Following this legal epitome or creed is the largest single block of the Pentateuch, Exodus 20:18–Numbers 10:9. With a few narrative interludes, such as the conclusion of the covenant ceremony in Exodus 24, this block is a vast collection of cultic law intermingled with civil and criminal legislation, much of which reflects the later practices of the Temple period, but all of which is attributed to the revelation of God to Moses at Sinai. Embedded in this material is the "Book of the Covenant" (Exod. 20:22–22:33), which reflects conditions in a settled agricultural community and is thought to contain indigenous Canaanite law adopted by Israel at a later time. Also embedded is the so-called Holiness Code, Leviticus 17–26, which spells out in detail the ways in which Israel can achieve the ritual and moral holiness appropriate to a people holy unto God.

The latter part of the book of NUMBERS (10:11–36:13) picks up the account of the wandering of the Israelites in the wilderness and reports conflicts within Israel itself, such as the rebellion of Korah (Num. 16), as well as conflicts with other peoples. The Pentateuch concludes with a single unified block, the book of DEUTERONOMY, the great last will and testament given by Moses before his death on the east bank of the Jordan and before the entry of the tribes into the Promised Land. As its name suggests, Deuteronomy is a sermonic repetition. It opens with a summary of the history of God's saving acts with the people (chaps. 1–3), followed by exhortations to obedience and loyalty (chaps. 4–11), and another great block of legal material known as the Deuteronomistic Code (chaps. 12–25). It concludes with a ceremony of covenant recommitment, curses and blessings, Moses' final song and blessing, and an account of his death (chaps. 26–34).

Sources of the Pentateuch. By the middle of the eighteenth century, students of the OT had begun to realize that a vast collection of materials of such widely divergent character as those which make up the Pentateuch undoubtedly represented the work of many hands over many generations. A source-critical approach began to detect specific strands in the material, and by 1878, when JULIUS WELLHAUSEN published the first edition of History of Israel, a four-source hypothesis had reached the shape that it retains to this day. SOURCE CRITICISM identifies as the oldest continuous stratum of the Pentateuch a "Yahwistic" source (known as J after the first letter of "Jahweh," the German spelling of the divine name). This source was set down in writing in the tenth to ninth century B.C., probably during the united monarchy of David and Solomon. It is distinguished by the use of the divine name YHWH as well as by other linguistic tags, such as the name "Sinai" for the mountain of God and "Canaanite" for the indigenous peoples of the land. The style is earthy and direct; God is often spoken of in anthropomorphic terms. It is animated by that scheme of promise leading to fulfillment under the guidance of God that is first predicted in Genesis 12:1-3. The J source begins with an account of the Creation and the Fall (Gen. 2:4b–4:26), runs on throughout Genesis to Exodus 24, reappears again in parts of Numbers, and makes a final appearance in Deuteronomy 34.

Woven together with the J source is an "Elohistic" or E source, written in the northern kingdom of Israel in the century following the division of the two kingdoms (ninth to eighth century B.C.). It knows God by the generic name "Elohim" until the revelation of the divine name to Moses on the mountain of God in Exodus 3:14-15. It typically refers to the mountain of God as "Horeb" and to the indigenous people of the land as "Amorites." Though it is much more fragmentary in character than the J source, it seems to supplement it, beginning with Genesis 15, making a major contribution in the story of the "binding" of Isaac in Genesis 22, and running on through Exodus, parts of Numbers, and concluding in Deuteronomy 31:14-34. Scholars have detected a heightened role for Moses in the Elohistic source, a tendency toward a more spiritual conception of religion and a more delicate and ambiguous understanding of human nature.

The key for dating the entire scheme is the Deuteronomistic or D source, which consists of the book of Deuteronomy and of editorial touches in the other four books of the Pentateuch. By identifying Deuteronomy with the book that was found in the Temple during its renovation in the days of King Josiah, and which led that king to centralize worship in Jerusalem and to suppress local cults as demanded by the book of Deuteronomy (II Kings 22-23), source critics were also able to locate in prior times the two sources that had first recorded the history of Israel's formative experience and would thus have provided the basis for the great recapitulation of that experience undertaken by D.

The final Priestly or P source, deemed to be the work of learned priestly circles in the exilic or early postexilic period, provided the editorial framework for the entire Pentateuch. But the P "writer" was no mere copy editor, for this source brings its own perspective on Creation (Gen. 1:1-2:4a), the Flood, and the Exodus; furthermore, it incorporates vast blocks of cultic and legal tradition in Exodus 25-31; 35-40, all of LEVITICUS, and Numbers 1-10. Themes of the Priestly source center around a view of the world as a great organism in which the Sabbath, the Temple, and the people of Israel are the heartbeat, the regulator, and life-giving element. In Israel's cult God had provided the means necessary to make human life possible, and in so doing had elevated Jerusalem and its sanctuary to the very pinnacle of the world.

The Prehistory of the Pentateuch. Building upon the work of nineteenth-century source critics, twentieth-century scholarship has devoted much of its effort to reconstructing the evolution of the Pentateuchal tradition prior to its reduction to writing at the hands of the great theologians J, E, D, and P. Scholars such as HERMANN GUNKEL, Albrecht Alt, and GERHARD VON RAD, using the methods of form criticism, which can trace small orally transmitted units back to their original forms and points of origin, have shown that the stories of Creation, the patriarchs and matriarchs, and the Egyptian sojourn of Israel were originally independent traditions that coalesced during the slow process of unification of the tribes of Israel in Canaan. In the process they were attached as preface and prologue to the memory of the root experiences of those tribes.

In his famous 1938 article, "The Form-Critical Problem of the Hexateuch," von Rad argued that in the cultic, preserved "little historical credo" of Deuteronomy 6:21-23 (see also 26:5-9; Josh. 24:2-13), the confession that "we were Pharaoh's slaves in Egypt; and the Lord brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand . . . and he brought us out from there, that he might bring us in and give us the land which he swore to give to our fathers," one could see not simply an epitome of the history of salvation, but the very source and kernel out of which the entire Pentateuch grew. Around this early testimony of a group of escaped slaves around whom had gathered other tribes who accepted allegiance to the same Yahweh who had brought liberation were woven the rest of the traditions and memories coming from disparate sources that constituted the collective religious memory of Israel. The memory of the other great root experience of the past, the covenant given at Sinai, was also woven into this primitive confession, yielding the great tapestry of Pentateuchal history that now lies before us. From von Rad's perspective, the book of Joshua, which tells of the conquest of the land and thus brings to fulfillment the promise of blessing that animated the entire story, ought to be included in the earliest stratum of Israel's tradition. Therefore, he prefers to speak of a Hexateuch, a six-book Torah rather than a Pentateuch. Others, such as MARTIN NOTH, prefer to link the book of Deuteronomy to the historical writings that follow it from Joshua through II Kings in a single unified work of ancient Israelite historiography called the Deuteronomistic history. For Noth, then, the earliest stratum of the OT is a four-book block, a Tetrateuch.

While these modern judgments regarding the proper scope of the original confession of Israel are worth considering, the historic identification of the five books of Moses as the foundation upon which all the rest stands still has the weight of tradition behind it, and a great deal of merit in its own right. It leaves the reader poised on the eastern bank of Jordan, looking across at the Promised Land, and faced with the burning questions that confront the covenant community in every age: What are we going to do? Will we be obedient to the one who has blessed us and led us all this way? Have we the courage to decide against death and curse and for life and blessing, with all the loyalty and the love that the latter require (Deut. 30:19)?

PENTECOST. Biblically, the Feast of Weeks, in both the OT and the NT; the second of three festivals on which every male Jew was required to worship at the Temple (Exod. 34:22-23; II Chr. 8:12-13). It means "fifty days," because the feast falls seven weeks after the opening of the harvest season (Lev. 23:15-16). The Sadducees considered Pentecost to be the Sabbath that falls during the festival of unleavened bread; others held that Pentecost is the first day of the festival of unleavened bread. Sometimes the day is called the Day of Firstfruits, celebrating the harvest. Later Christian tradition held that Pentecost is the day on which Moses received the Law, but there is no historical evidence for this.

For Christians the most important Pentecost festival was the one that took place after Jesus' resurrection. On that day the Holy Spirit fell upon the believers and gave them the power of xenoglossy, or the ability to speak and be understood in foreign languages. This was not the glossolalia or tongues-speaking of modern Pentecostals, which is the expression of syllables without content, but the ability to address Parthians, Medes, and others and be understood (Acts 2:7-8). This event is sometimes called the birthday of the church.

Pentecost in the Christian Year is the fiftieth day after Easter. From early times this became an important festival in worship. Believers fasted in preparation, and many baptisms were performed on that day. Today it is the longest portion of the church year for those who follow the interdenominational lectionary. J.C.

PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES. A conservative evangelical grouping of several denominations that stresses the necessity of believers receiving the BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT, an experience that occurs subsequent to conversion. This inward experience is attested to by external evidence of the individual speaking in tongues (GLOSSOLALIA), a duplication of the event at Pentecost. Pentecostals, besides confessing faith in the major tenets of orthodox Christianity, have emphasized the ministry of the HOLY SPIRIT in the life of believers, especially SPIRITUAL GIFTS that, besides speaking in tongues and their interpretation, include such gifts (charismata) as prophetic utterance, HEALING, etc. Whether the tongues spoken are recognizable foreign languages or some form of ecstatic utterance or unknown or unidentified speech varies in individual experience.

While the conduct of worship services in Pentecostal churches is quite similar to that of other evangelical groups, there are times when individuals in the congregation may utter "a message from the Lord" that may be delivered in vernacular speech or in a "tongue." If in the latter, most Pentecostal assemblies insist that an interpretation be given in the language understood by the congregation.

In earlier years Pentecostals, especially those in rural or mountain areas, were referred to as Holy Rollers. This appellation was given because Pentecostal services were marked by convulsive bodily movements and highly emotional scenes of weeping, shouting, singing, and ecstatic cries. Because of what non-Pentecostals regarded as bizarre behavior, Pentecostals were often ostracized and persecuted by other believers. What Pentecostals described as evidences of the Holy Spirit's activity, other Christians felt was excessive emotionalism. Some even ascribed the activity and teaching to Satanic influence.

Actually similar CHARISMATIC conduct has occurred in various segments of the church throughout the centuries of its history. But the Pentecostal movement is essentially a modern phenomenon that can be traced to the early part of the twentieth century in the United States.

While there are reports of earlier Pentecostal signs in American religious history, most scholars regard Pentecostalism as emerging from the Holiness movement of the latter half of the nineteenth century. Advocates of that revivalist movement followed the Methodist teaching of crisis sanctification and Christian perfection as taught by John Wesley. Thus entire SANCTIFICATION takes place instantly in an emotional experience similar to conversion. Some of its earlier proponents spoke of it as "a second work of grace." However, HOLINESS people never advocated a baptism in the Holy Spirit that was evidenced by speaking in tongues. In fact, Holiness teaching historically has been completely opposed to this central teaching of Pentecostalism.

Yet at the turn of the century certain American Holiness ministers became interested in manifestations of spiritual enthusiasm such as glossolalia, or tongues-speaking. Charles Fox Parham, a Methodist minister in the Holiness movement, had established the Bethel Bible College in Topeka, Kansas. While Parham was away from the school on January 1, 1901, Agnes N. Ozman, one of the Bethel students, testified to experiencing the baptism of the Spirit, and she spoke in tongues. Parham and other students had similar experiences, and with a new zeal they began to evangelize in Missouri and Texas. Houston became the new center of Parham's activities. With W. F. Carothers, a local minister, he opened a school. One of their converts was William J. Seymour, a humble black man with one eye. Parham urged Seymour to conduct a mission in Los Angeles. In 1906 in the Apostolic Faith Gospel Mission on Azusa Street, Seymour was used to launch the real beginnings of modern Pentecostalism. Despite his unimpressive appearance, Seymour was the instrument in a revival effort that soon drew nationwide attention, and ultimately took Pentecostalism to the four corners of the earth. Soon there were virile Pentecostal movements in Britain, the Scandinavian countries, Germany, India, and South America, especially in Chile and Brazil.

Most of the major Pentecostal denominations of the United States can trace their beginnings to the Azusa Street revival. Out of it came movements that later developed into the Assemblies of God, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), the black Church of God in Christ, and the International Church of the Four-Square Gospel, 10-51. Representatives of these so-called historic Pentecostal churches were agents in the 1960s in introducing their distinctives, which are now called the Charismatic movement, or renewal, to leaders in mainline denominations and the Roman Catholic church. PENUEL. A sanctuary and fortified town in central Transjordan Palestine. Alternately called "Peniel," the town played a strategic role at various times in Israelite history. It is listed among the cities conquered by Pharaoh Shishak in 918 B.C. In Genesis 32:30 a folk etymology "face of God" is applied to it, since it was made the site of Jacob's mysterious struggle with a supernatural being, after which he said that he had "seen God face to face." Its exact historical location is disputed. B.V.

PEOPLE OF GOD. This term belongs to both the OT and the NT; indeed it is one of the several links that connect the Jewish religion and the Christian faith as sharing in a common ancestry.

The root idea of people of God is twofold, suggesting the interrelation of PROMISE and COVENANT community. God's promise to Abraham (Gen. 12:1-3) centered in the rise of a people to whom the promise of both nationhood and special relationship to Yahweh were promised. Yahweh calls them "my people" (Isa. 51:4; Zeph. 2:9), as a nation chosen out of all the tribes of the earth to be God's special "treasure" (Exod. 19:6 KJV). The self-designation of Israel as "God's people" (II Sam. 14:13) implies that they belong to God (Deut. 14:2; 26:18) and are God's "possession" (Deut. 4:20). The classic passage in which this is described is Deuteronomy 7:6-8, with its notes of election, calling, and God's free love for Israel. All these terms underlie the covenant that God initiated and Israel accepted, under Moses' direction. But unhappily there was infidelity on Israel's part (Jer. 31:31-34), leading to the inauguration of a "new covenant" (II Cor. 3; Heb. 8), and a fresh focus placed on the concept of the people of God (I Pet. 2:1-10).

Both John the Baptist and Jesus are set in the context of Israel's religious life and hope for a New Age (Luke 1:16, 17, 68-79). They come on the stage of history to create a new people of God which, while having roots in the past and maintaining direct continuity with historic Israel, will have a new definition, that is, this people will be transnational and multiracial, harking back to Genesis 12:1-3. The inclusion of non-Jews within the covenant people is seen as anticipated in the OT (Rom. 9:25; II Cor. 6:16; Tit. 2:14; I Pet. 2:9, 10), but largely lost in a time of Israel's nationalism and exclusiveness. The membership of the people of God is now a wider term than ethnic status but embraces all who believe in Jesus as God's Messiah (Rom. 10:4-13). Israel as a believing remnant is included (Rom. 9:6-13) along with Paul's mission churches; together they form one united people as a promise of universal reconciliation (Rom. 11:25-32).

PERDITION, SON OF. The single allusion to this term in the NT is in II Thessalonians 2:3, where the writer, traditionally taken to be Paul, is answering some pressing pastoral needs at Thessalonica. Evidently the church was of a mind to suppose that the final day of world history had already dawned. Paul writes to assure them that this is not so (II Thess. 2:1-3), since the final "day will not come" until "the man of lawlessness is revealed, [he is] the son of perdition." This eschatological figure is described in a well-known Semitic manner, meaning a person who transgresses God's law (2:8) and so is destined for destruction—a fate that will, in Jewish-Christian apocalyptic, overtake the embodiment of evil in the last days. Opinions are greatly divided over who this person may have been, but it seems clear, from the descriptions in 2:4-10, that some political force in the Roman Empire, hostile to the church, was in view. (See ANTICHRIST.)

PEREA. The Transjordan region inherited by Herod Antipas after the death of his father, Herod the Great, in 4 B.C. Paralleling Samaria and Judea, Perea extended north and south between Pella and Machaerus. Its eastern edge flanked Nabatea. A non-biblical designation, Perea corresponds to the NT expression "beyond the Jordan" (Mark 3:8, John 10:40). Jesus traversed Perea on his final journey to Jerusalem (Matt. 19:1).

J.K.K.

PERFECTIONISM. The belief, held at different times and places among Christians, that a person is able to achieve perfect union with God in this world. Perfectionism has been held in the ancient church, the medieval church, and notably in Protestantism was taught by John Wesley and held by much of the Methodist movement, being modified and/or given up around the end of the nineteenth century. Once Methodism stopped emphasizing perfectionism, sectarian groups promoted the idea, producing the HOLINESS movement. Several contemporary churches and sects have a background in the Holiness revivals, including the Church of the Nazarene and the various Free and Wesleyan Methodist churches.

Roman Catholicism teaches the possibility of attaining a relatively perfect union with God in the world, based on the degree of charity or Christian love one possesses and exercises. Thomas Aquinas defined perfection in the believer's life as charity. However, one in such a state still commits venial sins. Wesley was so criticized for his early beliefs in perfectionism, that he more and more qualified his teachings. The Methodist ideal became one of "going on to perfection" rather than a claim to possess it.

The "councils of perfection" in Catholicism (voluntary poverty, perpetual chastity, complete obedience) are not necessary for salvation but are taken up by those who aim at the greatest degree of moral perfection. (See also SANCTIFICATION.)

PERGA. The three allusions to Perga all occur in regard to Paul's mission to Asia Minor in Acts 13:14. Perga was the capital town of the province of PAMPYLIA and was visited by Paul and Barnabas both on the outward and return visits to the Asian hinterland (Acts 13:13-14; 14:25). The locality was famed for the shrine of the goddess Artemis (Roman, Diana), who was known as the queen of Perga.

PERGAMUM. An ancient town in Mysia, now Turkey, where the site is known as Bergama, a small township. Referred to in Revelation 2:12-17 it is one of the places to receive letters from John in the name of the risen Christ (KJV, Pergamos). In the first century it had many temples, including the famed altar of Zeus, which may be referred to in Revelation 2:13 as "Satan's throne." The altar is now reconstructed in a museum in East Berlin.

The Asclepieum theater at Pergamum

Pergamum was the center of Caesar worship because of its place as the capital of the Roman province of Asia Minor. Equally it had a famous shrine of Asklepios, the god of healing, and it was the center of a therapeutic cult. It also boasted a large library, established by Eumenes II, which later was moved to Alexandria in Egypt. Parchment as writing material was said to have been used first at Pergamum; the city's name is derived from the Latin word for parchment (pergamena). R.M.

PERIZZITES. A Palestinian people linked with the Canaanites to denote the two major populations preceding Israelite penetration into the land (Gen. 13:7; 34:30; Judg. 1:4-5). If "Canaanite" and "Perizzite" respectively designate occupants of fortified cities and unwalled villages, "Perizzite" may reflect class as well as ethnic condition. Typically the Perizzites are associated with five population groups—Canaanites, Hittites, Amorites, Hivites, and Jebusites (Exod. 3:8; Deut. 20:17; Judg. 3:5). Later, Perizzite remnants were drafted into Solomon's assemblage of forced laborers (I Kings 9:20). J.K.K.

PERPETUA AND FELICITAS. North African Christian martyrs of the early third century A.D. Perpetua was a noblewoman of Carthage, and Felicitas was most likely a slave woman in her household. Perpetua had a son and Felicitas a daughter, born in prison. They all died in the Circus at Carthage, along with their teacher, Saturus. J.C.

PERRONET, EDWARD (1726–92). Clergyman and hymn writer. Edward Perronet was born in the village of Sundridge, England, the son of Vincent Perronet, a devout Anglican clergyman. The Perronets were descendants of a Huguenot family that fled from France to Switzerland and then to England. Both Perronets were sympathetic to the evangelical movement and its leaders, John and Charles Wesley, and George Whitefield. The younger Perronet once wrote: "I was born and am likely to die in the tottering communion of the Church of England, but I despise her nonsense." However, he later broke from the Anglican church and worked with the Wesleys for several years. For this Perronet suffered persecution and opposition from the opponents of Methodism. Eventually, he separated from the Wesleys and became the pastor of an independent church in Canterbury. Perronet's greatest contribution to hymnody was the text of "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name." Dr. John Rippon, a Baptist minister, rewrote some stanzas and dropped others. Today various versions of this triumphant song of worship are sung to the accompaniment of at least three tunes. R.H.

PERSECUTION. The harassment within a society of individuals or groups who have different opinions or are of a different background from the dominant group in the society. The harassment may range from the infliction of physical violence and even death, through imprisonment, fines, civil disabilities, to discrimination in employment, housing, and so forth. The differences that give rise to persecution may be racial or ethnic, political or religious. Here, we are considering religious persecution, which seems to be almost as old as religion itself and is still common in the present day. The existential character of religious beliefs means that they are held passionately, so that alternative beliefs may seem like a serious threat to someone's deepest convictions. But often this religious fanaticism is combined with political or racial motives where the dominant group feels its power to be threatened. The decline of religious beliefs in modern times and the rise of indifference may have reduced the incidence of purely religious persecutions in many parts of the world, but political and racial or ethnic motivations still keep alive some of the old religious rivalries.

The Church and Persecution. The Christian church had its origins as a movement within Judaism, but when the differences reached a certain degree, Christianity was experienced as a threat to the Jewish traditions, and in its very earliest days the church was subjected to persecution by Jews. This is attested in the NT, which tells how Stephen became the first Christian to die for his faith (Acts 7). At that time, Christians may have thought of the Roman authorities as affording some protection, but soon it was the Roman Empire that became the most persistent and dangerous persecutor of the new religion. Traditionally, there were ten great persecutions of the church by the empire, but this figure is only conventional, and the true picture is of sporadic hostility for a period of about two hundred and fifty years, sometimes becoming very severe in particular areas.

The most famous of these persecutions under the empire were the following: (1) NERO subjected the church to severe persecution in Rome in A.D. 64 and 65, and at that time both Peter and Paul perished. (2) The writer of Revelation claims to have been an exile for the faith on the island of Patmos near the end of the first century, and this was probably the result of a persecution under the emperor DOMITIAN. (3) IGNATIUS, bishop of Antioch, was martyred in A.D. 107 in the reign of TRAJAN, and correspondence between Pliny and Trajan in 112 makes it clear that there were persecutions of Christians in Asia Minor at that time, though it also suggests that Christians were not being actively sought out. (4) There was a bad outbreak of persecution at Lyons in 177, under Marcus Aurelius. (5) The beginning of the third century saw an attempt to end conversions to Christianity, and it is to this time that the sad story of the martyrdom of PERPETUA and her companions at Carthage belongs. There followed a time of relative quiet, broken about the middle of the century by (6) the persecution of Decius, who required all citizens to sacrifice to the emperor, leading to many apostasies. (7) The last persecution, under DIOCLETIAN, was the most systematic and severe of all, leading to the destruction of many churches and sacred books. It began in 303, and was terminated by the emperor Constantine in 313, when the Edict of Milan granted toleration to the church.

As we continue the story, the ironies of persecution begin to emerge. As the Christian church became increasingly entrenched in the empire, it took itself to persecuting the remaining pockets of paganism. In the Middle Ages, Jews, Muslims, and heretics were sought out and punished with great severity by the Inquisition. The Reformation brought little improvement. Calvin caused the unfortunate Servetus to be burned at the stake in Geneva for his anti-trinitarian views. In England Roman Catholics burned Anglicans under Mary, while the roles were reversed under Elizabeth I. Even in the American colonies, where many people had fled to escape persecution in Europe, new intolerances and persecutions came about. The situation began to improve in the seventeenth century. A major figure in bringing about change was Roger Williams, author of The Bloody Tenent of Persecution (1644) and founder of the state of Rhode Island, where religious freedom was written into the charter. Meanwhile in England the Toleration Act (1689) and subsequent legislation gradually established full religious liberty.

Modern Persecutions. In the world at large, persecutions continue. Throughout the nineteenth century, Jews were persecuted in various European countries, and this culminated in the twentieth century in the attempted mass extermination of European Jewry under Hitler. For sheer magnitude and malevolence, nothing like this had ever been known before in the history of the human race. Death camps for the mass destruction of human beings were set up, and it is estimated that six million people perished in them. In this case, of course, racial and religious motives were mingled, and the Nazi creed was itself a quasi-religion (see HOLOCAUST). Much the same can be said about Soviet Communism in Russia and, since 1945, other countries of Eastern Europe. In these countries the Christian faith has been seen as a rival to Marxist ideology. In some cases, the persecution has been severe; in others, while it may not be overt, it is subtly maintained, and Christians are debarred from certain forms of employment and from positions of influence. The human race, including, it would seem, those who count themselves Christians, has still much to learn about the basic human right to freedom of religion. (See LIBERTY, RELIGIOUS.) J.M.

PERSEVERANCE. The capacity to maintain a belief or an allegiance in the face of discouragement or even persecution. In the early church, those who persevered in the faith even to the point of martyrdom were highly esteemed, while nothing was blamed more severely than the behavior of those who lapsed and became apostates. But perseverance is not considered primarily as a human virtue, but rather as a gift of God. As doctrines of ELECTION and PREDESTINATION arose in the church, it came to be believed that in electing the faithful or making a covenant with people God gave with it the gift of perseverance. God would not let go of those who were chosen. God's grace would make up for their weakness, and even if they temporarily lapsed, God would bring them back. Paul gives eloquent expression to these ideas in Romans 9-11, which speak of the election, apostasy, and final restoration of the chosen people of Israel. J.M.

PERSIA. The name refers to the country in ancient times that today is called Iran, although Iran is sometimes used to include a wider range of territory including Afghanistan, Baluchistan, and West Turkistan. Persia was bounded on the west by Elam or Susiana, on the north by Media, on the south by the Persian Gulf, and on the east by Carminia. The term "Persia" (Dan. 11:2; Neh. 12:22) derives from a geographical region of southern Iran known as Persis (Pars, Parsa; modern Fars). It was apparently extended to the whole of the country during the Achaemenid dynasty, which was founded in the middle of the sixth century B.C., and was used until the Pahlavi dynasty (Reza Shah) initiated the change to Iran ("the Land of the Aryans"). The government of Iran officially requested on March 21, 1935, that other governments adopt and use that name. However, the tradition had been too long standing and too well imbedded in Western minds, and in October of 1949 the government of Iran officially announced that the name Persia would also be acceptable.

The change in name to Iran was intended by the Shah to emphasize the Indo-European nature of the people who had migrated there in the second millennium B.C. from central Asia to the north and who were now living among largely Semitic and Oriental people. The people of Iran, however, are of mixed ancestry, and the country is composed of many diverse elements including Arab, Turkish, Armenian, Assyrian, Kurdish, and others. The language of ancient Persis was Indo-European. It is called Old Persian and is known primarily through the cuneiform inscriptions of the Achaemenian kings from the sixth to the fourth centuries B.C. The best-known example is the Behistun Rock. Imperial inscriptions, as on this rock, were usually trilingual in the Achaemenid period—Old Persian, Elamite, and Akkadian. Avestan, the language of the ZOROASTRIAN scriptures, is equally old; it and Old Persian constitute two of the oldest attested languages of Iran. In order to facilitate the administration of a linguistically diverse country, the Achaemenids introduced ARAMAIC (Ezra 4:7), which became the lingua franca of the empire until it was replaced by Greek under the impact of Alexander the Great's conquest. People spoke Aramaic, however, in remote stretches of the empire until the time of Christ. It is thought by many that Christ probably conversed normally in this language. Many Aramaisms appear in the NT. Modern Hebrew is written in this Aramaic block script. In Persia itself, during the period from 300 B.C. to A.D. 700, five different major forms of Persian are known to have been used. From A.D. 700 onward modern Persian appears as the standard language of Persia written in the Arabic script. Other languages include Kurdish, Ossetic, Baluchi, Pashto, Wakhi, and Azerbaijani.

The religion of Persia before Zoroaster (traditional date of birth 660 B.C. but may be older) was polytheistically associated with nature—sun, moon, stars, earth, fire, water, and winds, which were in the control of supernatural powers. In the hierarchic organization of the gods, Mithra (Vedic, Mitra) was very popular among Aryans everywhere. His presence is recorded in a Hittite document of the fourteenth century B.C. found in Asia Minor. The Roman Mithras was modeled after this god. The gods were worshiped and sacrificed to openly by priests using fire worship and the psychedelic potion made from the haoma plant. Zoroaster instituted reforms that tended toward ethical monotheism, that is, he taught that his system of morality came from a supreme good God, who was already well known as AHURA MAZDA ("Wise Lord"). He seems to have held to the existence of lesser divine beings who were subordinate to the one supreme being. He taught a kind of dualism with an Evil Spirit opposing the Good Spirit. Each human soul is the seat of a war between good and evil. He found the support of an influential priestly group called the magi, concerning whose identity there is still much confusion. They were known as far away as Athens for their adeptness in the practice of magic. In the Achaemenid period they seem to have been at odds with the Zoroastrian rulers of Persia, and it is not certain that they were of Aryan stock. Perhaps they were Semitic. Some of their group may later have visited Jesus as a babe in Bethlehem (Matt. 2:1; "wise men" in Greek is magi).

The AVESTAS, the sacred scriptures of the Zoroastrian religion, were assembled in the Sasanian period (A.D. 226–651). The oldest Zoroastrian traditions indicate that their founder did not write any books, but that his disciples later wrote them out of their remembrance. During this long period a number of changes were made in Zoroastrian religion: a highly worshipful reverence of Zoroaster; a change in Zoroaster's "monotheism" that brought back the old Aryan nature gods; a greater emphasis on the place of Mithra among the common people; the development of a fuller doctrine of ethical dualism; a shift from moral regeneration to considerations of ceremonial purity; an elaborate doctrine of the future life involving a multiple layered hell and heaven; a day of resurrection and judgment based on one's moral consciousness; and a new heaven and new earth. Three great deliverers would be born of a virgin, one each thousand years before the Day of Judgment. Although much of this is to be found also in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, there is no demonstrably formative influence of Zoroastrianism on the theology of these religions. It is of interest, however, that Cyrus the Great, king of Persia, who in 538 B.C. allowed the Jews to return from captivity and rebuild their Temple in Jerusalem as a part of his general policy regarding captured nations, is regarded favorably by the prophet Isaiah, who calls him "the Lord's anointed" (45:1). He was, nominally at least, a Zoroastrian.

The period of Persian history that is of most importance for readers of the Bible is that of the Achaemenid kings whose reigns are as follows: CYRUS II (559-530), Cambyses II (530-522), Smerdis or Gaumata (522), DARIUS I (522-486), XERXES I (486-465), Artaxerxes I (465-424), Xerxes II and Sogdianus or Secydianus (424-423), Darius II (423-404), Artaxerxes II (404-359/358), Artaxerxes III (359/358-338/337), Arses (338/337-336/335), and Darius III (336/335-330). These span the period covered during the BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY of the Jews and their subsequent servitude to the Persians down to the time of Alexander the Great. Perhaps Cyrus II was especially favorable to the Jews (II Chr. 36:22; Isa. 45:1; Ezra 1:1-8; 3:7; 6:4-5) because when he conquered the Babylonians he found the exiled Jews to be a subjugated race that abhorred idols, whose basic views of religion were somewhat like his own. The Bible states that "the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia," who said "the Lord, the God of heaven, has given me all the kingdoms of the earth" (II Chr. 36:22-23). Cyrus gave the Jews considerable assistance in returning to their homeland to rebuild their Temple (Ezra 1:1-11), a practice we now know from the discovery of the Cyrus Cylinder to be a matter of policy with Cyrus for all conquered peoples such as Armenians, Lydians, Greeks, and others. That the Jews fared well under Persian rule is evident from the OT book of Esther. The books of the Jewish Apocrypha do not speak harshly of Persian rule. After the death of Cyrus, work lagged in Jerusalem on the Temple; but when Darius I, his successor, located the edict of Cyrus commissioning the building project he financed its completion (Ezra 6). The prophets Haggai and Zechariah participated in the effort (Ezra 5:1).

Another Persian king who was prominent in Jewish history was AHASUERUS, unknown by that name in Persian history but probably to be identified with Xerxes I since he is mentioned in Ezra 4:5-7 between Darius and Artaxerxes. He was the king who made Hadassah, a Jew whose Persian name was Esther, his queen (Esth. 4:7, 17). His successor, Artaxerxes I, permitted two other groups to return to Judah. One was led by Nehemiah, who rebuilt the walls around the city of Jerusalem (Neh. 1). The other was led by Ezra, who restored the spiritual life of the people (Ezra 7-10).

Persians are not referred to by name in the NT, but they are the Parthians mentioned in Acts 2:8 along with the Medes and Elamites. Jewish pilgrims came from these countries to the feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem. The Parthians (or Arsacids) ruled eastern Persia from the third century B.C. till the third century A.D. The Romans were never successful in subjugating Parthia, both Crassus (53 B.C.) and Mark Antony (36 B.C.) having been defeated in their attempts.

PERSONALISM. Any type of philosophy that takes personal existence as its primary clue to an understanding of reality. The personalist believes that more is to be learned about the universe from the higher levels of being (and personality is the highest known to us) than from the lower levels (hydrogen atoms and such). Thus personalism tends to be a philosophy of spirit and stands opposed to materialism and other reductionist theories. It also tends toward some form of THEISM.

The expression "personalism" was applied especially to a school of philosophy centered at Boston University. Its leading advocate was Borden Parker Bowne (1847-1910), and it still has eminent representatives, for example, Peter Bertocci (b. 1910). The school had affinities with Lotze and Eucken in Germany, Boutroux in France, and Ward in England. The very fact that the universe has brought forth personal beings is claimed to be evidence of a personal creative source. It is argued too that the categories that we employ in our understanding of the world, for example, causation, are ultimately derived from personal experience.

As well as this narrower use of the word "personalism," it is applied also to such thinkers as MARTIN BUBER and GABRIEL MARCEL. With Buber, it is the knowing of other persons rather than the knowing of facts that is the paradigm of knowing. The "between" of interpersonal relations is the environment of human existence, rather than the impersonal physical universe. Though he uses a different philosophical idiom, Marcel also stresses the ontological ultimacy of the personal, especially as it transcends beyond the merely individual existence into the realm of the intersubjective and of human community. It is at this point that one may make a distinction between personalism and EXISTENTIALISM. While both types of philosophy stress the uniqueness and irreducibility of personal existence, known to us primarily in human existence, the personalists insist that personal being fulfills itself only in community, while existentialists (SARTRE is the obvious example) are concerned with individual existence and even tend to regard interpersonal relations as essentially frustrating.

PESHER. In ancient Judaism an application of biblical prophecies to the events of the end times. Such peshes are especially common in the texts found at Qumran, called the Dead Sea Scrolls. The term "peshes" is found in Ecclesiastes 8:1: "Who knows the interpretation of a thing?" The Aramaic word peshar occurs thirty-one times in the section of Daniel written in Aramaic. It is used for the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dreams and the handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's feast by Daniel. The angel's interpretation of Daniel's night vision (Dan. 7) is also called a peshar. This shows that peshers are the result of divine revelation, rather than of human wisdom. The Aramaic section of Daniel uses a Persian noun, raz, to designate mysteries, such as Nebuchadnezzar's dream. The idea is that both the mystery, or raz, and the interpretation of it, the peshar, come from God.

PESHITTA. A version of the Bible in Syriac, so called after its designation "peshitta" meaning "the simple [version]" and intended to be used in a popular way as easily readable by Syrian Christians. The OT parts are extant in an ancient codex in the British Library, London, and cover Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The NT Peshitta was in circulation before A.D. 431 and is ascribed to Rabbula, bishop of Edessa. But this attribution is uncertain. Discoveries of a Peshitta text that Rabbula used cast doubt on the tradition.

PETER, ACTS OF. An Apocryphal work probably written in Greek by a resident of Asia Minor around A.D. 200. The author seems to have modeled his work on another Apocryphal work, the Acts of John. While not completely so, the Acts of Peter is generally orthodox. It is some 2,750 lines long, about the length of the Acts of the Apostles. The text is preserved in Coptic, Latin, Greek, Slavonic, Syriac, Armenian, Arabic, and Ethiopic. The manuscript contains supposed speeches or sermons of Peter, as well as a legendary account of Peter's martyrdom in Rome. The canonical Acts of the Apostles is obviously the pattern for this book. For example, Peter is said to have caused the deaths of Ananias and Sapphira in Acts 5:1-6. Augustine (Against Adimantus XVII, 5) criticizes the Manichaeans for retelling this story from the Apocryphal Acts.

PETER, APOCALYPSE OF. An early pseudonymous work, attributed to Peter but probably from the second century A.D. In the early church the Apocalypse of Peter was almost as popular as the canonical Apocalypse (or Revelation) of John. Indeed, it is mentioned in the late second-century list of biblical books prepared in Rome, the Muratorian Canon, although the Canon adds, "some will not have it read in the church." The work is about three hundred lines, but a full text has not survived. The text is reconstructed from a Greek fragment (the Akhmim fragment), an Ethiopic version, and quotations from the book found in ancient writings.

PETER, APOSTLE. The NT literature gives prominent place to Peter, whose life and ministry fall conveniently into the three categories.

Early Days. Occasional references to Peter's original name Symeon show that he belonged to the Jewish community (Acts 15:14 Modern Language Bible). His home was in Galilee, at Bethsaida (John 1:44), and it is known that, while this locality was Jewish, it was also of a cosmopolitan nature. Both Andrew, Peter's brother, and Philip, who also hailed from Bethsaida, bear Greek names. The bilingual setting arising from Greek culture explains why Simon became his adopted name.

His father's name was Jonah, which is the same as John (Matt. 16:17; John 1:42). At some point in his life not specified he had married (Mark 1:30), and in later days his wife accompanied him on his missionary tours, evidently to Corinth, where she was known (I Cor. 9:5).

His trade, both at Bethsaida on the east bank of the Jordan River and at Capernaum, another port on Lake Gennesaret, was fishing (Mark 1:16-21). Luke 5:1-11 is a passage that indicates something of his trade, which he resumed for a while in the later part of the Gospel story (John 21:1-3).

As to his cultural attainments, Acts 4:13 should not be pressed unduly. It is probably to be seen as a description of Peter and John as "uneducated, common men," which implies no more than that they were ignorant of the finer points of the rabbinical interpretation of the Jewish law. Exposure to Hellenistic culture in Bethsaida is a counterbalancing argument in favor of Peter's general education. He spoke his native language with a special, recognizable accent (Mark 14:70; Matt. 26:73). Both he and his brother ANDREW were followers of John the Baptist (John 1:35-42), as indeed were a considerable number of the original disciples (Acts 1:22) before their call to service by Jesus.

Call to Discipleship. John preserves an authentic tradition of Jesus' Judean ministry, part of which included the summons of John 1:40-42. In this context we first meet the nomenclature by which "Simon" is replaced by "Peter." The middle link-term is the Aramaic Kepha meaning "stone" or "rock." This is to be his new name, symbolizing a change of character. Hereafter he will be a new man, consolidated by his relationship to Christ his Lord. The name-giving is probably postulatory, anticipating the time when Peter will take his place as a pillar apostle (Gal. 2:9) and the foundation-stone, which he and the other apostles were to be as original witnesses to the gospel (Eph. 2:20; Rev. 21:14). "Cephas" is Paul's normal appellation of him, except for Galatians 2:7 ff.

This first introduction to Jesus in Judea makes more intelligible the subsequent response Peter made when Jesus called him to abandon his trade and become his disciple in a full-time capacity (Mark 1:16 ff.; 10:28; Luke 5:1-11 gives an expanded version of this call). A further invitation to belong to the inner group of the Twelve is given in Mark 3:13 ff., and the new name is mentioned at that time. Mark calls him Simon up to 3:16; thereafter he refers to him as Peter.

Peter's Role in the Ministry of Jesus. Still another honor was his as Jesus permitted a group of three disciples to accompany him on special occasions. Peter is included in the trio along with James and John (see Mark 5:37; 9:2; 14:33). In the lists of the Twelve, Peter stands out at the head (Mark 3:16; Acts 1:13). In Matthew's Gospel special incidents are told in which Peter plays a unique role, both in action (Matt. 14:23-33) and word (Matt. 16:13-17).

The confession at Caesarea Philippi is problematical. The authenticity of the passage (Matt. 16:17-19) has been challenged on textual grounds. Harnack tried to show that the passage is an interpolation into the original text, made at Rome in the time of Hadrian, A.D. 117-138. But this is a vain plea, without any external support. Moreover, the Semitic coloring of the passage testifies to its primitive character.

On a second argument, it is objected that linguistically the term for "church" (Greek ekklesia) is an anachronism. But linguistic researches show that the true equivalent of ekklesia is the Hebrew word for "assembly" or the Aramaic term for "gathering." Thus it is more appropriate to translate the Greek word as "people of God" than "church." In this way we remove the idea that Jesus could not have envisioned an institutional body at Matthew 16:18 and 18:17. No such concept is required since he more reasonably had in view the eschatological people of God, which he had come to gather in his earthly ministry and beyond.

A third objection raises the issue of the subsequent history of the church. It is said that Peter did not occupy the authoritative position, which would inevitably have been secured for him by this saying of Jesus in Matthew 16:19. The argument hinges on the meaning of the power of "the keys." Evidently what is meant here is the spiritual perception that will enable Peter to lead others in through the door of revelation through which he has passed himself. This "key" was not the exclusive possession of Peter, though on the day of Pentecost by common consent he was the first to use it. In Acts 10 he opened the door of faith to Cornelius as the firstfruits of the Gentile mission (see Acts 11:18).

Peter's confession was the turning point in Jesus' ministry. To him was accorded, by divine revelation, the insight into the mystery of Jesus' person, whom he acknowledged as Israel's Messiah and the divine Son. The subsequent rebuke (Matt. 16:21-33) is directly related to Peter's misunderstanding of what Messiahship involved and his attempt to dissuade Jesus from the path to the cross. Mark preserves the vivid narration (Mark 8:32-33), which exposes Peter's frail humanity.

An integral part of the confession at Caesarea Philippi is the subsequent experience of the TRANS-FIGURATION. Peter is again spokesperson for the three, and again misguided and fallible (Mark 9:5). Later reflection showed the reality of this vision, and Peter benefited from hindsight (I Pet. 5:1; II Pet. 1:16ff.). His proud claims to loyalty are shown up as hollow mockery by the events in Gethsemane, and his threefold denial (Mark 14:66ff.) is painfully told. The end is not without hope as the promise of "good-bye" (Mark 14:28) is confirmed by a personal message to Peter (Mark 16:7) and is followed by a personal appearance of the living Christ (Luke 24:34; I Cor. 15:5).

Peter's Apostleship. After Pentecost Peter became the leading figure in the apostolic church. The first twelve chapters of Acts show that he was clearly the dominant influence, both in decision-making and public preaching (see Acts 1:15ff.; 2:14ff.; 3:12ff.).

Before the Jewish authorities (4:5ff.) Peter was spokesperson. His many-sided role included that of forceful leader (5:1-11) and miracle-worker (5:15). Peter is presented as a church leader in his handling of the situation at Samaria (8:14ff.) and his encounter with Simon the sorcerer. Luke evidently decided to give prominence to the conversion of Cornelius by the way the narrative is written, with great fullness of detail and repetition for emphasis (Acts 10-11). Peter's Jewish susceptibilities were overcome and his convictions redirected as he came to learn that "God shows no partiality" (10:34), and that Gentiles such as Cornelius were suitable recipients of the gospel message, offered and received on the basis of trust in Christ, without any ceremonial requirement. Peter's sermon announced the good news, which was accepted gratefully and movingly. Peter's association with this embryonic Gentile mission is clear.

But his sympathies lay more with a mission to his Jewish compatriots, if we place the concordat with Paul (Gal. 2:7-10) in the period prior to the Jerusalem Council. His native weakness peeps through in the vacillations he practiced at Antioch (Gal. 2:14ff.), and he needed the stern reproof of Paul.

His arrest in Jerusalem at an earlier date (Acts 12:1ff.) led to imprisonment and release, the apparent hopelessness of his plight as a prisoner of Herod being described to highlight the need for him to leave Jerusalem. This he did, and "departed and went to another place" (Acts 12:17).

Aside from a brief reappearance at the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:7ff.), Peter now vanishes from the NT story of the church. Attempts have been made to argue that he left Jerusalem for Rome, to become the first bishop there. But this is countered by the fact that when Paul wrote his Letter to the Romans, he had no knowledge of Peter's presence in the imperial city, and recent Roman Catholic writers are more flexible than heretofore in leaving this identification of "another place" with Rome as an open question. No certain answer is possible. The rise of James in his absence, however, requires that he soon moved away from the Holy City and engaged in missionary work elsewhere (Gal. 2:9), possibly Corinth (I Cor. 1:12) and the regions of Pontus-Bithynia (I Pet. 1:1).

Peter the Martyr. The apostolic authorship of I PETER requires that Peter wrote his epistle from Rome, if (as is very likely) 5:13 in that document conceals the name of the imperial city. If, on the other hand, I Peter originated as a group document, composed by a Petrine school—as is more likely—that group associated with Peter's name is best located at Rome.

Christian tradition speaks with a divided voice over Peter's stay in Rome. Irenaeus makes the two apostles, Peter and Paul, the founders of the church there; but this cannot be so, in view of Paul's letter in A.D. 58 to the Roman church, which he had not then visited (Rom. 1:13). More reliably, Eusebius, in citing Dionysius, witnesses to the cooperative work of the two men in Italy at a time when Paul was a prisoner there, presumably at the close of Acts.

The Neronian persecution in A.D. 64 marks the turning point, though our sources of information about the apostles are not clear. First Clement 5, 6 speaks of Christian martyrs at Rome in such a way as to fit the description of Tacitus, that it was during Nero's persecution that Paul and Peter perished. This would preclude any release of Paul and further ministry after Acts 28, unless the date of the two-year confinement in "free custody" is brought forward to make possible a release and further missionary work in the West. Many scholars accept the direct evidence of I Clement 5, 6 and insist that the two apostles were martyred in Nero's outburst (see CLEMENT, EPISTLES OF). The tradition that Peter was crucified head downward (found in the Apocryphal Acts of Peter) looks as if it is an embroidered version of John 21:18ff.

The burial sites of the apostles were evidently well known, according to Eusebius, who quotes Gaius, at the time of Bishop Zephyrinus, A.D. 198217: "You will find the trophies (Greek tropaia) of those who founded this church." The maximum conclusion to be drawn from the recent Vatican excavations is that Peter's memorial was cherished near the spot where he died. His body was never recovered—therefore all talk of Peter's bones is unrealistic—but with the later concern for relics for apologetical reasons Christians piously believed that his exact grave could be located.

PETER, EPISTLES OF. The letters, designated "Catholic Epistles," ascribed to Peter and written to churches in northeast Asia Minor in the case of I Peter and to churches of unspecified destination (II Peter).

I Peter—Authorship. The evidence of the letter itself attributes this document to the apostle Peter (1:1), and tradition supported by a number of scholars endorses this claim. Verbal links between the letter and Peter's recorded teaching in Acts are often appealed to. But other interpreters have cast doubt on these arguments and regard the letter as a document emanating from the late first century, notably on the grounds that the classical language is hardly that of a Galilean fisherman, and that the nature of the persecutions facing the church suggests a confrontation with the Roman state that came about in the early second century. Again there are counter-challenges to both these positions. Some scholars argue that there is no hint of state persecution in I Peter. Rather it is the local population in Pontus that is finding Christian social conduct a source of irritation and a reason for hostility. The first objection is answered by the supposition, for which there is some evidence in the letter itself (5:12), that the author employed a scribe-secretary, namely Silvanus, to "ghost-write" the letter, thereby accounting for the elevated style and rich language.

The letter, if Petrine, may be dated in the final year of the apostle's life, around A.D. 64–65, reflecting conditions that led to Nero's persecution of Christians in Rome. If the letter is not genuinely Peter's, its date is usually set in the eighties or nineties or in the first decades of the second century.

Purpose. The purpose of the letter is decided by our choice of its setting. If it is addressed to Christians about to face Nero's persecution, we can identify the contours of Peter's teaching: (1) to encourage harassed believers in their trials (1:3-9; 4:12-19); (2) to counsel them to remain patient and blameless in spite of unprovoked attacks on them (3:8-22); (3) to remind them to act in a socially responsible way (2:11-17); and (4) to admonish their church leaders to accept patterns of lowly service (5:1-5). All this pastoral advice is set against the backdrop of a church faced with impending—if not actual—hostility from the civil authorities (2:13-14).

If the letter comes from a later decade, we can only guess who its readers may have been and their chief need. Recent studies have drawn attention to the social significance of Peter's constituency, namely as members of a disadvantaged and alienated social group in the Roman world and needing reassurance that in the church they can find their true identity as the people of God (2:1-10).

II Peter—Authorship. The problem of knowing the setting of II Peter is notoriously complex. The document professes to be written by "Simeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ" (1:1), who also claims to have been an eyewitness of the Lord's transfiguration (1:16-18), though the verb used is plural—"we were eyewitnesses"—as if to emphasize the corporate nature of apostolic testimony. The writer also speaks of a close relationship with Paul, his "beloved brother" (3:15). These two pieces of evidence lead some scholars to argue for Peter the disciple and apostle of the Lord as the author, and the epistle is then dated in Peter's closing years.

On the contrary there are other data that point more in the direction of a much later dating and imply that the author may have been someone other than Peter. There is the Hellenistic coloring of the language used, the presence of a developed Gnostic teaching (2:1ff.; see GNOSTICISM) that emerged later than Peter's lifetime, the postponement of the hope of Christ's imminent return (3:3-13), and the way in which Paul's letters have already been assembled to form a collection (3:15-16) that has the authority of sacred scripture. These items have indicated to most modern interpreters that this letter is best seen as a "testament of Peter" or a putting together of his teaching by faithful disciples or colleagues who in a later decade published this book in his name in response to pressing needs in the church of their day. The intention behind this type of publication is not to deceive the readers but to serve as a mark of respect for the teacher believed to be still speaking through his followers—a common idea in antiquity. The letter therefore was claimed as Peter's, though its passage into the church's canon was slow and cautious. Jerome speaks of it as being "rejected by the majority," but by A.D. 367 the church in the West had accepted it.

Teaching. If the setting of the epistle is in the closing years of the first century, and if the letter carries its authority as "the testament of Peter" as understood in the church at Rome, we can see some of the problems it addresses. There is the influence of "false teachers" who propagate a type of esoteric doctrine that advocates antinomian license, makes proud claims, and reviles the angels (II Pet. 2). Irenaeus matches these traits with a teaching traced back to Simon Magus in Acts. The author builds his opposition on the deposit of apostolic teaching current in Rome and calls on his readers to resist both Gnostic tendencies and antinomian libertinism.

PETER, GOSPEL OF. An Apocryphal, pseudonymous work written before A.D. 190, of which all is lost but two fragments. An unorthodox, even heretical writing, according to Serapion, bishop of Antioch, the Gospel of Peter, because of its Gnostic doctrines, was said to have been written by the Docetists. However, Theodoret credited the work to the Nazarenes, that is, Jews who accepted Christ only as a righteous man. The contents (as much as we know of them) of the Gospel of Peter do not make Theodoret's claim very likely. Eusebius (fourth century) declares that this Gospel (as well as the Acts, Apocalypse, and Preaching of Peter) was a writing not handed down among the catholic (that is, orthodox) Scriptures, and thus is not used as a testimony to the faith by orthodox church teachers either before his time or during his era. Most scholars today would date the book around A.D. 150.

PETER, PREACHING OF. A lost Apocryphal book of the NT, known principally from the quotations from it made by Clement of Alexandria and Origen. Gregory of Nazianzus and John of Damascus also briefly refer to the work. Gregory referred to it in Epistle 16, " 'A soul in trouble is near unto God,' saith Peter somewhere—a marvelous utterance." Origen declared that the Preaching of Peter "is not reckoned among the books of the church" and observed that the writing was not by Peter nor by anyone else who was inspired by the Spirit of God.

The fragments we have of the work give a supposed critique of pagan worship among the Greeks.

PETER DAMIAN (1007–72). Catholic monk, prior, cardinal bishop of Ostia, and church reformer. Damian was born in Ravenna and entered the Benedictines in 1035. He rose to prior and founded several monasteries before being made cardinal bishop against his will. He wrote many letters, sermons, monographs, and essays, as well as poetry, all stressing the need for asceticism and devotion to the church. He sharply criticized clerical laxity, defended Pope Alexander II against the antipope Honorius II, and supported the monastery at Cluny. Damian was involved in church polity and the relationship of the church to the Holy Roman Empire at the highest levels. He was never made a saint, but Pope Leo XII made him Doctor of the Church in 1828.

PETER LOMBARD (1095–1169). French theologian famous as "the master of the Sentences" because of his brief history of doctrine created out of citations of works of the church fathers and from medieval theologians. This popular work was entitled Libri Quatuor Sententiarum or the Four Books of SENTENCES. The work is an amazing achievement and became the standard text in theology by A.D. 1222. Eventually, all students in theology were required to study it for their doctoral degrees. Hundreds of commentaries were written on the Sentences from the thirteenth to the seventeenth centuries—some 180 commentaries in the English language alone. Lombard was constantly defended by the church as orthodox, although some of his material was held to be heretical by Pope Alexander III in A.D. 1177. Lombard was eventually displaced by the system of Thomas Aquinas.

Lombard was born in Lombardy, educated in Bologna, and was elected bishop of Paris in A.D. 1159. He wrote on scriptural topics, including Paul and the Psalms. Lombard's great work was the first to posit seven sacraments and to hold to sacramental efficacy, that is, that the Sacrament is the cause of the grace of God of which the Sacrament is also the sign. His work is divided into four books: On the Mystery of the Trinity; Concerning Creation and the Formation of Physical and Spiritual Things; Concerning the Incarnation of the Word; and Concerning the Sacraments and Sacramental Signs.

PETER'S PENCE. A tithe or tax sent by the English church to the pope, originally to assist English pilgrims in Rome, and later paid directly to the pope. The tax was ended after Henry VIII assumed leadership of the church and rejected papal supremacy in 1534. It lasted from A.D. 787 until that time.

PETRARCH, FRANCESCO (1304–74). Italian scholar of the High Middle Ages and a devoted recoverer of the ancient classics, whose work paved the way for the RENAISSANCE. Called "the father of humanism," Petrarch spent his life searching for ancient manuscripts in both Latin and Greek, editing the Latin ones and preserving the Greek ones, which he could not read. It is to Petrarch that we owe the phrase "The Dark Ages," as he felt an age of light, a golden age, was about to dawn through the recovery of the learning of the classical past. Petrarch had that mixture of love for God and for the world together that later fueled the Renaissance scholars. His lady love, one Laura, was already married, so he sublimated his feelings in the courtly Romantic style by writing sonnets praising her. These sonnets helped form Italian literature. His religious beliefs were expressed in a book called Secretum. J.C.

PFISTER, OSKAR (1873–1956). A Swiss pastor interested in counseling, who observed that theological training alone is inadequate for interpreting the human side of redemption, regeneration, and sanctification. He then turned to the study of psychology. In 1908 he was offered a chair of systematic and practical theology, but he declined, believing that he would be dealing with theory instead of practice.

He became acquainted with the writings of SIGMUND FREUD, and this led to a long correspondence in which they shared experiences and discussed philosophy. Pfister disagreed with Freud's philosophical base, yet the two had a mutual respect for each other's positions. Pfister was helped by Freud's findings that neuroses were caused by repressed conflicts in conscience. This explained to him why religious people seemed unable to live a life of love and instead retreated into dogmatism and legalism. Neuroses, he found, destroyed faith. His book, Christianity and Fear, was translated into English in 1948, and his correspondence with Freud appeared later. I.C.

PHARAOH. The Hebrew form of the Egyptian title "the Great House." Initially a designation of the palace, from the reign of Thutmose III (about 1490–1436 B.C.) on, it became the official title of the king himself. By about 950 B.C. the title was prefixed to regal names (thus, Pharaoh Shishak). Shortly after 700 B.C. it was written beside the regal name within the sovereign's cartouche (name ring).

Pharaoh and Egypt. At history's dawn, widely separated territories were fused into a single Egyptian monarchy. Though basic geographical isolation from the world and dependence on the Nile conferred a sense of unity on most ancient Egyptians, the separation of Upper and Lower Egypt was thoroughly perceived. To reverse Upper Egypt's attachment to the African desert and Lower Egypt's link with western Asia would have been impossible. Yet with the establishment of the First Dynasty near 3000 B.C., a single, effective nation emerged, and with it, the dogma that the pharaoh was divine. EGYPT and its absolute sovereign came to be respectively regarded as the daughter and son of the sun-god Re, the supreme deity.

Moreover, as the embodiment of Horus, a god of distant spheres, the pharaoh possessed a fullness of divinity that went unchallenged for centuries. Indeed, by the Fifth Dynasty (mid-third millennium B.C.), Egyptian dogma held that at death, this god-king became Osiris, who enjoyed the same resuscitation and prospects for eternal life as had the god with whom he was identified.

Civilized Egyptian existence gravitated around the divine monarch, who exercised extensive ownership, authority, and responsibility over the "Two Lands" entrusted to him. Written Mesopotamian law codes found no counterpart near the Nile, for the pharaoh's word was law. Egypt's sovereign was the earthly interpreter of "justice" (maat, that which conforms with predestined cosmic order). Yet the pharaoh was not tyrant. Rather, in lonely seclusion, he worked for state consolidation and the stabilization of life.

As the Egyptian government grew in complexity, the pharaoh was required to delegate his regal functions. The bureaucracy was headed by a vizier, who occasionally enjoyed widespread authority. Similarly, the priests who served Egypt's more important deities and the commander of Egypt's militia asserted their leadership. In about 935 B.C., one such commander, Shishak, founded Egypt's Twenty-second Dynasty. Moreover, the high priest of Amon-Re was a sturdy national figure. If the pharaoh's power became increasingly shared, the dogma regarding his claim to rule as Egypt's authoritative divine sovereign persisted. Though the pharaoh became a more remote palace figure, the Egyptian state remained centralized in his person.

Pharaoh and the Bible. In the OT, the Egyptian sovereign is ordinarily called "Pharaoh" (Gen. 12:15) or "Pharaoh king of Egypt" (Ezek. 32:2), though his own name may be added (thus, "Pharaoh Neco" [II Kings 23:29]; "Pharaoh Hophra" [Jer. 44:30]). Other biblically named pharaohs include Shishak (I Kings 14:25), Zerah the Ethiopian (II Chr. 14:9), and Tirhakah (II Kings 19:9).

The pharaohs who confronted Abraham (Gen. 12:18), promoted Joseph (41:39-40), and oppressed the Israelites prior to their exodus cannot be confidently identified. Still, it is often suggested that Seti I (about 1305-1290 B.C.) was the pharaoh of the oppression (whose death is reported in Exod. 2:23) and Ramses II (about 1290-1224) the pharaoh of the Exodus.

The composite biblical portrayal of Egyptian monarchy combines legendary and historical elements. Extra-biblical evidence warrants our accepting the following OT allusions as historically credible: Pharaoh's preoccupation with dream interpretation (Gen. 41:1-15), appointment of foreign servants to supervise his herds (47:6), subjection of Hebrew slaves on public works projects (Exod. 1:11), consultation with courtly "wise men" and "magicians" (7:11), and consent to an international marriage of royalty in order to strengthen ties with an ally nation (I Kings 3:1 reporting Solomon's marriage to Pharaoh's daughter).

PHARISEES. The origin of the Pharisees is not entirely clear. Their name means "separated" in Hebrew and probably reflects an early tendency toward separatism in a syncretistic world. They were a Jewish sect that arose sometime in the period between the time of Ezra (fifth century B.C.) and the first century A.D. They may have arisen as a result of the separatist tendencies in the teaching of Ezra after the return from Babylonian and Persian exile. The name does not seem to be earlier than the time of the Maccabean revolt in the second century B.C.

The Pharisees were not a political party, but they did exercise considerable power due to their orthodox teaching, educational activities in the synagogues, and their considerable number. Josephus writes that they were the most influential of the three major Jewish sects in the first century A.D.: "the Pharisees have the multitudes on their side." "They are able greatly to persuade the body of the people"; "they have so great a power over the multitude." He speaks in one place of about 6,000 Pharisees and later of about 4,000 SADDUCEES, who evidently were the second largest sect. Josephus explains the difference in the two at the time of his writing: "the Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from their fathers, which are not written in the laws of Moses; and for that reason it is that the Sadducees reject them, and say that we are to esteem those observances to be obligatory which are in the written word but are not to observe what are derived from the tradition of our forefathers" (Antiquities).

The traditions referred to are oral traditions that have been handed down for centuries in what we today know as the TALMUD, consisting of the older MISHNAH (about 200 B.C. to A.D. 200, when it was codified by Judah the Prince of Sepphon's in Galilee) and the GEMARA (about A.D. 200 to 500). These earlier "traditions of the elders" are referred to by Jesus as "your traditions," the "precepts of men" (Matt. 15:3, 9) and "traditions of men" (Mark 7:8). These were interpretations of the Torah by rabbis of the intertestamental period who felt they were in reality preserving the understanding of the Torah itself given to Moses at the time he received the Torah. One section of the Mishnah declares: "Moses received the Law from Sinai and committed it to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the Prophets, and the Prophets committed it to the men of the Great Synagogue." The Great Synagogue was a body of 120 elders, including many prophets who came up out of exile with Ezra. Herbert Danby comments, "The Mishnah . . . maintains that the authority of those rules, customs, and interpretations which had accumulated around the Jewish system of life and religion was equal to the authority of the written Law itself, even though they found no place in the written Law." The sect that perpetuated these traditions was the Pharisees. Josephus speaks of the "exact skill they had in the law of their fathers" (Antiquities) and says they are "supposed to excel others in the accurate knowledge of the laws of their country" (Life 38). They "seem to interpret the laws more accurately" than other sects (War).

Other important teachings of the Pharisees include, according to Josephus, following the conduct of reason, high regard for the elderly, the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body (compare Acts 23:8), divine reward and punishment in the afterlife for human conduct, frugal living, diets that exclude delicacies, and a perception of fate that allowed for the freedom of human will. They were normally pacifists although they participated in the revolts against Rome. The Pharisees were the only sect to survive the destruction of the Temple, and their thinking about law and religion thus became the core of rabbinic Judaism represented in the Mishnah and in much of subsequent Judaism. Whether they were strictly a sect or represented basically the theology of the masses is not clear.

Several prominent people in the NT were of the Pharisaic party. Nicodemus, the rabbi who was a member of the Sanhedrin, who came to Jesus secretly at first (John 3:1) and later publicly defended him (John 7:50) and buried him (John 19:39), was a "man of the Pharisees . . . a ruler of the Jews" (John 3:1). Paul was a Pharisee (Phil. 3:6) who describes himself as "extremely zealous for the traditions of my fathers" (Gal. 1:14). He seems to have maintained this association even after his conversion, declaring before the SANHEDRIN: "Brethren, I am a Pharisee, a son of Pharisees" (Acts 23:6). Paul was trained in Jerusalem by Gamaliel, "educated according to the strict manner of the law of our fathers" (Acts 22:3). Gamaliel was the grandson of the noted Pharisaic teacher Hillel, a contemporary of Christ who represented the most liberal wing of Pharisaism. He was a member of the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:34). The kind of teaching to which Jesus responded in the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew's account (5-7) is best understood as Pharisaic, and one might say that he was correcting a Pharisaic distortion of Mosaic Judaism in that sermon. The attitudes expressed toward the Law are characteristically Pharisaic in Matthew's account. Luke has none of the peculiarly Jewish elements in his record of the occasion (6:20-49). The Pharisees were involved in the successful attempt to have Jesus put to death (Mark 3:6; John 11:47-57). J.R.M.

PHELPS, SYLVANUS DRYDEN (1816-85). Baptist minister, author, and hymn writer. Born May 15, in Suffield, Connecticut, Phelps was educated at the Connecticut Literary Institute, Brown University, and Yale Divinity School. Ordained as a Baptist minister, he served the First Baptist Church, New Haven, Connecticut, for twenty-eight years. While still a college student, Phelps authored several hymns and children's songs. Some of his poetry and prose works were published, including a book on the Holy Land that went through nine editions. Probably his best-known hymn was "Savior, Thy Dying Love," published in Ira D. Sankey's Gospel Hymns. He was the father of William Lyon Phelps, who served for many years as professor of English literature at Yale and attained fame as a literary critic. Sylvanus D. Phelps died at New Haven on November 23. R.H.

PHENOMENOLOGY. A method of philosophical investigation associated chiefly with the name of EDMUND HUSSERL (1859-1938). Husserl's aim was to transform philosophy into an exact science, and he believed that he could do this by concentrating on pure description, avoiding interpretation and deduction, which are always fallible. In order to arrive at the pure phenomenon (that which shows itself), the investigator's mind has to be emptied of all presuppositions, even, for instance, the presupposition that the phenomenon investigated exists within some objective natural order. The mind has to be emptied of all traditional philosophical interpretations and theories. This phenomenological "reduction," as it is called, should bring one to confront the pure essence, the thing in itself as it presents itself to consciousness.

The phenomenological method was taken up by HEIDEGGER, and is basic to his analysis of human existence. That analysis consists of careful, even minute, descriptions of the various aspects of a human life. But Heidegger did not agree that such descriptions can be without presuppositions. On the contrary, the investigator always brings a preunderstanding to a task. Even to ask a question is to have some idea, however vague, of what would constitute a possible answer.

In one form or another, phenomenology has come to be widely used in theology, philosophy of religion, and religious studies generally. Tillich gives a good statement of the use of phenomenology in theology: "The test of a phenomenological description is that the picture given by it is convincing, that it can be seen by anyone who is willing to look in the same direction, that the description illuminates other related ideas, and that it makes the reality these ideas are meant to reflect intelligible." In philosophy of religion, OTTO's classic work The Idea of the Holy is a masterly exercise in the phenomenology of religious experience and was highly praised by Husserl. Finally, the methods of phenomenology have been widely employed in the comparative study of religions by Gerardus van der Leeuw and many others. J.M.

PHILEMON. The name refers to the man who received Paul's letter that bears his name. He is called Paul's "beloved fellow worker" as well as his "dear friend." A recent suggestion is that the first term was Paul's own coinage to denote those who worked with him in the task of missionary preaching, especially to the Gentiles. If this is so, we should recognize in Philemon a person, presumably a non-Jew by race, who was committed along with Paul to the evangelization of the Lycus Valley, where his home was.

Philemon's family associations are given in the opening verses of the letter. Apphia, whom Paul calls "our sister," is usually taken to be Philemon's wife, a tradition that goes back to the church fathers. Archippus, whose name follows directly, is often believed to be Philemon's son, a suggestion that cannot however be proved (see Col. 4:17 for a mention of the same person). The home of Philemon was a gathering place of Christians who met there for worship, thus forming "the church in your house," a common feature of early Christian societies in days before church buildings were erected.

Philemon's remaining characteristic explains the reason why Paul wrote to him. He was the owner of the slave Onesimus, who had wronged his master when both men were living at Colossae (Col. 4:9). Onesimus had absconded with some money. He met Paul, perhaps in the same place where Paul was detained, and was subsequently converted to the Christian faith (Philem. 10). Paul was greatly drawn to this man and found him useful (vv. 11-13). But he responded to the prompting of duty and felt he must let Onesimus return to his master.

The accompanying letter is to plead for leniency on several grounds, namely that Philemon should receive the runaway slave as he would receive Paul (v. 17) and with the reminder that the slave is now a Christian brother (v. 16). The final appeal is that Philemon owes a debt to Paul for his Christian standing (vv. 9, 19). And we have reason to be confident that Philemon heeded the Apostle's gentle but firm admonition to treat Onesimus kindly—otherwise the letter would not have survived. R.M.

PHILIA. Among the several Greek words for LOVE, philia is the most frequent, with the basic meaning of being attracted to a person or object. A natural expression is love for one's family, friends, country (patriotic attachment). Hence philadelphia, "love of a brother," carries the general sense of friendship and devotion. In Greek philos is a friend, and philema is a kiss, both terms used in the NT.

There is no religious flavor to the word in classical Greek, but in the Bible philia and AGAPE share a commonality of meaning, and can be used interchangeably of God's love for humans, where eros is singularly absent. They are also used of a person's response to the divine love (see John 21:15 ff., which has the verbs phileo and agapao with no distinction of meaning). R.M.

PHILIP, APOSTLE. One of the Twelve whom Jesus called as his followers and who became a founder-member of the apostolic church. He originated in Bethsaida (John 1:43-44). His attachment to Jesus is told in some detail in John 1:45-51, where Philip's messianic faith leads to Nathanael's becoming a disciple. Later in the Johannine story of the ministry of Jesus, Philip is tested by his reaction to Jesus' promise to feed five thousand hungry people (John 6:5-6). A third incident involved Philip and Andrew, who negotiated the coming of certain non-Jews to see Jesus (John 12:20-22). In these three episodes Philip is depicted as an ideal follower of Jesus who wishes to bring others to him. The slow emergence of his faith in Jesus as Divine Son is seen in John 14:8-9, but he has an undoubted place in the ranks of the Twelve (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14), both in the days of the ministry and after the Ascension of Jesus (Acts 1:13). His name does not feature in the later NT, but he has given his name to Gnostic writings claimed to emanate from him.

Philip's name is attached to the Gospel of Philip, which is a medley of Gnostic writings dealing chiefly with how the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist were perceived and practiced among the Valentinian Gnostics. The one place where the apostle does feature in this body of catechetical instruction is interesting. He names Jesus' father, Joseph, as the carpenter who made the cross from the wood of his workshop. In another Gnostic book, Pistis Sophia, Philip is one of the three disciples commissioned to write down the oral teaching on the risen Christ. R.M.

PHILIP OF HESSE (1504-67). Early defender of Lutheranism, signer of the Augsburg Confession, organizer of the Schmalkaldic League, and one known for tolerance. Because of his bigamous marriage in 1540, Philip lost status. After Charles V defeated the Lutherans at Mühlberg (1547), he imprisoned Philip. Released in 1552, Philip never regained power. C.M.

PHILIPPI. A city in Macedonia, northeast of Thessalonica, and approximately ten miles from the Aegean Sea. The city was once called Krenides, but in 356 B.C. it was enlarged by Philip II, father of Alexander the Great, and given his name. In 42 B.C. Antony and Octavian defeated Brutus and Cassius just west of the city, and shortly thereafter it became a Roman colony.

Acts 16:12-40 records the visit of Paul and Silas to Philippi. Lydia of Thyatira heard Paul preach and was baptized; a slave girl exploited for her powers of soothsaying was healed; Paul and Silas were beaten and imprisoned; and following an earthquake the jailer and his family believed and were baptized. Paul maintained a close relationship with the Christians there, as evidenced by their repeated gifts sent to him and his canonical letter addressed to them. (See PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE.) C.B.C.

PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE. A letter written by the apostle Paul from imprisonment to the Christian community at PHILIPPI in Macedonia. It serves as an expression of thanksgiving for a gift given to him by the Philippians, as a warning against false teachers whose influence he fears, and as an appeal to unity within the church. With its repeated mention of mutuality and joy, the letter is Paul's most intimate communication to a congregation. He had established the community himself (Acts 16:12-40), and the Philippians had provided him with monetary help on at least two previous occasions (Phil. 4:15-16; II Cor. 11:8-9).

The Occasion of the Letter. There were three reasons why Paul wrote to the Philippians. (a) Thanksgiving. Epaphroditus had brought a gift from the Philippians to Paul during his current imprisonment and had perhaps intended to stay longer and share the ministry. He became critically ill, however, and Paul, knowing the anxiety of his friend, sent him back home. The letter, which Epaphroditus carried with him, contained a word of thanksgiving for the Philippians' support (4:10-20) and a word of commendation for Epaphroditus' service (2:25-30).

(b) Warnings. Paul is also concerned about the vulnerability of the Philippians to sectarian teachers. He issues a sharp warning against such teachers who might make inroads in the Christian community. Opponents are mentioned in three places in the letter (1:27-28; 3:2-11, 18-19), but the references are such as to make it difficult to piece together a clear portrait of who they were. One plausible suggestion is that they were Jewish-Christian sectarians who offered perfection through circumcision and who represented the Christian life as one of spiritual exaltation immune to suffering. Paul calls them "dogs, evil-workers, mutilators of the flesh" (3:2), and "enemies of the cross" (3:18).

(c) Call to unity. Finally, though the Philippians merit high commendations (1:3-11), Paul takes the occasion of the letter to urge the congregation to maintain a unified front against the opposition (1:27-28) and specifically to settle the local squabble between two active members, Euodia and Syntyche (4:2-3).

The Structure of the Letter. Paul follows the typical form of Hellenistic letters including: salutation (1:1-2), prayer of thanksgiving (1:3-11), body of the letter (1:12-4:20), closing greetings, and benediction (4:21-23).

The body of the letter, though orderly, does not evidence a sustained rational argument. (a) 1:12-26 describes Paul's situation in imprisonment and his confidence that his confinement and anticipated release will turn out for the advancement of the gospel.

(b) 1:27-2:18 contains a series of exhortations to unity and to faithfulness in the face of persecution. The early Christian hymn cited in 2:5-11 serves to anchor the appeals in the story of the crucified and exalted Christ.

(c) 2:19-30 details Paul's immediate plans for Timothy, Epaphroditus, and himself.

(d) 3:1-21 relates Paul's warnings against the sectarian teachers and offers his personal experience as an answer to their insistence on circumcision for Gentile Christians. Christian life in the present entails sharing Christ's sufferings, becoming conformed to his death. Perfection comes only with the resurrection of the dead, when lowly bodies are transformed to be like Christ's glorious body.

(e) 4:1-9 deals with the pastoral problems and more general admonitions.

(f) 4:10-20 brings the body of the letter to a close by expressing gratitude for the concern and the gift of the Philippians.

Place and Date of the Letter. Paul writes as a prisoner, but it is not exactly clear from the letter where he is imprisoned, whether in one of the places mentioned in Acts or some other. Three locations are possible: Rome (see the mention in the letter of "the whole praetorian guard" and "Caesar's household"), an imprisonment recorded in Acts 28:14-31; Caesarea, noted in Acts 23:33-26:32; and Ephesus, not mentioned in Acts but possibly alluded to in I Corinthians 15:30-32 and II Corinthians 1:8-10. The location of the writing cannot be determined with any certainty. If Rome is the choice, the date would be A.D. 58–60; if Caesarea, A.D. 56–58; if Ephesus, A.D. 54–55.

C.B.C.

PHILISTINES. The people who lived along the Mediterranean Sea in the southern part of Palestine. The whole country apparently took its name from them.

Geography. The land of the Philistines began at the seacoast city of Joppa, which is a few miles south of modern Tel Aviv. From there it extended south past the city of Gaza, with the Negeb desert forming the southern boundary. The Philistines occupied the coastal plain toward the mountains to the east, a distance of about twenty miles. The major cities of the Philistines were Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ashdod on the coast and Gath and Ekron inland. The Philistine plain is fertile, but in constant danger of sand dunes encroaching from the south.

Language. For many years it was believed that the Philistines, known as the "People of the Sea," had come from the island of Crete. But there is no archaeological indication of a Philistine occupation of Crete. Wherever they came from, when they arrived along the southeast Mediterranean coast they began to speak a Canaanite dialect. Gradually this in turn gave away to Aramaic.

Religion. All of the Philistine gods known to us have Semitic names. The Philistines had temples dedicated to DAGON, a senior god associated with grain and fish, in Gaza and Ashdod. It was in their Dagon temple in Ashdod that they deposited the Ark of the Covenant after capturing it from the Israelites. They also had temples dedicated to the goddess ASHTORETH in Ashkelon and the god BAALZEBUB in Ekron.

Political and Military Organization. Before they were defeated by David, the Philistines lived mainly in their five major cities, which were ruled by lords, who also acted as a council that ruled the whole nation. The council as a whole could overrule the decision of any of its five members. At that time they were able to muster a large army of foot soldiers, archers, and charioteers. The Philistines had a monopoly on iron working. Goliath's weapons were most likely made by Philistine ironsmiths. After their defeat by David, the title "lord" was replaced by "king," and they thereafter lived mainly along the coast.

History. The Philistines began settling the coast of Palestine after being driven out of Egypt by Ramses II. They apparently captured the cities of Ashkelon, Ashdod, Gath, and Gaza from their Canaanite inhabitants. They perhaps did this with the permission of the Egyptians, who controlled the area. They may later have founded Ekron since there is no earlier mention of the city. They then proceeded to expand into surrounding areas. The pressure they put upon the people of Dan and Judah is portrayed in the story of Samson (Judg. 13–15). When the Israelites tried, unsuccessfully, to force them back at Ebenezer (I Sam. 4:1–10), the Philistines destroyed Shiloh and captured the Ark of the Covenant. Samuel and Saul each were able to push back the Philistines to some extent. After Saul's death, however, the Philistines were able to make deep inroads into Israelite territory. After David became king over all Israel they attacked him in the Valley of Rephaim near Jerusalem. David, with his well-trained troops, was able to drive them back and reduce them to a non-threatening status. They did, however, continue to participate in the Phoenician slave trade, as Joel records (3:1–8).

Nebuchadnezzar later ended Philistine independence by deporting their rulers and many of their people. The cities in succeeding centuries became Phoenician and then Greek, with increasingly diverse citizenship. B.J.

PHILLIPS, PHILIP (1834–95). Singing evangelist, composer, hymn writer. Philip Phillips, also known as "the Singing Pilgrim," was a farm boy who became a forceful influence in introducing gospel hymns to the Christian public. Born in Chautauqua County, near Jamestown, New York, Phillips was reared on a farm. His natural aptitude for music gave him the ability to sing when he was a boy of five. When he was nineteen, he became a singing master. At twenty-one he began his ministry as a singing evangelist, using a melodeon for accompaniment. His singing was said to increase the appetite for popular religious songs. As he traveled from church to church, he sold the songs he had published.

During the period after the Civil War, Phillips was one of several Americans who gave impetus to the acceptance of gospel songs. His Hallowed Songs was one of the hymnbooks used by Moody and Sankey in their evangelistic campaigns. Phillips published several hymnals, including The Singing Pilgrim, based on Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; New Hymn and Tune Book (1867); Hallowed Songs, and The American Sacred Songster. He wrote the words for "I Have Heard the Savior's Love," which was included in Sankey's Songs and Solos. Phillips also composed the music for "The Lord Will Provide" and "One Sweetly Solemn Thought." He wrote the book Song Pilgrim Around and Throughout the World (1880). Phillips died June 2, 1895, in Delaware, Ohio. R.H.

PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA (about 30 B.C.–A.D. 45). A Jewish philosopher of Alexandria in Egypt, often called Philo Judaeus, or Philo the Jew. An outstanding intellectual, Philo's influence on the early Christian church, specifically on the church fathers Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Ambrose, was immense. These Church Fathers adopted many of Philo's Stoic and Neoplatonic concepts and especially made use of his allegorical interpretations of Scripture. ALEXANDRIA was an outstanding intellectual center at the beginning of the Christian Era and also was home to a very large, flourishing Jewish community. Philo was the supreme example of HELLENISM's influence on the cosmopolitan intellectual life of the Jews in the Egyptian Diaspora.

Only one date for Philo's life can be set with precision, the year A.D. 39-40, when Philo was sent to Rome by the Jewish community to protest the persecution of Jews by Flaccus, Prefect of Egypt, and to explain why the Jewish religion prevented Jews from participating in the cult of emperor worship.

Philo was a prolific writer, and thanks to the value put on his works by the Christian church, most of his writings have survived. He seems not to have known Hebrew but wrote Greek in a rich, distinguished style. Some of Philo's surviving work is known, however, only in Latin or Armenian translation. The Jewish historian Josephus discusses Philo, but no other ancient Jewish writing mentions him. Scholars have identified the influence of Philo on Midrashim, such as the saying of Genesis Rabbab 1:1.

Philo was of a rich and powerful family that was connected to Herod's dynasty and even to the court of the Roman Emperor. Nonetheless, little is recorded of Philo's life. His writings demonstrate that he was highly educated in classical Greek philosophy, rhetoric, and the natural sciences. Those same writings, covering as they do the Pentateuch, show that Philo was reared in a devout Jewish family. Philo's usual manner of dealing with the five books of Moses was to disregard the narrative per se and to turn the characters and events into abstract philosophical concepts. Philo, a very sophisticated but devoted Jew, mentions that he questioned the Jewish elders about Jewish traditions, and that he journeyed to Jerusalem to visit the Temple. J.C.

PHILOSOPHICAL THEOLOGY. A branch of theology that employs philosophical concepts and arguments. Its aim may be simply intelligibility, for the philosophy current at any given time is an expression of the mentality of that time. If Christian theology is to be intelligible and relevant, then it will be useful to express it as far as possible in the prevailing philosophical idiom, thus exposing both its agreements and its disagreements with current secular thinking. Beyond that, philosophical theology may have (and usually does have) an apologetic aim, in showing the reasonableness of Christian faith and that it is no mere arbitrary set of beliefs but is philosophically defensible. The old natural theology, for instance, performed this function and could be considered as a type of philosophical theology.

THOMAS AQUINAS is a good example of a philosophical theologian. This statement is made not only because in the early part of his theological exposition he uses natural theology to establish the reality of his principal subject matter, God, but because throughout his work he employs philosophical concepts for the explication and articulation of his theology. In recent times, PAUL TILlich is an obvious example of a philosophical theologian.

Because philosophical theology serves the needs of theology and may even have an apologetic function, it must be distinguished from the PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION. The latter also employs philosophical concepts for the explication and even sometimes the justification of religion, but it relates to religion in general and does not share the theological concern with a particular tradition of faith and the vindication of that faith. It sometimes happens, however, that the philosophical theologian becomes so enamored of the philosophy that is used that it dominates the philosopher's position and may lead to the distortion or misrepresentation of the Christian doctrines that are the true theme of theology. Tillich, for instance, has been accused of setting up a "religious philosophy" that uses Christian symbols "in an alien and dechristianized meaning."

This is no doubt an exaggeration, but it points to a real danger and explains why KARL BARTH and others have been so reluctant to allow any philosophical influences to enter the structure of Christian theology. Even Barth is compelled to admit that at least in matters of terminology, theologians are bound to use some philosophically derived language. He insists, however, that it must be kept subordinate to the theological interests. It might be replied that as soon as theologians begin to speak of, let us say, "history" or "human nature" (and one can scarcely avoid such topics) then, whether they like it or not, they get into areas of philosophical controversy. It would surely be arrogant if they were to deny that anything can be learned from the philosopher in the handling of such topics. The attempt to restrict theology to biblical concepts hardly allows for intelligibility. (See also SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.) J.M.

PHILOSOPHY. From the Greek words philos ("love of") and sophia ("wisdom"). Tradition claims that Pythagoras was the first to describe himself as a philosopher or lover of wisdom. He held that people can be divided into three types: those who love activity, those who love pleasure, and those lovers of contemplation who seek wisdom. Pythagoras distinguished philosophy from both native shrewdness and trained skill. For Pythagoras wisdom leads to salvation, conceived in religious terms. For Plato philosophy is the search for eternal, unchanging truth or Reality, that is, for the causes and principles of things. The truth can be obtained only by a dialectical process of testing received opinions. By questioning and cross-examination, assumptions can be brought out in the open, critically examined, and the true nature of reality thus distinguished from the changing appearance of things.

In some cultural traditions, for example, in China and India, there is little, if any, distinction between the work of the philosopher and that of the wise man or sage. An appropriate distinction might be that the truth of the sage is, or can be, arrived at by direct intuition, while the truth of the philosopher is critical, that is, the result of rational or logical analysis. This is not to claim that one or the other offers greater insight into the human situation. Furthermore, to say that philosophy involves critical inquiry does not isolate what is unique to philosophy, since science, for example, engages in the critical testing of assumptions or hypotheses. Some modern philosophers have attempted to identify philosophical activity with a particular methodology. DAVID HUME essentially equated it with the procedures of experimental science; EDMUND HUSSERL with a phenomenological description of essences; Gilbert Ryle with the uncovering of fundamental category mistakes; and LUDWIG WITTGENSTEIN with the exposing of what literally is nonsense.

Modern philosophy has been characterized not only by a variety of methodologies but also by an increase in the fields of philosophical investigation. Aristotle had listed the areas of philosophy to include logic, physics, metaphysics, ethics, aesthetics, psychology, and political philosophy. Today physics and psychology are separate sciences, but there is important work being done in both the philosophy of science and in the philosophy of the social sciences. The PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION began in the eighteenth century as a discipline independent of sectarian theology. Currently, philosophical analysis is applied and important journals published in such fields as the philosophy of law, history, biology, and education. The most important schools of twentieth-century philosophy include PRAGMATISM, EXISTENTIALISM, LOGICAL POSITIVISM (or empiricism), and LINGUISTIC ANALYSIS. J.L.

PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION. That branch of philosophy that seeks to describe and evaluate the concepts and beliefs, experiences and practices, of "religion." Since this term "religion" has been defined in so many ways and must be taken in a very broad sense, the scope of philosophy of religion is quite extensive and its precise boundaries not easily defined. It can, however, be clearly distinguished from SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY. The latter expounds the content of some particular tradition of faith, whereas philosophy of religion is concerned with the whole panorama of religion, past and present. The philosopher of religion may not have any such affirmative attitude to religion as a theologian will normally have to the faith that is expounded.

Does this mean that a philosopher of religion may be an atheist or a non-religious person? The question is not easy to answer. Insofar as philosophy of religion is concerned with the coherence of concepts and the criticism of arguments, what is needed in the philosopher of religion is rationality and a grounding in the principles of logic. One's own religious opinions might be considered irrelevant.

On the other hand, if the philosopher of religion has also to explore and evaluate religious experiences, it might be thought that that person could hardly do this effectively if one had never known any such experiences. The philosopher might seem to be in the position of one who, having no appreciation of art or beauty, attempted to write a book on aesthetics. Even here, however, the atheistic philosopher of religion might be defended on the ground that one could study the many written descriptions of religious experiences undergone by others, and that nothing prevents a person from assessing the validity of these experiences, especially the interpretations and claims put upon them by those who have them. Nevertheless, religion is such an inward affair that any assessment from outside is suspect.

Philosophy of religion has also to be distinguished from NATURAL THEOLOGY. The traditional natural theology was indeed a philosophical exercise, and modern philosophy of religion may have developed out of it. But philosophy of religion is a broader study than the old natural theology, and before turning to arguments for or against the existence of God would be likely to raise the more radical question about the meaning of "God-talk" and the question of what is meant by the "existence" of God.

A contemporary philosophy of religion then is likely to begin with questions of language and logic. What do we mean when we use the word "God"? What is the "holy" or the "sacred"? Is any God-talk literal or descriptive in the way that our talk about entities within the world is? Or is all such talk symbolic and indirect? Then the question arises about its cognitive status. Is symbolic language only a language that evokes feeling, or is it (as is claimed for analogy) an indirect way of describing a reality that cannot be directly described? It is important here also to investigate and compare different types of related language—myth, poetry, metaphor, and so on. Again, one may ask about the nature of symbols and their cognitive functions. Is there any parallel between the non-picturing symbols employed by the physicist and those used by the philosopher of religion or the theologian or the ordinary believer? All these questions come "before" the traditional natural theology, just as that natural theology was often supposed to come "before" revealed theology.

Assuming that one had worked through the questions of language and meaning (and some modern textbooks of philosophy of religion might deal only with these questions), one might then go on to ask the question Does God exist? though almost certainly this question would be rephrased in the light of the analysis of the concepts of "God" and "existence." At this point, the traditional theistic arguments would be proposed for discussion, though expressed in new forms. It is interesting to note that each time the traditional "proofs" of GOD'S EXISTENCE are "refuted," they are soon refined and restated in a form that meets the objections. Probably few philosophers of religion today would claim that any one of the traditional arguments constitutes a "proof," but many would say that the traditional arguments, restated to take account both of objections and of new knowledge, constitute a cumulative case for theism in some form.

The philosophy of religion has also to turn its attention to the human pole of the religious relation. Who or what are human beings? Many religions have attributed to the human being an immortal SOUL. Here again one would have to begin by asking about the meaning of such a belief. Can we form a concept of "soul"? What about the problems of personal "identity"? Can the soul exist apart from the body, and, if not, is it possible to make sense of the concept of "resurrection"? These questions cannot be separated from more general questions about the nature of a human being. Is a naturalistic account of humanity adequate, or is the human being in some sense a breach in the texture of nature? At this point, the philosophy of EXISTENTIALISM, even in its atheistic forms, has drawn attention to the uniqueness of the human being and its transcendence of the merely natural mode of existence.

In studying the human being, philosophy of religion pays special attention to RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. It is important to distinguish the treatment that this subject receives from philosophy of religion and from the treatment in PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION. The latter is content to describe religious experience as a phenomenon of the psyche, but philosophy of religion goes more deeply into the matter and raises the difficult question whether it is some objective reality that confronts the religious consciousness or whether it is all explicable in terms of subjective factors in the believer's own mind. The question has been particularly discussed in relation to MYSTICISM. Here we have a form of religious experience which, although it seems to be restricted to a relatively few individuals, nevertheless seems to have a universal core that reappears among mystics in many cultures and in all the great religious traditions. This universality is itself an evidence in favor of the validity of the mystical experience. When one adds the strongly intentional character of such an experience, namely, that the experiencing mind refers it to some objective reality with just as much force as it does in sense-experience, then there might seem to be objective grounds for the mystical experience.

On the other hand, virtually all mystics tell us that their experience is ineffable, and this may be held to count against the claim that there is a mystical way of knowing the ultimate reality. Problems are caused too by the fact that there are drug-induced states of mind that appear to share many of the characteristics of the mystical vision. In any evaluation of religious experience, it is difficult to say how much is experience and how much is interpretation. Two people may have closely resembling experiences, but may interpret them very differently, according to the tradition of ideas each has inherited. For instance, a Christian mystic and a Hindu mystic may have similar experiences, but each will interpret the experience in terms of one's own religion. A more serious problem arises when a non-religious person has an experience similar to the mystical one, but interprets it without reference to any objective agency, such as God or the Absolute. Of course, there is never a merely raw experience. Some interpretation is always at work. But the philosopher of religion must, as far as possible, distinguish the experiential and interpretative elements, and, where there is a conflict of interpretations, try to decide which is the more convincing.

Philosophies of religion vary with changing philosophical fashions. The first great treatments of the subject appeared in the nineteenth century and were influenced by IDEALISM in either its Kantian or Hegelian form. Over against these were naturalistic interpretations of religion, often associated with the rising subjects of anthropology, psychology, psychoanalysis, and sociology. In the twentieth century there has been a wider range of influences at work. The so-called "process" philosophy of WHITEHEAD and HARTSHORNE has given birth to a philosophy of religion that finds a place for God and religious experience in a world view that is consonant with the findings of modern physics. PHENOMENOLOGY has furnished a technique for the careful investigation of religious experience. Existentialism has shown the inadequacy of naturalistic views of humanity and has exposed the tendencies in human nature that are inclined to a religious interpretation of the human being. Finally, ANALYTICAL PHILOSOPHY, as has been shown, has raised important questions about the fundamental concepts and language of religion.

PHINEHAS. (1) The son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron (Num. 25:7), whose priestly deeds are reported in postexilic OT narrative.

In Moses' time, a contrite Israelite assembly endured a divinely sent plague as punishment for having succumbed to Midianite idolatry at Peor. When a defiant Israelite entered the camp with a Midianite woman, Phinehas speedily killed them both. Now appeased, Yahweh terminated the plague and delivered to Phinehas and his descendants "the covenant of a perpetual priesthood" (Num. 25:6-18). Subsequently, as Israel fought against Midian, Moses dispatched Phinehas with sanctuary vessels and trumpets (31:6).

In Joshua's time, Phinehas headed a delegation of ten chiefs from nervous western tribes to investigate the rumor that their eastern counterparts had erected an altar out of a desire for schismatic worship. Phinehas accepted the explanation that the Transjordan tribes were giving visible expression to their determination to have "a portion of Yahweh" and in Israel. Needless intertribal warfare was averted (Josh. 22:9-34). Finally, at Bethel, Phinehas rendered an oracle favoring Israelite retaliation against those Benjaminites who condoned the rape of the Levite's concubine (Judg. 19:22-26; 20:27-28).

(2) One of Eli's sons, who, with his brother Hophni, abused the priestly office by acting contemptuously toward Yahweh's offering and lustfully toward women serving in the Shiloh sanctuary (I Sam. 2:17, 22). After bearing the Ark of the Covenant into battle against the Philistines near Aphek, Eli's incorrigible sons met untimely death, and Israel sustained bitter defeat (4:11).

(3) The father of a priest, Eleazar (Ezra 8:33).

PHOEBE. A Christian woman who had been a helper of the apostle Paul. She is called a deaconess in Romans 16:1-2, the only mention of her in the NT. It is not certain whether the term is to be taken generically as "servant" or technically as "deaconess."

PHOENICIA. A small country lying north of Palestine along the Mediterranean coast and roughly comparable to modern Lebanon and adjacent parts of Israel and Syria. It was narrow, consisting essentially of the seacoast and adjacent mountains running about 130 miles north-south. The name is Greek, probably a translation of the Semitic word "Canaanite," which reflected the Canaanites' background and was used by them to refer to themselves. The Greek name comes from a root word meaning either "palm" or "purple," the latter being also the meaning of the term "Canaan." It had its origin as a state about the thirteenth century B.C. and was a great maritime power from about 1000 B.C. until its culture was absorbed by the Greeks around 600 B.C. However, important cities of Phoenicia are much older. Excavations have dated structures at Byblos (Geba) to about 2500 B.C., but the city was probably founded around 3000 by the Egyptians for commercial purposes. Written records from Egypt speak of Phoenicia about 1600 B.C. Sidon was of such importance that Phoenicians were known as Sidonians in the time of Homer. Tyre was equally important and, even after its destruction by Alexander the Great, moved its location slightly and became again an important city until Roman times. Berytos (Beirut) was an important industrial center in the ancient world.

PHOENICIANS. A nation of people who in ancient times occupied the area along the northern coast of the eastern Mediterranean. Their origins are hidden in obscurity, but excavations in PHOENICIA indicate they were there in 3000 B.C., SIDON being their oldest city. Herodotus thought they came from around the Persian Gulf. Their country, roughly modern-day Lebanon, was predominantly mountainous and not especially productive of commercial agriculture, but they were blessed with several important natural harbors on the coast and consequently became a great maritime nation, trading and colonizing as far west as Africa and Spain, perhaps even reaching the Atlantic. Carthage was among their better-known colonies.

The Phoenicians became famous through commerce, exporting enormous quantities of cedar trees, papyrus leaves for scrolls and books, glass (which they may have invented), purple dye (from the plentiful murex seashell), and boats for navies all over the known world (for example, Sennacherib, Pharaoh Neco II, and Xerxes). With no known mineral resources except iron, Phoenicia developed into one of the greatest trading nations in ancient history. The nearby island of Cyprus became a virtual Phoenician colony. Trade was fostered by the fact that the Phoenicians lived at a crossroads of both land and sea trade routes, and enjoyed the protection of Egypt. The invention of the alphabet appears to have been a product of the Phoenician need for effective commercial bookkeeping, just as was their production and use of numbers, weights, and measures. Their exports included cedar and pine, fine linen, dyed cloth (especially purple), Phoenician glass, metalwork, salt, wine, and dried fish. In turn they imported papyrus, ivory, spices, horses, gold, silver, copper, silk, ostrich eggs, and precious jewels. Phoenicians, under Hiram, king of Tyre, imported many of these things for King Solomon (I Kings 10:11, 22; II Chr. 9:10, 21), including apes and peacocks. Phoenician workers who built the Temple of Solomon may have designed it on Phoenician models, some of which are known to us now (I Kings 5:1-12; II Chr. 2:3-16).

A number of people in the OT were associated with Phoenicia in one way or the other. Ethbaal is mentioned as the king of the Sidonians (I Kings 16:31). His daughter, the infamous Jezebel, married the Israelite king Ahab, who allowed her to introduce the worship of Baal into Israel (I Kings 16:29-34; 18:19). There were two HIRAMS from Tyre who had part in the building of the Temple in Jerusalem. The first was the king who was a friend of David (II Sam. 5:11), who after his death befriended Solomon by sending cedar and cypress trees from Phoenicia down the Mediterranean made into rafts, for use in the building of the Temple (I Kings 5:1-12). The second Hiram, whose father was a Tyrian, was of partial Jewish extraction. His mother, a Danite by birth (II Chr. 2:14), was the widow of a man from the tribe of Naphtali (I Kings 7:14). He was a skilled craftsman who was sent by Hiram the king (II Chr. 2:11-14) to do the bronze work in the Temple (I Kings 7:13-47). The city of Zarephath, where the widow lived to whom Elijah was sent, was located near Sidon (I Kings 17:9).

In the NT, Jesus went to Phoenicia on a preaching tour to Jews and encountered a Syrophenician woman (Mark 7:26; called a Canaanite in Matt. 15:22), whose daughter he healed. Paul and Barnabas passed through Phoenicia on the way to Jerusalem from Antioch, reporting on the conversion of Gentiles (Acts 15:3). Phoenicia had received the word earlier through the missionary efforts of those who had been scattered by the persecution of Stephen (Acts 11:19). At the end of his third journey Paul met with Phoenician Christians for a week, after which he bade them good-bye in a prayer meeting on the beach near Tyre and went on to Jerusalem (Acts 21:3-6).

The Ras Shamra tablets, discovered at UGARIT, were written in Ugaritic, a Semitic language closely akin to biblical Hebrew. They reveal a culture of religious depravity known in the OT as Canaanite. Carthaginian settlers from Phoenicia called themselves Canaanites until the fifth century A.D. Ugaritic is written in a twenty-nine-letter cuneiform alphabetic script, which reads from left to right like Akkadian. Numerous tablets, written in a variety of languages including Ugaritic, were discovered at Ugarit by C. F. A. Schaeffer, who directed thirty campaigns there during the period from 1929 to 1968. When deciphered the texts revealed the cultural life, social institutions, and religious beliefs and practices of the Phoenicians. Their religion was polytheistic, with El, Asherah, Baal, and Anath occupying the most important positions in the pantheon. It was largely a fertility cult, apparently, with many cultic practices centering in various temples. Human sacrifices were offered to Baal Ammon in Carthage and to Malqart in Tyre.

PHOTIUS (about 810-895). Highly honored Greek Orthodox churchman, twice patriarch of Constantinople, a key figure in East-West struggles for supremacy. Born into nobility, the scholarly Photius chose a career in politics. He advanced rapidly to first imperial secretary and ambassador to Assyria. When Emperor Michael III in 858 deposed Patriarch Ignatius of Constantinople, he named Photius his successor. Photius received the necessary sacred orders in five days and was consecrated patriarch on Christmas Day by Archbishop Gregory Asbestos of Syracuse, whom Ignatius had previously dethroned. Ignatius refused to vacate. Photius vainly sought help from Pope Nicholas I, even though some Roman delegates participated in dethroning Ignatius. A Roman synod (863) annulled all earlier actions, said Ignatius was still patriarch, and deposed Photius, Asbestos, and all appointed by them. However, Photius, supported by the emperor, retained the patriarchate.

Further disputes between Constantinople and Rome erupted over control of missionaries in Bulgaria. In 867 Photius excoriated Rome's missionaries and questioned Rome's saying the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (Filioque), and a council at Constantinople excommunicated the pope. When Basil murdered and succeeded Michael as emperor in 867, Ignatius was reinstated, and councils at Rome and Constantinople in 869 anathematized Photius. After Ignatius' death in 877, the emperor reinstated Photius as patriarch. However, Emperor

Leo VI in 886 again deposed Photius, who faded from history. Photius' most important writing was Myriobilion (Bibliotheca), reviews and excerpts from nearly three hundred books, many now lost.

PHRYGIA. A large area, difficult to define, in southwest Turkey through which Paul passed on his journeys (Acts 13:14-14:24; 16:6; 18:23) establishing and revisiting churches. In Roman times part of it, including the cities of Antioch and Iconium, lay in the province of Galatia, and the other part including the cities of Colossae and Laodicea, lay in the province of Asia.

PHYLACTERIES. In Hebrew, tefillin. Two small black leather cases containing scriptural passages and fastened with long black leather straps to the arm and forehead of the Jewish male during the weekday morning prayers. They are put on in response to God's command to wear them as a "sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes" (Deut. 6:8 KJV), as well as used in the prayers themselves. The scriptural passages in the black cases are on parchment made from the skins of ritually clean animals, preferably calves. The passages are written in square (Assyrian) script and refer to the words of the TORAH.

One cube is placed on the left arm facing the heart (unless the person is left-handed, in which case it is put on the right arm). The other cube is placed in the center of the forehead. This one should be particularly prominent, so that all can see it, in order to fulfill God's command: "And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord; and they shall be afraid of thee (Deut. 28:10 KJV). The leather thong of the second cube is wound seven times around the arm between the elbow and the wrist, and, after the cube for the forehead is donned, the hand strap is wound three times around the middle finger. With each action, blessings are recited. Some scholars do not like the word "phylacteries" because in the Greek this word means "amulet" or "safeguard," and this is not the purpose of tefillin. They are worn in obedience to a biblical commandment and as a reminder that the Torah must be studied and obeyed every day. They are not worn on the Sabbath and other biblical holy days, since these days are already reminders of God's Law.

PIA DESIDERIA. PHILIP JACOB SPENER's book in 1675 that launched PIETISM in German Lutheranism. Spener called for intense, devotional Bible study, lay fulfillment of Luther's priesthood of all believers, love as well as intellectualism in religion, higher morality among professors and students, and revival of evangelical preaching.

PIERPOINT, FOLLIOTT SANDFORD. (1835–1917). Classical scholar and hymn writer. Pierpoint was born in Bath, England, and educated at the local grammar school and Cambridge University. Somewhat of a Victorian dilettante with strong High Church convictions, Pierpoint wrote considerable poetry and many hymns. However, the one hymn for which he is remembered is "For the Beauty of the Earth," which was published in 1864 in an anthology entitled Lyra Eucharistica. Pierpoint, a young man of twenty-nine years, wrote this beautiful hymn late in the spring as he sat on a Bath hillside, overlooking the Avon River. R.H.

PIETÀ. A representation, generally in sculpture, of an individual holding the dead body of Christ following the descent from the cross. The most famous perhaps is that of the sorrowing Virgin Mary holding Christ's body on her knees. The statue, now located in St. Peter's, Rome, was one of several by MICHELANGELO dealing with the same theme. The Florentine Pietà, now in Florence Cathedral, shows a compassionate Nicodemus holding the Lord's body. Found in Michelangelo's studio at his death was the Rondanini Pietà, which is displayed in the Castello Sforzesco, Milan. The Pietà concept is found in Christian art of thirteenth-century Germany and even back to the Byzantine era. R.H.

PIETISM. A reaction, mostly within German Lutheranism, against the cold RATIONALISM of the philosophers and the rigid orthodoxy of Protestant Scholasticism. Against both rationalism and Scholasticism, Pietism proposed a life of deeper personal piety, supported by groups or "colleges of piety" formed by those within the church who wished to attain a deeper religious life. Its founder was PHILIPP JACOB SPENER, whose book Pia Desideria, published in 1675, set the tone and basic methodology of the movement.

While Spener did not disagree with any of the doctrines being taught by Lutheran orthodoxy, he felt that such orthodoxy was not enough, and that at times it tended to obscure the need for personal commitment. For that reason he suggested that candidates for the ministry should be examined in order to ascertain that they were "true Christians." Naturally, such a suggestion brought criticism and opposition from many of the leading theologians, who felt that their endeavors were being attacked. This, coupled with his insistence on giving the laity more participation in the life of the church, led Spener to repeated clashes with ecclesiastical authorities. But in spite of this, his suggestions were well received by many, particularly in Saxony, where he gained the adherence of AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE.

The work of Spener, Francke, and others eventually led to the founding of the University of Halle, where Francke was a professor, and which soon became a center of Pietism. Under Francke's inspiration, the movement then took an interest in missions, which most Protestants had neglected since the time of the Reformation, and Halle became a center for the training and sending of missionaries. As a result, many churches throughout the world bear the mark of the Pietist movement.

One of those who was deeply impressed by Pietism was Count NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF, who allowed a group of Moravian refugees to settle on his lands, and eventually so imbued them with his vision that the MORAVIANS spread throughout the world as missionaries.

JOHN WESLEY, the founder of the Methodist movement, was also profoundly influenced by the Moravians. It was they who led him through the difficult times when he doubted his salvation, and for that he was always grateful. From them, and from Pietism in general, Wesley also learned of the need for a personal commitment and life of faith. But he could never bring himself to become a Moravian or a Pietist in the strict sense, for the evangelical tradition in which he had been brought up, and which he always cherished, impelled him to be more concerned than the Moravians or the Lutheran Pietists with sanctification and with the application of the Christian faith to the life of society. J.G.

PILATE, ACTS OF. Various known as the Acts of Pilate and the Gospel of Nicodemus, the work in the NT APOCRYPHA dates from the fourth century, and is in two main parts: (1) the story of the passion, burial, and resurrection of Jesus; (2) the narrative of his DESCENT into the abode of the dead, and the ensuing delivery of the faithful dead, as well as his final triumph over Satan. References by Justin Martyr (about 100–165) to Acts of Pilate have led some scholars to assume that this document was known to him, but he is apparently merely assuming that there were official Roman records of the crucifixion of Jesus. Far more likely is the view that the first part of this work is an apologetic expansion of the Gospel of Matthew in its report of these events. The writer of these Acts is trying to expand and strengthen the Christians' claims about the empty tomb and the post-Resurrection appearances, as well as the commissioning of the disciples. To this end the author heightens the sense of injustice that was done to Jesus, by both Jewish and Roman legal standards, and uses the testimony of his opponents to reinforce that evaluation of Jesus' death and execution.

The second part of the work is concerned not only to demonstrate the facticity of Jesus' resurrection, but also to show how his descent into the realm of the dead makes it possible for him to give life to the saints of former times, reaching back to Adam himself. The final defeat of Satan is depicted here as well, for which the vivid symbol is that Jesus leaves his cross behind in hell as a perpetual evidence of his victory through seeming defeat. Among those who share in his triumph are not only such biblical figures as Enoch and Elijah, but also the penitent thief who was crucified with Jesus.

In several versions, the work is considerably expanded. One Latin version has the high priests testify to the reality of the Resurrection and to Jesus' divine sonship, which leads Pilate to write a letter to the emperor Claudius, explaining the Christian claims for Jesus and the Jewish opposition to him. Other additions describe how Pilate determined that Jesus' body had not been stolen from the tomb; how he provided accounts of these events to Roman authorities as well as Herod; how Veronica, who was supposed to be the woman cured of a bloody flux by Jesus and had wiped his face at the cross, was brought to Rome and honored by the emperor. H.K.

PILATE, PONTIUS. The discovery of an inscription at Caesarea on the coast of Palestine in 1961 has yielded evidence of the historical figure otherwise known from the Gospels as Pontius Pilate, although his career is briefly mentioned by Tacitus, Josephus, and Philo. The four Gospels all agree on making him the decisive Roman figure at the trial of Jesus, and there are occasional allusions to him in other NT books (Acts 3:13; 4:27; 13:28; 1 Tim. 6:13).

He came to his office as prefect of Judea in A.D. 26, and assumed large-scale military and judicial powers as well as wielding authority over the Jewish leaders and the Temple treasury. His relations with the Jews were not happy, and he constantly aggravated the situation, first by trying to introduce Roman military standards into the city, then by seeking to dedicate some golden shields in his Jerusalem residence. On both counts he was defeated and forced to back down. When he tried to use Temple money to finance an aqueduct to bring water to Jerusalem, his action led to resistance and bloodshed (see Luke 13:1).

At the trial of Jesus he was confronted with a political allegation, which he took seriously, but he vacillated because his position at Rome was tenuous, following the loss of his patron Sejanus in October A.D. 31. The emperor Tiberius was pro-Jewish, and Pilate had no wish to offend him. His final year saw his disgrace in Judea and recall to Rome, where he died, leaving a memory in the Apostles' Creed of the church ("suffered under Pontius Pilate"). R.M.

PILGRIMAGE. An important ritual practice in the majority of the world's religions is pilgrimage—travel for religious reasons, generally to a sacred shrine or center. The pilgrimage goal is usually a place of mythological or historical significance. Those completing the trek to it may receive special boons of healing, answered prayers, or inner grace. Additional benefits to the pilgrim are likely to be enhanced fidelity to the religion, strengthened bonds of fellowship with one's coreligionists and particularly those with whom one traveled in pilgrimage, and greater prestige within the faith-community after return. In some cases, of which the most important is undoubtedly the Muslim HAJJ to Mecca, pilgrimage fulfills a definite religious obligation. More often, however, the grace of pilgrimage lies precisely in the fact that it is a supererogatory work that goes beyond minimal spiritual duties, and hence exemplifies extra devotion or zeal. At the same time, the truth that, especially in premodern times, pilgrimage often combined spiritual enthusiasm with recreation and diverting, if strenuous, travel cannot be overlooked; pilgrimage also indirectly has done much to spread cultural features and knowledge of the world.

Besides the Muslim hajj, important pilgrimage practices have included Roman Catholic journeys to Rome, Lourdes, or Fatima; Japanese to the grand shrine of ISE or various sacred mountains including FUJI; Hindu to the sacred Ganges River and a number of famous temples; Buddhist to sacred relics and footprints of the Buddha; and Islamic to the shrines of numerous saints. Almost alone among major religious traditions, Protestant Christianity has no important role for pilgrimage in the traditional sense. Pilgrimage is also frequently used by spiritual writers as a metaphor for inward growth toward God.

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. See BUNYAN, JOHN.

PILLAR OF FIRE AND OF CLOUD. A crucial means of God's self-revelation to the Israelites as they trekked through the wilderness and advanced toward the Land of Promise (Num. 14:14; Deut. 31:15; Neh. 9:12, 19; Ps. 99:7). The pillar of cloud and fire provides Yahweh's transient people needful guidance and protection. When designed solely as a pillar of cloud, it becomes the locus of divine revelation.

The pillar of cloud and fire is introduced early in the narrative of Israel's departure from Egypt as indication that active divine presence would accompany Yahweh's people throughout their wilderness wandering (Exod. 13:21). As the Egyptian force gained ground on the fugitives, the pillar moved between the two hosts to prevent the Egyptians from immediately overtaking the Israelites (14:19).

The pillar of cloud is deftly portrayed in its revelatory aspect in two passages. First, Exodus 33:9-10 reports that whenever Moses entered the tent of meeting to converse with Yahweh, "the pillar of cloud would descend and stand at the door of the tent." Accordingly, God's presence was manifested to the people who responded reverently. Second, Numbers 12:5 records identical divine descent prior to the disclosure of Yahweh's word defending the incomparability of Moses to Aaron and Miriam, who had defied their brother's authority.

The origin of such imagery is conjectural. Some suggestions include: (1) the use of burning braziers to indicate an army's line of nocturnal march; (2) the notion entertained by desert inhabitants that active volcanoes emitting fire and smoke betokened divine presence; (3) the ascent of sacrificial smoke at ancient sanctuaries, if not the smoke and flame discharged by two bronze pillars fronting Solomon's temple (I Kings 7:15-22). Since cloud and fire often denote presence and guidance in the OT (Gen. 15:17; Exod. 3:2; 19:9; 24:17; 40:34-38; I Kings 8:10-11), this wilderness symbol is singularly apt. J.K.K.

PILLARS OF ISLAM. Five fundamental religious obligations of Muslims are commonly referred to as the "Five Pillars of Islam." They are: the profession of faith in the form of the simple Muslim creed, "There is no god but God (Allah, the one God), and Muhammad is his prophet"; the formal prayer or worship (salat), done in a prescribed manner five times a day, facing in the direction of Mecca; giving alms, which for fulfillment of this obligation is in prescribed amounts, often collected as taxes from the faithful only in traditional Islamic states; fasting in the form of abstention from food and drink between sunrise and sunset during the month of Ramadan in the Muslim lunar calendar; and the hajj or pilgrimage to Mecca incumbent upon those believers able to undertake it. The Five Pillars, ideally performed in the same way throughout the Muslim world and focused on the holy city of Mecca, have done much to enhance a sense of unity among Muslims. R.E.

PIRKE ABOTH. Popularly known in English as "Ethics of the Fathers." It is the part of the MISHNAH that comprises the selected wisdom, sayings, ethical and religious principles, and rules of conduct. The "fathers," scholars believe, are the early rabbis (from 300 B.C. to A.D. 200) who composed the various aphorisms and moral sayings. Aboth (or Avot) teaches good human relationships, the value of studying the Torah, how to serve God, love of peace, and the importance of charity, modesty, and humility to all humankind. L.K.

PISGAH, MOUNT. A mountain in the Abarim Mountains, opposite Jericho, from which Moses viewed vast stretches of Canaan west of the Jordan (Deut. 34:1-4). On its slopes Balak built seven sacrificial altars when he hired Balaam to curse Israel (Num. 23:14). If ancient Pisgah corresponds to Ras es-Siyaghah, it lies immediately west of Mount Nebo. J.K.K.

PISIDIA. An area located in southwest Asia Minor, now in Turkey. In NT times it formed part of the Roman province of Galatia. To the churches in this region Paul wrote the LETTER TO THE GALATIANS, according to one theory. The two references to Pisidia are in Acts 13:14 and 14:24. According to the first, ANTIOCH is called a Pisidian city to distinguish it from the more important Antioch on the Orontes (Acts 11:22-26; 13:1). Pisidia is known to have been a place where Jews settled in large numbers, though it is also attested that in this mountainous region the tribes were illiterate (that is, did not understand Greek) and both superstitious and savage (see Gal. 3:1). R.M.

PISTIS SOPHIA. A religious tract, written originally in Greek by Egyptian Gnostics and translated into the dialect of Sahidic. It is the latter translation that is extant. The theme of the document is the revelation made by the risen Lord to the chosen disciples, including PHILIP, who are bidden to write it down. This message of GNOSTICISM offers a way of escape from the material world to a spirit-filled existence in the realm of light. The title is taken from the name of the heroine, who in turn personified philosophy. She is set free from bondage to chaos by Jesus who ascends to the presence of God on high after defeating evil powers. Much is made of this engagement, and the work aids our understanding of how Egyptian believers in esoteric mysteries came to attach the story of Jesus and his disciples to contemporary mysticism. PIUS II (1405-64). Pope (1458-64) and Renaissance humanist named Enea Silvio de Piccolomini, known in literature as Aeneas Silvius, who reasserted papal supremacy over councils. A native Italian from Tuscany, he was educated in humanism at Sienna's university and became secretary to Bishop Capranica at the Council of Basel, living in Switzerland from 1431 to 1435, and distinguishing himself at the council. His history of the council in 1440 defended conciliar supremacy. In 1442 he began working for Holy Roman Emperor Frederick III as poet laureate and wrote irreverent, romantic works. On being ordained in 1446, he renounced his conciliarism and romantic writings, and in 1447 became bishop of Trieste. He then wrote new treatises on Basel, education, and other things, from a papal perspective. In 1456 he was made a cardinal and two years later elected pope. He took the name Pius from Virgil's "pius Aeneas." He served ably as pope, sought unsuccessfully to mount a crusade against the Turks, and in 1460 issued the bull Execrabilis against anyone appealing to a council. C.M.

PIUS IX (1792-1878). Pope (1846-78) with the longest papal reign in history, who opposed modern liberalism, proclaimed the Immaculate Conception of Mary, and pushed papal infallibility through VATICAN Council I. Born in Senigallia, Italy, and named Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti, Pius was inclined to constitutional reforms and liberalism when elected pope, but in 1848 revolutionists under Giuseppe Mazzini established a republic of Rome and briefly imprisoned Pius, who escaped. Restored to his throne in 1850 by French troops, Pius bitterly opposed liberalism and branded Catholic liberals as traitors. In 1861 Victor Emmanuel unified Italy, with most papal states included. Pius opposed the new state, and in 1864 issued his sweeping SYLLABUS OF ERRORS, which condemned eighty modernist errors including separation of church and state, civil control of education, and civil recognition of other religions. The Immaculate Conception of Mary (1854), removing Mary from original sin, proved popular in Catholicism; however, when Vatican Council I in 1870 voted for papal infallibility, reactions created the Old Catholic church under Jansenist auspices. On the withdrawal of French troops in 1870, Victor Emmanuel captured Rome, and the remaining papal states joined the new Italy. Pius retained Vatican City and received special privileges, but considered himself a prisoner. This "Italian question" was not settled until 1929, when Mussolini and the pope made a concordat.

C.M.

PIUS XI (1857–1939). Pope (1922–39) known for stressing liturgy, missions, and concordats with Mussolini and Hitler. Born near Milan, Italy, and named Achille Ambrogio Damiano Ratti, educated in Milan and Rome, Ratti taught dogmatic theology at Milan (1882–88), and from 1888 to 1918 rose to prefect at Milan's Ambrosian Library and later at Rome's Vatican Library. He became apostolic visitor to Poland (1918) and archbishop of Milan (1921). Elected pope (1922), he produced several encyclicals on social issues and concluded a concordat with Mexico (1929) allowing the church to function. But he is chiefly remembered for accommodating concordats with Mussolini (1929) and Hitler (1933), neither of whom kept the agreements. Fearing Communism, Pius supported Francisco Franco in Spain's civil war (1937). Disillusioned by the bad faith of totalitarian governments, Pius lashed out with Non abbiamo bisogno (1931), saying Catholics could not be Fascists, Mit brennender Sorge (1937), saying Nazism was utterly anti-Christian, and Divini Redemptoris (1937), saying Communism was false and deceptive.

C.M.

PIUS XII (1876–1958). Pope (1939–58), diplomat, humanitarian, and canon law expert, who decreed excommunication for Catholics who became Communists, and dogmatized the Assumption of Mary. Born into a family of lawyers and named Eugenio Pacelli, Pius XII became a priest in 1899 and that same year received doctorates in theology and law. A pastor for two years, in 1901 he began serving in various high papal offices including chamberlain, consultor, nuncio, secretary of state, and legate. His diplomatic missions carried him throughout the Catholic world. Elected pope in 1939, he sought peace and succored refugees, but vacillated on denouncing Hitler's genocide of Jews and later encountered severe criticism for not taking a strong stance against Hitler. As pope he visited France, the United States, Hungary, and Argentina. His encyclical Mystici Corporis (1943) pictured the church as Christ's mystical body. In 1946 he named thirty-two new cardinals, including five from the United States, raising the number of cardinals to seventy. In 1949 he declared excommunication for Catholics who became Communists, and in 1950 dogmatized Mary's bodily ascension into heaven. He opposed non-Catholic ecumenism, saying all should return to Rome.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT. A sequence of natural disasters victimizing Egypt prior to Israel's release from Egyptian servitude (Exod. 7:8–11:10). Various labels "plagues" (9:14), "signs" (10:1-2), and "wonders" (7:3), they jointly constitute God's "great acts of judgment" (7:4) against Egypt.

The ten plague episodes are as follows: (1) Nile to blood (7:14-25, following 7:8-13, a preface); (2) frogs (8:1-15); (3) gnats (8:16-19); (4) flies (8:20-32); (5) diseased cattle (9:1-7); (6) boils (9:8-12); (7) hail (9:13-35); (8) locusts (10:1-20); (9) darkness (10:21-23); (10) death of the "firstborn" (11:1-10).

These stylized plague episodes claim a historical nucleus. Interpreters have often introduced various natural Egyptian phenomena into the discussion, and sometimes argued for a causal relationship whereby one scourge triggers another. Tiny organisms tend to give the Nile a dull reddish hue when it crests in August. Scourges of frogs have been attested in September. An abundance of dead frogs might readily attract gnats and flies, subsequently inflicting disease upon cattle and humanity. Egyptian hailstorms, while infrequent, are known, as are locusts and severe sandstorms capable of darkening the skies. All plagues, save the death of the firstborn, can be said to make sense within an Egyptian setting.

Such rationalizations, however, ignore the wonder surging through these episodes. Natural law held no fascination for biblical Israel. Rather, with eyes of faith, Yahweh's people emphasized the reality of unnatural happenings providentially executed in their behalf. Their immunity from those plagues that devastated their Egyptian neighbors was not perceived as fortuitous. Nor was the hardening of Pharaoh's heart understood as anything but the outcome of Yahweh's own determination to manifest impressive "wonders" for Yahweh's own glory.

In sum, the plague episodes of Exodus 7:8–11:10 fit comfortably within the entirety of Exodus 1–15, chapters perceptively grasped by Johannes Pedersen as cultically shaped PASSOVER legend celebrating Yahweh's special intervention for the rescue of Yahweh's people. Nature was thus subjected to divine purpose as Yahweh claimed Israel in a most memorable manner.

PLAINSONG. Vocal music or chanting, rhythmic but not metrical, also called plainchant. It is the usual music of the Roman Catholic Mass. Plainsong is an extension of speech, and its scales are limited to the intervals of the human voice. Individual notes are usually of the same time length. Many times plainsong is performed by two choirs singing the same melody alternatively. It is a pure, beautiful music well suited to its sacred use in divine services.

Since the far-reaching revisions of the Catholic liturgy by Vatican Council II, the Mass is now sung or said in the vernacular, the language of the people. The Mass now is also accompanied by various kinds of instruments and several forms of music. J.C.

PLATO/PLATONISM. Probably the most influential philosopher who has ever lived (428–348 B.C.), Plato was a member of a distinguished Athenian family. As a young man, he was deeply influenced by the teaching and example of SOCRATES, who was put to death by the Athenian authorities in 399. About twelve years after this event, Plato founded his famous academy at Athens for the discussion and study of philosophical, scientific, and mathematical questions. The Academy claimed his energies for the rest of his life, except for two periods in 367 and 361–60, when he was persuaded to take part, without much success, in the political affairs of the Greek colony at Syracuse in Sicily. He is said to have been buried within the Academy. His philosophical work survives in the form of about thirty dialogues, distinguished not only for their contributions to epistemology, ethics, metaphysics, aesthetics, politics, and the philosophy of religion but also, in many cases, for their dramatic and literary power.

The Early Works. Plato's earlier dialogues are still strongly under the influence of Socrates, who appears as the principal spokesman. Three of these dialogues present us with a portrait of Socrates, and though that portrait may be to some extent idealized, we may well believe that its outlines are reliable. The Apology contains Socrates' defense, made before the magistrates of Athens, concluding with the dramatic words: "The hour of departure has arrived and we go our ways—I to die, and you to live. Which is better is known to God, and only to him." Phaedo claims to be a record of the conversation that Socrates had with his friends on the last day of his life in the prison. The theme of the conversation is the immortality of the soul, and the dialogue ends with Socrates drinking the cup of hemlock (the mode of execution in Athens at that time). The relatively brief Crito shows that although Socrates had come into collision with the state, he was the true patriot who respected the laws, for when he was offered the opportunity of escaping to another city-state, he declined, preferring to depart "in innocence, a sufferer and not a doer of evil, a victim, not of the laws, but of men."

Of the other early dialogues in which Socrates has a leading role, many follow a definite pattern. A question is asked, for example, "What is courage?" or "What is piety?" A number of answers are given by participants in the dialogue, but Socrates proceeds to show that these answers are inadequate. So these dialogues do not so much expand our knowledge as make us aware that much of what passes for knowledge has no right to the name. It is likely enough that this exposure of the pretentiousness of those who claimed to know does accurately portray the activities of Socrates in Athens, and it may well have been a factor in making him unpopular with those in high places. It fits very well with the incident mentioned in the Apology, according to which Socrates was declared by the Delphic Oracle to be the wisest of men, and the explanation is given that he alone was protected from illusion by his knowledge of his own ignorance.

A number of philosophical doctrines already find expression in the early dialogues, though it is not clear whether they represent Socrates' own views or are put into his mouth by Plato. We have already noted that Phaedo makes a case for the immortality of the soul, and it seems highly probable that this belief was held by Socrates; but certainly the belief in the reality, importance, and immortality of the soul, together with the duty of tending and cultivating the soul, becomes a major tenet in the philosophy of Plato himself and in subsequent Platonism.

The important doctrine of recollection appears in the Meno. A slave boy, who has never learned geometry, is skillfully questioned by Socrates so that he gives correct answers to mathematical questions. "Do you observe," asks Socrates, "that I am not teaching the boy anything, but only asking him questions?" Though his ability to answer is mythologically explained in terms of the immortal soul's remembering from former existences, the important point is that significant truths are present a priori in the mind and do not arise from sense experience. The theory of Ideas or Forms is also early, and is closely connected with belief in the immortality of the soul. The world of sense is in constant flux, but as the soul withdraws itself from the life of the senses, it becomes aware of the forms, ideas, or universal essences that are eternal and unchanging and that alone yield knowledge that is permanent and reliable.

Middle and Later Works. Of all Plato's dialogues, The Republic is the most famous. This writing raises the question, "What is justice?" and it brings together themes from ethics, politics, anthropology, and metaphysics. Justice is a theme ideally suited to raise a most difficult question, which is still being debated in ethics today—what is the relation between individual virtue and what might be called social virtue? Plato's way of answering this question is to claim that there are parallel structures in the individual and in society. Both are tripartite. On the one hand, the human soul has three parts or levels. The highest of these is reason, the faculty by which we can know the eternal Ideas; below that is the "spirited" part, characterized by courage and enterprise; below that again lies a multitude of passions and desires, clamoring for gratification. In the soul of the just person, these three parts are in harmony. The ideal life is that in which rational judgment prevails. It is therefore a life of intellectual contemplation, directed upon the Forms or Ideas, and especially on the Form of the Good, which stands at the apex of the hierarchy of Forms. The active life, dominated by the "spirited" element in the soul, is inferior to the contemplative life, but both of these are far superior to the life of the senses. In his well-known allegory of the cave, Plato suggests that the mass of human beings are the victims of illusion, and only a few penetrate to truth. The state shows a structure corresponding to that of the individual human person. The guardians are those devoted to wisdom, the philosopher-politicians; the soldiers and administrators rank next, and correspond to the spirited part of the soul. Below them are the ordinary people who need to be guided. Plato, it will be observed, had little use for democracy. Justice in the state, parallel to justice in the individual, depends on the harmonious relationship of the three classes.

Other important dialogues include the Symposium, which reports speeches in praise of love (eros) made at a banquet. This too praises the contemplative life, for the highest eros is that of the philosopher, who aims at a mystical union with the Good and the Beautiful. The Theaetetus and the Sophist both deal with the question of knowledge. Even if no very clear theory of knowledge emerges at the end, the point is again driven home that knowledge cannot be founded on sensation or sense-perception. The Timaeus is an essay in cosmology. A subordinate deity, the Demiourgos, is said to have formed the objects in this world of space and time, using the eternal Forms as his model. So there is a kind of imperfection about this empirical world. Full reality belongs only to the eternal world of ideas, and the physical world is but a copy of it. In an often quoted phrase, Plato describes time as "the moving image of eternity." While the Demiourgos gives form to the world, he does not actually create it but makes use of a preexistent matter (hyle). It has often been said that this makes a difference between Plato's teaching about creation and the Judeo-Christian doctrine of creation out of nothing. But the matter used by the Demiourgos is said to be completely without properties or determinations, and therefore it might be hard to say what is the difference between this indeterminate matter and nothing.

Plato's last and longest dialogue, Laws, contains his last reflections on ethics and jurisprudence. But it is also important as containing his last thoughts on theology or the philosophy of religion. He offers arguments for the existence of God and claims that God is wise and righteous. Here we seem to have reached a fully theistic position. But some matters remain obscure. How is this God related to the Form of the Good, which appears to be the (impersonal) ultimate being of the earlier dialogues? Or how is he related to the Demiourgos? Or how is he related to the many gods and goddesses of Greek religion, for, although Plato criticizes the unworthy and sometimes immoral myths that were told about the gods, it does not seem that he denied their existences.

Platonism. After Plato's death, the Academy continued to develop his philosophy, and in fact continued until A.D. 529, when it was closed by Justinian. As early as the first and second centuries A.D., Platonism was combining with Jewish and Christian theology (Philo, Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and many others). From the third century onwards, Platonism was being superseded by the related NEOPLATONISM, which strongly influenced Christian theology from Augustine until the Middle Ages. Platonism returned as a powerful influence in German IDEALISM. It is an exaggeration to say with Whitehead that Western philosophy is a series of footnotes to Plato, but no other thinker has been more formative. J.M.

PLENARY COUNCIL. According to part II of the Code of Canon Law of the Roman Catholic church, "Particular Councils," a plenary council (that is, a council of the whole) of all the churches in an Episcopal Conference is to be held as often as the Episcopal Conference considers it necessary and has the permission of the pope. "Plenary" refers to the whole, to all Catholic parishes in a given territory. J.C.

PLENARY INDULGENCES. An INDULGENCE, granted by the pope, that remits the entire temporal punishment that the sinner deserves according to divine justice. Such indulgences generally are said to be applicable to all the souls in PURGATORY. The degree to which it is accepted is up to God. J.C.

PLENARY INSPIRATION. See INSPIRATION AND REVELATION.

PLEROMA. See FULLNESS OF TIME.

PL KYODAN. A Japanese "new religion," whose name means "Perfect Liberty Church." This religious movement was founded by Miki Tokuchika in 1946 on the basis of two prewar movements. By 1970 it claimed over a million adherents, both in Japan, and largely among persons of Japanese descent, around the world. Its headquarters community at Tondabayashi, near Osaka, is imposing, including a temple, hospital, and golf course.

A basic tenet and the motto of PL is: "Life is Art." Like a masterly painting, one's life should be a carefully planned and balanced composition, with proportionate attention to work, family, culture, and recreation. To this end PL churches are noted for their cultural and sports activities.

PL's worship is liturgical, its rites of singing, chanting, and offering being of unusual grace and beauty. PL has a special prayer, the oyashikiri, which combines words and gestures and is said to be particularly powerful in healing. PL provides its members with guidance in spiritual and personal matters from designated elders through a formalized procedure for exchange of correspondence. In this way, like other of the new religions of Japan, it gives particular attention to the needs of the individual.

PLOTINUS (207–270). Philosopher and mystic, Plotinus was born in Egypt and studied at the school of Alexandria under Ammonius Saccus. After travels in the East, he opened a school in Rome in A.D. 44, and while there he wrote fifty-four tractates expounding the philosophico-religious system known as NEOPLATONISM. These writings were arranged in six groups of nine each, and so were called the Enneads (from Greek, ennea, “nine”). At the head of his metaphysical system stands The One, the Source of everything but so utterly transcendent that it is beyond personality and all human comprehension. We cannot even call it “God” or say that it “is,” though the mystic may in rare moments attain to communion with The One in an ecstatic experience that Plotinus calls a “leap.” But The One does not remain shut up and hidden in itself. It has come forth in a series of emanations. The first of these is Nous (Greek, “reason” comparable to the Logos of Christian thought). The Nous generates (or perhaps is constituted by) an intelligible world of ideas, in Plato’s sense. From the Nous there emanates the Psyche or world Soul, compared by some early Christian writers to the Holy Spirit. The Soul extends through the world, and in and through this universal Soul our finite human souls are united. Strictly speaking, it is the Triad of The One, the Nous, and the Psyche that constitutes the Plotinian Godhead, not The One by itself. Plotinus’ philosophy profoundly influenced patristic and medieval Christian thinkers, and its traces are to be found in such modern philosophers as Hegel and Heidegger.

PLUMTRE, EDWARD HAYES (1821–91). Anglican clergyman, theologian, author, and hymn writer. Plumtre, born in London, England, was a widely respected Victorian clergyman and man of letters. During his distinguished career, he was a writer of history, biography, and poetry and held high university positions. As a loyal churchman, influenced by the Oxford Movement, he held many high posts in the Church of England, including dean of Wells Cathedral. Plumtre was the author of several works of theology and composed verse translations of Sophocles and Aeschylus. He also wrote the Life of Thomas Ken, a seventeenth-century bishop of the Anglican Church, and served on the Revision Committee of the Revised Version of the Bible (1881). He is remembered best for the hymn “Rejoice Ye Pure in Heart,” which he was commissioned to write for the annual choir festival at Peterborough Cathedral in 1865. Another beloved hymn he left to the church was “O Light, Whose Beams Illumine All.”

PLURALISM. The de facto social system in the United States and other Western democracies, in religions, life-styles, and philosophical beliefs. Pluralism recognizes the legitimacy of many religious systems and tolerates many different philosophies and life-styles. Although traditionally pluralism stood for belief in more than one ultimate principle and opposed monism, the belief in one ultimate principle, the modern use of the term does not necessarily imply a denial of one ultimate reality: God. Rather, pluralism is the practical and necessary outgrowth of a democratic social order that recognizes the religious LIBERTY of every person. In order to allow people to follow the dictates of their own consciences, equal respect must be paid to every religious expression. This is not a denial of the unity of the Divine or of the objectivity of truth but is the recognition of the dignity and sanctity of each human personality. Such a social order, affirming religious pluralism, with corresponding freedom for various life-styles and world views, is a natural outgrowth of the American concept of the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE and the principles of religious TOLERATION worked out in England by John Locke.

Pluralism is a fundamental part of any free society but is fragile, as is democracy itself. The recognition of the inalienable rights of the minority by the majority, which is always changing, must constantly be promoted and protected. From time to time religious pluralism is challenged by zealots who feel they constitute a majority of the electorate and consequently should be able to enforce their religious practices by law. This religious imperialism is the antithesis of democracy and, in the case of Christianity, is a devolution from faith to a cultural religion, a CIVIL RELIGION that makes an idol out of one form of religion. In the contemporary world such threats to democratic pluralism and to the purity of faith have come from the religious right in America and from the political left in some Communist countries. Both attempts to suppress individual liberties are equally wrong. Only where people can worship or not worship as they decide is there genuine freedom.

PLYMOUTH BRETHERN. Also known as simply “Christian Brethren,” this group developed among the followers of JOHN NELSON DARBY, former cleric of the Church of Ireland. Its name came from a large group that assembled in Plymouth, England, about 1830. Members had met for some time in small groups in Ireland and England for prayer and fellowship. They were particularly concerned about biblical prophecy and the Second Coming.

The group split after 1845 over doctrine and church discipline. Darby’s followers, termed “Exclusive Brethren,” subdivided a number of times and now comprise about five separate groups, whose United States congregations number 250, with an approximate membership of 19,000. The “Open” group, under the leadership of George Müller, adopted less rigorous membership standards and a congregational polity. They have 850 United States "assemblies" with about 79,000 members and 400 designated leaders.

Plymouth Brethren stress the priesthood of all male believers and make little distinction between clergy and laymen. They have Communion every Sunday and usually practice believers' baptism. They have been quite active in missions, particularly in central Africa, India, and Latin America. N.H.

POETRY (Biblical). Given its innate simplicity, imaginative character, and emotional appeal, Hebrew poetry provided a superb means for biblical Israel to express itself about God, nation, and world. Approximately one-third of the OT is cast in poetry. Diverse poetic genres convey the judgment oracles of the prophet, the aphorisms of the sage, and the hymns, thanksgivings, and laments of the psalmist.

Basic Features of Hebrew Poetry. (a) Parallelism. Clearly, parallelism is the most significant structural feature of Hebrew verse. The poetical line (bicolon) consists of two members, the second echoing or extending the thought of the first. This often involves synonymous parallelism, whereby the first colon is creatively restated in the second:

The heavens are telling the glory of God; and the firmament proclaims his handiwork (Ps. 19:1).

Sometimes the parallelism is antithetic with the second member set against the first in contrasting manner:

The light of the righteous rejoices, but the lamp of the wicked will be put out (Prov. 13:9).

The parallelism is termed emblematic when the message of one colon is echoed in the other through metaphor or simile:

The Lord has become like an enemy, he has destroyed Israel (Lam. 2:5).

Synthetic or formal parallelism is evidenced when the thought of the first colon spills over into the second. No repetition is involved; yet the two cola are quantitatively balanced:

I have set my king on Zion, my holy hill (Ps. 2:6).

(b) Meter. In Hebrew poetry, meter is defined in terms of accented syllables. Since parallelism and meter are closely linked, the most typical metric pattern (3 + 3) involves three accented syllables in each colon (see Ps. 19:1 above). An early 2 + 2 meter operates in the Song of Miriam (Exod. 15:21), and a Qinah (lament) meter of 3 + 2, incorporating cola of unequal length, prevails in Lamentations 1-4 (see Lam. 2:5 above). Nor are tricola with 3 + 3 + 3 meter unusual (see Ps. 111:9-10). Since metrical irregularities are admissible in Hebrew rhythmic patterns, one poem may utilize several different meters.

(c) Strophic structure. The larger verse units into which Hebrew poetic lines group themselves are designated as strophes. Ordinarily they are not of equal length in a given poem. Though the strophic structure of many OT poems is elusive, several clues are trustworthy. These include use of a recurring refrain (Pss. 42-43), changes of person, the use of key words ("behold," "therefore"), and recourse to the acrostic whereby successive consonants of the Hebrew alphabet initiate the respective strophes (Ps. 119; Lam. 1-4).

New Testament Poetry. Though poetry is less prominent in the NT than in the OT, it surfaces at crucial junctures. Many NT texts draw upon OT poetry—Joel 2:28-29 is cited in the Pentecost narrative (Acts 2:17-18); and in its meditation on Jesus, Hebrews 2:6-8 quotes Psalm 8:4-6. Reporting the births of John and Jesus, Luke includes three expressive hymns—Mary's "Magnificat" (1:46-55), Zechariah's "Benedictus" (1:68-79), and Simeon's "Nunc Dimittis" (2:29-32). In Philippians 2:6-11 Paul presumably cites a known christological hymn (see also Col. 1:15-20). As teacher, Jesus apparently honored the canons of Semitic (Aramaic) poetry. In Matthew 7:7, "Ask, and it will be given you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you," synonymous parallelism is evident. Luke 13:30, "Some are last who will be first, and some are first who will be last," exhibits antithetic parallelism, and the Beatitudes (Matt. 5:3-10) employ synthetic parallelism.

Significant Poetic Techniques. Studies in Ugaritic poetry emphasize the importance of parallel word pairs. Though the correspondence in thought of parallel poetic lines remains a concern, focus has recently fallen on the correspondence of those specific terms that comprise these lines. The "cup" / "bowl" word pair appears in Isaiah 51:17, and the "strange" / "foreign" pair in Psalm 81:9. The isolation of almost a thousand fixed pairs in the Ugaritic language has highlighted the oral dimension of poetic composition in ancient Israel, when poets often fashioned their craft in on-the-spot situations with frequent reliance upon established poetic diction.

The omission of one or more words is called ellipsis. Proverbs 19:22 presumably contrasts a poor, honest man with a wealthy liar, though what is literally stated is "a poor man is better than a liar." Perhaps Psalm 113:4 is elliptical since Yahweh's glory is praised for reaching above "the heavens," rather than above "the hosts of heaven," a phrase more explicit and familiar.

Inclusion involves an exact or approximate repetition of an opening phrase at the conclusion of a literary unit. The final verse of Psalm 8 faithfully repeats the psalm's opening bicolon, and Psalm 70 opens and closes with synonymous imperatives addressed to the Deity—"make haste to help" and "do not tarry." This device appreciably unifies the composition in question.

POINT OF CONTACT. A term used in Christian theology and associated with the doctrine of REVELATION. At issue is whether God's saving revelation is present exclusively in Jesus Christ or whether God is also truly revealed in nature and in the events of history. Is the IMAGE OF GOD in humans so effaced by sin as to leave no natural point of contact with God? Or are people, despite sin, capable of knowing God, if imperfectly, through nature and history? The issue was especially joined in a dispute between KARL BARTH and EMIL BRUNNER. Barth maintained that saving revelation is found only in Christ and accused Brunner of yielding to a dangerous NATURAL THEOLOGY. The dispute initiated an important debate on the nature of humanity and divine revelation.

POLITICAL THEOLOGY. A term derived from the works of JURGEN MOLTMANN and J. Metz in Europe. Alistair Kee has been a leading spokesman for this overall view of theology that calls for religion to engage in political life, not to dominate it—or be used by it—but to criticize it with biblical insight.

Political theology is peculiarly conscious of the destructive unions of religion and political powers in the past, and, increasingly today in the conservative capture of mass Fundamentalist support in the American New Religious Right. From the cult of the emperor in ancient Rome to Constantine's use of the Catholic Church to unite the Roman Empire, to the involvement of the medieval popes in European political affairs, to the Nazis' abuse of the church, political theologians point out that, despite many pious protests by both conservatives and liberals in America, religion has always been "political." (See CIVIL RELIGION.) To make the believer conscious of these false ways of relating religion and politics is the necessary first step, according to political theologians, before the church can relate positively to the political order.

It is not possible for the church to withdraw from politics for that way (formerly used by Fundamentalists) is to legitimize the status quo simply by default. Another erroneous attitude toward religion is the conservative Protestant belief that religion is a matter of personal decision and hence a private matter. Religion then is quietistic, a devotion to the inner life, with an abandonment of the social and political realm. This effectively removes Christian witness from all the affairs that affect the lives of human beings. The powerful then control society, and the weak and poor have no one to stand up for them. This position, as political theologians from the various camps of BLACK THEOLOGY, FEMINIST THEOLOGY and LIBERATION THEOLOGY point out, is the way of selfishness, not the way of love.

The past two decades have produced many variants of political theology in response to major social and political upheavals such as the Montgomery bus boycott that led to the civil rights drive; the response of many Christians and Jews to the ten-year conflict in Vietnam with a vast peace movement; the Watergate break-in that led to President Nixon's resignation; the drive for the ERA by feminists; the nuclear freeze movement; the Catholic bishops' statements on nuclear war and on America's economy and society.

POLYCARP, EPISTLE OF. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna in the first half of the second century, was the author of several letters, according to Irenaeus, but only one letter has survived. This is his letter to the Philippian church. The purpose of this writing is twofold: to warn his readers against creating disorder in the church and falling into false teaching, and to encourage the Philippians to collect the letters of IGNATIUS into a corpus. To that end Polycarp is sending to the Philippian church the copies of Ignatius' letters in his possession. The date of this "covering letter" of Polycarp (K. Lake's phrase) is somewhere between A.D. 110 and 117, but it is possible, following P. N. Harrison, that the letter has two separate parts, with chapters 13–14 written first and chapters 1–12 much later, about 135–137, just before the arrival of MARCION, the heretical figure in Rome. The allusion (in 7:1) to a false leader as the "first-born of Satan" has suggested an identification with Marcion, since Irenaeus at a later time associates this designation with Polycarp's criticism.

Throughout the letter are encouragements to virtue, especially in a warning against covetousness, and a call to perseverance in the Christian life, with a special section of admonition addressed to deacons and elders at Philippi.

POLYGAMY. See MARRIAGE.

POLYGLOT BIBLE. A Bible containing several versions of the same text in parallel columns. The first OT of this sort was probably the Hexapla, compiled by Origen in the third century A.D. When the invention of printing permitted their production, a number of such Bibles were published, including the six-volume Complutensian Polyglot of 1522, produced under the patronage of Cardinal Jiménez of Spain. In 1952 The Genesis Octapla, compiled by Luther A. Weigle, chairman of the National Council of Churches' committee that sponsored the Revised Standard Version of the Bible, included eight English translations in one folio volume. In the 1960s several volumes were published that included the King James Version alongside other contemporary BIBLE TRANSLATIONS.

POLYTHEISM. Belief in and worship of many gods. As the theologian Paul Tillich once remarked, polytheism is really a matter of quality rather than quantity; the polytheist not only has more deities than the monotheist, but experiences the sacred in a profoundly different way. Instead of seeing all that is ultimately under a single divine being or will, one sees divinity as finite but richly diversified, linked to innumerable particular places, functions or moods. While polytheisms frequently tend toward unity, either under an impersonal, universal force or a potentially monotheistic "king of the gods," particularism is its most salient characteristic.

Despite its much-discussed "high gods," primitive religion had many polytheistic elements: personifications of nature, masters of animals, ancestral spirits, and mythological figures. It was in the ancient agricultural societies such as those of Egypt, Mesopotamia, Greece, Rome, or northern Europe, however, that polytheistic pantheons become most highly developed. The unification of many peoples into empires typically meant that their various patronal gods had to be incorporated into a single system, and the increasing complexification of human society called for a heavenly counterpart with extensive division of labor.

Today, the great historical religions of MONOTHEISM and monism have overwhelmed traditional forms of polytheism in most of the world. SHINTO is perhaps the only thoroughgoing polytheistic religion remaining in a major advanced society. But HINDUISM and TAOISM retain polytheistic pantheons set against a monistic background. Even in BUDDHISM and the Western monotheisms, devotion to various buddhas, bodhisattvas, saints, angels, and spirits, especially on a popular level, often displays polytheistic characteristics, revealing a persistent human desire to find the sacred in finite, particularized forms as well as in the One. PONTIFEX MAXIMUS. A title in Roman Catholicism designating the chief priest of the Pontifical College, the POPE. However, like the title "pope," which was not formally restricted to the bishop of Rome until the Council of Rome in 1073, "pontifex maximus" often designated other leading bishops until the eleventh century. C.M.

PONTIFICAL. A synonym for "papal," referring to the POPE, the bishop of Rome, and the head of the Roman Catholic Church. "Pontiff" is derived from the Latin word pontifex, or high priest. Its root meaning seems to be derived from the Latin words facere, to make, and ponteus, bridge, meaning to create a bridge between God and humans. Pontifical is used in many connections, as in the pontifical family (the pope's household), the pontifical gendarmerie (or police in the Vatican), the pontifical chapel, the pontifical Mass, and pontifical services.

"Pontificals" per se refer to the ceremonial robes and paraphernalia worn by a Catholic bishop, especially the pectoral cross, bishop's ring, the miter, and pastoral staff. It also includes the bishop's sandals, gloves, tunic, and dalmatic, as well as the episcopal throne. At one time, pontificals were also worn by Anglican bishops in cathedral services. Cardinals and abbots in the Catholic church use pontificals. J.C.

PONTIFICAL MASS. A high MASS sung by a cardinal, a bishop in his own diocese, or an abbot in his own abbey, and elsewhere only by permission. There are assistant priests, two assistant deacons, and at least nine acolytes. During the opening the bishop is vested at the altar. J.C.

POPE. In Roman Catholic theology, the pope is the VICAR of Christ on earth, and the head of the universal Christian church, as well as the bishop of Rome and the patriarch of the West. According to the ecclesiology (doctrine of the church) of the Catholic church, the apostle Peter was the first pope, appointed to that office by Jesus Christ at the encounter in Caesarea Philippi recorded in Matthew 16. Jesus asked the disciples who people said he was. John the Baptist, Elijah, and Jeremiah were mentioned, but Jesus asked them who they thought he was. Simon Peter, the son of Jonah, answered: "You are the Christ, the Son of the Living God." Jesus then told Peter: "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona! For flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. And I tell you, you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church, and the powers of death shall not prevail against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

From Peter's time to the present, some 263 other men have occupied Peter's place as Christ's vicar, according to ROMAN CATHOLICISM. A strong tradition tells us that Peter was martyred in A.D. 64, under Nero. Tradition also says that the Roman congregation elected Linus of Tuscany as bishop, establishing the concept of the transferability of the powers of Peter from one bishop of Rome to another down through the generations. This tradition was affirmed by the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), which declared "The Church in Rome always holds primacy."

In the early second century A.D., Ignatius of Antioch was martyred in Rome and acknowledged in a letter to the then reigning bishop of Rome the preeminence and special authority of the Roman church. Toward the end of the second century, Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, wrote, "All churches everywhere must agree with this church [Rome] because of its more effective leadership, since in it Christians everywhere have preserved intact the apostolic tradition."

Tradition records that the first thirty-three bishops of Rome (or popes) were martyred. Terrible persecutions broke out throughout the second and third centuries and into the fourth, culminating in the fiercest oppression ever, under the emperor Diocletian, from A.D. 300 to 305. Persecutions ceased when Constantine defeated Maxentius and became emperor in A.D. 312. In A.D. 313 full freedom of worship was granted Christians throughout the empire. Eventually Christianity became the state religion. Constantine moved the government east, to Constantinople, and the pope, by default, acquired many of the civil powers exercised formerly by the emperor. The prestige of the papacy increased dramatically because of this, and even more because of the ecumenical (universal) council called by Constantine at Nicaea. In the fifth century, Rome fell to the barbarians who spared the churches, increasing the pope's authority even more. Throughout the Middle Ages the popes grew more powerful because of the chaotic conditions in the Mediterranean area, after Odoacer overthrew the last Western emperor in A.D. 476.

The Council of Chalcedon recognized the Roman church as preeminent in A.D. 451, after the demands of Pope Leo I (440-461), who saw the bishop of Constantinople gaining in governmental prestige.

Gregory the Great, in the sixth century, was a strong pope but died in A.D. 604. The king of the Franks, Pepin, gave political authority over some seventeen thousand square miles of Italy to Pope Stephen III in the eighth century. This territory became the papal states, and the pope became a king for eleven centuries, until 1870 when the papal states were absorbed into the newly united kingdom of Italy. (In the thirteenth century, the city of Avignon and its environs in southern France were added to the papal states.) Later, Charlemagne confirmed this grant of territory and Pope Leo IV built high walls about the Vatican because of the frequent warfare in Italy. Upon the collapse of the empire of Charlemagne, the popes became pawns in the many struggles of feudalism. The state of the church degenerated, and at times, several men claimed to be pope (the anti-popes). This period, around A.D. 1000, was the low point of the papacy. Several popes abdicated in this difficult period. Pope Leo IX instituted reforms, but during his reign a split developed between Rome and the Eastern churches. In 1059, East and West mutually excommunicated each other. This schism has been largely healed since Vatican II, after nine hundred years. One of the most notable popes was Hildebrand, the reforming monk, who became bishop of Rome in A.D. 1075. Under Urban II, the first crusade was called, and Jerusalem and the sites of Christ's ministry were retaken from the Muslims. Innocent III (1198-1216) was a constructive pope who endorsed both the Franciscan and Dominican orders.

In the fourteenth century a conflict arose between Pope Boniface VIII and King Philip IV of France over control of church affairs. Under Clement V the seat of the papacy was moved from Rome to Avignon in France and remained there through the next six papacies. Pope Gregory XI returned the papacy to Rome in 1377, because of the reforming work of the dynamic Dominican nun, St. Catherine of Siena. She had a three-point program for church reform: (1) The pope should reside in Rome, (2) the church should be morally cleansed, and (3) political and social peace should be achieved for Italy.

The Renaissance was a glorious period for art and learning in Rome, sponsored by the papacy, but the worldliness and luxury of the papal court contributed to the greatest schism in Christian history—the Protestant Reformation. Half of Europe repudiated papal church leadership because of Rome's decadence and refusal to reform the church. Pope Leo X precipitated this break and excommunicated Martin Luther. The fifth Lateran Council, under Pope Julius, and the Council of Trent reformed the papacy somewhat, but it remained for the Vatican Council of 1870 and the Second Vatican Council under Pope John XXIII to institute far-reaching reforms. Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli (born 1881), as John XXIII, did more to reform and modernize the Catholic church than any of his predecessors. He also raised the world's respect for the papacy to its highest point since the Middle Ages. J.C.

PORT ROYAL. A Benedictine foundation near Paris, France, that became a Cistercian convent. Port Royal became the center of bitter seventeenth-century controversies over free will. Antoine Arnauld, head of the convent, and Blaise Pascal, whose sister was a nun at Port Royal, upheld the extreme Augustinian views of Cornelius Jansen, against the Jesuits. Port Royal was destroyed. C.M.

POSITIVE THINKING. A concept that takes its name from a book by NORMAN VINCENT PEALE, popular radio preacher and pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church in New York City. In 1952 he outlined the technique, giving examples from the lives of people to illustrate how anyone can develop "peace of mind, improved health, and a never-ceasing flow of energy." He assures his readers that they can have a life full of joy.

The basic principles of positive thinking are that, while accepting the fact that obstacles will arise, one must not permit these to dominate but must overcome or cast them out. People must will not to be defeated. Then they can become channels for spiritual power. Anyone can modify or change circumstances. With God's help they can build up the self. This is a system of creative living based on spiritual techniques, through which people can improve relationships with other people, maintain good health, and increase pleasure in living.

Prayer power is described as a spiritual technique based upon opening the mind humbly to God in order to stimulate the power of God to flow into the person. In praying, one should hold a mental image of what is needed, and in time this will become actualized in life. Create your own happiness, Peale affirms. Expect the best and receive it. Break wrong habits. Give up your worries to God. Emotions and health are interrelated. Relaxation is an affirmative way to a positive attitude. Peale's book is included in compilations of long-time best sellers of inspirational and self-help books. I.C.

POSTMILLENNIALISM. See MILLENNIUM.

POTENTIALITY. A philosophical term first used comprehensively by ARISTOTLE, referring to a capacity in a being to achieve some action or perfection. The term was later used by THOMAS AQUINAS and more recently by philosophers and theologians of NEO-THOMISM. Aristotle held that all things are made up of matter and form. However, prime matter is mere potentiality, whereas substantial form is what Aristotle and the Thomists call act, that is, what determines a material being's specific class or essence. A person's potential essence is rationality. Only God has no potency or aptitude for change. God's essence is pure act or existence.

POTIPHAR. Meaning "the one Re [the Egyptian sun-god] has given". Potiphar is identified as "an officer of Pharaoh, the captain of the guard." Potiphar bought JOSEPH from Ishmaelite (or Midianite) caravan traders just after he had been taken to Egypt as a slave (Gen. 37:36; 39:1).

We know neither the precise meaning of Potiphar's title nor whether any exact Egyptian equivalent exists. Yet he appears to be the chief steward within the court of an unnamed pharaoh. Potiphar's name is virtually identical with that of Joseph's priestly father-in-law, Potiphara (Gen. 41:45; 46:20). Presumably it was abbreviated so that the two names could be distinguished. Favorably impressed by Joseph's abilities, Potiphar placed his household in Joseph's charge (39:4). Then duped by the false accusation of his lusty, nameless wife that this "handsome and good-looking" slave had attempted to seduce her, Potiphar angrily consigned Joseph to prison (39:20).

POTTER'S FIELD. A piece of ground in Jerusalem, traditionally located on the southern slope of the valley of Hinnom, which was purchased by the chief priests (Matt. 27:6ff.) with the money that belonged to Judas Iscariot and thus in a sense was his purchase (Acts 1:18). The thirty pieces of silver he received for the betrayal of Jesus was subsequently considered "blood money" (Matt. 27:6) and the "reward of his wickedness" (Acts 1:18). When he returned it, the money was used to purchase the field where potters dug their clay as a burial place for strangers (Matt. 27:7). It was appropriately designated by an Aramaic term Akeldama (Field of Blood, Acts 1:19).

POWER OF THE KEYS. See KEYS OF THE KINGDOM.

PRACTICE OF THE PRESENCE OF GOD, THE. The spiritual effort to become increasingly aware of the presence of God dwelling in the heart or soul. This practice aims at finding God at the center of our being as our friend. In order to come to this realization, contemplative practices throughout Christian history have stressed silence and solitude. A life of constant prayer (as Paul recommended, "prayer without ceasing") is cultivated, in which God is praised often and God's presence held constantly in mind. The practice of a sacramental life, frequent reception of the Lord's Supper, humility, gentleness, and compassion for others, will lead one to an ever-lasting realization of the Divine Presence. Some spiritual writers hold that Christian perfection is the constant practice of God's presence.

A layman, Brother Lawrence, produced a spiritual classic entitled The Practice of the Presence of God. In it, Lawrence declared that he felt as closely in the Divine Presence while he was in the kitchen washing the monastery's pots as he did when he was on his knees at the Eucharist. It is just such a perpetual awareness of God as friend that the practice of the presence of God is designed to produce. J.C.

PRAETORIAN GUARD/PRAETORIUM. The elite household guard drawn from the Roman legions to protect the emperor, and also to protect the governors of Roman provinces. A praetor was an army officer ranking only behind a consul in the Roman army, and thus was equal to a four-star general in modern American terms. His headquarters was named a praetorium, and such a headquarters, including barracks for the troops, a parade ground, offices and a military prison, was located in the emperor's palace in Rome and, in the provinces, provided safe quarters for the governor (procurator) and other officials.

In the NT, the Praetorian Guard is mentioned in Philippians 4:22, as is Caesar's household. This is usually understood to refer to Rome, and specifically to Christians who were part of Caesar's personal staff. More recent research suggests that the Praetorian Guard was present in the Roman province of Asia, and so Ephesus might be the location referred to. In Jerusalem, during the time of Jesus, Pilate had his residence in the praetorium, which today is known as the Castle of Antonia. Jesus was taken to the praetorium for trial by Pilate and on its parade ground was mocked as a kingly pretender, draped in purple, crowned with thorns, and beaten, before being led away for crucifixion (Mark 15:16-20; Matt. 27:27-31). Paul was imprisoned in the praetorium in Caesarea (Acts 23:35). J.C.

PRAGMATISM. An early twentieth-century American contribution to philosophy, resting on the assertion of the priority of experience over principle, of action over doctrine. The test of the validity of an idea lies in its usefulness and practicality. Hence pragmatists are critical of theories such as IDEALISM that give priority to mind. By contrast they assert the relative and contingent character of reason. In the pragmatic approach, ideas take their meaning from the consequences, and truth from its verification. Ideas are instruments for obtaining results.

Pragmatism is a philosophy of relativity, not of absolutes. Taken into business ethics it seems to support the idea that the rightness of a policy is to be seen in successful results. It has been used in educational theory to base learning on reflection from experience. Pragmatism has been influential in the United States but has not been accepted to any extent as a philosophical system in Europe.

Pragmatism began with a gathering in Cambridge, Massachusetts, called the Metaphysical Club, during the 1880s. Key people were CHARLES SANDERS PIERCE and WILLIAM JAMES, philosophers on the Harvard faculty. Later JOHN DEWEY at Columbia became an exponent of the movement. Pragmatism was a revolt against idealism and took its first cues from British empiricists such as John Stuart Mill. William James was concerned about values and worth, but saw these within the framework of life rather than as abstract principles. John Dewey's thought has been called "instrumentalism." He wrote that the ends should lead to a constant reevaluation of the means in order to refine and reconstruct the goals to higher ends. Far from seeing pragmatism as without ethical norms, he believed that a pragmatic philosophy could lead to the achievement of higher ethical norms, goals, and achievements. Ethics would be relative, but in a positive way. Ideas are the instruments through which change is achieved, but are not ends in themselves.

Pragmatism in combination with logical positivism led into logical empiricism. While people may not be writing in the field of pragmatism today, its basic ideas permeate education, business, and government. I.C.

PRAJAPATI. In the VEDAS of HINDUISM, Prajapati, identified with Agni and PURUSA and later with BRAHMA, is the creator god. He made the universe after generating mystical heat (tapas) through a sacrifice with which he himself is one; creation is his dismembered being. In the BRAHMANAS, he is acknowledged as the chief deity and father of the gods. R.E.

PRAJNA. From the Sanskrit word meaning "intelligence, wisdom." In Hinduism and Buddhism, prajna is not mere factual knowledge, but that direct intuitive insight that sees things as they really are, distinguishing between reality and illusion. It accompanies enlightenment or God-realization, for only when one has overcome all ego can one perceive the true nature of the universe and divine Reality. R.E.

PRAYER. Kinds of Praying. Two types of prayer are known in the teaching and example of the NT church. There is private prayer, whether we think of the instructions of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:5-8), or Jesus' parables on prayer (Luke 11:5-13 and 18:1-14, which are perhaps the best-known examples), or the many requests that Paul makes that his friends should pray for him (for example, II Cor. 1:11).

There are also the "private" prayers of Jesus himself. He prayed at the critical moments of his life—at his baptism (Luke 3:21); at the choosing of the Twelve (5:12); at his transfiguration (9:28); and at his agony in the garden (22:39-45; Heb. 5:7 also describes this scene). Indeed, he died—as he lived—praying (Luke 23:46). From these episodes we gather that he sought the face of his Father at special times of crisis and need. But it is clear that communion with God was the daily inspiration of his life. And the Lord's prayers were far richer in content than a mere list of requests and preferences. Deep fellowship with God (9:29), the exultation of thanksgiving (10:21ff.), and an all-embracing intercession (Luke 23:34; 22:31ff.; John 17:9)—these are the features of his life of prayer, which set a standard for his disciples of all ages.

But, in addition to the account of private prayer, there is the record of the church's corporate prayer as the united assembly of believers expressed its praise and supplication. The Acts of the Apostles describes the prayer fellowship of the earliest believers. Acts 2:42 refers to the practice of their corporate assembly, whether at home (Acts 2:46; 4:23ff.; 5:42) or in the Temple (3:1, 11; 5:12, 42). It is interesting to observe the circumstances that drew Christians together. They needed and sought guidance (1:14, 24). They came together under the duress of persecution and hostility (4:23-31), and requested grace to continue their witness. They took the arrest and imprisonment of Peter (12:5) as a challenge to earnest intercession. They gathered at Antioch to worship the Lord, seeking the guidance that came in the Spirit's summons, "Set apart Barnabas and Saul." With further united prayer, these men who later hazarded their lives for the name of the Lord Jesus (15:26) were sent forth to the work of the gospel in Asia Minor, and the Christian mission was launched on its epoch-making way (13:1-3). Other allusions to the united praying of the people of God are in Acts 20:36 and 21:5—both touching scenes of tender pathos.

The Contents of Prayer. From the biblical records there is little to guide us when we try to discover the contents of the prayers in the early church. The prayers of the church in Acts are ad hoc utterances, called forth by the demands of the hour. Yet there are some principles to be noted, chiefly in the use of the Psalms, which is important, as Christians instinctively, like their Lord (Luke 23:46), turned to the Psalms of David for language in which to give vent to their deepest emotions (Acts 4:24-30). Acts 13:1 and following is important because we learn from it that the church at Antioch offered worship to the Lord. It is possible to relate this to the worship of Jesus, a calling upon him in devotion and supplication, as Stephen did (Acts 7:59), and Paul too (II Cor. 12:8). Many scholars find Christ-hymns (as in Phil. 2:6-11; I Tim. 3:16), in which Jesus is praised with a worship that belongs properly to God. The phrase, "calling upon the name of the Lord" (Acts 2:21; 9:14; 22:16; Rom. 10:13), points in the same direction, for it seems to show that Jesus was hailed in worship as one worthy of adoration. It is likely that the phrase is borrowed from the OT scripture, where it denoted that men, even then, would call upon the name of the Lord (Gen. 4:26; 21:33, etc.). If this is so, it is evidence that right at the beginning of the church age Jesus Christ was hailed with divine honors and placed at the center of a cultus that drew its inspiration from his living presence in the midst of his own.

There is one datum that is interesting: It is the strange-sounding Aramaic term MARANATHA (I Cor. 16:22), which our English translations render as either "our Lord is coming" or "our Lord, come!" It seems fairly certain that the second alternative is to be preferred, and that this phrase is a prayer of invocation addressed to Jesus. Similar language is found in Revelation 22:20; and the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (or the Didache) uses the exact formula for a service preparatory to the Lord's table (10:6). The use of an Aramaic phrase can only be satisfactorily explained on the assumption that Maranatha is an ancient watchword that takes us back to the earliest days of the church in Palestine, where Aramaic was the spoken language.

Now the evidence of this ancient Christian invocation to Christ throws a flood of light on the way in which the Jewish-Christians worshiped their Lord. For not only is Maranatha the oldest Christian prayer of which we have record; it can only mean that those who lately had invoked the name of their covenant God as "Lord" in the synagogue liturgy came to apply the same divine title to Jesus the Messiah.

Some Special Words for Prayer. We turn to consider some unusual expressions that found a place in the prayer-speech of the early believers.

(a) ABBA suggests our Lord's Gethsemane prayer, recorded in Mark 14:32-39: "Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee." As was the case with Maranatha in I Corinthians 16:22, this Aramaic word recurs in its original form in Paul's Greek letters (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6) and is translated for the benefit of the first readers. It seems certain therefore that Abba was current coinage as a title of special significance and depth of meaning for God in the early churches.

Abba is our Lord's favorite designation for God. Abba was avoided by Jews because it was thought to be too daring and familiar an expression to be used to the King of the Universe. Now, God's son uses exactly this expression, which perhaps is not surprising if from his early boyhood he was conscious of a unique filial relationship with God (Luke 2:49). The staggering thing is that he teaches his disciples to do the same. The leads us to the so-called LORD'S PRAYER, recorded in Matthew 6:9-13 and Luke 11:2-4. We should notice at once that it is more the disciples' prayer than the Lord's, but the title is now part of our speech and may be justified on the ground that it was the Lord who gave this prayer to his people in response to the request, "Lord, teach us to pray." There is evidence to show that very early in the church's history this prayer became accepted as a pattern prayer and was backed by dominical authority. As early as the time when the Didache was compiled as a manual of church order and practice (about A.D. 80–100), this prayer had become an integral part of Christian worship.

The range of the Lord's Prayer should be noticed, extending from the highest aspirations of which the human emotion and will are capable. The prayer reveals God as concerned with all things in life. It is the sum of Jesus' teaching on the fatherhood of God; and if we desire to learn what this means, it is the Lord's Prayer that will show us.

While the Lord's Prayer is not referred to as such in the NT Epistles, it cannot be accidental that Paul frequently begins his prayers for the churches by invoking the name of God as Father. He prays to the Father of Jesus Christ—and so by implication, the Father of all who are bound to Christ in the one family of his grace (see Rom. 8:15–17). And it is surely significant that in this paragraph Paul uses the Aramaic term Abba (as in Gal. 4:6) to highlight the spirit of filial adoption, which becomes ours as the Holy Spirit witnesses to our membership of the family of God. It may even be that Abba in these texts (as in I Pet. 1:17) is a veiled allusion to the Lord's Prayer. This would then explain the following reference to "newborn babes" (I Pet. 2:2).

(b) "Amen" is a familiar Christian term. In the synagogue worship, as in the OT, it was the people's full-hearted and full-throated response to and endorsement of the words of another (for example, Neh. 8:6). The word means literally "to be firm, true," and is connected with the verb "to believe." It occurs most obviously at the close of the NT doxologies, which ascribe praise to God and Christ. (See Rom. 1:25; 9:5; 11:36; 16:27; Gal. 1:5; Eph. 3:21; Phil. 4:20; I Tim. 1:17; 6:16; II Tim. 4:18; Heb. 13:21; I Pet. 4:11; 5:11; Jude 25.) Revelation 5 portrays a dramatic scene and probably reflects the worship of the church on earth as well as the church triumphant in heaven.

Two other passages are full of interest. Second Corinthians 1:20 and following pictures a scene that most likely takes us back to early worship. Christ confirms to us the promises of God, and our fitting response to God's faithfulness is the Amen, which accepts and endorses all that God has promised in the gospel. In I Corinthians 14:16 Paul rebukes the church for their unbridled indulgence in the more exotic gifts of the Spirit in public assembly. He is concerned lest an uninstructed person, an "outsider," should come into the church meeting and be embarrassed by a display of strange speech. "How can any one . . . say the 'Amen' to your thanksgiving when he does not know what you are saying?" asks the Apostle, thus making it clear that Amen was in common use as the worshiper's assent to what was heard from the lips of fellow-believers.

(c) The same verse quoted above (I Cor. 14:16) also contains a reference to the prayer of thanksgiving. The presence of the definite article "the thanksgiving" seems to suggest that a particular type of praying is envisaged, as distinct from the general use of the term

"to give thanks" (as in II Cor. 1:11; 9:12; I Thess. 5:18). Little is said about the content of such a thanksgiving prayer. It is possible that the prayer at the Lord's table is in mind; and it is this verb (Greek, eucharistein—"to give thanks") that has given the name Eucharist to the Lord's Supper. Nevertheless, in the Pastoral Epistles, we read of such thanksgiving prayers that are not connected with the Lord's table—in I Timothy 2:1 and 4:4–5. The last-mentioned is particularly significant for it hints at a thanksgiving over food.

Further prayers of gratitude to God and Christ are scattered throughout the book of Revelation. The seer, caught up in the Spirit on the Lord's day (Rev. 1:10), records the visions he saw of the heavenly hosts who worship God unceasingly (4:8). But the language he uses is that of the church upon earth, and in 11:16–18 we may overhear something of the hymns of worship and thanksgiving that are offered.

PRAYER BOOK. See BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

PRAYER OF AZARIAH AND THE SONG OF THE THREE YOUNG MEN. The Prayer and the Song, two literary pieces, form one book of the OT APOCRYPHA. Together with SUSANNA and BEL AND THE DRAGON it comprises the Additions to the book of DANIEL. The Song of the Three Young Men (or the Song of the Three Holy Children) occurs in Greek and Latin Bibles following Daniel 3:23. The book is composed of the Prayer of Azariah (vss. 1–22), the heating of the furnace (vss. 23–28), and the song of praise of the three young men (vss. 29–68). Verses 35–65 form the Benedicite of the Anglican Prayer Book.

PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD. In Roman Catholic theology, prayers for those who are presumed to be in PURGATORY. Because of the belief that extraordinary actions (such as a life of self-denial or especially martyrdom) earn even more merit than is needed for salvation, some of this surplus merit (the treasury of merits of the saints) is transferable within the communion of saints, the church, from the saintly to those less saintly. Prayers for the dead, then, underline pre-Vatican II Catholic theology, if understood in that way. Yet even some Protestants pray for the dead, in the sense of commemoration, as in the prayers included in the Lutheran Service Book and Hymnal. The Christian belief in eternal life and the communion of saints, both living and dead, makes prayers for the dead possible without reference to works of merit considered transferable to others.

The veneration of the dead forms a major part of the development of religion. The elaborate rituals of the ancient Egyptians, the ancestor cults of China and Japan, and even among the Hebrews in ancient Canaan, all point to the human continuing concern for respected ones who have departed from this life.

PRAYER WHEEL. In TIBETAN BUDDHISM, the mani chos akhor or "prayer wheel" is a hollow cylinder attached to a stick. The cylinder, inscribed with MANTRAS and containing a scroll printed with more mantras, can be spun by hand action; this is believed to release the efficacy of these mantras. Large permanently installed prayer wheels, as high as twenty feet, can be found at shrines and around the walls of temples. They are rotated by worshipers who ritualistically circumambulate the temple. R.E.

PREACHING. The OT picture of the prophets of Israel who were charged with "the word of the Lord" is the starting point for preaching in the Bible. In early Judaism, after the Exile, the synagogue was born; and with that mode of worship, readings from the Law and exposition of a sacred text became prominent. This kind of setting for worship provided both Jesus (Luke 4:16-31) and the first preachers (Acts 13:16-41) with a platform for their ministry.

The Acts of the Apostles has several examples of early Christian PROCLAMATION, called KERYGMA, that is, a declaration of God's offer to all who hear, calling for acceptance and obedience. Sometimes the audience is Jewish (Acts 2:14-40), sometimes pagan (Acts 14:14-18; 17:19-31), and sometimes mixed, representing the Jewish Dispersion in the Greco-Roman world (Acts 13:15-41). There is also one example of preaching to a Christian group: Paul's address to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts 20:17-35), and one additional allusion to Paul's preaching to a church audience (Acts 20:7-12).

Paul is the chief exponent of the NT kerygma, since he believed that God had called him to this service (Gal. 1:15-16; I Cor. 9:16). He maintained that in his message God was making an appeal (II Cor. 5:20). But Paul shared with the other NT writers a second type of preaching called teaching (Gal. 6:6; I Cor. 12:28; compare Eph. 4:11; I Tim. 4:6-16; II Tim. 2:2) or exhortation (I Cor. 14:3 KJV; see Acts 11:27-28; 21:10, for Agabus as a prophet; Rev. 1:1-13; 22:9 for John the prophet). Above all, NT preachers were witnesses to what they had seen (Acts 2:32), had received by tradition from others (I Cor. 15:1-11), and had experienced themselves (II Tim. 1:11-12; I Pet. 1:12). They invariably linked their preaching task to the gift of the Spirit (II Cor. 2:3-15; Heb. 2:4; I Pet. 1:12). This suggests that while there are formal patterns of similarity between the NT writers as they report their spoken utterances and contemporary teachers and philosophers (notably the Cynic-Stoic popular preachers), the NT preachers are claiming certain distinctives. They were messengers of the risen Lord whose Spirit has charged them to declare his "mind" (I Cor. 2:16). This distinguishes NT preachers from their current non-Christian rivals and from some persons in the apostolic churches whom Paul regarded as no better than purveyors of an alien gospel (Gal. 1:6-9; II Cor. 11:4).

Contemporary preaching is based on models wrought out in the course of church history. As early as Justin Martyr (A.D. 150) we have one type of preaching, the exposition of the Scriptures, for which there are many twentieth-century counterparts (for example, G. Campbell Morgan, James S. Stewart, John Stott). The explaining of Christian doctrine by the fathers of the fourth century has left its legacy for such preachers today whose theme is a rational defense of the faith (Paul Tillich, Helmut Thielicke, Reinhold Niebuhr, with varying emphasis). The evangelist or herald of the gospel, mentioned in II Timothy 4:5, is seen today in such people as Billy Graham. Those who stand in the tradition of the Hebrew prophets who called for social justice and economic reform on behalf of the poor and oppressed are seen in Savonarola in sixteenth-century Florence and today in Latin American preachers, both Catholic and Protestant, who expound and apply liberation theology. Finally, the pastor-preacher of the pre-Nicene church (mentioned by Polycarp) is represented in our day by such people as David Read, Peter Marshall, and TV personalities like Fulton Sheen and Robert Schuller. R.M.

PREDESTINATION. The doctrine that God, from the beginning, has determined the ultimate destiny of every human person: some are destined for salvation and eternal life, others are not. Those who are predestined to salvation are said to be "elected" by God, that is to say, "chosen." Most theologians have preferred to be reticent about those who are not predestined to salvation, the non-elect, and so the words "predestination" and "election" are often synonymous. But a few theologians have taught a doctrine of "double" predestination, holding that God not only predestines some (the elect) to salvation but actively predestines others to damnation or perdition (the reprobate). Here a third term has been introduced—"reprobation," the act of rejecting some persons from the possibility of salvation and of assigning them to eternal damnation. On this reading of the doctrine, "predestination" and "election" are not synonymous. "Predestination" is then understood as a generic term, the fixing of human destinies by God, and within this generic term are the two possibilities, the affirmative possibility of ELECTION and the negative one of reprobation.

The motivation behind the doctrine is a desire to uphold the glory and sovereignty of God. Sinful human beings are unable to achieve their own salvation. All depends on the initiative of God. God's grace alone can save human beings from their sins, and that GRACE is freely given. So salvation does not depend on human efforts or human merits, but entirely on whether God has elected a person to be the recipient of saving grace. This teaching can be seen as an extension of the doctrine of PROVIDENCE. God has set certain goals for the Creation and exercises over the course of events the controls that will bring these goals to fruition.

The doctrine of predestination emerges in the OT. Abraham is called or elected to a special destiny and to be the father of a people. In the subsequent generations, we see one person elected and another, if not positively rejected, at least set aside: Isaac is preferred before Ishmael, Jacob before Esau. The nation of Israel becomes God's elect or chosen people, over against the Gentile races. Within Israel, particular individuals are elected to special vocations—David is chosen and anointed to be king, Jeremiah is conscious of having been chosen by God before his birth for a prophetic career. Already in the OT the elect are represented as a minority, and this may be the origin of the belief among later theologians that the elect comprise only a tiny minority among the mass of humanity. The majority of human beings are not of the elect, so that the elect are, in the modern sense of the cognate French word, very much an elite.

When we turn to the NT, a doctrine of predestination is generally accepted. The Christian church is the new Israel or chosen people, and its members are the new elect. The author of Acts uses the language of predestination for the action of Jesus' contemporaries in rejecting him: "both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel" did "whatever thy hand and thy plan had predestined to take place" (4:27-28); it was all done "according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God" (2:23). But the language of predestination is specifically used not of events but of persons. It expresses the consciousness of these early Christians that they had not chosen Christ but he had chosen them, or God had chosen them in Christ. While this belief is common to the NT writers, it receives a definite formulation from Paul: "We know that in everything God works for good with those who love him, who are called according to his purpose. For those whom he foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son, in order that he might be the first-born among many brethren. And those whom he predestined he also called; and those whom he called he also justified; and those whom he justified, he also glorified" (Rom. 8:28-30). With this may be compared: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us in Christ with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places, even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and blameless before him. He destined us in love to be his sons through Jesus Christ, according to the purpose of his will, to the praise of his glorious grace which he freely bestowed on us in the Beloved" (Eph. 1:3-6). The gratuitousness of election and the idea of being elected "in Christ" are clearly expressed in these passages. But the main passage in which Paul discusses predestination is Romans 9-11. Paul, like other Christian preachers, had to ask himself: "Why do some respond to the preaching, while others reject it?" Especially difficult was the fact that Israel, the elect people, had rejected Christ. It is in considering the destiny of Israel that Paul touches on questions of predestination that were to provide fuel for later controversies.

The exegesis of these three chapters is difficult and disputed. When Paul talks of "vessels of wrath made for destruction" (Rom. 9:22), he seems close to a doctrine of double predestination and has sometimes been interpreted in that sense. But he also seems to be saying that God will not desert the elect people, Israel, but that although God has temporarily hardened their hearts, God will eventually bring salvation to them when the mission to the Gentiles has been completed. "The gifts and the call of God are irrevocable" (Rom. 11:29). What is not entirely clear is whether only a remnant of Israel is predestined to salvation or whether election still extends to the whole people. If the former of these alternatives is the case, then already predestination is being understood in a mainly individualistic way.

History of the Doctrine. The post-biblical development of the doctrine may be conveniently studied in four major theological figures, each of whom has made an important contribution. AUGUSTINE firmly believed (not least on the basis of his own experience) that salvation is the gift of God and that God's grace may be experienced as irresistible. The church itself is a mixed body that does indeed contain the elect but also a large number of people who, though baptized and members of the church, do not really belong to it. Only the elect, predestined by God from the beginning, truly belong to Christ, and their number is relatively small. Augustine believed that this number was also definite (certus numerus) and when that number had been made up, then God's purpose would be complete and his kingdom would have come. The certain number was supposed to correspond to the number of rebel angels who had fallen away from God in a premundane rebellion. Their defection had upset the harmony of the universe, and it was necessary to replace them by precisely the same number of souls—though these souls would be human rather than angelic. One may not question God's justice in what seems to be his arbitrary choice of men and women for salvation. Those who are rejected simply receive the due reward of their sin, while the elect owe their salvation solely to the divine mercy. But Augustine admits that we confront a mystery at this point. Furthermore, he stops short of a thoroughgoing double predestination, if that means an active reprobation of the non-elect. It is simply that they are left out and therefore left to suffer the just punishment for their sin. God cannot be accused of injustice. Rather, we have to acknowledge God's grace in being merciful to a few.

Augustine's views were sharpened in controversy with PELAGIUS, who held that a human being is free to choose between good and evil. The controversy between Augustinians and Pelagians continued after Augustine's death, and although Augustinianism triumphed, it was a chastened and modified Augustinianism that fell just short of double predestination. Nevertheless, one has to ask whether the doctrine does not constitute a fundamental incoherence in Augustine's theology as a whole. For what is the point of preaching, faith, the church, and the sacramental system if everything has been decided by God in advance? Again, in spite of what Augustine may say, does he allow any real freedom to human beings on these vital matters of faith and salvation, or are not people reduced to little more than puppets?

The main points of Augustine's teaching about predestination reappear in the philosophy of THOMAS AQUINAS. The question of predestination is treated immediately after his discussion of providence. The business of providence is to ensure that the ends of God are attained. Now, the end for humanity is eternal life, but this is not an end that can be reached by natural human power. People must be lifted up and sent there by another, and "the planned sending of a rational creature to the end, which is eternal life, is termed 'predestination,' for to predestine is to send." This predestining is entirely a work of God, in which the human person is passive. In reply to the question whether anyone is reprobated by God, Thomas gives a qualified assent. God does reject some people, in the sense that God permits them to fall into sin, but, strictly speaking, they destroy themselves. In their cases there is not that active planned sending to an end that is the essence of predestination to eternal life. "The causality of reprobation differs from that of predestination" for the reason that we have already noted. When Thomas uses the word "predestination," he uses it in the affirmative sense of election. There is no positive activity of reprobation parallel to the work of predestination. Thus Thomas also stops short of a strict doctrine of double predestination. Like Augustine, he teaches that human merit plays no part in these matters. We are saved not by good works but purely by God's mercy. Predestination is said by Thomas to be certain. He maintains too, with Augustine, that the number predestined to eternal life is fixed, but though he knows the view that the number of the elect is equal to the number of fallen angels, he says this matter is best left undecided, and that God alone knows the number of the elect.

We pass on to the Reformation, and especially to the teaching of CALVIN, in whose system the doctrine of predestination has an important place. In general, Calvin follows Augustine, but he introduces an extra rigor into the doctrine, and some of his followers become more rigorous still. The essence of Calvin's teaching on the subject is contained in four chapters of the Institutes (Book III, chaps. 21-23), and is prefaced by a warning that we must not be too curious in searching into the secrets of God. He chooses some and rejects others by his good pleasure, and we cannot inquire into the reasons for this. Calvin uses the word "pleasant" for the doctrine of predestination—and no doubt it is a pleasant doctrine for those who are assured that they belong to the elect. For God has done everything for their salvation, and his election is irreversible, no matter how sinful they are. As for the criticisms of "profane men," Calvin is unperturbed, for he says they will likewise criticize any Christian doctrine.

The tendency to individualize predestination, already evident in Augustine, is prominent in Calvin's teaching. The true church, according to Calvin, is the invisible church, and its membership is known to God alone. The visible church contains not only the elect but others whose membership is in outward things only and who do not belong to the elect. So not only the human race as a whole but even the church is divided into two exclusive classes of individuals, the elect and the reprobate. Obviously such a view would not make for a strong feeling of solidarity or community in the church, and indeed there is plenty of evidence that many people suffered lifelong anxieties, wondering whether or not they truly belonged to the elect. As in the case of Augustine, one has again to ask whether the doctrine of predestination, in this strong form, does not entirely undermine baptism, preaching, mission, and most of the other acts of the church.

Calvin is at great pains to insist that election has nothing to do with human merit or with God's foreknowledge of such merit. God does not elect those who will prove worthy of grace—the election is purely gratuitous and the only reason, if it be a reason, is to say that it depends on God's good pleasure. At this point he comes into conflict with Aquinas, whom he suspects of allowing some weight to the foreknowledge of merit. He differs also from Thomas in upholding a very strong interpretation of reprobation. Calvin teaches that reprobation is not just due to the permissive will of God but is something that God positively ordains. This in turn is linked with his doctrine of providence, which sees God as the ultimate author of every event that happens, even the sins of the wicked. Why God should ordain that people should sin we do not know. "It is certain, however, that it was just, because he saw that his own glory would thereby be displayed." Such teaching is bound to strike us as inhuman, and even Calvin's supporters find it hard to defend him. We seem to be dealing with a God of sheer power, not the God of Jesus Christ. The reprobate "were raised up by the just but inscrutable judgment of God, to show forth his glory by their condemnation."

In the high Calvinism that followed Calvin's own teaching, the doctrine of predestination was made, if possible, even more rigorous. The WESTMINSTER CONFSSION of faith, which became the doctrinal standard for English-speaking Reformed churches, made God's eternal decree foundational. Before there is any mention of the saving work of Christ, it is taught that "by the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated into everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death." In spite of Calvin's own warning against curious speculation, there was soon a controversy between those who held that the eternal decree was made without regard to the question whether people would fall into sin or not (supralapsarianism) and those who held that it was made only in the light of God's foreknowledge of the Fall (infralapsarianism). It is not surprising that just as there had been a reaction against strict Augustinianism, so there was one against high Calvinism. ARMINIANISM toned down the doctrine of predestination, and although it was condemned, it steadily gained ground. By the nineteenth century, the rigor of the traditional doctrine was being modified in the Calvinist churches. In Scotland, for instance, John McLeod Campbell taught that Christ's atoning death was for all humanity, not just for the elect, and though he was himself deposed from the ministry, his teaching has come to be generally accepted.

We move on to KARL BARTH, the greatest representative of the Reformed tradition in the twentieth century. He treats at length of predestination in Church Dogmatics. He tells us that in this matter he is not able to follow in the tradition of Calvin's teaching. Indeed, he is severe in his criticism. Calvin's electing God is a hidden God, and "all the dubious features of his doctrine result from the basic failing that in the last analysis he separates God and Jesus Christ." Barth, on the contrary, claims that "if we would know who God is and what is the meaning and purpose of his election, we must look only to the name of Jesus Christ and the existence and history of the people of God enclosed in him." So Barth intends to take seriously a point hitherto neglected, though it already appears in Paul—that the election of individual Christians is an election in Christ. Or, to put it in another way, Christ is himself the original elect one, and all further election is in and through him. In a recurring phrase, Barth speaks of Jesus Christ as "the beginning of all God's works and ways." Since Christ is the God-man, this also means that from the beginning there is a humanity in God, and God has elected people to be God's covenant partners. Further, since Jesus Christ is the God-man, we can think of him as both the electing God and the elected man. He has, so to speak, elected himself, and elected humankind in himself. Insofar as Barth still speaks of reprobation, he teaches that this is taken by Christ upon himself, and so he moves toward a universalism. "If the teachers of predestination were right when they spoke always of a duality of election and reprobation" (we should note the hypothetical character of Barth's language here) "then we may say already that in the election of Jesus Christ, God has ascribed to man election and to himself he has ascribed reprobation."

This teaching is not altogether clear. What is the relation of God the Father to Jesus Christ? Or of Jesus Christ as God to Jesus Christ as incarnate? Is there still lingering here some thought of the Father rejecting and punishing the Son? In spite of these obscurities, what clearly emerges is a doctrine of predestination in which we get away from individualism to the teaching that the whole human race is elected in Jesus Christ. It is interesting to note that even Judas, the "son of perdition," retains the indelible character of his election and vocation. "His election excels and outshines and controls his rejection." In spite of some doubtful points, Barth's reconstruction of the doctrine of predestination must be accounted one of the greatest achievements of his theology. He has insisted on Christianizing a doctrine which, in the past, was too often developed in relation to a hypothetical God, very different from the God of the Christian revelation.

The Contemporary Situation. At the present day, the doctrine of predestination does not excite the interest and passion that attached to it in the past. Since the Enlightenment, we have thought of the human being in terms of autonomy, freedom, and responsibility, and if some people today still think of themselves as pawns at the disposal of a destiny that they cannot control, they are more likely to think of this in terms of mechanical DETERMINISM than as due to the secret decrees of an all-disposing God. Nevertheless, those who believe in God have still the problem of reconciling human freedom with the divine government of the world. Furthermore, contemporary religious experience still reports the feeling of having been chosen or called by God, and confesses that the experience of grace is that of a divine initiative, which impinges on our lives before we have ourselves looked for God. Some doctrine of predestination is still needed to account for these matters, but it would be a doctrine that made room for the contribution of human FREEDOM, not one that turned human beings into puppets. It would also be a doctrine that interpreted predestination positively as election, with reprobation understood as the (unrealized) possibility that it might have been otherwise. J.M.

PREEXISTENCE OF SOULS. A religious doctrine, also known as REINCARNATION, transmigration of souls, or rebirth. It is often assumed that preexistence implies the IMMORTALITY of the soul, which undergoes a series of rebirths. However, preexistence does not mean the eternity of the soul. Buddhism, for example, teaches reincarnation but denies that the soul is immortal.

The origin of the belief in the soul's preexistence is obscure. It is not present in early Greek or Indian religion, but later the belief is widespread in these cultures. Preexistence teaches that the present self has lived before in another physical body and that it will live again in a future existence. It is not the empirical self or body, however, that preexists and is reborn but, rather, what the Hindus call the "subtle body." It is this "subtle body" that bears the individual karma or deeds of its previous existence, and it is this that determines the character of the next rebirth. Good karma will ensure rebirth in a higher state of existence, perhaps as a spiritual being or god. Evil karma will likely ensure rebirth in a lower order, as an animal or plant.

While the preexistence of souls was taught in ancient Greece (by Pythagoras, Orphism, Plato, and Plotinus), the doctrine has not prevailed in the Western religions. It remains a prevalent belief in those Eastern cultures deeply influenced by Hinduism and Buddhism. Associated as it is with the doctrine of KARMA, the preexistence and rebirth of souls has provided these religions with a highly rational theodicy or explanation of the existence and amelioration of EVIL. The question of whether preexistence of souls is at all compatible with the doctrine of the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD has been a topic of recent discussion. J.L.

PREFECT APOSTOLIC. The head of a prefecture apostolic, or the first ecclesiastical organization of a mission field, in the Roman Catholic church. This means the mission territory is directly supervised by the pope and the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. A prefect apostolic is not usually a bishop. J.C.

PRELATE. An official of the Roman Catholic church, from the Latin praelatus, meaning "one set before." Actual prelates include bishops, vicars and prefects apostolic, abbots, and curia members. Honorary prelates are those honored by the pope for their service in the church. All prelates are called monsignor and wear special dress. J.C.

PREMILLENNIALISM. See MILLENNIUM.

PRESBYTER/PRESBYTERY. The term "presbyter" is a transliteration of the Greek word for ELDER. The early Christian churches were administered by a body of elders, the collegiate system referred to in Acts 11:30 and Acts 15:22. This followed the practice of "the elders of Israel" who directed both civil and ecclesiastical rule. The presbyters functioned as BISHOPS (episkopoi) or overseers. Gradually one elder assumed the presidency of the governing group. Thus he became the bishop or chief presbyter, although the terms seem to have been interchangeable in the earliest days of the church.

During the Middle Ages the term "presbyter" was shortened to priest, but the identification of a priest as Christian minister did not occur until the second century. Calvin and his followers in the Reformed and Presbyterian tradition felt that biblical principles dictated the concept of church government by the elders or presbyters. Thus elders in a particular Presbyterian or Reformed church are responsible for the admission of new members and the supervision of the local church body. The minister is a teaching elder, whose office is on a parity with the ruling lay elders.

Presbyterian or Reformed polity consists of a series of courts, starting with the session or consistory that governs the particular congregation. The presbytery or classis is made up of ministers and elders who represent churches in a prescribed geographical area and has the oversight over the congregations and ministers of that region. The SYNOD consists of members of several presbyteries within a larger area. The GENERAL ASSEMBLY is the highest court, with final authority over the entire ecclesiastical organization. R.H.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES. A major Protestant communion, part of the Reformed wing of the sixteenth-century REFORMATION, owing its distinctive polity, doctrine, worship, piety, and discipline more to JOHN CALVIN than to ULRICH ZWINGLI. Presbyterianism, as a term, refers to a form of church government, that is, ruling by ELDERS or PRESBYTERS. According to Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, the form of government of the church is revealed in the NT, since the church possesses divine authority. In doctrine, Presbyterians are similar to the other Reformed churches of Switzerland, Germany, France, and Holland. The term "Presbyterian" then is generally used to refer to the Reformed churches as they developed in Britain (especially in Scotland) and North America.

John Calvin was a French lawyer who experienced a deep but quiet conversion to Luther's Reformation teaching of justification by faith. After a stormy life he eventually settled in Geneva and directed the continuation of the Reformation there after Zwingli's death in battle. Calvin's adherence to the basic doctrines of the Lutheran Reformation can be seen in his long friendship with Philip Melancthon and in his signing of the altered Augsburg Confession. Over many years, Calvin developed a systematic, tightly reasoned body of doctrine, The Institutes of the Christian Religion, which probably has exerted more influence on the development of Reformed Protestantism than any other work. Calvin, and thus the Presbyterianism derived from him, tended toward controversy and dogmatism, and, due to a necessary emphasis upon discipline, also to legalism. Nonetheless, Calvin and Presbyterianism reflect a deep loyalty to the SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD, making life and theology theocentric. Calvinism tends to be all-embracing, desiring to regulate all of life by the divine will, which it believes to be given in the Bible.

The doctrinal basis of the Presbyterian church is the conviction that the Bible is the Word of God, and is the only rule for faith and practice. Whatever the Bible affirms, Presbyterianism affirms. Whatever the Bible condemns, Presbyterianism condemns. While The Institutes of the Christian Religion form the historical and theological basis for Presbyterianism, the WESTMINSTER CONFSSION of Faith and the Westminster Shorter Catechism—along with the Heidelberg Confession and HEIDELBERG CATECHISM—form the traditional basis of the church.

Over the years Presbyterian doctrine, particularly in America, has undergone considerable change. The historic divisions between ARMINIANISM and high Calvinism over predestination have largely disappeared. Indeed, part of the reason for the long division between the northern and southern churches was the increasing liberalism of much of the northern church. The United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. confession of 1967, a result of modern biblical and theological studies, is accepted as the basic doctrinal position of the church. It is an impressive restatement of Reformed doctrine in contemporary terms.

The Reformation moved from the Continent to Britain by way of the low countries, where Lutheran and Reformed views were widespread. Lutheran doctrine was spread in Scotland before 1528 by traveling merchants, one of whom was martyred. JOHN KNOX, who had gone to Geneva, brought Reformed teachings to Scotland in 1559. By the end of 1560 the Scots church was in process of reform. By 1564, the General Assembly affirmed the Book of Common Order. Presbyterianism became the church of the great mass of Scots people, although the Church of Scotland underwent controversy and divisions between 1680 and 1843. Most of these divisions were resolved in church union by 1929. Presbyterian churches were also formed in England, and, after 1610, in northern Ireland. Presbyterians early came to America, although Presbyterianism in the U.S.A. has many origins. Until recently, there were at least ten important denominations called either Presbyterian or Reformed in America. All these churches are similar in polity or government—the distinguishing feature of Presbyterianism. The principles of the system of polity are derived either from the canons of the SYNOD OF DORT, the Westminster Confession, or the Heidelberg Catechism.

Presbyterians were generally united across the United States before the Civil War. However, with the coming of secession, Presbyterians in Virginia, North Carolina, upper South Carolina, and elsewhere in the South, met in Augusta, Georgia, and organized the Southern Presbyterian church. The churches in states holding to the union continued as the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. After several years of merger negotiations and votes by presbyteries north and south, the northern and southern branches merged into the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. in 1983.

Other Presbyterian bodies in America include the Presbyterian Church in America, more conservative than either the northern or southern churches, and the Bible Presbyterian church, an ultra-Fundamentalist body founded by the Reverend Carl McIntyre.

The Church of Scotland moved toward reunion of the divisions occasioned between 1680 and 1843 in the last part of the nineteenth century. This unity was accomplished in spite of the intellectual controversies of the era and the heresy trial of William R. Smith. In 1929, the United Free church and the established church reunited. The Scottish National church is free of state control and self-governing.

Before the mergers, there were several other bodies besides the United Free church, such as the Free Church of Scotland, the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland, the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and the Original Secession Church. The Free Presbyterian church dates to 1893 and essentially represented Fundamentalist beliefs in the Scriptures and a stand against the use of instrumental music in church. The Original Secession church dates to 1733, when Ebenezer Erskine and three other ministers withdrew from the established church as they felt it had departed from evangelical teaching. Erskine also felt the state should stay out of church affairs.

Interestingly, the Reformed Presbyterian church took root in America, resulting in the Associate Reformed Presbyterian church, chiefly found in the South. This small body maintains a college and seminary (Erskine) at Due West, South Carolina. The ARP group does not use hymns in its church services, but only the Psalms, as did the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Scotland. The ARP holds to the Westminster Confession of Faith and objects to secret oaths and secret societies.

In England, the Presbyterian Church of England was formed in 1876 from the English Synod of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. In Ireland, Presbyterian settlers began to arrive after 1610 and the beginning of the Ulster Plantation under James I. The established Anglican church persecuted Presbyterian ministers, and in 1661 ejected sixty-four pastors from their congregations. Many Presbyterians then migrated to America. Nonetheless, the church grew in Ireland and in 1741 a split occurred between the Secession Synod and the Synod of Ulster. Arian (Unitarian) beliefs developed in the Ulster Synod, and the cause of Trinitarianism was championed by the Reverend Henry Cooke, who prevailed in 1825. A Remonstrant Synod (of liberals) was formed in 1829 (only seventeen ministers), and the two orthodox synods united in 1840 to form the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

There are several smaller Irish bodies—the Reformed Presbyterians or the Covenanting Church of Ireland and the Secession Church in Ireland. Some congregations did not enter the union of 1840 and formed the Associate Synod of Ireland, also known as “the Presbyterian Synod of Ireland Distinguished by the Name Seceder.”

In the United States, until recently, there were major Presbyterian churches in the North and the South. The merger of 1983 formed the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. from the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (North) and the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (South). The northern church has diverse origins, embracing Scottish, English, German, and other national backgrounds; people who came from the Reformed churches in Europe.

Francis Makemie originally worked with Presbyterians coming from northern Ireland through the port of Philadelphia. Many of these "Scots-Irish" moved southward to Virginia, North Carolina, and the piedmont of upper South Carolina. A flourishing growth took place until the coming of secession in 1861. At that time, the presbyteries in the South renounced their connection with the general assembly (called the Old School Presbyterians). Forty-seven presbyteries met in Augusta, Georgia, December 4, 1861, and organized a new general assembly.

The Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America, the "Covenanter Church," is descended from the Church of Scotland. It was constituted in 1774 in Pennsylvania and reorganized in 1809.

The Associate Reformed Synod of the South was formed in 1782. There were four synods in the Associate Reformed church, but the Associate Reformed Synod withdrew from the church in 1822. The differences were due to the distance from other synods in New York and Pennsylvania, and questions about psalm use and closed Communion.

The Reformed Presbyterian Church in North America began in 1774. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church was formed on February 10, 1810, and merged with the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. in 1906. The Cumberland church was the result of the revivals in southwest Kentucky and Tennessee in 1797 and following under the leadership of the Reverend James McGready. The Cumberland church grew to constitute three presbyteries. It differed from the Westminster Confession, in holding that Christ died for all and in saying "There are no eternal reprobates." There was also a Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Colored.

In 1982, two conservative Presbyterian churches merged in Grand Rapids, Michigan. The Presbyterian Church in America and the Reformed Presbyterian Church in America, Evangelical Synod, joined to form the Reformed Presbyterian Church in America.

PREVENIENT GRACE. Not some special kind of GRACE, but a general description of all grace, as this is understood in Christian theology. The word "prevenient" means "coming before," and all grace is prevenient in the sense that God's gracious action precedes any turning toward God on the part of the recipient of grace. To speak of "prevenient" grace is simply to acknowledge the Christian testimony that God has loved us before we loved God. Such grace may be at work without the recipient's being explicitly aware of it. It may, for instance, be mediated through the Christian community. Paul's sudden conversion may well have been unconsciously prepared by experiences of grace through his contacts with Stephen and other Christians. In INFANT BAPTISM the child receives grace through the incorporation into the Christian community, though only later does the child recognize what has taken place. There are many other ways in which grace is at work before there is any turning to God.

PRIDE. Considered by moral theologians to be one of the SEVEN DEADLY SINS, and is said by some to be the worst of all and the root of all the rest. The first sin of Adam and Eve is in response to the temptation, "You will be like God" (Gen. 2:5). This is the temptation to go beyond their creaturely status and usurp the place of God. The theme of human pride is continued in the story of the Tower of Babel, which the people built in order to reach to heaven and make a name for themselves (Gen. 11:1-9). Augustine declared that "pride is the origin and head of all evils," and he points out that it was pride that led the devil to rebel against God. The devil has no body, and this was interpreted to mean that sins of the spirit (including pride) are worse than sins of the flesh. These views have been restated in modern times by Reinhold Niebuhr, who held that the sins of the flesh flow from the evil will of the spirit that has ceased to trust in God and has set itself up as its own ultimate. Pride takes many forms. Pride of power is perhaps the most dangerous and produces patterns of domination and even dictatorship. But pride of knowledge and pride of righteousness are particularly repulsive. Not all pride is sinful, for there is the proper pride of self-respect and the satisfaction of doing something well. Aristotle saw this proper pride as a virtuous mean between the vices of arrogance and self-depreciation.

PRIESTHOOD OF BELIEVERS. The concept that all Christians participate in the priesthood of Christ as mediator by virtue of their baptism. The vocation of the ordained, as well as the lay priesthood, is derived from the priesthood of Christ as described in the Epistle to the Hebrews. They are intended to be a mutually supportive priesthood.

Luther made a distinction between the priesthood of word and sacrament (ordained) and the priesthood of the laity. Some groups recognize no distinction between the people of God (the laos, or laity) and the clergy. The Society of Friends, for example, has no ordained ministers.

The Reformation emphasis on the priesthood of believers countered the strong role that the priest earlier had as mediator through receiving confessions and assuring absolution of sins. It removed the priest as mediator between God and the believer. The Catholic Reformation, in reaction, made the laity distinctly subordinate to the ordained ministry so that the idea of the priesthood of believers almost disappeared. The Constitutions on the Church from Vatican II tried to rectify this by recognizing the mediatorial role of the laity. The laity mediate God's redemptive purpose, specifically in the prayers of the people in the liturgy as well as in their daily work. The priesthood of believers is also connected with vocation because they are called out by their baptism. The key verse is I Peter 2:9, "But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood." I.C.

PRIESTLY, JOSEPH (1733–1804). English clergyman and scientist, prominently associated with instituting English and American Unitarianism, who helped found modern chemistry, advanced the knowledge of electricity, discovered oxygen, and isolated several gases. Born in Fieldhead, Yorkshire, he studied for the ministry at Daventry Academy. Ordained a Presbyterian minister in 1755, Priestly served three-year pastorates at Needham and Nantwich and in 1761 began teaching science at Warrington Academy. He shared the eighteenth century's confidence in rationalism and soon questioned "orthodox" beliefs. Appointed minister in Leeds (1767), he continued experiments with electricity and helped Theophilus Lindsey establish Unitarianism despite laws against rejecting the Trinity. Priestly advocated congregational polity and authority and reliance on Scripture rather than human creeds. While a librarian to Lord Shelburne (1772–80), Priestly had more time to write and experiment. His controversial books included Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion (1772–74) and Disquisitions relating to Matter and Spirit (1777). On leaving Lord Shelburne, he actively promoted Unitarianism in Birmingham, writing History of the Corruptions of Christianity (1782) and History of Early Opinions concerning Jesus Christ (1786). He supported the French and American revolutions and in 1794 moved to Northumberland, Pennsylvania, where until his death he helped emerging Unitarianism in New England. Theological and Miscellaneous Works appeared posthumously (26 vols., 1817–32). PRIESTS AND LEVITES. In ancient Mesopotamian and Egyptian civilizations the role of the priest grew up under the shadow of the king. The priests evolved as a hierarchical caste who were thought to support the monarchy. By contrast the biblical pattern is different, as we shall see.

Old Testament. The traditions of Abraham and the later patriarchs in Genesis show these figures as priests in their family groups. They build altars and offer sacrifices (Gen. 12:7ff.; 13:18; 22:13; 26:25; 46:1). The only royal priestly persons who enter the scene in the patriarchal narratives are figures outside Israel (Melchizedek in Gen. 14:18ff.) and the priests of Pharaoh in Genesis 41:45; 47:22. The tribe of LEVI (in Gen. 34 and 49:5ff.) has still to be given priestly functions.

Moses is called a Levite, and with him the Levitical office begins. Exodus 22:25-29 describes the real character of Israelite priesthood: the tribe of Levi is chosen to serve God and to act in the name of the entire people. The early days of the nation's self-consciousness witnessed the rise of priests as guardians of the ark (I Sam. 1–4) and as functionaries at the sacred shrines. The essential role of the priest was the offering of sacrifice, as Moses is said to have done (Exod. 24:4-8) as well as Levi (Deut. 33:10). AARON's family retained a distinctive role, but Levites were priests in a wider context, connected with various sanctuaries (Judg. 17:7-13; 18, 19). Families too had their local priests (Judg. 6:18-29; 13:19; 17:5; I Sam. 7:1).

With the advent of David as undisputed king over Israel, priesthood received a royal patronage, and two families were set apart for this purpose: ABIATHAR and ZADOK. Later genealogies in I Chronicles 6:49-53 connect both names with the family of Aaron. The rise of the office of HIGH PRIEST in Jerusalem gave impetus to the entire priestly role, and in 621 B.C. importance in a central and exclusive sanctuary in Jerusalem was emphasized (Deut. 18:16ff.). The effect of this revolution was to curtail the activities of local sanctuaries and their personnel and centralize worship at the Jerusalem Temple. Another vital result was to restrict priestly activity to Zadok alone (II Kings 23:5, 9) and so pave the way for the postexilic distinction between priests and Levites (Ezek. 44:1-31).

The fall of Jerusalem and the fate of the Temple in 597 and 586 B.C. also led to the collapse of the monarchy in Israel with the consequence that priesthood was set free from its sacrificial and royal connections and able to lead the nation as its "conscience" and mentor. The eclipse of the prophetic movement after the Exile also contributed to the importance given to Israel's priests. Both Ezekiel and Third Isaiah (Isa. 56–66) give prominence to the Levites as the only true priests, and the assembling of a final version of the Pentateuch and the work of the Chronicler (third century B.C.) also gave opportunity for the sacerdotal rites of the priesthood to be highlighted. It is from this redactional work that we derive the traditional picture of the Aaronic priesthood according to a pyramid configuration with Aaron on top, his sons next in succession, and then the Levites as tribal clergy below. The Zadokite line simply perpetuated this arrangement.

In Maccabean times the role of high priest came into prominence, and the Hasmonean family combined the office of priest and king—but not without protest, whether from the "pious ones," who later became the Pharisees, or the sectarians of the Dead Sea Scrolls who regarded their enclave at Qumran as the priestly offshoot.

New Testament. Jesus never claimed a priestly function, a fact exploited by Hebrews 7 in two ways: it asserts that Jesus was descended from Judah, not Levi, and yet it claims that Jesus does fulfill the role of Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18ff.), who was both king and priest. The oath of Psalm 110:4 is cited as supporting Jesus' office as messianic high priest, but in a superior way to the Aaronic-Levitical priesthood. The argument is then made that Jesus' ministry led to the offering of a perfect sacrifice on the cross and the opening of a new age of restored relationship between humanity and God that has the note of finality and completeness about it. Jesus is still, however, a priest (Heb. 7:26ff.) with a service of intercession as mediator of the Second Covenant (Heb. 8:6-13; 10:12-18).

If the task of priesthood is essentially one of sacrificial representation, then it may be said that other parts of the NT endorse the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews, even if they do not use the priestly language that it employs. The presentation of Jesus as suffering servant of God (Mark 10:45; 14:24) has links with Isaiah 53, and the setting of both the Last Supper meal and his death on the cross at Passover time recall the sacrificial rites of the OT (I Cor. 5:7-8). Mention of Christ's blood in several NT locations (for example, I Cor. 10:16-22; Rom. 3:24-25; 5:9; Col. 1:20; Eph. 1:7; 2:13; I Pet. 1:18-19) echoes an indebtedness to the idea that he died as both a priest and a victim, with the emphasis more on the latter term than the former.

An interesting development is to see the way the priestly language of the NT indicates a spiritualizing of the OT cult. Paul can utilize the terms of the Levitical ministry but in a new way and in reference to the church itself (Phil. 2:17; 4:18). Paul's notion of worship is one of a "spiritual worship" (Rom. 12:1; see Phil. 3:3; compare Heb. 9:14; 12:28) in contrast to what he regards as external and ceremonial (Rom. 2:27-29) under the OT rubric. The same application is seen in I Peter 2:5, 9 and in the Apocalypse (Rev. 1:6; 5:10; 2:6; compare Exod. 19:6).

The final element of the way "priests and Levites" are taken over by the NT writers is seen in their teaching on the ministry of the church. Again, the teaching is more by contrast than by direct correspondence. The apostles of Jesus were laypersons, not priests. Their colleagues are known as elders or presbyters (Acts 14:23; 20:17; Tit. 1:5), not successors in a priestly line. Yet priestly language can be used as in I Corinthians 4:1; II Corinthians 3:4-6; Romans 1:9; 15:15ff., however much it is qualified by the overriding considerations that apostolic ministry is not hierarchical or sacral but is dependent on the will of God in Christ (Rom. 1:1), and also that such apostolate is shared by the entire people of God.

PRIMACY OF THE POPE. The recognition of the authority of the pope (or bishop of Rome; the patriarch of the West) over the universal church. This primacy is jurisdictional and legal in the Catholic church, that is, the pope is the administrative head of the church, but a primacy of honor to the pope is also recognized by some Orthodox churches and High Church Anglicans.

The primacy of the pope in Catholic thought is based on the belief that Peter founded the Church of Rome, and further, that he was chief of the apostles. This is based on Matthew 16:15-19; Mark 3:16; 17:7; Luke 22:31-32; John 1:42; 21:15-17; Acts 2:14; 3:12; 4:8; 15:7-11; and I Corinthians 15:15; Galatians 1:18-19; 2:7. Christ said, "You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:18). Catholics see this promise as based on Peter, the man; Protestants believe the promise is based on the faith that Peter confessed.

J.C.

PRIMATE. A bishop of the Roman Catholic church, not a patriarch, who has jurisdiction over all metropolitans and bishops in a country or specific territory. The primate is himself supervised only by the pope. This title is no longer recognized in canon law, although it is used by some archbishops.

PRIME MOVER. A philosophical expression applied to God. Everywhere in the world one can observe motion—and the word "motion" here is being used in a very broad sense; in modern language, we might rather say "evolution" or "ordered development." It is argued that if one begins from inert formless matter, then it is impossible to account for the evolution or ordered movement of the universe. There must be an active source for this, a prime mover that is itself unmoved. These views were put forward by ARISTOTLE, who claimed further that this prime mover works through being an object of desire, that is to say, it is a final rather than an efficient cause. The argument reappears in THOMAS AQUINAS, as the first of his five ways of proving GOD'S EXISTENCE. We plainly see processes of change going on in the world. But anything that is changing must be changed by something else. As we trace this process back, we arrive eventually at "a first cause of change, not itself being changed by anything" (aliquid primum movens quod a nullo movetur). This, says Thomas, is what everyone understands by God. A similar idea appears in ALFRED WHITEHEAD, who argues that an organic universe could not arise from formless matter and who thinks of God as drawing the world in a certain direction through a "lure," which is like a final cause.

PRINCIPALITY. The KJV uses this term to translate a Greek word for "rule" or "dominion" (arché). It is one of the names given to angelic or demonic forces in Hellenistic cosmology, thought to control human destiny. In Paul's letters, confidence is expressed that these powers cannot separate believers from God (Rom. 8:38) since Christ is both their creator (Col. 1:16) and ruler (Eph. 1:21, 22). In Titus 3:1 the term is used of earthly authorities in the Roman Empire.

PRIOR/PRIORESS/PRIORY. Prior: A superior of a monastic order. Generally priors hold office for a set term of years rather than for life. The word is from the Latin meaning "superior" or "elder." Prioress: A superior of a convent of nuns, or an assistant to an abbess, in ruling such a convent. Nor all convents are ruled by prioresses; in some, the superior is called mother superior. Priory: A monastery or convent ruled by a prior or prioress. A priory may be self-governing (conventual) or dependent upon an abbey or mother house. J.C.

PRISCILLA. See AQUILA AND PRISCILLA.

PROBABILISM. In Roman Catholicism a theory that people involved in cases of moral doubt may follow a sound, probable opinion about acting morally. In the seventeenth-century controversies over JANSENISM, Blaise Pascal ridiculed and scorned the Jesuits for twisting the theory into a justification for practically anything, by using probabilism to vindicate probable opinions in favor of liberty even though opinions favoring law were more probably moral. In his Provincial Letters (1656) PASCAL depicted the Jesuits using probabilism in their confessionals to declare any act to be perfectly acceptable to Christ if there was any probability that it might be all right, thus approving murder, adultery, and so forth. The Jesuits were defending their use of free will against extreme Augustinianism at Port Royal, France, voiced by Cornelius Jansen, Antoine Arnauld, and Pasquier Quesnel. Pope Clement XI's bull Unigenitus (1713) formally condemned Jansenism. C.M.

PROCESSIONAL. The hymn or musical composition, vocal or instrumental only, which is played near the beginning of a worship service. In liturgical churches, the processional will cover the entrance of the choir, the crucifer, the presiding minister, and assisting ministers. It occurs immediately after the public confession in Lutheran churches and as the first element of the service in Reformed churches. J.C.

PROCESSION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT. A doctrine characterizing the relationship of the Holy Spirit to the Father and Son in the TRINITY, the manner of procession creating sharp controversy in early Roman and Greek Christianity. After prolonged acrimonious debate, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit received orthodox definition at Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381), and Chalcedon (451)—one Godhead in three persons, equal in glory and majesty, the Holy Spirit being different from the Father as the Son is different from the Father. The Father expresses paternity; the Son, filiation; the Holy Spirit, spiration. Controversy arose over whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son or from the Father through the Son. Cyril of Alexandria used both phrases. However, Eastern theologians tended to support the latter. Western theologians Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine supported the former (double procession, also called FILIOQUE—meaning "and the Son"). Opponents gave different interpretations of John 14:15-17; 14:15-17, 26; 16:5-15; Acts 5:32; 16:6-7; Romans 8:9-11, 16; Galatians 4:6; Philippians 1:19; and related passages. In 864 Eastern Patriarch Photius assailed Rome's double procession as invalid. The doctrine continues to mark a theological difference between Roman and Eastern Orthodox Christianity. C.M.

PROCESS PHILOSOPHY/PROCESS THEOLOGY. The name given to the METAPHYSICS of modern philosophers such as HENRI BERGSON and ALFRED NORTH WHITEHEAD and to the thought of those contemporary philosophers of religion and theologians influenced by them. As the name implies, process philosophy begins with the conviction that time, process, and becoming are constitutive of all reality, rather than being or unchanging substance. The beginnings of process philosophy and theology can be traced to two important movements of the nineteenth century: German romantic idealism, especially GEORGE W. F. HEGEL, and Darwinian evolution. These movements perceived evolutionary development as the key to both nature and history. The writings of Bergson and Whitehead had, in turn, a profound influence on two important, but very different, mid-twentieth-century process theologians: PIERRE TEILHARD DE CHARDIN and CHARLES HARTSHORNE.

According to these process thinkers, the world is not made up of static, discrete entities—what Whitehead called the "fallacy of simple location"—but is, rather, dynamic, organic, and social. The world is a creative, interdependent process of entities that give and receive from one another. It is a society of societies, growing together into an ever more complex unity.

According to Whitehead, whose metaphysical scheme has been most influential, the actual temporal world reveals the presence of four factors. The first is creativity, whereby the world advances toward novel modes of being. Creativity is not an entity but is real only through the actual entities that exemplify it. Actual entities are the final real things of which the world is made. Actual entities are, however, interdependent. They appropriate the past, realize their own subjective form, and eventually perish and become a datum for another entity or entities. To account for the orderly process of the world, Whitehead posits a third factor: eternal objects or pure potentials. An example is a color that comes and goes but does not perish. Eternal objects are the patterns, structures, qualities, and grades of relevance and value that are revealed in the world. Actual entities incorporate creativity and these eternal potentials in complex ways in realizing their own subjective form or aim. The fourth component of all process is God, an everlasting actual entity. God does not perish. It is God who accounts for the actual course of becoming, since neither creativity alone nor eternal objects (being potentialities) possess the necessary causal efficacy. God makes possible the entrance of the potential patterns and qualities into the process of becoming and supplies each entity with its initial aim and relevance. While God is unique in this respect, God is the chief exemplification of the metaphysical scheme—not its foremost exception. God is not independent, immutable, impassible, but, like other entities, is in some respects dependent, changing, and in process. Whitehead holds that God is di-polar. God's primordial nature—like the mind of finite entities—orders, grades, and adjusts the eternal objects as they enter the temporal process. However, God's primordial nature is lacking or deficient in actuality. The other pole of God's being, God's consequent nature, corresponds to the body of other entities and takes in and is affected by the other entities of the world. God is enriched by the world—God and the world being interdependent—a position known as panentheism.

Classical theism differs most profoundly with process theology at this point, since the former conceives of God as independent of the world, unchanging, and impassible. The God of process theology is best conceived as Savior of the world rather than its Creator. God's relation to the world is one of persuasive love, not coercive power. While finite creatures perish, they furnish God with new experience to incorporate into God's consequent nature. What God receives never fades away—hence all perishing entities achieve a kind of objective immortality in God. God in turn pours back into the world new ideal visions of the possibilities of creative advance. However, finite creatures are free to reject God's will and persuasion. There is, then, real loss and tragedy in the world and in God. Thinkers such as Hartshorne have made much of God's persuasive agency and human response as alone making sense both of God's love and human freedom. Among contemporary theologians most influenced by process thought are Norman Pittenger, John B. Cobb, Jr., and Schubert M. Ogden. J.L.

PROCLAMATION. The word group in Greek of terms for "proclaim," "tell," "announce" is made up of variants of the Greek root angell-. Angelos is a messenger, giving us the English "angel." The basic meaning is the carrying of a message, usually with good news and involving a quasi-religious setting, to do with the offering of sacrifice to the gods for the news received.

In the NT the eighty-eight or so allusions to "proclaim" and "proclamation" are divided into two categories: in the Lukan writings there are forty-eight references, and the remaining forty are split between John and Paul. It can be seen that this Greek root angell- is thus a favorite expression for LUKE, who loves to tell the GOOD NEWS as a message from God through "angels," human (Acts 10, 11) as well as otherworldly (Luke 1, 2), conveyed to men and women in this world and centering in Jesus as God's gift to humankind, especially the disadvantaged and the weak.

For Paul the proclamation centers on the KERYGMA of Jesus' death for sinners and resurrection. He regards this task of proclaiming the gospel as his life's work (I Cor. 1:23; 9:15-18; Gal. 1:16). But while this proclamation is verbal, it also has a sacramental nuance (I Cor. 11:26), the latter text using the same verb as in I Corinthians 2:1. The upshot of both types of proclamation is to awaken in those who hear or share in the Eucharist a lively sense of the divine presence, leading to an acknowledgment that God is present in human experience (I Cor. 14:25).

For the writer of the Fourth Gospel the proclamation is also to be lived out in human lives (I John 1:2-5), with a concern for the needy and the despised (see I John 3:15-17). The life of Christ is thus proclaimed not in word only but also in deed and truth (I John 3:18) and expressed to the church as brotherly love (I John 2:10). R.M.

PROCONSUL. As the name implies, it refers to a Roman official who acted for a consul. In specific terms the proconsul was the highest Roman authority in a province of the empire and was appointed to maintain law and order, to collect revenues and taxes, and to supervise the lower officials called quaestors. Various proconsuls are referred to in the Acts of the Apostles (13:7; 18:12; 19:38), such as Sergius Paulus in Cyprus, and Gallio, proconsul of Achaia. R.M.

PROCURATOR. The Latin term translates as "administrator." He, unlike the proconsul, was a direct appointee of the emperor, and the revenues and monies he received in the imperial provinces were paid directly into the emperor's personal fund. Though the procurator was strictly under the authority of the governor, he represented the emperor as the province's military and legal governor, a role played by various procurators in NT times, especially in Judea.

Judea, along with Samaria and Idumea, passed into Roman control in A.D. 6, when Archelaus was deposed by Augustus. PONTIUS PILATE was sent to be procurator (or better, prefect, a term that procurator later replaced) in Caesarea in A.D. 26, at the appointment of Emperor Tiberius. FELIX was appointed by the emperor Claudius in A.D. 52, to be followed by FESTUS in A.D. 60 on the nomination of Nero (Acts 24-27). R.M.

PROFANE. A verb or adjective, meaning literally "before the temple" and connoting that which is outside the holy place. By extension, to profane is to violate, debase, or defile the sacred; to have contempt for something holy or to be irreverent. Profane can also mean not devoted to the sacred or unconcerned about religion. Secular, meaning "worldly" or "nonreligious," is a possible synonym. The profane is also something that is unconsecrated and therefore not fit for religious purposes.

Although the technical meaning of the word relates to the sense of taboo in a consecrated environment, it is used more broadly today to refer to that which is not religious, by contrast, and without negative meaning. Hence, reference to the sacred and profane might mean no more than a description of religious art and general art, or between religious drama and plays for the theater. I.C.

PROMISE. The obvious division into which promises in the Bible fall is (1) human pledges of agreement, as when Jacob extracted a promise from Joseph that he would not inter his remains in Egypt (Gen. 47:29-31), or when Moses warned the tribes that wished to settle on the east bank of the Jordan that such an act would break a promise (Num. 32:24); and (2) divine assurances of favor to an obedient people or trusting individuals. The second category is more significant.

Promises, then, are words spoken with a future reference. A person agrees to keep a contract or to perform a deed, sometimes in exchange for a reward (for example, Esth. 4:7; Mark 14:11). Biblical writers attach importance to such vows as binding pledges, and those who treat "promises" lightly are held up to blame and guilt (for example, Acts 5:1-11).

When the author of the promise is God, certain new factors enter in. The relationship between God and Israel is unequal since God is their Lord. Hence, God's promises have a covenantal character, and are based on the divine nature as trustworthy (Ps. 12:6); they are not empty words (Isa. 55:11). That God fulfills promises is a basic element in Hebrew religion (I Kings 8:15), seen in God's redemption of Israel from slavery and all later enemies (see Luke 1:46-55). The building of Solomon's Temple is often referred to as a sign of God's faithfulness in making good God's promises (II Sam. 3:18; 7:13; I Kings 8:20, 56), chiefly because it confirmed the initial promise of God to create a people who would be installed in a land, "the land of promise" (Gen. 17:8). God is thus praised for bringing Israel to its destiny in Canaan, with Jerusalem and its Temple as the focal point.

The NT takes over this characterization of God, but shifts the emphasis from a temporal sphere to blessings in the coming of Jesus as Israel's Messiah and the church's Lord. All God's promises are realized "in Christ" (II Cor. 1:20), and the pledges to Abraham of a people and a land are transformed to apply to a multinational community of faith (Gal. 3:16-29) and to a spiritual possession that is the gift of the Holy Spirit, "the promise of the Father" (Luke 24:49; Acts 1:4) to all believers of all races. The promise that God will dwell with people is seen to be fulfilled in the presence of the Spirit with the church (Gal. 3:22; 4:4-7; Eph. 1:13). R.M.

PROOF TEXT. The term, in modern biblical studies, usually carries a pejorative sense. It stands for an illegitimate use of scripture when texts are isolated from their context and arranged to form a network of probative evidence without regard to the historical or situational meaning of the original authors.

A secondary application of the term is to the use of the OT in the writings of the NT. In this sense NT authors appeal, in different ways, to OT prophecies as the ground of their claim that the coming of Jesus as Messiah was an event foretold long ago. Matthew's Gospel is particularly rich in this use of the OT, while Paul and the writer to the Hebrews quote the OT to buttress their conviction that the messianic ministry and work of Jesus as the Christ were "prefigured" in the Law and the Prophets (Rom. 1:2; 15:4; I Cor. 10:1-11; Heb. 1:1-2; see Acts 26:22, 27). PROPAGANDA, THE. From the Latin de Propaganda Fide, that is, for the spread of the faith. A congregation, or institution, of the Roman Catholic church established in 1622 by Pope Gregory XV to oversee the worldwide missionary work of the church. Its official name is the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda. The Propaganda has oversight of all mission countries and mission districts. These undertakings are organized as prefectures and vicariates apostolic. The Propaganda uses the urban college for the education of missionaries from all over the world. J.C.

PROPER. The "propers" refers to those portions of the Catholic Mass, or Lutheran or Anglican liturgies, that vary according to the season, day, or festival being celebrated. These include the Introit, Collect, OT lesson, Epistle lesson, Gospel lesson, the Gradual, Offertory, prefaces to Communion, and post-Communion prayers. In the Roman Catholic church, there are also propers for the saints, which include the feast days of the Lord, the Virgin Mary, and the saints. The propers of the season turn on the church year, with variable features that observe Advent, Christmas, Epiphany, Lent, Easter, Pentecost, and the Pentecost season. These propers are recorded in the Catholic missal, the breviary, and the Book of Common Prayer, as well as the Lutheran Service Book and Hymnal and the Lutheran Book of Worship. J.C.

PROPHET/PROPHECY. The word means "one who speaks for [another]." In the Judeo-Christian tradition the "another" is assumed to be God, so that the prophet is regarded as God's spokesperson, mouthpiece, messenger. The origin of the term in Western language is somewhat more complicated. The Greek prophētēs was actually an "interpreter" of what some would consider to be the real prophet, that is, the one who claimed to be in actual contact with some deity or other source of esoteric knowledge, whose revelations had to be interpreted or translated for general understanding. The real prophet in the Greek sense was the mantis, one who in a trance or some extraordinary spiritual seizure (compare the word mania), like the Pythonic prophetess of Delphi, delivered utterances in ecstatic frenzy that were then "interpreted" (and put into suitably ambiguous "oracular" responses) for the benefit of the paying devotees.

Biblical language has been extremely careful in its choice of words in order to distinguish biblical prophecy from some of its less acceptable antecedents. The Greek Septuagint, the first translation of the Hebrew Bible into a Western language, used the word prophētēs exclusively to translate the Hebrew nābī' (see below) and reserved the common term mantis only in a few instances (Josh. 13:22; I Sam. 6:2; Mic. 3:7; Zech. 10:2; etc.) for one who was obviously considered to be a false prophet (for which the Septuagint also invented the word pseudo-prophētēs, a distinction that does not exist in the Hebrew Bible). Similarly, in the Latin biblical tradition and derived ecclesiastical tradition, propheta has been the operative word, in deliberate rejection of the Latin vates, which is the equivalent of the Greek mantis.

In the Old Testament. In Exodus 7:1 Aaron is designated as Moses' prophet, in the sense that he is his interpreter and spokesman (Exod. 4:14-16). But this is to grossly oversimplify the development of the concept of "prophet" in the OT.

(a) Early and pre-Israelite prophetism. As with everything else in its early history and cultural formation, Israel was a borrower of its institutions—cult and priesthood, liturgy, law, wisdom, and the rest. Prophecy is no exception, and therefore it is necessary to inquire into the origins of the common Near Eastern phenomenon, which also accounts for the Greek institution and its vocabulary as we have seen above. In Mesopotamia, both mabhu and bārū priests were institutionalized in society; the former uttered oracles under an ecstatic experience, the latter depended upon divination of various kinds. "Priest" and "prophet," it should be noted, were fairly interchangeable terms (as they are in some of the Israelite evidence): the Arabic kābin, "prophet," is cognate with the Hebrew kōbēn, "priest." The Mesopotamian pattern seems to have succeeded, to the best that we can judge the situation, in all the surrounding nations and cultures of the Near East that affected ancient Israel: In Egypt, Phoenicia, Canaan, Moab, Aram, etc. The burden of the prophecy was ordinarily official, that is, provided by court or cult prophets for the direction of the king or his officers. But there are also instances of private oracles (as at Delphi, later on) and even of prophecies, which could hardly have been viewed as expressly welcomed by their recipients.

In early Israelite history all these traits of nascent prophecy can be verified. Divination is practiced by David and Abiathar according to I Samuel 30:7-8, ecstaticism is taken as a matter of course (I Sam. 10:9-13; II Kings 3:15, etc.), and I Samuel 9:5-9 testifies that in earlier times the one who was later known as a "prophet" had been designated simply a "man of God," a "seer." The seer was a clairvoyant who literally "saw" what was otherwise undisclosed to the non-prophetic eye. This "seeing," in turn, might be aided by divination, ecstaticism, oneiro-mancy (revelation through dreams, frequent in both the OT and the NT), or necromancy (consultation of the dead, as in the tragic story of I Sam. 28:3-19).

In the later theology that could afford to forget these ambiguous origins, words like "diviner," "seer," "charmer," "dreamer," and their synonyms tend to become equated with unacceptable prophetic forms and are eschewed in favor of the single term nābī'. It is this word that the Septuagint and all subsequent translations have rendered as "prophet."

(b) Pre-classical prophecy. It is apparent that the common Near Eastern phenomenon of prophecy assumes new forms in Israel (I Sam. 9:5-9; in the story of Samuel's emergence in I Sam. 3:1-7; in the revelation to Elijah in I Kings 19:4-12, and elsewhere). Though court and cult prophecy continued as a matter of course, though odd and exotic conduct was anticipated and tolerated in these "men of God" (see I Kings 13:1-32), and though the prophet whose word was heeded and respected might at the same time be regarded as a "mad fellow" (II Kings 9:11-13), there was nevertheless by repute and in fact a novel kind of prophetism that began to make its appearance with the beginning of the Israelite monarchy, that is, Israel's taking on nationhood.

The Pentateuchal tradition, which ascribed to Moses the beginning of Israelite prophecy as it did of all the rest of Israel's institutions, obviously had ecstatic prophecy in mind (Num. 11:24-30). It is the same kind of frenetic spirit that possessed the "sons of the prophets" who are associated with Samuel, Elijah, and Elisha, and among whom Saul fell according to I Samuel 10:9-13. Saul's "prophetic" character, in this sense, is also noted in I Samuel 19:22-24. The "raving" of Saul provoked by "an evil spirit from God" in which he sought David's life (I Sam. 18:10) is, in the Hebrew, his "prophesying." This ambiguity of the prophetic spirit visible in the ecstatic state doubtless accounts for Jehu's followers' speaking of their "mad fellow." In I Kings 22:19-28 Micaiah ben Imlah ascribes the favorable word of the prophets, four hundred strong, offered to the kings of Israel and Judah to a "lying spirit" sent by the Lord. The "false" prophet Zedekiah obviously appeals to his ecstatic credentials as countering the word of Micaiah who possessed none.

Thus it is plain that ecstatic prophecy continued late in Israelite history to play a decisive role in the popular imagination. It cannot be denied that the Elijah and Elisha cycles in the books of Kings celebrate more the mystery and wondrous aura surrounding these men of God than they do their character as prophets. In much later times (see Jer. 27-28) Jeremiah had to warn against "prophets, diviners, dreamers, soothsayers, and sorcerers," who could produce impressive credentials to captivate the popular imagination. The canonical book of Nahum, among others (like the book of Esther in another genre), witnesses to the fact that an almost purely chauvinistic interpretation of prophecy could be treasured up and preserved for posterity as well as any other kind. In other words, even in its evolution and transformation in Isaiah, prophecy never entirely escaped its moorings. But still it must be insisted that something new had taken place, according to the record.

That something new may, as some believe, be due to the influence of the later prophetic tradition upon the stories about the older prophets. Against this view, however, are other important considerations. These older prophets have not been simply reinterpreted in later terms; too much of the bygone has remained to persuade us that a revision of the history has been written. Even more important, it is hard to believe that the "classical" prophecy, which begins with Amos, broke upon the world completely unheralded in the eighth century B.C. A much more natural assumption is that which the OT itself makes, namely that it had been prepared for by a development that had been taking place since the Israelite religion had first begun to assimilate to itself the institution of prophetism.

So, for example, there is no reason to doubt the authenticity of the substance of the oracle of Nathan in II Samuel 12:1-15 uttered against the king in condemnation of David's machinations detailed in II Samuel 11. That this oracle should have rebuked the arbitrary power of kings in favor of traditional Israelite values is just as much to be expected as is Nathan's participation as a court prophet in the palace cabal that guaranteed Solomon's accession to the throne in place of his presumptuous half brother Adonijah (I Kings 1:32-40). The oracles of Nathan guaranteeing an eternal destiny to the Davidic house in its present Deuteronomistic form evidently has Solomon in its purview (II Sam. 7:1-17). Psalm 89:19-37 (probably a much older text) doubtless testifies to an early court-prophetic testimony to a royal mystique (the Royal Psalms 2, 110, etc.), which nevertheless could be judged prophetically since the kings of the Gentiles ordinarily were not. Similarly, in I Kings 21 Elijah, whose title thus far had been "troubler of Israel" (I Kings 18:17) because he had decreed (prophesied) famine and drought for Israel's cultic crimes, in this further censure rejects the king for his desertion of Israelite justice and adoption of the ruthlessness of Gentile kingship. It is the same Elijah, nevertheless, who served as nationalistic prophet in respect to Israel's foreign and domestic politics (I Kings 19:15-18), as did his disciple Elisha (II Kings 8:7-15; 9:1-3).

(c) Classical prophecy. This term is applied to the prophecy that flourished in the separated kingdoms of Israel and Judah from the time of Amos, about the middle of the eighth century, and, after the dissolution of the northern kingdom in 721 B.C., in Judah alone down to and including the Exile and Babylonian captivity about 597-535 B.C. It can be called classical to Israel because it is this prophecy that is distinctive to that religion with few and insignificant parallels elsewhere. It presents the God of Israel as a deity concerned with morality, preeminently social morality, rather than with the formalities of national religion, a God who has covenanted with Israel not for its political success or aggrandizement but to prepare a holy and exemplary people. This God was a God of reward and punishment, in proportion as the people would abide by the terms of divine election.

The term "literary prophecy" was often used in the past, under the assumption that what distinguished earlier prophets like Nathan and Elijah from Amos and Hosea, for example, was that the latter had written down their prophecies whereas the former had not. It has now long been recognized that this was a false distinction, since probably none of the prophets of Israel was a literary author in his own right, except perhaps on rare occasions and only incidentally (see Ezekiel 4:1-3). We owe the prophetic works to disciples of the prophets who, first of all, remembered their masters' works and handed them on to subsequent collectors and editors who became the actual literary authors of the prophetic "Books."

"Literary prophecy" retains some validity as a designation for classical prophecy, however, when we consider that during this period there must have been an untold number of prophets active in the two kingdoms whose names we know but who have not been remembered because of neglect or because of deliberate obliteration (see II Kings 21:10-15). As with the other types of Israel's literature that have found their way into the canonical scripture of the Bible, the prophetic is the result of a highly selective process that has resulted in a collection that is representative and at the same time has preserved, with some reservations, those which were most worthy of preservation.

In more or less chronological order, the preexilic prophets who are also "literary" prophets are these: Amos (a Judahite who prophesied in Israel), Hosea (roughly contemporary, but an Israelite), Isaiah and Micah (both Judahites), and a succession of other Judahites: Zephaniah, Nahum, and Habakkuk. Their relative value as prophetic witnesses must obviously be determined on their own merits.

From the period immediately before and during the Exile come two of the most important of the major prophets, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Also, from the Exile itself, came that anonymous prophet to whom we must give the name of Deutero-Isaiah (Isa. 40-55). In view of the influence that prophetism had on the development of Israelite religion, it is remarkable that such a few names can be attributed to the roll of those who are responsible. Again we must mention the uncounted prophetic influence, especially as represented by the Deuteronomistic theologians who have put their imprint on practically all of Israelite history.

(d) Postexilic prophecy. This includes, from "classical" prophecy, the works of Joel (an apocalyptic work from about 400 B.C.), Obadiah (a judgment on Edom for its crimes against Judah), and Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. The last three, like Trito-Isaiah (Isa. 56-66), envisage the postexilic community restored on the soil of Palestine after the liberation under Cyrus (II Chr. 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-4). This prophecy tends to imitate preexilic prophecy in its thought forms, adding apocalyptic motifs and imagery borrowed from native Israelite and foreign resources (chiefly Persian), and attempts to recapture the immediacy of ancient prophecy by calling into actual being what were destined to remain forever prophetic ideals (for example, the restoration of the Davidic dynasty). It is no wonder that prophecy, reduced to these extremes, soon became only a memory in Israel and was recalled only as a former institution that might, magically, be restored to solve all problems (see I Macc. 4:46).

It must not be denied, however, that during this period the prophetic literature took on the character it now possesses, not through the infusion of a new prophetic spirit but through the editing of the prophetic books, which is itself a form of prophecy in the traditional sense of biblical inspiration. The prophetic literature, during this period, was subjected to the editing of the Deuteronomistic school of historiography and theology, which has affected every part of the OT, and it was subject also to other influences that have often changed the meaning of original prophecies. Ideas such as the eventual reunion of Israel and Judah under a common Davidic ruler, for example (Amos 9:11-15), were never to come to be. The messianic hope, nurtured by Haggai and Zechariah (and furthered by Deutero- and Trito-Zechariah in this period) had already been abandoned by Deutero-Isaiah and Ezekiel.

In short, postexilic prophecy, whether canonical or otherwise, must be characterized as derivative. It is not unfair to say that the "Spirit" had departed from the religion of Israel during the late Persian and early Hellenistic periods to the extent that Israel would now enter into a new period of self-examination independent of prophecy that could eventually be called the age of "wisdom."

In the New Testament. First of all, of course, the NT accepts what was then the conventional wisdom with regard to the OT prophets: they had predicted, down to the last detail, the most meticulous items of statistics that were now being verified. Such details are used as "proof texts" particularly in the Gospel of Matthew. Unfortunately, the spirit in which Matthew (and others) entered into this Midrashic interpretation was not always understood by his successors, and artistry was reinterpreted as historical fact.

In the NT there are persons designated as prophets. Apparently these prophets were of the ecstatic kind, given to "revelations" (Acts 11:27-28). Some of them had traits that remind us of ancient Israelite prophecy (Acts 21:10-11). They played a prominent part in the assemblies of the early Christian communities (I Cor. 13-14), but also had to be regulated by "hierarchical" direction. Yet at the same time, they also sometimes functioned on an administrative level (Acts 12:1-3). The prophetic office was as likely to be held by women as by men (Acts 21:9).

Primitive Christianity seems, in this respect, to have shared the experience of most eschatological groups from earlier and later periods. There was a prevalence of free spirits charismatically called to make known the mind of God, often in unintelligible babblings that required interpretation (I Cor. 14:26-33). In describing the "birth of the church" in Acts 2:1-13, the biblical author has adapted in Midrashic fashion a portrayal of the kind of ecstatic prophetism that was undoubtedly routine in early Christian assemblies. As the Pauline injunctions in I Corinthians already make clear, it was an exuberance that had to be brought under institutional control for the sake of order and continuity. Order and continuity prevailed, as the subsequent history of Christianity demonstrates, but the church was ultimately no more successful in institutionalizing prophecy than had been the OT (Deut. 13:1-5, for example). Prophecy, true or false, authentic or deluded, was and is a highly personal experience of direct access to an agreed source of truth, by definition incapable of being subjected to predictable norms.

PROPHETS (Major and Minor). The biblical works of Joshua through II Kings, in modern critical terminology the Deuteronomistic History, are in Jewish tradition classified as Early Prophets. (Traditionally, the authorship of these works was ascribed to one or another person who was regarded as a prophet.)

Both Jewish and Christian tradition designate as "prophetic" certain other OT works (these are, in the Jewish canon, the Latter Prophets), which are in turn distinguished as "Major" and "Minor." Major and Minor do not, of themselves, reflect qualitative judgments on the relative importance of the prophetic figures to whom these works are ascribed; they rather are quantitative indexes to the amount of material so ascribed.

In the Jewish CANON Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel are the Major Prophets. The Christian canon adds to this list after Jeremiah the book of Lamentations (Roman Catholics also the book of Baruch) and after Ezekiel the Book of Daniel: such works in the Jewish tradition are classified as non-prophetical "writings."

In both the Jewish and Christian canons the Minor Prophets are Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. Together, this "Book of the Twelve" is roughly equivalent in length (71 chapters) as a four-volume complement to the works of Isaiah (66 chapters), Jeremiah (52), and Ezekiel (48). However, all these prophetic collections, whether of Major or Minor Prophets, contain supplementary material from later times, while the book of Jonah is not the work of a prophet but rather a story about a prophet.

B.V.

PROPITIATION. See EXPIATION.

PROSELYTE. A convert from one faith to another. In the NT, all those who became Christians were proselytes, either from Judaism or paganism. Proselytes were known among the Hebrews in OT times, when non-Jews were allowed to offer sacrifices, be circumcised and, after ritual washing, became full members of the congregation. This growth of Judaism by the accession of proselytes continued through the centuries, as the presence of Gentile proselytes in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2) demonstrates. These proselytes came from all over the Roman world.

After the explosive growth of the early church began at Pentecost, many people who were formerly Jewish proselytes became Christian proselytes. This process is specifically recorded in Acts 13, where Jewish proselytes in Antioch of Pisidia embraced the new faith preached by Paul and Barnabas. Paul continued to attract proselytes to the synagogue, which undoubtedly explains the hostility of Jewish synagogue leaders to Paul's mission. In Acts 6:5, a Gentile proselyte to Judaism, Nicolaus of Antioch, was made a deacon at the same time as Stephen and Philip.

PROSOPON. In classical Greek, prosopon meant the "face" of a person, and it came also to be used for the mask worn by an actor; in Latin, this was called persona. The word prosopon came into theology to denote the "persons" of the Trinity, as the closest equivalent to the Latin persona. It is also used for the person of Jesus Christ. Though many Eastern theologians preferred the word hypostasis, prosopon and hypostasis stand side by side as alternatives in the Chalcedonian definition of 451.

J.M.

PROSTITUTION. OT writers speak of prostitution in a twofold way. There are those who engage in prostitution for commercial gain (Rahab in Josh. 2 and the two women in Solomon's court, I Kings 3:16, are obvious examples), and those who practice "sacred prostitution" as part of the cultic worship of Canaanite religion whose deities (Asherah, Astarte, Anath) encouraged this practice. At Ugarit there were prostitutes of both sexes, regarded as "holy" people devoted to the worship of Baal. The influence of cultic prostitution affected Jewish life, as the OT narrative makes clear (I Kings 14:24), and reforming kings such as Josiah (II Kings 23:7; compare I Kings 15:12; 22:46), and prophets like Amos (2:7, 8) and Jeremiah (13:27) sought to eradicate the presence of these ideas, which they or the editors of the texts regarded as morally offensive to Israel as a "holy people" of Yahweh. In popular Israelite religion, however, it seems that no clear distinction was made between various "religious" acts, and the common people in Israel tended to associate sexual acts performed in Canaanite holy places as appropriate, since, in their view, Canaanite religion lacked a moral basis. Hence the word of the eighth- to seventh-century B.C. prophets was timely (see Isa. 1:4-31; 5:16).

In the Greek world the cult of Aphrodite (called Venus by the Romans) was widespread. If Strabo is to be trusted, the temple at Corinth was serviced by a thousand prostitutes; and it cannot be accidental that Paul's letter (I Cor. 6:9, 15-20) shows how Christians there were being exposed to this influence. The NT writers uniformly warn of immoral living involving prostitution (Eph. 5:3, 5; Rev. 21:8; 22:15) and picture the church as a "pure bride" (II Cor. 11:2). Harlotry, in both OT and NT, is used figuratively of the evils of apostasy and idolatry (Isa. 57:3-5; Hos. 1:2; 2:2-8; Ezek. 16; Rev. 17:1-6, 15).

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH. See ANGLICAN CHURCHES.

PROTESTANT ETHIC. The Protestant ethic, or, more fully, the Protestant work ethic, means an attitude to work and economic activity that has been widespread in the West in the past few centuries, and that some scholars have traced to certain theological ideas that were promoted by the Protestant Reformation. In this ethic, hard work and thrift have been esteemed important virtues, while idleness has been counted a serious vice; and there is often a tendency to regard poverty as blameworthy and the consequence of idleness. The accumulation of wealth, which might once have been considered a vice, becomes rather the outward evidence for one's industriousness and even a sign of divine favor.

It was the German sociologist of religion, MAX WEBER, who drew attention to these connections in his celebrated but controversial book The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, written in 1904-1905. In this book and in a series of other writings, Weber set out to counter the Marxist claim that religion belongs only to the superstructure of society and that its character is determined by economic factors. Weber sought to show that, on the contrary, religious and theological ideas have a profound influence on economic attitudes and institutions. His investigations had shown him that in Germany the leaders of industry came overwhelmingly from Protestant backgrounds, and, looking at Europe as a whole, he noted that it was in the predominantly Protestant northern countries that industrial development had taken place, while southern Catholic Europe retained the features of a rural economy. This suggests that there may be some deep-seated connections between Protestant theology and the rise of modern capitalism with its industrial empires and commercial enterprises.

Weber reminds us of some of the changes that took place at the Reformation. The contemplative life of the monasteries came to an end and the active life was commended. The otherworldly asceticism of the monks was replaced by a this-worldly asceticism of the Puritans, who did not lavish their money on sensual indulgences but set it aside as capital. This was connected too with the Calvinist doctrine of election. One proved that one belonged to the elect by self-discipline that took the practical form of thrift. A further important idea was that of vocation. God calls each one to a place in society, and to perform the duties of one's station well is to fulfill this vocation. This is the life well-pleasing to God, but it is inevitably also the life in which wealth will accumulate. Weber's thesis has found both supporters and critics, and in such complex matters it is always hard to know whether all the factors have been taken into account. Weber himself never claimed that Protestant theology was the sole factor in the rise of capitalism. Even so, one can recognize that praise of hard work and thrift have been features of Protestant communities.

The rise of affluence in the West, together with the fact that automation and computerization are diminishing the amount of work that human beings have to do, is nowadays calling the Protestant ethic into question. On the other hand, some politicians urge the revival of the old virtues of industriousness and thrift. Certainly these values have so impressed themselves on the Western mind that it would need a radical and probably painful readjustment to replace them with new values.

J.M.

PROTESTANTISM. The movement that developed out of the religious and political events that attended attempts to reform certain abuses in the Roman Catholic Church. Protestantism became an important segment of the historic church that embraced the teachings of the sixteenth-century REFORMATION.

The nomenclature can be traced to the use of the term Protestatio, the document signed by certain German princes and representatives, generally supporters of MARTIN LUTHER, and presented at the second Diet of Speyer in 1529. The protesters objected to the repeal of the more tolerantly worded edict passed by the first Diet of Speyer in 1521. Both Diets had been called by Emperor Charles V, who wanted to squelch the politico-religious revolt of the German princes allied with Luther.

Dean Inge has pointed out that the employment of the word Protestatio has less of a sense of protest in modern usage and rather stresses the idea of positive witness. Roland H. Bainton, author of Luther's popular biography, Here I Stand, held a similar position. The distinguishing mark of Protestantism was its testimony to the supreme authority of the Word of God. This, of course, inevitably meant a disavowal of the supremacy of ecclesiastical authority as embodied in the traditional papal system. The Protestants of the sixteenth century, and later, held that they were seeking to recover the faith of the early church that had eroded through the centuries. Today, of course, the term Protestantism designates that segment of CHRISTENDOM that is not allied with the churches of Eastern Orthodoxy or the Roman Catholic Church.

The early Protestants—Lutherans, Calvinists, and the disciples of Zwingli—insisted that there was a single source of divine revelation, namely, the Holy Scriptures, not a combination of SCRIPTURE and TRADITION. It was not that they denied a place to tradition, but they refused to accept it as an equal source of divine disclosure.

Both Roman Catholics and Protestants were aware that the grace of God conferred righteousness upon needy men and women, but Protestants ruled out the sole efficacy of human meritorious acts and sacramental grace. According to them, God declares a person righteous, based on the righteousness of Christ and thus received through the response of faith. Certitude of salvation for Protestants is based on the objective authority of the Word of God alone.

While Protestants hold to varied views on the role of the sacraments they generally agree on the idea that the LORD'S SUPPER is not a sacrifice. There is also some consensus in opposition to the teaching of TRANSUBSTANTIATION, confirmed by the Council of Trent, that Christ is "truly, really and substantially contained in the sacrament under appearance of sensible things. . . . By the consecration of the bread and wine a change is brought about of the whole substance of the body of Christ our Lord and of the whole substance of the wine into the body of his blood." Protestants also declare that faith on the part of the believer is required when the Lord's Supper is received. They would all agree that the observance of the Lord's Supper is a visible declaration of the gospel.

Protestants have turned away from the hierarchical structure and the clerical authority of the Roman Catholic church. They generally declare that the church as the living Body of Christ has come into being through God's initiating grace, calling people to God as they respond in faith to the proclamation of the gospel. Most communions teach that the church is recognized by the preaching of the Word and by the proper administration of the rites of baptism and the Lord's Supper. Finally, Protestants stress the idea of the PRIESTHOOD OF BELIEVERS.

The branches of proliferating Protestantism first emerged through the influence of Luther, Calvin, and others. What came to be known as Lutheranism spread over Germany and central Europe and to all the countries of northern Europe. The disciples of ULRICH ZWINGLI were to be found largely in Switzerland. JOHN CALVIN, the French lawyer-turned-theologian, was the human instrument in launching the Presbyterian or Reformed churches in Switzerland, France, Holland, and Great Britain, and especially Scotland. The English Reformation developed partly through the exigencies of political history and through the less visible influence of the Continental Protestant teachings of the Lutherans, the Calvinists, and ANABAPTISTS. The Anglican Church was rent by various controversies and movements. The PURITANS, who set out only to achieve certain reforms in the Church of England, actually produced several major denominational groupings—the Independents, who later became Congregationalists, and from them came the BAPTISTS, who also may have been influenced by the Anabaptists, especially on the teaching of believers' baptism. QUAKERS were regarded as a radical segment of the Puritan Reformation. It was well over one hundred years later that METHODISTS left their Anglican roots to become a separate communion.

In America, where FREE CHURCHES thrived, the proliferation of Protestantism continued at a stepped-up pace. But in the early part of the twentieth century the practice of spawning new sects and segments of the church was challenged by a historical tenet of biblical faith: the unity of the church. One of the major forces in interdenominational cooperative witness was the Sunday school movement. The concept of conducting Bible schools or church schools in the churches was followed by interdenominational Sunday school rallies and conventions. In time, most of the churches were following the curriculum of uniform lessons, which became a major function of the International Council of Christian Education. Thus the Sunday school movement was an early and important factor in the dawning of the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT.

Likewise United States Protestants who had learned to work together in Christian education also found similar compatibility in planning and directing overseas missionary work. This led to the formation of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, which in turn became a major factor in promoting the ecumenical movement and the launching of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1948.

PROVERB. A colorful saying, usually short, offering wisdom or keen observation, such as those collected in the biblical book of PROVERBS and elsewhere in the Bible and Apocrypha, but particularly in the biblical WISDOM literature.

Some proverbs are brief, such as:

My son, if sinners entice you, do not consent. (Prov. 1:10)

Do not boast about tomorrow, for you do not know what a day may bring forth. (Prov. 27:1)

The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge. (Prov. 1:7)

Others offer lengthier observations:

Trust in the Lord with all your heart, and do not rely on your own insight.
In all your ways acknowledge him, and he will make straight your paths. (Prov. 3:5-6)

Still others offer rather full discussions, as in the case of the description of a good wife in Proverbs 31:10-31. Or in the meditation on the transience of life and wealth in Psalm 49:1-20. Or in the meditation on the justice of God in Psalm 73:1-28. Such sayings encapsulate the experience of a people, imparting gathered wisdom to future generations. Their freshness, simplicity, and directness make them a delight and a wise companion. Their brevity makes them memorable.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF. Epigrams or PROVERBS can be found scattered throughout the OT. Jeremiah 31:29 (compare Ezek. 18:2), "the fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge" is an example; so are the rhetorical question of Jeremiah 13:23, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots?" and the famous remark of Ezekiel 16:44, "like mother, like daughter." But the single greatest collection of pithy maxims touching on all of nature and human experience is, of course, the book of Proverbs. Tradition has attributed it to no less a sage than King SOLOMON, who "spoke of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon to the hyssop that grows out of the wall; he spoke also of beasts, and of birds, and of reptiles, and of fish" (I Kings 4:32-33).

The book of Proverbs discloses its own four-part structure by means of internal headings and thematic changes: (a) chapter 1-9, a rather well-integrated section of instruction to "my son" under the general heading "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge" (1:7); (b) 10:1-22:16, entitled "Proverbs of Solomon," a miscellaneous collection of maxims and epigrams, many of which deal with the theme of retribution; (c) 22:17-24:22, untitled but apparently the words of a teacher to a student; (d) and chapter 25-29, entitled "proverbs of Solomon which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied" (25:1). In addition to these principal parts, the book contains five shorter appendices which, except for 24:23-24, are gathered into the concluding chapters 30-31.

The rich variety of materials that it contains, topics that it treats, and literary styles (beside the epigram) that it employs all immediately suggest that the book of Proverbs came into its present form over many years and drew upon many sources for its materials. This hypothesis is readily borne out when it is discovered that the third section, 22:17–24:22, is very similar to an Egyptian wisdom text entitled “The Instruction of Amen-em-Ope,” which is thought to predate 1000 B.C. As the texts recovered from Egypt and Mesopotamia show, the ancient Near East had a rich sapiential tradition, and Israel’s wisdom tradition had roots in that soil. Parts (b) and (d) have much more of the character of indigenous folk wisdom. The popular theology of reward and punishment and the stress upon common sense derived from experience that appear here give us the flavor of popular etiquette and mores in Israel, particularly in postexilic times. In contrast, the opening section of the book, chapters 1–9, is often felt to reflect the rather more sophisticated thinking of courtly WISDOM. It holds up for emulation the virtues of prudence, knowledge, and discretion, and in its very opening verses sets forth as a model the wise man who, like Joseph or Daniel, courtiers to kings, can understand proverbs, the words of the wise, and their riddles. These chapters of “theological wisdom” also introduce us to Dame Wisdom.

In 1:20-33 and 8:1-36, wisdom is personified as a woman, the “first of [God’s] acts of old,” God’s cohort in creation (8:22). She is God’s daily delight, “rejoicing before him always, rejoicing in his inhabited world and delighting in the sons of men” (8:30-31). In 9:1-6, 13-18 it is Dame Wisdom and not the harlot, Dame Folly, through whom one can get sense and walk in the way of insight. This full-fledged personification of wisdom in Proverbs 8–9 continues to develop through later Jewish literature in texts such as Ecclesiasticus 14:20-27; 24:1-12; and the Wisdom of Solomon 7:22–8:18, until Dame Wisdom becomes almost an emanation of God and a mediator between the Creator and the creation. It seems quite possible that the writer of the prologue of the Gospel of John had personified wisdom in mind as he described the preexistent Word who was with God from the beginning and without whom was not anything made that was made (John 1:3).

PROVIDENCE. Derived from the Latin providere, “to foresee,” the word “providence” originally meant much the same as the word FOREKNOWLEDGE. However, when one speaks of the providence of God, it is meant not only that God foresees future events but that God actually brings them about. God’s providence, in Calvin’s words, “extends to the hand as well as to the eye.” All Christian theologians are agreed that God did not simply create the world and then leave it to its own devices (the view usually called DEISM). They believe that God has continued to govern the world and to direct it toward the ends that God has set for it. A very rigorous doctrine of providence (like the one taught by Calvin) seems to lead to a DETERMINISM in which the divine will has laid down in advance the detailed course of history and which would therefore allow no space for free human decisions. Calvin states bluntly that “men and angels do nothing, except at the secret instigation of God,” though he also wishes to maintain (inconsistently, it would seem) that these agents are responsible for their actions.

But whereas Calvin seems to think that even the most trivial events are directly decreed by God, many theologians would be content with a much less strict doctrine of providence. They hold that although God maintains a general government over the affairs of the Creation and will bring to realization divine purposes for it, God can reach this goal by more routes than one, so there is considerable flexibility, including scope for free human action. William James was one of several philosophers who used the analogy of the chess master to illustrate the point. The master can play a less skilled opponent or even a dozen such opponents simultaneously, and although the master does not know in advance what these opponents will do, the master’s skill at the game is so much greater than theirs that the master can always bring it round to the desired position and is assured of victory in the end. This is rather like the view of foreknowledge advanced by Leibnitz, who taught that what God foreknows (or foresees) is every possible course of events, and that God can take care within the overall plans of any contingency that arises. Leibnitz also taught a somewhat different doctrine of a “pre-established harmony” set up by God at the Creation and forming a kind of “program” for the universe. But if this were interpreted in a rigorous way, it might seem once again to rule out human FREEDOM.

Hegel, who believed that reason is the ultimate principle of the universe, held that the real is the rational and the rational is the real. If we could see the total course of universal history, we would understand that every event in it is a necessary moment in the unfolding of the absolute Spirit. At work in this process is what he called the “cunning of reason” and claimed that although God permits human beings to do what they please and to follow their passions, God so orders things that these human actions end up by serving not the purposes of their authors but the purposes of God. This philosophical doctrine of Hegel is obviously a sophisticated version of the view underlying the OT versions of the history of Israel and its neighbors, a history in which even God’s enemies unwittingly serve God’s purposes. PSALMS, BOOK OF. In the Hebrew biblical manuscript tradition, Psalms appears as either the first or one of the first books in the third part of the canon, the Writings. In the ancient Greek biblical tradition, which had a different order for many of the books, Psalms was placed along with other poetical works preceding the prophetic books. Such a difference in location shows something of the fluid quality of the CANON in its early days. English versions follow the Greek tradition, which reflects the canon of the early church.

Title of the Book. The name "psalms" comes from the Greek by way of the Old Latin translation of the Bible. The Greek term psalmos originally referred to the plucking of a stringed instrument and then was applied to songs sung to the accompaniment of such instruments. Thus a "psalm" was a "song." The Hebrew title for the book is tehillim, "praises." As we shall see, neither of these designations is adequate to describe the contents of the book.

Number of Psalms. Just as there are two titles for the book, so there are two traditions (Greek and Hebrew) for the numbering of the psalms. The Hebrew Bible contains 150 psalms, but the Greek Bible followed by the Catholic Vulgate (Latin) tradition has 151. Psalm 151 is said to stand "outside the number." In addition, some psalms are combined and others divided into two in the two different traditions. Thus in reading Protestant and Catholic translations one has to be aware of minor differences in how they are numbered.

Structure of the Book. The final form of the material, as noted in the RSV, suggests that the larger book is made up of five smaller books. This is indicated by the concluding doxologies at Psalms 42:13; 72:18-19; 89:52; 106:48; with Psalm 150 serving as a final doxology. This division into five books was probably intended to parallel the five books of the Pentateuch. Early Jewish tradition spoke of the five books of Moses and the five books of David. In addition, there is evidence that all of the five books are made up of several smaller collections. This is indicated by the headings to the psalms, which refer to Psalms of David (Pss. 3-41, for example), Psalms of Asaph (Pss. 50; 73-83), Korah Psalms (42-49; 84-85; 87-88), songs of ascent (120-34), and so on. Thus the book probably grew over the years by the addition and combination of smaller collections.

Headings of the Psalms. Most of the psalms have some type of heading giving such information as personal names, musical instruments, occasional directions for usage, the ancient name of the psalm type, and technical terms. Most of the technical terms, like selah, used in many psalms, were no longer understood by ancient commentators. Modern interpreters are still baffled about the meanings of most of the information supplied in those headings. The NEB translation, for example, simply omits these. In all probability, these headings functioned like the notations found at the top of modern hymns and thus would have offered significant directions to those using the psalms.

History of Interpretation. In early Jewish tradition, the personal names noted in the headings were assumed to indicate authorship, so David was considered the author of most of the psalms and ten or eleven other persons were seen as authors as well. (Adam was considered the author of Ps. 92, since it was thought to have been composed for use on the first Sabbath!) Historical type information was added to the headings of some psalms, supposedly written by David during particular times in his life (see Pss. 3; 7; 18; 34; 51; 52; 54; 56-60; 63; 142). Gradually, tradition came to consider David as the author of all the entire book.

More modern scholarship has concluded that David probably did not write many or any of the psalms, and that "of David" in the headings to many of them is a late addition or denotes that the psalms came from a "Davidic collection" of psalms.

Interpreting the Psalms. Many modern scholars are agreed that the vast majority of the psalms were written for use in worship services and thus must be understood as part of the liturgies used in the Temple. The great diversity in the psalms suggests, however, that the psalms were not just songs or praises. The content of the psalms is as diverse as the various components and interests that went to make up the services of worship. Thus some psalms are prayers to God in time of need, others are thanksgiving, some are hymns sung about God, some contain words of God addressed to the worshipers, others have words spoken by the priests to the worshiper or by the worshiper to a congregation, and so on. Thus in reading the psalms one should constantly ask the following questions: Who is speaking? Who is being addressed? What is being talked about? What is the mood of the psalm? What conditions of life are reflected in the psalm? Frequently changes in speaker, addressee, and mood take place within the same psalm indicating that the psalm was related to various aspects of the liturgy.

Worship services in ancient Israel served many different functions, focused on different concerns, and centered on both congregational and personal matters. In some services, the general community and its needs were the primary concern, in others the king, and still in others some individual or small group. The purposes of worship services were also varied. Some services were festive and celebrative, others were held to request divine help in time of trouble, others to offer thanksgiving. If psalms were used under these various conditions, then we would expect them to reflect such diverse interests, and they ought to be capable of being placed in categories according to their content, mood, and other factors.

Psalm Types. Most of the psalms can be divided into types or genres depending on whether they are hymns of praise, laments with petitions for help, thanksgiving after some disaster, and so forth. Further classifications can be made depending on whether the main participants in the worship were the community, the king, or some individual.

Laments were psalms used, along with sacrifices, during times of distress, petitioning God for help. Individuals offered laments during times of illness (Pss. 6; 13; 31; 38; 39), when they felt falsely accused of a wrong (Pss. 7; 17; 26; etc.), when they were oppressed and persecuted (Pss. 3; 35; 109), when they were penitent over sin (Pss. 25; 51), and so forth. The king could offer similar laments but also petitions when the country and his rule were threatened (Pss. 20; 22; 89). The community offered laments when the nation suffered defeat in battle or experienced other major calamities (Pss. 44; 60; 74; 79). Generally, laments contain the following elements: an address to the Deity, a description of the trouble or distress, a plea for redemption, a statement of confidence in God, confession of sin or statement of innocence, a pledge or vow to do certain things if God provides a rescue, and a conclusion.

Thanksgivings were offered, along with sacrifices, after the worshiper or community had been saved from distress, whether sickness (Pss. 30; 103), sin (Ps. 32), loss of faith (Ps. 73), or danger in battle (Pss. 18; 118). Of course, thanksgiving could be offered for normal blessing when no prior distress existed. For this purpose, hymns were probably used. Most thanksgiving psalms contain a call or statement about giving thanks, a description of the distress from which one was saved, thanksgiving, and references to fulfilling one's pledge or vow.

Hymns were sung on routine festival occasions and when the community wished to praise God. Examples of hymns are Psalms 8; 29; 47; 93; and 95–100. Most of the hymns were sung about rather than to God. Hymns generally contain the following features: a call to praise, the body of the hymn, which praises God for deeds and/or attributes, and a conclusion. Some hymns focus on very specific subjects, such as those that extol God and the city of Zion or Jerusalem (Pss. 46; 48; 76). Special royal psalms were used at the king's coronation (Pss. 2; 72; 110), when he took the oath of office (Ps. 101), went forth to battle (Pss. 20–21), or married (Ps. 45).

Although most of the psalms can be seen as belonging to one of the above types, many psalms are too general to be classified specifically. Such psalms may have been used or recited on various occasions and therefore preserved and used because of the value of their contents.

PSEUDO-CLEMENTINE. See CLEMENT, EPISTLES OF.

PSEUDO-MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF. Although it is attributed to MATTHEW, this gospel of the NT APOCRYPHA dates from the eighth or ninth century and is based on the Infancy Gospel of Thomas and the Protoevangelium of James. With the aim of lending credibility to this account, someone has written a preface to this work, linking it with Jerome (347-420), who reportedly claimed that the original Gospel of Matthew was written in Hebrew. In the Middle Ages this Pseudo-Matthew served as a major source for popular piety about the birth of Jesus, especially for artists and poets who wanted to portray the events surrounding the pregnancy of Mary and the infancy of Jesus.

PSYCHICAL RESEARCH. The scientific study of parapsychological or paranormal phenomena. These are sometimes referred to as parapsychology or EXTRASENSORY PERCEPTION. The areas under consideration include thought transference, foretelling the future, hauntings (appearances of ghosts or moving objects), and messages through mediums from spirits of the dead.

The beginnings of psychical research are to be found in the establishment of the Society for Psychical

Research in London in 1882. An American society was formed in 1888, and soon there were societies in a number of European countries and Japan. The universities have been hesitant to enter this field as a valid area of research, but serious work has been done at Duke University in the parapsychology laboratory of J. B. Rhine from the 1930s to the 1960s. Later a similar department was established at the University of Utrecht.

These investigations were encouraged by the rise of the SPIRITUALISM movement in the nineteenth century. British researcher Sir Oliver Lodge was a Spiritualist. Others accepted the reality of psychic phenomena but rejected the religious explanations derived from spiritualism.

Both the methods and findings of psychical research are ignored or rejected by most scientists. Some see possibilities for future research, but few are willing to enter into the search. There are two areas for such research. Cognitive phenomena include clairvoyance, telepathy or precognition, prophecy, and acquisition of facts about one person by another through normal sensory channels (ESP). Physical phenomena include "willing" the dice to fall in a certain way and the moving of objects by poltergeists (psychokinesis). People have believed in the existence of such phenomena for thousands of years, but there has been no agreement on causes, no effective statement of theory, or adequate methods for research. While some investigations have been done, much foundational work still remains.

PSYCHOANALYSIS. A branch of psychology, a method for studying how the mind works, and a form of treatment, named by SIGMUND FREUD, who developed it over a period of fifty years. Associated with Joseph Breuer in the 1890s, Freud observed the behavior of neurotic patients under hypnosis. He became aware that during a process of free association they brought out hitherto repressed painful memories, usually sexual. Freud theorized that basic to behavior was sexual energy, which he named libido, and that specific defense mechanisms developed as attempts to inhibit such memories. The study of dreams, slips of the tongue, and forgetfulness led to a model of the structure of personality that became basic to psychoanalytic theory and treatment.

According to psychoanalysis the structure of personality is threefold. The id is formed in the unconscious instinctual drives, which impel a person to activity. This energy arises from the erotic (libidinal) and aggressive drives. Such drives are important to the emotional life, their purpose being to regulate, control, and discharge instinctual energy. This basic element in the personality is exhibited most fully in infancy. The aim is gratification. Social processes of nurture and education are used to repress and direct these basic drives. Insufficient repression leads to the development of inappropriate behavior patterns. Over-repression leads to anxiety and self-concern, preventing attachment to others. Hence the means to direct the healthy development of libidinal energy is important.

The second aspect of personality is the ego, the conscious level of existence. Here the individual becomes related to the environment. Preconscious (but not unconscious) material is available for recall. The ego seeks to gratify instinctual needs but is open to delayed gratification and able to accept a modification of the pleasure principle. One way it builds defenses against anxiety is through identification. Modes of behavior are imitated through parents and other people in situations in which the child lives. Repression (forgetting) is another defense. Reaction formation is another way; the person acts contrary to what is expected in order to prevent psychic discomfort. Kindness may mask aggression; boldness may be a front for submissiveness. These "masks" may not be recognized by the wearer. Or, a person may try isolation, by objectifying feelings. What sounds like the repression of an idea may be in reality a deeply felt wish. Through the method of projection, an individual attributes personal attitudes and feelings to others. By not admitting to having such attitudes, pressures of anxiety, guilt, or hostility may be lessened. Prejudice is a form of projection. Denial of a possibility is another way of handling psychological threat. Finally, it is possible to regress to an earlier stage of development. The ego's task is to mediate between personal needs and environmental pressures in order to steer a course close to reality.

The third element in personality is the superego. Beginning to develop between the ages of three and six, this is the ego ideal, concerned with the values and mores of the community. This is conscience, first developed through identification with parents and concern to obey them. Later, teachers and heroes become other persons with whom to identify. In another way, the conversion experience comes out of struggles with the superego toward the formation of a new life-style expressing an understanding of conscience. Overall the superego acts as a censor on the ego in its response to the id.

Psychoanalytic theory highlights the importance of several mechanisms within the personality. Instinctual conflict among id, ego, and superego leads to anxiety. Such normal conflict becomes pathological when it inhibits enjoyment of life. Unconscious mental processes are also important in understanding the personality. While preconscious thoughts can be recalled, unconscious thoughts lie so deep that they can be recalled only with difficulty, if at all, yet are important for understanding behavior, especially when neurotic.

Psychoanalysis has added a dimension to developmental theory, notably through the work of ERIK ERIKSON and his stage theory. The field has also established the fact that there is a relationship between present behavior and childhood experiences.

From his work with adults, Freud established a pattern by which he discerned that persons go through specific stages related to the development of sexuality. The infant in the oral stage seeks instant gratification of physical needs for food and external comfort. In the next stage the child seeks anal satisfaction, expressed as a need to give or withhold, whichever brings gratification. The three-year-old, in the genital stage seeks fulfillment through a relationship to the parent of the opposite sex, later transferring that affection to the parent of the same sex as the one who becomes a role model. It is here that the superego begins to develop. The six-year-old enters a sexually latent stage, free to develop knowledge and skills before the identity struggles of adolescence.

Inevitably, psychoanalysis developed in many directions. Otto Reich, ALFRED ADLER, CARL JUNG, and others developed their own "schools." Psychoanalytic theory has influenced anthropology, sociology, literature, and the visual arts. Psychoanalysis is a descriptive method. It does not provide quantitative data that some forms of research generate. Recently there have been questions concerning the need for guidelines for evaluation. In the face of questions as to the efficacy of psychoanalytic treatment (however acceptable in theory) with reference to the amount of time and money expended, there may be further developments. I.C.

PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION. The ancient Greeks speculated on the meaning of religion, as evidenced in the writings of Plato and Aristotle. The people of the Bible wrote about religious experiences. But the psychology of religion in a technical sense could not arise until psychology itself became a discipline apart from philosophy. This occurred with the laboratory studies of Wilhelm Wundt in 1875. Somewhat earlier, the theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834) had been describing religion as "feeling."

The earliest uses of critical empirical methods were in studies of conversion by Edwin D. Starbuck and E. Stanley Hall and in studies of mysticism. Starbuck's Psychology of Religion appeared in 1899 and was followed three years later by William James' Varieties of Religious Experience.

During the same period, anthropologists were approaching the study of religious experience from the phenomenological perspective. J. H. Leuba's Psychological Origin and the Nature of Religion (1912), Sir James George Frazer's Golden Bough, and Emil Durkheim's writings were all influenced by evolutionary theory. Those who study preliterate religions use such terms as "mana" to indicate the essential Spirit, "animism" to indicate life in everything, and "totemism" to symbolize the figure that represents the clan or tribal group and the place of the ancestors in collective life. Further systematization of the field was made through E. S. Ames' Psychology of Religious Experience and J. B. Pratt's Religious Consciousness.

Studies in early forms of religion, insofar as these could be uncovered, provided agenda for psychological research. To what extent is religion an individual response and to what extent does the individual respond as participant of a group? In many cultures the relationship to the Other is a delicately ordered expression of the life of the community. This is observed in all religions where group or congregational worship is practiced, whether on a weekly basis, as in the Western religions, or on holy days, as is more characteristic of Eastern religions. The phase of individualism that became distinctive of the Western world during the Renaissance made possible the emphasis on personal sin, redemption, conversion, and commitment, which became characteristic of much of Protestantism.

An understanding of the Transcendent is a phenomenon of all religions. Some understand and deny, as in the origins of Buddhism, or recent secular responses implied in the terms "eclipse of God" or "death of God," and in agnosticism or atheism. The activity of the Other is known only by the responses of believers. A psychology of religion needs to inquire into the nature and meaning of prayer, both individual and collective. Verbal and bodily responses indicate the interrelationships of awe, fear, and love. The nature of praise and petition indicates the believers' understanding of the power of the One worshiped. The occasions on which the community gathers and the objectives of its worship indicate its understanding of and relationship to the Holy One.

This reflects the human understanding of the nature of the numinous, an area studied by psychologists of religion. The numinous evokes awe, as reflected in the care with which the worshiping people approach the Holy One and the way in which they order their existence. In some forms of religion the ethical character of the Divine is an integral part of the holiness, so that approaching the Divine requires righteousness on the part of a community or individuals. Yet in all religions there have been attempts to influence this reality through magic.

Another area in the psychology of religion is the study of the human response to the understanding of the Transcendent. People have always sought meaning for life, whether in community or as individuals. How a particular form of religion regards life after death, or its absence, is one indication of the goal of life. Another basic factor is the life-style a religion sets for its adherents—the values for living and the rewards and/or punishments it declares. This aspect of the study of religious psychology receives strong emphasis in early twentieth-century writings, beginning with George Albert Coe's Psychology of Religion (1916). What does one do, he asks, in studying a religion? The functioning of religion is a clue to the strength of the beliefs. Religious consciousness includes values, as indicated by individual and group conduct. The human response to the sacred is to be seen in behavior. Those values that a culture holds to be most important reflect its view of the nature of its god(s). The commands for the ordering of life, whether in oral tradition or written form, as in the Bible and in the Qur'an, are indications of the character of the Transcendent.

Out of an understanding of holiness arises the awareness of sin and, concomitantly, forgiveness. Sin is wrongdoing or a wrong attitude toward the Divine that disrupts a relationship. Some way must be found to restore wholeness. Repentance in some religions has been indicated through forms of a sacrificial system, functioning in behalf of individuals and/or a community. In more individualistic times repentance is demonstrated through personal acts of penance as signs of restoration. Doctrines of redemption, whereby the Other in some way takes the initiative in restoring human beings to favor, are important in studying the nature of a religion. Related to this, and beyond doctrines concerning life after death, are eschatological doctrines concerning the ultimate fulfillment of the purposes of existence and the world itself.

The study of CONVERSION has attracted research workers because it is a complex phenomenon, affecting not only individuals but groups. It arises in various contexts, expresses itself in differing ways, and affects people at any age level. It can be studied through the writings of those who have had this experience, through descriptive histories of revival meetings, and through observation. The study of MYSTICISM has a vast literature, not only in the writings of mystics, but in the books in which writers on the devotional life have tried to explicate the path for those who would follow.

Today, several streams of twentieth-century psychology inform the study of psychology of religion. BEHAVIORISM, with its emphasis on habit formation and the importance of rewards, has given direction to the psychological aspects of worship and the liturgies that support worship. It raises questions about the place of conditioning in developing expected behavior patterns and about the nature of the freely willed response. One could also cite theories and practices in psychotherapy designed for behavioral change.

Developmental psychologists such as ERIK ERIKSON lend insights that have bearing on religious development, through the use of such terms as "basic trust," "initiative vs. guilt," or "self-identity." Developmental psychology has led to recent and continuing studies in moral and religious development: Lawrence Kohlberg in moral development, James Fowler in faith development, and Kenneth Stokes in adult religious development.

An important influence in the study of religious psychology has come through the work of SIGMUND FREUD and CARL G. JUNG. Freud began his studies of religion in Totem and Taboo. His delineation of the unconscious facets in behavior have implications for religious belief and practice. The broad understanding of the nature of libido has brought a new dimension into the study of religious experience, the relationship to God, and the response in religious living. Freud's studies on the superego have influenced the understanding of conscience, whether one is dealing with the child's internalization of parental rules, or the adult's struggles among the aspects of self. The concept of projection is a help in understanding guilt and blame. Introversion/extroversion help explain the varieties of religious experience from the deeply personal to the corporate.

Jung's more positive regard for religion has made his writings a welcome addition to the research in religious psychology. In speaking of the anima/animus he points to the complexity of human personality. Individuation indicates the possibility of personal rebirth. In his theory of archetypes he brings the development of myths and symbols into the center of the understanding of religion.

PAUL PRUYSER, in his book A Dynamic Psychology of Religion (1968), developed another approach. Wishing to avoid systematization, he describes perceptual processes in religion such as sight, sound, and touch, and intellectual processes such as knowledge, memory, and imagination. He discusses symbolism and religious language, followed by emotional processes and the motor system. He concludes with the areas of relationships to persons, things, ideas, and the self.

Another influence is that of studies in EXTRASENSORY PERCEPTION and related fields. J. B. Rhine at Duke University initiated studies in parapsychology relating to life after death. Huston Smith studied the effects of mind-expanding drugs on religious experience. Morton Kelsey has explored dreams in a biblical-psychological perspective. The area of meditation as a way of self-awareness and relationship to the Transcendent has led to the development of a number of systems, including that of Robert Assagioli. This postdates ABRAHAM MASLOW's "religion . . . and peak experiences," a broader description of how people develop a sense of what is ultimate, or ERICH FROMM's view of a fully humanistic religion.

In less than a century the study of religious psychology has expanded through several disciplines into many areas, all continuous with the phenomena first observed by early researchers. I.C.

PTOLEMY. A dynasty of Hellenic kings who ruled over Egypt, beginning with the breakup of ALEXANDER THE GREAT's empire in 323 B.C., down to 30 B.C. The founder, Ptolemy (who died about 283 B.C.), was one of Alexander's most trusted associates and one of seven bodyguards who accompanied Alexander everywhere. Ptolemy married a Persian princess, Artacama. On Alexander's death he became ruler of Egypt, threw out Alexander's officials, conquered Cyrenaica, and later controlled Cyprus and Palestine (318 B.C.). Many wars took place between Alexander's various successors but Ptolemy held his throne in Egypt securely. Ptolemy is remembered as the founder of the famous library in ALEXANDRIA.

Ptolemy II (also known as Philadelphus, 309–246 B.C.) was not a soldier, but his navy became dominant in the eastern end of the Mediterranean. His court was the height of luxury, and he adopted the Egyptian custom of marrying one's sister. Ptolemy III (also Euergetes, king 246–221 B.C.) made war on the Seleucid (Hellenic) dynasty of Syria and Babylon, invading this empire as far as Babylon itself. Ptolemy IV (also Philopator, king 221–204 B.C.) was a weak, luxury-loving ruler. The decline of the dynasty begins with him. He was ruled by his advisors and mistresses. Ptolemy V (also Epiphanes, king 204–181 B.C.) came to the throne at age five. The government was paralyzed and all overseas possessions, as well as Palestine, were lost. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of his rival, Antiochus III. Ptolemy VI (also Philometor, 181–145 B.C.) became king as an infant. The country was ruled by his mother, Cleopatra. Later the Seleucid King Antiochus IV Epiphanes invaded Egypt and captured Ptolemy VI. Thereupon the city of Alexandria put his younger brother on the throne as Ptolemy VII (also called Physcon, king 146–117 B.C.). When Antiochus withdrew from Egypt, the two brothers ruled as joint-kings. When quarrels broke out between them, appeals were made to Rome, which intervened in Egypt in 168 B.C. Philometer, or Ptolemy VI, emerged the stronger. He invaded the Seleucid realms and conquered them but was mortally wounded in a battle near Antioch in 145 B.C. Ptolemy VIII (known as Lathyros, king 117–107, 89–81 B.C.) and Ptolemy IX (or Alexander I, king 107–89 B.C.), sons of Ptolemy VII, shared the empire and soon were embroiled in warfare. Ptolemy IX ruled Egypt alone from 104–99 B.C. He was overthrown by a popular revolt in 89 B.C. and died in a naval battle in 88 B.C. His son was briefly on the throne as Ptolemy X, but was murdered after only twenty days as king. This ended the legitimate Ptolemaic line. J.C.

PUBLICANS. Petty officials who collected minor taxes on salt, duty on goods, tolls on highways and bridges, and on any transaction they could intercept with toll gates or other controls. The term "publican" is derived from the older Roman order of publicani, who were contract TAX COLLECTORS, that is, they contracted to derive a certain sum from a territory in the provinces and were allowed to keep as profit any money above that contracted sum. The publicani were abolished under the empire and replaced with the telonai.

In the RSV the term "tax collector" is regularly used for this office, while the KJV (or Authorized Version) regularly uses "publican." The publicans (or tax collectors) were utterly despised by the Jews in Jesus' time because of their legal, but unjust, extortion of money from the people, as well as their cooperation with Rome. Yet Jesus befriended publicans, as he did other public sinners, offering salvation to them if they repented. Among the publicans who accepted Jesus and changed their lives was Levi, or Matthew, who became an apostle (Matt. 9:9-13; Luke 5:27-31), and Zacchaeus of Jericho, who welcomed Jesus and repaid all he had stolen (Luke 19:6). In Luke 18:9-14, Jesus told the parable of the Pharisee and the publican, which contrasted the humility of the tax collector and the pride of the Pharisee.

PUJA. In BHAKTI Hinduism, puja is worship offered to deities in a temple or a household shrine. Typical features of puja include invocation of the god, bathing and dressing its image, anointing it with sandalwood paste, offering flowers and incense, and waving a lamp in front of it. Food to be eaten by the family or to be distributed to temple worshipers is also presented. In household puja, done every morning in devout homes by the head of the family or a retained priest, the patronal deity is treated as an honored guest. In temples, the emphasis shifts somewhat to make the deity a king in his court. The regimen is based on the daily routine of a maharajah, with times for audience when worshipers may present petitions and simple offerings, usually assisted by ritually pure priests.

PUL. TIGLATH-PILESER III, king of Assyria from 745 to 727 B.C., took the name Pul when he ruled Babylon from 729 to 727 B.C. (II Kings 15:19; I Chr. 5:26; in Isaiah 66:19 the KJV has Pul, the RSV has Put). His son Shalmaneser V later ruled Babylon under the name Ululai.

PUNNA. From the Pali word for "merit." In BUDDHISM, punna is the spiritual power, capable of producing certain reward in this or another life, that results from the good KARMA engendered by good actions. Punna can effect present benefits, a postmortem sojourn in a paradisaic heaven, or a happy future rebirth. The actions that create punna are (1) donations, especially the giving of gifts to temples and monasteries, such as gilding images of the Buddha or donating food and clothes to monks; (2) morality—the keeping of moral precepts; and (3) the practice of meditation; for while the practice of vipassana—the meditation of analysis—can lead one beyond the karmic realm altogether to the realization of NIRVANA, other "samadhic" meditations generate very refined forms of karma, leading to rebirth in a high, perhaps "formless," heaven.

Understandably, the first two are ways of making punna appeal to the laity, while the third is of greatest interest to monks. The quest for punna is especially popular in THERAVADA Buddhism, where the distinction between lay and monastic spiritual paths is particularly marked, and where making punna is really the central focus of religious life for the great majority of Buddhists.

PURANA. In HINDUISM, the Puranas are sacred writings, generally written between A.D. 400 and 1000, which offer popular treatment of such topics as cosmology, the myths of the gods, dynastic histories, and the performance of pilgrimage and ritual. These books were very important for the development of BHAKTI and later types of Hinduism. Themes like the periodic destruction and re-creation of the world, the four YUGAS, the veneration of bhaktic deities, and the importance of CASTE, so characteristic of recent Hinduism, all received great impetus from this literature. MOKSHA, in fact, is less emphasized than the following of DHARMA in the context of life in this world combined with devotion to the gods.

Each Purana is "sectarian" in that it particularly exalts one of the deities, especially VISHNU, SHIVA, or BRAHMA. Tradition names eighteen Puranas as the major ones. Among them, the Vishnu Purana is a major source for information on the AVATARS of Vishnu. By far the most popular and influential Purana of all, the Bhagavata Purana relates the familiar stories of KRISHNA's childhood and youth, as well as offering rich insights into the meaning of Krishna devotion.

PURCELL, HENRY (1659–95). Outstanding English composer of sacred and secular music, known for his dramatic effects, creativity, realism, and melodic achievements in instrumental and vocal works. Born in London, an apprenticed chorister at the Chapel Royal from an early age, by 1683 Purcell had become composer for King Charles II's string ensemble, organist at Westminster Abbey, Chapel Royal organist, and keeper of the royal instruments. Often called the Father of Anglican Church Music, he composed numerous anthems, organ voluntaries, cantatas, sonatas, and chants, many still widely used. Deeply involved in music for the theater, he wrote partial and full-length scores for over forty dramas by Dryden, Congreve, Beaumont and Fletcher, and others. His single true opera was Dido and Aeneas (1689), although King Arthur, Don Quixote, and other compositions interspersed dialogue with music. Madrigalist, polyphonist, and instrumentalist, he died at thirty-six, preserver of the past, forger of the future.

PURE LAND BUDDHISM. A popular movement within MAHAYANA BUDDHISM, especially in China and Japan, which emphasizes the saving power of faith in Amitabha (Japanese: Amida) Buddha. According to the SUTRAS venerated by the movement, Amida Buddha made a vow that all who called upon his name in faith would be brought into his Buddha paradise, the "Pure Land," after death. From its entry into NIRVANA would be easy; the paradise itself is described in such glowing language as to make it incomparably appealing. Faith is expressed by recitation of what is called (in Japanese) the Nembutsu: Namu Amida Butsu, "Hail Amida Buddha."

Devotion to Amida in China goes back as far as the fourth century A.D. but, though adopted by some monasteries, has chiefly a lay character. In Japan, however, teachers such as Hōnen (1133–1212) and Shinran (1173–1262) made it the exclusive basis of powerful denominations with mass appeal. They taught (1) that Amida is really one with the universal Buddha nature, (2) that the Pure Land Buddhism of faith is really closer to the essence of Buddhism than the way of the ascetic because it is more ego-free, and (3) Shinran especially averred that since it is faith alone that counts, even one recitation of the Nembutsu by a sinner is sufficient for salvation. R.E.

PURGATORY. In Roman Catholic doctrine the state in which the souls of the dead suffer, through the pain of longing to see the beatific vision of God, until they are purged of unforgiven VENIAL SINS, or the punishment imposed by God for forgiven MORTAL SINS, so they may enter HEAVEN. In popular thought, this suffering involves fire, but this material element is not officially taught by the church and is vigorously denied by the Eastern Orthodox churches, who teach a form of purgatory, yet deny the fully developed Roman Catholic doctrine.

The Catholic faith is that souls in purgatory can be aided by the PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD as well as by the sacrifice of the Mass, hence funeral masses and masses said for the dead, especially on the anniversary of death. Popular piety also allows prayers for the dead in purgatory, requesting them to intercede with God on behalf of the living. All people are considered to go to purgatory on their death, unless they die in mortal sin, which causes their condemnation to hell. No one is considered so free of venial sin that he or she can be declared to go straight to heaven.

Perhaps nowhere is the difference between Catholics and Protestants so pronounced as in the matter of purgatory. Luther declared the whole doctrine and practice wrong, since it is not taught in Scripture. Calvin and the Anabaptists followed Luther in this rejection. Luther saw the whole system of prayers and masses for the dead, indulgences, and the stress on good works as the outgrowth of a doctrine of salvation by works rather than justification by faith alone in Christ through grace. There is no comparable doctrine concerning the souls of the dead in Protestantism. Luther gave his opinion that the souls may sleep until the final judgment. Prayers are not said for the dead in Protestant churches. Protestants in general will mention the dead in prayers only to commend the departed to God's grace and mercy and to give thanks for their lives and works among us. Lutherans and Anglicans commemorate the saints of the early church in their services. J.C.

PURIFICATION. See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

PURIM. The Jewish festival that commemorates the miracle of survival from Haman's plot to kill all the Jews of Persia. The story is told in the biblical book of ESTHER. Haman, chief minister of King Ahasuerus, plotted to destroy the Jews of Persia. Esther, the king's Jewish queen, at the urging of her older cousin Mordecai, interceded with Ahasuerus, who authorized the Jews to defend themselves on the day marked for their death. They routed their enemies, and celebrated the following day, the fourteenth of the Hebrew month, Adar. Purim means "lots," objects used in deciding a matter by chance, and refers to the lots Haman cast to determine the day for the destruction of the Jews. Purim is thus also called the Feast of Lots.

When the scroll of Esther is read in the synagogue on Purim, congregants make a lot of noise each time Haman is mentioned, thus "drowning out" his name. Other Purim customs are sending gifts to friends, giving food or money to the poor, the Purim feast, merrymaking, drinking, and Purim plays and carnivals. Purim is particularly popular in Israel. In Tel Aviv the festivities take the form of a three-day colorful carnival, called Adloyada. L.K.

PURITANS. Those within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in the 1560s who opposed the ELIZABETHAN SETTLEMENT and wished to further purify the church of all "popish" forms, particularly vestments, and to adhere strictly to the theology of CALVINISM. The Puritans also represented the rising gentry and market capitalism.

Their dissent surfaced again in reaction to the ceremonial uniformity stressed by WILLIAM LAUD, archbishop of Canterbury from 1633. When Laud tried to impose the Scottish Book of Common Prayer in 1637, the Scots responded with the National Covenant repudiating bishops, and with armed force. Charles I had to call the Long Parliament, which was under Puritan leadership. Laud was condemned and executed in 1645. In league with the Scots, Parliament in 1643 agreed to make the Church of England Presbyterian. It convened the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY, which drew up the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION, still the basis for Presbyterianism. (See PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.)

In the civil war between Royalist Cavaliers and Parliamentary Roundheads, OLIVER CROMWELL emerged. Charles I was executed as a traitor in 1649 after which Cromwell and the Puritans declared England a "Bible Commonwealth," with Cromwell as Lord Protector until his death in 1658. In 1660 Charles II restored the "middle way" of the Church of England. The Act of Uniformity (1662) forced two thousand Puritan ministers out of their churches, and Puritan chapels were illegal until the 1689 Act of Toleration.

Puritans were of many types. In the 1580s Separatist leaders were hanged or exiled to Holland (see SEPARATISM). In 1607 one congregation from Scrooby, England, fled to Holland and from there went to Plymouth Colony in 1620. Independents or Congregationalists and Baptists wanted no church hierarchy. Presbyterians favored that form of government. More radical were the democratic LEVELLERS, the agrarian communist Diggers, and the extremely millenarian Fifth Monarchy Men. From the SEEKERS, who awaited direct Spirit inspiration, emerged GEORGE FOX as leader of the QUAKERS, who rejected all external forms.

One estimate is that 85 percent of colonial American churches were Puritan in spirit. In New England they were CONGREGATIONALISTS, who divided into BAPTISTS (Separatists) and Unitarians (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION) after the First Great Awakening. Quakers settled in Pennsylvania, Presbyterians in the middle colonies, and loyalist Puritans in Virginia.

Puritans hailed the Bible as authority and source for patterns of worship and church polity. A personal conversion experience was requisite for church membership. Ministers were to preach the Word, administer the sacraments, and discipline church members. Puritans gave to America its cultural core: a sense of covenant with God, a millennial hope, a desire for pietistic perfection, a sense of individual piety, a belief in higher law, a commitment to freedom of conscience, and a belief in separation of church and state. PURUSA. From the Sanskrit word for "person." In Samkhya and YOGA philosophy, this term refers to the pure consciousness or "soul" principle awaiting liberation, in contrast to prakrti or "matter." In the VEDAS the word also names the creator God when conceived of in human form. R.E.

PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE (1800–82). Anglican theologian and leader of the OXFORD MOVEMENT, which is also known as Puseyism. Pusey was born August 22, and was educated at Eton and Christ Church College, Oxford (B.A. 1822, M.A. 1825). He was elected a fellow in 1823 at Oriel, where he met John Keble and John Henry Newman. He studied in Germany (1825–27) and then returned to become professor of Hebrew at Oxford in 1828, as well as canon at Christ Church. In 1828 he was ordained and married that same year Maria Catherine Barker.

To the Tracts of the Times he contributed one on fasting in 1834, three on baptism in 1835, and several on the Eucharist in 1836. His 1843 sermon "The Holy Eucharist: A Comfort to the Penitent," asserting the Real Presence, resulted in his being suspended from preaching for two years.

His publications included The Doctrine of the Real Presence (1855), The Real Presence (1857), The Minor Prophets (1860), and Daniel the Prophet (1864). He instituted the Oxford Library of the Fathers with a translation of Augustine's Confessions (1838). Pusey became the visible leader of the Oxford movement because of his defenses of it before bishops, and because he eventually became the only leader left at Oxford. Sympathizers were often called "Puseyites."

PYRRHONISM. The skeptical philosophy that originated with the Greek thinker Pyrrho of Elis (365–275 B.C.). Pyrrho left no writings, and the main source of his life and thought is Diogenes Laërtius' Lives of Eminent Philosophers.

Pyrrho's student, Timon of Phlius, and others insisted that Pyrrho neither engaged in speculation nor taught a body of doctrine. Rather, he offered a way of living, reflecting a radical indifference to the circumstances of life and the opinions of philosophers. The goal of philosophy was, for Pyrrho, happiness based on tranquility of mind. Timon summarized Pyrrhonism in terms of three questions to which Pyrrho gave clear answers. To the question "What is the nature of things?" Pyrrho answered that we cannot know, since we have only the mutually contradictory evidence of our sensations, the evidence of phenomena and not of things in themselves. To the question "What is our relation to phenomena around us?" Pyrrho again answered that we cannot know, that we should acknowledge our ignorance, and suspend all judgment. To the last question, "What will result from such a lack of comprehension and suspension of judgment?" Pyrrho answered, tranquility of mind and happiness. The term Pyrrhonism has come to mean a skeptical approach to thought and life.

PYTHAGOREANISM. A school of Greek philosophy named after its preeminent member, Pythagoras, an Ionian Greek, born in the sixth century B.C. Pythagoras was one of the most influential of the pre-Socratic philosophers. He founded a famous society in southern Italy, which continued in existence for over a century. It is difficult to distinguish the teachings of Pythagoras from those of his school, since he left no writings, because the society was sworn to secrecy, and the disciples, in esteem for their master, attributed their own ideas to him.

For the Pythagorean school, philosophy was a way of life devoted to the salvation of the soul. The society engaged in many dietary practices and other ascetic activity as a means of purification. The pursuit of knowledge, especially mathematics, which held a mystical significance, was seen as the highest form of purification. Pythagoras taught that by studying the cosmos, or the world's orderly perfection, one creates order in the soul. The Pythagoreans saw the nature and order of things in their mathematical structure. Things were observed to be made up of their numbers, just as other pre-Socratics saw the fundamental nature of things as water or fire. The ultimate principles were limit and the unlimited, which were equated with good and bad, respectively. There followed ten pairs of fundamental opposites, including right and left, male and female, and so forth. The universe was thus perceived as a harmony of opposites. The cosmos or order was achieved by the imposition limit, the number series, on the unlimited. The Pythagorean school made important contributions to arithmetic and geometry.

Qq

Q (QUELLE). Q symbolizes the hypothetical document(s) that many students of the NT believe is the "second source" drawn on by Matthew and Luke, in addition to the Gospel of Mark, in the composition of their Gospels. Q stands for Quelle, the German term for "well" or "source."

No such document has ever been found, but a close study of the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) discloses Matthew's and Luke's similar use of almost all of Mark (the "first source" for their Gospels), and a mutual dependence upon a second source in numerous other places. This unknown "second source" is known as Q, and also as the LOGIA or "sayings of Jesus." It is thought that Q might have been a handbook that recorded oral traditions about Jesus that originally circulated in Aramaic as well as Greek. Q may even have been a collection of Jesus' "wisdom" sayings, as it contains many of his discourses. J.C.

QARMATIANS. A radical, revolutionary Islamic sect that flourished in the Arab world between the ninth and eleventh centuries A.D. Secretive, based on the doctrines of the Ismaili movement within Shi'a Islam, it sought social reform and the creation of an ideal egalitarian society through revolution and force of arms. Qarmatians under Hamdan Qarmat, after whom the movement was named, seized power in a part of Iraq in A.D. 877, established strongholds through Arabia and North Africa, and ruled the Persian Gulf island of Bahrein from about A.D. 900 to 1077. Qarmatian ideas and practices have had an impact on subsequent Islamic history, particularly in later extremist Ismaili sects such as the Assassins and Druzes. R.E.

QUAKERS. See FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

QUARTODECIMANS. Those who disputed the date of EASTER in the early church, which was set by the Council of Nicaea in A.D. 325. There were a number of disputes about this complex computation of the proper day on which to observe the Festival of the Resurrection of our Lord. The Quartodecimans led the first dissent, teaching that Easter should be celebrated on the same day that the Jews observed Passover, the fourteenth of Nisan, on whatever day of the week that observance fell, even if it were not a Sunday. The Nicene fathers believed Easter should always be observed on a Sunday, since the Resurrection took place on the first day of the week. These dissenters took their name from quattuordecima, the Latin word for fourteen. Some churches observed Easter in this fashion even after the council's decision, but eventually Nicea prevailed. J.C.

al-QUDS. The Arabic name for Jerusalem. A city holy to Islam only after Mecca and Medina, its importance goes back to the Prophet Muhammad, who, seeing its role as a pilgrimage center for the other two monotheistic faiths, Judaism and Christianity, wished to associate Islam with it as well. According to Islamic tradition, the Prophet made a mystical ascent to heaven there from the Temple mount. Later the DOME OF THE ROCK mosque was built on that site. R.E.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN. See BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

QUIETISM. The term used for a movement in seventeenth-century Roman Catholicism, which is associated especially with Miguel de Molinos. Quietism taught a form of spirituality that called for extreme passivity of the soul and the suppression of all human effort. According to traditional Catholic spirituality, a certain passivity is necessary for the operation of the grace of God in the soul. However, this state of contemplativeness is reached by certain ascetical exercises and virtuous acts. The Quietists, on the contrary, rejected all ascetical and intellectual activity, as well as good works, regarding all attempts to do anything exemplary as an offense against God. They held that spiritual perfection requires the complete extinction of the will and claimed to care neither for heaven, hell, nor salvation but abandoned the soul completely to God. Devotional pictures and mental religious images were rejected, even contemplation of Christ and the Holy Trinity. They refused to engage in acts of mortification, confession, and petition. The Quietists taught that sin is impossible. Since the will is annihilated, all that one does is the work of God. Certain actions may be viewed as sinful, even devilish, by others, but they are not, and must not distract the Quietist's passivity.

In 1675 Molinos published his Spiritual Guide, which was at first highly approved but soon was recognized as leading to dangerous tendencies. In 1685 Molinos was arrested, and two years later Quietism was condemned as a heresy by Pope Innocent XI in his bull Coelestis Pastor. Sixty-eight of Molinos's writings were condemned. Notable exponents of Quietist spiritual tendencies were Madame GUYON and Fénelon, archbishop of Cambrai. Their teachings ignited the debate over semi-Quietism in the last years of the seventeenth century. Semi-Quietism was condemned by Pope Innocent XII in 1699. J.L.

QUIRINIUS. The Roman governor of the province of Syria, to which Judea was attached, during (according to Luke 2:2) the time of Jesus' birth. The governor, or propraetor, was known as "Cyrenius," and his full name was P. Sulpicius Quirinius. It is recorded that he traveled to Judea in A.D. 6 to hold a census and levy taxes. Scholars question Luke's accuracy because he also mentions that Herod the Great was on the throne, and Herod's death date was approximately 4 B.C. The census that supposedly took Joseph and Mary to Bethelhem from Nazareth is thus ten years after Herod's death. Some scholars believe there may have been an earlier census (about which we know nothing) and Luke confused the earlier census with the historically attested one of Quirinius in A.D. 6. It is known that Quirinius was in the area of Syria before becoming governor, during a war between 10 and 7 B.C. J.C.

QUMRAN. The local Arab name for the lower end of a valley down which a seasonal stream flows from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea is the Wadi Qumran. On a plateau overlooking this wadi, about ten miles south of Jericho and about a mile west of the Dead Sea, are the ruins of a fortress, built originally in the seventh or eighth century B.C. and converted into the headquarters for a religious community about 135 B.C. Abandoned temporarily in 31 B.C., it was restored about A.D. 1, and continued to be used until the Romans destroyed it in A.D. 68. In nearby caves were found the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. H.K.

QUODLIBET. This Latin word means "whatever you please." The term was used among the medieval scholastics for a special kind of disputation held at certain times of the year. The professor, instead of propounding for discussion a question of his own choosing, would offer to discuss any question proposed to him. J.M.

QUR'AN. The Arabic word meaning "recital." The sacred scripture of ISLAM, the Qur'an (sometimes spelled Koran) is comprised of 114 suras or chapters; the entire book is about the length of the Christian NT. The suras are arranged in approximate order of length, with the longest first.

The Qur'an is believed to have been delivered by God through the angel Gabriel to the Prophet MUHAMMAD over a period of more than twenty years. The revelations, beginning in a mountain cave around A.D. 610, came through several "modes"—in dreams, in waking deliverance by the angel, and in auditory experience. But in Muhammad's mind they were clearly distinct from any other divine inspiration, part of a unique message of which he was only the medium. In the original Arabic, the Qur'an is undeniably of intense poetic power; Muslims, pointing to the tradition that the Prophet was himself illiterate, say that its deliverance through such a person is itself a miracle, which indicates the book's uniqueness.

Suras of the Qur'an are classified as Meccan, Medinan, or combinations of both. This refers to whether they were received during the earlier ministry of the Prophet at Mecca, or the later at Medina, or assemble material from both periods. In general the Meccan suras—which, being shorter, tend actually to appear at the end of the volume—speak of God's power and judgment, presenting vivid eschatological passages, while the Medinan are more legislative, dealing with theological and practical concerns of the emerging Islamic community. But throughout all, the unvarying fundamental themes are apparent: absolute monotheism, the one God being creator of the world and humankind, controller of all destinies, judge of all at the End; God's appeals to humanity through a series of past prophets and in the signs of nature; and the supreme importance of submitting to God's will in all areas of life.

In Muslim belief, the Qur'an is itself the Word of God in the world, in a way that has been compared to Christian belief in Christ as the incarnation of the divine Logos. Not only does it contain God's message to humanity, but its very cadences recall people to God, are the basis of most Muslim prayer, and are said to reflect the actual personality or "style" of God in interaction with humankind. In addition, many assert, particularly in Sufi and Shi'a circles, that the Qur'an contains layer upon layer of hidden meanings. For ritual purposes the Qur'an is always recited in the original Arabic. It is held to be untranslatable; versions in other languages are at best paraphrases, which can hint at its verbal meaning but do not convey the divine power of the original.

RABANUS MAURUS (776–856). Archbishop of Mainz, student of ALCUIN, master of the monastic school in Fulda, and abbot of Fulda (822–842). An excellent scholar and a vigorous abbot, he greatly advanced the monastery until his election as archbishop in 842. He was active in criticizing heresy and in defending orthodox doctrine. He chaired three synods between 847 and 852, including one involving the theologian Gottschalk's doctrines on predestination, Rabanus Maurus was a prolific author, writing a work on grammar, sermons, a martyrology, poetry, and a manual for priests and monks dealing with the sacraments, fasts, and public prayer, called De institutione clericorum. He also wrote scriptural commentaries and essays on the church fathers. Later he was proclaimed "the teacher of the Germans." J.C.

RABBAH. A city of Judah, mentioned in Joshua 15:60, whose name means "great." The site of this ancient city has not been positively identified, but some scholars suggest it may have been the same as Beth-shemesh, the capital of Ammon, which is the modern Amman, capital of the Kingdom of Jordan, twenty-four miles east of the Jordan River, in Transjordan.

Beth-shemesh was captured by David (II Sam. 11:1, 12:26; I Chr. 20:1). The prophets Amos, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel condemned the city. Much later it was rebuilt by Ptolemy II and named Philadelphia. It was one of the cities of the Decapolis in NT times. Herod the Great captured the city in 30 B.C. The Romans completely rebuilt the city, demolishing all ancient remains. Only a few ruins of ancient times have been discovered, among them a late Bronze Age temple and some ruins of the old citadel. J.C.

RABBI. Jewish teacher, preacher, and spiritual leader. The office of rabbi was created in the Middle Ages, when the rabbi was the recognized leader of the community and the official JEWISH legal authority.

From the days of Joshua until the monarchy, the spiritual leaders were the elders, judges, and prophets. During the monarchy, the spiritual and religious authority was divided among the prophets, priests, scholars, and king. From Ezra until the destruction of the Second Temple, A.D. 70, the authority of the scholars increased, while the influence of the priests waned; prophecy had ceased. The term "rabbi" ("my master, my teacher") first came into general use at the end of the first century A.D. It was applied to scholars who had been ordained in Palestine, while the term "Rav" was applied to those in Babylonia. The rabbis of the Talmudic period did not accept any salary from the community, in accordance with the law that prohibits receiving any income or material benefit from the knowledge of the Torah. Thus a rabbi always had another occupation. The situation changed during the Middle Ages.

Formerly, the main duties of a rabbi lay in deciding legal questions in all branches of Jewish law, acting as a judge in civil and criminal cases, and supervising religious institutions. Until the nineteenth century, preaching was of secondary importance. Today the rabbi is a communal official, a congregational leader, whose duties include not only religious activities but also embrace educational, pastoral, social, and interfaith activities. Many rabbis have administrative positions with organizations, teach Judaic studies at universities, and engage in other non-pulpit occupations.

The three major rabbinical seminaries in the United States are the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary of Yeshiva University (Orthodox); the Jewish Theological Seminary of America (Conservative); and Hebrew Union College—Jewish Institute of Religion (Reform).

L.K.

RACA. A word of Aramaic derivation, with the meaning "fool," "wretch," and used as an expletive. The single NT usage is Matthew 5:22, which illustrates the force of this name-calling. A similar Hebrew word is used to imply a moral judgment, that is, a worthless person (Judg. 11:3; II Sam. 6:20).

R.M.

RACHEL. A woman from Haran who helped bring the nation of Israel into being. Ruth refers to Rachel and her sister LEAH as those who "built up the house of Israel" (4:11). It was from Rachel's two sons, Leah's six sons, and the four sons of their handmaids that the twelve tribes of Israel arose. Rachel's sons were: Joseph, Benjamin; Leah's: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun; their handmaids': Gad, Asher, Dan, Naphtali. Some scholars think it possible that there was a Rachel tribe or clan whose symbol was the ewe, the female lamb (the Hebrew word rachel means "ewe"). Such a symbol would have been a good representation of a nomadic group.

When Rachel was of marriageable age, her cousin Jacob came from Palestine to Mesopotamia seeking a wife from among her clan, as his father Isaac had done (Gen. 29:1-13). Rachel's father, Laban, arranged for Jacob to work for him seven years to earn the right to marry her. Seven years later, after the wedding ceremony, Jacob discovered that Laban had tricked him into marrying his older daughter Leah. Jacob then worked another seven years to earn Rachel.

Jeremiah pictures Rachel as weeping at the fate of her children (31:15). This could refer to the northern kingdom represented by Ephraim, Joseph's son, or to the male children two years old or under living in Bethlehem, Rachel's home area, who were ordered killed by King Herod after the wise men spoke of the birth of a new king (Matt. 2:16-18).

RACOVINIAN CATECHISM. An early confession of modern Unitarianism (as distinct from ancient Arianism), dating from 1605. It expresses the theology of Faustus SOCINUS, that the OT and NT are inspired, but revelation is received through human reason alone; Christ is not God although he is not merely a man, rather he was the chosen instrument of God to found Christianity, through which all may find eternal life. Since Jesus is not truly divine (for if he were, he could not have died on the cross), then the doctrine of the Holy Spirit cannot be true. Rather there is only one person in God, the Father. The son is but an instrument, a prophet, and a sacrifice for sin. The Holy Spirit is only the presence of God in the world. The doctrine of original sin is rejected and human beings are said to be born innocent. By the exercise of human reason one may live a godly life and merit eternal life. (See UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION.)

RAD, GERHARD VON. (1901–71). German OT scholar and theologian. At the beginning of the twentieth century, OT scholarship had reached a stalemate. The focus for many years had been on seeking the origins of the stories of the OT. Scholars had nearly exhausted the possibilities of discovering more layers of literary sources. Gerhard von Rad felt that the time had come to shift attention to exploring the meaning of the OT in its final form, to look at the OT as a whole and the Bible as a whole. After completing his theological studies in 1925, he began serving as a parish pastor. The growing anti-Semitism of his people, however, led him to request a leave of absence to study problems placed on the Christian church by the OT. Upon completing this further work he began teaching at Leipzig, then at Jena and Heidelberg.

Central to von Rad's work was his belief that three statements of God's saving deeds formed the core of Israel's faith:

Deuteronomy 26:5b-9—Wandering Aramean ancestors, after going down into bondage in Egypt, were brought out by the Lord God and led into a new land.

Deuteronomy 6:20-24—The Lord freed the people from Egypt.

Joshua 24:2b-13—God worked with Israel over the years, from Mesopotamia to Egypt to their own land.

Among von Rad's greatest contributions are his books, including Deuteronomy, Genesis, Holy War in Ancient Israel, Old Testament Theology (2 vols.), The Sacrifice of Abraham, and Wisdom in Israel.

RADHAKRISHNAN, SARVEPALLI (1888–1975). A distinguished modern Hindu, Radhakrishnan enjoyed a varied career as philosopher, educator, diplomat, and, from 1962 to 1967, president of India. His studies of the history of Indian philosophy are standard, and in such works as An Idealist View of Life he presents Advaita VEDANTA as a viable philosophical option for the modern world. R.E.

RADICAL REFORMATION. A term used to describe several of the movements that were an early part of the Protestant REFORMATION. Generally speaking, the term "Radical Reformation" is used in contrast to the "Magisterial Reformation" of Luther and Calvin.

One of the first of these movements was led by Andreas Bodenstein von CARLSTADT (or Karlstadt), an early colleague of Luther on the theological faculty at Wittenberg. While Luther was hiding at Wartburg Castle, Carlstadt made reforms on his own that went far beyond Luther's ideas, including the introduction of a vernacular mass, the discarding of vestments and images, and an extreme view of the priesthood of all believers. His anticlerical views led him to renounce his academic degrees and to dress as a peasant, wearing no shoes. He asked people to call him "Brother Andrew."

Carlstadt joined the fanatical group known as "the prophets of Zwickau" who conducted raids on churches and monasteries, claiming direct inspiration from God. THOMAS MÜNZER, one of the "prophets," was involved with the Peasants' Revolt (1524-25) that spread throughout southwestern Germany. This insurrection had no doubt been incited by long-standing oppression. Luther was appalled by the excesses of the revolt. Addressing both rulers and peasants, Luther reproached the former for oppressing the poor, and exhorted the latter to "be subject to the higher powers." When the revolt continued, Luther encouraged the nobility to stamp out the revolt. Münzer was one of those killed in the conflict.

In Zurich, where Zwingli was active in the Swiss Reformation, one of his more radical followers, Conrad Grebel, began to question infant baptism. The Anabaptist movement, so called because they rebaptized adults who had been baptized as infants, was born January 21, 1525, when Grebel baptized Georg Blaurock, who, in turn, baptized others, and a "gathered church" was inaugurated. Blaurock continued his ministry in the Tyrol.

There were numerous leaders in the Radical Reformation: Jacob Hutter, the leader of the HUTTERITES, one of the Anabaptist sects; Kaspar von Ossig SCHWENKFELD, the leader of a movement, still existing, known as the Schwenkfelders; Michael SERVETUS, of Spain, who was influenced by the Anabaptists but violently attacked the traditional views of the Trinity. Subsequently, he carried on a pamphlet war with John Calvin, who was to bear the burden forever, rightly or wrongly, of causing Servetus to be burned at the stake for heresy.

The MENNONITES, who developed in the Netherlands and northeast Germany, are the surviving descendants of the Anabaptist movement. The leader of the Mennonites was a Dutch Roman Catholic priest named Menno Simons who joined the Anabaptists in 1536. R.H.

RAHAB. The woman of faith who saved the lives of the two men sent by Joshua to spy out Jericho.

JOSHUA sent two men secretly to see what the land was like that they were about to enter and take (Josh. 2:1). They lodged that night at the house of Rahab, a harlot. When the king of Jericho heard that spies had entered the city, he ordered a search. Rahab then hid the men in the piles of flax drying on her roof. When the search party arrived, she told them that the men had left. Being a person of faith, Rahab said to the spies of Joshua, "I know that the Lord has given you the land. . . . We have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea . . . and what you did to the two kings of the Amorites. . . . The Lord your God is he who is God in heaven above and on earth beneath." She asked the men to promise to protect her family when they attacked the city, and they agreed. She then let them down by a rope through her window, which opened onto the city wall. Later when the city was attacked by the Israelites, she hung a scarlet cord in her window, and her family was spared (Josh. 6:17, 22-25).

The same Rahab may have been the mother of Boaz, the ancestor of Jesus (Matt. 1:5). Rahab is cited as a person whose faith resulted in good works (James 2:25-26 and Heb. 11:31). B.J.

RAHNER, KARL. (1904-84). One of this century's most important theologians and widely considered the most influential Catholic theologian of the middle decades of the century. Rahner was born in Freiburg im Breisgau in Germany. He entered the novitiate of the north German province of the Society of Jesus in 1922. Three years earlier his brother Hugo, a noted theologian, had entered the same novitiate. Rahner pursued philosophical studies at Feldkirch and at Pullach, near Munich, focusing especially on Immanuel Kant and the Catholic philosopher Joseph Marichal, S.J., the father of the Neo-Thomist school known as Transcendental Thomism. This initiated Rahner's sustained effort to reconcile Thomistic epistemology and metaphysics with Kant's critical philosophy.

Rahner contends that God is not merely a regulative idea of pure reason, as Kant thought, but that a transcendental reflection on human knowledge will show God's existence to be an a priori necessary condition of any speculative judgment. Neo-Thomists such as Etienne Gilson, however, consider Rahner's transcendental method a dangerous concession to Kantianism. After a two-year period of practical experience as a Latin teacher, Rahner was sent to Valkenburg, Holland, where he studied theology between 1929 and 1933. In 1934 his superiors sent him to Freiburg for further philosophical training, and there he studied with Martin Heidegger. This initiated a new dialogue with German idealism, especially Hegel, and with Heidegger. Rahner's doctoral dissertation on Thomas Aquinas and theological anthropology was refused by his mentor at Freiburg, Martin Honecker, who opposed Transcendental Thomism. However, Rahner was transferred to Innsbruck, where he completed his doctorate in theology in 1936. His Freiburg dissertation was published in 1939 as Spirit in the World (Eng. trans. 1968). A second important study, on the foundations of a philosophy of religion, entitled Hearers of the Word, was published in 1941 (Eng. trans. 1969). Rahner began his teaching career at the Jesuit theological faculty at Innsbruck in 1938. The faculty was suppressed by the Nazis in 1939, and until 1944 Rahner was largely occupied in pastoral work in Vienna. After the war he resumed his teaching, first at Pullach and then at Innsbruck in 1948. He was appointed to a chair at Munich in 1964 and later taught at the University of Münster.

Rahner was a prolific writer. While his theology is highly coherent, based on a carefully worked out theological anthropology, his practice of presenting his work in short articles and monographs and his prodigious output have not made his work easily accessible or comprehensible beyond the circle of professional theologians. His most important studies have appeared, since 1954, in a series of large volumes of Theological Investigations. The range of subjects is extremely wide, including not only creative interpretations of anthropology, the Trinity, Christology, grace, ecclesiology, tradition, and development of dogma, but also ascetical theology and spirituality, moral theology, pastoral theology and practice, and ecumenism. Rahner played an important role in the sessions of the VATICAN COUNCIL II (1962–65) as a consultant and theological adviser. He also served as author or editor of a number of important theological source-books and encyclopedias, including a later edition of Denzinger's Enchiridion Symbolicum, the multi-volume Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, the series of monographs, Quaestiones Disputatae, and Sacramentum Mundi (6 vols.). Rahner was also instrumental in inaugurating the international theological review, Concilium (1965– ). Rahner's contribution to the advancement of Catholic thinking in the fields of dogmatics, ecclesiology, and moral and practical theology is unique among theologians of the past quarter-century.

The major criticisms of his work tend to focus on ambiguities and difficulties in reconciling his transcendental method and his dependence on Kant and Hegel with traditional Catholic, and especially Thomistic, philosophy and theology. While his many writings initially give the appearance of being themselves rather traditionalist, Rahner's doctrine of God, his teaching regarding "anonymous Christianity," and his advocacy of theological pluralism in the Catholic Church, to mention only a few themes, are often considered progressive and even revolutionary.

RAIKES, ROBERT (1735–1811). Founder of the Sunday school. He was born September 14 in Gloucester, England, to the daughter of the Reverend R. Drew and a printer named Robert Raikes. He inherited his father's newspaper, the Gloucester Journal, and published it until his retirement in 1802. His philanthropic work began with prison reform and concern for the sick. Then noticing that children were unsupervised on Sundays, Raikes hired women to teach them reading and the catechism. After the first school opened in July 1780, the concept spread rapidly in Britain and the United States. In 1785 the Sunday School Society was formed, and in 1803 the Sunday School Union was organized in England.

RAINBOW. A colorful bow, visible to a person facing away from the sun, produced by the refraction and reflection of sunlight by falling rain. Since it is often seen against the cloud mass of a retreating thunderstorm, the rainbow has become a symbol of a storm that is past. It is like a bow that the Lord has set aside after shooting arrows of lightning (Lam. 2:4; Hab. 3:9-11). As such it becomes a sign of the covenant that God will never again let a flood destroy all flesh (Gen. 9:8-17). Appreciated for its beauty, the rainbow appears in descriptions of the heavenly city (Ezek. 1:28). John saw a throne in heaven surrounded by a rainbow that shown like an emerald (Rev. 4:3; 10:1). The Hebrew word for "bow" can refer to a rainbow, to a bow used with arrows, and possibly to masculine vigor (Gen. 49:22-25). B.J.

RAMABAI, PANDITA (1858–1922). An important early leader among women of India and for the Christian cause in her country. Born of Brahmin parents, she was taught Sanskrit and the wisdom of the Hindus by her father, contrary to the custom of India. Later she married a Bengali lawyer and lived in Calcutta. After a short marriage, she was left a widow with a small child. She then began studying Christianity and was baptized on a trip to England. Her life was spent in helping to raise the status of women in India, especially young widows who by tradition were not allowed to remarry. She started a school to educate women, which met with much opposition. India's learned men gave her the title "Pandita" ("the learned one"), which had not been given to a woman before that time. RAMADAN. In Islam, the ninth month of the lunar calendar, and the month of fasting, when Muslims are to abstain from food and drink between sunrise and sunset. This fast is one of the Five PILLARS, or fundamental obligations, of the faith, and is also customarily a time of special religious study and devotion. R.E.

- RAMAH. Several cities carry this name.
- (1) A border town in the northern tribe of Asher near Tyre. This may be the same as modern Ramia, eleven miles east of Ras en-Naqura.
  - (2) A town in the tribe of Naphtali, modern er-Rameh, fifteen miles west of Safed. The ancient site may be located beneath the highest point of the modern village.
  - (3) A town in the tribe of Benjamin, near the frontier between Israel and Judah, a few miles north of Jerusalem.
  - (4) A town in the tribe of Ephraim, perhaps the modern Rentis, nine miles northeast of Lydda on the west slope of the hill country.
  - (5) A town in the Negeb, the desert on the southern border of Palestine. Sometimes this Ramah was referred to as "Ramah of the South."
  - (6) The town of Ramoth-gilead in the land to the east of the River Jordan. B.J.

RAMAKRISHNA (1834–86). Ramakrishna is widely recognized as one of the greatest and perhaps the most influential of the saintly spiritual personalities of modern HINDUISM. Not only an exemplar of the life of the traditional "holy man," Ramakrishna also dealt experientially with religious pluralism, a problem felt acutely in the modern world, and inspired the foundation of an order that has had a unique role in Hindu modernization in India and in introducing that tradition to the West.

Born the son of a poor Brahmin in a Bengali village, he went as a young man with his brother to serve a temple of Kali near Calcutta. An essentially simple and deeply mystical spirit, Ramakrishna was wholly oriented toward religious experience rather than learning. He maintained a profound devotion toward Kali, the Great Mother, and frequently went into samadhic trance. He was initiated into several Hindu paths—Saiva, Vaisnava, Tantric, Advaita—and undertook the experimental practice of Islam and Christianity as well. He became convinced that all led to the same ultimate goal of God-realization. The Ramakrishna Mission, which has done teaching and charitable work in India and the West, was founded by Swami Vivekananda and other of his disciples. R.E.

RAMANUJA. The most important Hindu theologian and philosopher in the Bhakti tradition, Ramanuja rejected the radical nondualism (Advaita) of SAMKARA in favor of a "modified nondualism," which allowed for a personal God and a definite distinction between God and humanity, thus permitting the loving, personal devotion to God central to Bhakti.

Ramanuja's exact dates are a subject of controversy, but it is clear that he did his major work in south India during the twelfth century A.D. A strict adherent of VAISNAVISM, he argued in commentaries on the Upanishads, the Bhagavad Gita, and the Brahma sutras that their right interpretation shows BRAHMAN, or God, to be, not impersonal and objectless consciousness, but personal, aware, and eternal, ruler and redeemer of all selves. R.E.

RAMAYANA. Together with the MAHABHARATA, one of the two great epic poems of Hindu India. The two combined comprise 200,000 lines. The Ramayana is shorter than the other work (48,000 lines), and, unlike it, tells a straightforward story centered on a single character, Rama, a reincarnation of VISHNU. Born as a prince, Rama married the beautiful Sita, traditionally regarded as the ideal of Indian womanhood. But owing to intrigue, Rama is banished and retires to a forest with Sita and his half brother, Laksmana. There Sita is abducted by Ravana, the demon-king of Sri Lanka (Ceylon). To rescue her, Rama makes an alliance with the king of the monkeys. After many adventures, assisted by monkey soldiers and especially their great hero Hanuman, Ravana is vanquished. Rama and Sita return to their capital at Ayodhya, where Rama gains the throne. But because people question the chastity of Sita, since she had dwelt with Ravana, Rama sends her away. She returns with a sage who attests for her, and she asks the earth itself to take her as proof of her virtue; the earth opens and the queen sinks into it on a golden throne. Saddened, Rama leaves the kingdom to his sons and goes to the realm of the gods.

In the earliest version of the Ramayana, that of Valmiki, about A.D. 300, Rama is merely a human prince. Later versions make him an avatar of Vishnu, the epic becoming a major force on behalf of Vaisnavism and BHAKTI. The principals, especially Hanuman and Sita, are characterized by utter loving devotion to the divine Rama, and he plays the avatic role of defeating demonic evil and restoring dharma. Told and retold, known by almost everyone in some form, the Ramayana has been a very influential component of Indian popular culture for centuries. It has been just as influential in Buddhist and Islamic southeast Asia as popular literature. R.E.

RAMCARITMANAS. A literary version of the RAMAYANA, written about 1574 in a Hindi dialect by the great poet Tulsi Das (1532–1623). It emphasizes devotion to Rama as God and makes the chief characters ideals of their social roles. R.E.

RAMESES. The royal residence city in the Egyptian Delta about 1300–1100 B.C., often occupied by kings named Ramses. During their bondage in Egypt, the people of Israel helped build the storage cities of Pithom and Raamses (Exod. 1:11). It was from the residence city of Rameses that they began the Exodus (Exod. 12:37). B.J.

RAMOTH-GILEAD. An important fortress city in Gilead, east of the River Jordan in the tribe of Gad, often referred to simply as Ramah. It was one of the three CITIES OF REFUGE in east Palestine. Tell er-Ramith on the Wadi Shomer may mark the ancient site. B.J.

RANK, OTTO (1884–1939). Internationally known psychologist and author. Rank was associated with SIGMUND FREUD for twenty years but broke with Freud because of his own interests in the conscious mind, as opposed to Freud's psychoanalytic interest in conflicts within the subconscious. Rank, after 1925, called his technique "will therapy" and sought to help his patients reconcile their wills with the environment. Rank received his Ph.D. from the University of Vienna. From 1912 to 1924 he edited two leading European psychoanalytical journals. He founded the International Psychoanalytic Institute in Vienna in 1912 and served as its director until 1924. J.C.

RANKIN, JEREMIAH EAMES (1828–1904). Congregational minister, educator, and hymn writer. Rankin was born January 2 in Thornton, New Hampshire. After his graduation from Middlebury College in Vermont, he attended Andover Theological Seminary. After graduation he was ordained to the ministry in the Congregational Church. He served congregations in New York, Vermont, and Massachusetts, after which he was called to the First Congregational Church, Washington, D. C. He subsequently was pastor of the Valley Congregational Church, and president of Howard University. Rankin featured gospel singing in his Sunday evening services. He wrote a number of hymns, including "God Be With You Till We Meet Again," published in Gospel Bells (1883), which he and others edited. Earlier he had compiled a book of gospel songs entitled the Gospel Temperance Hymnal (1878). Some of his original hymns, including, "Laboring and Heavy Laden," appeared in Songs of the New Life. RANTERS. A term of derision applied to lay preachers of the antinomian and pantheistic type during the great sectarian upheavals during the English Commonwealth of the mid-seventeenth century. They rejected the Church of England and stressed the INNER LIGHT, considering themselves above the ordinary distinctions between right and wrong. J.C.

RAPP, GEORGE (1757–1847). The founder of the Harmony Society was born November 1 in Württemberg, in what is now West Germany, to Hans Adam and Rosine Berger Rapp. A devout student of the Bible, the Pietists, the mystics, and Emanuel Swedenborg, Rapp led a group of Separatists to Harmony, Butler County, Pennsylvania, where they organized the Harmony Society (1805). Its beliefs were a combination of Lutheran Pietism overlaid with millenarianism. From 1807 they practiced celibacy. From 1814 to 1824 they lived in New Harmony, Indiana, until that land was sold to Robert Owen. Rapp died in a third settlement, at Economy, Pennsylvania. N.H.

RAS SHAMRA. See UGARIT.

RASTAFARI MOVEMENT. A politico-religious movement that originated among Jamaican blacks in 1930. Their belief is that blacks are the true heirs of biblical Israel, and that Ras (Prince) Tafari, crowned as Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia in the year of the movement's founding, would be their messiah who would repatriate blacks back to Africa. Rastafari has roots in several earlier black prophetic and repatriation movements. The movement is distinguished by its puritanical ethic, its black separatism, its distinctive hairstyle ("dreadlocks"), its religious use of "ganja" or cannabis, and its association with the music known as "reggae." In the 1960s a division began to appear between those Rastafarians who held to the earlier mystical religion and those who were more interested in using the movement as the basis of black social and political action. Rastafari has branches in England, North America, and several Caribbean islands. R.E.

RATIONAL-EMOTIVE THERAPY. An approach to psychological counseling developed by Albert Ellis in the 1960s and practiced through his Institute for Rational Living.

It is based on the thesis that neurotic fears, angers, and depression may be caused by events, but essentially are the result of how people think about these events. People have been in situations of great danger, yet maintained courage. Others are crushed by similar situations. This attitude prevents people from fulfilling their potential.

If the situation cannot be changed, the solution is to help the person view it differently. The patient is encouraged to think rationally about possible meanings in the situation. This brings a non-emotional factor into play to view the situation more objectively. As the person learns to accept a less defensive and subjective interpretation, the result becomes different. The situation can be dealt with from a new perspective and potentially with more positive effect. It is acknowledged that some feelings arise from unconscious factors going back to childhood and require deeper therapy. I.C.

RATIONALISM. A term (from the Latin word ratio, "reason") that has been used in reference to a variety of movements in Western philosophy and theology. The word signifies that reason, rather than experience, tradition, or authority, is the final arbiter in matters of knowledge and truth. Rationalism is often contrasted with empiricism, the latter basing knowledge on experience and observation, the former on innate ideas or A PRIORI categories possessed by the mind. Classical philosophical rationalism is associated with certain philosophers of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, particularly DESCARTES, SPINOZA, and LEIBNITZ. These thinkers shared the belief that genuine knowledge is derived from what Descartes called the clear and distinct perceptions of the intellect, and that God is the ultimate guarantor of the possibility of such knowledge.

Philosophical rationalism profoundly influenced Protestant theology in the first half of the eighteenth century, largely through the influence of Christian von Wolff (1679–1754), a follower of Leibnitz. Pursuing the model of mathematics, Wolff developed his theological system deductively from a few simple, self-evident truths. The world mirrors God's perfection, and God's perfect image is found in human reason. Our natural knowledge of God cannot, therefore, be contradicted by revelation. In Germany the tradition of Wolffian rationalism led directly to the critical rationalism of IMMANUEL KANT and is reflected in his Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone (1794).

The term "rationalism" is often associated with the ENLIGHTENMENT and its critique of orthodox Christianity, especially in DEISM. However, the English Deists and the Frenchman VOLTAIRE, in their commitment to the principle of criticism, were influenced not by Descartes but by JOHN LOCKE and the empiricist tradition. They were "rationalists" only in the sense that they appealed to experience and scientific inquiry, rather than to faith and authority, and in their confidence in human nature to increase freedom and human happiness. The rationalists of the seventeenth century were not characteristically anti-religious; in fact, God is the crux of the systems of Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibnitz. On the other hand, the rationalism of the eighteenth century was often, in figures such as Holbach, Helvetius, Reimarus, and Tom Paine, atheist or at least antagonistic to all forms of orthodoxy.

In the nineteenth century the term "rationalism" was used loosely to signify a general commitment to reason as the ultimate arbiter of truth. Again, it often is used to describe the position of those who attacked Christian theology. J.L.

RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER (1861–1918). American theologian who was one of the leading exponents of the SOCIAL GOSPEL. Among his writings were Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907) and A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917). In the former of these books, he advocated an alliance between the churches and the working class and expressed the view that Christianity is committed to a socialist solution to the problems of industrial society. The purpose of Christianity is to transform this world into the Kingdom of God, conceived as an ideal society. In the second of the books mentioned, he set out to rewrite Christian theology, making the doctrine of the Kingdom of God central and interpreting all the other doctrines so that they articulate organically with the central truth. But Rauschenbusch did not think that he was reducing Christianity to a mere political ideology. "The kingdom of God is divine in its origin, progress, and consummation. It is miraculous all the way, and is the continuous revelation of the power, the righteousness, and the love of God." To make this doctrine central, he held, is simply to return to Jesus' own way of looking at things. J.M.

RE/RA. Egyptian god associated with the sun who came to have marked preeminence over all the other gods. Frequently represented as a falcon-headed figure topped by the solar disk in his boat, or sometimes by the solar disk alone, Re was said to cross the sky in a solar ship every day, then to make his way during the night back through the underworld to the East. In the course of this journey he had to defeat an evil demon, Apepi. By the Fifth Dynasty (2494–2345 B.C.), Re was the chief god worshipped by the pharaohs, the ruler being considered both a descendant of Re and Re incarnate. Still later, Re was joined with the deity of the temple city of Thebes, Amon, to form the composite creator and sovereign god AMON-RE. R.E.

REAGAN, RONALD WILSON (1911- ) Fortieth president of the United States; former governor of California; former motion picture actor. Born on February 6 to John Edward Reagan and Nellie Wilson Reagan in Tampico, Illinois, he grew up in a succession of northern Illinois towns where his father was employed as a shoe salesman. Ronald did not become a Roman Catholic like his father, but was reared in his mother's faith, the Christian church (Disciples of Christ). When he was nine, the family settled in Dixon, Illinois, where Ronald attended high school and played football and basketball, and was elected president of the student body. There he gained his first acting experience in school plays. He next entered Eureka (Ill.) College, graduating in 1932. After leaving college he became a sports announcer on a Des Moines (Ia.) radio station.

The future president began a successful career as a film actor in 1937 and starred in a number of movies. He was a captain in the Army Air Force during World War II. He later acted in television, appearing regularly until the 1960s. He served as president of the Screen Actors Guild from 1947 to 1952 and again in 1959. Starting out as a liberal Democrat, Reagan switched his party allegiance and became active in the 1964 presidential campaign of Barry Goldwater. Reagan was elected governor of California in 1966 and reelected in 1970. It was after his second term as governor of California that Ronald Reagan became a leading voice of conservative Republicanism, and made a strong bid for the party's 1976 presidential nomination. In 1980 he gained the Republican nomination and won the presidency by a landslide victory over Jimmy Carter.

Once in the White House he followed what he regarded as his mandate for radical change, seeking to end the excessive growth of government bureaucracy, and reducing government spending. Early in his first term he forged a coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats to enact his economic program, which included the largest budget and tax cuts in United States history. His "new federalism" sought to transfer many federal powers to the states. Yet he increased defense spending, vowing that he would restore the armed forces to their pristine strength.

John W. Hinckley, Jr. attempted to assassinate the president on March 30, 1981. Reagan recovered from his bullet wounds, with a renewed sense of his place in history. His opposition to the Equal Rights Amendment, his pro-government policies in El Salvador, as well as his anti-Sandinista program in Nicaragua, and his efforts to bring peace to the Middle East, especially in Lebanon, aroused bitter criticism.

The president maintained his program, supported heavily by the religious right, opposing abortion, and advocating prayer in public schools and tax relief for families with children in private schools. His long campaign for reelection ended triumphantly when Ronald Reagan was again swept into office for a second term in November 1984, losing only the electoral votes of Minnesota and the District of Columbia. REALISM. An assertion of the independence of an object from human perception. Realists believe that there is a reality of things, qualities, or species. Kant used the phrase "thing-in-itself" to denote this quality of inner reality. The realist affirms that the object perceived has an ontological quality and is not simply an ideal or an appearance, as idealists assert. It is more than a name, as the nominalist asserts, and more than a mental concept, as the conceptualist asserts.

Realism has its roots in ARISTOTLE, whose work was the basis for medieval scholastic philosophy. DESCARTES in the eighteenth century, another realist, affirmed "I think, therefore I am." JOHN LOCKE affirmed that sensations have their origins outside the person who feels. Despite the popularity of IDEALISM during much of the nineteenth century, there was a resurgence of interest in realism (or empiricism) with the work of WILLIAM JAMES. PRAGMATISM deals with the concept of reality versus cognition. The neo-realistic position was a defense of the independent existence of things. Realism is one of the basic strands of what has been called the "perennial philosophy." I.C.

REALITY THERAPY. A treatment developed by William Glasser and G. L. Harrington as an alternative to Freudian-based psychotherapy. Rejecting traditional labels, Glasser substitutes "responsible behavior" for the term "mental health," and "irresponsible behavior" for "mental illness." Although unconscious factors exist, these are not important for the therapeutic process. The past is irrelevant for developing new behavior patterns.

People have two basic needs: to love and to be loved; to have a sense of self-worth and feel that others value them. People love and value those who act responsibly. In this way they fulfill their needs without harming others. Such persons know right from wrong and maintain a standard of behavior consonant with that knowledge. This requires a realistic estimate of the self and a will to self-correction. Normal people know the ethical standards of the society; their need is to learn how to live up to these standards.

Discomfort at not feeling loved or valued may be met in irresponsible ways that hurt others. People who act irresponsibly need a relationship to someone who cares in order that they may become concerned and involved in a process of change. The therapist, by accepting the patient while rejecting the wrong behavior, encourages responsible ways of acting. At the beginning, the patient may deny or evade the behavior or blame the problem on other people. The goal of therapy is to help the person view the self realistically in order to act responsibly.

The process of responsible living can begin in early childhood through responsible parents and teachers who insist on responsible action from children through a process of loving discipline. I.C.

REALIZED ESCHATOLOGY. See DODD, CHARLES H.

REAL PRESENCE. The way in which Christ is understood to be present in the EUCHARIST. The Council of Trent affirmed that Christ is "really, truly, and substantially" present in the Eucharist, that is, the bread and wine actually become the Body and Blood of Christ. This doctrine, called TRANSUBSTANTIATION, is affirmed to continue the tradition found in the ante-Nicene fathers. It also reflects the categories of medieval philosophy, where "substance" designates a reality and "accidents" designate appearances. Hence, after the words of consecration, the bread still appears to be bread but in reality it is transformed into the Body of Christ, an actuality perceived only by faith.

The Reformers rejected this view. Calvin taught that the life-giving power of Christ is present in the Eucharist to those who receive in faith. Luther affirmed CONSUBSTANTIATION—the substance of the Body and Blood of Christ is in, with, and under the bread and wine in a "sacramental" union. Zwingli viewed the Lord's Supper as a "sign" of the presence of Christ without sacramental signification. Anglicans affirm a doctrine of the Real Presence but leave open the way in which this is effected. The division is between those who affirmed "real" to mean the natural (but transformed) Body of Christ, and those who use words such as "in," "under," or "through" to indicate how the Real Presence is known by faith to the believer. I.C.

REASON. See RATIONALISM.

REBEKAH. A woman of faith who became the mother of Jacob and Esau. When ISAAC reached the age to marry, his father, Abraham, sent a servant to Mesopotamia to find him a wife from among the relatives there who were faithful to the living God (Gen. 24). The servant prayed to the Lord to make known to him which woman this should be. And, as he had asked, a young woman came to the well and offered him water. Rebekah and her family agreed that she should return with the servant. She married Isaac, and, after twenty years of marriage, finally gave birth to Jacob and Esau. When Isaac became old and about to die, he asked his son Esau to go hunting and prepare some savory food for him so that he could bless him before he died (27:1-4). After Esau went out, Rebekah instructed Jacob to go out to the flock and get two kids to prepare that he might receive the blessing instead. She then dressed Jacob in his brother's best clothes and put the skins of kids over his arms. When Jacob then received the blessing, Esau became so angry that Rebekah sent Jacob to her family home in Mesopotamia. There Jacob met Rachel, and after fourteen years of work, married her (29:1-20). RECAPITULATION. From the Greek verb used in Ephesians 1:10 ("to unite [anakephalaioó] all things in him"), Christian theology has taken the cue that Christ's cosmic work is to sum up all the disparate elements of the universe into a single whole. In the context of Ephesians the argument seems to run in response to a philosophical question current in the first century. The issue lay in attempting to reconcile the "many" and the "one." Greek philosophers knew that there were many objects of sense-perception in the universe. They strove to seek behind the variety of phenomena the key to all in "the one," a principle of unity. This verse in Ephesians offers the NT answer to this quest. It is in the cosmic Christ.

The term has thus become part of a Christian philosophy of history that seeks to integrate the many facets of human existence and experience into a harmonious end-result, an omega point, as Teilhard de Chardin calls it. The patristic writer who laid the foundation for this notion was Irenaeus. His entire soteriology hinges on his statement that the incarnate Christ "recapitulated" Adam's career as man in order to bring the divine life to humankind. Christ, as the SECOND ADAM, came into human life to repair the consequences of Adam's sinful disobedience (see Rom. 5:12-21) and to restore man to union with his creator. R.M.

RECEIVED TEXT. A phrase directly taken from Erasmus' edition of the Greek NT in 1533, which contained the Latin words: "Textum . . . receptum"; "The text which [the reader] thus has is now accepted by everyone." The term Textus Receptus refers to the standard edition of the text of the Bible of its day and was the basis of the KJV/AV translation of 1611. (See BIBLE, TEXT OF.) R.M.

RECHABITES. A group that lived a simple life-style in a rural setting, possibly as a protest against the lack of faith they saw in the cities. They may have been metallurgists or smiths who moved from place to place to find ore and work it (I Chr. 2:55). B.J.

RECONCILIATION. A theological term to denote one aspect of Christ's work in restoring good relations between God and humankind. He is called "our peace, who . . . might reconcile us both to God in one body through the cross, thereby bringing the hostility to an end" (Eph. 2:14-16)—a characteristic

NT statement (it is not an OT word) that includes several elements of the early Christian teaching. First, reconciliation presupposes an ALIENATION between God and humanity, which has a twofold dimension. On God's part, since God is holy, God is distanced from humanity, which is both creaturely finite and morally unfit to be in fellowship with the Creator. On humanity's side, the enmity gives rise to feelings of guilt and bereftness, leading to suspicion and hostility. Second, the initiative in securing reconciliation lies with God, who is always said to be the prime mover and never the one needing reconciliation (II Cor. 5:18-21; Rom. 5:1-10). Yet the cost is great since the process is not easily achieved and God's way of "making peace" entailed both God's own self-giving in Christ and God's absorbing human ESTRANGEMENT in an act of identification and vicarious ATONEMENT. The focus of that "at-one-ment" is the cross, where Jesus' self-sacrifice marks the limit of divine determination to be at one with God's erring creation (Col. 1:20-22). Third, reconciliation has cosmic aspects (notably in Col. 1:15-20), but it is best interpreted as a restoration of personal relations which, once established, need to be worked out in daily living and on a human level (see Matt. 5:24; I Cor. 7:11).

One further dimension of the word is seen in Ephesians 2:11-22. Here the situation described is one of mutual hostility dividing Jews and Gentiles in the ancient world. The enmity was mutual. The Jews regarded themselves as a race apart, by their election and destiny as God's people. The Gentiles despised the Jews for their aloofness and strange customs. Now, the text declares, in the Christian message there is hope to reconcile these alienated factions as they are brought into fellowship with God through Christ and so united in the "one body" of the church. Reconciliation is eminently fitted to be a vehicle of communicating the Christian message in our day for the reasons implied above. (See also REDEMPTION; REGENERATION.)

RECONSTRUCTIONIST JUDAISM. See JUDAISM, HISTORY OF.

RECTOR. From the Latin word meaning "a ruler." In the Roman Catholic church a priest legally appointed as the head of a parish, church, or other ecclesiastical organization, such as a university. A priest may not be the rector of more than one parish at the same time. The term is also used in the Church of England and the Episcopal Church.

J. C.

RECUSANCY. The resistance to Anglican church attendance laws from the reign of ELIZABETH I to George III. Recusants were chiefly Roman Catholics, but a few dissenting Protestants were also prosecuted. The law held that all people must attend the Church of England, and was specifically aimed at "papists," or Roman Catholics. Conviction of recusancy brought large fines, disqualification from public office and from bringing suits at law or acting as a guardian, practicing law, or holding a military commission. Finally, three months after conviction, recusants were to renounce the supremacy of the pope over the Church of England, or failing that, to leave England as exiles. The laws against recusancy were not always enforced, but in the earlier reigns of Protestant monarchs, many martyrs were made among Catholics. The practice of holding secret masses, and of hiding priests, was common among the Catholic gentry and nobility. The secret hiding places, called "priest's holes," can still be seen in some old English country houses.

J. C.

REDACTION CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

REDEMPTION. The basic meaning of redemption is "deliverance," with a setting determined by the context in which the word is used. In the OT there are three special areas of interest. First, prisoners in captivity were set free by payment of a ransom or an act of clemency on the part of the ruling authority, as the exiles were restored by Cyrus' decree (Ezra 1; a return celebrated in Second Isaiah's writings, for example, Isa. 45:1-25; 52:3, where Cyrus is the agent of the release of the Babylonian exiles, but God is the redeemer). Second, slaves were liberated by a procedure that entailed the notional payment of money to the Temple or, in Greco-Roman religion, the depositing of money in a sanctuary (notably at Delphi) for the owner to claim. Paul exploits this act of "sacred manumission" in Galatians 4:1-5:1; 6:17, to explain how Christians, in bondage to evil powers, have been ransomed and redeemed (I Cor. 1:30). Third, the most important background, however, is seen in the OT imagery of the Passover, which lies at the heart of Israel's celebration of its national redemption from Egyptian servitude to become the free people of God's covenant. One verse (Exod. 8:23, RSV marg.) neatly sums up the basic Hebrew thought of this episode. Yahweh says "I will set redemption" between Jews and Egyptians, thus claiming Israel as God's own possession. So they are bound to God by covenant obligation and treaty (Exod. 12-24).

The NT writers pick up this idea repeatedly. The wide range of literature on this subject in the NT, with variant idioms and set against diverse backgrounds, is in fact unified by its common indebtedness to the theme of redemption. It sees in Christ's coming and death the action of God to release people from slavery to SIN and to create them as a new covenant community, in succession to old Israel who rejoiced in God as their redeemer from alien political powers and tyranny. The NT, however, goes beneath the outer forms to describe the power of evil from which God in Christ has redeemed creation, as Revelation 21:22, heralds a new world of freedom of humanity's spiritual oppressions (Rev. 21:4; 22:3). The nation of humanity's alienation and enslavement, in the NT, is much more in terms of separation from God (Eph. 2:1; 4:18) and estrangement by reason of sin (see Rom. 6, 7; Col. 1:21). Just on the periphery lies the idea of being set free from political or social bondage (for example, Luke 1:73), but while the NT writers know that slavery is a common reality of life in their society, they say little in terms of emancipation (see I Cor. 7:20-24; Philem.; I Pet. 2:13-38), and redemption or SALVATION is celebrated as a release from humanity's great spiritual enemies: Satan, judgment, fear, and death (Rom. 16:20; Gal. 4:3-7; Rom. 8:1, 2, 14-17; I Cor. 15:54-57). (See also RECONCILIATION; REGENERATION.) R.M.

RED HAT. See CARDINAL.

RED SEA. The body of water that separates Egypt and Ethiopia in Africa on the west from Arabia on the east. The northwest arm of this sea is referred to as the Gulf of Suez, and the northeast arm as the Gulf of Aqaba. These two upper arms form the coasts of the Sinai Peninsula. The Red Sea, also known as the Arabian Gulf, is part of a rift system beginning in the north with the Jordan and the Dead Sea and continuing south through the Arabah and the Gulf of Aqaba. The Gulf of Suez lies in another rift.

In ancient times the name Red Sea was also given to the Persian Gulf on the far side of Arabia and to the Erythrean Sea to the south and the Indian Ocean beyond. In the biblical account of the EXODUS, the Red Sea is referred to in the original Hebrew (Exod. 13:18) as the Sea of Reeds or Sea of Rushes. It is not clear in the story of the Exodus which part of the sea the Israelites crossed. Isaiah refers to the Red Sea as "the tongue of the sea of Egypt" (11:15).

The name Red Sea may have come from the red coral that lines its shores and covers its floor, or from the color of the Arabian mountains that border its east shores, from the glow of the sunset reflected in its waters, or from the name of a king (Erythras, meaning "red") who ruled the area. B.J.

REDUCTIONISM. A philosophical term current in contemporary discussions of the relations between the various sciences. Reductionism implies that one science can be understood and explained, that is, reduced to, the laws and processes of another, more primary science. For example, some would assert that psychology is reducible to physiology, or that biology is reducible to chemistry and physics. Since the Enlightenment, many influential thinkers have used forms of reductionism to interpret religious beliefs and practices. Feuerbach and Freud, for example, viewed religious beliefs as essentially unconscious expressions of psychological wishes, fears, and aspirations. Durkheim interpreted religion as the unconscious institutionalization of powerful sociological needs. Karl Marx and contemporary Marxists see religion as explainable in terms of material, economic forces.

In the nineteenth century, reductionism was often joined with evolutionism in the search for the origin and explanation of religion, for example, in animism or in the worship of natural objects such as the sun. The reductionistic search for a single origin of religion in human psychological or social need today is widely repudiated. Reductionism can be guilty of the genetic fallacy, of judging the present truth or value of a science, a belief, or an institution in terms of its primitive beginnings. An example would be to judge the worth of chemistry in terms of its origins in alchemy. J.L.

REFORMATION, CHRISTIANITY IN THE.

The sixteenth-century ecclesiastical separations from Roman Catholicism initiated by MARTIN LUTHER's discovery of justification by faith alone and his reliance on the Scriptures as an authority greater than that of the pope in Rome. Luther's search for salvation was intensely personal. He had no desire to start a new church, yet he felt that selling INDULGENCES to cancel out sins was a mockery of faith and repentance. His Ninety-five Theses, October 31, 1517, questioned this lucrative practice. He maintained his view that indulgences were neither helpful, lawful, nor scriptural. Luther's act sent shock waves throughout Europe and stirred up long smoldering desires for change. Repressed resentment of church abuses and calls for reform burst forth. Political, economic, social, and intellectual support developed.

During the events that followed, Luther's understanding of what had happened deepened. In 1520 he ably defended his convictions in three essays basic to PROTESTANTISM. (1) The Appeal to the German Nobility declared that elevation of the clergy over laity is wrong. Claims that the PAPACY is superior to the state, that only the pope can interpret Scripture, and that only the pope can call a council are also false. Every Christian is part of the body of Christ by baptism. The parts have different functions, but none is spiritually superior to another. Every vocation is sacred. Christians are a priesthood of believers. All parts contribute to the common good. The baker's job is spiritually equal to the priest's. Luther called on the nobility to function as Christians by curbing abuses of the church. (2) The Babylonian Captivity maintained that only baptism and the Lord's Supper are truly SACRAMENTS instituted by Christ. Luther painted transubstantiation and denial of the cup to the laity as captivities to increase the clergy's power. Thus Luther rejected the medieval church's claims to control over society through the sacraments. (3) The Liberty of a Christian Man set a basic ethical standard for Protestants. The Christian is both free and bound. He is free because he is saved by faith, not by a multitude of required good works. He is bound because he does good works out of joy and gratitude for what God has done.

Christendom in the late sixteenth century

Luther already stood excommunicated by the papal bull Exsurge Domine, June 15, 1520. After it reached him, he publicly burned it on December 10, 1520, and was summoned to the Diet of Worms, 1521, to justify his actions. Luther declared he would not retract anything unless proved wrong by Scripture and right reason: "Here I stand, so help me God." The Diet of Worms condemned Luther, but sufficient political strength rallied behind him to forestall enforcement. CHARLES V, elected emperor in 1519, was too busy with other affairs to press against Luther.

In 1526 Charles V granted the Lutheran evangelicals freedom to pursue their religious convictions until a council could settle matters. This freedom was withdrawn in 1529. The Lutherans protested, thus acquiring the name Protestants. At the Diet of Augsburg, 1530, with Luther still under excommunication, the Lutherans put forth their classical AUGSBURG CONFESSION, written largely by PHILIP MELANCHTHON. It is Protestantism's fundamental creed. Sympathetic princes used its doctrines in their territories, thus establishing territorial churches in Germany, with the princes as "necessary bishops."

With the Turks threatening Austria and other matters of state pressing, Emperor Charles V did not proceed with force against the Lutheran "heretics" until 1546, the year of Luther's death. The Lutheran forces surrendered in 1547, but Charles could not force Catholicism on the populace. The Peace of Augsburg, 1555, recognized the right of the ruler, whether Lutheran or Catholic, to establish his religion in his territory. Churches had been formed in Germany, East Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; and Lutheran ideas had spread throughout Europe.

With the power of the medieval church weakened in principle and in fact, other forms of Protestantism soon emerged.

Zwinglianism. ULRICH ZWINGLI (1484–1531) launched a reform movement in Switzerland. His study of the NT made him critical of Roman Catholic practices as early as 1516. As people's priest of the Great Minster Church in Zurich in 1518, he took the Bible as his guide and preached against indulgences and fasts. By 1522 the civil rulers of Zurich declared all religious customs had to be based solely on the Word of God. Zwingli's Sixty-seven Articles, 1523, broadened the reform. Zurich's rulers declared priests, nuns, and monks could marry and ordered ministers to preach from the Bible. Images were removed from churches; clerical robes were banned. Zwingli's disciples spread these reforms in other Swiss cities. Luther and Zwingli conferred on the Lord's Supper at Marburg, but disagreed. Zwingli held a memorial view of Christ's presence in the bread and wine. Zwinglianism had a proclivity toward HUMANISM and RATIONALISM and passed into the PURITAN and REFORMED traditions.

Anabaptism. Early on Zwingli clashed with some of his co-workers over infant baptism. Conrad Grebel, Felix Manz, and some others closely studied the Bible. They found no infant baptism. They challenged Zwingli. Zwingli won in debate, January 17, 1525, and the civil authorities ordered parents the next day to baptize their infants. A death penalty for rebaptizing adults was passed in 1526, and in January 1527 Manz became Zurich's first victim. At Schleitheim in 1527 the Anabaptists issued a confession. They insisted on adult believer's baptism, separation from worldly activity, congregational polity, non-participation in war and government, and no swearing of oaths. Thousands suffered death from Zwinglian, Lutheran, and Catholic rulers, who regarded separation of church and state as treason. BALTHASAR HUBMAIER wrote the first plea for religious toleration in this period in 1524. This group was severely discredited by extremists at Münster in 1534-35, but continue today as the MENNONITES and HUTTERITES. Separation of church and state, congregational rule, pacifism, and right of conscience in religion are among their legacies.

Calvinism. JOHN CALVIN did not initiate reform at Geneva, but with the publication of The Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1536, he became the leader. He established a theocracy in Geneva that became a model for Protestants in the Netherlands, West Germany, France, and Scotland. He stressed God's sovereignty, election, predestination, human sinfulness, discipline, and the will of God as he understood them according to the Bible. His logical theology appealed to the revolutionary elements rising in Europe. He made success a sign of God's blessing and strove to make everything glorify God. Calvin's emphasis on vocation as a means of changing the world and glorifying God helped Calvinists to control society. Although entangled with complicated politics, the HUGUENOTS expressed Calvinism in the French wars of religion. JOHN KNOX put Calvinism into nationalistic developments in Scotland, and Dutch Calvinists drew on nationalistic feelings to throw off the yoke of Spain. Calvinism displaced Lutheranism as the international expression of Protestantism.

Socinianism. The execution of MICHAEL SERVETUS in Geneva, 1553, caused a reaction to Calvin. Servetus used reason to judge the Bible and rejected the Trinity. Laelius and Faustus Socinus fostered this rationalism, and Faustus and others carried these ideas into Poland and Transylvania. Socinianism appeared in England as Unitarianism (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION). Theophilus Lindsey founded the first Unitarian Church in London, 1774. The movement is known for individual freedom to seek religious truth through reason.

Anglicanism. Desiring royal supremacy, HENRY VIII overthrew the papacy in England, but remained Roman Catholic in doctrine. Protestantism took forward steps with THOMAS CRANMER under Edward VI, but Queen Mary temporarily reestablished Catholicism. Elizabeth I established a national church with her via media, a combination of Lutheran, Calvinistic, and Catholic elements. The defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588 heightened English nationalism and clinched Elizabeth's ERASTIAN settlement.

Many forces converged to make the Reformation possible. The rapid spread of Protestant ideas attests their appeal and widespread discontent with Catholicism. Dissatisfaction had steadily mounted after the reforming COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE (1414-18). Erasmus and other humanists poured scorn on the church's immoralities and abuses. They especially censured popes Alexander VI, Innocent VIII, Julius II, and Leo X, and showed that some major church documents were forgeries. Peasants were restive and desirous of social and economic change, as seen in the Peasants' Revolt, 1524-25. Many scholars sought to return to Greek antiquity and primitive church purity. The church's dominance was deeply resented. By the end of the sixteenth century, a CATHOLIC REFORMATION had countered many Protestant gains and a series of reform-minded popes had strengthened the Catholic image once more. C.M.

REFORMED CHURCHES. The various communions that developed during the Protestant REFORMATION and embraced the theological system and polity of JOHN CALVIN. The churches of this persuasion generally have been called "Reformed" if their origin was on the Continent and "Presbyterian" if they came into being in Scotland or England. "Reformed" refers to the distinctive theology of Calvinism and "Presbyterian" to polity—the form of church government by presbyters, or elders.

Reformed churches emerged in Holland, Germany, Switzerland, France, Hungary, and Scotland and, to a lesser extent, England produced Presbyterian churches. The first Reformed churches in America were established from 1628 onward by Dutch settlers in New Amsterdam. At first these churches were controlled by the Classis of Amsterdam in the Netherlands. The colonial churches did not become self-governing until the middle of the eighteenth century.

In the middle of the nineteenth century waves of Dutch immigrants settled in the Midwest, particularly in Michigan and Iowa. The Reformed churches in the eastern United States welcomed the immigrant groups and assisted them in various ways. Eventually the older and newer settlers formed a single denomination known today as the Reformed Church in America.

The Reformed type of Protestantism, distinguished from the LUTHERAN, became a separate communion in Germany's Palatinate in 1563. Later, other provinces of the Rhineland accepted the Reformed faith and the German Reformed church evolved. The German Reformed church was planted in the United States by German, Swiss, and a sprinkling of Dutch and Huguenot immigrants, who came to Pennsylvania and adjacent colonies in the early part of the eighteenth century. In the first groupings of Reformed churches both Germans and Dutch often were joined.

Through a series of denominational mergers the German Reformed church disappeared as a separate entity. Some German Reformed congregations were absorbed into the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., but a major union occurred when the Reformed group merged with the Evangelical Synod of North America in 1934 to form the Evangelical and Reformed church. Then later (1957) this church united with the Congregational Christian churches to form the United Church of Christ in America.

The largest segment of Reformed churches in the United States are the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES. As a result of the merger of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., with the (Southern) Presbyterian Church in the United States in 1982, the new Presbyterian church (U.S.A.) now lists 3¼ million communicants. There are six other Presbyterian bodies with a combined membership of more than 300,000.

The Reformed Church in America, with about 350,000 members, is the largest communion that contains "Reformed" in its official name. It is a vigorous denomination with two seminaries—New Brunswick Theological Seminary in New Jersey and Western Theological Seminary in Michigan and three colleges, Central and Northwestern in Iowa, and Hope in Michigan.

A group of Dutch immigrants settled in Michigan in 1846 and allied themselves with the Reformed Church in America. Unhappy with this relationship, they left it in 1857 and formed the Christian Reformed church, which today boasts a membership of well over 200,000 in the United States and another 80,000 in Canada. Says the noted church historian, Sydney E. Ahlstrom: "With a well supported church-school system and a strong intellectual and theological tradition nourished by Calvin College and Seminary in Grand Rapids, Michigan, the denomination has become the country's most solid and dignified bastion of conservative Reformed doctrine and church discipline."

There are Reformed churches in perhaps eighty nations of the world but the principal countries continuing to promote Calvinistic teaching and church order are the Netherlands, Scotland, Ireland, South Africa, Canada, and the United States.

The WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES was formed in 1875 in London to foster cooperation and understanding between Reformed and Presbyterian churches around the globe. It is the oldest international confessional body, growing out of the revivals and missionary movements of the nineteenth century. In 1970 at Nairobi, Kenya, the alliance united with the International Congregational Council. Now the corporate designation is the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (Presbyterian and Congregational). R.H.

REFORM JUDAISM. See JUDAISM, HISTORY OF.

REFUGE, CITIES OF. Six cities appointed to give sanctuary to those who had killed accidentally: Kedesh, Shechem, and Hebron in Canaan; Bezer, Ramoth-gilead, and Golan across the Jordan to the east (Josh. 20:7-8). The purpose of these cities was to prevent revenge and encourage justice, that the murderer might not die before having faced the congregation for judgment (Num. 35:12).

Those who were found guilty were returned to their home towns to the avenger of blood. Those found innocent were to remain in the city of refuge until the death of the high priest, which was seen as a return of life for life. Those who left the city before the death of the high priest could be killed by the avenger (35:24-28). This detention not only protected the innocent but also atoned for and prevented further bloodguilt. The killing of an innocent person caused the land to be polluted (Deut. 19:10). B.J.

REGENERATION. The two occurrences of the word in the KJV are Matthew 19:28 (RSV "the new world") and Titus 3:5, literally "bath of rebirth," referring to Christian BAPTISM. Both texts speak of the new order of existence, both cosmic and personal, that is promised in the new age of Jesus Christ (see II Cor. 5:17). The term is basically a declaration of the new life to which Christians are called, since with Christ's advent a fresh start has been made to world history, in "the fulness of the time" (Gal. 4:4 KJV).

The verb "to be born again" (better, "born from above"; see NEB, which combines the two ideas in John 3:3, 7, by rendering "born over again") gives rise to the term "new birth," elaborated in I John 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18, thus making regeneration a particularly emphasized Johannine idiom. First Peter 1:3, 23, repeats the same idea. Christians are likened to newly born members of the divine family. Their new life is traced back to their baptism, which marks the death of the "old person" and the ushering of converts to a new way of living.

Paul's teaching is more complex, with more application to the life of the regenerate believers who are expected to act out their new life (Rom. 12:2; Col. 3:10) as part of God's new order (Gal. 6:15). The term "regeneration" corresponds to the NEW MAN of Ephesians 2:15; 4:24, made up of believing Jews and Gentiles based on Christ's RECONCILIATION, and certified in baptism (Tit. 3:5; compare I Pet. 3:21). Romans 6:1-14 is especially significant, with its insistence that Christians as raised to new life are committed to a new allegiance to Christ. They are to deem themselves "dead to sin," but "alive to God" in newness of life.

In theology regeneration has a wide range of meanings, extending from transference to the visible church by the rite of infant baptism (in foro coeli, that is, spiritually regenerate) to an admission to the fold of believers. In the former case, the teaching is historically known as baptismal regeneration and rests on the belief that the sacrament, when performed aright, has the power to confer what it signifies, namely regeneration or new birth of the child to God's family. The latter understanding professes to safeguard the sacrament by insisting on the need for faith, whether personal or corporate. If infant baptism as a means of regeneration requires the presence of faith, whether the child's incipient trust or the parents' pledge to bring up their offspring as Christian, the regeneration is treated as in foro ecclesiae, that is, baptism regenerates by placing the child within the sphere of the church's influence. The two views of regeneration are thus distinguished. On the one hand, regeneration denotes a real change in a person, although an infant. On the other, the child is placed in a believing atmosphere which, in later life, will ensure his or her full participation in Christ's body. R.M.

REGIONAL MINISTER. This term is employed by the CHRISTIAN CHURCH (Disciples of Christ) to describe the ecclesiastical administrative office of a minister charged with relationships with the pastors and churches of a geographical area. The regions may cover single states or several states as population dictates. In the congregational polity of the Christian Church, the regional minister does not exercise responsibility in a magisterial or authoritarian way. Besides conferring and counseling with churches seeking pastors, the regional minister gives similar help to ministers seeking places of service. The regional minister supports the program of the denomination in such areas as world mission support, leadership development, stewardship, and so forth. Similar nomenclature (regional executive minister) is employed by the United Church of Christ. R.H.

REHOBAM. King of Judah about 922-915 B.C.; son and successor of Solomon; first king of the southern kingdom. In Hebrew, Rehobam can mean "may the people become greater." Solomon's son may have taken this name to indicate that he would not exert over his people the harsh kind of power of his father Solomon. Rehobam became king at forty-one and reigned seventeen years (I Kings 14:21; II Chr. 12:13). But in time he became even harsher than his father, which led to the revolt of the north and the breakup of the kingdom. After the land was attacked by Egypt, Rehobam began building cities for defense in Judah (II Chr. 11:5-12). For three years Rehobam followed the teachings of the Lord; then he turned away, and all the people with him. The Lord let Shishak, king of Egypt, come in and take away the treasures of the Lord's house (II Chr. 12:1-12).

REINCARNATION. A belief that the soul, spirit, or essential self, bearing personality traits and one's debit sheet of merit and demerit, passes into another body after death, perhaps after time in an intermediate state. Belief in reincarnation is widespread but is most central to HINDUISM and BUDDHISM, and the smaller religions of India such as JAINISM and SIKHISM. Through Buddhist influence, reincarnation has been important as a belief in China and Japan, including the "new religions" of Japan, but has had to come to terms with indigenous ANCESTOR VENERATION and worship of Shinto KAMI.

Reincarnation is widely held in primitive religion, typically in the simple form of belief that the same souls may be reborn over and over in the same tribe, or that dead children may be reborn as subsequent offspring of the same mother or of relatives. In Hinduism, the JIVA or particularized soul is thought to be reborn lifetime after lifetime in accordance with one's KARMA, until MOKSHA or liberation is finally won. Reincarnation is often viewed as a theoretical rationale for the caste system, since one's status in it is seen as the result of karma carried over from previous lives. It is also seen as an expression of SAMSARA—the world as fundamentally in a state of transitoriness and flux.

In Buddhism, much the same view of reincarnation as an articulation of karma and samsara obtains. But Buddhism rejects the Hindu caste system and philosophically asserts that there is no actual entity that is reincarnated, but rather an ongoing process of karmic energy. Reincarnation has generally not been accepted by normative Jewish thought, but it has a place in the mystical cabalistic tradition as the concept of gilgul, "wave."

In the classical world, reincarnation found expression in Platonic philosophy and in such mystery religions as Orphism. Later it appeared in quasi-Christian Gnosticism and Manichaeism. But although belief in reincarnation was attributed to such highly Hellenistic Christian thinkers as Origen, it has been rejected by normative Christianity. In Islam also reincarnation has been accepted by certain fringe mystical schools, often influenced by Neoplatonism in the West and Hinduism in the East, but not by the main body of believers. Under the influence of movements like Theosophy, interest in reincarnation has shown a remarkable upswing in America and western Europe in the twentieth century. R.E.

RELATIVISM. Relativism is the notion that knowledge and/or values are not absolute but dependent upon related factors. Interrelated forms of relativism are: (1) historical and cultural, (2) epistemological, (3) ethical, and (4) religious.

Historical and cultural relativism emerged from the study of the past and other societies and affirms that human faith and values are conditioned by historical and sociocultural context. Marxist analysis emphasizes economic factors as determinative. Anthropological study shows how different cultural wholes shape the beliefs and actions of various societies.

Epistemological relativism holds that human knowing is conditioned by the viewpoint of the knower. Einstein's theory of relativity, formulated to apply in physics, is the most widely known and influential form of relativism and has served to emphasize the temporal and spatial relativity of all knowing.

Ethical relativism affirms, in parallel fashion, that human goals and rules of conduct are dependent upon the cultural context, and that the goodness and rightness of actions are relative to particular circumstances.

Religious relativism discloses the circular quality of relativism. On the one hand, faith in God, gods, or comparable ultimates emerges within specific socio-cultural contexts. On the other hand, ethics, knowledge, and cultural/historical viewpoints are dependent upon the ultimate convictions that shape and validate them. The "personal knowledge" of Michael Polanyi's philosophy, with its fiduciary or tacit dimension, demonstrates appreciation of the circularity of relativism, as does the "theocentric relativism" of H. Richard Niebuhr in theology.

Relativism may be mistakenly identified with the recognition of a plurality of perspectives or with the notion that knowledge is only of relationships. If relativism is held as truth it tends toward an absolutism that is contradictory. (See also SITUATION ETHICS.) C.Mc.

RELICS. Bones or personal articles belonging to departed saints, which in Roman Catholic theology are venerated, and with which many miracles of healing or divine help are associated in popular religion. The use of relics in devotion is traced to the solemn dignity given the bones of the martyred Polycarp by Christians in Smyrna in A.D. 156. So popular did relics—in the form of skulls, fingers, hands, and other body parts—become that the corpses of the saints were exhumed and dismembered, first in the East, and then, by the seventh century, in the West, although it was forbidden before that time in Rome. The Council of Nicaea in A.D. 787 legislated the presence of relics as necessary for the consecration of a church. Each altar was constructed with a relic box within it to sanctify it. Although ICONS were more popular in the East, the Council of Constantinople ratified the veneration of relics in A.D. 1084 for the Eastern churches.

Roman Catholics explain the practice of venerating the saints by declaring that it has biblical sanction in II Kings 2:14 and 13:21, which report miracles brought about through Elijah's mantle and even Elisha's bones. In the NT there are reports of people being healed by contact with handkerchiefs that had been on Paul's person (Acts 19:12). This biblical material is similar to the healings and other miracles said to occur through relics throughout Christian history. Catholics argue that since the Lord works miracles through such remains of believers now with God in heaven, then those remains ought to be venerated. Almost every large cathedral contains relics, some of which are only occasionally put on public display for veneration, such as the Shroud of Turin in Italy or the body of St. Francis Xavier in Goa, India.

During the Crusades, thousands of relics were brought back to Europe, many of them counterfeits. Because relics foster superstition, many abuses arose. Perhaps the worst case was the displaying of relics and sale of indulgences in Germany in the early sixteenth century. Martin Luther reacted sharply against these abuses, denouncing them in the Ninety-Five theses. Thus the abuses connected to relics contributed to the coming of the Protestant Reformation. Protestantism rejected the veneration of relics entirely. J.C.

RELIGION, STUDY OF. Since the nineteenth century the study of religion or the "science of religion" has been distinguished from the study of THEOLOGY. The latter frequently refers to inquiry in a particular confessional tradition, for example, Roman Catholic or Lutheran. The former is concerned with the investigation of religion as a universal human phenomenon and with the common religious elements that can be observed in preliterate, archaic, and advanced cultures.

Study of the gods and religious mythology can be traced back to classical Greece. However, the science of religion as we know it today dates from the nineteenth century. Max Müller (1823–1900), the German-educated Oxford Sanskrit scholar and philologist, was responsible for the adoption and present use of the terms "science of religion" and "comparative study of religion." He also is considered the father of the scientific study of religion. Between the 1860s and 1920s there was a great burst of interest in the application of the new sciences to the investigation of religion. Scholars were especially interested in seeking out the origin of religion and its evolutionary development, as well as the comparative study of religious phenomena. This new interest is traceable to several factors: (1) the emergence of such new sciences as sociology, anthropology, and psychology; (2) the sudden availability of valuable new information, including archaeological evidence, which shed light on the religions of ancient Egypt, Greece, Rome, Babylonia, and the Semitic religions of Syria and Palestine; (3) the rapid expansion of the European colonial empires, which brought with it an enormous increase of information concerning the preliterate and archaic cultures and religions of Africa, India, Asia, and Oceania; this new information came to the attention of scholars through the reports of explorers, civil servants, traders, and missionaries; and (4) the availability, for the first time, of translations of many of the important sacred texts of Iran, India, China, and Japan, exemplified in Max Müller's editorship of the fifty-one-volume series, The Sacred Books of the East, which was begun in 1870.

The first chair of the History of Religions was founded at Geneva in 1873. In 1876 four chairs were established in Holland at the universities of Amsterdam, Groningen, Leiden, and Utrecht. Dutch scholars have continued as leaders in the field ever since. In 1885 a special faculty for the Religious Sciences was organized at the Sorbonne in Paris. In 1880 the Revue de l'Histoire des Religions was founded in Paris. The best-known current journal in the field, Numen (1954), is published by the International Association for the History of Religions. The first International Congress for the Sciences of Religion was held in 1897 at Stockholm. Among the earliest reference works and encyclopedias reflecting the influence of this new science were Hastings' Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics (13 vols.; 1908-23) and Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (5 vols.; 1909-13).

Due largely to the influence of the evolutionary theories of Auguste Comte and Charles Darwin, many of the pioneers in the science of religion were absorbed by the question of religious origins and development. Among the earliest was Edward Burnett Tylor (1832-1917), whose Primitive Culture (1871) proposed animism, or the belief that everything is endowed with a soul, as the origin of religion. Sir James George Frazer, in The Golden Bough (1890; 3rd ed. 1907-13, in 12 volumes), suggested that religion emerged as a result of the failure of primitive magic. In 1900, R. R. Marett and others contended that the beginning of religion was to be found in the pre-animistic experience of a pervasive, impersonal force, which the Melanesian natives called mana. Andrew Lang (1844-1912) and Wilhelm Schmidt (1868-1954) attacked the theory of animism, but from a different point of view. Both scholars discovered a belief in supreme beings in numerous primitive cultures. Schmidt sought to demonstrate the fact of what he called "primordial monotheism" in Der Ursprung der Gottesidee (The Origin of the Idea of God), 12 vols.; 1912-55). The biblical scholar J. Robertson Smith (1846-94), in The Religion of the Semites (1889), and the sociologist Emile Durkheim (1858-1917), in The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1916), claimed that the earliest-known expression of religion is found in the social function of totemism. However, by the second decade of this century, field research had largely discredited these theories and had shown the futility of the search for origins. Interest shifted to the historical, functional, and phenomenological study of religions.

The most important contributions to the scientific study of religion in this century would include the work of the sociologists MAX WEBER and ERNST TROELTSCH, the psychological studies of WILLIAM JAMES and CARL JUNG, and the work of the anthropologists Lucien Levy-Bruhl (1857-1939), Bronislaw Malinowski (1884-1942), Robert Lowie (1883-1957), Paul Radin (1883-1959) and, more recently, E. E. Evans-Pritchard (1902-73) and C. Levi-Strauss (1908- ).

The phenomenological study of religion has produced some of the most valuable scientific work. This would include Rudolf Otto's (1869-1937) The Idea of the Holy (Eng. ed. 1923), Gerardus van der Leeuw's (1890-1950) Religion in Essence and Manifestation (Eng. ed. 1938), W. Brede Kristensen's (1867-1953) The Meaning of Religion (Eng. ed. 1960), Joachim Wach's (1898-1955) Types of Religious Experience (1951) and The Comparative Study of Religions (1958), and the numerous works of Mircea Eliade (1907- ) including Patterns in Comparative Religion (1958) and The Sacred and the Profane (1959). RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. Religious experience is usually regarded as personal, involving a relationship to the divine Other, or God. Religious experience includes the whole person, but uppermost is an awareness of the emotions and senses: sight, sound, touch, smell, and taste. Signs made and attitudes assumed express feelings through the senses and heighten experience. The objective is to stir emotions of yearning, guilt, repentance, love, and joy. Reflection on the experience is an intellectual work and helps to form the understanding of who God is and how God acts in relation to the individual and the world.

Religious experience has an individual component but is also known through corporate worship and may be strengthened through the awareness of a religious community's singing, praying, and reenacting rituals. The individual is both strengthened by the group and more closely related to it through shared worship. There is the further possibility of deepened relationships to other individuals and a satisfying integration of the self.

The nature of the relationship sought with the Transcendent varies with the personality of the individual. Some seek a strong authority figure to give reassurance and direction. Others seek a flexible figure who invites openness and exploration. Each person hopes for freedom through a different route. Some, more aware of the dark side of life and the self, struggle in their religious experience against darkness, separation, and even a sense of temporary abandonment while yet believing that God is present. Others, temperamentally attuned to the sunny side of life, develop an uncomplicated trusting relationship to God with little turmoil.

To speculate on the needs out of which the quest for religious experience arises borders on the philosophical. For some there is a yearning for completeness, arising from the awareness of the difference between being human and being empowered by God. Others, overwhelmed by a sense of guilt (which is sometimes pathological), seek forgiveness and reconciliation. VICTOR FRANKL speaks of the search for meaning. ABRAHAM MASLOW speaks of self-actualization as the apex of the values on a ladder of need fulfillment. Some seek a direction for life, motivated not only by a desire for order but from a belief that goodness and self-transcendence in loving service is the basic way to self-fulfillment. Others seek a relationship to God—the saint's desire to know and love God for love's sake alone, without fear of hell or hope for heaven.

For some people religious experience is a discovery. They seek God, sometimes with great difficulty and loneliness, fighting the shadows until the light appears. They take the initiative, and God is both the objective and the fulfillment of their search. Others affirm that their religious experience was initiated by God, revealed through God's action in Scripture, an exemplar, the created world, or some personal sign. Their desire is active, but their response is that of passive waiting. They are found by God rather than seeking God.

One of the most studied aspects of religious experience has been that of CONVERSION, beginning with the work of E. D. Starbuck in 1899 and continued by G. Stanley Hall in his classic study of adolescence. WILLIAM JAMES in The Varieties of Religious Experience devotes careful attention to this phenomenon.

Conversion literally means "a turning around" and indicates a change in life direction. Frequently, as a religious experience, it has been a dramatic, even cataclysmic, event of life-shaking proportions to the convert and a source of awe and astonishment to onlookers. Some forms of Protestant Christianity have expected this kind of experience as indication of a changed life. In this theology, each person needs to hear proclaimed the gospel that the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ brought redemption from sin. This redemption must be appropriated personally through a conviction of sin, deep remorse, repentance, and full confession. The result is a sense of release and joy that signals entrance into the redeemed life. While this experience can occur in private, it frequently occurs at a public meeting. Repeated personal conversation with a believer will sometimes bring this response. The whole setting of a revival meeting is directed toward this end: singing, preaching, prayer, testimonies, exhortation, and invitation. The result for the convert is a sense of peace with God and acceptance into a community of faith. In surrender to God there is release from the sense of sin and guilt, and a new direction for life. The person is now committed to Jesus Christ for life.

Conversion can also be a gradual process in which a person becomes aware of deeper commitment and/or change of direction only in retrospect. The process is motivated by the same needs for wholeness and relationship. Some of the same factors of personal and group persuasion may be present in a quieter way. Some religious groups consider this the normative form of conversion. Others reject it as not being manifest enough to give witnesses certainty that anything critical has happened.

Religious experience is both developed and expressed through prayer. The primary motivation is for an ever closer relationship to God as the source of life and love. To the believer, strength for everyday living comes through the power given by God. Thanksgiving expresses joy for gifts received and acknowledges that God is the giver of all. Adoration and praise celebrate not only the Being of God but the active divine presence in the life of the believer. Petition and intercession affirm the power of God to act in the lives of people and societies in response to the request of those in need. Some dimensions of prayer are beyond psychological probing. In fact prayer seems odd to a rational world view that affirms a cause and effect universe even while leaving space for indeterminism.

Hence a study of MEDITATION indicates many forms of the art practiced by those with no belief in the Transcendent. Meditation can be self-suggestion, a way of relaxing and reflecting that renews the physical, mental, and emotional powers of the practitioner. Many forms of meditation are currently popular that use classical religious techniques with no divine reference. To the religious person, however, the experience of prayer is deepened through the practice of meditation. Many of the classical writers on prayer have offered methods. Basically these stress ways in which the goal is a self-emptying and an awareness of God that goes beyond speech or image, or ways that imply the visualization of events, or words on which to concentrate in a reaching out toward God. Meditation, while drawing the believer into a deeper awareness of relationship to God, makes the person sensitive to the purposes of God for life, open to strengthening through divine power and clearer direction for action.

Meditation is a widely practiced way of prayer, but the mystical experience lies even deeper. Some people seem able to transcend the self and enter into a sense of union with God that they liken to the union of two persons in marriage, but which is recognized to be a deeply interior experience. In all religions, this is considered the apex of spirituality, differing both in kind and degree from the ordinary experiences of relationship to the Divine through prayer. This is a state of awareness not easily reached and not lightly held. It involves struggle, long periods of waiting, and an awesome sense of being close to the Holy. St. John of the Cross speaks of the "dark night of the soul" during which there is only waiting. Christians have known ever since the witness of the apostle Paul about such experiences. Within Judaism the Hasidic tradition conveys the mystical sense of joyous abandonment to the presence of God. Among Muslims the Sufis express the mystical dimension. There is also a mystical tradition in both Buddhism and Hinduism.

MYSTICISM includes a sense of the Spirit of God working in the world. The Pentecostal tradition has taken many forms through the centuries and there is a renewed surge today, not only among traditional Pentecostal groups but also in mainline traditions and independent congregations.

Religious experience is also evidenced in techniques for heightened awareness, notably among some cultic groups, in the use of drugs with specifically religious intent and usually within a communal liturgical setting. Parapsychology provides for some another avenue for religious experience, as people seek communication with those who have died, develop an elevated sense of personal immortality, become aware of a power to know events happening elsewhere or that will happen in the future. Some seek deeper understanding of God's will through dreams—a biblical practice recently attracting new interest in some circles. I.C.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. See LIBERTY, RELIGIOUS.

RELIGIOUS ORDERS. See ORDERS AND ORDINATION.

REMISSION OF SINS. See FORGIVENESS.

REMNANT. The remaining group of people that continue the life of the community after some traumatic event. Throughout the OT and NT there appears a small remnant remaining faithful to the Lord God.

Remnant in the Old Testament:

Noah. The earliest reference to a remnant is in the story of the Flood: "He blotted out every living thing. . . . Only Noah was left, and those that were with him in the ark" (Gen. 7:23).

Lot. When God indicated that the wicked city of Sodom was about to be destroyed, Abraham asked that the righteous be spared. Only Lot, his wife, and their two daughters were rescued, and his wife lost her life shortly thereafter (Gen. 18:17-19:29).

Jacob. When he went to meet Esau after having stolen the birthright many years earlier, Jacob divided his large company of people and animals into two groups so that if Esau's forces attacked one group the other might survive (Gen. 32:6-12).

Joseph. When famine struck his land, Jacob sent ten of his sons to Egypt to purchase food, but kept one of his sons, Benjamin, at home in case something should happen to the others (Gen. 42:1-38).

Moses. The pharaoh ordered all Israelite male children killed at birth, but Moses' mother hid him in the bulrushes, saving his life (Exod. 1:8-2:10).

Isaiab. The prophet, at the Lord's direction, named his son Shear-jashub, "a remnant will return" (from exile, to the Lord) (Isa. 7:3).

Remnant in the New Testament:

John the Baptist. The forerunner of Jesus called all people to repent (John 1:6-8) but knew that not all might choose to do so (Matt. 3:1-12).

Jesus. While he called all to repent and believe the good news (Mark 1:14-15), Jesus knew that not everyone would want to "enter by the narrow gate" (Matt. 7:13-14). The faithful will be a remnant (Matt. 22:14). Jesus said that at the end of time his reapers will separate the weeds from the wheat, and only the wheat will remain (Matt. 13:24-30).

Paul. In Romans 9-11 Paul quotes Isaiah: "For though your people Israel be as the sand of the sea, only a remnant of them will return" (Isa. 10:22; Rom. 9:27). There is, Paul says, a remnant, chosen by grace (Rom. 11:5).

John of Revelation. In writing to the seven churches, John addresses the faithful remnant at Thyatira (2:24-25) and calls the faithful in Sardis to awake from deadness and stir up the remnant of their faith (3:1-2). In 11:13 he speaks of a remnant surviving a devastating earthquake and giving glory to God; and in 12:17; and 13:11-18 of the persecution of the faithful remnant. B.J.

REMONSTRANCE, THE A theological platform presented by followers of ARMINIUS in 1610. This platform was directed to the Estates of Holland and contained five points rejecting the doctrine of Calvinism on predestination. The Remonstrance claimed predestination is not absolute but conditional on the human response of faith. It denied the concept of the limited atonement, that is, that Christ died only for the elect, and held that Christ died for all, so all could, in theory, be saved. While affirming free will, it held that free will could not choose to do God's will unless it was first given God's grace. This grace is not irresistible, however, so it may be accepted or rejected. RENAISSANCE, CHRISTIANITY IN THE. The Renaissance (meaning "rebirth") extended roughly from 1350 to 1550, during which time SCHOLASTICISM, feudalism, and church dominance declined, and HUMANISM, individualism, and nationalism emerged as dominant factors in European culture. Centered in Italy, the Renaissance reached spectacular artistic heights in the fifteenth century, was carried by humanist scholars beyond Italy, and then experienced decline as the Protestant Reformation erupted.

The first hundred years of the Renaissance found the papacy, Christendom's highest office, in disarray. NOMINALISM'S Duns Scotus, William of Ockham, and others attacked Aquinas' system by saying abstract eternal forms were simply names, without the reality of particular things, thus impugning all value assertions. French domination during the Babylonian Captivity (1305-77) made claims of papal superiority sound hollow. The Great Schism (1378-1415), with popes at both Avignon and Rome claiming primacy, shattered confidence in papal authority. The reforming Council of Pisa (1409) then elected another pope without unseating the other two, thus embarrassing Christendom with the spectacle of three supreme authorities. JOHN WYCLIFFE and JOHN HUSS raised strong nationalistic voices of protest. Mysticism, a subtler protest, increased in popularity and further eroded ecclesiastical power by stressing simple Christian living and seeking more direct contact with the Divine. Its leaders included MEISTER ECKHART, JOHN TAULER, Henry Suso, Gerhard Groot, and THOMAS À KEMPIS. The Brethren of the Common Life and other semi-mystic groups called for inward transformation and popularized a new devotion (DEVOTIO MODERNA) that emphasized plain, undogmatic Christianity. Conciliarists Conrad of Gelnhausen, Heinrich of Langenstein, Pierre D'Ailly, Jean Gerson, and others clamored for reform through a council, and national states repeatedly challenged papal superiority. Although the Council of Constance (1414–17) unseated Christendom's three popes, elected Martin V, and declared conciliarism the supreme church authority, a buffeted papacy by 1460 had reclaimed power and made appeal to a council cause for excommunication.

Out of this turmoil the Renaissance came. Papal ecclesiasticism was no longer satisfactory. Scholars turned to ancient Greece and Rome for new views and secular values. FRANCESCO PETRARCH (1304–74), who molded the modern Italian language, and Giovanni Boccaccio, author of The Decameron, a forerunner of novels that virtually ignored Christianity, are credited with initiating the Renaissance. Petrarch wrote three hundred Italian sonnets to a married woman and collected old manuscripts. Boccaccio ignored Christianity in his frank celebration of worldly joys. Both bypassed medieval Christianity and looked to classical culture for inspiration—a characteristic that proved central in the Renaissance.

The fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453 causing Greek refugees to disperse, the invention of printing, new ways of making paper, the discovery of America, the circumnavigation of the globe, the mariner's compass, and new theories from Copernicus and Galileo stimulated intellectual interest not only in the past but in the present. Man as the measure of man gradually dominated, not the church, hence the term "humanism." LORENZO VALLA and NICHOLAS OF CUSA demonstrated that the Donation of Constantine, which gave Western Europe to the church, was a forgery. Perhaps other documents were also spurious. Ancient Greek, Roman, and Hebraic origins promised new beginnings.

With scholars like Lino Salutati (1331–1406), Leonardo Bruni (1369–1444), Marsilio Ficino (1433–99), and others, Florence soon had a complete translation of Plato's works and consciously modeled itself on Greek culture. Other cities followed. Patrons of art like the Medici in Florence, the Sforza family in Milan, and the dukes of Urbino surrounded themselves with poets, painters, sculptors, architects, and scholars—all vying with one another for Renaissance magnificence. Painting, sculpture, and architecture reached spectacularly creative heights in MICHELANGELO, Raphael, Andrea del Sarto, and LEONARDO DA VINCI. Religious subjects were not neglected, but secular objects gained in prominence, marking a drift toward earthly emphases.

Despite much anticlericalism and worldliness in the Renaissance, the papacy, after weathering its multiple popes and conciliarism, belatedly became an important patron of Renaissance culture. Pope Nicholas V (1447–55) helped found the Vatican Library and commissioned scores of scholars to find manuscripts and make translations. Sixtus IV (1471–84) commissioned the Sistine Chapel with its magnificent acoutrements. Julius II (1503–13) undertook to rebuild St. Peter's and employed such personages as Bramante, Michelangelo, and Raphael. Leo X (1513–21), who never understood the Luther "squabble" in Germany, encouraged Renaissance arts and literature with generous patronage. However, religious dedication was lacking. The papacy, despite its patronage, seemed more concerned to enhance its political prestige and power. The papacy was rife with nepotism, immoralities, political intrigue, financial abuses, wars, and ornate living. Several popes, notably Alexander VI (1492–1503), openly promoted their children's welfare. The Renaissance popes seemed unable to comprehend the widespread discontent with ecclesiastical control and the significance of social changes taking place. Catholic French King Charles VIII, seeing little difference between the papacy and other rulers, invaded Italy in 1494, and Emperor Charles V's Catholic forces sacked Rome in 1527. These invasions diminished Italy's role in the Renaissance, and attention shifted to outside Italy.

During the height of the Renaissance, scores of scholars visited Italy and returned home imbued with zeal for studies of ancient Greece and Rome, soon enlarged to include Christian and Hebraic origins. Johann Reuchlin especially promoted Hebrew in Germanic areas. Among the scholars who visited Italy and returned home were William Grocyn, Thomas Linacre, and John Colet from England; Rudolph Agricola, Conrad Celtis, Ulrich von Hutten, and Albrecht Dürer from Germany; and many others. Biblical and patristic studies tended to predominate outside Italy. Preeminent among northern humanists was ERASMUS of Rotterdam, who combined piety and classical learning to rejuvenate church and society. His Greek NT (1516) sought a purified biblical text as a beginning. His ecclesiastical criticisms attracted international attention, but Erasmus was not a radical reformer. He remained loyal to Roman Catholicism, as did many humanists after the clash with Luther in 1524–25. Nevertheless, humanism laid the intellectual foundations for the Protestant REFORMATION. In some, like Philip Melancthon, Renaissance-Reformation currents combined, especially in education, but other forces, particularly Luther's justification by faith alone, brought basic reforms. The Renaissance was the Reformation's forerunner. C.M.

RENAN, ERNEST (1823–92). French writer and student of religion who studied for the priesthood but turned away from the church when he became acquainted with biblical criticism. He wrote a series of books on the origins of Christianity, of which one (not the most scholarly) had tremendous popular appeal. This was his Vie de Jésus (Life of Jesus), published in 1863 after a visit to the Holy Land. Though the book is marred in places by sentimentality, and is more a work of the imagination than a properly historical study, Renan does evoke a vivid picture of the human Jesus, first in the happy phase of his ministry in the idyllic surroundings of Galilee, then in the dramatically altered scenes of controversy with the religious establishment, culminating in the death on Calvary. In Schweitzer's judgment, "he offered his readers a Jesus who was alive—there is something magical about the work." J.M.

REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS. See CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

REPENTANCE. A word used mainly by Christians, most frequently by Protestant evangelicals, for personal, religious CONVERSION.

The idea of repentance is expressed in the OT by the word "turn"—turn from all else in order to turn to God. "Turn back from your evil ways; for why will you die?" (Ezek. 33:11; "return" Hos. 2:7; Mic. 7:17). The word "repent" is generally avoided in modern Judaism. Considered in its broadest meaning, repentance, whether the word is used or not, is part of many living world religions whenever better ways of life are shown and people are encouraged to choose these ways and not to follow others.

Jesus' parable of the prodigal son (Luke 15:11–32) gives graphic symbols of repentance and non-repentance. The younger son repented and returned to find his father waiting to restore him to the family. The elder son did not leave home but fostered such an unforgiving and unsympathetic spirit that he was kept from a harmonious relationship with his family.

John the Baptist's preaching and baptism centered on repentance (Matt. 3:8, 11; Mark 1:4; Luke 3:8). Jesus' public preaching began with a call to his hearers to repent (Matt. 11:17; Mark 1:15, also Luke 5:32; 15:7; 24:47). The early church continued calling people to repent (Acts 2:3, 8; 3:19; 17:30; 26:20), using the baptism of repentance (Acts 13:24; 19:4) and striving "that all should reach repentance" (II Pet. 3:9). The Revelation made clear the consequences of non-repentance while sounding the call to repent (2:5, 16; 3:3).

Christians do not view repentance as an end in itself. Rather, it is a requisite for positive belief. Jesus' first preaching was, "Repent, and believe in the gospel" (Mark 1:15). Belief, in this sense, is a positive acceptance of Jesus Christ as Lord, a commitment that enables that good way of living called in the Gospels "fruits that befit repentance" (Matt. 3:8; Luke 3:8). P.L.G.

REPHAIM. A biblical term used in three apparently unrelated ways.

(1) A prehistoric, legendary people associated with such non-Israelite people as Hittites, Perezites, Moabites, Ammonites, and, particularly, with the Anakim. The Rephaim were "a people great and many, and tall as the Anakim" (Deut. 2:21). Og, king of Bashan, is said to be of the Rephaim. His iron bedstead, preserved for a long time, measured 14½ feet by 6 feet (Deut. 3:11). "Bashan is called the land of Rephaim" (Deut. 3:13).

(2) The valley or vale of Rephaim is located southwest of Jerusalem and north of Bethlehem (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; II Sam. 5:18, 22; 23:13; I Chr. 11:5; 14:9; Isa. 17:5 where the growing of grain is mentioned). The valley formed part of the boundary between Benjamin and Judah.

(3) Rephaim as Hebrew "shades," or RSV "the dead" (Ps. 88:10; Prov. 9:18; 21:16; Job 26:5; Isa. 27:14). The connection may be that, in popular Hebrew thought, the Rephaim were a people who lived a long time ago and about whom little was known. There are references in the Ras Shamra texts to the Rephaim both as a clan and as a high-class guild connected with a royal fertility cult. P.L.G.

REQUIEM. A mass, set to music, sung in commemoration of the dead in the Roman Catholic Church. The name "requiem" comes from the Introit, which begins, "Give them rest eternal, O Lord. . . ." The Requiem Mass (and there are many) is officially to be used only at funerals, on the anniversary of the death of the departed (funds are often deposited to pay for such anniversary masses each year), and on All Souls' Day, November 1. Interestingly, because of this limited use, the Requiem Mass was adapted to concert use. Beautiful musical masses were written by many outstanding musicians such as Giuseppe Verdi, and these masterpieces are often played by orchestras in concert. The addition of orchestral accompaniment was completed in the eighteenth century. J.C.

RERUM NOVARUM. The encyclical letter of Pope LEO XIII published on May 15, 1891, which many regard as that pope's most important social pronouncement and the real entrance of the Vatican into the arena espousing social justice. While the letter was directed against certain forms of extant socialism and economic liberalism, the document imparted a strong impulse to the Christian social movement and social thought.

The pope examined the transfer of ownership to the state and rejected it on human, philosophical, and religious grounds. He then set out what he regarded as the true remedy by action of the church, of the state, of employers and employed. He maintained the priority of individuals and their families over the state, and their right by nature to possess property of their own in permanent possession. He asserted the right of workers to a living wage and reasonable comfort. The encyclical advised both employers and workers to organize into mixed and separate associations for mutual help and self-protection.

RESERVATION OF THE EUCHARIST. The Roman Catholic practice of reserving or keeping the consecrated bread (or Host) from the Mass, originally for purposes of communing the sick, but also for devotional reasons, as in the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. Reservation is an ancient tradition, as it is discussed by the church father Tertullian of North Africa. Justin Martyr, even earlier, speaks of retaining some of the consecrated elements in order to take Communion to the sick in their homes. Solitary monks and even private Christians reserved the bread in their homes until prohibited by the Council of Saragossa in A.D. 380. The adoration of the Sacrament was a later development, arising after TRANSUBSTANTIATION became the general theology of the Eucharist in the High Middle Ages.

At the Reformation, Martin Luther rejected the reservation of the Eucharist, and the practice did not become part of Protestantism. It was briefly permitted in the Church of England but was rejected by 1552 (the second prayer book). In recent years reservation has been revived by Anglicanism.

RESPONSIBILITY. See FREEDOM; FREE WILL.

RESTORATION, THE. Primarily the reinstatement of the monarchy in England in 1660 under Charles II. After the Puritan Commonwealth and the protectorate of OLIVER CROMWELL, the monarchy was restored and the Anglican church reestablished. The "Restoration Period" usually includes the reigns of Charles II (1660-85) and James II (1685-88). Literature and science flourished in this period.

Restoration is also a term applied to the movement initiated by Thomas and ALEXANDER CAMPBELL to restore the patterns of primitive Christianity in the church. Their ideas came from two Old Scottish Independents in Scotland, John Glas and Robert Sandeman, who advocated weekly Communion, believers' baptism by immersion, and congregational independence. The Campbells formed the Disciples of Christ and the Churches of Christ.

RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS. The "restoration of all things" is an expression that occurs in the NT (Acts 3:21). The word translated "restoration" is apokatastasis, and it was used in secular contexts in many ways. It could mean, for instance, recovery from sickness or the return of the heavenly bodies to positions that they had occupied at some previous time. In any case, it meant the reversion to some earlier and desirable state of affairs. In the OT, we meet the idea of a return to a Golden Age and, on a more limited scale, the idea of a restoration of the Davidic kingdom. Among early Christian writers, Origen made significant use of the idea of a universal restoration. But while Christians look in some sense for a final perfecting of the creation of Christ (anakephalaiosis is the word used in Eph. 1:10 and also by Irenaeus), the objection has been made that this is not merely a restoration and that what is promised is a new heaven and earth. Also the word "restoration" seems to imply that there was an original perfection. It might be replied that the restoration consists in the undoing of the history of sin and the realization of the potentiality that has always been there.

RESURRECTION OF JESUS. That God raised Jesus from the dead is the central and distinctive claim of the early church, as evidenced in the NT. The earliest surviving witness to this claim is to be found in I Corinthians 15:3-9, where Paul declares that the tradition he received affirmed Jesus' death for the sins of his people and his having been raised from the dead—that is, by God. Although this letter was written in the early fifties A.D., Paul makes clear that he is passing on a set of convictions that had been passed on to him, presumably at the time of his conversion, which could have been within a year or two of the Crucifixion itself. Similarly, in Philippians 2:9 and in Romans 1:4, Paul is apparently reproducing older hymnic or creedal tradition, which affirms that after Jesus' death on the cross he was exalted by God, and that his resurrection was the means by which God acclaimed Jesus as his Son. Thus the belief in the Resurrection goes back to the earliest years of the church's existence.

Paul further reports that the appearances of the Risen Jesus were not all private, individual experiences, but that they took place in groups ranging in size from "the twelve" (I Cor. 15:5) to "more than five hundred" (15:6). His own encounter with the resurrected Christ (15:8) may be identical with the experience he describes in Galatians 1:16, when God "was pleased to reveal his Son to [or in] me." In both the I Corinthians account and this one in Galatians, the appearances of Christ are linked with his being commissioned to carry out the church's mission to the Gentiles. He observes that both the death and the resurrection of Jesus are "in accordance with the scriptures," which is a surprising claim since there is almost no direct mention of the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD in the OT. The few scriptures to which Paul does make reference in this connection have to do with the exaltation of Jesus, rather than with his resurrection as such. Of paramount importance for Paul is that the resurrection of Jesus makes possible the moral renewal and transformation of God's new people, who are invited to share in the new life of obedience and victory over sin, which Jesus' resurrection has made possible and for which it is a model (Phil. 3:10; Rom. 6:5; II Cor. 4:10).

One striking detail of the resurrection tradition, which Paul draws upon in I Corinthians 15, is the claim that Jesus was raised "on the third day." That tradition may be based on a historical tradition as to when the appearances began, or it may derive from the prophecy of Hosea 6:2 (which predicts that God will restore people "on the third day"), or it may represent an effort to demonstrate that the Resurrection took place in space and time, rather than as a merely inner or spiritual experience. Or it may be a combination of these factors. Unlike Paul, the Gospels all point initially to the emptiness of the tomb of Jesus on the morning after the Sabbath (Mark 16:1, 6; Matt. 28:1, 5, 6; Luke 24:1, 2; John 20:1), which by Jewish calculation would be "the third day."

Another form of pre-Pauline tradition that presupposes Jesus' being restored to life, without actually referring to the Resurrection, is the words of institution of the Lord's Supper, where reference is made to the restoration of fellowship with the disciples in the kingdom of God (Mark 14:25) or to his coming to them in the future (I Cor. 11:26). Apart from this feature of expectation of renewal of fellowship in the Age to Come, and the predictions that God will vindicate him by raising him from the dead (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33, and parallels in Luke and Matt.), the Gospels differ from Paul and among themselves in their portrayal of the appearances of Jesus after his death.

In Mark, in addition to the predictions of his being raised just mentioned, there are promises that Jesus will resume his role as leader of the disciples (14:28; 16:7). His exaltation as SON OF MAN is announced in connection with his prediction of the Temple's destruction (13:26). But there is merely a description of the empty tomb, and no report of a post-Resurrection appearance. In Luke, however, there are several stories of his appearances to groups of followers (24:13-22), in which Jesus stresses that what has happened to him is in fulfillment of Scripture (24:26, 32), and that he is a tangible human being, as demonstrated by his sharing a meal with the disciples—one in which the traditional eucharistic words appear: took, blessed, broke, gave.

In Matthew more attention is given to the miraculous details that accompany the descriptions of the Risen Jesus: the earthquake and angelic visit when the stone is rolled back (28:2), the felling of the Roman guards (28:4). The message of the Resurrection is explicit (28:16-20). There is in addition an apologetic feature that discounts the charge of the detractors of the Christians' belief in the Resurrection by claiming that the followers stole his body from the tomb (28:11-15). In John's Gospel, the Resurrection is no surprise, since Jesus throughout the narrative announces his eternal existence (8:58), his identity as "the resurrection and the life" (11:25), and that his death is to be regarded as his glorification (13:31-33). It is assumed throughout that he will be raised (14:2-3, 19, 28; 17:1, 13), and his appearances are described in detail (20:11-18, 19-28, and in the epilogue, John 21).

In Acts, the Resurrection is appealed to primarily as proof that Jesus, the chosen instrument of God, has been exalted (Acts 1:3, 6:11), that his death was in fulfillment of Scripture (2:22-28), and that God has now glorified Jesus (3:13-15; 7:56; 10:40-41; 13:33-35). In the post-Pauline letters, Jesus' resurrection is described almost entirely in terms of his exaltation as the triumphant agent of God who establishes God's rule in the Creation (Eph. 1:19-23; Col. 2:9-13). In I Peter the Resurrection is the ground of the new birth of Christians (I Pet. 1:3-7), and in Revelation, Christ is depicted as the Lamb that was slain, who is now exalted in the presence of God and who is God's agent to defeat the powers of evil and bring to earth the City of God, in which God dwells in the midst of people (Rev. 21). In spite of the variety of images, therefore, the different NT writers share the conviction that the resurrection of Jesus is both the instrument of and the demonstration of his role as the one through whom God's kingdom is established in the earth.

H.K.

RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD. The belief in the resurrection of the dead began to develop in Jewish thinking only in the two centuries before the birth of Jesus. The earlier view of human existence assumed that God had animated human beings by a divine breath or Spirit (Gen. 2:7) and that in death the Spirit returned to God and the body was placed in its eternal home (Eccl. 12:5-7). A common way to describe death was joining one's ancestors in sleep, as David (I Kings 2:10), Solomon (I Kings 11:43), and Hezekiah (II Chr. 32:33) had done. There was no notion that these would awaken from that everlasting sleep. The abode of the dead was known as SHEOL, and was pictured as a vast underground tomb, where those who once lived are only shadows, where "maggots are the bed beneath you, and worms are your covering" (Isa. 14:11). This attitude toward the fate of the dead was shared with other cultures in Mesopotamia. Nevertheless, in some of the Psalms there are occasional expressions of hope for a share in the life of God beyond death, as in Psalms 16:10; 73:23-26. These remain undeveloped themes until the second century B.C.

Jewish thinking about the future of human existence was stimulated and challenged by alien religious and philosophical influences as well as the nation's bitter disappointment with the priestly Hasmonean family who, under the Maccabees, had gained political independence and freedom of worship for the Jews, but who had become secular, ruthless, and dependent on foreign powers. This tragic experience raised the questions, Is God just? Does God reward those who seek to obey God's laws, who endure martyrdom rather than dishonor the divine name?

The dominant religion of Persia during the period of Israel's exile in Babylon seems to have been what is now called Zoroastrianism, the doctrines of which included the concept of the supreme god overcoming the powers of evil by establishing the rule of righteousness and vindicating the faithful, who would be restored to life in a renewed creation. The Greek belief in the IMMORTALITY of the soul, in contrast to the decay and disappearance of the body, also had its influence on Jewish thinking in this period. No uniform pattern emerged, however, and it is impossible to determine how widespread interest was in the questions about life beyond death.

In the OT, the only clear statement about resurrection is in Daniel 12:2, where both the righteous and the disobedient are raised, the first group to everlasting life and the second to divine judgment. Less explicit, but seemingly pointing in the same direction, is Isaiah 26:19, which is part of an apocalyptic section of Isaiah in which assurance is offered to those who are suffering for their fidelity to Yahweh, the God of Israel. The period of divine wrath will soon be over and the divine vindication will follow.

Those Jews who were most open to the intellectual appeal of Greek philosophy incorporated the concept of the immortality of the soul into their hopes for future reward, as is most evident in the Wisdom of Solomon, where "blameless souls" are said to have been created in the image of God's own immortality (2:21-24), and where "the souls of the righteous" are to share in God's eternal rule over the Creation (3:1-8). In other Jewish writings of this period there is a clear belief in a bodily resurrection to share in the time of future blessing: II Baruch 50-51, for example, expects the faithful to be temporarily restored to a physical body, which will later be transformed to a body of glory; in some books, only the righteous are raised (Pss. of Sol.; I Enoch 83-90), while in others all humanity is raised for judgment (Sibylline Oracles; II Esdras; Testaments of the Twelve). In some documents, the divine fulfillment occurs on earth, but for others it occurs in paradise; for some it will take place in a Messianic Age, and for others in eternity. An important detail is that bodily, physical resurrection is to be expected by those who suffer a martyr's death (II Macc. 7:14-38; 14:46).

The Pharisees apparently believed in the resurrection, and the Sadducees did not (Mark 12:18), although Josephus' Wars describes the Pharisaic concept as though it were the immortality of the soul. The rabbinic teachings from the second century A.D. mingle representations of bodily resurrection with notions of the immortality of the soul. In the Dead Sea community's Scroll of the Rule (IV, 6-7) there is a belief in life after death for those who "walk in the Spirit," but the text does not specify whether this bliss is in or outside the body. Clearly there was in Judaism in this period a widespread concern for the destiny of humans beyond death, but no clear concept of the form that immortal existence would take.

REUBEN. The firstborn son of Leah and Jacob, and the tribe named for him.

After working seven years to marry Rachel, Reuben's father, JACOB, was tricked into marrying her older sister Leah (Gen. 29:1-26). Reuben, their first son, is listed first in the twelve tribes of Israel (Jacob). Jacob then worked another seven years to earn Rachel. Reuben found some ripe mandrakes, an herb with an edible root and berry (30:14). Rachel bargained with her sister Leah to have some of these mandrakes in hopes of increasing her (Rachel's) fertility, and later gave birth to Joseph and Benjamin. Reaching adulthood, Reuben lay with Bilhah, his father's concubine, challenging his father (35:22).

One day Reuben's brother JOSEPH came out to show the eleven brothers the coat of many colors their father had given him (37:3-4). When they began plotting to kill Joseph, Reuben convinced them to throw him into a pit instead, from where Reuben intended to rescue him. Without Reuben's knowledge, the brothers then sold Joseph into slavery (37:17b-28).

Later it was Reuben, after he and his brother had gone down to Egypt to get food during a famine, who suggested that their harsh treatment of Joseph earlier was bringing trouble upon them (42:22). It was also Reuben who promised his father Jacob that he would give his own two sons' lives if he did not return Benjamin home safely (42:37). Before he died, Jacob blessed each of his sons. Reuben he called preeminent in pride and power but unstable as water, and warned that Reuben would not have preeminence because he had defiled his father's bed (49:3-4).

Possibly beginning west of the Jordan, the tribe settled east of the Jordan in the land east of the northern part of the Dead Sea. Their strength and numbers dwindled over the years, and Moses blessed them with the words "Let Reuben live, and not die" (Deut. 33:6). The tribe is rebuked in the Song of Deborah for not having taken part in the battle against the Canaanites (Judg. 5:15-16). During the period of the kings the tribe played no further role.

REVELATION, BOOK OF. The last book of the NT in most Christian canonical lists is called in Greek the Apocalypse, which means "Revelation." The name indicates more, however, than just that some things are revealed in the book to its author. The term "apocalypse" refers to a type of literature prevalent in the period between the OT and the NT, which emphasized the impending end of the world and the triumph of good and light over evil and darkness. The conflict was described in this literature, typically, in bizarre terms that tended to identify good with the color white and tame animals, and bad with the colors black or red and wild animals. A common theme of APOCALYPTICISM is that the sufferings of the righteous are caused not by the punishment of God but by the afflictions of Satan, who seeks to turn the sufferer away from God. The book of Job is an ancient prototype of this teaching. Paul reflects upon this when he says, "Yea, all that live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (II Tim. 3:12), as did Jesus when he said, "Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake" (Matt. 5:10).

The book of Revelation is the only book of its type in the NT, but many other examples exist in the period before the NT, in such books as I Enoch and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, and in the period after the NT in such books as the Ascension of Isaiah and the Apocalypse of Peter. It was a literature of the oppressed who looked for a solution to their plight not on the plane of human history but in God's own action. Apocalyptic literature flourished in the hopes of Jews under oppression. The literature enflamed the Zealots of the first centuries B.C. and A.D., but when both wars of liberation (A.D. 70 and A.D. 135) ended in disaster for the Jewish nation, interest waned in apocalypticism. It seems to have made its way into Jewish Christianity in those early centuries, however, in the wake of Jewish Christian reaction to the destruction of Jerusalem, which was different from that of non-Christian Jews. Those who were Christian continued to look for an apocalyptic solution in the newly found Messiah, which Judaism had rejected. In this hope apocalyptic thought continued to flourish and the book of Revelation was written.

The date of its composition is not known for certain, but Eusebius dated the exile of the apostle John to Patmos during the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96), which is when Irenaeus writing in the second century had dated it. Scholarship over the past century has tended to agree with this, though there is no unanimity of opinion. Recently John A. T. Robinson dated the book to the period before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

The authorship has been equally troublesome to determine, and no final consensus prevails here either. Most have held in recent times that the book was written not by John the Apostle, but by another John who refers to himself in 1:4, 9. Dionysius of Alexandria decided in the third century, on the basis of grammatical style, that there were two different authors for the Gospel and the Apocalypse. Papias declared, in the second century, that the apostle wrote the Gospel and another John, known as "the elder" (see II John 1; III John 1), wrote the Apocalypse. It has become commonplace to attribute the Apocalypse to this other John, but the evidence has not been strong enough to make the hypothesis a fact. Although many modern commentators are convinced that the grammatical styles of the two books are incompatible, the greatest scholar of the third century, Origen of Alexandria, was not.

The book professes to be written about things that "must soon take place" (1:1), and it seems best to regard it as a revelation about persecutions that the first readers would soon be facing. The latter part of the book (chaps. 20–22) seems to contain references to events in the distant future, however. Envisioned by the author was the divine intervention of God after a great catastrophe had befallen the world, a catastrophe involving supernatural terrors that John is preparing the church to meet and overcome. The major thrust of the book is that the Lamb will conquer the Dragon (Christ will conquer Satan).

The book of Revelation was known and used by authors in the second century (Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Papias, Melito of Sardis), the third century (Tertullian, Cyprian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen), and the fourth century (Eusebius, Jerome). It was not accepted, however, into the canon of the Syrian church by the fourth century, having been omitted from the influential Peshitta Version, but was incorporated into the Philoxenian translation in the beginning of the sixth century. Under the influence of Jerome and Augustine it was recognized more widely in the West. Portions of the text exist in papyrus manuscripts dating to the third century. (See also ESCHATOLOGY.) J.R.M.

REVELATION IN HISTORY. See INSPIRATION AND REVELATION.

REVISED STANDARD VERSION (RSV). The International Council of Religious Education, an agency of the major American and Canadian churches, launched the effort to revise the AMERICAN STANDARD VERSION. The project continued after the ICRE became a part of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.

The translators were to "embody the best results of modern scholarship as to the meaning of Scriptures," and they were to "express this meaning in English diction" suitable "for use in public and private worship." Still the new Revised Standard Version was to retain "those qualities which have given to the King James Version a supreme place in English literature."

While a large segment of the Christian public accepted the new version when the NT appeared in 1946, the OT in 1952, and the Apocrypha in 1957, ultraconservatives in the United States were harshly critical of it. They were suspicious of this translation of the Bible because of its sponsors and also because "young woman" was substituted for "virgin" in Isaiah 7:14. This was regarded as a subtle undermining of the virgin birth of Christ. There were other renderings also that conservatives regarded with suspicion.

A Roman Catholic version was published in 1965, bearing the imprimatur of the church. As a result, the RSV received wide acceptance among Catholics as well as Protestants. A British version had wide acceptance with all stripes of believers, including evangelicals. Soon it was warmly received throughout the English-speaking world.

Due to the proliferation of new translations in contemporary English during the 1970s, sales of the RSV have slumped somewhat. Yet it continues as a preferred version in most of the major denominations in the United States. R.H.

REVISED VERSION (RV). Since biblical scholarship had advanced by the late part of the nineteenth century and a trove of new biblical manuscripts had been discovered, pressure began to build for a revision of the 1611 translation of the KING JAMES VERSION. Therefore, the Convocation of Canterbury in 1870 voted to undertake "a revision of the Authorized Version of the Holy Scriptures."

It was decided to invite scholars from a wide spectrum of the church and to include both British and Americans on the two committees of OT and NT translators. In due time the Revised Version (RV), sometimes referred to as the English Revised Version (ERV), appeared. The NT was published in 1881 and the entire Bible in 1885.

Because of the strict rules of procedure, the resultant product was regarded by many as too awkward in style for liturgical use. The American scholars later produced their own rendering, which was published in 1901 as the AMERICAN STANDARD VERSION (ASV). R.H.

REVIVALS. Periods of religious fervor when the faith of Christians is revitalized and non-Christians are converted. While one could refer to such periods as the twelfth-century flourishing of MONASTICISM or the fourteenth-century intensity of devotion as "revivals," the term is usually reserved for the modern phenomenon, which grew out of the PURITAN emphasis on conversion as a personal, emotional commitment and on the necessity of such a conversion for church membership.

Revivals are the Protestant religious corollary of "awakenings" or periods of national/cultural crisis in beliefs and values extending over a generation until reorientation is achieved. Puritanism (1610–40) is the birthplace of American cultural understandings, followed by the First GREAT AWAKENING (1730–60), the Second (1800–30), the Third (1890–1920), and the Fourth (1960–). Revivals have been identified with the work of revivalist preachers such as JONATHAN EDWARDS, GEORGE WHITEFIELD, CHARLES G. FINNEY, Phoebe Palmer, DWIGHT MOODY, BILLY SUNDAY, and BILLY GRAHAM. British revivals include the Evangelical Revival of

JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY in the 1740s and the 1859-65 revival, which was linked to America's "laymen's," "prayermeeting," or "holiness" revival. Western missionary efforts have also sparked revivals in such places as Korea and Indonesia. N.H.

REWARD. Pay or return for something done or left undone. Reward is used in many ways, such as in employment where the value for labor is determined by the rights of the laborer or the generosity of the employer.

In ethics, reward and punishment relate to the pleasant or painful consequences of choices made or not made. In religion, reward and punishment have to do with SALVATION. In some religions, rewards and punishments are corporate, individuals being involved solely as parts of the whole society. In still other religions, rewards and punishments are matters for the individual person who, on the basis of choices, will be rewarded or punished in this life or in life after death. The decision of who is rewarded or punished, that is, JUDGMENT, is variously described. In a state or nationalistic religion, rewards are those of a good citizen, punishment is specified in the civil or criminal codes.

In the Bible, rewards may be everyday wages or earnings (Matt. 20:8; Jas. 5:4; I Tim. 6:9; compare Matt. 10:10; Luke 10:7) or may be compensation generally as "they have their reward," spoken by Jesus concerning hypocrites (Matt. 6:2; 5:16); "your reward is great in heaven" (Matt. 5:12); "love your enemies, and do good . . . and your reward will be great" (Luke 6:35).

That good produces good consequences and that evil results in evil is an ethical principle or law essential in biblical thinking. "The wages of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life" (Rom. 6:23). Like the law of gravity, that law is obeyed or people suffer the consequences, for example, Amos' plumb line (7:7) and Jesus' parable of the two houses (Matt. 7:24-27; Luke 6:47-49 and Ezek. 33:11, 12; Mic. 6:15) and "whatever a man sows, that he will also reap" (Gal. 6:7). It is wisdom to follow this, and folly to ignore. Herein is judgment in the realm of practical affairs applicable to nations as well as to individuals.

Judgment is under God's control. God may make rewards greater than those merited (Pss. 100:6; 103:10; Matt. 20:1-16). Or the punishment may be total annihilation as Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:24). Joseph's fidelity under temptation brought good to him and saved the lives of his family (Gen. 50:20).

As with piety and humility, rewards cannot be striven for directly, they are by-products of commitment. "Seek first God's kingdom . . . and all things shall be yours as well" (Matt. 18:33). Beyond all other rewards is fellowship with God now (Ps. 73:25ff.; Job 42:5) and eternally in the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:22). P.L.G.

REZIN. (1) Name of the final king of independent Syria, a contemporary of Pekah of Israel and of Jothan and Ahaz of Judah. Tiglath-pileser III took Damascus in 732 B.C. and killed Rezin (II Kings 16:9). The OT mentions Rezin in connection with the attack he and Pekah made on Jerusalem about 735 B.C. (II Kings 15:37; 16:5; Isa. 7:1). Isaiah considered Rezin and Pekah "two smoldering stumps of firebrands" (7:4).

(2) The "sons of Rezin" (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:50) were a Jewish family connected with a Temple guild, the Nethinim, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon in 536 B.C. P.L.G.

REZON. Son of Eliada and an early supporter of the king of Zobah. He moved to Damascus where, during Solomon's reign, the band of men he gathered about him made him king. He was "an adversary of Israel" who did "mischief"; "he abhorred Israel" (I Kings 11:23-25). P.L.G.

RHODES. The easternmost and second largest island in the Aegean Sea, ten miles south of Asia Minor. Its position on the east-west shipping lanes of the Mediterranean made it, through much of history, a major trading center.

Although Rhodes had supported the Roman imperial expansion, Gaius Cassius Longinus, in 43 B.C., in the name of the triumvirate, mercilessly sacked the capital city, Rhodes, confiscated all public and private silver and gold, and transported it and many Rhodian works of art to Rome. This disaster left Rhodes the defeated and impoverished country it was when Paul landed there (Acts 21:1). Whether he stopped at the capital city or elsewhere is not known. Local tradition points to the "Port of Paul," an almost completely enclosed bay on the east side of the island, and north of the acropolis of Lindos. By the shore there is a very old church and monastery commemorating the apostle. P.L.G.

RICCI, MATTHEW (1552-1610). An Italian Jesuit; one of the greatest of the Christian missionaries to China. He entered China via Macao, a Portuguese colony, bringing with him clocks, astronomical and musical instruments, richly bound books, European paintings, and the most astounding to the Chinese, a map of the world. He began early to learn the Mandarin language and the Chinese classics. He showed himself to be a Christian priest, but he adopted Chinese dress and continued his studies of the language and literature of China. Making his way into official circles, by 1601 Ricci was invited by the emperor to visit Peking. There he was asked to remain and teach science at the court. He translated many European works into Mandarin and wrote books in that language about Christian beliefs. His book True Knowledge of God (1603) led to the first conversions in Korea. He met with much criticism from more conservative Christians for his acceptance of Chinese culture and customs into his Christian teaching. W.G.

RICHARD, TIMOTHY (1845–1919). A Welsh Baptist missionary whose methods and approach to work in China has been said to be similar to the earlier policies of RICCI, the great Jesuit missionary to China. He was sent to China in 1870. The famine of 1876–79 convinced Richard that a new approach needed to be made to the leaders of China who had refused needed help because they thought Westerners were barbarians. He advocated that colleges be established in every province to help win the thinking upper classes. After troubles during the Boxer Rebellion (about 1900), modern style education spread, and many eventual leaders of China were trained in these Christian institutions. Although Richard was little known outside missionary circles, his policies became accepted as an important part of missionary endeavor in many lands. W.G.

RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR. A twelfth-century Scottish monk and theologian of mysticism. Richard entered the Abbey of St. Victor in Paris, studying under Hugh of St. Victor. He became prior there in 1162. As a theologian he wrote De Trinitate and commentaries on Scripture, but he is best remembered for his mystical works Benjamin Major and Benjamin Minor. Benjamin, the beloved son of Rachel, is a symbol for the contemplative life. Richard calls mysticism "the science of the heart." His rigorous intellect, though disdaining secular learning, digested the older traditions of Plotinus and Dionysius the Areopagite and transmitted them to the medieval world. For the Victorines, MYSTICISM is a proper branch of theology. N.H.

RICHELIEU, ARMAND JEAN DU PLESSIS (1585–1642). Born on September 9, the third son of lesser nobility at Poitou, France, he became chief minister in 1628 to Louis XIII. Richelieu was a prime example of the medieval use of power for both ecclesiastical and secular ends. Though a cleric, he brought about the secularization of politics.

Richelieu was ordained priest and consecrated bishop of Luçon at Rome in August 1607. He was made a cardinal September 5, 1622, by Pope Gregory XV. He rose in power as adviser to Marie de Medici, the mother of Louis XIII, and almoner to Anne of Austria, Louis' child queen. In 1616 he became the king's secretary of state and in 1624 was appointed chief of the royal council.

His political goals were to establish royal absolutism and weaken the power of the nobility. His ultimate goal was to shift the European balance of power from the Hapsburgs of Spain to the Bourbons of France. Though he persecuted the Huguenots, stripping them of constitutional safeguards and defeating them at LaRochelle in 1628, he aligned France with the Protestant powers of Germany and against Spanish interests during the Thirty Years' War. Though it came after his death, Richelieu managed to lay down the lines for the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648, which established the religious map of modern Europe. His power and diplomacy aided the recovery of the Protestant sovereigns and halted the sweep of the Counter-Reformation. A patron of the arts and founder of the French Academy in 1635, Richelieu was buried in a chapel at the Sorbonne following his death on December 4.

RICOEUR, PAUL (1913– ). French philosopher who has written widely on religion and theology, especially in the areas of phenomenology, the philosophy of language, and hermeneutics. Educated at the University of Paris, Ricoeur has served as professor of philosophy at the University of Strasbourg (1948–56), the University of Paris (1956–65), and the University of Chicago (1965– ), where, since 1976, he has been the John Nuveen Professor of Philosophical Theology. His many books include Fallible Man (1965), History and Truth (1965), Freedom and Nature: The Voluntary and Involuntary (1966), The Symbolism of Evil (1967), Freud and Philosophy (1970), Conflict of Interpretations (1974), and The Rule of Metaphor (1978).

Ricoeur's early work explored the phenomenology of the will or volition, especially the themes of freedom, necessity, human finitude, and guilt. These studies in existential phenomenology show the influence of HUSSERL as well as JASPERS and MARCEL. Ricoeur's study of the use of symbolic language in The Symbolism of Evil turned his interests to the problem of language, especially the religious use of the indirect language of metaphor and myth. This led in turn to reflection on the more general questions of hermeneutics, or the theory of interpretation. Ricoeur developed the interesting distinction between a reductive hermeneutics of suspicion as found in Freud and Marx and a hermeneutics of recollection in which one seeks to retrieve the original meaning of the religious symbol. This involves a move from a first naïveté through criticism to a second naïveté. Ricoeur's more recent work shows the influence of French structuralism, in which interpretation is more concerned with the objective meaning of the text as distinct from the subjective intention of the author or the appropriation by the reader. RIGHTEOUSNESS. As a key biblical idea the term covers two aspects of the divine character: it defines what God is and how God acts in history, and it sets a standard, based on that character, which is expected of God's people, both Israel in the OT and the church of Christ in the NT. There is thus both an ontological-historical dimension and an ethical connotation to the term. Recent discussion, especially seen in John Reumann, Righteousness in the New Testament (1982), reports the result of a fruitful dialogue between Lutheran and Catholic scholars who have reached a consensus, namely that at a deeper level righteousness has to be seen as describing a personal relationship within a COVENANT, both the OT covenant of the Exodus and the NT covenant of redemption by Christ. On God's side, that aspect is best designated "saving activity" leading to Israel's calling to be Yahweh's people and the church's inclusion within God's redeeming purposes for the whole of humankind. The human counterpart is spelled out in terms of loyalty as "covenant-behavior," befitting those who enjoy a right relationship with God (see JUSTIFICATION).

Old Testament. Yahweh's person is embraced by this term "righteousness" (Isa. 24:16). Yahweh is "righteous" by definition, and so God acts in righteousness, that is, reliably, faithfully, in a trustworthy manner (Jer. 9:24; compare Deut. 32:4; Dan. 9:7). Yahweh speaks the truth (Isa. 45:19) and all Yahweh does is in line with the divinely revealed character. (See Exod. 9:27; Jer. 12:1.)

Two further applications are made of Yahweh's self-chosen conformity to this norm. Yahweh judges by upholding justice in the covenant community (Pss. 9:5; 119:7; Isa. 42:21; 58:2). Second and importantly, Yahweh vindicates the oppressed and delivers the captive, giving victory to the cause of people when they cry for redress and deliverance (Judg. 5:11; Isa. 41:2; 62:1, 2). It follows that "righteousness" shades into salvation, expressing God's gracious enterprise of deliverance (especially in Second Isaiah's prophecies, for example, Isa. 46:13; 51:5, 6, 8; compare 61:10). This may be called the clearest anticipation of the Christian gospel in the OT.

New Testament. See Romans 3:24-26; 4:24, 25; II Corinthians 5:18-21; Philippians 3:7-11. These are the three NT books that have preponderant references to righteousness. The unifying themes are that (1) righteousness is God's saving action in Christ; (2) it has a cosmic aspect, possessing the character of both gift and power, and denotes a new world set right with the Creator's plan; (3) its entry into human experience is faith in Christ who as the "righteous one" both makes possible human response and sets the new ethical standards in the gift of the Spirit in the new age (Rom. 8:1-4; Gal. 5:5) to enable believers to be "made righteous" (I Cor. 1:30) and to live in conformity with God's righteous demands (compare Matt. 3:15; Rom. 14:17).

The OT teaching on righteousness as a way of life, from the Davidic king who rules in righteousness (Jer. 23:5) to obedience to the law as a hallmark of covenant relations (Isa. 51:7; Ezek. 18:19, 21), is thus realized in the NT. The locus of this teaching is in the community of the new covenant (Jer. 31:31-34) heralded by Jesus' upper room words (Matt. 26:26-29) and made real in the NT picture of early companies of believers in Jesus Christ who sought to live righteously (Luke 1:75), both in relation to God's purpose and in their mutual life (I John 3:7, 10). No excuse is ever given for indulging in immoral ways, since the calling of the Christian in the NT churches is to be worked out in serious ethical endeavor. In the picturesque idiom of Revelation 19:8, the church of Christ is likened to the bride who is arrayed in white clothes: "fine linen stands for the righteous acts of the saints" (NIV). R.M.

RIGHT TO LIFE MOVEMENT. A descriptive term arising during the anti-abortion struggle in the United States, especially after the Supreme Court legalized abortion (during the first two trimesters of pregnancy) on January 22, 1973.

The Right to Life movement had its origins among Roman Catholics. As early as 1967 the Los Angeles diocese of the Roman Catholic church employed an advertising agency to promote a campaign advancing the Right to Life Leagues. Partisans identified their cause with the Declaration of Independence stating "that the right to life was inalienable." The Massachusetts Citizens for Life was founded in 1970, after Thomas Connelly discovered the number of abortions being performed at the Boston City Hospital. Massachusetts Citizens for Life was given great impetus by the positions taken by the vice president of the organization, Dr. Mildred Jefferson. The first black to graduate from Harvard Medical School, Dr. Jefferson soon became a prestigious national figure. She later became a director of the national Right to Life Committee.

The incident that sharpened the debate was the arrest of Dr. Kenneth Edelin, a highly professional gynecologist and obstetrician on the Boston City Hospital staff, who was indicted for manslaughter, in what was called the abortion of a living infant. Edelin's trial began January 6, 1975. About this time, Richard Viguerie, a conservative Protestant, espoused the Right to Life movement, adding a large new segment of supporters.

Colorado in 1967 was the first state to liberalize its abortion laws. Hawaii and New York followed in 1970. Challenges to similar laws in Georgia and Texas resulted in the Supreme Court's 1973 decision legalizing abortion. R.H.

RIG VEDA. The oldest and most important part of the VEDAS of HINDUISM, the Rig Veda is a collection of hymns addressed to the gods. They probably emerged as an oral tradition among the Aryan (Indo-European) invaders of ancient India around 1400-1200 B.C. R.E.

RINKART, MARTIN (1586-1649). German Lutheran pastor and hymn writer. Rinkart's greatest hymn of thanksgiving, "Now Thank We All Our God," was produced in the crucible of suffering caused by the Thirty Years' War. Born on April 23, in Eilenburg, a village in Saxony, Rinkart was the son of a coppersmith. As a youth he was a chorister at St. Thomas Church in nearby Leipzig. This was the church where later Johann Sebastian Bach was to serve as musical director. Young Rinkart sang to earn money to attend Leipzig University. He was ordained to the Lutheran ministry in his hometown of Eilenburg, serving the parish of that walled city through the suffering, plague, and famine of the long religious and political struggle between Protestant and Catholic forces. Twice Eilenburg was overrun by the Swedish army and once by Austrian troops. It has been erroneously reported that Rinkart composed this famous hymn in celebration of the Peace of Westphalia, but it is more likely that it marked the one hundredth anniversary of the Augsburg Confession. Rinkart wrote many other hymns but none has been as widely sung as Nun danket alle Gott. The English-speaking world owes a debt to Catherine Winkworth of Bristol, England, for translating the hymn into English. R.H.

RISSHO KOSEIKAI. A modern Japanese form of NICHIREN Buddhism, regarded as one of the "new religions" that arose before and after World War II. Like other Nichiren sects it bases its doctrines on the LOTUS SUTRA and uses in its worship the chant "Namu myo-ho-rengo-kyo" ("I give homage to the marvelous teaching of the Lotus Sutra").

Rissho Koseikai arose in the 1930s under the leadership of a remarkable woman, Myoko Naganuma, and a gifted man, Nikkyo Niwano. Mrs. Naganuma adopted many practices of traditional shamanism, including faith healing. After her death in 1957 the shamanistic practices were deemphasized in favor of more traditional Buddhist beliefs and practices. The concept of compassion for others, connected with the bodhisattva ideal, and the promise of salvation in terms of happiness and material blessing in the present life receive particular emphasis.

Much of Rissho Koseikai's popularity is due to the success of its small-group counseling procedures, known as boza, or "circle of harmony." Many of these groups are composed of women who have moved from the countryside to Tokyo and other cities. Companionship with others from the same rural area helps members deal with loneliness and alienation and affirm traditional values.

Mr. Niwano has been a leader in interfaith discussions and in the search for world peace. He has met with world leaders, including Pope Paul VI. The Great Sacred Hall in Tokyo, headquarters of the sect, is a striking blend of modern and traditional elements. Other buildings nearby include schools and a modern hospital. K.C.

RITSCHL, ALBRECHT (1822-89). German theologian and historian of Christian doctrine, considered to be the most influential Protestant theologian between F. SCHLEIERMACHER and K. BARTH. Born in Berlin, the son of a prominent Lutheran clergyman, Ritschl studied theology at Bonn, Halle, and Heidelberg but, initially, found most satisfaction at Tübingen under the tutelage of the Hegelian church historian F. C. BAUR. After taking his first teaching position at Bonn, Ritschl renounced Baur and developed his own distinctive interpretation of Christian origins and the history of doctrine. However, Ritschl's most important contribution was in the field of constructive theology which, taking the name of Ritschlianism, dominated Protestant theology in Germany from 1875 to World War I and in the English-speaking world during the early decades of the twentieth century.

Ritschl moved to Göttingen in 1864 and remained there for twenty-five years. Between 1870 and 1874 he published the three volumes of his major work, The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, whose themes were the focal point of Ritschl's own constructive interpretation of Christian theology. According to Ritschl, God is known neither by intuitive insight and mystical feeling (Schleiermacher) nor by philosophical speculation (Hegel). Religion is essentially a practical matter—in short, our experience of moral freedom. Religion is the warranty for the attainment of our spiritual victory over bondage to nature's necessity through the help of superhuman, spiritual power, or God. However, belief in God is always a value judgment of faith for Ritschl. God is known only through the effects of the Divine upon the individual, only, that is, as God is revealed to each person as the guarantor of that person's victory over the world.

For the Christian, the goodness and power of God are revealed in the person and work of Christ. However, knowledge of Christ is not based on a purely scientific, historical knowledge; Christ, too, is known only "through his benefits." Christ's divinity, therefore, is found in the service he renders and in the benefits he bestows. Ritschl insists that the Christian is not only justified and liberated from sin and nature's necessity through Christ's moral influence, the Christian is also called to an ethical task of reconciliation, or the upbuilding of the kingdom of God in and through the Christian community, the church. Ritschl's focus on the Christian's ethical vocation, on the social dimension of salvation within the Christian community, and on the regulative principle of the kingdom of God as a social ideal, had a profound influence on the SOCIAL GOSPEL and on theologians such as WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH.

RITUAL. Meaningful acts performed in appropriate circumstances and often following strictly prescribed patterns. In this broad sense, ritual pervades the whole of human life. Shaking hands with a friend or saluting an army officer are examples of ritual acts from everyday secular life. However, ritual has especial importance in religion. Every religion requires practice as well as belief from its adherents, and though not all religious practices are ritualistic (for the moral behavior demanded by a religion would not be considered ritual), yet every religion has some ritual dimension, however simple. In Protestantism, for instance, while the more elaborate forms of ritual have been rejected, new and simple rituals have emerged, such as solemnly carrying the Bible into the pulpit before the sermon.

In primitive and archaic religions, ritual was of very great importance. There was as yet no theology. Such religion, wrote anthropologist Marett, "was not so much thought out as danced out." Yet something like an incipient theology was already present in the meaningful actions performed in the ritual. The ritual might be the acting out of a myth or sacred story, and that myth, with its narrative form and its symbolic incidents, could be considered a halfway house between the ritual and its theological explication. These early rituals, then, were like sacred dramas. They might, as in the Greek mysteries, reenact the story of a god or a divine hero; or they might be suggestive of the processes of nature, as in the New Year ceremonies performed in Semitic religions. But these rituals did not just express a story for edification. They were also, as a form of doing, believed to be efficacious—they brought about results. Thus those who participated in the mysteries were believed to be united with the god or hero who was being celebrated, and to be made the recipients of power; while the New Year ceremonies were supposed to ensure the fertility of the flocks and fields for the coming year, as if there were an efficacious parallel between the ritual act and events in the world of nature.

Ritual persists into the higher religions. In Christianity, the most obvious examples of ritual are the SACRAMENTS. In baptism, the ritual act of pouring water over the baptized person or immersing in water can be understood as an act of cleansing from sin and, more elaborately, as being buried with Christ and then raised with him. In the Eucharist, the bread and wine become for the worshipers the Body and Blood of Christ, so that in receiving these visible objects, they inwardly receive Christ and are incorporated into him. Most Christians believe that these sacraments are not only illustrative of inward meanings but that they are actually efficacious in bringing about a new spiritual condition of the believer. There are many other ritual acts in Christianity, such as making the sign of the cross as a tacit affirmation of faith, laying on hands to signify the transmission of an office, kneeling in prayer as a sign of reverence, and so on. Similarly in Judaism, Islam, and the religions of the East, there are many rituals that survive, even though all of these religions have developed profound theologies.

Opinions differ about the value and importance of ritual and ceremonial. As mentioned above, Protestants have greatly reduced or simplified the rituals found among Catholic Christians. In all the great religions are found groups that reduce ritual or even seek to abolish it altogether. This might suggest that once religion has been thought out, it need no longer be danced out; or, to put it in another way, that religion should be completely interiorized. In the Christian tradition, for instance, the Quakers have abolished outward sacraments and have replaced them by acts of silent interior meditation. In Protestantism generally, preaching has become much more important than sacramental action. Religion has become verbalized, and the only kind of action that is encouraged is moral action.

Catholics, however, would contest the view that ritual ought to be phased out as religion becomes more self-consciously theological. It is true that the Anglican "ritualists" of the nineteenth century defended themselves by claiming that in the slum urban areas in which most of them worked, Christianity could be conveyed by ritual acts where it would never be understood through theological formulations. But most Catholics would choose a different ground for the defense of ritual. The human being is a psychosomatic unity, a creature of sense as well as intellect, of sight as well as sound. Hence the full expression of Christian faith and its full communication demand the visible act as well as the spoken word. The traditional High Mass is a multimedia experience, including words, action, music, and even incense. As such, it addresses the whole human being. This view is reinforced by the rise of television in recent decades and the consequent shift in communication from the verbal to the visible.

But even enthusiasts for the enduring importance of ritual would have to acknowledge that many rituals have a tendency to survive even after their significance has been forgotten or opinions have changed about what ought to be signified. Ritual has a built-in tendency to proliferate and then to become frozen and unchangeable. Recent liturgical changes in the Christian churches have tended to simplify the ritual, making it on the whole less fussy but at the same time placing emphasis on the important moments. Also, the strict precision required in the older rites has given way to a measure of flexibility. What is important is not the fact that something has always been done, but that what is done should be understood by the worshipers and should help to communicate to them and realize in them a religious truth. RIZPAH. Daughter of Aiah; concubine of Saul. After Saul's death, Abner took up with Rizpah, which amounted to claiming the throne (II Sam. 3:7; I Kings 2:22). When a famine arose later, David offered up two sons of Rizpah (II Sam. 21:1-9). Rizpah then began a heroic vigil by the bodies. B.J.

ROBERTS, DANIEL CRANE (1841-1907). Episcopal clergyman, educator, and hymn writer. Born on November 5, in Bridgehampton, New York, Roberts attended Kenyon College in Ohio. His studies were interrupted when he enlisted as a private in the Civil War. After completing preparation for the ministry, Roberts was ordained as a deacon in the Episcopal Church (1865) and a priest the following year. He served Christ Church, Montpelier, Vermont; St. John's, Lowell, Massachusetts; St. Thomas, Brandon, Vermont; and St. Paul's, Concord, New Hampshire, for nearly thirty years. He wrote the hymn "God of Our Fathers, Whose Almighty Hand" for the local Fourth of July centennial celebration while he was rector in Brandon, Vermont. He served as chaplain of the Grand Army of the Republic in New Hampshire and was active for many years in the New Hampshire State Historical Society. He died at Concord, New Hampshire, on October 31.

ROBERTS, ORAL GRANVILLE (1918- )

Famed faith healer and evangelist; founder of Oral Roberts University and the City of Faith hospital and medical center in Tulsa, Oklahoma. Born in Ada, Oklahoma, on January 24, Oral Roberts was reared by a family well acquainted with poverty. Oral was afflicted by a serious illness that has been described as tuberculosis and was said to have threatened his life at age sixteen or seventeen. Roberts frequently testifies in the manner in which he was healed of this illness by prayer.

For twelve years young Roberts served as pastor to several Pentecostal Holiness churches, the denomination in which he was nurtured. He attended Oklahoma Baptist University and Phillips University. In 1947 he began to travel extensively as a healing evangelist and in 1948 founded the Oral Roberts Evangelistic Association. His campaigns, conducted in a huge tent, attracted throngs of people seeking healing and salvation.

The Christian world was surprised when Roberts announced that he was moving his ministerial credentials from the Pentecostal Holiness church to the Methodist church. Then in 1963, he launched the beginning of Oral Roberts University in his home city of Tulsa. Before long ORU attracted attention as a school with high academic standards as well as very competitive athletic teams.

Meanwhile Roberts continued his ministry on television and at one time had the largest viewing audience in the religious field. The format of his television program was changed to feature performances by many performers enlisted from the show business world. Roberts, however, maintained the spiritual content of his TV specials. In 1981, amid controversy, Roberts opened the sixty-story City of Faith, which included a hospital, clinic, medical center, research center, and full-fledged medical school.

ROBINSON, ROBERT (1735-90). Baptist minister and hymn writer. Robinson, author of the beloved hymn "Come, Thou Fount of Every Blessing," came from a humble home in the village of Swaffham in the former county of Norfolk, England. He was born on September 27. His mother sent him off to London when he was fourteen to be apprenticed to a barber. Robinson was an undisciplined youth who spent his free time with a group of rowdies. When he was nineteen, he and his pals were on a drinking spree when they encountered a gypsy fortune teller whom they plied with drinks, seeking to obtain a prediction from her. To Robinson, she declared: "Young man, you will live to see your children and grandchildren." This prophetic declaration disturbed Robinson, but later he and his colleagues were bent on mischief as they stopped at an open-air revival meeting. They were there to scoff at "the poor deluded Methodists." However, the speaker, who was none other than George Whitefield, was preaching on Matthew 3:7. To his listeners the great evangelist declared "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?"

Robinson was convicted by the message and confessed his faith in Christ. Soon after, John Wesley appointed him to serve as pastor of the Calvinist Methodist Chapel in Norfolk. Subsequently he became an Independent, and for a time a Unitarian, before becoming a Baptist. He served for a number of years as pastor in Cambridge and became a forceful preacher despite his limited formal education. Later he was called to serve a church in Birmingham, but retired on his first night there. The next morning, his host found that he had died in the night. Among Robinson's many publications is History of the Baptists (1790).

Homer Rodeheaver

RODEHEAVER, HOMER ALVAN (1880–1955).

Famed gospel song leader and hymnbook publisher. Rodeheaver was born in Hocking County, Ohio. The family moved to Newton, Tennessee, where young Rodeheaver learned to play the cornet. While studying at Ohio Wesleyan University, Rodeheaver also began to play the trombone, which became the symbol of his later ministry as a gospel song leader for evangelists Billy SUNDAY and W. E. Biederwolf. For twenty-five years he headed Rodeheaver Publishers of Sacred Music, which then merged with another concern to be known as the Rodeheaver Hall-Mack Company. Rodeheaver wrote many songs, but he distinguished himself primarily as the promoter of the songs of other people, such as Charles Gabriel's "Brighten the Corner."

ROGERS, CARL RANSOM (1902– ). Psychologist, psychotherapist, and university professor best known for his "client-centered," non-directive theory of psychotherapy. Rogers favors what he calls a person-to-person rather than a doctor-patient relationship in counseling. Born on January 8, in Oak Park, Illinois, Rogers attended the University of Wisconsin, thinking perhaps he would enter the ministry. He attended a World Student Christian Conference in China in 1922 but thereafter turned away from the strict religious position in which he had been reared.

"I was forced to stretch my thinking," he says in an autobiographical essay entitled "This Is Me," which appeared in his book On Becoming a Person (1961), "to realize that sincere and honest people could believe in very divergent religious doctrines. In major ways I for the first time emancipated myself from the religious thinking of my parents, and realized I could not go along with them."

He was graduated from Wisconsin in 1924 with a Phi Beta Kappa key. He next attended Union Theological Seminary in New York, taking a seminar in which he hoped to resolve "his own religious doubts and questions." But he decided he could not work in a field "where I would be required to believe in some specified religious doctrine." He moved over to Columbia University Teachers College, where he took courses in psychology and psychiatry. He received an M.A. in 1928 and a Ph.D. in 1931 from Columbia, having specialized in child psychology.

Ohio State University called him in 1940 to serve as a full-time professor in clinical psychology. His book Counseling and Psychiatry (1942) appeared next. In 1945 he became professor of psychology at the University of Chicago and executive secretary of the University's Counseling Center. He remained at Chicago until 1957, when he accepted professorship in psychology at his alma mater, the University of Wisconsin. From 1964 through 1968 Rogers was appointed a resident fellow of the Western Behavioral Sciences Institute in LaJolla, California. In 1968, he joined the Center for Studies of the Person at LaJolla.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM. The worldwide ecclesiastical structure—the largest in CHRISTENDOM—known officially as the Holy Catholic and Apostolic church with its headquarters in the Vatican, a tiny enclave within the city of Rome. It is known as the "Roman" Catholic church as an expression of its submission to the bishop of Rome, the POPE, who is said to derive his supreme authority from the apostles and particularly to the primacy of Peter as Vicar of Christ. Without apology, it proclaims itself to be "the Catholic" (universal) church.

The Roman Catholic church, despite contemporary rumblings, still is hierarchical and authoritarian, requiring submission of clergy and laity. The pope exercises his administrative authority through the CARDINALS, who serve as his senate and his advisers. The global outreach of his government is extended through jurisdiction exercised first by archbishops, metropolitans or patriarchs, and then by bishops who direct their dioceses and parish priests at the congregational level. The pope either appoints or confirms the election of bishops and they in turn select diocesan officials and pastors. While there are some beginnings of lay representation in the direction of parishes, the teaching authority of the church has remained with the clergy.

The basic doctrines of the Catholic church are found in the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian creeds. After the Protestant REFORMATION the Roman Catholic church reasserted its claims to its unique authority, especially through the actions taken by the COUNCIL OF TRENT (1545-63), which was called during the CATHOLIC REFORMATION. Its disciplinary decrees were intended to reform the structure of the church and to halt the influence of PROTESTANTISM. At this gathering the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed was affirmed as a basis of faith: TRADITION and SCRIPTURE were declared as equal sources of the faith, and other positions that sought the revitalization of Catholicism were affirmed or reaffirmed.

The Roman Catholic church is a sacramental church; that is, the church regards itself as being the divinely appointed agent to convey the grace of God to humanity through the sacraments—baptism, confirmation, the Eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony. The Council of Trent taught that all seven sacraments were instituted by Christ.

While Catholic theologians sometimes employ the Pauline description of the church as the Body of Christ, they have developed the concept of the church as the extension of the Incarnation. In Mystici Corporis, the encyclical issued by Pius XII in 1943, the church as imperium, outside of which there is no salvation, and as the continuing Incarnation were melded. Thus the Body of Christ is equated with the Roman Catholic church in which Christ speaks and works as Christ did when he was on earth. The living voice of the church is held to expound infallibly the revealed truths contained in the deposit of faith.

Pope Paul VI in a speech at one of the later sessions of Vatican II said: "We must not think of the church as two substances but a single complex reality, the compound of a human and divine element. . . . The nature taken by the divine Word serves as the living organ of salvation in a union with Him which is indissoluble."

The Catholic position on baptism, which is administered to infants as well as adults, is said to cleanse the individual's original sin and restore original righteousness. The high point of Roman Catholic liturgy is the MASS. The word is derived from the Latin word missio, meaning dismiss, referring to the dismissal of catechumens before the Eucharist was celebrated. The Mass still closes with "Ite, missa est." Two main ideas are involved in the doctrine of the Mass: (1) the change whereby the bread and wine become the actual Body and Blood of Christ, the teaching known as TRANSUBSTANTIATION; and (2) the concept of the Mass as the reiterated "bloodless sacrifice" of Christ on the altar of the cross.

Vatican II, in its decree on the priestly life, continues the traditional teaching. Priests are "given the power of sacred Order, to offer sacrifice, forgive sin, and in the name of Christ publicly to exercise the office of priesthood in the community of the faithful." The confessional has always played an important part in sacramental teaching. PENANCE, which is allied to penitence, is required of those who have made their confession to a priest.

The veneration of MARY, the mother of the Lord, is a prominent feature of Roman Catholic worship. Even though there are many changes in the practices of contemporary Catholicism, devotion directed to the Blessed Virgin persists throughout the church. It can be traced to the early centuries of the church when her perpetual virginity was first mentioned. The Marian doctrine received considerable impetus at the Council of Ephesus (431), which upheld the title Theotokos (God-bearer). The Latin equivalent was Dei Genetrix or Mother of God.

Belief in Mary's intercession and directing prayers to her was a very early practice. Ambrose held her to be a type of the church, in that in giving birth to Christ she also brought forth Christians who were formed in her womb with him. The IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, the teaching that Mary was born "free from all stain of original sin," emerged late in the Middle Ages and did not become official church dogma until the bull issued by Pope Pius IX in 1854.

The ASSUMPTION, the belief that Mary at the completion of her earthly life "was taken up in body and soul to heavenly glory," did not become official teaching of the church until 1950. In modern times (nineteenth and twentieth centuries) efforts have been made to obtain a papal definition of Mary as "Mediatrix of All Graces" and "Co-Redemptress." Impetus has been given to Marian dogma by such diverse Catholic leaders as Edward Schillebeeckx, contemporary liberal Catholic theologian, who wrote a book called Mary, the Mother of Redemption, and Pope John Paul II, who journeyed to the Portuguese shrine of Fatima to thank Mary for preserving his life after the attempt was made to assassinate him.

Yet the Roman Catholic church cannot be described as a static entity. It is experiencing great internal turmoil on a number of issues. Even at the turn of the century the growth of what was called MODERNISM caused disturbances. Certain Catholic theologians had begun to accept forms of biblical higher criticism and similar teachings that had been embraced by a majority of Protestant scholars. Pius X condemned the movement and imposed an anti-modernist oath on the clergy. But it was the calling of VATICAN II (1962-65) by Pope John XXIII that really unleashed streams of progressive thought that have changed the course, perhaps irrevocably, of the Roman Catholic Church. Said John XXIII at the opening of the council: "The substance of the ancient doctrine of the deposit of faith is one thing, and the way in which it is presented is another."

HANS KÜNG analyzed the concept of papal infallibility (and incidentally biblical infallibility) in his book Infallible. In due time he was censured by his bishop and removed from the list of those officially permitted to teach Catholic theology. Other scholars have questioned the teachings of transubstantiation and clerical celibacy.

It is true that Vatican II had many beneficial effects, many observers have thought. The church now encourages Bible study by lay people, the Mass is celebrated in the vernacular, and there are new attitudes toward non-Catholic believers. Yet there are many who feel that in departing from the basis of authority in "sacred tradition, Holy Scripture, and the Church magisterium," progressive Catholic theologians have been too quick to embrace the theories of radical biblical criticism.

The concept that Protestants are heretics has been replaced by fellowship with "separated brethren." Some Catholic progressives look beyond Christian ecumenism to acceptance by Catholics of the non-Christian religions.

In various parts of the world, and especially in Latin America, leading Catholic theologians have turned their backs on the Catholicism that allied itself with despotic regimes, and some have become ardent proponents of LIBERATION THEOLOGY. The leaders in this new concern for the desperately poor and needy have adapted Marxist concepts to Christian ethical teaching. This has divided the church, especially in Latin America, into two camps—the traditionalists and the radical theologians and priests who have heartily embraced the teachings of revolutionary movements such as the Sandinistas of Nicaragua.

In the United States, progressive religious and priests have taken strong stands against the Vatican's official position on the role of women in the church. The diminishing number of candidates for the priesthood and the religious life has been attributed to the church's demands to maintain the regulations on clerical celibacy and what are regarded as limited opportunities for women to serve in more significant places of ministry. Lay people, especially in the United States, have expressed opposition to the Vatican's teaching on contraception, abortion, and divorce. The official Catholic position on nuclear warfare, service in the armed forces, capital punishment, and unbridled free enterprise has changed radically in recent years.

Another phenomenon in the Roman Catholic church has been the emergence of Catholic Pentecostalism or as it prefers to be known, charismatic renewal. What has grown to be a worldwide movement began in 1966 at Duquesne University in Pittsburgh. Influenced by some old-time Protestant Pentecostals, gatherings of Catholic believers reported that they had received gifts of the Spirit such as speaking in tongues, prophetic utterances, and were witnessing miracles of healing. The renewal has been characterized by emphasis on personal faith in Christ, increased interest in Bible study, and evangelistic outreach. To date there has been no tendency on the part of charismatics to leave the church. Many testify to a heightened interest in the Mass and devotion to Mary. It is difficult to assess the full significance of charismatic renewal, but there are indications that spirituality has increased, and there are signs of parish renewal.

There are now more than one billion professing Christians in the world. Of this number more than 600 million are Roman Catholics and more than 350 million are Protestants. Even though Catholics include all baptized believers in their statistics and most Protestants do not, Catholic dominance numerically seems to continue. With more than 50 million communicants listed in the United States, Catholics form the leading denomination, although the many varieties of Protestants total more than 100 million. In the United States there are 31 archdioceses and 131 dioceses, served by 320 bishops and 60,000 priests. Chicago, with a Catholic population of 2½ million, boasts the largest archdiocese. It is followed by Boston, Los Angeles, New York, Newark, and Philadelphia—all cities where the major religion is Roman Catholic. The vast Roman Catholic educational system is very impressive, from parochial grammar and high schools to huge and prestigious universities. No religious group, certainly not in America, has so devoted itself to providing the healing resources of hospitals, institutions that care for the needy, and charities of all descriptions.

The Catholic church proliferated in the United States earlier through large waves of immigrants. In recent decades their numbers have been amplified by millions of Hispanics from all the countries of Latin America and Asiatics from Vietnam, Cambodia (Kampuchea), Korea, and the Philippines. Because of the church's teaching against contraception and abortion, Catholic families have traditionally been large and this has led to a burgeoning Catholic population. Evangelization has augmented the ranks of converts—both blacks and whites—even in traditional Protestant sections of the country.

ROMAN CURIA. From the Latin phrase curia Romana, meaning the Roman court. The Curia consists of all the organizations that assist the pope in governing the Roman Catholic church. Such administrative bodies include the twelve Sacred Congregations, the Tribunals, and the Curial offices, along with certain standing commissions. The pope is finally responsible for all the decisions and actions of the Curia, as the administrators are exercising authority delegated from him. Popularly, "the Curia" denotes the pope and the papal family, including the cardinals, bishops, and priests residing in the Vatican. Particularly prominent parts of the Curia are the Chancery, the Dataria, and the Camera Apostolica, the divisions that make up the Curial offices.

ROMAN EMPIRE. In the first century B.C. the old Roman republic, weakened by social clashes between the rich and the poor, the corruption of wealthy nobility in the city of Rome as well as of the senate itself, the destruction of both a productive agricultural economy and decent urban life, the ravages of war upon the countryside, famine, taxes, and other factors, gave way to the control of military dictators and the emergence of the empire. Julius Caesar was assassinated in 44 B.C. on March 15, and into this vacuum stepped his adopted son, Octavian, who took control of the army after defeating Mark Antony in 31 B.C. By 27 B.C. he took the title of Augustus CAESAR and became the first emperor of the new Roman Empire. During his reign Jesus Christ was born (Luke 2:1). Augustus established the "Peace of Rome," which prevailed for two centuries, guaranteeing the conditions under which extensive travel might be conducted in peace and safety. This facilitated the spread of the Christian message. Paul refers to this general cultural condition as the "fullness of time" (Gal 4:4). Augustus (27 B.C.—A.D. 14) was followed by several other emperors who ruled during the lifetime of Jesus and the apostles: Tiberius (A.D. 14–37), Caligula (A.D. 37–41), Claudius (A.D. 41–54), and Nero (A.D. 54–68). Jesus died under Tiberius; Paul and Peter almost certainly died under Nero. Citizenship was granted to people in the provinces under certain conditions. Paul, a Jew, was a Roman citizen by birth (Acts 22:28ff.)

Archaeological evidence of the glory of the empire is everywhere present in the Mediterranean world and the Middle East. Stretches of the Egnatian Way and the Appian Way may still be seen in Greece and Italy, among other places. The road system was extensive, well built, and marked by frequent milestones measured from the heart of Rome. Aqueducts bringing water over long distances were built all over the empire and can be seen still today in Spain, Italy, Greece, Turkey, and Israel, among other countries. Roman arches were designed to bear heavy loads, enabling the construction of Roman theaters (and smaller odeia in which municipal business was conducted) in the heart of town. The Greeks had built their theaters into hillsides, usually at the edge of town. Thus town planning changed in the empire due to advanced engineering capabilities. Cities were laid out in orthogonal patterns with intersecting main streets (cardo) and secondary streets (decumanus), often with a tetrapylon at the central intersection. Architecture reflected the basic Greek patterns—Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian. Art, sculpture, and literature were greatly influenced by the Greeks, being done with occasional flares of creativity. Roman law gave the world a new sense of justice.

The empire in the time of Augustus, Trajan, and Hadrian (first and early second centuries A.D.) extended from Spain in the west to Armenia in the east, and from England (Britannia) in the north to Egypt in the south. Britannia, Mauretania, Dacia, Thracia, Moesia, Armenia, Assyria, Cappadocia, Mesopotamia, and Arabia Petraea were added after the death of Augustus. Some of the provinces, such as Achaia, were governed by proconsuls (Gallio, Acts 18:12) while others, such as Judea, were under procurators (Pilate, Matt. 27:2). In most towns under Roman rule the official positions were held by Romans. Kings, like Herod the Great and his sons, were allowed to govern only under the eye of Roman authority. In the fourth century Constantine, who became at least nominally a Christian, transferred the capital from Rome to Byzantium in the east and renamed it Constantinople. The west deteriorated, and eventually ROME fell to the barbarians. The old pagan Roman Empire then became the Christian Byzantine Empire, in which the power of the church gradually grew until it became a formidable rival to the power of the emperor. Augustine's City of God laid the theoretical foundation for the eventual supremacy of the pope over the emperor.

J.R.M.

ROMAN RELIGION. The oldest prehistoric religion in the area of ROME was tied to animism, magic, and polydemonism. It consisted of mere ritual, without theology, in its earliest expressions. After the founding of Rome, traditionally in 753 B.C., worship centered around one of the seven hills on which the city stood in later times, the Palatine Hill. During the time of the Etruscan kings pagan temples were built on the Capitoline Hill, but Augustus built his chapel to Apollo on the Palatine below which lay the home of the vestal virgins and the Sacred Way, which was the oldest street in Rome. Beside it were the oldest and holiest structures of the Roman religion. The oldest elements in the religion were often referred to as the "religion of Numa" because Numa Pompilius, the second Etruscan king, was considered the founder of religious law and tradition. The religious rituals of Roman religion, however, are thought to be much older and, since no records of the earliest times survive, they have to be perceived in the pre-Julian calendars dealing with the various festivals that were religiously oriented. They tell of primitive sacrifices of animals, fruit, grain, and wine offered to various gods.

This early agricultural orientation of Roman religion gave way to the temples, statues of gods, divination, and mythology that were introduced by the Etruscans and Greeks. As the state developed, religion was urbanized. The primitive religion was inevitably weakened. Into this instability was injected GREEK philosophy and oriental mythology, creating a religious syncretism. Out of this amalgamation of religious ideas and rituals absorbed by Roman conquest arose a new kind of Roman religion, quite different from the primitive religion of Numa. With the transition from republic to empire the rapid rise of the importance of the emperor contributed to the rising tide of state-centered awareness by the people, promoted by those who stood to benefit by a stronger central, political power. Enhancing that power with religious meaning was a predictable if gradual development.

A state cult emerged with the worship of the emperor, as the representative of the gods, at its center. EMPEROR WORSHIP reached beyond Rome to the empire. Already in the second century B.C. a cult of the genius of Rome had begun in the provinces. A temple erected in honor of the city of Rome was built in Smyrna. But with the rise of the empire the cult of the emperor developed and a temple was built in 29 B.C. to Augustus in Pergamum. By the end of his reign or shortly thereafter, an altar or temple of Rome and Augustus had been set up in most of the Roman provinces. Pergamum eventually had three temples dedicated to Roman emperors and was the center of emperor worship in Asia. The spirit of the religion was political, often commercial, and seldom if ever religious. The emperor was the high priest and head of the state religion, being responsible for maintaining proper relations between humans and gods. He was semidivine while living and a god after death. Conducting the cultic practices, which were purely formal acts of religious ritual, was an essential part of public business, comparable to collecting taxes. There were neither ethical nor doctrinal ramifications to the religion. Questions concerning the nature of God, the character and purpose of human existence, the ultimate destiny of humankind, and the sense of community of belief, such as existed in Judaism and Christianity, were foreign to the cult. Because it lacked those dimensions that were of most concern to its adherents it eventually and inevitably died. Oriental religions took its place. J.R.M.

ROMAN RITE. The ordinary, traditional Latin Mass of the Roman Catholic church, as contrasted with the several variations of the Latin Mass, such as the Ambrosian, Mozarabic, Carmelite, Carthusian, and Dominican. It was the most widely used Christian liturgy in the world before the authorization of masses in the vernacular of each country by Vatican Council II (1962-65). J.C.

ROMANS, LETTER TO THE. This letter, written by Paul to the church at Rome in the mid-fifties A.D., has been universally praised as one of the chief books of the NT and as giving the essence of Paul's teaching.

Setting. During a winter's respite—when the seas would be closed to navigation—Paul remained at Corinth (Acts 20:2-6), and it is traditionally believed that he wrote this letter while he was in that city. Thereafter, he planned to visit Jerusalem to carry the collection that had been gathered in the Gentile churches for the poverty-stricken Jerusalem Christian believers in the holy city. He had no prospect of what the future might hold (Rom. 15:31; compare Acts 20:3). So, it is suggested that this document was written as his "last will and testament," ensuring that, even if he never reached Rome—as he longed to do (Rom. 1:10, 13)—or even Jerusalem, there would be a record of his gospel to be sent to the western outpost of the church, for Christians to whom he was something of a stranger (1:13).

Clearly, at this time in his life, Paul had reached a turning point. According to Romans 14-16, especially 15:22-29, he makes it clear that, with his missionary work in eastern Mediterranean lands now concluded (Rom. 15:19, 23), he is ready to turn his face to new opportunities in the West. He is projecting a trip to Spain and wishes to secure the full support of the most influential church in the Christian world, at Rome, to aid him in his missionary outreach. He believes that they can, and will, do this; hence this is one reason for the letter.

Since it was Paul's intention to change the course of his mission and head in a new direction, we can well appreciate why he would want to "sum up" in this formal way the salient features of his preaching.

The tone and style of the earlier chapters (1-8) of his letter gives the impression of being just such a summing-up. Many scholars classify the letter—unlike other pieces of Paul's pastoral correspondence, more occasional in character—as "epistolary catechesis," that is, it is a letter couched in didactic form. It gives the substance of Paul's preaching and teaching for the training of new converts to the faith. It is also argumentative; and it also represents a sample of Paul's debating style, used in synagogue discussions and by the use of diatribe, to answer objections to his gospel from his Jewish compatriots (clearly in chaps. 2, 3). These combined features make the letter unique in Paul's writing to the churches. To be sure, it is a real letter, with addressees who are named (1:7), meant to meet the needs of a real-life, not an imaginary, congregation. But much of the argument is cast in the rhetorical style of exposition, as Paul enters into debate with his Jewish and Christian opponents (for example 3:4, 6, 27; 6:2, 15; 7:13; 9:14; 11:1, 11). These verses illustrate how he refuted false premises and conclusions in his enemies' and detractors' arguments.

The church at Rome sorely needed this statement of Paul's teaching. If chapter 16 is an essential part in the letter and not, as some teach, a detailed note of greeting addressed to Ephesus and tacked onto the copy of the Roman letters that eventually found their way to Ephesus, we can appeal to Romans 16:17-20 for the false ideas current. Even without that chapter, it is still obvious from chapters 14 and 15 that the church was divided over some practical issues, such as dietary rules and the observing of holy days. Two groups—the "strong" and the "weak"—were at loggerheads, and there were several other mediating positions taken on these issues. Paul wrote therefore to settle these churchly disputes.

A much more central concept of Paul in this letter relates to the Gentiles' freedom in the gospel. The position stated and enforced throughout the letter is that Paul's gospel is for all people (3:29), and salvation is designed to embrace all nations (10:12, 13) on the sole condition of human need (3:19-20), and God's grace in Christ offered to faith (3:24-26). New life is given on the basis of God's favor to all. The Jewish law is set on its true basis (3:31) when it is seen as pointing to Christ, who is both its goal and termination as a path of salvation (10:4). Christ is the universal Savior, and his people, whatever their racial origins, should find a center of unity as members in his own body in the one church (12:4-5). "Welcome one another, therefore, as Christ has welcomed you" (15:7) is the force in Paul's logic as well as his pastoral advice given at a distance.

Part of the problem within the church at Rome was evidently a suspicion created by Gentile arrogance, as this faction within multiracial house congregations was overemphasizing its independence of the church's Jewish origins in the OT and becoming forgetful of its indebtedness to historical Israel as God's chosen people (11:28). Paul tackles this issue at length in three chapters (9-11) by showing how Israel's past election, though frustrated by the nation's present disbelief and resistance to his message, will eventually be carried through to success. The outcome will be the salvation of Israel (11:26) as believing Jews will unite with the "wild olive" in Paul's Gentile mission to form one complete tree, and so "all Israel will be saved."

Plan. This letter is the most clearly structured of the surviving Pauline epistles. It is traditional to see three main divisions, with an exhortation (1:1-15) and conclusion (15:30-16:27). Paul is wrestling with three basic questions: How can sinful humanity be set right with God? What is the significance of Israel in history? What are the practical evidences in the outworking of Christian life and character? But these are not three unrelated matters. The single idea that binds them is the "righteousness of God," announced in the first chapter (1:16, 17), which then draws on Habakkuk 2:4. The prophet's statement, "The righteous shall live by faith," is sometimes taken to be the overarching text for Paul's treatment of chapters 1-8 in this letter. But the application of that verse in Habakkuk may be wider. Given that "righteousness" carries in this document its OT meaning of God's saving purpose, it then becomes possible to see how Paul is expounding God's salvation in three interconnected areas: (1) in the rescue of sinners from condemnation to new life by way of justification, reconciliation, and holy living (chaps. 1-8); (2) in the restoration of Israel, at least in its believing remnant now as a promise of a fuller response later to divine favor (chaps. 9-11); and (3) in the practical terms of daily living in the Christian society (chaps. 12-15 [16]). The main advantage of this way of seeing the infrastructure of Romans is that one is able to take in all the chapters and refuse to regard chapters 9-11 as an excursus and chapters 12-15 (16) as an appendix. We can also highlight the "center" or "heart" of Pauline theology as human recovery to God's family—for which the best modern term is reconciliation—as he is pleased to act, not only as Judge and Deliverer but most appropriately as Father. It can also be viewed as God's action to restore a fallen, alienated creation and to lead humans from their lostness "in Adam" to their inheritance "in Christ" (5:12-21), who is the first brother in a reconstituted and reconciled family of God (8:29) that embraces Jewish members (11:11-13) as well as Gentiles, and all sentient creatures and nature as well as human beings (8:19-21).

ROMANTICISM. A complex cultural movement of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries held together by a common reaction against the RATIONALISM, DEISM, and classicism of the late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The first pure phase of Romanticism ran from 1780 to 1830. During this period poets and artists such as Byron, Blake, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Beethoven, Chopin, Balzac, Goethe, and Schiller produced the fruits of their genius. The Romantics exalted the emotions, feeling, and the affections. It is quite wrong, however, to think that Romanticism repudiated reason and intellect. Rather, it sought to enlarge the vision of the Age of Reason by stressing both emotion and intellect, spiritual aspiration and feeling, as well as scientific fact.

The Romantics believed that experience involves much that eludes analytical reasoning, including the insights and powers derived from the affections, the will, intuition, and imagination. The Romantics were weary of abstract, rationalistic proofs for and against religion and Christianity in particular. They were unashamed to declare: "My experience is my proof." The essence of religion is in feeling and sentiment, not in abstract ideas. "Evidences of Christianity! I am weary of the word," wrote the poet Coleridge. The French writer Chateaubriand (1768-1848) perfectly represents Romantic sentiment in The Genius of Christianity (1802), for this popular apology shifts the argument for Christianity from rational demonstration to aesthetic feeling. The truth of Catholicism is found, according to Chateaubriand, in its symbolization of human aspiration and in its unexcelled beauty.

The Romantic emphasis on experience enhanced the value of individuality, in contrast to what was uniform and universal. Schleiermacher pointed out that nature everywhere aims at diversity and individuality. The Deist search for one universal religion was contrary to nature's multiplicity. The rich diversity of experience attracted the Romantics to past ages, to primitive societies, and to tastes and experiences that appeared to the Age of Reason as superstitious, even barbaric. The Romantics were especially drawn to the Middle Ages because it represented chivalric romance and the unity of religion and culture. Romanticism contributed to our modern historical consciousness and to historicism, in that it recognized that every historical occasion is unique and relative and must be understood and appreciated in terms of its own particular context and time. Attacking the past now seemed childish. This new appeal to history proved to be a two-edged sword for theology. It led to a new appreciation of ancient tradition and the organic development of that tradition over the centuries. This is evident in the work of both the Protestant and Catholic TUBINGEN SCHOOL. On the other hand, interest in history ushered in a period of intense investigation of the origins and development of Christianity, the results of which often challenged traditional doctrines and practices of the church.

Romantics envisioned nature not as a well-ordered machine, but as an insatiably dynamic and creative process. Behind and within nature they felt a spirit, a vital force, a Demiurge at work. This Spirit or God was not the Deist watchmaker God, wholly removed from creation. God is the vital Spirit immanent in all things, luring all creatures toward the achievement of their creative potential. "Call it Bliss! Heart! Love! God!" wrote Goethe, "I have no name for it. 'Tis feeling all."

Many Romantics found that through communion with nature they achieved an artless wisdom, which surpassed all knowledge and which brought with it spiritual repose. This gave the movement a distinctly religious sensibility. We are, in many respects, living today in a Romantic age. J.L.

ROME, CHURCHES OF. Rome, ancient capital of the ROMAN EMPIRE, present capital of Italy, and the location of VATICAN City, the headquarters of the 600-million-member Roman Catholic church, is known as the city of churches. Early Christian tradition links both Peter and Paul with Rome. There was a vigorous church there in the mid-first century A.D., as Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans during the decades of the fifties A.D.

Rome is the site of ST. PETER'S BASILICA, the largest Christian church in the world, and the seat of the pope. But Rome has several other basilicas and numerous other Roman Catholic churches. Among these are the basilica of St. Maria Maggiore (St. Mary Major), the Church of St. Peter in Chains, the Church of St. Prassede, the basilica of St. John Lateran, the basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls, the Church of St. Maria in Cosmedin, the Church of St. Maria delle Vittorie, and the Church of St. Maria di Trastevere.

The areas around St. Peter's Basilica, along with three other basilicas—St. Maria Maggiore, St. John Lateran, and St. Paul Outside the Walls—form the Vatican state, a temporal possession of the Roman Catholic church, ruled by the pope. The first basilica built in Rome was St. John Lateran, which dates back to A.D. 311-314; the second built was St. Peter's (A.D. 326); the third built was St. Paul Outside the Walls (A.D. 386); the fourth built was St. Maria Maggiore, which was begun in 432 and consecrated in A.D. 440.

The four basilicas of Rome have all undergone repairs, restorations, additions, and even complete rebuilding (in the case of St. Peter's, St. John's Lateran, and St. Paul's Outside the Walls) over the centuries. St. Maria Maggiore, also, has been much modified, chiefly in 1676 and 1758. St. Paul Outside the Walls stood intact from 386 until it was completely destroyed by fire in 1823. All of these historic churches and many of the smaller parish churches are full of priceless works of art, sacred relics, and reminders of the long, event-filled history of Western Christianity.

ROME, CITY OF. Traditionally (according to Titus Livius), Rome was founded April 21, 753 B.C. The original site of the city was some seventeen miles up the Tiber River from the Tyrrhenian Sea, in west central Italy, on seven hills. Originally a barbarous village ruled by petty kings (according to Tacitus), Rome, through warfare and trade, grew and developed into the Roman Republic by 509 B.C. Rome steadily grew in prominence in Italy and throughout the Mediterranean world until it became an empire (after the assassination of Julius Caesar in 44 B.C. and the civil war between Mark Antony and Octavius, who became Caesar Augustus, the first Roman Emperor). Rome went from glory to glory, conquering the Mediterranean world, western and central Europe, the Middle East and North Africa. Ultimately, external pressures by barbarian tribes, internal discord, and palace coups brought the fall of Rome in A.D. 410, when it was sacked by the Visigoths. The eastern ROMAN EMPIRE continued, ruled from Constantinople, or Byzantium, until A.D. 1492.

Rome was, and is, a city of glorious architectural structures. It has been built and rebuilt over and over again, beginning in the time of the republic and running down to the 1930s under Mussolini.

It was said that all roads led to Rome, and this was true because the Romans built sturdy roads all over their empire and posted stadia or mileposts along them giving the distance to Rome. A Roman once declared that all the sewers of Antioch (Asia) flowed through the streets of Rome. Indeed every fad, fashion, faith, and superstition from the East did come to Rome, including Judaism and Christianity. Thousands of Jews settled in Rome, and controversies among them (perhaps with Christian Jews) caused the emperor CLAUDIUS to expel many of them in A.D. 49. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (around A.D. 56) shows that a flourishing Christian church was there by that time, with some Christians in the emperor's household. Peter, too, is closely identified with Rome, and the "trophy" (or burial monument) of Peter under St. Peter's Basilica tends to confirm his presence there. Tradition holds that both Paul and Peter were martyred in Rome, under NERO, who had caused the city to be burned in A.D. 64 or 66. Nero destroyed the ghetto-like tenements of Rome's working classes and rebuilt the city, boasting that he found the city brick and left it marble.

The great Forum was begun by Julius Caesar and added to by many emperors. The Circus Maximus, the Colosseum, the baths of Caracala, and many other magnificent public works impressed the ancient world and still have the power to awe visitors almost seventeen centuries after Rome's fall. J.C.

ROOT AND BRANCH. A petition introduced by the PURITANS in the Long Parliament in London December 11, 1640, demanding that the episcopacy "with all its dependencies, roots, and branches, be abolished." The image comes from Malachi 4:1. Parliament did little with the petition initially; its introduction only alienated more moderate supporters. But bishops, deans, and chapters were abolished and church lands confiscated during the Civil War. N.H.

ROSARY. A popular Roman Catholic devotion in the cult of the Virgin Mary. It is a prayer directed to God through Mary, consisting of fifteen sets of ten HAIL MARYS (decades), each set opening with the Lord's Prayer and ending with the phrase, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit." The reciting of these prayers is accompanied by meditation upon the sufferings and glories of our Lord and the Virgin Mary. The rosary itself is similar to the prayer beads used both by Buddhists and Muslims. It is a string of small beads separated from each other by a larger bead, with a crucifix attached. Use of the rosary goes back at least to the twelfth century. Pope Pius V organized the pattern of saying the Rosary that is still followed. J.C.

ROSETTA STONE. An inscribed, irregularly shaped, thick block of basalt (3 feet 9 inches by 2 feet 4½ inches) found in August 1799, near the delta town of Rosetta, Egypt, during the Napoleonic campaigns. The second century B.C. text honors Ptolemy V Epiphanes by recording his benefactions to the Memphis priests.

Following the work by English physicist Thomas Young, Jean François Champollion, a brilliant young French scholar, in 1821-22 published the decipherment of the stone's text. The surface of the stone (now in the British Museum) is divided into three parts. Champollion discovered that the texts of the three parts were identical and were written in two ancient Egyptian scripts (hieroglyphic and Demotic) and in Hellenistic Greek. His conclusion, confirmed in 1866, has been generally accepted. This remarkable discovery allows scholars to translate previously unintelligible, ancient Egyptian writings. Egyptology, thus begun, has contributed much to our knowledge of Egyptian history and literature as well as to biblical backgrounds. P.L.G.

ROSH HASHANAH. The Jewish New Year. Unlike New Year celebrations of many people, the Jewish New Year is observed with a solemnity that is marked by prayer, contemplation, and soul-searching. Rosh Hashanah begins the pensive ten-day period known as the Days of Awe, which end with Yom Kippur, the DAY OF ATONEMENT. Despite its solemn character, Rosh Hashanah is a festival when Jews pray that "the righteous shall see and rejoice, the upright shall exult, and the devout shall delight in song." As it is written in Nehemiah 8:9-10, "This day is holy to the Lord your God; do not mourn or weep . . . do not be grieved, for the joy of the Lord is your strength."

Traditionally regarded as the first day of Creation, Rosh Hashanah is also called Yom ha-Zikaron (Day of Remembrance), and Yom ha-Din (Day of Judgment), in which God remembers all creatures and passes judgment on all human beings. Rosh Hashanah is also called Yom Teruah (Day of Blowing of the Ram's Horn) as a symbol of God's summons to the people for self-judgment, self-improvement, and atonement.

Prayer, solemnity, and rest from work mark the Jewish New Year. Apples dipped in honey are eaten in anticipation of a sweet and good year. On the first day, traditional Jews go to a body of water for tashlikh, the "casting out of sins."

ROSICRUCIANS. An esoteric society said to have existed since the days of ancient Egypt. Actually its true origins can be traced back to the early sixteenth century and to the writings of a Lutheran pastor, Johan Valentin Andrea (1586-1654). He apparently used the pseudonym Christian Rosenkreunz (rose cross) to author a series of pamphlets between 1614 and 1616. In Fama Fraternitatis and Confessio rosae crucis, two of the pamphlets, he announced the existence of a Rosicrucian fraternity that possessed occult powers. He said that Rosicrucianism had Eastern and Arab origins. It really was not until the eighteenth century, however, that Rosicrucian groups were formed in Germany, Russia, and Poland. The organization was known variously as the Brothers of the Rosy Cross, Rosy-Cross Knights and Rosy-Cross Philosophers. There was an apparent connection with FREEMASONRY. Indeed some Masonic lodges still offer an optional degree called the Rose Croix. The cross and rose symbolically declare the candidate's death and resurrection. In Great Britain this is a trinitarian rite that includes the reading of Isaiah 53. In the United States the same rite has pagan significance.

H. Spencer Lewis founded the Ancient Mystical

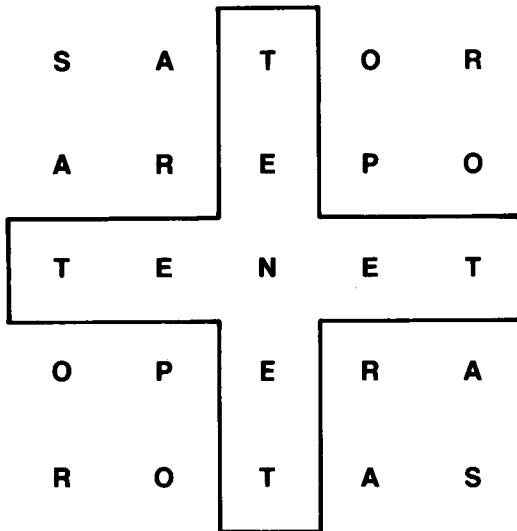

Order, Rosae Crucis (AMORC), with headquarters in San Jose, California. The Rosicrucian Brotherhood (Fraternitas Rosae Crucis) has headquarters in Quakertown, Pennsylvania, and the Society of Rosicrucians (Societas Rosicruciana in America) has offices in New York City.

AMORC has published the so-called "lost" Book of Jashar, which, it is believed, was written by Jacob live in 1751. Also published by the same group is a book called Secret Teachings of Jesus. American Rosicrucians are proponents of doctrines of THEOSOPHY. There is an emphasis in AMORC on developing psychic powers. The cross represents the human body rather than Christ's atoning death. The rose is said to contain a pure fluid that overcomes human passion.

Rotas-Sator Square

ROTAS-SATOR SQUARE. A cryptogram called the magic square. It is of uncertain date, origin, and interpretation.

Five Latin words of five letters are arranged in a square so that they can be read from top to bottom or from right to left as a sentence(?): Sator, "the sower"; Arepo, "with his plow"; Tenet, "holds"; Opera, "with purpose"; Rotas, "the wheels." Where the middle word "tenet" intersects, an equal-armed or Greek cross is formed. The design was first discovered in four copies at Dura-Europos in 1932, dating it to the third century A.D. In 1937, a copy was discovered at Pompeii (destroyed in 79 A.D.), which has raised doubts about its connections with Christianity.

ROUSSEAU, JEAN JACQUES (1712–78). The philosopher and political theorist who inspired the French Revolution and ROMANTICISM was born in Geneva, Switzerland, on June 28. After a Calvinist, working-class childhood, he ran away at sixteen, emigrated to Turin, and became a Roman Catholic. From 1733 to 1740 he lived in Chambéry, France.

His first publication was Dissertation sur la musique moderne (1743). His essay "Discours sur les sciences et les arts" (1750) created a stir by arguing that the arts and sciences served only the rich. He became friends with the Encyclopedists and contributed to their work. In 1754 he returned to Geneva, and to Calvinism to some extent. His Discours sur l'origine et les fondements de l'inegalite parmi les hommes suggested that primitive people are free and happy, and that society and reason corrupts the "noble savage." He spelled out the educational ramifications in Émile (1762). In Social Contract (1762), Rousseau outlined a theory of a just state based on the general consent of the populace. Both Émile and Social Contract were condemned by the parliament in Paris. He published his autobiographical Confessions (1781–88), in which he aimed "to show a man in all the truth of nature."

In an age of rationalism, Rousseau advocated a Deism centered in a personal relationship to God through conscience. His is a simple religion of love for God and humankind. Feeling is more important than thought. Nature and humanity are fundamentally good, though people are corrupted by society. He offered a substitute for revealed religion that was intellectually and emotionally satisfying. N.H.

ROYCE, JOSIAH (1855–1916). American idealist philosopher who had a lifelong interest in the problems of religion. In an early writing, The Religious Aspect of Philosophy (1885), he acknowledged that it was a religious interest that first drove him to philosophy. The variety of IDEALISM that Royce espoused was that known as "absolute idealism," in which the central reality is a spiritual Absolute. But, unlike some other absolute idealists, Royce did not believe that finite spirits are absorbed into the Absolute. They do indeed live within the Absolute, but the Absolute is "just to the finite aspect of every flying moment," so that the finite spirits are "ethically free individuals who are nevertheless one in God" (quoted from The World and the Individual, Royce's Gifford Lectures of 1900–1901). He laid great stress on the virtue of loyalty, defined as "the willing and thoroughgoing devotion of a self to a cause, when the cause is something which unites many selves in one." His last major writing, The Problem of Christianity (1912), expounded Christianity as a religion of loyalty, reaching out toward an ideal community that would be the realization of the divine on earth. His concern with loyalty was later to influence Marcel's stress on fidelity in interpersonal existence. J.M.

RUDRA. From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "the Howler" or "the Red One." A deity of the ancient VEDAS of HINDUISM who is said to inhabit wilderness areas and so to represent the powerful but unpredictable forces of nature. Rudra is an outsider who can sometimes be prevailed upon to heal, but can also be malevolent. He is generally considered to be a precursor of SHIVA in later Hinduism. R.E.

RULE OF FAITH (regula fidei). A summary of the Christian faith as handed down from the apostles, through the bishops, used primarily as a standard in catechetical instruction and as a guide for the interpretation of Scripture in preaching.

In contrast to creeds, rules of faith are more flexible in both wording and theological content. They became common before creeds, in the second half of the second century. Examples are found in the works of Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement, and Origen. Tertullian, for example, offers three different forms.

The rule of faith constituted the first summary of Christian TRADITION and was used as authority against the Gnostics. Irenaeus called the rule "the canon of the truth." The early church fathers assumed that the rule was not in contrast to Scripture but condensed the true meaning of Scripture and the apostles' teachings. The rule of faith was more useful than Scripture in theological debates because the Gnostics interpreted Scripture to support their own position and claimed secret traditions. The church fathers claimed that their rule of faith was the one universally accepted by the church. During the third century, tradition became more firmly fixed in the liturgy and developing creeds. Precise wording became more crucial in the emerging theological debates.

RUSSELL, CHARLES TAZE (1852–1916). Founder of the religious movement now known as JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. Born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Russell was employed as a clerk in a dry goods store. He disagreed with the teachings of the Congregationalist church in which he was reared, particularly the doctrine of eternal punishment. A self-taught student of the Bible, Russell began to develop his own set of doctrines. In 1872 he taught that the Second Coming of Christ would occur in 1874 and the end of the world would come in 1914. He refused trinitarian teaching, declaring that the Trinity meant "three Gods in one person." He also taught that Christ was the first created being and not the eternal divine Son of God.

Russell gained a group of followers and established an independent church in 1878, of which he was the pastor. His first book dealing with the Second Coming was entitled The Object and Manner of Our Lord's Return. In 1879 he launched a magazine called Zion's Watchtower and Herald of Christ's Presence. In 1881 he wrote Food for Thinking Christians, which was reissued five years later as Millennial Dawn, and later incorporated in his Studies of the Scriptures. By 1884 he had founded a publishing house, Zion's Watchtower Tract Society, which issued Russell's six volumes of Studies in the Scriptures (1886–1904). After his death a seventh volume on the book of Revelation was written by his followers. These seven volumes comprise the basis for the theology of Jehovah's Witnesses.

In 1909 Russell moved his headquarters to Brooklyn Tabernacle, New York City, where the growing movement of "Russellites" or "Millennial Dawnists" continued to thrive. Russell was a capable writer, with sermons syndicated in fifteen hundred papers. He also continued to travel extensively, and slide films synchronized with sound extended his vast ministry.

The world did not end in 1914, as Russell had predicted, but when World War I broke out, events only increased his popularity. In his works on Daniel and Revelation, similar to other Adventist writing, Russell taught a general revolution of the workers, followed by the resurrection of the dead, the Last Judgment, and the establishment of the messianic Kingdom on earth. Upon Russell's death the new head of the work was a lawyer named J. F. RUTHERFORD.

RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH. See ORTHODOX CHURCHES.

RUTH, BOOK OF. On the face of it, the story of Ruth and her mother-in-law, Naomi, is a story about human loyalty that transcends all bounds of duty and kinship. Ruth was a woman of Moab who married one of the sons of Elimelech and Naomi, Bethlehemites who had settled in her land. After the death of all of the men of the family and in a time of famine, Naomi determined to return to Bethlehem and urged her two daughters-in-law to remain with their kinfolk in Moab. The other woman, Orpah, was persuaded to do so, but Ruth uttered that cry of total human loyalty that has glorified her in all the ages since: "Where you go I will go, and where you lodge I will lodge; your people shall be my people, and your God my God; where you die I will die, and there will I be buried" (Ruth 1:16-17).

In the event, Ruth and Naomi did return to Bethlehem, and there through a series of honorable transactions, Ruth entered into a marriage contract with Boaz, a distant kinsman of Elimelech. Unlike an even closer relative, Boaz was willing to raise up through Ruth a family line for Naomi and her late son, thus fulfilling the law of leviratic marriage (Deut. 25:5-10). Thanks to Boaz' willingness to take the foreigner Ruth in marriage, she became an ancestor of David, according to the end of the book. Christians even acknowledge her as an ancestor of Jesus (Matt. 1:5, 16). Like the book of Jonah, the real purpose of the book of Ruth seems, therefore, to be an affirmation of the universal love of God for human beings and the universal scope of God's saving grace.

Although the book of Ruth is attached to the book of Judges in the Septuagint and in the English Bible tradition, it is commonly held now to have been written in the postexilic period. It is a classic example of the Hebrew narrative art, and some even regard it as the perfect example of storytelling in the Bible.

RUTHERFORD, JOSEPH FRANKLIN (1869–1941). Second head of the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, a name he gave to the organization in 1931. Born to a Missouri Baptist family, Rutherford obtained an attorney's license in 1892. For a time he served as a special judge in Missouri and so became known as "Judge" Rutherford. He met CHARLES TAZE RUSSELL through serving him as legal counsel and became a devout follower of his teachings. Thus he became a candidate to succeed Russell in the leadership of the proliferating organization.

Under Rutherford's firm hand the organization took on an increasingly revolutionary thrust. In 1918 he and six others were sentenced to twenty-one years in the federal prison at Atlanta after being charged with insubordination and disseminating propaganda against military service. Rutherford served nine months.

Like his predecessor, Rutherford was a prolific writer and crusader for the doctrines of the group. To give an explanation for Russell's failed prediction that the world would end in 1914, "Judge" Rutherford explained in 1921 that Christ actually returned invisibly in 1914 and had begun to purge his temple in 1918. Since Armageddon had been postponed and the Witnesses had grown well beyond the expected 144,000 (derived from Revelation 14), Rutherford discovered a new class in which many of his followers would be found.

RUYSBROECK, JAN VAN (1293–1381). Flemish mystic. Raised by a pious uncle who was a canon at St. Gudule in Brussels, Ruysbroeck was ordained in 1317 and became a chaplain there from 1317 to 1343. In 1343, along with two other priests, he moved to a hermitage at Groenendael. As others joined them, they formed an Augustinian abbey in 1349 of which Ruysbroeck became prior. His first mystical work, The Kingdom of the Lovers of God, derived much from Hadewych, who also spoke of mysticism's relationship between the soul and God as that between a lover and the beloved. Ruysbroeck's most famous work, The Spiritual Espousals (1350), is a commentary on "Behold, the Bridegroom comes." It is a guide for the soul searching for God. He also wrote The Seven Steps of the Ladder of Spiritual Love and The Sparkling Stone.

Ruysbroeck's spirituality, which anticipated the fifteenth-century devotio moderna, deeply influenced John Tauler, Gerard Groote, and Henry Suso. His fusion of the metaphysical and personal earned him the title of "the Ecstatic Doctor." He was beatified in 1908. His feast day is the anniversary of his death, December 2.

SABAOTH. Hebrew noun meaning "hosts," often located in the special epithet for Israel's God, "Yahweh of hosts." Aptly highlighting divine sovereignty and splendor, "Yahweh Sabaoth" is sometimes affirmed as God's very name (Amos 5:27; Jer. 10:16). Fundamentally a military term denoting an army of men (Judg. 4:2) or warfare itself (I Sam. 28:1), "Sabaoth" probably originated as a divine epithet at Shiloh, the central sanctuary of eleventh-century B.C. Israel (I Sam. 1:3). Yahweh of hosts is both the creator and commander of the celestial army (sun, moon, stars; Ps. 33:6; Deut. 4:19) and the determiner of historical events involving the subjection of God's wayward people to foreign power (Jer. 6:6) and their ultimate redemption (Isa. 47:4).

J.K.K.

SABBATARIANISM. A belief that Sunday should be observed as the OT SABBATH. According to the fourth commandment (Exod. 20:8-11), one should keep it holy and do no work. Constantine made Sunday a day of rest in A.D. 321.

The sabbatarian movement in its strictest form, however, is largely the creation of Scottish and English Reformers during the last two decades of the sixteenth century (it was not an issue on the Continent). Nicholas Bound's book True Doctrine of the Sabbath (1595) joined the issue. James I's Book of Sports (1618), which allowed sports on Sundays, provoked political controversy. The Puritan Parliament burned the book in 1643 and enforced strict Sabbath observance.

Puritans and Presbyterians brought the practice to America, where "blue laws" were enacted and continue to our day, though nearly obliterated by urbanization, industrialization, and immigration. Various nineteenth-century organizations tried to stem the tide. In 1828 the General Union for Promoting Observance of the Christian Sabbath mounted a petition campaign against mail delivery on Sunday. Evangelicals protested the opening on Sunday of the 1876 Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia and the 1893 Columbian Exposition in Chicago.

The word "sabbatarianism" is also sometimes applied to groups that consider the Jewish Sabbath, Saturday, as the proper day for Christian worship, that is, Seventh-day Adventists, and Seventh-day Baptists. N.H.

SABBATH. Jewish. The weekly day of rest, pleasure, and meditation. Jews acknowledge the period from sunset Friday to nightfall Saturday as their Sabbath. Most Christians observe it on Sunday and Moslems on Friday.

To the Jewish people, the weekly Sabbath is the holiest day in the Hebrew calendar, with the one exception of the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur).

The first thing in the world that God made holy was not a mountain, not an altar, not a land. It was a day—the Sabbath. “And God blessed the seventh day and made it holy” (Gen. 2:3).

In the Bible, the Sabbath is the only holy day of which observance is mandated in the Ten Commandments—first in Exodus and again in Deuteronomy. The first part of the Fourth Commandment, “Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy” (28:8 JPS), may show that the Sabbath was well established long before the Israelites stood at the foot of Mount Sinai.

Jews connect the Sabbath to two events: the Creation and the Exodus from Egypt. “And on the seventh day God finished His work which He had made; and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had made” (Gen. 2:2 JPS). “And thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God brought thee out thence by a mighty hand and by an outstretched arm; therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day” (Deut. 5:7, 15 JPS).

It is for this reason that the kiddush, the blessing over wine that ushers in the holy Sabbath, contains these words: “With loving favor Thou hast given us the heritage of Thy holy Sabbath, a memorial of Thy work of creation. That day is the first of the holy convocations, recalling our going forth from Egypt.”

The special status of the seventh day and its name were disclosed to the Jewish people (Israel) in the wilderness. For their food, God supplied their day's portion of manna for five days. On the sixth day, God provided a double portion of manna to last through the seventh day, on which no manna appeared. The Israelites were commanded to go out and collect and prepare each day's portion for the first five days. On the sixth day, they were to prepare for two days. On the seventh day they were not to go out. In this way, they learned that the seventh day is “a holy sabbath unto the Lord” (Exod. 16:23 JPS). The two loaves of Sabbath bread at the Friday night meal are a reminder of the double portion of manna.

Shabbat, the Hebrew word for the Sabbath, is related to the verb shavat, which means “cease, desist, rest (from work).” While the Bible does not specify all kinds of work forbidden on the Sabbath, it does mention a few, among them buying and selling, traveling, and cooking. The Mishnah, the largest post-biblical collection of Jewish laws, lists, under thirty-nine categories, all acts defined as work in Jewish law and therefore forbidden on the Sabbath. These include plowing, reaping, carrying loads, kindling a fire, writing, sewing, and the like. The prohibition against work on the Sabbath extends to the free and the slave alike and to beasts of burden. “. . . thou shalt not do any manner of work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates” (Exod. 20:10 JPS).

The Sabbath demands more than the stoppage of work, however. It is specifically marked off as a day devoted to God and to the life of the Spirit. It is to be honored by the kindling of lights, eating good food, wearing one's best clothes, worshiping, receiving religious instruction, studying, and demonstrating love for family and friends.

The most important observance of the Jewish Sabbath is in the home. Every home is perceived as a small sanctuary. The family table is the “altar.” In the observant home, the mother lights the candles at sundown Friday and recites a blessing over them. The father blesses the children. For boys, the blessing is, “May the Lord make thee as Ephraim and Manasseh”; for girls, the blessing is, “May the Lord make thee as Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, and Leah.” Then he recites the priestly blessing over all their children:

May the Lord bless thee and keep thee.
May the Lord cause His countenance to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee,
May the Lord lift up His countenance unto thee and give thee peace. Amen.

In honor of his wife, the husband recites “A woman of valor . . .” from Proverbs.

The Sabbath table is covered with the best tablecloth, set with the best dishes, with the kiddush cup, and with two loaves of Sabbath bread. The father says the kiddush over the wine and a blessing over the bread. After the Sabbath meal, blessings are said and joyful songs are sung.

In the synagogue, the Sabbath is welcomed as a bride and bidden farewell as a queen. Sabbath services include reading from the Torah—a scroll of parchment that contains the Five Books of Moses, the Pentateuch, in unvowelled Hebrew—and from the Prophets. There is a period of study and religious instruction in the afternoon. The end of the Sabbath is marked when three stars appear in the sky. The Havdalah ceremony features the lighting of a specially braided candle, blessings over wine, over spices in a special spicebox, and over the candle. Finally, a “separation” blessing praises God “who divides the holy from the ordinary, the light from the darkness.”

The beauty of the Jewish Sabbath has been enhanced by a rich embroidery of folklore. The Sabbath, for example, is perceived as a fair and chaste bride descending on the rays of the setting sun to her faithful lover. There is a legend about two angels who accompany each Jew as that person goes home from the synagogue on Friday night. Every devout Jew is said to acquire an additional soul on the Sabbath—an extra measure of spirituality.

Scholars assert that the Sabbath as a universal rest day devoted to God is one of the most important Jewish contributions to civilization. L.K.

In the New Testament. The celebration of the Sabbath is noted in the Gospels, Acts, and also (more negatively) in the Epistles. As a devout Jew, Jesus kept the Sabbath, attending synagogue and helping to lead the service (Luke 4:16-30; Matt. 13:53-58; Mark 6:1-6; Acts 13:14-16). Jesus' devotion, however, was tempered by the view that "the Sabbath is made for man, not man for the Sabbath." Indeed, Jesus' practices sparked controversy with the Pharisees, with Jesus showing that the intent of the Sabbath is to benefit people, rather than being a ritual observance that must not be deviated from (Luke 6:1-11; Matt. 12:1-14; Mark 2:23-28; 3:1-3).

After the Resurrection, which took place on Sunday, the first day of the week, Christians began to celebrate their "sabbath" on Sunday, although the early Jewish Christians apparently continued to honor the Jewish Temple worship and the Sabbath as well (Acts 3:13; 13:14-15; 14:1; 16:16; 17:17; 18:4; 21:26). Indeed, Paul probably lived according to his Jewish upbringing, despite his clear teaching that such observances were not necessary for Christians (Acts 15; Gal. 2:11-21). In the period after the destruction of the Temple (A.D. 70), the widely scattered and increasingly Gentile church dropped the observance of the Sabbath altogether. The LORD'S DAY, the first day of the week, became the Christian day of worship exclusively. J.C.

SABBATICAL YEAR. An early Israelite institution organized around the final year of a seven-year cycle. Its antiquity is attested in the Covenant Code mandate that the land lie uncultivated every seventh year (Exod. 23:10-11) and that the slave who desires it be liberated after serving six years (21:2-6). Since owners were forbidden to harvest untilled agricultural yields, this humanitarian regulation provided sustenance for the landless poor. Lack of a specific starting date for the sowing cycle implies the existence of field rotation, ensuring that not all land would lie fallow simultaneously.

The Deuteronomic Code makes the sabbatical year an occasion for the remission of debts owed by one Israelite to another (Deut. 15:1-4a). Through this generous addressing of human need, the Deity was honored in this "Lord's release" (v. 2). Writing off indebtedness included the liberation of Hebrews enslaved for nonpayment of debts who had served six years (15:12-18). Deuteronomy's silence about the land's noncultivation implies that the practice had lapsed or that the nation's economy was no longer solely agrarian.

The Holiness Code perceives this institution as a Sabbath, signifying Yahweh's ownership of the land (Lev. 25:2-7). Everything from the agricultural land was to be left untouched. But God promises a yield in the sixth year so extraordinary that it will sustain Israel through the year of fallow and the next year till harvest time (25:19-22). Unlike Deuteronomy, debt cancellation was transferred to the fiftieth or jubilee year (25:13).

Only in Nehemiah 10:31 does the OT offer a lucid historical allusion to sabbatical year observance (see also I Macc. 6:49, 53). The intensity of Israel's religious fervor in any given era surely determined how zealously this institution was upheld.

SABEANS. A sturdy and tall (Isa. 45:14) Semitic people living "far off" (Joel 3:8) in the southwest Arabian Peninsula, roughly near modern Yemen. They were renowned in the Bible as traders in slaves (Joel 3:8), camels (I Kings 10:2; Isa. 60:6); gold (I Kings 10:4; Ps. 72:10, 15; Isa. 60:6; Ezek. 27:22-23; 38:13); spices (I Kings 10:4; Ezek. 27:22-23; 38:13); precious stones (I Kings 10:4; Ezek. 27:22-23; 38:13); frankincense (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20) and myrrh. Saba (in Hebrew Sheba) was the capital city (Job 6:19 and elsewhere). The Sabean, who had colonies in Ethiopia, traded goods from many lands, much from Africa. P.L.G.

SABELLIANISM. See MONARCHIANISM.

SAB'IYYA. In ISLAM, one of several subdivisions of the Shi'ites. The name, literally meaning "severer," is generally used to identify the Ismailites, who recognize as IMAMS (divinely inspired leaders) only the first seven successors to MUHAMMAD. It is also sometimes used for only the largest subgroup of Ismailites.

The question of how to transmit authority has always been important in Islam. Who can truly claim to be the successor to the Prophet Muhammad? Shi'ites believe that each imam, beginning with Ali, Muhammad's son-in-law, designated one of his sons as his successor. Ja'far al-Sadiq (died A.D. 765) designated his son Ismail, but he outlived Ismail and then designated another son as successor. Many felt that the designation once made could not be changed, and so they accepted Ismail's son as the seventh imam.

Several popular beliefs came into play at that point: there would be only seven imams; the seventh would not die but would enter a state of seclusion that would last indefinitely; during that time he would rule through special representatives; and finally he would return as Mahdi, a "messianic" figure, and not die until he had conquered the world. Down to the present day there have been various people who claimed to be the Mahdi.

A number of Sab'iyya sects arose. The QARMA-TIANS were the most shocking. In A.D. 930 they captured Mecca and stole the sacred black stone from the Ka'ba. The Fatimid dynasty ruled Egypt (A.D. 909-1171). And the Assassins dominated the area south of the Caspian Sea from the eleventh to the thirteenth century. They survive today as the Nizarites, governed by Aga Khan IV, with headquarters in Paris. K.C.

SACERDOTAL. Having to do with sacred things, with the divine liturgy and the duties of a priest. Sacerdotal means consecrated or sacred; the holy. There are sacerdotal robes or vestments, sacerdotal vessels, such as the chalice and paten, and sacerdotal rites, such as the Mass and the sacrament of baptism.

J. C.

SACKCLOTH. A coarse, dark cloth woven from the hair of goats or camels. Literally, the word is used of a sack for grain (Gen. 42:25, 27, 29; Levi. 11:32; Josh. 9:4) and as a garment worn in mourning (II Sam. 3:31; 21:10; I Kings 21:27), as a sign of mental anguish, personal grief (I Sam. 21:10), or national calamity (II Kings 6:30; Neh. 9:1; Esth. 4:2). Sackcloth is associated with the rending of clothing and putting ashes on the head. In Jonah 3:8, the Ninevites covered man and beast with sackcloth. In Judith 4:11 (Apocrypha), sackcloth was put on an altar.

Sackcloth was worn on occasion by prophets (Isa. 2:2) but was not the usual prophetic garment. There is no indication that wearing sackcloth was uncomfortable nor was it a form of penance or self-discipline. The only mention in the Pentateuch is of Jacob (Gen. 37:34). The practice seems to have been mandated by custom rather than by law.

SACRAMENTARY. A liturgical book containing the canon of the Mass along with proper collects, prefaces, and prayers, used in the Western church until the thirteenth century for celebration of the Mass. Beginning in the tenth century, sacramentaries were gradually replaced by MISSALS.

SACRAMENTS. A significant rite or action that makes present or effective the sacred or holy. Sacraments are found in all religions in which the divine or the supernatural is made present through the natural. SYMBOLS are images that suggest or present the sacred, while effective action is essential to sacraments. They leave the situation different from what it was before. A classic definition of a sacrament describes it as "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace." This would be in accord with the general teaching of the church fathers and the medieval theologians. Augustine defined a sacrament as a "visible sign of an invisible reality," and Thomas Aquinas spoke of a sacrament as "a sign of a sacred thing insofar as it sanctifies men," indicating the importance of its effective action.

The word "sacrament" does not appear in the Bible, although sacramental actions, for example, baptisms and purification rites, common sacred meals, and rites of initiation and confirmation, are found in both the OT and the NT. The Latin sacramentum meant an oath of allegiance and, while this had some influence on Christian usage, the word "sacrament" is more closely associated with the Latin NT rendering of the Greek mysterion or sacred mystery. In the early and medieval church, the scope of what constituted valid sacraments was not sharply drawn, in part because no clear distinctions were made between, for example, baptism and confirmation. Augustine even applied the word to the creed and to the Lord's Prayer. Hugh of St. Victor (twelfth century) held that there were as many as thirty sacraments. Peter Lombard (1100–60), in his Sentences, established seven sacraments, the number that became traditional and authoritative in the Roman Catholic church, namely, BAPTISM, CONFIRMATION, the EUCHARIST, PENANCE, EXTREME UNCTION, ORDERS, and matrimony. Aquinas accepted these seven, and they were formally affirmed at the councils of Florence (1439) and Trent (1545–63). The Eastern Orthodox churches also accept these seven sacraments, as do many Anglicans. In the latter case, baptism and the Eucharist are given a special rank of importance.

The Reformation brought with it sharp differences regarding the sacraments, especially between the new Protestant churches and the Roman Church, but also among the Protestants. The principal differences were three: (1) The number of sacraments. The Protestants accepted only two sacraments as valid—baptism and the Eucharist (or Lord's Supper, Holy Communion)—arguing that they alone are explicitly sanctioned in the NT. The Roman church finds direct or implicit scriptural sanction for the other five sacraments. Catholic theologians argue, for example, that penance derives from the disciples' authority to "bind and to loose," and from the church's responsibility to give fraternal correction (Matt. 18:15). (2) The Lord's Supper as a sacrifice. The Reformers also rejected the Catholic teaching that Christ is sacrificed anew, as a genuine expiatory sacrifice for the remission of sins, in the Mass or Eucharist. Protestants have insisted that this detracts from the NT witness to the once-for-all nature of Christ's sacrifice for sin. Therefore Protestant churches have usually viewed the Lord's Supper simply as a commemoration of Christ's sacrifice or as a "sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving." Catholic theologians point to the fact that, while there is a real identity, the sacrifice of the Mass must be understood as a representation of the sacrifice of the cross. Through the ministry of the priest (in persona Christi), Christ offers his sacrifice. More recently, Vatican II stressed the active cooperation of the faithful, not only through but with the priest, in the offering of the Eucharist. (3) The manner in which grace is present and conveyed in the sacraments. Concerning the Eucharist, all of the Protestant Reformers rejected TRANSUBSTANTIATION, the doctrine that at the consecration the substance of the bread and wine are changed into the substance of Christ's Body and Blood. However, the Reformers all taught the REAL PRESENCE of Christ in the Holy Communion. Luther taught that Christ is bodily present "in, with, and under" the elements of bread and wine (CONSUBSTANTIATION), while Calvin insisted on Christ's presence, though not "enclosed in the Bread and Wine."

Because of the common emphasis on Christ's Real Presence, it can be misleading to speak of Catholic sacramental theology as objective and Protestant as subjective. Roman Catholicism insists, for example, that the right disposition of faith must be present, without which the sacrament, while formally valid, is not efficacious. Likewise, Protestant sacramental theology insists that the sacraments must be properly performed in terms of matter (for example, water in baptism) and form (for example, the NT formulas). Keeping this in mind, it is true to say that historically the Catholic doctrine of the sacraments is more objective since it has stressed that, with the right intention and proper conditions, the sacraments convey or even infuse sanctifying grace. That is, their validity is independent of the worthiness of the priest or minister or the recipient, and thus the sacrament mediates or produces grace ex opere operato. The emphasis on the real efficient causality of the sacraments is related to the Catholic teaching that they are necessary for salvation and therefore that they must be administered as established by Christ and as entrusted to the church. Historically, the Protestant view has tended to see the sacraments not so much as direct channels of GRACE but, rather, as signs or seals of God's divine favor or promise, which must be received by a lively faith. Like the Word of God, the Reformers viewed the sacraments as proclaiming or showing forth or ratifying God's gracious goodness and, therefore, they were less willing to restrict grace to the sacraments or to claim them as necessary for salvation.

In his encyclical Mysterium Fidei (1965), Pope Paul VI reaffirmed the Roman Catholic church's teaching regarding transubstantiation and called for a retention of the traditional sacramental terminology. Nevertheless, Vatican II and actions since then have opened up a new dialogue between Catholics and Protestants on a number of traditional points of contention regarding sacramental theology, especially concerning the Lord's Supper. While differences remain, significant progress has been achieved toward a common understanding of the Real Presence, the Eucharist as a sacrifice, and the relationship of faith and grace in sacramental action. Furthermore, studies in psychology and social anthropology have underlined the important but often unconscious benefits of ritual and sacramental action in the life of both individuals and social groups. This has enhanced the church's awareness of the role of sacramental rites in its ministry of healing.

SACRED. See HOLY.

SACRED CONGREGATIONS. The technical name for some Vatican commissions or administrative bodies such as the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. It is equivalent to "Holy Organizations." They are bodies composed of cardinals and officials for the transaction of the headquarter's work of the Roman Catholic church. Before Vatican II there were twelve such congregations.

SACRED HEART. Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, symbolized by paintings, statues, and medals that portray Jesus' heart (usually marked with the letters, IHS, for "Jesus Christ, Savior") on the outside of his robes with one hand pointing to it. This cult, or way of devotion to Jesus, is found only in the Roman Catholic Church. Neither the Eastern Orthodox nor the Protestant churches promote or follow this practice.

Devotion to the Sacred Heart originated in the Middle Ages among contemplative monks or mystics. The Carthusian Order and the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits) took up the cult and promoted it throughout the church. St. Francis de Sales and the Silesian Order also spread the practice, as did St. Margaret Mary Alacoque and the Visitandine Order.

The Sacred Heart movement was not without opposition. The Jansenist movement resisted the cult, claiming that a separation was introduced between Christ's heart and his full divine-human being. The Jansenists, meeting in Pistoia, formalized this objection, which was subsequently condemned by Pope Pius VI on August 28, 1794. Pope Pius IX created a Feast of the Sacred Heart, setting it on the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi, the third Friday after PENTECOST. There are at least three orders of monks, missionaries, and priests dedicated to the Sacred Heart.

SACRIFICES, HUMAN. Cultic expressions involving child holocausts permitted in some ancient Near Eastern religions, but officially rejected by Israelite religion.

At one level, Genesis 22:1-19 constitutes an Israelite polemic against child sacrifice. As a unique test, Abraham is divinely commanded to sacrifice Isaac. Having acted obediently, the patriarch is permitted to substitute a ram for his son. First Kings 16:34 reporting that Hiel rebuilt Jericho "at the cost of" two sons during Ahab's reign (869-850 B.C.) is too ambiguous to be decisive. Jephthah's sacrifice of his daughter (Judg. 11:30-40) is undeniably tragic and extraordinary; a Hebrew rendition of a widespread folk tale, it does not disclose pervasive Israelite practice. Infant skeletons excavated at Gezer, Megiddo, and Taanach provided no direct evidence of child sacrifice. Infant mortality explains the situation equally well.

Nevertheless, biblical denunciations of human sacrifices suggest significant deviation from the religious norm (Deut. 18:10; Ps. 106:37-38; Jer. 19:5; also Wisd. Sol. 12:5-6). An acutely endangered adult might give up a child in order to induce divine intervention. Three kings behaved thus. Regarding defeat by the Israelites as imminent, Mesha, a ninth-century B.C. king of Moab, sacrificed his son (II Kings 3:27). Similarly, amid threatening international conditions, two Judean kings, Ahaz (735-715) and Manasseh (687-642), made a burnt offering of a son (II Kings 16:3; 21:6). Though Josiah worked to eliminate this pagan rite (II Kings 23:10), prophetic oracles in Jeremiah (7:31-32) and Ezekiel (16:20-21) indicate that precarious Judean existence prior to Jerusalem's destruction (587 B.C.) stimulated its revival.

In Leviticus 18:21; 20:2-5; II Kings 23:10; and Jeremiah 32:35, child sacrifice is linked with Molech. Though an Ammonite deity is named Molech (I Kings 11:7), in Punic, the language of Carthage, molch denotes a type of human sacrifice, not a deity. If this bears on the above mentioned texts, as some scholars claim, Israelite children were offered to Yahweh as well as foreign gods. Child sacrifice likely invaded Israel from Phoenicia in an era of religious syncretism. Israel's prophets, priests, and the Deuteronomist loathed it as an alien perversion of proper Israelite religious expression. J.K.K.

SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS. Diverse rituals that enhance relations between God and humanity. Motivated by the dual need to acknowledge Yahweh's sovereignty with tribute and influence Yahweh's action with gifts, or the desire to strengthen divine-human communion, or the urge to expiate human wrongdoing, people perform these cultic ceremonies to provide a vital continuity in divine-human intercourse. Though strictly speaking, sacrifice in biblical Israel involved the slaughter or burning of an animal, meal and cereal offerings constituted significant accompaniments.

History. The Israelites offered sacrifices to Yahweh throughout their history. Since sacrifice is virtually a universal religious phenomenon, biblical procedures often resemble those reflected in extra-biblical texts. Still, whatever the Israelites adopted from the surrounding cultures of Mesopotamia and Canaan was made to serve their own purposes. Several technical names for sacrifices attested in the OT appear in the Ugaritic literature uncovered at Ras Shamra. Thus the antiquity of these sacrifices is obvious.

Various historical, prophetic, and cultic texts in the OT reflect preexilic sacrificial undertakings. First Samuel 1 reports that Elkanah, Samuel's father, made annual sacrifices at Shiloh; Amos 4:4 reveals sacrificial frenzy at Bethel and Gilgal; and Psalm 56:12 mentions sacrificial vows made by the hard-pressed, pious Israelite. The clearest biblical statement regarding sacrificial offerings is found in Leviticus 1-7. Serving as a "memorandum" for priests, Leviticus 1:1-6:7 offers directives when individual Israelites seek participation in sacrificial offerings. It is supplemented by Leviticus 6:8-7:38, a section more specifically concerned with priestly leadership. This postexilic legislation traces back to ritualistic prototypes that are much older.

Since sacrificial offerings incorporated self-evident procedures and symbols for the priestly editors of the Pentateuch, they felt no urge to systematize ritualistic data or to advance a specific theory of sacrifice justifying the existence of the sacrificial cult. While not definitive, biblical sacrifices are probably best classified according to their several functions—as gifts, vehicles of communion with God, and mechanisms facilitating the expiation of sin and guilt.

Sacrifices as Gift. The gift aspect of sacrificial offerings rests on the obvious consideration that they all involve the presentation of something to or before God. Two general Hebrew nouns for sacrifice fundamentally convey the idea of gift. One is minhâ. In its earliest biblical usage it denotes sacrifices in general, though sometimes it relates to secular expressions of respect (people to a king; I Sam. 10:27) or common personal allegiance (Jacob to Esau; Gen. 32:13). When the minhâ later acquired the sense of "cereal offering" (Exod. 29:41), another noun, qorbân (linked with the verb biqrib, "to bring near"), imparted the general notion of giving (Lev. 2:1).

The tributary offering of firstlings also falls into this category. It was commonly held that the firstborn of the herd and firstfruits of the ground belong to the Deity; they must be delivered to Yahweh as sacred gifts (Exod. 13:2; 23:19). This regulation did not apply to the firstborn child who was "redeemed" when a young animal served as suitable substitute (13:13). Accordingly, the God who activates animal and plant life is respectfully celebrated as worthy of a portion of that life. The claim of divine ownership is thankfully recognized (Deut. 26:1-11).

The cereal offering (minhâ) is another type of sacrificial gift (Lev. 2). Consisting of flour, cakes, or crushed grain, the minhâ is placed on the altar along with oil and frankincense. A portion, known as the 'azkârâ, is burned. Stemming from the verb zâkar ("to remember"), this noun (meaning "reminiscent"?) may suggest the actual function of the cereal offering, namely, bringing the worshiper to Yahweh's own remembrance.

The burnt offering (commonly called an 'olâ, though sometimes a kālîl) is yet another sacrificial gift. It consisted of a bull, ram, goat, or dove (Lev. 1). Probably in order to designate it as his own gift, the offerer laid his hand on the animal's head. The animal was slaughtered, its blood was dashed at the altar's base, and the carcass was cut into pieces and burned in its entirety. No sacramental eating was involved. Though an atoning dimension is ascribed to this sacrifice (1:4), originally that was unlikely the case. In Numbers 28:2 the Deity refers to the 'olâ as "my food for my offerings by fire, my pleasing odor." Whatever be its ancient Near Eastern antecedents, Israelite priests perceived this expression figuratively.

Since sacrificial gifts were basically motivated by the offerer's gratitude, the votive (neder), thank (tôdâ) and freewill offering (nedâbâ) also merit mention. Precarious circumstances stimulated the pious to promise the Deity a sacrifice following personal deliverance (Jonah 1:16). The thank offering was a similar expression of gratitude, though it entailed no previous vow (Ps. 107:21-22). Finally, spontaneous thanksgiving is best denoted by the freewill offering that lacked stringent regulations (Lev. 22:23).

Sacrifice as Communion. Through the shelem sacrifice, worshipers were sacramentally linked with the Deity and one another. Since the Hebrew noun shālôm means "peace," shelem is often rendered "peace offering." The chief concern, however, is the establishment of full harmony between God and worshipers through a shared banquet. While the biblical legislation (Lev. 3) somewhat resembles that mandated for the burnt offering ('ōlā), Yahweh's portion is limited to the poured out blood of the sacrificial animal, along with the fatty parts of the entrails and the kidneys that are burned. The rest of the victim was consumed in a communion meal joyfully eaten by both priests and laity in God's presence (Deut. 12:18).

The same type of sacrifice is sometimes designated by the noun zebab, meaning "what is killed" (Exod. 18:12), and is indicative of an early Israelite period when domestic animals were solely slaughtered for the purpose of a meal in which God shared. With its vivid portrayal of one family banqueting in Yahweh's presence, I Samuel 1 highlights the communal aspect of Israelite sacrifice.

Sacrifice as Expiation. Whereas spontaneously motivated sacrifices are outlined in Leviticus 1-3, two mandatory sacrifices, the sin offering (battā'th) and guilt offering ('āshām), are respectively portrayed in Leviticus 4:1-5:13 and 5:14-6:7. Since the exact distinction between them is never stated, perhaps they constitute two independent, parallel atonement rituals. Both were emphasized during and after the Exile, and both were designed to expiate "unwittingly" committed sinfulness (Lev. 4:2) that ruptures the individual's relation with God and threatens communal well-being. Such wrongdoing involved engagement in real but minor offenses that do not incur expulsion from the covenant community. No sacrificial remedy existed for such presumptuously deliberate sins as murder and apostasy.

Above all, the problem of continuing ritual uncleanness is addressed. Concerning the sin offering, only special portions of the sacrificial victim are destined for "the altar of burnt offering" (4:10). Most of the animal, now contaminated by the sin of the worshiper who placed his hand on it (4:4), is burned outside the camp (4:12). By sprinkling the blood on the horns of the altar, the officiating priest "makes atonement" (4:20) for the individual offering the sacrifice.

Moreover, Leviticus 16 contains legislation for an annual DAY OF ATONEMENT, which provides the Israelite community a solemn occasion for returning to spiritual wholeness. This ceremony distinctively uses a scapegoat that symbolically receives, through the laying on of the hands of the high priest, the nation's transgressions and is driven into the wilderness for Azazel, probably a desert demon.

Financial compensation, not animal sacrifice, is the central factor within the legislative procedures established for the guilt offering. Its place in any discussion of Israelite sacrificial offerings is admittedly peripheral.

Religious Significance. Across the centuries, not all Israelites esteemed sacramental offerings identically. In popular thought, sacrifices were often regarded as wielding such automatic power as to render the worshiper's inward involvement irrelevant. Yet the religiously perceptive within Israel argued otherwise. The priesthood did not approach sacrifices mechanically. Though in instituting the sin offering Yahweh favored Israel with an instrument for EXPIATION, humble confession constituted an intrinsic expectation (Lev. 5:5). Sacrifices were serious business to devout Israelites who continuously presented Yahweh with daily offerings of sacrificial beasts, grain, and wine libation (Num. 28:3-8). Indeed, sacrificial offerings might instill reverence within the Israelite community. Rather than badgering Yahweh with new requests for benefits, the Israelite, in a thank offering, might recognize that benefits had already come from God. And voicing a vow might place one under moral obligations capable of enhancing one's spirituality.

Nevertheless, Yahweh would not tolerate flagrant abuse of the sacrificial system. Samuel and Hosea respectively ranked obedience and steadfast love ahead of sacrifice (I Sam. 15:22; Hos. 6:6). Amos railed against the juxtaposition of external sacrificial observance and rampant social injustice (Amos. 5:21-24). Concern for proper human attitude is echoed in Psalm 50, where thank and votive offerings are favorably regarded (v. 14) despite Yahweh's disclosure, "I will accept no bull from your house" (v. 9). Malachi's rebuke of sacrificial negligence (1:6-14) is further reminder that Yahweh welcomes appropriately rendered offerings. They ensure the continuance of a positive relationship between God and people. But the aphorism "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination" (Prov. 21:27) admonishes that this relationship is doomed should Israel become manipulative. J.K.K.

SADDUCEES. An aristocratic party or sect of the Jews composed of the high-priestly families, lesser priests, and wealthy persons of rank who participated in the rule of the Jewish homeland from the years following the Maccabean wars of independence to the revolt against Rome, about 160 B.C. to A.D. 70. The Sadducees derived their name from the priest ZADOK (Greek Saddouk), whose descendants held office from the time of Solomon and who performed their priestly duties in Jerusalem's Temple (I Kings 1:5-8, 32-40; 2:26-27, 35).

References to the Sadducees in both Jewish and Christian sources chiefly relate to their beliefs and practices, which are opposed to those of the Pharisees.

As controversial as these opposing positions sometimes were, both parties found common cause in the face of intermittent threats to the survival of Judaism and its Temple. In the Roman period some priests belonged to the sect of the Pharisees; conversely, some of the Pharisees before A.D. 70 conscientiously adhered to the priestly laws concerning their revenues and sought to extend to their own tables the priest's rules concerning ceremonial purity.

Early History. Already in the Persian period, but especially under Ptolemaic rule 323–200 B.C., the power of the priests greatly increased. The HIGH PRIEST was the head of the state, and other leading priests directed the Gerousia (council, later known as the Sanhedrin). The concerns of the priestly aristocracy were therefore political as well as religious. These political concerns led them to become enamored with HELLENISM in the early years of the Seleucid rule of the Jewish state and to adopt an assimilationist posture. When Antiochus Epiphanes, 175–164 B.C., sought to promote the Hellenization of his Jewish subjects he found allies among high-ranking priests. The successful Maccabean wars of independence resulted in the discrediting of the Hellenizing priests (the office of high priest remained vacant for a time) and necessitated the establishment of a new high-priestly line: Simon Maccabeus (142–135 B.C.) and his dynastic successors (I Macc. 14:35, 41-49). During the brief period of Jewish political independence, various sectarian movements developed, distinguished by their differing attitudes toward the Hasmonean priest-kings. Among those who rallied around the Maccabeans were priestly families who traced their ancestry to Zadok. Together with wealthy aristocrats these partisans became known as the Sadducees (Saddoukaioi; Mark 12:18).

The Roman Period. Information concerning the fortunes of the Sadducees under Roman rule derives from the record in Josephus' Antiquities of the succession of high priests in Jerusalem. Under the Herods and Roman procurators the powers of the high priests were greatly diminished, and concerted efforts were made to install persons who were subservient and loyal. Josephus reports that there were twenty-eight high priests from the days of Herod the Great to the fall of Jerusalem. Josephus sought to relieve the leading priests as well as the Pharisees of blame for the Jewish war with Rome, but the fact cannot be concealed that Eleazer, the son of the high priest Ananias, by preventing the daily sacrifice to the emperor, provoked the Romans to retaliate. It is probable that a preponderance of the priesthood sided with Eleazer against the Romans and the incumbent puppet high priest. The destruction of Jerusalem's Temple, and the implication of members of their party in the revolt, led to many casualties among the Sadducees. Their (always limited) influence among the populace was eclipsed by the growing prestige of the PHARISEES. With the collapse of the Jewish state the Sadducees disappear from history.

Distinctive Characteristics of the Sadducees. Given the scattered, disparaging references of Josephus and the Gospels to the Sadducees, it is difficult to form a coherent picture of their beliefs and practices. Josephus writes that the party contained "persons of the highest reputation," yet they were "influential only with the wealthy," and had no following among the people. In their relationship to each other the Sadducees were "rather boorish in their behavior," in their relationship with their countrymen, "as rude as with aliens."

One could hardly expect religious idealism to flourish among the Sadducees; theirs was the pragmatic stance of expediency. Even after the Hellenizers had been expelled or silenced there was still among the priestly aristocracy a worldly mindedness and the same comparative laxity in their practice of Judaism. Driven to make the most of bad bargains, they maintained that human choices are free and responsible. They held "that all things lie within our own power." The statement of Josephus that the Sadducees "do away with fate altogether" is not to be understood as a flat denial of divine providence, nor should his comparison of them with Epicureans be pressed. The Sadducees stood for the old dogma: God is responsible for the good; humans are responsible for their misfortunes. Yet their emphasis on human freedom promoted self-reliance and represented a lessening of reliance upon God.

A fundamental difference between the Sadducees and other contemporary sects is that these partisans did not regard the observance of "anything besides what the Law enjoins them." The Sadducees refused to be bound by the achievements of the previous centuries in regard to both the interpretation of the Torah and the introduction of religious views derived by inference therefrom. They saw in "the tradition of the elders" an unnecessary limitation of their hereditary, judicial, and doctrinal authority. In their rejection of the legal tradition of the Torah scholars, many of whom belonged to the sect of the Pharisees, they revered the written Torah only. Accordingly, they rejected belief in bodily resurrection and rewards and penalties in the world to come; they also denied the existence of angels and evil spirits (Mark 12:18-27; Acts 23:6-8). Conservative and autocratic tendencies, plus their attraction to Hellenistic cultural advantages, inclined the Sadducees to hold that the progressive religious ideas of the Pharisees were either superfluous or unacceptable. The more insistent the Pharisees were upon the observance of both the oral and written Torah, the more resistant the Sadducees became. Mark's account of Jesus' encounter with the Sadducees may reflect a typical defense: holding up their opponent's beliefs to ridicule (Mark 12:18-27).

SAHABA. Literally "companions," the closest associates of MUHAMMAD during his career. Most of the HADITH traditions are attributed to them, and their actions and procedures are regarded as standards for orthodox behavior.

Among the companions, the first four caliphs occupy the highest place. Muhammad promised to these four and to six other companions a place in paradise. There are several other groups of companions. The Muhajirun are those who migrated from Mecca to Medina before, with, or after Muhammad. The Ansar, or helpers, are those believers in Islam in Medina who welcomed and assisted Muhammad. The Badriyun took part in the important battle of Badr, where Muhammad defeated a hostile military force.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL. One of the two most famous churches in London, along with WESTMINSTER ABBEY. St. Paul's serves as the chief seat of the Church of England in the city. St. Paul's was built by the noted English architect Sir Christopher Wren, who brought the building to completion over a thirty-five year period, 1675–1710. His structure replaced the earlier St. Paul's that had been burned in the great fire of London in 1666. Wren's dome rises 365 feet above the street, where St. Paul's stands on Ludgate hill in the center of the old city of London.

The first church to stand where St. Paul's is now was said to date back to A.D. 604, built by King Aethelberht of Kent and Bishop Mellitus of London. Several churches were destroyed and rebuilt over the centuries before Wren undertook his task in 1675. His building is based on the Gothic plan, in the shape of a Latin cross; but like St. Peter's Basilica, it is dominated by the large central dome. Many sculptures adorn the building, although some have been destroyed by time. There are beautiful choir stalls, a huge baptismal font, artistic ironwork, and a geometrical staircase, thirty-five feet in diameter, in the southwest tower.

ST. PETER'S BASILICA. The cathedral church of Rome, seat of the Roman Catholic church's pope, in VATICAN City, Rome. St. Peter's, the largest Christian church in the world, is the second church built above the traditional tomb of Peter, the first having been built by the emperor Constantine the Great about A.D. 325. This original basilica signified Constantine's acceptance of Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire. However, in 1506, Pope Julius II determined to build a new, more magnificent church and had the original one completely demolished. The construction of the present St. Peter's took 150 years, with ten architects directing, and frequently changing, its design. The original architect, Donato Bramante, planned a domed church in the form of a Greek cross (all four arms of equal length). However, in the seventeenth century, the nave was lengthened so that the basilica is now in the shape of a Latin cross. St. Peter's is 210 meters (700 feet) long and 137 meters (450 feet) across at its widest point. It covers 12,960 square meters (15,500 square yards) of space. The great dome, designed by Michelangelo, is 42 meters (138 feet) in diameter and more than 120 meters (400 feet) high. (See photo on next page.)

ST. SULPICE, SOCIETY OF. An order of secular priests, founded in Paris in 1642 by J. J. Olier, devoted to the theological education of parish priests. They are not monks but live in community with their students in order to encourage spiritual formation and growth. Scripture, theology, prayer, and spiritual exercises are encouraged. The Sulpicians received papal endorsement and their own constitution. They spread to Canada and to the newly independent United States. In 1791, the order founded St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore, the first Roman Catholic seminary in the country and now a pontifical university. It follows that the Sulpicians would produce outstanding theologians. The most distinguished modern American Sulpician is the biblical scholar Raymond Brown.

SAINTS, VENERATION OF. The practice began in the early church with the belief that martyrs gained immediate entry into heaven and that their intercession with God was particularly effective. Revelation 6:9 indicates that MARTYRS do occupy a special place before God's altar, and the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31) suggests that the dead do intercede for the living. Veneration is based on the theory that the saints' goodness makes them closer to God and their humanness makes them more accessible to us.

Veneration of confessors—those who had persevered in the faith under persecution and were not martyred—followed. Gradually bishops, popes, church fathers, ascetics, virgins, and mystics were all included in this veneration. The practice was first limited to celebrations at a person's tomb, but soon became attached also to relics, particularly the person's bones, and then significant places and objects from that person's life. The Martyrdom of Polycarp (about A.D. 160) calls his remains "more precious than costly stones and more excellent than gold."

Mention of the saints in the liturgy can be dated from the time of Augustine. In the eighth century it became customary to read from the lives of the saints at matins. Veneration was primarily an act of lay piety; local holy persons were venerated. Gradually the papacy tried to take control, regulating the process through rigorous examinations before allowing beatification and canonization. Everything was strictly defined in canon law. Many people, however, continued to venerate whomever they considered worthy.

Eventually each "official" saint was assigned to a day on the calendar when he or she was especially remembered. Children are often given the name of the saint on whose day they are baptized. Because it is sometimes difficult to separate fact from pious fiction in the lives of the saints, Pope Paul VI tried to eliminate many of the more nonhistorical saints, but popular piety continues.

In the Greek church veneration is based on the idea that the saints are instructional examples for us of the Christian life of sanctification. Thus the Eastern church treasures ICONS more than relics. In the West the saints became supernatural helpers in times of need. A perceived need for special protection led cities, countries, guilds, individual people, and so forth, to claim their own patron saints. Patrick, for example, is the patron saint of Ireland; Cecilia is the patron saint of music and musicians.

The Reformation repudiated the veneration of the saints, declaring that all true Christians are saints and that Christ is our only intercessor. In most Protestant churches very little attention is paid to the saints, and thus there is a certain loss of historical perspective and sense of connectedness. Charles Williams in Descent of the Dove and several of his fiction works argues that Paul's image of the church as the body of Christ means that all Christians—past, present, and future—cohere in one body and that they can indeed help one another. Worship, then, is reserved for God, but one can still offer reverence to the saints and receive inspiration and comfort from them. N.H.

SAIVA SIDDHANTA. From the Sanskrit word for "wisdom of the Saivas," or worshippers of SHIVA. A school in HINDUISM with a distinctive teaching and body of literature, Saiva Siddhanta expounds Shiva as the supreme lord. In contrast to Advaita Vedanta, it accepts the reality of souls and matter created by MAYA, not illusion, but God's creative energy. However, souls in this real universe are in bondage to KARMA because of ignorance until liberated by the power of Shiva. That is attained by following a spiritual discipline under the direction of an authentic GURU. Saiva Siddhanata has its major center of strength in the Tamil areas of south India. R.E.

SALEM. The name of the place where Melchizedek was king (Gen. 14:18). The word, meaning "completion," is not related to shālôm ("peace") or to the name Jerusalem, even though in Psalm 76:2 Salem and Zion are in parallel relationship and Hebrews 7:2 reads "king of Salem, that is, king of peace." The Hebrew word Salem probably preserves the name of the Ugaritic god who completes the day, that is, the Venus star at sunset, Shalem. Yurūshalem thus means "foundation or sacred place of Shalem," the local god of the pre-Israelite city whose name also may be incorporated in Solomon's name. P.L.G.

SALEM COLONY. The first settlement of what became the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY; founded in 1626 by Roger Conant as a successor to a previous settlement at Cape Ann (Gloucester). The settlements were promoted by John White, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Dorchester, England, who got Salem chartered as the New England Company in 1628. He sent John Endecott as leader of a party of forty, who arrived aboard the Abigail on September 6, 1628. Originally called Naumkeag, the colony was renamed Salem or "peace" after the resolution of conflict between Endecott and older settlers. Salem was incorporated as a town in 1630. It is most famous as the site of the first Congregational church in the United States, founded August 6, 1629, and as home of the witchcraft trials of 1692. N.H.

SALOME. (1) The daughter of Herodias who danced for Herod Antipas and his guests (Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:22) is unnamed in the Gospels. Josephus (Antiquities) names her Salome.

(2) A Galilean woman from Capernaum, wife of Zebedee, a wealthy fisher, and mother of James and John, mentioned mainly in Mark.

The Salome in Mark 15:40 has been thought to be the same person as "the mother of the sons of Zebedee" in Matthew 27:56, and also the same person as "his [Jesus'] mother's sister" in John 19:25. If so, Jesus called James and John, his first cousins, among his earliest disciples (Matt. 4:21-22; Mark 1:20), men he nicknamed "sons of thunder" (Mark 3:17).

Salome may have been among the Galilean followers of Jesus from early in his ministry. She is named among the women "who, when he was in Galilee, followed him, and ministered to him" (Mark 15:40). "The mother of the sons of Zebedee" (Matt. 20:20-22) asked Jesus that her two sons should sit "one at your right hand and one at your left, in your kingdom" and was told that this was not his to grant. Jesus anticipated, probably in her presence, that both James and John would suffer persecution comparable to that of his own. Salome is named (Mark 15:10) as one of the women who witnessed Jesus' crucifixion. The beloved disciple (John 19:26) to whom Jesus committed the care of his mother is thought to be Salome's son John, Jesus' cousin. P.L.G.

SALVATION. A key biblical term to embrace several important aspects of the divine enterprise in restoring humankind to God's family and of the human response to that initiative. The basic meaning of "save" is "to deliver," whether the offending condition is one of danger or disease or death. Hence "to be saved" carries a wide range of meanings, but the three most common are: (1) to be set free from the peril of physical or spiritual dangers that would ensnare and ruin human lives; (2) to be restored to health and wholeness (Heb. shālôm; the NT equivalent is "peace" with God or with one's neighbor or oneself); (3) to be rescued from death when the biblical author is faced by mortal peril or when he contemplates the prospect of sin's penalty of separation from God. These are the three major emphases of the word.

Old Testament. The Hebrew verb "to save" carries the sense of "space," that is, to be set free from narrow confines and led out to a spacious area (Pss. 18:36; 66:12). It is an easy transition to associate debilitating conditions with one's enemies, such as disease (Isa. 38:16, 20), disaster (Jer. 30:7), or human foes (II Sam. 3:18; Ps. 44:7).

God is known throughout the OT as the author and giver of salvation. God alone is Israel's savior (Hos. 13:4), and when pressed by religious syncretism, Israel's prophet of the Exile denies that there is another savior (Isa. 43:11). With consistency the OT writers look back to Israel's salvation from bondage in Egypt and its REDEMPTION by God's acts in the time of Moses and the EXODUS (Exod. 12-15). Moses' song epitomizes the theme: "Yahweh . . . has become my salvation" (Exod. 15:2), a note repeated whenever Israel faced the threat of national invasion by surrounding peoples (for example, Isa. 12:2, 3). The psalmists rehearsed the salvation from Egypt as part of the later Temple worship (Pss. 66:1-7; 106:7-10), which was essentially a "remembrance" of God's mighty deeds. At Passover the same "re-presentation" was set on a domestic level, as Jewish families have always looked back, in their Passover liturgy (based on Exod. 12), to God's saving power as a pledge of future salvation.

The Babylonian exile reinforced these themes, with a new dimension added. Israel's hopes, centered on its newly gained monotheistic belief (seen in Isa. 40-55, and later articulated after the Exile in the Priestly section of the Pentateuch, for example, Gen. 1), were widened to take in a cosmic sweep of salvation. Yahweh was hailed as savior of the entire world, and the creator of a new age set free from SIN and decay and restored to its pristine integrity as a paradise regained. The Jewish apocalyptic writers (second century B.C.—first century A.D.) gave even richer meaning to this eschatological salvation as cosmic and transcendental (for example, Daniel and IV Ezra). Sometimes these hopes were pinned on a special figure (first called messiah in Psalms of Solomon, about 50 B.C.; and the "anointed one" in IV Ezra), but often it was God's own intervention that was celebrated.

New Testament. The cultural and religious world of the NT writer was racked by uncertainty. In spite of outward calm there were still political upheavals, economic stresses, and much intellectual ferment. To meet this challenge contemporary religious cults of Greco-Roman society offered "salvation" as a way to inner peace. The term "salvation" may be defined, in the background of the NT, as "escape from the prison-house of bondage," from the pessimism of despair. The blind goddess of change imposed a sense of life's meaninglessness, or else the more philosophical belief that the whole of life was determined by an inevitable link of cause and effect seemed to give no purpose to existence. Both aspects, popular and philosophical, of life in the first century A.D. led to a feeling of hopelessness and "failure of nerve," to use the expressive phrase of Gilbert Murray.

The Jewish elements in that society were caught in this web, with one additional factor compounding their woes. Postexilic Judaism (sixth century B.C. on) became increasingly marked by the fear that God was so far removed from people that contact was difficult and only an intricate system of priestly mediation could assist. This led to the codification of Levitical rules in the final edition of the Pentateuch, made in these centuries; and a heightened sense of guilt, both national and personal, dominated the Jewish mentality.

Two factors, then, made ready for the Christian gospel, which offered salvation as a removal of guilt by Christ's sacrifice on the cross which, in turn, abolished all other sacrifices (Heb. 8-10). This is the primary declaration of salvation that entailed a new start to life based on FORGIVENESS (see Matt. 1:21, 23 for the symbolism of the name "Jesus," which means "God saves," with sin's remission an integral part) and restoration to God's favor (Gal. 4:5ff.; Eph. 1:7, 13; II Cor. 5:18-21).

But salvation was no less real when offered to the members of Greco-Roman society. Paul is greeted at Philippi (Acts 16:17) as one of the servants of the Most High God (a paganized title), "who proclaim to you a way of salvation." Significantly, release came to the girl with the demonic spirit as she was set free from the power of bad religion and superstitious dread. The Philippian jailer, too, asked, "What must I do to be saved?" (Acts 16:30), a reference perhaps to his fear for physical safety, but including for the NT narrator an undertone of religious fear, which Paul addressed: "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved, you and your household" (v. 31), that is, he will pass from the loneliness of despair into a new society of "the saved," the eschatological community of the end-time, called the church.

As with the OT, God is universally greeted as the originator of salvation, both personal and cosmic. Indeed, the title Savior is severely restricted in the NT, being used only occasionally of Jesus and more often of God in Luke-Acts and the Pastorals. Nonetheless, God is the agent of salvation, which is God's direct gift in response to faith and obedience (Rom. 10:9, 10; Eph. 2:4-10).

The phases of salvation are clearly demarcated. The past tense is only rare (Eph. 2:5), while the tense that looks back to a point in past time usually refers to baptism as the occasion when the new Christian professed the faith and was welcomed from the alienation of separation from God to the new society (for example, Rom. 10:9, 10; Gal. 3:2; Eph. 1:13, 14). The present tense (I Cor. 1:18) denotes that salvation is an ongoing, progressive experience that must be applied in everyday living. There is an implicit warning against treating salvation as an excuse for continuing evil ways. The future aspect is important for Paul. His teaching makes clear that final salvation is not attained until the PAROUSIA or the glorious return of Christ (Phil. 3:20, 21), when believers will at last be saved (Rom. 8:19-25). Part of the reason here is to encourage Christians to live in anticipation of the final day (I Cor. 4:5); but because Paul's salvation teaching has a cosmic dimension, he can contemplate only in hope the ultimate outworking in God's plan for the universe as well as the church. Salvation will not be achieved until God's purpose is complete—for Jew as well as Gentile (Rom. 11:26-32), for all people as well as believers (I Cor. 15:25-28).

General William Booth, founder of the Salvation Army

SALVATION ARMY. This Christian international evangelistic and relief agency was founded in London in 1865 by William Booth, a Methodist lay preacher. He and his wife, Catherine, were moved by compassion for the needy people of London's East End. To achieve their goal they launched the East London Christian Mission, which was renamed the Salvation Army in 1878 when the organization was restructured on a military basis.

With Booth as "General" the "Army" served "territories" that conformed to the national boundaries of various countries. The territories were subdivided into "provinces" and "divisions" headed by various officers—majors, captains, and so forth. All in the Army were expected to offer "unquestioning obedience" to orders that came down from the top.

The doctrinal basis of the Salvation Army reflected Booth's own strongly evangelical and evangelistic background, including an emphasis on personal holiness and free will. In a real sense the Army was and is a denomination that differs from others in its military structure and its refusal to observe the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper.

The Salvation Army relief program is unparalleled in the Christian world. It pioneered in working with released prisoners and homeless men and women, and in providing homes for unwed mothers, and soup kitchens. During World Wars I and II the army set up stations to provide coffee and doughnuts to men and women in the armed forces, and it provided services latterly taken over by other organizations.

Because of its colorful uniforms, its bands, and its open-air street meetings, the Army has become known to most of the civilized world. Despite its emphasis on a wide range of social services, the Army has maintained its evangelistic zeal.

From the start Booth and his associates employed women as officers on an equal basis. Booth's wife, Catherine, was an eloquent preacher. Their daughter, Evangeline, eventually became the commanding general of the entire international organization.

SALVE REGINA. A prayer to Mary, Queen of Heaven, second in regular use among Roman Catholics only to the Hail Mary. The phrase is from the first words of the fourth antiphon of Our Lady. These antiphons are four chants in honor of Mary, each with a versicle, response, and prayer, which vary with the seasons of the church year. The four antiphons are Alma Redemptoris Mater, Ave Regina Coelorum, Regina Coeli, and Salve Regina. The antiphon for the season is sung after compline in the divine office. When the office is said in choir, the antiphon of Our Lady is sung kneeling, except on Saturdays, Sundays, and during Lent. In the Dominican liturgy, the antiphon is accompanied by a procession; in the Carmelite liturgy, it is said before the altar steps before the last gospel at mass; and in the Mozarabic rite, before the blessing.

SAMADHI. From the Sanskrit word meaning "total collectedness." In HINDUISM, the highest state of yogic or meditative concentration of mind. Samadhi is a state of pure consciousness, which has transcended all particular objects or moods as objects of consciousness, and is thus, in VEDANTA, a sharing in the absolute consciousness or BRAHMAN, ultimate reality. In the yoga sutras of Patanjali, samadhi is the last and highest of the "eight limbs of yoga," the state at which PURUSHA or spirit attains full release from the toils of prakriti, matter.

In BUDDHISM, on the other hand, samadhi generally refers to meditation techniques that train the mind in reaching subtle levels of consciousness, but that are not themselves the goal, Nirvana.

SAMARIA/SAMARITANS. The place-name denotes a city in Israel that became the capital of the northern kingdom after the division of the tribes (I Kings 12:25-33). To replace SHECHEM nearby as capital, it was built by Omri, who settled the site and made it his royal residence (I Kings 16:24), its prominence on a high elevation adding to its prestige. The palace has been excavated to reveal an early Bronze Age and Iron Age fortification. Omri's settlement was the first of many attempts to develop the site. Jeroboam II refurbished the palace before it fell to the Assyrians in 722 B.C. The city was restored in Hellenistic times, as Greek pottery finds have shown. The Romans further enlarged the Israelite city and erected a temple to Augustus.

From a religious point of view Samaria became a center for Canaanite worship. Ahab domesticated the deity Melkart under the influence of his wife Jezebel (I Kings 18:19), and Jehu's later reforms aimed to purify worship at Samaria, which the eighth-century prophets regarded as evil and idolatrous (Isa. 9:9; 28:1-4; Hos. 7:1; Mic. 1:6; Amos 3:9-4:3). According to Isaiah and Amos, Samaria was notorious for its commercial greed and social injustice.

The prophets saw divine judgment in successive invasions by the Syrians (I Kings 20:1-21) and especially the Assyrians (II Kings 15:17-22, recounting the invasion of Tiglath-pileser III, which was a prelude to the more successful attacks of the Assyrian Shalmaneser V and Sargon II, who in 721 B.C. deported the inhabitants to denude the city). Some inhabitants did remain (II Kings 17:29), called in the biblical text Samaritans, and formed the nucleus of a later settlement, subsequently to be destroyed by Alexander the Great, then rebuilt by the Roman general Pompey, and later refurbished as a part of Herod's grandiose building projects. This explains how Samaria takes its place in NT history (Luke 17:11; John 4:4-26, 30-42; Acts 8:4-25).

The Samaritans, as mentioned, appear in II Kings 17:29 as a remnant left in the city, to be joined by others whom the Assyrian king brought in to populate the ravaged area. But the later references to Samaritans in Jewish history are confused, and it is likely that the term strictly belongs to those who lived at or near Shechem, a short distance from the ancient site of Samaria, in the postexilic era. Sychar in John 4:5 is another name for Shechem. The Samaritans formed a distinctive community of Semitic people, with their own holy place (Mount Gerizim; see John 4:20) and customs, especially a distinctive celebration of Passover. In NT times they retained this identity and were not on friendly terms with their Jewish neighbors (see John 4:9 and the setting of Luke 10:20-37; 17:11-20). They were often in trouble with the Roman overlords of Palestine because of their political and religious demonstrations. Pilate massacred many of them, and they were harshly treated by the Romans in the Jewish war of A.D. 66-72, in spite of their earlier support of Rome's cause.

The Samaritans left a literary legacy of an edition of the Pentateuch, which they highly valued, and a creed that included a hope of a second Moses who would restore their fortunes. Their liturgy and beliefs live on into modern times. The many influences that history brought to bear on the Samaritans pose a complex question. They seem to have had contact with the people of the Dead Sea Scrolls, in view of parallels with the ideas common to both groups. Their interest in cosmological matters suggests that they came under the power of Gnostic thinking, especially in its Judaic form. An early Gnostic sect called Dositheans evidently had some connection with the Samaritans. As a final observation we note the penetration of Islam into Samaritan life in a later century. We can see how Samaritan and Muslim writers agree in their assessment of the Christian story of Jesus, stemming from a shared belief in the unity of God and the high place accorded to Moses. This led to a devaluing of Jesus as the final revelation of God, according to the orthodox Christian position.

The NT writers outline the progress in the Christian message to include Samaria (Acts 1:8; 8:4-25; 9:31), which, in later church history, became regarded as the seat of heresy, mainly because Simon the magician (in Acts 8) was treated as the father of the Gnostic aberration. More plausibly it has been argued that the development of early Christianity was influenced by those teachers, such as Stephen and Philip, who had connections with Samaritan ideas and practices.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH. See PENTATEUCH.

ŚAMKARA. Founder of the Advaita VEDANTA school, Śamkara is widely regarded as the most important single philosophical voice within HINDUISM and among the most influential of all Indian philosophers. He was born in south India in what is now the state of Karela. His dates remain a subject of debate, but were most likely around A.D. 700-732. According to tradition, Śamkara was a child genius who early mastered Vedic lore, took the garb of an ascetic, and traveled extensively about India studying, teaching, and establishing monastic centers. Most accounts have him die at only thirty-two years of age.

Śamkara's basic works are his commentaries on the Brahma sutras, the UPANISHADS, and a few other texts. His fundamental doctrine is the sole reality of Brahman, God, as pure sat-chit-ananda, "being, knowledge, bliss." All that appears other than Brahman is maya, apparent realities superimposed upon Brahman by ego-consciousness because of AVIDYA or ignorance. This ignorance is overcome not through much learning but by non-attachment and spiritual insight.

SAMKHYA. From the Sanskrit word for "calculation," in the sense of "analysis." One of the darshans or schools of philosophy of ancient HINDUISM, Samkhya emphasized a dualism between matter, prakriti, and spirit, purusha. Matter is composed, in varying degrees, of three gunas or attributes: sattva, intelligence; rajas, active energy; and tamas, sluggishness. Purusha, on the other hand, is scattered throughout the cosmos as an infinite number of "souls" that are motionless, unchanging, and desireless. But purusha draws prakriti to itself, activating it in the process, and out of this process come into being humans and other animate beings.

Entrapped thus in prakriti, the purusha may yearn for KAIVALYA, MOKSHA, or liberation. That liberation is the goal of the classical systems of YOGA, which are considerably influenced by Samkhya philosophy. Samkhya in particular has a close relationship to the yoga sutras of Patanjali and to parts of the BHAGAVAD GITA.

SAMOTHRACE. An island in the northeastern part of the Aegean Sea. On a sea lane linking Greece to the Black Sea, Samothrace was a center for traders, travelers and colonists in the sixth and fifth centuries B.C. From Hellenistic times to the fourth century A.D., the island was a celebrated religious site, comparable to Olympia and Delphi, famous for its Sanctuary of the Great Gods. The island's capital, located on the north coast, had a small harbor that was visited by Paul on his way from Troas to Neapolis (Acts 16:11) and again, probably, on his return journey (Acts 20:6).

SAMSARA. From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "going around." In the thought of HINDUISM, BUDDHISM, and JAINISM, samsara refers to the "wheel of existence," the endless rounds of transmigration or rebirth in this and other worlds decreed by KARMA, which is the lot of all beings until they attain MOKSHA, KAIVALYA, or liberation into NIRVANA, unconditioned reality by whatever name it is called.

The idea of samsara implies that the jiva or ego, or in Buddhism the accumulated energies of a life, pass through a succession of bodies. Sometimes regarded as fatalistic, the doctrine actually implies, first, that the universe is grounded upon DHARMA or righteousness and justice in its eternal ordering, since entities receive the proper fruits of their actions, and second, individual responsibility, in that one's future destiny is determined by the karma one makes or the liberation one seeks here and now.

SAMSON. A Danite judge, famed for his enormous strength and heroic accomplishments against neighboring Philistines (Judg. 13-16). Samson's Canaanite personal name (meaning "solar," "little sun") has invited the thesis that he was a mythical sun hero. But the proximity of Zorah, his hometown, to Beth-she-mesh ("house of the sun"), with its solar cult, suggests that Samson's name may not have been extraordinary and encourages our reading his bawdy exploits as those of an earthy frontier hero.

Samson's Career. Artful biblical narrative initially focuses on Samson's birth (Judg. 13:1-25). The angel of Yahweh informs Manoah's unnamed barren wife that she will bear a son who shall, from birth, be consecrated to Yahweh's service as a NAZIRITE. He must let his hair grow long and avoid wine, strong drink, and unclean food. Following his birth and early development, "the Spirit of the Lord began to stir him" (13:25). The meaning of that inner turmoil becomes evident only in subsequent narrative.

If Judges 13 suggests that Samson will pursue an austere existence, his exploits enumerated in Judges 14:1–16:22 tell otherwise! Willful Samson insists that his parents arrange his marriage to a Philistine maiden of nearby Timnah. A theological notation confers respectability on Samson's request: "it was from the LORD; for he was seeking an occasion against the Philistines" (14:4). After Samson has posed a riddle to the wedding guests (14:14), his bride coaxes out of him its meaning. She informs the Philistines, who solve the riddle. Samson pays the promised reward with the clothing of thirty Philistine victims at Ashkelon. In a rage he returns to Zorah.

When Samson learns that his wife has been given to his best man, he seizes three hundred foxes, ties blazing torches to their tails, and sends them through the Philistine grain fields (15:5). The Philistines burn Samson's wife and father-in-law after learning that they are the source of his rage. Samson then avenges himself on these murderers. Determined Philistines now induce certain Judeans to deliver Samson to them in a bound condition. Samson cooperates. Then with perfect timing, he frees himself and slays a thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass, his improvised weapon (15:15). Subsequently recognized while visiting a harlot in Gaza, Samson eludes the ambushers and uproots Gaza's gates, which he triumphantly carries forty miles to Hebron (16:3).

Tragedy soon overtakes Samson. Having won Samson's affection, Delilah obtains the secret of his strength so that the Philistines may seize him. Finally, "he told her all his mind" (16:17). Thereupon Samson's head is shaved as he sleeps on Delilah's lap. The Nazirite vow is violated. The weakened Samson is captured, blinded, and forced to grind meal at Gaza's prison. As Samson's hair begins to grow, his former strength returns. In a final desperate deed, Samson pulls down the pillars of the Philistine temple of Dagon. With the edifice crashing on both the Philistine throng and himself, Samson slays more enemies at his death than he had during his reckless life (16:30).

Historical and Religious Significance. Though the deeds of this legendary hero elude historical verification, the Samson narrative is historically significant insofar as it thoroughly reflects mounting Philistine-Israelite border tension during the eleventh century B.C. Though perhaps only sporadic and local, the friction was the harbinger of mounting hostility between the two populations in the years ahead. The narrative's religious import mainly lies in its convincing rendition of Samson as a negative example. Divinely given charismatic talent is wasted on someone susceptible to selfishness and unrestrained passion. His deeds were consistently motivated out of personal revenge, not out of recognition that he might have sacrificially and systematically rescued Dan, his native tribe, from augmenting Philistine pressure. Despite his flawed character, Samson's story has inspired such noteworthy creations as Saint-Saëns' opera Samson and Delilah and Milton's dramatic poem Samson Agonistes. J.K.K.

SAMUEL. The OT material presents several portraits of the man Samuel, making it difficult to determine the real identity of the "historical Samuel."

The Priest-Prophet at Shiloh. In I Samuel 1:1–4:1a, Samuel is presented as a person born to a barren mother, Hannah. As a consequence of the mother's vow (I Sam. 1:11), the lad is dedicated to the service of God and functions under the priest Eli at the sanctuary in Shiloh. Here he becomes prominent as a prophet while still a youth, condemns the house of Eli, and develops a reputation throughout Israel (I Sam. 3:10–4:1a).

Serious questions have been raised about this portrait of Samuel: (a) The story of the birth plays on the words "asked for" and "lent" (I Sam. 1:20; 2:20). These are the meanings of the name SAUL, not Samuel, which suggests that this birth and dedication story was once told about Saul and only secondarily applied to Samuel. (b) Only in these stories does Samuel have anything to do with SHILOH. Elsewhere in the stories he is associated with other places. (c) The content of Samuel's oracle against Eli's house (I Sam. 3:10–18) is already pronounced by an unnamed man of God in I Samuel 2:27–36, suggesting that the condemnation of Eli's family was originally made by someone other than Samuel.

The Seer-Prophet from Zuph. A second portrait of Samuel is found in I Samuel 9:1–10:16. In this account, he is presented as a seer-PROPHET (see 9:9), who at God's direction anoints Saul to rescue Israel from the Philistines. It would seem that Samuel has been introduced also into this story secondarily. At the beginning of the story, the seer is simply an unnamed man of God (9:6) and only later in the story is this character identified with Samuel (9:14). The only other text that associates Samuel with prophecy is I Samuel 19:20, where he is shown presiding over a group of prophets. This story, however, goes on to report a saying about Saul (19:24), which is already found in 10:12.

The Judge. A third picture of Samuel is found in I Samuel 7:3–8:22; 10:17–25; 12:1–25; 13:8–15; 15:1–35; 16:1–13. In these materials, Samuel is never called a seer or prophet but is presented as the last judge of Israel who reluctantly presides over the establishment of the monarchy. After aiding in the selection of Saul (10:17–25), he rejects him and moves to make DAVID king. Much of this material has been made to serve the themes of the books of I-II Samuel, namely, kingship as a blessing and curse, the repudiation of Saul, and the exaltation of David. These seem to be more theological and literary concerns used as propaganda than really historical factors.

The "Historical Samuel." Probably the portrait of Samuel as judge, king-maker, and king-rejector has more historical accuracy about it than the other two portraits. Samuel seems to have been a revered religious leader in the tribe of Benjamin: "Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life. And he went on a circuit year by year to Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah; and he judged Israel in all these places" (I Sam. 7:15-16). He may also have assisted in some fashion in Israel's war with the Philistines (7:1-4). He seems to have been drawn rather reluctantly into the move to make Saul king (I Sam. 8; 10:17-25; 12) and then to have broken with Saul probably over a struggle for power and authority (I Sam. 13; 15). Samuel may have aided David in the latter's struggles against Saul (19:18), but the account of his anointing David (16:1-13) sounds very much like an old folktale told to exalt David and to suggest that he was God's chosen even when an unpretentious lad. J.H.

I and II SAMUEL. The ninth and tenth books in the English Bible that continue the historical narrative of the book of Judges. In the Hebrew Bible, they are counted a part of the "Former Prophets." In the ancient Greek tradition, I-II Samuel were called "first and second kingdoms" and closely associated with I-II Kings, called "third and fourth kingdoms." In Hebrew, the books follow Judges, but in other ancient versions, as in modern English texts, the book of Ruth has been placed between Judges and I-II Samuel.

Title. From the early centuries of the present era, the name of SAMUEL has been associated with these two books although his death is described before the end of I Samuel (25:1). In ancient times the two books were considered as a single work. Why the material should be called "Samuel" is unknown except that he does appear as the first important person in the book. First Chronicles 29:29 speaks of the Chronicles of Samuel the seer, which contained "the acts of David." No such work as this is known, but such a reference may have suggested Samuel's name for the books now bearing his name.

Structure. One way of looking at the books of Samuel is to see them as the continuation of the book of JUDGES. In the latter book, conditions are described in the early history of Israel, when judges ruled the people and "there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (Judg. 21:25). If the books continue the story in Judges, then Samuel's speech in I Samuel 12 would mark the end of the period of the judges (begun in Judg. 2) and introduce the period of the kings (begun in I Sam. 13). The latter period would then extend through the end of II Kings.

If we only focus on the two books themselves and the main characters in the story, the following outline suggests itself: (a) stories about Samuel (I Sam. 1-3; 7:3-17), (b) stories about the ARK OF THE COVENANT (I Sam. 4:1-7:2; II Sam. 6), (c) Samuel and Saul (I Sam. 8-15), (d) Saul and David (I Sam. 16-II Sam. 1), (e) David as king in Hebron

(II Sam. 2:1-5:5), (f) David as king in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:6-20:26), and (g) miscellaneous material about David (II Sam. 21-24). The story about David is not complete until the opening chapters of I Kings, which report David's death and Solomon's ascension to the throne.

Contents. In I Samuel 1-7, Samuel is the dominant character. Stories in the first three chapters report his birth and early service in the sanctuary at Shiloh under the direction of the priest ELI. An important theme in these narratives is the downfall of the house of Eli and the loss of prestige by the sanctuary at Shiloh. In I Samuel 4:1b-7:2, Samuel does not even appear. These stories, continued in II Samuel 6, concern the loss (and subsequent return) of the ark. Clearly, the Ark narrative originally had nothing to do with the Samuel narrative but has been included in the story here because it emphasized the loss of prestige by Shiloh, the home of the ark. The last independent Samuel story tells of his presiding over the Israelite triumph over the Philistines (I Sam. 7:3-17).

First Samuel 8-12 describes relationships between Samuel and Saul. In reality, however, these chapters are put together to provide a judgment on the institution of kingship and on Saul (see I Sam. 8:12). The account of Saul's coming to the throne that presents him in a good light (I Sam. 9-11) is sandwiched between two speeches of Samuel that condemn kingship. Again the material that focuses on Saul (I Sam. 13-15) has been edited so that Samuel condemns him in both I Samuel 13 and 15.

Once David enters the picture (I Sam. 16), he tends to dominate the stories even though Saul is the king and David only his servant. As David becomes more successful, Saul becomes more tragically obsessed. Eventually the tension between the two led to David's flight and his stay with the Philistines until their defeat of Saul. Thus I Samuel 16-II Samuel 1 is really not so much about Saul as about David's rise to prominence.

DAVID, of course, is the central character in II Samuel. Here the material can be seen as structured in various ways. First, it presents David under the blessing (II Sam. 2-8), when things work well for him and culminate in his empire. Then David is presented under the curse (II Sam. 9-20), when his reign is tormented by family and political problems. Another way to look at the material is to see II Samuel 2-7 as telling how David came to acquire his great state (I Sam. 8), followed by the account of how that state and its well-being were threatened (II Sam. 9-20).

The miscellaneous materials in II Samuel 21-24, containing stories from various periods in David's career and rule, have not been integrated into the story line of I-II Samuel and thus must be viewed as a catch-all of remaining Davidic stories.

Themes. Various themes stand out in the books of Samuel, and to treat these was a primary purpose. (a) Kingship is presented as both a blessing and a curse, as a hope and as a source of despair, a perspective then illustrated in the books of Kings. (b) The fall of the house of Eli and the demise of Shiloh and their replacement by Jerusalem and a new priesthood are stressed. (c) Saul is presented as the first but the forsaken ruler. (d) David and his family are presented as the elect, but even they are not a complete blessing.

SAMURAI. In Japan, a warrior class characterized by distinct moral and spiritual values. As aristocratic knights or bushi, the samurai came to power in the eleventh century and as a class controlled Japanese political and cultural life in the Middle Ages, a period of almost incessant civil war. When the Tokugawa shogunate (1600–1868) established peace, the samurai had little fighting to do, but became a rigorously demarcated caste marked by certain privileges, such as the right to wear swords, and dominating government and education. The samurai way of life, often called BUSHIDO (the way or tao of the warrior), increasingly codified as the centuries of samurai dominance passed, drew inspiration from CONFUCIANISM, ZEN, and SHINTO. It emphasized frugality, courage, indifference to suffering, and utter loyalty to one's lord. If he failed to meet his obligations, a samurai was expected to commit ritual suicide, seppuku or hara-kiri.

The samurai class, along with other relics of feudalism, was officially abolished after the Meiji restoration of 1868. But its values continued to play a significant role in Japanese life, above all in the mentality of many military people and their supporters until the end of World War II in 1945.

SANBALLAT. A politician called by Nehemiah (2:10) "the Horonite," that is, from Beth-horon. In a letter from Elephantine in Egypt, dated 407 B.C., Sanballat is called "the governor of Samaria" who had two sons with Hebrew names. Nehemiah 4:2 speaks of Sanballat's "brethren" (political followers) and of "the army of Samaria" as sources of his power. He seems to have been a Persian appointee, located in the city of Samaria, to whom the Persians had given authority over Judah and Jerusalem. TOBIAH, the Ammonite, was his henchman in their attempt to stop the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls (Neh. 2:10, 19; 4:7; 6:1, 12, 14). Nehemiah "chased . . . from me" (13:28) the unnamed member of a prominent, priestly family in Jerusalem who had married Sanballat's daughter.

SANCTIFICATION. The process of growth in personal sanctity or holiness, following JUSTIFICATION, or acceptance of the sinner as righteous by God on account of the sacrifice of Christ, appropriated by faith. Justification is the initial stage of salvation, which immediately reconciles the sinner to God. This new relationship or turn toward God is then followed by a lifelong process of growth in grace, called sanctification. In both justification and sanctification, all is accomplished by God's free grace, received humbly in faith or trust.

Sanctification is derived from "sanctify," which is from the Latin sanctus, or holy. To sanctify directly means "to make holy." Sanctification refers to the ongoing process of becoming HOLY. To be "holy" means "to be identified with God," for only God is holy, according to biblical revelation. God's name is holy; and elements of worship, such as temples and scriptures, are made holy by their relationship to God. Anything used by God becomes holy (Pss. 99:3, 9; 111:9; Exod. 3:5; 20:8, 11; 28:2; 35:2; Josh. 5:15; II Chr. 35:3; I Kings 8:4, 6). Clearly, sanctification means "to be in close relationship with God." Any practice, then, that keeps us near the Divine and available for God's service, such as prayer, works of love and mercy, or sensitivity to the needs of people made in God's image, is conducive to growth in sanctity.

In the OT, holiness means "to be set apart." Thus the Levites (Lev. 20:26; 21:8) were holy because of their separation from ordinary life and their devotion to God. In the NT, as well as in the prophetic writings of the OT, sanctification is more personally and ethically understood. Paul declares in Romans 12:1-2, "Present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is your spiritual worship. Do not be conformed to this world but be transformed by the renewal of your mind." Personal holiness or ethical purity is here equated with sanctification. Paul goes on to list humility, generosity, faithfulness, mercy, cheerfulness, love, sincerity, joy, patience, peacefulness, and good deeds as the expression of sanctification in the Christian's life.

J.C.

SANCTUARY. A place that is sacred in that it is both consecrated and a place of refuge or asylum. "Sanctuary" is also the term used for the right of asylum, of protection from one's enemies or the power of the law. The Hebrews had cities of REFUGE or sanctuary (Deut. 4:41-42). The area immediately surrounding the altar, in the chancel of a church, is also called the sanctuary. (See also SANCTUARY, RIGHT OF.)

J.C.

SANCTUARY, RIGHT OF. The sacred character of holy places, the protection provided by the Holy, taboos against shedding blood on holy ground, and fear of the effectiveness of any curses uttered by anyone cornered in a sacred place have combined to make churches asylums for those who have committed crimes.

In Israel, certain cities were designated as places of REFUGE (see Deut. 19:1-13). The first record of the right of sanctuary in Christian churches is found in fourth-century Roman law. The Theodosian and Justinian codes also acknowledge and regulate the practice, which developed in recognition of the bishop as intercessor with the civil government. Both civil and canon law regulated just which offenses would be offered sanctuary and which would not. Sometimes those guilty of violent crimes would be given temporary sanctuary to check blood vengeance, to provide for compensation for the victim or kin, or to gain assurance that the criminal would be tried and not just summarily executed.

In medieval England every church was considered a sanctuary, and other places obtained the right through royal charter. Henry VIII abolished twenty-two such places and substituted seven "cities of refuge" in 1540. James I in 1623 abolished the right of sanctuary for certain crimes, but the practice was not totally eliminated until 1723. On the Continent, the practice survived until the French Revolution. It is the basis today for diplomatic asylum in embassies.

The right of sanctuary was tested in the United States during the 1980s, as churches responded to the plight of refugees from Latin American military dictatorships. The United States government would not grant political asylum to refugees from governments that it supported. Some church leaders risked civil disobedience in claiming the right of sanctuary in order to shelter and help such refugees.

SANCTUS. The hymn of victory or tersanctus, derived from Isaiah 6:3, which appears in the liturgy of the Mass at the end of the preface (to Holy Communion). It consists of the phrase "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts. Heaven and earth are full of thy glory." This portion of the Christian liturgy (which also occurs in Holy Communion services of several denominations) is taken from synagogue worship.

SANGHA. From the Pali word for "assembly." In BUDDHISM, the monastic order. Originating in the band of disciples gathered by the Buddha himself, the Sangha is perhaps the oldest existing non-hereditary institution in the world today. Its purpose is the pure practice, conservation, and teaching of the Buddhist path to enlightenment. Those who formally become Buddhists, and those who enter the Sangha, affirm the Triratna, "Three Jewels": "I take refuge in the Buddha, the dharma, and the Sangha"—that is, in the Buddha as the supreme example of the enlightened person, in his teaching, and in the organization that perpetuates it.

The Sangha is found in most traditional form in the Theravada Buddhist countries. Here monks are celibate and follow literally such ancient observances of the Vinaya Pitaka, the scripture of monastic discipline—such as no meals after noon—and retreat during the rainy season. Mahayana monks and priests, while part of the Sangha, often follow considerably modified rules.

Everywhere, however, the Sangha has developed from its original ideal as an assembly of wandering teaching monks, the "Sangha of the Four Quarters," to a collection of monastic and temple communities, together with some hermit recluses. Ruled by an abbot, larger monasteries serve as Buddhist educational centers and places of retreat, while village temples with their modest staff of monks are local centers of religious life. In the Theravada countries, except Sri Lanka (Ceylon), boys traditionally spend a year as a member of the Sangha before marriage as part of initiation into manhood.

SANHEDRIN. The term is a loanword into Hebrew from the Greek word synedrion meaning "a council or meeting place." It has specific application to the Jewish senate (Acts 5:21) or "council of elders" (Luke 22:66; Acts 22:5) called in session to determine legal questions for the people according to the rabbinic interpretation of the law, both civil and religious. Joseph of Arimathea is called a counselor (Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50) since he was a member of this body.

The rabbis traced back the genesis of the Sanhedrin to the seventy men appointed to assist Moses (Num. 11:16), and they believed that after the Exile the company of ruling elders was convened by Ezra (see the Mishnah, Sayings of the Fathers 1:1 for a statement to this effect). Josephus, however, knows of the Sanhedrin from a decree of Antiochus III (third-second century B.C.) debated by the "senate" of the Jews. Here we meet the composition of the body as consisting of priests and elders under the controlling influence of the high priest. There are several allusions to this governing council in I Maccabees and Josephus, showing that the PHARISEES came to power in this way by becoming a numerous group in the Sanhedrin.

With the Roman occupation of Israel after 63 B.C., when Pompey took over the administration of Palestine, the Sanhedrin's power was restricted, and with Herod the Great's virtual dictatorship in force, the elders were muted or reduced to compliance. A sharp turn of events in A.D. 6, which made Judea a province of Rome, threw the Sanhedrin into prominence, and restored the power and privilege it had enjoyed in the earliest Hasmonean times. During the six decades that span much of the NT (A.D. 6–66, when the great rebellion against Rome broke out) the Sanhedrin was in the seat of authority as the center of religious, judicial, and administrative power in Israel.

In this period the council was dominated by the aristocracy of the SADDUCEES, led by the chief priests with the HIGH PRIEST (known from the Gospels as Annas and his son-in-law Caiaphas; and from the Acts as Ananias at the trial of Paul, Acts 23:2) the leader. Patterned on the reference given in Numbers 11:16 and following, of the "elders of Israel," the number of the senate was fixed at seventy (plus one); the extra person in excess of seventy was the high priest who acted as chairman. The latter office was hereditary, while it seems that the council members elected one another for life. The main credential for membership was a knowledge of the Torah (Moses' Law) and its rabbinical interpretation.

The jurisdiction of the Sanhedrin covered a wide geographical area (including the Dispersion; see Acts 9:1ff.) and it had within its competence to deal with an extensive range of judicial themes and concerns. In particular, it acted as the main beth din, "a court of justice," and its speciality was the examination and punishment of heretics, that is, those accused of teaching contrary to the Torah and leading others astray (as in the stories of Acts 4, 5, 22, 24). In this context we must view the "trials" of Jesus and Stephen (Acts 6:9-8:1) as well as the later sentence of death passed on James, the Lord's brother, for alleged transgression against the Law of Moses (compare Paul's defense too, Acts 25:8; 26:2-8). It seems that both Jesus and Stephen were regarded as deviant teachers in Israel, though Jesus' pretension to be a messianic figure was taken to imply that he claimed to share God's throne (Mark 14:62), a bid that the Sanhedrin regarded as blasphemy (Mark 14:64). On Stephen's part, the grievance was similar except for the obvious difference that he claimed to see the exalted Jesus as an occupant of God's throne like Daniel's Son of man (Dan. 7:13; Acts 7:55).

The competence of the Sanhedrin to carry out capital punishments is much debated. John 18:31 clearly indicates that the Romans reserved the right to execute, and there is some independent corroboration of this restriction on the Sanhedrin's power. On the other side, there is a conflicting body of data to show that the Sanhedrin did expect to have the power of life and death in religious cases demanding the death penalty (for example, adultery), and the "executions" of Stephen and James indicate how they brought about the deaths of these men. But these instances were in the nature of mob violence and murder rather than summary execution. Yet again the evidence of John 18:31 is capable of a nuanced interpretation, given John's theological interest, and it may mean: "it is not lawful for us to put any man to death" by crucifixion, the Roman method of execution, a point John wished to emphasize since he regarded the manner of Jesus' death (John 18:32) as both significant and symbolic (Jesus' being "lifted up," John 12:32, 33).

Saul of Tarsus is often thought to have been a Sanhedrin member (Acts 26:10), but this is unlikely, given his youthful age at the time of Stephen's interrogation. R.M.

SANKEY, IRA DAVID (1840-1908). Famed musician and associate of DWIGHT L. MOODY in his evangelistic campaigns. Born in Lawrence County, Pennsylvania, Sankey early demonstrated his gifts as a musician. After having served with the Union troops during the Civil War, he returned to Newcastle,

Ira D. Sankey

Pennsylvania, where evangelistic singing became his primary interest. He was often a soloist at large Sunday school conventions in the heyday of that movement.

As a delegate to the international convention of the YMCA. in Indianapolis in 1870, he met D. L. Moody for the first time. The evangelist urged Sankey to return to Chicago to work with him, in what was to be an association that was to continue for twenty-five years. Moody did the preaching, and Sankey sang gospel songs and served as organ accompanist.

Moody and Sankey were involved in a preaching tour of the British Isles that continued from 1872 to 1875. In the meetings the Sankey and Moody Hymn Book (published in 1873) was employed to introduce to the British public gospel songs, a genre of music then unknown to the more formal British public. As Moody and Sankey traveled through England, Scotland, and Ireland, the meetings met with great response from both clergy and lay people.

After some revisions, a resultant hymnbook, Gospel Hymns and Sacred Songs, published by P. P. Bliss and Sankey, appeared in the United States in 1875. This was the book used in the great Moody meetings in the Brooklyn Rink, the old Pennsylvania Railroad depot in Philadelphia, and in other cities. Neither Moody nor Sankey benefited personally from the royalties on their hymnbook sales. "The new melodies penetrated even the music halls and were whistled by the man on the street" (Louis F. Benson, The English Hymn, 1962). Sankey's singing in a baritone voice as he accompanied himself on a small reed organ vaulted him to a new plane of popularity. R.H.

SANSKRIT. An ancient Indo-European language of India, which is the sacred language of HINDUISM. Sanskrit is often referred to as devavani—the language of the gods. Sanskrit literature is of four types: the VEDAS; sastras or guides to conduct, such as the Laws of Manu; PURANAS; and poetry, such as the epics MAHABHARATA and RAMAYANA. Of these classes, the first three are believed to be divinely inspired, the Vedas being the fundamental Hindu scriptures. Sanskrit remains the tongue of the most sacred Hindu rituals performed by Brahmins. Important religious texts of BUDDHISM and JAINISM are also in Sanskrit.

SARACENS. The term first used by late classical authors (first through third centuries A.D.) to refer to an Arab tribe of the Sinai. After the rise of Islam, European Christians used the term to refer to any Muslim subject of the caliphate, whether Arab, Turkish, or some other nationality. K./M.C.

SARAH. (1) The wife of Abraham and mother of Isaac. As Abram's childless wife (Gen. 11:29-30), Sarah, alternately Sarai, meaning "princess, mistress," accompanied him to Canaan (12:5) via Haran (11:31). Believing that Sarai's beauty would endanger him during their emergency sojourn in Egypt, Abram instructed her to pretend that she was his sister (12:13; in 20:12 she is his half sister). Sarai's presence in Pharaoh's house evoked divinely sent plagues. Discerning Sarai's true identity, Pharaoh expelled the couple (12:15-13:1).

Subsequently, Sarai despaired over her inability to provide Abram an heir. Abram accepted Sarai's offer of her Egyptian maid Hagar. Once pregnant, Hagar acted arrogantly. Obtaining Abram's consent, resentful Sarai expelled Hagar (16:1-6), but she returned under divine leading to bear Ishmael (16:7-15).

When God assigned the couple the names "Abraham" and "Sarah" (17:5, 15 [dialectical variants of their former names]), he assured ABRAHAM that this "mother of nations" would bear a son within a year (17:16-21). Hearing that same divine promise at Mamre, ninety-year-old Sarah laughed incredulously (18:10-15).

At Gerar, the uneasy couple made King Abimelech victim of the wife-sister deception. Once Sarah was inside Abimelech's house, God warned the king to return her untouched to Abraham (20:1-7). Abimelech complied, offering Abraham a reprimand, gifts, and an invitation to settle nearby (20:9-16).

When Sarah bore the child of promise, Abraham named him Isaac to commemorate his wife's joyful laughter over his birth (21:1-3, 6-7). At Isaac's weaning feast, Sarah demanded the permanent expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael, who threatened her own son's inheritance (21:8-14). When Sarah died at Kiriath-arba (Hebron) at the age of 127 (23:1-2), Abraham buried her in the cave of Machpelah that he purchased for a family sepulcher (23:3-20). Beyond Genesis, Sarah is mentioned but once in the OT—in Isaiah 51:2 as Israel's ancestress.

NT texts refer to Sarah's protracted barrenness (Rom. 4:19), conception of Isaac (Rom. 9:9), dissimilarity with Hagar (Gal. 4:21-31), faith in God's promise (Heb. 11:11), and submissiveness to Abraham (I Pet. 3:6). A superlative expression of Sarah's beauty appears in the Genesis Apocryphon, a first-century A.D. Aramaic scroll from Qumran.

The temple of Artemis at Sardis

SARDIS. A city in Asia Minor, capital of ancient Lydia and of the Roman province of Lydia, located in the Hermus River valley, near the river Pactolus. In the sixth century B.C., Sardis was one of the most powerful and rich cities in the world. The famed Croesus was one of its prominent and despotic kings. An oriental and geographically well-defended city, its wealth came from agriculture and much commerce and trade. It became the most important Persian city in Asia Minor. The patron deity of the city was Artemis-Cybele, who claimed power to restore life to the dead.

The letter to Sardis (Rev. 3:1-6) is to a church that is nearly dead (v. 2) but that had a few faithful believers (v. 4) to whom the promise is given that their names remain in "the book of life" and will be confessed before God and the angels (v. 5).

SARGON. (1) Sargon of Akkad. As history's first empire-builder, Sargon founded the Semitic Empire of Akkad (about 2360-2180 B.C.). Credited by the Sumerian King List with a fifty-six-year reign, this energetic imperialist ascended to power in Kish, defeated Lugalzaggisi of Erech, and won mastery over all Sumer. His inscriptions also report spectacular campaigns throughout Upper Mesopotamia enabling him to command territory spanning the Lower Sea (Persian Gulf) to the Upper Sea (Mediterranean).

At Akkad (near the later Babylon, though still archaeologically unidentified), Sargon established a new capital. He brought sufficient unification to his wide-ranging empire so that, following his death, two sons and an impressive grandson, Naramsin, could hold sway for nearly sixty years. Sargon's birth, rise to kingship, and eventful rule have been vastly embellished by Sumerian and AKKADIAN legend.

(2) Sargon I. A virtually unknown nineteenth-century B.C. monarch standing in twenty-seventh position within the Assyrian King List, whose seal impression is attested on ancient Cappadocian texts.

(3) Sargon II (722–705 B.C.). Son of Tiglath-pileser III, father of Sennacherib, and king of ASSYRIA, who succeeded his brother, Shalmaneser V, after the latter had been murdered during the siege of Samaria. Sargon claimed the throne amid obscure, yet real, internal conflict. He was immediately greeted by extensive anti-Assyrian rebellion. Thus his goal of reestablishing the dimensions of his father's empire was realized only through sustained diligence. For a decade, he successfully waged war against various enemies to the west (Syria and Asia Minor) and north (Urartu). His army even advanced to the Egyptian frontier.

Sargon then engaged in delayed retaliation against Merodach-baladan, a Chaldean prince, who had led Babylonian and allied Elamite rebels against him at the outset of his Assyrian reign. Merodach-baladan, who presently suffered internal problems of his own, fled to Elam. This enabled Sargon to enter Babylon without incident in 709 B.C. and make himself king there.

In 713 Sargon began the ambitious construction of his own new city Dur-Sharrukin (Khorsabad) near Nineveh. It was completed in 707, but never truly inhabited. After Sargon's battlefield death amid a minor engagement in Iran in 705 (which thrust his son Sennacherib into kingship), the city was abandoned.

The extent of Sargon's engagement in Palestinian affairs is somewhat unclear. Whereas the OT seems to credit Shalmaneser with the capture of Samaria (II Kings 17:1-6; 18:9-12), Sargon's annals repeatedly claim that as his own achievement. Moreover, some biblical scholars have equated Sargon with the imprecise "king of Assyria" reference in II Kings 17:6. Since Samaria fell to the Assyrians in the late summer or autumn of 722 and Shalmaneser died late in 722, Samaria's capitulation likely predated Sargon's regal installation. Sargon probably boasted about the event because it happened in his accession year. The reorganization of Samaria into an Assyrian province, however, occurred under Sargon's supervision.

Less than a decade later, Palestinian inhabitants impressed by Egypt's resurgence under its new Twenty-fifth (Ethiopian) Dynasty decided that the time was ripe to stand up to Assyria. In about 714, the Philistine city of Ashdod defied Assyria by withholding tribute. Judah, Edom, and Moab were invited to join an expanding coalition of anti-Assyrian rebels. Isaiah's opposition to Judah's involvement is recorded in Isaiah 20, the only biblical text that names Sargon (v. 1). Judah's king Hezekiah apparently accepted Isaiah's advice and stood aloof. Busily preparing to overtake Babylon, Sargon dispatched his general, who severely punished Ashdod in 712 and straightaway turned it into an Assyrian province. If Judah escaped disaster, it was forced to recognize that under Sargon, Assyria was a most resourceful military power. J.K.K.

SARTRE, JEAN-PAUL (1905–80). French philosopher, playwright, novelist, and essayist, best known as one of the leaders of twentieth-century atheistic EXISTENTIALISM. Born in Paris, he entered the Ecole Normale Supérieure in 1924. Sartre did further study in Germany under EDMUND HUSSERL and MARTIN HEIDEGGER. Both were critical influences. From 1931 to 1944, he taught philosophy at lycées in Le Havre, Laon, and Paris. His first novel, Nausea (1938), established his reputation in French literary circles. It concretely expresses existentialist themes developed in his philosophical works. Sartre's major work, Being and Nothingness, appeared in 1943, the same year as the play The Flies, which, with No Exit (1944), attracted much attention. In 1945 he co-founded the periodical Les Temps Modernes. After the war there appeared a number of novels, plays, and literary studies, including The Age of Reason and The Reprieve (1945), Dirty Hands (1948), Troubled Sleep (1949), The Condemned of Altona (1956), Saint Genet (1961), and a study of Flaubert (1971).

Sartre's life was one of political engagement and disputation. Drawn to Marxism, he later criticized French Communism and identified with Maoist causes. His Critique of Dialectical Reason (1960) is an effort to show Marxism's compatibility with existentialism. However, the relationship between his highly individualistic existentialist moral theory and his Marxist and later Maoist views is never clearly resolved. At the center of Sartre's existentialism is an analysis of human consciousness, the crux of which is the anguish of our experience of inescapable freedom. Sartre calls "bad faith" the effort to conceal our freedom by assuming that our situation is determined or inevitable. Sartre insists that authentic existence requires the acceptance of our own freedom and the recognition that we are the sole origin of, and thus responsible for, all our acts. Yet human consciousness is radically contingent, never ontologically self-sufficient. We therefore project this perfection in the idea of God. However, Sartre insists, God does not exist. J.L.

SAT/SATYA. In SANSKRIT, these terms combine the concepts of being, existence, essence, truth, and that which is morally right. This combination offers a valuable insight into a keynote of HINDUISM: its identification of ontological reality, sat or being, with satya or truth as expressed through human speech and deed; and with righteous conduct, which is moral both in itself and because it is in accordance with the true nature of the cosmos. In ancient India, telling truth and acting in accord with it at whatever sacrifice was thought to have great sacred potency. In the twentieth century MOHANDAS GANDHI revived the belief in his concept of satyagraha, "holding to truth/being," as the principle underlying his tactics of non-violent resistance.

SATAN. The word, meaning simply "adversary," is seldom found in the Hebrew OT, where it refers to David (I Sam. 29:4), the sons of Zeruiah (II Sam. 19:22), and David's enemies (I Kings 5:4), including Hadad the Edomite (I Kings 11:14) and Rezon (11:23). In a few places the term seems to have a special significance equivalent to "the adversary" and apparently refers to that ruler of evil beings who is constantly set in opposition to God's purposes. This seems to be the meaning in I Chronicles 21:1; Job 1:6-12; 2:1-7; and Zechariah 3:1-2. Interestingly, in these passages the Septuagint consistently translates the term by the Greek word for the DEVIL. The Latin Vulgate uses Satan. The paucity of references to Satan in the OT is in striking contrast to the saturation of apocalyptic literature in the intertestamental period with various terms for Satan, such as Asmodeus, Semjaza, Azazel, Mastema, Satanail, and Belial. Whether this influx of teaching on angels and demons is due to Persian cosmology is debated, but the tremendous increase of such teaching after the return from Persia in 538 B.C. is incontrovertible. It may be more likely explained by the transcendentalizing of God by the Jews after the destruction of the Temple and the need to fill the void with intermediary beings, both good and evil.

The NT inherits the tradition of the previous centuries and speaks frequently of the role of Satan and the demons. He is called Satan (II Cor. 12:7; Rev. 12:9), the Devil (Matt. 4:1; 25:41), Beelzebul (Mark 3:22), Belial (II Cor. 6:15), and perhaps Abaddon and Apollyon (Rev. 9:11). In addition, many metaphors are used to describe Satan: the Serpent (Rev. 12:9), the Dragon (Rev. 12:7), the Lion (I Pet. 5:8; II Tim. 4:17), the Strong Man (Matt. 12:29), the Evil One (Eph. 6:16), the Accuser (Rev. 12:10), the Tempter (Matt. 4:3), the Destroyer (I Cor. 10:10), the Adversary (I Pet. 5:8), the Enemy (Matt. 13:25; I Cor. 15:25), an Angel of Light (II Cor. 11:14), the Prince of Demons (Matt. 9:34; 12:24), the Ruler of this World (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), the Prince of the Power of the Air (Eph. 2:2), and the God of this World (II Cor. 4:4).

The Bible contains no account of the origin of Satan, although he is already present in the Garden of Eden when the story of humanity begins (Gen. 3:1; II Cor. 11:3). Some find allusions to his origin in Isaiah 14 and Ezekiel 28, though in both passages it is a human ruler who is under primary consideration. In the NT, Jude 6 speaks of the expulsion of angels from their own position and proper dwelling and their consignment to the nether gloom until the Judgment.

In II Peter 2:4, angels are said to have sinned and been cast into hell, awaiting judgment in pits of nether gloom. Since Matthew speaks of the devil and his angels (25:41), these verses may have some bearing on the origin of both. The only alternative to strict dualism is the acceptance of Satan as a created being.

Satan is considered the greatest enemy of God and Christ, whose power includes control of the kingdoms of the world (Matt. 4:9; I John 5:19) and death itself (Heb. 2:14). Christ's earthly ministry was viewed as a period of binding the strong man so that he might spoil his goods (Matt. 12:29). The resurrection of Jesus Christ was thus an evident conquest of Satan's ultimate power over death (Heb. 2:14), guaranteeing that both Death and Hades will finally be cast into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14).

SATI. This word, meaning in Sanskrit "virtuous woman" or "chaste wife," has two distinct but related denotations. First, Sati is a HINDU goddess, daughter of the sage Daksha. She desired to marry the god SHIVA despite the opposition of her father, who despised Shiva's unkempt appearance and mad behavior. Though uninvited, Shiva appeared at the ceremony in which Sati was to choose her spouse, and the two were united. But when Daksha then failed to invite Shiva to a great sacrifice, Sati in her mortification committed suicide in the sacrificial fire. Shiva wandered the world in sorrow, bearing the corpse of his wife, until to end his mourning the other gods cut the body into many pieces; the place where each piece fell to earth is considered sacred to Sati, and many temples thus attribute their location. Sati is reported to have been reborn as Parvati, Shiva's great consort-goddess.

Second, sati, in this usage often written "suttee," refers to the customary suicide of a Hindu widow at the death of her husband, most commonly by immolation on his funeral pyre. Never universal, though encouraged by the hard lot that often fell to widows, the practice was abolished in British India in 1829.

SATISFACTION. See ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF.

SATORI. A Japanese word used in ZEN to indicate enlightenment, meaning literally "surprise." In Zen, satori is the supreme attainment, a complete inexpressible experience of freedom from the fetters of conditioned reality. It is an inward, intuitive realization that cannot be articulated in the language of ordinary rational discourse, but can be demonstrated by an utter joy and spontaneity of being. It is identified with the enlightenment of the Buddha under the bodhi tree.

Satori experiences may be realized repeatedly, both as "little" and "great" satoris. Generally they are attained after a period of intensive Zen practice, often stimulated by a gesture or even slap from a Zen master. The Soto tradition of Zen emphasizes the realization of satori during quiet sitting (zazen), while the Rinzai school employs the more concentrated methods of koan work, harsh interviews, and grueling retreats to bring about the abrupt spontaneous "surprise" of awakening. R.E.

SATYA SAI BABA. (1926– ). Satya Sai Baba is among the most famous of contemporary holy men in HINDUISM. While his personality is dynamic and his preaching simple but effective, it is undeniably the almost endless stories of miracles done by him, from healings to materializations of gems, that has attracted the most attention, laying the foundation of a large religious movement. Many of his followers consider him an avatar. R.E.

SAUL (meaning asked [of God], or lent [to God]). Son of Kish and first king of Israel (about 1020–1000 B.C.).

Historical Context. On Saul fell the uneasy task of governing a people undergoing social transition as they left their loosely organized tribal existence behind and advanced toward statehood. Though some regarded the emergence of monarchy as an affront to Yahweh, who alone was Israel's king, others embraced monarchy as a historical necessity. The Philistine defeat of Yahweh's people at Aphek not long after 1050 B.C. (I Sam. 4:1-11) induced more politically minded Israelites to conclude that Canaan might become a Philistine empire within months. With its army in shambles, the central sanctuary at Shiloh upended, and priestly leadership rendered inadequate, the Israelite confederacy faced grim prospects. Continuing Israelite presence in the Land of Promise required stronger leadership. The Israelite monarchy was thus spawned, and a Benjaminite named Saul was ushered into the regal office.

Saul's Regal Election. Since the Chronicler's portrayal of Saul is limited to his battlefield death at the hand of triumphant Philistines (I Chr. 10), we must consult I Samuel to glean information about Saul's regal election and accomplishments. Two variant traditions reporting Saul's choice as king are preserved. The earlier one (I Sam. 9:1–10:16) tells of Kish's lost asses, which "handsome" Saul and a servant were sent to recover. After a lengthy, fruitless search, they decided to consult a seer in a nearby town (presumably Ramah, 7:17; 9:5,6). As they entered, they were met by SAMUEL, a prominent man of God, who informed them that Kish's asses had been recovered and urged their attendance at a cultic sacrifice where the choice portion had been reserved for Saul. Samuel privately anointed Saul to be "prince" over Israel (10:1a) and, in a lengthy speech, defined his new function as a charismatic leader capable of delivering Israel from its enemies (10:1b-8).

Integrated with this account is the originally separate story of Saul's courageous rescue of the Transjordan city of Jabesh-gilead from Ammonite aggression (I Sam. 11). Threatened by the ultimatum of Nahash the Ammonite, the beleaguered city sent an embassy to Gibeah to solicit help. Just then Saul appeared. Upon hearing the news, "the spirit of God came mightily upon Saul" (11:6). Dramatically he mustered numerous volunteers and conquered the Ammonite enemy. After securing Israel's striking triumph, Saul was publicly acclaimed by the people as king "before the Lord in Gilgal" (11:15).

A later tradition similarly tells of Saul's regal election, but exhibits anti-monarchical overtones (I Sam. 8:1-22; 10:17-27; 12:1-25). Here Samuel is no seer, but a judge who is offended when the people demand, "Appoint for us a king to govern us like all the nations" (8:5). Perceiving that it is Yahweh's will that he both honor their request and warn them of the odious ways of sovereigns, Samuel assembled the people at Mizpah, where Saul is chosen by divinely controlled lot (10:20-21). Taken together, these two traditions aptly reflect Israel's ambivalent attitude toward monarchy. In choosing a king, Israel strode boldly in a new direction that broke with venerable Yahwistic tradition. But how else might the Philistine challenge be met? In light of such ambivalence, Saul's regal career was destined to be troublesome.

Narrative Bias. Unlike DAVID, Saul does not enjoy a predominantly favorable biblical portrait. We would do well to recognize Saul's negative "press" before dealing further with his achievements and problems. That Saul's name is not listed among those Israelite heroes celebrated in Ecclesiasticus 44:1–50:24 and Hebrews 11:1-40 is itself indicative of the way he is treated within the detailed Saul traditions preserved in I Samuel 9–31. Samuel largely dominates chapters 9–15 and David chapters 16–31.

Hostility toward Saul is not merely a mark of the Deuteronomic historian who gave I-II Samuel its present shape. Rather, it is indigenous to the traditions he used. In early monarchical Israel, two main factors contributed to a prejudicial attitude toward Saul. First, Samuel and his hawkish support group, the sons of the prophets, kept alive the holy war mentality of premonarchical Israel. Thus they opposed Saul's modern, pragmatic approach, which compromised Israel into becoming like the other nations. Second, at Saul's expense, the Samuel narrative is rife with pro-Davidic sentiment. By setting Saul in an unfavorable light, it intensifies the prestige of David and his Jerusalem-based dynasty. Indeed, the tradition seems more resolute in reporting Saul's emotional imbalance than it is in describing those extremely trying conditions that would have frustrated any able Israelite who might have ruled as Israel's first monarch. With this in mind, let us consider Saul's tragic alienation from Samuel and David.

Alienation from Samuel. While the relationship involving Saul, the statesman, and SAMUEL, the prophet, began auspiciously, in time it suffered grave rupture. Saul never forgot that it was Samuel who had conferred him with regal status. Samuel never forgot that the new order that Saul represented merited scrutiny. Their personal rift began as Saul prepared to fight the Philistines at Michmash (I Sam. 13). As holy war required, Saul waited at Gilgal for Samuel, who was expected to offer Yahweh the appropriate sacrifice. With the volunteer army scattering and Samuel's failure to arrive at the appointed time, Saul made the sacrifice himself. At once Samuel did arrive, and with the thundering words, "Your kingdom shall not continue" (13:14), he condemned the monarch. By offering sacrifice in Samuel's absence, Saul had usurped the authority of the old guard militant prophetism that Samuel embodied.

The rupture became permanent when Saul ignored the requirements of holy war during his battle, at Samuel's instigation, against the Amalekites (I Sam. 15). By sparing the king Agag and taking the best of the Amalekite spoils, Saul presumptuously decided to rewrite the rules of Israelite warfare. Saul reasoned expediently: Why should his troops not be allowed to benefit from the spoils of war? Samuel reasoned theologically: Was Saul's insubordination to Yahweh's will not unpardonable? After announcing that Yahweh had rejected Saul in favor of a better person (15:28), Samuel strode off, never to see Saul again. Finally, just prior to Saul's combat with the Philistines at Mount Gilboa, he conversed with Samuel's ghost, which the medium at Endor summoned (28:8-25). The distraught king heard a chilling prediction about Philistine triumph and his own death. Prophetic support for Saul had long vanished.

Alienation from David. However David entered Saul's service, be it through his musical talent (I Sam. 16:15-23) or slaying of Goliath (17:31-58), he quickly rose to prominence. Soon he was promoted to army lieutenant (18:5). Enormously jealous of David's popularity, Saul resolved to exterminate him. Saul's attempts at spearing David against the wall failed (18:9-11; 19:9-10), as did his stratagem to demand from David an outlandish marriage present for his daughter Michal that should have made him easy Philistine prey (18:20-27). Unable to persuade Jonathan to kill David (19:1-7), he dispatched servants to David's sleeping quarters only to learn that David had escaped through Michal's assistance (19:11-17). Saul shamelessly ordered the massacre of the priests of Nob because they unwittingly helped David (22:11-19). Rumors of David's whereabouts sometimes reached Saul too late to be useful (23:7-13, 19-25). Twice Saul might have died at David's hand had it not been for the latter's fear of slaying Yahweh's anointed (24:5-7; 26:6-12). Indeed, Saul even confessed his wrong in seeking David's life (26:21).

Throughout, Saul assumed that David coveted the throne for himself (18:8). So suspicious was Saul of conspiracy that he questioned the loyalty of his closest supporters (22:6-8). Saul's obsession with tracking down David cost him dearly, for meanwhile, the Philistines were free to reorganize against Israel.

Saul's Statescraft. Like the judges preceding him, Saul became a prominent Israelite leader because he displayed charismatic endowment. This was notably the case in his triumph over Ammon (I Sam. 11). Saul's military victories were many (14:47-48). Speedily limiting Philistine advances into Israel's central highlands, Saul enhanced his own ability to move in a north-south direction within the land (chaps. 13-14). Thus he was able to penetrate deeply into Judah and oust meddling Amalekites (chap. 15). Required to devote much of his attention to warfare, Saul drafted recruits into a small standing professional army that Abner commanded (14:50, 52b). Moreover, the inclusion of foreign mercenaries in Saul's militia can be inferred from mention of "Doeg the Edomite" (22:9, 18).

Saul also seems to have been aggressive in setting economic policy. The spoils of war were to be kept alive (15:9), and, paying some homage to feudalism, Saul exercised the right to allocate property to his retainers (22:7). Of course, Saul made no attempt to subvert tribal loyalties, establish an intricate bureaucracy, or spend lavishly on an ambitious building program at Gibeah. Excavations there have shown Saul's fortress to be quite unpretentious.

Saul was well endowed with personal initiative, courage, and piety. The prophetic opposition he incurred troubled him greatly. He was a competent monarch who faced awesome challenges as Israel became a political state. Though his personal life was plagued by emotional instability and his public life by strained relations with the religious establishment, Saul's numerous contributions toward the welfare of his people are worthy of remembrance.

Saul is also the original name of the apostle Paul (Acts 7:58; 13:9). J.K.K.

SAVIOR. Both in biblical religion and in the worship of those peoples whose lives had an impact on Jews and Christians, God or the gods (or their earthly agents) were hailed as savior figures. The basic meaning was deliverance or SALVATION from evil, whether physical or moral.

In OT times God is known as the people's rescuer from all manner of troubles, notably invasion, disease, and death. God often worked through human instruments, according to Judges, which chronicles the rise and exploits of leaders such as Deborah, Gideon, Samson (see Judg. 3:9, 15; compare II Kings 13:5; Neh. 9:27; Obad. 21).

In Greco-Roman religion, the cult divinities were invoked as saviors, a title common to Isis, Serapis, and especially Asclepius, the god of bodily healing. Mighty leaders and rulers were similarly regarded as saviors of their people, for example, Ptolemy I. In the Roman principate the title expanded, and later in Hellenistic society the appellation was given to emperors from Nero onward as a mark of veneration, and later, under Domitian, of worship.

The Revelation of John and I John, set in the time period of the last named, were thus engaged in polemic against these claims, as Jesus Christ, the Christian savior, was accorded titles of "King of kings" (Rev. 19:16) and "Savior of the world" (I John 4:14).

But the title "savior" is found earlier, belonging especially to the Luke-Acts sections of the NT (Luke 2:11; Acts 5:31), and in the Pastorals the term is used of Christ and God ten times. Paul's usage is descriptive (Phil. 3:20; compare Eph. 5:23), that is, denoting Christ the Lord as deliverer or preserver.

SAVITRI. The heroine of a story in HINDUISM recounted in the MAHABHARATA, Savitri is often held up as a model of ideal wifely devotion. A princess of unequalled beauty, Savitri looked long for an acceptable husband before marrying the forest-dwelling son of a deposed king. This prince was fated to have but one more year to live, however. When he died and YAMA, ruler of the dead, claimed his soul, Savitri diligently followed him. Yama, impressed by her faithfulness, granted her several boons, including a hundred children. When Savitri pointed out that this last gift could not be realized without a husband, Yama relented and restored her mate to life.

SAVONAROLA, GIROLAMO (1452-98). Born September 21, in Ferrara, Italy, the fiery preacher and reformer became a Dominican novice at Bologna in 1475. In 1482 he became a lecturer at the convent of San Marco in Florence, where he was to spend the rest of his life. In 1491 he was made prior.

His denunciation of the corruption of the Medicis and the immorality of his fellow clergy evoked controversy. When the Medicis fell from power in 1494, Savonarola became the leader of Florence and set up a theocracy, burning books, fancy clothes, and other signs of luxury and immorality. Pope Alexander V tried to curb his power by summoning him to Rome on July 21, 1495; forbidding him to preach on October 16, 1495; and even trying to bribe him with a cardinal's hat. When Savonarola ignored these attempts, the pope excommunicated him in May 1497. When the pope put the city under interdict, the people turned on Savonarola. Denounced as a schismatic and heretic, he was tortured, hanged, his body burned, and his ashes thrown in the river. He died on May 23.

Its full name is A Declaration of the Faith and Order Owned and Practiced in the Congregational Churches in England. The Declaration consists of three parts: a preface, a confession of faith based on the 1646 WESTMINSTER CONFSSION, and a platform of discipline affirming the autonomy of local congregations. It was drawn up by representatives of 120 churches and was a compilation of what Congregationalists commonly believed, but they did not consider it a binding statement of doctrine.

SAYYID. A term in Islam that refers to a person with authority. At the popular level, it may be used to refer to any holy person, such as a Sufi. More precisely, it refers to the descendants of MUHAMMAD through FATIMA, beginning with al-Hasan and al-Husayn, and to Muhammad's close relatives, including Ali. Sunni sayyids wear green turbans to mark their status. Shi'ite sayyids wear black turbans. They are forbidden to receive alms but are eligible for part of a special tax called al-khums ("the fifth"). Shi'ite piety encourages devotion to and blessings on the sayyids.

SCAPEGOAT. The goat used in Judaism's solemn DAY OF ATONEMENT ritual (Lev. 16) to bear the people's sins before being dispatched into "the wilderness to Azazel" (v. 10). This annual expiation involved two male goats. By the casting of lots, one goat was chosen for Yahweh, and one "for Azazel" (v. 8).

The goat destined for Yahweh was immediately sacrificed as a sin offering (v. 15). Still alive, the other goat was set "before Yahweh." Placing his hands on the goat's head, the high priest transferred all of Israel's iniquities to it (v. 21). An attendant led this sin-laden "scapegoat" into the desert. He was readmitted into the community after he had cleansed his body and clothing of impurity acquired from contact with the beast (v. 26).

The personal parallelism in verse 8, "for the Lord . . . for Azazel," invites the conjecture that the name Azazel belongs to a remote desert demon and not to the goat. In its impurity, the goat could be sacrificed neither to Yahweh nor to Azazel. Sinfulness was expiated by virtue of the goat's introduction into Yahweh's powerful presence (v. 10).

SCHAEFFER, FRANCIS A., IV (1912-84). Evangelical theologian, apologist, author, and crusader. Born in Philadelphia, Francis Schaeffer was preparing for the Christian ministry at Princeton Theological Seminary when he became involved in the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy.

As a young minister, Schaeffer served congregations in St. Louis, Chester, and Grove City, Pennsylvania. Then he and his wife, Edith, moved to Europe in 1949. Their original goal was to be involved in children's work. However, because their ministry was prospering in the Roman Catholic canton of Valais, the Schaeffers were asked to leave.

They moved to the tiny hamlet of Huemoz in the Protestant canton of Vaux. There in a chalet they started the L'Abri Fellowship. In 1955 they began to minister to young people of a lost generation who were seeking answers to their personal problems.

Schaeffer conducted a series of lectures dealing with the relevancy of Christian faith in a hostile culture. These lectures became the basis of twenty-three books Schaeffer later authored. They reached tens of thousands—a far wider audience than he had assembled face to face at L'Abri. One of the first books was The God Who Is There, followed by Escape from Reason.

In 1979 Schaeffer, though suffering from cancer, conducted a lengthy tour of the country accompanied by Dr. C. Everett Koop, a noted pediatric surgeon, later to be named United States Surgeon General. They had written Whatever Happened to the Human Race?—a book that declared that secular humanism had replaced the laws of God as the basis of contemporary ethics. They also presented their views against abortion and euthanasia in a film that had been produced by Schaeffer's son, Franky. In December, 1983, there was a flare-up of the cancerous condition that sent Schaeffer to the hospital in Rochester, Minnesota, where he died on May 15.

SCHAFF, PHILIP (1819–93). Swiss-born church historian and Mercersburg theologian. In 1837 he began studies at the universities of Tübingen, Halle, and Berlin, where he studied with Johann A. W. Neander. He received the licentiate in theology in 1841. In 1843 he was invited to the Reformed Church's Mercersburg Seminary (Pennsylvania), where his 1845 inaugural address, published as The Principle of Protestantism, shocked listeners by viewing the Reformation as a flowering of the best in medieval Catholicism.

During nineteen years at Mercersburg he mediated between German and American scholarship in such monumental works as What Is Church History? (1846), Apostolic Christianity (1851), America (1854), three books on the church to 1073, volumes on the German and Swiss Reformations, and Creeks of Christendom (3 vols., 1877). He edited the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (28 volumes, 1886–1905), The Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (3 vols., 1882–84), and the American Church History series (13 vols., 1893–97) for the American Society of Church History, which he helped found. He later taught at Andover and Union seminaries. He strongly supported the Evangelical Alliance and the Alliance of the Reformed Churches.

SCHELLING, FRIEDRICH W. J. VON (1775–1854). German idealist philosopher who wrote extensively on religion. He was the son of a Lutheran pastor and destined for the ministry. At the theological seminary at Tübingen he became friends with the philosopher GEORGE HEGEL and the romantic poet Hölderlin. By the age of twenty-three he was professor at Jena, the center of German ROMANTICISM. There he was colleague and friend of JOHANN FICHTE. The two thinkers' subjective IDEALISM, emphasizing the aspiring, unconditioned ego, epitomized German Romanticism. Schelling later taught at Würzburg, Erlangen, Munich, and Berlin. His philosophy has been divided into four rather distinct phases. The first period was dominated by Fichte. The second stage, the philosophy of nature, sought to move beyond the subjective ego to the objective reality of nature. This period produced Transcendental Idealism (1800), his most systematic statement. In his third period Schelling developed a pantheistic philosophy of identity. Here BENEDICT SPINOZA and the Protestant mystic Jacob Boehme are influential.

Schelling sees evil as a necessary stage in the becoming of good, as well as a dark or negative principle in God, which exists to be overcome. After 1809 Schelling entered his last philosophical stage, during which he wrote extensively on religion, mythology, and revelation. These last writings introduce themes—the mystery of existence, anxiety, resistance—which resemble EXISTENTIALISM. The theologian PAUL TILLICH was greatly influenced by the later views of Schelling.

SCHILLEBEECKX, EDWARD. One of the most influential Roman Catholic theologians of the second half of the twentieth century. Born in Antwerp, Belgium in 1914, he studied at the Dominican houses at Ghent and Louvain and was ordained in 1941. Schillebeeckx continued his studies in Paris in 1945 at the Dominican Theological Faculty of LeSaulchair and at the Sorbonne, completing his doctoral dissertation on sacramental theology in 1951. He taught at the Dominican House of Studies at Louvain from 1943 to 1957. Since 1958 he has served as professor of dogmatic theology at the University of Nijmegen in the Netherlands. Schillebeeckx was a major contributor to the controversial Dutch Catechism; an adviser to the Dutch bishops and to Bernard Cardinal Alfrink; and peritus, or theological adviser, to the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). His influence is detected in several of the Council documents.

One of Schillebeeckx's earliest works, Mary, Mother of the Redemption (1955), reflects a somewhat conservative Marian piety. His most important early works, however, were in the field of sacramental theology. In Christ, the Sacrament of the Encounter with God (Eng. trans., 1963) and The Eucharist (Eng. trans., 1968), Schillebeeckx sought to enlarge upon the post-Reformation Roman emphasis on TRANSUBSTANTIATION. While not rejecting the doctrine, Schillebeeckx amplifies it in terms of what he calls "transsignification." The objectivity of Christ's Real Presence in the sacrament is affirmed, but emphasis also is placed on the response of the personal belief of the faithful.

Edward Schillebeeckx

Since 1964 Schillebeeckx has written a series of books—Revelation and Theology (1967); God, the Future of Man (1968); God and Man (1969); and World and Church (1971)—which reflect his concern for Christianity's witness to the human existential situation, the implications of secularization for Christian belief today, and the responsibilities of the church to the world.

In 1974 Schillebeeckx published Jesus, the Story of a Life (Eng. trans., Jesus—An Experiment in Christology, 1979), a best-seller. The Roman authorities found the book ambiguous on several christological doctrines, and summoned Schillebeeckx to Rome in 1979 to clarify his views. His most recent study in Christology is Christ, the Experience of Jesus as Lord (Eng. trans., 1980). J.L.

SCHISM. From the Greek verb schizein meaning "split" or "cut." A schism is a break in the unity of the church. In NT references such as I Corinthians 1:10 and 11:18, the word refers to division or factionalism within one church or the breaking away of members of one church to establish rival churches. Originally it described divisions caused by nonessentials. Thus schismatic groups are not necessarily guilty of HERESY, though that distinction becomes less and less clear in Christian history.

The Schism of 1054 refers to the division of Eastern Orthodoxy and the Western, Roman church. In that year pope and patriarch excommunicated each other. The Western Schism of 1378 to 1417 refers to a period in which there were two or sometimes three rival popes. The Protestant Reformation is the major schism in the Western church. According to Roman Catholic canon law, any baptized Christian who does not submit to papal authority is schismatic.

SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH D. E. (1768–1834). Generally considered the father of modern liberal theology and the dominant Protestant theologian between JOHN CALVIN and KARL BARTH. He was nurtured in the fervent piety of the German MORAVIANS, an experience that remained lasting. At the University of Halle he read deeply in PLATO, KANT, and SPINOZA. He moved to Berlin in 1796, where his imaginative powers were kindled through his association with the literary leaders of German ROMANTICISM. This led to his first book, On Religion: Speeches Addressed to Its Cultured Despisers (1799). Next came The Soliloquies (1800), representing Schleiermacher's most characteristic expression of Romantic spiritual aspiration. In 1804 Schleiermacher became professor of theology at Halle, but in 1809 he returned to Berlin as preacher at Holy Trinity Church. In 1811 he acceded to the chair of theology at the University of Berlin. The crowning achievement of these years was his masterpiece, The Christian Faith (1821–22; 1830). His literary remains comprise over thirty volumes of books, lectures, sermons, and letters.

Schleiermacher's contribution to modern theology is best seen in his two greatest works, On Religion and The Christian Faith. On Religion proposed that what the cultured despised wasn't the essence of religion at all. Religion is neither metaphysics (HEGEL) nor morals (Kant). It "cannot be an instinct craving for a mess of metaphysical and ethical crumbs." Religion is essentially a unique form of feeling, "the immediate consciousness of the universal existence of all finite things, in and through the Infinite, and of all temporal things in and through the Eternal." Later Schleiermacher was to define this feeling as "the consciousness of absolute dependence" on God. True religion of feeling cannot be taught by acquiring knowledge. In fact, our religious concepts may be crude and erroneous, but it is "the manner in which the Deity is present to a man in feeling that is decisive."

The Christian Faith draws out the implications of this experiential view of religion for a science of theology. Christian doctrine is the formulation in language of the prior Christian feelings. For Schleiermacher, theology presupposes the experience of the Christian community and is meant for the church. It is, therefore, confessional, not apologetic. Since all Christian doctrines are determined by reference to the consciousness of redemption accomplished by Jesus Christ, the Christian's God-consciousness always comes to realization in the experience of sin and redemption through the person of Christ, who is integral to the Christian experience of absolute dependence. According to Schleiermacher, sin is an arrestment of our God-consciousness, made known through Christ by means of the self-communication to us of his unique God-consciousness. Christ is both—the perfect spiritual Exemplar and Redeemer. The church is the community formed by the mind of Christ, whose vocation it is to mediate his unique God-consciousness to others.

Since Schleiermacher, liberal theology finds its authority in experience. Barth and EMIL BRUNNER considered this modern theology's great "false start," since theology appears imprisoned in human self-consciousness and subjectivity. However, recently theology has returned to and vindicated Schleiermacher's experiential method. J.L.

SCHMALKALD ARTICLES. A confession of faith written by Martin Luther in 1536. Pope Paul III had issued a call for a general council of the church to deal with the Reformers. John Frederick I, Elector of Saxony, asked Luther to review several previous statements of faith and to state the essential issues with a view toward negotiation.

Luther wrote out a statement and conferred with his friends. Eight fellow theologians signed the statement and presented it to the elector in January 1537. It was divided into three sections: (1) on the nature of God, divine unity, the Trinity, Christ, the Incarnation, matters in which the Reformers agreed with the church; (2) on Christ and justification by faith, noting how the Reformers differed from the church on this and such issues as the Mass, monasticism, and the papacy; and (3) fifteen articles for discussion on sin, law, sacraments, confession, the ministry, and the definition of the church.

In February 1537 members of the Schmalkaldic League (Protestant secular heads of state) met with theologians at Schmalkalden to discuss the statement and talk about responses to the pope's request. Luther was ill and did not attend. Philipp Melancthon preferred the AUGSBURG CONFESSION and its Apology, so the group adopted that as their standard.

The Schmalkald Articles, as Luther's statement came to be called, were circulated, however, and signed by forty-four theologians who said the articles represented their views. They were included in the 1580 Book of Concord and remain a historic document of Lutheranism. N.H.

SCHOLASTICISM. The name "scholasticism" meant originally the teaching of the schools, and is applied to the intellectual movement, both philosophical and theological, which dominated Europe from about the seventh century until the emergence of modern philosophy in the sixteenth century, and which has continued to be esteemed especially in the Roman Catholic Church even into the twentieth century. Because of its long persistence, it has been called the philosophia perennis, the "perennial philosophy."

Leading Characteristics. In Scholasticism, it is difficult to know where philosophy ends and theology begins. This is because of the conviction of most of the Scholastics that faith and reason belong together and that reason will not contradict faith, even if it cannot attain unaided to the truths of faith. In this regard, Scholasticism differs sharply from post-Kantian philosophy, in which faith and reason are kept apart. Since the Scholastics drew both on the revealed truths of the Christian religion and on the resources of classical philosophy, they considered theology to be a science and used logic and reason in their theological constructions.

The types of work that they produced included (1) Commentaries: these had their origin in the practice of reading texts, which were glossed and expounded by the teacher, and these expositions developed into major commentaries. A special case was the "sentences," in which propositions from the Scriptures were arranged and commented upon not in chronological order but in logical order, a step toward the systematic theologies and dogmatics of later times. (2) Questions and disputations. Problems were set up and then answers and objections to the answers were considered in a dialectical fashion. The pattern followed is clearly seen in the writings of Thomas Aquinas. First, the question is put, introduced by the Latin word utrum, "whether," for example, "whether God exists." Then there is given a provisional answer, introduced by the words videur quod, "it seems that. . . ." Next, objections are raised to the alleged answer, introduced by sed contra, "but, on the other hand. . . ." Finally, the teacher gives his respondeo, "I reply," in which he comes down on one side or the other. The arguments for and against are usually appeals to Scripture or to the writings of Christian authors, so that there is a subtle mingling of argumentation and authority. Still, the student does not just accept matters without further thought, but is compelled to face objections and to follow the course of the reasoning. (3) Finally, the summas were comprehensive treatments of wide areas of questions in philosophy and theology, conducted on the same dialectical principles.

History of Scholasticism. The roots of Scholasticism are usually traced back to Augustine and Boethius, though the period up to the eleventh century is often called "pre-Scholasticism." At this stage, the dominant philosophical influence was that of Plato and Neoplatonism. In the second half of the eleventh century there was a great surge of Scholastic thought. In those days the monasteries were still the major centers of learning, and one of the greatest was the monastery of Bec in Normandy. It was there that ANSELM (1033–1109) taught, before he became archbishop of Canterbury. He is often called the "father of Scholasticism." His watchword was Credo ut intelligam, "I believe in order to understand," and with him the rationalistic character of Scholasticism reached a high level. In a series of writings, he tried to prove the existence of God from reason alone, and then went on to demonstrate the rational necessity of atonement. Karl Barth, however, has argued that even for Anselm, faith remained primary, and reason simply expounds and systematizes the truths of faith. PETER ABELARD (1079–1142) showed the typical interest in dialectics in his Sic et non (Yes and No), in which he sets side by side contradictory judgments of the Christian fathers and then seeks to reconcile them. He also wrote an important treatise on ethics. Meanwhile the works of Aristotle were being rediscovered, and he became a more important influence than Plato.

Scholasticism reached its highest point with the work of THOMAS AQUINAS (1225–74). His Summa Theologica, written in the last years of his life and still unfinished when he died, is still the greatest single work on Christian theology ever written. Yet it was only a part of Thomas's colossal output. Scarcely less impressive is his Summa contra Gentiles, a Christian apologetic written in answer to the criticisms of Jewish and Muslim writers. It has been said of his major commentary on Aristotle's Metaphysics that even if it had been the only work to survive, it would still have entitled Thomas to a place among the world's great philosophers.

But after Thomas a decline set in. The once fruitful and exciting ways of investigation and argument became increasingly formal and stereotyped. We have reached "Scholasticism" in the bad sense in which the word is often employed, a formal system in which artificial questions are answered by unreal, hair-splitting distinctions. The underlying reason for this decline was a loss of confidence in reason itself, contrasting sharply with what we have seen in Anselm and Aquinas. Duns Scotus (1266–1308) and WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (1285–1347) brought flashes of brilliance to this scene of decay, but the former limited the role of reason in theology while the latter denied that any theological truths at all are rationally demonstrable. Scholasticism was eclipsed by the rise of modern philosophy after Descartes. It still produced an occasional thinker of importance, such as Francisco Suarez (1548–1617), but it was not till the end of the nineteenth century that it was revived by Pope Leo XIII. Cardinal Mercier of Belgium took a leading part in the revival, publishing A Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy (1916), and in the next generation JACQUES MARITAIN and ETIENNE GILSON were brilliant representatives of a reinvigorated neo-Scholasticism. J.M.

SCHOOLMASTER. The Greek word paidagōgos is rendered thus in Galatians 3:25, KJV (RSV has "custodian") and translates as "guide" in I Corinthians 4:15. In both instances the background is that of Greco-Roman educational systems, which entrusted the elementary training of children to a slave who acted as tutor and disciplinarian. R.M.

SCHOOLMEN. See SCHOLASTICISM.

SCHOPENHAUER, ARTHUR (1788–1860). German philosopher, advocate of a metaphysical and moral pessimism, and one of the important anti-Christian philosophers of the nineteenth century. Schopenhauer studied at Göttingen and Berlin and received a doctorate from Jena in 1819. Scornful of academics, he remained a private scholar. His masterpiece is World as Will and Idea (1819).

Schopenhauer was profoundly influenced by IMMANUEL KANT and held that the perceived world is phenomenal appearance, not what is metaphysically ultimate, which he calls Will. Here he departs from Kant and reveals the influence of Oriental and especially Indian philosophy. The world of objects is appearance, or maya, but what lies behind all maya, independent of our perception, is an energy or blind impulse called Will. It is endless striving, or the will to live, which characterizes all life. Knowing no cessation, the will can find no satisfaction or state of peace. Each being strives to assert its own will at the expense of others, hence avarice, cruelty, and war. Humanity creates its own hell. An escape from the futility of desire and striving can be achieved temporarily only through a disinterested contemplation of the beautiful and the sublime. A more lasting release can come, however, through radical renunciation of the will. Here Schopenhauer appeals to the Buddhist ideals of self-denial, mortification, and sympathy for all beings. For him death is simply extinction, and belief in God is infantile desire. Schopenhauer greatly influenced the composer Richard Wagner and the early philosophy of FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE. He was also successful in stimulating German interest in Oriental philosophy. J.L.

SCHWEITZER, ALBERT (1875–1965). Alsatian theologian, philosopher, musician, and medical missionary. From peasant stock, Schweitzer was born on January 14 in Kayersberg, Alsace, at that time a part of the German Empire. He spent his boyhood in Gunsbach, attended the gymnasium at Mulhausen, and received three degrees from the University of Strassburg; a doctorate in philosophy (1899), a licentiate in theology (1900), and a doctorate in medicine (1913). He also received an honorary doctorate in music. Later he studied at the universities of Paris and Berlin.

In 1899 Schweitzer became the pastor of a church in Strassburg, and in 1903 he was appointed head of the Theological College at Strassburg. His first book was J. S. Bach (1905; Eng. trans. 1911), of whom Schweitzer became an acknowledged authority and a brilliant interpreter at the organ.

In quite another field Schweitzer received international attention by writing the controversial The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906). Earlier (1901) he had written The Mystery of the Kingdom of God. In this work Schweitzer argued that Christ's teaching centered on his conviction of the imminent end of the world. His more widely known Quest held that Christ believed that the world would soon end, and when this proved a mistake, concluded that he must suffer in order to save his people from the tribulations preceding the last days. In 1911, in Paul and His Interpreters, Schweitzer applied the same theological principles in seeking to interpret Pauline teaching.

At the height of his career as a musician and theologian, Schweitzer decided he must give himself to the service of others. After seven years of preparation, he became a medical missionary to Africa. In 1913 he established a hospital at Lambaréné on the Ogowe River in the Gabon Colony of French Equatorial Africa. There he labored for forty years, except for a ten-year interval when as a German subject he was interned in French prison camps during World War II.

The hospital that Schweitzer built mostly with his own hands was supported from the proceeds of organ recitals he gave in Europe, his lecture tours, and book royalties. During his stay in Africa he developed the principle of "reverence for life."

In 1952 Schweitzer was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize, and received the British Order of Merit in 1955. He died on September 4 at Lambaréné.

SCHWENKFELD, KASPAR (1489–1561). ANA-BAPTIST theologian, writer, and preacher born in Ossig, Lower Silesia. He studied at the universities of Cologne and Frankfurt, and served as a counselor to various courts from 1511 to 1523. In 1518 he experienced a spiritual awakening. Schwenkfeld helped to introduce his form of Lutheran reform, which was called Reformation by the Middle Way, into Silesia in 1522. In 1525 he visited Luther and found they disagreed on the Eucharist. When he published anti-Catholic, anti-Lutheran views on the subject, he was dismissed by the Duke of Liegnitz.

In 1529 he went to Strassburg to confer with Sebastian Franck, Michael Servetus, Ulrich Zwingli, and others. At a synod there in 1533 he defended his views against Martin Bucer. Bucer won. Schwenkfeld went to Ulm, until the Lutherans ran him out in 1539. When he published his Great Confession in 1540, the Schmalkaldic League issued an anathema against him, and he became a religious fugitive. He died December 10, in Ulm. Societies he established survive as Pietist sects. The denomination has its headquarters in Pennsburg, Pennsylvania. N.H.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION. If, as many Christian thinkers have declared, both revealed religion and science deal ultimately with truth, only harmony should exist between them. Such a view is predicated on the idea that a sovereign God is the author of all truth. Data accumulated through empirical research have provided humankind with vast stores of verifiable knowledge, and the results of such research have been an ongoing boon to civilization in countless areas.

Some would argue that modern science owes much to Christianity and its Jewish antecedent for the idea of a rational universe. Carl F. H. Henry has said: "From the Christian religion western science derived its conviction of a comprehensively rational universe that everywhere bears evidence of one ultimate principle of the explanation" (study note, Holy Bible, RSV, A. J. Holman Co., 1962). Reformed theologians attribute the human propensity to gain understanding of and mastery over certain aspects of the physical world as an integral part of what is called the creation mandate. This stems from the divine instruction to humankind to subdue the earth (Gen. 1:28). It gives those working in scientific research with resultant discoveries an almost limitless work area. "The success of modern science in interpreting and shaping the world we live in stands unrivaled in the history of human achievements," declares Dr. William H. Werkmeister, professor of philosophy at the University of Florida (Scientific Method, Collier's Encyclopedia, Vol. 20, Macmillan Educational Corp., 1974).

Science as we know it today is one of the products of the Renaissance, spurred on by the Protestant Reformation. By the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the scientific method had evolved. Once begun, knowledge of both the animate and inanimate world burgeoned in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. In the twentieth century knowledge exploded in every area of learning, aided by the dazzling developments in computer science.

Science has advanced various aspects of Christian faith in such areas as archaeology, anthropology, modern linguistics, and communication techniques—including everything from the printing press to telephones, radio, and television. Yet the development of scientism—the exaggerated trust in the efficacy of the methods of natural science to explain all the pressing problems of humanity—inevitably has brought science and religion into collision.

There are several areas of conflict that still remain unresolved for many people. Probably the most publicized has been the rival explanations for the origin of human beings. The argument was started when CHARLES DARWIN'S The Origin of Species was published in 1859. This brilliant English scientist was the first to present the concept of organic EVOLUTION, the theory that existing plants and animals developed by a process of gradual, continuous change from previously existing forms. The idea developed popularly, however, that humankind had descended from monkeys. Many religionists immediately declared that this intrusion of science conflicted with the biblical doctrine of CREATION. Today the general concept of some form of evolution has been accepted, rightly or wrongly, by a good share of Christendom. But a vanguard of Christians, particularly in the United States, has waged unceasing warfare against the teaching of evolution in the schools. There are various levels of opposition, but the most vocal in recent years have been the proponents of "scientific creationism." They contend that there is as much scientific evidence to support the biblical account of creation as there is of evolution. Therefore they urge that both explanations be given in biology classes.

There are similar, but less emotional, battles over the relative merits of the biblical versus the several scientific theories of the origin of the universe. Currently in the scientific realm there are two theories vying for universal acceptance—the "big bang" and the "steady state" concepts.

The discovery of nuclear fission, employed as a domestic power source as well as for military weapons that threaten the existence of civilization, has revealed the moral limitations of science. Many critics of modern culture have felt that scientific advance has generated moral paralysis. Sometimes the scientists who recognize the perilous situation caused by the nuclear arms race warn of imminent doom more eloquently than churchmen. The threat of nuclear extinction has brought protests from a wide range of the world's inhabitants, from the left-wing picketers and marchers of Europe, to normally docile housewives, to those in the religious community.

In the creation of the most sophisticated weapon, a means of complete self-destruction has been devised.

Is it possible that human beings may be the agents of a chain nuclear holocaust that will destroy the earth (II Pet. 3:10-12)?

Technology has advanced further in this age than in all previous generations—fission, fusion, radar, television, automation, miniaturization, plastics, jets, rockets, and satellites. An increasing number of thinkers in all realms of modern culture fear that moral and spiritual concern has not advanced as rapidly as amoral scientific progress. R.H.

SCIENTOLOGY, CHURCH OF. In 1950, L. Ron Hubbard, a science fiction writer, produced a book expounding his views on psychology, Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health. Ultimately, this book is the basis of the new American religious movement called Scientology, which Hubbard founded in 1954. Hubbard declares that his movement resulted from years of study in philosophy, religion, science, and extensive travel in the Orient and elsewhere. Hubbard says he was concerned by the apparent dominion of death over life and wished to increase life and free people from deathlike circumstances: criminals, the insane, and all who are trapped in their own errors.

By discerning that people need to be freed from spiritual and psychological traumas, which he called "engrams," Hubbard devised a sort of Freudian psychoanalysis called "auditing" in which these "engrams" were uncovered and dissolved. To aid this counseling ("auditing") process, Hubbard devised an "E-meter," a sort of crude "polygraph" (or lie detector) that would register whenever the auditing uncovered a sensitive spot or engram. Hubbard set up the Church of Scientology to teach his religious philosophy and train "auditors" who opened Scientology centers all over the country and overseas as well. The person recruited for auditing is known as a "pre-clear." Once the person has gone through the process, he is called a "clear." After this basic step, many other stages of enlightenment through auditing and training have been worked out and set up by Hubbard. Large sums of money are charged Scientology students for this training through some thirty-eight or more grades, up to what is called "operating thetan" IX. The group is highly controversial and has been involved in many lawsuits. J.C.

SCOFIELD, CYRUS INGERSON (1843–1921). Lawyer turned Bible teacher and editor of a popular reference Bible. Scofield was born in Michigan but reared in Tennessee. During the Civil War he served with the Southern forces under General Robert E. Lee. For his valor, Scofield was awarded the Confederate Cross of Honor.

He was admitted to the Kansas bar in 1869, served for two years as United States attorney, then set up his own law practice in St. Louis. Much of his life during these years is veiled, but there have been persistent reports that Scofield was a heavy drinker and was involved in domestic discord.

However, when he was converted, Scofield applied himself to Bible study, coming under the influence of those who followed the system of Bible hermeneutics known as DISPENSATIONALISM. This view of Scripture teaches there is much variety in the divine economy in the Bible, that God has dealt differently with people during different eras of biblical history. There are several schools of dispensationalist thought, but Scofield's view of seven dispensations has been widely accepted. He became one of the great popularizers of dispensationalism through the influence of the Scofield Reference Bible (1909, 1967), which has had wide distribution. He was ordained as the pastor of a Congregationalist church in Dallas and served there from 1882 to 1895.

At the request of D. L. Moody, Scofield became pastor of the Moody Church in East Northfield, Massachusetts, from 1895 to 1902. Then he returned to serve the church in Dallas again until 1907. That year he began full-time service as a Bible conference teacher in the United States and in the British Isles. During this period he also founded the Central American Mission. R.H.

SCOPES TRIAL. Famed legal case involving the teaching of evolution in a public school contrary to Tennessee law. Besides the controversy over biological evolution versus direct creation, the trial attracted worldwide attention because it pitted the talents of William Jennings Bryan against those of Clarence Darrow.

The trial was a test case in June, 1925, involving John T. Scopes, a biology teacher who was tried for teaching in the Dayton (Tenn.) High School a "theory that denies the story of the Divine Creation of man as taught in the Bible and to teach instead that man has descended from a lower order of animals."

Darrow argued that academic freedom was being violated and the legislature had demonstrated a religious preference, violating the separation of church and state. Bryan, aiding the state prosecutor, was unable to present statements of Bible scholars and other evidence because of the presiding judge's ruling. Nevertheless, the jury returned a verdict of guilty and fined Scopes $100. Two years later the Tennessee Supreme Court ruled the law was constitutional but reversed the judgment against Scopes on a technicality, thus preventing an appeal to the United States Supreme Court. R.H.

SCRIBES. Professional TEACHERS of the (Mosaic) Law in the Second Temple period (postexilic Judaism). In Jeremiah 36:26 the term sōpher (pl. sōpherim) identified a royal "secretary" in charge of legal documents (II Kings 22:3 ff.; Isa. 36:3). The spiritual ancestors of the sōpherim in NT times, however, were the priest-scholars who, during the Babylonian exile, were the collectors, copyists, and editors of the scriptures (later to become the Hebrew Bible, the OT). Ezra the PRIEST, who is described as "a scribe skilled in the law of Moses," typifies these early Torah scholars (Ezra 7:6, 10; Neh. 8:7; II Chr. 34:13; Eccles. 39:6-11 is often cited as the classic description of the scribe of this period, early second century B.C.).

At the time of the Maccabean wars of liberation, scribes were among the "devout" (Hasidim) who supported the cause (I Macc. 7:11-17). During the rule of the Hasmonean priest-kings, an influential group of lay scribes emerged, who formed a component of the sect of the Pharisees.

There are numerous references in the NT to scribes (Mark 9:11, 14; 12:28; Matt. 8:19; 13:52; 23:34; Luke 5:17; 7:30; 10:25). In other references scribes are identified as "scribes of the Pharisees" (Mark 2:16; Acts 23:9). Still other references associate scribes with "the elders and the chief priests" (Mark 8:31; 11:27; 15:1; Luke 22:66). Or only with "the chief priests" (Mark 10:33; 11:18; 14:1; 15:31; Matt. 2:4; 21:15; Luke 23:10). From these accounts it is apparent that the pre A.D. 70 scribes were a high-ranking group serving on the SANHEDRIN. Next to the chief priests, the Sanhedrin scribes were leaders in the government of the Jewish nation. Some (possibly all) of them belonged to the sect of the PHARISEES (for example, Gamaliel, Acts 5:34-39).

In Matthew's Gospel the common reference to "the scribes and the Pharisees" appears to have been a stereotypical formula (also John 8:3), representing a later but valid judgment: the specialists in the law exceeded the nonprofessionals in importance in the sect. According to Matthew the formal authority of the scribes was acknowledged by Jesus, but he denounced the example they set (Matt. 23:2-3). One should contrast Jesus' commendation of the scribe, according to Mark 12:28-34. The parallels in Matthew and Luke of this meeting reflect the anticlerical bias of the late first-century churches (Matt. 22:35; Luke 10:25). A balanced perspective must take account of the fact that it was the dedication of the scribes that was chiefly responsible for the preservation of Judaism and of the OT during Greco-Roman times.

SCRIPTORIUM. A Latin name for a monastery room dedicated to writing or copying manuscripts, especially books of the Bible. Currently it is associated with such a room excavated at Qumran, where the Dead Sea Scrolls were produced.

SCRIPTURE, AUTHORITY OF. All the great world religions possess scriptures that keep them in touch with their origins and provide identity, stability, and continuity through the course of history. Here we are concerned with the authority of scripture in Christianity. By an authority, we understand that which rightfully claims the respect and allegiance of believers. Presently authority in matters of religion is not coercively imposed, like the authority of the state. People in most countries are free to believe or disbelieve, and so any authority in religion needs to justify itself. Reasons have to be given for holding that any book or institution or tradition is to be regarded as authoritative. There are at least three important reasons for ascribing authority to the Bible:

(1) Christians believe that their faith originated in an act of God in which God was revealed and communicated. The Bible witnesses to this act, so that in some sense (which we must examine more closely) it is or contains the WORD OF GOD and is therefore to that extent authoritative. The Bible is not identical with the Word of God. The primary Word was the living person, Jesus Christ, and the Bible is the Word of God only in the secondary sense, that it points to Jesus Christ and sets him before the reader or hearer as the REVELATION of God, and so he is the one who demands the response of faith. Both the OT and the NT derive their authority from Christ. The OT, of course, has a different ground for its authority among Jews, but for Christians it is authoritative because of its relation to Christ. At one time it was thought that the OT was full of specific prophecies relating to Jesus, and though few scholars would look on it in that way today, it is the OT that supplies the basic theological background assumed in the NT and that also supplies the expectations in terms of which Jesus Christ is interpreted in the NT. The NT itself bears a more direct relation to Jesus Christ. It sets before us his teaching, testifies to his death and resurrection, and also to the experience of salvation that the early Christian community found in him. Because it tells not only of Jesus but of the response to him, some modern writers prefer to speak of it as testifying to the "Christ-event," where this expression includes the complex social event of Jesus and the community that he gathered about him. The fact that the reading or preaching of the Bible today can still evoke the response of faith or bring about the experience of salvation is a ground for believing that it is inspired and may rightly be called the "Word of God."

(2) Apart altogether from its claim to be the Word of God, the Bible possesses the historical authority belonging to any document that records past happenings not too far distant from it in time. Admittedly, the historical authority of the Bible is more questionable today than it once was. It was once believed that Moses himself had written the first five books of the OT, so that they contained a firsthand account of the Exodus and the formative period of Israel's history. That theory of Mosaic authorship has long been abandoned, and we recognize that the books come from several centuries later and that the traditions they contain have been worked over again and again. Likewise, in the NT, many scholars are doubtful if any of the Gospels is an eyewitness account. Even so, the Gospels are quite close in time to the events they record. NT scholarship has moved beyond the extreme skepticism of an earlier period. There is no reason to doubt the general picture of the Christ-event given in the NT.

(3) A third kind of authority belongs to the Bible in virtue of its relation to the church. We say that the books of the Bible are canonical, and by that is meant that out of the great mass of sacred literature that proliferated in ancient times, these particular books were chosen by the church for inclusion in the CANON as the normative Christian books. Many people would say that this selection was made under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, but whether or not one wants to use such language, it can at least be agreed that the canonical status of the biblical writings rests on the collective consideration and judgment of the church, and this gives to these books an authority that cannot be claimed by the judgment or experience of an individual. The authority here is very much like the authority recognized in any science. Students do not begin to learn a science from scratch. They learn what those who have studied the subject before them have discovered, and they begin at that point. They may, of course, come to disagree with the received wisdom, but they will have to produce very good reasons for abandoning it or revising it. Likewise, in the church each individual begins within that collective tradition of faith that finds its principal expression in the Bible, as the church's book.

If the three points mentioned offer reasons for according authority to the Bible, we have to ask how far this authority may have been weakened by BIBLICAL CRITICISM. It needs little thought to realize that any theory of biblical inerrancy is problematic. As already mentioned, the primary Word of God is not a book at all, but the living person, Jesus Christ. Again, as we have seen, questions of dating and authorship have weakened the historical claims of the Bible, so far as they depended on "eyewitness" accounts. Further, to be infallible, the Bible would need to exist in a single universally accepted TEXT, whereas there are many textual variations. It would also need to be free of contradictions and incoherences, but there are several discrepancies on quite important matters, for example, which women discovered the empty tomb. One would also expect an inerrant Bible to be absolutely clear and unambiguous, but there are in fact many obscure and disputed passages. So, although we have seen that there are good reasons for acknowledging the authority of the Bible, this is not an absolute authority but one that has to be critically approached and evaluated on different matters. In any case, there would still be the question of interpreting a Bible pronouncement into the changed concepts and circumstances of the present (see HERMENEUTICS). But when all this is recognized, biblical authority has not been destroyed by critical scholarship. On the contrary, it has become possible to recognize that authority in a more intelligent way.

One further point is to recognize that the Bible is not the sole authority recognized by all Christians. TRADITION (including traditional interpretations of the Bible), REASON, and CONSCIENCE all carry weight alongside the biblical teaching when one seeks the answer to some disputed question about Christian belief or behavior.

J.M.

SCRIVEN, JOSEPH MEDLICOTT (1820–86). Itinerant Plymouth Brethren preacher and poet, the author of "What a Friend We Have in Jesus," one of the most popular hymns in the English language. Scriven had written the poem to comfort his ailing mother in Ireland. He never intended for it to be published, let alone sung as a hymn. Scriven was born to an affluent family in Dublin, Ireland. After graduation from Trinity College, Dublin, Scriven was planning to marry. However, the night before the wedding his fiancée was drowned. Because of his grief and estrangement from his family over his attachment to the Plymouth Brethren, Scriven decided to emigrate to Canada. He took up residence in Port Hope, Ontario, on the northern shore of Lake Ontario, where he became a tutor. He also stayed frequently in the home of James Sackville, in whose home the words of Scriven's famous hymn were written. Subsequently Scriven fell in love a second time and became engaged to Eliza Catherine Roche. However, she contracted tuberculosis and their wedding was called off.

Scriven devoted himself to the poor of the area, giving most of his private income away. He was living with the Sackville family again in 1886 when he was stricken with a fatal illness. Before he died, his host found the poem Scriven had written for his mother. Modestly Scriven told Sackville that "the Lord and I did it between us." Sackville made copies of the hymn and sent one to a publisher. Scriven, delirious from fever, stumbled from his bedroom and went outside. Several yards from the house, he fell into a creek and was drowned. R.H.

SCROLL. Writing material consisting of a long strip of papyrus, leather, or parchment. Though leather scrolls are unattested in the Bible, impressive specimens, widely known as the Dead Sea Scrolls, have been uncovered at Qumran. The celebrated twenty-four-foot-long Isaiah text contains seventeen sheets of sheepskin joined by linen thread. Ancient Egyptian PAPYRUS scrolls consist of a double thickness of strips cut from the stalk of the papyrus plant that have been placed side by side and glued together.

At Jeremiah's dictation (Jer. 36:4), Baruch wrote a relatively brief scroll (thrice read aloud in a single day; 36:10, 15, 21). That it was burned in Jehoiakim's brazier (36:23) suggests that it consisted of papyrus, because the stench of burning leather would have been overwhelming.

A scroll figures significantly in the visionary experiences of Ezekiel, Zechariah, and John. During his prophetic commissioning, Ezekiel perceives a scroll that he is divinely commanded to eat (Ezek. 2:8b-3:3). Its message of divine judgment is so extensive that, contrary to custom, the scroll is covered on both sides. This materializing of God's judgmental word finds further expression in Zechariah's vision of an enormous flying scroll (Zech. 5:1-4). In his visions, John sees a sealed scroll containing God's unalterable secrets about the future

(Rev. 5:1-14) and a scroll of doom that he must eat (10:1-11). J.K.K.

SCYTHIANS. A nomadic people who, in the eighth century B.C., wandered from southern Russia through the Caucasus Mountains into the Near East. They are first mentioned as Assyrian opponents in the annals of Esarhaddon (680-669). In time, Esarhaddon allied himself with the Scythians to buttress his position against other meddlesome Indo-Aryan hordes—the Medes and Cimmerians.

When the power of the Scythians was concentrated on the northern Euphrates (about 640-600), their influence extended in an east-west direction from the Caspian Sea through northern Armenia on to Cappadocia. It is uncertain what role the Scythians played as Assyrian allies when the Assyrian Empire expired before enemy Babylonians and Medes around 610. Also the chronology of the movements of these nomads is inexact. Presumably by 625, some Scythians had pushed into western Asia, swept down the Phoenician coast, and reached the Egyptian border. Bought off by Pharaoh Psammetichus I (664-610), they turned northward. In the early sixth century, the Medes defeated the Scythians and thrust them back into southern Russia.

By referring to the Scythians as Ashkenaz (Gen. 10:3; I Chr. 1:6; Jer. 51:27), the OT links them with populations of Asia Minor and northern Mesopotamia. A decreasing number of scholars maintain that the book of Zephaniah and oracles of Jeremiah referring to the so-called "foe from the north" (for example, Jer. 4:5-31) reflect Palestine's uneasiness regarding possible Scythian incursions. Indeed, the impact of the Scythians on biblical history cannot be readily determined. Employing the name "Scythian" to denote savage behavior (Col. 3:11), Paul knew of Scythian brutality manifested over six centuries earlier (compare II Macc. 4:47). J.K.K.

SEA, MOLTEN. A huge bowl of cast bronze located in the courtyard of Solomon's Temple (I Kings 7:23-26).

Measuring fifteen feet in diameter and over seven feet in height, this object may have weighed nearly thirty tons and held approximately ten thousand gallons of water. Under its outward curving brim were two rows of ornamental gourds. It rested on twelve bronze oxen, so arranged that three each faced the four main points of the compass.

The Chronicler's notation that "the sea was for the priests to wash in" (II Chr. 4:6) does not mean that the men climbed into the bowl. Possibly analogous to the great mosques, this water source simply facilitated the ritual ablutions of TEMPLE entrants. The name "sea" suggests cosmic concerns. It may have been mythically linked with the Mesopotamian apsu (subterranean fresh water) from which all life originated, or with the Canaanite god Baal, who triumphed over the chaotic sea. Moreover, the fertility symbolism of the twelve oxen was scarcely subtle. This valuable bronze object finally met disaster. King Ahaz seized the oxen under it to meet Assyrian demand for tribute (II Kings 16:17), and the Babylonians broke up the bowl and carried its fragments homeward after capturing Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (II Kings 25:13).

SEABURY, SAMUEL (1729–96). The first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, Seabury was born November 30 in Groton, Connecticut, to Abigail Mumford and the Reverend Samuel Seabury, a Congregational minister. His father joined the Church of England in 1730 and served the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel as a missionary. Seabury graduated from Yale College in 1748 and studied medicine at the University of Edinburgh. Ordained a priest in 1753, he went to New Jersey, in 1754 as a missionary. Seabury became rector of the church in Westchester, New York, in 1767, where he practiced medicine and ran a school as well. During the Revolution, Seabury sought to keep the colonists loyal and served as chaplain to the British troops. However, in 1783 the Connecticut clergy chose him as their candidate for bishop. He was consecrated by Scottish non-juring bishops in 1784. From St. James Church, New London, he reorganized the church, ordaining priests and confirming communicants.

SEAL OF CONFESSION. The absolute secrecy observed by the Roman Catholic priest in his role as a CONFESSOR and by any others who may have knowledge of anything revealed in the sacrament of penance. The confessor is forbidden to disclose or to use any information gained through confession if such use would harm the person who confessed, even if such use did not involve revealing what was confessed. A priest who reveals anything confessed would automatically be excommunicated. Ecclesiastical superiors may not publicly use information obtained through confession. Priests are expressly under the obligation not to reveal confessed material if called into a secular court of law. In general, English and American laws have respected the seal of confession, but in neither country is there an absolute law that respects the seal of confession. Some American state courts have recently begun to question the secrecy of material revealed to Protestant ministers, who have usually been accorded the same privileged information status as Catholic priests.

SEARS, EDMUND HAMILTON (1810–76). Unitarian minister and hymn writer. Sears was one of several Unitarian writers who contributed greatly to a vast outpouring of hymns between the 1830s and the Civil War. His greatest contributions were two Christmas carols, "It Came upon a Midnight Clear," and "Calm on the Listening Night." Sears was born in Sandisfield, Massachusetts, on April 6. After attending Westfield Academy, Brattleboro, Vermont, he enrolled at Union College, Schenectady, New York. He studied law briefly, then theology (while on the faculty of the academy), and later was graduated from Harvard Divinity School. Ordained to the Unitarian ministry, he twice served pastorates at Wayland (Mass.), and for a short time at Lancaster (Mass.). His final charge was at Weston (Mass.). Sears wrote hundreds of articles, poems, and hymns. He died on January 16, at Weston.

SECOND ADAM. In I Corinthians 15:21-22 and Romans 5:14-19, Christ is described as a second Adam in the sense that Adam brought sin into the world and Christ brought salvation. Adam represents death for all, and Christ, life. Tradition emphasizes these roles of the first and second Adams at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem when it locates the place of Adam's creation in a chapel directly below the site of the cross, where the blood of the dying Christ could flow through to Adam.

T.J.K.

SECOND COMING OF CHRIST. See PAROUSIA.

SECT. This word derives from the Latin verb sequi (to follow), not, as is often thought, from secare (to cut). Thus in its proper usage, it emphasizes a group's response to a leader and not its existence as a tiny fraction or section of the whole. Often it refers to a religious body that is gathered or called out of some natural organic group or state church on anti-conformist grounds, sometimes by a charismatic leader or by some principle of greater strictness or more single-minded dedication.

The Protestant Reformation was the progenitor of many sectarian movements. Some of these were rationalistic and anti-trinitarian, some intensely biblical, some described as spiritual. The continental Radical Reformation groups include the Anabaptists and their descendants, the Mennonites, the Amish, and the Hutterites. Technically, they fall into this category of sects, as do the Pietists who formed a distinct religious movement within existing churches. Many of these groups, such as the Dunkers, the antecedents of the Church of the Brethren, had their origins in Europe but flourished after emigration to America. The Moravian Brethren, influenced by Count Nicholas Ludwig von Zinzendorf, became one of the most influential of the pietistic sects. The somewhat related Schwenckfelders also became a miniscular example.

According to Sydney E. Ahlstrom, "the term 'sect' refers to a movement, almost necessarily small at the outset, that secedes from or forms the periphery of a more stable, socially adjusted, and often culturally dominant religious group. Sect formation is thus usually an expression of alienation; it is a movement of people who are spiritually, socially, economically, educationally, or in other ways 'disinherited'" (A Religious History of the American People, p. 473).

While sects are particularly a phenomenon of post-Reformation history, they have emerged throughout the long life of the church. In a sense Christianity itself was at first a Judaic sect. In the years that followed, sectarian movements, such as Montanism, Novatianism, and Donatism, developed within Christendom. Many sects through the years have become churches. This is particularly true of the vast number of religious groups that have proliferated in the United States. (See DENOMINATIONALISM.)

R. H.

SECULARISM. From the Latin word saeculum, referring to time. The "temporal" is contrasted with the "eternal" and by implication, the worldly with the religious.

Secularism denotes a turn away from an other-worldliness to a worldliness that values human achievement. This development took place in the Western world during the Renaissance, when new learning and discoveries encouraged pride in cultural achievements. Secularism continued to develop during the eighteenth-century Enlightenment, when political theory stressed the potential power of human beings to govern themselves in contrast to the religious theory of the divine right of kings. AGNOSTICISM, a skepticism regarding the activity of God, has been one facet of secularism.

Humanism stresses the value of people and envisions a world order that gives primacy to human welfare. Twentieth-century "secular Christianity" calls Christians to become involved in the world as the arena of God's activity. Secularism is characteristic of a society open to change within itself, interaction with other societies, and a contextual framework for values.

SECURITY OF THE BELIEVER. See PERSEVERANCE.

SEDER. The ceremonial feast that takes place on the first two nights of the Jewish festival of PASSOVER (the first night in Israel and among Reform Jews). The Seder starts with the chanting by the leader of the kiddush, a proclamation of the sanctity of the Passover, over a cup of wine. The second step in the order of the service is the washing of hands, without reciting a blessing. Next a small piece of celery or other green vegetable is dipped in salt water and the benediction for vegetables is recited. Many people have associated the vegetable, symbolically, with spring and the salt water with the tears shed by Jews during their slavery in Egypt. The middle of the three matzoth is divided into two. The larger piece, called the afikomen, is then wrapped in a napkin and hidden by the leader. Using the HAGGADAH, the participants in the Seder join in unfolding the drama of the Passover. This includes the chanting of The Four Questions by the youngest person present, the parable of the four sons, blessings, rabbinic lessons, the counting of the ten plagues, the thanking of God through singing "Dayenu," the explanation of the three major Passover symbols, the singing of psalms, and the drinking of the second cup of wine. The next step is to wash the hands, with the appropriate blessing. Following the blessings is the eating of the MATZAH (unleavened bread), the bitter herbs dipped in haroset—the mixture of apples, nuts, cinnamon, and wine symbolizing the mortar out of which the Jewish slaves made bricks—and the sandwich of matzah and bitter herbs. After this, the Passover meal is served. Following this, children search for and find the afikomen, which is distributed and eaten. Grace after meals is recited, the third cup of wine is drunk, and the service is concluded with the chanting of more psalms, the drinking of the fourth cup of wine, a closing poem, and the singing of hymns and songs.

SEEKERS. A radical PURITAN sect that flourished in the 1640s. They met in small groups to wait on God because they believed there was no true church since the spirit of the Antichrist had gained the upper hand, but that in time God would ordain new apostles and prophets to found another church. In the 1650s many became Quakers and Baptists. ROGER WILLIAMS' mature beliefs resembled theirs. N. H.

SEER. See PROPHET/PROPHECY.

SEICHŌ NO IE. From the Japanese phrase meaning "house of growth." One of the "new religions" of contemporary Japan, Seichō no Ie was founded by Masaharu Taniguchi (born in 1893), who was a worker for the Omoto faith before inaugurating his own movement. Although influenced by Buddhism and Confucianism as well as Omoto, the ideas that directly sparked Seichō no Ie actually came to Taniguchi through reading a book by an American "New Thought" writer in 1928. In 1930 Taniguchi started a magazine called Seichō no Ie to promulgate these teachings. Since then the religion has grown in organizational structure, establishing study groups and centers throughout Japan, but it has always been less a church in the conventional sense than an institution for disseminating Taniguchi's teachings through publications, lectures, and retreats.

The basic doctrine is that human beings are children of God and therefore perfect. Evil has no reality whatsoever of its own. It is only through the mind's false belief in imperfection that the illusions of evil and suffering arise from it, illusions that can be erased through the power of mind. In this way does Seichō no Ie deal with sickness, failure, and all other manifestations of evil. Its worship practices consist in large part of affirmations of perfection and a meditation method called shinsokan. It also has texts by Taniguchi, which play the role of Scripture.

Up until 1945, Taniguchi and Seichō no Ie supported the extreme nationalism and war effort of that era, unlike many other "new religions," and since then has endorsed causes regarded in Japan as ultra-conservative. Nonetheless, the movement has grown to number several million followers. R.E.

SEIR. A name used of a land, a people, and a mountain.

(1) The Land. "The hill country of Seir" (Gen. 36:8, 9; Josh. 24:4), "Mount Seir" (Deut. 1:2; 2:1), and "Seir" (Josh. 11:17; 12:7), all refer to an area of mountains and high plateaus (up to five thousand feet above sea level), which lies east of the Arabah and west of the desert. This land was the scene of the wilderness wanderings: "for many days we went about Mount Seir . . . the territory of your brethren the sons of Esau, who live in Seir" (Deut. 2:1-4). Mount Hālak, a term related to Seir, seems to refer to the wooded slope east of the Arabah "that rises toward Seir" (Josh. 11:17; 12:7).

(2) The People. Seir was the grandfather of Hori and, thus, the ancestor of the "sons of the Horites" (Gen. 36:20, 21; I Chr. 1:38). The HORITES were the pre-Edomite inhabitants of the land who later assimilated with the Edomites (Num. 24:18), the descendants of Esau (Gen. 33:14, 16; Deut. 2:4, 5, 12, 22, 29). It is now thought that the Horites may well have been Hurrians, migrants from the second-millennium kingdom of Mitanni in north and northeast Mesopotamia. The "men of Seir" (II Chr. 25:11, 14), whether Horites, Amorites, Edomites, or Idumeans, are considered hostile to Israel (II Chr. 20:10, 22). Psalm 137:7-9 is perhaps an echo of the Jacob-Esau rivalry. In Isaiah 21:11; Numbers 24:18; Ezekiel 35:2ff. "Mount Seir" is used for the Edomite nation.

(3) The Mountain. A mountain, also called Mount Jearim on the north border of Judah, near Beth-she-mesh, about nine miles west of Jerusalem (Deut. 1:44; Josh. 15:10, and, possibly, I Chr. 4:42-43).

P.L.G.

SELA. Meaning literally "rocky" or "cliff."

(1) Name of an ancient Edomite fortress-city whose ruins are about 2700 feet above sea level (Isa. 16:1). Amaziah of Judah took the city and renamed it Jokthe (II Kings 14:7). In Obadiah 3, Sela appears in the Hebrew text (RSV, "the rock"). The Nabateans built the city of Petra in a neighboring high valley. The Greek name Petra probably replaced the biblical name Sela.

(2) A place associated with the Amorites (Judg. 1:36).

(3) In Isaiah 42:11, Sela is a distant, unidentified place. P.L.G.

SELAH. A signal in poetry calling for a pause or music. Selah appears seventy-one times in thirty-nine psalms and three times in Habakkuk 3. The word, originally in the margin, made its way into the text. It is thought to have alerted the conductor of choir and orchestra to interrupt the even flow of the chanting with a clash of cymbals or a short musical interlude. P.L.G.

SELEUCIA IN SYRIA. One of nine known cities all named Seleucia for one of Alexander's generals, Seleucus I Nicator, who, in 312 B.C., founded the Seleucid Empire. He made Antioch in Syria his western capital, and in 301 B.C. built, at a former Phoenician harbor named Pieria, where the Orontes River meets the sea, a Greek-type city as a guardian fortress and seaport for Antioch, fourteen miles upstream. The city was built on the south side of the mountain Musa Dagh, with walls extending down to enclose the harbor. From the ruins of the city, still to be seen above ground, the city was large and prosperous.

For more than two centuries, Seleucia served as the Seleucids' Mediterranean port. Throughout the first century A.D. the Romans used it as their main naval base for the eastern Mediterranean. Cyprus is about one hundred miles to the southeast. It could be reached in less than a day's sailing. On a clear day, it can be seen on the horizon.

Barnabas and Saul with John Mark sailed to Cyprus from Selucia (Acts 13:4) on the "first missionary journey." Barnabas and Mark later, probably, did also (Acts 15:39), though this is not stated.

P.L.G.

SELF. Psychological study of the self began with the work of William James (1890) but was not really developed until the 1940s with GORDON ALLPORT's research on the individual and Prescott Lecky's Self-Consistency.

The self is the sum of the constituent parts of a person, including not only the physical self but one's work, family, and culture. Personal identity is a process, forged from interaction with the physical and social environment. It develops from the moment the infant begins to distinguish the self from the nurturer. Language is an important factor: to name the self and others brings both a cognitive and emotional understanding of selfhood. A stable selfhood depends upon the ability to cope with life situations and to have a realistic perception of relationships to others within a social group. Changes in the self-concept arise during adolescence in the quest for identity (Erikson) and during the stages of adulthood as people determine what is important in their lives and the degree to which they adapt to change. I.C.

SEMINARY. An institution for the training of candidates for the ministry, priesthood, or the rabbinate. In the United States it is a professional school giving training in religion, especially for men and women preparing for pastoral duties, requiring a college degree for entry, and having a three-year course of study leading to a master of divinity degree. Seminaries also often offer advanced graduate degrees.

In Great Britain the term "seminary" is normally used by Roman Catholic institutions preparing men for the diocesan priesthood, or for membership in a religious order. Commonly such schools offer a course of study comprising typically ten years of secondary, collegiate, and theological training. Some Roman Catholic institutions so named offer four-year courses in theology and other special studies. In Britain theological colleges, often associated with universities, provide the training for young men and women preparing for ministry in Anglican and free churches.

In the earlier half of the nineteenth century in both the United States and Britain, a "seminary for young ladies" was the common designation of a private school for girls. R.H.

SEMI-PELAGIANS. A term used to describe the anti-Augustinian movement that flourished in southern France and North Africa between 429 and 529. Writings of three of its leaders have survived: John Cassian, Vincent of Lérins, and Faustus, bishop of Riez.

Faustus' De gratia, ("Concerning Grace"), defined their position. They believed in the universality of original sin as a corruptive force and in the necessity of grace to overcome sin. But they also argued against Augustine that human volition can initiate the process of salvation by desiring it, though grace is needed to achieve it. Later Semi-Pelagians saw divine help not as grace infused in a person but as external prompting through the preaching of divine threats and promises. Their major concern was the justice of God. If human beings are totally incapable of action, then God is a capricious tyrant, arbitrarily saving some and damning others. The Semi-Pelagians were condemned as heretical by the Second Council of Orange in 529. (See also PELAGIANISM.) N.H.

SEMITES. Members of any of various ancient and modern peoples originating in southwestern Asia, including Sumerians, Akkadians, Canaanites, Phoenicians, Hebrews, and Arabs. According to the Bible, Semites, called "sons of Shem" (Gen. 10:22; I Chr. 1:17), have a common ancestor, SHEM, the long-lived, eldest son of Noah (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 10:1, 31; 11:10, 11; I Chr. 1:4, 24). With his brother Japheth, Shem acted honorably toward their father in contrast to their brother Canaan. Noah blessed them (Gen. 9:23, 26-27). P.L.G.

SENECA. Lucius Annaeus Seneca, a Roman statesman and the tutor of the young NERO. Seneca was born in Cordoba in Spain about 4 B.C. and died outside Rome in A.D. 65. Of a noble family, he was educated at Rome for a legal career, studying Cynic, Stoic, and Pythagorean philosophy. When he intrigued with the sister of Caligula to gain control of the throne, he was banned to the island of Corsica. Later the emperor Claudius invited him to return and become the tutor of the eleven-year-old Nero.

A good writer and speaker, more moral than most Romans in positions of power and leadership, he first guided Nero through a glorious five years of rule before Nero plotted with him to help do away with Nero's mother. One of Nero's richest and most powerful friends, Seneca was eventually ordered to cut his veins and take his own life, though when this proved ineffective, he died in a steam bath.

His Latin is clear and precise and was much admired by many of the early fathers of the church. His advice about daily living and attitudes toward one's neighbors was charitable and insightful. Some early Christians counted him as one of their own, a Christian in secret. This belief is based in part on fourteen letters, still extant, which are now almost universally thought to be spurious. His flair for drama, his precise Latin, and the plays he wrote made him popular again in the century of the Reformation. T.J.K.

SENNACHERIB. King of Assyria and Babylonia (704-681 B.C.), son of SARGON II, and father of ESARHADDON

Initial Challenges. Sargon's battlefield death brought Sennacherib to the Assyrian throne in uncontested fashion. Though Sennacherib inherited a well-consolidated empire, he soon encountered serious rebellion. With Elamite assistance, Marduk-apaliddina (MERODACH-BALADAN) reestablished himself as king in Babylon. This Chaldean prince had previously asserted his independence against Sargon. Merodach-baladan sought to buttress his position by uniting warring Chaldean and Aramean tribes against Sennacherib and dispatching envoys to Assyria's western vassals to incite their insurrection. HEZEKIAH, king of Judah, warmly hosted such a delegation (II Kings 20:12-13). Defeating Elamite and Chaldean forces near Kish, Sennacherib took control of Babylonia, appointed Bel-ibni to the throne (702-700), and triumphantly returned with captives and spoil to Nineveh.

Sennacherib's prism, a hexagonal clay cylinder on which the Assyrian monarch recorded his various campaigns, including one against Hezekiah of Judah.

The rebellion of western states against Sennacherib was extensive. The kings of Tyre and Sidon refused to pay Assyria customary tribute. To brace himself against Assyria, Hezekiah negotiated a treaty with Egypt (Isa. 30:1-7; 31:1-3). Also, Sennacherib's annals report that Hezekiah consented to the Jerusalem imprisonment of King Padi of Ekron, one of Assyria's few remaining western allies.

In 701 Sennacherib was free to press westward. Though some historians argue that he made two separate invasions into Judah (the second in about 668), a second invasion is neither readily discernible in the relevant, yet confusing, biblical text (II Kings 18:13-19:37) nor mentioned in Assyrian annals. Accordingly, the following reconstruction is plausible. Sennacherib quickly subdued Tyre and replaced its fleeing king with his own appointment. This induced several western states to submit immediately, but Ashkelon, Ekron, and Judah remained resolute rebels. Sennacherib soon overtook Ashkelon and Ekron, defeated a large Egyptian army allied with Ekron, and overran Judah. According to Sennacherib's report, he seized forty-six of Hezekiah's fortified cities, and by isolating Jerusalem from all outside assistance, confined Hezekiah inside his royal city "like a caged bird." While Sennacherib was still leveling Lachish, Hezekiah sent a message of surrender (II Kings 18:14a). Sennacherib was not lenient. He demanded the return of King Padi to his Ekron throne, the parceling of certain Judean territory to Padi and the loyal heads of Ashdod and Gaza, and Hezekiah's payment of such enormous tribute that he had to lift gold and silver from the Jerusalem Temple and surrender his royal treasures (18:14b-16).

Presently, the unexpected happened. Rather than conquering Jerusalem, Sennacherib suddenly withdrew from Judah. This may be understood as Sennacherib's response either to a devastating epidemic that crippled his army (19:35, a verse inspiring Lord Byron's well-known poem "The Destruction of Sennacherib," 1815), or, more likely, to a "rumor" that reached him and demanded his attention elsewhere—presumably renewed rebellion in Babylonia (19:7). Jerusalem's much relieved citizens were left to ruminate on Zion's inviolability, and in time, make it national dogma.

Continuing Babylonian Problem. With Merodach-baladan still stirring up Babylonian politics, Sennacherib acted decisively in 700 B.C. by placing his own son Asshur-nadin-shum on its throne. Meanwhile, Merodach-baladan fled to Elam. After six years of relative peace, Sennacherib directly faced Elam. Resentful of Elam's tendency to support Babylonia in anti-Assyrian measures, including its granting asylum to defeated rebels, Sennacherib undertook a novel expedition by ship in 694 and overtook Elam's coastal cities. Elamites, however, were able to invade Babylonia, take Sennacherib's son prisoner, and install Nergal-ushezib on Babylon's throne. Once Sennacherib dealt with him, another usurper, Mushezib-Marduk, surfaced. When Sennacherib reasserted himself in 691, he was defeated by a coalition of Elamites, Babylonians, and neighboring tribal confederates. Finally, in 689 Sennacherib mastered Babylon's rebellion. This time an internally distraught Elam was incapable of interfering. Forced to face Sennacherib alone, Babylon was turned into shambles and its citizenry massacred.

Sennacherib's last eight years of rule were mainly tranquil, allowing him to concentrate on palace construction in Nineveh. In 681 he was assassinated by two sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, who fled (II Kings 19:37). Thus his favorite son, Esarhaddon, moved swiftly to claim Assyria's throne. J.K.K.

SENTENCES, BOOKS OF. The latin word sententia originally meant any exposition of thought. In the twelfth century, theologians compiled collections of "sentences," systematized catalogues of teaching from Scripture and earlier church fathers. One of the first was Peter Abelard's Sic et non. The most famous was Peter Lombard's Four Books of Sentences. The books of sentences became syllabi for the theological education of men like Martin Luther. They marked the transition from monastic education to the Scholastic universities. A master taught his students from the books of sentences, which summarized past opinion, and then gave his own views and judgments. N.H.

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. This concept is rooted in the ANABAPTISTS, who favored a congregation of gathered believers and eschewed all entanglements with the state. Many refused to pay taxes, serve in the army, and later to vote. Among English Puritans, the Separatists or BAPTISTS were its most ardent advocates. They opposed conformity of worship and discipline decreed by the crown and particularly that decreed by Archbishop William Laud. They claimed the right of the local congregation to ordain, baptize, worship, and discipline.

In America, Baptist founder ROGER WILLIAMS was undoubtedly its earliest proponent. Separation of church and state was part of the foundation of Rhode Island. Quakers in New Jersey, Delaware, and Pennsylvania worked to the same end. Williams grounded his stand on a doctrine of the church and a belief in liberty of conscience. Separation was recognized in Maryland in the 1630s and during the seventeenth century in the Carolinas, Georgia, and New York.

It was written into the federal Constitution in 1787 and the Bill of Rights in 1791 on the basis of the "rights of man" natural law philosophy and the fact of religious PLURALISM. Though many states then had religious tests, Article 6 of the Constitution prohibited them "as a qualification to any office or public trust." The First Amendment declared that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Due to the work of THOMAS JEFFERSON and JAMES MADISON, the Church of England had been disestablished in Virginia in 1785. The Congregational Church was disestablished in Connecticut 1818, New Hampshire 1819, Maine 1820, and finally Massachusetts 1833.

The concept, while usually lauded as a unique American ideal and achievement, continues to be controversial. Most staunchly upheld by Baptists and such organizations as Americans United for the Separation of Church and State, issues such as prayer in public schools, federal aid to education, draft registration, abortion, and affirmative action against racism and sexism have raised questions about its limits.

Since nineteenth-century controversies over which version of the Bible to read in public schools, some religious groups have tried to keep the government from interfering in their business (such as taxing churches' auxiliary enterprises) while seeking to disseminate their religious ideas to others (such as requiring the Ten Commandments to be posted in public schools or having abortion outlawed by constitutional amendment). Religious pluralism in a democratic state requires, however, at least TOLERATION and a measure of separation. N.H.

SEPARATISM. Separatism is the tendency or impulse for a religious group to separate itself from a mother group in order to purify the group's life or restore its doctrine to a more pristine form. Even though the tendency to come out from among them has roots as old as ancient Israel, the term "separatism" was probably first applied to the followers of ROBERT BROWNE and the INDEPENDENTS, who withdrew from the Church of England and established autonomous local churches. Separatism's classic instance in American religious life was Plymouth Colony, whose pilgrims established a city set upon a hill amidst a howling wilderness. There the "visible saints" could truly re-create primitive Christianity. Separatism was subsequently an important impulse in early Baptist and Congregational history. W. G.

SEPHARDIM. Hebrew term applied to Jews of Spanish and Portuguese origin and to their descendants, as distinct from ASHKENAZIM, or Jews whose origins go back to central Europe. After the Jews were expelled from Spain in 1492, the term "Sephardim" was given a wider connotation because of the influence of the Jews from Spain on the culture and traditions of the Jewish communities of North Africa and the Middle East. Sephardim also refers to a Jew belonging to a community that has adopted the Sephardic rite, whether or not the community is of Spanish origin.

The Sephardi Jews made great contributions to Jewish learning. They developed their own institutions and congregations, and had great rabbis, poets, and other famous personalities. Some of the works of their poets have become an integral part of the daily and Sabbath liturgy.

While they do not differ in the basics of Judaism from their fellow Jews, their ritual, traditions, customs, food, and language do differ. In the Sephardic synagogue, for example, the chants are simpler than in the Ashkenazic synagogue, the Torah is raised and shown to the worshipers before the public reading rather than after, the procedures and arrangements are different, and terms for religious services and objects are dissimilar. Babies are named for living relatives in the Sephardic tradition. The Sephardic pronunciation of Hebrew is different. On Passover, rice is permitted, and lettuce is used instead of horseradish to symbolize the bitter herbs.

The first Jewish settlers in the United States were Sephardim, and the Spanish and Portuguese synagogue (Congregation Shearith Israel) in New York is the oldest in America, dating back to 1654. After 1900, there was a wave of Sephardic immigrants from the Balkans, Asia Minor, Syria, and Turkey. After World War II, more came from Morocco, Egypt, Iraq, Syria, Iran, Israel, and Cuba (after 1959). Sephardim are divided into three language groups: Judeo-Spanish, Greek, and Arabic. L.K.

SEPHARVAIM. A city of disputed location conquered by the Assyrians. With Israel's fall to Assyrian forces in 722 B.C., Samaria became an Assyrian province. When Sargon II later sought to confer on Samaria a more permanent organization, he dispatched inhabitants of Sepharvaim to colonize it (II Kings 17:24). If consonantal confusion in the Hebrew text may be assumed, these colonists may have been the Median inhabitants of Sepharad whom Sargon conquered in 716 B.C. J.K.K.

SEPTUAGINT. The name of the earliest Greek translation of the Hebrew Torah. Ultimately it encompassed the entire OT and the Apocrypha. The undoubtedly spurious Letter of Aristeas, composed about 125 B.C., reports that Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285–246 B.C.) was persuaded by his librarian to have a translation of the Jewish Law prepared for his magnificent library in ALEXANDRIA. He contacted the high priest Eleazer in Jerusalem, who dispatched seventy-two men (six from each tribe) to Egypt. Isolated on the island of Pharos, they completed their task in seventy-two days. The version was thus called the Septuagint (translation of the seventy), and is designated by the numerals LXX.

This legend was both accepted and embellished by early Christians in advocating the inspiration and reliability of their favorite version, a factor causing it to fall into disfavor among Jews. Mention that several savants shared this task, that the Torah was the first to be translated, and that it was officially authoritative are the main historical kernels within the legend. Actually the Septuagint emerged to answer the desire of Greek-speaking Jews of the DIASPORA to comprehend the OT in their native tongue. Presumably, by the third century B.C., nearly a million Jews inhabited Alexandria. With the Greek translation of Jewish Scripture, communication between Jew and Gentile intensified. Also Judaism began appropriating Greek thought with greater enthusiasm.

Manuscripts discovered at Qumran demonstrate that the Septuagint had a long, complex prehistory. Following the relatively uniform and accurate rendering of the Torah into Greek in about 250 B.C., other books were translated during the next century.

Some of the translation of I Samuel–II Kings is slavish to the Hebrew, and some is far better Greek, though paraphrastic. Shifts in the narrative sequences in I Kings provide Solomon and Ahab a more sympathetic press. The Proverbs text has been expanded to include Greek ethical and metaphysical instruction. Throughout, the Septuagint introduces anti-anthropomorphisms (thus, the Hebrew of Exod. 24:10, "they saw the God of Israel," is rendered in Greek, "they saw the place where the God of Israel stood"). Also the Septuagint differs from the Hebrew canon in its arrangement of the individual books into three categories—historical, poetic, and prophetic. Most OT quotations within the NT are drawn from the Septuagint. J.K.K.

SERAPHIM. Heavenly beings mentioned only in Isaiah 6:2, 6, associated with the throne of God. The word "seraphim" is now thought to derive from the Hebrew word meaning "to burn," not, as previously thought, "to be bright," that is, "shining ones."

The description of the seraphim's impressive appearance emphasizes the six wings. Each seraph had two wings covering his face, two covering the "feet" (a euphemism for male sex organs), and two for flying. A representation of a six-winged female or smooth-shaven male figure has been found at Tell Halaf (Gozan in ancient Assyria) on a relief dated a century before Isaiah's time.

The seraphim are attendants and servants of God. They have voices for speaking, singing, or chanting, and hands capable of managing tongs. The seraphim show humility and modesty. They demonstrate intelligence and character by celebrating "the Holy One of Israel" in song and by serving as agents of divine purgation and forgiveness, thus preparing for the Lord's call to Isaiah to be sent and to go as the Lord's prophet. The "living creatures" or CHERUBIM of Ezekiel 10 and of Revelation 4:8 are in some way related to the seraphim of Isaiah's vision (compare ANGEL). P.L.G.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT. The collection of teachings that Jesus is reported in Matthew 5–7 to have delivered to the crowds that were following him are commonly known as the Sermon on the Mount. The name derives from the vantage point that he chose from which to address them, according to Matthew 5:1. These chapters read more like a series of excerpts from his teaching than a unified address such as a modern sermon might be. Luke 6:17–49 describes Jesus as delivering a similar discourse, though it is shorter than in Matthew and is said to have been given "on a level place" (Luke 6:17). The variations in detail between these two "sermons" are significant.

Throughout his Gospel, Matthew has grouped the teaching of Jesus into a series of discourses, most of which conclude with the remark "when Jesus had finished . . ." (7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). At least one discourse section, however, does not have this stylized conclusion (23:1-39). Since Matthew in the Sermon on the Mount contrasts the teaching of Jesus with the LAW of Moses (referring indirectly to Moses in such phrases as "you have heard it was said to the men of old," Matt. 5:21, 27, 31, 33, 38, 43), it is possible that the editorial marking off of these five discourses is intended as a contrast with the Pentateuch, or Five Books of Moses (Gen. to Deut.). In this way Jesus stands over against Moses as the giver of the New Law. Whether the fivefold division of the material is intended or not, the links and contrast between Jesus and the interpretation of Mosaic Law that seem to have been current in Jesus' time are explicit in Matthew 5:17-20. Although Paul asserts that "no human being will be justified in his [God's] sight by works of the law" (Rom. 3:20), Paul is in apparent agreement with Jesus that the Christian should and can fulfill what the Law justly requires (Rom. 8:4; Matt. 5:17).

The first cluster of sayings in the Sermon is widely known as the BEATITUDES (5:3-12), from the Latin word for blessed, beatus. In contrast to Luke's "Blessed are you poor" (Luke 6:20), Matthew quotes Jesus in such a way as to convert statements in which are depicted those who are in literal need (such as poverty or hunger) into general statements about spiritual or moral deprivation: "Blessed are the poor in spirit"; and "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness" (Matt. 5:3, 6). In each of Matthew's versions of the Beatitudes, there is a contrast between the present difficult spiritual conditions for the faithful and their future reward and vindication by God. It is those presently experiencing oppression or difficulties who already share in the Kingdom. The Greek term makarios means much more than "happy," although several modern translations render it that way. It implies, rather, a special condition of humans beings as a result of their close relationship to God, through which they are privileged beneficiaries of God's actions. The last two Beatitudes, however (Matt. 5:10-11), warn of suffering and persecution "for righteousness' sake" and "on my account," so that the blessed state of the faithful includes courage to endure suffering and even martyrdom, rather than a life of tranquil withdrawal. They are urged to fulfill their mission: as "salt of the earth" and as "light of the world," they are to give taste and seasoning to life and to share the light of God's grace with others (5:13-16).

Next in the Sermon comes an extended section in which Jesus shows what attitude his followers should take toward the Law of Moses. His outlook is phrased in a series of contrasts with the then-current views among Jews, especially those of the Pharisees (5:17-48). Linking the Law and the Prophets (5:17), Jesus declares that it is his mission from God to bring to fulfillment the scriptural demands, not to do away with them. Indeed, not the smallest letter (iota) or punctuation mark (dot) in Scripture will disappear until all its demands and promises have been realized.

The charge against the Pharisees and those who spend their time in interpretation of the Scriptures ("scribes") is not that they are too strict, but that through pretended piety they evade the true obligations laid down in Scripture (5:19-20). From the specific examples that follow, however, it is clear that what Jesus is demanding is not simple, literal conformity to the Law. What is demanded by him is not merely avoidance of murder, but taking the initiative in reconciliation with those with whom one is in conflict (5:21-26); not simple abstinence from adultery, but self-discipline to root out even the inclination to sexual promiscuity (5:27-30). Divorce, though allowed by the Law (Deut. 24:1), is not to be practiced, except in case of infidelity on the part of one's spouse (5:31-32). Oaths are to be avoided in favor of direct, unequivocal statements (5:33-37). Retaliation is to be replaced by initiative toward one's antagonist by acting in generosity toward those who abuse or threaten. What Jesus here represents God as expecting from people is nothing less than complete obedience to God's will (5:38-48).

On the three aspects of piety that seem to have been especially important for Jews in the first century—almsgiving, fasting, and prayer—Jesus has demanding requirements. Alms are to be given solely out of personal, human concern, never as a means of gaining public recognition of one's generosity (6:1-4). Similarly, prayer is grounded in one's personal commitment to God's will and must include an appeal for sensitivity concerning injustices done to others (6:5-15). Fasting is a form of private discipline, rather than a pious mode of showing off (6:16-18). In this section, the so-called LORD'S PRAYER appears in a version that reflects how it had developed as a liturgical form, in contrast to Luke's much simpler version (compare Luke 11:2-4).

The rest of the Sermon concerns questions of personal values: whether one's top priority is the accumulation of transitory earthly treasures or the devotion of one's energies to works of mercy that will be rewarded by God (6:19-21); whether the light of the knowledge of God is allowed to illumine the whole of one's inner life (6:22-23); whether the final standard in life is God's will or the acquiring of wealth (6:24); whether one lives life in total reliance upon God's purpose or is preoccupied with anxieties about appearances, achievements, and acquisitions (6:25-34); whether one devotes time and energy in criticism of others or to self-examination (7:1-5). What is called for is unconditional reliance upon God (7:7-11), which involves treating others as one would want to be treated (7:12), self-discipline in preparation for entering the life of the age to come (7:13-14), discernment so as to differentiate false from true agents of God (7:15-20), and active devotion to doing God's will (7:21-23). Only the adoption of these values will enable one to withstand the difficulties of life and the divine judgments that will bring this age to a close (7:24-27). The Sermon graphically describes what are the privileges and the costs of discipleship for those who see in Jesus the agent for the coming of God's Rule.

SERPENT. A scaly, limbless, elongate reptile of the genus Serpentes.

In various religions the serpent is widely used as a symbol of both beneficent and hostile supernatural and sacred power. With the Canaanites, the symbol for disruptive and destructive chaos was the dragon. Figurines of Asherah, the fertility goddess, are often draped with snake representations, as were her altars also. Nehushtan, the name of the bronze serpent destroyed by King Hezekiah (II Kings 18:4), may have been the name of a Canaanite serpent-nature deity. In the Hebrew wilderness wanderings, the Israelites encountered deadly "fiery serpents" (Num. 21:6-8). To counteract their poison, Moses made a brazen or BRONZE SERPENT (Num. 21:9), which is said to have been preserved. (For a Christian reference to the bronze serpent, see John 3:14.)

In Palestine, especially in the Negeb, snakes are common, thirty species being known. A small number of these are poisonous, a few deadly. The situation was probably much the same in biblical times. Snakes were abhorrent to writers of the Bible. They viewed serpents as dangerous and vicious. This is reflected in the record of Moses' use in Pharaoh's court of a rod that became a serpent and then a rod again (Exod. 4:3; 7:9-15). Snakes have sharp tongues (Ps. 140:3) in which is poison (Ps. 58:4); they bite (Prov. 23:32; Eccl. 10:11) and follow mysterious ways (Prov. 30:19).

The serpent in the Garden of Eden narrative (Gen. 3:1, 2, 4, 13, 14) is well informed and most crafty (Matt. 23:33), as well as critical of the Creator. He tempts Eve successfully but, in the end, loses his place in paradise (Gen. 3:14-15). In postexilic thought, when SATAN came to be considered responsible for all evil in the world, the Genesis serpent was understood either as an agent of Satan or Satan himself. This is most graphically expressed in Revelation 12:9-15; 20:2.

SERPENT, BRONZE. See BRONZE SERPENT.

SERVANT OF THE LORD. A title assigned to the highly idealized figure whose career is portrayed in four "Servant Songs" within Second Isaiah.

The Servant Songs. Displaying a vocabulary and message largely representative of Second Isaiah, these lyrics presumably encompass Isaiah 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; and 52:13-53:12. Yahweh speaks in 42:1-4, and depicts the servant as God's chosen agent who faithfully extends justice to the nations. The servant speaks in 49:1-6. He discloses his prenatal divine appointment. Confidence in Yahweh has overtaken his despair about obstacles so that he might pursue a universal mission benefiting distant peoples and Israel. As a light mediating salvation "to the end of the earth" (49:6), his identity is puzzling. He is charged with returning Israel to God (49:5), but the servant designation is also attached to Israel itself (49:3).

The servant speaks in 50:4-9. He declares that having been taught daily by Yahweh, he teaches others. Though forced to endure shame, he resolutely pursues his mission and confidently anticipates divine vindication. Yahweh and the nations speak in 52:13-53:12. Yahweh announces the future exaltation of God's innocent servant. Looking on this disfigured "man of sorrows" (53:3), astonished nations declare, "He was wounded for our transgressions" (53:5). Giving his life as a sin offering for many, the servant will know that in his endeavors, Yahweh's will has triumphed.

The Servant's Identity. (1) As an individual. While consensus is impossible, various proposals have recognized the servant's individual, corporate, and quasi-corporate existence. The servant's striking personal characteristics have led to his identification with known historical persons (for example, Moses, Jeremiah, Cyrus), the ideal monarch (Messiah), and Second Isaiah himself. But no known historical figure fits the servant's description completely, though the law-giving Moses and tormented Jeremiah are sometimes recalled. Moreover, suffering coordinates poorly with the messianic office. If referring to himself, Second Isaiah appears grossly immodest.

(2) As Israel. Perhaps the servant symbolizes the nation Israel. The two are equated in 49:3. Outside these lyrics, Second Isaiah applies the servant label to Israel (42:19; 43:10; 48:20). The nation itself is regarded as Yahweh's agent of universal righteousness and salvation chosen from the womb and equipped with God's spirit. Also in the servant's humiliation, Israel might perceive its own humiliation in Babylonian exile. This interpretation is likewise problematic. The servant Israel is deaf and blind to Yahweh's purpose (42:19). Israel often meets suffering with complaint. And significantly, the servant is charged to return Israel to Yahweh (49:5).

(3) As individual and nation. The coalescence of individual and corporate realities in Hebrew thinking may apply here. If Abraham embodies Israel (51:2), why not the servant? Perhaps Second Isaiah sketched the servant figure with deliberate fluidity. Accordingly, the servant is the called people of Yahweh, its faithful remnant purged through Babylonian exile, and, notably in the fourth servant song, an individual representing the nation. This interpretation may be the most viable, for it properly esteems the capacity of these lyrics to portray the true Israel and the true Israelite as radically engaged in Yahweh's redemptive world mission.

SERVETUS, MICHAEL (1511-53). Learned Spanish physician and early UNITARIAN. After studying at Saragossa and Toulouse, Servetus's study of the Bible led him to deny a fundamental tenet of the classic doctrine of the Trinity, that is, that the Son was eternal with the Father. After studying medicine in Paris, he was physician to the archbishop of Vienne for twelve years (1541-53), during which time he carried on a secret correspondence with JOHN CALVIN. After Servetus published his repudiation of the Trinity, the divinity of Christ, the cult of the saints, purgatory, and predestination, he was imprisoned by the Vienne Inquisition. He escaped to Geneva, where Calvin, who had violently disagreed with him, had him arrested. Tried for denying the Trinity and infant baptism, both capital offenses under the Justinian Code, he was burned at the stake as a heretic. (See also SOCINIANS). W. G.

SESSION. In the polity of PRESBYTERIAN and REFORMED churches, the session is the lowest court in the denomination, concerned with the oversight of a particular congregation and made up of elders, including the minister. The elders, as representatives of the people, along with the pastor, are responsible for the nurture and discipline of the congregation. Both ministers and elders are ordained for life, although there is a recognized distinction in ordination to the pulpit ministry. The end to which ordination is directed determines the character of the rite. Sometimes ministers are referred to as teaching elders and the others as ruling elders. The elder has been regarded as a representative of the people, though not appointed by or responsible to the people in the ordering of church affairs. R. H.

SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA. In Revelation, the city of ROME, built on seven hills (17:9), symbolizes the anti-Christian character of the Roman Empire and its emperor worship. Seven is the Hebrew number that symbolizes completeness. Thus the churches in seven cities of the province of Asia symbolize the conquering power of Christ and of his ecumenical church over all evil. The seven cities are:

(1) Ephesus—an economic, postal, and administrative center of the province. The site of a temple of Artemis or Diana.

(2) Smyrna—second most important city and seaport of Asia.

(3) Pergamum—cultural and religious center.

(4) Thyatira—in the province of Lydia, renowned for its purple dye industry (Acts 16:14).

(5) Sardis—political, commercial river city with a noted temple of Artemis.

(6) Philadelphia—joined by river and road to Sardis.

(7) Laodicea—commercial and industrial center on the international highway from Ephesus to the Orient. P.L.G.

SEVEN CHURCHES OF ROME. See the place-names.

SEVEN DEADLY SINS. See CARDINAL SINS/CARDINAL VIRTUES.

SEVEN GIFTS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT. A list derived from Romans 12:6-8. The seven gifts are: prophecy, service, teaching, exhortation, liberality, zeal, and mercy with cheerfulness. Comparable lists are found in I Corinthians 12:8-10, with nine items; I Corinthians 12:28-30, with eight items; and Ephesians 4:11, with five items. (See also Isa. 11:2.)

SEVEN LAST WORDS. The phrase describes the seven statements made by Jesus from the cross, as recorded in the Gospels. It is impossible to place the statements in precise chronological order because they derive from different narratives. In the traditional order listed below the first three sayings concern other people at the scene; the last four concern Jesus' own mission.

"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Luke 23:24). In his hour of intense suffering Jesus prays for his oppressors—both the Roman soldiers and all who had a part in the Crucifixion.

"Truly, I say to you, today you will be with me in Paradise" (Luke 23:43). One among several views of the afterlife in Judaism understood paradise (an elaborate garden or park) to be the realm where the souls of the righteous go at death. Jesus mediates forgiveness to the repentant criminal crucified near him.

"Woman, behold, your son!" "Behold, your mother!" (John 19:26-27). Jesus demonstrates his filial concern for his mother by entrusting her to the care of the beloved disciple.

"Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani? My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Mark 15:34; Matt. 27:46). Jesus quotes the Aramaic version of Psalm 22:1, which becomes both his cry of abandonment by the Father and his confession of faith in the midst of suffering.

"I thirst" (John 19:28). Jesus' final request is itself a fulfillment of the Scriptures (see Ps. 69:21).

"It is finished" (John 19:30). Jesus, thoroughly obedient to the Father's will, utters a cry of completion and so of victory. God's plan is accomplished.

"Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit!" (Luke 23:46). This committal of himself to God evokes from a nearby centurion a testimony to Jesus' innocence.

SEVEN PENITENTIAL PSALMS. See PENITENTIAL PSALMS.

SEVEN/SEVENTH/SEVENTY. The Hebrew people's interest in mathematics was ordinarily in utilitarian arithmetic. For anything beyond that, the systems developed in Egypt and/or Mesopotamia were available. As in those older cultures certain NUMBERS had symbolic significance beyond numbers as such, indeed, perhaps as all numbers once had. Seven, seventh, and seventy, together with their multiples, have been called "sacred" numbers by reason of their relation to the furnishings and decorations of the tabernacle and Temple (Ezek. 40:22, 26; Exod. 25:31-37; I Kings 6:38; 7:17; 8:2; Zech. 4:2, 10). In Egypt, seven was a holy number in religion, magic, and medicine. In Mesopotamia, where the seven-day week was developed, seven is found in reference to religious festivals and observances, perhaps related to the seven planets known to that culture.

In the Bible, seven was associated with vengeance and punishment (Lev. 26:18; Dan. 4:16, 23, 25), with angels (Ezek. 9:2; Zech. 4:10*b*; Rev. 15:1, 6-8), with evil spirits and infirmities (Luke 8:2; 11:26), with healings (II Kings 5:10), with the ideal number of sons (Ruth 4:15; Job 1:2; II Macc. 7; Acts 19:14), with famine and years of great plenty (Gen. 41:26-27; II Kings 8:1), and with wedding festivals and defilements (Lev. 15:19, 28; Num. 19:11, 14, 16).

Matthew's genealogy of Jesus is divided into three sections of fourteen (7 x 2) generations (Matt. 1:1-17). Seventy is also often used as an approximate number (Gen. 50:3; Luke 10:1, 17). The forgiveness to be given seventy times seven times, which Jesus recommended, means an undetermined, large number (Matt. 18:22).

There are numerous sets of seven items in both the OT and the NT: seven qualities of the Lord's Spirit in people (Isa. 11:2); the seven petitions of the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:9-13); Christ's post-Resurrection appearance to seven disciples (John 21:2); and SEVEN GIFTS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT (Rom. 12:6-8).

The Revelation uses seven throughout the book beginning with letters to the SEVEN CHURCHES (chaps. 2-3). Seven marks the culmination of a series, as in the seventh seal (8:1), the seventh trumpeter (11:15), and the seventh bowl (16:17). It is difficult to identify a single symbolic meaning for the numerous usages of seven, but perhaps "completeness" comes closest. (See also TWELVE.)

SEVEN VIRTUES. According to Roman Catholic moral theology, the four CARDINAL VIRTUES: prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance, plus the three THEOLOGICAL VIRTUES or supernatural gifts: faith, hope, and charity (that is, love). The concept of virtue means the perfection of something, a state, condition, or habitual mode of thinking and action. A virtue is a lasting disposition of the soul, aiming its powers toward good. As opposed to vice, a virtue is a good habit—not an action—for it is the intention and tendency of one's thoughts and habits that are virtuous or not virtuous. There are intellectual virtues or perfections of the mind, including wisdom, understanding, and knowledge, along with prudence and artfulness in action. However, the four cardinal virtues are the basis for all righteous action and for the practice of religion. These moral virtues relate to our duties as people and only indirectly to God. They are infused in the soul just as the three theological virtues are, that is, they are supernatural gifts that perfect our natural powers, and do not arise out of human habits and the repetition of good acts. They are infused, given directly by God. The infused theological virtues enable people to attain their final aim, to become one with God, and members of God's kingdom. J.C.

SEVEN WORKS OF MERCY. Traditionally, in the Roman Catholic church, the good works to which Christians, and particularly the religious and priests, should devote themselves. These include the conversion of sinners, the instruction of the ignorant, the counseling of the wavering and doubting, the comfort of the sorrowful, bearing ills patiently, forgiving wrongs, and praying for the living and the dead. The seven works of mercy are also known as the spiritual works of mercy. J.C.

SEX. A biological phenomenon, an adaptation of the physical structures of living beings to enable and enhance the reproduction of the species and thus the continuation of life itself. What began as a biological development and fundamentally natural activity has become, in every age and culture, a generating point for customs, traditions, moral codes, religious beliefs, and the great themes of literature, drama, music, and art.

Sex among the peoples of the Bible, which reports human experiences from about 1800 B.C. to A.D. 150, as among all peoples everywhere in all ages, was more than the relief of physical tension, engagement in pleasure, or even the creation of new life. Rather sex and its expression became the framework for the organization of social life and a mainstay of moral codes.

It is natural and reasonable to expect that such a deep human drive, and biological necessity, should form a major component of religious concern, thought, law, and symbolism. When we consider the wide area of religious activity in the world and point out the sexual elements in religious life everywhere, the expectation is more than met. Religions have honored sex, denigrated sex, encouraged sex, forbade sex, regulated sex, even worshiped the Divine through sex. From the polygamy of the Hebrew patriarchs and the early Mormons to the strict monogamy of the early Christian church to the sacred prostitution of Baal worship in Canaan that infiltrated Hebrew worship itself, sex is a paramount theme in religion, the Bible, and theology. This article will consider sex in three parts: in religion generally, in the Bible (first in the OT, then in the NT), and in Christian theology, as it has historically developed. In the case of the Bible and theology, the negative influence of the prophetic reaction against the lure of Baalism in ancient Israel must be especially noted.

Sex in Religion: Ancient. Much of early religion developed as an explanation of natural phenomena (why do some things happen?) and elaborated rituals to influence or control the necessary conditions for life. This is called etiology and is illustrated in the story of the Fall (Gen. 3), when the pain of childbirth and feminine sexual attraction to the male are explained as the result of sin. Ancient people entertained a belief in life after death and in the essential "livingness" of all that is—fields, stones, hills, trees. This ANIMISM or spiritism explains why trees were prayed to, why food and weapons were placed in the grave with the dead, and why sexual intercourse was often practiced in fields soon after planting. Such a practice illustrates "sympathetic magic," that is, it aims to encourage the spirits or gods also to have intercourse and so make the fields fertile. These beliefs and practices seem to have been spread worldwide, and such beliefs played a strong role in Israelite history after the invasion of Canaan in the thirteenth century B.C.

Sex, in animism, was identified clearly with life—the power of life itself. It was, therefore, closely monitored. Taboos against intercourse at various times, for example, before battle, during a woman's menstrual period, or at holy seasons, developed. This belief system, for example, that sexual intercourse before a sports competition is ill-advised, still exists in developed countries today.

Because sex was identified so closely with the power of life, the sexual organs were often objects of veneration, if not outright worship. While the representation of the male phallus (penis) figures in ancient (as well as modern) Hindu rituals, the female breasts and vulva play an even larger role. Throughout Europe and the Middle East many examples of female sex worship (or "the Mother Goddess") are found. These take their name from an early discovery in Germany, "the Venus of Wilhelmsdorf." "Venus" is a crude, almost round lump with exaggerated large breasts and buttocks and a clearly defined vulva. There is no neck, head, arms, or legs, just a torso.

But sex seen as so powerful caused opposite reactions as well. CELIBACY, the restraint of the sexual impulse, also played a role in ancient religion (and still is practiced today). Here the retention of strength was the dominating idea. The identification of spiritual power and wisdom with celibacy, and its association with the priest, may stem from this idea.

Much has been written recently about possible matriarchal (mother dominated) societies in ancient times. Some tribal peoples in the past had some such system, which explains the Amazon myth among the Greeks. However, the widespread worship of "the Mother Goddess" (Venus), which probably forms the background of most Mesopotamian religion, and that of the Canaanites, was found along with patriarchal (father dominated) societies. The real interest of Jew and Christian in the sexual elements of ancient religion lies precisely here, in the religious matrix of the Mesopotamian and Canaanite areas, into which the people of the Exodus came, bearing Yahweh worship and Yahweh's Sinaitic covenant. The bald facts are that the Canaanites worshiped the Mother Goddess, engaged in sexual practices in their religion (including sacred "prostitution," which was actually priestly, not profane, work), and the Canaanites were a patriarchal society.

Sex in the Bible: Old Testament. The Hebrews who appear in history symbolized by Abraham (probably the eighteenth century B.C.) wandered in Canaan for generations, then at least some of them entered Egypt. Perhaps some Hebrews (or "river crossers," that is, nomads) regularly wandered from Canaan and the Sinai into Egypt. These nomads were patriarchal (male dominated) and polygamous (one man, many wives) and also held lesser wives or concubines. Many stories illustrating all these practices are found in Genesis and throughout the Pentateuch as well as in Judges and in the historical books, I and II Samuel and I and II Kings. Since they were nomads, the earliest (or proto-) Hebrews seemed immune from Canaanite sex (BAAL) worship. The story of Joseph, tempted by the Egyptian's wife, shows the high moral standards (with a polygamous world view) that characterize not only the Hebrews but the nomadic peoples of the Middle East in general.

After the Exodus (probably thirteenth century B.C.) and the Sinai wandering, the Hebrews probably joined the (first in Sinai, later in Canaan) other clans and tribes of "Hebrews" and began a long struggle of attrition against the Canaanite (and Philistine) city-states already in place in the area. This was a difficult struggle as the Canaanites were far more technologically advanced. For centuries (the period of the Judges) the Hebrews occupied the rough hilly sections and were kept out of the fertile valleys and the Canaanite cities that guarded them. As long as this was the case the Hebrews retained a comparatively pure worship of Yahweh. But, over time, they acquired bronze, and then iron weapons and great war chiefs, and conquered Canaanite and Philistine cities. Settling into an urban life-style (under Saul and David), the Hebrews culturally assimilated the Canaanite agriculture, architecture, literature, technology, and many religious practices. Here Baal and the ASHTORETH—the golden bulls and sacred poles that represented fertility—entered Hebrew religion in force. The stories of Solomon building Temples to foreign gods in Jerusalem, to satisfy his many foreign-born wives, illustrate this development. Later, after the breakup of Solomon's kingdom on his death in 931 B.C., the prophet Hosea, writing in the northern kingdom, Israel, portrayed sacred PROSTITUTION as part of the temple worship in Samaria. All the prophets in Judah as well identify the Hebrews (and later, the Jews, in the remaining southern kingdom) as adulterous, meaning idolatrous, as they forsook Yahweh, Israel's true husband, for the Baals.

It was this experience of the dilution of Yahweh worship with Baalism and its pansexuality, under Canaanite cultural influences, that led to the most negative attitudes toward sex and sexuality, and toward women and feminine sexuality in particular, among the Jews (that is, those Hebrews who survived the defeat of the nation and exile in 586 B.C.). This negative reaction to Baalism also is read back into the patriarchal stories and the law codes included in the Pentateuch as the Pentateuch and the historical books were reworked and brought into their present state during and after the Babylonian exile (ended in 538 B.C.).

With this in mind, we may examine examples of sexuality and regulations on sexual conduct in the OT.

Marriage. The patriarchs were polygamous, and indeed, polygamy was not banned among Jews until A.D. 1030, by Rabbi Gershom ben Judah. Christians who adopted the monogamy of the Greeks and Romans in the first century A.D. thereby signaled their break with Judaism. Marriages were arranged by parents and generally were businesslike affairs. However, love could be present as in Jacob and Rachel's match (Gen. 29:1-35).

Concubines. Although a man could have as many wives as he could support (later the Talmud, and still later, the Qur'an, limited this to four wives), he could also have lesser wives or CONCUBINES. Concubines were not prostitutes but members of the FAMILY circle.

Prostitution. Commercial prostitution was practiced by non-Israelites in the cities and towns of Canaan and throughout the Middle East. Prostitutes served the nomadic foreigners who traveled from place to place. In earlier times, they were not without some recognized social standing (Deut. 23:17-18).

Sex Outside of Marriage. FORNICATION was not looked upon as negatively as ADULTERY. The major restriction on such activity was that it could render a young woman unmarriageable. If the man married the woman, all was well. If not, a fine would be levied by the courts (Exod. 22:16-17).

Masturbation. This was considered an unnatural act, since the life force—here the semen—was wasted. Perhaps this was condemned so harshly because of its possible connection with Baal worship or with homosexuality.

Homosexuality (Male). This was condemned because it apparently was connected with Baal worship. Guilds of male cult prostitutes (called "dogs" by the OT writers) were known at cult shrines, perhaps including Samaria and Jerusalem. Once again, this practice was seen as wasting the life force and was unholy as well as unnatural. There is no factual basis for the recent claim that the OT condemned HOMOSEXUALITY because it was connected with degrading prisoners taken in war. Rape of women was usual in war.

(Female). Female homosexuality seems unknown in the OT. It is not condemned. This probably is the case because of the situation of many wives in a harem as well as because the practice involved no loss of the life force (semen) and contained no danger of illegitimate offspring to threaten the family line.

Divorce. This was allowed by ancient Hebrew law (Deut. 24:1-4), but it is mentioned only in the sermon attributed to Moses in Deuteronomy (a later document); it is not specifically mentioned in the Covenant Code, Exodus 21-23. The Hebrews did practice DIVORCE, which was initiated by the husband, not the wife. The wife had no power to refuse the divorce once the husband wrote out a letter of dismissal and gave it to her (Deut. 24:3-4), and the husband could not take her back if she remarried. (Consequently, remarriage after divorce was allowed for both men and women by the ancient Hebrews.) Isaiah 50:1 and Jeremiah 3:8 both mention decrees or bills of divorce.

Bestiality. Sexual contact with animals was severely condemned as unnatural, a waste of the life force and an affront to human dignity, which represents the image of God (Exod. 22:19; Deut. 27:21).

Adultery. This was condemned specifically in the Decalogue at Sinai (Exod. 20:14). The integrity of the family was jeopardized by such conduct. A man could not be sure that his son was really his son if his wife was unfaithful. Economic and social conditions within a patriarchal society dictated this rigidly enforced law. Adultery breaks up the family, not just the marriage.

Incest. Sex between parents and children, among siblings, and among close relatives was not unknown (Gen. 19:30-38). Indeed, Lot is said to have had intercourse with his daughters, although this may reflect an earlier Middle Eastern story taken over by the Hebrews (Deut. 22:30). Incest was condemned.

Levirate Marriage. Because of the strong patriarchal stress on family and the veneration of ancestors (the patriarchs), a cult of the dead arose. If a man died without sons, the OT law held that his brother must take the dead brother's wife and beget sons, who would be counted as the sons of the dead brother (Deut. 25:5-10; compare Num. 27:1-11). They could then venerate their "father" on the appropriate anniversaries and holy days. The prophets later criticized ancestor veneration, which was common to the Orient and best known in China and Japan.

Sex in the Bible: New Testament. Since the NT's earliest writings date from shortly before A.D. 50 (Paul's earliest letters) and originated in the cosmopolitan Roman Empire, and later writings (for example, Luke-Acts, as well as all of Paul's letters and the other letters attributed to Paul) also consciously were produced with audiences in Greece, Asia Minor, and even Italy (Romans) in mind, it is natural that the NT attitude toward sex reflects the most moral attitudes of Greco-Roman society.

Like the OT, the NT considers sex good. It is not denigrated, although its expression is regulated. Through Paul, as well as Jesus, many of the Jewish attitudes and background beliefs (for example, the sacred quality of semen, in the prohibitions against anything but male-female contact within marriage were preserved. However, two developments, neither foreign to Judaism in Judea in the first century A.D., are explicitly brought out in the NT: monogamy (I Tim. 3:2, 12; Tit. 1:6) and the beginnings of celibacy (I Cor. 7). In both of these developments, Paul—and his disciples who probably wrote the Pastoral Letters in his name—led the way. In one other area, the NT also departs from the OT, in the matter of divorce. According to a probably genuine Jesus tradition Jesus forbade divorce. Of course, other evangelists softened this prohibition, adding “except for adultery” (Matt. 5:31-32; 19:8-9; Luke 16:18; compare Mark 10:2, 4).

Paul was inclined toward celibacy, which is demonstrated in several clear passages (I Cor. 7:1, 6-9, 25-40). Of course, the reason for this teaching (which he was willing to relax for those not able to bear it—I Cor. 7:8-9, 36-38) was Paul’s earlier belief in the imminent return of the Lord to judge the earth. Since the last days were upon the Christians, it was better to concentrate all one’s energies on evangelism and prayer rather than on starting a family. There are strong indications that Paul later modified his eschatology, and it is certain that his disciples did, and also the subapostolic church, during the period the NT was being written. Paul’s disciples, in the Pastoral Letters, clearly state the early church’s monogamous tradition: A bishop must be “the husband of one wife” (Tit. 1:6). In later centuries, under the influence of Stoic and Neoplatonic ideas that stressed asceticism, celibacy would become more and more recommended for the higher clergy. However, clerical celibacy for all was not the rule in the early and even medieval church, as the Greek Orthodox custom of allowing a man to marry as long as he gives up all hope of becoming a bishop (who must be celibate) shows.

Christian Theological Developments. No discussion of the NT’s attitude toward sex would be complete without mention of the VIRGIN BIRTH narratives in Matthew and Luke and the resulting stress on the virginity of Mary. It must be borne in mind that Mark begins with Jesus’ baptism, John begins with the Logos hymn followed by Jesus’ baptism by John the Baptist, and Paul nowhere shows any knowledge of the virgin birth story.

The virgin birth account (Luke 1:26-38; Matt. 1:18-25) undoubtedly reflects an influence from the larger Greco-Roman world. Although much of the birth narrative is grounded (as is the Passion narrative) in a creative weaving together of OT passages, virgin births play no part in Hebrew religion. The passage in Isaiah 7:14 KJV, “Behold a virgin shall conceive . . .” (see Luke 1:27), has been conclusively shown to be mistranslated by the Septuagint (LXX) translators in the second century B.C. The Hebrew word almah, translated as parthenos in the LXX and in the NT, actually means “young woman,” not “virgin.” Almah is even used to refer to young women who were prostitutes, so nothing pertaining to sexual status other than being a young female is implied in the word. The NT narrative rests, at least here, on a mistranslation.

The concept of virgin birth, however, stems from the Egyptian and Middle Eastern tendency to divinize rulers and heroes. Legends arose, for example, that Alexander the Great was born of a virgin. Of course, after receiving divine honors upon his conquest of Egypt, Alexander considered himself a god. Something of the same corruption by popular religion in Asia Minor, Egypt, and the Middle East later affected the Roman emperors. In all events, the virgin birth doctrine spread in Christianity under the influence of Neoplatonism, a form of idealism that depreciated the material world, including the body. The same influence encouraged ASCETICISM, which was strong in Egypt by the late third century, as well as celibacy. The councils of the church that drew up the orthodox creeds had to combat this influence (which was a large part of the Gnostic movement) and undergird the real humanity of Jesus, so that his “perfect manhood” would not be swallowed up in his divinity. Interestingly, most of the great heresies attacked by the Nicene Creed were those that denied the full humanity of Jesus, not (as Fundamentalism implies) attacks on Jesus’ divinity. The stress on the virgin birth, as well as the influence of Neoplatonism and the rise of Gnostic systems (as in Arianism), made such heresies probably inevitable.

The growing cult of the BLESSED VIRGIN MARY resulted in her confirmation as “Theotokos,” the “God-bearer” or “the Mother of God” by the orthodox ecumenical councils. Over time, Mary became more and more prominent in the personal piety of the people, especially among women. In particular, after Christianity became a favored—and later the official—religion in the Roman Empire, devotion to Mary spread as the church crowded out the pagan shrines devoted to Isis or other Greek or Roman representations of the Mother Goddess (“the Earth Mother” or Venus). In this way, the FEMININE element that was ruthlessly criticized by the prophets and suppressed by the reforms of Ezra and the priests of the Second Temple (after the Exile and return, 538 B.C.) came back, in purified form, into popular Christianity. During the medieval period devotion to Mary spread and became more and more institutionalized. The Protestant Reformers removed all Mariolatry from the evangelical churches while affirming the ecumenical creeds with their emphasis on the virgin birth and on Mary as “Theotokos.”

In the twentieth century, the Roman Catholic church has both formally declared certain doctrines long held in popular piety to be the teachings of the church as well as, later, undergoing the thorough reformation of Vatican Council II (1962–65). It has, however, on a more conservative note, continued its theological objections to artificial birth control and to most abortions, as well as to homosexuality, despite more liberal developments among most mainline Protestants. The Neo-Fundamentalist movement of the past decade has stressed male dominant, anti-abortion positions in reaction to the major Protestant churches, mirroring the Catholic position.

SHADDAI. A divine term meaning "the mountain one" (assuming its derivation from the Akkadian word shadū ["mountain"]). It was linked with 'ēl, the dominant name for "god" in Semitic, to form 'ēl shadday. Ordinarily this compound is translated "God Almighty" in deference to an early rabbinic etymology ("self-sufficient").

The Priestly account of the call of Moses claims that in patriarchal times the Deity was known as "God Almighty" (Exod. 6:3). This name appears in Genesis 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; and 48:3, where it is associated with the covenant that the Deity establishes with Abraham's line. In Jacob's testament (Gen. 49:25) and Balaam's oracles (Num. 24:4, 16) it is situated in early poetic tradition. In Numbers 1:6, 12, within an ancient name list, the "Shaddai" element surfaces in the personal names Zurishaddai and Ammishaddai. "Shaddai" may locate the patriarchal EL in mountainous territory or associate EL's self-revelation with the mountain storm (congenial with Yahweh's stormy theophany on Sinai; Exod. 19). Accordingly, Shaddai resembles Hadad, the Amorite storm god.

In later usage, "Shaddai" and "Yahweh" were sometimes synonymous (Ruth 1:20–21; Pss. 68:14; 91:1; Ezek. 1:24; 10:5). For Job, however, this name so highlighted divine omnipotence that it transcended uniquely Israelite connotations. It appears thirty-one times in Job. With one exception (II Cor. 6:18), its Greek counterpart, PANTOKRATOR, is limited to the book of Revelation (for example, 1:8; 11:17; 21:22).

J.K.K.

SHADRACH, MESHACH, ABEDNEGO. Daniel's three companions whose Babylonian names always occur together (Dan. 1:7; 2:49; 3:12–30).

The names conferred on these youths by Nebuchadnezzar's chief eunuch replaced their Hebrew names (Hananiah, Mishael, Azariah) compounded with -el ("God") and -iah ("Yahweh"). Jews in foreign service were customarily assigned foreign names. These new names presumably distort those of Babylonian gods. Perhaps in "Shadrach" and "Meshach" a fractured form of the name "Marduk" (Babylon's patron deity) is concealed. "Abednego" is a corruption of "Abdi-nabu," meaning "servant of Nabu" (Babylonian wisdom deity).

The story of DANIEL's companions deservedly stands within a larger narrative collection (Dan. 1–6) designed to buttress the faith of Palestinian Jews suffering under Seleucid oppression around 165 B.C. Their courageous fidelity to Jewish tradition is exemplary. As "youths without blemish, handsome and skilful in all wisdom . . . and competent to serve in the king's palace" (1:4), they and Daniel abstain from eating the king's food, which fails to meet Jewish dietary regulations. Yet after a ten-day fare of vegetables and water, they appear healthier than Nebuchadnezzar's other trainees (1:15). And their divinely given wisdom eclipses that of Babylon's court magicians (1:20).

Without mention of Daniel, chapter 3 reports that the youths would rather be thrust into a furnace than worship the king's golden image. Their reply to Nebuchadnezzar demonstrates that they rate religious integrity above concern for personal safety (3:17–18). Astonished that the divinely protected youths are completely spared from the fire, the king commands their release, legitimizes their religion, and rewards them with regal advancement (3:26–30).

al-SHAFI'I (767–820). The first great systematizer of Islamic law and founder of one of its four major schools. Though born at Gaza in Palestine, he was a member of the clan to which MUHAMMAD belonged, and his mother took him to Mecca to be educated. After finishing the mosque school there he lived with a Bedouin tribe and learned a pure form of Arabic that distinguished all his speaking and writing.

Since Islam is a comprehensive system, touching on all aspects of life, law is also comprehensive. Al-Shafi'i carefully studied the two schools of law already existing and tried to go beyond them and provide a truly scientific approach to law.

He taught that there are four sources of Islamic law. The most important is the QUR'AN, the words of God. Next is the practice of Muhammed, as preserved in the HADITH (traditions). Since not all questions can be answered from these two sources, he also recognized the importance of laws agreed on by the consensus of the Muslim community as expressed by the jurists. And finally, he affirmed the validity of reasoning by analogy to existing laws. He believed that in this way a scholar could reach conclusions that avoided the errors that result from relying only on individual opinions.

In A.D. 815 (year 199 of the Muslim era) al-Shafi'i moved to Egypt. Many hailed him as the restorer of Islam, whom God had promised to send at the beginning of each new century.

SHAKERS. The United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Coming, or the Millennial church, traces its lineage back to the French Camisards who proclaimed illumination of the Holy Spirit and a return to NT simplicity. Their beliefs were taken up by the Shaking QUAKERS, whose leaders James and Jane Wardley were instrumental in the conversion of Ann Lee Stanley. Persecuted and imprisoned for her beliefs, "Mother" Ann and at least seven followers emigrated to America in 1774. In New York City she and her husband encountered marital problems and separated. She had borne him four children, but they all died in infancy.

The Shakers regrouped in 1776 near Albany and organized a Christian socialistic community. In 1779 they were joined by a group of New Light Baptists. They grew rapidly with converts from the Second GREAT AWAKENING, particularly CANE RIDGE, and by 1830 numbered more than six thousand in nineteen settlements in eight states.

They were intensely biblical, millennial, revivalistic; universalists, perfectionists, and spiritualists. They regarded Ann Lee as a female incarnation of Jesus. Their worship featured personal testimony, group dancing, and speaking in tongues (GLOSSOLALIA). A period of enthusiasm (1837-45) included séances and visions. Their celibate and segregated communities were models of male-female equality and functional efficiency which is evident in their highly prized furniture. They are credited with the invention of the buzz saw and nail cutter (both invented by women), the screw, propeller, rotary harrow, clothes pins, apple parer, and the threshing machine.

SHALMANESER. The name of five kings of the Assyrian Empire.

The objective of this empire's southward expansion was Egypt. The small kingdoms of Syria-Palestine, among them Israel and Judah, had first to be brought under submission. ASSYRIA deserved its reputation for savage and brutal warfare, yet it developed an imperial administration that more closely interrelated its world and was a model for the subsequent empires of Persia, Greece, and Rome.

(1) Shalmaneser I (1274-1245 B.C.), son of Adad-nirari I, began Assyria's rise to power. He founded and fortified Kalah.

(2) Shalmaneser II (1031-1020 B.C.) was not an active imperialist.

(3) Shalmaneser III (858-824 B.C.), son of Ashurnasirpal II, was the first Assyrian king to make direct contact with Israel. From his first year, he began what turned out to be three decades of almost yearly Assyrian campaigns in Syria-Palestine.

In 853 B.C. at Qarqar, Shalmaneser's army was confronted by a confederated army put together by kings of territories from Cilicia to Ammon. Shalmaneser recorded that the opposing army numbered 63,000 men, and that Ahab had supplied 10,000 foot soldiers and 2,000 chariots. Shalmaneser claimed the victory, but he withdrew from the area and did not come again for eight years. In 845 B.C. Shalmaneser returned with an immense army of 115,000 men; they defeated the king of Damascus at Mount Hermon.

In 841 B.C., the kings of Tyre and Sidon along with Jehu, the king of Israel, brought heavy tribute to Shalmaneser, the first of such payments made by the kings of Israel and Judah. This event is reported on Shalmaneser's Black Obelisk (in the British Museum), where Jehu is pictured groveling abjectly before Shalmaneser.

From 839 B.C. to 828 B.C., Shalmaneser was campaigning in northwest Syria. In 835 B.C., he waged a punitive raid on Damascus. He left his name and figure carved on a cliff beside Dog River, north of Beirut, Lebanon, and a record of his military exploits on the Balawat Gates (now in the British Museum).

(4) Shalmaneser IV (783-774 B.C.), son of Adad-nirari III. Throughout his reign, he was concerned with domestic affairs and defense against attack from nearer enemies. This was the Golden Era for Israel under Jeroboam II (786-746 B.C.) and for Judah under Uzziah (783-742 B.C.).

(5) Shalmaneser V (726-722 B.C.), son of TIGLATH-PILESER III, who, by the time of his conquest of Damascus in 732 B.C., had either defeated or received surrender from nearly all of the Syria-Palestine kingdoms. He had taken Gilead and much of Galilee and had exiled their people and put Hoshea on the throne of Israel as an Assyrian appointee. When Tiglath-pileser III died, Hoshea, with Egypt's backing, rebelled. Shalmaneser responded at once. In 725 B.C., he captured Shechem. The next year, he surrounded Samaria and took Hoshea prisoner. Samaria held out more than two years under siege. (Tyre's siege, at the same time, lasted five years.) Shalmaneser's records show that after he had destroyed the city in 722 B.C., he deported 27,290 people from Samaria and resettled them in such places as Gozan, Harran, Media, Halah, and Nineveh (II Kings 17:6). Whether Shalmaneser V died in battle or was murdered is not clear. His successor, Sargon II, claimed the victory over Samaria (see II Kings 17:1-6, 24). P.L.G.

SHALOM. Popularly translated from the Hebrew as "peace" and used in greeting or taking leave of someone. "Shalom," however, has little in common with its English equivalent. Shalom does not mean merely the absence of strife. It connotes totality, health, wholesomeness, harmony, success, and the completeness and richness of living in a wholesome social environment. When persons meet or part, they wish each other "shalom," or they inquire about each other's shalom. The ideal of peace is considered so important in Jewish tradition that the sages of old took Shalom to be one of the names of the Lord. L.K.

SHAMANISM. This term, derived through Russian from the Siberian Tungusic language, refers to a distinctive class of religious specialists, shamans, and their practices. Interpreted somewhat broadly, shamanism can be found among preliterate peoples in a wide variety of places. Its practitioners include not only Siberians, but also Native Americans, Eskimos, Native Australians, and tribalists of South and Southeast Asia. Shamanism survives in the popular religion of China, Korea, and Japan, where female shamans are most typical.

Shamanism is not itself a religion, but a pattern of roles and practices that can exist within the context of ANIMISM's belief in many spirits, both natural and ancestral, and usually belief also in a sacred cosmology with other realms where spirits and gods dwell and to which souls may depart. In this world the shaman emerges as a "man of power," able to control spirits and travel to the other spheres.

The most distinctive feature of shamanism is the specialist's call and initiation. Although sometimes shamanism is hereditary or learned through apprenticeship, characteristically the candidate is a young person of unstable or epileptic traits, who "hears voices" and seems beset by spirits. The person undergoes, either alone or with the help of a senior shaman, a strenuous initiation including isolation, visions, and mystical death and restructuring of mind and body. Through this process the person gains control of the spirits, being able now to use them as assistants in healing and marvelous flight.

Illness is commonly interpreted in shamanistic cultures as caused either by infestation of foreign evil or by separation of the sick person's soul from the body. In the first case the shaman may send his (or her) spirit aide into the body to identify the alien entity, then expel it by magical means. In the second the shaman may, entranced, journey far in search of the lost soul, then bring it back with great fanfare. For these scenarios the shaman typically wears elaborate garb, often ornamented with bells, mirrors, and feathers. The shaman employs a drum, and the performance may include such seemingly miraculous phenomena as spirit voices and the extraction of a visible noxious substance from the sick person's body. While on one level the performance may partly depend on ventriloquism and sleight of hand, undoubtedly it enables many patients to interpret the disease in a way congruent with their world view, to become assured a therapeutic process is underway, and to open themselves to healing energies. Shamans also serve as psychopomps, or guides of departed souls.

Shamanism has very ancient roots in human culture. Some authorities believe that the shamanistic experience played a major part in the emergence of human religion, and that much of human culture, including song, poetry, and art, has ultimate roots in the entranced utterances and the accoutrements of the shaman. Conversely, a residue of the shamanistic paradigm of call, initiation, healing power, and magical journeying can be seen in the myths and sacred biographies of later cultures. SHAMGAR. A non-Israelite who, before 1125 B.C., by a single exploit, delivered Israel from an enemy, killing six hundred of them with an "ox goad," a long pole tipped with metal (Judg. 3:31). The enemy was somewhat like the Philistines but did not likely have that name. Shamgar, a Hurrian name, is called Son of Anath, that is, from Beth-anath, a fortified Canaanite town in Galilee (Josh. 19:38; Judg. 1:33). The effect of Shamgar's heroism was to clear the roads temporarily of bandits and to make them safe for travelers and caravans (Judg. 5:6). Shamgar's story is comparable to Samson's (Judg. 15:14-16). His name is similar to Shammah, one of David's "mighty men" who also "slew the Philistines" (II Sam. 23:11-12). Shamgar is not said to have served Israel as a judge. P.L.G.

SHAMMAI. (1) In I Chronicles 2:28, 32, a descendant of Jerahmeel. His father was Onam and his sons were Nadab and Abishur. His brother was Jada. (2) First Chronicles 2:44-45 lists a Shammai as a descendant of Caleb. His father was Rekem and his son was Maon. (3) A descendant of Caleb, the son of Jehphunneh the Kenizzite (I Chr. 4:17; Num. 32:12). His father was Mered and his mother was "Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh."

All these men appear to have non-Israelite ancestry. In sound, the name is similar to other Hebrew names, but Shammai does not appear to have been given to any man of Judah or of Israel.

SHAPHAN. The name of two OT figures. (1) The secretary and financial officer to JOSIAH. Shaphan received from Hilkiah the newfound "book of the law" (substantially the book of Deuteronomy), which had been discovered during the reconstruction of the Temple, and delivered it to King Josiah (II Kings 22:3-13; II Chr. 34:8-20). Friends and supporters of Josiah's reforms, Shaphan and his sons Ahikam, Elashah, and Gemariah, also supported Jeremiah (Jer. 26:24; 29:3; 36:10-12; 39:14; 40:5).

(2) Father of Jaazaniah (Ezek. 8:11). W. G.

SHARIA. The path of true religion that a MUSLIM is to follow. Although sharia is sometimes translated as law, it includes all the aspects of the proper way of life, morality as well as law. As revealed truth it has been contrasted to theological speculation or human endeavor. More recently it has been used to designate the traditional Muslim law, in contrast to the modern civil law.

Sharia includes law in the narrow sense (fiqh), moral and religious regulations, mystical thought, and personal piety. Some actions are neither prohibited nor required but are classified as worthy of praise or as deserving God's disfavor. From early times the sharia has been interpreted and enforced by an organized judiciary system. Various schools developed that differ from one another in interpretation and strictness of enforcement. Shi'ite law differs considerably from Sunnite law, largely because of the role of the imams, who, according to Shi'ite belief, are divinely inspired and thus able to speak for God, the great Lawgiver. Specific areas of legislation include penal law, laws governing commercial transactions, family law, the law of succession and inheritance, and matters of procedure and the taking of evidence.

Under the impact of modernization and urbanization many changes have been introduced into the laws of Muslim countries. The status of women has been a particular concern of the modernizers. But in rural areas and in countries such as the Islamic Republic of Iran, where traditional values are emphasized, the old principles are enjoying new popularity. K.C.

SHARON. The "level place" or "plain" in the central coastal area of Palestine stretching from Joppa north to south of Mount Carmel, about fifty miles long and from eight to ten miles wide. It was well watered with three perennial and two seasonal streams. With marshes, sand dunes, and no natural ports, in OT times the area was relatively undeveloped. The one known settlement was north of Joppa, Tell Qasile, founded about 1200 B.C. In the east, toward the hill country, there once were forests of oaks. When weather conditions were favorable, sheep herding and farming were possible. This gave Sharon a reputation for fertility (Isa. 65:10, "pasture for flocks"). "The Way of the Sea," a part of the international trade route leading from Mesopotamia through Damascus, entered Sharon by way of Megiddo and ran southward by Joppa and Gaza, ultimately to Egypt.

Generally speaking, Sharon was thought of in the OT as a forbidding, rather than an inviting area: "Sharon is like a desert" (Isa. 33:9), a "rose of Sharon," a crocus (Song of S. 2:1). Sharon was not a center of strength in OT times. Several events that are significant in Christian history took place in Sharon, however, and are connected with Joppa and, especially, Caesarea Maritima. P.L.G.

SHAVUOT. Hebrew name of the Feast of Weeks, one of the three Jewish pilgrimage festivals. It is also known as PENTECOST, since it takes place on the fiftieth day after the completion of the counting of the omer (sheaf of new barley), which begins on the second day of PASSOVER. The festival is also called the Festival of the Firstfruits because of the wheat, which is harvested after the barley. Shavuot is also commemorated as the time that God gave the Ten Commandments on Mount Sinai, and the holy day thus has another name—the Season of the Giving of Our Torah. The book of Ruth, relating Ruth's acceptance of the Jewish faith, is read in the synagogue. Confirmation and consecration services are generally held on this festival. L.K.

SHEBA, QUEEN OF. A ruler of a kingdom located in southwest Arabia that is known biblically as Sheba but is otherwise known as Saba, its citizens being the SABEANS. The kingdom lay in the territory of modern Yemen.

The accounts in I Kings 10:1-13 and II Chronicles 9:1-12 of the lady's twelve-hundred-mile desert trek to visit the rich and proverbially wise King SOLOMON has given this unnamed monarch universal fame. The queen's kingdom was situated geographically to become wealthy through trade in Arabian products, especially the lucrative incense business, exchange goods imported from Asia and Africa, and perhaps slaves.

Archaeological investigation has been made of this area. The notable queen has not yet been attested, but available evidence corroborates the biblical account. The gifts that the queen brought to Solomon are things that could have come from Saba, products of the Red Sea commerce, gold, precious stones, "algum" wood and spices, as well as incense and perfume.

What prompted the queen of Sheba to make the arduous journey to Jerusalem and return? Recent interpreters have stressed economics as the motive. She did what her neighboring kingdoms in South Arabia had not yet undertaken, that is, to establish a trade agreement for an exchange of goods with Solomon, first by means of the recently domesticated camel and later by the fleet of ships Solomon and Hiram developed (I Kings 10:22; II Chr. 9:21).

The I Kings 10:1-10, 15 account, exactly copied in II Chronicles 9:1-9, 12, reports that after she had observed and admired Solomon's "affairs" and "wisdom," and also his answers to her questions, she said, "the half was not told me" (I Kings 10:6-7). "When the queen of Sheba had seen all . . . there was no more spirit in her" (I Kings 10:4-5); that is, it took her breath away. The Hebrew phrase translated "she came to Solomon" is translated in Genesis 19:34 "go in and lie with him," that is, for purposes of sexual relations. Another expression, Solomon gave the queen of Sheba "all that she desired" or "whatever she asked" (v. 13) has been taken to mean the same thing. Arabic legends give considerable detail along these lines. It is known that the Sabeans had colonies in Ethiopia and that the Abyssinians' royal line claims to have originated from relations between Solomon and the queen of Sheba. P.L.G.

SHECHEM. An old Canaanite city near Mount Gerizim that became a significant regional, Israelite religious and political center. Currently it is thought that the name, meaning "shoulder," relates to the city's location, near both Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim (Deut. 27-28). The name was previously associated with a certain man named Shechem, identified as the son of Hamor (Gen. 33:18-19).

The name Shechem appears in Egyptian texts as early as the nineteenth century B.C. "Sychar" in John 4:5 is thought to be a later name for the OT Shechem. Excavations have identified Shechem with Tell Balatah, about 1½ miles east of the pass between Mounts Gerizim and Ebal and near "Jacob's well" which is east of the tell.

Shechem, according to excavators, was occupied from about 4000 B.C. and reached the height of its prosperity in the patriarchal age. It declined in the times of the Hebrew conquest but was rebuilt in the Hellenistic era and was occupied from then until about 100 B.C. Abundantly supplied with water and located in a fertile plain, where major north-south and east-west highways met, at times Shechem was a wealthy and powerful city, walled and conquerable only through ambush (Judg. 9:34-35). Abraham (Gen. 12:6-7) and Jacob (Gen. 33:18-20) were at Shechem. Dinah was raped there (Gen. 34:1-24). Joseph visited his brothers there (Gen. 37:12-24), and later his bones were buried there (Josh. 24:32). Shechem flourished throughout the history of the northern kingdom but suffered under the Assyrians (724-722 B.C.) From about 325 to 107 B.C., the Samaritan period, Shechem regained its status as a city related to the Samaritan temple, which was built on Mount Gerizim. Shechem suffered its death blow under John Hyrcannus in 107 B.C.

The numerous sanctuaries and temples found in and around Shechem through archaeological excavations and built at various periods of the city's long history support the Bible's connection of Shechem with religious ceremony and covenant-making (Gen. 12:6; 33:18-20; 35:4; Deut. 27-28; Josh. 8:30-35; 24:1-28; Judg. 9:1-40). Shechem's reputation as a place of religious significance to the Samaritans remained in NT times (John 4:5-6, 20). P.L.G.

SHEEN, FULTON JOHN (1895-1979). Roman Catholic archbishop, noted radio and television personality described as one of the most persuasive voices for the Catholic faith in America, and author.

Bishop Sheen was born on May 8, in El Paso, Illinois. His father, Newton Morris Sheen, a farmer, and his mother, Delia Fulton Sheen, moved to Peoria when Fulton was a small child. He attended St. Mary's School and Spalding Institute in Peoria, then enrolled in St. Viator College in Bourbonnais, Illinois, where he was a member of the debating team and an editor on the staff of the college newspaper. He received a B.A. in 1917 and an M.A. in 1919 from St. Viator. In 1919 he attended St. Paul Seminary in St. Paul, Minnesota, and was ordained a priest in the Diocese of Peoria on September 20, 1919. Subsequently he earned S.T.B. and J.C.B. degrees from the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., in 1920. He received a Ph.D. from the University of Louvain in Belgium (1923) and attended the Sorbonne in Paris and the Collegio Angelico in Rome (D.D.; 1924). In 1925 Louvain made him an agrégé en philosophie for his dissertation, "God and Intelligence." For this he earned the Cardinal Mercier International Prize for Philosophy.

Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen

After serving for a brief period as a parish priest at St. Patrick's Church, Peoria, Sheen in 1926 joined the faculty of the Catholic University of America as an instructor in philosophy of religion. Monsignor Sheen became the speaker on the NBC radio network "Catholic Hour" on March 2, 1930. Before long his audience of both Catholics and Protestants reached many millions. Later he was featured on a television program called "Life Is Worth Living." Many experts in the field rated him as the most eloquent preacher in the United States. His broadcasts formed the basis for a number of books that became best sellers. A series of prominent people were converted to the Catholic faith through contact with the soft-spoken radio priest. Monsignor Sheen was appointed national director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in 1950 and was consecrated as a bishop the following year. He died on December 10.

SHEKEL. From the Hebrew word meaning "to weigh." The shekel was an OT measure of weight before it became a primary unit of money. The substances most often weighed were silver (Gen. 23:15, "four hundred shekels of silver" for a piece of land), gold (Num. 7:86; Josh. 7:21; II Chr. 3:9), iron (I Sam. 17:7), and bronze (I Sam. 17:5). The weights used were of stone. The Hebrew word translated "weight" is "stone." (Prov. 16:11: "A just balance and scales are the Lord's, all the weights in the bag are his work.") There were different sizes of shekel weights. Most often mentioned in scripture is "the shekel of the sanctuary" (Lev. 5:15), which was a half shekel, and a shekel "by the king's weight" (II Sam. 14:26). The weights of silver plates (130 shekels) and basins (70 shekels) are listed (Num. 7:13). Until after the Babylonian exile, shekels as money represented uncoined metal.

P.L.G.

SHEKINAH. A Hebrew word meaning "to dwell." The word "shekinah" is not used in the Bible but appears frequently in post-biblical, Jewish writings representing the presence or immanence of God. The word is associated with bright light. Moses on Mount Sinai could see Yahweh's "goodness" and "back" but not Yahweh's face "for man shall not see me and live" (Exod. 33:12-23). The presence of the risen Christ to Paul on the road to Damascus was "a light from heaven, brighter than the sun" (Acts 26:13). In rabbinical writings, the lamps of the Temple's Holy Place are witnesses "that the Shekinah abides in the midst of Israel" (Shab. 22b). And, the windows of the Temple were made "to let the light of the Shekinah illumine the world" (Num. Rab. 15:2).

The concept of God present with people and nations occurs frequently in the OT, for example, Jerusalem, where Yahweh has chosen to put the divine "name" (I Kings 11:36). In the NT, the significance of shekinah is taken by the more detailed doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In the OT the nearest approach to the NT doctrine of the Holy Spirit is the idea of the shekinah. In a sense, shekinah became, like Word (Ps. 18:30 KJV), Spirit (Isa. 63:10), Wisdom (Prov. 8:22-33), and Name, a substitute for the Divine Name (Deut. 12:5; I Kings 8:16), the pronunciation of which was avoided.

GLORY is a term related to shekinah, the glory of God to be seen in nature (Ps. 1: 11 ff.), on Mount Sinai (Exod. 24:16), in the tabernacle (Exod. 29:43; 40:34), and in the Temple (I Kings 8:11). Glory is used in Paul's letters almost as a title, for example, "Lord of glory" (I Cor. 2:8). God has made the light to shine out of darkness "to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (II Cor. 4:6).

SHELDON, CHARLES M. (1857-1946). Author of In His Steps, Sheldon was born February 26 in Wellsville, New York, to Sarah Ward and Stewart Sheldon, a Congregational minister. He studied at Phillips Academy, Brown University (1883), and Andover Theological Seminary (1886). Ordained a Congregationalist, he pastored the church in Waterbury, Vermont, before becoming pastor of Central Congregational Church in Topeka, Kansas (1889-1919).

He began to expound the SOCIAL GOSPEL in stories, of which he read a chapter each Sunday evening to his congregation. In His Steps—stories of how members of a middle-class congregation followed the teachings of Jesus by asking in each situation "What would Jesus do?"—was written in this way. It appeared serially in The Advance, a Chicago magazine, and in book form in 1897. Estimates of its sales run as high as thirty million. It continues in print today, and has been translated into twenty-three languages, as well as becoming a movie in 1936. In 1919 Sheldon became editor of the Christian Herald. He wrote fifty other books dealing with slums, class tensions, political corruption, corporate dishonesty, and labor turmoil. He also crusaded for prohibition, pacifism, and ecumenism.

N.H.

SHEM. Possibly from a Hebrew root word meaning "hear" or from a Babylonian word meaning "name" or "son." Shem was the first named and thus considered the oldest of NOAH's three sons (Gen. 10:21), Ham being named second, and Japheth the third (Gen. 5:32; 9:18; see also 10:1). Biblical tradition describes all the peoples of earth as lineal descendants of Noah through one of his three sons. Thus, all share in the covenant God made with Noah (Gen. 9:9, 12-17; 10:32).

The term "Semite" is applied to some of Shem's descendants, who are called Semites after his name. According to Genesis 10:22, Shem was also the father of several non-Semitic peoples. The division of nations by Noah's sons seems to have been based on geography. All of Shem's "children" appear to have occupied lands to the northeast of Palestine, that is, "Elam, Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud, and Aram" (Gen.

10:22). Shem is mentioned specifically as the ancestor of the Hebrews through Eber (Gen. 10:21), a name that has been found in the Elba tablets. Genesis 11 concludes the narrative of Shem's progeny by naming Terah as the father of Abraham, thus introducing the more detailed accounts of the patriarchs and how they became residents of the land of Canaan.

When Noah became drunk on wine and lay "uncovered" in his tent, Ham "saw the nakedness of his father" (Gen. 9:20 ff.). Shem, along with Japheth, covered Noah with "a garment," but in such a way that they did not see his nakedness (Gen. 9:23). Noah, awake, blessed the kind ones but cursed Canaan, a son of Ham (9:24-25; 10:6). The blessing of Shem made Canaan his slave (Gen. 9:26).

P.L.G.

SHEMA. The heart of the Jewish service. The worshiper who recites it proclaims allegiance to the kingdom of heaven and joyful submission to God's laws and commandments. The Shema is a proclamation of the existence and unity of God; of Israel's complete loyalty to God and God's commandments; the belief in divine justice; the remembrance of the liberation from Egypt; and the election of Israel as God's people. The opening verse, "Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is One Lord," sounds the keynote of all Judaism: God is One because there is no other God than he; God is also One because he is wholly unlike anything else in existence.

The Shema commands undivided allegiance to and total love of God. It bids the worshiper to teach God's commandments "diligently unto thy children, and [thou] shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." The middle of the Shema teaches the doctrine of Divine Righteousness. The third section indicates how God's teachings are constantly to be kept before the eyes of the worshipers and their children by means of an outward expression of an inward thought, the fringes on the prayer shawl. The Shema is the first prayer of innocent childhood and the last utterance of the dying.

L.K.

SHEOL. A Hebrew word of uncertain meaning, signifying the abode of the dead. It appears sixty-five times in the OT and is variously translated in the KJV, transliterated consistently in the RSV.

The Hebrew people generally shared with Semites the view that after DEATH, people survived but in an underworld place of darkness, dust, and inactivity, from which none escaped. Few details are given, but Sheol is pictured as a walled place with stout gates. Life there is shadowy and characterized by eternal thirst. The horror of such existence is that it is without hope or any communication with God (Ps. 6:5; 88:4 ff; Isa. 38:18). Synonyms used for Sheol include: the ditch or pit, the realm of death, the earth, and perdition. Sheol is not a place for punishment of the wicked. In classical Greek, as in NT Greek, Sheol is translated "Hades."

In late OT times, some taught that, even in Sheol, Yahweh rules people and would work their vindication (Pss. 49:14 ff; 139:8; Job 19:26 ff.). In a few passages mention is made of liberation from Sheol through resurrection of the righteous to bliss and the wicked to shame (Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2). Such notions were rejected by most of Judaism so that no consistent doctrine of the subject developed.

The whole concept of life after death was changed for Christians by the RESURRECTION of Christ. His body did not see corruption in Hades (Acts 2:31) for he has "the keys of Death and Hades" (Rev. 1:18).

The NT knows a place of punishment for the dead, GEHENNA, a term rarely used in the NT. It is used most often in the teachings of Jesus as a place of the final sufferings of the wicked and unrepentant. In II Peter 2:4, the word translated "hell" is Tartarus, which to Greeks was the place where the wicked were punished. It was thought to be located in the bowels of the earth, far deeper than Hades. Such subjects are treated in the NT but with restraint and always with the intent to warn and to awaken responsibility.

P.L.G.

SHEPHERD. In Palestine in ancient times the shepherd was a prominent figure. Along with agriculture, herds of sheep and cattle represented the prime means of wealth. Sheep provided wool, meat, clothing, material for tents, and were regularly used for sacrifices in the cultic system. Sometimes the owner tended the flocks, sometimes his sons, and sometimes paid servants. Their job included supervision of the herd, protection from animals of prey and thieves, searching for stray sheep, caring for the sick, leading the flock to adequate land for grazing, and regularly contending for the scarce sources of water (for example, Gen. 26:19-22). The story of the conflict between Cain and Abel in Genesis 4 illustrates the tension that often existed between farmer and shepherd.

As a conspicuous person in the society the shepherd came to be widely used symbolically in the literature of Israel and the early church. (1) As a Figure for God. Repeatedly in the OT God is depicted as the shepherd of the flock Israel. The familiar Psalm 23 links the image of the shepherd with that of the Oriental host. Psalm 80 begins, "Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, thou who leadest Joseph like a flock!" The tender, protective care God shows Israel is movingly affirmed in Isaiah 40:11: "He will feed his flock like a shepherd, he will gather the lambs in his arms, he will carry them in his bosom, and gently lead those that are with young."

(2) As a Figure for Jesus. In the NT God as shepherd is missing, except in the parables of Jesus (for example, Luke 15:3-7). Instead, Jesus is "the great shepherd of the sheep" (Heb. 13:20), to whom the straying members of the flock have turned (I Pet.

2:25). In John 10 the image is developed in a striking way. Jesus as the shepherd knows the sheep by name and goes before them on their wanderings. The good shepherd is distinguished from the mercenary in that the shepherd will not flee when thieves or wild beasts attack. "I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep" (10:11). The flock is extended beyond the bounds of Israel: "And I have other sheep, that are not of this fold; I must bring them also, and they will heed my voice" (10:16).

(3) As a Figure for Leaders and Ministers. Ezekiel 34 describes the kings of Israel as shepherds who, instead of feeding the sheep, have fed themselves and have exploited the flock. They have abdicated their pastoral role like mercenaries, and thus the sheep have scattered to become a prey for wild beasts. The only hope for Israel is that God will search them out, rescue them, and bring them to green pastures.

In the NT the figure of the shepherd is never used in a negative or judgmental fashion as in Ezekiel, except perhaps Mark 6:34, where it is said that Jesus had compassion on the crowds, "because they were like sheep without a shepherd." In Ephesians 4:11 the word translated in the RSV as PASTORS is the same Greek term translated elsewhere as "shepherds" (for example, Luke 2:8). They function as tenders of the flock under "the chief Shepherd" and are warned about the temptation to grow rich at the expense of those in their care and the temptation to domineer them (1 Pet. 5:2-4). SHEPHERD OF HERMAS. The writer of this treatise is Hermas, a fairly unknown APOSTOLIC FATHER. He had been a slave at Rome, but had been set free to become a farmer. He lived at the same time as Clement of Rome, around A.D. 100; yet the one outside reference to him—in the Muratorian Canon, where authoritative books of the church are listed—dates his writing at a time when his brother Pius was bishop of Rome (about A.D. 140-154). Modern scholars see his composition as the work of more than one person; its composition is not the work of a single author but is spread over several decades.

The Shepherd is made up of five Visions, twelve Mandates, and ten Similitudes. The sources of these visions are an old woman of youthful beauty—a figure of the church—and a shepherd-angel who instructs Hermas on the nature of the Christian life. The genre of Hermas' treatise is apocalyptic, that is, revealing divine truths from the heavenly world, couched in figurative or allegorical idiom. The teaching is centered on the possibility of repentance after baptism, and probably reflects the author's own family experience since his sons had abandoned the faith in time of persecution. The call of the book is ethical, exhorting to purity and limiting the chance of post-baptismal forgiveness, a rigorous doctrine to be seen in view of the impending end of the world, which is expected soon.

The value of The Shepherd is the light it throws on a species of Jewish Christianity as it became domiciled at Rome. The book was prized as possessing quasi-canonical status, especially in the Eastern sector of Christendom, and was regularly included in the list of the church's sacred scriptures. Athanasius' Festal Letter of A.D. 367 shows that the Shepherd was being used for training converts in his day. But its pessimistic outlook, which adopted a narrow view of God's forgiveness for penitent sinners, and its otherworldly apocalyptic genre made it an unpopular treatise, and it soon lost any appeal it had. SHESHBAZZAR. A Babylonian name meaning "Sin (the moon god) protects the father." Sheshbazzar, "the prince of Judah" (Ezra 1:8), grew up in Babylon, where his father, Jehoiachin, the exiled king of Judah, was in prison. ZERUBBABEL was the grandson of Jehoiachin, and thus a nephew to Sheshbazzar (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 23; Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27). We hear of Sheshbazzar first when he was selected by Cyrus I, the king of Persia, to lead the first group of Babylonian Jews to Jerusalem, with royal authority and support, to rebuild the city and its Temple (Ezra 1:8). To Sheshbazaar the king entrusted a collection of valuables from Jews of Babylonia together with the Temple gold and silver vessels that Nebuchadnezzar had carried away to Babylon after he had sacked the city in 587 B.C. Sheshbazzar, like Zerubbabel after him, was called "governor" of Judah (Ezra 5:14; Hag. 1:1, I Esdras 6:18), and is credited with having laid the foundations of the house of the Lord, that is, Zerubbabel's Temple (Ezra 5:16; I Esdras 6:20). P.L.G.

SHEVAT. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

SHIBBOLETH. As a consequence of the part that this word played in the narrative of Judges 12:1-6, it has an acquired meaning as a test word used to distinguish a particular group or class of people.

The "mighty warrior" Jephthah lived in Gilead on the east bank of the Jordan River (Judg. 11:1-6). Since his mother was a harlot, Jephthah was rejected by the clan's leader as heir to his father's estate (Judg. 11:2). He fled to the wilderness, where he became the leader of a band of "worthless fellows." When the Ammonites, southern neighbors of Jephthah's tribe, threatened war, the Gileadite chieftains offered Jephthah leadership over the tribe in exchange for his successfully making war on their enemies. Jephthah accepted the offer and prevailed in battle. After this, armed men from Ephraim came from the west bank of the Jordan and complained to Jephthah that he had not invited them to join the battle with him. Jephthah replied that he had waited for them to defend Gilead from Ammon but, since they took no action, he initiated the battle and "the Lord gave them into my hand" (Judg. 12:2).

At this, the Ephraimites attacked Jephthah and his men but were defeated. They attempted to retreat westward to their territory, crossing the Jordan. But Jephthah's men had seized control of the fords and, as a test of his identity, required each fleeing man to pronounce the word "shibboleth." The text explains that since Ephraimites "could not pronounce it right," they were killed. Apparently, the Ephraimites had a peculiarity in pronunciation that made it difficult for them to make the "sh" sound (12:6). This narrative has given to shibboleth its acquired meaning as a test or password used for identification purposes.

SHI'ITE. The "separate party" of Islam, a collection of diverse groups and movements that arose in opposition to Abu Bakr, Umar, and Uthman, the first three caliphs. The Shi'ites believe that Ali, the fourth caliph, was the mandated successor to MUHAMMAD the prophet. In their view, the first three caliphs were usurpers. (The Sunni majority of Islam honor all four caliphs.) Since the time of the civil war of A.D. 656, which established Ali, Shi'ites have divided into a bewildering array of splinter groups and messianic sects, following various lines of IMAMS. These imams traced descent from Muhammad through Ali and Ali's son al-Husayn. The Druzes and BAHAI also arose from Shi'ite groups.

The imam in Shi'ism fills both a religious and a political role. Thus the history of Shi'ite religious movements is also a history of political disaffection and revolt. Born in the civil war of A.D. 656, the Shi'ite movement has almost always been in opposition to the dominant political power. Although they held power in the Fatimid dynasty in tenth- to twelfth-century Egypt, and are now in power in the Islamic Republic of Iran, they have traditionally been downtrodden.

The movement gained its greatest solidarity in the eighth century under the imam Ja'far al-Sadiq, who provided it with a distinctive ideology. Even before this, however, the movement had suffered divisions between extremists and moderates, and the Zaydiyya, who form the majority in Yemen, had already split off. In 750 the Shi'ites overthrew the Umayyad dynasty, but the leaders of the revolution embraced Sunnism and established the ABBASID caliphate, which was hostile to Shi'ites.

Ja'far al-Sadiq designated one of his sons, Isma'il, to succeed him in the imamate, but Isma'il died before his father. Some Shi'ites believed that he had not died, but rather had gone into a state of "occultation," or concealment, and would return as the Mahdi (messiah). This group gave rise to the large number of sects known as ISMA'ILYYA, including the Nizari sect called Assassins. The Isma'ilyya count seven imams from Ali and therefore are also known as Seveners (SAB'IYYA). Other Shi'ites believe in twelve imams and are called Twelvers or IMAMIYYA.

Shi'ism as a reform movement has received much support through the centuries from non-Arabs, who often felt discriminated against in the Arab-dominated areas. It carries, however, an elitist message—that only the descendants of Ali have legitimate political and religious authority. The difficulty here may not be as great as it seems, since individuals as far from Arabia as Iran have claimed descent from Ali.

The number of groups increased throughout the Middle Ages as leadership disputes divided and subdivided the Shi'ites. Among those who look for the coming of the Mahdi, some expect the return of the seventh imam and some the twelfth. A number of men have declared themselves to be the Mahdi, and some have attracted large numbers of followers. Others have claimed to be a new imam, including the Iranian leader Ruhollah Khomeini, formerly recognized only as an AYATOLLAH.

SHILOH. (1) A site (Seilûn) in ruins nine miles north of Bethel, nine miles south of Shechem, east of the main road from Shechem to Jerusalem, just off the "Highway of the Patriarchs," which follows the crest of the north-south ridge of Palestine.

Throughout the period of the Judges, Shiloh was Israel's most important political and religious city (Judg. 18:31). Previously the site may have had a Canaanite high place. The narratives of "the daughters of Shiloh" who danced at a feast (Judg. 21:21), the behavior of Eli's "worthless" sons (I Sam. 2:12, 22-23), and the "base" women at Shiloh (I Sam. 1:16) suggest that Shiloh was the scene of an early encounter of Israel in Palestine with the fertility cult of the Canaanites.

At Shiloh the people of Israel assembled at the completion of the conquest (Josh. 18:1), at the casting of lots in the division of the land (Josh. 18:8-10; 19:51) and, possibly, annually (I Sam. 1:3). Great religious festivals and pilgrimages were held at Shiloh (Judg. 21:19-21; I Sam. 1:3). Special meetings of the tribes were held there to settle difficult matters (Josh. 22:12 ff.).

Religiously, Shiloh was distinguished as the place where the tabernacle with the Ark of the Covenant rested after the conquest. The phrase "the doorpost of the temple of the Lord" (I Sam. 1:9) has been taken to suggest that the desert tabernacle had been replaced at Shiloh by a more permanent structure. When the Ark was seized in battle by the Philistine overlords (I Sam. 4:11), Shiloh lost its prominence. The priesthood of Shiloh fled to Nob, a site probably on the slopes of Mount Scopus overlooking Jerusalem. The thought that Shiloh was destroyed by the Philistines about this time is supported by the findings in excavations by Danish expeditions in 1926, 1929, and 1932.

(2) A personal name that appears in Genesis 49:10, Jacob's blessing on Judah, "... until Shiloh come. . . ." (KJV). The RSV here chooses to treat Shiloh not as a place or personal name. This has disappointed some interpreters who had taken Shiloh here to be a code name for the Messiah, the son of David, of the house of Judah. P.L.G.

SHIMEI. An abbreviated form of the Hebrew word for "Yahweh has heard." A popular Hebrew personal name for men, especially in Levitical circles. Of the many men who possessed this name, of only a few do we have details other than the name. They do not seem to have been connected other than by name. The most important Shimei was a son of Gera, a Benjaminite, belonging to Saul's family. As David fled Jerusalem from Absalom's revolt, Shimei stoned and cursed David, "You are a man of blood" (II Sam. 16:5-8). After the revolt was quelled, David gave Shimei royal clemency. The time came when, on his deathbed, David charged Solomon to bring death to Shimei (I Kings 2:8-10) and this was done (I Kings 2:39-46). P.L.G.

SHINAR. A Hebrew name for a large part, if not the whole, of ancient Babylonia. Genesis 10:9-10 speaks of Nimrod, "a mighty hunter," as king over Shinar, a land that included the cities of Babel (Babylon), Erech (ancient Uruk, modern Warka) and Accad (ancient Akkade, near Babylon and modern Baghdad). The town of Babel (Gen. 11:9) was built in Shinar. Amraphel, otherwise unknown, is named "king of Shinar" in Genesis 14:1, 9. P.L.G.

SHINTO. From the Japanese word meaning "The Way (Tō, from Chinese tao) of the Gods." Shinto as a religion represents a perpetuation, with some modification, of the worship of the indigenous KAMI or gods of Japan that existed before the coming of Buddhism in the sixth century A.D.

The most important of these deities were the ujigami, patron gods of particular uji or clans. Accounts of the deities of the imperial house and other noble families are given, together with the Shinto creation myth, in the earliest extant Japanese books, the Kojiki (A.D. 712) and the Nihonshoki (720). However, these works should not be taken as comprehensive Shinto scriptures; the gods of a large number of shrines are not presented in them.

Theologically, Shinto is polytheistic, perhaps the only unambiguous polytheism to be found in a modern, advanced society. Some contemporary Shinto spokesmen have endeavored to develop the ramifications of this "pluralistic" view of the spiritual universe with interesting results. However, what can be expressed doctrinally is not the most significant aspect of Shinto experience. What most Japanese appreciate in Shinto is probably its traditionalism, which affords a link to the past, and the clean, simple, rustic atmosphere of the shrines in which its gods are honored. The latter quality suggests an important feature of Shinto, the distinction it makes between purity and pollution. Shrines, worship, and worshippers should be clean and pure.

Shinto worship is of two kinds. First, individuals approach shrines at all times to clap the hands twice, then offer a short prayer. Second, offerings of food and sometimes other objects are formally presented by priests periodically. The most important offerings are given at matsuri, shrine festivals, which will also include carnivals and highly colorful and diverse traditional dances, processions, and ceremonies.

Sociologically, Shinto remains a religion of the particular, centering on the ujigami of particular lineages or communities to which people feel a special relation. But certain shrines, above all the Grand Shrine of ISE, dedicated to the divine ancestress of the imperial house, evoke the loyalty of larger groups or of the nation as a whole.

Shinto has had a checkered history. After the introduction of BUDDHISM, a pattern of assimilation between the two religions emerged. In various ways, the kami and the Buddhas and bodhisattvas were viewed as different expressions of the same spiritual essences and were often worshiped together. But with the Meiji restoration of 1868, Shinto was seized upon by the new government as a uniquely Japanese institution. It was thoroughly separated from Buddhism, and emphasis was put on the legitimation of imperial rule by Shinto mythology and on participation in Shinto as an expression of patriotism. As extreme nationalism took stronger hold in Japan until the end of World War II in 1945, this often cynical use of Shinto only increased. Since then Shinto has largely resumed a more traditional role as the cultus of community shrines. R.E.

SHISHAK. The biblical name of a pharaoh who in Egypt was known as Sheshonq I (935-914 B.C.). Shishak rose to power as a Libyan chieftain-warrior and became so widely respected that he was received with royal honors at Thebes. He became ruler of all Egypt with his capitol in the Delta. His son was made high priest of Amun at Thebes. Shishak made a substantial addition to the great temple of Amun at Karnak on one wall of which he recorded an account of his victories in Judah and Israel in the fifth year after the death of Solomon (about 918 B.C.) It has been proposed that he was Gezer's destroyer and Solomon's father-in-law, but by current Egyptian chronology this now seems unlikely.

The biblical accounts of Shishak's raid (I Kings 14:25; II Chr. 12:2-12) are concerned only with his plundering the palace and the Temple of Jerusalem. Shishak could have considered the Temple's Ark of the Covenant to be the unique throne of Rehoboam's kingdom, the container for the national deity, and, therefore, he seized it to show his sovereignty over the nation by taking the Ark to Egypt as a prize of war. At any rate, after Shishak's raid, the Bible tells nothing more about the Ark.

Shishak's campaign was not intended to destroy as much as to demonstrate Egypt's military and political power. For some 250 years before (1552-1300 B.C.) Egypt was without question the dominant empire of the world. At that time Egyptian armies repeatedly swept over Palestine. Thutmose III (about 1490-1436) made more than a dozen such campaigns. It appears that in the thirteenth century B.C., after the Sea Peoples had destroyed Megiddo and Beth-shan, the Egyptians rebuilt those walled cities and established Philistine caretakers for Egypt in them. Merneptah is said to have left at Lachish marks of his raiding in 1223 B.C. Egypt had a long memory. Shishak may have considered his military action in Palestine as a reassertion of Egypt's imperial claims on that territory.

There is another indication of how confident Shishak may have been of his right to act in Palestine's political affairs. This was his welcoming JEROBOAM, son of Nebat, when he was forced under threat of death to flee from Jerusalem (I Kings 11:40). When Jeroboam returned from Egypt (with Shishak's backing?), he became the first king of Israel (I Kings 12:20). (The LXX [Septuagint] has a supplement at I Kings 12:24 ff. and 19:18 ff. according to which, during the years that Jeroboam was a guest in Shishak's court, he married Shishak's sister-in-law, who bore a son named Abia. These facts, if true, suggest that Shishak may have continued to support Jeroboam as one of Egypt's client-kings. Jeroboam's wife and son are mentioned in I Kings 14:1-17.)

Shishak's successors lacked his imperial interests. It would be two centuries after Shishak's time before Egypt would be involved again in political and military affairs in Palestine. P.L.G.

SHITTIM. From the Hebrew word meaning "acacia." (1) Acacia was the only kind of wood used in the construction of the tabernacle and its furnishings (Exod. 25:10). Two kinds of acacia grow in the Sinai and Negeb desert valleys, acacia pyrocarpa and acacia raddina. The latter is distinguished by its umbrella-like top, which provides a deep shade.

(2) A place name, Israel's final campsite on the east bank of the Jordan before crossing the river (Josh. 3:1; Mic. 6:5). From this place spies were sent into Jericho (Josh. 2:1). Two sites have been suggested for Shittim. They are located near each other and about six miles northeast of where the Jordan River empties into the Dead Sea: Tell el-Hammon, favored by W. F. Albright, N. Glueck, and G. E. Wright; and Tell el-Kefrein, a little to the northwest.

(3) "The valley of Shittim" (Joel 3:18), which was watered by a stream issuing from the Jerusalem Temple, probably should be understood as "the valley of acacias." P.L.G.

Shiva Nataraja

SHIVA. With VISHNU, Shiva is one of the two major deities of HINDUISM. He is worshiped throughout the Hindu world, his "family" of gods including his "great mother" consort, who is known by such names as Parvati, Durga, and Kali, and his sons Skanda and the elephant-headed GANESHA.

Shiva himself can be traced back to the Vedic deity RUDRA. In myth and art he is represented in various ways: as the great yogin seated on Mount Kailas in Tibet, whose meditations sustain the world; as the erotic lover of Parvati; as the lord of the dance, who tramples time and enacts the destiny of the universe; as the uncouth ascetic who dwells in cemeteries and cremation grounds. Most commonly, however, Shiva is worshiped in shrines as the simple quasi-phallic pillar known as the lingam. In these symbols, as well as in more philosophical expressions of Saivism, the Great God is seen as the timeless, absolute consciousness that underlies the cosmos, before which universes rise and fall in their immense cycles of creation and destruction. The destructive aspect of Shiva is, in fact, particularly emphasized. He is the destroyer of worlds in this cosmos of impermanence and, on a deeper level, the destroyer of illusion. Shiva is worshiped in simple puja rites by all classes of society and is the patron of certain sects such as the LINGAYATS, as well as of the large number of Saiva yogis and ascetics. R.E.

SHOFAR. The horn of an animal, most often a ram, prepared for use as a musical instrument in the Jewish synagogue. It is sounded during the month of Elul, on Rosh Hashanah (the Jewish New Year), and at the end of Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement). The Bible refers to two kinds of sounds to come from the shofar: teki'ab and teru'ab (Num. 10:5-8). Since doubt arose as to whether teru'ab, a wavering blast, was a moaning sound or an outcry, a third set of sounds was instituted—that of shevarim (broken sounds). The final great blast of teki'ab (a long single note) is explained as a sign of the removal of the Divine Presence, deduced from Exodus 19:13: "When the trumpet sounds a long blast, they shall come up to the mountain." SHOWBREAD. From the Hebrew word meaning "bread of the face" thus "bread of the Presence" (RSV) or "shewbread" (KJV), an English expression apparently traceable to William Tyndale.

In many grain-oriented societies, bread is considered a suitable SACRIFICIAL OFFERING to a deity along with other gifts and sacrifices of food. The original notion was probably providing food for the gods or of worshipers sharing a meal with the gods as a symbol of good will and friendship between them: "he was made known to them in the breaking of the bread" (Luke 24:35). In this way, bread so used became special or holy. Careful preparation of such bread was required. Worshipers who ate the bread were made holy through ceremonial purifications. The practice is found in ancient Egypt and in ancient Babylonia where cakes of bread were laid out before various deities in twelves or in multiples of twelve. (See Jer. 7:18; 44:19, cakes offered to the queen of heaven.) In Ugaritic writings, the gods are said to eat bread. Bread offerings were also common in Greek and Roman rituals.

The passage in I Samuel 21:4-6 relating to David and his men eating the bread of the Presence calls it "the holy bread." The bread had been made to be a holy offering to the holy God. The priest required that the partakers themselves must be in a state of holiness. In Numbers 4:7 and II Chronicles 2:4, showbread is called "continual" bread.

In Israel's tabernacle-temple arrangements, the number twelve is a symbol, as when reference is made to the twelve cakes of holy bread that are put on the table in two rows, six in a row. This suggested to R. de Vaux that the bread offering was "a pledge of the covenant between the twelve tribes and Yahweh" (compare Lev. 24:5-6). The number twelve may also refer to the twelve months of the year, Yahweh being thanked for providing food the year around.

The law concerning the preparation of the bread of the Presence is given in Leviticus 24:5-9. The bread was made in the ordinary way but without leaven and of fine meal or flour. Such bread was fit to set before angels (Gen. 18:6) and daily before Solomon (I Kings 4:22). The bread was to be prepared and presented by the Kohethites "every sabbath" (Lev. 24:8). The holy bread shared the table with cups of pure frankincense, which is "a memorial portion" (Lev. 24:1-7). The incense was offered by being burned on the nearby altar of incense. "Drink offerings" or libations were also made (Num. 4:7).

The bread of the Presence ceremonies were presumably maintained in the tabernacle and temples throughout Hebrew history, except after Antiochus Epiphanes defiled the Temple of Zerubbabel in 169 B.C. and before Judas Maccabeus revived the practice in 165 B.C. at the time of the rededication of the Temple. Josephus states that at Herod's Temple, the showbread was made of unleavened flour, was baked on Friday and brought into the Temple on Saturday morning and was placed on the table in two rows of six each, "one loaf leaning against another."

A number of the religious meanings of the OT bread of the Presence carry over into the Christian sacrament of Communion or the Lord's Supper. Jesus often said, "I am the bread of life" (John 6:35, 48). At his last supper, Jesus "took bread, and blessed, and broke it, and gave it to the disciples and said, Take, eat; this is my body" (Matt. 26:26), "do this in remembrance of me" (I Cor. 11:24). P.L.G.

SHRINE. From the Latin word scrinium, meaning a box containing writing materials. Originally, a shrine was a reliquary, a container for the bones and/or possessions of a departed saint, shaped like a writing box. In wider use, it refers to a sacred image to which devotion is given, such as a statue of the Virgin Mary, or to a holy place, particularly the resting place of a saint. J.C.

The Shroud of Turin

SHROUD OF TURIN. An ancient linen cloth, which is dimly imprinted—to the naked eye—with the image of a man. For centuries, many Christians have believed that the shroud is the linen burial cloth in which Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus wrapped the body of Jesus before laying him in the tomb. It is now in the Cathedral in Turin, Italy, and only rarely is put on public display.

Interestingly, unlike many religious relics, the shroud becomes more fascinating as scientists study it. In 1898, it was photographed for the first time, and the print on the cloth was found to be negative, that is, its light and dark areas were reversed when it was developed on film. This photograph showed a very detailed picture of a man who appeared to have been crucified, crowned with thorns, and pierced by a sharp instrument through the side. The person whose picture was mysteriously imprinted on the shroud suffered and died in the same way Jesus' passion and death is reported by the Gospels.

In 1978, a team of scientists founded the Shroud of Turin Research project, which rephotographed the shroud using modern techniques, and also performed tests on threads of the material. They announced that the image was not painted on the cloth, but could offer no explanation for the phenomenon. J.C.

SHUNNING. The avoidance of flagrant and unrepentant sinners after they have been "banned" or excommunicated—a part of church discipline practiced particularly among the AMISH and MENNONITES. It amounts to almost complete social ostracism, including the avoidance of marital and familial contact. Based on Matthew 18:15-17; I Corinthians 5:11; Romans 16:17; II Thessalonians 3:14; and II John 10, if a person is found in sin, admonished by the elders, disciplined by the church, and still persists in sin, that person is banned, and thereafter shunned.

Strict shunning was introduced by Obbe Philips of the Netherlands about 1533-35. MENNO SIMONS joined the group in 1536 and taught the idea in Loving Admonition (1541), A Fundamental Doctrine or an Account of Excommunication, Ban, Exclusion (1541), and A Kind Admonition . . . Concerning the Shunning and Separation of the Unfaithful Brethren (1558). Shunning is accorded an article in the Dordrecht Confession (1632).

Most rigorously practiced today by Old Order Amish, it includes refusal to eat at the same table, exchange social courtesies, or work together. It is imposed by a bishop with consent of a congregation. Often practiced between factional groups, it has been challenged in court as a boycott. N.H.

SHUR, WILDERNESS OF. A desert-like region in the northwest part of the Sinai Peninsula. Its northern border was the Mediterranean coastal plain, with its "way of the land of the Philistines" (Exod. 13:17). Its western boundary was the route of the present Suez canal. To the east was the Wadi el-Arish or "the river of Egypt," the border between ancient Israel and Egypt. Through its southern portion ran an important east-west caravan route called "the way to Shur" (Gen. 16:7). It led from Egypt via Beersheba, Hebron, and Jerusalem, finally to Damascus and Mesopotamia. P.L.G.

SHURTLEFF, ERNEST W. (1862-1917). Congregational minister and hymn writer. Shurtleff is best remembered for "Lead On, O King Eternal," which he wrote for his graduating class at Andover Theological Seminary in 1883. Born in Boston on April 4, he received training at Boston Latin School, then entered Harvard, and later Andover. At the time of his seminary graduation Shurtleff was already an accomplished organist and had published two books of verse, including many hymns. He served churches in California, Massachusetts, and Minnesota. He and his family went to Europe in 1905. He organized the American Church in Frankfurt and later was in charge of student ministry for the Academy Vitti in Paris. He died in the French capital on August 29.

SHUSHAN. The Hebrew name for the Persian city Susa. Susa is an unoccupied site near the modern village in Iran named Shūsh. The place is in the district of Khuzistan, near the Iraq border, some 175 miles north of the Persian Gulf. The ancient city was situated in a fertile plain abundantly supplied with water from four nearby rivers. From June through October, the area is intolerably hot, with temperatures reaching 140 degrees Fahrenheit. During the winter, even in the January-February rainy season, the weather is pleasant. The kings of ancient Persia used it as their winter capital. Easy access from Susa southeast to the Mesopotamian Valley and northeast to the Persian plain made it a crossroad of international trade, war, and politics.

Aside from the many times Susa is named in the book of Esther, Susa is mentioned in the OT in Nehemiah 1:1 (Nehemiah was in Susa when he first got word of conditions in Jerusalem) and Daniel 8:2 (Susa was the locale of one of Daniel's visions). In today's Shūsh, there is a mosque where the tomb of Daniel is venerated.

SIBYLLINE ORACLES. This name covers a widely disparate collection of writings whose dates are from the second century B.C. to the seventh century A.D. The title derives from the Sibyl who is described as an old woman who gave out prophecies in a trance-like state. The name is generic, since there were as many soothsayers as there were shrines where the oracles were given. The most famous were at Erythraea in Asia Minor and at Cumae in Italy.

The literature that is labelled Sibylline Oracles is cast in the form of Greek hexameter verse, and the themes are all connected with prognostications of doom awaiting the human race. Especially at Rome a collection of such predictions was highly regarded, and they were consulted especially in time of war and crisis. The oracles were also propaganda pieces that in the hands of Virgil the poet were exploited to magnify the accomplishments of the emperor Augustus, and to forecast a utopia under his rule. Augustus, however, was suspicious of the oracles since they seemed to portend a rival empire as a challenge to his principate, and he had two thousand of the oracles destroyed. The religious overtone also is obvious, since the shrines of Apollo were supported by the oracles, and in days of stress people flocked to gain assurance from, the Sibyl.

Jewish and Christian writers in later centuries edited these documents in their own interests and used the eschatological hopes in the oracles to their advantage. Beliefs in judgment, resurrection, and the afterlife were enlisted, and the notion of a new world, purified by fire, is common to Persian, Stoic, Jewish, and Christian apocalyptic (see II Pet. 3:10-13).

Christian influence is especially seen in Oracles 2, 7, and 8, where the prospect of the afterlife is set in terms of the Christian hope. The fathers of the church quoted copiously from these books and chapters, and their influence on medieval thought, art, and liturgy (for example, in the Dies Irae, "Day of Wrath," in the various Requiems and Masses) was considerable. Michelangelo often brought the Sibyls into his paintings alongside OT prophets and Christian figures.

SIDDHARTHA. From the Sanskrit phrase meaning "he who attains the goal." The personal name of the BUDDHA, whose family name was Gautama and clan name Sakya. The hero of the famous novel Siddhartha by Hermann Hesse, while a contemporary of the Buddha, was another spiritual seeker of ancient India.

SIDDHI. From the Sanskrit word meaning "attainment, perfection." In YOGA, siddhis are extraordinary psychic powers the yogin attains at advanced stages of his practice, as a consequence of withdrawal of attachment to sense-objects (pratyahara) and complete control (samyama). The list includes clairaudience, clairvoyance, and the ability to disappear or assume whatever form one wishes. In SANKHYA, siddhis are attitudes conducive to spiritual growth, such as studiousness and detachment.

SIDDIM, VALLEY OF. A battleground hosting the triumph of Chedorlaomer and three other allied Mesopotamian kings over five local rulers of the lower Jordan Valley (Gen. 14:1-12). Since this bituminous region is explicitly equated with the Salt (Dead) Sea (14:3), it was likely situated in what is presently the shallow portion of the Dead Sea, south of the el-Lisan ("tongue") peninsula.

SIDDUR. The Jewish daily and Sabbath prayer book. The liturgical expression of the hopes and convictions of the Jewish people as a whole, the siddur is of paramount importance to Jews. Its phrases and teachings are either culled from Scripture and the rabbinic writings or are a devotional paraphrase of them. The siddur is preoccupied with the One Eternal Lord. It engages in direct speech with God and exhausts the resources of language in songs of praise, in utterances of loving gratitude, and in rejoicing at God's nearness in natural outpourings of grief for sin.

The siddur includes the three daily services: Shabaris (morning service); Minhab (afternoon service); and Ma'ariv (evening service), followed by the Sabbath service. The structure of the classic Jewish prayer book and its inspiration derive from the Bible, especially the Psalms, and rabbinic creativity throughout the ages. The oldest prayers included in the siddur are the SHEMA, which was recited daily in the Second Temple, and the Amidah, or Shemoneh Esreh (the Eighteen Benedictions). Many other prayers composed by famous personalities were added to the daily liturgy. Most Jewish prayer books include blessings for a variety of occasions, such as the recovery from an illness, a prayer for a safe trip, and the like. They include blessings for other festivals, although special prayer books carry the full service for the High Holy Days and festivals. The basic prayers of the liturgy are recorded in the Talmud.

SIDON. An ancient Phoenician city situated on the Mediterranean seacoast twenty-five miles north of TYRE. The Amarna Letters (thirteenth century B.C.) disclose that Sidon's loyalty toward Egypt was more formality than fact. Nevertheless, trade relations between Egypt and Phoenicia persisted.

The city's political influence is symbolized in biblical genealogies that refer to Sidon as Canaan's "first-born" (Gen. 10:15; I Chr. 1:13). The nouns "Sidon" and "Sidonians" frequently denote all Phoenicia and its inhabitants (Judg. 3:3; 10:6; I Kings 5:6; 16:31). Israel felt anxious about "Sidon the Great" (Josh. 19:28), which lay just beyond the tribal border of Asher (Judg. 1:31). Hence, prophetic texts eagerly await the destruction of Sidon and its increasingly dominating neighbor, Tyre (Isa. 23:1-18; Jer. 27:3-7; Joel 3:4).

During the first millennium B.C., Sidon experienced Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian invasions. Assyria's king Esarhaddon destroyed Sidon in 677. The city reemerged only to be captured by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar in 593. Later, the Persians enlisted Sidon's fleet in warfare against the Greeks. Still smarting from its abortive revolt against Persia's king Artaxerxes III Ochus (351), Sidon surrendered to Alexander the Great in 333 without incident. Rome under Pompey claimed Sidon in 64. Jesus and Paul each visited Sidon (Matt. 15:21; Acts 27:3), and Sidonians journeyed southward into Galilee to receive Jesus' message and healing (Luke 6:17).

SIGER OF BRABANT. A thirteenth-century professor of philosophy at the University of Paris, he was a leading exponent of radical Aristotelianism and defended the independence of philosophy from theology. In 1270 the bishop of Paris condemned thirteen errors in his teaching. In 1277 the same bishop condemned 219 more propositions. Aquinas' De Unitate Intellectus contra Averroistas was directed against him. Summoned by the Inquisition, Siger and two colleagues fled to Italy, where he was fatally stabbed by a mad cleric.

Dante admired him and placed him with eleven others in the Heaven of Light. Fourteen authentic works by Siger survive along with six probable ones. He taught Aristotle's thought, whether or not it agreed with church doctrine. Main points of controversy centered around the eternity of the world and the unity of all human intellect, which involved the denial of individual immortality and rewards and punishments.

N.H.

SIGN. Something that represents something else, often with a related purpose or identity, a mark, a SYMBOL, a quality, a trace, as smoke is a sign of fire.

In the OT, the much-used word "sign" had many meanings: an identifying mark, a statement, a proof, an omen, a lesson, a testimony, an assurance, a warning. God put the rainbow in the sky as a sign that God would not again destroy the earth in a flood (Gen. 9:12-13). God gave the people the rite of circumcision so that they would be marked with a divine sign. God marked Cain. The blood on the lintels of the Israelite homes was a sign of God's mercy toward the chosen people, as the plague of grasshoppers was a sign of God's might before the Egyptian court.

In the NT, John the Baptist was expected to provide signs by which the Messiah could be identified. Christ himself condemns those who demand signs, for example signs in the heavens (Matt. 12:39; Luke 11:29) and refuses to supply any. Yet the angels had provided at least descriptive signs of where the infant Jesus had been laid. Christ argues that the demand for signs springs from lack of faith. Yet in a sense his miracles—giving the blind sight, casting out devils, helping the lame walk—are in fact signs to those who have faith, even if he often says, "Go and tell no man." In the church some of the most meaningful acts of worship, such as baptism and the Lord's Supper, like Passover in the OT, are signs loaded with history, association, and meaning.

T.J.K.

SIGN OF THE CROSS. The act of making the outline of the cross on one's upper body during worship services in the Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Episcopal, and many Lutheran churches. It accompanies the benediction at the end of divine services and in the sacrament of baptism and the rite of confirmation.

SIGNS AND WONDERS. In the first three Gospels the phrase "signs and wonders" is almost a catchword for Christ's demonstrations of the power of God among people. John, on the other hand, leans toward the "signs" that demonstrate God's "glory." The Greek words involved are dunamis (miracles), terata (wonders), semeia (signs), and doxa (glory).

Either in the NT or the OT, God is seldom revealed full-blown without accompanying wonders and miracles. Often those revelations are described as mighty acts, miracles, wonderful deeds, signs, marvels, great wonders, mighty doings. They create awe, respect, admiration, appreciation, thanksgiving, and faith (Exod. 3:20; Josh. 3:5; Mark 6:5; Acts 2:22). In general these signs and wonders can be described as miraculous events that seem to contravene the normal laws of nature. Yet God is a provident and loving God who normally makes use of the normal patterns of creation in the world, such as life and death, seedtime and harvest, in order to improve the lot of people.

The use of signs and MIRACLES is continually addressed to people who have faith. In Exodus 3:12, God assures Moses, from Sinai, "This shall be the sign for you"—the giving of the commandments. In the NT, the single most significant dunamis, as Paul continues to insist, is the raising of Christ from the dead. Without that, there could be no faith in any of the other signs and wonders. Not only believers but also Christ's enemies accepted the reality of his miracles (Mark 3:22). Thus the work of Christ, through his signs and miracles, through his preaching, and through his relationships with people, became further witness of the person and work in the plan of salvation.

SIHON. An Amorite king whose story is mainly told in Numbers 21:21-31. He wrested Heshbon from the Moabites and made it his capital. As the Israelites advanced northward in Transjordan en route to Canaan, Sihon inhospitably denied them permission to cross his territory. When warfare erupted, Sihon met defeat, and the triumphant Israelites seized his kingdom. Impressed by its good pasturage, the tribes of Gad and Reuben subsequently settled there (Josh. 13:8-28).

SIKHISM. From a Pali/Sanskrit word meaning "disciple." The religion now numbers about ten million adherents, who largely live in the Punjab province of India. It was inaugurated by NANAK in the late fifteenth century A.D. Growing out of the Hindu Bhakti tradition and also influenced by Sufi Islam, Sikhism is centered on a monotheistic belief in one Creator, who is formless and beyond all human comprehension. Karma and reincarnation are also accepted. The Sikh God can be worshiped anywhere by means of simple prayers and hymns that focus on the "True Name" (Sat Nam) of God, such as those employed in the attractive morning devotions or JAPJI.

From the time of Nanak, Sikhism was guided by a succession of ten GURUS until the death of the last in 1708. From then on, the only authority has been the Sikh scriptures, called the Adi Granth. It was compiled by the fifth Guru in the succession, Arjun, who served as Guru from 1581 to 1606. It was the martyrdom of this guru by the Muslim Mogul rulers of north India that brought about bad feelings between Sikhs and Muslims and began the celebrated Sikh military tradition, culminating in a Sikh state, which lasted until subjugated by the British in the nineteenth century. The last Guru, Govind, created the Khalsa, a Sikh military order, in 1699.

Sikh worship consists of hymns, prayers, sermons, and reading from the Granth, which is given great symbolic honor, and is followed by a communal meal. Sikh community identity, enhanced by such practices of the Khalsa as refusing to cut the hair and wearing a turban, is very strong.

SILAS. A friend and companion of Paul. The name Silas, which might be either Hebrew or Greek, occurs only in Acts. In the Pastoral Epistles (I and II Tim. and Tit.) this same individual is called Silvanus (see also II Cor. 1:19; I Thess. 1:1; I Pet. 5:12). Acts 16:37 reports that Silas, like Paul, held Roman citizenship. Doubtless he came from a Jewish background, because he is described as one of the "leading men among the brethren" at Jerusalem (Acts 15:22).

Once the great council at Jerusalem had met, Silas was designated as a "prophet" or missionary to bring the report of that convention to the church at Antioch, where he remained for a considerable time. Later he was chosen as Paul's companion for the second missionary journey, taking the place of Barnabas. At Philippi he and Paul were beaten because they had driven out evil spirits from a girl who was possessed, but they escaped from prison after an earthquake. Instead of departing, they converted the family of the jail keeper. They would not quietly go on their way, insisting that they be properly treated as Roman citizens. They continued to evangelize in Thessalonica and Berea.

Silas remained in Berea with Timothy after Paul moved on to Athens. Later they rejoined him in Corinth. At this point Silas apparently no longer traveled with Paul, who continued to praise the work of Silas while Paul was on his third missionary journey (II Cor. 1:19). Later Silas seems to have served as scribe, perhaps even as coauthor, and messenger of the First Epistle of Peter, probably working closely with him. Tradition made him the first bishop of Corinth and a favorite saint in the Greek world. T.J.K.

SILLOAM. A spring, a tunnel, a collecting cistern, and a village, all with a significant part in the history of Jerusalem, both among the Jebusites and the Israelites. The spelling of this location sometimes varies—Siloeh, Siloam, and Shiloah, or in Arabic, Silwan. The place so named borders on the lower valley of the Kidron, a usually dry wadi that in its upper area runs between the present eastern wall of Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. On the village side, to the east, there are thousands of Jewish and Arabic graves. Atop this hill Solomon built a temple to Chamos for the Moabite wives in his harem. For this reason the hill is also sometimes known as the Mount of Scandal. A tomb near the valley floor is known by tradition as that of Solomon's favorite wife, a daughter of the pharaoh.

The Pool of Siloam

At the bottom of the western slope of the wadi is the spring of Gihon, which feeds its water into the Pool of Siloam through an ancient tunnel. Another spring farther down the Kidron, Ain Rogel, probably gets its water from the same flow under Jerusalem that supplies Gihon. Other names for Gihon are the Fountain of the Virgin or the Fountain of Steps.

The Jebusites once sealed off this spring and conducted its water into a well inside the city walls, where they hauled up water for pre-Israelite Jerusalem by ropes and buckets, to keep attackers from cutting off the supply of water. It was up this fifty-foot shaft that David's commandos climbed one dark night, after the city gates were closed, to conquer Jerusalem for Israel (II Sam. 5:8).

To make the waters of Gihon and the Pool of Siloam even more reliable during the Assyrian sieges, King Hezekiah cut a 1,730-foot tunnel through the limestone under the city (II Kings 20:20; Eccles. 48:17). The tunnel was picked out from both ends, and despite a broad S-curve, finally did come together. Among energetic tourists the wade through Hezekiah's unlighted tunnel to the Pool of Siloam is still a highlight of a tour of Jerusalem. One of the oldest long inscriptions of ancient Hebrew was discovered in the cave in 1880, describing how the two teams pierced through the rock and finally met. The tower of Siloam (Luke 13:4), the King's garden (Neh. 3:15), and the place where a blind man waited for Christ (John 9) are all closely connected with the Siloam area, as are many other stories.

SILVANUS. See SILAS.

SIMEON. The name of several biblical figures. (1) The second son of JACOB and LEAH (Gen. 29:33). In the story of JOSEPH in Egypt, Simeon was retained as a hostage by Joseph, who sent back the other brothers for young Benjamin (Gen. 42:24, 36; 43:23). Simeon and his brothers Reuben, Levi, and Judah were not highly regarded by the writers of the Jacob-Joseph stories. Simeon's six sons (with the exception of Ohad) each headed a tribe (Gen. 46:10; I Chr. 4:24; Num. 26:12-14), although by the time of the judges (Judg. 5) the Song of Deborah does not mention the tribe of Simeon, which is an indication of its fallen status.

(2) The "righteous and devout" man of Jerusalem who recognized Jesus as the Messiah (Luke 2:22-35). At Jesus' presentation Simeon blessed God in the words that have become known as the Nunc Dimittis.

(3) An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30).

(4) A name of Simon Peter in the KJV (Acts 15:14).

(5) A prophet and teacher in Antioch (Acts 13:1).

SIMEON STYLITES (about 390–459). First of the stylites or pillar saints. After some time as a monk,

Simon became a hermit in northern Syria, near Antioch, when he was about twenty years old. Ten years later he mounted a pillar, first a low one and then higher ones. He lived the remainder of his life sixty to seventy feet off the ground, never coming down. His ascetic example was widely emulated. His feast day is January 5. N.H.

SIMON. (1) Magus. One of Philip's converts in a village of Samaria (Acts 8:9-24). Simon Magus (magician, exorcist, necromancer, charlatan) attempted to buy from the apostles Peter and John the right to confer the Holy Spirit and to perform miracles. For this Peter condemned him, saying not even Philip had such ability. Ever since, in the history of the church, simony has meant the buying and selling of church offices.

In the popular tradition of the early church, Simon set himself up as a deity to be worshiped, together with his consort Helena. Church fathers like Eusebius, Irenaeus, and Justin condemned his teachings, which later became mixed with Gnosticism. One account says he was worshiped with sacrifices, incense, images, and libations. Generally, the confusion and the wild stories about Simon Magus reflect an age that was fascinated by mystical signs, miracles, and wonders.

(2) The Zealot. Simon Zelotes, Simon the Canaanite, and Simon the Zealot are different names for the same individual in the NT (Mark 3:18; Matt 10:14). He was apparently active against the Roman occupiers of his country, and became one of the twelve disciples, even though the Scriptures are almost completely silent about his activities as a disciple.

SIMON MACCABEUS. See MACCABEAN REVOLT.

SIMON PETER. See PETER, APOSTLE.

SIMONS, MENNO. See MENNONITES.

SIMUL IUSTUS ET PECCATOR. From the Latin phrase meaning "simultaneously justified and a sinner." It is MARTIN LUTHER's phrase to explain how he understood the justification of sinful humanity by a righteous God.

This was possible because God imputed the perfect righteousness of Christ to those who were redeemed. Christ died on the cross for sinners, but God sees there the human beings for whom Christ died. JUSTIFICATION is made possible through the work of the Holy Spirit. Human beings, although still capable of falling into sin, are freed from the fear of judgment. They are also freed from the sin of pride, because they know that justification is not their own work but solely that of a gracious God who in Christ suffered on their behalf. Good works become evidences of the redeemed life, and not ways of obtaining salvation.

Paul speaks of being "in Christ" and says that such people are a new creation. I.C.

SIN. A Religious Concept. In ordinary speech, the word "sin" is commonly used of any moral fault. This obscures the fact that it is primarily a religious concept. Sin is basically an offense against God. This is clear when we think of primitive and archaic religion, where sin was usually understood in ceremonial terms as the transgression of some rule connected with the cultus, though this rule might have no moral import. In the higher religions, however, sin is usually a moral as well as a religious matter. We sin against God by breaking the moral law. Our duty to God is closely related to our duty to the neighbor, and when we injure the neighbor, we thereby sin against God.

The essence of sin has been variously understood. The notion of lawbreaking or transgression has already been mentioned and is appropriate where God is understood as Lawgiver. In Greek, the word for sin was hamartia, "missing the mark," and the Greek philosophers often equated sin with ignorance. They believed that no one would sin who really understood what he or she was doing. But although some sin does arise from ignorance, this hardly accounts for deliberate sin. The notion of sin as stain or pollution is also common, and is important in the OT. This certainly emphasizes the personal nature of sin, which enters into and disfigures the person of the sinner. Some such notion of sin lies behind the ceremonial practices of washing and those ideas of ATONEMENT that stress the cleansing blood of Christ. In much modern theology, sin is understood as separation from God, a deep ESTRANGEMENT reflected in the sinner's ALIENATION from others and even from the self. Each of these ideas contributes something to the complex notion of sin.

Original and Corporate Sin. The universality of sin in human life has led to various theories of ORIGINAL SIN. In the crudest form of such theories, it is believed that the first sin of Adam and Eve produced in them an inward corruption and tendency toward sin that was hereditarily transmitted to their descendants, down to the present time. Though this view has been largely abandoned, the universality of sin remains as an observable fact of human life, and there is a residual truth in the doctrine of original sin. Most theologians today would be content to say that sin has so distorted human life that every new individual born into this world absorbs something of the sinful attitude. Original sin is, in the words of Schleiermacher, "in each the work of all, and in all the work of each." No doubt there is an ORIGINAL RIGHTEOUSNESS that is more original than original sin, for it is that original ideal of a humanity made in the IMAGE OF GOD. But actual humanity has everywhere departed from that archetype.

The words of Schleiermacher, just quoted, draw attention to the corporate nature of sin. We are too inclined to think of sin in individualistic terms. More frightening than any individual sin is the massive distortion of human society through injustice and evil passions, with its resultant damaging consequences for individual lives. These corporate dimensions of sin are far more stubborn than sin in the individual, as Reinhold Niebuhr pointed out. No one seems responsible, so no one's conscience is troubled. But Niebuhr may have been too pessimistic, for sometimes vast corporate sins have been overcome. The classic instance is slavery, and the same might happen with war.

Sin and Sins. At the heart of sin is an attitude of the whole person—the attitude of turning away from God in resentment and revolt. All actual sins follow from this basic attitude, and it is with the basic attitude that theologians have been primarily concerned, since only if it can be changed will specific sins be overcome. However, there is a danger that theologians will simply condemn all human actions as sinful without making distinctions. Calvin's statement, "Everything proceeding from the corrupt nature of man is damnable," is a judgment that can easily become anti-human. Niebuhr believed that Barth too was indiscriminate in his condemnation of sin, and that one has to acknowledge that there are relativities. All sin is bad, but some sins are worse than others.

Moral theologians have for a long time distinguished different sins and tried to analyze the specific nature of each. Broadly speaking, a division is made between sins of indulgence and sins of the spirit. The former—sloth, lust, gluttony, and so on—are the grosser and more obvious sins, and perhaps the ones that attract most popular disapproval. Among Christians, for instance, there has been undue preoccupation with sins connected with sex. On the other hand, as Niebuhr and before him Augustine believed, the most serious sins are spiritual rather than bodily—such sins as pride, arrogance, and the desire for domination. The original temptation in the garden of Eden was: "You will be like God." All sin is turning from God, but perhaps the most deadly is the attempt to take over from God. A turning from God, however, is also a turning to the creature, that is to say, an IDOLATRY or putting some finite being in place of God. Paul sees this as characteristic of the Fall of human beings: "They worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator" (Rom. 1:25). This links the sins of indulgence and pride, since both can be considered forms of idolatry.

Forgiveness and Punishment. The Bible attributes to God two responses to the sins of human creatures—forgiveness and punishment. We put forgiveness first, because it is God's affirmative response by which God seeks to overcome the damage that sin has done to the Creation. God's covenant and promise to Israel and to the whole creation stands in spite of human sin. So every falling away is met with forgiveness and the possibility of a new beginning. This culminates in the NT message of RECONCILIATION between God and humanity, effected by the work of Christ. Fallen human beings, who are unable to save themselves from sin, are offered the GRACE of forgiveness and renewal.

The alternative to forgiveness is punishment, and this remains as at least a hypothetical possibility. We need not think of God as a vengeful executioner, though God has sometimes been represented in this way. But we can envisage the possibility that the sinner will obstinately refuse the gifts of forgiveness and grace (and there is no "irresistible" grace that would violate personal being). If we suppose that people persist in sin, what then? Even in that case, their punishment is not something arbitrarily imposed by God; it is simply the unchecked working out of sin to its conclusion. When death was threatened as the punishment of sin, this was not some external punishment, but simply the dissolution of the sinner's being brought about by the ravages of sin itself. To indulge in lust and anger is to be inwardly torn apart by these passions, to be proud and arrogant is already to lapse into a coldness that freezes the springs of life, to be alienated from God is to be like a branch cut off from the vine that gives it life.

Sin and Finitude. It is important not to confuse sin with finitude. People cannot be blamed for not being God. Their finitude, however, makes it essential for their well-being that their lives should be lived in dependence on and companionship with God. We could say, however, that it is finitude that makes sin possible, perhaps even inevitable. Kierkegaard explored this question when he showed how finitude gives rise to an anxiety that issues in the sinful act. Other writers have tried to be more specific in linking finitude to sin. William Temple believed that it is the fact that each human being is an individual, seeing the world from one's own point of view, that gives an initial tendency toward self-centeredness. Leibnitz claimed more generally that all finitude implies imperfection; for instance, in the human being it implies imperfect knowledge and thus mistakes. Sin is not a fate, but it is perhaps inevitable in the development of the human being, who combines both freedom and finitude, and in the end it makes possible a more mature relation between redeemed humanity and God than would have been possible if that relation had never advanced beyond the immediacy of what has been called "dreaming innocence." This helps to explain why the sin of the garden of Eden came to be called by Christian theologians the felix culpa or "happy fault." J.M.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF. The desert region between Elim and Mount Sinai through which the Hebrews passed during their EXODUS from Egypt (Exod. 16:1; 17:1; Num. 33:11-12). Though its name resembles that of Sinai, the itinerary of the Hebrews offered in both Exodus and Numbers assumes two distinct regions. Presumably, the Wilderness of Sin is situated at the western edge of the Sinai Peninsula. Likely the ancient equivalent of modern Debbet er-Ramleh, it should not be confused with the Wilderness of Zin, located directly south of Judah. J.K.K.

SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT. A particular sin of an attitude opposing God described, among other places, in Mark 3:28; Matthew 12:31-32; and Luke 12:10; sometimes called BLASPHEMY against the Holy Spirit, or the UNFORGIVABLE SIN.

The sayings of Jesus about the sin against the Holy Spirit have always proved troublesome to commentators, whether Augustine, the Scholastics of the Middle Ages, the Reformers, or present-day theologians. Mark describes this sin as a denial of Christ's work and that of the Holy Spirit, crediting it instead to an evil spirit.

The sin is basically a denial of God and of God's authority. Yet Christianity has long taught the possibility of forgiveness and of faith up till the time of death, even as Christ forgave the penitent thief on the cross, since only sin against the Holy Spirit cuts one off from God. If one can ever confess faith in Christ as Savior and Messiah, however, there is no longer any chance of being guilty of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit.

Christ constantly pointed to the Pharisees as examples of those who had lost all power to retrace their steps and had therefore cut themselves off permanently from God's forgiveness. These sayings of Jesus should not trouble concerned seekers after God, since by their very seeking they demonstrate they have not reached this state. T.J.K.

SINAI, MOUNT. The name of the sacred mountain before which the Israelites encamped during the EXODUS. The same site is called "Horeb" in Deuteronomy. Thus Moses is summoned at "Horeb, the mountain of God" (Exod. 3:1), and there Elijah experiences Yahweh's presence (I Kings 19:8). Lacking geographical distinctiveness, Sinai and Horeb are presumably the same site.

Israel's Encounter with God. At Sinai (Exod. 19-24) Israel experienced Yahweh's self-revelation and joined Yahweh in covenantal relationship based on the Law imparted through Moses, the unique mediator representing the people to God (19:8; 20:21) and God to the people (19:3, 7; 24:3). Following covenant ratification (24:3-8), Moses returned to Sinai's summit for forty days (24:18). Audible and visual elements forcefully signaling Yahweh's august presence included thunder and lightning (19:16; 20:18), cloud (24:15), fire (19:18; 24:17), smoke (20:18), and thick darkness (20:21).

Sinai's Location. Given the disparate biblical evidence, the locus of Mount Sinai is debated. Traditionally it has been equated with Jebel Mûsâ

Traditional Mount Sinai with St. Catherine's Monastery at the base

(Arabic: "Mount of Moses"), a 7,500-foot summit situated in the southern apex of the Sinai Peninsula.

Two alternatives merit mention. Those who interpret the Exodus 19 portrayal of Yahweh's self-revelation historically claim that volcanic activity is reflected. They favor territory east of the Gulf of Aqaba in Midian, where extinct volcanoes exist. They also note that after fleeing Egypt, Moses married into a priestly family of Midianites (Exod. 3:1; 18:1). This proposal, however, establishes a much greater distance between Egypt and Sinai than the biblical narratives imply. Moreover, the Midianites were not confined to northwest Arabia. The family Moses joined was part of the Kenite clan of roving smiths. Consequently, this group would have ample motive to visit Sinai's copper mines. Reference to the quaking mountain (Exod. 19:18) is metaphorical and no more conducive to literal appropriation than, say, the disclosure in Psalm 29:6a that Yahweh's powerful voice "makes Lebanon to skip like a calf." Manifestations of God typically embrace awesome natural phenomena as evidence of Yahweh's marvelous presence (Ps. 18:7-15 offers a superb example).

Others locate Mount Sinai at Jebel Helal west of Kadesh, a northern oasis on the Sinai Peninsula. Kadesh enjoyed prominence in the Israelite memory about wilderness wandering, and is near Seir and Paran, regions poetically associated with Sinai (Deut. 33:2; Judg. 5:4-5; Hab. 3:3). Moreover, Exodus 15:22 and Judges 11:16 imply a direct trek from Egypt to Kadesh. Nevertheless, the poetic texts lack sufficient precision to settle the issue. Certainly the notation in Deuteronomy 1:2 that Mount Horeb (Sinai) and Kadesh are separated by an eleven-day journey embarrasses this proposal.

The view that Sinai is distant from Kadesh (likewise assumed by Num. 33:2-49) plays no havoc with the traditional view, advanced since the fourth century A.D., locating the sacred mountain at Jebel Mûsâ. The present Monastery of Saint Catherine situated on its northwestern slope can be traced to A.D. 527. Legend claims that after her martyrdom, angels carried Catherine of Alexandria to the top of the mountain now bearing her name (Jebel Katarin, adjacent to Jebel Mûsâ's summit). From the monastery it is a ninety-minute climb to Jebel Mu-sâ's summit. That this location has been inaccessible and dangerous for pilgrims across the centuries itself speaks for the antiquity and authority of the tradition. Moreover, the regularly unpatrolled Egyptian copper mines of Serâbit el-Khâdim located nearby might have attracted Moses' Kenite associates. The traditional identification, albeit unprovable, is attractive.

Conclusion. Biblical Israel was far more taken with the content of the event than its location. The theophany, Law, and covenant linked with Mount Sinai truly facilitated Yahweh's becoming the God of Israel and Israel's becoming the people of Yahweh.

Codex Sinaiticus (fourth century A.D.), the only early Greek manuscript containing the entire NT. Sheets are of high quality vellum, probably made from antelope skins.

bound together within covers. The adjective "Sinaiticus" is given to the manuscript, comprising virtually the entire Bible, discovered by L. F. K. von Tischendorf in 1844 in the monastery on Mount Sinai. It is now in the British Library, London. The extant copy contains most of the biblical books plus some parts of the OT Apocrypha, including some extra-canonical works such as the letter of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas. The first edition of the Codex, abbreviated by the Hebrew letter Aleph or S (Sinaiticus), is fourth century in origin, with scribal copies of later date. These copies are labeled by Aleph with an upraised small letter such as a, b, or c to denote scribal correctors. The textual evidence of Aleph is regarded as important, especially where it agrees with B (Codex Vaticanus), mainly in the Synoptic Gospels and Pauline letters. (See BIBLE, TEXT OF.)

SISERA. The leader of the Canaanite confederacy presumably allied with Aegean elements that unsuccessfully competed against the Israelites for mastery over the Esdraelon Plain (about 1125 B.C.). Though Judges 4 identifies Sisera as the army commander of King Jabin of Hazor (4:2), Judges 5, containing the archaic Song of Deborah, presents

Sisera as the head of a coalition of Canaanite monarchs and omits mention of Jabin. Forced to flee from Israel's foot soldiers when the flooding waters of the Kishon bogged down the Canaanite chariots, Sisera sought refuge with Heber the Kenite, with whom he was on good terms. Heber's wife Jael, a deadly hostess, killed Sisera unawares, thereby parading her loyalty to Israel (4:18-21; 5:24-27). J.K.K.

SISTINE CHAPEL. Famous chapel decorated by Michelangelo in the VATICAN during the reign of Pope Sixtus IV (1471-84), for whom it was named. It was originally a chapel and also a fortification (or keep), but later other walls were built and it lost its defensive function. It contains the outstanding paintings of the Creation on its ceiling and of the Last Judgment on the altar wall. J.C.

SITUATION ETHICS. Situation ethics is often referred to as the "new morality," a movement in contemporary Christian ethics initiated by Joseph Fletcher in an article entitled "A New Look in Christian Ethics" (1959). The view was given prominence in the chapter on ethics in Bishop John A. T. Robinson's best-selling Honest to God (1963). Joseph Fletcher expanded his position in Situation Ethics: the New Morality (1966).

In contrast to LEGALISM or antinomianism, Fletcher proposes the situational method for making moral decisions. This method is pragmatic, relativistic, positivistic (that is, based on faith), and personal. Christian ethics interprets the situation and utilizes the situational method within the context of Christian faith and love. Fletcher's method is informed by six propositions: (1) only love is always good; (2) the ruling norm of Christian decision is love alone; (3) love includes justice, which is love distributed; (4) love does not depend upon liking a person; (5) love as the end justifies the means; and (6) decisions in love are to be made in particular circumstances.

Situation ethics evoked a storm of controversy in the 1960s and continues as a subject of discussion. Proponents emphasize its focus upon people and actual cases as a means for overcoming rigid legalism and prepackaged answers in Christian ethical reflection. Critics point to the utilitarian tendency of situation ethics, the imprecision of movement from loving intentions to loving consequences, the lack of clarity in relating the facts of particular cases to value judgments, and the limited view of the situation among adherents of situation ethics.

In spite of the difficulties of situation ethics, the movement has served as a corrective to certain tendencies in contemporary Christian ethics. For example, H. Richard Niebuhr held that the reduction of ethics to TELEOLOGY and deontology is inadequate. These two types must be supplemented by responsibility in context to form a threefold method in Christian ethics. Situation ethics has in some measure made up for the lack that Niebuhr saw, though its corrective has, in the view of many, focused too narrowly on the immediate situation rather than on the comprehensive context intended by Niebuhr. In similar fashion, situation ethics has also served to correct the tendencies in recent decades toward excessive emphasis in Christian ethics on rules and on rationalism. (See also RELATIVISM.) SITZ IM LEBEN. The German phrase for "the setting in life," a term used in biblical criticism to refer to the situation in which a biblical passage was written. Used in redaction (editorial) criticism, it aims to demonstrate the prevailing conditions in the life of a group that caused the biblical writer to present an idea (for example, the teachings of Jesus) in a certain way. SIVAN. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

SIX HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SIX. See BEAST.

SKANDHAS. From the Sanskrit word for "bundles." In the philosophy of BUDDHISM, the entities that comprise a human being. Themselves aggregates or bundles of the primordial particles, dharmas, the human skandhas are five in number: physical form, senses, perceptions, reactions (for example, an emotional response), and consciousness. The skandha concept emphasizes the composite and hence imper-manent (that is, anatman or "no self") nature of the human being. R.E.

SKEPTICISM. Skepticism denotes: (1) a general attitude of doubt, (2) a philosophical tradition originating in ancient Greece that questions the possibility of authentic knowledge, and (3) the doubting of particular religious, scientific, or societal convictions.

The term derives from skepsis, a Greek word originally meaning "inquiry" or "speculation" in a reflective manner, especially related to sense perception. Further developing Socrates' questioning method, Pyrrho (about 360–270 B.C.) and thinkers of the third century B.C. in Plato's Academy initiated skepticism as a philosophy that challenged the reliability of sense perception and proposed to doubt the truth of all assertions.

AUGUSTINE (A.D. 354–430) sought to refute skepticism, affirming that doubt presupposes faith and that philosophy is faith seeking understanding. Medieval and Reformation thinkers tended to use skepticism to show the inadequacy of reason and the need for revelation and faith.

DESCARTES (1596–1650) developed a rigorous skepticism to strip away the dubious, leaving "clear and distinct" ideas as a basis for knowledge. The skepticism of David Hume (1711–76) about all knowledge provoked IMMANUEL KANT (1724–1804) to formulate his critical philosophy. In this perspective, only natural scientific knowledge is certain, while religious convictions rest on mere faith or moral certainty. Much philosophy and theology in the twentieth century have been preoccupied with the problems posed by the critical separation of objectivity from subjectivity and of knowledge from faith.

Michael Polanyi (1891–1976) illustrates the emergence of a post-critical attitude toward skepticism, holding that all knowing takes place within a communal context of faith. When skepticism ignores this tacit dimension of knowing, it destroys the possibility of knowledge in every area, including the natural sciences. Doubting presupposes a background of believing that defines the meaning and limits of skepticism. Skepticism, therefore, provides correctives to inherited dogmas—scientific, societal, religious—but has no meaning apart from communities of interpretation and commitment. (See also RELATIVISM.) SKINNER, B. F. See BEHAVIORISM.

SLAVERY. An institution, involving one person's legal ownership of another, widely embraced in the biblical world as essential to the social order.

Just as slavery is addressed by such second-millennium B.C. Mesopotamian documents as the Laws of Eshnunna, the Lipit-Ishtar Law Code, the Code of Hammurabi, and the Middle Assyrian Laws, so it is addressed by biblical legislation in Exodus 21, Leviticus 25, and Deuteronomy 15. Slaves were obtained by wartime capture (Num. 31:9; II Chr. 28:8), purchase from slave owners (Gen. 17:27), and self sale, when there was no other way for the poor to meet financial indebtedness (Lev. 25:47) or the thief to make restitution (Exod. 22:3). Biblical narratives refer to defaulting debtors fleeing from their creditors (I Sam. 22:2), parents agitated that they might have to sell their children (Neh. 5:1-5), and the creditor preparing to seize the offspring of his deceased debtor (II Kings 4:1). Some slaves taken in war became the property of either the sanctuary (Josh. 9:27) or the crown (II Sam. 12:31), but most slaves served as domestics in the homes and fields of their masters.

Though biblical Israel did not question this institution, memory of its own enslavement in Egypt led to a humanitarian treatment of slaves who were valued as human beings as well as chattel. A slave wounded by his master was granted freedom (Exod. 21:26-27). Sabbath rest was mandated for both slaves and masters (Exod. 20:10). Slaves were entitled to freedom after six years of service, and masters were urged to be generous when liberating them (Deut. 15:12-14). The fugitive slave escaping from his master in a foreign land was to be granted asylum in Israel (Deut. 23:15-16 [the Code of Hammurabi decrees the death penalty for such harboring]). Ecclesiastes recommends leniency toward the slave who curses his master (Eccl. 7:21-22).

With population statistics yielding a slave-freedman ratio of one to five throughout the Roman Empire, the presence of slaves in the early church was, of course, accepted without incident. Nevertheless, the NT epistles advocate a brotherly interaction between master and slave (Philem. 16) and affirm that slave and free are one "in Christ" (Gal. 3:28; I Cor. 12:13). Masters are admonished to treat their slaves fairly (Col. 4:1; Eph. 6:9). Slaves, in turn, are urged to be respectful (I Tim. 6:1-2), to work conscientiously (Col. 3:22-23), and to strive for integrity (Tit. 2:10). The Gospels attest the slave as a stock figure in the teachings of Jesus (Matt. 25:14-30; Mark 10:43-45; Luke 14:16-24) and portray Jesus healing servants who were the property of the centurion (Matt. 8:5-13) and high priest (Luke 22:50-51).

SMITH, JOSEPH (1805–44). Mormon founder and prophet. He was born on December 23 in Sharon, Vermont, to Joseph and Lucy Mack Smith. In 1816 the family moved to Palmyra, New York. Joseph experienced his first vision in the spring of 1820, followed by similar ones in 1823, in which the angel Nephi (later called Moroni) appeared to him. The angel said that no sect on earth represented God's will, that the church of Christ had been withdrawn, and that Smith was chosen to restore it.

On September 22, 1827, Smith was shown plates of gold at Hill Cumorah, Ontario County, New York, which recorded the "true" history of the church in America. His three-year translation of the plates was published in July 1830 as the Book of Mormon. Along with A Book of Commandments (1833) and Doctrine and Covenants (1835), it forms the basis of Mormonism. Smith founded the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS on April 6, 1830. The church was at once millennial, restorationist, and perfectionist.

On June 18, 1827, Smith married Emma Hale of Harmony, Pennsylvania. She bore him five children, including Joseph Smith (1832–1914). Smith (the father) allegedly had as many as twenty-seven other wives and in 1843 declared that polygamy was a part of Mormon belief and practice. In 1831 Smith moved his flock to Kirtland, Ohio, in 1838 to Missouri, and in 1839 they were forced to Commerce, Illinois, which Smith renamed NAUVOO. There the Mormons grew and prospered. In 1844 Smith even announced he would run for the presidency. His destruction of his critics' press, however, gave outsiders an excuse for revenge. He and his brother were imprisoned in Carthage, Illinois, and were taken out and shot.

SMITH, SAMUEL FRANCIS (1808–95). Baptist minister, linguist, author, and hymn writer. Smith gained his greatest fame as the one who penned the words for "America," which was introduced on July 4, 1832, by Lowell Mason's children's choir at Park Street Congregational Church, Boston. Educated at Boston Latin School and Harvard College (where Oliver Wendell Holmes was a classmate), Smith received his ministerial training at Andover Theological Seminary. His first church was in Waterville, Maine, where he also taught modern languages at Colby College. Later Smith was called to the Baptist Church at Newton, Massachusetts, from which he resigned to become secretary of the American Baptist Missionary Union. He and Baron Stow compiled The Psalmist: A New Collection of Hymns (1843), a widely known Baptist hymnal. His deep missionary interest is reflected in "The Morning Light Is Breaking." His immersionist convictions are contained in "Down to the Sacred Wave." Smith died at Newton Center, Massachusetts, on November 16. R.H.

SMYRNA. The present-day Turkish city of Izmir on the shores of the Aegean Sea. It was one of the SEVEN CHURCHES addressed by John in the book of Revelation; he encouraged it to remain faithful during the Roman persecutions. Perhaps the most beautiful city of Asia Minor, rivaled only by Ephesus, this seaport had a large Jewish colony. One of its early bishops was the church father Polycarp. T.J.K.

SNAKE HANDLING. This is a phenomenon that has been practiced by a small group of Pentecostals, mostly outlawed congregations of the Church of God, in Appalachia. During the course of fervent services the snake handlers pass poisonous snakes, usually rattlers or copperheads, from one member of the congregation to another. This is done in observance of the phrase in Mark 16:18, "they shall take up serpents" (KJV).

The initiator of the practice was "Little" George Hensley, who in 1909 climbed White Oak Mountain, which rims Grasshopper Valley (Tenn.), in search of a large rattlesnake. A few days later, while conducting evangelistic services at nearby Sale Creek, Hensley quoted the Markan passage, thrust the rattlesnake at the people, and challenged them to take it up as a test of their faith.

Thereafter the practice of snake handling continued, until Garland Defriese, one of Hensley's converts, was bitten. In the summer of 1938 three members of the Pine Mountain Church of God were arrested for a breach of the peace—reptile handling. Later they were acquitted. Bona fide figures on the number of groups that practice snake handling are impossible to track down, but reports indicate that the phenomenon continues. R.H.

SOBORNOST. The Russian Orthodox term for synod or church assembly, akin to the Greek concept of koinonia. In Orthodoxy, there is a mystical sense to the sobornost, a union or henosis between priests and laypeople that expresses itself in the traditional liturgy. This unity is considered superior to the polity of Catholicism and Protestantism. J.C.

SOCIAL DARWINISM. A term for the use of evolutionary ideas, drawn from the writings of CHARLES DARWIN and HERBERT SPENCER, and applied to ethics, social theory, and history. Social Darwinism was prevalent in England, Europe, and especially in America between the 1880s and World War I. The Social Darwinists were particularly taken with the Darwinian idea of development from simple, homogeneous forms of life to higher, more complex forms. They also accepted Spencer's evolutionary optimism with regard to society, based on the view that the "struggle for existence" has a beneficial effect on the progress of the human race by ensuring the "survival of the fittest." They assumed that pressure of subsistence on human populations encourages the development of skill, intelligence, and adaptability.

Acceptance of Lamarck's theory of the inheritance of acquired characteristics by Social Darwinists gave impetus both to competition and to social planning and eugenics. Social Darwinism thus produced contradictory social theories. Some emphasized Darwinian natural selection through the struggle among members of the species to justify extreme views of laissez-faire political economy. Others argued, on the basis of natural selection as a struggle between species and races, for imperialistic policies based on national and racial superiority. One of the most dangerous twentieth-century offshoots of this vogue of Social Darwinism was the myth of Aryan supremacy and the prominence of anti-Semitic theories derived, for example, from the popular writing of Houston Stewart Chamberlin. SOCIAL ETHICS. See ETHICS.

SOCIAL GOSPEL. This term, often used imprecisely and pejoratively, refers to the general teaching arising in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries that sought to relate the Christian gospel to the social environment as well as to individuals.

The Social Gospel was a product of liberal Protestantism that for a time exercised the dominant influence on United States Christianity. The German-American WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH (1861–1918), who was moved by the dislocations in society caused by industrialization, gained the title "Father of the Social Gospel in America." Essentially, the Social Gospel movement was a transitory phase of Christian social thought, a submovement within religious liberalism. Because of its optimistic view of human nature, many of its critics believe the Social Gospel did not prepare Christians for two world wars and the depression. The Social Gospelers were crusaders who believed in social progress and the essential goodness of people.

The Social Gospel movement was given formal expression in 1908, when the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America was formed. Many of its ideals were embodied in the New Deal legislation of the 1930s.

The Social Gospel is an identifiable development in American religious thinking. While it did emerge from liberal interpretations of the faith, it cannot be denied that it stressed the truth of the gospel's relationship to the world in which Christians are called upon to witness.

In the intense struggle of FUNDAMENTALISM and MODERNISM in the early part of the twentieth century, orthodox believers tended to speak disparagingly of the Social Gospel with its liberal origins. The Fundamentalists moved defensively into a position of declaring that the unique—the only—task of the church was the preaching of the gospel. Only toward the end of the twentieth century did Evangelicals reassert their concern for people's social as well as spiritual needs.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE (SPCK). In response to pleas from colonists in Maryland, the bishop of London commissioned Thomas Bray to find them Bibles, Christian books, and pastoral help. He and others founded SPCK in 1698. It was given a royal charter in 1701 and continues to be a major English publisher today. SPCK initially provided free libraries for the colonies. Many Christian schools and teacher training colleges were founded in Britain and on various British mission fields around the world under its auspices.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS. The SPGFP was founded by the Reverend Thomas Bray in 1701. Bray had been sent from England to inspect the state of church life in the American colonies. The purpose of the society was to minister to English settlers overseas and also among the Indians. The first missionaries were sent to North America, but soon afterward the work of the society spread to several other outposts of British colonialism such as India, Burma, South Africa, and even to other territories such as Japan, North China, Korea, and Polynesia. In 1965 the SPGFP united with the Universities Mission to Central Africa to form the United Society for Promoting the Gospel, under which name it continues its missionary endeavors.

SOCINIANS/SOCINUS. A sixteenth-century religious group, precursors of UNITARIANISM. They accepted Jesus as God's revelation but considered him primarily human, and divine only by office, not by nature.

The group originated in Italy with the work of Laelius Socinus (1525–62) and his nephew Faustus (1539–1604). (Socinus is the latinized form of Sozzini.) Laelius, trained in law at Padua, was a friend of John Calvin and Philipp Melancthon. Faustus' anti-trinitarian views were denounced by the Inquisition in 1559. He published them anyway in 1562 and in 1563 denied human immortality. He fled to Poland, where the Polish Brethren, under his leadership, grew to three hundred congregations. Their center was Rakow, where Socinian views were taught in the university and propagated by its press, until forced to close in 1638 by Jesuit persecution. In 1658 the Polish Diet offered the Socinians their choice of exile or conformity. Some fled to Transylvania, the Netherlands, and Germany, where they were gradually absorbed by other groups.

SOCIOBIOLOGY. A new field of science that emerged during the 1970s that proposes to apply the findings of evolutionary biology and genetics to human behavior in areas previously dealt with by anthropology, sociology, and ethics. Much controversy has surrounded sociobiology because of claims such as those by zoologist Edward O. Wilson (Sociobiology: the New Synthesis, 1975; On Human Nature, 1978) that the new discipline will be able to displace the dying social sciences by "biologizing" them.

The analytical methods of evolutionary biology have made remarkable advances in recent decades in dealing with certain adaptive patterns of animal and insect behavior. For example, worker ants that produce no offspring apparently have evolved to provide for the progeny of the queen ant and thus serve the purposes of the community. Their behavior in the ant society can be explained on the basis of biological programming to ensure not the survival of the individual insect but of the group and its genes. Building on this success in explaining nonhuman behavior, sociobiologists first offered genetic explanations of such forms of human behavior as sexual relationships and orientation, war, religion, and the design of architecture, and subsequently developed an explanatory model based on genetic/cultural coevolution.

Sociobiologists do not assert that human social behavior is totally dependent upon or determined by biological factors, specifically genetic programming. However, when there is a choice between two alternative patterns of behavior, for example, between monogamy and polygamy, rules representing genetic predisposition condition the outcome. These theories suggest the possible importance of genetic engineering and gene-splicing.

Critics of sociobiology point to its insufficiency for clear results, to its overly complex biological analyses of simple human behavioral issues, and to its tendency toward theological comprehensiveness rather than scientific precision. The accusation is also made that sociobiology can easily become a successor to SOCIAL DARWINISM, a movement of the late nineteenth century claiming that the socially rich and powerful must be the fittest and the best. Many fear that sociobiology will provide the basis for continued discrimination against people of particular races and those who are socially disadvantaged.

Though these criticisms must be kept in mind, sociobiology gives promise of throwing new light on human behavior and relating the natural sciences more closely to the social sciences and humanities. Some of its claims seem exaggerated, but it deserves continuing attention and careful evaluation.

SOCIOLOGICAL STRUCTURALIST CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION. The term "sociology" was invented by the French philosopher AUGUSTE COMTE (1795–1857) as a designation for a grand synthesis of knowledge of humanity. Its methods were to be "positivistic": observation, experimentation, and comparison. In the spirit of the later eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, Comte sought to free human thought from traditional religious authority in order to explore and understand human origins and human culture. Earlier thinkers, whose work anticipated the aims of Comte, had sought to trace statistically the changes in human society through population and migration studies, but the focus of sociology soon shifted to political and cultural factors. These lines of inquiry were greatly facilitated by detailed studies of primitive societies in lands newly accessible to the West, or seriously analyzed for the first time and in their own terms. An important ingredient in these investigations, which paved the way for anthropology, was what was known as "folk psychology"—how members of a particular society viewed the world, their origins, their destiny. Akin to this was the analysis of the social process itself: individual and group behavior patterns, societal structures, including class stratification and development of leadership, and the perception of group identity. Strongly influential in the development of these methods were the theories of evolution, which gave rise to such notions as the survival of the fittest and inevitable progress.

In the later nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, scholars interested in ancient cultures—both those of Greece and Rome and those of the ancient Near East—turned to archaeological, literary, and inscriptional sources, with the aim of performing analyses similar to those of the sociologists and anthropologists. The aim in most cases was to discern universal patterns of human behavior, individually and corporately. Meanwhile sociological theoreticians were seeking to discover the general laws of human social behavior and societal development in order to understand the past and to predict the future. Inevitably, these lines of inquiry affected the study of religion, which is a common feature of all societies. Those who wanted to place biblical religion in a framework of universal religious experience were eager to utilize the new methods, whether to classify the biblical evidence in the general categories of religion, as in the studies by E. B. Tylor (1932–1917), or in the still widely utilized approach of JAMES G. FRAZER (in The Golden Bough), whose encyclopedic study treats the variety of world religions as variations on a basic theme of a dying and rising divinity. Those who wanted to affirm the special character of biblical religion understandably held aloof from the sociological enterprise with its drive toward generalizations.

Thinkers who were seeking to trace patterns of historical development, on the other hand, including the emergence of early Christianity, are exemplified by the so-called Tübingen School in Germany, which took its cue from G. W. F. HEGEL'S theory that human history moves by a dialectical process in which an idea (thesis) evokes a counter-idea (antithesis), from which then emerges a new, higher synthesis. For example, Paul's law-free gospel (thesis) is attacked by Judaizing Christians (antithesis), from which there emerges early catholic Christianity (synthesis). KARL MARX, on the other hand, regarded history as moving on through the actions and reactions of economic and social forces, rather than of ideas. Responding to Marx's theory, MAX WEBER proposed that the history of any society is shaped by the network of values, convictions, and aspirations that it shares. In addition to his study, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, in which he directly takes issue with Marxist theory, Weber undertook detailed studies of religious traditions in the Middle and Far East to show how they are constitutive for their respective societies. The most significant of these for biblical studies was Ancient Judaism. In this work Weber sought to show how Israel had changed historically from a loose aggregation of tribes among whom spontaneous ("charismatic") leaders emerged in time of crisis, to a unified nation, with institutionalized political and religious powers and with a common central shrine under a king.

Perhaps because both liberal and evangelical Protestants were preoccupied with their own respective forms of religious individualism, the potential of Weber's sociological approach for the study of biblical history went largely unrealized. There were some short-lived efforts at the University of Chicago in the 1920s and 1930s to use this resource as support for the Social Gospel by reconstructing the social setting of primitive Christianity. And in Germany, the form-critics M. Dibelius and R. Bultmann talked about the life situation (Sitz im Leben) of the oral traditions later incorporated into the Gospels, but their focus was almost solely on the ideas of the Gospel material rather than on the specifics of the social structures and dynamics. Similarly, in the OT field, archaeologists, such as W. F. Albright, were seeking to assemble and assess for historical purposes the mass of archaeological and inscriptional evidence from the ancient Near East, with its enormous potential for aiding historical reconstruction of ancient Israelite society. And a century and more of classical studies, as well as the discovery of quantities of writings from the Greco-Roman period, including personal and commercial records, shed new light on social details of the culture of this period during which Pauline and the other NT writings were produced in the Roman world. But apart from pointing out parallels or general similarities between specific ideas and practices in the Bible and those in the ancient world, little systematic use was made of this evidence for sociological analysis. Efforts at historical reconstruction in the OT period at the turn of this century include the work of Julius Wellhausen (1884–1918), whose analysis of the oral and literary forms embedded in the biblical material and whose empathy for the poetic and mythic elements in the Bible (in contrast to his skepticism about historical reconstruction) evidenced a closer kinship to sociologists than to historians. Only since the 1970s has a broad-based effort been made by biblical scholars to utilize sociological methods for biblical history and interpretation; yet nearly the entire range of those methods and theory has been put to use.

Sociology concerns itself with social organization, social psychology, and social change. Akin to these, but emphasizing description and classification of data rather than tracing patterns of development, is anthropology, within which may be distinguished ethnology (comparative study of customs), social anthropology (comparison of social organizations), and ethnography (gathering evidence about human societies), which is assisted by archaeology (material remains of ancient cultures). In recent years a kindred undertaking is sociology of knowledge, which builds on Max Weber's concept of values as forming the basis of a society. The concern of social anthropologists for the social function of phenomena, as distinguished from mere description, meshes well with sociology of knowledge and with sociology of literature (the analysis of the social function of a writing). For example, the social function of an exorcism in one society may be the display of magical power, while in another (the gospel tradition), an exorcism is a sign of the coming of God's rule (Luke 11:20).

In OT studies, some of the major areas of interest for sociological inquiry have been whether the tribal structure of ancient Israel in the period before the monarchy is to be seen as a loose confederation around a common shrine (Martin Noth) or a peasants' revolt (George Mendenhall, and from a Marxist perspective, Norman Gottwald); what was the social function of the prophets and what is the historical significance of the genealogies (Robert R. Wilson); what was the social situation that gave rise to Jewish apocalyptic (Paul D. Hanson). On the NT side, traditional sociological questions and methods that treat of class and economic distinctions appear in the significant work of Gerd Theissen of Heidelberg, who has published illuminating analyses of the Jesus movement and of the Pauline churches. Wayne Meeks of Yale has produced an important study of The First Urban Christians, working from socio-economic evidence both within and outside of the NT. As noted above, in OT studies Robert R. Wilson of Yale has provided valuable insight into the social dynamics of Israel's history and religion through his use of sociological methods. Some attempts have been made by exponents of liberation theology to reconstruct the origins of Israel and of the church by the use of Marxist sociology, with results that are heavily ideological and not historically persuasive to most.

In France and to a lesser extent in North America the attempt has been made to use the anthropological theories of Claude Lévi-Strauss in NT studies, especially his notion that all human thought may be reduced to patterns of "binary opposition," such as good/evil, real/unreal, literal/figurative. By this method both the historical development evident in the Bible and the intentions of the authors are dismissed as unimportant, in favor of timeless patterns present universally in the human mind. Like the methods of the history of religions school and the psychologists of religion (of Jungian persuasion) who want to discern eternal mental models of religious experience, the results are counterproductive for the historical study of the Bible.

Of all the anthropologists whose work has been utilized in biblical studies, the one whose contribution has been the greatest and the most direct is Mary Douglas, whose studies of purity and boundaries that demarcate social and religious communities has a direct and immensely fruitful contribution to make in both OT and NT studies. Her own work on Levitical purity makes the links explicit.

Some scholars have been content to draw on anthropology primarily to provide categories for classifying biblical phenomena, but their work ignores the distinctiveness of the changing historical contexts in which the biblical people lived and wrote. By contrast, the most significant work being done in the biblical field combines insights from the anthropological methods and studies with sociology of knowledge, as represented by the work of Peter Berger, Thomas Luckmann, and Alfred Schutz. This method takes fully into account the view of the world shared by a distinct segment of society and constitutive of its values, its hopes and anxieties, its leadership, and its social structure. By raising these kinds of questions concerning the changing world of the biblical writers, in both OT and NT times, the distinctive features and the diversity that is there represented may be discerned and illuminated. Since in the biblical tradition the Word of God is always addressed to human beings in human terms, and since human existence is always societal in nature, it is essential that the social dimensions of the Bible be taken into account in interpreting the biblical message and reconstructing its history.

Introductory manuals for using sociological methods in biblical interpretation include Robert R. Wilson's Sociological Approaches to the Old Testament (1984) and Howard C. Kee's Christian Origins in Sociological Perspective (1980).

SOCRATES (about 470–399 B.C.). Greek thinker, regarded as the father of Western philosophy and perhaps the greatest figure in the history of Greek thought. Socrates turned Greek philosophy away from the pre-Socratic interest in cosmology to the concerns of human conduct. There is little agreement on what can be known of the historical Socrates or of his specific contributions to philosophical doctrine. Living at the time of Athens' splendor, he was known for his physical robustness and endurance and distinguished himself for bravery in the Peloponnesian War. Historians have long been engaged by the "problem of Socrates," or determining his actual philosophical teaching. The sources—Xenophon's Socratic works (Memorabilia and Symposium), PLATO's dialogues, and statements in ARISTOTLE and Aristophanes's Clouds—give contradictory evidence. Xenophon makes him out to be a popular ethical teacher, while Plato portrays Socrates as a sophisticated metaphysician.

Socrates's method of philosophizing, it is agreed, was "dialectical" or conversational. He would engage a companion and profess ignorance on a subject, for example, the meaning of courage. When the companion offered a definition, Socrates would raise a few questions, exposing the inadequacy of the companion's response. In this way he would lead his companion to a more adequate, universal definition. Some found Socrates's method irritating and humiliating, but his aim was to discover truth and the good life. Socrates believed in the unity of knowledge and virtue, that is, that clear knowledge of truth is essential for a virtuous and happy life. Furthermore, he believed that knowledge and virtue are one in that the man who knows what is right will do what is right.

This ethical rationalism is criticized by some who would claim that Socrates didn't take into account the irrational character of the human will. Socrates insisted, nevertheless, that virtue is teachable and he certainly practiced what he preached. About 400 B.C. Socrates was accused by the court of King Archon of (1) not worshipping the gods of the State and (2) corrupting the youth (by instilling in them the spirit of criticism). He refused to go into exile or to make special appeal to the court. Rather, he made light of the charges. He was sentenced to death and refused to escape when it was arranged by his friends. He died of his own hand by taking the poison hemlock. The nobility of his last day and death is recounted by Plato in the Phaedo.

SODOM. Like its twin, GOMORRAH, the legendary city of Sodom is described in Genesis 10:19 as lying at the southeastern border of Canaan. It is identified with LOT, the nephew of Abraham, in Genesis

Pillar of salt on Jebel Usdum ("Mount of Sodom"), located on the shore of the Dead Sea near Sodom

13:1-13, where the stage is set for Sodom's abiding image as Sin City: "Now the men of Sodom were wicked, great sinners against the Lord." In Genesis 14 Sodom is one of the five cities that fight a losing battle in the region of the Dead Sea against the four kings of the East. Attempts to locate Sodom either alongside or under the southern end of the Dead Sea have not, however, brought any trace of it to light.

Genesis 18:16-33 is the famous account of Abraham's bargaining session with Yahweh over the fate of Sodom. The Lord agrees to spare the city if as few as ten righteous people can be found there, but chapter 19 reveals that not even that small number can be reached. Sodom's fate is sealed when the two angels who had visited Abraham and Sarah in the previous chapter are trapped in Lot's house by the men of that place who demand that they be brought forth for the purpose of homosexual abuse (known in our criminal codes as "sodomy"). Yahweh urges Lot and his household to flee from the impending destruction of Sodom. When Lot's wife looks back at the spectacle of Sodom's demise she immediately becomes a pillar of salt.

In the majority of the ensuing biblical references, Sodom is used together with Gomorrah as a metaphor for utter human depravity. In a curious reversal, however, the prophet Ezekiel favorably compares Sodom with her "sisters" Samaria and the harlot Jerusalem, to provide a standard against which the even greater wickedness of his contemporary community could be dramatized. Similarly, Jesus warns the cities in which his miracles had been performed that "if the mighty works done in you had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day" (Matt. 11:23).

In Luke 17:29-30, the destruction of Sodom by fire and brimstone is an analogy for the day of the coming of the Son of man. That analogy is echoed in another way in Jude 7, where the fire that punished Sodom and Gomorrah is called "eternal." W.S.T.

SOKA GAKKAI. The Japanese term for "Value Creation Society." Founded in 1937 by Tsunesaburo Makiguchi (1871–1944) as the Soka Kyoiku Gakkai, this lay organization was originally a small group for the discussion of educational philosophy, particularly from the point of view that it should emphasize benefit rather than abstract truth. But Makiguchi, who died in prison during the war, was a strong believer in NICHIREN Shoshu, a Buddhist tradition that also has an aspect favoring this-worldly benefits. When Soka Gakkai was revived in 1945 by Josei Toda (1900–58), a dynamic leader, it was as a lay auxiliary to Nichiren Shoshu.

Possessing many features of the "new religions" of Japan, it grew phenomenally during the 1950s and 1960s. Its convert-winning tactics were often criticized, but served to make Nichiren Shoshu the largest single religious institution in Japan, with some sixteen million members by the early 1980s. (Membership in Soka Gakkai and Nichiren Shoshu is now coextensive.) Soka Gakkai is known for its elaborate organization, its lavish conventions, its sponsorship of many cultural activities, and the Kokeito political party founded by Soka Gakkai members. R.E.

SOLA FIDE. From the Latin phrase for "faith alone." This is MARTIN LUTHER's translation of Romans 3:28, "A man is justified by faith apart from works of law." The word "alone" was not in the original text of Scripture, but Luther felt that the intention was there and used it to balance the contemporary stress on justification by works. The doctrine as stated is an effort to emphasize the fact that being made just in the sight of the holy God can come only through an act of God. This act was the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Faith is a gift of God that brings a person into a new relationship with God. Faith is also the appropriate human response to God's prior gift of salvation. Only by trusting God can a person appropriate salvation, the new life that makes one a new creature. I.C.

SOLA GRATIA. From the Latin phrase "grace alone." The Greek equivalent means "gift." The theological term means that human beings are saved only by the unmerited grace of God. God's love for all creation is so full that in spite of human sinfulness, God desires people to respond to divine love. Because God is totally good and loving, human beings can fulfill this relationship only by being freed from the sinfulness that alienates them from God. The grace or love of God enables people to accept the righteousness offered through Christ (justification) and be saved.

Good works flow from grace and are an expression of the love of God in people's lives. I.C.

SOLA SCRIPTURA. The expression used for the teaching that Scripture alone is decisive in settling questions of doctrine or practice. This teaching is one of the fundamental principles of PROTESTANTISM and is common to all Protestant denominations, though held with varying degrees of rigor. It was formulated in opposition to the Roman Catholic teaching that there are two sources of doctrine, Scripture and TRADITION, the latter understood as a deposit of unwritten truths that have been transmitted in the teaching of the church. In its broadest sense, sola scriptura simply means the sufficiency of the Scriptures, the claim that they contain everything that is necessary for salvation. Some theologians who believed this were willing to allow certain beliefs and practices that are neither forbidden nor expressly permitted in Scripture, on the ground that they were matters of indifference or "adiaphora." The much stricter view was that nothing is to be believed or practiced that is not explicitly authorized by Scripture. However, it was virtually impossible to adhere to this strict view. Vatican II abandoned the teaching about two sources and claimed instead that Scripture and tradition are like two streams rising from a common wellspring. The sharp difference that sola scriptura was supposed to emphasize has become blurred at the present time. J.M.

SOLOMON. Israel's third king (about 961–922 B.C.) and son of DAVID and Bathsheba. Through Nathan's revelation, he was named Jedidiah ("beloved of Yahweh"). But David named him Solomon (meaning "peaceful"), hoping that his son's reign would be more tranquil than his (II Sam. 12:24-25; see I Chr. 22:9).

During an era of relative peace, Solomon worked diligently to bring international esteem to Israel. No major world power existed to bother Solomon, and commercial alliances and military surveillance enabled him to dominate lesser neighboring nations. Solomon obtained political advantage with Egypt through a nameless pharaoh of the impotent Twenty-first Dynasty (I Kings 3:1). Agreements with Hiram I, king of TYRE (5:1, 10-11), and the queen of Sheba (10:1-10, 13), respectively, cemented ties with northern Phoenicians and the Sabaeans of Arabia. This was Israel's golden age, one further enriched by unprecedented intellectual and cultural attainments. Yet when Solomon died, so did Israel's united monarchy.

The Deuteronomic presentation of Solomon in I Kings 1–11 demands careful reading. Schematically arranged, good news about Solomon prefaces bad news. Tenacious about divine retribution, the Deuteronomist judged Solomon's basic flaw to be his toleration of the gods of his foreign wives that triggered Yahweh's wrath (11:1-13). The Deuteronomist favorably portrays Solomon's demonstration of wisdom, far-reaching commercial enterprises, and building program. Objectionable aspects of Solomon's reign are summarized in I Kings 11 to imply their emergence during Solomon's last years when "his wives turned away his heart after other gods" (11:4). During this dark hour, Solomon is said to have lost territory to Hadad the Edomite and Rezon of Damascus, whom Yahweh raised up against him (11:14, 23). Actually, Hadad troubled Solomon much earlier (11:21). With this chronological shift, the Deuteronomist claims that Solomon received his just deserts.

One source behind these chapters, the book of the acts of Solomon (I Kings 11:41), is a legendary biography indiscriminately celebrating the king's splendor. Representative of its content are Solomon's dream at Gibeon, where he intently prayed for wisdom (3:3-15), and his brilliant decision regarding the two harlots contesting possession of one child (3:16-28). The accolade that under Solomon, "Judah and Israel were as many as the sand by the sea; they ate and drank and were happy" (4:20) suppresses consideration of Israelite commoners disgruntled that urban civilization and social stratification were rapidly dominating. The biblical witness that the Israelites were masters and not slaves (9:22) is refuted by the disclosure that "Solomon raised a levy of forced labor out of all Israel" (5:13). If Solomon astutely stabilized the sound administrative policy innovated by David, many Israelites would finally rebel against his repressive approach (I Kings 12:1-16).

Solomon's Enthronement. Aging David's indecision regarding his successor provoked palace intrigue. David's military commander Joab and his priest Abiathar supported Adonijah, David's eldest living son. But Solomon was favored by Bathsheba, the royal guard Benaiah, the priest Zadok, and the prophet Nathan. Certain that Adonijah's seizure of the throne was imminent (I Kings 1:9-11), Bathsheba and Nathan successfully influenced David's decision for Solomon. Escorted by Davidic troops, Solomon was publicly anointed by Zadok (1:38-40).

After David's death, Solomon swiftly strengthened his position. When ADONIJAH expressed his continued craving for the throne by asking for Abishag, David's concubine, Solomon ordered his execution (I Kings 2:23-25). While ABIATHAR, Solomon's priestly opponent, was spared, owing to previous support of David, he was sent home to Anathoth (2:26). Unhesitatingly, Solomon honored David's command to assassinate Joab so that his murders of Abner and Amasa might be avenged (2:5-6, 31-34). Solomon rewarded his supporters by making Benaiah commander of the army and Zadok chief priest (2:35). Truly, "the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon" (2:46).

Administrative Achievements. (1) Provincial reorganization. To obtain firmer control, Solomon reorganized the nation into twelve administrative districts that generally ignored tribal boundaries (I Kings 4:7-19). Each was charged with delivering a month's provisions to the burgeoning court (4:22-23). This demanded enormous Israelite energy, as did Solomon's ambitious building program. When compulsory labor from conquered peoples proved insufficient, Solomon instituted the corvée, including the enrollment of his own people for a third of the year. Thus, unpaid labor gangs penetrated Lebanon for timber (5:13-14). Others worked in Jerusalem, where Solomon's building program was concentrated. Since Adoram, the director of Solomon's forced labor, was lynched by Israelites (12:18), presumably the corvée included freeborn Israelite draftees.

(2) Military policy. Solomon's military machine boasted 1,400 chariots and 12,000 horsemen (I Kings 10:26). The king strengthened Jerusalem's fortifications, and along the nation's perimeter established a band of military centers, including Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, Beth-horon, Baalath, and Tamar (9:15-19). Solomon appreciably enhanced Israel's capacity to repel military attacks.

(3) Foreign policy. Solomon's amicable relations with foreigners led to international alliances. Typically confirmed by marriage, they expanded Solomon's harem (I Kings 11:1-3). Through marriage to Pharaoh's daughter, Solomon acquired the Canaanite city of Gezer, tentatively an Egyptian holding (3:1; 9:16). Also Solomon's alliance with Tyre supported his architectural and maritime ambitions.

(4) Commerce and industry. Assisted by Phoenician sailors, Solomon established a trade program centered at Ezion-geber on the Gulf of Aqaba (I Kings 9:26-28; 10:11-12, 22). Solomon's engagement in caravan trade with the Sabaeans of Arabia is attested by his audience with the visiting queen of Sheba (10:1-10, 13). Moreover, the king turned a profit as middleman in the horse and chariot business (10:28-29). Of necessity, chariots constructed in Egypt and horses bred in Cilicia traversed Israelite territory.

(5) Building program. Among those sites hosting Solomonic architecture, Gezer, Hazor, and Megiddo have yielded impressive four-entry-way gate systems. Relying on Phoenician technology (5:1-12), Solomon built an impressive administrative complex in Jerusalem (7:1-8). Supplementing the palace itself were "the House of the Forest of Lebanon" (dual armory and treasury), judgment hall, and residence for Pharaoh's daughter. Details about the construction and dedication of the Jerusalem Temple, both a royal dynastic chapel and national sanctuary, are offered in I Kings 5-8.

Herbert G. May

Solomon and Wisdom. In this culturally productive era, much Israelite myth, legend, and history achieved literary fixation. Moreover, impressed by Egypt's long-standing example, Solomon fostered a court-centered wisdom movement. Three canonical wisdom books are attributed to Solomon—PROVERBS, ECCLESIASTES, and the SONG OF SOLOMON. Though the latter two postdate him, perhaps Proverbs contains a Solomonic nucleus. Yet immodest statements that Solomon "was wiser than all other men," spoke 3,000 proverbs, and composed 1,005 songs discourage literal acceptance (I Kings 4:31-32).

Final Assessment. Having inherited much from Saul and David, Solomon properly recognized that his main political task involved holding the Israelite state together. Though temporarily successful, his grandiose governmental programs drained his subjects. Expenses regularly outdistanced income. Solomon inspired social stratification repugnant to loyal Yahwists whose faith had been nourished by a Mosaic covenant embracing all Israelites as equals before God. Because his statecraft often manifested more dazzle than substance, at Solomon's death, Israelite elders understandably pleaded for more tolerant rule.

SOLOMON'S PORTICO. A three-story, roofed building with an impressive, first-floor colonnade on the south side of a cloister-like quadrangle in Herod's Temple. Architecturally, the enclosure resembled the portico of the Bethesda pool (John 5:2; KJV, porch).

The whole complex of Herod's TEMPLE had taken forty-six years to build and was not completely finished in Jesus' lifetime (John 2:20). It is not known when Solomon's portico was erected, but before the first century A.D., Josephus states that Solomon's first-floor portico had four rows of columns, one row "interwoven into the wall." The height of each first-floor column was twenty-seven feet, and its circumference such "that three men might with their arms extended, fathom it round, and join hands again." The columns were fashioned with bases and capitals in the Corinthian style. An upper, open, columned gallery, with an enclosed "attic" above, ran the length of the portico.

Inside the enclosed space, which Solomon's portico faced, were stalls for merchants and money changers. When Jesus entered the Temple and was teaching and preaching in Solomon's portico, during Tuesday of Holy Week, he could see where, the day before, he had driven out the merchants and overturned the money changers' tables (Matt. 21:12-13; Mark 11:15-19; Luke 19:45-48). When the Temple authorities saw Jesus on Tuesday, they asked, perhaps pointing to the enclosure, "By what authority are you doing these things?" (Matt. 21:23; Mark 11:27; Luke 20:1-2).

Solomon's portico was the traditional meeting place for the scribal schools and for learned men to hold debates. Here is where twelve-year-old Jesus must have been when Mary and Joseph found him (Luke 2:46). Solomon's portico was Jesus' favorite place in Jerusalem to teach (Luke 19:17; John 10:23). Here, later, people saw the man lame from birth, healed in the name of Jesus, "walking and leaping and praising God" (Acts 3:8).

P.L.G.

SOMA. From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "pressed." A sacred plant and its pressed-out juice offered to the gods and consumed ritually in the religion of VEDIC HINDUISM. Many hymns of the RIG-VEDA are devoted to the praise of Soma, personified as a god, and to the drink's exalting effect. Probably hallucinogenic, the plant from which soma was produced has been identified by one modern theory with the Amanita muscaria or fly-agaric mushroom. As early as the BRAHMANAS, around 800 B.C., other plants of non-psychedelic effect were beginning to be substituted for the original soma, as they are now in the rites of the BRAHMINES.

SONG OF SOLOMON. An anthology of approximately two dozen pastoral lyrics affirming the pleasure and power of human sexual love. As one of the five MEGILLOTH (festival scrolls), this OT book was read at Passover as an allegorical reflection on Yahweh's relation with Israel since the Exodus.

Literary Aspects. Although clear-cut structure and movement are lacking, this book contains a variety of songs extolling the love of man and maiden. Among the literary types employed are the descriptive song (waf) advertising the physical charms of the beloved (4:1-7), the song of yearning (1:2-4), and the boast (8:11-12). The book swarms with accomplished imagery exhibiting an obvious rural orientation. The repeated phrase, "O daughters of Jerusalem" (1:5; 2:7; 3:5; 5:8, 16; 8:4) and the presence of two lovers throughout confer a lyric unity upon the whole. In terms of anonymity, dialogical style, and rural atmosphere, Egyptian love songs from the mid-second millennium B.C. offer the closest extra-biblical parallels.

Authorship and Date. The tradition that Solomon composed many songs (I Kings 4:32) and use of his name in Song of Solomon 1:5; 3:7-11; and 8:11-12 ineptly inspired the Solomonic reference in the title (1:1). The presence of Persian and Greek loanwords plus many Aramaisms suggest the third century B.C. for the final editing. These lyrics span a wide chronology and geography with the oldest tracing to the early monarchical period.

Interpretation. (a) Allegorical. This poetry has evoked widely differing interpretations. Early on, the clear wording of the erotic lyrics was overlooked by a Jewish allegorical approach, which maintained that the Song reflects God's mystical love for Israel. Similarly, Christian commentators claimed this book celebrates a mutual love involving Christ (bridegroom) and the church (bride). This once popular interpretation attracts few adherents today.

(b) Dramatic. Since these poems reveal no monologue, two major Greek manuscripts affixed character headings that denote as speakers the bride, bridegroom, and companions. Eventually some scholars saw an intricate plot involving a beautiful maiden, her shepherd lover to whom she remains faithful, and King Solomon. But the absence of any conflict in the canonical text argues against a dramatic interpretation. Too much must be read between the lines.

(c) Cultic. Could these lyrics have originally fulfilled a fertility cult function in accord with the Babylonian Tammuz festival or the Baal cycles of Canaanite mythology? This approach views the bride as a goddess seeking her lost lover, who has descended to the underworld. Once rejoined, their sexual union restores fertility and wholeness to the world. While ancient Near Eastern fertility customs may lie behind this poetry, the dying-rising god motif is lacking in the text. Moreover, in dissociating the poems from human love, the cultic interpretation is itself an allegorization.

(d) Syrian wedding analogy. Parallels have been adduced from week-long wedding celebrations in present-day Syria wherein the couple is enthroned as king and queen. The descriptive song portraying the bride's beauty is particularly significant. But biblical Israel's link with modern Syrian customs is necessarily remote. Moreover, only 3:6-11 indisputably depicts a wedding celebration. Even if some of the lyrics were sung at ancient Jewish weddings, the text preserves more love songs than wedding songs.

(e) Lyrical. Since the eighteenth century, this book has increasingly been regarded as an assemblage of artful poems celebrating the mysteries of pre-nuptial and nuptial human love. This approach excels in its capacity to grasp the poetry on its own terms and to appreciate it as a product of high literary merit commensurate with the sophistication and education of its composers.

SONG OF SONGS. See SONG OF SOLOMON.

SON OF GOD. In the OT "son of God" is used as a designation for Israel, for kings, and occasionally for special messengers of God. In the NT it is used primarily for JESUS.

Preeminently, Israel is God's son whom God has chosen "out of Egypt" (for example, Hos. 11:1; Exod. 4:22-23). As such, Israel is the object of God's election and owes God absolute obedience. In a derivative sense the king is described as God's son, a fact that may have been stressed in the coronation ritual (for example, II Sam. 7:14; Pss. 2:7; 89:26-27). Further, from time to time a messenger of God, usually a heavenly being sent for a special function, is called a son of God (for example, Gen. 6:2; Job 1:6).

Jesus is universally recognized as God's unique Son, though the understanding of that designation varies somewhat from writer to writer. For Mark the title, used not often but in key locations, is central to the understanding of who Jesus is (1:1). Jesus is acknowledged by God as the chosen Son at his baptism (1:11) and at his transfiguration (9:7). The demons respect Jesus' power over them as they confess him to be "Son of the Most High God" (5:7; compare 3:11). Yet it is in his obedience unto death that the Roman centurion perceives the truth about Jesus: "Truly this man was the Son of God!" (15:39; compare 12:1-11). Election, authority, and obedience are the hallmarks of Mark's CHRISTOLOGY.

In the Gospel of John the understanding of the Son of God is somewhat different. He has been sent by the Father into the world (3:17; 6:40-46; 8:42) and represents the Father in his words and actions (5:19-30; 7:16). Since Jesus is one with the Father and does the Father's works, he is entitled to be called "the Son of God" (10:30-38; 17:20-23). In his farewell discourse the Son, who has come from the Father, anticipates returning to the Father (13:1; 14:28; 16:5, 28). For John, then, the Son of God is a preexistent divine being who in his incarnation reveals the person and purpose of the Father and whose authority and obedience are presented in the cause of revelation.

Elsewhere in the NT the Son of God becomes a basic confession of Jesus by the early church (I John 4:15; Heb. 4:14; Rom. 1:3-4), and in light of that confession Christians are invited to address God with the striking words, "Abba! Father!" (Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15-16).

Though the NT writers describe the intimate relationship between the Father and the Son, it is something of a jump from the first century to the third, fourth, and fifth centuries, when the ancient church used the title Son of God to designate the Son's identity of substance with the Father. (See also SON OF MAN.)

C.B.C.

SON OF MAN. A term used in the Bible in three basic ways: for a human being, for an exalted apocalyptic figure, and for Jesus.

For a Human Being. Several times in the Psalms "son of man" appears in a parallel construction with the ordinary Hebrew word for human being.

What is man that thou art mindful of him and the son of man that thou dost care for him

(Ps. 8:4).

In Ezekiel the prophet is repeatedly addressed as "son of man," probably stressing the insignificance of the creature in contrast to the majesty of God.

For an Exalted Apocalyptic Figure. In Daniel 7:13-14 "one like a son of man" with the clouds of heaven is presented to the Ancient of Days and receives from him "dominion and glory and kingdom." In the apocryphal book of II Esdras (chap. 13) and the pseudepigraphal book of Ethiopic Enoch (chaps. 37-71), "son of man" is developed further in apocalyptic contexts.

For Jesus. The term appears approximately eighty-one times in the Gospels, in each case as a self-designation of Jesus, and in Acts 7:56. The sayings can be classified according to three types:

(a) those that speak of the coming of the Son of man in the glory of the Father with the clouds of heaven (for example, Mark 8:38; 14:62);

(b) those that predict the passion, death, and resurrection of the Son of man (for example, Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34);

(c) those that describe the earthly activity of the Son of man (for example, Mark 2:10, 28).

The scholarly community has debated vigorously a number of issues surrounding the uses of "Son of man" in the Gospels. How widely known was the term in Judaism of the first century A.D., and what did it imply? To what extent did the OT uses and/or the uses in II Esdras and Ethiopic Enoch shape the NT uses? Did Jesus actually use the term for himself, and if so, why? Could Jesus have spoken of the Son of man as an apocalyptic figure who was to come, which the early church then identified with Jesus in light of his resurrection from the dead? Are the uses of the term that describe Jesus' earthly ministry meant to be substitutes for "I" or "me"? Do the writers of the Gospels employ "Son of man" in the same way (compare John 1:51; 3:14-15)? However these questions are answered, "Son of man," when used for Jesus, designates not merely his humanity, but more importantly his authority on earth and in the age to come. (See CHRISTOLOGY and SON OF GOD.)

C.B.C.

SOPHERIM. Hebrew scribes, starting with Ezra in the mid-fifth century B.C. They were a professional class that preserved, interpreted, and applied the oral traditions that supplemented the written TORAH. The scribes are considered the initiators of the "Jewish" as distinct from the "Israelite" period of history. From their ranks came the men of the Great Assembly, whose contributions to Judaism were in liturgy, the preservation of Scripture, and the oral Law. The scribes were active for two centuries after Ezra. Sopherim also applies to those people occupied in the writing of the scrolls of the Torah, as well as prayers and passages that go into mezuzot and tephillin (phylacteries).

L.K.

SOPHIA. Greek for "wisdom." The ultimate wisdom of the OT was seeking after God (Prov. 4:5). In the NT Paul identifies Christ as wisdom become flesh (I Cor. 1:24, 30; Col. 2:3), just as John does with Christ as the word LOGOS. Not related to Greek philosophy, the doctrine of Christ as wisdom was especially alive among the Greek church fathers. Thus in Constantinople the most significant church of early Christendom could be named Hagia Sophia, Holy Wisdom, dedicated to Christ. T.J.K.

SOSTHENES. Sosthenes is mentioned as a co-worker of Paul, perhaps his scribe when the apostle wrote to the church at Corinth (I Cor. 1:1). He is not mentioned, however, in I Corinthians 16:17-19, when Paul lists his companions there in Ephesus. The same or a different Sosthenes appears as the head of the synagogue at Corinth (Acts 18:17), who turned Christian and was later beaten by a hostile crowd. Clement of Alexandria identifies him as one of the seventy disciples. Chrysostom says he was the same person as Crispus. By tradition Sosthenes served as bishop of Colophon in Greece. T.J.K.

SOTERIOLOGY. The doctrine of SALVATION or REDEMPTION. It explains how humans are reconciled to God. However, the explanation has varied through the centuries. Early theologians emphasized redemption as illumination through Christ, his victory over sin and death, or the liberation of the human race from the power of Satan. Other explanations stress expiation, mediation, and reconciliation. Contemporary theologians stress the role not only of the cross but also of the Resurrection, Ascension, and sending of the Holy Spirit in the salvation event. I.C.

SOUL. The English word "soul" is much richer and broader in meaning than its Hebrew or Greek equivalents, nephes and psyche. In either of the two biblical languages the roots include the concept of breath and breathing. Thus Genesis 2:7: The Lord God formed man of dust from the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life (nephes); and man became a living being.

In OT usage the word that we most often translate as soul, especially in the KJV, normally should be translated as LIFE. The word usually refers to the entire living being, to the whole individual, body and soul, in fact, even to living animals. It is the word ruach or SPIRIT that the OT writers more often use when they want to refer to what we think of as the soul, that part of a human being that relates to God, that trusts, that believes. Soul as nephes normally does not exist apart from a living person. To say in our terms that the "soul" of the loved one has departed to be with the Lord or to speak of the "immortal soul" would simply not be understandable in the culture of the OT.

Among philosophers and interpreters of Scripture there have been long discussions whether the individual human being consists of two parts, that is, body and soul, or of three parts, body, soul, and spirit. The believer in the OT viewed the self as a single entity, with the soul intertwined as part of the material body, for as long as one lived. Thus one did not possess or inhabit a body but consisted of a living, breathing body and soul, which were inseparable. Both the life force or soul and the body emanated from the Creator. Relationships to and trust in this Creator were manifested through the spirit, which the Creator had breathed into one, not merely as a life force but as a living proof that one was made after the image and with the life force of the Creator.

The whole concept of soul or nephesh in the OT is extremely complex, in all of its changing cultural implication, making translation difficult. It is further complicated by a Hebrew view that assumed that the thinking process occurred within the heart, not the head. Many of the proof texts about the life of the soul before or after death occur in poetic and prophetic passages.

In the NT the word psyche for soul is perhaps equally limited, in a still different cultural setting. Psyche also refers more to life than to spirit, as in Matthew 6:25 or John 10:11. Pneuma or spirit comes closer to the present concept of soul, but must also be carefully distinguished from those instances where it refers to the Holy Spirit. In some passages, however, pneuma and psyche actually appear to be synonymous, as if soul and life were identical.

Sometimes spirit (pneuma) and life (psyche) are both contrasted to the material elements of the BODY, the sarx or soma. In I Corinthians 15:42-50 and 2:14-15, Paul uses the adjective psychikos or "living element" to contrast what is natural, human, or non-spiritual with that which is spiritual. In fact, so many overtones of meaning have crept into the various Hebrew and Greek words sometimes translated as "soul," as demonstrated also in English in the poetry of Milton or Shakespeare, that the English word "soul" is equally difficult to define with exactness.

SPENCER, HERBERT (1820-1903). English philosopher and early sociologist, known for applying evolutionary theory to all branches of learning. Essentially self-taught, he early worked as an engineer, in journalism, and in 1848 he became subeditor of The Economist. His Social Statics (1850) attracted wide attention. This was followed by Principles of Psychology (1855), which was later incorporated into his ten-volume Synthetic Philosophy, which also included First Principles (1862), Principles of Biology (Vol. 1, 1864; Vol. 2, 1867), Principles of Sociology (Vol. 1, 1876; Vol. 2, 1882), and Principles of Ethics (Vol. 1, 1892; Vol. 2 1893).

In ethics Spencer was a utilitarian. He believed that agnosticism was the only reasonable religious position, since theism assumes a knowledge of that which lies beyond observable phenomena. Spencer proposed the worship of what he called the Unknowable. He held that the origin of religion is traceable to fear of spirits or ghosts, which then evolved into polytheism and eventually to monotheism. Spencer accepted Lamarck's belief in the inheritance of acquired characteristics and invented the term "survival of the fittest." He advocated an extreme individualism and laissez-faire economics and opposed welfare programs, which, he felt, impeded natural selection, hence social progress. Spencer was a leading proponent of SOCIAL DARWINISM, and his views were extremely influential in the late nineteenth century. Today he is read largely for historical interest.

SPENER, PHILIPP JAKOB (1635-1705). The founder of German PIETISM. Spener was born at Rappoltsweiler in Upper Alsace. He was early influenced by the devotional writings of the English Puritans. His concern to reform the German Lutheran Church was further strengthened during a visit to Geneva, where he came under the influence of the pietistic reformer Jean de Labadi. Spener studied theology at the University of Strassburg (1651-53) and was appointed preacher at the church there in 1663. He became chief pastor of the Lutheran church at Frankfurt am Main in 1666. There he introduced the Collegia Pietatis, or small devotional meetings, which met twice weekly to encourage personal piety and Bible study.

In 1675 he published Pia desideria or Heartfelt Desires for a God-pleasing Reform of the True Evangelical Churches, which outlined his program of evangelical reform. The book increased Spener's reputation throughout Germany and stimulated pietistic reform in Lutheranism. In 1686 Spener was appointed first court chaplain at Dresden, a highly valued position. However, disagreement with the elector John George III caused him to move to Berlin as rector of the St. Nicholas' Church in 1691. There he found the support of the elector of Brandenburg and was able to carry out many reforms. In 1694 the University of Halle was founded through Spener's influence. It became a center of Pietism under Spener's disciples, A. C. FRANCKE and Christian Thomasius. At the time of Spener's death, Pietism was well established in Germany.

SPINOZA, BENEDICT DE (1632-77). Philosopher and foremost representative of modern RATIONALISM and PANTHEISM. Born in Amsterdam of Portuguese-Jewish parents, Spinoza had an early rabbinical training. However, in 1656 he was excommunicated from the synagogue for unorthodox views. He was compelled to leave Amsterdam and, after some moving about, settled in The Hague, where he earned a living grinding lenses. He was a tenacious defender of freedom of speech and thought and refused a pension from Louis XIV and a professorship at Heidelberg for fear that they might limit his freedom. His principal works include the Theological-Political Treatise (1670) and the posthumous Ethics (1677).

For Spinoza philosophy begins with a discussion of substance as the ultimate reality and causality. He rejects Descartes's dualism of God and world, mind and body, for if substance is that which exists by itself, then there is only one infinite substance, whose essence implies its existence, God or Nature (Deus sive Natura). Such an infinite being has an infinite number of attributes, of which only two, thought and extension, are known to the human mind. All things are modes of these two attributes, that is, either ideas or bodies. Since God and Nature are the same, the goal of religion and philosophy is the same: what Spinoza called "the intellectual love of God." To love God is at the same time to know the infinite causal system of Nature. To know God is to conceive things under the species of eternity (sub specie aeternitatus), which is the highest human pleasure.

For Spinoza the life of reason is also the life of virtue, for to understand is to be freed from the servitude of the emotions. For example, hatred is a mere passion, for once we understand that others act out of a certain necessity we overcome our hatred of them. A consequence of Spinoza's pantheism is his denial of a personal God and the immortality of the soul. He is one of the fathers of the modern historical-critical study of the Bible. Spinoza's greatest influence was in Germany in the nineteenth century. J.L.

SPIRIT. From the Latin spirare, "to breathe"; that which is immaterial or of the spirit; SOUL, personality, life force, will, consciousness, feeling, thought, existence, as distinguished from that which can be touched or measured.

The word "spirit," occurring more than five hundred times in the Bible, is almost indefinable. Its common form in Hebrew is ruach and in Greek, pneuma. Both basically mean "breath," "wind," or "life force," as in Job 34:14 or Genesis 6:17. Particularly in the OT, spirit can be associated with the life that originated with God, a breath breathed into humanity by the Creator, so that giving up one's spirit meant to die. Life itself was godlike in origin. Spirit often also occurs as the site of human experience and emotion—joy, dejection, anger, frustration (see Josh. 2:11; Gen. 26:34). Even more significantly it appears as a contrast to the part of a human being that decays and passes away, the flesh. On the other hand that part of human life that more narrowly relates to the life principle and to breathing, nephesh, often is inseparable from the body in Hebrew thought and dies when the body dies, even though this word too is sometimes translated as spirit or soul.

The concept of a disembodied spirit that stays alive after death, that is, a ghost, does not occur until relatively late in OT writings, as in the story of Saul and the witch at Endor, or in the evil spirits that came to trouble Saul in I Samuel 16:14. In general, spirit comes from God, provides life and breath, makes people human, sometimes gives special strength or insight, and occasionally persists after death.

In the NT, the word "spirit" appears to have adopted many added meanings from the Greco-Roman world and at least a few from Persian or Zoroastrian thought. Basically it still means "breath" or "principle of life." But human spirit, soul, or personality now continues to live after death (Luke 8:55). It is the seat of emotion (II Cor. 2:13). It eventually goes to heaven or hell (Heb. 12:23; I Pet. 3:19). Paul often contrasts the flesh with the spirit. And evil or unclean spirits are described as invading human personality during Jesus' ministry, or existing as a whole hierarchy of angels, demons, powers, principalities, and other ethereal spirits, as they did in Persia. T.J.K.

SPIRITS IN PRISON. This quotation from I Peter 3:19 refers to the story of Christ's DESCENT INTO HELL (Hades) and how he preached there, either to the spirits of people who had died or to the fallen angels. The Hades and descent into hell stories are common themes in Oriental mythology. The Christian account was very popular in medieval legend and epic, though the scriptural evidence is extremely limited. T.J.K.

SPIRITUAL EXERCISES, THE. A series of meditations and rules for helping a soul conquer its passions and give itself to God. Written by IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, the Exercises originated in his own experience in 1521 and were written during a stay at Manresa in 1522. Throughout his life he revised and expanded the work. The book offers four "weeks" of meditations: (1) on sin and its consequences, (2) on Christ's life on earth, (3) on Christ's Passion, and (4) on the risen life in Christ. The work was given papal approval by Paul III in 1548 and is still widely used by Christians in various traditions. N.H.

SPIRITUAL GIFTS. See GIFTS, SPIRITUAL.

SPIRITUALISM. The philosophical doctrine that holds to the reality of spirit as well as matter in the universe. An extreme view, called IDEALISM, holds that only spirit or mind is real. This absolute idealism was taught by Bishop GEORGE BERKELEY of Ireland. All forms of idealism or spiritualism oppose MATERIALISM.

However, the term has more specific—and negative—reference to the beliefs and practices of those who believe it is possible to communicate with the spirits of the dead (necromancy). This practice traditionally was called "spiritism," and is still so termed in German, French, and Italian use. In America, where the practice arose and flourished in the nineteenth century, it has always been called spiritualism, and it was institutionalized in several Spiritualist churches and associations.

Spiritualism makes use of people who supposedly have the power to allow the dead to speak through them. Table rapping, Ouija boards, trances, and séances are used in such practices, and these occult forms are subject to abuse and fraud. According to traditional Christian doctrine, all such attempts to contact the spirits of the departed are wrong since spiritualism involves the danger of communication with evil spirits, or, at least, the sin of superstition. The Roman Catholic church forbids its members to attend séances and Spiritualist meetings. J. C.

SPIRITUALITY. The condition of spiritual-mindedness, or devotion to God and the things of the spirit; also a disciplined approach to the spiritual life, opposed to materialism, secularism, and sensuality (hedonism). Spirituality may involve ascetic practices such as voluntary poverty, chastity (including complete celibacy), and entire obedience to the laws of the church.

Spirituality, or spiritual formation, is the theme of the Christian life after justification (either through infant baptism or by way of conversion and baptism for the Free churches), and, theologically, falls under the head of SANCTIFICATION. The formation of the Christian character is biblically described as being more and more conformed to the image of Christ. This metaphor is based upon the practice of pressing a signet ring into hot wax. The content or matter of the sanctified life is, then, Jesus Christ. Obedience to him and imitation of his absolute obedience to God and compassionate love for all people is a major element of sanctification. The concept of imitating Christ stems from Paul, who told his fellow believers to imitate him as he imitated Christ (Phil. 3:17; I Cor. 4:16; 11:1)

This inspirational idea was widely taught and practiced (however imperfectly) in the ancient and medieval church. A famous treatise, The Imitation of Christ, was written by Thomas à Kempis. After the Reformation, Luther reacted negatively to the concept of imitation because of its misuse in teachings that implied salvation by (or partially by) good works. Calvin later was more open to the concept of imitation as he stressed Christian discipline in his adaptation of Luther's Reformation teachings. For this reason, there has been a historically different development of the understanding of sanctification, that is, of spirituality, in Lutheranism and the Reformed churches. Nevertheless, PIETISM, a far-reaching movement of Protestant spirituality, grew out of late seventeenth-century Lutheranism, which fertilized the several sects that arose in Lutheran and Reformed circles in Europe and America; sects that often stressed Christian discipline and spirituality. The third force of the Reformation, the Anabaptists, stressed spiritual life, especially the distancing of the Christian from the secular world. Mennonite churches soon suffered a split and the world-denying Amish movement arose and migrated to America. Anabaptist spirituality chiefly consists in attempts to live a "primitive" or simple life, remote from the cities of the modern world, and rejective of modern science and technology. Houses without central heat, running water, and electricity, and church services held in a barn, along with the speaking of German dialect, the use of horses and buggies, and strict morality characterize the Amish, the Anabaptist ideal. Of course, the Mennonites adapted to the modern world, and like the Quakers exhibit a socially liberal attitude to the world that portrays a genuine spirituality of love.

In the mainline Protestant churches, the concept of spirituality or sanctification received little attention during the middle decades of the twentieth century. Social action, based on devotion to the justice of God, took preeminence for many years. However, the resurgence of evangelicalism in the 1970s made all churches reexamine the Christian's obligation to pursue spirituality. The concept of the people of God was adopted by several Protestant denominations and became the watchword of the post-Vatican II Roman Catholic Church. The neo-Fundamentalist movement, promoted by the Moral Majority, does, of course, endorse a spirituality of its own although it is legalistic and culturally conformist.

The media prominence of this movement has made spirituality, especially the stress on sexual purity, a topic of national interest and discussion in America. Spirituality—becoming more like Christ, expressing his love for others, trusting him more and more—is the very meaning of becoming a Christian. J. C.

SPIRITUALS. (1) Those practices that belong to priests. These include honoraria such as stole fees and fees for masses. Sometimes these practices are called spiritualities. These are also spiritual works of mercy, which consist of the work of converting sinners, instructing the ignorant, counseling those with problems, comforting the sorrowful, bearing ills patiently, forgiving wrongs, and praying for both the living and the dead.

(2) Black (Afro-American) spirituals make up one of the largest bodies of American folk songs to survive into the twentieth century. Spirituals are also the most widely known of American folk songs. These beautiful songs, hymns, and choir arrangements originated in the black Protestant congregations of the American South. For a long time, the spirituals were not recorded. Colonel Thomas Higginson of the Union Army in the 1860s did record the songs he heard his black soldiers singing and published these works in 1870. Black spirituals typically follow the form of an alternating line and refrain, which permits a wide display of extemporization. While there is some African influence on them, the spirituals seem to be creations of Afro-Americans rather than retentions from Africa.

Charles Spurgeon

SPURGEON, CHARLES HADDON (1834–92). Reared as a Congregationalist, Spurgeon became a Baptist preacher in 1850. In 1852 he was named pastor of a church at Waterbeach, Cambridgeshire, England. In 1854 he moved to New Park Street Chapel in Southwark, London. Soon he was preaching to crowds of as many as ten thousand. Eventually his congregation built the Metropolitan Tabernacle at Newington Causeway, which became his pulpit. He founded a seminary in 1856 and an orphanage in 1867. His collected sermons run to fifty volumes.

Theologically conservative, he distrusted science and the higher criticism of the Bible. In 1887 he left the more liberal Baptist Union. A friend of D. L. Moody, he was admired by many American Evangelicals and Fundamentalists. One of his successors, as pastor of the London Tabernacle, was Amzi Clarence Dixon, chair of the editors of the Fundamentals.

SRADDHA. From the Sanskrit word for "act of faith." In HINDUISM, offerings presented to departed ancestors through rituals based upon VEDIC rites. These usages consist of ritually building a spiritual body for the deceased after death, then of presenting food offerings (usually balls of rice) at regular intervals to sustain its life in celestial realms, where it awaits eventual rebirth. The rituals, among the most ancient widely observed in popular Hinduism, serve to establish family identity among participants as well as links between living and dead. Certain pilgrimage centers, especially Banaras and Gaya on the Ganges, are particularly visited as places to perform sraddha.

SRAMANA. From the Sanskrit word for "one who exerts effort." Sramana ("one who sees all things equally") is often used interchangeably. In ancient India, sramanas were wandering ascetics and spiritual teachers. They are contrasted in classical writings with the hereditary priestly BRAHMIN caste. Sramanas rejected caste, ritual, Vedic authority, and the gradual progression to the renunciant state through the stages of life (asramas) inculcated by the Brahmins. They advocated instead the sudden giving up of worldly life at any point, and thenceforward seeking MOKSHA or liberation entirely through inward ascetic and meditative means. The BUDDHA and MAHAVIRA, both of Kshatriya rather than Brahmin caste, together with their followers, were outstanding examples of the sramana type in early India.

SRI VAISNAVA. A BHAKTI or devotional movement within HINDUISM found in south India and directed toward VISHNU and his avatars. The earliest movement to combine VEDIC and popular religious elements under the direction of BRAHMINS, it took shape in the ninth century A.D. Sri Vaisnava accepts the priestly leadership of Brahmins, yet employs the hymns of the ALVARS and other post-Vedic material as equal in worship and scriptural authority with the Vedas. Later, the great theologian RAMANUJA provided a strong intellectual foundation for Sri Vaisnava belief in a personal God, the importance of loving devotion and good works, and the power of God's grace. On the Brahminical side, Sri Vaisnavas adhere strictly to rules of caste and diet and highly value scholarship. They are now split into two groups. The "Southern" upholds more the Alvar heritage, while the "Northern" emphasizes Vedic texts.

STATION DAYS. A Roman Catholic custom in which the priests and people of Rome meet together and processed to a certain church where the pope, or a representative of the pope, sang mass. These station days include all of Lent, ember days, the Sundays in Advent, and other feast days, a total of eighty-four days. J.C.

STATIONS OF THE CROSS. A series of fourteen pictures or symbols representing incidents in Christ's walk from his condemnation by Pilate to the cross. The tradition of walking from one picture or station to another during Lent was begun by the Franciscans. The custom of observing the Stations of the Cross has spread from Roman Catholics to Anglicans. A route through the old city of Jerusalem has been mapped out and marked by the Stations of the Cross. Thousands of pilgrims follow this route during Holy Week. The present order of the Stations and the accompanying liturgy were established in the nineteenth century.

The fourteen events commemorated are: Jesus' condemnation; taking the cross; Christ falls down; Christ meets Mary, his mother; Simon of Cyrene carries the cross; Veronica wipes Christ's face; Christ falls again; he tells the women of Jerusalem not to weep for him; Christ falls a third time; he is stripped; nailed to the cross; Christ's death; his body is taken from the cross; and his body is placed in the tomb. STENNETT, SAMUEL (1727-95). Baptist clergyman and hymn writer. Samuel Stennett was born in Exeter, England. His father, Dr. Joseph Stennett, was a distinguished Baptist minister, who served for many years at Little Wild Street Church in London. In 1748 Samuel became an assistant in the church and ten years later succeeded his father as the pastor. The son became known throughout the land as an evangelical preacher; he became confidant to many of the country's statesmen, including King George III. Stennett, like his grandfather and father before him, attained a wide reputation as a hymn writer. Two of his best known hymns are "Majestic Sweetness Sits Enthroned," and "On Jordan's Stormy Banks I Stand." Most of the thirty-nine hymns he wrote appeared in John Rippon's Selection of Hymns (1787). Stennett served the Little Wild Street Church for thirty-seven years, never holding another pulpit. He died in London on August 24. R.H.

STEPHEN. The first of the Christian martyrs, whose name means "wreath" or "crown," was stoned to death in Jerusalem about A.D. 33. Since his name is Greek and since he was the first of seven deacons chosen by the church in Jerusalem to look after the overlooked widows and orphans of Greek background, his roots may well have been from the world outside Jerusalem. Acts 6:5 describes him as a "man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit," and later as "full of grace and power," who "did great wonders and signs among the people."

In an age of much insurrection among the Jews against the Romans, when many of the Christians were already fleeing for safety across the Jordan to Pella, Stephen drew the ire of the Hellenic Jews from the free men's synagogue for what they termed his blasphemy against Moses and against God. Luke reports that his opponents hired false witnesses against him. At his defense before the Sanhedrin, Stephen argued that from the beginning of history the people of Israel had stubbornly resisted the workings of God. The arguments are well summarized in the book of Acts. The climax of Stephen's speech was that the Jews had brazenly rejected Christ and even slain him, just as their fathers had wiped out the prophets. This so enraged the court and the people that in a fit of mob anger they took him out and stoned him, even though under Roman law they had no such authority.

Stephen's death proved to be the turning point in splitting apart those Jews who accepted the work and sayings of Christ and those who did not. As the first MARTYR, his importance is marked by the great number of boys who were named after him in the early church and for centuries thereafter, by the great number of churches that bore his name, and by the position of his feast day on the day after Christmas—as if the church considered him more important than any individual in the NT other than Christ. T.J.K.

STEWARD/STEWARDSHIP. In the biblical world a steward was one who controlled the working of the household, directing the domestic affairs of the establishment, controlling the finances and supervising the servants and workers. Thus Joseph had a steward (Gen. 43:19) as did Abraham (Gen. 15:2), and on a larger scale, the kings of Israel, whose function was more largely financial.

In the NT, the commonest word for steward is oikonomos, the one who sets rules for the household. Bishops are stewards of the things of God (Tit. 1:7). In fact, every Christian is a steward of God's mysteries (I Cor. 4:1; Gal. 4:2). Stewardship is not limited merely to money or material goods. Stewardship before God involves everything God has provided—ability, talents, time, emotions, even life itself. When the Law tells us that the earth is the Lord's, and when the Lord places us in it as stewards, then stewardship becomes practical indeed. Biblical stewardship includes protection of the earth and all that is in it—animals, forests, land, people. In fact the charge to be stewards really puts the human race back in the position of Adam and Eve, to care for the creation as its guardians and custodians. Both the spiritual and material well-being of one's neighbors are necessary concerns for those who practice biblical stewardship, in the fullest sense of the word (Jas. 2:17; I John 3:17). T.J.K.

STICHOMETRY. This term refers to a method of arranging a text into hypothetical lines and stanzas on the assumption that its original literary form was poetic. The criteria are syllabic length and meter based on the kinds of vowels used. The method has been used extensively to reconstruct Hebrew poetry, especially in the Psalms. In the NT one of the clearest examples of a trochaic meter is Ephesians 5:14, giving rise to a two- or three-line "hymn" (see RSV and NEB for different versification).

STITES, EDGAR PAGE (1836–1916). Ship builder and hymn writer. A New Jersey native, Stites was attending a Methodist camp meeting about 1875 at Ocean Grove, New Jersey, when he wrote the words of his hymn "Beulah Land," with its famous opening words, "I've reached the land of corn and wine." The text was based on Isaiah 35:10. Ira Sankey said the famous number was sung most frequently at funerals. Not much is known of Stite's life. He was a cousin of another hymn writer, Eliza E. Hewitt.

STODDARD, SOLOMON (1643–1729). The "Pope" of Connecticut Congregationalism was one of fifteen sons of Anthony and Mary Downing Stoddard. A graduate of Harvard, he served the Northampton, Massachusetts, church from November 1669 until his death in February 1729. While there his grandson JONATHAN EDWARDS became his associate. Stoddard let professing Christians enjoy privileges of full membership even if they were uncertain of their state of grace. His sermons stressing judgment led to several revivals.

STOICISM. A philosophical movement that arose in ancient Athens and remained important for five hundred years. It was one of the most influential of the ancient philosophical schools, but only fragments of its early writings remain. The Stoics' aim was to understand the universe as macrocosm and human life and culture as microcosm. Heraclitus of Ephesus was the forerunner with his doctrines concerning the creative nature of reason in people and the universe, the subordination of the individual to the laws of nature, and the fact that all things are in a process of change.

The Stoics take their name from the Painted Colonnade (stoa) from which Zeno their founder lectured in Athens around 300 B.C. He emphasized the centrality of human character as evidenced in ethical and political action. He divided philosophy into three parts: logic, physics (cosmogony) and ethics. During the middle period, second and third centuries B.C., the movement was centered in Rome, where Diogenes lectured. There was at this time a modification in theme from the ascetic ideal of the wise person to the idea of the potential for moral progress in all people.

The late Stoic period, A.D. 100–200, is distinguished by the life and writings of SENECA, EPICTETUS, and the emperor Marcus Aurelius, whose Meditations are still accessible. He realized that Stoicism and Christianity were rivals and opponents in their appeal as the bases for popular life-styles. The stress now was less on natural science and more on moral philosophy: inward self-control and exemplary citizenship. Finding truth was both the desire and goal of the Stoics. They defined the formative creative power of the world—God—as LOGOS, Providence, and Order. They understood the course of the universe to be cyclical and timeless. In this universe God and world are autonomous and orderly. Those who live in harmony with this order will develop peace and well-being. This state could be achieved through virtue (which includes intelligence—knowing good from evil), bravery, justice, and self-control. All people, including slaves, have the divine spark, and the goal of each person should be service to others.

Stoicism has influenced Christianity, Judaism, and Islam. It influenced medieval political theory and the Renaissance tradition of Christian humanism. Its themes are still important for modern definitions of moral living.

STONE, BARTON W. (1772–1844). One of the early pioneers of the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES (Disciples of Christ), Stone was born on December 24 near Port Tobacco, Maryland. Ordained by the Presbyterian church in 1768, he was pastor at CANE RIDGE during the revival there. In 1803 he and four others formed the Springfield Presbytery. In 1804 they dissolved it, resolving to have no name but Christian, no creed but the Bible. In 1832 he agreed with Alexander Campbell to act as one of his disciples.

STONE, SAMUEL JOHN (1839–1900). Anglican clergyman, conservative apologist, and hymn writer. Stone was born in Whitmore, England. After his graduation from Oxford University, Stone served two English parishes—one at Windsor and one in the East End (London), where he ministered to the poor and needy. While Stone was a twenty-seven-year-old curate at Windsor, a controversy erupted in the Anglican communion over the writings of Bishop John Colenso of Natal, South Africa, who is said to have questioned several articles of the Christian faith. Colenso was forced from the church by his superior, the metropolitan, Bishop Robert Gray. Stone, a member of the High Church party, supported Gray and wrote a collection of twelve hymns, Lyra Fidelium, based on the Apostles' Creed. That association with the church inspired Stone to write his most enduring number, "The Church's One Foundation."

STOWE, HARRIET BEECHER (1811–96). Noted American author, abolitionist, and hymn writer. Harriet Beecher Stowe was the daughter of LYMAN BEECHER, New England Congregationalist minister, and a sister of the famed HENRY WARD BEECHER. Born on June 14 in Litchfield, Connecticut, she was four years old when her mother died. At thirteen she was sent to Hartford to attend a girls' school. She moved to Cincinnati in 1832, where her father became head of Lane Theological Seminary. She was employed there as a teacher in the Western Female Institute in Cincinnati, which had been founded by her sister, Catherine. About this time Harriet began her writing career and became an ardent abolitionist. In 1836 she married Calvin Ellis Stowe, professor of biblical literature at Lane Seminary. Later her husband received a call to a professorship at Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine. After the birth of her seventh child, Mrs. Stowe began to write Uncle Tom's Cabin, which appeared serially in an antislavery paper, the National Era. She wrote a number of books and hymn texts. Among her best-known hymns are "Still, Still with Thee," "Abide in Me, O Lord, and I in Thee," and "When Winds Are Raging." Mrs. Stowe died on July 1 in Hartford, Connecticut.

STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH (1808–74). German theologian. Born in Ludwigsburg, Strauss studied theology and philosophy at Tübingen and Berlin, where he was influenced by F. D. E. Schleiermacher and Georg W. F. Hegel. His Das Leben Jesu (The Life of Jesus, 1835–36) applied "myth theory" to the life of Christ. He saw the Gospels as "historical garb fashioned for primitive Christian ideas by naive poetic mythmakers and consolidated in an historical personality." The book brought about his dismissal as a professor at Tübingen. In later life he rejected Christianity entirely in favor of scientific materialism.

A graduate of Yale College (1857) and Rochester Theological Seminary (1859), he was ordained (1861) to serve the Baptist church in Haverhill, Massachusetts. From 1865 to 1872 Strong served First Baptist Church in Cleveland. He then became professor of biblical theology and president of Rochester Seminary, until his retirement in 1912. He also helped establish the University of Chicago.

STRONG, JOSIAH (1847–1916). Social reformer and prophet of the SOCIAL GOSPEL. He was born January 19 in Naperville, Illinois. He graduated from Western Reserve College in 1869 and attended Lane Theological Seminary. Ordained in 1871, he served the Congregational church in Cheyenne, Wyoming, for two years. Returning to Western Reserve College as chaplain in 1873, he took a pastorate in Sandusky, Ohio, in 1876. Strong served as secretary of the Congregational Home Missionary Society and as pastor of Central Congregational Church, Cincinnati. He was secretary of the American EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE until he resigned in 1898. His most famous book, Our Country (1885), was sympathetic to labor and critiqued capitalism. The New Era (1893) discussed the ideal society as Christ's kingdom.

STUDENT CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT (SCM). The British member of the World Student Christian Federation. The SCM began in 1892 with the "Cambridge (University) Seven." It drew students with a "desire to understand the Christian faith and live the Christian life" into study groups, conferences, and camps. An integral part of the movement was the Student Volunteer Missionary Union. Originally supported by the British Evangelicals, it reached out to High Church students and Liberals, paving the way for the modern ecumenical movement. Leaders included H. J. Oldham, William Temple, and Nathan Soderblom. Eventually more conservative members withdrew to form the Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union in 1910. To publish literature for students the group formed SCM Press, Ltd., London, in 1929, which continues to be a major British religious publisher.

STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT. The Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions began in the U.S.A. in 1866, and from it emerged in 1892 the Student Volunteer Missionary Union in Britain. The SVM slogan "The evangelization of the world in this generation," stated its aim—to enroll university students for worldwide missionary work. The SVM helped shape Protestant missions from 1890 to 1940, drew various churches together in mission, and became an important factor leading to the Edinburgh Conference on missions in 1910. Among the volunteers in the movement who became leaders in mission endeavors were Robert P. Wilder, John R. Mott, and Robert E. Speer. By 1939 SVM had recruited 25,000 missionaries, most of whom were from North America, and the majority went to Africa and Asia.

STUPA. In BUDDHISM, a domed building serving as a place of pilgrimage and worship. The oldest style of Buddhist edifice, the stupa was originally a place of burial for holy people and a reliquary housing remains of the Buddha and other saints. While this use has never been lost, the stupa later came to be venerated also for its symbolic significance. The traditional stupa of India and Southeast Asia first consists of a round base with a path outside it for walking around, a major devotional practice. Atop the base is a rounded dome, capped by a square structure. From the center of the square rises a pole bearing three horizontal discs or umbrellas.

The basic symbolic interpretation of the stupa is that the base represents the earth, the dome the sky, the cap the transcendent heavens, and the pole with its three discs the path of the Buddha, who has passed beyond all levels of conditioned reality, even the heavens. The stupa at Sanchi, India, built by Ashoka, with its rich carvings, is among the earliest and a classic example. The most imposing temple based on the stupa idea is probably the celebrated one at Borobudur in Java. The Tibetan chorten and the East Asian pagoda are further developments of the stupa.

SUBDEACON. In the Roman Catholic church, a person in the lowest of the two major orders leading to priesthood. Subdeacons arose in the early Catholic Church in the mid-third century A.D. Until the thirteenth century, it was a minor order, understood as instituted by the church. At that time it became a major order. Subdeacons are required to accept perpetual celibacy and to recite the divine office daily.

SUBDEAN. One who assists a dean in parish supervision. A dean is a clergyman appointed by the bishop (Roman Catholic church) or elected by the clergy (Lutheran) to supervise a district of the diocese (Roman Catholic) or synod (Lutheran). In the Catholic tradition, the office of rural dean or vicar forane dates to 1565.

SUBORDINATION. A teaching about the God-head or the Trinity that regards the Son as subordinate to the Father and the Holy Spirit as subordinate to both. This was a strong temptation in the first three centuries of Christian theology, but all forms of subordination within the Trinity were explicitly rejected in the resolutions of the Arian and Pneumatomachi controversies.

In more recent times some otherwise orthodox Christians have resurrected subordinationist trinitarian formulations to buttress arguments for male supremacy and female subordination. Confusing the image of head and body with structures of authority, they interpret such passages as I Corinthians 11:13 (see especially the TEV) to mean that all women should be subordinate to all men because Christ is subordinate to God. Subordination is also often confused with submission, which is a voluntary act of servanthood. Just as there is mutual submission at times between the coequal persons of the Trinity, so the NT repeatedly calls for mutual submission among all Christians (for example, Eph. 5:21).

N.H.

SUBSTANCE. An important word in the history of philosophy since Aristotle and in Christian theologies of the Incarnation and the Eucharist. According to Aristotle, the substance of a thing is what makes it what it is, its form or essence. The Greek term ousia, meaning what is underlying or basic, was rendered in Latin as substantia. Substantia is the permanent reality of a thing in contrast to its mutable, visible accidents.

These Aristotelian distinctions were taken up by the Scholastic philosophers and especially Thomas Aquinas. For Aquinas the reality of a thing is its substance, the source of a thing's unity and the subject of all predicates—that which sustains all accidents. For Descartes substance is that which needs nothing else for its existence, God being absolute substance in contrast to created substances. Spinoza taught that there is only one eternal, infinite substance, God or Nature, the things that make up the universe being God's finite modes.

In Christian theology the term "of one substance" was used in the NICENE CREED to express the relationship of the Father and the Son in the Godhead. In the Middle Ages the word "substance" was also used in Eucharistic theology to distinguish the substance of the species bread and wine from their mere accidents. The Council of Trent authorized TRANSUBSTANTIATION, or the change of the whole substance of bread and wine into the whole Body and Blood of Christ in the Eucharist, with only the accidents of bread and wine remaining.

SUCCOTH. (1) A city of Gad (Josh. 13:27) in Transjordan. Its name, meaning "booths," probably derives from a Canaanite harvest festival, though Genesis 33:17 associates "Succoth" with booths Jacob erected for his cattle as he returned from Paddan-aram. In the Judges era, its seventy-seven elders scornfully refused Gideon's request for food for his famishing army as it pursued Midian. On his triumphant return, Gideon severely punished them (Judg. 8:5-7, 14-16). Moreover, bronze equipment for Solomon's Temple was cast near Succoth (I Kings 7:46). The site is identified with Tell Deir 'Alla, situated along the course of the Jabbok as it turns northward to meet the Jordan. Presumably, "the Vale of Succoth" (Pss. 60:6; 108:7) denotes the fertile area dominated by this tell.

(2) An Egyptian city listed in Exodus 12:37; 13:20; and Numbers 33:5-6 as the first encampment of the Hebrews in the Exodus from Egypt. Ordinarily it is identified with modern Tell el-Maskhutah, a border fortress in the Wadi Tumeilat.

SUFISM. Islamic MYSTICISM. The name "Sufi" is derived from the Arabic word meaning "wool clad," from the ascetic clothing worn by the mystics. A broad movement, Sufism embraces ascetic hermits, protest movements, theological schools, and international brotherhoods. Sufis practice total reliance on God and have expressed their love for him in many ways, including meditation, poetry, dance, music, and recitation of the QUR'AN.

Sufism arose in the early days of Islam. The earliest Sufis practiced poverty (see FAKIR). They praised God through repetition of his name and through listening to poetry and music. The movements of the Umayyad and ABBASID dynasties, especially in politics, influenced early Sufism, and some Sufis may have drawn inspiration from Monophysite Christianity, Buddhism, Hinduism, and Zoroastrianism. Sufism began to coalesce in the late tenth century A.D., when various writers attempted to bring together the differing strands of the movement. In Sufism's medieval period (about A.D. 1000–1500), philosophers such as al-Ghazzali (who died in 1111) helped the movement gain recognition as a legitimate form of Islamic piety. Poetry gained increasing importance in that period, especially in the work of Jalal ad-Din Rumi, founder of the DERVISHES.

Sufism reached its peak of popularity in the time of the Mogul and Ottoman empires, about A.D. 1500–1800. The movement helped to expand the borders of Islam in Africa and Asia. Sufi missionaries brought Islam to West Africa, where today it competes with Christianity, and to Southeast Asia, particularly Indonesia, where it competes with Hinduism and Buddhism. The movement began to lose strength, however, during the time of Western colonialization. Wahhabiya, a movement requiring strict adherence to the Qur'an, rejected many aspects of Sufism: separate traditions, veneration of saints, and ecstatic communion with God. Wahhabis blamed Sufis for the weakened state of the Islamic world. Nevertheless, Sufism did remain strong in some areas, providing organization for resistance to colonialism. Both Sufism and Wahhabiya sought liberation from Western rule, and in nineteenth-century North India the mujahidin (holy warriors, see JIHAD) managed to combine the movements.

Today Sufism has little support. From a high point, when it was accepted as legitimate by perhaps 80 percent of all Muslims, Sufism has fallen to a small minority. Schools survive in seclusion and on the peripheries of the Muslim world. Westerners have heard about the movement through Indries Shah and others, and Western scholars have recently published several works on Sufism.

A major reason for hostility to Sufism is that the mystics have often said and done things that shock and infuriate the orthodox. One Sufi saint stared into the sun as a form of meditation. A Sufi saying is that God is an atheist, because he believes in no higher deity. Sufis have invited persecution and even martyrdom through such sayings and remarks that are regarded as even greater blasphemies, for example, "I am God." Sufis have also postulated a godhead, immutable and passive, behind or above Allah. Other Sufis reject all metaphysical speculation and therefore criticize the schools of Islamic philosophy that followed Greek thought.

Sufism's great spread in time, space, and philosophy defies generalization. The earliest Sufis, to whom later teachers looked for authority, most likely did not recognize themselves as members of a separate school. When the movement came to think of itself as distinct from other schools of thought it became divided through differences in temperament and varying degrees of borrowing from other religions. Persecution took its toll on membership and reputation. Though Sufi influence lingers on, it no longer commands widespread loyalty. K./M.C.

SUKKOT. A Jewish festival held during the fall season, which commemorates the time the Israelites lived in booths in the wilderness. Known as both the Feast of Booths and the Feast of Tabernacles, it was from ancient times one of the most important festivals of the Israelites. The Bible calls it "the feast of the Lord" (Lev. 23:39). It is observed for seven days in Israel (and by Reform Jews) and for eight days by Conservative and Orthodox Jews outside Israel. Temporary booths are constructed, and Jews are supposed to live in them for the entire festival so "that your generations may know that I made the people of Israel dwell in booths when I brought them out of the land of Egypt" (Lev. 23:43). Jews also recite blessings over the "fruit of goodly trees (a citron called etrog), branches of palm trees (lulav), boughs of leafy trees, and willows of the brook; and you shall rejoice before the Lord your God . . ." (Lev. 23:40). A harvest festival, Sukkot is also known as the "feast of ingathering." It is one of the three pilgrimage festivals, the other two being PASSOVER and SHAVUOT. SULLIVAN, HARRY STACK (1892–1949). Founder of the practice of psychiatry as the study of interpersonal relations. Sullivan was born in Norwich, New York, on February 21. He became a doctor in 1917, studied psychiatry at St. Elizabeth's Hospital in Washington, D.C., 1919–1923, and did clinical research at Sheppard and Enoch Pratt Hospital in Towson, Maryland, 1923–30. From this research he developed his idea that psychiatric disorders arose out of disturbances in the person's interpersonal relationships, particularly with the mother. This disturbance causes anxiety in the infant and the child develops a life-style designed to reduce this anxiety. Sullivan died in Paris, France on January 14. J.C.

SULPICIAN. See ST. SULPICE, SOCIETY OF.

SUMER. The land situated in the Tigris-Euphrates plain of Lower Mesopotamia, spanning modern Baghdad and the Persian Gulf. At history's dawn, its Sumerian inhabitants fashioned a remarkable civilization.

Historical Overview. The Ubaidians were Sumer's original inhabitants (about 4000–3300 B.C.). Their culture is attested at Tell al-Ubaid and in the lowest strata of numerous villages that ultimately became substantial urban centers. As they prospered, they sustained infiltrations of western Semitic nomads. The Sumerians arrived about 3300–3000. Speaking a unique language, they blended with the native population and spawned a culture rich in technological, religious, and literary achievements. Especially significant was the Sumerian invention of a cuneiform system of writing.

During Sumer's early dynastic period (about 3000–2360), such city-states as Kish, UR, and Erech vied for dominance, though none permanently unified the land. Sumer's kings included Enmebaragesi of Kish, founder of the Nippur temple of Enlil, Sumer's chief deity; Mesanepadda of Ur, founder of a dynasty noted for its exquisite tombs; and Gilgamesh of Erech, whose exploits made him the focus of legend. Sumer yielded to Semitic rule when SARGON established the Akkad Empire (about 2360–2180). Encompassing most of western Asia, it collapsed when Sargon's grandson, Naram-Sin, was overwhelmed by Gutu barbarians who loosely controlled Sumer for approximately one dark century.

The Sumerians gradually revived. Presumably, toward the end of Gutian dominance, Gudea advanced his city, Lagash, by sponsoring effective programs in trade, temple building, visual arts, and literature. Utu-hegal, king of Erech, liberated Sumer from the Gutu yoke, but was overthrown by Ur-nammu, founder of the Third Dynasty of Ur (about 2060–1950). Through his law code, Ur-nammu corrected various social abuses. Sumer likewise prospered under his son Shulgi, but was soon overrun by Semitic nomads, the Amurru (biblical Amorites). Elam's destruction of Ur (about 1950) induced rival Amorite dynasties to assert themselves. Babylon claimed the victory when Hammurabi defeated Rim-sin of Larsa (about 1720). Thus ancient Sumer expired.

Sumerian Society. Though agrarian in economy, Sumerian society was predominantly urban. The typical Sumerian city-state hosted, as the property of its patron deity, a large, walled city featuring as its outstanding edifice a mud brick temple with enormous tower (ziggurat). Surrounding land belonged to the temple and private citizens. The city's governor (ensi) and an assembly of free citizens determined local policy. Emergencies evoked by barbarian incursions and city-state rivalries inspired the institution of kingship. Most Sumerians were free citizens devoted to private enterprise. They farmed, fished, traded, and engaged in various crafts. Thousands of clay tablets attest the importance of writing. Though most served economic and legal interests, some contain literary expressions of myth, epic, hymn, lament, and proverb. Sumer's schools ensured the education of professionals and general advancement of learning. Its artists excelled in music, sculpture, and cylinder seal engraving (small stone cylinders creating geometric and scene impressions when rolled over wet clay).

Sumerian Religion. In their cosmology, the Sumerians spoke of a heaven vaulting over an earth disk, all of which was surrounded by primordial water. A pantheon of inscrutable, immortal deities supervised the universe. Four were particularly prominent—Enlil, An, Ki, and Enki (deities of atmosphere, heaven, earth, and water). Sumerian perspectives about the nature and destiny of humanity were sober. Determined to concentrate on divine pursuits, the gods created humanity from clay to meet their needs for food, drink, and lodging. Through cultic rituals, the most crucial being the New Year festival, humanity served and placated the gods. Abject existence was plagued by uncertainty. When tragedy struck, the day's order was not complaint but confession of moral and ritual offense against the gods. At death humanity entered a netherworld dismally reflecting previous earthly existence.

SUMMA. Originally the medieval title of any compendium of a subject such as theology, philosophy, or canon law. Summas superseded SENTENCES as handbooks for schools. The best known is Thomas Aquinas' Summa Theologica. N.H.

SUMMA CONTRA GENTILES. See AQUINAS, THOMAS.

SUMMA THEOLOGICA. See AQUINAS, THOMAS.

SUN. The daytime luminary that God created under the designation "the greater light" (Gen. 1:16) to avoid any mythological association with the Mesopotamian and Canaanite sun-gods, Shamash and Shapsh, with whose names shemesh, the Hebrew noun for "sun," is cognate.

Diverse Literary Usage. Solar biblical references define space and time: east ("from the rising of the sun"; Deut. 11:30), west ("toward the going down of the sun"; Isa. 45:6; 59:19), the whole earth ("from the rising of the sun to its setting"; Pss. 50:1; 113:3; Mal. 1:11); morning ("when the sun rises"; Ps. 104:22), midday ("until the sun is hot"; Neh. 7:3), and evening ("the sun went down"; Judg. 19:14). The frequent phrase "under the sun" in Ecclesiastes (1:3, 9, 14) indicates mundane existence. The sun is mentioned in expressions denoting shameful public exposure (Num. 25:4; II Sam. 12:11-12), sunstroke (Ps. 121:6), the just ruler (II Sam. 23:4), dynastic permanence (Ps. 89:36), Yahweh's creative power (Pss. 19:4; 74:16; 136:8; Ecclus. 43:2), and the transfiguration of Jesus (Matt. 17:2). Folkloristic allusions appear in Joshua 10:12-13, where postponed sunset ensures Joshua's military triumph, and II Kings 20:8-11 (Isa. 38:7-8), where the sun's receding shadow on a sundial signals Hezekiah's recovery from severe illness.

Solar Idolatry. Israelite involvement in the Palestinian solar cult, whose appeal is betrayed by the place-names Beth-shemesh ("house of the sun"; I Sam. 6:9) and En-shemesh ("spring of the sun"; Josh. 15:7), was prohibited by Yahweh (Deut. 4:19; 17:3). Nevertheless, King Manasseh (687-642 B.C.) legitimized the worship of "all the host of heaven" (II Kings 21:3, 5), in which many Judeans presumably participated (Jer. 8:2). Though Josiah's reform (622 B.C.) abolished its priesthood and horse-and-chariot paraphernalia (II Kings 23:5, 11), its survival soon thereafter (Ezek. 8:16) again jeopardized Yahweh's incomparability.

Final Judgment and Blessing. Several prophetic texts declare that with the cessation of the present era on the Day of Yahweh, the world will confront a sun "dark at its rising" (Isa. 13:10), one covered "with a cloud" (Ezek. 32:7; see Joel 2:10, 31). Jesus speaks similarly in his portrayal of the end of the age (Matt. 24:29; Mark 13:24). The faithful, however, are marvelously reassured. With Yahweh's ultimate triumph, either the sun will shine with sevenfold brightness (Isa. 30:26), or in the new Jerusalem, their future home, the resplendence of God's indwelling glory will render the sun irrelevant (Isa. 60:19; Rev. 21:23).

J. K. K.

SUNDAY. The first day of the week, and by ancient tradition of the church, the chief day of Christian worship. In the OT the people of God had worshiped, instead, on the seventh day of the week, Saturday. But Christ's resurrection from the dead on EASTER Day established a new day for worship, as did his appearances to the women, the disciples, the two men on their way to Emmaus, and later to Thomas, all on Sunday, and still later, his sending of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost Sunday. It was almost as if Christ had picked Sunday over Saturday.

The SABBATH day had been both a day of worship and a day of rest. In the Greco-Roman world there was no fixed pattern for a weekly day of rest. Christians therefore often worshiped either before or after the working day. As for the Mosaic Law, Christ disregarded a Pharisaical interpretation of the Law when he healed the crippled and harvested wheat on the Sabbath. Sunday almost immediately became the cornerstone of Christian worship. As several fathers of the early church wrote, every Sunday became a little Easter. In fact, the replacement of Saturday with Sunday as the chief day of worship was almost automatic, even for a die-hard loyalist to the laws of Moses like Simon Peter. What few references the NT provides almost all point to Sunday as the normal day of worship, whether reported by Luke, Paul, or John. In Acts 20, for example, Luke writes of the visit to Troas and how Paul preached "on the first day of the week, when we were gathered together to break bread" (v. 7). This is the service in a private house or apartment, not in a synagogue, at which Eutychus fell asleep on the window sill and crashed to the street below. The service was apparently held at night.

Paul further exhorts the Corinthians to gather an offering for Jerusalem when they gathered on the first day of the week. He says he had given similar instructions to the churches in Galatia. John, in Revelation 1:10, terms Sunday as the "Lord's day" as if the term were already understood by everybody.

Paul normally refers to Sunday as the first day of the week. By the time John was a prisoner in exile on Patmos, the "first day" had universally assumed the new name, "the day of the Lord." In Greek this is kyriake, and means simply "the Lord's" or "pertaining to the Lord." The Latin equivalent is dominicalis, a word that has given us the name for Sunday in most of the Romance languages—those based on Latin. Even in the twentieth century we have such forms as domingo (Portuguese), domenica (Italian), and dimanche (French). The other days of the week continued to be named after Roman gods—Luna, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn. In northern Europe, where the biggest family of languages was the Germanic one, the names of the days of the week remained pagan. The deities honored were the sun, the moon, Tiu, Woden, Thor, Freia, and Saturn. Even so pious a monk as the Venerable Bede in his monastery in England could write that Christians should not be disturbed to worship on a day, Sunday, whose name honored the sun god. After all, should not Christians make some concessions to the lack of knowledge of the unconverted heathen? And did Christians not also mark the resurrection of the Lord on Easter, also a pagan rather than a Christian name?

SUNDAY, WILLIAM (BILLY) ASHLEY (1862-1935). Colorful American evangelist who left a career in professional baseball. Born in Ames, Iowa, Sunday for a time worked as a fireman on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad between baseball seasons. Soon after his conversion at Chicago's Pacific Garden Mission in 1886, Sunday left baseball. From 1891 to 1893 he served as an assistant secretary of the Chicago YMCA. Then for two years he served with J. Wilbur Chapman in his evangelistic campaigns.

Sunday began his independent career as an evangelist in 1896. He developed an organization of co-workers including HOMER RODEHEAVER, the trombone-playing song leader. Sunday developed the idea of conducting city-wide campaigns, enlisting the support of all the churches in an area. Often his meetings were conducted in wooden tabernacles especially built for his meetings.

Sunday became famous for his humorous rhetoric and unorthodox preaching style. Since sawdust covered the ground in the tabernacles, the converts resulting from his meetings were described as "hitting the sawdust trail." Sunday always found opportunity to strike hard against evolution and "Demon Rum." He was heard by more people—some one hundred million—than any preacher up to his time.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS. Newspaper editor ROBERT RAIKES of Gloucester, England, in 1780 hired women to teach poor children to read and recite their catechism in an effort to "check the deplorable profanation of the Sabbath." The concept spread throughout England. A Sunday School Society was formed in 1785, and the British Sunday School Union in 1803. Promoted by the Clapham sect, it changed from a secular charity into a vehicle for Christian education. The Sunday School Institute was formed in 1843 to ensure Church of England teaching; it became the National Sunday School Union in 1903, and the National Christian Education Council in 1966.

The concept was promoted in the United States by Isabella Marshall Graham and her daughter and son-in-law Joanna and Divy Bethune, who first started a class for adults in 1792. In 1804 some Philadelphia women formed a Sabbath school to teach poor girls. A landmark decision by the Superior Court in 1808 declared them as women "citizens of the commonwealth" and thus eligible for incorporation. Whereas British teachers had been paid, American schools became entirely a voluntary enterprise.

Joanna Bethune formed the Female Union for the Promotion of Sabbath Schools in 1816. Patterned after the Edinburgh Gratis Sabbath-School Society, its constitution was borrowed from a Bristol society. The executive committee included Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, and Dutch Reformed women. The Bethunes also organized the New York Sunday School Union and in 1824 the American Sunday School Union. In 1829 its mission became the evangelization of the nation; in 1833 the "Valley Campaign" to save the Midwest from Roman Catholicism; in 1834 the "Southern Enterprise" to promote Sunday schools from Maryland to Florida; and in 1835 to win the world.

Begun as an ecumenical effort by women, Sunday schools were perceived by some as an intrusion on parents' educational responsibilities. Others said it infringed on the pastor's teaching office and was a violation of Sabbath rest. In the work of Dwight L. Moody and in many conservative churches today, the Sunday school remains a form of evangelistic outreach. Children of the poor and unchurched are bussed to church in hopes that parents will eventually join.

In 1872 Moody convinced the ASSU to adopt the "uniform lesson plan," in which all age levels studied the same text. This ecumenical venture, an important part of the Evangelical United Front, encouraged interdenominational publishing and teacher training. The Sunday school became an integral part of the American church, sometimes more important to its members than worship services.

SUNNA. The Arabic word meaning "way, course of action, manner of acting." In Islam, Sunna refers to the decrees of God and the precedents of the prophet Muhammad, taken as models for the faithful. The term Sunni is commonly used for the majority body of Islam, which emphasizes the Sunna of the Prophet, tradition, legal precedent, and the consensus of believers. The other major party is the Shi'a.

R.E.

SUNNI/SUNNITE. The majority party in Islam, so called because it follows the SUNNA, or traditional forms of faith and practice, in contrast to the SHI'ITE movement, the party loyal to Ali. K.C.

SUNYATA. From the Sanskrit word for "emptiness." In BUDDHISM, a term used to describe the phenomenal world and the world of thought that stems from it as ultimately empty or void. It is most prominently used in the Mahayana thought of NAGARJUNA (about A.D. 200), for whom emptiness was the most appropriate metaphor for a universe in which all is in flux, and there is nothing to which to cling, neither god nor abiding self, in the realm of conditioned reality. What is unchanging is NIRVANA, not different from the void, the indescribable opposite of the conditioned realm yet also one with it, since Nirvana and Sunyata are in no other place and time than the here and now. Sunyata or emptiness, in other words, is simply the ordinary world seen with the eye of enlightenment, which sees it as it really is: transitory, with no place for attachment, but also where liberation can be realized in the midst of ordinariness by those who so view it. R.E.

SUPER EGO. See FREUD, SIGMUND.

SUPEREROGATION, WORKS OF. Traditionally, in Roman Catholic moral theology, good works that go beyond those strictly obligatory on Christians. Those who voluntarily take upon themselves the counsels of perfection (celibacy, poverty, obedience) are considered to practice good deeds beyond the call of a believer's duty. Any extraordinary act, such as the work of a missionary in dangerous areas, serving the sick in an epidemic, or voluntarily identifying oneself with the oppressed would be considered a work of supererogation.

In Protestantism, generally, the concept of WORKS of supererogation is rejected. Luther saw such a notion as resting on works righteousness, the belief that one cooperates with God in salvation, or somehow wins a reward from God for one's ascetic life-style. Of course, legalism and an emphasis on good works developed in some Protestant sects. In the case of John Wesley's early teachings on the possibility of Christian perfection, Wesley—and the later Methodists—found it helpful to deny the need for works of supererogation. J.C.

SUPERNATURAL. See TRANSCENDENCE.

SUPREMACY, ACTS OF. The first, passed in 1534, confirmed to HENRY VIII and his successors the title "the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England." As enforced by Thomas Cromwell, it gave the king and his agents precedence over the entire episcopacy. The act was later repealed by Queen Mary. A second Act of Supremacy, passed in 1559, named ELIZABETH I "the only supreme governor . . . as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal." This act set limits on the government's ability to judge heresy and made Parliament a more equal partner in the church's governing. An oath affirming the sovereign's supremacy was required of all clergy and public officials. N.H.

SUSANNA, BOOK OF. Apocryphal addition to the book of DANIEL. In the story Susanna refused to have sexual relations with two elders who approached her in her garden pool. Accused of adultery, she maintained her innocence in an ensuing trial. Daniel, in an attempt to defend her, confronted and cross-examined the two elders who contradicted each other's testimony. Susanna was acquitted and in accordance with the law of Deuteronomy 19:18-21, the two elders were executed. The apocryphal books of JUDITH and TOBIT are similar to the book of Susanna in showing how God vindicates the righteous and punishes the wicked. W. G.

SUTRA. From the Sanskrit word for "thread." In HINDUISM, a sutra is a short saying or aphorism, often collected into a text, as are the "Yoga Sutras" of Patanjali. In BUDDHISM, the much longer SANSKRIT scriptures of Mahayana are called sutras. R.E.

SUTTA PITAKA. From the Pali phrase meaning "Basket of Discourse." The second of the three collections of texts that make up the Tripitaka, "Three Baskets," the Pali scriptures of BUDDHISM that alone are authoritative in the Theravada tradition. The Sutta Pitaka is important for its presentation of basic Buddhist teaching on the origin of suffering and the way to liberation, its instruction on meditation, and its account of the Buddha's last days. Its discourses, mostly attributed to the Buddha himself, tend to be in concrete stories or lists that make for easy memorization. R.E.

SUZUKI, DAISETZ TEITARO (1870-1966). The person far more responsible than anyone else for the considerable cultural and spiritual influence enjoyed by ZEN Buddhism in Europe and America. A scholar, writer, and Buddhist layman, Suzuki was religiously trained in a Zen monastery in Kamakura. Fluent in English, he resided in the United States (1897-1909) as editor and translator for the Open Court Publishing Company. He subsequently made several lecture tours of the West, the most important being an extended stay in America in the early 1950s, which did much to make Zen an important motif in the "Beat" literature and art of that decade. Suzuki made a lasting impression on such Western expounders of Zen as Christmas Humphreys and Alan Watts, as well as on psychologists and philosophers like Erich Fromm.

In his many books, Suzuki engagingly discussed Zen monastic life and the relation of Zen to Japanese culture. However, Zen, as he presented it, was not bound to any particular discipline or culture. Instead, it offers the profound freedom of overcoming the dualities that trap the mind, through non-attachment to specific routines or sets of ideas. Suzuki's gift lay in his ability to present Zen in language that spoke to the West's spiritual quest. R.E.

SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL (1688–1772). The father of the Church of the NEW JERUSALEM was born to Jesper Swedberg, a professor of theology at Uppsala, Sweden, and bishop of Skara. Having studied natural science at Uppsala and served on the Board of Mines (1716–47), Swedenborg is sometimes called the father of "crystallography." Between 1743 and 1745 he became ever-conscious of the spiritual world. In The Worship and Love of God he explained that in a vision God told him to explain the "spiritual sense of the Scripture." Thus he published the Arcana Coelestia (1749–56), an eight-volume commentary on Genesis and Exodus. Thirty more volumes followed.

Swedenborg asserted human freedom. His self-assured optimism influenced transcendentalism, spiritualism, communitarianism, faith healing, mesmerism, perfectionism, and millenarianism. He believed in three orders of being: the natural world of mineral, vegetable, or animal "ultimates," the spiritual order, and the celestial realm. Everything on the natural level corresponds to something on higher levels. Swedenborg argued that his interpretations of the spiritual meaning of Scripture constituted Christ's Second Coming or the New Jerusalem as prophesied in Revelation 21:2.

Swedenborg's works include The Earths in the Universe (1758), The New Jerusalem and Its Heavenly Doctrine (1758), Heaven and Hell (1758), Divine Love and Wisdom (1763, perhaps his central work), The Apocalypse Revealed (1766), and The True Christian Religion (1771). N.H.

SWEETMAN, JAMES WINDROW (1891–1966). Entering the Methodist ministry in 1915, Sweetman spent much of his life (1919–46) in India, where he worked on a Christian approach to Muslims, a task for which he prepared himself through private study. He concentrated on a sympathetic understanding and effective communication with Islam. In 1947 he took up the chair of Islamics at Selly Oakes College in Birmingham, England, where he fostered interreligious sensitivity and introduced missionary candidates to the priority for Christian mission to Muslims. He also wrote several articles and books, the major one being a three-volume work, Islam and Christian Theology, a study of Islamic theology in its relationship with Christian thought. W.G.

SYCHAR. A city of Samaria visited by Jesus. The site of Jacob's well, it was situated "near the field that Jacob gave to his son Joseph" (John 4:5-6). This surely recalls Jacob's gift to Joseph of "one mountain slope" (Hebrew shekem ["shoulder"]) reported in Genesis 48:22. Presumably, "the sons of Hamor, Shechem's father" had earlier sold this field to Jacob (Gen. 33:18-19).

Sychar's proper identity turns on the question of whether Sychar and SHECHEM refer to the same locality. Though the best ancient manuscripts attest "Sychar" in John 4:5, "Shechem" appears in a Syriac witness, and Jerome equates Sychar with Shechem. The once popular identification of Sychar with the Arab village of 'Askar, located approximately a mile northeast of Jacob's well, no longer appears persuasive. At best, the similarity of name is uncertain. Also this equation plays havoc with the narrative. The presence of a decent well at 'Askar calls into question the Samaritan woman's lengthy journey to Jacob's well (John 4:7), which is doubtless situated just beyond the southeastern edge of Tell Balatah (biblical Shechem). Thus "Sychar" is most likely a textual error displacing "Shechem," the reading intended by the biblical writer. J.K.K.

SYLLABUS OF ERRORS. Pope Pius IX in 1864 issued Syllabus Errorum, condemning eighty theses. An accompanying encyclical Quanta cura appeared to make the Syllabus dogmatically binding. Among other things the Syllabus condemned rationalism, indifferentism, socialism, communism, naturalism, freemasonry, separation of church and state, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion as practiced in many democratic countries. The document culminated in the rejection of any suggestion that "the Roman pontiff can and ought to reconcile himself and reach agreement with progress, liberalism and modern civilization."

Most understood the documents as a direct attack on Americanism, a liberal Catholic movement in the United States, and Catholic Liberalism on the Continent. Others, however, argued that the pope was surprised by the hostile reaction because he sought merely to attack ideas basic to the current Italian Liberal attack on his temporal power. One can also see in it the temporary triumph of ultramontaniam. Much of it was reiterated in the dogmatic constitution "De Fide Catholica" of VATICAN I in 1870. N.H.

SYMBOL. A symbol is something that, because of its natural properties, historical associations, or mere convention, has come to be understood as referring beyond itself to some other reality. Symbols are very common in both secular and religious life. A ruler of a country may use the lion as a symbol of courage; Christianity uses the cross as a symbol of the sacrificial love of Christ. Virtually anything can become a symbol, not only objects but actions and gestures.

In religion, a special importance belongs to the symbolic use of words. In a sense, all referring words are symbols, since they refer to realities beyond themselves. But when we speak of symbolic language, we mean that the reference of the words is not to be taken in the literal or dictionary sense, but has been transferred to some other reality, perhaps in itself difficult to understand, yet now illuminated in some respects by the use of the symbol. For instance, if one says that God is a strong tower, it is obvious that the expression "strong tower" is not to be taken literally—God is not a building. But the words suggest that God can be trusted for protection against evil, just as a strong tower can be trusted. The infinite and eternal being of God must inevitably be beyond human comprehension and cannot be directly grasped by our minds. Hence, virtually all language about God is symbolic or indirect. We take items from everyday human experience and apply them to God, though we understand that they do not apply directly but at most suggest what we believe God to be like. This is the case even when we say "God exists," for we know what it means to exist as a finite being in the world, but we cannot grasp what would be the fullness of being that transcends the world and gives existence to everything in the world. Thus, although Aquinas named God "He who is," the mystical theologians were perhaps wiser when they declared God to transcend even being.

Though symbolic language is indirect, it should not be despised, for it has a flexibility of outreach that makes it in some situations superior to precise conceptual language, just as poetry can express meanings that cannot be put into prose. Paul Tillich warned against thinking of language as "only symbolic," and claimed that the power of symbolic language surpasses that of nonsymbolic language. Tillich mentioned six characteristics of a symbol: (1) It refers beyond itself to the reality that it is intended to illuminate. (2) It participates in that reality, in the sense that it shares some deep affinity, which it brings to light. (3) In doing so, it opens up a level of reality that has hitherto been closed and that cannot be opened up in any other way. (4) At the same time it opens up new dimensions of perception within ourselves, making us sensitive to realities that we had previously missed. (5) Symbols are not produced intentionally or at will—they grow up in human experience and perhaps have their roots in the unconscious. (6) Symbols not only come into being and grow, they eventually wither and die if, in changed historical circumstances, they can no longer perform their work as they did in the past. This is one reason why religions rise and fall.

Thomist scholars have been critical of symbolic theories of religious language because, they believe, such theories have surrendered the cognitive element in religion and reduced religion to emotional response. They contrast with the symbolic theories their own theory of ANALOGY. But these criticisms seem unjust. While symbols do have emotional appeal, they are also cognitive, and in fact no hard and fast line can be drawn between symbols and analogues.

On the other hand, some philosophers (Hegel is an example) have held that symbols or images produced by the religious consciousness are only stages on the way to the rational concepts of the absolute philosophy. But the question here concerns the reach of human reason. A god who could be grasped in precise concepts would surely be less than God, and God's ultimate mystery is respected rather in symbols that are content to hint at God's being.

Unfortunately, the religious have a tendency to absolutize their symbols and to take them literally. When this happens, the symbols distort rather than illuminate the divine reality, and they become objects of idolatry rather than pointers to God. J.M.

SYMBOLICS. A symbol is a statement of faith or CREED, therefore, symbolics is the area of study of the doctrines of various churches. The great symbols of the Christian faith include the Nicene Creed, which is technically known as the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, written by the councils at Nicaea, in A.D. 325 and 387, the Apostles' Creed, and the Athanasian Creed. SYNAGOGUE. A Jewish house of worship. Traditionally, it has had three functions: a place of prayer, a place of study, and a place of assembly. The term is from the Greek and referred to the congregation rather than the site or building. It is used interchangeably with temple.

It evolved from antiquity, appearing as a fully grown and firmly established institution around the first century of the Christian Era. Some scholars say that it originated in the Babylonian Exile. They reason that the exiles, deprived of the TEMPLE in Jerusalem, felt the need to meet from time to time and read the Scriptures. Ezekiel repeatedly refers to the assembly "of the elders" (Ezek. 8:1; 14:1; 20:1).

Some customs and rites of the Temple in Jerusalem were transferred to the synagogue, although some rituals were restricted to the Temple and could not therefore be assumed by the synagogue. Prayer was regarded as the substitute for sacrifice. The service, functions, and officials of the synagogue have remained remarkably consistent throughout the 2,500 years of its history. To the officials were added the professional CANTOR, unknown in early times; the ba'al keriah, who reads the Torah portions, where previously the person called up read his own portion; and, particularly in Western countries, the RABBI of the synagogue as distinct from the rabbi of the community.

Synagogues are oriented toward Jerusalem. According to Jewish law, the synagogue must have windows, a requirement stemming from Daniel 6:10-11, which describes how Daniel prayed by windows facing toward Jerusalem. The Torah scrolls are placed in a closet, called the Holy Ark, which is supposed to be on the side facing Jerusalem. The reader's desk was placed immediately in front of the ark. The Eternal Light burns over the ark. The Torah was read, and in many cases still is, from the bimah, an elevated platform surrounded by a railing and located so that the entire congregation can hear the Torah reading. The requirement of special accommodations for women is based on a strict interpretation of the existence of women's galleries in the "women's court" of the Temple in Jerusalem. There is no stipulation in Jewish law about the exterior of synagogues, and therefore they range from the simple Hasidic shtetlelech to impressive edifices of virtually every architectural style. Symbols used in the structure include the MENORAH, SHOFAR (a ram's horn), symbols of the Jewish festivals, the Ten Commandments, the Star of David, fruits of the land of Israel, the Lions of Judah, and the like.

The ritual of the Temple in Jerusalem was conducted inside the sanctuary by only the priests. The rest of the worshippers were kept at a distance. By contrast, the synagogue was a new type of religious building. It was based on the full participation of people in collective acts of worship conducted around a focal point inside the building. SYNERGISTIC/SYNERGISM. These terms have (1) the general meaning of cooperating and working together so that separate energies are combined and enhanced, and (2) a theological meaning referring to the doctrine that human wills work together with God's grace to effect regeneration.

The general meaning appears in contemporary group work. Here synergism refers to the way the interacting energies of individuals can enhance each other so that cooperation produces a resultant whole greater than the sum of the parts.

The theological meaning appears especially in controversies during the post-Reformation period. Both the Lutheran and Reformed traditions taught that regeneration from sin is solely by God's grace, revealed and imparted through Jesus Christ and accomplished through the work of the Holy Spirit. In opposition to Protestant teaching, the Roman Catholic Council of Trent, following Thomas Aquinas, affirmed that humans through PREVENIENT GRACE consent to the work of God and cooperate with God for justification. This synergistic tendency is strengthened by the general acceptance of the theology of the Jesuit Luis Molina and the condemnation of the Jansenist attempts to reaffirm the Augustinian teaching. In the Reformed tradition, Arminian tendencies toward synergism were rejected by the SYNOD OF DORT, while the federal stream of Reformed thought maintained the meaning of human responsibility within the covenant of God.

SYNOD. From the Greek word synodos, meaning "a meeting." A synod is an ecclesiastical council. Ecumenical, plenary, national, provincial, and diocesan councils are all called "synods" in Roman Catholic practice, as well as in Eastern Orthodox practice. However, in modern times, the term is usually reserved for a diocesan assembly. Such a diocesan meeting is not technically a council, since it does not make laws for the whole church or decide on the orthodoxy of doctrine. The term "synod" is used by the Lutheran church for the major governing unit of their polity. In the United States, a Lutheran synod is often territorially the same as a state, although a state may contain several synods in heavily populated areas, and several less-populated states may form a synod. In Presbyterian churches, the term "synod" is used for a larger governing unit, made up of a number of presbyteries, and often includes the territory of a number of states in the United States.

SYNOPTIC GOSPELS. The first three canonical Gospels, traditionally ascribed to MATTHEW, MARK, and LUKE. They are known as the Synoptic Gospels, since they share a generally common presentation of the events of Jesus Christ's life, death, and resurrection. In spite of important differences, these three Gospels share a basic structural core, running from Jesus' baptism at the hands of John the Baptist to the report of the women who found the tomb of Jesus empty. The term "synoptic" comes from the Greek words syn (with or together) and optos (seeing), meaning that these Gospels "see events together or alike." In contrast, the Fourth Gospel, John, diverges from the other three Gospels in sequence and in content (In John, for example, Jesus drives out the money changers from the Temple early in his ministry; in the Synoptics, the cleansing of the temple takes place in the last week of Jesus' life and is the last straw that forces the chief priest to act against him.).

But despite the general similarity of the Synoptics, the dissimilarities among them cause difficulties in interpretation and understanding that together are called "the Synoptic problem." Among these dissimilarities are the different ways the Synoptics begin and end. Only Matthew and Luke have birth narratives; Mark does not, nor does John. Yet the birth stories are very different in Matthew and Luke. More perplexing, the oldest manuscripts of Mark contain no resurrection appearances of Jesus to the disciples. Moreover, long sections of Mark (whose general outline and even wording Matthew and Luke share) are not found in Matthew and Luke, or else the material is found in one Gospel but not the other. In other places, Matthew and Luke share a common outline and verbal presentation; yet this material (generally discourses by Jesus) is not found in Mark at all.

Because of these content similarities in Matthew and Luke, and the fact that both longer Gospels follow Mark, but Mark does not follow either of them, the four-document theory of the composition of the Synoptic Gospels was devised by early modern NT scholars. Briefly, the theory of Gospel development and composition is that from the beginning the sayings of Jesus and reports of his healings and miracles circulated among the disciples in oral form. These ORAL TRADITIONS may have been in Aramaic and in Greek. Later, as Jesus' expected imminent return did not materialize, the reports of his life were written down. The first "gospel" was Mark, which tradition says is dependent upon Peter. Additionally, a "sayings source" or LOGIA, which recorded Jesus' teaching and preaching, was written, probably as a guide for Christian preaching and evangelism. Biblical scholars called the logia Q for Quelle, the German term for source. The later evangelists, Matthew and Luke, used Mark as their major source and supplemented Mark with Q. They both also included additional traditions (especially the birth narratives), which are called "M" in Matthew, and "L" in Luke. Mark, Q, M, and L thus form the four documents underlying the Synoptic Gospel tradition.

Newer biblical origins theories suggest that all three Synoptics may have been created out of units of tradition that circulated independently (the FORM CRITICISM theory) or that the various evangelists were actually theologians who personally selected and shaped the materials they found in earlier oral and written sources into coherent theological statements (REDACTION CRITICISM).

Each of the Synoptic Gospels presents Jesus in a slightly different way. Matthew shows us Jesus as the Messiah, the fulfillment of every OT prophetic prediction. Mark is the Gospel of action, showing us Jesus in dynamic activity. For Mark, Jesus is the Son of man. Luke reflects the humanity of Jesus and stresses his journey from Galilee to Jerusalem.

SYRIA. A Greek noun applied, since Herodotus (fifth century B.C.), to extensive Aramean territory north-northeast of Israel.

Geopolitical Considerations. Never a precise political entity, Syria possessed vague frontiers. Syria's interior consisted of wide-ranging mountains separating the Syro-Arabian desert plateau from the Mediterranean. Boasting many natural harbors, Syria's coast was particularly valuable. Primarily settling into Syria's sparsely populated inland, Aramean tribes developed into such states as Zobah (II Sam. 8:3), Damascus (8:5), Beth-rehob, Maacah, Tob (10:6), and Geshur (15:8). As Syria's dominant state during the ninth-eighth centuries B.C., Damascus regularly plagued Israel. In NT times, Syria was a Roman province, with ANTIOCH as its capital.

Biblical Events. Augmenting their leverage against David (about 1000–961 B.C.), the Ammonites hired Syrian troops from Beth-rehob, Zobah, Maacah, and Tob (II Sam. 10:6). After Israel's triumph in two phases of battle, Syria transferred allegiance to David (10:19). In another campaign, David so overwhelmed Zobah and Damascus that they proclaimed their vassalage (8:3–8). Though Solomon (about 961–922) prospered in horse and chariot trade with Syria (I Kings 10:29), his influence there suffered reduction when Rezon seized the throne of DAMASCUS (11:23–25).

During Israel's dual monarchy, Syria ordinarily enjoyed the advantage. When Asa of Judah (913–873) felt pressured by Baasha of Israel (900–877), he bribed BEN-HADAD I of Syria (about 885–870) to betray his ally Baasha. Ben-hadad's invasion forced Baasha's withdrawal from Judah and intensified Syria's control over a crucial Galilean caravan route linking Damascus with the Mediterranean (I Kings 15:18–21). Nevertheless, Ben-hadad II (about 870–842) endured Israelite resurgence under AHAB (869–850). His forces failed twice at overtaking Samaria, and Ben-hadad was captured. On condition that Syria would restore to Israel border cities previously taken and allow Israel a trading street in Damascus, Ahab released Ben-hadad (I Kings 20:1–34). But Ahab could not wrest Ramoth-gilead from Syria and died in the attempt (22:29–37). Under Hazael (about 842–806), Syrian troops wounded Israel's king Joram (849–842) in warfare (II Kings 8:28–29), seized its Transjordanian territories (10:32–33), and spared Jerusalem only because Joash (837–800) raised enormous tribute (12:17–18). Nevertheless, Jehoash (802–786) reclaimed Israelite cities from Ben-hadad III (13:24–25). Inflicting Assyrian retaliation against Syrian defiance in 732, Tiglath-pileser III (745–727) destroyed Damascus, killed its king Rezin (about 740–732), and transformed its territory into four Assyrian provinces (16:7–9).

Syria is rarely mentioned in the NT. Summarizing Jesus' Galilean activities, Matthew reports that "his fame spread throughout all Syria" (Matt. 4:24), and Luke states that Syria's churches were strengthened by Paul's missionary endeavors (Acts 15:41).

SYROPHOENICIA. The territory along the Mediterranean around Tyre and Sidon, now Lebanon, was the original Phoenicia, a part of the Roman province of Syria. It is to be distinguished from the colony in North Africa, sometimes also known as Phoenicia, which is now Libya. Jesus healed the daughter of a Syrophoenician woman near Tyre and commended the woman's persistence and faith. Mark (7:26) describes her as "Greek," or Gentile, probably because she was Greek-speaking, as one might expect in a merchant seaport, but Matthew (15:22) uses the older name Phoenicians employed in speaking of themselves, "Canaanite."

T. J. K.

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY. The attempt to present the entire body of Christian beliefs as a system of truth in which each doctrine is related to every other doctrine. The presupposition is that there is one fundamental truth—the truth of God in Jesus Christ. When that truth is put into words, it has to be broken up into many propositions. The systematic theologian seeks to show how these propositions cohere with each other and mutually imply each other as elements within the one inclusive truth.

Some systematic theologians employ a philosophical framework. The use of the basic categories of a philosophical system is employed to bring out the unified character of theological truth, as these categories are applied to the several Christian doctrines. In the nineteenth century, Hegelianism was sometimes used as the philosophical framework for a systematic theology. In the twentieth century, one of the most notable examples has been PAUL TILlich's Systematic Theology, which employs the whole German philosophical tradition. The danger in such forms of PHILOSOPHICAL THEOLOGY is that the distinctively theological element may become subordinated to the philosophical, and the latter may have the effect of distorting Christian teaching as it fits it into its own framework.

This explains why KARL BARTH rejected the idea of "systematic theology" (he had in mind especially the work of Tillich). Barth himself preferred to speak of "dogmatics," and although he sharply distinguished dogmatics from systematic theology, many writers have equated these two terms. If indeed we accept the definition of systematic theology given at the beginning of this article, then Barth's dogmatics can be considered as an example of systematic theology, for here is an attempt, unrivaled in modern times, "to present the entire body of Christian beliefs as a system of truth in which each doctrine is related to every other doctrine." Barth's carefully articulated system is held together not by a philosophical framework but by tracing all the Christian doctrines back to the fundamental datum: the Word of God. God has spoken, communicated, and revealed, and from this follow in order the triune being of God and the doctrines of creation, reconciliation, and redemption.

There are, of course, several possible starting points for systematic theology, besides the WORD OF GOD. In a secular age, it may be wiser to begin (as Tillich does) with the human condition (see CORRELATION, METHOD OF). This anthropological approach has been common since the time of SCHLEIERMACHER.

It has sometimes been objected that the idea of a systematic theology is too ambitious, and that acceptance of a system may result in a frozen dogmatism that discourages further inquiry. But the best systematic theologians have never fallen into this error. KARL RAHNER tells us that every conclusion is the springboard for fresh investigation, while Schleiermacher was explicit about the provisional character of any system of dogmatics: "Dogmatic theology is the science which systematizes the doctrine prevalent in a Christian church at a given time."

TAANACH. A royal Canaanite city overlooking the plain of Esdraelon, about five miles south of Megiddo, mentioned at least eight times in the OT. The walled city controlled several trade routes, especially one that left the Way of the Sea and cut across the valley to Tiberias and Damascus. Taanach long remained in Canaanite control even after the Hebrew conquest. Deborah's Song (Judg. 5:19) mentions it as the site of the battle between Sisera and Barak, "at Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo." The city is also mentioned in the Tell el-Amarna Letters. Solomon made it a twin fortress to MEGIDDO. T.J.K.

TABERNACLE. From the Hebrew word for "tent." The portable, earliest, and distinctive Israelite sanctuary, made at Mount Sinai. It represented the abiding presence (SHEKINAH) of Yahweh in the midst of the people and celebrated the Sinai covenant bond between Yahweh and Israel.

Theologically, the tabernacle was an architectural answer to a basic question in religious thought, "Oh, that I knew where I might find him [God], that I might come even to his seat" (Job 23:3). Israel's unique response to that was the holy tabernacle. Yahweh said to David, "In all places where I have moved with all the people of Israel, did I speak a word, . . . 'Why have you not built me a house of cedar?' " (II Sam. 7:7). In the same oracle, the promise is given to David that an offspring of his,

after the kingdom is firmly established, "shall build a house for my name" (II Sam. 7:13). Here, as in I Chronicles 17:3-14, the tabernacle is not regarded as Israel's final sanctuary but is a first step, valid for as long as Israel has no "peace" and "rest," that is, a nationhood. Then, the tabernacle is to be replaced with "a house of cedar," that is, a sanctuary with a fixed location, a TEMPLE. In history, this anticipation was realized in Solomon's Temple and its successor Temples, Zerubbabel's and Herod's. The floor plans and furnishings of each would correspond to those of the tabernacle. Metaphorically, the psalmists called the Jerusalem Temple "the tent" (Pss. 15:1; 27:5; 43:3; also Lam. 2:6, "booth").

The ALTARS to Yahweh established in sacred places by the patriarchs were forerunners of the Temple. The long biblical history of Israel's "holy place" tradition makes understandable the texts' minute concern for every small detail, including the priests' costumes (Exod. 28:1-43; 39:1-31), how the unleavened SHOWBREAD was to be made, the directions for preparing the food for consecration (Exod. 29:31-37), the incense (Exod. 30:1-10), and the holy oil (Exod. 30:22-25).

Interpretations of Exodus have implied that cultic influences from the Canaanite or Midianite "high places" and temples were present in the tabernacle. It would be surprising if some borrowing of this sort took place, together with memories of Egyptian monumental shrines and temples. Israel had left Egypt less than a year before the tabernacle was constructed (Exod. 40:17). Borrowings from others are evident but in this, as in other regards, Israel had ways of supplying meanings distinctive to its own particular religion. The tabernacle, together with its successor temples, was a monument of remembrance of Israel's primary religious tradition of monotheism as established through the covenant of Sinai.

All the materials, except the gold, used to build the tabernacles—Sinai, Shiloh, and Jerusalem—were perishable. It is hardly to be expected that any of these parts, including the ark, have survived since biblical times and could be recovered. Some cultural parallels to the tabernacle have been studied. Recently (1959-73) excavations at Timnah, eighteen to twenty miles north of Elath, have discovered a Midianite-Kenite sanctuary. The Timnah find, contemporary with the tabernacle and in a desert adjacent to Sinai, is the closest evidence comparable to the tabernacle currently available.

The Tabernacle in Exodus. In the eleven tabernacle chapters of Exodus, there is reference to a structure that is easily confused with the tabernacle, neither of which were halls where audiences gathered. Both names signify a place for the dwelling or meeting of Yahweh. Both are associated with Moses and with the pillar of cloud. But the tabernacle-tent stood in the middle of the camp with its sacred enclosure, the place for priestly rituals. The other tent, which Moses called "the tent of meeting" (Exod. 33:7 ff.), was pitched "far off from the camp" and served as an oracle-place where Yahweh "used to speak to Moses face to face, as a man speaks to his friend" (Exod. 33:11). Aaron and the Levites had charge of the tabernacle. "Joshua the son of Nun, a young man," was custodian of the tent of meeting (Exod. 33:11).

More than half of the book of Exodus deals with Israel's experiences at SINAI. Of those chapters more than half, eleven, deal with the tabernacle, its construction and furnishings, and with arrangements for its priesthood. These data are presented three times over, the last, 40:1-33, Moses' actual assembling of the tabernacle parts and equipment, giving fewer details. The parallels between the first and second accounts are:

The first of the six chapters of the first account of the tabernacle in Exodus begins, "The Lord said to Moses . . ." (Exod. 25:1), comparable to "God spoke all these words, . . ." the introduction to the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20:1). To the Exodus writers, the plans for the tabernacle, down to the smallest details, are as much spoken commands of the Lord of the covenant as are the Ten Commandments. Further, the divine orders were given visually. The heavenly prototype of the tabernacle was "shown" to Moses "on the mountain" (Exod. 25:40). To the writers, the tabernacle's every detail was "holy," the "holy" bread as sacred as the "holy" ark. The tabernacle as a whole was a copy of a heavenly reality. It was to be built in strict adherence with God's specific commands and with the heavenly vision God gave to Moses.

Exodus seems to share the view of Numbers 2:3, 17, that the tents of the Israelites were arranged so as to encircle the tabernacle. Next to the tabernacle court were the tents of the Levites, the priests of the tabernacle. The tabernacle court was a sacred enclosure 150 feet by 75 feet. A wall of linen curtains separated it from the people. The court's dimensions made two squares 75 feet by 75 feet. (A sacred precinct in the Amarna Letters is called "city of God.") At the center of the tabernacle's outer square stood the altar of burnt offering or the bronze altar 7½ feet square by 4½ feet high, made of wood and overlaid with bronze. Between it and the tabernacle was a laver of bronze with a base; it held water for purification.

The tabernacle itself stood at the center of the inner square of the tabernacle enclosure and was a structure consisting of wooden, ladder-like pieces, which were joined together and stood, like walls, on three sides of the structure, 45 feet by 15 feet. Over these was placed a series of coverings ("a tent over the tabernacle," Exod. 26:7). The innermost covering was the most "heavenly," made of fine linen embroidered with blue, purple, and scarlet material and embroidered with cherubim designs. The other coverings protected the interior from the weather.

The interior of the tabernacle was divided by a curtain in two parts: an outer, rectangular room (30 feet by 15 feet), the Holy Place, and the inner room, the square Holy of Holies (15 feet by 15 feet). The Holy Place had an altar for incense, a table for holy bread, and a highly ornate lampstand made of gold. The inner sanctuary was reserved for the ARK OF THE COVENANT alone. This sacred box, which contained the tablets of the Law, was covered by a "mercy seat," a slab of pure gold 45 inches by 27 inches; cherubim figures guarded the throne of the invisible Divine Presence.

To the Exodus writers, there were zones of holiness in the wilderness camp, ranging from the least holy, the peoples' tents, through the tabernacle court with its altar, to the ark. The final word in Exodus about the tabernacle is that, after it was erected and dedicated, "the cloud," "the glory of the Lord," so filled the tabernacle that Moses was not able to enter it (40:34-35).

The Plausibility of the Exodus Tabernacle. Comments have been made that the Exodus tabernacle "never actually existed. It is the product of the priestly imaginary structure" (J. Coert Rylaarsdam). The entire description "is a mere reflection of the temple at Jerusalem" (M. Burrows). Such judgments reflect conclusions based on Wellhausen's documentary hypothesis of sources within the Pentateuch. According to this theory P (for priestly) is the last strand of Pentateuchal material to be composed, dated to a time during or after the Babylonian exile. Since the Exodus tabernacle chapters manifest a strong priestly interest, this block of material, chapters 19-40, has been assigned to the P document. On literary considerations alone, the conclusion has been reached that the Exodus tabernacle account cannot be historically factual but is to be understood as a product of priestly, devoted imagination, reflections on what was known or had been heard of Solomon's Temple.

Roland de Vaux's conclusion is representative of more recent opinion: "However amply influenced by Solomon's temple," the Exodus description of the desert sanctuary "did preserve an authentic tradition" (Ancient Israel, 1961). The shift in opinion is traceable generally to more recent, nonliterary, cultural and archaeological investigations. Admittedly, we have few evidences of sanctuaries comparable to the Exodus tabernacle in its time and geographical setting. The nearest approach to this is the desert sanctuary at Timnah. This, however, is not inconsiderable in view of its proximity in time and location and the fact that the Timnah sanctuary was constructed by Midianites and Kenites, Semites and near relatives of the Israelites. Moses' father-in-law, Jethro, was a Midianite priest (Exod. 3:1).

In the Egyptian Delta, where the Hebrews were slaves, temples and shrines and gold-covered god-boxes were carried in sacred, festal processions. In Tutankhamen's tomb a gold-covered box was found that contained some of the pharaoh's treasures. It was equipped with carrying poles that fit into sockets located beneath the base.

Given the desert environment and the fact that the Israelites were less than a year away from the land of Goshen, there is nothing essentially impossible in the Exodus description of the tabernacle. The materials needed were at hand. Acacia wood was readily available nearby, perhaps then more than now in the sizes required. The fabrics, the precious and non-precious metals, could have been obtained through trade or through offerings from the people (Exod. 32:1-3; 35:20-29; compare 12:35-36). Workmen like Bezalel and Oholiab (Exod. 31:1-6; 36:2), skilled craftsmen in many building arts, were available to do the work and to train others (Exod. 31:6). The symmetrical proportions of the tabernacle, with its rectangular rooms, all aligned on a longitudinal axis, and the most holy place at the rear of the structure, was an architectural pattern regularly observed in Egyptian temples, a style with which the Israelites could have been familiar.

The Exodus tabernacle was made for a people who involuntarily had had to become nomads. All that they possessed they had to carry from one camp to another. Question may be raised how the outer court, bronze lampstand, and the bronze laver, each of which must have weighed well over a hundred pounds, could be carried, and also about the forty wooden "frames," which were 15 feet long and 27 inches wide, and must have been awkward to carry. But, with abundant manpower available, this probably could be managed. More than 1,200 years before this, the Egyptian slaves had built the Pyramids, a much more difficult undertaking. Students of the ancient Near East have discovered traveling tents for gods or god-emblems in Assyria as well as in Egypt.

David's Jerusalem Tent. At the end of II Samuel (24:18-24), David is directed by a prophet to erect an altar on the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite. After the land was purchased, David built "the altar of burnt offering for Israel" (I Chr. 22:1) there and offered sacrifices. David designated this threshing floor as the site for the future house of the Lord. The place is widely accepted to be somewhere within the Haram es Sherif in Jerusalem, not far from the Islamic shrine, the Dome of the Rock. This means the site David chose was high ground, a short distance from the walled city of the Jebusites to the south. The "threshing floor" may have been used previously by the Jebusites as a "high place" and thus was "sacred ground" before being used as such by Israelites.

On the threshing floor, David pitched a tent for the ark (II Sam. 6:17; I Chr. 16:1), which stood isolated on the mountaintop. David's palace and other buildings were inside the walled city below. The erection of Yahweh's tabernacle or tent on this prominent spot or acropolis set Yahweh's seal upon the city and upon the kingdom of which it had become the capital. David's tent was a monument of political and religious significance, plainly evident for all who had eyes to see.

Roland de Vaux and others have remarked that perhaps it was David's tent on the "high place" of Jerusalem that was the remembered prototype of P's Exodus description of the Sinai tabernacle. That depiction features items of pure gold, gold-plated things and foundation bases of silver and gold, all of which would seem perhaps more readily available to David with his wealth than to Moses. "The wealth of the Davidic court and the important part which the tabernacle played in David's political strategy would lead us to believe that the Davidic tabernacle was richly and ornately fabricated, in which case it would agree well with the Priestly descriptions" (Frank M. Cross, "The Priestly Tabernacle," BA Reader 1, 1961).

The Tabernacle in the History of Religions. Ikhnaton (or Akh-en-ton), pharaoh of Egypt (about 1369-1353 B.C.) is popularly regarded as the world's first monotheist, perhaps more accurately, monolatrist, since what distinguished him was his enthusiastic preoccupation with the worship of Aton, the sun god. It was this concern that motivated his revolution, not a denial of the existence of other deities. There is no evidence that Moses was aware of Ikhnaton's "reformation," but it is possible that, in his Egyptian education, he could have heard something of it (Acts 7:22). What is clear from the biblical text and from Jewish tradition is that Moses was completely devoted to Yahweh alone, the one and only God. Ethical monotheism underlies biblical religion fundamentally. According to Exodus, the Sinai tabernacle was (and is) the unique, architectural monument to ethical monotheism, Moses' grand legacy to the world's religious thought and life.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF. See SUKKOT.

TABITHA. See DORCAS.

TABOO. A prohibition for magical or religious reasons. Taboos can apply to a place, person, object, or action. They arouse fear of the sacred or supernatural or fear of contamination. They can preserve a culture's separateness (see KOSHER) or express mystic identity with a TOTEM. Many, like the incest taboo, serve to maintain the structure of the society.

TABOR, MOUNT. A limestone peak rising about 1,840 feet above sea level five miles south of Nazareth. In the OT it is often associated with the prophets, and in the NT as one of the possible sites of Christ's transfiguration. Its Arabic name is Jebel el Tor. It often served as a place of refuge. The armies of Naphtali and Zebulun gathered here before fighting Sisera (Judg. 4:6). Two Midianite kings killed Gideon's brothers on Tabor. From the conelike summit of the steep slopes there are good views down on several trade routes and toward the Sea of Galilee. The mountain where the Transfiguration occurred is not named in the accounts in Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Nonetheless the emperor Constantine's mother, Helena, ordered a memorial church built atop the mountain early in the fourth century, with shrines to Jesus, Moses, and Elijah. The fact that a town existed there in Christ's time does not mark it as a likely place where he might have taken his disciples for solitude.

TADMOR. A desert town, perhaps named from the Hebrew tsamar, meaning "a palm tree." It was fortified by Solomon to control a trade route in the eastern desert. Tadmor, later known by its Greek name of Palmyra, lay east of Damascus, a distant outpost of Solomon's vast kingdom. By scribal error Tadmor east of Damascus and Tamar south of the Dead Sea were sometimes confused with "Tamar in the wilderness" described in I Kings 9:18.

TAGORE, RABINDRANATH (1861–1941). A Hindu poet and the first Asian to win the Nobel Prize in literature. Tagore did much to focus the cultural renaissance and growing national awareness of India in the first half of the twentieth century. He came from a wealthy, educated, and active family; his father, Debendranath Tagore, was prominent in the reformist Brahmo Samaj. Tagore's Hindu religion was by no means narrow and dogmatic, but expressed a universal spiritual quest for a God found everywhere, above all in the ordinary daily lives of India's millions. He was much influenced by the fervent, yearning, formless mysticism of the Bauls, wandering minstrels of Bengal. He also wrote passionately of India as a nation, yet Tagore's nationalism was more cultural and spiritual than political. Nonetheless, he renounced the knighthood Britain had given him in protest against the Amritsar massacre, and it was he who first called Mohandas K. Gandhi, spiritual leader of the independence movement, Mahatma or "Great Soul."

Besides poetry, Tagore wrote short stories, novels, dramas, and essays; he was also an accomplished artist and musician, and took an active role in improving education. It was the English translation (by himself) of Gitanjali, a collection of his Bengali mystical poems, however, that won him the Nobel Prize in 1913. This event, rightly seen by British-ruled Indians as vindication of their native culture and spirituality, brought him immense popularity. Tagore's contribution to rising nationalism is symbolized by the fact that the national anthems of both India and Bangladesh are from songs of his, yet his greatest work has a universal spirituality that has appealed to people of many lands. T'AI CHI. From the Chinese term for "Great Ultimate." In Chinese philosophy, especially Neo-Confucianism, T'ai Chi represents the cosmic unity through which the Tao or universal way expresses itself and becomes the two primordial forces, YIN and YANG, and then the phenomenal world. R.E.

TAIZÉ. An ecumenical monastic community founded in 1940 in Burgundy, France, by Rogert Schutz. Schutz had envisioned the need for a monastic order within Protestantism while preparing his dissertation at the University of Lausanne. He became the first prior in a house established in Taizé, France. His first act of service was to harbor Jewish and other refugees, but this activity was halted shortly by the Gestapo. In 1942 he returned with three newly appointed brothers and began to live the monastic life. Taking a vow of celibacy and common property, the small band grew gradually until it reached seventy in the 1970s. While the brothers wear white, hooded robes in church, they wear no distinctive garb at other times. They have been joined by Franciscan and Eastern Orthodox monks who are accepted as equals in the community. Their principal work is devoted to the promotion of Christian unity, but they also operate a large cooperative farm and dairy. Some of the brothers undertake missions to other countries, especially to Africa and Latin America. R.H.

TAJWID. The recitation of the QUR'AN. Although manuals of recitation exist that are sufficient for the average MUSLIM, tajwid can occupy a lifetime of learning. Experts study not only different styles of chanting, but also textual variants, the exact pronunciation of words and letters, and the ritual acts demanded in the performance. Performers study with a master in the art who can trace his training back through a line of master reciters to Muhammad and the archangel Gabriel. Master reciters can build up a devoted following as they perfect their chanting. Three distinct styles exist: slow and deliberate chanting for examination of the text; rapid recitation, used to acquire merit; and an intermediate speed. Some reciters use melodies; others reject them.

TALISMAN. An object believed to bring divine protection or good fortune and drive away evil influences. Usually small, fabricated of wood, stone, metal, or bone, and worn on the person or placed in the home, talismans are common in most religious traditions, especially on the popular level. R.E.

TALLIS, THOMAS (about 1505–85). English composer and organist; the "father of English cathedral music." He was organist at Waltham Abbey until its dissolution in 1540. Tallis became a gentleman of the Royal Chapel, where he remained all his life. He and William Byrd, another great composer, were jointly granted by Queen Elizabeth a twenty-one-year monopoly to print music. Most of this was vocal music set to Latin words. Tallis' "Responses" are his best-known compositions. Some of the hymn tunes he composed still appear in contemporary hymn books. His "Lamentations" and office hymns are greatly appreciated by critics. His motet, Spem in alium, was written in five parts to be sung by eight choirs. His "If Ye Love Me," composed for the English service, is still greatly loved.

TALMUD. A vast and varied work geared toward an understanding of a Jew's legal and moral responsibilities as set forth in the Bible and discussed, commented upon, and interpreted by rabbis and scholars over a period of about seven hundred years—roughly between 200 B.C. and A.D. 500. Almost every conceivable area of human interest is dealt with. Comprising more than thirty large volumes, the Talmud is a treasure-trove of ethics, religion, folklore, and jurisprudence. The Talmud ranks next to the sacred Scriptures in significance as a source for religious insight, inspiration, and practice.

In early biblical Judaism, except for the Bible, there was a ban on committing to writing anything handed down by tradition. Scholarly discussions and opinions were transmitted by word of mouth, from scholar to disciple, teacher to pupil, father to son. Because it was transmitted orally, it was called the Oral Law, while that which was written down—the Bible—was called the Written Law. When the ban against committing the discussions, opinions, and commentaries was lifted, the vast mountain of centuries of learning that had been transmitted by word of mouth was finally put into written form.

The MISHNAH, a collection of Jewish legal material, is one part of the Talmud; the GEMARA, or commentary on the Mishnah, is the other part. The Mishnah is divided into six sections, called Orders. They deal with (1) the laws of agriculture and prayers; (2) laws of the Sabbath and the festivals; (3) laws pertaining to marriage, divorce, and family relationships; (4) civil and criminal statutes and court procedures; (5) laws of sacrifice and the Temple cult; and (6) laws of ritual uncleanness.

The Gemara proceeds by way of question and answer and generally follows the method of analogy and association. A discussion may thus cover a wide range of subjects and often ends up with a completely different subject than it started with. Very seldom does the Talmud give a direct answer to a problem when there is a variety of opinions on a subject.

In the evolution of Judaism, the Talmud is the sequel to the Bible. The study of its contents has been the basis of Jewish religious life. Since the study of the Mishnah was actively pursued in two centers of learning, Palestine and Babylon, two Talmuds emerged, the Palestinian Talmud (sometimes referred to as the Jerusalem Talmud) and the Babylonian Talmud. The Babylonian Talmud has been accepted as the authoritative one.

The text of the Talmud consists of some 2.5 million words, on 5,894 folio pages. Roughly one third is halakhah and two thirds is aggadah. Halakhah embraces two areas of prescribed conduct; one relates to the rules of ritual and religion, the other pertains to the rights and obligations of people in civil society. Aggadah covers whatever is excluded from Halakhah. This includes countless norms of conduct, moral but unenforceable in courts of law, reflections on the cosmos and its Prime Mover, impressions of the character and manners of the rabbis of the Talmud, views on the economy of nature, scientific observations, passages illuminating the religious experience and social life of the Jews and their association with non-Jews, and much else. L.K.

TAMAR. (1) In Genesis 38, Tamar was a Canaanite woman who was left childless in turn by two of the sons of Judah, Er and Onan. Under the levitical laws she was also promised to a third son, Shelah, but her father-in-law never met this obligation. Frustrated, Tamar put on the clothes of a prostitute and tricked her father-in-law Judah into giving her children, the twin boys Perez and Zerah (Gen. 38:6-30). Tamar belongs to the genealogical line of the ancestors of Christ, as cited in Ruth 4:12 and Matthew 1:3.

(2) A daughter of King David; the beautiful sister of Absalom (II Sam. 13:1). Her half brother Amnon was so taken by her charms that he raped her. As she wept in shame he drove her out of the palace. Her brother Absalom got revenge by ordering the killing of Amnon.

(3) The beautiful daughter of Absalom, probably named after his sister of the same name (II Sam. 14:27). According to the Septuagint version of the OT, this Tamar married King Rehoboam and became queen. Her name also appears as Maacah (I Kings 15:2).

(4) According to Ezekiel 47:19 and 48:28, Tamar was the boundary fortress in the extreme southeast corner of Solomon's kingdom. South of the Dead Sea, it lay on the trade route to King Solomon's mines in the Arabah. About fifty miles from Jerusalem, Tamar (palm tree or oasis) had a mystical, legendary meaning for the Israelites, not unlike neighboring Kadesh, where they had spent their sojourn in the wilderness after leaving Egypt. Often Tamar served as a watering spot and as a garrison town, both for the Israelites and later for the Romans. The exact site cannot be determined, but the place was mentioned by Ptolemy. T.J.K.

TAMIL. A language of the Dravidian group spoken by about forty million people in south India and Sri Lanka. The word "Tamil" evokes a racial and cultural heritage as well as a tongue. The Tamil areas of India centering around Madras have long been a heartland of traditional HINDUISM, even though originally non-Indo-European in language and culture, and only gradually penetrated by SANSKRIT BRAHMIN, and VEDIC Hinduism, beginning in the early centuries A.D. Much correlation of indigenous and mainstream Hindu gods and institutions took place; for example, the popular Tamil deity Murukan, originally a lord of the hills and of hunters, came to be seen as a son of SHIVA.

Since entering the major Hindu current, the Tamil area has been a source of much creativity in that tradition. BHAKTI or devotionalism, with its overtones of resistance to excessivism Brahminism and caste, received a powerful early impetus from the ALVARS, seventh-to ninth-century Tamil-area poets of devotion to VISHNU, and the Nayanars, singers from about the same period of devotion to Shiva. The greatest theologian of Bhakti, RAMANUJA, was born of a Brahmin family living in the Tamil area. At the same time, the appeal of ascetic and non-dualist spirituality is shown by the early success of JAINISM and Advaita in the Tamil lands, and by the recent Advaita sage Ramana Maharshi (1879-1951).

TAMMUZ. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

TANTRISM. A set of systems for attaining enlightenment and spiritual power in HINDUISM and BUDDHISM. The term has been used broadly to embrace any path outside such "orthodox" ways as Patanjali Yoga and Vedanta, or regular Theravada and Mahayana Buddhism. However, the more common usage restricts Tantrism to a particular set, which stresses arduous initiations, rigorous gurus, considerable use of mantras and mudras, and antinomian practices (some sexual, like much Tantric symbolism) reputedly of great power. Tantric adepts are said to be persons of great wizard-like ability, but fierce and unconventional, and Tantrism has often cultivated an aura of secrecy and mystery. The word comes from tantra, literally "thread," the name of a class of Tantric texts.

Some characteristics of Hindu Tantrism are:

(1) Practice is invariably considered more important than doctrine in Tantrism. However, certain ideas that particularly uphold the practice are taught. The belief that the Absolute—BRAHMAN, or SHIVA—is all is stressed, for Tantrism brings home that this means the flesh and the passions, as well as the mind and spirit, are divine, and capable of realizing divinity in their own way. For the initiated adept the body and passions can be used as means to liberation, even though to attempt such a thing would be dangerous for the untrained.

(2) The polarity of Shiva, the Absolute, and his consort, Shakti, representing the phenomenal world, is central to much of Hindu Tantrism. In the sexual ritual, the male identifies with Shiva and his partner with Shakti, making it thus an enactment of the ecstatic union of God and the world.

(3) The role of the guru and of initiation is very important, since the great danger of Tantric practice without proper empowerment and guidance is emphasized. The only absolute for a Tantric practitioner is usually his guru's instruction, which may not always conform to conventional morality.

(4) Intense ritual activity, the use of quasi-magical mantras and mudras, and the evocation of deities with whom the adept may identify, are important. Yantras, mystical diagrams, and MANDALAS, diagrammatic arrangements of gods, are also significant in Tantrism's "spiritual technology."

(5) The use of "forbidden things," such as meat, alcohol, and illicit sex, whether actually or symbolically, is important in part of the Tantric tradition as a sort of "shock therapy" technique by which one's conventional, socially conditioned personality structure is broken down to make room for reshaping as a new person of power and oneness with the Absolute.

(6) The yogic theory and practice connected with raising the kundalini energy up the spine to open the cakras or centers of psychic power in the body are closely associated with Tantrism.

In Hinduism today, Tantric groups are small and secretive, well outside the mainstream. But Tantrism has had a considerable influence on Hindu symbolism, art, and ritual.

Buddhist Tantrism, on the other hand, in the form of VAJRAYANA, the "Diamond Vehicle," is the dominant form of Buddhism in Tibet, Mongolia, and the Himalayan area, and is represented by the influential Shingon denomination in Japan. Vajrayana and Shingon emphasize Tantric Buddhist deities, mandalas, mantras, initiations, and evocational rites, treating the sexual aspects only symbolically. Buddhist Tantrism differs from Hindu in making the feminine principle represent the Absolute, and the masculine the Buddha or bodhisattva, who demonstrates attainment of it. R.E.

TAOISM. An important tradition in Chinese philosophy and religion, Taoism is composed of several related but not identical strands: the naturalistic philosophy of LAO-TZU and CHUANG-TZU; Neo-Taoism, with its emphasis on spontaneity and its close ties to poetry and art, yogic and alchemical practices designed to produce immortality; popular religion involving the ministrations of Taoist priests; and new religious movements with overtones of social protest.

The word Taoism (Chinese: Tao-chiao, "Teaching on the Tao") comes from Tao (pronounced dow). Tao literally means "way," in the sense of a road or path, but in philosophy it has acquired a broader meaning, as the supreme Way or the Great Path down through which the universe is moving. It has been translated not only as Way, but also as Nature, as Existence, even as God, and each of these English words suggests something of its significance. If the Tao is ultimate reality, then clearly the greatest human good ought to be to live in harmony with it. The major Chinese philosophical traditions agree on this, and the term is used by both CONFUCIANISM and Taoism. But while the former emphasize that for humans the Tao is to be found in human nature and human relationships, Taoists stress the corruption and artificiality of society, telling us that the Way is best found by one who seeks it instead in nature and mystical experience.

Taoism has always looked to the non-rational, poetic, and imaginative aspects of consciousness as revelatory; over against Confucian rationalism and this-worldliness it has played a role comparable to that of Romanticism in the West. Thus, though generally tolerated except in extreme manifestations, Taoism has usually had a "non-establishment" character in China over against the Confucian-based moral, political, educational, and family systems. This "other side" quality is really what unifies the highly diverse philosophical, ritual, and sociological strands that go under the name of Taoism. They all in some way meet individual needs, or needs of classes disadvantaged by the system, not wholly fulfilled by the sober Confucian "work ethic" for personal solace and the alleviation of fear, for expression of inner feeling and fantasy, for the acquisition of spiritual power, or for protest. This quest for meeting personal needs, even if that means going "outside the system," rather than offering values that simply help one fit into society effectively, has been a dominant theme that has produced practices ranging from nature mysticism to occultisms of many sorts, although at times Taoism has also inculcated political perspectives. It should not, however, be thought that Taoism and the Confucian "system" need be mutually exclusive. Religion in China was not generally thought of as exclusive, and most traditional Chinese had some relation to all three major traditions, Taoism, Confucianism, and BUDDHISM. It was said that Chinese officials were Confucian at work and Taoist in retirement.

Major components of the Taoist tradition include the following:

The Tao te ching. This ancient Taoist classic, whose name means "The Book of the Way and Its Power," is usually dated by scholars at somewhere around 300 B.C. Its author is said to be Lao-tzu, but that name simply means "The Old Man," and despite traditional identifications the work is essentially anonymous. The Tao te ching is the earliest known source in which the concept of Tao receives its full cosmic, metaphysical meaning. Main themes of the book include (1) the Tao as the underlying, ever-changing, ever-productive unity of the universe, beyond all human words and concepts, for "the Tao that can be named is not the real Tao"; (2) feminine and maternal imagery for the Tao, for it or an expression of it is "the mother of all things," its creativity is compared to giving birth, and one adhering to it to an infant nursing at the breast; (3) comparisons are invidious, for seeming good and bad, life and death, are like the high and low notes of music, and each is to be lived as something to animate in its time, but not to cling to; (4) the Tao te ching contains attacks on rule-bound morality of the Confucian sort, preferring a wordless intuitive approach to the conduct of life; (5) the Tao is acquired by creative "unlearning," forgetting the superficial so that one can be close to the wellsprings of life; (6) the Tao is to be lived by wu wei, "not doing," which means not sheer idleness but doing that which is in accord with the way the Tao is going, and so sustained by its inexhaustible energy; (7) the political ideal of a small state composed of people who live simply, close to the earth, without reading and writing, guided by leaders so subtle they govern without being known as rulers. These themes enunciated in the Tao te ching have been important to philosophical Taoism down through the centuries.

Chuang-tzu. Second in importance only to the Tao te ching in philosophical Taoism, the book attributed to the sage Chuang is believed by many modern scholars to have been written, in its major parts, at about the same time as the book of Lao-tzu. Like the other Taoist, Chuang-tzu emphasized that the Tao is beyond words and cannot be understood conceptually. But Chuang-tzu approached his literary task with brilliant and imaginative originality. Through unforgettable images he led the reader to see that in the Tao "all things are equal," whether they seem to us large or small, good or bad, important or trivial. By means of such perceptions one can lead a life of genuine freedom, both in one's mind and in one's relations with the world.

Neo-Taoism. A modern term for what was traditionally known as Hsuan-hsueh, Dark (that is, esoteric) Learning, a revival of philosophical Taoism in roughly A.D. 220–420. Its adherents honored Confucius and were in intellectual interaction with Buddhism. Major spokesmen like Kuo Hsiang taught that the Tao, as ultimate reality, is "non-being," and what happens flows out of it with free, ever-changing, unplanned spontaneity. The person who would live with the Tao must live with the same radical freedom and flexibility. Taoism in this period developed important links to the world of artists, poets, and intellectuals, many of whom attempted to live the "free" wandering or retired life its emphasis on spontaneity inculcated.

At the same time, Taoism was acquiring links to popular and sectarian religion among the masses. As early as the second century A.D., a shamanistic figure called Chang Ling inaugurated a popular healing movement, which quickly became a state within the state in western China. The Tao te ching was a scripture of the movement, and Chang was said to have received an empowering vision of Lao-tzu. However, his cause had millenarian and magical overtones, replete with spells and recipes for immortality that went beyond philosophical Taoism. Other comparable Taoist sects stem from about the same period or later. But Chang's, known as the Teaching of Right Unity, has remained a major force in religious Taoism to the present. Chang took the title T'ien Shih, "Celestial Teacher" or "Heavenly Master," to which his descendants succeeded. Their authority was recognized by the emperor in 1016, and the hereditary court established on Dragon and Tiger Mountain in Kiangsi. There, as Taoist "pope," the Celestial Teacher regulated the priesthood under his control, blessed charms, and performed quasi-magical rites. A Celestial Teacher, claimed to be in direct line of descent from Chang Ling, holds office today in Taiwan.

Undoubtedly its anti-establishment character contributed to its service as a motif for sectarianisms. But whether for political reasons or out of conviction, rulers have from time to time come to terms with Taoism, particularly in the form of its own religious establishments. In the wake of the Right Unity and the Dark Learning movements, Taoism prospered along with Buddhism under the T'ang dynasty (A.D. 618–907). Its most fervent supporter was the emperor Hsuan Tsung (reigned 712–56), who ordered a Taoist temple in every city and a copy of the Tao te ching in every noble home. Sovereigns of the Sung dynasty (A.D. 960–1280) made a mutually beneficial covenant with the Celestial Teacher. It was during this period, aided by the Sung rulers' penchant for naming deities on a large scale, that the lavish Taoist pantheon took shape. Headed by Yu Huang, the Jade Emperor, identified with the Pole Star and cosmic sovereign, it embraces a vast heavenly bureaucracy parallel to that which administered the empire below, colonies of immortals on distant islands or in mountain recesses, and innumerable gods of special functions and localities brought into tenuous relationship with it. The Tao Tsung, or Taoist Canon, containing some 1120 volumes, was collected and published in the Sung period, in 1019.

The Taoist Priesthood. It would be misleading to say that the great mass of Chinese people are Taoist, in the sense that Spaniards are traditionally Catholic, for most Chinese have had a non-exclusive relation with the three major traditions and above all with a basic popular religion of local gods and ancestorism. But religious specialists who are definitely Taoists play an important part in popular religion. Taoist specialists fall into two categories: those who are monastics or recluses, often celibate, who practice meditation, asceticism, and perhaps yogic activities like those to be discussed below, and who relate only to those who seek them out; and Taoist priests of orders like that under the Celestial Teacher. These priests are generally married and pass their office to their children, and indeed are often not full-time clericals. They work among the people, performing religious functions such as divinations, exorcisms, funeral and memorial services for fees, or selling charms and amulets. Often SHAMANS and mediums are associated with them. Their most important rite is the chiao, a lengthy liturgy requiring many priests and enacted in a community temple on the occasion of a major festival to petition the gods on behalf of that community.

Some outside observers, following the example of Chinese Confucian scholars, have dismissed religious Taoism and its priests as superstitious and degenerate. Undoubtedly, like any religion catering to belief in the mystical and miraculous, it is open to much abuse. But it should be noted that, first, there is no small amount of elitism involved in such judgments, and, more important, that although operating on an unphilosophical level religious Taoism remains consistent with many of the fundamental principles of the tradition: belief that in alignment with the Tao and its derivative forces is all power, belief that the non-rational faculties of the mind can be in touch with important realities and that therefore divine beings and occult forces may have reality, belief in the importance of meeting personal spiritual needs. The chiao rite seeks to raise the officiants step by step, through hierarchical rank after rank of evoked gods, to the presence of the great Tao itself.

Yoga and Alchemy. The major purpose of these practices, and related ones such as marking merit by good deeds, is the attainment of personal immortality. Taoism seeks immortality not so much through the liberation of the soul from mortal flesh, as by the transformation of the body itself into a refined, incorruptible vessel. This is done by perfectly harmonizing its energies so that it can in no way be broken and there is no place for death to enter. The yin and yang forces, respectively feminine and masculine powers of the universe, and the five elements, earth, air, fire, water, and wood, must be harmonized within the microcosm of the self for it to share the immortality of the universal Tao.

Taoist alchemy was concerned with the production of elixirs of immortality, based on the right balancing of these elements. Among its important texts are the writings of the Taoist/Confucian philosopher Ko Hung (A.D. 284–343); he makes it clear that, as was the case with Western alchemy, the practice of this art involved a combination of spiritual and chemical work. The adept was to prepare with fasting and worship and to regard these operations as symbolic of inner transformation. The same principle of psycho-physiological balance applied to dietary and exercise techniques widely engaged in by Taoists. Foods and medicinal herbs were taken or abstained from in accordance with beliefs about their energies corresponding to cosmic energies. The senses, as gateways potentially letting in discordant forces, were carefully controlled.

Circulation of breath, or more precisely ch'i, the life-energy closely associated with it, was very important as an exercise for self-regeneration in hope of immortality. It involved deeply breathing in energies from the five directions and major celestial bodies. A further stage was the circulation of breath in the body. Through a combination of gymnastics, "embryonic breathing" (soft breathing like that of an infant), and holding the breath, ch'i or breath-energy was circulated through all parts of the body.

One ultimate purpose of the circulation was to unite the breath with the semen to produce a spiritual embryo, which eventually would provide a vehicle for the adept's immortal existence. Esoteric Taoism embraced other sexual techniques as well. Certain practices of sexual union allowed male and female fluids, and so energies, to be exchanged, balancing the yin and yang forces that lay behind them, preparing for immortality.

Though immensely varied, Taoism, an inseparable component of traditional Chinese culture, has as its basis the individual finding of union with the ultimate Unity.

TAPAS. From the Sanskrit word meaning literally "heat." In HINDUISM, tapas refers to practices of intense ASCETICISM and mortification, which are believed to engender spiritual power. It is particularly associated with VEDIC religion, but is among the foundations of YOGA as it later developed and even of the satyagraha taught by MOHANDAS K. GANDHI.

In Vedic and epic literature we read of sages who, by such practices as fasting, concentration, long immobility, and endurance of great heat or cold, acquired supernatural wisdom and miraculous power. The effect of tapas was essentially independent of morality; demons also practiced it to attain power to work evil. Quite often human sages and demons alike acquired power through tapas greater than that of virtually all the gods.

On a philosophical level, tapas was identified with the creative heat by which the universe was made, and with the heat of the sacrificial fire. Thus engendering it enabled the adept to find within himself the creative power and the sacrifice that communicated between humans and the gods—in a word, to find the divine within. This “interiorization of sacrifice” was an important step toward the Upanishadic realization that ATMAN, the true Self, is BRAHMAN, God.

TAPPAN, WILLIAM BINGHAM (1794–1849). Clockmaker, minister, teacher, poet, and hymn writer. Born in Beverly, Massachusetts on October 24, Tappan was apprenticed to a clockmaker. He worked at his trade after moving to Philadelphia in 1815. In 1818 he moved to Somerville, New Jersey, where he continued his education and then returned to Philadelphia and became a teacher.

He published his first poetry in 1819 in the volume entitled New England and Other Poems. His Songs of Judah appeared in 1820 and his Poems two years later. Altogether he published ten volumes of verse. Tappan became a worker with the American Sunday School Union in 1826, spending the years from 1829 to 1834 in Cincinnati. He moved to Boston in 1838 and three years later was ordained as a Congregational minister. He died of cholera in Needham, Massachusetts, on June 18.

One of his best-loved hymns was “The Ransomed Spirit to Her Home.” He also wrote “There Is an Hour of Peaceful Rest,” “’Tis Midnight,” and on Olive’s Brow,” and “Wake, Isles of the South.” This last number was first sung on a New Haven wharf to a band of missionaries who were sailing to the Sandwich Isles (Hawaii).

TARGUM. From the Hebrew and Aramaic words meaning “translation,” or “interpretation.” In Judaism, a targum is an Aramaic translation of a portion of the Hebrew scriptures. In the late centuries B.C. when Hebrew had ceased to be the vernacular language of many Jews and was replaced by Aramaic, the language of Jesus, such translations were read line by line after the Hebrew reading in synagogues. Some Targums contain extensive MIDRASH or commentary, which offer much insight into the Jewish religious world of the period, even though the major extant texts have undergone editorial work up to as late as the fifth or sixth centuries A.D. Four Targums of the Pentateuch survive, together with fragments of others, including some discovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls.

TARIQA. From the Arabic word for “path, way.” In Islam, a Tariqa is a spiritual path, especially practices associated with Sufism or Islamic mysticism pursued under the guidance of a shaykh or pir, a spiritual teacher. The term came to refer to the entire system of RITUAL and inner practice of a Sufi community and order. Typical practices include prayer, meditation, chanting, and dancing, such as the ecstatic performances of the “whirling dervishes.” The object is to reach a state of rapture in which the individual ego “fades away” into the divine. Sufi orders teaching such paths include both lay and regular members. In the twentieth century, despite opposition from both puritanical and modernizing movements within Islam, such orders count millions of followers.

TARSHISH. A term possibly derived from an old Semitic root meaning “to smelt” or “to be smelted,” hence a smelter or refinery. A far-off, at times romanticized, port not yet identified. OT references to Tarshish related to ships and ports. Jonah took a ship bound for Tarshish (Jon. 1:3; 4:2) to flee to a distant Western land (Isa. 66:19). The land was considered rich in metals such as silver (Jer. 10:9), iron, tin, and lead (Ezek. 27:12). Many have considered Tarshish as the place Herodotus described as Tartessus in Spain. The Phoenicians are known to have had colonies and refineries on Sardinia. There is, however, no datable evidence of the Phoenicians' being in either Spain or Sardinia prior to the eighth century B.C. From the etymology of the name Tarshish, W. F. Albright proposed that the term might be a common noun generally applied to any place where mining or smelting took place. He also suggested that "ships of Tarshish" may refer not to a place but, rather, to a kind of ship, as ore-bearing vessels. As such, they would be large. Isaiah was impressed with the height of their masts (2:16). Their destruction would be awe inspiring (Ps. 48:7; Isa. 2:16; 23:1, 14). The Mediterranean was the usual place where the great Phoenician fleets of Tarshish ships carried cargo from Eastern ports to far distant Western places. Tyre (Isa. 23:1, 14; Ezek. 27:25) and Sidon must have been principal naval bases.

P.L.G.

TARSUS. A city on the southern flank in the coastal region of Asia Minor, though it stands on a waterway that runs out to the Mediterranean Sea. It was thus a port city, a commercial center in NT times, and boasted a sizable population. Paul's claim to be "a citizen of no mean city" (Acts 21:39) seems amply supported. Tarsus also gathered to itself a mixed population, part Oriental, part Greco-Roman and, in Paul's day, had a metropolitan and pretentious character, with an intellectual and strong religious interest as a seat of Stoic philosophy.

TATHAGATA. From the Sanskrit and Pali words meaning "one who has gone thus" or "one who has thus come." A title frequently applied to the BUDDHA in Buddhist scriptures, and probably used by the Buddha of himself, the meaning of Tathagata is something like this: One who has gone to the other shore, to the fullness of wisdom, to unconditioned reality or Nirvana where one cannot be named because one is beyond all words and concepts. But a Buddha both goes to that state and appears out of it. In Mahayana Buddhism, Tathagata has come to mean the universal Buddha-nature or universal essence, that is, the quality that is realized in the enlightenment of a Buddha.

TATIAN (about 110–172). Fervent Christian apologist against Greek philosophy, author of the DIATESSARON, a harmony of the four Gospels. Born in Assyria, a student of Greek philosophy, Tatian converted to Christianity while in Rome, probably between 150 and 165. He studied under Justin Martyr, most famous of the early Christian apologists. The Diatessaron, used in Syriac churches until the fifth century, testifies to the four Gospels' early significance. Tatian's only extant writing, Address to the Greeks, caustically derides Greek philosophy as conceited human opinion compared to biblical revelation. He was strongly ascetic, yet upheld the Creation, the Incarnation, the Resurrection, and the Judgment. C.M.

TAULER, JOHANN (1300–61). German mystic who helped popularize mysticism during the Babylonian Captivity, and influenced Luther with his earnest Christian ways. On joining the Dominicans in 1315, Tauler worked in Strassburg, Cogné, and Basel, becoming well known for his preaching and counseling of monks and nuns. Unstinting care of the sick during the Black Death of 1348–49 increased his popularity. A disciple of MEISTER ECKHART, Tauler condemned dependence on external works and rituals, saying vital religion originates from God's inward transformation of the individual. Believing the vision of God comes as God wills, Tauler stressed love and ethical piety more than intellectual striving for unification. The truly religious abandon craving for the transitory, surrender self-will, and humbly follow the Holy Spirit's leading. Enlargement of love and strength for self-sacrifice resulting from divine inward transformation was more his goal than unitive ecstasy. Only a few of his sermons and letters remain extant. C.M.

TAX COLLECTOR. The KJV renders the Greek word telōnēs as PUBLICAN, reflecting the Latin publicanus, a title given to a person permitted to gather taxes or custom dues on Rome's behalf. The term goes back to a group of persons in the second century B.C. who were assigned government contracts, including the raising of various taxes both at Rome and later on in the provinces. In this way it came about that, with Rome's interest in Judea as an administrative province, publicani were enlisted and appear in the Gospel stories.

The system devised by the Romans was fraught with tendencies to abuse and corruption. Evidently no ceiling was imposed on the amount that could be levied, and tax collectors quickly gained a reputation for malpractice, greed, and hardheartedness. The populace responded with suspicion and hatred.

The Roman tax arrangement was to put responsibility in the hands of a head person who in turn sublet the right to other contractors. ZACCHAEUS (Luke 19:2) was evidently in charge of raising taxes through this network of underlings. They too shared the principal's unenviable reputation: hence the phrase "tax collectors and sinners" (Matt. 9:10 ff.; 11:19, 21, 31; and the counsel of John given in Luke 3:12-13; as well as Jesus' reported assessments in Matt. 5:46; 18:17).

Tax collectors, such as LEVI and Zacchaeus, were deemed to be religiously unclean from being in too close contact with Gentiles (Luke 18:9-14; 19:7). Yet Jesus befriended tax collectors as a class of people treated as outcasts (Matt. 11:19; Luke 15:1-2) and called one of them to be a member of the Twelve (Mark 2:13-17).

TAXES. Taxation was an integral part of society in the various parts of the Bible, though the purpose of tax gathering was diverse. The tabernacle and the Solomonic Temple were supported by levies on the people for the upkeep of the priests (Deut. 18:1-5); hence "tithes," a tenth portion, were extracted (Deut. 14:22-29). This levy was obviously open to abuse when the priesthood fell into unscrupulous hands (see I Sam. 2:12-17, 29).

The warnings given in I Samuel 8:11-18 relate to the actions of Israel's monarchy in imposing taxes for the king's greater glory, and this indication points to Solomon, who financed both his building schemes and his foreign campaigns by taxing the nation (I Kings 4:7-34: the glowing account puts a good face on Solomon's policies, but the truth lies rather in the outcome of protest against Solomon's economic oppression seen in I Kings 12:4, 16, 17). Levies required to stave off foreign invasion and to raise tribute paid to invaders were also a feature of Israel's history occasioned by its geographical situation on the main military routes in the Fertile Crescent (see II Kings 15:19, 20; 23:35).

Religious taxes were renewed after the Exile (Neh. 10:32-39), and the complaint of Haggai and Malachi in their preaching was that the people were becoming slack in payment (Hag. 2:8; Mal. 1:6-14). The later legacy of this tax was the imposition of a half-shekel tax required to finance the Temple services and levied on all Jews, including those living in the Dispersion (see Matt. 17:24-27 for an allusion to this).

The NT references to taxation are dominated by Rome's custom to get money from its provinces. So, in the birth stories of the Gospels, there is a census to ensure that all residents were on the roll (Luke 2:1-5). Jesus lived in a society in which payment of Roman taxes was an accepted part of the way of life. The taxes were variously levied as income tax, a sales tax, a poll tax, a land tax. Such taxes were all part of Jewish society and equally hated by loyal, patriotic Jews, especially the Zealots who resented Rome's presence in the holy land of Israel. TAX COLLECTORS, like Matthew (Matt. 9:9) and Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1-10) were common, and known to be rapacious. Jesus was faced with the patriotic issue in Mark 12:13-17, as Paul was at a later time (Rom. 13:6, 7). The issue was a delicate one: Is it right for Jews and Christians to pay taxes to Rome? Both teachers accepted in principle the right of governments to tax their subjects, but reserved the believer's higher allegiance for devotion to God in the Kingdom. Another view of Rome, with its merchantile commerce, which brought gain not least by taxation, is seen in Revelation 18:2-18, a passage reflecting Rome's role as persecutor of the church. Then in A.D. 96 when the Revelation of John was written, submission to Rome had become impossible since the empire had turned hostile.

TAYLOR, JAMES HUDSON (1832-1905). Born in Yorkshire, England, Taylor underwent a deep conversion experience at the age of seventeen, followed by a call to China—at that time a virtually closed empire. While evangelizing among the poor in London, Taylor trained to become a doctor but sailed as the first agent of the short-lived Chinese Evangelization Society. Later he returned to complete his studies and again in 1866 sailed for China with a company of skilled workers, the core of the new CHINA INLAND MISSION. Against extraordinary odds, the missionaries penetrated into the inland provinces. By 1895 the CIM had about half the Protestant force in China (over 600 missionaries). The CIM example led others to penetrate into other provinces. Taylor became a great influence in Chinese missions through his writing and speaking, his example of faith, and his unselfish promotion of interdenominational missions. W.G.

TAYLOR, JEREMY (1613-67). The Anglican bishop and devotional writer was born to Nathaniel and Mary Dean Taylor. He attended Gonville and Caius colleges, Cambridge. Sponsored by Archbishop Laud, he received a fellowship at All Soul's College, Oxford, in 1630, and received an M.A. from University College in 1635.

In The Rule and Exercise of Holy Living (1650) and The Rule and Exercise of Holy Dying (1651), he taught an ordered life of devotion, which requires self-discipline in the care of one's time, purity of intention, and practice of the presence of God. In Holy Dying he suggested that life must be a preparation for death.

With the Restoration, Taylor was made bishop of Down and Connor and vice-chancellor of Dublin University. At St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, he also became bishop of Dromore (1661), where he was buried. N.H.

TAYLOR, NATHANIEL W. (1786-1858). The architect of the New Divinity was born June 23 in New Milford, Connecticut, to Nathaniel and Anne Northrop Taylor. He was graduated from Yale in 1807, and was ordained in 1812. Taylor served as minister of First Church, New Haven, from 1811 to 1822 and then became Dwight Professor of Didactic Theology at Yale Divinity School until his death. His 1828 sermon "Concio ad Clerum" announced his revision of Jonathan Edwards' theology. He declared that people are not depraved by original sin except by their own actions: "Sin is in the sinning." Sin is "original" only in the sense of being "universal." Inevitable, it is not causally necessary. People always have "power to the contrary." N.H.

TEACHER. There is little speculative interest in knowledge for its own sake in the biblical books. What little there is may be traced to the influence of Greek moral philosophy on the wisdom writers and their schools.

WISDOM, defined as the knowledge of God and God's law with an application to everyday-life situations, is the object of both study and communication by Israel's teachers (see Job 28; Prov. 1:2-33; 2-5, and later in the book of ben Sirach, a preeminent teacher in early Judaism). Israel's sages stood in a succession of prophetic figures who instructed the people from Samuel onward. In Elisha's time we read of "schools of the prophets," which, however, were more like guilds than places of teaching and learning (II Kings 2:15; 9:1). After the Exile, with the birth of the SYNAGOGUE, teaching was set on a firm basis as part of the Sabbath and weekday liturgy. The rise of "wise men" whose work it was to interpret the law for the community gave impetus to the importance of the teacher; hence the term SCRIBE found in the Gospels, used of such professional students and teachers. Nonetheless, it must be remembered that Judaism has always given pride of place to teaching in a domestic setting, and Hebrew parents are charged to light the lamp of truth in the minds of their offspring, a duty going back to Deuteronomy 4:9-10; 6:7, 20-25; 11:19; 32:46 (see also Prov. 6:20-23).

The NT church perpetuated the teaching office, taking a cue from its Jewish roots but also from the legacy left by its head, Jesus, who is often called Teacher in the Gospel records. While Jesus was no trained scribe, he is sometimes greeted as RABBI meaning "my great one" or "teacher," an honorific title accorded to a person in Judaism (John 1:38, 49; 3:2; 6:25). Jesus as a teacher possessed charismatic authority (Mark 1:27-28), and modern opinion classifies his role in first-century Jewish life as that of a teacher-holy man-healer, of whom we have other specimens in Galilean Judaism. As such a leader, he drew the inspiration of his teaching less from the Mosaic Law (the Torah) than from his immediate apprehension of divine truth, his mission as the agent of God's rule, which he claimed to embody, and (it may be) his filial awareness of being God's Son (see Matt. 11:25-30). On that basis he taught his followers in a way that set him apart from Israel's teachers (see Matt 23:1-12). The Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5-7) epitomizes his message, along with the parables of the kingdom of God (Matt. 13; Mark 4; Luke 15: these are chapters that collect such examples of teaching methods).

In the early congregations the office of teacher was honored. Gifted people were charged to interpret the divine will for young converts and for community life (Acts 13:1, 5 [John Mark is a catechist]; I Cor. 12:28; Rom. 12:7; Jas. 3:1). Gradually the office became regularized with an exalted status given to it as part of Christ's legacy to the church (Eph. 4:11), and the apostles were regarded as authoritative teachers (II Tim. 1:11), who in turn were to instruct others (II Tim. 2:1-2). Teachers like Timothy (I Tim. 4:11-16) set a model, which in due course became taken up into the office of BISHOP, so that in the pre-Nicene church (before A.D. 325), the bishop was essentially a "prophet-teacher." R.M.

TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS. A specific title, found in the documents of the Qumran sect, the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. It refers to the leader of the community as a man of exemplary character ("righteous teacher") or, more likely, as the person raised up in the community to point the way to God's will (called righteousness) for those who had emigrated in obedience to the call of Isaiah 40:3. Attempts to identify the historical personage behind the name are all speculative, though we can describe him as a priest who in turn was the community's founder and inspiration. He was despised, persecuted, and exiled by the Jerusalem Temple hierarchy. His life is to be dated in the mid-second century B.C. R.M.

TEACHING OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. See DIDACHE.

TE DEUM LAUDAMUS. The title of a psalm-type hymn sung at matins as the last response on all feast days, and on all Sundays except in Advent and in the Lenten season. The Latin name is from the opening words, "You are God; we praise you." It is often sung as a thanksgiving hymn and is sometimes referred to as the Ambrosian hymn. It is generally thought to have been composed by Niketas of Remesiana, who died about A.D. 414. J.C.

TEFILLIN. See PHYLACTERY.

TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE (1881-1955). Jesuit priest, theologian, and paleontologist, known for his interpretation of Christianity in the perspective of cosmic evolution. Born into a family of the landed gentry of Sarcenat in the province of Auvergne, France, Teilhard entered the Jesuit novitiate in 1899. He took his first vows in 1901, at a time when the French government's anticlerical crusade was at its zenith. The Jesuit order was soon outlawed in France, and Teilhard and his classmates and teachers went to the island of Jersey. He studied philosophy in Jersey for two years, at the same time making a geological study of the island. He then taught physics and chemistry at a Jesuit school in Cairo for three years. In 1908 Teilhard moved to Hastings in Sussex, England, for his theological training. He was ordained in 1911. In 1912 he began work in paleontology at the Museum of Paris. This was an especially rich period intellectually, for he came under the influence of Bergson's Creative Evolution and the Bergsonian philosopher-scientist and Catholic modernist Edouard LeRoy. At the same time Teilhard worked with the abbé Henri Breuil, discoverer of the Cro-Magnon cave culture of the Dordogne valley. Evolution then became the crux of Teilhard's scientific and spiritual reflection.

Teilhard served as a stretcher-bearer for four years on the front during World War I, for which he earned a Croix de guerre and a médaille militaire. He returned to Paris in 1919 and received his doctorate in paleontology from the Sorbonne in 1922. During this period he taught geology at the Institut Catholique, where his evolutionary ideas were already under suspicion. In 1924, while working with E. LeRoy and teaching at the Collège de France, Teilhard privately circulated a paper on original sin, which was denounced. His superiors ordered him to resign his post, and he was sent to China where, in virtual exile, he remained for over twenty years until 1946. In China he worked on the stratigraphy and paleontology of northern China and Asia and participated in the discovery of the famous Sinanthropus skull. He published scores of scientific papers, but during these years he was forbidden to publish religious works, such as The Divine Milieu (1960) and, later, The Phenomenon of Man (1959). These and The Appearance of Man (1966), The Future of Man (1964), and Letters from a Traveller (1962) appeared posthumously. From 1946, Teilhard lived in France, South Africa, and New York City, where he died on Easter Day.

Teilhard portrays the cosmos as energy in the process of an evolutionary movement toward greater systems of complexity, involving three stages or "critical points," each marked by profound changes. The first threshold was the emergence of inorganic matter; the second, the appearance of life, the encircling of the earth's surface with a covering, or "biosphere." The third critical threshold was the appearance of mind, or the "noosphere," the movement from instinct to thought or "hominization," the emergence of humans. Evolution now can follow a conscious direction. Teilhard believes that the future will exhibit a progressive extension of this higher consciousness, or "noogenesis." The first stage of human evolution exhibited a kind of centrifugal force, making for increased individuality and personal freedom. The next stage will be centripetal and will result in greater intercommunion and socialization on a planetary scale. Teilhard envisions a new convergence of humankind toward what he calls the Omega point—or Christogenesis—the goal of the evolutionary process. At the Omega point all things reach a suprapersonal unity in God in which agape, or self-transcending love, reigns.

Critics disagree as to whether Teilhard considers the Omega point as God or the point at which all things are brought into perfect unity with God. The latter, more orthodox view, appears to be his view. In any case, the Christian perceives the Omega as given in foretaste in the person of Christ, the divine Logos incarnate. Some scientists have dismissed Teilhard's evolutionary scheme as pure speculation, beyond all scientific evidence; other scientists have been sympathetic. Teilhard's theology has similarly been both praised and reviled by Catholic theologians and ecclesiastical authorities. At the height of Teilhard's extraordinary popularity, the Holy Office issued a monitum, or simple warning, on June 30, 1962, against uncritical acceptance of his views. Today Teilhard's writings do not appear to elicit the wide interest that they enjoyed in the sixties.

TEKOA. A deserted village in the highlands of Judea ten miles south of Jerusalem. Sometimes also spelled Tekoah and Thecoe, it once held an important place in the commerce and defense of Israel. From its height of about 2,800 feet one could easily see nearby Herodium or Bethlehem, both somewhat lower, and even the hills of Jerusalem. A few springs in the area made it a good place to grow crops, so close to the edge of the desert.

It was once the home of the prophet Amos, who was later called to prophesy in the northern kingdom. The church father Eusebius writes of a cave in Tekoa in which Amos was buried, and where a monastery was located. This monastery, the New Laura, is known in church history as a center for spreading the teachings of Origen. It was also to Tekoa that Absalom fled when he was under sentence of death for killing his brother Amnon.

When Israel was under attack from Assyria, Rehoboam named Tekoa as one of the significant fortresses that should be rebuilt to withstand the invaders. Jeremiah suggested a trumpet call from the towers of Tekoa as a warning of the enemy's approach. Tekoa, because of its height and because the limestone soil made tracking difficult or impossible, was often a place of refuge. Cisterns stored water during the dry season. The houses of the village, the churches, and the monasteries did not fall into complete disuse until after the Crusader period.

TELEOLOGICAL ARGUMENT. See GOD'S EXISTENCE, ARGUMENTS FOR.

TELEOLOGY. From the Greek word telos meaning "end," and carrying a sense of finality or completion. Although the idea is traceable to Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas, the word was first used by Christian von Wolff in 1728. It includes the idea of purposive structure within an organism and the theory that ends are inherent in the nature of things. Paley's Evidences affirmed that the universe is under the dominion of a purposeful, intelligent being who is also the final cause. Such thinking arises by analogy from the observation that human beings have the capacity to plan and pursue rational goals. Teleological thinking in the twentieth century stems from inquiry into problems of structure and function. This teleological approach differs from that of Darwin, who viewed life as a process evolving by natural selection.

Teleology raises the question of the reality of evil. If all things are developing toward an end, can evil be considered a form of completion? Christian eschatology is a form of teleology affirming that life is not cyclical but is directed by God toward completion of the divine plan: the reign or kingdom of God. In John's Gospel, Jesus' statement at his death, "It is completed," signifies the fulfillment of his telos in God's purpose. The movement of biblical history is teleological because the history of Israel is viewed as God's way of working in the life of a nation toward the fulfillment of divine purposes.

TELL. A "heap" (KJV) or "mound" (RSV, except Josh. 8:28). A characteristic feature of Near Eastern topography is the appearance of numerous rounded hills, some natural and some made by people. The Arabic word "tell" has come into common use to distinguish it from the former (tel). The Hebrew Bible uses the word "tel." How much awareness the biblical writers had of the tel's nature is difficult to say. From references such as Joshua 8:28; Deuteronomy 13:16; and Jeremiah 49:2, it would appear that they had perhaps more understanding than the archaeologists did at the beginning of Palestinian investigation around 1850.

Surface surveys, such as those of Edward Robinson and Eli Smith beginning in 1838, called attention to the phenomenon of the tell. But it was not until Sir Flinders Petrie at Tell el-Hesi in 1890 demonstrated stratigraphic excavation and pottery chronology that tells attracted scientific diggers to these "mounds of buried cities." From those early beginnings and continuing until today, excavation techniques have been refined to the point that the trained archaeologist can be confident in "reading" a tell, that is of tracing its material cultural history from the surface to bedrock. In 1963 P. Lapp estimated that excavations of about 150 tells, including 26 major ones, had been made, out of about 5,000 known tells. Since 1963, about 2,000 more tells have been identified and more are to be expected.

A tell is produced when groups of people in successive periods of history, separated in time by decades or centuries, choose to build settlements on the same geographic spot, each, after the first, living on top of the remains of its predecessors. The first settlement may have been prompted by geographical position, by a spring or stream of water, by a nearby caravan route or junction of such routes, by fertile land surrounding the site, or by ease of defense against attack. As the tell "grows," the added height provides vantage points in observing the approach of enemies as well as comfort in summer heat by catching refreshing winds, an added advantage in threshing grain.

The technique of excavation on a Near East tell is the same as that used elsewhere. The difference lies in the time-span involved. Elsewhere "trash heaps" are often of one or two periods of occupation. The antiquity of the Near Eastern civilizations makes it possible that the lower levels of the tell may go back to prehistoric times, while the uppermost level may have been laid down recently.

The final objective of ARCHAEOLOGY is to describe, as far as material remains and written records permit, life as it was at the several periods of a tell's occupation. A basic concern is accuracy and completeness of record keeping. For every object uncovered, in what stratum it was found and just where within the stratum must be recorded. To this end, surveying the tell to establish elevation and grid points is a first step in setting up those kinds of records that will be used throughout the excavation. Once the workers are organized, slow and deliberate removal of earth is begun with constant care to conserve every object of significance. Of prime importance is every piece of pottery. Rarely are pieces found unbroken. But each small fragment means something to the trained pottery expert. From these pieces, their quantity and kinds, the historical time period of the stratum is established.

Archaeologists usually will not be able to uncover a whole stratum of the tell at one time. They choose what seems to be a promising spot and stick to that spot as long as the digging there proves productive, hopefully down to bedrock. Stratum levels are determined by the uncovering of pavements and floors or by destruction levels with thick layers of ash or an accumulation of airborne dirt blown in over a long period when no one lived at the place.

Once data from the excavation begin coming in and a rough indication of the occupation dates of the first level is obtained, the archaeologist begins to compare the findings with the findings of other archaeologists who have worked with comparable material. This sort of "comparative stratigraphy" goes on level by level. In this way, the tell's story fits in with and makes a contribution to our knowledge of its particular periods of human history.

Sometimes digging a tell brings to light an important or even unique item, such as an Egyptian scarab, a cuneiform tablet, an inscribed piece of pottery, or even a statue with the name of a king, and possibly, but not usually, some evidence of the name of the place. These finds make news, but of greater interest to the archaeologist is what each level of the tell can contribute to knowledge of what human life was like at its time in history. P.L.G.

TEMPLE. The idea of a temple developed from people discovering places where they met satisfactorily with a deity (for example, a "Garden of Eden"). "Do not come near; put off your shoes from your feet, for the place on which you are standing is holy ground" (Exod. 3:5). "It is well that we are here; let us make three booths" (literally tent, dwelling, habitation; and, hence, tabernacle, Holy Place and Holy of Holies, Mark 9:5; Heb. 9:1-4, 11). In Greek there is a specific word for temple; In Hebrew there is none. When reference is made to a temple, it is a "house of . . ." either a deity or person. This Semitic usage is reflected in NT Greek in "house of God" (Matt. 12:4) and "my Father's house" (John 2:16).

The location of the three Jerusalem Temples was the same, the hill to the north of Jebus. Second Chronicles 3:1 calls it Mount Moriah, thus linking it to "the land of Moriah" (Gen. 22:2), where Abraham attempted to sacrifice Isaac. Second Samuel 24:16 and following refers to the hill as "the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite" (he is called Ornan in I Chr. 21:15). There David met "the angel of the Lord," erected an ALTAR to the Lord, and purchased the threshing floor for a quantity of silver. He had previously brought the TABERNACLE and the ARK OF THE COVENANT into Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:12-19).

A threshing floor is generally a cleared, flat, large, rock surface at such an elevation that, during threshing, the winds can drive away the chaff (Pss. 1:4; 35:5; Hos. 13:3). When not used for threshing, such places were useful for public gatherings and as HIGH PLACES for community worship. Hence, it has been suggested that Araunah's threshing floor could have been "holy ground" for residents of the area from time immemorial. Holes in the rock beneath the Dome of the Rock may be understood as places for libations, or liquid sacrifices, of blood, wine, oil, or water, to honor the earth-gods of fertility.

Relation to the Tabernacle. The wilderness sacred tent, erected first in Moses' time, was the portable sanctuary for Israel from Sinai to Solomon's Temple (Exod. 25-31; 35-40). Once in Palestine, the tabernacle, with the ark, is said to have remained in SHILOH for some three hundred years, from Joshua to David. In I Samuel 1, "the house of the Lord" (v. 7) is also described as "the temple of the Lord" (v. 9), suggesting that, while preserving parts of the Mosaic tent and some of its furnishings, the Shiloh sanctuary had become a more permanent structure. Other provincial sanctuaries housed at least pieces of the tabernacle or its furnishings and existed along with Shiloh: Nob (I Sam. 21:1-6) and Kiriath-jearim (I Sam. 7:1-2). Gibeon, according to I Chronicles 21:29 and II Chronicles 1:3, 5, at some time had custody of the tabernacle and its bronze altar. The sanctuaries at Laish-Dan and at Bethel are regarded in parts of the OT as heretical.

The Temple of Solomon. Solomon's Temple, the "First" Temple, was Israel's earliest Jerusalem sanctuary. Thanks to the details in I Kings and less extensive references in II Chronicles, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, more is known of Solomon's structure than of either of the others—Zerubbabel's and Herod's, together considered the "Second Temple."

Israel did not have the skilled technicians required to erect a temple as grand as Solomon's. The Israelites had manpower, and they could be trained by the foreign workers (I Kings 5:13-16). The professional builders, as well as imported materials, came by way of an international treaty initiated by King Hiram of Tyre (986-933 B.C.), who was a friend of David (II Sam. 5:11) and a business partner of Solomon in several enterprises (I Kings 9:11-12; 9:27; 10:11-12). Archaeological findings at Palestinian sites where Phoenicians also worked (for example, Megiddo and Samaria), as well as sites in Phoenicia itself, provide valuable information for an understanding of the construction and decoration of Solomon's buildings in Jerusalem, including the Temple.

Solomon's Temple had a separate courtyard, adjacent to and connected with areas that contained the king's residence and other governmental buildings. The Temple was begun in the fourth year of Solomon's reign (about 957 B.C.) and completed and dedicated seven years and nine months later. It took thirteen years to finish the whole complex (I Kings 7:1).

The measurements of the Temple, given in cubits (I Kings 6:2-3), are interior figures. (The ordinary cubit is estimated at around 18 inches. The "royal" cubit is 1/2 meter and a little more, around 20 inches.) The entry way was 10 x 20 x 15; the Holy Place was 40 x 20 x 15; the Holy of Holies was 20 x 20 x 20, a cube. An estimate of the outside dimensions would be 102 cubits (153 ft.) long x 49 cubits (73½ ft.) wide or approximately the size of the Parthenon at Athens, not counting its outer colonnades. Like the Parthenon at Athens, the Temple of Solomon stood on the city's highest ground, readily seen from nearly every direction. (Compare the centrality of the Dome of the Rock in present-day Jerusalem.) Unlike later Jerusalem Temples, Solomon's stood surrounded by open space rather than by adjacent structures which, as in Herod's Temple, crowded in on the later Temples.

A model of the Brazen Sea

Before the House were three features symbolic of the created universe. (1) The Altar of Burnt Offering (II Chr. 3; Ezek. 43:13-17) was the place for the central ceremonial in the Temple ritual, the offering by fire of animal sacrifices. It was built in stages like a Babylonian temple-tower (ZIGURAT), with a ramp around the pyramidal sides leading to the altar with "horns" at the top (Ezek. 43:14 calls it "mountain of God"). (2) The Brazen Sea. A very large bowl holding almost ten thousand gallons of water, represented the seas of the earth as the altar represented the mountains. Under the sea were twelve larger-than-life, copper-bronze statues of bull calves, arranged in triads, each three facing a major point of the compass. Several suggestions have been made as to their significance. They were not objects of worship. (3) The Pillars: Jachin (beauty) and Boaz (strength) (I Kings 7:15-22; Ps. 96:6). Nothing parallels these in the tabernacle. Temples of the ancient Orient typically had two such columns or statues flanking the temple doorways as guardians to keep out evil influences. Jachin and Boaz had carved stone bases, shafts made to resemble solid metal. There were capitals at the top that have been thought to function as braziers, pillars of fire by day and cloud by night (Exod. 13:21). The description in I Kings 7:16-20 is nearly matched by a wall fresco in color excavated in the Solomon strata at Megiddo. The columns have been interpreted as representing celestial "props" (the Greeks called them Pillars of Hercules), which the ancient peoples thought kept the inverted bowl of the heavens from falling upon the flat earth. If so, heaven is implied by the pillars and earth by the altar and laver together to symbolize that the Lord of this Temple is the Creator God of the cosmos, a thought distinctively Israelite in character.

The walls of the Temple and of the 7½ foot raised basement were made of gleaming white limestone in huge blocks, 12 to 15 feet long and approximately 1½ feet high. Excavations show that a particular pattern of headers and stretchers was the style of Phoenician masonry in Solomon's time (I Kings 5:6, 18). Such stones could be obtained from quarries inside the solid limestone mountain upon which the Temple was erected. The stones were carefully shaped at the quarry and fitted together on the site without mortar. The "Giblite" (Byblos) carpenters were also Phoenicians (I Kings 5:18). "Neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of iron was heard in the Temple, while it was being built" (I Kings 6:7). The great double doors of the Temple were sheltered by a liwan type porch, a three-sided room. The porch was roofed. Its fourth side had an open doorway.

"The House" as used in I Kings, designates the Temple's two rooms, the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, in the same arrangement as those of the tabernacle but twice the dimensions. Around these were placed side rooms on three floors with entrances from the inside of the Holy Place. The function of these chambers is not given in the text. It is thought that they served not only as storage for priestly things but also as "safety deposit vaults" (see "the treasures of the house of the Lord"; I Kings 7:51; 14:26; 15:18; II Kings 18:15; 20:13, 15; 24:13). They had no outside doors or windows, and the walls were 5½ feet of solid masonry.

The Holy Place had tall and narrow, double, two-leaved doors to the Temple on its short side, facing east. The wood carving of the walls, to a height of 7½ feet above the floor, consisted of cherubim facing each other with a palm tree between and a border of open flowers (I Kings 6:32; Ezek. 41:18-20). The design of the cherubim was provided by the sarcophagus of Hiram of Byblos (about 1000 B.C.). The important furnishings, the table of showbread (I Sam. 21:6 KJV) and the incense altar, came from the tabernacle. There were five lampstands and seven-wicked, clay, bowl-like, oil lamps on each side of the room—the Temple's only artificial light. Inserted in the wall paneling were ten "pillars," probably pilasters made of alnum wood, thought to be East Indian sandalwood. These were 3½ feet wide and reached the 45-foot ceiling, where they terminated in volute capitals often called "proto-Ionic" or "proto-Aeolic" after later Greek designs.

The Holy of Holies was a cube room, 20 cubits on a side. Its floor was elevated 7½ feet above that of the Holy Place, its doorway being approached by a short flight of steps. The inner shrine was visually dominated by two statue cherubim, 15 feet high, each with a 15-foot wingspread. The design was Phoenician, of a heavenly creature, which was widely considered a guardian, companion, and bearer-through-the-air of deified kings and deities. Here they were covered with gold. Between them was the tabernacle Ark of the Covenant. With its "mercy seat," a gold-plated lid, the ark became the throne or "footstool" (Pss. 99:5; 132:7) for Yahweh who, at times of sacrifices and prayer, came in invisible presence to receive and respond to the people's petitions.

The Temple of Solomon was plundered in 597 B.C. by NEBUCHADNEZZAR II of Babylon. Ten years later, in August 587 B.C., the Temple, along with the city, was burned down by the same enemy (I Kings 24:13). "By the waters of Babylon, there we . . . wept, when we remembered Zion" (Ps. 137:1).

Visual reconstructions of Solomon's Temple have been produced from as early as A.D. 1720; more than thirty were produced in the nineteenth century, including a widely published model by Conrad Schick (1896). Twentieth-century archaeology has transformed the Temple's looks in more recent efforts. Two that took archaeological findings seriously are a drawing by Stevens under the direction of G. Ernest Wright (1955) and the Howland-Garber scale-model reconstruction, begun in 1945 and finished in 1950, which shows the Temple's interior as well as its exterior.

The Second or Zerubbabel's Temple. The site of Solomon's Temple had lain desolate ("jackals prowl over it," Lam. 5:18), for fifty years, when the Second Temple, often called ZERUBBABEL'S, was begun in March/April 537 B.C. It was finished in March 515 B.C. This construction was made possible by a decree of King Cyrus of Persia, quoted in Ezra 1:2-4 (see also 6:3-5; II Chr. 36:22-23). The year was 538 B.C., as it is known from the Cyrus Cylinder, a barrel-shaped, engraved stone that Hormazd Rassamin discovered at Babylon about 1880. Cyrus restored to the various exiled peoples in Babylon their "sacred things" that the Babylonians had taken away from their conquered lands. At government expense, Cyrus ordered the rebuilding of the devastated temples.

Many, though not all, of the Jews in Babylon accepted Cyrus' offer to return home. By September 538 B.C., those who had returned to Jerusalem had set up an altar on the Temple mount. The foundations of the Temple were laid the following year and, after several long interruptions the Temple was finished and dedicated, seventy-two years after the First Temple had been destroyed.

Although those younger people who had grown up in Babylon rejoiced greatly in the accomplishment, the few older people who remembered the glory of Solomon's Temple "wept with a loud voice" (Ezra 3:11-12; Hag. 2:3).

The records of Cyrus cited in Ezra 6:3 give the Temple dimensions: "its height shall be sixty cubits [90 feet] and its breadth sixty cubits [90 feet], with three courses of great stones and one course of timber." If, as one assumes, the Second Temple was similar in plan and appearance to the First, these dimensions are puzzling. They do suggest a relatively large building. Ezra 3:7 states that it was constructed with the help of Sidonians and Tyrians, as was Solomon's Temple (I Kings 5:1-18). The Second Temple stood for nearly five hundred years, compared to less than one hundred for Herod's Temple.

The Second Temple was not connected with a palace. It stood in an inner court, which was surrounded by a larger court and its side rooms.

Some of the Temple furnishings are listed in I Maccabees 1:21: golden altar, lampstand, table of bread of the Presence, cups, censers, along with the gold decoration for the front of the Temple. These must have been those treasures that Antiochus Epiphanes took away "to his own land" in 169 B.C. (I Macc. 4:49-51). For the rededication in 164 B.C. of the "purified" Temple, the Maccabees made new holy vessels to replace those never recovered from the Seleucids.

Nehemiah (2:8) refers to "the fortress of the temple," indicating that the Second Temple, like Herod's but unlike Solomon's, had a role to play in times of war. First Maccabees 6:7 states that Alexander the Great tried unsuccessfully to take Jerusalem. Simon II, the high priest in Jerusalem, repaired the house, and in his time fortified the Temple with "high double walls," "high retaining walls for the temple enclosure" (Sirach 50:1-2). So the Temple became a stronghold of the Jews against the foreign troops that occupied the Birah, a nearby tower, later known as Baris, which overlooked the Temple. In Sirach 50:5-24 there is an admirable word-picture of what it was like to share in a worship service at the Second Temple in the times of Simon II.

Little did those who wept at the dedication of Zerubbabel's Temple know that it would stand through nearly five hundred turbulent years of Israel's history. Its reputed inferiority when compared with Solomon's Temple may have been exaggerated. The compiler of II Maccabees claims that the Second Temple was the most famous and most sacred shrine in the world (2:19, 22; 3:12; 5:15; 14:31; 15:18). Haggai and Zechariah, the two prophets of the Second Temple, seem to have offered early messianic prophecies (Hag. 2:20-23; Zech. 6:9-15).

Herod's Temple. Herod began his reign in 37 B.C.; he began the Temple in about 20 B.C. He finished the Temple itself in 1½ years, but the work on elaborate, adjacent structures continued and was still being done in Jesus' time (John 2:20). The work is said not to have been entirely completed when the whole was destroyed in A.D. 70. He had already begun his miniature Rome, Caesarea Maritima, and its fortresses. In Jerusalem he had built a theater, a neighboring amphitheater, a stadium, and his own royal palace, guarded by three strong towers and a huge fortress, named Antonia, for Mark Antony. But still the Zerubbabel Temple, ancient and in looks contrasting badly with all Herod's new Greco-Roman structures of white marble and gold, dominated the skyline of the city. Josephus calls Herod's Temple "the most glorious of his actions." In rabbinic literature, it is said that "one who has not seen Herod's Temple has never seen a beautiful building." Herod's Temple was part of his ambition to bring Jerusalem up-to-date, a city to match other cities of Caesar's realm. He seems to have hoped that his gift of the Temple would make the Jews accept him.

The site was the same as that of previous Temples, the arrangement of major rooms the same, but, otherwise, the Temple was almost completely a new structure, as was required by the Hellenistic-Roman style of architecture. Colonnaded courtyards and supplementary buildings called for an enlargement of the Temple mount. The total area covered nearly all of the present-day el-Haram esh-Sharif ("the Noble Sanctuary" or "the glorious holy place") plus the adjoining fortress of Antonia. The Temple itself, like its predecessors, faced East and was built over or near today's Dome of the Rock. The whole walled area was a square, 600 feet on each side, oriented to the points of the compass. To provide this space, it was necessary to put up walls of great stones (usually 15 feet long and 3 to 4 feet high) and then fill in the area where needed. Some of these Herodian walls can be seen today, for example, the West or Wailing Wall. The southeast corner of the Haram wall with its dizzying drop-off from the top seems to be "the pinnacle of the temple" (Matt. 4:5; Luke 4:9).

The enclosure was terraced so that the Court of the Gentiles was lowest; the Women's Court five steps higher; and, at another five steps, the Court of the Priests, with the Temple towering above it on a still higher elevation. The area was walled in with a double colonnade on the inner side. The columns were 27 feet high and about 17 feet in circumference. Gates were provided: one (Golden Gate) on the east, one on the north, two on the south leading to the City of David, and four entries from the Upper City to the west, including one that led directly to Herod's palace. The largest area was the Court of the Gentiles; the smallest was the Court of the Priests. The Women's Court served as a passageway to both the Court of Israel and the Court of the Priests. It was clearly not exclusively a gallery for women. The Levitical choir sang from this court. Thirteen chests with inverted trumpets received offerings (Mark 12:41-44). The Beautiful Gate (Acts 3:2, 10) was probably in the east wall of the Women's Court. Its high doors of bronze were imported from Corinth and were called the Corinthian Gates.

The Court of the Gentiles (literally Nations) was open to all. Here were the extensive finance offices of the merchants and money changers. Because of the heavy tax, the Temple was the wealthiest of Jerusalem's institutions. Jesus and other teachers gathered people here to listen to what they had to say. Here, also, the handicapped gathered to ask for alms, and scholars debated with one another (Matt. 21:23-23:30; Mark 11:27-12:40; Luke 20:1-47).

A marble fence about 10 feet high, with a number of openings, surrounded the inner sanctuary. On the fence were carved notices in Latin and Greek warning foreigners to go no farther, for they would die (see Acts 21:28). Two of the Greek inscriptions have been found. Steps led to the courts surrounding the Temple with gates at the top. One court was for men, the Court of Israel. In the other, the Court of Priests, stood the altar for burnt offerings.

The Temple floor plan was that of the Temples of Solomon and Zerubbabel. The only difference was in the Temple porch, which Herod made 100 cubits (or about 150 feet) wide and 100 cubits (or about 150 feet) high, an arrangement that gave opportunity for much Greco-Roman decoration, as with some of the tomb façades at Petra. A restrained reconstruction appears in the Holy Land hotel scale model of Jerusalem. The Herodian Temple's height made possible an "upper room" above the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, not part of the earlier sanctuaries.

The Arch of Titus in Rome portrays some of the sacred furnishings taken from the Temple before its destruction in A.D. 70: the golden lampstand, the golden table of showbread, and two silver trumpets. The function and appearance of the whole Herodian construction was that of a stout, defensive bastion supplementing the strength of the Antonia tower. So it proved to serve in Titus' battle against Jerusalem. After all else in the city had been taken, the Romans, at the end of June, laid siege to Antonia and the Temple area. Antonia soon fell and was razed, but, until August 28, the city defenders within the Temple area held out against the might of Rome. Titus had given orders to save the Temple but, in the tumult of battle, fire entered and consumed the Temple. Legend has it that Titus himself rescued the Temple's sacred furnishings. P.L.G.

TEMPLE, WILLIAM (1881–1944). Archbishop of Canterbury (1942–44), theologian, philosopher, and noted preacher. Son of Frederick Temple, who also had been archbishop of Canterbury, the younger Temple was educated at Rugby, then at Balliol and Queen's colleges, Oxford. Ironically, he was refused ordination in 1906 by Bishop Henry Luke Paget, who felt that Temple was weak in his declaration of the Virgin Birth and Resurrection. Two years later he was ordained by Randall Thomas Davidson, with Paget's consent.

In 1910 Temple was appointed headmaster of Repton and in 1914 chosen as rector of St. James, Piccadilly. In 1919 he was made canon of Westminster. He was consecrated bishop of Manchester in 1921, archbishop of York in 1929, and archbishop of Canterbury in 1942.

From his earliest years, William Temple was interested in social, economic, and international issues. He became active in Faith and Order and the Life and Work Movements that developed into the World Council of Churches. His books included Mens Creatrix; Christus Veritas; Nature, Man and God; Readings in St. John's Gospel; and Christianity and Social Order. R.H.

TEMPLES. From the Hebrew word for "house," any location where it is believed deity or deities reside or visit, where people offer worship and petitions. Nearly every religion has "holy places," some more sacred than others. The idea of a temple is more important than place or structure. These matters are determined often by a particular theology, history, and ritual. Temples in biblical Palestine, Israelite and Canaanite, their physical arrangements, furniture, utensils, and ritual practices, resemble each other so closely that archaeologists often find it difficult to distinguish one from the other. Yet, as the biblical records clearly indicate, there were, related to these temples, two distinctly different kinds of theology and motives for worship. The contrast in ideologies was so fundamental that committed followers of Yahweh could not, or, it was thought, should not, practice both religions simultaneously. The necessary decision is illustrated by Joshua's call, "Choose this day whom you will serve" (Josh. 24:15), and by Elijah's demand, "If the Lord is God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him" (I Kings 18:21).

Here are the beginnings of the exclusivism that is characteristic of monotheism as it was later in Zoroastrianism, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Exclusivism is no issue in polytheistic religious systems. Worshipers in these are at liberty to practice as many different religious rites, rituals, and commitments as may suit their individual tastes. Temples are to be found in many different physical forms, with the form reflecting different traditions, histories, physical and material environments. To survey forms of temples in various religions is not intended here. What is attempted is an illustrative survey of characteristic non-Israelite sanctuaries in biblical Syria-Palestine as known from literary and archaeological sources. The data are selected to compare the material similarities of non-Israelite temples to those of Israel.

There were non-Israelite temples in Syria-Palestine during the times of the Gospels and Acts. These were mainly temples of Greco-Roman religions and architecture. Examples would be the temples at Samaria and Caesarea Maritima and the one at Caesarea Philippi. The surviving monuments at Nabatean Petra give an informative representation of what that architecture was like.

The Patriarchal Shrines. The devotional practices of the patriarchs accord with the simple, ancient, Semitic religious shrine practice. The progenitors of the Israelites are said to have founded worship of Yahweh at Shechem (Gen. 12:6-7; 33:18-20), Bethel (Gen. 12:8; 28:18-22; 31:13), Mamre (Hebron, Gen. 13:18), and Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:33; 26:23-25). Typical features of such installations are altars, raised stones, a sacred tree or trees, and a well or cistern of water. (Gen. 28:18-22). Bethel was a place that was made "holy" for Jacob by his dream there of "angels of God" "ascending and descending" on "a ladder," the top of which reached to heaven (v. 12) and by a theophany of Yahweh (v. 13), who gave Jacob a blessing (vv. 13-17). Here Jacob set up a "pillar" stone, which he anointed and named "God's house" (v. 22). He gave the place, previously called Luz, a new name, Beth-el, that is, "God's house" and "the gate of heaven" (v. 17). In Genesis 31:13, Yahweh is spoken of as "the God of Bethel."

Since patriarchal Bethel was on, or near, a well-used travel route, the place became for passersby a wayside shrine. Except for Jerusalem, Bethel is the city name most used in the OT. Its character as a temple site was enhanced when it became one of the two royal, border sanctuaries of the northern kingdom.

A number of the patriarchal shrines were maintained for centuries, popular with Israelites making pilgrimages. In Amos, there are references to Gilgal as a "winter house" and to Bethel as a "summer house" (3:15; 4:4), to Beer-sheba (5:5; 8:14), Samaria, and Dan (8:14).

The High Places. This expression in English Bible translations represents a single Hebrew word, bamah. By reason of the prophets' denunciation of the HIGH PLACES as locations where Israelites compromised their loyalty to Yahweh, bamah became a derogatory, technical term. It signifies a non-Israelite, traditional, open-air shrine or sanctuary. Sometimes these installations were deliberately located on high ground or hilltops which, being physically nearest heaven, Canaanites considered to be the home of the gods. Note Hosea 4:10-14, "They sacrifice on the tops of the mountains, and make offerings upon the hills, under oak, popular, and terebinth, because their shade is good" (v. 13). Also Psalm 121:1-2 (TEV) "I look to the mountains; where will my help come from? My help will come from the Lord, who made heaven and earth."

A bamah site, however, was not always on a hilltop. Archaeology has demonstrated that such sanctuaries could be located on low ground (Gezer) or by the sea (Byblos and Ugarit). A textual description of a mountaintop bamah is Mount Peor (Num. 23:28), identified as a sanctuary of the Moabites at Shittim (Num. 25:1-9). The account implies that a high place's rituals included eating, drinking wine, dancing, mass sexual intercourse, possibly suggesting sacred prostitution, male and female—all typical of imitative magic, dramatic presentations designed to urge the deity to provide fertility. The OT characterizes such worship as "harlotry." The very name Peor was long remembered as a symbol of Israel's defection from Yahweh, "the sin at Peor" (Josh. 22:17; Num. 25:18; 31:16).

The past half century of archaeology in Palestine has given information about Canaanite worship practices that has altered previous opinion. It was once thought that Canaanites worshiped only at high places. Now it is known that they erected monumental temple buildings from early times onward. These often were functioning at the same time as the high places and in the same communities.

Illustrative Non-Israelite Temples. (1) Syrian. Temples in two excavations in Syria demonstrate cultural continuity with Canaan in temple building. Ebla, about thirty miles south of Aleppo, was the capital of an empire that for about eight centuries, beginning about 2500 B.C., the age of the Egyptian pyramids, commercially dominated lands between Mesopotamia and Egypt. During Ebla's most prosperous era it had an estimated population of 260,000. As many as five hundred god-names appear in the Ebla tablets. Of the many city sanctuaries, the largest, near the the royal palace on the city's acropolis, was Temple D. This was a solidly constructed, enclosed building about 93 feet by 37 feet. Its three rooms, porch, nave, and cella, were arranged along a longitudinal axis with entrance on the south side. The innermost room was the largest (about 40 feet long). Within the rear wall, a niche was provided presumably for a god emblem. Except for the niche, the floor plan generally, even the size approximately, bears striking resemblance to the Temple of Solomon, even though Ebla's temple was erected fifteen hundred years earlier. The temple was dedicated to a god named Davar, which is the Hebrew for "word," as in "the word of Yahweh."

Ugarit was near the sea about sixty miles southwest of Ebla, at the junction of the north-south coastal highway from Egypt to Asia Minor and a trade route leading to Aleppo, Mari, and Babylon. The city flourished, and its temples were built, in the Middle Bronze Age, 2100-1500 B.C. Ugarit had twin temples situated on the highest spot in the city, visible from the harbor and the sea. These structures, identical in size and floor plan, were, except for the palace, which was located elsewhere, the largest buildings in Ugarit. Each temple consisted of two rooms, a nave, and a cella, where, in a corner, the god emblem was displayed. The entrance, flanked by pillars, was on the south side and faced an open-air courtyard, which had a large, stepped altar at its center.

The twin temples of Ugarit were dedicated to Baal and Dagon. According to the Ugaritic texts, Dagon was an associate of El, the senior god. Baal was the son of Dagon, the young fertility and warrior god. After he had defeated enemies of the gods, he demanded and received from them a high social rank and a "house" (temple) of his own.

(2) Midianite. At Timnah, about fifteen miles due north of Elath in the Arabah Valley and near the Edomite boundary, a copper mining center was excavated (1969). From the fourteenth to the twelfth century B.C., Egyptians operated the center with local Midianite and Kenite labor. Egypt abandoned the center after an earthquake but the laborers reopened it. Under the Egyptians, a temple to Hathor, "the Lady of Turquoise," had been erected. Out of the ruins, the Midianites made their own kind of sanctuary. It consisted of a low stone wall enclosing an area about 26 feet square with a single entrance on the south side. On the east wall was a row of standing stones. Inside the south wall, on either side of the entrance, were low benches for offerings. On the west rear portion of the area, there was an elevated masonry structure containing a niche for the god emblem, possibly the bronze serpent with the gilded head found by the excavators. The whole of the enclosure was covered with a cloth awning or tent of skins. The pole holes were found. Outside the structure was a small room, possibly for the priests.

This find is our best available counterpart to the Sinai tabernacle. It was built by desert-dwelling Midianites. Moses' father-in-law, Jethro, was a Midianite nomad who lived in the Sinai Desert, an area adjacent to the Arabah.

At Amman, when the site was being cleared for the present airport in the mid-1950s, a temple of about 1400 B.C. was discovered and was excavated in 1966. The temple is located in the same area as Timnah. It consists of stone walls forming a small square within a larger square. Evidence of humans' being burned as foundation deposits was found (Josh. 6:26). At the center of the open-air inner square, there was a "pillar" base made up of two flat, circular stones, one on top of the other, thought to be a base for a god-emblem such as a wooden tree trunk. Between the inner and outer squares, partitions with open doorways formed rooms that adjoined each other and were probably roofed over with tent material. This provided what has been interpreted as a covered walkway for ceremonial processions to circumambulate the inner square. The temple is far removed from any known ancient settlement and seems to have belonged to nomadic tribes. Nomadic justice and treaty formation required witnesses by or before the gods. This structure seems well arranged for such special occasions.

A temple dated about 1600 B.C., also in an isolated spot and on the slopes of Mount Ebal, some distance from Shechem, was first discovered in 1931 and excavated in 1962. The plan and function of the Mount Ebal sanctuary duplicate almost exactly those of the Amman temple, both open and part-covered sanctuaries. Covenant-making is associated also with this locale. The great temple of Shechem was dedicated to Baal-berith, Lord of the covenant (Judg. 8:33; 9:4).

(3) Egyptian. During those times when Egyptians held active control over the Esdraelon area, both at Megiddo and at Beth-shan, they built temples for worship by themselves and for the Canaanite natives. These were not the kind of temples that were built in Egypt. They were, rather, simply series of irregularly shaped rooms strung out along a natural ridge; some were open-air, others roofed. Mekal was the city-god of Beth-shan, a local form of Reshef, god of lightning, whom the Egyptians identified with their god Seth. To these gods several Beth-shan temples were dedicated. Others nearby were devoted to Ashtoreth (I Sam. 31:10), or Anat, whom the Egyptians equated with Antit. In these were found models of multistoried temples that were decorated with molded figurines of naked human beings, serpents, and doves. Another temple belonged to Dagon (I Chr. 10:10), an old Semitic deity who was popular with the Philistines (Judg. 16:23 ff.). The Philistine clients of Egypt celebrated their victory over Saul by exhibiting on the temple and city walls his head, body, and armor (I Sam. 31:10; I Chr. 10:10).

It is not likely that the Egyptian-built "foreign" temples at Beth-shan and Megiddo influenced the architecture of Canaanite temples even though the rites and ceremonies held in them may have resembled Canaanite practices.

(4) Philistine. These non-Semitic folk, who rivaled and, at times, dominated the Israelites for possession of the land of Canaan, erected in their cities temples with another kind of "foreign" architecture. If the Philistines worshiped deities of the Aegean, from which area it is supposed they came, the Bible does not mention it. According to biblical records, the Philistines in Canaan worshiped gods with Semitic names, Dagon and his consort Tanit in Gaza and Ashdod (Judg. 16:23; I Sam. 5:1-5), Ashtoreth or Asherah-Anat in Ashkelon, and Baalzebub in Ekron (II Kings 1:16).

The Philistines appear to have used their temples for festivals involving large gatherings of people (Judg. 16:27). This may suggest worship practices similar to those of the Canaanite high places—eating, drinking, and carousing (compare "their hearts were merry," Judg. 16:25).

The first unmistakably Philistine temple ever discovered was excavated in 1972 at Tell Qasile, now in the northern part of Tel Aviv. Tell Qasile may have been the port through which David received the cedars of Lebanon from Tyre for the building of his palace, and Solomon for the Jerusalem Temple. The Tell Qasile temple consists of a well-planned complex of a number of units with its entrance to the west, that is, the temple faced the Mediterranean Sea. The rooms followed a "bent axis" plan, not unknown in Mycenaean Greece. Worshipers, entering the open courtyard, had to make a right-angle turn in order to face the altar, which stood in front of the temple proper. This rectangular room, 57 feet by 45 feet, had, on stone bases, two interior columns to support the roof. It has been suggested that these columns were shaped like those at Mycenaean Knossos on Crete, that is, broad at the top, tapering to a narrow point at the base. If so, it is understandable that Samson, standing between "the two middle pillars" "upon which the house rested" could have pulled down the Philistine-built house of Dagon at Gaza (Judg. 16:27).

(5) Canaanite. It was once thought that Palestinian Canaanites did not build temples but that the high places were their only sanctuaries. The only architectural evidence that was then available seemed to be the ninth-century B.C. palace-chapel at Tell Tainat in remote northern Syria. Excavations since that time have provided abundant evidence of Canaanite temple building in Palestine. Those that have been found date from Early Bronze Age to the divided kingdom and have been found throughout the land. For example, at Megiddo, a series of three temples were built at different periods on the same location. At Hazor, in a "holy of holies" shrine, a remarkable row of standing stones was found, which were flanked by the figure of a man seated and by a beautifully carved stone figure of a crouching lion. The central standing stone had carved upon its top a pair of praying hands with a crescent moon encircling a sun disk above and between them. There was a three-roomed temple at Hazor also, in plan not unlike the Temple of Solomon.

At Lachish, in a location just outside the city gate, a series of three superimposed temples have been reported, the earliest from about 1600 to 1200 B.C. and the latest, destroyed possibly by the Israelites, about 1200 B.C. In pits near the temples, bones of sheep, goats, oxen, and gazelles—all young—were identified; many right forelegs and shoulders were included (see Lev. 7:32).

At Ai (Tell et-Tell) there was a small Early Bronze (before 2000 B.C.) temple consisting of two rooms built against the inner facing of the city wall. Two steps led to the roofed, rectangular first room (25 feet by 18 feet). Benches for offering and incense stands were found along two walls. A narrow door led into the second room, about the same size but irregular in shape. In the corner was a masonry structure thought by the excavators to be an altar.

At Nahariya, five miles north of Acre on the shore, a structure, dated about 1800 B.C., was found (1953-54). It consisted of a long, stone building with a square room at the east end. Like the Tell Qasile, the Philistine temple, this one faced the sea and had its cella at the east end. There was a vestibule at the west end, the single room. Incense burners, pottery, and a silver figurine of a female deity were found together with a number of clay figurines of doves, probably indications that the temple belonged to Asherah-Anat.

An unusual design for a Canaanite temple was used for the temple of Baal-berith at Shechem. Its floor plan was not unusual. It provided for a single, rectangular room (33 feet by 40 feet), the space divided by two rows of three columns each, with stone bases. The door was protected by a porch that incorporated a single column. On either side of the porch were entrances to stairs that led to a second floor with, possibly, a balcony on four sides and then to the flat roof. There were no windows on the ground floor but inside lighting was provided by windows on the second floor, just under the roof. Flanking the porch and just outside the porch were two standing stones. This, with its great altar in the courtyard outside, was the Shechem temple of the Lord of the covenant built about 1600 B.C. (Judg. 9:4).

The outside walls of this temple were made of exceptionally thick, solid masonry. The roof was flat and is thought to have been surrounded by a crenelated wall. All of this has led to a conclusion that this temple building, unlike any other Canaanite temple thus far known, was designed to serve the city not only as a place for worship in peacetime and/or for public gatherings (Judg. 9:27), but also as a refuge and fortress to which the population could retire for safety in case the city came under enemy attack.

Noteworthy Israelite Temples. From the excavations

(1962-74) of Tell Arad and Beer-sheba, eighteen miles apart, it has been realized that throughout the kingdom period, the southernmost border of Judah was guarded by a chain of defensive fortress settlements of which Beer-sheba and Arad are examples. Furthermore, each of these had temples with altars at central locations. The tenth-century B.C. Arad temple, built over an elevation on the summit of the mound (a bamah?), consisted of a rectangular building, 65 feet by 49 feet, with entry on the east and the "holy of holies" toward the west. The inner room was elevated by three broad steps on which were stone incense altars flanking the entrance. These were well finished; some of the final incense offerings were still on the tops. One altar had YHWH written on it in ink, a unique find in Palestinian archaeology. Around the walls of the outer room were plastered benches probably for offerings and cult vessels. Outside the temple doors were two stone slabs, probably bases for pillars, comparable to the Jachin and Boaz of the Solomonic Temple. East of the house was an altar for burnt offerings, square and built of earth and small field stones (see Exod. 20:24-25). Throughout its history, the temple was approached directly from the city gate. Ostraca with priestly Hebrew names were found in some of the side rooms. Strikingly, the Arad resembles Solomon's Temple in orientation and plan, as well as furnishings.

The temple at Beer-sheba, which may have been as fine as the one at Arad, the excavator thinks was destroyed to make room for a later residential development. The stone altar was discovered, dismantled but with all its pieces. This has been reconstructed and measures 7½ feet by 7½ feet by 4½ feet high.

At the northernmost border of Israelite territory, not far from the foothills of Mount Herman, stood Dan, which has been under excavation from 1966 and continues until now. The place was strongly fortified, with a freely flowing spring in its midst, one of the sources of the Jordan River, and with a large and well-preserved city gate. Its "temple" was a bamah, pre-Israelite and Israelite, about 60 feet square. The enclosure wall was made of dressed limestone blocks laid in "ashlar" construction, which was typical of the way Phoenician masons made walls. In its center was a small horned altar 16 inches by 16 inches by 14 inches high. Monumental steps, 26 feet wide, led from the city up to the high place.

Jereboam I established Dan and Bethel as fortress towns at Israel's north and south borders to mark off and defend them (I Kings 12:26-33; II Chr. 13:8-9). Bethel had walls 11 feet thick and other defensive features. Amaziah, its priest in Amos' day, referred to its sanctuary (not yet located) as "the king's sanctuary" and "a temple [along with that of Dan?] of the kingdom" (Amos 7:13).

Conclusion. The Canaanites and the Israelites both had temples, some open air, some architectural structures, which in outer appearances looked very much alike. What went on in these places of worship differed sharply.

The Canaanites worshiped with a gathering of peoples to eat, drink, dance, and carouse, all for the pleasure of gods who, it was thought, would respond with the increase of families, food, and flocks. The focus of Canaanite ritual, as was true also of their stories of the gods, was focused on the ways of nature, their great festival days determined by the agricultural calendar.

The Israelite worship was conducted in quarters isolated from crowds, participated in by qualified personnel, joined at crisis times by political leaders, and conducted largely in silent places, except for the outer court sacrificial ceremonials where music and spoken word might be provided. The focus of Israelite worship was the remembrance of past history, deliverance from bondage in Egypt, the covenant made at Sinai, wilderness wanderings, and the gift of their own land. Such worship bound the society more closely together as a people through thoughtful contemplation rather than by action. The festivals observed, though held at times of year similar to the festal times of the Canaanites, emphasized historical and theological meanings. Canaanite and Israelite worshippers in their sanctuaries both used the word El for God and employed outwardly similar acts of sacrifice but in different atmospheres and with different meanings.

P.L.G.

TEMPTATION. The state of being enticed, especially to do wrong. God allows people to be tempted by Satan in order that they may grow in faith and be better prepared to follow the Lord. Temptation is part of God's process of TESTING people.

God permitted Satan to afflict Job (1:6-22; 2:1-7) so that Job would decide what place God had in his life. He allowed Satan to incite David to take a census in Israel (I Chr. 21:1-4). And God allowed a "lying spirit" (I Kings 22:19-23) to entice King Ahab through his prophets.

God permitted Jesus to be led by the Holy Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted by Satan to prepare him for his ministry (Matt. 4:1-11; Mark 1:12-13; Luke 4:1-13). In the Lord's Prayer we pray, "Lead us not into temptation" (Matt. 6:13). These words echo those Jesus prayed in the Garden of Gethsemane while the disciples slept: "Watch and pray that you may not enter into temptation" (Matt. 26:41). We are assured that God is faithful and will not let anyone be tempted beyond one's strength, but will provide a way of escape, that a person may be able to bear it (I Cor. 10-13). The Lord, who has been tempted as we are, is able to help those who are tempted (Heb. 4:15; 2:18). When someone is tempted and falls, that person can have God's forgiveness (Col. 1:13), for God has conquered all the forces of evil (Col. 2:13-15).

B.J.

TEMPTATION OF JESUS. God allowed Satan to tempt Jesus to prepare him for his ministry. God tempts no one, nor can God be tempted (Jas. 1:13). But Jesus, who not only was the Son of God but also came to earth as a fully human person, could be tempted.

After Jesus was baptized by John the Baptist in the River Jordan, God arranged for him to be tempted. The Gospel writers Matthew (4:1-11), Mark (1:12-13), and Luke (4:1-13) state that Jesus was led out into the wilderness by the Holy Spirit to be tempted by Satan. For forty days Jesus fasted. Then the tempter came to him and tried to get him to: turn a stone into bread; hurl himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple; and worship him, Satan. Jesus responded with words from Scripture: We do not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God; we should not test the Lord our God; and we should worship the Lord and serve only the Lord. Jesus then was ready to begin his ministry, and to help all those who are tempted (Heb. 2:18, 4:15) because he had been through TEMPTATION himself.

TEN COMMANDMENTS. The summary of the agreement between Jehovah and the Hebrew people at Mount SINAI, known in Hebrew as the ten words or ten statements. In only slightly differing versions in Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5, the laws were first stated directly and orally by God to the people in the desert.

First God was identified as the author when he stated, "I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." Later Moses is made the go-between on Mount Sinai to receive the Decalogue in its written form. Exodus 32:15-16 makes it clear that Jehovah had shaped and inscribed the two tablets on which the commandments were written. After forty days in the presence of Jehovah, Moses descended the mountain, presumed to be Jebel Musa in the Sinai peninsula. Finding the people had deserted both him and Jehovah for a golden calf, he dashed the tablets to pieces.

Later Jehovah ordered Moses to go back up the mountain, bringing blank tablets on which Jehovah once again inscribed the "ten words." This time Moses successfully delivered them to the people. The stone tablets were then safeguarded within the Ark of the Covenant (Deut. 10:1-5). First Kings 8:9 states that the ark's sole purpose was to house these two tablets of the Law. The oldest Jewish tradition is that Jehovah engraved the commandments on the stone, and that Moses was merely the courier. On the other hand a second tradition, supported by Exodus 34:27-28, makes Moses the scribe.

Scripture itself gives no clue for how to divide or number the commandments. Generally they are thought of as falling into two parts: those that relate to one's relationship to God and those that relate to one's relationship to one's neighbor. Christ also divided them into these two groups. Traditionally the Jews generally count the statement, "I am the Lord your God" as the First Commandment. Most later practices count this statement rather as an introduction.

Since the time of Augustine, the Western church has placed three commandments in the first table and seven in the second, not counting the commandment about graven images as a separate one and splitting out the final commandment(s) on coveting as nine and ten. This is still the practice of the Roman Catholics and Lutherans. The Jews, Greek Orthodox, Anglican, and Reformed generally make the commandment about images a separate one. Except for the Jews, they place four commandments in the first table and six in the second. Since the time of the Reformation the numbering has been very confused. From a Jewish interpretation, the commandment to honor one's parents is a religious obligation one really owes to God, not merely to one's parents, and this places it logically in the first table. Thus under the Jewish system there are five commandments in each table.

Many scholars think that the original form of the commandments, in whatever language Jehovah gave them, was a strong negative followed by a verb. Such a form in English is preserved in "Don't kill," "Don't steal," "Don't covet." The first of the commandments dealt with problems the Hebrews faced in Egypt and among the Canaanite tribes in the desert: worshipping many gods other than Jehovah, worshipping those gods in the form of idols, misusing the name of God, and honoring and revering God's name in worship and obedience. Whether the commandment to honor one's parents belongs to the first table or the second will probably never be solved, but the role of the parent as one's first influence in life, almost godlike, does make it a good transition between the commandments that deal with God and those that deal with one's neighbor. The commandment against killing is primary to humanity's ability to live in community with others. Apparently Deuteronomy 19:1-10 and Numbers 35:1-15 allow for killing in time of war and for capital punishment. The commandment on adultery protects the integrity of the family, and in fact Deuteronomy 22:22-27 makes adultery a capital offense. Stealing likewise was a serious offense in a society of wandering shepherds, often away from their families, tents, and animals. Testifying falsely before a court, lying or ruining the reputation of one's neighbor, was also a serious matter, and the establishment of a court and judicial system at Kadesh about the same time as the giving of the Decalogue emphasizes the importance of legal testimony and the wrongness of perjury. The last commandment(s) had to do with coveting. As in contemporary Arabic, housse included everything that belonged to the house—wives, servants, flocks, household goods.

The spectacular theophany of Jehovah to Moses and to the people of Israel both before and after the giving of the Decalogue helped establish its importance in the COVENANT relationship. Exodus reports that the people trembled when they saw the mountain smoking and the lightning flashing, or when they heard the sound of thunder and blasts of the trumpets. They begged Moses to ask God not to speak to them in person but instead that he act as God's spokesman.

After the account of the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai in the biblical record come chapter after chapter of the detailed code of conduct, which the Ten Commandments had merely summarized. Taking up a great portion of the Pentateuch, the five books of Moses, these detailed laws about the building of the tabernacle, about sacrifices, about farming, and about dealing with one's neighbor differ from other social codes of the Near East only in degree. In general, the Ten Commandments in Exodus are only loosely connected historically with the setting of the text. Their repetition in Deuteronomy appears to be a teaching tool for the training of priests. Psalm 81 is probably a hymn extolling the giving of the commandments and the making of the covenant.

Physically, the tablets of the Law followed the people of Israel wherever they wandered. The Ark of the Covenant seems to have belonged most closely to the tribe of Ephraim, and soon became an object of reverence, even of worship, as the dwelling place of Jehovah. Even when captured by the Philistines, however, or later kept safely hidden at Kiriath-jearim because David had not yet been able to subdue Jerusalem, it was still an object of great importance. According to one Talmudic legend, the ark contained not merely the two tablets of the Law but also the fragments of the two others that Moses had smashed. When Christ makes reference to "the commandments" in the NT (for example Mark 10:19), he does so without the phrase "the ten commandments." In any case, the commandments sum up the relationships between a loving God and what God expects of loving people.

TENDAI. A Japanese word from the Chinese term T'ien T'ai meaning literally "heavenly terrace," the name of the mountain and monastery where it originated. A school of MAHAYANA BUDDHISM brought to Japan by the monk Saicho (Dengyo Daishi) early in the ninth century A.D., Tendai had immense influence on the development of Japanese Buddhism and remains an influential denomination in Japan.

Based on the LOTUS SUTRA as the supreme expression of truth, Tendai asserts that all other scriptures represent accommodations for different audiences at different stages of this ministry. It is thus able to affirm a vast number of teachings and practices as partial but valid, and a salient characteristic of Tendai has been its openness to diversity. In Japan, within it were nourished (before they became separate movements) ZEN meditation, PURE LAND devotionalism, esotericism borrowed from Shingon, and worship of bodhisattvas, such as Kannon and Jizo. Philosophically Tendai has emphasized the presence of the Absolute as the Sunyata, Emptiness, Buddhahood, in the transitory phenomenal world just as it is. It teaches "Three thousand realms in a single instant," that is, that all states of existence from the heavens of the gods to the hells, including the path of bodhisattvahood and Buddhahood, can be experienced here in this life in every moment of thought.

In Japan, Tendai is headquartered at Mount Hiei just outside of Kyoto. In the Middle Ages this great monastery exercised considerable cultural and political power. The leaders of most of the important new Buddhist movements of the Kamakura period (1185-1333), such as Nichiren, Honen and Shinran of Pure Land, and Eisai and Dogen of Zen, were trained at Mount Hiei. Several "new religions" of modern Japan have received indirect inspiration from Tendai. R.E.

TENEBRAE. The name of the special matins and lauds services of the liturgical churches celebrated on Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday. These services are so called from the Latin word tenebrae meaning "darkness." They are held as a mourning service and a reenactment of the terrible events surrounding the death of Christ, enacted by means of candles, darkness, and noise as part of the ceremony.

The first lessons read during Tenebrae are all from Jeremiah and Lamentations, and the psalms and antiphons have references to the passion of Christ. There are fifteen lighted candles, and one is put out after every psalm, while the last lighted candle is hidden behind the altar. Prayers are then said in darkness; during this period noise is made by shuffling prayer books and hand clapping, and the congregation disperses in silence. This noise symbolizes the convulsion of nature at the death of Christ on the cross. The single remaining light is the Light of the World. In Protestant churches a simpler service, also called Tenebrae, which ends in silence and darkness is often held on Good Friday and/or Holy Saturday. J.C.

TENNENT, GILBERT (1703-64). The Presbyterian revivalist was born February 5 in Ireland, the eldest son of William and Catharine Kennedy Tennent. Licensed by the Philadelphia Presbytery in May 1725, he was ordained in New Brunswick, New Jersey, in 1726. During the FIRST GREAT AWAKENING he followed George Whitefield to New England in 1740-41. His 1739 sermon "The Danger of an Unconverted Ministry" caused a 1741 schism between New Side and Old Side. Tennent served as moderator when the church reunited seventeen years later. In 1743 he accepted a call to Second Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, where he was buried. N.H.

TENNYSON, ALFRED (1809-92). English poet and hymn writer. Commonly known as Alfred, Lord Tennyson, he was the first Baron Tennyson. Born at Somersby, Lincolnshire, he was the son of an Anglican rector. He first was educated by his father, then at Louth Grammar School, and Trinity College, Cambridge. There he was part of a group known as "the Apostles." On the death of Arthur Hallam, his good friend and his sister's fiancé, Tennyson wrote Two Voices and began In Memoriam. In the year 1850, he published this completed elegy and was married to Emily Smallwood. That same year he succeeded Wordsworth as poet laureate. Tennyson wrote the Charge of the Light Brigade in 1854, and Idylls of the King in 1859. Some of his poems have become hymns, including parts of In Memoriam, "Strong Son of God," "Crossing the Bar," and "Ring Out, Wild Bells." Tennyson became a baron in 1884. He was buried by the side of Robert Browning in Westminster Abbey. R.H.

TENRI-KYO. The Japanese words for "religion of divine wisdom." One of the oldest of the "new religions" of Japan, Tenri-kyo was founded by Nakayama Miki (1798-1887). In 1838, in the course of a shamanistic healing rite, she was possessed by a deity who declared himself the "true and original God," the monotheistic God now most commonly known in Tenri-kyo as Oyagami, "God the Parent." During the remainder of her long life Nakayama practiced spiritual healing, taught dancing rituals, and penned the scriptures called Ofudesaki. All these are still basic features of the religion.

Tenri-kyo, a cheerful, optimistic faith, centers on belief that God originally created humankind to live a joyous life. God is eagerly calling us back to that primal purpose. This divine work commenced in the ministry of the founder and is expressed in Tenri-kyo's main rite, a dance enacting the Creation. In its amplest form, this ritual is performed at the religion's main temple, near Nara, Japan, around a pillar said to represent the spot where the Creation began. Tenri-shi, the headquarters city built by the main temple, draws many pilgrims and includes a university, museum, library, hospital, and extensive administrative facilities. The religion is well organized, actively missionary, and in the 1980s numbered several million adherents in Japan and abroad. R.E.

TEFILLIN. See PHYLACTERY.

TERAPHIM. A Hebrew word, plural in form but singular in meaning, translated in English as IDOLATRY (I Sam. 15:23), "image" (I Sam. 19:13, 16), and "household GODS" (Gen. 31:19, 34, 35). No one form, shape, or size of the teraphim has been identified. Rachel concealed the teraphim she stole from her father in her camel's saddle and sat upon it (or them) (Gen. 31:19, 34, 35). Michal took a human-sized teraphim, gave it goat's hair, and covered it with bed clothing to look like a sick David (I Sam. 19:13, 16). In Judges 17:5; 18:14-20; Ezekiel 21:21; and Zechariah 10:2, the teraphim is associated with the ephod in divination. Employing it for such purposes was condemned in the OT, as in Josiah's reformation (II Kings 23:24); yet clearly the teraphim appears to have been used by some Israelites from the period of the Judges to the times of Zechariah, who states, "The teraphim utter nonsense" (10:2).

TERESA OF AVILA (1515–82). Renowned Spanish Carmelite nun and mystic, reformer of the CARMELITE order, and part of the Catholic Reformation. Descended from an old Spanish family, Teresa was born in Avila, received a modest education from Augustinian nuns, and in 1535 joined the Carmelites. After passing twenty years in lukewarmness, negligence, and frequent illness, Teresa experienced a true conversion in 1555. A picture of the wounded Christ and Augustine's Confessions brought her to an ecstatic vision of Christ. She surrendered completely to God's will. Discovering that the original Carmelite rule had been strict, she resolved to establish a monastery with strict rules. Strong opposition came from townspeople, groups within the church, and officials in her own order, but she presented everyone with a reformed convent in 1562. Criticized and pressured not to do anything further, she nevertheless persevered until she founded sixteen reformed Discalced (barefoot) branches of the Carmelite order for women and fourteen for men. Saint JOHN OF THE CROSS (1542–91), who wrote Dark Night of the Soul, zealously assisted her in administration. After her conversion to perfection, Teresa spent her life in intense devotions, ascetic exercises, self-mortification, and reforming efforts. Her Spiritual Autobiography (1562) scrutinizes her life and gives directions for achieving genuine prayer. She also wrote The Way to Perfection, Foundations, and The Interior Castle, giving classic guidelines for prayer. Gregory XV in 1622 canonized Teresa as the "seraphic virgin," and in 1970 Paul VI declared her a Doctor of the Church.

TERTULLIAN (about 145–220). Born Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus, he was the "father of Latin theology," who established the West's trinitarian doctrine, wrote its earliest plea for religious liberty, realized that culture religion compromises worship of God, and defended Christianity against pagans and heretics. Tertullian's exact dates are not known, making chronology uncertain. He was born in Carthage, North Africa, received a good pagan education in literature and philosophy, and practiced law in Rome. When about fifty he accepted Christianity, returned to Carthage, and rose to presbyter. Rigidist and legalistic in his views, he rejected Catholicism's lax clergy and joined strict MONTANISM in about 207.

Tertullian's Against Praxeas explains the Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as one person in three functions, thus arguing that Christ was not less than God, and that Christ was fully human and fully divine, thus setting the West's orthodox view. Shortly after his conversion, Tertullian wrote his Apology, which defends Christians as honorable, peaceful people who contribute to society; yet in court they are not given privileges accorded to murderers. He demands equality and toleration as God-given inalienable rights.

Prescriptions against Heretics, written before Tertullian joined the Montanists, maintains that Christian authority rests on the faithful transmission of Christ through canon, creed, and clergy, and that heretics and outsiders have no right to interpret Scripture. After joining the Montanists, Tertullian held that Rome's morally lax clergy had compromised Christianity and forfeited authentic guidance. He saw more validity in the Montanists, who relied on the Spirit for guidance, than in institutionalized apostolic succession.

On Idolatry calls for a full break with the world because Scripture forbids idolatry, and participation in the world's affairs involves idolatrous customs and ceremonies, thus compromising loyalty to God. Tertullian's Testimony of the Soul maintains that the soul will tend upward to God if not frustrated by earthly matters.

Tertullian's many works also include On the Resurrection of the Flesh, On the Flesh of Christ, Scorpiae, and numerous ascetic writings: On Baptism, On Penance, On Patience, On Women's Dress, The Soldier's Crown, On Fasting, Monogamy, On Flight in Persecution, and Exhortation to Chastity.

TESTAMENT. From the Latin word testamentum, meaning an "oath" or "covenant." Generally, what is meant by the term "testament" in the names "Old Testament" and "New Testament" is conveyed by the word COVENANT. A testament, so understood, is a religious order or epoch of divine revelation. In the Christian understanding, the later testament (NT) is the fulfillment of promises made by God in the former testament (OT). The OT concept of testament (or covenant) is that of berith, the ceremony of making an agreement or treaty. Yahweh's covenant with Israel was a particular kind of berith, a suzerainty treaty, whereby vassals are bound to loyalty by a conquering monarch.

Jeremiah the later prophet, speaking near the destruction of Judah (586 B.C.), tells us God will make a new covenant (testament), written on people's hearts (Jer. 31:31). This idea is taken up by the NT writers. In Hebrews we read of a new covenant made in Jesus Christ (Heb. 7:1-22; 8:8 ff.). This new testament is primarily seen in the Eucharistic meal shared by Jesus with his disciples before his death, and celebrated every Lord's Day by the emerging Christian church. Paul, in Galatians 4:21-28, connects the original testament (covenant) of God's promises made to Abraham and the new testament made in Jesus, showing the primacy of PROMISE over the LAW given to Moses in the covenant at Sinai.

TESTEM BENEVOLENTIAE. This ENCYCLICAL by Pope Leo XIII, issued January 22, 1899, condemned Americanism, a liberal Catholic movement. It referred to the French translation of Walter Elliott's Life of Father ISAAC HECKER and declared certain doctrines to be in error without saying that either Hecker or other American theologians actually taught them.

N.H.

TESTIMONY. The offering of evidence or the bearing of WITNESS, either in a court proceeding or in the context of preaching or prophesying. The RSV translation—and most other English translations of the OT—use “testimony” for three Hebrew words that all share the radical (or three-letter root, in Hebrew), UDH, meaning “to bear witness” or “to testify.” In the NT, similarly, there are three Greek terms that are translated as “testimony.” In both testaments, “testimony” refers to prophetic witness, as in Isaiah 8:16, 20 and Matthew 8:4 (KJV). In Ruth 4:7 (KJV), “testimony” refers to evidence in a business contract. In I Corinthians 1:6 and II Timothy 1:8, it refers to witnessing to the salvation made possible through Christ. Hebrews 11:5 (KJV) uses “testimony” to refer to prophecy given by Enoch.

TESTING. God tests individuals and groups to know what is in their hearts (Deut. 8:2), to motivate them to grow as Christian people (Jas. 1:2-4), and to prepare them for Christian service (Matt. 4:1-17). God allows Satan to tempt people in order that they may grow (Matt. 4:1). But God tempts no one (Jas. 1:13).

In the OT God tests individuals: Abraham (Gen. 22:1), Hezekiah (II Chr. 32:31); nations: Israel (Exod. 15:25; Deut. 33:8); and objects: a sword (I Sam. 17:39) or a reputation (I Kings 10:1).

In the NT God tests Jesus through the TEMPTATION by Satan to prepare him for his ministry (Luke 4:1-13). The faithful can also expect to be tested (I Pet. 4:12-13). The NT also speaks of the final testing that is to come upon the whole earth (Rev. 3:10).

In both the OT and NT the concept of testing is closely linked with the promises of God. Abraham was encouraged to go through a series of tests by the promise of a land, an heir, many descendants, and a blessing to come to all nations. Testing thereby becomes an important way in which God works with people.

TETRAGRAMMATON. See YAHWEH.

TETRARCH. In Greek, the ruler of a fourth part of a land or territory. A tetrarch may once have been of lower status than an ethnarch, which was in turn lower than a king. When Herod the Great died in 4 B.C., his lands went to three sons. Of these, Herod Antipas and Philip were usually referred to as tetrarchs, and Archelaus as an ethnarch. But all these words were generally interchangeable in common use. How significant a petty ruler was, and what he was called, often depended on his territory, wealth, education, and status. In Roman histories Herod the Great is often called tetrarch and equally often king. Usually in the NT Herod the Tetrarch means Herod Antipas, as in Matthew 14:1, Luke 3:1, and other passages. But in Mark 6:14 and Matthew 14:9 the same Antipas is styled king. Luke 3:1 cites two other tetrarchs, Herod Philip, the brother of Antipas, and Lysanias.

THADDAEUS. One of the twelve disciples of the Lord, often called Judas, but not Judas Iscariot. The KJV of the Bible describes him as a brother of James, but the RSV lists him as the son of James. Luke usually calls him Judas (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13), but in Matthew 10:3 and Mark 3:18 his name appears in the usual sequence with the other disciples as Thaddaeus. In some variant readings of the older Bible manuscripts his name also appears as “Lebbaeus whose surname was Thaddaeus.” He is also sometimes confused in early Christian writing with Addai (Thaddaeus’ name in Syriac is Taddai), one of the seventy disciples who brought Christianity to the area of the Black Sea.

THEBES. One of the best-known national capitals in the ancient world. It lies on both sides of the Nile about four hundred miles south of Cairo. Throughout much of Egypt's long history, Thebes was the nation's well-fortified (Nah. 3:8) military, political, and religious center. Thebes is mentioned in the OT only in the late books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Nahum. The reason for this is that Israel's earlier dealings with Egypt and its pharaohs were with monarchs who chose capitals or alternate capitals in Egypt's delta region, far nearer to the Palestine border, which these pharaohs were eager to defend.

The city of Thebes is divided into two parts: Karnak, situated on the east bank, the city of the living, with palaces, temples, shops, offices, and residences; and Luxor, on the west bank, the city of the dead, with funeral temples and elaborate tombs for royal and wealthy persons.

The ancient name of the city was Wase or Wo'se, dating from the age of the Pyramids. The place became Egypt's capital about 2040 B.C. and was known as Nowe or Nuwe, "the city of Amun." That name appears in Hebrew as "No' Amun" or "No" (Jer. 46:25). It was the Greeks who named the city after their own Thebes in Boeotia. Luxor at that time was called Ta-ope, which sounded to the Greeks like Thebes.

Like Rome, Thebes is noted for its monumental temples and tombs. Pharaoh after pharaoh exhausted the riches of the nation in erecting, adding to, or embellishing these enduring buildings, which were intended to memorialize their builders' names as well as to be gifts to the gods, chiefly Amun. Amun's temple at Karnak was and is the centerpiece of Thebes. Its ruins cover an immense area and consist of a complex of temples in an incoherent plan. There are ten pylons, a number of processional gateways, and an avenue of sphinxes two miles long. The most imposing part is a pillared hall, dedicated to AMON-RE, king of the gods, with fourteen enormous columns 78 feet high and a clerestory to admit light and air. There are 140 other columns in the temple. Its walls are covered with reliefs and inscriptions showing and telling the victories of the pharaohs; some of them recount Seti's and Sheshonq's triumphs in Palestine as well as Ramses II defeating the Hittites at Kadesh in Syria (about 1299 B.C.). THEISM. The basic religious doctrine of Christians, Jews, and Muslims that GOD exists. This God who is, is spirit, personal and intentional, omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient, perfectly good, eternal, and the creator and preserver of the universe. Only this one God is the worthy subject of human worship and obedience. J.C.

THEOCRACY. From the Greek word theokratia meaning "the rule of God." In a theocracy the people or tribes are thought to be ruled directly by God, as in ancient Israel, in Calvin's commonwealth at Geneva, in early New England, or in some parts of Islam. The word is first used in Josephus, who contrasts it to monarchy or democracy, to describe the system of government at the time of Moses. He writes of the nomadic shepherd's need to be completely free of human interference, but yet to depend on the guidance and leadership of a divine being, to live out a fulfilled life.

God can express leadership in many ways, perhaps through leaders like Moses and Aaon, perhaps through a judge like Gideon or Deborah, perhaps even through a Nazirite like Samson. Yet it is not these individuals who are governing, but God, through human agents. Such a theocratic government was first established at Sinai. God demanded pledges of the people, and God was committed to their welfare and support. Even the annual COVENANT meal emphasized once again the importance of this theocratic relationship (Exod. 24:3-11). The basic ingredient if such a state is to succeed is the loyalty and trust of the people. God's symbolic presence in the tabernacle, between the cherubim, was the assurance of God's continued guidance and direction, as was the system of the twelve tribes, the burnt offerings, and the ark.

The medieval concepts of feudalism and of the divine right of kings adopted much of their philosophy from that of the OT theocracy, except that the intermediaries of God's authority were now dukes, barons, bishops, and kings. T.J.K.

THEODICY. See EVIL.

THEODORET (about 393-466). Able Antiochene theologian and bishop of Cyrus near Antioch, deeply involved in the fifth-century controversies over Christ's nature. Born in Antioch and educated in monastery schools, Theodoret gave away his property, became a monk around 415, and bishop about 423. Friend and ex-classmate of Nestorius, Theodoret resented Cyril of Alexandria's railroading of Nestorius and wrote against Cyril before and after the COUNCIL OF EPHEBUS (431), which condemned and deposed Nestorius in a brief session. In 433 Cyril, hoping to ease tensions, accepted a faith statement written by Theodoret, but Dioscorus, Cyril's successor, denounced Theodoret's alleged division of Christ into two sons. Theodoret's new faith statement asserted Christ's unity and condemned anyone who rejected Theotokos (Mary as the "Mother of God"), even the NESTORIANS. Dioscorus continued harassing Theodoret and influenced the "robber" Ephesian council in 449 to depose him. Summoned to the Council of Chalcedon (451), Theodoret was acquitted and restored, after condemning Nestorius. However, in the aftermath of Chalcedon, Theodoret was again condemned by the Council of Constantinople (553). Although few have survived, Theodoret wrote numerous defenses of Christianity, biblical treatises, theological tomes, and historical works. He continued Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History to 428, still extant. C.M.

THEOLOGICA GERMANICA ("German Theology"). A German mystical work from the late fourteenth century that influenced Luther and later Pietism with its subtle denigration of external works. Although of unknown authorship, the book came from near Frankfurt am Main, probably written by one or more people associated with the Friends of God, which a layman, Ruleman Merswin of Strassburg (1703-82), apparently founded. Reflecting MEISTER ECKHART and JOHANN TAULER, the work stressed inward transformation, love, and complete surrender to God's will. Scripturally oriented, the "German Theology" identified sin as inordinate self-will—claiming for oneself what truly comes from God. It emphasized spiritual pride and lawless freedom as self-will's chief fruits. Those who aim for perfection wish only to be used by God. Union with God is effected not by creaturely works, exercises, or cunning flowing from self-will but by surrender to divine will. Luther republished the book in 1516 and 1518. C.M.

THEOLOGICAL VIRTUES. In Christian tradition, especially in Roman Catholicism, there are three theological virtues: faith, hope, and love (charity).

These three virtues, identified by Paul in I Corinthians 13, were added to the four CARDINAL VIRTUES of prudence, temperance, justice, and fortitude, which were derived from Greek philosophy. Faith, hope, and love are said to be infused into the person by God. J.C.

THEOLOGY. See SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

THEOLOGY OF GLORY. The Latin expression theologiae gloriae, meaning "theology of glory," was used by Luther, Barth, and others as the opposite of theologia crucis, THEOLOGY OF THE CROSS. Whereas the latter looks only to the humiliated and suffering Christ for the knowledge of God, the theology of glory claims that there is a direct knowledge of God accessible through the exercise of reason in natural theology. The advocates of a theology of the cross deny that there is any such direct route to the knowledge of God, which lies beyond the reach of finite and sinful creatures and is given only in the divine condescension in Jesus Christ. J.M.

THEOLOGY OF THE CROSS. The Latin expression theologia crucis, meaning "theology of the cross," is associated chiefly with Luther. In opposition to the Scholastic teaching that there is a "natural" knowledge of God open to all human beings, Luther held that we know God only in the humiliation and passion of Jesus Christ. In the condescension of the Incarnation, God is veiled so as to be communicated to our creaturely spirits. In recent times Karl Barth has revived the expression theologia crucis. He called for theological obedience to the revelation in Christ, and denounced what he considered to be the arrogance of natural theology as the creature's attempt to grasp at God. (See also THEOLOGY OF GLORY.) J.M.

THEONOMY. From the Greek words theos (God) and nomos (law) meaning "the law of human reason united with its ultimate ground, or God." The term was brought into current usage by the theologian PAUL TILlich, who contrasts theonomy with autonomy and heteronomy in his writings on religion and culture.

AUTONOMY is the obedience of the individual to the law of reason, which one finds within one's own mind or conscience. Autonomy was the ideal of the ENLIGHTENMENT. HETERONOMY (from heteros or strange) is a law of reason or conscience commanded from outside. It represents an alien law, religious or secular, imposed upon the mind. The history of thought and religion reveals the continuous struggle and fluctuation between autonomous and heteronomous reason and authority. Both claim to speak in the name of what is unconditional or ultimate. However, individual autonomy often is empty and illusory, while heteronomy denies personal freedom and easily becomes totalitarian.

Theonomy is autonomous reason united with its ultimate ground or depth, that is, God. In a theonomous culture, individual reason actualizes itself in obedience to its divine ground. The late Middle Ages was a theonomous age, when religion and culture were one. Tillich insists that there is, however, no complete theonomy under the conditions of historical existence. He sees the yearning for theonomy, for the union of individual reason and its unconditional ground, as the quest for revelation or the KAIROS. J.L.

THEOPHANY. From the Greek words theos (god) and phainein (appear). A temporary showing, REVELATION, or appearance of God to people, not unrelated to epiphany. In the OT there are frequent examples of theophany, especially in the times before the Babylonian Captivity. Sometimes the Lord seems to appear bodily, in visible form, sometimes as an angel or messenger, often in a cloud or fire relating to a glorious and majestic presence. Some of the best known of these many appearances are the ones to Abraham at the oaks of Mamre (Gen. 18:1; very popular as a subject for Orthodox icon painting), to Moses in the burning bush (Exod. 3), or to the prophet Elijah in the cave at Horeb (I Kings 19:9-14).

The most frequent and awesome theophanies are those related to the Ten Commandments, the Ark of the Covenant, and the tabernacle. Usually these incidents reflect God's glory and majesty, as when God appeared at a distance to the people in smoke, fire, lightning, and the sound of trumpets. Many passages of the OT (Exod. 3:6 or 33:20) insist that no one can see God and live. Yet there is an equal amount of testimony about those who actually did see God and did survive (Gen. 32:30; Judg. 6:22-23; Deut. 4:33). Moses sometimes appears to have seen God face to face, sometimes only from the back.

In the NT, Christ became "flesh and dwelt among us, . . . we have beheld his glory, glory as of the Son of the Father," a kind of living theophany. Appearances such as those at Christ's baptism, the angel that freed Peter from prison, or the fiery tongues at Pentecost are probably not theophanies in the most normal sense. One other use of theophany is the appearance of Christ at his Second Coming. T.J.K.

THEOPHILUS. The name, meaning a "person loved by God," attached to the addressee of Luke's two-volume work (Luke 1:3; Acts 1:1). Evidently Luke saw some significance in this fact, since both his writings underline the wide embrace of the Christian message to include the Gentile world as "loved by God."

The name may well be generic and designate the world of Luke's interest. Against this is the adjective "most excellent," which rather suggests an honorific title of a man highly placed in Roman circles as enjoying rank, such as Felix and Festus, who were procurators of Judea (Acts 23:26; 24:3; 26:25).

According to this view, Luke had some well-known representative of Roman officialdom in his mind, and from Luke 1:4 it seems this man professed an initial interest in the Christian gospel by becoming an inquirer or catechumen. He was in need of further instruction (see Luke 1:4, "that you may know the truth") and possibly required to be steered away from misconceptions of Christianity that he had entertained. No certain clue to his precise identity is found. R.M.

THEOSOPHY. A religious movement fostered by the Theosophical Society founded by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and others in 1885. Emphasis is placed on finding deeper spiritual reality, mystical experience, and inner, hidden spiritual meaning. There is also an interest in occult phenomena. Theosophy is monistic, asserting a unity of mind and spirit that tends to negate the objective reality of evil. Theosophists believe in a basic eternal principle beyond human understanding. They seek to investigate unexplained powers and laws in the universe.

The American section has split several times over questions of leadership. The Indian section developed through the work of Annie Besant. Although small, the Theosophical Society has been influential in popularizing Asian religion and philosophy in the West and has stimulated a revival of Buddhism and Hinduism in Asia. I.C.

I AND II THESSALONIANS. Written by the apostle Paul, with Silvanus and Timothy, to the church in THESSALONICA shortly after its foundation. The common view is that these two letters are the earliest in the Pauline collection. Beyond doubt I Thessalonians is an authentic writing of the apostle, for while he speaks of his colleagues as active partners in the nurture of these recent converts, he also shares himself, as well as the gospel, with the Thessalonians, for they "had become very dear" to him (I Thess. 2:7-12, 17-20). The origin of II Thessalonians is less certain. It lacks the affectionate tone of I Thessalonians. Its apocalyptic passage, II Thessalonians 2:1-12, details events that will occur before the return of Jesus, whereas I Thessalonians states that no predictable signs will be given heralding the End.

Various attempts have been made to explain these and other differences: (a) II Thessalonians antedates I Thessalonians; (b) II Thessalonians is a pseudonymous letter; (c) II Thessalonians was addressed to Jewish Christians; I Thessalonians to Gentiles in the church. It may be that (a) eases some problems. Paul's letters in the NT are placed in a descending order according to their length. The letter's pseudonymity (b) is unlikely since those who have advanced this premise have provided no satisfactory motive for its composition. It is also unlikely (c) that Paul would have fostered separations in the church between Christians of Jewish and Gentile origins. Note I Thessalonians 5:27. It is probable that Paul wrote II Thessalonians soon after I Thessalonians and addressed both letters to the same persons. First Thessalonians was dispatched from Corinth during Paul's first visit to this major city and shortly after Timothy's return from Macedonia (I Thess. 3:1-12; Acts 18:5). Adopting the date usually given for Paul's first mission in Corinth, one may conclude that I Thessalonians was written within the year A.D. 50-51; II Thessalonians shortly afterward. References in both letters to the founding of the church and subsequent developments imply a somewhat longer ministry than the notice in Acts implies.

The Form of I Thessalonians.

- A. Greeting, 1:1
- B. Thanksgiving for the Thessalonians' endurance and progress, 1:2-10
- C. Opposition: insidious aspersions concerning Paul's motives and conduct; the apostle's defense, 2:11-16
- D. Post-campaign events recalled, 2:17-3:10
- E. A prayer for the church, 3:11-13
- F. Deficiencies in the church's life and thought:
  1. Moral injunctions, 4:1; 5:12
  2. Encouragement concerning the "coming" of Christ—life today in the light of this event, 4:13-5:22
- G. Final prayer and farewell, 5:23-28

It is noteworthy that Paul is not drawn into doctrinal disputes in I Thessalonians, and that no references are made to a specific form of opposition. Therefore some of the major themes of the apostle's polemical theology are not treated: justification by faith; dying and rising with Christ; the church as the Body of Christ, etc. Paul had many reasons to commend this congregation. It had had a good beginning (I Thess. 1:9-12; 2:13; compare II Thess. 1:3-4, 11). The church's members had stood fast in the midst of persecutions (I Thess. 3:1-8; compare II Thess. 1:3). What was needed most was encouragement, not rebuke; a deepening understanding of the gospel they had welcomed, not new instruction (I Thess. 3:12; 4:1-2, 9-10; compare II Thess. 2:5; 3:4). There were, however, some shortcomings. Paul prayed for the opportunity to "supply what was lacking" by means of a face-to-face encounter, but some matters were of such urgency that he could not wait (I Thess. 3:9-10; 4:13; compare II Thess. 2:1-12).

Paul's Eschatological Teaching in I Thessalonians.

According to Paul's response it is clear that unresolved grief, occasioned by the death of loved ones, was deeply troubling some members of the church. It was feared that those who had "fallen asleep" were precluded from salvation, that God would deny them that final blessedness to be enjoyed by those who live to experience the coming (PAROUSIA) of Christ. The apostle's teaching contains traditional and distinctively Pauline elements.

First of all, the apostle cites the common creed of the early church: "we believe that Jesus died and rose again" (I Thess. 4:14; Paul's usual statement is that Jesus was raised, I Cor. 6:14; 15:4, 12-14). The apostle then appeals to "a word of the Lord": procedural priority shall be given those who have fallen asleep, the dead in Christ shall come with him (I Thess. 4:15-17; compare I Cor. 15:51-52). Perhaps this assurance was given to Paul in a post-resurrection appearance (note Gal. 1:12; 2:2). The apostle next employs a metaphor used by Jesus to declare the unpredictability of the coming Day of the Lord—"like a thief in the night" (I Thess. 5:2, compare Matt. 24:43-44; Luke 12:39-40). This element of surprise causes Christ's own no dread, for they already belong to "the day": they are not destined for wrath but to obtain salvation through him (I Thess. 5:5-10). For Paul, the coming of the Day of the Lord was not only a future event, but a present reality; a lasting union with Christ had already been established, a union indissoluble even in death (I Thess. 5:10; compare Rom. 8:31-39). In the meantime the three theological virtues—faith, love, and hope—provide the best equipment for the warrior who is not able to know in advance when and how Christ's final victory will be shared.

The Form of II Thessalonians.

- A. Greeting, 1:1-2
- B. Thanksgiving for the progress of the church; a prayer for those being persecuted; assurances of recompense, 1:3-12
- C. Concerning the Day of the Lord, and the man of lawlessness:
  - 1. The rebellion comes first, 2:1-2
  - 2. The apocalyptic scenario, 2:3-12
- D. Paul's conviction concerning the election of his converts; prayers for them and theirs for him, 2:13-3:5
- E. A command concerning "the idle" among the brethren, 3:6-15
- F. Closing prayer; signature, 3:16-18

The Eschatological Teaching in II Thessalonians.

It is probable that the actions of the emperor Gaius (Caligula) provide the background for Paul's allusions to "the man of lawlessness." In A.D. 40, Gaius had given orders to set up a statue to him in Jerusalem's Temple. The emperor's decree was withdrawn at the last moment, but this crisis forewarned Jews and Christians of a real and lasting threat, and may have contributed to Paul's dreaded expectancy (II Thess. 2:8-10; compare Mark 13:14-23). The restraining factor, if not the critical role of Paul's mission to the Gentiles, may be a reference to Roman law and order, embodied in Gaius' successor, the emperor Claudius.

In no other letter does Paul draw so extensively upon APOCALYPTICISM. Did he come to realize the limited value of this opaque imagery for a faithful exposition of the Christians' hope, which was based upon the passion, death, and resurrection of Jesus the Christ? J.L.P.

THESSALONICA. When the apostle Paul established a church in this principal city of Macedonia (Acts 17:1-9), it was a thriving commercial center and maritime base. The site of several ancient settlements, Thessalonica was refounded by Cassander, king of Macedonia, in 315 B.C., who named it after his wife, a stepsister of Alexander the Great. After the conquest of the Romans, Pompey made this city the headquarters for his campaigns in the East. In the power struggles among the successors of Julius Caesar, the Thessalonians sided with the victors. Octavian designated Thessalonica a "free city" and assigned its government to five or six politarches. Luke's accuracy in identifying the city's authorities by this title is corroborated by an inscription on a local arch (Acts 17:6, 8).

Paul came to Thessalonica overland via the Egnatian Way about A.D. 49. For three Sabbaths he preached in the synagogue, the result being that "some [Jews] . . . a great many of the devout Greeks [Godfearers] and not a few of the leading women" became believers (Acts 17:2-4; compare I Thess. 1:8). Paul's ministry was terminated when some of the synagogue authorities stirred up the populace and charged Paul with politically subversive activities. The charge was a serious one, since Jewish communities in several regions were at this time in a restive, militant mood. Remaining cool, the authorities arrested Jason and some others (Paul's hosts), making them go bail for Paul's good behavior. Out of consideration for his recent converts Paul left Thessalonica under cover of darkness, an action that subsequently left him open to accusations of not caring (I Thess. 2:1-12, 17-18). According to I Corinthians 16:5, Paul later revisited Macedonia (Acts 20:1-3). Two letters in the Pauline collection are addressed to the THESSALONIANS. J.L.P.

THIELICKE, HELMUT (1908 - ). German Lutheran pastor and theologian whose writings have had considerable influence within evangelical Protestantism in Europe and North America in recent decades. Thielicke was educated at Greifswald, Marburg, Erlangen, and Bonn. He served as a parish minister at Ravensburg, and as head of the Theological Office of the Württemberg Church. His theological work is closely related to the concerns of the church and preaching, and he was first introduced to the English-speaking world through his sermons.

Thielicke was removed from his university post and interned by the Nazi government during World War II. The war experience is reflected in his prolific output of sermons, essays, speeches, radio talks, articles, and books in the years following the war. Thielicke served as professor at Heidelberg (1936-40), Tübingen (1945-54), and Hamburg (1954-74), and as rector of both Tübingen (1951) and Hamburg (1960) universities. He was a popular teacher and lectured on packed halls of students. His two most important works are his Theological Ethics (4 vols.; Eng. trans. 1964–69), a three-thousand-page work, perhaps the most extensive analysis of Christian ethics in Protestantism since the Reformation, and a three-volume systematic theology, The Evangelical Faith (1968–78; Eng. trans. 1974–82). The Ethics treats foundational questions in Christian ethics, issues of politics, church and state, and sexual ethics. Many of the traditional Lutheran themes—law and gospel, the orders of creation, Luther's two kingdoms, and the discussion of Catholic natural law—are prominent in Thielicke's ethical analysis. Among his other works, available in English, are Between Heaven and Earth, Faith and Action, Nihilism, The Silence of God, and Man in God's World. J.L.

THIGH. The leg bone joining the hip to the knee, the longest bone of the human body. The numerous biblical references to thigh may literally refer to the bones of animals or a human. The phrase to put "sword on thigh" means "to fight" (Judg. 3:16; Ps. 45:3; Song of S. 3:8; Ezek. 21:4). When the Hebrew word for thigh is translated "shaft," it refers to the riser of lampstands (Exod. 25:31; 37:17). To "smite upon the thigh" refers to a gesture of shame or sorrow (mentioned only in Jer. 31:19). Thigh is also translated "side," as in north side, south side, right side, or left side (Exod. 32:27; 40:22-24). The translation "thigh" or "loins" is a substitute for penis, the male organ (Gen. 24:2, 9; 47:29). Thigh in Judges 8:30 appears in the KJV as "sons of his body (thigh)." In Exodus 1:5 (KJV), reference is made to "all the souls that came out of the loins (thigh) of Jacob." Thus, oaths taken "under" the patriarch's "thigh" may be understood as in contact with his penis, the rationale being: (1) that the oath is rendered serious by being witnessed by the superior seat of life, and (2) that the descendants of the superior are honor bound to enforce obedience to the oath and to act in vengeance if the oath is broken. The practice is mentioned only of Abraham (Gen. 24:2, 9) and of Jacob (Gen. 47:29; Exod. 1:5). P.L.G.

THIRD ROME. A theory of Moscow's divine election to protect Christianity. Philotheos (early sixteenth century) argued that Rome became heretical, Constantinople (second Rome) compromised with Rome's heresy at Florence (1439) only to fall in 1453, and Moscow became third Rome when Russia, through Ivan the Great's marriage (1472), assumed Christianity's protection. C.M.

THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. The doctrinal formulas of the Church of England, also used by Protestant Episcopal and Methodist churches. Although not a creed, they are short summaries of dogmatic tenets on a variety of issues occasioned by the theological controversies of the sixteenth century. Since 1865 clergy of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND have been required to give only general assent to them.

The Thirty-nine Articles began as Ten Articles issued in 1536, to parallel the Lutherans' Wittenberg Articles. In 1538 Thomas Cranmer and a group of colleagues agreed with a group of Lutherans on a series of Thirteen Articles based on the Augsburg Confession. In 1549 Cranmer drew up a code to be signed by clerics wishing to be licensed. From May 1552 a version of these was discussed by the bishops, who in October 1552 referred the matter to a committee of six, including John Knox.

Edward VI approved the resulting Forty-two Articles in 1553. With excisions and additions these became ELIZABETH I's Thirty-nine Articles (1571). JOHN WESLEY reduced them to twenty-four, which with one addition asserting the autonomy of the new American nation, have survived in the Methodist Discipline. The Articles are decisively Protestant, declaring a commitment to belief in original sin (IX) and justification by faith (XI). On election their approach is supralapsarian. The Article on the Lord's Supper (XXVIII) is more of a compromise than a theological consensus. N.H.

THOMAS, ACTS OF. One of a collection of writings known as the Apocryphal Acts, purporting to retell the doings of the apostles after the birth of the church, but almost certainly a product of Gnostic Christianity. The traits that characterize the Acts of Thomas as Gnostic are (1) a view of redemption that is world-denying, ascetic, and based on secret lore, and (2) a myth that recounts, in poetic idiom, the visitation of the redeemer. In the "Wedding Hymn" (chap. 6 ff.) the redeemer's relation to his people is akin to a bridal one, typical of Valentinian religion, a second-third-century system of Gnosticism. The document also contains the celebrated "Hymn of the Pearl" (chaps. 108–113), which is an extended allegory based on the tale of a prince sent to Egypt to recover a pearl. He is enticed by the luxuries of Egypt and sidetracked from his mission by falling into a stupor, until he is aroused by a message from home. Thus bestirred, he executes his mission and returns home to receive again the beautiful robe he had left there. Clearly the story is a parable of the soul's fall into the obliviousness that would lead to ruin unless it had been stirred up by the Gnostic appeal. Then it regains its high honor, being clothed with splendor on its ascent to the heavenly region. There is also the possibility that the allegory cloaks a mission of the Gnostic redeemer on his visit to earth and subsequent return to the Father of all.

The Acts of Thomas exists in two versions: Greek and Syriac. Its origin is evidently in Syria, at Edessa, and may be dated in early third century. It was highly valued at one time by orthodox Christians, but its use by the Manichaeans, a second-third-century group of ascetics, who claimed it and interpreted it in line with their teaching, meant it lost its appeal.

Its main story line is of THOMAS, who is appointed apostle to India. His exploits there are told, with stress on his miracles and his celibate life, thus praising the single state and condemning marriage and the home life of orthodox Christians. R.M.

THOMAS, APOSTLE. One of the Twelve whom Jesus called to follow and serve him (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). In the Fourth Gospel he is further identified as the Twin (John 11:16; 20:24; 21:2), with a textual and ecclesiastical variant that makes his full name Judas Thomas, otherwise known as Judas the Twin, that is, the twin brother of Jesus, being the same person as in Mark 6:3. This information is given in the apocryphal ACTS OF THOMAS, and in the Syriac versions of John 14:22.

Thomas' character can only be partially pieced together from a few references to him, mainly in the Fourth Gospel. He appears in dialogue with Jesus (John 11:16; 14:5), suggesting both a courageous zeal, "Let us also go, that we may die with him," but also a weak grasp of who Jesus was. Jesus is said to have corrected him (John 14:6-7), and the trait of skepticism is further illustrated in John 20:24-25, where, since Thomas was absent from a resurrection appearance on Easter Day, he doubted the reality of Jesus' rising again and wanted tangible proof. So the proverb "doubting Thomas" was created; but his full faith is seen in his confession, a week later (John 20:28). His return to a fisherman's trade is recorded in John 21:1-14; and he is again with the apostolic band in the upper room according to Acts 1:12-14.

Later church tradition makes much of Thomas' missionary exploits, assigning him a sphere of service in Parthia (so Eusebius), and in India (according to the Acts of Thomas), where he is revered as church founder and martyr. Documents are extant—such as the Martyrdom of St. Thomas in India—that are claimed by the present-day Mar Thoma church in southwest India as part of the wide group of Malabar Christians. Other traditions locate his missionary work and death in Edessa on the Syrian border.

THOMAS, GOSPEL OF. There is an Infancy Gospel of Thomas, extant in several languages, which tells some fabled stories of the miracle-working childhood and boyhood of Jesus as an infant prodigy. His use of miracle-power is bizarre, such as the ability to lengthen a beam of wood, his turning models of clay birds into live ones that fly off, and the striking dead a playmate in the village. All this is docetic in tone, that is, it denies the full human life of Jesus in the interests of promoting his divine powers.

By contrast, the Coptic Gospel of Thomas is a compendium of sayings, 114 in number, most beginning with "Jesus said." There is hardly any narrative to frame the sayings. The logia are of various kinds; many are gnostic in flavor, insinuating that Jesus came to enlighten the elect and to abolish death, thereby releasing the soul held in bondage. Some are parallel with the canonical Gospels' record, especially in the Synoptic Gospels and notably in the common sayings source called Q found in the OXYRHYNCHUS papyri, but the full gospel was discovered as part of the NAG HAMMADI Coptic library, which was disclosed in Egypt in 1956. The material was published in translated form in 1959, and has been commented on with great interest since then. Some have argued that this document reveals a gospel used by Syrian Christians, and others have traced a continuing influence on the development of early wisdom Christology, that is, Christ is presented as a "wise teacher," instructing believers with proverbs and sagacious sayings. THOMAS À KEMPIS. See IMITATION OF CHRIST.

THOMAS AQUINAS. See AQUINAS, THOMAS.

THOMAS CHRISTIANS. A group of Christians in Kerala, South India, who believe on the basis of a third-century document (Acts of Thomas) that their Christian community was founded by the apostle THOMAS, sent to India by Jesus. The story is accepted by many Roman Catholic authorities. Most sober historians say that the story is credible, but that it lacks actual confirmation. This community in India was governed for centuries by bishops from Syria, uses Syriac in worship, and is often referred to as a Syrian church. The first Europeans to contact the church in modern times were the Portuguese in 1599. W.G.

THOMISM. This is the name given to the teaching of THOMAS AQUINAS (1225–74) and of his many followers. Thomism is both a philosophy and a theology—a philosophy that draws its categories and procedures from ARISTOTLE and other classical writers, and a theology that expounds Christian faith with the aid of these philosophical categories. Pope Leo XIII initiated a revival of Thomistic studies in 1879, giving to this philosophy something like an official status in the Roman Catholic Church. The revival, sometimes called neo-Thomism, produced such distinguished thinkers as JACQUES MARITAIN and ETIENNE GILSON. More recently, Thomism has moved on to the new phase of “transcendental” Thomism. In this form, it has confronted the transcendental philosophy of Kant and developed a dynamic concept of the human being. Leaders of the new development of Thomism include Joseph Maréchal, KARL RAHNER, and Bernard Lonergan. J.M.

THOREAU, HENRY DAVID (1817–62). The essayist, poet, and transcendentalist was born July 2 in Concord, Massachusetts, to John and Cynthia Dunbar Thoreau. Graduating from Harvard in 1837, he began his famous Journal in 1834 and continued it until his death from tuberculosis. He and his brother John took a thirteen-day vacation in September 1839, which became the basis for A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers. In 1838 Thoreau gave the first of his almost annual lectures to the Concord Lyceum on “Society.”

In 1841 he went to live with Ralph Waldo Emerson. The two became life-long friends and leading members of the Transcendental Club. In March 1845 Thoreau began to build a hut on Walden Pond, where he lived from 1845 to 1847. His stay and reflections on it became Walden, or Life in the Woods, published in 1854.

His concern for slavery led him to help a fugitive slave in 1851 and to defend John Brown in A Plea for Captain John Brown (1860). During his life he published a number of essays including “Civil Disobedience” (1849), “Slavery in Massachusetts” (1854), “Life without Principle” (1863). A number of other works were published posthumously including Excursion in Field and Forest (1863), The Maine Woods (1864), Cape Cod (1865), and A Yankee in Canada (1866). N.H.

THUMMIM. See URIM AND THUMMIM.

THURNEYSSEN, EDUARD (1888–1974). Swiss Protestant pastor and theologian, best known for his association with KARL BARTH and the beginnings of NEO-ORTHODOXY or dialectical theology. He was pastor successively at Leutwil in Aargau, Bruggen near St. Gall, and the Münster at Basel. His study of Dostoevsky (1921) had a significant influence on his fellow theologians. His other writings include Come, Holy Spirit (sermons, in collaboration with K. Barth, 1924); Christoph Blumhardt (1926); and The Word of God and the Church (1927). Thurneysen was an editor, with Barth, of the periodical Zwischen den Zeiten (Between the Times, 1923). Unlike EMIL BRUNNER and RUDOLF BULTMANN, Thurneysen never broke with Barth, and his correspondence with him is an important source of information about the early years of dialectical theology. J.L.

THYATIRA. A city in the Roman province of Asia on the main road from Pergamum to Sardis and on a tributary of the Hermus River, about sixty miles from Smyrna (modern Izmir). Thyatira is situated at the junction of two river valleys, a borderline fortress town. Ak-Hissar, its modern name, means “white castle.”

In NT times, Thyatira had developed into a regional manufacturing and commercial center and was celebrated for its elaborately organized trade guilds. The bronze workers’ guild may be reflected in Revelation 2:18. The dyers’ guild had produced a special and famous purple dye (Turkish or Turkey red) made from the madder root grown in the region. The Phoenician purple dye came from murex shellfish. Lydia, a woman “from the city of Thyatira” whom Paul converted in Philippi (Acts 16:14), was “a seller of purple goods.” Her name may have meant “woman of Lydia” since Thyatira, on the Lydia-Mysia border, was spoken of sometimes at the one and at other times at the other.

The trade guilds were closely allied to the city’s pagan religious establishments, Apollo and Artemis mainly. Members were expected to join in the rituals, celebrations, and feasts with the “immortality” (Rev. 2:20-21) that a “Jezebel” type woman in the church seems to have practiced and to have encouraged other Christians to continue from their pagan past. Thus, Thyatira has a NT connotation of syncretism and compromise even though it was recognized that many in the church were not holding to Jezebel’s “teaching” or had “learned what some call the deep things of Satan” (Rev. 2:24). P.L.G.

TIBERIAS. A city on the west bank of the Sea of Galilee, seven hundred feet below sea level. Its founder was the tetrarch Herod Antipas, who named it after Emperor Tiberius, made it his capital, and forced Jews to help construct it and live in it. Because of an earlier graveyard there, Jews considered the place ritually unclean. Christ frequently passed it by on the road, and it is mentioned in the NT only in connection with the Sermon on the Mount. There is good arable land along the shore, and Christ’s own disciples demonstrated that the neighboring waters were good fishing grounds. From the natural rise of land at Tiberias there are fine views eastward five miles across the lake to Gergesa and Hippos, and northward to Magdala and Capernaum. Thermal baths made it a resort and a place of healing in Roman times.

After the destruction of Jerusalem, it became one of the most important cities among the Jews, once a leading rabbi had declared most of it ritually clean. It became the home of the supreme court or Sanhedrin. The Masoretic vowel-pointing of the OT was developed in Tiberias. It is the burial place of Maimonides, the prince of Jewish scholars. During the Inquisition in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries many Jews from Spain fled there. Because of its warm climate it remains a favorite Jewish winter resort even now. T.J.K.

TIBERIUS. The successor of AUGUSTUS as Roman emperor, appointed by the senate in A.D. 14. The Gospel of Luke dates the beginning of Jesus' ministry in the fifteenth year of Tiberius' reign (Luke 3:1). Other references in the Gospels to "Caesar" allude to Tiberius. His was "the likeness and superscription" on the coin presented to Jesus, who commented, "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's" (Mark 12:13-17 and parallels; John 19:12-15).

Tiberius refused to accept divine honors in Italy, but in Eastern provinces worship was accorded him. He encouraged the veneration of Augustus and sought to preserve the traditions of governance established by his illustrious predecessor. Tiberius showed little interest in religions and violently suppressed the Isis mystery cult following a scandal in a temple raised in her honor.

Intrigue brought Tiberius to power, and his late years were marred by intrigue. A praetorian prefect, Sejanus, conspired to depose the emperor, but the conspiracy was exposed and Sejanus was executed. It is thought that Sejanus was responsible for the appointment in A.D. 26 of Pontius Pilate as prefect of Judea, and that his anti-Semitism provoked the rioting that led Tiberius to order the expulsion of Jews from Rome around A.D. 19. The emperor died on March 16, A.D. 37, in his self-imposed exile at Capri, after an illness that left him deranged. J.L.P.

active and important Assyrian kings for Israel and Judah. In 842 B.C., Jehu paid tribute to campaigning Shalmaneser III in Lebanon. Assyria's armies were occupied elsewhere until Tiglath-pileser III's first campaign (740 B.C.), which resulted in the conquest of Arpad in northern Syria, tribute to the Assyrian king being brought from Tyre, Damascus, Cilicia, Carchemish, and others (II Kings 19:13; Isa. 37:13). Tiglath-pileser III's next effort (734 B.C.) posed a threat to Damascus and Israel, but the invader was satisfied with receiving tribute from Menahem of Israel (II Kings 15:19), Rezon of Damascus, and others, including Zabibi, queen of the Arabs.

In about 733 B.C. Tiglath-pileser III became aware that Damascus was rallying the anti-Assyrian forces of the Levant against him. He characteristically avoided a direct assault. He advanced through Phoenicia and as far down the coastline as Gaza, whose king fled to Egypt. Tiglath-pileser returned to accept Ahaz's tribute (II Kings 16:10) and the surrender of Pekah of Samaria (II Kings 15:29). When Tiglath-pileser III did finally attack Damascus, it fell (732 B.C.) without an ally. King Hoshea of Israel paid tribute, as did Ashkelon, Tyre, and others. Damascus was no longer a political power, and Assyria was free to organize Syria-Palestine into an Assyrian province. In each area, Assyrian inspectors were installed to check on the loyalty to Assyria and performance of the local administrators. Messengers with fresh horses stationed on the highways brought reports to Tiglath-pileser III's capitol at Calah, about twenty miles south of Nineveh. News of the slightest rebellion brought swift retribution. By 729 B.C. Tiglath-pileser III had become king of Babylon. The stage was set, as Egypt fully realized, for an extension of Assyrian rule southward beyond Syria-Palestine. This was left for Tiglath-pileser III's successors to accomplish.

The Tigris River emerging from the mountains near Ibn 'Omar

TIGRIS. Known as Hiddekel in the OT, this was both one of the four rivers of Eden in Genesis 2:14 and the scene of one of the great visions of the prophet Daniel (Dan. 10:4). The eastern source of the Tigris rises near Lake Van in the Armenian highlands (now eastern Turkey), only a few miles from the source of its sister river, the EUPHRATES. It flows in a southeasterly direction and enters the great flood plain (Mesopotamia), which it shares with the Euphrates some 460 miles north of the Persian Gulf.

Along its total length of 1150 miles, the Tigris flows by the major centers of the ancient Mesopotamian cultures, including the Assyrian capital, Nineveh, and cult center, Assur. Even in times less ancient, the Parthians and Sassanians maintained their capital at Ctesiphon, on its banks; the Hellenistic rulers of the Middle East built a capital nearby at Seleucia; and the Abbasid caliphs founded Baghdad on the Tigris in A.D. 762.

TILlich, PAUL (1886–1965). One of the most creative and influential Protestant theologians of the twentieth century. Born in Starzeddel, Germany, son of a Lutheran pastor, Tillich studied at several universities, including Berlin, Tübingen, and Halle. He received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from Breslau in 1911 with a dissertation on FRIEDRICH W. J. VON SCHELLING. He served as an army chaplain for four years during the First World War. After the war, Tillich taught at Berlin and later was professor of theology at Marburg, Dresden, and Leipzig. In 1929 he became professor of philosophy at Frankfurt. At this time he was active in the Religious Socialist movement (see KAIROS), and his opposition to Hitler and national socialism resulted in his dismissal from his university chair. He left Germany in 1933 and settled in New York, where he served as professor of philosophical theology at Union Theological Seminary until 1955, also teaching at Columbia University. He was university professor at Harvard (1955–1962) and Nuveen professor of theology at the divinity school at the University of Chicago (1962–65).

Tillich was a prolific writer. His Systematic Theology (3 vols.; 1951–64) is one of the great works of constructive theology in this century. Among his other writings are Interpretation of History (1936), The Protestant Era (1948), Courage to Be (1952), Love, Power, and Justice (1954), Dynamics of Faith (1958), and three volumes of popular sermons: Shaking of the Foundations (1948), The New Being (1956), and The Eternal Now (1963).

The sources of Tillich's thought are many and complex. They include Platonism; the late medieval Christian mystics, such as Jacob Boehme; the German idealist philosophers, especially Schelling; and the existentialists, from KIERKEGAARD to HEIDEGGER. His writings reveal a unique joining of biblical, ontological, and existentialist language and concepts. Tillich says that theology must concern itself both with Christian truth and the human situation. He calls this the METHOD OF CORRELATION. Unlike the philosopher, the theologian stands within a community of faith or a "theological circle." The theologian analyzes the situation out of which the human existential questions arise and then seeks to demonstrate that the symbols used in the Christian message are the answers to these questions. Theology always begins with commitment, with an existential decision concerning the object of one's ULTIMATE CONCERN. Existential analysis reveals that finite existence is marked by a sense of estrangement symbolized by the Fall. Humanity's finite freedom, the source of anxiety, drives us from a state of "dreaming innocence," of undecided potentialities, to the actualization of freedom and existential estrangement. In the state of estrangement we seek salvation (salvus, meaning "healthy" or "whole") but cannot save ourselves.

Only God, the ground and power of all being, can save us from the forces that threaten our finite existence and can create a new being. Jesus Christ is the New Being, for he is essential God-personhood under the conditions of existential estrangement. In Jesus Christ the ground and power of being is revealed concretely, overcoming the forces that threaten creaturely existence. Those who participate in Christ are "new creatures," new beings. However, while living under the conditions of existential estrangement human beings are never fully healed. Hence the Christian hope for the ultimate communion of all beings in the eschatological new creation, the kingdom of God.

Tillich's analysis of the spiritual malaise of twentieth-century life, his understanding of religion as the depth-dimension of all human aspiration, and his existentialist reinterpretation of the themes of classical Christian theology form an unparalleled theological achievement in this century, and he has had a wide influence, both within and outside the church and theology. J.L.

TIME. One of the great enigmas of philosophy, which seems to elude the grasp of thought. It is not an object of human experience that can be objectively studied, but is rather the form and condition of all human experience. Time, of course, can be measured objectively. We make clocks, based on that natural clock which is the solar system, giving rise to the succession of days and months and years. This successiveness, that all things stand to one another in relations of "before" and "after," is one of the fundamental characteristics of time. Here we notice too a basic difference between time and space. Though scientists talk of space time, the distinction is that we can move in any direction in space and come back to the starting point; time is like a one-way street. The order of before and after is irreversible. We can develop these ideas a little further by contrasting time as we experience it in ourselves with time as we objectively measure it in the world.

Clock time is pure succession. Day follows day and year follows year. Human experience too is successive, but is not just pure succession. Indeed, we find pure succession rather frightening, as the past swallows up one moment after another, and the future remains veiled in uncertainty. Human beings, through memory and anticipation, are able to transcend mere successiveness. They live in a "span" of time rather than in a knife-edge instant. They have even visualized the possibility ("eternal life") of an experience in which past and future are gathered up in a present enjoyment that includes both—what Boethius called "the whole, simultaneous and complete fruition of a life without bounds." Perhaps the divine experience is like this, so that, as the psalmist supposed, a thousand years are to God like a day or a watch in the night. "Eternal life" then would not mean a life infinitely prolonged through time, but our participation in the divine experience of perfect simultaneous fruition, free from the tyranny of successiveness.

A further difference between clock time and humanly experienced time is this: clock time is uniform—as the seconds tick by, each one is like all the others, for they are all quantitatively defined. For the human being, time is qualitative as well as quantitative. There are times in life that seem to drag slowly, because they are empty, and times that are so full that they flash by. These are the times of crisis and decision, both in individual lives and the history of the race. Some biblical scholars have made a distinction between chronos (uniform time) and KAIROS (a time of crisis or fulfillment). This linguistic distinction has been challenged, but in any case we can recognize what is meant by the biblical expression, the FULLNESS OF TIME, a conjunction when the course of affairs has come to a decisive turning point.

Another question is whether time has a beginning or an end. In Christianity, it has generally been believed that there is both a beginning and an end, the time of creation and the time of consummation. In the nineteenth century, such ideas might have seemed utterly unscientific or anti-scientific. Nowadays, however, cosmologists can visualize certainly a beginning and possibly an end, and though their speculations have little to do with theological beliefs about CREATION and ESCHATOLOGY, they at least show that to talk of a beginning and an end is not an obvious absurdity. J.M.

TIMOTHY. This man is mentioned in both Acts and the letters of Paul as a trusted colleague of the apostle and is the recipient of two letters sent to him when he fulfilled a role as church leader in Ephesus (I Tim. 1:3).

He was the son of a marriage that united two cultures. His Jewish Christian mother Eunice (II Tim. 1:5) and father, a Greek (Acts 16:1), represented the two streams of influence on his young life. His contact with Paul arose out of the latter's missionary journeys (Acts 13-14), which brought Paul to Timothy's native place, Lystra, in Asia Minor (Acts 16:2). The commendation of the church fellowship enabled Paul to enlist Timothy on the return visit to Lystra, perhaps as a replacement for John Mark, who had deserted the apostolic party earlier and was not deemed worthy to rejoin the group. At all events Timothy was sure to prove a valued member of the apostolic entourage, having been set apart for the work of ministry (I Tim. 1:18; 4:14; II Tim. 1:6).

Timothy's various commissions took him to Thessalonica and to Corinth (II Cor. 1:19). He was delegated to visit Corinth as Paul's envoy (I Cor. 4:17), but without much success. He was Paul's travel companion to Jerusalem and then to Rome (Acts 20:4-5) en route to the Holy City. We know of Timothy's association with Paul in Rome only from the so-called Captivity Epistles, especially Philip- pians, assuming these emanate from Rome. If Paul was released from Roman imprisonment, it would be possible that he then appointed Timothy to Ephesus while he headed west to Spain. But this is conjectural. At some point in his life Timothy shared an imprisonment (Heb. 13:23).

His character references are impeccable (Phil. 2:19-24; I Cor. 16:10; compare II Tim. 1:5-7), even if he was nervously fearful (II Tim. 1:7) and sickly (I Tim. 5:23). R.M.

I AND II TIMOTHY. These two NT letters, addressed on their face to Timothy, Paul's junior colleague, along with Titus are called the PASTORAL EPISTLES.

I Timothy. Its features are a singular absence of personal information given to Timothy and they reflect very little of the writer's own circumstances. Timothy is evidently a church leader in Ephesus (1:3), and he is counseled to attend to his office as minister (4:11-14) with a backward glance to his ordination. The call he must heed is to remain loyal to the apostolic standards (6:20-21) given in the Pauline teaching.

The letter is notable for (a) its exposé of the false doctrine Timothy must resist (1:3-11, 18-20; 4:1-4: a type of Jewish GNOSTICISM seems to lie at the heart of these descriptions), and (b) its clear instructions or directions for the recruitment, selection, maintenance, and disciplining of ministerial orders (3:1-16: overseers, deacons, deaconesses; 4:12-6:19: widows and elders in particular).

II Timothy. The writer is known to be a prisoner (1:8) and the prospect for his release is not good (in spite of a remarkable deliverance he has had, 4:6-8, 16-18). In the light of his impending martyrdom he writes to encourage Timothy, who is spoken to in personal terms, revealing his family background (1:3-7) and calling for his assistance in a moving plea (4:1-22).

In the face of aberrant teaching (2:1-3, 7; 3:10-11) Timothy is to remain committed to his task as an exponent of Paul's doctrine and draw an example for Paul's life (3:10-17). The presence of a block of material reflecting Paul's own plea and his autobiographical details has been argued for, with some cogency, in this letter; and this would explain the warmth and intimacy of many personal allusions. TINDAL, MATTHEW (1657-1733). A leading English rationalist and Deist. Educated at Oxford, Tindal briefly accepted Roman Catholicism but returned to the Church of England in 1688. Two early works, The Rights of the Christian Church (1706) and Defence of the Rights of the Christian Church (1709), aroused heated controversy. He attacked papalism and defended DEISM, rationalism, and Erastianism. His reputation rests on Christianity as Old as the Creation (1730), often called "the Deists' bible." Tindal argues that natural religion is all that is needed, and God has given human beings reason to apprehend it. The law of nature preceded revealed law, and God being immutable and perfect, revealed law can add nothing to the natural law. God's supreme gift to humankind is reason that rejects all superstitions and miracles. To advocate revelation is to insult God's perfectly ordered, mechanical universe. True Christianity is not new; it is as old as the creation. C.M.

TIRHAKAH. King of Ethiopia and Egypt, the third king of the Ethiopian dynasty, born about 709 B.C. Throughout his reign (690-644 B.C.), he was active in opposition to the Assyrian presence in Palestine. Tirhakah established his first capital in the delta to be nearer those he regarded as his vassals in Philistia, Phoenicia, and Syria-Palestine. Second Kings 19:9 states that Tirhakah was king of Ethiopia at the time of the Assyrian attack on Jerusalem in 701 B.C., and that he offered military support for Hezekiah's resistance to the Assyrians. Tirhakah was eight years old then. It is possible that Sennacherib invaded Egypt in 688 B.C., when Tirhakah was king of Egypt. At that time he was forced to flee to Thebes. Tirhakah continued the struggle and regained control. But, two years later, Ashurbanipal sent an expedition to Egypt, and Tirhakah had to flee from the delta to Thebes a second time. Tirhakah died before Thebes fell to the Assyrians in 633 B.C. (Nah. 3:8).

TIRTHANKARA. The Sanskrit word meaning "crossing maker." In JAINISM, one of a series of twenty-four great ascetics and teachers who aid persons in "crossing over" ordinary life and attaining liberation. Their cultus is central to Jain worship. While they are not gods, their memory and spiritual energy are invoked with simple offerings and chants. Most Tirthankaras are nonhistorical, but the last, MAHAVIRA, is accounted the founder of the present Jain religion.

TIRZAH. Meaning "delight." (1) The last named daughter of Zelophehad, a descendant of Joseph through Manasseh. He had no son. Tirzah and her sisters were involved in a significant judicial decision dealing with women's rights to inherit property (Num. 26:33; 27:7; 36:2, 6, 10-11).

(2) A city in Samaria that for about forty years was the second capital of Israel. Its location on the road from Shechem to Beth-shan gave it a traditional reputation for beauty (Song of S. 6:4). It was, however, the scene of some of the ugliest episodes in Israel's political history: Elah was slain while drunk (I Kings 16:9-10), Zimri burned the palace down over himself (I Kings 16:18), and Menahem made a revolution (II Kings 15:14, 16).

P.L.G.

TISHBE. The name of a place, not precisely located, but in the hill country of Gilead about six or seven miles east of the Jordan River, perhaps modern Khi Lisdib. The name is associated with the prophet Elijah, who is called "the Tishbite," an inhabitant of Tishbe (I Kings 17:1; 21:17, 28; II Kings 1:3, 8; 9:36).

P.L.G.

TISHRI. See HEBREW CALENDAR.

TITHE. From ancient times, the tenth part of a person's income and/or property devoted to religious use as an offering, or to political use as a tax or tribute. Across the Middle East and Mediterranean world, in every center of civilization, and among nomadic peoples, the concept of the tithe, as a person's obligation to Deity (sometimes to the king revered as a deity) prevailed. The Assyrians, Babylonians, Romans, and Hebrews all knew and practiced, in various ways, the tithe.

Interestingly, the Covenant Code, much of which dates from the time of the Decalogue (the thirteenth century B.C.), does not mention a tithe for Yahweh. Rather OFFERINGS (Exod. 23:16, 19) are commanded. The much later Deuteronomic Code (622 B.C.) speaks specifically of tithing the firstfruits of grain and other crops. Undoubtedly, the tithe, in different forms in different historical contexts, was practiced by the Hebrews long before the seventh century B.C. Under David and Solomon a tenth of one's income was the usual national tax (I Sam. 8:15-17). The usual exploitation of conquered people (and the Hebrews were oppressed and conquered many times, from the times of the Judges to the final fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70) by the invading power was a tenth of every subject's possessions.

In the ongoing Hebrew tradition of tithes and offerings, one concept stands out—only the best, the virgin oil pressed from the olive, the perfectly formed healthy sheep or calf, and the finest wheat were to be offered to God as the tithe. God's portion is to come first, not last.

In the course of Hebrew history, the tithe became a sign of reverence for God by way of showing love and mercy for God's children. The tithe, by various arrangements (as in the third and sixth years of the seven-year cycle of feasts and offerings) was made into a social welfare program to support widows and orphans and even stateless nomadic people dwelling in the land. The book of Ruth illustrates how the grain that was hard to gather was left in the field for the poor and helpless to gather as a tithe due to God's creatures. Sharing was stressed, unselfishness taught, by way of the tithe. Additionally, the costs of the temple (and shrines) cultus and the support of the priests and Levites were gathered by way of the tithe (Deut. 12:17, 19; 14:22-29; Lev. 27:32; Neh. 10:36; Num. 18:26-28; Deut. 26:12; Neh. 10:37).

The tithe was the general rule among the Jews in Jesus' time. A temple tax was paid by all adult male Jews for the support of the cultus and the upkeep of the sanctuary. Among the stricter Pharisees (to whose theological outlook Jesus inclined, and which Paul embraced), the tithe was practiced scrupulously. Jesus made sarcastic references to the hypersensitivity of the Pharisees to tithing even the mint leaves from their garden, but nonetheless taught the appropriateness of the tithe as the believer's normal act of gratitude to God (Luke 11:42).

Throughout Christian history, the tithe has been taught as an ideal of Christian giving. Old English law collected the tithe of the crops and stored them in tithe barns. Although not practiced by the majority of Christians, the ideal of the tenth that belongs to God is a living reality in all the churches. J.C.

TITUS. This man's name (strangely) does not appear in Acts, but from Paul's letters we know him to have been a loyal assistant and a person meriting Paul's trust. At the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15), if we assume Galatians 2:1-10 refers to this same event, he was a test case since, as a Gentile, he had not been circumcised. It is uncertain whether Paul agreed to his circumcision or not (Gal. 2:3 is not clear).

Titus' mission responsibility was especially to Corinth, to whose church he had gone to raise the "offering for the saints" (II Cor. 9:1). At a crucial time in Paul's dealing with the Corinthians, Titus played a vital role, succeeding where Timothy failed in representing Paul's mind and carrying the "letter of reproof" (II Cor. 2:4), which led the church to penitence (II Cor. 7:8-9). Titus met Paul in Macedonia with the news of the end of the church's disaffection (II Cor. 7:5-7; compare 2:13)—at least for the time being. Paul's writing contained in II Corinthians 1-7, which rejoices over this reconciliation, was evidently taken by Titus to Corinth. And in a subsequent note (II Cor. 10-13) addressing a further outbreak of the church's rebellion, Titus again is a link person (II Cor. 12:18).

Paul's mission preaching to Crete is not evidenced in our records, but Titus' appointment to that charge is (Tit. 1:5ff.), and Eusebius' Church History, the first full-length, continuous narrative written by a Christian, has Titus remaining there as bishop. The letter, ostensibly written by Paul to Titus (see PASTORAL EPISTLES), describes how Titus is to conduct his ministry at Crete, with exhortations to oppose false, Gnosticizing notions (Tit. 1:10-16), to appoint faithful leaders (2:1-15), and to remain true to Paul's message.

TITUS, EMPEROR. Son and successor of the emperor VESPASIAN. After military training and billets in Germany and Britain, Titus assisted his father in the suppression of the Jewish revolt in A.D. 66. The Arch of Titus in the Roman Forum celebrates the subjection of Judea in A.D. 70. During his brief reign Titus ordered the construction of costly public works.

TOBIAH. A leader in Ammon, modern Amman in the kingdom of Jordan, who was at least half Jewish. Tobiah, whose name means "Yahweh is good," was a worshiper of Yahweh and, along with the Samaritans (descendants of the conquered Israelites, who also worshiped Yahweh), offered to help Nehemiah and the returned exiles rebuild Jerusalem in the mid-sixth century B.C. NEHEMIAH, reacting from the developing sense that Judaism must purify itself and keep all other elements at arm's length, rejected the offer of help made by Sanballat the Samaritan and Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh. 2:10; 4:3, 7; 6:1-19). However, Tobiah, who apparently was governor of Ammon under the Persians, moved into Jerusalem and took a room located in the ancient Temple area. This happened during a trip Nehemiah made back to Babylon (Neh. 13:6). On his return, Nehemiah threw Tobiah and his belongings out and had the room ritually purified (Neh. 13:6-9).

Ezra 2:60 mentions that the Tobiah family was one that had been exiled in Babylon and returned to Palestine. Tobiah may have made this return himself but found the growing exclusiveness of the Jews under Ezra and Nehemiah offensive. Tobiah then became the enemy of Nehemiah's reconstruction.

TOBIT, BOOK OF. The book of Tobit, also sometimes called Tobias, as in the Latin Vulgate, is one of the most interesting and revealing books of the APOCRYPHA. Polycarp, Ambrose, and Augustine argued that it should be part of the Bible, whereas Jerome, Athanasius, and Luther considered it just a rollicking good story. It was probably written sometime between the third and first centuries B.C. It exists in a variety of ancient manuscripts—Greek, Latin, Aramaic, and Syriac.

The story reads like a novel, except that the setting is the Hellenistic/Semitic world. Tobit is a pious Jew of the tribe of Naphtali. He, his wife Hannah, and his son Tobias are taken as prisoners of war to Nineveh by the Babylonians. Tobit distinguished himself by giving food to the poor and giving proper burial to the dead. Tobit had to flee, but was later allowed to return to Nineveh. Unclean from burying the dead, he had to sleep outside the house. At night birds blinded him with their droppings. He prayed for the return of his sight.

At the same time there was a young woman in Ecbatana by the name of Sarah who was praying at exactly the same time as Tobit. Seven times she had married, and seven times on her marriage night her husbands had been murdered by an evil spirit named Asmodeus. When God heard the prayers of Sarah and Tobit, he sent his angel Raphael to help them. Thinking he was near death, Tobit sent his son Tobias to Ecbatana to recover a loan. Raphael accompanied him, along with a pet dog. As they camped along the river, a large fish jumped from the water as if to bite Tobias. Tobias caught the fish, saving the gall, liver, and heart to be used for medical purposes.

Tobias was the only eligible kinsman left for Sarah to marry, under levirate law. To drive away the evil spirit and escape death, Tobias burned the fish's heart on the incense stand of his new wife. He got the money he came for, used the gall bladder of the fish to cure his father's blindness, and learned that Raphael was really an angel. He and his whole family lived happily ever after, to a ripe old age.

The extended story of Tobias is a well-told tale, encouraging Jewish virtues, faith, and morals at a time when the Jews were being persecuted and scattered throughout the world, and for centuries was popularized in painting, song, and legend. T.J.K.

TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS DE (1805–59). Born in Paris on July 29, de Tocqueville was a political scientist, historian, and politician. With his friend Gustave de Beaumont, he spent nine months in America (1831–32), which resulted in a joint work on the American penal system and the first part of de Tocqueville's Democracy in America (2 vols.; 1835, 1840), which focused on America's social equality. In 1839 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. After the French Revolution in 1848, he was elected to the Constituent Assembly and helped write the Constitution for the Second Republic. Deprived of all positions by Napoleon III's coup, he wrote The Old Regime and the Revolution in 1856. He died in Cannes.

TOLAND, JOHN (1670–1722). English Deist, philosopher, political pamphleteer, and biblical critic. Born a Roman Catholic near Londonderry, Ireland, he became a Protestant at sixteen. In 1690 he received the M.A. at Edinburgh University, studied at Leiden for two years, and settled in Oxford in 1694. Then followed a stream of mostly anonymous or pseudonymous books and pamphlets on a wide range of subjects. Politically, Toland was a Whig and a strong defender of toleration. Philosophically and religiously, he was influenced by Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the Cambridge Platonists, and JOHN LOCKE. Religiously, Toland advocated RATIONALISM, freethought, and latitudinarianism.

His most influential work, Christianity not Mysterial, Or a Treatise Showing That there is nothing in the Gospel Contrary to Reason, Nor above it: And that no Christian Doctrine can be properly call'd A Mystery, was published in 1696. It is one of the great treatises of DEISM and elicited over fifty attempted refutations. The book was condemned by Parliament. The title nicely sums up its central theme: Christianity cannot be contrary or above reason. Revelation may give us knowledge that we otherwise might not apprehend; but once known, revelation must be entirely reasonable—not mysterious. Toland ends the book: "I acknowledge no Orthodoxy but the Truth." Toland's exploration of the origins of religion appears to anticipate David Hume's Natural History of Religion, as does his naturalistic interpretation of the biblical miracles preview the biblical criticism of Enlightenment thinkers.

TOLSTOY, LEO. (1828–1910). Russian nobleman and author of such world-famous novels as War and Peace (1866) and Anna Karenina (1875–77). He was also a social reformer, inspired by Christian principles. Already during the time he was writing his novels he was engaged in improving the lot of the Russian peasantry, and after 1877 he devoted himself wholly to developing his religious and social ideas. He lived in a very simple manner, and his theology was also stripped down to the barest essentials. It resembled in fact the kind of theology that Harnack was teaching at the same time, that is to say, it put at the center not the doctrines of the person and work of Christ but Jesus' own proclamation of the kingdom of God and the conduct that he commanded in the Sermon on the Mount. But whereas Harnack was conservative in politics, Tolstoy was liberal and also commended nonviolence. He was excommunicated from the Orthodox Church in 1901, became estranged from his family because of his religious and social preoccupations, and died on his way to a monastery.

TOMB. A building or other masonry structure, such as a pyramid, used for the burial of the dead. In Palestine, natural caves also were used as tombs. Perhaps the most famous Christian tombs were caves, such as Lazarus' tomb at Bethany (John 11:38), and Jesus' tomb at Jerusalem (Matt. 27:60), which was a man-made cave hewn out of the rock at the direction of Joseph of Arimathea. Abraham and the other patriarchs and their wives were probably buried in the cave of Machpelah, in a field near Hebron. Abraham bought the field from Ephron the Hittite for just this purpose (Gen. 23:10 ff.).

The most famous tombs of ancient times were not caves, however, but huge masonry constructions, the great pyramids of Egypt at Gizeh near modern Cairo. These included the Fourth Dynasty pyramid of Mycerinus (or Menkaure), the pyramid of Chephren (or Khafre), and the Great Pyramid of Cheops (or Khufu). Actually, there were older pyramids than these. A Second Dynasty pyramid at Sakkara is 6,500 years old, the world's oldest stone structure. However, for sheer size—and the wonder of the ages—nothing surpasses Cheops' Great Pyramid, which covers 13.1 acres, and contains 2,300,000 stone blocks that weigh, on average, two and one-half tons each. This tomb is over 481 feet high, and the four sides of the base are roughly 756 feet each.

The Persians buried nine of their emperors in the hills near Persepolis. Cyrus the Great, who permitted the Jews to return to Jerusalem, was buried in a small, freestanding stone tomb near Pasargadae.

TONGUES, GIFT OF. See GLOSSOLALIA.

TONGUES OF FIRE. One of the metaphors describing the reception of the Holy Spirit by the disciples of Jesus gathered in the upper room in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost after Jesus' resurrection (Acts 2). The passage reads: "Cloven tongues like as of fire" (KJV) descended and rested on the faithful resulting in their all being "filled with the Holy Ghost." They then "began to speak in other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance," that is, they exhibited xenoglossia, or the ability to speak languages that were real but hitherto unknown to them. This outpouring of the Spirit and tongue-speaking experience was not the GLOSSOLALIA Paul discusses in I Corinthians 12-14, and that modern Pentecostals and contemporary neo-Pentecostals practice (Acts 2:3 ff., 6-18; 10:46). The disciples saw their experience as the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy, that the old would dream dreams and the young see visions (Joel 2:28; Acts 2:16 ff.). J.C.

TONSURE. From the Latin word tondere, meaning "to shave." A shaving of part of the hair of the head, prescribed by canon law for all Catholic priests, except in countries like Britain and the United States, where it is out of harmony with public custom. It symbolizes the clerical state and reminds one of Christ's crown of thorns. J.C.

TOPHETH. Meaning "fireplace" or "hearth." A place in the valley of Hinnom that bounds Jerusalem on the southwest. The name has associations with cremation as a punishment (Deut. 32:22; Isa. 33:14; Isa. 30:33, where the RSV reads Topheth as "burning place") and with the Phoenician and Moabite practice of child sacrifice or passing of children through fire (II Kings 23:10; II Chr. 28:2-3; 33:6). P.L.G.

TOPLADY, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE (1740-78). English clergyman, theologian, and hymn writer. Born in Farnham, Surrey, England, Toplady was educated at Westminster School, London, and Trinity College, Dublin. Converted through the influence of a Methodist layman, he was ordained to the Anglican priesthood. Subsequently, after serving as pastor of the French Calvinist Church in London, he became a bitter antagonist of John Wesley and Methodism and a stout defender of Calvinism. He outlined his position in Historic Proof of the Doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England. However, he is probably best known for his hymns: "Rock of Ages," "A Debtor to Mercy Alone," "A Sovereign Protector I Have," and "From Whence This Fear and Unbelief?" R.H.

TORAH. Scroll of the law and teaching, read in the synagogue on the Jewish Sabbath, Mondays and Thursdays, and on Jewish holy days. The scroll of the Torah is made up of separate leaves of specially treated parchment sewn together with threads made from the tendons of ritually clean animals. On the parchment are the words, in unvocalized and unaccented Hebrew, of the five books of Moses, the PENTATEUCH, hand-lettered by a special copyist, known in Hebrew as a sofer ("scribe"), who must be devout and learned. The scroll is rolled on two wooden staves called in Hebrew Etz Hayim ("tree of life"), topped by an ornamental headpiece or crown. The scroll is tied by a sash and covered with an embroidered mantle, over which a breastplate hangs. A pointer (yad), in the form of a tiny hand with a pointing finger, is used to keep the place in the reading of the Torah. When not in use, the scrolls of the Torah are kept in a closet called the Holy Ark (Aron ha-Kodesh). During services when the ark is opened, worshipers rise and remain standing until it is closed. When the Torah is carried, the congregation stands, and those nearest to it kiss its mantle as it goes past. On Simhat Torah, the "Rejoicing of the Law" festival, all scrolls are taken from the ark and carried in procession seven times around the synagogue.

In rabbinic literature, "Torah" also refers to the Pentateuch as distinct from the other two sections of the Hebrew Bible—the Prophets and the Writings—and indeed to all the teachings of Judaism, its laws, doctrines, ethics, philosophy, and customs and ceremonies.

The study of Torah is considered a major religious duty and its fulfillment the highest goal of piety and virtue. God's command to Joshua (Josh. 1:8), "This book of the Torah shall not depart from thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate on it day and night," was interpreted as an exhortation to devote one's whole life to the study of the Torah. The daily prayers include a blessing to God for the commandment to occupy oneself with the study of Torah. The blessing preceding the reading of the SHEMA praises God for giving the Torah. The rabbinic passage setting forth those things the fruit of which the individual enjoys in this world while the main reward is reserved for the world to come ends with "but the study of the Torah is equivalent to them all." The idea that the Torah is the source of life of the Jewish people is expressed in many parables and homilies but especially in the prayer: "Blessed is our God, who hath created us for His glory and hath separated us from them that go astray, and hath given us the Torah and thus planted everlasting life in our midst. May He open our heart unto His Torah." L.K.

TORAH READING CYCLE. Since study is an integral part of prayer in Jewish life, public religious services on the Sabbath, festivals, Mondays and Thursdays and the new moon include the reading of a portion of the TORAH scroll. The Torah, containing the five books of Moses in unvowelled Hebrew on parchment, is divided into portions and read in annual cycles. The public recitation of the Torah is usually followed by the reading of a supplementary portion from the Prophets, called the Haftarah. The Torah portions are subdivided, and the subdivisions on Sabbath mornings number seven. Different congregants are called up to the Torah to pronounce the blessings before and after the reading of each parashah (subdivision). L.K.

TORII. The Japanese word meaning literally "bird-roost." A distinctive gateway marking the entrance to the precincts of a Shinto shrine. Typically made of two round, upright pillars and two crossbeams, the torii is a distinctive mark of a Shinto shrine and its "sacred space." R.E.

TOTAL DEPRAVITY. See ORIGINAL SIN.

TOTEM. In primitive religion, a natural object, commonly a particular species of animal, believed to have a special sacred or symbolic relationship to a social group, such as a tribe. Early anthropology and psychoanalysis made much of totemism in its theories of religious origins, but modern thought has tended to give it less importance and to point to considerable diversity in its practice.

A totem animal is often present in mythology as the primal ancestor of its people. In some cases eating it may be taboo, although in others the animal is eaten but usually only in special ritual circumstances in which the act is a sort of Holy Communion. Totemism at its most intense presents a significant link between the human and the natural order, and makes the totem creature an objectification of the people's sacred corporate identity. It is, however, usually not the central motif of a society's religion and may have little more significance than as a way of reckoning kinship or as a touchstone of emotional identity, like its modern survival in team mascots and the bears and eagles that are the emblems of contemporary nations. R.E.

TRACHONITIS. An area of ancient Palestine south of Damascus, north of Hauran, east of Bashan, and north of Galilee, now part of Israel, Syria, and the kingdom of Jordan. It was ruled by the tetrarch Herod Philip (Luke 3:1), and, at a later date, by Herod Agrippa I. Caesarea Philippi was in that region. J.C.

TRACTARIAN MOVEMENT. See OXFORD MOVEMENT.

TRADITION. The word "tradition" comes from the Latin traditio, meaning "handing over." The corresponding Greek word, used in the NT, is paradosis. This is the word used by Paul when he writes, "Hold to the traditions which you were taught by us" (II Thess. 2:15). Tradition pervades virtually all the departments of human activity. In government, education, family life, and so on there are recognized principles and practices that are passed on from one generation to another. Even in the sciences, tradition is important. Each new investigator joins a scientific community in which there is already a body of received opinion on the science concerned and recognized ways of conducting research. Even the most acute and innovative researcher builds on what is already there and owes far more to the legacy received than he or she is likely ever to contribute to the science concerned. Tradition is especially important in religion and theology, and it is to the place of tradition in these areas that we now turn.

The Structure of Tradition. In a religious tradition, it is possible to distinguish three constitutive elements: first, the origin, the truth or insight or event from which the tradition took its rise and which it is intended to pass on and to perpetuate; second, the transmission, the actual process of passing on or handing over; and, third, the reception and appropriation of what is passed on by those living at a particular point in time. The origin of an entire religious tradition (as distinct from minor traditions within the mainstream of tradition) is usually a REVELATION, an event that brings a new spiritual insight so profound that it serves as the foundation on which an entire religion is built up. We must notice, however, that even the originating event is not an isolated happening but already belongs in traditions that reach further back. The originating event from which the Christian tradition came was the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, but these were understood in the light of the Jewish tradition with its messianic expectations and so on. The process of transmission is effected by quite specific vehicles in the Christian church. Preaching is the most fundamental, and has gone on since the time of the apostles. Alongside preaching, we may set teaching (didache), especially the instruction of catechumens. The earliest preaching and teaching antedated the composition of written SCRIPTURES—indeed, it is now generally believed that the Synoptic Gospels were constructed out of units of teaching circulating in the church. But when the Scriptures did emerge, they obviously became a very important vehicle for transmitting and stabilizing the traditions about Jesus. The sacraments constituted a further vehicle for the transmission of the tradition, in the dramatic liturgical forms of baptism and the Eucharist. The community itself, and especially the ordained ministry, played an indispensable part in the work of transmission. Finally, tradition needs to be received and appropriated. Where the reception is only outward or formal, the tradition becomes lifeless and even meaningless, and this of course does sometimes happen. If the tradition is alive, it must be received in such a way that the recipient participates in something of the power and illumination of the original event.

Tradition and Development. There are two opposed ways in which tradition may be understood: as static or dynamic. In the first case, tradition is understood as a body of truths and practices given at the beginning and then to be kept pure and unchanged from generation to generation. There is a hint of this view in a late writing of the NT that speaks of "the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints" (Jude 3). This is sometimes called the "deposit of faith." On a more dynamic view of tradition, it is recognized that there may be development of both practices and doctrines. Such development may be simply an unfolding of what is implicit in the original given, or it may be due to the pressures of social or intellectual developments, for instance, belief in the authority of scripture has to be rethought in the light of historical criticism. The question then arises, What is legitimate development? Clearly there must be a demonstrable continuity, or else the tradition may be abandoned altogether. An acorn must change and develop as it grows into a tree, but it does not grow into just any tree, but into an oak. In a living tradition there is both development and continuity. Vincent of Lerins seemed to be favoring the static view when he urged Christians to hold to "that which has been believed everywhere, always, and by all," but he also declared that there should be "a great increase and vigorous progress in understanding as the ages and centuries march on."

Catholic and Protestant Views of Tradition. The discussion of tradition and development brings us to consider the sharp opposition that prevailed for many years between Catholics and Protestants over the place of tradition. Protestants claimed that the Bible alone is authoritative (the principle of SOLA SCRIPTURA), and that tradition can have no binding force. Catholics, on the other hand, seemed to recognize tradition as a separate source of revealed truth. But in recent years the views of both Catholics and Protestants have changed, and tradition is no longer the contentious matter it once was. In view of biblical criticism, Protestants acknowledge that the Gospels are collections of traditions about Jesus that circulated for a long time before they were written down, and that the CANON of the NT was decided by the church, largely on the grounds of what were judged to be writings that continued the tradition of the apostles. On the Catholic side, tradition is now seen not as a separate source from scripture but as intimately joined to it. The Constitution on Divine Revelation of Vatican II suggests that tradition and scripture flow along in dynamic interaction like a river: "Sacred tradition and sacred scripture, then, are bound closely together and communicate one with the other. For both of them, flowing out from the same divine wellspring, come together in some fashion to form one thing, and move toward the same goal."

TRADITION CRITICISM. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

TRADUCIANISM. Sometimes called "generationalism" because it is a doctrine about the beginnings of the human soul. Some theologians speculate that the soul comes from the parents through the act of generation and was in the embryo at conception. Others theorize that the soul of the parent generated the soul of the infant as a separate process. The doctrine entered Christian thought from Stoicism through Tertullian (second century) as an effort to explain the transmission of sin through Adam.

TRAJAN. Roman Emperor from A.D. 98 to 117. An exchange of letters in A.D. 111–112 between the emperor and the younger Pliny, proconsul of Bithynia and Pontus, reflects the imperial position toward the profession and practice of Christianity at this time. Some scholars see a correspondence between the situation revealed in these letters and that presupposed in I Peter, but many assign an earlier date to this writing. J.L.P.

TRANCE. See MYSTICISM.

TRANSACTIONAL ANALYSIS. A school of psychology originating in the work of Eric Berne, popularly known for his book Games People Play, to shorten the therapeutic process required by conventional psychotherapy. Noting that people reveal themselves through interaction, Berne devised a system of group therapy by which people could help one another see themselves more clearly. Building on SIGMUND FREUD's analysis of the continuous struggle between ego-id-superego and the discoveries by neurosurgeon Wilder Penfield that all memories, including feelings, are stored in the brain, Berne constructed a method to explore the interaction of any two persons as stimulator and responder. He called this Transactional Analysis (TA). These "games" reveal the past through present transactions.

The key terms are "Parent," "Adult," and "Child," but these words do not hold the common meanings attributed to them. Every individual incorporates each "person." Parent may mean nurturer or conscience; child may mean dependency or creativity; adult may mean a way of processing the other two "persons" maturely, or it may include an overload of conflicting stimuli that cause inappropriate behavior. When behavior is analyzed by correlating action with memories, a person can begin to sort out the reasons for these actions and begin to modify behavior. Transactional Analysis is popularly outlined in the book I'm OK—You're OK by Thomas A. Harris. I.C.

TRANSCENDENCE. The word derives from the Latin phrase trans scandere, meaning to "climb over." The term may refer (1) to being above and apart from or (2) to transcending by rising above and beyond. Transcendence is contrasted with IMMANENCE, understood as indwelling and abidingly pervasive.

Transcendence, as applied to God by theologians and philosophers, distinguishes God as Creator and Ruler, external to the universe, from God as immanent within the world. Aristotle depicts God as the transcendent Unmoved Mover, final cause of the world but unaware of it. The Neoplatonists, and Augustine following them, affirm the immanence of God as the source and sustainer of Being, yet transcending it. The transcendence of God has been stressed by medieval nominalists, by critical philosophers from Descartes to Kant, by Deists, by existentialists, and by Neo-orthodox theologians.

IMMANUEL KANT (1724–1804) gives "transcendental" a highly specialized meaning referring to the a priori of experience and knowledge: the Transcendental Aesthetic as the a priori of sensory experience, the Transcendental Logic as the a priori in thought, and the Transcendental Unity of Apperception as the self.

New England TRANSCENDENTALISM is a literary movement led by Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–82), deriving from Kant the notion of a transcendence based on intuition, but giving it a meaning akin to Romantic idealism. C.Mc.

TRANSCENDENTALISM. This American contribution to philosophy and theology, an outgrowth of German idealism and the English Romantic movement, represents an intellectual, aesthetic, and spiritual ferment. Transcendentalism began in 1836 with publication of RALPH WALDO EMERSON'S Nature and the first meeting in September of the Transcendental Club at the home of George Ripley. Attending were Bronson Alcott, Orestes Brownson, Emerson, and other leading UNITARIAN ministers.

Prominent members over the next four years included HENRY DAVID THOREAU, Theodore Parker, Margaret Fuller, and Elizabeth Palmer Peabody. They published the Dial from 1840 to 1844.

An affront even to Unitarian orthodoxy, transcendentalism represented an attack on historic Calvinism, tradition in general, a belief in miracles specifically, and an acceptance of German critical scholarship including that concerning the historical Jesus. Affirmatively transcendentalists believed that the universe was centered in one mind, one will, and the Oversoul, which was active in all nature, awakening in human beings religious sentiment and happiness. Their optimistic views rooted in a pantheistic concept of the universe, represented a post-Kantian IDEALISM with a dash of the mystic SPIRITUALISM of Emanuel Swedenborg and Eastern religions. They tended to ignore such problems as evil, sin, pain, and death. A complementary creed to the optimism of Jacksonian democracy, it influenced American culture through such literary giants as Emerson, Thoreau, and Nathaniel Hawthorne. Many of its members were involved in the communitarian experiments at Brook Farm and Fruitlands.

TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION. A technique from the Hindu tradition brought to the Western world by Mahareshi Mahesh Yogi. It is a process of turning inward to transcend thought and expand consciousness, in order to get in touch with creative intelligence. The procedure is used twice daily for fifteen- to twenty-minute periods while the person, comfortably seated with eyes closed, sinks into the deeper levels of mind. Breathing and pulse rate are reduced, muscles relax, and a stillness is felt. The alternation of daily activity and meditation is designed to bring strength and perspective in order to gain enlightenment and self-realization through self-awareness. Transcendental Meditation (TM) recognizes five stages: waking, dreaming, deep sleep, temporary pure awareness, and permanent pure awareness. Beyond this are two states seldom reached: that in which one sees the world as transformed, and one in which it is realized that the self is not only an inner but an outer reality.

TRANSEPT. From the Latin words trans septum, meaning "across wall," denoting a projection between the nave and choir of a cruciform (cross-shaped) church. It is the aisle or hall that crosses right in front of the nave, extending to both sides.

TRANSFIGURATION. An important episode in the Gospel story and life of Jesus, according to the Synoptic Gospels. John 12:27-30 is sometimes thought to be a recast version of the incident, without any specific setting so typical of the threefold account (see John 1:14).

The center of interest is the transformation of Jesus' appearance to resemble a shining being (presumably angelic), with the appearance of two OT characters, Moses and Elijah, adding to the drama and the scenario (Matt. 17:1-8; Mark 9:2-8; Luke 9:28-36). The usual interpretation is that OT figures witness to the presence of the Messiah, whom the Father's voice from heaven greets as "my Son." Peter's action in wishing to erect three booths was evidently intended to make the event memorable and to prolong it, though it is more likely that it represents a plea for Jesus to act in a nationalistic way and bring in the divine kingdom as patriotic leader (Lev. 23:39-43 tells of the erecting of booths, a feast that in first-century Judaism carried strong national overtones).

As the evangelists use the incident, it stands in some relation to the promise given in Mark 9:1 that the Twelve will see God's kingdom come in power. This is taken to refer to either the RESURRECTION (in which case some think the Transfiguration is a predated Resurrection appearance) or the PAROUSIA (in which case the story anticipates the final glory of Christ). The memory of this tradition is seen in II Peter 1:16-18, which suggests a setting in the Parousia (v. 19).

TRANSUBSTANTIATION. The word means "the change of one substance into another" and refers to the Roman Catholic dogma that in the EUCHARIST the substance of the elements of bread and wine are changed into the substance of the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ. Early medieval theologians used terms such as "transform" and "transfigure" to refer to the change of the Eucharistic elements. However, by the thirteenth century the doctrine and term "transubstantiation" were well established and frequently used, for example in the words of Thomas Aquinas: "The whole substance of the bread is changed into the whole substance of Christ's body, and the whole substance of the wine into the whole substance of Christ's blood. Hence this conversion . . . may be designated by a name of its own, transubstantiation." Martin Luther opposed transubstantiation, while teaching the Real Presence of Christ "in, with, and under" the bread and wine (consubstantiation).

To counter Luther's teaching, the Council of Trent issued its teaching on transubstantiation (1551), which has remained authoritative in Roman Catholicism to the present day: "It has always been the conviction of the Church of God and this holy Council now again declares that by the consecration of the bread and wine a change takes place in which the entire substance of the bread is changed into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord and the entire substance of the wine into the substance of his blood." This dogma often has been misunderstood, due largely to a confusion over the word "substance." Using an Aristotelian and Thomistic distinction, some theologians have taught that it is the substantial form of the bread and wine, the reality that underlies their appearance or accidents, which is changed, and not their species, which are perceptible to the senses. The Roman church does not, however, sanction any particular philosophical interpretation of substance, and Catholic theologians continue to disagree on the precise nature of the conversion of the elements. Recently Catholic theologians have entered into serious dialogue with Anglicans and Lutherans on the interpretation of transubstantiation. J.L.

TRAPPISTS. The popular name of Roman Catholic monks belonging to the Order of Cistercians of the Strict Observance. The CISTERCIAN order was founded in 1098 by Saint Robert Molesmes at the monastery of Citeaux in France. In 1664 Armand Jean LeBouthillier de Rance, abbot of LaTrappe, a Cistercian abbey in Normandy, instituted a movement to reform the order. One of the strictest monastic communities, the Trappists demand absolute silence; emphasize liturgical worship including observance of the divine office for seven hours daily; and forbid the eating of meat, fish, and eggs. The monks spend their days in liturgical prayer and contemplation, theological study, and manual labor. Since Vatican Council II, the Trappists have abolished the position of lay brothers. Nuns of the Strict Observance are called Trappistines. The expulsion of monks during the French Revolution was responsible for Trappists' establishing monasteries in Europe, China, Japan, and the United States. In 1817 they returned to LaTrappe. R.H.

TREE OF KNOWLEDGE/TREE OF LIFE. Genesis 2:9 reports that "the Lord God made to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food, the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." The tree of knowledge was the tree whose fruit ADAM AND EVE were forbidden to eat; the tree of life was to promote continuing life to those who ate its fruit. The Genesis account does tell that Adam and Eve ate of the one tree, but leaves silent the question of the other. Eating of the tree of knowledge traditionally thought of as an apple tree, probably incorrectly, was a direct challenge by the human race to Jehovah's judgment about what is right and wrong. In church iconography, only one tree, not two, is ordinarily depicted in Paradise. In some passages in the OT the phrase "knowledge of good and evil" has sexual overtones (Deut. 1:39; II Sam. 19:35), and some scholars think it also does here. T.J.K.

TRENT, COUNCIL OF (1545-63). Nineteenth ecumenical council and Roman Catholicism's doctrinal response to sixteenth-century Protestantism, which set the doctrine for Roman Catholicism until VATICAN COUNCIL II (1962-65). Despite opposition and delays, Pope Paul III convoked the Council of Trent, which opened December 13, 1545. Interruptions were frequent: session 1-8 at Trent and 9-11 at Bologna took place under Pope Paul III (1534-49), sessions 12-16 at Trent under Julius III (1550-55), and sessions 17-25 at Trent under Pius IV (1559-65). Middle and lower clergy and university representatives were not invited; they had abetted conciliarism earlier. Fifty theologians and fifty canonists acted as consultants without official voice. Only archbishops, bishops, influential abbots, and heads of religious orders could vote. A few scattered Protestants attended only briefly. Luther refused to go unless the council was free of papal domination and Scripture was accorded final authority. Some 255 prelates finally signed Trent's conclusions, but only 60 to 70 attended the various sessions. Jesuits Salmeron and Lainez, known for their papal loyalty, spoke first and last on all proposals, and only they were allowed to preach. Heated debate and even fighting marked some sessions.

Trent declared Scripture and tradition equal for faith and morals; sanctioned the Apocrypha as biblical; made Jerome's Latin Vulgate translation the official Catholic Bible; defined justification by grace as a joint effort by God and man in which good works have merit and increase faith; reaffirmed and defined the seven sacraments (baptism, the Lord's Supper, confirmation, penance, ordination, marriage, and extreme unction); declared the Mass a propitiatory sacrifice and ordination indelible; made Latin official for the Mass; reaffirmed transubstantiation and withholding of the cup; said celibacy and chastity were better than marriage; asserted the efficacy of indulgences; and approved the honoring of relics, invocation and veneration of saints, and masses for the dead. More preaching, restraints on pluralities, and less concubinage were urged, and an index of prohibited books was established, but reforms were noticeably missing. Office by divine right was denied all bishops except the pope, and no concessions were made to the Protestants. (See also CATHOLIC REFORMATION.) C.M.

TRIAL OF JESUS. Jesus' trial followed his arrest on the Mount of Olives by Roman soldiers directed by Judas. This occurred in the evening hours of Nisan 14, as the day began at twilight (roughly 6:00 P.M.). Actually, Jesus had not one but several trials that were brought about by the rising fear and dislike of Jesus as an authoritative leader by the religious powers of Judea. The problem of convicting Jesus of anything grew out of the overlapping political jurisdictions and the supremacy of Roman power in Judea.

Jesus' trial (or trials) began with an interview before Annas, former high priest and father-in-law of Caiaphas, the present high priest (John 18:13). Then he was taken to Caiaphas' house and forced to undergo an illegal (because it was held at night) grand jury investigation by some Sanhedrin members (Matt. 26:69-75; Mark 14:55; Luke 22:54-64). At dawn, Jesus was tried by the Sanhedrin (Luke 22:66), and on his tacit admission that he was the Son of God, he was condemned to death. Because the Romans had a monopoly on the death sentence, Jesus was then taken to Pilate, the governor, at the Praetorium. The charged lodged was not blasphemy, but treason, for it was said he claimed to be King of the Jews (Luke 23:1-3). Pilate, uncomfortable with this process, sent Jesus to Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea, since Jesus was a Galilean (Luke 23:6). Herod examined and mocked Jesus but found him not guilty and sent him again to Pilate (Luke 23:15). Pilate, at the second interview, tried to release Jesus, but the crowd, stirred up by the priests, demanded the release of Barabbas, a convicted murderer, as their Passover favor, instead of Jesus, as Pilate had suggested (Luke 23:16-18). Pilate, afraid of a riot, and of a letter to Rome by the priests suggesting that he was easy on traitors, washed his hands to symbolize his innocence of Jesus' blood and handed him over to an execution squad for crucifixion—the punishment for treason (Matt. 27:24; Mark 15:15-20). TRIBES OF ISRAEL. According to the final editing of the OT, based on an idealized vision of Israel's early history (which is also reflected in the later prophets like Ezekiel [chap. 48] and the NT), there were twelve tribes of Israel. However, a close reading of the OT reveals a wide variation of names and in the number of the tribes. The Song of Deborah (Judg. 5) names only ten tribes, and completely omits Judah. The Blessing of Moses (Deut. 33) names only eleven tribes, omitting Simeon. The Blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49) lists twelve. Indeed, one of Jacob's sons, Joseph, was represented, as early as Genesis 41, by not one but two tribes, named after his half-Egyptian sons, Ephraim and Manasseh. This gives a list of thirteen tribes: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin, Gad, Asher, Dan, and Naphtali. Later, the territory of Canaan was divided into twelve areas since Levi received no territory because of their devotion to the service of the tabernacle, and later the Temple in Jerusalem. Much later, Solomon entirely disregarded the old tribal boundaries and divided the kingdom into twelve administrative districts (I Kings 4:7-19). Some scholars surmise that later editors projected back twelve tribes in Israel's early history on the basis of Solomon's districts. Whatever is the case, it is clear that the number of tribes was fluid in early Israelite history, reflecting the varied peoples that ultimately came to form Israel.

The idealized twelve tribes were said to be descended from the grandson of Abraham, Jacob. The twelve sons were born of two of Jacob's wives, Leah and Rachel, and two of his concubines, Zilpah and Bilhah. The sons of Jacob by Leah were Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun. The sons by Rachel were Joseph and Benjamin. By Zilpah, they were Gad and Asher. By Bilhah, they were Dan and Naphtali.

The tribal system did not survive the monarchy of Solomon. Indeed, it may have been the intention of the imperial-minded Solomon to break forever the residual tribal loyalties that threatened national unity. Indeed, those tribal loyalties burst into flames of revolt at Solomon's death, when ten of the tribes broke away from David's monarchy and the northern kingdom of Israel was established (922 B.C.). In fact, Jeroboam, who was made king, was given his power by the ten tribes joined in solemn assembly. Folklore and pride in ancestry kept the tribal ideal alive down through the NT period, when frequent allusions were made to Jesus' descent from David, and Paul gloried in his identity as a Benjamite. The twelve apostles were told by Jesus, too, that they would sit in judgment on the twelve tribes of Israel. The Epistle of James even refers to Christians as "the twelve tribes."

Judges 1 describes the territory conquered—or not conquered—by the various tribes, doing this in terms of the Canaanite peoples who formerly inhabited the land, and in many instances continued to live there. Joshua 15-19 gives precise boundaries for the tribes. Judah stretched from Edom to the Wilderness of Zin to the south end of the Dead Sea to Kadesh-barnea to the Brook of Egypt and then to the sea. On the north, Judah touched Jerusalem, ran up to Ekron, and ended at the sea. The Joseph tribes (Ephraim and Manasseh) occupied the land from the Jordan River by Jericho to Bethel to Beth-horon to Gezer and the sea.

Gad and Reuben and some of Manasseh received land east of the Jordan. Benjamin received land within the original territory of Judah, to the east and south of Jerusalem. Simeon also received land in the area of Judah, as Judah could not occupy all of it. Zebulun received twelve cities with their villages. Issachar settled in the north near Mount Tabor. Asher settled near Mount Carmel and bordered on Tyre. Naphtali received nineteen cities in the north. Dan settled near Joppa but lost his land and captured Leshem, renaming it Dan. J.C.

TRIBULATION, THE GREAT. The term has acquired something of a technical significance in a type of biblical interpretation known as DISPENSATIONALISM. This is an attempt to see the prophetic passages of the Bible as detailed and chronological descriptions, with specific reference, of the end times, the fate of the world, the future of the Jewish people, and the experience of Christians in those final generations.

So the phrase in Daniel 12:2, "a time of trouble" (compare Jer. 30:7), is thought to be elaborated in the reported saying of Jesus (Matt. 24:21; compare Mark 13:19, 24) concerning "the great tribulation." The term here relates to the bitter experiences to befall the followers of Christ at the onset of the Jerusalem war of A.D. 66, which in turn led to their migration to Pella. Dispensational interpreters, however, view the historical setting of A.D. 66 as mirroring the greater trial to occur in the events, both historical and on a cosmic scale, prior to the PAROUSIA or Second Coming of Christ. The debate is joined on the issue whether the church of that period will escape the tribulation by being taken out of history by God's intervention (either as an entire generation of Christians or as a remnant of faithful believers, the elect ones: the technical expressions are "total" or "partial rapture," based on I Thess. 4:17, which describes a catching up or seizure from earth to the Lord's presence). The alternative is that the church will be compelled to enter this dark experience and suffer martyrdom in the tribulation period, often associated with the reign of evil, called the rule of ANTICHRIST. Some verses point in the direction of Christians having to suffer: Acts 14:22; II Thessalonians 2:1-12; Revelation 7:14.

Modern biblical scholarship sees the term as a figurative expression for (1) what occurred historically in the events of A.D. 66-70, and (2) the solemn reminder that the church's lot in this world is always to encounter suffering and trial, as the Johannine Christ foretold (John 16:33). There is, most modern scholars hold, no futuristic specificity to "the great tribulation," aside from the warning that good and evil will be in fierce contention until the ultimate denouement of history when God's universal kingdom comes, and God will be "all in all" (I Cor. 15:28 KJV).

TRIBUTE. A general term to cover the objects, mainly money or precious metals, paid in TAXES usually imposed by a monarch or an alien world power. With the setting up of the Israelite monarchy, it was expected that the people would be called on to maintain its support, as in Samuel's warning (I Sam. 8:10-18). Gifts as tribute were also rendered to the king as a sign of vassalage (I Sam. 10:27).

As Israel was exposed to the dominance of foreign powers, it was open to direct levies in the form of ransom money and taxes; but in the Davidic phase of the monarchy the reverse was true, and various peoples brought tribute to David's court (II Sam. 8:6) and to his son Solomon (I Kings 4:21), who ruled much like an Oriental potentate. Other Israelite kings such as Ahab (II Kings 3:4-5) and Jehoshaphat (II Chr. 17:11) received gifts from neighboring states.

A weakened country, divided into two kingdoms, was unable to resist the might of rising empires, such as Syria (II Kings 12:17, 18) and Assyria, which under Tiglath-pileser III and Shalmaneser V (II Kings 16:8; 17:3), imposed tribute on Israel and Judah. Hezekiah's willingness to concede the right of the Babylonian king to levy this tribute is a notable example of Judah's vulnerability (II Kings 20:12-15).

The southern kingdom was forced to accept the suzerainty of both Egypt and Babylon (II Kings 25:13-17).

Rome's presence in the Syrian Levant in the second and first centuries B.C. meant that Palestine came under its jurisdiction and control for taxation purposes. In the NT, tribute is expected to be paid to Rome whether as head tax (Matt. 22:17, 19; Mark 12:13-17) or a tax levied on the land of the provinces (so Luke 23:2, which uses the term phoros in possible allusion to the Roman tributum soli, that is, land tax). Paul also recognized the duty of paying tribute to Rome (Rom. 13:6-7) in return for the benefits of the pax Romana of Roman civilization with the peace and security it maintained throughout the world in the Julio-Claudian period.

A religious tribute is mentioned in Matthew 17:24-25, namely the levy of the half-shekel Temple tax on all male adult Jews, whether living in Israel or the Dispersion. After the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the money thus raised was channeled by the Romans into a poll tax for the upkeep of the pagan temple of Jupiter Capitolinus in Rome (this is the fuscus iudaicus).
R.M.

TRINITY. Meaning literally "threeness," this term is used especially of the Christian doctrine that GOD is three persons in one substance, or one substance in three persons—three in one and one in three. Strictly speaking, the word "triunity" is preferable to the word "trinity," since "triunity" emphasizes the unity as much as it does the trinity. But even to say this is to show where the difficulty of the doctrine lies. How does one reconcile the paradox of unity and trinity? Why was it first considered necessary to get into the paradox? Theologians have oscillated between an emphasis on the unity of God, which leads into unitarianism and the virtual abandonment of the Trinity, or else they have so emphasized the distinctness of the three persons that they have moved toward tritheism, a belief in three Gods.

Origins and Levels of Meaning. Perhaps the origins of the doctrine of the triune God were simply linguistic, and at one level the formula may be regarded as the distinctively Christian name or designation of God. After all, "God" is not a specifically Christian word. Many gods have been worshiped in the course of human history, and Christians found it necessary to say which God they worshiped. We see this early problem very clearly expressed in a passage written by Paul, where he says: "Although there may be so-called gods in heaven or on earth—as indeed there are many 'gods' and many 'lords'—yet for us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things and for whom we exist, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things and through whom we exist" (I Cor. 8:5-6). Here is one of the earliest attempts to specify the Christian God and to distinguish that God from the many "gods" and "lords" worshiped in the pagan world.

Two points may be noted about this early statement by Paul. The first is the introduction of Jesus Christ. Christians believed that Christ had brought them a signal revelation of God, and so from then on one could not speak of God without reference to Christ, or of Christ without reference to God, even if there was still no developed CHRISTOLOGY and still less a doctrine of the triunity of God. The second point is that Paul mentions only the Father and the Son, without naming the Spirit. He distinguishes only two persons who are significant for understanding the object of Christian worship, so that this might seem to be an incipient "binitarianism," rather than a trinitarianism. It is indeed the case that the understanding of the Holy Spirit developed only later, so that in the early period one sometimes finds "binitarianism," but this is not a considered doctrine (as it would be in a modern writer who advanced it) but a stage on the way to trinitarianism.

The next level of understanding beyond the Trinity as linguistic convention is the so-called "economic" Trinity, that is to say, the recognition of a threefold action or function of God toward creatures. This reflects the Christian experience of God in salvation history. God has been known as the Father, the God of Israel who created heaven and earth and spoke to people by the prophets; God has been known in Jesus Christ, the Son, through whom, Christians believed, God had spoken and acted in a new and decisive way; God has been known also in the Holy Spirit, who, from the day of Pentecost onward, was guiding and inspiring the church (though here we have to notice that, to begin with, no clear distinction was made between the Holy Spirit and the risen Christ). But if God's self-revelation as given in the Judeo-Christian experience is true, then must not one proceed from the economic Trinity to what is called the "immanent" or "essential" Trinity, that is, the doctrine that not only has God been known in a threefold action but that God in God's self is three in one and one in three? Obviously this brings us into a much more speculative region, for how can we know God's self? Yet the very paradox of three in one and one in three may be thought to preserve the ultimate mystery and incomprehensibility of the divine being.

History of the Doctrine. The doctrine of the triune God is not found explicitly in the NT, but the raw materials, so to speak, are undoubtedly there, and the later formulations are legitimate developments from the NT sources. As we have noted already, there already appears in the NT an accidental or incidental binitarianism, through the close association of Christ with God. Here it should be noted that the word "God" (theos) is in the NT almost invariably applied to the Father of trinitarian terminology, to the God of Israel or the ultimate Source, though in a very few cases (John 1:1; 20:28; Heb. 1:8) Jesus Christ is called God. However, the close association between God and Christ in many passages, especially the greetings at the beginning and end of some of the Epistles, is indicative of how these early Christians were thinking. Even if this is "binitarian," the important point is that one has departed from undifferentiated monism in thinking of God, and the way is open to trinitarianism as the next stage, once the theology of the Holy Spirit has been developed. In a few cases the full trinitarian formula appears: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all" (II Cor. 13:14); "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 28:19)—though these words are unlikely to come from Jesus, and the earliest formula was probably baptism in the name of Jesus.

The development of trinitarian doctrine from the NT proceeds hand in hand with the development of Christology, and to a large extent the two doctrines share the same terminology. A high Christology inevitably encouraged a differentiated understanding of Godhead. In the earliest period, Jesus was often considered subordinate to God, but the tendency was more and more to declare him equal to the Father. At Nicaea (325) he was declared to be "of one substance" (HOMOIOUSIOS) with the Father, in opposition to the Arians, who maintained a form of subordinationism. Meanwhile, ATHANASIUS developed a theology of the Holy Spirit, so completing the Trinity.

In the West, theological thought began from the unity of the Godhead, conceived as one substance or being, and then differentiated the persons. Already in TERTULLIAN (about A.D. 200) we find the classic language of "substance" and "persons." But when the emphasis on the substantial unity was pushed to extremes, the persons might be reduced to mere temporary "modes" of the one God, or it might even be maintained that it was the one God (the Father) who was incarnate and suffered in the Son—the heresies of modalism and patripassianism respectively. The East, like the NT, began from the three persons, God (the Father), the Son or Logos, and the Spirit. Here the principle of unity was God the Father, the origin of all. God is not derived from anything other than God's self, God is "ingenerate" or "unbegotten." The Son, on the other hand, is "begotten" of the Father. The Spirit also derives from the Father, but is said to "proceed," a word used in

Traditional Symbols for the Trinity

John's Gospel. When pushed to extremes, this Eastern view could come close to a belief in three Gods. The difference is made clear by the different models or analogies used in West and East. In the West, Augustine illustrated the three-in-oneness of the Deity from the threefold unity of the human mind, for example, as memory, understanding, and will. In the East, Basil used the analogy of a society of three persons, Peter, James, and John. The continuing difference between East and West over the question of whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone or from the Father and the Son (FILIOQUE) reflects these deeper theological differences.

Non-Christian Trinities. It is interesting to note that in many non-Christian religions one finds views of God that have some analogy to trinitarianism. The mystical philosopher PLOTINUS (about A.D. 250) visualized a divine Triad, consisting of the ineffable One who is the Source of all, the Mind or Logos, and the Psyche or World-soul, which indwells the entire universe. Although these three were hierarchically arranged, each being lower than the one above it from which it "emanated" or proceeded, there is at least a remote resemblance to the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. In Indian religion, the three Gods, Brahma the creator, Vishnu the preserver, and Shiva, often called the "destroyer" but performing many other functions, form together the Trimurti or "Three Powers," and each may be also represented as threefold in itself. The older theologians saw in such phenomena vestigia trinitatis or traces of the Trinity, and believed that they go back to some primeval revelation, vaguely remembered in all religions. Few would take that view nowadays, but the fact that trinitarian views of God are widespread perhaps indicates that some such understanding of God belongs to NATURAL THEOLOGY and is not only part of the Christian revelation. If that is so, then all serious reflection about God leads in a trinitarian direction. In spite of his insistence on the specifically Christian revelation, Barth seems to lend tacit support to the view expressed here, for he holds that the doctrine of the triune God follows immediately from any revelation on the ground that revelation itself has a threefold structure—revealer, revealed, and revealedness. TRINITY SUNDAY. The Festival of the Holy Trinity or the Octave of Whitsunday (that is, the Sunday after Pentecost), a late developing festival of the Christian liturgical year. The church in Gaul founded that day as a festival in honor of the Holy Trinity in the tenth century A.D. It was approved by the pope only in A.D. 1334. There is no such festival in the Orthodox churches. J.C.

TRISAGION. From the Greek words tris and hagion meaning "thrice holy." A prayer that forms part of the liturgy of the catechumens in the Orthodox churches. Its text is: "Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us." Sometimes the liturgical refrain, "Holy, Holy, Holy" (the Sanctus) of the old Lutheran Communion service is incorrectly called the Trisagion. J.C.

TROAS. A seaport and standard port of call of northwest Asia Minor near the site of ancient Troy. It revolted against the Roman Empire in the second century B.C. and for a time was ruled by Syria. At Troas, Paul had a vision of a man calling him to preach in Macedonia. Paul visited and preached at Troas a number of times (Acts 20:6). T.J.K.

TROELTSCH, ERNEST (1865–1923). German Protestant theologian also noted as a social philosopher active at the turn of the century. Born on February 17 at Augsburg, he died on February 1. Troeltsch's higher education was at Erlangen and Göttingen. He taught systematic theology at Bonn (1892-94), systematics and the philosophy of religion at Heidelberg (1894-1914), and philosophy of religion and philosophy in Berlin (1914-19). He was a Prussian government official for church and educational affairs from 1919 to 1921.

Troeltsch was a forerunner in the developing field of the philosophy of religion. He was deeply interested in the history of religions (religionsgeschichte Schule). A major influence on him was ALBRECHT RITSCHL. Ritschl and Troeltsch are often mentioned together as the highest development of German Protestant liberalism. Troeltsch rejected supernatural revelation and understood Christianity as a historically developing phenomenon. He saw the church as involved in a social evolution that forces the institution to adjust itself again and again to the new social environment it finds itself part of. The core of Christianity is the pious Jesus exhibits in the Gospels, Troeltsch felt. He believed that all religion grew, not out of revelation, but out of inner feelings. J.C.

TRUEBLOOD, DAVID ELTON (1900– ). American QUAKER theologian, educator, and author. Born on December 12, in Pleasantville, Iowa, to devout Quaker parents, Elton was reared on a family farm. He attended William Penn College in Oskaloosa. Both studious and involved in extracurricular activities, Trueblood played varsity football, edited the yearbook, and was a member of the debating team. Majoring in history, he was graduated in 1922 with a B.A. degree. Subsequently Trueblood studied a year at Brown University and another at Hartford School of Theology, before entering Harvard Divinity School. After his graduation he was appointed assistant professor of philosophy and dean of men at Guilford College in North Carolina. He completed work on a Ph.D. degree at Johns Hopkins University in 1934. For three years he served as assistant professor of philosophy at Haverford College in the suburbs of Philadelphia. From 1936 to 1945 he was professor of philosophy at Stanford University, and for a year he was on the faculty of Garrett Biblical Institute in Illinois.

It was in 1946 that Trueblood began his long career at Earlham College, a Quaker school in Richmond, Indiana. Trueblood's first book was The Essence of Spiritual Religion which was followed by a number of others. He interrupted his long career at Earlham for the better part of two years, starting in 1954, when he served as chief of religious policy for an information agency. In 1956 Trueblood founded the Earlham School of Religion. He also was president of the Yokefellow Association, which he had started.

TRUST. See FAITH.

TRUTH. This word has different meanings in different kinds of discourse. The truth of a mathematical proposition and that of an empirical proposition are obvious examples of different kinds of truth. Similarly, there are different criteria for testing different truths. In the case of what claims to be a mathematical truth, we check whether it is deducible from the fundamental axioms of the mathematical system in which it appears. In the case of an empirical proposition, there are many possible procedures, some very simple, some highly complex. If someone asserts, "It is raining," the matter can be simply settled by looking out of the window. If it is claimed that Julius Caesar was assassinated on the ides of March, this calls for much more complicated procedures. Perhaps we could say in every case, however, that a proposition is true if it shows us things as they really are.

Religious and theological statements claim to be true. Here the first move is to ascertain the meaning of what is being asserted, for religious language is frequently symbolic or even mythological. It may look like empirical assertion, but may be quite different, so that the first task in any assessment is a hermeneutical one. Suppose someone asks, "Is it true that Jesus rose from the dead?" This looks at first sight as if it referred to an event of past history, like Caesar's assassination, but from Paul onward many Christian theologians have not regarded the Resurrection as the empirical matter of the raising of a corpse. In that case, it is up to them to say what resurrection does mean, and to indicate what considerations would be relevant to the truth or falsity of the claim that Jesus rose from the dead.

Let us take another example: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." This too looks like an assertion about the past. But what meaning is to be given to the phrase "in the beginning"? Or how is one to understand the verb "created," a strange metaphysical verb without parallels in ordinary experience? If the interpretation of religious assertions is the first step toward assessing their truth, the second must be the development of a religious EPISTEMOLOGY. This implies that the question of truth in religion or theology has to be put in the context of an entire PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

TÜBINGEN SCHOOL. A term used to refer to a school of Protestant historians and theologians and to a school of Catholic theologians, both attached to the University of Tübingen in Germany during the first half of the nineteenth century. The Protestant Tübingen School was founded by F. C. BAUR, who, influenced by HEGEL's dialectical view of history, insisted that theology be approached historically, both in terms of its development and by means of the historico-critical method. The school saw the early church as divided between Petrine (Jewish) and Pauline (Gentile) Christianity, which reached a synthesis in second-century Catholicism. This view was later discredited by the work of the Ritschlians, especially Adolf Harnack. The Catholic Tübingen School is associated with J. S. Drey and J. A. Möhler, who were influenced by German ROMANTICISM and IDEALISM. They emphasized religious experience and the evolution of tradition, stressing Catholicism's diversity within an organic unity. Their influence was felt in later liberal Catholicism.

TWELFTH NIGHT. The twelfth evening after Christmas, and the eve of Epiphany. According to the Julian calendar (before 1752), this day (twelfth day) was Christmas, and certain Christmas-related ancient customs still cling to it in many countries. In England, Christmas decorations are removed from the church and the home on the twelfth day. J.C.

TWELVE. In the OT and NT NUMBERS are often used symbolically or with hidden meanings. Some numbers were especially sacred or laden with symbolic significance. Among these were one, three, four, seven, ten, twelve, forty, seventy, and one thousand.

"Twelve" early took on importance in astrology and other occult arts among the Mesopotamian civilizations as the Sumarians divided the year into twelve months, based on the lunar cycle. Twelve functions symbolically in Genesis as the number of the sons of Jacob (Gen. 35:22), and consequently of the tribes of Israel (Num. 1). The tribes of Ishmael are also said to be twelve. In the NT, Jesus called twelve of his disciples to be apostles (Mark 3:14). An added note, from the Fourth Gospel, tells us there were twelve baskets of food left over after the miraculous feeding of the crowd (John 6:13). J.C.

TWELVE, THE. See APOSTLE.

TWO SWORDS. The doctrine of the two swords, in Roman Catholicism, signifies that God gave the church power to loose and bind on earth and in heaven (Matt. 16:13-20), thus giving Rome spiritual and temporal rule, which the church may delegate. Christianity gained legal toleration in 313 and became the only legal religion in the Roman Empire in 380. By 416 only Christians could serve in the Roman army. During this period Rome began asserting primacy over both swords. Pope Leo I (440-461) manifested the theory against the invading Huns and Vandals, and Pope Gelasius I (492-496) boldly claimed priestly power is above kingly power, setting the stage for the struggle between church and state through the Middle Ages. The greatest manifestations of the theory came during the pontificates of Gregory VII and Innocent III. Modern nationalism has made the theory virtually impossible to implement, but Roman Catholicism has not officially abandoned it. (See also SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.) C.M.

TYCHICUS. A Greek name meaning "fortunate." A native of the Roman province of Asia and a traveling companion of Paul on the journey to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). Tychicus traveled to Troas from Greece in advance of Paul to prepare the way. Together with Onesimus, he is the bearer of the Letter to the Colossians. He later served at Ephesus after being diverted from Crete (Tit. 3:12). T.J.K.

TYNDALE, WILLIAM (about 1494-1536). English Reformer and Bible translator. Born between 1490 and 1495 in England near the Welsh border, Tyndale was educated at both Oxford and Cambridge. At the latter university he became interested in reading the Greek NT. Finding both clergy and laity ignorant of the Scriptures, he set out to translate the NT into English. Failing to enlist the help of the bishop of London, Tyndale went to Wittenberg, Germany, where he met Martin Luther. Driven from Cologne, when his translation was partly printed, he published his first edition in Worms in 1525. This was widely distributed in England before the authorities discovered it and burned it. In 1534 Tyndale printed a revised version of the NT in a style said to have formed the basis of the KING JAMES VERSION. Betrayed by one he regarded as a friend, Tyndale was imprisoned at Vilvorde, near Brussels, where he had translated the first five books of the OT. He was tried, condemned, and on October 6 was burned at the stake. R.H.

TYPOLOGY. A comparison of events or persons in an earlier portion of Scripture to a later portion, for example, of an OT event to an NT event, or even to something in the Christian church. Thus typology sees types as moving across the scale of time, and is an effort to understand later revelation or acts of God historically, and to see foreshadowings or predictions of such events as the Incarnation of Christ, the Crucifixion, and Resurrection, in the OT.

Generally, typology is distinguished from ALLEGORY, which makes no historical claims but uses earlier events or persons as signs of eternal, philosophical truths. Typology is considered basic to the internal consistency and unity of the OT and NT, as one Bible, while allegory, though present in both testaments, is not. This neat distinction is not fully accepted by biblical scholars today, however, because of the contemporary insights of literary criticism, including rhetorical criticism, into the biblical materials.

Types are ideals, in the traditional form of biblical exegesis followed by rabbis in Judaism, as well as by Roman Catholics and Protestants. Paul used typology in comparing the ideal person of Adam to the ideal person of Christ, and drew an analogy between Adam's sin and Christ's redemption. (Rom. 5:12-21). J.C.

TYRANNUS. Tyrannus is mentioned only in Acts 19:9. On first coming to Ephesus, Paul taught for three months at the synagogue, but when opposed, "he withdrew . . . taking the disciples with him, and argued daily in the hall of Tyrannus." Tyrannus may have been a Jewish scribe, a Greek teacher of rhetoric or philosophy, or even someone long dead, whose name was still associated with the school or the building where Paul taught. TYRE. An important city in Phoenicia, bordering on the shores of Israel. Tyre, meaning "rock," lies about halfway up the coast of the Mediterranean Sea between Carmel and Beirut. Originally the city lay on the mainland, and even there it was protected by rugged promontories, known in history as the Ladder of Tyre. Later the city was rebuilt on an island just off shore. The historian Herodotus dates its age from about 3000 B.C., and Josephus from about 1200 B.C. Isaiah 23:7 describes Tyre as an "exultant city whose origin is from days of old."

Tyre is frequently mentioned in the Bible and in the Tell el-Amarna letters. King HIRAM of Tyre had dealings with David and provided Solomon with architects and materials to build the Temple in Jerusalem. At home he built the new city on the island and rebuilt the old one on the mainland. He constructed fabulous new harbors and breakwaters that were the envy of the ancient world, connecting two harbors with a canal. He traded for grain in the Crimea, mined gold and lead in Spain, copper in Cyprus, and tin in Cornwall, and established colonies in North Africa, Sicily, and Crete. His traders appear to have sailed around Africa and ventured out into the Atlantic. During the wars with Assyria, Tyre was able to buy off the invaders several times by paying tribute money. When Alexander the Great laid siege to the city, Tyre resisted. He built a causeway two hundred feet wide between the mainland and the island, and after the conquest, slaughtered, crucified, or sold into slavery all the survivors.

TYRRELL, GEORGE. (1861–1909). The leading representative of Catholic Modernism in the British Isles. Originally an Anglican, he became a Jesuit priest in 1891, and declared his aim to be the synthesis of the truth of religion with the truth of Modernity. He believed that the principal source of theology is the evolving experience of Christians, and that the test of its truth is the pragmatic one of whether it fosters moral and spiritual development. He was expelled from the Jesuits and virtually excommunicated in 1907. He continued to regard himself as a Catholic but also continued to be a severe critic of the church, especially of the efforts then being made by Cardinal Mercier to revive Scholastic philosophy. At his death, he was refused a Catholic burial.

UGARIT. An important seaport of the Canaanite period, about seven miles north of Latakia (in Syria), the biblical Laodicea. The city lay half a mile from the sea on a navigable river. The tell from which the ruins rise is about seventy feet above the landscape. Another name for Ugarit is Ras Shamra, "the hill of the fennel plants." The tablets and writings found at Ras Shamra probably shed more light on the CANAANITE culture in which the people of Israel found themselves at the time of the conquest than any other site in the history of archaeology.

Ugarit was an active city from about 5000 B.C. to about 120 B.C., when it was destroyed by the sea peoples. The gold bowls found there are among the finest samples of the goldsmith's art anywhere in the ancient world. An ivory trumpet two feet long was made from a single tusk, and other pieces of ivory found there are large and impressive, both in the intricate Egyptian-style carvings and in basic design. Scores of bronze tools and weapons have been found, often in a single workshop or warehouse, many with cuneiform inscriptions. The collection of pottery from Ugarit demonstrates the importance of the city from a standpoint of trade, and most of the pieces are of the highest workmanship. One caravan route led along the coast from Asia Minor to Egypt, and another toward the east to Mari and Babylon. Copper articles from Crete were common, but Ugarit itself seems to have been a center for the making of tools and weapons from bronze.

The buildings are no less impressive than the artifacts. Even the graves were much more sophisticated than those in other parts of the world, king-size tombs of cut stone, in the style of Crete and Mycenae. The huge temple dedicated to Baal had much the same design as Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem. The main palace had sixty-seven rooms, in a building considerably bigger than a football field. This contained living quarters for the high priest and a huge collection of cuneiform tablets. Apparently it also served as a library and a writing school for scribes. Of the three largest buildings, roughly of the same size, two were temples to Baal and Dagon. The images of the gods appeared to have been kept in an inner room, a "holy of holies," even as Jehovah held such a spot in Jerusalem.

What makes Ras Shamra more remarkable than any other Canaanite site are the thousands and thousands of tablets found there. Some were in languages or forms of writing that had not previously been known—Hurrian, Hittite, Sumerian, Akkadian, Egyptian, Cretan-Minoan, and Ugaritic. The Akkadian ones alone number well into the thousands. These are in part history, in part business records, in part private letters, and very largely religious, mythological, and cultural. They describe the whole pattern of Canaanite gods and their relationships, as complex a hierarchy as what we know of the Greek gods and goddesses of Mt. Olympus. Many of the references shed significant light on obscure passages of the OT, previously not well understood, such as the one about cooking a kid in its mother's milk. Some are interesting for their cultural values, in the style of Poor Richard's Almanac, such as "Don't tell your wife where you keep your wallet."

The tablets give a very lively picture of the involvement of Baal and Anath in the doings of human beings. The king of the gods is El, the father of all. Often he is depicted as a bull. Here we also meet Baal, the son of Dagon, and the Prince of the Sea. The count of the gods and goddesses numbered well into the hundreds, each with individual functions and cults. In fact, the collection of tablets found at Ras Shamra since 1929 will keep scholars, linguists, and students of Near Eastern religion busy for many generations, and we are fortunate to have so many parallel insights into the world of the OT.

ULAMA. The Arabic word plural of 'ālim, meaning "an authority, a scholar." A collective term for the religious scholars of Islam who, having received a traditional education in Arabic, the Qur'an, the Hadith, and Islamic law, constitute an elite group competent to teach religion and interpret it authoritatively. Their role, combining that of the preacher, the professor, and the lawyer in other traditions, is a recognized one throughout Islam. Serving as theologians, judges, and officials in traditional Muslim states, members of the ulama have wielded great power. For this reason states have at various times sought the support of the ulama or to control or limit its power. In particular, modernizers within the Islamic world in recent centuries have often found themselves at odds with the usually highly conservative ulama, a conflict that lay behind the Iranian revolution of 1979.

ULTIMATE CONCERN. A term used by PAUL TILlich to describe the existential basis and object of religion and the criteria for any authentic theology. For Tillich, religion is the depth dimension in all human cultural and spiritual life. By the metaphor "depth" Tillich means that the religious dimension of life points to what is ultimate and unconditional in a person's life—that which both gives meaning to that life and sustains its being. Hence a person's ultimate concern is that person's religion. Such a concern can manifest itself in any aspect of life—in the moralist's unconditional demand of conscience or in the scientist's passionate, unflinching search for truth. According to Tillich, only those propositions that deal with their object insofar as it can become a matter of ultimate concern for us are theological. It is obvious, however, that often the object of ultimate concern is not truly ultimate. A genuine ultimate concern must have the power to determine our being or nonbeing. That is, it must actually possess saving power. J.L.

ULTRAMONTANISM. Meaning "beyond the mountains"; a catchword symbol for belief in the absolute supremacy of the papacy over all clerical and civil matters throughout the world. Although Ultramontanism has rootage in the ancient claims of the papacy to primacy in church and state, seen especially in the pontificates of Leo I, Gregory VII, Innocent III, and Boniface VIII, it reached a pinnacle and is commonly associated with Pius IX's (1846-78) rejection of modernism. Historically it was a nineteenth-century reaction to the French Revolution, which outlawed traditional Catholicism and instituted the worship of reason. Ultramontane papal superiority over church and state was preeminently affirmed by Pius IX's Inmaculate Conception of Mary (1854) and Syllabus of Errors (1864), a sweeping rejection of progress and liberalism; by Vatican I's (1870) dogmatism of papal infallibility; by Pius X's (1903-14) condemnation of modernism in Lamentabili and Pascendi (1907); and excommunication of Alfred Loisy and George Tyrrell for biblical liberalism. C.M.

UMMA. The entire community of ISLAM, the ideal unity of all Muslims, regardless of the religious and political factors that divide them. This concept derives from the position of Muhammad as the Prophet around whom the community centered. Today most Muslims are non-Arabs, live outside the Middle East, speak a great variety of languages, differ widely from one another in culture, and live under a wide range of political systems. Yet the ideal of an all-embracing community persists. It is strongest when Islam faces threats to its traditional values and standards of conduct. K.C.

UNAM SANCTUM. See INNOCENT III.

UNBELIEF. See ATHEISM.

UNCLEAN. See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

UNCTION OF THE SICK. The sacramental anointing with oil of the sick. In the Roman Catholic Church, such anointing is counted as one of the seven sacraments. It was formerly called extreme unction because it was given only at the approach of death, but since Vatican II the adjective "extreme" has been dropped, and the anointing is now regarded not as a preparation for death but as part of the church's ministry of HEALING. There are similar practices in the Anglican and Eastern Orthodox churches. The oil used is consecrated each year by the bishop on Maundy Thursday and then distributed to the parishes of the diocese. The anointing is often accompanied by LAYING ON OF HANDS and a PRAYER for the recovery of the sick person.

The practice is very ancient in the Christian church. The disciples of Jesus "anointed with oil many that were sick and healed them" (Mark 6:13), while the apostle James advises the sick person to "call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord" (Jas. 5:14). The rite is to be understood within the larger concept of the church's ministry of healing, itself closely connected in the NT with the forgiveness of sins. The renewed interest in recent years in the ministry of healing, which goes with the modern understanding of the human being as a psychosomatic unity, has led to a corresponding renewal of interest in the sacrament of unction. J.M.

UNDERHILL, EVELYN (1875-1941). Writer, lecturer, spiritual director, and mystic who encouraged the rediscovery of Christian MYSTICISM. Her Mysticism (1911) is still the definitive treatment. Born December 6, the only child of Lucy Ironmonger and Sir Arthur Underhill, she was not reared in a religious home. She studied at King's College, London, where she later was made a Fellow (1927). Her father was a Deist, a lawyer, and a yachtsman, as was Hubert Stuart Moore, whom she married in 1907. Confirmed in the Church of England in 1891, she was deeply attracted to Roman Catholicism. However, her spiritual director, BARON FRIEDRICH VON HÜGEL, whom she met in 1911, advised her against changing. Under his influence she became increasingly Christocentric and devoted to the sacraments. From 1924 she conducted frequent retreats at Pleshey and served as spiritual director to many, including her devoted friend and literary executor Lucy Menzies. She died on June 15, and is buried at St. John's, Hampstead. Her writings include Practical Mysticism (1915), The Essentials of Mysticism (1920), and Worship (1938). N.H.

UNFORGIVABLE SIN. Resistance to the Holy Spirit, so that God's offered forgiveness cannot be received, hence the sin of sins, making pardon impossible. This concept is based on Scripture, both OT and NT, but is not expressly stated in the Bible. It is, above all, BLASPHEMY and a SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT, that is, on God, as God communicates grace to people. In Matthew 12:24-32, Jesus condemned the action of certain Pharisees who accused him of casting out demons by use of the power of the chief of demons, Beelzebub, rather than acknowledging that God's cleansing power was working through Jesus to overcome Satan and his demons. The unforgivable sin, then, is to call evil good, and good evil, along with rejecting God's offer of forgiveness.

In the OT, the concept is far different, although there, also, the rejection of God is the basic idea. In Numbers 15:30, doom is pronounced on the person who willfully rejects God's law. Such a wicked person is separated from Yahweh's grace, and so lost forever. The unpardonable sin is more popularly known as the unforgivable sin. J.C.

UNIATE CHURCHES. A general term to identify various churches connected historically with the Eastern rite that have separated from the parent body and are now in communion with the Roman Catholic church. Many of them in early times accepted the teachings of Eutyches and Nestorius and were cut off from Christendom for over five hundred years by the Muslims. While under the authority of Rome, Uniate churches generally have kept some distinctive practices: married clergy, leavened bread, both bread and wine in Communion, Greek or other languages in the liturgy, and baptism by immersion. The variations, not necessarily the same for all, reflect agreements made with Rome when the unions took place, from as early as 1182 to modern times. Among the most important groups of Uniate churches are the Maronites; Armenians; Ruthenian Ukrainians, Hungarians, Podcarpathians, and Yugoslavs; Copts; Ethiopians; Melkites; and some Bulgars, Albanians, and St. Thomas Christians. A few have rescinded their unions. C.M.

UNIFICATION CHURCH. The worldwide movement founded by the Reverend Sun Myung Moon in Korea in 1954 as the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity (HSAUWC), whose members are known informally as "Moonies." In the United States the movement is officially known as the Unification Church of America, and its president is Dr. Mose Durst. There are also Unification churches in Korea, Japan, a number of European countries, Canada, South America, and Africa. The Unification Church (U.C.) is much in the news due to charges by many parents of youthful members that their sons and daughters were "brainwashed" or recruited by forms of mind control; a number of kidnappings of members who were then "deprogrammed" or—it is claimed—freed of mind control; and the conviction and imprisonment of Rev. Moon by United States courts for income tax evasion.

The U.C. began, according to Unificationist accounts, when Rev. Moon, a Presbyterian minister in North Korea, was imprisoned by Communist authorities in the late 1940s because of his successful religious work. Opponents claim that Moon was actually imprisoned for adultery. Moon was a prisoner in a forced labor camp near Hung Nam, North Korea, in October 1950, when the United Nations forces landed at nearby Wonsan and overran the camp. Moon then fled south to Pusan in South Korea and built a small chapel in Seoul and founded the HSAUWC. After a few years, the movement spread to Japan and prospered. Somewhat later, missionaries (among them, Mrs. Durst) carried the movement to the United States.

Starting in California, the U.C. grew by conversions on college campuses and in places frequented by questioning youth. It spread across the country both by evangelism and by way of Rev. Moon's "I Love America" crusades in dozens of United States cities. Disillusioned youth, tired of the radicalism of the 1960s and the anti-Americanism of the anti-Vietnam war movement, found Moon's blend of Christian fundamentalism, Asian cultural religion, fervent patriotism, and anti-Communism very attractive. Some 35,000 young Americans had committed themselves to Moon by the 1980s. J.C.

UNION OF AMERICAN HEBREW CONGREGATIONS (UAHC). The network of and major leadership service organization for about 750 Reform Jewish congregations in the Western hemisphere. The life ambition of Rabbi ISAAC MAYER WISE was to establish a seminary to train American Jewish youth for service as American rabbis. On July 8, 1873, he gained his first major objective when the UAHC was organized in Cincinnati, Ohio, at a conference of congregational representatives. The constitution of the newly established Union declared "it is the primary object . . . to establish a Hebrew Theological Institute." Two years later Hebrew Union College was opened. Other provisions of that constitution were "to encourage and aid the organization and development of Jewish congregations; to promote Jewish education and enrich and intensify Jewish life . . . and to foster other activities for the perpetuation and advancement of Judaism." Originally "unalterably opposed to political ZIONISM," the UAHC in 1942 underwent an ideological transformation. It is headquartered in the House of Living Judaism in New York City. L.K.

UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION. A liberal Protestant denomination formed in 1961 by the merger of the American Unitarian Association and the Universalist Church of America. Arising in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, both groups shared common concerns and a common history. In 1953 the two groups had formed the Council of Liberal Churches. The merged group is characterized by Congregational polity, creedlessness, commitment to social and ethical issues, love for freedom of religious belief, a quest for truth, belief in human dignity, a humanistic Christology, acceptance of religious humanists and agnostics as well as theists into fellowship, and a desire for an ecumenical, interfaith community.

Most members of the association have come to it from other denominations. In 1983, there were 935 churches, with 131,844 members. The association belongs to the International Association for Liberal Christianity and Religious Freedom. Its lack of a creed precludes membership in the National Council of Churches or the World Council of Churches.

UNITAS FRATRUM. See MORAVIAN BRETHERN.

UNITED BIBLE SOCIETIES. A world fellowship of sixty-four national Bible societies, founded in 1946, which coordinates the efforts of Bible societies in more than one hundred countries.

The first Bible society developed from the concerns of the Pietist movement in Germany when the Van Canstein Bible Society was formed. The modern movement was launched in 1804, when the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) was organized in London. Shortly after, the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY was formed in 1816 in New York City. Then came the Russian Bible Society in 1819. The BFBS grew rapidly and by the end of the nineteenth century had developed a worldwide network of Bible distribution. Likewise, the ABS grew at an equal pace. This resulted in duplication of effort in many areas.

In the early decades of the twentieth century, leaders of the two major Bible societies recognized that there was need for greater coordination of their efforts. Joint agencies were set up as a first step in solving the problem. But it was not until after World War II that the United Bible Societies organization was established at a conference of sixteen member societies at Haywards Heath, England. In 1947 Olivier Beguin was appointed as the first UBS secretary.

The UBS has functional subcommittees on translation, production, distribution and fund raising, and the World Service Budget. Specialized consultants work at the World Service centers in New York and London and others in four regional centers: Africa's in Nairobi; Asia's in Singapore; America's in Mexico City; and Europe's in Basserdorf, Switzerland. The UBS headquarters is now located in Stuttgart, Germany.

The UBS organizes training institutes and publishes technical helps for translators, seeks means of achieving the most economical means of producing Bibles, stimulates new methods of Bible distribution, and aids millions of new literates in Bible reading. The UBS Council meets at least once every ten years. Its general committee meets every three years and supervises the executive committee, which meets at least once a year. Through the World Service Budget pooled funds are appropriated for the worldwide program of UBS.

UNITED BRETHERN IN CHRIST. A denomination formed in 1800 by Philip William Otterbein (1726–1813), who had been a German Reformed minister, and Martin Boehm (1725–1812), of Swiss Mennonite ancestry.

Boehm had served a Mennonite congregation in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, but he lost favor with the Mennonites when he conducted revival meetings in English. He continued to preach, and in 1768 he met Otterbein at an evangelistic service near Lancaster. After the meeting, Otterbein embraced Boehm and declared: "We are brethren."

Otterbein, who earlier had been called to serve as minister of a German Reformed congregation in Lancaster, struggled to find a more vital experience of his faith. When this occurred, he began to preach with greater power. He stressed the need for his converts to experience a new birth. Like Boehm, Otterbein worked cooperatively with ministers of other denominations. He participated in the consecration of Francis Asbury as a bishop in the newly formed Methodist Episcopal church.

In this framework Boehm and Otterbein, both of whom had moved to a pietistic and revivalistic stance, formed their new Methodist-type denomination, which was evangelical, Arminian, and perfectionist in doctrine. They became the first two bishops of the United Brethren church. Otterbein nevertheless served as minister of the German Evangelical Reformed church in Baltimore from 1774 until his death.

Two parties developed in the United Brethren—one held closely to the original constitution, and another sought to revise it to meet what they considered were changed conditions. When a new constitution was adopted in 1889, the minority group separated and became the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution). In 1946 the parent body joined with the Evangelical church, another German-speaking Arminian pietistic group that had been formed in 1807 by Jacob Albright (1759–1808), a former Lutheran turned Methodist. The resulting Evangelical United Brethren church merged with the Methodist church in 1968 to form The United Methodist church.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA. A Protestant church formed by the merger of the Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches in the Dominion of Canada, negotiated between 1908 and 1925. The United Church of Canada resulted from a deliberate effort to reverse the fragmentation of the Protestant church into smaller and smaller sects. Each one of the churches that initiated the United Church was also itself the product of mergers.

A Basis of Union was established by 1908, giving the polity and doctrine of the proposed new church. About three thousand local unions of congregations took place before the formal merger in June 1925. Since 1925, several other Protestant churches have joined the merger. The Evangelical United Brethren are the last group to join.

Doctrinally, the Bible is declared to be supreme authority but tradition is also acknowledged, especially the ancient creeds and the confessions of the Reformed churches. A careful balance has been achieved between the Calvinism of the Presbyterians and the Arminianism of the Methodists. Those seeking ordination are asked to be only in essential agreement with the church's doctrine. There are two sacraments, baptism—generally infant baptism—and the Lord's Supper, which is celebrated a minimum of four times a year. Worship is ordered by the Book of Common Order, adopted by the UCC in 1932. A common Protestant emphasis upon Bible reading and preaching is observed. The UCC is a leader in the struggle to remove sexism from church life. All church offices are open to women as well as men. The UCC is a member of the World Council of Churches, the World Methodist Council, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the International Congregational Council.

J.C.

UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (UCC). An American Protestant denomination formed June 25, 1957, and completed with the adoption of a constitution in July 1961. The UCC is a merger of the Congregational Church, the Christian Church, the Evangelical Synod, and the Reformed Church. The Congregationalists and the Christians merged in 1931 and the Evangelical Synod and Reformed Church merged in 1934. Total membership of the UCC in 1985 was 1,701,513 in 6,427 churches.

The UCC seeks to express more fully the oneness in Christ of the churches composing it, to make more effective their common witness to Jesus and to serve his kingdom in the world. The UCC has a statement of faith, adopted at Oberlin, Ohio, in July 1959, but it is a testimony rather than a test of faith. The doctrines and theological positions of the four churches now within the UCC remain established. It stands as a tribute to the faith, charity, and understanding of the merged churches.

The UCC is an unusual union of congregational local church government and presbyterian polity in larger church, district, and synod matters. The UCC is mainstream Protestant in overall theology, although it generally leans toward the more liberal side of the centrist position. It affirms the responsibility of the church to make the historic faith of Christianity its own in every generation. It recognizes two sacraments—baptism (usually of infants) and the Lord's Supper. The UCC is committed to ecumenicity. It belongs to the National Council of Churches, the World Council of Churches, and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. At the present there is talk that it may be considering a merger with the Community churches and the Christian churches (Disciples of Christ).

UNITED STATES CATHOLIC CONFERENCE. The secretariat, or civil arm, of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. Since the NCCB is the highest ecclesiastical authority of the Roman Catholic church in the United States, the USCC renders an important service in such areas as social justice and family life. Strategically located in its headquarters in Washington, D.C., the USCC conducts its work through seven major departments: education, legislation, immigration, social action, lay organizations, youth, and press. The USCC traces its origins to the National Catholic War Council, formed during World War I. In 1919 the War Council became the National Catholic Welfare Conference, which in turn was succeeded by the launching of the USCC on January 1, 1967.

UNITY. See ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT.

UNIVERSALISM. The doctrine that in the end all souls (human, angelic, and even demonic) will be saved by God's grace. Some NT scholars claim that this teaching is already found in Paul's belief that Christ "must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet" (I Cor. 15:25). It clearly emerges in some of the patristic writers, especially ORIGEN, who used the word apocatastasis (compare RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS). The term meant the return of the heavenly bodies to their original positions and was used by Origen to mean the return of all things to an original perfection. "We think," he wrote, "that indeed the goodness of God through his Christ may recall all his creatures to one end, even his enemies being conquered and subdued." Though universalism was rejected by Augustine and the Reformers, it has been revived by liberal theologians who have found the idea of eternal punishment repellent. Karl Barth too has taught a form of universalism, holding that the entire human race has been elected in Jesus Christ. A doctrine of universalism seems to accord very well with belief in a God of love. How could such a God rest until every soul had been saved? But there are difficulties about universalism. Salvation cannot be forced on people, so must there not always remain open the possibility that some people or angels will steadfastly refuse the divine grace? There is another serious objection: the Christian proclamation is good news or gospel only on the assumption that there is some peril from which it offers deliverance; but if it has already been decided that all will be saved, the gospel ceases to have any force. If there is nothing but salvation, then Christ offers us nothing that is not already assured to us, whatever we may do or believe. This is as fatalistic as the extreme forms of PREDESTINATION.

J.M.

UNIVERSALS. Those things that can be possessed by everyone, a cause with many effects, or a thought so broad that many people can grasp the idea. A universal can be an idea deduced by abstraction. Several philosophical schools define universals. The conceptualists accept mental constructs or ideas as universal. Nominalists view words as universals. Idealists view the ideal as universal. Realists accept only intellectual ideas as universals. Linguistic analysts assert that definition is a language issue; for that reason universals do not really exist. Existentialists are not interested in universals because such a theory obstructs for them the real need, which is to understand human existence.

The idea of a universal finds little place in a thought world where the emphasis is on inductive reasoning, finding particularity, or being aware of differences. When the emphasis is on variety and distinctiveness, the universal seems too abstract to be useful. In popular terms, however, the word is used to frame broad categories, although even within such categories there will be exceptions. I.C.

UNKNOWN GOD, ALTAR TO AN. In Acts 17:23, Luke's narrative of Paul's experiences in Athens says that he pointed to an altar on Mars Hill inscribed "To an unknown god." Paul then used this as a springboard to proclaim the true God, Yahweh, whom they did not know. Paul's sermon (considered a Lukan composition) also makes reference to two Stoic poets in terms that stress the fatherhood of God. The King James (Authorized) Version says "The Unknown God," but the Greek uses the indefinite article, so that the expression means not any one specific god but any of the many gods who inadvertently might have been overlooked. There is historical evidence that the Greeks did dedicate altars to anonymous gods. The biography of the philosopher Apollonius (written in the third century A.D.) speaks of the practice. The phrase "an unknown god" is used by the philosopher Hegel in his religious writings. J.C.

UNLEAVENED BREAD. Bread baked without leaven (hops or yeast) and associated with the Passover meal from the time of the Exodus according to the accounts in the Pentateuch. The term also applies to the week-long Feast of Unleavened Bread which formed the greater part of the Passover season.

One of three great traditional festival times among the Hebrews, PASSOVER, which commemorates the miraculous deliverance of the Hebrews from Egyptian slavery in the Exodus (about 1290 B.C.), is celebrated in the first month of the liturgical year, Nisan (March-April), on the fourteenth day of the month. This is followed on the fifteenth of Nisan by the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

Scholars believe that Passover was originally a nomadic or shepherders' festival held during the lambing season. Certainly there is some evidence that the Passover ritual is older than the time of Moses. The text of the Pentateuch explains the use of unleavened bread as the result of the haste in which the Hebrew slaves prepared the Passover as they were awaiting the imminent sign from Yahweh to escape from Egypt (Exod. 12:14-20; 13:6-10). The "leaven" was symbolic, also, of sin, and the casting out of the old leaven from Hebrew homes during this season represented the searching of one's soul for sins and repentance of them. J.C.

UNMOVED MOVER. See PRIME MOVER.

UNTOUCHABLES. This term was formerly used for those people in India considered outside the four major caste groups of HINDUISM, and therefore especially polluting to people of CASTE. They were referred to by Mohandas K. Gandhi as "Harijan," "children of God," an expression widely used, and are officially spoken of as "scheduled castes." Their social and economic position has generally been highly depressed. In the modern Republic of India both the term and the enforcement of restrictions on people because of "untouchable" background has been illegal, and the government has taken vigorous steps to improve their lot. However, discrimination persists, especially in rural areas. R.E.

UPANISHADS. From the Sanskrit phrase meaning literally "to sit down near to," meaning "instruction" such as a master would give privately to his closest disciples. Since the eighth century A.D. this term has referred to the latest section of the VEDIC scriptures of HINDUISM, a series of philosophical treatises that technically serve as commentaries on the earlier ritual-oriented texts. Despite many diversities of point of view, the major Upanishads present a reasonably consistent philosophical position which, together with the Brahma Sutras and the Bhagavad Gita, has been the basis of the VEDANTA philosophical Darshana, above all the Advaita Vedanta associated with Samkara. Although 108 Upanishads are counted in all, thirteen are considered most important; they were composed over about five hundred years, beginning around 400 B.C.

The basic theme of the Upanishads is BRAHMAN, the Universal, and its relation to Atman, the soul, spirit, or true self of the individual. The various texts tell us that Brahman pervades and is all things, taking many different forms like the flames of a fire. Thus Brahman and Atman are one; our true nature is none other than the divine Universal. This deep wisdom, the Upanishads insist, is not known through reason or study, but can only be acquired by a diligent student practicing meditation under the guidance of a sage who already has it. For the true self cannot be perceived objectively, any more than the eye can see itself, for it is itself the source of awareness. It can only be realized through inner experience.

Other themes of the Upanishads include the five "sheaths" that surround the Atman in the human being: joy, intellect, mind, vital energy, and physical form. Vedanta philosophers correlated these with the three states of consciousness also presented in the Upanishads: physical form with waking, the middle three with dream consciousness, and joy with deep sleep without dreams, when one is united with Brahman. The Upanishads also discuss reincarnation and the emergence of the world from Brahman, together with the idea that the phenomenal world is to be understood as MAYA. The most persistent notion of the Upanishads, however, is the supreme reality of Brahman and the realization of it as the supreme value of human life.

UPPER ROOM. In connection with Jesus' last meal in Jerusalem and the venue of the first Christians after the Resurrection, mention is made of a locale called the upper room (Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12; Acts 1:13). Palestinian dwellings were made with a room (usually large) set above street level to avoid the noise and heat of ground activity (II Kings 1:2, "upper chamber"; II Kings 4:10, a "small roof chamber," set for the prophet Elisha).

The place where Jesus gathered the disciples is sometimes equated with the home of Mary, mother of John Mark (Acts 12:12), but this cannot be shown (but see Acts 1:14 for the presence of women in the apostolic party). Other possibilities include the location of the upper room at the home of one of the disciples, "whom Jesus loved" (John 13:23); again a guess. Also uncertain is the present-day identification of the NT upper room of the Last Supper with the coenaculum, near the Benedictine monastery (the Dormition church) on Mount Zion in Old Jerusalem. Evidence points to this site as a medieval foundation (fourteenth century), though the tradition that here is located David's tomb is older, possibly reaching back on historical and archaeological grounds to Herod's time. But this is disputed. The one strand of evidence is that the historian Epiphanius in the fourth century refers to the emperor Hadrian's visit made in A.D. 135 to this building as to the "upper room." But no attempt was made to perpetuate this tradition.

UR. Also known as Uru, Uri, Urim, or Ur kasdim, "Ur of the Chaldees." Ur was an important Babylonian city on the lower Euphrates, from which ABRAHAM's family emigrated to HARAN. It lay about 150 miles from the head of the Persian Gulf in present-day Iraq. The city was occupied from about 4000 to 500 B.C. and reached the peak of its riches and influence about 2600 B.C. The phrase "Ur of the Chaldees" occurs four times in the OT. It gives rise to scholarly questions of priestly editing in the OT, since the word for Chaldees is not used elsewhere until the ninth century.

After seventy-five years of preliminary exploration, serious archaeology began at Ur in 1922, under Sir Leonard Woolley, for the British Museum and the University of Pennsylvania. Ur yielded valuable artifacts and texts from the life of the ancient Near East, especially in the age of the patriarchs. The excavations revealed harbors along the river, storehouses, private houses, palaces, a huge ziggurat or temple, and hundreds of valuable artifacts in gold, jewelry, and ivory. The base of the three-storied step pyramid, a ziggurat, was about the size of a football field. The walls were of dried brick, but faced with fired brick. From the uppermost courtyard rose a temple to the moon god Nanna, also known as Sin. A long, open stairway, not unlike some seen among the Inca and Aztec ruins, rose directly through the three levels of the ziggurat. A huge gate at the first level was later converted into a separate place of worship. Raised platforms probably at one time contained images of the moon god and his companion gods. A vast network of other rooms supported the temple complex—kitchens, workshops, storerooms.

Perhaps the most revealing discoveries at Ur relate to Sumerian burial customs of the period 2700 to 2500 B.C. For example, in the tomb of Shubad (not a queen but certainly a noblewoman) are buried seventy-four of her attendants. Apparently they followed her voluntarily into death, probably by taking poison. In this and other tombs were found fully outfitted soldiers, charioteers, musicians, grooms, dressers, courtiers, cooks. Evidence for the burial of living attendants has not been found elsewhere in the Middle East, but is born out by an ancient Sumerian poem, the Gilgamesh Epic.

The leading role of Ur in the Tigris-Euphrates Valley continued to decline gradually over the centuries, after its heyday in the time of the moon god. The major temples were partially restored by Nebuchadnezzar about 1700 B.C. and again by Cyrus the Great about 535 B.C. T.J.K.

URBI ET ORBI. Latin for "to the city and the world," a special papal blessing for Rome and the world given traditionally following the pope's election, but also on other celebrative occasions. Although usually bestowed from St. Peter's, it has also come from the balconies of other Roman basilicas. C.M.

URIAH. An officer in David's army of Hittite background who served loyally and well. Uriah or Urijah ("Yahweh is light") was a worshiper of Yahweh, as his name indicates. His professionalism and dedication to duty was outstanding. Granted leave by David, he refused the comforts of his own home while his comrades were still in the field (II Sam. 11 and 12). Uriah served in the wars with Syria and Ammon, but rather than honoring him, David shamed him and treacherously committed him to death because of David's overwhelming passion for Uriah's wife, BATHSHEBA.

David wished to cover his adultery with Bathsheba, which had left her pregnant, by bringing Uriah home on leave. Uriah's devotion to duty frustrated this plan, so David misused his power as commander in chief, ordering his officers to put Uriah in the most exposed front rank, in the battle at Rabbah-Ammon, then fall back so that Uriah would be killed. Nathan the prophet condemned David for this and foretold disasters that would afflict David's house because of this sin.

Others named Uriah (or Urijah) included a high priest in the monarchy of Ahaz of Judah; a prophet who predicted the destruction of Jerusalem and was tracked down and killed in Egypt (Jer. 26:20-23); and two priests during the times of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 8:33; Neh. 3:4; 8:4). J.C.

URIEL. The name of two men, and of an angel, in the OT and OT Apocrypha. In I Chronicles 6:24; 15:5, 11, Uriel, whose name means "my light is El," is a Levite who helped move the Ark of the Covenant from Obed-edom's home to Jerusalem. In II Chronicles 13:2, Uriel is a man from Gibeah, the grandfather of King Abijah of Judah. In II Esdras 4:1-11, Uriel is an angel. J.C.

URIM AND THUMMIM. Two objects of unspecified material that were used by Israel's priests as instruments of discovering the divine will. They were kept in the high priest's "breastpiece" (RSV) or "breastplate," in the case of Aaron, so that he could "bear the judgment of the people of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually" (Exod. 28:30). It is thought that each of these objects must have had a "yes" side and a "no" side. The inquirer (as Saul in I Sam. 28:6 and David in I Sam. 30:7-8) framed the question in a form so that it could be answered with a yes or no. The priest took or tossed out of the breastpiece Urim and Thummim. Two objects with yes showing would be an affirmative answer; two with no, a negative answer; one yes and one no would mean no answer (I Sam. 28:6). H. H. Rowley suggests that since "thummim" means "perfect things," it was the yes symbol, leaving Urim to be the no. The Pentateuch and records of the early monarchy show use of the Urim and Thummim. No further mention is made of this practice until the brief references in Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65). (See EPHOD.) P.L.G.

URSULINES. The oldest teaching order for women in the Roman Catholic church. The formal title of the order is the Company of Saint Ursula. It was founded by St. Angela Merici at Brescia, Italy, in 1535, for the purpose of reforming society through the education of girls. At first young women were to aid in accomplishing this goal while living in their own homes. In 1566, Archbishop Charles Borromeo revised the rules of the order to permit community life. By 1612 the Ursulines of Paris were raised to the status of a religious order with solemn vows and strict enclosure. The order spread to North America when Marie Guyard founded a convent at Quebec in 1639.

Today there are sixty-five autonomous communities in the world. In 1900 representatives of communities from various countries met in Rome to form the Roman Union, now the central governing body of the order. R.H.

USSHER, JAMES (1581-1656). Irish prelate, born at Dublin and educated at Trinity College in that city, where subsequently he was appointed professor of divinity and cathedral chancellor (1607). His ecclesiastical and theological position was that of Calvinism, which he sought to make a powerful influence in the Irish church. This is seen in his advocacy of the Lambeth Articles of 1595. Later, he became a bishop, then archbishop of Armagh. His visit to England in 1640 was destined to become a permanent stay and led to an absence from his native land. In the English Civil War (1642-49) he associated himself with the royalistic cause, but the protector Oliver Cromwell treated him well, granting him on his death a burial niche in Westminster Abbey.

His writings include a history of Western Christianity and various ecclesiastical treatises. But his fame was made by his drawing up a scheme of biblical chronology in which he concluded that the world was made in 4004 B.C. Allied with the KJV, this chronology became very popular until the rise of biblical criticism, though Ussher's name stands out as one who first attempted a chronological chart of the Bible's history. R.M.

UTILITARIANISM. The theory that arose during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries through the English philosophers Jeremy Bentham and John Stuart Mill. The theory of utilitarianism is that right action is one that brings the best possible consequences. No action is in itself morally right or wrong but becomes so when the consequences are known. The "best" consequence is one that brings the greatest happiness for the greatest number of people. This is based on the theory that people live on pleasure-pain motivation and that happiness is the balance of pleasure over pain. There is a utilitarianism of act, which looks for the consequences of each human act; and a utilitarianism of rule, which judges actions within principles. (It might be right, in general, to be truthful in order that people can trust one another, but in a specific situation a person might cause less pain or give more pleasure to another by a lie.) G. E. Moore, twentieth-century linguistic analyst, broadened the concept "happiness" to include love, knowledge, and beauty. Some have asked whether the elimination of suffering might be a more important consequence for action than that of striving after the achievement of happiness.

Utilitarianism has become a guiding principle in several areas of public life. In law it has affected the theory of punishment to focus its purpose on reform rather than retribution. The validity of a government is based on whether or not it promotes the general interest. Economists debate the relative balance of government or private enterprise on the basis of which better promotes the general welfare. Under this theory, there are no good actions to be praised and rewarded, but only good consequences that justify the action. In today's world, however, when the consequences of an action may not be known until many years later, the definition of a utilitarian act in advance is problematical. I.C.

UTOPIANISM. A view of an ideal or imagined world or society. The term was first used by Sir Thomas More in Utopia (1516; Eng. trans. 1551) and is derived from the Greek meaning "no place" but by a play on words is connected with "eutopia" meaning "good place." Descriptions of such a society where harmony reigns through beneficent institutions may be found in literary forms such as novel, story, poetry, and essay. It also appears in political theory, such as Plato's Republic. Philosophies of history, such as those of Hegel, Spencer, and Marx in the nineteenth century grow out of a theory of inevitable progress that envisions the possibility of a just society. Anthropological philosophies such as those of Marcuse or Arendt describe utopia in terms of the fulfillment of genuinely human values in individuals and societies. Finally there are utopias growing out of the prophecies of MILLENARIAN religious groups who predict a cataclysmic end to the world and of political revolutionaries who affirm that tearing down the old foundations is necessary to building new and better political and social structures.

Utopian theories arise partly as a critique of a present society and as an encouragement to reform. They are based on the belief that humans have the knowledge and power to change society. This implies a will to know and to do the good, the possibility of modifying human behavior, and some agreement on what constitutes a good social order. Utopian concepts also arise from an effort at moral clarity—defining an ideal—and from the impulse in a creative mind to think freely and imaginatively about the future. I.C.

UZZIAH. Also known as Azariah, meaning "Jehovah is my might," or "Jehovah is my strength." A king of Judah who ruled from about 783 to 742 B.C. He came to the throne at age sixteen and according to the biblical record ruled for fifty-two years. External evidence would prefer forty-two. Judah prospered mightily under his reign. Along the coast he conquered Philistia and exacted tolls from the camel caravans (II Chr. 26:6). He built his own fortresses after demolishing Gath, Jabneh, and Ashdod. To the southeast he overran Moab, Edom, and Petra, building the city of Elath and restoring the land to Judah (II Kings 14:22). At Jerusalem he raised stronger defense towers. He strung fortresses across the Negeb, apparently to control the trade routes from Arabia. His military skills included developing new weapons, probably catapults (II Chr. 26:8). He ordered new cisterns and water systems for irrigation. According to Chronicles, however, he depended too much on his own powers and forsook God. He entered the Temple "to burn incense on the altar of incense," a duty strictly reserved for priests (II Chr. 26:16-18). As a result he was stricken with leprosy. He moved to a "separate house," where he was isolated, and stepped aside from his role as ruler. Uzziah was probably more grandiose and successful than any other king except Solomon.

Of the two other Uzziahs mentioned in the OT, one was the father of Jonathan, one of David's stewards, and the other a priest from the tribe of Levite, a Kohathite. T.J.K.

VAIROCANA. From the Sanskrit word for "The Illuminator." In MAHAYANA BUDDHISM, the supreme cosmic Buddha. As Mahavairocana, "Great Illuminator," he is the personification of the primordial enlightened reality, the Adi-Buddha. In other instances, Vairocana is simply the first of the "self-born" Dhyani ("meditation") Buddhas, who personify transcendent aspects of nature and Buddha virtues. Vairocana is particularly important in the VAJRAYANA Buddhism of Tibet; he holds the central position in the MANDALA that underlies the well-known Bardo Thodol, or "Tibetan Book of the Dead."

VAISNAVISM. In HINDUISM, the worship of the deity VISHNU, or one of his avatars such as Rama and KRISHNA. A major form of modern Hinduism, Vaisnavism is textually based on the BHAGAVAD GITA and certain of the PURANAS, and represents a consummate expression of BHAKTI or devotionalism. More like the God of Christianity than his counterpart Shiva, in the other great theistic tradition of India, Vishnu is a benign deity who creates, upholds the moral order, comes into the world in human form whenever righteousness declines to combat evil, and is linked only to subordinate and highly decorous goddesses. In Vaisnava doctrine Vishnu, or Krishna, is bound to the devotee in an intense relation of love and grace; the fervent love of the worshiper for God calls forth a response in divine grace, which deepens it still more and burns away all karma. This enables the worshiper to escape the cycle of birth and death and live eternally in the heavenly presence of Vishnu.

Vaisnavism has inspired important philosophical work, such as that of the great theologian of bhakti, RAMANUJA; no less important is its rich treasure of devotional poetry, including that of the ALVARS and of such major writers as Tulsidas and Mira Bai. With its emphasis on deep subjective fervor, it is not surprising that it has also evoked a number of revival and sectarian movements, down to the HARE KRISHNA movement of today.

VAJRAYANA. From Sanskrit, "vehicle of the Vajra," the word "vajra" meaning both "diamond" and "thunderbolt." The Tantric form of BUDDHISM, Vajrayana is the form of the religion traditionally prevalent in Tibet, Mongolia, Nepal, and Bhutan, and has influenced Chinese and Japanese Buddhism, especially the Shingon denomination of Japan. Deriving from Mahayana, its philosophical, symbolic, and practical forms of expression are deep and complex. Grounded in belief in the power of mind to create its own reality, they center around mantras and evocations of Buddhas designed to awaken enlightenment, putting much stress on initiation and the master-disciple relationship. The MANDALA is central to the distinctive Vajrayana iconography, and such implements as the vajra, or ten-pronged wand, and the bell are common in its rites. R.E.

VALENTINIAN GNOSTICISM. See GNOSTICISM.

VALLA, LORENZO (about 1405–57). Italian Renaissance humanist, opponent of Scholasticism, often called the father of modern HISTORICAL CRITICISM, famed for demonstrating the falsity of the DONATION OF CONSTANTINE. Born in Rome, he received a thorough humanistic education, and was ordained a priest in 1431. That same year he wrote a dialogue, De voluptate, extolling sensual pleasure (published later). Critical of monastic vows and inferior Latin, he shared the humanists' ideal that pure language would lead to reform, expressed in De Elegantia Latinae Linguae. His Declamatio (1440) not only attacked the pope's temporal power but showed the falsity of documents in which Constantine purportedly gave the church Western Europe. As early as 1435 Valla, dissatisfied with contentions in Rome, took employment with King Alfonso V of Aragon, who shielded him in 1442 from the Inquisition. His Collatio Novi Testamenti (1444), published by Erasmus (1505), advanced historical criticism with a sharp comparison of the Vulgate Latin and Greek NTs. About 1447 Pope Nicholas V, a friend of humanists, invited Valla to Rome, where in 1450 he became professor of eloquence. However, his erudition and critical views aroused opposition and suspicion of heresy. Luther considered him an eminent Christian scholar. C.M.

VALUES CLARIFICATION. A movement made up of various techniques of teaching and content analysis in contemporary religious education, including Roman Catholic catechetics. Values clarification aims at understanding people's behavior, especially that of children, with an aim to understanding just what elements of moral education the person is capable of learning. Of course, the techniques of values clarification are applied to adults as well. A value is the relationship of the self as it relates to other people in the environment through the feelings, ideas, behavior and intellect of the individual, in such a way as to enhance that person's creative growth.

Values have to do with the priorities we maintain in our lives. Questions of values always have to do with the relationship of the self to other people, so they have to do with societal relations. The value process is one in which the self, in responding to the various environments in which it finds itself (people, things, institutions), selects its priorities and expresses them through the behavior, feelings, and ideas of the person in such a way as to creatively enhance that person's total development.

Values clarification always begins with the human experience, but for religious education it has a theological bias. Religious values clarification holds that "we believe in the sacredness of human life." Values clarification makes understandable the stance of the person to the environment. According to some catechists, it makes no difference whether the educator starts from human experience and moves to the Word of God, or starts with Scripture and doctrine and moves to human experience. Values clarification makes the human experience more receptive to the events in which God is revealed and is a way that enables the teacher to examine his or her own experience and the setting and the system at hand, so that the environment may be ordered and made sacred to the person. Religious instruction, then, consists of that environment, people, teachers, and educational system that permits students to make meaning and to order their priorities in such a way as to maximize their creative and spiritual development. Christian education, above all, seeks to promote spiritual growth and especially the person's relationship to God.

Values are clarified by an inductive growth process, that is, a give-and-take session in which people discover themselves, their attitudes, desires, relationships, hopes, and dreams. Students in such an open session learn to make choices and to take responsibility for their choices. They also learn to rank their values. Over time, the members of the session evolve into a community; it is hoped into a caring, Christian community. Values clarification is thus a learning process that searches into the reasons for our choices and commitments and explores the effects those choices have on ourselves and on others. Religious education further measures those choices and effects on the environment in terms of Scripture, doctrine, and Christian moral teaching. Catechists see a need for the theologian and the religious educator to continually engage in the process of values clarification, constantly confronting people with the presence of Christ in the world.

VAN DYKE, HENRY (1852–1933). United States Presbyterian minister, educator, diplomat, and author. Born in the Germantown section of Philadelphia, Van Dyke was educated at Princeton University and Princeton Theological Seminary. After his ordination, Van Dyke served as minister of Brick Presbyterian Church, New York (1883–99). He served as professor of English literature at Princeton University (1899–1913; 1919–23). He was U.S. minister to the Netherlands and Luxembourg from 1913 to 1916 and was chaplain (lieutenant commander) in the U.S. Navy from 1917 to 1919. He authored many books, including The Reality of Religion (1884), Little Rivers (1885), and The Story of the Other Wise Man (1896). Van Dyke wrote poetry, short stories, essays, and attained considerable reputation as a literary critic. He died on April 10 in Princeton, New Jersey. R.H.

VAN EYCK, HUBERT (or Huybrecht; about 1366–1426) and JAN (about 1390–1441). Flemish painters. The van Eyck brothers presumably were born in Maeseck (modern Maaseik), Belgium, on the Meuse River. Founders of the Flemish school of painting, the van Eycks were the reputed originators of a process of oil painting employing a drying varnish. They introduced a new realism into painting that had not been attained by earlier artists.

Facts about the gifted brothers are sketchy. Their famed Ghent altarpiece, a twelve-by-nineteen-foot work representing scenes from the Apocalypse, was created for the church of Saint Bavon in Ghent. The inscription: "Hubert van Eyck, the greatest painter who ever lived, began this work, which his brother Jan, the second in art, finished at the order of Jodocus Vyd." The masterpiece was completed in 1432. The center and largest panel of the altarpiece represents the Adoration of the Lamb. Hubert is considered by many experts to have been the painter of the Three Marys at the Sepulchre, now to be seen in the Van Beuningen Collection in Rotterdam.

Jan's life is documented from 1422. Painter and diplomat, he first served John, count of Holland, and Philip the Good of Burgundy. Jan was known for his scrupulous attention to detail. R.H.

VASHTI. The queen of Persia, wife of Xerxes I (or Ahasuerus), mentioned in the book of Esther (Esth. 1:9, 11, 12, 15-17; 2:1, 17). Vashti refused to come before Ahasuerus and show her beauty to the court, so she was demoted from her position. This led to Esther's becoming queen (Esth. 2:17). J.C.

VATICAN. The residence of the POPE, the head of the Roman Catholic Church, located in the city of the Vatican, an autonomous, independent, though tiny, state, which lies on Vatican hill, one of the seven hills of Rome.

The palace of the Vatican, is, in effect, the international headquarters of the Western or Roman Catholic Church. The pope's private living quarters are located here, and additionally, the palace contains the apartments of cardinals and other officials, staff, the secretary of state; a number of chapels, including the famous Sistine Chapel; the archives of the church; art galleries; five museums; a printer's establishment; and an astronomical observatory. This vast palace, with its gardens that go back to the time of Nero, plus the great plaza of St. Peter's Cathedral and St. Peter's itself, form the independent state of Vatican City. The pope once ruled over large territories in Italy (the papal states), which were absorbed into the unified Italian state in the nineteenth century. In 1929, the government of Mussolini negotiated the Lateran Treaty, which recognized the "extraterritoriality" or independence of the Vatican city-state. This "state" comprises an area of less than one square mile, with a population of some five hundred people. The ruler of the state is the pope and, during a papal vacancy, the college of cardinals. Also recognized as "extraterritorial" and under the complete control of the pope are the basilicas of St. John Lateran, St. Mary Major, St. Paul Outside the Walls; the churches of Sant' Andrea-della-Valle and San Carlo-ai-Catarine, plus the palaces of San Callisto and Castel Gandolfo.

In a figurative sense, the term "Vatican" stands for the pope or the official position of the Roman Catholic Church. It can even be used to symbolize the whole church itself. J.C.

VATICAN COUNCILS. Two widely important church-wide councils held by the Roman Catholic Church, in 1869–70 (and not completed) and in 1962–65 (under Pope John XXIII, with its completion under Pope Paul VI).

According to Roman Catholic reckoning, Vatican I was the twentieth ECUMENICAL COUNCIL. It opened December 8, 1869, and was adjourned in October 1870, when the Italian army captured Rome from papal forces. Some six hundred cardinals, bishops, and patriarchs attended, and a constitution on the Catholic faith was written. The third session dealt with the primacy of the pope; the fourth session declared it to be Christian doctrine that the pope is infallible when making pronouncements, as the successor to St. Peter and the head of the Catholic church, in matters of faith and morals. The vote on this doctrine was 433 for, 2 against: there were 55 in opposition who did not vote. Because of the political situation the council was able to do only a fraction of the work planned for it. The decree on papal infallibility resulted in the defection of 150,000 believers who became "Old Catholics." Actually, however, the popes have made little use of the power given, and only one doctrine has been so defined. Pope Pius XII pronounced the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary into heaven a dogma in 1950.

Vatican II was announced by Pope John XXIII in January 1959. Upon requests for agenda, twelve volumes of Catholic self-criticism were assembled. There were 2,540 bishops and superiors of religious orders in attendance at the opening session on October 11, 1962, making it one of the largest councils in church history, including forty observers from the Orthodox and Protestant churches. The first session debated five major issues: the liturgy, sources of revelation, the communications media, church unity, and the nature and structure of the church. The council recessed on December 8, 1962, until September 1963. Tragically, John XXIII died on June 3, 1963, before the second session could begin. But the newly elected and more conservative Pope PAUL VI reconvened the council. It opened again on September 29. Paul VI announced himself as a firm supporter of the renewing, reforming work of the council begun by Pope John. The second session was more open than the first and ran smoother, completing its work on December 4, 1963. Decrees on the liturgy and on the communications media were promulgated by session two.

The third session opened September 14, 1964, with even more observers from the Greek Orthodox Church, Protestants, and Catholic laypersons, as well as nuns and parish priests in attendance. Decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the church and on the pastoral office of the bishop were passed, as well as a declaration of freedom of religion and "on the church's attitude toward non-Christian religions." Further decrees on the Eastern rite Catholic churches and on ecumenism were passed but left changes in marriage legislation to the decision of the pope. The council closed on November 21, 1965.

Both Vatican councils were courageous and timely responses to the real changes in the church's position in society and on social problems in the modern world. While fault might be found with the decree on papal infallibility of Vatican I, in the main, the decisions of both councils were practical and genuinely responsive to real issues that affected the whole Christian church. No general council had been held since the Council of TRENT (1545-63) at the time of the Counter-Reformation. Vatican I responded to the rise of rationalism (the Enlightenment), liberalism (social democracy and the breakdown of the older monarchical orders in European nations), and materialism. Some or all of these systems of thought denied basic Christian doctrines such as revelation, the existence of God, and the immortality of the soul. The council met largely to condemn such errors, as well as to clarify the church's position on the pope's infallibility. While many bishops and lay Catholics already firmly believed in papal infallibility, the issue caused discontent in Germany, France, and England. Eventually, this discontent resulted in the Old Catholic schism but also in a great strengthening of the Catholic Church.

Vatican Council II stands undoubtedly as one of the greatest episodes, if not the greatest, in Roman Catholic history. If Vatican I dealt with an array of problems built up over two centuries, Vatican II had even more problems, which had accumulated during the suffering, toil, and rapid social change of one century. World Wars I and II, the rise of Communism and its triumph over half the world, the new morality, the ever-present threat of nuclear war, and vast strides in medical science that enabled the prolongation of life and birth control through many techniques, all raised issues that challenged the traditional Catholic faith. Vatican II tackled many of these issues and others, too, including Christian attitudes towards Jews in the light of the Nazi holocaust, the status of women, and the church's relations with the other great, non-Christian religions.

If the attempt was courageous, in the best spirit of Christian faith, hope, and love, then the initial credit for Vatican II must go to the popular Pope JOHN XXIII. But, in even larger measure, credit must go to the council fathers who stoutly defended the faith while freely and openly admitting mistakes and striving to accommodate the church's practice, organization, and outlook to the late twentieth-century world. The reforms of the church initiated by Vatican II have continued to develop and unfold among Catholics. The use of the vernacular in the Mass, the deepening involvement of the laity in the church as the people of God, improved relationships with Protestants (including many ongoing theological talks with Baptist, Presbyterian, Reformed, Lutheran, Anglican, and Orthodox bodies), and a new respect between Catholics and Jews, all stem from Vatican II beginnings. Even the involvement of the church in the welfare of Christians behind the Communist Iron Curtain, so promoted by the election of the non-Italian, Pope John Paul II, a Pole and confronter of Communist power, has its roots in the heroic efforts of the fathers of Vatican I and II to make the faith relevant to the problems of the here and now. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, RALPH (1872-1958). English composer. Born in Down Ampney, Gloucestershire, on October 12, Vaughan Williams received his musical education at Trinity College, Cambridge, and the Royal College of Music, London. Subsequently, he pursued advanced study under Max Bruch in Berlin and Maurice Ravel in Paris. After serving four years with the British Army in Macedonia and France, he became a professor of composition at the Royal College of Music. He continued on that faculty until 1940. Although Vaughan Williams spent some time teaching, he spent even more on composition. He led a very active life up to the time of his death on August 26.

Religiously Vaughan Williams was a sort of agnostic, yet he produced significant religious music, including the oratorio "The Holy City," and his Christmas cantata "Hodie." He was a coeditor of Songs of Praise and The Oxford Book of Carols. Some of his other works bordered on religious themes, such as the music for George Herbert's "Mystical Songs," the Tallis Fantasia for string orchestra, and the "Fantasia on Old 104th Psalm Tune" for piano, chorus, and orchestra.

Early in his career Vaughan Williams was interested in English folk song, which shaped his later compositions. He was both an adventurous and a precise composer, who many feel had the greatest impact on religious music in the twentieth century. His major works include Mass in G Minor (1923), Sonata Civitas (1926), Five Tudor Portraits (1936), Serenade to Music (1938). He also composed two operas, Sir John in Love (1929) and The Pilgrims' Progress (1951). R.H.

VEDANTA. This term, meaning in Sanskrit "end of the VEDAS," in the sense of their completion or fulfillment, is the most influential of the six traditional DARSANAS or schools of philosophy in HINDUISM. The name indicates that it is thought by its followers to present the truest or highest philosophical interpretation of the ancient Vedic scriptures.

Vedanta is not a single philosophical position, but rather a tradition and family of philosophical schools that have developed in interaction with one another, but which show some very marked differences. For the entire tradition, however, the most important authority is the UPANISHADS, the latest and most metaphysical section of the Vedas. The teachings of the Upanishads are themselves not entirely consistent, but overall emphasize such themes as these, which have also been major themes of Vedanta: the oneness of Brahman, God or the Absolute; the possibility and importance of liberation from the world of SAMSARA, life and death and subjection to KARMA, through inwardly realized union with or love for God; that liberation is attained through discipline, attention to spiritual rather than material things, and the following of true teachers or GURUS.

After the Upanishads, the most important classic Vedanta text is the Brahma sutras of about 200 B.C.—A.D. 200, attributed to Badarayana. They are brief, cryptic comments on various Upanishadic passages, virtually unintelligible without the commentary that later philosophers gave them in turn, each according to his own school.

Because of its immense popularity in the Hindu world, the BHAGAVAD GITA is also often regarded as a classic text for Vedanta and has been much commented on by Vedantists, although the Gita itself shows evidence of considerable influence from Samkhya, another of the traditional six schools.

The best-known Vedanta school, especially outside of India, is Advaita Vedanta, "Non-dualist Vedanta." Its greatest spokesman was Samkara (eighth century A.D.). Advaita teaches the unreality of all appearances other than Brahman, and hence of all duality or multiplicity, including our own apparent existence as separate individual selves. Such appearances are the realm of maya, which means, in its "strong" sense, the "creative energy of God," but negatively, the illusion of seeing the world as other than Brahman. Contrary to what is sometimes thought, Advaita Vedanta does not teach that the world is illusion, but that it is seen in an illusory way if it is seen as anything other than Brahman. Such misperception is the product of avidya, ignorance or not seeing, in turn the result of one's misplaced identification with the individual self. For the true self is the Atman, the ultimate principle within the self not different from Brahman; the other parts of the human being, which Vedanta describes as a series of "sheaths" around the Atman—joy, intellect, mind, life-energy, and physical form—are contingent upon the reality represented by the Atman. Liberation, in the Advaita Vedanta tradition, is fundamentally a matter of right seeing, rightly distinguishing between the real and the unreal, and so is based on right knowledge more than right action or right feeling. However, it is strongly emphasized that mere intellectual knowledge of truth is insufficient. Liberation requires prajna, deep wisdom or insight that comes only with meditation and freeing the spirit from sensory attachments.

Another Vedantic school is Visista Advaita Vedanta, "modified non-dualist Vedanta." Its most important teacher was RAMANUJA (twelfth century A.D.). This school, closely linked to the BHAKTI movement, stressed the personal theism that makes devotionalism real. It vehemently criticized Samkara and the Advaita school for its teaching that Brahman is ultimately without attributes, and for its failure to make any real distinction between the Creator and souls dependent upon the Creator. Visista Advaita Vedanta asserted instead that God really has qualities such as truth, awareness, and eternity, and that human souls can be united with God in love but not in absolute identity.

Another school, Dvaita Vedanta, was founded by Madhava (1238–1317). Related like Ramanuja's system to devotionalism, this "dualistic Vedanta" stressed the distinctions between God, self, and world, teaching that while all is dependent upon God, God is separate from them, and salvation must depend solely on God's grace.

Other schools of Vedanta have tried to find middle ground between Advaita and the requirements of theistic experience. Since tension between the philosophical drive toward unity and the theistic experience of divine otherness expressed through God's love and grace has been a central dynamic of Hinduism, the Vedanta tradition, concerning itself with these issues, has come to be the religion's intellectual mainstream. R.E.

VEDAS. The Vedas, "knowledge," are the ancient sacred scriptures of HINDUISM. More properly, they should be called sacred songs and chants, since they were preserved only in oral tradition until comparatively recently, together with ritual and philosophical commentary.

The premier portion of these scriptures is the RIGVEDA, probably from 1500–1200 B.C., the era when the Indo-European or Aryan people whose priests recited them invaded India. The RigVeda consists of hymns, often of great beauty and vigor, chanted by BRAHMIN priests while sacrifices are being presented. They are addressed to various gods: the sovereign deities of the sky, Varuna and Mitra; the atmospheric Indra; the gods of the sacrifice itself, Agni, fire, and Soma, the sacred drink. Others such as Aditi, the mother of the gods, and Uma, the dawn, may also be praised; all the deities tend to be simply honored as bright, shining, and beneficent, though some hints of their mythology also appear.

Other Vedas of the same order as the RigVeda are the YajurVeda, MANTRAS recited by priests; the SamaVeda, mostly chants from the RigVeda but for a different group of priests; and the AtharvaVeda, a collection of more popular hymns and magical spells.

The scriptural Vedic literature is then completed by the BRAHMANAS, Aranyakas, and UPANISHADS, extensive commentaries on the four books of the original order of Vedas. The Brahmanas and Aranyakas ("forest books") contain much ritual instruction, together with mythological and philosophical commentary. The Upanishads, the most philosophical of the Vedas, deal chiefly with ultimate metaphysical truths. R.E.

VEDIC RELIGION. Sometimes used to refer to the religion of the ancient Indian Indo-Europeans before the rise of BHAKTI and other new developments in the early centuries B.C. In that case, the word HINDUISM is reserved for Indic religion in the latter period and after; in it different gods are most prominent, and the whole style of spiritual life has many quite different characteristics. But it should be borne in mind that we know relatively little of popular religion, and religion of non-Indo-European background (apart from its probable manifestation in BUDDHISM and JAINISM), in the period covered by Brahmanism, although they are undoubtedly the soil out of which much of later Hinduism grew. Brahmanism is essentially a religion of the priestly Brahmin caste and their upper-caste, Indo-European associates.

Major features of Brahmanism are (1) the authority of the Brahmin priests, (2) the authority of the Vedic scriptures, (3) the centrality of the sacrificial rites, (4) as time went on, increasing emphasis given to TAPAS—spiritual power produced by ASCETICISM, and (5) increasing metaphysical speculation, especially that centering around the concept of Brahman (originally the holy power associated with the sacrifice and an amorphous vital force invoked by it, but later the underlying universal Reality of which all things are merely diverse forms, and which the UPANISHADS identify also with the ATMAN, the innermost self or "soul" of a human being). The gods of Brahmanism are those of the Vedic hymns, sovereign Varna and Mitra, heroic Indra, and so forth. In what might be called its "classic" period, the early centuries of the first millennium B.C. when the BRAHMANAS were composed, special attention was given to Agni, the fire-god who is the heart of the sacrifice, and Brahma, the creator-god and source of wisdom, ultimately to be superseded by Brahman, the more impersonal version of the same name and vital Reality.

Brahmanism upheld a social order based on caste and patriarchal family, and put much emphasis on such ethical virtues as truth-telling and the keeping of compacts. But it was a religion ostensibly heavily centered on priesthood and ritual sacrifice. These were thought to have correspondences with the great universe itself, by which the latter could be adjusted and manipulated. But the practitioners of these rites, who loved delving deeper and deeper into their meaning and that of the forces they evoked, could not in the end resist the conclusion, published in the Upanishads, that the ultimate locus of the sacrifice, the power, and the Reality behind them was within—in the sacrifice of asceticism, the spiritual power it generated (tapas), and in the universe in the self as Brahman in the Atman. R.E.

VEIL OF THE TEMPLE. (See Matt. 27:51; Mark 15:38; and Luke 23:45.) A door hanging (or "curtain," RSV) that covered the opening between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies in Herod's Temple and perhaps in Zerubbabel's Temple also. It is reported to have been torn in two (Matt. 27:51 and Mark 15:38, which add "from top to bottom"; Luke 23:45) at the time of Jesus' death on the cross. Hebrews 10:20 takes the torn curtain to represent the torn "flesh" of Jesus, thus concluding that Jesus' death opened for Christians a "new and living way" to the presence of God.

No mention of such a curtain is made in the I Kings description of Solomon's Temple. Exodus 26:31 states that in the tabernacle a textile partition separated the two rooms of the tent and that it was made "of blue and purple and scarlet stuff and fine twined linen; in skilled work [embroidery?] shall it be made, with cherubim." Second Chronicles 3:14 quotes this verse almost verbatim and applies it to Solomon's Temple. When such a curtain or veil was installed in the temple, it would seem an effort to magnify the transcendent otherness of God by keeping even priests, performing sacred duties in the Holy Place, from seeing the Ark of the Covenant and its guardian cherubim. P.L.G.

VENERATION. See WORSHIP.

VENIAL SIN. A term used in Roman Catholic theology to distinguish between the nature and effects of certain forms of sin. Venial sin is distinguished from MORTAL SIN. Neither term is found in Scripture, and the Protestant Reformers rejected such distinctions. However, the early church fathers did posit two classes of sin, and the modern distinctions between mortal and venial sin were established by the Scholastic theologians, especially THOMAS AQUINAS. According to Thomas, while mortal sin is a deliberate turning away from God and merits an eternal punishment, venial sin is a disorder of the soul, a sickness that is repairable, and thus merits only a temporal penalty. Venial sin can be declared in confession before taking the Sacrament, but this need not be done. Venial sin can be expiated by other means. Unlike mortal sin, venial sin does not directly cause a loss of charity or deprive the soul of sanctifying grace. The distinctions between mortal and venial sin were approved at the Council of Trent. VENIAMINOV, INNOKENTI (1797–1879). The Russian Orthodox metropolitan noted as a missionary to Alaska and Siberia. He was born John Popov but took the name Veniaminov after his first bishop. He went to the Aleutians in 1823 as a missionary, studied the local language, and in 1829 extended his missionary activity to Alaska. In 1839 he was commissioned as bishop of Kamchatka and Russian America. He founded many mission stations and organized the work of the church in the region. As metropolitan of Moscow, he urged his church to its missionary responsibility. His best-known book is A Guide to the Kingdom of Heaven. His collected works and letters have been published in several volumes.

VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS. Latin for "Come, Creator Spirit," the opening line of a hymn invoking the Holy Spirit, used at vespers during Pentecost (or Ordinary Time) in the Roman Catholic Church. It is also sung at ordinations, consecrations of bishops, dedications of churches, and at the opening of synods and before elections.

VERBAL INSPIRATION. See INSPIRATION AND REVELATION.

VERONICA. The traditional name of a woman who is supposed to have shown mercy on Jesus as he was carrying his cross to Golgotha by wiping his face with her handkerchief. Tradition says Jesus' face was imprinted on her handkerchief. This handkerchief or veil is preserved at St. Peter's in Rome, where it can be handled and shown to the faithful for veneration only by a canon of the basilica. This veil is itself known as the Veronica; a name that may be formed of the Latin and Greek words for true (vera) and image (eikon).

Nothing is known of Veronica. She is not a saint in the Roman martyrology but is said to have been the wife of a Roman officer and in other places is spoken of as the same woman mentioned in Mark 5:25-34, who was healed of an issue of blood.

VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE. See BIBLE VERSIONS, NON-ENGLISH; BIBLE TRANSLATIONS, ENGLISH.

VESPASIAN. Titus Flavius Vespasianus, Roman Emperor from A.D. 69 to 79; founder of the Flavian dynasty. After receiving a customary military training, Vespasian became a praetor in the reign of Gaius, commanded a legion under Claudius, and became proconsul of Africa in A.D. 66. In that year he was assigned three legions to quell the Jewish revolt in Judea.

After NERO's death, Vespasian aspired to succeed him. Already Josephus, the Jewish historian who sought asylum with Vespasian, had predicted his accession. Egypt's legions swore their allegiance, and the emperor-designate picked up more supporters en route to Rome. Vespasian left his son, TITUS, to pursue the war with the Jews.

Vespasian proved himself an able administrator. He ridiculed the notion that he was a god or would become one. There is no record of persecutions of Jews or Christians during his reign, but Cynic and Stoic philosophers were banished for allegedly promoting sedition. Judea remained a part of the imperial estate, and the head tax of two drachmas, paid to the Temple by every male Jew before its destruction by Titus, was transferred to the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. Vespasian died on June 24, A.D. 79, and was succeeded by his son, Titus.

VESPERS. The normal evening service in Roman Catholic churches of the Latin rite, as well as in monastic, cathedral, and collegiate churches. It is sung daily between 3:00 P.M. and 6:00 P.M. In Protestant churches it is the normal evening service (usually, but not limited to, Sundays). In the Byzantine rite the service is called Hesperinos.

VESTMENTS. Vestments are the liturgical garments worn at church services by the clergy and their assistants. Originally, Christian ministers wore the street dress of Roman men, a long tunic. As styles changed, the church retained this earlier dress and elaborated upon it.

Vestments included the ALB, or white linen robe; the surplice, or loose white outer garment that originated in the cold churches of northern Europe (where it was worn over a fur coat); the maniple and stole, derived from the Roman handkerchief and napkin; the chasuble, or outer Eucharistic vestment, which is often ornately decorated; and the cape, or warm black overcoat, usually worn at the church door or in out-of-doors processions.

There are variations in vestments according to ecclesiastical rank, from DEACON to PRIEST (or PASTOR) to BISHOP, as well as according to the various services of the church, from preaching to officiating at Holy Communion. Generally, in the ancient and medieval church, the minister celebrating Communion wore the alb, the stole, and the chasuble. He also wore the amice, a linen protective cloth worn over the shoulders, and the maniple, a narrow linen strip that was hung on the left forearm. The stole, a narrow scarf in colors to match the liturgical colors of the church year, was worn about the neck and secured at the waist by a cincture, or rope. The chasuble covered everything. At baptisms and confession ministers wore the surplice and stole. Essentially, the surplice was a widened, shortened alb.

In earlier days, the minister or priest also wore, as his distinctive garment, the cassock, a robe that was usually black and reached to his feet. This had a standing collar—the origin of today's clerical collar.

Clergy of higher ranks than priests wore much more elaborate vestments, both for everyday use and for worship. Deacons were identified by wearing their stoles crossed over their chests, in the shape of St. Andrew's cross (X). Priests wore their stoles hanging straight down. This practice is still followed in the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches. Bishops, archbishops, and cardinals were, and still are, marked by such items as the dalmatic, gloves, the miter, the pallium, and the pectoral cross. J.C.

VIA ANALOGIA. See ANALOGY.

VIA DOLOROSA. The traditional route Jesus Christ followed through the streets of Jerusalem from the praetorium, or judgment hall of Pontius Pilate, to Calvary. It is also known as the Way of the Cross or the Way of Sorrows. Today pilgrims to the Holy City often follow a full-sized wooden cross in a procession through the ancient streets, singing a passiontide hymn, and pausing to pray at the nine Stations of the Cross on the way to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Most of the older communions regard the church as the true site of Calvary. The last five stations are within the church itself. R.H.

VIA MEDIA. The expression, Latin for the "middle way," has been applied to Anglicanism, understood as pursuing a middle course between Roman Catholicism on the one side and Protestantism on the other. The idea goes back to the Anglican Reformation, but it was given eloquent expression by JOHN HENRY NEWMAN and other Tractarians. J.M.

VIA NEGATIVA. See NEOPLATONISM.

VICAR. In Roman Catholic polity, a clergyman who exercises an ecclesiastical office in the place of another, acting in the other's name and with his authority. Examples include the vicar apostolic, who acts for the pope in missionary countries, and parochial vicars, who assist the rector or chief pastor of a parish. It is used among Lutherans to signify seminarians on internships and among Anglicans as a title for a parish priest, usually an assistant. J.C.

VICAR APOSTOLIC. A titular bishop, that is, one without a territorial diocese, cathedral, or chapter of canons. The vicars apostolic rule territories as delegates of the pope, for example, the church in England was ruled in this way until 1850. Such vicars apostolic have seats and vote in the general councils of the church. J.C.

VICAR GENERAL. A deputy administrator appointed by a diocesan bishop to help with the governing of the diocese. The vicar general exercises the bishop's full power but must do so according to the bishop's wishes. He takes precedence over all clergy in the diocese but loses this rank on the death or move of the bishop. J.C.

VICAR OF CHRIST. The title applied to the pope, the bishop of Rome, by the Roman Catholic Church. The pope is the visible head of the church, which is the mystical or sacramental body of Christ, and so is the representative of Christ on earth and the supreme authority of the church. J.C.

VIDYA. In Hinduism vidya (knowledge) is not knowledge gained through the senses or through reflection. That knowledge only leads us to draw distinctions, and all distinctions are illusion, quite unreal. Therefore such knowledge is really ignorance, avidya. True vidya must overcome all distinctions.

Avidya is the normal state of human beings and is the reason we cannot escape KARMA (our actions and their results). Karma makes us prisoners of SAMSARA, a cycle of rebirth time after time after time. Actions, no matter how good or wise, cannot free us from the burdensome necessity of this rebirth. But knowledge can. Paradoxically both vidya and avidya are hidden within Brahman, ultimate reality. Avidya is perishable, while vidya is immortal, and if we control both of them we can transcend them and escape samsara.

To the Western mind distinctions are real, and the distinction between the one who knows and the object of knowledge is basic. In Hinduism, especially the Vedanta philosophy of Samkara (eighth century A.D.), that basic distinction is the worst illusion of all and the hardest to overcome. Ultimate reality (Brahman) is the only thing worth knowing. But Brahman contains no distinctions. Therefore the one who knows Brahman has true knowledge, but as a result becomes one with Brahman. The self ceases to exist; in fact, it has always been merely an illusion, avidya or ignorance. Thus karma and samsara are overcome. Distinctions are no more. Everything is one. K.C.

VIENNE, COUNCIL OF. Fifteenth ecumenical council in Roman Catholicism (October 16, 1311–May 6, 1312) which condemned the wealthy Order of Templars and dealt with controversies over Franciscan poverty. Pope Clement V (1305–14), who moved the papacy to Avignon, France, called the council to meet at Vienne in southeast France in 1308, only to have it delayed until 1311. King Philip IV of France was already brutally suppressing the Templars and seizing their properties. The council majority believed the charges of heresy and immorality against the Templars lacked evidence, but Philip IV intimidated Templar sympathizers by bringing his army to Vienne early in 1312. About a month later Pope Clement V suppressed the Templars in his bull Vox clamantis, with the council acceding on April 3. Other council actions sanctioned strict Franciscan poverty, encouraged Raymond Lull to establish university centers for missionaries to learn Oriental languages, and granted tithes for six years to Philip IV for a crusade that he never made. However, Philip, with papal aid, managed to seize most of the Templars' property and execute most of their leaders as heretics. Vienne's decrees on reform were eventually incorporated in the "Clementines" published by Pope John XXII. C.M.

VIGIL. From the Latin word meaning "a watching." A vigil is the day preceding certain feasts, and is equivalent to the eve of the feast. It is observed as a preparation for the celebration of the festival. In early times, a fast was observed as part of the vigil. Festivals that have vigils in the Roman Catholic Church include Easter; Christmas; Pentecost; Ascension Day; the Assumption of Mary; the Feasts of St. John the Baptist, of St. Lawrence the Martyr, and of saints Peter and Paul. The vigils of Pentecost, the Assumption, and Christmas are fast days, unless they fall on a Monday. The Orthodox churches also observe vigils called provorita ("preparations"). Vigils arose from overnight services held to prepare for feast days, such as the Easter vigil service and the midnight Mass at Christmas. Among some Protestants, a "Watch-night" service on New Year's Eve is held. J.C.

VIHARA. A dwelling for Buddhist monks; a monastery. In earliest Buddhism monks spent the annual rainy season in caves or in free-standing structures called viharas. With the development and growth of the monastic orders, large buildings were constructed for the use of monks. The usual monastery was a group of buildings for various purposes. In addition to living quarters for monks there were buildings for daily and special services, for study, and for other uses.

In India many ancient viharas were built of brick. From country to country the use of materials, the style of architecture, and the types of specialized buildings have varied greatly. In China, Korea, and Japan most monastery buildings are of wood. Some buildings were set aside for the use of the laity, and others were built as devotional chapels. During periods when the laity gave generously to the support of monasteries, magnificent structures were built and were lavishly decorated. By the fifth century A.D. in China, many monasteries had accumulated so much wealth that they aroused the greed of the state. Over the next several centuries periodic persecutions involved the confiscation of monastery property, the forced return of monks and nuns to lay life, and the melting down of images made of precious metals.

One of the best-known monastic buildings is the great Potala palace in Lhasa, Tibet. Until the country was occupied by the Peoples' Republic of China, it served as the center of Tibet's theocratic government, headed by the Dalai Lama.

In Japan the history of Buddhism can be traced in the development of the major temples. In Nara, the first major center of Japanese Buddhism, and Kyoto, capital of the nation for a thousand years, monasteries have preserved priceless art treasures and bear witness to changing styles in architecture. At a Nichiren temple in Yamanashi Prefecture, a contemporary treasury for relics was built entirely of aluminum, but in traditional style. K.C.

VIMALAKIRTI. The hero of a MAHAYANA Buddhist scripture probably written in the first century A.D. As a layman, married and the father of children, Vimalakirti was especially popular in China because he demonstrated that it was possible to achieve enlightenment (bodhi) without becoming a monk or being celibate. His highly moral character was close to the Chinese ideal. K.C.

VINAYA PITAKA. The first of three collections (known as "Three Baskets") of sacred Buddhist writings in the Pali language. It deals principally with the rules governing the monastic order of BUDDHISM. The rules are traditionally believed to have been given by the Buddha (sixth century B.C.) but some of them may be as late in origin as the first century B.C. K.C.

VINCENT DE PAUL (about 1581-1660). French Roman Catholic priest, devoted to helping the poor, who founded the missionary order of Lazarists and Sisters of Charity. Born in Ranquine in Gascony, he studied theology at Toulouse, receiving ordination when about twenty years old. Seized by Turkish pirates in 1605, he was enslaved in Tunisia for two years. Eventually escaping, he went to Paris where he worked among the poor. About 1610 he vowed to devote his life to charitable works, a few years later founding at Chatillon-les-Dombes the first of several confraternities of charity for both men and women. He founded the Congregation of Priests of the Mission in 1624, commonly called Lazarists. Approved by Pope Urban VIII, Vincent extended his missions for the poor throughout Europe. About 1632 he established Sisters of Charity specifically to care for the sick and poor. He was canonized in 1737. C.M.

VINCENTIAN CANON. A Roman Catholic rule for determining the validity of doctrines, based on the criticism of Augustine's predestination advanced by Vincent of Lérins in his Commonitorium in 434, four years after Augustine's death. To distinguish truth from heretical views one should look for that faith "which has been believed everywhere, always, and by all" (Commonitorium). Vincent, a monk at Lérins, urged this three fold test of universality, tradition, and consent to avoid what he believed was novel teaching in Augustine's writings, namely predestination and irresistible grace. He explained universality as what the whole church confesses, tradition or antiquity as what was held by holy ancestors and fathers, and consent as definitions and determinations of all or at least most priests and doctors. Vincent thought Augustine's views threatened motivation for doing good works and undercut human responsibility.

VIRGIL. Publius Vergilius Maro (70–19 B.C.), classical Roman poet, often considered a Christian prophet, who influenced Dante, Chaucer, and Milton. Born near Mantua, of middle-class parents, Virgil studied literature, rhetoric, and philosophy at Cremona, Milan, Rome, and Naples. He abandoned politics for poetry and spent most of his life near Naples, where he knew Octavian (later emperor Augustus) and the poet Horace. His three masterpieces were the ten Eclogues, the Georgics, and the Aeneid. The Eclogues (37 B.C.) were pastoral poems invested with real Italian people, places, and events, both directly and allegorically. The fourth Eclogue extolled the birth of a child destined to usher in a Golden Age of peace and prosperity. The Middle Ages regarded this as a prophecy of Christ's birth. The highly artistic Latin of the Georgics (36–29 B.C.), in four books, feelingly depicted country life and became famous for its description of bee life, the plague, and the significance of sacrifice. Virgil's unfinished twelve books of the Aeneid (29–19 B.C.) was a mythological, national epic about the origins of Rome and the glories of Romans under emperor Augustus. The Aeneid depicted the wanderings of Aeneas from Troy to Italy, including an underworld trip where Aeneas' father revealed the unborn heroes of Roman history. In the Middle Ages Christians found hidden, prophetic meanings in this epic. They often imitated Virgil's style and altered Vergil to Virgil, linking him with Christ's virgin birth. (Virgil's nickname, Parthenias, connoted "virgin.") Jerome and Augustine objected to Christianizing Virgil, yet he influenced Christian writing for sixteen hundred years.

C.M.

VIRGIN BIRTH. The Gospels of Matthew and Luke agree in reporting that Mary conceived Jesus without having had sexual intercourse (Matt. 1:18-21; Luke 1:26-38). In both accounts Joseph and Mary were betrothed, but had not had sexual relations at the time Jesus was born. They disagree about where the holy family lived: Matthew locates it in Bethlehem, from which they moved to Nazareth by way of Egypt. Luke locates them from the outset in Galilee, with the journey to Bethlehem occurring just before Jesus is born. But on the miracle of his conception they are in agreement.

Such a claim is not evident, however, in the rest of the NT. Paul refers to Jesus as simply "born of woman," thereby implying an ordinary human birth. Mark 6:3 identifies Jesus as "son of Mary," which might imply that he had no legitimate father, since personal identity among Jews was always in terms of X, son of his father, Y, as the abundant references to Jacob and his twelve sons show. John 1:45 goes even farther in describing Jesus as "son of Joseph."

A problem for those who accept the virgin conception of Jesus as literal, historical fact is the evidence in Mark that his family did not want to accept his claims of divine authority, but considered him to be mad, as a literal reading of Mark 3:21 (compare 3:31-34) makes clear. If they had had knowledge of his supernatural birth, it seems wholly unlikely that they would have evaluated in such a manner his mission and sense of destiny. This way of understanding the passage in Mark about his family thinking he is crazy is confirmed by the fact that both Matthew and Luke—who have the virgin birth theme—omit that passage from Mark when they tell the story that it introduces in Mark (compare Matt. 12:22-30; Luke 11:14-23). Since there are no birth stories in either Mark or John, one cannot infer from these sources alone that Jesus was virginally conceived.

A related paradox is that Matthew and Luke, while denying that Joseph is the actual father of Jesus, take care to trace his genealogy back through Joseph to David, although each Gospel writer follows a different genealogical route (Matt. 1:2-17; Luke 3:23-38). In John, however, Jesus' descent from the Davidic line is directly called into question (John 7:40-43).

As confirmation of his account of the miraculous birth of Jesus, Matthew appeals to Scripture (Matt. 1:22-23; Isa. 7:14) to show how the divine plan, which is to be achieved through Jesus, is prepared for supernaturally by his virginal conception: "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel" (which means "God with us"). Matthew quotes the passage from the Greek version used by early Christians (the Septuagint), where the word PARTHENOS can mean "virgin," but can also refer to a young woman of marriageable age. In the original Hebrew, however, the word for a young woman, almah, means only the latter, and appears in contexts describing ordinary sexual relationships between young men and young women (Prov. 30:19). In Isaiah 7:14 the point of the prophecy is not the extraordinary nature of the child's conception or birth but that the period of her pregnancy—that is, less than nine months—will see the problem posed by the invasion of Judah resolved. Hence the child is to be given the symbolic name for the people's deliverance from foreign occupation, "God with us."

In second-century writings that attack Christianity the charge is made that Jesus was really the son, not of parthenos, the virgin, but of Pantheros, a Roman soldier. Thus instead of virgin born he is the illegitimate son of a soldier.

Various explanations have been offered for the rise of these traditions about Jesus' virginal conception: (1) It was a matter of historical recollection that Jesus had been virginally conceived and miraculously born. (2) Mary's period of gestation was unusually short, with the result that the charge arose that she must have had premarital sexual relations or was sexually promiscuous. (3) Jesus was indeed illegitimate, as the designation in Mark 6:3 may be read as implying. (4) The wishes of the early Christians to heighten the significance of Jesus by the story of his virgin birth were joined with the desire to demonstrate that this event had taken place in fulfillment of Scripture.

Although, as noted above, Paul and the other NT writers do not make this claim in behalf of Jesus, they do share with other NT writers the conviction that God's purposes were revealed to and for humanity in a human being, who entered the world by physical birth rather than in a heavenly or an angelic being who merely masqueraded as human, as other religions of that epoch claimed. For all of these NT writers the important emphasis is on the fact of his human birth rather than on the virginal conception that Matthew and Luke claim brought it about.

VIRGIN MARY. See MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS; BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

VIRTUES, CARDINAL. See CARDINAL VIRTUES.

VIRTUES, SEVEN. Ancient Greek philosophy spoke of four CARDINAL VIRTUES: prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude. Aristotle in his Ethics defined virtue as a "disposition which makes a man good and causes him to do his own work well." To live in such a virtuous state makes the person happy or blessed. The exercise of a virtue is due to the virtuous person's disposition to choose the mean, the middle way, between extremes. Courage thus is the path of moderation between being cowardly and being rash. A virtue is therefore an excellence of one's character.

In Christianity, the word for virtue (arete) occurs only four times in the NT, and three of these occurrences are in II Peter 1:3, 5. Only in Philippians 4:8 does Paul use the term, and this is generally translated as "excellence," as in the RSV. Later theologians added the three THEOLOGICAL VIRTUES taken from I Corinthians 13, faith, hope, and love (charity), to the four cardinal virtues and produced the teaching device of the seven virtues.

VIRTUES, THEOLOGICAL. See THEOLOGICAL VIRTUES.

VISHNU. One of the two highest gods of HINDUISM, equal in importance to SHIVA. He played a small role in the Vedic period (second and first millennia B.C.). His major importance lies in the veneration given to him in devotional or BHAKTI Hinduism. In the overall Hindu pantheon, Vishnu is the protector and maintainer of world order—a role complementary to that of Shiva, the destroyer. Vishnu, like many gods, is also the focus of a sect, in his case VAISNAVISM. Vaisnavas worship Vishnu as the supreme god of the universe, not only the preserver, but also the creator and destroyer. They focus their worship on his AVATARS, or incarnations.

The main temple at Angkor Wat, Cambodia. This temple was originally dedicated to the Hindu god Vishnu. It shows sculptures and reliefs of Vishnu in his various avatars and scenes from the Ramayana.

In the mixture of the Aryan religion and that of the Indus Valley, which gave birth to the many forms of Hinduism, Vishnu does not play a major role. The Vedas mention the three strides he took to cross the earth, atmosphere, and heaven. They picture him in his heavenly abode, "the highest place." The later BRAHAMANAS identify him with the Vedic sacrifice, which was still the center of Hindu religion at the time. The Brahmanas refer to him as the highest god. However, his greatest importance came after the Bhagavatas identified their god, Vasudeva-Krishna, as the incarnation of Vishnu. The Bhagavad Gita, part of the Mahabharata epic, tells the story of Vishnu's incarnation as Lord KRISHNA. It advances the concept of avatar and the idea of a supreme personal God. From these developments arose the cult of the Vaisnavas.

The Vaisnavas gained power after the fourth century A.D. because Hindu rulers began to see Vishnu the preserver as the cosmic equivalent of a king. Just as Vishnu maintained the cosmic order, kings maintained the social order. These kings became devotees of Vishnu's avatars. Many demigods became identified as avatars of Vishnu. The list of avatars eventually became limited to ten names. Krishna and Rama are two important avatars. Gautama the Buddha has been considered an avatar who diverted the unworthy into another religion. Non-human avatars include the fish that rescued the Hindu first man, Manu, from the great Flood, and a boar which raised the earth from the waters.

In later times, the Hindus elevated Vishnu to the role of creator, overseer, and destroyer of the entire universe. He is portrayed as floating on the cosmic ocean, asleep in the coils of the cobra Sesa. At the beginning of each age he awakens, and a lotus issues from his navel. The god Brahma comes forth from the lotus to create the world. Vishnu's avatars enter the world to maintain it, but eventually Vishnu, in the form of RUDRA, destroys the world. Beyond the immeasurable and incomprehensible world of Vishnu and the cosmic ocean lies only the formless and indifferent creator Bhagavan. The world we perceive was created from the innate creativity, or lila ("sport") of Bhagavan, and it will eventually dissolve back into the blessed state of unity. K./M.C.

VISIBLE CHURCH. See CHURCH: Visible and Invisible.

VISION. See BEATIFIC VISION.

VITELLIUS. A personal name shared by two distinct, though related, historical personages. Lucius Vitellius was legate of Syria in the time of Roman occupation (A.D. 35-37). He arranged a truce with a rebellious Parthian king, Artabanus III, at the instigation of Emperor Tiberius. Herod Antipas appears on the scene as the one who relayed the news of the settlement to the emperor, an act to which Vitellius took exception. It later formed the occasion on which he got his own back, and refused to press an invasion on the Jewish enemy, Aretas, in A.D. 37. He replaced Caiaphas by another high priest, Jonathan, whom he later replaced by Theophilus, since he acted as successor to Pontius Pilate. He permitted the stoning of Stephen.

His son, who also bore the name Vitellius, briefly became a Roman emperor in competition with Otho in the "year of the Four Emperors," A.D. 69. In fact, he ruled only from April to December that year and was executed by Vespasian on December 21.

R.M.

VOCATION. In the religious sense, a feeling of being called by God into service. In a general way, the concept of vocation or CALLING applies to all Christians, who are called to faith in Christ (I Pet. 2:9). According to Roman Catholic teaching, this vocation (calling) is to all human beings, even to those remote from the church, for vocation is a prevenient grace, in which all people have sufficient grace to be saved. The calling of God cannot be restricted to those who respond in acceptance, as was done by the Reformed Synod of Dort, which taught a limited atonement, that is, that Christ died only for the elect, which is to say, only for those who accept his calling to salvation.

Vocation, in the broad sense, implies the way one makes one's living in the world. This includes secular as well as religious professions and duties. Paul declared: "Everyone has his own vocation (calling), in which he has been called; let him keep to it" (I Cor. 7:20). Any human activity that is wholesome, no matter how humble in the eyes of society, may be the object of a vocation from God. Brother Lawrence thought of his position as dishwasher as a divine vocation, and indeed, was able to minister to others through it.

More specifically, the term "vocation" has been reserved for the sense of divine calling to the ministry or the religious life, as to the priesthood or to a monastic order. The actual presence of a vocation in one's life is demonstrated by a fitness or suitability in the person for the religious (that is, monastic) life, or for the priestly life, which has the same requirements plus an actual attainment of holiness of life. In the Catholic Church, the call of the bishop to a man to become a priest is the decisive element in a priestly vocation. In the Protestant churches, the concept of vocation to being a Christian (the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS) is the same as in Catholicism. The concept of vocation to the ministry is similar, also, with the external call exercised by the Roman Catholic bishop generally exercised by the synod, district, or conference, except among Baptists, where it is usually exercised by the local congregation. All Protestants generally accept the need for a demonstration of fitness or aptitude (the inner call) on the part of the candidate for ordination, which is usually expressed in the ability to pursue academic and theological education successfully, plus the affirmation of the external call of the synod or other ecclesiastical body. J.C.

VOID. Emptiness or nothingness. In mystical religious thought it suggests an emptying of the mind. There is a psychological quality as well as an ontological meaning to emptiness. Nothingness is a nihilistic concept, but self-emptying has a positive meaning by the implication of fulfillment through the divine life. Genesis describes the world as void before the divine Word brought order from chaos. I.C.

VOODOO. A syncretistic religion combining Roman Catholic and African, particularly Dahoman, elements. It developed among slave populations of the new world, especially in Haiti and Brazil. In it African deities are associated with Catholic saints. African and Catholic ritual have combined to form a new religion, often equated with WITCHCRAFT by white observers. Voodooists believe in one supreme God, but interact with the lesser gods, known as loa. The loa possesses ("mount") their devotees and perform sacred dances. Possession can be used for healing, protection from evil influences, and bringing good or evil fortune to others. Particular loa become attached to individual families or priests. A male priest is called a hungan and a female priest a mambo. Each priest organizes a congregation. K./M.C.

VOLTAIRE (1694–1778). French philosopher, polemicist, and man of letters, born François Marie Arouet. Voltaire had a very great influence on the European thought of his own and subsequent times. He wrote history, biography, novels, tragedies, essays, and pamphlets, and carried on an extensive correspondence with the leading men and women of his age, including Frederick II of Prussia. His best-known work is the philosophical romance, Candide (1759). In it Voltaire attacks the optimism and abstract speculation made fashionable by the philosopher Leibnitz and concludes with the practical advice, "Let us cultivate our garden."

Voltaire is the best representative of French DEISM. While skeptical of religious dogma, he was firmly convinced that reason and the order of nature justify belief in a creator God. He attacked the materialism and atheism of his fellow philosophers Holbach and Helvetius. Before 1751, Voltaire refrained from assailing orthodox Christianity. He limited his religious writings to praise of natural religion and pleas for religious toleration. However, for twenty years after 1751 he issued a torrent of books and pamphlets denouncing Christianity. His battle cry was Ecrasez l'infâme—"Crush the infamous thing"—by which he meant Christianity in all its orthodox, ecclesiastical forms, both Catholic and Protestant.

Typical of Voltaire's writing in this period is the Sermon of the Fifty in which he pokes fun at the outmoded science, the historical incongruities, and primitive morals that he finds in the Bible. His attack seldom varied, but he spared his readers tedium by lighting up long, tendentious passages with brilliant and outrageous humor. What drove Voltaire was his conviction that organized Christianity supported superstition, which inevitably led to fanaticism. He wanted to purify religion of these dangers and replace orthodoxy with a rather vague and emotional Deism. Doctrine would consist of belief in one God, whose service was the practice of virtue. At the time of his death, Voltaire was a national hero. In 1791 his remains were buried in the Pantheon in Paris. J.L.

VOLUNTARISM. Contrary to the European practice of state churches, churches in America are "voluntary," that is, dependent on the voluntary support of members who choose to affiliate with them. It is a consequence of freedom of religion and the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

Voluntarism is a typically American arrangement, often accompanied by a tendency toward democratically governed local churches opposed to or in tension with national hierarchies, a concern for practical achievements rather than doctrinal purity (support is based on the popularity of the minister and program, thus success is measured by numbers and budgets), and rotating ministers obliged to please their congregations. The voluntary system emphasizes religious experience (conversion is sometimes required to join), the priesthood of all believers, and ethical distinctives (the strictest churches appear to be most attractive), and downplays the sacraments and the authority of the minister. The voluntary system also carries over into charitable work and cultural efforts, much of which depends on volunteers rather than being supported by the state. (See DENOMINATIONALISM.) N.H.

VOLUNTEERS OF AMERICA. A religious and social welfare organization incorporated in New York City on November 6, 1896. The Volunteers came into being as a result of a dispute between General William Booth of the SALVATION ARMY and his son Ballington Booth, who wanted to inject more democratic procedures in the army. The Volunteers under Ballington Booth continued to operate much as the Salvation Army. The organization today holds evangelistic services and Bible classes and conducts numerous social services such as family aid, day nurseries, hospices for working girls, maternity homes, and ministries to needy older people. There is a major service to prisoners in state institutions called the Volunteers Prisoners League. Headquarters of the Volunteers is located in New York City. R.H.

VON HÜGEL. See HÜGEL, BARON FRIEDRICH VON.

VOTIVE MASS/OFFICE. A mass that differs from the formal office of the day in that it is celebrated for a special intention or wish. Its name comes from the Latin votum, "a wish." These intentions may include a wish for the blessing of a marriage, for the repose of a soul (at a funeral mass), or for some other worthy cause, at the choice of the priest. Among these causes, votive masses may be said for the election of a pope, for the removal of the separation between churches, for a good death, for peace, for the sick, or for the evangelization of the world. Private votive masses may be said using any mass in the Roman missal, as well as from the special votive offices or masses found in the missal. There are special rubrics that govern when such private votive offices may be said, as well as rubrics on nuptial and funeral masses. J.C.

VOWS. A solemn promise made to God freely, without coercion, with due deliberation, to do some task or enter some particular state such as becoming a priest, monk, or nun. Vows may be public (as are the vows of monks) or private. Bishops and other ordinaries can dispense persons from their vows if the request is based on a just cause, except for those vows reserved to the pope. In Roman Catholicism vows are impediments to marriage; that is, anyone under the vows of monasticism or of the major orders (subdeacons, deacons, priests, bishops) and those of first profession in the Jesuit order, is ineligible to marry and only rarely is dispensed; to marry without dispensation results in excommunication.

The vows of religion are the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, which all religious (that is, monks and nuns) take. These are the evangelical counsels that are seen as steps to Christian perfection. These vows are taken at profession. Sometimes a fourth, special vow is added by the person making profession. J.C.

VULGATE. This venerable Latin translation of the Holy Scriptures was the work of JEROME, a fourth-century scholar. Jerome set an example for future translators by working from the original languages. Probably no other Bible has left a greater impact on the church. Even in 1546 the Council of Trent declared it to be the only authentic Latin text of the Scriptures. Until recently the Roman Catholic Church would permit no other basis for vernacular translations.

Jerome began his work on the Vulgate in 382 and completed it in 404. His scholarship and linguistic ability towered above others in the early church, yet the completed translation met opposition from those who felt their own renditions were superior. But the sheer excellence of Jerome's scholarship ultimately won acceptance for this great version. The Vulgate was the version of the Bible that became the first to be printed on Gutenberg's press in 1456. R.H.

WAHHABIYAH. The name given to a puritanical movement in ISLAM, derived from the name of its founder Muhammad ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab (1703–92). It was given to its followers by others; they call themselves muwabbidun ("Unitarians") because of their emphasis on the unity of Allah.

Al-Wahhab was born near Riyadh in present-day Saudi Arabia and achieved his greatest success in collaboration with the tribal leader Muhammad ibn Sa'ud. After dominating Arabia for nearly a century, the movement declined in the nineteenth century, but regained its position with the establishment of the modern kingdom of Saudi Arabia in the early 1930s.

The Wahhabis reject anything that might compromise the sovereignty and unity of God. They condemn veneration of saints, the building of mausoleums for them, and even celebration of the Prophet's birthday. They believe in literal interpretation of the Qur'an and following the theology and legal theory of the conservative thinkers Ahmad ibn Hanbal and ibn Taymiyya. The only authorities for belief and behavior are the Qur'an, Sunna (customary practice established by the example of Muhammad), and the four orthodox Sunni schools of legal thought (Fiqh). Any other practice or belief constitutes "innovation" or heresy. Targets of the displeasure of the Wahhabs include the mystical Sufis.

WAHY. From the Arabic word for "inspiration." In Islam, divine inspiration or revelation. In pre-Islamic times, the term referred to the inspiration of poets, particularly those who gave utterance out of a trance-like state. But in Islam, it is restricted generally to NABI and rasul—prophets and emissaries of God—and above all to the inspired revelation that God delivered through the Prophet MUHAMMAD. However, the QUR'AN itself, the vehicle of that revelation, refers to other wahy as well: to that of angels, to other prophets, to the mother of Moses. An angel can also be the bearer of God's revelation, as was Gabriel for Muhammad. The process of receiving wahy was, for Muhammad, often excruciating: he would shake, be in pain, perspire heavily, and fall into a trance. But the result, the Qur'an, is said by believers to be inimitable.

WAILING WALL. Known in Hebrew as Kotel Maaravi, which means "Western Wall," the Wailing Wall is the last remnant of the Temple complex in Jerusalem. Throughout the centuries it was a place of "wailing" and religious pilgrimages and prayers. It is about 160 feet long and 60 feet high. Arabs and Jews have had frequent arguments about its use by the Jews as a place of worship, despite the fact that the Western Wall came under the protection of the British during their administration in Palestine. in 1929, the League of Nations guaranteed the Jews access to the Western Wall under British protection. Following the establishment of the State of Israel and the War of Liberation in 1948, the old city of Jerusalem was occupied by Jordan. Contrary to the provisions of the armistice between the State of Israel and Jordan for free access to the Western Wall, the approach to it was forbidden to Jews. With the Six-Day War in 1967, Israel regained the old city, and Jews could once again go to the Western Wall.

WALDENSES. A Protestant communion that still survives, particularly in the valleys of northwest Italy, and traces its roots back at least to the twelfth century. The name of the movement derives from Peter Waldo (properly Valdes), a merchant of Lyons, who adopted a life of apostolic poverty in 1173 and organized the Poor Men of Lyons to spread the vernacular Scriptures. Later, they were more generally called Vaudois. Some historians seek to trace the Waldenses back to the days of the apostle Paul and others to the time of Constantine in the fourth century. There are those who trace the etymology of the name Waldenses to the Latin word for valley (vallis), but their twelfth-century origin and Peter Valdes as their founder is more likely correct.

The Waldenses sought to be strictly orthodox, but after a time they ignored the church's insistence that they preach only when permitted by the clergy. Soon their own clergy (barbis) conducted an itinerant ministry that spread their influence all over Europe. They doubted the validity of the sacraments when they were administered by unworthy priests. The Waldenses were ascetics who believed in visions, prophecies, and spirit possession. They also were committed to millenarian views. Prayers for the dead and veneration of the saints and relics were on their proscribed list.

During the Inquisition, the Waldenses suffered persecution, and their numbers were reduced. But they survived in the mountain valleys of the Savoy and Piedmont. After contact with Geneva, early in the sixteenth century, the Waldenses accepted the major doctrines of the Reformed faith. In 1532 they convened a synod at Chanforans at which they adopted the Genevan Confession of Faith, which included the doctrine of predestination. They also renounced their ties with the Roman church.

General J. C. Beckwith, a British officer, lived with the Waldenses in the nineteenth century and exerted a strong influence on them. He prevailed upon them to give up French as their language and to speak Italian. With Beckwith's encouragement, they established 120 schools.

Today the Waldenses enjoy freedom of worship and respect in both Roman Catholic and Protestant circles. They operate a theological seminary in Rome.

WALI. A Muslim saint. In its original meaning of "friend," the term was used of those especially close to God. In time the people applied it to the Sufi mystics, many of whom were regarded as saints while still alive. A system of graded ranks of saints developed, and devout followers collected stories of the lives of the saints. Many saints have had only a local following, but others are revered widely. In time the tombs of saints attracted pilgrims who made vows to the saints and prayed to them as intermediaries between humans and God. The veneration of saints was the occasion by which non-Muslim practices came to be observed.

In India and other parts of the world, incidents from the lives of the saints were popular subjects for artists. One of the saints often portrayed by Indian Muslims was Ibrahim ibn Adhan, known in English literature through the poem "Abu Ben Adhem" by Leigh Hunt. Orthodox theologians regarded such veneration as contrary to Islam. The Wahhabi reform movement, especially influential in Saudi Arabia, destroyed many tombs of saints and declared that worship at tombs was idolatry (shirk). K.C.

WAR. Refers primarily to armed conflict among nation-states or between contending forces within a nation-state, to the military actions and violence associated with such conflict, and to the condition of open and declared hostility that is the context of intra- or international conflict and violence. The term is used also in a secondary, metaphorical sense to refer to any condition of continuing hostility and strife, as in the "war of the sexes" or "class war." It is an end to war in the primary meaning that the prophetic heritage of the Hebrew and Christian faiths affirms: "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2:4). It is the primary meaning that Carl von Clausewitz uses in his classic Vom Kriege (1933; Eng. trans. On War, 1873) when he defines war as a rational, limited instrument of national policy, as calculated acts of violence designed to force the actions of others into line with that national policy.

The Causes of War. In varied forms, war has been a pervasive element in human interaction as far into the past as historical memory reaches. While means as diverse as marital alliances, political and diplomatic stratagems, economic pressures and lures, and threats of violence have been used by rulers to attain their ends, war has remained one of the most powerful ways to enforce the will of governments. The causes of war, therefore, occupy the same spectrum as those goals that have at particular times motivated leaders of states and nations. Among the most prominent of these are: the accumulation of more power; the acquisition of additional wealth, especially territory, productive lands, taxable people, and profitable economic rights and enterprises; the desire for honor, status, and glory that wars once provided in abundance; and for attaining the security of space to live and food to eat or for the maintenance of security by defending the group and its resources against attack. As human conditions and capabilities have changed over the centuries, the valence and mix of these causes have altered, but so has war itself and its problems for society.

War as an Escalating Problem. War has always been a problem for those who were victims of its violence and cruelty. For rulers and military leaders, however, it has usually been regarded as providing opportunities for glory, wealth, and power as well as absolutely essential for defense. In recent centuries, and especially in recent decades, changes have occurred in war that have magnified its problems so greatly as to render meaningless most benefits it has traditionally been thought to offer. The most significant of these changes are these:

(a) The shift to total war is one striking change that has occurred. War for the empires and kingdoms of the past was a concern mainly of rulers and soldiers. Alexander the Great assembled his army, marched off to war, fought a succession of armies, and, with the defeat of each army and its leader, conquered yet another empire. War could bring a different ruler and at times impinge violently on a sector of the people, but for the most part it was peripheral to ordinary life and did no more than decide which oppressive tyrant would occupy the throne. In the modern world, the entire populace has been increasingly involved in war. First, a large number and a broader cross-section of people became part of the armies as more egalitarian weapons like the longbow and then the musket replaced the more elite weaponry of an armored knight on horseback. Second, the increasing economic and political power of the emerging middle class meant wider participation in the decisions regarding war. Third, the industrial revolution produced improved weaponry and vehicles for warfare, requiring revised strategy and tactics that combined armies, navies, political economies, and, later, air power for a new type of conflict involving total societies in waging war and in enduring attacks by the enemy. War in the twentieth century has become relentlessly more total. By World War II this process had developed to the point where it was possible to speak of total war in the sense of the war effort and the consequences of the struggle reaching into every sector of the nation. The saturation bombing of cities at times made it safer to be in the armed forces than at home.

(b) The development of nuclear weapons has been even more decisive in escalating the problems of war and, indeed, turning war into a mortal peril for culture, human life, and perhaps for all forms of life on planet Earth. Weaponry changed very slowly in the ancient and medieval worlds but developed with alarming rapidity in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. First, rifling made it possible to fire greater distances with accuracy. Second, larger guns and improved vehicles increased the firepower of weapons and the rapidity for delivering devastating explosives. Third, the development of nuclear devices, combined with jet aircraft, rockets, and computerized control for long-distance, rapid, and accurate delivery, now provides the capability for the total destruction of nations and human life. These changes mean that war is no longer a pervasive and troublesome phenomenon on the periphery of society but has become a threat to entire peoples and nations through its total involvement and because of its capability of total destruction. The violence of war, always massive, has now, with the advent of nuclear weaponry, made the end of human history a clear and present danger.

Ethics and War. Reflection on the moral significance of war has taken place through much of human history in social contexts where conflict and violence were accepted elements of the customs and mores. Teachings that have provided increasingly critical perspectives on war have emerged gradually, in response to human suffering, from religious faith, and based on the perceived dangers of war.

(a) Emerging criticism appears gradually from multiple sources. The teaching of Taoism, though not directly critical of war, include the notion of wu-wei as a pattern of non-action leading to inward balance and peace. Jainism, emerging from Hinduism in the fifth century B.C., developed the ethical concept of ahimsa as non-violence toward living creatures, a notion that has been influential in Buddhism and Hinduism and, through exemplars like Gandhi, in the global community. In the Hellenic period, exhaustion from the wars among Greek city-states led to ideas of escape from violence and of benevolence toward others. The Hellenistic period witnessed the development of the practice of amnesty toward conquered peoples and the emergence of the notion of universal humanity. Though war is condoned in ancient Hebrew ethics, the OT contains strong admonitions for mercy and justice toward the oppressed and also a powerful understanding of God's covenant developing in history toward conditions of greater peace and with justice. The ethical teachings of the NT, especially Jesus' emphasis on turning the other cheek and loving one's enemies, have fueled growing opposition to war in Western society. The critique of war emerging around the globe from diverse communities, combined today with the massive threat of nuclear weapons, has produced broad-based and powerful movements opposed to war and to the policies of nations that lead toward war.

(b) Ethical perspectives on war resulting from these developments can be delineated with the following patterns: (1) Conventions governing the way war is waged that mitigate its violence but accept its existence. In ancient days, such conventions were minimal and often not observed. During the medieval period, the customs associated with knighthood dealt with the methods of fighting and the appropriate behavior of victor and vanquished. In recent centuries, customs governing warfare have been formulated and ratified by nations and international bodies such as the Red Cross, designated to oversee compliance. Under the League of Nations and the United Nations a body of international law related to war has been shaped. (2) PACIFISM holds that war is wrong and must be rejected as a means of settling human conflicts or attaining collective goals. A significant minority movement in both the Hindu/Buddhist and Christian traditions, pacifism has become much more widespread and influential in the twentieth century through the work of leaders like Mahatma Gandhi and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. (3) The just war ethic, based on Roman thought, is the traditional Roman Catholic position, though it has been widely influential beyond the bounds of that church. The just war ethic lays down criteria for war: just cause, declared and waged by legitimate political authority, begun as a last resort, just methods in waging war, reasonable expectation of successful outcome, results less evil than if not undertaken, just intentions, and carried out as a path to a better condition of peace. (4) The view of war as crusade, to be carried out as religious duty, can be based upon a few passages in the OT but appears most prominently in the Islamic view of war and in the view held by Christian leaders of the Middle Ages who initiated and encouraged the Crusades against the Muslims. (5) The position of political realism holds that all social collectivities, including nations, act only out of motives charged with interests of survival, power, and acquisitiveness. The use of force and the waging of war are inevitable and must be brought insofar as possible under the control of justice by means of the balance of power. (6) Nuclear pacifism affirms that the tremendous peril of nuclear war requires that it be rejected. This does not mean, however, that limited wars, that is, wars not using nuclear weapons, are unacceptable and even unnecessary. Under no circumstances, due to its destructive potential for all, can nuclear war serve the national interest of any nation.

War and the Future. Given the escalation of weaponry and the probability that all parties would be annihilated in a nuclear war, it would be easy to suppose that war is now impossible. Not at all. Instead the superpowers continue to produce more and more nuclear warheads and increasingly larger and faster means to deliver them to enemy territory. Nuclear weapons exist in sufficient numbers not only to destroy the entire world a hundred times over but with enough left over "to make the rubble bounce," as Winston Churchill phrased it. In addition, there is the problem of the proliferation of nuclear weapons and the possibility of nuclear bombs falling into the hands of terrorists. The situation has a desperate quality that makes such positions as the just war ethic with its rational calculations seem quaint. With reference to war today, reality has walked off the ethical maps of the past.

As never before, war and the future are opposed to each other. If there is to be a future for humans, it will be because war as it can now be waged has been avoided and the causes of war contained within social structures. The dimensions of the problem are at last emerging with clarity.

Karl Barth has placed war in perspective for the Christian community in Church Dogmatics. According to Barth, the traditional and continuing view that war is a normal and acceptable way to pursue the policies of nations has become, given the possibilities of war today, "an increasingly unbearable perversion of Christian truth." War now involves total civil communities so that all suffer and inflict suffering. War now makes enemies of people and communities because of differing national loyalties, not because some are guilty and others innocent. And war now is total because its possibilities of destruction are total and because it involves not only killing but all other sins as well. War means killing without glory, without dignity, without chivalry, without restraint, and without reserve, and it just as surely means also to steal, ransack, fornicate, burn, lie, deceive, and dishonor, Barth says. And there are no longer mitigating values sufficient to begin balancing its evil.

Beyond clear perspective on the danger and evil of war, what can be done? So preoccupied with the number, complexity, and destructive potential of weaponry have many become that the only solutions are seen to be in terms of unilateral or multilateral reduction in arms, especially nuclear arms. While such reduction is undoubtedly desirable and eventually necessary, it will only come about when the means for reducing tension and building a fabric of relations based on justice and respect is achieved. Neither war nor peace is "natural" or "normal" among people either individually or collectively. Tensions and some forms of conflict are inevitable. The crucial issue is whether situations of tension can be mitigated or resolved to prevent escalation of conflict, whether agreed-upon means for adjudication of differences can be developed that will lead toward higher levels of justice, and whether covenants of shared interests and goals that transform relations toward peace can be built and reinforced. WARDEN. A lay officer in Anglican and Episcopal churches. Wardens (generally two to a parish) have been appointed in Anglican churches since the Middle Ages to care for the maintenance and furnishings of the church building. Historically, churchwardens are responsible for public order in the church and church yard and so had the power of arrest in England until the nineteenth century. J.C.

WARFIELD, BENJAMIN B. (1851-1921). Old School theologian and refiner of Princeton theology, Warfield was born near Lexington, Kentucky. He attended Princeton University (B.A. 1871; M.A. 1874) and studied (1876-77) at the University of Leipzig. After serving as assistant minister at First Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, he taught at Western Theological Seminary in Pittsburgh (1878-87).

In 1887 he became professor of didactic and polemical theology at Princeton Seminary, where he shaped the doctrine of scriptural INERRANCY. In an article with A. A. Hodge titled "Inspiration" in the Princeton Review (1881), he argued that Scripture was inerrant in the original autographs. Warfield contributed to The Fundamentals and also wrote An Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament. Published posthumously were Revelation and Inspiration, Studies in Tertullian and Augustine, Calvin and Calvinism, and two volumes on Perfectionism.

WARING, ANNA LAETITIA (1820-1910). Welsh hymn writer who lived her entire life—ninety years—in Neath, a town located on the river of the same name in southeastern Wales. As one of several gifted women writers belonging to the evangelical wing of the Church of England, Miss Waring compiled her Hymns and Meditations (1850, 1863) under the wider influence of the Oxford movement. Critics praised her hymns, which combined great lyric virtues with devotional warmth. Miss Waring's most famous hymn no doubt is "In Heavenly Love Abiding," which many regard as one of the best hymns of the nineteenth century. Another is "My Heart Is Resting, O My God." R.H.

WARNACK, JOHANNES (1867-1944). Missionary with the Batak Church in Sumatra. Born in Germany, Warnack went in 1892 as a pioneer missionary to the island of Samosir. Later he became a teacher and in 1898 director at the Rhenish Mission seminary for preachers in Sipoholon. In 1908 he was appointed to the home staff with responsibility for the mission's work in Indonesia. He went back to Sumatra as a successor to the pioneer missionary LUDWIG NOMMENSEN in 1920, and led the church there until 1931. He is known for his research into the language and primitive beliefs of the Indonesian people. He was a prolific writer and greatly influenced the public in central Europe to interest in missionary endeavors in Indonesia. W.G.

WARNECK, GUSTAV (1834-1910). Generally regarded as the founder of the Protestant science of missions. Born in Naumburg, Germany, Warneck became professor of the science of missions at the University of Halle in 1896. One of his contributions to missions was the founding of the journal Allgemeine Missionszeitschrift in 1874. This journal promoted the scientific discussion of missions and was influential in the field. Warneck also influenced missions through other publications, particularly his Sketch of the History of Protestant Missions from the Reformation to the Present Day, first published in 1892 and reprinted ten times. W.G.

WARNER, ANNA BARTLETT (1824–1915). American hymn writer and novelist. The author of "Jesus Loves Me, This I Know" was a daughter of a prosperous New York lawyer. Anna was born on August 31 in New York City. When there were reverses in the family fortune, the Warners moved to their summer home on Constitution Island in the Hudson River off West Point. Anna and her sister, Susan, turned to writing as a means of making up for their reduced circumstances. Susan wrote novels, one of which, Wide, Wide World, was a great success. This was followed by Queekey, which was almost as popular.

For fifty years the sisters devoted their Sunday afternoons to Bible classes they conducted in their home for West Point cadets. The future officers were rowed to the island and back by the Warners' hired man. Susan was the teacher of the classes until her death in 1885, and Anna took her place.

Under the pseudonym Amy Lothrop, Anna also wrote novels, including the six-volume Stories of Vinegar Hill (1873), Say and Seal (1860), and Fourth Watch (1872). She also wrote several books on gardening. However, her name will live longest for the always popular children's hymn "Jesus Loves Me," which first appeared in her novel Say and Seal. "We Would See Jesus" first appeared in another of her novels, Dollars and Sense. "One More Day's Work for Jesus" was published in her volume Wayfaring Hymns, Original and Translated. Anna Warner also compiled Hymns of the Church Militant (1858). R.H.

WASHINGTON, BOOKER T. (1856–1915). Educator and social reformer, Washington was born April 5 on the James Burroughs plantation near Roanoke, Virginia, to a slave, Jane Ferguson. After the Civil War he moved to Malden, West Virginia, where he worked in the salt furnaces and coal mines. From 1872 to 1875 he studied at Hampton (Virginia) Institute and Industrial School, to which he returned in 1879. In 1881 he was chosen by Hampton founder Samuel C. Armstrong to head the Tuskegee Normal School and Industrial Institute in Alabama.

Washington gained national recognition as an educational leader of black people in the United States and was counted among the ablest speakers of his time. He felt that blacks could stay in the South if they accepted segregation and worked on their own to gain a solid social and financial base. In 1900 he founded the National Negro Business League. His Cotton States Exposition speech in 1895 in Atlanta advocated cooperation between the races, a bold concept for the times among blacks or whites. Washington died at Tuskegee in 1915. N.H.

WATER FOR IMPURITY. Water played many ritual roles in the Hebrew law. Above all, water's use as a cleanser made it the symbol of purification from those conditions that made a person ceremonially unclean. The cleansing of lepers (Lev. 14:8) was done with water. Elisha sent Naaman the Syrian to bathe as part of his cure of leprosy. Uncleanliness brought on by illness was cleansed with water, and also the unclean state that was caused by eating unclean animals (Lev. 15:5-8; 10-13; 17:25 ff.). The "water of bitterness" was made of water and dust from the tabernacle's floor. A person suspected of adultery was forced to drink it, with the belief that the unfaithful would be revealed (Num. 5:11-31). The "water of separation" (Num. 19) was a mixture of fresh running water and the ashes of a perfect, reddish-brown heifer. It was sprinkled with a sprig of hyssop on a person who had become unclean by touching a dead body, on the third and seventh days after the contact. After a bath and clean clothes, the person was declared clean.

WATSON, RICHARD (1781–1833). Early Methodist theologian. Born in Lincolnshire, England, Watson was a Methodist traveling preacher from 1796 to 1801. From 1803 to 1809 he was secretary of the New Methodist Connexion conference. Committed to Wesleyan orthodoxy and Arminianism, Watson wrote against both special election and predestination. In his Theological Institutes (1823) Watson held that Christ died for all—for those who finally obtain salvation as well as for those who by rejecting Christ fail to be saved. The Institutes' systematic presentation of Wesley's thought was influential for British and American Methodism until the turn of the twentieth century. W.G.

WATTS, ISAAC (1674–1748). Hymn writer and clergyman; the "father of English hymnody." A son of a Dissenting schoolteacher, Watts was born on July 17, in Southhampton, England. Although a friend offered him a university education, Watts chose to attend the Dissenting Academy at Stoke Newington. In 1702 he became pastor of the Independent Church at Mark Lane, London, a post he held all his life. One of the most influential of the British hymn writers, Watts composed a total of six hundred hymns, many of which are still sung today. He first published Hymns and Spiritual Songs in 1707, which was revised in the subsequent sixteen editions. His writing gave strong impetus to hymn singing in worship services, which up to that time had chiefly employed metrical psalms. Some of his great numbers are "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross," "O God, Our Help in Ages Past," "There Is a Land of Pure Delight," and "Jesus Shall Reign." R.H.

WAVE OFFERING. An early Hebrew festival practice, undoubtedly begun after the invasion and settlement of Canaan. The first sheaves of grain to be harvested were waved before the altar as a sacrifice to Yahweh, seen as Lord of the Harvest (Lev. 23:10-15). Along with the waving of the sheaves before the altar by the priest, the farmer was also to offer a year-old male lamb, without blemish, as a burnt OFFERING. A cereal (or grain) offering of flour, oil, and wine was to be offered along with the lamb. No one was to eat of the grain harvest until this offering was made.

WAY, THE. An international religious movement founded by Victor Paul Wierwille (1917-85), a former Evangelical and Reformed minister, with headquarters in New Knoxville, Ohio.

The movement resulted from youth gatherings that were addressed by Wierwille, who took to the road in 1968 on a Harley-Davidson motorcycle at the age of fifty-one. A charismatic personality, Wierwille attracted many of the youth of the JESUS PEOPLE era. Thousands attended his "Rock of Ages Festivals."

Wierwille was a capable organizer and from "the trunk" of his Ohio headquarters grew "branches" in twenty state organizations, which in turn grew "twigs" (churches) on which "leaves" (disciples) sprouted. Newcomers are enrolled in Wierwille's "Power for Abundant Living" course, which consists of twelve three-hour sessions.

While much of what the Wierwille organization teaches has an orthodox ring to it, since 1977, at least, the founder insisted that "Christ is not God." In fact, his most strident attack on the doctrine of the Trinity is contained in his book, Jesus Christ Is Not God (1975). He also stressed the necessity for a recruit to speak in tongues, declaring that one is not regenerate unless one can do this.

Young converts, after pledging allegiance to The Way, are encouraged to leave home in order to make their full commitment. They sign up as WOW ambassadors, pledging themselves to a year's service in the movement. Wierwille's leadership trainees are enlisted in The Way Corps. Persistent reports indicate that these elite disciples are trained in military strategy, including the use of weapons.

Followers of The Way are assured that salvation will bring them successful living. One of the posters advertising Wierwille's course reads: "You Can Have Whatever You Want." Beside the 150-acre Ohio headquarters, The Way has two colleges, one in Emporia, Kansas, and one in Rome City, Indiana, as well as a mountain retreat in Colorado, and survival camps in New Mexico and Colorado, in addition to dozens of smaller properties. Estimates of the number of The Way disciples ranges from 40,000 to 100,000. Assets of The Way have been estimated at $50 million.

WEATHERHEAD, LESLIE DIXON (1893-1976). British Methodist preacher and author. Weatherhead was born on October 14 in London. He was educated at Newton Secondary School in Leicester, Richmond Theological College, Manchester University, and London University. Serving with the Indian army in World War I, Weatherhead rose to staff captain, and after the Armistice he became an army chaplain. His first pastorate was in Madras, India. Returning to Britain in 1922, he ministered to Methodist churches in Manchester and Leeds. In 1936 he was called to serve the prestigious City Temple in London and continued in that pulpit until 1960. Thereafter for many years he was pastor emeritus.

Weatherhead wrote thirty books, many of them on the relationship of religion and psychology. In 1966 The Christian Agnostic was published. In that work Weatherhead acknowledged the difficulty of drawing a hard line between belief and unbelief. Long before it became popular, Weatherhead supported the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. He criticized the United States for being involved in the Vietnam war, and argued in favor of mercy killings. Weatherhead died at Bexhill, England, on January 3.

WEBER, MAX (1864-1920). German sociologist and economist. Born in Erfurt, Germany, on April 21, Weber was educated at the University of Heidelberg and later in Berlin and Göttingen. A professor at Berlin, Freiburg, Munich, and Heidelberg, Weber pioneered in developing a methodology for social science. He opposed the Marxian view that economics is the determinant factor in social causation, insisting that the dynamic factors were much more complex than that. He stressed the role of religious values and ideologies and the place of charismatic leaders in shaping societies.

In Weber's major work, Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1920), he developed a thesis concerning the intimate connection between the ascetic ideal fostered by Calvinism and the rise of capitalistic institutions. He advocated that Germany establish a democratic form of government similar to the American model. Other works by Weber include Theory of Social and Economic Organization and Methodology of the Social Sciences.

WEEKS, FEAST OF. One of the three great holy days of the Jews, the Feast of Weeks is also known as the Day of Firstfruits, the Feast of Harvest, the Assembly, the Completion, Pentecost, and the Feast of the Reaping. Originally this festival of harvest had probably been a typical Canaanite agricultural celebration that the Hebrews adopted as their own, a time to celebrate the end of the barley reaping.

In ancient Israel the time probably varied from place to place and from year to year, depending on the locale and the weather. Later the date settled down, seven weeks after the OFFERING of a sheaf of barley at the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Exod. 23:16). When the Feast of Unleavened Bread later merged into the Passover, the date apparently became fixed throughout the country, no matter when the harvest was completed. At the Feast of Unleavened Bread the ritual was to offer at the altar two loaves without leaven, but at the Feast of Weeks, the two loaves from the new crop were required to be like those of the daily diet—leavened (Lev. 23:17). Exodus 34:18 refers to a pilgrimage of weeks, as people brought forward their individual offering of loaves.

This was traditionally a time of merriment and celebration, with the assurance there would again be bread for the coming year. The Priestly Code (Lev. 23:15-23) also required sacrifices of seven lambs, two young bulls, and a ram. During the rites God was honored as the provider of the land, a land overflowing with milk and honey. The males did a liturgical dance around the altar, now a form of worship nearly extinct except in the rites of ancient Christian Copts and Amharics. This was also the occasion for chanting the great Hallel or hallelujah, as found in Psalms 113-118. After the religious ceremonies there was a huge FEAST for everyone in the neighborhood, including the poor, the travelers, the non-Jews, and the strangers. Sometimes local villages continued to offer individual gifts of loaves until the time of the Feast of the Booths.

Associating the modern Christian festival of Pentecost and its outpouring of the Holy Spirit with the Feast of Weeks, some authorities say, is not justified, even if both occurred historically at the same time. In nineteenth-century Germany several Jewish rabbis developed for the first time the concept of celebrating Jewish confirmation, bar mitzvah and bat mitzvah, on this feast, perhaps to conform to Christian custom. This pattern is now fairly common among many Jews.

WEIL, SIMONE (1909-43). French philosopher, mystic, and writer on socio-political and religious topics. Her brilliant, passionate, uncompromising, and often enigmatic life and writings have accorded her the reputation of both genius and saint. Born in Paris into a well-to-do and intellectual Jewish family, Simone Weil's academic career was a brilliant success. She taught in a number of secondary schools and became engaged in left-wing politics.

Throughout her short life she fought for the weak and the oppressed but never joined a political party. Taking leave from her teaching, she worked as a farm laborer and for a year in a Renault auto factory, but this came to an end because of illness.

The years 1936 to 1943 were a period of intense religious speculation and personal agony of soul. She was drawn to the Catholic Church and its spirituality but refused to be baptized. She was intensely Jewish but castigated Judaism and rejected much of the OT. She lived in exile at the time of the German occupation but sought unsuccessfully to return from London to join the forces of the Resistance. Denied this, she sought to share in the privations of her countrymen. She allowed herself to die of hunger while a tuberculosis patient at the Ashford Sanatorium, Kent, at the age of thirty-three. Among her posthumously published books are Gravity and Grace (Eng. trans., 1952), The Need for Roots (1952), Waiting for God (1951), and The Notebooks of Simone Weil, 2 vols. (1956).

WELLHAUSEN, JULIUS (1844-1918). Famous German Lutheran biblical scholar and Orientalist, born in Hameln on May 17. Wellhausen is widely known for his studies on the documentary theory of the composition of the Hexateuch (the first six books of the OT).

Wellhausen's chief works are the Prolegomena and the Komposition des hexateuchs, at one time the standard texts in all scientific biblical study. Every student of the OT came to know Wellhausen's view on J, E, D, P, the basic documents he believed underlay the received texts of Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, and Joshua. Much of Wellhausen's more startling theories have been modified by later scholars but, in the main, the DOCUMENTARY HYPOTHESIS—though often challenged by conservatives—remains a major element in biblical study and exegesis. Wellhausen's higher education was at Göttingen. He taught at Greifswold, Halle, and Marburg. From 1892 to 1918 he taught at Göttingen. His works are extensive; some of the more important are Israelitische und Judische Geschichte; Reste arabischen Heidentums; Das Evangelium Marci; Das Evangelium Matthai; Das Evangelium Lucae; and Das Evangelium Johannis. Wellhausen died at Göttingen on January 7.

WELTANSCHAUUNG. The German term for "world view" or basic unexamined philosophical outlook. The term is widely used with reference to attempts to understand the way biblical writers viewed the world around them, especially in the work of Rudolf Bultmann and his school, who sought to "demythologize" the NT.

WESLEY, CHARLES (1707-88). The co-founder of Methodism and a most prolific hymn writer. The eighteenth child of Samuel and Susanna Wesley, Charles was born on December 18, at Epworth, a symbol of his parents' reconciliation. At age nine he followed his older brothers Samuel and John to Westminster School in London. In 1726 he enrolled at Christ Church College, Oxford. There he drew together a group of friends into a "Holy Club," which was eventually dubbed "Methodist." John joined the group later.

In 1735 Charles was ordained a priest of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and joined General James Oglethorpe's expedition to Georgia. There Charles served as secretary to Oglethorpe and chaplain to Ft. Frederica. After a brief but stormy stint, Charles returned to England.

After John's return from Georgia in 1738, the brothers came under the influence of MORAVIAN Peter Bohler. Charles experienced conversion on May 21, three days before John's Aldersgate experience. Despite a reprimand from the archbishop of Canterbury, he joined his brother and their friend GEORGE WHITEFIELD in preaching the Wesleyan revival.

In 1748 Charles married Sarah Gwynne in Wales. They had a daughter and two sons, Charles and Samuel, both of whom were musical prodigies. Samuel became a Roman Catholic. A fiery preacher but a mediocre organizer, Charles the senior gave up the itineracy in 1756 and settled in Bristol. In 1771 he returned to London, where he lived until his death on March 29, 1788. He is buried in the churchyard of St. Marylebone.

It is said that one can sing the theology of John in the hymns of Charles. Between 1737 and 1742 they published six volumes of hymns. The United Methodist Book of Hymns contains seventy-three of his songs, the Episcopal Hymnal eighteen, and the Presbyterian Worshipbook ten. His best-known hymns include "And Can It Be?"; "Christ the Lord Is Risen Today"; "Christ, Whose Glory Fills the Skies"; "Come, Holy Ghost, Our Hearts Inspire"; "Come, Thou Long Expected Jesus"; "Hark! The Herald Angels Sing"; "Love Divine, All Loves Excelling"; and "O for a Thousand Tongues." N.H.

WESLEY, JOHN (1703-91). The founder of Methodism was born on June 17 in Epworth, England, the fifteenth child and second son of Samuel and Susanna Annesley Wesley. In 1709 John was saved when angry parishioners set fire to the Epworth rectory, and thereafter John always considered himself "a brand plucked out of the burning."

In 1714 he entered Charterhouse school in London, and in June 1720, he enrolled at Christ Church College, Oxford. Wesley was ordained a deacon in 1725, elected a fellow at Lincoln College, Oxford, in 1726, and a priest in 1728. After a period as curate for his father in Wroot, he returned to Oxford in 1729 as a tutor and leader of the HOLY CLUB, founded by his brother CHARLES WESLEY. In 1733 John preached on "The Circumcision of the Heart," signaling his own growing belief that a personal experience of God's grace was essential.

During his 1735 trip to Georgia, he met a group of Moravians, who caused him to question his own faith. He was appointed rector of Christ Church, Savannah, and served there until he "ran away" in 1737. His return to England was due in part to a failed love affair with a young woman named Sophy Hopkey and also disillusionment over the lack of spiritual discipline among his parishioners.

John Wesley

The year 1738 has been called "the year of grace" in Wesley's life. On February 7 he met Moravian Peter Bohler, who encouraged him to "preach faith until you have it." During a meeting of a small group at Aldersgate on May 24, Wesley found his "heart was strangely warmed" during the reading of Martin Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans. That summer he visited the Moravians in Germany and met COUNT NICHOLAS VON ZINZENDORF. He later (1740) rejected Moravian teaching and separated from their Fetter Lane Society.

Influenced by reading Jonathan Edwards' Faithful Narrative, Wesley agreed to succeed George Whitefield in preaching to the miners near Bristol in April 1739. In 1739 he preached on "Free Grace" at Bristol and for the first time at the Foundry in London, which became the Methodist headquarters. United societies were organized in 1739, and the first official Methodist society was formed in July 1740 with the first annual conference in June 1744. The Articles of Religion were drawn up at this conference and were based to a considerable extent on the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England.

About the same time Wesley began to hear reports of people who believed that they were "saved from all sin." He published his Plain Account of Christian Perfection first in 1766, with the fourth and definitive edition published in 1777. Influenced by mysticism, he concluded that one could begin a process of sanctification after one was converted, and that one could attain entire sanctification or Perfect Love before death. Wesley, however, never claimed to have attained it himself, though many of his followers did so claim.

Wesley was unlucky in matters of the heart. In 1748 he was nursed back to health by Grace Murray in Newcastle and announced his intentions to marry her. But interference by Charles resulted in her marriage to John Bennet. In February of 1751 John Wesley married Mary Vazeille, a marriage that was marked by discord until her death in 1781.

Having initially encouraged the American Revolution, Wesley appointed THOMAS COKE and FRANCIS ASBURY as superintendents of the American work in 1784. He tried to keep his followers within the Church of England but did not succeed. Wesley's major writings are his Journals, Explanatory Notes Upon the New Testament, the Standard Sermons (4 vols.), and voluminous letters. A writer who developed his theology in the midst of his preaching, he emphasized universal atonement and human freedom to respond affirmatively to the gospel. Well-versed in church history, Wesley had a reverence for classical spirituality and the liturgy of the Church of England. A traditionalist, he hesitated, yet felt compelled by circumstances, to license and ordain lay people.

WESTCOTT, BROOKE FOSS (1825–1901). English prelate and NT scholar. His education at Cambridge brought him into close touch with men who subsequently were to be his collaborators, especially J. B. LIGHTFOOT and F. J. A. Hort, the so-called Cambridge trio. He moved along well-worn paths of preferment and advancement in the English public school system and church offices, proceeding first to Harrow School, where he was a teacher. He moved to a residentiary canonry at Peterborough cathedral, and thence back to Cambridge as professor of divinity. He became a Fellow at King's College, Cambridge (1882), a canon of Westminster (1884), and bishop of Durham (1890). One of the interests he showed, in addition to his academic and administrative innovations, was in a school for the training of the ministry, later to become Westcott House, a seminary for episcopal ordinands.

His switch from the academe to the high office in the Church of England as bishop of Durham came in succession to Lightfoot. At Durham he showed continued interest in ordination candidates as well as the social well-being of men and women in a depressed area of the English northeast. In 1892 he was instrumental in settling a miners' strike.

His literary work brought him into close liaison with Hort; together they published in 1881 a new scientifically prepared text of the Greek Testament, which gave preference to the manuscripts Sinaiticus (Aleph) and Vaticanus (B). This edition lay at the basis of the Revised Version translation of 1895. Westcott's work as a biblical commentator is especially valuable, with important writings on the Gospel of John, the Johannine Epistles, and the Letter to the Hebrews. His knowledge of the early church fathers was extensive, and with Lightfoot and Hort he shared a theological position of enlightened conservatism and churchly allegiance. R.M.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. One of the great shrines of the Church of England and of the English nation. Its official name is the Collegiate Church of St. Peter in Westminster. The precise date of the founding of the abbey is unknown, but it was rebuilt and restored by King Edward the Confessor, who died in 1066 and whose remains are buried in the abbey. A new rebuilding of the church began in 1245 and went on intermittently for several centuries. In 1540 the monastery was dissolved, and a collegiate church under a dean and canons was set up as a royal peculiar, independent of the bishop of London. The abbey contains the coronation chair, and here the kings and queens of England have been crowned for many centuries. The tombs of many of them are also within the abbey, as are memorials to many famous Britons. (See photo on next page.)

WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY. During the struggle between king and Parliament in England,

Westminster Abbey

Parliament summoned an assembly of divines in 1643, and charged them with the task of reforming the church in a PURITAN direction. The Assembly was overwhelmingly Presbyterian in its composition, but it was not, strictly speaking, a church synod but a creation of Parliament. The Assembly continued to meet for about ten years. The place of meeting was Westminster Abbey, from which the body became known as the Westminster Assembly. Its principal work was to draw up various documents for the projected national Presbyterian church of the future. These documents included not only the well-known WESTMINSTER CONFSSION of Faith and the WESTMINSTER CATECHISMS, but also the Directory for the Public Worship of God, and the Form of Presbyterial Church Government. The Assembly was never officially dissolved. Its work gained full acceptance only in Scotland, though only a tiny minority of its members were Scottish and they attended only part of the proceedings.

J.M.

WESTMINSTER CATECHISMS. There are two Westminster Catechisms, the Larger Catechism and the Shorter Catechism, both produced by the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY in 1647. The Larger Catechism is a more popular version of the teaching of the WESTMINSTER CONFSSION of Faith. The Shorter Catechism is much better known because it was widely taught to children and is still in use in some Presbyterian churches. The first question and answer are very well known: "What is the chief end of man?" "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him for ever."

J.M.

WESTMINSTER CONFSSION. This was the Confession of Faith produced by the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY and was intended to become the standard of doctrine for the whole of the British Isles. In fact, it had lasting influence only in the (Presbyterian) Church of Scotland, a strange irony since only eight out of the 159 members of the Assembly were from Scotland. However, the Westminster Confession has continued to be the standard of doctrine (after the Bible) in the Church of Scotland and in many of the Presbyterian churches of the English-speaking world.

The Confession consists of thirty-three short chapters. The first asserts the authority of the Scriptures, understood as the canonical books of the OT and NT, and each point of doctrine is supported by one or more references to so-called "proof texts" from the Bible. The second chapter treats of God, conceived in a strongly monarchical way, while the third goes on immediately to the eternal decree of predestination, whereby "some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death." In the words of G. S. Hendry, "The Gospel is construed in the framework of a gigantic drama, which begins when God in his eternal decree separates the elect from the reprobate, and ends at the last judgment when he separates the righteous from the wicked for all eternity; and at every stage of the drama as it unfolds, the Confession seeks the motif in the separation that is going on beneath the surface (where they are mixed up together) between the good and the bad." The stress on double predestination is perhaps even more extreme than is found in Calvin. Another related emphasis is the sharp distinction between the visible and the invisible church.

With the liberalizing of theology in the nineteenth century, the Confession became increasingly an embarrassment to the churches that subscribed to it. Some of them have revised or replaced it, but because of the difficulty of doing this, a more common practice has been to modify the terms of assent required of ministers. In the Church of Scotland, what is required is acceptance of "the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith contained in the Confession of Faith of this Church, recognizing liberty of opinion on such points of doctrine as do not enter into the substance of the faith." But just what "the substance of the faith" comprises is not stated.

WHITE, ELLEN GOULD HARMON (1827–1915). Prophetess and pioneer leader of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Although Ellen White cannot properly be called the founder of Seventh-day Adventism, she is revered greatly as one of its significant figures.

Ellen was born in Gorham, Maine, to devout Methodist parents, followers of WILLIAM MILLER, a Baptist minister who had predicted that the Lord's Second Coming would occur in 1844. Ellen was a teenager when she had her first vision, shortly after the Great Disappointment (the wave of feeling that followed the failure of Miller's prediction regarding the time of Christ's return).

After marrying James White, an Adventist elder, in 1846, Ellen continued to experience visions or revelations—about two thousand in her lifetime. She wrote forty-five books and four thousand articles. One of her works, Steps to Christ, reached a circulation of 5 million copies and appeared in eighty-five languages. Another important volume dealing with Adventist doctrines was entitled In Defense of the Faith.

In 1855 the Whites moved to Battle Creek, Michigan which became the headquarters of the burgeoning church. Although her prophetic utterances formed much of the doctrinal basis of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, Ellen recoiled from a leadership role. In 1903 the church headquarters was moved to Takoma Park in Washington, D.C.

Besides prophecies dealing with doctrine, Ellen also had many visions dealing with health and diet, which has long been emphasized by ADVENTISTS. Her vegetarian protege, Dr. John H. Kellogg, made Battle Creek the nation's breakfast cereal center.

WHITE FATHERS. The Society of Missionaries of Africa commonly known as White Fathers because of their hooded capes and white robes. The society was founded by the archbishop of Algiers, Charles Lavigerie, in 1868. Its priests and brothers come from Europe, the United States and Canada. The order, first founded to care for thousands of homeless Arab children in Algiers, eventually conducted missionary work throughout the African continent. The White Fathers have concentrated their attention on the training of African clergy. W.G.

WHITEFIELD, GEORGE (1714–70). The primary evangelist of the first GREAT AWAKENING and colleague of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY was born December 16 in Gloucester, England, to Thomas and Elizabeth Edwards Whitefield. In 1732 George entered Pembroke College, Oxford, where he shortly met Charles Wesley and joined the HOLY CLUB. During an illness in the spring of 1735 he experienced "new birth." Recuperating in Gloucester, he converted friends, started a religious society, and was ordained deacon in Gloucester Cathedral (1736). He received his B.A. from Oxford in June 1736.

Already well known as a preacher, he traveled to Georgia, landing in Savannah in May 1738 and returning in September. Criticized as an enthusiast and as one who drew "the wrong crowd," he was forced to preach out-of-doors, beginning in 1739 to the colliers (coal miners) near Bristol and later to the well-to-do at summer resorts. It is said that as many as twenty thousand people were reached by Whitefield in one setting. In August 1739 he again sailed for America to erect Bethesda, an orphanage near Savannah. He preached from Georgia to Massachusetts, mostly in Presbyterian and Congregational churches, including those of Jonathan Edwards and Gilbert Tennent.

He returned to England in 1741 and became engaged in a controversy with the Wesleys over predestination and free grace. A chapel on Tottenham Court Road in London became the center of his activity. In 1741 he was made perpetual moderator of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Conference. In August 1744 he again sailed for America, landing in York, Maine, and spending the next year in New England and two years in the South. In 1748 he returned to England, via Bermuda, and was named chaplain by Selina, Countess of Huntingdon. After four more visits to America, he died of asthma while ministering in Newburyport, Massachusetts.

WHITING, WILLIAM (1825–78). British educator and hymn writer. In the work Hymns and Human Life, Erik Routley, a British hymnologist, calls William Whiting's "Eternal Father, Strong to Save"

"a national possession." Actually, it was the only hymn Whiting ever wrote. It is still known to worshippers in the church today by its famous tune Melita by J. B. Dykes. Whiting served as master of the Winchester College Choristers' School for more than thirty-five years (1842–78). His single contribution to Christian hymnody was created under the influence of the Tractarian movement in the Anglican Church, which sought to maintain the beauty of ancient liturgy. Whiting's great work first appeared in Hymns Ancient and Modern (1868). R.H.

WHITMAN, WALT (1819–92). American poet, born May 31 on Long Island to Walter and Louisa Van Velson Whitman, who were Hicksite Quakers. In 1823 the family moved to Brooklyn, New York. With very little education, Whitman at age eleven became an office boy. At thirteen he became a printer's devil, beginning three decades in newspaper offices as a typesetter, printer, writer, reporter, and editor.

Over a seven-year period he wrote his most notable work, Leaves of Grass, first published in 1855 with twelve poems. It was revised and expanded in nine editions (1856–92); its two great themes were love and death. The work reflects his loneliness, his isolation, and his struggle to understand himself as a human being. During the Civil War he moved from New York to Washington, where he worked in military hospitals as a volunteer and later as a clerk in the Department of the Interior. After a stroke in January 1873 he returned to Camden, New Jersey, to live with his brother George. Lionized in Europe, he was regarded by American critics as too innovative in his poetic techniques. His other works include Drum Taps (1865), Passage to India (1871), and the prose work Democratic Vistas (1870). N.H.

WHITSUNDAY. White Sunday or the Day of Pentecost. The term is from English popular usage from the twelfth century to the present. The name derives from the white baptismal garments of the babies traditionally baptized on this festival. There is also Whitsun Eve, the eve of Pentecost. J.C.

WHITTIER, JOHN GREENLEAF (1807–92). American Quaker poet and abolitionist. Born on December 17 on a farm near Haverhill, Massachusetts, Whittier developed a love for nature and rural life. Although his formal education was limited, he became an insatiable reader. He was early influenced by the poetry of Robert Burns, which started him on his own poetical career. His first verse was published in 1831.

Early in his life, Whittier met William Lloyd Garrison, the great abolitionist, whose influence plus his own ancestral Quakerism caused him to embrace the antislavery cause. Garrison, then editor of the Newburyport Free Press, published Whittier's first poetry in 1826. The turning point in Whittier's life was the publication in 1833 of his Justice and Expediency, a powerful abolitionist document. That same year he entered politics and by 1834 had been elected to the Massachusetts legislature. He broke with Garrison in 1843 but continued in politics and was active in the formation of the Republican party. He supported Abraham Lincoln's campaign for the presidency.

After the Civil War, Whittier withdrew from political life that had brought him much persecution and settled in Amesbury (Mass.), to spend the rest of his life writing poetry. His verse can be described in four categories: religious poetry, antislavery poems, rhymed legends and historical ballads, and poems of nature and rural life—especially emphasizing the glories of New England. Probably his best known work was Snowbound (1866).

It is ironic that a Quaker who attended services where hymns are never sung should have authored so many verses that became popular Protestant hymns. Some of the most familiar hymns are: "Dear Lord and Father of Mankind," "Immortal Love, Forever Full," "I Know Not What the Future Hath," and "All Things Are Thine."

Whittier died on September 7 in Amesbury.

WHOLLY OTHER. See BARTH, KARL.

WIDOW. The surviving female spouse of a deceased man. In biblical times widows were treated with respect and pity and protected by the covenant laws (Deut. 16:11; 26:12; 27:19). Widows had special privileges in gathering the remainder of the crops (Deut. 24:19 ff.) and taking part in sacrifices and feasts (Deut. 14:29). The third-year tithe was divided with widows. J.C.

WIEMAN, HENRY NELSON (1884–1975). American philosopher and theologian associated with the "Chicago School" of Protestant modernism, especially influential between 1910 and 1940. Wieman graduated from Park College in Missouri; San Francisco Theological Seminary; studied in Jena and Heidelberg in Germany; and completed his doctorate in philosophy at Harvard. He taught at Occidental College and at the Divinity School of the University of Chicago from 1927 until his retirement in 1949. The greatest intellectual influence on Wieman was the scientific experimentalism and instrumentalism of JOHN DEWEY. Among Wieman's most important religious writings are Religious Experience and Scientific Method (1926), The Wrestle of Religion with Truth (1927), Source of Human Good (1946), and Directive in History (1949).

Wieman insists that knowledge of God is subject to scientific experiment and is derived from our experience of those qualities, events, and processes that constitute the natural world. For Wieman, God is the source of creative good, that process or event which endures, through frustration and destructive conflict, to enhance the qualitative meaning of life. Wieman calls God the creative event. Humans do not create their own good but are called upon to commit themselves to God, the source of creative good. Wieman's particular form of naturalistic theology has few adherents today, but its influence can perhaps be seen in the return to a more empirically based theology. J.L.

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM (1759–1833). The politician and philanthropist was born August 24 in Hull, Yorkshire. He attended Cambridge University and entered the House of Commons in 1780, a supporter of parliamentary reform and Roman Catholic political emancipation. From 1787 on he worked to abolish the slave trade and then slavery itself in the British colonies. Wilberforce was a leader of the Proclamation Society, a society founded in 1787 for the "reformation of manners," and the Society for Effecting the Abolition of the Slave Trade, which after 1823 was called the Society for the Mitigation and Gradual Abolition of Slavery Throughout the British Dominions. Despite disheartening opposition Wilberforce and his associates went on to form the Anti-Slavery Association in 1823. They were often called the Clapham Sect.

Their first success was abolition of the slave trade in the British West Indies in 1807. Their goal was finally accomplished in 1833, when all slavery was abolished in the West Indies. Wilberforce, however, had retired from Commons in 1825. A month after his death the Emancipation Bill was passed. N.H.

WILDERNESS WANDERINGS. The uncertain movements of the Israelites who escaped from Egyptian bondage under the leadership of Moses, after the plagues and the Passover culminated in the crossing of the Sea of Reeds, and their entry into the Sinai Peninsula. This forty-year pilgrimage took place in the four "wilderness" (or desert) areas of the Sinai and the wilderness areas to the east and north in the Transjordan region. The wildernesses of Sinai include the wildernesses of Shur, Sin, Paran, and Zin. The experiences of the Israelites are recorded in Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. These biblical books include a rather detailed list of spots visited by the Israelites (Num. 33 contains a list), but many of them are not yet identified by scholars. Indeed, at least two routes through the Sinai are considered probable, so it is not clear that we will ever know the exact route.

Some forty-four different sites, towns, and natural phenomena, such as mountains and oases, are mentioned in the OT as being visited during the wilderness wanderings. Traditionally, the EXODUS was across the north end of the Red Sea, but modern scholars have shown that the "Red Sea" (Exod. 13:18; 14), or yam suph in Hebrew, was the "Sea of Reeds" or the Lake of Reeds north of the modern city of Suez. The crossing of the sea was, then, across the present Suez Canal area. The wandering, then, was south, toward the apex or end of the Sinai Peninsula, where Mount Sinai (or Gebel Musa, the mountain of Moses) was probably located. The Israelites then turned north and east along the Gulf of Aqaba and proceeded north up the Arabah to skirt the east side of the Dead Sea. They entered Canaan from the Transjordan area and pushed west into the Promised Land. However, a northern route, along the Egyptian military road that linked Egypt with the Philistine cities of the Canaanite coast, has also been suggested. J.C.

WILFRID (634–709). English missionary, bishop of York, advocate of papal authority who turned England toward Roman Catholicism. A native of Northumbria, Wilfrid was educated in the Celtic monastery at Lindisfarne, but was drawn toward Roman Christianity. Between 653 and 658 he journeyed to Rome and spent three years at Lyons, France, where he learned Benedictine monasticism and received the tonsure. Returning to England, he was made abbot of Ripon, where he established the rule of Saint Benedict. At the Celtic-Roman synod of Whitby (664), he persuaded King Oswy to switch to Rome's dating of Easter and the Benedictine tonsure for monks, popular symbols of differences between Roman and Celtic Christianity. Years of struggle between the old Celtic and Roman forms of religion followed. Regarding Celtic Christianity as non-apostolic, Wilfrid received consecration as bishop of York from twelve Frankish bishops. Twice he lost possession of his bishopric and was once briefly imprisoned, but was restored on personal appeal to Rome. In the interims, he evangelized in Frisia (679) and missionized pagans in Sussex (681–686). He spent the last years of his life in a monastery at Ripon. In the long Celtic-Roman struggle in Britain, Rome contributed order and liturgy, and Celtic Christianity missionary zeal and learning. C.M.

WILLARD, FRANCES. See WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (1285–1347). English philosopher and theologian, studied and taught at Oxford University in the declining years of medieval SCHOLASTICISM. On several occasions his controversial views brought him into conflict with the authorities, and he died out of communion with the church. He was a nominalist, holding that universals have no real existence and are simply names invented by the human mind. The real things of the world are the individual entities. He did not share the confidence in reason that had been shown by earlier Scholastics, and believed that the propositions of theology cannot be established by reason and depend only on revelation. At a later time, this teaching was taken up by Luther and other Protestant Reformers.

Ockham's views are also seen as pointing the way toward later empiricism. His famous dictum, "Entities are not to be multiplied beyond what is necessary" (entia non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem), is known as "Ockham's razor," and has been revived in modern times by naturalists and positivists who claim that there is no need ever to invoke supernatural agencies. In ethics, William of Ockham denied natural law, just as he had denied NATURAL THEOLOGY, and claimed that morality depends not on the divine nature but on the will and command of God. J.M.

WILLIAMS, JOHN (1796–1839). Pioneer missionary to the South Pacific Islands. Williams, with little formal education, was apprenticed to an ironmonger in London at the age of fourteen. He experienced an intense conversion four years later, just at the time the churches were beginning to hear of the mission to the Pacific Islands. His conversion experience plus his reading of the voyages of Captain Cook stirred his missionary ambition. He was ordained into the Congregational ministry in 1816 and sailed for Tahiti, where a strong Christian movement was in progress. He began his work on the island of Raiatea and later traveled to other islands, teaching, evangelizing, and training the native workers. He also did linguistic work. On one of these voyages he was murdered by cannibals. His martyrdom inspired many others to take up the Christian cause in the South Pacific. W.G.

WILLIAMS, ROGER (about 1604–83). Regarded as the founder of the BAPTISTS in America, Williams was born in London to James and Alice Pemberton Williams. He entered Charterhouse in 1621, received a B.A. from Pembroke College, Cambridge, in January 1627, and took holy orders shortly thereafter. In December of 1629 he married Mary Barnard, and in December of 1630 they sailed for New England. A NONCONFORMIST, he criticized Boston PURITANS as an "unseparated people." Though called to the Salem church, because of interference he went to Plymouth. Two years later he returned to Salem as an assistant and in 1634 became the church's pastor over the objections of the general court. He consistently protested Puritan treatment of the Indians and moved the Salem church toward democratic policies. In 1635 the general court banished him from Massachusetts.

In 1636 he founded the first settlement in Rhode Island, Providence, a community whose government was planned as a pure democracy—a safe harbor to Jews and Quakers, complete religious LIBERTY, and SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. Williams' spiritual quest led him to become a Baptist and by 1639 a Seeker. In 1644 Williams published The Bloody Tenet of Persecution, followed in 1651 by The Bloody Tenet Yet More Bloody in which he argued that religious liberty was a natural right. N.H.

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM (1717–91). Welsh hymn writer and itinerant Methodist minister. This prolific author of some eight hundred hymns in Welsh and more than one hundred in English is probably best known for "Guide Me, O Thou Great Jehovah."

Born in the village of Cefn-y-coed, near Llandovery, Wales, on February 11, Williams was a son of an elder in the Congregational church. He was enrolled at the Dissenting Academy at Llwynllwyd, where he was converted through the witness of Howell Harris, the founder of Welsh Calvinistic Methodism. Williams later became an important agent in the Evangelical Revival, along with Christmas Evans and John Elias.

Williams joined the Church of England and was ordained as a deacon in 1740, but he was refused ordination as a priest in 1743. Serving for a time as a Anglican curate, he identified himself more closely with the Methodist Revival. His hymns contributed greatly to the Revival. He was the author of two long poems—"View of Christ's Kingdom" (1756, 1764) and "Life and Death of Theomemphus" (1764, 1781). Altogether he produced twenty-four hymn-books. R.H.

WILL OF GOD. The imposition of the will of God upon the affairs of people is a prevalent teaching in Middle Eastern religions and those of the Far East but less evident in the Western world. John Calvin rooted his theology in the idea of the sovereignty of God and its implications for PREDESTINATION in the created order. Most Calvinistic forms of Christianity have this in common. The Bible, however, is not as clear on the question of the exercise of that sovereignty as this system of thought might imply. A basic assumption in the Bible's discussion of human responsibility and accountability is the FREEDOM to make the choice to sin (Ezek. 18:1 ff.). God "judges each one impartially according to his deeds" (I Pet. 1:17). God's will is not seen in the inability of people to exercise their own will but in the encouragement of people to do the will of God: "It is God's will that by doing right you should put to silence the ignorance of foolish men" (I Pet. 2:15). God's will is not always imposed upon us: "He is forbearing toward you, not wishing that any should perish, but that all should reach repentance" (II Pet. 3:9; compare Matt. 18:14). And yet "If the righteous man is scarcely saved, where will the impious and sinner appear?" (I Pet. 4:18). Those who "suffer according to God's will" (I Pet. 4:19) are evidently those who suffer as Christians (4:16) rather than those who are predestined to suffer.

Jesus declared that those who enter the kingdom of heaven will be the ones who do "the will of my father who is in heaven" (Matt. 7:21). He said, "Whoever does the will of my father who is in heaven is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Matt. 12:50). One's capacity to do God's will is emphasized by Jesus in John 7:17: "If any man's will is to do his will, he shall know whether the teaching is from God or whether I am speaking on my own authority." Jesus came to do the will of God (John 4:34; 5:30; 6:38 ff.), and yet he was capable of exercising his own will in the temptations of Satan (Matt. 4:1; Heb. 4:15; 5:8). Paul speaks often about the will of God in his own life and in that of the believer. He considers his own call to apostleship as the will of God (I Cor. 1:1; II Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:1-4; Eph. 1:1) and emphasizes that God "accomplishes all things according to the counsel of his will" (Eph. 1:11). One should try to understand what the will of the Lord is (Eph. 5:17) and try to live by it. In order to "prove what is the will of God" one must be transformed in mind and no longer conform to the world (Rom. 12:2). It is the "will of God in Christ Jesus" to rejoice, pray, and give thanks in all circumstances (I Thess. 5:18). Clearly, then, one can and should learn what the will of God is and do "the will of God from the heart" (Eph. 6:6).

There is a meaning of the term "will of God," however, that suggests Heilsgeschichte (redemptive history), suggesting that God's purposes for humankind are firm and unalterable (Rom. 3:3-4; Eph. 1:5; Acts 22:14) as is God's purpose for the Jews (Rom. 11:5, 11). There is no contradiction in the realization that God's purposes for humankind will come to fruition and the recognition that this does not nullify human freedom in the working out of that divine will. J.R.M.

WILL TO BELIEVE. A phrase used by WILLIAM JAMES in one of his essays on pragmatism. The implication is moral: one makes a deliberate effort not to rest on opinions or think about options but to make a decision. The will to believe involves a commitment to someone or something beyond the self. The element of choice and decision is based on a hypothesis of freedom of the will. This assumes the existence of a power in the universe that supports and sustains those who make this commitment. "Believe" includes the element of "faith in" and represents a step beyond what is reasonably acceptable, although the rational faculty is involved in the decision to make the commitment; this is itself a moral stance. Existentialists, on the contrary, would define the will to believe as a solitary free-floating decision with no guarantee that anyone or anything in the universe would sustain the person. I.C.

WILL TO POWER. This expression, from the German phrase Wille zur Macht, is associated above all with the philosophy of FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE. It was used as the title of a posthumous volume consisting of fragments and aphorisms collected and edited by his sister, but though this was claimed to be his greatest work, modern scholars believe that it was edited in a distorting manner and does not truly represent Nietzsche's thought. Will to power is a metaphysical principle, the universal striving for preservation and enhancement of being. It is therefore a philosophical interpretation of the becoming of the universe, or, in Heidegger's words, "a richer name for the overused and vacuous term 'becoming.'" Heidegger has associated will to power with contemporary NIHILISM and the rise of technology. Earlier attempts to associate it with militarism (for example, by Bertrand Russell) are now generally regarded as mistaken. J.M.

WILSON, WOODROW (1856-1924). The twenty-eighth president of the United States was born December 28 in Staunton, Virginia, to Janet (Jessie) Woodrow and Joseph Ruggles Wilson, a Presbyterian minister. After his childhood in Augusta, Georgia, and Columbia, South Carolina, where his father became a seminary professor and pastor of First Presbyterian Church, and a year at Davidson College, he enrolled at Princeton, where he received a B.A. in 1879. He attended the University of Virginia law school and completed his Ph.D. at Johns Hopkins University in 1886, with a dissertation on "Congressional Government."

Wilson taught at Bryn Mawr (1885-88) and Wesleyan University (1888-90) before returning in 1890 to Princeton as professor of jurisprudence and political economics. In June of 1902 he was elected university president but resigned in 1910 to become governor of New Jersey, where he passed sweeping reform measures within ten months. Nominated by the Democratic party in 1912, he defeated Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft by advocating "New Freedom." His administration instituted the federal income tax and the Federal Reserve System, created the Federal Trade Commission and passed the Clayton Anti-Trust Act.

When war broke out in Europe, Wilson attempted to keep America neutral. He was reelected in 1916 on the slogan "He kept us out of war." However, German submarine warfare forced the United States to declare war on April 6, 1917. On January 8, 1918, Wilson delivered his famous "Fourteen Points" speech, which became the basis for peace negotiations, after the armistice was signed on November 11. Although he was able to make the League of Nations part of the Versailles Treaty, he was not able to get Congress to pass it. In the fall of 1919, after a national tour to gain support for the treaty, he collapsed and was paralyzed. Incapacitated by his illness, he could neither engineer nor accept compromise. The Republicans won the presidency, and Wilson died three years later in his sleep. N.H.

WINTHROP, JOHN (1588-1649). First governor of the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY, born in Edwardstone, England, to Adam Winthrop and his second wife, Anne Browne. Winthrop entered Trinity College, of Cambridge, in 1603 but left without a degree. In 1605 he married Mary Fort, who died in 1615 after bearing six children. Their eldest child, John, was later governor of Connecticut. Winthrop was admitted to Gray's Inn in 1613 and practiced law in London, eventually being admitted to the Inner Temple. A PURITAN, he was part of the group granted a charter for Massachusetts in 1628. A year later he became its first governor, serving a dozen one-year terms. He was also the first president of the New England confederacy. The most serious disruption of his career involved the antinomian controversy surrounding ANNE HUTCHINSON. N.H.

WISDOM. A search for the ideal way to think and live, with guidelines granted to humankind both from the wisdom of God and from the individual's own powers of intellect.

Near East. The search for God and for God's wisdom to achieve both an idealized life-style and an understanding of one's self and of one's environment is certainly not restricted to biblical writings. The sacred literature of ancient India, China, Canaan, and Mesopotamia all emphasize the search for wisdom and truth, whether divinely revealed or self-discovered. Thus proverbs like "Know thyself" and "Nothing to excess" were bywords of those who trekked to garner wisdom from the oracle at Delphi. Those who sought learning, wisdom, and inspiration pilgrimaged elsewhere in Greece to drink of the Castalian and Pierian springs. King Minos of Crete kept open house for the travelers who came seeking knowledge. The reverence paid to Ea, the Babylonian goddess of wisdom, typified the search for human understanding. Pallas Athene, Greek goddess of wisdom, ruled the acropolis in Athens from her temple, the Parthenon. The queen of Sheba traveled for months to discover if Solomon was really as wise as his reputation made him out to be.

Old Testament. The concept of wisdom in the OT relates not just to knowledge and skill but most of all to spirituality, goodness, kindness, and usefulness to society. Thus the coming Messiah is characterized in Isaiah 9:6 and 11:2 as a "Wonderful Counselor" and the one on whom "the Spirit of the Lord shall rest, . . . the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord."

Wise men were often found at royal courts, or at what in the ancient world were called academies (now universities), though not exclusively. Others who are cited in the Bible for their wisdom included musicians, architects, goldsmiths, and even midwives. But the usual place to look for a "wise man" was at a royal court, where kings vied to recruit them. Thus Daniel (2:12-14) in Babylon was described as one "skilful in all wisdom, endowed with knowledge, understanding learning, and competent to serve in the king's palace." Other classes of wise men would include astrologers, soothsayers, sorcerers, magicians, and magi.

The story of Moses and Aaron before the court of the pharaoh in Egypt also provides some understanding of the functions of wise men at court, contrasted in this case with the court-appointed Egyptian ones.

And the story of Joseph (Gen. 39:21) in Potiphar's household sheds further light on the practical role of a wise man in the proper running of a courtly household, in the interpretation of dreams, and eventually in running the whole kingdom of Egypt.

The whole OT is alive with the overlying concept of wisdom as a major factor in humankind's search for truth and life. Individual after individual is cited as "wise" as if this were the highest compliment one could bestow—Moses, David, Ethan, Darda, Joseph, Joshua, Bezalel, and most of all, Solomon, to cite only a few. Jeremiah (9:23) urges the wise not to glory in their wisdom. The author of Proverbs urges one to accept good advice (12:15), avoid evil (14:16), keep sobriety (20:1), and save money (6:6). The wise were expected to speak with care, restrain their emotions, not be proud, know how to address kings, desire good rather than evil, and seek to lead others in the paths of wisdom.

The epitome of wisdom in the OT is King Solomon, whose influence and dominion extended further than those of any other of the kings of Israel, when everyone lived peaceably "under his vine and under his fig tree." "And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding beyond measure, and largeness of mind like the sand on the seashore, so that Solomon's wisdom surpassed the wisdom of all the people of the east, and all the wisdom of Egypt. For he was wiser than all other men, wiser than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, Cacol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol; and his fame was in all the nations round about. He also uttered three thousand proverbs; and his songs were a thousand and five. He spoke of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon to the hyssop that grows out of the wall; he spoke also of beasts, and of birds, and of reptiles, and of fish. And men came from all peoples to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and from all the kings of the earth, who had heard of his wisdom" (I Kings 4:29-34).

Particularly in the OT, as the above quotation suggests, wisdom developed its own vast library of "wisdom literature," which at the very least included categories like proverbs, fables, oracles, dreams, riddles, sayings, poetry, myth, and epic. Some of the best examples of this wisdom literature, in the canonical books of the OT, would include Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and some of the Psalms, along with many other non-canonical books like the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, and IV Maccabees.

New Testament. As one would expect, the significance of wisdom literature and of the search to find one's self in relationship to God and the world continued from the Hebraic culture of the OT to that of the NT world. In a Jewish-oriented society, the concept of wisdom was simply inescapable, as when Luke records a proverb like "Physician, heal yourself" (4:23). Probably the most significant continuation of the concept of wisdom from the OT is the effort to show Jesus as a teacher of wisdom and to make his "sayings" like those of Solomon (Matt. 23:24; Luke 11:49). "Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me" (Matt. 11:29). "Behold, something greater than Solomon is here" (Luke 11:31).

The emphasis on wisdom and all its aspects is equally important in the letters of Paul, as in Romans 11:33, which echoes with such a phrase as "the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God." Colossians, Corinthians, and Ephesians also offer wisdom concepts and phrases relating directly to those of the OT. James is probably the only NT book that really measures up completely to the best of the wisdom books of the OT, and perhaps to a lesser degree the book of Revelation, where insight and knowledge characterize the eschatological realm of the glorified Lamb.

In short, the whole concept of wisdom in the Bible is an integral part of the world of both the OT and the NT.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON. This book from the APOCRYPHA belongs to the wisdom literature, like Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Job, Sirach, and many of the Psalms. It takes its cue from the incident in which the Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream and said, "Ask what I shall give you" (I Kings 3:5). Solomon responded, "Thy servant is in the midst of thy people whom thou hast chosen, a great people, that cannot be numbered or counted for multitude. Give thy servant therefore an understanding mind to govern thy people." Its author claims to be Solomon, a man who is a king and the son of a king, a rich man, a wise man, a judge, a builder of the Temple, and a man whose reputation for practical know-how and accomplishment ranged so far afield that it attracted even the queen of Sheba and an Egyptian princess.

The book appears to have been composed about 100 B.C., probably by a Hellenistic Jew living in the significant Jewish colony at Alexandria on the mouth of the Nile. The writer is intimately knowledgeable about the writings of Moses, from which he continually quotes passages and incidents. He is equally learned, however, in the subtleties of the Greek philosophers of the Hellenistic age, as one often finds them in Paul and in the Epistles. His views offer a meaningful insight into the troubled world of the intertestamental Jews, trying to accommodate their faith to the quickly changing culture of their times, cut off from the umbilical cord they had known when they lived in their homeland.

The book begins as Solomon chides secular rulers for abandoning God, for their impiety and their idolatry, and praises those who remain faithful. He insists that in the long run only the godly can expect earthly and heavenly rewards, despite appearances to the contrary. WISDOM for Solomon comes only from identifying with God. Human wisdom reflects that of God, almost like a ray of light or an emanation. That is why wisdom brings joy to the believer, even as it has from the time God first created the human race.

Wisdom, which is identical with God, makes the world go round and constantly renews it.

The last half of the book goes into detail about how God dealt with people during the time of the Exodus, with many chapters given to the foolishness of people who worship false idols, either in the time of their wandering in the desert or in the current Mediterranean world of Greece and Rome.

A graduate of the Boston University School of Theology, Wise served for a time as a counselor for the YMCA and for a Minneapolis Methodist church before becoming professor of pastoral psychology and counseling at Garrett Theological Seminary. The author of numerous articles on pastoral counseling, his particular focus has been on the duties of the supervisor in the clinical practice of pastoral psychotherapy. His more important books include Religion in Illness and Health (1942), Pastoral Counseling: Its Theory and Practice (1951), Psychiatry and the Bible (1956), The Meaning of Pastoral Care (1966), and Pastoral Psychotherapy: Theory and Practice (1980).

Isaac Mayer Wise

1819, Wise studied for the rabbinate in Prague. He came to America in 1846 and became rabbi of the Orthodox Beth El Synagogue in Albany, New York. He shocked the congregation there when he introduced his first reforms in the ritual, which led to a congregational split. Wise next became rabbi in Cincinnati, which started him on his amazing career as teacher, orator, editor, author, reformer, organizer, and administrator.

Wise dedicated his life to the creation of an informed and progressive laity and an American-trained rabbinate. He founded and edited the American Israelite, through which he promoted his ideas for Reform Judaism. In 1855, he opened the short-lived Zion College in Cincinnati, the earliest attempt to create a Jewish university in the United States. In 1873, Wise and the leaders of thirty-four synagogues founded the UNION OF AMERICAN HEBREW CONGREGATIONS. Two years later, he achieved another goal—the founding of Hebrew Union College, the first permanent American rabbinical seminary. In 1889, Wise brought into being the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the first permanent body of Jewish religious leaders.

WITCHCRAFT. Generally defined by anthropologists as the practice of magic for harmful, destructive ends, witchcraft has found credence in a very wide range of premodern societies. Undoubtedly, in traditional cultures in which belief in the power of spells and fetishes to work supernatural good or ill prevails, individuals have not seldom resorted to those means to harm others they regard as enemies or against whom they wish to avenge a wrong.

However, observers have noted that often witchcraft serves chiefly as an explanatory device to interpret otherwise unintelligible evil. Humankind would usually prefer to affirm any depth of iniquity than to leave an evil simply unexplained; for once it is interpreted in a way rationally consistent with one's world view, it can be dealt with either practically or symbolically or at least accepted with resignation. Death, sickness, or misfortune, then, can be fitted into a universe of meaning by attributing them to witchcraft. Sometimes the general explanation is sufficient, the witches being vague, almost mythical entities; in certain African societies, for instance, almost all sickness or death seems to be laid at the witch's door in this manner.

But in other cases the charge of witchcraft is aimed at particular individuals, commonly "weird," aberrant, unpopular people, or people against whom the victim or victim's family has a grudge. If the community in general accepts the accusation, the "witch" may be tried, often by ordeal, such as with poison or hot coals. If found guilty, the witch was customarily killed. In many primitive societies, a witch may be of either sex, but in the major traditional civilizations was most often female.

That was certainly the case in Europe during the era of notorious persecution of alleged witches for a period of about two centuries after 1480. Estimates vary widely, but undoubtedly the number of people who lost their lives—after unspeakable torture in innumerable cases—was in the millions and was mostly women. It seems beyond doubt that most of the elaborate witchcraft these unfortunate people were made to confess under torture, with its nocturnal assemblies and pacts with the Devil, existed only in their tormentors' twisted and misogynist imaginations. It is another example of the projection of evil onto the witch, in this case a deep-seated anxiety and social malaise engendered by Europe's wrenching transition from the medieval to the modern world.

In more recent times the term "witchcraft," or its putative root "wicca," has been used in a positive sense to refer to the practice of benign or "white" magic. In the twentieth century witchcraft or wicca groups have appeared as part of a small neo-pagan movement in England and America. Often associated with an affirmation of feminine spirituality, they practice rites in the tradition of pre-Christian European religion. (See also SHAMANISM)

WITHERSPOON, JOHN (1723–94). Presbyterian minister, signer of the Declaration of Independence, and president of the College of New Jersey (now Princeton), Witherspoon was born on February 5 to the Reverend James and Anne Walker Witherspoon near Edinburgh, Scotland. At age thirteen he entered the University of Edinburgh, receiving an M.A. in 1739 and a B.D. in 1743. He was licensed to preach in 1743 and ordained in 1745. From 1757 to 1768 he served as pastor in Paisley and became leader of the conservative Popular Party. His diatribe Ecclesiastical Characteristics (1753) censured certain "paganized Christian divines." He also argued for the "right of personal conscience" and the right of the people to choose their own ministers. In 1759 he became moderator of the Synod of Glasgow and Ayr.

In 1768 he became president of the College of New Jersey, which prospered until the Revolution curtailed its growth. In 1776 he was chosen as a delegate to the Continental Congress and urged adoption of the Declaration of Independence. He served in Congress until November 1782. From 1782 to 1794 he attempted to rebuild the college, also serving in the New Jersey state legislature in 1783 and 1789. From 1785 to 1789 he organized a national Presbyterian church, drafting its catechism, confessions of faith, directory of worship, form of government, and discipline. In May 1789 he became the moderator of its first general assembly.

WITNESS. The OT setting for the majority of the places where this word or its equivalent, TESTIMONY, occurs in the rudimentary legal system of the Hebrews, especially in the books of Exodus and Leviticus. The Ten Commandments (Exod. 20:1-17) are referred to as "the two tables of the testimony" (Exod. 31:18; 32:15-16). This reference gives an orientation to the OT usage of witness: it is a pointer to a particular event and provides evidence for it. In the case cited it is the covenant Yahweh instituted with Israel and their acceptance of it. Other objects served the same purpose, even when the events in Israel's life are different and diverse. For example, the "tent of meeting" as a portable reminder of God's presence with the migrating tribes en route to Canaan is called the "tent of testimony," a witness to Yahweh's nearness especially when the "ark of the testimony" is also mentioned (Exod. 31:7). Otherwise "witness" includes monuments set up by patriarchs (Gen. 31:44) or tribes (Num. 32; Josh. 22:26-34, where the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh opt to remain on the east side of the Jordan River and set up a "memorial altar," called witness, that they will abide by the terms of this arrangement) or individuals such as Absalom (II Sam. 18:18, Absalom's pillar is erected as a witness to his family name, since he had no male offspring to perpetuate it).

Witness also plays a significant role in legal disputes, whether of property (Ruth 4:9 ff.) or persons (Gen. 31:44 ff.). A person's own integrity is stated with an appropriate summons to a witness (I Sam. 12:3-5). Yahweh's role as a witness is often invoked, since it is believed that Yahweh's character as righteous judge will vouch for the uprightness of the person who so calls on God to attest (Job 16:19-21; Ps. 89:34-37). A lying witness is treated as unmitigated evil in Israel (especially in Prov. 12:17, 19; 14:4, 25). Isaiah (8:2) makes certain to secure "reliable witnesses." In Second Isaiah's thought such need for sound witness is applied to the nation as Israel is called to bear Yahweh's name to the nations and must be true; hence "you are my witnesses" (Isa. 43:10, 12; 44:8) is Israel's vocation, epitomized in the servant of Yahweh who is a missionary and witness to the world (Isa. 49:1-6).

Since witness-bearing involves loyalty to the truth and one's own convictions, the logical step is taken in times when Israel has to be faithful under persecution. In the mid-second-century B.C. Maccabean age, faithful Jews were called to suffer for their faith, and herein lies the birth of the idea of witness as martyrdom (especially in Daniel and the books of Maccabees, for example, IV Macc. 18:11-19, and the Martyrdom of Isaiah; and Heb. 11:32-40).

In the NT the major OT themes of integrity in speech as bearing witness to the truth and preparedness to suffer for it are continued. The need for witnesses in solemn oath-making (Deut. 19:15) is renewed (Matt. 18:16; John 8:17; Heb. 10:28). Paul will appeal to his honesty as an apostle and witness that he is not lying in protestations of his own defense (II Cor. 1:20-23; 13:1; compare I Tim. 5:19), and his role as witness is especially important in attesting to the resurrection of Jesus (I Cor. 15:15) as the locus of his apostolic call (I Cor. 9:1). What he proclaims as the kerygma is nothing less than the witness of God (I Cor. 2:1; II Thess. 1:10), a thought taken up in I John which emphasizes the apostolic community as a witness to God's revelation in Christ (I John 5:6-12).

In the Johannine literature, witness becomes a key concept; in fact, "witness" takes the place of "preaching the gospel," a phrase absent from this body of literature. The Johannine Jesus comes as a "witness" (John 18:37), and other figures bear witness to him (John 1:6-7; 3:25-36; 5:30-39; 10:25; 15:26-27; 21:24,; III John 12).

The transition from witness to MARTYR, which is the same Greek word, is made in the Revelation (2:13; 11:3-8; 12:11, 17), but the prototype is Stephen in his role as both a preacher of the truth (Acts 6:8-7:51) and a witness who sealed his testimony with his blood (Acts 7:54-8:1; compare Acts 22:20). The hymnic Te Deum celebrates the "noble army of martyrs," with Tertullian's adage in mind: the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.

WITTGENSTEIN, LUDWIG. See LOGICAL POSITIVISM.

WOLSEY, THOMAS (about 1474-1530). English Roman Catholic cardinal, papal legate, controversial chancellor, and opponent of Lutheranism. Born into a butcher's family in Ipswich, Wolsey studied at Oxford and received ordination in 1498. He rose rapidly to power. After three minor appointments, Wolsey became chaplain to Henry VII (1507), privy councilor to HENRY VIII (1511), bishop of Lincoln and Tournai and archbishop of York (1514), cardinal and Lord Chancellor of England (1515), and papal legate (1518). He virtually ran England from 1515 to 1529. Wolsey adroitly handled England's foreign policy to make England the balancing factor in European politics. A secret treaty with Emperor Charles V to elect Wolsey pope fizzled in 1521 and 1523. Wolsey's life-style, arrogance, and ruthless tax collecting engendered widespread anticlericalism. He held multiple offices and had five hundred household servants and enormous wealth. His young son Thomas Wynter received numerous church offices, and in 1521 and 1523 Wolsey directed massive burnings of Luther's works in London. Unable to maneuver Henry VIII's divorce from Catherine, Wolsey incurred Henry's disfavor in 1529, forfeited his posts and wealth, and was accused of treason for breaking the law of Praemunire (1353). He died while on his way to London to stand trial.

WOMEN. To outline the role of women during biblical times is a difficult and uncertain task because the Bible covers a span of several thousand years and various cultures, most of which we know little about. The place of women in a given culture also varies according to social class. Thus Esther, queen of Persia in the fifth century B.C., lived a quite different life from that of Rhoda, a maid in the home of Mary the mother of John Mark in first-century Jerusalem (Acts 12:12-17).

One generalization that can be made is that most of these cultures were highly patriarchal. While Israel's neighbors Sumer and Assyria originally worshiped female deities and held women in high esteem, the position of women gradually deteriorated as male deities gained ascendancy in the region. Men were dominant, women subordinate, no matter what their social status. MARRIAGES were arranged at early ages, so that most women moved from being under the authority of their father to the authority of their husband. Even widows were under the authority of their sons or brothers.

In Israel women were essentially considered property (note the command against coveting, Exod. 20:17), and were of lesser value (fifty shekels of silver for a man, thirty for a woman, Lev. 27:1-7). Polygamy was the rule, with multiple wives, concubines, and servants (women were men's sexual property as well). A woman could be divorced at the will of her husband. All the sexual taboos listed in Leviticus are stated in terms of male activity (except the prohibition of bestiality). Adultery and fornication were interpreted as one man's crime against another man's property. Children were the property of their fathers. Thus a childless widow was required to submit to the right of levirate and marry her husband's brother in order to produce male offspring to bear the family name and inherit her late husband's property (see Deut. 25:5 ff.). Women could not inherit tribal lands (the daughters of Zelophehad were an exception in Num. 27:5-8; 36:1-9), and they were not considered competent witnesses in legal matters. As Roland de Vaux has noted, "the social and legal position of an Israelite wife was . . . inferior to the position a wife occupied in the great countries round about."

Indeed one could argue that only a male was truly a Jew: only men were circumcised to indicate their membership in the Hebrew community; only sons were required to be taught the Law (Deut. 6:8); first-born males were to be dedicated to God; and only males were members of the Aaronic priesthood. Women could participate in all the great religious festivals and often did, but unlike men they were not required to do so. They were exempt because such female functions as menstruation and childbirth made them ritually impure for periods of time. However, mothers were to be honored (Exod. 20:12; Lev. 19:3); children who struck or cursed either parent were to die (Exod. 21:15, 17). Likewise Exodus 21 lists penalties for anyone who hurt or killed slaves of either gender.

Babylonian women, by contrast, had a fairly high status. They could own property, conduct their own business, appear in public, plead their own cases in court, even hold public office, and witness contracts. Women's property remained theirs after their marriage and was passed to their children. Marriage was a contract between husband and wife as well as the sale of a woman to a man by her father. Divorced women retained custody of their children.

The women of ancient Egypt also enjoyed a relatively high status. The land of Egypt belonged to its queen; the king was the man who married the daughter of his predecessor. As late as the Ptolemies, marriage contracts frequently assigned a man's property to his wife. Either spouse might be the owner of house and lands. Mutual respect was expected between spouses. Jewish women in the colony at Elephantine in the fifth century B.C. seemed to have enjoyed the same privileges. Women still were not considered the social equals of men, however, and men were dominant in public life.

The status of women in Greek culture also varied. Plato felt that women in the ideal republic should share the appropriate tasks of their class, while Aristotle viewed women's nature as inherently defective (a view Aquinas later wrote into Scholastic theology). Demosthenes summed up women's roles: "We have hetaerae for the pleasure of the spirit, concubines for sensual pleasure, and wives to give us sons." Wives were secluded and regarded as perpetual minors, though loved and respected. Hetaerae were cultured, artistic, educated, and intellectual women, often foreigners, single women, forbidden to marry Greek citizens.

Likewise in Roman culture women held a variety of positions. During the republic women had few legal rights; but during the empire, marriage laws were changed, giving wives greater rights and more mutual responsibility for children and property. This growing emancipation disturbed many people (see the Satires of Juvenal and the Epigrams of Martial). Upper-class women were well educated and retained their own property and inherited that of their husbands. The early Christian church benefited greatly from their liberal giving.

In interpreting Scripture, one must be cautious about projecting our own twentieth-century assumptions about sex role stereotypes on the preindustrialized world of the Bible. It is safer to assume that their customs were different from ours than that they were the same. Many are totally foreign to us (for example, there is no consensus among scholars about what customs may have been behind Paul's discussion of proper hairstyle or head covering for women who pray and prophesy in the Corinthian church, I Cor. 11:2-16). We should also be wary about generalizing from early Hebrew customs of the Pentateuch to the Greco-Roman world of the post-Pauline letters, or vice versa. Another temptation is to denigrate Jewish customs regarding women in an attempt to make Christianity appear as their social salvation, which it was not. Indeed, Christian women of the Middle Ages had much less freedom and autonomy than upper-class women of the Roman Empire or ordinary women in the earliest Christian communities. WOMEN, ORDINATION OF. Women in the early church participated in various forms of ministry, including those inaugurated by the laying on of hands. These included the offices of widow, deacon, and presbyter. One tomb bears the mosaic inscription Theodora episcopa—"Theodora, bishop"—over the head of a veiled woman; the words are repeated on a nearby marble slab. Medieval abbesses also exercised certain clerical and episcopal functions. Gradually, however, the liturgical service of women was eliminated and their other ministries severely limited.

The first woman officially ordained in the United States was Antoinette Brown (Blackwell), who became the pastor of a Congregational church in 1853. The first woman ordained by a denomination was Universalist Olympia Brown in 1863. The Disciples of Christ began ordaining women in the 1880s. In the late nineteenth century many women were ministers in the growing Holiness denominations, which continue to ordain them.

Among mainline Protestants, the Methodist and Presbyterian churches began ordaining women to full ministry in 1956. In 1964 the Presbyterian church U.S. followed suit. In 1970 the Lutheran church in America and the American Lutheran church ordained women. The Episcopal church admitted women to the diaconate in 1970 and the priesthood in 1976. However, the hierarchies of the Southern Baptist Convention, the Eastern Orthodox, and the Roman Catholic churches still oppose women's ordination.

The number of women in ministry has grown steadily in the past decade, though they still experience difficulty in placement and advancement. Among the United Methodists, however, women have advanced to the positions of district superintendent and bishop. In mainline seminaries female enrollment is approaching 50 percent.

The chief arguments against women's ordination are the lack of a positive tradition in church history; the supposed NT prohibitions found in I Corinthians 14:34 and I Timothy 2:11-12; the example of the Twelve (male) apostles; and the fact that Jesus was male, and thus women do not bear a physical resemblance to him.

Those who favor it argue that women were involved in the ministry of the early church (for example, Phoebe, the "deaconess" in Rom. 16:1-2, and other women co-workers of Paul, Rom. 16:3, 6, 15; Phil. 4:3, and so on). They interpret the NT passages cited as merely attempts to order worship (I Cor. 14:40; see 11:5) and to silence uneducated or unorthodox women (I Tim. 3:11; Tit. 2:3-5). They note that women exhibiting gifts for ministry should be allowed to exercise those gifts (I Cor. 12:11-13, 27-31; Eph. 4:11-12). They point out that Peter recognized the prophecy of Joel (2:28-32) that daughters as well as sons were to prophesy (Acts 2:17-18), as being fulfilled in the church. Proponents of women's ordination argue that in the ministry of the church there is to be no regard for gender (Gal. 3:28) since both men and women were created in the image of God (Gen. 1:26-27) and are re-created in Christlikeness (Phil. 2:1-9; Gal. 5:22-23). WOMEN AND RELIGION. See FEMININE DIMENSIONS OF THE SACRED.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION (WCTU). This organization came into being in 1874, during the course of the temperance crusade that swept the United States. It was founded in Cleveland, Ohio, as a means of upgrading the country's moral condition, and total abstinence was a major goal.

Frances Willard, a New York-born feminist, was president of the Evanston (Ill.) College for Ladies when she became involved in the burgeoning battle against the use of alcohol. In the excitement of the hour, bands of women invaded saloons to sing hymns and kneel in prayer. As an activist Miss Willard envisaged the temperance crusade as a means of advancing the cause of women's rights and as a vehicle to demonstrate their ability in politics.

Miss Willard soon became president of the Chicago WCTU and then was elevated to the post of president of the national work in 1879 and the world organization in 1883. Today the WCTU has branches in seventy countries. Miss Willard used the organization to advance the cause of women's suffrage. In 1882 she helped organize the Prohibition Party.

The WCTU has long worked for public education against the use of alcohol and campaigned for legislation to prohibit its sale. Lately, the movement has been involved in research in the field of drug abuse. While the WCTU is not as great a force as it once was, it still had a following of 250,000 members in the 1970s.

WOOLMAN, JOHN (1720-72). This QUAKER leader and proponent of abolition was born October 19 to Samuel and Elizabeth Burr Woolman in Rancocas, New Jersey. In 1749 he married Sarah Ellis. Originally a surveyor, he drew up wills, taught school, and published a primer. Profoundly religious from his youth, at age twenty-three he felt called to the Quaker ministry. For thirty years he traveled the East Coast from North Carolina to New Hampshire. Having executed bills of sales for slaves, he became convinced that the practice was wrong. While visiting slave-trade centers such as Perth Amboy and Newport, and during a 1746 visit to Virginia, he witnessed the corruption slavery brought to society.

In 1776 he convinced the Philadelphia yearly meeting to disown members who kept slaves. He published his ideas in Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes (1754) and in his Journal, published posthumously in 1774. His A Plea for the Poor (1763) also argued against exploitation by the wealthy. He died in York, England, while laboring among the poor. N.H.

WORD, THE. A title for the preincarnate Lord who became human, in Johannine theology. Another term is LOGOS, which is Greek for "word." Various backgrounds for the term, which is restricted to the NT literature associated with JOHN, have been proposed. In Greek philosophy the Word was regarded as a divine principle underlying the cosmos. Marcus Aurelius speaks of the "reason (logos) that governs the universe." Indeed according to Stoic thought, Logos was another name for Zeus or God or fate. The setting is metaphysical and cosmological, and it is not likely that Johannine use that relates the Word to the incarnate life of the Son of God (John 1:14) is directly drawing from philosophical categories. The "Word," we should observe, is not identical to God, though sharing in the divine life (John 1:1).

In Philo we see how Logos in Stoic religion did influence his understanding of the OT; with Philo Logos is a mediator between God and the raw stuff of creation—an idea possibly seen in John 1:1-3. But again John has a clearly personal idea of the Word, a notion not seen in the Jewish philosopher.

More promising is the OT-rabbinic setting of the Word. In two ways the WORD OF GOD was given personalized existence either as an attribute of God active in creation (Prov. 8:22-31; Eccles. 24; Wis. Sol. 7-9) or as personification of God in revelation, chiefly through the Law, the Torah, wisdom, or the Prophets (Prov. 1:1-33; 4:7-9; Isa. 55:11; IV Ezra 6:38). These two ideas as media of God's activity in the created order (Ps. 33:6, 9; Gen. 1:1-5) and in God's prophetic word of revelation (compare Heb. 1:1-3) lie at the center of the OT teaching on the Word, and form the most plausible backdrop to the NT usage. In the prologue to the Fourth Gospel Jesus is depicted in both his preincarnate and incarnate existence. To the Word are ascribed activities in creation (John 1:1-3) and in revelation (John 1:17), with the fulcrum of Johannine Christology clearly established at the pivot of the "becoming-man" of the preexistent, heavenly being who is set on a par with God (1:1; see John 1:14). The incarnate Word thus embodies the full and final revelation of God (1:18), and the revelation comes in the person who claims ultimacy as a revealer of the Father (14:9), akin in idiom but hardly in substance to the later Gnostic claim that divine secrets are made known through a heavenly revealer figure.

The later Johannine writings (for example, I John

1:1-2) explain how the Word was truly incarnate in the human being Jesus, probably as a counter-thrust to the incipient Gnostic teaching that God cannot really be seen and known in human terms.

Just as our words are a gateway to our true self insofar as we are willing to disclose it to others, so Jesus as the Word is the medium by which we see what God is really like, "his essence all-divine" (John Henry Newman). R.M.

WORD OF GOD. A fundamental theological concept in the Judeo-Christian tradition. In Hebrew, "word" is dabar, which has a variety of meanings, not only "word," but also "deed," "thing," and so forth. In the Greek of the NT, "word" usually translates LOGOS, but the connotations of Logos in the NT are much closer to those of the OT dabar than to the Logos of Greek philosophy, where the term had taken on the significance of a "rational principle" and came to be understood as a kind of hypostasis proceeding from God, yet remaining in closest union with God. Logos came to have this sense in patristic theology. In the prologue to John's Gospel we probably see the beginning of a transition from the traditional sense of the Hebrew dabar in the direction of a more philosophical and Hellenistic understanding of the term, but this is a matter of controversy.

The presupposition of talking about a "Word of God" is that "God speaks." Perhaps in the earliest times it was supposed that God literally speaks, and that human beings can hear God's word (or words) directly. In later times God's speaking was not understood in such a literal and anthropomorphic way. God speaks in the sense of communicating, and the very notion of speaking or uttering a word implies that the speaker reveals what has hitherto been hidden in the mind. God releases the divine word into the world, but it is still God's word and, in a sense, an extension of God's own personal being.

The Bible itself is reticent about the precise mode of the divine speech or communication. A common expression in the OT is: "The Word of the Lord came to Jeremiah" (or some other prophet). In Jeremiah's case, it might be seeing some common object, for example, an almond tree in blossom, that triggered the word in his mind. In the case of ecstatic prophets, it may have been some intense inward experience that gradually resolved itself into words. In the NT, it is the human personal life of Jesus Christ that is the Word of God incarnate, God's fullest self-communication.

Karl Barth distinguished three basic forms of the Word of God. First, there is Jesus Christ, the living and incarnate Word; second, there is the Bible, the witness to Jesus Christ expressed in human words; third, there is the proclaimed word, the church's proclamation of Jesus Christ in its preaching and other forms of witness. Raymond F. Collins distinguishes seven "different but interrelated" meanings of the expression "Word of God" in his Introduction to the New Testament (1983). J.M.

WORDS OF INSTITUTION. See INSTITUTION, WORDS OF.

WORDSWORTH, WILLIAM (1770–1850). English Romantic poet, born April 7 to John and Ann Cookson Wordsworth. His mother died when he was eight, his father when William was thirteen. Wordsworth attended St. John's College, Cambridge, on scholarship and graduated in January 1791. His first works published were An Evening Walk and Descriptive Sketches (both in 1793), the latter being an account of a walking tour in the Alps.

In October 1795 he set up housekeeping in Dorsetshire with his sister Dorothy. There he wrote The Borderers, a blank-verse tragedy. In the summer of 1795 he met SAMUEL COLERIDGE, and around 1797 William and Dorothy moved to Alfoxden Park in Somerset to live near him. In 1798 Wordsworth and Coleridge published Lyrical Ballads, which included "Lines Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey." In 1798 the three friends went to Germany. In 1799 the Wordsworths returned to Dove Cottage, Grasmere, in the Lake District, and in October 1802 he married Mary Hutchinson. He completed an autobiographical poem, The Prelude, in 1805, but it was not published until after his death. Other works by Wordsworth are: "Ode to Duty," "Intimations of Immortality," and "The Excursion." Wordsworth was named poet laureate in 1843 and is buried at Grasmere.

WORK. See VOCATION.

WORKS. Few words in moral theology have such a conflict-filled past as the term "works." While great strides toward theological reconciliation have come for Protestants and Roman Catholics since Vatican II, nonetheless the two branches of the Christian church still disagree in principle (if not in practice) on works. Protestants, at least the majority, believe that people are saved by faith in God through Christ alone, without works; while Catholics follow the decisions of the Council of Trent that declared both FAITH and works necessary for salvation. Luther's stout rejection of religious works or even good works as a basis (total or partial) of human salvation is well known.

This controversy turns on a complex development in biblical religion, which gives grounds for disagreement about the relation of faith and works, as is illustrated in the Epistle of James: "Show me your faith apart from your works, and I by my works will show you my faith" (Jas. 2:18).

These elements include the development of doctrine within the OT, from the view that God will reward everyone according to one's works, good or bad, to the recognition that all people are sinful (Prov. 24:12; Pss. 62:12; 143:2; Eccl. 7:20; Matt. 16:17; Rom 2:6; 3:23; Rev. 2:23). Then, the book of Job, overturned the simple bookkeeping idea that good people are rewarded with prosperity, heightening the "mystery of evil" even more. Within Hebrew thought, and in Christianity, faith as trust in God came to be seen as the basis for reconciliation with God (Isa. 28:16; Hab. 2:4; also see Heb. 11).

Paul saw that faith as trust, a faith reckoned to the sinner from before the foundation of the world (predestination) was the grounds of JUSTIFICATION, and not any work of religious merit, although he continued to observe the Jewish Law.

Augustine attempted to solve the problem of the relation of faith and works by declaring that God imputes righteousness to the sinner and infuses righteousness into those so justified, so they can do works worthy of salvation. Luther and Calvin followed Augustine's first doctrine, and the Council of Trent elected to follow the second. J.C.

WORKS OF GOD. In Latin opus dei, a term for the Divine Office (or daily worship of God) in the Roman Catholic Church. Benedict gave it this title in his famous Rule. He held that monks were to prefer nothing to the work of God, that is, to worshiping the Lord. In a monastery it is the most important activity to be performed, although men must work and study also.

On a larger scale biblical theology understands the Bible as the record of God working in history as "the God who acts." The faithful are called to participate in God's work by witnessing to God's grace. But, as Luther pointed out, God calls people to their secular vocations also. As we fulfill our roles in society we also aid in the work of God. However, our calling and participation does not earn our salvation. No one is saved by works; justification is by faith through grace. Augustine believed he settled the tension between faith as the basis of salvation and the need to do good works—the work of God—by holding that God not only imputes righteousness to sinners so that they are accounted as righteous, but also imparts (infuses) righteousness to sinners so that they actually can do good works. WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES. See REFORMED CHURCHES.

WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The surge of feeling for church unity across Christendom in the early part of the twentieth century developed into what has come to be known as the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. The formal organization of the World Council of Churches occurred in Amsterdam in 1948, when its first general assembly convened.

Church historians trace the origin of the WCC to the missionary-oriented Edinburgh Conference in 1910. During the course of this ten-day gathering, the need became apparent that a representative organization should be formed to coordinate missionary cooperation, an authoritative body that could be a mouthpiece to governments. Within weeks an international agency was formed called Faith and Order, which sought to further some of the visions presented at Edinburgh.

Meanwhile another international, interchurch movement, Life and Work, concerned with social and political action by the churches, met in Stockholm in 1925 and again at Oxford in 1937. In the latter conference proposals were acted on recommending that a World Council of Churches be formed. This information was passed along to the conveners of the Faith and Order Conference being held at Edinburgh the same year. When both conferences had approved the proposal, a joint committee was appointed to bring the WCC into being. World War II prevented the initial assembly being held until 1948.

The International Missionary Council was formed in 1921 at Lake Mohonk, New York. The leaders of the IMC were told about the plans to form the WCC, but they decided that the missionary organization should be maintained as a cooperative but separate organization. However the IMC joined the WCC at the New Delhi WCC Assembly in 1961. Today the WCC is the principal agency of the ecumenical movement with a membership of nearly three hundred churches of the Protestant, Anglican, Orthodox, and Old Catholic traditions. R.H.

WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCES. Ten major world missionary conferences from 1860 to 1963 provide a useful measure of the church's self-understanding and methodology in mission and of its worldwide growth in a century of revolutionary change. Three of these conferences stand out as being specially significant.

Edinburgh 1910. The beginning of the organized ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT was marked at this conference. The one significant result of this conference was the organization of the international committee that became the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL in 1921 and that had a large influence on foreign missions.

Jerusalem 1928. A small group gathered at the Mount of Olives to reexamine the Christian mission. The Christian and non-Christian encounter in an increasingly industrialized world was the major concern of this conference.

Madras, 1938. This conference meeting ten years later looked at the meaning of mission in relation to the growth of the "younger churches" as the churches of the Third World began to make a larger contribution to mission and to urge the need for unity and union among the churches. Madras produced a brief statement of faith, outlining three new world religions: Communism, Nationalism, and Scientific Skepticism. W.G.

WORLD RELIGIONS. The great religions that number their adherents in the millions, which may be composed of several different traditions or denominations, and which, even if confined to one culture area, have been of major historical and cultural importance to the world as a whole. These large religious families fall into distinct groupings: HINDUISM, predominant in India; BUDDHISM, which has spread over much of Southeast and East Asia; Chinese and JAPANESE RELIGION, an amalgam of usually non-exclusive practices of CONFUCIANISM, TAOISM, Buddhism, SHINTO and traditional ancestral and agricultural rites; and the interrelated Western monotheistic faiths of Semitic origin, JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, and ISLAM. It may be noted that most of these religions trace their origin to a single founder, or at least a "founding era," when its distinctive sacred writings and doctrines were defined, generally in the period the philosopher Karl Jaspers has called the "axial age," the era from roughly 600 B.C. to A.D. 600, when writing became widespread and the classical civilizations took shape. Of the world religions, only Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam are transcultural on a large scale, having spread across many cultural areas and serving as the religious bases of a number of otherwise often different societies. We will summarize the status of the major world religions in the 1980s. For their basic character, see their respective articles.

Although it is not strictly a world religion, what is called primitive religion, or better primal or basic religion, should not be left out of the account. This is the religion of nonliterate tribal societies, characterized by ANIMISM, archaic hunting and agricultural rites, tribal initiations, and often SHAMANISM. It is now in considerable decline due to modernization and the missionary efforts of major religions throughout the world, but is still practiced in isolated areas and rather widely in syncretism with major religions.

Hinduism. The traditional religion of India, in its great variety of strands, despite some secularizing influences, continues to flourish in its homeland and to provoke interest around the world in its philosophies and practices, such as yoga.

Buddhism. This religion has been severely afflicted in numbers and influence in some of its traditional homelands, owing to Marxist revolution in China, Tibet, and Indochina, but continues to teach freely in other centers such as Japan, Thailand, Burma, and Sri Lanka, and to attract growing interest in the West.

Chinese Religion. Little is known definitely of the status of the traditional religious pattern among the one-fourth of the world's people living in the People's Republic of China, but undoubtedly its practice is much diminished from before the 1949 revolution. Traditional Chinese religion continues in such places as Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Singapore.

Japanese Religion. Despite the pressure of secularization in affluent modern Japan, Buddhism, Shinto, and the "new religions" of Japan continue to draw a significant following.

Judaism. This numerically small but worldwide and immensely important faith suffered devastating losses in the Holocaust of the Nazi era in Europe but has since established its own state in Israel.

Christianity. In the twentieth century, the largest of the world religions has grown significantly in Africa and parts of Asia but has experienced practical losses to Marxism and secularization in Europe.

Islam. This faith has experienced more growth in both numbers (as percent of world's population) and influence in the twentieth century than any other major world religion and has been swept by revitalization movements.

The following chart provides comparative figures and percentages of the world's population for the world religions in 1900 and 1980, based on the best data and estimates available, together with a projection of these figures for A.D. 2000.

WORLD VIEW. See WELTANSCHAUUNG.

WORLD VISION INTERNATIONAL. An evangelical interdenominational service agency that supports the work of child care, community development, evangelism, leadership development, and many related ministries.

This international work evolved from the concerns of Robert (Bob) Willard Pierce, former Nazarene pastor and missionary to China. Pierce, whose methods were as unorthodox as they were effective, began his ministry in Los Angeles as a youth worker and evangelist. He later became one of the co-founders of Youth for Christ International and the director of Los Angeles Youth for Christ. Colleagues of his Youth for Christ days included Billy Graham, Torrey Johnson, Robert Cook, Robert Evans, and many others.

His free-wheeling tours to cities of Asia confronted Pierce with the tragic plight of hordes of orphans, especially in Korea. The formal organization of World Vision, Inc., occurred in 1950, primarily to serve as a support agency for the work among orphans. Eventually this operation spread to nineteen countries. Impressed by the needs of Asia, Pierce produced motion picture films on China and Korea that had great impact on Christian audiences in America. For many years he conducted a radio program and later produced television specials.

One of the most significant aspects of Pierce's ministry was to impress on United States evangelicals the importance of combining concern for both physical and spiritual needs. Pierce was a major factor in reestablishing the importance of wedding evangelism and social action.

In India, and subsequently in other lands, World Vision sponsored pastors' conferences designed to revitalize the vision of indigenous leaders. In 1978 World Vision International was formed of the original United States work plus World Vision of Canada and other World Vision entities. R.H.

WORLDWIDE CHURCH OF GOD, THE. Originally named the Radio Church of God, this contemporary religious group is the creation of Herbert W. Armstrong, who founded it in Eugene, Oregon, on radio station KORE in 1934. Today, this most successful variant of "British-Israelitism" has 250 churches with some 75,000 members in North America, Europe, Africa, and Asia, and distributes 4.3 million copies of its magazine, The Plain Truth. The church largely consists of the public speaking efforts of the elderly Mr. Armstrong (since he removed his son, Garner Ted Armstrong, from the church in 1978) on 100 radio stations and 150 television stations each week. Additionally, the group maintains two college campuses (Ambassador College), in Pasadena, California, and in Texas, and a vast publishing enterprise that produces and mails 80,000 Bible lessons every month.

The Worldwide Church of God is based on a number of sectarian—or cultic—ideas that were not invented by Armstrong, but were taken up by him and widely and successfully propagated for the first time. Briefly, these ideas include Sabbatarianism (that the only legitimate day of worship for Christians as well as Jews is Saturday—the OT Sabbath); a rejection of Christian liturgical festivals and fasts, especially the Nativity (Christmas) and Easter; a rejection of the observance of birthdays in general; legalism (the belief that the OT Law is binding, and OT festivals and fasts, like Pentecost, are binding on Christians); and British-Israelitism (Anglo-Israelism), the claim (made since the eighteenth century by some British sectarians) that the British people, along with their Germanic relations, the Angles and Saxons, are the descendants of the "Ten Lost Tribes of Israel." Armstrong mixes all these elements together, along with others, and uses them to denounce the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches as teaching a "counterfeit gospel." Armstrong, along with previous sectarians, identifies this "demonization" of the gospel with the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 and the eventual embrace of Christianity by the Roman Empire under Constantine the Great in A.D. 312. J.C.

WORMS (DIET AND DISPUTATION). See LUTHER, MARTIN; DIET OF WORMS.

WORSHIP. The word derives from the Saxon term "worthship" and is used to indicate an attitude of homage. It is used in English to translate a Hebrew term in the OT that means "to bow or prostrate oneself," and a Greek term in the NT that means the same but derives from a root meaning "to kiss." The posture indicated refers to the practice of bowing to kiss the hand or foot of the person or thing to which homage is being paid. The idea of emotional and spiritual emptiness in the presence of the HOLY lies at the heart of the experience of worship. It is significant that no noun conveying this thought is found in the OT or the NT. The inevitable conclusion that must be reached is that worship is viewed in the Bible as an action rather than a state or condition. Even though a noun form of the verb proskuneo exists in classical Greek, in more than one form, it does not appear in the NT. The words that do appear and are sometimes translated "worship" are different Greek words that refer to the external services and ministries involved in the religious life (Rom. 9:4; Col. 2:18; Heb. 9:1, 21; 12:28) rather than the essence of intellectual, spiritual, and emotional expression proceeding from the inner self (Matt. 4:9, 10; Rev. 4:10).

Old Testament. In the patriarchal period, worship was individual rather than corporate, except where families were involved. Jacob set up a stone as an altar and poured oil upon it (Gen. 28:18). The mountain where Moses saw the burning bush (Exod. 3:2) was later called the mountain of God (Exod. 4:27). Abraham built an altar on a mountain where he offered sacrifice (Gen. 22:9, 13). Noah built an altar after the ark landed, and SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS were made to God (Gen. 8:20). There was no written law before Moses according to which the Hebrews conducted their lives and performed their acts of worship. Rather, they seemed to conduct themselves according to the life and teaching of Abraham, who experienced theophanies that provided him with divine instruction (Gen. 12:1; 13:14; 15:12). This revelatory experience was passed on by tradition and combined with further theophanies and dreams to his descendants: Isaac (Gen. 26:24), Jacob (Gen. 28:10; 32:25; 48:3), Joseph (Gen. 37:5), and Joseph's brothers (Gen. 50:24-25). The condemnation of Adam presupposes a prior revelation that he violated (Gen. 3:17), as does the unacceptability of Cain's sacrifice (Gen. 4:4-5). Abel's sacrifice was accepted because it was offered by faith (Heb. 11:4) and faith requires an awareness of the will of God by which divine approval may be obtained (Heb. 11:2). Thus, the ancients worshiped by the revealed will of God, transmitted to them in various ways (Heb. 1:1).

The nations among which the Hebrews lived were polytheistic and worshiped idols. When the Israelites moved into Canaan they established sanctuaries as fixed places of worship, as the Canaanites had done, for example, at Shiloh, Bethel, and Shechem. They eventually adopted some Canaanite practices including idolatry and cult prostitution connected with these "high places," practices which Josiah, king of Judah, corrected during his reign in 621 B.C. (II Kings 23:4-20). The Israelites were supposed to have offered worship only in the places God designated and in the way God prescribed (Deut. 12:5-7), but their violation of this, due partly to Canaanite influence, led to the eventual downfall of the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 B.C. and the southern kingdom of Judah in 587 B.C.

In Canaan the Israelites celebrated three major agricultural festivals that are still recognized, with varying degrees of interest, in the several forms of modern Judaism. The PASSOVER and unleavened bread, celebrated in the spring during the barley harvest, was the beginning of the religious year (Exod. 12:2). The purpose of the Passover observance was to remind the Israelites of God's miraculous intervention on their behalf, when God passed over their firstborn and destroyed the firstborn of Egypt (Exod. 12:17; 13:8-9). The Feast of WEEKS (Pentecost, Acts 2:1) was observed fifty days later (Deut. 16:9) at the time of the wheat harvest. It was also called Feast of the Firstfruits (Num. 28:26) or the Feast of Harvest (Exod. 23:16). This was a one-day feast during which the poor were not to be forgotten (Lev. 23:22). The final festival of the religious year was the Feast of TABERNACLES (Ingathering, Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:39), observed in the fall when the olives, grapes, and grain harvests were completed. The Israelites lived in tents during this seven-day festival (Exod. 23:16) and remembered the period of their wilderness sojourn when they had lived in tents for forty years. Yards and porches in modern Jerusalem are still dotted with tabernacles during this week each fall. The most solemn occasion of the entire religious year was Yom Kippur, the DAY OF ATONEMENT (Lev. 16:1-34; 23:26-32; Num. 29:7-11), observed also in the fall. Contrary to the others it was a day of solemn fasting and holy convocation. It was a Sabbath day and the only one on which fasting was obligatory according to the Law of Moses. It is still the most solemn day in modern Israel, when virtually everything under Jewish control is shut down. It was a day for solemn reflection on one's sins and those of the nation; a day when the high priest went into the Holy of Holies in the tabernacle or Temple and made a blood offering for the sins of the nation. This is the only time of the year when anyone was allowed in this holiest place in the nation, the place where the very presence of the Lord was felt (Exod. 40:34-38; Lev. 16:11-19).

When the Israelites became a nation and entered into covenant relationship with God at Mount Sinai, where they received the Law of Moses, they were given a sacrificial system as an integral part of their worship experience (Lev. 1-7). Four kinds of sacrifice involved the shedding of blood. The burnt offering was a lamb that was sacrificed each morning and evening, reminding Israel of its devotion to God (Exod. 29:38-42; Num. 28:3-8). The complete dedication of the worshiper to God was indicated by the fact that the whole animal was consumed on the altar (Lev. 1:5-17). Paul probably alludes to this in Romans 12:1. The second offering, the peace offering, was made to indicate living communion between God and humans. This was a voluntary sacrifice, and any animal, except a bird, could be offered. The primary feature of this offering was the sacrificial meal in which one's family and friends might participate (Lev. 3:1-17; Deut. 12:6-7). The sin offering was a third kind of sacrifice that was offered for specific sins intentionally or inadvertently committed (Lev. 4:1-35; 6:24-30; 12:6-8; 14:19-31). If one could not afford a sheep or a goat, two turtledoves or pigeons could be substituted (Lev. 5:7). The fourth type of sacrifice was the trespass offering, which involved the legal rights of a people and their property, whether in relation to God or people (Lev. 5:14-6:7; 7:1-7). Failure to offer the tithe, firstfruits, or other required offerings necessitated this sacrifice of a ram, a very costly retribution.

After the Jews of Judah were carried into captivity in Babylonia in the sixth century B.C., the exiles were forced to build local places of study and worship, since they no longer had access to the TEMPLE. These they called SYNAGOGUES. The exact date of their origin is unknown, but they must have been built rather soon after the Jews attained some measure of freedom under the Persians late in the sixth century B.C. Synagogues were built throughout the Diaspora and served as cultural centers for the preservation of the Jewish way of life, not just as places of worship. However, worship was an important part of the function of the synagogue. The ruler of the synagogue (Acts 18:8; Mark 5:22) was in charge of worship and selected those who led prayers, read from the Law, and preached (Luke 4:16 ff.; Matt. 4:23; Acts 13:15). The services, held on Sabbath days, consisted of psalms, benedictions, recitation of the Shema (Deut. 6:4) and the Eighteen Benedictions, reading from the Law and the Prophets, and a sermon (Luke 4:16-27). There is evidence that the reading of the Law followed a triennial cycle. It was read in its entirety over a three-year period. Later, selections from the Prophets (Haftorah) were added to the readings from the Torah. Eventually, the Babylonian cycle was adopted, allowing the completion of the reading in one year. The passage was read in Hebrew and then translated into Aramaic, one verse at a time. Sacrifice was not performed in the synagogues, nor associated with them. By A.D. 70, when the Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, it is estimated that four to seven million Jews in the Diaspora had more than a thousand synagogues.

New Testament. Worship was a matter of private conviction with Jesus, who refused to bow down before Satan and worship him (Matt. 4:9). He rebuked some of the Pharisees who came to him for replacing the word of God with tradition in their external expressions of worship (Matt. 15:1-9). Since Jesus forbade his disciples to preach to Gentiles (Matt. 10:5) and did not make a special effort to go to them himself (Matt. 15:24), he and his disciples worshiped in synagogues and in the Temple (Luke 4:16-22; Mark 11:15-19; Luke 21:37; 24:53; Acts 2:46; 3:1). After Gentiles were admitted to the church (Acts 10) Paul spoke to both Jews and God-fearing Greeks in synagogues throughout the Diaspora (Acts 17:1-4; 18:4). He charged the Greeks in Athens with worshiping in ignorance through their IDOLATRY and taught them to seek after the one true God in whom we "live and move and have our being" (Acts 17:22-34).

In his letters, Paul used a variety of Greek terms to discuss the external expressions of worship in the religious life of the believer (Rom. 9:4; I Cor. 10:14; Col. 2:18; II Thess. 2:4). Similar terms are also found in Hebrews (9:1-2; 12:28). In almost all other NT references, however, the concept of worship is conveyed with the verb meaning "to prostrate oneself" in the presence of the object of worship, whether physically or spiritually (Matt. 2:2; John 4:20; Acts 8:27; 17:23; 19:27; Heb. 11:21; Rev. 19:10). There is no uniform posture for worship in the Bible. Jesus prayed on the cross (Luke 23:34). Stephen prayed while he was being stoned to death (Acts 7:59). Jesus prayed lifting his eyes to heaven (John 17:1), but the tax collector would not lift his eyes to heaven as he prayed (Luke 18:13). Paul and Christians from Ephesus knelt and prayed on the beach at Miletus (Acts 20:36). Moses took off his shoes in the presence of God (Exod. 3:5), as did Joshua, who "fell on his face to the earth, and worshiped" (Josh. 5:14).

The NT does not give a full description of early Christian worship, but a survey of various passages shows the following components of worship: PRAYER (I Cor. 11:4; 14:15; I Tim. 2:1-8; Phil. 4:4-8); singing (Col. 3:16; Eph. 5:19; I Cor. 14:15, 26); teaching or PREACHING (Acts 20:7; I Cor. 14:26-33; I Tim. 4:13); reading of scripture (I Tim. 4:13); observance of the LORD'S SUPPER (I Cor. 11:2-16) on the first day of the week (Acts 20:7); and giving of their money for benevolent and other needs during these assemblies (I Cor. 16:2), although giving was not limited to these occasions (Gal. 6:10). Some of these acts of worship were performed charismatically (I Cor. 14), but the principle that was to be kept uppermost in mind during these services was that they should "let all things be done for edification" (I Cor. 14:4, 26). In these assemblies men lifted up "holy hands" in prayer, indicating a lack of anger and quarreling (I Tim. 2:9-15). A public "amen" was given to the thanksgiving (I Cor. 14:16), which apparently was a part of the prayer service (I Tim. 2:1; Phil 4:6).

Post-New Testament Period. Evidence from the second century indicates that this type of worship was continued into that century. Justin Martyr, in the second century, described essentially this same kind of service. Christians met on Sunday at one place and read the writings of the apostles and the prophets, following which there was a sermon of exhortation. The congregation prayed and then observed the Lord's Supper, after which a contribution was taken up and sent to the needy by the deacons. The congregation said the Amen at the conclusions of the prayers and thanksgivings. Christian worship in modern times perpetuates essentially these same elements found in early centuries with slight modification among the various branches of Christendom. The Roman Catholic and Episcopal traditions, along with most forms of Eastern Orthodoxy, highlight the liturgical aspects of worship, while the Protestant and Evangelical traditions tend to highlight the place of preaching, due largely perhaps to the Reformation inheritance.

WRATH OF GOD. The justifiable and righteous anger of God against sin, mentioned many times in the OT. God's wrath is the expression of divine holiness as it comes into contact with the evils wrought by people, especially by those God has called into covenant. The divine wrath is seen in God's reaction to Moses (Exod. 4:14), to Miriam and Aaron (Num. 12:9), against Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19), against those who opposed the children of Israel as they went up to occupy Canaan (Joshua), and against Israel many times as the people broke the covenant and followed other gods. Ultimately, Yahweh's wrath against Israel's sin led to the destruction of both Israel (Samaria, 722 B.C.) and Judah (Jerusalem, 586 B.C.). Yet God's wrath is but the opposite side of God's love. God wishes people to turn from sin, and if they persist in it, then God punishes them to bring them to repentance. This is the message of all the great prophets from Amos to the Isaiah of the Exile (Second Isa.; Isa. 40-55).

Even in visiting wrath on humankind, Yahweh tempered anger with mercy. God is slow to show anger because God is full of chesid, or steadfast love. God is said to have wrath, to be angry, and to hate certain actions and situations in the OT (Deut. 11:17; Exod. 4:14; Ps. 85:4; Hos. 9:15). Related to God's wrath is the jealousy of God (Exod. 20:5). God's jealousy is displeasure with Israel's sinfulness. In the NT God is also said to have wrath against a present sin (Rom. 1:18), but generally, the wrath of God means the punishment of sinners at the Last JUDGMENT. In general, the NT ideas about God's wrath are similar to those of the OT.

The concept of God's wrath has been under attack since the first century A.D. Philo of Alexandria had to defend the OT against Stoic criticisms. The Stoics did not believe in divine punishment. The heretic Marcion accepted this view and taught that there were two Gods—the OT God, who had wrath, and the Christian God, who only loved. The church condemned him. Schleiermacher rejected God's wrath and thus hell. Ritschl later agreed. Some sectarians and cultists, such as the Jehovah's Witnesses, also deny the wrath of God and the reality of hell and eternal punishment. Obviously, the concept of universal salvation is opposed to the concept of God's wrath.

WRITING AND WRITING MATERIALS.

Apart from some verses in Daniel (2:4-7, 28) and Ezra (4:8-6:18; 7:12-26), which are written in Aramaic, the writing of the Bible is in either HEBREW or GREEK. There are a few exceptions to this: Genesis 41:43 has an Egyptian loanword, abrek (RSV "bow the knee!"), and both Hebrew and Aramaic equivalents of the English rendering "heap of witness" are given in Genesis 31:47.

The LANGUAGE of the NT is koinē Greek, that is, the language common among the populace in first-century Greco-Roman society, though this older view of koinē stated in classic form by A. Deissmann needs to be qualified in two directions. First, recent studies have shown the strong influence of the OT in Greek, the so-called Septuagintal style, on NT authors; and the Aramaic influence from the spoken dialect of Palestine has been successfully noted on many NT passages, thanks to the work of Matthew Black, Nigel Turner, and Klaus Beyer. Second, in modern times it has been argued—with some cogency—that especially the NT writers of the apostolic church (Paul, and Peter) have command of a literate, sophisticated, and urbane manner of composition to suit their audiences in the higher strata of society, which is more professional and upper class than artisan. Allusions to classical Greek authors are rare (for example, I Cor. 15:33, citing Menander's comedy Thais), but the point made by E. A. Judge is that Paul was at home with the upper levels, both educationally and in his written style and language, of middle-class society in the large Hellenistic cities, such as Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome, where he founded and ministered to congregations.

Writing. References to writing are as wide and continuous as the story of biblical history. Writing has been in existence at least from the third millennium B.C., so it is not surprising that the early figures of Israel's history are said to have left written compositions (Moses, Exod. 17:14), especially those parts of the OT that later Judaism prized so highly as God's law or Torah (Exod. 24:12; 34:27), the "words of Yahweh" (Exod. 24:4) engraved on stone tablets (Exod. 32:16; compare Job 19:24 for this material used for inscriptions). Moses was evidently assisted by a body of scribes whose work codified the judicial rules (Deut. 16:18; Jos. 8:33; I Chr. 23:4). Thereafter, in the narrative sequence of the OT story, leaders of Israel wrote down their deeds (I Sam. 10:25), sent letters (II Sam. 11:14), and corresponded with surrounding heads of state (II Chr. 2:11), using court officials as amanuenses (I Chr. 24:6).

The prophets of the eighth and seventh centuries wrote (Isa. 8:1; 30:8), sometimes dictating to a trusted secretary like Baruch (Jer. 30:2; 36:27; 45:1). Postexilic leaders were familiar with the art of writing, and Zerubbabel and later Nehemiah had much correspondence with their patrons in Persia (Ezra 4:6, 7), while Ezra, a contemporary figure, is given the epithet, "the scribe" (Ezra 7:6).

Interestingly, Jesus Christ left no book, and occasional allusions (John 8:6) are more tantalizing than informative (Rev. 2-3: letters of Christ to the seven churches of Asia, which are said to have been transcribed by John for these congregations, Rev. 1:11). Not much is recorded of writing in the Gospel accounts, since they reflect the traditional Jewish method of teaching by word of mouth or ORAL TRADITION. In the apostolic age, however, the scene changed, and Paul in particular found it essential to keep open regular lines of communication with his churches by letter-writing habits. He regarded his letters as his alter ego, sending them at such times as he was unable to travel because of imprisonment (Phil. 2:12; Col. 2:5; 4:18) or other circumstances (I Cor. 5:1-13). His writings were evidently effective (II Cor. 10:10), and he expected a wide circulation for them (I Thess. 5:27; Philem. 1-2; Col. 4:16), adding a postscript in his own handwriting (I Cor. 16:21; Gal. 6:11; II Thess. 3:17, especially when there were forgeries being circulated, II Thess. 2:2). Paul used amanuenses, one of whose names we know as Tertius (Rom. 16:22), as Peter appears to have enlisted Silvanus to help in the composition of I Peter (5:12). As we observed, the letters of Paul are artistically shaped and to be classified as elegant prose compositions, however much they were occasioned ad hoc by the needs of his readers. Letters of commendation formed one special type of writing (II Cor. 3:1-3; compare Acts 18:27). In the later NT books the claim is registered that written compositions of the apostles, like those of the OT prophets, are under the inspiration of the Spirit (II Tim. 3:15, 16; II Pet. 3:15, 16).

Writing Materials. The earliest form of writing material was stone or rock, on the surface of which marks or alphabetic letters were chiseled (Job 19:24) by an iron stylus (Jer. 17:1). Stone altars were a permanent witness to this type of inscription (Josh. 8:32; Deut. 27:2-8). Of less durability but far more convenient were wooden boards, used by the prophets of Israel (Isa. 30:8; Hab. 2:2), and this type of material was popular in Greco-Roman schools and in Jewish homes (Luke 1:63). Clay tablets made of baked brick are also mentioned (Ezek. 4:1), especially for legal documents where the object is to be deposited and not subject to the wear and tear of constant use.

PAPYRUS was perfectly suited to fill the need for convenient, inexpensive, and durable writing material. The papyrus plant is native to Egypt, growing especially in the marshes of the Nile Delta since it grows with its roots in water. The plant grows ten to fifteen feet high, which is adequate for preparation into a writing surface. The sections of the stem are cut, and strips are laid side by side to form a narrow mat. The layers are joined by hammering and pressing. The sheets are trimmed, with the surface polished smooth, and then glued together to form a continuous roll. Not surprisingly this simple yet profound invention gave a monumental impetus to writing and supplied the English language with the word "paper."

While papyrus is not explicitly mentioned in the OT, papyrus scrolls were found among the cache at Qumran (the Dead Sea Scrolls), and the inexpensive cost and durability of papyrus in the first and second centuries A.D., according to C. H. Roberts and T. C. Skeat, led to the Christian use of this material for their first compositions. A number of these survive as NT textual papyri, on which selected Gospels and other NT books are written (for example, P52, a fragment of John 18, the John Rylands manuscript, going back to the early second century A.D.). The transition from the common practice of using papyrus in a roll (as a scroll to be unwound, as in Luke 4:17, 20; Rev. 5:1-7; 10:2, 8-10) to a codex form, that is, like a book with leaves to be turned over, is a matter for debate between experts. One possible suggestion is that Christians found it easier to locate passages of a text when the writing was in page form. See II Timothy 4:13 for some brief allusion to these materials and the suggestion that parchment notebooks were a Roman invention.

The next important change came with the shift from papyrus to PARCHMENT. The turning point was in A.D. 301, when an edict of Emperor Diocletian clamped down on high wages paid to scribes who wrote on parchment, a leather-like substance drawn from the hides of sheep, goats, and calves (its invention derives from the kings of Pergamum in the second century B.C.), suitably tanned, shaved, and polished. Later (A.D. 312) the Christian emperor Constantine ordered fifty Bibles in vellum (a kind of parchment) to be placed in churches. This shows how popular the parchment codex had become. The evidence survives in our two finest specimens of parchment codices, Sinaiticus and Vaticanus.

Earlier scribes used a pen made of reed sharpened to a point (Jer. 8:8; III John 13). The ink was a mixture of gum and carbon in the form of lampblack. The absence of an acid base made the writing erasable, and it could easily be washed or scraped off; in the course of time it faded (see Col. 2:14 for illustration of this fact). The later addition of iron sulfate to ink caused the lettering to eat into the writing material, so that it became permanent. R.M.

WYCLIFFE, JOHN (1328–84). English theologian and church reformer, the “Morning Star of the Reformation.” Born in Hipswell, Yorkshire, he was educated at Oxford and lived there during most of his life, winning notice as a philosopher-theologian. Wycliffe grew increasingly skeptical of prevailing church conditions: the papacy moved from Rome to Avignon causing the Babylonian Captivity (1305–77), and Christendom was soon embarrassed by two popes during the Great Schism (1378–1417). Wycliffe turned to Augustine, the Bible, and early church fathers for inspiration. He gave lectures on the entire Bible to complete his doctoral degree and gradually developed a view of the church contrasting the earthly institution with the invisible, ideal church. He was rector at Fillingham and Ludgershall before Lutterworth (1374–84), where he gained fame as a radical critic of the church and especially monasticism, which he regarded as religiously bankrupt. He expected a plush appointment from the pope in view of his scholarship at Oxford, and when that did not happen, he entered the service of King Edward III, who appointed him to Lutterworth. He represented the king in a dispute with the pope, who still claimed England as a fief and was demanding tribute (based on the “Donation of Constantine”). Wycliffe appealed to English law and developed a doctrine of righteous stewardship, which runs throughout his works. He held that everything belongs to God and that we are but stewards who can lose our stewardship through unworthy service.

On Divine Lordship (1375) and On Civil Lordship (1376) maintained that every creature, whether priest or king, is a servant of God the Creator, and that human stewardship (lordship) is neither unlimited nor permanent. Since lordship is by grace, one not in grace can be replaced. Priests and rulers are but stewards and if unfit should lose their stewardships. Wycliffe rejected the use of force but was accused of fomenting the Peasants' Uprising in 1381. He thought the church should institute radical reform, but that secular powers might do so if the church did not.

On the King's Office anticipated a national church as realized under Henry VIII. In 1377 Pope Gregory XI issued five bulls against Wycliffe and demanded his arrest, an order resisted by Wycliffe's political protectors. On the Pastoral Office (1378) called for clerical poverty and non-support of immoral and negligent clergy by the withholding of funds and attendance. On the Eucharist (1380) rejected transubstantiation as biblically, historically, and philosophically invalid and argued that the elements remain bread and wine after consecration. In 1381 Oxford repudiated this view, and the Blackfriars Council (1382) condemned ten of his views as heretical. Wycliffe spent his last years writing pamphlets against opponents. Wycliffe's LOLLARD followers extended and spread his ideas, preaching and circulating the Bible in English, but were condemned by Parliament in 1401 and forced underground. They fostered an ethos that later prepared England for the REFORMATION. Wycliffe's views were further condemned by the Council of Constance in 1415.

WYCLIFFE BIBLE TRANSLATORS. Working through eighteen national sending agencies, WBT is the world's largest organization involved in translating the Scriptures into the languages of tribal peoples. To accomplish its goals, Wycliffe sponsors the work of 1,781 North Americans overseas as well as 658 linguists and aides from other parts of the world. These figures do not include the North American administrative staff of 200 nor 466 short-term personnel. WBT has two major affiliates: the Summer Institute of Linguistics and the Jungle Aviation and Radio Service.

The ministry of WBT was conceived by W. Cameron Townsend and L. L. Legters, missionaries to Latin America. Their vision was to translate the Bible into every tongue on earth. In 1917 Townsend was peddling Bibles in Central America. When he realized that 60 percent of the people of Guatemala could not read the Spanish edition of the Bible he was selling, he quit his job, joined another mission and started on a seventeen-year task of translating the Scriptures into Cakchiquel, the language of one of the Indian tribes. In 1934 Townsend launched Camp Wycliffe in Arkansas as a training school for linguists. Eventually this work evolved into the Summer Institute of Linguistics. In 1935 members of this group started field work among the larger tribes of Mexico. By 1942 Wycliffe Bible Translators, Inc., was established.

Today linguists are working in primitive tribes of the continents of both North and South America, Asia, and Africa. The task is not yet complete. Even as late as 1959 Ethel E. Wallis and Mary A. Bennett wrote the significant book Two Thousand Tongues to Go.

XERXES. The Greek name of two Persian emperors, called Ahasuerus in Hebrew (Esth. 1:1 ff.; 4:6), and, in the original Persian, Khshayarsha. Both emperors belong to the Achaemenid dynasty. The king who figures in the romantic—and late—story of ESTHER is considered to be Xerxes I. His father was the famous Darius, and his grandfather was Cyrus the Great.

Xerxes I ruled the Persian Empire from 486 to 465 B.C. He was at first a very vigorous king, suppressing revolts in Egypt and pacifying Babylonia by abolishing Babylon as a separate kingdom and removing the images of Marduk (Bel, Merodach) that were needed for a king of Babylon to be legitimized. This caused two revolts that he put down.

Xerxes I then turned to the Greeks who had defeated Darius at Marathon. In 483 B.C. he began his western campaign. He bridged the Hellespont and raised a vast fleet. In 480 B.C., he conquered Athens. Then the tide turned. The Greek navy defeated the larger Persian fleet at Salamis (Sept. 28, 480 B.C.). Xerxes withdrew, and his Greek expeditionary force was defeated by the combined Greek armies at Plataea (479 B.C.). He then degenerated to the type of king portrayed in Esther. J.C.

Yy

YADIN, YIGAEEL (1917–84). Often hailed as Israel's most celebrated biblical archaeologist, Yadin was born with the family name of Sukenik. His father, Eliezer Sukenik, played a prominent part in the publishing of the first Dead Sea Scrolls in 1947, having arrived in Palestine as an emigré from Poland. His son Yigael was required to take a code name as a member of the anti-British Haganah or Jewish defense force, which protested the British mandate. Thus Yadin was given him, a name taken to mean "he will be redeemed." And this name has remained.

Yadin's role in Israeli history was first as a leader in the national defense army, where he served as chief of staff. He was active in the first Israeli-Egyptian war, and was a member of the delegation that secured a cease-fire. In 1952 he returned to his initial interest in biblical and Israeli archaeology, cooperating, as his father had done, with others in the securing of the Dead Sea Scrolls for the State of Israel. The documents are now housed in the splendid Shrine of the Book museum, thanks to Yadin's advocacy. He edited two of the seven major scrolls—the War Scroll and the Genesis Apocryphon Scroll.

Between 1956 and 1958 Yadin was the principal excavator in the site of Hazor. Not only did this important site receive expert and scientific attention, but Yadin used the operation to train what became a rising generation of Israeli archaeologists. In the 1960s he turned to Masada, where Herod the Great had built his summer place and where the last resistance stand of the Zealots against the Roman armies was made until the outpost fell in A.D. 73. Yadin's book on his work made Masada a well-known name of Jewish patriotic history, and he publicized the small sherds on which were written the names of the freedom fighters who ended their lives in a mass suicide pact.

He entered politics in 1977 to head a new party in the Knesset. His influence gave impetus to the coming to power of Menachem Begin, whose first government had Yadin as its deputy prime minister. Not fully successful as a political figure, he returned to archaeology in 1981, with further publications on the art of warfare in Bible lands and the discoveries found in the caves of Bar Kochba's time (A.D. 132–135) adding to his reputation. His work on the Temple Scroll from Qumran found in 1976 was one of his latest and most spectacular enterprises (his book appeared in English translation in 1983). R.M.

YAHWEH. The personal name for the Israelite national Deity, usually translated "the LORD" in modern versions. Both the exact pronunciation and meaning of the name are uncertain. Ancient Hebrew texts in which only consonants and not vowels were written reproduce the name, the so-called Tetragrammaton, as YHWH. Since the name was later not pronounced, except on special occasions by the high priest, substitutes such as ADONAI ("my Lord") or SHEMA ("the name") were used instead. Thus the exact pronunciation was lost. Evidence supplied by ancient church fathers suggests the form Yahweh.

The meaning of the name is uncertain although it may have never been anything more than a proper noun. Exodus 3:14 suggests that it may have been connected with the verb "to be," but here the author may have been offering a late, uncertain folk etymology. According to Genesis 4:26, people have worshiped Yahweh since the earliest days of human history. According to Exodus 6:2, however, the name was not revealed until the time of Moses. These different views probably reflect different literary and theological traditions in ancient Israel. Yahweh was worshiped by other than Israelites according to Exodus 18, where Moses' father-in-law, a Midianite or Kenite, is depicted as a devotee. (See JEHOVAH.)

YAMA. From the Sanskrit word for "restrainer, punisher," or "twin." In the mythology of Hinduism, the god of death who rules over the underworld. He was the first man, who, being therefore also the first to die, established his realm in the place where departed souls go. He is presented in the Vedas as less grim than a jovial, majestic figure, green but wearing red robes, who gathers ancestors to himself and bestows upon them the immortality whose secret he discovered. Later, however, Yama became more terrifying. He personified the dread aspect of death and was the Dharmaraja, the judge of righteousness who weighs the deeds of the deceased and has the wicked punished in the hells. In this form he passed into the lore of Buddhism, and so into the mythology of Tibet, China, and Japan.

YEAR, CHRISTIAN. See CHRISTIAN YEAR.

YIDDISH. One of two major languages of the Jewish people. Printed and written in Hebrew characters, Yiddish became the language of the Jewish masses. Before the Holocaust, Yiddish was spoken by about twelve million people.

According to some authorities, the history of Yiddish dates back to the tenth or eleventh century, when in the German provinces of the Rhineland, Jews speaking the local German dialects intermingled Hebrew expressions. Yiddish has since undergone its own development. In addition to the Hebrew elements—estimated at about 20 percent—contained in Yiddish, some other elements from the languages of the countries where Jews lived (mainly Slavic words) were gradually adopted. The term "Jewish" when applied to "Yiddish" is wrong. In modern times, Yiddish became the medium of expression of many outstanding writers—Sholem Aleichem among them—who created a great modern Yiddish literature. Like Hebrew, Yiddish is written and printed from right to left.

YIGDAL. A Hebrew hymn based on the thirteen Articles of Faith formulated by MOSES MAIMONIDES. "Yigdal," which opens the hymn, means "Magnified be (the Living God)." Sung to a variety of tunes, it is one of two hymns often chanted at the conclusion of the Sabbath and festival evening services. Among Ashkenazi Jews, it is also recited before the daily morning service. The tune for Tabernacles was used by Isaac Nathan in 1815 as the air for one of Lord Byron's "Hebrew Melodies," being set by him to the verses of "The Wild Gazelle."

YIN/YANG. In Confucianism and Taoism, complementary cosmological principles that emanate from the Supreme Ultimate (T'ai Chi) and whose interplay underlies the movement of the world. Yin is earth, feminine, dark, and passive, embodied in valleys and streams, and emblemed by the tiger and the color orange. Yang is heaven, male, light, active, and sovereign, embodied in mountains and sky, and represented by the dragon and the color azure. Yin and yang thinking goes back at least to cosmological theories of the third century B.C. and is basic to countless Chinese rituals, art motifs, and the geomancy used to orient a house or grave properly between yin and yang lines of force. The first half of the year, for example, is yang, being the growing season and the time of lengthening days; it is inaugurated by dragon dances on New Year's Day. At the summer solstice, tiger dances usher in the time of increasing dark and ingathering. Yin and yang, portrayed respectively by broken and unbroken lines put into trigrams and hexagrams, are fundamental to the divination of the celebrated I CHING. Although yang may be favored in popular religion, it is important to note that theoretically yin and yang do not represent good or evil but symbolize complementary forces that should be kept balanced.

YM and YWHA. A voluntary organization that provides group experiences to people who use its facilities. Unlike the Christian YMCA and YWCA, which are separate for men and women, the Jewish Ys are combined and provide a wide variety of activities for all age groups—from the preschooler to the older adult. These activities include physical fitness, Jewish culture and education, recreation, classes, discussion groups, lounge programs, and the like. Whereas in New York most of these institutions are known as YM & YWHAs, in most of North America they are called Jewish Community Centers. They originated in America, unlike other Jewish institutions that were brought over from other countries. Their memberships include Orthodox, Reform, Conservative, and unaffiliated. The Jewish Welfare Board (JWB) is the network of and central service agency for 275 Jewish Community Centers, YM & YWHAs, and camps in North America serving one million people.

YMCA/YWCA. Two parallel but separate international organizations ministering to young men and women and seeking to aid them through activities that develop their powers of body, mind, and spirit. The organizations employ a triangle—red for men, blue for women—as a symbol of their programs.

George Williams (1821–1905), a London dry goods merchant, is credited with the founding of the YMCA in 1844. When he arrived in London, he was appalled by the working conditions he found there. He was concerned for the spiritual welfare of working-class young men and coupled with this a recreational program. The YWCA, originally two separate organizations, was founded in London in 1855. The two British groups were joined in 1877. The first United States organization was formed in New York City in 1858 under the name of the Ladies' Christian Association. The YMCA began as a pronouncedly evangelical movement, and Williams early sponsored Bible classes and other meetings designed to win young men for Jesus Christ. Leading evangelicals of the day, such as Lord Shaftesbury, sponsored the movement. Soon the YMCA spread to the Continent, to the United States, and to the British Empire. The American YMCA was founded in Boston in 1851. During the Civil War, Dwight L. Moody, the famed evangelist, served the troops as a YMCA worker.

Local YMCAs are autonomous corporations voluntarily affiliated with national councils in the various countries they serve and with the World Alliance of YMCAs, which has its headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland. Like the YMCA, the work of the YWCA was strengthened by the Second Evangelical Awakening. The program of the YWCA closely parallels that of the YMCA with internationalism and interdenominationalism promoted strongly. Both the YMCA and YWCA, as active participants of the United Service Organizations (USO), served the men in uniform during World War II. The YMCA has served the United States military forces in four wars.

YOGA. Literally "discipline." A term that includes a variety of beliefs and practices in Hinduism. A person who practices yoga is a yogi (or yogin). In the United States the feature best known is a set of physical exercises, with emphasis on proper posture and disciplined breathing. In the Bhagavad Gita the term "yoga" is used to designate three ways of conducting the religious life: bhakti-yoga, or the life of devotion to deity; karma-yoga, the doing of one's duty in the world without attachment to the results of one's actions; and jnana-yoga, the gaining of true knowledge. To distinguish these ways from what is most widely thought of as yoga, many writers prefer to speak of them as marga (path). Scholars have pointed out yoga-like practices in ancient Taoism and medieval Christianity.

Classic Yoga. Various features of early Hinduism have been regarded as forerunners of yoga, but many scholars see its true beginnings in the Yogasutra of Patanjali. Those who believe that the author of the sutra is the great grammarian Patanjali date its origin to around 200 B.C. Because of the philosophical ideas in the sutra, however, many scholars feel that around A.D. 300 is a preferable date, and that the author was another person with the same name as the grammarian.

Patanjali's system of yoga is the basis for one of the six darshanas, or accepted philosophical systems of orthodox Hinduism. It is close to the system known as samkya, and like samkya teaches a dualism of matter and soul. These two, matter and soul, are eternally separate and distinct. Yoga seeks to free the soul from dependence on material reality. In this it draws on the help of a soul that, unlike all other souls, has never been involved in matter. This soul, Ishvara, is, in effect, a god and can serve as an object of MEDITATION and thus as an aid toward salvation. Salvation is not viewed, however, as involving a state of oneness with the god.

The Yogasutra consists of four sections. The first stresses true consciousness as prior to and more important than mere awareness of our common sense world. This consciousness is the real self, and yoga is the method by which one comes to freedom apart from ordinary awareness. Second, under the guidance of a guru one learns the practices that lead to that goal. Third is the gaining of paranormal powers. These powers, however, may actually hinder the yogi from the final goal and must be used with great care. Fourth is the attainment of kaivalya, the final liberation of the person or soul. Classic Patanjali yoga is also known as raja or "royal" yoga.

Hatha Yoga is a system of rigorous physical practices accompanying meditation and designed to achieve the goals of royal yoga. Ha or "sun" refers to the "breath" that circulates through the upper half of the body, and tha or "moon" refers to the "breath" that circulates from the abdomen to the feet. Thus the yogi strives to coordinate the life forces in the body. Also involved is an ancient theory of the human self that teaches that there are channels (nadi) running from the base of the torso to the head, and that there are centers of energy (chakra) from the base of the spine to the top of the head. Although these channels and centers cannot be discovered by a surgeon, they are considered more real than the physical body. They represent within the body real cosmic forces that the yogi can activate through Tantric practices. One important method for doing this is the use of mantras, or sacred words and phrases full of spiritual power. The practice of yoga is believed to arouse the dormant energy latent in the individual and make it move upward along the central channel through the various chakras.

Kundalini Yoga is the term used in Tantric meditation to describe the awakening of the dormant energy. This energy is known as kundalini or "serpent power" because it is pictured as coiled at the base of the central channel. There it rests in the lowest chakra, situated between the genitals and the anus. When it is awakened it rushes upward like lightning to the highest chakra within the brain and causes a state of complete absorption in the experience (samadhi). The person thus gains "liberation." Tantric yoga differs from other forms of yoga in that it does not reject or renounce sensuous experiences. Instead it places great emphasis on them and is in sharp contrast to the ascetic life-style.

A side effect of awakening the kundalini is the generation of paranormal powers. These powers are quite dangerous. Anyone not meditating under the supervision of a qualified guru may be harmed, and even a competent yogi may find them so distracting as to interfere with the true goal—liberation.

The Self-Realization Fellowship. Yoga was introduced to North America in 1920 by a gifted and dynamic teacher named Mukunda Lal Ghosh, who was born near Calcutta in 1893. He took as his religious name Paramahansa (that is, Master Yogi) Yogananda. His life and teachings have become well known through his informative and highly readable book, The Autobiography of a Yogi, which is distributed by the Self-Realization Fellowship.

Lively and enthusiastic as a boy, he visited a great number of holy men, many of whom could perform paranormal acts that impressed their followers. He recounts these experiences in his book, including his encounter with a holy woman who had solved the perennial problem of the food chain by being able to draw nourishment directly from the air without any need of photosynthesis or other material process. He finally chose as his master the family guru, who had been instructed by another guru from a long line of gurus, beginning with one who had been living in the Himalayas for many centuries.

After coming to America, Yogananda quickly gathered a following. His teachings combine the traditional kundalini beliefs and practices with a variety of other ways of thought. One of his concerns was to demonstrate the universal validity of yoga philosophy. He borrowed heavily from the vocabulary of modern science and of Christianity, and taught that Jesus, Paul, and other spiritual masters throughout the ages had essentially the same message that he proclaimed.

The technique he used was termed kriya ("applied") yoga. By meditation, yogic exercises, and the use of the powerful syllable "Om" the practitioner can concentrate his or her own life-energy and draw it away from outward concerns to spiritual centers within. In the opposite of the upward movement of the kundalini energy, the brain serves as the source of power and sends power coursing downward to open up the chakras. If rightly done, this action enables the individual to speed up the course of evolution and perhaps even control death.

Branches of the Fellowship, called Churches of all Religions, exist in many countries, including India. California has about a fourth of the branches in the United States. There are two classes of members, laity and more advanced members called renunciants. Worship services are simple and low key. Christian scriptures are used, along with the Bhagavad Gita and Yogananda's writings.

Yogananda died in the United States in 1952. It is reported that his body remained incorruptible until his casket was closed for the last time, twenty days after his death.

The International Sivananda Yoga Society. Named for a prominent modern teacher of yoga (Sivananda) in India, this movement was brought to the United States in the early 1960s by Swami Vishnu-Devananda. He is described as an extrovert and is the first yoga teacher to be licensed as an airplane pilot. His specialty is hatha yoga (described above).

The most striking feature of yogic practice is the control that can be achieved over the body and its normal functions. The lungs, heart, and other internal organs can be subjected to the will of the yogi, and physical health can be enhanced. Claims of paranormal powers, however, have not been verified. Powers of levitation, if demonstrated, would probably convince skeptics. Such claims are part of the Indian tradition that austerity can create power so great that an ascetic can threaten even the gods. Also a part of the tradition is the belief that mystical experience itself is the supreme goal of religion, far more important than the worship of supernatural beings.

YOM KIPPUR. See DAY OF ATONEMENT.

YOUNG, BRIGHAM (1801–77). The second president of the Mormon church and colonizer of Utah was born June 1 in Whitingham, Vermont, to John and Abigail Howe Young. When Brigham was three, they moved to New York's "burned-over district." With little education, he became a house painter and glazier. At twenty-two Young joined the Methodist church, but when The Book of Mormon appeared, he studied it for two years before being baptized in 1832. In July 1833 he led a group to Kirtland, Ohio, where in 1834 he married Mary Ann Angell. Later they led "Zion's Army" to Missouri.

In February 1835 he became third in seniority among the quorum of the Twelve Apostles and in 1838 its senior member. He later directed the group's removal to Nauvoo, Illinois, where he acted as chief financial officer. Following JOSEPH SMITH's murder, he was elected president in 1847. He led the exodus to the Great Salt Lake Valley, founding Deseret. A colonizing genius, Young scientifically planned the cities and sent colonists into every fertile valley with specialists to ensure viable communities. A Perpetual Emigration Fund helped settle immigrants converted by the Mormon missionaries. He had little interest in theology, confined church power to the ruling oligarchy, and stifled charismatic tendencies. When Congress passed the Utah Territory Act in 1850, Young became its first governor.

YOUTH FOR CHRIST INTERNATIONAL. An interdenominational organization that specializes in teenage evangelism. Youth for Christ began in the United States during the large youth rallies of the early 1940s, and was organized in 1945. It soon spread rapidly to foreign countries. It now ministers in fifty-four nations. Its major emphases are (1) Saturday night youth rallies conducted to instill commitment to Christ; (2) on-campus activities designed to help teenagers reach their peers; (3) national youth magazines and other literature aimed at both Christian evangelism and growth; (4) Lifeline ministries to delinquents; (5) leadership training in evangelism methods; (6) overseas outreaches by teen teams; and (7) camps and conventions. Its headquarters is in Wheaton, Illinois.

YUGA. In Hinduism "an age," an extremely long period of time, part of a vast calendar of time on a cosmic scale. The concept can be traced back to the Vedic period (about 1000-600 B.C.) and was developed in later periods. Four yugas covering more than five million human years are believed to be at the center of a complex system of rendering time. It is linear, since it moves forward, but it is also circular, as eventually the universe will dissolve and the whole cycle will begin over again.

The system involves two Hindu deities: BRAHMA, whose lifetime is the same length as created time, and VISHNU, who descends to earth in various forms. It is also believed that each of the yugas is shorter and less virtuous than the one before it. The present age, the Kali Yuga, last of the four, is 420,000 human years in length and is the most wicked of all. Humans are morally too weak to live virtuously without the restraints of law.

ZACCHAEUS. According to Luke 19:1-10, a man from Jericho who followed Jesus, after showing his deep interest in Jesus by climbing up into a sycamore tree to see his entry into the town. Zacchaeus (whose name means "pure") is said to have been a short man who could not see Jesus over the heads of the crowd. He was a tax collector of Jericho, who had become wealthy through his profession. Apparently, his conscience troubled him, and he was looking for the power of forgiveness to change his life. Jesus recognized this and invited himself to Zacchaeus' house. At dinner, Zacchaeus was converted and declared that any unjust gains he had made would be repaid with interest.

ZADOKITE FRAGMENTS. The fragments of two medieval copies of a Jewish sectarian manual, written in Hebrew, discovered in the Ibn-Ezra Synagogue in the old city of Cairo, Egypt, during 1896-97. These fragments describe a Jewish sect that leaves Judea and goes to Damascus and there enters into a new covenant. This may be symbolic of the group's leaving orthodox Judaism. Solomon Schechter, a Jewish scholar and educator, edited these fragments in 1910 and named them the Zadokite Fragments because he believed them to be from a Zadok book. However, later, some other portions of the same work were found at the monastery at Qumran, near where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found. Now scholars believe the work arose out of the same monastic, apocalyptic sect that produced the Manual of Discipline and the Book of the War of the Sons of Light and the Sons of Darkness. While this Qumran group is often called the ESSENES (who are described in Josephus), there is no certainty that these celibate sectarians, who looked for two messiahs, were Essenes. The Zadokite Fragments are now generally called the Damascus Document fragments. The contents of the document are rules for living and reflections on the history of the group.

ZADOK THE PRIEST. The high priest of Israel during the reign of King David. Zadok lived in Jerusalem during the monarchies of David and Solomon and first shared priestly rank with Abiathar, but, because of his loyalty to Solomon as heir to the throne, became chief priest (I Kings 2:35).

Zadok was the father of Ahimaaz and Jerushah and the grandfather of Jotham (II Sam. 18:19 ff.; II Kings 15:32-33). Zadok played a role in protecting David's throne during Absalom's rebellion, guarding the ark (II Sam. 15:24 ff.). On Absalom's death, Zadok supported Solomon and anointed him as king. He was awarded with preeminence among the priests, a rank and privilege held by his descendants for centuries. Zadok's descendants were numerous and highly placed in the restored Temple after the return from Babylonian exile (I Chr. 24:2 ff.; 27:17; 29:22). Indeed, the prophet of the Exile, Ezekiel, believed that Zadok's descendants were the only legitimate priests (Ezek. 40:46; 43:19; 44:15; 48:11).

Zadok was also the name of four men in Jerusalem during the time of Nehemiah. Ezra 7:25 and Nehemiah 11:11 also mention a high priest named Zadok. J.C.

ZARATHUSTRA. See ZOROASTRIANISM.

ZAREPHATH. A Phoenician city controlled by the city-state of Sidon, where Elijah stayed with a widow during a famine and raised her son from the dead (I Kings 17:8 ff.). Zarephath was located on the coast of Lebanon eight miles south of Saida. It had two harbors. The prophet Obadiah (v. 20) spoke of Zarephath as the northern boundary of the restored kingdom. J.C.

ZARETHAN. A city in the Jordan Valley near where the Israelites under Joshua crossed the Jordan River "on dry foot" (Josh. 3:16). The description in I Kings 4:12 indicates that it was not far from Beth-shean. It was at Zarethan that Hiram, Solomon's artificer, cast the bronze vessels for Solomon's Temple (I Kings 7:45-46). The site of Zarethan is not absolutely known, but it is thought to be one mile east of the Jordan halfway between the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee. J.C.

ZAYDIYYA. One of the three main branches of the Shi'a in ISLAM; important in Yemen to the present day. Like all SHI'ITES, the Zaydites consider the first three caliphs inferior to Ali. Ali's sons, al-Hasan and al-Husayn, are regarded as imams (religious heirs of MUHAMMAD'S authority). Zaydites differ from other Shi'ites in their support of the revolt led by Zayd ibn Ali, al-Husayn's grandson, in the city of Kufa in A.D. 739. They believe that it is not necessary to have an imam in every age, and they reject the principles of "clear designation" and "infallibility" as prerequisites for being an imam.

The Zaydiyya early divided into two groups, the compromisers and the revolutionaries. The compromisers, unlike all other Shi'ites, consider the first two caliphs legitimate, although inferior to Ali. Thus they tried to find a compromise between the Shi'a and the Sunnis, who acknowledge all the first four caliphs. This branch died out after the ninth century A.D. The revolutionary Zaydiyya are more like other Shi'ites, and their only connection with the compromisers is their shared name. The revolutionaries hold that all who did not acknowledge the imamate of Ali became unbelievers. K./M.C.

ZEALOTS. Members of the several sects of Jews in the first century A.D. that Josephus called "the fourth philosophy," distinguishing them from the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. The Zealots were Jewish patriots who deeply resented foreign domination of their country. In the first century A.D. that was the Roman Empire. It was unlikely that the Zealots were fanatics or guerrilla fighters, although such people and groups existed. Judas of Galilee revolted against Rome when Quirinius, governor of Syria, began a census of the Jews. John of Gischala terrorized the territory in A.D. 66 and that resulted in the tragic Roman-Jewish war of A.D. 67-70.

One of Jesus' disciples, Simon, is called the Zealot in Luke 6:15 and Acts 1:13, but is called the Cananaean in Matthew 10:4 and Mark 3:18. Probably this distinguishing title is given to keep him from being confused with Simon Peter. J.C.

ZEBAH AND ZALMUNNA. Kings of Midian who were pursued beyond the Jordan by Gideon (Judg. 8:4-28). Gideon captured them in a surprise raid east of Nabah and executed them at Succoth (Judg. 8:21). This caused the Israelites to offer Gideon a kingship over them, but he refused it (Judg. 8:23). J.C.

ZEBEDEE. The father of James and John, two of Jesus' twelve apostles (Matt. 4:21; Mark 3:17). Zebedee, whose name means "Yahweh has given," was married to Salome (Mark 15:40; Matt. 27:56). Zebedee was a fisherman with his sons and many hired workers. Jesus, setting out on his ministry, called James and John to follow him, and they did. There is no further information about Zebedee in the NT. J.C.

ZEBULUN. The sixth son of Leah and Jacob; Jacob's tenth son. Zebulun was a full brother to Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, and Issachar (Gen. 30:20; 35:23). He had three sons: Sered, Elon, and Jahleel (Gen. 46:14), who went into Egypt with the tribes of Jacob while Joseph was prime minister there. The tribe of Zebulun was allotted territory in Canaan (Gen. 49:13) near Sidon, including a part of the Plain of Esdraelon and the region of the later village of Nazareth. The important "way of the sea" commercial route ran through Zebulun's territory. Many of the tribe were carried into Assyrian captivity and lost to history. J.C.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF. One of the Minor Prophets in the OT; the eleventh in the "Book of the Twelve." Zechariah's ministry (about 520 B.C.) was contemporaneous with HAGGAI, but is reflected only in chapters 1-8 (First Zechariah). Chapters 9-14 represent a much later time, the third century B.C. (Second Zechariah).

Both Haggai and First Zechariah deal with the Jews in Jerusalem under DARIUS, emperor of Persia. Conditions were unsettled, and the Temple reconstruction begun by the returned exiles was at a standstill (Hag. 2:6-9; Zech. 2:6 ff.; 6:15; 8:9).

Haggai and First Zechariah urged the people to complete the Temple, with Zechariah's preaching occurring around 520–518 B.C., over a two-year period (Zech. 1:1; 7:1). This reconstruction must be accompanied by repentance on the part of the Jews, Zechariah declared. Much of his message seems influenced by Ezekiel, although First Zechariah shows his later development of doctrine by speaking of angels, in terms similar to the principalities and powers of Paul. These angels control the fate of human groups. Both Haggai and First Zechariah held messianic beliefs, and both prophets supported the Jewish governor (a descendant of David), Zerubbabel, as the Messiah (Hag. 2:23; Zech. 6:9-15). These pretensions were discovered by the Persians, and Zerubbabel disappeared from history. A non-Jew was then made governor in Judah. The Temple restoration was allowed by the authorities, and it was completed in 515 B.C. The renewing of the Temple cultus was one of Zechariah's major concerns.

First Zechariah was an apocalyptic visionary, who recorded his calls for repentance in a series of eight highly imaginative visions. These include the vision of the horseman (1:7-17); the four horns and four smiths (1:18-21); the measuring line (2:1-5); the high priest, Joshua, clad in filthy clothes (3:1-10); the candlestick and the olive trees (4:1-3); the flying scroll (5:1-4); the woman inside a basket (5:5-11); and the four chariots (6:1-8).

In chapter 6, Zechariah's coronation of Zerubbabel as the Messiah is recorded. Some scholars believe that originally the text said Joshua, the high priest, was recognized as the Messiah. The passage seems to be corrupt either through accident or censorship.

Chapters 9–14 (Second Zechariah) come from the time of Alexander the Great's Hellenistic empire. The oracles or messages of some unknown prophets were attached to Zechariah by the editors of the OT books. Three prophetic sections were added, two to Zechariah and one entitled Malachi (1:1). Second Zechariah consists of prophecies on the coming of the Greeks (chap. 9); the restoration of Israel to the land (chap. 10); a parable of the shepherds (chap. 11); and a series on Israel's promised future (chaps. 12–14). Much of the material here is apocalyptic and has heavily influenced Christian eschatology. Some of these ideas were used by the Gospel writers to underscore the belief in Jesus' messiahship. From Zechariah 11:12, Matthew drew the prophecy that the Christ would be betrayed for thirty pieces of silver. J.C.

ZEDEKIAH. The name of four men in the OT, chief of whom was the last king of Judah, reigning 597-587 B.C. The other men of this name were (1) one of Ahab's four hundred court prophets, who was burned because of blasphemies and crimes (I Kings 22:11, 24; II Chr. 18:10-23); (2) a prophet who was deported to Babylon and who also was executed (II Kings 24:12-16; Jer. 29:21-23); and (3) a prince in the time of Jehoiakim, king of Judah (Jer. 36:12).

Zedekiah's reign is extensively recorded in II Kings 24–25; II Chronicles 36; and Jeremiah 39 and 52, as well as in some passages in Ezekiel (chaps. 17 and 19). He was the son of King Josiah and became king after his older brothers and nephew, Jehoahaz II, Jehoiakim, and Jehoiachin had briefly occupied the throne. When the Babylonians conquered Jerusalem in 597 B.C., the king, Jehoiachin, was deported to Babylon (Jer. 27:20; II Kings 25:27; Ezek. 1:2) and Zedekiah was made a puppet king (Jer. 37:11). His name was changed from Mattania to Zedekiah, and he was forced to swear loyalty to Nebuchadnezzar. He violated this oath and the Babylonians returned to attack Jerusalem again. In 587 B.C., the city was captured and destroyed. Zedekiah was carried before the Babylonian king. His sons were murdered before his eyes; he was then blinded and taken to Babylon in chains (Jer. 39:1-5; II Kings 24:17-20; 25:1-7; II Chr. 36:11-21; Jer. 39:6-14; 52:11). J.C.

ZEN. A form of Mahayana BUDDHISM that arose in China sometime around A.D. 500 and spread to Korea and Japan. It developed into the form in which it is best known in the West today around the eighteenth century in Japan. The name is derived from the Sanskrit word dhyana ("meditation") by way of the Chinese name for the sect, Ch'an.

Early History. Although traditions teach that there was a long line of Zen patriarchs before the time of Bodhidharma, he is the first that is clearly identifiable. The stories about him are largely legendary, but they indicate that he arrived in Canton, China around A.D. 520. He is said to have sat before a wall for nine years, deep in meditation. A would-be disciple, desperate to catch Bodhidharma's attention, cut off his own arm. Seeing this, the master accepted him as a disciple. Another story, often depicted in art, relates that Bodhidharma crossed the Yangtze River standing on a single reed. Black ink paintings show him with fierce eyes and stern face.

During this early period Buddhism was influenced by TAOISM, and the two religions were regarded as nearly identical, though in time the differences became clear. Zen shows many signs of Taoist influence. While other Buddhist schools stressed ultimate reality, Zen placed primary emphasis on mind. Zen taught that NIRVANA is identical with the original Buddha mind or Buddha nature, and that this nature is in everyone. Therefore it is possible to see one's nature and as a result to become Buddha. Reading scriptures, reciting the name of Buddha, joining the monastic order, and other religious practices are unnecessary. This teaching led in time to such extreme statements as, "If you meet the Buddha, kill him." That is, the Buddha is no help toward enlightenment, but is only a hindrance. It all depends on the individual.

The most significant early Zen document is the Platform Scripture. It relates the story of how a simple country boy from southern China, Hui-neng, perceived the true nature of Buddhism, to the amazement of the then patriarch, who at once chose him as his successor. The succession was passed in secret, and this secrecy resulted in a dispute between followers of Hui-neng and a rival claimant. Separate schools in the north and the south of China were the result.

Medieval China. During the T'ang dynasty, A.D. 618-907, Buddhism gained its greatest influence, but also met with fierce opposition from the government. Monasteries had accumulated power and wealth, arousing both envy and greed. Zen monks fared better than those of other orders because they worked with their own hands and thus earned the respect of the people. Several schools of Zen thought and practice developed in this period. The two schools that have been dominant to the present, especially in Japan, are the Lin-chi (Rinzai), and the Ts'ao-t'ung (Soto). Rinzai is known for its use of the koan (see below) and for zazen, sitting in silent meditation.

Features of Zen Life. A roshi, or Zen teacher, is responsible for guiding a novice to enlightenment (satori). In formal interviews the teacher seeks to help the novice break free of conventional thinking and suddenly awaken to one's own true nature, the Buddha mind. The teacher might use slaps, shouts, symbolic and enigmatic actions, and traditional sayings, or koans. A koan might be a classic saying from ancient China, or a contemporary question to which there is either no one correct answer, or at best a seemingly illogical one. This illustrates the inadequacy of ordinary thought processes in the search for enlightenment. One famous koan is: "What is the meaning of the coming of Bodhidharma from the West? The cypress tree is in the garden." And another is: "What is the pure Dharmakaya (Buddha as absolute reality)? The hedge around the privy."

Monastic life is carefully regulated. "Meditation in movement has a thousand times more value than meditation in stillness," is a traditional statement. The movements of the monk include such things as the daily routine of rising, washing, and using the toilet, gathering for morning services, chanting scriptures, cooking food, waiting on tables, cleaning the garden, begging in the streets, and visiting in the homes of the laity.

Zen in Japan. Although Buddhism was introduced to Japan in A.D. 552, Zen did not become a major influence until the Kamakura period (1185-1333). Features of other sects were often included in Zen practice. One example is the repeated chanting of the name of Buddha (nembutsu). Zen became popular among the ruling class, especially the samurai, and had patriotic overtones well into modern times.

After a period of decline, Zen was revived by Hakuin Ekaku (1685-1768), a Rinzai monk. He is greatly admired for his calligraphy and his painting in black ink, a distinctive Zen style. He wrote about his enlightenment experiences and gave new vitality to the use of the koan in discipline and training.

Zen exerted strong influence on a number of distinctive features of Japanese culture. One of these is the tea ceremony. The preparation and the drinking of tea take place in a refined and formal setting of simple beauty. A rustic hut in a carefully planned garden, special teapots and bowls, special instruments, all add to the charm of the ceremony and help create an atmosphere of calm contemplation. Each step of the ceremony has its tradition and its significance.

The form of Japanese poetry most widely known and most imitated in other countries, the haiku, is closely associated with Zen, and many of the greatest poets have been monks. A haiku consists of seventeen "sound units" (roughly equivalent to seventeen syllables) arranged in three lines of 5, 7, 5 units. The haiku has been described as Zen directed to certain selected natural phenomena, the simple, often overlooked things of everyday life. War, sex, harmful plants, hostile animals, floods, plagues, and earthquakes are omitted as being menacing to human life. By contrast, sunrise and sunset, plum blossoms, rain, a lake, the autumn full moon, stubble in a cold rice field, signs of the Buddha's presence in the world of nature, are typical themes in the poetry of Basho (1644-94), one of the greatest writers of haiku.

Zen in the Modern World. Because of its close connection with the warrior class in Japan, Zen declined after World War II, while new religions and new sects of Buddhism dominated the popular religious scene. It is, however, too distinctively Japanese a form of religion, too deeply spiritual, too sublimely aesthetic ever to vanish entirely, and it has regained vitality. Propagated by creative teachers, it attained considerable popularity in the United States, and a number of Zen monasteries were built here. Writers have drawn parallels between Zen and aspects of Roman Catholic spirituality. Most of those interested in Zen have preferred its gentler features connected with its view of life and have not undertaken the rigid monastic way of life with its austere discipline and its slaps and beatings.

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF. Zephaniah, son of Cushi, was a descendant of King Hezekiah, and was probably a citizen of Jerusalem. His prophetic ministry can only be located historically by conjecture, but it is likely that he preached before the sweeping religious reforms of King JOSIAH (622 B.C.) occasioned by the discovery of the Deuteronomic code during the remodeling of the Temple. This would make Zephaniah a contemporary of the young Jeremiah (about 630-625 B.C.). His book is ninth in the "Book of the Twelve," the shorter writing or Minor Prophets.

Zephaniah is full of harsh judgments on the syncretistic and morally corrupt religious life of Jerusalem. He declares God's judgment on the whole world (1:2 ff.), but specifically on Jerusalem and Judah (1:4-2:3). Jerusalem is condemned for mixing the worship of Yahweh and false gods and for social evils and the mistreatment of the poor (1:7-13). Zephaniah calls for repentance before the soon to come Day of Yahweh's Wrath.

He goes on to pronounce judgment on the surrounding nations, including Assyria (2:4-5). Then his text returns to more judgments on Jerusalem (3:1-13). The people's apostasy from true worship and their rejection of God's prophets (3:5-7) mean defeat for Judah but ultimately restoration in the faithful remnant (3:11-13). For Zephaniah, doom for Jerusalem was certain, yet he praises the Lord for overthrowing enemies and for ultimately redeeming the people. Zephaniah's book, however, remains one of the darkest—and clearest—expressions of the terrible Day of God's Wrath (1:14-18) that awaited Judah. Zephaniah went beyond Amos and First Isaiah, and visualized the Day of Yahweh as the final judgment of the world. In his view, God's patience has been stretched to the limit, and the long delayed and fully deserved punishment of a disobedient people was about to come. Because of this strong emphasis on judgment, some scholars believe the notes of hope, especially that of the righteous remnant (3:13), were added in later times. J.C.

ZERUBBABEL. The grandson of Jehoiakim, who was carried into Babylonian exile as a prisoner, although a well-treated one. Zerubbabel (whose name means "offspring of Babylon") was son of Shealtiel (Ezra 3:2, 8; Hag. 1:1) and was rightly king of Judah. He was permitted to return to Jerusalem by the liberal policies of Cyrus the Great upon the defeat of Babylon by Persia (539 B.C.). Returning with the first band, Zerubbabel and Joshua, the high priest, set up an altar and began the sacrificial cultus in the ruins of the Temple, observed the Feast of Tabernacles, and began planning the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezra 3).

Opposition from the Samaritans and the local Jews brought on a period when nothing was done to restore the Temple. The preaching of Haggai and the First Zechariah in 520-518 B.C. inspired the people to complete the Temple by 515 B.C. During this time Zerubbabel was the Persian governor of Jerusalem. Both Haggai and First Zechariah declared Zerubbabel to be the Messiah, the Davidic king promised of old. However, the Persians apparently removed Zerubbabel, and Joshua, the high priest, became the leading Jewish authority, with temporal power in Persian hands. The second Temple is, nonetheless, often called Zerubbabel's Temple. J.C.

ZEUS. Chief god of the ancient Greek pantheon, father of Apollo, Artemis, Athena, Hermes, Ares, Dionysus, and several demigods. His father was Cronus, king of the Titans and son of Heaven (Uranus) and Earth (Ge). According to one myth, Cronus swallowed his children for fear of being dethroned, but Zeus was saved by his mother, Rhea. Zeus later overthrew the Titans, took control of the heavens, and ruled over the sky and the weather. He assigned the underworld to his brother Hades, and the sea to his brother Poseidon. Zeus was the god of justice and the protector of property and strangers, but his power was universal, while other gods, such as Athena, were locally of greater importance.

Zeus had oracles at Dodona in Epirus, at Olympia, and at the oasis of Siwas in Libya. His great festivals were the Dipolieia, the Pandia, or the festival of "All Zeus," and the Diasia, which celebrated Zeus Meilichios, an early fertility god.

The West Front of the Altar of Zeus at Pergamum (restored)

Zeus was famous in legend for his love affairs with mortal women. He probably became identified with heroes of pre-Hellenic cults, and in many legends he took the form of an animal such as the bull. His infidelity and promiscuity presented an ethical dilemma for later Greeks.

ZIGGURAT. Square-based, stepped towers used as temples in ancient Mesopotamia. Ziggurats had no interior rooms but possessed exterior stairways or ramps. As exemplified by the famous Hanging Gardens of Babylon, the terraces were often landscaped. The largest were over three hundred square feet and perhaps approached two hundred feet in height. They obviously represent artificial mountains, created for deities worshiped on high peaks before their devotees moved to the flat plains of the Valley of the Two Rivers.

ZIMRI. The descendant of King Saul mentioned in I Chronicles 9:36-42. Zimri is said to be the father of Moza. There are four other men named Zimri in the OT, including a chariot captain who killed King Elah and became king of Israel for seven days (I Kings 16:8-10; 15). He was killed by Omri, who became king.

ZIN, WILDERNESS OF. One of four distinct wilderness regions of the SINAI Peninsula that should not be confused with another region, the wilderness of Sin. Zin is located to the south and west of the Dead Sea, directly across the Arabah (or Wadi) from Edom. The oasis of Kadesh-barnea was located at the edge of this desolate region (Josh. 15:1; Num. 33:36; 34:3). Moses sent spies into Canaan through this wilderness area (Num. 13:21). Perhaps the most famous biblical event there was the murmuring (or complaining) of the Israelites against Yahweh while passing through the hardships of the wilderness of Zin (Num. 27:14).

ZINZENDORF, COUNT NICHOLAS LUDWIG VON (1700-60). The founder of the MORAVIANS was born May 26 in Dresden, Germany. His maternal grandmother, Henriette von Gersdorf, was a friend of Jakob Spener, who became the boy's godfather. A brilliant pupil at Halle from 1710 to 1716, Zinzendorf attracted attention from Pietist August Francke. Zinzendorf had begun to seek God at age four, and by age ten he founded the Order of the Mustard Seed, which eventually numbered such men as the archbishop of Canterbury and General James Oglethorpe among its members.

In 1722 Zinzendorf inherited a small estate at Beethelsdorf, Saxony, from his grandmother, which housed a party of refugees from Bohemia or Moravia led by Christian David. In 1727 the Brotherly Agreement of Herrnhut established an ecumenical community. To stop growing criticism of their work, Zinzendorf was ordained as an orthodox Lutheran pastor in 1734. However in 1736 Saxony banished them from the estate; they did not return until 1747. In 1737 they consecrated Zinzendorf bishop in order to give him more authority in his missionary journeys to Holland, the Baltics, the West Indies, England, and finally to America (1741-43). Zinzendorf, author of such hymns as "Jesus, Thy Blood and Righteousness," "O Thou, to Whose All-Searching Sight," and "Jesus, Still Lead On," was buried in Herrnhut.

ZION. The rock outcropping at the southern tip of the ridge between the Kidron and Tyropoeon valleys in Jerusalem. This rock, now covered by the mosque of Omar, supposedly was the site of Abraham's attempted sacrifice of Isaac and, later, of Mohammed's ascent into heaven. On this rock David set up an altar of sacrifice, and Solomon built Yahweh's Temple. The second Temple, reared by Ezra and Nehemiah, and beautified by Herod the Great in Jesus' time, also stood on Mount Zion. As the city of Jerusalem grew, the entire eastern ridge (David's city) was called Zion, and later the whole old city of Jerusalem became known as Zion, the City of God.

J.C.

ZION, DAUGHTER OF. A term referring to Jerusalem and to Judah (or Israel, in the broad sense); the people of the Mosaic Covenant and believers in the Royal Covenant theology that developed in Jerusalem from the time of Nathan the prophet to the First Isaiah. According to this theological view, Jerusalem was sacred to Yahweh, and most especially the southern tip of the ridge between the Kidron and the Tyropoeon Valley, at the top of which stood Zion (or "Citadel"), the ancient rock outcropping called Mount Moriah. On this ancient natural-rock threshing floor, David built an altar of sacrifice and Solomon later built the Temple.

This royal David theology further held that God would never allow David's kingly line to fail—there would always be a king descended from him on the throne in Jerusalem. Since Zion, even in relatively ancient times, formed only a small portion of the city of Jerusalem, the city (and by extension, the nation and the people of the Jews) came to be called the Daughter of Zion. J.C.

ZIONISM. The belief in the restoration of the Jewish people to Zion, the poetic name for both Jerusalem and the land of Israel. The wish to return to Zion has been a part of Jewish prayers for centuries.

Political Zionism, first promulgated by THEODOR HERZL in 1897, aimed to create for the Jewish people a home in Palestine secured by public law. After more than half a century, in 1948, the State of Israel was established.

Cultural Zionism saw Palestine as a "spiritual center" from which would come new cultural influences to revive the spirit of the Jewish people outside the Promised Land. The founder of cultural Zionism was Ahad Ha'Am.

Labor Zionism, promoted by Aaron David Gordon, emphasized the importance of the return of the Jewish people to the soil. Gordon believed that the Jewish people could be "reborn" through the reeducation and moral conduct of the Jewish individual and through love of the soil of the Holy Land, or work, and of one's fellow human beings.

Religious Zionism projected a concept of religious nationalism, which asserted that "the thought-image of Jewish nationality lay in the unity of the Jewish people with its Torah and its faith." L.K.

ZOAN. The capital of the Twenty-first Dynasty of Egypt, situated on the northeast frontier of Egypt on the Tanaitic branch of the Nile River and northeast of Cairo. Known as Tanis in Greek, this area was the dwelling place of the Hebrews during their sojourn in Egypt. It may be that Zoan-Tanis is the same city as Avaris and the biblical Rameses. J.C.

ZOAR. One of the five cities of the plain known to Lot in Genesis 19:20-23, situated on the east side of the Dead Sea. Zoar was a city in Moab during the eighth century B.C. and was mentioned by Isaiah (15:5) and Jeremiah (48:34). In the Christian Era, Zoar's site was moved to the southern end of the Dead Sea. The original site may be below the present Dead Sea. J.C.

ZOHAR, THE. In Hebrew, the Zohar means "the [Book of] Splendor." It is not a book so much as a collection of Jewish occult literature; the major deposit of writings on the KABBALAH. Throughout history, the Zohar has had many names, including Midrash ha-Zohar, Midrash Yehi Or, and the Menorat Ha-ma'or.

The Zohar is a collection of several books, each of which contains short midrashic statements, long sermons, and miscellaneous discussions. Most of these writings are said to be teachings of Simeon ben Yohai and his colleagues. The printed version consists of five books, three under the name Sefer ha-Zohar al ha-Torah; one is entitled Tikunei ha-Zohar, and one is called Zohar Hadash. The books are unified around the fiction that Simeon ben Yohai and his companions (ten men in all) are joined together in study and discussion. The writings purport to come from Palestine, but scholars declare that internal evidence shows they arose in Spain. J.C.

ZOROASTRIANISM. The religion of ancient Iran ("land of the Aryans") from soon after the Aryan migrations from central Asian down to the Islamic conquest (A.D. 651). Today there are only about 150,000 followers, of whom 120,000 live in and around Bombay, India.

History. There are many different accounts of the history of Zoroastrianism, and because of lack of adequate data any history of the religion must be regarded with some skepticism. "Zoroaster" is the Greek form of the name "Zarathustra" or "Zarathushtra," a prophet of Iran. Some time around 600 B.C. seems the probable date of his birth, based on linguistic evidence, but some scholars place him as early as 1200-1500 B.C.

Zoroaster was a reformer who abolished some of the more distasteful aspects of Indo-Aryan religious practice and established a new morality, details of which are not clear. His influence spread slowly throughout Iran, probably during the sixth through the fourth centuries B.C. He left behind a collection of hymns, the AVESTA, which was gradually expanded and constantly edited until the Islamic conquest. Related languages of the area around the Aral Sea are Modern Afghan and Sogdian, in which Buddhist and Manichaean texts are still preserved today.

Zoroastrian contact with the Middle East began under the West Iranian Achaemenid dynasty, founded by Cyrus in 550 B.C. (see II Chr. 36:22). His successors expanded westward, coming into contact and conflict with Babylonians, Assyrians, Egyptians, and Greeks. The Jews, who had been conquered by Babylonia, welcomed the coming of the Persians and prospered under their rule. At that time, what we call Zoroastrianism was the official religion of the empire, but Zoroaster was rarely mentioned. Devotion centered around AHURA MAZDA (the "Wise Lord"), but included a host of nature and tribal deities. Most likely, popular religion was little changed from the original beliefs of the Iranians. This period of rich cross-fertilization with ancient empires hopelessly muddled the picture of Iranian religion. Further interchange came after 331 B.C. with the conquest of Iran by Alexander the Great (356-323 B.C.). The Parthians (a west Iranian tribe) regained their independence and reasserted Zoroastrianism under the Arsacid dynasty (250 B.C.-A.D. 226). During this time there was extensive contact with Rome. Mithraism, a Zoroastrian cult, became for a time as popular as Christianity within the Roman Empire. During the Sassanian dynasty (A.D. 226–651) the figure of Zoroaster gained greater importance in the official religion. The rulers fought against the inroads of Christianity and Manichaeism. Iran fell to Arabian armies in 651, and most Zoroastrians converted to Islam. Although officially regarded as "People of the Book," Zoroastrians were not treated as well as Jews or Christians. Perhaps Zoroastrians seemed more dualistic because of the position they gave to the powerful evil spirit Ahriman, or perhaps their tradition was further removed from Islam than either Judaism or Christianity. In any case Zoroastrianism declined precipitously.

A great exodus to India began in the eighth century, but some few Zoroastrians remained in remote villages in Iran. Official persecution ended in the 1920s under the Pahlavi dynasty, and Zoroastrians flourished. Many moved to Tehran and other cities, and their numbers increased to about twenty thousand. Like other religious minorities they have suffered under the Islamic republic.

In India Zoroastrians cluster around Bombay in the Gujarat region, where they are successful businessmen and merchants. Due to their wealth they enjoy influence out of proportion to their numbers and consequently are resented by their less wealthy neighbors. Overseas, large communities live in London and Toronto.

Beliefs and Practices. The practices of the Iranian Zoroastrians (known as Gabars) and those in India (Parsis) differ, due to their long separation. In addition, differences of calendar split the Parsis into two groups. Common characteristics include, first of all, the use of the Avesta and its commentary, the Zand. Central symbols in Zoroastrian practice are fire and binding. Fire symbolizes life, royalty, truth, and justice, and all fire is regarded as sacred. Initiates are given a sacred shirt and sacred belt, which they wear at all times except when bathing. This is similar to the sacred thread worn by high caste Hindus. Bride and groom are ceremonially bound together at their wedding. Sacred fires are maintained in fire temples. Since, however, Zoroastrians form communities but not congregations, they do not gather together at these temples. The Zoroastrian concept of the nimbus of fire around royal or holy people spread into Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam. The dead are ceremonially cleansed, clothed with their sacred shirt and belt, and exposed to carrion-eating birds in "Towers of Silence." Corpses are disposed of in this way so that earth, fire, and water will not be defiled. The main ceremony of the hereditary priesthood is the sacrifice of baoma (soma), the holy liquor, to the sacred eternal fire. Priests offer the sacrifice on behalf of a worshiper, receiving a fee for the performance.

Zoroastrians seek to uphold two principles: to maintain life and to combat evil. To maintain life, one must marry and have children, and if possible, work the land and maintain food animals. Asceticism and celibacy, which are contradictory to life, are discouraged. The struggle against evil means to work for the victory of Ahura Mazda (later called Ormazd) and his angels and archangels over Ahriman (Angra Mainyu) and his demons and archfiends. While this may seem to be a dualistic world view, it has been interpreted in a variety of ways. Early views, apparently, were explicitly dualistic, with Ormazd and Ahriman equal. The actions of humans were seen as tipping the balance in one direction or another. During the Sassanian dynasty, a higher power or principle was contemplated. This was called Zurvan, the name for the highest deity or "god of time" in some sects of both Zoroastrianism and Manichaeism. Finally, the current view is that good has an inherent advantage. As in Christianity, the ultimate triumph of good is assured. This resemblance is more than coincidence.

Relation to Other Religions. Zoroastrianism occupies a pivotal position in the history of world religions. On the west it interacted with the great religions that were born in the Middle East, and on the east it shares roots with Hinduism and its offshoot, Buddhism. Thus it stands amid five religions, which together embrace well over half the world's population. The clearest influences can be seen in the figures of Satan and the Messiah in Judaism and Christianity. In early Jewish tradition Satan was the servant of God (for example, in the book of Job). Under Persian influence after the Babylonian captivity, Satan came to be regarded as the cosmic enemy of God, parallel to Ahriman in Zoroastrianism. In Islam Satan is the personification of evil, a fallen angel who tempts humans to sin. But even in hell he will continue to be God's servant. Angels and archangels, as conceived of in late Judaism and post-biblical Christianity, are drawn from Zoroastrian myths. The demon Asmodeus in the book of Tobit in the OT Apocrypha is derived from the daeva Aeshma. A parallel can be drawn between Philo Judaeus' six powers of God and the Zoroastrian equivalent, six "Holy Immortals," such as Cosmic Order, Good Mind, the Kingdom and others. Judaism's world ages with final judgment and redemption bear a strong resemblance to Zoroastrianism's cosmology. Beyond the similarities speculation can run wild, but hard evidence is lacking.

In addition to Zoroastrian elements borrowed by Judaism, Christianity picked up from Zoroastrianism the idea of guardian angels and the heavenly journey of the soul. Belief in the heavenly book of record, bodily resurrection, paradise, and the transformation of the earth show further parallels between Judaism and Christianity on the one hand and Zoroastrianism on the other. But there is no evidence that these elements were borrowed, or, if so, which religion did the borrowing. The Zoroastrian practice of prayer five times a day seems to have been borrowed from Islam, but it could be the other way around. Similarities between Parsis and Hindus that are not shared by Iranian Zoroastrians are probably borrowings from Hinduism, but since the two religions have common Indo-Aryan roots, these features may represent parallel developments.

Modern pressures make many religious practices, such as the exposure of the dead in the Tower of Silence, difficult to perform, but a religion that has survived so many crises and threats to its existence clearly has the power to adapt, while maintaining its essential nature.

ZWICKAU PROPHETS. See MÜNZER, THOMAS.

Ulrich Zwingli

ZWINGLI, ULRICH (1484–1531). Humanist-biblical Swiss reformer, noted for his “memorial” view of the Lord’s Supper. Born at Wildhaus, Switzerland, Zwingli received educational guidance from his uncle, a local priest. He became skilled in music and pursued humanistic studies at Berne, Vienna, and Basel. In 1504 and 1506 he acquired B.A. and M.A. degrees from Basel, where he also taught classics for four years. In 1506 Zwingli received Roman Catholic ordination and served as parish priest at Glarus, 1506–16. He diligently studied Greek classics, early church fathers, and the Greek NT, and he also served as an army field chaplain but vigorously opposed recruitment of Swiss mercenaries for any but the pope. From 1516 to 1519 he was priest at Einsiedeln, where he preached an Erasmian philosophy of Christ and combatted the selling of indulgences. On January 1, 1519, he became chief pastor at Great Minster Church, Zurich. Taking the Bible as his basic authority, he expounded the entire NT, verse by verse, by 1525. His preaching attracted large audiences and soon led to changes.

In 1522 Zwingli challenged the validity of fasts, and before the year ended the Zurich Council declared all religious practices had to conform to the Bible. In 1522 he and ten other priests petitioned the bishop of Constance to allow priests to marry. That same year he married Anna Reinhart, a marriage kept secret until 1524. In 1523 he successfully defended his Sixty-seven Articles against Roman Catholic opponents.

Zwingli upheld biblical authority, salvation by faith, the Mass as a remembrance, and the right of priests and nuns to marry. He said good works do not merit salvation, rejected prayer to saints, and opposed any religious rules contrary to the Bible. The council enacted these views into law, virtually completing the REFORMATION in Zurich. By the end of 1523 the council had forbidden images and the Mass. A commemorative love feast replaced the Mass. Zwingli abandoned robes, tapestries, frescoes, relics, crucifixes, candles, bell-ringing, chanting, and organ-playing as creaturely items that distract from worship of God the Creator. In 1525 Zwingli published Commentary on True and False Religion, his best theological work. He accepted the Bible for faith and practice, God’s foreordination and election, and those things expressly enjoined in Scripture. He repudiated original sin and held that the Holy Spirit had inspired men like Socrates.

In 1525 Zwingli successfully debated against some co-workers who said infant baptism was not biblical. By 1526 Anabaptist co-workers were under the death penalty for rebaptizing adults. Felix Manz was martyred in Zurich (1527), the first Anabaptist executed by Protestant authorities. Other Swiss cities—Basel, Berne, St. Gallen, Schaffhausen, Mülhausen—adopted Zwingli’s reforms. At the Marburg Colloquy (1529), LUTHER and Zwingli agreed on fourteen religious issues but not on the Lord’s Supper. Luther insisted on Christ’s physical presence: “This is my body” (Matt. 26:26). Zwingli insisted the elements “signify” Christ’s presence (John 6:48-63). This disagreement blocked political and theological union. In a brief battle at Kappel between Protestant and Catholic Swiss cantons, Zwingli was killed.
