1. The nature and scope of prayer. (a) NT prayer reflects the prior development of the OT. It is modeled, however, on the praying of Jesus, to which there are repeated references and which in its turn draws on OT prayers and ideas. NT prayer is addressed to God or to Jesus, now called Lord (see kyrios, 3261), esp. in passages with the vb. proskyneō, worship (→ 4686). But proseuchomai itself can also relate to Jesus (e.g., Acts 1:24). In this way the early church shows that it regarded Jesus Christ as its Lord and living head. Consequently one can enter into personal contact with him, talking with him just as one did when he was on earth (cf. Acts 9:10–16; 2 Cor. 12:8–9).

It follows that genuine prayer is not monologue but dialogue, in which the person praying is often silent in order to listen to Jesus. As in the OT, therefore, prayer is personal and specific, a genuine conversation with God or Jesus Christ. In addition, since the NT believer knows God as Father with even greater clarity than any OT saint, praying proceeds from a childlike trust, as expressed in the typical NT form of address "Abba" or "Father" (Matt. 6:6–9; Lk. 11:2; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6; Eph. 3:14–15). It is precisely at this point that NT prayer contrasts most sharply with that of rab. Jud. (→ patēr, father, 4252).

(b) The suppliant's assurance that his or her prayers are heard (→ aiteō, 160) is even stronger in the NT than in the OT, being grounded in the experience of God's fatherly love in Jesus Christ. Jesus explicitly strengthens this assurance, which comes from faith, by promising that prayer will be heard (e.g., Mk. 11:24). Even if it seems as if God does not answer prayers, we must not doubt his fatherly love or the power of prayer (cf. Jesus in Gethsemane [e.g., Matt. 26:36–46], where his passion is the Father's will).

(c) True prayer has great power. It expresses that faith whereby the sinner is justified (Lk. 18:10, 14). It is answered with the gift of the Holy Spirit (11:13), clarifies the way ahead (Mk. 1:35–39), and enables the suppliant to receive and put on the whole armor of God (cf. Eph. 6:18). We should surround all activities with prayer, esp. for the perseverance of the saints and for bold and faithful witness (6:19–20). True prayer overcomes anxieties (Phil. 4:6). But at the same time it is a fight with the powers of evil and darkness (Rom. 15:30; Col. 4:12; cf. Matt. 6:13).

Nevertheless, the NT, like the OT, warns of hindrances that can make prayer ineffectual: licentiousness and lovelessness (1 Pet. 3:7; Jas. 4:3), unbelief and doubt (1:5–7), or an unforgiving spirit (Matt. 6:14–15; Mk. 11:25).

(d) NT prayer can be about anything, from the smallest matter to the greatest, from the affairs of today to those of eternity. The best example is the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:9–13; Lk. 11:2–4). Here the prayer for daily bread, which includes all our daily needs, is flanked on the one side by prayer for the coming of God's kingdom and for his will to be done on earth, and on the other by prayer for forgiveness of sin, for preservation in temptation, and for deliverance from all evil. But it is important to note that the prayers that refer to God, his will, his kingdom, and his name stand first. The Lord's Prayer is embedded in longer discourses about true prayer (Matt. 6:5–15; Lk. 11:1–13), which must be marked by simplicity, concentration, discipline, patient confidence—and obedience.

(e) In addition to supplication, the NT, like the OT, notes the following types of prayer: intercession (e.g., Rom. 15:30; 1 Thess. 5:25; 2 Thess. 3:1; Jas. 5:14–18), which ought to embrace everyone, even enemies (Matt. 5:44); and praise, thanksgiving, and adoration, which is addressed exclusively to God, apart from his gifts (cf. esp. Rev. 4:8–11; 5:8–14; 7:9–17; 11:15–18; 15:2–4; 16:5–7; 19:1–8; 22:3, 9). The NT frequently insists that prayer should be constant (Lk. 18:1–8; Acts 12:5; 1 Thess. 5:17). That is,

Christians ought always to live in the presence of their Lord and in communication with him, and should constantly be looking to him (Col. 4:2).

The posture in prayer was either kneeling (Lk. 22:41; Acts 21:5; Eph. 3:14–16), in which case the forehead might touch the ground (Matt. 26:39), or standing (Mk. 11:25; Lk. 18:11, 13), sometimes with uplifted hands (1 Tim. 2:8).

Communal prayer appears to have been customary in the early church, both in public worship (1 Cor. 11:4–5; 14:13–17) and smaller gatherings (Matt. 18:19, where Jesus attaches a special promise to communal prayer; see also Acts 2:42; 12:12), although private prayer is the fountainhead of prayer in general (Matt. 6:6); note also that Jesus frequently prayed alone (e.g., 14:23; Mk. 1:35; Lk. 5:16; 6:12; 9:18).

2. The form of the Lord's Prayer. Set prayers certainly existed, but even here there was no rigidity, as can be seen from the fact that the Lord's Prayer has been handed down in two variant forms (Matt. 6:9–13; Lk. 11:2–4). Certain MSS have with the text of Matt. an addition such as: "For yours is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen" (see NIV note). But these are all relatively late and probably not original. This praise ascription was probably composed to adapt the prayer for liturgical use in the early church (perhaps on the model of 1 Chr. 29:11).

There are also differences between the version of the Lord's Prayer in Matt. and in Lk. For example, Lk. begins with the address "Father," reflecting the Gk. patēr and the Aram. ʾabbāʾ ("Dear Father"), whereas Matt. gives the pious and more reverent form of Palestinian invocation ("Our Father"). One should note that the shorter form of Lk. is completely contained in the longer form of Matt. It seems most likely that the Matthean form is an expanded one, for in general liturgical texts grew by expansion. Moreover, no one would have dared to shorten a sacred text like the Lord's Prayer and leave out two petitions if they had been part of the original tradition. Yet both Matt. and Lk. have the same basic order, which puts God first and humanity and human needs second. This also reflects the order of the two great commandments and the Shema (cf. Matt. 22:34–40; Mk. 12:28–34; Lk. 10:25–28).

In Matt. 6:9–13 the prayer consists of two halves, each consisting of three petitions: three for the honor of God and three for our needs. Some argue that Matt. sees the prayer in the context of a new Sinai, since he records it in the Sermon on the Mount, where Jesus is the new lawgiver. Each half of the Lord's Prayer opens with a petition recalling the book of Exod. The first petition is a Christian restatement of the third commandment (Matt. 6:9; cf. Exod. 20:7; Deut. 5:11), stating it positively. In so doing it not only precludes taking the name of God in vain, but it also secures what is implied in the first and second commandments concerning other gods and graven images (Exod. 20:3–6; Deut. 5:7–10).

The petitions for God's kingdom to come and for his will to be done extend and supersede the fourth commandment's teaching concerning the Sabbath (Exod. 20:8–11; Deut. 5:12–15). Commandments five through ten are directed at personal relationships (e.g., honoring one's parents; prohibitions against murder, adultery, stealing, bearing false witness, and coveting, Exod. 20:12–17; Deut. 5:16–21); these are reflected in the fifth and sixth petitions for forgiveness and avoidance of temptation. These themes are interwoven with the history of Israel in general and with the desert wanderings in particular.

The fourth petition does not reflect any of the ten commandments, but it does recall the coming to Sinai in God's provision of the manna (Matt. 6:11; Lk. 11:3; cf. Exod. 16:15; Num. 11:4–9; Deut. 8:3; Ps. 78:24–25; on the significance of "daily" bread, → epiousios, 2157). It implies provision for one's immediate needs, as in the desert wanderings, and also provision in the coming kingdom symbolized by the messianic banquet. Note esp. Deut. 8:2–3, which tells how God humbled the Israelites in the desert, then fed them with manna in order to teach them that "man does not live on bread alone but on every word that comes from the mouth of the LORD" (cf. Matt. 4:4; Lk. 4:4).

In other words, the Lord's Prayer applies the themes by which ancient Israel lived to the life of the new Israel. It is thus a fulfillment of the ten commandments and the exodus themes (cf. Matt. 5:17–18). At the same time, it transforms the themes from external commandments into petitions with which the one who prays personally identifies. Thus the law may be said to be written in one's heart (cf. Jer. 31:33).

3. Prayer in individual NT writers. (a) The frequent use of proseuchomai in Lk.'s writings is striking. For Lk. prayer is a basic expression of Christian faith and life, and Jesus is the model of how to pray aright (Lk. 11:1). All the important points in the lives of Jesus, his apostles, and the members of his church are marked by prayer to God, and all important decisions are made with prayer (3:21–22; 6:12–13; 9:18, 28–29; 22:44–46; Acts 1:14, 24–25; 6:6; 9:11; 10:9; 13:3). That prayer was experienced as genuine conversation with God is clear from the fact that those praying often receive definite instructions from God (e.g., Acts 10:9–16, 30–32; 13:2).

(b) In Jn. the euchomai word group is absent (except for euchomai in 3 Jn. 1:2, which is more of a wish than a prayer). In referring to Christ's prayers, Jn. uses the ordinary words for speaking and talking, qualifying them only with statements about Jesus lifting up his eyes to heaven (e.g., Jn. 11:41; 17:1). Moreover, it is noticeable that Jesus almost always speaks to his heavenly Father in the immediate situation (see esp. 12:27–28). In this way Jn. indicates Jesus' continual fellowship with God; for him praying did not require a special act, since his whole life was one of prayer.

(c) Paul stresses that true prayer is wrought by the Spirit (Rom. 8:15, 26; Gal. 4:6). In Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6, Paul uses krazō (to cry, 3189) in order to express that freedom, joy, and confidence in prayer that spring from our awareness of being God's children. Such prayer does not originate in any power we possess and can never be considered a meritorious work. Like faith itself, from which it stems and with which it is practically identical, prayer is a gift from above (cf. Eph. 6:18). To Paul, prayer is ultimately the indwelling, energizing Spirit speaking with God himself, who "is the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3:17; cf. Jn. 4:23–24). Thus prayer is not dependent for its efficacy on human eloquence. Rather, assurance of salvation is the result of Spirit-wrought prayer (Rom. 8:15–16; cf. also "through Jesus Christ" in Paul's prayers, 1:8; 7:25).

Paul likewise refers to a kind of Spirit-filled prayer that transcends the limitations of human speech and understanding: the so-called speaking in tongues or praying in the Spirit (1 Cor. 14:14–16). Yet he considers prayer that is intelligible to the hearers to have greater value than prayer offered in tongues (14:19), because only when others can give assent is the church edified as a body. Note that Jn. also regards Spirit-wrought prayer as the new departure in Christian praying (see Jn. 4:23–24).

According to Paul, prayer contains various elements: (i) doxology (e.g., Rom. 1:21); (ii) praise (e.g., 14:11; 15:9–11); (iii) blessing (e.g., 1:25; 9:5); (iv) worship (e.g., 1 Cor. 14:25); (v) hymns, community singing, psalms, etc. (e.g., 14:26; Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16); (vi) thanksgiving (e.g., Rom. 1:8–10); (vii) boasting in Christ or before God (e.g., 5:2–3, 11); (viii) petition for self (e.g., 1:10; 7:24); (ix) intercession for others (e.g., 1:7b; 9:1–3).

By far the largest element among these nine is intercessory prayer. Paul sees himself as a mediator and intercessor before God, esp. for the needs of others. An important feature here is the wish prayer, a desire that God may take action regarding the person(s) mentioned in the wish. Thus, for example, Paul writes in Rom. 15:13: "May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace as you trust in him, so that you may overflow with hope by the power of the Holy Spirit" (cf. also 15:5–6; 1 Thess. 3:11–13). Also revealing are the prayer reports, where at the beginning of most of his letters Paul assures his readers not only of his thanksgivings for them, but also of his intercessions on their behalf (e.g., Rom. 1:9–10; Phil. 1:4–6, 9–11). Such prayer reports may also occur in the body of letters (e.g., Rom. 9:3; Col. 1:29–2:3).

Paul's prayers were grounded in the gospel of Christ and infused by warm personal feeling and expectation. His awareness that we are living in the last days and will soon stand before the judgment seat of Christ adds urgency to his prayer life. But his prayers also indicate concern for mutual intercession, reconciliation, and unity throughout the church. Sometimes his prayers are characterized by a tension between confident thanksgiving and anxious supplication, but invariably they lead back to thanksgiving in view of mercies already given.

(d) Jas. 5:13–18 merits special mention. On the one hand, it teaches that a Christian's whole life, the good times as well as the bad, should be lived in an atmosphere of prayer—i.e., that believers should lay before God everything that happens to them, so that each experience is suffused with prayer. On the other hand, in cases of sickness, prayer is to be accompanied by the laying on of hands, anointing, and confession of sins. Here the laying on of hands (implicit in the phrase "pray over him") and the anointing with oil are considered to be tangible expressions of prayer for the benefit of the sick individual, while confession of sins is made in order to remove any hindrances to prayer.

4. Finally, in one passage only (Acts 16:13, 16) proseuchē means a place of prayer.

προσήλυτος (prosēlytos), proselyte (4670); φοβούμενος τὸν θεόν (phoboumenos ton theon), God-fearer (5828 + 2536); σεβόμενος τὸν θεόν (sebomenos ton theon), God-fearer (4936 + 2536).

OT 1. prosēlytos (from proserchomai, approach) occurs only in Jewish and Christian lit. In LXX prosēlytos (trans. of Heb. gēr) designates a non-Israelite who has permanently settled in the land. Such people usually worked under Israelite masters as citizens without full rights, but in contrast to slaves they had personal freedom. They were not allowed to own or acquire landed property. But they did enjoy privileges in the land (e.g., they received legal protection, cf. Exod. 22:21), and they also had responsibilities, such as keeping the Sabbath according to God's law (20:10; 23:12).

Later, when Israel separated itself more and more from everything non-Jewish, the gērîm were to an increasing degree drawn into national life. They were given a share in the law, as in the sacrifices and great festivals (Num. 15:15–16, 30). If they accepted circumcision, they could even celebrate the Passover and were then fully integrated into the people (Exod. 12:48).

2. During the intertestamental period, prosēlytos acquired its more traditional meaning of a pagan who became a full-fledged Jew through conversion, circumcision, baptism, and a sacrifice in the temple. An intensive missionary movement began in the Hel. Jewish Diaspora. On the one hand, this movement was effective because of its concept of the transcendent, invisible God, who was incapable of representation by an image. On the other hand, it was limited by circumcision as an act of complete adherence.

3. Proselytes must be distinguished from non-Jews who took part in synagogue worship and kept the law to some extent, but who did not accept circumcision. The latter were required only to keep the Sabbath and food laws, together with the moral code, and to acknowledge the one God. These were called God-fearers (Gk. phoboumenoi ton theon [→ 5828] or sebomenoi ton theon [→ 4936]).

NT In the NT proselyte and God-fearer appear only in Acts (except for Matt. 23:15), the book that describes the coming into being of the young church on the mission field or among the Jews of the Diaspora.

1. prosēlytos occurs only 4x. In Matt. 23:15 Jesus is not attacking the missionary zeal of the Pharisees as such but the fact that they convert pagans to their own legalistic understanding of the law and thus make twice as much a "son of hell." In Acts 2:11 the various national groups are summed up as Jews (by birth) and proselytes (NIV, "converts to Judaism"). In 6:5 Nicolaus, one of the seven, is called "a convert to Judaism," since in contrast to the others, he was born a pagan. In 13:43 we find a more precise definition, "devout converts to Judaism" (sebomenōn prosēlytōn), designating full worshiping proselytes.

2. The phrase phoboumenos or sebomenos ton theon occurs only in Acts. Paul preached in the synagogues before Jews and "God-fearing Gentiles" (Acts 13:26; cf. 13:16, "you Gentiles who worship God"). It was among such people that he found a powerful hearing. Lydia, a seller of purple cloth in Philippi (16:14), and Titius Justus in Corinth (18:7) are specifically mentioned as God-fearers. It was because Paul did not demand circumcision but only faith in Christ that the sebomenoi ton theon attached themselves to him. As a result, he came into conflict with the Jews, who accused him before Gallio of persuading people to worship God contrary to the law (18:13).

The same type of conflict first surfaces in the story of the centurion, Cornelius (Acts 10:1–11:18), who is described as phoboumenos ton theon (10:2, 22). Peter was attacked by the Jerusalem church because he had not avoided contact with the uncircumcised, regardless of how pious the centurion may have been, as was commanded in the law of Moses. Rather, he actually baptized this man and his house as believers in Christ.

πρόσκομμα (proskomma), stumbling, offense, obstacle (4682); προσκοπή (proskopē), occasion for taking offense or making a false step (4683); προσκόπτω (proskoptō), strike, beat against, stumble, be offended (4684); ἀπρόσκοπος (aproskopos), without offense, giving no offense, blameless (718).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. proskoptō means trans. to strike or knock against; intrans. to knock oneself against, trip, or fall. Metaphorically it means either to give or to take offense. proskomma means the cause, the process, and the results of the offense, and thus an obstacle, fall, or destruction. proskopē means the offense or the reason for taking offense. The verbal adj. aproskopos means both giving no offense (i.e., being blameless) and taking no offense (i.e., being unhurt).

2. The OT is clear that sin causes a fall. Though the God of Israel guards a person from tripping and falling (Ps. 91:11–12) and is "the Rock" of Israel's strength and salvation (Deut. 32:15; Isa. 17:10), he can become "a stone that causes men to stumble" (8:14), so that they fall and perish. The God of Israel humbles those who do not fear him (cf. Ps. 18:26). Hence he warns his people against worshiping heathen gods and fellowshipping with the godless inhabitants of the land, who are a snare to them (Exod. 23:33; 34:12).

NT The words in this group follow the OT and have in the background the idea of tripping over a stone and falling. Four uses may be distinguished.

1. Christ remains obedient to God and true to his task. Thus, neither Satan, who (alluding to Ps. 91:11–12) says that Jesus as God's Son will not strike (proskoptō) his foot against a stone (Matt. 4:6; Lk. 4:11), nor the threat of death by the Jews (Jn. 11:7–10), who were planning to stone him should he come to Jerusalem, could cause him to stumble and nullify his messianic mission.

2. Christ is both the stone that serves as the foundation (→ themelios, 2529) for the church and the stone over which one can fall (Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:8, both referring to Ps. 118:22; Isa. 8:14; 28:16). This explained why many Jews were not coming to salvation. Whoever refuses Jesus and his message finds eternal destruction (cf. Lk. 2:34). Lk.'s version of the saying about the cornerstone presses the picture further: "Everyone who falls on that stone will be broken to pieces, but he on whom it falls will be crushed" (20:18). The background here is Isa. 8:14–15, which declares that Yahweh will become "a stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall.... Many of them will stumble; they will fall and be broken." What was said of Yahweh by Isa. is said of Jesus in Lk. Humans will be either broken on Christ now, as he shatters their preconceived plans for their lives, or they will be broken by him in judgment.

3. Whether the disciple of Christ may cause offense to others is another matter. Paul expressly forbids the strong to cause the weak to stumble and to hurt their conscience (Rom. 14:13, 20–21; 1 Cor. 8:9). Their freedom, though justified in itself, must not cause others to fall. This is the law of love. Those who hurt the conscience of another create an obstacle for the gospel (cf. 1 Cor. 9:12–13, 19–20). Paul enlarges the circle still further when he says, "Do not cause anyone to stumble, whether Jews, Greeks or the church of God" (10:32).

4. The day of Christ makes it imperative that the Christian should be without offense. Paul prays for the Christians in Philippi that they "may be pure and blameless [aproskopoi] until the day of Christ" (Phil. 1:10). Paul is not referring only to external and ethical behavior but also to the nature of our relationship to Christ (1:9); his prayer is also a warning to the church. In his defense before Felix, Paul rebuts the accusations of Tertullus when he declares, "So I strive always to keep my conscience clear [aproskopon] before God and man" (Acts 24:16); in other words, Paul wants a conscience undefiled by sin.

προσκυνέω (proskyneō), worship, do obeisance to, prostrate oneself, show reverence (4686); προσκυνητής (proskynētēs), a worshiper (4687).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. proskyneō is a technical term for the adoration of the gods, meaning to fall down, prostrate oneself, adore on one's knees. Often this took place by casting oneself on the ground to show homage to a deity. Later the vb. was used in connection with the deification of rulers and the Roman emperor cult. proskyneō can also denote an inward attitude of reverence and humility.

2. In the overwhelming majority of cases in the LXX proskyneō means to bow down; it is used both of bowing down before humans and before God (e.g., Gen. 18:2; 19:1; 22:5; 23:7, 12; Exod. 4:31; 20:5). The noun proskynēsis, worship, which is absent from the NT, occurs only in Sir. 50:21; 3 Macc. 3:7. Although in cl. Gk. proskyneō is generally used trans., it hardly ever takes an acc. in the LXX, being followed instead by a prep. phrase (e.g., epi [Gen. 18:2], enantion [23:12], enōpion [Ps. 22:27], pros [5:7]). This Hebraism marks off the adoration of Yahweh from pagan worship, in which the worshiper has no sense of having to keep a distance from the deity. The God of Israel is worshiped without images and thus is not within the grasp of the worshiper.

proskyneō retains its physical sense of bending, except that this is understood as bowing to the will of the exalted one (cf. Exod. 12:27–28). Just as folding or crossing the hands and arms denotes the suppliant's mental concentration, and as lifting up outstretched hands expresses the fact that one is making a request, so the physical act of bending indicates one's readiness to bow to God's will. When proskyneō refers to human beings, it indicates reverence shown to a person superior in position or power (2 Sam. 18:21). But that certain limits were observed in this matter is shown by Est. 3:2, 5, where a Jew, at the peril of his life, refuses to prostrate himself before a heathen prince.

NT 1. In the NT the proskyneō occurs 60x (24 in Rev., 11 in Jn., and 13 in Matt.). The OT sense is further developed, except that now it denotes exclusively worship addressed (or which should be addressed) to God or to Jesus Christ (even in Matt. 18:26 the king is a symbolic figure for God). Acts 10:25–26; Rev. 19:10; 22:8–9 note that worship is to be offered to God alone, not to an apostle or even to an angelic being. Therefore, whenever obeisance is made before Jesus, the idea is either explicit or implicit that he is king (Matt. 2:2), Lord (8:2), the Son of God (14:33), or one who can act with divine omnipotence (e.g., 14:33; Mk. 5:6; 15:19).

For this reason obeisance is often linked with an earnest request for help. It intensifies the request and is a sign of faith in the divine helper and redeemer, a faith certain of being heard (e.g., Matt. 8:2; 9:18; 15:25). In Jn. 9:38 obeisance is nothing less than the outward reflex action of faith: To believe means to adore Jesus, to recognize him as Lord, to render him homage as king. Thus, obeisance is esp. appropriate before the risen and exalted Lord (Matt. 28:9, 17; Lk. 24:52).

When Satan, reversing the true order of things, suggests obeisance from Jesus (Matt. 4:9; Lk. 4:7), he demonstrates himself as God's great adversary, who wants to usurp what is due to God alone (Matt. 4:10; Lk. 4:8) and so overthrow all the good purposes and ordinances of God.

2. In this context obeisance is a sign of humankind's fundamentally religious nature. One's worship shows who one's god is: the true God, idols, demons, or even Satan himself (cf. Rev. 9:20; 13:4, 8, 12). For a person's relation to God is expressed principally in worship, and above all in prayer. The call to conversion can thus be put in the form: "Worship God!" i.e., recognize him in all his power and glory as creator and judge, and acknowledge his exclusive sovereign rights and claim on you (Rev. 14:7; 22:9).

3. When proskyneō is used absolutely, it means to participate in public worship, to offer prayers (e.g., Jn. 12:20; Acts 8:27; 24:11). Hence in Rev., proskyneō comes to denote a particular kind of prayer, namely, adoration. Its characteristic features find expression in the various hymns of adoration found throughout this book (4:8–11; 5:8–10, 12–14; 7:10–12; 11:15–18; 12:10–12; 15:3–4; 16:5–7; 19:1–8). These hymns are addressed to God himself (or to Jesus Christ) and are concerned with his being and his works in a worldwide context. They use varied language and ideas, constantly finding new titles of dignity with which to praise God and ascribing to him the most exalted merits and attributes (eternity, omnipotence, honor, wisdom, holiness, power, etc.). This often takes the form of royal acclamation: "You are worthy" (4:11; 5:9, 12) and "Salvation!" (7:10), interspersed with exclamations such as "Hallelujah!" "Amen!" (7:12; 19:1, 3, 4). Through such hymns runs a gloriously universal strain, and in the face of such adoration, human petitions and thanksgivings fade away into silence.

4. The noun proskynētēs, worshiper, occurs only in Jn. 4:23 in the context of Jesus' reply to the woman of Samaria that the time has come during which "true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth" (cf. also 4:24). Earlier the woman had declared that her ancestors had worshiped on Mt. Gerizim (4:20). Jesus had countered this woman's assertion of her Samaritan faith by stating that "a time is coming when you will worship the Father neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem" (4:21).

There is a dispute among scholars as to whether "in spirit and truth" refers to the human spirit or God's Spirit. If the former, Jesus' words are referring to the need to take up a correct personal attitude in worship in contrast to mere custom and ritual. But if the Spirit of God is meant here, the phrase may be a hendiadys meaning "Spirit of truth." This option does fit better the train of thought, for in the context, both "this mountain" and "Jerusalem" have come to stand for ways in which humans have seen fit to worship God in ways that are not acceptable to him. But in the coming age people will worship God in the true way, which he himself has chosen and provided, i.e., in and through himself (note Jn.'s teaching on the Spirit in Jn. 1:32–33; 3:5–8, 34; 6:63; 7:39; 11:33; 13:21; 14:16–17, 26; 15:26; 16:7, 13; 20:22).

πρόσφατος (prosphatos), fresh, new, late (4710); προσφάτως (prosphatōs), lately, recently (4711).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. this word was originally a sacrificial term: pros and phatos (a verbal adj. related to the noun phonos, slaughter); it meant just slaughtered and hence fresh or new. In the LXX this word occurs in Num. 6:3, where it means fresh grape juice; in Deut. 32:17, where it refers to new gods (cf. also Ps. 81:9); and in Eccl. 1:9, where the Teacher says that there is "nothing new under the sun" (cf. "new" in 1:10, which shows that prosphatos is a synonym for kainos). The adv. prosphatōs, "soon," occurs in Deut. 24:5; Ezek. 11:3; Jdt. 4:3, 5; 2 Macc. 14:36.

NT The adv. prosphatōs occurs without theological significance in Acts 18:2, where Lk. notes that Aquila and his wife, Priscilla, had "recently" come from Italy because of the command of Claudius that all Jews had to leave Rome.

The adj. prosphatos occurs only in Heb. 10:20, where it refers to the "new" (fresh) and living way of immediate access to the Father that has been opened for us through the physical death of Jesus Christ. That death is here associated with "the curtain," relating Jesus' sacrifice to the OT Day of Atonement, in which the high priest went behind the curtain into the Most Holy Place to enter the presence of God, symbolized by the ark of the covenant. Since the death and resurrection of Jesus and his position as our "great high priest over the house of God" (10:21), we no longer need the ceremonial system of the old covenant. Insofar as our ability to draw near to God is related to the "new [kainos] covenant" (8:8; 9:15), prosphatos is a synonym of kainos.

πρόσωπον (prosōpon), face (4725); προσωπολημψία (prosōpolēmpsia), partiality, bias (4721); προσωπολημπτέω (prosōpolēmpteō), show partiality, give a biased judgment (4719); προσωπολήμπτης (prosōpolēmptēs), biased, taking sides (4720); ἀπροσωπολήμπτως (aprosōpolēmptōs), unbiased (719).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. prosōpon means face, actor's mask, and then (fig.) the part played by the actor. When used of things it means surface, either the top or the one facing the observer. It is occasionally used for the face of the gods.

2. prosōpon is found about 900x in the LXX, mostly as a translation of pānîm. (a) It is used for someone's face (Gen. 31:2) or appearance (4:5), also as a paraphrase for the whole person (Deut. 7:10). The frequent expression "to turn the face" means to greet respectfully. It is sometimes also used for the faces of animals (Ezek. 1:10).

(b) It can denote the face (surface) of the earth (Gen. 2:6).

(c) It is also used with various preps. to express relationships, e.g., "before the face of," meaning before, into, in front of, opposite.

(d) It is used above all for the "face" of God. Where the LXX uses this phrase, it is often referring to some relationship of God to human beings, e.g., his gracious turning to them or his disappointed turning away from them. If God lifts up or causes his face to shine on the Israelites, they receive peace (i.e., salvation; see Num. 6:25–26). When God hides or turns away his face, it implies the withdrawal of grace (cf. Ps. 13:1; 104:29). Seeing God's face is mentioned as the most exceptional possibility (Gen. 32:30, Peniel, the face of God; cf. also 16:13; Exod. 24:9–11; Deut. 4:12; Jdg. 6:22–23). This is always a dangerous experience, for if sinful people see the holy God, they must die (Exod. 33:20; cf. Isa. 6:5).

(e) When God's face is mentioned in connection with the temple, the language is cultic. Extrabiblical usage may have had an influence here. Among the nations surrounding Israel, the face of the deity was seen and worshiped in its temple. Since Israel had no image of God in the temple, the expression of seeking God's face has a metaphorical sense, denoting prayer (Ps. 24:6; 42:2; Zech. 8:21–22; Mal. 1:9) or the seeking of God's fellowship (Ps. 105:4).

(f) In rab. Jud. a human's highest hope is to see the face of God or the Shekinah, either in the hour of death and in the world to come after the days of the Messiah or even during the days of the Messiah.

NT The NT follows the OT usage in its use of prosōpon.

1. (a) It can be used lit. of a person's face (Matt. 6:16–17; 2 Cor. 11:20). (b) It is used in various metaphorical expressions: e.g., "to fall on one's face" is a sign of respect and subjection (Matt. 17:6; Lk. 5:12; 1 Cor. 14:25), and "Jesus resolutely set out for [lit., set his face to go to] Jerusalem" (Lk. 9:51) expresses his immovable decision to head for Jerusalem. (c) prosōpon can stand for the whole person (2 Cor. 1:11). (d) It is also frequently combined with preps., mostly in lit. reproductions of Sem. expressions: e.g., "ahead of you [lit., before your face]" (Mk. 1:2), "in the sight of" (Lk. 2:31). (e) Face is also used to refer to the surface of the earth (Lk. 21:35; Acts 17:26) and the appearance of the sky (Matt. 16:3) and of plants (Jas. 1:11).

2. prosōpon is further used of the face of God and of Christ. The angels of the "little ones . . . see the face of [God] in heaven" (Matt. 18:10), a circumlocution for God's care for the humble. In the heavenly sanctuary Christ appears for us "in God's presence" (lit., "before the face of God," Heb. 9:24). Thereby the heavenly sanctuary replaces the earthly temple.

For believers the glory of God (→ doxa, 1518) has appeared "in the face of Christ" (2 Cor. 4:6). Paul is writing here about the glorified Lord. Thus, prosōpon as used here recalls the face of God in the OT. Christ "is the image of God" (4:4; cf. Jn. 12:45; 14:9), God's turning to us and his final revelation. The reference of the whole context to Exod. 34 makes this certain. The glory on Moses' face, derived from his meeting with God, was transient (2 Cor. 3:13). Hence he covered his face with a veil. Paul expands the picture to cover the whole OT. The veil that hid Moses' transient glory covers the whole OT, so that Israel cannot see the glory of the promise and fulfillment in Christ (3:14–15). Only when there is faith in Christ is the veil removed (3:16). All present knowledge by faith is only an imperfect anticipation of the future knowledge, "face to face" (1 Cor. 13:12). God's servants will not see his face until they are in the new Jerusalem (Rev. 22:4).

3. prosōpon is also used in the compound words prosōpolēmpsia, prosōpolēmptēs, prosōpolēmpteō—all compounded with a form of the verb lambanō (lit., take). This translates the Heb. nāśā', to lift up the face of one who has bowed humbly in greeting, i.e., to acknowledge that person. God does not allow himself to be influenced by appearances or respect of persons (Deut. 10:17). He is impartial (ouk estin prosōpolēmptēs, Acts 10:34) and acts with impartiality (aprosōpolēmptōs, 1 Pet. 1:17). Likewise, the earthly judge must refrain from all partiality (Lev. 19:15; Deut. 1:17; 16:19; cf. also Mk. 12:14; Gal. 2:6; Jude 16). prosōpolēmpsia means partiality or bias (Rom. 2:11; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25; Jas. 2:1). In Jas. 2:9 prosōpolēmpteō means to show partiality.

προτίθημι (protithēmi), mid. display publicly, plan, propose, intend; act. set before as a duty (4729); πρόθεσις (prothesis), setting forth, presentation, display, plan, purpose, resolve (4606).

CL & OT 1. The vb. protithēmi (pro, before, with the vb. tithēmi, set, place; → 5502) possesses the basic meaning to set before, but also means to resolve, propose, determine. The noun prothesis can denote the public lying in state of the dead, public announcements, and later, an intention.

2. In the LXX protithēmi (used 19x) is used 5x in the sense of laying before or laying on (e.g., Exod. 40:4 of the bread of the Presence). In Ps. 86:14 it describes a conscious refusal to turn to God (cf. also 101:3, where it denotes not setting evil before one's eyes). The noun prothesis (19x) is used 13x as a technical term for the bread of the Presence (e.g., Exod. 39:36 = LXX 39:18) and is thus to be translated presentation. The meaning of intention, purpose, plan is found only in 2 Macc. 3:8; 3 Macc. 1:22; 2:26; 5:12, 29.

NT 1. In the NT protithēmi is found 3x. It means to resolve in Rom. 1:13 (cf. Paul's intention to visit Rome), to put forward in 3:25 (God "presented [Christ] as a sacrifice of atonement"; → hilaskomai, 2661), and to set forth in Eph. 1:9 (God set forth his purpose in Christ). The noun prothesis occurs 12x, 4 of which refer to the "consecrated bread," i.e., the bread of the Presence (e.g., Matt. 12:4; Heb. 9:2). Human objectives are mentioned in Acts 11:23; 27:13; 2 Tim. 3:10 ("purpose").

2. By contrast with the nontheological use of the word in the LXX, Paul uses prothesis 2x in order to describe the primal decision of God. In Rom. 8:28 God's prothesis (resolve, purpose) is stated to be the foundation of the Christian's call. Our hope and certainty are based on and upheld by God's previous activity, not by any human capacity for decision making. Paul uses the word similarly in 9:11 (cf. Gen. 25:23). The election of Jacob was already laid down in God's resolve before the birth of the twins. Here also prothesis serves to characterize God's activity as free and grounded in his will alone. It is thus independent of human prerogatives. The keeping of the promise is always God's free act both in Israel and in the church.

3. In Eph. 1:11 the existence of the church is described as the result of a decision made by God. This decision is both in time and in all aspects a preceding resolve. As in Rom. 8:28–30, there is an accumulation of words that emphasize the priority of God's will. In Eph. 3:8–11 Paul discusses the realization of God's saving plan in Christ. prothesis in 3:11 serves to characterize God's activity in Christ as the fulfillment of an "eternal purpose." It is one in which we do not have a say, either in time or in its intentions. In 2 Tim. 1:9 Paul is concerned with the redeeming and calling activity of God. Once again, its assumptions do not lie in the area of prior human achievement but of God's own decision.

προφήτης (prophētēs), prophet, proclaimer (4737); προφῆτις (prophētis), prophetess (4739); προφητεύω (prophēteuō), make prophetic revelations, prophesy (4736); προφητεία (prophēteia), prophetic activity, prophetic gift, prophetic word, prophetic saying (4735); προφητικός (prophētikos), prophetic (4738); ψευδοπροφήτης (pseudoprophētēs), false prophet (6021).

CL 1. prophētēs (from pro-, before, and phē-, to say) essentially means one who proclaims openly or states publicly. The vb. prophēteuō has a similar meaning. Often behind this word is a note of authority. The rest of the words in this group are derived from the same root.

2. From cl. Gk. lit. we can ascertain the place of the prophet in Gk. public life. The words of this group are tied up with the Gk. oracle, the most famous being that at Delphi, presided over by Apollo. In this connection we meet these words in two senses.

(a) The Pythia at Delphi was called prophētis, but had the further title of promantis. She was an elderly woman who sat on a tripod over a cavity in the earth, from which an "oracular spirit" in the form of smoke arose and gave her inspiration. This was enhanced by the chewing of bay leaves (Apollo's plant). She would burst out with enigmatic inarticulate sounds, similar to speaking in tongues. Her messages concerned future events and had a direct connection with the person consulting the oracle, who came to it baffled by a problem and sought help in the form of instruction. The person consulting would present in writing a question that had arisen in his or her life—a question of business, religion, politics, ethics, or education.

(b) Since the Pythia's reply was usually incomprehensible to the visitor, other officials at the shrine were responsible to translate the utterance into a saying that could be understood and remembered. This task was carried out by wise and respected old men, called to this position by the oracle and likewise known as prophētai. They did not work by direct inspiration but rather by reason and understanding. They received the Pythian oracles, tested them, interpreted them, and formulated the final saying. Thus they never spoke on their own initiative, but only after a visitor had presented a question and the Pythia had uttered the oracle.

(c) From the preceding discussion we note the following features: (i) The prophet received a message indirectly from the god or the inspired soothsayer. Direct inspiration was a privilege reserved for the Pythia. Indirect inspiration came through her inarticulate utterances or through such things as the blowing of the wind, the rustling of the sacred oaks, the clanging of cymbals, or the shaking of an image of a god borne by priests.

(ii) The prophet did not give advice until asked. The initiative was the questioner's alone, not the god's or the prophet's.

(iii) For this reason the words of the Gk. prophet were always addressed to a unique, historical situation in the life of the client. The advice given embraced a whole range of counseling help that was called for by human troubles and needs.

3. In early times the Gk. poet also had the title of prophet, since he achieved in his poetry something unique. He derived his wisdom from the gods.

OT 1. The Heb. word for prophet (nābîʾ) is probably derived from a vb. that means to call, proclaim. This can be understood either in an act. sense (a prophet is someone who calls out, proclaims), or in a pass. sense (someone called or appointed by God). From this noun the vb. nābā' is derived, which means to show, present, or express oneself, to speak as a prophet (1 Sam. 10:5f., 10ff.; 19:20; 1 Ki. 22:10, 12).

(a) The noun nābî' occurs 309x in the OT. In the historical books the pl. signifies groups of prophets; the sing. in early texts denotes widely varying types of people, while in later texts it denotes one who speaks on behalf of Yahweh. In earlier texts, the prophet can also have the title "man of God"—a title of distinction given to great leaders such as Moses (Deut. 33:1), David (Neh. 12:24, 36), but above all Elisha (29x) and the unnamed prophet of Judah in 1 Ki. 13:1–31 (15x)—or "seer" (i.e., someone who through visions has the ability to reveal hidden secrets and future events [1 Sam. 9:6–20]).

(b) Various figures in the history of Israel were given the title of nābî'. They include Abraham (Gen. 20:7), Moses (Deut. 34:10), and Aaron (Exod. 7:1). Miriam received the title of prophetess (Exod. 15:20), which is doubtless linked with the Song of Moses at the Red Sea.

2. Before the fully-fledged prophecy of the writing prophets took shape, certain earlier forms are found in the OT. (a) One of these is the groups of ecstatics who moved freely about the country, putting themselves by the use of musical instruments into a state of trance and in such a condition babbling out their messages. This ecstasy was infectious, so that Saul also came to be counted "among the prophets" (1 Sam. 10:11; 19:24). The prophets of Baal were also ecstatics (1 Ki. 18:19–40). In Num. 11:10–30, seventy elders were seized by the Spirit of God and went into an ecstasy. Joshua was critical of them, but Moses replied: "I wish that all the LORD's people were prophets and that the LORD would put his Spirit on them!" (11:29).

(b) Another early form is the groups of prophets in monastic communities. These groups formed themselves around a prominent figure (e.g., Elisha, 2 Ki. 2:3–18; 4:38; 6:1), whom they addressed as "master" or "father," at whose feet they sat and learned, and with whom they lived in communal dwellings. Such groups are linked with a sanctuary (1 Ki. 13:11, Bethel; 2 Ki. 2:1, 4, 5, Gilgal, Jericho). Ecstasy has here a markedly reduced role. Instead, the gift of the Spirit seems to be manifested by the working of miracles (2:19–25; 4:1–7, 8–37). But note too that Elisha was also a man of God's word, who gave both spiritual (4:1–7, 8–37; 5:1–14) and political counsel (13:14–20).

(c) A third early form involved the cultic prophets employed as officials at the national sanctuary. These men had a place along with the priests in the cult. Their task was to give oracles in answer to communal laments, esp. to the king. For this reason they had great influence in the royal court (1 Ki. 1:8), where they spoke as men of God (22:24–28), sometimes with remarkable severity (cf. Nathan in 2 Sam. 12:1–14). The cultic prophets were feared, because their powerful word could bring success or disaster (1 Sam. 16:4; 1 Ki. 17:18). Among the cultic prophets we may count Shimei (1 Ki. 1:8), Zedekiah (22:24), and Nathan (2 Sam. 12:1–14; 1 Ki. 1:8–45), who worked in close association with the court and yet enjoyed an astonishing degree of independence.

3. Prophecy in the traditional sense associated with the prophetic lit. of the OT began in Israel with the monarchy. Ecstasy, soothsaying, and miracle-working fade into the background, and the word of Yahweh comes increasingly to the fore. Ties with the cult, with institutions, and with the monarchy also become progressively looser. In fact, these prophets were often critical of the cult (e.g., Isa. 1:10–17; Jer. 7:1–15; Mic. 3:9–12). The word was the predominant means of proclamation. The only actions of the prophets were symbolic actions, acting out the content of the word (e.g., Isa. 7:3; 8:3–4; 20:2; Jer. 16:2, 5, 8; Hos. 1:2, 4, 6, 9; 3:1–5).

The cl. prophets were active during three periods: the dissolution of the northern kingdom (around 721 B.C.), the destruction of the southern kingdom (around 597–587 B.C.), and the return from exile (around 539 B.C.). Their message had a horizontal dimension (messages regarding Israel and the nations) and a vertical dimension. Often their messages included warnings, where the future is linked with the present situation of the hearer. Their themes include the following:

(a) Prophecies of judgment. Esp. before the exile, the prophets warned the people about approaching judgment. This could take various forms, such as droughts, earthquakes, and wars. But since the prophets were also responsible for exhorting and counseling the people with a view to repentance, the threat of judgment was accompanied by an explanation of its reason. Judgment was a result of the sins of the nation, the king, or a group within the nation. For the prophets, sin is human behavior that is out of accord with God's character and will. In Isa. this meant that the people were not trusting in Yahweh alone; in Amos and Mic., that the people were disobeying the law of Yahweh; in Hos., Jer., and Ezek., that the people were unfaithful by worshiping idols.

(b) Prophecies of salvation. These prophecies, which were based on the loving will of God, included promises of God's future help (Isa. 41:17–20; Jer. 31:31–40) and descriptions of the salvation that God would bring about (cf. Isa. 11:1–9; Zech. 8:4–5). Prophecies of salvation predominated during and after the exile. Salvation would become a reality in the renewal of the relationship between Israel and God, in the eschatological king (the Messiah), in the new ordering of the cult, and in the political liberation of the nation. A majestic representation of salvation was generally followed by an explanation of the ground on which it was based: not the faithfulness, holiness, or zeal of the people, but the faithfulness, holiness, and unconditional love of God.

4. At least two of the later canonical prophets (Dan. and Zech.) wrote in the style of Jewish apocalyptic. Apocalyptic is not a straightforward continuation of prophecy, though both share the element of future expectation. Thus in Zech.'s seven visions of the night (1:7–6:8), the prophet becomes a seer to whom the eschatological future of the nations and of Israel is revealed (cf. Isa. 24–27; Ezek. 38–39; Joel). The rabbis saw in apocalyptic the legitimate successor of prophecy. The cessation of prophecy is indicated by Ps. 74:9 and 1 Macc. 9:27 (cf. 4:46; 14:41).

5. The Qumran community treasured the OT prophetic writings to an extraordinary degree. They applied the prophecies to the events of their own day, which they saw as the end time. The Teacher of Righteousness reveals the secrets of the prophetic words (1QpHab 7:1–5) and so takes on the role of an actual prophet. The Qumran community awaited the coming of "the Prophet and the Messiahs of Aaron and Israel" (1QS 9:11).

NT 1. (a) In the NT prophētēs is found 144x (most frequently in Matt. and Luke–Acts). It means a prophet, one who proclaims and expounds divine revelation. In most cases it refers to OT prophets, but it is also applied to John the Baptist, Jesus, and others who proclaim the kingdom of God or Christ, and to those believers who possess the gift of prophecy. Only in one place (Tit. 1:12) does a pagan (the poet Epimenides) receive the title of prophet; he was also regarded as a prophet by Gk. writers in the ancient world. As well as referring to a person, the word prophētēs is also used of the OT prophetic writings (e.g., Matt. 5:17; Jn. 6:45; Rom. 3:21).

(b) The title prophētis (prophetess) is given in the NT only to Anna, the daughter of Phanuel, because she proclaimed Christ (Lk. 2:36), and to Jezebel, the type of the woman who led astray into idolatry and who called herself a prophetess (Rev. 2:20).

(c) The abstract noun prophēteia occurs only 19x in the NT (9x in Paul and 7x in Rev.). It refers to the prophetic word of an OT (e.g., Matt. 13:14) or of a Christian prophet (e.g., 1 Cor. 14:6). Only Paul uses it as a term for the gift of prophecy (e.g., Rom. 12:6). At Rev. 19:10 it probably means prophetic word, while at 11:6 it signifies prophetic activity.

(d) The vb. prophēteuō is found 28x in the NT (11x in Paul, all in 1 Cor.). The basic meaning is to proclaim divine revelation (e.g., Matt. 7:22). This can be understood in an ethical, hortatory sense (e.g., 1 Cor. 14:3, 31), in a revelatory sense (e.g., Matt. 26:68), or as pointing to the future (e.g., 15:7).

(e) The late word pseudoprophētēs is found 11x in the NT. It denotes a person who makes a false claim to being a prophet (e.g., Matt. 7:15). Since such people proceed to preach what is not true, the name is applied to anyone who does this (1 Jn. 4:1). The adj. prophētikos occurs only in Rom. 16:26 and 2 Pet. 1:19.

2. The NT term prophet is used in five ways. (a) It can mean the OT prophet, who is a spokesperson for God (Acts 3:18, 21). God is behind the pass. construction in Matt. 2:17, 23, etc. In Heb. 1:1 the prophet is likewise an instrument of God who makes an open proclamation. Often the focus of the OT prophet's message is on predictions that are fulfilled in Jesus Christ (e.g., Matt. 1:22–23; 2:5–6, 15, 17–18, 23; for more on this, → plēroō, fulfill, 4444). Matt. does not cite these prophets in an attempt to prove their authority as prophets; rather, the texts are quotations intended to prove that Jesus Christ is the promised Messiah. The direction of the argument is thus the opposite to that of a proof text that establishes the truth of Scripture.

A striking feature is the frequency of NT references to the violent deaths of the prophets (Matt. 23:31; Acts 7:52). In early Christianity martyrdom was related to the concept of the prophet. Jesus presented himself as one who stood in the long line of rejected prophets; his own rejection marked the climax of evil and brought open judgment on Jerusalem (Matt. 21:33–44). He was also the culminating figure of those who were martyred for their righteousness (23:35; Lk. 11:51). Abel (Gen. 4) was the first; Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, is mentioned toward the end of the last book of the Heb. canon (2 Chr. 24:20–22).

(b) John the Baptist is consistently given the title of prophet. This is justified since he takes up and makes even more radical the prophetic preaching of judgment and repentance (Jer. 7:3–29; 26:1–19; Amos 9:7–15; Mic. 3:12). His preaching was aimed at moral improvement and at shaking the religious self-confidence of the Jews. His baptism was a testimony of conversion and formed a seal of salvation. It is not surprising that many Jews therefore regarded John as the expected eschatological prophet who would bring in the age of salvation (cf. Deut. 18:15–18). The NT, however, portrays him as the forerunner (e.g., Matt. 3:1–12; 11:11–12; 14:2–5; 16:14; 17:13) or witness of Jesus (Jn. 1:6–9), who points in his preaching to Jesus Christ, the true eschatological prophet.

(c) Only occasionally in the NT is Jesus Christ called a prophet and generally only by the people (Matt. 16:14; 21:11, 46; Mk. 6:15; Lk. 7:16; 24:19; Jn. 4:19; in Lk. 13:33, Jesus alludes to himself as a prophet). He stands in the succession of the OT prophets, though he is greater than them (Matt. 12:41), since he not only announced but also brought salvation (Lk. 10:24; 1 Pet. 1:10–11). Jesus is presented as a prophet in the sense of Deut. 18:15: "The LORD your God will raise up for you a prophet like me [Moses] from among your own brothers. You must listen to him" (cf. Acts 3:22–23; 7:37; see also Jn. 6:14; 7:40).

(d) In the nativity narrative of Lk., and only here, we find people who have been specially commissioned and equipped by God to proclaim prophetic messages given to them by the Holy Spirit. Of these only Anna has the title of prophetess (Lk. 2:36). Zechariah's song is described as a prophecy inspired by the Holy Spirit (1:67). Elizabeth (1:41–42) and Simeon (2:25) speak by the Holy Spirit, which implies a prophetic gift.

(e) The early Christian church had believers who possessed the gift of prophecy. They were regarded as a sign that the Spirit was present in the church. It appears as if this charismatic gift became institutionalized, and prophets were then seen as the holders of a spiritual office. They had their own standing in the community on a par with apostles and teachers (Lk. 11:49; 1 Cor. 12:28–29; Eph. 2:20; 3:5; 4:11), next to teachers (Acts 13:1), or next to saints and apostles (Rev. 18:20).

(i) In the worship at Corinth prophets had the task of exhorting, comforting, and edifying the church (1 Cor. 14:3, 24–25, 31), and of communicating knowledge and mysteries (13:2). Paul instructed them to do this in words that could be understood (14:15–16, 23–24), not in a state of ecstasy. There was evidently a danger that the prophetic spirit might break out in uncontrolled, ecstatic power so that several would be prophesying at the same time (14:31). Paul ruled that the spirits of prophets should be subject to the prophets (14:32), by which he meant submission to order and the peace of God (14:33a). The prophet must also be able to remain silent.

(ii) In Eph. 2:20 the prophets together with the apostles form part of the "foundation" of the church, with Jesus Christ being the chief cornerstone. Traditionally these prophets have been understood to be OT prophets, but most scholars today acknowledge that Paul probably means NT prophets (cf. the order, "apostles and prophets"). The image used suggests that when the period in which the laying of the foundation of the church was over, the prophetic office would be over (→ themelios, foundation, 2529).

(iii) Warnings against false prophets in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 7:15, 22–23; 24:24) suggest that there must have been a great number of Christian prophets in the area of Syria and Palestine, some of whom were pretenders and not genuine prophets.

(iv) Acts gives considerable information about prophets. One sign of the superabundant outpouring of the Holy Spirit is the recognition that all Christians are given prophetic inspiration (2:17–18; 19:6). In fact, Lk. gives the names of certain early Christian prophets (11:27–28; 13:1; 15:32; 21:9–11), such as Agabus, who predicted a widespread famine (11:28) and Paul's arrest (21:10–11), and the four daughters of Philip, who prophesied (21:9). The vb. prophēteuō is always used in Acts of Christians. Although Peter is not called a prophet, he has the marks of one, which include knowledge of human hearts (5:3; 8:21–23). He also had experience of visions and dreams, fulfilling the prophecy of Joel (cf. also Acts 10:10–20). Others had these prophetic experiences as well (9:10; 16:9; 22:17–21; 27:23; cf. Num. 12:6).

What distinguishes the prophets in Acts? Certain functions are reminiscent of the OT prophet: prediction of future events (11:28; 20:23, 25; 27:22), declaration of divine judgments (13:11; 28:25–28), and the employment of symbolic actions (21:11). There is also, as in the OT, a link between prophecy and exhortation. Judas and Silas, "who were themselves prophets, said much to encourage and strengthen the brothers" (15:32; → parakaleō, encourage, 4151). The interpretation of Scripture, usually in the synagogues, is a central feature of the mission of the prophets, though it is not confined to them (2:14–36; 3:12–26; 4:8–12; 7:2–53; 9:20–22; 13:5, 16–41).

(v) In Rev. prophets are mentioned in 10:7; 11:10, 18; 16:6; 18:20, 24; 22:6, 9. The author regards himself as a prophet who has received from the exalted Lord a revelation of the meaning of the events of history (1:1; 22:9). This is embodied in a series of seven sets of visions, which constitute the substance of his book. He is called to console and exhort (cf. above). Although the words parakaleō and paraklēsis do not occur, the letters to the seven churches in chs. 2–3 (and indeed the whole work) are messages of consolation and exhortation that carry the authority of the exalted Christ, speaking through the Spirit (22:18–19).

(vi) For a time prophecy continued to have a place in the church. Prophets are known in the Didache (end of 1st cent.), though the author shows some nervousness about false prophets and those who outstay their welcome (10:7; 11:7–12; 13:1–7). Prophets featured in Montanism in the 2d and 3d centuries, but Montanist abuse led to the gradual discrediting and disappearance of prophecy in the church.

προχειρίζω (procheirizō), determine, appoint (4741).

CL & OT procheirizō means prepare something or someone for a purpose; the mid. usually means prepare for oneself, keep something at one's disposition; determine, nominate, elect. It was used for the election of leaders of the people or the appointment of a prosecutor by the general assembly. It was also used of the allotment of land, of legions to a general, or of the resolutions of a legislative or executive body. It became a common term in legal language of the inscriptions and papyri.

In the LXX procheirizō occurs 6x. It means the choice and commissioning of someone by God (Exod. 4:13) or leaders (Jos. 3:12; Dan. 3:22) to carry out a particular task, esp. one of a political or military nature (2 Macc. 3:7; 8:9; 14:12).

NT This vb. is found only 3x, all in Acts. In 26:16 it is used in the words of the risen Christ to Paul, whom he appointed as a minister and witness to what he had seen and would be shown (cf. 16:9–10; 22:17–21; 23:11). Ananias's words (22:14) are to be similarly understood: The God of Israel had "chosen [Paul] to know his will and to see the Righteous One and to hear words from his mouth." Paul's calling rested on this event. In 3:20 Peter urges repentance "that [God] may send the Christ, who has been appointed for you."

πρῶτος (prōtos), first (4755); πρῶτον (prōton), first of all (4754); πρωτεύω (prōteuō), be first (4750); πρότερος (proteros), beforehand (4728).

CL & OT 1. prōtos is the superlative of pro, before, and the ordinal number corresponding to heis, one. In late Koine Gk. it was also used for proteron (earlier). It was originally used as an adj. or noun, meaning first in time or space; then in the neut., prōton, as an adv. meaning first, at first. prōtos further connotes first in order or succession, and first in rank or worth. In Gk. philosophy ta prōta means the basic elements; in logic, the primary, unprovable propositions. In Aristotle prōtē philosophia means that which is of the highest order (i.e., metaphysics), or alternatively, the philosophy of the ancients. In mathematics the prime numbers are called prōtoi arithmoi.

2. In the LXX prōtos (240x) usually represents, as does archē (beginning), the Heb. rō'š; also 'eḥād (17x), first, one; and qedem (9x), forward. Generally speaking, the meanings of prōtos correspond to those in cl. Gk., though they are confined to the nonphilosophical senses.

(a) prōtos can have a spatial sense: in front, toward the East (i.e., the first in rank of the directions, "toward the sunrise," Num. 2:3); in the front, above (1 Sam. 9:22). (b) In the temporal sense (most frequent) it means first (Deut. 13:9; Ruth 3:10), in earlier times (2 Sam. 16:23), first of all (Tob. 5:9, S); as a noun in neut. pl., former things in contrast to later things (Eccl. 1:11). (c) As an ordinal it denotes order or succession: first (Gen. 32:17; Exod. 12:18; 1 Sam. 14:14). (d) Finally, it denotes rank and worth of both persons (e.g., the chief priest or high priest, 1 Ki. 2:35; the king's closest friend, 1 Chr. 27:33; the lead singer, Neh. 12:46) and things (the most valuable, 1 Sam. 15:21; the most precious, Amos 6:6).

Theologically, prōtos can be used to designate God as "the first"—a special characteristic of the preaching and theology of Isa. (cf. 41:4; 44:6; 48:12). God is prōtos as the Creator; he is also the last. The whole creation is directed toward his acts. It is true that the temporal sense is present here as well, since the Creator is the Eternal One before (and after) all creation. But in the first instance prōtos here expresses the position of God as the Lord of the world.

3. In interpreting Gen. 2:7, Philo distinguished two kinds of humans. The "first" is from heaven and spiritual, while the "second" is Adam, the forefather of the human race; note how Paul reverses the order: "The first man Adam became a living being; the last Adam, a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor. 15:45). Occasionally God is called prōtos kai monos, the first and only one (→ monos, 3668); both terms express his uniqueness.

NT 1. In the NT prōtos occurs 155x (95x as adj. or noun, 60x as adv.). It is used in much the same way as it is in the LXX. (a) It is used in a spatial sense in such passages as Acts 12:10; Heb. 9:2, 6, 8.

(b) It is also used in a temporal sense: first, first of all, to begin with, previously (Matt. 5:24; Lk. 9:59, 61); in the pair of opposites ta prōta—ta eschata, "first [condition]"—"final condition" (Lk. 11:26). An element of evaluation is contained in the contrast between hē prōtē and hē kainē diathēkē, the first and the new covenant (Heb. 8:7, 13; cf. 8:6, 8). The first or old covenant has been superseded by the new and is no longer valid (archaios is used in 2 Cor. 5:17 and 2 Pet. 2:5; palaios in 2 Cor. 3:14).

(c) In a succession or order, prōtos means first in a series, followed possibly by deuteros, tritos, second, third, or else by heteros, the other (Matt. 22:25; Lk. 14:18; Jn. 19:32). It is used adverbially as the first (20:4).

(d) As a designation of rank and office, prōtoi ("leading men," Mk. 6:21) stands alongside megistanes and chiliarchoi as a title. It draws attention to the value of a special garment ("best robe," Lk. 15:22). In the prōtoi and eschatoi of Matt. 19:30 there is an element of evaluation: The prōtoi are those who have been accepted, the last, those who have been rejected. Used adverbially in this sense, it denotes priority perhaps to the exclusion of others (Mk. 7:27), in the first place or first of all (Rom. 1:16; 2:9–10), so also probably in 1 Tim. 1:16, where Paul as the first is a typical representative of God's grace.

(e) prōteuō also denotes privilege: to take the first place, be preeminent (Col. 1:18; see here prōtotokos, 4758).

2. The frequent NT use of prōtos/prōton as an expression of order or sequence (69x) demonstrates the significance of order in God's plan and revelation, however important the free, unpredictable Spirit may be. This is partly accounted for by the influence of the OT and Jud. and the importance they attached to a devout, believing, well-ordered life (Lk. 11:38; Jn. 7:51). Jesus insisted on priorities in his new, messianic order. Thus, before bringing your sacrifice, first be reconciled to your fellow believer (Matt. 5:24); seek first the kingdom of God (6:33); first take the beam out of your own eye, then set about removing the splinter from your neighbor's (7:5). God has even ordered various events in the course of salvation history (e.g., Mk. 9:11 par.; 1 Thess. 4:16; 2 Thess. 2:3; 1 Pet. 4:17).

The early church drew inferences from this divine ordering of events that it applied to the ordering of worship (1 Cor. 14:30; cf. 14:33, 40) and the ordering of offices in the church (12:28). But the order of the church of Christ must not be made into a hierarchy. To be the first is not, and never becomes, an institution. It always remains a function: Those who want to be first in the church must become its servants and so follow the example of Jesus.

Jesus is the only servant (diakonos) in the full sense, and thus the only one who is "first" (Matt. 20:27–28). God made Jesus the Lord of this order by making him the prōtos kai eschatos (a title of God, Isa. 44:6; 48:12; cf. Rev. 1:17; 2:8; 22:13). As the First and the Last, he is also the unique one, and his mission is unrepeatable. Hence Jesus alone has the authority to make the last first and the first last (Matt. 20:16). Thus he confirms Israel's abiding preeminence (Mk. 7:27; cf. Rom. 1:16; 2:9–10; but see also Matt. 8:11; Lk. 13:28–30). Yet for the moment Christ is giving the Gentiles preference over his own people (to be understood in the temporal sense, cf. Rom. 11:25–32), in order to make them jealous and move them to return to him.

See also prōtotokos, firstborn (4758).

πρωτότοκος (prōtotokos), firstborn (4758).

CL & OT prōtotokos is a late derivative from prōtos (first) and the aor. root tek- (born). As an act. form prōtotokos means bearing one's firstborn; as a pass. form prōtotokos is first found in the LXX, about 130x.

1. In the LXX prōtotokos is used (a) in its lit. sense both of humans and animals, often as a noun in the neut. sing. with the accompanying phrase "of every womb" (lit., "which opens the womb," e.g., Exod. 13:2). The following expressions are confined to humans: prōtotokos hyios, firstborn son (cf. Gen. 25:25, Esau), and prōtotokos as a noun joined to the proper name (e.g., "Nadab the firstborn" in Num. 3:2). In the ANE the firstborn was generally believed to inherit his father's strength (cf. Gen. 49:3), which gave him a special position in law (cf. Deut. 21:15–17). For this reason it was normal for him to receive his father's special love.

(b) In a transferred sense, prōtotokos is used to express a special relationship with one's father, especially with God. Here the two roots from which it is derived no longer play any role in the meaning (e.g., Exod. 4:22). In Ps. 89:27 the thought is of "adoption," i.e., the bestowal of special legal rights and honors; here the king is not born "my firstborn," but "appointed." It is to be noted that while prōtotokos is used in the OT as a title of honor for the chosen, that is, those who have received grace, it is not found in an eschatological or soteriological sense.

2. In rab. Jud. the Torah is described in a comment on Prov. 8:22–23 as the first created thing, the firstborn of the way of Yahweh, and the earliest of his works. The same description is applied to the sanctuary with reference to Jer. 17:12. In both cases the term is used in a fig. sense to express the special love of God for the Torah and the sanctuary.

NT prōtotokos appears 8x in the NT.

1. In the lit. sense, prōtotokos describes the birth of Jesus as Mary's firstborn in Lk. 2:7. "Firstborn" possibly conveys the implication that Jesus was the first of several children (cf. Mk. 6:3). Or it may emphasize, in view of the mention in Lk. 1:27, 34 of her virginity, that Mary had borne no previous children. In any case, however, prōtotokos does not preclude further children of Mary.

2. In the fig. sense, as a title of honor for Jesus, prōtotokos is comprehensible only if seen as the derived definition of this word in the LXX. This must not be forgotten when we encounter shades of meaning in the NT that go beyond its use in the LXX.

(a) It is used in Col. 1:15 as a title for the mediator of creation, as is demonstrated by parallel sayings in 1:16, "by him all things were created . . . all things were created by him and for him"; and 1:17, "He is before all things, and in him all things hold together." These statements are a confession of the supreme rank of the preexistent Christ as the mediator in the creation of all things.

(b) It is used in an eschatological sense in Heb. 1:6 to qualify hyios, son (1:5), as a title given to Jesus at his ascension, i.e., the heavenly enthronement of the risen Lord. According to Ps. 2:7 (cited in Heb. 1:5), Christ's exaltation represents the perfection of Jesus, and he will be followed by others. Since the exalted Christ is one step ahead of his followers on the way to consummation, he is already prōtotokos. Rom. 8:29 refers to the eschatological transfiguration, when those who have been foreknown and chosen out are made like him (by the resurrection of the dead), although they will never be completely like him, for he remains their Lord. Col. 1:18 and Rev. 1:5 connect the title prōtotokos with the resurrection: Jesus is the first to be raised by God (→ prōtos, 4755), so that "in everything he might have the supremacy" (Col. 1:18).

As a title of honor for Jesus, prōtotokos expresses more clearly than almost any other the unity of God's saving will and acts: "the firstborn over all creation" (Col. 1:15), "the firstborn from among the dead" (1:18), and "the firstborn among many brothers" (Rom. 8:29; cf. Heb. 12:23). Creator and Redeemer are one and the same, the all-powerful God in Jesus Christ, "the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End" (Rev. 22:13), who binds his own to himself from all eternity and is their surety for salvation, if they remain in him. This goes beyond the limits of what can be logically asserted: The man Jesus of Nazareth is the mediator of creation; he who was executed on the cross as a criminal is the first to experience resurrection and the one who leads us into life. In the man Christ Jesus, the prōtotokos, God has brought his divine power and glory to its climax (Col. 1:19–20), and he has given a share in this to the church.

3. The pl. prōtotokoi refers to the church in Heb. 12:23 ("the church of the firstborn, whose names are written in heaven"). Is this concept be taken literally? This would mean that Christians are here set directly alongside Christ in an unparalleled and almost dangerous manner. Doubtless the author sees the Son and the sons (chs. 1–2) as closely related: They are all "of the same family" (2:11). But these prōtotokoi, as "brothers" of Christ, do not possess the rank of firstborn as an inalienable right, as Christ does, but receive it like heirs, only on the ground that Christ is the prōtotokos and as such "the author of their salvation" (2:10).

See also prōtos, first (4755).

πτερύγιον (pterygion), end, edge (4762).

CL & OT pterygion is the diminutive of pteryx, wing, and designates the tip or extremity of anything. On a building a pterygion may designate a turret or battlement or a pointed roof. Both pterygion and pteryx are used in the LXX to translate the Heb. kānāp, wing.

NT The devil took Jesus to the pterygion of the temple and urged him to jump, in order to demonstrate that he would be miraculously protected by divine power (Matt. 4:5–7; Lk. 4:9–12). Probably this refers to the southeast corner of the temple area, where one could look straight down from the roof of Solomon's porch into the Kidron Valley far below. There may be a play on words in this passage, for the word pteryx, wing, occurs in the same psalm that Satan quoted about the angels taking care of Jesus. In Ps. 91:4 we read: "He will cover you with his feathers, and under his wings [pteryx] you will find refuge."

Eusebius preserves a story of Hegesippus, which tells how the Jewish leaders set James, the brother of Jesus, on the pinnacle of the temple in order to speak to the Passover crowds and persuade them not to go astray after Jesus. But when James testified to Jesus instead, the leaders cast him down and stoned him.

πτωχός (ptōchos), poor (4777); πτωχεύω (ptōcheuō), be poor, beg (4776); πτωχεία (ptōcheia), poverty (4775).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. ptōchos signifies utter dependence on society. As an adj. it means begging, poor, dependent on the help of strangers; as a noun it means beggar. This word stands in contrast to plousios, rich, owning property. It is also used as a metaphor for meager, inadequate, scanty. Derived from it are ptōcheuō, beg, live the life of a beggar, be destitute, and ptōcheia, begging, destitution, poverty.

(b) In early Gk. thought poverty was not considered to have religious value. Charity, esp. by the propertied classes to those impoverished by the blows of fate, was considered a virtue because it was useful to society, but it was not regarded as a religious or ethical act. There was no public care for the poor. In later Gk. philosophy poverty was regarded by some as a favorable precondition for virtue.

2. In the LXX ptōchos (some 100x) generally translates one of five different Heb. words. In most cases it is synonymous with penēs (poor, 4288). (a) ptōchos has various connotations. It can mean the socially poor, those without land, the peasants as poor, needy, and unimportant. It can also denote the physically weak. Finally, it refers to beggars and the homeless. In general, ptōchos here has widened its cl. Gk. meaning, esp. in social, economic, and religious spheres.

(b) Because Israel's land is Yahweh's land, God commanded that there be no continuing poverty among his people. Hence the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20:22–23:19) lays down several stipulations that in principle were always valid in Israel, even if they were seldom carried out. (i) Any Israelites who as a result of economic need had to sell themselves into slavery in payment of debt were to be freed in the sabbatical year (21:2). (ii) In the sabbatical year, when the ground was allowed to lie fallow, its produce belonged to the poor (23:10–11). (iii) It was forbidden to exploit or oppress the poor (22:22–27). (iv) The law may not be perverted against the poor (23:6–8). Yahweh himself was their protector (22:27b), and he reminded Israel of how he had freed them from slavery in Egypt (22:21; 23:9).

(c) Under the monarchy the economy changed from a predominantly barter economy to one using some form of money. As a result, many of the farmers became financially dependent on business people. This impoverishment of a wide stratum of the population was felt not merely as a major social problem but also as a religious one, for it involved a breach of the divine law. The 8th-cent. prophets esp. attacked social injustice in the name of Yahweh, threatening God's judgment on the rich, who were responsible (e.g., Isa. 3:14–15; 5:8–9; Amos 2:7; 4:1; 5:11; 8:4; Mic. 2:2; 3:2–4).

Only in this setting can we understand the meaning of "poor" and "needy" in Ps. The poor are those who suffer injustice; they are poor not because of disobedience or laziness but because others have despised God's law. Thus they turn, helpless and humble, to God in prayer, aware that ultimately it is a question of God's glory (e.g., 25:16; 40:17; 69:29; 86:1; 109:22). Through this process there gradually developed the specific connotation of "poor" as all those who turn to God in great need and seek his help. God is praised as the judge of Israel and the protector of the poor (e.g., 72:2, 4, 12–13; 132:15), who procures justice for them against their oppressors (cf. Ps. 9; 10; 35; 74; 140).

Ezek. saw the coming destruction of the kingdom of Judah as Yahweh's punishment for their oppression of the poor and needy (22:29). The misery of the exile led to the use of "poor" and "needy" as collective terms for the people; these words are found in a number of hopeful eschatological promises about the future of the people (e.g., Isa. 29:19; 41:17; 49:13; 51:21–23; 54:11–15; 61:1–4).

(d) Pronouncements in wisdom lit. on the poor are much less religious in tone. They vary from explanations of poverty as the fault of those who suffer it (e.g., Prov. 6:6–11; 23:21) and warnings against it (Sir. 40:28), to the praise of the poor and a call to improve their lot (Prov. 14:31; Sir. 10:30).

3. All the main lines of OT thought occur again in rab. Jud., both concerning material poverty and its alleviation and its spiritualization and religious classification. (a) The Pharisees, Essenes, and the Hel. Jews of Jerusalem had their special forms of charitable work (e.g., feeding the poor, clothing the naked).

(b) The synagogue communities had an excellent organization of care for the poor, which went as far as founding hospices. It was rooted in the law of the OT and was made possible by the temple tax, and after the destruction of Jerusalem by weekly public alms. In fact, clear norms were laid down for contributions expected from synagogue members. The poor themselves were expected to contribute in order to demonstrate their religious equality, though they were the first to profit from care of the poor. Priests and Levites without estates, foreigners, widows, and orphans received tithes for the poor paid at the end of every third year (cf. Deut. 14:29; 26:12).

4. A considerable variety of opinion is found in the spiritual judgments on poverty. (a) Pss. Sol. esp. reserves the word "poor" for those who have experienced divine acts of deliverance and are hence identical with the righteous (cf. 5:2, 11; 10:6; 15:1; 18:2). Heavy material burdens and martyrdom are generally included.

(b) The community of the "poor" in Qumran rejected private property and built up a well-organized community life in expectation of eschatological salvation. They chose the term "poor" for themselves. Their writings attacked the priests who exploited the poor.

(c) Rab. theology ultimately denied that poverty had theological value. It even saw it as the result of lack of knowledge of the Torah, the one real poverty. This led to a feeling of moral superiority over the poor. In striking contrast, however, was a form of popular eschatology that saw the poor as the primary objects of divine mercy. Such belief led to the danger of idealizing poverty.

NT ptōchos occurs 34x in the NT, mostly in the Gospels; ptōcheia, 3x; ptōcheuō, only in 2 Cor. 8:9.

1. The Gospels. (a) ptōchos occurs in its lit. sense in the Synoptics. Jesus told the rich man who wanted to inherit eternal life: "Go, sell everything you have and give to the poor" (Mk. 10:21; cf. Lk. 18:22). In Mk. 12:41–44 (cf. Lk. 21:1–4) Jesus says that the apparently negligible gift of the poor woman, entitled to support, is far greater than those of the rich. Only in Jesus' anointing by a woman (Matt. 26:11; Mk. 14:7; cf. Jn. 12:8) do we read that almsgiving must take second place, but here it is a question of one final opportunity for an extravagant act of love to Jesus before his death.

(b) Jesus speaks of the poor in Matt. 11:5 and in the first beatitude (5:3; Lk. 6:20). Neither passage uses "poor" in the general social meaning. Rather, the enlarged form that Matt. uses ("the poor in spirit") brings out the true nuance, based on OT and Jewish background, that people in affliction have confidence only in God. Lk. indicates that the poverty of the beatitudes is a poverty caused by discipleship: Those who believe in the Son find all that God's promises for the poor, the miserable, and the humble (e.g., Isa. 57:15; 61:1) are fulfilled in him.

(c) Lk. 4:18 records Jesus' quotation of Isa. 61:1 ("to preach good news to the poor") at the beginning of his ministry. In Lk. this dominant theme of poverty is linked with a sharp attack on the rich (6:24–26). Jesus told the man who had invited him to a meal (14:12–14) to invite the poor and others from whom no repayment could be expected and promised him an eschatological reward for so doing. Similarly, the poor are among the first substitute guests at the great banquet (14:21). Lazarus is the type of poor whom God receives (16:20, 22), and the anonymous rich man who fails in his duty to him is the type of those condemned by God (cf. 12:13–21). When Zacchaeus promises to give half of his goods to the poor after his conversion (19:8), his gratitude shows itself in concern for the poor, and he is saved (19:10).

(d) The Synoptic Gospels depict Jesus' way of life as one of self-chosen poverty. Note esp. Jesus' reply to a would-be disciple: "Foxes have holes and birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man has no place to lay his head" (Matt. 8:20). The disciples left all in order to follow him (4:18–22; Jn. 1:35–51). Jesus demanded that the rich young ruler sell his possessions and pursue a life of discipleship in poverty as the precondition of eternal life (Matt. 19:16–22; Lk. 18:18–24). When Jesus sent out his disciples, they were to go without possessions or provisions (Matt. 10:1–16; Lk. 9:1–6). In this way of life was a double separation: from possessions and from family ties (Matt. 10:37–39; Lk. 14:25–33).

The lifestyle that Jesus adopted for himself and called his disciples to embrace was one exemplified in the Sermon on the Mount, esp. the Beatitudes. Jesus' way of life was a conscious identification with the poor and the OT concept of poverty. In itself this was an act of loving compassion. At the same time it was a life that deliberately chose to cast itself on the care of the Father. But in doing so, Jesus was also putting to the test the people of Israel.

2. James. James vigorously attacks the attitude of the rich both in public and in church services (2:2–3, 6–7) and demands equal esteem for the poor. He bases his position on the fact that God "has ... chosen those who are poor in the eyes of the world" (2:5) and the knowledge that mercy toward others will be the criterion in the final judgment (2:13; cf. Matt. 25:31–46).

3. Revelation. In the letters to the churches of Smyrna (2:9) and Laodicea (3:17) the contrast between poor and rich shows the difference between a human estimate and that of the glorified Lord (1:9–18). In 13:16 John describes how all social and economic classes, rich and poor alike, are captured by the hypnotic power of the beast from the abyss.

4. Paul's letters. Paul makes only occasional use of the concept, although he is deeply concerned for the poor. (a) Paul refers to the poor in a lit. sense in connection with his collection for the church in Jerusalem. "The poor in Jerusalem" was perhaps a name these believers had acquired (cf. Rom. 15:26, where "of the saints" is added; cf. also Gal. 2:10). In Rom. 15:26 Paul speaks of "a contribution" that the churches of Macedonia and Achaia were making: "They were pleased to do it, and indeed they owe it to them. For if the Gentiles have shared in the Jews' spiritual blessings, they owe it to the Jews to share with them their material blessings" (15:27). Paul himself was going to Jerusalem with this contribution prior to a prospective mission trip to Spain (15:24–25).

(b) In 1 Cor. 16:1–4 Paul had given various recommendations about the collection to the churches of Galatia, suggesting that they put something aside on the first day of each week (16:2) and proposing on his arrival to send "the men you approve ... to Jerusalem" (16:3); if it seems advisable, he will go himself as well (16:4).

It appears as if the Corinthians did not follow these instructions, for Paul returns to the issue in 2 Cor. 8–9 with strong encouragement to finish the project. Evidently a year had elapsed and the collection had not advanced much (8:10). Paul, therefore, sends Titus to help them in this regard (8:6, 16–17, 23). Paul writes not as a command (as he had done in 1 Cor. 16:1–2), but "to test the sincerity of your love by comparing it with the earnestness of others" (2 Cor. 8:8). In addition, he sets before them the example of Christ: "For you know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor [ptōcheuō], so that you through his poverty [ptōcheia] might become rich " (8:9). Christ's leaving heaven to come to this sinful earth has practical application for Paul. His becoming poor is the paradoxical ground of the true riches of the believer (cf. also Phil. 2:6–11).

In 2 Cor. 9:1–4 Paul expresses the hope that his boasting about the Corinthians to the churches of Macedonia and Achaia will not prove vain in view of the possibility of a meager response. He reminds them that "whoever sows sparingly will also reap sparingly, and whoever sows generously will also reap generously. Each man should give what he has decided in his heart to give, not reluctantly or under compulsion, for God loves a cheerful giver" (9:6–7; cf. Prov. 22:9). This is further reinforced by a quote from Ps. 112:9.

(c) In Gal. 2:10, the poor are mentioned in relation to Paul's meeting with the "pillars" of the Jerusalem church, where he was recognized as the apostle to the Gentiles while they would go to the Jews. The only stipulation was that Paul and company "should continue to remember the poor, the very thing I was eager to do." The need of material relief at Jerusalem is evident from the story of the appointment of the seven to serve in the daily distribution to Gk.-speaking widows (Acts 6:1–6). The situation was no doubt aggravated for the church by Jewish hostility (cf. 5:17–41;

7:54–8:3; 9:1–2; 12:1–5). Acts 11:27–30 tells how the Christian prophet Agabus foretold the terrible famine that took place under the emperor Claudius. The church at Antioch responded by sending relief to Jerusalem through Barnabas and Saul.

(d) Paul develops the theme of poverty further in relation to the apostles, who, among other things, are described as "poor, yet making many rich" (2 Cor. 6:10). The paradoxical nature of the apostolic ministry follows the pattern set by Christ, who is himself the ground and pattern for all Christian life and giving.

(e) The cosmic spirits (→ stoicheion, 5122) worshiped by the heathen, including formerly the Galatian believers, are called "weak and miserable [ptōchos]" (Gal. 4:9; cf. 4:3). The word translated "miserable" here is the same word translated "poor" at 2:10. In other words, the stoicheia have nothing at all to offer but enslavement. But by listening to the Judaizers with their insistence on the necessity of circumcision for salvation and the other legal observances (4:10), the Galatian Christians are in danger of returning to their former enslavement, whereas through Christ and the Spirit they can live as sons and heirs of God himself (4:1–7).

πύλη (pylē), gate, door (4783); πυλών (pylōn), gate, gateway, entrance (4784).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. pylē is used, mostly in the pl., to mean the gates of a town, although it can also mean the door of a house. In a general sense it may designate any entrance or opening (e.g., a geographical pass or straits). The gates of Hades was a common expression for the nether world, the realm of the dead. pylōn means a gateway.

2. In the LXX pylē refers to (a) the gate of a city, building, farm, or village; (b) the area immediately inside a city gate; and (c) the gate(s) of death (Job 38:17; Ps. 107:18), of Sheol or the abode of the dead (Isa. 38:10; Wis. 16:13; 3 Macc. 5:51; cf. Pss. Sol. 16:2), and of heaven (Gen. 28:17). pylōn denotes an entrance or doorway.

NT 1. In the NT pylē can denote (a) a city gate (Lk. 7:12; Acts 9:24; 16:13). Jesus suffered outside the gate of Jerusalem (Heb. 13:12; cf. Lev. 16:27), which emphasizes that his suffering represents the true offering of the Day of Atonement and that, in his death, he is classified with lawbreakers, who were stoned outside the camp (24:14; Num. 15:35). (b) It can also mean a gate of the temple (Acts 3:10; cf. 3:2, which uses thyra), and (c) a prison gate (12:10).

2. (a) pylē is used fig. of the narrow gate through which one must pass to enter life (Matt. 7:13–14; cf. Lk. 13:24, which uses thyra). This image indicates an entrance that is difficult to find and hence ignored by many. These words form an appeal to decide to follow Christ and face all the consequences that obedience entails.

(b) pylē is used of "the gates of Hades" in Matt. 16:18. This image reflects the commonly held ancient idea that the underworld was secured by strong gates that prevented escape and barred access to invaders. It is improbable that Jesus uses this expression for the ungodly powers of the underworld assailing the rock, for Hades (→ hadēs, 87) was not regarded as the abode of evil powers who emerge to attack humans (the word for that abode is geenna, hell, → 1147). In the light of the Jewish background, Jesus is affirming in Matt. 16:18 that death, in spite of its unconquerable power, will not win control over the ekklēsia built on the rock; that is, death will not vanquish the Messiah who builds the church or the members of his community.

pylōn denotes (a) the gateway or porch of a house (Matt. 26:71; Lk. 16:20; Acts 10:17; 12:13–14), and (b) the gate(s) of a city (14:13), in particular, the gates of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:12–13, 21, 25; 22:14).

See also thyra, door, entrance (2598).

πῦρ (pyr), fire (4786); πυρόω (pyroō), to set on fire, burn (4792); πύρωσις (pyrōsis), burning, being burnt (4796); πύρινος (pyrinos), fiery, of fire (4791); πυρράζω (pyrrazō), be red (4793); πυρά (pyra), pile of combustible or burning material (4787); πυρετός (pyretos), fever (4790); πυρέσσω (pyressō), suffer with a fever (4789).

CL 1. Great importance has been attached to fire in human existence, in both a positive and a negative sense: as a life-giving and as a life-destroying force. It is used by people at the center of the home (the hearth, which is thus, like sacrificial fire, regarded by many people as something holy). It is also used as a weapon in fighting and war.

As to the environment of the OT and Jud., the fire cult of the Persian religion is of particular importance. Fire and a serpent represent the contraries truth and falsehood in the Mazda teaching of Zoroastrianism. In the conflict between the good and evil basic principles, human beings should place themselves on the side of the good, to which fire belongs. Fire is the protector of the good, divine order of life. Since fire is revered as the element of purity, it must not be allowed to become contaminated. In the final judgment fire will be the means employed for the last test.

2. In the Gk. world fire was used in both secular and religious spheres. Metaphorically it described the most diverse human experiences, such as intensity of passion, wickedness, or the heat of battle. In Gk. religion Prometheus and Hermes are said to have brought fire to the human race. Fire was used as a means of ritual cleansing (e.g., purificatory offering after childbirth or a death, and the various feasts of purification). Although corpses were burned in funeral rites, it was believed that the soul could not be affected by the fire or cut off from its future existence. Fire played an important part in the mystery religions, both for purification and in the representation of the divine and of the new nature of the initiated.

In Gk. philosophy fire is one of the four (or five) basic elements of all things. According to Heraclitus, the world is a movement of fire, which is undergoing a constant process of change and is identical with the deity (or logos). In this pantheistic system, God, the fiery universe, universal reason, and the human spirit are all regarded as one. Heraclitus held that a great world era will come to its end when everything is burned up and returns to the primal fire; then a new world will be produced out of the primal fire. The Stoics likewise saw fire as the active world principle, the world soul that guides everything according to purpose, holding all things together and controlling them by law and reason. The human soul is part of the godhead and thus fiery in nature; it will return to primal fire when the world disappears in flames.

OT 1. In the LXX pyr is used over 350x. Fire is used for several purposes in the home (Exod. 12:8; 2 Chr. 35:13; Isa. 44:16; Jer. 7:18) and in craftwork, especially metal work (Isa. 44:12–17; Jer. 6:29; Sir. 38:28). In war it is a means of destruction (cf. Deut. 13:16; Jdg. 20:48; Amos 1:4). No fire may be kindled on the Sabbath (Exod. 35:3). Among natural phenomena, lightning is the "fire of God" (2 Ki. 1:10–14). In a metaphorical sense, fire stands for various human activities: slander and quarreling (Prov. 26:20–21), anger (Sir. 28:10–11), the shedding of blood (11:32; 22:24), the passion of love and debauchery (9:8; 23:16), and adultery (Job 31:12; Prov. 6:27–28).

Fire also serves in the OT as a means of purification (cf. Lev. 13:52, 55; Num. 31:23; Isa. 6:6). The only corpses that are burned, however, are those of criminals (Gen. 38:24; Lev. 20:14; 21:9; Jos. 7:15), so that they may have no place in the grave of their ancestors.

In worship the sacrificial fire is used for burning gifts on the altar and incense in the censer (Lev. 1:7–17; 3:5; 6:9–13; 16:12–13). No sacrifice may be offered by fire that does not come from the altar (10:1; Num. 3:4). Heathen customs are forbidden, such as the burning of children to Molech (Lev. 20:2; Deut. 12:31; 18:10; cf. 2 Ki.16:3; 17:17; 21:6). We do not know the purpose and nature of this custom, or the extent to which it was practiced in ancient Israel.

Since Yahweh is present among his people as the Judge who delivers as well as punishes, the fire that accompanies him becomes the expression of two different aspects of his activity. (a) It is the mark of divine judgment (Gen. 19:24; Exod. 9:24; Lev. 10:2; Num. 11:1; 16:35; 2 Ki. 1:10; Amos 1:4, 7). (b) It is also a sign of Yahweh's grace, in that he displays by means of fire his acceptance of a sacrifice (Gen. 15:17; Lev. 9:23–24; Jdg. 6:21; 1 Ki. 18:38; 1 Chr. 21:26; 2 Chr. 7:1). In addition, fire is also a sign of divine guidance (cf. the pillars of cloud and of fire, Exod. 13:22; Num. 14:14). Yahweh speaks out of the fire (Deut. 4:12, 15, 33). Elect persons can even be taken to him with fiery manifestations (2 Ki. 2:11).

Yahweh himself is a devouring fire who watches over obedience to his will with fiery zeal (Deut. 4:24; 9:3; Isa. 33:14). His word can also be described as a devouring fire (Jer. 23:29).

Regarding a theophany, when Yahweh appears, he is accompanied by fire (Gen. 15:17; Exod. 3:2–3; 19:18; Num. 14:14; Jdg. 6:21; 13:20; Isa. 4:5; Ezek. 1:27). This does not mean, however, that he is thought of as the god of fire, for Israel drew a distinction between Yahweh himself and the phenomena that accompany his appearance. Fire is one of Yahweh's servants, an instrument in his hand (1 Ki. 19:11–12; Ps. 50:3; 104:4). Fire is a symbol of Yahweh's holiness as judge of the world, also of his divine power and glory (Exod. 24:17; Isa. 6:1–4; Ezek. 1:27–28). According to Dan. 7:10, a stream of fire issues from beneath Yahweh's throne, a concept that plays an important part in Jewish and Christian cosmology and apocalyptic.

In the postexilic period it was expected that Yahweh would appear to bring history to its consummation, and fire is the token announcing the day of Yahweh (Joel 2:30). His enemies will be destroyed by fire and the sword (Isa. 66:15–16; Ezek. 38:22; 39:6; Mal. 4:1). According to Isa. 66:24, the effects will be far-reaching: Those condemned in the judgment will be continuously tormented by fire.

2. In Jewish apocalyptic fire is the mark of the heavenly world. The heavenly house in which Yahweh lives is surrounded by fire (1 Enoch 14:9–22). Fire is the means of punishment in hell (91:9; 100:9; 2 Esd. 7:38), and the final judgment is by fire (1 Enoch 102:1; 2 Esd. 13:10–11). The community of Qumran also expected the ungodly to be judged by fire in the final judgment (1QS 2:8; 4:13).

NT In the NT pyr occurs 71x. It is part of everyday life (Mk. 9:22; Lk. 22:55), including its use as an instrument of torture (Heb. 11:34; Rev. 17:16) and in war (18:8). It appears in a fig. sense in Jas. 3:5–6 (the tongue as a corrupting fire) and Lk. 12:49 (the fire of discord). Similarly the vb. pyroō, burn, be inflamed, is used of the heat of emotions, such as sexual desire (1 Cor. 7:9) and indignation over another's hurt (2 Cor. 11:29). Several derivative words (see the lexical section) also occur in the NT.

1. Fire has theological significance as a sign of heavenly, divine glory. The exalted Christ has eyes like flames of fire (Rev. 1:14; cf. Ezek. 1:27; Rev. 2:18; 19:12). The angel in 10:1 has legs like pillars of fire. Before God's throne burn seven lamps of fire (4:5; 15:2). The Holy Spirit, being of heavenly origin, appears in tongues as of fire (Acts 2:3, cf. Jn. 3:8), and fire accompanies the appearance of God (Acts 7:30).

2. Fire is also used in various metaphorical expressions. In the proverbial sayings in 1 Pet. 1:7 (cf. Prov. 17:3), faith is tested by suffering in this world as gold is tested in fire. Sufferings are a pyrōsis, burning, which come upon Christians in order to test or prove them. This is also a sign of the end times (1 Pet. 4:12; cf. 4:7). In Rev. 3:18, gold's being refined by fire represents true Christian faith that can stand the test. In the passage about the spiritual armor of the Christian (Eph. 6:16), the shield of faith serves to ward off "all the flaming arrows of the evil one."

3. Fire is also a picture of divine judgment (Matt. 3:10; 7:19; Lk. 3:9; Jn. 15:6). (a) Even in this age God can use fire as a means of judgment: The sons of Zebedee want Jesus to give them permission to call down fire on the inhospitable Samaritan village (Lk. 9:54; cf. 2 Ki. 1:10, 12). Rev. 9:17–18 depicts horses coming out to execute judgment, with smoke and sulfur issuing from their mouths. This marks them out as a scourge, bringing destruction with them. Similarly the riders' breastplates, "fiery red," point to the dawning of the judgment. The final powers to array themselves against God, Gog and Magog, will be destroyed by divine fire (20:9). The two witnesses are able to destroy their enemies with fire (11:5): God's power of judgment is at their disposal (cf. 2 Sam. 22:9). But the false prophet also, empowered by Satan, can call down fire from heaven (Rev. 13:13).

(b) In Lk. 12:49–50 Jesus' mission is presented as a fulfillment of John the Baptist's prophecy, but now in the sense that he who baptizes in spirit and fire must himself suffer. His way of bringing the judgment is to take it upon himself, so that the eschatological judgment is taken up in the present, historical sufferings of Jesus. In Mk. 9:49 salt and fire are linked together in a riddle. Salt has power to purify, preserve, and give flavor, and fire is an image of the divine judgment. Those who want to find fellowship with God must give up the old self to judgment by denying themselves. Any who refuse to do so are liable to the eschatological judgment of wrath.

In 1 Cor. 3:13 we find recorded the traditional notion of an eschatological judgment by fire, in which every person's work will be tested. Bad workmanship will be burned up, though the builder will narrowly escape, like a stick being pulled out of a burning woodpile. In 2 Thess. 1:7 the Parousia is described as Jesus' revelation "in blazing fire" (cf. Exod. 3:2; Isa. 66:15). In Rom. 12:20 Paul cites Prov. 25:21–22, making the metaphor refer to the final divine judgment. Only in one NT passage (2 Pet. 3:7–12) does the ancient idea of a world conflagration appear, combined with a recollection of the flood catastrophe recorded in the OT.

(c) Fire appears in Matt. 13:42; 18:8–9; 25:41 par.; Mk. 9:43–49 as the opposite of the "kingdom of God" and life (→ zōē, 2437). The "hell of fire" (→ geenna, 1147) in Mk. 9:48 recalls Isa. 66:24. Contemporary Jewish ideas of the present punishment by fire of the people of Sodom and Gomorrah are suggested by Jude 7. Burning sulfur indicates eternal damnation in hell at the end of time (Rev. 14:10; 19:20; 20:10, 14; 21:8).

πυρρός (pyrros), red (as fire) (4794).

CL & OT pyrros is connected with pyr, fire (→ 4786), and pyroō, burn. It can mean red, yellow, yellow-gray, or tawny. The LXX uses pyrros for red in Gen. 25:30; Num. 19:2; 2 Ki. 3:22; for "ruddy" in Song 5:10. Red horses figure in the vision of Zech. 1:8; 6:2, symbolizing the east.

NT The word occurs only at Rev. 6:4 and 12:3, though Pyrros, Pyrrhus, occurs as a proper name in Acts 20:4. The rider of the fiery horse (Rev. 6:4) is a war-monger, the color signifying slaughter. Most interpreters interpret the four riders as agents of destruction, sent out or simply permitted by God. The red dragon (12:3) denotes Satan but recalls the evil Leviathan (Isa. 27:1) associated with Egyptian power (Ezek. 29:3). The color might stand for bloodthirstiness (Rev. 12:4) or for evil (cf. 17:3; cf. Isa. 1:18).

πωλέω (pōleō), sell (4797); πιπράσκω (pipraskō), sell (4405); ἐμπορεύομαι (emporeuomai), trade (1864).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. pōleō and pipraskō can both mean sell as in normal trade, but also betray or sell for a bribe. pipraskō was the word normally used for selling captives or slaves. emporeuomai began as a general term for travel, but later meant travel on business, trade.

In the LXX pōleō and pipraskō are used for selling either things or people (e.g., Gen. 41:56; Exod. 21:8). The latter word was also applied fig. to sin and its consequences (i.e., God "sells" his people [Isa. 50:1], and an individual can "sell oneself" to do what is evil [2 Ki. 17:17; cf. 1 Macc. 1:15]). emporeuomai normally means trade (e.g., Gen. 42:34; Amos 8:6). Once it is used fig. of trading in wisdom (Prov. 3:14).

NT Both pōleō and pipraskō occur in the NT as commercial terms for selling commodities (Mk. 10:21 par.; Lk. 12:33; Acts 4:34). Only pipraskō is used of selling a person: once lit. in a parable (Matt. 18:25), and once fig. in Rom. 7:14 ("sold as a slave to sin"). emporeuomai occurs 2x in the NT: in Jas. 4:13 it means engage in trade; in 2 Pet. 2:3 it is used fig. to convey the idea of exploitation.

ῥαββί (rhabbi) (from Heb. rabbî, "my lord"), rabbi (4806); ῥαββουνί (rhabbouni) (from Aram. rabbûnî, "my lord"), rabbi, my master (4808); καθηγητής (kathēgētēs), teacher, leader (2762).

OT The Sem. rab means many or great. In the latter sense we find it both inside and outside Israel as a designation for chief officers (e.g., Est. 1:8; Jer. 39:13; 41:1; Dan. 1:3; Jon. 1:6, of a sea captain), and it has come down to us in the titles of certain Assyrian and Babylonian officials (e.g., 2 Ki. 18:17; Jer. 39:13).

NT 1. Rabbi was a title of respect given to teachers of the law, such as the Pharisees (Matt. 23:7–8), as well as to any teacher. Gradually it became a technical term for one who had received ordination (*s*ᵉ*mîkâ*), i.e., who had received authority to act as judge in religious matters. This was conferred on the recipient by the laying on of hands.

2. John the Baptist's disciples addressed John by this title (Jn. 3:26). It was applied to Jesus a number of times: by Nicodemus (3:2), by Nathanael (1:49), by Peter (Mk. 9:5; 11:21), and by Judas (Matt. 26:25, 49; Mk. 14:45). The Aram. rhabbouni is found in the mouth of Bartimaeus (Mk. 10:51) and Mary Magdalene (Jn. 20:16).

3. In the Gospels the most common form of address for Jesus is didaskale, i.e., teacher (→ didaskalos, 1437); Lk. uses the synonym epistata 7x (5:5; 8:24 [2x], 45; 9:33, 49; 17:13). Jesus is also often called kyrie (i.e., lord, master; → kyrios, 3261). This is often no more than a mark of respect (e.g., Matt. 13:27), though it also does acknowledge that Jesus was regarded as a teacher. The Aram. title rhabbouni was normally avoided in Gk.-speaking circles as unfamiliar (cf. Jn. 20:16). Matt. also tends not to use didaskalos (rhabbi) for Jesus, since being in sharp conflict with the Jewish rabbis, he wishes to avoid the too-frequent ascription of their title to Jesus.

Note esp. Matt. 23:8, where Jesus instructs his disciples not to be called rhabbi, since they really have only one didaskalos, Jesus Christ himself (cf. 23:10, where NIV "teacher" and "Teacher" is kathēgētēs, a word that occurs only there in the NT).

4810 (rhabdizō, beat with a rod), → 4811.

ῥάβδος (rhabdos), rod, staff (4811); ῥαβδίζω (rhabdizō), beat with a rod (4810); ῥαπίζω (rhapizō), strike (4824); ῥάπισμα (rhapisma), a blow with a club, rod, or whip (4825).

CL & OT Along with other words, rhabdos refers to a rod or staff, esp. that carried by kings as a hereditary emblem of authority and by heralds and public speakers. Roman magistrates bore the rhabdoi as a badge of their authority. rhabdizō denotes beating with a stick or rod, generally as a punishment for minor offenses by slaves or children. rhapizō indicates striking with the hand.

In the LXX rhabdos denotes a shepherd's club (Mic. 7:14), Aaron's rod (Num. 17), the ruler's scepter (Ps. 45:6), a rod as a means of punishment (Exod. 21:20), and a traveler's staff. Several passages containing the idea of a staff (e.g., Gen. 49:10; Num. 24:17) became important in later Jewish messianic interpretation. In addition, the Qumran Isa. commentary applies the rhabdos of Jesse from Isa. 11:1 to the kingly Messiah.

NT rhabdos occurs 12x in the NT; rhabdizō 2x (Acts 16:22; 2 Cor. 11:25); rhapizō 2x (Matt. 5:39; 26:67); and rhapisma 3x (Mk. 14:65; Jn. 18:22; 19:3).

1. Jesus was struck by the soldiers (rhapizō, Matt. 26:67; rhapisma, Mk. 14:65; Jn. 19:3; Matt. and Mk. also have kolaphizō). In keeping with his earlier teaching not to retaliate against those who strike with the hand (rhapizō, Matt. 5:39), Jesus neither defended himself against nor struck back at those who beat him. Like his Lord, Paul was beaten by civil magistrates (rhabdizō, 2 Cor. 11:25).

2. rhabdos is used of a traveler's staff in Jesus' sending forth of the Twelve (Matt. 10:10; Mk. 6:8; Lk. 9:3; cf. also Heb. 11:21). In Matt. and Lk. they are to take no staff; in Mk. a staff is permitted. rhabdos is also used for a rod of authority or chastisement (see Acts 16:22, where the magistrates beat [rhabdizō] Paul and Silas with rods). This last sense of rhabdos is applied fig. in 1 Cor. 4:21.

rhabdos is also used several times to denote divine majesty, rule, and power, particularly in connection with the final overthrow of evil. In this connection, some of the OT passages where the scepter was already explained messianically in Jud. are applied to Christ. For example, God has entrusted absolute authority to the Son (Rev. 2:27; 12:5). The one who will smite (patassō) the nations and rule them with a rod of iron (19:15; cf. Ps. 2:9) is the Lamb who was himself slain (Rev. 5:8–9; 12:11; 19:7, 9, 13).

References to rhabdos in Heb. illustrate further the theme of the scepter of authority in the NT's exegesis of the OT. The superiority of the unique Son to the angels is reinforced by an appeal to a series of OT testimonies, including Ps. 2 and 45 (a royal marriage psalm that invokes the righteous king as "God, " cf. Heb. 1:8). Heb. 9:4, which contrasts the temporary character of the OT sanctuary with the eternal new covenant, alludes to the rod of Aaron that budded and was preserved (Num. 17:10); this emblem of the Levitical priesthood has now been superseded.

ῥακά (rhaka), empty-head, fool (4819).

CL & OT The origin of rhaka is uncertain. Derivations from Aram., Heb., and Gk. have been suggested. Perhaps the best option is as the transcription of the Aram. term of abuse rêqā', empty-head, blockhead.

NT rhaka appears only in Matt. 5:22: "But I tell you ... anyone who says to his brother, 'Raca,' is answerable to the Sanhedrin. But anyone who says, 'You fool (mōre)!' will be in danger of the fire of hell." rhaka is here compared with mōre, the term of abuse that was more commonly used. mōre is more drastic and is best rendered by idiot or fool. In 5:22 are thus assembled the two everyday terms of abuse prevalent in Jesus' day.

With the expression "but I tell you," Jesus introduces a divine law that is a development of the OT. Not only does actual murder place people under punishment of death; the heart inflamed with a destructive mental attitude, from which springs the damning word or act, merits the same judgment. God's judgment on sin is radical and far-reaching. It not merely covers the accomplished deed; it exposes the motive behind it. Sins of thought and tongue are on the same level as physical murder.

ῥαντίζω (rhantizō), sprinkle (4822); ῥαντισμός (rhantismos), sprinkling (4823).

CL & OT rhantizō is rare in cl. Gk. and infrequent in the LXX. It is distinguished from niptō, to rinse part of a body (→ 3782); louō, wash the whole body (→ 3374); and baptō/baptizō, immerse (→ 966). Gk. lit. attests sprinkling for religious cleansing.

Oil mixed with the blood of sacrifice was sprinkled on Aaron and his sons to consecrate them (Exod. 29:21), but sprinkling was primarily for cleansing, whether by the blood of sacrifice or by water. On the Day of Atonement the sanctuary and its sacred objects were cleansed by sprinkling the blood of a bull and of a goat offered as sin offerings (Lev. 16:11–19). The sprinkling of the Israelites with the "blood of the covenant" at the making of the Sinai covenant (Exod. 24:8) had a different purpose, namely, to bring Israel into a unity of fellowship with Yahweh and to seal the covenant.

Sprinkling was performed esp. for cleansing from defilement incurred through contact with leprosy (Lev. 14:6–7, 51) and with the dead (Num. 19:9–21). In Ps. 51:7 the ceremony of cleansing of the leper and his house provides the inspiration for the symbolic language of a divine inner cleansing by sprinkling. As a leper was cleansed by blood sprinkled from a sprig of hyssop and by water, so the self-confessed sinner seeks spiritual cleansing from God. In Ezek. 36:25 sprinkling with water symbolizes an eschatological cleansing of God's people in the end times, which is tantamount to a new creation.

NT The book of Heb. frequently recalls the OT sprinkling with sacrificial blood in order to show the superior power of Christ's blood to cleanse (e.g., 9:13–14, 18–28). In 10:22 cleansing by sprinkling (presumably of Christ's sacrificial blood) is parallel with washing with pure water. The cleansing power of Christ's sacrifice is known in baptism, even as the believer becomes one with Christ in his dying and rising (cf. Rom. 6:1–10).

The noun rhantismos, sprinkling, has not been found outside the Bible. Its occurrence in Heb. 12:24 is instructive, for though it is set in parallelism with Abel's blood, the latter was not sprinkled. The phrase "sprinkled blood" was therefore a current expression. In contrast to the cry of Abel's blood for vengeance (Gen. 4:10), the sprinkled blood of Christ assures forgiveness.

ῥέω (rheō), flow, stream (4835); ῥύσις (rhysis), a flowing river, stream (4868); παραρρέω (pararreō), flow past, drift away, let slip (4184).

CL & OT 1. This word group commonly refers to the flow of a stream or river, but it is also applied to the run-off from melted snow, the "running" of milk and honey (equivalent to prosperity), or, with respect to blood, a hemorrhage. In addition, a city or area may stream with people or gold. Solid objects liquefy and "melt away." Thus it is not surprising that this word group takes on the meaning of fall, drop off (e.g., of hair or ripe fruit).

2. The LXX reflects an equally wide variety of usage. These words are most often applied to the promised land as flowing with milk and honey (Exod. 3:8; 13:5; Lev.

20:24; Num. 14:8; Deut. 6:3) or to some discharge or hemorrhage (esp. in Lev. 15). Water flowed from the smitten rock (Ps. 78:20; 105:41).

The word group was also used in connection with the descent of precipitation at the divine command (Job 36:28; 38:30; Ps. 147:18 = LXX 147:7; Prov. 3:20), the falling of tears (Jer. 9:18), and wafting of perfume by the wind (Song 4:16). Joel uses rheō 2x to refer to the flow of water and milk from Judah's hills when the Spirit of the Lord is poured out and blessings abound (3:18). Zech. uses the vb. more ominously by picturing flesh decaying and eyes "rotting out" of their sockets, fitting retribution for those who war against Jerusalem (14:12). The disappearance of hope among ungrateful people is likened to the flowing away of water and the melting of hoar frost (Wis. 16:29).

NT rheō occurs only once in the NT: "Streams of living water will flow from within" the believer (Jn. 7:38). Here believers are viewed as channels for the outflowing of the Spirit to others (cf. 15:26–27). The 3 NT occurrences of rhysis all occur in connection with the "flow of blood" = "bleeding" (Mk. 5:25 = Lk. 8:43–44), endured by a woman for twelve years. The compound pararreō (lit., "flow past") is used fig. in Heb. 2:1 with reference to "what we have heard [i.e., the gospel], so that we do not drift away."

ῥῆμα (rhēma), word, utterance, thing, matter, event, case (4839).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. rhēma means that which is stated intentionally: a word, an utterance. In Plato rhēma denotes an individual word but also a sentence. In grammar rhēma means a vb. as distinct from a noun.

2. In the LXX rhēma usually translates Heb. dābār, word, thing, which is chiefly rendered by logos (word, → 3364). rhēma is used mostly in prophetic books, though it is found 147x in the Pentateuch as well as in other historical books. The double meaning of dābār as word or thing has colored the use of rhēma, which can mean both word, utterance as well as matter, event.

(a) rhēma, word, utterance, is often synonymous with logos (cf. the alternation of both words in Exod. 34:27–28; 2 Sam. 14:20–21). Frequently rhēma relates to a word from God: a single utterance (Exod. 19:6), a command (Deut. 4:1), the creative word (8:3), or a directive oracle (1 Sam. 3:1). The pl. occasionally denotes the commandments in general (Deut. 28:58), the Ten Commandments (Exod. 34:1), and the teachings of wisdom (Sir. 39:6; Wis. 6:25). rhēma, word, can also be used for the process of inspiration (e.g., Num. 23:5, 16, where God puts the word into the mouth of the pagan Balaam) and in the phrase "the word of the LORD came to ..." (e.g., 1 Sam. 15:10; 1 Ki. 17:2, 8), but logos is mainly used for this in the historical books.

(b) rhēma, thing, matter, is more specifically defined by the context as an action (Gen. 22:16; Deut. 15:10; 23:10 = LXX 23:9), legal case (Exod. 18:26; Deut. 1:17), event (4:32), or thought (15:9). The narrative portions of the Pentateuch sometimes use rhēma in the construction "after these things" (e.g., Gen. 15:1; 22:1).

NT In the NT the term rhēma occurs 68x. It usually means word rather than matter, esp. because the NT does not have much legal material. Whereas logos often designates the Christian proclamation as a whole in the NT, rhēma usually relates to individual words and utterances: e.g., we will have to render account for every unjust word we speak (Matt. 12:36); Jesus answered Pilate without a single word (27:14).

1. For Lk. a basic principle is: "Nothing [lit., not a thing] is impossible with God" (Lk. 1:37; cf. rhēma in Gen. 18:14); he may have understood rhēma as the word of promise, which never remains unfulfilled (cf. Lk. 2:29). The Christmas message (2:17), proclaimed by an angel, is God's word, to which one bows in trust and obedience and the realization of which one lives to see (2:15, 19). The preaching of John the Baptist makes this clear. Whereas prophecy was extinct for the rabbis, Lk. applies a typical OT formula to John ("the word of God came to John," 3:2; cf. 7:26–27).

In this sense even the words of Jesus are designated by the noun rhēma in Lk. Anyone who believes and obeys him and, like Peter, throws out the net in response to his word sees its fulfillment (Lk. 5:5–8). True, Jesus' word is not always immediately understood (2:50), esp. predictions of his suffering (18:34), but later realization awakes the memory and discloses the connection between word and event (24:8; Acts 11:16).

2. In Acts the pl. rhēmata relates to Stephen's critique of law and temple, condemned as blasphemous (6:11, 13), and positively to the apostolic witness of the Christ event proclaimed in the speeches (2:14; 5:20; 10:22, 44; cf. 26:25). The individual events of the Christ event are also denoted as rhēmata (5:32; 13:42).

3. In Jn.'s Gospel the unity of Jesus' word and God's word is expressly established: Jesus speaks "the words of God" (Jn. 3:34; cf. 8:47; 14:10; 17:8); his words are spirit and life (6:63), i.e., they are inspired and give eternal life (6:68) to those who accept them (17:8) and who keep them in themselves (15:7). The divine authority of these words rests on the sending of Jesus (3:34), esp. on his sonship (3:35; 17:8).

4. In the NT letters, this equation of Jesus' words and God's word is matched by the correlation between gospel and OT prophecy (Rom. 1:2–4). What was said in Deut. 30:12–14 concerning the rhēma of the Torah points to the message of justification through Christ: it is, for the believer, the word that is near and that saves (Rom. 10:8). But like the song of praise of the spheres, this word is carried into the furthest corners of the earth (10:18; cf. Ps. 19:4). Paul can designate the glad tidings of the gospel as the rhēma of Christ (Rom. 10:17). Peter also identifies the gospel and the OT by relating Isa. 40:8 ("the word of the Lord stands forever") to the gospel (1 Pet. 1:24–25; cf. also 2 Pet. 3:2; Jude 17).

5. As to the meaning of thing or matter, rhēma appears in Lk. 2:15, 19 for the Christmas events. Several times the NT refers to the legal provision of Deut. 19:15, whereby a legal matter (rhēma) is to be binding on the basis of the evidence of two or three witnesses. Whereas in Matt. 18:16 this provision is impressed on the church as a community rule and is applied by Paul to his judicial decisions in community affairs (2 Cor. 13:1), John relates it to proclamation as witnessed by Jesus and God (Jn. 8:17).

ῥύομαι (rhyomai), rescue, deliver, preserve, save (4861).

CL & OT 1. (a) rhyomai is a mid. dep. vb. found in cl. Gk. and in inscriptions and papyri. It is used of deliverance by both the gods and humans. Such deliverance extends not only to individuals in battle, but to various dangers and afflictions, even to protection of property.

(b) On the human level the vb. is applied to the action of princes in delivering cities and countries as well as women and children. It can even be used of inanimate objects. Thus, walls, helmets, and armor are said to protect. On the other hand, Odysseus cannot save his comrades who have destroyed themselves by sin, and there are cases where not even the gods can save.

2. In the LXX rhyomai translates mostly various forms of nāṣal, to rescue, deliver (90x). It is used 12x to translate gā'al, redeem, buy back, deliver (→ lyō, 3395) as well as several other vbs. with the same general nuance. There appear to be two main groups of passages: those that correspond to cl. Gk. usage, except that Yahweh fulfils the role that in Gk. lit. is ascribed to the gods, and a distinctive OT usage.

(a) The psalmists sing of divine deliverance from persecutors (Ps. 7:1), wicked neighbors (34:4), and evil men (43:1); from murder (18:29), the sword (22:20), death, and famine (33:19); from sin and its consequences (39:8; 40:13). But the Torah, prophetic, historical, and wisdom writings celebrate Yahweh's deliverance of his people both as a whole (Exod. 6:6; 14:30; Isa. 36:15; Ezek. 13:21, 23) and as individuals (2 Sam. 22:18, 44, 49; Job 5:20; 22:30). Sometimes this is related to the specific saving acts of God, esp. the exodus (Exod. 6:6; 14:30) and the settlement in Canaan (Jdg. 8:34).

The OT, like cl. Gk. lit., knows of human deliverers. But these people act in the name and power of Yahweh. Thus Moses saved the daughters of the priest of Midian (Exod. 2:17, 19), and Gideon is called a savior of Israel (Jdg. 9:17). The king saves Israel (2 Sam. 19:9). It is the task of the judge to deliver (Ps. 82:4). In Sir. 40:24 a brother or companion may be a savior.

(b) A distinctive OT emphasis occurs in passages where a theocentric understanding replaces the anthropocentric understanding of secular Gk. Deliverance is no longer determined by the laws of being that obtain for both gods and humans but by the sustaining word of Yahweh, for whom the deliverance of the people is part of salvation history. He delivers according to his mercies (Neh. 9:28) and his name's sake (Ps. 79:9). In the later part of Isa. Yahweh is celebrated as the one who delivers his people from bondage—his name is "our Redeemer" (63:16; cf. 44:6; 47:4).

Deliverance in the OT has nothing magical about it. Because it has to do with historical situations, it occurs in history. However, deliverance comes in Yahweh's good time. Such deliverance is often linked to faith on the part of the people: "In you our fathers put their trust; they trusted and you delivered them" (Ps. 22:4). Unbelief amounts to a denial that the Lord can save (Isa. 36:14–20; Wis. 2:18). But he delivers those who fear him and hope in his steadfast love (Ps. 33:18–19; Ezek. 14:20), who consider the poor (Ps. 41; cf. Sir. 40:24), and who, out of an individual awareness of guilt, offer a heartfelt cry for deliverance from transgression (Ps. 39:8; 40:13; 79:9). Salvation is grounded in Yahweh's mercy (31:1; 71:2; 86:13).

NT 1. The vb. occurs only 15x in the NT, seven of which are in quotations or allusions to the OT; in each case God is the deliverer. The taunt of the bystanders at the crucifixion echoes Ps. 22:8: "He trusts in God. Let God rescue him now if he wants him, for he said, 'I am the Son of God'" (Matt. 27:43). The mockers take the sufferings of Jesus and the failure of God to deliver him as conclusive disproof of his claims. But Matt. sees the allusion to Ps. 22:8 as proof of a deeper working of God. Although God does not deliver Jesus from death in the way that might have been expected, he delivers him in a deeper sense in the resurrection. The song of Zechariah in Lk. 1:74 sees the promised deliverance from the hand of Israel's enemies to serve God without fear as a fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham (cf. Gen. 22:16–17).

In dealing with the question of whether God has finally rejected Israel (Rom. 9–11), Paul argues that the present hardening is merely a temporary element of God's purpose and that Isa. 59:20–21 has yet to be fulfilled: "So all Israel will be saved, as it is written: 'The deliverer will come from Zion; he will turn godlessness away from Jacob'" (Rom. 11:26; cf. also Ps. 14:7).

Paul uses rhyomai 3x in his account of his afflictions in Asia, expressing language that recalls the psalmist's praise of Yahweh's deliverance from death: "He has delivered us from such a deadly peril, and he will deliver us. On him we have set our hope that he will continue to deliver us" (2 Cor. 1:10). Paul may be alluding here to the riot in Ephesus (Acts 19:23–40), to a serious illness (cf. 2 Cor. 12:7), or even to a more serious danger in Asia not recorded in Acts 19.

As to other uses of the vb. in Paul, his prayer to be "delivered from wicked and evil men" (2 Thess. 3:2) recalls OT language (cf. Ps. 140:1; Isa. 25:4). In view of 1 Thess. 2:15–16, this may refer to opposition from the Jews (cf. Acts 17:5–15). OT language is again found in 2 Tim. 3:11, where Paul refers to his sufferings at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra (cf. Acts 13:14–14:20; 16:1–5), from which "the Lord rescued me." In 2 Tim. 4:17–18 Paul presumably describes a preliminary hearing of his case at Rome. Although friends of a defendant often appeared in court to give support, no one stood by Paul. "But the Lord stood at my side and . . . I was delivered [rhyomai] from the lion's mouth. The Lord will rescue [rhyomai] me from evil attack." Paul's situation recalls Dan. 6:20 and Ps. 22:21, but doubtless refers also to the Roman practice of exposing criminals to wild beasts in the arena. Paul's expectation of future deliverance looks forward to deliverance through death and whatever terrifying circumstances may attend it.

Peter in 2 Pet. 2:9 uses several OT stories to illustrate the exhortation: "The Lord knows how to rescue godly men from trials." The examples he cites are Noah and the flood (2:5; cf. Gen. 6:1–8:22), and the judgment on Sodom and Gomorrah (6; cf. Gen. 19:24) and the rescue of Lot (2 Pet. 2:7; cf. Gen. 19:16, 29). In each case the righteous are saved from a judgment that befalls the ungodly; this is both an encouragement and a warning.

2. Only once is rhyomai used with a clear reference to the deliverance that believers have already experienced: "He has rescued us from the dominion of darkness and brought us into the kingdom of the Son he loves" (Col. 1:13; cf. Eph. 2:5–8, where sozō, save, 5392, is used). Paul may be alluding to baptism, esp. if we look at baptism in the light of the cross and the Christian experience of life in Christ (Col. 2:12–15; 3:1–4). In 1:14 this deliverance is related to redemption (apolytrōsis; → lytron, ransom price, 3389) and the forgiveness of sins.

3. There has been considerable debate on the interpretation of Rom. 7:24, esp. on the question of whose cry this is: a redeemed person, an unredeemed person, or even a redeemed person looking back at the time when he or she was not redeemed: "What a wretched man I am! Who will rescue me from this body of death?" This person is subject to death because of sin (5:12, 21; 6:23). The answer to the question is given in 7:25: "Thanks be to God—through Jesus Christ our Lord! So then, I myself in my mind am a slave to God's law, but in the sinful nature a slave to the law of sin." The believer's life in this world remains one of conflict. The answer is further developed in ch. 8. What the law was powerless to do God has done by sending his Son to fully meet God's law and by giving us the Spirit, who comes to live in us.

4. The Lord's Prayer contains the petition: "But deliver [rhyomai] us from the evil one" (Matt. 6:13). Jesus instructs us to pray for release from the power that dominates this age and constantly threatens us. But there is also an eschatological note: the thought of eternal salvation as the goal of deliverance (cf. also Rom. 11:26; 1 Thess. 1:10). The latter passage expresses our Christian hope as waiting for God's "Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead—Jesus, who rescues [rhyomai] us from the coming wrath."

CL & OT In cl. Gk. rhypos is used of literal dirt, liquid and solid. rhyparos and rhyparia carry both lit. and fig. meanings; with rhypainō the fig. meaning, to mess up (one's life and character), seems primary. rhypos appears 2x in the LXX for lit. dirt (Job 9:31; 11:15) and 2x for defilement before God (14:4; Isa. 4:4). rhyparos is used in Zech. 3:4–5 of dirty clothes.

NT rhypos occurs once, of physical dirt (1 Pet. 3:21); rhyparia once, of moral filthiness (Jas. 1:21). rhyparos is used 2x, once of dirty clothing (2:2) and once of a morally unclean person (Rev. 22:11). rhypainō appears in 22:11, where the meaning is "let him who is vile [rhyparos] continue to be vile [rhypainō]."

σάββατον (sabbaton), Sabbath (4879); σαββατισμός (sabbatismos), Sabbath-rest (4878).

OT 1. sabbaton transliterates the Heb. šabbāt. It is found in the sing. and the pl. (sabbata) for a single Sabbath day. Presumably the word derives from the Heb. vb. šābat, to cease, pause (cf. Gen. 2:2–3, where this vb. is used for God's resting on the seventh day; cf. also Exod. 20:8–11). There seems to be no difference in meaning between the sing. and pl. forms of the Gk. equivalent in the LXX.

2. The Sabbath is mentioned in numerous parts of the law (e.g., Exod. 20:8–11; 23:12; 31:12–17; 35:1–3; Lev. 23:1–3). No other commandment is so strongly emphasized, showing its great importance in Israel's history. It carried the death penalty for infringement (Exod. 31:14; cf. 35:3; Num. 15:32–36). The rite of circumcision was performed on the Sabbath if it fell on the eighth day after the boy's birth (Lev. 12:3; cf. Jn. 7:22). The special day may go back to a pre-Mosaic period and have been known to the Israelites when they were in Egypt or even earlier.

Sabbath observance is strongly emphasized in both versions of the Decalogue, though in a slightly different form and with a different reason suggested. In Exod. 20:8–11, its observance is based on the seven days of creation in Gen. 1:1–2:3. After creating humankind, God blessed the seventh day and set it apart as holy. In Deut. 5:12–15, observance is linked with redemption from bondage in Egypt. God's people had been slaves there, but God mightily delivered them; thus, the day was to be kept holy. In both cases the Sabbath was established for the benefit of humanity and for calling to one's mind the fact that we owe everything to God. The emphasis on resting from labor shows that its main purpose was the cessation of ordinary work for one day in seven. In Exod. 31:17 the Sabbath is a covenant sign between God and Israel.

Lev. 23:1–3 includes the Sabbath in the feasts of the Lord, which were commemorative days set apart so that Israel might spend time in meditation on different aspects of God's good hand over the nation. Included in their observance were sacred assemblies, public acts of worship. Both for the individual and the community the Sabbath was thus to be a day of public worship as well as an opportunity for a joyful observance of the day in the home. This was so in preexilic times (Isa. 1:13; Hos. 2:11; Amos 8:5). It was also a suitable time for consulting a prophet (2 Ki. 4:23).

On the Sabbath special sacrifices were offered (Num. 28:9), and with them the renewal of the Bread of the Presence (Lev. 24:8), thus linking Sabbath with the official ritual of tabernacle and temple. It seems special Sabbath psalms were also appointed (cf. the title of Ps. 92). The insistence on laying aside work, even in the busiest times of plowing and harvest (Exod. 34:21), and the infliction of the death penalty for its breach (31:14; Num. 15:32) show the supreme importance attached to this command in the life of Israel. Yet the Sabbath was to be regarded not as a burden, but as a delight, "the LORD's holy day" (Isa. 58:13). Special blessings were attached to its observance (56:2).

After the exile, in the disordered state of the nation, one naturally finds a reemphasis on this day in Nehemiah's reforms (Neh. 10:32; 13:15–22).

3. During the intertestamental period Jud. gradually began to divide into two types. In Palestine and Mesopotamia a more legal attitude emerged, while in other parts of the Diaspora a more liberal attitude prevailed. Both sections insisted on the observance of Sabbath as a divine institution and regarded it, with circumcision, as one of the signs of the covenant. Synagogue worship on the Sabbath was a regular feature of both types.

Hel. circles took a more mystical and spiritual attitude to the Sabbath. Philo insisted that it should be dedicated to the study of the spiritual. On that day the slave became a free person. With the translation of the OT into Gk., although the Heb. word itself was transliterated in Gk., its meaning was given as anapausis (rest, → 398).

Palestinian Jud. tended toward a more lit. and rigid attitude. Traditions of how it was to be observed began to crystallize. Even the rescue of an animal from death on the Sabbath was forbidden at Qumran (CD 10:14–11:18). To protect it from Gentile influences, a stereotyped code of what could or could not be done on the Sabbath came into existence (→ Jub. 2:17–33). These traditions later became codified in the Mishnah tractate Shabbat. Yet even here, under certain circumstances the Sabbath law could be superseded. These included the service of the priests in the temple, the saving of life in emergency, and circumcision on the eighth day.

In spite of these burdensome regulations the Sabbath was welcomed with joy. It was to be celebrated at home as rest and refreshment, corporately in public worship. On the day before the Sabbath, the day of preparation (paraskeuē; → kataskeuazō, prepare, 2941), everything was to be made ready and the lamps lit, since the Sabbath commenced at sunset. A meal extra to the normal two was added and the best clothes worn. Guests were often invited (cf. Mk. 14:3).

NT 1. The Gospels. The Palestinian attitude to Sabbath observance is clear in the Gospels. One of Christ's conflicts with the Jews, mentioned in all four Gospels, centers on what was or was not permissible on the Sabbath. All but one of these involves healing on the Sabbath day. The exception is when the disciples plucked the ears of grain as they passed through a field.

Was Jesus abrogating the day of rest or merely challenging the restrictions that the rabbis had imposed for the Sabbath? Let us examine the six recorded confrontations of Jesus with the Jews over the Sabbath question. (a) Matt. 12:1–8 (Mk. 2:23–28; Lk. 6:1–5) relates the incident of the plucking of ears of grain on the Sabbath day. According to the Pharisees, this was breaking the law. Jesus claims, however, that as was the case with David and his men (cf. 1 Sam. 21:1–6), human need overrides ritual law (cf. Exod. 23:12; Deut. 5:14). The law itself is not challenged, but Jesus claims an overriding factor.

(b) Matt. 12:9–14 (Mk. 3:1–6; Lk. 6:6–11) describes Jesus' healing of the man with a withered hand. Before healing him, Jesus asks the Jewish leaders whether it is lawful on the Sabbath day "to do good or to do evil, to save life or to kill?" (Mk. 3:4). Again, Jesus does not challenge the law itself; in fact the wording assumes its relevance. The right use of the law, the healing of the whole person, is the object behind that law, and thus the healing is justified.

(c) Lk. 13:10–17 relates the story of a woman bent over with infirmity. She comes into the synagogue, and Jesus restores her on the Sabbath, which rouses the anger of the synagogue ruler. Jesus' response includes two points. What he did was an act of mercy such as the leaders would have allowed to an animal. It was also the destruction of a work of Satan. There is no hint that the principle of a day of rest is being questioned, but merely the proper use of the day.

(d) In Lk. 14:1–6 Jesus again opens the discussion by asking the Pharisees whether it is right to heal on the Sabbath day or not. They offer no reply. This is an esp. important incident, since the question is addressed to experts in the law. Jesus proceeds to heal a man suffering from dropsy and then explains that healing the sick is in fact just as much an act of mercy as pulling an animal out of a well. The fact that the experts offer no reply suggests that they agree that Jesus is not challenging the Sabbath law.

(e) In Jn. 5:1–9, 16–17; 7:22 Jesus chooses the Sabbath day to heal a man crippled for 38 years, telling him to take up his bed and walk. When the Jews persecute Jesus for this, he replies, "My Father is always at his work to this very day, and I, too, am working" (5:16). That is, Jesus is continuing the work the Father has been doing all the while. He is not annulling the Sabbath here, for he goes on to stress how the law of circumcision overrides the law of the Sabbath. Had he been annulling the Sabbath law, he would not have argued in this way. Moreover, "to this very day" suggest that while the Sabbath command was in force, God in fact kept working. In other words, the Sabbath command does not mean to do nothing, but to do the work of God. This was what Christ was doing in healing the infirm man.

(f) In the case of the man born blind (Jn. 9), Christ does not defend his action. But in the initial answer to the disciples' question in 9:2, Christ claims the Sabbath healing was "that the work of God might be made displayed in his life" (9:3).

(g) We should also note Lk. 4:16, where Lk. notes that Jesus attended the synagogue "as was his custom." That is, Jesus followed the ordinary habits of Jewish worship on the Sabbath day, a pattern evident in his boyhood (2:22, 41). It may be significant that at his trial (e.g., Matt. 26:57–68; Jn. 18:12–24), there is no mention of his annulling of the Sabbath law.

(h) Christ's statement that his followers should pray, in view of the coming destruction of Jerusalem, that their flight not occur in the winter or on the Sabbath, implies that he foresees his followers continuing to observe the Sabbath but that it will be hard to get help or buy what is needed on a Sabbath day in the vicinity of Jerusalem (Matt. 24:20).

(i) In Mk. 2:27–28 we find Christ's positive statement about the Sabbath. He insists that the Sabbath was made for humanity's good, probably an indirect reference to Gen. 2:2–3. If so, the Sabbath ordinance was not merely for Israel, but had a pre-Israelite, worldwide, humanitarian implication. Moreover, Jesus is "Lord even of the Sabbath." In other words, he has the authority to decide about its observance. Far from suggesting that it is to be annulled, this saying suggests that the manner of its observance is under the control of Christ himself.

2. Acts. The decrees of the Jerusalem Council in Acts 15 make no mention of the Sabbath. This presumably was not a point of contention between Jewish and Gentile Christians. On his missionary journeys Paul seized every opportunity to preach in the synagogues on the Sabbath day (13:5, 14, 42–44; 14:1; 16:13; 17:2, 16; 18:4; 19:8). Yet we also find him meeting with the Christians on the first day of the week (20:7; cf. 1 Cor. 16:2; → kyriakos, Lord's day, 3258).

3. The NT letters. Three significant passages in Paul's letters explore the Christian attitude toward the Sabbath. (a) Rom. 14:5–6 has no direct reference to the Sabbath but touches on this theme. It deals with the weak Christian, one who still is influenced by the letter of the law. In the case of days, instead of thinking of one day as being esp. sacred, the strong Christian considers all days as God's days, to be lived to God. No day in itself has any special sanctity.

(b) In Gal. 4:10 Paul addresses Gentile converts who, after their conversion, were turning to a scrupulous observance of Jewish ritual, special days, new moons, and feasts, i.e., taking on themselves the Jewish law. Paul will not countenance a reversal to Jewish practices for Gentile Christians.

(c) In Col. 2:16 Paul argues that the legal demands of the Jewish law have been cancelled in Christ's death (2:14); thus, Jewish food regulations and religious days are not binding on the Christian. Included in this ritual is the Jewish Sabbath. These observances, Paul claims, point to a spiritual reality fulfilled in Christ.

(d) Heb. 4:9 is unique in passages on the Sabbath: "There remains, then, a Sabbath-rest [sabbatismos] for the people of God." Here the rest typified by the Sabbath is seen as the rest of the heart, provided in Christ (cf. Matt. 11:28)—to be realized partially now and fully in the life to come.

4. Theological insights. Just as God's rest after creation included the idea of the Sabbath day each week, the rest of the heart remaining to God's people includes the foretaste of the final rest in the weekly rest day. We have seen that the Sabbath concept includes both a national aspect as part of the covenant relationship with the Jews and a universal aspect as a spiritual and humanitarian benefit for humankind as a whole. The end of the Sabbath, as a sign of the covenant with Israel, does not necessarily mean the abolition of the concept of a weekly day of rest. Mk. 2:27 suggests that such an outward enjoyment of a Sabbath rest was an integral part of the inward heart rest, of which the Sabbath under the old covenant had been a shadow. The fact that an analogous day for Christians, the Lord's Day, had already come into being suggests that this is the right solution of the problem.

Σαδδουκαῖος (Saddoukaios), Sadducee (4881).

NT 1. This noun is not found in cl. Gk. or the LXX. In the NT it is always found in the pl. (Saddoukaioi). It designates a group or party within Palestinian Jud. before and during the 1st cent. Usually it is assumed that the term goes back to the name Zadok (LXX Saddouk), the name of several priests, one as early as David's reign (2 Sam. 15:24–36; 17:15; 19:11), who gained control of the high priesthood and temple under Solomon (1 Ki. 2:35; 1 Chr. 29:22; cf. also the "descendants of Zadok" in Ezek. 44:15). However, this identification is by no means certain.

2. In fact, information about the Sadducees with any claim to authenticity is found only in Josephus, the NT, and the Mishnah. (Talmudic references to the Sadducees are late, confused, and unreliable.) (a) Josephus first mentions the Sadducees in connection with the reign of John Hyrcanus (135–105 B.C.), but he assumes that they were a well-established group by that time. They were rude in their conduct, few in number, and held the confidence of the wealthy alone. Josephus usually refers to the Sadducees in the context of their continued controversy with the Pharisees. The Sadducees rejected the oral law and did not believe in continued existence, bodily resurrection, rewards and punishments after death, or predestination.

(b) In the NT, Matt. 3:7–10 and 16:1–12 name the Sadducees along with the Pharisees as leaders of the Jewish people rebuked by both John the Baptist and Jesus. In Mk. 12:18–27 the Sadducees, "who say there is no resurrection," present Jesus with a situation that they believe makes the resurrection look ridiculous. Jesus, however, silences them with an argument based on the written law.

Acts places the Sadducees among the opponents of the early Christians. In 4:1 they are associated with, but distinguished from, the priests; in 5:17, the high priest and his associates are specifically identified as "the party of the Sadducees." In 4:2 the opponents of the Christians were "greatly disturbed because the apostles were teaching the people and proclaiming in Jesus the resurrection from the dead," while 23:6–9 describes an uproar in the Jewish Council when Paul, perceiving the presence of both Sadducees and Pharisees, identifies himself with the latter. Lk. explains, "The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, and that there are neither angels nor spirits, but the Pharisees acknowledge them all" (23:8).

(c) References to the Sadducees in the Mishnah describe them almost entirely in terms of their differences with the Pharisees on ritual, ceremonial, and judicial matters. These issues relate to such matters as the date and observance of certain feasts, Sabbath-keeping, the way sacrifices were to be offered and temple ritual performed, the conduct and penalties in criminal cases, and procedures relating to ceremonial defilement and cleanliness.

3. In sum, the Sadducees came into existence during the intertestamental period, probably assuming their definitive stance after the Hasmonean priest-rulers gained firm control. They were closely associated with the priestly aristocracy and hence deeply involved in politics. Like the priests, the Sadducees seem to have given at least some support to foreign influences (Hellenism) and powers (the Romans) present in Jewish Palestine in order to maintain their own position.

Their religious and theological views resulted from a conservative, lit. handling of the OT law. The Sadducees were bitter opponents of the Pharisees, for whom oral tradition attempted to interpret, update, and apply the written law in the face of changing circumstances. The Sadducees maintained their own traditions and hermeneutical methods that accepted only the written law (i.e., the Pentateuch) as authoritative. Hence they refused the mass of postbiblical developments associated with Pharisaism, including belief in the imminence of divine activity and life after death. The Sadducees were essentially secularists. This doubtless resulted from their exclusion of God from human history and their limitation of humanity's existence and blessing to this life.

Political motives stirred the Sadducees to oppose Jesus and the Jewish church. Jesus' preaching and public ministry posed a threat to the political status quo and the dominance of the priestly party within it (cf. Jn. 11:47–50). His emphasis on the spiritual realm, his attacks on the external religion of Jewry, and the popular acceptance accorded him and his followers endangered their already precarious position. To make matters worse, Christianity was in agreement with much in the position of the Sadducees' enemies, the Pharisees. Still, the Sadducees found one emphasis of Christian doctrine even more objectionable than any Pharisaic teaching, namely, that the resurrection is a present reality accomplished in Jesus (cf. Acts 4:2).

σαλεύω (saleuō), shake, cause to waver or totter, unsettle, drive away (4888); σάλος (salos), rolling or tossing motion (4893); ἀσάλευτος (asaleutos), unshakable, firm, enduring (810).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. saleuō means to rock, vibrate (sea, ground), loosen (tooth, nail), roll, toss (of ships in stormy seas); fig. it means to be in distress, be unstable, shake

(because of sickness or age). Hence, life in the world beyond is asaleutos, not subject to trouble or disturbance. asaleutos also refers to the calmness of the sea, or fig. of the mind. salos means tossing motion, earthquake, rolling swell of the sea; perplexity, restlessness (political or personal).

2. In the LXX saleuō appears 77x, translating a variety of Heb. words. Frequently in Ps. it denotes the godly person who is not moved in the face of enemies (e.g., 15:5; 16:8; 112:6). salos occurs 8x and denotes a slipping of the feet (66:9), the tumult of the waves (89:9), the raging of the sea (Jon. 1:15), and a storm (Zech. 9:14). asaleutos occurs in Exod. 13:16; Deut. 6:8; 11:18 in reference to the immovability of the symbols that were to be worn on hands and forehead as a reminder of Yahweh and his Word. It is from these verses that the Jewish practice of wearing phylacteries arose (Matt. 23:5).

NT 1. saleuō is used of the shaking caused by wind and storm, as in the parable of the two men whose houses, built on sand and rock respectively, faced a violent storm with dramatically different consequences (Lk. 6:48). After the release of Peter and John from prison, the house where the Christians in Jerusalem had met to pray was shaken as in an earthquake as a sign of divine approval (Acts 4:31; cf. 2:2; also Exod. 19:18; Isa. 6:4; 2 Esd. 6:15–16, 29). At Philippi, the foundations of the prison were shaken by an earthquake (Acts 16:26). The swaying building perhaps unlatched the doors and momentarily opened up the rough mortar between the stones, thus causing the staples holding the prisoners' chains to fall out.

2. After answering messengers from John the Baptist, Jesus took occasion to speak about John's character and mission. A reed "swayed" by the wind (Matt. 11:7; Lk. 7:24) may be a collective sing., referring to the cane grass growing on the banks of the Jordan. People went to the desert not to gaze at the beauty of the cane grass being swayed about in the wind, but to look for a man with a message. This swaying cane grass may also be a metaphor for a fickle person, which John the Baptist was not. saleuō is also used fig. to express abundant giving, just as full volume is obtained by shaking together the contents of a grain measure (6:38); to be thoroughly unsettled in mind (2 Thess. 2:2); to incite a mob (Acts 17:13); and to shake out of a sense of security and happiness (Acts 2:25, quoting Ps. 16:8).

3. After the tribulation, the Son of Man's return will be accompanied by unmistakable cosmic portents. These are described in the Synoptic Gospels in the traditional terminology of Jewish apocalyptic, commonly used to symbolize political upheaval and the end of the world (Isa. 13:10; 34:4; Ezek. 32:7; Amos 8:9; 2 Esd. 13:1–13, 30–38). According to Matt. 24:29; Mk. 13:25; Lk. 21:26, the powers of the heavens—either the heavenly bodies or the forces that control them—will be shaken. This disruption of nature involves a tumult of the elements, so that the universe loses its equilibrium and becomes unhinged. This will signal the reappearance of the Son of Man.

4. The noun salos occurs only at Lk. 21:25, where the rolling swell of the sea is one of the eschatological signs that will distress the nations (cf. Hag. 2:6). The image of roaring waves often symbolizes turbulent conditions in the life of the nations (Ps. 65:7).

5. Lk. tells how, when the crew of Paul's storm-tossed ship ran the vessel ashore, the bow stuck fast in the mud and "would not move" (asaleutos, Acts 27:41). The only other use of asaleutos is in Heb. 12:28, where the writer says that the divine kingdom "cannot be shaken" and is thus eternal, in contrast to the fate of the material creation, however solid that has appeared in the past (12:26, quoting Hag. 2:6).

Σαλήμ (Salēm), Salem, seat of Melchizedek's rule (4889).

OT 1. Salem is associated from earliest times with Jerusalem. As a place name šālēm occurs only 2x in the OT: Gen. 14:18 and Ps. 76:2 (a poetic abbreviation of Jerusalem). In the mind of the psalmist, Salem is the dwelling place of God, parallel to Mount Zion. According to Josephus the priest-king Melchizedek renamed that city Jerusalem.

2. šālēm, a common OT cognate of šālôm ("wholeness, peace") bears the meaning peaceful in the MT in the sense of a covenant of peace among humans (Gen. 34:21). More frequently it signifies the concept of perfect devotion or blamelessness as a description of our spiritual relation to God (1 Ki. 8:61; 11:4; 15:3; 2 Chr. 16:9).

NT In the NT Salēm occurs only in Heb. 7:1–2. After identifying Melchizedek as "king of Salem" (cf. Gen. 14:18), the writer quickly unfolds the deeper spiritual meaning implicit in Melchizedek's royal title. To the eyes of faith the "king of Salem" is "king of peace" (→ eirēnē, 1645). Heb. reflects little interest in the geographical location of Salem. Rather, from the etymology of Salem the letter deduces a principal characteristic (i.e., peace) of the reign of the end-time priest-king.

σάλπιγξ (salpinx), trumpet, trumpet call (4894); σαλπίζω (salpizō), sound the trumpet, give a blast of the bugle (4895); σαλπιστής (salpistēs), trumpeter (4896).

CL & OT 1. In the ancient world the trumpet was used to give signals in war (e.g., to change guard, prepare for attack or retreat, or terrify or deceive the enemy). In times of peace it was used at trials, before prayer, by shepherds, in funeral or festal processions, and at athletic contests.

2. In the LXX the salpinx was sounded at burnt offerings and fellowship offerings (Num. 10:10; 2 Chr. 29:27–28), at feast times (Lev. 25:9), at royal coronations (2 Ki. 9:13), and at dedications (2 Chr. 5:12; Ezr. 3:10), as well as in war to mark the beginning of a battle (Job 39:24–25; 1 Macc. 9:12–13) or to warn of an invasion (Amos 3:6). Trumpets played an important part in the taking of Jericho (Jos. 6:4–21) and Gideon's defeat of the Midianites (Jdg. 7:18–22).

NT 1. Occurring 11x in the NT, salpinx denotes both the instrument itself (1 Cor. 14:8) and the sound it emits (15:52). salpizō occurs 12x, all but two (Matt. 6:2; 1 Cor. 15:52) in Rev. 8–11. salpistēs occurs only once.

2. (a) The injunction of Jesus not to "announce . . . with trumpets" the giving of alms (Matt. 6:2) prohibits ostentatious giving that is designed to gain human attention and praise (6:1–4). Jesus may be alluding to a practice (not elsewhere attested) of blowing a trumpet in the temple when alms were being collected for some special relief project or in the synagogue when notable gifts were given, to encourage other generous donations and to bring the donors to God's attention. But salpizō here may well be fig.

(b) Paul observes that only a distinct bugle blast rouses troops for battle. Similarly, only clear, intelligible communications should have a place in corporate worship (1 Cor. 14:8–9).

(c) Although the sound of a trumpet may be one of the concomitants of a theophany (Heb. 12:18–19), sometimes the authoritative and indescribable voice of God or Christ is itself said to sound "like a trumpet" (Rev. 1:10; 4:1). As in the OT, a trumpet call announces divine judgment (8:2–9:21; 11:15–19; cf. Joel 2:1–2; Zeph. 1:14–16), the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Thess. 4:16; cf. 2 Esd. 6:23–24), and the gathering of the elect from the four corners of the earth (Matt. 24:31; cf. Isa. 27:13).

(d) Only in Rev. 18:22 is there a reference to the trumpet as an instrument of music, played by trumpeters (salpistēs).

4899 (Samareia, Samaria), → 4901.

Σαμαρίτης (Samaritēs), Samaritan (4901); Σαμάρεια (Samareia), Samaria (4899).

OT 1. The Gk. word Samareia stands for the Heb. šôm^erôn and designates originally the capital city of the northern kingdom founded by Omri in 876 B.C. It later came to designate the area of the northern kingdom as an administrative unit of several successive empires. In the NT Samareia always denotes the territory of Samaria (e.g., Lk. 17:11; Jn. 4:4; Acts 1:8; 8:1; 9:31; 15:3). Samareitēs (first used in 2 Ki. 17:29; in the LXX only here; also Samaritēs), denotes the inhabitants of Samaria, both the city and the territory. In the NT Samaritēs applies only to the latter.

Samaritēs is both a geographical/ethnic term and a religious designation (cf. Ioudaios, Jew; → Israēl, Israel, 2702). The ethnic identity of the Samaritans is a point of dispute between the Jews and the Samaritans. The anti-Samaritan polemic of Jud. assumed a total deportation of the population of the northern kingdom. But the religious community centered on Shechem, or Mount Gerizim, saw itself as a religious group within Israel, standing in unbroken continuity with the northern tribes, esp. of Ephraim and Manasseh.

2. The origins of the Samaritan community lie in obscurity and are covered over by the mutual polemic of the Jews and Samaritans. The political and religious tension between the northern and southern tribes and between the northern and southern kingdoms doubtless forms part of the antecedents of the schism. But tracing it to the Assyrian colonization as recorded in Jewish polemics (based on 2 Ki. 17:24–41, which also influenced the Christian view of the Samaritans) is questionable. But neither can we accept the Samaritan attempt to date their origin as early as the time of Eli. Even the conflict between the Persian administration in Samaria, headed by the house of Sanballat, and the leaders of the restoration in Jerusalem (Nehemiah and Ezra) should be regarded as only one contribution to the growing alienation between Judea and Samaria (cf. Ezr. 4; Neh. 4; 13:28).

The most important single event in the history of the rise of the Samaritan community was probably the construction of the temple to Yahweh on Mount Gerizim towards the end of the 4th cent. B.C. According to Josephus, the initiative came from the priests who had been excluded from Jerusalem because their marriages had been rejected as mixed marriages. They were settled by Sanballat in Shechem. Permission to build the temple presumably was granted by Alexander the Great in gratitude for military support by Sanballat. In the mouth of Josephus this is a credible and historically plausible tradition, because the erection of a temple was in any case an act of state (cf. Ezr. 1:1–8).

This was not the only temple to Yahweh erected outside Jerusalem in the postexilic period (cf. the temple at Elephantine in Upper Egypt in the 5th cent. B.C.).

However, the Gerizim temple alone became a real challenge to the Jerusalem temple, since it represented a considerable political faction and because sooner or later the claims of Deut. about the sole, legitimate cultic center came to be related to it. It is entirely likely that the participants in the founding of the sanctuary saw the Gerizim temple as an act of restoration (cf. Jos. 24:2, esp. LXX), since Shechem and Gerizim had ancient Israelite traditions on their side (cf. Deut. 27:4).

The next conflict that opened up deep wounds and that was perhaps decisive for the ultimate schism arose through the opportunist policy of Shechem under Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–ca. 164 B.C.). Josephus reports that the Samaritans requested in 167/166 that their temple on Mount Gerizim be dedicated to Zeus Hellenios. They did not intend thereby to implement any change of cultic practice. Rather, they were suggesting that their own deities could also be identified with Gk. gods and worshiped under their names. As a result, the Samaritans escaped persecution, while in Judea the Maccabees and their followers resisted the policy of cultural and religious Hellenization at the price of their lives. Thus, it was only natural that the success of the Maccabean revolt led not only to the expansion of Judea (cf. 1 Macc. 10:38; 11:34, 57), but also to the destruction of the temple on Mount Gerizim by John Hyrcanus in 129/128.

Pompey ended Judean dominance over Samaria in 63 B.C. This explains the good relations of the Samaritans to the Romans, which lasted until A.D. 67, and to the house of Herod, which was closely tied to Rome. This was interrupted only by a bloodbath precipitated by Pontius Pilate, which cost him his office, and a trial for breach of peace in A.D. 52, when the Samaritans, who were supported by the procurator Cumanus, came into violent conflict with the Jews. Following the trial in Rome, the leading Samaritans were executed and Cumanus banished.

NT 1. Samaria and the Samaritans occur in various places in the NT. Within the framework of the commissioning of the disciples, Matt. 10:5–6 contain the saying peculiar to Matt.: "Do not go among the Gentiles or enter any town of the Samaritans. Go rather to the lost sheep of Israel." The parallelism between "the Samaritans" with "the Gentiles" and their juxtaposition with "Israel" show unmistakably that the Samaritans are not recognized as Israelites here. The saying is closely linked to 15:24, where Jesus says to the Canaanite woman: "I was sent only to the lost sheep of Israel." Matt. 10:5–6 is not to be understood as a purely geographical limitation of the mission of the disciples to Galilee; rather, "Israel" indicates that all members of the people of Israel are included, wherever they live. In the light of this, it is questionable whether "town of the Samaritans" here means the province of Samaria. Rather, a distinction must be drawn between the journey through the province of Samaria and specific entry into a Samaritan town or village (cf. Jn. 4:5).

Historically Matt. 10:5–6 stands in connection with the conception of a mission solely to Israel (cf. also 10:23). But we should not understand the negations of 10:5 as directed against a Samaritan or Gentile mission that was beginning at the time this Gospel was being written, in view of the fact that the charge was clearly directed to the Twelve in 10:5–6. Their role, after all, was related to the twelve tribes of Israel even after Pentecost (cf. 19:28; Gal. 2:7–10).

2. (a) The narrative in Lk. 9:51–56 fits perfectly into our picture of the mutual attitudes of the Jews and Samaritans of the 1st cent. A.D. The reaction of James and John, the sons of Zebedee (9:54), takes up the Elijah tradition of 2 Ki. 10:10–14 and recalls the judgment on the people of Sodom (Gen. 19; cf. Lk. 10:12). The astonishing feeling of power of the two disciples is perhaps to be understood as an anticipation of 10:17–20. Jesus' rebuke (9:55) serves as a repudiation of false notions of the character of his messianic way (9:51, 53; cf. Matt. 16:22–23) and the apostolic commission (cf. Lk. 10:3–16).

(b) The parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk. 10:30–37) is a Lukan amplification of the pericope on the two great commandments (10:25–28), giving an illustration in the form of a narrative and expounding Lev. 19:18. The introductory question to the parable ("And who is my neighbor?") stands in tension with the point of the parable drawn out in Lk. 10:36–37 ("'Which of these three do you think was a neighbor to the man who fell into the hands of robbers?' The expert in the law replied, 'The one who had mercy on him.' Jesus told him, 'Go and do likewise'").

The fact that the positive figure in the narrative is a Samaritan serves to detach the love command from all previous relationships with a person in need. In the context of the priest and Levite (cf. Jn. 1:19), it contains an element of criticism of official Jud. (cf. 4:1–45). Attention is not drawn to any particular qualities of the Samaritan.

(c) The description of the grateful Samaritan in Lk. 17:11–19 as a "foreigner" can in itself be intended in an unpolemical way: "Was no one found to return and give praise to God except this foreigner?" (17:18). For the Samaritans could occasionally describe themselves as being an independent nation. Jewish polemics referred to an independent Samaritan nation by stressing their alleged non-Israelite origin. Another possible background for calling the Samaritans a foreign people is the use of Deut. 32:21 in anti-Samaritan polemics (cf. Sir. 50:25–26).

The intention of Lk. 17:11–19 is comparable not only with 10:30–37 but also with Matt. 8:5–13 (par. Lk. 7:1–10), where a heathen puts the whole of Israel to shame with his faith. In such a text the later way of mission (cf. Acts 8; 10–11) is anticipated in paradigmatic cases in the pre-Easter history of Jesus (cf. Jn. 4:1–42).

3. (a) Acts 1:8 contains the promise and commission: "But you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth." The fact that "Samaria" in 1:8 is attached to "Judea" without repetition of the preposition and article in the Gk. makes the phrase "in all Judea and Samaria" appear to be a single concept and not the designation of two consecutive stages in the history of the mission. This corresponds to the common administration of Judea and Samaria by a Roman procurator from A.D. 6 on.

(b) Acts 9:31 concludes the account of Paul's conversion and first preaching with the statement: "Then the church throughout Judea, Galilee and Samaria enjoyed a time of peace. It was strengthened; and encouraged by the Holy Spirit, it grew in numbers." The mention of Galilee between Judea and Samaria does not conflict with the above interpretation, for in 1:8 and 8:1 Galilee was probably included in the notion of Judea, which would correspond to the religious orientation of Galilee around Jerusalem. From a geographical standpoint the statement in 1:8 has therefore three parts: Jerusalem, the land of Israel, and finally the whole world are to be the scene of the disciples' testimony.

(c) In order to understand the account of Philip's missionary success in Samaria (Acts 8:4–25), we must grasp the geographical aspect. One immediate question is which "city in Samaria" (8:5) Philip went to. The logical possibilities would be the former capital Sebaste, Neapolis, or Sychar (cf. Jn. 4:5, where the same expression is used of the latter). The reference to Simon the sorcerer suggests not a Roman city in Samaria but some town in the middle of the province, for Philip goes to a place where Simon's power dominates the religious scene (cf. Acts 8:10).

4. (a) Jn. 4:1–42 is one of the prominent references to the Samaritans in the NT. Sychar (4:5) was "near the plot of ground Jacob had given to his son Joseph" (cf. Gen. 48:22). Here was located a spring or well (Jn. 4:6, 11–12), one not mentioned in the OT. The sole tradition about a well associated with Jacob's name is found in Gen. 29:2–10, where the place is given as Haran. But the Jewish haggadah (commentary on nonlegal OT passages) compressed this tradition into the picture of a single miraculous spring that "accompanied" both the patriarchs and Moses on their wanderings (cf. 1 Cor. 10:4). The Samaritan concentration of the most diverse patriarchal traditions on Shechem and its environment (cf. Jn. 4:20) led logically to the local tradition of the well of Jacob.

The woman's amazement and Jn.'s explanatory comment (Jn. 4:9) refer to Jesus' request for water, which indicates a kind of meal fellowship. This is distinguished from the Pharisaic conception, according to which the vessels of the Samaritans were considered unclean and could not be used by the Jews. The symbolism of the living water (4:10–15) does not relate to the once-and-for-all reception of the Spirit (cf. 7:37–39), but rather to the continued working of the words of Jesus (cf. 6:63). The allusion to the life of the Samaritan woman in the course of the conversation (4:16–19) focuses on Jesus' special gift of seeing inside a person (cf. 2:25) and elicits a corresponding confession about his being a prophet (cf. 1:49; 4:19).

Allegiance to Mount Gerizim as the sole legitimate place of worship was the distinctive point of the Samaritan creed. The way in which the Samaritan woman introduces the theme (Jn. 4:20) is an excellent expression of the Samaritan standpoint: The age-old Israelite practice is set in opposition to the Jewish claims in favor of Jerusalem. According to Samaritan tradition, a long chain of important biblical figures from Adam to Joseph knew and recognized Gerizim as a holy place. Jesus' position on the problem of the right cultic center (4:21–24) exhibits different lines of thought. The essentially futuristic pronouncements of 4:21 and 23–24 relativize the question of place in favor of stressing the dimension of Spirit and truth in which God will be worshiped. In 4:22, however, Jesus speaks in the present and clearly adopts the Jewish standpoint and thus condemns the Samaritan one.

Jesus' comment that "salvation is from the Jews" (Jn. 4:22) fits into the context of the chapter (cf. 4:9 and 42) and of the entire Gospel (cf. 1:11; 4:43–44; 12:37–41). Jesus is a Jew, and Judea is his actual domain; it is this reality that gives his conflict with the Jews its particular sharpness. Yet an evident concern of Jn. is to present the Spirit as the decisive power of the new age inaugurated by Jesus (cf. 1:32–33; 3:3–8; 6:63; 20:22).

The reproach in Jn. 4:22 ("You Samaritans worship what you do not know") recalls Acts 17:23 and fits in well with the tendency in Jud. to place the Samaritans on the same level as the Gentiles on cultic questions. This was particularly pronounced in the 1st cent. A.D., esp. in light of the Samaritan request to Antiochus Epiphanes to represent their sanctuary on Mount Gerizim as dedicated to Zeus. The Maccabees and the Hasidim, of course, understood these maneuvers of Samaritan politics as a desertion of Yahweh into Gk. religion.

The woman's testimony to belief in the coming Messiah (Jn. 4:25) relates to the Jewish expectation of salvation, endorsed by Jesus in 4:22. The idea of a Messiah is lacking in Samaritan texts; to their ears it was probably too closely tied to the ideal of the Davidic king. The openness of the woman to a Messiah should probably be understood as the consequence of the impression made on her by Jesus' prophetic knowledge (4:19). This line is continued in her receptivity to his messianic claims (4:29; cf. 4:26).

The present wording of Jn. 4:25–26 hardly provides a basis for the frequently expressed opinion that Jesus is here shown as the fulfillment of a Samaritan messianic expectation. The Samaritans did indeed expect that their Taheb (coming one, restorer, who was an eschatological figure) would reveal truth. But in its context (and in contrast to 4:25) this is not to be understood in terms of proclamation, but as the realization of the divinely willed state of affairs (cf. 2 Esd. 6:27–28), in particular the restoration of worship on Mount Gerizim. Furthermore, the dating of the Taheb expectation is disputed. Note too that the beginnings of Samaritan eschatology lie in obscurity. Thus, Jn. 4:25c should probably be understood from the context of the Fourth Gospel as the expression of a Christology that gives strong prominence to the element of proclamation and teaching as the mission of Jesus (e.g., 1:18; 6:68; 18:37).

The final confession of the Samaritans in Jn. 4:42 ("We no longer believe just because of what you said; now we have heard for ourselves, and we know that this man really is the Savior of the world.") cannot be demonstrated as the expression of contemporary Samaritan theology. The title "Savior of the world" is a synonym for the title of Messiah or Christ. It is in Jn. that the office of Savior is applied to the whole world for the first time (cf. 4:14). This extension is probably connected with the Johannine preexistence Christology, which binds the Messiah closely with the concept of God and at the same time allots him a cosmological function (cf. 1:1–18).

(b) In Jn. 8:48, in the context of a violent controversy, the Jews put to Jesus the question: "Aren't we right in saying that you are a Samaritan and demon-possessed?" Jesus' reply gives an explicit answer only to the second part of the question: "I am not possessed by a demon ... but I honor my Father, and you dishonor me" (8:49). Both the question and Jesus' answer have been variously understood. Two main lines of thought may be noted. (i) For most exegetes (the more likely interpretation) the two halves of the question in 8:48 are materially related or even mean the same thing, so that the answer in 8:49 reflects the fact that Samaria was considered to be a demon-possessed land. (ii) Other scholars stress the difference between the two halves of the question in 8:48 and Jesus' refusal to address the accusation of being a Samaritan in 8:49.

σάρξ (sarx), flesh (4922); σάρκινος (sarkinos), consisting of flesh, fleshly (4921); σαρκικός (sarkikos), after the manner of the flesh, belonging to the domain of the flesh, fleshly (4920); κρέας (kreas), flesh, meat (3200).

CL sarx (in Homer nearly always in the pl.) means the flesh of a human as distinct from his or her bones, sinew, etc. From Hesiod on it also denotes the flesh of an animal, and in a wider development (also now in the sing.) the flesh of fishes and small animals, as well as of fruits. The body (sōma) consists of bones, blood, sinews, flesh, and skin. Occasionally sarx denotes the entire physical body.

Transitoriness is a particularly characteristic mark of sarx. When vital energy (psychē, soul) and desire (thymos) pass away, flesh and bones disappear. Unlike human and animals, the gods have no sarx, but are nous (mind), epistēmē (insight), and logos (word, reason). In this vein a person's imperishable nature is increasingly contrasted with perishable flesh. Our flesh dies and is buried, but our real being lives on.

According to Epicurus, the start and root of all good is well-being, the hēdonē (desire) of the belly. When flesh cries out, "Do not hunger, do not freeze, do not thirst," the soul heeds this reminder. Since the dianoia (understanding) knows the end and the limit of the sarx, Epicurus certainly does not invite people to a life of luxury; on the contrary, he invites them to an utterly controlled and temperate life. For not only present but also future hēdonē is essential to good fortune.

These ideas were caricatured by Platonists in a form that depicted Epicureans as favoring evil desires. To them, the cravings and lusts of the body defile the soul, which has a share in the divine. Epicurus was obliged to defend himself against the imputation of approving appetite, bodily desire, fornication, and intemperance. This anti-Epicurean polemic was widely spread in Hellenism and penetrated deeply into Jud.

OT The most frequent Heb. equivalent of sarx is bāśār (though bāśār is also rendered by kreas, denoting mostly flesh as an item of food). sarx has a wider meaning. It can even denote humanity (Isa. 40:5–6).

1. (a) bāśār denotes flesh as food for people (e.g., Gen. 41:2; Num. 11:33; 1 Sam. 2:13, 15). Flesh ("meat") and wine are food for good times (Dan. 10:3).

(b) Likewise, bāśār denotes human flesh. God took one of the ribs of the first man and closed up its place with flesh (Gen. 2:21). Daniel and his friends remained, in spite of a reduced diet, (lit.) "fatter in flesh" and therefore in good bodily condition (Dan. 1:15). Ezek. 37:6, 8 mentions together sinews, flesh, skin, and spirit, and Job 10:11 refers to skin, flesh, bones, and sinews. In a specific sense the penis is called the naked flesh (Exod. 28:42) or the flesh of the foreskin (Gen. 17:11–25; Lev. 12:3).

(c) bāśār can also denote the human body in its entirety, specifying the part for the whole. When in deep sleep a word from Yahweh is heard, the hair of the flesh stands up (Job 4:15). The flesh is, however, not merely the body but the whole person: "O God, you are my God, earnestly I seek you; my soul thirsts for you, my body [lit., flesh] longs for you" (Ps. 63:1). Here the flesh denotes one's self. In Job 19:25–26 one possible explanation is that Job is hoping for vindication after death while existing in some physical form.

(d) The self does not stand alone, however. A relative is "my own flesh and blood" (Gen. 29:14). Joseph's brothers admit that he is "our own flesh" (37:27). Still more comprehensively all flesh means all humankind (see Job 34:15) or everyone (Isa. 66:23). Finally, the phrase can include humanity and the animal world, as in Gen. 6:17–19; 9:11–12.

(e) From the foregoing the anthropological differences between the OT and Gk. lit. are clear. In the OT flesh denotes the human as a whole. According to the Gk. conception, however, a human has flesh but is not flesh.

The same distinction shows itself in the understanding of transitoriness. In the OT the flesh denotes a person in his or her transitoriness as one who suffers sickness, death, fright, etc. Thus Isa. says: "All men [flesh] are like grass, and all their glory is like the flowers of the field. The grass withers and the flowers fall" (40:6–7). Sennacherib's Assyrian horde is called "the arm of flesh," which is puny compared with God (2 Chr. 32:8). God "remembered that they [Israel] were but flesh, a passing breeze that does not return," so he forgave their iniquity (Ps. 78:38–39). One should not depend "on flesh for his strength" but on the Lord (Jer. 17:5).

2. šᵉʾēr (another Heb. word translated by sarx in the LXX) means flesh to eat (Exod. 2:10; Ps. 78:20, 27), human flesh (Jer. 51:35; Mic. 3:2–3), or a blood relative (Lev. 18:6; 20:19; 25:49; Num. 27:11).

3. Jud. in its various forms closely connected one's carnality with one's sin, but without identifying flesh as the actual cause of sin. It referred to OT statements that describe dependence on the flesh not merely as folly but also as sin (Isa. 31:3). "All flesh" is humankind, and to strive after evil is inherent in a human being (Gen. 8:21).

(a) Some of the Qumran teachings about inherent evil in a human fully accord with the OT (cf. Ps. 51:5). But elsewhere in their writings, humans are seen as belonging to the community of wickedness because they are mere flesh. The counterpart to flesh is not, however, spirit. For side by side with the spirit of holiness is found the spirit of wickedness and of the flesh. It is always God or his justifying righteousness that stands over against the flesh.

(b) Rab. usage evidences two characteristic departures from the OT. Humanity in its transitoriness is now called "flesh and blood." Even more important is the frequent replacement of the OT bāśār by gûp. Behind this doubtless stands a new anthropological conception of the body as a vessel that at any time can be possessed by a different spirit. In this way the body is not devalued, since in the final judgment God will fetch the soul, place it in the body, and judge the two together. But the body no longer denotes a human being as a whole. A Hel. oriental influence is to be found here.

(c) Hel. Jud. showed its peculiarity in two characteristic alterations made in the LXX as compared with the MT. In Ezek. 10:12 it does not speak of the flesh of the cherubim, and in Num. 16:22; 27:16 it translates the Heb. phrase "God of the spirits of all flesh" by "God of the spirits and of all flesh." Elsewhere, the appraisal of flesh is also quite different. According to 1 Enoch 17:6 (Gk. text), Hades is the place where no flesh goes, and according to L.A.E. 43:4 and 2 Esd. 7:78, 100, the soul in death detaches itself from the body. But in Apoc. El. 5:32 (which probably dates from the 2d or 3d cent. A.D.), physical flesh is discarded and a spiritual flesh is put on.

(d) Philo's works include statements inclining in the direction of cosmological dualism. For him God is a being without flesh or body. For the human soul the body (i.e., the flesh) is a burden or a coffin. Freedom from the flesh through asceticism is thus important, for otherwise the soul is hampered in its upward flight. Guilt begins with the soul's steadfast continuance in the flesh.

NT Just as in 1st-cent. Jud., the different authors of the NT vary in their appraisal of the flesh. The division can be shown statistically: 91 of the 147x of sarx are found in the Paul's writings, above all in Rom. and Gal. The adjectives sarkikos (7x) and sarkinos (4x) also occur primarily in Rom. and 1 and 2 Cor. kreas occurs in the NT only 2x in Paul in the sense of flesh as a food item. Note that the NIV uses a wide variety of expressions to translate sarx: e.g., "flesh" (33x), "sinful nature" (23x), "body" (20x), "human" (3x), "people" (3x), and "sinful man" (3x). For the most part we will use the word flesh in this article.

1. Paul uses sarx so frequently that only the most essential passages for its understanding can be discussed.

(a) As mere flesh (of people, animals, birds, fishes), sarx occurs only in 1 Cor. 15:39. Occasionally it denotes the human body (as in 2 Cor. 12:7, a thorn in the flesh probably means sickness; Gal. 4:13–14, illness of the flesh, probably again sickness). But sarx can also denote humanity generally. According to 2 Cor. 7:5, (lit.) "our flesh" (i.e., we) had no rest because there were fightings without and fears within (about the stability of the Corinthian church). In marriage the flesh suffers troubles (1 Cor. 7:28), because now it is the last time and persecutions threaten (7:29–31). When Paul says that before he began to preach the gospel he did not confer with flesh and blood

(Gal. 1:16), he means he did not confer with other people. If flesh and blood will not inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15:50), it means that, according to OT anthropology (Prov. 5:11), in death the whole self must disappear and a new sōma come into existence (→ 5393).

(b) sarx also denotes relationships that have a temporary significance. Thus according to the flesh, Jesus is a son of David (Rom. 1:3), but only from the resurrection onward is his divine sonship declared by the Spirit of holiness (1:4). "Israel after the flesh" (lit., 1 Cor. 10:18) is the nation descended from Abraham (Rom. 4:1; cf. 11:14). From him Paul's kinsmen according to the flesh are descended (9:3), and from his descendants comes the Messiah (9:5, 8). sarx also means common humanity in Phlm. 16. Paul uses "all flesh" for "humankind" only in the fundamental expression of his theology: "No one [lit., no flesh] may boast before [God]" (1 Cor. 1:29).

(c) sarx is used not only to indicate physical kinship; it can be used also generally in reference to what is human. Thus "the wise after the flesh" (lit.) are the wise according to human standards (1 Cor. 1:16; cf. 2:6, "wisdom of this age"). The weapons Paul uses in his campaign are no longer of human invention, but are made effectual by God (2 Cor. 10:3–4). In contrast to him stand those who wish to make themselves agreeable to the church by human means (Gal. 6:12), so that in human ways they can glory in the circumcision of a Christian church (6:13). Paul might have every reason to glory in descent, circumcision, and zeal for the law. But that would be to have confidence in a human reckoning (the flesh), which does not count with God (Phil. 3:3–4). With God only the righteousness of Christ, received by faith, is of any consequence (3:8–11).

(d) This leads to the use of the phrase kata sarka, according to the flesh. Even though Paul lived as a man "in the flesh," he did not carry on his fight in the light of human standards (2 Cor. 10:2–3; cf. 1:17). This principle applies even to seemingly "religious" matters. To glory in visions is as foolish as to glory in circumcision (11:18), and even Jesus Christ himself must be seen with new eyes rather than simply in accordance with old pre-Christian expectations and values (5:16).

Similarly, Christians are no longer in the grip of the self-centered, self-justifying standards of secular humanity. They do "not live according to the sinful nature (kata sarka) but according to the Spirit (kata pneuma)" (Rom. 8:4). Therefore, the new life in the Spirit is paralleled by a renunciation in principle of human efforts at self-justification.

(e) The flesh, i.e., one's existence apart from God, has therefore a drive that is opposed to God. It not only occasions sin but also becomes entangled in it. Accordingly, Paul can draw up a catalogue of vices that he characterizes as "acts of the sinful nature [sarx]" or "the desires of the sinful nature [sarx]" (Gal. 5:16, 19; cf. Rom. 13:14). Above all, in Gal. 5:17 Paul is able to say, "The sinful nature [sarx] desires what is contrary to the Spirit, and the Spirit what is contrary to the sinful nature. They are in conflict with each other, so that you do not do what you want." This is not the flesh of the anti-Epicurean polemic, but the human self, insofar as it gives itself to aims in opposition to God.

Hence, the law also is weak through the flesh, because it can be used by the flesh as a means of self-assertion against God (Rom. 8:3). Therefore, God sent his Son in the likeness of a human being (sarx) determined by sin so that in this most God-like of all humans he might bring sin into judgment and thus achieve righteousness. Consequently, believers are already dead in respect to the ambitions and drives that mold life apart from God. In this sense they are no longer in the flesh (8:9), for they now live according to God's life. They desire to achieve what is good, i.e., true life. However, the problem is that they achieve instead the evil that they do not desire (i.e., death), because they do not allow God to care for them. Paul writes, "So then, I myself in my mind (nous) am a slave to God's law, but in the sinful nature [sarx] a slave to the law of sin" (7:25b). Although Paul adopts here a typically Gk. manner of speaking, his understanding is completely different. Even the nous, the rational power of mental comprehension, is unable to find out what is good, since the true meaning of life remains hidden from it by sin.

(f) On the one hand, Paul can say that believers no longer live in the flesh (Rom. 7:5; 8:8–9; Gal. 5:24). But on the other hand, as a believer, Paul still lives in the flesh (2 Cor. 10:3; Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:22–24). The contradiction is resolved in 1:22–24. To be in the flesh is for Paul something that has been so vanquished that for him it makes no difference whether he lives or dies. Life is to exist in and for Christ. Even death, as departure and being with Christ, is much better. But for the sake of the future of God's kingdom it is more important for him to remain in the flesh.

In the combination "body of the flesh" Col. seems to show Hel. influence. sarx is here the material of which the body (sōma) is composed (Col. 1:22; 2:11). Hence, "the uncircumcision of the sarx" in 2:13 means the time before the putting off in baptism of the body of the flesh (2:11). sarx is not corporality but understanding oneself as flesh. Its meaning is shown in 2:18. "The mind of the flesh" ("unspiritual mind") is preoccupied with angelic powers to whom as sarx the human race appears to be in subjection. But believers hold fast to the Head (2:19), in whom the whole fullness of Deity dwells bodily (2:9). Thus, living in the flesh, they are not in subjection to these powers, but in the flesh they already share in the life of Christ (1:24).

Eph. pursues a related idea. In its desires the flesh is open to the powers and influences of this world, which themselves are not flesh and blood (2:2–3; 6:12). In 2:11–12 sarx appears as that which is temporary. The wall of partition that existed between circumcision in the flesh and uncircumcision in the flesh Jesus broke down by his death in the flesh, thus abolishing the law of commandments and ordinances.

Flesh in 1 Tim. 3:16 (presumably an early creedal formulary) means human, physical life: Jesus "appeared in a body."

2. (a) The non-Pauline uses of sarx are, as might be expected, quite different. From the OT heritage comes Matt. 16:17, where flesh and blood, i.e., humans, are contrasted with God. The same holds good for Acts 2:31 (cf. Ps. 16:10). Christ was not left in Hades and his flesh did not see corruption, for here "flesh," being parallel to Christ, stands for the whole person. In Lk. 24:39 the risen Jesus makes it known that he is not a spirit because he has flesh and bones. The saying in Mk. 14:38 that "the spirit is willing, but the sarx is weak" is not an OT quotation, but is perhaps inspired by Num. 27:16; Isa. 31:3. In 2 Pet. 2:10 (cf. also Jude 7) there is the more Heb. thought, that one should not in any way hanker after the flesh, because such hankering brings defilement.

In the same way 1 Pet. 2:11 speaks of the fleshly (sarkikos) desires that wage war against the soul. Christ has suffered in his flesh. Only those who suffer in the flesh in the same spirit as Christ are free from sin (4:1–3) and escape the depravities of the flesh (4:4–5). Christ was indeed put to death in the flesh but was made alive in the spirit (3:18). Accordingly, one interpretation of 4:6 declares that the gospel was preached to the dead so that like all human beings in the flesh, they might receive their sentence. In their case, since they were already dead, this has already come about. But behind this is the intention that they might live according to God's will in the spirit. Hence baptism also serves not for cleansing the flesh, but for cleansing the spirit in a good conscience (3:21).

Alternate interpretations of 1 Pet. 4:6 suggest that it refers to the proclamation of the gospel by the preincarnate Christ to people in OT times, which may also be related to 3:20. Or perhaps it refers simply to those in the present age who have received the gospel and since died. The verse would then mean that, although they share the common destiny of sinful humankind in death, nevertheless they live now in the spirit.

Heb. makes use of sarx as the human nature that Christ assumed. Christ for a while was made lower than the angels and so shared in flesh and blood (2:14). These were "the days of his flesh" (lit., 5:7). Through his flesh he made for us a way into the heavenly sanctuary; the sphere of flesh is the curtain that separates us from it, and by death Jesus passed through it (10:20). He cleanses the conscience and not merely the flesh, as the offerings of rams and bulls did (9:13–14). The "external regulations" (lit., "regulations for the flesh," 9:10) are therefore statutes only for the purification of the flesh.

sarkinos (Heb. 7:16) refers to the physical descent of the Levitical priesthood in contrast to the priesthood of Melchizedek and Christ.

sarx mia (Matt. 19:5b) has a special significance as the translation of the Heb. bāśār ʾeḥād (one flesh) of Gen. 2:24. The union of man and woman creates a new relationship. "One flesh" does not in the first instance mean sexual intercourse, although it includes it. It signifies primarily the coming into being of a unitary existence, a complete partnership of man and woman that cannot be broken without damage to the partners in it, a partnership toward which husband and wife should strive. This is the meaning of marriage granted by God (19:6).

(b) In many respects, Jn. appears to stand near to the OT. He speaks of all flesh in the OT sense (Jn. 17:2). The declaration that people should not judge Jesus according to the flesh (8:15; cf. "by mere appearances" in 7:24) is in accord with Matt. 16:17. One should judge him not by his human circumstances but by his mission, for that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit (3:6). That which is born of the flesh comes from itself or the world, but that which is born of the Spirit is a completely new humanity insofar as it comes from God (1:13). It is not surprising, then, that the flesh profits nothing; it is the spirit indeed that gives life (6:63). We cannot comprehend Jesus on a merely human level, but we may do so by receiving his words, which are spirit and life.

Alongside all this, there is another fact for Jn.: The Word, which was theos and was in the beginning with God, became flesh (1:14). The entry of the Word as flesh among all flesh reveals how estranged flesh is from the Word and so from true life, which it does not have. Jn. 6:51–58 should be understood against this background. Those who eat the flesh of the Revealer not only confess that only the coming of the Word in the flesh can redeem them; they also confess that there is nothing in the flesh (i.e., the world) to help. In receiving the incarnate Word they are in the world but not of the world.

In 1–3 Jn. the confession that Jesus is come in the flesh separates belief from unbelief (1 Jn. 4:2; 2 Jn. 7). Jn.'s opponents no longer wished to associate the Revealer with the flesh they had rejected. Jn., however, asserts the historicity of the incarnation.

3. Since the meaning of sarx varies radically from context to context, we will draw here a brief summary of this concept in the Bible. (a) In some contexts, esp. in the OT, sarx emphasizes human creatureliness and frailty—i.e., people as a whole are fallible and vulnerable. The biblical writers draw at least four distinct lessons from this basic datum. (i) They warn against any false hope and consequent disillusionment brought about by putting undue confidence and trust in such fallible and frail creatures. (ii) They also call attention to a person's creatureliness before God and distance from him in his otherness and transcendence. (iii) In at least one passage one's very weakness is a ground of God's loving compassion and restraining patience (Ps. 78:38–39). (iv) In times of oppression or persecution, the believer is encouraged not to fear an enemy who is mere flesh.

(b) In other contexts sarx is used simply to denote the physical part of a human and does not offer an evaluation of a person as a whole. (i) Especially in Johannine thought this relates to the incarnation: "The Word became flesh" (Jn. 1:14). (ii) Similarly the physical nature of sarx has positive significance in terms of the bodily obedience of the Christian. Here Paul's use of flesh overlaps with that of sōma, body (2 Cor. 4:10). Believers still live "in" the flesh (en sarki) but not "according to" the flesh (2 Cor. 10:3).

(c) To assess a truth or a phenomenon "in accordance with the flesh" is to reach a verdict on the basis of purely human, external, or natural considerations. It is an assessment that leaves spiritual dimensions out of account.

(d) A quite different use of sarx appears in the major theological passages of Paul, such as Rom. 8:5–8. Here the mental outlook of the flesh is hostile to God. It is the outlook orientated toward the sinful self, that which pursues its own ends in self-sufficient independence of God. At the same time, sarx admittedly also characterizes a human being as a sinner in one's rejection of the law. Moreover, in at least two passages Paul outlines the close relationship between flesh and death (8:13; Gal. 6:8). Here death is the inevitable fruit that grows out of a fleshly way of living.

Σάρρα (Sarra), Sarah (4925).

OT This is the personal name of the wife of Abraham and mother of Isaac. In Gen. 17:15 her name is changed from Sarai to Sarah, and all subsequent references conform to this. The name is generally understood to mean princess, but there may be a connection with the Heb. root śārâ (to strive), the root underlying the name Israel.

In the Gen. traditions Sarah emerges as the beautiful wife who is all but lost to a foreign ruler (12:10–20; 20:1–18), the resolute adversary of Hagar and her offspring (16:1–14; 21:8–21), and the mother of Isaac (18:1–15; 21:1–7). All three stories are part of a narrative complex that traces the somewhat tortuous course by which the promise of 12:1–3 moved towards fulfillment. To later Jews Sarah was to be appreciated, along with Abraham, as the rock from which Israel was hewn (Isa. 51:2).

NT Sarah has a place in two important Pauline arguments. In his theology of justification her barrenness is the context in which Abraham's justifying faith is demonstrated (Rom. 4:19). In addition, the conception of Isaac as the heir of promise over against Ishmael is cited as evidence of the free sovereignty of God's electing purpose (9:9; cf. also the argument of Gal. 4:21–31).

The authors of Heb. and 1 Pet. treat Sarah as a model of faith and submission. Her faith is one that accepts the unseen as real and takes nothing to be impossible (Heb. 11:11). In 1 Pet. 3:6 her obedient attitude to her husband establishes the pattern that Christian wives should follow.

σβέννυμι (sbennymi), quench, extinguish, quell (4931).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. sbennymi means to extinguish by drowning with water, as opposed to smothering; also, to allay or subdue. When applied to liquids, it means to dry up, evaporate. In the pass. the word is occasionally used of people becoming extinct, while in medical lit. it describes the disappearance of inflammation.

2. In the LXX this word has its normal lit. meaning of extinguish, quench (e.g., Lev. 6:5–6 = LXX 6:12–13; 2 Sam. 14:7; 2 Ki. 22:17; Isa. 1:31; 34:10; Amos 5:6), though a metaphorical usage occurs in Song 8:7 (the quenching of love) and 4 Macc. 3:17 (the quenching of passion).

NT sbennymi is used in the NT in both a lit. sense (Matt. 12:20; 25:8; Mk. 9:48; Eph. 6:16; Heb. 11:34) and a metaphorical sense (1 Thess. 5:19). In Eph. 6:16 believers are urged to shield themselves behind an all-embracing faith so they can deflect and extinguish the evil temptations that would sear and consume the personality. The shield in this armor of faith is the old wooden scutum of the Romans, which protected most of the body. Its leather covering soaked in water effectively stopped and extinguished darts dipped in pitch, which were used as fiery missiles.

In 1 Thess. 5:19 Paul warns the church against quenching the Spirit, whose advent was marked by fiery tongues (Acts 2:3), by living in a manner contrary to Christ's will. This verse does not apply specifically to quenching speaking in tongues but to refusing to allow the exercise of any of the Spirit's gifts within the community, all of which have been given to build up the church (cf. 1 Cor. 12:7; 14:26).

The expression in Matt. 12:19–20 that the Messiah will not cry out, break a bruised reed, or "snuff out" a smoldering wick is part of a quotation from Isa. 42, which occurs in the context of the application of the servant song of 42:1–4 to Jesus (Matt. 12:15–21). In refusing to argue with the Pharisees or to allow his messiahship to be openly asserted, Jesus does not wrangle or cry aloud. Rather, his goal is to nurture the fragile faith and hope of people through announcing the arrival of his universal rule.

The description of punishment in Mk. 9:48 ("their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched") comes from Isa. 66:24. This seems to be an early description of eternal punishment (cf. also Jdt. 16:17; Sir. 7:17). The picture is taken from the Valley of Hinnom (→ geenna, hell, 1147), where human sacrifice had been offered during the monarchy (2 Ki. 23:10; Jer. 7:31; 32:35). Later this area became Jerusalem's rubbish dump, and unclean corpses that could not be buried were burned there.

The mention of the heroes of old who by faith "quenched the fury of the flames" (Heb. 11:34) is probably an allusion to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who were delivered from the fiery furnace after they refused to worship Nebuchadnezzar's golden image (Dan. 3). The readers of this letter might themselves soon face a fiery ordeal.

4934 (sebasma, object of religious reverence, holy thing, sanctuary), → 4936.

σέβω (sebō), to reverence, shrink back in fear, worship (4936); σεβάζομαι (sebazomai), show religious reverence, worship (4933); σέβασμα (sebasma), object of religious reverence, holy thing, sanctuary (4934); εὐσεβέω (eusebeō), reverence, be devout (2355); εὐσέβεια (eusebeia), devoutness, piety, fear of God, religion (2354); εὐσεβής (eusebēs), God-fearing, devout, pious (2356); εὐσεβῶς (eusebōs), godly, in a godly manner (2357); θεοσέβεια (theosebeia), fear of God, reverence for God, devoutness (2537); θεοσεβής (theosebēs), devout, God-fearing (2538); ἀσέβεια (asebeia), impiety, godlessness (813); ἀσεβής (asebēs), godless, impious (815); σεμνός (semnos), honorable, worthy of reverence, venerable, holy (4948); σεμνότης (semnotēs), honorableness, dignity, holiness (4949).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the root seb- meant originally to step back from someone or something, maintain a distance. From this spatial meaning developed the metaphorical idea of trepidation ranging from shame, through wonder, to something approaching fear. This attitude is evoked by that which is sublime and majestic or by the risk of failure. The word theosebeia, which conveys the restricted idea of one's attitude towards deities, is essentially the same as eusebeia. sebasma is an object of religious reverence, an idol; in the pl. it often means the cult.

Words deriving from this stem frequently convey the idea of devoutness, although this attitude does not entail—as it does in the Bible—a committed obedience to a single, personally conceived God. Those worthy of reverence are above all the members of one's own family (including one's ancestors), the gods, and the laws ordained by them. In religious usage there is an easy transition to the reverence of the cult. eusebeia is one of the virtues of one who is righteous and acceptable to the gods. Later this basic idea of seb- fades, and sebō can assume the meaning to bless or congratulate.

(b) The negative asebeia likewise has an ethical and religious content. Because of the close connection between the ordinances of the Gk. city-state and the worship of the gods, the asebēs is often named side by side with the adikos (wicked); want of reverence for the gods and neglect of cultic obligations were considered antisocial. In the case of a someone who was a misfit in the community, adikia was that aspect of his (immoral) behavior that was against the ordinances, while asebeia described the aspect that was against the gods. In Greece the worship of the gods declined more and more in favor of a philosophical ideal and an ethical-moral attitude. That is, a philosopher could actually be an atheist (atheotēs) while still being eusebēs, and Christians also were described in this way because they did not reverence the old gods.

(c) semnos and semnotēs denote that which is sublime, majestic, holy, evoking reverence. The difference between these words and the seb- words is that they contain a stronger aesthetic element; thus a royal throne, an ornament, or sublime music can be so described. The adj. and the noun often denote the majesty of deity, but sometimes also the solemnity, serious purpose, and grandeur of a human.

2. (a) These ideas and words rarely appear in the LXX, since the basis of OT piety differs from that of Gks. The Creator God lays claim to a person's service in thought, word, and deed; he requires active obedience, not merely devout trepidation to which lip-service is paid just on fixed occasions in cultic homage or in the sphere of intellectual rhetoric. This active obedience, together with worship, is the characteristic feature of the fear of God (→ phobos, 5832), which is essentially the OT idea of piety. Thus, in the few cases where eusebeia and its cognates are used, it usually renders words from the Heb. root yārē', to fear.

(b) Only in the wisdom lit. and in the Apocr. (esp. 4 Macc.) do eusebeia and its related words occur more frequently—an indication of Hel. influence. The same is true of the semnos word group. This adj. describes that which is sublime, holy, and thus worthy of God; in contrast with hagios (holy), therefore, the aesthetic element predominates.

(c) The LXX uses the negative compound asebēs, impious, synonymously with adikos, unrighteous, unjust, wicked, and describes both an individual action and a general human attitude of departing from God. An human injustice is at the same time an offense against God and his commandments. Thus asebeia and adikia stand close to hamartia (sin, 281); social order and social justice are inseparable from worship.

NT 1. This word group is found rarely in the NT. Apart from the OT quotation in Mk. 7:7 par. Matt. 15:9 (= Isa. 29:13 LXX), sebō occurs only in Acts, usually in its adjectival form as a technical term to denote the Gk. adherents of Jud. (→ prosēlytos, 4670). In Acts 17:23 and 2 Thess. 2:4 sebasma is the heathen object of worship. sebazomai appears only in Rom. 1:25, where it means to show religious reverence. The vb. eusebeō (2x), the adj. eusebēs (3x), the adv. eusebōs (2x), and the noun eusebeia (15x) are, apart from 4x in Acts, confined to the Pastorals and 2 Pet.

Like hosios (holy), which frequently stands alongside dikaios (righteousness), eusebēs and eusebeia denote a moral attitude in the Gk.-speaking world. Both ideas occur frequently in Hel. Jud. They are almost entirely lacking in the earlier NT lit., though much in evidence in the Pastorals. This is best explained by supposing that early Christianity used these words at first for non-Christian piety and that only later the apostles gave them Christian content. Exceptions are the negative forms asebeia, godlessness, and the adj. asebēs, ungodly.

2. Whilst latreuō (→ 3302) is a neutral word for cultic worship and thus appears in various parts of the NT, sebō retains the anthropological emphasis of typical Gk. piety, i.e., deference to that which is sublime and exalted. It is difficult to use such language in relation to God and Christ, because the Christian is in personal union with them, a union in obedience and trust.

In Rom. 1:18 Paul describes the pagan as enslaved by asebeia and adikia ("godlessness and wickedness") and states that the wrath of God rests on such people for giving divine honors to the creature rather than the Creator (1:25). He thus pronounces judgment on all contemporary religious activity, for being wise in its own eyes, it fails to make any contact with the one true God and his holy purpose either in the realm of worship or in that of interpersonal relationships. Here, as in the LXX, there is no longer a sharp distinction between asebeia and adikia because in the light of Christ's revelation both are sin (hamartia, 281). This latter word gained ascendancy over asebeia, as indeed over all other terms that denote the outworkings of the power of evil.

As in the OT, hamartōlos and asebēs can stand side by side in Paul to describe the sinner whom Christ makes righteous (cf. Rom. 4:5; 5:6, 8). The Pastorals take over this association (1 Tim. 1:9; cf. 1 Pet. 4:18), though here asebeia is the antithesis of the much used eusebeia (cf. 1 Tim. 3:16; Tit. 2:12).

3. theosebēs is used in Jn. 9:31. True piety consists in doing God's will. In Acts 10:2 the fear of God is described by the combination of eusebēs and phoboumenos: God is revered in that human beings fear him, i.e., offer him veneration, worship, and sacrifice. At the same time the appropriate distance is maintained, because humans are sinners. This also explains the technical term sebomenos in Acts, which denotes those Gentiles who worshiped the God of the Jews without wholly belonging to his people, i.e., without circumcision and minute observance of the law (13:43, 50; 16:14; 18:7). This word group is naturally used for Gentile veneration of the gods (cf. 17:23; 19:27).

4. The Pastoral Letters use the relevant Gk. vocabulary more freely than the other NT writings, the probable reason being that faith is here more of a virtue and now means primarily a Christian attitude to life. Only on that account can the OT phrase "fear of the LORD" be rendered so consistently by the Hel. eusebeia, though to be sure the attitude of the believer—"to live a godly life [eusebōs] in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. 3:12)—is based on faith in Christ (1 Tim. 3:16; cf. 6:3). The NT devout person now understands himself or herself as a follower of Jesus Christ. Consequently, devoutness becomes one in a series of Christian virtues (1 Tim. 6:11; Tit. 1:1; 2:12).

Thus pistis, faith, takes on a special coloring as compared with its use elsewhere in the NT. Good works are definitely included in it (1 Tim. 2:10; 5:4), not, however, in the sense of justification by works (4:7–8; 6:5–6; 2 Tim. 3:5). Faith is rather seen as something ethical and related to this world; only once is it defined in relation to its ultimate goal, the coming kingdom of God (1 Tim. 4:8).

5. The use of the semnotēs group (noun 3x, adj. 4x) also fits into this framework. It occurs in Phil. 4:8 ("noble"), where Paul gives directions to Christians for the conduct of their everyday lives. Otherwise it occurs almost exclusively in the Pastorals. semnotēs differs from eusebeia in that it indicates, without direct reference to God, an ethical and aesthetic outlook resulting in decency and orderliness. Seriousness both of doctrine and of life is expected of the leaders of the church. By ruling their own families well and setting a good example, they are to bring up their children to be obedient and to lead honorable lives (1 Tim. 2:2; 3:4, 8; Tit. 2:2, 7).

6. In Jude and 2 Pet. Christians are described as the righteous who live, like Noah and Lot, in the midst of asebeis, ungodly men (2 Pet. 2:5–6; 3:7; Jude 4, 15, 18). Here eusebeia is seen as the Christian manner of life, which keeps Christ's return constantly in view (2 Pet. 3:11–12). The Christian who lives with this expectation strives after knowledge and is preserved from temptation (1:3–8; 2:9).

σείω (seiō), shake, cause to quake, agitate (4940); σεισμός (seismos), shaking, commotion, earthquake (4939); ἀνασείω (anaseiō), stir up, incite, excite (411); διασείω (diaseiō), shake violently, intimidate (1398); κατασείω (kataseiō), shake down, motion, shake or wave the hand as a signal (2939).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. seiō means to shake, move to and fro (e.g., a poised spear, a door, the head [as a sign of discontent], the ground); fig. it means to agitate, disturb, upset; accuse falsely, spitefully; extort (shake out) hush money, blackmail. seismos means shaking, shock, earthquake, blackmail; anaseiō, shake back (hair from head), swing to and fro, brandish, threaten; diaseiō, shake violently, wag (a tail), shake off (people), throw into confusion; kataseiō, shake down, throw down; fig. listen carefully by throwing back the ears; be dead drunk (thrown on the floor); signal with the hand.

2. (a) seiō occurs 37x in the LXX, usually meaning to shake, move to and fro. In the Song of Deborah the earth is said to have been shaken (Jdg. 5:4). This depiction of the divine presence occurs frequently in the OT, esp. when God comes in judgment, the anticipation of which causes a shaking or trembling among the peoples (Ezek. 38:19–20). When Judah is threatened, the whole land is said to tremble (i.e., with fear) in anticipation of the thundering horses of the invader (Jer. 8:16). In its day, the terror of Babylon causes other nations to tremble (Isa. 14:16). Paradoxically, her end produces a similar effect (Jer. 50:46 = LXX 27:46). Nebuchadnezzar's heavy chariots and wagons driving into the city (Ezek. 26:10) will cause the walls of Tyre to shake or vibrate both lit. and fig., the latter because the strength of a city, symbolized by its wall, has been destroyed, and no one knows what the enemy will now do to a defenseless people.

(b) seismos occurs 15x in the LXX. It means an earthquake, lit. or fig., in Isa. 29:6; Jer. 10:22; 23:19; Ezek. 3:12–13; 38:19; Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5; the rumbling of wheels in Nah. 3:2; the rattling of chariots in Jer. 47:3 = LXX 29:3; trembling for fear in Isa. 15:5; the rattling of dry bones in the valley as they come together in Ezek. 37:7.

(c) diaseiō is used of intimidation, esp. to extort money (3 Macc. 7:21). In Job 4:14 it describes a great shaking of bones caused by a fearful nightmare. kataseiō occurs 2x. Daniel's servants sprinkled (kataseiō) ashes over the floor of Bel's temple to betray the footprints of the nightly intruders (Bel 14); in 1 Macc. 6:38 kataseiō denotes horsemen being placed in position on either wing of an army.

NT 1. seiō occurs 5x in the NT. It is a powerful word to describe the effect on the people when Jesus entered Jerusalem seated on a donkey: "The whole city was stirred" (Matt. 21:10), shaken to its foundations; his deliberate fulfilling of the prophecy of Messiah's entry (Zech. 9:9) was unmistakable. At the resurrection the guards at the tomb "shook" violently at the sight of the angel (28:4).

Heb. 12:26 refers to the giving of the law on Sinai, when the divine voice shook the earth. The earthquake at the time (Exod. 19:18) was an event that Israel never forgot (Ps. 68:7–8). At the end of the present world order God will shake (seiō, as in Hag. 2:16, quoted in Heb. 12:26) not only earth but heaven as well. The opening of the sixth seal leads to cataclysmic events of cosmic proportions, including stars falling to the earth, like so many figs being shaken off the tree by a gale (Rev. 6:13; cf. Isa. 34:4).

2. In Matt. 8:24 seismos describes the violence of the sudden storm that threatened to engulf Jesus and the disciples on the lake. The other 13 occurrences of seismos in the NT all refer to earthquakes and always as divine interventions: at the moment of Jesus' death (Matt. 27:54), which symbolizes his shattering of the power of death; at the resurrection, where it is linked with the rolling back of the stone (28:2); at Philippi, when Paul and Silas sang God's praises in prison (Acts 16:26). Together with the subsequent resurrection of a number of saints in the holy city, the earthquake at Calvary foreshadows the eschatological earthquakes as a sign of the end times (Matt. 24:7; Mk. 13:8; Lk. 21:11; Rev. 6:12; 8:5; 11:13, 19; 16:18), the general resurrection, the destruction of the present earth, and the formation of the new (21:1).

3. anaseiō occurs only at Mk. 15:11, where the chief priests incite the crowd to ask for Barabbas, and at Lk. 23:5, where they insist that Jesus has been inciting people to rebellion all over Judea. diaseiō appears in Lk. 3:14, where John the Baptist tells the soldiers who responded to his preaching not to use their position to intimidate anyone, i.e., not to extort money. They were probably not Roman soldiers but a Jewish paramilitary force used to support tax collectors. kataseiō is used 4x, only in Acts: of Peter (12:17), Paul (13:16; 21:40), and Alexander (19:33) motioning with their hands to gain people's silent attention before speaking to them.

See also saleuō, shake, cause to waver, unsettle, drive away (4888); ektinassō, shake out, shake off (1759).

σελήνη (selēnē), moon (4943); σεληνιάζομαι (selēniazomai), be moon-struck, have seizures (4944); νεομηνία (neomēnia), new moon, first of the month (3741).

CL & OT 1. Cl. Gk. writers often refer to selēnē, the moon, in its lit. sense. Commonly in view is the moon's specialized function of marking time by waxing and waning. The religious festivals of many ancient societies, including the Israelites, were determined by the lunar calendar (see esp. Sir. 43:6–8). Cl. writers refer to Selene, the moon goddess.

The moon with its unique cycle of phases, its growth and decline, its effect on the tides, though a lesser light, is more prominent in pagan mythology and religion than is the sun. Because the ancients observed what they thought was a relationship between the phases of the moon and human behavior, selēniazomai means to be a lunatic.

2. The OT frequently refers to the moon. It is never mentioned alone; only twice do we read about the moon apart from the sun, and in both instances it is associated with the stars (Job 25:5; Ps. 8:3). Some OT references to the moon have a fig. sense (e.g., Song 6:10 = LXX 6:9; Sir. 27:11; 50:6). (a) The moon provides nocturnal light (136:9) and demonstrates the fixed order of God's creation (Jer. 31:35 = LXX 38:35), its beauty (Ps. 8:3), and its permanence (72:5, 7).

(b) Since the Heb. calendar was a lunar calendar, each new moon (neomēnia) was a festival to the Lord (Num. 10:10; 1 Sam. 20:5, 18). However, worship of the moon, as of the sun and the stars, is prohibited (cf. Deut. 17:3; 2 Ki. 23:5).

(c) A specialized reflection of popular belief in the preternatural power of the moon is the promise that under Yahweh's protection the moon will not smite one by night (Ps. 121:6). The vb. selēniazomai, however, does not occur in the LXX.

(d) As with the sun, the prospect of eschatological judgment and blessing affects the light of the moon. In judgment it will be darkened (Isa. 13:10; Ezek. 32:7; Joel 2:10), "abashed" (Isa. 24:23), turned into blood (Joel 2:31), or held up in its course (Hab. 3:11; 2 Esd. 5:4). In blessing its light will be as the light of the sun (Isa. 30:26), and the moon will no longer function as a luminary at night (60:19–20).

NT 1. In the NT selēnē occurs only in association with hēlios. Only two occurrences are not apocalyptic in tone: a reference to the glory of the moon as distinct from sun and stars in Paul's argument about the resurrection body (1 Cor. 15:41), and the fig. reference in the description of the woman who has the moon under her feet (Rev. 12:1). The cognate vb. selēniazomai (Matt. 4:24; 17:15) reflects the popular connection of demon-possession with the moon (cf. the English word "lunacy"). The latter passage describes symptoms of something like epilepsy, a malady there attributed to an evil spirit.

2. The cosmic phenomena associated with eschatological happenings regularly include references to the moon. (a) In passages where judgment is in view, the apocalyptic language of the LXX is used. As the sun will be darkened, so "the moon will not give its light" (Matt. 24:29; Mk. 13:24). The par. in Lk. simply indicates that there will be signs in the sun, moon, and stars (21:25). The quotation of Joel 2:31 in Acts 2:20 speaks of the moon being turned into blood; Rev. 6:12 similarly says that at the opening of the sixth seal "the whole moon turned blood red." When the fourth angel blew his trumpet in 8:12, the moon, together with the sun and stars, was darkened by one third.

(b) The only other reference to selēnē concerns the eschatological era of blessing: The holy city, the new Jerusalem, is said to need no moon to shine on it since the glory of God is its light (Rev. 21:23).

3. The only NT use of neomēnia is in Col. 2:16, where Paul encourages believers not to feel judged for ignoring certain old covenant rituals, including observance of the New Moon (cf. Neh. 10:32–33; Isa. 1:13–14; Hos. 2:11; 1 Macc. 10:34).

σημεῖον (sēmeion), sign, wonder, miracle (4956).

CL & OT 1. (a) The basic meaning of sēmeion is a sign by which one recognizes a particular person or thing, an authenticating mark or token. Among the nuances is the omen that announces coming events. As distinct from teras (→ 5469), sēmeion does not necessarily have the character of the miraculous.

(b) When a sēmeion has the character of the marvelous, the word acquires the meaning of miraculous sign. It then denotes in general a miracle, worked by a deity or a miracle worker, that contradicts the natural course of things. Note the phrase sēmeia kai terata, "signs and wonders," first attested in Polybius.

2. sēmeion occasionally translates the Heb. môpēt (Exod. 11:9–10), i.e., that which by its remarkable nature excites wonder and attracts attention. But for the most part it translates ʾôt, which means (a) sign, mark, token; (b) miraculous sign, miracle.

(a) Whether directly or by authorized agents, whether unrequested (e.g., 1 Sam. 10:1–9) or in answer to prayer (e.g., Jdg. 6:17), Yahweh grants and works signs, which accompany his word and vouch for its validity and reliability. Thus the sign of Cain (Gen. 4:15) vouches for the promise of divine protection, and the blood on the Israelite houses (Exod. 12:13) vouches for the promised exemption. Just as the rainbow guarantees God's covenant promise (Gen. 9:8–17), so circumcision (17:11) and Sabbath (Exod. 31:13, 17) are also "signs of the covenant" that express and seal the relationship between Yahweh and Israel (cf. also 3:12; Jdg. 6:16–37; 1 Sam. 10:1–9; Isa. 7:10–14).

Yahweh's messengers can authenticate their mission and message by signs performed (Exod. 4:1–17) or predicted (1 Sam. 10:1–9; 2 Ki. 19:29). The symbolic actions of the prophets are a way of making visible the word of God (1 Ki. 11:29–39; Isa. 8:1–10; 20:1–6; Jer. 19:1–13; 27:1–7; Ezek. 4–5; Hos. 1–3). They are not simply pictorial illustrations of the oral proclamation but, like the prophetic word itself (cf. Isa. 55:10–11), tokens of the power that shapes history. Even the prophet, as a witness of the message, can himself become a "sign" (8:18; Ezek. 12:3–6; 24:24, 27).

(b) Alongside such signs, which are either ordinary incidents or ones where the aspect of the marvelous does not lie in the sign itself but in the prophetic prediction, there are others that possess a thoroughly miraculous character. In this category belong the signs worked by Moses (Exod. 4; 7–12; 14; 17; Deut. 34:11) and those granted to Gideon (Jdg. 6) and Hezekiah (2 Ki. 20:8–11; cf. Isa. 38:7–8). The phrase sēmeia kai terata, "miraculous signs and wonders" (no essential distinction between the two words), is found primarily in those texts that describe the time of Moses as a time of Yahweh's marvelous action in history (Exod. 7:3; cf. Deut. 4:34; 6:22; 7:19; 29:2 = LXX 29:3; Neh. 9:10; Ps. 78:43; 105:27; 135:9; Jer. 32:20–21 = LXX 39:20–21).

The OT also records numerous miracles in which God works directly or through specially chosen people (e.g., Gen. 17:17; 18:11; Jos. 3; 6; 10; 1 Ki. 17–18; 2 Ki. 6–7). Every such event goes back to God; nothing is impossible for him (Gen. 18:14). All signs are pointers to Yahweh himself, a revelation of his might and glory. Through them Israel—indeed, all the nations of the world—are to encounter Yahweh and recognize that he alone is God (cf. Deut. 4:34–35; 1 Ki. 18:36–39; Ps. 86:10, 17). Since the goal of signs is the universal glorification of the divine name (72:18–19), unbelief and disobedience are expressions of an incomprehensible hardness of heart (Num. 14:11, 22; Ps. 95:8–11).

(c) Miraculous signs are not uniformly distributed throughout the OT. They are largely grouped in three main periods, each of which was marked by a life-and-death struggle for God's people and which put Yahweh's saving power and will to the proof: (i) the redemption of God's people from Egypt and their establishment in Canaan; (ii) the conflict with pagan religion under Elijah and Elisha; and (iii) the time of Daniel during the exile, when the supremacy of Yahweh and the faithfulness of Daniel and his companions is vindicated. The same can be said for the fourth period of miraculous signs, the time of Jesus and the gospel age.

Some of the miraculous events in the OT need not have involved suspension of natural causes. The locusts that plagued Egypt were blown there by a strong east wind and were blown away by a strong west wind (Exod. 10:13, 19). The arrival of the quails coincided with the spring migration (16:13). The parting of the Red Sea was caused by a strong east wind blowing all night (14:21). In such instances the event is a providential ordering of natural causes for the benefit of God's people. Similarly, the fire falling on Elijah's sacrifice on Mount Carmel (1 Ki. 18:38) may have been a thunderbolt. Nevertheless, these events were remembered as indicative of Yahweh's providential help.

3. According to Exod. 7–8, the Egyptian magicians had the power to perform miracles by secret magical arts, but they were inferior to the miracles of Yahweh. Likewise in Deut. 13:2–5 the false prophet who wishes to seduce Israel to apostasy from Yahweh has an apparent power to perform signs and wonders. These are recognized as opposed to God in that the word they authenticate separates one from him rather than binds one to him. Hence, even though a prophet may perform such signs, he is to be tested by his teaching. If his teaching leads to other gods, he is to be rejected.

4. The apocalyptic signs of the end of time (cf. 2 Esd. 4:51–52; 6:11–12; 8:63) are partly concerned with horrible and frightening portents, which indicate that the last days are dawning. Insofar as these portents are convulsions of a cosmic nature, they announce the transformation of the world: the dissolution of the old creation and the reconstitution of the whole of nature.

5. Rab. lit. speaks often of miraculous signs or miracles, God's miracles, the miraculous workings of great men of God and of the rabbis, and the miracles of the messianic age. A prophet must prove his identity by means of signs and wonders (cf. Matt. 16:1; Jn. 6:30). Miracles are equally regarded as divine confirmatory signs for the proclamation of a rabbi.

NT sēmeion is found 77x in the NT, predominantly in the Gospels (48x) and Acts (13x). As in the LXX, sēmeion means either a sign (= mark, signal; Matt. 26:48; Lk. 2:12; 2 Thess. 3:17), or a miraculous sign (= miracle; Jn. 2:11, 18, 23; Acts 4:16, 22; 8:6; 1 Cor. 1:22). The phrase sēmeia kai terata, "signs and miracles," occurs 16x (e.g., Mk. 13:22; Jn. 4:48; Acts 2:19, 22, 43; Rom. 15:19; Heb. 2:4). The apocalyptic meaning of the signs of the end is also found (e.g., Matt. 24:3; Mk. 13:4; Lk. 21:11, 25).

1. It is the OT conception of the prophet as Yahweh's sign that underlies Jesus' being the God-given sign (Lk. 2:34) by which the rise or fall, the salvation or ruin, of every human being is decided. In this connection Jesus also rejects a demand for signs (Matt. 16:1, 4; Mk. 8:11–12; Lk. 11:16), which is linked in Matt. 12:38–39; 16:1–4; Lk. 11:16, 29–30 with mention of the sign of Jonah. Jesus unmasks the demand for signs as a subterfuge concealing a refusal to repent. Anyone who does not believe God's final word going forth in him will not be brought to repentance even by miracles (cf. Lk. 16:27–31). The only sign God gives to the unrepentant generation is that of Jonah: As Jonah once came back from the dead, so at the Parousia (→ 4242) the Son of Man will come in judgment (cf. Matt. 24:30).

The parabolic actions of Jesus that demonstrate the dawn of the age of salvation

(Mk. 2:18–22; 3:13–15) are to be compared with the prophetic symbolic actions of the OT. Thus, Jesus' table fellowship with sinners (Matt. 9:9–13; Mk. 2:13–17; Lk. 5:27–32; 19:1–10) is a prophetic sign, an anticipation of the acquittal of the final judgment and a practical illustration in advance of the messianic meal in the age of salvation.

2. Alongside miracles performed directly by God (e.g., Acts 5:19; 12:3–10; 16:25–28) one can also distinguish the following uses of sēmeion in the NT: (a) Jesus' miracles; (b) the miracles of his witnesses; and (c) the miraculous power of elements hostile to God.

(a) The Gospels record many healing miracles of Jesus, three cases of people being raised from the dead (Jairus's daughter, Matt. 9:18–26; the widow of Nain's son, Lk. 7:11–17; Lazarus, Jn. 11:1–44), and eight so-called nature miracles (the stilling of the storm, Matt. 8:18, 23–27; the feeding of the 5,000, 14:13–21; the feeding of the 4,000, 15:32–39; Jesus' walking on the water, 14:22–33; the cursing of the fig tree, 21:18–19; the coin in the fish's mouth, 17:24–27; the catch of fishes, Lk. 5:1–11; and water changed into wine, Jn. 2:1–11). The essential characteristic of the effective work of Jesus is seen in the combination of proclamation and healing (cf. Mk. 1:38–39; Lk. 9:11; 10:23–24; 13:32).

There do exist accounts of miracles of Jewish and pagan miracle workers of antiquity. A comparison of these accounts with those of the Gospels shows that the NT miracle traditions have adopted certain narrative forms and motifs from their milieu, but it also draws attention to the particularities of the Gospel witness. With Jesus magic, conjuration, cursing of people, and spells are all absent. He performed miracles by his authoritative word, to which he sometimes added a gesture (e.g., Mk. 1:31, 41; 5:41). Jesus carried out no miracles of punishment (cf. Lk. 9:51–56). He declined to perform miracles in order to rescue himself (Matt. 4:1–7; 26:51–54; 27:39–44) and rejected demonstrations of power designed to prove his divine sending (4:5–7; 16:1–4).

Moreover, Jesus forbade those whom he had healed to relate his miracles to others (e.g., Mk. 5:43; 7:36; Lk. 8:56); in the case of the healed leper the man was to show himself "to the priest and offer the sacrifices that Moses commanded" (Mk. 1:44; cf. Lev. 13:49; 14:2–22). It was not personal gain but thanks to God that Jesus looked for from those who experienced his miraculous help (Lk. 17:11–19). By and large the accounts pay little attention to the miraculous process as such; they concentrate instead on the encounter of Jesus with the whole person in his or her physical and spiritual needs.

In Matt. 9:2–8 forgiveness of sins is linked with healing. Healing becomes a turning point in the life of the one healed (cf. 20:34; Mk. 5:18–20; 10:52; Lk. 18:43). Anyone who experiences a miracle of Jesus is thereby placed on the road of discipleship, in the same way that miracles in general are related to faith. Only faith, i.e., trust in the power of Jesus that transcends all human possibilities, can receive miracles (Mk. 2:5; 5:34; 7:29; 9:23–24; cf. Jn. 4:50; 11:40); unbelief is denied miracles (Matt. 13:53–58; Mk. 6:1–6). Note that Jesus' miracles often presuppose faith; they do not first create it. Note also that miracles silence all opposition; if believers see God at work, the verdict of Jesus' opponents is that he is in league with Satan (Matt. 12:24; Mk. 3:22).

What finally and radically distinguishes Jesus' miracles from those of the Jewish and Hel. narratives is their eschatological reference. As Matt. 11:2–6; Lk. 7:18–24; 11:20 clearly reveal, miracles are signs of God's kingly rule, the dawn of which Jesus announced in his proclamation (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; Mk. 1:39; 6:6; Lk. 4:14–15, 44). His words and works are the beginning of the age of salvation, his miracles a foreshadowing and a promise of the coming universal redemption.

Ultimately, then, it is in this eschatological context that the accounts of Jesus' miracles are to be read. The casting out of demons signals God's invasion into the realm of Satan and its final annihilation (Matt. 12:29; Lk. 10:18; Jn. 12:31; Rev. 20:1–3, 10); the raising of the dead announces that death will be forever done away with (1 Cor. 15:26; Rev. 21:4; cf. Isa. 25:8); the healing of the sick testifies to the cessation of all suffering (Rev. 21:4); the miraculous provisions of food are tokens of the end of all physical need and of the messianic banquet (7:16–17; 19:9); the stilling of the storm points to complete victory over the powers of chaos that threaten the earth (21:1).

The eschatological reference of Jesus' miracles is esp. expressed in Jn.'s Gospel, which stresses the historical reality of the events. At the same time, the miracles are signs pointing beyond themselves to the one who performs them. They prove Jesus' identity as the Christ, the Son of God (Jn. 20:30), who brings the fullness of salvation (2:1–11; wine was a symbol of the age of salvation in the OT, cf. Isa. 25:6), offers the bread of life (6:1–14), grants resurrection and eternal life (11:1–44), and banishes darkness (9:1–7). In his miracles Jesus reveals his glory (2:11; 11:4), which is the glory of God himself (1:14). Granted, miracles have this power of statement only for those whose eyes God himself opens (12:37–41; cf. Isa. 6:10; 53:1), so that in faith they become aware of Jesus' glory (Jn. 2:11; 11:40). Those who are unenlightened, by contrast, react to Jesus' miracles with sham faith (2:23–25) or unbelief (12:37–43).

The NT writers agree that Jesus' miracles also express his uniqueness: his compassionate love as well as his divine authority (cf. Acts 10:38). In him God himself "has come to help his people" (Lk. 7:16).

(b) According to the Synoptics, Jesus also sent out his disciples to preach and to perform miracles (Matt. 10:7–8; Mk. 3:14–15; Lk. 9:1–2; 10:9). Similarly, Acts frequently mentions the correlation of apostolic proclamation and apostolic miracle-working (4:29–30; cf. 3:1–10; 4:16, 22; 5:12; 6:8; 8:6–8; 9:32–43; 15:12; 20:7–12). The miracles are coordinated with the preaching; they are accompanying signs, by which Christ confirms the word of the witnesses (14:3). As in the authoritative word (6:10), so in the signs is manifested the power of the Holy Spirit promised to the disciples (1:8).

Likewise for Paul word and deed, preaching and signs, belong together; in both Christ is at work through the power of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 15:18–19). Signs and wonders accompany the proclamation that takes place in "demonstration of the Spirit's power" (1 Cor. 2:4; cf. 1 Thess. 1:5). They are marks of the divine legitimization and the authority of the apostolic office and work (2 Cor. 12:12). To those who listen to the preaching the Spirit also mediates miraculous powers (Gal. 3:5). That is why, alongside the gifts of proclamation, the charisma of healing and the power to perform miracles belong to the living gifts of the Holy Spirit to the church (1 Cor. 12:8–11, 28).

Finally, Heb. also maintains that God confirms the preaching of salvation by signs and wonders (2:3–4), which, as "powers of the coming age" (6:5), foreshadow complete salvation. Kerygma and charisma, preaching and miracles thus belong together. In both Jesus Christ proves himself to be the living Lord, present in his church in the Holy Spirit.

(c) Like the OT, the NT reckons also with signs and wonders worked by false prophets and pseudo-messianic figures (Matt. 24:24; Mk. 13:22; Rev. 13:11–14; 16:14; 19:20), by whom people will be seduced into apostasy from God. The Antichrist is expected to perform signs and wonders in the power of Satan (2 Thess. 2:3–12).

σιγάω (sigaō), to be quiet, be silent (4967); σιγή (sigē), silence (4968).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. sigaō means to be silent, keep still, say nothing. The noun sigē, silence, was a favorite word of the mystery religions, that humans should remain in silence before the gods.

2. (a) In the LXX sigaō has various nuances. In Eccl. 3:7 it is used in the Teacher's time passage to contrast simply "a time to be silent and a time to speak." But the vb. can also mean more than just being silent. It is used several times to refer to an agonizing silence. In Ps. 32:3 sigaō denotes the inner turmoil the psalmist feels before he confesses his sin before God, and in 39:2 the psalmist uses every ounce of his energy to keep silent in the presence of the wicked. In God's judgment in Amos 6:10 (= LXX 6:11), a survivor pleads with a relative, "Hush! We must not mention the name of the LORD," while in Lam. 3:49 the poet refuses to be silent as he pours out his soul in pain.

(b) This word can also be used in connection with Yahweh. In Ps. 50:21, the Lord decides to remain silent while the wicked persist in their ways. But the time is soon coming when God will rebuke them and tear them to pieces. In 107:29, the Lord commands the raging storm at sea to be calm, and "the waves of the sea were hushed" by him. In Exod. 14:14, Moses assures the people on the edge of the Red Sea that they do not need fear: "The LORD will fight for you; you need only to be still."

NT 1. sigaō occurs 10x in the NT, and sigē, 2x. These two words are used frequently of the silence of either an individual or a group of people. Lk. uses it for the silence of Jesus' enemies after he had given a brilliant answer to their question about paying taxes to Caesar (Lk. 20:26). The disciples were silent about their experience with Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration (9:36). The crowd in 18:39 told a blind beggar, calling out to Jesus for help, "to be quiet." Peter motioned for the believers "to be quiet" so that he could tell them about his miraculous escape from prison (Acts 12:17). Those gathered at the council of Jerusalem were silent as they listened to Barnabas and Paul tell about the marvelous things the Lord had done through them among the Gentiles (15:12). When Paul motioned to the angry crowd in Jerusalem, "they were all silent," and he addressed them (21:40).

2. Paul uses sigaō in his instructions regarding proper church order in 1 Cor. 14. With regard to speaking in tongues, if no interpreter is present, then the speaker "should keep quiet" (14:28). Regarding prophecy, if one person is prophesying and a revelation comes to someone else, the first speaker "should stop." Finally, in a passage that has prompted much scholarly discussion, the apostle instructs women to "remain silent" in the churches. Among the numerous suggestions that have been made on this passage, Paul certainly cannot mean that women may say nothing in church, since in 11:5 he implies that women have a right to pray and prophesy in public.

3. In Rom. 16:25 Paul uses sigaō to refer to the mystery that God had kept "hidden" for centuries, about how he would someday include the Gentiles in his plan of salvation. God did give hints in the prophets to this effect, and in the NT era he made plain what his goal for the nations was (→ mysterion, 3696).

4. Finally, John uses sigē in Rev. 8:1 for the great half-hour silence in heaven immediately after the opening of the seventh seal. This silence was followed by the blowing of the seven trumpets.

σίδηρος (sidēros), iron (4970); σιδηροῦς (sidērous), made of iron (4971).

CL & OT 1. This Gk. word meant not only iron but also anything made of iron and a place for selling iron. In Homer's time iron was highly valued and pieces were given as prizes. Hesiod considered the Iron Age in which he lived to be the epitome of human evil. The word is used symbolically by Homer to mean hard, stubborn, merciless.

2. In the LXX this word occurs frequently, translating Heb. barzel. Deut. mentions "the iron-smelting furnace" (4:20). Iron metallurgy was probably developed by the Hittites during the 2d millennium B.C. Hittite iron was brought to Palestine by merchants from Tyre and later by the Philistines, who monopolized the blacksmith's art (1 Sam. 13:19–20). The Canaanites possessed chariots of iron (i.e., with iron fittings) in the period of the judges (Jos. 17:16; Jdg. 1:19; 4:3). By the time of David iron was used for nails (1 Chr. 22:3), though bronze was still being used in large quantities. The OT uses iron as a symbol of strength (Ps. 2:9; Jer. 1:18), endurance, hardness (Job 19:24; Mic. 4:13), and cruelty (Dan. 7:7, 19; Amos 1:3). In Nebuchadnezzar's image (Dan. 2) iron with clay represented the last human kingdom before God's kingdom filled the earth.

NT Rev. 2:27; 12:5; 19:15 allude to Ps. 2:9, about God's Anointed One (i.e., Christ) reigning in judgment with an iron scepter. This scepter may have been a short-handled battle mace. In Rev. 9:9 the locusts who appeared after the sounding of the fifth trumpet had "breastplates like breastplates of iron." Rev. 18:12 refers to iron as an item of merchandise, and Acts 12:10 speaks of the iron gate of Jerusalem that opened by itself when Peter and his delivering angel walked through it.

4971 (sidērous, made of iron), → 4970.

Σινά (Sina), Sinai (4982).

OT The indeclinable proper name Sina is derived from the Heb. sînay (see Exod. 16:1; Deut. 33:2; Jdg. 5:5; Ps. 68:8, 17; Sir. 48:7). Sinai is the name of the sacred mountain before which Israel encamped when Yahweh made them his covenant people (Exod. 19–24). Moses ascended the mountain to speak with God (19:3, 20; 24:9) and came down to communicate God's word to the people (19:25). After concluding the covenant Moses went up another forty days and nights (24:18; cf. 32:1). In revealing his presence to the people, Yahweh did so with thunders and thick cloud, with trumpet blast to warn the people not to touch the mountain (19:16–24). This is the setting of the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20; cf. Deut. 5). After the golden calf incident, Moses went up the mountain again to replace the tablets broken at the foot of the mountain.

The exact site of Mount Sinai (also called Horeb) has been much debated. Traditionally it is located at Jebel Musa among the high mountains at the apex of the Sinai peninsula, although alternate sights have also been suggested.

NT Sinai is mentioned 2x each in Acts and Gal. and is alluded to in Heb. 12.

1. The speech of Stephen prior to his martyrdom summarizes Israel's history. The Lord God, perhaps through an angel, spoke with Moses at the burning bush in the desert near Mount Sinai (Acts 7:30; cf. Exod. 3:1–2) and again when he gave the law (Acts 7:38; cf. Exod. 19). Sinai thus played a prominent part in Israel's salvation history. But according to Stephen, the present Jewish leaders have failed to understand God's workings.

2. In Gal. 4:21–31 Paul identifies the present stubborn and disobedient Israel with Hagar (Gen. 16:15) and Mount Sinai, symbols of standing outside the covenant promises and being in bondage to the law, respectively. Together they are typified by the present Jerusalem, which is in bondage, as contrasted with the believing church, "the Jerusalem that is above," which is "free" and "our mother" (Gal. 4:26).

3. In Heb. 12:18–29 Mount Sinai (although not mentioned by name) is contrasted with Mount Zion, representing the old and new covenants respectively. The description of the former, drawn from Exod. 19–20, stresses its holiness and inaccessibility for ordinary people, whereas that of the latter stresses that believers have come to "the church of the firstborn, whose names are written in heaven" (12:23), "to Jesus the mediator of a new covenant" (12:24). We, therefore, must listen to God (12:25), for we have a kingdom that cannot be shaken (12:28).

σιωπάω (siōpaō), to be quiet, be silent (4995).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. siōpaō means to be still or silent, also to keep secret. The imperative can mean "Hush!" Both Socrates and Plato kept silent before the jury when they were on trial for their lives.

2. siōpaō has a variety of nuances in the LXX. (a) It can mean physical silence. A husband whose wife has made a vow and who, when he learns of it, says nothing cannot later annul the vow, for he was silent about it (Num. 30:10–15). Job says that people used to sit silent before him and listen to his wise counsel (Job 29:21). The Israelites did not answer the field commander of the Assyrians because the king had told them to be quiet (Isa. 36:21). The four lepers knew that they should not keep silent about the fact that the enemy camp of the Arameans had been deserted (2 Ki. 7:9).

(b) Silence (or the impossibility of it) can also denote pain and agony. Even if Job remains silent, that does not mean his pain has gone away (Job. 16:6 = LXX 16:7). In fact, the churning inside him never grows quiet (30:27). The elders of Israel sit on the ground in silence after the destruction of Jerusalem (Lam. 2:10), and the eyes of the people are given no respite from tears (2:18). In Amos 5:13, those who grieve at injustice in Israel keep quiet, for if they were to speak, they too would become liable to some form of oppression. The prophet Jer. writhes in pain and cannot keep silent (4:19).

(c) siōpaō is used of the call to the Israelites to be silent before the Lord so that they can listen to his word (Deut. 27:9). In a similar vein, when Nehemiah commands the people after the reading of God's law to rejoice and not to mourn or weep, the Levites go through the city and tell the people: "Be still, for this is a sacred day" (Neh. 8:11).

(d) Finally, siōpaō is used for the silence of God. After a time, while the enemies of his people were destroying the nation (mostly because he had been fed up with their wickedness) the Lord said, "I have kept silent, I have been quiet [both siōpaō] and held myself back" (Isa. 42:14; cf. 64:12). But now the Lord will not longer be silent (62:1) for the sake of Zion, for he will show her his salvation. Nor will he be silent with the enemies of his people, but will pay them back in full (65:6).

NT 1. siōpaō occurs 10x in the NT, all but once in the Gospels. It is used of the physical silence of the human voice. Gabriel told Zechariah that he would "be silent" until the birth of his son (Lk. 1:20). The crowd told the two blind men "to be quiet" and stop shouting out for Jesus to have mercy on them (Matt. 20:31). The disciples kept quiet before Jesus out of embarrassment of what they had been discussing (Mk. 9:34). Jesus refused to instruct his followers to be silent at his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, for otherwise the stones would cry out (Lk. 19:40). Jesus' enemies remained silent when he asked them whether it was appropriate to do good or to do evil (Mk. 3:4), and Jesus himself remained silent before his accusers (Matt. 26:63; Mk. 14:61).

2. In a vision given to Paul, the apostle was told to keep preaching and to "not be silent" in Corinth, for the Lord had many people in that city whom he wanted to call to himself through Paul.

3. The main theological use of this vb. is in the command Jesus gave to the wind and the waves on the storm of the sea of Galilee: "Quiet!" (Mk. 4:39). Note that only Mark gives the direct words of Jesus here (see also phimoō, to quiet, muzzle, 5821). This saying links back to a similar command of the Lord to the stormy seas in Ps. 107:29, though the LXX uses sigaō (→ 4967) there rather than siōpaō.

See also hēsychia, quiet, quietness, rest, silence (2484); ēchos, sound, noise, report (2491); sigaō, to be quiet, be silent (4967); phimoō, to quiet, muzzle (5821); phōnē, sound, noise, voice, language (5889).

4997 (skandalizō, give offense, lead astray), → 4998.

σκάνδαλον (skandalon), offense (4998); σκανδαλίζω (skandalizō), give offense, lead astray (4997).

CL & OT 1. skandalon was originally the piece of wood that kept open a trap for animals; a related word (not found in the NT) means (fig.) a trap set through questions. No nonbiblical example of the vb. skandalizō has been found.

2. Both words have been shaped by biblical language. The LXX uses skandalon fig. to denote a snare to destroy a person (1 Sam. 18:21; Ps. 141:9) or to cause one to sin (Jos. 23:13; Jdg. 2:3; 8:27; Ps. 106:36). It can also mean an obstacle in the way of the blind (Lev. 19:14), fig., a cause of misfortune (Ps. 119:165) or of troubled conscience (1 Sam. 25:31). Hos. 4:17 uses this word to refer to idols. skandalizō occurs in Dan. 11:41; Sir. 9:5; 23:8; 32:15 (= LXX 35:15) with the meaning of stumble, be led astray.

3. In Qumran writings, the Heb. words translated by this word group are a metaphorical expression for sinning or for leading someone to sin.

NT The NT usage is fixed essentially by the OT. It is often based directly on OT passages (e.g., Matt. 13:41 on Zeph. 1:3 [Sym.]; Matt. 24:10 on Dan. 11:41; Rom. 9:33 and 1 Pet. 2:8 on Isa. 8:14 [Aquila, Sym., Theod.]). The vb. is used 29x (14x in Matt., 8x in Mk.). The noun occurs 5x in Matt. and 4x in Rom., as well as several times in other books.

1. The original concept of a bait or trap is found only in Rom. 11:9 (quoting Ps. 69:22). Otherwise skandalon is used with the thought of a stone or obstacle over which one can trip and fall. It is used in parallel with proskomma in Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:8 (→ 4682). When the sense is to cause people to sin, the connotation of trap is still present (cf. Rev. 2:14).

2. (a) skandalon denotes a temptation to sin, an enticement to apostasy and unbelief (e.g., Matt. 16:23; 18:7; Rom. 9:33; 14:13; 16:17; 1 Pet. 2:8; Rev. 2:14). It is then used as that which causes offense or scandal or hinders faith (e.g., Matt. 13:41; 1 Cor. 1:23; Gal. 5:11; 1 Jn. 2:10).

(b) Correspondingly skandalizō means to lead into sin, give offense (e.g., Matt. 5:29–30; 18:6; 1 Cor. 8:13). In the pass. it means to take offense, fall away, be misled (e.g., Matt. 13:21; 24:10; Jn. 16:1; 2 Cor. 11:29). It can also mean to offend, provoke, raise dissensions (e.g., Matt. 15:12; 17:27; Jn. 6:61).

3. (a) The NT stresses that Jesus constantly becomes an offense. Thus the idea of being repelled by or taking offense at, is always linked with him. The disciples took offense at his prophesied sufferings (Matt. 26:31), because they were incompatible with their preconceptions about the Messiah (see also 11:6; 13:57; 26:33; Mk. 6:3; Lk. 7:23). When Peter took offense in Matt. 16:22, his protestation was rejected by Jesus as a satanic suggestion. Jesus also became an offense for John the Baptist (11:6; Lk. 7:23), because John had expected him to reveal himself as Messiah in a different way. The Pharisees took offense at Jesus' teaching (Matt. 15:12), for it contradicted their concept of the law and of one's cooperation with God's grace. The depth of their offense is seen from Jesus' comparison of them with weeds to be rooted up (15:13).

(b) The basis of the offense caused by Jesus is the cross (1 Cor. 1:23), which nullifies all human wisdom and excludes all human cooperation in salvation (cf. Gal. 5:11). As a result, the preaching of Christ crucified is a skandalon to the Jews (it was a sign of God's curse, 3:13; cf. Deut. 21:23) and foolishness to the Gentiles. This infuriating offense must remain, otherwise the gospel will cease to be the message of salvation.

(c) The foundation of the offense caused by Christ is God's decree (see Paul's quote of Isa. 8:14; 28:16 in Rom. 9:33; see also 1 Pet. 2:8). This OT passage explains why the Jews are excluded at first from salvation, though not forever (Rom.), and why in general unbelief rejects Jesus (1 Pet.). In the offense we see an aspect of God's election (cf. in 1 Pet. 2:8, "what they were destined for").

(d) Jesus and his gospel become the cause of sin only when unbelief rejects the salvation he brings, for as he presented it, it did not correspond with human expectations. While those who believe in him will not be put to shame (Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:6), those who do not believe stumble at him (2:8). It is human blindness that makes Jesus an occasion for destruction. That is true both of the Pharisees (Matt. 15:14) and of those who walk in darkness because they do not love their fellow believers (1 Jn. 2:11). Those who love their fellow believers, on the other hand, find no cause for stumbling (2:10). Many disciples found Jesus' saying about his body being life-giving food "a hard teaching" and so took offense and drew back (Jn. 6:60–61, 66). Such behavior made the disciples guilty, for they saw nothing more than flesh in Jesus ("the flesh counts for nothing," 6:63).

(e) In his eschatological discourse Jesus speaks esp. of the offenses of the last days. That is, because of tribulation, many "will turn away from the faith [skandalizō]" and deny their Lord (Matt. 24:10). This will reveal the identity of true believers. Matt. 13:41 should be understood in a similar vein: "The Son of Man will send out his angels, and they will weed out of his kingdom everything that causes sin [skandalon] and all who do evil." Those who cause others to sin are "sons of the evil one" (13:38), who will someday be separated from all contact with the kingdom of God.

In his farewell discourse Jesus declares: "All this I have told you so that you will not go astray [skandalizō]" (Jn. 16:1). He is referring here particularly to the promise of the Paraclete (15:18–27), but also to his preaching as a whole (cf. 6:63).

4. While there is an offense inherent in the gospel that must not be removed, there is a human offense that must be avoided. Such offenses are inevitable (Matt. 18:7b;

Lk. 17:1). They belong to the world and make it ripe for condemnation, but woe to those through whom they come. This is esp. true of those who offend the "little ones" who believe in Jesus (Matt. 18:6). Jesus was probably thinking both of children and of those who need special help from the body of believers. It is easy to give such people an occasion for straying away from Jesus. But those who do are subject to judgment. That is why the strong are exhorted not to cause the weak to stumble (Rom. 14:13, 21; 1 Cor. 8:13), for it destroys the work of God (Rom. 14:20).

We must also beware ourselves of separating ourselves from God by actions (Matt. 5:30) or by looking (5:29). The cutting off of part of the body is not to be taken lit. One should also beware of offenses caused by false doctrine and avoid those who create them (Rom. 16:17).

σκηνή (skēnē), tent, tabernacle, dwelling (5008); σκῆνος (skēnos), tent (5011); σκήνωμα (skēnōma), tent, dwelling (5013); σκηνοποιός (skēnopoios), leather worker, tentmaker (5010); σκηνόω (skēnoō), live, dwell, encamp (5012); ἐπισκηνόω (episkēnoō), take up one's abode with (2172); κατασκηνόω (kataskēnoō), live, dwell, perch (2942); κατασκήνωσις (kataskēnōsis), place to live, nest (2943); σκηνοπηγία (skēnopēgia), booth, tabernacle (5009).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. skēnē originally denoted a tent covering made of branches or poles with a matted roof and sides constructed from straw, leaves, or skins. The term was also used of the raised stage of a theater, the cover of a wagon, or the cabin of a ship. Because of the nature of a tent, it came to signify transitoriness.

2. (a) In the LXX skēnē (430x) and skēnōma (80x) are used synonymously, meaning tent, dwelling, or perhaps a matted booth or shed. skēnē is used for the tabernacle, the tent of meeting, the appointed place where God meets his people (cf. Exod. 26:36; Lev. 1:3) or where Yahweh resides. It was also called the "tabernacle of the Testimony" (cf. Acts 7:44; Rev. 15:5) because it contained the covenant tablets. skēnos is found only in Wis. 9:15: "A perishable body weighs down the soul, and this earthy tent burdens the thoughtful mind."

The tent is the customary dwelling of nomadic or seminomadic peoples. The Hebrew patriarchs were tent-dwellers (e.g., Gen. 12:8; 13:3; 26:25), as were the Israelites during their desert wanderings (Num. 16:27). Later, when celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles each year, the Israelites lived in tents for seven days to recall their journey from Egypt to Canaan (Lev. 23:34, 42–43). During the time of Jeremiah the simplicity and independence of the nomadic tent life was idealized by the Rechabites (Jer. 35:6–10 = LXX 42:7–10). Even when sedentary life became the norm (cf. Heb. 11:9–10), tents were used by shepherds (Isa. 38:12) or herdsmen (Jdg. 6:5) and by armies (2 Ki. 7:7–8).

(b) The tabernacle continued to be used long after Israel's entry into Canaan. Under the judges it was at Shiloh (Jos. 18:1) and during Saul's reign at Nob (1 Sam. 21) and Gibeon (1 Chr. 16:39). According to 1 Ki. 8:4, Solomon had it brought into the temple. Its structure and contents are described in Exod. 25–30; 35–38. The two interior compartments were divided by a veil or curtain. The first room, called "the Holy Place," was twenty cubits deep; the second, the "Most Holy Place" (Lev. 16:2–3; cf. Heb. 9:12; 10:19), was entered by the high priest on the annual Day of Atonement (Lev. 16).

In the Most Holy Place stood the ark (Exod. 25:10–22), a slab of gold with a cherub at each end resting on top. This article was termed the kappōret (LXX hilastērion; → hilaskomai, reconcile, 2661), the "atonement cover" or "mercy seat." The high priest sprinkled it with blood on the Day of Atonement. The altar of incense or the golden altar stood in the Holy Place in front of the curtain (30:1–10; 37:25–28); on the north side was the table of the bread of the Presence (25:23–30) together with various vessels and instruments. On the south side stood the lampstand (25:31–40; 37:17–24; 40:24). The tabernacle stood in a courtyard one hundred cubits by fifty cubits, with its door facing east (27:9–19; 38:9–20). The altar of burnt offering stood on the eastern side of the court (27:1–8; 38:1–7); between the altar and the tabernacle door stood the basin for the priests' washing (30:17–21; 38:8; 40:30–32). The later temple was modeled after the tabernacle.

NT 1. Luke's writings. In Lk. 16:9 Jesus encourages the diplomatic use of wealth so that when it collapses (either at an individual's death or the end of the world), the benefactor may be welcomed into "eternal dwellings [skēnē]." At Jesus' transfiguration Peter offered to construct "three shelters [skēnē]" for Jesus and the two heavenly visitors, Moses and Elijah (9:33). Peter wanted to perpetuate his experience of the unveiled glorious personal presence of God in Christ.

As he summarized the findings of the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:13–21), James appealed to Amos 9:11–12 (LXX). He recognized the rebuilding of "David's fallen tent" (possibly alluding to a matted hut in which David lived or held audience when he was on military expeditions) in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ and the rise of the church as the new Israel. It was precisely because of this restoration that Gentiles were seeking the Lord (Acts 15:17–18). Therefore, the Gentile mission was not illegitimate (15:19).

Acts 18:3 indicates that Aquila and Paul were "tentmakers" (skēnopoios) by trade. While this term originally meant tentmaker, it came to be used of leather workers in general. The articles that Paul made for sale probably included furnishings as well as tents (which in antiquity were often made of leather). By such manual labor Paul avoided being dependent on any congregation in which he was currently ministering.

The vb. kataskēnoō is used intrans. in the NT for to live, settle, dwell (of birds; cf. Ps. 104:12; Matt. 13:32; Mk. 4:32; Lk. 13:19; cf. also kataskēnōsis, a place to live, a nest in Matt. 8:20; Lk. 9:58). kataskēnoō occurs in a quotation from Ps. 16:9c, which is seen as being fulfilled in the resurrection of Jesus: "My body also will live in hope" (Acts 2:26).

2. John's writings. skēnoō is found only in Jn.'s writings. In the body of Jn.'s Gospel Jesus is pictured as the new temple (Jn. 2:19–22), but in the prologue he is the tabernacle ("made his dwelling" in 1:14 uses skēnoō), the locus of God's presence among humans on earth (cf. Exod. 25:8–9). Where Christ is, there is God's dwelling.

Rev. 7:15 pictures one of the elders before God's throne informing John that God "will spread his tent" (skēnoō) over those who have come out of the great tribulation; that is, he will live with them continuously within his temple. With the arrival of the new Jerusalem "prepared as a bride beautifully dressed for her husband," God will live with humans (21:2–3, where both skēnē and skēnoō are used). He himself will be personally and permanently present in the midst of his people, who will witness the final fulfillment of the oft-repeated promise of Yahweh to his covenant people: "I will be their God, and they will be my people" (Exod. 6:7; Lev. 26:12; Jer. 32:38; Ezek. 37:27; Zech. 8:8; 2 Cor. 6:16). Elsewhere in Rev. (12:12; 13:6) skēnoō is used of the permanent inhabitants of heaven.

skēnopēgia is found mostly as a technical term in Jewish religion for the building of tents or booths, i.e., the Feast of Booths or Tabernacles (e.g., Deut. 16:16; 31:10; Zech. 14:16, 18–19; 2 Macc. 1:9). It was celebrated in the month of Tishri 15–21 (i.e., October), when booths were made from branches of trees. Jn. 7:2 refers to this feast: "when the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles was near." Jesus rejected his brothers' plea to go to the feast in Jerusalem, do miracles there, and win popular acclaim (7:3–9). But he went during the middle of the feast after all (7:14). Then, on "the last and greatest day of the Feast," Jesus stood up and issued his invitation: "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink. Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, streams of living water will flow from within him" (7:37–38). That is, those who come to believe in Jesus will have fulfilled in them what the Scriptures prophesy about the activity of the Holy Spirit (cf. Isa. 58:11; Jn. 7:39).

There may have been a significant connection between these utterances of Jesus and the Feast of Tabernacles. According to Jewish tradition, on the seven days of the feast a golden flagon was filled with water from the pool of Siloam and used for libations. Jesus may well have been contrasting this water with the living water he gives. Similarly, his pronouncement about being the light of the world (Jn. 8:12) may be an allusion to the lights used in the feast.

3. Paul. The two NT uses of skēnos are in 2 Cor. 5:1, 4, where a believer's earthly body is described as a temporary tent, in contrast to the heavenly body that will form one's eternal dwelling. This skēnos concept remains near the foreground of the apostle's thought throughout 5:1–7. This word suggests the impermanence and frustrating limitations of mortal embodiment (5:2, 4, 6) and the Christian's pilgrimage of faith to the promised land of Christ's immediate presence (5:6–8). Although Paul honored the human body (cf. 1 Cor. 6:19), he was painfully aware of its inadequacy as an organ for either the human spirit or the Holy Spirit when compared to the resurrection body. In 2 Cor. 12:9 Paul uses episkēnoō, to take up one's abode, in his declaration: "Therefore I will boast all the more gladly about my weaknesses, so that Christ's power may rest on [episkēnoō] me." The passage concludes his discussion of his "thorn in the flesh."

4. Hebrews. Ten of the 20 NT uses of skēnē are in Heb., eight occurring in chs. 8–9. Heb. contrasts the heavenly and true skēnē pitched by God (8:1–2; 9:11) with the earthly tabernacle erected by Moses at divine direction (8:5; cf. 9:24). It is evident from Exod. 25:40 (cited in Heb. 8:5) that the earthly tabernacle was a precise model of a heavenly prototype visible to Moses. In 9:2–3, 6–8 the writer draws a distinction between a front or outer skēnē ("first room") and a rear or inner ("second") skēnē, i.e., between the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place. This distinction highlights the severe restrictions placed on human access into the Most Holy Place under the old covenant (for the various religious objects in the tabernacle, → hieron, temple, 2639).

Later in this book (Heb. 11:9, 13), tent nomadism is associated with being strangers and exiles. Finally, in 13:10 the expression "those who minister at the tabernacle" probably does not refer to Christian believers, as if their worship were focused on some fig. altar in the heavenly sanctuary, but to all the worshipers belonging to the old order to whom the sacrifice of Christ ("an altar," by metonymy) seemed superfluous.

5. Peter. In 2 Pet. 1:13–14 mortal existence and physical embodiment are equated with dwelling in a tent (skēnōma), death with the laying aside (or perhaps dismantling) of that tent (cf. Job 4:21). However, because the concept of laying aside such a tent (2 Pet. 1:14) refers more appropriately to a body than to a tent or dwelling, some prefer to render skēnōma in both these verses by "body" (NIV renders the second one as "it"). This putting aside marks departure from earthly life (1:15) and entrance into the eternal kingdom of Jesus Christ (1:11). Note also that in Stephen's speech (Acts 7:46) skēnōma is applied to the habitation that David wished to build for the God of Jacob.

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the noun skia has both a proper and a transferred meaning. It can mean a lit. shadow, thrown by an object (e.g., a tree or a rock) or a person. But it can also assume the meaning of skotos and indicate the sphere of darkness (→ 5030). A particularly important example of this is in the expression skia thanatou, shadow of death. skia here underlines the suggestion of threat already contained in the concept of death. This noun can also be used to signify the vanity of human actions and of humanity in general. Occasionally it can be translated image, reflection. Plato used skia alongside eikōn almost as a synonym (→ 1635), both of which describe a mere likeness of the true and eternal realities.

(b) The Platonic distinction between shadowy image and real form, which is ultimately equivalent to that between appearance and reality, plays an important part in Philo's religious philosophy. He describes God's works of creation as skia, so that we can draw conclusions from the visible world about the invisible God. The Logos, which has in addition a mediating function, can also be called eikōn and skia. Philo makes a conscious distinction between the exceptional, mediatorial role of Moses, and that of the prophets, attributing to Moses a knowledge of God en eidei, in form, while the prophets know him only en skia, in a shadow.

(c) episkiazō means to overshadow, cover, which is an intensive form of skiazō, to shade. The noun aposkiasma occurs nowhere in pre-Christian lit.; it signifies a darkening caused by the movements of constellations.

2. (a) In the LXX skia means shadow. Most frequently it is found in a concrete sense: the shadow of mountains (Jdg. 9:36), plants (Ezek. 17:23; 31:6; Jon. 4:6), a booth (4:5), and a sundial (2 Ki. 20:9–11; Isa. 38:8).

(b) There is no mention in the OT of a human shadow; but the idea is in the background of Isa. 51:16, with its mention of "the shadow of [God's] hand" (cf. 49:2) and in places where the "shadow of the Almighty" is mentioned (Ps. 91:1; cf. 57:1). In Exod. 40:34–35 is a reference to the cloud whose shadow is a demonstration of God's authority. Paradoxically, words of this group assume a positive meaning akin to that of phōs, light, in passages where "shadow" refers to the sphere of God's protection and shelter rather than some sinister darkness.

(c) The negative sense of skia is retained in places where, in poetic lit., skia is linked with thanatos, death (e.g., Job 3:5; 12:22; 28:3; Ps. 23:4; 107:10, 14; Isa. 9:2). In these contexts skia denotes the realm of darkness, which threatens life. The metaphor of shadow is a favorite one for describing the short and transitory nature of human life. For "man is like a breath; his days are like a fleeting shadow" (Ps. 144:4; cf. 1 Chr. 29:15; Job 14:2).

(d) In the Apocr. "shadow" is used chiefly to demonstrate the nothingness of human life (cf. Wis. 2:5; 5:9) and effort (cf. Sir. 34:2 = LXX 31:2). But the lit. meaning is also found (cf. Wis. 19:7; Bar. 5:8, both using skiazō); skia can also refer to an (earthly) empire (cf. Bar. 1:12).

NT 1. In the NT skia occurs 7x, the vb. episkiazō 5x, and aposkiasma once. At Mk. 4:32 we find the lit. meaning: Birds will be able to nest in the shadow of the mustard plant when it has grown into a tree. The shadow of a shrub affording shelter to birds indicates a place of security such as is offered by nature.

2. In all 5 uses of episkiazō, God is ultimately the cause of the overshadowing, which demonstrates his power and glory. The sphere of God's rule is characterized in the Synoptic Gospels by use of the OT image of the bright cloud that overshadowed (episkiazō) Jesus and his disciples during his transfiguration (Matt. 17:5; Mk. 9:5; Lk. 9:34). Here the cloud's shadow symbolizes God's gracious presence.

In Lk. 1:35 the specific image of a cloud throwing its shadow is lacking. Instead, there is a more abstract and yet direct reference to the divine subject of episkiazō when Mary is told: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you." The vb. here recalls the Shekinah presence of Yahweh.

Acts 5:15, which speaks about the sick who were carried out on to the street "so that at least Peter's shadow might fall on some of them as he passed by," points to the healing power of God, whose sphere of operation is in this case identified with Peter.

3. As in the OT, skia in the NT can also refer to the sphere of darkness in which people find themselves before they come to the light. By nature humanity lives in the land and the shadow of death (cf. the citation of Isa. 9:2 in Matt. 4:16 and the words about John the Baptist at Lk. 1:79). Here death and darkness are intensified to mean the darkness of separation from God and from his Messiah.

4. It is not only the transitoriness of human life, however, with its threatened termination by death, that is expressed by skia. As in Philo, skia plays an important part in the distinction drawn between real and unreal existence in Col. and Heb. In Heb. skia stands with hypodeigma, copy (Heb. 8:5, → 5682), and parabolē, likeness (9:9, → 4130), in stark contrast to typos, pattern (8:5, → 5596), and eikōn, form (10:1, → 1635). Unlike Philo, the author of Heb. understands this contrast Christologically. That is, in comparison with the high-priestly work of Jesus Christ, who is in the heavens, all earthly worship, as conducted in the tabernacle, takes on secondary importance. Thus the Mosaic law may not be regarded as absolute in its validity, for it belongs to the "shadow of the good things that are coming" (Heb. 10:1; cf. 8:5).

Col. 2:17 asserts that questions of food and drink, festival, New Moon, and Sabbaths "are a shadow [skia] of the things that were to come; the reality, however, is found in Christ." The person who belongs to Christ, the bearer of true reality, does not have to submit to the judgment of others in such matters. It is not that the ordinance has been suspended. Rather, it is made clear that the direct relation to God established by faith in Christ has priority, since it links humanity with genuine reality, with God in Christ.

5. Before this God all that is earthly, including certain religious and cultic formalities, cannot but appear transient. Earthly things are marked by the characteristics of the shadow: change and darkening. With God, on the other hand, the Father of lights, there is no "change like shifting shadows [aposkiasma]" (Jas. 1:17); that is, the processes of change and darkening, such as occur among the constellations, are excluded in the case of God.

σκληρός (sklēros), hard, rough (5017); σκληρότης (sklērotēs), hardness (5018); σκληρύνω (sklērynō), to be, become, hard (5020); σκληροτράχηλος (sklērotrachēlos), stiff-necked, obstinate (5019); πωρόω (pōroō), harden, become hard (4800); πώρωσις (pōrōsis), hardness (4801); παχύνω (pachynō), thicken, make insensitive (4266).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. sklēros means dry, hard, rough; sklērotēs, hardness. The vb. sklērynō was originally a medical term meaning to harden (act.) or to grow hard (pass.). sklērotrachēlos means stiff-necked, stubborn, obdurate. (b) pōroō (derived from pōros, porous stone) means to harden, form a callous, and thus petrify or become hard. (c) pachynō, from pachys (thick, fat) originally meant to thicken, fatten, then by extension to make impervious (to water). Hence fig. it came to mean to make insensitive; in the pass., to be insensitive.

2. Hardening, according to the OT, results from the fact that people persist in shutting themselves to God's call and command. A state then arises in which they are no longer able to hear and are therefore irretrievably enslaved. Alternatively, God makes the hardening final, so that the people affected by it cannot escape from it.

(a) In the oldest OT narratives it is always non-Israelites who are hardened. The most important is that of the hardening of Pharaoh (Exod. 4–14). After every appeal by Moses and every plague we read, "Yet Pharaoh's heart became hard" (7:13, 22; 8:15, etc.). It was God who hardened Pharaoh's heart. Whole peoples could be hardened by God (e.g., the Canaanites, Jos. 11:20). Non-Israelites were hardened, therefore, only when they came into contact with Israel, for the hardening of the peoples was one of the means God used to fulfill his purpose for Israel.

(b) Not until the appearance of the great prophets do we see Israel as a hardened people. This is expressed most strongly in Isa.'s writings. God's word had come to the priests and the prophets in Jerusalem, but they did not want to listen. Consequently, that word became a word of judgment against them, "so that they will go and fall backward, be injured and snared and captured" (28:13). On the occasion of his call Isaiah received the command, "Make the heart of this people calloused [pachynō]; make their ears dull and close their eyes" (6:10). One of God's judgments on his people is not that he no longer speaks to them. Granted, God's word is still proclaimed with utter clarity. But because the people have not wanted to listen, from now on they will be unable to do so. The vineyard that did not want to bear fruit is now unable to bear, because God has forbidden the clouds to rain on it (5:1–7).

(c) The claim that God himself is the one who mercilessly hardens Israel is an extreme statement. The later prophets do not speak with the same severity. Jer. speaks of hardening, but he no longer names God as its cause (6:28). For Jer. the cause is the obstinacy of the people who give heed to the false prophets. The decisive new element is the promise of God's new covenant. Then Israel will hear and recognize the Lord (31:33–34), and people will receive a new, no longer hard, heart and a new spirit (Ezek. 36:26–27).

(d) In the wisdom lit. the godless are often characterized as hardened (e.g., Prov. 28:14; 29:1). Here attention is directed more to the guilt occasioned by such hardness.

Hardening is the continually mounting refusal to listen to God's law. It is not, however, inevitable. There is room, therefore, for the appeal, "Today, if you hear his voice, do not harden your hearts" (Ps. 95:7–8). For God's judgment takes place as a result of hardness.

NT 1. (a) sklēros is used in a metaphorical sense of things: e.g., "strong" winds (Jas. 3:4), or a "hard [unacceptable] teaching" of Jesus (Jn. 6:60). God will punish the ungodly because of all the "harsh" things they have spoken against him (Jude 15, quoting 1 Enoch 1:9). sklēros is also used of people: The master in the parable of the talents is described in Matt. 25:24 as "a hard [hard-hearted] man." The word is used absolutely in Acts 26:14: "It is hard [difficult] for you to kick against the goads."

(b) sklērotēs occurs in Rom. 2:5 to describe a human characteristic. Specifically, by the Jews' "stubbornness" and unrepentant hearts, they were storing up for themselves the wrath of the coming judgment.

(c) sklērynō is used trans. with a human subject: "Do not harden your hearts" (Heb. 3:8, 15; 4:7). The appeal of Ps. 95:8 is repeated three times; the community must not forfeit God's promise. Heb. 3:13 takes up the appeal of 3:8 in the pass., that no one "may be hardened" by the deceitfulness of sin. God is subject of the hardening in Rom. 9:18: "He hardens whom he wants to harden." The hardening of Pharaoh in Exod. 4:21 is doubtless in the background here. God punishes by abandoning people to their sin (cf. Rom. 1:24, 26, 28). Acts 19:9 records that some Jews in Ephesus, "obstinate" at Paul's preaching in the synagogue, refused to believe.

(d) sklērotrachēlos occurs only in Acts 7:51. In his speech Stephen calls the Jews "stiff-necked . . . with uncircumcised hearts and ears." Like their fathers and unwilling to listen to God, they always resist the Holy Spirit and instead kill his prophets.

2. (a) pōroō is used metaphorically in all five passages where it occurs. Mk. 6:52 and 8:17 use the word of the hardening of Jesus' disciples so that they do not understand who the Lord is. In Jn. 12:40 pōroō refers to the Jews at whose hand Jesus met with rejection (quoting Isa. 6:10). In two passages of Paul it also refers to the Jews: "The others [i.e., the non-elect] were hardened" (Rom. 11:7); "their minds were made dull" (2 Cor. 3:14).

(b) Two passages also apply the verbal noun pōrōsis to the Jews. Jesus is grieved at their "stubborn hearts" (Mk. 3:5; cf. Matt. 19:8; Mk. 10:5, sklērokardia, → kardia, 2840), while Paul states that "a hardening in part" has come on Israel (Rom. 11:25). In Eph. 4:18 the apostle says that Gentiles have no understanding and are separated from God because of "the hardening of their hearts."

3. Both passages where pachynō occurs (Matt. 13:15; Acts 28:27) quote from Isa. 6:10.

4. All these words are used in a metaphorical and theological sense and denote the same idea: the reluctance of humans to respond to God. In the NT those who do not open themselves to the gospel are described as hardened—Jews, Gentiles, and even Jesus' disciples when they do not understand the coming cross. The prophetic idea that God hardens people is taken over from the OT (e.g., Rom. 11) without for a moment losing sight of the notion of personal responsibility (2:5). The inability to hear renders a person liable to judgment. The appeals in Heb. not to harden our hearts are meaningful only because hardness is broken down with the promise of forgiveness and a new beginning (cf. 8:9–10). With the gospel God also gives the ability to understand it.

God gave people over to their sin (Rom. 1:24), but in Christ he gives a new opportunity of hearing through his Spirit. He thus fulfills the promises of the OT.

Over against hardening, the inability to receive God's word, stands faith as the obedient reception of the word. Still, Paul grapples with the question of whether, despite Christ's coming, the Jews will remain hardened in his exposition of God's plan of salvation in Rom. 9–11.

5020 (sklērynō, to be, become, hard), → 5017.

σκόλοψ (skolops), thorn (5022).

CL & OT This word is not common in secular Gk. Originally it meant a pointed stake that was used in defense or as that on which the head of an enemy could be stuck. But it is also well-attested as a word for a thorn or splinter.

skolops is used metaphorically in the LXX. In Num. 33:55 it identifies those whom, if the Israelites failed to drive them out of the land, would become "barbs [lit., thorns] in your eyes." In Ezek. 28:24, when the Lord gathers his people back from exile, their neighbors will no longer be "painful briers" or "sharp thorns (akantha)" (see also Hos. 2:8 = LXX 2:6; Sir. 43:19).

NT skolops is used only once in the NT, for Paul's "thorn in [his] flesh" (2 Cor. 12:7). In the prior context Paul refers to his own "visions and revelations" (12:1) in reply to those at Corinth who were vaunting their own spiritual experiences and decrying Paul's foolishness and weakness (11:16–21). Whereas his opponents made much of power, Paul refrains from boasting, "so no one will think more of me than is warranted by what I do or say" (12:6). He goes on: "To keep me from becoming conceited because of these surpassingly great revelations, there was given me a thorn [skolops] in my flesh, a messenger of Satan, to torment me."

Various theories have been offered as to what this thorn was. Perhaps it was a temptation to hate or to covet. Some scholars take "flesh" in the broadest sense as the sphere of physical existence, so that Paul need not be referring to a physical ailment but perhaps to his opponents or Satan's work behind them. Note that physical ailments are not implied in the OT uses of the word.

Still, the context suggests some definite weakness or hardship (12:9–10; cf. 11:23–30). Epilepsy or some form of eye trouble are possible explanations if the expression refers to a bodily ailment. In support of the latter some commentators refer to Gal. 4:13–15, where Paul refers to an "illness" and reminds the Galatians that "you would have torn out your eyes and given them to me." The theory of eye trouble may be supported by the reference to the "large letters" Paul wrote with his own hand (6:11). Likewise, the reference to bearing in his body "the marks of Jesus" (6:17) may refer to some physical illness or to afflictions suffered in the course of preaching the gospel. Luke the physician's attendance on Paul may have been due to Paul's ailments.

The exact nature of the thorn in the flesh remains obscure. In any case, the affliction that may have been severe is seen to be ultimately trivial. The case illustrates the role of intercessory prayer. Paul did not regard it as wrong to pray for himself for alleviation. But in answer to his prayer the Lord said to him, "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. 12:9). Paul did not regard the Christian life as a life free from weakness and hardship. In response Paul declares: "I will boast all the more gladly about my weaknesses, so that Christ's power may rest on me. That is why, for Christ's sake, I delight in weaknesses, in insults, in hardships, in persecutions, in difficulties. For when I am weak, then I am strong" (12:9–10).

σκορπίζω (skorpizō), scatter, disperse, distribute (5025); διασκορπίζω (diaskorpizō), scatter, disperse, waste (1399); διαλύω (dialyō), break up, dissolve, disperse (1370); διασπείρω (diaspeirō), scatter (1401).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. skorpizō means to scatter, disperse, as do diaskorpizō and diaspeirō. In the Christian era it is sometimes used in the pass. of churches. dialyō, which generally means break up, dissolve, can be used of the dispersing of a crowd.

2. In the LXX diaspeirō appears approximately 60x, diaskorpizō, 50x, skorpizō, 21x, and dialyō, 12x. These verbs are used intrans. of those who disperse themselves and are scattered; e.g., a people (Gen. 11:4; Num. 10:35; 1 Sam. 11:11; 13:11; Ezek. 46:18) or a flock (34:5; Zech. 13:7). They are also used trans. to mean shatter a people (Jer. 13:14; 51:23 = LXX 28:23); cast loosely about, spread (e.g., Mal. 2:3); rout enemies (Isa. 41:16; Jer. 15:7; Ezek. 5:2); or disperse nations (Lev. 26:33; Ezek. 5:10; 6:5; 30:26).

NT skorpizō occurs only 5x in the NT. In Jn. it occurs in connection with the persecution of Christians (Jn. 16:32) and in the allegory in which "the wolf attacks the flock and scatters it" (10:12). Both Matt. and Lk. draw attention to the missionary principle enunciated by Jesus: "He who is not with me is against me, and he who does not gather with me scatters" (Matt. 12:30; Lk. 11:23). Jesus here takes the theme of gathering and scattering applied in the OT to the people of God (Isa. 40:11; 49:6; Ezek. 34:13, 16) and applies it to his own significance in the end time. The comparable inverted form of this saying—"whoever is not against us is for us" (Mk. 9:40; cf. Lk. 9:50)—occurs in the context of casting out demons. These are not contradictory, however, for the former was spoken to the indifferent about themselves, the latter to the disciples about another adherent of Jesus. Paul uses skorpizō once in a quotation from Ps. 112:9 in his argument for a benevolent offering for the poor in Jerusalem (2 Cor. 9:9).

diaskorpizō (9x in NT) can refer to the squandering of resources, either one's own or those entrusted by someone else (Lk. 15:13; 16:1). The vb. also highlights the persecution and dispersion of the messianic community, for the "shepherd" will be smitten and the "sheep" scattered (Matt. 26:31; Mk. 14:27; cf. Zech. 13:7). Lk. uses the vb. in Mary's song to express her confidence in God's ability to turn tables on the lofty (Lk. 1:51). A striking instance of the scattering of the proud appears in the case of Judas the Galilean, whose followers dispersed when he was discredited as a messianic pretender (Acts 5:37). Matt. twice contrasts "scattering" and "gathering" in the parable of the talents (25:24, 26). John sees Jesus' mission as embracing the "scattered children of God" (i.e., Gentiles) as well as Jews, in order that he might "bring them together and make them one" (Jn. 11:52).

The verb dialyō appears in the NT only when Gamaliel draws attention to the futility of the revolt led by Theudas and the subsequent dispersal of his followers (Acts 5:36).

The vb. diaspeirō is used 3x of the dispersion of the early Christians through persecution (Acts 8:1, 4; 11:19). The beneficent result of such circumstances was the proclamation of the Christian message in new areas; that is, persecution paved the way for missionary advance. On the related noun diaspora, → 1402.

5028 (skotia, darkness, gloom), → 5030.

σκότος (skotos), darkness, gloom (5030); σκοτία (skotia), darkness, gloom (5028); σκοτόω (skotoō), darken (5031); σκοτίζομαι (skotizomai), darken (5029); σκοτεινός (skoteinos), dark, obscure (5027).

CL & OT 1. Both skotos and skotia mean essentially the same: darkness, gloom. Likewise, skotoō and skotizomai mean darken, become dark. Darkness applies primarily to the state characterized by the absence of light. Uses of the word concentrate on the effect of darkness on humanity. In the dark humans grope around uncertainly, since their ability to see is limited. They may not know which way to turn. Thus, darkness appears as a place of danger and anxiety. Since all anxiety ultimately derives from the fear of death, the ominous character of darkness culminates in the darkness of death, which no one can escape. Darkness is therefore also Hades, the world of the dead.

Freed from their temporal sense, the words of this group can describe human ways of life and behavior. They can describe one's seclusion or obscurity. They can also indicate the secrecy, furtiveness, or deceitfulness of one's activity, as well as one's lack of enlightenment, insight. and knowledge.

2. In Gnosticism, darkness becomes an independent force, seen as the unlimited ruler of the earthly world. In contrast to this world of darkness shines the transcendent world. Humanity has been endowed with a soul, coming from a spark of light. By means of gnōsis (knowledge) people can attain to enlightenment; agnoia, ignorance, keeps one from salvation. The contrast between the world of light and of darkness results in a call to metanoia, repentance (conversion), the decision to turn from the darkness of the earth-bound and bodily to the light and life.

3. The key to the OT view of light and darkness is faith in God as Creator, who stands above both. He is not only the Lord of light; darkness also bows before him. Darkness is first mentioned in connection with the primeval chaos (Gen. 1:2). God creates both light and darkness (Isa. 45:7), and he causes day to follow night (Ps. 104:20; Amos 5:8; cf. Gen. 1:4–5, 18). In his saving activity he can make use of darkness, as when he sent darkness on Egypt (Exod. 10:22; Ps. 105:28).

The fact that God is Lord over darkness does not automatically diminish the threat of this force hostile to humankind. Darkness is a symbol of limitation, restraint, and affliction (Isa. 9:1 = LXX 9:2). Humans belong to this sphere by nature (8:22; cf. 60:2). Even the righteous are exposed to the terrors of darkness (Job 19:8; 30:26; Ps. 88:6). When people separate themselves from God by disobedience, darkness remains (107:10–11). Conversely, God illumines the darkness for those who fear him. Those who walk through the valley of deep darkness need not fear (Ps. 23:4; cf. 112:4; Isa. 50:10; Mic. 7:8), for darkness is not dark to God (Ps. 139:11–12) and to those led by him (Isa. 42:7, 16; 49:9).

God promises that the people who walk in darkness will see a great light (Isa. 9:2). But sinners, who hide themselves from the light of God (29:15), are heading for that day when God will bring the darkness of sin into the light (Job 12:22) and hold a terrible judgment (34:23–24). Hence the prophets proclaim that the day of Yahweh will not be, as the people expect, a day of joy for Israel but rather a day of darkness and calamity (Joel 2:2, 10; Amos 5:20; 8:9)—unless they repent (Joel 2:12–17).

Eschatological darkness means the final and eternal destruction of the faithless and disobedient.

4. Later Jewish writings develop the concept of eschatological darkness and damnation in the world beyond (cf. Jub. 5:14; 1 Enoch 17:6; 63:6; 108:11–14). The purpose of such teaching is to bring about enlightenment and a decision to follow the way of light. Qumran lit. frequently refers to humanity caught in the tension between light and darkness. Darkness seeks to lead them astray, but they can extricate themselves from the power of darkness by deciding to enter the covenant as a child of light.

NT 1. The NT uses the word darkness in a lit. sense to indicate time in connection with night setting in or departing (Jn. 6:17; 20:1). Metaphorically but without negative allusion attaching to night, skotia and phōs (light) are used in Matt. 10:27 and Lk. 12:3.

2. The skotia word group connotes a clearly negative sense in those passages that contrast a sound eye in a body full of light with an evil eye in a body full of darkness (Matt. 6:22–23; Lk. 11:34–36). At Jesus' arrest (22:53) and still more in his hour of death (Matt. 27:45; Mk. 15:33; Lk. 23:44), the power of darkness gave the impression of having won a victory. But at Easter the divine power of light triumphed once and for all over the satanic powers of darkness. It is in the light of this victory that darkness is mostly seen and evaluated in the NT.

3. The natural abode for human beings is in darkness. People live in darkness (cf. Isa. 9:2, quoted in Matt. 4:16) and cannot avoid the darkness of death (Lk. 1:79). In this sphere the power of Satan holds sway (Acts 26:18; cf. Eph. 6:12), which impels humans to do the evil works of darkness (Jn. 3:19; Rom. 13:12; Eph. 5:11); "their foolish hearts [are] darkened" (Rom. 1:21). This includes Jews, whose strict adherence to the law can cause them to become blind leaders of the blind (Matt. 8:12; 15:14; cf. Rom. 2:19). In fact, darkness can be so dominating that Paul writes that the Ephesians once were darkness (Eph. 5:8).

4. Darkness is not, of course, a power equal with God. He is in control of it; for example, he blinded the magician Bar-Jesus by a word of the Spirit spoken by Paul (Acts 13:11). Just as in creation, God now causes light to shine in human hearts out of darkness (2 Cor. 4:6). He is Lord over darkness, a lordship displayed above all in Jesus Christ, whom he has sent into the world to call his people out of darkness into his wonderful light (1 Pet. 2:9), into the kingdom of the Son of his love (Col. 1:13).

This theme is particularly prevalent in John, who often uses the metaphor of light and darkness. Thus in the prologue of his Gospel he writes: "The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not overcome it" (Jn. 1:5, cf. NIV note). Light and darkness are mutuallly exclusive elements (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14), and we must make a decision for one or the other, for God or against him—or to be more precise, for Jesus Christ, who is "the light of the world" (Jn. 12:46; cf. 8:12). Those who believe in him (12:46) and follow him no longer walk in darkness (8:12).

5. It is not enough merely, however, to confess allegiance to the light with one's lips. No one can have fellowship with God and at the same time walk in darkness; such people are liars (1 Jn. 1:6). Refusal to love others means living in darkness (2:9–11; cf. Jn. 12:35). Such people have not understood that darkness is passing away and that the one true light is already shining (1 Jn. 2:8).

For those people who stubbornly reject the light, who refuse to acknowledge Jesus Christ as Lord, and who perform the works of darkness—here false teachers come in for special mention (2 Pet. 2:17; Jude 13)—a day of deepest darkness is coming, God's judgment. On that day the Lord will "bring to light what is hidden in darkness and will expose the motives of men's hearts" (1 Cor. 4:5). Such people will be cast out into the gloomy place of eschatological destruction (cf. Matt. 8:12; 22:13; 25:30).

This judgment is expected at the second coming of Christ, which will be accompanied by manifestations of darkness, when "the sun will be darkened, and the moon will not give its light" (Matt. 24:29; Mk. 13:24; cf. Isa. 13:10; Ezek. 32:7). Thus, Paul can strongly exhort Christians to watchfulness and soberness in the light of the Parousia, which will suddenly overtake them (1 Thess. 5:4–6).

σκύβαλον (skybalon), refuse, dung (5032).

CL This depressing word means rubbish and muck of many kinds: excrement, rotten food, bits left at a meal as not worth eating, a rotting corpse. Nastiness and decay are the constant elements of its meaning. It is a coarse, ugly word implying worthlessness and repulsiveness. skybalon occurs once in the LXX, signifying moral uncleanness (Sir. 27:4).

NT The only NT usage of skybalon is in Phil. 3:8, where Paul writes that all the natural and religious privileges that once seemed sweet and precious to him as a Pharisee he now considers "rubbish." Now that Paul is a believer, they no longer have any value to him.

σμύρνα (smyrna), myrrh (5043); σμυρνίζω (smyrnizō), mix with myrrh (5046); μύρον (myron), ointment, perfume (3693).

OT Myrrh is a gum from a low, thorny tree that grows primarily in Somaliland, Ethiopia, and Arabia. The gum exudes from the trunk and branches, giving a pleasant fragrance. The LXX uses smyrna to translate Heb. mōr or môr. In Exod. 30:23 it is an important ingredient in the anointing oil used in the consecration of the tabernacle and priests. In Ps. 45:8 its fragrance is mentioned in connection with the oil of gladness with which God anoints his chosen king (see also Song 3:6; 4:6, 14; 5:1, 5, 13; Sir. 24:15).

NT smyrna was among the gifts brought to the infant Jesus by the Gentile Magi (Matt. 2:11). Here and elsewhere outside the Bible it is mentioned together with incense. These gifts may have been understood as a fulfillment of Ps. 72:10–11 (cf. also Isa. 60:6).

Nicodemus brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes weighing a hundred pounds to the burial of Jesus (Jn. 19:39). This large amount was probably an expression of honor. Jn. 19:40 indicates that spices were usually laid between the clothes in which the body was wrapped (cf. also Mk. 16:1; Lk. 23:56; 24:1). This attempt to preserve Jesus' body suggests that none of those involved expected an immediate resurrection.

The pass. part. of smyrnizō occurs in Mk. 15:23 in the reference to the "wine mixed with myrrh" that was offered to Jesus by the soldiers prior to the crucifixion. This is often taken to be an anodyne given to condemned prisoners to blunt their consciousness, though it may have been nothing more than a drink given by the soldiers to the exhausted.

myron is probably best translated as ointment or perfume (Matt. 26:7, 9, 12; Mk. 14:3–5; Lk. 7:37–38, 46; 23:56; Jn. 11:2; 12:3, 5; Rev. 18:13).

Σολομών (Solomōn), Solomon (5048).

OT Solomon was the son (by Bathsheba) and successor of David, the last king of a united Israel. His reign (ca. 961–ca. 922 B.C.) was peaceful and prosperous, except for some economic difficulties and abortive revolts toward the end of it. It was without doubt the most splendid era in Israel's history. Building on the foundations laid by David, Solomon organized an efficient administration, developed industry and commerce, and established harmonious relationships with neighboring states. His most lasting achievement was the building of the temple in Jerusalem.

At birth, he was named both Solomon and Jedidiah (2 Sam. 12:24–25). The meaning of Solomon is not certain—"his [i.e., Yahweh's] peace, well-being" is possible, but most probable is "his compensation," i.e., God's compensation to David for the death of Bathsheba's firstborn. He was by no means David's oldest son, and thus it was not without rivalry and intrigue that he came to the throne, first as coregent with David (1 Ki. 1). He quickly and ruthlessly consolidated his position (1 Ki. 2) and then took appropriate steps to strengthen his kingdom and empire. In the face of external foes, Jerusalem and other strategic cities were fortified and garrisoned with a powerful chariot force (9:15–19; 10:26). Solomon attempted to strengthen the internal structures of Israel by breaking down the old tribal pattern and replacing it with a system of administrative districts (4:7–19).

Solomon established good relations with neighboring states, esp. Tyre and Egypt (1 Ki. 3:1; 5:12; but cf. 9:12). These alliances not only provided military security but also encouraged the development of commerce, both overland and maritime (cf. 10:22, 25). The trade was boosted by the exploitation of Israel's resources, esp. the copper mines in the Negev.

In all these cases Solomon displayed vision, statesmanship, and skill; the divine promise of wisdom, made at the start of his reign, was thus amply fulfilled (1 Ki. 3:12). The wisdom for which his name became a byword was two-fold. (1) It was a practical wisdom; statecraft and the administration of justice were above all the areas in which it was needed and demonstrated (3:9, 16–28). (2) It was an academic and didactic wisdom; in a world already famed for its wise men, Solomon showed himself outstanding, making major contributions to the collection of proverbial and related material (4:29–34). His name is linked with the books of Prov. (1:1), Song of Songs (1:1), and (by implication) Eccl. (1:1), and we may see him as the founder and patron of a great deal of literary activity in Israel. He may well have established "wisdom schools" in Israel.

Solomon's shrewdness and sagacity were not, however, unalloyed. Many of his ventures were excessive and expensive, so that he gradually impoverished the country. In time, heavy taxation and forced service caused deep resentments, which eventually broke up his kingdom (cf. 1 Ki. 12:1–20). His diplomatic marriages were but the beginning of a vast and expensive harem. His personal piety also lapsed into a measure of apostasy and idolatry (11:1–10). Ironically, the man who built the temple was the first one to adulterate its worship.

In later lit., beginning at least with Josephus, many legends and legendary features became attached to the OT's more realistic information. In particular, the story of the Queen of Sheba's visit (1 Ki. 10:1–13) attracted many such accretions. Solomon's wisdom, magnificence, and pious attachment to the law of Moses were heightened and extolled while his faults were glossed over. Strangely, the weight of later Jewish criticisms of Solomon centered on something of which he was not historically guilty, namely, the development of magical practices.

NT Solomon figures little in the NT; he is neither exalted nor denigrated. In Matt. 1:6–7 he appears in his appropriate place in the genealogy of Christ. Matt. 6:29 and Lk. 12:27 mention his splendor, Matt. 12:42 and Lk. 11:31 his wisdom. Finally Acts 7:47 recognizes him as the builder of the temple.

These widely separated references both acknowledge Solomon's achievements but also highlight their lack of finality in God's purposes. Solomon was great David's son, but he was not the promised Messiah, merely his progenitor (Matt. 1:6–7). Solomon had indeed built a majestic temple in God's honor; but the whole burden of Stephen's speech in Acts 7 is to depreciate any temple "made by men" (7:48). Solomon's temple and the second temple after it became centers of apostasy and unbelief. Both Acts 7:50 and Matt. 6:29 turn the reader's attention from human achievement such as Solomon's to the glories of the Creator. Finally, 12:42 expressly states that Solomon in all his wisdom has been eclipsed by Christ. This verse, which is primarily attacking Jewish unbelief, suggests that Solomon is as a type of Christ.

σοφία (sophia), wisdom (5053); σοφός (sophos), wise (5055); σοφίζω (sophizō), make wise, teach, instruct; mid. to reason out, devise craftily (5054).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. sophos and sophia denote an attribute, not an activity. They indicate unusual ability and knowledge, either in the practical sphere or in theoretical knowledge. In some cases sophia was held to be an innate sense of wisdom and discernment; the Sophists, however, viewed it as knowledge that could be taught and acquired. Socrates' wisdom consisted in the fact that he knew that he knew nothing. All authoritarian wisdom is in reality no wisdom. In Plato wisdom is related to his view of eternal forms or ideas. For Aristotle, sophia and philosophia were identical. With the Stoics theory and practice coincide; wisdom is realized knowledge.

2. (a) As a rule, this word group occurs in the LXX to render words from the stem ḥkm, the majority of which are in wisdom lit. (Job, Ps., Prov., Eccl.; also Sir. and Wis.). This word group has a wide breadth of meaning. sophia denotes specialist knowledge in a particular field, such as a handicraft or art (Exod. 36:1–2), but also economic shrewdness (cf. Prov. 8:1, 18, 21), the art of governing (8:15), and education (1 Ki. 4:29–34). Moreover, the OT is concerned with wise behavior that enables one to master life (Prov. 8:32–36), which depends on right conduct in obedience to God's will rather than on theoretical insight. Wisdom is thus integrally connected with the fear of Yahweh (9:10; cf. 1:7; 15:33 = LXX 16:4; Job 28:28; Ps. 111:10).

(b) The OT is aware of wisdom in the surrounding nations (e.g., in Babylon, Jer. 50:35; 51:57; Egypt, 1 Ki. 4:30). There are astonishing parallels between certain Egyptian texts and Heb. wisdom lit. (e.g., between Prov. 22:17–23:11 and the Egyptian Wisdom of Amenemope). But even as they adapted these texts, Israel brought them firmly into line with its own religious convictions. Also, just as in Egypt wisdom texts served in the training and education of future palace officials, so at Solomon's court such texts were collected for the training and education of the rising generation of royal advisers. Daniel and his companions also belong to these courtly circles (Dan. 2:48; 5:11–12).

(c) Over all acquired and transmitted wisdom, however, stands the wisdom given as a gift by God to King Solomon (1 Ki. 3:5–14), which finds expression in judicial shrewdness (3:16–28) and leads, in later minds, to admiring recognition by Israel's neighbors (4:31, 34; 10:1–9). Here is founded the longing of later generations for the splendor and security of Solomon's reign. It is equally comprehensible that wisdom was expected in the hoped-for messianic king (Isa. 11:2).

(d) The concept of wisdom is pervasive in postexilic times. Wisdom, now conceived in personal terms, becomes the mediator of revelation and a teacher (Prov. 8:1–21), who summons (1:20–21; 8:32–34) and invites us into her presence (9:1–6). Created prior to all the works of creation (8:22–31), wisdom discloses the original order inherent in creation. She thus gains the role of a divine principle implanted in the world.

3. (a) In Hel. Jud. wisdom is identified with the law (Sir. 24:8–34; cf. also Josephus). The student of wisdom follows her like a lover and wins all the bliss of living with her (14:20–27). Wisdom was not only present at the creation but is herself creator as the "mother" of all good things and innumerable riches (Wis. 7:12). She sits by the throne of God (9:4), mediating God's salvation (7:27). Similar ideas are found in Philo. For rab. Jud., wisdom and scriptural erudition are essentially identical.

(b) In the Dead Sea Scrolls wisdom is influenced by the dualism of the sect's theology. God's all-embracing plan for the world, the goal of which is the annihilation of the wicked, is determined by wisdom (1QS 4:18). The elect are allotted wisdom by the Spirit of truth (4:21–22).

NT In the NT terms from this word group are found mostly in 1 Cor. 1–3 (26x) and Paul's later writings, whereas the Gospels and other books seldom use them.

1. Gospels. (a) The use of these words in the Gospels is generally tied to the traditional OT and Jewish conception, where wisdom is a person's approach to life, arising out of life in the covenant bestowed by God and so must be regarded as the gift of God. Thus, the twelve-year-old Jesus grew in wisdom and insight and distinguished himself by his exceptional knowledge of the law (Lk. 2:40, 52). Mk. 6:2 depicts the later astonishment of the inhabitants of Nazareth at the wisdom given to Jesus (cf. Matt. 13:54). In Acts Stephen is similarly represented as a man equipped by God with the Spirit and wisdom, whose testimony cannot be contradicted for this reason (6:3, 10; cf. also the promise of wisdom for defense speeches during the coming final days, Lk. 21:15).

(b) The Jewish tradition of a personally understood wisdom who calls people to her may lie behind the remarkable statement that "wisdom is proved right by her actions" (Matt. 11:19). Jesus and John his witness are understood as the mouths of wisdom, who brings salvation. Note that God's word of wisdom in Lk. 11:49 is cited as a word of Jesus in Matt. 23:34–35; Jesus is wisdom come to earth, someone "greater than Solomon" (12:42). It therefore seems justifiable to speak of a sophia-Christology (cf. also logos in Jn. 1; → 3364).

2. Paul's earlier letters. (a) In a fundamental and far-reaching exposition that develops his theology of the cross, Paul contrasts the wisdom of the world with the message of the cross. God has turned the wisdom of the world into foolishness (1 Cor. 1:20; cf. 3:19), not through words or arguments, but through an action, namely,

Christ's death. Since in God's will "Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God" (1:24; cf. 1:30) has been revealed, worldly wisdom that rejects the cross is proved to be that which it always was: foolishness (→ mōria, 3702, i.e., rebellion against God), in the form of human self-exaltation and boasting (1:29, 31).

Humans have closed their minds to God's wisdom as they encountered it in the works of creation and instead have attempted to create their own wisdom (1 Cor. 1:21; cf. Rom. 1:18–23). However, God has chosen to save those who believe through the foolishness of the preaching of the cross. Thus every attempt to demand a proof for the truth of God (1:22) is as condemned to failure as is every attempt to boast of oneself (3:18–21).

Both the character of the Corinthian congregation and the manner of Paul's preaching confirm this interpretation of the salvation event. God's election of the foolish, the weak, and the despised—who formed the church in Corinth—shows that God puts to shame those who are considered wise by human standards (1 Cor. 1:26–29). God's will, announced in the OT as judging human pride (1:19, 31; 3:19–20), is thereby fulfilled. Paul's renunciation of "superior wisdom" (2:1) serves the sole saving work of the cross, which may not be emptied of its power (1:17). Paul can still say that he speaks wisdom "among the mature," but it is God's wisdom, hidden in the mystery (2:6–7). This is probably due to the fact that Paul takes up ideas of his opponents (who believed in a spiritual, nonsuffering Christ) and puts them to a positive use in his own theology.

(b) In the hymn that concludes his exposition of the mystery of Israel's election, Paul praises "the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God" (Rom. 11:33). God's wisdom is revealed in his inscrutable judgments and ways (cf. Isa. 40:13–14) and is thus not to be extolled in speculation, but experienced in history. This salvation history reference, along with the reminiscences of Prov. 8, allows us to understand wisdom here as the work of the creator, who is at the same time the Lord and perfecter of history.

(c) That Paul can use sophos in its ordinary nontechnical sense is shown by 1 Cor. 3:10, where he describes himself as an "expert builder" of the community, and possibly also by the question in 6:5, where Paul asks rhetorically if there is in the community no wise person able to render judgment, in order to keep members from bringing lawsuits in heathen courts.

3. Paul's later letters. Wisdom is understood as a gift of God's grace (Eph. 1:8, 17; Col. 1:9), in which believers may grow. The content of this teaching of wisdom revealed by the Spirit is the mystery of God—Christ, "in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (2:3). The Christology developed here links to the OT and Jewish conception of wisdom hidden in God before the creation of the world (Prov. 8; Sir. 24). This wisdom will be revealed in the fullness of time in Christ through the church (Eph. 3:9–10).

4. Other NT books. (a) Jas. 3:13 teaches that wisdom is shown in good behavior by works of kindness. This letter deals with opponents who (like those in Corinth) claim for themselves wisdom "from above," but cause strife here on earth (3:15–16). James describes this wisdom as peaceable, full of compassion, and without hypocrisy (3:17). To get such wisdom one must pray to God (1:5).

(b) In Rev. sophia is praised in two hymns: as an attribute of God (7:12) and of the slain Lamb at his exaltation (5:12). The exalted Christ has the same power and wisdom as God has. In 13:18; 17:9, sophia is the secret knowledge of Christians, on the basis of which they can interpret the apocalyptic mysteries and events of their time.

5. sophizō occurs 2x in the NT. Its use in 2 Tim. 3:14–15 is similar to that of Ps. 19:7; 105:22; 119:98: God's word is able to make us "wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus." Its use in 2 Pet. 1:16, where reference is made to "cleverly invented" stories in contrast to the historical truth of Jesus, is similar to the negative nuance of this vb. in Eccl. 7:16; Sir. 7:5; 32:4 (= LXX 35:4).

σπέρμα (sperma), seed (5065); σπείρω (speirō), sow (5062); σπόρος (sporos), seed (5078); φυτεύω (phyteuō), to plant (5885).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the sperma group is often used in the lit. sense of sowing seeds and fig. of producing offspring. Pindar refers to the pure, divine seed of the god. speirō had wide currency in ethical "sowing–reaping" maxims, highlighting the inevitable consequences of willful deeds.

2. (a) In the LXX sperma and speirō occur 217x and 52x times respectively, often referring to sowing seed, either in the ground (Gen. 47:23; Isa. 55:10) and of male semen (Lev. 15:16; 22:4; Jer. 31:27 = LXX 38:27). This word group is used fig. of offspring or posterity, either individually (Gen. 4:25; 21:13) or collectively (e.g., seed of Abraham, 15:5; 17:7–8; 22:18; seed of Noah, 9:9; seed of the patriarchs, Deut. 1:8), thereby highlighting the cohesion of the elect community. In later interpretations seed in Gen. 3:15 included a collective and an individual sense. Collectively the word foreshadows the spiritually renewed posterity of Adam who strive with Satan, while ultimately it refers to Christ, the paramount seed who seals Satan's doom. Ps. 22:30 refers to the sperma (i.e., spiritual progeny) of the Messiah.

(b) speirō is used fig. of Yahweh's sowing Israel in the land (Hos. 2:23) or into dispersion (Zech. 10:9) and of the chosen nation's bearing fruit (Jer. 31:27 = LXX 38:27; Ezek. 36:9). The imagery of sowing seed is employed in injunctions to ethical action (Hos. 10:12; Jer. 4:3) and in warnings against evil practices (Job 4:8; Prov. 22:8).

3. (a) In Jewish writings the ethical idea of sowing and harvest (→ therismos, 2546) occurs in an apocalyptic context. The present evil world is like a field sown with corrupt seed, which can only bear fruit (→ karpos, 2843) after its kind (2 Esd. 9:17). Unless the produce of this seed is gathered in, the beneficent age to come cannot be inaugurated. The image of sowing seed was also used of the implantation of the law in the children of Israel (9:31).

(b) In Philo sperma is the starting point of the universe and of all that exists. The body originates from human seed, but the soul from divine seed. God sows every chaste virtue in the soul, while wisdom, the daughter of God, sows knowledge and discernment. But humans possess the capacity of sowing both good and evil seed.

NT 1. sperma (43x in the NT) and speirō (52x) occur frequently in Jesus' parables, where the familiar imagery of seed sown in a field conveys profound teaching about the kingdom of God. (a) In the parable of the sower (Matt. 13:1–9; Mk. 4:1–9; Lk. 8:4–8) emphasis rests on the act of sowing the seed, which Jesus identifies with the proclamation of the word of God. Jesus' later interpretation of the parable (Matt. 13:10–23; Mk. 4:10–20; Lk. 8:9–15) emphasizes the four kinds of soils on which the word was sown, thus illustrating the diversity of response to the word. The seed sown along the path symbolizes the stubborn, secular person. That sown on rocky ground characterizes the shallow hearer. The seed sown among thorns depicts the selfish recipient. The seed cast on good soil represents the saved, who by embracing the proclaimed word participate in the eternal increase of the kingdom. The parable extends the promise of an overflow of a spiritual harvest, thus encouraging persistence in preaching.

(b) In the parable of the seed growing secretly (Mk. 4:26–29), the seed deposited in the earth develops successively into the blade, the ear, and finally the full head of grain, symbolizing the growth of the life of the Spirit in the believer promoted by the secret power of God. Lacking the life of the kingdom, humanity is like the flower of the grass that fades and comes to naught (Jas. 1:10–11). The parable of the wheat and weeds (Matt. 13:24–30), in which the Son of Man sows the seed of wheat and the devil the seed of weeds, affirms the simultaneous growth of good and evil during the present age. Finally, in the parable of the mustard seed (Matt. 13:31–32; Mk. 4:30–32; Lk. 13:18–19) the growth of a tiny seed into a magnificent shrub highlights the contrast between the insignificant beginnings of the kingdom and its final manifestation in majesty.

2. (a) The NT frequently uses sperma in the sense of offspring or posterity. The word often occurs in citations of OT promise texts that foretell the future blessing of the descendants of, e.g., Abraham (Lk. 1:55 [cf. Gen. 17:7; 18:18; 22:17; Mic. 7:20]; Acts 7:5–6 [cf. Gen. 12:7; 17:8]) and Isaac (Rom. 9:7 and Heb. 11:18 [cf. Gen. 21:12]).

(b) Paul's use of sperma occasionally transcends the basic physical relation to include the spiritual descendants of OT believers. Consequently, the NT expression "Abraham's seed" is not restricted to the generic house of Israel, but includes all who possess the same kind of faith as the patriarch had (Gal. 3:29). The OT promise to the patriarchs thus includes the ultimate spiritual blessing of all who believe, Jew or Gentile (Rom. 4:16–18). In Rev. 12:17 the seed ("offspring") of the woman represents the NT community that becomes the focus of Satan's attack.

(c) Paul ultimately interprets the OT promise of a seed in terms of Christ, the paramount offspring of Abraham (Gal. 3:16–19; cf. Gen. 12:7). As head of the corporate community (Gal. 3:29), Christ is identified as the ultimate fulfillment of the divine promises to the patriarchs and later to David (Acts 13:23, 33–37).

Paul's exegesis in Gal. 3:16–19 has sometimes been criticized for its artificiality. Note that the pl. of the Heb. word for "seed" generally means grain or crops (e.g., 1 Sam. 8:15); thus the Heb. of Gen. 12:7 must have been sing., even though God's promise to Abraham was not confined to a single individual but extended to his posterity. Yet Paul's argument in Gal. 3:16–19 is not grammatical but theological. In the first instance, the seed refers to the people of Israel, the posterity of Abraham. Although the children of Ishmael also descended from Abraham, there was only one covenant people (seed) descended from him, the line that came through Isaac. Christ as the ultimate seed represents the covenant line through Isaac.

Moreover, Paul is making use here of the notion of corporate solidarity, where a single individual represents an entire people (cf. the Adam–Christ typology in Rom. 5:12–21). Esp. since Paul is fully aware that physical descent is no guarantee of spiritual relationship (9:6–7), he is able to use the collective sing. in Gal. 3:29: "If you belong to Christ, then you are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." The Messiah, as the true descendant of Abraham and the true representative of his people, and in him his elect ones, as sharers in his experiences and his benefits, are seen as the legitimate heirs of God's promises. While the Judaizers at Galatia may have insisted that the promises made to Abraham and his seed involved the Jewish people as a whole, Paul finds a deeper application of this principle.

(d) Philo's concept of the divine seed receives a Christian interpretation in 1 Jn. 3:9, where sperma signifies the divine principle of life (the Spirit?) in the believer, which renders continuance in sin incongruous. As the physical sperma was the generator of life in the physical order, so the divine sperma becomes the fount and origin of life in the new order of recreated humanity.

(e) Paul uses the figure of a seed sown in the earth (cf. Jn. 12:24) to illustrate the burial and resurrection of the bodies of deceased believers (1 Cor. 15:36–44). As the bare grain of wheat sown in the soil unfolds into a full-grown ear, so the seed of spiritual life deposited in the ground will be raised into a glorious new body animated by the Spirit. Just as there is continuity as well as discontinuity between the seed that is sown and the plant that emerges, so there is continuity and discontinuity between the body that is buried and the resurrected body.

(f) Paul uses speirō (and its correlate phyteuō) in the context of the material maintenance of the gospel preacher. Like the servant who plants a vineyard (1 Cor. 9:7), the one who sows the seed of spiritual fruit is entitled to reap the reward of a decent living (9:11). To underscore the church's responsibility for the financial support of the preacher, Paul in 2 Cor. 9:6 asserts that the liberality with which one sows determines the spiritual and material benefits one reaps.

(g) Paul also uses phyteuō in 1 Cor. 3:6–8 to describe his work of evangelism in contrast to Apollos's follow-up work of nurturing believers who have made a commitment to Christ. Paul plants the seed, whereas Apollos waters it. But the credit for any fruit that comes through that process belongs to God alone. Elsewhere in the NT, phyteuō usually refers to physical planting and occurs mostly in parables of Jesus (e.g., Matt. 21:33; Mk. 12:1; Lk. 13:6; 20:9).

(h) In Gal. 6:7–8 this theme of sowing and reaping is developed into an ethical proverb familiar to secular antiquity and the OT (cf. Prov. 11:30; 13:2). Paul, however, focuses attention on the old and new natures as the two spheres in which ethical action is sown. A sowing to the sinful human nature yields a harvest of moral corruption, while a sowing to the Spirit produces eternal life. James adds that the divine standard of ethical conduct is achieved only by those possessors of heavenly wisdom who sow in gentleness, humility, and peace (Jas. 3:18).

CL & OT spēlaion means cavern, grotto. The LXX uses spēlaion for a cave as a place of refuge (Gen. 19:30; Jos. 10:16; 1 Sam. 22:1), as a tomb (Gen. 23:9), or as a robber's hideout (Jer. 7:11).

NT In Matt. 21:13 (par. Mk. 11:17; Lk. 19:46) Jesus, as the Lord of the temple (Matt. 12:6), protests that the Jerusalem authorities have degraded God's house of prayer (Isa. 56:7) into a den (spēlaion) of thieves (→ lēstēs, 3334), robbing the helpless while themselves enjoying the safe refuge of privilege. Their trading activities betrayed an insensitivity to the holiness of the outer court and denied Gentiles access to the only part of the temple area permitted to them for quiet worship. Jer. 7:11, alluded to here, had correctly forecast the destruction of the land in Jeremiah's day.

The sale of animals in the temple forecourt was apparently a recent innovation by the high priest Caiaphas (ca. A.D. 30), competing against the four traditional markets on the Mount of Olives. So unpopular among ordinary Jews was the temple trading, because of the greed of those in charge, that a popular uprising three years before Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70 swept away these bazaars. Heb. 11:38 and Rev. 6:15 describe refugees seeking shelter in spēlaia, caves, a feature of the limestone rocks of Palestine (cf. 2 Macc. 6:11; 10:6). Natural caves could also be adapted as burial places, as in the case of Lazarus (Jn. 11:38).

See also lēstēs, robber, highwayman, bandit, revolutionary (3334); sylaō, plunder, rob (5195); apostereō, rob, defraud, deprive (691); andrapodistēs, slave-dealer, kidnapper (435).

σπλάγχνον (splanchnon), almost always in the pl. splanchna, inward parts, entrails, hence as the seat of emotion, the heart, love (5073); σπλαγχνίζομαι (splanchnizomai), have pity, show mercy, feel sympathy (5072); πολύσπλαγχνος (polysplanchnos), sympathetic, compassionate (4499); εὔσπλαγχνος (eusplanchnos), tenderhearted, compassionate (2359).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk., to splanchnon, used almost entirely in the pl., originally meant the inward parts or entrails (of a sacrificial animal), esp. the more valuable parts: the heart, lungs, liver, spleen, and/or kidneys. Since immediately after killing the animal these parts were removed, roasted, and eaten in a sacrificial meal, the word came to mean the sacrificial meal itself. Starting in the 5th cent. B.C., we find splanchna used also for the human entrails—esp. the male sexual organs and the womb—as the site of the powers of conception and birth, Hence children were sometimes called splanchna. Since the intestines were regarded as the site of the natural passions (e.g., anger, fretful desires, love), the word came to have the fig. meaning of heart (as the organ of feelings and emotions), or the sense of premonition; finally, it came to mean affection and love.

The vb. splanchneuō originally meant to eat the entrails or prophesy from the entrails. The later form splanchnizomai, with the metaphorical meaning to have mercy on, feel pity or compassion for, is found only in the writings of Jud. and the NT.

2. The LXX uses the noun 15x, the vb. 2x, mostly in the Apocr. In Prov. 12:10 the noun means kindness, mercy; in 26:22, inner parts, belly. In 2 Macc. 9:5; 4 Macc. 5:30; 10:8, it means intestines; in 15:23, 29, mother love; in 2 Macc. 9:6, heart. In the Pseudepigrapha the words contain the predominant meaning merciful (e.g., T. Zeb. 7:3; 8:2, 6).

NT 1. The vb. splanchnizomai occurs only in the Synoptic Gospels. (a) Jesus was filled with compassion when he saw various human needs, such as sick people who needed healing (Matt. 14:14; 20:34; Mk. 1:41), the masses who were like sheep without a shepherd (Matt. 9:36; Mk. 6:34), the widow at Nain who mourned the death of her only son (Lk. 7:13), and the crowds who were hungry (Matt. 15:32; Mk. 8:2). In Mk. 9:22 a father asks Jesus to "take pity" on him and his demon-possessed son.

(b) In the parables of the unforgiving servant (Matt. 18:23–35) and the prodigal son (Lk. 15:11–32), splanchnizomai expresses the strong feeling of a merciful master (Matt. 18:27) or a loving father (Lk. 15:20). In both parables this vb. makes the unbounded mercy of God visible. In the parable of the good Samaritan (Lk. 10:30–37) the vb. expresses the Samaritan's willingness to use all means—time, strength, and life—for saving the wounded traveler (10:33; note the contrast with the priest and Levite, 10:31–32). Such action reflects the "mercy" (eleos, → 1799) that Jesus expects of us (10:37). Humanity and neighborliness are not qualities but action.

2. The noun splanchna (pl., as in OT) denotes the "tender mercy" of God in Lk. 1:78 (with eleos, → 1799). Elsewhere this noun is generally used (mostly in Paul) to refer to the whole person in his or her capacity to love. The frequent translation "heart" is suitable if we understand the heart as the center of loving and kind action. In 2 Cor. 6:12 Paul accuses his readers of showing him little affection, while in 7:15 he says of Titus that his heart went out to the Corinthians. In Phil. 1:8 Christ is the source of the love that embraces and lays claim to the apostle's personality.

splanchna occurs 3x in Phlm., which shows Paul's inner participation and personal concern in the matter of the runaway slave, Onesimus. In v. 7 Paul praises Philemon for his love and kindness, which have "refreshed the hearts of the saints," while in v. 20 Paul hopes that his own "heart" will be refreshed by Philemon's actions regarding the slave. In v. 12 the word can be rendered "as a piece of me" (NIV, "my very heart").

3. In Acts 1:18 the intestines in the physical sense are meant. In 1 Jn. 3:17 splanchna means the heart that expresses "pity" for someone in need.

4. Jas. 5:11 links polysplanchnos with oiktirmōn (→ oiktirmos, 3880) in a phrase that means the "compassion and mercy" of God. eusplanchnos, compassionate, tenderhearted, is found in lists of Christian virtues in Eph. 4:32 and 1 Pet. 3:8.

See also eleos, compassion, mercy, pity (1799); oiktirmos, compassion, pity (3880).

5080 (spoudaios, zealous), → 5082.

σπουδή (spoudē), zeal (5082); σπουδαῖος (spoudaios), zealous (5080); σπουδαίως (spoudaiōs), eagerly (5081); σπουδάζω (spoudazō), to be zealous (5079).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the words in this group denote quick movement in the interests of a person or cause: i.e., spoudazō, to hasten oneself; spoudaios, quick, hasty; spoudē, haste or speed. From there the words went on to suggest inner movement, e.g., for the vb., to be zealous, seek to do, be concerned for; for the adj., busy, active, industrious; for the noun, zeal, industry, effort. When used in contrast to play and joking, these words stress serious preoccupation with something. When used with a moral connotation spoudē means willingness, good will; spoudaios implies a person concerned with the good, a virtuous individual. In religious contexts the vb. means to involve oneself wholeheartedly.

2. spoudē and its cognates are normally used in the LXX with the meaning of urgency and haste (e.g., Gen. 19:15; Exod. 12:11, 33). Only in later OT writings does spoudē mean zeal (e.g., Wis. 14:17; Sir. 27:3).

NT 1. In the NT spoudē can mean haste (e.g., Lk. 1:39). In Lk. 7:4 spoudaiōs stresses the intensity of the request by which opposition should be overcome, and in 2 Tim. 1:17 it brings out the diligence of the search to overcome obstacles (cf. Tit. 3:13). In 1 Thess. 2:17 the vb. underlines the intensity of Paul's efforts to see the Thessalonian believers again. In 2 Pet. 1:15 the vb. and in Jude 3 the noun are used in connection with the writing of an important letter.

2. For Paul spoudē is a necessary expression of the life of the Christian community; it is a gift of God that must be developed. Its power should be seen in a solid "effort" to maintain unity (Eph. 4:3), to aid other Christians (Gal. 2:10; 2 Cor. 8:7, 8, 16), to make good of a wrong done (7:11–12), and to exercise leadership in the church (Rom. 12:8). All believers are expected to give themselves completely (12:11), and a zealous example can prove infectious (2 Cor. 8:8).

3. In later writings of the NT spoudē has a more general meaning. Our whole conduct of life must be molded by it, if we are not to lose what we have received (2 Tim. 2:15; Heb. 4:11; 6:11; 2 Pet. 1:5, 10; 3:14).

στατήρ (statēr), stater, a silver coin worth four drachmas (5088); δίδραχμον (didrachmon), a double drachma, two-drachma piece, worth about half a shekel among the Jews (1440); κῆνσος (kēnsos), tax, poll-tax (3056); δηνάριον (dēnarion), denarius, a day's wage (1324); φόρος (phoros), tax, tribute (5843).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the statēr was a silver (later gold) coin of a certain weight. The drachma was a coin of much less value, comparable to a Roman denarius. Three Gk. words could be used to indicate a tax or tribute: kēnsos, telos (→ telōnion, customs house, tax office, 5468), and phoros (a tribute paid by foreigners to a city state).

2. The LXX uses both drachma (e.g., Gen. 24:22; Exod. 38:26 = LXX 39:2; NIV "beka") and didrachma (e.g., Gen. 20:16; 23:15–16; NIV "shekel") for Israelite currency, but it also uses a transliterated word siklos for the Heb. šeqel (shekel). Before the exile there were no real coins; metals were fashioned into lumps of recognized weights. Various forms of shekels are mentioned (e.g., "by the royal standard," 2 Sam. 14:26; "the sanctuary shekel," Lev. 5:15). Exod. 30:11–16 states that when the Israelites were subjected to a census in the desert, Moses ordered each man to pay half a shekel as ransom money to prevent the plague spreading among the people. The money raised in this way was spent on the tabernacle (30:16; 38:25–28).

When Solomon built the first temple, he raised heavy taxes and used forced labor (1 Ki. 4:6; 5:13–14; phoros), both of which were resented (12:4). In 2 Ki. 12:10 we read of a collection box for the upkeep of the temple, but 2 Chr. 24:6, 9 refers to what had been levied by Moses as something that was to be perpetuated. Neh. 10:32 speaks of this tax as a third of a shekel (LXX didrachma), but it was evidently raised to half a shekel later. Every Israelite male over twenty had to pay. It was paid as long as the temple stood. The Romans evidently recognized this as a Jewish religious obligation. Jews of the Diaspora contributed, and the bullion trains required strong protection. After the destruction of the temple, Vespasian decreed that the tax should still be paid, not to the Jewish temple, but to Jupiter Capitolinus.

NT 1. The temple tax lies in the background of Matt. 17:24–27. Tax collectors approach Peter as a representative disciple of Jesus and ask him whether his leader has ever paid the standard contribution (didrachma) to the support of the temple as required in Exod. 30:11–16. Since Jesus and his followers constantly moved from one place to another, it was difficult for tax agents to make contact with them. But now that they are back in Capernaum, this matter can be dealt with.

After Jesus makes the point that as the Son of God it is not really appropriate for him to pay a tax to his own Father, he directs Peter nevertheless to secure the money for payment by going down to the lake, casting in his fish line, and pulling up the first fish to strike his bait. In its mouth he will find a statēr (Matt. 17:27)—probably a tetradrachma (i.e., a four-drachma coin; already in Ptolemaic times the term statēr was applied to the four-drachma piece, thus sufficient to pay the tax for Jesus and Peter). Most likely this coin was a Tyrian shekel. Because of its high silver content and standardized weight, the Tyrian shekel was generally preferred in Palestine, despite the paganism of its symbols.

In the context of Matt. this story illustrates the distinction Jesus draws between his own followers as the true people of God and the Jewish nation. The disciples are the true sons of God who do not need to pay tribute to aliens. But to avoid giving offense the tax is paid.

2. The best-known discussion of any coin in Scripture occurs when Jesus is questioned as to whether it is lawful to pay taxes to Caesar (Mk. 12:13–17). His enemies feel they have him on the horns of a dilemma. If he answers that it is acceptable to pay tribute to Rome, this will offend the religionists who oppose any support to a pagan power; but if he declares himself opposed to paying of such taxes, he can incur the charge of fomenting sedition and be immediately turned over to the Roman authorities.

In answer to their craftiness, Jesus simply asks the Jewish leaders to produce a silver dēnarion from their own pockets. Holding it up before them he points out that the portrait on the obverse is that of the Roman emperor and that the inscription bears Caesar's name. They obviously have no compunctions about using this money, with all of its advantages of protection for law-abiding citizens and the safeguarding of their financial security. The leaders also have no scruples about accepting Roman law and order and military defense against marauding invaders. Therefore, their pious question concerning the legitimacy of paying taxes to the government is nothing more than arrant hypocrisy. Thus Jesus answered: "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's [the money and support necessary for a strong, efficient government] and to God what is God's [not only their tithes and temple taxes, but also the worship of their hearts and the faithful obedience to his revealed will]" (Mk. 12:17).

3. In Rom. 13:6–7 Paul also adopts the same attitude of Jesus with regard to payment of taxes to the Roman state: "This is also why you pay taxes [phoros], for the authorities are God's servants.... Give everyone what you owe him. If you owe taxes [phoros], pay taxes; if revenue [telos], then revenue." The premises of Paul's position are that "there is no authority except that which God has established" (13:1; cf. 1 Pet. 2:13–14), that these have been instituted for the well-being of the human race (Rom. 13:2–3), and that to resist what God has appointed is to resist God and thus provoke divine wrath (13:4–5).

σταυρός (stauros), stake, cross (5089); σταυρόω (stauroō), hang upon a cross, crucify (5090); ἀνασταυρόω (anastauroō), crucify (416); συσταυρόω (systauroō), crucify with (5365); κρεμάννυμι (kremannymi), hang (3203).

CL 1. stauros is an upright, sometimes pointed stake. It may serve for fencing, a foundation, and a palisade. Similarly, stauroō means drive in stakes or erect a palisade.

Both the noun and vb. have a more specific meaning in connection with punishment, though this occurred in a variety of ways. The vb. is more common in the compound anastauroō, which means hang up, impale, apparently always in public. Corresponding to the vb., stauros can mean a stake on which an already executed criminal was publicly displayed in shame as a further punishment. But stauros can also itself be an instrument of execution in the form of a vertical stake and a cross-beam of the same length.

2. In order to determine the exact technical form and significance of execution as conveyed by stauros and (ana)stauroō, one needs to know in what region and under what authority the execution was carried out. It is also necessary to know the standpoint of the writer who uses these terms.

(a) The East and West had a fundamental difference over the question of execution and its means. The East hanged and impaled bodies that were already executed, sometimes by decapitation. But this form of punishment was not practiced in the West. Hanging or fastening to a stake, beam, or cross was itself a means of execution. In this method, a more or less quick death was effected by strangulation, although hanging could also be long and painful for the victim. Execution by crucifixion was known in Greece and Carthage.

(b) In Judea at the time of Jesus sentencing to crucifixion and execution was entirely in the hands of Roman authorities. As with the Gks. and probably throughout the East, freedmen with Roman citizenship were exempted from crucifixion. This method of execution, therefore, was reserved for slaves, foreigners, and inhabitants of foreign provinces. As a rule, it was used only in cases of serious crimes, such as treason. It is understandable that in Palestine crucifixion constituted an important punitive weapon in the hands of the Roman occupying power, by which it sought to deal effectively with any resistance to its authority. This method of death was intended more as a deterrent than as a means of retribution. This explains why a cross was set up in an open place. Contemporary writers condemned this form of execution as excessively cruel.

There were two possible ways of erecting the stauros. The condemned man could be fastened to the cross lying on the ground at the place of execution, then lifted up. Alternatively, the stake would already be implanted in the ground before the execution. The victim was tied to the crossbeam, hoisted up with the horizontal beam, and tied fast to the vertical stake. The cross was probably not much higher than the height of a man.

According to Roman practice, there was first a legal conviction. If the execution was to take place somewhere other than the place of sentencing, the condemned man carried the crossbeam to the spot of crucifixion, usually outside the town. At that place the victim was stripped and scourged. He was then tied or nailed with outstretched arms to the crossbeam and hoisted on to the stake with the crossbeam. Death came slowly after extraordinary agony, probably through exhaustion and/or suffocation. The body could be left on the scaffold to rot or provide food for predatory animals and carrion crows. Occasionally the body was given to relatives or acquaintances for burial.

3. Oriental ways of execution were known in ancient Israel and were in part followed. In Joseph's interpretation of the dream of an Egyptian court official, Pharaoh would behead the baker and dishonor him by leaving his body hanging on a stake (Gen. 40:18–19). The body of Saul was beheaded by the Philistines and then hung to a wall (1 Sam. 31:9–10). Darius made a decree that anyone infringing an edict of Cyrus should have a beam pulled from his house and be impaled on it (Ezr. 6:11). The regulation in Deut. 21:22–23 clearly shows that penal procedure in Israel followed general oriental practice. The penalty is applied here to capital offenses, but a specific limitation is also made: The corpse was not to remain on the tree overnight, lest the land be defiled (cf. Jos. 8:29; 10:26).

4. The LXX never uses the noun stauros. The vb. stauroō occurs only in Est. 7:9; 8:13; possibly Lam. 5:13; these usages are somewhat ambiguous. Josephus records that the Jewish ruler Alexander Jannaeus (103–76 B.C.) ordered a mass execution by hanging men alive on stakes. This violent attack was an unusual procedure, detested and not normally practiced in Jud.

NT In the NT stauros, anastauroō and stauroō, and systauroō occur essentially in three sets of textual and theological complexes: (1) in the passion narratives of the Gospels (Matt. 27:1–2, 11–61; Mk. 15:1–47; Lk. 23:1–56; Jn. 18:28–19:37; cf. also Matt. 20:19; Lk. 24:20; Acts 2:36; 4:10; Rev. 11:8); (2) in the theological reflection of Paul's letters (some 20x); (3) in Jesus' sayings about bearing one's cross (Matt. 10:38; 16:24; Mk. 8:34; Lk. 9:23; 14:27).

1. The crucifixion of Jesus as a historical and theological question. Paul speaks of Christ's cross in numerous places, but he gives no details about the event. However, 1 Thess. 2:15–16 is important in view of the fact that he sees the church of his day threatened by persecution from the Jews in a parallel situation to Jesus: They "killed the Lord Jesus and the prophets and also drove us out" (cf. also Matt. 23:34).

The Jews and their representatives similarly appear in Mk. as the driving force behind the crucifixion. It is at their instigation that Jesus is arrested (14:43–49), tried, and sentenced to death by the Sanhedrin (14:53–64). Pilate recognizes their motives but finds no legal grounds for this condemnation. Finally for political reasons, he gives in to the people, who have been stirred up by the Jewish leaders to demand Jesus' crucifixion. The theologically significant insults heaped on the crucified Jesus come from the lips of passing Jews and those who represent the Jewish nation and its theology (15:29–32).

The other Evangelists include other material that likewise implicates the Jews. Pilate's wife urges her husband not to have anything to do with Jesus, "for I have suffered a great deal today in a dream because of him" (Matt. 27:19). Pilate washes his hands and declares, "I am innocent of this man's blood.... It is your responsibility," which the crowd accepts (27:24–25). Lk. records the saying, "Daughters of Jerusalem, do not weep for me; weep for yourselves and for your children" (Lk. 23:28). He expresses the Evangelists' typical attitude in the words of Peter addressed to the Jews at Pentecost: "this Jesus, whom you crucified" (Acts 2:36).

(a) Any historical reconstruction must be based on the following. (i) In Judea in the NT era, capital jurisdiction belonged to the imperial representative alone. (ii) Pilate's judicial decision for the stauros was decisive. (iii) If he used any justification to crucify Jesus, it would have been on the basis of Jesus being an agitator, not a blasphemer. (iv) The execution was carried out by the Romans according to their practice. (v) Jesus died on the cross as an instrument of torture, probably slowly through suffocation or exhaustion. (vi) Known Roman practice authenticates the account of Jesus' scourging, the removal of his clothing, and the guard of Roman soldiers at the place of execution. (vii) Jesus bore the crossbeam to the place of execution outside the city (Mk. 15:20b–21).

(b) Exegetical and theological considerations also demand close scrutiny of the historical question. Matt. and especially Lk. exhibit differences from Mk.'s account;

Jn. deals with the passion narrative quite differently. In each case a writer's theological motives can be ascertained. The oldest tradition of the crucifixion of Jesus, used by Mk., shows a definite tendency to see the relationship of these events to Ps. 22 (cf. Ps. 22:1 [Matt. 27:46; Mk. 15:34], 6–7 [Matt. 27:39, 43; Mk. 15:29; Lk. 23:35], 8 [Matt. 27:43], 18 [Matt. 27:35; Mk. 15:24; Lk. 23:34b; Jn. 19:24], 22 [Heb. 2:12]). Attempts to harmonize the account should not be allowed to obscure such theological intentions.

Passages like Heb. 2:14–18; 3:14; 4:14–15; 5:7–10 indicate additional reasons for the early church's interest in the story of the crucifixion and suffering of its Lord. Basic is its confession of the crucified Jesus as the one exalted to God in the sense of a cosmic, saving act. When the church saw itself attacked, persecuted, and suffering as a consequence of this confession, its interest in the earthly career of its Lord came to the fore. The Savior led the way as an obligatory pattern of suffering for his followers.

The basis of Jewish opposition to Jesus is stated as envy (Matt. 27:18; Mk. 15:10); Jn. presents the actions of Caiaphas as being motivated by expediency (Jn. 11:49–50). But there was a genuine theological zeal that was present in the Jews' attitude to Jesus and their reaction to the early church. The repudiation of the craving for legitimization of "the message of the cross" by "miraculous signs" (1 Cor. 1:18–25) is reflected in the crucifixion narrative of Matt. 27:39–43; Mk. 15:29–32; Lk. 23:35–39.

The historical question of responsibility for the crucifixion must be discussed without prejudice. But equally the question of guilt transcends the time of Jesus. This aspect is shown by Heb. 6:6, where those who commit apostasy are said to be "crucifying [anastaurountas, pres. part.] the Son of God all over again and subjecting him to public disgrace." The question of guilt for the cross of Christ remains a contemporary one, wherever one's righteousness is presented as grounded in the grace of God, demanding self-surrender in faith.

2. The theological significance of the crucifixion of Jesus. (a) Paul's earlier letters. The use of the stauros word group in a theological sense occurs most frequently in Paul's earlier letters (17x): stauros, 7x; stauroō, 8x; systauroō, 2x. All these statements see the cross of Christ as the saving event that radically transforms the world.

The gospel embraces "the message of the cross," i.e., the saving proclamation based on the cross of Christ (1 Cor. 1:17–18; cf. 2:1–2; Rom. 1:16; Gal. 3:1). That cross is not an isolated event in history but the act of God; that is, the transcendent God acts as the cross of Christ is proclaimed, his liberating message to humankind. That proclamation did not paint the historic details of the crucifixion before the eyes of its hearers. Instead, it publicly proclaimed Jesus Christ as the Crucified One, portraying him as God's saving event in terms of the law (cf. Gal. 3:1).

The message of the cross brings sōtēria, salvation (→ sōzō, → 5392). This is indeed only to those who believe (1 Cor. 1:21), who submit to God's verdict in the cross of Christ, even though it may appear foolishness. This condemnatory and at the same time liberating message of salvation is folly and scandalous not only to the Jews and Greeks (1:18–25). It is also this to any perverted form of Christianity, whether it is enamored of its own religious experiences (like the Corinthian church) or whether it falls back into a legalism that effectively denies the cross of Christ (like the Galatians).

This identification of the gospel with the cross of Christ is underlined by Phil. 2:8. Most scholars regard Phil. 2:6–11 as an early hymn about Christ's emptying of himself of his heavenly glory and humiliating himself by becoming obedient to death (which Paul incorporated into his argument to urge Christians to have the mind of Christ). But Paul was not satisfied merely with the statement in the hymn about the death of Christ; he added the words "even death on a cross."

This focus on the theology of the cross coincides with Paul's particular emphases. For example, 1 Cor. 1:13 shows how he used the traditional interpretation of the death of Jesus (cf. 15:3) to respond to the disunity among the Corinthians: "Was Paul crucified for you?" Paul had not brought about salvation; the Corinthians were not his property. Thus, there was no basis for dividing the church as the body of Christ on his account. Paul uses here the preposition hyper in connection with stauroō in a way that was characteristic of the early church's sacrificial and representative theology. Moreover, the whole argument of Rom. reveals how Paul thinks of Christ's death as a representative sacrifice bearing the punishment of sin on behalf of others (cf. Paul's use of hyper, instead of, in the place of, in connection with the death of Christ in such crucial passages as 1 Cor. 15:3 and Gal. 3:13; cf. Rom. 5:10–11, 18; 1 Cor. 11:24–25; Eph. 1:7; 1 Tim. 2:6).

Morever, Paul's theology of the cross has its own special emphases. Paul saw all humans as unredeemed, not simply because of an uncleanness brought about by the accumulation of individual acts of sin, but because of a basic, depraved, self-seeking hostility to God that rejects God's offer to liberate us. This appears in the presumptuous demand that God's message should be validated by miraculous proofs and that the gospel of God should conform to worldly wisdom (see 1 Cor. 1:22). In effect, we judge God and discount the cross and its proclamation for our justification and salvation (1 Cor. 1:19–29; Gal. 2:19–21).

For Paul, it is not enough to speak simply of "Christ." For "Christ" could be understood as a glorified Christ, removed from the world and removing us from the world. Paul sets alongside the word Christos the unambiguous estaurōmenos (crucified, 1 Cor. 1:23; Gal. 3:1). He speaks with special emphasis in 1 Cor. 2:2: "I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified." This intensification reflects his experience in Corinth and in general (Gal. 3:1). The cross of Christ alone is Paul's ground for boasting and confidence (cf. Gal. 6:14). In practical terms, this means that Paul boasted most gladly of his weaknesses (2 Cor. 12:9–10).

The practical significance of the resurrection is implied in Paul's teaching about the cross. He presents Christ crucified as the decisive act of God in salvation. The risen Christ does not simply cancel out or supersede the crucified Christ. Through the exaltation his self-humiliation and obedient death are raised in power as the sign of salvation (Phil. 2:8–11). Christ, who took on himself this weakness and was thus crucified, now lives by reason of the creative power of God, who raises the dead (2 Cor. 13:4). Believers enter this resurrection life that comes from God, an act that conquers death in the believers' existence under the cross. This teaching forms the basis of the apostle's existence under the cross (1 Cor. 15:30–32). Without the resurrection Paul's life would be the most pitiable self-deception imaginable (15:19).

The cross of Christ and the crucified Christ are alone the power and wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:18–24). They form Paul's answer to a church that was preoccupied with power, fame, and wisdom and was thus dividing the body of Christ (1:10–4:21). They also apply to renunciation of one's rights (6:1–11) and even to one's proper freedom for the sake of others (8:1–11:1). In addition, Paul also refers to an astonishing extent to his own mode of life and preaching. They represent the way of life controlled by the cross of Christ (1:17, 23; 2:1–5; 3:5–15; 4:6; cf. also the exhortations to imitate Paul, which occasionally round off the longer sections, 4:16; 11:1).

The fundamental pattern here is Christ, especially his renunciation of his rights (1 Cor. 11:1) and his humiliation to death on the cross for the sake of others (Phil. 2:1–11). To this also belongs Heb. 12:2. The afflicted are exhorted to look to Jesus, who endured the cross, despising its shame because of the joy that was set before him.

Paul speaks of some people as "enemies of the cross of Christ" (Phil. 3:18) in the context of a call to imitate the example of himself and others (3:17). These enemies are those who strive after earthly things and whose lives are not shaped by the message of the cross (3:18–19). They are those who have not sought salvation in Christ crucified. They have not, like Paul, left their legalistic existence behind them, sought to know the sufferings of Christ, or be conformed to his death (3:7–11).

What Paul says about the preaching of the cross in 1 Cor., about humility in Phil. 2, about justification in Phil. 3, and in all three places about imitation and its practical application, he also develops in relation to baptism (Rom. 6; cf. Gal. 2:20). Christ has died (Rom. 6:10), and thus Christians have also died with him (6:2). They have been thereby, like him, freed from the guilt and power of sin (6:10). Baptism into Christ means baptism into his death (6:3). Baptism thus represents the all-encompassing event of Christ's death. Believers are thus crucified with Christ (systauroō, Rom. 6:6; Gal. 2:20).

At the same time, through the cross of Christ the compelling power of the world has been crucified for the benefit of the believer's inner self. Those who have become Christ's possession have crucified the sinful nature "with its passions and desires" (Gal. 5:24). In this they are not merely passive; it is something they do themselves. The continuing role of the cross of Christ in the believer brings about a radical transformation of daily living (cf. 6:14).

(b) Col. and Eph. adopt a somewhat different approach from Paul's other letters (stauros alone occurs, 3x). Col. does continue the earlier Pauline teaching that in Rom. 6 relates dying with Christ to baptism (Col. 2:12; cf. 3:3), a process that liberates us from the enslaving, cosmic powers (2:20; → stoicheon, 5122). Paul's exhortation to put to death what is earthly in us (3:5–9) is the outworking of the decisive saving event of the death of Christ (cf. Gal. 5:24). Eph., by contrast, speaks only of the believer's being made alive in Christ (2:1; cf. 1:20; 2:6; Col. 3:1). Neither Col. nor Eph. make any specific reference to a believer's being crucified with Christ. The development of soteriological ideas is correspondingly less rigorous than in the earlier letters (cf. Col. 2:12 with Rom. 6:6).

However, Col. and Eph. develop a theology of the cosmic significance of the Christ event that is not found in the earlier letters. With Christ's "blood ... shed on the cross" as its basis, reconciliation of all things to God has taken place through Christ's exaltation and assumption of authority (Col. 1:19–20). Eph. 2:16 develops this thought in a specific direction, declaring that God's purpose was to "reconcile both [Jew and Gentile] to God through the cross, by which he put to death their hostility."

Col. 2:14–15 further develops the cosmic significance of the cross, in that God "canceled the written code, with its regulations, that was against us and that stood opposed to us; he took it away, nailing it to the cross." Two pictures are combined here. (i) There is the picture of debt, drawn from the ancient business world. This represents the ordinances of the Jewish law and the dictates of the false teachers; its accusing testimony is canceled. (ii) There is also the picture of a public, official decree that has been posted (cf. the sign typically posted on a cross, giving the reason for a criminal's punishment). Taken together these pictures show that Christ himself made the cross into a public declaration, proclaiming the cancellation of our sins and the end of all claim to legalism.

3. The sayings about bearing the cross. These sayings occur 5x in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 10:38; 16:24; Mk. 8:34; Lk. 9:23; 14:27). Jesus emphasizes that if believers want to gain life, they will not be exempted from a life of self-renunciation, perhaps even martyrdom. The way of Christ is also the way for Christians. These sayings, in other words, are the equivalent of Paul's theology of the cross.

Jesus became increasingly aware that because of the attitude of the religious leaders of his day, he would be put to death at the hands of the Romans through crucifixion. He also knew of the practice of a condemned man bearing the crossbeam of the cross. Whatever fate awaited him would also await those who followed him. The sayings about bearing the cross form part of his warning to his disciples to count the cost (see the context of Matt. 10:38; Lk. 14:27). Note also Jesus' warning that a servant is not above his or her master (Matt. 10:24; cf. Lk. 6:40; Jn. 13:16; 15:20).

στενάζω (stenazō), to sigh, groan (5100); στεναγμός (stenagmos), sigh, groan, groaning (5099).

CL & OT 1. stenazō in cl. Gk. means sighing or moaning. stenagmos connotes a sighing or groaning.

2. In the LXX stenazō has various meanings. In Isa. 19:8 it denotes the general concept of mourning. On several occasions it means to sigh or groan, suggesting grief as a result of physical suffering, loss, or distress (24:7; Lam. 1:8, 21; Ezek. 21:6–7). It can also describe the groaning of the wounded (28:19).

In Isa. 59:11 stenazō describes the roaring of a bear. In Job 31:38 it is used fig. for the crying out of the land, in 24:12 for the crying out of the wounded, and in 30:25 for a personal grief for the poor.

3. The noun stenagmos has the same flavor of meanings. In Exod. 2:24; 6:5; Jdg. 2:18 it is used of groaning as a result of physical affliction and distress. In Ps. 38:8 it describes the groaning of the psalmist in distress, while in Jer. 4:31 it describes the anguish of a woman in labor. In Gen. 3:16, however, the noun bears a metaphorical meaning for pregnancy.

NT stenazō in Mk. 7:34 describes the general sense of sighing as an expression of inward emotion. Paul uses the term exclusively of sighing in the sense of deeply longing for something (Rom. 8:23; 2 Cor. 5:2, 4). In Heb. 13:17, however, it stands as the antithesis of "joy" and means "burden." James uses the vb. to instruct believers not to "grumble against each another" (Jas. 5:9).

The noun stenagmos occurs 2x in the NT. In Acts 7:34 it describes the groaning of the Israelites in their slavery in Egypt. In Rom. 8:26 it refers to the interceding Spirit's "groans that words cannot express." There is a progression in the context where Paul moves from the groaning of the creation (8:22) to the groaning of the Christian (8:23). Such groaning is shared by the Holy Spirit and the believer. The Spirit utilizes these deep groanings in intercession for believers. They are in turn observed by the one who "searches our hearts" (8:27). The deep emotive elements in stenagmos should be retained here (for more on this passage, → entynchanō, 1961).

στέφανος (stephanos), wreath, crown (5109); στεφανόω (stephanoō), crown (someone) (5110); στέμμα (stemma), garland (5098); διάδημα (diadēma), diadem, crown (1343).

CL & OT 1. (a) stephanos was used originally of anything that encircles, such as a besieging army or the wall around a city. It developed into its usual meaning of crown or wreath, esp. the victor's wreath of leaves at athletic games. The stephanos in fact bore diverse connotations: of victory, festivity, worship, public office or honor, kingship, or royal visitation. stephanos and the vb. stephanoō were often used fig. to denote an object of pride.

(b) stemma was used esp. of the laurel wreath of a sacrificing priest.

(c) diadēma was the band around the tiara of the Persian king, worn also by Alexander and later kings, and so generally denoted a crown as a badge of kingship.

2. (a) In the LXX stephanos usually refers to a royal crown (e.g., 2 Sam. 12:30) and is used as a figure for honor, victory, or pride. diadēma is applied in Est. 1:11; 2:17 to the royal crown of Persia, but occurs more frequently in the Apocr. (also there with metaphorical senses; e.g., Wis. 5:16; Sir. 47:6).

(b) The crown was a frequent image in later Jud. The expectation of a "crown of glory" appears in T. Benj. 4:1. There were said to be three crowns: of Torah, priesthood, and royalty.

NT 1. diadēma occurs 3x in the NT and signifies the kingship of the dragon (Rev. 12:3), of the beast (13:1), and of Christ (19:2). stemma is used only in Acts 14:13 of the "wreaths" brought by the pagan priest who was planning to offer sacrifices to Paul and Barnabas at Lystra.

2. stephanos occurs 18x. It is used of Jesus' "crown of thorns" (Matt. 27:29; Mk. 15:17; Jn. 19:2, 5). To the soldiers it meant mock royalty, to the Evangelists it constituted testimony to the true kingship of Christ over a spiritual kingdom, while perhaps also implying his forthcoming victory over death.

This same word is used for the prize of athletic victory and as a metaphor for the eternal reward of the faithful (1 Cor. 9:25; 2 Tim. 2:5; 4:8; Jas. 1:12 ["crown of life"]; 1 Pet. 5:4 ["crown of glory"]; Rev. 3:11; 4:4, 10). In two cases the believer's eternal hope is set against the transience of perishable wreaths (1 Cor. 9:25; 1 Pet. 5:4). In 2 Tim. 4:8 Christ at his Parousia will bestow on his people "a crown of righteousness."

Paul calls the church at Philippi his stephanos, that is, his pride or glory (Phil. 4:1). The Thessalonians (1 Thess. 2:19) are Paul's joyful tribute to the coming Christ. The imagery used here may link with an ancient practice in which a ruler was presented with a crown as a token of one's allegiance (cf. 1 Macc. 13:37; 2 Macc. 14:4).

The phrase "crown of life" in Rev. 2:10 (cf. Jas. 1:12) is of special interest. The gen. here is best taken as epexegetical, that is, the prize "that consists in life." The term was particularly appropriate in Smyrna, where a crown or wreath was a pervasively common numismatic emblem. Eternal life, untouched by the threat of spiritual death, will be the prize of all those faithful who endure persecution to the suffering of death. Such people will share the experience of him "who died and came to life again" (Rev. 2:8).

3. stephanoō in Heb. 2:7, 9 is used in a messianic application of Ps. 8:5. While some see a reference here to the transfiguration or Christ's crown of thorns, the words probably refer to his future glory (cf. Phil. 2:9).

5113 (stērigmos, steadfastness), → 5114.

στηρίζω (stērizō), make fast, establish, strengthen (5114); ἐπιστηρίζω (epistērizō), strengthen (2185); στηριγμός (stērigmos), steadfastness (5113); ἀστήρικτος (astēriktos), unstable (844).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. stērizō means primarily to fix something so that it remains stable and secure, such as supporting a vine with a stake. In a fig. sense, it came to mean to confirm or establish. In the field of medicine it could mean to gain bodily strength, to strengthen.

2. In the LXX stērizō at times denotes physical support, such as the ladder that Jacob saw in his dream resting on the earth (Gen. 28:12) and Moses' hands being supported by Aaron and Hur (Exod. 17:12). Likewise, epistērizō is used of the pillars that supported the Philistine temple (Jdg. 16:26, 29). stērizō also denotes food that strengthens and refreshes a person (Jdg. 19:5, 8).

Often the words in this group describe giving moral or spiritual support. In 2 Ki. 18:21 Sennacherib's field commander uses stērizō in a warning to Hezekiah that leaning on Egypt for aid will prove ineffective. By contrast, David prays for God to sustain him with a willing spirit (Ps. 51:12). The psalmist in Ps. 111:8 affirms that God's laws are dependable, and in 112:8 that because he trusts in the Lord, his heart is secure. epistērizō is used in Ps. 71:6 for the psalmist's reliance on God since birth.

Finally stērizō is used 10x in Ezek. for God's command to the prophet to "set" his face against Israel and other nations and to prophesy judgment against them.

NT 1. stērizō occurs 13x in the NT, epistērizō 4x (all in Acts); stērigmos and astēriktos occur only in 2 Pet. (once and 2x respectively). In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Abraham stresses that the gulf between heaven and hell "has been fixed" (Lk. 16:26). In a phrase similar to Ezek., Lk. 9:51 says that Jesus resolved (lit., "set his face") to go to Jerusalem.

2. Far more frequent are the fig. uses of this word group. All four uses of epistērizō stress the strengthening of churches through the word of the Lord (Acts 14:22; 15:32, 41; 18:23). In Rom. 1:11 Paul hopes that his visit to Rome will "make [them] strong" (in this sense, stērizō is similar to parakaleō, encourage, → 4151). On several occasions Paul prays that God will strengthen believers (Rom. 16:25; 1 Thess. 3:2, 13; 2 Thess. 2:17; 3:3; cf. 1 Pet. 5:10), esp. in the context of the opposition they are facing.

3. Peter uses stērigmos in 2 Pet. 3:17 to encourage believers to be on their guard against heretics and instead to remain steadfast in their faith. astēriktos, by contrast, is used to describe the instability of these heretics (3:16) and their protégés (2:14).

στίγμα (stigma), mark, brand (5116).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. stigma is related to the vb. stizō, to prick, mark with a pointed instrument, hence, to brand, tattoo. stigmata (pl.) were used to mark cattle and other animals as a protection against theft. stigmata applied to the human body were a sign of disgrace, used on deserters. Criminals were marked as a punishment, and esp. slaves suffered this penalty if they ran away and were caught or broke the law in some other way. The imperial period saw the branding of slaves as a mark of ownership; the mark was usually placed on the forehead. Stigmata could also be used as a sign of devotion to the gods.

2. The LXX has stigmata only once, and then with an insignificant meaning (Song 1:11 for earrings "studded" with silver). Nonetheless, the idea behind the word is present in several cases: when slaves were marked as a badge of ownership (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:16–17), when Cain was given a mark as a sign of Yahweh's preservation of his life (Gen. 4:15), when the remnant of the Israelite faithful were marked with the Heb. letter tāw as a pledge of their safety against the day of judgment (Ezek. 9:4), and esp. when Yahweh's people are bidden to inscribe his name on their hands as a promise of fidelity (Isa. 44:5).

Real stigmata (cuts on the body and "tattoo marks") were expressly forbidden in Israel, according to Lev. 19:28 (the related Gk. word used here, stikta, does not occur in the NT). Only in her apostate days did Israel borrow this practice from the Gentile nations (Jer. 16:6; 41:5; cf. 47:5; 48:37). True Yahwism is thus differentiated from the practices of the nations (1 Ki. 18:28), but 20:41 may be an exception if the prophet had Yahweh's "mark" on his forehead.

In the intertestamental period Jews were branded by their captors (Pss. Sol. 2:6), and slaves were branded to prevent their escape. The Hel. persecution of Jews took the form of the forcible imposition of pagan symbols, and Philo regarded the willing acceptance of a brand as a hallmark of apostasy. Jews regarded circumcision as the effective antidote to the desire to be tattooed, since a loyal Jew had this badge of his membership of the elect race and needed no other religious marking. Marks on bodies (in a fig. sense) and on grave sites in a literal fashion suggest a protective claim to belong to Yahweh (cf. Pss. Sol. 15:6–9). The sign of the tāw on Jewish tombs and ossuaries was a development of Ezek. 9:4.

NT The single NT occurrence of stigma is in Gal. 6:17. Perhaps Paul is referring to his claim to ownership by the Lord Jesus, whose slave Paul is. Or he may be implying some badge of protection that none of his enemies in Galatia can ignore with impunity (the Galatians would be familiar with the idea of a religious teacher being under the care of the gods and so immune from attack). Or perhaps the stigmata serve as a Christian counterpart to Jewish circumcision, a sign of eschatological fulfillment marking out the new Israel (6:16) as the true circumcision (cf. Phil. 3:3).

These stigmata are not to be seen as deliberately marked symbols (e.g., as though Paul had tattooed the sign of the cross or the name of Jesus on his flesh). Rather, they are scars and wounds received in his missionary service on behalf of the Gentiles (Eph. 3:1, 13; Col. 1:24).

See also charagma, mark, stamp, graven object (5916); kaustēriazō, mark by a branding iron, brand (3013).

στοιχεῖον (stoicheion), element; usually pl. stoicheia, elements, rudiments (5122); στοιχέω (stoicheō), be in line with, hold to (5123); συστοιχέω (systoicheō), stand in the same line, correspond to, conform to (5368).

CL & OT 1. The root stoichos means row, rank, line, esp. battle line. The vb. stoicheō thus means to be in a row, remain in a line, march in rank and file, or (metaphorically) step into line. The noun to stoicheion denoted the shadow on a sundial or (fig.) a part of a word (i.e., a letter, a syllable), a component of the universe (i.e., beginning, foundation, etc.).

2. In the LXX stoicheion occurs only in the Apocr. (3x, always pl.). In Wis. 7:17; 19:18 it means "elements of the universe" or "matter," and in 4 Macc. 12:13, "the substance of human life." stoicheō is found only in Eccl. 11:6, in the sense to succeed, to prosper.

NT 1. In the NT stoicheō occurs only 5x. Acts 21:24c gives the clearest sense: (lit.) "you too are in the ranks as one who keeps the law." In other words, it refers to leading a closely regulated life, to living according to definite rules. This is also shown by Phil. 3:16: "Only let us live up [stoichein] to what we have already attained." In Gal. 6:16 Paul uses the word kanōn to describe the rule just given in 6:15 and links it with the vb. stoicheō: "follow this rule." Gal. 5:25b should thus be paraphrased: "conduct our lives in conformity with the Spirit" (cf. also Rom. 4:12, when the vb. is translated "walk").

The compound systoicheō (Gal. 4:25) interprets the meaning of one of the two lines of descent from Abraham in 4:22–25, that of slavery: Hagar belongs to the same line (systoichei) as the present city of Jerusalem. Sinai, the mountain on which the law was given, is here linked with stoicheō, just as "law" is in Acts 21:24.

2. The noun is used 7x in the NT letters (always in the pl.; 4x in Paul, once in Heb., and 2x in 2 Pet.). The uses in 2 Pet. 3:10, 12, are the simplest to interpret. The reference to "the elements" (3:10) means earth, water, and air, of which only the first is named explicitly. When the world is consumed, these elements will melt and be destroyed (3:10, 12) in the primeval element, fire.

The meaning of Heb. 5:12 is also clear because of the presence of archē, beginning. The linking of these two words ("elementary truths" or "first principles") carries a derogatory ring, which is further emphasized by the reminder that the readers need milk and not solid food. The recipients of Heb. are not familiar with even the basic teachings of the faith (cf. 6:1–4).

In the case of Gal. 4:3, 9 and Col. 2:8, 20 many scholars hold that the stoicheia are angels, demons, and gods, i.e., personified forces as taught by a certain gnostic heresy. Others take Gal. 4 to refer to the Torah with its statutes and the world of false gods that the readers once served. In Col. the expression refers to religion before and outside Christ. But the interpretation is relatively unimportant, since the hierarchy of beings taught by Gnosticism, while partly syncretistic, was in fact the product of a current philosophico-religious view of the world.

The important point is that in Gal. 4:1–11 Paul has nothing positive to say about "the basic principles of the world," since he knows they have been overcome by Christ. Compared with him they are "weak and miserable" (4:9) and not the gods (4:8) the Gentiles believed them to be before conversion. Even the law is reckoned as among these principles and hence is declared null and void. Thus "the basic principles of the world" cover all the things in which humans place trust apart from the living God revealed in Christ; they become gods, and humans become their slaves.

In Col. 2:8, human tradition and "the basic principles of this world" both come under the heading of "hollow and deceptive philosophy," which seeks to prey on humankind. Such philosophy has long since been defeated by Christ and has appeared as a captive in his triumphal procession (2:10–15). As in Gal. 4:3, 5 "the basic principles of this world" are disapprovingly linked with "rules," which may be Jewish legal requirements. Note that later Gnosticism had significant links with the OT. Those who have died with Christ (Col. 2:20) should have nothing further to do with them; they are freed from the burdens imposed by the stoicheia on their day-to-day lives (2:21–23; cf. 3:1–17).

στῦλος (stylos), pillar, support (5146).

CL & OT stylos is a common Gk. word used for different kinds of pillars, columns, and other supports. In the LXX stylos is used for various Heb. words, esp. the posts in the tabernacle (Exod. 27:10–17; 36:36 = LXX 37:4) and the pillars in the temple (1 Ki. 7:15–45). It is also used for the pillar of cloud and of fire that represented God's guidance in the desert (Exod. 13:21; Ps. 99:7). Fig. it refers to the structure of the house that wisdom builds for the God-fearing person (Prov. 9:1).

NT stylos is used with reference to the temple in Rev. 3:12, where the Spirit of Jesus promises that those who overcome will become pillars in the temple of God. This metaphor probably refers to the two pillars that adorned the porch of Solomon's temple. The same word is used fig. of the leaders of the Jerusalem church, James, Cephas, and John (Gal. 2:9), and of the church of the living God as the foundation of truth (1 Tim. 3:15).

συκῆ (sykē), fig, both the tree and the fruit (5190); σῦκον (sykon), fig (5192).

CL & OT The forms sykea and sykē are both found in cl. Gk. and can refer to the resin of the pine or fir, as well as to the fig tree.

sykē is widely used in the LXX for the Heb. tᵉʾēnâ for the fig tree, its fruit, and its leaves (Gen. 3:7; Num. 13:24), esp. as characteristic of the fruitfulness of the promised land (Deut. 8:8). sykē has wide parabolic (cf. Jdg. 9:10) and fig. extensions. It represents ease and prosperity (cf. 1 Ki. 4:25), esp. in the messianic age (Mic. 4:4; Zech. 3:10 = LXX 3:11); it affords comparisons for that which is intrinsically desirable (Hos. 9:10), for renewal (Joel 2:22), and for that which fades (Isa. 34:4), and it is easy to capture (Nah. 3:12). It is also a description of disappointed hopes (Hab. 3:17).

The destruction of the fig tree, like that of other trees and crops, is a picture of judgment (Isa. 34:4; Jer. 8:13; Hos. 2:12; Joel 1:2–12). In Hos. 9:10 and Jer. 24 sykē symbolizes the nation that otherwise is generally pictured as a vine. Mic. 7:1–3 depicts the corrupt state of the nation that is full of bitterness, mutual hostility, and bloodshed in metaphorical terms of the absence of the fig when sought.

NT The reference to Jesus seeing Nathanael under the fig tree (Jn. 1:48, 50) is presumably to be taken lit. The remaining NT references all have fig. and symbolic aspects.

1. Particular problems attend the interpretation of Jesus' cursing of the fig tree (Matt. 21:18–22; Mk. 11:12–14, 20–25). As it stands, this event is not only the sole destructive miracle in Jesus' ministry, but it is also an acted parable in which Jesus depicted the judgment about to fall on Jerusalem. Most difficult is the statement, "it was not the season for figs [sykon]" (Mk. 11:13). (a) For Jesus to seek figs where he knew there could be none supplies the element of the incongruous, which calls attention to the presence of a metaphorical meaning or a parable.

(b) "Season" (kairos, → 2789) should be understood as in Mk. 12:2 of the time of ingathering. Jesus is thus reported to have come by the tree when, by its show of leaves, it ought to be in fruit, and, inasmuch as the harvest had not been gathered, the fruit should be showing on the tree.

(c) In addition, the explanatory clause, "it was not the season for figs," should not be attached to the foregoing words, "he found nothing but leaves," but to the words before that, "to find out if it had any fruit." Surely if the stones would cry out to greet the Messiah (Lk. 19:40), a fig tree could bear fruit out of season! After all, fruit should be continually in season during the messianic age, and Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mk. 11:1–10) had, in fact, pointed to the inauguration of the messianic age.

(d) One should also note the OT precedents for the association of the destruction of fig trees with judgment and the symbolic representation of Israel by the figure of figs. The attitude of the Jewish leaders to Jesus and the impending betrayal of Judas are best summed up in Mic. 7:1–6. The spiritual state of the nation and its leaders is uppermost in Jesus' mind at this period (cf. Mk. 11:1; Lk. 19:41–46). The cursing of the fig tree is, therefore, not an isolated event, but an integral part of the symbolic acts of Jesus' final visit to Jerusalem. It symbolizes judgment on the nation for its barren state and is of a piece with the cleansing of the temple that occurred at the same time.

2. Lk. does not record the cursing of the fig tree but contains a parable that presents a counterpart. In Lk. 13:6 the fig tree planted in a vineyard symbolizes Israel, which, despite tending, has so far failed to produce fruit. The master in the parable has sought fruit for the past three years (the period of Jesus' ministry?). But the caretaker of the vineyard asks for it to be spared one final year to give it a chance to bear fruit. If not, he will cut it down. This time of sparing corresponds to the time in which Israel is spared the final calamity of judgment, thus giving it one last chance to bear fruit. Note the context in which Jesus warns his hearers: "Unless you repent, you too will all perish" (13:5).

3. In Matt. 24:32–33; Mk. 13:28; Lk. 21:29 the growth of the fig tree is seen as a sign of the approaching summer, the climax of which will be the time when the figs are ripe for gathering. This is the time when the Son of Man will gather the elect (Mk. 13:27; cf. Matt. 24:31; Lk. 21:28) and come to take account (Mk. 13:34–37; cf.

Matt. 24:36–51; Lk. 21:34–35). If the references to the fig tree in the ministry of Jesus are connected, then this reference is also a picture of Israel as it moves inevitably to the time when fruit will be sought and none found, reminiscent of the fig tree that was cursed.

4. Expectation of fruit also underlies Jas. 3:12, where the picture is one of natural (and, by analogy, moral) consistency between the one bearing fruit and the type of fruit produced. In Rev. 6:13, the picture suggests that which falls easily in judgment.

5194 (sylagōgeō, rob, carry off as booty or captive), → 5195.

συλάω (sylaō), plunder, rob (5195); συλαγωγέω (sylagōgeō), rob, carry off as booty or captive (5194).

CL & OT sylaō means to strip off the arms from a fallen enemy; to take a bow out of its case or the lid off a quiver; to despoil secretly, i.e., cheat. In the LXX sylaō occurs only in Ep. Jer. (Bar. 6:18), referring to burglary, for fear of which priests bolt and bar their temples.

NT sylaō occurs only at 2 Cor. 11:8. By a bold military metaphor Paul dramatizes the fact that his ministry at Corinth was at no cost to the Christians there, because he had, as it were, plundered other churches by accepting financial support from them, rather than expecting the Corinthians to give money to him for his personal needs.

sylagōgeō, rob, carry off as booty, occurs for the first time in the NT. In Col. 2:8 the vb. is used fig. of drawing someone away from the truth of Christ into the slavery of error. Paul warns the converts at Colosse against the threat of being seduced from the Lord. His vb. gives the picture of prisoners being led away with a rope around their necks, like the long strings of captives portrayed on Assyrian monuments.

συλλαμβάνω (syllambanō), seize, conceive, assist (5197).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. syllambanō meant collect together as its primary meaning; it could also mean: put together, close; lay hands on, seize; grasp (of the mind); conceive, become pregnant; take part with another, assist.

In the LXX, syllambanō often means conceive, either lit. (e.g., Gen. 4:1, 17; 1 Sam. 1:20) or fig. (Ps. 7:14). It can also mean seize, arrest, capture, either lit. (e.g., Num. 5:13; Deut. 21:19; Jdg. 15:4) or fig. (e.g., the snatching away of sinners before their time by an act of God's judgment, Job 22:16; Ps. 9:16; the snaring of the unsuspecting by the wicked, Jer. 5:26; cf. Eccl. 7:27).

NT syllambanō occurs 16x in the NT.

1. Lk. uses it to mean conceive in his account of the births of John the Baptist and Jesus (Lk. 1:24; 31, 36; 2:21), while Jas. 1:15 uses the imagery of conception and birth fig.

2. The vb. can also mean seize or capture. It is used in all four Gospels to describe the seizing of Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mk. 14:48 par.; Jn. 18:12; cf. Acts 1:16). Lk. also uses it in his narrative of the arrest of Peter (Acts 12:3) and in the account of the attempt by the Jews to lynch Paul outside the temple at Jerusalem (23:27). In Lk. 5:9 the same word describes a huge catch of fish.

3. The vb. appears 2x in the mid. voice, meaning take hold of together, assist. In Lk. 5:7 those in Simon's boat call for assistance (NIV, "help") when their nets break under the strain of a miraculous catch; in Phil. 4:3 Paul uses syllambanō to appeal to an unknown church member to "help" Euodia and Syntyche resolve their differences.

5203 (symbasileuō, share the rule), → 995.

συμβουλεύω (symbouleuō), advise (5205); σύμβουλος (symboulos), adviser (5207); συμβούλιον (symboulion), advice, council (5206).

CL & OT Words associated with the stem symboul- refer to the giving of advice by one person to another, either in private or in public affairs. In the LXX, symbouleuō generally means advise. symboulos is used once of a person who might give advice to God (Isa. 40:13), the thought, however, being the inappropriateness of such an attempt.

NT symbouleuō is used of the evil plots of the Jews against Jesus and the early church (Matt. 26:4; Jn. 18:14; Acts 9:23), but also of the good advice given by Christ to the church at Laodicea (Rev. 3:18). A symboulion can be the panel of advisers employed by a Roman governor (Acts 25:12). Matt. uses symboulion lambanō for the machinations of the Jewish authorities against Jesus (12:14; 22:15; 27:1, 7; 28:12); symboulion didōmi (Mk. 3:6) conveys the same meaning. symboulion poieō (15:1) can mean reach a decision or hold a meeting; the phraseology leaves it uncertain whether this refers to a second, morning meeting of the Sanhedrin. symboulos occurs in a quotation of Isa. 40:13 in Rom. 11:34; the rhetorical question stresses the transcendent and incomprehensible character of God's wisdom.

σύν (syn), with (5250); μετά (meta), with (3552).

CL In cl. Gk. syn meant including, with the aid of, while, and meta means in company with. In Hel. Gk., however, these two words become virtually synonymous. syn has not survived in modern popular Gk.

NT 1. syn occurs 128x in the NT, of which 74 are in Luke–Acts. meta is more common (364x) than syn, but the latter is rarely used in compound verbs. Both preps. are used in connection with Christian discipleship, fellowship meals, and eschatology.

2. In spite of the general interchangeability of these two preps., it is significant that Paul regularly ends his letters with the prayer that God's grace might be "with" (meta, never syn) his addressees, whereas he depicts the Christian life as one of identification with (syn) Christ and the Christian's destiny as living "with him" (syn, e.g., 2 Cor. 13:4). This suggests that of the two preps., syn was the more suited to express intimate personal union (e.g., Col. 3:4) and meta the more suited to denote close association or attendant circumstances (e.g., 1 Thess. 3:13).

The more dominant expression in Paul regarding our present relationship with Christ is that we are "in [en, → 1877] him." But when we die, there is an added dimension: We go to be "with [syn] Christ" (Phil. 1:23). syn here signifies more than mere spatial juxtaposition and even more than coexistence. Our destiny after death is active communion with Christ. Moreover, after the Parousia, our being "with [syn] the Lord" (1 Thess. 4:17) denotes the added dimension of our sharing in the eschatological blessings of the kingdom enjoyed by Christ since his resurrection.

CL & OT In cl. Gk. synagō is used of bringing together, collecting, or convening, even in a hostile sense of joining battle. It can also refer to uniting in marriage or forming a conclusion from certain premises. Sometimes it speaks of gathering together stores or crops (Xenophon).

In the LXX synagō occurs about 350x and stands chiefly for the Heb. ʾāsap. It is used of collecting things, esp. fruits (Exod. 23:10; Lev. 25:3, 20; Isa. 17:5), but also ears of grain (Ruth 2:7), quails (Num. 11:32), money (2 Ki. 22:4; 2 Chr. 24:11), and the ashes of a red heifer (Num. 19:9). More important, the vb. may refer to gathering together persons, nations, or armies (Exod. 3:16; 4:29; Num. 21:16, 23; 2 Sam. 10:17; 12:29). It also refers to being gathered to one's people in Sheol (2 Ki. 22:20) and gathering those slain in battle in order to bury them (Jer. 9:22; Ezek. 29:5).

A diff. Heb. verb (qābaṣ), also translated by synagō, is used of collecting grain or grapes (Gen. 41:35, 48; Isa. 62:9), booty (Deut. 13:16), money (2 Chr. 24:5), birds (Isa. 34:16), animals (Ezek. 39:17), and people (Deut. 30:3–4). It is used esp. of God's recalling and assembling the exiles (Isa. 40:11; 43:5; 56:8) and his gathering the nations for judgment (66:18; Mic. 4:12).

NT In the NT synagō appears 59x. In the Synoptics it refers to the gathering of people (e.g., crowds, Matt. 13:2; wedding guests, 22:10) or things (food, 6:26; fish, 13:47; vultures, 24:28). It is contrasted with skorpizō (scatter; → 5025) in connection with the mission of the church (12:30; 25:24, 26). Matt. frequently records an assembling of the religious leaders (2:4; 22:34, 41; 26:3, 57; 27:17, 62; 28:12), and once uses synagō to refer to the whole Roman cohort gathering in the Praetorium before Jesus' crucifixion (27:27). The nations will be gathered together at the last judgment (25:32), and the Messiah will gather the wheat into his barn (3:12; cf. 13:30, where the reapers are angels sent by the Son of Man). Wherever several believers gather in Christ's name, he will be in their midst (18:20). In 25:35, 38, 43 synagō means invite in, receive as a guest.

In Jn. the fragments from the feeding of the five thousand are gathered up (Jn. 6:12–13). Christian workers gather fruit unto life eternal (4:36), and Christ's mission is to gather and to make into one the children of God scattered abroad (11:52). Fruitless branches, however, are gathered and burned (15:6). Jesus often gathers his disciples to Gethsemane (18:2), and the chief priests and Pharisees convene a council (11:47).

In Acts the early church gathers for prayer (4:31), instruction (11:26), information (14:27; 15:30), consultation (15:6), and the breaking of bread (20:7–8). On the other hand, just as Herod and Pilate assembled against Jesus (4:26–27), so do the Jewish religious leaders against the church (4:5). In Pisidian Antioch practically the whole city gathers to hear the word of God (13:44).

The only instance of synagō in Paul occurs in 1 Cor. 5:4, where believers will assemble to deal with a case of incest requiring excommunication. In Rev. we read of a gathering for the great eschatological battle (16:14, 16; 19:19; 20:8) and for the great supper of God (19:17).

episynagō is used in Jesus' lament over rebellious Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37; Lk. 13:34), in eschatological passages speaking of the gathering of the elect (Matt. 24:31; Mk. 13:27), and in connection with crowds gathering about Jesus (1:33; Lk. 12:1). In Lk. 17:37 episynagō is used in a warning: "Where there is a dead body, there the vultures will gather."

syllegō is used for collecting grapes (Matt. 7:16; Lk. 6:44), good fish (Matt. 13:48), and weeds for destruction (13:28, 29, 30, 40, 41). trygaō appears as a stylistic variation for syllegō in Lk. 6:44. In Rev. 14:18–19 trygaō speaks of gathering the clusters of the vine, a fig. use in which the winepress of God's wrath is in view.

Several other words are used sparingly for gathering together: (1) systrephō in Acts 28:3, of Paul's gathering a bundle of sticks (cf. Matt. 17:22); (2) athroizō in Lk. 24:33, of the eleven apostles and others gathered together in Jerusalem; (3) synathroizō in Acts 12:12, of the believers assembled in the home of John Mark's mother (cf. 19:25); (4) epathroizō in Lk. 11:29, of crowds gathered.

episynagōgē in 2 Thess. 2:1 refers to believers "being gathered" together to Christ at the Parousia; in Heb. 10:25 to the regular gathering together of believers in worship and instruction.

συνέδριον (synedrion), council, Sanhedrin (5284).

CL & OT synedrion is related to synedros (syn + hedra), one who sits with somebody else (in a council), and synedreuō, sit in council. Originally it meant the place where a council met, then the body of councilors, or their actual meeting. It was used of various official bodies (including courts).

The word is used a dozen times in the LXX, but with no fixed significance. Josephus uses it for various councils and courts, but esp. as a technical term for the supreme Jewish council. The body that guided Jewish affairs in Jerusalem after return from the exile was an aristocratic council of priests and lay leaders. Later, scribes of the Pharisaic party gained seats on it. The earliest use of synedrion in this sense occurs in a decree of Gabinius (57–55 B.C.), which mentions five such bodies in different areas of Palestine. Somewhat later the Jerusalem council gained authority over the whole country and was regularly called synedrion, even by the Jews, who took the word over into the Heb./Aram. as sanhedrîn.

This council was composed of 71 members, with the high priest as chairman. It included the heads of the priestly families, leaders of the lay aristocracy (the elders), and a number of scribes; the first two groups stood together as the Sadducean party, while the third group was Pharisaic in outlook. Membership appears to have been self-perpetuating. The Sanhedrin was essentially a court charged with the maintenance of Jewish customs. It could impose the death sentence, but (except in rare circumstances) the Romans retained the right of actually inflicting the penalty (Jn. 18:31). We do not know how it functioned in NT times, since the rules for procedure contained in the Mishnah reflect Pharisaic ideals rather than the actual Sadducean practice.

There were also smaller Jewish courts known by the same name outside Jerusalem, who exercised jurisdiction among Jewish communities in Palestine and the Diaspora. The Mishnah lays down a membership of 23 persons for them.

NT Christians are warned that they may be summoned to bear witness before such local courts and might even be sentenced to scourging by them (Matt. 10:17 par.). Jesus said that a person who is angry with his brother is liable to judgment by the synedrion, thus indicating metaphorically that anger is as culpable as murder (5:21–22).

The majority of references to the Sanhedrin are in connection with its proceedings against Jesus and the early church. At a particular point in Jesus' ministry the Sanhedrin determined that he had to be put away (Jn. 11:47), and it seized the opportunity given by Judas at the Passover to arrest Jesus and try him (Mk. 14:55; 15:1; Lk. 22:66). This opposition continued toward the early church (Acts 4; 5:17–41; 6:8–7:60; 22:30–23:10, 20, 28; 24:20), though according to Acts the Pharisees took a more favorable position.

συνείδησις (syneidēsis), consciousness, conscience (5287); σύνοιδα (synoida), perf. with pres. meaning, be conscious of, have a conscience about (5323).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. synoida can mean share the knowledge of (e.g., as witness in court), be privy to, be conscious of. syneidēsis and syneidos (used synonymously) mean the faculty of memory, consciousness, and conscience.

(a) Originally syneidēsis focused on knowledge, specifically the capacity to relate to oneself by looking back at one's past. This activity included evaluations and judgments about good and evil. Hence, the word acquired the moral meaning of conscience. In this context writers spoke of a good (agathē or orthē) or a bad (deinē or ponēra) conscience. The good conscience is generally at peace, whereas the bad conscience makes itself painfully felt by relentlessly troubling its owner.

(b) It is striking that pre-Christian Gk. lit. speaks almost exclusively of a bad conscience, whereas the Romans often spoke of a good or clear conscience (used esp. regarding performance of expected duties). Later writers saw the conscience as a watchman bestowed by God to guide a person to live according to nature and to direct one's moral progress. The ground was thus laid for conscience to become a normative guide.

2. The OT has no special word for the conscience. In the LXX syneidēsis occurs only in several late passages (Eccl. 10:20; Wis. 17:11; Sir. 42:18), where it does take on the Gk. notion of this human phenomenon. For the Israelites the question of one's attitude toward oneself was less significant than that of one's attitude toward God. God's people were to be more concerned with their accountability before him than with exploring self-consciousness.

This does not mean that the OT knows nothing of a tormented conscience but that the voice of conscience possesses no intrinsic value. It is the voice of the divine Judge that counts, demanding from people an account of their dealings. The function of conscience is attributed to the human heart. Thus David's heart smote him to remind him of his guilt (1 Sam. 24:5; 2 Sam. 24:10) and summoned him to penitence and regret (cf. Ps. 51:10). The idea of a clean heart points forward to the NT notion of a good conscience.

3. The correspondence between the OT idea of the heart and the Gk. notion of conscience is developed in Philo. For him conscience is a normative entity in a human shaped by the law of God. Its task is to convict of sin and reprove and thus bring one to repentance. Otherwise, it will continue to trouble the sinner. The ultimate goal of conscience is to drive the sinner into the arms of a merciful God.

NT 1. In the NT the vb. synoida occurs only 2x. In 1 Cor. 4:4 it is reflexive: "My conscience is clear." Acts 5:2 suggests a shared knowledge: "With his wife's full knowledge [Ananias] kept back part of the money."

2. The noun syneidēsis, however, occurs 30x. In Rom. 2:15 it stands alongside kardia (heart) and logismoi (thoughts) as a critical human organ. All three elements enable Gentiles to conduct lives that correspond to those of the Jews, who live according to God's revealed law. Conscience is assigned the role of awakening awareness of the law that is written on the human heart. It appears, as it were, as a court of appeal that cannot promulgate any statutes (for only God himself can do this) but is able to deliver judgment on the cases before it.

The thought of conscience as a court of appeal is clear in the passages in which Paul deals with the Corinthians' question of the propriety of eating meat sacrificed to idols (1 Cor. 8:7–13; 10:25–11:1). He makes two points: Christians are free from regimentation by an alien conscience, yet they must show regard for the more sensitive or "weak conscience" of others.

Paul rejoices in the testimony of his own conscience that has been formed by God (2 Cor. 1:12). Likewise, he hopes that the consciences of those who are open to God will recognize the sincerity of his missionary life and work (4:2; 5:11). Therefore, the avoidance of a bad, accusing conscience is worth aspiring after, yet it is even more important to have a good conscience that confirms the correspondence of faith and life. Appealing to such a conscience that is in line with God's will, Paul can also demand obedience to those in authority "because of conscience" (Rom. 13:5; cf. 1 Pet. 2:19). Acts 24:16 lays down what is virtually a rule of conduct: "I [Paul] strive to keep my conscience clear before God and man" (cf. 23:1).

3. The Pastoral Letters lay great emphasis on a good conscience. They refer to the corrupt and unbelieving, whose "minds and consciences are corrupted" (Tit. 1:15), and to "hypocritical liars, whose consciences have been seared" (1 Tim. 4:2). By contrast, Christians are to hold "to faith and a good conscience" (1:19; cf. 1 Pet. 3:16) and "to serve . . . with a clear conscience" (2 Tim. 1:3). Alongside a "pure heart" and a "sincere faith," 1 Tim. 1:5 names "a good conscience" as the source of love in action. In short, the conscience can be regarded as the place where the "deep truths of the faith" are kept (3:9). That is why "the pledge of a good conscience toward God," which is the essence of baptism (1 Pet. 3:21), is so important.

4. Heb. stresses the Christological basis of the NT understanding of conscience when it declares that "the blood of Christ" purifies the conscience "from acts that lead to death, so that we may serve the living God" (9:14). Using the symbolism of the Day of Atonement ritual, in which the high priest entered the sanctuary once a year, 10:22 urges believers to enter and to draw near themselves "with a sincere heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled to cleanse us from a guilty conscience and having our bodies washed with pure water." It is only because of the high priestly sacrifice of Christ that "we are sure that we have a clear conscience" (13:18).

5. In this way the Christian understanding of conscience is transformed by faith in the forgiving power of Christ. The Gks. saw conscience as something bad, operating retrospectively, whereas Christians came to see conscience as being made clean through faith. Its purity lay in the believer's knowledge of his or her standing in Christ. The fact that it was directed by the Word of God gave the believer a heart to serve God in love.

σύνεσις (synesis), faculty of comprehension, understanding, insight (5304); συνίημι (syniēmi), perceive, comprehend, understand (5317); συνετός (synetos), quick at apprehending, understanding, intelligent (5305); ἀσύνετος (asynetos), senseless, foolish (852).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the vb. syniēmi originally meant to bring together, a meaning not found in the NT. Fig., syniēmi means to perceive, take notice of, understand, comprehend. The noun synesis originally meant a joining (e.g., of rivers); then, in a transferred sense, the faculty of judgment, apprehension, understanding, insight, comprehension. Neither vb. nor noun acquired any great philosophical importance. The adj. synetos means quick at apprehending, clever; also intelligible. The opposite is asynetos, stupid or unintelligible.

2. In the LXX both noun and vb. occur about 100x each, the adj. 53x, the negative adj. only 12x. As one might expect, these words are found most frequently in the wisdom lit. Words in this group often occur in connection with sayings about wisdom.

synesis, understanding, insight, and sophia, wisdom (5053), are used together (Job 12:13; Prov. 1:7; Isa. 11:2; 29:14; Sir. 1:19–20). The object of this knowledge is the fact that the Lord is God (e.g., Jer. 9:24). Fear of the Lord, justice and righteousness, right and wrong are named as the objects of insight (1 Ki. 3:9, 11; Prov. 2:5, 9). Thus, insight is not open to everyone. Since the knowledge of God is always associated with his revelatory activity, insight can ultimately be understood only as a gift that God imparts in response to our request (1 Ki. 3:9; Dan. 2:21) but can also withdraw because of disobedience (Isa. 29:14).

NT syniēmi occurs only in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts, in quotations from the LXX at Rom. 3:11; 15:21, and otherwise in 2 Cor. 10:12; Eph. 5:17. synesis occurs 7x times (once in a quotation). The OT idea that insight is a gift of God and is linked with his revelation reappears in the NT usage. In many cases the NT passages in question are quoting from or alluding to the OT (e.g., Isa. 6:9–10 in Matt. 13:14–15; Deut. 6:5 in Mk. 12:33; Ps. 14:2 in Rom. 3:11).

1. In the Synoptics the most important passages are those that deal with the theme of the so-called "messianic secret." (a) Mk. records the disciples' lack of understanding regarding Jesus' words and actions (6:52; 8:17, 21; in 8:18 with direct reference to Isa. 6:9–10 or Jer. 5:21). That is, the closeness of the disciples to Jesus was not alone sufficient to guarantee understanding. His work can only be understood in the light of Easter.

Mk. 4:10–12 makes this point clear. Here Jesus stresses that his works become revelation to those who believe. Therefore, believers are the ones who receive the secret of the kingdom of God; to "those on the outside" everything comes in parables. Because they do not understand the parables, they are unable to turn and be saved (cf. Isa. 6:9–10 again).

(b) Matt. has a different emphasis from Mk., for he stresses the disciples' understanding. Matt. shows how the disciples did in fact come to understand, though he does stress that such understanding is a divine gift (cf. 16:16–20; 17:5–13). At the end of the parabolic discourse, for example, Jesus asks the disciples, "Have you understood all these things?" They reply, "Yes" (13:51). The statement of Mk. 6:52, which attributes their lack of insight to hardness of heart, is replaced by an exclamation of worship, praising Jesus as the Son of God (Matt. 14:33). The discussion of yeast in Mk. 8:14–21, which ends with the accusing question, "Do you still not understand?" leads in Matt. 16:5–12 to the final understanding of the disciples.

(c) In Lk. 18:34 the disciples' lack of understanding is emphasized particularly in regard to Jesus' passion prediction. In 2:47 the insight of Jesus at twelve years of age is the subject of amazement, and there is no doubt that such insight is regarded as a gift from God. Conversely, his parents' failure to understand (2:50) must be seen as the opposite. In addition, it is the risen Christ who enables the downcast disciples on the Emmaus road to understand the Scriptures and to grasp the fact that his sufferings were foreordained by God (24:45).

Acts 28:26–27 cites Isa. 6:9–10 as the explanation for the unwillingness and inability of the Jews in Rome to understand the gospel (cf. Jn. 12:40, where noeō is used instead of syniēmi). Although insight is a gift of God, the fault for lack of insight lies within ourselves.

2. In Paul the use of these words is again affected by OT concepts, esp. since in most cases they occur in quotations from the OT or allusions to OT phrases (Rom. 3:11 = Ps. 14:2; Rom. 10:19 = Deut. 32:21; Rom. 15:21 = Isa. 52:15; 1 Cor. 1:19 = Isa. 29:14).

Whether lack of insight is being condemned (Rom. 3:11), or God's wrath is pronounced over the arrogance of those who believe themselves to be wise (1 Cor. 1:19), or the subject is the universality of the message of salvation (Rom. 10:19; 15:21), insight is always seen as a gift of God and lack of insight as not merely a chance lack of knowledge. Rather, as Rom. 1:21 stresses, lack of insight must be regarded as culpable behavior. asynetos, having no insight, "foolish," appears among the list of evils in Rom. 1:31.

3. In the later Pauline letters we find not only the familiar ideas (insight as a gift, 2 Tim. 2:7), but also a new emphasis as a result of the connection of these words with the concept of mystery. Fullness of understanding is given in the revelation of the secret of God in Christ, in whom all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge lie hidden (Col. 2:2–3). We may compare Eph. 3:4, where the content of the mystery of Christ is, in keeping with the wider context of this letter, associated with the church.

σφραγίς (sphragis), seal, signet (5382); σφραγίζω (sphragizō), to seal (5381); κατασφραγίζω (katasphragizō), to seal (2958).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. sphragis means the tool that seals (e.g., a signet ring), the stone set in it (the gem), or the engraving on it (an image or name). Seals were widely used in the ANE by both private persons and authorities, esp. in Mesopotamia but later in the whole Mediterranean area. The importance of the seal was legal: An owner put his mark on his possessions, his animals, and his slaves in order to guard them against theft. It was thus a protecting sign or a guarantee. When used with documents (wills, deeds of sale, etc.) the seal served as a signature to authorize what was written there. Things sealed were at the disposal of the possessor of the seal and symbolized authority.

(b) Seals were also important in religious life. For instance, an animal could be attested as ritually pure and thus suitable for a sacrificial victim. People showed themselves to be the possession of their deity by the imprint of their seal. More tangibly one could seal houses, etc., to guarantee that they were preserved, or documents, to keep their contents a secret. Hence, one could also say that the mouth or words are sealed; what one has experienced must remain secret and in safekeeping. This applied esp. to secrets of the mystery religions.

2. In the LXX sphragis and sphragizō are used lit. and fig. In this way they approximate to nonbiblical usage. (a) A seal engraved by a maker of signets (Sir. 38:27) can leave its impress in clay (Job 38:14). It has a legal use; by means of a seal a document (e.g., a marriage contract, Tob. 7:14; a deed of sale, Jer. 32:10–11, 44 = LXX 39:10–11, 44) becomes valid. All who affix their seals to a document are bound to abide by its contents (Neh. 10:1). To give one's seal to another implies the transference of authority and power (Gen. 41:42; 1 Ki. 21:8 = LXX 20:8; Est. 3:10; 8:8, 10). Hence, one of the means by which the dying Antiochus Epiphanes appointed his friend Philip as regent over his kingdom was to hand over his seal to him (1 Macc. 6:15).

The LXX also speaks of a seal used as a fastening (for a purse, 2 Ki. 22:4; Tob. 9:5; a pit, Dan. 6:17; a fountain, Cant. 4:12). Thus the act of sealing is also equivalent to keeping something secret (e.g., a book, Dan. 12:4; Isa. 29:11; cf. 1 Esd. 3:8). The seal is necessary in both private and public life. The seal of the state (Jerusalem, 2 Esd. 10:23) is carefully guarded (Tob. 1:22). Signet rings are precious (Isa. 3:21; Sir. 32:5–6) and are regarded as valuable spoil (Num. 31:50).

(b) The fig. use of the concept is found esp. with the sense of concluding or shutting up. One can, e.g., ask for a seal to be set on one's lips that one may not sin in speaking (Sir. 22:27; cf. Ps. 141:3). God seals the stars (Job 9:7) by shutting them up so that they no longer shine, and he seals people, preventing them from working, so that they may recognize their dependence on him (37:7 LXX). Several times sins are said to be sealed (in a bag, 14:17; cf. Hos. 13:12). A revelation that is sealed remains hidden (Dan. 12:9), and one can learn as little of its contents as of those of a sealed book. The end of life is sealed in that it is unalterable (Wis. 2:5).

(c) The application of sealing to a religious context plays some part in the LXX. These precise words are not used, but their meaning is present. Isa. 44:5 presupposes the custom of having a seal with the words "The LORD's," i.e., Yahweh's property, tattooed on the hand. Ezek. 9:4–6 is also relevant here: God orders one of his servants to mark a sign on the foreheads of his children to protect them in the judgment. The seal is thus God's protective mark for his property (cf. Pss. Sol. 15:6–9).

3. The affixing of seals is also frequently mentioned in rab. Jud. For example, letters are sealed (m. Ohal. 17:5; cf. m. Shab. 8:5). In the temple was a room where four kinds of seals for victims were kept (m. Sheqal. 5:3–4). A seal can be made of metal or coral (m. Kelim 13:6). The Mishnah also uses the word in a metaphorical sense (e.g., m. Sanh. 4:5).

Sealing often occurs in the sense of signing, esp. in the tractate Gittin (1:1, 3), where two witnesses are said to "seal" a bill of divorce. Circumcision is called the seal of the holy covenant (y. Ber. 9:3) or the seal of Abraham (Exod. Rab. 19:5), since he was the first to receive this sign (Gen. 17:11). The noun and the vb. occur only infrequently in the Qumran texts.

NT 1. sphragis occurs 16x in the NT, sphragizō 15x, and katasphragizō once. (a) Twice sphragizō is used of actual physical sealing: the stone in front of Jesus' grave (Matt. 27:66; cf. Dan. 6:17) and the pit into which the devil is thrown (Rev. 20:3). In both cases this is done to prevent the one enclosed within from leading people astray (Matt. 27:63–64; Rev. 20:3).

(b) In Rom. 15:28 Paul says that he is "sealing" (NIV, "made sure") the collections from Macedonia and Achaia for the Jerusalem church. Paul is either saying that he has "sealed" the collections as one seals a purse (cf. Tob. 9:5) so that the contents may be kept safe, or that he has finished the collection.

2. (a) Jn. uses sphragizō in the sense of confirm, authenticate. Those who receive God's witness thus certify that God is true (Jn. 3:33), while 6:27 says that God has put "his seal of approval" on the Son of Man. By doing so he attests that the eternal food that the Son of Man gives is true spiritual food; by his seal God authenticates the Son of Man's work. Some think Jn. is reflecting here on baptism as a sealing; others think that this seal is the miracle of the feeding of the five thousand (6:1–15) or the testimony of holy Scripture (5:39).

When Paul in 1 Cor. 9:2 calls the Corinthian community the seal of his apostleship, he means that the existence of this community in the world confirms the legitimacy of his apostolic authority and that they are at the same time his letters of recommendation (cf. 2 Cor. 3:1–3).

(b) Three times Paul connects sealing with the Holy Spirit. This sealing, as he sees it, is symbolized by baptism, which he associates with the gift of the Spirit (1 Cor. 6:11; 12:13; cf. Acts 2:38; 10:47). While Eph. 1:13 relates being sealed with the Holy Spirit (cf. 4:30) to the whole baptismal event, 2 Cor. 1:21–22 looks on baptism as an anointing in Christ and associates it with the receiving of the pledge of the Spirit (arrabōn, → 775). As Christ was anointed with the Spirit at his baptism (cf. Lk. 3:22; 4:18), so also are believers at theirs. The Spirit is a pledge until the day of redemption (Eph. 1:14; 2 Cor. 1:22; cf. 5:5). In sealing believers with his Spirit, God makes them his own possession.

It is not certain that Paul used the word seal in Rom. 4:11 in connection with Abraham's circumcision because he thought of baptism as a "seal" (cf. also Col. 2:11–12, which mentions a circumcision not performed by human hands, which comes through Christ). This idea did become explicit at a later stage (e.g., 2 Clem. 7:6; 8:6). Rom. 4:11 most likely means that by the seal of circumcision God confirmed that Abraham was justified even before God made his covenant with him (Gen. 17:10–14), a covenant whose sign is circumcision. Thus, circumcision here represents God's confirmatory sign, given as a seal to Abraham.

(c) In 2 Tim. 2:19, Paul speaks of a firm foundation that is fixed (cf. Isa. 28:16) and bears an inscription: "'The Lord knows those who are his,' and, 'Everyone who confesses the name of the Lord must turn away from wickedness.'" The word sphragis here means the inscription on a seal (Exod. 28:36 = LXX 28:32). The question is what is meant by the foundation on which this mark is stamped: Is it Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 3:10–11), the church (cf. 1 Tim. 3:15), the apostolic witness (cf. Eph. 2:20), or the truth in contrast to what is taught by the false teachers (2 Tim. 2:15, 18)? In any case, through his seal God guarantees the firmness of the foundation, for he knows his own and does not tolerate unrighteousness. The two inscriptions probably depend on Num. 16:5.

3. More than half of the uses of this word group occur in Rev. (a) In 22:10 the seer is forbidden to seal the words of the prophecy; he must not keep them secret since the time of their fulfillment is near (cf. the opposite in Dan. 12:4). By contrast, Rev. 10:4 reads: "Seal up what the seven thunders have said and do not write it down." This reflects the idea that what is sealed up is hidden (cf. Isa. 29:11). The message of the thunders, which ushers in the beginning of the final judgment, is only for the seer's ears and is not to be communicated to anyone else.

(b) Rev. 5:1 tells us how Jn. sees in the right hand of him who sits on the heavenly throne a scroll written on both sides, which has seven seals. No one but the Lamb can open it (5:2–10). The contents of the scroll are so voluminous that they cover both sides (cf. Ezek. 2:9–10). But it is still secret, even for the seer (cf. Dan. 12:4, 9). The number seven recalls the Roman custom of sealing a will with seven seals, but the more likely reason for seven seals is to be derived from the use of this number in Rev. itself (→ hepta, seven, 2231).

It is difficult to imagine what the scroll looks like, since a part of the final cataclysm is revealed with the opening of each individual seal (Rev. 6:1, 3, 5, 7, 9, 12; 8:1), despite the fact that the contents of ancient documents were disclosed only after the opening of all the seals. But the writer is not interested in this idea itself, but in emphasizing that only the Lamb is worthy of setting the final events in motion.

(c) Finally Rev. 7:1–8 refers to the "seal of the living God" (7:2), which is imprinted on the foreheads of believers before the four angels of judgment are allowed to begin their work. These seals will protect them from the judgment that is coming on the world (9:4; cf. Ezek. 9:4; Pss. Sol. 15:6–9). The seal is here a sign of ownership and thus also of the one who protects; God keeps his own from the judgment. That 12,000 of each tribe receive the seal means that God's entire people will be spared from judgment (→ chilias, thousand, 5942). The imprinting of the seal that bears God's name (cf. 14:1; 22:4) will distinguish believers from those who bear the "mark of the beast" on their hands and foreheads (13:16–17; 14:9, 11). God's sign protects one from judgment; the mark of the beast brings it upon one (9:4; 14:9–11). It is easy to discern here a word of consolation to a community living through the trials of persecution.

σχῆμα (schēma), outward appearance, form, shape (5386); συσχηματίζω (syschēmatizō), to mold, form after; pass. be formed like, be conformed to (5372).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. schēma means (1) form, shape, figure; (2) appearance, as opposed to reality; (3) bearing, air; (4) fashion, manner; (5) character. Gk. thought did not sharply distinguish between the external and the internal. schēma denotes the form that is seen. It could thus denote the role played by an actor, which includes its essential character. But the outward form can also be deceptive and appearance a sham. schēma can thus mean mere appearance as opposed to reality. One must beware of the modern perspective, however, which tends to relate schēma merely to external things, implying that the essential character is something different. To the Gk. mind, the observer saw not only the outer shell but the whole form with it.

syschēmatizō means not only to conform to the external form, but to assume the form of something, to identify oneself essentially with someone else. A similar vb., metaschēmatizō (→ 3571) indicates the process by which an object or a person is transformed and changed.

2. In Isa. 3:17 schēma refers to the proud bearing of women. Words of this group do not appear elsewhere in the LXX.

NT 1. schēma and syschēmatizō each occurs 2x in the NT. In Phil. 2:7, in the Christian hymn incorporated into this letter, Paul refers to Jesus Christ as "being found in appearance as a man" (schēma). This refers primarily to the way in which Jesus' humanity appeared, the way in which anyone could see him (for more on this passage, → morphē, 3671, and kenos, 3031).

2. (a) In 1 Cor. 7:31 Paul shows how real the schēma was for him when he declares: "This world in its present form is passing away."

(b) In Rom. 12:2 Paul warns us not to "conform" (syschēmatizō) to this age, that is, not to be absorbed by it, surrender oneself to it, and fall prey to it. To do so is to yield oneself to its power (cf. 1 Pet. 1:14).

σχίζω (schizō), split, tear, divide, separate (5387); σχίσμα (schisma), split, tear, division (5388).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. schizō is generally used lit. of dividing into parts or breaking into pieces; only rarely is it used in the fig. sense of a division of opinion. The rare noun schisma denotes a slit, cleft, or clique.

2. schizō occurs 11x in the LXX in reference to cutting wood (Gen. 22:3), splitting rocks (Isa. 48:21) or mountains (Zech. 14:4), or dividing water (Exod. 14:21). schisma is not found in the LXX. A related noun schismē is, but it is used in a lit. sense (Isa. 2:19, 21; Jon. 2:6).

NT 1. (a) At the baptism of Jesus, the heavens were "torn open" (Mk. 1:10), a sign of divine disclosure at a crucial point of history (cf. Jn. 1:51; Acts 7:56; 10:11; perhaps an allusion to Isa. 64:1; Matt. 3:16 and Lk. 3:21 use anoigō, open; → 487).

(b) In each of the Synoptic Gospels the story about the failure of Jesus' disciples to fast is followed by a parable about patching clothing (Matt. 9:16; Mk. 2:21; Lk. 5:36). No one ever sews a piece of newly woven, unshrunk cloth into an old garment because the added patch would tear away (schizō in Lk.) some of the garment and make a worse tear (schisma in Matt. and Mk.). Jesus is stressing the incompatibility of mixing his new era with the old era of Jud.

(c) Jesus' death was marked by the tearing of the inner curtain of the temple "in two from top to bottom" (Mk. 15:38; cf. Matt. 27:51; Lk. 23:45), the curtain that separated the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place (Exod. 26:31–35; 40:21). This symbolized the opening up of direct access into God's presence that Christ's sacrifice secured (Heb. 6:19–20; 9:8; 10:19–20). Matt. 27:51 mentions an earthquake that "split" the rocks (cf. Isa. 48:21).

(d) In the decision of the soldiers "not [to] tear" Jesus' tunic but to cast lots for it, Jn. sees a fulfillment of Scripture (Jn. 19:24, citing Ps. 22:18). A few days later, in the miraculous catch of 153 fish, Jn. writes that "the net was not torn" (Jn. 21:11). On three occasions Jn. notes that the Jews "were divided" (schisma) regarding Jesus; the points at issue were Jesus' identity (7:43), his miraculous cure of the man born blind (9:16), and his teaching about the good shepherd (10:19).

2. Paul's preaching is twice said to have prompted a division of opinion: once with the people of Iconium (Acts 14:4), and once with the Sanhedrin (23:7). In the Corinthian church there was not only squabbling (1 Cor. 1:11) but also a tendency to form "divisions" (1:10; 11:18), probably on the basis of sociological groupings or personal preferences for one church leader over another (see 1:12; 3:4; 11:17–22, 33–34). Such divisions, Paul insists, constitute a denial of their allegiance to one Lord (1:10, 13) and their membership of one body (12:12–26), where no division should occur (12:25).

See also chōrizō, divide, separate (6004).

σῴζω (sōzō), save, keep from harm, preserve, rescue (5392); σωτηρία (sōtēria), salvation, deliverance, preservation (5401); διασῴζω (diasōzō), bring safely through, save, rescue (1407).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. both sōzō and sōtēria basically denote rescue and deliverance in the sense of averting some danger threatening life. This can be deliverance from war or from danger in the sea, but it can also be deliverance from an illness. Where no immediate danger is mentioned, the words can mean to keep or preserve, even a safe return home. In religious contexts the gods save humans from various perils of life. They are regarded as saviors and protectors.

(b) For Gnostics knowledge given by divine revelation frees the soul from the power of death. In the mystery religions deliverance comes through the initiate's sharing in the experience of the dying and rising god through the actions of the mystery cult. The initiate participates in the divine being and thus attains a life that extends beyond death.

(c) In the philosophical sphere, sōzō and sōtēria can denote the divine preservation of all things. Plato expressed belief in such an ordering. In the Hel. period, when belief in fate replaced that of a divine harmony, the gods were seen as having power to save and keep people from an inscrutable destiny. Marcus Aurelius, the Stoic philosopher-emperor of the 2d cent. A.D., took comfort from the thought of a higher divine ordering and preservation (sōtēria) of life.

2. In the LXX sōzō translates at least 15 Heb. vbs., the most important of which are yāšaʿ (hiphil), to deliver and save; and mālaṭ (niphal), to slip away, escape, or (piel) to deliver, save. sōtēria stands for six different Heb. formations, most related to yāšaʿ.

(a) Deliverance may come about through humans (e.g., judges and kings, Jdg. 8:22; 13:5; 2 Sam. 3:18; 14:4; 2 Ki. 6:26), though this does not necessarily exclude Yahweh's ultimate agency. In some cases deliverance may lack theological significance (e.g., 1 Sam. 23:5). It may be the relief of a besieged city (11:3) or help in battle (Jdg. 12:2–3). The king was also a deliverer of the poor, needy, and oppressed within the nation (Ps. 72:4, 13).

The OT gives repeated reminders about human limitations. Often humans are powerless to save (Jer. 14:9). God did not want Gideon to think that his victory came as a result of human hands (Jdg. 7:2). Moreover, astrologers are powerless to save (Isa. 47:13), as are idols (45:20; 46:7; Jer. 2:27–28) and the nations (Hos. 14:3 = LXX 14:4). Rather, victory over one's enemies is by the power and name of Yahweh alone (Ps. 33:16–17; 44:3, 6–7). Thus Isa. 30:15 counsels: "In repentance and rest is your salvation, in quietness and trust is your strength." It is important to do Yahweh's work by Yahweh's appointed means.

(b) Regarding yāšaʿ, while Yahweh employs human agents, the pious Israelite is fully aware that deliverance comes ultimately from Yahweh himself. This vb. is esp. prominent in the Psalms, where people look both back to past and ahead to future deliverance from enemies and trouble (e.g., 12:1; 20:9; 28:9; 60:5). Deliverance or salvation is the work of God, but its precise content varies according to context and circumstances. In 74:12 sōtēria denotes the victory over the powers of chaos at the creation, but it can also denote victory over historical enemies (60:11; 144:10).

The theme of salvation and deliverance is by no means confined to Ps., although both there and elsewhere it has often cultic associations. At the climax of Moses' review of Yahweh's dealings with the tribes, Israel is seen as a unique nation, "saved by the LORD ... your shield and helper and your glorious sword" (Deut. 33:29; cf.

Exod. 15:2; 1 Sam. 11:13; 14:39). Conversely, Israel's failure to trust Yahweh's saving power provokes his wrath (cf. Num. 10:9; Deut. 20:4; Ps. 78:22; Isa. 17:10; Hab. 3:13). When Yahweh is absent or the people turn to other gods, they are not saved (Jdg. 10:12–14; 1 Sam. 4:3). According to the historical writings and the prophets, victory comes from Yahweh (Isa. 33:2; Jer. 14:8; 15:20; 17:14; Zeph. 3:17).

Solomon prays at the dedication of the Jerusalem temple that priests may be "clothed with salvation" (2 Chr. 6:41; cf. Ps. 132:9, 16) and thus be instruments of the divine blessing, which is pure and holy and at the same time brings deliverance to the people (cf. 2 Chr. 6:36–39). There may be here an underlying allusion to the function of the priests as the givers of oracles of salvation. They are to lead the people into the ways of righteousness, which bring deliverance from trouble (see also Isa. 61:10).

Another expression with cultic overtones is "the cup of salvation" (Ps. 116:13; cf. 16:5). This "cup" may be a drink offering of wine that was part of the thank offering (cf. Num. 28:7), though it may also stand in contrast to the cup of Yahweh's wrath (cf. Isa. 51:17; Jer. 25:15). Similarly in Exod. 14:13 Israel's role in order to receive "the deliverance the LORD will bring" is that of trusting response; the exodus provides a pattern.

Here the salvation in question is earthly and historical. Indeed, many OT references to salvation speak of a material deliverance accompanied by spiritual blessings. But certain passages in the prophets have an eschatological dimension. For example, in the last days Yahweh will bring full salvation for his people (e.g., Isa. 43:5–13; Jer. 31:7 = LXX 38:7; Zech. 8:7). Then Israel "will draw water from the wells of salvation" (Isa. 12:3); the whole world will share in this salvation (45:22; 49:6).

Finally, we should note that yāšaʿ appears in certain proper names that celebrate Yahweh as the deliverer: e.g., Isaiah (which means "salvation of Yah[weh]"). Most noteworthy is Joshua (Heb. yᵉhôšuaʿ, later yēšûaʿ, "Yah[weh] is salvation"), not only the name of Moses' successor (Exod. 17:9–14; Deut. 1:38; Jos. 1:1) but also the name from which Jesus derives (→ Iēsous, 2652).

(c) Regarding the vb. mālaṭ, the fathers of Israel testify that they trusted in God to save them (Ps. 22:5; cf. 8, 21). Job's comforter, Eliphaz the Temanite, argues that God will save the downcast (Job 22:30). The message of this book is that suffering is not necessarily the direct effect of sin and that God's ways are more marvelous than we can comprehend. In the end God does deliver Job and restores to him more than he had at first.

Many OT texts warn against turning for deliverance to that which, in worldly wisdom, we would naturally expect to save us from calamity: an army or the strength of a war horse (Ps. 33:16–17), a mighty foreign state (Isa. 20:6), wealth (Job 20:20), or one's own understanding (Prov. 28:26). In the coming deliverance prophesied by Isa. 49:24–25, captives will be delivered from those who held them captive. In the last days those who call on the name of the Lord will be saved (Joel 2:32). In Dan. 12:1 those whose names are written in the book of life will be saved.

3. In the Apocr. sōzō is seldom used of one person rescuing another (though see 1 Macc. 6:44; 9:21). It is more often found in the mid. and pass. of being saved through flight (e.g., 2:44; 9:9; 10:83; 11:48). Moreover, the author of 4 Macc. stresses that deliverance cannot be found by abandoning the law (9:4; 15:2, 8, 27). The vb. is always used in the context of dire threat to life. Most occurrences have to do with God's rescuing of the godly (Wis. 9:18; 16:7; 18:5; 1 Macc. 3:18; 4:9, 11). Conversely, the heathen gods cannot save (Ep. Jer. 49). The idea of an eternal salvation that comes from God, as contrasted with an earthly one that comes from humans, is present in 4 Macc. 15:3.

In 1 Enoch 106:16 the idea of being saved occurs in reference to the flood. But the idea occurs most frequently in statements to the effect that the ungodly have no salvation or hope of salvation (5:6; 98:10, 14; 99:1; 102:1). Elsewhere salvation is applied to the individual in both temporal deliverance (T. Reu. 3:9; T. Jos. 10:3) and eternal salvation (T. Benj. 4:1; T. Ash. 5:2). Over against the eternal salvation stands eternal punishment, in which the wicked are cast into the fire. The godly individual attains salvation by prayers and piety and by God's help. But T. Jud. 22:2; T. Ash. 7:3; T. Benj. 10:5 also speak of the eschatological salvation of Israel in which even the nations participate.

4. Josephus generally uses both the noun and the vb. in the sense of rescuing someone from death, a city from an enemy, or the land and the temple from destruction. Similarly, Philo uses them frequently in the sense of rescuing from danger or preservation in a temporal sense, though his main interest lies in the relationship between God and the godly person. God is the savior (sōtēr) who not only preserves order but also saves and helps in the struggles of the soul against the passions. Qumran lit. frequently refers to God's saving and helping in the history of Israel (1QM 4:13; 11:3; 14:4–5; 18:7; CD 5:19; 1QS 1:18–19). But God's saving also figures in the personal life of the godly. Regarded eschatologically, it is not the individual but God's people as a whole who are the objects of salvation.

NT 1. The vb. sōzō is found 106x in the NT, diasōzō 8x, and the noun sōtēria 45x. The meaning of deliverance from physical danger to life is comparatively rare. It occurs, e.g., in the account of Paul's shipwreck (Acts 27:20, 31, 34). Note that five occurrences of diasōzō come in accounts of how Paul escaped various dangers (23:24; 27:43, 44; 28:1, 4); the other three uses of this vb. refer to the sick who touched Jesus' garment being made well (Matt. 14:36), the plea of the centurion to heal his slave (Lk. 7:3), and the eight souls, including Noah, who were "saved through water" (1 Pet. 3:20). The last instance refers to physical danger but has soteriological overtones and is cited as a parallel to baptism, with its symbolism of cleansing and death and resurrection (3:21).

A number of passages use sōzō in the sense of saving from death, but there are often implications of divine deliverance (cf. Matt. 8:25; 14:30). These are esp. prominent in uses of this vb. in events surrounding Jesus' crucifixion. One criminal on the cross railed at Jesus to "save yourself and us," thinking of physical salvation (Lk. 23:39). But the other one sought salvation in terms of repentance and mercy and was promised by Jesus to be with him that day in paradise (23:43). Jesus himself asked whether he should pray, "Father, save me from this hour." No, he replied, "it was for this very reason I came to this hour" (Jn. 12:27; cf. also Heb. 5:7). Such passages show that saving in the NT transcends physical saving.

2. In the Synoptic accounts of Jesus' miracles of healing, sōzō is used 16x and diasōzō 2x (see above). The healing in these stories is always of the whole person. The faith of the person is of great importance for its achievement, making effective Christ's saving power: "Your faith has healed [sōzō] you" (Mk. 10:52; Lk. 8:48; 17:19; 18:42). Here sōzō has the sense of delivering from physical affliction. Jesus' acts of healing were continued by the apostles, carried out in the name of Jesus Christ (Acts 4:10); they presupposed faith as necessary for healing (14:9; cf. Jas. 5:15).

The particular theological and soteriological significance of the word group is largely latent in the Synoptic tradition. Zechariah's psalm at the birth of his son, John the Baptist, makes three references to the salvation that the child will herald, but he does so in terms of OT thought. He blesses God for raising up "a horn of salvation for us" (Lk. 1:69; cf. also 1:71, 77; cf. Mal. 4:5; Mk. 1:4). This salvation is construed as being saved from one's enemies. In the OT cleansing from sin was a precondition of physical salvation from one's enemies, but this song suggests that it is the precondition of light and peace (Lk. 1:78–79 cf. Isa. 9:2), now understood in terms of a personal relationship with God in Christ. Matt. 1:21 explains the name Jesus: "He will save his people from their sins."

Certain passages in the Synoptics imply eschatological salvation. In a saying following his challenge to take up one's cross, Jesus declares: "For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for me and for the gospel will save it" (Mk. 8:35; par. Matt. 16:25; Lk. 9:24). Jesus first envisions people standing in a human court where a denial of association with him brings release, whereas admitting such association brings martyrdom. But in the hereafter, the situation is reversed, and those who yield their lives in loyalty to Jesus safeguard it in a deeper sense. Following the saying about the camel and the eye of a needle, the disciples ask, "Who then can be saved?" (Mk. 10:26). Jesus replies: "With man this is impossible, but not with God; all things are possible with God" (10:27). Only the sovereign God can bring one into his eternal kingdom.

This salvation becomes a present fact through the actions of Jesus that bring forgiveness of sins. It is stressed in Lk.'s account of the change that came over Zacchaeus: "Jesus said to him, 'Today salvation has come to this house, because this man, too, is a son of Abraham. For the Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost'" (19:9–10).

3. In the proclamation of the early church, sōzō and sōtēria gain a central importance through their application to Christ as the basis, content, and goal of the gospel. They sum up the essential characteristic of his mission. Note esp. Acts 4:12, where Peter declares to the assembled religious leaders that "salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved." sōtēria here embraces both healing and salvation, for the occasion is Peter's defense after being arrested for healing the lame man in the temple in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth (3:6–8; cf. 4:9–10). Peter took the opportunity to preach Jesus as the servant foretold by the prophets, whom God raised up as Savior from sin (3:12–26). Acts 4:12 makes an absolute and universal claim for the Christian message of salvation.

The apostolic preaching, addressed first to the Jews (Acts 13:26) and then to the Gentiles (16:17), excludes every other way of salvation (13:38; 15:10–11), for salvation can be gained only by faith in Christ (16:31). The salvation given to those who believe consists in the forgiveness of sins (10:43; cf. 26:18) and a new relationship with God.

In Acts, statements about salvation frequently focus on the immediate present. The offer of salvation is linked with the demand, "Save yourselves from this corrupt generation" (2:40). But 2:21, alluding to Joel 2:32, refers to future salvation: "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved." The Joel prophecy refers to the end time, and its use here implies that the end time has now arrived. Note that "the name" for Joel was that of Yahweh, whereas in Acts it is applied to Jesus. In him God is personally present in a saving way.

4. Paul frequently uses sōzō and sōtēria exclusively for the saving activity of God. The message of saving grace comes to us through the gospel message. It brings salvation (Eph. 1:13). "It is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes" (Rom. 1:16; cf. 1 Cor. 1:21). The word of the cross is God's power for those who are being saved (1:18). We have obtained deliverance (15:2); we have been saved by the grace of God through faith (Eph. 2:8).

Eph. 1:13 presents a comprehensive picture of the process of salvation: The believers addressed here heard the gospel before their deliverance; they came to faith and were sealed with the Holy Spirit. Paul's statements about the goal of his missionary activity correspond to this. He was intent on bringing the good news of salvation to as many Jews and Gentiles as possible through the preaching of the gospel (Rom. 1:15; 11:14; 1 Cor. 9:22; 10:33; 1 Thess. 2:16). Those who have been saved through faith are contrasted with those who are perishing (1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Cor. 2:15). The apostle testifies that salvation is a present reality through the divine means of grace offered to people, and he adds to his quotation of Isa. 49:8 the words, "Now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2).

From Rom. 8:24 we see how strongly Paul was conscious of the inner relation between present and future salvation. The fact that we have already been saved makes the expectation of final eschatological salvation the greater reality, when the final verdict is passed (1 Cor. 3:15; 5:5; cf. 2 Cor. 5:10). This future salvation, which is "nearer now than when we first believed" (Rom. 13:11), is the goal toward which Christians press. All present discipline and punishment have as their purpose that we should not forfeit this salvation (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24–27). Accordingly, in Phil. 2:12 those who have been saved by God's grace are exhorted to work out their future salvation by a sanctified life in fear and trembling.

According to God's plan of salvation, all Israel will share in the future salvation after the fullness of the Gentiles has come into the church of God (Rom. 11:25–26). In this final salvation (1 Thess. 5:8–9; 2 Thess. 2:13) we are concerned first with deliverance from the coming wrath of God (Rom. 5:9; 1 Cor. 3:15; 1 Thess. 1:10) and then with the granting of the divine glory. Then Christians will be fully conformed to the image of God's Son and so God's activity will reach its conclusion (Rom. 8:29; 2 Thess. 2:13–14).

5. In the Pastoral Letters there is a whole series of statements about salvation that shows a comprehensive understanding of it: past, present, and future. (a) God desires the salvation of everyone (1 Tim. 2:4). The task of Jesus was to save sinners; that is why he came into the world (1:15; cf. 2 Tim. 1:9). Paul himself had experienced the saving power of grace, even though he felt he was the chief of sinners.

(b) Regarding the present experience of salvation, God calls us with a holy calling (2 Tim. 1:9). We are saved not because of deeds we have done, but in virtue of his own mercy (Tit. 3:5). Here salvation is linked with baptism and renewal of life through the Holy Spirit (see further palingenesia, 4098). According to 2 Tim. 3:14–15, knowledge of the Scriptures can bring salvation through faith in Jesus Christ (cf. Jn. 5:39; 2 Cor. 3:14; Heb. 4:2).

(c) In 2 Tim. 4:18 Paul speaks of the coming salvation; he is confident that the Lord will rescue him into his kingdom. In 2:10 Paul affirms that his sufferings are a necessary service for the elect, so "that they too may obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory." In 1 Tim. 4:16 the future perfection of salvation is promised both to Timothy and his hearers, provided he shows discipline and faithfulness in teaching and life. In 2:15, Paul points out that women will be saved through faith, love, and holiness without abandoning their role as mothers (the meaning of being "saved through childbearing" is not easy to ascertain and is probably lost to us).

6. In 1 Pet. the apostle uses sōtēria, along with a number of other expressions, to express final salvation. Christians are guarded by God's power through faith for this salvation, which is already there but will be revealed only in the last time (1 Pet. 1:5). Christians "grow up in [their] salvation" through the spiritual food they receive through preaching and teaching (2:2), so that finally they reach "the goal of [their] faith, the salvation of [their] souls" (1:9). Already the OT prophets pondered on and prophesied about it (1:10).

In 1 Pet. the vb. sōzō is found only in 4:18 (quoting Prov. 11:31) and 3:21. In the latter passage baptism expresses the saving power of God; it saves now because of the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the destruction to which humans become subject because of their sins. In this sense baptism is an antitype of God saving Noah and his family "through water" (3:20). It is noteworthy that although 1 Pet. repeatedly mentions present salvation, the apostle seldom uses this word group; instead, he employs such terms as "you were redeemed" (1:18) and "he [God] has given us new birth" (1:3).

In 2 Pet. 3:15 the readers are exhorted to take God's forbearance, the main reason for the delay in the Parousia, as motivation to be concerned with their final salvation, which is sure only if they do not give up their efforts for sanctification. Eschatology and ethics are, as with Paul, closely linked.

7. In Heb. Christ is the "author" and the "source" of our salvation (2:10; 5:9). At his first coming Jesus laid the foundation for the future saving activity of God by his atoning sacrifice. As the one who lives forever, he "is able to save completely those who come to God through him" (7:25). At his second coming Christ will appear as the one who "brings salvation to those who are waiting for him" (9:28). In all aspects salvation is the goal of God's activity with us. This salvation is perfect and eternally valid (5:9). The saving activity of God in Christ began already with Christ's proclamation (1:1–2). From him it came to the hearers of his word, who passed it on, while it was confirmed by God by signs, wonders, various miracles, and by gifts of the Holy Spirit (2:3–4). We should therefore not ignore it (2:3).

8. Jas. uses sōzō to mean deliverance in the final judgment, except in 5:15, where it means to heal. The same is true of Jude, where both the noun (v. 3) and the vb. (v. 23) are found. In v. 5 the rescue of Israel from Egypt is the subject.

9. The word group is little represented in the Johannine writings, which speak more of "eternal life." sōtēria is found only once in the Gospel in the remark to the Samaritan woman that "salvation is from the Jews" (4:22). sōzō in the sense of salvation occurs 4x. In 3:17 and 12:47 Jesus says that he has come not to judge but to save the world; in 5:34 the word is applied to the Jews, in 10:9 to believers. The Son of God is the true and only mediator of salvation. (In 11:12 and 12:27 sōzō has the general meaning of being delivered from physical and emotional need.)

In Rev. only the noun is found (3x), in liturgical passages of worship. In 7:10 the great multitude attributes salvation to God and the Lamb (cf. 12:10; 19:1). These songs of triumph and victory proclaim that now, after the conquest of all enemies of God, salvation, glory, and power belong to God alone.

σῶμα (sōma), body (5393); σωματικός (sōmatikos), bodily (5394); σωματικῶς (sōmatikōs), in a bodily form (5395).

CL 1. In cl. Gk. sōma originally meant the corpse of a human or the carcass of an animal. In the 5th cent. B.C., it began to be used in the sense of torso, the whole body, and by extension the whole person. As the idea developed in Gk. philosophy of the soul alongside the body, sōma came to mean that which is mortal as distinct from the immortal soul. In Plato, the body is the abode of the preexistent soul; death frees the soul from the body. The picture of the body was also extended to the cosmos, which is ruled and directed by the divine soul. Aristotle held that the body is primarily that by which the soul becomes something particular. The bond between body and soul is thus indissoluble. He also used sōma in the sense of an organism to explain the character of the state.

The Stoics continued to maintain the traditional dichotomy of body and soul. The soul is the animating principle, whose seat can be the head just as much as the heart. The soul permeates the entire body and conveys its sense impressions. However, the basic idea of wholeness in sōma remained decisive. The Stoic philosopher Marcus Aurelius spoke of a human as sōma, pneuma (spirit, soul), and nous (mind, reason). The further development of these thoughts together with neo-Platonic ideas led to a devaluation of the body as opposed to the soul.

2. The OT has no dualism corresponding to the Gk. idea of body and soul. In the LXX sōma denotes the entire range of ideas conveyed by the Heb. bāśār, flesh, signifying a human in his or her individual corporeality. This is distinct from sarx, flesh, which denotes humanity in its creatureliness. sōma can mean corpse (1 Sam. 31:10, 12) and even back (1 Ki. 14:9). But its basic meaning is the body in the sense of the whole person (cf. Lev. 15:11, 16, 19; 16:4; 19:28; etc.). It has virtually the sense of person, though this is not to be confused with personality. Even angels have sōmata (Ezek. 1:11, 23; Dan. 10:6 Theod.).

3. Depreciation of the body as the seat of passion first occurs in Sir. 23:16–18; 47:19. The books of Macc. reflect Hel. influence in the distinction drawn between body and soul (cf. also Wis. 9:15). A good soul and an undefiled body belong together (8:20). But the dominant thought is that of the soul as the particular gift of God. Hence, the body can be given up in persecution.

4. In later Jewish lit., the significance of death stands out in light of the connection between body and soul, for death separates body and soul. The body remains on earth and the soul is taken up to heaven (2 Esd. 60). Rab. lit. confirms the double aspect of the concept of body common in the NT period: In one sense the body is the person; in another, a distinction is drawn between body and soul, spirit, or mind.

5. The notion of the body played a central role in Gnosticism (→ ginōskō, 1182). One's inner self must be set free from the material world of the flesh and the human body; this comes about through redemption. This idea of redemption was also applied to the cosmos. In general, however, Gnosticism postdates NT Christianity.

NT 1. (a) sōma in the NT reflects the wide range of meaning that it had in Gk. generally as well as in OT thought. It means corpse (e.g., Matt. 27:52; Lk. 17:37) and is used of the body of Jesus (Matt. 27:58; Mk. 15:43; Lk. 23:52, 55; Jn. 19:31). The thought that a dead body can be raised to life (Matt. 27:52) stands behind the expression "temple ... [of] his body" (Jn. 2:21). This is the only instance in the Johannine writings where sōma does not mean dead body or slave (cf. Rev. 18:13). Paul sheds new light on the body of Christ in Col. 2:9, for he stresses that all the fullness of the Deity lived in Christ "in bodily form" (sōmatikōs).

(b) The physical aspect of the body is uppermost in Mk. 5:29 and Jas. 2:16. Matt. 6:22 speaks of the eye as the lamp of the body (cf. 5:29), while 6:25 speaks of the body as being more than clothing. These passages in Matt. point beyond the body as a mere physical organism to the sōma as signifying the self.

(c) Heb. 10:10 contrasts "the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" with the temple sacrifices. sōma here and in 1 Pet. 2:24 denotes not only Jesus' physical body but the total giving of himself in death. It thus contrasts with the merely physical bodies of animals in the sacrificial system.

2. (a) In Paul sōma has a specialized meaning in the sense of person. Human existence (even in the sphere of the pneuma, spirit) is a bodily, somatic existence. Passages such as Rom. 6:12 and 12:1 clearly show that the sōma is not merely an outer form but the whole person.

In a series of Pauline passages sōma denotes the general physical body (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:3; 7:34). In only one passage (1 Thess. 5:23) does Paul speak of humankind in a tripartite way: "May your whole spirit [pneuma], soul [psychē] and body [sōma] be kept blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Rom. 12:4–5 and 1 Cor. 12:12–26 take up the issue of the relation of the body to its members (→ melos, 3517). The "marks of Jesus" that Paul bears in his body are perhaps the scars from wounds received in service to Jesus (Gal. 6:17; cf. 2 Cor. 11:24–27). In 1 Cor. 9:27 Paul speaks of disciplining his body, and in 13:3 he may have had in mind the most painful form of self-immolation (burning), which would be worthless without love. To Timothy Paul emphasizes that bodily or "physical" (sōmatikos) training has only limited value (1 Tim. 4:8).

The body is mentioned in connection with sexual relations in Rom. 4:19 and 1 Cor. 7:4. But the warnings against unchastity and immorality (Rom. 1:24; 1 Cor. 6:13–20) show a wider significance here than the merely physical. Bodily acts affect not only the individual act of sin but the whole person to one's innermost being. This is underlined by Paul's questions: "Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ himself? .... Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit, who is in you, whom you have received from God? .... Therefore honor God with your body" (1 Cor. 6:15, 19–20).

(b) The body is not something external to a human being that is, as it were, added to one's essential self or soul. sōma denotes the whole person. The sōma can be the object of an action or the subject of an action. Regarding the former, when Paul speaks of treating his "body" roughly, he means treating himself roughly. Similarly, 1 Cor. 13:3 shows how one can immolate one's self, not just one's body. Moreover, we can sacrifice ourselves in the service of God by presenting our bodies "as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God" (Rom. 12:1).

The sōma can also be the subject of an action: "If by the Spirit you put to death the misdeeds of the body, you will live" (Rom. 8:13). These misdeeds (i.e., living "according to the sinful nature," 8:12–13) suggest action by one's body. Body here is equivalent to the self, the human "I" in its sinfulness. Similarly, Christians should not be led by the desires of their bodies (6:12), which can be dominated by the power of sin. The desires of the body and the desires of the sinful nature are synonymous (Gal. 5:16–21, 24).

Paul's understanding of sōma as "I," as a "person," as distinct from the sarx (flesh) is illustrated by Rom. 7:14–25. "I am unspiritual [sarkinos], sold as a slave to sin" (7:14). The body is open to two possibilities, desire and obedience. When Paul cries: "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" (7:24), he is thinking of the shattered character of human existence as it finds expression in the body. He sees in his existence the powers of sin and the Spirit, which can mean either destruction or life. One's bodily existence does not in itself denote something either good or bad. Rather, the body is the concrete sphere of existence in which one's relationship with God is realized.

(c) In this light, it is understandable why Paul in 1 Cor. 15 stresses the resurrection of the body over against his Corinthian opponents. His understanding of resurrection is influenced by Jewish anthropology. Human life is thinkable only in a body. Thus, any division of the person into soul and body along the lines of Gk. anthropology is precluded (cf. also 2 Cor. 5:1–10).

In this discourse Paul contrasts an earthly or "natural body" and a "spiritual body" (1 Cor. 15:44). The former represents his earthly existence and the latter his post-resurrection life. These images are presented in spatio-temporal terms, although a spiritual body cannot be conceived in terms of matter. Paul's aim here is to express a person's essential being, which is characterized by existence in a body. The body in the sense of the "I," the person, will survive death through the creative act of God (15:38, 42, 44).

The continuity between the earthly body and the heavenly body does not rest on a transformation. If that were the case, Paul would have stressed the temporal aspect of his concept of the "spiritual body" (15:44). The thought would then be of a body consisting of a substance known as pneuma. But Paul is not concerned with the description of such a spiritual substance. His concern is with the fact that God determines this sōma through the Spirit as a power of God (cf. 15:50). Thus, after the resurrection this sōma is no longer subject to sin and death. It is no longer a divided self. One's personhood is, therefore, not something at one's disposal. It is not founded on oneself. It remains a gift.

(d) Over and above this, sōma has a specific meaning in Paul that no longer refers to an individual but to a group. He speaks of the sōma of Christ (Rom. 12:5; 1 Cor. 12:27; Eph. 4:12; etc.). Paul uses the picture of the body to express the essential character of the Christian church. In 1 Cor. 12:12–30 his exposition takes up the Gk. thought of the organism, basing the necessity of the different functions of the members on the unity of the body. But the essential character is not based on the Gk. image. The members do not constitute the whole. Rather, it is the task of the members that highlights their corporate nature in their diverse functions.

The body constitutes the unity and in this sense can be described as the body of Christ. It is based on Christ himself. The description of the church as the body of Christ means that he constitutes the existence of the individual as a member of his body. The bestowal of the Spirit is connected with baptism (1 Cor. 12:13). The church has an eschatological character. It exists by the promise of God in Christ for the future.

The Lord's Supper is rooted in the concept of the body as a community (Matt. 26:26–29; Mk. 14:22–25; Lk. 22:17–20; cf. 1 Cor. 10:16–17; 11:23–26). Christ's death gives the Lord's Supper its meaning. That death is the decisive saving act "for you" (11:24) and is proclaimed by the Lord's Supper (11:26). In the center stand not the elements or substance of bread and wine but the action of the fellowship as the body of Christ. To be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord (11:27) signifies an act of one believer against another. The giving of Christ's body in death is the authentic sign of his church, which understands itself as the body of Christ.

(e) Col. and Eph. develop a picture of the body of Christ that is distinct from that in the other Pauline letters. In Col. 1:15–20, the cosmic dimension of Christ's saving act is particularly clear, for through his death Christ has reconciled all things to himself (cf. also Rom. 11:36; 1 Cor. 15:24–28; Eph. 1:22–23 for the cosmic significance of Christ). A redemption is offered here that holds good even in the face of the cosmic powers. Christ is the head of the world, and his body is the church, in which obedience to his lordship is proclaimed for realization in the world. Thus, the church and the world are not two great fixed entities set in permanent opposition. The church recognizes the real possibilities for the world under the lordship of Christ and the freedom to live in the world.

The concept of the body as the church of Christ is clear in Eph., where Christ is the head of that body (4:15–16). Believers grow up into him and become mature, building up the church in love. Those who are hesitant and misguided (called "infants" in 4:14) are carried about by every wind of doctrine. These people were perhaps gnostic-type individuals, who boasted of their own knowledge and not of their relationship with Christ. In addition, Paul here provides a definitive understanding of the church. By stressing Christ as the head, he is stressing both lordship and promise. The church is held and sustained by the power of Christ, and he protects it, through the truth recognized by those who are mature and the love practiced by them, from false teaching and schisms.

σωτήρ (sōtēr), savior, deliverer, preserver (5400); σωτήριον (sōtērion), salvation, deliverance (5402); σωτήριος (sōtērios), saving, delivering, bringing salvation (5403).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the noun sōtēr, formed from the vb. sōzō (save, → 5392), includes the connotations of sōzō and sōtēria. It is applied almost exclusively to the gods or humans. (a) The gods are saviors from the dangers of life and also protectors and preservers of humans. The title was accorded to numerous gods, but esp. to Zeus. Isis and Serapis were also frequently called saviors. In the Hel. period Asclepius was regarded as a savior of the sick.

(b) Humans could also be called saviors if they healed or saved others from trouble and danger. Plato called the ideal ruler who governed and preserved the state a sōtēr in the sense of a protector. The term could also be applied to philosophers. It was widely applied to statesmen and rulers, such as Philip of Macedon, who was hailed by the inhabitants of Thessaly as friend, benefactor, and savior.

In the Hel. ruler cult kyrios ("lord") became part of the official title of kings, and divine honors were accorded them. theos sōtēr ("god savior") was also regularly incorporated into the Ptolomaic and Seleucid royal titles. This development reached its strongest expression in the Roman imperial cult. The expression "savior of the inhabited world" was applied to Augustus Caesar. However, sōtēr was not incorporated into the official titles of the Roman rulers, and an emperor rarely allowed himself to be called sōtēr on coins. But in inscriptions an emperor could be called a sōtēr, designating him as a benefactor linked with a golden age of peace, order, and prosperity. Although the emperor was called a savior only in a this-worldly sense, he had been empowered by the gods or divine providence.

(c) The adj. sōtērios, saving, delivering, bringing safety to, is found in cl. Gk. applied both to humans (e.g., someone bringing safety to the state) and to the gods.

2. sōtēr occurs in the LXX 35x for nouns or participles related to the Heb. vb. yāšaʿ. (a) In Jdg. 3:9, 15 sōtēr ("deliverer") may be taken as a technical term for the Israelite judges (cf. 12:3). Note 2:16: "Then the LORD raised up judges, who saved [sōzō] them out of the hands of these raiders" (cf. also Neh. 9:27). Still, Jdg. 2:18 stresses that Yahweh was the ultimate source of the saving. Samuel took the desire for a king as a rejection of "your God, who saves you" (1 Sam. 10:19, LXX "who is your sōtēr").

3. sōtēr is applied above all to Yahweh. Isa. 45 contrasts the mysteries of Yahweh's working with the impotence of the idols. Yahweh has anointed the Persian king Cyrus to liberate Israel from captivity in Babylon (45:1). Yahweh promises the wealth of the nations to captive Israel. The prophet cries: "Truly you are a God who hides himself, O God and Savior of Israel" (45:15). Israel is saved by Yahweh "with an everlasting salvation" (45:17). Turning to those who carry idols, Yahweh insists that "there is no God apart from me, a righteous God and a Savior." Yahweh is the only God who can save anywhere to the "ends of the earth" (45:21–22; see also such passages as Deut. 32:15; 1 Chr. 16:35; Ps. 24:5; Mic. 7:7; Hab. 3:18; often the LXX speaks of "God my Savior" whereas the Heb. speaks of "the God of my salvation").

The coming Messiah is not called sōtēr, even though the promised king in Zech. 9:9 is described by the part. sōzōn ("saving one") in the LXX. In Isa. 49:6 the servant of Yahweh's task is to bring Yahweh's "salvation to the ends of the earth."

In the Apocr. the title sōtēr is limited to God (Wis. 16:17; Sir. 51:1; Bar. 4:22; 1 Macc. 4:30; 3 Macc. 6:29, 32; 7:16). Josephus uses it only for human saviors; Philo saw God as the Savior of his people, the sustainer of the race and the cosmos, and the Savior of the soul in its struggle with the passions. Apart from one isolated instance in rab. writings, the Messiah is not called a Savior. Elsewhere, God and Messiah are described by the Heb. word gō'ēl, redeemer (→ lytron, 3389).

NT sōtēr occurs 24x in the NT; 16x it refers to Christ, the remaining 8x are applied to God. Since it is never used of ordinary people, it occurs much less often than either sōzō or sōtēria.

1. (a) The angel who announced the birth of Jesus to the shepherds told them not to be afraid, for "today in the town of David a Savior has been born to you; he is Christ the Lord" (Lk. 2:11). The use of sōtēr here takes up the descriptions given to the national leaders and to God in the OT and Jud. In Lk. the word occurs elsewhere only in Mary's Magnificat, where it is applied to God (1:47; cf. Hab. 3:18). Some think that the use of sōtēr in Lk. may reflect the Christian response to the emperor cult (cf. above): Jesus is the true bringer of peace (note the reference to Augustus in 2:1).

(b) In the proclamation of the early church to the Jews, Jesus is presented as the Savior of Israel: "God exalted him to his own right hand as Prince and Savior that he might give repentance and forgiveness of sins to Israel" (Acts 5:31; cf. 13:23). This preaching clearly draws a distinction between Jesus and God. At the same time, it draws attention to the uniqueness of Jesus as the divinely appointed and empowered one whom God chose as the instrument of salvation. It was precisely this that was the point of conflict between the church and the Jews.

(c) In Jn. it is left to the Samaritans to conclude: "We no longer believe just because of what you [the Samaritan woman] said; now we have heard for ourselves, and we know that this man really is the Savior of the world" (Jn. 4:42). Earlier Jesus had drawn attention to the futility of Samaritan worship and that salvation came from within Jud. (4:22). Paradoxically, however, 4:42 brings out salvation's universal aspect. There is also the further paradox implied by Jn. that the Samaritans have seen this and responded to it in the person of Jesus, whereas the Jews have not.

2. (a) In Paul's letters to churches sōtēr is found only twice. Phil. 3:20 reminds its readers of their expectation in the midst of the trials that "we eagerly await a Savior

... the Lord Jesus Christ," who will return, change us, and take us to himself. Eph. 5:21–33 exhorts husbands and wives to mutual love and respect within marriage, based on the relationship between Christ and his church: "For the husband is the head of the wife as Christ is the head of the church, his body, of which he is the Savior" (5:23). Christ is the Savior because he gave himself up to death for his church and cleansed her by the washing of water and the word, in order to present her for himself pure and glorious (5:25–27).

(b) In the Pastoral Letters sōtēr occurs more frequently than in any other NT writings: 6x for God and 4x for Christ. This title for God links with the usage of the LXX (e.g., Ps. 25:5; 27:9; Hab. 3:18; Sir. 51:1). (i) The statements in the Pastorals about God as Savior show that God's offer of salvation is universal. The true and living God is "the Savior" of all people (1 Tim. 4:10), and he has instituted preaching so that the message of salvation might become known to all and that all might believe (Tit. 1:3). We must live lives that "will make the teaching about God our Savior attractive" (2:10). In the next verse, Paul declares that the grace of God is revealed above all in its power, bringing "salvation [that] has appeared to all men." In 1 Tim. 1:1, Paul also calls God "our Savior."

(ii) Passages that speak of Christ as our Savior furnish an all-embracing picture of God's activity for our salvation. To the world God has manifested his purpose to save the human race, planned "before the beginning of time" but now "revealed through the appearing of our Savior, Christ Jesus," who has destroyed death and brought life and immortality to light (2 Tim. 1:10). In this Savior have appeared God's goodness and kindness (Tit. 3:4), qualities praised in Hel. rulers but here transferred to God.

Through God's free purpose, decided before eternal ages, and through his grace revealed in Christ, believers are already saved. Through his cleansing and regeneration, not through our own works, God has saved us according to his mercy. The pouring out of the Holy Spirit has come richly "through Jesus Christ our Savior" (Tit. 3:5–6). As those justified by grace, believers await the fulfillment of their hope (3:7), which they will receive through "the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ" (2:13). This translation, while not accepted by all scholars, seems most in line with the patterns of the use of the Gk. article, even though elsewhere Paul distinguishes between God and Christ. Note esp. that epiphaneia, appearing (→ 2211), is nowhere else in the NT used of God, only of Jesus.

The expression "Jesus Christ our Savior" cannot be derived directly from the OT, for there the Messiah is never called Savior. Nor did Jesus ever call himself sōtēr. The designation of Jesus as sōtēr is found mainly in the Hel. environment, perhaps partly in answer to the imperial cult. This does not explain everything, however, since the references to Jesus as one who saves his people from their sins (Matt. 1:21) occur in writings linked with the Jewish Christian church, and it is only a short jump from there to actually calling Jesus "Savior." The title Savior was necessary to help the Gks. understand what the title Messiah implied for the Jews.

3. Peter uses sōtēr in 2 Pet., linking it with the title kyrios (Lord; → 3261). This letter is addressed "to those who through the righteousness of our God and Savior Jesus Christ have received a faith as precious as ours" (1:1). The apostle goes on to exhort his readers to confirm their calling and election, so that "you will receive a rich welcome into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (1:11). Later in the letter he warns believers against being enslaved to the passions after "they have escaped the corruption of the world by knowing our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2:20). He also seeks to stimulate them to wholesome thinking in order "to recall ... the command given by our Lord and Savior through [the] apostles" (3:2).

The letter of 2 Pet. closes with a command that takes up again the theme of knowledge (cf. 1:2–3, 5–6, 8): "But grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. To him be glory both now and forever! Amen" (3:18; cf. a similar closing in Jude 25).

4. sōtērios is used as an adj. only in Tit. 2:11: "For the grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men." Elsewhere it is used in the neut. (sōtērion) as a noun, a synonym for sōtēria (salvation; → sōzō, 5392) in Lk. 2:30; 3:6; Acts 28:28; Eph. 6:17.

σωφροσύνη (sōphrosynē), prudence, self-control (5408); σωφρονέω (sōphroneō), be of sound mind, be reasonable, prudent (5404); σωφρονισμός (sōphronismos), self-discipline (5406); σωφρόνως (sōphronōs), reasonably, with restraint, soberly (5407); σώφρων (sōphrōn); prudent, sensible, self-controlled (5409).

CL & OT 1. Although the sōphrosynē word group can be found earlier in cl. Gk., it became esp. important in philosophical circles. The word was consolidated in Plato into the doctrine of the four cardinal virtues: wisdom (sophia), courage (andreia), prudence (sōphrosynē), and justice (dikaiosynē). In the relationship of the three classes of the state to one another, the lower ones particularly must exercise self-control. Among the Stoics and in popular philosophy prudence (sōphrosynē) also occurs in the scale of the cardinal virtues and was expanded into a series of subordinate virtues (e.g., discipline, obedience, decency, propriety, modesty, temperance, self-control). Some philosophers related sōphrosynē specifically to control of the sexual instincts and to chastity.

2.There is no Heb. equivalent for sōphrosyne. The noun is found chiefly in 4 Macc. In Wis. 8:7 sōphrosynē is one of the four cardinal virtues (the same four as in Plato), which those who love righteousness and wisdom practice. According to Philo, a person ought to suppress one's desires by means of prudence.

NT In the NT sōphrosynē, prudence, self-control, is found only in Acts 26:25 and 1 Tim. 2:9, 15; sōphronismos, self-discipline, occurs only in 2 Tim. 1:7. sōphroneō, sōphronōs, and sōphrōn occur in Mk. 5:15; Lk. 8:35; Rom. 12:3; 2 Cor. 5:13; 1 Pet. 4:7; and the Pastoral Letters (1 Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:8; 2:2, 5, 6, 12). The NT does not contain a formal scheme of the four cardinal virtues, even though the paraenetic sections make use of the language and forms of the Hel. environment. The Pastoral Letters in particular stand within the Hel. tradition and thus adopt the admonition to be prudent in the correspondingly general sense of moral formulas (1 Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:8; 2:2).

sōphrōn in Tit. 2:5, where the women are addressed directly, has the meaning of chaste, pure (cf. 1 Tim. 2:9). Being prudent is here cited as a Christian virtue.

Thoughtful and prudent action is to be grounded in faith (Rom. 12:3). Paul thus appeals for an attitude that perceives both its own limitations and other people in their humanity, and that determines its action towards others accordingly. Prudence is a necessary element of a love that maintains the tension between commitment and reflective distance.

ταλαιπωρέω (talaipōreō), experience distress, endure hard labor (5415); ταλαιπωρία (talaipōria), strenuous work, suffering, hardship (5416); ταλαίπωρος (talaipōros), wretched, distressed (5417).

CL & OT 1. Cl. authors used talaipōreō for those who endured hard work or suffered distress, perhaps to the point of being worn out physically or emotionally. talaipōria varied from the concept of regular exercise or normal usage to that of hard work, hardship, or suffering, the latter including pain caused by physical diseases. talaipōros describes people and circumstances that are wretched and miserable.

2. In the LXX talaipōreō is found mainly in prophetic lit. (e.g., Isa. 33:1; Jer. 4:13, 20; 10:20), usually in its ordinary physical sense, meaning to assail, distress, deal violently with. talaipōria is common in the LXX (e.g., Job 5:21; Hos. 9:6; Mic. 2:4) and describes troubles and difficulties (lit. or fig.) that are of a serious nature. talaipōros occurs mostly in the Apocr. to describe the persecutions of the Maccabean period (e.g., 2 Macc. 4:47).

NT talaipōreō occurs in the NT only in Jas. 4:9, a call to penitence and humility that exhorts readers to "grieve." talaipōria occurs only 2x in the NT: in Rom. 3:16, where Isa. 59:7 is quoted, and in Jas. 5:1, where it means "misery." talaipōros is also found only 2x (Rom. 7:24; Rev. 3:17), both describing a miserable, wretched condition of humanity.

ταπεινός (tapeinos), lowly, humble (5424); ταπεινόω (tapeinoō), make low, humble (5427); ταπείνωσις (tapeinōsis), abasement, humiliation (5428); ταπεινόφρων (tapeinophrōn), humble-minded (5426); ταπεινοφροσύνη (tapeinophrosynē), lowliness of mind, humility (5425).

CL & OT 1. (a) tapeinos was originally used with the sense of low-lying, although fig. uses were soon developed: (i) low socially, poor, powerless, unimportant; (ii) despondent, downcast; (iii) in ethical teaching, one should avoid the two extremes of arrogance and pride (hybris), and of groveling and servile behavior. (iv) Occasionally the word is used with a positive connotation in individual, social, ethical, and religious contexts; there it means unassuming, obedient, conforming one's behavior to the righteous laws of the gods.

(b) The vb. tapeinoō represents the various shades of meaning of the adj.: to level, humble (socially, politically, economically), make small, discourage, be obedient, etc. The reflexive form with heauton and the mid., meaning humble or demean oneself, is used normally in a derogatory sense. In some occasions, however, it could mean humbling oneself before the gods by covering one's head during sacrifice and prayer.

(c) tapeinōsis suggests the process of humiliation or being made low. tapeinophrōn and tapeinophrosynē generally have a depreciatory connotation: e.g., to think poorly, ill; to be ill-disposed, fainthearted, or weakly; to have a servile mind.

2. In the Gk. world, with its anthropocentric view of humanity, lowliness was looked on as shameful, something to be avoided and overcome by act and thought. But in the OT and NT, with its theocentric view of humans, the words have a positive thrust, since they describe those events that bring a person into a right relationship with God and one's fellow human beings.

3. tapeinos and its cognates are found approximately 270x in the LXX. It uses the full range of meaning of this word group and adds a few variants of its own; e.g., to humble a woman in a sexual sense (Deut. 21:14; 2 Sam. 13:12; Ezek. 22:10–11), to rape (e.g., Gen. 34:2), to fast (e.g., Lev. 16:29; Isa. 58:3). But above all the words occur in expressions of belief in what Yahweh has done, in that he brings down the proud and arrogant and rescues the humiliated. This recognition is expressed in a number of ways. (a) The prophets express it in warnings of judgment (e.g., Isa. 2:9, 11, 17; 5:15; 10:33–34; 14:32; Zeph. 2:3) and in promises (Isa. 49:13; Zeph. 3:12).

(b) The historical books see it in events. This is shown in their theological attitudes and in their corresponding choice of language (e.g., in Hannah's prayer and song, 1 Sam. 1:11, 16; 2:7; in the promise given to David, 1 Chr. 17:10).

(c) Ps. and Lam. repeat it in prayers (e.g., Ps. 10:17–18; 25:18; 31:7). There is frequent parallelism with the poor. The relationship between Ps. 82:3 and 5–7 shows that the gods are incapable of giving justice to the lowly, so God himself must judge.

(d) Prov. speaks of humility as the fruit of experience and as a rule for life (e.g., Prov. 3:34; 11:1–2; 15:33 = LXX 16:1; 16:19; 18:12).

4. The members of the Qumran sect called themselves the poor, and in the Community Rule virtuous humility is mentioned along with lovingkindness, truth, right thinking, faithfulness, unity, and patience as the great virtue of the community (1QS 2:24; 4:3; 5:3, 25). This attitude stands alongside a hatred for the ruling sons of darkness (9:22; 11:1–2). Humility is the proper attitude before God as humans submit to his chastisement (1QH 17:22).

5. For the rabbis, humility also had a high place in the scale of virtues that people should attain, a humble spirit being the characteristic sign of the Jew. Jesus' teaching indicates a wide discrepancy between this high ideal and actual Pharisaic practice (Matt. 23:1–7; Lk. 18:9–14). They were humble among themselves but considered ignorance of the law to be a result of either sin or God's disfavor.

NT 1. Words of this group are found 34x in the NT. In Matt. and Lk. the words are closely linked with the proclamation of the eschatological breaking-in of the kingly rule of God. This is the new element in the frequent use of OT texts. Lk. introduces the theme in the opening chs. of his Gospel. The mother of Jesus praises the grandeur of God in OT phrases: "For he has been mindful of the humble state of his servant" (Lk. 1:48; cf. 1 Sam. 1:11; Ps. 113:5–9); "He has . . . lifted up the humble" (Lk. 1:52; cf. 1 Sam. 2:7; Job 5:11; Ps. 75:7). The work of John the Baptist is then presented as preparing for the coming of God, in accordance with the prophecy of Isa. 40:3–5, "every mountain and hill [shall be] made low" (Lk. 3:5).

Jesus himself went the way of humility (Matt. 11:29). He could, therefore, warn against desire for status (Lk. 14:11; cf. also Matt. 18:4; 1 Pet. 5:5) and promise that those who humble themselves will be exalted by God (Matt. 23:12; Lk. 18:14). In the same verses he threatens the proud with the last judgment.

2. The foundation of this promise and warning is found in Jesus' own way of life as expressed in his invitation in Matt. 11:28–30. He is "gentle [praus] and humble [tapeinos] in heart." The two thoughts stand in parallelism and show that Jesus was submissive before God, dependent on him, and devoted to him, and at the same time humble before human beings, whose servant and helper he came to be (Matt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45; Lk. 22:27). That is why he could call those who are weary and burdened to himself and offer them rest as they follow him.

Matt. 18:1–5 shows that Jesus' call to discipleship, with its teaching on humility, should not be confused with ethical attainment. The demand to humble oneself like the child that was placed among the disciples does not mean that one should make oneself lower than one actually is. Rather, one should know, like the child, how lowly one really is. Humility is to know how lowly we are before God. Such humility and lowliness bring joy and bliss, for they permit one to share in the royal rule of heaven.

3. (a) The central position of the Savior's invitation in Matt. corresponds to that of the hymn to Christ in Phil. 2:6–11. In Paul's description of Jesus' work from his self-emptying (→ kenos, 3031), through his self-humbling (2:8), and to his exaltation by God, all the main lines of the OT proclamation of God's sovereign control of history come into focus as they find their fulfillment. Here God stands by his word. At the same time the self-humiliation of Jesus Christ inaugurates the new life under his rule (cf. 2:10–11). The meaning of self-humiliation is doubly defined in Jesus Christ. On the one hand, Jesus became obedient unto death, even the uttermost shame of the cross. On the other hand, he had no other support than the incredible promise of the faithfulness of God (cf. Ps. 22; 25:18; 31:17; 119:50, 92, 150; esp. Isa. 53:7–12).

(b) Acts 8:35 expounds Isa. 53:7–8, referring to the humiliation (cf. tapeinōsis in Acts 8:33) and exaltation of Jesus Christ.

(c) Paul understood his own apostolic service to be one of following the Lord, who gave him strength through his own exaltation won through self-humiliation. Hence Paul knew "what it is to be in need" (tapeinoō), i.e., being hungry and suffering want and affliction (Phil. 4:12–13; cf. 2 Cor. 11:23–29; 12:7–10). This experience may also include the physical work that, his enemies insinuated, was a penance for some hidden sin, but which Paul defended on the grounds that it enabled him to proclaim the gospel without charge (11:7).

Lk. faithfully conveys Paul's understanding of his apostolic service in the statement, "I served the Lord with great humility and with tears" (Acts 20:19). Paul recognized God's action both in humbling him through his failures (2 Cor. 12:21), which were manifest in the continuing strife and immorality of the Corinthians (12:20–21), and in comforting those who were humbled by strife and inner fears (7:5–6; cf. Isa. 49:13). In the midst of the difficulties of his service, Paul was supported by the hope that the coming Lord would transform "our lowly bodies" (lit., "our body of humiliation," Phil. 3:21) and make it like his glorious body.

(d) In three passages in Paul's letters words from this group are used in their original derogatory sense—in each case ironically in a polemical context. In 2 Cor. 10:1 Paul quotes the taunt of his opponents that he was so "timid" (tapeinos) when he was with them but bold when far away. In Col. 2:18, 23 he warns against the opponents who take pleasure in " false humility" (tapeinophrosynē), worship of angels, and asceticism.

(e) Paul's exhortation to humility is also rooted in the effective reality of Christ. Rom. 12:16 warns against haughtiness and recommends either, "Be willing to associate with people of low position," or, "Be willing to do menial work" (see NIV note). Similarly Eph. 4:2 and Col. 3:12 enjoin being humble (both passages using tapeinophrosynē parallel to prautēs; → praus, 4558), which unites the church and holds it together.

4. The exhortations in Jas. and 1 Pet. do not add anything new to the OT and Paul's calls to humility. Jas. 1:9–10 speaks of the socially low, the poor, who can boast of their exaltation, while the rich, paradoxically, should boast of their low position (tapeinōsis), i.e., of their being subject to death. Jas. 4:6 and 1 Pet. 5:5 both quote Prov. 3:34, which promises God's favor to the humble, and both draw the conclusion: "Humble yourselves before the Lord, and he will lift you up" (Jas. 4:10; cf. 1 Pet. 5:6). In 1 Pet. 5:5 one also sees the metaphor of putting on clothing: "All of you, clothe yourselves with humility [tapeinophrosynē]" (cf. Jn. 13:4).

5. Gradually the concept of "humility" in the church changed from an eschatological expectation and a manner of life to a term describing an inclination to penance and fasting.

ταράσσω (tarassō), shake together, stir up, disturb, unsettle, thrown into disorder (5429); τάραχος (tarachos), commotion, confusion, disturbance (5431).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. tarassō means to shake something out of inertia and throw it into confusion, i.e., to disturb, upset, confound, agitate (from the stirring up of the sea or movement of the air to violent emotional agitation); hence it can mean to confuse, also to shake. There is a corresponding use of the pass.: to be disturbed, agitated, confused, even become alarmed. tarachos connotes agitation, confusion, tumult.

2. The LXX uses tarassō on the whole in the same way as cl. Gk., to render various Heb. equivalents (cf. Ezek. 32:2, 13, to trouble water; Ps. 46:6, of the nations in uproar; Isa. 8:12, to be dismayed, alarmed).

NT 1. In the NT tarassō occurs 17x and tarachos 2x. The meaning is essentially the same as in cl. Gk. (a) tarassō is used of the stirring of the water in the pool of Bethesda (Jn. 5:7). This water was perhaps disturbed from time to time by an intermittent spring, but popular belief supposed that at such times an angel endued the water with healing properties. The pool was more than 50 feet deep, with no shallow end, so a disabled person would have had to be carried and held all the time.

(b) tarassō is also used in a fig. sense to express the stirring up of spiritual or emotional excitement or confusion, e.g., as when the Jews stirred the emotions of the crowds in Acts 17:8, 13, or when false teachers brought the churches into confusion (15:24; Gal. 1:7; 5:10; cf. Acts 12:18, tarachos). The part. hoi tarassontes in Gal. 1:7 likely means that as the result of another, adulterated gospel, the churches of Galatia have become confused in their understanding and thus also in their actions—a confusion that may be fatal, since it destroys the living organism of the church. The sing. in 5:10 refers to the same false teachers as a unit. These people will have to answer before the judgment seat of God for the confusion they have sown.

(c) The pass. can sometimes have a negative sense, connoting emotional disturbance: to become terrified, be afraid or overawed. This form of the vb. occurs 5x in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 2:3; 14:26; Mk. 6:50; Lk. 1:12; 24:38). In each case the reference is to an emotional shock that is brought about not by any human action, but by an action of God—including Matt. 2:3, where Herod and Jerusalem are shaken at the report of the Messiah's birth.

(d) A different thought is contained in the expression in Jn. 14:1, 27: "Do not let your hearts be troubled." In this formula (cf. Ps. 55:5; 143:4), the heart stands for the self. Since the disciples will soon be left alone in a world in which there is conflict between the powers of this world and God's revelation, they will undergo inward shock and anxiety. This anxiety will be overcome, however, by faith in God, which is identical with faith in Jesus, since this faith knows of a home (14:1) where death has been conquered. Believers need not remain in a condition of fear and anxiety, since they have the promise of eschatological peace (14:27; cf. also 1 Pet. 3:14).

(e) Jesus too is at times troubled. At Jn. 11:33 tarassō, together with embrimaomai (be deeply moved), denotes the wave of anger that came over him when confronted with so much lack of faith and hope, although life itself was present within his person at the tomb of Lazarus. At 12:27 Jesus' words "my heart is troubled" do not refer simply to an emotional experience. The fear and anxiety he experienced shows that he has humbled himself to the utmost in order to take on himself our lost human condition and in this very condition to glorify the Father.

2. tarachos denotes the stir caused by Christians in both its occurrences (Acts 12:18; 19:23).

ταρταρόω (tartaroō), send to Tartarus, hell (5434).

CL & OT tartaroō, to send or hurl into Tartarus, is a vb. dependent on Gk. mythology. Tartarus was a dark abyss, deep below Hades, to which rebellious gods and disobedient humans were sent for torment and punishment. It was surrounded by a brazen wall and encircled by impenetrable darkness. Specifically, the Cyclopes and Titans were imprisoned there by Uranos, Kronos, and Zeus (→ ouranos, 4041). Jewish apocalyptic writers in the intertestamental period adopted this language as another term (in addition to geenna) for where the ungodly were punished (e.g., 1 Enoch 20:2, Gk. MSS). Although the vb. does not occur in the LXX, the noun tartaros does (e.g., see Job 41:31 = LXX 41:23, where it refers to the depths of the sea that Leviathan plays in; Prov. 30:16 = LXX 24:51, where it translates šᵉʾôl, one of the aspects of reality that is never satisfied).

NT In the NT tartaroō occurs only in 2 Pet. 2:4, which adopts the Jewish apocalyptic view of tartaros as the place where the disobedient angels were sent after they rebelled against the Lord. This place, however, is not the actual place of punishment for these angels. Rather, they are being "held" in the "gloomy dungeons" of tartaros for punishment later—presumably in geenna (→ 1147). By being held there, God limits their ability to wreak havoc on the earth.

This is one of the only biblical passages that alludes to the fall of the angels, an event that presumably preceded the temptation of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. Many scholars, however, see a reference here to Gen. 6:1–4, which in Jewish apocalyptic writers was frequently understood as a time when angels ("the sons of God") stepped out of their bounds and sinned against God by cohabiting with human women ("the daughters of men"), producing a rebellious race of humans, who were subsequently destroyed in the flood.

τάσσω (tassō), arrange, appoint (5435); προστάσσω (prostassō), command, appoint (4705); διατάσσω (diatassō), command, order (1411); διαταγή (diatagē), ordinance, direction (1408); ἐπιτάσσω (epitassō), command, order (2199); ἐπιταγή (epitagē), order, injunction (2198).

CL & OT 1. tassō is common in cl. Gk. Its first meaning is military: draw up troops (or ships) in battle array. From this the vb. came to mean direct or appoint someone to a task, arrange, set up, put things or plans in order. prostassō, diatassō, and epitassō mean mostly command, order, arrange. The corresponding nouns have the same import. All these vbs. and nouns imply an acknowledged authority and power residing in the person from whom decisions or directives issue.

2. In the LXX the words in this word group are used with both God and humans as the arranging or directing agents. tassō is used far more frequently than any of the other three vbs. diatagē is used only in Ezr. 4:11 and epitagē in Dan. 3:16; Wis. 14:16; 18:16; 19:6; 1 Esd. 1:18; 3 Macc. 7:20.

NT 1. tassō is used 8x and means some order or arrangement that has been made. It denotes God's appointment of "the authorities that exist" (Rom. 13:1), of a career of service "assigned" for Paul (Acts 22:10), and of individual persons "appointed" for eternal life through believing the gospel (13:48). In the mid. voice it means to make a mutual arrangement (28:23).

2. prostassō, with its official sense of command, occurs 7x and is used with the angel of the Lord (Matt. 1:24), Moses (8:4; Mk. 1:44), and Peter (Acts 10:48). In Acts 10:33 it refers to God's charge to Peter, and in 17:26 to God's setting of definite epochs in history.

3. diatassō occurs 16x and refers to various types of orders and commands. Jesus gave various directives to his disciples when he sent them out (Matt. 11:1; cf. 1 Cor. 9:14). God too can give orders (e.g., to Moses, Acts 7:44). But so can humans, such as the emperor Claudius (18:2) and Felix, the governor of Judea (23:31; 24:23). The apostle Paul did not hesitate to give orders to those churches he had started, such as his command to the ones in Galatia to participate in the collection for Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1) and his directives to the church in Corinth (7:17; 11:34). He also made assignments for Titus to carry out on Crete (Tit. 1:5). diatagē occurs only 2x in the NT. In Acts 7:53 it refers to the law put into effect through angels, and in Rom. 13:2 it refers to government leaders as being instituted by God.

4. epitassō occurs 10x. Like the other words in this group, it refers to various sorts of commands or orders. Several times it refers to orders that Jesus gave to evil spirits, who obeyed him (Mk. 1:27; 9:25; Lk. 4:36; 8:31). He also ordered the wind and waves to become calm (8:25). Humans in positions of power can give orders (Mk. 6:27; Acts 23:2). Paul believes he can order Philemon to take Onesimus back, but decides to appeal to him instead (Phlm. 8). epitagē occurs 7x, all in letters of Paul. It is used 5x in the expression kat' epitagē, according to command (e.g., a command from God, 1 Cor. 7:25; 1 Tim. 1:1; Tit. 1:3). In 1 Cor. 7:6 Paul insists that his word is not to be taken as a command but as advice. In 2 Cor. 8:8 he resorts to exhorting the Corinthians on the collection rather than commanding them again (in contrast to 1 Cor. 16:1–2). Titus is to preach "with all authority [epitagē]" (Tit. 2:15).

τεῖχος (teichos), wall around a city (5446); τοῖχος (toichos), wall of a house (5526).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. teichos means a wall, esp. around a city. toichos is the wall of a house, temple, enclosure, side of a tent.

2. teichos occurs 193x in the LXX and generally means a town or city wall (e.g., Isa. 22:10), occasionally of other buildings (Lam. 2:7), and fig. of a chaste maiden difficult to approach (Song 8:9–10). toichos is used 88x and means the wall of a house or a room (Amos 5:19), the temple (1 Ki. 6:5), or occasionally a vineyard (Num. 22:25).

NT 1. In the NT teichos consistently means city wall. The local disciples lowered Saul of Tarsus in a basket through a window in the city wall to allow him to escape from Damascus (Acts 9:25; 2 Cor. 11:33). In Heb. 11:30 teichos is used for the walls of Jericho collapsing before Joshua's army.

In Rev. 21 teichos occurs 6x for the high city wall of the new Jerusalem (21:12), which symbolizes the eternal security of the inhabitants and excludes those outside (22:15). The twelve foundations of the city and its twelve gates are inscribed with the names of the twelve apostles and the twelve tribes of Israel, respectively, signifying the completeness of the number of the people of God under the two covenants. The measuring of the wall by an angel (21:17) not only draws attention to its extraordinary height but also alludes to its divine protection. The wall is said to be built of jasper and adorned with twelve different jewels, each gate being made of a single pearl (21:17–21).

2. toichos appears only in Paul's rebuke of the high priest Ananias as a "whitewashed wall" (Acts 23:3). The one dispensing justice ought to be a wall firm and true, supporting the house of Israel, its laws, and all who live within its shelter. The fig. of a whitewashed wall, on the other hand, suggests a structure whose precarious condition has been disguised by generous coats of whitewash (cf. Ezek. 13:10–16).

See also phragmos, fence, wall, hedge (5850); charax, pointed stake, palisade, rampart, mound (5918).

τεκμήριον (tekmērion), proof (5447).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. tekmērion almost always means strict proof. In Aristotelian logic it denotes a compelling sign. This sense is suggested in the LXX (Wis. 5:11; 19:13; 3 Macc. 3:24).

NT tekmērion occurs only at Acts 1:3, where Lk. refers to many "convincing proofs" as infallible evidence of the resurrection of Christ. Lk. did not view Jesus' appearances as mere visions, since Jesus ate and drank with his disciples in his resurrected body (e.g., Lk. 24:41–43; Acts 1:4; 10:41).

τέκνον (teknon), child (5451); τεκνίον (teknion), little child (5448).

CL & OT teknon denotes a child in relation to one's parents and ancestors. In the LXX it is used both of a child still unborn (Gen. 3:16; 17:16) and an elder son (27:13); it does not distinguish sex. In addition to the broader meaning of descendant (30:1), the word is also used metaphorically as an intimate form of address (43:29) or for a pupil in relationship to his master (1 Sam. 3:16; 26:17). In Ps. 34:11 wisdom calls out: "Come, my children, listen to me." teknion, diminutive of teknon, is a nursery term and denotes the little child (no occurrences in the LXX).

NT 1. In the Gospels, teknon describes the relationship of parents to their children (Matt. 18:25; 21:28; Mk. 13:12; Lk. 15:31; cf. Acts 21:5) and pictures our relationship with God (Matt. 7:11; Lk. 11:13). Note its use in Jesus' lament over Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37; Lk. 13:34) and in the generic sense of descendant (Matt. 3:9; Lk. 3:8; cf. also Jn. 8:39; Rom. 9:7–8; Gal. 4:31). Jesus uses the word as a form of address (Matt. 9:2; Mk. 2:5; 10:24).

There are several NT references to parent-child relationships. The obedience of children to their parents (Eph. 6:1; Col. 3:20) should be reciprocated by the kindness of parents towards their children (Eph. 6:4; Col. 3:21; cf. 1 Thess. 2:7). The parent's task includes warning; in a similar vein, Paul warns the church (2:11). He compares his flock to children (1 Cor. 4:14; 2 Cor. 6:13; Gal. 4:19) and saw his relationship to Timothy and Titus as a father-child relationship (1 Cor. 4:17; Phil. 2:22; 1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2; 2:1; Tit. 1:4). The Pastoral Letters lay great stress on orderly family relationships (1 Tim. 3:4, 12; Tit. 1:6). teknion, little child, is used only in the Johannine writings, and then only as a form of address to the disciples or the church (Jn. 13:33; 1 Jn. 2:1, 12, 28; 3:7, 18; 4:4; 5:21).

teknon can, however, also describe characteristics of a particular group: those who have fallen under God's wrath (NIV, "objects [tekna] of wrath," Eph. 2:3); "children of light" (5:8); the obedient (1 Pet. 1:14); those who stand under a curse (2 Pet. 2:14; cf. also 2 Jn. 1, 4, 13; 3 Jn. 4). Arndt regards most of these as Hebraisms, together with the expression children of wisdom (i.e., those who attach themselves to wisdom and are led by her, Lk. 7:35) and the designation of the inhabitants of a city as its tekna (Matt. 23:37; Lk. 13:34; 19:44; Gal. 4:25; cf. Joel 2:23; Zech. 9:13; 1 Macc. 1:38).

2. Paul's starting point is the promise that those who belong to Israel stand under God's blessing (Rom. 9:4–5; Gal. 4:21–22). But who belong to Israel? Not the natural descendants (tekna) of Abraham (Rom. 9:6–7; Gal. 4:23), but those who believe (see 3:7; cf. Rom. 8:13). It is not a question, therefore, of a natural relationship as children to God, but of a legal acceptance by adoption of believers as God's children and as heirs of the promise. The gift that establishes the relationship (adoption, huiothesia; → huios, 5626) is the Spirit, who cries Abba, Father, leads us into freedom, and engenders in us the hope of sonship (Rom. 8:13–17, 19–23; cf. Gal. 4:5–6).

Jn. sees being children of God in terms of begetting and birth, as a new being mediated by initiation. The child (teknon) of God is born of God (Jn. 1:12–13; 1 Jn. 2:29; 3:2). Children of God and children of the devil stand opposed (3:10). Love for God and love for fellow believers characterize God's children (cf. 4:21). John uses huios (son) for Jesus Christ as the one and only Son of God (Jn. 3:16; 20:31), but tekna of those who receive him and so become his children (see 1:12–13; 1 Jn. 3:2). In Eph. 5:1 the church is called to be mimētai tou theou, imitators of God, and as such are tekna agapēta, dearly loved children. This expresses the call to discipleship.

Discipleship may, however, entail under certain circumstances the abandonment of all by the disciple, even one's children (Mk. 10:29–30; cf. Lk. 14:26). The horror of the end is depicted, among other things, in terms of a father set against his child and a child against the parents (Matt. 10:21; Mk. 13:12; cf. Lk. 21:16).

τέκτων (tektōn), builder (5454); ἀρχιτέκτων (architektōn), master builder (802); τεχνίτης (technitēs), craftsman (5493); τέχνη (technē), art, skill, trade (5492).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. tektōn means a craftsman or builder in wood, stone, or metal; architektōn means a head builder, contractor, or director of works; technitēs means a craftsman, artisan, or designer; and technē means an art, craft, trade, or professional skill.

In the LXX all of these words appear in their cl. meaning. It is noteworthy that, unlike the more intellectual and aristocratic societies of Greece and Rome, the Jews had a high regard for manual work and a deep respect for those who did it well, whose ability was seen as a gift of God's Spirit (Exod. 35:30–36:2).

NT tektōn appears in the NT only in the identification of Jesus by the people of Nazareth as "the carpenter" (Mk. 6:3), "the carpenter's son" (Matt. 13:55). Though carpenter is the common rendering here, tektōn can also mean mason; perhaps Joseph and Jesus were builders, so that both carpentry and masonry were among their skills.

architektōn occurs only in Paul's description of himself as "an expert builder" (cf. the LXX of Isa. 3:3) who laid the foundation of the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 3:10). Paul identifies this foundation with Christ: i.e., Christ as set forth in the doctrines Paul preached, the teaching of reconciliation through the cross and the new community created thereby.

technitēs bears its ordinary sense of craftsman in Acts 19:24, 38; Rev. 18:22, but in Heb. 11:10 the word is applied to God as the craftsman who has built the heavenly city for which his people hope.

technē has its ordinary sense of skill or trade in Acts 17:29; 18:3 (where Paul and Aquila are identified as tentmakers or leather-workers); and Rev. 18:22.

τέλος (telos), end, conclusion, close, goal (5465); τελέω (teleō), bring to an end, finish, complete, carry out, accomplish (5464); τελειόω (teleioō), bring to completion, complete, accomplish, finish, fulfill, make perfect (5457); τέλειος (teleios), complete, perfect (5455); τελειότης (teleiotēs), perfection, maturity (5456); τελείωσις (teleiōsis), perfection, fulfillment (5459); τελειωτής (teleiōtēs), perfecter (5460); συντέλεια (synteleia), completion, close, consummation (5333); συντελέω (synteleō), bring to an end, complete, carry out, fulfill, accomplish (5334).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the noun telos meant a turning point, the culminating point at which one stage ends and another begins; later the goal, the end. Marriage is in this sense a telos, as also is death. telos can mean the completion of physical and/or intellectual development, as the use of the word teleios also makes clear. telos can have also dynamic character, as in the ratification of a law. This dynamic character is also clear in the religious sphere, where sacrifices and religious rites are called telē; their goal is to bring people nearer to God. Also of significance is the religious description of God as the archē kai telos, the beginning and end of all things, who embraces totality.

(b) Anything that has reached its telos is teleios, complete, perfect. One brings something to completion, perfection (teleioō). The pass. of teleioō, to be made perfect, to reach perfection, is used equally of human adulthood and of fully grown plants. The rare noun teleiotēs denotes a state of completeness or perfection.

(c) In Gk. philosophy telos has the primary meaning of goal. For the pre-Socratics the goal of life was delight in the beautiful, contentment, and contemplation. In Plato and Aristotle the telos to which one aspires is an ethical goal and ultimately happiness and bliss. Thus in the realm of ethics Plato can equate the concept of the perfect (teleios) with that of the good (agathos). In Gnosticism "perfection" is a technical term in the myth of the "redeemed Redeemer." He is the "perfect man." Anyone who is saved by him through true knowledge is the "perfect" gnostic.

2. (a) telos occurs more than 150x in the LXX, chiefly in adverbial combinations. eis telos (15x) means forever (e.g., Job 20:7; Ps. 9:6; Hab. 1:4) or utterly (e.g., 2 Chr. 12:12). It is also important to note that telos repeatedly translates Heb. words meaning end, border, boundary. In such cases it means conclusion, end (cf. 2 Sam. 15:7; 2 Ki. 8:3).

(b) teleō is found 28x in the LXX, usually meaning to bring to an end, to fulfill (e.g., Ruth 2:21; Ezr. 9:1). It occurs in the pass. as a religious term: to consecrate oneself (e.g., to the service of Baal Peor, cf. Num. 25:3, 5; Ps. 106:28).

(c) teleios (21x) usually means complete, sound; the stress lies on being whole, perfect, intact. It is used of the heart that is wholly turned toward God (1 Ki. 8:61; 11:4) and of the one who is bound wholly to God (Gen. 6:9; cf. Deut. 18:13). The thought of totality is also shown in the mention of a total depopulation (Jer. 13:19) and in the fact that whole offerings can be called teleiai (Jdg. 20:26; 21:4).

(d) teleioō (25x) has likewise the idea of being perfect and whole: to show oneself perfect, i.e., blameless (2 Sam. 22:26); to make beauty perfect (Ezek. 27:11). It is used 9x times in the Pentateuch as a religious term meaning to consecrate for the cult (e.g., Exod. 29:9, 29). But this word also means to bring to its conclusion (2 Chr. 8:16; Neh. 6:16).

(e) teleiotēs (only 6x) signifies perfection or integrity (Jdg. 9:16, 19; Prov. 11:3).

(f) teleiōsis (17x) occurs mainly in connection with cultic usage, occurring chiefly in connection with the consecration of priests.

3. (a) The OT apocalyptic lit. uses synteleia, end, completion (e.g., Dan. 8:19; 11:27; Heb. qēṣ), although the word is also used frequently elsewhere. In this eschatological sense qēṣ in rab. lit. refers chiefly to the days of the Messiah's coming that were ordained before the end of the world.

(b) In Qumran the term "perfect" is colored by the OT. Those who are perfect are those who keep God's law wholly and so walk perfectly in his ways (cf. 1QS 1:8; 2:2). In a narrower sense the members of the community are called "the perfect" (8:20).

(c) Philo has a double telos in a person's life: wisdom (sophia; i.e., the perfect and direct understanding of God that comes about by learning) and virtue (aretē), attained by practice. He has three stages on the way to perfection: beginners, advanced, and perfect. Repentance holds second place to perfection (teleiotēs). Both Philo and Josephus make use of the comprehensive description of God as archē kai telos, beginning and end.

NT In the NT the words of this group occur fairly often: telos 40x, teleō 28x, teleios 19x, teleioō 23x, teleiotēs 2x, teleiōtēs once (Heb. 12:2), and teleiōsis 2x. telos occurs frequently in the Synoptic Gospels and Paul, teleō particularly in the Synoptics and in Rev., whereas teleios and its derivatives are most common in Heb.

1. The letters of Paul. (a) Paul uses telos to mean end result, ultimate fate. Rom. 6:21–22 speaks of the alternatives that face a person as a result of his or her conduct: death or life (cf. Ps. 73:17). According to Phil. 3:19, the enemies of the cross of Christ will find their ultimate fate in eternal destruction (cf. also 2 Cor. 11:15). There is a debate on the meaning of telos in Rom. 10:4. Many consider it to mean that in Christ the law has ceased to be the way of salvation. But others argue that telos here denotes the logical end or goal of a process, its consummation (cf. 1 Tim. 1:5, "the goal of this command is love"). In this meaning, "Christ is the end of the law" in the sense of its climactic development, which in turn implies the end of the validity of the OT law.

In 1 Cor. 10:11 Paul refers to "the fulfillment [telos] of the ages" that have come over us; by this Paul means that we are living in the last days (cf. 7:29, 31). In 15:24 telos refers to the conclusion of the eschatological events (cf. Mk. 13:7 par.), the point of time when Christ hands over the kingdom to his Father. Finally, in a different vein, in Rom. 13:7 telos means tax (cf. 13:6, teleō, pay taxes; → telōnion, customs house, tax office, 5458).

(b) teleō twice means to achieve one's object: of the power of Christ in the weakness of the apostle (2 Cor. 12:9), and of the desires of the flesh (Gal. 5:16). In two other places this vb. means to bring to an end: of fulfilling the law (Rom. 2:27) and of completing one's course (2 Tim. 4:7). Acts 20:24 uses teleioō in this sense (cf. 13:25).

(c) teleios occurs 5x meaning mature, adult: 1 Cor. 2:6; 14:20; Eph. 4:13; Phil. 3:15; Col. 1:28. Twice this word denotes that which is wholly in accord with God's will (Rom. 12:2; Col. 4:12). In 1 Cor. 13:10 "perfection" means the future world, in which everything imperfect (13:9), which distinguishes our present world, is overcome. Col. 3:14 calls love the "perfect unity," for by it the gifts given to the church (3:12–13) are fitted together into a whole.

2. The Synoptic Gospels. (a) In the eschatological discourses of Jesus telos is used as a technical term for the end of the world (Matt. 24:6, 14; Mk. 13:7; Lk. 21:9; cf. synteleia [tou] aiōnos, the consummation of the age, Matt. 13:39–40, 49; 24:3; 28:20). It also occurs several times in the prep. combination eis telos, which probably refers to the end of the world (Matt. 10:22; 24:13). In Lk. 18:5 eis telos simply means finally.

The phrase telos echein, to have an end, occurs 2x. In Mk. 3:26 a kingdom in which division dominates will cease to stand (cf. on this Lk. 1:33, where the reign of Christ has no end). Lk. 22:37 attributes to Jesus the statement that "what is written ... is reaching its fulfillment," for the words of Scripture (Isa. 53:12) were being fulfilled in him. telos as outcome is found in Matt. 26:58 and as tax in 17:25.

(b) Characteristic of Matt. is his use of teleō in the formulaic ending of Jesus' five great discourses and the resumption of narrative ("when Jesus had finished ...," 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). Lk. 12:50 and Matt. 10:23 (the disciples will not have come to the end of the towns of Israel before the Parousia breaks on them) also have the sense of carrying through to the end. Lk. uses the vb. 2x in the pass. for fulfillment of Scripture (18:31; 22:37; cf. Acts 13:29) and once in the act. for fulfilling the law (Lk. 2:39).

(c) Among the Synoptics, the adj. teleios occurs only in Matt. In 5:48 is the summons to be perfect, as the heavenly Father is perfect. In the light of the context, this is a command to be compassionate, to love friend and foe (cf. Lk. 6:36). To serve God with an undivided heart can also mean to sell one's possessions and give them to the poor (Matt. 19:21).

(d) Lk. is the only Synoptic writer to use the vb. teleioō. When the Passover feast "was over," the boy Jesus stayed behind at Jerusalem (2:43). Jesus told the Pharisees to tell Herod that "on the third day I will reach my goal" (13:32). Despite Herod Antipas's threats of murder Jesus intended to continue his work for salvation "today and tomorrow." What his completion on the third day signifies is not entirely clear. Does it mean that God will put an end to his work on the third day? Or does Jesus mean that whatever violence is inflicted on him, he will go on working, for "on the third day" he will be completed notwithstanding, i.e., rise from the dead (cf. 9:22; 18:33; 24:7, 46)?

3. James and 1 Peter. (a) In Jas. teleios (5x) has the basic meaning of "whole." One is perfect, i.e., not lagging behind in any point (1:4), when one is patient and forbearing. Jas. calls the law of freedom, by which he means the commandment to love one's neighbor (2:8), "perfect" (1:25), because this alone makes us really free (cf. Jn. 8:31–32; Gal. 5:13). That God's gifts can be called "perfect" (Jas. 1:17) goes without saying. According to Jas., the person who does not offend in words is "perfect" and not "at fault" (3:2). teleioō accordingly means to become whole: Only through works is faith brought to wholeness (2:22, cf. 2:17, 20). Elsewhere Jas. also uses telos as outcome (5:11; cf. Matt. 26:58) and teleō as to fulfill (a law, 2:8; cf. Lk. 2:39).

(b) telos is used in 1 Pet. 4x: as a goal (1:9), as an eschatological term (4:7; cf. Matt. 24:6), as one's ultimate fate (1 Pet. 4:17; cf. Rom. 6:21–22), and as meaning "finally" (1 Pet. 3:8; cf. the adv. teleiōs, meaning entirely, fully, in 1:13).

4. Hebrews. This word group occurs with the greatest frequency, relatively speaking, in Heb. (18x); only the vb. teleō is lacking. (a) By contrast with its use in the rest of the NT, teleioō is here attested 9x, nearly always with cultic overtones (cf. OT discussion above). It means to make perfect in the sense of consecrate, sanctify, so that, like the OT priest, one can come before God. Heb. uses the vb. to differentiate Christ—the high priest perfected through suffering (2:10) and made eternally perfect (7:28), who was thus able to be the source of eternal salvation for his people (5:9)—from the priests of the old covenant, who were subject to weaknesses (7:28) and whose sacrifices could not perfect their consciences (9:9; cf. also 10:1). Christ alone was able to perfect his people by a single sacrifice (10:14). The law (7:19), i.e., the Levitical priesthood, has completely failed to bring about "perfection" in anyone (teleiōsis, 7:11). Thus Heb. calls Christ's heavenly sanctuary "more perfect" (9:11) in contrast with the earthly one.

teleioō is used 2x without cultic reference. Heb. 11:40 means that the witnesses to faith under the old covenant (11:39) did not reach perfection, for this was given only by Christ (cf. 10:14). Now, however, God's people share in that perfection (12:23).

(b) teleios, mature, occurs in 5:14. teleiotēs, "maturity" (6:1) means that part of Christian doctrine intended for adults; it is the opposite of archē, the beginning teachings (5:12; 6:1). In 12:2 teleiōtēs stands alongside archēgos: Jesus is the beginner and perfecter of faith. He has not only maintained faith right to the end (5:7–8; 12:3), but he has also laid the foundation of faith (cf. 1:3).

(c) telos occurs in two prep. combinations: mechri telous, "till the end" (3:14) and achri telous, "to the very end" (6:11; see also the uses of telos in 6:8; 7:3).

5. The Johannine writings. (a) In Jn. 4:34; 5:36; 17:4, Jesus uses teleioō to denote the works of the Father that he must accomplish. Then on the cross he can say that they have been accomplished (tetelestai, "it is finished," 19:30, cf. 19:28). In his high priestly prayer Jesus asks that his own people be perfected in unity (17:23), so that the world will believe that the Father has sent the Son (cf. 17:21). In 19:28 teleioō is used of Scripture being fulfilled. Jn. uses telos to denote the full extent of Jesus' love or his love to the very end (13:1).

(b) In 1 Jn. the pass. of teleioō is used 4x with reference to love. Love of God reaches its completion when people keep his word (2:5) and love their neighbors (4:12). This love attains its goal in that they are liberated from fear on the judgment day (4:17; cf. 2:28). One who knows fear is not perfectly determined by this love, for "perfect [teleios] love drives out fear" (4:18).

(c) Rev. has teleō 8x, usually meaning to finish or to be finished. Rev. 11:7 refers to the completion of a testimony, while 15:1 announces the seven last plagues on the world in which God's wrath is brought to completion (cf. 15:8). Rev. 20 speaks 3x of the end of the thousand-year reign (20:3, 5, 7), while 10:7 and 17:17 deal with the mystery of God or the words of God being fulfilled.

Regarding telos, the formula "beginning and end" (cf. Isa. 41:4; 44:6; 48:12) expresses the power of God (Rev. 21:6) and of Christ (22:13), which embraces time and creation. Just as God is the beginning and the end (cf. 1:8), the creator and perfecter of all things, so also is the exalted Christ (cf. 1:17; 2:8). Thus in 2:26 Jesus exhorts his church to hold fast continually the works of Christ "to the end."

6. In summing up the theological function of this word group in the NT, a distinction can be drawn between an eschatological and an anthropological aspect. The two are bound up with the general areas of meaning associated with telos and teleios.

(a) First and foremost is the eschatological function of telos. The dynamic, goal-directed character of the noun is further underlined by the frequent use of the vb. teleō. This aspect stands out with particular clarity in passages concerned with the future consummation in the Synoptics (e.g., Mk. 13), Paul's letters (e.g., Phil. 3:19), and Rev. (e.g., 20:1–7). The important point here is that the end is not understood simply as the mechanical cessation of movement but rather as the consummating conclusion of a dynamic process, the goal of which manifests the realization of its meaning and its intentions.

(b) Connected with the idea of the end as the completion and realization of a goal is the sense of teleios as that which has reached its goal and is thus completed and perfected. To the extent that the whole is achieved only at the end, teleios may be applied in its fullest sense only to God (Matt. 5:48) and Christ (cf. Heb. 7:28). In the context of individual human development teleios applies to humans who have reached maturity, the grown persons who have come of age (esp. in Paul). The NT does not speak of an ideal of ethical perfection that is to be realized by degrees. Rather, when viewed against the background of the OT, teleios signifies the undivided wholeness of a person in one's behavior. When applied to humankind and ethics, therefore, teleios denotes not the qualitative end point of human endeavor, but the anticipation in time of eschatological wholeness in actual present-day living. Christian life in the NT is not projected idealistically as a struggle for perfection, but eschatologically as the wholeness a person is given and promised.

τελώνιον (telōnion), customs house, tax office (5468); τελώνης (telōnēs), farmer of taxes, tax collector (5467); ἀρχιτελώνης (architelōnēs), chief tax collector (803); τέλος (telos), toll, customs duty, revenue (5465); τελέω (teleō), to pay what is owed (5464) (for other meanings of telos and teleō, → telos, end, goal, 5465).

CL & OT 1. (a) The telōnēs, tax farmer, was a notorious figure at ancient Athens. The system of farming out sources of government revenue from taxes, tolls, property, land, mines, etc., goes back to the Gk. city states. Their polis constitutions did not provide for long-term civil servants. But by the tax-farming system the city was guaranteed a known income without the need for a complex financial administration. The privilege of farming taxes was auctioned annually. The successful individual or group had to have acceptable backers underwriting prompt payment, who then had to pay a first installment before being allowed to collect dues from the public. For the actual collection the tax farmers used employees, who in turn had to extract a sum over and above that required by their masters in order to provide an income for themselves. From the public's point of view it was a hated system, open to abuse.

The Romans operated a somewhat similar system, where the business of collecting taxes was left to certain leading officers, called publicani, chiefly belonging to the equestrian order. They paid an agreed sum to the government. These publicani, who were wealthy individuals, sublet the tax-collecting to agents (magistri), and the agents engaged local officials (portitores) to collect the dues. It was these portitores who are referred to in the NT as telōnai. The telōnai had to belong to the native population in order to be aware of local ways and to run less risk of being deceived. Indeed, they themselves almost invariably succeeded in deceiving and fleecing the tax-paying public.

(b) telōnion means a custom house, tax office; later, customs duty. telos, which usually means end, fulfillment (→ 5465), can also denote duty for the state, payment of toll or tax. Similarly, teleō generally means to carry out, execute a plan, but also to pay what one owes, esp. in dues and taxes.

2. In the LXX telos, when meaning tax, translates mekes, tax collected for Yahweh from war booty (Num. 31:28, 37–41). It also translates other Heb. words to mean the redemption price of a field in the year of Jubilee (Lev. 27:23) as well as a general tribute imposed by King Artaxerxes (Est. 10:1). telōneō, to impose taxes, occurs in 1 Macc. 13:39, of tolls exacted from the Jews by the Syrians. In 1 Macc. 10:31; 11:35 telos means customs duty. teleō does not appear in the LXX with the meaning of render or pay.

3. (a) The first reference to tax farming in Palestine dates from the time of Ptolemy II Philadelphus in the 3d cent. B.C. Josephus refers to the collecting of taxes from the Jews during the Seleucid period. The capture of Jerusalem by Pompey in 63 B.C. led to the imposition of Roman taxation. But in 30 B.C. Augustus allowed Herod the Great to control his own finances, collecting taxes directly through royal slaves.

(b) Jewish sources distinguish two classes of tax officials: those responsible for income tax and poll tax, and customs officers stationed at bridges and canals and on state roads. During the time of Roman rule, taxation remained constant, but at a harsh level. The province of Judea alone had to find 600 talents annually. Tacitus mentions that in A.D. 17 the provinces of Syria and Judea begged for a reduction in taxes. There was some relief from A.D. 37 when the governor Vitellius remitted the market duty on crops.

According to the Mishnah, a Jew entering the customs service cut himself off from decent society. He was disqualified from being a judge or even a witness in court and was cast out of the synagogue. His family members were considered equally tarnished. Because of their exactions and extortions, customs officials were relegated to the same legal category as murderers and robbers. Money handled by tax collectors was tainted and could not be used, even for charity.

NT 1. The telōnai are mentioned only in the Synoptic Gospels. They themselves are not the holders of the tax-farming contracts, who were usually foreigners, but subordinates hired from among the native population. Herod Antipas adopted the farming system for Galilee and Perea, but as an imperial province, Judea paid taxes not through tax farmers but directly to the imperial treasury (Mk. 12:14). The responsibility for collection was imposed on the Sanhedrin, under the supervision of the Roman procurator.

The prevailing method of tax collection afforded collectors many opportunities for greed and unfairness. Hence telōnai were hated and despised as a class. Strict Jews were also offended by the fact that the tax collector was rendered unclean through continual contact with Gentiles and because his work involved breaking the Sabbath. Contemporary public opinion is accurately reflected in the disagreeable associations expressed in the NT: telōnai are linked with sinners (Matt. 9:10), pagan Gentiles (18:17), prostitutes (21:31), and extortioners, imposters, and adulterers (Lk. 18:11).

2. (a) Jesus teaches that for Christians to fail to include their enemies and persecutors in their love is to leave themselves on no higher a moral and spiritual plane than the most despised classes: tax collectors and pagan Gentiles (Matt. 5:46–47). Lk., writing to a wider audience, uses the more general term "sinners" (Lk. 6:33).

(b) Jesus' summons to the tax collector Matt. to join him (Matt. 9:9) must have outraged and bewildered public opinion. For Matt. himself (called Levi by Mk. and Lk.) the call of Jesus entailed great sacrifice, for he left everything (Lk. 5:28). Fishermen could return to their boats (Jn. 21:3), but a telōnēs who gave up his occupation had no prospect of another job, even with the skills he undoubtedly possessed (e.g., being multilingual and experienced in keeping records).

Matt.'s toll house (telōnion) at Capernaum commanded both the sea route from east and north of the Sea of Galilee and also the land road that led from Damascus to the Mediterranean Sea (Matt. 4:15). Customs would be levied on all goods carried by ship or caravan. In Matt.'s case the duty would be collected not on behalf of the Roman government but for the tetrarch Herod Antipas. This fact would, however, not make Matt.'s calling or class any less unpopular.

(c) Jesus' presence at the farewell banquet Matt. arranged for his old associates (Lk. 5:29) inevitably drew criticism from the teachers of the law and Pharisees. In answer to the accusation that by eating with such people he was defiling himself, Jesus uses a current proverb to equate tax collectors with the sick. Jesus associates with these people not for his own sake (because, unlike the Pharisees, they are sympathetic to him and receptive to his message), or even (as his enemies might hint) because birds of a feather flock together. Rather, just as a doctor must get near to patients in order to treat them, so Jesus shares the company of the outcasts of society, for he knows that they are spiritually sick and needy (Matt. 9:12; Mk. 2:17; Lk. 5:31).

(d) Jesus speaks of the refusal of the Pharisees to respond either to the Baptist or to himself. John was criticized for his asceticism and Jesus for exuberance in the company of tax collectors and sinners (Matt. 11:19; Lk. 7:29, 34). Often the spiritual response of the despised put their religious betters to shame (Matt. 8:2, 8–9; 9:9–13; 15:28; 21:32), but as a category of people tax collectors could still be referred to as those who were uninterested in spiritual matters. If an offending Christian brother refuses to heed the local congregation, he is to be regarded as putting himself outside the religious community, i.e., joining the same class as Gentiles and tax collectors (18:17).

3. Light is thrown on the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18:23–35) when it is seen against the background of tax farming. The two debtors and the other servants are ministers (douloi) of the king and probably engaged in the collection of taxes. The vast sum due to the king from the first minister is not necessarily hyperbolic (Josephus refers to one tax farmer who owed 16,000 talents). The minister's plea for time is genuine, and the king releases him from immediate liability. When later the same minister's own hard-heartedness is exposed, the king delivers him to the torturers, who by severe examination will extract information from him about his personal assets.

4. Since architelōnēs is found only once (Lk. 19:2), Zacchaeus's official position is not clear. Probably he was the equivalent of the Roman magister, the intermediary between the publicani and the portitores. Jericho was a likely post for a tax officer of some standing, and one who would inevitably become rich. That city was an important customs station at the main ford of the Jordan, some seventeen miles from Jerusalem, and on the major route between Judea and lands east of the river. Zacchaeus's undertaking to recompense anyone he had defrauded (19:8) need not imply his own use of extortion. As the leading member of a company of publicani, he was responsible for and tainted by the actions of his subordinates. By inviting himself to this man's house, Jesus gently put pressure on his host's conscience. His initiative accomplished what many must have regarded as a miracle no less astonishing than any of his supernatural actions.

τέρας (teras), miraculous sign, prodigy, portent, omen, wonder (5469).

CL& OT 1. In cl. Gk. teras referred to terrible appearances that elicited fright and horror and that contradicted the ordered unity of nature. This gave rise to the meaning of teras as a miraculous sign or portent, which often came from the gods, esp. in the sense of an uncanny omen requiring interpretation by a seer.

2. In the LXX teras is different from the cl. Gk. usage. It is true that the character of the unusual also belongs to the word in the OT, but this is based on the fact that God created the world and controls nature, so that in essence these are not contrary to nature but works of God. Essential for teras is a reference to the self-revelation of Yahweh. The word thus designates a prophet who is made a sign (Isa. 8:18; 20:3; Ezek. 12:6, 11; 24:24, 27), and further, a man who becomes a manifestation of God's wrath and a horrible "portent" (Ps. 71:7; cf. 31:12). An event that announces future judgment can also be called a sign of horror (1 Ki. 13:3, 5). In apocalyptic contexts teras in Joel 2:30 is a baneful sign of the end (→ sēmeion, 4956). Finally, the word can denote miracles in general (Exod. 7:9; 11:9; 2 Chr. 32:31, esp. when linked with sēmeion; cf. 32:24).

NT In the NT teras occurs 16x, always in the pl. and only in combination with sēmeion (→ 4956 for comments on sēmeia kai terata).

See also thauma, object of wonder, wonder, marvel, miracle (2512); sēmeion, sign, wonder, miracle (4956).

τέσσαρες (tessares), four (5475).

CL & OT 1. The symbolic significance of the number four (tessares) is derived from the four points of the compass and the four directions of the wind (whereby the earth is pictured as a four-cornered disc), also from the four seasons and the corresponding constellations. In Babylonian mythology the four signs of the zodiac (Taurus, Leo, Scorpio, and Aquarius) appear as powerful figures that support the firmament of heaven by its four corners, or as the four beasts of burden of the four-wheeled heavenly chariot. The number four thus symbolizes the totality of earth and universe.

2. The OT uses tessares in this traditional sense, but without taking over the mythical connotations (e.g., Ezek. 1:4–18). Thus, in accord with ancient geography, four streams of Paradise encircle the four quarters of the globe (Gen. 2:10–14). In Zech. 1:18–21 the four horns represent four empires; in 6:5 the four spirits or winds denote Yahweh's omnipotence. The four winds or corners of the earth are mentioned in Isa. 11:12 and Jer. 49:36 (= LXX 25:15; → forty as a multiple of four, tesserakonta, 5477).

NT In the NT the number four occurs in the purely numerical sense (e.g., Mk. 2:3; Jn. 11:17; 19:23, where the division of Jesus' clothes into four presupposes that number of soldiers; Acts 21:9, 23; 27:29). In Peter's vision of the sheet with four corners containing clean and unclean animals (denoting God's acceptance of the Gentiles), the imagery may suggest the four corners (10:11; 11:5) of the vault of heaven. The four horns of the altar are mentioned in Rev. 9:13 (cf. Exod. 30:1–3).

Esp. in apocalyptic texts, the number four occurs with a symbolic meaning. But in most cases, the apocalyptic or mythological background is not decisive for the meaning. Thus the idea of gathering the elect from "the four winds" (Matt. 24:31; Mk. 13:27) is comparable with saying from all quarters. In Rev. 4:6, 8; 5:6, 8, 14; 6:1, 6; 7:11; 14:3; 15:7; 19:4 (cf. Ezek. 1:5–22), the imagery of the ancient world is formally adopted but with a transformed significance. The four living creatures, perhaps alluding to figures of the zodiac supporting the vault of heaven, become (by analogy with Isa. 6:2–3) creatures who praise God's holiness by day and by night. The four angels at the "four corners of the earth" who hold the winds (Rev. 7:1) and then later let them go (9:14–15) are creatures who serve God.

τεσσεράκοντα (tesserakonta), forty (5477).

OT Periods of forty days occur repeatedly in the OT (e.g., Gen. 7:4; 8:6; Exod. 24:18). Forty years was the duration of Israel's desert wanderings (16:35). Perhaps the number forty is a round number designating a generation. Forty is often associated with long periods of human endurance and the duration of successive developments of God's redemptive acts. In apocalyptic lit., forty days is the proper period for a term of instruction (2 Bar. 76:4; cf. 4 Ezra 14:23). At Qumran, the war of the Sons of Light and the Sons of Darkness was to last forty years (1QM 2:6).

NT In keeping with forty as an important number in God's redemptive acts, Jesus was forty days in the desert (Matt. 4:2; Mk. 1:13; Lk. 4:2) and remained with his disciples forty days after the resurrection (Acts 1:3). There are several references in Acts and Heb. to the forty-year period of Israel in the desert, and it seems to have been a theme of early Christian preaching (Acts 7:36, 42; Heb. 3:9, 17; cf. Acts 7:23, 30; 13:21).

The Jews were scrupulously careful not to exceed the maximum of forty stripes in a flogging (Deut. 25:3; 2 Cor. 11:24).

5493 (technitēs, craftsman), → 5454.

τηρέω (tēreō), preserve, keep (5498); τήρησις (tērēsis), observance (5499); παρατηρέω (paratēreō), watch (closely), observe (4190); παρατήρησις (paratērēsis), observation (4191).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. tēreō means: (a) have in view, perceive, observe; then (act.) wait for (the right opportunity); (mid.) be on one's guard; (b) guard, watch over, preserve (things, persons, or ethical values); (c) pay attention to, obey, comply with. The derivative noun tērēsis means: (a) guard, custody, detention; (b) prison; (c) observance, obedience. The compound paratēreō is identical with the simple vb.; paratērēsis is used only for observance of legal demands.

2. In the LXX phylassō has the same basic meaning and is much more common (over 400x) than tēreō (38x), which occurs mostly in wisdom lit. The predominant meaning of tēreō is that of religious observance, relating either to God's commands (1 Sam. 15:11; Prov. 19:16) or those of wisdom (3:1). Note the parallelism between phylassō and tēreō in Prov. 13:3: "He who guards [phylassō] his lips guards [or preserves, tēreō] his life" (see also 16:17; 19:16). In Dan. 9:4, God keeps (tēreō) his covenant with all who obey (phylassō) him.

3. tērēsis is found in the LXX only in the Apocr. In Wis. 6:18, Sir. 32:23 (= LXX 35:23) it is used for the result of the love of wisdom or of the commandments. Otherwise it is used for the guarding of persons or of a city. paratēreō (6x) means lie in wait for; paratērēsis is found only as a variant reading (Aquila) in Exod. 12:42.

NT 1. In the NT phylassō (→ 5875) occurs 31x, whereas tēreō is found 70x. Thus, the NT prefers the word less used in the LXX. In the NT tēreō means: (a) guard, keep watch (e.g., Matt. 27:36; Acts 16:23); (b) keep (e.g., Jn. 2:10; 12:7; 2 Pet. 2:4); (c) keep blameless, uninjured (e.g., 1 Cor. 7:37; 1 Thess. 5:23; 1 Tim. 5:22); (d) protect (e.g., Jn. 17:15); (e) hold fast (e.g., Eph. 4:3; Rev. 16:15); (f) follow, obey (e.g., the law, Jas. 2:10; the Sabbath, Jn. 9:16; traditions, Mk. 7:9; commands of Jesus, Jn. 14:15, 21; 15:10).

2. About half of the occurrences in the NT have this last-mentioned meaning. In contrast to phylassō, with only a few exceptions (e.g., Mk. 7:9; Jn. 9:16; Jas. 2:10), tēreō does not refer to keeping Jewish or Judaizing (Acts 15:5) traditions rejected by Christians (cf. the polemical use of paratēreō in Gal. 4:10 as it is applied to observing Jewish customs) but to keeping new Christian traditions (e.g., 1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 4:7). This is set out clearly in Christ's final command (Matt. 28:20), where he commands the church to "obey" the new righteousness he had taught during his ministry. The same use is found in 1 Cor. 7:19, where keeping (tērēsis) the commands of God is to be understood in terms of Christian ethics.

In Rev., linked with logos (word), entolē (command), and pistis (faith), tēreō has the force of holding fast a confession, both in facing false doctrine and in meeting a martyr's death (2:26; 3:3, 8, 10; 12:17; 14:12). All the Johannine passages—whether they deal with a church's or an individual's keeping of Jesus' words or commands (e.g., Jn. 8:51; 15:10; 1 Jn. 2:3; 3:22), or with God's or Christ's keeping of the church (Jn. 17:11, 15; 1 Jn. 5:18)—have to do with remaining in the church or in Christ. In Jn. 14:15, 21, 23–24, in the setting of Christ's farewell discourse, love to Christ is defined in terms of keeping his commands.

The reference of paratērēsis ("careful observation") in Lk. 17:20 cannot be established with certainty. Probably the word is used of the observation of apocalyptic signs. There is, however, the possibility that a keeping of the law is intended. paratēreō, apart from Gal. 4:10 (see above), is found only with the meaning of watch closely, lie in wait for (Mk. 3:2; Lk. 6:7; 14:1; 20:20; Acts 9:24).

See also phylassō, guard, preserve, keep (5875); grēgoreō, watch, be on the alert, be watchful (1213); agrypneō, keep or be awake, keep watch, guard (70).

5499 (tērēsis, observance), → 5498.

τίθημι (tithēmi), put, place, set, render, appoint (5502).

CL & OT tithēmi is a common Gk. word for put, used in both lit. (put something in a place) and metaphorical (put something into a category) senses. With a predicate in apposition it means cause to be or regard as.

NT In the NT tithēmi occurs 100x with a wide range of meanings. In the act. voice it signifies God destining someone for something, e.g., in Heb. 1:2 (he "appointed" the Son heir of all things) and in various OT texts quoted in the NT: Ps. 110:1, "until I put your enemies under your feet" (see Matt. 22:44; Mk. 12:36; Lk. 20:43; Acts 2:35; 1 Cor. 15:25; Heb. 1:13; 10:13); Gen. 17:5, "I have made [Abraham] a father of many nations" (see Rom. 4:17); Isa. 49:6, "I have made you a light for the Gentiles" (see Acts 13:47); Isa. 28:16, "I lay in Zion a stone" (see Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:6).

In the mid. voice God sets times (Acts 1:7), makes certain people overseers (20:28), arranges parts of the body (1 Cor. 12:18), appoints gifted people in the church (12:28), appoints Christians to obtain salvation (1 Thess. 5:9), appoints Paul to his ministerial work (1 Tim. 1:12) or to an apostolic role (2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11), and commits the word of reconciliation into his hands (2 Cor. 5:19). The thought of God settling what will be by his sovereign decision runs through these passages.

τίκτω (tiktō), bring forth, bear, give birth to, produce (5503); τεκνογονέω (teknogoneō), bear children (5449); τεκνογονία (teknogonia), childbearing (5450); τεκνοτροφέω (teknotropheō), bring up children (5452).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. tiktō means beget (of the father), give birth to (of the mother); bear young, breed (of animals); produce (of the earth); generate, engender.

In the LXX tiktō is used 215x and stands almost exclusively for the Heb. yālad (bear). The word was used predominantly of the woman (male begetting is usually expressed by gennaō, → 1164). The word often denotes the physical act of labor that comes as something over which one has no control (Isa. 13:8; 26:17–18). (On Isa. 7:14 [cf. Matt. 1:23], → Emmanouēl, 1842, and parthenos, 4221.) tiktō can also be applied to animals (Gen. 30:39).

tiktō is also used in a metaphorical, although somewhat negative, sense in the LXX in speaking of the nation of Israel (Num. 11:12; Isa. 66:8) and of bearing mischief (Ps. 7:14; Isa. 59:4). The picture here is of a hidden, irresistible power breaking out of a person. tiktō is never used of the Lord himself, though gennaō is (Deut. 32:18; Ps. 2:7).

NT 1. tiktō occurs chiefly in the birth narratives of Jesus and John the Baptist. It also occurs in Rev. 12:2, 5, in the heavenly vision of the birth by a woman of a child who is appointed to be Lord and Redeemer of the world and who is immediately caught up to God from the power of the dragon. gennaō is used more in a general sense, e.g., in the announcement to Elizabeth and Mary of the impending birth of their sons (Lk. 1:13, 35) and the report of Jesus' birth (Matt. 1:16), whereas tiktō expresses more the physical reality of giving birth (Lk. 2:6–7, 11). It appears in passages that bring home the reality of labor (Jn. 16:21; Rev. 12:2) or the shame of the woman who cannot give birth because she is barren (Gal. 4:27; see also genea, 1155).

tiktō and its cognates are used exclusively of the woman in the NT. Thus, 1 Tim. 2:15 reinterprets the judgment pronounced on Eve about pain in childbearing (Gen. 3:16), suggesting that this judgment does not mean that women are eternally condemned: "Women will be saved through bearing children [dia tēs teknogonias]—if they continue in faith, love and holiness, with propriety." Widows should marry and bear children (teknogoneō), thus giving the enemy no opportunity to revile the church (5:14). Widows should not be enrolled under the age of sixty, and among other things they should be known for having brought up children (teknotropheō, 5:10).

2. tiktō occurs twice in a metaphorical sense: of the earth bearing useful plants (Heb. 6:7) and of desire that gives birth to sin (Jas. 1:15). Here the vb. expresses the necessary connection between conception and birth. Where there is rain, there is fruit. Where there is desire, there is sin and death. Jas. 1:15, 18 also contain the word apokyeō (bring forth), which is likewise used in a metaphorical sense. It expresses the end result, in the one case of desire and in the other case of God's will.

See also gennaō, beget, become the father of, bear (1164); ginomai, be born, become, happen (1181); ektrōma, miscarriage (1765); palingenesia, rebirth, regeneration (4098); eugenēs, well-born, noble in descent or character (2302).

τιμή (timē), price, value, honor, respect (5507); τιμάω (timaō), set a price on, honor (5506); τίμιος (timios), precious, valuable (5508); τιμιότης (timiotēs), wealth (5509); ἀτιμία (atimia), shame, dishonor, disgrace (871); ἄτιμος (atimos), despised, dishonored (872); ἀτιμάζω (atimazō), dishonor, treat shamefully (869); ἔντιμος (entimos), respected, honored, valuable, precious (1952).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. timē means worship, esteem, honor (used of people); worth, value, price (of things); compensation, satisfaction, penalty. timē denotes the proper recognition one enjoys in the community because of one's office, position, wealth, etc., and then the position itself, the office with its dignity and privileges. The timē of a person, state, or deity must be distinguished from that of another; it is a personal possession. Slaves had no timē.

(b) Every deity was shown honor because of the sphere of influence he or she controlled by sacrifice and hymns of praise. On their part the gods "honored" humans by giving them their earthly positions of honor and good fortune.

(c) Shame and dishonor (atimia) put a person outside the community. atimia was the technical term for the deprivation of a citizen's rights.

2. (a) In contrast to its use of doxa (→ 1518) the LXX seldom uses timē for God's honor. Normally timē applies to human honor, although both words could render Heb. kābôd. Humankind has a position of honor in the creation (Ps. 8:3–8). Honor and position of office belong together (139:17, timaō). Honor should be shown to parents (Exod. 20:12; Sir. 3:3–16), the elderly (Lev. 19:32), and kings (Dan. 2:37). The rabbis stressed the honor due to a teacher of the law, one's neighbor (cf. Prov. 14:21; Sir. 10:23), and Jewish slaves.

(b) A person marked out by honor might expect a corresponding position, wealth (Gen. 31:1; Isa. 16:14, both doxa), and influence (Job 30:4, 8). A worthy appearance (Isa. 53:3), fitting speech (Sir. 5:13; cf. Job 29:21–25), and generosity (Prov. 22:9) also went with it.

(c) The godless experience atimia (Isa. 10:16; Jer. 23:40; cf. Dan. 12:2). The people did not grasp where the deepest dishonor lay, i.e., in faithlessness to God (Jer. 6:15), and this had to be recognized (Ezek. 16:63).

(d) The godly in the OT struggled with the problem of how dishonor could come to them (Job 10:15; 30:1–12). Only the Servant of the Lord bears shame patiently (Isa. 53:3) and leaves his cause in God's hand. Jud. ascribed an atoning value to the death of the martyrs and regarded it as honorable (4 Macc. 1:10; 17:20; Josephus, J.W., 2.151). The pious rejected the scorn of the godless as something derived from a false outlook because the true basis of honor is not earthly prosperity but virtue and wisdom (Wis. 3:14–5:5).

NT 1. The word group is not strongly represented in the NT. timē is found 41x, timaō 21x, timios 13x, and timiotēs once (Rev. 18:19). Only Paul uses atimia. (a) Only the positive forms are used in the sense of price, sum of money: e.g., timē (price) in 1 Cor. 6:20; timaō (to set a price on) in Matt. 27:9; and entimos (precious) in 1 Pet. 2:4, 6.

(b) The meaning of timaō in the sense of show honor is rare (e.g., Acts 28:10). It is not clear whether timē should be rendered honor or honorarium in 1 Tim. 5:17.

(c) Generally timē represents the recognition of the dignity of an office or position in society (e.g., the authorities, Rom. 13:7; cf. 1 Pet. 2:17; owners of slaves, 1 Tim. 6:1; a wife, 1 Pet. 3:7; the sexes in general, 1 Thess. 4:4). The honoring of God is uppermost in the doxologies, where both doxa and timē occur (1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16; Rev. 4:11), but honor should be shown to everyone (1 Pet. 2:17).

(d) timē and its cognates are used for exaltation in the ultimate eschatological salvation (Jn. 12:26; Rom. 2:7, 10; 1 Pet. 1:7; 2:7).

(e) timios, an important NT word, occurs in a variety of contexts. It is used 6x in Rev. for "precious stones" (e.g., 17:4; 18:12, 16) or "costly wood" (18:12; cf. also 1 Cor. 3:12). Peter talks about the "precious" blood of Christ (1 Pet. 1:19) and the "precious" promises of God's word (2 Pet. 1:4). For Paul, life had no "worth" unless he was able to complete the task the Lord had assigned to him (Acts 20:24). The author of Heb. instructs us that marriage should be held in honor by everyone (13:4).

2. (a) The negative aspect sometimes receives less stress with atimos. It can mean without honor, unhonored, less honorable (1 Cor. 12:23). In 4:10, however, the connotation is stronger and means despised.

(b) atimazō means to handle shamefully, with or without physical maltreatment: e.g., what happened to those whom the owner of the vineyard sent (Mk. 12:4; Lk. 20:11), to apostles by the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:41), and to the poor by church members (Jas. 2:6).

(c) atimia is generally translated in the NT by dishonor or disgrace, e.g., of a man's long hair (1 Cor. 11:14), of the dead body (15:43), of the apostles' "glory and dishonor" (2 Cor. 6:8), and of "ignoble" purposes for household articles (2 Tim. 2:20).

(d) None of the uses deviates from secular Gk. A deepening ethical sense can be found in Rom. 1:26, where under the OT influence atimia means "shameful."

3. (a) As in Gk. society and the OT, timē is also used in the context of the social order decreed by God. timē is respect for the standing and task of a person who has a place in God's world of human beings, animals, and things. The resultant order and grades of honor must be respected not only by the one placed lower, but also by the one placed higher. For example, while the wife is placed below her husband, she is to receive full honor from her husband (1 Pet. 3:1, 7). Elsewhere the subjection of the wife is counterbalanced by the love of the husband, which becomes a reciprocal subjection (Eph. 5:21–33; Col. 3:18–19). Things and animals have no honor. In the ancient world this was true also of slaves, because they had no right to direct their lives, though both the Stoics and the NT judge otherwise.

(b) The biblical teaching about natural relationships—e.g., man and wife, parents and children, the authorities—was developed from this. The same principle was applied to church life. Honor was to be shown the elders (1 Tim. 5:17), widows (5:3), and the responsible leaders of the congregation in general (Phil. 2:29). It is noteworthy, however, that this hierarchical line is crossed by a person offering honor to those on a lower level. Those who carry out the lowest services should be shown particular honor (1 Cor. 12:23–24); note also the admonition to show mutual honor (Rom. 12:10).

(c) Humanity's intrinsic honor is based on their position of dominion in creation (Ps. 8:5–8). To that extent it is conferred by their status in the structure. However, it is also derived from having been formed in the image of God. All humans should be honored (1 Pet. 2:17; cf. Rom. 12:10). Hence slaves were members of the church (1 Cor. 7:22–23; 12:13; Eph. 6:9), just as much as non-Israelites. In the church the restoration of the image of God has once more become universally possible (Col. 3:10–11).

(d) According to the NT, therefore, the Christian must not despise any class of humans. They must, however, be willing to bear personal dishonor. In contrast with the early Israelites, material possessions and wealth no longer constitute a basis for honor. Hence to lose things is in itself nothing to be ashamed of. Nevertheless, the NT does not reduce the ground for honor, as did the Stoics, to an inner quality, such as virtue or wisdom. Dishonor, through being despised or suffering physical violence, must be borne for the sake of love after the pattern shown by Christ (Isa. 53:3–8; Heb. 12:2; 1 Pet. 2:23–24). It is to be endured by the power of God (2 Cor. 6:7–8) and is made less bitter by the hope of eternal life and glory (1 Cor. 15:43; 2 Cor. 4:17; Heb. 12:2; 1 Pet. 1:7). All this presupposes that it is as a righteous person that one suffers shame (3:13, 17).

(e) The dishonor caused by sin, disgrace, and degradation is quite different (Rom. 1:24, 26). Sin of this kind is not regarded simply as a moral lapse. The shame lies essentially in the fact that humans have fallen from the honor given them by God in creation and have misused their bodies.

τολμάω (tolmaō), be brave, dare, risk (5528); τολμηρός (tolmēros), confident, bold, audacious (5529); τολμητής (tolmētēs), arrogant (5532).

CL & OT With a basic sense of doing or bearing that which is fearful or difficult, the vb., adj., and noun embrace the related ideas of patience, submissiveness, courage, and daring (in a good sense of brave enough and in a bad sense of rash or foolhardy). In the LXX, the vb. appears 7x (e.g., Est. 1:18; 7:5; Job 15:12), the adv. 3x (Sir. 8:15; 19:2–3), always in a negative sense

NT The single occurrence of tolmētēs is clearly in the bad sense: the "bold . . . men" of 2 Pet. 2:10 brook no restriction on self-will and recognize no authority to which they will answer. The comparative adv. in Rom. 15:15, however, is used in a good sense: Paul is confident because of God's grace in him.

The vb. swings freely between these two usages, but for the most part it moves in the realm of the moral rather than the physical. It describes the courage of Joseph in asking for the body of Jesus (Mk. 15:43), the cowardice of those who shrank from joining the early church (Acts 5:13), the moral propriety of Moses who dared not gaze on God (7:32) and of Paul as he courageously asserted his convictions in relation to Corinthian opponents (2 Cor. 10:2; cf. Jude 9), and the moral impropriety of questioning the unimpeachable evidence of the resurrection (Jn. 21:12) or of taking a fellow Christian to law (1 Cor. 6:1).

Moral and physical courage are both involved in Matt. 22:46 par., a meaning combining both "did not have the face to" and "did not have the gall to." It has the strongest sense of putting oneself at risk in Rom. 5:7, and a weak but similar sense in 15:18; 2 Cor. 10:12; 11:21, where it is little more than venture to do something.

τρεῖς (treis), three (5552); τρίς (tris), three times (5565).

NT 1. The number three is common throughout the biblical lit., but great caution is called for in evaluating significant usages. Three is a common and natural rhetorical number, and threefold repetition or grouping occurs often where the number itself is not mentioned. Many repetitive narratives and parables have three elements. Many basic concepts are readily formalized on a tripartite pattern: i.e., beginning, middle, end; past, present, future; body, soul, spirit. Diverse examples are numerous: three enduring gifts in 1 Cor. 13:13, three witnesses in 1 Jn. 5:8, and the threefold titles of Christ and God in Rev. 1:4; 4:8.

2. A period of three days is common in the OT. It is often the length of a journey or of an interlude before a crisis (cf. Gen. 30:36; 40:12–19; Exod. 3:18). Note the easy transition to the phrase "the third day" (e.g., Gen. 40:20; → tritos, 5569) and to the fuller expression "three days and three nights" (1 Sam. 30:12; Jon. 1:17). As the ancients reckoned inclusively, this may denote a period much shorter than seventy-two hours.

Some of these OT phrases are taken up significantly in the NT with reference to Jesus' death and resurrection. This is particularly striking in the allusion to Jonah (Matt. 12:40), a figure elsewhere prominent in the Gospels (Matt. 16:4; Lk. 11:29–32; see also Matt. 26:61; 27:40, 63; Mk. 8:31; 14:58; 15:29; Jn. 2:19–20).

3. Although three has widely been thought a sacred number, specifically religious uses of it in the Bible are relatively few. In the OT it is frequent in cultic contexts (e.g., Exod. 23:14, 17). In Rev. it is not as noteworthy as might be expected. Sometimes the structural pattern seven in Rev. divides into four and three (e.g., 8:13), and twelve is composed of four threes (21:13). There is, however, no reason to think that religious symbolism there attaches to three itself.

4. Yet the number three assumes peculiar importance indirectly in connection with the concept of the Trinity. There are threefold formulas listing the three persons in such passages as Matt. 28:19; Jn. 14:26; 15:26; 2 Cor. 13:14; 1 Pet. 1:2. There seems to be no precursor of this idea in any significant usage of the numerical concept in the OT, nor can we connect it with the occurrence of triads of deities in ANE paganism.

5560 τρίβολος — τρίβολος (tribolos), thistle (5560).

CL & OT 1. The root idea of this word is "three-pointed," and tribolos is first of all a weapon with three spikes, then a spiked water plant, then a similar land plant or a burr. It was metaphorically transferred to "sharp" tastes like vinegar and to sharp instruments, such as threshing machines.

2. tribolos appears in Gen. 3:18 with akantha; in 2 Sam. 12:31 "iron triboloi" are "iron picks." In Prov. 22:5 triboloi makes the path of the wicked hazardous.

NT tribolos occurs only twice in the NT. In Matt. 7:16 it illustrates consistency in nature, applied fig. to the moral life; in Heb. 6:8, an unchanged heart.

See also akantha, thorn (180); skolops, thorn (5022).

5569 τρίτος — τρίτος (tritos), third (5569).

NT 1. tritos occurs 23x in Rev., more often than any other ordinal and much more than the cardinal treis (→ 5552). In 14 cases it represents the fraction 1/3, referring to disasters in which a "third" part is destroyed (e.g., 8:10–12; cf. Ezek. 5:2, 12).

2. The uses of tritos in the Gospels and elsewhere are different. Of 25x it occurs outside Rev., 13 refer to the resurrection of Christ "on the third day." This was evidently a characteristic motif of the early Christian preaching (Acts 10:40; 1 Cor. 15:4). The Scripture to which the latter passage alludes is evidently Hos. 6:2, which speaks of the restoration of the apostate kingdom of Israel (see also tris, three, 5552).

3. In 2 Cor. 12:2 Paul speaks of "the third heaven." While some Jewish writings refer to seven heavens, the apostle here seems to suggest that he was carried to the highest heaven. In 12:4 "paradise" is linked with this heaven (→ paradeisos, 4137).

5595 (typikōs, as an example, typologically), → 5596.

τύπος (typos), form, likeness, model, type (5596); τυπικῶς (typikōs), as an example, typologically (5595); ἀντίτυπος (antitypos), copy, image, antitype (531); ὑποτύπωσις (hypotypōsis), pattern, model, example, prototype, standard (5721).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. typos refers first of all to a concrete object (e.g., the shape of a loaf, relief, coin) and then the impression of a form (i.e., what an object leaves behind when pressed against another, e.g., a trace, scar, impress of a seal, a letter of the alphabet, etc.); still more generally, it can mean a likeness (→ eikōn, image, 1635).

(b) The word is often found in the abstract sense of general form or type, such as the form of a style or a doctrine. From this follows a wider abstraction, such as the form that stamps and the form that is stamped. typos thus denotes: (i) an original, a pattern—e.g., a prototype or model, and the ethical sense of example; (ii) a copy (also antitypon).

2. In the LXX typos occurs only 4x. It Exod. 25:40 it refers to the original heavenly model for the tabernacle. In Amos 5:26 it means an image or idol, while in 3 Macc. 3:30 typos denotes the form or style of writing, and in 4 Macc. 6:19 a religio-ethical example.

3. (a) The word is a favorite of Philo, who uses it entirely in accord with cl. Gk. usage. It can denote both the original pattern as well as a copy or imitation. God conceived of the original tabernacle, which he gave as a typos or paradeigma, model, to the spirit of Moses.

(b) typos was also used among the rabbis as a loanword with the meaning, as in cl. Gk., of a form, model, and then the more general meaning of type.

NT 1. typos occurs 15x in the NT. The concrete meaning of the impression of a form is found in Jn. 20:25 for the mark of the nails in the hands of the risen Christ.

2. In Acts 23:25 typos has the abstract sense of the gist or content of a letter; in Rom. 6:17 it is the expression of teachings the Roman believers have received. In the latter reference, the original meaning of the form that stamps can still be strongly felt. The message of Christ is the factor that stamps and determines the life of the Christian.

3. The most common meaning for typos in the NT is the form that stamps. (a) The double meaning of typos as the form of both pattern and copy is found in Acts 7:43 (a quote from LXX of Amos 5:26), where it means the images of false gods, and Acts 7:44, which quotes Exod. 25:40 and denotes by typos the heavenly original, on the basis of which Moses erected the tabernacle (cf. also Heb. 8:5). The relationship of the original heavenly pattern (typos, 8:5; eikōn, 10:1) to the earthly copy (antitypon, 9:24; hypodeigma, copy, 8:5 [→ 5682]; skia, shadow, 8:5 [→ 5014]) is inserted into the scheme of the past and future blessings of salvation. Through Christ the heavenly patterns enter history and show the copies and shadows as perishable.

(b) Alongside typos and hypotypōsis, with the meaning of example, stand words such as hypodeigma or hypogrammos (example, → 5681). These latter represent Christ's ministry of self-sacrifice (Jn. 13:15) and his suffering (1 Pet. 2:21), not simply as an ethical example, but as the saving work that the community may appropriate and so use to follow Christ (cf. 2:21b). typos with the meaning example is used solely with reference to Paul (Phil. 3:17; 2 Thess. 3:9), the officials of the congregation (1 Tim. 4:12; Tit. 2:7; 1 Pet. 5:3), or the congregation itself (1 Thess. 1:7). These passages are not simply admonitions to a morally exemplary life; rather, they call for obedience to the message (2 Thess. 3:6). It stamps those who proclaim it and gives them authority. Moreover, the shaping power of a life lived under the Word has, in turn, an effect on the community (1 Thess. 1:6), causing it to become a formative example.

4. Besides this common Gk. usage, typos also appears in the NT for the first time to denote historical events. It becomes a hermeneutical concept in the interpretation of OT tradition, esp. the historical experiences of Israel, with the present eschatological event of salvation.

(a) In 1 Cor. 10:6, 11, Paul uses typos and typikōs to interpret the events in the Corinthian church in the light of Israel's experiences in the desert. The punishment of God's ancient people, which followed their disgraceful practices, prefigures judgment on those who abuse the Lord's Supper. It carries a specific warning to the "strong" at Corinth not to abuse the sacrament. The typological method developed by Paul thus consists in expounding the analogous relationship of concrete historical OT events, in the sense of the past prefiguring present or future happenings.

This introduces a vital theological concern of Paul. God's activity in history is expounded in order to show how God is bound to his promises. It is God himself who creates this "typical" relationship, insofar as his Word of revelation (the Scriptures) fulfills it (cf. Rom. 4:23–24; 1 Cor. 10:11). In this prefiguration of saving events in OT history, witness is born to the community's participation in Christ's saving work. As against some supposed metaphysical misinterpretation, salvation history is interpreted as the self-fulfilling activity of God in concrete human history.

(b) Paul's argument in Rom. 4 and Gal. 3 is also typological in this sense, although the word typos does not occur. The same typological argumentation is present in 1 Pet. 3:21. Noah's deliverance through the flood waters is a prefiguration and type of the saving event of baptism, which thus becomes the antitypon, the antitype (in the sense of being an image).

(c) The typos concept produces a tension that breaks through the typological method in Rom. 5:14. The figures of Adam and Christ are compared and contrasted in their significance and effectiveness for "all." Adam is designated a "pattern [typos] of the one to come." This gives rise to an Adam-Christ typology. But since Adam cannot really count as a faithful prefiguration of Christ, and since there is no other known occurrence of typos meaning a contrasting picture, Paul here may be using the typos concept with the precise polemical intention of rejecting a traditional Adam-Messiah typology. It is a matter of the radical abrogation of the old by the new; the new only becomes actual when the old is overcome. Paul thus shows that this paradoxical relationship of the radical opposition and yet profound association of old and new is the reality in which the community is already living in the present.

In spite of this contrasting picture, however, Paul may also be using typos to designate a parallel in overall pattern between Adam and Christ. That is, just as Adam functioned as a representative for the entire human race in his decision to eat the forbidden fruit and so involved everyone in his decision, so Jesus also functions as a representative for the entire human race in satisfying God's judgment against sin through his sacrifice on the cross, so that any who come to him may be declared righteous in God's eyes. God's principle of operation remains the same in that he works through representative people.

τυφλός (typhlos), blind (5603); τυφλόω (typhloō), to blind (5604).

CL & OT 1. typhlos means blind. It is used lit. of humans and animals and fig. of other senses and the mind. The barbaric custom of blinding for revenge or punishment is well attested.

2. Blindness has always been common in the Near East. The brightness of the sun, dust, and dirt all encourage inflammation of the eyes, which may lead to blindness. The helplessness of the blind was proverbial in the OT (Deut. 28:29; Isa. 59:10; Lam. 4:14). They were the weakest and most needy members of society (cf. 2 Sam. 5:6–9). Consequently, the blind were under the special protection of the Mosaic law (Lev. 19:14; Deut. 27:18) and are expressly mentioned in the promise of release from bondage (Jer. 31:8). The pious Israelite helped the blind (Job 29:15).

The proper functioning of the senses is a gift from God; he decides whether a person sees or is blind (Exod. 4:11). Only in Deut. 28:28–29, in the context of the curse on those who do not obey the law, is blindness mentioned as a punishment in the OT. Blindness was a cultic blemish. The blind could not function as priests (Lev. 21:18), and blind animals were not to be offered as sacrifices (22:22; Deut. 15:21).

Blindness is also used fig. in the OT. Bribes make one blind (Exod. 23:8; Deut. 16:19), so that one no longer sees injustice. God can blind the disobedient, so that they no longer see what is right and true (Isa. 6:10; 29:9–10). In 42:19 the prophet calls those who pay no attention to the word of the Lord blind (both typhos and typhloō are used) and deaf.

3. Later in Jud. blindness came to be regarded as God's punishment for human sin because it prevented study of the law. The benediction on seeing a blind man was "Blessed be the truthful Judge," which implies that the blindness was a just judgment either on the person's own sins or on those of his or her parents (cf. Jn. 9:2). The Qumran community excluded the blind and others with physical defects from their membership. There was, however, no discrimination of the blind in the Jewish synagogue.

NT 1. The view of blindness changes in the NT. Jesus received the physically blind into his fellowship and gave them a share in the kingdom of God. He instructed the man who had invited him to a meal that he should invite the poor and blind (Lk. 14:13, 21).

2. The many cases in which Jesus healed the blind were messianic signs (Matt. 9:27–31; 12:22; 15:30; 21:14; Mk. 8:22–25; 10:46–52 par.; Lk. 7:21). Thus when John the Baptist grew doubtful and sent disciples to question him, Jesus answered, among other things, "The blind receive sight" (7:22), pointing him to Isa. 29:18; 35:5. Jesus' appearance and ministry meant that the promised time of redemption had become a present reality. The new age, in which there will be no more blindness, had broken in.

When Jesus healed the man born blind (Jn. 9:1–34), he rejected the question that seemed so obvious to others: Who was responsible for his blindness? Jesus' concern was, "What is the purpose of this blindness?" In response, Jesus insisted that God's redemptive work was the ultimate factor: "Neither this man nor his parents sinned ... but this happened that the work of God might be displayed in his life" (9:3). God's work is done in this man and at the same time God reveals Jesus as the light of the world.

3. Acts 13:11 tells of a man temporarily blinded as the result of a curse. The story makes clear the superiority of the Christian servant over the heathen magician.

4. (a) Blindness is used fig. in Matt. 15:14, where Jesus calls the Pharisees "blind guides" of the blind. He is alluding to the phrase that Jews versed in the law called themselves: hodēgoi typhlōn (guides of the blind, cf. Rom. 2:19)—a title of honor. As bringers of light, they offered truth and understanding. Jesus saw these leaders differently. He felt no sympathy for them in their blindness but rather condemned them, for it showed that they had become hardened (cf. also Matt. 23:16–17, 19, 26). In fact, in Jn. 12:40 Jesus applies Isa. 6:10 to these unbelieving Jews, suggesting that God has judged them by blinding (typhloō) their eyes and deadening their hearts.

(b) Elsewhere in the NT, Paul calls the blinding of unbelievers as something that Satan, the god of this age, has done (2 Cor. 4:4). Jn. says essentially the same thing, though he writes that "the darkness has blinded" them (1 Jn. 2:11).

Υ upsilon

5614 (hybrizō, act arrogantly, ill-treat), → 5615.

ὕβρις (hybris), insolence, arrogance, insult, ill-treatment (5615); ὑβρίζω (hybrizō), act arrogantly, ill-treat (5614); ὑβριστής (hybristēs), violent, insolent man (5616); ἐνυβρίζω (enybrizō), despise, insult (1964).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hybris originally meant excess weight or power; then also ill-treatment, abuse, insult; and arrogance, insolence, brutality. The word appears objectively as an infringement of the order of justice established by Zeus, which enabled community life in the Gk. city state to be maintained. Cl. Gk. tragedy contrasted hybris to sōphrosynē, modesty (→ 5408), which respects the limits laid down for humans. Thus hybris is not, strictly speaking, directed against the gods. What the malefactor harms is good order.

2. hybris is used for various Heb. words meaning arrogance (e.g., Lev. 26:19; Job 35:12; 37:4; Prov. 8:13; 14:3; Isa. 13:11; 16:6; Ezek. 30:6, 18; Amos 6:8). It can also denote arrogant or boasting speech (Prov. 1:22; Jer. 13:17) and insolence (Prov. 11:2; 13:10; Ezek. 7:10). hybrizō is used in 2 Sam. 19:43; Isa. 13:3; 23:12; Jer. 48:29 (= LXX 31:29); 2 Macc. 14:42; 3 Macc. 6:9. hybristēs occurs 10x (e.g., Prov. 15:25; 27:13; Isa. 16:6; Sir. 8:11).

NT 1. In contrast with the OT, the abstract use of hybris in the sense of pride is absent from the NT. In 2 Cor. 12:10, it is used alongside diōgmos, persecution, so that the word clearly has in mind the action of ill-treatment (cf. Acts 27:10, 21, where it means hardship and damage caused by the elements). Paul's description of himself before Christ as a hybristēs (1 Tim. 1:13) likewise means a violent, insolent man. Similarly the vb. hybrizō regularly has the meaning of to mistreat or insult (Matt. 22:6; Lk. 11:45; 18:32; Acts 14:5; 1 Thess. 2:2).

2. In Rom. 1:30 hybristēs refers to a violent, insolent person who pays no attention to God's wrath and willingly offends his honor. Paul presents the catalog of vices listed in 1:29–31 as the outcome of idolatry and as a judgment by God (cf. 1:28).

3. The compound enhybrizō, to insult, outrage (with "the Spirit of grace" as its obj.) is used in Heb. 10:29, in parallel with katapateō, to trample underfoot (obj. "the Son of God," → peripateō, walk, 4344), and with a Gk. phrase meaning to treat as profane ("the blood of the covenant"). The author has in mind here the OT difference between deliberate and involuntary sin (12:26). Religious apostasy belongs to the former category, and it is a serious sin, even perhaps unforgivable (see 6:4–8). He explicitly alludes to Exod. 24:8; Deut. 17:2–6; 32:35–36; Isa. 26:11, arguing a fortiori from instances of judgment in the OT to the present situation of his readers.

ὑγιής (hygiēs), healthy, well (5618); ὑγιαίνω (hygiainō), make well again, cure (5617).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hygiēs means (lit.) healthy (in body), strong, active, sound; (fig.) of good understanding, sensible, shrewd, sober, of good judgment. Likewise hygiainō means to be healthy, to be of sound mind, to be shrewd or sensible. These two words (frequently in conjunction with logos) were commonly used to describe an idea or opinion as judicious, sensible, i.e., "healthy" as opposed to being false or "sick."

2. In the LXX hygiēs and hygiainō (about 50x) are used only in a direct sense (e.g., Gen. 37:14; Isa. 38:21). The vb. form hygiaine sometimes stands for the Heb. šālôm, a greeting in the sense, "Peace be to you" (e.g., 1 Sam. 25:6; 2 Sam. 20:9; cf. 2 Macc. 9:19).

NT 1. Most of the 23x in which hygiēs or hygiainō are used in the NT occur in the Gospels and Pastoral Letters. In the Gospels and Acts hygiēs and hygiainō are used primarily in the sense of healthy, well. (a) Generally the well-being is the result of a healing miracle performed by Jesus (Matt. 12:13; 15:31; Lk. 7:10; Jn. 5:9–15) or the disciples (Acts 4:10). Faith occasions the saving act and thus the healing. Note the words of Jesus in Mk. 5:34: "Daughter, your faith has healed you. Go in peace and be freed [hygiēs] from your suffering."

In all of its uses here, however, hygiēs and hygiainō do not denote merely a physically healthy condition. Those healed by Jesus are healed in their entire beings by the word of the Messiah (Jn. 7:23), i.e., are also saved from sin (cf. Lk. 5:21–25). In the healing of the lame, the blind, and the deaf (Matt. 15:31; cf. Mk. 7:37; 8:23), the promise of God's coming (Isa. 35:4–6) is fulfilled. Good health, therefore, is not the result of medical treatment but indicates a more profound healing; i.e., it is a sign that the age of salvation has dawned.

(b) As in the above passages, the use of hygiainō ("safe and sound") in Lk. 15:27 does not mean merely physical well-being (cf. 15:24). Having returned from his period of alienation and come home to his father's house, the prodigal is reinstated to his original status as son, i.e., he has now become well. In Jesus and his healing word we see the Father running to meet us and restore us to full health. Thus, when faced with objections to his mingling with the outcasts of society, Jesus justifies his mission with the aphorism: "It is not the healthy [hygiainontes] who need a doctor, but the sick" (Lk. 5:31). Jesus is probably speaking ironically here when he calls the Pharisees and teachers of the law "healthy" (cf., e.g., 5:17, 21, 30).

2. The metaphorical meaning is found in the Pastoral Letters, where hygiainō and hygiēs are characteristic terms for soundness in faith and doctrine (1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3; 2 Tim. 1:13; 4:3; Tit. 1:9, 13; 2:1–2, 8). In these letters, the word faith (pistis, → 4411) has the basic idea of a fixed body of doctrine rather than a subjective experience in the believer. Problems of heresy are to be solved by an appeal to the fixed norms of Pauline doctrine. Teachings that do not conform to the doctrinal tradition, and thus are not "healthy" or "sound," must be rejected. Hence, to be "sound in faith" (Tit. 2:2) means to hold the received apostolic doctrine as normative.

ὕδωρ (hydōr), water (5623).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hydōr designates water.

2. hydōr is used 460x in the LXX. (a) Drinking water is a vital necessity for humans and cattle, also for irrigating vegetation (cf. the high esteem of rain in Deut. 11:11; 1 Ki. 18:41–45). Water is a precious gift from Yahweh, who turned the previously dead earth into fertile land by means of surging spring water, just as the abundance of water, indicated by the four-branched river of Paradise, characterizes the orchard of Eden (Gen. 2:10–14). From the period of desert wandering Israel gratefully acknowledges Yahweh's miraculous provision of water (Exod. 17:6), which is remembered again and again in paraenesis (e.g., Deut. 8:15; Ps. 78:15–16) and songs of praise (e.g., 74:15). An abundance of sweet fresh water is of decisive significance for Israel's life in the promised land (cf. Num. 24:7; Deut. 8:7; 11:11).

(b) But hydōr is also viewed under the negative demonic aspect of something threatening. In the roar of the sea and the waves of rushing rivers, Israel discovered deadly powers that God can use when he causes the annihilating flood to cover his adversaries (cf. Gen. 6–8; Exod. 14–15; cf. Ezek. 26:19–20).

(c) Water is in the OT, as in the whole of the ancient world, the most preferable means of washing. Ablutions are part of the consecration rites for priests and Levites before entering on their vocation (Exod. 29:4; Num. 8:5–22). The high priest must wash on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:4, 24). After sexual discharge (15:1–33), after a birth (12:1–8), and after skin diseases (14:8–9), water baths erase the impurity (cf. also Num. 19:11–12). For the final future of their nation the prophets hoped for an eschatological sprinkling of God's purifying water, which would cleanse both land and people, set idolatry aside, and put a new Spirit in their hearts (Isa. 44:3; Ezek. 36:25–32; Zech. 13:1). Here water has become a picture for the Spirit of the Lord.

3. Hel. and apocalyptic Jud. continued the prophetic spiritualization of cleansing. Philo and Josephus interpreted purification by water as a symbol for the purification of the soul and the conscience. The Qumran community stressed the superiority of the converted way of life to the special water bath (1QS 3:4–12). By contrast, the Pharisees built up the OT prescriptions of Lev. 11–15 into a complicated system of ritual lustrations.

NT 1. hydōr occurs 76x in the NT, often in connection with potamos, river, or pēgē, spring (→ 4380). (a) The NT reflects the OT use of this word. Drinking water remains a highly treasured commodity (Mk. 9:41). Giving a drink to the thirsty, therefore, counts as a work of particular compassion (Matt. 25:35, 42). The use of water for secular cleaning is also attested (Lk. 7:44; cf. Jn. 13:5). The preciousness of water and its vital necessity for life suggest various pictorial uses of the word (Jn. 4:7, 13–14; Rev. 7:17).

(b) That God created water is obvious in the NT. Rev. 14:7 names the fountains of water as God's creation (cf. also the cosmology of 2 Pet. 3:5; cf. Gen. 1:2, 6, 9; Ps. 24:2). Heaven and earth derived their existence, through God's word, out of water and by water, until the then-existing world perished in the waters of the flood.

(c) As in Jud., angelic or demonic powers shelter under the waters (Rev. 16:5). The healing power of individual springs or pools is the gift of these supernatural beings (Jn. 5:4, 7). The picture of "rushing waters" is the seer's description of the numinous power of heavenly voices (Rev. 1:15; 14:2; 19:6). Peter's walk on the waters (Matt. 14:28–31) is possible only as long as he maintains faith to share in Jesus' victory over the demonic powers personified in the water and wind (14:30). By contrast, the demon throws the possessed lad into fire and water in order to injure him (17:15), and the demons plunge pigs into the water—as it were, their own particular element—drowning the animals in which they have gone to live (8:32).

2. (a) The significance of water as a Jewish means of lustration is also familiar in the NT (Jn. 2:6). Water esp. serves for the ritual washing of the hands (Mk. 7:3–4) and vessels (Matt. 23:25–26). Pilate's symbolic washing of his hands is also in keeping with OT custom (27:24–25; cf. Deut. 21:6; Ps. 26:6). The baptism of John, carried out with the water of the Jordan (Matt. 3:6, 13–17), despite its ethical intention, retains formal affinities with proselyte baptism.

(b) Whereas Jesus absolved his disciples from the Pharisaic prescription of handwashing before and after meals (Matt. 15:1–20), and even changed the water of Jewish purification into wine (Jn. 2:1–11), the baptismal practice of John the Baptist found its continuation in Christian baptism. It, too, takes place in water (Acts 8:36–39), and its effect is described as cleansing (Eph. 5:26; Heb. 10:22). The cleansed person receives God's Spirit (cf. Acts 2:38). Baptismal water is symbolized by Israel's walk through the Red Sea (1 Cor. 10:1–2) and by the Noachian flood (1 Pet. 3:20–21).

(c) Jn. sees the decisive significance of water esp. in its Christological and pneumatic aspects. Jesus washed his disciples' feet as an example for them to follow (Jn. 13:1–17). The Lamb leads us to springs of living water (Rev. 7:17), which rise from the throne of God and of the Lamb (22:1, 17; cf. 21:6). Christ pours out this water (Jn. 4:10–15; 7:37–38), which is God's Holy Spirit (7:39). For all who believe and are baptized, the river of the water of life is already flowing now—free of charge (Rev. 21:6; 22:17).

υἱός (huios), son (5626); υἱοθεσία (huiothesia), adoption (5625).

huios in General

CL & OT 1. (a) huios denotes son in the widest sense, both son of human parents and the offspring of animals and plants. huios can also mean descendant in general. Moreover, the idea of family relationship can recede completely and give way to one of relationship of interest, e.g., a teacher-pupil relationship. Closely connected with this is the fact that membership of a particular group can be expressed by the word son. Finally, huios with the gen. (cf. Heb. ben in the construct) can denote that certain things and concepts are dependent on one another and belong together (e.g., sons of light, of darkness, etc.).

(b) In ancient Gk. society, children (esp. sons) were the pride of the family. They were a welcome help at work and inherited the honor and the duties of their father. Deformed children, however (esp. girls), were sometimes left to die. Later generations with an individualistic outlook on life tended to limit the number of children.

(c) huiothesia, adoption, occurs seldom in cl. Gk.

2. (a) In the OT the child, esp. the son, was a gift of God (Gen. 1:28; Deut. 28:4–11; Ps. 127:3–5; 128:3; Isa. 54:1), although both the burden of pregnancy and the pain of childbirth were understood as God's punishment (Gen. 3:16). To have no children was a disgrace (30:1–2; 1 Sam. 1:11) and a sign of a lack of blessing (Gen. 33:5). Children needed upbringing ("discipline," Prov. 22:15), so parents were to exercise their responsibility toward their children (Deut. 6:7). For their part, children were to respect their parents (Exod. 20:12); violence against one's parents merited the death penalty (21:15). The idea of the original innocence of children, widespread among us, is foreign to the OT (Jer. 6:11; 44:7). Children were considered unwise and helpless.

(b) On the notion of the Israelites as children (sons) of God, see the section below on "ho huios tou theou, the Son of God."

NT 1. (a) huios can denote the relationship of a son (→ prōtotokos, 4758) to his father (Mk. 10:46), to his mother (Matt. 1:21), to both (Lk. 1:13), or to his physical ancestors (Matt. 1:20; Lk. 19:9). From this arises the more general meaning of descendant (Matt. 23:31).

(b) huios is used metaphorically to denote membership of a particular group of people (e.g., "heirs [lit., sons] of the prophets," Acts 3:25; "son of a Pharisee," 23:6). "Son of man" can denote membership in the human race (Mk. 3:28; Heb. 2:6; see "ho huios tou anthrōpou, the Son of Man," below). huios can denote participation in a greater whole: "children of the resurrection" (Lk. 20:36), "sons of the kingdom" (Matt. 13:38), "sons of light" (Jn. 12:36; cf. 1 Thess. 5:5), "sons of the evil one" (Matt. 13:38), "child of the devil" (Acts 13:10), and "Sons of Thunder" (Mk. 3:17).

(c) The parent-child relationship is set in a new light by Jesus' call to discipleship. On the one hand, ties of blood pale into insignificance in the light of the call (Matt. 10:37; Lk. 14:26–27) and in the events of the end time may even be transformed into enmity (Mk. 13:12). On the other hand, they regain the significance they had lost at the hands of the Pharisees (7:9–13). In the NT letters children have a place in the directions about social and family relationships (Eph. 6:1–4; Col. 3:20–21).

2. (a) Of special significance are those passages that speak of our relationship to God as his children (cf. huioi theou; huiothesia, 5x in Paul). Through the power of the Spirit, believers acknowledge God as their Father (Rom. 8:14–15). In Gal. 4:5, Paul speaks of our receiving "the full rights of sons" through adoption (cf. Eph. 1:5); this is linked with baptism in Gal. 3:26–27, though baptism in the NT is never treated as a rite separable from faith (cf. Rom. 6:3–11; Gal. 2:20; 3:5–9, 23–25).

Paul takes the idea a stage further in that he understands sonship not just as a present condition (like his predecessors) but also as the goal of hope, still to be fulfilled (Rom. 8:23; cf. also Jas. 1:18; 1 Pet. 1:23). Thus the concept takes on a peculiar double aspect. Paul places adoption as God's children within his own framework of salvation history. Those who belong to Christ by faith are "children of Abraham" (Gal. 3:7, 29), which guarantees salvation. Christians have entered into their inheritance, because they are heirs of Christ and of God (Rom. 8:17; Gal. 4:4–7).

(b) In the seventh beatitude, Jesus promises that peacemakers "will be called sons of God" (Matt. 5:9; cf. Rom. 9:26). The beatitude is all the more significant in view of the fact that throughout Matt. Jesus is called the Son of God either explicitly or by implication (see 2:15; 3:17; 4:3, 6–7; 8:9, 29; 11:25–27; 14:33; 16:16; 17:5; 21:37–38; 26:63; 27:40, 43, 54). Against this background, there is the double implication in the beatitude: Israel as such is not the son of God but only those in Israel who are peacemakers, and we may become, by being disciples of Jesus, what he is in himself.

Matt.'s use of Hos. 11:1 ("Out of Egypt I called my son," cf. Matt. 2:15) reinforces this conclusion. He sees the return of the holy family from Egypt as a fulfillment of this prophecy. This is not to be understood in the sense of a simple prediction, for Hos. is clearly talking about the exodus and not about the infant Jesus' coming from Egypt. It is, however, fulfillment in the deeper sense that Jesus, not the nation of Israel, is God's true Son and that the original event of which Hos. spoke was only a foreshadowing of an apparently insignificant event that would turn out to be the most significant event for humankind.

(c) Lk. 20:36 speaks of "children of the resurrection." The expression is a Hebraism for God's people in the hereafter. Several NT passages make the metaphor explicit by relating resurrection and rebirth. Matt. 19:28 speaks of the "renewal" or regeneration (palingenesia) "of all things," suggesting a cosmic event. The only other NT use of this word relates it to baptism and personal renewal as a present reality (Tit.

3:5), while 1 Pet. 1:3 speaks of being given "new birth into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." Here there is an element of realization in the present, and the resurrection in this instance is Christ's and not ours, but it has a future aspect (cf. 1:4, 23; 3:21–22; 5:10; cf. Col. 3:1–4).

The discussion of Jesus with Nicodemus on rebirth is usually taken to refer to present spiritual experiences, but it may well have overtones of the connection between resurrection, rebirth, and spiritual sonship. For that which is born of the flesh cannot enter the kingdom of God, but only that which is born of the Spirit (Jn. 3:5; cf. 1 Cor. 15:50). Sonship is connected with rebirth in Jn. 1:12–13 (where the Gk. word is tekna; see 5451). But Jn. prefers to keep the term Son of God for Jesus (20:31; cf. 17:1), and his stress falls on the present reality of new life (cf. 3:16–21; 15:7–8).

ho huios tou anthrōpou, the Son of Man

OT 1. The philological problem in the OT and Judaism. The antecedents of the concept ho huios tou anthrōpou are found exclusively in the OT and in Jud., esp. in apocalyptic writings; in the LXX the phrase goes back to the Heb. and Aram. words for child (huios) and for man (→ anthrōpos, 476).

(a) In biblical Heb. ʾādām or ʾenôš is a collective term for human(kind); thus an individual person is called ben ʾādām, son of a man, and a number of them are called bᵉnê ʾādām, sons of men. The use of "son of man" as an address in Ezek. is striking (ca. 90x). Here the prophet is not addressed by his own name but as an individual creature drawn from the genus human being and contrasted with God. God himself condescends to consort with his servant (cf. also Dan. 8:17).

The way in which the phrase "son of man" appears in elevated speech is thus important, esp. in parallel phrases: "God is not a man, that he should lie, nor a son of man (ben ʾādām), that he should change his mind" (Num. 23:19); "What is man (ʾenôš) that you are mindful of him, and the son of man (ben ʾādām) that you care for him?" (Ps. 8:4). The stark contrast between the God who offers reassurance and the people whom he addresses, who perish like grass, is plain in Isa. 51:12. In other words, the contrast between God and "man"/"son of man" is a definite Heb. idiom.

(b) In biblical Aram. we must note Dan. 7:13, which has become a fundamental problem in apocalyptic studies: "There before me was one like a son of man (kᵉbar ʾenāš), coming with the clouds of heaven." In contrast to the beasts that have been described previously, there comes onto the stage one who is like a son of man (i.e., a member of the genus human being).

(c) Ps. 80:8–15, with its picture of the vine and the vineyard (referring to God's dealings with Israel), is particularly important. It leads to a prayer for the king, the "man at your right hand" (cf. Ps. 110:1) and "the son of man [whom] you have raised up for yourself" (80:17–18). Here the "son of man" (ben ʾādām) is used of that specific elect man, the king.

2. The development of the tradition within apocalyptic. (a) The basic starting point for the apocalyptic tradition is the vision of Dan. 7:13–14. As the beasts are being rendered powerless, the one like a son of man ascends with the clouds of heaven to the Ancient of Days. This vision apparently refers to the theocracy of Israel, which is conscious of being fundamentally different from other kingdoms and nations. Dan. 7:18 refers to the imminent crisis of history and the transference of power to the hitherto humbled people of Israel; hence the traits of the one like a son of man are transferred to Israel itself (cf. the Qumran community, which regarded itself as the eschatological Israel and as a fellowship between saints on earth and powers in heaven).

(b) (i) The son of man appears once again as an eschatological figure, the object of the expectation of a corresponding community, in the Similitudes of 1 Enoch (37–71). The Elect One, the Righteous One, is the representative of God's righteousness and wisdom, who mediates this blessing to his community. He is "hidden before him" and exists before the creation of the world. However, he also takes on the messianic struggle with kings and powers and emerges victorious. The features of this delineation are gleaned from an exegesis of Ps. and the prophets (esp. Dan. 7:9–10).

One main question is whether Christian influence has produced this distinctive son of man tradition in 1 Enoch. While the main document can be dated somewhere between 40–38 B.C. and A.D. 70, it is entirely possible that the Similitudes were not part of the original book but a later insertion. If so, the "son of man" tradition in that portion may indeed reflect Christian thinking.

(ii) The exaltation of Enoch to be son of man and his translation to be with the Lord of spirits (70–71) is especially important. These last two chs. of the Similitudes are remarkable for the problems they present as to their relation both to one another and to the book as a whole. Enoch is greeted as the "son of man," who is born to righteousness. That is, he is invested with the eschatological function of the son of man. What we have here is an exegetical development of the Enoch tradition of Gen. 5:21–24 and the "son of man" references in Dan. 7:13. Apparently the Jewish sect represented here had a son of man tradition linked with an apocalyptic exaltation of the teacher and preacher of repentance. This has many points of contact with NT motifs.

(iii) In the Similitudes, the vision of the son of man of Dan. 7 is interpreted of a messianic figure without the phrase "son of man" becoming a messianic title. In 1 Enoch 70–71 the Enoch tradition is united with Dan. 7 to describe a representative of righteousness who bestows peace and salvation on his community.

(c) The connection of the "Apocalypse of Ezra" (2 Esd. 13) with the vision to Daniel is fundamentally different from that of the Enoch tradition, in that the destiny of the nation as a whole is more emphasized. It upholds a form of religion that is based more on the Torah (13:54). The real problem is posed by the discrepancy between the tradition and the motifs used: Son of man and messiah, apocalyptic vision and messianic expectation are joined in an unequal union, to the detriment of both elements. In apocalyptic terms the "man come up from the heart of the sea" (13:25) is described as "he whom the Most High has been keeping for many ages, who will himself deliver his creation [and] direct those who are left" (13:26, NRSV). However, messianic motifs are added: Humankind gathers to fight against the man who has risen from the sea, but unarmed he wages war with the stream of fire that issues from his lips. Then he descends from the mountain to gather a peaceable host out of the midst of the scattering or the great affliction (13:1–13). It is important to note that this "man" is at the same time the "son" or the "servant" through whom the Most High reveals himself (13:32, 37, 52). Until now he has been hidden, but when his day comes he is made manifest (13:52). This passage differs from Dan. 7 in its more fantastic imagery and the more active role given to the messianic man.

(d) It is also important to note how the "one like a son of man" and the "heavenly one" assume concrete historical features: Abel, Enoch, and Melchizedek appear in apocalyptic lit. as God's elect, who represent his righteousness and exercise his authority to judge. OT exegesis reveals their particular qualifications for this, but only Melchizedek is endowed with messianic traits (cf. Ps. 110). At Qumran, Melchizedek is thought of as a heavenly being who executes judgment on the godless. The motif of the son of man does not explicitly appear in this context, but it is clear that certain decisive functions of the Son of man can similarly be applied to angels or heavenly beings.

(e) Attempts to shed greater light on the meaning of the Son of man concept from pagan mythology have produced nothing conclusive. Almost certainly the background of the concept is to be found in the OT, where the Son of man is to be understood collectively of Israel as the heir of Adam. Although destined to rule, the Son of man undergoes loss of dominion and suffering, but he will finally be vindicated by God. Beyond that, what seems most apparent is a series of independent exegetical uses of Dan. 7 by the authors of 2 Esd. and 1 Enoch, not a continuous developing Son of man tradition.

NT 1. The designation of Jesus as the Son of Man and the oldest tradition. (a) Statements in which Jesus speaks of himself as the Son of Man indicate his possessing a certain authority (e.g., Mk. 2:1–12) or his treading a path of suffering appointed for him (e.g., 8:31–38; 9:31; 10:33–34). But we also find statements about the coming Son of Man, which reflect an apocalyptic tradition (e.g., 13:24–27; 14:62). The Gk. phrase ho huios tou anthrōpou is derived from the LXX trans. of the Aram. bar nāšā'. This shows that the Evangelists attached a messianic significance to the Gk. trans.

(b) The church fathers in general saw in the phrase ho huios tou anthrōpou a reference to Jesus' humanity. But if one goes back to the Heb. or the Aram. equivalents of this phrase, the distinctiveness of "this man" as opposed to all other humans is prominent. It is advisable neither to discard completely any connection with apocalyptic nor to concentrate exclusively on Dan. 7 or the Enoch tradition as its religio-historical provenance. Jesus seems to have put his own stamp on this expression. "Son of man" refers to a unique historical course leading from humiliation to exaltation. Undoubtedly the idea contains both the present lowliness of his being human and his striving after his vindication and authorization by God.

(c) One should never separate the "kingdom of God" sayings (including their messianic potential) from the "Son of Man" sayings. Neither set of sayings excludes the other; they stand together. Nor should one confuse the messianic motif with the idea of the Son of Man. Messianic elements concern Israel, as the OT shows, but the idea of the Son of Man concerns the fulfillment of humanity's goal. It is no coincidence that the concept of the Son of Man is not only associated with a particular, historical vocation, but also at times involves a separation from other humans.

(d) It is not a sound historical method to deny Jesus the use of the expression "the Son of Man" and to relegate this problem to later stages of the Christian community. In the Synoptic tradition the expression is used solely of Jesus by himself; it is neither a mode of address to him nor a confession of him. "Son of Man" was neither a name nor a title but the mark of a particular eschatological role. Yet there is a connection between the present sayings of Jesus (see below) and the future sayings (Mk. 8:38; Lk. 12:8 par.).

It is important to note that Jesus' path through suffering to exaltation has its parallels in the apocalyptic tradition: Abel's authority to judge (T. Ab. 13:2–3), the exaltation of Enoch, and the translation of Elijah and of the Servant of God (Isa. 53) all provide abundant fuel for the hope of being exalted by God on one's way through suffering (Lk. 22:69). Jesus thus follows the path of the Son of Man up to the Ancient of Days (Dan. 7:13) and does not come down from heaven to earth.

2. Present statements in the Synoptic Gospels. We now begin an analysis of the "Son of Man" sayings in the Gospels. (a) In Mk. 2:10 Jesus makes the claim that as "the Son of Man" he has power to forgive sins on earth; he can act with a unique authority in this eschatological hour. The phrase "the Son of Man" here also serves to bring the conflict with the hostile teachers of the law to a head. Matt. 9:8 may imply that Jesus grants a share in this "authority to men," to his community. Hence this material has a place in discussions between the Christian community and Jud.; it raises the issue whether Jesus approaches too closely to divine prerogatives.

(b) In Matt. 11:18–19 Jesus contrasts the coming of the Baptist with the coming of the "Son of Man." These two witnesses appear in different ways. The Son of Man eats bread and drinks wine (Matt. 11:19; Lk. 7:34). Note that it is not just any man who eats and drinks, but that eschatological Man sent from God; hence there can be no substitute for the phrase "the Son of Man" as a polemical designation of him.

(c) The position is complicated in Matt. 8:20. Most likely the homeless "Son of Man" means Jesus himself as he steels his disciples for discipleship and homelessness. It is a question here, not of the existence of a human being, but of the eschatological fate that characterizes the existence of the "Son of Man."

(d) While Mk. 2:27–28 could be regarded as a comment by Mk. to his readers, more likely Jesus here expresses his own authority as the leader of God's people to whom the Sabbath has been given.

(e) Matt. 16:13 ("Who do people say the Son of Man is?") gives a striking rendering of the simpler question of Jesus recorded by Mk. Here the phrase "the Son of Man" is probably a pure self-designation of Jesus that has lost any eschatological reference. At any rate, it comes remarkably close to being a periphrasis for "I."

3. Announcements of the "Son of Man's" path of suffering. It is striking how firmly rooted the idea of "the Son of Man" is in the general predictions of suffering (Mk. 8:31; 9:31; 10:33) and in the apocalyptic sayings of 9:12 and Lk. 17:25. The firm roots of the concept of "the Son of Man" here must owe something to motifs in Isa. (the "ransom" for Israel, Isa. 43:3–7; the Lord's making "his life a guilt offering," 53:10). It must be presupposed that "the Son of Man" has to contend with the opposition of his people (a tradition attached to the designation bar nāšā').

Jesus' suffering presents special problems to scholars: Did it come as a surprise when he found himself caught up without warning in conflict and suffering in Jerusalem? Or did Jesus deliberately enter on the course of suffering laid on him by his Father? If, as seems likely, the second is the case, then the conflict that awaited him and the suffering enjoined on him must be exegetically substantiated.

(a) Mk. 9:31 betrays an Aram. or Heb. play on words ("Son of Man ... men"), which can certainly be traced back to Jesus himself. God himself consigned him (the Son of Man) into the hands of men (cf. Lk. 9:44). While this text only mentions his being "betrayed into the hands of men "(without his being killed), it is probable that we have to do with a twofold utterance: God gave him up—men delivered him over to death.

(b) Mk. 8:31; 9:12; Lk. 17:25 record another "Son of Man" saying that, on the one hand, speaks of the divine decree (dei, must, Mk. 8:31; Lk. 17:25) and, on the other, emphasizes the combination of "suffer many things and be rejected by the elders, chief priests and teachers of the law" (Mk. 8:31, alluding to rejection by the "builders" of Ps. 118:22).

The OT conceived of the life of the "righteous" or of the "Servant of God" (Isa. 53:8, 10; Wis. 2:17, 20) as ending not in suffering but in an eschatological answer from God. The righteous will be raised up (Deut. 18:15) or exalted (Isa. 52:13). In order to understand Jesus we must, as far as possible, look for the Heb. or Aram. equivalents.

(c) Lk. 22:21–23 and 48 stand out among Jesus' prophetic announcements of suffering. Behind both passages we must assume an Aram. or Heb. version that emphasized betrayal by the table companion or "friend." The phrase "Son of Man" gives these words a solemn and emphatic ring; they point to the most abject humiliation possible in the area of human trust and friendship.

(d) In interpreting Mk. 10:45, we must bear in mind its close relationship to Lk. 22:27. These texts emphasize Jesus' service and point out in context how two elements of service and the surrender of one's life should be normative for discipleship. God is the pattern, for he himself serves his people instead of making them serve him (Isa. 43:22–24); neither must we discount the reference here to the Servant of God who surrendered up his life in death (53:12).

4. The resumption of the apocalyptic "Son of Man" tradition. (a) In some respects the distinction between the self-authenticating "I" and the corresponding apocalyptic "Son of Man" in Matt. 10:32–33; Mk. 8:38; Lk. 12:8–9 spans the present and the future statements. This presupposes the creation of a community that is subject to the prophetic law of discipleship. The earthly event is determinative for the future of those who confess and those who deny. The "Son of Man" is a future entity that is taken for granted as an object of confession. The disciples here are faced with afflictions that call for uncompromising resolution. Jesus himself takes part in this affliction and faces each individual disciple with a decision.

(b) Matt. 10:23, which goes closely with 10:5–6, has to do with a persecution of Jesus' followers within Palestine. Nevertheless, the mission must be confined to the cities of Israel, and no mission to Hel. settlements is anticipated. These texts offer consolation to Jesus' disciples in a time of eschatological persecution.

(c) Lk. 18:8 forms the conclusion to a parable and asks the question: "When the Son of Man comes, will he find faith [faithfulness] on the earth?" That is, will the covenant the Son of Man has made with his own people be preserved in faithfulness, harmony, and humility? In one tradition, Abraham sees the sins on the earth and has power to execute judgment; still, he cannot exercise it, lest he destroy the creation (cf. T. Ab. 12). So it seems that, according to one Jewish view, each generation had one "righteous one" to whose lot it fell to decide their fate. We should note perhaps how close this perspective is to the parable of Lk. 12:36: If the master comes and knocks, he wants to find his servants keeping watch.

(d) The paraenetic warning of Lk. 21:36 reveals the "Son of Man" as an eschatological figure possessing full authority to judge. To be sure, the material of 18:8 and 21:36 could derive from Jesus, though some scholars see them as coming from the tradition of the community like that which developed 1 Enoch (see above).

(e) Jesus' saying during his trial ("From now on, the Son of Man will be seated at the right hand of the mighty God," Lk. 22:69) bears relationship to the apocalyptic "Son of Man," like the righteous people of the old covenant (Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Melchizedek), exalted to be with God. He is the righteous one of the end times and the last in the series of witnesses.

(f) As to other occurrences of the phrase "Son of Man" in the Synoptics, in some cases the usage may be due to the work of the Gospel writers. Matt. 13:37–43 is generally thought to be Matt.'s own interpretation of the parable of the weeds. In addition, in 16:28 Matt. seems to have rephrased the difficult saying in Mk. 9:1 in order to clarify it for his readers. In Lk. 6:22, where Jesus speaks of the possibility of persecution "because of the Son of Man," the Matthean parallel offers "because of me" (Matt. 5:11); presumably Lk. has retained the original form of a statement in which Jesus referred to himself as a figure of rejection and called his disciples to be ready to face the same fate.

The saying about blasphemy and the Son of Man (Matt. 12:31–32; Lk. 12:10; cf. Mk. 3:28–29) is particularly difficult to understand (→ diabolos, 1333). In Mk., Jesus in effect says that humans can be forgiven every sin except blasphemy against the Spirit, whose power is displayed in the gracious acts of Jesus. In Lk. 12:10, blasphemy against the Son of Man (Jesus) is excusable, but not deliberate blasphemy against the manifest activity of the Spirit. This saying stands in tension with 12:8–9, where the Son of Man is a glorious figure who could hardly be blasphemed with impunity; perhaps the sayings were spoken on different occasions.

Lk. 19:10 adds to the picture of the present authority of the Son of Man by assigning to him the task of a shepherd who seeks out and rescues the lost sheep (cf. Matt. 18:11, NIV note). Other sayings refer to the Son of Man's activity in the future (i.e., from the temporal standpoint of Jesus). The saying comparing the Son of Man with Jonah (Matt. 12:39–40; Lk. 11:29–30) should probably be taken as a comparison between Jonah's miraculous deliverance from death and God's vindication of Jesus by raising him from the dead (as Matt. makes explicit).

Matt. 24:37–44 and Lk. 17:22–37 contain references to the day or the coming of the Son of Man, which is compared to the flood and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, both of which came unawares on those who failed to prepare themselves for what lay ahead. Yet Jesus' disciples should not be unprepared. They will be longing for the consummation (17:22), and it should be clearly recognizable when it comes. Still, there is the danger of being misled by false prophets or of growing weary in waiting, so the disciples must be vigilant and not diverted by worldly concerns.

The expectation of the coming of the Son of Man, presupposed in these sayings, finds expression in the apocalyptic tradition, particularly in Dan. 7:13. Clear references to this text are to be found in Mk. 13:26 and 14:62; the latter text combines Ps. 110:1 and Dan. 7:13 in order to depict the vindication of the Son of Man by God and his coming to judgment (there may also be some influence from Zech. 12:10). In Mk. 14:62 the point of the saying is to show how Jesus reinterprets messiahship in terms of the Son of Man of Dan. 7:13 (cf. Mk. 8:29–31). In 13:26 the coming of the Son of Man is associated with the gathering of God's people and their deliverance from earthly tribulation.

(g) Two things are clear in the light of the Synoptic material: (i) We must not interpret the concept of "Son of Man" in too narrow a Christological sense; rather, it serves to establish the eschatological righteousness. (ii) Early Christian teachers and prophets have worked out various patterns in which the "Son of Man" plays a role. Hence, Dan. 7 is not the only decisive factor in determining the significance of these texts.

5. The Son of Man in the Fourth Gospel. (a) Jn.'s Gospel, one of the last books of the NT to be written, seems to reflect a development in Son of Man theology. This development should be regarded not only as the expression of a certain ideology but also as the result of the church's internal and external struggles. This Gospel presents Jesus as the one who is "sent" from heaven and who represents God as both the "Son of God" and the "Son of Man."

As far as tradition is concerned, Jn. 13:16, 20 uses Synoptic material (Matt. 10:24, 40). Both verses speak of the execution of a commission that comes from God. Even the predicate granted to Jesus, "Son of God," is guarded from blasphemous claims by the reference to the OT tradition about such commissions (Jn. 10:34–36; cf. Ps. 82:3, 6).

(b) The concept of the "Son of Man" contains apocalyptic elements, but it itself is given a kerygmatic revaluation. God's commission determines his "descent" and "ascent" (Jn. 3:13, 31; 6:62). This sending determines his "way" and forms the destiny of him who, at the commission of the one who sent him, goes along this way himself and takes others with him along it. The apocalyptists spoke of a journey to heaven and the gnostics of an ascent into the heavenly world; for Jn., however, the decisive question is who gives true testimony, who is authorized to bring this message, and who has the right to be exalted to be with God. The "ascent" corresponds to being exalted, the "descent" to the incarnation (cf. Jn. 3:13 with 3:14; also 1:14; → hypsoō, 5738). That Jesus has come into the flesh (1 Jn. 4:1–3; 2 Jn. 7) are anti-gnostic confessions that emphasize the unique nature of Jesus' sending. The Johannine concept of the "Son of Man" is thus seen to be a theological testimony of Jesus to himself.

The promise of Jn. 1:51 has an early Jewish-Christian sound; it recalls the story of Jacob (Gen. 28:10–17). Rab. tradition took the words "angels of God were ascending and descending on it" to refer either to the ladder or to Jacob himself. Now the Son of Man replaces the ladder, as Jn. apparently sees the Son of Man as replacing Jacob: Either Jacob becomes an eschatological symbol for the Son of Man or the Son of Man is identified with the true Israel. In the history of salvation, the Son of Man embraces the earthly Israel and now represents it.

(c) Jn. 5:27 tells us that the Father gave the Son authority to execute judgment because he is "the Son of Man" (the absence of the article here reflects proper Gk. grammar). It is an open question whether this text refers to the unique human existence of Jesus or to the rank referred to in Dan. 7:10, 14. Perhaps T. Ab. is connected with this material, for there it is explicitly denied that God himself judges, on the grounds that humans should be judged by humans (13:3). This is to be understood in the light of the idea that certain righteous men are chosen as judges.

(d) The heavenly messenger of Jn. is the counterpart of Moses. This Gospel is interested in Jesus' commission and authority, not in the idea of revelation. As the one who comes from heaven, he surpasses Moses (Jn. 1:17; 5:45). It was Moses who ascended and descended when he came from Sinai (Exod. 24:12; 34:29). Jesus ascended and descended in another way, and so bore another glory than that of Moses. The antithesis of Moses and Jesus contains a polemic against the rab. concept of salvation.

This antithesis is particularly clear in the passage on the bread from heaven in Jn. 6. This section contains three "Son of Man" sayings, which reveal the structural division of the passage (6:27, 53, 62); the authority of the Son of Man is made explicit in 6:27b. The dualistic predicates, "heavenly/earthly" or "imperishable/destined to perish," mold the figure of the messenger and his gifts. There is a radical change in the eschatological way of thinking, for Christ as the heavenly messenger, the Son of Man, imparts abiding food, which brings eternal life. His message is true.

(e) With the words "I am" (esp. Jn. 8:58), the heavenly messenger announces himself in the manner of the OT God (cf. Exod. 3:14; Isa. 43:25). As God's representative, the Son of Man assumes the attributes of God and Yahweh. His path is a unique part of the course of salvation history; gradually we will recognize the truth (Jn. 3:14; 8:28; 12:23; 13:31). This process, which is rooted in history and yet molds history anew, depends on the idea of the Son of Man. As far as the unbelieving crowd is concerned, a claim to messianic status and the raising up of the Son of Man seem to be mutually exclusive (12:34). Jn., however, knows that that which "abides" and the process of salvation history are not mutually exclusive, but rather presuppose each other.

(f) The Son of Man sayings in Jn. pose various problems when they are considered in relation to the Synoptic tradition. At several points the title is used in the same way as in the other Gospels with reference to Jesus' death and exaltation (Jn. 3:14; 8:28; 12:23, 34; 13:31–32) and to his activity as judge (5:27; cf. 9:35–39). But the vocabulary with which these statements are expressed differs. Jesus is to be "lifted up" on the cross, a word that refers both to his being physically lifted up to die and to his being "exalted" by God in his death and in his resurrection. As the Son of Man who died on the cross, Jesus is the source of eternal life (6:27, 53).

Other passages, however, emphasize that the Son of Man came down from heaven (Jn. 3:13; 6:62); this thought of preexistence is absent from the Synoptic sayings, and it raises the question whether or not Johannine thought has been influenced from other directions. Though some writers have related this concept to gnostic speculation, it is important to note that the materials for the Johannine picture of the Son of Man can largely be found in the OT and the Christian tradition. (i) "Son of Man" is a title of majesty in Dan. 7 and the Synoptic Gospels. (ii) The descent of the Son of Man is probably implicit in Dan. 7. (iii) Jn.'s description of the exaltation of the Son of Man is presented in terms of the Servant of Yahweh (Isa. 52:13) and in light of the resurrection. (iv) Jn. emphasizes the present anticipatory fulfillment of eschatological expectations. These four elements largely account for the distinctive Johannine use of the title.

6. The concept of the "Son of Man" in the rest of the NT. (a) In the Pauline tradition we find the idea of "the man from heaven" as the antitype of the "earthly man" (1 Cor. 15:47–48) or, exegetically, the "last Adam" as the antitype of the "first Adam" (15:45). Perhaps here also, as was the case with the Son of Man idea, an originally apocalyptic and temporal concept has been adapted to the form of a doctrine of salvation based on the figure of the anthrōpos. We can detect traces of the older apocalyptic Son of Man tradition in the use of Ps. 8:6 in 1 Cor. 15:27. Yet note how Paul avoids this apocalyptic idea amidst his Hel. surroundings. He is concerned rather to set the new humanity in their setting within the saving event rather than under sin and death (cf. also Rom. 5:12–21). His view of history here takes on metaphysical and ontic features.

(b) Heb. 2:6–10 uses Ps. 8:4–6 to prove that "man" and "son of man" must undergo a process in the history of salvation before they can reign over the world to come. The connection of "man" and "son of man" is necessary here; it points to the various stages of Jesus' life and thus emphasizes that his final goal has not yet been reached (Heb. 2:8). As in Jn. 1:51, "son of man" here embraces the community of believers.

Heb. 2:5–9 provides the first evidence of the dissolution of the connection between the Messiah and angelic powers, which had developed in apocalyptic. That is, the Son of Man and humankind are in salvation history, but are on a different level than the angels. New light is also shed on Ps. 8:5–7. A statement in the OT that delimited the dignity of creaturely humanity by reference to God's creative power here refers to the glory that is paradoxically ascribed to the One who is humiliated.

(c) Although the Son of Man idea is firmly entrenched in Lk.'s Gospel in sayings about judgment and the Parousia, the same is not true of the corresponding sayings in Acts. Hence, Stephen's testimony in Acts 7:56, that the Son of Man is standing (not sitting) at God's right hand is all the more notable. It clearly shows that in Hel. circles the idea of the Son of Man was also interpreted in apocalyptic terms.

Five ways of interpreting Acts 7:56 have been offered: (1) Jesus stood to receive Stephen into heavenly glory; (2) Jesus stood up as Stephen's advocate or witness in the heavenly court (cf. Lk. 12:8); (3) Jesus stood up to take possession of his messianic inheritance; (4) Jesus was originally thought of as standing (just like the angels) before God; or (5) Jesus stood up, as God stands up, to face his enemies (cf. Ps. 3:7; 7:6; Isa. 14:22).

(d) The linguistic usage of Rev. 1:13; 14:14 reveals affinities to Dan. 7:13. Both passages speak of "one like a son of man" walking ("among the lampstands") or sitting on the clouds of heaven. Note too how Rev. differs from the Gospels in leaving out the article. This is apparently an imitation of the text of Dan. 7:13: The apocalyptic "son of man" is the figure found already in Dan. 7:13, but now as a glorified ruler and judge. He is in all respects like an angel (Dan. 10:5; cf. Rev. 1:13; 14:15).

ho huios tou theou, the Son of God

CL 1. In cl. Gk. huios is found in references to "sons of Zeus" and of other gods. Ancient Gk. mythology portrayed the world of the gods as one great family. Zeus is the "father of men and gods," and it was thought obvious that gods should cohabit with mortal women and thus produce children.

2. Even more important was the Egyptian ruler-cult, which influenced Alexander the Great. He was hailed in the Libyan desert as "son of Ammon," or, in Gk. terms, "son of Zeus." His successors, esp. the Ptolemies, adopted the Gk. version of that title. Under the Roman Empire, the idea of the son of God spread everywhere, but it now had its foundation in Roman political theory. After Caesar had been murdered in 44 B.C. and been declared divine, Octavian let it be known that, on the basis of his adoption in 45 B.C., he was divi filius, son of the divine. This nomenclature slowly established itself as that part of the name that indicated the genealogical succession. That remained true of all the emperors.

3. Particular guilds boasted of an attachment to a particular god and could thus call themselves huioi, sons, or paides tou theou, children of the god (e.g., doctors are "sons of the god" Asclepius). It was particularly easy for the Stoics to think of humans as children of gods, for they upheld the ultimate unity of God and humankind. A characteristic expression of Stoic thinking is the possibility of realizing the freedom and bliss offered by Zeus. It spoke of a world order and its destruction; the Christian message spoke of the woe that had come upon humanity and the world, and of redemption from it.

4. A separate problem involves the use of theios or theos to describe men whose acts or endowment surpass those of normal men. This is especially true of poets or seers, but also of commanders like Lysander, whose divine charisma or divine qualities were celebrated. Legends thus came to surround the births of famous men. Apollonius of Tyana in particular was furnished with all the characteristics of a divine endowment, and divine sonship also seems to have been part of this endowment.

5. Nevertheless, the significance of the Gk. and Hel. background for the NT should not be overestimated. Naturally, early Christian thinkers could not help being influenced by their Hel. environment, but it was primarily their OT and Jewish environment that provided them with the concepts and vocabulary with which to develop their understanding of the person of Jesus. Most admit that the use of theios with people endowed with superhuman qualities carries no essential relationship to the concept of Jesus as the Son of God.

OT 1. Israel and sonship. A foundational element of the OT tradition is that Israel has been chosen (→ eklegomai, 1721) and so is in a position of sonship. This gives expression, on the one hand, to the subordination of the son and the legal claim of God as Father (→ patēr, 4252) (Mal. 1:6), and on the other hand, to the care and love extended to Israel as God's "firstborn son" (Exod. 4:22–23; Jer. 31:9). Only in this context do the prophets' messages of judgment and the recognition of God's chastisements make sense. Israel provides a historical pattern for election and for a concept of sonship that is not interpreted in purely natural categories.

Yet we must not forget that Gen. 6:2, 4 speaks of "sons of God" who took to themselves "daughters of men" and fathered the "Nephilim" (cf. also heavenly "sons of God" in Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; Ps. 29:1; 82:6; 89:7). Here is evidence of the pictorial idea of a heavenly court. However, the idea of "sons of God" is replaced by other phrases, such as "sons of heaven," "holy ones of heaven." Human instruction in all art and science is traced back to the angels (1 Enoch 6–8). Their fall is the real disaster of history.

2. The king as God's son. Decisive for the later messianic hope (→ Christos, 5986) is Nathan's prophecy in 2 Sam. 7:12–16: God will establish a house and eternal kingdom for David. God will be a father to David's son, who will be a son to God. The dynastic changes within the house of David were thus authorized by the divine legitimation of the succession. The original covenant between the people and their king was replaced by one that God himself gave, which was between him and the royal house.

Ps. 89 takes up this divine legitimation, to which the psalmist appeals in interceding for the king, the firstborn, the most exalted of the kings born on earth (89:27–28). There was also a coronation ritual based on 2 Sam. 7:12–16, and the king could begin his rule only after Yahweh had recognized the king as his son (Ps. 2:7) and invested him with the royal crown (2 Ki. 11:12; Ps. 21:3) and scepter (110:2). The shout of joy in Isa. 9:6 ("To us a child is born, to us a son is given") perhaps arose out of the divine formula of acknowledgment (cf. Ps. 2:7).

Isa. 9:2–7; 11:1–9 describe the enthronement of the coming king of salvation and the equipment of the new shoot of David's line with the gifts of the Spirit of God. At his exaltation to sonship, he receives names that promise salvation and describe its constituents. The king is none other than God's representative on earth. With his coming, humanity's history of woe is at an end; he will bring salvation to the whole world.

3. The special effects of these OT beginnings in later Judaism. (a) The description of the eschatological event put on God's lips in Jub. 1:22–25 presupposes Israel's apostasy; his people return in all sincerity, with wholehearted heart and soul. God himself circumcises their hearts and bestows upon them a holy spirit. "I will be your father and you will be my children. And they all will be called children of the living God, and all angels and spirits will know, yes, they will know that they are my children and I am their father in truth and in righteousness, and that I love them" (cf. 2:20; 19:29).

In Qumran this eschatological process is given a distinctive form. Specifically, attachment to the community of the elect is described as sonship (sons of light: 1QS 1:9; 2:16; sons of favor: 1QH 4:32–33; son of grace: 7:20). In Israel the returning and transformation of God's people take place in a community that claims for itself the fulfillment of OT promises.

In 2 Esd. 7:28–29; 13:32, 37, 52; 14:9 we find the phrase "my son," which can be traced back to a Gk. pais (→ 4090) or Heb. ʿebed tradition. These references fit in with Ps. 2:7; Isa. 11; their main emphasis is on the apocalyptic struggle with the nations.

(b) The Jewish wisdom tradition places great value on the life of the individual righteous person. Sir. 4:1–10 (Heb. text) concludes with the promise, "and God will call you his son, and he will be gracious to you and rescue you from the pit." The picture of the righteous person also lies behind Wis. 2:13–18. He claims a special knowledge of God and calls himself God's child and God his Father. His way of life is different from that of others, and he can be regarded as God's servant in the sense of Isa. 53. In 5:5 the righteous one is reckoned among God's children and receives a portion among the saints (cf. Isa. 53:12; Dan. 7:18).

(c) Hel. Jud. held fast to God as Creator and Father and saw in history the evidence of his providence, goodness, and righteousness. Josephus believed, for example, that God was "Father of all," i.e., he did not recognize any people as being God's sons in a special way. He did see the patriarchs as arising from God himself, as examples of his special working.

Philo was definitely interested in philosophical and exegetical problems, to which he gave a speculative interpretation. In his thinking, for example, the Logos is the oldest son of God and the cosmos the youngest. Abraham is not only God's friend, from whom nothing is hidden, but also God's child (huios). He is of noble birth because he has chosen God as his Father and is the only one to have been adopted by him as son.

NT 1. (a) The early Christian confession of Jesus as Son of God is in fundamental agreement with Jesus' manner of addressing God (Aram. ʾabbāʾ, Father; Mk. 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6; → proseuchomai, 4667). It is something new when Jesus addresses God as "my Father"; this mode of address in prayer derives from the language of the family circle. Thus, understandably, Jesus speaks of himself as the "Son" and claims for himself a special knowledge of the Father (Matt. 11:27; Lk. 10:22). These statements involve election, knowledge, and revelation.

(b) "Son of God" is the essential confessional phrase of early Christianity. It is firmly rooted in baptism, preaching, and confessions (Acts 9:20; 13:33; Rom. 1:3–4) and points back to the founding of the community and the Easter event. Its close connection with the confession of Jesus as Messiah suggests that this sonship refers back to 2 Sam. 7:12, 14. Thus, the messianic element in Jesus' preaching is traceable back to the Davidic tradition.

On the other hand, Lk. 4:18–19 (cf. Isa. 61:1–2) shows that the messianic element in Jesus' message is also related to a special endowment with the Spirit. This tradition is associated with Ps. 2 and Isa. 11:1–10, two texts that left their mark on the preaching of the Baptist. The gifts of the Spirit have an immediate point of contact with 11:2: The Messiah is fully endowed with God's Spirit. Then the tradition divides: (1) The Messiah will judge by the breath of his mouth or by fire (11:4); (2) Jesus conceived of himself as God's Servant, on whom the Spirit of the Lord rests (in the sense of 42:1; 61:1–2).

Both the messianic and the adoptionist element of Ps. 2:7 and the tradition in Isa. 42:1; 61:1–2 concerning the Servant and the Spirit is important in NT Christology. Jesus is "Son" in his unique relation to God and his unique life of prayer; he is the Servant of God as the bearer of the message of the heavenly voice that called him. Both concepts designate a function and a task, a being in the presence of God.

2. The concept of sonship in the tradition of Matt. 11:25–27; Lk. 10:21–22. In Matt. 11:25–27; Lk. 10:21–22 we have a thanksgiving prayer of Jesus that consists of praise and a word of revelation. The middle section (Matt. 11:27; Lk. 10:22) suggests that the Father has handed over to the Son the full revelation that just as only a father really knows his son, so only a son really knows his father. That is, the Son alone is in the position to mediate this knowledge to others. The logion has its parallels in apocalyptic (Dan. 2:20–23; 1QS 11:15–20).

The content of this logion is Sem. The knowledge it presupposes is neither speculative nor mystic but personal. Note too the use of parallel clauses to express a reciprocal relationship; Sem. languages lack the reciprocal pronoun, "one another." The conceptual background can be found in Jewish wisdom teaching, which in turn is based on the OT (cf. Exod. 33:12–13; Job 28:25–28; Prov. 8:22–30; Sir. 1:1–10; Wis. 8:3–4). The saying grounds Jesus' right to be the mediator of knowledge of God to humanity in the exclusive relationship that a son has with his father, and thus implicitly Jesus claims a unique filial status. It fits in well with Jesus' other references to God as his Father.

The evidence for Jesus' own use of the specific term "Son" is comparatively small (mainly Matt. 11:27 par.). The title is generally found in statements addressed by others to Jesus, such as the heavenly voice (Mk. 1:11; 9:7) and evil powers (Matt. 4:3, 6; Mk. 3:11; 5:7). In the temptation story, Jesus refuses to misuse his relationship with God for his own ends.

3. The voice at Jesus' baptism (Mk. 1:11 par.; Lk. 3:22). The words of God recorded in all the Gospels in their accounts of the baptism (Mk. 1:11 par.) seem to form the real source of all the statements about the Son, the Servant, the Beloved, or the Elect One. Here Jesus was being called, chosen, and selected for a special task. It is important that the heavenly voice is associated with the gift of the Spirit. If the ʿebed tradition is present here, then the Heb. ʿebed in Isa. 42:1 is represented by huios, and bāḥîr by agapētos, beloved (note, however, that the LXX of 42:1 has pais, servant, child, and eklektos, elect one; → eklegomai, 1721). Jesus' baptism was a token of his death, which he undertook for the sins of the whole nation.

At the same time, we should not forget that also behind the baptism saying is Ps. 2:7 (see also Acts 13:33; Heb. 1:5), which favors the Son tradition. From the beginning the text confirmed God's recognition of Jesus as his Son as well as his Servant.

4. The parable of the wicked tenants (Mk. 12:1–12 par.). This parable acknowledges the appearance of the Son in contrast to the earlier sending of servants (the prophets). After sending several, the owner sends his son to the rebellious tenants. But their resistance is stiffened; they seize the son, kill him, and throw him out of the vineyard. Since the servants' commission was indistinguishable from that of the son, the parable's meaning undoubtedly lies in the extreme crisis of the historical situation when Jesus first told the parable, though Jesus also undoubtedly had a deeper meaning in mind.

Jesus' day saw the revolutionary temper of the Galilean peasants towards their foreign landlords (note that the owner lived abroad). The tenants had in mind the legal enactment that, under certain conditions, the estate of a deceased man was regarded as property without an owner, which anyone might appropriate; hence those who first seized possession had the prior claim. Jesus was contending against the tenants of the vineyard and the leaders of the nation, saying that they had again and again acted rebelliously against God and were even rejecting the final messenger of God.

5. Jesus' birth stories (Matt. 1:18–2:18; Lk. 2:1–20). Though Lk. refers to Jesus as "Son of the Most High," he concentrates on Jesus as the son of David, fulfilling 2 Sam. 7:12–16 (Lk. 1:32–33). Matt. calls the messianic child the "Son of God," quoting Hos. 11:1 (Matt. 2:15). The Redeemer, as a second Moses, must come out of Egypt (→ plēroō, 4444). Both Matt. and Lk. introduce the idea of Jesus' divine sonship with his being begotten (→ gennaō, 1164) by God without any earthly father.

6. Pre-Pauline traditions and the Pauline message. We must distinguish between the "Son of God" preexisting formulas that Paul quotes or adopts (Rom. 1:4; 8:3, 32; Gal. 2:20; 4:4–5; 1 Thess. 1:10) and his own formulations (Rom. 1:3, 9; 5:10; 8:29; 1 Cor. 1:9; 15:28; 2 Cor. 1:19; Gal. 1:16; 4:6). Statements involving "Christ" or "Lord" (kyrios) predominate. Still, the Son statements imply Jesus' legitimation, his relation to God, and his representation of God as his envoy. Behind these statements is the OT and Jewish background of the "Son" as the one who carried out the divine purpose.

(a) The twofold statement of Rom. 1:3–4 speaks of an enthronement and presupposes Ps. 2:7 and 110:1. Resurrection and enthronement thus coincide in history. Both forms of existence mentioned in this text, "descendant [son] of David" and "Son of God," describe life on earth and in heaven; the second form transcends the first.

(b) The statements about the sending of Jesus in Rom. 8:3 and Gal. 4:4–5 also seem to be pre-Pauline. One can discern here a formal scheme that can also be detected in the Johannine lit., although in a modified form (Jn. 3:17; 1 Jn. 4:9, 10, 14). The subsequent final clauses (hina, so that) specify the main purpose of the sending. Behind this lies the coming messenger who will surpass Moses (Deut. 18:15; Jn. 17:3).

(c) The delivering up of the Son (Rom. 4:25; 8:32; → paradidōmi, 4140) probably also belongs to pre-Pauline material. paradidōmi in this context may well be interpreted on the basis of the Passion story as an alternate sending formula ("deliver" meaning "send"). The example of Abraham, the patriarch who did not withhold his son (Gen. 22:12, 16), may also have played a part here. We have here a kērygma still influenced by Sem. ideas of the rights of a messenger. It is concerned with God's decisive action as he commissions and authorizes his Son to suffer—an expression of his fatherly love.

(d) The summary of the old Gentile-Christian kērygma in 1 Thess. 1:9b–10 also appears to be pre-Pauline. It is probably built on a call to repentance and an expectation of salvation; it recalls elements of the Baptist's preaching of impending wrath (Matt. 3:7; cf. Rom. 5:9). The resurrection serves as a pledge of future salvation.

(e) Pre-Pauline material is likewise found in 1 Cor. 15:23–28. Passages such as Ps. 8:6 and 110:1 form the basis of the Christological affirmations here. The absolute use of "the Son" is key, as is his assumption of features that elsewhere are attributed to "son of man" (cf. Ps. 8). What is important here is the Son's obedience towards the "Father."

(f) These pre-Pauline statements concerning the Son of God lead us not only to the heart of old creedal formulations but also to the kērygma of the Christian mission in the Diaspora. Paul himself not only handed down earlier statements but also gave them a soteriological interpretation and subordinated them to his preaching of the cross.

(g) The only two references to the Son in Acts (9:20; 13:33 [Ps. 2:7 LXX]) both associate the term with the preaching of Paul. Clearly Lk. regarded it as distinctive of Paul's Christology. Paul used it to climax his theological statements and to demonstrate the close bond between Jesus and God in virtue of which Jesus is the mediator of salvation. Thus it is the Son who is the theme of the gospel (cf. Rom. 1:3, 9), and it is by means of this title that Paul emphasizes the supreme value of the death of the one who stood closest to God as the means of reconciling humankind with God (5:10; 8:32; Gal. 2:20; Col. 1:13–14). Note that for Paul Jesus was God's Son during his earthly life, and that it was as God's Son that he died. Consequently, Jesus did not cease to be divine in his earthly existence, and his self-emptying cannot mean that he gave up his divine nature to assume human nature (cf. Phil. 2:5–8).

It is, then, all the more remarkable that Paul can speak of Christians as the "sons of God" (Rom. 8:14, 19; 9:26; 2 Cor. 6:18; Gal. 3:26; 4:6–7) and claim that their destiny is conformity to the likeness of God's Son (Rom. 8:29). They are to share the glory of the exalted Son and must pattern their lives on his holy, sinless life.

7. The Son of God in the Johannine literature. The statements about the Son of God in Johannine lit., esp. in the letters, are important. In the Fourth Gospel, the sending of Jesus is a firm foundation for the doctrine of salvation. One believes and recognizes God and him whom he has sent (Jn. 17:3; cf. Num. 16:28). This statement about his being sent has its explicit purpose in showing Jesus' status as God's Son. It is a matter of God's decisive act in commissioning and authorizing his Son—but the Son therefore makes the same claims and has the same rights as the Father (Jn. 5:23).

(a) Jn. 3:35 describes the Son's authority to teach and to act. The Father loves him (i.e., chooses him) and has placed all things in his hands. This authority (→ exousia, 2026) belongs to one who is commissioned and executes justice. The Son can do nothing by himself but always looks at what the Father is doing (5:19; 7:18). His work is the execution of a commission from which he does not deviate in the least. The authority of the Father is, on the one hand, a once-for-all act in the past and, on the other hand, a continuous activity in the present; the main emphasis lies on the latter, for Jn. 6:40 expressly says that God's purpose is to draw all humanity into an encounter with the Son and so to faith. Only thus is true life achieved.

(b) Jn. reflects the early church's baptismal confession that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (Jn. 20:31; cf. Acts 8:37 in NIV note). This baptismal confession is also in view when Jn. speaks of faith "in the name of God's one and only Son" (Jn. 3:18; cf. 1:12). Part of faith is the deliberate saying of Jesus' name as a confession and a testimony (see also 1 Jn. 4:15; 5:5). The absolute use of "the Son" is typical of Jn. (e.g., Jn. 3:36), though he also uses "his Son" (e.g., 1 Jn. 1:3, 7), meaning "the Son of the Father." The expression "having the Son" (Jn. 3:36, lit.) is an oriental way of expressing participation in the being of God.

(c) The title "Son of God" is clearly fundamental in John's Christology and expresses a number of basic convictions about Jesus. (i) This title expresses the metaphysical or essential relationship between Jesus and his Father. So close is the link between them that to deny the Son is to deny the Father (1 Jn. 2:22–23). Father and Son belong inseparably to each other (Jn. 1:18; 5:23; 1 Jn. 1:3; 5:20). The Son is preexistent (Jn. 3:17; 11:27; 1 Jn. 3:8; 4:9–14). He is God's "only" Son, a term that expresses the special love between the Father and Jesus.

(ii) The NT in general does not speculate on the origin of the Son, and the use of the terminology of sonship is not designed to encourage such speculation, but to draw out the nature of the relationship between Jesus and God: a relationship of mutual love (Jn. 3:35; 5:20) and of filial obedience (5:19).

(iii) The Son shares the functions of the Father, esp. as the judge and the bringer of life (Jn. 5:17–30).

(iv) The Son mediates between God and humankind. He was given by the Father in order that we might be saved (Jn. 3:16). While in the world, he remains in constant communion with the Father (1:18; 3:13; 8:29; 16:32) and is thus able to reveal the Father to us. The title "Son" expresses above all the fact that Jesus is the Savior. In 1 Jn. "the Son" stands close in meaning to "Messiah," but for Jn. Jesus is the Savior particularly because of his metaphysical relationship with God (Jn. 11:41; 12:27–28; 17:1). This is why Jn. is so concerned to emphasize the real nature of the incarnation (2 Jn. 7–11).

(d) Jn. also refers to believers as "sons of God" or "children [tekna] of God." It is only in the Hel. tradition that the distinction arises between the "Son" of doctrinal statements and the children who become such through faith and baptism. Jn. 1:12 speaks of the "right" to become God's children (tekna theou), and 1 Jn. 3:1 of the gift of being "children of God." From this gift proceeds our "being" ("and that is what we are"). This right or gift of childhood is presented in terms of a birth process (Jn. 1:13; 3:3; 1 Jn. 2:29; 3:9–10; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18), which is the product of the "Spirit" or the receiving of baptism ("water and the Spirit," Jn. 3:5). Those so born live a life of obedience and righteousness.

8. The Son of God in Hebrews. We meet the absolute use of the name "Son" in Heb. (1:2, 5, 8; 3:6; 5:8; 7:28). We also meet "Son of God" as an official rank, where the early Christian baptismal confession has left its mark (4:14; 6:6; 7:3; 10:29). Surprisingly, this book is reticent about God's position as Father (cf. 1:5; 12:7, 9).

Heb. 1:1–4 juxtaposes historical and metaphysical elements about Jesus the Son. He has been appointed heir (→ klēros, 3102) of all and was the mediator of creation, and he is now the "exact representation" of the invisible God (cf. also Col. 1:15–16). The historical process is described in the aor. tense and the metaphysical in the pres.

9. The Son of God in Revelation. In Rev. the concept "Son of God" appears only in 2:18, where it is Christ's name for himself. According to 2:23 he shares in God's activity of judgment (→ krima, 3210; cf. Jer. 17:10); Christ grants believers a share in his dominion over the nations (Rev. 2:26–27; cf. Ps. 2:8–9). It is significant that the authority of the Son of God is described in OT terms.

10. The Trinitarian formula. The triadic confessional formula of Matt. 28:19 ("name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit") recalls the absolute use of the name Son. The entire formula is a brief summary of the saving event, of catechesis, and of the authorization for the baptism of the nations. Matt. presents a practice of baptism that has the highest authority.

In sum, the self-designation "the Son" is particularly important among the Christological statements because it traces back the call, the election, and the claims of Jesus to God himself and thus authenticates them.

huios Dauid, Son of David

OT 1. "Son of David" is a NT predicate of Jesus that has a long tradition behind it in the OT and in the traditions of Jud. (a) Nathan's promise in 2 Sam. 7:12–16 is fundamental: the raising up of a successor to David from his offspring and the confirmation of his "house" and kingdom forever. It is the basis for Ps. 2:7; 89:4; 132:11 (covenant-making and oath).

(b) Some of the OT prophets also presuppose this promise to David and give it a future interpretation in terms of Israel's messianic hope (see Isa. 9:6–7; 11:1–10). Just as God's Spirit once rested on David, so the new ruler, a second David, will be equipped with Yahweh's Spirit. His wisdom and understanding are stressed, and justice and righteousness are the results of the appearance of this king. Jer. 23:5 expressly mentions the "righteous Branch" of David, who will act in wisdom, justice, and righteousness (30:9; 33:15).

Ezek. 34:23 makes use of the shepherd image for their prophetic description: "I will place over them one shepherd, my servant David, and he will tend them" (cf. 37:24). Isa. 55:3 refers to an "everlasting covenant" and the realization of the gifts of grace promised to David; thus it gives an answer full of promise to the nation's complaint that its history is no longer favored by God's gracious care (Ps. 89). This everlasting covenant is also the beginning of salvation for the nation. Zech. 3:8 promises "my servant, the Branch," who "will branch out from his place and build the temple of the LORD" (6:12). The blessing of the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem are here joined together (12:8, 10; 13:1).

(c) A messianic sense is clear in Gen. 49:9–10 (lion of Judah) and Num. 24:17 (star of Jacob), yet the connection with the promise of the "kingdom of the son of David" is at best indirect. Note that Isa. 11:1–10 and Mic. 5:1–5 presuppose that Yahweh once more starts his messianic work anew; both prophets look to the family from which David came and expect a completely new start in place of the ruling descendants of David.

2. Later, Jud. also took up the promise of a son of David in order to enable it to put up with its political oppression and its distress through its relationship to God.

(a) In wisdom lit., Sir. 47:11 and 1 Macc. 2:57 allude to the permanency of the throne or the throne fixed for eternity. More important is Pss. Sol. 17, which uses "Son of David" as a fixed messianic expression (cf. 2 Sam. 7:1; Ps. 2:9; Isa. 9:6; 11:1, 10). During a period when the Hasmoneans were making messianic claims for themselves and were appropriating the glory of the priesthood, the old Davidic promises were being revived. It was a time of affliction. The one who offered this prayer directed his prayer to God and held him to his promise. He expected a change in which the dominion of the Gentiles would be broken and the pollution of sinners would be done away with. The Messiah's appearance would mark the beginning of the gathering of a holy nation, a dominion over the Gentiles, and the establishment of righteousness.

Pss. Sol. 17 discloses the viewpoint of the Pharisees prior to 63 B.C. The "Son of David" is to renew David's dominion but in the way in which the Pharisaic party think of the coming of the messianic age: "But he rules over them as a righteous king, instructed by God, and in his days no injustice shall be done among them for they are all holy and their king is the Lord's Anointed" (17:35–36).

(b) Although messianic claims could be made for men of non-Davidic origin, the rabbis not only emphasized "the king, the Messiah," but also the "Son of David."

(c) The Qumran sect expected three future persons who would bring salvation: a prophet (Elijah or Moses), the Davidic Messiah, and a priest, who seems to have had first place in this trio. The coming shoot of David will appear with the interpreter of the law and will establish David's tent (interpreted elsewhere as the books of the law). In the Qumran lit. we see a similar messianic tradition to that of Pss. Sol.

(d) It is possible that the title "son of David" was understood particularly in terms of the character of Solomon, who had a reputation for wisdom as well as for power over evil spirits (→ T. Sol.). The evidence is sparse, but it does help explain why the title "son of David" is linked with exorcisms and healings in the Gospels.

NT On a number of occasions, the NT presupposes that Jesus of Nazareth belongs in terms of genealogy to the line of David and that this descent from David was a messianic element in his history.

1. The creedal formulas of Rom. 1:3–4 and 2 Tim. 2:8 presuppose that descent from David and divine sonship, based on his resurrection from the dead, are two stages in an early Christology. As indicated previously in the "Son of God" section, in Rom. 1:3–4 Paul quotes a confession handed down to him from the Palestinian community. The gospel concerns the "Son" (Mk. 1:11; 9:7), who descended from the seed of David according to the flesh, but who has been installed as "Son of God" in power according to the Spirit of holiness through the resurrection from the dead. This describes two consecutive episodes in Jesus' history according to God's plan of salvation: On earth he appears as the Son of David; by the resurrection, he is enthroned as the heavenly Messiah (see Ps. 110:1).

2. The speeches in Acts distinguish between David who died and the "Holy One" who has been raised from the dead and does not see corruption (Acts 2:27; 13:37, quoting Ps. 16:10). The quotation from Amos 9:11–12 in Acts 15:16–18 refers to the restoration of "David's fallen tent" and a new era of salvation for the remnant of Israel. The promise of the Son of David is presupposed here, though it is not explicitly mentioned.

3. (a) The structure of Mk.'s Gospel corresponds to the confession of Rom. 1:3–4: The Messiah (i.e., the Son of David) is the "Son of God" to whom the Evangelist bears witness. Mk. 12:35–37 par. records a discussion that raises the question of the relation of the "son of David" to David's Lord (according to Ps. 110:1; → kyrios, 3261). The answer accords with Rom. 1:3–4: The Son of David must be exalted. That Mk. sees Jesus as David's Son is shown by the mode of address in Mk. 10:48. Mk. 12:35–37 juxtaposes two apparently conflicting statements based on Scripture and asks how they are to be reconciled. The answer? The Messiah can be both a descendant of David and David's Lord by virtue of his exaltation; that is, the Messiah is not merely a descendant of David but also the Son of God (cf. 2 Sam. 7:12–16), or possibly the Son of Man.

(b) Matt. gives special weight to Jesus' Davidic descent and heightens the way in which he is thus addressed and acclaimed (9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30; 21:9, 15; 22:42, 45). In his preface Jesus is described as "Christ" (Christos, i.e., Messiah), "son of David," and "son of Abraham" (1:1); this indicates that both Jesus' origin and his position in salvation history are a theme of the book.

In Matt. 1:20 Joseph also, the father of Jesus, "the husband of Mary" (1:16), is called "son of David." This shows that the genealogical sense of the phrase has not been relinquished. In Jud. it had above all a legal significance: Recognition by the father determined the succession. The degree to which the genealogy sets forth Jesus' claim to a place in salvation history is shown by the structure of the family tree with its three groups of fourteen members. Matt. deliberately fits Jesus' messianic status into Israel's history and thereby emphasizes his claims.

(c) Lk.'s birth narrative presupposes the tradition of Jesus' Davidic sonship ("descendant [house] of David," 1:27, 69; 2:4; "town of David," 2:4, 11; "throne of ... David," 1:32). That Lk. admits it genealogically is clear from the family tree (3:31). It is striking how Jesus is acclaimed as "king" by the lips of the Jewish people (19:38; 23:2); this draws out the full implications of the motif of Davidic sonship (cf. Jn. 12:13).

4. The Johannine tradition puts Jewish messianic questions to the tradition about Jesus: (a) "When the Christ comes, no one will know where he is from" (Jn. 7:27); (b) "the Christ will come from David's family and from Bethlehem, the town where David lived" (7:42). Objections such as these leveled by Jud. can appeal to the OT (origins in Bethlehem, Mic. 5:2) or to a given tradition (the hiddenness of the Messiah). It is not that the traditions are false, but the statements of the tradition cannot adequately accommodate the Christ whom Jn. confesses. The title "Son of David" does not occur in Jn.'s Gospel in so many words; the confession of Jewish Christianity rather refers to the "King of Israel" (1:49; 12:13; 19:19; cf. 18:37).

5. There is an archaic ring about Rev. 5:5 (cf. Gen. 49:9–10; Isa. 11:1, 10) and Rev. 22:16 (cf. Num. 24:17; Isa. 11:1, 10), which is reminiscent of the Messiah as the Son of David. Note also Rev. 3:7, where Christ holds the key of David (cf. Isa. 22:22) that controls entry to the heavenly banqueting hall.

6. The title "Son of David" thus sums up the NT confession of Jesus as a descendant of David who fulfills the promise of the coming anointed king and who is the glorious antitype of both David and his son, Solomon. This messianic hope is fulfilled in Jesus' birth as the adopted son of Joseph at Bethlehem, in his works of mercy and healing, and in his entry into Jerusalem. The title is inadequate to convey the high status of the one who is David's (and everyone's) Lord, but it remains a fitting title for the exalted Son of God in whose possession is the key to the heavenly banquet.

ὕμνος (hymnos), song, song of praise, hymn, ode (5631); ὑμνέω (hymneō), celebrate, praise, sing (5630).

CL & OT 1. In. cl. Gk. hymnos is something sung, a song. It includes varied poetical forms, both recited and sung. In general, this word refers to songs to the gods, esp. a song in praise of the divinity, as distinct perhaps from epainos, praise given to humans (→ aineō, to praise, 140). hymneō means to sing of, celebrate, in poetry or prose; to discuss, tell repeatedly, recite; (pass.) ring (in one's ears).

2. In the LXX hymneō is found 69x and hymnos 28x. Both noun and vb. translate a variety of Heb. words for praising and singing. The Hallel psalms (Ps. 113–118) occupied an outstanding position in the rites of the individual feast already when the first temple was standing, and they continued to do so in the later worship of the synagogue. In the Passover the slaughtering of the lambs was accompanied by the repeated singing of these psalms. At the Passover meal itself, the first half of the Passover Hallel followed the Passover meal itself, the Haggadah, and the second half followed the final prayer of the meal and the drinking of the third cup (→ pascha, Passover, 4247).

3. Noncanonical collections of hymns have also come down to us from various Jewish circles in Palestine; from the Qumran sect we have the great collection of Hodayot, the hymns of praise, and from Pharisaic circles the Psalms of Solomon.

NT 1. hymnos occurs in the NT only in Eph. 5:19 and Col. 3:16; hymneō only in Matt. 26:30; Mk. 14:26; Acts 16:25; Heb. 2:12. (a) The aor. part. of hymneō, "when they had sung a hymn" (Matt. 26:30; Mk. 14:26) is generally understood as referring to the singing of the Hallel psalms at the close of the Passover meal prior to drinking the fourth cup; this view in part depends on whether Jesus' last meal with the disciples was in fact a celebration of the Passover (→ deipnon, supper, meal, 1270).

(b) Acts 16:25 records how, after being beaten and imprisoned at Philippi, "Paul and Silas were praying and singing hymns [hymneō] to God." The story shows how they could praise God despite their difficult circumstances. Their action was at the same time a testimony to their fellow prisoners. God vindicated them, not so much by the earthquake (which they did not use as an occasion for escape), but by the conversion of the jailer and their subsequent honorable release.

(c) Heb. 2:12 provides to Ps. 22:22 a Christological significance as an illustration of the solidarity of the speaker with God's people: "In the presence of the congregation I will sing your praises [hymneō]." Jesus cites this same psalm on the cross (Matt. 27:46; Mk. 15:34). In fact, in the early church the entire first part of this psalm was seen as a testimonium of the crucifixion of Christ (cf. Ps. 22:18 with Mk. 15:24; Jn. 19:24). Thus, it was only natural that the second half of this psalm would also be seen as the voice of the exalted Christ (note that "congregation" in the LXX of Ps. 22:22 is ekklēsia, the standard word for "church" in the NT, → 1711). Thus, the Son of God is pleased to call the members of the church his "brothers" (Heb. 2:11).

ὑπακούω (hypakouō), listen, obey (5634); ὑπακοή (hypakoē), obedience (5633); ὑπήκοος (hypēkoos), obedient (5675).

CL & OT hypakouō, to listen to, answer, obey (derived from akouō, → 201) was used in cl. Gk. with the dat. of the person or thing, sometimes with the gen. of the person. The noun hypakoē, obedience, is rare, while the adj. hypēkoos, obedient, is attested from the 5th cent. B.C.

In the LXX, hypakouō denotes obedience shown to humans (Gen. 16:2; 22:18), to wisdom (Sir. 4:15; 24:22), and to God (e.g., Jer. 3:13, 25). In several places, the vb. means to answer (Isa. 50:2; 65:24; 66:4), hypakoē also means an answer (2 Sam. 22:36). hypēkoos is used in Deut. 20:11 of subject peoples, and in Prov. 4:3; 13:1 of a son's obedience to his father.

NT 1. hypakouō occurs 21x in the NT; hypakoē, 15x; hypēkoos, 3x. In Acts 12:13 the vb. means to open in the sense of answering the door. Elsewhere the word group denotes obedience. The pattern of this obedience is Jesus Christ, who was "obedient [hypēkoos] to death" on the cross (Phil. 2:8). Through his obedience, which stands in contrast to Adam's disobedience, "the many" have been made righteous (Rom. 5:19). Heb. has a similar thought. Through his suffering Jesus learned obedience; thus he became the source of eternal salvation to those who obey him (5:8–9, both noun and vb. used). His obedience to his Father does not exclude his being Lord, whom demonic powers and the forces of nature obey (Mk. 1:27; 4:41).

2. Paul preached the good news "so that all nations might believe and obey" (Rom. 16:26; cf. 15:18; 16:19). Obedience to Christ includes submission to the apostle through whom Christ speaks (2 Cor. 7:15; 10:5–6; cf. Acts 6:7). He found in the Philippians an obedient attitude (Phil. 2:12), and he warned the Thessalonians to have nothing to do with those who would not obey his apostolic instructions (2 Thess. 3:14; cf. Rom. 10:16; 2 Thess. 1:8). Obedience to his preaching brings righteousness (Rom. 6:16–17). Heb. 11:8 identifies Abraham as an example of believing obedience (cf. Gen. 12:1–8). Christians are "obedient children" (1 Pet. 1:14), and this obedience must embrace their whole lives. This includes submitting willingly to earthly authorities, such as parents and masters; these in turn must acknowledge Christ as the highest authority (Eph. 6:1–9; Col. 3:20–22).

3. The use of the noun hypakoē corresponds to that of the vb. The apostle Paul sought to bring every thought captive in obedience to Christ (2 Cor. 10:5; cf. Rom. 16:26). Beneath all this lies the understanding of faith as an act of obedience to Christ (1:5). Such obedience cannot be separated from obedience to his messengers and the message they proclaim (15:18; 2 Cor. 10:6; Phlm. 21). Christians are hindered in their obedience because of the sinful passions of the body (1 Pet. 1:14, 22; cf. Rom. 6:12).

ὑπέρ (hyper), over, above, for (5642).

CL & OT The original local sense of hyper (over, above) is found in cl. Gk. and occasionally in the papyri, but not in the LXX or NT. Its most common Hel. meaning (on behalf of) seems to have arisen from the image of one person standing over another to protect him or her, or of a shield lifted over the head that suffers the blow instead of the person. The use of hyper in the sense of exchange or substitution is rare in cl. Gk., but it does occur more frequently in the LXX (e.g., Deut. 24:16; Isa. 43:3–4; Jdt. 8:12).

NT 1. With the acc. case, hyper in the NT has the sense of surpassing over and above, beyond (e.g., 2 Cor. 1:8; Eph. 1:22; Phlm. 16; Heb. 4:12). In 1 Cor. 4:6 the to (neut. art.) that precedes "Do not go beyond [hyper] what is written" is a clue that the phrase in question is probably a quotation of a Pauline slogan or (conceivably) Paul's repudiation of a Corinthian watchword.

2. When hyper is used with a pers. noun or pronoun in the gen. case, it expresses some advantage or favor that accrues to persons and thus mean "on behalf of" (representation) or "in the place of" (substitution). When the benefit is gained by things, the meaning will be "for the sake of," which approaches a causal sense ("because of").

To act on behalf of a person often involves acting in that person's place. Hence hyper not infrequently has the sense of anti (instead of); in fact, in the NT period, hyper encroaches more and more into the meaning of anti. For example, of Onesimus Paul says to Philemon: "I would have liked to keep him with me so that he could take your place [hyper sou] in helping me while I am in chains for the gospel" (Phlm. 13). Paul wants Onesimus as a helper in place of the help that Philemon might otherwise want to give.

In Jn. 11:50, Caiaphas remonstrates with the Jewish leaders: "You do not realize that it is better for you that one man die for [hyper] the people" (Jn. 11:50; cf. 18:14). It is clear that hyper here denotes substitution, not simply benefit or representation, since Caiaphas remarks that such a death "for the people" would ensure that "the whole nation" did not perish (11:50b). That is, politically the death of the one (as a scapegoat) would be a substitute for the death of the many. As Jn. saw it (10:51–52; 18:14), Caiaphas unwittingly expressed a theological profundity here: Christ's suffering was vicarious and redemptive. Similar is Paul's affirmation that "one died for all" (2 Cor. 5:14–15). The death of Christ was the death of all, because he was dying their death. In becoming the object of divine wrath against human sin, Christ was acting vicariously, in our place (cf. 5:21; Gal. 3:13).

In some places, however, where "to die" or its equivalent occurs with hyper, it is difficult to determine whether or not the prep. denotes substitution (e.g., Rom. 8:32; Gal. 2:20; Eph. 5:2, 25; 1 Thess. 5:10; Tit. 2:14). In Rom. 14:15 "for [hyper] whom" does not appear to have any substitutionary notion, since a parallel in 1 Cor. 8:11 uses the prep. dia. It is striking that, in addition to affirming that Christ died for (hyper) persons (Rom. 5:6, 8; 2 Cor. 5:14–15; 1 Thess. 5:10; 1 Tim. 2:6), Paul can say that he died or gave himself "for [hyper]" our sins (1 Cor. 15:3; Gal. 1:4; cf. Heb. 5:1; 7:27), i.e., with reference to our sins or to expiate our sins. That Paul never uses anti with respect to Christ's death is probably because anti was losing it popularity as a prep. and also because hyper could simultaneously express both representation and substitution.

3. Most puzzling is the use of hyper with the vb. baptizō (to baptize) in 1 Cor. 15:29 ("baptized for the dead"). Any interpretation of this passage must meet two requirements: (a) hyper should not be given a sense unparalleled in the Greek Bible, and (b) the resultant meaning of the verse must contribute to Paul's argument in 1 Cor. 15. Consequently, it seems probable that some baptized Corinthians had a semimagical view of baptism and were being rebaptized vicariously for certain deceased Corinthians who were thought to be at a disadvantage because they had not been baptized before being overtaken by death. On this interpretation Paul is using an ad hominem argument (as in 15:30–32) in support of a conclusion already established (namely, that the dead in Christ will rise) and is appealing to an aberrant practice (otherwise unknown to us in the 1st cent.), without giving it his approval.

ὑπέρακμος (hyperakmos), past the peak, overripe, begin to fade; or, overwhelmingly strong, overpassionate (5644).

CL & OT The word is formed from hyper, beyond, and akmē, peak, which is used in the sense of the peak or high point in human development. Thus, the word denotes a person, either male or female, who is past one's prime, past marriageable age. The word does not occur in the LXX.

NT hyperakmos occurs only at 1 Cor. 7:36, where it has two possible explanations. The subject of the verse has traditionally been taken to refer to the father of a virgin daughter, who does not want her to go past the age in which she might normally be married (hyperakmos; → gameō, 1138). As far as Paul is concerned, such a man does not do wrong if he gives his virgin daughter away in marriage (the vb. gamizō, used 2x in 7:38).

But 1 Cor. 7:35–38 may also refer to a man who is in some kind of liaison with a virgin. It may imply a betrothal in which marriage has been put off on the grounds of the spiritual considerations Paul is urging in this passage. It may even refer to a spiritual marriage that has not been consummated physically, though evidence for such marriages is later than the NT. In this case the verse is saying, "If anyone thinks that he is not behaving properly to his virgin and he be overpassionate [hyperakmos] ... let them marry." Or one can still take the subject of this verse to be the man but refer hyperakmos to the virgin, i.e., the man should go ahead and marry her on the grounds of her age.

In any case, the general tone of Paul's recommendations remains clear. It is not a sin to marry; out of personal humanitarian considerations it may be right to do so. But the present times make celibacy preferable.

ὑπερηφανος (hyperēphanos), proud (5662); ὑπερηφανια (hyperēphania), pride (5661); ἀλαζών (alazōn), boastful (225); ἀλαζονεία (alazoneia), boastfulness (224).

CL & OT 1. (a) The cl. Gk. vb. hyperēphaneō means to be proud, arrogant. Later it was used trans.: to treat arrogantly, despise. The adj. hyperēphanos usually means arrogant, proud; it also has a positive use: magnificent. The noun hyperēphania means pride, arrogance, contempt.

(b) The alazōn, the wandering charlatan or braggart, was a favorite comedy character. A wandering sophist was also scornfully nicknamed alazōn. The corresponding abstract noun, alazoneia, means boastfulness, imposture.

2. (a) In the OT a central theme of the prophetic message (e.g., Isa. 13:11) and of the wisdom lit. (e.g., Prov. 3:34) is that God's judgment destroys all human pride. The number of Heb. words translated by the four words mentioned above (plus hybris, 5615) is large, though more than half are derivatives of the root gā'â, be exalted. The fact that hybris and hyperēphaneia are synonyms suggests that the LXX translators saw no fundamental distinction between them.

(b) hyperēphania occurs in such passages as Ps. 17:10; 31:18, 23; Prov. 8:13; Isa. 16:6; Amos 8:7. hyperēphanos occurs in Ps. 119:21, 51, 69, 78, 122; Prov. 3:34; Isa. 29:20; Wis. 14:6; Sir. 3:28. For the adv. hyperēphanōs, see 1 Macc. 7:34; 2 Macc. 9:4.

(c) alazoneia is found in Wis. 5:8; 17:7; 2 Macc. 9:8; 15:6; 4 Macc. 1:26; 2:15; 8:19; alazōn in Job 28:8; Prov. 21:24; Hab. 2:5.

3. (a) In wisdom lit. those who are hyperēphanos form a distinct group, contrasted with the righteous and the humble. hyperēphanos is never used of Israel in wisdom lit. According to the LXX of Prov. 3:34, "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble." Just as the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, to forsake the Lord is the beginning of pride (Sir. 10:12). Therefore, those who pray cleanse themselves from the suspicion of pride (Est. 4:17 LXX) and indicate their own lowliness as they anticipate God's help (Jdt. 6:19).

(b) The prophetic message, by contrast, accuses Israel itself of pride (using words from this group, Ezek. 7:20; 16:56; Amos 8:7; in general, cf. Hos. 5:5; 7:10; Amos 6:8; Zeph. 2:10) and thus takes up a position in the sharpest opposition to deeply ingrained conceptions.

NT 1. hyperēphania occurs only in Mk. 7:22; hyperēphanos occurs 5x. (a) The context of Lk. 1:51 is poetic (Mary's Magnificat, a song based on Hannah's song in 1 Sam. 2:1–10): "He [God] has performed mighty deeds with his arm; he has scattered those who are proud in their inmost thoughts." The verse also echoes Ps. 89:10 (where the LXX has "you have humiliated him as a wounded proud man"). The Magnificat itself expresses Mary's joyous gratitude for her personal blessing (Lk. 1:46–48), God's graciousness to all who revere him (1:49–50), and his special love for the lowly (1:51–53) and for Israel (1:54–55).

(b) The remaining instances of the hyperēphan- word group occur in paraenetic contexts, where they are included in lists of vices used in early Christian instruction. For example, Jesus uses hyperēphania in a list of things that he declares come out of the human heart, which must be dealt with at that level and cannot be cured by external washings (Mk. 7:21–22): "For from within, out of men's hearts, come evil thoughts, sexual immorality, theft, murder, adultery, greed, malice, deceit, lewdness, envy, slander, arrogance [hyperēphania] and folly." Similar lists of virtues and vices are also found in intertestamental lit. (e.g., Wis. 14:25–26; T. Reu. 3:3–6; T. Jud. 16:1). The NT writers continued this OT wisdom tradition (see, e.g., 1 Cor. 5:10–11; 6:9–10; Gal. 5:19–21; Eph. 5:3–5; 1 Pet. 4:3).

(c) In Rom. 1:30 hyperēphanos occurs in a catalog of vices that Paul sees as the outcome of idolatry, which is itself an expression of God's judgment (cf. 1:28). In this list are included the "insolent [hybristēs], arrogant [hyperēphanos] and boastful [alazōn]." In 2 Tim. 3:2 the haughty are included in a list describing the characteristics of the godless in the last days: "People will be lovers of themselves, lovers of money, boastful [alazōn], proud [hyperēphanos]. . . ." Paul urges Timothy to "have nothing to do" with such people (3:5).

(d) Prov. 3:34 (from the LXX) is cited 2x in paraenetic passages of the NT that exhort humility (Jas. 4:6; 1 Pet. 5:5). The former passage is concerned with worldliness, the latter with relationships within the church in the wider context of living in the end times.

2. alazōn and alazoneia each occur 2x in the NT. (a) alazōn occurs in the catalogs in Rom. 1:30 and 2 Tim. 3:2 (see above). It denotes those who try to impress others with big claims. The alazōn is the braggart or the charlatan. Such people often delude themselves that they are greater than they really are.

(b) Jas. 4:16 takes up the thought of 4:6 (noted above): "As it is, you boast and brag [lit., in your arrogance, alazoneia]. All such boasting [kauchēsis, → kauchēma, 3017] is evil." Jas. uses the pl. here, perhaps suggesting numerous instances of confidence in one's own cleverness, luck, strength, or skill that have brought material advantage. The context deals with laying plans for material gain without regard to God. The author counters this with the remedy of saying, "If it is the Lord's will," before we do this or that (4:15). Moreover, if we know what is good and do not do it, we sin (4:17).

(c) alazoneia also occurs in 1 Jn. 2:16: "Everything in the world—the cravings of sinful man, the lust of his eyes and the boasting [alazoneia] of what he has and does—comes not from the Father but from the world." alazoneia here implies a lust for advantage and status. The expressions used here are not so much a classification of the kinds of evil that stem from fallen humanity as they are Jn.'s attempt to lay bare the world's self-centered, grasping structure, which can only be overcome by love (see 2:15).

ὑπό (hypo), under, by (5679).

CL The basic meaning of this prep. in cl. Gk. is under. But it was also used after a pass. voice to denote the pers. agent who carried out the action (in contrast to an impers. agent, which was usually expressed by the dat. of means or instrument).

NT 1. There are several ways in which agency is expressed in the NT: hypo (Matt. 4:1 [2x]), dia (through, 2 Cor. 1:19; → 1328), apo (from, 3:18; → 608), ek (out of, by, Gal. 4:4; → 1666), en with the dat. (in, Matt. 9:34; → 1877), or the simple dat. (Matt. 6:1).

2. Where dia and hypo are both used and can be distinguished, dia marks intermediate agency and hypo ultimate or original agency. Thus in Matt. 1:22, the Lord as the ultimate author (hypo kyriou, lit., "by the Lord") of the prophetic word is distinguished from the prophet Isa., who acted as a mediate agent ("through [dia] the prophet") in speaking the divine word.

3. Similarly to dia, sometimes para (from the side of, → 4123) occurs where one might expect hypo. In Lk. 1:45, in the phrase "what was said to her by [para] the Lord" (lit.), para may allude to the intermediate agency of the angel. Whereas para traces an action back to its point of departure or source, hypo relates an action to its ultimate cause.

4. The opposite nuance occurs with respect to apo and hypo (→ apo, from, 608).

ὑπογραμμός (hypogrammos), outline, copy, example (5681).

CL & OT This word is late. Philo uses it in the sense of outline. Its most common use is for the faint outlines of letters that pupils traced over while learning to write, then also of the sets of letters written at the top of a page to be copied repeatedly by the learner on the rest of the page.

NT hypogrammos is applied metaphorically in 1 Pet. 2:21 to the example left by Christ for his disciples to follow, esp. in his patient endurance of undeserved suffering.

ὑπόδειγμα (hypodeigma), proof, example, model (5682).

CL & OT In Hel. Gk. hypodeigma means an example, with a transferred sense of demonstration, sample, or model (typos is a synonym). It is used in either the good sense of a model to copy or as warning of an example to avoid. Philo has an important discussion of the Levitical tabernacle as a model of the divine plan that Moses glimpsed and Bezalel constructed. The occurrences of this noun are in Ezek. 42:15 ("temple area," where LXX has the "ground-plan of the house"); Sir. 44:16 (Enoch was "an example of repentance"); 2 Macc. 6:28, 31 (the Maccabean martyrs are a "noble example").

NT The NT usage divides between the two meanings given in the LXX. It can mean a figure or copy. The Levitical furnishings and service are a "copy" of their heavenly counterparts, which alone have substantial reality (Heb. 8:5; 9:23). hypodeigma can also mean "example," either in a call to imitation (Jn. 13:15; Jas. 5:10) or in the bad sense of serving as a warning (Heb. 4:11; 2 Pet. 2:6).

ὑποκρίνομαι (hypokrinomai), answer, pretend, dissimulate (5693); ὑπόκρισις (hypokrisis), pretense, hypocrisy (5694); ὑποκριτής (hypokritēs), pretender, hypocrite, a godless man (5695); συνυποκρίνομαι (synypokrinomai), join in hypocrisy (5347); ἀνυπόκριτος (anypokritos), unfeigned, genuine (537).

CL & OT 1. hypokrinō (usually in the mid.) is a compound verb based on krinō, judge. Its basic meaning is to reply, expound, interpret (e.g., dreams). In cl. Gk. words in this group had primary reference in the world of the theater. A hypokritēs appeared on stage and turned the speeches of the chorus into dialogue, or he explained to the audience what was going on. hypokrisis means reply, interpretation, play-acting, then also appearance, hypocrisy. anypokritos was someone inexperienced as an actor, and in a metaphorical sense unfeigned, genuine, simple.

2. In the LXX the vb. occurs rarely and mostly in late writings (Sir. 1:29; 33:2 = LXX 36:2; 2 Macc. 5:25; 6:21, 24; 4 Macc. 6:15, 17). hypokritēs means someone estranged from God (only in Job 34:30; 36:13); such people have God "on their lips," but keep him "far from their hearts" (Jer. 12:2). Job 36:13 describes an angry and taciturn man who is too proud to call for help when he needs it. Such a man should not be in a position of authority, because he directs all his efforts to the oppression of his subjects (34:30).

A rab. saying stated that 90 percent of all the world's hypocrisy was to be found in Jerusalem. This was one of the chief sins denounced in Jud., the Pharisees falling under special condemnation.

NT The NT uses the words in this group exclusively in the metaphorical sense of hypocrisy. They occur mainly in the Synoptics. hypokrinomai occurs only in Lk. 20:20, synypokrinomai only in Gal. 2:13. The noun hypokrisis is used 6x, hypokritēs 17x (mostly in Matt.). anypokritos occurs 6x.

1. hypokrinomai in Lk. 20:20 means to act or pretend; spies sent out to Jesus "pretended to be honest," but they were in fact trying to find grounds to accuse him. Similarly in Gal. 2:13, synypokrinomai describes how Pet. did not remain true to what he knew was right. He had been eating with Gentiles freely, but when "certain men came from James," Pet. decided to separate himself from the Gentiles and thus became a hypocrite.

2. Jesus calls his opponents' attempts to trap him with crafty questions "hypocrisy" (hypokrisis; Mk. 12:15; cf. Matt. 23:28). It involves a deliberate pretense, similar to that of a stage performance. Exhortations in the NT letters (e.g., 1 Tim. 4:2; 1 Pet. 2:1) list hypokrisis alongside lying and slander. It denotes attempts to cover up sin by putting oneself in a favorable light at the expense of truth.

3. (a) The noun hypokritēs is found exclusively on the lips of Jesus. In Matt. 15:7–9 he quotes Isa. 29:13 as prophetic of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law: "You hypocrites! Isaiah was right when he prophesied about you: 'These people honor me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me'" (cf. Mk. 7:6–7). These leaders are prime examples of unbelief (cf. Lk. 12:56). Outwardly they appear to be godly, but in reality they are sinners, guilty in God's sight since they do everything possible to repel the salvation that comes in Jesus. Jesus pronounces against these "hypocrites" a series of seven severe "woes" (Matt. 23:1–32).

(b) These Jewish leaders, however, are not the only ones so addressed. Jesus applies the word to any who seek to put forth an outward show of religion without having a heart truly devoted to God. For example, in the Sermon on the Mount a hypokritēs is someone who tries to remove a speck from someone else's eye while having a log in his or her own eye (Matt. 7:3–5; cf. Lk. 6:41–42). Again, anyone who prays in public primarily to be seen by others rather than to enter a relationship with God is a hypokritēs. People should rather pray in secret and give alms in secret (Matt. 6:2–6).

4. anypokritos is found only in the NT letters. It is used 3x to qualify love: agapē (Rom. 12:9; 2 Cor. 6:6) and philadelphia ("love for . . . brothers," 1 Pet. 1:22). Such love comes from an open and genuine heart that has no ulterior motives to hide; it does not deliberately put on a show. The same is said of faith in 1 Tim. 1:5; 2 Tim. 1:5. Faith is not affected by considerations of expediency but grows spontaneously out of the union of the Christian with the living Christ and finds its expression in a transparent life. This is also true of wisdom that comes from above (Jas. 3:17).

ὑπομένω (hypomenō), be patient, persevere, endure, be steadfast (5702); ὑπομονή (hypomonē), patience, steadfastness, endurance (5705).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk., hypomenō means to wait, remain behind, stand one's ground, survive, remain steadfast, persevere. It is used frequently in military contexts and at first is ethically neutral. Later the noun hypomonē came into use, and from then on both words imply value judgments in both a positive and a negative sense. Positively, among the noblest of virtues are steadfastness, constancy, and perseverance; a proud Gk. freeman endures burdens or difficulties solely for the sake of his honor. Negatively, there is the dishonorable attitude of passive resignation in the face of degradation, abuse, ostracism, slavery, or tyranny.

2. The LXX uses hypomenō predominantly in the sense of wait and await. This personal expectation appears to be grounded in the covenant relationship, for often Israel as a nation is called to wait on God (Ps. 27:14; 33:20), while God, who rules over all the nations, is called the "Hope of Israel" (Jer. 14:8; cf. 17:13; also Ps. 52:9; 130:5). Israel's endurance has none of the resigned attitude of a slave but reaches out to God and draws strength from him (Isa. 40:31). Thus hypomonē expresses the attitude of the person living in the light of the last days (Dan. 12:12 Theod.; Hab. 2:3; Zeph. 3:8).

Job and later biblical writers use hypomenō in its Gk. sense of being steadfast, holding one's ground, persevering in distress (Job 6:11; Sir. 22:18). This use runs through the Jewish intertestamental lit. (esp. 4 Macc.) and is taken up in the NT by Paul.

NT 1. The Synoptic Gospels. hypomenō occurs in the lit. sense of staying (e.g., young Jesus stayed behind in Jerusalem, Lk. 2:43) and in Jesus' teaching about endurance as a prerequisite of salvation: "He who stands firm to the end will be saved" (Matt. 24:13; Mk. 13:13; the par. in Lk. 21:19 uses the noun instead of the vb.). The context is the eschatological discourse of Jesus, where the disciples have just been warned of numerous trials and persecutions, including being hated by all for the name of Jesus. The severity of the situation calls for endurance. A similar warning occurs in Matt. 10:22, where Jesus is sending out his twelve disciples. They will be hated by all, "but he who stands firm to the end will be saved." The blessedness of those who endure recalls Dan. 12:12.

Lk. uses the noun in the parable of the sower, where the good seed represents those who hear the word and retain it, "and by persevering produce a crop" (Lk. 8:15; cf. Matt. 13:23; Mk. 4:20). The cares of the world, riches, and pleasure may prevent us from producing a fruitful life; thus, we need patient endurance in order to bear the fruit of the word.

2. Paul. (a) Both the noun and the vb. figure in the argument of Rom. hypomonē is a quality required of humans if their lives are to be pleasing to God: "To those who by persistence [hypomonē] in doing good seek for glory, honor and immortality, he will give eternal life" (2:7). Both the act. sense of steady persistence in doing good and the pass. sense of patient endurance under difficulties are possible here. In Rom. 5 Paul shows how justified believers can turn even suffering to good account. They not only rejoice in the hope of sharing God's glory (5:2) but also develop their character through, among other things, "perseverance" (hypomonē; 5:3–4).

In Rom. 8:25 hope is characterized as waiting "patiently" for what we do not see. The context here is the groaning and frustration of the created order, "as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies" (8:23). The concept occurs also in the practical exhortations at the end of Rom.: "Be joyful in hope, patient [hypomenō] in affliction, faithful in prayer" (12:12; cf. the connection between hypomonē and thlipsis [persecution, → 2568] here, as in 5:3). The purpose of the Scriptures is to promote "endurance" (hypomonē), which reflects the character of God (15:4–5; note the reiteration of the themes of 2:7; 5:3–4).

(b) Whereas hypomonē is a characteristic of hope in Rom., it is a characteristic of love in 1 Cor., since love "always perseveres" (13:7). In 2 Cor. Paul develops the theme of endurance, esp. in one's service for the church. His own affliction and comfort have occurred in order to help produce in the Corinthians "patient endurance of the same sufferings we suffer" (1:6), while 6:4; 12:12 allude to Paul's own apostolic endurance.

(c) "Endurance" (hypomonē) and "patience" (makrothymia, → 3429) are qualities for which Paul prays to be developed in the Colossian Christians (Col. 1:11). In 1 Thess. 1:3 the "endurance inspired by hope" of the Thessalonians is a cause for particular thanksgiving, and in 2 Thess. 1:4 Paul writes of his boast of their "perseverance and faith" among the churches of God. In 3:5 the apostle prays that the Lord may direct their hearts "into God's love and Christ's perseverance" (cf. Heb. 12:2–3).

(d) In the Pastoral Letters "endurance" is mentioned as a quality required of Christian workers (1 Tim. 6:11; cf. 2 Tim. 3:10) and of older men (Tit. 2:2). It is necessary to "endure [hypomenō] everything for the sake of the elect" (2 Tim. 2:10). Endurance is also a precondition of reigning (2:12), as in Paul's quotation of a hymn in this letter, which includes the words: "If we endure, we will also reign with him."

3. The theme of perseverance and falling away is a central theme of Heb. (cf. the use of Ps. 95:7–11 in Heb. 3:7–11, 15; 4:3–11; also the argument of ch. 12). Both hypomenō (10:32; 12:2–3, 7) and hypomonē (10:36; 12:1) figure in the exhortations to persevere. This stands in contrast with shrinking back (10:39). The author urges endurance in the light of his readers' past endurance, which included the loss of earthly goods (10:32, 34). They must endure to do the will of God and so "receive what he has promised" (10:36); such endurance is evidence of sonship (12:7), as Jesus himself demonstrated, "who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. Consider him who endured such opposition from sinful men, so that you will not grow weary and lose heart" (12:2–3).

4. The noun (Jas. 1:3–4; 5:11) and the vb. (1:12; 5:11) both feature in the letter of Jas. Here the role of "perseverance" in producing Christian character (1:3–4) may be compared with Paul's argument in Rom. 5:3–5 and 2 Pet. 1:6. Persevering under trial is necessary to receive the crown of life (Jas. 1:12; cf. Rom. 2:7; 8:25). Jas. 5:11 holds up the example of the perseverance of Job (cf. Job 1:21–22; 2:10).

5. Suffering for the sake of Christ is contrasted with enduring punishment rightly inflicted for a crime in 1 Pet. 2:20. There is no credit for the latter kind of endurance, and believers should not render themselves liable for such punishment. Pet. argues that earthly obligations such as submitting to government officials and (for slaves) obeying masters still hold good, since these people have been appointed by God. Moreover, in submitting without reviling, believers have the example of Christ before them (2:21–25). In 2 Pet. 1:6 hypomonē occurs 2x in a list of virtues in a way that recalls Rom. 5:3–5 and Jas. 1:3–4.

6. In Rev. patient endurance is the lot of Jn. himself in his exile on Patmos "because of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (1:9). Likewise, the churches of Ephesus and Thyatira are commended by the Spirit for their "perseverance" (2:2–3, 19), and the church at Philadelphia is encouraged: "Since you have kept my command to endure patiently [hypomonē], I will also keep you from the hour of trial that is going to come upon the whole world to test those who live on the earth" (3:10). The conflict with the beast gives rise to several exhortations: "This calls for patient endurance and faithfulness on the part of the saints" (13:10; cf. 14:12).

ὑπόστασις (hypostasis), (1) substantial nature, substance, essence, actual being; (2) confidence, conviction, steadfastness (5712).

CL & OT 1. hypostasis has a wide range of meanings in both secular Gk. and the LXX. (a) In cl. Gk. it is used concretely for the basis of something; the bottom under water on which one can get a foothold; the value of property or land; life's starting point; substance; essence.

(b) As a human attitude the noun means putting oneself between, holding one's ground, enduring; a bold venture, enterprise; entering a risky undertaking; constancy.

(c) In philosophy hypostasis can denote the immanent Logos (word) in matter, giving it form. Here the hypostasis is distinguished from the hypokeimenon, the basic primary matter that has not yet been formed. Thus God, as the world-logos, is the hypostasis of the world. Without hypostasis there can be nothing empirical and no real being, for it actualizes a body. hypostasis is substantial, concrete being between the merely actual but contingent and the realities that are merely mental. Thought and appearance have existence (hyparxis), but not reality (hypostasis).

2. In view of the preceding the following basic elements in this word emerge: (a) that which is permanently constituted; (b) the enduring relationship of the particular thing to reality; (c) virtually the same as essence (ousia), esp. among the Stoics.

3. The LXX shows how in the Hel. period a complex word like hypostasis had become a fashionable term comparable with the word existence today. hypostasis occurs 20x, representing 15 different Heb. equivalents, which differ considerably in meaning.

(a) In a more general sense the word means the ground under water on which one can stand (Ps. 69:2); living being (Deut. 11:6); duration of life (Ps. 39:5; 89:47); food or sustenance (Jdg. 6:4); load, pack (Jer. 10:17); outpost (1 Sam. 14:4); pillar (Ezek. 26:11); a woven embryo (Ps. 139:15); arrangement (Ezek. 43:11).

(b) hypostasis is used in a more philosophical sense meaning council, group of intimates (Jer. 23:22); burden (Deut. 1:12); expectation, hope (Ruth 1:12; Ps. 39:7; Ezek. 19:5). This last meaning gives hypostasis a new focus within the compass of Scripture. The elements of hope and confidence are important for understanding NT usage.

NT hypostasis occurs only 5x in the NT. The reason for this may well be that, up to the time of the author of Heb., NT writers were not interested in philosophical trains of thought.

1. In 2 Cor. 9:4 Paul expresses the hope that the Corinthians will take part in the collection. Otherwise, if some Macedonians come with him and Paul finds that the believers in Corinth are not willing to participate, he will feel ashamed "of having been so confident" (lit., in this hypostasis). He uses the same word in 11:17, where in Paul's speech as a fool it translates lit., "in this confidence of boasting." But it may be asked whether the meaning in both passages should not be "enterprise" or "venture."

2. Compared with Paul, the use of hypostasis in Heb. is more theologically significant. (a) The term is important in Christology in 1:3, which states that Christ reflects God's glory and the "exact representation of his being [hypostasis]." The Son is not merely like the Father; rather, the substance of God is truly in Christ. What God essentially is has been made manifest in Christ. hypostasis here means "substance" or "real essence" in contrast to what merely appears to be.

(b) Heb. 3:14 states: "We have come to share in Christ if we hold firmly till the end the confidence [hypostasis] we had at first." The thought of the passage is that of confidence, similar to that of patience in 6:12 and perseverance in 12:1.

(c) From these two cases it seems clear how different the uses of hypostasis are in Heb. The most debated meaning of this word occurs in 11:1: "Now faith is being sure [hypostasis] of what we hope for and certain [elenchos] of what we do not see." The following explanations of this verse should be considered as possibilities.

(i) Confident trust in things hoped for. The gen. in "of things hoped for" is understood in this case as an obj. gen. In favor of this interpretation is Heb. 10:38–39, where faith and shrinking back are contrasted.

(ii) Pledge, security, guarantee, assurance. In other words, faith is a confident assurance that we will experience the reality of what we hope for.

(iii) Realization, actualization, substance. According to this meaning, faith already grasps the substance of what is promised. The problem with this interpretation, however, is that if faith gives a present existence to what is only hoped for in the future, faith becomes virtually identical with illusion.

Of these three options, the second one is the best. Heb. 11 proceeds to pile up a series of examples of what it means to live by faith. Faith not only grasps an event, an act of God such as the creation (11:3); it also shows itself in events. The more pleasing sacrifice and walk of Abel; the construction of the ark by Noah; Abraham's obedience in leaving his homeland, his life as a sojourner, and his near-sacrifice of Isaac;

the blessing of the patriarchs; Moses' severance with the Egyptians; the saving of the firstborn of Israel by the Passover blood; the crossing of the Red Sea; the conquest of Jericho; the rescue of Rahab—these were all saving acts of God in Israel's history, something new and unique on earth. Admittedly, the goal or fulfillment of all the hope still lay ahead. The people in the account were guarantees of their ultimate realization for the people of God. For this reason those addressed are exhorted not to neglect meeting together (10:25) and to remain with the people of God, in whom faith brings about a new reality and through whom God's deeds are wrought.

Note too how in 11:1 that "being sure of what we hope for" is set parallel with "[being] certain [elenchos] of what we do not see." This parallel would not work if hypostasis meant mere confidence. We should interpret hypostasis in the light of elenchos.

Throughout Heb. 11 faith is qualified by the instrumental dat. ("by faith"). This faith is seen as the relationship to the commands and promises of God that made possible the acts and behavior of the person concerned. Faith enabled what was hoped for to become a reality piece by piece. In other words, the phrase "things hoped for" is not an obj. gen., as if the things hoped for became real. Rather, it is a subj. gen., in that the things hoped for work through faith and produce action and attitudes. Thus Abraham hoped for a future city and so chose the life of a sojourner.

ὑποτάσσω (hypotassō), submit, be in subjection (5718); ὑποταγή (hypotagē), obedience, submission (5718).

CL & OT 1. hypotassō is a Hel. Gk. word that denotes subordination or subjection. In the act. voice it means to put things in a proper order, i.e., to subordinate. In the pass. voice it usually means to be subject to someone, which often implies obedience. In the mid. voice the vb. means either to subject oneself to someone or to become subservient; this can occur voluntarily or out of fear.

2. The meaning of hypotassō in the LXX is essentially the same as in Hel. Gk. The Lord subdued nations under David (act. voice: Ps. 18:47; 144:2; cf. 47:3; pass. voice: 1 Chr. 22:18; Ps. 108:9 [LXX lit., "foreign nations have been subjected to me"]). God placed all things in subjection to humans (8:6), and as punishment for disobedience, God subjected his people to their enemies (3 Macc. 2:13). In all these examples, these subjects had little choice.

The mid. voice, however, along with some uses of the aor. and fut. pass., often implies a voluntary element. For example, David's officers and mighty men submitted themselves to his son Solomon (1 Chr. 29:24). Ps. 37:7a reads in the LXX: "Be subject to the Lord and beseech him." Similarly, 62:1 reads: "Shall not my soul be subject to the Lord? For from him comes my salvation" (cf. 62:5). According to 2 Macc. 9:12, on his deathbed Antiochus Epiphanes IV said, "It is right to submit oneself to the Lord and not to think that a mortal is equal to God." These verses obviously imply a human role in submission to the Lord.

NT 1. Every NT use of hypotassō and hypotagē involves some sense of hierarchy, but as with the LXX, only context can determine whether the subordination is compulsory or voluntary. For example, children are expected to be obedient to their parents (1 Tim. 3:4 uses hypotagē; cf. Tit. 1:6; cf. also Eph. 6:1; Col. 3:20, both of which use hypakouō, obey, → 5634). Yet when Lk. writes that Jesus "was obedient" (pass. of hypotassō) to his parents (Lk. 2:51), we should not understand that he was forced into obedience against his will, as it were. Rather, the Son of God was voluntarily submissive to his earthly parents.

2. Forms of hypotassō in the act. voice occur in Rom. 8:20 ("the one who subjected" creation); 1 Cor. 15:27 ("God . . . put everything under Christ"); 15:28 (lit., "the one who has subjected all things to him"); Eph. 1:22 ("God placed all things under his [Jesus'] feet"); Phil. 3:21 ("to bring everything under his control"); Heb. 2:5 ("it is not to angels that he has subjected the world to come"); 2:8 ("put[ting] everything under him"). In all cases, God is the expressed or implied doer of the action, and in all but Rom. 8:20 the theme is that all things have been made subject to the exalted and cosmic Christ, including angelic powers and death (1 Cor. 15:27–28; 1 Pet. 3:22).

3. In Lk. 10:17, the disciples report that demons submitted themselves to them (probably involuntarily). According to Paul, the sinful mind does not submit itself to God's law (Rom. 8:7). Likewise, the Jews who refused God's provision of salvation in Christ "did not submit to God's righteousness" (10:3). These last two verses imply a voluntary refusal to submit.

4. The rest of the uses (mid. and pass.) of hypotassō involve Christian behavior in the context of established authority structures. Thus all believers should voluntarily "submit to the Father" (Heb. 12:9). They should also be submissive to governing authorities, both secular (Rom. 13:1, 5; Tit. 3:1; 1 Pet. 2:13) and in the church (5:5). Similarly, Christian slaves should freely serve their masters (Tit. 2:9; 1 Pet. 2:18), and wives should be submissive to their husbands (Eph. 5:24; Col. 3:18; 1 Pet. 3:1, 5).

Since this last topic is set in Eph. 5:22–24 in the context of all Christians "submit[ting] to one another out of reverence for Christ" (5:21), the emphasis here must be on mutual submission: Just as husbands are called to love their wives with a self-sacrificing love (5:25–28), so wives are called to put aside their own agendas in submission to their husbands. The ideal, of course, is that this will be mutually voluntary. Only then will the Christian home function as God's wants it to.

5. The interpretation of hypotagē in 1 Tim. 2:11 is highly debatable. Is Paul establishing a universal principle or offering a particular instruction as he calls for women in the church to learn in quietness and "full submission" and to be silent before men in the church? And does Paul have in mind here the home situation (so that anēr means husband rather than man, → 467), or is he referring to men generally? A complete understanding of this text and its cultural context, along with its parallel in 1 Cor. 14:34–35, will probably continue to elude us.

ὕστερος (hysteros), what is behind, after, later (5731); ὑστερέω (hystereō), to come too late, miss, fail to reach; be in need of, lack; be less than, inferior to (5728); ὑστέρημα (hysterēma), need, want, deficiency, lack, shortcoming (5729); ὑστέρησις (hysterēsis), need, lack, poverty (5730).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. hysteros means what is behind or after, esp. in reference to time. The adv. hysteron means secondly, after, later. hystereō was coined from the adj. and means to come after or too late. From this primary sense a fig. use of the verb developed, meaning to lag behind or to be inferior, and a secondary nuance, signifying failure in something. In the Hel. period hystereō means to lack something.

(b) The noun hysterēma, want, lack, need, first appears in the LXX. One ancient Hel. writer states that no titles were spared Caesar, i.e., what any single title lacked as a complete expression of honor was supplied by what the others contributed.

2. (a) In the LXX hysteros (4x) and hysteron (14x) are always used in a temporal sense: after, later, then. hystereō occurs 21x and means primarily to lack, have a need. In the year of release the prosperous Israelite is to lend generously to a poor fellow Israelite who has a need (Deut. 15:8). The Israelites of the desert generation were sustained by God and lacked nothing (Neh. 9:21; cf. Eccl. 6:2). The heart of a fool, however, lacks sense (10:3). Belshazzar's kingdom was weighed in God's balances and found to be deficient (Dan. 5:27 Theod.). Ben Sira reflects on the person who works hard but finds he or she remains in want (Sir. 11:11–13).

Closely related to the concept of experiencing a lack is that of coming too late or failing. Those who fail to observe the Passover will be cut off (Num. 9:13). Although the fulfillment of what God has promised appears to delay, Israel must confidently wait for God to act (Hab. 2:3).

(b) The noun hysterēma occurs 6x in the LXX, where it means lack or need. A good land is a place where there is no lack of anything (Jdg. 18:10). According to Eccl. 1:15, what is lacking cannot be numbered. In two cases hysterēma shades into the meaning of want or poverty: "those who fear [the LORD] lack nothing" (Ps. 34:9); "haste leads to poverty" (Prov. 21:5 Theod.).

NT 1. hysteros is used primarily in the NT in the neut. sing. as an adv., later (Matt. 21:29; 25:11; Jn. 13:36), finally, last of all (Matt. 4:2; 21:37; 22:27; 26:60). Heb. 12:11 says that all parental discipline at the time it is administered is painful but "later on" produces a harvest of righteousness. Only once is hysteros used as an adj.: In 1 Tim. 4:1 it means "in later times"—a parallel to the eschatological formula "in the last days" (cf. 2 Tim. 3:1).

2. hystereō occurs 16x in the NT and has a broad range of nuances. (a) The basic sense is to come too late through one's own fault and so to be excluded from privilege. After referring to the desert generation, which forfeited its place in the promised land through rebellion and unbelief (Heb. 3:7–19), the writer of Heb. pleads with his readers to take care lest any of them, through lack of faith in God's word, should fall short of attaining God's promised rest (4:1). Near the end of the letter the author repeats this admonition, employing the parallel expression "misses the grace of God" (12:15). Paul concludes in Rom. 3:23 that all humans "fall short" of participation in the divine glory; God's grace is our only hope for eternal life.

(b) With reference to circumstances, hystereō means to lack. In Matt. 19:20 a wealthy young man affirms to Jesus that he has kept God's commandments and asks, "What do I still lack?" He is unaware of an absolute lack that will exclude him from eternal life but only of some unfulfilled remainder that he can yet complete. In the parallel account in Mark 10:21, Jesus is the one who speaks of a deficiency: "One thing you lack. . . . Go, sell everything you have . . . come, follow me." The one thing the man lacks is the self-sacrificing devotion that characterizes every true disciple of Jesus.

(c) The most common idea of this vb. in the NT is expressed in the contrast between abundance and lack. When famine struck, the lost son experienced lack and was hungry (Lk. 15:14; cf. Phil. 4:12). Although Jesus sent out his disciples on their preaching mission without purse or provisions, they did not lack anything (Lk. 22:35). The Corinthians were enriched through God's grace so that they did not lack anything in the realm of spiritual gifts (1:5–7). When Paul was in Corinth and experienced need, what he lacked was provided by the generosity of believers in Macedonia (2 Cor. 11:9). Paul can speak of having learned the secret of enjoying abundance or experiencing lack with contentment (Phil. 4:12).

(d) Finally, the vb. occurs in the derivative sense to be less than, inferior to. Paul affirms that he is "not . . . in the least inferior to" the super-apostles (2 Cor. 11:5; 12:11); that is, he needs nothing to compensate for some deficiency exhibited by a comparison with them. In comparing the church to a human body Paul observes that God has so adjusted the body that greater honor is bestowed on "the parts that lacked it" (1 Cor. 12:24).

3. (a) The cognate nouns hysterēma and hysterēsis are interchangeable (cf. Mk. 12:44 with Lk. 21:4). Jesus contrasts the gifts to the temple treasury of the wealthy, who give from their abundance, with the gift of an impoverished widow, who gives everything she has. In this context either noun means want in general, i.e., poverty (cf. a similar contrast in 2 Cor. 8:14; 9:12). The general sense of need or lack is evident in Paul's response to the gift he received from Philippi. He does not complain of "living . . . in want," for he has learned the secret of self-sufficiency in every circumstance (Phil. 4:11–12).

(b) hysterēma occurs twice in the stylized expression "to fill up the lack of someone," where some absence is compensated for by representing other(s) who could not be present. A visit from the elders of Corinth has made up for the absence of the Corinthians, for whom Paul feels both affection and concern (1 Cor. 16:17). The Christians at Philippi were also genuinely concerned for Paul, but it was their emissary Epaphroditus who supplied what had been lacking to the community (Phil. 2:30).

(c) On two occasions Paul uses hysterēma in the pl. (i) He writes to the Thessalonians about his deep desire to return to Thessalonica in order to complete the work he had begun there (1 Thess. 2:17–3:13). He prays earnestly night and day that he may see them once again so that he may supply "what is lacking" in their faith (3:10). The pl. here embraces specific areas in which their faith needs to be matured (cf., e.g., 4:13–5:11, 14). In lieu of a visit, the apostle uses his letter to address these deficiencies in the experience of faith.

(ii) Col. 1:24 is difficult and its meaning continues to be debated. As Paul reports on his share in Christ's reconciling work, he affirms that he rejoices in the sufferings he has endured, for he is completing "what is still lacking" in Christ's afflictions for the sake of his church. This deficiency cannot refer to Christ's own vicarious sufferings on the cross in the accomplishment of redemption. Paul makes it clear that reconciliation has been truly and validly achieved through Christ's death (cf. 2:11–14).

The key to the interpretation is in the phrase "Christ's afflictions," which occurs only here in the NT. This phrase seems to be referring to a certain limitation on the messianic woes that has been determined by God (cf. Mk. 13:5–27; cf. 1 Enoch 47:1–4). Once that measure has been attained, the old aeon, characterized by sin and suffering, will pass away and the new age will dawn. For the present, however, something is still lacking in those appointed sufferings. In Paul's experiences as the apostle to the Gentiles, he is doing his part to complete what is lacking in these messianic afflictions. Thus, he is bringing closer the dawning of the new age in which Christ will return in glory (Col. 1:28–29; 3:4). It is this prospect that accounts for Paul's joy.

ὕψος (hypsos), high (5737); ὑψηλός (hypsēlos), high, exalted, proud (5734); ὕψωμα (hypsōma), height, the exalted (5739); ὕψιστος (hypsistos), highest, most exalted (5736).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. hypsos denotes primarily extension upward in space, height (only of things, not of people); fig. it means the superiority and exaltation of one thing or person over another. In the case of people this term can take the negative sense of pride. In conjunction with bathos, it denotes the complete dimensions and aspects of an object. (b) The adj. hypsēlos was also originally spatial in meaning (e.g., high buildings, plants, position); it was used fig. in both a positive (sublime) and a negative (pompous, high-sounding) sense. (c) hypsōma is always used in fig. senses, e.g., as an astrological term for the closest approach of a star to the zenith.

2. (a) In the LXX hypsos is used lit. to denote the height of an object (e.g., a mountain, 2 Ki. 19:23; Ps. 95:4; the temple, Ezr. 6:3; a tree, Ezek. 31:14). Used absolutely, it often denotes the heavenly realm or the realm of God (Ps. 68:18; 102:19; Isa. 40:26). It is thus the opposite of bathos (that which is separated from God, → 958). In fact, both hypsos and hypsistos (e.g., Gen. 14:18–19; Ps. 18:13) can be simply a substitute for God himself. In relation to humans, hypsos in Isa. 2:17 stands for human pride; in 1 Macc. 10:24 it has the sense of encouragement.

(b) The adj. hypsēlos occurs in the LXX in a variety of meanings. Used as a noun, it is more emphatic than hypsos to denote the realm of God (Ps. 93:4; cf. Lam. 1:13), the place where God lives (Isa. 33:5, 16; 57:15). The Spirit from on high (32:15) is God's Spirit. But in a remarkable reversal of this usage, the word is also used for Canaanite shrines and pagan high places (2 Chr. 14:3; 17:6; Jer. 19:5; Ezek. 6:3).

NT 1. hypsos in the spatial sense occurs only in Rev. 21:16 in the measurements of the new Jerusalem. In a similar way hypsēlos is used lit. in Matt. 4:8; 17:1; Mk. 9:2 and Rev. 21:10, 12 of mountains and walls. In these contexts the dimensional aspect is uppermost, although there are symbolic overtones.

2. (a) In accord with OT usage, both hypsos and hypsistos denote the realm of God or his dwelling (Lk. 1:78), to which Jesus is exalted (Eph. 4:8, citing Ps. 68:19; → anabainō, 326), in order to sit at God's right hand and to intercede for us (cf. Heb. 9:24). Even with the fig. meaning the spatial concept still remains in the background (→ ouranos, 4041).

In Heb. 7:26, hypsēlos denotes the place to which Jesus ascended, which is beyond what humans can conceive. Gnostic systems used hypsos for the place beyond the heavenly spheres that is filled with angels and powers. Compare this with Heb. 9–10, where Christ's exaltation is pictured in terms of the Day of Atonement ritual (cf. Lev. 16). Having penetrated these heights, the high priest Jesus Christ has been installed to exercise his sovereignty after his once-for-all sacrifice on the cross. The crucial moment is his going up to heaven, which corresponds to the high priest's going into the Most Holy Place. In other words, the sacrifice on the cross opens to the new high priest the way to heaven.

(b) Lk. 24:49 speaks of power from on high. Here also hypsos is a periphrasis for God. The same is true of hypsistos, "the Most High" (e.g., Lk. 1:32, 35, 76; Acts 7:48). Acts 13:17 also reflects OT ideas (cf. Exod. 6:6). The "exalted arm" (NIV, "mighty power") is an expression of the might and power of God. Describing this arm as hypsēlos, raised, stretched out, is a vivid way of expressing the idea that God's power is not in repose but in action.

3. (a) In Jas. 1:9 hypsos appears in contrast with tapeinos (→ 5424) and is therefore appropriately rendered "high position." The passage refers to the salvation already given and yet still to come in Christ, which paradoxically reverses all human relationships. The poor person (which in Jas. is virtually synonymous with the Christian) must hold fast here and now to this eschatological exaltation by faith.

(b) Since this exaltation is not something Christians earn but is Christ's gift to them, Paul commands them not to think of themselves as hypsēlos ("arrogant," Rom. 11:20) but to associate with the lowly (12:16). Exaltation is God's work; thus, every personal desire for exaltation is an abomination to him (Lk. 16:15).

4. The NT use of hypsōma probably denotes cosmic powers. Rom. 8:39 and 2 Cor. 10:5 are both concerned with powers directed against God, seeking to intervene between God and us. They may be related to the stoicheia tou kosmou, the elemental powers of this world (cf. Col. 2:8, 20). However high and mighty they may seem, they are to be strenuously resisted (2 Cor. 10:5) in the knowledge that not even they can separate the Christian from Christ (Rom. 8:39).

ὑψόω (hypsoō), exalt, raise (5738); ὑπερυψόω (hyperypsoō), raise above all heights (5671).

CL & OT 1. The idea of exaltation played an important role in the myths that formed a part of the OT cultural background. (a) The Babylonian creation epic, Enuma Elish, describes exaltation as a work of the gods. The Babylonian god Marduk struggles with the gods of chaos (the sea-dragon, Tiamat, and the usurper of divine sovereignty, Kingu). After defeating them Marduk creates the material world out of the divided halves of Tiamat (the sea-dragon), and humans out of Kingu's blood. Marduk is then exalted to a position of sovereignty over the world, whereupon he raises his earthly representative, Hammurabi, and installs him as ruler.

(b) The Babylonian myths of Adapa and Etana refer to human attempts at self-exaltation. Adapa is a man who works his way up to heaven but cannot obtain the food of life there. The enterprise founders on the punitive justice of the gods, who reduce him to the confines appointed to him. Etana tries in vain to reach Ishtar's throne in heaven on the back of an eagle, hoping to achieve immortality without dying.

2. hypsoō occurs over 150x in the LXX. The basic meaning is exalt (e.g., Ps. 18:46; Ezek. 28:2), be high (Ps. 89:13); then by extension stretch out, be loud (i.e., raise the voice, Isa. 37:23; 52:8), grow (Ezek. 31:4, 10), and praise (Ps. 107:32). In the OT God alone has the right to exalt (and also to bring low, 1 Sam. 2:7, 10). Humans run the risk of over-reaching themselves by self-exaltation. Thus in a few passages hypsoō means to be proud, haughty, presumptuous, arrogant (Ps. 37:20; 131:1; Ezek. 28:5). The following LXX usages are theologically significant.

(a) The exaltation of the righteous, that is, of all those who in their extreme need through poverty, oppression, or deprivation of rights seek help from Yahweh alone

(cf. Ps. 37:34; 89:17). The righteous who encounter God experience exaltation by him in their everyday circumstances, lifting their lives to a new plane. Thus the righteous are promised a positive transformation of their present situation through Yahweh's intervention.

(b) The exaltation of God by the individual worshiper or the congregation. Such exaltation is a liturgical formula by which worshipers pay homage to God (e.g., Ps. 99:5, 9), and in which they acknowledge their loyalty to him as the Lord above all other gods (cf. 97:9). A pious person likewise uses this liturgical formula: "Glorify the LORD with me; let us exalt his name together" (34:3). In the OT the exaltation of Yahweh includes the exaltation of his people.

(c) Self-exaltation, that is, the exaltation that a person seeks to bring about independently from God, who desires obedience and provides for people's needs (cf. Ps. 75:4–5). By exalting oneself and in self-gratification relying on one's own strength, a person places himself or herself in opposition to God and calls forth his humbling intervention (75:7; Isa. 2:11, 17).

3. The post-canonical apocalyptic writings were more receptive to mythological ideas. Recalling Moses' ascent up the mountain of God, temporary exaltation became the vehicle of divine revelations (cf. 1 Enoch 39:3; 52:1; 89:52; 2 Esd. 14:9, 49). The righteous are promised a place in heaven at a final exaltation (cf. Dan. 7:22; 2 Bar. 13:3). As a son of man Enoch is exalted to the highest heaven (1 Enoch 70:1–4).

The way of the righteous as it is described in Wis. 2:10–20; 3:7–10; 4:10; 5:1–5 is also worth mentioning. The ungodly do violence to the righteous because the latter know God. The righteous are ill-treated and killed so that God may demonstrate whether they are his children. In the end, God exalts them. At the final judgment they will oppose their adversaries to their terror and will receive the kingdom of glory.

NT 1. hypsoō occurs 20x in the NT. It means to make great, "prosper" (Acts 13:17) or to exalt.

2. The theologically important passages are those in which hypsoō denotes the exaltation of Jesus (Jn. 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34; Acts 2:33; 5:31) and the exaltation of the humble.

(a) Behind Jesus' sayings on self-abasement and self-exaltation (Matt. 23:12; Lk. 14:11; 18:14) lies the basic form of the two-part OT saying (cf. Job 22:29; Prov. 29:23; Sir. 3:18). The righteous, humble, and suffering person is promised exaltation as a reward. This teaching acquires a new significance in the context of Jesus' message. Jesus puts all of human life once more on the basis of obedience toward God. Insofar as the Pharisees ascribed respect and honor to themselves (Lk. 18:9–12), they were denying God the obedience of service. The true disciple must be ready to follow Jesus along the path of humility to suffering (cf. 14:27), in order selflessly to serve the despised. Such people are promised exaltation at the resurrection (14:13–14) and the fulfillment of God's promises at the final judgment (Matt. 5:1–12).

But the immediate present already takes on a new form for the disciple in anticipation. Those who exalt themselves will lose their lives in God's judgment (cf. Lk. 17:33; cf. also 1:52; 10:12, 15). In their exhortations, therefore, 1 Pet. 5:6 and Jas. 4:10 warn Christians to submit to God in order that they might share in exaltation in the future glory.

(b) The early Christological statements in Acts clearly see the resurrection and exaltation of Jesus together (see 2:33; 5:31). That exaltation signifies the completion of God's action in his Anointed and the beginning, the continuance, and the expected fulfillment of Christ's Lordship over church and world (cf. 2:36).

(c) The idea of Jesus' exaltation also occurs in the hymn quoted by Paul in Phil. 2:5–11 (see esp. hyperypsoō in 2:9). Jesus' humiliation (2:6–8) is contrasted with his exaltation (2:9–11), which is the consequence of his obedience in suffering and consists in his designation as sovereign over the entire universe. In granting Jesus the new name of "Lord" (see kyrios, 3261), believers acknowledge his victory (cf. Col. 1:19–20). Similar statements expressed in different language occur elsewhere in the NT (e.g., Rom. 1:4; 1 Tim. 3:16).

(d) The concept of exaltation plays an important part in the Christology of Jn., where it is used in parallel with glorification, doxazō (e.g., Jn. 17:5; → doxa, 1518). In Jn. there is only one exaltation, that of Christ (3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34). If Jesus used the expression "Son of Man" in order to embrace the double nature of his activity as of this world in humiliation and suffering (cf. "son of man" in Ezek.) and as exalted in full authority and glory (cf. "son of man" in Dan. 7:13), then Jn. uses this idea consistently. Note esp. how he describes Jesus' crucifixion as his exaltation (3:14; 8:28; cf. 12:34). He is lifted up on the cross, but at the same time he is lifted up to his heavenly glory as the Son of Man. At the very moment that his enemies think that they are passing judgment on him, he becomes their judge. Jesus' exaltation on the cross, however, does not discount the possibility of his final ascent to his Father (20:17).

φαίνω (phainō), (act.) shine; (mid.) shine, appear, become manifest, come into view (5743).

CL & OT The act. of phainō means to shine (e.g., of the sun, the moon, or a lamp), while the mid. and pass. more frequently mean to appear, come into view.

NT 1. The act. of phainō occurs 9x in the NT, 7 of which are in the Johannine writings. It generally refers to the light of natural luminaries such as celestial bodies (Phil. 2:15), the sun (Rev. 1:16; 21:23; cf. 8:12), and the moon (21:23), but may also refer to the light of a lamp (Jn. 5:35; 2 Pet. 1:19; Rev. 18:23). In all these passages, the light concerned is contrasted with a stronger source of light; e.g., the sun and the moon will be superfluous when the glory of God illumines the heavenly Jerusalem (21:23). Only in two places does phainō refer to the "true" light, i.e., Christ (Jn. 1:5; 1 Jn. 2:8).

2. phainō in the mid. and pass. occurs 22x in the NT, of which 17 are in the Synoptics. It is used for the appearing of a star (Matt. 2:7) and of weeds among the wheat (13:26). phainō also occurs for angels appearing in dreams (1:20; 2:13, 19), for Elijah's rumored appearance (Lk. 9:8), and for the appearances of the risen Christ (Mk. 16:9). Certain phenomena will appear when he returns (Matt. 24:27, 30). The idea of becoming visible is present in 9:33 (of Christ's deeds); Jas. 4:14 (of a mist, to which one's brief life is compared); and 1 Pet. 4:18 (of the ungodly at the last judgment). Matt. 6:5, 16, 18 and 23:27–28 take what people are or do in secret and contrast this with outward appearances (cf. 2 Cor. 13:7). Mk. 14:64 and Lk. 24:11 refer to the way something "appears" to a person (cf. Rom. 7:13).

Heb. 11:3 is theologically significant. Here the prime cause of "what is seen" is said to be God's creative word. In this way the doctrine of ex nihilo creation is safeguarded against the error of materialism, which teaches that material things have evolved from phainomena, "what was visible."

Φαρισαῖος (Pharisaios), Pharisee (5757).

OT Pharisaios, the Hel. form of an Aram. word meaning "the separated ones," denotes the representatives of an influential religious group in Jud. The designation is only attested in Hel. Jud. up till the time of the NT (though not in the LXX). The first occurrences of the word are from the time of Hyrcanus I (ca. 135 B.C.). From the 1st cent. B.C. on, however, the Pharisees were in the public esteem, the most respected and thus the leading group of Jud.

1. (a) Josephus, himself a Pharisee, came to speak of the movement in differing ways. He called them one of the many Jewish "philosophies" (along with, e.g., the Essenes and Sadducees). Since representatives of this group never called themselves by the name Pharisee but spoke of themselves rather as the ḥ^{a}bērîm (the comrades of a ḥ^{a}bûrâ, a society), it is appropriate to ask whether the designation Pharisaios is perhaps a nickname that opponents gave to the exponents of that piety.

(b) The name of this group does imply separation, but separation from what? There are three possibilities. (i) The group is related in some way to the Hasidim, those separated from Judas Maccabeus (cf. 1 Macc. 2:42; 7:13), esp. when the Hasmoneans began to claim political domination. (ii) They separated themselves from the rest of the people who did not keep the law in order to follow exactly the individual prescriptions of the law. (iii) The name is a pun on the distinctions they made between the individual prescriptions of the law. Of these, probably (ii) is the best explanation.

2. The following are the characteristics of Pharisaism. (a) The legal prescriptions of the OT were observed with minute attention to detail (e.g., tithing all goods, attending to all the purificatory regulations, etc.). The Halakah (i.e., the body of legal decisions that interpreted the law; often called the oral Torah, since these were not written down by Moses) was considered equally as binding as the biblical tradition. The Pharisaic experts in the Scripture, the "teachers of the law," gave binding interpretations to the laws by way of casuistic exegesis. This casuistry led in part to controversial debates between individual scholars (esp. between the school of Shammai and that of Hillel). The Pharisees set the people a good example in keeping the law, in that they themselves adhered to the strict purificatory rites that were otherwise only binding for priests.

(b) In contrast to the Essenes, who emphasized the complete helplessness of the human will over against God, and the Sadducees, who stressed the unlimited freedom of the will, the Pharisees held firm to a conditional freedom of human will. Humans may not be able to frustrate the will of God, but within the frame of the divine plan they are able to do good or evil.

(c) The Pharisees adhered to the concept of the resurrection, of a judgment after death, and of supernatural beings such as angels and the devil. The Sadducees rejected these ideas as being irreconcilable with Scripture (cf. Acts 23:8).

(d) From the downfall of the Hasmoneans, the Pharisees, unlike the Zealots, renounced all use of force. God himself, through his intervention, would give the decisive turn and liberate his people.

(e) The Pharisees awaited the Messiah, whereas the Sadducees did not.

In that Pharisaism was sufficiently flexible to adjust itself to the conditions of a changed way of life, it was the most spiritually formative power in Jud. during the time of Jesus and was mainly responsible for reorganizing Jud. after the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70. But with its preoccupation over the fulfillment of the laws, Pharisaism was in fact an intensely narrow and rigid formalism.

NT 1. In the NT the Pharisees are named 98x: in the Gospels, Acts, and once in Paul (Phil. 3:5). In Pharisaism Jesus met Israel as it strove for true faith and obedience to God, but which had become totally hardened in formalism and thus barred itself from precisely that for which it was searching: to please God. In general Jesus and the Pharisees are depicted in Matt., Mk., and Jn. as embittered opponents (cf. Matt. 12:14; 24; Mk. 3:6; 12:13; Jn. 7:45–52; 11:46–47, 57).

2. It is a striking fact that Lk. does not generally represent the Pharisees as inimical to Jesus. Jesus was a guest of distinguished Pharisees and ate food at table with them (Lk. 7:36–37; 11:37; 14:1), and 13:31 even reports that Pharisees warned Jesus of Herod's attempts on his life. Pharisees were members of the Christian community (Acts 15:5). Some have questioned whether the Pharisees would have invited to a meal a wandering preacher who violated their purificatory regulations so blatantly (Lk. 11:38). But individual Pharisees (such as Nicodemus in Jn. 3) were attracted to Jesus, though their background prevented them from extending the formal rites of fellowship and acceptance to one who stood outside their number. Thus, it is not unlikely that some of them did interact with Jesus in a dinner setting without full acceptance.

3. (a) The equation of oral tradition with the OT law led to serious divergences. The nature of the differences becomes clear only in the light of the two opposing understandings of God. For the Pharisees God is primarily one who makes demands; for Jesus he is gracious and compassionate. The Pharisee does not, of course, deny God's goodness and love, but for him these were expressed in the gift of the Torah and in the possibility of fulfilling what is there demanded. The Pharisee saw adherence to the oral tradition as the way to the fulfillment of the Torah (cf. Matt. 12:2–5; 15:1–2; Mk. 7:3, 5). By contrast, in Matt. 12:7 Jesus cites Hos. 6:6 ("I desire mercy, not sacrifice") and thus grounds the entire interpretation of the law in the command of love (cf. Matt. 22:34–40; Mk. 12:28–34; Lk. 10:25–28).

(b) Jesus repudiated the Pharisees' exclusion of the uneducated and notorious sinners (cf. Matt. 9:11; Mk. 2:16; Lk. 5:30) as lack of love. The Pharisees were ostensibly concerned about God's judgment, forgiveness, and the holy nation of Israel, but their attitude was the negative one of separation and concern for the minutiae of the law. Jesus, on the other hand, sought to heal the injuries of his people by bringing God's love to the helpless and the sick (cf. Matt. 9:12–13; Mk. 2:17).

(c) This segregation essentially led the Pharisees into a conflict between what the Torah demanded and what they actually performed (see Matt. 23). Their casuistic exegesis of the law, with its consequent dissociation from everything impure, led them to a distinctly merit-based system of thought (→ misthos, 3635). They drew on themselves the accusation of hypocrisy (→ hypokrinomai, 5693) and pride (cf. Matt. 6:5, 16; 23:13, 15, 23, 25, 27, 29; Lk. 18:9–14).

The Pharisees' understanding of God and the law made them blind to the true offer and claim of God's meeting them in Jesus (cf. Matt. 23:26). The real tragedy was that the Pharisees earnestly sought God, but because a particular view of God had hardened in their tradition, they decided against Jesus and thus against God (cf. Matt. 12:24–32; Lk. 11:43–54).

φεύγω (pheugō), escape, flee, avoid (5771); ἀποφεύγω (apopheugō), flee from, avoid (709); φυγή (phygē), flight (5870).

CL & OT From the time of Homer on, words in this word group most commonly meant flee, take flight, whether absolutely or from someone or something. Because a person may flee his or her country, the articular part. is used to refer to exiles or fugitives, and the verb itself may take on the force of be banished, be expelled. Similarly phygē came to mean exile, banishment. In legal terminology, the pheugōn is a defendant (opposed to the diōkōn, the prosecutor), and pheugein graphēn means to be put on trial. Thus, to escape one's prosecutors means to be acquitted.

In the LXX the pheugō word group is not used as a legal idiom but offers more instances of flight in a moral context: e.g., flight from an unbearable friend (Sir. 22:22) or from sin (21:2), flight to the Lord or to the altar (1 Ki. 2:29), or flight based on fearful ungodliness (Prov. 28:1). pheugō is usually avoided when the Heb. original means something less than rapid flight. The noun phygē always means flight or escape, although in Ps. 142:4 the thought is close to refuge.

NT 1. Joseph was ordered to flee to Egypt with Mary and the infant Jesus (Matt. 2:13). The disciples when persecuted in one city were to flee to the next and continue their ministry (10:23). There is no shame in the flight of the sheep from false shepherds (Jn. 10:5) nor in the escape from the sword accomplished by people of faith (Heb. 11:34). Indeed, believers in Jesus' day were commanded to flee to the mountains when Jerusalem appeared in danger (Matt. 24:16 par.; cf. 24:20, the only occurrence of phygē in the NT).

Fear is attached to the flight of the swine herds (Mk. 5:14 par.) and to the escape of Moses (Acts 7:29); cowardice to the hirelings (Jn. 10:12); irresponsibility and unbelief to the sailors manning the boat that conveyed Paul toward Rome (Acts 27:30); and shame to the total abandonment of Christ by the disciples in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mk. 14:50, 52 par.). The devil will flee from us if he is resisted (Jas. 4:7).

2. Both John the Baptist and Jesus warn us to flee from the coming wrath and from the judgment of hell (Matt. 3:7 par.; 23:33). Repentance thus becomes evidence of such flight.

3. Related to this is the epistolary exhortation to flee from moral evil. The Corinthians are told to flee from fornication (1 Cor. 6:18) and idolatry (10:14); Timothy to flee youthful lusts (2 Tim. 2:22) and various vices (1 Tim. 6:11) and to pursue such virtues as righteousness, godliness, faith, and love. apopheugō is used in 2 Pet. 1:4; 2:18, 20 in the sense of escape, rather than flee, the escape being from the corruption of the world.

4. pheugō is used metaphorically in the majestic apocalyptic panoramas of Rev. Thus the woman flees to the desert (12:6). When people seek death, it flees from them (9:6). The islands flee and the mountains disappear in God's fierce wrath (16:20); indeed, in the face of his majesty, heaven and earth flee away (20:11).

φθείρω (phtheirō), destroy, ruin, corrupt, spoil (5780); φθαρτός (phthartos), perishable, mortal (5778); φθορά (phthora), ruin, destruction, perdition, corruption (5785); ἀφθαρσία (aphtharsia), incorruptibility, immortality (914); ἄφθαρτος (aphthartos), imperishable, incorruptible, immortal (915); διαφθείρω (diaphtheirō), spoil, destroy, ruin (1425); διαφθορά (diaphthora), destruction, corruption (1426).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. phtheirō means ruin, corrupt, destroy, kill. The term has various shades of meaning: to corrupt morally, bring down the state of laws, bribe, seduce a woman, and defile a virgin. In the pass. it means go to ruin, perish, be corrupted, destroyed. phthartos means mortal, corruptible; phthora, destruction, corruption. The compound diaphthora can mean destruction, murder, disorder; diaphtheirō to frustrate attempts to help or change one's mind.

In the LXX the words of this group can mean kill people (2 Sam. 24:16), lay waste a stretch of country (1 Chr. 20:1) or a city (1 Sam. 23:10), or destroy weapons (Isa. 54:16). In Gen. 6:11 and Hos 9:9 phtheirō describes a sinful and fallen world. God is the one who can redeem life from destruction (phthora, Ps. 103:4). A sacrificial animal not free of blemish is described as "deformed" (phthartos, Lev. 22:25).

NT In the NT words of this group are used mostly in a Hel. environment, with various shades of meaning: from the use of diaphtheirō in Lk. 12:33 for moths destroying clothes to Rev. 11:18, where the word expresses the extermination of people via God's judgment.

1. (a) In dealing with the moral shortcomings at Corinth, Paul writes: "If anyone destroys [phtheirei] God's temple, God will destroy [phtherei] him" (1 Cor. 3:17). The divine penalty is announced in the form of a legal judgment. In this way God protects his church. Paul, for his part, can claim, "we have wronged no one, we have corrupted [phtheirō] no one" (2 Cor. 7:2). He is therefore in a position to require the church in Corinth to make room for him and his message. He later fears that just as Eve was deceived by the serpent, so the church will be led into rebellion by his opponents and their "minds may somehow be led astray [phtharē] from your sincere and pure devotion to Christ" (2 Cor. 11:2–3).

To demonstrate that false teaching and apostasy are not without their effect on human relationships, Paul refers to a Gk. saying that had become proverbial: "Bad company corrupts [phtheirō] good character" (1 Cor. 15:33). Paul uses the saying to warn the Corinthians not to consort with those who deny the resurrection.

(b) According to 2 Pet. 2:12, heretics are "like brute beasts" who are "born only to be caught and destroyed [eis . . . phthoran]"; "like beasts they too will perish [phtheirō]" (cf. Jude 10). Those who serve Christ, however, are "to put off your old self, which is being corrupted [phtheirō] by its deceitful desires" (Eph. 4:22). Believers can thereby "escape the corruption [phthora] in the world" and live a new life in Christ's power (2 Pet. 1:4). Elsewhere Paul warns the church not to sow to the sinful nature, for those who do so will reap destruction (phthora, Gal. 6:7–8).

(c) In Rev. the harlot Babylon is the epitome of apostasy against God; she has "corrupted [phtheirō] the earth by her adulteries." But now she is judged. In other words, God's victory over the sin of the world has been made manifest (19:2).

2. By contrast, Pet. emphasizes that our salvation was not gained through "perishable things" (phthartos) such as silver or gold but with Christ's precious blood (1 Pet. 1:18). Just a few verses later he rephrases the same idea by saying that we have been born again not through "perishable" (phthartos) seed but through the imperishable, living, and enduring word of God (1:23).

3. (a) aphthartos, immortal, describes the character of God. In the doxology of 1 Tim. 1:17 the church praises him as "the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only God." The sin of the heathen is that they exchange "the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man" (Rom. 1:23).

(b) Immortality is also attributed to Christ as Lord. In Eph. 6:24 peace is pronounced on all those who "love our Lord Jesus Christ en aphtharsia." The NIV translates this phrase "with an undying love," but others prefer the trans. "in his immortality." As the Exalted One, Jesus shares fully in the immortality of the Father. It is this Christ whom the church confesses, declaring that Christ "has destroyed death and has brought life and immortality [aphtharsia] to light through the gospel" (2 Tim. 1:10). In spite of the delay of the Parousia, the church lives in the knowledge that her salvation is something present and already given. She has been taken up into Christ's immortality.

Thus believers already possess an "inheritance that can never perish [aphthartos], spoil or fade" (1 Pet. 1:4). Pet. also instructs us to love one another, seeing that we have been born again of "imperishable [seed], through the living and enduring word of God" (1:23). This should be apparent even in outward things. Gentleness and quietness, not outward adornment, are the "unfading" (aphthartos) qualities of the Christian (3:3–4).

(c) In 1 Cor. 9:24–27 Paul compares the Christian life with an athletic contest (cf. Rom. 9:16; Gal. 2:2; 5:7). In both there is a victory to be striven for; both demand utter dedication and self-denial. The victor is beckoned by the prize, which for the athlete is one that "will not last" (phthartos), but for the believer is a crown "that will last forever" (aphthartos), namely, to be with God for eternity (cf. Rom. 2:7).

3. (a) In 1 Cor. 15:42–54 Paul uses the illustration of the seed sown in the ground to contrast mortality (phthora) and immortality (aphtharsia). There is no coming to life without a previous dying; i.e., only when the seed disintegrates in the earth is it changed into a new form (15:35–42a). It is the same with the resurrection of the dead, and yet it is quite different. "The body that is sown is perishable, it is raised imperishable" (15:42b), a spiritual body (15:44). Paul thus guards against the idea that there is anything intrinsically imperishable about human bodies. Everything passes away, because human beings are subject to sin and hence to death (Rom. 6:23); "outwardly we are wasting away" [diaphtheirō] (2 Cor. 4:16). Resurrection is a new existence, one that is gained by being raised to immortality, for "the perishable [phthora] [cannot] inherit the imperishable [aphtharsia]" (1 Cor. 15:50). Instead, "the perishable [phthartos] must clothe itself with the imperishable [aphtharsia]" (15:53).

(b) Paul emphasizes the same truth when he speaks of those who have died at the time of the Parousia. They do not simply continue their life in immortality; they will be changed (1 Cor. 15:52). It is just as true for them as for the dead, that mortality cannot attain immortality. When the end comes, the great transformation will come for all. Thus the illustration is used of putting on new clothes (→ endyō, 1907): "the perishable must clothe itself with the imperishable" (15:54).

(c) Jesus is the first to have been resurrected by God and is thus vindicated as Messiah. His body did not "see decay" (diaphthora, Acts 2:31; 13:35–37), a quotation from Ps. 16:10. The defeat of death through Christ's victory affects the whole cosmos. That is, the redemption of humanity means also the redemption of creation, which will be "liberated from its bondage to decay [phthora]" (Rom. 8:21).

φθονέω (phthoneō), be envious (5783); φθόνος (phthonos), envy (5784).

CL & OT In secular Gk., phthoneō can mean to bear ill-will of a general kind, but more often it expresses specifically the envy that makes a person grudge something that someone else owns. The noun phthonos is used in a similar way. Frequently it appears with zēlos, jealousy, though several cl. writers distinguish between these two synonyms.

phthoneō appears in the LXX only in Tob. 4:7, 16 in the sense of begrudging the giving of alms. phthonos occurs in 1 Macc. 8:16 and Wis. 2:24 (where the coming of death into the world is attributed to the devil's phthonos).

NT In the NT phthoneō is found only in Gal. 5:26, where "envying each other" is set in sharp contrast to living by the Spirit. phthonos occurs 9x.

1. In the NT letters phthonos features in several lists of bad qualities that characterize the unredeemed life. It is one of the "acts of the sinful nature" that are opposed to the "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:19–23; cf. Rom. 1:29). It is a feature of life before conversion (Tit. 3:3), to be put away by those who "grow up in [their] salvation" (1 Pet. 2:1–2). It is symptomatic of pseudo-Christian teaching that trades on controversy and wordy disputes (1 Tim. 6:4).

2. The phrase dia phthonon, "out of envy," describes the evil motives of those who delivered Jesus to Pontius Pilate (Mk. 15:10 par.). The same expression reappears in Phil. 1:15 (bracketed with eris, "rivalry," and contrasted to eudokia, "goodwill") to expose the motivation of those who preached the gospel from a desire to undermine Paul's evangelistic reputation, rather than share his gift.

3. Jas. 4:5 may provide the only example of phthonos used in a good sense, but the trans. of this verse in notoriously difficult. Following the NIV note, God "jealously (pros phthonon) longs for the spirit that he made to live in us." The description of God as the jealous lover who cannot brook a rival is prominent in the OT, but the LXX word used to translate the Heb. qin'â in this context is zēlos (→ 2419), not phthonos (cf. Zech. 1:14). The NIV main text prefers to take the (human) spirit as the subject of the sentence in Jas. 4:5, giving phthonos its more usual bad sense of envy.

φιλαργυρία (philargyria), love of money, avarice, miserliness (5794); φιλάργυρος (philargyros), lover of money, (5795).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. philargyria means love of money, covetousness, miserliness; various authors considered this a vice. These two words appear infrequently in the LXX: philargyria only in 4 Macc. 1:26; 2:15 (S^1); and philargyros only in 2:8. The vb. philargyreō also occurs in 2 Macc. 10:20, where it means money-hungry.

NT 1. In 1 Tim. 6:10 philargyria (love of money) is described as "a root of all kinds of evil." What is said in this text comes of experience, for the dream of wealth and happiness can gain a demonic hold over a person or a nation. Even the ancient Gks. had a proverb that expressed a negative philosophical judgment on desire for material things.

This text gets its point through its application to one's relationship with God. Selfish amassing of material possessions has its prototype in Adam and Eve's grasping of the forbidden fruit in the garden of Eden. It is an indication that life, limited as it is by time, circumstance, and the vital interests of others, is no longer accepted thankfully from God's hand. Love of money erects a selfish dividing wall against God and our neighbors. It drives those who are possessed by it into utter isolation. Thus striving after wealth is the germ of total alienation from God.

2. Lk. notes that the Pharisees were lovers of money (Lk. 16:14). Paul warns Timothy that such people will become prevalent "in the last days" (2 Tim. 3:1–2).

φιλέω (phileō), be fond of, love (5797); φίλος (philos), a relative, friend (5813); φιλία (philia), friendship, love (5802); καταφιλέω (kataphileō), to kiss (2968); φίλημα (philēma), a kiss (5799); φιλαδελφία (philadelphia), brotherly love (5789); φιλάδελφος (philadelphos), loving one's brother or sister (5790); φιλανθρωπία (philanthrōpia), love for humankind, hospitality (5792).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. phileō is a regular word for showing affection, love, hospitality, etc. It also means be accustomed to, be in the habit of. There are many words compounded from phil-, such as philoxenia, hospitality, and philadelphia, brotherly love. philos originally was an adj. meaning dear, expensive, valuable, but became the ordinary word for a friend or relative; philē similarly means a female friend. philia is a later abstraction meaning friendship, love, devotion, favor; philēma is a love token, a kiss.

2. phileō rarely occurs in the LXX (on this, → agapaō, 26). When it is used, like agapaō it translates Heb. 'āhēb (e.g., Gen. 27:4, 9, 14; Isa. 56:10, Prov. 8:17; 21:17). philia occurs only 38x; philos (181x) is more common.

NT In the NT the vb. phileō occurs in Matt. (5x) and Jn. (13x); elsewhere it appears only 7x. A distinction from agapaō is not strictly adhered to. The nouns philos (28x) or philē (once) are used for friends as well as for people bound together in faith. philēma, kiss, appears in the NT letters as a Christian form of greeting. The noun philia only appears in Jas. 4:4.

1. (a) A typical example for the original meaning of phileō is Matt. 6:5: The hypocrites "love" to pray at street corners (cf. also 23:6; Lk. 20:46). The use of agapaō in Lk. 11:43 and phileō in 20:46 shows how the difference between these two words is not always maintained. Note also Matt. 10:37, where the starting point is the natural love among relatives: "Anyone who loves [ho philōn] his father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; anyone who loves [ho philōn] his son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me." (Note, of course, the transition to a theological meaning here, for the phraseology points implicitly to a love for Jesus, elsewhere described as agapē.) But clearly, when the kingdom of God breaks in, even usual family ties may be dissolved for the benefit of the new fellowship of the family of God.

(b) Jn. characterizes love according to whether the world (→ kosmos, 3180) is viewed as God's creation or as the sphere of enmity toward God. In the case of the former, natural creaturely love has its legitimate place. Thus Jn. 11:3, 36 speak of Jesus' bond of friendship with Lazarus. But Jn. also sees the kosmos as the sphere of darkness that opposes God. Viewed thus, a person's love (phileō) for the world is the same as hatred for God's revelation (15:19; cf. Jas. 4:4). In 1 Jn. 2:15 Jn. expresses a similar idea, though the word agapaō (→ 26) is used: "Do not love the world or anything in the world." God so loves the creation that hates him that he saves it (Jn. 3:16, agapaō), so the other imperative also holds: "Whoever loves God must also love his brother" (1 Jn. 4:21, both agapaō).

The scene with Peter in Jn. 21:15–19 clinches the fact that phileō and agapaō cannot always be distinguished. Initially 21:15–16 distinguish the agapaō in Jesus' mouth from the phileō in Peter's, but in 21:17 this distinction ceases. Nor is it possible to draw any exegetical consequences from this scene. Jn. 5:20 and 16:27 are the only places where phileō is predicated of God. Both times it is God the Father who is spoken of.

(c) There is a single, yet important, Pauline example of the use of phileō, in 1 Cor. 16:22: Love for the Lord is a condition of salvation. The whole history of the word would have led one to expect agapaō here. Thus again the impossibility of a rigid distinction is clear. phileō in Tit. 3:15, too, can only be correctly understood when it is born in mind that through God's love in the revelation of the Son, human love understood as love in faith requires a new interpretation. Note also the varying translation of Prov. 3:12 in Heb. 12:6 (agapaō) and Rev. 3:19 (phileō).

2. philos is also used in the NT for a friend to whom one is under a basic obligation (cf. Lk. 7:6; 11:5–6; 14:10, 12; 15:6, 9, 29; 23:12; Jn. 11:11; Acts 10:24; 19:31; 27:3). Relatives and friends are often mentioned alongside each other, but on other occasions, relatives are included in the philoi. In Lk. 16:9, people are linked by some relationship; Jesus here advises people to win friends for themselves by giving away their worldly wealth. A similar point is made when Pilate is threatened in Jn. 19:12 with losing his honorary title of "friend of Caesar." By contrast, philos can express God's love for the godless. In Matt. 11:19 and Lk. 7:34 Jesus is called a "friend of tax collectors and 'sinners.'" He loves them, although they are enemies, just as God loves the world that hates him.

That is also what is meant when Jesus addresses his disciples as "friends" (Lk. 12:4; Jn. 15:14–15). They come to Jesus as sinners and become his friends through his sacrificial love (15:13). They now belong to the family of God, in which they are brothers and friends of Jesus and children of the Father (Lk. 21:16; cf. also Jas. 2:23, where Abraham because of his faith is called "God's friend"). Brothers and sisters in faith can therefore be greeted as philoi (3 Jn. 14).

3. philēma is a kiss. For the vb. to kiss, phileō and kataphileō are both used in the NT. The kiss was a common courtesy greeting among rabbis, and Judas's kiss was of this nature (Matt. 26:48; Mk. 14:44; Lk. 22:47). In the story of the woman who was a sinner (Lk. 7:36–50), the kiss was a sign of respect.

The kiss in the ancient world was both a friendly sign of greeting and an emotional token of farewell (Lk. 15:20; Acts 20:37). In the early Christian congregations it became a "holy kiss." Those who have been incorporated into the fellowship of God's love are holy (→ hagios, 41) and can greet one another as such (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26; 1 Pet. 5:14).

4. There are at least 24 words in the NT that have the root phil- in them (in addition are seven names, such as Philemon and Philip; for all phil- words, → 5787–5819). Chief among these is philadelphia. The writers of the NT letters exhort all believers, who are brothers and sisters in Christ, to love one another as family members (Rom. 12:10; 1 Thess. 4:9; Heb. 13:1; 1 Pet. 1:22; 2 Pet. 1:7; cf. the related philadelphos in 1 Pet. 3:8). philanthrōpia, love for humanity, is ascribed both to God in his kindness in sending our Savior (Tit. 3:4) and to the islanders in the hospitality shown to the shipwrecked passengers on the island of Malta (Acts 28:2; cf. also philanthrōpōs, kindly, in Acts 27:3).

φιλοσοφία (philosophia), love of wisdom, philosophy (5814); φιλόσοφος (philosophos), philosopher (5815).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. philosophia (a compound of philos, friend, and sophia, wisdom) means love of wisdom, the sciences, or aspiration toward it. (a) Among the pre-Socratics philosophia meant striving toward any kind of scientific activity. It was then narrowed down to the question about the origin of the world from a single primary substance.

(b) For Socrates the whole weight falls on the first half of the word. Philosophy became the aspiration to wisdom—generally, of course, though combined with the knowledge that one never attains to this. According to Plato, philosophy is the knowledge of reality, the eternal and immortal ideas. To him the Sophists were those who believed that they possessed wisdom and pretended to be able to teach it. The true philosophos, however, is the modest man who knows that he knows nothing, but is seized by love for wisdom and searches after it his whole life long without ever entirely attaining to it. The word sophos, wise, befits the gods alone. Aristotle understood philosophy in the narrowest sense to mean metaphysics, investigation of the cause and principles of things or of the world of appearances.

(c) In Hel. philosophy philosophia acquired an almost religious significance. Its goal is happiness. This the Stoics and Epicureans propagate. For the Stoics, philosophy consists in striving for theoretical and esp. practical excellence, that is, for virtue. The Epicureans define philosophia as the pursuit of happiness by means of, and allowing the possibility of, reason. Here practical philosophy (ethics) dominates, to which rationality (logic) and the physical sciences are made subservient.

(d) In the mystery religions and Gnosticism philosophia is no longer concerned with a rational understanding of the world but depicts reality from the religious viewpoint. It thus runs into metaphysical speculation. True philosophy is defined as the quest for religious knowledge. Philosophy should, therefore, fulfill the function of spiritual worship.

2. (a) philosophia (as well as the vb. philosopheō) is found in the LXX only in 4 Macc. (e.g., 1:1; 5:10–11, 22; 7:9, 21). philosophos occurs in Dan. 1:20, where, judging by the context, conjurers must be meant (see also 4 Macc. 1:1; 5:35; 7:7).

(b) Hel. Jud. presented itself as philosophy. For Philo philosophia is synonymous with religion. The Mosaic law is the ancestral philosophy, and Philo calls all Jews philosophers. For Josephus likewise the Jewish religion and philosophy are identical. The same can be said for 4 Macc., where the tyrant Antiochus ridicules Jud. as "foolish philosophy" (4 Macc. 5:11); the martyrs, nevertheless, appear as the representatives of "divine philosophy" (7:9).

NT 1. In the NT philosophia occurs only in Col. 2:8, where Paul warns against it. To him, philosophy depends on human traditions and on "the basic principles [stoicheia, → 5122] of this world," not on Christ. These principles of the world dealt not with natural components of being, in the sense of scientific analysis and philosophical knowledge of the laws of the world, but with personal powers (cf. 2:18), which constrained people under fixed precepts. To these Colossian heretics, Christ embodied these stoicheia and thus endorsed legalism and asceticism. The background of this philosophy is a gnosticized Jud.

Paul combats this Colossian philosophy in his letter, because its adherents were looking for salvation and fulfillment in the elements of the world, not in the saving deeds of Christ. Thus his warning against philosophy in 2:8 does not refer to cl. Gk. philosophy, but to a speculative doctrine that came to full expression in Gnosticism.

2. The noun philosophos is used only in Acts 17:18 in the setting of Paul's speech before the Areopagus. The "Epicurean and Stoic philosophers" confronted Paul about his ideas and the new gods he seemed to proclaim ("Jesus and the resurrection"). After Paul's speech, however, it appears as if both groups rejected what he had to say (17:32).

φιμόω (phimoō), to quiet, muzzle (5821).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. phimoō is related to phimos, which is a muzzle, an instrument keeping the mouth of an animal closed. The vb. thus means to muzzle or gag. From this there developed a metaphorical meaning of keeping a person silent, whether by physical means or by threats.

2. In the LXX, the vb. phimoō occurs in Deut. 25:4, in the command of the Lord, "Do not muzzle an ox while it is treading out the grain." Presumably the reason for this command is that while the ox is working, it has a right to eat.

NT 1. phimoō occurs 7x in the NT. Paul quotes the command of Deut. 25:4 in 1 Tim. 5:18, applying the OT principle given for animals to those elders who preach and teach in the church; such people have a right to earn wages for their work.

2. Jesus gave a direct command to the wind and waves on the storm of the sea of Galilee: "Be still!" (Mk. 4:39; see also siōpaō, to silence, 4995). This saying links back to a similar command Yahweh gave to the stormy seas in Ps. 107:29, though the LXX uses sigaō (→ 4967) there rather than phimoō.

3. phimoō is used twice for Jesus' command to an evil spirit to be quiet and to come out of the person in whom it lived (Mk. 1:25; Lk. 4:35).

4. After Jesus had silenced the Sadducees with his wise answer concerning marriage and the resurrection, the Pharisees came to Jesus with a question (Matt. 22:34). In a similar vein, Pet. encourages us to "silence the ignorant talk of foolish men" by doing good, so that they will have nothing evil that they can say about us (1 Pet. 2:15).

See also hēsychia, quiet, quietness, rest, silence (2484); ēchos, sound, noise, report (2491); sigaō, to be quiet, be silent (4967); siōpaō, to be quiet, be silent (4995); phōnē, sound, noise, voice, language (5889).

5828 (phobeomai, to be afraid, fear, have reverence, respect for), → 5832.

φόβος (phobos), terror, fear, alarm, fright, reverence, respect, awe (5832); φοβέομαι (phobeomai), to be afraid, fear, have reverence, respect for (5828); φοβερός (phoberos), fearful, terrible, frightful (5829).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. phobos means panic, fright, fear, awe, reverence. Sometimes these words denote fear of the gods, holy awe. But in general, the attitude of reverence before the deity is denoted by sebō (→ 4936) and the related words eusebeia (godliness) and its opposite, asebeia (ungodliness, impiety).

2. In addition to the above, fear in the OT can also mean someone or something that is to be feared. It may even be applied to God (Gen. 31:42, 53; Isa. 8:13). The vb. phobeomai is used in the LXX and the NT only in the mid. (apart from Wis. 17:9). It is used intrans. with the prep. apo in the sense of "be afraid of" (Lev. 26:2; Deut. 1:29). It is used trans. with a pers. or impers. object meaning "to fear" (Lev. 19:3, parents; Prov. 13:13, a command; 24:21, the king; Num. 14:9, a foreign people). The adj. phoberos (fearful, terrible) is applied esp. to God in his works (e.g., Ps. 66:5).

There is a significant difference between Israel's relationship with God and the religious attitude of the Gks. The Israelite can stand before God in fear and love. Granted, God is great, mighty, and terrible (Deut. 10:17–18; cf. 1 Chr. 16:25), but he is gracious to humans (Deut. 6:5, 13). Thus we often read the address to God's people: "Do not be afraid" (e.g., Gen. 15:1; Jdg. 6:23; Isa. 44:2). God's grace and favor do not abolish the solemnity of the address. It demands total obedience (Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:6–7). Love is not mere feeling; it has to be proved in action, just as God's love is proved (e.g., Isa. 41:13).

Nevertheless, the motive of fear predominates. The fear of God is the first essential motive in the laws of the Pentateuch (Lev. 19:14, 32; Deut. 13:11; 17:13). It is the decisive religious factor in OT piety (e.g., Ps. 103:11–17; Prov. 1:7; 23:17; Sir. 1:11–30). On the other hand, those who trust in God do not need to fear enemies, adversity, or danger (e.g., Ps. 27; 46).

NT 1. The NT notes various causes of fear: the appearance of angels (Matt. 28:4; Lk. 1:12; 2:9), the catastrophes in the end times (21:26), death (Heb. 2:15), rulers (Rom. 13:3), and the Jews (Jn. 7:13; 20:19). Fear in the sense of anxiety is denoted by the expression phobos kai tromos, fear and trembling, which occurs already in the LXX (e.g., Exod. 15:16; cf. 1 Cor. 2:3; 2 Cor. 7:15; Phil. 2:12).

phobos and its cognates are used in the sense of fear, awe, and reverence before God (e.g., Acts 9:31; 2 Cor. 7:1; Col. 3:22). Reverence should be shown to masters (Eph. 6:5; 1 Pet. 2:18), husbands (3:2), and those outside the church (3:15). phobeomai may be followed by apo (e.g., Matt. 10:28; Lk. 12:4). But it may also be used trans. with a person or a thing as its obj. (Matt. 14:5, the people; Heb. 11:23, the king's edict). In such cases the object of fear is some power behind the immediate object. The vb. is used in the weakened sense of "to be afraid that" in Acts 23:10 and Gal. 4:11.

The term phoboumenos ton theon, a God-fearing person (Acts 10:2, 22; 13:16, 26), is a designation for a non-Jew who has connections with the synagogue (→ prosēlytos, 4670). The adj. phoberos (fearful, terrible) occurs in Heb. 10:27, 31; 12:21.

2. Fear and reverence of God and of Christ (Eph. 5:21) provide both the motive for and the manner of Christian conduct (Lk. 18:2, 4; Acts 9:31; 1 Pet. 2:17; Rev. 11:18). Jesus himself impressed on his disciples the absolute necessity to fear God, who can destroy both body and soul in hell (Matt. 10:28; Lk. 12:5, → geenna, 1147). Jesus' warning, like the teaching of the apostles (2 Cor. 5:11; 1 Pet. 1:17), points unambiguously to the prospect of judgment. Paul could exhort the Philippians to "work out your salvation with fear and trembling" (Phil. 2:12). But this is only one side of the motivation, for he immediately adds: "it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose" (2:13).

3. The fear that overtakes people when they encounter God or his messengers may be seen in the accounts of the miracles of Jesus and the apostles and also in the appearances of Christ and the angels. But here, as in the OT, we repeatedly find the command, "Do not be afraid!" It occurs in the accounts of Jairus's daughter (Mk.

5:36; Lk. 8:50), Peter's catch of fish (5:10), the appearance of the angels to Zechariah and Mary (1:13, 30), Paul's visions (Acts 18:9; 27:24), John's vision on Patmos (Rev. 1:17), and the prophecy fulfilled on the first Palm Sunday (Jn. 12:15; cf. Isa. 41:10, 13; Zech. 9:9–10). It occurs in the pl. in the nativity story (Lk. 2:10), Jesus' walking on the water (Matt. 14:27; Mk. 6:50), the transfiguration (Matt. 17:7), and the angel's and Jesus' words at the empty tomb (28:5, 10).

4. The exhortation not to fear is also found frequently with regard to what is around us. We need not fear those who can only kill the body (Matt. 10:26, 28; Lk. 12:4–5). The little flock need not fear want (Lk. 12:32), while Christians should not fear their opponents (cf. Phil. 1:28) or suffering (1 Pet. 3:14; Rev. 2:10). Fear of other people is taken away from us by our sense of security in God (Matt. 10:30–31; Heb. 11:23, 27; 13:6).

5. The NT letters present the real ground for overcoming fear. Christ has appeared to "free those who all their lives were held in slavery by their fear of death" (Heb. 2:15). "God did not give us a spirit of timidity, but a spirit of power, of love and of self-discipline" (2 Tim. 1:7). Finally, "There is no fear in love. But perfect love drives out fear, because fear has to do with punishment. The one who fears is not made perfect in love" (1 Jn. 4:18; cf. 5:3). Thus, the NT presents a tension between fear and love. In a paradoxical way they exist together.

φραγμός (phragmos), fence, wall, hedge (5850); φράσσω (phrassō), to fence in, stop, close (5852).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. phragmos means a fencing in, hence a fence, enclosure. The corresponding vb. phrassō means to fence in, hedge around, esp. for protection or defense; fortify.

2. In the LXX, phragmos occurs 18x. It can refer to the wall of the city of Jerusalem (1 Ki. 11:27; cf. Ps. 144:14). A thorny hedge was used around vineyards to keep animals out, such as jackals and foxes (cf. Song 2:15). Fig. phragmos can refer to the "wall of protection" that God gives his people (Ezr. 9:9; cf. Isa. 5:2, 5; 58:12). In Ps. 62:3 a fragile person being assaulted by enemies is called a "leaning wall" (cf. a similar reference to the entire nation of Israel in 80:12).

phrassō occurs 8x in the LXX with a variety of meanings. In Prov. 21:13 it means to stop up (the ears), i.e., refuse to listen. In Song 7:2 it means to surround. In Job 38:8 Yahweh tells Job that he is the one who shuts in the sea. In Prov. 25:26 phrassō means to stop a well.

NT 1. phragmos is used in Matt. 21:33; Mk. 12:1 for the fence or hedge set up to protect the vineyard in the parable of the wicked tenants (cf. Isa. 5:2). This and the other precautions taken by the owner underline his care for his vineyard and his proprietary rights over it.

The messianic age will be inaugurated with a banquet (cf. Isa. 25:6). In Jesus' parable alluding to this great feast, the master, after being rebuffed by those originally invited (i.e., Jews), instructs his servant to go out to the highways and hedges (phrag- mous, Lk. 14:23; NIV "country lanes"; i.e., Gentiles) and persuade all he finds to come to the banquet.

In Eph. 2:14 phragmos refers to the ethnic "barrier" that stood between Gentiles and Jews, which has been removed by Christ.

2. phrassō occurs 3x in the NT. Paul concludes that one purpose of Scripture is to show that all people, both Jew and Gentile, stand condemned before God, so that every mouth "may be silenced" (Rom. 3:19). That is, no one can give any excuse or justification for his or her way of life when viewed against the standards required by a holy and perfect God. In 2 Cor. 11:10 Paul declares that no one will prevent him from boasting: a metaphor drawn from damming a river or barricading a road. Heb. 11:33 refers to those who by faith "shut" the mouths of lions (e.g., Dan. 6:22; 4 Macc. 16:3, 21; 18:13), thus transmuting their natural instincts.

φρόνησις (phronēsis), way of thinking, frame of mind, intelligence, good sense (5860); φρονέω (phroneō), think, judge, give one's mind to, set one's mind on, be minded (5858); φρόνημα (phronēma), way of thinking, mentality (5859); φρόνιμος (phronimos), intelligent, discerning, sensible, thoughtful, prudent (5861).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the words listed above by and large have their ordinary meanings. phronēsis frequently has the fuller sense of discernment, judicious insight.

2. All these words appear in the LXX of the OT. Various meanings are possible; e.g., in Job 5:13 phronēsis stands for cunning, craftiness, while phronimos has a corresponding sense in Gen. 3:1. In Prov. 24:5 phronēsis means a peasant's knowledge of his job; in Theod.'s trans. of Dan. 1:4; 5:12 it means intellectual acuteness, either as a qualification for training in the palace of the Persian king or in the interpretation of dreams.

These words occur mostly in wisdom lit., where they usually suggest discernment. Both noun and adj. are regularly used with reference to human beings, though phronēsis can denote the creative understanding of God (e.g., Prov. 3:19; Isa. 40:28; Jer. 10:12). In the LXX, one can detect a tendency to fill out the meaning of these words in accordance with the OT doctrine of wisdom (→ sophia, 5053).

NT 1. In the NT the vb. occurs more frequently (26x) than the nouns or adj. (phronēma, 4x, all in Rom. 8; phronēsis, 2x; phronimos, 14x). The vb. tends to retain its ordinary meaning; it is, so to speak, more neutral and requires a context to indicate its true sense. Note also the use of phroneō in Acts 28:22; 1 Cor. 13:11; Phil. 1:7; 4:10, where it refers not so much to the process of thinking as to the content of what is thought.

This is even clearer when phroneō is used absolutely; it acquires its proper meaning only from its immediate context: e.g., from the use of phroneō words that have prefixes—such as hyperphroneō, "think ... more highly" (Rom. 12:3) and sōphroneō (12:3, "think ... with sober judgment"; → sōphrosynē, 5408)—or that have the object ta hypsēla (lit., "do not think high things," i.e., "do not be arrogant," 11:20). These words and phrases indicate direction (upward or downward) and impart to phroneō its specific meaning in a given context.

2. In other words, there is no such thing as neutral thinking. Humans are always aiming at something; striving and endeavor are part of our nature. This is the idea behind phronēma, which means "mind" in Rom. 8:6 [2x], 7, 27. In this chapter Paul is describing the new life in Christ as life in God's Spirit. One's mind is set on certain things, and what these are depends on whether a person is controlled by the "sinful man" or "by the Spirit." Thus, "those who live according to the sinful nature" (8:5) set their minds on "what that nature desires." That is, their thinking and striving are directed toward those things that are human and transitory. But those "who live in accordance with the Spirit of God have their minds set on what the Spirit desires" (8:5). To them that are thus minded there is a promise of "life and peace" (8:6).

To focus one's mind on the sinful nature means death, not simply because there is an inevitable connection between the two (cf. Rom. 5:21; 6:23), but also because such thinking is rebellion against God and cannot submit to his law (8:7). In other words, the way we think is intimately related to the way we live, whether in Christ (i.e., in the Spirit and by faith) or in the sinful human nature (i.e., in sin and in spiritual death).

This close interrelationship between life and thought is echoed by the use of phroneō in Mk. 8:33 (cf. Matt. 16:23). There Pet. is reproved by Jesus because his thought and will are taking the side not of the things of God but of human things (which are opposed to God). It is God's will that Jesus be offered as a sacrifice, and by opposing that divine will in suggesting Jesus should not suffer and die, Pet. is furthering the cause of God's enemies (hence the sharp rebuke, "Get behind me, Satan!").

3. What should a Christian strive toward? What kind of thinking is fitting? The answer that seems most obvious—that one should strive for high ideals—is at first sight attractive to Christians. After all, God has given us gifts that we can seek to perfect and use for exalted purposes. But such striving can lead to jealousy, disappointment, and schisms in the church, as is seen in Corinth. That is why the apostle exhorts all Christians to "think . . .with sober judgment, in accordance with the measure of faith God has given" (Rom. 12:3), for "everything that does not come from faith is sin" (14:23).

In Rom. 12:16 Paul warns: "Do not be proud, but be willing to associate with people of low position." The proud are under God's judgment: "God opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble" (1 Pet. 5:5, quoting Prov. 3:34). Whether Paul is warning "charismatic" believers to beware of spiritual pride (perhaps the context of Rom. 12:16) or censuring Gentile Christians for arrogance toward Jews (cf. 11:20), the message to Christians is clear: We must aim not higher but lower, seek to identify with the lowly and humble, and strive for the unity of the church.

4. Moreover, a Christian's aims are closely intertwined with the motives underlying them. Thus, Paul frequently exhorts believers to be of one mind or of the same mind (Rom. 12:16; 15:5; 2 Cor. 13:11; Gal. 5:10; Phil. 2:2; 4:2). Such exhortations, which are linked often with warnings against arrogance, do not spring simply from a pragmatic outlook that puts church unity above all else; rather, they are based on Christ, since he is the one on whom the church is built. This is esp. prominent in the Christ hymn of Phil. 2:6–11 and in 2:5, which introduces this hymn. This verse is best understood as meaning: "Have the same thoughts among yourselves as you have in your communion with Christ Jesus," rather than simply seeing Jesus' own attitude as a model for us to follow.

If this is so, then Paul's call to unity is based on the fact that the church possesses new life under the lordship of Christ (cf. Phil. 2:10–11), new life that springs from his life of self-abasement. This interpretation is supported by Phil. 4:2, where church members are required to "agree . . . in the Lord" (lit., "think [phroneō] the same thing in the Lord"). "In the Lord" here is a formula for the believer's new life in Christ. Among other passages where the apostle calls for a harmonious attitude of mind, note his prayer in Rom. 15:5, where "a spirit of unity . . . as you follow Christ Jesus" is lit. "to think the same according to Jesus Christ." In other words, God has given us the opportunity of achieving unity and harmony in Christ. Our new standing in Christ both creates and demands a new mentality, which comes to concrete expression in the unity of the church.

5. Similar considerations underlie Paul's injunction in Col. 3:2: "Set your minds on things above, not on earthly things." "Things above" refer not to anything humanly exalted but to that heavenly sphere where the exalted Christ exercises his lordship (cf. 3:1). He frees us from all that would hold us down (contrast Phil. 3:19, where Paul accuses his opponents of having "their mind . . . on earthly things" and of making a god out of their "stomach").

6. (a) In the Gospels the adj. phronimos is confined to parables or fig. language; it refers to the wise, judicious behavior that should characterize people in God's kingdom. The examples offered are taken from everyday life: The wise man (phronimos) builds his house on the rock (Matt. 7:24); the five wise virgins have a supply of oil (25:1–9); a wise and faithful steward watches and is ready at the coming of his master (24:45); the unrighteous steward acts wisely (Lk. 16:8); and the wisdom of serpents is held up as an example to Christ's disciples (Matt. 10:16). Insofar as such wise thinking is contrasted with mōros, foolish thinking (→ mōria, 3702), the OT idea of wisdom is involved: The wise are those who do the will of the Lord (Matt. 7:24), whereas the foolish are those who refuse obedience.

(b) Paul's uses of phronimos arises from a slogan in circulation among the "charismatic" Corinthians who think they are "so wise in Christ" (1 Cor. 4:10), a claim Paul controverts (cf. 10:15; 2 Cor. 11:19). The wisdom claimed by such people is a purely human wisdom, which because of their arrogance jeopardizes the unity of the church. So Paul counters it both with a reference to his own suffering as an apostle and with the warning, supported by the OT, that those who regard themselves as wise fall under God's judgment (Rom. 11:25; 12:16).

7. The noun phronēsis comes closest to the OT concept of wisdom. In Eph. 1:8 it means discernment, insight. In Lk. 1:17 it may mean simply mental attitude, but since it occurs in a context strongly reminiscent of the OT, it means "the wisdom of the righteous." Such wisdom, however, is not merely rational discernment but is the result of God's people being turned to the obedience of faith, in accordance with OT prophecy.

φυλάσσω (phylassō), guard, preserve, keep (5875); φυλακή (phylakē), watch, guard, prison (5871); φύλαξ (phylax), guard, sentry (5874); φρουρέω (phroureō), guard, keep in custody, preserve (5864); φυλακτήριον (phylaktērion), phylactery (5873).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. phylassō means, intrans.: (a) be sleepless, watch, keep guard; (b) serve as garrison (for or in a city). This leads to the trans. use: (c) guard, preserve—originally of things, property, persons, and then fig. of love, loyalty, respect; (d) watch over, store (in safekeeping); (e) obey (an order, oath, law), attend to. phroureō means to pay attention to something; when used trans. it has the same meaning as phylassō.

2. In the LXX phroureō is found only 4x, all in the Apocr. phylassō (guard, watch, keep; follow, obey) is found over 400x, with no distinct difference in meaning between the act. and the mid. It usually denotes obedience to and keeping of the law, cultic regulations, the word of God in general, or the covenant. The subj. of the vb. can be the whole people of Israel, groups within it, or individuals (Exod. 12:24; Lev. 18:4; Deut. 5:1; Ps. 78:10; Prov. 19:16; Ezek. 11:20).

In general, the concept of phylassō developed in the OT from this original thought of fulfilling covenant obligations (positive or negative) to the intertestamental idea of keeping the law as the way to salvation (cf. Dan. 9:4; then also 1 Macc. 2:53; 8:26, 28; 4 Macc. 5:29; 6:18; 15:10; 18:7). At the end of this development God's covenant loyalty is regarded as dependent on the community's keeping of the law. The other cl. meanings of phylassō are also found in the LXX but much more rarely. To be stressed is the usage found esp. in Ps., of God's protecting actions for his people or the pious (cf. 12:7; 17:8; 145:20).

NT 1. In the NT phylassō occurs 31x, much less often than tereō (→ 5498). It means: keep watch (Lk. 2:8); guard (e.g., Acts 12:4; 23:35); protect (by God or Christ: Jn. 17:12; 2 Thess. 3:3; 2 Tim. 1:12; 2 Pet. 2:5; Jude 24; by humans: Jn. 12:25); observe (e.g., the law, Gal. 6:13; God's commandments, Mk. 10:20; the words of Jesus, Jn. 12:47; or the decisions of the apostles, Acts 16:4). In the mid. it can mean beware of, abstain from (Lk. 12:15; Acts 21:25; 2 Tim. 4:15; 2 Pet. 3:17; 1 Jn. 5:21).

2. Matt. and Mk. use phylassō once each (Matt. 19:20; Mk. 10:20). In both cases it denotes keeping the law (see above on OT). Although in these two passages and in Lk. 18:21 there is no direct criticism of Jewish observance of the law, the radical demand made by Jesus on the rich young ruler is indirectly a complete rejection of it.

Paul uses phylassō only in its Jewish sense, but the context can give it a particular nuance. In Rom. 2:26 it is anti-legal; in Gal. 6:13, anti-Judaistic. The same connotation is found in Acts 7:53, where Stephen in his defense denies that the Jews had ever kept the law; in other words, the Jewish conception of how the law should be kept was rejected from the standpoint of early Christianity. Acts 21:24 approves of the Jewish observance, because the Jewish Christians also did so.

The Jewish legacy to early Christianity is found in a much more important form when phylassō is used with tradition, the handing on of the Christian message and teaching. In Acts 16:4 Paul and Timothy delivered to the churches of Asia Minor the decisions of the council of Jerusalem (cf. also a similar meaning in 1 Tim. 5:21; 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:14). The future of the church depends on believers guarding, working out, and making real the inheritance received from the apostles. Note 2 Tim. 1:12, where the Lord himself guards it. This step of stressing tradition was necessary for the development of the early church. phylassō is found in its lit. meaning frequently in Lk. (2:8; 11:21; 12:15) and Acts (12:4; 23:35; cf. also Jn. 12:25; 2 Tim. 4:15; 2 Pet. 2:5).

In Jn. 12:47 the expression about not keeping Jesus' words means simply not to believe in him as the Revealer sent by God. Belief and keeping Jesus' words are defined in terms of each other.

3. In 2 Thess. 3:3 Paul deals with preserving the church's faith: God is the one who protects (phylassō) the church from the evil one. The basic thought here is eschatological; the concrete background is the threat of a rising false doctrine within the church. The position is similar in Jude 24 and Phil. 4:7 (where phroureō, guard [cf. 2 Cor. 11:32], is used; cf. also 1 Pet. 1:5), passages in which the church is commended to God's protection in its fight against false doctrine. In 1 Jn. 5:21 believers must be on guard against idols. Jn. 17:11–12 is concerned with the maintenance of the unity of the church and its exclusive relationship to Christ. Here phylassō and tēreō are used together as synonyms. phroureō is used in Gal. 3:23 in a special sense for the role of the law in the history of salvation.

4. (a) The noun phylakē means guard or watch (of the shepherds over their flocks in Lk. 2:8); also, the place of guarding or prison (Matt. 5:25; 14:3, 10; 18:30, where it is a picture of judgment); Lk. 21:12 (in the context of warnings about what will happen to Christ's disciples). In 1 Pet. 3:19 "the spirits in prison" presumably denote the underworld or place of punishment in hell. In Rev. 2:10 believers at Smyrna will be put in prison and are exhorted to remain faithful unto death so that they may receive the crown of life; in 20:7 Satan is released from his prison for a short time after the millennium and prior to his ultimate subjection. phylakē can also mean guard, sentinel (Acts 12:10); watch of the night, reflecting the Roman practice of dividing the time between 6 P.M. and 6 A.M. into four periods (Matt. 14:25; Mk. 6:48). phylax also denotes a guard or sentry (Acts 5:23; 12:6, 19).

(b) The related word phylaktērion (lit., a safeguard, means of protection) denotes a small box containing Scripture texts bound on the forehead and arm during prayer (Matt. 23:5; cf. Exod. 13:9, 16; Deut. 6:8; 11:18). Jesus refers to phylacteries in the context of his warnings against the Pharisees for merely external righteousness. They were regarded as a mark of devotion to the law as well as a protection against demonic influence.

See also tēreō, preserve, keep (5498); grēgoreō, watch, be on the alert, be watchful (1213); agrypneō, keep or be awake, keep watch, guard (70).

φυλή (phylē), tribe, clan, nation (5876).

CL & OT 1. In. cl. Gk. phylē derives from phyō, to bring forth, produce, be born. In the Athenian state the phylē became an important, if artificially constructed, unit of political organization. At first, it was limited to a group bound together by common descent, but the element of blood relationship almost disappears to mean simply a political subdivision of the people.

2. In the LXX phylē occurs over 400x, most frequently for the Heb. maṭṭeh and šebeṭ. Apart from Isa. 19:13, which refers to the tribes of Egypt, these two Heb. nouns apply only to Israelite tribes (though both words also denote a rod or staff). The other Heb. word that phylē sometimes translates is the word for clan, mišpāḥâ (this word is usually trans. by dēmos, people, → 1322). The tribe was divided into a number of clans and the clans into families (see, e.g., Jos. 7:14).

The general meaning of phylē is a body of people united by kinship or habitation. In the OT it is used not only as a technical term for the twelve tribes of Israel

(Num. 34:18–28), but it also applies to the nations of the world, as in the blessing of Abraham (Gen. 12:3). Later Jewish writings invariably mention tribes only in connection with OT texts, the number twelve, or the related hope of a regathering of all Israel. The Qumran community likewise speaks of the future restoration of a kingdom of twelve tribes.

NT 1. phylē occurs 31x in the NT, more than half of these in Rev. It can refer to the historic tribes of Israel (7:4–8, 13x) or universally to the tribes of the earth, i.e., peoples and nations (1:7). (a) "The twelve tribes of Israel" is used of eschatological Israel in Matt. 19:28; Lk. 22:30; Rev. 7:4; 21:12, i.e., the regenerated elect gathered out of the twelve tribes of historical Israel down through the ages (cf. Rom. 11:26). The promise in Matt. 19:28 that the twelve apostles will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, is a reward for their loyalty to Jesus. They will be given positions of royal authority and honor in the new world as judges, i.e., rulers (the sense of judge as in the book of Jdg.). In Lk. 22:29–30 Jesus speaks of assigning royal power to them.

(b) The phrase "the twelve tribes scattered among the nations" is used fig. of Christians as the true people of God in Jas. 1:1. The word "Israel" is first clearly equated with the Christian church by Justin Martyr (ca. A.D. 160). The nearest NT parallel is Gal. 6:16, where Paul prays for peace and mercy "to all who follow this rule, even to the Israel of God," i.e., all Christians, both Jewish and Gentile, who glory in the cross as the sole basis of their standing with God (→ Israēl, Israel, 2702).

2. (a) In Rev. 21:12 there are twelve gates to the heavenly Jerusalem, corresponding to the number of the tribes of Israel, and the names of the tribes are inscribed on the gates (cf. Ezek. 48:30–34; also the Temple Scroll at Qumran). More grandly, rab. Jud. thought in terms of 144 gates in the city wall, twelve for each tribe. The number twelve implies completeness: the whole regenerate people of God, the whole apostolic band (→ dōdeka, twelve, 1557).

(b) All twelve tribes are listed in Rev. 7:5–8, except Dan is replaced by Manasseh, which was actually a section of the tribe of Joseph. The change is probably deliberate, although we do not know why. Irenaeus held, based on an interpretation of Gen. 49:17, that Dan was omitted because the Antichrist was to come from this tribe. Rab. tradition consistently associated Dan with idolatry, deducing from 1 Ki. 12:28–29 that only Dan responded to the lure of the golden calf of Jeroboam I. The prince of Dan is said to be Satan in T. Dan 5:6.

Although Reuben was the firstborn son of Jacob (Gen. 35:23), Jn. puts Judah at the head of his list of the twelve tribes. This is no doubt because Jesus was of that tribe (Heb. 7:13–14; Rev. 5:5), in accordance with messianic expectation (Gen. 49:9).

3. Many Jews in NT times were either from proselyte families or the descendants of those forcibly converted to Jud. during Maccabean times. Thus only a minority of 1st-cent. Jews could genuinely trace their genealogy back to one of the twelve tribes of Israel. Even fewer Jews were able to do so after Herod the Great, who (according to tradition) burnt many Jewish family registers. Examples like Anna of the tribe of Asher (Lk. 2:36; cf. Gen. 30:13) and Paul of the tribe of Benjamin (Rom. 11:1; Phil. 3:5) show that where tribal origin was known, the pedigree was treasured. To be able to trace one's ancestral line back to a tribe was to have a sure claim on the covenant promises that the God of Israel made to his people. When Paul became a Christian, however, he willingly discarded the proudest of human links with the past, considering it to be so much "rubbish" in comparison with knowing Jesus (Phil. 3:7–8).

φύραμα (phyrama), a mixture, a lump (5878).

CL & OT 1. In cl. and Hel. Gk. phyrama describes something mixed or kneaded, like dough. Not until Plutarch is there a clear instance of this word being used for the dough-like mixture from which a potter molds wares.

2. In the LXX phyrama is unrelated to the potter's craft. It denotes the kneading bowls in which dough is prepared (Exod. 8:3), the dough itself (12:34), or the coarse flour to be worked into dough (Num. 15:20–21). The cognate vb. phyraō describes the mixing of unleavened flour with oil (e.g., Exod. 29:2, 40; Lev. 2:4–5; 1 Chr. 23:29) or the action of kneading (Gen. 18:6; 1 Sam. 28:24).

NT phyrama occurs 5x in the NT; 4x it refers to a lump of dough (Rom. 11:16; 1 Cor. 5:6, 7; Gal. 5:9). In Rom. 9:21, however, phyrama denotes the dough-like mixture of clay from which a potter may make one vessel for honored use and another to serve a menial purpose. Similarly, God has fashioned humans as vessels of mercy and of wrath. In the context it is clear that God's wrath stands in the service of his mercy and is designed to draw attention to the extent of his mercy toward all who receive by faith the righteousness provided in Christ (9:22–33).

φύσις (physis), nature, condition, kind (5882); φυσικός (physikos), natural (5879); φυσικῶς (physikōs), naturally, by instinct (5880).

CL & OT 1. (a) physis is a word from the Gk. world of ideas. Its meanings are many and varied and kept changing, depending on which philosopher used it.

(b) physis denotes source, commencement, origin, also the lineage of adults or children. Aristotle regarded physis as the primal substance of the elements. From this basic understanding, physis denotes natural condition, quality, or state (e.g., of the air); outward form and appearance; and stamp or character. When set alongside ethos, custom, and logos, reason, it means (human) nature or the imperishable—and perishable—nature of the gods. physis can be used both for the bodily physique of individuals and for the institutions and constitutions of states.

(c) physis can further denote the creation, i.e., the world of nature. It is the efficacious generative power that causes plants to appear and hair to grow. Nature is endowed with reason and determined by its end; it produces nothing without purpose. Aristotle distinguishes nature (physis) both from tychē, fate, and from technē, skill. In the natural order of things, all humans are similar despite their individual and national differences. Nature is self-sufficient and strong. Our lives are determined by the twin forces of nature and laws; this order fixes the natural end of life.

(d) Among the Stoics, physis became a god of the universe, as is indicated in a famous quotation from Marcus Aurelius: "O Nature, from you comes everything, in you is everything, to you goes everything." Of importance for the Stoics is the assertion that one should live by following nature. Nature is here conceived of as that which is in harmony, good in itself and resting, and thus distinguished from the field of morals and ethics.

2. The Heb. lacked the Gk. conception of nature. This is connected both with the fact that all existing things are referred to the creation or to the Creator God, and also with the stronger historical thought of the OT. Thus in the LXX physis occurs only in the Apocr., where the Hel. influence is most evident: in Wis. (3x), 3 Macc. (once), and 4 Macc. (8x).

(a) physis is used in the sense of endowment and character (4 Macc. 13:27); it can also indicate a quality, such as the power of love for one's children (16:3). In 5:25 we read of the law being adapted to our nature, for the Creator of the world feels for us according to our nature. In 15:25, physis stands alongside genesis, creation, and philoteknia, filial love, to denote the regular order of nature. Nature is a dispenser of good things. Thus Antiochus seeks to convince elderly Eleazar to eat pork with the words, "When nature has granted it to us, why should you abhor eating the very excellent meat of this animal?" (5:8, NRSV).

(b) In 3 Macc. 3:29 physis means created beings, the whole world of creation, including humankind. In Wis. 7:20 it refers to species of living beings, but also (with reference to material objects) the fire-extinguishing property of water (19:20b). By nature, fundamentally, all human beings are foolish (13:1).

3. Philo is the first known Jewish writer to take over the word consciously. But he also modified it as he sought to expound the Jewish faith in its strength and breadth. (a) For him God stands in the foreground. Philo, in fact, ascribes to physis much of what, from the OT point of view, is the work of God. Like wisdom (cf. Prov. 8), physis is a power that participated in God's work of creation, though God himself stands outside nature.

(b) This physis is that which brings forth, e.g., all humanity. It is immortal. It teaches the division of time into day and night, waking and sleeping, and it also creates space, which remains confined to three dimensions. It reveals us to be people who dispose over plants and animals; it has given us speech and sexual relations.

(c) The law is the true word of nature, for the law follows nature and the prescriptions of the law are in agreement with nature. That is why one must follow nature and its developments. Nature ratifies the law. Philo also regarded nature as capable of receiving virtue; conscience makes use of it, because it hates evil and loves good. To nature belong godliness and love of humankind.

4. (a) Josephus similarly took over and adopted the Gk. concept of physis to his Jewish outlook. physis stands for the condition and characteristics of animals and humans and of natural self-love. It is almost synonymous with character. physis can also denote the being of God, of all things, or of the elements.

(b) At times physis means nature as a whole, the whole created world, or natural instincts. Thus a person can be active by nature or naturally freedom-loving. By contrast, sexual deviations are contrary to nature.

(c) physis can denote natural qualities. Thus suicide is foreign to the common nature of all living beings. physis can also mean the regular order of nature and its laws or the juxtaposition of divine and natural law.

NT physis in the NT occurs mostly in Paul, esp. Rom. (7x; the adj. physikos occurs 2x). Elsewhere the word occurs only in isolated passages. It has various shades of meaning, which correspond to the previous usage of the word.

1. In Gal. 2:15 physis means "by birth," i.e., one's line of descent. Corresponding to this is Rom. 2:27, where Paul refers to those who remain "physically" uncircumcised; one's line of descent is the reason why someone has not been circumcised. But Paul also says that such a man can fulfill the law and so perform God's will without belonging to Israel.

God will not spare the wild olive shoot (the Gentile Christians) if he did not spare "the natural branches" (the Jews) that belonged to the rich olive tree (Rom. 11:21). In Paul's parable here, the wild olive shoot is cut from a wild olive tree, to which it belongs "by nature," and is grafted "contrary to nature" into the cultivated olive tree. Paul's argument concludes: How much more can the "natural" olive branches that belong to the rich olive tree be grafted back (again) into their own olive tree (11:24). Paul is here following Hel. linguistic usage with his reference to the distinction between Jews and non-Jews. As transgressors of the first commandment the heathen are "by nature" (i.e., by descent) objects of wrath (Eph. 2:3; cf. Wis. 13:1). But this situation is ended by the grace of Christ in the lives of those whom God has made alive (Eph. 2:5–10).

2. physis stands further for the regular order of nature, which determines the distinction between the sexes. God has given up on the idolaters, with the result that they have exchanged "natural [physikēn] relations" between men and women for "unnatural ones" (Rom. 1:26; lit., "contrary to nature"). Yet some heathen do not have the Torah but do "by nature" what the law demands (2:14). It is not as if they read off the law from the natural order; rather, we are dealing here with the typically Stoic thought of the moral law founded in nature, which was taken over by Jud. and applied to the Torah. In this way the Mosaic law becomes the universal and perfect expression of the moral law founded in nature. In a similar way, Paul insists that "the very nature of things" teaches that it is degrading for a man, but a source of pride for a woman, to have long hair (1 Cor. 11:14).

3. In 2 Pet. 1:4, the apostle speaks of believers as those who "participate in the divine nature," which is a result of the "knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1:8) and our "calling and election" (1:10). The thought is not that of a metamorphosis into quasi-deity, for the results of this participation are expressed in positive human qualities. It is rather that to be truly human, one needs an enabling that comes from God himself. This teaching is comparable with Paul's instructions on the new creation and Jn.'s on being born again. Participation in the divine nature and its outworking in life are prerequisite for entrance "into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (1:11).

In contrast to participation in the divine nature stands the use of the adj. physikos, which is applied to humans in their natural state: "But these men . . . are like brute beasts, creatures of instinct [physika], born only to be caught and destroyed" (2 Pet. 2:12). The corresponding adv. (physikōs) occurs in a closely related passage: "Yet these men speak abusively against whatever they do not understand; and what things they do understand by instinct [physikōs], like unreasoning animals—these are the very things that destroy them" (Jude 10).

4. Jas. 3:7 uses physis twice in the sense of "kind": "All kinds [physis] of animals, birds, reptiles and creatures of the sea are being tamed and have been tamed by [humankind]." The thought corresponds with the conception of a regular order of nature. The point of the allusion is to emphasize, by contrast, the fact that "no man can tame the tongue. It is a restless evil, full of deadly poison" (3:8).

φωνή (phōnē), sound, noise, voice, language (5889); φωνέω (phōneō), make a sound, call, summon (5888).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. phōnē signifies an audible sound made by a living creature, covering the whole range of animal noises or human sounds. As applied to human beings, it means voice, speech, or statements. A deity was thought to have an extraordinary phōnē (cf. Acts 12:21–22). phōneō can denote the sound of a musical instrument, person, or animal.

2. In the LXX phōnē generally denotes any audible sound, from the clap of thunder (Exod. 19:16) to the twittering of birds (Ps. 104:12), but not the organ of speech or speech itself. In several psalms (e.g., Ps. 29:3–4; 104:7) God's revelatory voice is described as thunder. To hear (i.e., obey) God's voice was the essence of Israel's religion (1 Sam. 12:14; cf. Jos. 24:19–24). By the 1st cent. the rabbis had a developed view of an echo of a heavenly voice that was audible on earth and proclaimed divine messages.

phōneō occurs 26x in the LXX: for human speech (Ps. 115:7 = LXX 113:15; 3 Macc. 2:22), animal cries (Zeph. 2:14), and a trumpet blast (Amos 3:6).

NT 1. As in the LXX, so in the NT phōnē describes any noise or sound, whatever its source: e.g., the wailing of Rachel (Matt. 2:18), the rustling of wind (Jn. 3:8), or the tumult of a crowd (Rev. 19:1). It occurs 139x in the NT.

2. Not all human voices sound alike (Jn. 3:29; Acts 12:14), and each person has more than one "tone" (Gal. 4:20). Speaking in a loud voice is something humans can do (Lk. 23:23; Acts 7:57, 60; 14:10; 26:24), including the souls of martyrs (Rev. 6:9–10). Unclean spirits (Mk. 1:26; 5:7; Lk. 4:33; Acts 8:7), angels (Rev. 5:12; 14:7, 9), and the archangel (1 Thess. 4:16) may also speak this way. Particularly noticeable is the close association of this idea with (a) the praise of God by angels (Rev. 5:11–12) or humans (Lk. 17:15–16; 19:37–38; Rev. 7:9–10); (b) the power of Jesus to raise the dead by his voice (Jn. 11:43; cf. 5:25, 28–29); and (c) the cry of Jesus at his death (Matt. 27:46, 50; Lk. 23:46).

3. The loud voice from heaven that figures so prominently in Rev. (e.g., 1:10; 4:1; 10:8; 11:12) or that dialogues with Pet. regarding Jewish food laws (Acts 10:9–16) is the personal voice of God (Rev. 16:17), Christ (Acts 10:13–15; 11:7–9), an angel (Rev. 18:1–2), or some heavenly inhabitants (11:15). Linking together the Synoptic records of Jesus' baptism (Matt. 3:13–17; Mk. 1:9–11; Lk. 3:21–22) and transfiguration (Matt. 17:1–8; Mk. 9:2–8; Lk. 9:28–36) is the "voice ... from heaven" (Mk. 1:11) or "from the cloud" (9:7). The words "my Son" in this messianic confirmation clearly indicate that the voice belongs to God the Father.

4. For Jn., to hear (i.e., obey) the voice of Jesus (Jn. 10:3, 16, 27; 18:37) is to gain eternal life (5:24–25; 6:68; 10:27–28).

5. Paul too heard a voice from heaven during his conversion experience (Acts 9:4; 22:7; 26:14); his companions heard the voice but did not understand what was being said (9:7; 22:9).

6, Not infrequently the content of a phōnē is a solemn declaration of confession of faith (Acts 13:27; 19:34; 22:14; 24:21; 2 Pet. 1:17).

7. phōneō occurs 43x in the NT, only in the four Gospels, Acts, and Rev. 14:18. In some cases (e.g., Lk. 8:8; 16:24; Acts 10:18) it means the same as krazō (to cry out, → 3189), esp. when megalē phōnē (lit., "loud voice") is added (e.g., Mk. 1:26). It sometimes denotes an urgent request (Matt. 27:47) or a powerful command (Lk. 8:54; Jn. 12:17), and not infrequently an authoritative summoning (e.g., Mk. 9:35; Lk. 16:2) or a polite invitation (e.g., 14:12; Jn. 1:48). In Palestine the cock would crow (phōneō in Matt. 26:34, 74) during the third watch (i.e., between midnight and 3 A.M.).

See also hēsychia, quiet, quietness, rest, silence (2484); ēchos, sound, noise, report (2491); sigaō, to be quiet, be silent (4967); siōpaō, to be quiet, be silent (4995); phimoō, to quiet, muzzle (5821).

φῶς (phōs), light, brilliance, brightness (5890); φωτίζω (phōtizō), light up, illumine, bring to light (5894); φωτισμός (phōtismos), illumination, enlightenment (5895); φωτεινός (phōteinos), shining, bright, radiant (5893); φωστήρ (phōstēr), luminary, brightness (5891); φωσφόρος (phōsphoros), bearing light, morning star (5892).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the basic meaning of phōs is light, brightness; it also covers nuances such as sunlight, daylight, torch, fire, eyesight. Fig. phōs means the light of life, i.e., life itself, which is highly valued as something bright. One who brings salvation or victory is also referred to as phōs. The vb. phōtizō, almost always trans., means to light up, illumine, make visible. Its corresponding noun phōtismos denotes brilliance, radiance, revelation. The adj. phōteinos means shining, bright. A further derivative is phōstēr, luminary or brightness; from Euripides on the morning star (the planet Venus) is termed phōsphoros.

(b) Relatively early in Gk. usage phōs came to mean the sphere of ethical good, whereas misdeeds are said to take place in darkness. Hence the task of a judge is to bring hidden things "to light." In Plato, phōs increased its range of connotation; that is, it could stress the illuminating qualities of knowledge. Light possesses powers essential to true life. Hence "to be in the light" came to mean simply "to live," whereas to be in Hades (→ hadēs, 87) was to be in darkness.

(c) In many ancient religions the metaphor of light was important. The gods lived in a world of brightness, and torch races were held as part of their cultic veneration. In some mystery cults the cleansing and refining effect of fire played no small part. Gnosticism marked the climax of this process. It saw an essential difference between light and darkness, which stood against each other as hostile powers. Human beings, who by nature are in darkness, must liberate the elements of light within their own souls and free them from earthly matter so that they may be reunited with the supernatural world to which they really belong and so attain to true life. Light and life are inseparably connected.

2. (a) The OT frequently refers to light and its effects. The primeval light (Gen. 1:3) has pride of place over all the other lights; even the stars are only light-bearers. The sun, being the brightest heavenly body, is assigned to the day (Gen. 1:14–18; Sir. 43:2–5), and each new day begins with the ushering in of morning light (2 Sam. 23:4). The moon and stars seek to penetrate the darkness of the night (Gen. 1:16; Sir. 43:6–10). In a culture filled with astrological beliefs, the Israelites stressed the creation of light in order to render abortive any attempt to deify it. There is only one God, Yahweh. He creates light and darkness, and since he is Lord also of the darkness, he is able to turn darkness into light (Ps. 139:11–12).

(b) The OT frequently refers to light as a kind of attribute of God; light is his garment (Ps. 104:2). His nearness and presence are indicated by light (cf. Exod. 13:21–22; Neh. 9:12; Isa. 60:19–20; Dan. 2:22; Hab. 3:4). Light is esp. a feature of God's self-manifestation (Ps. 4:6; 43:3; 89:15).

For humanity the light of Yahweh means salvation, an idea expressed in Ps. 27:1: "The LORD is my light and my salvation—whom shall I fear?" (cf. Job 22:28). The light that comes from God sets the bounds of every person's life and arises on everyone (cf. 25:3; Sir. 42:16). Yet each person must turn to the light and consciously acknowledge its source.

The light of the ungodly is worthless. It goes out (Job 18:5–6) or is taken from them (38:15). They grope in darkness (cf. 12:25; Prov. 4:19), and even after death darkness will still surround them (Ps. 49:19), while God will redeem the soul of the righteous "from the grave" (49:15).

(c) Yet during their earthly lives, the godly enjoy the light of the living (Ps. 112:4; cf. Job 33:30; Prov. 4:18; 13:9). They experience God's saving power when they open their hearts to the light of God's Word (Ps. 119:105; cf. Prov. 6:23; Wis. 7:10, 26). In God's light we see light (Ps. 36:9). Only when enlightened by God does the nature of reality dawn on us. Our lives must be lived in the light, i.e., in concrete obedience to God's commandments. Just as the "pillar of fire" marked Israel's route at the time of their exodus from Egypt (Exod. 13:21–22), so the law shows us how to walk in the light (cf. the exhortation of Isa. 2:5).

The prophets esp. stress the importance of walking in holiness and righteousness. Those who walk in the light themselves become a light for others (said of the Servant of the Lord, Isa. 42:6; 49:6). This missionary outlook is marked by a worldwide hope even in the OT for the truth of Yahweh will go forth as "a light to the nations" (51:4), who will flock to God's light (60:3). In the OT wisdom lit. we see the antithesis of light and darkness as the respective spheres of the God-fearing and the ungodly (e.g., Prov. 4:18–19).

3. (a) This dualism of light and darkness receives radical treatment in Qumran texts. The "sons of light" (i.e., members of the Qumran community) are locked in a conflict with the "sons of darkness" (1QS 1:9, 18, 24; 2:5, 16, 19; 3:13). This confrontation corresponds to a similar one in the metaphysical world of spirits, where the Prince of Light (3:20; CD 5:18; 1QM 13:10) is opposed as lord of the world by the Angel of Darkness (1QS 3:20–21). The sons of light are subject to attacks from the Angel of Darkness and his evil spirits, and their situation would be desperate apart from the help of the "God of Israel." He limits the power of darkness, for he created the spirits of both light and darkness.

(b) In Philo wisdom and knowledge are called the light of knowledge, i.e., they cast true light on the whole question of existence. Since he viewed salvation in terms of light, it is easy to see why he used the metaphor of light for epistemological concepts. The logos is light, as is the human nous or understanding. By describing conscience as phōs, Philo indicates the connection between knowledge and ethical behavior. Pride of place among the virtues is piety and love for God. He is the one and only God, living in a heaven of brightness and light.

NT In the NT phōs occurs 73x, of which 33 are in the Johannine writings; phōtizō occurs 11x; phōtismos 2x (2 Cor. 4:4, 6); phōteinos 5x; phōstēr 2x (Phil. 2:15; Rev. 21:11); phōsphoros only once (2 Pet. 1:19).

1. (a) The original meaning of phōs is found in reference to the light of the sun (Rev. 22:5), which is absent at night (Jn. 11:10); the light of lamps (Lk. 8:16; 11:33; Acts 16:29; Rev. 18:23; 22:5); and the warm glow of a fire (Mk. 14:54; Lk. 22:56).

(b) The "bright cloud" used by God in the transfiguration of his Son (Matt. 17:5) points beyond itself to God, whose appearing is inevitably accompanied by effulgence. The Son, too, is surrounded by radiance: "His face shone like the sun, and his clothes became white as the light" (17:2). Here light is a manifestation of God's presence; in several other places it indicates the appearing of the exalted Christ (Acts 9:3; 22:6, 9, 11; 26:13), and in still others the coming of angels as messengers from God himself (12:7; cf. Matt. 28:2–3).

The disciples are also described as light or light-bearers (Matt. 5:14, 16; Lk. 11:35; cf. Eph. 5:8; Phil. 2:15), since it is their task to pass on the divine light they have received. That which they heard from Jesus in the intimacy of his closed circle of friends they are to proclaim fearlessly "in the daylight" (i.e., in public; Matt. 10:27; cf. Lk. 12:3). As missionaries of Christ, they are to shine out into the world, not with their own light but with the light of heaven, God's dwelling-place (1 Tim. 6:16), or even with the light of God himself (1 Jn. 1:5).

2. Jn. portrays Jesus Christ as light breaking in upon the darkness of the world. Already in Jn. 1:4, light and life are linked together, i.e., Christ is the only remedy for those who by nature are in darkness (cf. 8:12). John the Baptist is a witness to the light (1:6–9; 5:35–36). "The true light that gives light to every man" came into the world in the person of Jesus Christ (1:9).

This same note of exclusiveness is sounded in one of Christ's celebrated "I am" sayings: "I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness, but will have the light of life" (Jn. 8:12; cf. 9:5; 12:46). By making the world bright, we as humans are able to see. Simply recognizing the way is not sufficient, however. We must walk in it, for he who is the light and the way does not want mere admirers but believing followers. Thus Jesus challenges us: "Put your trust in the light . . . so that you may become sons of light" (12:36).

An admonition such as this is necessary because the natural self loves darkness rather than light (Jn. 3:19). Even though since the coming of Jesus Christ "the darkness is passing " (1 Jn. 2:8), the Christian who comes to the light still needs to be urged to keep the commandment of brotherly love (2:8–10), for "whoever loves his brother lives in the light" (2:10; cf. 1:6–7). To do this, we must be in communion with him who is the light of the world, Jesus Christ.

3. Though using these words less frequently than Jn., Paul gives them a similar theological content. Light and darkness are as incompatible as righteousness and lawlessness (2 Cor. 6:14). The content of light is Christological. The god of this world has blinded unbelievers "so that they cannot see the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ." But God, "who said, 'Let light shine out of darkness,' made his light shine in our hearts to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (2 Cor. 4:4, 6; cf. Gen. 1:3; 2 Tim. 1:10). Through him we share "in the inheritance of the saints in the kingdom of light" (Col. 1:12). Thus, believers are "children of light" and "light in the Lord" (Eph. 5:8; cf. 1 Thess. 5:5).

Such sonship, however, makes ethical demands on its recipients: "The fruit of the light consists in all goodness, righteousness and truth" (Eph. 5:9). Thus we must walk according to the light—and all the more so since Christians bear a missionary responsibility for the world about us, a responsibility we can only meet if we "shine like stars [phōstēr] in the universe" (Phil. 2:15; cf. Acts 13:47), even though this may involve them in conflict (Heb. 10:32).

In this world Christians live their lives, so to speak, between God and Satan. The latter can even disguise himself as "an angel of light" (2 Cor. 11:14). Hence Christians must put on "the armor of light" (Rom. 13:12). Only those who have fought a good fight in this armor have no need to fear the day when "the Father of the heavenly lights" (Jas. 1:17) brings to light what is hidden (1 Cor. 4:5).

4. Like the OT and 1st-cent. Jud., the NT describes the future of the ungodly in terms of eschatological darkness that symbolizes perdition. But believers have a hope that enables them to see the end of time differently. This too can be depicted in terms of light. In the new Jerusalem there will no longer be sun, moon, or created light, "for the glory of God gives it light, and the Lamb is its lamp [lychnos, → 3394]. The nations will walk by its light" (Rev. 21:23–24; cf. 22:5). While the ungodly are excluded (21:8, 27; 22:3, 11, 18–19), there is an echo here of the Gentiles' coming to the light alongside Israel, which is featured in the eschatological proclamation of Isa. 2:2–5; 24:23; 60:1, 19.

In 2 Pet. 1:19 the apostle admonishes: "You will do well to pay attention to [the word of the OT prophets], as to a light shining in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star [phōsphoros] rises in your hearts." Stars are messianic symbols (→ astēr, 843; cf. Num. 24:17; Lk. 1:78; Rev. 22:16). The thought of Christ as the morning star in 2 Pet. 1:19 presents a marked contrast with Isa. 14:12, where "morning star, son of the dawn" is a title applied to the king of Babylon, whose fall Isa. proclaims. Christ will claim the final victory.

χαίρω (chairō), be glad, rejoice (5897); χαρά (chara), joy (5915); συγχαίρω (synchairō), rejoice with (5176).

CL & OT 1. chairō means be glad, rejoice; chara, joy. The pres. imperative frequently occurs in the greeting chaire (sing.), chairete (pl.), "Hail!" At the opening of a letter the infinitive chairein, is often used; the same formula is used at parting, "Farewell!" chara denotes both the state and the object of the joy. Also to be noted is the connection with charis (grace), which has not always been clearly distinguished in meaning from chara.

2. In the LXX chara appears primarily in the later writings (e.g., Wis. and 1–4 Macc.). There is no clear distinction between chairō and euphrainō (2370), which translate the same Heb. words (Est. 8:17; Prov. 29:6; Lam. 4:21). chairō covers both the subjective feeling and the objective cause of joy. Of all the words in this group, it thus comes closest to the Heb. šālôm, peace, salvation, and in fact is used to translate this in Isa. 48:22; 57:21. The vb. and the noun do not often appear in the context of joy in worship (Ps. 30:11); agalliaō and euphrainō are used here.

3. A nonspecific use as a greeting occurs particularly in 1–4 Macc. The general meaning to be glad, be pleased, is found in Gen. 45:16; Isa. 39:2. In the OT there is no apology for joy in the good things of life, such as health (Sir. 30:16), wise children (Prov. 23:25), eating and drinking (1 Ki. 3:1), or peace in the land (1 Macc. 14:11, euphrainō). But Prov. also warns that joy can be transitory and is threatened by the vicissitudes of life, for after laughter comes weeping (14:13).

4. God is the giver of all joy and blessings (1 Ki. 8:66). He gives and keeps his gracious word (8:56), which far outweighs transitory blessings. This word comforts and strengthens in times of temptation and distress (Jer. 15:16). It enables us to endure until such time as God turns mourning into joy (Ps. 126:5). The fear of the Lord is thus a source of joy (Sir. 1:12). As a result, chairō serves also to describe eschatological joy, rejoicing over ultimate salvation and peace (Isa. 66:10, 14; Joel 2:21, 23; Zech. 10:7).

5. Rab. Jud. emphasized joy in the law. Reading the Pentateuch is described in this way. In Philo divine wisdom is a source of joy. In Qumran joy springs from knowledge of the truth (1QH 11:30), but here it is the knowledge of God's election and mercy toward his elect. There is a decisive contrast between present sadness in affliction and chastisement (9:24) and the joy of final victory (e.g., 1QM 13:12–14; 14:4), when the sons of light will be brought to everlasting joy (1QH 13:6).

NT In the NT chairō occurs 74x, chara 59x, and synchairō 7x, mostly in the Gospels and Paul's letters. It is no accident that the words appear esp. in which eschatological fulfillment in Christ, being in him, and hope in him are mentioned. But note that the whole NT message as the proclamation of God's saving work in Christ is a message of joy.

1. The general use as a greeting needs only brief mention. chairein is used at the beginning of a letter in Acts 15:23; 23:26; Jas. 1:1. In Matt. 28:9 the risen Christ makes himself known to his disciples by using the familiar, everyday greeting, chairete. In 2 Jn. 10 those addressed are warned not to "welcome" teachers of heretical doctrine, so as to avoid involvement in their evil deeds. When in Matt. 26:49; 27:29, par. Jesus is saluted in derision as "Rabbi" or "King of the Jews," there is a concealed irony since he is unwittingly given the title that is his due. In Lk. 1:28, Mary is startled not so much by the chaire as by the message that follows.

2. According to the Synoptics, the coming of Jesus brings in a time of joy (cf. Matt. 9:15; Mk. 2:19; Lk. 5:34). The fact that he brings in the final salvation distinguishes him from John the Baptist and the OT prophets. The effect of his work and preaching is to bring joy (19:6). Even when he becomes an offense and the way of those who walk in his footsteps leads to suffering and persecution, the joyful assurance of salvation should not be lost: "Rejoice [chairete] and be glad, because great is your reward in heaven!" (Matt. 5:12).

Jesus is the coming judge of the whole world. Hence those who remain faithful to Christ's commission and receive the word with no mere ephemeral joy (Matt. 13:20 par.) will hear one day the welcoming summons to the joyous banquet of his Lord (cf. 25:21, 23; cf. Rev. 19:7, 9). When the disciples met the risen Christ, they were seized not only with fear but also with great joy (Matt. 28:8; cf. Mk. 16:8; Lk. 24:9).

3. (a) Lk.'s Gospel has joy as one of its basic themes, beginning with the birth narratives. Zechariah is promised joy and gladness; many will rejoice at the birth of his son (1:14) because of what God is about to do on behalf of his people (cf. 2:15). When Elizabeth meets the mother of the Savior, the child leaps for joy in her womb (agalliasis, 1:44). Jubilant praise of God, in the majestic language of the OT psalms, is expressed in the Magnificat of Mary (1:47) and in the hymn of Zechariah (1:68–79). The basis and content of this great joy is the Christmas message that in Jesus God has visited and redeemed his people (1:68) and has taken care of lost humanity.

Joy is an important result of Jesus' miracles (Lk. 13:17). The 70 disciples may share in his power over evil spirits and be filled with joy and pride (10:17), but joy in God's electing love counts for still more: "Rejoice that your names are written in heaven" (10:20; cf. Matt. 7:22–23). God deals mercifully with the lost, and there is joy in heaven over one sinner who repents (Lk. 15:7, 10, 32). Indeed, the whole of Lk. 15—with its parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son—presents Jesus as calling on us to rejoice with him over the lost returning to the Father (15:6, 9 [synchairō], 32 [chairō]). The conclusion of Lk. is remarkable for its amazement and overflowing joy (24:41, 52). This message is to be carried beyond Israel and preached to all nations.

(b) This process is repeated in Acts in expressions of joy over the irresistible worldwide expansion of the church. There is first the apostles' joy in suffering shame and persecution for Christ's sake (5:41; cf. Matt. 5:11–12). Believers experience such joy through the enabling of the Holy Spirit (Acts 13:52; cf. 7:55). There is also joy over the ingathering of the Gentiles (11:23; 13:48; 15:3). When the gospel is preached to them and they are baptized, the persons concerned are filled with joy (8:8, 39; 15:31).

4. Jn. in his Gospel features complete joy or fullness of joy (cf. 1 Jn. 1:4; 2 Jn. 12). It occurs as early as Jn. 3:29, where John the Baptist's joy is full on account of the "bridegroom," the promised revealer of heavenly truth (cf. Matt. 9:14–15 par.). The eschatological hour of joy has now arrived, in which continuous sowing exists side by side with harvest time (Jn. 4:35–36), and in which Jesus is already accomplishing the work he was given to do (cf. 4:34). Abraham in heaven joins in the rejoicing over this day (8:56). The perfect joy that Jesus has, because he is in full communion with the Father (14:20) and does his will (4:34), is to be given to the disciples as well (15:11). This he asks from the Father (17:13) and therefore exhorts his own to abide in him and in his love (15:4, 9). His work of love is completed as he lays down his life for his "friends" (15:13); it will only be fully revealed, however, when he goes away from them (16:20).

The world cannot take away this joy and consolation any more than it can take away the peace that Jesus gives (Jn. 14:27; 16:33), for they do not belong to this world. His disciples can expect the world's hatred and persecution (15:19; 16:2). But fear is banished because Jesus has overcome the world (16:33; cf. 1 Jn. 1:4). Present sadness will be turned into joy (Jn. 16:22).

5. The Pauline letters testify to the paradox that Christian joy can be found only in the midst of sadness, affliction, and care. Indeed, this is precisely where it gives proof of its power. (a) This joy has its source beyond mere earthly, human joy. It is joy in the Lord. This is why Paul constantly exhorts his readers to manifest such joy (Rom. 12:12; 2 Cor. 6:10; Phil. 3:1; 4:4, 10). It is "joy in the faith" (Phil. 1:25; cf. Rom. 15:13); that is, it has its basis in the hope and confidence of faith, which despite all troubles and fear is certain of justification through Christ (Rom. 8:31–32; 2 Cor. 7:4) and looks forward to his return. Joy is also a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22; cf. Rom. 14:17; 1 Thess. 1:6). It is thus a spiritual gift, and in this respect approximates to charis, grace. Because faith and its consequent joy do not come from ourselves, Paul can be confident and rejoice even when Christ is preached with base motives. The important thing is that God is doing his gracious work and that as many as possible share in the gospel (Phil. 1:5–6, 15–18).

(b) In 2 Cor. Paul places joy in direct contrast to thlipsis, affliction (→ 2568), by which he means not only the distress caused by outward trials, but also the necessary sorrow aroused by his apostolic rebukes. He protests to the Corinthians that "we work with you for your joy" (1:24). He wrote a harsh letter to them so that his joy might be shared by all (2:3). The lives of the Corinthians must be ruled not by passive resignation or the worldly grief that produces death (7:10), but by the joy of a purified faith. Having sharply rebuked them earlier, Paul has regained his confidence in them, and he now has even stronger grounds for rejoicing (7:9, 13).

(c) Paul wrote the letter to the Philippians from prison (possibly in Ephesus), at a time when he was still uncertain of the outcome of his trial. There is evidence that Paul felt lonely (Phil. 2:20–21) and that the faithful preaching of the gospel was in jeopardy (1:15–18; 2:21). Yet there were also grounds for thankfulness and unmitigated joy: thankfulness for the participation of the Philippians in the gospel enterprise (1:5), and joy over the continuing proclamation of Christ (1:18). Thus, constrained by the gospel and by Christ himself, Paul exhorts his readers to rejoice together with him (synchairō, 2:17–18), to cast care behind them (4:6), and to be of one mind in the fellowship of the Spirit (2:1–2). All Paul cares is that Christ be magnified in his body (1:20). Above all his joy is in the Lord (4:4).

(d) The present period of trial and distress is limited, for the Lord is at hand (Phil. 4:5; cf. 1 Thess. 5:2–3). Hence joy is based primarily on the hope that after suffering together we will be glorified together (Rom. 8:17). This joyous and confident waiting for the day of Christ puts our present experience into true perspective. It enables us to sympathize with others (12:15), and it reminds us that our present joys and sorrows belong to this life only and are not our final lot (1 Cor. 7:30; 2 Cor. 6:10).

6. (a) This Pauline teaching about joy in affliction and temptation proved its value when the later NT letters were being written. By this time, the persecution of Christians was so severe as to threaten the very existence of the church (1 Pet. 4:12–13). Still, being robbed of material goods could not deprive them of their joy (Heb. 10:34). Granted, persecution brings real distress (12:11). Thus, believers must exercise patience (10:36) and continue obediently in sound doctrine (12:17). Christ voluntarily gave up his own joy and took on himself the shame of the cross. Only looking to him can we obtain patience and endurance in temptation (12:2; cf. 1 Pet. 1:8–9).

(b) Jas. 1:2 comes close to teaching Christians to rejoice in martyrdom (cf. Acts 5:41). In the course of the church's history, however, this has at times degenerated into virtually seeking martyrdom for its own sake.

CL & OT chalepos can be used of words that are difficult to bear, or of humans and animals that are hard to deal with and thus dangerous. Sometimes this word has moral implications, meaning bad or evil (cf. Wis. 3:19; 17:11; 19:13). In Isa. 18:2 it is used of a nation, probably in the sense of harsh. In Sir. 3:21, it is used of intellectual difficulty—that which is too difficult for a student.

NT chalepos occurs only 2x in the NT. In Matt. 8:28 it indicates the devilish ferocity of the two demoniacs from the country of the Gadarenes. In 2 Tim. 3:1 it denotes the character of the last days: times of hardship when self-interest is a decisive factor in human relationships.

5908 (chalkion, a copper vessel or implement), → 5910.

5910 χαλκός — χαλκός (chalkos), copper, bronze, a copper coin (5910); χαλκίον (chalkion), a copper vessel or implement (5908); χαλκεύς (chalkeus), coppersmith (5906); χαλκοῦς (chalkous), bronze, (5911); χαλκολίβανον (chalkolibanon), bronze (5909).

CL & OT 1. Since copper was the first metal to be worked in Greece, chalkos became the word for metal in general and applied at first also to iron. Later it also included bronze: copper to which a small amount of tin had been added.

2. (a) In the LXX copper is first mentioned, together with iron, in connection with Tubal-Cain, who made cutting instruments (Gen. 4:22). This notation draws attention to an important development in the history of humankind. Copper weapons, mace heads, helmets, and axe blades were developed in the Early Bronze Age. A cache of 450 copper objects found at Nahal Mishmar in the Judean desert in 1961 has pushed back into the 4th millennium the achievement of high technical standards. Bronze probably made its appearance ca. 2000 B.C., but copper remained in use for objects that did not need to be cast. Both metals became much more common from this time on. A hard cutting edge was achieved on this soft metal by hammering.

(b) The altar of sacrifice in the tabernacle was bronze-covered (Exod. 38:2), whereas its carrying rings were cast (38:5). Solomon imported Hiram from Tyre to oversee the lavish bronze and copper work connected with the temple (1 Ki. 7:13–47). Copper smelting was carried out as early as 4000 B.C. at Timnah, a mining site about 15 miles north of Elath. Mines found here have been explored. The deepest workings are several hundred feet below the surface and are supplied with ventilation by air channels, roughly the diameter of a thumb. A description of mining is given in Job 28:1–11.

NT The words in this group occur 10x in the NT. chalkos means copper coin (Matt. 10:9; Mk. 6:8; 12:41), a commodity of merchandise (Rev. 18:12), and a clanging "gong" (1 Cor. 13:1), such as was used in various cults (here symbolizing the emptiness of speaking in tongues when devoid of understanding and love). chalkous denotes the material from which an idol is made (Rev. 9:20). In Mk. 7:4 chalkion is translated "kettle," a vessel used for cooking. A chalkeus is a metalworker (2 Tim. 4:14). The compound chalkolibanon (Rev. 1:15; 2:18) describes an alloy, the exact nature of which is not known.

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the vb. charassō, from which charagma is derived, means to cut to a point, to sharpen. Later it developed a technical sense of inscribing on wood, stone, or brass. Then, in a specialized meaning, it was used for the casting of a die and so the minting of coins. In the Hel. papyri ownership of property is secured by the brand mark (charagma), while documents are validated as true by the imposition of a stamp or seal (charagma). Imperial decrees are shown as genuine by the same token. Currency carries the impress (charagma) as a sign of its genuineness.

2. charagma does not appear in LXX, but the cognate vb. charassō occurs in 1 Ki. 15:27; 2 Ki. 17:11; Sir. 50:27. In 3 Macc. 2:29 it is used for Jewish markings with pagan cult symbols.

NT 1. Rev. 13:11–18 seems to refer to the imperial priesthood under the figure of the second beast, who requires that universal recognition and homage be given the "first beast" (the imperial line). All trading is possible only by those who have the "mark" (charagma) of the first beast on their right hand or forehead. That "mark" is identified with the beast's name or number (13:18).

Being marked was common in the ancient world (→ stigma, 5116), denoting ownership and preservation. Repeatedly in Rev. the mark of the beast denotes subservience to anti-Christian powers (16:2; 19:20; 20:4). This mark is countered by a "seal" (sphragis, → 5382) from God on his own people (7:1–8), and God's wrath is threatened to all who bear the mark of the beast (14:9, 11). Those who do not accept the satanic mark are promised the right to judge the evil powers (20:4).

2. In Acts 17:19 charagma is used in the sense of handiwork produced by an artist or craftsman in the production of a heathen god.

See also stigma, mark, brand (5116); kaustēriazō, mark by a branding iron, brand (3013).

χαρακτήρ (charaktēr), impress, stamp, reproduction, representation, outward appearance, form (5917).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. charaktēr means one who sharpens or scratches, and later one who writes in stone, wood, or metal. Thence it came to mean an embosser and a stamp for making coins, and from this the embossed stamp made on the coin. Finally, it came to mean the basic bodily and psychological structure with which one is born, which is unique to each person and cannot be changed by education or by development. Hence charaktēr also means individuality, personal characteristics. In Philo the human soul is called the charaktēr of divine power and the Logos is entitled the charaktēr of God.

This concept cannot really be found in the OT, though it is reminiscent of passages about the image of God. The word is found in the LXX (e.g., Lev. 13:28), but there it means "scar."

NT charaktēr is found only in Heb. 1:3, where Christ is defined as "the exact representation [charaktēr] of his [God's] being," i.e., the one on whom God has stamped or imprinted his being. In other words, the NT use is entirely different from our modern concept of one's personal character. The Son possesses the very stamp or substance of God's nature; those who see and recognize him, see and know the Father (Jn. 14:7–10). The word charaktēr expresses this truth even more emphatically than eikōn (→ 1635).

The context of Heb. 1 makes it clear that the writer's purpose is to stress the glory of the Son who has entered history and the uniqueness of the revelation of God in the unique One. In 1:3 we perhaps have an early hymn (as in Phil. 2:6–11; 1 Tim. 3:16). The Son, who controls the beginning and the end (Heb. 1:2), stands in a unique relationship to God, whose "radiance" (→ apaugasma, 575) and "exact representation" (charaktēr) he is. Jesus also stands in a unique relation to the universe, which he upholds, and to the church, which he has purified from sins. This letter is concerned equally with the preexistent, the historical, and the glorified Christ, in whom we have our true high priest.

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. charax means a pointed stake, esp. a wooden support for vines; by extension, it denotes the timber used in constructing a palisade around a city or camp.

2. charax occurs 14x in the LXX. Hezekiah is promised deliverance from the Assyrians threatening Jerusalem; against the city the enemy will not build up a "siege ramp" (Isa. 37:33; cf. also Jer. 33:4 = LXX 40:4; Ezek. 4:2). In Ezek. 21:22 charax is used for a "battering ram." The Assyrians raised up artificial mounds against the walls of cities as a platform, from which they could employ battering rams to greater advantage against the upper and weaker portion of the wall. In Deut. 20:19 instructions are given to the people of Israel that when besieging an enemy city, they were not, in a manner of speaking, to "besiege" the local fruit trees, i.e., not to attack and destroy them.

NT charax occurs only at Lk. 19:43, where Jesus laments over Jerusalem's coming fate. Her enemies will surround the city and cast up a charax about her: a protection for themselves and a site from which to launch their attacks. Forty years later the prophecy was fulfilled when the Roman army surrounded the city with siege works, which must have contained much timber, for the Jews destroyed them with fire. The Roman general Titus then replaced the charax with an earthen wall, from which he completed the siege.

χάρις (charis), grace, gracefulness, graciousness, favor, thanks, gratitude (5921); χάρισμα (charisma), gift given out of goodwill, spiritual gift (5922); χαρίζομαι (charizomai), show favor or kindness, give as a favor, be gracious to someone, pardon (5919); χαριτόω (charitoō), endue with grace (5923).

CL & OT 1. Words formed from the Gk. root char- indicate things that produce well-being. Included in this word group is chara (joy), which is the individual experience or expression of this well-being. (a) From this basic meaning of the root the individual meanings of charis are derived: e.g., grace, favor, beauty, thankfulness, gratitude, delight, kindness, benefit; in the pl., debt of gratitude, recompense, thanks. charis can describe both the attitude of the gods and of human beings (e.g., the emperor's dispensations). In Gk. mythology personifications of charis occur: Charis is the exceedingly beautiful wife of Hephaestus; hai Charitēs, the Graces, are the creators and bestowers of charm.

(b) The derived noun charisma, gracious gift, donation (only from God to humans) is found in pre-Christian lit. only in one LXX version of Sir. 7:33 (S); 38:30 (B^1); and Ps. 31:22 (Theod.); elsewhere only in Philo, Leg. 3, 78; Sib. Or., 2.54.

(c) Outside the NT, the vb. charizomai does not occur with God as its subj. until the 2d cent. A.D., when it means to give graciously. When applied to human dealings with one another, it means to do something pleasant for someone, to be kind or gracious, to oblige or gratify someone. It is also used in the sense of courting a god's favor by sacrifice. In the context of ethics and law the vb. means to grant, remit, forgive, or pardon. In the perf. and plupf. pass. the vb. means to be pleasant, agreeable, or desired.

(d) The vb. charitoō occurs only in a few LXX and extracanonical passages (Sir. 18:17; Ps. 17:26, Sym.; Let. Aris. 225; T. Jos. 1:6), always with reference to divine blessing. Otherwise it is confined to the NT and late post-Christian secular lit.

2. The LXX uses charis about 190x, of which only 75 have a Heb. equivalent (mostly the noun ḥēn, 61x). It usually means favor, inclination; less commonly beauty, charm (e.g., Ps. 45:2). Occasionally it is used as an adj. (Prov. 1:9; 4:9; 5:19).

(a) The use of ḥēn clarifies the biblical meaning of charis as "grace" in history and actions. It denotes the stronger coming to the help of the weaker. The stronger party acts by a voluntary decision, though moved by the dependence or request of the weaker party. A typical expression used to describe such an event is the formula "to find favor in someone's eyes," i.e., to acquire that person's favor, liking, benevolence, or understanding. The action itself is what makes the weaker party acceptable: e.g., Jacob to Esau (Gen. 32:5); the Egyptians to Joseph (47:25); Ruth to Boaz (Ruth 2:2, 10, 13). This acceptance is desired (Zech. 4:7) or experienced (Eccl. 9:11) as fortune or salvation. Often it can only be understood as the result of the special intervention of God, who supplies grace to the weak (Gen. 39:21; Exod. 3:21; 11:3; 12:36).

(b) ḥēn seldom denotes the activity of God, but when it does, it is mostly in the sense of God's undeserved gift in election. Noah is chosen out of a human race sentenced to destruction (Gen. 6:8). The choice of this one person allows us to recognize mercy in the midst of judgment. Moses, the chosen mediator, reminded Yahweh of his electing gift (Exod. 33:12–13a) and thus requested a renewed gift from him (33:13b, 16), recognizable as Yahweh's care in history for his covenant people and renewed on account of Moses' intercession (33:17). David also surrendered himself in moments of crisis to God's providence (2 Sam. 15:25). Bowing before God, humility and petition appear here not as necessary preconditions of God's merciful gift, but as the way open to humankind. Wisdom lit. recognized the relationship between a person's humility and divine grace (Prov. 3:34; cf. 1 Pet. 5:5).

(c) Even the postponement in history of punishment is a gracious act of God (cf. 2 Ki. 13:23). Various writers on OT theology rightly point out that, over and above the occurrences of the concept of grace, the OT teaches that all creatures live by Yahweh's grace, which produces everything that furthers life. Note how the increase of sin is often followed by a greater increase of grace: The flood is followed by the Noahic covenant (esp. Gen. 8:21–22); the tower of Babel is followed by the Abrahamic covenant for the blessing of all people (Gen. 10, 12).

3. (a) In addition to the established OT concepts, the Apocr. speaks of grace as a reward for good works, which include benevolence (Sir. 12:1; 17:22; 40:17), renunciation, and self-denial, esp. that of the martyr (Wis. 3:14). On the grace of martyrdom, see 4 Macc. 11:12.

(b) The Qumran texts betray a distinctive theology of grace: a theology that, within the bounds of covenant grace (1QM 12:3) and in confession and prayer, expresses hope for the gift of God reserved for the individual (e.g., 1QS 11:13–14 ["by his showing favor shall he provide my justification"]). The divine pleasure works as providence and foreknowledge, which make possible knowledge and a change for the good (10:6; 11:18). Through obedience and sacrifice this good pleasure can be influenced (9:4–5; 1QM 2:5).

(c) Rab. lit. contains more than a one-sided doctrine of justification by works. Grace can be procured by human behavior, for rewards are given only for deeds (e.g., 2 Esd. 8:31–33, 36). Yet there is also the belief that grace is necessary for every action; it initiates and completes even the actions of the elect. Thus, the divine reward is a reward of grace.

NT The NT uses the term charis 155x, mostly in Paul's letters (100x); it occurs 17x in Acts, 10x in 1 Pet., and 8x in Heb. In the Gospels it occurs only 12x (Lk. and Jn.). With the exception in 1 Pet., charisma is an exclusively Pauline concept (16x). charizomai occurs only in Paul (16x) and the writings of Lk. (7x); likewise charitoō (once each in Paul and Lk.).

1. The concept of charis in the sense of God's undeserved gift does not occur in Jesus' teaching. But the theme of his teaching and his acts as a whole reflect the central message of grace: God's condescension to the weak, poor, hopeless, and lost (Matt. 11:5, 28–30; Mk. 10:26–27; Lk. 15). Immeasurable remission of debt (Matt. 18:21–34), gracious reward in God's kingdom (20:1–16), and pardon leading to a new life (Lk. 7:36–50; 13:6–8; 19:9–10) are central themes in his ministry.

2. (a) In the few places where Lk. includes Jesus' references to charis, it means reward in the last day, payment for something taken as a matter of course (Lk. 6:32–34; 17:9); thus, it has a meaning almost the opposite of its usual meaning. In 4:22 "the gracious words" seem to include the astonishing rhetorical force of Jesus' words, his authority, the boldness of his claims, and the content of his teaching. Elsewhere Lk. uses charis in its OT sense to express the favor and the acceptability of Mary or the child Jesus before God (1:30; 2:40) and other human beings (2:52, quoting 1 Sam. 2:26). In the history of doctrine, of special significance is the angel's greeting to Mary, "Greetings, you who are highly favored!" (Lk. 1:28). This does not exalt Mary in her essential being over the rest of humankind (cf. a similar statement about Stephen in Acts 6:8). Rather, Mary is promised as a special favor of God a unique role in the history of God's saving purposes, of being "the Lord's servant" (1:38).

(b) In Acts charis denotes the power that flows from God or the exalted Christ and that accompanies the activity of the apostles, giving success to their mission (6:8; 11:23; 14:26; 15:40; 18:27). Paul's message of grace is identical with the gospel (13:43; 20:24), and the Lord himself confirmed it by miraculous signs (14:3). It is what enables people to believe (18:27) and builds them up (20:32). Even where the sense "favor of all the people" is present (2:47; cf. 4:33), God's initiative is the decisive factor. It occurs exclusively in the sense of human favor only in 24:27; 25:3, 9. Paul's view of law and grace is echoed in Pet.'s speech in 15:10–11, which contrasts the "yoke" (zygos, → 2433) of circumcision with "the grace of our Lord Jesus." charizomai in Acts denotes granting someone's life to a third party (3:14; 27:24) and handing over someone (25:11, 16).

3. In Jn. charis occurs 4x, only in the prologue, where it is perhaps influenced by Paul's thought. The antithesis of law and grace (1:17) is typically Pauline. In 1:14, 17 the Evangelist has linked charis with one of his favorite concepts, truth (cf. Exod. 34:6). As in Paul, the event of Christ is identified with grace (seen esp. in Jesus earthly life, 1:14), and grace is regarded as the essence of "his glory" (→ doxa, 1518). Grace is poured out in overflowing fullness (1:16). In the teaching of Jn. as a whole, the gifts that the Revealer brings, such as "life" and "light" (1:4–5), are identified with Jesus Christ himself (cf. his "I am" sayings) and can only be understood as gifts of his grace.

4. For Paul charis is the essence of God's decisive saving act in Jesus Christ, which took place in his sacrificial death, and also of all its consequences in the present and the future (Rom. 3:24–26). Therefore, the use of this word at the beginning and end of Paul's letters is much more than a polite cliché. "Grace" is not just a good wish for salvation; it is qualified as "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 13:14).

(a) Paul unfolds the reality and power of charis in a stubborn conflict with rab. ideas of justification by works and synergism. This leads him to set up and then contrast two antithetical, mutually exclusive series of ideas: grace, gift, the righteousness of God, superabundance, faith, gospel, and calling on the one side; and law, reward, sin, works, accomplishment owed, one's own righteousness, honor, worldly wisdom, and futility on the other side. The person and work of God's Son has made it possible for justice in the Judge's pardon not to conflict with grace (Rom. 3:21–26; 8:32; Gal. 2:20–21; Phil. 2:8–13). In Christ, therefore, God's grace is given as a precious gift (1 Cor. 1:4). Apart from him there can be no talk of grace (cf. 1:30–31; see also Jn. 1:14, 16–17). But this also means that grace can never become a quality that someone possesses in one's own right.

(b) The following extracts from Paul's letters outline the above summary. charis occurs in a central position or serves as the climax of the argument. Frequently it is defined by means of a contrast.

(i) Rom. 3:21–31. We are justified by God's grace as a gift through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (3:24). Here grace is pardon by the divine Judge, who reckons to the sinner the righteousness of Christ.

(ii) Rom. 4:2–25. The ideas of grace and debt (i.e., a reward for work accomplished) are mutually exclusive. "Therefore, the promise comes by faith, so that it may be by grace and may be guaranteed to all Abraham's offspring—not only to those who are of the law but also to those who are of the faith of Abraham" (4:16). Only the free gift of God ensures the extension of the saving promise to all people.

(iii) Rom. 5:15–21 and 6:1. Rom. 5:15 declares that "the gift [charisma] is not like the trespass [paraptōma, → 4183]." Here charisma is used in the sense of charis, the gift of life, which as "God's grace and the gift that came by the grace of . . . Jesus Christ, overflow[ed] to the many" (5:15; cf. 5:20b). But grace is not given to let us go on sinning (6:1). It does not owe its origin to sin, nor can it be manipulated by us. It is a new reality, a dominion established once and for all by Jesus Christ. Its ground is the new righteousness of Christ, and its goal is eternal life (5:21).

(iv) Rom. 6:12–23. This section carries this thought further, as 6:14–15 argues that those who have died with Christ and now live in him (cf. 6:11) no longer live under the dominion of sin (hamartia, → 281), but under that of grace; 6:15 guards against any misunderstanding (as in 6:1–2). God's gracious gift (charisma) of eternal life has made the power of death as the wages of sin something that belongs to our past (6:21–23).

(v) Rom. 11:5–6. Being "chosen by grace" and a life based on "works" have nothing in common; otherwise, "grace would no longer be pure grace." It would be compromised by the rab. principle of accomplishment and achievement.

(vi) 2 Cor. 1:12. To the Jewish desire for control of one's fate through works of law corresponds the Greek striving for autonomy by means of "worldly wisdom" (cf. also 1 Cor. 1:18–25). Grace opposes the pride of both as the sole source of power for the apostolic mission and for the Christian's life (cf. 1 Cor. 1:30–31).

(vii) Gal. 2:21. Here Paul formulates the climax of his theology of grace: "I do not set aside the grace of God, for if righteousness could be gained through the law, then Christ died for nothing!"

(viii) Gal. 5:1–6. Paul accuses the Galatian churches (5:4) of doing what he repudiated for himself in 2:21, i.e., of wanting by implication to be justified through the law. By doing this, he writes, they have become "alienated from Christ" and "have fallen away from grace." They have plunged into the abyss of their own righteousness and thus of bondage.

(c) Apart from the antithetic use of charis and law (nomos, → 3795), Paul employs the concept of grace in various other connections. (i) Paul praises the gracious acts of God with the exclamation "thanks [charis] be to God" (Rom. 6:17; 7:25; 1 Cor. 15:57; 2 Cor. 2:14; 9:15; cf. 8:16; 1 Tim. 1:12; 2 Tim. 1:3) at crucial points in his letters. (ii) Those who partake in that which is by nature good without a load on the conscience do it "with thankfulness" (1 Cor. 10:30). (iii) The spiritual song is understood as "gratitude" to God (Col. 3:16). (iv) In 1 Cor. 16:3 and 2 Cor. 8:6, 7, 19, charis is the technical term for the gift of gratitude and love Paul was collecting for the Jerusalem community.

(d) Arising out of God's basic act of pardon and legal acquittal (Rom. 8:31–39), Paul understands the whole movement of the Christian life from beginning to end as grace (Rom. 5:2; 2 Cor. 6:1–9; cf. also Jn. 1:16). It is guaranteed by being anchored in God's purpose (Rom. 8:28). Human weakness, not self-determination, is its sphere of activity (2 Cor. 12:9). The grace of God makes the new self what he or she is (1 Cor. 15:10). This is as true of the apostolic mission in particular (Rom. 1:5; 12:3; 15:15; 1 Cor. 3:10; Gal. 2:9; Phil. 1:7) as it is of the Christian life in general (Rom. 12:3, 6; 1 Cor. 1:4–9; 2 Cor. 4:15; 6:1; 8:1; 9:8, 14; Phil. 1:7). The relationship with Christ is frequently expressed by dia, through. When grace is said to be given, to overflow, etc., the intent is to acknowledge its reality in human life, not to imply that it is a thing or an object.

(e) The manifold outworking of the one grace in individual Christians through the one Spirit Paul calls a charisma, a personal endowment with grace. This is the specialized use of charisma as distinct from the general (see above on Rom. 5:15–16; 6:23). In Rom. 12:3–8 and 1 Cor. 12 Paul develops the meaning of this special endowment for service to the community. It has both inward- and outward-looking aspects: prophecy as a gift of proclamation, service, teaching, spiritual exhortation, leadership in the congregation, beneficence, and compassion. In 1 Cor. 12:9–10, 28–30, Paul adds faith, the gift of healing, special authority to distinguish between spirits, speaking in tongues, the interpretation of tongues, and, as first in the order of functions, the service of the apostle (12:28).

It is inconceivable to Paul that there should be any Christian without some charisma. At the same time, a single person may be characterized by more than one gift of grace. Paul himself had, beside his apostleship (2 Cor. 1:11), the gift of celibacy (1 Cor. 7:7), which did not belong of necessity to the apostolate (9:5). He also possessed the gift of tongues (14:18), and no doubt also prophecy, teaching, and administration. Capacity for spiritual service is determined by one's present charisma. It must not be overstepped through ambition (Rom. 12:3–5; 1 Cor. 12:11–27; cf. also 1 Pet. 4:10). Yet Paul also encouraged eager desire for the best gifts (1 Cor. 12:31), which can be attained not through achievements, but only through prayer and obedience. Rom. 11:29 designates as charismata the abiding privileges of Israel in salvation history (cf. 9:4–5).

(f) The vb. charizomai, like charis, is used primarily in connection with the decisive, gracious gift of God. Rom. 8:32 speaks of the all-embracing gift of God in giving his Son (cf. Jn. 3:16). God's Spirit leads to the knowledge of what God has bestowed (1 Cor. 2:12). Already in the old covenant the free gift of God is linked only with the promise (Gal. 3:18), not with the law. Readiness to suffer for Christ's sake is, like faith, given by God to the church by grace for Christ's sake (Paul uses the pass. of this vb. in Phil. 1:29, presumably to avoid using the divine name). Through Philemon's prayers the imprisoned Paul hopes God will enable him to come to that church as a guest (Phlm. 22).

Another meaning of charizomai is to forgive (e.g., 2 Cor. 2:7, 10; cf. also Eph. 4:32; Col. 2:13; 3:13). Christians are to forgive each other, since God in Christ (or the Lord) has forgiven them. In 2 Cor. 12:13 the vb. is used almost ironically to mean excuse.

5. In Eph. charis occurs 12x. It is used (as elsewhere in Paul's letters) in an antithetical connection: "[God] made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace [chariti] you have been saved" (2:5): "by grace [chariti] you have been saved, through faith ... the gift of God," in contrast to "not from yourselves ... not by works, so that no one can boast" (2:8–9). In contrast to Paul's earlier letters, charis is here connected with sōzō, save (→ 5392), not with dikaioō, justify (which does not occur in Eph. and Col.). The emphasis is thus shifted from forensic justification to effective salvation. Hence grace is connected with charitoō, to favor, bless, freely give (Eph. 1:6). It looks forward to exaltation (1:6–7; 2:7), though it is still related to "redemption through his blood" (1:7; cf. 2:15; 4:9).

The cognitive aspect of grace that comes to humans in the gospel is stressed in Col. 1:6. Grace and truth belong together (1:5b; cf. Jn. 1:14). In Eph. 4:7—"But to each one of us grace [charis] has been given as Christ apportioned it"—charis is used in the sense of charisma, since a list of the ministry gifts to the church follow (4:11).

6. In the Pastorals 1 Tim. 1:12–16 alludes autobiographically to Rom. 5:20b. In 2 Tim. 1:9 Paul builds the connection of God's purpose and the grace of Christ (cf. Rom. 8:28, 32) and gives with Tit. 2:11 a doxology of joy over the present revelation of grace. As in Eph., grace and salvation are connected in 2:11: Grace works to train us away from the world and toward our eschatological hope.

In Tit. 3:7 grace has a double connection. It refers back to the Savior Jesus Christ, who pours out the renewing Holy Spirit (cf. 3:5–6). At the same time, it is related to justification in the truly Pauline sense ("justified by his grace"). Christ's grace brings about (also forensically) the appointment of heirs to future life. The Pastorals say nothing more about individual gifts of grace, but only speak of grace for office (2 Tim. 2:1). charisma is passed on through the laying on of hands (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6).

7. Of the remaining NT letters 1 Pet. and Heb. come nearest to Paul's understanding of grace. (a) Like Eph. and Col., 1 Pet. does not specifically link grace and justification. It speaks of God's grace that is given through Christ (1:10, announced by the prophets), the future revelation of which determines conduct and hope (1:13), and as stewards of which, in its manifold forms (4:10; 5:10), Christians should live. Grace also permits the endurance of undeserved suffering to be understood as approved by God (2:19–20; cf. 5:10). In the concluding message the standing of the addressees in grace is confirmed as true (5:12).

(b) Heb. 2:9 portrays charis as God's care in salvation history, which is made effective in Jesus' substitutionary death. Therefore the throne on which Christ sits to rule is "a throne of grace" (4:16). Here forgiveness can be received from the one who can sympathize with the weak, for he has identified himself with them as high priest. The remaining texts in Heb. are concerned with the problem of cheap grace. To abuse the spiritual gift by one's way of life is worse than transgressing the Mosaic law (10:29); grace once abandoned cannot be regained (12:15–17). But firmness of heart remains, in spite of all exhortations, a gift of God and not the result of keeping special regulations (13:9).

(c) The danger of falling away occurs in Jas. 4:6; the Spirit's offer of gifts outweighs his yearning demands (there follows a quotation from Prov. 3:34; cf. 1 Pet. 5:5). In 2 Pet. 3:18 the author paradoxically exhorts us to grow in grace, in contrast to falling from our own firm position (cf. Gal. 5:4 with 1 Cor. 12:31). Jude 4 warns against the misuse of grace to satisfy our passions, a danger Paul had already repulsed in Rom. 6:1.

χείρ (cheir), hand (5931); δάκτυλος (daktylos), finger (1235); χειροποίητος (cheiropoiētos), man-made, made by human hands (5935).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. cheir is the hand, the member of the human body that we put to the most active use, serving us both in our work and in defense of ourselves. Our strength and energy are made effective through our hands. In the pl. cheires and dynameis (power[s]) can be used as synonyms. When linked with a personal name, cheir stands as a substitute for the person.

2. The OT speaks of a person's activity as the work of one's hand. The hand is a symbol of human power. Thus, to fall into someone's hand means to come into their power (Gen. 32:11; Jdg. 2:14; Jer. 27:6–8 = LXX 34:6–8). In 2 Sam. 18:18 cheir means a mark or monument (cf. Isa. 56:5).

This word is also a symbol for divine omnipotence (2 Chr. 20:6; Ps. 89:21). God's hand created heaven and earth, and with his hand he controls them (Isa. 48:13). For Israel God's hand means salvation and release; but for their enemies, destruction and ruin (Exod. 7:4; 9:3; 1 Sam. 7:13). The hand of the Lord is used to express both God's righteous punishment (5:6, 11), and his loving care (Ezr. 7:6; Job 5:18; Ps. 145:16; Isa. 49:16) and divine protection (51:16).

3. Both in fig. language about God and with reference to humans the two hands do not have equal status. A higher value is placed on the right, because it is the one that is active (Exod. 15:6, 12; Ps. 118:15–16; Isa. 41:13; cf. Matt. 5:30; → dexios, 1288).

Hands can serve to express displeasure and passionate excitement (Num. 24:10), but also humble supplication (2 Chr. 6:12–13; Ps. 28:2), joy (47:1), sorrow (Jer. 2:37), solemn oath (Gen. 14:22; 24:2, 9; 47:29; Ezr. 10:19), and loyal citizenship (Prov. 6:1–5; 22:26). The "sign on your hand" (Exod. 13:9, 16; Deut. 6:8; 11:18) is a picturesque way of expressing constant remembrance of God's saving acts and of his commands. To fill someone's hand means to install him to priestly office (Num. 3:3). Washing the hands not only fulfills the laws concerning purification (Exod. 30:18–21) but also signifies an affirmation of innocence and a clear conscience (Deut. 21:6; Ps. 26:6; cf. Job 17:9; Ps. 24:4; Matt. 27:24).

NT 1. cheir occurs 177x in the NT. It is often used lit. in the combination podes kai cheires, feet and hands (Matt. 18:8; 22:13; Lk. 24:39; Jn. 11:44; Acts 21:11). The phrase dia cheiros tinos (also pl.), through someone, by someone (e.g., Mk. 6:2; Acts 5:12; 7:25; 11:30), is a Semitism representing the Heb. b^{e}yād, by, with. The hands can stand for a person (17:25). cheir is used 25x times in connection with the laying on of hands (→ epithēmi, 2202).

2. As in the OT, the hand of the Lord denotes the embodiment of divine power. It is applied to Christ in Jn. 3:35; 10:28; 13:3. God's hand works in creation (Acts 7:50; Heb. 1:10) and in his plan of salvation (Acts 4:28). It expresses God's righteous punishment (13:11; Heb. 10:31) and the special care (Lk. 1:66), security, and protection (23:46; Jn. 10:29) he grants to all who trust him. God's hand indicates his wonder-working power with which he accompanies the apostolic proclamation of the gospel (Acts 4:30; 11:21). God can operate "through [an] angel" (lit., "by the hand of an angel," 7:35). God's hand also indicates his hidden wisdom with which he leads his people on earth through suffering (1 Pet. 5:6). Hand, finally, can be a periphrasis for a hostile power, into whose control a person is delivered (esp. Matt. 17:22; 26:45; Acts 21:11), but from whose hand one can also be set free (12:11; 2 Cor. 11:33).

3. cheir is frequently used in connection with the verb ekteinō, to stretch out. Thus Jesus commanded a sick man to stretch out his hand (Matt. 12:13; Mk. 3:5; Lk. 6:10). He stretched out his own hand to heal (Matt. 8:3; Mk. 1:41; Lk. 5:13; cf. Acts 4:30). Stretching out the hand can be an orator's gesture (Matt. 12:49; Acts 26:1). It can happen with hostile intent (Lk. 22:53) or refer indirectly to a disciple's death by crucifixion (Jn. 21:18).

4. The Jewish practice of ceremonially washing one's hands before meals (Mk. 7:1–4) is condemned by Jesus as an instance of scrupulous observance of an outward human ordinance, practiced to the neglect of God's Word (7:6–13; cf. Isa. 29:13; Matt. 15:8–9) and the failure to realize that evil comes from the heart (Mk. 7:14–23; cf. Matt. 15:10–20). Pilate's act of washing his hands before the crowd (27:24) was a public gesture disclaiming responsibility. Although the crowd accepted responsibility for Jesus' blood, the gesture was empty, for moral responsibility cannot be disposed of by outward gestures.

5. The human finger (daktylos) is mentioned in Matt. 23:4; Mk. 7:33; Lk. 11:46; 16:24; Jn. 8:6; 20:25, 27. The expression "finger of God" (Lk. 11:20) is paralleled in Matt. 12:28 by "Spirit of God." Since this phrase is similar to one in Exod. 8:19 concerning God's power in the events of the exodus, presumably Jesus here is defining his own mission in terms of the exodus (cf. esp. exodos as used in Lk. 9:31; → 3847).

6. cheiropoiētos, made by human hands, underlines the distinction between God's action and those of humans (Mk. 14:58; Acts 7:48; 17:24; Eph. 2:11; Heb. 9:11, 24). It is esp. used to contrast the building of a dwelling-place for God done by humans (e.g., tabernacle or temple) with the dwelling place he has built for himself (e.g., the heavenly sanctuary).

χειροτονέω (cheirotoneō), appoint (5936); προχειροτονέω (procheirotoneō), appoint beforehand (4742).

CL & OT cheirotoneō, from cheir, hand, and teinō, stretch, means to vote or elect by a show of hands, as was regularly done in the Athenian assembly. From this the verb came to mean appoint, and its pro- compound means appoint beforehand.

NT In 2 Cor. 8:19 cheirotoneō refers to the churches' appointment of a representative to accompany Paul to Jerusalem to deliver the collection; in Acts 14:23 it refers to Paul's and Barnabas's appointment of elders in the Galatian churches. In 10:41 procheirotoneō signifies God's appointment of the apostles, prior to Jesus' resurrection, to be witnesses of that event.

OT cheroub is a transliteration of the Heb. word kᵉrûb (pl. kᵉrûbîm or kᵉrūbîm), a winged heavenly messenger sometimes associated with the seraph (cf. Isa. 6:2–6). Cherubim guarded the way to the tree of life (Gen. 3:24) and either support or flank God's throne (Ps. 80:1; 99:1; Isa. 37:16). Their swiftness in flight is likened to the wind (2 Sam. 22:11; cf. Ps. 18:10). Two wooden replicas of cherubim, gold covered and with wings outspread, were placed over the atonement cover of the ark, protecting the holy things and forming a pedestal for Yahweh's throne (Exod. 25:17–21; 37:7–9; cf. Num. 7:89). Cherubim adorned the inmost curtains of the tabernacle and the veil that separated off the Most Holy Place (Exod. 26:1, 31); they symbolized the heavenly hosts of the Lord (1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2; 2 Ki. 19:15; 1 Chr. 13:6). In descriptions of Solomon's temple emphasis is placed on the size of the cherubim, whose wings spanned the width of the sanctuary (1 Ki. 6:23–28; 2 Chr. 3:10–13).

Among the prophets only Ezek. mentions the word (apart from Isa. 37:16). The golden cherubim on which had rested the glory of the God of Israel were deserted (Ezek. 9:3), and the Lord was to be found among living cherubim, who carried out his every wish (10:1–20; cf. also 1:5–24). Cherubim also guard the presence of God (cf. 28:14–16).

Later Jud. meditated much on Ezek.'s chariot throne, but speculation was discouraged by the rabbis, and the Mishnah prohibited liturgical use of Ezek.'s chapters on the chariot. In a fragment from Qumran the cherubim utter blessings, accompanied by a still small voice (cf. 1 Ki. 19:12) as they move their wings. A similar interest in the heavenly throne is found in 1 Enoch (14:11, 18; 20:7).

NT cheroub occurs only in Heb. 9:5, where the phrase "the cherubim of the Glory" is used in a description of the Most Holy Place. The book of the Rev., without using the word, describes in terms reminiscent of both cherubim and seraphim (4:6–8) the living creatures who worship the one on the throne. Cherubim are specifically associated with God's throne, whether in heaven or in its earthly counterpart. They stand guard, support the throne, and act as swift messengers of the Lord of hosts, whom they worship.

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. chēra is fem. of the adj. chēros, deprived, and means a woman deprived (of her husband), i.e., a widow.

2. (a) In the LXX chēra connotes not only a woman who has lost her husband but also the accompanying ideas of loneliness, abandonment, and helplessness. Widows are regarded in a special way as in need of protection, mentioned often in association with orphans and aliens (e.g., Exod. 22:22, 24; Deut. 10:18; 24:17–21). Their difficult condition had its basis in the social and legal status of women (→ gynē, woman, 1222), esp. with regard to certain regulations of the law of inheritance.

(b) Yahweh receives widows to himself. They should put their trust in him (Jer. 49:11 = LXX 29:11), for he executes justice for them (Deut. 10:18; Ps. 68:5; Prov. 15:25; Mal. 3:5) and upholds them (Ps. 146:9). Therefore, his people also are called to maintain the widows' rights and to have compassion on them. Otherwise, they will bring down his wrath upon themselves (Deut. 27:19; cf. also Exod. 22:22–24; Isa. 1:17–23; 10:2; Jer. 7:6; 22:3; Zech. 7:10).

(c) Accordingly, in the OT various laws are given to ease the condition of widows. Their clothes should not be taken in pledge (Deut. 24:17); in the third year the tithe should be for their benefit (14:29; 26:12–13); and the gleanings of the field should be left for them, among others (24:19–21). Widows are to be invited to the sacrificial meals and to the feasts (16:11, 14) and thus have their place in the congregation. According to Lev. 22:12–13, the widowed daughters of priests have a share of the offering if they return childless to their fathers (cf. also 2 Macc. 3:10; 8:28, 30). Nevertheless, complaint about the unjust and merciless treatment of widows pervades the OT (e.g., Isa. 1:23; Ezek. 22:7; Mal. 3:5; Wis. 2:10).

(d) A plethora of legal questions, above all about the right of inheritance, arises when the remarriage of widows is considered. There are two restrictions. (i) A high priest may not marry a widow (Lev. 21:14). (ii) From the earliest times there are indications that a widow could be made an heiress to properties (cf. Ezek. 22:10; also Gen. 35:22; 2 Sam. 16:20–22; 1 Ki. 2:13–22).

(e) Isa. 47:8 uses chēra in a metaphorical sense for Babylon (cf. Rev. 18:7). But for Israel there stands, as the new divine covenant, the promise that the reproach of her widowhood (i.e., the exile) will no more be remembered (cf. Isa. 54:4).

NT 1. The Gospels speak of difficult circumstances for a widow: e.g., her need for persistent legal action (Lk. 18:1–5), the abuse of her trust (Mk. 12:40), and her poverty (12:41–44).

2. The NT churches also recognized their responsibility for the widow. The strongest expression occurs in Jas., where all outward veneration of God in worship is contrasted with the care of widows and orphans (1:27). In the church at Jerusalem there was at an early date an organized provision for widows. The murmuring of the Hel. group that their widows were being put at a disadvantage to Aram.-speaking widows led to the choice of seven men from the Hel. section to take charge of care for these widows (Acts 6:1–6).

3. In the later NT period, a distinction is drawn between ordinary widows and "widows who are really in need" (1 Tim. 5:3–16). For the latter category, if the widow is truly left alone (5:5), the church should provide for her (5:16); but if she has relatives, they are duty-bound to care for her (5:4, 16). The real widows were included in an official list of widows (5:9) and seem to have held some sort of office in the church. They had to be over sixty years old and to have been the wife of only one man (5:9). They also had to be "well known for ... good deeds" (5:10), such as bringing up orphans, hospitality, and readiness for humble service. Those enrolled seem to have taken a decision not to marry again.

Younger widows, by contrast, were not to be put on the list of widows, for they would be ensnared too easily by laziness and become busybodies (1 Tim. 5:13). Rather, they were to be encouraged to remarry (5:14).

χιλιάς (chilias), a thousand (5942); χίλιοι (chilioi), a thousand (5943); χιλίαρχος (chiliarchos), commander (5941).

CL & OT 1. Both nouns are in cl. Gk. and the LXX, although chilias (250x) is more frequent in the LXX, esp. in Num. and the historical books. chiliarchos in cl. Gk. denotes a leader of a thousand soldiers; it was used in Roman times of the tribunus militum, the military tribune.

2. The number 1,000 frequently occurs in the numbering of the tribes (e.g., Num. 1:23–46; 2:4–32; 1 Chr. 7:2–40). The OT historical books display an interest in the thousands involved in battles (Jdg. 1:4; 3:29; 4:6–14; 1 Sam. 4:2, 10; 6:19; 2 Sam. 10:6, 18; 24:9, 15; 1 Chr. 12:20–37) and in the numbers involved in building Solomon's temple (1 Ki. 5:11–16; 2 Chr. 2:2–18). There is, however, a strong case for thinking that in many contexts "thousand" (Heb. 'elep) does not lit. mean a thousand but was a term for a considerably smaller unit or perhaps meant 'allûp, captain of a band; this would make feasible the apparently large numbers in many OT records. Ezek. is concerned with the measurement and proportions of the land, representing the perfect ordering of the people of God (45:1–6; 48:8–35).

3. The pl. chiliades is often used for large numbers that cannot be counted. God shows steadfast love to thousands of those who love him and keep his commands (Exod. 20:6; cf. 34:7; Deut. 5:10; 7:9; Jer. 32:18 = LXX 39:18). His power is described in terms of mighty chariots, "tens of thousands and thousands of thousands" (Ps. 68:17). The greatness of Yahweh is also expressed in 90:4: "For a thousand years in your sight are like a day that has just gone by, or like a watch in the night" (cf. 2 Pet. 3:8). What to us seems a great age is as a moment to Yahweh. Note also the confession of the psalmist: "Better is one day in your courts than a thousand elsewhere" (Ps. 84:10).

4. In intertestamental lit. innumerable hosts figure in the apocalyptic writings of 1 Enoch 14:22; 40:1. The notion of thousands features in eschatological expectation: e.g., the thousands of children of the righteous and the superabundance of wine (10:17, 19). The number also features in speculations about the duration of the world and the new aeon, which include the idea of a cosmic week of seven millennia followed in some instances by a new era, an eighth millennium (T. Ab. B 7:16). The length of the messianic age varies from 1,000 years to 7,000 years.

5. One thousand features in the military structure of the Qumran community (CD 13:1–2; 1QS 2:21–22). Each thousand had its commander to lead it into battle (1QM 4:2; 1QSa 1:14, 29). The community believed that those who kept God's law would live a thousand generations (CD 7:6; 19:1–2; cf. Deut. 7:9).

NT 1. Various multiples of 1,000 occur in the NT. dischilioi (2,000), was the approximate number of the Gerasene swine (Mk. 5:13). About 3,000 (trischilioi) souls were added to the church at Pentecost (Acts 2:41). About 5,000 men heard and believed the word (4:4). The same number were fed by Jesus (Matt. 14:21; Mk. 6:44; 8:19; Lk. 9:14; Jn. 6:10); on another occasion it was 4,000 (Matt. 15:38; Mk. 8:9, 20). Acts 21:38 mentions the revolt of the Egyptian who led 4,000 men.

In dealing with the question whether God has rejected Israel for good, Paul recalls the remnant of 7,000 who did not bow the knee to Baal (Rom. 11:4; cf. 1 Ki. 19:18). This instance is at the same time a reminder that God is the one who preserves the remnant and that those who are saved are "chosen by grace" (Rom. 11:5); the alternative is salvation "by works" (11:6). In 1 Cor. 10:8 Paul recalls how 23,000 of the desert generation fell in a single day through idolatry (cf. Num. 25:1–18).

The military sense of a thousand is perhaps present in Jesus' question whether a king should first take counsel before meeting with 10,000 men his adversary who is coming against him with 20,000 (Lk. 14:31). Confronted by overwhelming odds, the first king sends an embassy and asks for peace. The illustration implies not only the need to count the cost of discipleship but also the impossibility of finding an alternative way out.

2. In NT times, a chiliarchos commanded a cohort of about 600 men (e.g., Jn. 18:12; Acts 21:31–37; 22:24–29; 23:10, 15–22; 25:23). The word is used of a high ranking officer generally in Mk. 6:21; Rev. 6:15; 19:18.

3. chilioi occurs 2x in 2 Pet. 3:8 with reference to Ps. 90:4, where the readers are urged: "But do not forget this one thing, dear friends: With the Lord a day is like a thousand years, and a thousand years are like a day." The context is concerned with human indifference and sin in the light of the apparent delay of the day of the Lord. But God is not bound by the time scale of the physical world. The reason for the delay of the Parousia is God's patience, "not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (2 Pet. 3:9).

4. The remaining nine uses of chilioi are found in Rev. (11:3; 12:6; 14:20; 20:2–7). In addition, chilias occurs 19x in this book (5:11; 7:4–8; 11:13; 14:1, 3; 21:16), representing an apocalyptic interpretation of OT themes. (a) Rev. 5:11 takes up the picture in Dan. 7:10, of the heavenly hosts numbering "thousands upon thousands ... ten thousand times ten thousand," praising God. In contrast to the OT, this picture receives a Christological interpretation, for the object of their praise is the Lamb (Rev. 5:12–14).

(b) Rev. 7:4 gives the number of the sealed as "144,000 from all the tribes of Israel" (cf. 14:1–2). Rev. 7:5–8 enumerate the tribes by name, specifying "12,000" out of each tribe. The numbers used symbolize the final perfection of the people of God, based on the concept of the twelve tribes of Israel (→ dōdeka, 1557) and asserting historical continuity with Israel. Note that when Jn. hears the number, he hears these round numbers. But when he actually sees the multitude, the numbers are replaced by a countless host of all nations: "After this I looked and there before me was a great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, tribe, people and language, standing before the throne and in front of the Lamb" (7:9).

(c) Rev. 11:3; 12:6 mention a period of "1,260 days." This corresponds to the 42 months of 11:2; 13:5 and the "time, times and half a time" of 12:14. In 11:3 it is the period of prophecy, while in 12:6 it is the period of persecution. Both passages refer to the same period: the age of the church, which is one of prophetic witness and at the same time one of persecution. In light of eternity it is a comparatively short period, though when expressed in terms of days it may seem lengthy. In the background stands Dan. 7:25; 12:7, a period that is half of seven, the perfect number, comprising severe affliction, which continues until God accomplishes the end of all things. This affliction is described in Rev. 11:7–10 (cf. 12:2–6); it will culminate in the judgment of civilization (11:13). The 7,000 who perish in the earthquake represent the complete judgment on godless, secular society; the rest who are terrified and give glory to God represent those who respond to the witness and God's judgments.

(d) Rev. 14:20 depicts judgment on the civilized world in terms of the sack of a city: "They were trampled in the winepress outside the city, and blood flowed out of the press, rising as high as the horses' bridles for a distance of 1,600 stadia" (i.e., approx. 200 miles). This number is a square number, comparable with the 144,000 and the dimensions of the Jerusalem (cf. 7:4; 14:1; 21:16). It suggests the area of the four parts of the earth, i.e., the whole earth; the passage refers to the last judgment (cf. 19:11–21).

(e) By contrast, the area of the holy city, the new Jerusalem, is also square, which again indicates completeness: "The city was laid out like a square, as long as it was wide. He measured the city with the rod and found it to be 12,000 stadia in length, and as wide and high as it is long" (Rev. 21:16). The number twelve goes back in this case to the twelve tribes and the 12,000 from each tribe. Thus, the completeness of the new Jerusalem corresponds to the completeness of the people of God.

(f) Rev. 20:2–7 contains six references to a period of 1,000 years, the period commonly called the millennium: a thousand-year age of restoration in which evil is banished. The idea of a messianic kingdom, preceding the end and the coming reign of God, is attested in various Jewish apocalyptic documents (e.g., 1 Enoch 91:12–13; 93:1–14; 2 Esd. 7:28–29; 2 Bar. 29:3; 30:1–5; 40:3). It extends the older idea of a Davidic king restoring the monarchy by combining it with that of universal judgment, resurrection, and the new aeon. The number 1,000 is probably connected with the idea of the cosmic week and Ps. 90:4.

In the early church belief in some form of a literal millennium is attested by, e.g., Papias, Irenaeus, Justin Martyr, and Tertullian. It was attacked by Origen and rejected by Augustine. In addition to apocalyptic ideas, Rev. 20 draws on Ezek. 36–48 with its visions of the resurrection of Israel, the conflict with Gog and Magog, and the promise of a new Jerusalem.

In modern times three main schools of thought have emerged concerning Rev. 20. The premillennialists treat the passage as future prophecy, in which Christ's second coming precedes the millennium. Satan will be bound for 1,000 years, the martyred dead will be raised, and Christ will reign as King of kings and Lord of lords from Jerusalem. The millennium will end with the final rebellion of Satan, but this will itself be put down. The resurrection and judgment of the wicked dead will precede the creation of the new heaven and earth. Postmillennialists see the second coming of Christ and the events of Rev. 20 as coming in the last thousand years of the present age. Amillennialists see the whole passage essentially as a symbolic description of the present age, in which Satan is already bound and the dead in Christ are already reigning with him.

The interpretation of Rev. 20 depends partly on how this vision is seen in relation to the entire book of Rev. Those who see the different visions as successive tend to see the millennium as the last of a series: a unique event immediately prior to the creation of a new heaven and a new earth. But a strong case can be made for seeing the book as structured into seven series of visions, each looking at the church in the gospel age. The visions are thus seven sets of parallel visions of the church and its tribulations between the two advents of Christ. On this view the period of a thousand years refers to the present era, culminating in a final outburst of satanic activity prior to the final destruction of all the evils that afflict humankind.

According to this interpretation, the vision of the binding of Satan has its roots in the saying of Jesus about the binding of the strong man, who must first be bound before his goods may be plundered (Matt. 12:29). The activity of Jesus is itself evidence of the binding of Satan. Furthermore, the gospel is being spread among the Gentile nations, which previously had been deceived by Satan (cf. Rev. 20:3). There is also a sense in which Satan has already fallen in power, evidenced by the power of the disciples over demons (Lk. 10:17–18; cf. Jn. 12:31; Col. 2:15). The first resurrection refers to the reign of the saints with Christ now (cf. Rev. 4:2–10; 5:6–13; 7:9–17; 12:5; 14:3, 5; 19:4–5).

This interpretation is in harmony with that of Jesus and Paul, neither of whom speak of a period of 1,000 years and into whose teaching such a period cannot easily be inserted (Matt. 24:4–36; 1 Cor. 15:20–28; 1 Thess. 5:1–11; 2 Thess. 2:1–12). Moreover, nowhere does Scripture speak clearly of two second comings of Christ: one before the millennium and one after. It seems best, therefore, to recognize the symbolic character of the apocalyptic language of Rev. 20 and see an eschatology in process of realization.

χολή (cholē), gall, bile (5958); ὄξος (oxos), wine vinegar (3954).

CL & OT cholē appears to refer first of all to the color of bile, from which it came to be used of gall or bile itself. The impressive thing was clearly its bitter taste. The word was also used for bitter anger or wrath. oxos was a wine vinegar popular among the lower ranks of society; it relieved thirst more effectively than water.

In the LXX cholē translates a variety of Heb. words and can mean gall (Deut. 32:32; Ps. 69:21; Prov. 5:4; Lam. 3:15) or venom (poison) (Job 20:14). On occasion it refers to a plant (e.g., Deut. 29:18; 32:32), but it remains uncertain which plant is meant. oxos occurs several times in the LXX, including Num. 6:3 (as one of the fermented drinks forbidden to the Nazirites) and Ps. 69:21 (see NT).

NT cholē is used in a lit. sense of the gall mixed with wine that was offered to Jesus as the soldiers prepared to crucify him (Matt. 27:34). In view of the parallel in Mk. 15:23, it seems that the word here refers to myrrh. This drink was perhaps a narcotic in order to dull Jesus' senses and alleviate pain, but he refused the sedative and heroically endured his sufferings to the end. Later Jesus did receive wine vinegar (oxos) in order to alleviate thirst (Matt. 27:48; Mk. 15:36; Lk. 23:36; Jn. 19:29–30). Both drinks may be seen as a fulfillment of Ps. 69:21.

cholē is also used metaphorically, which is important for understanding Acts 8:23. Simon Peter charged Simon Magus with being (lit.) "in the gall (cholē) of bitterness" when he offered the apostle money for the gift of conferring the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands. To have such a complete misunderstanding of Christianity was not simply to be pleasantly mistaken; rather, it was to find oneself in a situation that must be described as bitterness. Simon had an inkling of what Christianity was all about. He had welcomed the gospel and accepted baptism. It is an exceedingly bitter thing when a man of whom so much might well have been expected proves to be so completely out of harmony with the gospel. He was caught in a bitter bondage to sin.

χορτάζω (chortazō), to feed, fatten (5963); χόρτασμα (chortasma), used mostly in pl., fodder (5964); χόρτος (chortos), enclosed pasturage, fodder (5965).

CL & OT 1. In early Gk. chortazō was used uniformly of animals, but in the exaggeration of comedy it was applied to humans feasting. Under the influence of colloquial use, it became virtually the equivalent of esthiō, to eat. chortos, feeding place, fodder for animals, implies primarily grass or hay for horses and cattle, though it could be used poetically for food in general.

2. In the LXX chortazō carries the basic idea of satisfying with food (Ps. 37:19; 59:15; 132:15). By extension, the ground is satisfied with rain (Job 38:27), the trees with water (Ps. 104:16), and the earth with the fruit of God's works (104:13). On two occasions disillusion is expressed (Jer. 5:7; Lam. 3:15, 30), but more often the depth of satisfaction goes beyond that of mere food to that of seeing and knowing God (Ps. 17:15; 81:16; 107:9).

chortasma denotes "fodder" (Gen. 24:25, 32; 43:24; Jdg. 19:19) and "grass" once (Deut. 11:15). chortos (used 50x) translates a variety of Heb. words for grass and plants, which include human food (e.g., Gen. 1:29; 2:5; 3:18; Ps. 37:2; Isa. 15:6). Because grass grows in Palestine only during the period of the winter and spring rains and withers immediately when the heat comes, it is a ready illustration of the brevity and transitory nature of human life, esp. in the poetic books (Job 13:25; Ps. 37:2; 102:4, 11; 103:15; Isa. 37:27; 40:6–7). Defeated enemies are like down-trodden grass (2 Ki. 19:26).

NT In the NT chortazō almost invariably means to eat or to satisfy with food, as in the accounts of the feeding of the five and four thousand (Matt. 14:20; 15:33; Mk. 6:42; 8:4, 8; Lk. 9:17; Jn. 6:26). The Evangelists all stress that the crowds not only ate but were satisfied, so taking up the sense of chortazō in the LXX of Ps., and Jesus promises the same in the Beatitudes (Matt. 5:6; Lk. 6:21). That all distinction between this vb. and esthiō has vanished is clear from Mk. 7:27–28, where esthiō is used for the pet dogs and chortazō for the children. The only other occurrences of the verb are in Lk. 16:21, Phil. 4:12; Jas. 2:16; Rev. 19:21.

chortasma occurs once only in the sense of food (Acts 7:11). chortos is used of growing plants (Matt. 13:26; Mk. 4:28) and of grass in general (6:39; Jn. 6:10; Rev. 8:7; 9:4). The short life of the grass of the field is used by Jesus in an assurance that God will clothe his children (Matt. 6:30; Lk. 12:28). Jas. and Pet. both quote from Isa. 40:7–8 (Jas. 1:10–11; 1 Pet. 1:24), emphasizing the shortness of human life. chortos also illustrates living a Christian life with works that do not glorify God but serve one's own interests (1 Cor. 3:12); people who live this way may be saved, but their life's work will go up in the flames of God's judgment (3:13–15).

CL & OT chous is used by the cl. historians Herodotus and Thucydides to describe excavated or heaped up soil. This same word, in the sense of "dirt" or "dust," is used extensively in the LXX to translate the Heb. ʿāpār. In similes it often signifies a tiny or worthless object (e.g., Ps. 35:5; Isa. 17:13; cf. Neh. 4:10). Enemies lick up chous in humiliation, while the penitent and bereaved pour it over their heads in grief (Jos. 7:6; Lam. 2:10). Significantly, it was out of chous that God made the first man (Gen. 2:7; Ps. 102:14), and it is to chous that humans return when they die (Eccl. 3:20; 12:7).

NT chous appears twice in the NT, where it refers to the dust of the road (Mk. 6:11) and to dirt thrown on one's head as a sign of mourning (Rev. 18:19). choikos is used 4x, all in 1 Cor. 15:47–49, where Paul distinguishes "the first man" as God created him (cf. Gen. 2:7) from Jesus, "the second man," whose origin is heavenly.

χρεία (chreia), need, necessity, lack, want (5970); χρή (chrē), there is a need, it is necessary (5973); χρῄζω (chrēzō), to have need of (5974).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. chreia has the basic sense of need, want, necessity. The proverb that necessity is the mother of invention stems from a statement of Euripides that "necessity teaches wisdom even to the sluggish." From this primary notion of need developed the derivative ideas of office, duty, service, business. This same range of nuance occurs in the Hel. period, where chreia designates need or necessity. But the noun also signifies now occasion of need.

(b) The vb. form chrē, it is necessary, one must or ought to, is common in cl. Gk. In Hel. Gk. it recedes into the background and is almost totally displaced by dei. The parallel vb. chrēzō occurs throughout the period with the meaning to want, lack, have need of something. From the Hel. period we find the observation that those who drink wine need much discretion as well as the ethical injunction that if you have nothing to give to a person in need, show compassion.

2. The noun chreia is rare in the canonical books of the LXX but occurs frequently in the Apocr. (20x in Sir. alone). Its primary meaning is necessity or need, often denoting a need for something or someone. Thus the Medes have no need of gold (Isa. 13:17); a fool has no need of wisdom (Prov. 18:2); God has no need of sinful humans (Sir. 15:12). The secondary meaning of office, duty, service also occurs in the Apocr., where we read of service in the temple (1 Esd. 8:17; 1 Macc. 10:42), fulfillment of duty (Sir. 32:2 = LXX 35:2), administration of public affairs (1 Macc. 10:37; 2 Macc. 7:24), or holding an office (1 Macc. 13:15). From this last nuance it was easy to shift the focus from the office to the officials, also termed chreia (12:45; 13:37).

chrē occurs only once in the LXX (Prov. 25:27; cf. 4 Macc. 8:26 A), while the more usual Hel. chrēzō occurs 2x (Jdg. 11:7 B; 1 Sam. 17:18 A).

NT 1. (a) In the primary sense of need, lack, want, we read of David, who was in need and was hungry (Mk. 2:25), of distribution made to anyone in Jerusalem "as he had need" (Acts 2:45; 4:35), and of seeing one's fellow believer "in need" (1 Jn. 3:17). Epaphroditus is described as the one who supplied Paul's need (Phil. 2:25; cf. 4:16, 19). In the pl. the noun designates needs or necessities (Acts 20:34; 28:10; Rom. 12:13; Tit. 3:14).

(b) In combination with the vb. "to have," chreia functions as an act. verb "to need" (lit., "to have need of"). The healthy have no need of a physician (Mk. 2:17); the owner has need of his animals (11:13); the court has no further need for witnesses (14:63). The church of Laodicea boasts, "I am rich ... and do not need a thing" (Rev. 3:17).

(c) The secondary meaning of office, duty, service is found in the NT only in reference to the seven Hel. leaders: "We will turn this responsibility over to them" (Acts 6:3).

2. The rare term chrē occurs only once in the NT, in a comment of Jas. that "this [to both bless and curse from the same mouth] should not be" (3:10). The more usual chrēzō occurs 5x (Matt. 6:32; Lk. 11:8; 12:30; Rom. 16:2; 2 Cor. 3:1). When speaking of need, the NT writers usually use the phrase "to have a need [chreia]."

χρῆμα (chrēma), property, wealth, means, money (5975); κτῆμα (ktēma), property, possessions, (esp. in later usage) landed property (3228); ὕπαρξις (hyparxis), property (5638); τὰ ὑπάρχοντα (ta hyparchonta), what belongs to someone, property, goods, possessions (5639); οὐσία (ousia), substance, property (4045).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. chrēma (derived from chrē, it is necessary) stands for what is necessary, then goods and riches (mostly pl.). In the sing. it normally means quantity of, also money. ktēma (derived from ktaomai, buy, gain) means that which has been gained. It is used for possessions of every kind but later was confined to landed property. hyparxis means existence, then property, riches.

2. chrēma in Job 27:17; 2 Chr. 1:11–12 means money (in the latter together with ploutos, → 4458), while in Dan. 11:24, 28 it is the rich booty taken in war. ktēma in Job 20:29 has the general meaning of possessions or heritage, but in Prov. 12:27 it denotes riches as a reward for wisdom and hard work. ta hyparchonta (e.g., Gen. 13:6; 31:18; Prov. 6:31; Eccl. 5:19 = LXX 5:18; 6:2) means what one has, riches, possessions. In general the OT shows no hesitation regarding the mention of riches as good and as a blessing from God (Prov. 8:21; Eccl. 5:19; 6:2). But with hyparxis, as with ploutos, there is found, esp. in Prov., a critical outlook on wealth or the dangers bound up with it (cf. Job). Possessions are not the highest good. They are trivial compared with honor (Prov. 6:35), and they deceive one into seeking protection and security in them (18:10–11; cf. also 11:28; 28:6, 11; Sir. 11:18–19; 27:1–3; 31:3–11).

NT 1. With the exception of Mk. 10:23 and Lk. 18:24 (Matt. 19:23 has plousios), chrēma is found only in Acts 4:37; 8:18, 20; 24:26 and should be translated money. The sing. of ktēma is found only in Acts 5:1 and means a piece of land. The pl. ktēmata are the estates that in Acts 2:45 are distinguished from other possessions (cf. Matt. 19:22; Mk. 10:22; Acts 5:1). The pl. part. hyparchonta (e.g., Matt. 19:21; 25:14; Lk. 8:3; 11:21; 12:15; Acts 4:32; 1 Cor. 13:3; Heb. 10:34) is more common than the noun hyparxis (used only in Acts 2:45; Heb. 10:34). It means lit. the things that belong (to someone), and thus possessions.

Occasionally other words that have their primary reference elsewhere are used to denote possessions. For bios, which usually means life, → 1050. One's means of subsistence and thus property, worldly goods, is also borne out in ousia, substance (related to the vb. eimi, to be) in the sense of wealth in its sole NT occurrence (Lk. 15:12–13; cf. Tob. 14:13; 3 Macc. 3:28).

2. Jesus demanded from the rich young ruler a complete renunciation of his possessions for the sake of God's kingdom: "Sell your possessions [ta hyparchonta] and give to the poor" (Matt. 19:21). His riches were preventing him from following Jesus' call, for he had "great wealth [ktēmata]" or many estates (19:22). The fetters of possessions are so strong that a rich person can only with difficulty enter the kingdom of God. But when they are rightly used, goods can be used for good works, as in the case of the women who provided for Jesus and his disciples (Lk. 8:3) and the case of Zacchaeus (19:8; cf. also 12:33).

Lk.'s critical attitude towards wealth is shown by his being the only Evangelist to give the parables of the rich landowner (12:16–21; → thēsauros, 2565) and of the rich man and Lazarus (16:19–31). Covetousness (12:15) seeks security in life from material possessions and so leads a person to destruction (→ pleonexia, greed, 4432). It is one of the worst vices in a person freed by God.

3. Partially motivated by Jesus' instructions on possessions (cf. Lk. 12:33), but esp. by the expectation of the imminent Parousia, individual members of the early church in Jerusalem renounced their right to private property (Acts 2:45, ktēma and hyparxis; 4:32, hyparchonta), sold it when there was need (2:45), and gave the money to the apostles for distribution (4:36–37; 5:1–2). Ananias and Sapphira were judged not because they had kept back the proceeds of the property they had sold, but because they had lied to the Holy Spirit in pretending to give all to the church (5:3). What the sin of Achan (Jos. 7) was in the OT, theirs was in the NT. Note that Mary, the mother of John Mark, retained possession of her house and allowed it to be used as a meeting place (12:12). Local churches outside of Jerusalem apparently did not adopt the same community of goods.

4. In 1 Cor. 13:3 Paul uses love as the only valid criterion for evaluating good actions for our fellow believers involving possessions. If one's willingness to give away one's possessions to the poor is not an expression of love, the giver has no gain from the action.

In an exhortation to perseverance Heb. 10:34 reminds its readers that "you ... joyfully accepted the confiscation of your property [ta hyparchonta], because you knew that you ... had better and lasting possessions [hyparxis]." This may refer to the expulsion of Jews from Rome by the emperor Claudius in A.D. 49, among whom were Priscilla and Aquila (cf. Acts 18:2) and doubtless other Christian Jews who would have suffered eviction and looting. The allusion to possessions is further illustrated by the examples of Abraham (Heb. 11:16) and Moses, who preferred to suffer reproach for the sake of the Anointed One than to possess the treasures of Egypt (11:24–26; → thēsauros, treasure, 2565). It contrasts with the attitude of Esau, who forfeited his birthright for immediate material well-being (12:15–17; cf. Gen. 25:29–34).

χρηματίζω (chrēmatizō), impart a revelation, injunction, or warning; bear a name, be called or named (5976); χρηματισμός (chrēmatismos), a divine statement or answer (5977).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. the vb. chrēmatizō, related to chrēma, property, wealth, money (→ 5975), means to handle a matter, deal with something. In the language of government and business in the Hel. world it came to denote officially handling something or giving an official answer. It could denote a deity giving an answer. In the LXX chrēmatizō is used by Elijah to suggest sarcastically to the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel that perhaps Baal is on official business (1 Ki. 18:27). In Jer. 26:2 (= LXX 33:2) chrēmatizō denotes what the Lord reveals to the prophet to "tell" the Israelites who come to God's house (cf. also 29:23; 30:2 = LXX 36:23; 37:2).

chrēmatismos in cl. Gk. means money-making, although it is also a term for an official instruction or decree or for a divine answer in Hellenism. In the LXX it means dispatch (2 Macc. 11:17), oracle (Prov. 31:1 = LXX 24:69), and divine direction (2 Macc. 2:4).

NT 1. In the NT chrēmatizō has 2 distinct senses. It may be connected with chrēsmos, oracle, and with chrēmata, business. (a) In the infancy stories of Jesus, it is used of the instruction of people by revelations. It is usually in the pass., and the recipient is regarded as an instrument of God. Thus the wise men are warned in a dream not to return to Herod (Matt. 2:12). Joseph is likewise warned not to go to Judea where Archelaus ruled and so withdraws to Galilee (2:22). It was "revealed" to Simeon by the Holy Spirit that he would not see death before he had seen the Messiah (Lk. 2:26).

In a similar way, in the account of the opening of the church to the Gentiles, an angel "told" Cornelius to send for Peter to come to his house in order to speak to him (Acts 10:22). Heb. 11:7 speaks of how Noah responded "when warned about things not yet seen," and 12:25 encourages professing Christians not to ignore any message from God, for the Israelites did not escape a less serious message from Moses, "who warned them on earth" (cf. also the use of this vb. for the warning given to Moses in 8:5).

(b) In two instances chrēmatizō means to appear as something, bear a name. Thus in Antioch the disciples "were called Christians" for the first time (Acts 11:26). In Rom. 7:3, a woman "is called an adulteress" if she lives with another man while her husband is still alive.

2. chrēmatismos occurs in the NT only at Rom. 11:4: "And what was God's answer [chrēmatismos] to [Elijah]? 'I have reserved for myself seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal'" (cf. 1 Ki. 19:18). Thus, Paul argues, "at the present time there is a remnant chosen by grace" (Rom. 11:5). God has not rejected altogether his ancient people, the Israelites/Jews, and God's way of working now is the same as it was under the old covenant.

χρηστός (chrēstos), mild, pleasant, kind, good (5982); χρηστότης (chrēstotēs), goodness, kindness, friendliness (5983); χρηστεύομαι (chrēsteuomai), show kindness (5980).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. chrēstos originally denoted usefulness and thus anything that appeared good, suitable, proper. The word soon broadened to include moral excellence and perfection, in which inner greatness was linked with genuine goodness of heart. So chrēstos meant morally good and honorable, the capacity to show kindness to everyone. Used as a noun, to chrēston meant a friendly nature, kindness; in the pl. (ta chrēsta), kind actions. Similarly chrēstotēs acquired the meaning of friendliness, kindness, mildness, and was used in inscriptions as a title of honor for rulers and important public figures.

2. In the LXX the Heb. word ṭôb in its many shades of meaning is translated by chrēstos, along with agathos and kalos. There is little contemplation in the OT of the goodness of God in and of itself. On the other hand, God's benevolent activity is constantly sung and recognized in hymns of praise. chrēstos and chrēstotēs are favorite, although not the only, words for expressing the abundance of good that God in his covenant faithfulness displays to his own people and to everyone.

God's constant mercy and readiness to help is one of the essential themes of Ps. (e.g., 25:7–8; 31:19; 65:11). But chrēstos also occurs in prophetic texts (e.g., Jer. 33:11 = LXX 40:11; cf. 24:2–5). This picture of God's kindness grows deeper in the face of a bewildering recognition of the enduring nature of sin. Yet he still remains kind! Nor could the fate of the nation after the exile, with its conviction that God's dealings are incomprehensible, suppress the acknowledgment that Yahweh is kind (cf. 2 Macc. 1:24).

3. The Qumran documents continue the same train of thought. Just as the OT expected the pious to show kindness, which should reflect the kindness they received from God, the sect also expected its members to show gracious kindness to one another (e.g., 1QS 2:24–25; 4:3; 5:4, 25; 8:2). But in unexpected juxtaposition to the demand for gracious kindness toward one another stands the command for "eternal hatred" of the sons of wickedness (4:17). Here the limitation of the OT command to love or show kindness did not include love of one's enemies.

NT 1. In the NT chrēstos occurs 7x; chrēstotēs, 10x, and chrēsteuomai only in 1 Cor. 13:4. As in secular Gk., chrēstos is used of things, to denote their goodness (e.g., Lk. 5:39, good wine).

2. chrēstos is used in Lk. to widen the scope of the OT command to love (Lk. 6:35). Since God's kindness embraces even the ungrateful and the wicked (obstinate sinners), we are called to love our enemies unconditionally. Jesus invited those who had become exhausted by the legalistic piety of the Pharisees to take on themselves his "easy" yoke (Matt. 11:30). After experiencing his kindness, people are to be like him in showing kindness toward others (11:29).

3. Paul makes striking use of chrēstos together with the noun chrēstotēs. In his attack on self-righteous Jewish piety he shows that the goodness of God is no cheap, convenient grace. It should lead to a horror of one's unwillingness to repent so that God's aim of converting others to himself may be achieved (Rom. 2:4).

Esp. in his use of the noun chrēstotēs the apostle makes repeated use of the idea of God's incomprehensible kindness. God does not desire the death of sinners but their salvation (Rom. 11:22; Eph. 2:7; Tit. 3:4). His purpose in saving people is to show the meaning of kindness in their lives. Kindness and gentleness thus belong to the visible gifts of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). Love itself (→ agapē, 27) manifests itself as kindness (1 Cor. 13:4).

Because kindness is one of the chief aspects of the Spirit-filled life, it becomes the subject of the exhortation of Col. 3:12: "As God's chosen people . . . clothe yourselves with compassion, kindness." This completes the circle from the original kindness of the Creator God, who remains kind despite our sin and wickedness, to the revelation of his incomprehensible kindness in Jesus Christ in the fullness of time. In Jesus Christ God's fatherly kindness can be seen as in a mirror. Moreover, the members of the Christian community, the church, must choose as their path in the world the way of kindness. At the same time they choose that path in a world that often betrays little sign of it.

Χριστιανός (Christianos), Christian (5985).

NT The identification of the Messiah with Jesus of Nazareth brought the disciples the name Christianoi. Compared with other names for the followers of Jesus (e.g., disciple or believer), the word is rare in the NT. It is a word that defines the one to whom it is applied as belonging to the party of a certain Christos, much as Hērōdianos is a technical term for the followers of Herod (Mk. 3:6; 12:13). Its use also presupposes that Christos had taken on the meaning of a proper name, a process that would have been facilitated by the resemblance to the name Chrēstos, pronounced Christos.

According to Acts 11:26, Christianos was first used for Christians in Syrian Antioch. This verse, like the two others in which the word occurs in the NT (26:28; 1 Pet. 4:16), suggests that, being applied to Christians by outsiders, it contained an element of ridicule, similar to the word Nazarēnos or Nazōraios (→ 3716). But it soon became a name that those called by it felt honored to bear.

See also Iēsous, Jesus (2652); Nazarēnos, Nazarene, from Nazareth (3716); Christos, Christ (5986).

Χριστός (Christos), Christ (5986); Μεσσίας (Messias), Messiah (3549).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. chriō means to rub lightly, spread (over something); it requires more precise information about what is used, e.g., oil. The word has no sacral undertones. Naturally, then, this is true for the verbal adj. christos, which characterizes an object or a person as rubbed or smeared with whitewash, cosmetics, paint, etc. It is anything but an expression of honor. Where it refers to people, it even tends toward the disrespectful.

This is certainly why in non-Christian circles Christos, in its reference to Jesus, was soon confused with the Gk. name Chrēstos, and why the Jewish translator of the OT, Aquila, thought it right to render māšîaḥ or mᵉšîḥā', not by christos but by ēleimmenos (from aleipheō, which always means to anoint). Nevertheless, the meaning of the root chriō as rub (oil) on was essential for christos being used of Jesus of Nazareth and quickly acquired the character of a proper name.

2. Christos, used already in LXX, corresponds to the Heb. māšîaḥ and denotes someone who has been ceremonially anointed for an office. The Gk. transliteration of mᵉšîḥā' is Messias, which (like Iēsous) is made declinable by the added -s (not used in the LXX). But the NT authors were clearly taking over a word and concept that were already current in the pre-Christian period.

3. (a) In the OT two office-bearers are expressly described as māšîaḥ i.e., as anointed (with oil): the high priest (the one responsible for the official cult) and the king (→ chriō, anoint [5987]). In both cases the anointing, corresponding to its character as a legal act, was essential for the conferring of the authority connected with the office and for the resulting responsibility before God. However, in Jewish OT interpretation only the figure of the king was reckoned as messianic in the sense of specific messianic expectation.

(b) This expectation was ultimately related to the idea of the kingship and the sovereign kingly rule of God. The varying judgments on the monarchy in 1 Sam. 8–11 notwithstanding, the institution of the monarchy binds on the king a special responsibility for the things of God. This is clear from the censures that the OT historians passed on individual kings of Israel and Judah, according to whether or not they had ruled consistently with faith in Israel's God.

The crucial factor in being a māšîah is one's responsibility before God on the basis of transferred power and authority. This must be so if, after the Davidic kings (to whom must be ascribed considerable significance for the development of the messianic expectation), a foreigner such as the Persian king Cyrus can be described as God's māšîaḥ (Isa. 45:1; see below). Cyrus was a chosen instrument of God in the pursuit of God's universal aim of the salvation of all people through the nation he had chosen. Recognition of the divine freedom implied here is all the more essential, as the expectation of a messianic, kingly savior figure was associated from an early date with the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:8–12).

(c) A far-reaching influence on the development of the idea of the Messiah as a historical figure of increasingly supernatural dimensions was the memory of the magnificent and successful period of David's rule, the first king from Judah (cf. Isa. 9:2–7; 11:1–9; Mic. 5:2–6). A secondary motif here may be the association of the Messiah, especially in later Jud., with the pre-Davidic priest-kings of Jerusalem (such as Melchizedek), which David captured and made his capital (2 Sam. 5:6–10; 6:1–19).

(d) It is important to emphasize this kingly basis to Messiah because, with respect to the practice of anointing in Israel, both the king and high priest were anointed. But even though both anointings were similar in form, their life-setting was entirely different. The anointing of the kings of Judah was associated with the gift and the ritual transfer of authority, power, and honor. It gave the one anointed a position of power as well as the right to exercise it. The anointing of the priests, however, was a cultic purification, with the goal of enabling the priests to conduct valid worship.

4. (a) In this context we must consider further the description of the Persian king Cyrus as the anointed of God (Isa. 45:1), though he had clearly not been anointed as king in accordance with Judaic custom. We see here a sublimation of the concept, which makes it independent of the external act by transferring the entire weight onto God's appointment of the one designated by the anointing. In this case the anointed one is the one chosen in a special way by God and placed under his command, to do God's bidding and fulfill his plan in obedience to his will.

This helps to explain why the Judean kings, together with the OT Jewish Messiah, never themselves acquired divine features even in the so-called Enthronement Psalms (e.g., Ps. 2; 110). As the Lord's anointed, they remained in their kingship as dependent on God and responsible to him (cf. on David, 1 Sam. 16:1–13; 2 Sam. 19:22 = LXX 19:21; 23:1). At the same time, it follows that at any given moment the king, i.e., the actual reigning monarch of Judah from the house of David, could be introduced in Ps. as God's anointed without further special explanation (18:50; 20:6; 28:8; 84:9; 89:38, 51; 132:10, 17). This also explains how David (cf. 2 Sam. 3:18; 7:5) and his successors (e.g., Solomon, 1 Ki. 3:7–9; 8:28), and even a postexilic claimant like Zerubbabel (Hag. 2:23; cf. Zech. 3:8), are called the servants of God. Son (Ps. 2:7; 89:26–27) and servant, insofar as they describe the relationship of the anointed one to God, are not mutually exclusive. From God's point of view they belong inseparably together.

(b) It is difficult to give a precise answer to the question whether or not the Servant Songs (Isa. 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12) refer to a kingly figure as Messiah. Many scholars are not inclined to allow here an essential connection with the expectation of a future savior king. Yet there is a basis for it in the idea of responsibility under the claims of God, if even a prophet like Elisha (1 Ki. 19:16; cf. also Isa. 61:1) could appear in the ranks of the anointed.

5. The OT does not appear to exhibit any clear development of the messianic expectation. All that can be demonstrated is the presence of the expectation in the passages already referred to and in others extending, via Jer. 23:5–8 and Ezek. 34:23–24, to Hag. and Zech. Until this point they exhibit a strange uniformity. It is not until the Hel. period that this is overtaken by a sharp materialization of the concept in the direction of the expectation of an ideal eschatological Jewish national ruler who would nonetheless transcend national frontiers. It seems that the details, at least in part, were taken from the picture of the Maccabees and Hasmoneans and introduced into the older expectation oriented toward the memory of David.

We see this most clearly in Pss. Sol. 17:21–40; 18:3–9. Here the specific concept of the Messiah also appears in fixed form. Significantly its association with the Davidic tradition did not have the result that the Messiah could only be imagined as coming from the line of David. A notorious example of one who was no descendant of David is Simeon ben Kosebah, whom no less a person than Rabbi Akiba greeted as Bar Kokhba, the "star out of Jacob" promised in Num. 24:17, and thus identified him as messiah (ca. A.D. 132). Bar Kokhba's collapse, which severely shook messianism, may nevertheless have contributed to the fact that in Jud.'s liturgical texts, the hope of a Messiah from the line of David has persisted to this day.

NT 1. Wherever the NT is concerned with Jesus, it is concerned with him as Christ, i.e., as Messiah. In other words, for the whole of the NT, messianism no longer stands under the sign of expectation but under that of fulfillment. The Christ event is spoken of in the perf. or past tense. True, the writings do look into the future, sometimes intensively. But the One who is awaited is the One who has already come.

2. It is significant that the essential unity of the proclamation of Christ using the title Messiah is established, objectively as well as subjectively, with the least amount of ambiguity in the witness of Jn., one of the later NT books. The transliterated word Messias occurs only 2x in the Gk. NT, both in Jn. (1:41; 4:25); both times it is translated as Christos. Both passages lead to the conclusion that we must ascribe to Palestinian Jews the fact that in the Messiah the central concept in Jewish messianic expectation became the possession of the developing Hel. church. It found its way into the language of their worship and preaching.

No doubt the transference of this faith and language came about through the transmission of confessional summaries about Jesus. These were originally formulated in Aram. or Heb. in the Palestinian church and subsequently translated into Gk. as the church's mission extended beyond Palestinian Jewry. The best illustration of this process lies in 1 Cor. 15:1–7. Here Paul records the gospel he transmitted to the Corinthians, which he himself had previously received. Along with everything else we find Christos without the art., which seems to stem from the usage of contemporary Palestinian Jews. In the Gk. churches, therefore, the word christos, when linked with Jesus, completed relatively quickly the transition from an adj., which it is essentially, to a proper name. In the process it retained its traditional reference to Jesus' status.

3. The occurrence of Christos in this early Christian confession (1 Cor. 15:3–5) testifies to the fact that very early, believers saw no contradiction between Jesus' violent death on the cross and the name of Christ ascribed to him. This is remarkable because it seemed natural to the contemporaries of the early Christians that the collapse of a messianic pretender by crucifixion was decisive proof of the spuriousness both of his claims and of the hopes centered on him by his followers (cf. Acts 5:36–37 with Mk. 15:29; also 1 Cor. 1:23).

We find the same situation in other pre-Pauline passages incorporated by the apostle into his own proclamation: e.g., Rom. 4:25 (where "delivered over" refers to the death of Jesus, not to Judas's betrayal), or 3:25 (with its reference to Jesus' blood as a sacrifice of atonement). The same line is followed by all four Evangelists when they take over as part of the kerygma (most clearly in Jn. 18:36–37; 19:19–22) the inscription on the cross (cf. Matt. 27:37; Mk. 15:26; Lk. 23:38). This was intended to expose Jesus as pseudo-king of the Jews, i.e., as pseudo-Messiah, but the Evangelists make it an involuntary proclamation of Jesus as Messiah by his enemies, because that was what God willed. Jesus, because he was the Messiah, had to suffer and die (cf. Mk. 8:31; Jn. 3:14, where, however, this concept is linked with "the Son of Man"; also esp. Lk. 24:26).

The clear impression we receive from all such passages is that, when it represented itself as the community of Jesus, the early church presented itself simply as the messianic community. For in its preaching of Jesus as Messiah it was at the same time interpreting itself messianically in relation to its life, its historical origins, and its aims. If at a relatively early date Christians began to consider themselves as the Israel of God (Gal. 6:16), i.e., the true Israel as distinct from Israel according to the flesh (1 Cor. 10:18), the spiritual roots for this lie in the messianism that has just been outlined. Paul attests the same messianism when in 15:25 he leaves the last event before the end the kingly rule of the Christ/Messiah.

The most surprising fact is the part played by Jesus' messiahship in the Gospel of Jn. The crucial question throughout the book is that of a correct understanding of Jesus' kingship, beginning with the conversation between Jesus and Nathanael (1:47–50) to the dialogue between Pilate and Jesus (18:33–38) and that between Pilate and the chief priests (19:21–22). In Jesus' discussion with the Samaritan woman he discloses his messiahship (4:25–26). One recognizes in the solemn Iēsous Christos—lit, "Jesus is the Christ"—the confessional formula of Jn.'s own church (17:3; cf. further 1 Jn. 2:22; 4:2; 5:1; 2 Jn. 7). Here the early Christological inheritance is preserved in all its splendor and without any contraction.

4. Naturally the messianic element in the NT faith in Christ and in the NT confession of Christ is inseparable from the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. His resurrection is reckoned as his resurrection as Christ/Messiah (cf. Acts 2:31 with 1 Cor. 15:4; also Rom. 1:4). It appears everywhere as something done by God to the crucified and buried Jesus (cf. Acts 2:36) and moreover as his vindication by God (cf. Rom. 6:7–10; 1 Tim. 3:16). It is fully consistent, then, that in Jesus' statements about his suffering, the announcement of his impending death is always accompanied by that of his resurrection. This is not so much intended to discredit the opponents who refused to believe him and thus delivered him up to death on the cross so as to secure his messiahship, which seemed to be disproved by his death on the cross (cf. Lk. 24:26 with 19–21; cf. above).

What Paul writes in Rom. 9–11 about the relation of the church to Jud. presupposes a confident reliance on the messiahship of Jesus, which God legitimated just as much as does the expectation of a new heaven and a new earth (cf. esp. Rev. 5:1–5; 22:16). This is linked to the risen and exalted Jesus (cf. 1:5, 18), or the certainty that the coming of the kingdom of God is linked with Jesus as the Christ (Acts 28:31). To this extent the whole of Christian preaching has its source and its center everywhere in the messiahship of Jesus confirmed by God.

5. Finally, the formula Iēsous Christos leads to the question whether the linking of Jesus' name with the title of messianic dignity goes back to Jesus himself. This poses the issue of Jesus' messianic consciousness. A few comments here are appropriate.

(a) Many scholars argue that Jesus himself had no messianic consciousness. To support this view they point not only to the kerygmatic character of the accounts of his defense (e.g., before the Sanhedrin), but also to the fact that the so-called sayings source Q contains nothing that attributes messiahship to Jesus.

With respect to both reasons, however, we must recommend caution. First, Q remains a working hypothesis, not a document of historical fact. Second, there is still the need to explain how the kerygma by itself arrived at the idea of having Jesus represent himself to the Sanhedrin as the Messiah if he did not regard himself as such during his lifetime. Still, it is true that Jesus did not refer to himself in any clear form as Messiah. The most he permitted was for people to attribute to him messianic titles like "Son of David" (Mk. 10:47–48; → huios, 5626), without adopting an attitude of agreement or of denial toward them.

Furthermore, the picture of Jesus in the Gospels suggests that he conformed to none of the traditional messianic descriptions. He called in question by his person any notion of himself as a political savior-king and did not allow his own followers to address him as such. Even an event like Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi (Matt. 16:13–23; Mk. 8:27–33; Lk. 9:18–22), if one accepts its historical reliability, does not take us fundamentally beyond this conclusion. Certainly the events connected with his passion and Easter would appear quite differently in the tradition if at any point in time Jesus had given precise information about himself as far as his messiahship was concerned. Finally, Jesus did not triumph over death and the grave as the man he was, but, in the case of his resurrection, was the object of a mysterious direct action on the part of God. The result is a fairly unanimous picture, which scholars describe, imperfectly and in an unbalanced fashion, by the ambiguous phrase "the messianic secret." Still, the phrase points in a direction in which the answer to the question posed at the outset is to be found.

(b) The problem of the messianic secret can only be properly understood when we realize that Jesus' whole ministry was deliberately concentrated with his disciples. The Twelve were, after all, the interpreters of Jesus. Granted, they did not achieve a full recognition of Jesus as Messiah until after the Easter events (cf. Lk. 24:25–27). Nevertheless, the view they proclaimed had to be consistent with what they had known about Jesus during his earthly ministry, so that they could then associate what he had said and done with the use of the category of Messiah. The new situation of the resurrection did not encourage the development of ideas but led to final personal decisions and corresponding actions. This could only come about if the picture of the risen Jesus and that of the earthly Jesus were not contradictory but mutually interpretative on the grounds of their connection with him.

In other words, it was the mystery of the person of Jesus that was responsible for the disciples' feeling themselves confronted by the question of the Messiah in the earthly Jesus. On the basis of their encounters with the risen Jesus, the disciples ultimately answered it with the confession that he was the Messiah and that in him God had fulfilled his promise to the house of David and to Israel of salvation for the whole of humanity in a manner that was nevertheless only accessible to faith.

(c) Naturally the name Jesus Christ means more to Christianity than the messianic status of a certain Jesus of Nazareth, in whom God fulfilled his promises to the fathers. Every aspect of the salvation God has bestowed on the world is bound up in Jesus insofar as he is the Christ. In Jesus as the Christ "all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form" (Col. 2:9) for the salvation of all those who put their trust in him and appropriate to themselves the fruit of his death and resurrection (Rom. 4:24–25). Yet to express all of this in a single title like Messiah or Christ is not sufficient. Thus, when the NT kerygma expounds the salvation bound up in Christ, it makes use of other titles of honor, which emphasize the side of Jesus' person or work on which the particular title depends—titles such as Son of God, Lord, Savior, and mediator.

Still, if "Christ" has been transformed from a title of honor to a part of Jesus' name, this corresponds to the essential feature in Jesus' historical appearance that at the same time must be reckoned as the condition of his whole work as mediator of salvation: his obedient submission to God's will as manifested in the process of God's self-revelation in the history of the people of Israel. To this extent Jesus' affirmation of his messiahship, whether or not it was ever explicitly announced, is for the whole kerygma the presupposition of his path to the cross. It is equally the presupposition of his resurrection and exaltation on God's part.

This element in Jesus' messiahship, central for Christology, is represented nowhere in the NT as clearly and at the same time as comprehensively as in the Christological hymn that Paul introduced into his letter to the Philippians (Phil. 2:5–11). Here he describes Jesus' path via the incarnation, the life of obedience, the death of obedience on the cross, the resurrection, and the exaltation at God's side as the path of that Messiah who is identical with Jesus of Nazareth.

χρίω (chriō), anoint (5987); χρῖσμα (chrisma), anointing, unction (5984).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. chriō means simply to rub lightly, spread (over something). The word in no way specifies what is being rubbed. It can be done with oil, as for example with a human body after bathing, but also with poison (as in the preparation of arrows for battle), paint, whitewash, or even cosmetics.

2. chriō occurs 60x in the LXX. Apart from Deut. 28:40 and Ezek. 16:9, it translates the Heb. māšaḥ, to smear, anoint with oil or ointment. Unlike aleiphō, chriō is used basically in the symbolic ritual sense. Likewise, chrisma is used consistently of ritual anointing (Exod. 30:25; 40:9; etc.).

(a) From the petty states of the Canaanites in the region of Syria and Palestine, Israel adopted the institution of the monarchy, and with it probably also the anointing of kings (Jdg. 9:8, 15; 1 Sam. 9:16; 10:1; 16:3, 12–13). The OT tradition concerning the anointing of the king is not, however, uniform. In one place the anointing was performed by "the elders of Israel" on the basis of a contract between the king and these representatives of the twelve tribes (2 Sam. 5:3). Elsewhere it took place at the direct command of Yahweh and by the hand of a prophet (9:16). Whether it was Yahweh or the people who "made" the king, his anointing became a sacred act as part of the ceremony of enthronement, which took place in a holy place before Yahweh.

The anointing gave the new king the legal right to rule over Israel (→ Christos, 5986). It was done from a special vessel, a horn kept in the temple (1 Ki. 1:39), using olive oil mixed with spices, which was poured over the king's head as appropriate words were said (2 Ki. 9:3, 6). The anointing formed the first part of the coronation ceremony in the temple and was followed by the acclamation by the people, "Long live the king!" (11:12), and finally the ascent of the throne in the royal palace (11:19).

(b) The anointing signified communication of kābôd, the gift of authority, strength, and honor (cf. Ps. 45:7–8). The descendants of David were regarded as his successors to the throne (2 Sam. 7), as Yahweh's anointed, without having in every instance been symbolically anointed by a prophet. Anointing by Yahweh is sometimes coupled with the gift of the Spirit and Yahweh's special protection (e.g., 1 Sam. 16:13; 24:6–11; 26:9–23). Thus, the anointed one stood in direct contact with God and was regarded as inviolate.

(c) The high priest was also anointed (Exod. 29:7), as were other priests (40:15). This anointing took place during the seven-day-long consecration of the priests, after the preparation of the sacrifice (29:1–3), the ritual cleansing (29:4), and the enrobing (29:5–6) at the entrance of the sanctuary (29:7; cf. 28:41; 29:29; 40:13). Anointing made the priests sacrosanct, separating them from the sphere of the unclean (30:29–30). This same process of sanctification could also apply to holy objects, such as the tabernacle (40:9), the altar (40:10), the vessels used in the sanctuary, and the ark (30:26–29).

3. In passages like Isa. 61:1 and Ezek. 16:9, the anointing is to be understood fig., since in Israel ritual anointing was only available to kings and priests. Isa. 61:1 should be regarded as the testimony of the prophet, who is here speaking of his charismatic endowment with authority. In the NT this text is applied to Jesus (Lk. 4:18); he has been anointed by God to be the promised prophet.

NT In the NT chriō (apart from the form Christos, Christ, → 5986) occurs only 5x and chrisma only 3x (all in 1 Jn.). Both words are used exclusively in a fig. sense, corresponding to their use in the LXX. Anointing is a metaphor for the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, special power, or a divine commission.

1. Jesus was anointed by God (Lk. 4:18 [quoting Isa. 61:1]; Acts 4:27; 10:38; Heb. 1:9 [quoting Ps. 45:7]). The first three texts indicate a special endowment by the Holy Spirit with supernatural power, which probably recalls what happened at Jesus' baptism. On that occasion Jesus received the royal and priestly anointing that made him the Christos, the Messiah. Jesus of Nazareth was thereby declared the instrument of the gospel of peace. According to Lk. 4:18, Jesus read out the Isa. passage in order to proclaim that the period that begins with him is the period of salvation.

Heb. 1:9 does not refer to Jesus' baptism but to the ceremonial act of enthronement in heaven (cf. 1:3–4). On account of his obedience and endurance of suffering (2:9), Jesus was anointed and elevated at his ascension to the rank of eschatological ruler (1:8) and high priest (5:9–10).

2. The remaining instances of chriō and chrisma refer to the anointing of Christians. Some exegetes suggest the existence of an act of anointing before baptism. Perhaps 2 Cor. 1:21 and 1 Jn. 2:20, 27 refer to baptism, but we have no evidence of anointing as an independent rite within the baptismal ceremony. For Jn. the chrisma is the Spirit of truth, who gives believers the power of understanding so that they do not need any other teacher (2:27). The Spirit brings to mind what Jesus has said (cf. Jn. 14:26; 15:26; 16:13–14). By continuing in Jesus (1 Jn. 2:28) and through the power of the preached word as it works in the church, believers share in Jesus' messianic anointing. They receive the Holy Spirit, who is able to discern the spirits (4:1–6).

It is difficult to determine the meaning of chriō in 2 Cor. 1:21–22. Those exegetes are probably right who regard the three vbs. used here (stand firm, anoint, set his seal) as three different aspects of what happens in baptism. By their spiritual anointing, Christians are made rightful members of the covenant of promise. Paul's language here possibly implies a reference to a term in the gnostic mysteries, from which he thus dissociates himself. It is not our choice and decision that leads us through a mystic anointing to higher knowledge of the other world and to the way of redemption. It is the decision made by God for humankind in Christ Jesus, which operates through faith.

χρόνος (chronos), time, period of time (5989); χρονίζω (chronizō), take time, linger, delay (5988); χρονοτριβέω (chronotribeō), spend, lose, or waste time (5990).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. chronos denotes a space of time, whose duration is not as a rule precisely determined, but at most is characterized by additional adjs. as longer (e.g., polys, much) or shorter (e.g., oligos, little). In the face of wasted time, chronos takes on the meaning of loss of time. With reference to people, chronos often means age, years, or time of life, and thus comes close to bios, life (→ 1050). chronos is also used adverbially. In the gen. it means for a considerable time; in the dat. in (the course of) time, gradually, late; in the acc. for a set time.

(b) The older vb. chronizō means to be a long time coming, fail to appear, linger, remain, hesitate, put off doing something. The rare vb. chronotribeō means to spend, lose, or waste time.

(c) The Gks. experienced time as a power that inescapably determined life. On the one hand, time appeared to them to be an endless quantity. On the other hand, they were painfully aware that the time allotted to a person was all too short. One felt the advance of time, whose "omnipotence" overthrows all but the gods; it is always threatening life. Growing old in time as quickly as a shadow warns us of our transience. If youth is able to overlook this, that perspective disappears with age.

(d) "All-seeing time" was further felt to be a kind of judge, bringing everything to light. Time reveals the truth, esp. in respect of a person's real worth. If there are already echoes here of the positive functions of time, this is even more clearly the case where time is spoken of as that which gives healing forgetfulness; it erases everything.

(e) But even though it is the healer of wounds, time cannot save anyone from death. The Gks. reflected on human temporality and the necessity of one's own death. In this context, some aspired to make the fullest possible use of time; others sought to break through the limitations of time and achieve a life that would transcend death through a personal legacy.

(f) The Gks. also reflected philosophically on the nature and the origin of time. Such reflection reached its first great peak in Plato. chronos was created at the same time as the starry heavens; moreover, time will also pass away together with them. In the world of finitude time has become an image of the infinite one in the form of an endless sequence of particulars. In being and becoming, time corresponds to the incessant circular movement of the planets. It thus describes in turn cycles of natural becoming and passing.

Aristotle's analytic formulation of this question shifted the interest from the problem of being to the analysis of existence, that is, reality. Aristotle saw in change the sole possibility of discovering reality. The sequence of movement can be measured by number. He thus defined time as the continuous quantity of successive movement; time is deduced from place and movement, a process typical of the Gk. way of expressing things visually.

2. The OT does not reflect abstractly on time. There is therefore no unified biblical word for time, but rather several concepts that are expressed in the Heb. (or Gk. equivalents of) words, such as day, hour, eternity, age, end, decisive moment, now, today. In contrast to other words on time (see, e.g., kairos, 2789), chronos occurs only about 100x, concentrated in Job, Isa., Dan., and Macc. chronos may sometimes be used synonymously with hōra (hour, 6052) and kairos to denote a point of time (e.g., Jer. 38:28 = LXX 45:28). In general, however, it means an expanse of time. Esp. noteworthy is the formula eis ton aiōna chronon, "into eternal time" (e.g., Exod. 14:13; Isa. 9:7). The thought is here partly of the whole human life span, partly of a long period of time, but never of a timeless, otherworldly eternity.

(a) For Israelites, time and history were inseparably connected. That is, time interested them only insofar as it was qualified by a particular event. This was esp. the case with regard to Yahweh's dealings with his people. Certain periods of salvation history are accordingly described as the time of the fathers (1 Esd. 8:76), of Noah (Isa. 54:9), of Abraham (Gen. 26:1), of Joshua (2 Macc. 12:15), of Samuel (1 Esd. 1:20), etc.

Fundamental is the faith that the eternal, i.e., the "everlasting" God (cf. Ps. 90:1; cf. Exod. 15:18; Isa. 40:28; Dan. 12:7), is the Lord of time and that he gives all human time its content and meaning. If it was customary in ancient Israel to look more to the saving occasions of the past, the prophets fixed their eyes on future times. In Isa. this occurs through the use of chronos. Isa. saw that for long periods of time the enemies of Zion would be exposed to divine punishment (13:20; 14:20). Zion, by contrast, without being spared times of visitation (cf. 54:7; Jer. 29:8), will stand firm for all time (Isa. 33:20; cf. 34:17; 51:8), for Yahweh will establish an everlasting kingdom of peace (9:7).

(b) The problem of the elapse of a person's life span, which so oppressed the Gks., also comes up in the later strata of the OT. In Job, for example, the fact that humankind has only a short life (Job 14:1), though one would like to live for a long time (29:18), becomes a source of temptation. But Job and others find comfort in the knowledge that God prescribes the individual's allotted times (14:5, 13). Hence, even one who dies early can fill long spaces of time in a way that pleases the Lord (Wis. 4:13). All the same, from the perspective of this outlook, an extension of one's life span is regarded as a particular grace of God (Isa. 38:5).

(c) In wisdom lit. one finds the beginnings of a philosophical treatment of the question of time. But it is supported by a belief that it is God who, through wisdom (Eccl. 8:8), gives insight into the beginning, end, and middle of the times. The net result here is that God, who prepared the earth for eternal times (Bar. 3:32) and created the constellations to mark the time (Sir. 43:6), allots everything its time in nature, individual life, and national history (Eccl. 3:1). This is esp. true of times and opportunities for repentance (Wis. 12:20).

3. (a) Times of repentance with clearly defined limits played an important role in the Qumran community (1QS 7), whose consciousness of time was clearly formed by eschatological and apocalyptic ideas. Great emphasis was placed on the observance of special festive seasons (1:14–15; 10:1–5). In every period of time members of their fellowship were "to praise their Creator" (9:26), for only thus would they survive the fires of wrath of the last days and the raging of the angel of darkness (3:23).

(b) In his reflections on time, Philo takes over Plato's cosmic understanding of time. He seeks to combine a philosophical view of the origin of time with OT faith in God the creator. It is he who has created, out of nothing, the heavenly bodies with their harmonic movement without thereby standing in need of time. Everything goes back to his creativity.

NT 1. In the NT chronos occurs 54x, chronizō 5x, and chronotribeō once (Acts 20:16). Like the other temporal terms, chronos serves initially for the formal designation of a space or point of time. Thus the longer or shorter duration of a condition or an activity is frequently described by phrases with chronos (cf. Lk. 8:27, 29; Jn. 5:6; Heb. 11:32). Often, esp. in Acts, the details of any actual or projected length of stay at various places are given by chronos (e.g., 14:3; 15:33; 19:22; cf. 1 Cor. 16:7). As in the OT, chronos can also denote a person's lifetime (Acts 1:21; 1 Cor. 7:39). Finally, it can also describe a short time span (Jn. 7:33; 12:35) and can even be found with the meaning of kairos and nyn, in a moment (Lk. 4:5).

2. Theologically more significant than the general indications of time are passages that speak of chronos in connection with specific events. Such passages occur esp. in Lk.'s writings. Lk. 1:57 mentions the chronos of Elizabeth's delivery. In Acts 13:18 the word denotes a period of forty years of salvation history. The climax of the chronos-pronouncements is reached in a whole series of Christological statements. For with Jesus Christ, something new and unique has happened in time. Nevertheless, the NT writers are not interested in speculative questions about the origin and the nature of time. Their thoughts center on Jesus Christ, who has given time and history a new significance. This is expressed by Paul in Gal. 4:4–5, where he refers to the coming of the Messiah as having occurred "when the time [chronos] had fully come."

(a) One is able, of course, to speak of an end of time only against the background of the eschatological and apocalyptic messianic expectations of contemporary Jud. With the coming of Christ this time of expectation has come to an end for the NT (cf. 1 Pet. 1:20). His appearance means the end of the old age.

(b) But Jesus also opens up a new epoch, for with him begins God's reign over the world. In light of the incarnation of God in his Son and his entering into historical time, several scholars refer to the "center of time" in relation to Lk.'s perspective. For with the appearance of Jesus, the kingdom of God has come among us (Lk. 17:21). The Christ-event becomes the criterion of all historical time, both backward and forward. Now that "the times of ignorance" are past (Acts 17:30, lit. trans.), one can accordingly, in the light of "the revelation of the mystery hidden for long ages past" (Rom. 16:25), understand the past as a time of preparation. In retrospect it can be seen as standing under the sign of the promise and the "grace . . . given us in Christ Jesus before the beginning of time [chronos]" (2 Tim. 1:9; cf. Tit. 1:2; 1 Pet. 1:20).

3. (a) But the time of salvation was by no means past with Jesus' death. Jesus himself had spoken clearly of the coming end of the world (e.g., Mk. 13; Matt. 24–25) and thus assigned the believers into an interim period that stretches from Easter to the Parousia. Again and again the NT authors concern themselves with the remainder of the time (1 Pet. 4:2) and the events of the end. But they do not seek to predict that time of the end. Certain signs (e.g., the appearance of heretics and scoffers, Jude 18), are mentioned, but these serve only to encourage Christians to be watchful rather than to invite them to speculate about dates. God is the Lord of time, and it is his privilege to decide on the final hour for the consummation of his kingdom (Acts 1:6–7). Neither the angels nor Jesus himself know when the day of the Lord will break (Mk. 13:32). It will come suddenly, like a thief in the night (1 Thess. 5:1–11). Many early Christians were initially of the opinion that it would probably be only a short while until the Parousia; gradually, however, they adjusted themselves to a longer expanse of time.

(b) For all those who have not yet encountered God in Christ, who avoid him, or who (like the false prophetess Jezebel) resist him, this interim period is a "time to repent" (Rev. 2:20–21). But this time of decision will not be prolonged indefinitely. At the consummation of the divine mysteries time will cease to exist (10:6). Those who in faith recognize Christ as Lord are to use the time given them in the interim period for growing and maturing in their knowledge of the faith (cf. Heb. 5:12–13).

Pet. stresses further the ethical accountability of Christians, who are no longer to behave as they used to in earlier times in the manner of the heathen, but who are to live now by God's will (1 Pet. 4:2). According to 1:17, the interim period is defined as a "time [chronos] of exile" (lit. trans.) that leads us through much darkness, hours of temptation, and persecution. Comfort during this time is granted by the hope of God's future and the eventual restoration of the original order of creation.

CL & OT 1. This word is borrowed from Sem. languages of the ANE (e.g., Heb. ḥārûṣ). This may reflect the fact that gold was rare in Greece before Alexander the Great captured Persia's stores of gold. In Egypt, West Arabia, the mountains of Armenia, and Persia gold was widely used and the goldsmith's art perfected from the 3d millennium B.C.

2. In the LXX chrysos and chrysion, which became interchangeable, translate five different Heb. words for gold. These probably indicated differing degrees of purity in the gold, which was often mixed with varying percentages of silver (cf. Gen. 2:11–12). In ancient times, there were three ways of working gold. It could be melted and cast into molds to form solid figures (Exod. 32:4), beaten into sheets with which objects could be covered (25:11), or beaten into a particular shape (25:31).

Besides the cultic associations of gold in both the tabernacle and the temple, in countries around Israel gold was made into idols (Exod. 20:23). It was frequently used for jewelry (Gen. 41:42; Jdg. 8:26), and at a comparatively early date was used for currency (2 Ki. 18:14; 23:33). Since royalty throughout the ages used gold for crowns, thrones, cups, and drinking bowls (1 Ki. 10:18, 21; Est. 1:7), it became an appropriate gift for a king (Ps. 72:15). In Dan.'s interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream the Babylonian king is the head of gold (Dan. 2:38). Because gold is indestructible, it became a symbol for great value and enduring worth (Prov. 8:18–19).

NT The NT makes extensive use of the word group for gold. chrysos occurs 10x; chrysion, 12x; chrysoō, 2x, and chrysous, 18x. More than half of these uses are in the book of Rev.

Gold was used in the NT as an exchange of currency. When Pet. and Jn. encountered a crippled man as they were entering the temple, Pet. said, "Silver or gold I do not have" (Acts 3:6). Pet. did not have money to give to this man, but he did have the power of Jesus to make him walk. Similarly, when Jesus sent out the Twelve on their mission journeys, he instructed them, "Do not take any gold or silver or copper in your belts" (Matt. 10:9); rather, they were to be dependent on the people with whom they stayed for physical needs.

Gold was also used as a precious metal for a wide variety of purposes, both decorative and religious. It could be used as a commodity in its own right (Rev. 18:12), for jewelry (1 Tim. 2:9; 1 Pet. 3:3), for royal crowns (Rev. 9:7) and garments (17:4, 18:16), for valuable articles in one's home (2 Tim. 2:20), for various articles used in the service of God in the temple or heaven (Matt. 23:16–17; Heb. 9:4; cf. also Rev. 1:12, 20; 2:1; 8:3; 9:13), and for idols (Acts 17:29; Rev. 9:20). It is probably because of its great value and its association with royalty that the wise men presented gold as one of their gifts to "the king of the Jews" (i.e., the infant Jesus, Matt. 2:11).

Gold takes on a symbolic value in several passages of the Scriptures. Pet. reminds us, for example, that saving faith has far greater value than gold, for through it we receive an imperishable inheritance, whereas gold can perish (1 Pet. 1:7; cf. Jas. 5:3, where Jas. refers to the "corrosion" of gold). Furthermore, the precious blood of Jesus is worth far more than perishable gold, for that blood redeems us from an "empty way of life" to a full and rich life in Jesus (1 Pet. 1:18). When Paul uses picturesque language to refer to building fruitful, enduring lives on the foundation of the church, which is Jesus Christ, he talks about using "gold, silver, costly stones," in contrast to those who build with elements that will not stand the test of God's fire of judgment: "wood, hay or straw" (1 Cor. 3:12).

This last verse touches on another metaphorical use of the topic of gold, namely, the fact that in order to be useful it has to be refined (though the Scriptures refer more frequently to the refining of silver than of gold; → argyrion, 736). To the lukewarm church in Laodicea Jesus gives counsel that if they want to be truly rich (i.e., rich with eternal, lasting treasure; cf. Matt. 6:19–21, 24), they ought to "buy from me gold refined in the fire," a euphemism for eternal, spiritual wealth available through faith in our Lord (Rev. 3:18; cf. 1 Pet. 1:7).

Finally, the new Jerusalem is described as a "city of pure gold," whose "great street [is] ... of pure gold" (Rev. 21:18, 21; contrary to popular assumption, Rev. does not say that all the streets of the city will be paved with gold, only the "great street"). These references show both the perfection of that city and the inestimable value of trying to attain to it.

χωλός (chōlos), lame, halt, maimed (6000).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. chōlos describes a lame condition in the legs or feet that produces a halting or limping gait. In a later period the word was used to designate a deformed or impaired condition of the hand.

2. In the LXX chōlos means lame with respect to one's feet (2 Sam. 9:13; 19:26). Whether congenital or acquired, this condition disqualified a man from holding office as a priest in Israel (Lev. 21:18). This prohibition formed part of the concept of holiness for the nation and was esp. important for those participating in the sanctuary rituals, of whom a high standard was required. Whatever approached God or was offered up to him must be perfect, so that priests had to be free from both ceremonial impurity and physical defects (21:1–23; Deut. 15:21). In the same way sacrifices had to be without blemish (Lev. 22:19–22), to symbolize the offering of the very best of human productivity to God. Otherwise punishment would result (cf. Mal. 1:7–14). In Isa. 33:23; 35:6; Jer. 31:8, and elsewhere, the lame are mentioned in connection with the promised future.

NT chōlos occurs 14x in the NT. In Matt. 11:5; 15:30–31; 18:8; Mk. 9:45; Lk. 7:22; Acts 3:2; 14:8; Heb. 12:13, the reference is either implicitly or explicitly to impairment of the legs and feet. Of a more indeterminate nature is the use of chōlos in Matt. 21:14; Lk. 14:13, 21; Jn. 5:3; Acts 8:7. In the NT the lame, the maimed, or the crippled were invariably regarded as underprivileged members of society and thus objects of charity, whether of a secular (cf. Lk. 14:13) or Christian (cf. Acts 3:2–10) nature.

χωρέω (chōreō), have or make room for, give way, go (6003); χώρα (chōra), country, region (6001).

CL & OT 1. chōreō is a verbal derivative of chōros or chōra, an open space, a land, country, region. (a) Intrans. it means to give room, to be in motion from one place to another. When applied to persons, it can mean to give ground in battle, to tackle and carry out something, or to come to regret an action. When applied to things, its meaning includes to move things, to spread news or commands, to undertake something, e.g., a war. (b) Trans. it means to be able to take up, hold something; in an extended sense, to be able to put up with someone.

2. chōra is a frequent word in the LXX, occasionally for the land of Canaan (Gen. 15:7; Isa. 2:7) but much more often for other lands and territories (e.g., Gen. 10:20; Num. 32:1; Ps. 105:44). chōreō is rare in the LXX, being used in connection with the capacity that cultic vessels have to hold something (e.g., 1 Ki. 7:38). In the writings of Hel. Jud. outside the LXX chōreō is relatively common: (a) intrans., of war spreading, of human wickedness increasing and spreading; (b) trans., often of one's incapacity to grasp the knowledge of God presented to one or to bear the word of God.

NT 1. Intransitive use. The expression "everyone to come [chōreō] to repentance" (2 Pet. 3:9) corresponds to the use of chōreō in the sense of tackling something and carrying it out. The thought is probably that of a single act that is possible, since God is delaying the last judgment. The phrase "goes [chōreō] into the stomach" (Matt. 15:17) corresponds to the description of physiological processes in medicine. It suggests a certain independence of the natural processes of the mind and the will. chōreō in Jn. 8:37 means to spread or make progress. It is applied to the failure of Jesus' word to make progress in the hearts and minds of his Jewish opponents. In the context of 8:30, Jesus is apparently speaking to Jews who have heard his teaching with approval, yet without letting it take effect.

2. Transitive use. chōreō is used to denote the capacity to hold: of water jugs (Jn. 2:6), of a place (Mk. 2:2, "no room left"), and the world, which does not "have room for" all the books that could be written about Jesus (Jn. 21:25). It also means to receive or "accept" the apocalyptic teaching of Jesus (Matt. 19:11–12, contained in 19:9 or 10). Jesus is indirectly exhorting a group of people who have been given an insight or a gift for something to make use of it. The meaning corresponds to understanding and grasping the teaching of the parables (cf. 13:11, 16–17, 19, 23). In both instances Matt. stresses the understanding of the disciples.

Paul's plea to "make room for us" (2 Cor. 7:2) takes up his earlier plea to the Corinthians to extend themselves (6:13) and corresponds to the assurance that "we are not withholding our affection from you, but you are withholding yours from us" (6:12). They are to recognize Paul in his apostolic ministry as he has given himself to them (2 Cor. 1–6), so that they can be proud of one another on the day of the Lord Jesus (1:14).

3. As in the LXX, chōra can refer to the land of the Jews (Acts 8:1), but much more often for other countries and territories (Matt. 2:12; 8:28; Lk. 19:12; Acts 16:6). It is also the word commonly used for fields (Jas. 5:4). The shepherds of Bethlehem were out in the fields at night when angels visited them, announcing the birth of Jesus (Lk. 2:8); in Samaria, Jesus looked out and saw fields white for harvest (Jn. 4:35).

χωρίζω (chōrizō), divide, separate; (pass.) depart, be separated, divorced (6004); ἄγαμος (agamos), unmarried (23).

CL & OT 1. Cl. Gk. authors use chōrizō to denote such separation as the freeing of the soul from the body at death or the dividing of opposing military forces. Fig. the vb. often indicates a separation in thought, i.e., logical distinctions or observable differences.

2. In the LXX chōrizō denotes spatial separation of persons (Lev. 13:46; Jdg. 4:11) or things (1 Esd. 4:44, 57), departure (Jdg. 6:18; 2 Macc. 10:19; 12:12), exclusion from office (1 Esd. 5:39), or separation from evil (Ezr. 9:1; Neh. 9:2; 1 Esd. 7:13). The vb. was often used in the papyri and Hel. Gk. in the pass. as a technical term for marital separation, esp. divorce.

NT 1. chōrizō may signify a physical separation of persons (Phlm. 15, "he was separated from you") or departure from a city or locality (Acts 1:4; 18:1–2).

2. (a) In a fig. sense, so convinced was Paul of the constancy of God's love that he could list—and then dismiss as impotent—all potential obstacles to the continued flow of that love in Christ to the believer (Rom. 8:35–39). To his question "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" (8:35a) comes the answer that nothing in all creation can (8:39).

(b) If the phrase "set apart from sinners" in Heb. 7:26 is construed with what precedes ("holy, blameless, pure"), it refers to Christ's sinlessness. If, on the other hand, it is taken with what follows ("exalted above the heavens"), it refers to his withdrawal from the world of evil. Perhaps the author intends us to understand Christ's separation as both moral and spatial.

3. In Matt. 19:6; Mk. 10:9; 1 Cor. 7:10–11, 15, chōrizō is used for divorce. (a) Matt. 19:3–9 (cf. Mk. 10:2–9) records an incident in which the Pharisees try to get Jesus to take sides in the contemporary dispute between the schools of Shammai and Hillel concerning permissible grounds of divorce: "Is it lawful for a man to divorce [apolyō; → apostasion, divorce, 687] his wife for any and every reason?" (Matt. 19:3). In reply Jesus appeals to the divine ordinance in Gen. 2:24 that predates any Mosaic legislation (Deut. 24:1–4), in which God's ideal is that the two partners "become one flesh." We must not undo God's work by trying to "separate" what God has joined together (Matt. 19:6; see below for more on this).

(b) In 1 Cor. 7 Paul addresses an aberrant situation at Corinth in which a group of ascetics seem to be enjoining either celibacy (cf. 7:1–2, 8–9) or celibacy within marriage (cf. 7:3–7), or even the dissolution of marriages, whether Christian (cf. 7:10–11) or mixed (cf. 7:12–16). Paul appeals in 7:10–11 to Christ's prohibition of divorce (Matt. 19:6; cf. 5:32; 19:9); he has no need to express his own opinion (cf. 7:12, 25): "A wife must not separate from her husband," nor should "a husband . . . divorce [aphiēmi; → 918] his wife" (7:10b, 11b). Parenthetically the apostle adds (7:11a) that if a separation does take place on the wife's initiative (owing either to her husband's adultery or to his ascetic tendencies), she should remain unmarried or else seek reconciliation. Her option might possibly imply his guilt.

However, with regard to mixed marriages Paul knows of no relevant word from Christ (1 Cor. 7:12a). His judgment is that separation is permissible only "if the unbeliever leaves" (7:15a, probably on the basis of religious incompatibility). In such circumstances, the believing partner need not feel bound to persist in seeking reconciliation since God's calling is to peace, not discord (7:15b), and there is no assurance that the unbelieving spouse will come to faith (7:16).

4. Divorce, separation, and remarriage. (a) In principle Paul regards the marriage bond as lifelong (1 Cor. 7:10–11, 39; cf. Rom. 7:1–3). He pictures the marriage union as an image of Christ and the church (Eph. 5:21–33), grounded in the creation ordinance of Gen. 2:24 (Eph. 5:31). The "one flesh" relationship can take place outside marriage, but then it is adulterous. In 1 Cor. 6:12–20 Paul discusses relations with prostitutes and stresses that no believer should join himself to become one body with such a woman. "Do you not know that he who unites himself with a prostitute is one with her in body? For it is said, 'The two will become one flesh.' But he who unites himself with the Lord is one with him in spirit" (6:16–17). Since sexual acts establish relationships through the body, Paul distinguishes sexual immorality from all other sins (6:18).

In 1 Cor. 5 Paul deals with a case of incest: a certain man's cohabitation with his father's wife; in such a case excommunication is imperative (5:5, 13). The prescribed punishment for incest or adultery in the OT was the execution of the offending parties (Lev. 20:10–12; Deut. 22:22; cf. Jn. 8:1–11). But in the NT excommunication replaces execution. Just as certain acts affected the community in the OT and had to be purged, Paul urges that offender be removed from the NT community. The immoral and adulterers have no place in the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 5:9–11; 6:9–11). However, 6:11 shows that such sins are not beyond the grace of Christ and that the truly penitent can take their full place in the fellowship of the church (cf. also Jn. 8:11).

It is against this background that Paul discusses separation and divorce issues in 1 Cor. 7. The foundation of his teaching is a frank recognition of human needs and the fact that marriage is God's appointed way of avoiding the sins he has just been dealing with (7:2). Moreover, spouses should give each other their conjugal rights, for each rules over the other's body (7:3–4). They are to refrain from normal married relations in which intercourse plays a part only in order to devote themselves to prayer—and then only temporarily—lest Satan tempt them through a lack of self-control (7:5). Some have the gift of celibacy, which enables them to devote themselves to the things of the Lord and to be spared the troubles that beset the married, esp. in view of the times (7:7, 26, 29–35).

In 1 Cor. 7:25–29 Paul writes about "virgins" (7:25; parthenos, → 4221), i.e., the "unmarried" (agamos; cf. 7:8, 11, 32). agamos is a broader category than parthenos, since it includes those who have been married and are now unmarried (7:11) as well as those who have never been married. What Paul says in this section applies equally to single people, widowers, widows, and the divorced. He begins by insisting that his observations are not based on a specific command of the Lord. If a person is currently married, he or she should not seek divorce; if a person is presently single, he or she should not seek marriage, though if anyone does want to get married, that person has not sinned.

Paul is mainly concerned about two things as to whether marriage should take place: the "present crisis" in which we live, coupled with the fact that marriage necessarily brings a division of loyalties (1 Cor. 7:26–35). But there is also a question of the kind of people we are, with our basic human needs and gifts (7:2–9, 36–38). In Paul's opinion this second factor is the decisive one, for if we do not have the gift of celibacy, the unmarried state can be more of a hindrance than a help (7:2, 5, 9, 36–38). It can mean less devoted service and even expose one to great moral danger. Getting married is no sin.

As far as marriage itself is concerned, Paul considers it to be permanent: "A woman is bound [deō, bind, → 1313] to her husband as long as he lives" (1 Cor. 7:39; cf. Rom 7:2–3). Paul offers the following principles: (i) Marriage is intended by God to be lifelong. (ii) Remarriage after the death of a partner is permissible, though not mandatory. (iii) Sexual relations outside the marriage constitute adultery and are thus forbidden. (iv) In such cases divorce is permissible and the so-called innocent party free to remarry; yet grace and reconciliation are available in Christ for those who seek them (1 Cor. 6:9–11) and are preferable.

(b) Paul's teaching is not in conflict with that of Jesus. The question that the Pharisees raised with him deals with the interpretation of Deut. 24:1–4 in the light of existing marriages (Matt. 19:1–12; Mk. 10:1–12; cf. Lk. 16:18). The so-called "exception clause" in Matt. 5:32 and 19:9 permit divorce and remarriage on the grounds of porneia ("marital unfaithfulness"), a term that includes adultery (moicheia; → moicheuō, commit adultery, 3658) as well as any kind of illegitimate sexual intercourse (→ porneuō, commit fornication, 4519).

The OT law provided for divorce by the husband on the grounds of existing unchastity discovered after the marriage had taken place (Deut. 24:1–4). All he had to do was to give his wife a bill of divorce and send her away. She was then free to marry, but not to return to him as his wife after being married to someone else even if the second husband were to die. The question raised by the Pharisees arose out of the way in which this basis for divorce had been extended and trivialized. The stricter school of Shammai allowed divorce only in cases of adultery, whereas the more lenient school of Hillel extended it to incompatibility on various grounds. While the OT law did permit divorce in certain cases, in the case of adultery after marriage the penalty was the execution of the offending parties (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22; cf. Gen. 38:24; Ezek. 16:38–42). The practice of stoning offenders was still an issue in Jesus' lifetime, though it was not always carried out and was stopped under Roman rule (Jn. 8:1–11).

Jesus' teaching went behind the Mosaic permission to the creation ordinance of Gen. 2:24: "For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and they will become one flesh." In so doing, he was basing his reply not on the provision made by the law for what a man might do if he found something "displeasing to him" (Deut. 24:1) in the wife he had married but on God's original goal for marriage. The "one flesh" relationship constitutes the essence of marriage and distinguishes that relationship from all others. On the basis of Gen. 2:24, a husband and wife "are no longer two, but one" and should not be separated (Mk. 10:8–9). Jesus goes on to ascribe the Mosaic regulation in Deut. 24:1 to the fact that "your hearts were hard" (Matt. 19:8; Mk. 10:5).

The culminating pronouncement Jesus made is double-edged: "Therefore what God has joined together, let man not separate" (Matt. 19:6b; Mk. 10:9b). The Pharisees had tried to maneuver Jesus into making a statement on a controversial issue in order to force him to take sides and possibly even to contradict the law (Matt. 19:3; Mk. 10:2). Jesus expanded the entire issue by relating it to any party that served to cause the breakdown of a marriage: husband, wife, or even a third party. In fact, as Jesus said in Matt. 5:27–30, even an adulterous look is a step in the direction of a marital separation, and either partner who actually commits adultery is de facto putting the marriage asunder.

The Synoptic Gospels all record Jesus' statement that the man who divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery (Matt. 19:9; Mk. 10:11; Lk. 16:18a). The Pharisees may have asked their initial question about divorce in the context of Herod Antipas, who divorced his own wife and married Herodias, the wife of his half-brother, Philip (Matt. 14:3–4; Mk. 6:17–18; Lk. 3:19). This situation had been denounced by John the Baptist and ultimately led to his death, and perhaps the Pharisees were hoping a similar perspective from Jesus would have the same result. The question would have added poignancy, since Jesus had just entered the territory of Antipas "across the Jordan" (Matt. 19:1; Mk. 10:1).

Moreover, in Mk. 10:12 Jesus denounces as adultery the case of the woman who divorces her husband in order to marry another. This too would fit the case of Herodias (though Jesus said this to his disciples in private). The key element in God's sight is not the formalities of a divorce but the action that constitutes the breakup of the marriage relationship. What is condemned as adulterous is what causes the breakup of a marriage for the sake of a new liaison.

What about the exception clause, which occurs in Matt. 5:32; 19:9, but not in Mk. or Lk.? Some scholars regard this clause as an addition by Matt. to soften the rigorous teaching of Jesus. Others, however, argue that Mk. and Lk. have abbreviated their sources. Clearly abbreviation has taken place in the case of Lk., who gives only the pronouncement with no background or prior discussion. Still others believe that Matt. has added material but see it as an editorial clarification expressing the mind of Jesus in the light of the historical situation.

We should also draw attention to the parallel between the teaching of Matt. 19:10–12 and Paul's teaching on gifts in relation to marriage and celibacy (1 Cor. 7:1– 9, 36–38). The response of Jesus' disciples to his teaching on this issue is similar to that of the spiritual party at Corinth, that perhaps the best course for a follower of Jesus to follow is to refrain from sexual relations altogether, including marriage: "If this is the situation between a husband and wife, it is better not to marry" (Matt. 19:10). The implication is that the only safe course is to try to live without sexual relations. Jesus' reply crystallizes their thought by explicitly referring to "eunuchs." But Jesus distinguishes between those who are such by nature and those who are capable of living as such for the sake of the kingdom (19:12). In other words, as Paul said, both marriage and celibacy are gifts. Deliberately to avoid marriage for fear of not being able to stay married is an unrealistic solution. It all depends on the gifts one has been given: "The one who can accept this should accept it" (19:12).

Ψ psi

6010 (psallō, sing [a hymn or praise]), → 6011.

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. psallō originally meant to pluck (hair), to twang a bow-string, and then pluck a harp or any other stringed instrument. The noun psalmos refers in general to the sound of the instrument or to the actual production of the sound.

2. (a) In the LXX psallō and psalmos generally refer to the individual psalms in the book of Psalms. It often occurs in various headings, e.g., "A psalm of David." It seems apparent that, at least during the OT period, the singing of Ps. was always accompanied by musical instruments. psalmos can also mean any spiritual song, whether or not an instrumental accompaniment is mentioned (cf. Ps. 33:2). The phrase "play the harp" in 1 Sam. 16:16, 18 is psallein en kinyra (lit., "to sing with a lyre"). Finally, psalmos can refer to profane songs, such as the drunkards' songs of 69:12.

(b) The particular significance of "psalms" (nearly always meaning those of David, but also later poems up to and including the psalms of Qumran) is that, by and large, they constituted the backbone of Jewish synagogue worship. Individual psalms provided a daily form of prayer for the faithful Jew.

NT 1. In the NT two basic meanings can be ascertained. (a) psalmos can denote the OT book of "Psalms" or even the entire so-called Writings, the third division of the Heb. Bible, of which Ps. was first in this division (see Lk. 20:42; 24:44; Acts 1:20; 13:33). (b) More generally psalmos can mean a hymn of praise; psallō, to sing a spiritual or sacred song (→ psalmos in 1 Cor. 14:26; Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16; psallō in Rom. 15:9; 1 Cor. 14:15; Eph. 5:19; Jas. 5:13).

2. It is remarkable not only that these words occur only 4x in Lk., 7x in Paul, and once in Jas., but also that they are used by Lk. only in the first sense and by the other writers only in the second. But the reason for this is not so much theological as that the vocabulary is influenced by the respective contexts. Lk., for instance, emphasizes the continuity of salvation history in Jud. and Christianity.

3. The meaning "hymn of praise" or "to sing a spiritual or inspired song" can be further subdivided as follows. (a) A hymn of praise (psalmos) or the singing of praises is a typical manifestation either of the Spirit of God in his present activity in the community of the baptized (Eph. 5:18–19; Col. 3:16), or of God himself (1 Cor. 14:25–26). This includes free compositions, repeated liturgical fragments, and new Christian songs (which may well have been modeled on the psalms of the OT and of Jud.), such as we know from the wording of the various songs of Rev. (cf. 5:9–13; 7:12; 11:15, 17–18; 12:10–12; 15:3–4; 19:1–2, 6–8).

In 1 Cor. 14:15 Paul also regards singing as a manifestation of the Spirit, being a higher activity than speaking in tongues on the grounds that it is more edifying: "I will sing with my spirit, but I will also sing with the mind." The contrast in the context of 14:14 is not between "with [or in] the spirit" (either the speaker's or more probably the Holy Spirit) and "with [or in] the mind," but between being in the Spirit unintelligibly and therefore unedifyingly (in tongues) and being in the Spirit intelligibly (cf. 14:16–19).

A similar meaning underlies Jas. 5:13, albeit in a less explicit sense: "Is any one of you in trouble? He should pray. Is anyone happy? Let him sing songs of praise." This answer is given in response to the question: How should a devout Christian react to adversity and prosperity? Our feelings must be expressed in an intelligible form and should be directed to God.

(b) psallō has the sense to sing hymns of praise in God's honor in Rom. 15:9, where Ps. 18:49 and 2 Sam. 22:50 are seen as finding fulfillment in the coming of Christ and the response to that among the Gentiles: "so that the Gentiles may glorify God for his mercy, as it is written, 'Therefore I will praise you among the Gentiles; I will sing hymns [psallō] to your name.'" ψεύδομαι (pseudomai), lie, deceive by lying (6017); ψευδής (pseudēs), deceitful, mendacious, a liar (6014); ψεῦδος (pseudos), a lie (6022); ψεύστης (pseustēs), a liar (6026); ἀψευδής (apseudēs), guileless, truthful (950).

CL & OT 1. The noun pseudos means a lie, the antithesis of the truth (alētheia; → 237). The OT proclaims that God is truthful. He and his word can be trusted. "God is not a man, that he should lie.... Does he speak and then not act? Does he promise and not fulfill?" (Num. 23:19; cf. 1 Sam. 15:29).

2. Humans, however, have fallen prey to a lie; they have dissociated themselves from God and do not acknowledge him as Lord. The prophets accuse God's people of falling prey to a lie. Instead of trusting their Lord, they rely on their own strength and political alliances. They listen to false prophets (Jer. 5:31; Ezek. 13:19) who flatter them, give false prophesies of salvation, and whitewash over sin (Ezek. 22:28; cf. Hos. 10:13). The most serious accusation is that the people put their faith in idols instead of in God, which the prophets call lies (Isa. 28:15; 59:13; Jer. 5:12; Ezek. 13:8; Amos 2:4). Lying, in the eyes of the prophets, is not so much an ethical offense as a basic moral attitude that turns its back on the one true God. Only a remnant will survive God's judgment: those who "speak no lies, nor will deceit be found in their mouths" (Zeph. 3:13).

3. Similarly in Ps. those who turn from God are described as liars: "Even from birth the wicked go astray; from the womb they are wayward and speak lies" (58:3). "In my dismay I said, 'All men are liars'" (116:11). But the devout hold firm to God and do not "turn aside to false [pseudeis] gods"(40:4). God will make an end of all liars (5:6).

4. In the OT laws the Lord states explicitly, "Do not lie. Do not deceive one another" (Lev. 19:11). Notable is the command in the Decalogue not to give false testimony (Exod. 20:16; cf. Lev. 19:12; Prov. 21:28). Such a thing is reprehensible because in ancient Israel judgment could be given solely on the basis of the evidence of two or three witnesses (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6–7; 19:15–21).

5. Rab. texts likewise declare that God has nothing to do with lies. Four groups of people will not see God: scoffers, hypocrites, liars, and slanderers. To bear false witness against one's neighbor is to bear false witness against God. In the Qumran writings, lies belong on the side of God's adversary and to the powers of darkness. They are the mark of the godless, whereas members of God's community are called "sons of truth." Belial uses lies to lead the godly astray; thus, the godly person confesses: "I will not keep Belial within my heart, and in my mouth shall be heard no folly or deceitful lie" (1QS 10:22).

NT In the NT 15 different words contain the root pseud- (false; 6012–6026), occurring esp. in Johannine and Pauline writings. Besides the words listed in the head paragraph are the following:

- pseudadelphos, false brother (2 Cor. 11:26; Gal. 2:4)
- pseudapostolos, false apostle (2 Cor. 11:13)
- pseudodidaskalos, false teacher (2 Pet. 2:1)
- pseudologos, liar (1 Tim. 4:2)
- pseudomartyreō, to give false witness (5x; e.g., Matt. 19:18; Mk. 14:56)
- pseudomartys, one who gives false witness (Matt. 26:60; 1 Cor. 15:15)
- pseudomartyria, false testimony (Matt. 15:19; 26:59)
- pseudoprophētēs, false prophet (11x; e.g., Matt. 7:15; 24:11, 24; Rev. 16:13; 19:20)
- pseudochristos, false Christ (Matt. 24:24; Mk. 13:22)
- pseudōnymos, bearing a false name (1 Tim. 6:20)
- pseusma, falsehood (Rom. 3:7)

1. (a) The NT takes up the OT witness to the truthfulness and truth of God. Tit. 1:2 speaks of God as one "who does not lie [apseudēs]." God keeps faith with his promises in history, for his decrees are unchangeable. The writer of Heb. stresses how God's keeping his promises and swearing an oath indicate that "it is impossible for God to lie" (6:18). Since the God who raised Jesus from the dead is the source of truth, Paul defended himself by claiming in the last resort that God knows that he is not lying (2 Cor. 11:31; Gal. 1:20).

(b) The revelation of God's truth in Jesus Christ lets the other side of the picture come to light—the lies of humans, who have "exchanged the truth of God for a lie, and worshiped and served created things rather than the Creator" (Rom. 1:25). The revelation of God's wrath against human wickedness (1:18–3:20) leads in 3:4 to the confession: "Let God be true, and every man be liar. As it is written: 'So that you may be proved right when you speak and prevail when you judge' " (cf. Ps. 51:4).

2. (a) Jn.'s Gospel presents a dualism of God and the devil in terms of truth and lie. The devil is "a liar and the father of lies" (Jn. 8:44); it is his "native language." Lying and death stand opposed to the truth and life of the Revealer. Lying here is not simply telling untruths; rather, it connotes the will directed against God, unbelief, and resulting futility (see 8:41–47, where Jesus accuses his opponents of lying). Such lying happens everywhere that humans seek their own glory and put up barriers to resist Christ's revelation.

(b) This thought is expanded in 1 Jn. People "make [God] out to be a liar" when they claim that they have not sinned (1:10; cf. 5:10). This letter is also directed against false teachers who preach lies (2:22), denying Jesus as the Christ (cf. Rev. 2:2). In the Johannine literature lie is used in the widest sense to mean hatred of Christ and thus life without God.

3. (a) The antithesis of truth and lie is not only the determining factor that distinguishes between Jesus' disciples and his enemies. It also operates within the church in the responses of obedience and disobedience to the word of truth. Peter asks Ananias, "How is it that Satan has so filled your heart that you have lied to the Holy Spirit?" (Acts 5:3). Ananias's sin was not that he withheld his property but that he lied to God in professing to have given it all to the church while retaining something for himself (5:4).

(b) In 1 Jn., the false evaluation that human beings give themselves in relation to God (see above) means that any contradiction between one's confession of faith and one's life as a member of the church involves him or her in a lie. Three examples of such behavior include: to profess fellowship with Christ while walking in darkness (1:6); to profess knowledge of Christ while disobeying his commands (2:4); to profess love for God while hating one's brother (4:20). Here, too, it is apparent that for 1 Jn. lying is not only a moral offence but also the manifestation of life without God.

(c) The admonitions in Eph. and Col. have individual faults in mind when their readers are told to throw off falsehood and to speak the truth to each other (Eph. 4:25; Col. 3:9). Paul can make this command because Christians have put off "the old self" and may put on "the new self" (Eph. 4:22–24; cf. Col. 3:9–10) and are therefore in the position to stop lying.

(d) Rev. likewise understands lying in specific terms: No liar (pseudēs) or perpetrator of horrible deeds will enter the new Jerusalem (21:8, 27; 22:15). Those who belong to the Lamb stand opposed to liars: "No lie was found on their mouths" (14:5). As in Jn. and 1 Jn., lying and falsehood stand in fundamental opposition to God. Thus the Jews at Philadelphia are described as "the synagogue of Satan, who claim to be Jews . . . but are liars" (3:9).

CL 1. Early in cl. Gk. psychē was impersonal: the breath that gives life to humankind. Linked with psychē was thymos, which denoted the warm flow of blood, the life force, hence, emotion. Together the two words connoted a psycho-physical entity. But when the dependence of the conscious soul (thymos) on the unconscious (psychē) became recognized in Gk. thinking, the meaning of psychē was broadened to include thymos. Thus the psychē became the bearer of conscious experiences. Later the psychē was regarded as the permanent part of the person, an independent soul in contrast to the body.

2. (a) In ancient Gk. lit., the soul is conceived as combined with the body as two parts forming one person. When it leaves the body, the body loses its life. Thus the soul can simply stand for life. A person may release one's soul, and so one's life, from oneself. psychē can even come to mean things as dear as life, e.g., money and children.

(b) psychē can also refer to the inward part of a person, i.e., one's personality. Here the soul becomes equivalent to the person. The psychē, bound as it is to the body, is so much a personal force that it can be used instead of the pers. pron. (i.e., "my soul" is equivalent to "I"). If a human being is anything at all, he or she is soul.

The actual power of the soul is seen first of all in the movement that it imparts to the body in which it lives. It becomes the character and disposition of the person. According to Aristotle, the soul fills and moves a person and describes it as fire and warmth; Plato suggests that the soul can be robbed of its body.

The soul is the seat of perception, of desire and pleasure, and of enjoyment. psychē can be used generally in place of emotion. The soul, not the body, is the seat of love and desire, hunger and thirst. The powers of reason and will are, however, also part of the soul. Thus the soul finds a place alongside thought and judgment; its tasks are to care, rule, and advise. In all this, the soul remains incorporeal.

With the Stoics, however, the view develops that the soul is material, nourished by material substances and filling the body. It is correlated to the body. The substance of the soul is the pneuma, breath. Like the body, it results from procreation. Emotions are the greatest enemies of the soul and are in a position to rob it of liberty.

The essential characteristic of the soul consists in the fact that it can set itself in motion. Among all animate beings, the human being is the one in whom the deity has implanted the most powerful soul. Furthermore, it has a share in divinity, since the divine power rules in humankind by means of the soul. The soul can be trained. The most important thing is to cultivate or take care of it rather than to pursue wealth or happiness. For virtue does not result from wealth; on the contrary, the acquisition of wealth and of other good things both in private and in public life are the fruit of virtue. One can say that here for the first time we find the concept of the care of souls. The human reaches harmony by gaining full mastery over oneself; the soul is enabled to govern the body.

(c) Gk. lit. speaks both of the departure of the soul (i.e., the loss of life) and of an abode of souls. It is a likeness of the person concerned, but it is not that person himself or herself. The soul is thus represented as an entity in its own right as opposed to the body; it joins itself to its body and leaves it again. Related to this in thought is the concept of a journey of the soul into the world beyond and its return to the earth, or of its descent from the realm of light into the body and its return to the heavenly world by means of a cycle of births. Another concept is that of a gathering of the souls in a field in the underworld, to hear the judgment as to whether they will partake in the eternal symposium or lie in the mire of the underworld. The driving force behind these ideas about the soul is the religious movement of Orphism.

Plato provides us with the idea that the soul is immortal and that it can be deprived of its body; in fact, the soul does not come fully into its own until it has been separated from the body. He argues for the necessity of the soul's immortality on the ground that a lifetime is too short a period for the moral struggle in humankind. A person must therefore be able to collect and assess experiences from several incarnations of one's soul. It has knowledge of the forms of ultimate reality, which it acquired in prephysical existence. The body is clothing for the soul or a kind of prison. Liberation from this prison may be achieved by Bacchic ceremonies, by the grace of gods who provide redemption, or by ascetic renunciation of earthly existence. The immortal souls are led into the underworld by Hermes.

In a fig. sense, psychē can also be used of the inspiring force in the constitution of a state. Gk. writers can refer to the soul of the city or even that of Greece. The thought of a world soul as the life principle of the cosmos is found in the Stoic writer Chrysippus.

OT 1. In the LXX, psychē, soul, occurs over 900x and is distributed fairly equally among the various books. Most often it stands for the Heb. nepeš (breath, life, soul), but also 25x for lēb (heart, inner person) as well as a few times for several other Heb. words.

(a) nepeš denotes that which makes a body, whether of a human or an animal, into a living being. When nepeš is translated as psychē, it signifies what gives life to a person (e.g., Gen. 2:7). Note 1:20, which speaks of "living souls" (NIV, "living creatures"). A dying person breathes out the soul (Jer. 15:9) or pours it out (Lam. 2:12), though it can also return to a person's body (1 Ki. 17:21). "Soul for soul" means "life for life" (Exod. 21:23). Blood, as the seat of life, can be practically identical with psychē (Gen. 9:4–5; Lev. 17:11, 14).

(b) psychē, rendering nepeš, is the sensitive part of the life of the ego, the seat of the emotions: e.g., love (Song 1:7), longing (Ps. 63:1), and gladness (86:4). The psychē reveals its life in movement and the various expressions of the emotions. It is the uniting factor for the inner powers of a person—hence the phrase "with all your soul" (Deut. 13:3). Within the soul dwell the desire for food (12:20, 21), the lust of the flesh (Jer. 2:24), and the thirst for murder and revenge (Ps. 27:12). The soul expresses its feelings: It weeps (119:28), is poured out in tears (Job 30:16), and experiences patient endurance (6:11). But knowledge and understanding (Ps. 139:14), thought (1 Sam. 20:4), and memory (Lam. 3:20) have their seat in the soul as well. So much does the soul sum up the whole self of a person that "soul" can be equivalent to the self (cf. 1 Sam. 18:1). When the people are numbered, counting is by "souls" (Exod. 1:5; Deut. 10:22).

Living creatures likewise can be described as souls: everything that lives, all living things, usually in a collective sense (Lev. 11:10). A clear indication of how unfamiliar the OT is with the concept of a soul separate from the body (e.g., at death), is the fact that it can speak of a corpse as the soul of a person, meaning by this phrase the dead person in his or her corporeality (Num. 6:6).

(c) Whereas in Qumran texts this word remains totally within the OT framework, Hel. influence is more clearly discernible in the Apocr. While elsewhere the OT does not reflect on the relationship between body and soul, the Apocr. contrasts these two elements. A perishable body weighs down the soul (Wis. 9:15), and the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God (3:1). Pollution of souls is also mentioned (14:26). It is esp. bad when no healing can be found for the soul, so that it must perish eternally (16:9).

2. (a) For Josephus, psychē is primarily the seat of outward, earthly life. It is the sense of the inner person with its various powers as contrasted with the body. It is the locus of the will and the virtues, the seat of the emotions and various personal qualities. Josephus also contrasts immortal souls with human bodies. The soul, not being subject to corruption, can pass over into another body. The evil soul will, however, suffer eternal punishment. From these concepts it is clear that Josephus moves in the world of Hel. thought concerning the immortality of the soul and its true life, separated from the body, in eternal fellowship with God.

(b) For Philo the soul is the side of human existence that has been equipped with divine powers and possibilities; it belongs to the divine Spirit, and its first power is that of glorifying God. Of particular concern for Philo is the governing principle of souls, the nous, understanding (→ 3808). The essence of this governing part is the Spirit of God. Philo also knows psychē in the sense of life; its whole being is in the blood and thus includes what is mortal. But in striking contrast to the OT, Philo takes it for granted that there are bodiless souls (i.e., angels). As in Gk. philosophy, the soul finally leaves the mortal part belonging to it behind and goes into the world of things imperishable and incorruptible. It is at home in the divine world; in the body it finds itself in an alien.

(c) Hel. influences are also discernible in Jewish lit. For example, 4 Macc. demonstrates this with its conception of an immortal soul that separates itself from the body in death (14:6); the victor's prize for virtue is everlasting life for the soul (cf. 17:12). In the hour of death, the souls of the righteous are received by the patriarchs (cf. 5:37; 13:17). Rab. lit. contains similar ideas. For example, in the midrash on Eccl. 3:21–22a the souls of both the righteous and the ungodly rise at death to the heavenly height in order to receive the judgment.

These views may be in the background of Lk. 16:23 (Lazarus in Abraham's bosom and the rich man in the place of torment) and of 23:43 (Jesus' saying, "Today you will be with me in paradise"). At the end of time, God will bring soul and body together and judge both. According to 2 Esd. 7:78–101 souls are judged directly after death and are sent to a place of refreshment, peace, and sevenfold joy, or to a place of torments and roaming in sevenfold pain.

NT 1. In the NT, by way of contrast to the frequent use of psychē in the LXX, this word occurs only 102x, the majority of which are in the narrative portions of the NT.

(a) psychē, soul, is the seat of life or life itself, as in the well-known saying: "Whoever wants to save his life [psychē] will lose it, but whoever loses his life for me ... will save it" (Mk. 8:35; cf. Matt. 16:25; Lk. 9:24). The principle that the person who gives up one's life will truly find it becomes clear from the example of Jesus himself and his death and resurrection: True life is ever only won through sacrifice.

psychē also means life in the saying of Matt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45, where Christ's mission is stated as his giving his life as a ransom for many. So too at Lk. 14:26, to hate one's psychē means hating one's "own life" (cf. 9:23). The counterpart of 14:26 is Rev. 12:11, which speaks of those who have not loved their lives.

psychē embraces the whole natural being and life of a human being for which one concerns oneself and of which one takes constant care. Thus Matt. 6:25 speaks of being anxious for one's psychē, i.e., for its food. Life (psychē) and body (sōma) are God's handiwork; thus, they are of more importance than the food and clothing about which we are so concerned. In Lk. 12:19 the rich man addresses his psychē, i.e., he speaks to himself. What he does not realize is his psychē, i.e., his life, can be taken from him at any moment. The citation of Ps. 16:10 in Acts 2:27 also speaks of the psychē—again, the seat of life—as being left by God in Hades, i.e., left dead in the grave. Even for Paul, to think little of the soul means to think little of one's life (Phil. 2:30).

Jn. 10:11 speaks of Jesus laying down his psychē for the sheep. This is why the Father loves the good shepherd (10:17). The same expression is used in 13:37–38, where Pet. offers to lay down his psychē for Jesus. People can also risk their lives for others (Rom. 16:4) or "for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts 15:26).

psychē is also found in the NT in recording numbers of people (e.g., "Jacob and his whole family, seventy-five [souls] in all" [Acts 7:14]; "276 [souls]" shipwrecked on Malta [27:37]; "a few people [psychē], eight in all," were saved in Noah's ark [1 Pet. 3:20]) as well as in the phrase "every soul," which means "everyone" (Acts 2:43; cf. 3:23; 27:22; Rom. 2:9; 13:1).

The expression "every living thing [soul]" (Rev. 16:3; cf. 8:9) is also to be understood in the OT sense. At creation the dust of the ground was made into a "living soul" by the breathing in of the divine breath (cf. Gen. 2:7). Paul takes up this idea in 1 Cor. 15:45 in order to contrast Adam as a created "living being [soul]" with the life-giving Spirit present in Jesus Christ.

(b) psychē means the inner life of a person, equivalent to the ego or personality, and has various powers. In 2 Cor. 1:23 Paul pledges his "soul" in a solemn oath (lit., "I call on God as my witness, upon my soul"). The reference here is not only to Paul's life but to his whole person, with all that he believes, hopes, and strives for. Similarly in 1 Thess. 2:8, Paul writes concerning himself and his coworkers that they have given their "souls," i.e., their living powers of energy, working day and night in their care of the churches. Jesus speaks of souls that are in need of rest and peace (Matt. 11:29), since, in the depth of one's inner soul sorrow is experienced (26:38; Mk. 14:34; cf. Ps. 42:6).

In Lk. 1:46 soul is used in parallel with spirit. Both have here the meaning of the whole inner person in contrast to the outward aspect of lips and speech. Above all, the soul is spoken of here in a sense that goes beyond the world of Gk. thought. It is the seat of the religious life and of one's relationship to God. It is this religious root in human existence that is referred to in 2:35, contrasted directly with the sword that wounds the body outwardly. We have here to do with a hidden, inward experience of the soul. The religious life of a person is also the subject of 3 Jn. 2: lit., "it is well with your soul."

(c) Of some interest is the contrast of soul (psychē) and spirit (pneuma, → 4460) as expressed in 1 Thess. 5:23, with its tripartite division of a human: spirit, soul, and body. The "spirit" in this context, as in Philo and Platonism, means the higher side of a person (cf. Heb. 4:12). "Soul" thus means life, i.e., the fact of being alive, and the human aspect that has to do with willing and with emotion. In a similar way, in 1 Cor. 2:14 Paul contrasts psychikos and pneumatikos. The former is the animate person, filled with soul in the sense of life-force ("a living being," Gen. 2:7; cf. 1 Cor. 15:45); the latter is spirit: that aspect of the individual that is enlightened by God's Spirit.

The adj. psychikos is used again in Paul's discussion of the nature of the resurrection in 1 Cor. 15:44–46, where the body of this life is contrasted with the resurrection body. The former is psychikos; the latter is pneumatikos. Through this distinction Paul counters the objection against the absurdity of thinking of the resurrection as the resuscitation of our corpses. The NIV rightly brings out the contrast between life under the conditions of space and time and the resurrection life by translating psychikos here by "natural." In Jas. 3:15, on the other hand, psychikos is best translated as "unspiritual." Here the contrast is worldly wisdom and divine wisdom. Finally, in Jude 19 the NIV translates this word as those who "follow mere natural instincts." In each case, the emphasis falls on a person in oneself without the new life of God.

In Heb. 6:19 ("an anchor for the soul"), "soul" again means the whole inner life of an individual with the powers of will, reason, and emotion. In this connection, mention should also be made of the use of psychē to mean insight, will, disposition, sensations, and moral powers of humankind (cf. also Matt. 22:37; Mk. 12:30; Lk. 10:27; cf. Deut. 6:5).

(d) In terms of Gk. phrases, ek psychēs, "from your heart" (Eph. 6:6; Col. 3:23), should be understood as the inner disposition of a person. Similarly we find the phrase mia psychē, "as one man" (Phil. 1:27), resulting from our standing firm "in one spirit." The background here is probably the notion that the church is the body of Christ, which, like a human body, is filled with a soul, showing itself as real and alive when it completes the unity of the body by bringing about a unity of inner powers within the church. Likewise, in Acts 4:32 the common "mind" is meant, so that the church is united with one heart and one soul. This inner power of the church members is also the target of the exhortation in Heb. 12:3 not to "lose heart." Souls that are not firmly established can be enticed and led astray (10:39). Souls can also be activated in wrong and evil ways; they can be poisoned (Acts 14:2).

(e) Hel. Jud. is familiar with the concepts both of the soul's corruption and of the soul's salvation. These lines of thought appear in the later letters of the NT, but nowhere does the NT refer to an immortal soul as the guarantee or substance of eternal life. Although certain passages show traces of Hellenism, they are nonetheless brought to a different level by biblical tradition, basic eschatological insights, and the Christian experience of faith in the risen Lord. It is the task of the church leader, for example, to "keep watch over your souls [NIV, you]," which are destined for eternity (Heb. 13:17).

Jas. 1:21 and 5:20 speak of the salvation of a soul that is in danger. The death from which it is said that the soul will be saved is eternal death.

The salvation of souls is the goal of faith and the content of God's saving activity, in which he gives all those who are baptized a share (1 Pet. 1:9). It is probably for this reason that 1:22 speaks of the purification of the soul, i.e., the inner life (NIV, "yourselves"). It is a matter of the soul in its relationship to God. The soul, as the part of us that believes and is sanctified, is destined to an inheritance in God's future kingdom. Thus here the contrast is not between spirit, soul, and body, but between the soul and the lusts of the sinful nature. It is souls in this sense that are meant in 2:25, their "Shepherd and Overseer" being Jesus Christ himself. "Soul" is used again in the same sense of being destined for eternal life and victory over death when Christians are exhorted in 4:19 to entrust their souls to God in time of persecution, for he will preserve us for eternity.

Matt. 10:28 (cf. Lk. 12:5) also falls into this category. The soul is directed to God alone, who "can destroy both soul and body in hell." The soul in this sense only exists because it is called by God and because it allows itself to be called and filled with divine power. God alone has power over it. He can let it live, and he can destroy it. Similarly in Rev. 6:9 and 20:4 mention is made of "the souls" of those who have been slain, who are under the altar of God in heaven. The martyrs, who have shed their blood for Christ's sake, are compared with sacrifices; that is why their souls are under the altar. The dominant thought here is that the souls that have been won by God, have been saved, believe in him, and have sacrificed themselves for him are preserved in his keeping.

2. The NT contains several other compounds related to psychē. (a) anapsyxis occurs only at Acts 3:19 in the phrase "times of refreshing," i.e., the age of salvation, which is promised to the nation of Israel if it repents. Although many Jews were converted (2:41; 4:4; 5:14; 21:20), the Israel Lk. describes in Acts is one in which large numbers of Gentiles are incorporated and from which many of the old Israel remain aloof.

(b) The cognate vb. anapsychō has a trans. meaning at the only place where it occurs in the NT, as compared with its intrans. sense in the LXX, where it means to refresh oneself (Exod. 23:12; Jdg. 15:19; 1 Sam. 16:23). In 2 Tim. 1:16 Paul mentions how Onesiphorus often refreshed him while he was in prison. It is not clear whether this refers to physical refreshing or spiritual encouragement, or both.

(c) The term dipsychos, "double-minded," occurs in Jas. 1:8. Perhaps it means with a divided heart. At any rate Jas. makes the twofold point that such a person is unstable and that cannot presume on the goodness of God, for prayer and devotion require a wholehearted attitude to God. In 4:8, Jas. calls on doubters to purify their double-minded (dipsychos) hearts (cf. also haplotēs, sincerity, 605).

(d) The rare word oligopsychos means timid or discouraged (1 Thess. 5:14). Such persons are to be encouraged, though the idle are to be admonished.

(e) sympsychos, harmonious, united in spirit, occurs in Phil. 2:2, where Paul exhorts the church to complete his joy by being "one in spirit," love, and purpose.

(f) In Phil. 2:19 Paul expresses the hope that he "may be cheered" (eupsycheō) when he receives news of the Philippians, which no doubt implies the hope that they will have taken to heart his admonition in 2:1–18.

ψυχρός (psychros), cold (6037); ψῦχος (psychos), cold (6036); ζεστός (zestos), boiling, hot (2412); χλιαρός (chliaros), lukewarm (5950); θερμαίνω (thermainō), warm, keep warm (2548); θέρμη (thermē), heat (2549).

CL & OT psychros (and the noun psychos, cold) are commonly used of lit. cold, often of liquids, but also fig., to mean ineffectual or cold-hearted. zestos, boiling, is usually lit., but may be applied fig. to human passions. chliaros refers mostly to liquids or food. thermos, hot, passionate, and its cognates are common in both lit. and metaphorical senses, often as the antithesis of psychros.

In the LXX psychos and the thermē group are freely used of temperature. The latter group is also occasionally fig.: in particular, thermainō, warm, used commonly of fire, may be applied to the heart (Ps. 39:3; Hos. 7:7; cf. Deut. 19:6).

NT 1. In Matt. 10:42 psychron, used alone, means cold water. psychos (Jn. 18:18; Acts 28:2; 2 Cor. 11:27) denotes cold temperature. thermē (once) and thermainō (6x) are used in two of the above passages, where Pet. and Paul respectively warm themselves at the fire (Mk. 14:54, 67; Jn. 18:18, 25; cf. Acts 28:2). To be warmed, filled with food, and clothed are the basic necessities of the destitute (Jas. 2:16; cf. 1 Tim. 6:8), and Jas. insists on a practical faith that will supply them to a fellow believer in need.

2. Words in this group are also used metaphorically. (a) The verbal form psychō is applied to one's spiritual state (love grows cold, Matt. 24:12; cf. zeō, to be fervent, in Acts 18:25; Rom. 12:11).

(b) The main significance of the word group attaches to chliaros, psychros, and zestos in Rev. 3:15–16. Here all three are used metaphorically and absolutely of personal character. The passage has usually been understood to refer to levels of spiritual fervor, which accords with the exhortation in 3:19 to be earnest.

The interpretation is, however, open to question. Rev. 3 presents the notions of cold and hot indifferently, as though both were desirable conditions; indeed, cold twice precedes hot. Note that the Lord does not say, "It is better to be hot or even cold, i.e., better even stony indifference than halfhearted support."

The present usage is better seen as an image referring to the water supply of Laodicea, which was derived from a pipeline bringing water that was lukewarm and so impure as to have an emetic effect. The words hot and cold were applicable to the waters of the two neighboring cities, Hierapolis and Colosse (cf. Col. 4:13). The hot water, which produced the celebrated petrified cascades of Hierapolis, was medicinal, being used for the eyes by local people even today (cf. Rev. 3:18b); the cold perennial stream at Colosse made that city the earliest natural settlement of the valley.

Lukewarmness should thus probably be understood as ineffectiveness, the inadequacy of human effort as a substitute for diverse manifestations of God's giving. Effective service hinges on one's response to Christ, not on human endeavor. The Laodicean Christians are characterized as those whose wealth and self-sufficiency prompted them to work by their own resources rather than to recognize their need of Christ. The point is reinforced by a series of images derived from notable industries and achievements of their city. They have "wealth and do not need a thing," but they must do their business with Christ if they are to obtain the real spiritual goods. In a city that sold eye ointments, the church is spiritually blind; Christ alone can supply it with vision.

ᾠδή (ōdē), song, ode (of mourning, complaint, or joy) (6046); ᾄδω (adō), to sing (106).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. adō means to sing; to produce all kinds of vocal sounds (e.g., the hoot of the owl or the croaking of a frog); to produce the sound of a plucked string or any other similar sound; to celebrate, praise, or honor in the cult. (b) The noun ōdē occurs in Gk. tragedy with these meanings: a song of mourning or lamentation, a song of joy or praise, poetry in general, and singing in general (whether of humans or birds).

2. (a) In the LXX the vb. occurs 66x, rendering chiefly the Heb. šîr, sing (e.g., Exod. 15:1, 21; Num. 21:17; Jdg. 5:1, 3). The noun ōdē occurs 87x, mainly for šîr and šîrâ (e.g., Exod. 15:1; Deut. 31:19, 21–22, 30; 32:44). Except for Deut. 31:30, where ōdē is spoken, singing is always indicated. Sometimes musical accompaniment is mentioned (e.g., 1 Chr. 16:42), and sometimes both music and dancing (2 Sam. 6:5). adō can also be used in parallel with other words for singing and rejoicing (e.g., 1 Chr. 16:9; Ps. 98:4).

(b) Often the joyous nature of an ōdē is stressed. The new song was a song for festive occasions. But Amos 8:10 gives a dire warning to those who self-confidently await the day of Yahweh: "I will turn your religious feasts into mourning and all your singing into weeping." In 1 Chr. 25 the Chronicler writes of the role of the temple singers and music in the cult.

(c) Music is mentioned in various connections in the OT: at a family gathering (Gen. 31:27), the acclamation of heroes (Jdg. 11:34; 1 Sam. 18:6), the king's enthronement and martial occasions (Jdg. 7:18–22; 2 Ki. 11:14; 2 Chr. 13:14; 20:28), harem and court music (2 Sam. 19:35; Eccl. 2:8), feasts (Isa. 5:12; 24:8–9), dirges and laments (2 Sam. 1:17–18; 2 Chr. 35:25), cultic occasions (Exod. 28:35; Jos. 6:4–20), and occupational songs (Num. 21:17–18; Jdg. 9:27; Isa. 16:10).

NT 1. In the NT ōdē and adō occur only 4x in Paul's letters and 8x in Rev., with both noun and vb. together in Rev. (cf. Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16; Rev. 5:9; 14:3; 15:3). Rev. 5:9 suggests that it is always a song that is sung. In this book, the entire creation—in heaven, on earth, and below the earth—acknowledges, as of right, the lordship of the Lamb in their eschatological paean of praise. The "song of Moses" in 15:3 transposes the song of Moses in Exod. 15:1 and includes words from Ps. 145:7, giving them a Christological significance. As Moses once sang God's praises after crossing the Red Sea, so those who have gained freedom through the Lamb sing of God's saving deeds.

2. (a) Songs clearly formed a central part of early Christian liturgy, just as they had the worship of the OT community and of the temple. Paul twice alludes to songs in his discussion of the spiritual activity of believers. Rather than being drunk with wine, Christians are urged to "be filled with the Spirit. Speak to one another with psalms, hymns and spiritual songs [ōdē]. Sing [adō] and make music [psallō] in your heart to the Lord, always giving thanks to God the Father for everything, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. 5:18–20). These songs would no doubt include OT psalms that the NT writers often freely quote, but Christian hymns as well.

(b) Rev. 5:9–10, 12–13; 12:10–12; 19:1–2, 6–8 are among the oldest of Christian songs. Perhaps the earliest Christian hymn is contained in Phil. 2:6–11, which Paul cites in support of his plea to the Philippians to have the mind of Christ. This may have been a pre-Pauline hymn or something that Paul composed himself and that was also known to his readers. Other possible Christological hymns are the Prologue of Jn.; Eph. 2:14–18; Col. 1:15–20; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 1:3; and 1 Pet. 3:18–22.

(c) Lk.'s account of the birth and infancy narratives contains psalms like the Magnificat, expressing Mary's praise for God's saving mercies (Lk. 1:46–55); the Benedictus, Zechariah's thanksgiving for his son, the future John the Baptist (1:68–79); and the Nunc Dimittis, Simeon's psalm on seeing the infant Jesus in the temple (2:29–32). These psalms are all couched in terms of Yahweh's saving acts against the background of OT expectation.

(d) Elsewhere music is mentioned in the NT in various connections: dirges (Matt. 9:23), prophetic passages (24:31; 1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Thess. 4:16; Heb. 12:19), the music of merrymaking at the return of the lost son (Lk. 15:25), and in a fig. sense (Matt. 6:2; 11:17; Lk. 7:32; 1 Cor. 13:1; 14:7–8).

(e) Singing is an expression of Christian joy; it is at the same time an edifying expression of the Spirit-filled life. Note Col. 3:16: "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly as you teach and admonish one another with all wisdom, and as you sing psalms [psalmos], hymns [hymnos] and spiritual songs [ōdē] with gratitude in your hearts to God." Although it may be impossible to differentiate exactly between the three terms used here, taken together they express the full range of singing prompted by the Spirit. Psalms probably designates the OT psalms (→ psalmos, 6011), hymns were festive songs of praise (→ hymnos, 5631), and spiritual songs were songs in which God's acts were praised and glorified.

3. Liturgy, including liturgical singing, involved the entire congregation of the early church. Songs edified those present by building them into a community in Christ. It is interesting to note that the first attacks that the Roman state directed against the church were not so much against holding particular Christian beliefs but against liturgy, that is, against how those beliefs were expressed in the worship of the church. Next to the preaching of the Word and participation in the sacrament, the heart of worship was spiritual singing, a festive recognition of God in Jesus Christ as the Lord of the church and of the world. In this context, the use of psallō in parallel to exomologeō, confess, in Rom. 15:9 is esp. important: Even singing psalms is a confession of faith before God.

ὠδίνω (ōdinō), to travail as in giving birth (6048); ὠδίν (ōdin), pain of labor (6047).

CL & OT 1. The cl. authors used ōdinō to describe labor pains, esp. of women but also of animals. The word claimed a wide fig. usage for great anguish, hard physical work, emotional or mental strain, or ardent frustrated longing. The noun ōdin constitutes a late literary form of the cl. Gk. word ōdis and occurs mainly in the LXX and the NT; its meanings are similar to the vb.

2. In the LXX ōdinō occurs esp. in Isa. (e.g., 23:4; 45:10; 51:2) to describe the pangs of childbirth, usually used in a fig. sense. ōdin occurs frequently in the LXX (e.g., 13:8; 37:3; Jer. 6:24), sometimes describing the agonies of death (e.g., 1 Ki. 22:6; Ps. 18:4), but often used in the context of childbirth. While it is sometimes used fig., the lit. interpretation was strongly represented.

NT ōdinō occurs 3x in the NT. It is used lit. at Gal. 4:27 (citing Isa. 54:1) and Rev. 12:2. The only fig. sense is found in Gal. 4:19, where Paul speaks of giving birth to the believers in Galatia. ōdin occurs in 1 Thess. 5:3, where the inevitable fact of labor in a pregnant woman is used fig. of the inescapable prospect of Christ's return. What is stressed is the suddenness of its coming. As a metaphor of intense suffering, ōdin occurs in Matt. 24:8; Mk. 13:8. In Acts 2:24 labors pains are associated with the agony of death, reflecting the phraseology of Ps. 18:5–6 ("cords [ōdin] of . . . death"). The thought that the Messiah could remain in the grip of death is inconceivable.

See also basanos, torture, torment (992); mastigoō, whip, flog, scourge, chastise (3463); talaipōreō, experience distress, endure hard labor (5415).

ὥρα (hōra), hour, time, point of time (6052); ὡραῖος (hōraios), at the right time, seasonable, ripe, hence beautiful, fair, pleasant (6053).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the noun hōra denotes a particular division of time, esp. an hour. But it can also mean year, day, and moment, or even designate a season (e.g., spring or summer) or a stage of life (e.g., youth). In Homer and other poets hōra marks the customarily appropriate time for certain activities, e.g., the evening meal, going to sleep, or sexual enjoyment. There is also the personification of the Horae, the goddesses of the seasons, who guard the gates of Olympus. Contemplation of nature and specifically of spring can arouse one's consciousness of transience and direct one's thoughts to "the last hour." In contrast to this, there is the summons to act in conformity with one's age and so to make use of the given "hour."

(b) The related adj. hōraios means appropriate to the season, at the right time. In connection with the timely occurrence of happy events, hōraios can take on the meaning of agreeable, lovely, and beautifully formed.

2. hōra occurs some 50x in the LXX, chiefly for the noun ʿēt, time. (a) It serves initially to indicate a somewhat indeterminate period of time (similar to hēmera, day, e.g., Dan. 12:13). Even where hōra is accompanied by an ordinal number, it can scarcely be an hour of sixty minutes that is in question. Dividing day and night into hours was unknown in ancient times, so only general expressions were used, such as morning, midday, and evening (e.g., Gen. 3:8; 18:1; 1 Sam. 11:11). A sundial is mentioned for the first time in 2 Ki. 20:9–11 (par. Isa. 38:8). In Exod. 18:22, 26, "at all times" (lit., "at every hour") simply means at any time.

(b) More frequently than periods of time hōra denotes a more or less restricted point of time. The prep. phrase en autē tē hōra (lit., "in that hour") has the meaning of immediately, on the spot (e.g., Dan. 5:5). Similarly, this formula can express temporal connection (Est. 8:1) or action following without delay (9:2). Various formulas express details of time: e.g., "at this time [hōrā] tomorrow" (Exod. 9:18; 10:4) and "about this time [hōra] next year " (Gen. 18:10). In Rom. 9:9, where this last passage is quoted, hōra is replaced by the materially synonymous kairos (→ 2789).

(c) Characteristic for the OT understanding of time and thus for the use of hōra is faith in God as the creator and Lord of time in all its dimensions. It is Yahweh who sees to it in nature that everything takes place at its appointed hour: e.g., rain comes at the proper season (Deut. 11:14; Job 36:28; Zech. 10:1), and grain is ripe for harvest (Job 5:26). God is Lord of the hour of birth (cf. Gen. 18:10, 14; 2 Ki. 4:16–17) and of death (cf. 2 Sam. 24:15; Job 5:26). The praise of the divine apportionment of time for natural processes sounds out in various passages (e.g., Sir. 39:33–34).

(d) Esp. important for the Israelites are God's mighty acts in history, such as when he strikes the enemies of his people at some particular hour (Exod. 9:18; 10:4; Jos. 11:6) or when he suddenly strikes terror into Belshazzar with the mysterious writing on the wall (Dan. 5:5). God's word is fulfilled punctually at the predetermined hour (cf. Gen. 21:1–2 with Gen. 18:10, 14). The remembrance of God's saving activity in history is to be kept alive at fixed festal hours in the cult (Exod. 13:10). The children of Israel are thus to keep the Passover "at the appointed time [hōra]" (Num. 9:2). The chronological concept of hours, which played a large role in Christian liturgy, is approached most closely by the mention of "the time of the evening sacrifice" (Dan. 9:21). But in the OT as a whole, the temporal sense of hōra recedes behind that fullness of content that is effected by Yahweh or related to God in the cult.

3. hōra, like other temporal concepts, acquired a strong eschatological and apocalyptic stress in later Jewish writings. Like the "day of the Lord," phrases such the hōra kairou, "hour of time" (Dan. 8:17, 19, LXX), refers to the events of the last days when God will come with accompanying cosmic phenomena in order to punish the godless in the judgment and to lead the righteous to everlasting salvation. Thus Sir. urges: "Before judgment comes, examine yourself; and at the time [hōra] of scrutiny you will find forgiveness" (18:20, NRSV). For the individual's hour of death there is the promise of God's blessing and hope (11:22).

NT 1. By comparison with the LXX hōra is used twice as often in the NT (106x). hōraios occurs only 4x. (a) Linked with ordinal numbers hōra serves to fix events chronologically in the course of the day (e.g., Matt. 20:3, 5–6, 9; Jn. 1:39; 4:6; Acts 2:15). This is esp. true of particular points of time within the Passion narrative of Jesus (e.g., Matt. 27:45; Mk. 15:25, 33–34; Jn. 19:14) and in connection with Jewish times of prayer (Acts 3:1; 10:3, 9, 30). Alongside precise indications of time of this sort, hōra can also be used in accord with the ancient division of the day for more imprecise designations (e.g., lit., "at a late hour [of the evening]" in Matt. 14:15; Mk. 6:35). More generally still, hōra is used in phrases like "to this very hour" (1 Cor. 4:11), "at that very hour" (Matt. 8:13), or "from that moment" (9:22) to place an event in relationship to something before, simultaneous, or after.

The allusions to the point in time of the Parousia are similarly generalizing (cf. Matt. 24:36; 25:13; Mk. 13:32). Esp. vivid is the contraction of time (with the word hōra) to a single moment, embedded within greater periods of time, in the apocalyptic vision of Rev. 9:15: "And the four angels who had been kept ready for this very hour and day and month and year were released to kill a third of mankind."

(b) So far we have been dealing with more or less exact indications of time that are given by the word hōra, partly in the sense of kairos (→ 2789). In another group of passages the word serves to describe limited time spans. Analogously with temporal concepts such as year, month, and day, hōra can means the length of time of a measurable hour. "Are there not twelve hours of daylight?" (Jn. 11:9). The last of the laborers to be hired worked only one hour (Matt. 20:3, 5, 9, 12). The disciples could not stay awake "one hour" (26:40). In general, an hour is felt to be relatively short. This is also shown in places where the thought is obviously not simply of a space of time sixty minutes in length (e.g., Jn. 5:35; 1 Thess. 2:17; Phlm. 15). Now and then in connection with hōra longer periods of time can be in mind (e.g., 1 Cor. 15:30).

2. (a) Like other biblical temporal concepts, hōra acquires its decisive importance from its content, from the event that has been, is being, or will be enacted at a particular hour. Granted, it is by no means irrelevant to the authors of the NT when something takes place, but even more significant for them is what invests the particular unit of time with its essential quality. This is already the case in the general human context. In a woman's life it is the sudden change from pain to joy that gives its own value to the hour in which she gives birth to a child (Jn. 16:21).

(b) More far-reaching in their force of statement are the individual hours within Jesus' lifetime. Again and again the Gospel writers point to particular periods of time in which things happen to or through Jesus that reveal his incomparable majesty and authority. There is, for instance, the hour in which Jesus legitimates himself for the benefit of the doubting John the Baptist by means of healing miracles (Lk. 7:21–23; cf. Matt. 8:13; 9:22; 15:28; 17:18).

It is esp. Jn. who stresses over and over again that such miraculous signs are not intended to serve Jesus' self-glorification but to point to God the Father. For the glory of God to shine out, Jesus must wait for the right hour, the kairos. This is true of his miraculous actions (cf. Jn. 2:4) as it is of his suffering (cf. 7:30; 8:20; 13:1). Thus when the "hour" (hōra) of Jesus' arrest, death, and return to the Father is impending (e.g., 12:23, 27; 13:1), Jesus uses the remaining time for table fellowship with his disciples in order to express his love in the symbolic action of the foot-washing and the farewell discourse.

3. (a) In addition to the general temporal and Christological passages, eschatological conceptions of time play an important role in the NT. From the Gospels to Rev. what becomes apparent, alongside belief in the hour that is filled with meaning by Christ, is the expectation of a still-awaited "last hour," which, after eschatological terrors (cf. Jn. 16:2, 32; Rev. 3:10), will run into the final hour of judgment (14:7; cf. Jn. 5:24–30). No one, not even Jesus, can provide an exact indication of "that day and hour" (Mk. 13:32), for it will break in suddenly like a thief (Lk. 12:39–40, 46; Rev. 3:3). But for this very reason one must stay awake, be ready (Rom. 13:11), and be careful to increase one's vigilance for the "signs of the times" (Matt. 16:3; cf. Lk. 12:56).

(b) Jn. can even say that the "last hour" has come (1 Jn. 2:18). When it became clear that the Parousia was being delayed, there still remained the task of handling every particular present hour correctly, grasping it as time given by God and realizing the possibilities that lay within it. This was the case both in the ethical responsibility of everyday life (cf. Rom. 13:11–14) and in the testing of times of persecution, for which Jesus prepared his disciples (Jn. 16:1–4). To those who will answer for their faith in court Jesus promised the assistance of his Spirit (Matt. 10:19), so that even the hour of their trial can serve to glorify God.

ὡσαννά (hōsanna), hosanna (6057).

OT This Greek word is a transliteration from Aram. hôša' nā' (Heb., hôšî'â nā'), meaning "O, save." The Heb. expression is found in Ps. 118:25, which the LXX translated as sōson (save [us]). Ps. 118 is most likely a liturgy for the Feast of Tabernacles. "Blessed is he who comes" (118:26) is likely the Davidic king, in his role as the Melchizedek priest, leading his people in procession to Yahweh's house. In this context "O, save" suggests an imploring cry to Yahweh to bring to reality that which the liturgy has depicted. Later Jewish thought applied this great cry to the expectation of the messianic king.

NT By NT times Hosanna had become a full "cultic cry." The Gk. of Matt. 21:9; Mk. 11:9; Jn. 12:13 transliterates but does not translate. The sight of Jesus fulfilling the kingly prophecy of Zech. 9:9, coupled with the strewing and waving of branches reminiscent of the ceremonial fronds that characterized the Feast of Tabernacles, prompted the shout appropriate to that occasion; unwittingly, the people greeted the true David, the true King of Israel, with the Davidic welcome.

CL & OT In cl. Gk. the words in this group describe that which is helpful, serviceable, valuable, or beneficial to people. This meaning is continued in the LXX. For example, a messenger bringing good news "refreshes" those who have sent him (Prov. 25:13). In many cases, however, the OT writers tells us what is not useful. For example, wealth is of no benefit in a time of danger or disaster (11:4). According to Isa. 30:5, forming an alliance against God's will with an evil nation is "useless" to God's people and will bring them no "advantage." Isa. points out that esp. idols are "worthless" (44:9; 57:12).

NT 1. Some uses of this word group in the NT are on a human level. The woman with the twelve-year flow of blood had spent much money on doctors but to no avail (Mk. 5:26). Pilate saw that his attempt to release Jesus "was getting nowhere" (Matt. 27:24). Paul emphasizes to Timothy that physical training has only limited "value" (1 Tim. 4:8).

2. As in the LXX, many occurrences of this word group tell us what is not beneficial or advantageous to us. Circumcision, for example, has no intrinsic value (Rom. 2:25; cf. 3:1), and for those who seek it "Christ will be of no value" (Gal. 5:2). Nor does eating ceremonial foods have any ultimate spiritual value (Heb. 13:9). If we do amazing works supposedly for the Lord but do not have Christian love in our hearts, we "gain nothing" (1 Cor. 13:3). With regard to gaining life, the flesh "counts for nothing" (Jn. 6:63), and it will do us no "good" to gain the whole world if in the process we forfeit the soul (Matt. 16:26; Mk. 8:36; Lk. 9:25).

3. So, then, what does have value? Obviously, love for Christ and his people does. So does combining the message of the gospel with faith (Heb. 4:2) and with God's grace (13:9). Note also that "godliness has value for all things" (1 Tim. 4:8), as does devoting ourselves to "doing what is good" (Tit. 3:8). Finally, Paul stresses that "all Scripture is God-breathed and is useful [ōphelimos] for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work" (2 Tim. 3:16–17).

Subject Index

This subject index is not a complete subject index to every occurrence of particular English words and concepts in this NIV Theological Dictionary of New Testament Words. Rather, it is an index to the definitions of Greek words, where major discussions of a wide variety of concepts occur. For example, if you wanted to make a study of "love" in the New Testament, this index directs you to the discussions of the Greek word agapaō (and related words) on pp. 25ff., of philadelphia (and related words) on pp. 48ff., of splanchnon on pp. 1185ff., and of phileō (and related words) on pp. 1305ff. You should read each of these entries in its entirety. This index does not, however, show every place where God's love for us, our love for God, or love in the Christian community is briefly mentioned or alluded to. Only the first page of the defined Greek word is given.
