The parallels with Ps. 22 may, however, be pursued even further. Some scholars cite parallels in Christian writings in which the quotation of a single text of Scripture implied that the entire section was to be kept in view. In Ps. 22 the psalmist survives his immediate desolation and ends up praising God in the congregation (22:22). All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the Lord (22:27). Dominion belongs to the Lord, and he rules over the nations (22:28). Posterity will serve him and proclaim his deliverance to a people yet unborn (22:30–31). If the earlier part of Ps. 22 may be seen as being fulfilled in Jesus' death, the latter may be said to find fulfillment in the revelation of the risen Christ and his commission to his followers to evangelize (Matt. 28:16–20).

6. God and the church. (a) The community of believers is called the "church of God" (Acts 20:28; 1 Cor. 1:2; 10:32; 15:9; 2 Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:13; 1 Thess. 2:14; 1 Tim. 3:15; → ekklēsia, 1711). It consists of those who are chosen by God and called to be saints (Rom. 1:7) and who have received all the gifts of salvation and grace. They have peace with God (Rom. 5:1), for they have been reconciled through Christ (2 Cor. 5:18). As the beginning of God's new creation (5:17), they are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works (Eph. 2:10). God works in them both to will and to accomplish (Phil. 2:13) and gives them assurance of the completion of their salvation (Rom. 5:2, Phil. 3:21). At Christ's return he will give life to their mortal bodies (Rom. 8:11) and a share in his glory and in eternal life.

(b) The church is the temple of God (1 Cor. 3:16; 2 Cor. 6:16; Eph. 2:21), God's holy building into which all believers are placed as living stones (1 Pet. 2:4–5), the dwelling of God in the Spirit. Christians are members of God's household (Eph. 2:19, 21); they form his new people (1 Pet. 2:9), the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:27). In him believers have a share in the fullness of the being of God and Christ (Eph. 1:23; Col. 2:10). The community stands under God's protection. It is hidden in him, for God is on its side (Rom. 8:31). Thus no power is capable of separating it from God's love (8:38–39).

Paul emphasizes strongly that the church of God consists of Jews and Gentiles. This is because Christ has reconciled Jews and Gentiles to God into one body through the cross (Eph. 1:22–23; 2:11–16). Whoever receives the word of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:19) and believes in Christ has free access to the Father (Eph. 2:18). In God's people of the new covenant racial and national differences are removed.

7. The Trinity. The NT does not contain the word trinity (a word coined by Tertullian) or homoousios (a word used in the Nicene Creed to denote that Christ was of the same substance as the Father). But the NT does contain a fixed, three-part formula in which "God," "the Lord Jesus Christ," and "the Holy Spirit" are mentioned together (2 Cor. 13:14; cf. 1 Cor. 12:4–6). The Father, Son, and Holy Spirit appear together as one "name" in the baptismal formula in Matt. 28:19. Note too the triadic form of "one God and Father," "one Lord," and "one Spirit" in Eph. 4:4–6. In Gal. 4:4–6 God first sends the Son and then the Spirit of his Son to continue the work of Jesus on earth.

Regarding two-part formulae, God and Christ are closely connected in 1 Cor. 8:6 as "one God, the Father ... [and] one Lord, Jesus Christ," as well as in 1 Tim. 2:5 as "one God and one mediator between God and men." In this connection Matt. 23:8–10 should also be mentioned, where Jesus draws the disciples' attention to the fact that they have "one Master" (himself) and "one Father ... in heaven." In such statements two facts—that God and Christ belong together but that they are distinct—are equally stressed.

A close relationship also exists between Christ and the Holy Spirit. Thus Paul can say outright that "the Lord is the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3:17). In Jn.'s Gospel the Holy Spirit, while having a certain independence, is bound to the exalted Christ (Jn. 16:14). Christ and the Holy Spirit are in an interchangeable relationship.

Finally on two-part formulae, in Acts 5:3–4 Peter clearly states that lying to the Holy Spirit and lying to God are one and the same.

8. Pagan deities. It is unlikely that the average Gk. and Roman took the old gods and goddesses seriously, but tradition and superstition led people to altars, shrines, and images. The multiplicity of altars at Athens moved Paul to describe the Athenians as deisidaimonesterous (Acts 17:22), a word that could mean superstitious but that Paul intended in a more positive sense, "very religious." But note also that in 1 Cor. 10:20 Paul equated pagan deities with demons.

The following Gk. deities are named in the NT. (i) Zeus and Hermes. At Lystra, after an outstanding miracle of healing, Barnabas and Paul were treated as heavenly visitants, the dignified Barnabas as Zeus, and Paul, the talker, as Hermes (Acts 14:8–18). (ii) Ares. At Athens Paul was taken to the Areopagus, or Hill of Ares, where speakers were allowed to hold forth and where the Athenian Council met (17:19). (iii) Artemis. Her temple at Ephesus was one of the wonders of the ancient world, and Paul's successful preaching roused the makers of silver-shrine souvenirs (19:21–41). (iv) Hades. In cl. Gk. this god's name came to stand for his kingdom of the underworld; in the NT this word is used of the place where the dead go (→ hadēs, 87).

Three Canaanite gods appear in quotations from the OT: Baal (Rom. 11:4; cf. 1 Ki. 19:18), and Molech and Rephan (Acts 7:43; cf. Amos 5:26, NIV note).

9. theios occurs 3x in the NT. With the art., to theion means "the divine being" in Acts 17:29. As an adj., it means divine and is used with power and nature in 2 Pet. 1:3–4. theiotēs means "divine nature" (Rom. 1:20): "God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly ... understood from what has been made."

theotēs, deity, divinity (Col. 2:9), is used as an abstract noun for theos in connection with the incarnation: "For in Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form."

See also Emmanouēl, Immanuel (1842); kyrios, Lord (3261).

2537 (theosebeia, fear of God, reverence for God, devoutness), → 4936.

2538 (theosebēs, devout, God-fearing), → 4936.

2540 (theotēs, deity, divinity), → 2536.

2542 (therapeia, service, treatment), → 2543.

2543 θεραπεύω

θεραπεύω (therapeuō), heal, cure (2543); θεράπων (therapōn), servant (2544); θεραπεία (therapeia), service, treatment (2542).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. therapeuō means to serve, to be in service to (a superior); thus also to serve in the sense of venerating the gods, to care for (e.g., as a doctor), whence finally to cure, usually by medical means.

2. The LXX frequently uses therapōn to mean attendant, servant. The use of the vb. seems imprecise, even haphazard. In addition to the meaning serve, it can mean to sit (Est. 2:19; 6:10), to appease (Prov. 19:6), and to seek (29:26).

NT therapeuō occurs 43x in the NT, almost all of which appear in the Synoptics and Acts. Except for Acts 17:25, the vb. means exclusively to heal. Thus, in the NT therapeuō never has the meaning to serve (though cf. therapeia in Lk. 12:42, "servants" and therapōn in Heb. 3:5, "servant"). The cultic usage for the worship of God is found only in Acts 17:25, where Paul concludes, based on God as the Creator of the world and the Lord of heaven and earth, that he does not dwell in temples made by humans and that no one can give him anything. Nevertheless, he still accepts service from human beings.

1. Only in Lk. 4:23 (in the proverb "Physician, heal yourself") and in 8:43 ("no one could heal" the woman with the flow of blood) does therapeuō denote healing by ordinary medical means. Otherwise the vb. describes the miraculous healings of Jesus and his disciples.

(a) The Gospels present Jesus' work in terms of teaching and miracles (Matt. 4:23–24; 9:35; Lk. 6:18). Healing plays an essential part in his miraculous work, but it must be seen in the context of his teaching if it is to be understood correctly. This is esp. clear in Matt., where the great collection of Jesus' teaching (Matt. 5–7) and of his miracles (chs. 8–9) are enclosed between two almost identical verses, 4:23 and 9:35 (Jesus taught "in their synagogues, preaching the good news of the kingdom, and healing [therapeuō] every disease and sickness"). This emphasizes Christ's twofold task of teaching and healing.

As Jesus repeatedly heals the sick (e.g., Matt. 4:24; 12:15; 14:14; 15:30), he is fulfilling OT prophecies (8:16–17; cf. Isa. 53:4). The healings do not prove Jesus to be the Christ, but viewed against their OT background, they form part of his act of obedience and thus a necessary element in his messianic work. This conviction lies behind the many summaries (e.g., Matt. 4:24; Mk. 1:34; 3:10) of his miracles that emphasize that all who turn to Jesus find healing. This is why he has power to heal on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:10; Mk. 3:2; Lk. 6:7; 13:14). In taking up the cause of the helpless, Jesus proves himself to be the Servant of God (Matt. 8:7; 19:2).

(b) In Mk. 6:5–6 there is the remarkable statement that in Nazareth Jesus "could not do any miracles." It is clear from most of the detailed accounts of healing that faith on the part of those concerned was already present before they were healed by Jesus

(cf. Matt. 8:8–10, 13; 9:27–30; 15:21–28; Lk. 8:43–48). Thus, after the disciples' failure to heal the lunatic boy (Matt. 17:16), the father confidently turned to Jesus for help, and his faith was vindicated, for the lad was healed (17:18). Healing is faith's reward, because faith is confident that even when people have done their utmost and failed, the power of God in Christ is inexhaustible. Thus healing does not initiate faith but assumes it (cf. Mk. 6:5–6). It is not that faith is the power that effects the miracle; it is rather preparedness for the miracle. At the same time, however, we may never tie faith so closely to miracles that it is an absolute requirement. Note, for example, the healing of the servant of the high priest's ear in the Garden of Gethsemane (Lk. 22:51). The root cause of healing lies in the heart of the healer, Jesus.

(c) Christ healed not only bodily infirmities but also cast out demons (e.g., Matt. 8:16; Mk. 1:34; 3:10–11; Lk. 4:40–41), revealing his messianic claims. Satanic powers are subject to his power and word, and by exercising power over the demons, he was utterly different from the ordinary exorcists of his time. In these miracles we glimpse the splendor of Christ the King.

(d) Jesus also gave his disciples a share in his healing power (Matt. 10:1, 8; Mk. 6:13; Lk. 9:1, 6). They entered into his work not only in the sense of teaching his doctrine, but in the sense of being empowered for the same messianic works he himself performed. For this, implicit faith is required (Matt. 17:16–21), the faith by which the early church experienced the enabling Christ in its midst (cf. Acts 5:16; 8:7). In the healings performed by the disciples the church was given a token of the active presence of its exalted Lord.

2. In sum, the NT stories of healing are not told in order to "prove" the messiahship of Jesus by demonstrating his power over natural laws. The real miracle is his victory over forces struggling for mastery over this cosmos. Although the healing miracles, in common with all the miracles in the Gospels, are repeatedly given prominence as outworkings of the Lord's power (cf. Matt. 14:14; 19:2), they are not regarded as having any importance in their own right.

See also iaomai, cure, restore (2615); hygiēs, healthy, well (5618).

2544 (therapōn, servant), → 2543.

2545 (therizō, reap, harvest), → 2546.

2546 θερισμός

θερισμός (therismos), harvest (2546); θερίζω (therizō), reap, harvest (2545); θεριστής (theristēs), reaper, harvester (2547).

CL & OT 1. This word group in cl. Gk. is commonly used in the lit. sense of reaping or gathering food crops. It is also used metaphorically, frequently in proverbs that highlight the inevitable moral consequences of prior actions. therizō also occurs in the extended sense of cutting off or destroying human adversaries.

2. In the LXX therismos means either the process of harvesting a crop (Exod. 34:22) or the produce reaped (Isa. 16:9). therizō is commonly used in the extended sense of reaping the fruit of a prior deed, either good (Job 5:26) or evil (4:8), or of gaining a reward through persistent effort (Ps. 126:5).

The harvest theme is symbolically used in the OT of a time of divine appointment in general (Jer. 8:20) or of temporal judgments in particular: e.g., on Ethiopia (Isa. 18:4–5), Babylon (Jer. 51:33 = LXX 28:33), Judah (Hos. 6:11), and Israel (Isa. 17:5). The richly descriptive harvest imagery portrays judgmental acts of God in justice and vengeance. A people ripened by sin are compared to a harvest prepared for the sickle of divine retribution. First cut down, then bound in bundles, threshed, and winnowed, the grain is gathered in the storehouse while the chaff is consumed by fire. A few OT prophets looked beyond the temporal horizon of divine judgment to the general harvest that would consummate this present age. Joel 3:13 foresees the ingathering of the end-time harvest of the nations. Isa. 27:12 expands the imagery so that the divine threshing process will separate Israel (grain) from the nations (chaff).

3. The figure of the world as a ripened field ready for harvest was taken up in Jewish apocalyptic lit. The end of this present evil age, which is to be consummated in a holocaust of judgment, is like a harvest in which good and evil fruit is reaped. The ethical maxims of Philo make frequent use of the sowing-reaping motif.

NT 1. The primary meaning of therismos (13x in the NT) is the process or time of gathering ripened crops, particularly grain (Matt. 13:30; Mk. 4:29; Jn. 4:35). therizō (21x; e.g., Matt. 6:26; Jas. 5:4) is used of reaping a cultivated crop and, in the case of grain, of threshing, winnowing, and storing the produce. theristēs, the agent who harvests a crop, is used only in Matt. 13:30, 39.

2. The notion of harvesting a ripened crop provided Jesus and the NT writers with a powerful image for explaining various facets of the divine economy. (a) The therismos group occurs in the Synoptics in the sense of the increase of one's labor generally. In the parable of the talents (Matt. 25:24, 26) and pounds (Lk. 19:21–22), the master and the nobleman, respectively, are accused of unjustly appropriating the fruit (→ karpos, 2843) of others' work.

(b) Jesus developed the basic harvest imagery into the notion of the potential fruit of the Christian mission. Predisposed by God for reception of the gospel, humans are likened to a crop of fully ripened grain ready for harvest (Matt. 9:37–38; Lk. 10:2). With a note of urgency Jesus, "the Lord of the harvest," enjoins his followers, the reapers, to gather the ripened harvest before it perishes in the field. Jn. acknowledges that in the work of the kingdom the spiritual harvester reaps the labors of faithful planters who went before (Jn. 4:36–38). Both sower and reaper may anticipate due rewards for faithful performance of their appointed tasks.

(c) The harvest imagery also depicts the judgmental aspects of the kingdom, i.e., the preservation of the righteous and the punishment of evildoers. Using the figure of winnowing grain John the Baptist affirms of Jesus: "His winnowing fork is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor, gathering his wheat into the barn and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire" (Matt. 3:12).

(d) Jesus used the harvest imagery to emphasize the eschatological aspects of the divine judgment. In the parable of the seed growing secretly (Mk. 4:29), the decisive event in the life of the kingdom is the reaping of a spiritual harvest with sharpened sickle. Jesus uses therismos as a symbol of the final separation between the righteous (the wheat) and the wicked (the weeds) in the parable of the weeds (Matt. 13:24–30); the granary is the Father's eternal kingdom. The vision of the Son of Man (cf. Mk. 13:26–27; Rev. 1:13) reaping earth's ripened harvest in judgment with his angels (14:15–16) recapitulates the teaching of the OT and Jesus on the subject.

See also sperma, seed (5065); karpos, fruit (2843).

2547 (theristēs, reaper, harvester), → 2546.

2548 (thermainō, warm), → 6037.

2549 (thermē, heat), → 6037.

2555 (theōreō, watch), → 3972.

2559 (thēlys, female), → 781.

2563 θηρίον

θηρίον (thērion), wild animal, beast (2563).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. thērion usually means a wild animal, occasionally an animal kept at pasture. From Plato on it came to be used metaphorically as a derogatory term for people of a "bestial" type: beast, monster.

In the LXX thērion designated a wild animal. The thērion is an enemy of humans (Gen. 3:14–15; 9:2, 5; 37:20). In warnings of God's judgment the ravages of wild beasts are listed along with other troubles (Lev. 26:22; Deut. 32:24; Jer. 12:9; 15:3). The devouring of human corpses by beasts is regarded as the height of shame (2 Sam. 21:10; cf. Gen. 40:19). In the days to come full harmony between humanity and beast, which existed in Paradise, will be restored (Lev. 26:6; Isa. 35:9; Ezek. 34:25; Hos. 2:20 = LXX 2:18).

In Dan. 7 thērion refers to world powers, seen as supernatural, beast-like figures. They arise from the chaos that is hostile to God (water) and represent the sort of political powers with which the Jewish people had to deal throughout the centuries. The coming of the Son of Man will put an end to them.

NT 1. thērion (45x in the NT) occurs in lists of living creatures (Acts 11:6; Jas. 3:7), in a catalogue of plagues (Rev. 6:8), and as a description of the Cretans (Tit. 1:12). In Mk. 1:13 the wild beasts emphasize the horror and human desolation of the desert; possibly they are also intended as an allusion to the messianic return of the Paradise era, with its state of peace between humankind and beast.

2. This word appears 38x in Rev., particularly in chs. 13–19. The beast and the false prophet, representing powers opposed to God, join the dragon to form the satanic trinity (16:13). From their mouths issue three foul demonic spirits like frogs, who gather the world rulers at Armageddon for battle. The beast in 11:7 combines characteristics of all four beasts in Dan. 7, dreadfully intensified. It originates in the realm of chaos (11:7; 13:1), is given authority by the "dragon" (13:2, 4), has the attributes of beasts of prey (11:7), and executes its claims to total power with ruthless force (13:7–8, 15).

As the Antichrist the beastly monster caricatures the Lamb (with its wound, 13:3, 14 [cf. 5:6]; its horns, 13:1 [cf. 5:6]; world dominion, 13:2 [cf. 5:5]; and worship, 13:4 [cf. 5:8–14]). It also apes the title of God (17:8, 11; cf. 1:4). "Another" beast (13:11), otherwise called "the false prophet" (16:13; 19:20; 20:10), furthers the plans of the first beast by its propaganda of working miracles (13:13), erecting an image (eikōn, 13:14), and branding people with a mark (charagma, 13:16–17). Although to outward appearances a lamb, it speaks like a dragon (13:11; cf. Matt. 7:15). The final victory over these beastly powers will belong to Christ and his church (Rev. 15:2; 19:19–20).

2564 (thēsaurizō, store up, gather, save up, reserve), → 2565.

2565 θησαυρός

θησαυρός (thēsauros), treasure box, chest, storeroom, treasure (2565); θησαυρίζω (thēsaurizō), store up, gather, save up, reserve (2564); ἀποθησαυρίζω (apothēsaurizō), lay up treasure (631).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. thēsauros means a treasure chamber, storage room, granary; also treasure. Early in recorded history temples were built with treasure chambers, where gifts and taxes in kind and money could be stored. The practice appears to have spread from Egypt to Greece. Collecting boxes were also known (cf. 2 Ki. 12:10). thēsaurizō is used similarly in the sense of storing up treasure or putting it in safekeeping.

2. Jos. 6:19, 24 (= LXX 6:18, 23) mentions the "treasury" of the Lord in connection with the holy war and the ban (cf. 1 Ki. 7:51; 14:26); in 1 Ki. 14:26 and 15:18 "the treasures of the temple of the LORD and the treasures of the royal palace" are carried off to Egypt. Later, besides the common usage of treasure (Prov. 10:2), we find reference to treasures in or from heaven (Job 38:22 ["storehouses of the snow"]; Jer. 50:25 = LXX 27:25 ["arsenal . . . weapons of his wrath"]). In Isa. 33:6, "the fear of the LORD is the key to [Zion's] treasure," which is defined as "salvation and wisdom and knowledge."

Isa. 45:3 refers to "the treasures of darkness" (i.e., treasures that are hidden away), which God will give to Cyrus so that he may have a true knowledge of Yahweh, the God of Israel. The prophet is perhaps contrasting earthly treasure for which human beings work and fight with the treasure that Yahweh alone gives. We should be as eager to search for the fear of the Lord and the knowledge of God as people do for buried treasures (Prov. 2:4–5).

3. In rab. Jud. good works (e.g., almsgiving) are a treasure stored up as a reward in the world to come, while the interest is enjoyed in this world. The rabbis sometimes spoke of the treasure from which the scribe draws and of the treasure house of eternal life, i.e., the place where the souls of the dead are stored up.

NT The NT continues both the cl. Gk. meaning of thēsauros (18x) and its usage in OT and rab. lit. The vb. thēsaurizō occurs 8x. The concept often involves the paradoxical transformation of earthly values. What is treasured by humans is of no enduring worth in God's sight, and real treasure involves earthly poverty.

1. (a) In Matt. 2:11 the "treasures" that the Magi open to the infant Jesus are gifts of gold, incense, and myrrh. In 12:35 the heart is compared with good things "stored up," out of which a good person brings forth good. The picture is either that of a storehouse or a treasure chest. As the context suggests, Jesus' words here constitute a warning against the hypocrisy of appearing to speak good, whereas in fact one intends evil.

(b) In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus tells his disciples: "Do not store up [thēsaurizō] for yourselves treasures [thēsauros] on earth, where moth and rust destroy, and where thieves break in and steal. But store up [thēsaurizō] for yourselves treasures [thēsauros] in heaven. . . . For where your treasure [thēsauros] is, there your heart will be also" (Matt. 6:19–21; cf. Lk. 12:21, 33–34). The idea of treasures in heaven is a Jewish notion. The nature of this treasure is not defined, although the following sayings warn against double-mindedness, trying to serve God and Money (→ mamōnas, 3440), and anxiety about food and clothing—culminating in the injunction: "But seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things will be given to you as well" (Matt. 6:33).

Clearly, Jesus outlines a contrast between worldly possessions and spiritual good. In view of the proximity of this section to the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:9–13) and the saying about the kingdom in 6:33, we should understand this treasure primarily in terms of the kingdom of heaven (cf. 13:44). On a human side this is understood in terms of doing God's will; on God's side it involves God's reign and gracious provision for his children. But the treasure is not some form of accumulated spiritual capital; it is the realization of a gracious personal relationship with the Father and with one's fellow human beings in the kingdom of God. What is worth possessing is not material things that perish but personal acceptance by God and by others. In a similar vein, Paul instructs believers not to put our hope in earthly wealth but in God and to share what we have; in this way we will "lay up treasure" (apothēsaurizō) for ourselves for the coming age.

(c) The teaching about treasure is further exemplified by the story of the rich young ruler, to whom Jesus said: "If you want to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. Then come, follow me" (Matt. 19:21; cf. Mk. 10:21; Lk. 18:22). This saying makes explicit an implicit point in the background of the earlier sayings: Not only is the treasure to be seen in the light of the coming end time, it is also connected with following Jesus.

(d) Matt. 13:44 states that "the kingdom of heaven is like treasure hidden in a field. When a man found it, he hid it again, and then in his joy went and sold all he had and bought that field." Important here is both the overpowering joy that the kingdom brings and the wholehearted self-sacrifice it causes one to make. According to rab. teaching, if a worker lifted a treasure in the course of his work, the find belonged to the master. But in this parable the man does not lift it until he is the actual owner of the field, and he is prepared to go to any lengths permitted by the law to obtain it. Note also the following parable of the pearl of great price (13:45–46).

(e) The parable of the rich fool (Lk. 12:16–21) presents the converse of Jesus' positive teaching about treasure. It describes a man who did, in fact, store up earthly possessions. "But God said to him, 'You fool! This very night your life will be demanded of you. Then who will get what you have prepared for yourself?' This is how it will be with anyone who stores up [thēsaurizō] things for himself but is not rich toward God" (12:20–21). Lk. presents the parable in conjunction with Jesus' refusal to intervene in a family feud over possessions. He warns of greed, for "a man's life does not consist in the abundance of his possessions" (12:15). Lk. follows this story with Jesus' teaching on anxiety about food and clothing and on laying up treasure in heaven (cf. above).

(f) thēsauros in the sense of treasure chest occurs in Matt. 13:52 at the conclusion of Matt.'s account of seven parables. In response to the disciples' affirmation that they have understood, Jesus said: "Therefore every teacher of the law who has been instructed about the kingdom of heaven is like the owner of a house who brings out of his storeroom [thēsauros] new treasures as well as old." The contents of the treasure chest is not simply the teaching but the teaching as the occasion for appropriating the kingdom.

2. (a) Paul uses thēsaurizō in his instructions to the Corinthians about the collection for the poor believers in Jerusalem, setting aside whatever amount each one wants and storing it up until Paul arrives (1 Cor. 16:2). He uses the same word again in 2 Cor. 12:14, where he declares that "children should not have to save up [thēsaurizō] for their parents, but parents for their children." The apostle is speaking here of his forthcoming visit and his determination not to be a burden to them. Paul regards himself as their father (cf. 1 Cor. 4:15), and hence he feels under obligation to support them.

(b) In Rom. 2:5 the vb. is used fig. in addressing the Jews who by their hardened hearts "are storing up" God's wrath against themselves for the day of judgment. There is an ironic contrast here, for the Jews are presuming on "the riches [ploutos, → 4458] of [God's] kindness, tolerance, and patience" (2:4)—reflecting the Jewish conception of treasure stored up in the world to come as a reward for good works.

(c) Paul uses the noun thēsauros 2x, both with a Christological connotation. In 2 Cor. 4:7 he compares the treasure of God's gift in Christ to the believer with the bodily existence of those who receive it: "But we have this treasure in jars of clay to show that this all-surpassing power is from God and not from us." This treasure of "the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" has just been defined in a manner recalling the creation of light (2 Cor. 4:6; cf. Gen. 1:3; Ps. 112:4). The treasure is thus revealed but at the same time hidden by the vessel that contains it and the outward circumstances of the believer's life.

Col. 2:3 also speaks of treasure Christologically: "in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." As in 2 Cor. 4, the treasure is linked with revelation and knowledge (cf. Col. 2:2). But the hiddenness refers to Christ, who, although it might not appear so to earthly sight, is nevertheless "the image of the invisible God," in whom "God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell" (1:15, 19), and who is now with God (3:3). Jesus Christ is like a hidden treasure, for which a searcher should be willing to wager everything to find. Jesus is the only place where wisdom and knowledge may be found.

3. In Heb. 11:26, the author writes that Moses "regarded disgrace for the sake of Christ as of greater value than the treasures [thēsauros] of Egypt, because he was looking ahead to his reward." The main exegetical question here is the phrase "for the sake of Christ." Is the author giving a veiled reference to the belief that Jesus, long before his incarnation, accompanied the Israelites through the desert (cf. 1 Cor. 10:4)? Perhaps. But "[the] Christ" here can be translated "the anointed one" (→ Christos, 5986). OT texts such as Ps. 89:50–51; 105:15 suggest that the people of God are God's anointed. In other words, what Moses preferred to the treasures of Egypt was the lot of God's people as his anointed firstborn, for he believed God's promises to them (cf. Heb. 11:27).

Thus in this context Israel is God's son, as God through Moses reminded Pharaoh when he demanded their release: "Israel is my firstborn son" (Exod. 4:22). It was with the lot of Israel that Moses identified himself. This interpretation has the advantage of being compatible with all the other instances of faith in Heb. 11 drawn from OT history, none of which are given a specific Christological interpretation. The reproach, abuse, or stigma that was the lot of the Israelites thus anticipates the reproach that falls on those who follow Christ. The same act of faith is required to prefer suffering, in the light of God's promises, to material gain.

4. Jas. 5:3 takes up the thought about treasure expressed in the teaching of Jesus: "Your gold and silver are corroded. Their corrosion will testify against you and eat your flesh like fire. You have hoarded wealth [thēsaurizō] in the last days." This text spells out the judgment awaiting those who are preoccupied with earthly treasure. There is an irony here. For while the people concerned thought that they were storing up treasure, they were, in fact, storing up judgment (cf. Rom. 2:5).

5. In 2 Pet. 3:7 we see a further idea of storing up judgment. Pet. applies this idea to the whole world order: "By the same word the present heavens and earth are reserved [thēsaurizō] for fire, being kept for the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men." Although in general the NT refers to a judgment of fire as applying only to God's enemies (e.g., Rev. 20:14–15), Pet. speaks of a fiery destruction of the present heaven and earth. Still, the Bible is filled with varying images of judgment, the new creation, regeneration, and the new heaven and earth. Perhaps the specific image of fire is drawn from Jewish apocalyptic writings (e.g., 2 Esd. 13:10–11; Sib. Or. 2:187–213; 3:83–92; 4:171–182; 5:155–161; → pyr, fire, 4786).

See also mamōnas, money, wealth, property (3440); peripoieō, save for oneself, acquire, gain possession of (4347); ploutos, wealth, riches (4458); chrēma, property, wealth, means, money (5975).

2567 (thlibō, press upon, oppress, afflict), → 2568.

2568 θλῖψις

θλῖψις (thlipsis), oppression, affliction, tribulation (2568); θλίβω (thlibō), press upon, oppress, afflict (2567); στενοχωρία (stenochōria), straits, distress, affliction, difficulty (5103); στενοχωρέω (stenochōreō), crowd, cramp, confine, oppress (5102).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. thlibō means press, squeeze, crush. A fig. use, meaning oppress (external) and grieve, vex (internal), is common. Some Stoics referred to the pressures of life, which the true Stoic must and can overcome. The noun thlipsis, oppression, distress, affliction, is linked with the vb. It is occasionally found coupled with stenochōria, which is used to express a narrow place, hence being pressed by inner and outer difficulties.

2. In the LXX thlipsis usually denotes need, distress, and affliction, depending on context (e.g., war, exile, and personal hostility). As in cl. Gk. it is sometimes linked with stenochōria (e.g., Deut. 28:53, 55, 57; Isa. 8:22; 30:6) as well as with other words of fear and pain. thlipsis in the LXX is often the oppression that belongs of necessity to the history of Israel and that was regarded by the faithful as part of salvation history. There is a connection between oppression (Exod. 3:9) and deliverance (3:10). Even when the oppression is a punishment, its purpose is deliverance (Neh. 9:27; Hos. 5:14–6:2).

The eschatological nature of oppression is often stressed (cf. Hab. 3:16; Zech. 1:15). Dan. 12:1 speaks of "a time of distress such as has not happened from the beginning of nations" until the writer's own time. But here also deliverance from trouble is referred to, and this expresses the faith and hope of the faithful in Israel. "A righteous man may have many troubles, but the LORD delivers him from them all" (Ps. 34:19; cf. 37:39). This was the unshakeable conviction of the faithful, who were able to pray: "Though you have made me see troubles, many and bitter, you will restore my life again" (71:20).

3. Jud. also knew of the troubles of the people that it expected in the end time and described in detail in various apocalypses (1 Enoch, 2 Esd., 2 Bar.).

NT thlipsis is used 45x in the NT, thlibō 10x, always fig. (apart from Matt. 7:14—the narrow road leads to life; Mk. 3:9—the crowd crushes Jesus). stenochōria is found 4x (Rom. 2:9; 8:35; 2 Cor. 6:4; 12:10), stenochōreō 3x (2 Cor. 4:8; 6:12). The usage of these words in the NT is clearly the same as in the OT. The following cases are of importance.

1. thlipsis has an eschatological significance for the church (cf. esp. the quotation of Dan. 12:1 in Matt. 24:21 and Mk. 13:19). The tribulation stands in the closest connection with the Son of Man (Matt. 24:30) of Dan. 7:13 and the birth pangs of the Messiah (Matt. 24:8). This tribulation belongs to the period of catastrophes before the final salvation, and it is characterized by leading astray, hate, political strife, and catastrophes of nature. The same thought is to be found in Rev., not merely in 2:22 and 7:14 (cf. 3:10), where the "great tribulation" is referred to, but also in 1:9, where "suffering" is once again linked with Dan. 2:28 and 7:13.

2. A second element is expressed by the phrase "Christ's afflictions" (Col. 1:24). The OT statement about the many troubles of the righteous (Ps. 34:19) is esp. applicable to the truly righteous one, Jesus Christ (Acts 3:14–15). Jesus himself insists that he "must" suffer (e.g., Mk. 8:31; Lk. 24:26). "What is still lacking" in Col. 1:24 is not only a question of the afflictions left over for the church, but also of the afflictions that the Lord suffered in his unique suffering (1:20, 22), with which the church knows itself to be linked in its own affliction. Passages like 2 Cor. 1:5 (cf. 1:4, 6) and 4:10 (cf. 4:8) allow us to infer that the thought of such afflictions was implicit in the proclamation of the passion of Christ.

3. In the light of the two preceding concepts we can understand believers' afflictions. (a) Believers are implicitly included in the eschatological afflictions. They are exposed to tribulations (Matt. 24:9), esp. hatred, betrayal, and death. It is above all the time of leading astray (cf. 24:4–5, 11, 24), the time of testing (→ peirasmos, 4280).

(b) Col. 1:24 makes it clear that Christians experience these afflictions in solidarity with Christ's passion. Only so can they be rightly explained and endured (cf. 2 Cor. 1:4–6; 4:8–11; Phil. 3:10; 1 Pet. 4:13). Precisely for this reason tribulation and all other distress cannot separate us from Christ (Rom. 8:35). Because we suffer with him in these distresses, we will be glorified together with him (8:17; cf. 8:37).

(c) The connection of thlipsis with the eschatological and Christological tribulations, both of which are divine "necessities," makes it probable that the tribulations of Christians are also conditioned by this "must." Note Jn. 16:33: "In this world you will have trouble"; Acts 14:22: "We must go through many hardships to enter the kingdom of God." It is perhaps most clearly expressed in 1 Thess. 3:3, where Paul writes that he had sent Timothy to exhort the church "that no one would be unsettled by these trials. You know quite well that we were destined for them." Paul had expected nothing else for his own life (3:4; cf. Acts 20:23) and had experienced it in full measure in his missionary work (e.g., 2 Cor. 6:4–10; 11:16–12:10; Phil. 1:17; 4:14). But it caused him joy, not grief (Rom. 5:3; cf. Jas. 1:2–3).

(d) Various NT churches experienced tribulation: Jerusalem (Acts 11:19), Corinth (2 Cor. 1:4), Thessalonica (1 Thess. 1:6; 3:3), and Macedonia generally (2 Cor. 8:2). But these afflictions are determined, as far as believers are concerned, by their goal in God's plan of salvation. They are therefore never purposeless, but produce hope (Rom. 5:3–5). Just as a woman who has given birth to a child no longer remembers the anguish in her joy (Jn. 16:21), so believers may have sorrow (16:22) and tribulation (16:33), but Jesus encourages us to "take heart." Believers know God's righteousness, which repays with affliction those who cause affliction and grants rest to the afflicted (2 Thess. 1:6–7).

See also diōkō, run after, pursue, persecute (1503).

2569 (thnēskō, die), → 2505.

2570 (thnētos, mortal), → 2505.

2571 (thorybazō, cause trouble, pass. be troubled, distressed), → 2512.

2572 (thorybeō, throw into disorder, pass. be troubled, distressed), → 2512.

2573 (thorybos, commotion, uproar, turmoil), → 2512.

2579 (thrēskeia, service of God, religion), → 3302.

2580 (thrēskos, pious), → 3302.

2581 θριαμβεύω

θριαμβεύω (thriambeuō), lead to a triumphal procession (2581).

CL & OT 1. This vb. is derived from the noun thriambos, originally a hymn sung at the ceremonial processions in honor of the god Dionysus. In the 2d cent. B.C. it took on the meaning to celebrate a triumph or to lead someone in a triumphal procession. In the Hel. environment of the NT, thriambeuō meant the triumphal procession of a ruler, which his defeated enemies had to follow. Prisoners provided a spectacle laid on by the victor. Censers were also carried in the triumphal processions and spread a festive perfume.

2. This word does not occur in the LXX.

NT thriambeuō only appears twice in the NT: 2 Cor. 2:14 and Col. 2:15, on both occasions in the trans. sense, to lead in a triumphal procession.

1. Col. 2:15 presents God as the triumphant victor: Jesus' journey to the cross is God's triumphal procession. Through Jesus' death and resurrection the spiritual authorities and powers opposed to God have been disarmed and defeated. God, as it were, leads them like prisoners in his triumphal procession.

2. In 2 Cor. 2:14, Paul himself is led in triumph as one whom God has defeated, who as the servant of Jesus Christ is at all times and in all places a part of God's triumphal procession. The apostle understands his missionary task as the work of a slave, who puts the power of the divine victor on show and by his proclamation spreads the perfume of the knowledge of God—to some for life, to others for death (2:14–17).

See also athleō, compete (123); agōn, fight (74); brabeion, prize (1092); nikaō, be victorious (3771).

2585 θρόνος

θρόνος (thronos), throne, seat (2585).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. thronos originally meant a chair with an attached footstool; it denoted a place of honor, such as the master of a house might use, though it could also be offered to guests and bards. Under Lat. influence, this word came to mean the seat of a god and could also then be used metaphorically, as in the pl. thronoi, for power. To be seated on the throne was a sign of regal or divine majesty.

2. (a) The concept of the royal throne derives from the Orient. Sitting on a throne denotes the unique exaltation of the absolute ruler, his superiority over against those subject to him. It is his sole right to sit on the throne; the suppliant or servant stands before him. Only when the king sits on the throne does he take his power. The magnificent ornamentation of a throne indicates his divine dignity; at its sides, to the right and left, stand attendant heavenly beings such as cherubim as pictorial symbols of ruling power (cf. 1 Ki. 10:18–20). The earthly ruler was honored as a son of the god or even (as in Egypt) as the incarnation of the divine.

(b) Since the king was originally also the judge, his throne was both a visible symbol of regal power (2 Sam. 3:10; 14:9) and of justice (Ps. 122:5). The throne was thus a constant factor over against the changing bearers of power. In this way, Nathan's promise of the permanence of the Davidic rule (2 Sam. 7:13) was linked with "the throne" (cf. also 1 Chr. 28:5; 29:23). This formed the primary link with the later hope of the everlasting throne of the Messiah.

3. In the OT the throne represents God's power and righteousness. This can never be simply identified with the king's power, however much the ANE court style was taken over. The Israelite king stood in an adoptive relationship with Yahweh as his "Son" (Ps. 2:7). Jer. specified Jerusalem as God's throne (3:17), but also Israel (14:21). Ezek., in his great vision of the future, saw the new temple as the abode of the divine throne (43:7), while in Isa. 66:1 heaven is said to be Yahweh's throne (cf. 6:1; 14:13).

The special nature of the divine kingship is seen in the throne vision of Isa. 6:1–13, but most clearly in Ezek. 1:4–28. Here Yahweh's kingly power is seen under the symbolism of transcendent creatures, representing the world rule of their Lord. They each have four faces, representing God's omnipresence, and face the world, while above their outspread wings (1:22) stands the vault of heaven, which keeps the destroying floods away from the creation (cf. Gen. 1:6–7). It is above this world—inaccessible to humans—that God's throne is seen, surrounded by an unearthly brightness. The throne of the "Ancient of Days" in Dan. 7:9 probably has a similar significance (cf. Ps. 97:2) The other thrones mentioned there are probably for the assessors or the jury in the court proceedings.

4. The hidden nature and dynamic of Israel's throne theology is revealed by the rite of Yahweh's ceremonial enthronement (cf. Ps. 24; 93; 96–99). Yahweh's kingship is not an inactive representation, but a fight that has just been won (see esp. Ps. 93; also 46; 89:7–14). In Israel's enthronement ritual, which may have been part of the New Year Festival, the ark of the covenant represented the throne of God: Yahweh was depicted as present, though invisible, "enthroned between the cherubim" (99:1), which were on both sides of the ark.

NT 1. The NT adds little to these OT concepts. In Rev. the throne plays a dominant role. The word occurs there 47x, over against 15x in the rest of the NT. In Matt. 5:34, Jesus speaks of heaven as God's throne and for that reason forbids us to swear by it. The promise to Nathan is alluded to in Lk. 1:32, with extended reference to the messianic throne (2 Sam. 7:12, 16; cf. also Acts 3:20–21). Note too such phrases as "glorious throne" (Matt. 19:28; cf. 25:31; 1 Sam. 2:8) and "throne of grace" (Heb. 4:16). The latter is the antitype to the "atonement cover [hilastērion, → hilaskomai, 2661]" in the earthly sanctuary.

2. A striking point in the NT is that the Son of Man sits on the divine throne of judgment (Heb. 12:2). Matt. 19:28 even promises such ruling authority to the twelve apostles, as judges with him over Israel. In Matt. 25:31–46, the Son of Man judges the world from "his throne in heavenly glory" entirely on his own. A pictorial tension exists between these statements and those (following Ps. 110:1) that view the Messiah sitting at the right hand of God, but there is no material contradiction.

3. (a) In Heb. the throne of Jesus is not merely a throne of justice, but also a "throne of grace" (4:16). Because of the incarnation of our heavenly high priest and his perfect life, we can approach this throne "with confidence" and find mercy and grace.

(b) In Col. 1:15–20, generally considered to be a baptismal hymn, thrones are mentioned along with "powers ... rulers ... [and] authorities." This list denotes various groups of angels who belong to the council of the heavenly throne (cf. 1 Ki. 22:19). Within the compass of the hymn, this enumeration declares that Christ's creative power not only embraces what is visible, the earth, but also what is invisible, the world of angels.

4. (a) The picture of the throne in Rev. is based on Ezek. and is developed esp. in ch. 4. The throne there signifies the transcendent majesty of God. The "sea of glass, clear as crystal" (Rev. 4:6) is the vault of heaven (as in Ezek. 1). but the twenty-four elders on their thrones are new (Rev. 4:4). They are the heads of the heavenly court council. They represent the old and new Israel—the heads of the twelve tribes together with the twelve apostles. Their function is like that of the heavenly beings. They constantly adore "him who sits on the throne" (4:10), before whom they fall down and cry: "You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being" (4:11).

(b) A new factor appears in Rev. 5:6–9. "In the center of the throne," as the divine judgment of the world begins, appears the one who is to carry it out—"a Lamb, looking as if it had been slain" (cf. 5:12). Christ, in highest glory, is here pictured in terms of complete defenselessness. Nowhere is the paradox of the NT revelation of Christ shown so clearly as here. God's power is, from a human point of view, total powerlessness. Christ carries out the judgment in, and as, a self-sacrifice. The one who sits on the throne was a human, who turned power into service and brotherhood. To him, at the end of time, the whole creation pays its homage (5:13).

(c) Opposing this Christian throne as seen by faith is the throne of the Antichrist, who proclaims his power and demands submission (Rev. 13:4–8; cf. 2 Thess. 2:4). This throne, too, speaks of dominion—not of the Lamb, but of the dragon (Rev. 13:2). But his dominion succumbs to the wrathful judgment of the Lamb (16:10). The throne of the Lamb is ultimately triumphant. From it flows the river of the water of life in the new Jerusalem (22:1).

See also dynamis, power, might, strength, force (1539); exousia, freedom of choice, right, power, authority (2026); ischys, strength (2709).

2592 (thymiama, incense), → 3337.

2593 (thymiatērion, censer, altar of incense), → 3337.

2594 (thymiaō, burn incense), → 3337.

2596 θυμός

θυμός (thymos), passion, anger, rage (2596); θυμόω (thymoō), pass. become angry (2597); ἐνθυμέομαι (enthymeomai), reflect, consider (1926); ἐνθύμησις (enthymēsis), thought, reflection, idea (1927).

OT There is virtually no distinction in the LXX between thymos and orgē (→ orgē, 3973).

NT thymos occurs only 18x in the NT. In general it means anger, wrath, rage.

1. In Heb., Lk., Acts, and the Pauline writings (apart from Rom. 2:8), thymos refers to human anger. The pl. may denote outbursts of anger or even passions. As in the LXX it often stands alongside orgē without any perceptible distinction of meaning (e.g., Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8). It is also linked with eris (quarreling), zēlos (jealousy), eritheia (selfish ambition) in 2 Cor. 12:20 and Gal. 5:20. These are dangers into which even the church might fall. On the other hand, some people were filled with rage at the teaching of Jesus (Lk. 4:28) and Paul (Acts 19:28).

All this has its origin in the old human nature (Gal. 5:19–20; Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8–9) and can only be overcome in the power of the Spirit, who renews the heart (Eph. 4:23; Gal. 5:16, 18, 22, 25), and creates a new nature (Eph. 4:24).

2. In Rom. 2:8 thymos (with orgē) describes the divine anger, although God's name is not mentioned. The divine anger will be revealed at the final judgment (2:5) in those whose hearts are hardened and who do not obey the truth (2:8), but do evil (2:9).

In Rev. thymos denotes almost exclusively divine anger (e.g., 15:1, 7; 16:1). The picture of the cup of God's wrath is a striking expression, derived from the OT (cf. Jer. 25:15–28), of the divine judgment (14:10; 16:19; 19:15) that human beings must, as it were, drink. It brings eternal ruin. Similar to this are the expressions the "winepress of God's wrath" (14:19) and the "bowls filled with the wrath of God" (15:7; 16:1).

3. Of the vbs. derived from thymos, thymoō, become angry, occurs in the NT only in Matt. 2:16, and enthymeomai, reflect, consider, only in Matt. 1:20; 9:4. The noun enthymēsis, consideration, reflection, is always in the negative sense of bad or foolish thoughts (9:4; 12:25; Acts 17:29; Heb. 4:12). Except in Acts 17:29 the contexts suggest hidden, secret thoughts that one prefers not to reveal but that God in his omniscience perceives and brings to light.

See also orgē, anger, 3973.

2597 (thymoō, become angry), → 2596.

2598 θύρα

θύρα (thyra), door, entrance (2598).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. thyra denotes a door of a house and occasionally, by metonymy, the house itself. The phrase "at the door(s)" can indicate nearness of place or time: To be "at the door" of a king or other influential person means to be paying court to or seeking benefit from that person. The noun can also be used for any entrance, lit. or metaphorical.

In the LXX thyra denotes an opening, doorway, or gate, and fig., any aperture (e.g., an animal's jaws, human lips).

NT 1. In the NT thyra is used lit.: (a) the door of a house or room (e.g., Matt. 6:6; 25:10; Mk. 1:33; 2:2; Acts 5:9); (b) the door of the temple (Acts 3:2; 21:30); (c) prison doors (5:19, 23; 12:6) that miraculously open to liberate apostles, proof that the gospel cannot be hindered by bonds or imprisonment; (d) the entrance to a cave tomb (Matt. 27:60; Mk. 16:3); and (e) the opening in a stone enclosure (Jn. 10:1–2).

2. thyra is also used fig. (a) The phrase "before" or "at the door" indicates nearness in time or place (Matt. 24:33; Mk. 13:29; Jas. 5:9; cf. also Acts 5:9).

(b) The image of the open door denotes an opportunity for the spread of the gospel. God opens a door for the message of salvation (Col. 4:3), giving the missionary a field in which to work (1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12), and he opens a door of faith to Gentiles by offering them the possibility of believing in Christ (Acts 14:27). By contrast, the closed door (Matt. 25:10; Lk. 13:25; cf. Rev. 3:7) carries a sense of judgment.

(c) The narrow door in Lk. 13:24 (cf. Matt. 7:13–14, where pylē is used) denotes the entrance into the kingdom of God, and the shutting of that door indicates irrevocable loss of an opportunity. According to Rev. 3:8, the exalted Christ alone has the authority to grant access to his kingdom. Rev. 3:20 is best understood in an eschatological setting: The returning Savior seeks fellowship with a disciple in a festal meal; the door is opened by obedience and faith. Only once does the NT expressly refer to the door of heaven (4:1), although this metaphor may underlie other passages that speak of opening and shutting the sky or heavens (Lk. 4:25; Rev. 11:6).

(d) In the "I am the door [NIV, gate]" sayings in Jn. 10:7, 9, Jesus is the gate to the sheep, the door whereby the genuine shepherd approaches the flock. In 10:9 the image is that of the gate through which the sheep go in and out; i.e., Jesus is the gate for the sheep to go into the fold, the gate leading to salvation and life (cf. 14:6), an idea perhaps indebted to a messianic interpretation of Ps. 118:20. The image of Jesus as the gate to salvation appears early in patristic exegesis (Ign. Phld. 9:1; Herm. Sim. 9.12.1).

See also pylē, gate, door (4783).

2599 (thyreos, shield), → 4483.

2602 (thysia, sacrifice, offering, act of offering), → 2604.

2603 (thysiastērion, altar), → 2604.

2604 θύω

θύω (thyō), to sacrifice, slaughter, kill, celebrate (2604); θυσία (thysia), sacrifice, offering, act of offering (2602); θυσιαστήριον (thysiastērion), altar (2603); προσφορά (prosphora), offering, the act of offering, the offering that is brought (4714); προσφέρω (prospherō), offer, sacrifice (4712); εἰδολόθυτος (eidōlothytos), a thing sacrificed to idols (1628); ὁλοκαύτωμα (holokautōma), whole burnt offering (3906); βωμός (bōmos), (pagan) altar (1117).

CL 1. In cl. Gk. thyō has the basic meaning to sacrifice, though originally in connection with the smoke offering it meant to smoke, offer a smoking or a burnt sacrifice. Because sacrificial animals or portions of animals—and humans also—were burnt, thyō assumed the meaning to slaughter for cultic ends. The noun thysia signifies the ritual of sacrifice as well as the sacrificial animal or any sacrificial gift.

2. prosphora originally meant bringing, presenting. It was used of income, revenue, and the offering of sacrificial gifts, then in particular an offering of food, esp. in the form of a gift of grain. For the act of offering, the vb. prospherō was used. From Sophocles on, in connection with making an offering in the form of a gift, the expression came to indicate total submission to the deity.

OT 1. Principal sources. Many passages in the OT exhibit the wide-ranging significance that sacrifice acquired in Israel. The main sources are the Mosaic legislation (e.g., Exod. 20:22–23:33; 34; Lev. 1–7; 16; Deut. 12–26), though sacrifices are also outlined in Ezek. 40–48. The OT presents a variety of interrelated ideas. Note too that the notion of sacrifice was not unique to Israel but was widespread in the ancient Near East (cf., e.g., Lev. 20:2–5; Deut. 18).

2. Cultic sites. The offering of sacrifice was localized at a cultic site that centered on the altar (Heb. mizbēaḥ, place of sacrifice). The LXX is the first place where the corresponding Gk. noun thysiastērion, sacrificial table, altar, occurs (419x); its use remains confined to Jewish and Christian lit. thysiastērion is always used for altars dedicated to God, such as the altar on which Abraham intended to offer Isaac (Gen. 22:9–10), the altar of burnt offering (Lev. 4:7), and the altar of incense (Exod. 30:1; 40:5). For altars of foreign gods bōmos (high place) is used in the LXX, even though mizbēaḥ was sometimes used for pagan altars in the MT (e.g., Exod. 34:13; Num. 3:10). This distinction is reflected in the NT in Paul's use of bōmos for the altar to the unknown god in Acts 17:23.

The patriarchs built their own altars and offered sacrifice without recourse to priesthood: e.g., Noah (Gen. 8:20); Abraham (12:6–8; 13:18; 22:9); Isaac (26:25); Jacob (33:20; 35:1–7); Moses (Exod. 17:15). Some altars were made of earth (Exod. 20:24). The altar built by Elijah on Mount Carmel consisted of twelve uncut stones representing the twelve tribes (1 Ki. 18:31–32). Altars were also built by Joshua (Jos. 8:30–31 = LXX 9:2), Gideon (Jdg. 6:24–31), and David (2 Sam. 24:18–25). Solomon's bronze altar for burnt offerings was probably a new one (1 Ki. 8:22, 54, 64; 9:25; 2 Chr. 4:1); it was 20 cubits square and 10 cubits high and stood in the inner court.

Within the Holy Place in the tabernacle was a miniature altar of incense, overlaid with gold (Exod. 30:1–10). Only Aaron and the high priests had access to this altar for burning incense morning and evening and for making atonement once a year on the Day of Atonement. The horns of the altar were projections that were smeared with the blood of the sacrifice (29:12; 30:10; Lev. 4:7). On the large altar the victims were tied to the horns (Ps. 118:27). Offenders might cling to them for safety (1 Ki. 2:28). In Ezekiel's vision of the temple no incense altar is mentioned, but the altar of burnt offering is described in detail (43:13–17).

The temple that was rebuilt after the exile was provided with altars. Antiochus Epiphanes removed the golden altar in 169 B.C. (1 Macc. 1:21), and two years later surmounted the altar of burnt offering with the abomination of desolation (1:54). The Maccabees built a new altar and restored the altar of incense (4:44–49). In the time of Herod the altar of burnt offering was a pile of uncut stones approached by a ramp.

3. Types of sacrifice. The OT describes various forms of sacrifice, named according to the occasion and form of the gift. The Heb. noun zebaḥ is the generic term for sacrifice. It is used for sacrifices in which the flesh is eaten, e.g., feasts at altars (1 Sam. 2:13) and the yearly sacrifice (1:21).

(a) The ḥaṭṭāʾt is generally rendered "sin offering." In this sacrifice the blood of the animal is not used on the person. The rites for the healed leper (Lev. 14) and the consecration of the priest involve this sacrifice and the daubing by blood, but the blood is taken from a different sacrifice. The priest purges the sanctuary by means of a sin offering on behalf of those who have polluted it. Unrepented impurities cannot be so purged (Num. 15:27–29) but must be dealt with by the Day of Atonement ritual (→ hilaskomai, make atonement, 2661).

Repentance is a precondition of the sin offering (Lev. 4:22–23, 27–28). This sacrifice covers the inadvertent violation of prohibitive commandments (4:2, 13, 22, 27), but not the neglect of performative commandments. The type of animal offered is related to the social and economic position of the offender: a bull for the high priest and community, a male goat for a chief, and a female of the flock for a common Israelite (cf. Lev. 4:2–21; 9:2–3, 15; 16:5, 11; Num. 15:22–26). The very poor could offer birds or flour (Lev. 5:7–13). Where more than one kind of sacrifice is offered, the sin offering take precedence, because the altar must first be purged before other gifts may be offered (cf. Lev. 5:8 with Num. 6:14–17).

(b) The ʾāšām is generally translated "guilt offering." It was to be offered, together with a fine, for unwitting trespass in any holy thing (Lev. 5:15; cf. also ch. 27). Cases where the guilt offering has to be made include reparation by a Nazirite for desecrating his hair and vow (Num. 6:1–12), the desecration of Israel by foreign nations (Jer. 2:3), and the desecration of Israel by mixed marriages (Ezra 10:19). Lev. 5:17–19 prescribes the guilt offering for unwitting sins in order to avoid divine retribution. It was also to be offered in cases of a breach of faith (6:1–7; Num. 5:6–10); the guilty party must express repentance in confession.

Isa. 53:10–11 declares that the servant of Yahweh is made a "guilt offering" and will "bear [the] iniquities" of the people. In other words, the servant of Yahweh takes over the role of the animal in the guilt offering by offering his own life. In the NT Jesus' self-giving as a lytron, ransom (Matt. 20:28; → 3389), recalls this passage.

(c) The ʿōlâ is the "burnt offering." For this the LXX has holokautōma and holokautōsis. The entire beast or fowl was laid on the altar, except the skin (Lev. 7:8) and those parts that could not be washed clean (1:9–17), and it was consumed by fire. The animal had to be a male without defect from the herd or flock (1:3, 10; 22:18–19) or, if necessary, a fowl (1:14–17; 5:7; 12:8; 14:22; 15:14–15, 29–30; Num. 6:10–11). A lamb was offered by individuals (Lev. 12:6; Num. 6:14) and by the nation with the sheaf-waving (Lev. 23:12) and also daily at the morning and evening sacrifices (Num. 28:1–10; cf. 2 Ki. 16:15; Ezra 3:5; Neh. 10:33; Ezek. 46:13, 15).

The atoning character of the burnt offering is made explicit in Lev. 1:4 and is implied in certain rituals (9:7; 14:20). The OT refers to human burnt offerings made to other gods (2 Ki. 3:27; Jer. 19:5); human sacrifice is condemned in the OT (Lev. 18:21; 20:1–5; Deut. 12:31; 18:10; 2 Ki. 23:10; Jer. 32:35; Ezek. 20:25–26; Mic. 6:7). Abraham was prepared to offer Isaac as a burnt offering, though God drew his attention to a ram instead (Gen. 22:2, 13).

(d) The Heb. noun minḥâ (LXX thysia) means a gift or present (Gen. 32:14, 19, 21–22; Jdg. 6:18), tribute (3:15–18; 2 Sam. 8:2, 6), and an offering made to God of any kind, esp. of grain (Gen. 4:3–5; Num. 16:15; 1 Sam. 2:17, 29; Isa. 1:13). The sacrifices of Cain and Abel are both described by this same word; it is the context that indicates that Abel's offering of the firstlings of his flock and their fat portions (Gen. 4:3) was acceptable to God rather than Cain's offering of the fruit of the ground. But Cain's decisive sin was resenting God with an impenitent heart (4:6–7), which in turn led to the murder of his brother and his attempted cover-up (4:8–9).

(e) The šᵉlāmîm is frequently translated as "fellowship offering" or "peace offering." This was a thank offering, votive offering, or freewill offering (cf. Lev. 7:11–16; 19:5–8; Deut. 27:7). The ritual is prescribed in Lev. 3. The offerer lays his hand on the animal's head and kills it. The priest throws the blood on the altar and round it. The entrails are removed and the fat burnt as a pleasing odor to Yahweh. Certain parts of this offering went to the priest and the rest was eaten by the offerer (7:15–16). It was mainly a private and family sacrifice, but was offered in public at Pentecost (23:19) and at the consecration of priests (9:4).

(f) Several other cultic rites are noted in the OT. The nesek ("drink offering") consisted of wine (Gen. 35:14; Lev. 23:37; Num. 29:39). It is mentioned in connection with the morning offering (Exod. 29:41; Num. 28:8) and with other offerings (6:15, 17; 15:5, 7, 10; 1 Chr. 29:21; 2 Chr. 29:35; Ezek. 45:17).

The "memorial offering" (ʾazkārâ), a term associated with the meal offering (Lev. 2:2, 9, 16; 6:8; Num. 5:26), denotes the frankincense burned for the bread of the Presence (Lev. 24:7). A meal offering could be used as a sin offering and a memorial by the very poor (5:12). The bread of the Presence was to be set on the table in the sanctuary at all times before Yahweh (Exod. 25:30). It was an expression of the covenant, being offered with fire and frankincense. In 1 Sam. 21:1–6 David and his men ate this bread, which act Jesus appeals to in the NT in order to justify the disciples' plucking grain on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:1–8).

The "wave offering" (tᵉnûpâ) was waved at the high priest's ordination (Exod. 29:26). The Levites were also offered as a wave offering (Num. 8:11, 13, 15, 21). The offering was so called because it was waved, signifying that the sacrifice was Yahweh's.

4. Purpose of sacrifice. What is the fundamental idea behind a sacrifice? Various theories have been advanced, such as to provide food for God. Although this may have been in the minds of some Israelites because of influence from Canaanite religion, it was trenchantly denounced by the psalmist in Ps. 50:8–15. An alternative view that sacrifice releases the life force of the animal through its death (an animist interpretation) cannot be sustained in light of a detailed examination of the passages concerned.

At the root of sacrifice is a profound awareness in humans of a need for a source of power outside themselves. In its deepest form it represents an awareness of the need to be reconciled and to commit oneself without reserve to the God who offers reconciliation and who is worthy of total commitment. The variety of sacrifices in the OT expresses the varied aspects of this need and the divine provision made for them under the old covenant. With the death of Christ the NT writers see the sacrifices of the OT superseded.

A number of passages in the prophets denounce mere sacrificial ritual (Isa. 1:11–31; Jer. 6:20; 7:21–22; Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:21–27; Mic. 6:6–8). Right conduct and obedience are stressed over against such ritual. What is most important is not the act of sacrifice but the heart of the worshiper (cf. esp. 1 Sam. 15:22). In Hos. 6:6 (cf. Matt. 9:13; 12:7) Hos. offers a statement of priorities by means of hyperbole: "For I desire mercy, not sacrifice, and acknowledgment of God rather than burnt offerings." Isa. condemned not only vain offerings, new moons, and Sabbaths but also prayer (1:13–15; 29:13) that is not made with the right inner attitude. The same focus on moral righteousness, in contrast to mere ritual, is also found in Ps. (e.g., 40:6–8; 50:8–15) and in wisdom lit. (cf. Prov. 15:8; 21:3, 27).

5. Sacrifice in the postexilic period. Sacrifice was restored soon after the return (Ezra 3:2–7). Darius authorized not only the rebuilding of the temple but provision for the temple worship (6:9–10). Thus, the second temple remained the center for Israelite religion (6:17; 7:17; 8:35; 10:19). The Jerusalem temple was destroyed in A.D. 70, and with it sacrificial rites died out. But already in NT times the growth of synagogue worship, esp. in the Diaspora, was displacing sacrificial ritual, which could only be participated in at Jerusalem. The Qumran community had already cut itself off from the temple, replacing material sacrifices with obedience to the Torah and the praise of God.

NT thyō and its cognates are found in various NT writings. The vb. thyō occurs 14x, the vb. prospherō 47x (esp. Matt. and Heb.), the noun thysia 28x (more than half in Heb.), and thysiastērion 23x. These words retreat into the background in the writings of John and Paul. Examination of the context of these passages reveals how far the NT writers have dissociated themselves from OT worship. Even the allusions to the altar in the visions of Rev., which formally lean heavily on the imagery of the OT, exhibit a new interpretation of the concept of sacrifice.

1. Synoptic Gospels. Jesus does not reject the temple worship practices any more than the prophets. Rather, he directs his polemic against attempts to evade God's radical demand of love through ritual and hair-splitting observance of the law. In the Sermon on the Mount priority is given to reconciliation, but not to the exclusion of formal worship (see Matt. 5:23–24). Doing one's utmost to seek reconciliation among human beings is the sine qua non of true worship.

Hos. 6:6 is cited twice in Matt. In Matt. 9:12–13 the Pharisees complain that Jesus is guilty of defilement by eating with tax collectors and sinners. In reply Jesus says: "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. But go and learn what this means, 'I desire mercy, not sacrifice.' For I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners." Jesus' message here is in line with his previous teaching in the Sermon on the Mount (5:23–24). "Sacrifice," as the highest form of Israelite worship, stands for the keeping of the Mosaic law, which itself demanded separation from anything that defiles as a prerequisite for worship. The greater includes the less. To Jesus, what defiles is not what the Pharisees presume, i.e., formal association with sinners, but the heart that lacks mercy.

Jesus appeals to Hos. 6:6 again when his disciples are criticized for plucking the ears of grain on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:7). Here too "sacrifice" stands for the observance of the religious prescriptions of the law, and the principle is the same. Humane considerations take precedence over formal observance of the letter of the law. In addition, someone greater than the temple is here (12:6), and "the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath" (12:8).

In a series of woes pronounced on the scribes and Pharisees Jesus condemns the practice of swearing not only by the temple but also by the gold of the temple (Matt.

23:16–17) and by the altar and the sacrifice (23:18–22). The scribal rulings operated on the principle that oaths by the most holy things are to be avoided, because they are as binding as oaths made in God's name. But oaths made by less holy things are less serious and thus less binding. Jesus sweeps such rulings aside as chicanery. We should not make an oath at all unless we intend to keep it (cf. 5:33–37). In all this Jesus is not rejecting sacrifice and the temple as such; rather, he is putting them in perspective.

All four Gospels record Jesus' cleansing of the temple (Matt. 21:10–17; Mk. 11:15–17; Lk. 19:45–47; Jn. 2:13–17). In the Synoptics it occurs as a symbolic act after Jesus' entry into Jerusalem during the last week of his ministry. It represents his coming into his own and God's purging judgment on his own house. Jn. likewise sets the account before the Passover but places it before his narrative of Jesus' public ministry. In the Synoptic account Jesus adopts words from an eschatological proclamation of Isa. (56:7) and from Jer.'s denunciation of the temple (7:11): "It is written . . . 'My house shall be called a house of prayer,' but you are making it a 'den of robbers'" (e.g., Matt. 21:13).

Jesus' action is also a fulfillment of Mal. 3:1–3 and thus a messianic sign. The purification of Jerusalem and the temple was part of Jewish expectation (cf. Pss. Sol. 17:30). In Jn. 2:17, "His disciples remembered that it is written: 'Zeal for your house will consume me'" (cf. Ps. 69:9). The Ps. itself adds: "and the insults of those who insult you fall on me." This may well be implied in Jesus' action; the attitude of humans to the temple expresses their attitude toward God. Jn.'s narrative then compares the Jerusalem temple with the temple of Jesus' body—both of which are the dwelling place of God. And in both cases the attitude of the Jews of Jesus' day showed how oblivious they were to the presence of God among them.

Lk. 2:24 refers to the offering made by Joseph and Mary on behalf of their infant son (cf. Lev. 12:2–8), which because of their poverty consisted of two birds. Lk. 13:1 mentions the blood of those Galileans that Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. In this connection Jesus rebutted the inference that anyone who so suffered must have been esp. guilty of sin: "I tell you, no! But unless you repent, you too will all perish" (13:3).

The guilt of those who reject God's servants is expressed in the saying that "upon you will come all the righteous blood that has been shed on earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zechariah son of Berekiah, whom you murdered between the temple and the altar" (Matt. 23:35; cf. Lk. 11:51). Not only are these the first and last victims of murder in the Heb. OT (Gen. 4:8; 2 Chr. 24:21); they were also murdered in connection with sacrifice.

The holokautōma (burnt offering) is mentioned in Mark's account of the two greatest commandments. The teacher of the law acknowledges that Jesus is right, then adds that loving God "is more important than all burnt offerings and sacrifices" (12:33).

2. Acts. Stephen's speech in Acts 7 similarly adopts a negative attitude toward sacrifice. The first allusion is to the sacrifice to the golden calf (7:41; cf. Exod. 32:4, 6); the second cites Amos 5:25 on the absence of sacrifice in the desert wanderings (Acts 7:42–43). Stephen draws the conclusion that Israel's failure to worship God in a spiritual way resulted in God's giving Israel over to paganism.

There is a distinct note of futility in the reference to a pagan altar in the account of Paul's address in the meeting of the Areopagus: "Men of Athens! I see that in every way you are very religious. For as I walked around and looked carefully at your objects of worship, I even found an altar [bōmos] with this inscription: TO AN UNKNOWN GOD. Now what you worship as something unknown I am going to proclaim to you" (Acts 17:23). This is the only use of the word bōmos (the LXX word for pagan altars) in the NT.

The apostle Paul continued to make occasional offerings himself. Acts 21:26 (using prospherō and prosphora) tells how Paul joined four men who had evidently undertaken a Nazirite vow (cf. Num. 6:1–21; Acts 18:18) in their purification rites and paid their expenses. By associating himself with them in their vow, Paul was consistent with his principle of being "all things to all men" in order to win them to Christ (1 Cor. 9:22). Whereas Paul repudiated the extension of circumcision to the Gentiles, he nevertheless kept the law among Jews. Similarly, Acts 24:17–18 reports how Paul made offerings (prosphoras) and was purified in the temple.

3. Paul's letters. In his letters Paul takes over the Jewish-Christian interpretation of the death of Jesus, which saw its saving efficacy in terms of OT sacrificial language. In urging moral purity to the Corinthians, Paul writes: "Get rid of the old yeast that you may be a new batch without yeast—as you really are. For Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed [thyō]" (1 Cor. 5:7; → pascha, Passover, 4247). Rom. 3:25 describes Jesus' death as a hilastērion, propitiation (→ hilaskomai, make atonement, 2661).

Rom. 15:16 sums up the grace of Paul's calling " to be a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles with the priestly duty of proclaiming the gospel of God, so that the Gentiles might become an offering [prosphora] acceptable to God, sanctified by the Holy Spirit." Here the Gentile Christians are the offering and Paul the priest of the Diaspora Jews (cf. Isa. 66:20).

In Phil. 4:18 Paul describes the gifts sent by the Philippians as "a fragrant offering [osmē, → 4011], an acceptable sacrifice [thysia], pleasing to God." In 2:17 he sees his own impending martyrdom in similar terms: "But even if I am being poured out like a drink offering on the sacrifice [thysia] and service coming from your faith, I am glad and rejoice with all of you" (cf. 1:19–26). The use of thysia here and the fact that Paul was in prison expecting the possibility of execution suggest that he was thinking of his death not as a propitiatory sacrifice, but as a freewill offering for the sake of the church.

In Rom. 12:1 Paul sees the Christian life as a sacrifice: "I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices [thysia], holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship." The life of the believer, not ritual, is now the true sacrifice of the people of God. In Eph. 5:2 Paul urges his readers to "live a life of love, just as Christ loved us and gave himself up for us as a fragrant offering [prosphora] and sacrifice [thysia] to God." In short, Christ's death is an atoning sacrifice, offered by pouring out his blood.

In Corinth there was an acute problem over whether Christians should eat meat that had been sacrificed to idols. The term eidōlothytos (Acts 15:29; 21:25; 1 Cor. 8:1, 4, 7, 10; 10:19; Rev. 2:14, 20) refers to meat sacrificed according to the rites of the locality and thus offered to a pagan deity, part of which was burned on an altar, part eaten at a solemn meal in the temple, and part sold in the market. The eating of such meat was condemned by the Jerusalem council. The church of Pergamum was accused of allowing people to eat it and of practicing immorality. From the Jewish standpoint it was unclean and therefore forbidden.

For Christians this issue raised the question of whether eating such meat implied some kind of allegiance to or communion with a pagan deity. The "strong" at Corinth said that they could do it with good conscience and impunity (cf. 1 Cor. 4:4, 10; 8:1–2). But weak believers who did so had a guilty conscience about it. Paul replies that Christians should be guided by love rather than any vaunted knowledge; he himself says he will not eat such meat if it causes others to stumble (8:1–13). Although all things come from God (8:4–6), Christians should be guided by concern for the consciences of others, not by what they feel in their own conscience (8:10–13). Moreover, to participate knowingly in something offered to demons (10:20) is to be a partner with demons, and as such is incompatible with partaking of the Lord's table (10:19–22). On the other hand, when Christians are unaware of any demonic associations, they may eat the meat (10:23–30) but should do everything to the glory of God (10:31–11:1).

Between these two passages in 1 Cor. Paul deals with the question of freedom and the Christian worker's right to upkeep. Alluding to Deut. 18:1, he asks in 1 Cor. 9:13: "Don't you know that those who work in the temple get their food from the temple, and those who serve at the altar [thysiastērion] share in what is offered on the altar?"

4. Hebrews. The central theme of Heb. is the way in which, through Christ, believers enter into the reality of which the OT institutions represent only an anticipation, one of which is the OT sacrificial system. The noun thysia and the vb. prospherō occur frequently. The function of the high priest is defined in terms of offering gifts and sacrifices for sin (5:1; cf. 8:3). But Jesus, "unlike the other high priests . . . does not need to offer sacrifices day after day, first for his own sins, and then for the sins of the people. He sacrificed for their sins once for all when he offered himself" (7:27). And again: "Christ was sacrificed [prospherō] once to take away the sins of many" (9:28).

The gifts and sacrifices of the earthly tabernacle could not "clear the conscience of the worshiper" (9:9). Their very repetition shows that they "can never take away sins. But when this priest [Jesus] had offered for all time one sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God" (10:11–12; cf. the use of prosphora, offering, in 10:14 and 18). The earthly tabernacle is but a copy of the heavenly one. "It was necessary, then, for the copies of the heavenly things to be purified with these sacrifices, but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices [thysia] than these" (9:23). In keeping with the symbolism of the Day of Atonement ritual (cf. Lev. 16), Christ is seen by his resurrection and ascension as entering the inner sanctuary once and for all "to do away with sin by the sacrifice of himself" (9:26; cf. 10:1).

Heb. 10:5–10 sees the coming of Christ anticipated in Ps. 40:6–8. The Ps. is cited in the LXX version, which reads "a body you prepared for me" in place of the MT "my ears you have pierced." Four different sacrifices are mentioned here: "sacrifice" [thysia], "offering" [prosphora], "burnt offerings" [holōkautōma], and "sin offerings." The spiritual principles underlying these sacrifices are fulfilled and transcended in the perfect and voluntary self-sacrifice of Christ. Unlike the purificatory rites of the old covenant, which required constant repetition, Christ's offering effects the sanctification of believers once and for all (5:10). Only "if we deliberately keep on sinning after we have received the knowledge of the truth, no sacrifice [thysia] for sins is left" (10:26; cf. 3:12; 6:4–8; 10:29; 12:25–29). This denotes contempt of the most flagrant kind, like the Israelites who rebelled and thus failed to enter the promised land.

Heb. 11:4 locates the essential difference between the sacrifices of Cain and Abel (Gen. 4:3–10) in the fact that Abel's offering [thysia] was given "by faith." The sacrifices that yet remain for believers are those of praise and proper living: "Through Jesus, therefore, let us continually offer to God a sacrifice [thysia] of praise—the fruit of lips that confess his name. And do not forget to do good and to share with others, for with such sacrifices [thysia] God is pleased" (13:15–16). The linking of praise with practical living shows that such sacrifice extends beyond liturgical worship.

This passage is set in the context of a reminder that we have no lasting city on earth (Heb. 13:14). The writer earlier presented Christ's death in terms of the Day of Atonement tabernacle ritual but now argues, "We have an altar [thysiastērion] from which those who minister at the tabernacle have no right to eat. The high priest carries the blood of animals into the Most Holy Place as a sin offering, but the bodies are burned outside the camp. And so Jesus also suffered outside the city gate to make the people holy through his own blood" (13:10–12). The allusion is to the Day of Atonement animals (Lev. 16:27). Here the word "altar" is used by metonymy for "sacrifice." The saying is comparable with speaking of Christ as a hilastērion (Rom. 3:25).

The Jews possess both a visible altar and a visible city, Jerusalem, but not the spiritual reality. They also have material sacrifices in contrast to the spiritual sacrifices of praise and deed (Heb. 13:16). The "we" in question must mean "we Christians" (cf. 8:1) in contrast to the Jews, who cling to the material sacrifices of the temple ritual. Those who do so have no right to feed on Christ. The absence of a visible altar (13:10) compares with the absence of a visible city (13:14).

5. 1 Peter. The theme of the sacrifice of the Christian is taken up in 1 Pet. 2:5, where the apostle exhorts us "like living stones, [to be] built into a spiritual house to be a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices [thysia] acceptable to God through Jesus Christ." This priesthood, which also includes being a holy nation, is defined in terms of declaring "the praises of him who called you out of darkness into his wonderful light" (2:9; cf. Exod. 19:5–6). By Christ's death believers of all nations are constituted the new people of God and the new priesthood of God.

In 1 Pet. 1:18–19 Peter understands the death of Christ as a ransom in sacrificial terms, which provides the basis for the Christian life: "You know that it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (see also lytron, ransom, 3389). The writer has in mind here both the perfect Passover lamb (cf. Exod. 12:5; 29:1; Lev. 22:17–25) and the lamb led to the slaughter in Isa. 53:7 (cf. 52:3).

6. Altars. In addition to the reference to thysiastērion noted above, altars are mentioned in several other NT passages. Zechariah received tidings of the birth of his son, John the Baptist, from an angel of the Lord standing "at the right side of the altar of incense" (Lk. 1:11). Rom. 11:3 alludes to Elijah's complaint: "Lord, they have killed your prophets and torn down your altars; I am the only one left, and they are trying to kill me" (cf. 1 Ki. 19:14). The saying forms part of Paul's argument about the remnant and the people of God. God has not rejected his people, even though it may seem as if there are no godly people remaining. Just as God kept for himself seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal, so he keeps a remnant today. But it is by grace and not works (Rom. 11:4–6). Still, Jas. 2:21 asks: "Was not our ancestor Abraham considered righteous for what he did when he offered his son Isaac on the altar?"

The remaining passages referring to altars occur in Rev. The souls of the martyred saints are under the altar, crying out for vengeance (6:9–10). Their sacrifices are in no sense atoning, but neither were all the OT sacrifices. The prayers of the saints have a sacrificial character: "Another angel, who had a golden censer, came and stood at the altar. He was given much incense to offer, with the prayers of all the saints, on the golden altar before the throne" (8:3). The mingling of incense indicates symbolically the hallowing of the prayers from a source outside human beings, without which their prayers would not be acceptable to God. The action of the angel in taking fire from the altar and throwing it on earth (8:5) is a sign that the prayers are answered in the judgments that befall the earth (cf. 6:9–10).

The judgment that comes "from the horns of the golden altar that is before God" (Rev. 9:13) again indicates the divine judgment in answer to the cries of the saints. The miniature golden altar of incense stood within the Holy Place of the tabernacle (Exod. 30:1–10). Similarly, in Rev. 14:18 and 16:7 judgment comes from the altar.

In Rev. 11:1 John is told to "measure the temple of God and the altar, and count the worshipers there." He is not, however, to measure the court outside the temple, which is given over to the nations, who will trample the holy city for forty-two months (11:2). The measuring symbolizes setting the holy places apart from that which is profane and which will be subject to tribulation and judgment. The sanctuary symbolizes God's people, and they will come through the tribulation (cf. also Ezek. 40:5; 42:20; Zech. 2:1). Just as the sealed will come to no ultimate harm, so the sanctuary, which represents the true church sanctified by God himself, will be safe when God's wrath falls on the holy city.

See also aparchē, the gift of the firstfruits, offering, gift (569).

2606 (thōrax, breastplate), → 4483.

I iota

2609 Ἰακώβ

Ἰακώβ (Iakōb), Jacob (2609); Ἰάκωβος (Iakōbos), James (2610).

OT Jacob (Heb. yaᶜᵃkōb) was the second son of Isaac and Rebekah and the grandson of the patriarch Abraham. He was favored by his mother, while Isaac was partial to his other son, Esau. Early in his life Jacob obtained the birthright due his brother Esau by giving him some "red stew" in return for the birthright (Gen. 25:30). According to the Deuteronomic legislation, the right of the firstborn included a double portion of the paternal estate (Deut. 21:17), and most probably involved leadership of the clan as well (Gen. 27:29). The subterfuge by which Jacob obtained the blessing of Isaac was initiated and encouraged by Rebekah (27:5–17). The blessing itself (27:27–29) apparently had the validity of a last will and testament.

Jacob's deception led to his flight to the home of his uncle Laban. As he stopped for the night at Luz, Jacob had a dream of a ladder reaching to heaven (Gen. 28:10–17). In the dream the Lord spoke to him, reiterating the promise given earlier to Abraham (12:7; 13:15–16; 15:17–21; 17:1–8; 24:7). Not only did the reiteration of the promise include the affirmation that the land would belong to the descendants of the patriarchs (28:13), but that they and their descendants would be the vehicle by which God's favor would extend to the Gentiles (28:14).

Jacob's dramatic encounter with the Lord led to his calling the site Bethel (i.e., "house of God"), and that site continued to be known as Bethel throughout the OT. Jacob was hired by Laban and in return for fourteen years of labor he received Laban's two daughters—first Leah, then Rachel—as his wives. Leah became the mother of Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun.

Rachel, however, did not bear children immediately and, in keeping with the prevailing custom, gave her maid, Bilhah, as a concubine to her husband. Bilhah became the mother of Dan and Naphtali. At length Rachel gave birth to two sons, Joseph and Benjamin. Jacob also had two sons, Gad and Asher, by Zilpah, Leah's maid.

Relations between Jacob and Laban became strained partly because of Jacob's increase in wealth (Gen. 31:1–2), and Jacob left with his family. When he heard this, Laban pursued Jacob. When he reached his son-in-law, he berated him for several things, including the alleged theft of the family gods (31:30), which, in reality, Rachel had taken and secreted in the camel's saddle. The possession of the family gods designated the one who had them the right to the paternal estate. After a mutual agreement that they would not again interfere with one another, Jacob resumed his journey.

In a dramatic event at the river Jabbok Jacob wrestled with a man whom he identified as God (Gen. 32:30). It was during this experience that his name was changed to Israel (Israēl, → 2702). He named the site of the encounter Peniel ("face of God"). As he continued, Jacob encountered Esau (33:1–4). A reconciliation was effected by the two brothers, which seems to have been an enduring one.

After an unfortunate experience with the people of Shechem (Gen. 34), Jacob returned to Bethel, but not before he had all the images of foreign deities removed from his household. After the images were buried under an oak at Shechem, the Lord appeared to Jacob and the terms of the Abrahamic covenant were again affirmed. On the journey from Bethel, Jacob suffered the loss of his wife Rachel, who died while giving birth to Benjamin (35:16–18). This tragedy was soon followed by the death of his father Isaac (35:29) and the banishment of his son Joseph to Egypt (Gen. 37).

Joseph rose to power in Egypt, and his wisdom and foresight led to his overseeing the storage of food in Egypt. This propitious act enabled the Egyptians to have provisions while many in the surrounding areas were ravaged by famine. When the famine struck Canaan, Jacob sent his sons to Egypt to obtain food. He kept his youngest son Benjamin with him, however. Alleging that they were spies, Joseph required them to bring Benjamin to Egypt to prove their word and, hence, their innocence.

After his brothers brought Benjamin to Egypt, Joseph identified himself as their brother and arranged to have Jacob brought to Egypt as well. Jacob lived in Egypt for seventeen years. When he was near death, he exacted from Joseph the promise that he would be buried in Canaan. He adopted Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 48:1–6), and pronounced a blessing on them as well as on his own sons (48:8–49:27). Jacob died at age 147 and was buried with his ancestors in the cave of Machpelah (50:1–13).

The name Jacob became an eponym for Israel and occurs frequently with that connotation in the OT (Num. 23:7, 10, 23; Ps. 14:7; Isa. 48:20; Amos 3:13). The patriarch Jacob is frequently cited in connection with the acts of God on his behalf. God is described as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Exod. 3:6, 15), and the covenant given to the patriarchs is cited in the same connection (2 Ki. 13:23). Malachi assured the people that the love shown by God to Jacob had not been withheld from them with the words, "I have loved Jacob, but Esau I have hated" (Mal. 1:2–3).

Iakōbos (James) is the Hellenized form of Iakōb.

NT 1. In the NT Iakōb denotes both the patriarch Jacob and the legal father of Jesus (Matt. 1:2, 15–16; Lk. 3:34). NT writers make several allusions to events in Jacob's life. Jn. 4:5–6, 12 refers to a plot of ground that Jacob gave to Joseph, which was the site of Jacob's well (Gen. 33:19; 48:22). Stephen mentions several events in the life of Jacob (Acts 7:8, 12, 14). The writer of Heb. cites Jacob as a recipient, like his grandfather Abraham, of God's promises (11:9), as an example of faith (11:21), and as someone who conspired to get the birthright from his brother Esau (12:16–17; Esau's selling of his birthright is cited as an example of reckless godlessness).

In Rom. 9:6–13 Paul talks about the events surrounding the birth of Jacob and Esau in a passage explicating the fact that God's work of election is not based on works (9:11). Paul here refers to the purposes expressed in the words God spoke before the births of the two brothers, "the older will serve the younger" (Gen. 25:23). He quotes Mal. 1:2–3 in this connection as well. Allusion is made to Jacob's dream at Bethel in Jn. 1:51, where Christ transfers the image of the ladder to himself.

"The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" is an expression that occurs in the NT. Peter used this phrase in connection with "the God of our fathers" in speaking to Jews (Acts 3:13). Jesus used a somewhat expanded formula to illustrate that God was the God of the living (Matt. 22:32; Mk. 12:26; Lk. 20:37). Stephen used the appellation "the God of Jacob" in his defense (Acts 7:46), which may reflect Ps. 132:5.

Jacob is mentioned along with the patriarchs Abraham and Isaac in Matt. 8:11, where their fellowship in heaven is the reward of the people of faith. Jacob is used as an eponym of the Jewish nation in Lk. 1:33 and Rom. 11:26 (the latter being a free quotation from Isa. 59:20).

2. There are several people in the NT with the anglicized name James (Iakōbos). (a) One of the sons of Zebedee, who became a disciple of Jesus, was named James (Matt. 4:21). Together with his brother John (who were called "Sons of Thunder" [Mk. 3:17]) and Peter, they formed the inner circle of Jesus' disciples. James and John sought high places when Jesus established his kingdom (Mk. 10:35–40); Jesus promised them suffering instead. Shortly after the establishment of the NT church, James was executed by Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:2).

(b) Another one of Jesus' disciples was called "James son of Alphaeus" (Matt. 10:3). Nothing more is known about him from the NT besides his name.

(c) In the Gospels, James, the brother of Jesus (cf. Gal. 1:19), is mentioned by name only (e.g., Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3). He did not accept the authority of Jesus during Jesus' lifetime (Jn. 7:5), but after his death and resurrection (perhaps as a result of a personal appearance from the resurrected Jesus, 1 Cor. 15:7), he became a believer (Acts 1:14). Eventually he became the leader of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; Gal. 2:9). Paul calls him one of the apostles in Gal. 1:19. Most scholars think that James was a child of Joseph and Mary, though a few scholars suggest he was the son of Joseph from a previous marriage or else a cousin of Jesus (taking adelphos, brother, in a general sense of relative). There is little doubt that this James is the one who authored the letter of James in the NT (Jas. 1:1).

See also Israēl, Israel (2702); Ioudaia, Judea (2677).

2610 (Iakōbos, James), → 2609.

2611 (iama, healing), → 2615.

2615 ἰάομαι

ἰάομαι (iaomai), cure, restore (2615); ἴασις (iasis), healing (2617); ἴαμα (iama), healing (2611); ἰατρός (iatros), physician (2620).

CL & OT 1. iaomai, to cure, restore, is used in the lit. sense as a medical term, and also fig., to free from an evil, such as ignorance or some intellectual shortcoming; also to heal psychological illnesses. Likewise the nouns iasis and iama, healing, and iatros, physician, are used both lit. and metaphorically.

(a) The various types of medical treatment throughout human history can be properly understood only when one is acquainted with the ideas that have been held regarding the causes of sickness. Apart from external injuries, where the cause is obvious, sicknesses in the ancient world were not simply physiological phenomena, the causes and nature of which could be investigated and therefore possibly cured. Originally, sicknesses were ascribed to attacks by external forces (e.g., gods, demons, sin, guilt, magical powers such as a curse, etc.). To bring about a cure a number of methods were employed: exorcisms (to cast out demons), various magical practices (the earliest beginnings of medicine), influences based on suggestion, or prayers and offerings, in an attempt to appease the deity. Both the sickness and its cure, therefore, were believed to arise from the intervention of a superior will.

As early as the 3d cent. B.C., the science of medicine reached its first flowering among the ancient Egyptians. But the honor of having set medical science on an empirical basis belongs esp. to the Gks. Already in Homer's time physicians were esteemed, esp. those of Egypt. The oath of Hippocrates (born 460 B.C.) is a remarkable testimony to the fact that, as medicine in Greece came into its own, there gradually arose a specific code of ethics among physicians.

(b) It remains true, however, that in the ancient world no clear line of demarcation can be drawn between rational and magical ideas of reality. Thus, the relationship between the origins of medicine as a rational science and "supernatural" healings attributed to superior powers is inextricably involved. Thus we constantly find that among different peoples special healing deities were worshiped (e.g., Apollo, Asclepius, Imhotep, Tammuz). Temple-like edifices were built to them and used as healing centers (e.g., the Asclepeion of Cos), where priests acted as physicians and ran what can only be described as a healing business. All kinds of offerings were presented, not merely to obtain a cure, but also as thanksgiving for miraculous cures already obtained. In the ancient world there were numerous accounts of miraculous healing, often embellished to the point of being grotesque.

Kings were originally chief priests as well and as such had the gift of healing. It is thus no surprise to read that Emperor Vespasian healed the blind and lame by his touch and with the use of spittle.

2. In the LXX , it is characteristic of faith in Yahweh that he alone is the source of all healing ("I am the LORD, who heals [iaomai] you," Exod. 15:26; cf. 2 Ki. 5:7). To turn to a physician (let alone another deity) for healing could on occasion mean distrust of Yahweh and an offense against the first commandment (2 Ki. 1; 2 Chr. 16:12). As sicknesses come from Yahweh himself, he is the only one who can bind up and heal (Job 5:18). For the same reason the OT makes little distinction between external ills with an obvious cause (e.g., injuries sustained through accident, in war, etc.) and other ills arising from within. In every aspect of life humans are dependent on Yahweh alone. This does not mean that demons have nothing to do with sickness. Rather they are thought of as being in God's service (cf. Exod. 12:23; Hab. 3:5).

This view of sickness and healing as marks of Yahweh's visitation or of his renewed favor often brings a devout man into grievous inward conflict (cf. Job and Ps., e.g., Ps. 38; 51; esp. 88). This could lead to a deep questioning of Yahweh when the malady was felt to be undeserved (Job 9:17–23; Ps. 73:21–22). Yet the devout turned in prayer, lament, and thanks to God alone as the only one who could grant healing (30:3; 103:3; cf. Wis. 16:12).

In spite of this radical attitude to sickness and healing, some passages do indicate the use of medical treatment (e.g., 1 Ki. 17:21; 2 Ki. 4:34; 5:13–14; 20:7), though the means used by the prophets are seldom "medical" as we understand the word. These are miraculous cures, carried out in reliance on the healing power of Yahweh.

The priest in Israel was not a healer. His function was restricted to that of a medical officer of health, who ascertained whether healing had taken place (Lev. 13–14). In later works, where the work of a physician is regarded in a positive light, he is God's servant in the strictest sense. It is God who appoints him and through prayer grants him wisdom for his work (Sir. 38:1–2, 9–14). An important element in the OT understanding of sickness and healing is the idea that bodily sickness is closely connected with sin and therefore a manifestation of God's anger against specific transgressions (e.g., Ps. 32:1–5; 38:3–8). Healing then becomes a picture of forgiveness, of God's mercy, of his nearness (e.g., Ps. 30:3; 41:4; 103:3; Isa. 6:10).

3. In Jud., too, medicine was generally held in considerable suspicion, although we do read of rabbis who were also physicians. The Jews also shared ideas that were widespread in relation to miraculous healings. Incantations, invocations, and other practices played a large role. With few exceptions, the rabbis themselves do not appear in tradition as miraculous healers.

NT 1. In the NT iaomai occurs 26x; iasis, 3x; iatros, 6x; iama, 3x (all in 1 Cor. 12). Apart from iama, this word group occurs chiefly in the Synoptic Gospels and esp. in Lk. The use of iaomai corresponds in the Gospels and in Acts to that of therapeuō (→ 2543). Hence, the remarks made under therapeuō on the theological assessment of healing miracles apply here also. The cures done by Jesus and his disciples are signs of the incoming kingdom of God (Lk. 9:2, 11, 42; Acts 10:38) and the fulfillment of OT prophecy (cf. Isa. 35:3–6; 61:1–2).

This is not to deny that the NT shares the view of sickness common at that time (cf. Lk. 13:11; Acts 12:23). As we noted above, the miraculous cures of Jesus are not without parallels in the extrabiblical world. But even though the NT records of healing show all the familiar features of other ancient healing/miracle stories (e.g., the helplessness of physicians, Mk. 5:26–29; the instantaneous nature of the miracle, Lk. 8:47), the NT accounts are simple and straightforward. They do not aim to glorify some miracle worker or even miracles as such. Rather, the historical account is still very much in mind, and such events are viewed in the light of Christ's message. Farce, magic, and sensationalism are absent.

The healings done by Jesus are determined by his word and by faith (e.g., Matt. 8:8, 13; 15:28; Lk. 7:7). They are therefore fundamentally different from other healings in the ancient world. Jesus also breaks through a typical Jewish doctrine of retribution (i.e., that every sickness must be caused by a certain sin; cf. Jn. 9:2–5), without thereby denying the basic connection between sin and sickness (e.g., Jn. 5:13–14; cf. Jas. 5:16). The focal point of all these healings is not the miracle but the healer himself, who reveals his uniqueness and his sense of mission and whose authoritative preaching has brought in the dawn of the new age (cf. Lk. 6:19; Acts 10:38).

2. In 1 Cor. 12 iama, healing, occurs 3x as Paul enumerates various spiritual gifts. All the apostles received the gift of healing as well as a commission to preach the gospel. But Paul makes it clear that healing can also be carried out by other individuals whom God has endowed with that spiritual gift. The gift of healing is one function among others, all of which are coordinated with one another in the church as the body of Christ.

See also therapeuō, heal, cure (2543); hygiēs, healthy, well (5618).

2617 (iasis, healing), → 2615.

2620 (iatros, physician), → 2615.

2625 (idios, one's own, [pl.] possessions, property), → 4347.

2626 ἰδιώτης

ἰδιώτης (idiōtēs), layman, unlettered, uneducated, unskilled (2626).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. idiōtēs means: (a) a private person as opposed to an occupant of a public office, or an individual citizen of the totality of citizens; (b) a layperson as opposed to an expert (e.g., a priest or philosopher), an unlettered person; (c) an outsider as opposed to one who "belongs."

2. idiōtēs occurs in the LXX only in Prov. 6:8b (in a section not in the Heb.). It denotes a common person in contrast to a king. The rabbis transliterated the word and used it for a private person as opposed to the king, a layperson as opposed to an expert, or a human as opposed to God.

NT In the NT idiōtēs occurs 5x. In Acts 4:13 it is used of the apostles as unlettered, uneducated men. Similar is 2 Cor. 11:6, where Paul says he is "not a trained [idiōtēs] speaker," though he insists he does have knowledge.

The idiōtai in 1 Cor. 14:16 are all those who do not possess the gift of tongues and who, since they do not understand what is said when this gift is exercised, cannot join in the Amen to the church's thanksgiving. Similarly, in 14:23–24, the same word refers to those who "do not understand" the concept of speaking in tongues because they are unbelievers who attend Christian meetings only occasionally. For their sakes, Paul urges that public worship should be intelligible.

2627 (idou, see! look! behold!), → 3972.

2632 (hierateia, priestly office), → 2636.

2633 (hierateuma, priesthood), → 2636.

2634 (hierateuō, hold the office or perform the service of a priest), → 2636.

2636 ἱερεύς

ἱερεύς (hiereus), a priest (2636); ἀρχιερεύς (archiereus), high priest (797); ἀρχιερατικός (archieratikos), high-priestly (796); ἱερωσύνη (hierōsynē), priestly office, priesthood (2648); ἱερατεία (hierateia), priestly office (2632); ἱεράτευμα (hierateuma), priesthood (2633); ἱερατεύω (hierateuō), hold the office or perform the service of a priest (2634); ἱερουργέω (hierourgeō), perform holy service, act as a priest with regard to something (2646).

CL & OT 1. All the words in this word group are formed from the adj. hieros, holy (→ 2641). According to the Stoic Zeno, the priest, versed in chastity and godliness, must be in concord and harmony with nature (viewed as divine). For the Stoics "the wise man alone" is therefore a priest.

2. The LXX uses hiereus to trans. Heb. kōhēn, priest. The development of the priesthood in the OT depends much on the view one takes of the dating of the OT books and the sources behind them. In the context of the various scholarly reconstructions, the following comments are generally accepted.

(a) The task of the priest in Israel seems not to have been originally sacrificial service, but speaking on behalf of Yahweh (cf. 1 Sam. 14:36–42) and instruction in the Torah (Deut. 27:9–10; 31:9–13). After all, sacrifices could be offered by the head of a family (cf. Gen. 8:20; 31:54; Exod. 12:21). Moses' father-in-law, Jethro the priest of Midian (Exod. 2:18–22; 3:1), offered burnt offerings and sacrifices at Sinai. He held a fellowship meal with the elders of Israel and advised Moses in the regulations of sacral law (Exod. 18:12–26).

(b) The descendants of Levi became the priestly class (Exod. 32:25–29; Deut. 33:8–11), although not every Levite served as a priest (Jdg. 19:1). The Levites enjoyed a particularly close relationship to Yahweh (Deut. 10:9). In point of law they stood close to aliens in possessing no land, but they did belong to the tribal system and had certain "towns to live in, with pasturelands for [their] livestock" (Josh. 21:2; cf. entire ch.). The high priesthood belonged to the clan of Aaron.

(c) In the premonarchic period priests are found primarily in connection with a sanctuary (e.g., the shrine of the Ephraimite Micah in Jdg. 17). At the sanctuary of the ark in Shiloh, Eli's family carried out the priestly duties, which consisted of offering sacrifices and burnt offerings and oracular prophecy (1 Sam. 1:3; 2:27–28).

(d) The flourishing temple cult in Jerusalem at the time of the monarchy gave rise to organized priesthoods (1 Ki. 4:2–5; cf. 12:26–31), which quickly gained recognition over against the local sanctuaries (2 Ki. 10:11, 19–21; 11:1–12). Local priests did not cease to exist, though they were often involved in pagan worship. Among other things, Josiah's reform "did away with the pagan priests appointed by the kings of Judah to burn incense on the high places of the towns of Judah" (2 Ki. 23:5); Josiah reestablished the worship of Yahweh as centered in the temple.

(e) In exilic times a clearer distinction was made between the priests and Levites as two divisions of the tribe of Levi. According to Ezek. 44:15, the Zadokites put forward their claim to the high-priestly offices. They derived their origin from Zadok, a pre-Davidic priest of Jerusalem, who was traced back through the family of Eli at Nob to that of Eli at Shiloh (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chr. 24:3).

(f) The postexilic reconstruction demanded Zadokite origin for the chief priests, Aaronic descent for the ordinary priests, and Levitical parentage for the temple servants (cf. 1 Chr. 24). In addition to those offering sacrifices, a growing body of experts in the Scriptures, ordained by Ezra (Neh. 8), soon overshadowed the priesthood.

(g) At the time of Jesus a social gap divided the chief priests (who formed an elite group and received power from the Romans to rule the people) from the ordinary priests. The latter formed twenty-four divisions of service in four to nine family groups (1 Chr. 24; cf. Lk. 1:5, 8). The divisions performed their service in the temple in turn, a week at a time. For the rest of the time the priests carried out a profession in the surrounding land. They could pass expert judgment on questions of ritual purity and often undertook the reading and exposition of the Torah in synagogue worship. Priestly rank was hereditary.

(h) At Qumran the Zadokite priesthood, deprived of its powers by the Hasmoneans, constituted itself as the priestly salvation community of the last days (1QS 5:2, 9; CD 3:21–4:2). Its founder, the "Teacher of Righteousness," was a Zadokite priest (4QpPs 37 3:16), while his opponent, the "wicked priest" (1QpHab 8:8), is perhaps the high priest Jonathan (152–143 B.C.). The priests took precedence in the community. The chief priest of the last days is ranked above the Messiah (1QSa 2:11–21). The purificatory prescriptions for priests were applied to all members of the community.

3. Regarding the high priest, archiereus occurs only 5x in the canonical books of the LXX, but 41x in the Apocr. (a) The postexilic office of high priest was until 172 B.C. in the possession of the Zadokites. Since the nation lacked an independent political head, he also had political powers. Out of this arose tensions (e.g., between the high priest Eliashib and Nehemiah, Neh. 13:4–9, 28) and tendencies toward Hel. customs (2 Macc. 4:12–15). Power struggles for this office gave Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) several opportunities from 175 B.C. on to fill the position. It was against this that the Maccabean uprising was directed. In Jerusalem the Hasmonean Jonathan (a member of an ordinary priestly family) usurped the office of high priest in 152 B.C. (1 Macc. 10:20–21). The Hasmoneans held it against the protests of the Pharisees until 37 B.C. Then Herod and the Romans arbitrarily installed and deposed twenty-eight high priests until A.D. 70.

(b) At the time of Jesus the high priest was the highest representative of the people. He could take over the offering of the sacrifice at any time; he had the first choice of the parts of the sacrifice, the leadership of the priesthood, and the chief seat in the Sanhedrin (→ synedrion, 5284). His greatest task was the absolution of the community on the Day of Atonement.

(c) The esteem of the high-priestly office led to a widespread Jewish expectation of an eschatological high priest alongside the kingly Messiah.

4. Melchizedek, who in Gen. 14:18 is called "king of Salem" and "priest of God Most High," holds a unique place in the biblical record (cf. Ps. 110:4). See further, Melchisedek, 3519.

5. hierōsynē (1 Chr. 29:22; Sir. 45:24; 1 Macc. 2:54) goes back to the basic meaning of priestly office. Josephus and Philo both testify to its high esteem. Josephus himself possessed this office.

6. hierateia is the word used for priesthood in the LXX (e.g., Exod. 29:9; 40:15; Jos. 18:7; 1 Sam. 2:36; Neh. 7:64; 13:29). In Num. 3:10 and 18:1 it denotes the priestly service, but more frequently simply the priestly office. By their investiture and anointing (Exod. 29:9; 40:15), in accord with divine instruction (Num. 25:13; Neh. 13:29; Sir. 45:7), Aaron's descendants have an eternal hierateia.

7. Exod. 19:6 speaks of Israel as "a kingdom of priests." This suggests that all Israelites were to have access to Yahweh and that the nation was to serve as priests for the rest of the world. The LXX translates this phrase by basileion hierateuma ("kingly priesthood") and stresses that Israel is called from among the nations to priestly service for God (cf. Isa. 61:6).

NT 1. In the NT hiereus refers mainly to the Levitical priests; in Heb. also to Christ and in Rev. to Christians. The word occurs 31x.

(a) Jesus had strikingly few dealings with the priesthood. When he sent healed lepers to the priests for confirmation of their healing (Matt. 8:4; Mk. 1:14; Lk. 5:14; 17:14), he was respecting their authority and acting in accordance with the law (cf. Lev. 13:49; 14:2–3). Lk. 10:31 is reminiscent of the prophetic critique of a merely external cult. In Matt. 12:1–8 (also Mk. 2:23–28; Lk. 6:1–5), Jesus declared his freedom over against cultic precepts. In the light of Lev. 24:9; Num. 28:9–10; Deut. 23:25; 1 Sam. 21:1–6; Hos. 6:6, not only was plucking grain on the Sabbath permitted, but Jesus as the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath.

Only in Lk. 1:5, 8; Acts 6:7 are priests found in a positive relationship to the salvation event. In Zechariah the priesthood is taken into the service of the immediate preparations for salvation through the promised Messiah. Lk. 1:8 provides the only NT instance of hierateuō. The addition of a large number of priests from the lower classes to the Jerusalem congregation (Acts 6:7) does not appear incredible in view of the social contrast with the priestly aristocracy.

(b) In Rev. 1:6 and 5:10 (cf. 20:6) Christians are called "a kingdom and priests" and thus have been picked out from humanity for the service of God. The promise of Exod. 19:6 is thus fulfilled, but the new order knows no temple, since God himself is now the temple (21:22).

(c) The thought of Exod. 19:6 is also taken up in 1 Pet. 2:9: "But you are a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people belonging to God, that you may declare the praises of him who called you out of darkness into his wonderful light." This concept of priesthood embraces the idea of access to God in intimate knowledge and the prophetic role of priesthood in proclaiming the knowledge of God. It complements Peter's earlier idea of offering spiritual sacrifices: "You also, like living stones, are being built into a spiritual house to be a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (2:5). In both cases the priesthood of all believers is seen to supersede that of the Jewish priesthood. This is, in fact, the concept of Exod. 19:6.

(d) In Rom. 15:16 Paul describes his gracious calling "to be a minister [leitourgos] of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles with the priestly duty [hierourgeō] of proclaiming the gospel of God, so that the Gentiles might become an offering acceptable to God, sanctified by the Holy Spirit." The context suggests that this letter itself is a summary of Paul's priestly ministry (cf. 15:15). God's saving purpose is for both the Jewish nation and Gentiles. Salvation is grounded on grace received by faith (chs. 1–8), and Jew and Gentile are on the same footing. Chs. 9–11 consider God's purposes for the Jewish nation. The idea of the self-offering of the individual's life (12:1) is paralleled by that of the Gentiles. Just as the OT priest presented the sacrifice to Yahweh, so Paul, as the apostle to the Gentiles (cf. 1:5; also Acts 9:15; 22:21; 26:17–18; Gal. 2:8–9), is the one who has the special task of bringing them to God.

This offering, which would otherwise be unclean, is made acceptable by the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom. 15:16 with 8:2–27). In the background of Paul's thought may be Isa. 66:20, where the Diaspora Jews are an offering that the Gentiles will bring to Jerusalem, though here the roles are reversed. A similar concept is recorded in Phil. 2:17. Paul is in prison and awaiting possible execution (cf. 1:12–14, 17–26) and can envisage his own death as an offering for the sake of the church: "Even if I am being poured out like a drink offering on the sacrifice and service coming from your faith, I am glad and rejoice with all of you."

(e) Although the words "priest" and "high priest" do not occur in Jn. 17, Jesus' prayer here is sometimes referred to as his high-priestly prayer. The chapter represents his prayer for his people prior to his arrest and execution. Note 17:19, where Jesus says: "For them I sanctify [hagiazō] myself, that they too may be truly sanctified." The vb. hagiazō was used in the LXX for the sanctifying of priests (e.g., Exod. 28:41; 29:1, 21) and of sacrifices (e.g., 28:38; Num. 18:9; → hagios, holy, 41). The notion of sanctifying through death for the sake of the people may reflect the Day of Atonement ritual carried out by the high priest (Lev. 16).

2. archiereus occurs only in the Gospels (83x), Acts (22x), and Heb. (17x). In the Gospels and Acts it refers to the chief priests opposed to Jesus; in Heb. it has a Christological and soteriological significance, for Jesus is depicted as the true high priest.

(a) In the Gospels and Acts the high priest is mentioned as the president of the Sanhedrin in the trials of Jesus and his followers (e.g., Matt. 26:62; Acts 5:21, 27; 23:1–5). Often the pl. "chief priests" occurs, denoting the holders of the higher priestly offices (e.g., Matt. 21:45–46; Jn. 12:10; Acts 5:24; 25:2). The priestly aristocracy thus appears as a closed group who staged persecutions and condemnations. Their combined act with the "elders" and the "teachers of the law" is interpreted as being ordained by God (e.g., Matt. 16:21; 20:18; → dei, it is necessary, one must, 1256).

Looked at historically, it may well have been Jesus' cleansing of the temple (e.g., Mk. 11:18; Jn. 2:13–17) as an attack on the carefully preserved temple administration of the chief priests that was the decisive factor in their hostility against him. Perhaps too their arrangement with the Romans, who gave them their power, aroused fears that the Romans might take measures against Jesus and his followers on their own account (11:48). Note the prophetic remark of the high priest Caiaphas that one man should die to save the nation (11:50). Jn.'s observation is an ironical comment on what to Caiaphas was sheer political realism: "[Caiaphas] did not say this on his own, but as high priest that year he prophesied that Jesus would die for the Jewish nation, and not only for that nation but also for the scattered children of God, to bring them together and make them one" (11:51–52).

Caiaphas is mentioned in the NT at Matt. 26:3, 57; Lk. 3:2; Jn. 11:49; 18:13–14, 24, 28; Acts 4:6. His successor, according to Josephus, was "Jonathan the son of Ananus," who is commonly identified with the Annas of the NT. According to Jn. 18:13, Caiaphas was the son-in-law of Annas, who had been deposed as high priest in A.D. 15. Lk. dates the public ministry of John the Baptist "during the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas" (3:2). As the head of a powerful family, Annas continued to exert considerable influence, which is evidenced by the fact that he procured appointment to the office for five of his sons.

(b) In Acts 22:30–23:10, during Paul's interrogation before the Sanhedrin, the high priest Ananias commanded that Paul should be struck on the mouth. Paul responded by lashing out at him, calling him a "whitewashed wall." When those who stood by were shocked that Paul would speak that way to a high priest, the apostle apologized (based on Exod. 22:28) and admitted he did not know this man was the high priest. His failure to recognize the high priest is perhaps due to Paul's possible failing eyesight or to a change of high priest since his last visit to Jerusalem. The interrogation broke up in disorder when Paul played off the Pharisees and Sadducees against each other.

Ananias appeared in person to support the renewed charges before Felix at Caesarea five days later (Acts 24:1). This Ananias had been appointed high priest in A.D. 48 but was sent to Rome in A.D. 52 to answer charges of cruelty. He was acquitted by Claudius through the efforts of Herod Agrippa II. An unscrupulous man, Ananias was a typical powerful Sadducee. Because of his collaboration with the Romans he was hated by the nationalists and was murdered at the outbreak of the Jewish war in A.D. 66.

(c) While high-priestly functions are attributed to Christ in the NT outside Heb., such as intercession (Jn. 17:19; Rom. 8:34; 1 Jn. 2:1) and the opening of access to God (Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:18; 1 Pet. 3:18), only Heb. offers a fully developed high-priestly Christology. The author of this NT book interprets the suffering and the present work of Christ as a high-priestly service. Alongside the title archiereus, Christ also, on the basis of Ps. 110:4, bears the title hiereus. But the interest is really focused on the high-priestly rank of Christ. The thought of a high-priestly self-sacrifice, prominent in Heb., is new. The writer develops the concept of the priesthood of Christ as the antitype of the Levitical priesthood, and does so in respect of structure, scriptural basis, bearer, service, place, and time.

(i) Structure. Every high priest, who stands as a representative of humans before God (Heb. 5:1), must be founded on his solidarity with humanity in their susceptibility to sin (5:2) and on divine calling (5:4). Of the duties of the high priest Heb. is interested only in the sacrificial service (5:1; 8:3), and primarily in his double service on the Day of Atonement (2:17; cf. Lev. 16)—the slaughter of the sacrificial animal (Heb. 9:22) and his entry with the sacrificial blood into the Most Holy Place (9:7). The goal of this high-priestly service is to render access to God by blotting out the guilt of one's sins (4:16; 7:18–19, 25; 10:1, 19, 22).

(ii) Scriptural basis. The fact and significance of the priesthood of Christ are grounded on Ps. 110:4 (cf. Heb. 5:6) and Gen. 14:17–24 (Heb. 7:1–10). Following an exegetical tradition of Hel. Jud., Heb. interprets Jesus according to the historical figure of Melchizedek (see also Melchisedek, 3519). This man was not tied to any descent and is therefore seen as eternal (7:3). He is also superior to the Levitical priesthood, since Melchizedek blessed Abraham, the ancestor of the Levites, and received a tithe from him (7:5–10).

All this prefigures the priesthood of the Son who is addressed in Ps. 110 (cf. Heb. 7:3). It is grounded, moreover, on a divine oath (Ps. 110:4), whereas the Levitical priesthood rested on legal ordinance (Heb. 7:11, 20–21). The OT law (7:16), however, can only install men in their weakness as high priests (7:23, 28). God's oath, by contrast, in which resides the "power of an indestructible life" (7:16), entrusts to Jesus the Son of God, who has overcome all weakness, an unalterable priesthood (hierōsynē; 7:24 cf. 5:7–10; 7:28).

(iii) The bearer. The weakness of the Levitical priesthood lies in its sinfulness (Heb. 5:3; 7:27). Although Jesus became a human being in every respect (2:17), he did not sin (4:15; 9:14); only such a high priest can act for us (7:26), for he alone can atone.

(iv) Service. The Levitical priestly service is inadequate, since for an atoning sacrifice it must have recourse to animal blood. This only effects an external purification, not the eradication of the guilt of sin from the conscience (Heb. 9:13–14). On the contrary, it is only the necessity of continually renewed sacrifices that actuates a consciousness of sin (10:1–4). But Christ, through his self-sacrifice, has effected once for all the liberation of the conscience from all sin (9:14, 26) and thus opened the way to God (10:19–22).

(v) Place. The Levitical priestly service is imperfect, since its nature is earthly and it takes place in an earthly sanctuary (Heb. 9:1). According to Exod. 25:40, the tabernacle is the shadowy replica of the heavenly sanctuary, in which Christ officiates as high priest (Heb. 8:2, 5; 9:11, 24). The heavenly sanctuary is perfect, "true," because it is "not a part of this creation" (8:2; 9:11). To that extent not only Christ's entrance into heaven, but also the death he suffered on earth, is heavenly high-priestly service. He is a high priest forever but is first proclaimed as such on the basis of his sacrificial death (5:10).

(vi) Time. The words "covenant" and "promise" (Heb. 8:6–13; 10:16–17) bring a historical moment into the contrast between the earthly, Levitical high priesthood and the heavenly high priesthood of Christ. The latter sets the former aside (7:18–19). Moreover, the unique self-sacrifice of Christ marks the arrival of the end (already prophesied in the OT) of the cult as an atoning institution (10:5–10, 18). Christians know only the sacrifice that is left for humans—that of praise, confession, and service (13:15–16).

(d) The high-priestly Christology of Heb. does not serve speculative but paraenetic interests. Heb. encourages believers in Jesus to hold fast to their confession by giving a new emphasis both to Jesus' historical work and to his present significance at God's right hand. Thus Jesus' death on the cross represents the high-priestly self-sacrifice of the eternal Son of God, surpassing all other sacrifices and valid once and for all. His exaltation is seen as the entrance of the perfect high priest into the heavenly and true sanctuary and as his continual intercession for believers. Christ, therefore, as the eternal and heavenly high priest, now gives to those who hold firm to their confession of him a present guarantee of immediate access to God and a future guarantee of entrance into the lasting heavenly world.

2638 (hierothytos, devoted, sacrificed to a divinity), → 2641.

2639 ἱερόν

ἱερόν (hieron), temple (2639).

CL & OT 1. The expression to hieron is the neut. form of the adj. hieros, holy, used as a noun. In cl. Gk. to hieron and its pl. ta hiera, the holy things, can denote sacrifice; the pl. can also refer to cultic objects. to hieron can mean a consecrated grove, any place of sacrifice, or the inner part of the place of worship, the temenos (→ naos, 3724). Polybius uses to hieron of the Jerusalem temple, and both Jewish and Christian writers frequently use the word for pagan shrines (e.g., Ezek. 27:6; 28:18 LXX of Tyre; 1 Macc. 10:84; 11:4 of Dagon).

2. (a) LXX terminology. In the canonical writings of the OT, the LXX uses to hieron only in Chr. to denote the Jerusalem temple (1 Chr. 9:27; 29:4; 2 Chr. 6:13; cf. also a mistranslation in Ezek. 45:19). However, it does occur in the Apocr. (e.g., 1 Esd. 1:8; 5:44; 8:18, 81; 1 Macc. 15:9; 2 Macc. 2:9; 3 Macc. 3:16; 4 Macc. 4:3). The reason for its general absence from the canonical writings is its associations with idolatry, coupled with the fact that the Heb. OT uses the following more general terms to denote the temple. (i) bayit, the ordinary word for house, can be used for the temple of a god (Dagon, 1 Sam. 5:2) and the house of God (Exod. 23:19; 34:26; Jdg. 18:31; 1 Ki. 6:5; Isa. 2:2; 38:22; Ezek. 41:7–14).

(ii) hêkāl, meaning a great house, is used for a palace (e.g., 2 Ki. 20:18; Isa. 39:7) as well as the temple at Jerusalem (e.g., 1 Ki. 6:3, 5, 33; Ezr. 3:6, 10; Ps. 18:6; Isa. 6:1; Hag. 2:15, 18; Mal. 3:1). Note too the expression "your holy temple" (Ps. 5:7; Jon. 2:4) and "his holy temple" (Ps. 11:4; Mic. 1:2; Hab. 2:20), which uses this word.

(iii) qōdeš, meaning holiness, can mean the Holy Place, esp. in the tabernacle or tent of meeting (e.g., Exod. 26:33; 28:29, 35, 43; Lev. 4:6; 16:23; Num. 4:12). The Holy Place of the temple corresponds to that in the tabernacle (1 Ki. 8:8, 10; Ezek. 41:21, 23; Dan. 8:13; 9:26). In some passages this expression may stand for the temple as a whole.

(iv) The related word miqdāš means sacred place, sanctuary: e.g., in Moab (Isa. 16:12), Bethel (Amos 7:9, 13), Jerusalem (Lam. 1:10); it can also designate the tabernacle (Exod. 25:8) or the temple (Ezek. 45:3–4, 18). In some places this word is qualified (e.g., miqdaš yhwh, "sanctuary of the LORD," Num. 19:20; Jos. 24:26; 1 Chr. 22:19; Ezek. 48:10).

(v) māqôm means place, e.g., God's place (Isa. 26:21; Jer. 7:12; Hos. 5:15; Mic. 1:3), Jerusalem as God's special place (1 Ki. 8:30; 2 Ki. 22:16), Shechem (where God appeared to Abraham, Gen. 12:6), or holy places (28:11, 19; Deut. 12:2; 2 Sam. 7:10).

(b) Background. The OT refers to numerous holy places and shrines before the building of Solomon's temple. The tower of Babel suggests the existence of some form of temple (Gen. 11:4). The patriarchs encountered Yahweh at various places, generally building an altar or pillar to commemorate the occasion (cf. 22:9; 28:22). During Israel's desert period, the tabernacle provided a meeting place for Yahweh and his people (Exod. 33:7–11). Various local shrines were recognized in the period of the judges, such as Shechem (Jos. 8:30–35; 24:1–27) and Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:3). The Canaanite deities had their own temples, such as the house of Dagon (1 Sam. 5:5) and of the Ashtoreths (1 Sam. 31:10).

David was conscious of a discrepancy between his own lifestyle, having built a palace for himself, and provision for the worship of Yahweh (2 Sam. 7:2). Although David had succeeded in consolidating the kingdom, Yahweh told David through Nathan that he did not need a building erected by humans, for he was the one who enabled them to do things. Nevertheless, Yahweh would provide a house (7:13). But since David was a man of blood, he was not permitted to build the temple; this would fall to his son Solomon (7:12–17), though David did collect material and treasure and bought the site for it, the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite (2 Sam. 24:18–25; 1 Chr. 21:25; 22:2–19).

(c) Solomon's temple. The building began in Solomon's fourth year and was completed seven years later (1 Ki. 6–8; 2 Chr. 3–5). The location was in the area now covered by the Moslem shrine known as the Dome of the Rock. Phoenician craftsmen were employed in its building (1 Ki. 5:10, 18; 7:13–14), and it shared architectural features common to Phoenician and Canaanite buildings. There apparently was an inner and outer courtyard (cf. 6:36; 7:12). The bronze altar for burnt offerings stood in the inner court (8:22, 64; 9:25). Between this and the porch was the bronze basin (7:23–26). West of the porch, behind bronze doors, stood the Holy Place, where the ordinary rites were performed. It had latticed windows (6:4) and contained the golden incense altar, the table for the bread of the Presence, the five pairs of lampstands, and the instruments of sacrifice.

The inner sanctuary was a perfect cube of twenty cubits, containing the ark of the covenant. The latter was a receptacle for the Ten Commandments, the manna, and Aaron's rod (Exod. 25:16, 21–22; 40:20; Deut. 10:1–5; 31:9; Jos. 24:26; Heb. 9:4–5). It served as the meeting place where Yahweh revealed his will (Exod. 25:22; 30:36; Lev. 16:2; Jos. 7:6). It was here that the high priest appeared on behalf of the people with the sacrificial blood on the annual Day of Atonement (Lev. 16; → hilaskomai, to reconcile, 2661).

According to Exod. 37:1–9, the ark was made at Sinai by Bezalel according to the pattern given to Moses. It played a crucial part in the crossing of the Jordan (Jos. 3–4), the fall of Jericho (ch. 6), and subsequent history in the conquest of Canaan (Jdg. 2:1; 20:27; 1 Sam. 1:3; 3:3). Its loss to the Philistines signaled the loss of Yahweh's presence in Israel, but it also led to plagues for the Philistines (1 Sam. 4:1–7:2). David brought the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6; cf. 15:24–29). It was placed in Solomon's temple with great ceremony (1 Ki. 8:1–11; cf. 2 Chr. 35:3). Jer. anticipated an age without its presence (3:16). The ark was destroyed with the fall of Jerusalem at the hands of the Babylonians in 587 B.C. and was not replaced in the second temple.

Shishak of Egypt plundered the temple in the reign of Solomon's son, Rehoboam (1 Ki. 14:26), and later kings, including Hezekiah, used its treasure to purchase allies and pay tribute to invaders (15:18; 2 Ki. 16:8). Idolatrous kings introduced the symbols of pagan deities (16:10–18; 21:4; 23:1–12). By the time of Josiah (ca. 640 B.C.) the temple had fallen into considerable disrepair (2 Ki. 22:4–6), and restoration was financed by collecting money from worshipers. Jer. warned against abuse of the temple and false reliance on it as a guarantee of the divine presence (7:4, 11). It was looted and sacked by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Ki. 25:9, 13–17; cf. Dan. 5:2–3, 23), though Israelites continued to offer sacrifices there after its destruction (Jer. 41:5).

(d) Ezekiel's vision of a temple. During the exile the prophet Ezek. received a vision of a new temple (see Ezek. 40–43). Its dimensions are somewhat different from those of Solomon's temple, and the vision includes a description of the surrounding area, with gates fortified to prevent the inclusion of non-Israelites.

(e) The second temple. The returning exiles brought with them the vessels looted by Nebuchadnezzar and authorization from Cyrus of Persia to rebuild the temple (ca. 537 B.C.; cf. Ezra 1; 3:2–3, 8–13). There was no ark. Instead of Solomon's ten lampstands, a seven-branched candelabrum stood in the Holy Place with the table for the bread of the Presence and the incense altar. These were taken as spoil by Antiochus IV Epiphanes (ca. 175–164 B.C.), who set up a pagan altar or statue in its place (1 Macc. 1:54). Some three years later the Maccabees removed the pollution and replaced the temple furniture (4:36–59). They also turned the temple into a fortress, which later in 63 B.C. for three months withstood the siege of Pompey.

(f) Herod's temple. In an attempt to conciliate the Jews, Herod began a massive rebuilding of the temple in 19 B.C. The main structure was finished within ten years, though work went on until A.D. 64 (cf. Jn. 2:20). The temple area was dominated by the fortress of Antonia at the northwest corner, which formed the residence of the procurator and also housed the Roman garrison (cf. Lk. 13:1; Acts 21:31–35). The outer court was surrounded by a portico. Solomon's Colonnade (Jn. 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12) was on the east side. The Jewish teachers of the law held their schools and debates in the colonnades (Mk. 11:27; Lk. 2:46; 19:47), and the merchants and moneychangers had their stalls there as well (Lk. 19:45–46; Jn. 2:14–16).

The inner area was surrounded by a balustrade that separated it from the court of the Gentiles. This inner area contained three courts: the court of women, the court of Israel, and the priests' court, in which stood the altar outside the temple proper (cf. Matt. 23:35). At the Feast of Tabernacles men could enter the latter. The altar was of unhewn stone. The temple was destroyed in the Jewish War in A.D. 70.

NT As the focal point of Jewish religion, the temple figures prominently in the NT, esp. in the light of Jesus' associations with it. It was the place of God's presence, glory, revelation, and meeting with his people. Jesus' actions in connection with the temple had a parabolic character, signifying God's presence with his people for those with eyes to see. Its destruction epitomized God's judgment on the Jewish people for their rejection of him in the person of Jesus. At the same time it signified the end of the old covenant and its supersedure by the new.

1. The infancy narratives in Lk. Lk. 2:22–52 preserves two groups of stories that center on the temple as the focal point of the divine presence. Jesus' parents brought him to the temple to make the customary offering (in their case, the form permitted for the poorest sections of the community, 2:24; cf. Lev. 12:2–8). In so doing, they showed as devout Jews due reverence for the law and respect for the temple. Corresponding to this, Simeon and Anna represent the godly remnant of Israel, who seek Yahweh in the temple and who are thus granted a revelation of his Messiah (Lk. 2:25–38). Note also Lk.'s account of the circumstances attending the birth of John the Baptist (1:5–80). His father, Zechariah, was a priest, and the revelation of God's purposes in giving him a son came as he was burning incense in the temple (1:8–23).

In short, in Lk.'s infancy narratives the temple is the place where the godly remnant of Israel wait on God and where they receive revelations of God's saving purposes—first in the birth of John the Baptist and then in the birth of Jesus.

2. The temple as the scene of Jesus' ministry. (a) Lk. relates as one of Satan's temptations for Jesus to make a spectacular display by casting himself down from the top of the temple (Lk. 4:9–12). This temptation is based on a perverted interpretation of Ps. 91:11–12, which Jesus meets with Deut. 6:16: "Do not put the Lord your God to the test." The fact that Jesus answers the temptation in this manner indicates that he has no need to vindicate his divine vocation in this way. He is conscious of his divine calling, and that is sufficient. He can trust the Father to vindicate him in whatever way the Father chooses.

(b) Throughout Jesus' public ministry, the temple remains to Jesus the focal point of meeting God and worshiping him. The contrasting attitudes of Jud. are epitomized in the temple. For example, both the Pharisee and the tax collector pray in the temple, the former pleading his own righteousness and the latter confessing his need and crying out for mercy (Lk. 18:10–14). A similar contrast in Jewish piety is exhibited in the story of the widow's two small copper coins (Mk. 12:41–44), which Jesus considers worth more than the gifts of the rich. This incident occurs in the last week of Jesus' ministry, which is deliberately set in the temple as the place of revelation and worship; it is immediately followed by Jesus' prophecy of the destruction of the temple, occasioned by the disciples' remark about its "massive stones" and "magnificent buildings" (13:1).

(c) Jesus' messianic entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1–9; Mk. 11:1–10, Lk. 19:28–38; Jn. 12:12–19) leads directly to his entry into the temple and his cleansing of it

(Matt. 21:10–17; Mk. 11:15–19; Lk. 19:45–48; cf. Jn. 2:13–17). Jesus does not go there simply because Jews happen to be gathered there or because he wants to do things openly. This is not merely a prophetic denunciation of commercialism (Mk. 11:17). Rather, Jesus is acting in judgment as God himself would act, driving out the money changers and those who sold animals and birds for sacrifice. It is an attempt to restore the true function of the temple as a house of prayer and place where God will be known. This last point is made clear by the fact that Jesus proceeds to teach daily in the temple (Matt. 26:55; Mk. 14:49, Lk. 22:53). But his action results in the decision of the religious authorities to destroy him. Their counteraction is thus a repudiation of God's summons.

In Jn. the cleansing of the temple is placed at the beginning of his account of Jesus' public ministry. Some have suggested that Jesus cleansed the temple twice. Others, however, argue that Jn.'s placement of the story here represents a thematic ordering of his material rather than a chronological one. It is followed by a discussion of the sign of Jesus' authority—the destruction and raising of the temple of Jesus' body (Jn. 2:18–22), the believing response of some (2:23–25), the discussion on rebirth with Nicodemus (3:1–15), and the teaching on coming to the light so that one's deeds may be seen to have been wrought by God (3:16–21). The cleansing is preceded by the Johannine prologue (1:1–18), the witness of the Baptist (1:19–34), the call of the disciples (1:35–51), and the miracle at Cana (2:1–11), revealing the transforming power of Jesus.

(d) Jesus describes the tabernacle as "the house of God" (Matt. 12:4) in answer to the Pharisees' challenge on the legality of plucking ears of grain on the Sabbath (cf. 1 Sam. 21:2–7; Hos. 6:6). In the course of his reply Matt. records Jesus as saying, "I tell you, something greater than the temple is here" (Matt. 12:6, lit. trans.). This "something" may be the community of the disciples, who with Jesus constitute the corporate Son of Man (12:8). Or it may be the kingdom of God effectively present in the eschatological community or the believing remnant of God's people. Many scholars, however, relate the phrase to Jesus himself as God's new temple (cf. Jn. 2:21).

(e) In his final week of public ministry Jesus also denounces the practice of swearing by, among other things, the temple or any part it (Matt. 23:16–22; cf. 5:33–37). To swear by any part of the temple (which in rab. teaching was less binding than swearing by God himself) is in fact to introduce duplicity into one's dealings. Rather, one's word should be binding, and note that the God who sanctifies the temple also sanctifies its several parts. Therefore, any such oath is tantamount to swearing by God himself.

(f) On the question of the temple tax (Matt. 17:24–27), → statēr, stater (a silver coin worth four drachmas), 5088.

3. The destruction of the temple. In two groups of passages Jesus discusses the coming destruction of the temple. In the first group he refers to the temple of his body (Matt. 26:61; 27:40; Mk. 14:57–58; 15:29–30; Jn. 2:18–22; cf. Acts 6:14). Already Jesus' own person is superseding the material temple as the dwelling place of God, where God and humans meet.

In the second group Jesus prophesies the physical destruction of the Jerusalem temple (Matt. 24:1, 15; Mk. 13:2–3, 14; Lk. 21:5–6, 20). The cause of the destruction is the rejection by the Jewish leaders and the people as a whole of God's summons to them in the person of Jesus. For Jesus' coming to Jerusalem and visitation of the temple has failed to find the response of penitence, faith, and commitment. God's people have rejected him, and the destruction of the temple will be his judgment on them, a symbol of the termination of the divinely appointed covenant relationship. It is anticipated by Jesus' cursing of the fig tree (Matt. 21:18–19; Mk. 11:12–14). The sign will be "the abomination that causes desolation" (Matt. 24:15–22; Mk. 13:14–20; Lk. 21:20–24).

Judas's casting the rejected pieces of silver into the temple (Matt. 27:5) indicates the permanent defilement of the sanctuary by the death of Jesus. The rending of the temple veil on Jesus' death (Matt. 27:51; Mk. 15:38; Lk. 23:45) shows us that access to God is now by Christ's death.

4. The temple in Acts. The death and resurrection of Jesus do not mean a repudiation of the temple or of Israel for the early church. The sermons of Acts addressed to Jews lay the guilt for Jesus' death squarely with the Jewish leadership (cf. Acts 2:23; 3:13–14; 4:10–11; 5:30; 7:52; 10:39; 13:27–29), but they all hold out the invitation to repentance, faith, and a return to God. God has not yet finally rejected his ancient people. Similarly, the temple is still the divinely appointed place of worship, though now in the context of Christian fellowship (2:46; 3:1–10). As late as 22:17 Paul has a revelation of the risen Lord while praying in the temple.

The apostles taught there as Jesus did (5:12, 20–21). As a Jew, Paul respected the rites and customs of the temple, bringing the offering of Nazirite purification (21:26; 24:6, 12, 18; 25:8; 26:21). His attitude is to be understood in the context of his determination to be all things to all people in order to save some (1 Cor. 9:19–23). So long as the temple stood, judgment had not fallen on the nation. Indeed, the early church was essentially Jewish Christian. Only after Peter's vision was the church opened up to Gentile believers (Acts 10). Nevertheless, a note of criticism regarding the temple begins to be heard in Stephen's speech (7:44–50) and indirectly in Paul's Areopagus address (17:24).

5. The temple in the NT letters. Where the Christian community is called the temple of God, the word naos (→ 3724) is used. to hieron occurs only in 1 Cor. 9:13, where Paul uses Deut. 18:1 to claim monetary support for Christian workers on the basis of the OT pattern that those employed in temple service received food for their work. Heb. uses the pl. phrase ta hagia ("the holy things," → hagios, holy, 41) for the sanctuary in connection with its discussion of the Day of Atonement ritual as a type of Christ's priestly work (Heb. 9:24–25; cf. 13:11; Lev. 16). oikos theou, "God's household," occurs in 1 Tim. 3:15 (cf. Heb. 3:6; 10:21; 1 Pet. 4:17).

See also naos, temple, shrine, sanctuary (3724).

2640 (hieroprepēs, befitting a holy person or thing), → 2641.

2641 ἱερός

ἱερός (hieros), holy (2641); ἱεροπρεπής (hieroprepēs), befitting a holy person or thing (2640); ἱεροσυλέω (hierosyleō), rob temples (2644); ἱερόσυλος (hierosylos), temple robber (2645); ἱερόθυτος (hierothytos), devoted, sacrificed to a divinity (2638).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hieros is that which is determined, filled, or consecrated by divine power. In contrast to hagios, holy, hosios, devout, pious, and semnos, revered, august (→ sebō, 4936), all of which contain an ethical element, hieros denotes what is holy in and of itself, quite apart from any ethical judgment. It is not used of the gods themselves, but of what belongs to their sphere, what they have sanctified, and what has been consecrated to them.

Among objects described as holy are the head of Zeus and his bed, the abode of the gods (the snowy regions of Olympus), the scales of Kronos, the bow of Hercules, and the chariot of Achilles. The gods themselves sanctified such things as the light, the air, night and day, the earth, fruitful ground, and cities like Pergamum, Thebes, and Athens. Similarly, people are said to be hieroi because they possess a trait that comes from the gods. For example, kings are hieroi since they received their sovereignty from the gods. From the time of Augustus (63 B.C.–A.D. 14) the Roman emperor was addressed by the title hieros. Not only his person but everything connected with him came to be counted as hieros, because it had been sanctified by the gods.

2. (a) The thought of consecration to the gods leads into the realm of the cultus, which was the decisive general factor in determining the meaning of hieros. Even if everything that is called hieros does not belong directly to the cultus, it nevertheless remains associated with it. For example, when the choruses in the theater are called hieroi, it is because they convey a divine message; noncultic songs consecrated to the gods are hieroi, and the circle in which justice is administered is called hieros. Again, hieros can be used of people, esp. of those who have been initiated into the mysteries.

(b) ta hiera (lit., the holy things) denotes above all the sacrifice, occasionally the sacrificial animal, and the omens that accompanied the sacrifice. However, ta hiera was more typically used for cultic objects (images, vestments, sacred utensils, etc.), actions, and the cultus itself.

(c) to hieron has predominantly the meaning of sanctuary, cultic center (→ 2639).

3. hieroprepēs, befitting the sacred, hierosyleō, rob a temple or commit sacrilege, and their derivatives need no further explanation. hierothytos means devoted, offered to a god, or sacrificed; it is a specifically cultic term. The pl. ta hierothyta means the sacrifice or sacrificial flesh. For hiereus, priest, and archiereus, high priest, chief priest, → hiereus, 2636.

4. In the LXX most of the words in the hieros word group go back to the Heb. kōhēn (in form, the part. of kāhan, to be a priest, serve as priest). hieros did not fit the Jewish concept of holiness prevailing at the time of the trans. of the LXX, because it meant what is holy in and of itself apart from any ethical element, whereas since the exile only what conformed to the Torah could, to the Jewish mind, be holy. Even the temple in Jerusalem was not generally called to hieron until the Apocr. (though cf. 1 Chr. 9:27; 29:4; 2 Chr. 6:13). These words could, however, be used for the priest and his activities (→ hiereus, priest, 2636).

NT 1. Most of the words in the group occur only rarely in the NT. hierothytos (only in 1 Cor. 10:28) is the meat that was slaughtered in the pagan cult. The fact that some Christians continued to eat it, knowing its origin, caused questions of conscience at Corinth, which Paul attempted to resolve by directing the church to the glory of God and concern for others (10:31–11:1).

2. hieroprepēs, befitting a holy person or thing, worthy of reverence (only in Tit. 2:3), corresponds with a preference for the solemn and cultic in the Pastorals. In this verse, the older women in the congregation should conform to propriety in their behavior.

3. hieros, sacred, holy, occurs in 2 Tim. 3:15 in a solemn context of a reference to "the holy Scriptures" (similar to what is found in Philo and Josephus). Although the word was otherwise not popular, it could be used more easily of the Scriptures because they possessed a sacred quality all their own. In a comparison (1 Cor. 9:13) Paul uses ta hiera in its usual sense of sacred actions (NIV, "temple").

4. hierosylos means temple robber, one who commits sacrilege against a temple. In Acts 19:37 Paul and his companions are defended by the town clerk of Ephesus against such a charge. The apostle was accused of teaching that "man-made gods are no gods at all" and therefore of undermining both trade and the temple of Artemis (19:26–27). The related vb., hierosyleō, rob temples (Rom. 2:22), apparently alludes to a problem frequently aired in rab. discussion. To what extent was it permissible to do business in pagan temple utensils and property, although they were ritually unclean? Under certain circumstances such dealings were allowed, if they contributed to the damaging of the pagan cult. Paul seems to be rejecting such devious practices. The verse may also allude to the practice of some Jews of removing gold and silver idols from shrines for private profit.

5. For to hieron, temple (almost without exception, Herod's temple), → 2639. The most important difference between to hieron and naos (→ 3724) is that the former is never spiritualized. It always means the structure with its walls, gates, porticos, courts, and buildings.

See also hagios, holy, sacred (41); hosios, holy, devout, pious (4008).

2642 (Hierosolyma, Jerusalem), → 2647.

2644 (hierosyleō, rob temples), → 2641.

2645 (hierosylos, temple robber), → 2641.

2646 (hierourgeō, perform holy service, act as a priest), → 2636.

2647 Ἱερουσαλήμ

Ἱερουσαλήμ (Ierousalēm), Jerusalem (2647); Ἱεροσόλυμα (Hierosolyma), Jerusalem (2642); Σιών (Siōn), Zion (4994).

CL & OT 1. Ierousalēm and Siōn are proper nouns, unknown in early cl. Gk. The form Hierosolyma was used for the city in the Roman province of Judea and Hierosolymitēs for an inhabitant of Jerusalem. Hel. Jud. took advantage of this rendering of the Heb. name to liken it to Gk. hieros, holy, in order to distinguish the city as the "holy city" of Jud.

2. (a) The Israelites found Jerusalem as the name of a Canaanite city-state of the Jebusites (cf. Jos. 10:1) and took it over. The name means something like "foundation of Salem," i.e., of a god who, according to Ugaritic texts, embodied the twilight. His sanctuary was in this settlement, which originally was situated on the hill Zion. In later history Jerusalem was the name of the whole of the expanding settlement. After David had seized it, the city was also called the City of David. The name of the city in Jdg. 19:10–11 and 1 Chr. 11:4 is Jebus, derived from the proper noun Jebusite.

(b) The etymology of the name Zion (Heb. ṣiyyôn) cannot be explained with certainty. It does derive from Canaan's pre-Israelite period and represents a description of the terrain, a geographical name. From the earliest times Zion was the name of the southeast hill, site of the original Jebusite fortress and of the ancient Canaanite settlement of Jerusalem (Jos. 10; Ezek. 16:2–5).

3. (a) In the OT yᵉrûšālayim occurs 660x and ṣiyyôn 154x. The LXX transcribes the Heb. original as Ierousalēm (fem.), in the Apocr. occasionally as Hierosolyma (neut. pl.). Inhabitants of this city are described in the canonical OT with a noun plus Ierousalēm (e.g., "dwellers in [inhabitants of] Jerusalem" in Isa. 5:3; Zech. 12:10); in the Apocr. we read Hierosolymitēs ("Jerusalemite," e.g., Sir. 50:27; 4 Macc. 4:22; 18:5).

(b) As a neutral city, belonging to neither Judah nor Israel and yet lying exactly between the two territories, Jerusalem was an ideal capital for David. Since he captured it with an army of mercenaries, it remained independent (cf. 2 Sam. 5:6–10). The bringing of the ark of Yahweh into Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6) was a decisive act for the further significance of the city, for it then became the central cultic sanctuary of all Israel. Even after the northern kingdom's break with the south, Jerusalem retained its central theological significance for all Israel (1 Ki. 12:27–28). Yahweh of hosts, who once was enthroned above the ark (2 Sam. 6:2), now "dwells on Mount Zion" (Isa. 8:18), on the "mountain of the LORD's temple" (Isa. 2:2–3; Mic. 4:1–2).

Jerusalem, as the royal capital, became the center of the political kingdom. As "the holy city" (Isa. 48:2; 52:1), it became more and more the focus of theocratic hopes. Both historical experience and theological reflection strengthened the idea of the inviolability and indestructibility of the temple city (cf. 2 Ki. 18–19; 2 Chr. 32; Isa. 36–37; Jer. 7:4). During the exile, it was the embodiment of every longing (Ps. 137). Soon the name of the city was linked with eschatological expectations (Jer. 31:38–40): Jerusalem would become the focus for the whole world, to which all the Gentiles would stream (3:17), and would then be called "a house of prayer for all nations" (Isa. 56:7). In all this complex of ideas Jerusalem and Zion frequently occur together.

(c) When the prophets spoke about the conditions they observed in Jerusalem, however, a different picture emerges. Jerusalem had fallen away from God and become a prostitute. The worship of idols and disregard of God's commands were rife in the city. Hence, they announced God's judgment on the city (e.g., Isa. 32:9–14; Jer. 6:22–30)—judgment that was sure to come because the corrupt people would not turn and repent (4:3–4). Foreign peoples and kings would carry out that judgment, which would result in a cleansed and purified Jerusalem (Isa. 40). It was Yahweh's intention to do good to Jerusalem once again (Zech. 8:15), and at the end of the age the city "will be holy; never again will foreigners invade her" (Joel 3:17).

The eschatological Jerusalem was always conceived, however, as an improved, renewed earthly city, never as supernatural and heavenly. Thus, the nations could go on pilgrimage to it and accept a new way of life (Isa. 2:2–4) by turning to Yahweh (Jer. 3:17). From Jerusalem streams of blessing would pour out into the world (Ezek. 47:1–12). From this holy city Yahweh would reign over the whole world (Isa. 24:23; Jer. 3:17).

4. The name Siōn was at first not used by the Israelites. When the prophets and poets took up the name, they extended or shifted its meaning. On the one hand, Zion together with Jerusalem could be applied to the whole expanded city, and Zion could be equated with Judah (e.g., Ps. 69:35; Jer. 14:19) or even with Israel (Isa. 46:13). On the other hand, Zion was no longer reckoned as the southeast hill but included the northeast hill with its temple buildings (cf. Ps. 2:6; 20:2). Yahweh is God on Zion (99:2; 135:21), and the Lord of hosts lives on Mount Zion (Jer. 8:19).

5. (a) The use of the names in Jud. does not differ from that of the OT. Jerusalem/Zion was the beloved city, toward which one turned one's face during the daily times of prayer (cf. Dan. 6:10). One went there on pilgrimage, whenever possible, at the great festivals (cf. Acts 2:5), and one wanted to die and be buried there. Huge sums of money flowed to Jerusalem from the Diaspora as temple tax.

(b) Eschatological ideas were also formed. Alongside the concept that the earthly city would be the scene of Yahweh's victory (2 Esd. 13:25–38; Sib. Or. 3:663–704) there developed in apocalyptic lit. a belief in the heavenly, preexistent Jerusalem (2 Bar. 4:2–7), which would descend to earth at the end of the age (2 Esd. 10:27, 54; 13:36). The new Zion/Jerusalem will be of unimaginable beauty (Tob. 13:16–17), inhabited by vast multitudes (Sib. Or. 5:251–68) and ruled over by God himself (3:787).

NT 1. In the NT the name Jerusalem occurs 139x. As in the LXX we meet the two forms Ierousalēm (76x) and Hierosolyma (63x). The name Siōn occurs only 7x in the NT, mostly in quotes from the OT (only Heb. 12:22 and Rev. 14:1 use it independently).

2. (a) In the Synoptics and Acts Jerusalem frequently denotes simply the city. However, a theologically significant idea is often linked to this geographical name. To the theocratically minded Jew Jerusalem was God's choice to be the focus of the world. Yahweh, who alone rules, exercised his sovereignty there through two institutions: the priesthood (which performed the sacrifices) and the scribes or rabbis (who knew and expounded the Scriptures). Thus, Jerusalem was "the city of the great King" (Matt. 5:35; cf. Ps. 48:2), where the temple stood, in which the only valid sacrificial service was maintained.

(b) Because Jerusalem had this theocratic significance, it played a decisive role in the events of Jesus' passion. Jesus had to go to Jerusalem in order to fulfill his mission there at the center of the Jewish world (Matt. 16:21; Lk. 9:31, 51). There Jesus confronted the priests as functionaries of the cult (cf. Lk. 19:45–48) and the scribes as keepers of the Mosaic tradition (Matt. 23). It is significant that Jerusalem was the place where Jesus suffered, died, was buried, and rose again. His sacrifice made sense and was effective only in Jerusalem (Mk. 10:33–34). What a paradox that the sacrifice was rejected by the theocratic institutions while being accepted by God.

3. Jerusalem is esp. important in the theology of Lk. He begins and ends his Gospel with activities in Jerusalem and in its temple (Lk. 1:5–25; 24:53); Acts continues in this direction. Jesus' disciples, to whom he appeared after his resurrection, remained at his express command in Jerusalem (Lk. 24:49, 52), waiting for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:4; 2:1–4). In accordance with their commission they proclaimed the divine events to all peoples, beginning from Jerusalem (Lk. 24:47; Acts 5:20–21). The city remained central to God's people. The so-called apostolic council, for example, gathered within its walls (Acts 15:1–33; cf. 21:18).

4. One must mention, however, another concept in the Synoptics that corresponds to the OT prophetic message of Jerusalem as the evil city. It kills God's messengers (Matt. 23:37–39). A prophet is nowhere more in danger than in Jerusalem (Lk. 13:33). The city does not recognize what belongs to its peace (19:42). Its inhabitants have not wanted to be gathered (Matt. 23:37). Therefore, it comes under judgment (Lk. 19:43–44), which will be carried out by means of foreign peoples (21:20). Jerusalem will be destroyed (Matt. 23:38; Lk. 21:24), so that the discerning should weep (Lk. 23:28–31).

This judgment on Jerusalem begins when the temple veil is torn in two (Matt. 27:51) at Jesus' death and the graves outside the city are opened (27:52–53). But something new arises from the ruins. Jesus will return to the destroyed city and be greeted with a cry that welcomes the Messiah (Matt. 23:39, citing Ps. 118:26).

5. (a) In Jn. Jerusalem is not only the scene of the passion but also the place where Jesus reveals his glory, since many deeds and miracles take place there. Jn. alone records that Jesus frequently came from Galilee to Jerusalem (2:13–17; 5:1–2; 7:1–10; 12:12–15).

(b) Paul was born at Tarsus (Acts 21:39; 22:3), but most likely Jerusalem was the scene of his boyhood and upbringing. For him as well, Jerusalem is the center of Christendom, but in a different sense from the Synoptics and Acts. The gospel went out from Jerusalem (Rom. 15:19) and has brought into being a new unity between Gentiles and Jews, the ekklēsia (cf. Eph. 2:14). Paul emphasizes his agreement with the apostolic council in Jerusalem (Gal. 2:1–10). But he does not view this as the highest authority. If he seeks out the apostles (cf. Gal. 1:18–20), it is out of brotherly love and respect; for they preceded him chronologically (1:17–18). But he received his commission and instructions, like the others, from the Lord himself (1:1; 2:2).

Because Gentile Christians have received a share in the spiritual blessings of the original church in Jerusalem, it was natural for Paul that these churches should "share with them [that is, the Jerusalem church] their material blessings" in the form of financial help (Rom. 15:27). We should view Paul's collection as the legitimization of the Gentile Christian churches toward Jerusalem and the external documentation of the interdependence of Gentile Christianity and the original Jerusalem church (cf. also 2 Cor. 8:14–15; 9:12).

(c) Rev. describes Jerusalem (without mention of the name) as the historical scene of the passion (11:8), itself involved in the events of the end. As the wicked city ("which is figuratively called Sodom and Egypt," 11:8), it will be trampled on, while the temple and those who worship in it will be saved (11:1–12; cf. Lk. 21:24). In Rev. 14:1 the OT name for the temple hill, Mount Zion, occurs.

6. Apart from the topographical uses of the name indicated so far, there also occurs in the NT the idea of the heavenly Jerusalem. (a) In Gal. 4:26 Paul speaks of "Jerusalem that is above," which, according to an allegorical interpretation, is the free woman who gave birth to believers. In Jewish apocalyptic tradition heavenly Jerusalem was the preexistent place where God's glory was always present. For Paul it was also the place of freedom from the law. This "Jerusalem that is above" forms a sharp contrast to "the present city of Jerusalem," which is called the mother of unbelievers (4:25).

(b) Heb. 12:22 speaks of "the heavenly Jerusalem," within which Mount Zion is situated. This is the place to which believers have come through their relationship with Jesus and the new covenant.

(c) In Rev. 3:12; 21:2 the "new Jerusalem" is described as a heavenly city. At the end of the age it will descend from heaven as the bride of the exalted Christ and receive as its citizens all those who have been marked as conquerors (3:12). This beautiful city (21:2, 10–11) is of vast extent (21:12–16), but one thing is absent from it: the temple, "because the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are its temple" (21:22). This view forms a contrast with Jewish expectations in which the temple will mark the focal point of heavenly Jerusalem.

2648 (hierōsynē, priestly office, priesthood), → 2636.

2652 Ἰησοῦς

Ἰησοῦς (Iēsous), Jesus (2652).

OT Iēsous is the Gk. form of the OT Jewish name Yēšûaʿ, arrived at by transcribing the Heb. and adding a nom. -s to facilitate declension. Yēšûaʿ (Joshua) seems to have come into general use about the time of the Babylonian exile in place of the older Yᵉhôšuaʿ. The LXX rendered both the ancient and more recent forms of the name uniformly as Iēsous. Joshua the son of Nun, who was Moses' successor and completed the occupation of the promised land by the tribes of Israel, appears under this name (cf. Exod. 17:8–16; Num. 11:27–29; Deut. 31:3, 7–8, 23; 34:9; book of Joshua). The name means "Yahweh is help" or "Yahweh is salvation" (cf. the vb. yāšaʿ, help, save).

Among Palestinian Jews and also among the Jews of the Diaspora the name Jesus was fairly widely distributed in the pre-Christian period and in the early part of the Christian era. Note Jesus ben Sirach, the author of the book of Sirach in the Apocr. (cf. Sir. 50:27). The name Jesus occurs in the writings of Josephus (1st cent. A.D.) no less that 19x, including "Jesus the so-called Christ" (Ant. 20.9.1). The name also occurs in numerous nonliterary Jewish texts, among them inscriptions on graves and ossuaries from the area of Jerusalem.

NT 1. The NT also shows the name Jesus widely spread among the Jews at the time of Jesus of Nazareth and his disciples. Thus, in Lk.'s genealogy of Jesus (3:29) it is borne by one of his ancestors, without the fact being noted as anything extraordinary. Col. 4:11 mentions a Jewish Christian man named Jesus, who also had a second, non-Semitic name, Justus. Moreover, the OT Joshua appears in the NT as Iēsous (Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8).

Some text traditions of the NT show a tendency to no longer use the name Jesus (e.g., the Western text of Acts 13:6). The motive here is clearly deep reverence for the name Jesus; no one other than Jesus could have the name of "the author and perfecter of our faith" (Heb. 12:2). This reverence led rapidly to the almost general renunciation on the part of Christians of its further secular use.

But it is no less significant that by the end of the 1st cent. Jesus had become uncommon as a personal name among Jews as well. In its place the OT name Yᵉhôšuaᶜ reappeared, with Iasōn as the Gk. equivalent. Talmudic Jud. soon accustomed itself, when it was obliged to name Jesus of Nazareth, to referring to him as Yešû and not as Yēšûaᶜ. Although the reason for this may lie in the purely external fact that the Christians referred to their Lord as Yešû, it is also an expression, not only of Jewish antipathy, but also of how far this name had become unique to the Christians.

2. According to the NT, Jesus' name was determined by heavenly instruction to the father (Matt. 1:21) and the mother (Lk. 1:31). Matt. also gives an interpretation of the name Jesus: to "save his people from their sins." This interpretation is certainly linked with the meaning of the Heb. name Yᵉhôšuaᶜ (see above). In Matt. 1:21, of course, perhaps under the influence of Ps. 130:8, salvation is defined as forgiving the people's sins. What was formerly reserved for God is attributed to Jesus.

The same understanding of the name Jesus and a corresponding testimony probably lies behind Lk. 2:11, where the angel of the Lord on the night of Jesus' birth announced Jesus to the shepherds as sōtēr, Savior (cf. 1:77). In this regard one should not overlook the fact that Lk. particularly emphasizes Jesus as the Savior of sinners (cf. Lk. 15). In these texts, therefore, we have an early Christology, with a similar theological approach as in Phil. 2:9. The name Jesus already contains what is later fulfilled in the title "Lord," applied to the risen and glorified Jesus of Nazareth for the salvation of all humanity.

See also Nazarēnos, Nazarene, from Nazareth (3716); Christos, Christ (5986); Christianos, Christian (5985).

2653 ἱκανός

ἱκανός (hikanos), enough, worthy, able, competent, qualified (2653); ἱκανότης (hikanotēs), ability, competence (2654); ἱκανόω (hikanoō), enable, make sufficient, qualify (2655).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hikanos, found only from the time of the Gk. tragic poets on, conveys the idea of attaining a fixed goal, realizing a set purpose, and means adequate, sufficient, large enough, or numerous enough.

2. (a) In the LXX hikanos generally means sufficient, enough: what craftsmen need for their work (Exod. 36:7); a brother's need of help (Lev. 25:25–28); and what is needed to ward off hunger (Prov. 25:16), to offer a sacrifice (Lev. 5:7), or to bring down divine judgment (Obad. 5). Here then it is no longer a result being assessed as to whether it reaches a given standard; the whole reference is to a person and his or her needs. The sense of the word has shifted from that of obj. measurement (to suffice, be enough) to the personal idea of to need, stand in need of.

(b) It is also striking that the LXX translates the Almighty God not only by the word pantokratōr, but also by ho hikano, the sufficient one. Perhaps this arose because of a misreading of the Heb. word for Almighty (šadday). Note that the Heb. word for sufficiency or need is day and for "who" is sometimes še. If šadday is divided into še and day, it then means "one who is sufficient" (see LXX of Ruth 1:20–21; Job 21:15; 31:2; 40:2 = LXX 39:32; Ezek. 1:24). Yahweh does not have to conform to some external standard or ideal; rather, he himself sets the standard for himself and hence also for his creation.

NT 1. The NT use of the hikanos word group comes largely from the language of Hellenism and Hel. Jud. By far the most instances (27 out of 39x) occur in Lk.'s writings, where hikanos almost always means much, considerable, applied either to time (e.g., Lk. 8:27) or numbers (e.g., Acts 11:24); nothing of theological importance arises here except in the difficult saying of Christ concerning the two swords (Lk. 22:38).

Having originally sent his apostles forth on their preaching mission without any external means of protection (cf. Lk. 22:35), Jesus now urges them to show courage and endurance in the face of trials. The swords of 22:38 are not intended for use, as Lk. 22:49–51 indicates. Rather, the apostles are to have the courage of "sword-bearers," men who are ready to risk their lives for a cause. Since Jesus perceives that this is their intention, he says, "That is enough."

2. Almost all other instances of hikanos in the NT occur in Paul. Taken in connection with Matt. 8:8 and Mk. 1:7, they indicate the development of an early Christian language of confession: I am not worthy, nor is anyone worthy (2 Cor. 2:16; 3:5), to be an apostle (1 Cor. 15:9), to be a minister of the new covenant (2 Cor. 3:6), or to serve Christ (Mk. 1:7). I am not worthy of his presence (Matt. 8:8), which transforms me into his likeness (cf. 1 Cor. 11:1). It is entirely of God's grace that we are able to do anything (2 Cor. 3:5–6; Col. 1:12: hikanotēs and hikanoō).

By contrast, 2 Tim. 2:2 clearly indicates that in the later NT period certain gifts, esp. faithfulness, made some more competent to teach than others. But this in no way obscured the conviction that the Christian's sufficiency is always the gift of God. Paul, who is thoroughly conversant with Gk. usage where hikanos means considerable (e.g., of numbers, 1 Cor. 11:30), follows the LXX in its use of the word to translate Heb. day, need. A Christian's own worth is meaningless when it comes to one's sufficiency before God. Works acceptable to God are not those performed for God, but only those that he himself requires and that the Christian therefore receives from his hand (cf. Exod. 4:10–12).

See also arkeō, be enough, suffice, be adequate (758).

2654 (hikanotēs, ability, competence), → 2653.

2655 (hikanoō, enable, make sufficient, qualify), → 2653.

2656 (hiketēria, supplication), → 1289.

2661 ἱλάσκομαι

ἱλάσκομαι (hilaskomai), propitiate, expiate, conciliate, make gracious, be gracious (2661); ἵλεως (hileōs), gracious, merciful (2664); ἱλασμός (hilasmos), propitiation, propitiatory sacrifice (2662); ἱλαστήριον (hilastērion), that which expiates or propitiates, means of propitiation, atonement cover (2663).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the adj. hileōs originally meant cheerful, joyous; then later, gracious, benevolent. It was chiefly used of rulers or gods. hilaskomai (mid. deponent) has a causative meaning: to make gracious, appease; the aor. pass. hilasthēnai should be translated in an intrans. mid. sense: to let oneself be appeased, to have mercy. The subj. is generally a human and the obj. a deity; the setting is usually a cultic act by which a deity is appeased. If a human is the obj., the vb. means to conciliate or bribe. The noun hilasmos is rare in cl. Gk. and found mainly in late lit. It denotes the action by which a deity is to be propitiated. to hilastērion is the neut. adjectival noun from hilastērios; on Gk. inscriptions it means a propitiatory gift for the gods.

(b) The basic idea behind hilasmos is a human effort to dispose in one's favor the awful and frequently calamitous power of the dead, of demons, and of the gods, and to strengthen one's own power by the assistance of supernatural forces. This presupposes some knowledge of the threat posed to human existence by the envy, punishment, and baseless anger of the all-powerful gods. The propitiation of deities is accomplished by means of cultic acts, including human or animal sacrifice, purificatory rites, prayers, and dances.

In later, more enlightened times the power of the gods lost some of its terror, so that the significance of propitiatory rites diminished. In Stoicism cultic rites are replaced by the moral person, who keeps in line with the will of the deity through ethical behavior.

2. (a) In contrast to cl. Gk. usage, hileōs with eimi or ginomai in the LXX means to be or become gracious, translating primarily the Heb. vb. sālaḥ, to forgive (15x; e.g., 1 Ki. 8:30, 34, 36; 2 Chr. 6:21; Jer. 5:1). hileōs occurs in the LXX only as a predicate of God.

(b) The vb. hilaskomai occurs only 11x in the LXX, always in a mid. or pass. sense and always with Yahweh as subj. It means to have mercy; 7x it translates the Heb. sālaḥ, to forgive (e.g., 2 Ki. 5:18; Ps. 25:11). But in six of these passages there is implicit or explicit mention of divine wrath (Exod. 32:14, cf. 32:11; 2 Ki. 24:3–4; Ps. 78:38; 79:9; Lam. 3:42; Dan. 9:19, Theod., cf. 9:16).

(c) The compound exhilaskomai occurs 105x in the LXX, mostly for the Heb. vb. kipper, to cover, propitiate, atone. Occasionally this vb. has the sense of purify (of objects, e.g., Ezek. 43:20, 22, 26) or entreat favor (e.g., of a person, Zech. 7:2; 8:22; Mal. 1:9). But in most cases the subj. of exhilaskomai is a human (the priest) and the obj. God, and the process is a cultic act. In Sir., sin is the obj. (e.g., 20:28), and the subj. is either God (5:6; 34:19 = LXX 31:19) or a human (3:3, 30; 20:28). In a noncultic sense, Gen. 32:20 and Prov. 16:14 clearly use exhilaskomai in the sense of appeasing anger.

(d) The LXX uses hilasmos (10x) to translate derivatives of the Heb. vb. kipper (piel), to cover over, pacify, propitiate, which describe the process of propitiation (sacrificial propitiation in the cult, e.g., Lev. 25:9; Num. 5:8).

(e) The LXX uses hilastērion 20x for Heb. kappōret, which may be rendered propitiatory or mercy seat, or atonement cover (e.g., Exod. 25:17–22; 31:7; 35:12; Lev. 16:2, 13–15; Num. 7:89). It designates the slab of gold placed on top of the ark of the testimony, on which were two cherubim, whose outstretched wings came together and formed the throne of Yahweh. When the high priest entered the Most Holy Place on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), this holiest place had to be enveloped in a cloud of incense. Then the blood of the sin offering of atonement was sprinkled on and before the hilastērion.

3.(a) Sacrificial rites were widespread throughout the ancient world. In some OT writings the notion of propitiating an angry deity receives emphasis (e.g., 1 Sam. 26:19; cf. also Gen. 8:20–21; 2 Sam. 24:17–25). Yahweh needs to be propitiated because of human sin (cf., e.g., Isa. 43:22–25).

(b) The Israelite concept of propitiation can therefore be understood only against the background of the OT doctrine of sin (→ adikia, 94). An offense (even if unwitting) against Yahweh's covenant laws gives rise to objective guilt (cf. 1 Sam. 14:2–44), which sets in motion a destructive force whose disastrous effects fall of necessity as punishment on the miscreant and his or her affairs. This chain of sin and disaster can be halted only by Yahweh, who diverts the evil effect of a misdeed from the doer to an animal, which dies in his place—the classic example being the ritual of the scapegoat given to Azazel on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:20–22).

In this act, the subject who brings about the atonement is Yahweh. The priests function merely as his representatives in the cultic action (cf. Exod. 28:38; Num. 18:22–23), while the wrongdoer or the sinful people are the recipients of the atonement. According to the OT, life is carried in the blood, and thus blood acts as the means of atonement (Lev. 17:11; cf. 17:14; Gen. 9:4; Deut. 12:23; see below).

4. In discussing reconciliation and atonement scholars have drawn a distinction between propitiation and expiation. In propitiation the action is directed toward God or some other offended person, and the underlying purpose is to change an attitude of wrath into one of favor. In expiation, however, the action is directed toward that which has caused the breakdown in the relationship; the defilement of an offensive act is removed through some act of expiation.

(a) The writers of the OT did not manifest a crude pagan idea of propitiating a capricious and malevolent deity. Nor did they share a common quasi-mechanistic view of life in which the effects of sin could be nullified by resorting to the appropriate rite as an antidote. There is a personal dimension that affected both the offending and the offended parties, which means that, when an offense has to be expiated, the action must be taken because the personal relationship between the parties requires it. That is, expiation has, as it were, the effect of propitiation; the sin that may have brought about God's wrath is expiated.

(b) A closer examination of the significance of blood in the OT further supports the idea of propitiation. Key here is Lev. 17:11: "For the life of a creature is in the blood, and I have given it to you to make atonement for yourselves on the altar; it is the blood that makes atonement for one's life" (cf. the related prohibition in 17:14; also Deut. 12:23). In many OT passages (e.g., Gen. 9:5–6; Num. 35:19; 2 Sam. 23:16–17; Ps. 72:14), blood means death rather than life. As long as the blood circulates in the animal or human being, there is life. When it no longer circulates, death ensues.

Taken in isolation, it is possible to construe certain passages that deal with atonement (e.g., Exod. 30:10; Lev. 16:27; 17:11) as offering the life of the victim. But it is equally possible to understand them as offering the death of the victim, whose life has been taken away. In various passages where atonement is effected by some means other than the cultus, it is the termination of life that brings about the atonement. In the original Passover, for example, the blood of a slain animal was the means of averting destruction (Exod. 12:13); a substitute death had taken place for the death of the firstborn. Note too how Moses sought atonement for the sin of the people by asking Yahweh to blot him out of God's book (Exod. 32:30–32; cf. also Deut. 21:1–9; 2 Sam. 21:3–4).

In the case of sacrifice within the cultus, atonement is effected not simply by offering the blood but by the offering of the whole sacrifice (Ezek. 45:17). Different parts of the slain animal could be associated with atonement: e.g., the head (Lev. 1:4) and the burning of the fat (4:26). In some cases where atonement is spoken of, blood appears to be excluded altogether (e.g., Exod. 29:33; Lev. 10:17–18). In other places atonement is connected with ceremonies like the pouring of oil on the head of a cleansed leper (14:18, 29), the offering of incense (Num. 16:46), and the scapegoat (Lev. 16:10).

In other words, where blood is mentioned in the OT, the thought that is uppermost is not the blood itself but the shedding of the blood, as a symbol of the termination of life; and where blood is linked with sacrifice or atonement, the thought is that of the death of the victim. Such acts are not arbitrary but are required because Yahweh is who he is.

NT In view of the frequent occurrence of cultic terms using this word group in the LXX, it comes as a surprise to find how rarely the NT uses these words. Each of the four terms is used only twice, so that the whole group of words appears only 8x in the NT (3x in Heb.).

1. (a) hileōs appears in Matt. 16:22 as a negative exclamation in Peter's rebuke of Jesus when the latter told him of his impending death at Jerusalem: "Never, Lord! . . . This shall never happen to you!" The Gk. translated "Never, Lord" is hileōs soi, kyrie (lit., "gracious to you, Lord"); the words to be supplied or understood are eiē ho theos (i.e., "may God be"). For biblical parallels see Gen. 43:23; 2 Sam. 20:20; 1 Chr. 11:19.

(b) Heb. 8:12 comes at the end of a quotation from Jer. 31:31–34: "For I will forgive [lit., be gracious to, hileōs] their wickedness and will remember their sins no more." It concludes an argument that the new covenant has been inaugurated by Christ, that this is the covenant foretold by Jer., and therefore that "by calling this covenant 'new,' he had made the first one obsolete" (Heb. 8:13).

2. (a) It is striking that exhilaskomai, the primary vb. in the LXX, does not occur in the NT. The aor. pass. of hilaskomai is used in Lk. 18:13 in the tax collector's prayer in the temple: "God, have mercy on me, a sinner"; the thought is similar to that of Ps. 79:9, where the same vb. is used. It can be rendered as both "be propitious" and "be merciful." The tax collector felt the need for a forgiveness that only God himself could bestow—and he cries out for mercy.

Jesus' rejoinder is contained in Lk. 18:14: "I tell you that this man, rather than the other [the Pharisee], went home justified before God" (on justification, → ikaiosynē, 1466). The Pharisee's attitude in Jesus' parable was not atypical of attitudes within Judaism. In the Talmud one rabbi was said to be confident that his righteousness was sufficient to exempt his whole generation from judgment. If the saved numbered only "a hundred, I and my son are among them; and if only two, they are I and my son" (b. Sukkah 45b). Similarly, in terms of performing acts understood as constituting righteousness, Paul declared himself "as for legalistic righteousness, faultless" (Phil. 3:6). According to Paul, justification is by faith related to the saving act of Christ on the cross (Rom. 3:20–27).

In sum, the parable in Lk. 18:9–14 focuses on two aspects: From a human side, what matters is a heartfelt turning to God, which simply casts oneself on God's mercy; on God's side, human self-righteousness is of no avail, but God has mercy on the ungodly who turn to him for mercy.

(b) Heb. 2:17 takes up the cultic ritual of the Day of Atonement: "For this reason he [Jesus] had to be made like his brothers in every way, in order that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in service to God, and that he might make atonement [hilaskomai] for the sins of the people" (cf. Lev. 16:14–17). Note the NIV footnote here, "and that he might turn aside God's wrath, taking away the sins of the people." Jesus is portrayed as a faithful high priest (cf. 1 Sam. 2:35) who atones for the sins of the people. His death and exaltation are interpreted in terms of the annual Day of Atonement ritual, which is seen as a type of Jesus' reconciling work and which is thus rendered obsolete by the fulfillment that comes with Jesus.

The author here points out that Jesus stands as a high priest in the service of God. While there is no explicit reference to appeasement of an angry deity and God is not said to be the recipient of the atonement, when we look at this passage against the wider background of personal relations with Yahweh in the OT or the more specific background of the Day of Atonement ritual, the reason why guilt has to be dealt with lies in the character of God himself, who is angry with our sins and requires a substitute sacrifice. He is both the provider and the recipient of the reconciliation.

3. The noun hilasmos occurs only in 1 Jn. "He is the atoning sacrifice [hilasmos] for our sins, and not only for ours but also for the sins of the whole world" (2:2). "This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as the atoning sacrifice [hilasmos] for our sins" (4:10). Note again the NIV footnote in both of these verses, that Jesus is "the one who turns aside God's wrath." The decision whether to translate hilasmos by "expiation" (RSV; note that the NRSV uses "atoning sacrifice") or "propitiation" must be decided against the background of the considerations already discussed (see OT section). But as with other OT and NT passages concerning reconciliation, it is not a matter of applying some impersonal antidote. The question at issue is our personal relationship with God and that which hinders this relationship must be dealt with for God's part just as much as for ours (cf. 1 Jn. 1:5–10; 4:7–10, 13–21).

In 1 Jn. 1, the author outlines what it is that makes atonement for our sins—the death of Christ: "But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus, his Son, purifies us from all sin" (1:7). Jesus' death (referred to by the word "blood") is the basis on which we are purified whenever we confess our sins: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just and will forgive us our sins and purify us from all unrighteousness" (1:9). Jn. does not set out the need for a hilasmos. For him it is self-evident in the light of the character of God and the coming judgment (4:17). Note also that atonement is not regarded as something that we do to God, but rather as an expression of God's love for us (4:10).

4. (a) In the description of the ark of the covenant located in the Most Holy Place of the tabernacle, Heb. 9:1–5 calls the top of it the hilastērion, i.e., "the atonement cover" or "the mercy seat" (Heb. 9:5a; cf. Exod. 25:18–22; 37:7–9). This, as noted above, is the word used in the LXX.

(b) The interpretation of Rom. 3:25 has been the subject of significant debate. It stands at the center of Paul's statement of God's righteousness in the face of human sin. Gentiles stand condemned apart from the law (1:18–32; cf. 2:12); Jews are condemned by the law (2:1–3:20). "But now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known, to which the Law and the Prophets testify. This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe. There is no difference, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement [hilastērion], through faith in his blood" (3:21–25).

What does hilastērion mean here? In spite of objections, it seems best to relate this to the Day of Atonement ritual as described in Lev. 16. Paul is suggesting here that what the atonement cover meant for the removal of sins in the OT ritual, Christ is the new covenant equivalent, the antitype of the OT type. In other words, Christ now occupies the place that the hilastērion occupied in the OT—the central place where atonement occurs that restores the relationship between God and his people.

We must not forget that the overall context for Rom. 3:21–25 is 1:18–3:20, which begins: "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness" (1:18). Somewhere, somehow, that wrath needs to be propitiated, and the apostle affirms that it is through the "atoning sacrifice" of Christ that this indeed takes place. In sum, therefore, Jesus Christ is the person whom God has set forth or "presented" as a propitiatory sacrifice, and we can receive the benefits of that sacrifice through faith in the atoning power of his blood.

See also apokatastasis, restoration (640); katallassō, reconcile (2904).

2662 (hilasmos, propitiation, propitiatory sacrifice), → 2661.

2663 (hilastērion, that which expiates or propitiates, atonement cover), → 2661.

2664 (hileōs, gracious, merciful), → 2661.

2668 ἱμάτιον

ἱμάτιον (himation), garment (2668).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. himation (technically a diminutive of heima) means garment, article of clothing.

2. (a) In the LXX himation means both the outer garment and clothes as a whole. Clothes were often torn as a mark of sorrow (Jdg. 11:35). Because of what happens to clothing, it is easy to see that a garment can become a symbol of the transient (Isa. 50:9; 51:6, 8) as well as of God's salvation and protection (61:10; cf. Gen. 3:21).

(b) In the rab. writings clothing is used as a metaphor for repentance, the fulfilling of the commandments, good works, and the study of the Torah, which one wraps oneself in as a garment or armor. In 1 Enoch the garment is used as a symbol of salvation.

NT himation is used 60x in the NT. It is used lit. for clothing in general (cf. Matt. 27:31; Acts 9:39), and more esp. for the outer garment (cf. Matt. 9:20–21; Jn. 19:2). It is also used fig. or parabolically (Mk. 2:21; Heb. 1:11; cf. Matt. 22:11–12, endyma).

1. Sometimes what was done with clothes gave a special emphasis to what was being said. (a) People tore their garments as a sign of sorrow when they heard blasphemy (Matt. 26:65; Acts 14:14). Paul shook out his garments (18:6; cf. Neh. 5:13) to show that he no longer felt any responsibility for the hardened Jews of Corinth.

(b) In Mk. 11:7–8 the multitude used their garments as a saddle on the donkey and a carpet on the road of the divine rider in Jesus' triumphal entry. By this symbolic action Jesus was proclaimed king at his entry into Jerusalem. Jesus' kingship was mocked by the purple robe that the soldiers put on him (Jn. 19:2, 5).

2. (a) In Mk. 2:21–22 par., himation stands for the radical newness of Jesus' kingdom. The new cloth could not be used to patch old rags (the old way of life). In Heb. 1:11 (quoting Ps. 102:26), himation denotes the universe.

(b) The garment (endyma) is the symbol of the righteousness promised by God (Matt. 22:11–12). In the parable of the marriage feast, the wedding garment is a metaphor for forgiveness and the promised righteousness (cf. Isa. 61:10). Being clothed with this garment is thus a symbol of belonging to the community of the redeemed. In Rev. this eschatological dress takes the form of white garments (3:4, 5, 18) that are washed in the blood of the Lamb (7:14). White (→ leukos, 3328) denotes purity.

See also gymnos, naked (1218); dynō, set, dress (1544).

2674 Ἰορδάνης

Ἰορδάνης (Iordanēs), the river Jordan (2674).

OT This was the Gk. name for the river that descended from Lake Huleh through the deepest valley depression on earth and ended in the Dead Sea. It was the principal river of Palestine. Of the OT incidents relating to the Jordan, its crossing by the Israelites was the most notable (Jos. 3:16). Its waters were also used in the miraculous healing of Naaman (2 Ki. 5:14).

NT In the NT, the celebrated river was the site of John the Baptist's ministry (Matt. 3:6; Mk. 1:5; Jn. 1:28; 3:26) and the place where Jesus was baptized (Matt. 3:13; Mk. 1:9; Lk. 4:1). Aside from references to Christ exercising his ministry on the far side of the Jordan (Matt. 19:1; Mk. 10:1) and returning on one occasion to the site of John's baptism spot (Jn. 10:40), there is no other NT passage that significantly involves the Jordan.

See also thalassa, sea, lake (2498); pēgē, spring, source (4380); hydōr, water (5623); kataklysmos, a deluge, flood (2886); limnē, lake (3349).

2675 ἰός

ἰός (ios), poison (2675).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. ios is used of a variety of poisons, esp. the poison of snakes. It is used also for rust on iron and for other chemical deposits, such as the patina on bronze statues. In the LXX ios means rust (Ezek. 24:6, 11–12) and poison (Ps. 140:3). It also occurs in Prov. 23:32 and Lam. 3:13, where it means an arrow.

NT In Rom. 3 Paul is concerned with the universality of sin. Quoting from Ps. 140:3 he writes, "the poison of vipers is on [sinners'] lips" (3:13). In his catena of quotations (3:10–18) Paul lays emphasis on the deadliness of wicked speech, referring to the throat, the tongue, the lips, and the mouth (feet and eyes are also mentioned).

James likewise finds "poison" an apt word for the untamed tongue, which is capable of all sorts of evil. The harm it causes makes it like "deadly poison" (Jas. 3:8). James uses the same word when he castigates the rich for their corroded gold and silver and sees the "corrosion" as something that will in due course eat them up (5:3). Gold and silver, of course, do not corrode, but James is speaking metaphorically, expressing forcefully the view that the treasures of the rich are tarnished and tainted.

2676 (Iouda, Judah), → 2677.

2677 Ἰουδαία

Ἰουδαία (Ioudaia), Judea (2677); Ἰουδά (Iouda), Judah (2676); Ἰούδας (Ioudas), Judah, Judas, Jude (2683).

OT 1. Iouda, Judah, and Ioudaia, Judea (both for the Heb. yᵉhûdâ), occur as geographical terms for the mountainous desert region south of Jerusalem (Jos. 20:7; 21:11; Jdg. 1:16; Ps. 63:1). The tribe that settled there bore the name of Judah, the fourth son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:35). The precise etymology is uncertain, though Gen. 29:35 suggests a link with yādâ, praise, in Leah's remark on the birth of her son, "'This time I will praise the LORD.' So she named him Judah."

2. The patriarch Judah seems to have held great influence among his brothers, as evidenced by their acquiescence to his wish that Joseph be sent to Egypt (Gen. 37:26–27) and by his acting as spokesman for them in Egypt (43:3–10; 44:16–34).

Judah figures prominently in the blessing of Jacob, where he was promised a position of honor among his brothers as well as the prospect of sovereignty and dominion to be realized in a future king (49:10). The name Judah continued as the name of the tribe of which this son of Jacob was the progenitor.

3. The territory occupied by the tribe of Judah consisted mainly of the highland country in the area of Canaan westward from the Dead Sea. The territory extended to the Mediterranean Sea and was bounded on the north by the tribal territories of Benjamin and Dan. The Negev formed the southern boundary.

David, Israel's greatest king, came from the tribe of Judah. When the division of the united monarchy occurred, the southern kingdom became known as the kingdom of Judah, though elements in the tribe of Benjamin remained loyal to the house of David as well.

The kingdom of Judah's history was characterized by internal and external difficulties. Not all her kings were wise, though several made positive contributions to her welfare. During the reign of Uzziah (767–739 B.C.), the fortunes of Judah as well as of Israel were greatly enhanced by the quiescence of Assyria on the world scene. This period of affluence, however, belied an internal sickness, for the covenant stipulations were being violated, leading to societal wrongs that the 8th-cent. prophets warned would lead to her downfall.

Under Hezekiah (716–686 B.C.) a serious Assyrian incursion and siege of Jerusalem came to an end with the withdrawal of the Assyrian forces. While Hezekiah's foreign policy was, at times, unwise (Isa. 30:15), his contribution to the kingdom of Judah was generally commendable. Following Hezekiah's reign the fortunes of Judah began to suffer again. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, extracted tribute from Judah for some time after his rise to power in 605 B.C. After several rebellions against Babylon, successive attacks ultimately led to the end of Judah as a kingdom in 587 B.C.

NT 1. In Matt. 2:5–6, Iouda occurs in the sense of the territory of Judah (Judea), the place where Bethlehem was located (the quote from Mic. 5:2 determines that Iouda rather than Ioudaia be used). In Lk. 1:39 the virgin Mary heads to a town of Iouda, where Elizabeth lived. Since Lk. invariably uses Ioudaia for the Roman province of Judea, it seems likely that Iouda here is a town now unknown.

Heb. 7:14 makes reference to the descent of Christ from the tribe of Judah, a tribe with no priestly prerogatives. The point is made that the Levitical priesthood was unable to achieve perfection for its adherents, hence the need for another priest. This represents a change in the law (7:12), for Christ did not descend from the tribe of Levi, which, according to the law, was the tribe from which the priests were to be chosen.

In Heb. 8:8 the house of Judah is cited along with the house of Israel to represent the whole nation. The reference here is to the two kingdoms of the divided monarchy and occurs in a quotation from Jer. 31:31–34, where the new covenant is predicted.

In Rev. 5:5 Christ's descent from the tribe of Judah is reflected in the appellation "Lion of the tribe of Judah." In 7:5, the tribe of Judah is cited along with other tribes with whom the group numbering 144,000 is associated.

2. Ioudas occurs as the name of several individuals in the NT. (a) The name is used for the fourth son of Jacob (Matt. 1:2–3; Lk. 3:33–34; see OT, above).

(b) Ioudas was the name of another ancestor of Christ (Lk. 3:30), who was the son of a certain Joseph.

(c) One of the brothers of Jesus was named Judas (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3). This Judas is considered by some to be the author of the NT letter of Jude (Jude 1:1). Most scholars think that this Judas was a child of Mary and Joseph, although a few scholars suggest he was the son of Joseph from a previous marriage or else a cousin of Jesus (taking adelphos, brother, in the general sense of relative).

(d) Judas son of James was one of the twelve apostles (Lk. 6:16; Acts 1:13). He was one of the group who engaged in prayer in the upper room after Jesus' ascension.

(e) The most well-known Judas is Judas Iscariot, who betrayed Jesus (Matt. 10:4; Mk. 3:19; Lk. 6:16). The meaning of Iscariot is not clear. It may have been a Hellenization of the Heb. "man of Qerioth." His betrayal of Jesus was decisively carried out after Jesus said to him, "What you are about to do, do quickly" (Jn. 13:26–30). After an unsuccessful effort to atone for his wrong by returning the money paid him for his treachery, Judas hanged himself (Matt. 27:5).

(f) A certain Judas, surnamed "the Galilean," participated in an insurrection during a tax census under Quirinius (Acts 5:37).

(g) Judas of Damascus gave Saul of Tarsus lodging after the latter's vision on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:11). It was there that Ananias was to go to find Saul.

(h) Judas Barsabbas was chosen by the Jerusalem council along with Silas to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch (Acts 15:22) to substantiate the council's decision.

See also Israēl, Israel (2702); Iakōb, Jacob (2609).

2680 (Ioudaïkōs, Jewish), → 2702.

2681 (Ioudaios, Jew), → 2702.

2682 (Ioudaïsmos, Judaism), → 2702.

2683 (Ioudas, Judah, Judas, Jude), → 2677.

2692 (iris, rainbow), → 847.

2693 Ἰσαάκ — Ἰσαάκ (Isaak), Isaac (2693).

OT The son of Abraham's old age, whose name means "he laughs" (Gen. 17:17–19; 18:12–15; 21:6, 9). Isaac is a less colorful individual than the other patriarchs, but he has an important place as the child of promise in the theological development of the tradition. His birth (21:1–7) is the first step toward the fulfillment of the promise of 12:1–3 and a refutation of the human impatience that produced Ishmael.

The questions of faith in the promise and obedience to the God of the promise underlie the challenge of the sacrifice of Isaac (Gen. 22:1–19). The remaining Isaac narratives trace the next steps in the development of the promise—the marriage to Rebekah (24:62–67) and the births of Esau and Jacob (25:19–28). His success is viewed as a mark of God's special blessing (26:12–13, 29). In Amos 7:9, 16, Isaac is a synonym for the nation Israel.

NT In the NT Isaac occurs in genealogies (Matt. 1:2; Lk. 3:34) and in formal conjunction with other patriarchs (Matt. 8:11; 22:32; Mk. 12:26; Lk. 13:28; 20:37; Acts 3:13; 7:8, 32). Like Sarah he figures in the Pauline argument for the freedom of God's electing purpose (Rom. 9:7, 10), and like Hagar in the allegorical proof that Christians are the children of promise (Gal. 4:28). The letter to the Heb. follows the theological pattern of the Genesis traditions, seeing Isaac as heir to the promise (11:9), the testing ground for Abraham's faith (11:17–18), and the one who handed on the blessings of the promise to the next generation (11:20). Jas. uses the sacrifice of Isaac to demonstrate the necessity of works (obedience) as well as faith (belief) (2:21). The tendency to see in the sacrifice of Isaac a type of Christ's death is a feature of later Christian interpretation.

See also Abraam, Abraham (11); Sarra, Sarah (4925); Hagar, Hagar (29).

2694 (isangelos, like an angel), → 34.

2698 ἴσος

ἴσος (isos), equal, corresponding to (2698); ἰσότης (isotēs), equality, fairness (2699); ἰσότιμος (isotimos), of equal value (2700); ἰσόψυχος (isopsychos), of like soul or mind (2701).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. isos and isotēs in their earliest stage expressed a fundamental rule in the sharing of the booty of war, that there was not only an equality of quantity but also an equality of value of the objects divided up. From this, these two words came to denote numerical and physical equality (e.g., of number, value), substantial equality (e.g., of the copy with its original), and political and legal equality (e.g., Gk. democracy rested on the principle that all citizens possessed equal standing in society and enjoyed equal political and legal rights). By extension, isos became the expression for impartiality and meant essentially the same as dikaios, just.

(b) Behind the idea of legal equality and fairness lay fundamental philosophical convictions about the essential equality of all human beings. In Stoic ethics the thought of the homogeneity of humanity led to the leveling out of the natural differences in good or evil thoughts and deeds; good is good and evil is, without distinction, evil.

(c) As a principle of order isotēs meant cosmic harmony, the balancing of all forces. This cosmic principle is reflected in human striving for equality.

(d) This sense of equality, so strongly developed in Gk. intellectual life, led in Hellenism via the veneration of heroes to the doctrine of deification. In Gk. tragedies, for instance, heroes were believed to possess powers like the gods. An ideal of Gk. philosophy was to become as far as possible like god.

2. In the LXX isos and isotēs are infrequent. isos is used for the most part in comparisons such as similes (e.g., Job 5:14; 10:10; Ezek. 40:5–9). The Apocr. sometimes reflects the principle of equality of humanity through isos compounds: e.g., isomoiros, having an equal share (2 Macc. 8:30); isopolitēs, a full citizen with equal rights (3 Macc. 2:30). But there is nothing like the Gk. concept of equality between humans and the gods, because of the fundamental distance between God and his creatures. No mortal, for example, may dare wish to be God's equal (isotheos, 2 Macc. 9:12); not even the heavenly beings may be likened to him (isoō, Ps. 89:6).

3. Rab. Jud., with all its delight in the law and striving after faithfulness, championed the idea that, despite the different standards of fulfillment of the law in this life, in eternity all believers in the Messiah will receive equal rewards as a gift of grace. The Messiah will so lead his people that every member will be equal to all the others (Pss. Sol. 17:41–46).

NT In the NT the adj. isos occurs 8x, isotēs 3x, isotimos only in 2 Pet. 1:1, and isopsychos only in Phil. 2:20.

1. Some uses of isos remain within the framework of cl. Gk. The word marks equality of size (Lk. 6:34; Rev. 21:16) and conversely, at the trial of Jesus, the lack of unanimity in the evidence of the witnesses (Mk. 14:56, 59). In Phil. 2:20 Paul recommends Timothy to the congregation as a fully like-minded (isopsychos) and reliable colleague.

2. (a) The equality among Christians in salvation is experienced as a supernatural act, through one and the same experience of the Spirit, which removes all barriers between Jewish Christians and Gentiles (Acts 11:17; cf. 2 Pet. 1:1, isotimos, "as precious as," lit., "equal in value"). Jesus also notes a removal of differences with regard to the eschatological equality of Christians. All believers will receive the same reward (misthos, 3635) in heaven as a gift of grace, whether they entered the work in the vineyard early or late (Matt. 20:12).

(b) The existing social inequities of the members of the congregation, however, are not denied or simply removed. But the fellowship of poor and rich, of masters and slaves, receives new rules and standards through love as a new regulating principle of life among Christians. Thus masters should treat their slaves justly and with fairness (isotēs; Col. 4:1). They are no longer a possession subject to their master's caprice, but brothers in Christ. This principle of equality took concrete expression in the original community in Jerusalem in relations between the wealthy and the poor (Acts 2:44–45; 4:36–37). With these assumptions Paul appealed to the Corinthians to give of their own surplus to meet the economic lack of the community in Jerusalem, so "that there might be equality" (isotēs, 2 Cor. 8:13–14).

This new attitude of brotherly love means being free to love one's enemy. It surpasses the law of giving in order to get, which even sinners practice when they help one another, "expecting to be repaid in full [isos]" (Lk. 6:34).

(c) Though the word is not used, the apostle Paul makes it plain that the gifts of grace (charismata) are variously divided but have equality of value in Christ (Rom. 12:6–8; 1 Cor. 12:4–30; Eph. 4:16; cf. Matt. 25:14–15). The uniting force is love (1 Cor. 13).

3. Two passages speak of Jesus' equality with God. (a) In Jn. 5:16 Jesus has broken the Sabbath commandment. He defends himself by saying, "My Father is always at his work to this very day, and I, too, am working" (5:17). Thereupon the Jews try to kill him because by calling God his Father, he is "making himself equal with God"(5:18). In their own context they may have a point, but to Jesus, as the obedient Son, he is equal to the Father in the harmony of their will and their working (5:19–44).

(b) The hymn to Christ in Phil. 2:6–11 contains the assertion that Jesus "did not consider equality [isa] with God something to be grasped" (2:6). On the one hand, since this passage deals with historical sequencing in the life of Jesus, we should not treat this phrase in isolation, as if it were an ontological statement about equality with God possessed by the preexistent Jesus. The striking point is that the Preexistent One entered without reserve into the sphere of humanity, death, and historical existence in all its ambiguity. On the other hand, this passage is not just a statement of Jesus' exemplary obedience (2:8) or model humility, but objectively of incarnation from his status as "being in very nature God." Paul's message here involves Jesus' renouncing the glory of divine status and living under the conditions of a fully human existence.

See also homoios, like, of the same nature, similar (3927).

2699 (isotēs, equality, fairness), → 2698.

2700 (isotimos, of equal value), → 2698.

2701 (isopsychos, of like soul or mind), → 2698.

2702 Ἰσραήλ

Ἰσραήλ (Israēl), Israel (2702); Ἰσραηλίτης (Israēlitēs), Israelite (2703); Ἰουδαῖος (Ioudaios), Jew (2681); Ἰουδαϊσμός (Ioudaïsmos), Jew (2682); Ἰουδαϊκῶς (Ioudaïkōs), Jewish (2680); Ἑβραῖος (Hebraios), Hebrew (noun) (1578); Ἑβραΐς (Hebraïs), Hebrew (fem. adj.) (1579).

OT 1. The name "Israel" (Heb. yiśrāʾēl) is formed from the noun ʾēl (God) and a verbal predicate. An explanation of it is given in Gen. 32:28 in the context of the story of Jacob's (→ Iakōb, 2609) wrestling with God: "Your name will no longer be Jacob, but Israel, because you have struggled with God and with men and have overcome" (cf. Hos. 12:4). Hence, the name has been interpreted to mean He who strives with God (the vb. being śārar, to rule, or śārâ, contend, fight). This interpretation is supported by the story. But since elsewhere ʾēl is never the obj. in proper names, but is always the subj., the meaning God strives has also been put forward.

"Israel" thus began in the OT as a personal name (e.g., Gen. 50:2; Exod. 1:1; 1 Chr. 1:34). But it was also used as a tribal and national name: "the Israelites [lit., the sons of Israel]" (Lev. 1:2; Jdg. 2:4), "the house of Israel" (Exod. 40:38; 1 Sam. 7:2; Isa. 46:3), and a term specifically applied to the northern kingdom (1 Ki. 12:21; Hos. 5:1; Amos 5:1; Mic. 1:5), though it was also used as a title of honor for the southern kingdom (Isa. 5:7; Jer. 10:1). The earliest external reference to the Israelites outside the OT occurs in an inscription on a pillar set up by Merneptah, king of Egypt, ca. 1220 B.C., to celebrate his victories. In it he boasts: "Israel lies desolate; its seed is no more."

"Hebrew" (Heb. ʿibrî; Gk. Hebraios) is an old word of uncertain meaning. Many scholars link this word with the Habiru, a people frequently mentioned in Babylonian, Ugaritic, and Egyptian texts of the mid-2d cent. There it seems to denote people of equal social standing who, not having a permanent home or possessions, entered the service of the settled population on a contractual basis (cf. 1 Sam. 14:21). In closely knit groups, the Habiru penetrated the arable land. The native Canaanites perhaps called them the ʿēber people, because they had come from ʿēber, from the (land) beyond (e.g., Gen. 14:13). Hence, the word "Hebrew" was sometimes used by other peoples in a derogatory manner, sometimes by Israel in dealings with foreigners in a self-deprecating manner (Gen. 40:15; 43:32; Exod. 1:15–19; 2:11–13; 3:18; 1 Sam. 4:6, 9; 13:3, 19; 29:3).

2. (a) After the twelve tribes of Israel occupied the promised land, a common religious center was set up at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:3; 4:3–4). During the time of the judges, each tribe was responsible for defending its own territory. The pressure exerted by the Philistines made Israel desire a common defense under a single leader. Saul, having been installed as king (1 Sam. 9–12), demanded military service and united the tribes politically. This double basis in religion and politics set up a tension that was to run throughout and determine Israel's history.

After David's united kingdom was split following the death of Solomon, Israel (also called Ephraim, after the younger of Joseph's two sons [Gen. 41:50–52])—a term applied only to the northern kingdom—exercised autonomy in religion and politics for a good 200 years. The God of Israel was worshiped at the sanctuaries of Bethel and Dan. In 733 and 722 B.C. Assyria defeated Israel (cf. 2 Ki. 15–17). As the result of deportations and the mingling of the remainder of the inhabitants with newly settled people (which had the express intention of producing a cultural and religious syncretism), there arose the Assyrian province of Samaria (→ samaritēs, 4901).

Judah, the southern kingdom, survived the northern kingdom by about one and a half centuries, partly no doubt on account of its dynastic basis and its more skillful politics. Under Babylonian overlordship, things ended up better for Judah than they did for the northern kingdom under Assyria. Thus, under the Persians the exile of Judah could be reversed.

The southern kingdom also received important theological support. Isa. glorified the Davidic dynasty in Zion. By taking over the name Israel and all its traditional associations for the southern kingdom after the fall of the northern kingdom (cf. Isa. 24–28), Isa. defined theological hopes in accordance with actual political circumstances. The sphere of salvation was narrowed down to the remnant, Judah/Israel.

By contrast, Jer. retained the name Israel for the northern kingdom, though it had been destroyed a century earlier. Without prejudice to Josiah's attempt to restore the state of Israel (2 Ki. 23), Jer. proclaimed that the old Israel was finished. But God would one day recreate from it his people. They would be a community that would once again be stateless (cf. Jer. 3:11–18; 31; 37:7–11). On the pattern of the time of Moses, God would draw up a new covenant with them, this time writing the commandments in their hearts (31:31–34). These hopes for Israel meant, however, that Jeremiah had to announce judgment and destruction for the state of Judah, which he loved and for which he pleaded before God (Jer. 14–19).

(b) God's relationship to Israel is expressed in a variety of metaphors: He is father, king, savior, guardian, refuge, and comforter. Correspondingly, Israel is a son, bride, wife, possession, vineyard, and vine. These mostly personal terms indicate a relationship of partnership. God lets his beloved son know both what he does for him and what he requires of him (Deut. 10:12; Mic. 6:8). Through such instruction, Israel became a unique people (Num. 23:9), distinguished and separated from all others (Deut. 4:5–10). In the holy land of Israel this holy people was to live for the holy God in holiness (Lev. 11:44–45; 19:2; 20:26). Israel's election was at the same time a commission. Although the least significant of the peoples (Deut. 7:7), Israel still had to be for the nations a prince and a light, a witness to God by his very existence (Isa. 43:8–12).

Israel continually ran the risk of falling back into Canaanite cults and of wanting to be like the other peoples. This meant that the relationship of trust could be damaged from the human side, but not destroyed, for the covenant with Israel remained irrevocable for God's sake. To make this fact certain beyond all doubt, use was made of concepts taken from the realm of law: God would not abandon his legal claim on Israel (Amos 9:1–15), nor would he publish a bill of divorce (Isa. 50:1). Lest his name be blasphemed among the heathen for faithlessness, God remained true to the oath he had sworn to the fathers (Ezek. 20:9, 14, 22; cf. Deut. 7:8). Even judgment was a sign of his faithfulness.

Israel was warned, threatened, and comforted through God's servants the prophets of Israel (Ezek. 38:17). But in all this we encounter only different forms of the same invitation to repentance. God's own faithfulness to the covenant made it possible for Israel to be purified and the covenant relationship renewed. The hope of the restoration of the whole of Israel did not rest on Israel's righteousness but on God's love to the fathers (Exod. 32:11–14; Deut. 9:5), and on his freedom that chose Israel contrary to all expectations (Ezek. 16:59–63).

(c) Shortly after the return of the exiles from Babylon, the prophets announced a turning point in the coming of salvation (cf. Hag. 2:20–23; Zech. 6:9–15). But three generations later Ezra and Nehemiah saw in these semipolitical dreams a danger to Israel's continued existence. The latter left to the Persians the management of political relations and concentrated on the internal building up of the covenant community in Jer.'s sense, using Holy Scripture as a basis. What had hitherto been the privilege of the priests now became a common possession (cf. Neh. 8).

(d) The rest of Israel's history has been a continual struggle to retain its identity both politically and culturally. Religiously, it seemed able to remain separate, primarily through its synagogues, its adherence to the Hebrew Scriptures, and its observance of unique laws, such as circumcision, food restrictions, and keeping the Sabbath. Politically the people of Israel had a succession of overlords, from Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.) to the Seleucids and Ptolemies, the Romans (see NT section), Arabs, Crusaders, Turks, and British—with only occasional moments of independence, such as with the Maccabees and Simon Bar Kokhba. Yet even under the most difficult conditions, remnant Jewish communities repeatedly migrated back. In 1948, after the horrific treatment of Jews during World War II and with the approval of world public opinion, there arose once again a state with the ancient name of Israel.

NT The intertestamental period and NT era witnessed an intense struggle over the identity of the true Israel in the face of foreign rule, competing groups within Jud., and the emergence of the church. Despite the many strata within it, Jud. was a relatively unified whole compared with the other peoples. As bearers of God's revelation in the struggle against the heathen, even the early followers of Jesus recognized themselves as belonging to Israel. Hence, the rise of the Christian church must be seen against the background of the competing groups within Jud. that were concerned with the identity and destiny of Israel.

1. Israel in the context of foreign rule. (a) In the Hel. environment, with its striving for cultural unity, it was possible for Jews to take over not only the Gk. language but also many Hel. manners, as long as they were not connected with a pagan cult and thus incompatible with Jewish religious principles. Through mission, which had its theological roots in the universal claim of the one God, who desires the salvation of all the nations (cf. Isa. 41–42; 49), the tension between Israel and the nations was removed by the anticipation of the reunion expected in the end time (cf. 1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:28).

Thus postexilic Jud. became a missionary religion, ready to accept anyone who confessed Israel's God. Success was great, esp. among women (who were not circumcised, only baptized). About one in ten of the inhabitants of the Hel. Mediterranean world was a Jew, not necessarily by birth but by belief.

But this openness, which the nations found attractive in Jud., also gave rise to hatred and persecution. In times of crisis the position of Jews before the law worsened, and enmity led to pogroms (e.g., the persecutions under Trajan, A.D. 115–117). Jews were faced with the choice either of giving up their Jewishness and adopting the pagan gods and the cult of the emperor or of renouncing the privilege of cultural and political equality. As a result, those who remained faithful to their community withdrew into a kind of ghetto existence, involving a separation that was completely religious in character. As the theology of the Talmud shows, Pharisaism, based on Heb. Scripture, made the whole of Israel immune to the damaging influences of Hel. anti-Jewish culture and gave it a self-consciousness that supplied the power to survive as a community for thousands of years amid the hatred and persecution of a hostile environment.

(b) The use of the terms relating to the Jews was determined by these conflicts. The word Hebrew (noun and adj.) was the most neutral. It denoted the language and the script, then also the people who used them. In worship the Bible was read in the Heb. original and then translated into current Aram. in the form of the Targums. Where it is used without any special significance, Heb. frequently means the then-current Aram. (cf. Jn. 5:2; 19:13, 17, 20; 20:16; Acts 21:40; 22:2; 26:14; Rev. 9:11; 16:16).

Since language, education, and the structure of theology are largely determined by the fact of belonging to a particular cultural sphere, the word Hebrew (cf. Acts 6:1) could sometimes acquire an apologetic or polemical tone. Paul emphasized in 2 Cor. 11:22 and Phil. 3:5 his Heb.-speaking origins and affiliations as something positive.

The terms Judah, Jew, Jewish, and Judaism possess a political and sociological coloring. They denote not only the membership of the nation but also the people who turn to Jud. and live according to Jewish customs (cf. Gal. 2:14; Tit. 1:14). To this context belongs the noun first coined by the LXX, Ioudaïsmos, Judaism, as a way of life and faith (Gal. 1:13–14; cf. 2 Macc. 2:21; 8:1; 14:38; 4 Macc. 4:26). This usage was taken over by the Jews themselves, esp. in dealings with foreigners.

In the NT the word Jew is used of individuals and in the pl. of groups, occurring some 195x with almost every shade of meaning (79x are in Acts, 71x in Jn., 26x in Paul, but only 17x in the Synoptic Gospels). It was often used by Gentiles as a contemptuous term, for they did not understand the peculiarity and necessary separation of the Jewish people (Add. Est. 13:12–19). Because Jews did not take part in Gentile cults and social life, they were regarded as godless, haters of foreigners, and even as haters of humanity in general (3 Macc. 3:4–29). Contempt for Jews also resulted in a hatred that worked itself out in bloody persecution.

Intensified by such anti-Jewish attitudes, Jud.'s consciousness of itself as "Israel" developed. This is the most pregnant of the theological concepts consistently used within the community. Israēl occurs 68x in the NT, most often in Paul (17x) and Acts (15x). Israēlitēs occurs 5x in Acts (always as a form of address: 2:22; 3:12; 5:35; 13:16; 21:28), 3x in Paul (Rom. 9:4; 11:1; 2 Cor. 11:22), and once in Jn. (Jn. 1.47). Each time it refers to Jews as members of the people of God. The world was created for Israel's sake (2 Esd. 7:11). Israel is God's possession and his firstborn (Pss. Sol. 18:4). It owes its special character solely to the gift of instruction. God stands by his promises, and he will gather all those who have been scattered. They will possess the land (Matt. 5:5; → klēros, 3102), and all Israel has a share in the world to come.

2. The struggle over Israel within Judaism. (a) During the Hel. period, postexilic Jud. was divided geographically between the homeland and the Diaspora. Parallel with this was the cultural division between Hebrews and Hellenists. Some Diaspora Jews emphasized their connection with the Heb. (or Aram.) language and culture and separated themselves from those Jews who were more open towards Hel. culture (cf. synagogues of the Heb. in Rome and Corinth). But there were also in Jerusalem Jewish groups who in language and perhaps also in customs were those of Hellenists (2 Macc. 4:13; Acts 6:1; 9:29).

Jews who lived in the homeland retained close links with those who lived in the Diaspora. Jerusalem was supported materially by the latter in the form of the temple tax, while it remained a religious focal point with its pilgrim festivals (cf. Acts 2:5–11) and regularly sent out embassies to Jewish communities. Still, there was no common political action, either during the rebellions in Israel or the persecutions in the Diaspora.

From the sociological point of view Israel was divided into several classes: e.g., priests, Levites, Israelites, and proselytes. But because the question of how Israel could continue to exist before God in this period was interpreted in various ways, several groups arose, each of which maintained that it was the true community (e.g., Sadducees, baptists, apocalyptists, Pharisees, and Zealots). Membership in these groups no longer depended on origin but on the decision of an individual to accept a particular doctrinal opinion. The boundaries of the parties were fluid, and it was possible to transfer from one to another. Thus, for example, disciples of John the Baptist transferred their allegiance to the Jesus group (Jn. 1:38–40).

Some of these groups were divided further into subgroups. Thus, within the Pharisees there was a Zealot wing, hostile to foreigners, and a missionary wing, friendly towards Rome. Similar splits arose also among the followers of Jesus (1 Cor. 1:12; 3:4; 2 Cor. 11; Gal. 1–2).

The idea of election, the continued existence of Israel, and the formulation of instruction in purity were hammered out in continuous debate over points of doctrine and constant conflict. The passion with which the struggle for Israel's reality was fought is a sign of the vitality of the prophetic spirit in this period.

(b) The course of this conflict among the Jews was bitter—of a kind that could only come about among brothers disputing a common heritage. The fight had been going on for a long time before the Jesus movement arose and entered the debate.

The methods of polemic were various. Opponents were denounced in forthright language, as can be seen by the NT use of terms such as "hypocrite" (Matt. 23:13) and "brood of vipers" (3:7). Wholesale appeal was made to history, like Paul's comment about the behavior of the Jews, "who killed the Lord Jesus," as typical of their treatment of the prophets (1 Thess. 2:14–15). An opponent's positive points could be assertively transformed into negatives (e.g., the law in Paul, Rom. 4:13–15; Gal 3:10–13; the devil and lies instead of God and truth, Jn. 8:41–44; Rev. 3:9; cf. Paul's interpretation of current Jewish attitudes in the light of the Scriptures in 2 Cor. 3:4–18 and Gal. 4:21–31).

Such polemic had the air of prophetic denunciation: e.g., Israel was stubborn and godless, and God was hiding his face from Israel. In line with this, Paul, missionary to the Gentiles, took up the arguments of the Gentile-Jewish polemic (1 Thess. 2:14–16). We meet the sharpest form of the polemic in Jn., which seems to separate believers entirely from the Jews (see below).

Jewish writing remains so polemical that dangerous misunderstandings were unavoidable, where the different sides were considered in isolation. After the destruction of the temple, feelings were so intense that opposing positions were treated as nonexistent. Thus the Talmud is almost completely silent about its opponents. The last step was legal separation between Jews and Christians through the introduction in the 80s of the petition on heretics into the Eighteen Benedictions: "May the Nazarenes and heretics disappear in a moment; they shall be erased from the book of life and not be written with the faithful" (cf. Jn. 9:22; 12:42).

(c) The positive side of such polemic was an apologetic presentation of one's own position. Each individual group felt that it was the separated remnant of Israel that would lead to the eschatological community of the saved. It is striking, however, that everyone refrained from simply identifying his or her group with the eschatological total-Israel. Thus 1 Cor. 10:18 lacks a corresponding "Israel according to the spirit." The nearest approach to this is the "community of the new covenant" (cf. Lk. 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; 2 Cor. 3:6).

Even if primarily one's own group is intended, an open attitude towards a future gathered Israel was retained. Separation from Israel was election for Israel. The community of the remnant realized its commission to call the entire people to repentance. The community of the remnant was a light for the whole community. For their sakes the whole of Israel would be saved in the end (cf. Rom. 11:26). The clearest expression of hope for the whole of Israel occurs in prayers that frequently conclude with a reference to the whole of Israel (Gal. 6:16). The remnant of the elect in the NT also hoped for the salvation and the reestablishment of Israel as one people (Mk. 13:27; Lk. 24:21; Acts 1:6). The expected judgment would be carried out through the twelve disciples, whose number indicates the totality of Israel (Matt. 19:28; Lk. 22:30).

(d) All 1st-cent. groups of Jud. were united in the belief that Israel's hope would be realized in some individual figure who would usher in the eschatological salvation. God would reveal himself to them and lead them out of their obscurity and ambiguity. All such attempts at messianic realization found people ready to believe in them; all ended in apparent catastrophe: the Teacher of Righteousness at Qumran, John the Baptist, Jesus, the Zealot leaders, and Bar Kokhba. Only two groups survived the ultimate catastrophe of A.D. 70: the Pharisees, who excluded all messianic or Zealot tendencies at Jamnia; and the Jewish believers in Jesus, who stressed their eschatological, messianic beliefs over against the Pharisees. The messianic belief of the NT can, therefore, be considered representative of a typical Jewish outlook at the time of the second temple.

Each Jewish group took and applied key statements from the Jewish Scriptures to the person who, for them, represented all Israel. This representative was the elect one among the community of the elect, the righteous one among the righteous, the son among the sons, the servant among the servants (Isa. 53), who took Israel's suffering on himself. The son of man, the figure of judgment representing the people of Israel in Dan. 7:13, was now identified with the Messiah.

Specifically for the Christian movement, as God constantly spoke to Israel, he also spoke to the Christ. As Israel was enabled in a unique way to hear and to obey, so also was Christ (Jn. 5:19, 36; cf. Matt. 5:17; 11:27). Terms were therefore applied to him that in the Heb. Scriptures denoted Israel; e.g., the vineyard, the vine (Ps. 80:8–9; Jer. 2:21; 2 Esd. 5:23; Jn. 15:1–8), and the cornerstone (Ps. 118:22–24; Matt. 21:42; Mk. 12:10–11; Lk. 20:17; Acts 4:11; Eph. 2:20; 1 Pet. 2:6–8).

The Messiah and Israel stand inseparably together. Whoever does not decide for this elect one opposes him. Whoever refuses to trust him has thereby decided against Israel. Such a one has lost descent from Abraham (Jn. 8:39) and belongs to Satan's synagogue (Rev. 3:9). Nevertheless, both the one who evidences such trust (even though it should be proved false) and the one who refuses it stand within Jud.

Israel and its Scriptures were the critical principle by which every messianic pretender was to be judged: The messiahs of Qumran were expected to come from Aaron and Israel, and the Messiah Jesus from the patriarchs (Matt. 1:1–17; 11:2–6; Jn. 5:39; Rom. 1:3; 9:5). This was the only way in which Israel could protect herself against excess in spirit and prophecy, against the majority of messianic pretenders, and against overhasty solutions of the problems of her existence.

The NT witnesses also knew that the reality of Israel was the touchstone of Christology and thus clung passionately to Israel as the basic foundation of the Christ event. Consequently, there emerges from the NT sharp opposition to any abandonment of Israel (cf. Jn. 4:22; Rom. 9–11). Only in living union with Israel is Jesus the Christ. Apart from this historical reality he dissolves into an idea, a Gnostic myth, and a Docetic speculation.

Hence in the case of the Messiah Jesus, baptism and the Lord's Supper are the feasts of Israel. The cross he bore was a sharing in Israel's suffering. Although Jewish Christians engaged in the dialogue within Jud. found themselves cut off from their Jewish brethren because of him, the NT demonstrates that Jesus, the Jew and Hebrew, represents Israel completely in his person. He is bound up with Israel from first to last.

(e) This identification of Jesus, the bringer of salvation, with Israel entailed consequent missionary activity among Jews. As Jesus turned exclusively to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, his messengers were to go only into the towns of Israel (Matt. 10:5–6; 15:24). Paul, the Jewish missionary (1 Cor. 9:20), also demonstrated the priority of Jud. in salvation history (Rom. 1:16) by always going first of all to the Jews (Acts 13:14; 14:1), always acknowledging that he was a Jew (Acts 22:3; 2 Cor. 11:22; Phil. 3:5). Despite the failures of his Jewish mission he held fast to Israel, his people (cf. Acts 28:20). On the basis of the Jewish Scriptures Paul demonstrated in Rom. 9–11, in a kind of commentary of OT teaching, that just as Israel's present hardening was causing the message of Christ to come to the Gentiles, who were thus acquiring a share in Israel's salvation, in the end time, all Israel would be saved (11:26). An anticipatory sign of this undiminished faithfulness of God was Jewish Christianity, the faithful remnant of Jud., represented by Paul himself.

(f) The position of the various NT writers vis-à-vis Jud. is revealed in their use of terms. Thus in Paul Jew is used 26x, often in opposition to Greek, Gentile, and mostly in a positive sense. Israel (17x) stands for either the historic people or the eschatological whole of Israel, though not for Christian community (except perhaps Gal. 6:16). In the Synoptics, Israel stands for the people and the land (e.g., Matt. 26, 20), used in preference to Jew. Jew is used esp. in the phrase "king of the Jews" (e.g., Matt. 27:11; Mk. 15:2; Lk. 23:3; Jn. 18:33, 39), and the term appears almost without exception on the lips of Gentiles (cf. Matt. 2:2; 28:15; Mk. 7:3; Lk. 7:3). The use of the word Israel in general maintains the connection with the reality and hope of Israel.

In Acts Israel is used more frequently in the account of the Palestinian church, while Jew is used in the narrative of Paul's missionary journeys. This corresponds to Hel. usage. In Jn. it is clear from the few but fundamental passages where Israel is used (1:31, 49; 3:10; 12:13) that the writer is still within the sphere of the whole of Israel, even though his polemic is sharp. This is expressed in the Johannine use of Jew (71x), which can indeed be used neutrally of the people or the religious community (e.g., 4:9; 18:35) but with sharp rejection when it denotes the ruling classes (e.g., 1:19; 7:11; 18:12). In Rev. Jew has a positive sense, but it is not applied to the community that does not believe in Jesus (2:9; 3:9). Israel is the true eschatological people of God (2:14; 7:4; 21:12).

3. From the Gentile mission to the Gentile Christian church. Only when those to whom the Jewish mission was originally addressed overwhelmingly rejected the offer did the mission to the Gentiles arise (Acts 13:46). The tradition therefore had to be restated to meet the demands of missionary practice among Gentiles. The history of Israel, which had figured so prominently in addressing the Jews (Acts 2:14–36; 3:22–26; 7:2–53), was dropped from the instruction given, because the people did not have the preparation necessary to understand it. Nevertheless, God's encounter with the Gentiles remained rooted in the historical experience of Israel in the teaching of the Jewish missionaries to the Gentiles. The Jesus covenant is the extension of the Sinai covenant (cf. Rom. 9–11; 1 Cor. 11:25; 2 Cor. 3:6–18; Gal. 4:24–31; Heb. 8:8–13; 10:16–18). In terms of world history the Christ event became the inclusion of the nations in the Sinai event.

Due to mounting internal tensions and disappointment over the attitude of the Diaspora, the position of Jewish Christians in the land of Israel became continually more difficult. Step by step they were transformed from a competing Jewish group to the independent opponents of the Pharisees, who now represented orthodox Jud. From A.D. 70 on, Jewish Christians saw their own way of faith as something distinct from that of the synagogue in the Jewish community.

The path of Gentile Christianity turned from Jud. and eventually led into Gentile anti-Semitism, which increased after the destruction of Jerusalem. The OT prophets' criticism of Israel was construed as anti-Jewish and repeated irresponsibly. In place of living and healthy dialogue between the groups, there arose what was more like a dogmatizing monologue. Ignatius of Antioch, for example, a Gentile Christian, writing ca. A.D. 115, expressed the opinion that a Christian must necessarily be an opponent of the Jews (Ign. Magn. 8; 10:3). Somewhat later a Gentile Christian named Barnabas used the word Israel mostly in connection with his exegesis of the Bible against Israel, although he did not yet dare to take over this word for the church. Justin Martyr, by contrast, asserts boldly: "We are ... the true spiritual Israel" (Dial. 11, 5). The way of Barnabas and Justin became the way of the church.

See also Iakōb, Jacob (2609); Ioudaia, Judea (2677).

2703 (Israēlitēs, Israelite), → 2702.

2708 (ischyros, strong, powerful, mighty), → 2709.

2709 ἰσχύς

ἰσχύς (ischys), strength, power, might (2709); ἰσχύω (ischyō), be strong, powerful; (2710) ἰσχυρός (ischyros), strong, powerful, mighty (2708); κατισχύω (katischyō), to be strong, powerful, be dominant, prevail (2996).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ischys denotes the strength and power possessed by living beings or by things. In the Gk. tragedies it was sometimes applied to deities. ischyros means strong either in body or mind and was also applied to deities, living creatures, or things. ischyō means to be able to do something, have the ability to, be strong, healthy. It can also mean to use force, exercise power, esp. physical power. In the legal sphere, this vb. acquired the meaning to be valid, be applicable, have value. katischyō means to be superior to others, be the victor, gain the upper hand, prevail.

2. (a) In the LXX ischys translates 30 different Heb. words. It can express one's physical strength (e.g., Jos. 8:3; Jdg. 16:5; Ps. 22:15; 31:10; Ezek. 30:21) or intellectual power (Prov. 8:14) but is used esp. for divine power (e.g., the Lord's bringing up his people from Egypt "by [his] power"; Num. 14:13; cf. Ps. 29:4; 147:5). As such it can be a gift of God to us (Mic. 3:8).

(b) ischyō in the LXX usually denotes becoming strong or being strong in a physical sense: of things (e.g., Isa. 28:22, "or your chains will become heavier"), and of human beings (e.g., Jos. 14:11, "I am still as strong today as the day Moses sent me out").

(c) katischyō denotes being superior in a physical sense. It is used of human beings (e.g., Jos. 17:13, "when the Israelites grew stronger"; Ezek. 30:24, "I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon"), of things (Isa. 54:2, "lengthen your cords"), and of God's power (1 Chr. 29:12).

(d) ischyros denotes strong: of persons (Num. 13:18 = LXX 13:19), animals (Prov. 30:30 = LXX 24:65), things (Isa. 8:7), or God (Deut. 10:17).

NT 1. This group of words is found in almost all NT writings and refers to the strength and power of living creatures (e.g., Heb. 11:34) or things (e.g., 6:18, strong consolation; 5:7, strong cries). The particular trans. depends on the nuances of the context. Peter (Mk. 14:37) must answer the question: "Could you not [lit., did you not have strength to] keep watch for one hour?" (cf. Matt. 26:40). We are called on to love God with all our "strength" (Mk. 12:30; Lk. 10:27). Salt that has lost its taste is "good for" nothing (Matt. 5:13). In Lk. 15:14 the famine is described as "severe." The prayer of a righteous man "is powerful" (Jas. 5:16). The gates of Hades "will not overcome" the church (Matt. 16:18). In a fig. sense people can be called "the healthy" in contrast with the sick (Mk. 2:17; cf. also Rev. 6:15). As a legal term ischyō means to avail, be valid (Heb. 9:17, of the validity of a will; cf. Gal. 5:6).

2. Some NT passages need special attention. The Synoptic tradition uses this group of words in a manner that implies approval of an action or quality; thus the strong man is safe unless a stronger man comes (Mk. 3:27). Since in Isa. 49:24–25 it is God who sets the prisoners free, Mk. 3:27 may be suggesting that God, the stronger one, has conquered Satan, the strong one, and cast him out of heaven. In Mk.'s context, however, the passage means that Jesus' victory over the demons proves him to be stronger than the strong, i.e., stronger than demons or the demon-possessed (cf. Acts 10:38).

Jesus' superiority is also seen vis-à-vis John the Baptist; the expected one is mightier than John and will demonstrate this by baptizing with the Holy Spirit and with fire (the fire of judgment; Matt. 3:11; Lk. 3:16), or with the Holy Spirit as a gift of salvation (Mk. 1:7–8). ischyō is also used in various places to depict Christ's superior power in contrast to the impotence of others, thereby emphasizing the greatness both of a miracle and of the one by whom it is done. In Mk. 5:4 the observation that no one had sufficient strength to subdue the demoniac prepares us to appreciate the greatness of Christ's miracle (cf. also Lk. 8:43; Rev. 18:10). Christ's opponents are inferior to him (Lk. 14:6; cf. 14:29–30; 20:26), their impotence merely throwing his superior power into sharper relief; the same superiority is evident in the infant church in Acts 19:20, and in the "wisdom [and] the Spirit" with which Stephen spoke (6:10) and died.

3. To defend himself against his opponents in Corinth, who were proud of their strength and their abundance of gifts (1 Cor. 4:10), Paul set weakness and impotence over against strength. "The weakness of God is stronger than man's strength," and God puts the strong to shame by choosing what is weak (1 Cor. 1:25–27). Paul himself had to suffer the reproach that, while his letters were "weighty and forceful [ischys]," he himself was weak (2 Cor. 10:10).

Still, Paul did not regard his own lack of strength as a disadvantage (cf. his comments on his "thorn in [the] flesh," 2 Cor. 12:7). He argues from the strength of God, which the unbeliever regards as foolishness, i.e., weakness (1 Cor. 1:18). Christ's power, like God's power, carries the day and is transmitted to those who live in him (Phil. 4:13). There is no power inherent in a human being; it can exist only when God's strength is displayed in human weakness (2 Cor. 12:9).

4. Eph. and 2 Thess. use the ischyō word group to express a somewhat different concept of strength and power. Eph. 1:9 and 6:10 speak of the power of God, not the power of Christ, and 2 Thess. 1:19 echoes Isa. 2:10, 19 in ascribing to the power of God the punishment of the ungodly at the last day.

5. In Rev. the grandeur of the imagery is conveyed by ischys and ischyros. "Strength" figures among the ascriptions addressed to the Lamb (Rev. 5:12) and to God (7:12; 18:8). It is also attributed to the angels (5:2; 10:1; 18:21; cf. 2 Pet. 2:11), whose voice is mighty (Rev. 18:2; cf. 19:6) and who are superior to the dragon (12:8). They belong to the heavenly kingdom and are thus closely associated with God; hence in the worship of heaven the hymn addressed to God may likewise be addressed to them.

See also bia, force, violence (1040); keras, horn (3043); kratos, power, might, rule (3197); dynamis, power (1539).

2710 (ischyō, be strong, powerful), → 2709.

2715 (ichthydion, little fish), → 2716.

2716 ἰχθύς

ἰχθύς (ichthys), fish (2716); ἰχθύδιον (ichthydion), diminutive of ichthys, little fish (2715); ὀψάριον (opsarion), fish for eating (with bread) (4066); κῆτος (kētos), sea-monster (3063).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ichthys was in general use as a word for fish. It appears as a metaphor for a "foolish man" in Plutarch. kētos is specifically a sea-monster, of the whale kind. kētos is also a constellation, and the supposition that sea-monsters inhabited the deep gave rise to kētos in the sense of "gulf."

2. In the LXX, ichthys describes all created life living in the water (e.g., 1 Ki. 4:33; Job 12:8), whether fresh (Exod. 7:18; Ezek. 29:4) or salt (Hos. 4:3) water. Fish are involved in the subservience of creation to the Creator (Ezek. 38:20) and by the Creator's will are under human domination (Gen. 1:26; 9:2; Ps. 8:8). Their commercial value is implied in Neh. 13:16 as well as by the provision of a "Fish Gate" (3:3, ichthyēros). With the rest of creation, fish fall under divine judgments on the human race (Exod. 7:18; Ps. 105:29), illustrate divine providential interventions (Isa. 50:2), and figure in the ideal future (Ezek. 47:9). The angler's art aptly denotes the inhumane treatment of humans (Hab. 1:14). Religiously, it is forbidden to make fish-like representations of the divine nature , a prohibition much to the point in the light of Assyrian representations of Ea in fish form and the fish costume of exorcist priests (Deut. 4:18; cf. Tob. 6:1–17).

The LXX uses kētos in Gen. 1:21 ("great creatures of the sea"; cf. Sir. 43:25) as well as Job 3:8 ("Leviathan") and 9:13; 26:12 ("Rahab"). In Job it has mythological overtones. Otherwise it is only used of the "great fish" in Jon. 1:17; 2:10 (= LXX 2:1, 11) and 3 Macc. 6:8.

NT The NT use of ichthys reflects the OT background. The whole Galilee narrative of the Gospels implies commerce in fish, but neither here nor throughout the OT is there any stress on different species of fish. The vocabulary of the LXX is increased by the occasional use of opsarion for fish prepared for food (Jn. 6:9, 11; 21:9–13). The word does not necessarily mean "small" fish, as Jn. 21:9–13 indicates.

The sole NT observation on zoology appears in 1 Cor. 15:39, but its interest is clearly theological—the subservience of all creation to the Creator's will and design. This truth receives vivid illustration in the nature miracles of Jesus, the two feedings of the crowds (Matt. 14:17; 15:36, with par.), the tribute money (17:27), and the miraculous catches of fish (Lk. 5:6; Jn. 21:6). The single thread of truth linking these narratives is that by the mere exercise of his will Jesus subdues creation to his plan in works of mercy for the well-being of people, and thus is manifested as the incarnate Creator.

kētos makes its only appearance in Matt. 12:40 with reference to the "huge fish" of Jonah. Both the LXX and NT have clearly made the correct word choice here, a sea-monster of undefined nature but undoubted size.

2731 Ἰωνᾶς

Ἰωνᾶς (Iōnas), Jonah (2731).

OT 1. Iōnas is a transliteration of Heb. yônâ—the OT prophet Jonah.

2. Four elements in the Jonah story relate to the NT. (a) What was the motive for Jonah's flight (Jon. 1:3–17)? Most scholars think that he was a religious particularist who did not want to see Israel's privileges shared with the heathen. It should be noted, however, that later Jewish opinion stressed the repentance of the Ninevites as an example that God's people were called to follow. This was the point Jesus sought to make.

(b) The book of Jonah records his own comment on his remarkable experience. In Jonah's prayer, the belly of the fish becomes "the depths of the grave [Heb. Sheol]" (Jon. 2:2). While recognizing that Sheol is frequently metaphorical for that which is dark and likely to end in death, the use of the metaphor here, coupled with the reference to "the pit" (2:6), forms part of the OT background to Jesus' use of the incident.

(c) The only thing the OT records regarding Jonah's preaching is coming judgment (Jon. 3:4). It was the force of his word and the recognition of the divine authorization that lay behind this word that motivated the Ninevites' repentance.

(d) The Ninevites heeded the call to repentance, and God expressed his satisfaction with this (Jon. 3:10–4:10).

NT The NT refers to Jonah only in passages in which Jesus alludes to him in the context of certain controversial exchanges with the Pharisees (Matt. 12:38–41; 16:4; Lk. 11:29–32). These references are both general to the career of Jonah and particular, in that they refer to him as a sign (→ sēmeion, 4956).

In speaking of the people of his day as "wicked and adulterous" (Matt. 12:39; cf. Lk. 11:29, which omits "adulterous"), Jesus undoubtedly intended to set up a parallelism between them and Nineveh (Jon. 1:2): "wicked" in heart and life, "adulterous" physically and spiritually. The Lord underlines their spiritual vacuity by his refusal of the sign they sought. Matt. 16:1 notes that the Pharisees and Sadducees wanted a "sign from heaven," presumably something unequivocally from God that would authenticate Jesus—primarily without his being involved in its performance. To Jesus (cf. Matt. 11:4) this was rank blindness in the face of his constant performance of his own works before their eyes. In this context he set up a threefold comparison.

1. He made an open comparison between himself and Jonah. In Matt. 16:4 Jesus leaves his hearers to their own interpretative devices. In Lk. 11:30, there is a significant change of tense: "As Jonah was . . . so also will the Son of Man be. . . ." That is, if the Jewish leaders review the story of Jonah, they can see that he was a divinely sent persuader, a heaven-sent opportunity that came once and did not return. Similarly, the Son of Man will, at some later point, make them aware that he too was sent from God and that in him they reached, for good or ill, a point of no return.

2. Jesus compared Jonah's experience of a three-day sojourn in the fish to his own coming sojourn "in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12:40).To what Jesus was looking forward when he predicted a coming event in the light of which his own status as a Jonah-type sign would be clear? His resurrection from an unequivocal experience of death would be the "sign from heaven" that they had faithlessly sought and would not, even when it happened, be able to recognize (cf. Lk. 16:31). Matt.'s comparison between Jonah in a Sheol-like situation and Jesus "in the heart of the earth" is distinctly apt.

3. Note also the comparison between Jonah's preaching and its result, and Jesus' own preaching and its result (Matt. 12:41; Lk. 11:32). The comparison here is a fortiori. The ensuing judgment on the impenitence of the Jewish leaders would be greater because the one who calls to repentance is greater. Jesus is claiming here the honor due to his deity.

K kappa

2748 (kathairō, to clean, make clean), → 2754.
2751 (katharizō, cleanse, purify), → 2754.
2752 (katharismos, cleansing), → 2754.

2754 καθαρός

καθαρός (katharos), clean, pure (2754); καθαίρω (kathairō), to clean, make clean (2748); ἐκκαθαίρω (ekkathairō), clean out (1705); καθαρίζω (katharizō), cleanse, purify (2751); καθαρότης (katharotēs), cleanness, purity (2755); καθαρισμός (katharismos), cleansing (2752); ἀκάθαρτος (akathartos), unclean (176); ἀκαθαρσία (akatharsia), uncleanness (174).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the family of words that go with katharos embraces the realms of physical, cultic, and ethical purity. katharos means clean in a physical sense, in the sense of being ritually pure, and in a moral sense. The cognate vb. kathairō means to clean, sweep, cleanse. The compound vb. ekkathairō intensifies the primary meaning, so that it means to sweep out, cleanse thoroughly. More common in Hel. Gk. is katharizō, to cleanse, in a physical, ritual, or moral sense. katharotēs means cleanness (lit. and fig.). The later Hel. term katharismos is found first as a technical term in agriculture, and then generally in the sense of physical or ritual cleaning.

(b) The negative words formed by adding the alpha-privative (akathartos and akatharsia) refer to the whole realm of uncleanness, ranging from menstruation to moral pollution through wrongdoing.

(c) In Gk. religion the system of purificatory and expiatory rites had nothing to do with penitence for sin or an inward purification of the heart. It was concerned rather with the warding off of demonic spirits by means of exorcism and ritual acts.

A woman after childbirth, as well as her child, were unclean. So too was a dead person. Those who touched either of these had to undergo purification, which removed the uncleanness that had come from without. A person who shed blood, even if done in the course of executing justice, had to be cleansed. The blood of an animal was poured over the hands of the person who had become unclean, so banishing death by death. Later these rites were given a deeper, ethical meaning. The credit for this goes to the Orphics and Pythagoreans, but above all to the mystery religions and the philosophers.

(d) The concept pure and its opposite impure are woven into the history of all religions. In primitive cultures, a supernatural force possesses dangerous powers that are conceived in material terms and are thought to be transferable by physical contact. In particular, birth, death, and sexual processes are associated with this force. A person wishing to approach the deity had to be careful not to offend the gods by uncleanness, which contradicts their nature. Thus arose a demand for cultic purification. The priest had to undertake purificatory rites, washing away what was unclean, in order to free the individual from evil and demonic influences. Not until later did purity receive an inward sense, thus freeing it from ritual and linking it instead to morality and ethics.

2. (a) In the LXX katharos usually denotes ritual purity, while akathartos and akatharsia mean ritual impurity (e.g., Lev. 5:3; 15:24). The distinction between clean and unclean goes back to an early period. Within the same realm of ideas are the concepts of holy (hagios, → 41) and profane (koinos; → koinōnia, 3126).

(b) In the OT purity and impurity are spoken of chiefly in a cultic sense. The distinction between them is inseparably connected with Israel's belief in Yahweh, which was grounded on the presupposition that uncleanness and Yahweh are irreconcilable opposites. Purity is therefore regarded as the norm, qualifying one to take part in worship, while impurity separates one from worship and from God's people, so that it must be opposed and purged out as an abomination (Lev. 7:19–20 = LXX 7:9–10).

(i) Purity begins with the individual. Diseases, esp. leprosy, render a person unclean. One of the OT priest's duties was to pronounce a person who had contracted leprosy either clean or unclean (see Lev. 13:17, 44). Likewise, sexual processes made a person unclean (e.g., emission of semen, 15:16; menstruation, 15:19; adultery, 18:20; homosexuality, 18:22; sexual intercourse, 1 Sam. 21:5–6). A dead body is unclean in the highest degree; its uncleanness was transferred to every person present and also to open vessels (Num. 19:14–15). In general, cleansing with clear water was sufficient, but special cleansing water, previously mixed with the ashes of a red heifer, was necessary in cases of defilement by contact with a dead body (Num. 19).

(ii) Lev. 11 presents a catalogue of clean and unclean animals. These distinctions appear to guard against animal worship (occasionally practiced in the northern kingdom, 1 Ki. 12:28–32), to show Israel's rejection of animals symbolizing foreign religions (such as the pig in the Adonis-Tammuz cult), and to formulate health regulations. Foreign territory was likewise regarded as unclean, since foreign gods were worshiped there (Amos 7:17). Even Israel's own land and the temple could be defiled by idolatry (Jer. 2:7; 7:30). The temple, the altar, and the Most Holy Place, as the abodes of Yahweh, were the places of greatest purity and sanctity; because of the uncleanness of the Israelites, these places needed regular purification by the ritual of atonement (Lev. 16).

(iii) The prophets did not abandon the distinction between clean and unclean. Rather, they extended and spiritualized the concepts, for in criticizing cultic abuses they introduced a concept of purity that had to do with people and their behavior (Isa. 6:5; Jer. 2:23–25). The concept of impurity thus approached those of guilt and sin (33:8; Ezek. 39:24; cf. Ps. 51).

(c) Thus, when the OT distinguishes between clean and unclean, it is much more than a concern with merely cold, legalistic superficialities. Rather, we have here evidence of the dynamic struggle of Israel's religion with that of her neighbors.

3. (a) Beginning in intertestamental times, Jud. surrounded the laws of purity with many casuistic and sometimes grotesque prohibitions and commands, which made the regulations into laws that were difficult to fulfill. A Pharisee was defiled, for example, merely by sitting on the clothes of someone who could not read the Torah.

(b) The most common act of ritual purification was washing one's hands before the blessing at a meal (cf. Mk. 7:3–4; Jn. 2:6). This requirement applied also to the hours of prayer. Recitation of the Shema also became involved in ritual purification. Such regulations were meant as a guide for life, but they became a heavy burden in the sense of a legalistic system of casuistry.

4. The Essenes were even stricter than Pharisees on matters of purity and purification. Since they regarded themselves as the priestly, redemptive community of the end time, they made the Jewish rules for the priests binding on the whole community. Daily immersion was practiced in the pools that have been uncovered at Qumran. Anyone who offended in some way against the rules of the community was excluded temporarily or permanently from the purity of the many. At the same time, fig. language is used when an individual gives thanks that God has cleansed him from sin (1QS 3:4–12; 4:20–23).

NT In the NT katharos and its cognates occur in nearly all the writings, though references to purity are not as frequent as those to words derived from hagios, holy. We find these words used in a physical (e.g., Rev. 15:6), cultic (e.g., Matt. 8:2–4; Lk. 17:14), and spiritual (e.g., Matt. 5:8) sense. The concept of purity does acquire a new character through the preaching and person of Jesus.

1. (a) Jesus develops his doctrine of purity in his struggle against Pharisaism. In Matt. 23:25–26 he rejects the observance of ritual regulations on the ground that this kind of purity is merely external. Behind the practices of the Pharisees lurks the misguided notion that uncleanness comes from outside a person (cf. Matt. 15:11, 16–17; Mk. 7:15, 18). The opposite is true: What defiles a person comes from within, from the human heart (Mk. 7:15, 20–23). Jesus counters the Pharisaic emphasis on washing hands with a demand for purity of heart, as expressed in Matt. 5:8: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they will see God."

For love that surrenders itself fully to God and to other people, there are no longer any unclean foods (Mk. 7:19c). Jesus sits down to eat with tax collectors and sinners (2:13–17). He does not repel lepers but heals them (Lk. 17:11–19). He talks to Samaritans (17:16c) and even Gentiles (Matt. 8:5–13; 15:21–28). By removing the dividing barriers of the ceremonial law and by demanding purity of heart and character, Jesus breaks through the innermost essence of Jud. and leaves it behind him.

(b) For the Christian community at Jerusalem, it was difficult to step across the barriers that Jesus had broken down, for as Jewish Christians they held on at first to the ceremonial law and temple worship. This difficulty is illustrated by the story of the conversion of the centurion Cornelius as a result of Peter's preaching (Acts 10:1–11:18). In a vision Peter becomes aware of the invalidity of the outward distinction between clean and unclean: "Do not call anything impure that God has made clean" (10:15). Granted, in the apostolic decree of the Jerusalem council, ritual requirements are laid on the Gentile church at Antioch (15:29), but at the same time the view prevails that God makes no distinction between Jews and Gentiles, but cleanses human hearts by faith (15:9).

2. (a) Paul is the first to recognize clearly that Christ has brought about the end of the law (Rom. 10:4), so that all cultic and ceremonial distinctions become obsolete. In the controversy between the strong and the weak, distinguished by differing attitudes toward eating meat used in pagan sacrifice, Paul comes down resolutely on the side of the strong: "All food is clean" (14:20; cf. also Tit. 1:15). For him the only reason to observe any kind of legalistic rules is regard for the weaker believer.

(b) In Jn.'s writings purity is brought through the saving death of Jesus. That is, Jn. gives purity a Christological foundation: "The blood of Jesus, his Son, purifies us from all sin" (1 Jn. 1:7; cf. 1:9). The story of Jesus washing the disciples' feet also shows that those who allow themselves to be served (as in baptism) by Jesus are clean (Jn. 13:10; cf. also Eph. 5:26). Purity is mediated by the word of Christ (Jn. 15:3). In Johannine thought, therefore, purity is not an ethical quality that one must work for, but an outworking of the fact that the church belongs to Christ.

(c) Heb. interprets the death of Jesus with the help of OT ritual concepts in order to demonstrate the superior quality of the new covenant over the old (9:13–14). In contrast to the purification of the OT temple by sacrifice, repeated every year (which the writer sees as an annual reminder of sin, 10:1–4), the purification effected by Christ's blood is valid once and for all. Moreover, it serves not only to bring outward purification, but also inner cleansing from sin (1:3; 10:22). Like 1 Jn., Heb. links the concept of purity with that of forgiveness (9:22).

(d) It is not until the Pastoral Letters as well as Jas. and 1 Pet. that the concept of purity gains in part an ethical character. The letters to Tim., in language formally similar to the preaching of Jesus, exhort purity of heart and conscience (1 Tim. 1:5; 3:9; 2 Tim. 2:22). Meanwhile, the focus shifts from the person of Jesus to didactic instruction: "The goal of this command is love, which comes from a pure heart and a good conscience and a sincere faith" (1 Tim. 1:5; cf. 1 Pet. 1:22).

Jas. shows a certain tendency to return to a concept of religious purity when he describes self-denial in the face of a sinful world as pure and undefiled religion (1:27). The nearest the NT comes to traditional Jewish thinking is in Rev., with its talk of purity in terms of physically clean linen garments (15:6; 19:8, 14) and the new Jerusalem of "pure [katharos] gold (21:18, 21).

3.It is significant that in the NT comparatively little use is made of the idea of purity in preaching Christ or Christian ethics. Preaching and teaching are dominated rather by words such as discipleship, obedience, sanctification, and love. But subsequent church history demonstrates how easy it is to fall back into a legalistic outlook. Again and again groups and sects have arisen that taught an ascetic purity as a distinguishing mark of Christian faith, seeking to impose this by rules and laws. This view of purity—which is, generally speaking, nearer to the radical Jud. of the Pharisees or Essenes—shows that in Christian proclamation the struggle between law and gospel must constantly be fought anew, in order that a Christ-centered doctrine of purity may be achieved, liberating us rather than bringing us back into legalism.

See also hagnos, pure, holy (54).

2755 (katharotēs, cleanness, purity), → 2754.

2756 (kathedra, seat), → 2764.

2757 (kathezomai, sit), → 2764.

2761 καθεύδω

καθεύδω (katheudō), sleep (2761); κοιμάω (koimaō), sleep, fall asleep (3121); ὕπνος (hypnos), sleep (5678).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. katheudō means exclusively sleep; koimaō (from keimai, lie) means lull (oneself), sink into sleep. In its mid. and pass. forms it can be used either of natural sleep or of dying. hypnos denotes natural sleep that refreshes or overcomes a person, causing one to forget the day's burdens. However, inasmuch as the Gks. identified life with our waking consciousness, sleep came to be seen as useless, degrading, and animal-like. The similarity between sleep and death led in mythology to the portrayal of Hypnos as the twin brother of the god Thanatos.

2. (a) In the LXX katheudō (35x) denotes natural sleep and never means to die. The same applies in general to the noun hypnos, though Jer. 51:39 (= LXX 28:39) refers to hypnon aiōnion, eternal sleep (see also Job 14:12; Ps. 13:3, hypnoō). hypnoō, sleep, occurs 25x in the LXX.

(b) koimaō (150x), meaning sleep (e.g., 1 Sam. 3:9), developed several nuances in the OT. In the Pentateuch esp., koimaō meta (e.g., Gen. 19:32–35) is used of sleeping together as a euphemism of sexual activity. In later parts of the OT, it acquired the meaning die, in the sense of an honorable death (e.g., "he slept with his fathers," 36x in 2 Ki. and Chr.; cf. also Isa. 43:17; Ezek. 32:19–32).

3. katheudō and hypnos are used by Philo and Josephus of sleep in the physical sense only. In intertestamental lit. we find the expression hypnos aiōnios, eternal sleep, from which the departed are to be awakened (cf. T. Iss. 9:9). The concept of an intermediate state finds further development in Jewish apocalyptic (e.g., 1 Enoch 91:10; 92:3) and forms the background of NT teaching about death and resurrection.

NT hypnos (6x in the NT) and katheudō (22x) usually refer to the literal state of sleep (e.g., Matt. 1:24; Lk. 9:32; Jn. 11:13). Only in 1 Thess. 5:10 does it have the sense of having died (but cf. also Matt. 9:24 par.). In the scene in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:40; Mk. 14:37; Lk. 22:46) and in 1 Thess. 5:6–7 sleep has a negative connotation, indicating a lack of watchfulness. koimaō, on the other hand, is used 15x to mean die (only at Matt. 28:13; Lk. 22:45; Acts 12:6 does it have the sense of sleep).

It is chiefly Paul who uses koimaō in a fig. sense, emphasizing the close relationship between a sleeping person and death. He generally uses participial forms to describe deceased believers as those who have fallen asleep (see 1 Cor. 15:18, 20; 1 Thess. 4:13–15, both in connection with statements about the resurrection; cf. also Matt. 27:52).

In 1 Cor. 7:39; 15:6, 51, koimaō is used as an equivalent of die (cf. also Acts 7:60; 13:36; 2 Pet. 3:4). Jn. uses the ancient ambiguity of the vb. in Jn. 11:11–14, in the story of the raising of Lazarus, to show a misunderstanding on the part of the disciples. Jesus meant that Lazarus had died, but the disciples understood him to mean a sleep that would bring healing. Such language draws attention to Jesus' victory over the power of death. For him thanatos is no more than hypnos.

See also apokteinō, kill (650); thanatos, death (2505); nekros, dead, dead person (3738).

2762 (kathēgētēs, teacher, leader), → 4806.

2764 κάθημαι

κάθημαι (kathēmai), sit (2764); καθέζομαι (kathezomai), sit (2757); καθίζω (kathizō), sit, cause to sit (2767); καθέδρα (kathedra), seat (2756); πρωτοκαθεδρία (prōtokathedria), best seat, place of honor (4751); πρωτοκλισία (prōtoklisia), best seat, place of honor (4752).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kathizō was originally a trans. verb, to cause someone to sit. But it acquired also an intrans. sense and became a synonym of kathēmai and kathezomai. Sitting was often a mark of honor or authority in the ancient world: A king sat to receive his subjects, a court to give judgment, and a teacher to teach.

2. Of the many different situations in which people sit in the OT, the following are significant. (a) In various contexts, sitting is a mark of honor and authority. The king sits on his throne. To sit at his right hand is a mark of the highest honor (e.g., 1 Ki. 2:19; cf. Ps. 110:1); in 1 Sam. 2:8 to sit with princes is a picture of exaltation. God, as king, also sits enthroned in heaven (1 Ki. 22:19; Ps. 29:10). The court, or judge, sits to give judgment (Exod. 18:13–14; Dan. 7:9–10, 26). A respected elder sits while others stand (cf. Job 29:7–8). A teacher sits among his pupils (2 Ki. 6:32; Ezek. 8:1). David "sat before the LORD" (2 Sam. 7:18)—a privilege apparently reserved for the king.

(b) To sit on the ground, by contrast, is a mark of abasement. It is a characteristic attitude of the sufferer (Job 2:8), mourner (Ps. 137:1), humiliated (Isa. 47:1), penitent (Ezra 9:3–4; Jon. 3:6), and suppliant (Jdg. 20:26; 2 Sam. 7:18).

(c) For most of the OT period it was normal to sit at a table (1 Sam. 20:5, 18, 25; 1 Ki. 13:20). The custom of reclining appears first in the Persian period (Est. 1:6; 7:8).

NT The NT also mentions people sitting in a wide variety of situations, including most of those listed above.

1. Kings sat on a throne (e.g., Acts 12:21; Rev. 18:7). God as king is also described in Rev. as the one who sits on the throne (e.g., 4:2–10; 5:1–13; 6:16; 7:10–17; 21:5). It is a mark of Christ's glory that he has been seated at God's right hand (e.g., Mk. 14:62; Eph. 1:20) or even shares the very throne of God (Rev. 3:21). Thus, having completed his work of redemption, he is now seated in the place of supreme authority until all opposition is finally destroyed (Heb. 1:3–4; 10:11–13).

2. As a remarkable extension of this idea, the believer, who is "in Christ," shares this exalted position. James and John asked for this place of honor as a personal right, but it was refused (Mk. 10:37–40). But the Christian's union with Christ means that "God raised us up with Christ and seated us with him [synkathizō] in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 2:6). He even offers us a place on the throne he shares with the Father (Rev. 3:21; cf. Matt. 19:28).

3. The seated position of the judge or court (Acts 6:15; 23:3; 26:30) leads to the trans. use of kathizō as a term for the appointment of judges (1 Cor. 6:4). In Jn. 19:13 this vb. can either be trans., that Pilate placed Jesus on the judgment seat as an act of mockery, or intrans., that he sat on it himself. God (Rev. 20:11) and Christ in glory (Matt. 25:31) are described as sitting on thrones to give judgment.

4. Jesus customarily sat down to teach, whether in the open air (e.g., Matt. 5:1; 13:1–2) or in the temple court (26:55). In the synagogues it was customary for the preacher to stand to read the Scriptures and to sit to expound them (Lk. 4:16–21). The expression "Moses' seat" (Matt. 23:2) may therefore be fig., indicating the authority of the teacher who, like Moses, speaks in God's name.

5. The worshipers in the synagogue apparently sat (Acts 13:14), and Christian worship followed the same pattern (20:9; 1 Cor. 14:30). The most respected members of the synagogue congregation sat in the front seats (Mk. 12:39), a practice that led to unhealthy class distinction (cf. Jas. 2:2–4).

6. As in the OT, sitting on the ground was a mark of humiliation (Jas. 2:3). Mary's sitting by Jesus' feet (Lk. 10:39, parakathezomai) was a sign of humility. Sitting in sackcloth and ashes as a sign of penitence is still known (10:13), and beggars sit on the ground to ask for alms (Mk. 10:46; Jn. 9:8).

See also klinō, recline, sit down (3111).

2767 (kathizō, sit, cause to sit), → 2764.

2770 καθίστημι

καθίστημι (kathistēmi), bring, appoint, put in charge (2770).

CL & OT kathistēmi has three main meanings: (a) lead or bring in; (b) appoint, esp. to an office or position; (c) bring to pass, become something, appear as. The usual meanings in the LXX are place somewhere and appoint to an office (cf. Deut. 17:15; 1 Sam. 8:1; Ps. 105:21).

NT Meaning (a) is found only in Acts 17:15: "(those) who escorted Paul"; (b) is found in 6:3 (of deacons); Tit. 1:5 (of elders); Heb. 5:1; 8:3 (of the high priest); Matt. 24:45 par. (of the controller of a household).

Meaning (c) occurs in Rom. 5:19; Jas. 4:4; 2 Pet. 1:8. Rom. 5:12–21 contrasts Adam and Christ. Adam's act of disobedience has binding results for all: "The many were made sinners." Through Christ's obedience, however, "the many will be made righteous" (5:19). In both cases, "were/will be made" is kathistēmi. Drawing on the language and ideas of the OT, Paul uses this vb. to describe God's judgment on humanity. But the decisive event is Christ's obedience even to death (cf. Phil. 2:5–11). Through that event it is now possible for all to stand as righteous before God.

See also horizō, determine, appoint (3988); paristēmi, place, put at the disposal of (4225); procheirizō, determine, appoint (4741); tassō, arrange, appoint (5435); tithēmi, put, place, set, appoint (5502); prothesmia, appointed date (4607); cheirotoneō, appoint (5936); lanchanō, obtain as by lot (3275).

2775 (kathoraō, look at), → 3972.

2785 καινός

καινός (kainos), new (2785); καινότης (kainotēs), newness (2786); ἐγκαινίζω (enkainizō), make new, consecrate (1590); ἀνακαινόω (anakainoō), renew (363); ἀνακαίνωσις (anakainōsis), renewal (364).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kainos tends to denote what is qualitatively new as compared with what has existed until now, what is better than the old. neos, by contrast, is a temporal word for what has not yet been, what has just made its appearance. But the longer these words were used, the less strictly was this conceptual differentiation maintained.

2. In the LXX kainos often follows cl. Gk. by indicating something new, something previously not there (e.g., Deut. 20:5, a new house; Jos. 9:13, new wineskins; 1 Ki. 11:29, a new cloak). The word finds its theological place in the eschatological message of the prophets, who question Israel's previous experience of salvation in history and announce God's new and saving activity in the future. This move of Yahweh's consists, according to Jer., in the establishment of a "new covenant" (31:31–34), in contrast to the covenant at Sinai; in this covenant Yahweh will put his will in Israel's heart in order to bring about a new obedience among his people.

Ezek. makes a similar promise of a "new heart and a new spirit" that Yahweh will create within his people (18:31; cf. 11:19; 36:26).

Isa. 43:18–19 presents the programmatic formulation of "forget the former things; do not dwell on the past. See, I am doing a new thing!" (cf. also 42:9; 48:6). The prophet understands Yahweh's activity in leading Israel back out of the Babylonian exile as a new creation, which will embrace the nation and the whole created order (43:16–21). In 65:17–18 he proclaims the creation of "new heavens and a new earth." The new thing that is awaited and promised in the prophetic proclamation as Yahweh's future act reaches from the inner parts of the human being all the way to the universal dimensions of a new world. The Israelite covenant community responds to these deeds of Yahweh with the "new song" (Ps. 33:3; 40:3; 144:9; 149:1).

NT 1. (a) The NT also follows the cl. Gk. usage of kainos. It occurs in the sense of unused (Matt. 9:17; 27:60; Mk. 2:21; Lk. 5:36; Jn. 19:41), unfamiliar, interesting (Mk. 1:27; Acts 17:19, 21), and novel (Matt. 13:52; 2 Jn. 5).

(b) But everything in the NT connected with Jesus' saving work is also characterized as new: a new covenant (Lk. 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; 2 Cor. 3:6; Heb. 8:8, 13; 9:15), a new command (Jn. 13:34; 1 Jn. 2:7–8), a new creation (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15), the new existence of life in the Spirit (kainotēs, newness, Rom. 6:4; 7:6), the new self (Eph. 2:15; 4:24; cf. anakainoō, renew, 2 Cor. 4:16; Col. 3:10), a new heaven and a new earth (2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1), a new name (2:17; 3:12), the new Jerusalem (3:12; 21:2), and a new song (5:9; 14:3).

2. The following features emerge from an investigation of theological usage. (a) Most important is the use of kainos with diathēkē (covenant, → 1347), in both the Synoptic and Pauline traditions of the Last Supper, in the words spoken over the cup: "This cup is the new covenant in my blood" (1 Cor. 11:25; cf. Lk. 22:20). These words signify that the blood, or death, of Jesus is the basis of the new covenant. This is an evident link with the promise of Jer. 31:31–34.

Elsewhere Paul interprets the new covenant as a covenant of the Spirit in contrast to the old covenant with its written code (2 Cor. 3:6). "We serve in the new way [kainotēs] of the Spirit, and not in the old way of the written code" (Rom. 7:6).

Heb. develops the new covenant theme further, contrasting the imperfect old covenant of Sinai with the perfect new one (8:6–7). The quotation from Jer. 31:31–34 is explained thus: "By calling this covenant 'new,' he has made the first one obsolete" (Heb. 8:13). Again and again the statements of this book circle around the newness of this covenant (9:15), which can also be called a "superior" (8:6) or "eternal" covenant (13:20). Through Jesus' death and mediating work "those who are called [will] receive the promised eternal inheritance" (9:15).

(b) The Synoptics use kainos from time to time with the same meaning as neos in order to distinguish the new that is an integral part of the appearance of Jesus from the old already in existence: e.g., in the parable of "new [neos] wine" that must be put into "new [kainos] wineskins" (Mk. 2:22). Similarly, 1:27 reports the strong impression that Jesus' teaching created: "a new [kainos] teaching—and with authority!" The nature of the newness is characterized by its contrast with the casuistic rab. method of teaching (1:22), by its authoritativeness, and by its power to effect what it says (as the context of the healing of the spirit-possessed man shows).

(c) In Gal. 6:15, Paul designates God's saving act in the cross of Christ "a new [kainos] creation" (cf. 6:14), setting it in opposition to the legalism advocated by the Judaizers, who claimed that God requires all male believers to be circumcised. For Paul, God's saving act is something fundamentally new. The new creation of God embraces not only humanity (1 Cor. 8:6) but the whole creation (Rom. 8:18–22; cf. Isa. 43:18–21).

Similar in meaning is 2 Cor. 5:17, where Paul declares: "Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new [kainos] creation; the old has gone, the new [kainos] has come!" Those who believe are transferred by faith into Christ and go from the present age into the age to come. This is indeed a new act of creation (ktisis, → 3232) analogous to the original creative act by which the world came into being. The apostle is here taking up his earlier thought of God's new creative act in Christ in 4:6: "For God, who said, 'Let light shine out of darkness,' made his light shine in our hearts to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (cf. Gen. 1:3).

In 2 Cor. 4:16 Paul continues this discussion of newness. Our salvation is not a matter of gaining some new psychological or ethical quality. It entails a daily process of renewal: "Though outwardly we are wasting away, yet inwardly we are being renewed [anakainoō] day by day." This takes place through the recreative power of the Spirit given by Christ, "in the new way [kainotēs] of the Spirit" (Rom. 7:6; cf. Tit. 3:5).

The existence of the new person thus involves a new way of life, which is hidden with Christ in God (Col. 3:3). Those who embark on it should hold fast to their new life and put on the new self, "since you have taken off your old self with its practices and have put on the new [neos] self, which is being renewed [anakainoō] in knowledge in the image of its Creator" (Col. 3:9–10; cf. Rom. 12:2; Eph. 4:23–24). The imperative does not invalidate the indicative; rather, the concealment of the existence of the new creation is itself the basis for the energetic imperative to the new way of life (cf. Gal. 5:25).

The two passages just mentioned (2 Cor. 4:16; Col. 3:10) are the only uses of anakainoō in the NT; in both cases it is in the pass. The corresponding noun anakainōsis, renewal, is also found only twice in the NT. In Rom. 12:2 believers are exhorted to let this renewal affect their social attitudes: "Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing [anakainōsis] of your mind." Tit. 3:5 sees salvation grounded in renewal: "He saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy. He saved us through the washing of rebirth [→ palingenesia, 4098] and renewal [anakainōsis] by the Holy Spirit."

(d) Jn. 13:34 speaks of the "new [kainos] command" of brotherly love: "A new command I give you: Love one another. As I have loved you, so you must love one another." The command is new because Jesus was the first to reveal fully what love means (cf. 1:17; 15:13). Here, too, the imperative to love is grounded in the indicative of Jesus' love. Because the Christian community has experienced the reality of the self-sacrificial love of Jesus, it is summoned at the same time to transform concern for self into concern for others. It is not a question of an ethical principle, but of becoming new in love by virtue of the new love of Christ.

In 1 Jn. the point at issue is likewise that of brotherly love (1 Jn. 2:7–11). The command is called, strikingly, old and new at the same time (2:7–8; cf. 2 Jn. 5). It is old in the sense that it goes back to the beginning of the Christian life. As to content, it is simply the new love for one's fellow believers that is in view, although the Christological foundation of Jn.'s Gospel is not explicitly expounded in this letter (1 Jn. 2:8–11).

(e) The vb. enkainizō occurs only 2x, both in Heb. In 10:20, believers have confidence to enter the sanctuary "by a new and living way opened [enkainizō] for us through the curtain, that is, his body" (cf. the use of this vb. in 1 Sam. 11:14; Ps. 51:10). The meaning of inaugurate is suggested for this vb. in Heb. 9:18: "Even the first covenant was not put into effect [enkainizō] without blood" (cf. Deut. 20:5; 1 Ki. 8:63; 2 Chr. 7:5).

(f) kainos plays an important role in the visions of Rev. Those who are victorious over their earthly temptations will receive "a white stone with a new name" (2:17; cf. 3:12). This stone may reflect the white stone used by jurors to signify acquittal, a token entitling one to free entertainment at royal assemblies (i.e., admission to the heavenly feast), or a white stone regarded as a mark of felicity (or even a combination of these or other images). The new name is not that of the bearer, but of the one giving authority to the bearer. The context of Rev. 1 suggests that the new name is that of Christ as Lord (cf. 1:8, 10–20; cf. Phil. 2:11), for he has conquered and has assumed lordship (cf. Rev.2:17; 5:5–11; 22:13, 20). He is the one who makes the new reality possible.

The heavenly community of the redeemed will strike up a "new song" in honor of the Lamb who was slain (Rev. 5:9; 14:3). When the great and final apocalyptic battle has been fought out against Satan and all the enemies of the Lamb have been defeated, the "new Jerusalem" will arise (21:2), and "a new heaven and a new earth" will be created (21:1; cf. 2 Pet. 3:13). Then there will be no more tears, suffering, pain, or death (Rev. 21:4). In Jesus Christ is the universal hope of all things being made new (21:5).

See also neos, new, young, fresh (3742); prosphatos, fresh, new, late (4710).

2786 (kainotēs, newness), → 2785.

2789 καιρός

καιρός (kairos), time, especially a point of time, moment (2789); εὐκαιρέω (eukaireō), have opportunity (2320); εὐκαιρία (eukairia), favorable opportunity, the right moment (2321); εὔκαιρος (eukairos), opportune (2322); εὐκαίρως (eukairōs), when convenient (2323); ἀκαιρέομαι (akaireomai), have no time, no opportunity (177); ἀκαίρως (akairōs), untimely, ill-timed, inopportune (178); πρόσκαιρος (proskairos), temporary, transitory, passing (4672); σήμερον (sēmeron), today (4958); νῦν (nyn) now (3814); νυνί (nyni), now (3815); ἄρτι (arti), now, just, immediately (785); εὐθύς (euthys), at once, immediately (2317); εὐθέως (eutheōs), at once, immediately (2311).

CL 1. (a) In cl. Gk. kairos originally denoted right measure, correct proportion, that which is convenient and appropriate; it can also have a locative sense, meaning right spot, suitable place. Used in a material sense, it can denote importance, norm, wise moderation. Used in a temporal sense, the word characterizes a critical situation, one that demands a decision. Positively, this implies opportunity, suitable time, right moment; negatively, danger. But kairos can also appear as a synonym with other temporal concepts and denote generally time (chronos, → 5989), season of the year, hour (hōra, → 6052), or the present moment (e.g., nyn, now, and sēmeron, today). Various words have been derived from kairos (see the lexical paragraph above for these words with their meanings).

(b) Further mention must be made of the adv. nyn and the synonymous intensive form nyni, now, at the present moment. Not infrequently nyn has a more material meaning as well as the temporal, such as in accordance with the present situation, as matters now stand. nyn is also frequently used adjectivally, meaning present (e.g., ho nyn chronos, "the present time"), or even substantivally (e.g., to nyn, "the present time").

(c) Synonymous with nyn is the temporal adv. arti, now, just, forthwith. With the preps. heōs, until, and apo, away from, arti turns the attention from the present moment to the past or future.

2. The presence of the two etymological word groups for time suggests that the Gks. distinguished individual points of time that can be affected by human decisions (kairos) from the stream of time, whose progress is independent of human influence (chronos). The will to seize the moment, which can also grasp the wrong thing (kairos-thinking), counteracts the danger of fatalism, which can grow out of chronos-thinking.

(a) kairos, nyn, and sēmeron mark those points of time that are of importance for an individual's life in the infinite onward flow of the stream of chronos. Where the Gks. showed an interest in the exploration of tangible reality, reflection on time led to prominence being given to smaller units of time.

(b) It is against the background of the swift passing of time (chronos) that the point of time that demands action (kairos), whether it is given by gods or by fate, gains its importance. In later times Kairos was even worshiped as a god. kairos is the space of time in which decisions are made for the individual, which one must dare to exploit. Those who miss or evade their kairos destroy themselves. It is important to take to heart the call to recognize the moment and in all one's activity to find the right moment.

OT In the OT, where time is essentially understood qualitatively from the point of view of the encounter between God and humankind, the use of a term to denote the right moment was important. It is therefore not surprising that kairos occurs about 300x in the LXX, three times more than chronos. It is primarily used to render the Heb. word for time ʿēṯ (198x). In some places, kairos appears more or less synonymously with other words for time (such as chronos, Eccl. 3:1; Dan. 2:21; 7:12; Wis. 7:18; 8:8; hēmera, day, Ps. 37:19; Jer. 50:27, 31 = LXX 27:27, 31; hōra, hour, Num. 9:3, cf. 9:7, 13).

1. While kairos often serves simply for precise (e.g., Gen. 17:23, 26) or more general (e.g., Jdg. 11:26; 1 Ki. 11:4; Ps. 71:9) temporal designations, in other passages it helps to illustrate the characteristic aspect of the OT understanding of time. For time is not an anonymous destiny. Yahweh has created the whole of time and fills it in accordance with his will, and also fixes the individual kairoi (cf. Gen. 1:14). He does this as the Lord of nature, who guides the heavenly bodies (Job 38:32), directs the weather (Lev. 26:4), and allots times and seasons for the biological growth of plants (Ps. 1:3) and animals (Job 39:1). The feasts and festivals in the context of the yearly cycle are special times of joy and rest given by Yahweh (Exod. 23:14–17).

As Lord of humanity, God also apportions one's life span (Sir. 17:2): he determines the hour of birth (Eccl. 3:2) and death (7:17 = LXX 7:18). All the elements of human existence in their tension-laden diversity are times from and in God's hands (cf. Ps. 31:15), as the song in praise of time stresses (Eccl. 3:1–8).

In times of affliction it is not easy to hold to this confession of Yahweh as the giver of times, but even then the Israelites who remain with the covenant do not allow their relationship with God to be broken (cf. Ps. 32:6; 37:19, 39). It is in times of distress that they hope for a time of pardon (102:13), for the kairos of God's help and redemption (cf. Isa. 33:2; Judith 13:5).

2. Such a trust in the particular moment (kairos) of a saving act of Yahweh is founded on the historical experiences of the people of Israel. Again and again in the stereotyped phrase "at that time [kairos]," attention is directed to the events of salvation history in the past, in the first instance to the time of Moses and the exodus from Egypt (cf. e.g., Deut. 1:9, 16, 18), but also to the that of prophetess Deborah (Jdg. 4:4), the reign of David (1 Chr. 21:28–29), or the building of Solomon's temple (2 Chr. 7:8). Esp. in the historical books of the OT, kairos is often found with this function of drawing attention to God's activity in the history of his people.

3. In the OT prophets and in later apocalyptic circles of Jud., a change took place from a focus on the fulfilled time of earlier generations and the patriarchal traditions to the expectation and hope of judgment and fulfillment in the future, which achieves the same significance for life in the present as past history had done before. The phrase "at that time" now takes on a future reference (e.g., Jer. 3:17; 4:11; Dan. 12:1; Joel 3:1) and points to an intervention by God in the near or distant future that will have the character of a comprehensive judgment. For the godless in and around Israel, that "day of the Lord" will be a time (kairos) of visitation (Jer. 6:15; 10:15), wrath (Sir. 44:17), and punishment (5:7; 18:24). But those who remain obedient and practice righteousness await everlasting salvation (Zeph. 3:16, 19–20; cf. Isa. 60:20–22; Dan. 12:1–2). Right up to the final day of judgment, however, Yahweh gives time for repentance (cf. Sir. 18:21) and for acting uprightly. This comes about by a right use of the present kairos at any given time (cf. 51:30).

4. (a) In later Jewish writings both the chronological interest and the expectation of a final space of kairos are powerfully elaborated. The Jews prepared for an early end to the present time and hoped for a new age, conceived in temporal terms.

(b) The conception of time in the Dead Sea Scrolls has the strong imprint of deterministic thought. In the present ordering of time we must obey God's will (1QS 9:12–16), which consists in being separate from sinners in order to prepare the way for the last days (9:18–20). For God has preordained the moment of visitation (3:18), when an end will be put to wickedness and truth will come to light in the world forever (4:18–23).

NT In the NT, kairos occurs 85x, eukaireō 3x, and eukairia, eukairos, and eukairōs 2x each. akairōs and akaireomai are used once. proskairos occurs 4x, sēmeron 41x, nyn 147x, nyni 20x, arti 36x, euthys 51x, and eutheōs 36x. These words tend to be most prominent in the writings of Lk. and Paul.

1. The OT understanding of time stamps the NT use of the word group. In a whole range of passages kairos means the same or nearly the same as other words for time, denoting generally a particular time (e.g., the phrase "at that time," Matt. 11:25; 12:1; Acts 7:20). This should not be understood merely as a short point or moment of time (except in Lk. 8:13). kairos often refers to a longer or shorter time span (e.g., "the times of the Gentiles" in 21:24; "present sufferings" in Rom. 8:18). It can mean the times in the life of nature established in creation (Matt. 13:20; 21:34; Mk. 12:2), but any kind of nature idolatry is repudiated (Gal. 4:9–10), and the confession of God as the giver of fruitful times is given added strength (Acts 14:17).

2. The decisively new and constitutive factor for any Christian conception of time is the conviction that, with the coming of Jesus, a unique kairos has dawned, one by which all other time is qualified. Mk. 1:15 makes this clear in programmatic fashion: "The time [kairos] has come.... The kingdom of God is near. Repent and believe the good news." The time of grace for which the prophets hoped and waited has now been realized with Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 3:21; 1 Pet. 1:10–11). Anyone who listens to him now in faith and obedience will have eternal life (Jn. 5:25; cf. 3:36). With the life and esp. the suffering and death of Jesus, the old age has passed away, and with the present time of divine righteousness (Rom. 3:26; 5:6) the fulfillment of the times has dawned. But this time also presents the church with the opportunity to serve one another, as Paul suggests in Phil. 4:10 (using the vb. akaireomai, have no time, no opportunity).

3. (a) As the physical presence of Jesus plunged every concrete "today" into the light of divine salvation (Lk. 13:32; 19:5, 9; 23:43; cf. 2:11), so his redeeming power can become effective in our lives from now on through our relationship of faith with the exalted God (cf. 22:69). Jesus' suffering and death is no mere fact of the past; it is, rather, present time. From Easter on, this is the proclamation that counts: "I tell you, now is the time [kairos] of God's favor; now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2; cf. Isa. 49:8). By passing on this message of the kairos, the "now" of the offer of salvation keeps on becoming afresh the reality that demands a decision.

Just as the disciples obeyed when Jesus called them (Matt. 4:20, 22; Mk. 1:18), so each person is summoned today to respond to the missionary proclamation without delay and begin to follow Jesus. They are not to evade the decision by delaying the Today until Tomorrow and are certainly not to "harden" their hearts, i.e., to reinforce their will for an existence without God (cf. Heb. 3:7, 15; 4:7), lest they find themselves, like Jerusalem, standing under the verdict of a "woe" (cf. Lk. 19:44).

(b) If, therefore, kairos must be used initially for the fundamental decision of faith, those who are now reconciled (cf. Rom. 5:11; 13:11) must henceforth live by faith. The "once" or "formerly" of idolatry is to be superseded by the "now" of true worship of God (Gal. 4:8–9; Eph. 5:8–9). Faith brings release from being the servile victim of time; it brings freedom from the burdensome past through the acceptance of the gift of forgiveness. At the same time, however, it does not absolve one from the ethical responsibility to make sensible use of the time at one's disposal (Gal. 6:10; Col. 4:5). Indeed, the opposite is true. Believers are assigned historical time with the imperative to make "the most of every opportunity" (Eph. 5:16).

This new life of faith is not, of course, without affliction. "This present time [kairos]" (Lk. 12:56; cf. Mk. 10:30), and therefore also the time of the church, is not a time of blessedness free from temptation but a time of struggle (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24–27; Eph. 6:12; 1 Tim. 6:11–15) and suffering (Rom. 8:18). Thus Christians must encourage each other to prevent a falling away (Heb. 3:12–13) in the moment of temptation (Lk. 8:13).

4. The fullness of divine glory will dawn only with "the last time" (1 Pet. 1:5, kairos eschatos), the precise date of which is unknown (Mk. 13:33; Acts 1:7; 1 Thess. 5:1–11) and that is sometimes expected as imminent (1 Cor. 7:29; Rev. 1:3; 22:10) and sometimes as more remote (2 Thess. 2:1–12). The NT is always pointing to this telos of final time (→ telos, goal, 5465). The eschatological kairos is now understood Christologically as the time of Christ's return in glory (1 Tim. 6:14) and as the time of the final judgment (1 Cor. 4:5; 1 Pet. 4:17–18; Rev. 11:18; cf. Jn. 5:28–29), when the godless are punished and those who trust in God are rewarded (cf. Mk. 10:30; Gal. 6:9).

Thus with the pattern "once" and "now" there corresponds the "already" (confident in faith and hope) and "not yet" (full blessedness, cf. Rom. 8:18; Heb. 11:25–26; 1 Pet. 1:5–6). Jesus' lordship is still not completely visible or perceptible (Heb. 2:8). Satan is still allowed a period of time for his diabolical intrigues (Rev. 12:12). The Christian still comes up against the harsh realities of life (cf. 2 Cor. 4:18), esp. those of bad times (cf. Eph. 5:16; 2 Tim. 3:1; 4:3). The time between the appearance of the earthly Jesus and the Parousia thus remains a tension-laden time, which requires vigilant concentration (cf. Lk. 21:36; Eph. 6:18, by prayer) on the part of Christians. Such a time of probation, of course, stands clearly within the sign of the promise that embraces all times: "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today and forever" (Heb. 13:8).

See also aiōn, aeon, age, life span, epoch, eternity (172); chronos, time, period of time (5989); hōra, hour, time, point of time (6052).

2790 Καῖσαρ

Καῖσαρ (Kaisar), Caesar, emperor (2790).

CL "Caesar" was originally a proper name, the family name of the Julian family, esp. of Julius Caesar, but also of Augustus (so Lk. 2:1). It developed a titular significance and became equivalent to "the emperor." This usage appears in all NT refs.

NT Insofar as Kaisar functions as a theological concept within the NT, it denotes the legitimate power of political authority. Thus, it is important for Luke that Paul can affirm his innocence not only with respect to the Jewish law and temple, but also with respect to Caesar (Acts 25:8); so too Paul is wholly justified in appealing to this civil power for protection against what amounted to religious persecution (25:11).

It is possible, however, for the authority of Caesar to be contrary to the authority of God in a false antithesis. Thus, according to Acts 17:1–9, the Jewish community in Thessalonica had apparently achieved a satisfactory balance between their religious and secular obligations and felt a threat to this equilibrium by the strong challenge of the Christian gospel (cf. 2 Thess. 2:5). That which was threatening their established way of life, they accused of threatening the law and order of society at large. The claims of the exalted and soon-to-return king Jesus on personal life and relationships were so far-reaching that they could be (and were) misrepresented as the claims of an earthly tyrant, and Jesus was portrayed as a rival to Caesar (Acts 17:7).

The possible conflict between the authority of God and that of Caesar must have been a real one for early Christians and is tackled in Mk. 12:13–17. The question put to Jesus concerned the poll tax that had been levied on the inhabitants of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea since A.D. 6. As tribute money to the occupying Roman power, the tax became a focus for intense national and religious feeling on the part of the Jews. The Zealots were esp. vehement and implacable in their hostility; God was their only ruler and king. The question whether it was lawful to pay the tax to Caesar was thus well chosen to trap Jesus on the horns of a dilemma: Either deny the authority of Caesar (rebellion) or deny the full authority of God (blasphemy).

Jesus clearly viewed the antithesis as false, for political and divine authority need not necessarily conflict. Paying taxes is a legitimate obligation within the network of human relations. Thus, the poll tax did not conflict with the higher authority of God. To pose Caesar and God as mutually exclusive authorities makes all human relationships antithetical to divine authority, for all relationships involve obligation of one kind or another. Human beings can live within human relationships of authority and obligation and still "give... to God what is God's."

There is, however, the possibility of real conflict between one's obligation to Caesar and obligation to God. Loyalty to Caesar can become an excuse for evading higher obligation to the truth (Jn. 18:38; 19:12–16). Those who limit their motives and aims to friendship with Caesar shut themselves off from an answer to the question, "What is truth?" Whoever affirms loyalty only to Caesar is thereby self-condemned (cf. Jn. 16:8–11).

See also hēgemōn, leader, commander, chief (2450); anthypatos, proconsul (478).

2798 (kakia, badness), → 2805.

2800 κακολογέω

κακολογέω (kakologeō), speak evil of, revile, insult, execrate (2800).

CL & OT kakologeō is seldom used in cl. Gk. It means speak ill of, revile (a person or thing; see 2 Macc. 4:1). In the LXX kakologeō often means execrate (cf. Exod. 21:16; 22:28; Ezek. 22:7). The transition to this meaning has its explanation in the Jewish belief in the power of the spoken word. Certainly reviling can also include a curse.

NT kakologeō occurs 4x in the NT. In Matt. 15:4 and Mk. 7:10 it has the idea of curse. The biblical basis here is Exod. 21:17. Jesus takes issue with the Jewish interpretation of the biblical commandments, which softened their meaning and robbed them of their force (Matt. 15:5–6). In Mk. 9:39 Jesus forbids his disciples from restraining a strange miracle worker who was casting out demons in his name, for "no one who does a miracle in my name can in the next moment say anything bad about me." In Acts 19:9 kakologeō refers to unbelieving Jews who "publicly maligned the Way."

See also anathema, cursed, accursed (353); katara, curse, malediction (2932); rhaka, empty-head, fool (4819).

2801 (kakopatheia, suffering), → 4248.

2802 (kakopatheō, suffer evil, endure hardship), → 4248.

2803 (kakopoieō, do wrong, harm), → 2805.

2804 (kakopoios, evildoer), → 2805.

2805 κακός

κακός (kakos), bad, evil (2805); ἄκακος (akakos), guileless, innocent (179); κακία (kakia), badness (2798); κακόω (kakoō), harm, embitter (2808); κακῶς (kakoō), badly, with evil intent (2809); κακοποιέω (kakopoieō), do wrong, harm (2803); κακοποιός (kakopoios), evildoer (2804); κακοῦργος (kakourgos), evildoer, delinquent (2806); ἐγκακέω (enkakeō), become tired, lose heart (1591); φαῦλος (phaulos), bad, evil (5765).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kakos means bad in the sense of lacking something, always in contrast to agathos, good. It has four primary uses: (a) negligible, unsuitable; (b) morally evil; (c) weak, miserable; (d) harmful, unfavorable. to kakon and the pl. ta kaka mean evil, suffering, misfortune, ruin.

The Gk. world had two basic frameworks within which to understand the question of the meaning and origin of evil. (a) Evil was seen as a metaphysical principle. (b) Human ignorance is the source of all evil. An unenlightened and ignorant person does evil involuntarily, and this is the basis of ruin and corruption. Enlightenment leads to knowledge and frees one from evil, causing one to do good.

Plato synthesized these two basic concepts by developing a metaphysical dualism of spirit and matter, with its ethical expression in a dualism of soul and body. The cause leading to evil lies in the material and physical. In his old age Plato went a step further and assumed the existence of an evil world soul.

The basis of evil in the cl. world must not be regarded as personal guilt, for it is not the result of a free and responsible personal decision to do evil but of a lack, such as the lack of knowing divine providence.

2. In the LXX kakos is used predominantly for Heb. raʿ and rāʿâ (227x), which are also rendered by ponēros 226x (→ 4505). There is a similar balance in the use of the vbs. kakoō (21x) and ponēreuomai (22x).

(a) kakos is primarily the evil that objectively hurts one's existence. (i) It is principally regarded as God's punishment (Deut. 31:17), which usually corresponds to the preceding sin. Yahweh brings evil back on one's head. Hence Amos 3:6b can say, "When disaster comes to a city, has not the LORD caused it?" (ii) Yet God grants protection to the pious in the midst of all evil (Ps. 23:4). God's "plans [are] to prosper you and not to harm you" (Jer. 29:11 = LXX 36:11). (iii) Behind the evil lies God's gracious purpose of visitation. His final purpose is "to give you hope and a future" (Jer. 29:11c). (iv) The OT reaches the climax of its search for the origin and purpose of evil when faced with God's all-sovereign goodness. Here all questioning is silenced. In Job the three friends seek to link Job's suffering with his sins. Job never denies his sinfulness, but the work as a whole makes no direct connection between his sinfulness and his sufferings. Suffering is not necessarily the result of sin; it may be training in faith and hence testing (Job 5:17–18; cf. also Ps. 73).

(b) Evil is also an aspect of moral behavior (cf. Ps. 28:3; 34:12–16; Jer. 7:24; Mic. 2:1). Note that the OT seldom speaks theoretically of evil. It describes it concretely.

(c) Some passage of the OT connect the concept of evil with an evil power opposed to God (cf. 1 Chr. 21:1).

3. According to the teaching of Qumran, God created at the beginning two spirits, the good spirit (the spirit of light) and the evil spirit (the spirit of darkness). According to God's eternal decree, all humans belong to one or other of these spirits, and this is revealed by their good or evil deeds (1QS 3:13–21).

4. Philo attributes the origin of good to God and evil to humanity. But human beings have the possibility of choosing the good, just as they choose between good and bad clothes. Evil is a reality opposed to God, but not a person opposed to him.

NT 1. kakos (50x in the NT, half in Paul) means evil, bad, destructive, unjust. Its derivative akakos means without suspicion, simpleminded (Rom. 16:18) or guiltless, untouched by evil (used of Christ in Heb. 7:26). The related adv., kakōs, occurs 16x, often in connection with diseases (Mk. 1:32, 34; 2:17). Jas. 4:3 uses this word to mean improper motives.

The noun kakia is often used synonymously with the neut. adj. kakon to mean evil, wickedness, and denotes the source of the behavior of a kakos, an evil person, or kakopoios, evildoer (cf. Acts 8:22; Rom. 1:29; 1 Cor. 5:8). In Matt. 6:34 it has the more general meaning of trouble, hardship, or misfortune.

The vb. kakoō means do evil, cause damage, or harm (1 Pet. 3:13; 5x in Acts); kakopoieō means behave badly, do wrong (1 Pet. 3:17; 3 Jn. 11), harm (cf. Mk. 3:4; Lk. 6:9). A change in meaning is evident with enkakeō. It no longer means behave badly, but become tired or careless (e.g., in prayer, Lk. 18:1; in doing good, 2 Thess. 3:13) or lose heart (2 Cor. 4:1, 16; Eph. 3:13). Weariness here is not physical but spiritual.

kakos and its derivations are of less importance in the NT than in the OT, since the NT prefers ponēros and hamartia (→ 281) to express evil and personal guilt.

2. (a) The NT knows of no dualism in which evil has the same power as good. Equally rejected is the idea that the root of evil could lie in God, "for God cannot be tempted by evil" (Jas. 1:13). Evil comes rather from a person's heart in the form of evil thoughts that find expression in acts (Mk. 7:21–22 par.), such as love of money (1 Tim. 6:10) or the misuse of the tongue (Jas. 3:6–10; 1 Pet. 3:10).

(b) Evil may be God's righteous punishment, from which only repentance can deliver one (e.g., Lk. 13:1–5), or it can be borne and conquered by the experience of the love of God in Christ (Rom. 5:5; 8:35, 37–39).

(c) kakos is used attributively as a noun of persons (Matt. 21:41; 24:48; Phil. 3:2; Tit. 1:12; Rev. 2:2) and of things (Mk. 7:21; Rom. 13:3; 1 Cor. 15:33; Rev. 16:2). Otherwise it is always a neut. noun meaning evil or the evil in the sense of a misfortune, wrong, suffering (cf. Lk. 16:25; Acts 16:28; 28:5), or an evil act, a sin (cf. Matt. 27:23 par.; Acts 23:9).

(d) For Paul, the problem of evil lies in the fact that people often do evil against their will (Rom. 7:15, 17–19), which rules in them like a strange law (7:21, 23), and yet it is an expression of their existence and nature. One's evil nature shows itself in evil acts, separates one from God, and brings one under judgment. Since we constantly do the evil instead of the good we want to do and thus achieve death and not life, every hope of conquering evil by our own strength is demolished. The solution of this problem is found in Christ's victory over evil in his cross and resurrection. Note Paul's shout of salvation: "Thanks be to God—through Jesus Christ our Lord!" (Rom. 7:25).

(e) We must understand the apostolic exhortations to conquer, lay aside, and shun evil against this background of evil being stripped of its power (Rom. 12:17, 21; 16:19; 1 Cor. 10:6; Col. 3:5; 1 Pet. 3:11). Though every governing authority (Rom. 13:1, 3–4; → exousia, 2026) should as God's representative hold down evil, the problem of evil is finally solved only by justification and sanctification. The one who has been justified is in the sphere of influence of the One who has conquered evil and who gives the Spirit. Hence no believer faces the powers of evil without strength (Rom. 13:10; 2 Cor. 13:7).

3. phaulos (6x in the NT) is a synonym of kakos. In Tit. 2:8 it is used in a judgment on people. Otherwise it is used for people's actions (Jn. 3:20; 5:29; Rom. 9:11; 2 Cor. 5:10; Jas. 3:16); its opposite is agathos (→ 19).

4. In two NT passages we find kakourgos, evildoer, criminal. In Lk. 23:32, 33, 39, it is used for the criminals crucified with Jesus. In 2 Tim. 2:9 Paul uses it to refer to his imprisonment "like a criminal."

See also ponēros, sick, bad, evil (4505).

2806 (kakourgos, evildoer, delinquent), → 2805.

2808 (kakoō, harm, embitter), → 2805.

2809 (kakōs, badly, with evil intent), → 2805.

2813 καλέω

καλέω (kaleō), call (2813); κλῆσις (klēsis), call, invitation (3104); κλητός (klētos), called, invited (3105); ἐπικαλέω (epikaleō), call, appeal to (2126); προσκαλέω (proskaleō), summon (4673).

CL 1. (a) kaleō means to speak to another person, either immediately or mediately, in order to bring that person nearer, either physically or in a personal relationship. Thus the word can mean invite (e.g., into a house, to a feast) The part. klētos means invited one, a guest, and klēsis means the act of inviting (even official summons by an authority). (b) kaleō (and epikaleō) and klēsis mean summon one's adversary or witnesses before a court of law—later, proskaleō and prosklēsis were used. (c) kaleō also means to name, either when a person is being addressed or when a name is bestowed. kaloumenos with the names of people or places means called, so-called.

2. epikaleō, usually in the mid., normally has the meaning of invoking. It is used either of the worship of the gods or, in legal language, of lodging an appeal.

3. kaleō and klēsis are seldom used of a divine call in cl. Gk. Such a use comes from the mystery religions, the influence of the LXX, and especially NT use. Various words besides kaleō were used to denote an individual's work in society (e.g., ergon or ponos); work was considered to be one's calling. Consciousness of vocation remained confined to priests and to some extent to those who devoted themselves to intellectual and administrative tasks.

OT With minor exceptions kaleō (ca. 300x), epikaleō (ca. 150x), and proskaleō (25x) are used in the LXX to render various forms of the Heb. qārā'. The LXX uses klēsis only in Jer. 31:6 (LXX 38:6); 3 Macc. 5:14; Jdt. 12:10. klētoi and the part. keklēmenoi are used for those invited (guests). The combination klētē hagia denotes the worshiping congregation at festivals (Exod. 12:16; Lev. 23:2–37 [11x]; Num. 28:25). The phrase is particularly used with reference to their calendar (see also ekklēsia [1711]).

1. (a) kaleō often means naming—of things (e.g., Gen. 1:5, 8–9; 2:19; Isa. 35:8; 56:7) or persons (e.g., Gen. 25:26, Jacob; 29:32–35; 30:6–24). When God promises to give his servants "another name" (Isa. 65:15), it implies a new existence. (b) epikaleō can also denote naming (e.g., Num. 21:3). The phrase "Your name is called (epikeklētai) over us" (Jer. 7:14 in LXX) implies a special degree of possession and protection.

2. epikaleō is the most important term in the LXX for calling on the Lord and worshiping him, and it has the special characteristic of confession (cf. Gen. 4:26; where a cry of need is involved, krazō may be used). Worship is addressed to God, to the God of Israel, to the Lord (1 Ki. 17:21), or above all to the name of God (Gen. 13:4; Isa. 64:7; Jer. 10:25), which is a strong tower (cf. Prov. 18:10). The purpose of the manifestation of God's presence is that we should turn to him in worship.

3. (a) For the most part kaleō and proskaleō describe a call from those higher in rank to individuals or groups under them, e.g., parents to children (Gen. 24:58), rulers to subjects (Exod. 1:18; Jdg. 12:1), and Moses to the elders (Exod. 12:21; 19:7). Such a call was always a summons or a command, never a mere invitation (Job 13:22). This call expects people to hear and answer, though they can refuse to obey God's call (Isa. 50:2; 65:12; Jer. 7:13; cf. 13:10). By contrast, God's commanding call creates order in the universe. He calls the stars (Isa. 40:26) and causes events to happen in history.

(b) Before a person can answer God's call, one must realize that the call has indeed come from God. The difficulty of this is shown dramatically in the story of Samuel's call (1 Sam. 3:4–10; kaleō appears 11x). God's call often leads to suffering for his sake. This shows that fundamentally his call is only bringing to light the election that preceded it. In Isaiah's Servant Songs we have the profoundest use of kaleō in the sense of service and dedication, linked with an exceptionally frequent appearance of eklegomai, choose (→ 1721). God calls the elect one (Isa. 41:8; 43:10) in righteousness (42:6) and by name (43:1; 45:3). This individual is a type of all who have been called (41:2, 4).

4. This word group does not occur in the accounts of the call of the judges (Jdg. 6:13) and the prophets (cf. Isa. 6:1–8; 40:6–12; Jer. 1:4–9; Ezek. 2:1–8). This is because those calls are not described in Scripture with specific words but by content and form.

5. Within Jud. only the people of Qumran seem to have had a special sense of call. While election played a considerable part there, the specific call of God is mentioned only 2x, though the expression "the called of God" is found a number of times.

NT In the NT kaleō is found 148x, epikaleō 30x, proskaleō 29x, klēsis 11x, and klētos 10x. Paul tends to use the word group often, whereas it occurs rarely in the General Letters and in Rev. Lk.'s infrequent use of it is probably due to his Greek background; he is the only NT writer to use more classical compounds such as eiskaleō, invite, metakaleō, have brought to oneself.

1. (a) In the NT kaleō can mean the giving of a name (Matt. 1:21; Jn. 1:42), the use of a title when addressing someone (Matt. 23:7–8), or the attribution of a particular rank (23:9, father; Lk. 6:46, Lord; 22:25, benefactor). Of special importance are the cases where God gives a name. By conferring the names "Jesus" (Lk. 1:31) and "John" (1:13), God expresses, as in the OT, his control over their lives.

(b) Frequently behind the pass. kaleomai, be named, be called, lies an expression of the character and existence of a person or thing. This is perhaps most clearly seen in Paul's remark that he does "not even deserve to be called an apostle" (1 Cor. 15:9). Often in such expressions OT ideas have been taken over, as in Mk. 11:17 par., where the temple is called "a house of prayer" (quoting Isa. 56:7). This usage is particularly important in Lk. 1:32, 35, where Jesus is called "the Son of the Most High," i.e., "the Son of God." Consequently, his followers will be called "sons of God" (Matt. 5:9; Rom. 9:26) and "children of God" (1 Jn. 3:1). These new names clearly express a new existence granted by an act of God.

2. (a) We meet the meaning "invite" for kaleō principally in the parables of the great banquet (Lk. 14:7–25 [11x]) and the marriage feast (Matt. 22:2–10 [5x]; cf. also Rev. 19:9). There is a hint of both privilege and command in these passages. Probably this is also how we should understand "I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners" (Matt. 9:13; Mk. 2:17; Lk. 5:32). When someone ignores the divine invitation, he or she is not only missing an opportunity, but may be squandering life and hope.

(b) The note of command in the verb comes through even more clearly in passages where rulers or officials call their subordinates: Herod (Matt. 2:7) and the owner of the vineyard (20:8). As a result, it would have been natural for Jesus to use it as a special term for the call of his disciples, though it occurs only in 4:21 and Mk. 1:20.

(c) It is striking that proskaleō is likewise not used for such a call. This word is used of a commanding call to an individual (Matt. 18:2; Mk. 15:44), an existing, fairly well-defined group like the disciples (Matt. 10:1; Mk. 6:7; 12:43; Acts 6:2), or the people in general (Matt. 15:10; Mk. 7:14). In Acts 13:2 the vb. indicates the heavenly call to Paul and Barnabas, which was to be realized in their earthly commissioning. In 16:10 a heavenly directive to Paul and his companions was communicated by a vision.

(d) The statement, "For many are invited [klētoi], but few are chosen" (Matt. 22:14), reflects on the relationship between God's call and election. It shows that, at least from the standpoint of human response, the circle of the called and of the elect cannot be taken as necessarily coinciding (→ eklegomai, choose [1721]).

3. (a) Paul uses kaleō (33x), klēsis (9x), and klētos (7x) almost always with the sense of divine calling. He understands calling as the process by which God calls those whom he has already elected and appointed out of their bondage to this world, so that he may justify and sanctify them (Rom. 8:29–30) and bring them into his service. This call is thus part of God's work of reconciliation and peace (1 Cor. 7:15). It reaches us only through the love of Christ directed toward us (Gal. 1:6, 15).

When Paul says that God's decision is not dependent on works but solely "by him who calls" (Rom. 9:12), he is stressing the unfettered choice of God, which is not influenced by human preconditions (cf. also Gal. 1:6; 1 Thess. 2:12; 1 Pet. 1:15). Rom. 4:17 shows that God's call means a new existence, equivalent to a new creation.

(b) God's call is mediated by the message of the gospel (2 Thess. 2:14), which comes through the witness of humans. It brings people into fellowship with Christ (1 Cor. 1:9) and with the other members of his body. Since the divine call is "as members of one body" (Col. 3:15), it is equivalent to entering the kingdom of God. The use of klēsis always indicates either that the call comes from God (Rom. 11:29; Phil. 3:14) or that one is brought into fellowship with the church as a whole (1 Cor. 1:26; Eph. 4:1). Baptism is both a visible sign of the call and of the obligation of the believer to live a life "worthy of the calling . . . received" (Eph. 4:1; cf. 1 Thess. 2:12).

(c) Paul addresses church members as klētoi, called ones (Rom. 1:6–7; 8:28; 1 Cor. 1:2, 24—sometimes written as those "called as saints"). He stresses that both the existence of the church and individual membership in it are based solely on the will and work of God. In 1 Cor. 1:26 we see how Paul saw this calling as dependent on God and how it involves the church. In considering their calling, the Corinthians will realize what they once were and with what sort of people God has joined them in his church.

In 1 Cor. 7:15–24 the Christian's call does not necessarily change his or her social status. That is, it does not free the slave from a master or force the believer to change occupations. The change in relationships is reached not by revolution but by a change in one's inner attitude. In 1 Cor. 7:20 klēsis denotes a particular place or station in life.

(d) In rare cases Paul uses klētos of a personal commission. When in Rom. 1:1 and 1 Cor. 1:1 he declares himself to be klētos apostolos ("called to be an apostle"), he is stressing that he owes his office as apostle to a special call by God.

4. The use of the word group in 1 Pet. is essentially Pauline. Peter stresses in 1:15 and 5:10 that the call comes from God and that God has a purpose in his call (2:21; 3:9). Those called by him are to bear witness to the one who has called them out of darkness (2:9) by following the example of Christ (2:21); thus, they will inherit a blessing (3:9). Similar is Heb. 3:1 and 9:15, which speak of the heavenly call and a promised inheritance.

5. epikaleō (in the NT only in the mid. and pass.) is used with much the same nuance as kaleō. In the expression "[those] who bear my name" (lit., "over whom the name of God has been called," Acts 15:17; cf. Jas. 2:7), both God's assumption of power over his people and his simultaneous expression of care for them are brought out. Twice (Acts 4:36; 12:12) epikaleō is a virtual synonym for kaleō.

Paul uses epikaleō 6x in his appeal to Caesar (Acts 25–28). In addition, it is frequently used of calling on God or his name (cf. 7:59; 9:14; Rom. 10:12–14; 1 Cor. 1:2). It normally carries with it the thought of confessing God within the church. In 2 Cor. 1:23 we note an exception, for here God is being called on as a witness. Such expressions are based on OT language for the invocation of Yahweh.

2814 (kallielaios, cultivated olive), → 1778.

2815 (kalodidaskalos, teaching what is good), → 1437.

2818 (kalopoieō, do good), → 2819.

2819 καλός

καλός (kalos), good, beautiful, noble (2819); καλοποιέω (kalopoieō), do good (2818); καλῶς (kalōs), well, beautifully (2822).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the basic meaning of kalos is organically fit, suitable, useful, sound: e.g., a suitable harbor, a healthy body, pure gold, an unblemished sacrifice. Aesthetic judgments became attached to this meaning, so that kalos also came to mean the beautiful. Finally the concept was broadened again to mean morally good. Thus, the concept kalos achieved an inclusive meaning, denoting a state of soundness, wholeness, and order, both externally and internally.

(b) A Gk. ideal for life and education was expressed by the phrase kalos kai agathos, which showed the aristocracy how to live. An education based on the arts and exemplary behavior molded the nobleman in the ethics of his class. Socrates and Plato raised this chivalrous class ethic to be a general goal of all Gk. education. In their writings the kalos kagathos (as it came to be written) is someone who is respectful and fair, thoughtful and discreet, moderate and capable in the way he conducts his life.

(c) Finally, Plato raised the concept kalos in the sphere of philosophy and religion to the status of an eternal idea by linking it with the experience of erōs (love). The unremitting longing and striving of the soul is directed towards the kalon; erōs is the force that drives people to seek and recognize the kalon in this world. Earthly beauty partakes of the eternal archetype of the beautiful. The kalon thus links the divine and earthly realms and gives life meaning and an eternal dimension. This religious significance of kalos was retained in later Christian thought. True beauty is at one with the eternally true and good and is only found with God; everything on earth is a mere reflection of that divine beauty.

2. The meaning the Gks. gave to kalos scarcely penetrated the world of the OT or NT. In the LXX kalos occurs most often beside agathos and chrēstos as a translation of ṭôb. It means good—not so much in the sense of an ethical evaluation as in that which is pleasant, enjoyable, beneficial. kalos is what is pleasing to Yahweh, what he likes, or what gives him joy. Note esp. the use of kala as an expression of God's aesthetic judgment in Gen. 1:31. kalos means fair or beautiful in, e.g., 6:2; 12:14; 2 Sam. 11:2; 13:1.

It is striking that the OT shows no interest in the Gk. ideal of beauty as a motive for living and for education. Everything is directed toward God's will, which is expressed in the law; any ideal of self-perfection is thus excluded. Hence, kalos is frequently used as a synonym for agathos (cf. Isa. 1:17; Mic. 6:8; Mal 2:17; also Num. 24:1; Deut. 6:18; 12:28; 2 Chr. 14:2; Prov. 3:4). In the story of the fall, kalos is used in the description of "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil" (Gen. 2:9, 17).

NT 1. In the NT kalos is used 100x (almost the same as agathos, 102x; → 19) to denote good. In the Synoptic Gospels, John the Baptist demanded from those who wanted to enter the fellowship of the kingdom "good fruit" (Matt. 3:10; Lk. 3:9). Jesus made the same demand (Matt. 7:17–19; 12:33; cf. Lk. 6:43–45). His parables speak of "good seed" (Matt. 13:24, 27, 38), "good fish" (i.e., people) who are caught in the net (13:48), and "good soil" in which the Word flourishes (13:23; Mk. 4:20; Lk. 8:15). It is in this sense that Jesus calls us to "good deeds" (Matt. 5:16), which are summed up in the maxim of 25:40: "Whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did for me." They remain connected with the works of love that served as directives for the practice of mercy in Jud. (cf. Isa. 58:6–7). At the same time, from good deeds is removed all thought of striving after reward (cf. Lk. 10:30–37).

In the story of the anointing at Bethany (Mk. 14:6), Jesus, aware of his imminent passion, places this "beautiful thing" done to him higher than his disciples' almsgiving. The opportunity for this act—the anticipatory anointing of his body and thus the affirmation of his path of suffering—only offered itself in this historical moment.

2. In Jn. Jesus is "the good [kalos] shepherd." Here kalos brings into focus his office as shepherd in all its uniqueness, in contrast to contemporary false claims to the office of shepherd (Jn. 10:11, 14). He is the good, the lawful, shepherd, because he opposes the wolf at the risk and cost of his own life. This pattern of Jesus must be seen against the OT background of Yahweh as shepherd (Gen. 49:24; Ps. 23; → poimēn, 4478). In Jn. 10:32 Jesus speaks of his "many great [kalos] miracles" in the context of a controversy with the Jews. It is not the miracles themselves that are in dispute, but his messianic claim, the evidence for which is in these works.

3. In general Paul uses kalos as a synonym for agathos; it does not convey anything that could not be expressed by agathos (cf. Rom. 7:18, 21; 1 Cor. 7:1; 2 Cor. 13:7; Gal. 6:9). By contrast, the preference for kalos in the Pastorals is striking (cf., e.g., 1 Tim.3:1; 5:10, 25; 6:18; Tit. 2:7, 14; 3:8, 14), esp. in military imagery (cf. 1 Tim. 1:18; 6:12; 2 Tim. 2:3; 4:7). The reason for this usage may be because kalos was a favorite in popular Hel. speech and expressed a Hel. sense of values. Thus, it helped express more clearly for a second generation of Christians what is involved in Christian discipleship. kalos continues in the General Letters to describe desirable Christian conduct (e.g., Heb. 5:14; 10:24; Jas. 2:7; 3:13; 4:17; 1 Pet. 2:12; 4:10).

4. The adv. kalōs occurs 37x in the NT. It often bears the meaning to say something right or correctly (e.g., of the Scriptures, Matt. 15:7; Acts 28:25; of people, Mk. 12:32; Jn. 4:17). It can also be used to denote correct or appropriate conduct (e.g., 1 Tim. 3:4, 12–13; Heb. 13:18; Jas. 2:8).

See also agathos, good (19); chrēstos, pleasant, kind, good (5982).

2820 (kalymma, veil, covering), → 2821.

2821 καλύπτω

καλύπτω (kalyptō), cover, hide, conceal (2821); ἀνακαλύπτω (anakalyptō), uncover, unveil (365); κατακαλύπτω (katakalyptō), cover up, veil (2877); κάλυμμα (kalymma), veil, covering (2820); ἀκατακάλυπτος (akatakalyptos), unveiled (184).

CL & OT 1. kalypto, to conceal, cover, occurs in cl. Gk. in both lit. and fig. senses. It is often used in the sense of burying someone by covering with earth. katakalyptō, to hide, cover up, put on a veil, is attested in cl. Gk. from Homer on, while anakalyptō, to uncover, remove a veil, is a later word. kalymma, veil, head-covering, is used in a variety of ways, such as the veil of a bride or the veil that a priest wore when he spoke on behalf of a deity.

2. (a) kalypto in the LXX is used of the cloud that covered Sinai and of the darkness that covers the earth (Exod. 24:15; Isa. 60:2). In Ps. 32:5 the word is used of concealing sin, while in 85:2 it refers to God's covering of sin in forgiveness. The word is frequent in Ps. (e.g., 44:15; 69:7; 85:2) and Ezek. (e.g., 7:18; 16:8; 24:7–8).

(b) anakalyptō is related in meaning to apokalyptō (→ 636). It is used in Job 12:22 of the uncovering of hidden depths shrouded in darkness and in 33:16 of the uncovering of the human mind. In Isa. 47:3 Babylon, addressed as a virgin, is threatened with the uncovering of her nakedness as a divine punishment, while in Jer. 13:22 Judah is similarly threatened with the lifting of her skirts (a symbol of humiliation).

(c) katakalyptō occurs in Exod. 26:34; Num. 4:5 of the covering of the ark with a curtain. In Isa. 6:2 the seraphim cover their faces and feet with their wings. Tamar in Gen. 38:15 veils her face, i.e., like a prostitute. The rare verbal adj. akatakalyptos, unveiled, occurs in Lev. 13:45.

(d) kalymma is used in Exod. 34:34–35 of the veil worn by Moses to cover his face. In Num. 4:6, 8, 12, etc., this word (along with katakalymma) is used of the cloths with which the holy objects like the ark of the covenant, the altar, and the altar vessels were kept from being touched or seen. To look at them or touch them could mean death (Num. 4:15, 20).

NT 1. (a) In the lit. sense kalyptō is found at Matt. 8:24 (the boat is covered by waves); Lk. 8:16 (no one hides a lit lamp in a jar); and 23:30 (people cry to the hills to cover them). (b) A fig. use is found in the general statement, "There is nothing concealed that will not be disclosed" (Matt. 10:26; cf. Lk. 12:2). The statement allows of various applications, but in the context it refers to the commission Jesus gave to his disciples. The word told to them in secret is to be proclaimed publicly from the rooftops (Matt. 10:27).

2. In 1 Cor. 11:1–6 Paul deals with the question of women's veils. This is the only place in the NT where the mid. katakalyptomai, to veil oneself (11:6–7), and the adj. akatakalyptos, unveiled (11:5, 13), are found. Paul requires women to wear a veil when praying or prophesying in church (11:4–5) and offers various arguments why. For one thing, this is in keeping with the strict Jewish practice of what is fitting and proper, according to which it would be unthinkable for a woman to appear in public without a veil (11:13). Paul wants this custom to be observed not only in Corinth but also in the other churches as well (11:16).

The most puzzling ground for this ruling is the one given in 11:10: Women are to have a "sign of authority" (exousia) on their heads. Exactly what Paul means by this is unclear. Just as difficult are the words "because of the angels" in this verse. Are the angels guardians of the natural order (11:8–9; cf. Gen. 2:21–23)? Or is the veil a protection against fallen angels, who might wish to lead the women astray? The brevity of Paul's reference makes its interpretation difficult (→ kephalē, 3051, for more interpretative comments on 1 Cor. 11:2–16).

3. (a) The word kalymma, covering, occurs 4x in the NT, all in 2 Cor. 3:13–16. Here Paul refers to Exod. 34:33–35, where Moses puts a veil over his face because the Israelites feared the divine radiance coming from it (34:30; cf. Num. 4:15, 20). Paul disregards the fear motive. Rather, he suggests that Moses put on the veil in order that the Israelites might not see the end of his temporary radiance. One of Paul's main points here is the passing glory of the old covenant contrasted with the eternal glory of the new (2 Cor. 3:11). This veil remains unlifted up to the present day when the "old covenant" is read

(3:14–15). It lies over the minds of the Jews who cannot grasp the true meaning of the old covenant as pointing to Christ. Just as Moses removed the veil when he went in to God (Exod. 34:34), so will the veil be removed from Israel when they are converted to the Lord, i.e., when they allow themselves to be ruled by the Spirit (3:16).

(b) The only NT instances of the vb. anakalyptō , to unveil, uncover, are also found in 2 Cor. 3:14, 18. Paul's statement in 3:14, which says that the veil remains over the reading of the "old covenant," is difficult to interpret, though Paul emphasizes that for Christians the veils that might prevent them from seeing "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ" (4:4; cf. 4:6) have been removed. This is clear from 3:18, which expresses this assurance of Christian faith: "We [believers] . . . with unveiled faces all reflect the Lord's glory." The beholders are changed by the Lord, who is the Spirit (3:17), into the likeness of the one whom they behold.

In Corinth there were opponents of the apostle who held that his gospel was veiled (cf. 2 Cor. 4:3, pass. of kalyptō), that is, obscure or contradictory. Paul throws back the criticism in his opponents' face by saying that it is veiled "to those who are perishing," that is, to those who cannot see the light of the gospel because Satan has blinded them (4:4). This judgment agrees with the remarks about the unbelieving Jews made in 2 Cor. 3:13.

4. In 1 Pet. 4:8 the readers are exhorted to love on the ground that "love covers over a multitude of sins." In Jas. 5:20 the same exhortation is given in order to bring back "a sinner from the error of his way." Probably what we have here is a catch phrase that had its origin in Prov. 10:12. This phrase may mean that love wins for those who practice it the divine forgiveness of sins. More likely, however, it means that love covers up, by means of human forgiveness, a multitude of sins in others.

See also kryptō, hide, conceal (3221).

2822 (kalōs, well, beautifully), → 2819.

2834 κανών

κανών (kanōn), rule, standard, norm (2834).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kanōn is a loan word from Sem., where it meant reed, cane, stalk of grain. kanōn means anything that can be held against something else in order to stretch, roll up, or measure it. The idea of measurement became predominant, and eventually kanōn meant esp. a measuring line or rod, fixed rule, norm. In mathematics, astronomy, and history, kanōn means list or table; in art a guideline. In philosophy kanōn denotes a criterion of judgment.

In 4 Macc. 7:21 kanōn means a standard of judgment, while in Jdt. 13:6 it stands for something like a bedpost. In Mic. 7:4, an almost unintelligible verse in the LXX, kanōn seems to be a meaningless conjecture with no Heb. equivalent.

NT 1. kanōn occurs 4x in the NT, only by Paul. It denotes both the rule for the individual Christian's life and the standard by which to judge others. "Peace and mercy to all who follow this rule [kanōn], even to the Israel of God" (Gal. 6:16). Paul is summing up here all he has previously said, esp. about the death of Christ on the cross, which gives a new relationship with God and a new basis for existence. The kanōn establishes a new scale of values, different from everything outside salvation in Christ. These values are to be applied in our everyday lives. To "follow this rule" means that the new being, shaped by Christ's saving work, manifests itself in thought and action. Whoever lives by the rule belongs to the "Israel of God."

2. kanōn occurs in some MSS readings of Phil. 3:16: "Only let us live up to [the same standard as] what we have already attained." In the context Paul speaks of being taken hold of by Christ, an experience that enables him to press toward the goal of his heavenly calling. If we adopt the word kanōn here, it has same sense as in Gal. 6:16.

3. kanōn is used three times in 2 Cor. 10, where it is translated "field" (10:13), "area of activity" (10:15), and "territory" (10:16). The NIV thus interprets kanōn in a geographical sense, i.e., the area of work measured out or allotted to Paul. Other interpreters understand kanōn here as the rule or pattern that Paul follows by preaching the gospel only in areas where it has not yet been proclaimed (see Rom. 15:20–21).

4. In later church usage the word kanōn designated the rule of faith and esp. the list of writings recognized by the church as documents of divine revelation. Regarding the OT, by the time of Jesus the authoritative books seem to have been widely agreed upon, namely, the books that we today accept as the OT Scriptures (not including the Apocr.). The NT quotes from or alludes to all books of the OT except Est. This body of writings seems to have been formally accepted by the Jews at Jamnia in about A.D. 90.

Regarding the NT, it was a matter of recognizing which books the Spirit was speaking through. The earliest list of NT writings that corresponds precisely to what we today accept as the NT canon was written in A.D. 367; this list and others that preceded it were often drawn up to guard the church against heretics and their writings. However, note that the authority of the four Gospels, Acts, and the letters of Paul was generally recognized early in the 2d cent. And even earlier than that, Paul could testify that when the Thessalonians "received the word of God, which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men, but as what it actually is, the word of God, which is at work in you who believe" (1 Thess. 2:13). In 2 Pet. 3:15–16, Peter includes the "letters" of Paul along with "the other Scriptures."

See also metron, measure (3586).

2840 καρδία

καρδία (kardia), heart (2840); καρδιογνώστης (kardiognōstēs), knower of hearts (2841); σκληροκαρδία (sklērokardia), hardness of heart (5016).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kardia was used in lit. and fig. senses. Lit., it denoted the heart as a bodily organ and the center of physical life. Fig., it was regarded as the seat of the emotions, instincts, and passions, as well as the source of intellectual and spiritual life. The heart was the center of the human will and the seat of one's power of decision. Used in specific senses with reference to nature, it meant the pith of wood and the seed of plants.

2. The OT also uses heart with a lit. and a fig. meaning. The Heb. word lēb (also lēbāb) is most often rendered by kardia, sometimes by dianoia (mind) and psychē (soul). (a) Viewed as a bodily organ, the heart is the seat of strength and of physical life (Ps. 38:10; Isa. 1:5). When the heart is strengthened by food, the whole person is revived (Jdg. 19:5; cf. Gen. 18:5; 1 Ki. 21:7).

(b) In a fig. sense kardia is the seat of one's intellectual and spiritual life, one's inner nature. It is the seat of a person's emotions: joy (Deut. 28:47), pain (Jer. 4:19), tranquillity (Prov. 14:30), or excitement (Deut. 19:6). It is the seat of understanding and knowledge: of rational forces and powers (1 Ki. 3:12; 4:29), and of delusions and visions (Jer. 14:14). Folly (Prov. 10:20–21) and evil thoughts also operate in the heart. Finally, the will originates in the heart, with its carefully weighed intentions (1 Ki.

8:17) and decisions (Exod. 36:2). In a general sense, kardia is a comprehensive word for the total person (Ps. 22:26; 73:26; 84:2)

3. The idea of human responsibility is particularly related to the heart. Thus, the heart is also the organ through which a person is converted (Ps. 51:10, 17; Joel 2:12) and acts according to God's Word. It is the seat of awe and worship (1 Sam. 12:24; Jer. 32:40 = LXX 39:40); the heart of the godly inclines in faithfulness to the law of God (Isa. 51:7), while that of the ungodly is hardened and far from God (29:13).

4. Philo and Josephus use "heart" exclusively as a bodily organ, the central part of physical life, without clearly defining the seat of the inner life. Philo leaves open the question of whether one's controlling reason is to be found in the heart or in the brain, although he shows many echoes of OT usage. By contrast, rab. Jud. speaks of the heart as the center of life, even of life before God; good and evil thoughts live in the heart, and in the heart one worships God.

NT kardia occurs 156x in the NT. Its use of this term coincides with the OT, though the meaning of the heart as the inner life, the center of the personality, and the place in which God reveals himself is more clearly expressed in the NT than in the OT.

1. (a) kardia is the center of physical life and one's psychological makeup. This word seldom occurs in the sense of the bodily organ, the seat of natural life (cf. Lk. 21:34; Acts 14:17; Jas. 5:5). By contrast, it frequently denotes the seat of intellectual and spiritual life, the "inner self" in opposition to external appearance (1 Pet. 3:4, lit., "the hidden person of the heart"; cf. 2 Cor. 5:12; 1 Thess. 2:17). The powers of the spirit, reason, and will have their seat in the heart in the same way as the movements of the soul, feelings, passions, and instincts.

A striking feature of the NT is the closeness of kardia to the concept nous, mind (→ 3808). Like kardia, nous also has the meaning of person, inner self. Heart and mind (noēmata, lit., thoughts) are parallel in 2 Cor. 3:14–15 or used synonymously in Phil. 4:7. In such cases the element of knowledge is more heavily emphasized with nous than with kardia, where the stress lies more on the emotions and the will.

(b) kardia is also the center of spiritual life. The most significant instances of kardia in the NT occur in those passages that speak of one's standing before God. The heart is that part in us that is addressed by God. It is the seat of doubt and hardness as well as of faith and obedience.

2. Sin marks, dominates, and spoils not only the physical aspects of the natural self, not only one's thinking, willing, and feeling, but also one's innermost being, the heart. If the heart has been enslaved by sin, the whole person is in bondage (cf. Jer. 17:9). Evil thoughts come from the heart (Mk. 7:21 par. Matt. 15:19). Shameful desires live in the heart (Rom. 1:24). The heart is disobedient and impenitent (2:5; 2 Cor. 3:14–15), hard and faithless (Heb. 3:12), dull and darkened (Rom. 1:21; Eph. 4:18). Referring to his opponents, Jesus quoted Isa. 29:13, "Their hearts are far from me" (Mk. 7:6; par. Matt. 15:8). Equally, he rebuked his disciples for their slowness of heart (Lk. 24:25). The Gentiles cannot excuse themselves before God, for they carry in their hearts the knowledge of what is good and right in God's sight (Rom. 2:15).

3. God alone can reveal the things hidden in the human heart (1 Cor. 4:5), examine them (Rom. 8:27), and test them (1 Thess. 2:4). Because corruption stems from the heart, that is where God begins his work of renewal, sometimes by piercing it (Acts 2:37; cf. 7:54, where "furious" lit. translates "furious in their hearts"). It is in the heart that conversion takes place, and it is a matter of the whole person. The heart is thus the seat of faith (Rom. 10:6–10), and Christ takes up residence there (Eph. 3:17).

Conversion of the heart is not achieved through the will or desire of the person (1 Cor. 2:9), but solely because God opens the heart (Acts 16:14) and lets his light illumine it (2 Cor. 4:6). God bears his witness to humankind by sending into the human heart the Spirit of his Son (2 Cor. 1:22). When this Spirit takes up his dwelling there, we are no longer slaves to sin but children and heirs of God (Gal 4:6–7). In short, God pours his love into our hearts (Rom. 5:5).

4. The human heart, however, is the place not only where God arouses and creates faith; here faith also proves its reality in obedience and patience (Rom. 6:17; 2 Thess. 3:5). The Word of God takes root in the heart (Lk. 8:15), and the peace of Christ begins its rule there (Col. 3:15). God's grace strengthens and establishes the heart (Heb. 13:9). The NT describes a heart directed unreservedly to God as a "pure" heart (Matt. 5:8; 1 Tim. 1:5). This purity is based solely on the fact that the blood of Christ cleanses it (Heb. 10:22; cf. 1 Jn. 1:7).

5. kardiognōstēs (unknown in cl. Gk.) occurs in the NT only in Acts 1:24 and 15:8. It describes God as the one who knows human hearts. As noted above, he sees, tests, and examines the hidden depths of the human heart (see also Lk. 16:15; Rev. 2:23). sklērokardia occurs in the LXX in Deut. 10:16; Jer. 4:4; Sir. 16:10. In the NT it occurs at Matt. 19:8; Mk. 10:5; 16:14; cf. Rom. 2:5 (see also sklēros, 5017). Hardness of heart is the closedness of the self-centered person to God, his offer of salvation, and his demands, and also to one's fellow human beings. The natural person has a stony heart, turned against God and neighbor, until God's intervention gives that person a new, obedient heart (cf. Ezek. 36:26–27).

2841 (kardiognōstēs, knower of hearts), → 2840.

2843 καρπός

καρπός (karpos), fruit (2843); καρποφορέω (karpophoreō), bear fruit (2844); ἄκαρπος (akarpos), unfruitful, fruitless (182).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. karpos is used both of the fruit from plants and of the offspring of animals. It also occurs in an extended sense for the result or outcome of an undertaking, whether good or bad.

2. Likewise in the LXX karpos means the fruit of plants (e.g., Deut. 1:25; Mal. 3:11), but also the fruit of the body, posterity (e.g., Gen. 30:2; Deut. 7:13; Ps. 21:10; Mic. 6:7), and, fig., the fruit of an action (e.g., Jer. 6:19; 17:10; Hos. 10:13).

In Jewish writings, the righteous bring forth good fruit, the unrighteous bad. Commercial language used karpos in the sense of interest (as the fruit of a transaction), as also did theology with its growing emphasis on belief in the beyond. Thus, in discussing sin a distinction was drawn between the original stock or capital (so-called original sin) and interest (individual sins). Punishment of the former was reserved for the beyond; the latter was punished here and now, partly through giving birth to ever new sins.

NT 1. (a) karpos occurs 66x in the NT. Its primary meaning denotes the fruit of plants (Matt. 13:8 par.; 21:19 par.; Lk. 12:17) or the produce of the earth (Jas. 5:7, 18; cf. Lk. 20:10). Passages such as Jas. 5 make it clear that people can prepare for and encourage the growth of fruit by their work but can expect and receive it only as a gift. The seed and harvest are bestowed on them. To what extent the growth of fruit is removed from human willpower is also shown by the fact that it ripens at its appointed time (Matt. 21:34; kairos, → 2789).

The form of a fruit is not optional but is determined by the seed (cf. 1 Cor. 15:35–44), so that one may reason back from the fruit to the plant (Matt. 12:33 par.; cf. 7:16, 20). This applies not only to the species but also to quality. Matt. especially contrasts "good fruit" from good trees with "bad fruit" from bad trees (3:10; 7:17–19; 12:33). Fruit that does not come up to expectation is useless, and that which bears it (the tree, 7:19; Lk. 3:9; 13:6–9) is unusable.

(b) karpos in the sense of fruit of the body, offspring, is found only in Lk. 1:42; Acts 2:30.

2. The passages under 1 (a) are not concerned primarily with the processes of nature but with humans before God. This applies even more to the remaining passages, in which the idea of fruit is applied to one's life. These are often connected with the vbs. poieō (do) and pherō (bear, bring forth). The verbal compound karpophoreō (bear fruit) occurs 8x.

(a) When John the Baptist demanded good deeds from people as "fruit in keeping with repentance" (Matt. 3:8 par.), the use of karpos expressly indicates that it is not a question of deliberate, self-determined action on one's part. Rather, it is "fruit-bearing" that follows from one's turning to God and the power of the Spirit working in one's life. When Jesus taught that true disciples are recognized as such precisely by their fruit (7:16–20), which they bear in true discipleship, he means that their faith shows itself alive in their love. In receiving divine love, they will love; in receiving forgiveness, they will forgive. In short, the sanctification that has come to them and is going on in them is expressed by their giving God the honor.

At the same time they put at the disposal of others the benefit of the divine working in them through what they do and say. The graphic pronouncement that every tree without fruit will be condemned in the judgment of God (Matt. 3:10; 7:19; Lk. 13:9) also raises the question of the outworking of faith in those who have received God's word. Those who check the growth of fruit or even hold back others from enjoying it will receive a reward from God in keeping with their evil deeds.

(b) The expression karpon pherō (bear fruit) is used esp. in Jn. 15:2–16, where close fellowship of Jesus' disciples with their Lord is portrayed as the secret of the power to bear fruit. His death is the soil out of which rich fruit grows (12:24); his death on the cross brings about redemption. As the vine, he sends through his branches the life-giving power that is the prerequisite and means of faith.

True, humans can accomplish moral and technical achievements by their natural gifts. But the "fruit of the gospel" (Luther)—that which God expects from us—can grow only from the soil of obedience, which essentially consists in recognition of the bond between Creator and creature, established by the death of Christ. We no longer need to consider our own achievements. Freed from the anxiety of failure, we are capable of the highest endeavor ("more fruit," Jn. 15:2, 5, 8). Because the source of our capacity to bear fruit lies outside ourselves, the yield is certain. It counts and abides for eternal life (4:36; 15:16).

(c) Paul recognizes good deeds as the "fruit of righteousness" (Phil. 1:11; cf. Heb. 12:11; Jas. 3:18) and "the fruit of the light" (Eph. 5:9), produced by God himself, Jesus Christ, or the Holy Spirit. He sharply distinguishes it from striving in one's own strength to attain salvation (Gal. 5:22; Col. 1:10). Works or deeds (→ ergon, 2240)—a word that comes from the world of techniques and craftsmanship, signifying what one produces by one's own efforts—is seldom used in a positive sense. karpos, however, comes from the realm of natural growth and signifies that which grows by drawing on the life-giving power of the tree or soil.

But this growth as a sign of life does not lie at our disposal. In using this metaphor, Paul stresses that the fruit appears naturally in those who have been received into the body of Christ, in whom the Spirit of Christ is active, and who have a share in the gifts of this living fellowship (Gal. 5:22–23) because it is not something manufactured. While believers in Christ thus bring their fruit to God and live for him, the power of sinful desires can only bear fruit for death (Rom. 7:4–5).

(d) Where fruit is lacking, the NT uses the adj. akarpos, unfruitful, fruitless, unproductive (e.g., Mk. 4:19 par.; Tit. 3:14; 2 Pet. 1:8; Jude 12). akarpos describes the works of darkness (Eph. 5:11) and the state of the mind when prayer is made in tongues (1 Cor. 14:14).

(e) Paul also uses karpos for the results of his own missionary work (Rom. 1:13; Phil. 1:22). It can even be said that the apostles and, in particular, missionaries who are building up the churches have a right to make a living through that work (1 Cor. 9:7; 2 Tim. 2:6; cf. Matt. 21:41–43; Lk. 20:10). In these passages fruit means wages.

(f) karpos occurs twice in Rev. 22:2. The picture of the tree of life, "bearing ... fruit ... every month," represents the fullness of God's pervading presence in the new world, where shame and sin are overcome and all hindrances to the activity of the divine Spirit are removed.

See also sperma, seed (5065); therismos, harvest (2546).

2844 (karpophoreō, bear fruit), → 2843.

2846 καρτερέω

καρτερέω (kartereō), be strong, steadfast, persevere (2846); προσκαρτερέω (proskartereō), persevere with, persist in (4674); προσκαρτέρησις (proskarterēsis), persistence, steadfastness, perseverance (4675).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. kartereō (from kratos, strength) means to remain strong, steadfast, endure. It has the same sense in the LXX (cf. Job 2:9; Sir. 2:2; 12:15). The word is used in 4 Macc. for the patient endurance of Jewish martyrs (9:9, 28; cf. 10:1; 13:11; 14:9). The compound proskartereō has the same basic meaning, but gives greater emphasis to the time element: to persist, persevere with a person, persist in an activity (Num. 13:20 = LXX 13:21).

NT 1. In the NT kartereō is found only in Heb. 11:27, where it describes the faith of Moses. According to Heb. 11:1, 3, faith is a persuasion of invisible things. Moses is one of a number of OT saints who "persevered because he saw him who is invisible." The kind of endurance that clings tenaciously to the invisible God makes possible that attitude of faith exemplified by Moses, whom Christian readers are to emulate.

2. The vb. proskartereō occurs (10x) esp. in Acts (6x). (a) It is sometimes used in a nonreligious sense to indicate duration. Thus in Mk. 3:9 Jesus tells his disciples to keep a boat "ready" for him. Acts 8:13 and 10:7 refer to a prolonged or continuous stay with a person: After his baptism Simon Magus "followed Philip everywhere," while certain soldiers are permanent "attendants" of the centurion Cornelius. In Rom. 13:6 Paul says that as servants of God, rulers "give their full time" to their governing duties.

(b) Constancy and perseverance are esp. important in the Christian's prayer life. In Rom. 12:12; Col. 4:2, the apostle exhorts Christians to devote themselves to prayer (echoing Christ's teaching in Lk. 11:1–13; 18:1–8). Acts also uses proskartereō to denote the constant attitude of prayer that was a part of the early church leaders both before and after Pentecost (1:14; 6:4). The description of the church in 2:42 likewise makes use of this word: "They devoted themselves [proskartereō] to the apostles' teaching and to the fellowship, to the breaking of bread and to prayer," as does the notation in 2:46 that they "continued to meet together" in the temple.

3. The noun proskarterēsis occurs only in Eph. 6:18. Here too believers are encouraged to persevere in prayer and supplication, which is to be made in the Holy Spirit and must include the apostle (cf. also Col. 4:2–3). With these solemn words the apostolic injunction receives the emphasis its importance demands.

See also anechomai, bear, endure (462); makrothymia, patience, longsuffering (3429); hypomenō, be patient, persevere, endure, be steadfast (5702).

2848 κατά

κατά (kata), down from, concerning, according to (2848).

CL The primary local meaning of kata is down from, expressing vertical extension. That kata is closely related to ana is clear from the fact that "down" and "up" simply represent the same idea from opposite viewpoints.

NT 1. Examples of the spatial meaning of kata (with the gen.) include Matt. 8:32 (a herd of pigs rushing down a mountain) and Acts 27:14 (a strong wind swept "down from the island").

2. In 2 Cor. 8:2 is a clear example of the developed metaphorical sense: "extreme poverty" (lit., "poverty reaching down to [kata] the depths"). From the local meaning "down upon," there naturally arose the idea of hostile movement directed against someone or something, as in the charge against Stephen that he was speaking "against this holy place" (Acts 6:13).

In this regard 2 Cor. 13:8 does not mean that truth is its own defense ("for we cannot do anything against [kata] the truth"). Rather, to explain why he does not expect the Corinthians to discover him to be a false apostle or counterfeit Christian, Paul asserts that he would never be able to bring himself to propagate falsehood or to hinder the advance of the truth without first changing his identity as an apostle. In Col. 2:14 Paul speaks of God's obliteration, through the cross of Christ, of the signed acknowledgment of indebtedness "that was against [kata] us."

3. Two significant corresponding uses of this prep. are kata sarka (lit., "according to the flesh," → 4922) and kata pneuma (lit., "according to the Spirit," → 4460). kata sarka can mean simply with respect to physical descent (Rom. 1:3; 4:1; 9:3). Some commentators find in 2 Cor. 5:16b a Pauline disavowal of interest in the historical Jesus (i.e., not regarding Christ kata sarka). But kata sarka in this case means "from a worldly [or nationalistic] point of view" and qualifies "regarded," not Christ. Since his conversion Paul has ceased making superficial judgments based on external appearances (cf. 5:12), so that he regards the time-honored division of humanity into Jew and Gentile (5:16a) as less significant for him than the believer-unbeliever distinction (Rom. 2:28–29; 10:12–13; 1 Cor. 5:12–13; Gal. 6:10), which was based on a kata pneuma ("in light of the Spirit") or kata stauron ("in the light of the cross") attitude.

The opposition between sarx and pneuma is an important ingredient in Paul's theology (see, e.g., Gal. 5:16–24). The sense of Rom. 8:5 is that "those who live according to [kata] the sinful nature [sarx]" are earthly-minded or take the side of the flesh in the Spirit-flesh conflict, while "those who live in accordance with [kata] the Spirit" give their attention to spiritual matters or take the side of the Spirit. The contrast here is between two diametrically opposed determinative principles of action.

This contrast is given a different turn in Gal. 4:21–31. Here "the son born in the ordinary way [kata sarka]" (4:29a) refers to Ishmael as the son of the slave woman Hagar

(4:23a) and then allegorically as the descendants of Abraham who do not believe in Jesus, while "the son born by the power of the Spirit [kata pneuma]" (4:29b) refers first to Isaac as the "son [born] by the free woman . . . as the result of a promise" (4:23b) and then to all those who share Abraham's faith as "children of promise" (4:28).

4. Often the noun that follows kata specifies the criterion, standard, or norm in the light of which a statement is made or is true, an action is performed, or a judgment is passed. In such cases kata will mean according to, in conformity with, corresponding to. This use is common in reference to the precise and impartial standard of judgment on the day of judgment (Matt. 16:27; Rom. 2:6; 1 Cor. 3:8; 2 Tim. 4:14; 1 Pet. 1:17; Rev. 2:23). Noteworthy too is the twice-repeated "according to [kata] the Scriptures" in 1 Cor. 15:3–4, which constitutes an appeal to certain OT prophecies of the death of Christ to atone for sins (Isa. 53:4–6, 10–12), and to the resurrection of Christ (Ps. 16:10; Isa. 53:10b, 11a; 54:7).

kata theon (God) may signify "in accordance with God's will" (Rom. 8:27), "like [i.e., in the image of] God" (Eph. 4:24; cf. Col. 3:10), "as God intended" (2 Cor. 7:9), "as God wants you to be" (1 Pet. 5:2), or simply "godly" (2 Cor. 7:10–11).

Sometimes the ideas of standard and reason merge, as in those "called according to his purpose" in Rom. 8:28. Here this phrase indicates either that God's calling is in accord with his purpose or that it is on basis of his purpose. Similarly in 1 Pet. 1:1–2, election is based on (kata) the foreknowledge of God the Father, is effected by (en, in, → 1877) the sanctifying work of the Spirit, and aims at or achieves (eis, unto, → 1650) obedience and the constant sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. In 1:3a kata expresses the idea that regeneration is the result of the Father's great mercy.

5. Finally, kata can have a distributive meaning. According to Acts 2:46, the early church in Jerusalem celebrated the Lord's Supper "every day" (lit., "according to each day"), and taught and proclaimed the good news "from house to house" (5:42; lit., "according to the house"). With regard to ecclesiastical polity, Paul and Barnabas appointed elders "in each church" of South Galatia (14:23; lit., "according to the church").

2849 (katabainō, descend), → 326.

2850 (kataballō, throw or strike down, found, ground), → 2856.

2851 (katabareō, burden, be a burden to), → 983.

2856 καταβολή

καταβολή (katabolē), foundation, beginning (2856); καταβάλλω (kataballō), throw or strike down, found, ground (2850).

CL & OT 1. The vb. kataballō derives its basic meaning from its two roots kata, down, and ballō, throw. It thus means bring from an upright into a horizontal position (e.g., throw down, or, in a fig. sense, put down, reject). The related meaning lay a foundation, found, is derived from ancient building techniques and refers to the stacking of stones into the foundation trench or the rolling and pushing of the vital cornerstones of the building.

The noun katabolē chiefly takes up the fig. meaning. It can mean payment (laying out) of certain sums of money or the date of commencement for a building. Biologically, it can denote the depositing of seed in the ground or in a mother. Later writers use the phrase apo or ek katabolēs kosmou, since the beginning of the world.

2. kataballō in the LXX has no relationship to the idea of creation. Only once (2 Macc. 2:13) does it have the sense of found (a library). katabolē occurs only at 2 Macc. 2:29, where it indicates a master builder's concern "with the whole construction."

NT 1. kataballō is used only twice in the NT. In 2 Cor. 4:9, Paul refers to the fact that in his ministry he has frequently been "struck down, but not destroyed," while Heb. 6:1 refers to the foundation of one's faith, upon which one must build.

2. The noun occurs 11x. The expression "creation [lit., foundation] of the world" (Matt. 13:35, citing Ps. 78:2; Matt. 25:34; Rev. 13:8) is a fixed expression for the point from which historical dates are reckoned. When God's free activity is dated before this point in time (e.g., Jn. 17:24, where the obj. of God's love is Jesus; Eph. 1:4, where the obj. is the election of believers), the purpose is to declare the independence of God's providence from the absolute beginning he himself set for human history. This independence enables God to break into history in his loving purposes and to bring the course of salvation history to its completion, again in his love.

3. Two points stand out in all the texts that mention the foundation of the world. (a) It is always associated with a statement about humanity's destiny. (b) There is an implied connection between God's foreknowledge and predestination. Matt. 25:34 and Eph. 1:4 speak of election; Rev. 13:8 and 17:8 speak of reprobation. Lk. 11:50 (a lamentation of Jesus) and Heb. 4:3 speak of historical failure for which account must be rendered. Finally, Matt. 13:35; Heb. 9:26; and 1 Pet. 1:20 (cf. Jn. 17:24) refer to the unique, central position of Jesus Christ in the history of salvation. He reveals what has been hidden since the foundation of the world and thus fixes the end of time.

4. In Heb. 11:11, katabolē is linked with the cl. idea of depositing seed (i.e., begetting).

See also ktisis, creation (3232); dēmiourgos, maker (1321).

2857 (katabrabeuō, decide against, condemn), → 1092.

2858 (katangeleus, proclaimer), → 33.

2859 (katangellō, proclaim), → 33.

2860 (katagelaō, laugh at, mock), → 1151.

2861 (kataginōskō, condemn), → 3210.

2865 (katagōnizomai, conquer, defeat), → 74.

2868 καταδικάζω

καταδικάζω (katadikazō), condemn (2868); καταδίκη (katadikē), condemnation (2869).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the vb. katadikazō means to condemn, render judgment against; the noun katadikē denotes a legal sentence or judgment brought against someone.

2. katadikazō translates several Heb. verbs in the LXX. It means to condemn as guilty in Job 34:29; Ps. 37:33; 94:21; to subvert someone in a cause in Lam. 3:36 (NIV, "deprive ... of justice"); and to inculpate and hence endanger one's life in Dan. 1:10 (Theod.). In Wis. 2:20; 11:10; 12:15; 17:11 it has the sense of formal condemnation. katadikē occurs in 12:27 of the condemnation pronounced on those who do not heed God.

NT katadikazō is used 5x in the NT, always in the sense of condemn, pass judgment against, find guilty. This is particularly clear in Matt. 12:37, where it is used in contrast with dikaioō (→ dikaiosynē, 1466). In Lk. 6:37 katadikazō occurs 2x in connection with krinō (→ krima, 3210), where it connotes the formal act of passing judgment. The same concept is evident in the metaphorical usage of the term in Jas. 5:6, where "you have condemned" represents a formal pronouncement of judgment before the execution of a sentence. The noun katadikē occurs only once in the NT (Acts 25:15) in the sense of a sentence of guilt and condemnation.

See also krima, dispute, decision, verdict, judgment (3210); paradidōmi, deliver up, give up, hand over (4140); bēma, judgment seat (1037).

2869 (katadikē, condemnation), → 2868.

2870 (katadiōkō, search for, hunt for), → 1503.

2873 (katathema, accursed thing), → 353.

2874 (katathematizō, curse), → 353.

2875 (kataischynō, to dishonor, disgrace, put to shame), → 158.

2877 (katakalyptō, cover up, veil), → 2821.

2878 (katakauchaomai, boast against, exult over), → 3017.

2880 (kataklaō, break in pieces), → 3089.

2883 (kataklēronomeō, give as inheritance), → 3102.

2886 κατακλυσμός

κατακλυσμός (kataklysmos), a deluge, flood (2886).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. kataklysmos was used lit. and fig. to signify a deluge, a great flood. The LXX uses the word for the flood of Noah (e.g., Gen. 6:17; Ps. 29:10; Sir. 40:10); in Ps. 32:6; Sir. 21:13; 39:22, however, the references are fig.

NT The word occurs only 4x in the NT (Matt. 24:38–39; Lk. 17:27; 2 Pet. 2:5), referring each time to the devastation of Noah's deluge.

See also thalassa, sea, lake (2498); pēgē, spring, source (4380); hydōr, water (5623); Iordanēs, the river Jordan (2674); limnē, lake (3349).

2890 (katakrima, punishment, condemnation), → 3210.

2891 (katakrinō, condemn), → 3210.

2892 (katakrisis, condemnation), → 3210.

2894 (katakyrieuō, rule over, conquer, be master of, lord it over), → 3261.

2895 καταλαλέω

καταλαλέω (katalaleō), speak evil of, rail at, slander (2895); καταλαλιά (katalalia), evil speech, railing, slander (2896); κατάλαλος (katalalos), slanderer, railer, defamer (2897); ψιθυρισμός (psithyrismos), gossip (6030); ψιθυριστής (psithyristēs), whisperer, gossiper (6031).

CL & OT katalaleō, to speak evil against, slander, is rare in cl. Gk. In the LXX this vb. expresses hostility of speech, whether against God (Num. 21:5, 7; Ps. 78:19; Hos. 7:13), against his servant Moses (Num. 12:8; 21:7), or against other people—e.g., when Job is reproached by his friends (Job 19:3) or when one's brother or neighbor is slandered (Ps. 50:20; 101:5). The noun katalalia, slander, is found only in the Bible (e.g., Wis. 1:11) or in texts depending on it. katalalos, slanderer, is found for the first time in the NT.

NT In the NT katalaleō is not used of blasphemy against God (→ blasphēmeō, 1059). Slanderers (katalalos) are among the sinners whom Paul lists in Rom. 1:30 as typical examples of paganism. This word is linked with psithyristes, a whisperer, gossiper (1:29). The cognate nouns psithyrismos, gossip, tale-bearing, and katalalia are again linked in 2 Cor. 12:20 and 1 Clem. 30:3; 35:5. katalalia, slander, is among the sins that Paul fears he will encounter in the rebellious church of Corinth (2 Cor. 12:20); fellowship in the community is destroyed by this sin.

The Christian churches are themselves the victims of such evil speech; it is the result of the hostile attitude taken up toward them by the heathen world. Christians should, therefore, be much more concerned to show by their "good behavior in Christ" that the slanders against them are groundless (1 Pet. 3:16; cf. 2:12). As "newborn babies" (i.e., those born again, who know the kindness of their Lord), Christians should put away "slander of every kind," along with other sins (1 Pet. 2:1–3). The letter of Jas. also, with its particular censure of sins of the tongue (cf. 3:1–12), emphatically forbids Christians to indulge in slandering other believers (4:11–12), for such a sin is a slight to God's law and an affront to God himself as the one Lawgiver and Judge of all.

See also blasphēmeō, slander, defame, blaspheme (1059); loidoreō, insult, abuse, revile (3366); oneidizō, insult, denounce, rebuke (3943).

2896 (katalalia, evil speech, railing, slander), → 2895.

2897 (katalalos, slanderer, railer, defamer), → 2895.

2898 (katalambanō, seize, attain, make one's own, take possession), → 3284.

2901 (kataleipō, leave, leave behind, leave over), → 3309.

2903 (katallagē, reconciliation), → 2904.

2904 καταλλάσσω

καταλλάσσω (katallassō), reconcile (2904); καταλλαγή (katallagē), reconciliation (2903); ἀπαλλάσσω (apallassō), set free, release (557); διαλλάσσομαι (diallassomai), become reconciled (1367); ἀποκαταλλάσσω (apokatallassō), reconcile (639); μεταλλάσσω (metallassō), to exchange (3563); ἀντάλλαγμα (antallagma), what is given or taken in exchange (498); ἀλλάσσω (allassō), change (248).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. katallassō is a compound of allassō, to alter, exchange. Its original meaning is to change, exchange; transferred, it means to reconcile. It generally denotes the restoration of an understanding between people after hostility or displeasure. The vb. is rarely found in the sense of reconciliation in a religious setting. The corresponding noun is katallagē, reconciliation. From the same root is derived the noun antallagma, what is given in exchange, price of purchase.

2. allassō is used 30x in the LXX, meaning change (e.g., wages, Gen. 31:7; clothes, 35:2; 41:14; cf. 2 Ki. 5:5, 22–23), renew (Isa. 40:31; 41:1), exchange (Lev. 27:10, 27, 33), or, similarly, redeem (i.e., to exchange one sacrifice with another, Exod. 13:13).

The compounds of this group are rare in the LXX. katallassō is found only at Jer. 48:39 (= LXX 31:39, shattered, dismayed); 2 Macc. 1:5; 7:33; 8:29. katallagē occurs only at Isa. 9:4 (= LXX 9:5), where it differs from the Heb. text and is hard to understand, and at 2 Macc. 5:20. diallassō can mean remove (Job 12:20, 24), break, frustrate (5:12); similarly, apallassō can mean destroy (Job 9:34; cf. also Exod. 19:22; 1 Sam. 14:29; 22:1; 3 Macc. 6:30). antallagma means price (1 Ki. 21:2 = LXX 20:2; Jer. 15:13), a change (Ps. 55:19), a ransom price (Amos 5:12), or exchange (Ruth 4:7). Later rab. usage is anticipated in 1 Sam. 29:4, where diallassomai deviates from its usual sense to mean to make oneself acceptable. katallassō and its derivatives are not found in cultic and priestly contexts.

3. In Jud., confession of sins and repentance are means by which reconciliation with God is sought, i.e., the restoration of his favor. Thus katallassō appears with reference to God in 2 Macc. 1:5; 7:33; 8:29. When the fulfillment of the law becomes a means to the end of achieving righteousness before God, the thought of reconciliation can find itself in close proximity with that of reward. katallassō and cognates are not unfamiliar in such contexts, but occur infrequently.

NT 1. In the NT katallassō occurs only in the sense of to reconcile or (pass.) to be reconciled. It is used of the reconciliation of people with one another (1 Cor. 7:11; cf. diallassomai in Matt. 5:24) and of people with God (only in Paul: Rom. 5:10; 2 Cor. 5:18–20; cf. apokatallassō in Eph. 2:16; Col. 1:20, 22). katallagē also occurs in the sense of reconciliation (only in Paul: Rom. 5:11; 11:15; 2 Cor. 5:18–19).

apallassō occurs in the act., meaning to free (Heb. 2:15), and in the mid. or pass., to get free, be released, settle with (Lk. 12:58; Acts 19:12). Similarly, we find metallassō in its original sense (Rom. 1:25–26). antallagma, ransom money, is found only at Matt. 16:26; Mk. 8:37.

allassō (6x) means to change, sometimes in a natural sense (i.e., in Gal. 4:20 Paul wishes he could change his tone with the Galatians), but also in an eschatological sense (on the last day, "we will all be changed," 1 Cor. 15:51–52; cf. Heb. 1:12). In Rom. 1:23 Paul insists that those who worshiped idols knew God via general revelation but "exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles."

2. katallassō and katallagē are among the basic concepts of Pauline theology. They serve to give greater theological precision to Christ and his work than the soteriological concepts found in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts (e.g., forgiveness). (a) The subject of reconciliation is God (2 Cor. 5:18–19). Note the contrast to pagan thought, which knew the deity only as the object of the reconciling work of humans. At the same time it is consistent with the OT message of God as the "compassionate and gracious" one, who reveals "love and faithfulness" as belonging to his very being (Exod. 34:6–7; cf. Ps. 103:8–18), and who promises forgiveness and restoration of the covenant as his sovereign work (Isa. 43:25; 54:7–10; Jer. 31:31–34).

The katallagē created by God is thus a completed act that precedes all human action. "For if, when we were God's enemies, we were reconciled [katallassō] to him through the death of his Son, how much more, having been reconciled [katallassō], shall we be saved through his life" (Rom. 5:10). Before the reconciliation took place, therefore, we were at enmity with God. But Jesus' resurrection is the guarantee of salvation and reconciliation. Human action, including repentance and confession of sins, is not a work we do to bring about and initiate reconciliation, to which God reacts. Rather, it is God's work, to which we must react.

That this is the state of affairs is confirmed by Paul's characteristic order of indicative followed by imperative, which starts out from God's act as the matter of primary importance and moves to the injunction to proclaim the good news of being reconciled to God. This is the basis of the believer's joy in God: "Not only is this so, but we also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received reconciliation [katallagē]" (Rom. 5:11). In 2 Cor. 5:20, in which Paul expresses similar thoughts, he does not hesitate to follow up his description of reconciliation with: "We implore you on Christ's behalf: Be reconciled to God."

(b) The reconciliation has been effected by Christ's work in his death and resurrection. Reconciliation is an expression of the new situation that this work has brought about and that Paul usually indicates in terms like dikaioō, justify, dikaiosynē, righteousness (→ 1466). The fact that katallassō and katallagē can be used in parallel with these terms (cf. Rom. 5:9 with 5:10; 2 Cor. 5:19 with Rom. 4:3–22) indicates the central place they have in the preaching and theology of Paul.

(c) Later in Rom. Paul probes the place of the Jewish nation in the divine economy of salvation. This explains why he is anxious to demonstrate from the OT that salvation has always been by grace through faith (cf. chs. 3–4) and to show that the role of the law was never intended to be a means of self-salvation. In Rom. 9–11 Paul asks whether God has forsaken Israel forever in view of their rejection of Christ. Part of his answer he gives in terms of reconciliation: "For if their rejection is the reconciliation [katallagē] of the world [i.e., the Gentiles], what will their acceptance be but life from the dead?" (11:15).

3. As God's unilateral act in Christ, reconciliation is his gift, and the ministry of reconciliation is spoken of in these terms in 2 Cor. 5:18–21. Having depicted the act of new creation that takes place when a person is "in Christ," Paul writes: "All this is from God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ and gave us the ministry of reconciliation: that God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting men's sins against them. And he has committed to us the message of reconciliation. We are therefore Christ's ambassadors, as though God were making his appeal through us. We implore you on Christ's behalf: Be reconciled to God. God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God."

Reconciliation here denotes the end of a relation of enmity and the substitution of one of peace and goodwill. The initiative for reconciliation was God's, who found through the death of his Son a way both for his love for the sinner and his wrath against sin to be accommodated. In this way, God remains righteous, but sinful humans can also be justified through faith in Jesus.

In 2 Cor. 5:19 reconciliation is understood as justification. It is expressed first of all negatively ("not counting men's sins against them") and then positively in 5:21, where Christ is said to have assumed our sin so that "we might become the righteousness of God." This is no legal fiction. For in Christ believers actually assume his righteousness, just as Christ assumed believers' sins as he hung on the cross.

But the ministry of reconciliation does not end with this. We are to proclaim it as "ambassadors" (2 Cor. 5:20; cf. Eph. 6:20; → presbeuō, 4563). In 1 Cor. 1:18; 2:2, Paul defined his task in terms of preaching the word of the cross, the message of God's love for sinners and reconciliation (Rom. 5:8–11). What he calls "the message of reconciliation" in 2 Cor. 5:19 is the gospel itself, and the proclamation of the gospel is responsibility of the whole church. At the same time, note that the appeal to "be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:20b) is addressed to the church. Both the church and the world (5:19) must enter into this reconciliation and live it out. The substance of this exhortation ("be reconciled to God") draws attention to the fact that reconciliation is incomplete until it is accepted by both sides.

The thought of both 2 Cor. 5:21 and Rom. 8:3 requires us to say that what Christ did on the cross comprehends and supersedes the OT sin offerings. In Gal. 3:13–14 Paul does not use the concept of reconciliation but expresses the atoning work of Christ on the cross in terms of the removal of the curse (→ katara, 2932). Here again there is the thought of the benefit to others achieved by Christ in his death on their behalf. He is our vicarious substitute.

4. The substance of the reconciliation lies in the ending of the enmity between God and humanity (Rom. 5:10). Reconciliation results therefore in our having "peace with God," a phrase used in 5:1 for the effect of justification. In this sense reconciliation is the precondition of our salvation (5:10b) and the basis for the all-embracing "new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17–21).

5. (a) Col. 1:20, 22 uses, instead of katallassō, the otherwise unknown vb. apokatallassō (cf. Eph. 2:16), but this links with the previously mentioned Pauline use of katallassō and has essentially the same meaning: "For God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him, and through him to reconcile [apokatallassō] to himself all things, whether things on earth or things in heaven, by making peace through his blood, shed on the cross. Once you were alienated from God and were enemies in your minds because of your evil behavior. But now he has reconciled [apokatallassō] you by Christ's physical body through death to present you holy in his sight, without blemish and free from accusation" (1:19–22).

This passage has many of the features of reconciliation we have seen in Rom. and 2 Cor.: estrangement caused by sin that has to be dealt with before God; God's offer to be reconciled with us; its initiation from God's side; Christ's death as the reconciling process, referred to in terms of his "blood" and "cross"; and the purpose of presenting us as righteous before God. The ground of this victory is the cancellation of the debt of the law on the cross, thus depriving the principalities and powers of their hold on us (Col. 2:13–15).

But the scope of reconciliation is given here a cosmic dimension. The text presupposes a cosmic catastrophe caused by the powers of evil. The one who is the creator and sustainer of all is the one who has triumphed over the powers of evil on the cross and is therefore the reconciler of all (Col. 1:16–20; cf. 2:15). Within this cosmic context is set the reconciliation of believers (1:21–22). But it should be noted that the reconciliation is conditional upon continuing in the faith (1:23).

(b) Eph. 2:16 sees the reconciliation in the context of its effect on the relationship of Jews and Gentiles before God. The Gentiles were at one time "separate from Christ, excluded from citizenship in Israel and foreigners to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world" (2:12). But they have been "brought near through the blood of Christ" (2:13). Christ's death has, however, not only reconciled the Gentiles; it has also reconciled the Jews, providing a way of salvation to them that they did not have before. At the same time the act of reconciling Jew and Gentile to God reconciles them to each other and creates a new humanity. Christ is our peace, having created "in himself one new man out of the two, thus making peace, and in this one body to reconcile [apokatallassō] both of them to God through the cross" (2:15–16).

6. Reconciliation on a human level is discussed in two important passages. (a) In 1 Cor. 7:10–11 Paul discusses the issue of divorce: "To the married I give this command (not I, but the Lord): A wife must not separate from her husband. But if she does, she must remain unmarried or else be reconciled [katallassō] to her husband. And a husband must not divorce his wife." The teaching is in line with Jesus' interpretation of the OT on this matter (cf. Matt. 19:3–12; Mk. 10:2–12; Lk. 16:18; cf. Deut. 24:1–4; Matt. 5:27–32) and hence may properly be said to be a charge from the Lord.

In contrast with 1 Cor. 7:13–16, where Paul deals with the question of whether divorce should take place on the grounds that one party is a believer and the other is not, Paul's judgment in 7:10–11 seems to refer to the question of divorce in general. The two courses open are either to separate and remain single or to be reconciled. In 7:13–16, however, Paul apparently recognizes that there are cases where there is no real alternative but for the breakup of a marriage. The fact that a believer may find himself or herself married to an unbeliever is no grounds for separation, as the believing partner consecrates the other partner and provides the possibility of saving him or her (7:12–16). Thus, Paul does not teach that a believer must inevitably separate from an unbeliever in a marriage.

(b) The unique vb. diallassomai occurs in Matt. 5:24: "Therefore, if you are offering your gift at the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there in front of the altar. First go and be reconciled [diallassomai] to your brother; then come and offer your gift" (5:23–24). Jesus' teaching here is of a piece with his teaching on the two great commands and the parable of the good Samaritan, which lays down the responsibility to love God with all one's being and one's neighbor as oneself (Matt. 22:34–40; Lk. 10:25–37; cf. Lev. 19:18; Deut. 6:5). No sacrifice is acceptable to God without repentance and reconciliation.

The following saying (Matt. 5:25–26) is paralleled in Lk. 12:58: "As you are going with your adversary to the magistrate, try hard to be reconciled [apallassō] to him on the way, or he may drag you off to the judge, and the judge turn you over to the officer, and the officer throw you into prison." The need for human reconciliation is parabolic of our need for reconciliation with God (cf. also the parable of the unforgiving servant in Matt. 18:23–35). The adversary (or accuser) here may represent Jesus Christ, with his message of repentance in view of the coming of the impending judgment; for when judgment falls, it will be irrevocable (cf. the context of this passage: Lk. 12:54–57; 13:1–9). We must seek reconciliation with him before that occurs.

7. The act. of apallassō occurs in Heb. 2:15 and means to free, release, deliver. Jesus partook of our human nature and through his death destroyed the one who had the power of death, that is, the devil, and so was able to "free [apallassō] those who all their lives were held in slavery by their fear of death." In Acts 19:12 this same vb. is used for the curing of illnesses.

8. antallagma, that which is given in exchange, occurs only in Matt. 16:26 and Mk. 8:37: "What can a man give in exchange for his soul?" The context is that of the call for complete renunciation of self as the precondition of discipleship and acceptance with the Father: "For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for me and for the gospel will save it" (8:35). We can give nothing in exchange for our life, and thus even to take up the cross in utter self-abandonment is far more important than gaining the whole world. Like the other sayings in the Synoptics, this one does not offer a theology of reconciliation in the Pauline sense. Rather, it states in the sharpest possible terms our need for reconciliation, while implying at the same time that reconciliation is available to those who are concerned enough to seek it.

See also apokatastasis, restoration (640); hilaskomai, propitiate, expiate, be gracious (2661).

2905 (kataloipos, what is left, the rest), → 3309.

2906 (katalyma, lodging, guest room), → 3395.

2907 (katalyō, destroy, demolish, abolish), → 3395.

2909 (katamartyreō, bear witness against, testify against), → 3456.

2917 (katanoeō, notice, observe, consider, contemplate), → 3808.

2918 καταντάω

καταντάω (katantaō), come to, arrive at (2918); ἀπαντάω (apantaō), meet (560); ὑπαντάω (hypantaō), meet (5636); ἀπάντησις (apantēsis), meeting (561); ὑπάντησις (hypantēsis), meeting, coming to meet (5637).

CL & OT katantaō denotes movement towards a goal, primarily a place (such as a town). In a metaphorical sense it denotes the attainment of an objective. The word occurs infrequently in the LXX. It is used lit. in the sense of coming to Jerusalem or Tyre (2 Macc. 4:21, 44); it is used fig. of attaining to the status of high priest and of people reaching the full measure of sin (4:24; 6:14). In 2 Sam. 3:29 it is used of Yahweh's requiting blood guilt on the head of Joab.

NT 1. In the NT katantaō occurs 13x. In Acts it is used primarily in the sense of arrive (16:1; 18:19, 24). It occurs once in a metaphorical sense. In his address to Agrippa, Paul declared that the twelve tribes of Israel hope to "see fulfilled" the promise made by God to their ancestors (26:7).

2. This expression is related to Paul's usage that is always metaphorical. The ultimate goal of the Christian life is "to attain to the resurrection from the dead" (Phil. 3:11). Eph. 4:13 expresses the goal that all Christians should "reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God." In 1 Cor. 10:11 the apostle speaks of us "on whom the fulfillment of the ages has come (katantaō)" (cf. Heb. 9:26). Christ, who inaugurates the end of the ages, will begin a new world era and order of things. Admittedly, this is apparent only to believers. Nevertheless, the form of this world is passing away (1 Cor. 7:31). This movement that comes from God is also to be seen in the fact that the Word of God "has reached (katantaō)" the churches (14:36; cf. 1 Thess. 2:13).

3. apantaō (Mk. 14:13; Lk. 17:12) and hypantaō (e.g., Matt. 8:28; Lk. 8:27) mean meet, and the related nouns apantēsis (Matt. 25:6; Acts 28:15; 1 Thess. 4:17) and hypantēsis (Matt. 8:34; 25:1; Jn. 12:13) mean meeting.

The use of apantēsis in 1 Thess. 4:17 is noteworthy. The ancient expression for the civic welcome of an important visitor or the triumphal entry of a new ruler into the capital city is applied to Christ. "After that, we who are still alive and are left will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet (eis apantēsin) the Lord in the air." The same thoughts occur in the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1).

See also erchomai, come, go (2262); mellō, be about to, intend, propose (3516).

2921 (kataxioō, deem worthy, consider worthy), → 545.

2922 (katapateō, trample), → 4344.

2923 (katapausis, rest, place of rest), → 398.

2924 (katapauō, bring to rest, rest, stop, resting), → 398.

2925 καταπέτασμα

καταπέτασμα (katapetasma), covering, veil, curtain (2925).

CL & OT katapetasma appears to have been a technical term for a temple curtain. With but few exceptions this word is used in the LXX for the curtain separating the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place in the tabernacle (Exod. 26:31–37; 27:21; Lev. 4:6, 17; Num. 4:5; 18:7) and the temple (2 Chr. 3:14). It is used sometimes for the curtain at the entrance of the tabernacle, but the regular word for that is kalymma (e.g., 1 Sam. 1:18; 9:22; 2 Sam. 7:6).

This inner curtain was made of fine linen interwoven with blue, purple, and scarlet wool; on it were the figures of two cherubs. It symbolized the separation between God and humankind. The high priest alone could enter the Most Holy Place only once a year to offer the atoning blood in the presence of God.

NT 1. It is debated whether "the curtain [katapetasma] of the temple" that was torn at the time of the crucifixion was the inner or outer curtain (Matt. 27:51; Mk. 15:38; Lk. 23:45). If it was the inner one, it symbolized the reality that Jesus' death opened the way for all humans to enter God's presence. This tearing, however, would not have been known to the public, since only the priests could enter the Holy Place. The early church fathers regarded the tearing as a prophetic sign of the destruction of the temple.

The writer of Heb. finds great assurance in knowing that Jesus, as the forerunner of all believers, entered God's presence within the inner curtain in the heavenly sanctuary (6:19–20), what was symbolized by the katapetasma of the tabernacle (9:3). Later he insists that Jesus opened the way for us to enter through this inner curtain (10:20). This may be an allusion to the tearing of the curtain when Jesus died, though no explicit reference is made to it.

2. kalymma is used in the NT only of Moses' veil (2 Cor. 3:13–16; cf. Exod. 34:33–35; → kalyptō, to hide, 2821).

2927 (katapinō, swallow, overwhelm), → 4403.

2928 (katapiptō, fall down), → 4406.

2932 κατάρα

κατάρα (katara), curse, malediction (2932); καταράομαι (kataraomai), curse (2933); ἀρά (ara), curse (725); ἐπικατάρατος (epikataratos), cursed (2129); ἐπάρατος (eparatos), accursed (2063).

CL & OT 1. ara and katara mean essentially the same thing, curse. kataraomai means curse someone (dat.) or execrate someone (acc.). In ancient thought the spoken word had intrinsic power, which was released by the act of utterance. The person cursed was thus exposed to a sphere of destructive power. It worked effectively against a person until the power within the curse was spent. Words of malediction and of benediction are thus more than evil or pious wishes.

2. In the LXX both ara (e.g., Ps. 10:7 = LXX 9:28; 14:3; 59:12) and katara occur. The latter is often given as the opposite of eulogia (→ 2330), blessing (Deut. 11:26–29; 30:1): "I have set before you life and death, blessings and curses" (30:19). kataraomai (e.g., Gen. 12:3; Num. 22:6–12), araomai (e.g., Num. 22:6, 11), and epikataraomai (e.g., Num. 22:17; 23:7) occur as vbs.

The Balaam story (Num. 22–24) shows how belief in the power of the curse, widespread in the ancient world, was prevalent in Israel. The Moabite king Balak charged Balaam to curse Israel so that he might become master of his mighty enemy. But God prevented Balaam from pronouncing the curse. Instead, he had to bless Israel.

The curse decreed by God or his messengers works irrevocably. The punishment with which Jer. threatens Jerusalem in 26:6 (= LXX 33:6) consists in her being delivered defenseless to the curse of the heathen (cf. 24:9). Likewise in Mal. 2:2, divine judgment consists in the blessing of the priests being changed by God into a curse. Only God himself can annul this curse.

NT In the NT ara occurs only in Rom. 3:14 (quoting Ps.10:7). It exhibits the sinfulness of those who live under the law. Heretics who entice unbalanced souls are "an accursed brood" (katara in 2 Pet. 2:14). Ground that, in spite of rain and cultivation, grows only thorns and thistles is said figuratively in Heb. 6:8 to be near to being cursed. The passage has in mind Christians who, in spite of the spiritual blessing they have received, fall away from the faith (6:4–10).

The vb. kataraomai is found in the story of the fig tree that Jesus cursed because it had no fruit on it (Mk. 11:21); the tree withered. This story is a fig. reference to the judgment of God (cf. Lk. 13:6–9). To Jesus those "who are cursed" (Matt. 25:41) are sinners condemned in the final judgment. Humans should not take an active part in the divine judgment; thus, believers are forbidden to curse (Rom. 12:14, 19). Rather, they should love their enemies and bless those who curse them (Matt. 5:44; Lk. 6:28). The warning given in Jas. 3:9–10 points in the same direction.

eparatos, accursed, is found only in Jn. 7:49. The Pharisees held that people who believed in Jesus were accursed because they did not know the law. This incident provides evidence of the enmity of the Pharisees against Jesus.

The verbal adj. epikataratos occurs twice in the NT (Gal. 3:10–13). Paul uses it as he interprets the relationship between the curse of the law and redemption through Christ. The curse of the law signifies being surrendered to the judgment and wrath of God. It affects all who do not abide in the commandments of the law (3:10), which essentially means the entire human race (cf. Rom. 1:18; 2:5; 3:23; also Lev. 18:5; Deut. 27:26).

Jesus, however, who hung on the cross as one cursed by God (cf. Deut. 21:23) and died the death of a criminal, took on himself the curse that lay on sinful humanity and with it the judgment of God (Gal. 3:13). Here Paul expresses the idea of substitution (cf. Rom. 3:25; 1 Cor. 1:30; 2 Cor. 5:21). Through his redemption the curse has been broken. In its place, the blessing of Abraham can now come to those who believe in Christ. As the redeemed who are called to divine sonship, they receive the fullness of salvation that is bound up with the promise of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 3:14; 4:5–7).

See also anathema, cursed, accursed (353); kakologeō, speak evil of, revile, insult (2800); rhaka, empty-head, fool (4819).

2933 (kataraomai, curse), → 2932.

2934 καταργέω

καταργέω (katargeō), abolish, nullify(2934).

CL & OT Derived from argos, inactive, useless, katargeō is a late word that in cl. Gk. means to render inactive, put out of use, cancel. It only appears in the LXX in Ezra 4:21, 23; 5:5; 6:8, where it signifies hindering or interrupting the rebuilding of the temple.

NT Of its 27x in the NT, one is in a parable (the fig tree of Lk. 13:7 "uses up the soil" in the sense of making it unproductive); the rest are in theological contexts, all but one being in Paul.

1. God puts out of action through the cross and the parousia destructive powers that threaten our spiritual well-being. These include (a) the rulers of this age (1 Cor. 2:6, possibly human, but more likely demonic); (b) the law, which set Jew and Gentile at enmity and made both guilty before God (Eph. 2:15; cf. Rom. 7:2); (c) the sin-dominated nature that was ours in Adam (6:6); (d) the "lawless one" (2 Thess. 2:8); (e) all forces presently hostile to Christ (1 Cor. 15:24), including death, which has already been brought to nothing in principle through Jesus' resurrection (15:26; cf. 2 Tim. 1:10). The writer to Heb. adds (f) the devil (2:14).

2. God removes and displaces what is transient to make way for better and abiding things. Already displaced through the coming of the new order in Christ is the "glory," such as it was, of the Mosaic dispensation (2 Cor. 3:7, 11, 13), and the "veil" that was on Jewish hearts like Paul's (3:14). Being displaced, as God's plan goes forward, are "things that are" in this world—though grammatically neut., the phrase denotes people (1 Cor. 1:28). Due for displacement through the changes that the parousia will bring are (a) the belly and food (6:13: our present bodies will be changed) and (b) prophecies and conceptual knowledge (→ gnōsis, 1194), which, being at best partial, will be left behind, just as a grown person abandons childish things when he or she apprehends God directly by sight (13:8, 10, 11).

3. Humans attempt, wittingly or unwittingly, to contradict and cancel those principles and powers of divine working that bring salvation. To preach justification by circumcision or to seek justification by works of law is not only to cancel the offense of the cross (Gal. 5:11) but also to be "alienated" from Christ and his grace (5:4). But just as faith does not cancel the law (Rom. 3:31), the law does not set aside the covenant promises (Gal. 3:17), and Israel's unbelief does not nullify God's faithfulness (Rom. 3:3), so the gospel of grace will stand, despite human efforts to nullify it, and in the end it will triumph.

See also atheteō , set at naught, reject (119); exoutheneō, reject with contempt (2024).

2936 (katartizō, put in order, restore, make complete, prepare), → 787.

2937 (katartisis, being made complete, completion), → 787.

2938 (katartismos, preparation, equipment), → 787.

2939 (kataseiō, shake down, motion the hand as a signal), → 4940.

2941 κατασκευάζω

κατασκευάζω (kataskeuazō), make ready, prepare, build, construct, erect, equip, furnish (2941); παρασκευάζω (paraskeuazō), get ready, prepare (oneself) (4186); παρασκευή (paraskeuē), day of preparation (4187); ἀπαρασκεύαστος (aparaskeuastos), unprepared (564).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. both compounds occur regarding setting up and decorating rooms and festal routes or making various kinds of preparations (e.g., dressing, meals, and battles on land or sea). kataskeuazō is also used in an inward sense, for the instruction of those who are learning and for preparation for religious rituals. This vb. also occurs in philosophical logic and geometry for the construction of positive arguments.

2. (a) The LXX uses kataskeuazō 30x. In Isa. 40:28; 43:7; 45:7, 9, the vb. refers to God's work of preparation in the context of creation. Equipping troops with arms and warships is mentioned in 1 Macc. 10:21; 15:3. The Apocr. also uses kataskeuazō in connection with the production of idols (Ep. Jer. 9, 45–46).

(b) paraskeuazō occurs 16x in the LXX. In Jer. 6:4; 50:42; 51:11 (= LXX 27:42; 28:11), it refers to preparation for battle; in Tob. 8:19; 2 Macc. 2:27; 6:21 it occurs in reports of the preparation of a meal.

(c) Both vbs. are used of other activities of preparation: construction of a building (Num. 21:27; 2 Chr. 32:5), tilling a field (Prov. 24:27 = LXX 24:42), spreading a net as a trap (29:5).

NT In the NT, paraskeuazō is found 4x and kataskeuazō 11x.

1. In Acts 10:10 paraskeuazō refers to the preparation of a meal, while in 1 Cor. 14:8, in a passage about the inadequacy of speaking in tongues, it occurs in the metaphor of preparation for battle. In 2 Cor. 9:2–3 it is used with regard to the Christians in Achaia, who "since last year ... were ready to give" for the collection to Jerusalem. The next verse contains the only NT use of the adj. aparaskeuastos, of the possibility of their not being ready to do this after all.

2. (a) kataskeuazō is used 3x in connection with John the Baptist's function of preparing the way for the Lord's messenger (Matt. 11:10; Mk. 1:2; Lk. 7:27), and once of his function to make ready "a people prepared" (1:17). In each case Mal. 3:1 is cited (with echoes of Exod. 23:20; Isa. 40:3, both of which use hetoimazō [→ hetoimos, 2289]).

(b) kataskeuazō is used in 1 Pet. 3:20 (in connection with baptism) for the building of Noah's ark. All the other NT examples of this vb. are in Heb. and refer to the construction and furnishing of a building. The OT concept of God's all-embracing work of creation introduces the simile of the building of a house and concludes that God has built everything (3:3–4). The underlying thought here is of Christ as the builder of the church. Heb. 11:7 refers to Noah's building the ark in obedient faith, in order to prepare a way of escape for him and his family. In 9:2, 6, in a section about Christ's unique sacrifice, the author refers to setting up the tabernacle for worship according to God's instructions.

3. In cl. Gk. the noun paraskeuē means preparation in general, but the NT uses it always as a temporal expression to indicate the "day of Preparation" preceding a Sabbath or Passover festival: Matt. 27:62; Mk. 15:42; Lk. 23:54; Jn. 19:14, 31, 42.

See also hetoimos, ready, prepared (2289); zōnnymi, gird (2439).

2942 (kataskēnoō, live, dwell, perch), → 5008.

2943 (kataskēnōsis, place to live, nest), → 5008.

2958 (katasphragizō, to seal), → 5382.

2961 (katatomē, mutilation), → 4362.

2968 (kataphileō, to kiss), → 5797.

2969 καταφρονέω

καταφρονέω (kataphroneō), despise (2969); περιφρονέω (periphroneō), despise (4368); καταφρονητής (kataphronētēs), despiser (2970).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. kataphroneō is a common word, which means showing contempt or disregard for someone or something. Whether it denotes a compliment or censure depends on who or what is being disparaged. kataphronētēs means one who despises, usually in a bad sense. periphroneō can be a synonym of kataphroneō, although its primary meaning is simply to think hard about something.

In the LXX, objects of kataphroneō include God (Hos. 6:7 = LXX 6:8), one's father (Gen. 27:12), one's mother (Prov. 23:22), and the ways of the law (19:16). Such contempt was, of course, profoundly impious. periphroneō has a good sense of despising distress (4 Macc. 6:9), torments (7:16), and pains (14:1). kataphronētēs signifies one who deals treacherously and unfaithfully (Hab. 1:5; 2:5; Zeph. 3:4).

NT kataphroneō occurs 9x in the NT. In the proverbial saying of Matt. 6:24 par. it is morally neutral; its sense is good in Heb. 12:2, where Jesus is said to have despised the shame of the cross. But it has a bad sense in the warnings against despising God's kindness (Rom. 2:4), his church (1 Cor. 11:22), Christ's little ones (Matt. 18:10), a youthful leader of the church (1 Tim. 4:12), and Christian masters (6:2). It is also bad when Peter censures heretics for despising "authority" (likely the lordship of Christ exercised through church officers, 2 Pet. 2:10; cf. Jude 8, which uses atheteō, reject).

periphroneō occurs only in Tit. 2:15, the sense of which is parallel to 1 Tim. 4:12. kataphronētēs appears only in Paul's citation of Hab. 1:5 at the end of his evangelistic sermon in Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:41), where it means "scoffers."

2970 (kataphronētēs, despiser), → 2969.

2977 (kateidōlos, full of idols), → 1631.

2980 (katexousiazo, exercise authority over, tyrannize), → 2026.

2989 (katēgoreō, accuse), → 2991.

2990 (katēgoria), accusation, → 2991.

2991 κατήγορος

κατήγορος (katēgoros), accuser (2991); κατήγωρ (katēgōr), accuser (2992); κατηγορέω (katēgoreō), accuse (2989); κατηγορία (katēgoria), accusation (2990).

CL & OT katēgoros means speaking against or accusing someone; as a noun, it means accuser. Satan is the great accuser in the OT, though humans also carry out his work (Dan. 6:5). The biblical foundation for this teaching is esp. Job 1–2 and Zech. 3. Satan as accuser is concerned with Israel, but he also accuses individual persons. He acts particularly when people accuse themselves, run into danger, or live carelessly. In the heavenly court he can appear when he wants to, and he is turned away only on the merits of the case. Michael is his opponent.

NT Rev. 12:10 is clearly based on Jewish concepts, and only here in the NT is Satan called katēgōr. He is said to accuse the children of God "day and night." After the exaltation of Jesus Christ, Satan was cast out of heaven (12:7–9). The same picture of the fall of Satan, but without the use of katēgoros, is found in Lk. 10:18; Jn. 12:31; and Rom. 8:33–34. Jesus, the intercessor, replaces the accuser. In other NT passages katēgoros refers to human accusers before earthly tribunals, as in the case of Paul's enemies before the Roman procurators (Acts 23:30, 35; 25:16, 18).

katēgoreō is derived from katēgoros and means to be an accuser, betray, make known. The enemies of Jesus spied on him to see whether he would heal on the Sabbath, so that they might accuse him of a breach of the Sabbath before the local Sanhedrin (Mk. 3:2; Lk. 6:7). The chief priests accused Jesus before Pilate (Mk. 15:3–4; Lk. 23:10, 14). The word appears more frequently in Acts because of the repeated accounts of attacks on Paul (22:30; 24:2; 25:5; 28:19). He defended himself by pointing out that his accusers could not prove their accusations (24:13, 19; cf. 25:5, 11, 16). He appealed to Caesar, but not because he wanted to accuse the Jews (28:19).

katēgoreō is used also in a nonlegal sense in Rom. 2:15: "their thoughts now accusing, now even defending them."

Jn. 5:45 refers to the last judgment. Jesus is not the one who will accuse the Jews who do not believe, but Moses, because those who do not believe in Jesus refuse also to believe in the law of Moses, which bears witness to Jesus (5:46).

katēgoria is derived from katēgoros and means an accusation in the legal sense. Pilate asked the chief priests what "charges" they brought against Jesus (Jn. 18:29). Timothy was instructed not to accept an accusation against an elder unless there were two or three witnesses (1 Tim. 5:19; cf. Deut. 19:15). One of the conditions that a candidate for eldership must fulfill is that his children are not open to the accusation of being wild or disobedient (Tit. 1:6).

See also diabolos, adj., slanderous; noun, slanderer, the devil (1333); krima, judgment (3210); enkaleo, accuse (1592).

2992 (katēgōr, accuser), → 2991.

2994 κατηχέω

κατηχέω (katēcheō), inform, instruct (2994).

CL & OT 1. This word, rare in cl. Gk. and found only at a late date, meant originally to sound down from above, and so denotes the action of poets or actors who speak from a stage. In Plutarch the word has the general sense of to give information about something, report something. It is also found with the meaning to instruct, teach. A related noun katēchēsis is used in Stoic lit.

2. The word is absent from the LXX, and its usage in Philo and Josephus conforms to that of cl. Gk.

NT Paul and Lk. use this vb. 4x each. Lk.'s usage covers both normal meanings: to report something (Acts 21:21, 24) and to instruct someone (18:25). The meaning of the word in Lk. 1:4 is disputed as to whether Theophilus has been receiving reports about Jesus' life, death, and resurrection, or whether he has been formally instructed in these teachings of Christ. If the latter, the katēcheō is here being used as a technical word for Christian instruction (see below).

Paul uses katēcheō exclusively in the sense of to instruct someone regarding the content of the faith (see 1 Cor. 14:19; Gal. 6:6; in Rom. 2:18 the law is the subject of instruction), so that it may even be regarded as a technical term for "to instruct in the faith." This meaning seems particularly appropriate in 1 Cor. 14:19, where Paul asserts that he would rather speak five intelligible words "to instruct others" than ten thousand words in tongues, which after all may merely encourage self-glorification on the part of the speaker.

In Gal. 6:6 Paul enjoins that the one who is taught (katēchoumenos, pres. pass. part. of katēcheō) should supply the material needs of the teacher (katēchōn, pres. act. part. of katēcheō). This is the earliest evidence we have for a teaching office in the early church (cf. 1 Cor. 9:3–18); perhaps Paul himself introduced the term katēchōn for the teacher of the gospel.

The use of katēcheō as a technical term also occurs in Acts 18:25, if "the way of the Lord" refers to God's redemptive work in Christ and in history. By the time 2 Clem. 17:1 was written (mid-2d cent. A.D.), katēcheō had become the normal term for giving baptismal instruction to catechumens. The process came to be called katēchēsis (from which we get the Eng. words "catechism" and "catechesis").

See also didaskō, teach (1438); didaskalos, teacher, master (1437); didaskalia, teaching, instruction (1436); paideuō, bring up, instruct, train, educate (4084); paradidōmi, to deliver, hand down (4140).

2996 (katischyō, to be strong, powerful, be dominant, prevail), → 2709.

2997 (katoikeō, inhabit), → 3875.

2999 (katoikētērion, dwelling place, habitation), → 3875.

3001 (katoikizō, settle), → 3875.

3004 (katō, below, downward, down), → 539.

3005 κατώτερος

κατώτερος (katōteros), lower (3005).

CL & OT katōteros is the comparative of katō, under. In the LXX it occurs mostly in the Ps. to denote any area in which life is threatened, or the realm of the dead itself (63:9; 86:13; 88:6; 139:15).

NT In the NT katōteros occurs only in Eph. 4:9: Christ "descended into the lower parts of the earth" (lit. trans.). The following questions arise: Is the comparative katōteros here used in the sense of the superlative ("into the lowest regions of the earth") or of the positive ("into the regions of the earth that lie below")? Is "of the earth" a gen. of apposition? If so, the expression would mean, "the lowest parts, namely, the earth." Or is it a partitive gen.? If so, the expression would mean "the lowest parts of the earth." Does katōteros correspond to the expression in the OT, "the depths of the earth," which can refer to the earth itself (Ps. 139:15) as well as to Hades (63:9; cf. Tob. 13:2)? According to a rab. tradition, one of the names for Gehinnom (→ geenna, 1147) was lowest land, lowest earth.

Perhaps Eph. 4:9 is dependent on an older Jewish exposition of Ps. 68:18, in which Moses ascended into heaven to receive the Torah and then descended to earth to transmit it to humans; this exposition is then applied to Christ (→ anabainō, 326, for another explanation). Or perhaps "he descended" and "the lower parts of the earth" refer to Jesus' death. Anyone who dies, according to the Jewish view, goes into the realm of the dead, and this realm of the dead lies under the earth (→ hadēs, 87)—hence "descended."

Regardless of which view is correct, Jesus did become a human being in such a way that he took our final destiny, death, on himself. Light is thus thrown on the statement of Eph. 1:20–23. The "all in all" (lit. trans.) that he fills means the highest heights and the lowest depths (the realm of the dead). It also means that he has received power over all beings, esp. the spirits. Ultimately it matters little whether the earth itself or regions lying beneath its surface are meant in 4:9. What is important is that Christ, the exalted one, is conqueror of all powers and dominions and that as such he has given gifts to his church.

See also abyssos, abyss, pit, underworld (12); hadēs, Hades, the underworld, the realm of the dead (87); geenna, Gehenna, hell (1147); tartaroō, sent to Tartarus, hell (5434).

3008 καῦμα

καῦμα (kauma), heat, burning (3008); καυματίζω (kaumatizō), burn, scorch (3009); καῦσις (kausis), burning, heat (3011); καυσόω (kausoō), be on fire, burn (3012); καύσων (kausōn), heat (3014).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kauma means burning, heat, esp. sunburn or heat of the sun; in a transferred sense, fever heat, ardor of love, frostbite. kaumatizō means dry up by heat, and by extension, in the mid. form, suffer from fever. The rest of the words in this group all have to do with burning or intense heat.

2. In the LXX kauma serves most frequently as a translation of ḥōreb or ḥōm (each 4x) in its original sense of the heat of the sun, burning sun (cf. Gen. 31:40; Jer. 36:30 = LXX 43:30; cf. Sir. 43:3), but also in the transferred sense of fever heat (Job 30:30). Its use is, however, illuminating, as can be seen from the context in each case.

(a) Even in Jer. 36:30 the context should be noted. The fact that Jehoiakim's body is to be exposed to the heat of the sun and the frost of night is a sign of divine judgment on him because of his guilt. The same idea is conveyed by the complaint of Job, "My body burns with fever" (30:30). He sees in this a sign that God has become a cruel enemy (30:21).

(b) kauma is also used as a parable for affliction and trouble. Thus in Jer. 17:8 the one who trusts in the Lord is "like a tree planted by the water, [which] does not fear when heat comes; its leaves are always green." Similarly in Sir. 14:27 those who meditate on wisdom will be "sheltered by her from the heat." Looking forward to the coming reign of peace, Isa. prophesies that God's glory "will be a shelter and shade from the heat of the day" (4:6).

(c) kausis is used for natural fire: for baking bread (Isa. 44:16), on an altar (40:16), or on the golden lampstand (2 Chr. 13:11). kausōn denotes heat, esp. from the sun (Gen. 31:40; Isa. 49:10; Jon. 4:8).

NT 1. In the NT this word group occurs 4x in the Gospels, 5x in the General Letters, and 4x in Rev. (1) Rev. 16:8–9 speaks of divine judgment and wrath. The fourth bowl of wrath is poured on the sun, which "was given power to scorch [kaumatizō] people with fire. They were seared [kaumatizō] by the intense heat [kauma]."

2. Matt. 13:6 and Mk. 4:6 tell of the seed falling on rocky ground, which was "scorched" (kaumatizō) by the sun after germination. This parable refers to those who take offense at God's Word when tribulation and persecution arise.

3. In Rev. 7:16 God's people have come through great affliction and martyrdom and been raised to the heavenly glory: "Never again will they hunger; never again will they thirst. The sun will not beat upon them, nor any scorching heat [kauma]."

4. In 2 Pet. 3:10, 12, kausoō is used for the eschatological fire that will burn up the elements before the creation of the new heaven and earth. In Heb. 6:8, kausis is used for the burning of useless thorns and thistles—a symbol of God's ultimate destruction of those who have fallen away.

5. kausōn denotes the heat of the day because of the burning sun (Matt. 20:12; Lk. 12:55; Jas. 1:11). The last of these uses is fig. for the passing value of riches.

See also pyr, fire (4786).

3009 (kaumatizō, burn, scorch), → 3008.

3011 (kausis, burning, heat), → 3008.

3012 (kausoō, be on fire, burn), → 3008.

3013 καυστηριάζω — καυστηριάζω (kaustēriazō), mark by a branding iron, brand (3013).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. this vb. means to burn with hot iron, to brand. The LXX does not have the vb., but 4 Macc. 15:22 has the related noun kautērion in the sense of branding iron.

NT The sole NT occurrence of kaustēriazō is 1 Tim. 4:2, where Paul refers to false teachers who have their consciences "seared." The condition of these heretics is perhaps that of men who are possessed by Satan and demonic forces. Alternatively, it may mean that their consciences have been made insensible to moral distinctions.

See also stigma, mark, brand (5116); charagma, mark, stamp, graven object (5916).

3014 (kausōn, heat), → 3008.

3016 (kauchaomai, boast), → 3017.

3017 καύχημα — καύχημα (kauchēma), boast, pride, object of boasting (3017); καύχησις (kauchēsis), boasting (3018); καυχάομαι (kauchaomai), boast (3016); ἐγκαυχάομαι (enkauchaomai), boast (1595); κατακαυχάομαι (katakauchaomai), boast against, exult over, triumph over (2878).

CL & OT 1. All of the above words occur in cl. Gk. katakauchaomai means vaunt oneself against someone, treat someone in a derogatory or contemptuous manner.

kauchēma refers to the subj. of boasting (similarly, kauchēsis), to the words used by the boaster, and occasionally also to the act of boasting. Although the Gks. recognized legitimate pride in oneself, they drew a clear distinction between this and unwarranted bragging, which was pilloried by the satirists and others.

2. The OT also recognizes legitimate pride, e.g., of children in their fathers (Prov. 17:6) or of old men in their gray hair (16:31). Personal boasting, however, is reprehensible (1 Ki. 20:11 = LXX 21:11; Prov. 25:14; 27:1), an expression of sheer folly and ungodliness (cf. Ps. 52:1; 94:4). The theological basis for rejecting all self-praise lies in the fact that those who boast focus attention on themselves and no longer look to God, the Creator and Redeemer. They trust in themselves instead of having confidence in God, praising his grace and faithfulness (Jer. 9:23–24 = LXX 9:22–23). Boasting in God and his acts, however, is always appropriate (Deut. 33:29; 1 Chr. 16:28–29; 29:11; Ps. 5:11; 32:11; 89:16–17; Jer. 17:14).

3. In Jud. this group of words has the same meaning as in the OT, except that the Mosaic law is added to the list of things truly worthy of praise (Sir. 39:8). In rab. theology, praise of Abraham has its basis in his fulfillment of the law. The rabbis also warned against arrogance and spiritual pride and encouraged humility. Moreover, suffering becomes a ground for boasting, as it is received by the believer at God's hand.

NT In the NT kauchaomai occurs 37x, enkauchaomai once, katakauchaomai 4x, and the nouns kauchēma and kauchēsis each 11x. Most occurrences are in Paul's letters. He uses these words to emphasize an idea central to his doctrine of justification, namely, that original sin consists in glorifying oneself and not giving God his due.

kauchaomai occurs with particular frequency in polemical passages. Just as Paul attacks the Jewish doctrine of justification by works, so he opposes the closely related habit of human self-praise, based on fulfillment of the law. The emptiness of such kauchēsis is revealed by the rhetorical question in Rom. 3:27: "Where, then, is boasting?" Through the principle of faith, all human glorying is made of no account.

This is clearly evident in Eph. 2:8–9: "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast." The worthlessness of human boasting, when based on the Mosaic law, is similarly exposed in the context of Rom. 2:23 (cf. also 4:2, where Abraham's works gave him nothing about which to boast before God; Gal. 6:13).

Paul attacks just as strongly the self-confidence of the Gks., who boast of their wisdom (1 Cor. 1:29; cf. also 3:21). All forms of boasting in the flesh (2 Cor. 11:18; Phil. 3:3–4) are wrong; they include such things as the arrogant attitude of Gentile Christians to non-Christian Jews (Rom. 11:17–18) and false bragging (1 Cor. 4:7; cf. 2 Cor. 5:12; 12:6; Jas. 3:14). Personal boasting is evil (4:16; cf. 1 Cor. 5:6), and it conflicts with an appropriate form of boasting, cited from Jer. 9:24 in 1 Cor. 1:31: "Let him who boasts boast in the Lord" (cf. 2 Cor. 10:17–18).

For Christians, therefore, the only fitting form of kauchēsis is to boast of God through Jesus Christ (Rom. 5:11; cf. Phil. 3:3) or, as Gal. 6:14 puts it, to glory in the cross of our Lord. The Christian's kauchēsis can include glorying in the acts of God to which the apostles bear witness, and also in those acts brought about in the course of apostolic ministry. In this sense Paul can boast of the authority that has been given to him (2 Cor. 10:8; cf. Rom. 15:17) in contrast to the false apostles (2 Cor. 11:12–30).

Paul also boasts of individual churches in which the fruit of faith can be seen (1 Cor. 15:31; 2 Cor. 1:14; 7:4, 14; 8:24; 2 Thess. 1:4; → ergon, 2240). In the context of Christ's return, he can describe the Thessalonians as "the crown in which we ... glory" (1 Thess. 2:19). He writes also that the Philippians will be his kauchēma "on the day of Christ" (Phil. 2:16; cf. 1:26). He will have no one deprive him of this apostolic ground for boasting (1 Cor. 9:15).

Naturally, Paul knows where the limit comes (cf. 2 Cor. 11:16–30). Christians can really only boast of their weakness, because that is where God's strength becomes apparent (11:30; 12:5, 9). If we boast of our own behavior (1:12; cf. Gal. 6:4; Jas. 3:14), we should do so only insofar as we live in dependence on God and in responsibility to him (cf. 1 Cor. 9:16). Where the Lord is not the foundation and content of our kauchēma, boasting remains "in the flesh" and is therefore sinful. However, it is vital "to hold on to ... the hope of which we boast" (Heb. 3:6; cf. Rom. 5:2).

3018 (kauchēsis, boasting), → 3017.

3026 (keleusma, signal, cry of command), → 3027.

3027 κελεύω

κελεύω (keleuō), command, order (3027); κέλευσμα (keleusma), signal, cry of command (3026).

CL & OT keleuō occurs widely in cl. Gk. It is generally used of verbal orders emanating from a person of superior rank or status. In the LXX its use is confined to the Apocr., where it is used of a variety of types of commands: from religious leaders, army officers, kings, prophets, and even God. The meaning of keleusma in cl. Gk. ranges from specific commands to terse orders and inarticulate cries; it is often used of the command of a god. In the LXX keleusma occurs only in Prov. 30:27 = LXX 24:62.

NT In the NT keleuō (25x) is confined mostly to Matt. and Acts. In Acts the word is used only of orders given by human authorities: the Sanhedrin (4:15), the Ethiopian eunuch (8:38), Gamaliel (5:34), Herod (12:19), the magistrates (16:22), the tribune (21:33; 22:24; 22:30; 23:10), the high priest (23:3), Felix (23:35), Festus (25:6, 17, 21, 23), and the centurion (27:43). In Matt. keleuō is also used of orders given by human authorities: e.g., Pilate (27:58; 27:64) and Herod (14:9). But on a few occasions it refers to orders given by Jesus (8:18; 14:19). In Lk. the vb. is used for Jesus' command to have a blind man brought to him (18:40).

keleusma is found only in 1 Thess. 4:16, where it denotes a shout of command at the onset of the Parousia, together with a call of the archangel and a trumpet sound. It is not clear who gives this keleusma—God, Christ, or the archangel.

See also dogma, decree, ordinance, command (1504); entolē, command, order (1953); parangellō, give orders, command (4133).

3029 (kenodoxia, desire for praise, conceit, vanity, illusion), → 1518 and 3031.

3030 (kenodoxos, desirous of praise, conceited, boastful), → 1518 and 3031.

3031 κενός

κενός (kenos), empty, fig. without content, truth, or power, without result or profit (3031); κενόω (kenoō), to empty, destroy, render void (3033); κενοδοξία (kenodoxia), desire for praise, conceit, vanity, illusion (3029); κενόδοξος (kenodoxos), desirous of praise, conceited, boastful (3030).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kenos means empty as opposed to plērēs (full). It is used mostly lit. of things (e.g., an empty jug, pit, or house), but also occasionally of persons (e.g., with empty hands). When used metaphorically in connection with things, kenos means either lacking content or a missing effect (esp. the expression eis kenon, in vain); with people, hollow, shallow, lacking in judgment, vain.

The vb. kenoō means to empty, in the sense of plunder or bring to nothing. kenodoxos means vainglorious, conceited. kenodoxia means either vanity, conceit, or error, delusion.

2. Heb. has no exact equivalent to kenos. The LXX uses this word to translate 19 different Heb. words. The most common of these is rîq, empty, worthless, vain. For the most part it means empty (e.g., Jer. 14:3, vessels; Deut. 15:13, empty-handed). But it also has a distinctive metaphorical sense; Jdg. 9:4; 11:3 speak of andres kenoi, worthless men, who are not counted among the people of Yahweh and who are willing to perform any kind of deed. The prophets spoke of turning away from Yahweh as giving oneself to vanity. The help Israel sought from the Egyptians was worthless and empty (Isa. 30:7). Israel has forgotten Yahweh and offers sacrifice to vanity or nothing, i.e., to idols (Jer. 18:15). By contrast, the Lord's chosen ones will not toil in vain (Isa. 65:23).

3. The word is found most frequently in the cries of Job. He resents the vain words (Job 27:12) and the empty comfort (21:34) of his friends. He sees not only the things around him but his own life sink into nothing. He laments the months of emptiness (7:3) and vain hope (7:6), crying out: "Let me alone; my days have no meaning" (7:16). Unless Yahweh rescues him, he can only perish.

NT 1. kenos occurs in the parable of the vineyard, when the tenants send back the master's servants empty-handed (Mk. 12:3; Lk. 20:10–11). Most of the other NT occurrences of this word are in Paul, who gives it a distinctive sense, especially in the negative expression mē eis kenon, not in vain, where the accent is on fruitlessness and inefficacy. He uses it to suggest that under certain circumstances things such as grace (2 Cor. 6:1), preaching (1 Cor. 15:14), missionary work (1 Thess. 3:5), and his own activity as an apostle (Gal. 2:2; Phil. 2:16) are fruitless or in vain. As the work of God, Paul's mission is wrought in power, in contrast to the empty, ineffective words of paganism (Eph. 5:6).

2. Paul uses kenodoxia (Phil. 2:3) and kenodoxos (Gal. 5:26) each once, both with the nuance of conceit.

3. Similar to kenos, Paul uses the vb. kenoō negatively and also passively. He speaks of certain things that must not be made empty, i.e., made void. Among them are faith (Rom. 4:14), the cross of Christ (1 Cor. 1:17), and his boasting as an apostle (2 Cor. 9:3). The cross and faith form the central subject matter of the gospel and thus constitute its power. Hence, the offense of the cross, which both condemns and saves, should not be made void by words of worldly wisdom (1 Cor. 1:17). The saving way of faith should not be made void by justification through the law (Rom. 4:14).

4. The precise significance of heauton ekenōsen (Phil. 2:7) has been much discussed. The words mean lit. "he emptied himself." Most scholars regard Phil. 2:6–11 as a pre-Pauline hymn about Christ, which Paul quotes in the course of his argument in order to illustrate his point that Christians should be unselfish, humble, and outgoing in their relationships, and thus have the mind of Christ (2:5). Some scholars interpret Christ's emptying himself in the sense of his freely exchanging his preexistent, divine mode of being (2:6) for a common, human, earthly existence (cf. 2 Cor. 8:9). Others, however, suggest that the passage should be translated: "He poured out his life" (cf. Isa. 53:12), so that it refers not to Jesus' incarnation but to his self-surrender on the cross.

Phil. 2:7 has played an important part in the discussion of Christology. It has given rise to the doctrine of kenōsis, according to which Christ emptied himself of, and made no use of, at least some of his divine attributes during the period of his earthly life. Thus, he was not omnipresent, omniscient, or omnipotent in his incarnate state. Scholars appeal to the Gospels to show that Jesus was tired and had other bodily needs. He also disclaimed omniscience (Mk. 13:32). They then explain this in terms of a self-emptying of divine attributes, which they find implied in Phil. 2:7.

This Christology has been questioned on two levels. (a) It raises certain theological questions. The attributes of omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence are essential attributes of divinity. God would not be God without them. If Christ were divested of essential divine attributes, it is difficult to see how the doctrine of his divinity can still be maintained. It would make him, as the Arians believed, something less than God but more than human. Moreover, what became of the cosmic functions of the divine Word (cf. Jn. 1:1–5; Col. 1:17; Heb. 1:3) during the period of Jesus' incarnation? Did the Word abandon them (as kenōsis seems to imply)? Or was it rather that the divine Word that sustains the universe was both in him, living out the divine life in this human life, and also outside him?

To resolve this dilemma scholars have offered an analogy between the conscious mind's relationship to the unconscious mind and Jesus' relationship to the divine Word. The conscious mind is only partly aware of its own workings, yet it continues to work unconsciously. In a similar way, Jesus was aware only of what he needed to be aware of as God's Son and the servant of humankind.

(b) Does Phil. 2:7 really imply kenoticism? Neither the Gospels nor Phil. 2 presents the picture of the abandonment of any divine attributes. They do, however, show Jesus clearly accepting the status and role of a servant (Phil. 2:7; cf. Mk. 10:45; Lk. 22:27; Jn. 13:3–16; 15:20). The motive and guiding principle in all his actions was love, humility, and obedience to the Father (cf. Matt. 3:15; Jn. 5:19; 7:16; 15:10; 17:4; Gal. 4:4). As a servant, Jesus accepted the limitations that were the Father's will.

Phil. 2 sees Christ as having three states: a preexistent state, a state of humiliation as a servant in his life and death, and a state of exaltation in which he is universally acknowledged as Lord. It is usual to take the various descriptions in 2:7–8 as involving successive acts. But the emptying, the taking the form of a servant, and being born in the likeness of humankind are clearly not successive acts, for the birth is mentioned last. Similarly, the humbling and obedience are not stages that follow each other until they are replaced by the cross. Rather, these descriptions each apply to Christ's entire life, all of them culminating in the cross. Thus, the imagery of the passages makes use of both the picture of the preexistent Christ and the suffering servant. The emptying of 2:7 is the outpouring of Christ during his life and also on the cross.

See also mataios, empty, fruitless, useless (3469).

3033 (kenoō, to empty, destroy, render void), → 3031.

3035 (kentyriōn, centurion), → 4483.

3038 (kerameus, potter), → 3040.

3039 (keramikos, belonging to the potter, made of clay), → 3040.

3040 κεράμιον

κεράμιον (keramion), an earthenware vessel, jar (3040); κέραμος (keramos), clay, earthenware vessel, a roof tile (3041); κεραμεύς (kerameus), potter (3038); κεραμικός (keramikos), belonging to the potter, made of clay (3039); κεράννυμι (kerannymi), mix (3042); σκεῦος (skeuos), thing, object, vessel (5007).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. this group of words revolves around the potter's craft. From Homer on, keramion denotes vessels of clay, esp. earthenware jars for storing wine or water. The potter was a familiar figure in every village. The fragility of earthenware pots and the ease with which a potter's stock could be depleted through breakage gave rise to proverbs that suggest the potter was sometimes the butt of jokes: e.g., "to make a pot of the potter"; "the potter bears a grudge against the potter." keramos also came to designate in the pl. tile work, e.g., in the building of a temple or roof tiles of a house.

(b) The vb. kerannymi, to mix, blend, may originally have had something to do with mixing water and soil in order to prepare the potter's clay. But usually it is used of diluting wine with water.

2. (a) In the LXX keramion designates an earthenware pot or jar. In Isa. 5:10 God warns unresponsive Israel that a ten-acre vineyard will yield only one keramion of wine. Jars filled with wine signified prosperity and blessing. Conversely, God's judgment on Moab is pronounced in terms of emptying his vessels (skeuos) and smashing his wine jars (Jer. 48:12).

(b) kerameus means potter (e.g., 1 Chr. 4:23). Normally, the reference to the potter is lit. in the OT, although the potter's craft suggested a metaphor for God in his relationship to Israel and the nations (Ps. 2:9; Isa. 29:16; 41:25; Jer. 18:2–3, 6). Typical is the oracle of lament in Isa. 45:9, which pronounces woe on those who disbelieve in the deliverance God has promised. As inconceivable as it would be for a lump of clay to inquire of the potter what he was doing in the molding process, so is the folly of anyone who tries to argue that God is unable to accomplish what he has promised.

Keen observation of the potter is characteristic of Ben Sira. In a moving passage, he contrasts the wisdom of the scribe with the skill of the farmer, the gem cutter, the smith, and the potter—all who keep the fabric of the world stable (Sir. 38:24–34). He observes not only the potter at work at his wheel, but the importance of glazing and the cleaning of the kiln (38:29–30). The concentration of the potter on his work suggests an apt figure for God in pursuing his purposes among humanity (33:13 = LXX 36:13). Similarly, the effect of the kiln on the finished vessel furnishes a simile for the manner in which human reasoning tests individual character (27:5).

(c) In common with cl. Gk., the vb. kerannymi refers to the diluting of wine with water (Prov. 9:2, 5; Isa. 5:22; 19:14) and has no association with the potter's trade.

NT 1. keramion occurs 2x in the NT, both in connection with the arrangements for the Last Supper (Mk. 14:13; Lk. 22:10). The two disciples charged with the preparation were to follow a man in the city carrying a clay water jar, who would lead them to the house where the feast was to be celebrated. The device of a man carrying a water jar suggests a prearranged signal, for ordinarily women carried water in jars. Perhaps Jesus resorted to a means of recognition that required no exchange of words in the street because his enemies were looking for a way to arrest and kill him (cf. Jn. 11:47–54).

2. keramos occurs only in Lk. 5:19, where it means roof tiles. When four men were unable to break through a crowd with their paralyzed friend, they climbed a staircase on the side of the house to the flat roof and broke it open in order to lower the man before Jesus. Such a roof was made from light material coated with clay (cf. Mk. 2:4).

3. kerameus occurs 3x in the NT, two in the stylized phrase "the potter's field" (Matt. 27:7, 10), which refer to a field the chief priests purchased with the thirty pieces of silver Judas returned, to be used as burial ground for strangers who died in Jerusalem (27:3–10; cf. Acts 1:18). The field contained a pit where potsherds were discarded.

It also occurs in the parable of the potter in Rom. 9:19–29, where God's sovereign disposition over his own creation is affirmed on the analogy of the potter's determination to make from the same lump of clay one vessel (skeuos) of striking beauty and another destined for menial use (9:21). Paul uses the analogy in response to the charge that God is unjust in the administration of his judgment. He first appeals to Exod. 33:19, where God affirms, "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy." From this, Paul deduces that everything depends on God's mercy, which he extends or withholds according to his sovereign will (Rom. 9:15–18). But how God can hold an individual accountable for transgression if he himself assigns to each person his or her role (9:19)?

In his reply, Paul makes use of the parable of the potter (cf. Isa. 29:16; 45:9). As the clay cannot protest against the action of the potter, neither can the creature protest against the action of the creator (Rom. 9:20). Verse 21 recalls Jer. 18:6 (cf. Wis. 15:7), where God's right to make vessels designed for different purposes from the same lump of clay is affirmed. Rom. 9:22–29 contemplates the two categories of such vessels in terms of the sovereign disposition of the divine will. Implied in the discussion is a call for Israel to become open to God's grace expressed in Christ and to the experience of mercy.

4. In addition to its use in Rom. 9:21, skeuos, object, vessel, jar, occurs elsewhere in Paul and other NT writings. In 2 Cor. 4:7 Paul speaks of having the treasure of the knowledge of the glory of God "in jars of clay." In 2 Tim. 2:21 anyone who purifies oneself from what is ignoble "will be a instrument [skeuos] for noble purposes ... useful to the Master." This reflects the language of Acts 9:15, where Ananias is told that Saul of Tarsus is "my chosen instrument to carry my name before the Gentiles and their kings and before the people of Israel."

skeuos can mean generally any object for any purpose (Mk. 11:16), goods, or property (Matt. 12:29; Mk. 3:27; Lk. 17:31). The addition of a qualifying phrase may define its nature more precisely, e.g., "everything [lit., all the vessels] used in its ceremonies" (Heb. 9:21; cf. also Rev. 18:12). In Acts 27:17 it seems to be an anchor, though it may be gear or sails (cf. also 10:11, 16; 11:5). For its meaning in 1 Thess. 4:4 and 1 Pet. 3:7, in the context of marriage relationships, → gynē, woman, 1222.

5. The adj. keramikos occurs only once in the NT, in the pledge of shared power with Christ extended to faithful Christians at Thyatira (Rev. 2:27). Together they will rule the nations with an iron rod and "will dash them to pieces like pottery" (a quotation from Ps. 2:9). The new order must be preceded by the shattering of the old (cf. Rev. 11:15). This promise provides an assurance of vindication and a reversal of roles in which the humiliated people of God will share in the authority of their Lord.

6. As in cl. Gk. the vb. kerannymi is used of diluting wine with water. In Rev. 14:10 it carries the nuance of pouring out the wine of God's wrath "full strength." In 18:6 it describes the fate of Babylon, whose judgment is depicted as mixing a double portion of wine to make her reel from drunkenness and deprive her of all sense and capability (cf. Isa. 19:14; Pss. Sol. 8:14).

See also ostrakinos, made of earth or clay, earthenware (4017); pēlos, clay, mud, mire (4384); phyrama, a mixture, a lump (5878).

3041 (keramos, clay, earthenware vessel, a roof tile), → 3040.

3042 (kerannymi, mix), → 3040.

3043 κέρας

κέρας (keras), horn (3043).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. keras is a common word for the horn of an animal; later it came to mean courage or stubbornness. In ancient religion, though probably not in Greece, horns symbolized the strength of gods and humans. Thus, Assyrian princes and Babylonian priests wore two-horned headdresses similar to those that normally adorned the gods. Alexander the Great was known as "The Horned One."

2. In the LXX keras is used in two different connections. (a) It denotes the horns of animals (Deut. 33:17) and is esp. frequent with this meaning in apocalyptic lit. (e.g., Dan. 7:7; 8:3; 1 Enoch 90:9). In priestly and sacrificial contexts the word refers to the twisted horn-like corners or projections of the altar (Exod. 27:2; Lev. 4:7; Ps. 118:27).

(b) From these original connotations came the fig. use of keras to express the power and might of human beings and of Yahweh. As in the prophetic and symbolic act of Zedekiah (1 Ki. 22:11), the horn frequently denotes physical power and superiority (Mic. 4:13) as well as well-being in general (1 Sam. 2:1). When Yahweh is addressed as "the horn of my salvation" (2 Sam. 22:3; Ps. 18:2), he is considered to be the power that brings about salvation and preserves humans against hostile attacks.

NT 1. In the NT keras is found only in Lk. 1:69 and in Rev. In Zechariah's song of praise (Lk. 1:68–79), strongly reminiscent of Ps. and full of OT imagery, the phrase "horn of salvation" is taken over from Ps. 18:2 and means "saving power." The vb. "raised up" suggests that by his acts in history God brings about salvation. The addition of "in the house of his servant David," which goes back to 132:17, specifies the Messiah as the horn of salvation. Lk. 1:69 glorifies God as one who has demonstrated his power in history and who by sending the Messiah has raised up a power that brings salvation.

2. Rev. 9:13 refers to the horns of the golden altar before God. The fig. use of horns in Rev., where they have no organic connection with the animals concerned and so cannot in any sense be envisaged biologically, is connected with OT and Jewish apocalyptic. The Lamb bears seven horns (5:6). In accordance with the symbolic meaning of the number seven and of the metaphor of the horn, these horns express divine power.

The dragon and the beast each have ten horns (Rev. 12:3; 13:1; 17:3). Those of the beast are related to the ten horns of Dan. 7:7 as well as to their application (ten kings; cf. 7:24), who, according to Rev. 17:12–14, give over their power to the beast. They join with the beast in his war against the Lamb but are vanquished. Like most of Rev., the meaning of this vision is debated. Some interpret it as referring to the 1st cent., so that the beast represents Nero redivivus and the ten horns represent princes or Roman emperors. Others suggest that these horns represent all rulers and their subjects (cf. 19:17–21) who are linked with the Antichrist in the open battle against Christ.

See also bia, force, violence (1040); ischys, strength, power, might (2709); kratos, power, might, rule (3197).

3045 (kerdainō, to gain), → 3046.

3046 κέρδος

κέρδος (kerdos), gain (3046); κερδαίνω (kerdainō), to gain (3045); ζημία (zēmia), damage, disadvantage, forfeit, loss (2422); ζημιόω (zēmioō), suffer damage, loss, forfeit (2423).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kerdos means gain, profit, advantage; sometimes clever advice, cunning attacks; in the pl. even deceit. The vb. kerdainō means to make a profit or gain an advantage; it can also mean to spare or avoid (cf. Acts 27:21), since avoiding loss brings a gain. The opposite of kerdos is zēmia, disadvantage, loss, and (occasionally) punishment. The opposite of kerdainō is zēmioō, suffer loss.

2. Neither kerdos nor kerdainō occurs in the LXX, though the concept of profit does. The OT refers to gains that are unjustly acquired (e.g., Gen. 37:26; Exod. 18:21; Ps. 10:3; 119:36; Isa. 33:15; 56:11; 57:17), using such words as anomia, lawlessness, anoma, lawless things (→ nomos, law, 3795), and adikia, unrighteousness (→ 94). Eccl. stresses that there is no true profit (perisseia; → perisseuō, abound, surpass, 4355) under the sun (cf. Eccl. 1:3; 2:13; 3:9, 19; 5:15; 6:8).

zēmioō does occur in the LXX. It refers to some sort of legal punishment, such as a levied fine (Exod. 21:22; Deut. 22:19). In Prov. 17:26; 19:19; 21:11, it occurs as a generic word for punishment. In 2 Ki. 23:33 zēmia refers to a levy imposed by Pharaoh Neco on Judah; in Ezra 7:26, to the notion of confiscation of property; and in Prov. 27:12 to the loss a fool suffers by refusing to avoid danger.

NT 1. In the NT kerdos occurs only 3x (all in Paul); kerdainō occurs 17x. The NT opposes the normal economic orientation of profit insofar as profit is anticipated out of selfish motives. Tit. 1:11 is directed against teachers of false doctrine from Crete who were spreading ideas with an eye to "dishonest gain" (cf. also the warnings to church leaders in 1 Tim. 3:8; Tit. 1:7; 1 Pet. 5:2). Anyone whose view of life is dominated by the profit motive falls into an arrogant self-centeredness and thus into sin (Jas. 4:13). Matt. 16:26 (Mk. 8:36; Lk. 9:25) warns against finding one's life by means of self-preservation. One may need to lose one's life in order to gain it.

2. Paul develops a positive understanding of gain. The gain of Christ is the ultimate good. Death itself is thus a "gain" (Phil. 1:21), since it marks the end of the life of martyrdom and leads to life with Christ. In Phil. 3 Paul recounts his own privileges as a Jew and as a Pharisee, such as his circumcision and faithful adherence to the law. But what he at one time considered "profit" (kerdos) has become, for the sake of Christ, total "loss" (zēmia), because these things were bound by the law of human achievement and conferred none of the "righteousness that comes from God" (3:9). Paul, therefore, regards human gains as losses, in order to gain Christ and to be found in him.

3. Paul takes on the same language as he reflects on his missionary commission. His main goal is to "win" (kerdainō) as many as possible for the Lord by whatever means possible (1 Cor. 9:19–22). Likewise, Peter exhorts wives to win their unbelieving husbands by their godly behavior (1 Pet. 3:1). Jesus exhorts people to use effective pastoral care and concern to gain a fellow believer who has fallen into sin (Matt. 18:15). Jesus also uses kerdainō metaphorically in the parable of the talents, when he refers to those who have gained more talents by their wise use of what the master had given them (25:16–17, 20, 22).

See also apodidōmi, give away, give back, sell, recompense (625); misthos, pay, wages, reward (3635); opsōnion, wages, payment (4072).

3051 κεφαλή

κεφαλή (kephalē), head (3051); ἀνακεφαλαιόω (anakephalaioō), sum up, recapitulate (368).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kephalē means (a) the head of man or animal, the coping of a wall, the capital of a column, the source or mouth of a river, the beginning or end of a month, etc. (b) It also denotes what is decisive, superior. In Gk. anthropology the head takes precedence over all other members; in it lies the authoritative principle, reason. (c) It also stands for the life of an individual. As early as Homer it was used in a similar way to psychē. Thus, curses that name the head are directed against the whole person.

2. (a) In the LXX kephalē has the primary meanings we know from cl. Gk.: the head of a man (Gen. 28:11), the head of an animal (3:15), the top of a mountain (8:5) or tower (11:4).

(b) The head is particularly important in the language of gesture. It was shaven in times of grief (Ezek. 7:18); a man under a vow did not shave it (Num. 6:5; cf. Acts 18:18). It was covered (2 Sam. 15:30) or strewn with ashes (13:19) as a sign of penitence.

(c) Via expressions like "for each person" (Exod. 16:16; lit., "for each head") and "one by one" (Num. 1:2; lit., "head by head"), the use of kephalē in the LXX was extended to cover the life of the individual. The OT sees the human person as a unity, but in each case it singles out that part of the person that is significant. In this case it is the head as the source of life. The head can be used as the equivalent of the person and one's whole existence (e.g., 2 Ki. 25:27; Ps. 3:3; Ezek. 9:10; 33:4). In Isa. 43:4 kephalē stands for nepeš ("soul") and denotes a human life.

(d) By comparison with other nations Israel will be "the head, not the tail" (Deut. 28:13; cf. Isa. 9:14). Thus kephalē can denote the one who occupies a position of superiority in the community (cf. Jdg. 10:18).

3. Philo's use of kephalē was seminal. The logos (word) is the head of the universe that God has created, its source of life, overlord, ruler. In contrast to ANE mythology, which saw the whole cosmos encompassed in the head and body of the highest god (→ aiōn, 172), Philo believed in God as the creator of the cosmos. In the gnostic use of kephalē, the term serves to denote not only the unity of the body, but also the controlling influence over it. The post-Christian Odes of Solomon speak of the head concept of the first man in a manner comparable with that in which the NT speaks of Christ.

NT 1. In the NT, kephalē appears 75x, primarily in its basic meaning of the head of a person (Matt. 14:8), animal, or demons (Rev. 17:3). It occurs most frequently in Rev. (19x), where it refers to those human and animal forms characterized by the shape or the ornament of their heads. The head bears the tokens of honor and dignity (4:4; 19:12; etc.), but also those of shame (13:1). Jesus' head is often mentioned in the passion narrative (Matt. 27:29–30, 37; Mk. 15:19, 29; Jn. 19:2, 30). The smiting of his head stands in marked contrast with an anointing of it (Matt. 26:7; Mk. 14:3; Lk. 7:46). The head of Jesus is also mentioned in the resurrection narratives (Jn. 20:7, 12). On the phrase kephalēn gōnias, head of the corner (Matt. 21:42; Mk. 12:10; Lk. 20:17; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:7), → gōnia, 1224.

2. The head is mentioned in the NT also in connection with the customs of fasting and penitence (Matt. 6:17; Acts 18:18; Rev. 18:19). As we know from the LXX, the shaking of the head signifies that a claim and its consequences have been rejected (Matt. 27:39). With the phrase, "Your blood be on your own heads!" Paul placed on the Corinthian Jews the responsibility for their rejection of the Messiah (Acts 18:6; cf. Matt. 27:25).

The numbering of the hairs of the head (Matt. 10:30) and the saying that "not a hair of your head will perish" (Lk. 21:18) speak of God's promise to preserve those who commit themselves into his hands. In wanting to have his head washed (Jn. 13:9), Peter wanted his whole life to be cleansed. Jesus prohibited swearing by one's head (Matt. 5:36; cf. m. Sanh. 3:2, where the rabbis refused to allow anyone to retract an oath by the life of the head).

3. In 1 Cor. 11:2–15 one notes a discussion of reasons why women should be required to veil their heads during public worship. The reference to a veil is to something that conceals the whole head, including the hair. In Jud. women were veiled in public. Paul's teaching here may have been influenced by the presence of Jews in Corinth, who maintained Jewish practices in their synagogue worship and who may well have looked with a critical eye on what was going on in the church. Note that immediately before the present passage Paul has urged that no offense be given to Jews, Greeks, or the church (10:32) and that the church should follow him in trying to please everyone and in being imitators of Christ (10:33–11:1).

The underlying problem in Corinth was one of freedom in the light of the new and equal standing of males and females before God. In his letter of 1 Cor., Paul reflects in several places on the importance of freedom to these new church members—often a form of freedom that had no restraints. He emphasizes a freedom that is linked with service to God and love for others. Thus, freedom can never be equated with license. The apostle is concerned not only with freedom but also with order in society. For him the role and relationships of the sexes, which are determined by creation, are not abolished by salvation. This must be reflected in public worship. Thus, Paul advances the following arguments for the subordinate role of women and for the veiling of the woman's head.

(a) The hierarchy of the order is God–Christ–man–woman, in which each of the first three members is the head of the following one (1 Cor. 11:3). Here kephalē should probably be understood not as ruler but as source or origin. The creation narrative of Gen. 2:21–23 assigns a priority to the male (cf. also Eph. 5:22–33; Col. 3:18–19; 1 Tim. 2:11–14). But the Christian knows that Christ has a greater priority as the archetypal man (cf. 1 Cor. 8:6; 15:46–49; Col. 1:16), and the head of Christ is God (cf. 1 Cor. 3:23; 8:6).

There is a transition from the sense of head in 1 Cor. 11:3 to its literal sense in 11:4–6, and from there on the text oscillates between the two senses. Paul argues that for a man to pray with his head covered is to dishonor his head (11:4, cf. 11:7), because it implies that he is abdicating the sovereignty and dignity given to him by the Creator. But for a woman to pray or prophesy with her head unveiled dishonors her head (11:5), for this is tantamount to a denial of her relation to man in the ordinances of creation. It is just as dishonorable as if her head were shaven, which was a commonly accepted sign of dishonor.

Paul's argument at this point has two premises: (i) the propriety of covering the head in the presence of a superior, and (ii) the constitutional relationship of man and woman, which gives a certain priority to the man. Given these two premises, the propriety of veiling the woman in worship (the most solemn occasion for recognizing the divine ordering of things) logically follows. However, in situations where the former premise is neither recognized nor understood, the validity of the conclusion no longer has the same weight as it did in Paul's day.

(b) Man has priority in the order of creation in relation to the glory of God (11:7–9, 12). The argument is now developed in relation to the concept of glory (doxa, → 1518). Gen. 1:26–27 states that all humans (Heb. ʾādām; Gk. anthrōpos) were made in the image of God. Here in 1 Cor., however, Paul speaks only of the male (Gk. anēr). Perhaps he is reading Gen. 2:18–23 in the light of Gen. 1:26–27. But he also couples together here the concepts of image and glory in a way that goes beyond the Gen. narratives: "A man ought not to cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of man" (1 Cor. 11:7). Elsewhere Paul argues that humankind has fallen short of the glory of God (Rom. 3:23; cf. 1:21) and that the glory of God is revealed in the gospel in the face of Christ (2 Cor. 4:4–6), who restores the image of God in humanity (Col. 3:10).

In addition to the priority of the male in the created order and the significance of veiling, Paul here has two further premises implied in his conclusion. (i) The glory of God should not be veiled in the presence of God, for this would be a contradiction in terms. Hence, the man should not be veiled. (ii) Woman is the glory of man (for woman was made for man, cf. 1 Cor. 11:9). Hence, the glory of man should be veiled in the presence of God. Again, it should be said that the practical application drawn from these premises depends on how far they are recognized in a community.

(c) Paul then refers to the angels (1 Cor. 11:10): "That is why the woman ought to have authority [exousia] over the head, because of the angels" (lit. trans.). The veil was a sign of the woman's authority. In Christ a woman has an equal status with men before God. The veil was a sign of this new authority, which was denied her in the synagogue. As a woman she may pray or prophesy (11:5), but she must maintain due regard for her place in the created order. Whereas the man shows his authority by not being veiled, the woman shows hers by wearing a veil. The wearing of the veil manifests both the liberty and the restraint that belongs to the woman in Christ. The liberty derives from freedom in Christ; the restraint (as elsewhere) derives from the ordering of society, which has divine sanction.

What about the reference to angels? According to Rev. 8:3, angels are charged with the task of transmitting prayers to God. They are the sign of the divine presence. Therefore no offense should be given them. The major premise of the argument is that one should not give offense—in this particular case, to the angels. The minor premise (implied) is that the veil is a sign of a woman's status and authority in the Christian community. Thus, women should be veiled in worship. Again it may be noted that, although the guiding principles behind Paul's recommendation hold good, its continued application depends on the continued acceptance of all the premises of the argument. In a culture where the significance of veiling is no longer understood in the same way, the argument no longer has the same force.

(d) Next, Paul appeals to custom grounded in the natural order (1 Cor. 11:13–15). He shares the view that it is natural for men to have their hair short, though it may be grown longer on occasion in connection with a vow (Acts 18:18). The statement that a woman's long hair is "her glory ... given to her as a covering" (1 Cor. 11:15) does not imply that if she has sufficient hair, she need not be veiled. Rather, the veiling of the woman in worship is seen as consonant with nature. Paul's view of the woman's hair as "her glory" is perhaps taking up the thought that, just as in the presence of God the glory of man must be veiled (see above), so too must the "glory" of the woman. In each case Paul uses the same word, doxa.

(e) The argument concludes in 1 Cor. 11:16 by stating that this is the practice recognized by Paul and the other churches. The passage has been used in support of requiring women to wear hats in worship today. If this application were valid, the argument would support not the wearing of hats but full veils. However, the above discussion has shown that its force depends on the common understanding of certain premises valid in Paul's culture. Where these premises no longer obtain, the conclusions also no longer obtain, even though the motivating principle of maintaining freedom of the Spirit and restraint with regard to the order of nature and society still holds.

4. In Eph. 4 the head is contrasted with the body (→ sōma, 5393). Christ is the head of his body (4:15). The body is supplied from the head and grows because of it (4:16). To describe the relationship of the Lord to his people, the church, Eph. emphasizes that the church is to grow eis andra teleion (lit., "into the perfect or complete man," 4:13). In this picture, Christ is the head, and as head he sustains the whole body. Thus, in 4:15 the head determines the relationship of love and truth in the body of Christ, i.e., the fellowship of those who practice truth and through love grow up into him. The relationship of kephalē to sōma expresses the authority of Christ (cf. Col. 2:10) and the corresponding subordination of the church. It expresses the body's participation in and dependence on the head for the gift of life. The head is always the heavenly goal of the body, which cannot be attained except in a body sustained by faith and revelation.

Eph. 1:21–22 declares that all powers are now subject to Christ, who is the "head over everything for the church." The archē, the principality that previously was so important, is now one of the many subject to Christ. The application to Christ of archē ("beginning") in Col. 1:18 (where he is also said to be "the head of the body, the church") does not contradict this, for here the word stands in polemic juxtaposition to the archai (1:16; → archē, 794).

5. In Rom. 12:19 Paul urges believers not to avenge themselves, for vengeance belongs to the Lord (cf. Lev. 19:18; Deut. 32:35). He then backs this up with a quote from Prov. 25:21–22a: "If your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him something to drink. In doing so, you will heap burning coals on his head" (Rom. 12:20). While the imagery behind this thought is debated, it seems most likely that the coals represent an element of shame or contrition, not a form of punishment. Paul's main concern is that the life of the believer should be free from all thought of revenge, that the enemy might be convicted (though not necessarily converted—for that is God's work) by kindness, and that the way to overcome evil is not to repay in kind but to repay it with good.

6. The rare vb. anakephalaioō means to bring something to a kephalaion, to sum up, recapitulate. It is used in Rom. 13:9 of the individual commandments, which "are summed up in this one rule, 'Love your neighbor as yourself.'" In Eph. 1:10 it occurs in the statement of God's plan "when the times will have reached their fulfillment—to bring all things in heaven and on earth together under one head [anakephalaiōsasthai], even Christ." The thought of unity implied here has affinity with the use of the vb. in Rom. and is one of the great themes of Eph. (cf. 2:14–22; 4:3–4). But there may also be an overtone of renewal, which is in fact a condition of unity. Christ and his people, both Jew and Gentile, constitute the "one new man" (2:15; cf. 4:13). Moreover, this affects the entire created order. In his body, which represents the plērōma (fullness; → plēroō, 4444), the heavenly domain of his presence, Christ fills all in all (1:22–23; cf. 1:10).

3056 (kēnsos, tax, poll-tax), → 5088.

3060 (kērygma, proclamation, announcement, preaching), → 3062.

3061 (kēryx, herald), → 3062.

3062 κηρύσσω

κηρύσσω (kēryssō), announce, make known, proclaim (aloud) (3062); κῆρυξ (kēryx), herald (3061); κήρυγμα (kērygma), proclamation, announcement, preaching (3060).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the noun kēryx denotes a man commissioned by his ruler or the state to make known, with a clear voice, some important news (a sort of town crier). The vb. kērysso was formed from the noun to describe the activity of the herald, though it occurs less often than the noun. The noun kērygma was later formed to describe either the act of shouting aloud or the report or edict that was proclaimed.

(b) The precise meaning of these words depends on the function of the kēryx in the historical period in question. (i) In Homer kēryx is used of the attendants of a prince who performed duties in keeping with the role of senior court officials, whose task was to care for the personal well-being of the prince and his guests. They had the respect of the prince and a status similar to that of friends. The herald's staff, a kind of scepter, in their hands, made that clear as they carried out the commission (to inform or invite) authorized by the prince.

(ii) In the period of the polis, the democratic city-state, the institution was maintained, though in this age there were various types of heralds. Formally these men were servants of certain authorities, whose chief qualification for office was a loud and clear voice; but heralds also called the soldiers to battle and the full citizens to the assembly. They were responsible for good order in the assembly and opened it with prayers and sacrifices and announced its end. In public court hearings heralds announced the result of the drawing of lots for the judges, called on the judges to cast their votes, and asked the people whether anyone had objections about procedure or the statements of the witnesses. Thus they were, so to speak, responsible for the maintenance of law and order.

There was also a certain sacredness to their position. When the kēryx appeared, weapons were stilled, e.g., when heralds from one city invited all Greece to a festival in honor of the gods. The herald who came to an enemy with a message in time of war was not to be touched, since that would incur the wrath not only of the one who sent him, but also that of the gods. It is probably because of this position that heralds occasionally functioned as political ambassadors.

(iii) The following general characteristics may therefore be listed. The kēryx was always under the authority of someone else, whose spokesman he was. He himself was immune from danger, since he conveyed the message and intention of his master. Since all he could do was announce, he had no liberty of his own to negotiate. He also proclaimed legal and judicial verdicts, and what he announced became valid by his act. The binding and settling nature of this proclamation distinguishes kērysso and its cognates from angellō (→ 33) and its compounds, which refer primarily to the imparting of information.

(c) With the relaxation of the rigid order of the polis, the Stoics were provided with the opportunity for giving a quite different interpretation to the office of kēryx, after it had largely lost its significance for society. Epictetus saw the real kēryx of his day as the Cynic philosopher, who moved around the country as a messenger of the gods and guardian of the moral order. Without means of his own and totally dedicated to his task, he came to denounce the way of life of his contemporaries and to call them to repentance and reformation of life. These preachers of virtue prepared the stage on which later the messengers of the gospel of Jesus Christ were to stand. The Eleusinian mysteries also had their special heralds, who carried out liturgical functions in the cult, were responsible for announcements, and together with the priests exercised great influence.

2. (a) In striking contrast to Gk. lit., the noun kēryx occurs only 4x in the LXX (Gen. 41:43; Dan. 3:4; Sir. 20:15; 4 Macc. 6:4). In Gen. 41 and Dan. 3 the emphasis is on the vb. kērysso, which appears in addition to the noun. In other words, a figure comparable to the Gk. kēryx was unknown in Israel. It is clearly not appropriate to describe the prophets in this way.

(b) The LXX uses the vb. kērissō 30x. In Exod. 36:6 it is used for an announcement made throughout the camp by Moses; in 2 Chr. 36:22, throughout the kingdom by King Cyrus. In Hos. 5:8; Joel 2:1; Zeph. 3:14; Zech. 9:9, the vb. refers to a loud cry (a cry of alarm raised or accompanied by instruments, or the triumphant battle cry or shout of victory). In Prov. 1:21; 8:1, wisdom cries out with a loud voice.

If we leave aside the Prov. passages and Zeph. 3:14; Zech. 9:9, we may say that kērissō is used only for three classic functions of the herald: (i) for the proclamation of a cultic festival (Exod. 32:5; 2 Ki. 10:20) or fast (2 Chr. 20:3; Joel 1:14; 2:15; Jon. 3:5, 7); (ii) for the orders of the military commander in the field or a decree of the prince (Exod. 36:6; 2 Chr. 24:9; 1 Esd. 2:2; 1 Macc. 5:49); (iii) for the proclamation of judgment (Hos. 5:8; Joel 3:9; Jon. 3:2, 4), of Yahweh's day of judgment (Joel 2:1), or of liberty to captives (Isa. 61:1). Note that in Mic. 3:5, kērissō is used to render the false prophets' proclamation of peace.

The noun kērygma is found once in each of the above categories, describing the content of what is proclaimed (2 Chr. 30:5; Prov. 9:3; Jon. 3:2; 1 Esd. 9:3). Categories (i) and (ii) move within the familiar framework of orders given by human authorities, but the prophetic passages mentioned under (iii) speak of the proclamation of a judgment of Yahweh. The number of references is, however, relatively small. The kēryx word group never achieves central importance in the OT's proclamation of salvation; this purpose is served by other vbs. (e.g., angellō).

3. (a) In Jewish writings outside the OT, Josephus's use of kēryx corresponds to the cl. Gk. usage when he refers to the conveying of military commands and to diplomatic missions. Philo, by contrast, uses the words for the utterances of the OT prophets. In rab. lit. both the noun and the vb. appear where an announcement or a judicial verdict is publicly proclaimed and also for the public announcement of rab. decisions on doctrine when these are relevant to the keeping of the law.

(b) At Qumran the vb. sāpar, to tell, recount, which sometimes comes close in meaning to the Gk. kērissō, occurs fairly frequently in the Hymns. Here, of course, it is used of the congregation's, or the individual worshiper's, act of proclaiming praise to God and recording the wonderful works of Yahweh or his honor, majesty, patience, and mercy.

NT 1. The first noticeable feature in the NT is that, in keeping with the LXX, it uses the noun kēryx only 3x (1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11; 2 Pet. 2:5). kērygma, too, is found relatively seldom. Paul uses it for the message of Christ that he proclaims (Rom. 16:25) or for his preaching generally (1 Cor. 2:4; 15:14; 2 Tim. 4:17; Tit. 1:3). In Matt. 12:41; Lk. 11:32, kērygma is used for the "preaching" of Jonah to Nineveh.

The vb. kērissō, on the other hand, occurs 61x. An analysis of the grammatical obj. of the vb. reveals that in early works of Paul (Gal. 2:2; 1 Thess. 2:9; cf. Col. 1:23), and in some Gospel passages (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 24:14; 26:13; Mk. 1:14; 13:10; 14:9), the obj. is to euangelion, the gospel. But in Acts 8:5; 9:20; 19:13; 1 Cor. 1:23; 15:12; 2 Cor. 1:19; 11:4, Phil. 1:15, the obj. is Christ (4x), Jesus (3x), or Christ Jesus. John the Baptist preached "a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mk. 1:4; Lk. 3:3; cf. Acts 10:37). For Luke the basileia, kingdom (→ 993), is the obj. of proclamation (Lk. 9:2; Acts 20:25; 28:31; cf. Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 24:14).

2. (a) This evidence makes it clear that the NT writers, following other streams of Jud., avoided identifying themselves or the messengers of Jesus with the Gk.

institution of the kēryx, open as it was to such a wide variety of interpretation. Only in the later NT passages (1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11, leaving aside the description of Noah as a kēryx of righteousness in 2 Pet. 2:5) is the word used, and then in combination with apostolos, apostle (→ 693), which qualifies it. But even these two texts reveal the basic difference between the biblical viewpoint and that of the surrounding world: It is not the institution or the person to which importance is attached, but only the effective act of proclamation. This may be why the establishment of a definite, official position of "preacher" was avoided by not using that particular noun (e.g., it is not included in the listing of special ministry gifts in Eph. 4:11–12).

(b) A similar finding results from a study of the term kērygma, proclamation, in the NT. Where it is used (e.g., Matt. 12:41; Lk. 11:32 for the kērygma of Jonah), it undoubtedly includes the content of Jonah's message to Nineveh. But the emphasis lies much more on the carrying out by Jonah of a divine commission—the delivery of a message containing not only a threat of judgment but also an invitation to repentance and salvation.

In three texts of Paul (1 Cor. 1:21; 2:4; 15:14), this emphasis is even more obvious. The emphasis in kērygma has in mind the apostle's activity of preaching just as much as the content of his message. In Rom. 16:25 kērygma, message, is already becoming hypostasized: It is Christ-preaching, as carried out by Paul. Furthest of all along this line goes 2 Tim. 4:17, where the kērygma is the actual act of proclamation, which has need of the particular messenger only in order to complete it and give it concrete fulfillment (see also Tit. 1:3).

(c) The nouns of this group are thus used in the NT generally to express the form of an activity; what the kērygma is—i.e., what content it makes known—can be seen only from the context in each case. The NT is therefore as faithful to the original meaning of the word as is the OT. kērygma is the phenomenon of a call that goes out and makes a claim on the hearers; it corresponds to the life and activity of the prophets. It is not until the 4th cent. that Athanasius, after centuries in which the word had been used in a variety of ways, used the noun kērygma in the full sense of Christian or church doctrine.

3. (a) The NT's predominant conception of proclamation as a process and event, whose content can only be determined by closer definition, is confirmed by the greater frequency with which the vb. is used in comparison with the nouns. kēryssō is one of a number of formal verbs of telling and communication, which connote a certain means of communication but are not limited as to the content (e.g., didaskō, to teach [1438]; angellō, to report [33]; legō, to say [3306]; homologeō, to confess [3933]; martyreō, to bear witness [3455]; euangelizō, to preach [2294]). None of these vbs. gained a position of clear dominance in the NT or became a technical term (see, e.g., Lk. 4:43; 6:13; 9:6; Phil. 1:18; 1 Thess. 2:2, 9).

The nearest the NT comes to the classical figure of the herald is in Rev. 5:2, where the angel makes a proclamation with a mighty voice, and in 1 Pet. 3:19, where the voice of the crucified one rings out in Hades (here the vb. has no obj.). Perhaps also Matt. 10:27; Lk. 12:3, where proclaiming from the rooftops refers to the public revelation of what has hitherto been hidden, can be mentioned here.

(b) Traces of the original meaning of the word are also to be found here and there in Paul. In Rom. 2:21 he addresses those who make a demand that people should not steal and yet do it themselves: "You who preach [kēryssō] against stealing, do you steal?" Here kēryssō may be compared with the Stoic sense of proclamation of a definite command that demands obedience (see also 1 Cor. 9:27; Gal. 5:11).

Positively. Paul sees himself as one who proclaims the gospel of God (1 Thess. 2:9) among the Gentiles (Gal. 2:2), something that can be done only if it is accompanied by a total giving of his own person (1 Thess. 2:8). For Paul proclamation is not, as with Jonah, a once-for-all cry. The proclamation of the message of Christ requires unceasing pleading and wooing with a love that seeks and is accompanied by a constant care for the individual. It also involves exhortation (→ parakaleō, 4151), warning, encouragement (→ paramytheomai, 4170), and witness (martyreō, 3455). In such a context kērysso appears as the central act of proclamation, which is needed if the call of God is to be realized (1 Thess. 2:12).

The basis for this invitation (i.e., its content and origin) may be discovered from other passages in his letters where Paul uses kērysso. It is Christ, a person, whom Paul proclaims in this way (1 Cor. 1:23; 15:12; 2 Cor. 1:19; 4:5; Phil. 1:15; cf. 2 Cor. 11:4). It is in fact the crucified Christ (1 Cor. 1:23; cf. 2:2) who is presented in this proclamation as the basis of life. It is the Christ in whom Paul sees all the previous promises of God as being fulfilled and taking concrete form (2 Cor. 1:20). It is the Christ to whom Paul bears witness on the basis of the tradition handed down to him (→ paradidōmi, 4140), but also on the basis of his own experience (1 Cor. 15:3–8). The death of Jesus for the sin of others, as well as his presence and exaltation made possible only by this means (1 Cor. 15:1–2; cf. Phil. 2:8–11), formed the central content of what Paul preached as his saving and world-changing message (1 Cor. 15:12).

The act of proclamation is ultimately a prerequisite of faith, inasmuch as it has as its goal not simply the imparting of information or a formal allegiance, but a faith that involves self-surrender and trust (cf. 1 Cor. 15:11). Therefore, Paul sees proclamation as legitimate and possible only where a commission and authority has been given (Rom. 10:8–12; cf. 10:15 with Acts 13:3 and Isa. 52:7). This means that Christ is not merely an object of proclamation, but also the subject, who has authority over it. He himself is the one who commands the proclamation and who allows the hearers to experience him in and through such human proclamation (cf. Gal. 3:1).

(c) The Synoptic Gospels all use kērysso for the activity of John the Baptist (Matt. 3:1; Mk. 1:4; Lk. 3:3), indicating, as the allusion to Isa. 40:3 also shows, that he is the last of the prophets. Mk. sums up his preaching as that of a "baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins." This phrase includes both the means and the end. Matt. and Lk. develop this further with some examples of his teaching. All three Gospels record, however, that the Baptist's preaching extended to the announcement of the coming stronger one, through whose Spirit-baptism a new order would begin (Matt. 3:11; cf. Jn. 1:26–27).

(i) Matt. inserts at this point (3:2), as the factor that legitimates and motivates John's preaching, the truth that " the kingdom of heaven is near." This means that John's call to repentance is set against the background of the promised lordship of Christ (cf. Jesus' almost identical words in 4:17), and is emphasized at 10:7 as the center of the message the disciples are to proclaim. Just as the prophets, represented by John, have pointed forward to Jesus' coming, so the disciples bear witness to its dawning. The content of the kērysso remains the same—a proclamation of Christ's lordship.

Note that Matt. is the only evangelist to use the term kērysso exclusively in reference to the ministry of John, Jesus, and the disciples expressly sent out by him. He thus underlines the binding, almost judicial and official character of the proclamation, which, in contrast to didaskō, to teach, takes place not only in the synagogues but also in the desert and the villages and even among the Gentiles (Matt. 24:14).

(ii) Likewise in Mark the line may indeed be followed from John (1:4, 7), through Jesus (1:38–39), to the commissioned disciples (3:14; cf. 6:12). But Mk. emphasizes the inner power and the necessity of proclamation rather than its official character. Even before the disciples have been commissioned, those who have been healed proclaim, despite being expressly forbidden to do so. Their encounter with Jesus, their experience of God's mercy, and their own recognition of the dawn of the new age in this Jesus (7:37, echoing Isa. 35:5) are enough to compel them to tell others.

(iii) Finally, Luke takes up in Lk. 4:18–19 the prophetic words of Isa. 61:1–2 in Jesus' sermon at Nazareth and his declaration that the word has been fulfilled by his coming. He describes Jesus as the one who both proclaims and carries through the work of God, and then sends out the disciples to proclaim it (Lk. 10:9). When they speak of Christ, they proclaim by that very act the kingdom—God's new ordering of the things in the world, taking place in and through Jesus (cf. Acts 8:5; 9:20; 20:25; 28:31). Conversely, the proclamation of the basileia is tied up with the words and teaching of Jesus (28:31).

The sermons recorded in Acts tend to have a general common structure and message. Jesus is described as the Son of God (9:20), who fulfilled the OT prophecies concerning the Messiah (cf. 2:25–35; 3:24–26; 10:43; 13:32–37). He went about doing good (10:37–38), was crucified but arose from the dead (e.g., 2:32; 4:10), and is now exalted at God's right hand (2:33; 3:21; 10:42). In his name alone forgiveness of sins can be realized (2:38; 3:19; 10:43). Acts 15:21 makes it clear that the proclamation refers also to binding principles of faith and life for the fellowship.

4. What is the particular nuance of kēryssō as compared with the other, synonymous words used for the passing on of the message of Christ? Both Luke and Paul prefer the vb. euangelizō when they want to describe the total activity of proclamation (in the case of Lk., katangellō also) and use kēryssō more often to denote Jesus Christ as the originator and the object of proclamation (e.g., Lk. 4:18–19, 44; 8:1; 1 Cor. 1:23; 15:12; 2 Cor. 4:5; Phil. 1:15). Lk. also uses kēryssō with reference to the particular message that God's rule has dawned in Christ (Lk. 9:2; cf. also 1:19; 2:10; 3:18; 9:2, 6; Acts 5:42; 8:4–6). In each case the proclamation has a personal character, and the one who proclaims must stake his or her existence on it.

At the same time, the conveying of the message of Christ does not consist solely in kēryssō, as Matt. makes clear. He describes the work of Jesus as "teaching ... preaching ... and healing" (Matt. 4:23; 9:35). The description of the disciples' work follows the same essential pattern (10:7–8), though the word for teaching does not appear in connection with the disciples until the great commission of Matt. 28:20. All this is to say that the event of proclamation is surrounded by objective instruction and by events and actions that make known the dawn and the power of the new age.

See also angellō, announce (33).

3063 (kētos, sea-monster), → 2716.

3064 (Kēphas, Cephas), → 4376.

3073 κινδυνεύω

κινδυνεύω (kindyneuō), be in danger (3073); κίνδυνος (kindynos), danger, risk (3074).

CL & OT Both vb. and noun are found widely in Hel. Gk. In the LXX the vb. is found in Isa. 28:13, where it describes the risk run by those who refuse to listen. In Ps. 116:3 kindynos describes a dire predicament from which the psalmist has been delivered. In Sir. 43:24 kindynos is used of the perils faced by mariners.

NT kindyneuō occurs 4x in the NT. In Lk.'s rendition of the stilling of the storm, he emphasizes the danger the disciples were in (Lk. 8:23), thus adding to the color and drama of the narrative. In 1 Cor. 15:30 Paul refers to the constant dangers attending his ministry; his argument is that to face these risks is pointless if there is no resurrection. In Acts 19:27 Demetrius and his fellow craftsmen are concerned at the danger posed to their trade by the activity of Paul; in 19:40 the town clerk warns of the perilous consequences of the Ephesians' rioting.

kindynos occurs 9x. In Rom. 8:35 peril is an element that cannot separate believers from Christ's love. In 2 Cor. 11:26 Paul uses the word 8x to describe difficulties that have beset his ministry. The perils include the elements (sea and storm) and hostility from other people (robbers, Jews, and Gentiles). These reflections form part of the apostle's attempt to demonstrate to the Corinthians the authenticity of his ministry.

3074 (kindynos, danger, risk), → 3073.

3080 (klados, branch), → 1285.

3081 κλαίω

κλαίω (klaiō), weep (3081); κλαυθμός (klauthmos), weeping (3088).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. klaiō means intrans. to cry aloud, weep; trans. bewail. The word does not express remorse or sorrow, but physical or mental pain that is outwardly visible.

2. (a) In the LXX klaiō can express profound grief (1 Sam. 1:7; Lam. 1:16 = LXX 1:15) as well as deep sorrow in mourning for the dead (Gen. 50:1). But it may equally express supreme joy, as at the meeting of Jacob and Joseph (46:29). The whole personality is involved, as it is in the case of a crying child (21:16; Exod. 2:6). In the OT the person weeping often expresses dependence on God by addressing cries or complaints to him in prayer (e.g., Samson in Jdg. 15:18; 16:28; cf. Isa. 30:19). A further OT feature is the cultic lamentation of the whole people before Yahweh, usually accompanied by a general fast (Jdg. 20:23, 26).

(b) The noun klauthmos means weeping (e.g., Gen. 45:2; Deut. 34:8; Jdg. 21:2; Job 30:31; Isa. 15:2–3; 30:19).

NT 1. Similar to the OT, klaiō expresses violent emotion, e.g., when parting (Acts 21:13), when thinking of the enemies of Christ (Phil. 3:18), when facing dying and death (Mk. 5:38; Lk. 7:13, 32; Jn. 11:31, 33; Acts 9:39), or generally when face-to-face with affliction (Rom. 12:15; 1 Cor. 7:30). Tears of joy are not mentioned in the NT.

2. The third Beatitude of Lk., "you who weep now" (6:21), is contrasted with the rich who laugh now and of whom all speak well (6:25–26). The latter are self-righteous people "who do not need to repent" (15:7) and who think highly of themselves. Those who "weep now," however, live humbly in complete dependence on God, since they are conscious of their guilt (Matt. 26:75; Lk. 7:38) and therefore acknowledge that God's assessment of them is just. Christ's promise to them is: "You will laugh" (Lk. 6:21). His followers' weeping over their guilt and the sufferings of the present will give way, at the end of time, to the laughter of the children of the kingdom.

3. By contrast, those who laugh now are warned: "You will mourn and weep" (Lk. 6:25). Where klaiō has a future reference in the NT, it is connected with warnings of disaster. Those who now are godless and scornful will be put to shame in the final judgment. To intensify the severity of these statements klaiō is sometimes combined with another vb. of mourning (cf. also Jn. 16:20; Jas. 4:9; Rev. 18:9).

4. To avoid lamentation in the future (when it will be too late), James exhorts his readers to weep now (4:9–10). He is perhaps recalling Jesus' words in Lk. 6:25.

5. The noun klauthmos, weeping, occurs frequently in the NT in the expression "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (e.g., Matt. 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Lk. 13:28). Here the word describes the final remorse that those who have rejected their opportunity to believe in Jesus will experience. In Matt. 2:18 klauthmos is associated with loud lamentation in the quotation from Jer. 31:15, seen as fulfilled in the slaughter of the innocents at Bethlehem.

See also koptō, strike (3164); lypeō, inflict pain (3382); brychō, gnash (1107); pentheō, be sad, grieve, mourn (4291); stenazō, to sigh, groan (5100).

3082 (klasis, breaking), → 3089.

3083 (klasma, broken piece), → 3089.

3088 (klauthmos, weeping), → 3081.

3089 κλάω

κλάω (klaō), break (3089); κλάσις (klasis), breaking (3082); κλάσμα (klasma), broken piece (3083); κατακλάω (kataklaō), break in pieces (2880); ἐκκλάω (ekklaō), break off (1709).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. klaō is a general vb. for to break, break off, break into pieces. It was esp. used for the idea of pruning branches of a tree.

2. Words in this group occur infrequently in the LXX. In Jdg. 9:53 (except A), klaō refers to the breaking of the head of Abimelech, son of Gideon, by a millstone (termed a "klasma of a mill"; cf. also 2 Sam. 11:21, 23) dropped on him. In Jer. 16:7 this vb. is used in the expression of breaking bread. The word klasma refers to a cake (1 Sam. 30:12) or the broken pieces of a grain offering (Lev. 2:6; 6:21). ekklaō is used for the breaking of a bird's wings in preparation for an offering (Lev. 1:17). kataklaō refers to broken branches in a vineyard, symbolic of the Lord's judgment (Ezek. 19:12).

NT 1. In the NT klaō occurs 14x and always in the expression of breaking bread. In the 1st cent., it was the usual pattern to break bread with one's hands at the beginning of a meal rather than to cut it with a knife. Thus Jesus broke the bread before he fed it to the multitudes (Matt. 14:19; 15:36; note also Mk. 6:41; Lk. 9:16, which use kataklaō). Paul similarly broke bread in the presence of the storm-exhausted people on the boat headed to Rome (Acts 27:35).

2. But breaking bread takes on religious significance because of the fact that Jesus broke bread with his disciples in the upper room as he celebrated the Passover with them (Matt. 26:26; Mk. 14:22; Lk. 22:19; 1 Cor. 11:24), telling them to do this in remembrance of him. As the early church developed, breaking bread seems to have become a technical phrase for the Lord's Supper (Acts 2:42 [klasis], 46; 20:7, 11 [klaō]). Breaking and eating bread in a worship setting denoted "participation in the body of Christ" (1 Cor. 10:16). This breaking of bread evoked not only the memory of the Last Supper but also the fact that Jesus broke bread with his followers after he was raised from the dead (Lk. 24:30; cf. the use of klasis in 24:35).

3. The word klasma is used exclusively for the broken pieces of bread that were gathered by the disciples after Jesus' feeding miracles (e.g., Mt. 14:20; 15:37; Jn. 6:12–13).

4. Finally, Paul uses ekklaō in Rom. 11:17, 19, 20 in his discussion of how some branches of the "natural" olive shoot (Jews) have been temporarily "broken off" so that branches from a "wild" olive shoot can be grafted in.

3090 κλείς

κλείς (kleis), a key (3090); κλείω (kleiō), to close, shut (3091).

CL & OT 1. The noun kleis means key; the vb. kleiō, to close or shut. kleis was also used in cl. Gk. in connection with heaven and the underworld: Certain celestial powers or deities had control over the keys to heaven (e.g., Dike) or the underworld (e.g., Persephone). The imagery of the key extended into everyday life, such as rest being cited as the most important key to deliberation or to war.

2. In the LXX kleis occurs only 5x. In OT times a key was probably so large that it had to be carried on a belt or even a shoulder (cf. Isa. 22:22); with such a key one could turn backward and forward the bolt of the door from the outside. One of the offices of the Levites was to administer the keys to the rooms and storerooms of the temple (1 Chr. 9:27). The announcement in Isa. 22:22 of the installation of Eliakim into his office, giving him the power of the keys to the house of David, originally had no messianic reference; it was interpreted as conferring teaching authority. Jn. interpreted it typologically and Christologically in Rev. 3:7 (→ anoigō, 487). kleis also occurs in Jdg. 3:25; Job 31:22; Bel. 12. The vb. kleiō occurs in various OT passages (e.g., Gen. 7:16; Jos. 2:5, 7; Jdg. 9:51; Neh. 6:10; 13:19; Isa. 24:10; 60:11; Ezek. 44:1–2).

NT kleis occurs 6x (4x in Rev.) and is used only fig. kleiō occurs 16x. It is used lit. of closed, shut, or locked doors in Matt. 6:6; 25:10; Lk. 11:7; Jn. 20:19, 26; Acts 5:23; 21:30. In Matt. 25:10 it illustrates that the time of opportunity is past, while in Lk. 11:7 it pictures the importance of persistence in prayer.

1. Lk. 4:25 refers to the time of Elijah, "when the sky was shut for three and a half years" (cf. 1 Ki. 17:1–18:1; Jas. 5:17–18). Jesus' point is that during this time Elijah was sent not to a widow in Israel, but to one in Zarephath. Thus, Jesus of Nazareth will pass over a rebellious Israel in favor of the Gentiles.

2. In Lk. 11:52 Jesus denounces the experts in the law for their hypocrisy and misguided legalism; they have taken away "the key to knowledge" and thus hindered people from entering the kingdom. The parallel saying in Matt. 23:13 refers specifically to the kingdom: "Woe to you, teachers of the law and Pharisees, you hypocrites! You shut the kingdom of heaven in men's faces."

3. Matt.'s account of Peter's confession culminates in the promise: "And I tell you that you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of Hades will not overcome it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven; whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven" (16:18–19). Jesus' choice of twelve disciples, reflecting the twelve tribes of Israel, is closely bound up with his reconstitution of the people of God. The band of disciples anticipates the messianic community that is constituted by Christ's death. Even though he dies, the gates of death will not prevail against his community.

In this passage Christ is seen as the master of the house. He has the keys to that house, the kingdom of heaven. Just as in Isa. 22:22 the Lord gave the key to David's house to Eliakim, so Jesus commits to Peter the keys of his house and thereby sets him up as representative of all the apostles, as its administrator (cf. also Mk. 13:34; Lk. 12:42; 16:1–12; 1 Cor. 4:1; 1 Pet. 4:10). He must lead God's new people into the resurrection kingdom. In this he stands in contrast with the Pharisees, who purportedly had the key to the kingdom but did not use it to enter and even prevented others from entering (cf. above on Matt. 23:13). Peter and the others have a preaching mission to give people access to the kingdom. This role the apostles fulfilled in Acts (for Peter, see esp. Acts 2 [ministry to Jewish believers]; 10 [to Gentile believers]).

The words "bind" (→ deō, 1313) and "loose" (→ lyō, 3395) in Matt. 16:19 may refer to prohibit and permit, i.e., establish rules; but they may also be referring to putting under the ban and acquitting (note the implied connection with entry into the kingdom). The power to teach and to discipline cannot be sharply separated. As the disciples had already shared in the work of Christ in his earthly ministry (cf. Matt. 9:35–10:42; Mk. 6:7–13; Lk. 9:1–6; 10:1–24), so now they are to share in the highest office of the forgiveness of sins (cf. Jn. 20:23). However, the idea of binding may also refer back to the picture of the binding of the strong man (i.e., Satan), who must first be bound before his goods (i.e., those enthralled by him) may be plundered (Matt. 12:29; Mk. 3:27). Thus Peter is perhaps being promised the power to bind Satan and to liberate people; not even death, the power of Hades, can thwart it (see also petra, rock, 4376).

This passage may be linked with Matt. 18:18, where the power to bind and loose is given to all the apostles (in the context of procedure in the church to deal with problems of discipline caused by one member sinning against another). This text confirms that in Matt. 16:16 Peter is being addressed as representative of all the apostles (cf. his confession in 16:16, which is the confession of all). Matt. 16:19 can also be related to Jn. 20:23, where Jesus gives a similar promise to his disciples about forgiving and retaining sins.

4. kleiō is used metaphorically in 1 Jn. 3:17: "If anyone has material possessions and sees his brother in need but has no pity on him [lit., closes his heart against him], how can the love of God be in him?" The phrase used here is unique (but cf. Ps. 77:9).

5. Access to God's kingdom is also the concern of those apocalyptic passages where the key of David is mentioned (Rev. 3:7–8). Jn. interprets Isa. 22:22 messianically: Just as Eliakim received the key to the house of David and was given the authority to decide admission to it, so Christ, the promised descendant of David, holds the perfect key in his hand to decide admission to and exclusion from the future regal city of God. As the crucified and risen Savior, he has the keys to the world of the dead (1:18), so that death has lost its final terror for the believer. Possessing the keys to the abyss (20:1), he is the Lord who governs the spirits of the underworld (20:3).

See also anoigō, open (487).

3091 (kleiō, to close, shut), → 3090.

3095 (kleptēs, thief), → 3334.

3096 (kleptō, steal), → 3334.

3097 (klēma, branch), → 1285.

3099 (klēronomeō, inherit), → 3102.

3100 (klēronomia, inheritance), → 3102.

3101 (klēronomos, inheritor, heir), → 3102.

3102 κλῆρος

κλῆρος (klēros), inheritance, lot (3102); κληρόω (klēroō), cast lots, determine by lot (3103); κληρονομέω (klēronomeō), inherit (3099); κατακληρονομέω (kataklēronomeō), give as inheritance (2883); κληρονομία (klēronomia), inheritance (3100); κληρονόμος (klēronomos), inheritor, heir (3101); προσκληρόω (prosklēroō), allot, assign; pass. join (4677); συγκληρονόμος (synklēronomos), fellow heir (5169).

CL & OT 1. Used from Homer on, klēros meant originally the fragment of stone or piece of wood used as a lot. Lots were also drawn to discover the will of the gods.

Since land was divided by lot, klēros came to mean a share, land received by lot, and finally inheritance. Of the related vbs., klēroō means to draw lots, apportion by lot, and klēronomeō, to be an heir, inherit. klēronomia first meant the activity of dividing by lot, then the portion so divided, the inheritance. A klēronomos is an inheritor; synklēronomos, a fellow heir.

2. Lots (Heb. gôrāl) were also drawn in the OT to discover God's will. The high priest wore the Urim and Thummim in the breastplate of judgment attached to the ephod (Exod. 28:30; Lev. 8:8; Deut. 33:8) for that purpose (Num. 27:21; Ezr. 2:63; Neh. 7:65). Heathen and magical oracles were an abomination to Yahweh and were denied to Israel by divine decree (Deut. 18:9–14). Guidance by lots was permitted only when carried out in obedience to God. But even then God could refuse to give an answer (1 Sam. 14:37; 28:6). God could also reveal himself to the heathen through the casting of lots and other means of divination (Jon. 1:7; Ezek. 21:21).

There are many examples of casting lots in Israel. In Jos. 7:14 and 1 Sam. 14:41 lots discovered the person under the ban. Saul was chosen as king by lot (10:20–21). In Chr. and Neh. lots were cast for priestly office and to choose who was to live in Jerusalem (cf. 1 Chr. 24:5–6; Neh. 11:1). Lots were cast over the goats on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:8) and were used in legal actions (Prov. 18:18). Captives and booty could be divided by lot among the victors (Ps. 22:18; Joel 3:3; Obad. 11; Nah. 3:10). When all is said and done, God controls the lot (Prov. 16:33).

3. Of special significance is the relationship of casting lots and the settlement of the land. Two different concepts intersect in the OT. (a) The land is Yahweh's inheritance (e.g. 1 Sam. 26:19; Ps. 68:9; 79:1; Jer. 2:7; Ezek. 38:16; Joel 1:6), in which he lives and should be worshiped (Exod. 15:17; Jos. 22:19). He brought his people out of Egypt and chose them from among the other peoples (Deut. 32:8–9; 1 Ki. 8:51, 53). Hence, not only the land but also Israel itself is God's heritage or inheritance (e.g., Deut. 9:26–29; 2 Ki. 21:14; Isa. 19:25; 47:6; Jer. 10:16; Mic. 7:18; Joel 2:17–18).

(b) The land is Israel's heritage, promised by God to Abraham and the patriarchs and given to Israel through conquest. Under Joshua, Israel took possession of the land and divided it by lot (e.g. Num. 26:52–56; Jos. 13:6; 21:43–45). The Levites also had their cities apportioned to them by lot (1 Chr. 6:54–81). Since the land is God's, his regulations should control it. Israel is thus called to obey God's commandments in order to live and remain in the land (Deut. 30:15–20; Jos. 22:1–5). This also explains the regulations for the sabbatical year and the Year of Jubilee (Lev. 25), which provided for the restoration of property and slaves, for the land is Yahweh's property and is therefore subject to his claims and regulations.

4. The recurring statement that the priests and Levites "have no share or inheritance among their brothers; the LORD is their inheritance" (Deut. 10:9; cf. 12:12; 18:1–2; Num. 18:20; Jos. 13:14, cf. Ezek. 44:28) calls for special attention. (a) The Levites receive a share in the offerings and gifts of the people. Through their example Israel is to learn that God's people must not seek safety and security through the land but only in the Lord and giver of the land, Yahweh.

(b) The affirmations that God is the strength and portion of the one who prays contain the same thought (Ps. 73:25–26; 142:5; Lam. 3:24). Note Ps. 16:5–6: "LORD, you have assigned me my portion and my cup; you have made my lot secure. The boundary lines have fallen for me in pleasant places; surely I have a delightful inheritance." Such statements of faith go back to the promise to Abraham, to whom God promised not merely descendants and land, but also himself as his "shield ... [and] very great reward" (Gen. 15:1). This promise was fulfilled in the conquest, but was not exhausted by it.

(c) The message of the postexilic prophets links these two groups of statements, showing that God stands by his promises. Even though the people have been exiled, the land and its mountains remain theirs. The Lord will give it anew to his people (Ezek. 36–37), and it will once again be divided by lot (45:1; 47:13–14; 48:29; cf. Isa. 49:8). Aliens also will receive their portion (Ezek. 47:22–23).

5. Later on gôrāl came to be used for the individual's fate in the last day (cf. already Isa. 57:6; Dan. 12:13), more or less in the sense of the heritage of the righteous. The rabbis speak of inheriting the land (cf. Ps. 37:9, 22, 29), the coming age, future reward, the garden of Eden, and also Gehenna. Here we meet the thought of rewards.

6. In the Qumran writings gôrāl denotes the fate predestinated by God (1QS 2:17; 1QM 13:9), signifying either that one belongs to God, the sons of light, the spirits of knowledge, etc., or to Belial, the sons of darkness, and its spirits. Hence this word has the meaning of adherents, party (1QS 2:2, 4–5; 1QH 3:22–25; 1QM 1:1, 5, 11). From this comes almost the meaning class, rank (1QS 1:10; 2:23; CD 13:12). "To cast the lot" often means to determine a person's fate or even to judge (1QS 4:26; 1QH 3:22).

NT 1. (a) klēros is used 6x in the lit. sense of lot, as when the soldiers cast lots for Jesus' garments at the crucifixion (Matt. 27:35; Mk. 15:24; Lk. 23:34; Jn. 19:24). Jn. sees this as a fulfillment of Ps. 22:18, which views such an activity as the ultimate degradation of a human being. But the psalmist also recognizes that God is in control and that he alone can give help (22:19). In Jesus' passion, by extension, God himself is behind the events (cf. Acts 2:23–24; 3:18–23; 4:28).

Acts 1:26 records the decision as to whether Joseph Barsabbas or Matthias should fill Judas's place among the twelve apostles. Both candidates met the necessary qualifications of being a member of the company who had followed Jesus throughout his earthly ministry and of being a witness to Jesus' resurrection (1:21–22). The lots were cast following the prayer: "Lord, you know everyone's heart. Show us which of these two you have chosen to take over this apostolic ministry, which Judas left to go where he belongs" (1:24–25). Matthias was chosen.

(b) In Acts 1:17, Judas is referred to as having been "one of our number and shared [klēros is part of this verbal expression] in this ministry." Here klēros is used in its other main sense—having a part or share in a ministry. In this verse too there is a profound sense of divine overruling (see next sec.).

2. With the meaning share, inheritance, klēros occurs 4x in the NT and klēronomia, 14x; klēronomos, heir, 15x; synklēronomos, fellow heir, 4x; klēronomeō, inherit, 18x. In Lk. 12:13 klēronomia has the basic secular sense of inheritance. kataklēronomeō occurs in Paul's review at Pisidian Antioch of salvation history in his reference to the seven Canaanite nations, whose land God gave Israel as an inheritance (Acts 13:19; cf. Deut. 7:1; Jos. 14:1). prosklēroō occurs only in Acts 17:4 (see below).

(a) The concept of inheritance has soteriological and eschatological dimensions. It is linked with God's historical saving acts. The idea of possession of the promised land passes beyond its first fulfillment in history to its later historical fulfillment in Christ and beyond that to the future final fulfillment at the end of time. The essential thought is that of inheriting the promise to which believers are called. According to various strata of the NT, the object of this inheritance is the kingdom of God (Matt. 25:34; 1 Cor. 6:9; 15:50a; Gal. 5:21; Eph. 5:5; Jas. 2:5).

In the Beatitudes, Jesus puts side by side the promise of the kingdom and that of inheriting the earth (gē [→ 1178] in Matt. 5:5; cf. 5:10). By this he suggests that the promised land of the OT is replaced by the all-embracing concept of the kingdom of God. This kingdom embraces all those promises, the fulfillment of which is yet future. This is confirmed when we look at the other things promised as an inheritance in the NT: eternal life (Matt. 19:29; Lk. 18:18; Tit. 3:7); salvation (Heb. 1:14); the imperishable order (1 Cor. 15:50b); an imperishable inheritance, kept in heaven (1 Pet. 1:4); the blessing (Heb. 12:17; 1 Pet. 3:9); the promises (Heb. 6:12; cf. 10:36); the new heaven and new earth (Rev. 21:7; cf. 21:1). In these statements OT thought is both retained and transformed (Rom. 4:13–15; Heb. 6:17; cf. Acts 7:5; 13:19).

(b) This inheritance, however, is not merely future. It can be recognized already now in faith (Eph. 1:18). According to Heb. 11:7, Noah inherited the righteousness that comes by faith. In Eph. 1:11 we are told that in Christ "we were made heirs" (NIV text note) and in 1:13–14 that we have the guarantee of this inheritance in the Holy Spirit whom we have received. The first Beatitude suggests that the poor in spirit already possess the kingdom of heaven, even though its full realization, like that of the remaining Beatitudes, lies in the future (Matt. 5:3).

(c) The fact that salvation is future and yet present (already/not yet) comes from our being inheritors through Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:11–12) and his death (Heb. 9:15). He who has come and will come again has brought us the inheritance. Indeed, he is the inheritance and the kingdom (cf. the OT statements about the heritage of the Levites and the expressions of faith in Ps.), and through him we are fellow heirs (Rom. 8:17).

The parable of the tenants of the vineyard (Matt. 21:33–41; Mk. 12:1–12; Lk. 20:9–19; cf. Isa. 5:1–7) shows Jesus as the heir and introduces the OT concept of the remnant. Yahweh has chosen Israel as his people—his vineyard and inheritance. He gave them the land, but they were disobedient. Now there was only a remnant. This remnant, repeatedly referred to by the prophets, is ultimately a single individual—Jesus, the Son. But through him the remnant grows into a great multitude of believers who are fellow heirs. Thus the rich young ruler should have become an heir with him of eternal life (Matt. 19:16–30; Mk. 10:17–30; Lk. 18:18–30).

Alongside the witness of the Synoptics is that of Paul, who gives special prominence to the connection between the promise to Abraham and the church as the heir in Christ. In Rom. 4:13 Paul declares that "through the righteousness that comes by faith" the promise to Abraham that he should inherit the world becomes ours. In the faith that we share in Christ we become heirs. If this depended on the law and not on Christ, "faith [would have] no value" (4:14). Those who are Christ's are Abraham's offspring and so his heirs (Gal. 3:29; cf. 4:1, 7; Tit. 3:7).

The author of Heb. stresses that by an oath to Abraham God promised salvation "to the heirs of what was promised" (6:17). They already have the future inheritance, but only in hope (6:18). They inherit it as did Abraham, "through faith and patience" (6:12). The one who has opened the way to this promise is Jesus (6:20); he is the Son and heir (1:2, 4). The stress is different here from Paul, though the essential concept is the same, for the future nature of the heritage and the need to hold fast to the promise are more strongly emphasized. In 11:7, as in Paul, faith is seen as believing and acting on God's Word. It is by this that Noah became an "heir of the righteousness that comes by faith" (cf. Rom. 4:3; Gal. 3:6; Gen. 15:6).

Jas. 2:5 echoes the teaching of the Synoptics. It treats the question of the heirs of the kingdom, even though the relationship to Jesus, through whom we become heirs, is not expressed. "Has not God chosen those who are poor in the eyes of the world to be rich in faith and to inherit the kingdom he promised those who love him?" There is a firm link between election, promise, and inheritance throughout the NT.

(d) Since Jesus is the heir and also the one who has given himself for us, we cannot have this inheritance except in relation to him. This involves practical obedience (Heb. 11:8) and demands patient endurance (6:12). Without it we will not inherit the kingdom of God (Gal. 5:21; 1 Cor. 15:50a). In his parable of the final judgment (Matt. 25:31–46), Jesus shows how this relationship to him and thus inheriting the kingdom involves love in our dealings with others, through whom he comes to us. Jesus' conversation with the rich young ruler also shows that eternal life can be inherited only in the obedience of faith (Matt. 19:29; cf. Mk. 10:29; Lk. 18:29).

Because Jesus has appointed us as his heirs, we are not merely fellow heirs with him (Rom. 8:17) but also fellow heirs with each other (1 Pet. 3:7), which involves our relationships with others (3:9). This obedience in faith is the concomitant of faith that is required to possess the salvation of God and his Son (cf. 1 Jn. 5:12; 2 Jn. 9). Although Col. 3:24 speaks of receiving the "inheritance . . . as a reward," this is not earned but rather a gift of God (cf. Gal. 3:18).

(e) Finally, the NT makes it clear that the inheritance of the promise is not only for God's chosen people Israel. Through Christ the Gentiles have become fellow heirs with them. Paul stresses again and again that in Christ all believers without distinction are children of God and inheritors of the promise (Gal. 3:23–29; cf. 4:30; Rom. 4:13–14). In Eph. 3:6 the Gentiles are fellow heirs in Christ through the gospel. Note in Eph. 1:3–14 the change of "we" (1:11–12) to "you" (1:13) and the stressed "also," suggesting Paul's identification of himself with the Jewish people and the inclusion of Gentile believers alongside Jewish believers in the Ephesian church.

According to Acts 26:15–18, Paul was commissioned by the risen Lord to open the eyes of the Gentiles, that they might turn from darkness to light and receive forgiveness of sins and an inheritance (NIV "place," klēros) "among those who are sanctified by faith" in Christ. In Col. 1:12, Paul affirms that the Gentile church in Colosse has a "share in the inheritance of the saints in the kingdom of light" (cf. Num. 18:20; Deut. 10:9; Ps. 15:5; 56:13; Isa. 2:5; 60:1–3). By contrast, in Acts 8:21 John and Peter deny Simon Magus "part or share in this ministry," i.e., the gospel. The expression is here a formula of excommunication.

In Acts 17:4 prosklēroō simply means that some of the Jews "joined Paul and Silas," along with a large number of Gentiles; yet behind this word is the thought that these Gentiles in Thessalonica have obtained a share in the promised heritage.

See also meros, part, share, portion, lot (3538).

3103 (klēroō, cast lots, determine by lot), → 3102.

3104 (klēsis, call, invitation), → 2813.

3105 (klētos, called, invited), → 2813.

3109 (klinē, mat, bed), → 3111.

3110 (klinidion, mat, bed), → 3111.

3111 κλίνω

κλίνω (klinō), recline, lie down, incline (3111); ἀνακλίνω (anaklinō), recline, sit down (369); ἀνάκειμαι (anakeimai), recline, be seated (367); ἀναπίπτω (anapiptō), recline, sit down (404); κλίνη (klinē), mat, bed (3109); κλινίδιον (klinidion), mat, bed (3110); κράββατος (krabbatos), mat, bed (3187).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. klinō means (act.) to make something slope, turn aside, sit down; (pass.) to lean, rest, lie down (at meals). anaklinō means to lean back or lie down. anapiptō means to fall back or, for soldiers in a battle, to give ground; thus, fig. it could mean to lose heart. anakeimai means to be laid up, set up (as a votive offering), also to depend on; in Hel. Gk. it took on the meaning to lie down, recline. The general practice at meals in the Greco-Roman world was not to sit on chairs but to recline on couches placed around three sides of the table. klinē is a bed or couch on which one lies; klinidion is a diminutive form.

2. klinō occurs frequently in the LXX with a variety of meanings. It can mean to kneel down (Jdg. 7:5), incline (one's heart, 9:3; Ps. 119:36); turn (one's ear, 49:4; 71:2); part (the heavens, 2 Sam. 22:10); plot (evil, Ps. 21:11); fall (46:6); to fade (of daylight, Jer. 6:4). anapiptō occurs in Gen. 49:9, where Jacob refers to Judah as a lion who "crouches" and lies down. One should note that for most of the OT period it was normal to sit at table (1 Sam. 20:5, 18, 25; 1 Ki. 13:20). The custom of reclining appears first in the Persian period (Est. 1:6; 7:8). klinē is the usual word in the OT for bed (e.g., Gen. 48:2; 49:33; Exod. 8:3; Ps. 6:6).

NT 1. In the NT klinō occurs 7x, klinē 9x, klinidion 2x, krabbatos, 11x, anaklinō 6x, anakeimai 14x, and anapiptō 12x. Except for one occurrence of klinō in Heb. 11:34 ("routed") and klinē in Rev. 2:22, all these occurrences are in the Gospels. klinē invariably means one's mat or bed (e.g., Matt. 9:6; Lk. 8:16); it is synonymous with klinidion (Lk. 5:19, 24) and krabbatos (e.g., Mk. 2:4, 9; Jn. 5:8–11). klinō is used in the statement of Jesus that he has nowhere to lay his head (Matt. 8:20; Lk. 9:58). It is also used in an expression that means late in the day, i.e., the time when the sun goes down (9:12; 24:29).

2. anakeimai, anaklinō, and anapiptō all have to do with eating and refer to the custom in the NT of reclining at meals, particularly on more formal or festive occasions; the words for "sit" (→ kathēmai, 2764) are never used in this connection. A "guest" at a meal is lit. "one who reclines" (cf. Matt. 22:10–11; Mk. 6:26). anapiptō and anaklinō are also used in Jesus' feeding miracles, when he orders the people to "sit down" (Matt. 15:35; Mk. 6:39; Jn. 6:10).

3. As in the synagogue, the place assigned is a mark of the guest's importance, the closest to the host being the most prestigious (Lk. 14:7–10; cf. Mk. 12:39). Thus we should understand the significance of the position of "the disciple whom Jesus loved" at the Last Supper, "reclining next to him" (Jn. 13:23, 25; 21:20); this was the position on Jesus' right (the left elbow being used to support the body), the place of a trusted friend, which allowed confidential conversation.

See also kathēmai, sit (2764).

3120 κοιλία

κοιλία (koilia), belly (3120).

CL & OT The basic meaning of koilia is a hollow or cavity. In cl. Gk. it can mean belly, abdomen, bowels, stomach; the abdomen as the site of the sexual organs, the womb. In the LXX it can also metaphorically mean the inner person (→ kardia, 2840).

NT Hence in the NT koilia means belly, stomach (Matt. 12:40; Rev. 10:9–10), the womb (Lk. 1:41–42; 2:21; 11:27; Acts 3:2), and the inner person (only in Jn. 7:38).

In Matt. 15:10–20 and Mk. 7:14–23 evil is said to come out of the heart (kardia) (7:21). That which enters a person from the outside enters the stomach (7:19). Thus, food cannot make someone unclean. Paul also argued against a false evaluation of stomach and food (1 Cor. 6:13). The linking of stomach and food shows that every effort to give food a religious value and make it subject to all kinds of ideologies is theologically improper and therefore to be rejected.

Paul uses koilia metaphorically in Rom. 16:18 and Phil. 3:19 ("their god is their stomach"). He rejects not only gluttonous and sexual excess, but also undue estimation of physical life (→ sarx, 4922).

3121 (koimaō, sleep, fall asleep), → 2761.

3123 (koinos, common, communal), → 3126.

3124 (koinoō, make common or impure, defile, profane), → 3126.

3125 (koinōneō, share, participate in), → 3126.

3126 κοινωνία

κοινωνία (koinōnia), association, fellowship, participation (3126); κοινός (koinos), common, communal (3123); κοινόω (koinoō), make common or impure, defile, profane (3124); κοινωνέω (koinōneō), share, participate in (3125); κοινωνικός (koinōnikos), giving, sharing, liberal (3127); κοινωνός (koinōnos), companion, partner, sharer (3128); συγκοινωνός (synkoinōnos), participant, partner (5171); συγκοινωνέω (synkoinōneō), participate in with someone, share (5170).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. koinos, when applied to things, means common, mutual, public. Hence, to koinon means the community, common property; in the pl., public affairs, the state. When applied to people, koinos means related, a partner, impartial. The corresponding vb. koinoō means to have a share in, unite, communicate, also to profane. koinōneō means to possess together, have a share in; koinōnia means communion, participation, intercourse. As an adj., koinōnos means common; as a noun, companion, partner.

The word koinōnia could denote the unbroken fellowship between the gods and humans. It also denoted the close union and brotherly bond among human beings. It was taken up by the philosophers to denote the ideal to be sought, virtually having the sense of brotherhood. The word koinos could also depict gods from different cultures reigning together. It also testified to an ever-increasing cosmopolitanism.

(b) To people groaning under the oppression of the aristocracy, Hesiod's Works and Days proclaimed the myth of an earlier golden age, characterized by happiness, equality, justice, and brotherliness. The doctrine of common property had a primeval aspect; early Athens was seen as a model. But whereas this looked back to a golden age, the sharing in the early church at Jerusalem is to be understood in the light of its eschatological experience. Moreover, the Stoics declared that friends must share and that possessions are the common property of friends. But they too based their demands on an ideal picture of a golden age, now lost forever in its original, pure form. The NT, by contrast, looks forward. The new age must break into the present, lost world.

2. The OT primeval history of Gen. records the rupture of fellowship with God, followed by the loss of unity among humans. But God's activity in forgiving, saving, and preserving did not cease. Instead, it found new ways (Gen. 8:21–22; 12:3). Abraham—and after him the people of Israel—stood in a saving relationship to Yahweh, the goal of which was to bridge the gulf between God and humankind.

God dealt with the Israelites as a community and fulfilled his promises to it. He gave them the land as an inheritance, which in the last analysis belonged to him (Lev. 25:23). The tribes, families, and esp. individuals were only tenants of the portions allocated to them. They had therefore no right to dispose of them. The judicial murder of Naboth (1 Ki. 21) should be judged in this light. Its background is the clash between the ancient Israelite right to land described above and the Canaanite doctrine of royal right, which Ahab wanted to exercise.

From here a line can be drawn to the attitude of the prophets in general. Just as Elijah denounced the breach of the ancient right, the prophets were opposed to all land speculation (cf. Isa. 5:8) and stood up for the interests of the community. This solidarity of God, the nation, and the land continued into the NT period. Israel could not envisage faith in God without entering the community and receiving the sign of circumcision.

3. The theological motif of broken fellowship with God, the problem of preserving the community according to God's will (cf. Isa. 5:8), and the role of the community in the ultimate, universal picture of salvation (cf. Gen. 12:3; Isa. 49:6) play a large part in the OT. It is therefore all the more striking that the koinōnia word group occurs almost exclusively in the later writings (Eccl., Prov., Wis., 1–4 Macc.), usually to translate words connected with the Heb. root ḥābar (unite, join together). In the OT stress was laid on the covenant and the individual's membership of the people. These were communal ideas. But in contrast to the quasi-egalitarian idea of koinōnia, these ideas stressed the unilateral role of Yahweh as the founder and guarantor of the community and its members. Where the koinōnia word group occurs in the LXX, it is used in a general sense (see Job 34:8; Prov. 21:9; 25:24; Eccl. 9:4).

4. The communal life of the Essenes was based on the idea of the equality of all its members. This is emphatically supported by the evidence of the Dead Sea Scrolls for the Qumran community, where each new member had to renounce and hand over his entire possessions to the estate of the community (1QS 1:11–12). The principal motive for this was not, as in ancient Greece, the ideal of brotherly communal possession, but the idea that possession of money was tainted with sin.

NT 1. The adj. koinos (Mk. 7:2, 5; Acts 10:14) and the vb. koinoō (Mk. 7:18; Acts 10:15; 21:28) mean respectively unclean, impure, and to defile, make impure. Koinos occurs in Mk. 7:2, 5 in the context of Jesus' teaching that it is not dirt or anything external that defiles a person but the thoughts of one's heart (see also Rom. 14:14). The vision to Peter in Acts 10, in which he was commanded to eat unclean creatures (koinos in 10:14, 28; 11:8), symbolized God's acceptance of the Gentiles and their inclusion in the new covenant. Paul was accused of defiling the temple by introducing Gentiles (Acts 21:28), although in fact he had refrained from giving offense in this way.

Koinoō refers to defilement under the old covenant in Heb. 9:13. But Heb. 10:29 speaks of defiling or profaning the blood of the covenant, spurning the Son of God, and thus being worthy of greater punishment than under the old covenant. Rev. 21:27 takes up the concept and applies it in a moral sense, when it declares that "nothing impure will ever enter" the new Jerusalem, "nor will anyone who does what is shameful or deceitful, but only those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life."

2. koinōnia is absent from the Synoptics and Jn. But it occurs 13x in Paul and is a typical Pauline term. The same is true of the vb. koinōneō. Elsewhere, koinōnos (Lk. 5:10; 2 Cor. 8:23; Phlm. 17) means partner, companion, sharer. In most cases, however, it is to be translated as an adj., sharing, participating in, or by a verbal phrase. Koinōnikos occurs only in 1 Tim. 6:18, where it means liberal. Synkoinōnos (participant, partner) and synkoinōneō (participate in with someone, share) occur only in Paul and Rev. 1:9; 18:4.

3. Acts 4:32–37 gives a picture of the communal sharing of goods practiced for a time in the early church. But it presupposed the continuance of private earning and the voluntary character of sacrifice and giving to the needy. There is no hint of either communal production or communal consumption. It was not organized and is not to be seen in economic categories. It rose out of the freedom from earthly care that Jesus preached and from his lofty scorn of goods (Matt. 6:25–34). It is to be seen as the continuance of the common life that Jesus led with his disciples (Lk. 8:1–3; Jn. 12:4–6; 13:29). The idea of equality is lacking.

The extraordinary actions of Barnabas (Acts 4:36–37) and of Ananias and Sapphira (5:1–11) are singled out for mention. But this does not mean that the community of possessions was general. This would not have been possible for the great majority of church members. Mention of the house of Mary (12:12) indicates that private ownership continued (cf. 5:4). Lk.'s general account of the Jerusalem church reflects the attitude of love that was intensified by an acute expectation of the end.

The koinōnia in Acts 2:42 can be taken in an absolute sense as an essential part of the life of worship: "They devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and to the fellowship, to the breaking of bread and to prayer." Here koinōnia should probably be translated "communion" or "liturgical fellowship in worship." This word expresses something new and independent here. It denotes the unanimity and unity brought about by the Spirit. The individual was completely upheld by the community.

The early church doubtless had financial cares. The fishermen and peasants that had migrated from Galilee would find earning a living difficult in the capital city. Moreover, the economic state of Palestine deteriorated through famine and continued unrest. The collections that Paul brought to Jerusalem were a tangible expression of fellowship in the churches. The collection has a religious overtone in 2 Cor. 9:13: "your generosity in sharing [koinōnias] with them and with everyone else." For it arose out of the one gospel that unites Jew and Gentile and belongs to the same spiritual and material giving and taking of which Paul speaks in Rom. 15:26. There was real need in Jerusalem. The poor among the saints at Jerusalem were in the majority. The stream of "spiritual gifts" that flowed from Jerusalem was answered by a counterstream of "earthly gifts."

The example of the early church remained isolated. Copying its example was neither demanded nor acted upon. The integrity of private property was regarded as a matter of course in all the churches. Christianity brought a new outlook, not a new order of society.

4. Close analysis of the word koinōnia shows that Paul never uses it in a secular sense but always in a religious one. It is not to be equated with societas, companionship or community. It is not a parallel to ekklēsia and has nothing to do with the local congregation. (a) For Paul koinōnia refers strictly to the relation of faith to Christ: "fellowship with his Son" (1 Cor. 1:9), "the fellowship of the Holy Spirit" (2 Cor. 13:14), "partnership in the gospel" (Phil. 1:5), "sharing your faith" (Phlm. 6). In each case the obj. is in the gen. The "right hand of fellowship" (Gal. 2:9) given to Paul and Barnabas by James, Peter, and John was not just a handshake over a deal but mutual recognition of being in Christ.

Similarly, koinōnia in 1 Cor. 10:16 means "participation" in the body and blood of Christ and thus union with the exalted Christ. This fellowship with Christ comes about through the creative intervention of God. It is a result of our birth into a new existence, which is not a divinization in the sense of the mystery religions, but incorporation into Jesus' death, burial, resurrection, and glory. It denotes a new relationship based on the forgiveness of sins. Paul conveyed this in new expressions he coined and mixed metaphors using syn ("with") compounds, such as to "live with [Christ]" (Rom. 6:8); to "share in his sufferings" (8:17); to be "crucified with him" (6:6); to be "raised with him" (Col. 2:12; 3:1); to be "made ... alive with Christ" (2:13; cf. Eph. 2:5); to "share in his glory" (Rom. 8:17); to be "co-heirs with Christ" (8:17); and to "reign with him" (2 Tim. 2:12).

(b) Apart from Matt. 23:30, where the Pharisees reject the charge that they had a share in the blood of the prophets, and those passages where it means partner or companion, koinōnos belongs to this area of Pauline usage. To eat meat that has been sacrificed to idols means to be a sharer in pagan sacrifice and to fellowship with demons, which excludes one from fellowship in the Lord's Supper and fellowship with Christ (1 Cor. 10:18). Conversely, 2 Cor. 1:7 and 1 Pet. 5:1 refer to the sharing by the apostle and the church in the suffering and glory of the risen Lord. Anyone who suffers oppression and persecution through following Christ may rest assured that he or she will, like the Lord, attain life through temptation and death. In the same connection, Heb. 10:33 speaks of being partners with those who are ill-treated and exhorts its readers to patience.

According to 2 Pet. 1:4, believers "participate in the divine nature," "through our knowledge of him who called us by his own glory and goodness" (1:3), and through patient endurance. Thus, we already have a share in a divine nature that is superior to all mundane existence. The same applies to passages where synkoinōneō and synkoinōnos occur. Participation in evil is rejected (Eph. 5:11; Rev. 18:4). But one can participate in suffering (Phil. 4:14) and the gospel and its hope (1 Cor. 9:23; Phil. 1:7). According to Rom. 11:17, believing Gentiles, who are like branches grafted into the olive tree of Israel, now share in its election and promises.

5. koinōnia in 1 Jn. 1:3, 6–7 does not refer to a mystical fusion with Christ and God, but to fellowship in faith. Its basis is in the apostolic preaching of the historical Jesus, in walking in the light, and in the blood of Jesus, which cleanses from all sin. It thus excludes the sectarian pride that denies the incarnation and misrepresents the character of sin.

See also echō, to have (2400).

3127 (koinōnikos, giving, sharing, liberal), → 3126.

3128 (koinōnos, companion, partner, sharer), → 3126.

3130 κοίτη

κοίτη (koitē), bed, marriage bed, intercourse (3130).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. koitē connotes the marriage bed. It was used also of the den of an animal or the nest of a bird.

2. (a) In the LXX, koitē has a variety of meanings. It often translates the Heb. verb that means to lie down and can represent the bed as the place of sleep or rest (e.g., 2 Sam. 11:13; 1 Ki. 1:47; Mic. 2:1). It can mean the marriage bed (cf. Gen. 49:4), but it does not necessarily have sexual connotations (cf. Exod. 10:23; Isa. 56:10; Dan. 2:28–29 [Theod.]; 7:1), for it can mean the home of an animal, such as the sheepfold (Isa. 17:2), the den of a snake (11:8), a pasture (Mic. 2:12), and a lair (Job 37:8; Jer. 10:22). In Exod. 21:18 koitē means a sick bed (cf. also Job 33:19; Ps. 41:3).

In keeping with the notion of the act or place of lying, koitē can also refer to the laying of seed in a woman—a technical term for emission of semen (cf. Lev. 15:18; 19:20; Num. 5:13). In Lev. 15:16–17, however, the word denotes the emission of semen apart from coitus.

koitē also occurs in a number of instances where it is associated with sexual implications deriving from Levitical regulations relating to various forms of sexual impurity (Lev. 15:21, 23, 24, 26). In Prov. 7:17 the word is used of the prostitute's bed, thus connoting in an implicit sense sexual intercourse. It is used similarly in Isa. 57:7, where the prophet berates the people for setting their beds on the mountains. The reference there is to idolatry and hence is used also here in the sense of spiritual fornication. Similarly, in Wis. 3:13 koitē describes a sinful union; in 3:16 it is a reference to the offspring of unlawful coitus.

NT In the NT koitē occurs 4x. In Lk. 11:7 it means the bed as a place of rest. A man in Jesus' parable protests that he is unable to help someone who needs bread since he is already "in bed."

In Rom. 9:10 the word occurs in the expression that means coitus and, by expansion, conception and pregnancy. The theological point of the passage is that Rebekah conceived children by "one and the same father [koitē], our father Isaac." Yet before either of these male twins had done anything good or bad, God in his divine sovereignty had decreed that "the older will serve the younger" (9:12; cf. Gen. 25:23). The argument forms an important part of Paul's case demonstrating to Jewish readers the consistency of divine sovereignty in the inclusion of the Gentiles in the people of God.

In Rom. 13:13 koitē is used in the pl. in a list of sins, including orgies and debauchery; it denotes illicit sexual union. Believers are warned to avoid these sins, together with dissension and jealousy; instead, they are "to clothe [themselves] with the Lord Jesus Christ, and ... not think about how to gratify the desires of the sinful nature" (13:14).

In Heb. 13:4 the word occurs in the sense of "marriage bed," as it does in the OT. The writer affirms that the marriage relationship should be kept honorable.

See also gameō, marry (1138); moicheuō, commit adultery (3658); nymphē, bride (3811); hyperakmos, past the peak, begin to fade; be overpassionate (5644).

3134 (kolazō, punish), → 3136.

3136 κόλασις

κόλασις (kolasis), punishment (3136); κολάζω (kolazō), punish (3134).

CL & OT 1. kolazō and kolasis were fixed terms in Gk. sacral jurisprudence. In inscriptions there are references to the gods punishing violations of cultic laws. Plato suggested that those who punish aright do good and that punishment is a blessing since it frees one from a false frame of soul.

2. In the LXX, the two words occur chiefly in the Apocr. kolazō is found in such passages as 1 Esd. 8:24; Wis. 3:4; Sir. 23:21; 1 Macc. 7:7; 2 Macc. 6:14; 3 Macc. 3:26; kolasis occurs in such passages as Ezek. 14:3–4, 7; 43:11; Wis. 11:13; 2 Macc. 4:38.

3. Philo distinguished between the beneficent power of God with which he made the world and the judicial power by which he rules what is created. God's mercy is older than punishment, and God prefers to forgive rather than to punish. Both Josephus and Philo speak of kolasis as divine retribution.

NT 1. kolazō and kolasis each occur 2x in the NT. The vb. is found in Acts 4:21 of the Jewish leaders' treatment of Peter and John, when they "could not decide how to punish them." It is used of divine chastisement in 2 Pet. 2:9: "Then the Lord knows how to rescue godly men from trials and to hold the unrighteous for the day of judgment, while continuing their punishment."

2. (a) The noun occurs in 1 Jn. 4:18: "Perfect love drives out fear, because fear has to do with punishment." That is, continued existence in fear is a sign of an inadequate relationship with God, which is meant to exist on the plane of love. Moreover, those who live in fear before God are already punished by this fear. The love in question involves both God's love for us and ours for him and for fellow believers. When people live on that level, they have "confidence on the day of judgment" (4:17).

(b) Matt. 25:46 raises the question of eternal punishment. At the end of the parable of the sheep and the goats, the Lord separates the blessed, who have manifested their righteousness in practical love, from those who have failed to do so. The latter are cursed and sent away from the presence of God into "eternal punishment," while the righteous receive eternal life (see also references to eternal judgment in 2 Thess. 1:9 and Heb. 6:2). Eternal punishment, like the idea of eternal fire, does not necessarily imply that those concerned go on being judged or continue to be consumed. If the metaphor of fire is to be pressed, it simply implies that the fire of righteousness continues to burn, but that what is consumed once is consumed for good. For more on the nature of "eternal" (aiōnios) in this phrase, → aiōn, 172.

See also dikē, justice, punishment, vengeance (1472).

3139 (kolaphizō, beat), → 3463.

3140 κολλάω

κολλάω (kollaō), join, cleave to, stick to (3140); προσκολλάω (proskollaō), cleave to, stick to (4681).

CL & OT 1. kollaō is a vb. related to kolla, glue, and means to glue in contrast to nailing, to join together tightly. It can be used of gluing a broken pot or gluing inlay work of gold and ivory, also of closing a wound. The compound proskollaō means to stick to.

2. (a) The LXX uses both words to mean cling, cleave to. In Job 29:10; Ps. 22:15; 137:6; Lam. 4:4, for example, the tongue cleaves to the gums for thirst. Similarly leprosy, pestilence, or diseases cleave to a person (Deut. 28:21, 60; 2 Ki. 5:27).

(b) It frequently means to join someone, to cleave to someone (e.g., Ruth. 2:8, 21; 2 Sam. 20:2; Job 41:9, 15 = LXX 41:8, 14; Ps. 101:3; 119:31; 1 Macc. 3:2; 6:21).

(c) proskollaō is used of the permanent relationship of man and woman (Gen. 2:24), who cleave to each other. As is shown by 1 Esd. 4:20, kollaō refers to more than the sexual union of man and wife, extending to the whole relationship. Because Solomon "held fast" (kollaō) to foreign wives (1 Ki. 11:2), he came under their religious influence. "The man who consorts with prostitutes" (Sir. 19:2) comes under an influence inconsistent with wisdom.

(d) The contrast is union with God. "Fear the LORD your God and serve him. Hold fast to him" (Deut. 10:20; cf. 6:13; 2 Ki. 18:6; Jer. 13:11; Sir. 2:3). The stress here is on inner union with God in contrast to the cultic and legal one of the context.

NT 1. The basic meaning of kollaō is found in Lk. 10:11, "the dust ... that sticks to our feet"; cf. also Rev. 18:5 ("her sins are piled up to heaven" [cf. Jer. 51:9]).

2. The most common NT usage is to join someone or a group. The prodigal son joined himself to foreign citizens (Lk. 15:15); Philip joined the chariot of the Ethiopian (Acts 8:29); Paul tried to join the church (9:26); some who had joined Paul came to faith (17:34); though the people of Jerusalem held the Christians in high honor, no non-Christian ventured to join them (5:13); it was reprehensible for a Jew to "associate with" heathens (10:28), because they did not have the law.

3. Mk. 10:7 and Eph. 5:31 both quote Gen. 2:24 (with its proskollaō; cf. Matt. 19:5, which uses kollaō). (a) In Mk. 10:7–8, marriage is indissoluble, because in it two persons become one living being. This refers to the total relationship of the partners and not merely the sexual union.

(b) According to Eph. 5:31, Christ left his Father to be joined to his bride, the ekklēsia, and to become one flesh with her. As in Ezek. 16, the husband here comes as sōtēr, Savior (Eph. 5:23). His wife—the new people of God—is decked with imperishable riches (5:26–27; cf. Ezek. 16:10–13). This marriage relationship of Christ and the church is a "profound mystery" (Eph. 5:32).

4. The believer's union with God necessitates that one must detest evil and "cling to what is good" (Rom. 12:9). Since with one's body a person is a member of the body of Christ, a man cannot become one body, a human unity, with a prostitute. For "he who unites himself with the Lord is one with him in spirit" (1 Cor. 6:17). He should live in this Spirit and perfectly imitate the actions and revelation of his Lord. But if he unites himself with a prostitute, he will become like her (6:16). Having sexual relations with a prostitute means a common existence with her. The spirit of the brothel and the Spirit of Christ mutually exclude one another.

3141 κολλούριον

κολλούριον (kollourion), eye salve (3141).

CL Eye wash or salve was common in ancient times. It was used for various purposes, but esp. for applying to the eyes.

NT The sole use of kollourion in the NT is Rev. 3:18. Since the context is the letter to the church at Laodicea, it is assumed that the writer had in mind a preparation made from powdered Phrygian stone used at the medical school there. Its significance must be understood together with that of the gold, which calls to mind the prosperity of the city of Laodicea, and the white clothing, which contrasts with the famous black wool of that area. The three items represent a spiritual value that the church failed to realize was missing (3:17). Apparently this was a worldly and prosperous church whose members mistook both the nature and source of true well-being.

See also horaō, see (3972); blepō, look at, see (1063); atenizō, look at a person or thing intently, gaze on (867); theatron, theater, place of assembly, a spectacle (2519).

3154 (koniaō, whitewash), → 3328.

3157 (kopetos, mourning, lamentation), → 3164.

3159 (kopiaō, become weary, tired, work hard, toil), → 3160.

3160 κόπος

κόπος (kopos), trouble, difficulty, work, labor, toil (3160); κοπιάω (kopiaō), become weary, tired, work hard, toil (3159); πόνος (ponos), hard labor, toil, pain, distress, affliction (4506); μόχθος (mochthos), labor, exertion, hardship (3677).

CL & OT 1. kopos means a striking, beating. It then came to denote the physical consequences of a stroke, weariness, depression. Thus, everything that leads to toil, pain, and hardship can be called kopos. The same applies to the vb. kopiaō; it denotes not only the activity of exertion and toil and the process of becoming tired, but also the consequent fatigue and exhaustion. ponos is a virtual synonym for kopos and means work and toil.

2. In the LXX kopos means labor (Ps. 73:5), adversity (Jdg. 10:16), or trouble (Ps. 10:7, 14; 94:20). kopiaō means grow weary (Isa. 40:28, 30), be weary of (43:22), labor (Job 20:18; Isa. 49:4). The ideas give expression to the sober reality of pessimism and resignation: "What does man gain from all his labor (mochthos) at which he toils under the sun?" (Eccl. 1:3; cf. 2:18). Even the servant of the Lord laments his toil: "I have labored to no purpose; I have spent my strength in vain and for nothing" (Isa. 49:4).

Against this background the growth of eschatological hope is understandable. Humankind will not toil in vain (Isa. 33:24; 65:23) forever. Those weary (kopiaō) people returning from exile will receive renewed strength (40:29–31).

NT 1. In the NT ponos occurs 4x; mochthos, 3x (all in Paul). The kopos word group occurs 41x. kopiaō is used in the general sense of labor or toil in everyday work (Matt. 6:28; Lk. 5:5; Rom. 16:6; cf. kopos in 1 Cor. 3:8). Jn. 4:38 and 2 Tim. 2:6 refer to working in the fields and harvesting—a picture of work in the kingdom of God. Work (kopos) in Rev. 2:2 and 14:13 refers to our work here as having eternal significance.

2. The kopos word group also denotes weariness. Jn. 4:6 speaks of weariness because of a journey. The church at Ephesus is praised for having borne much persecution without having become weary (Rev. 2:3). In Matt. 11:28 Jesus offers those who are exhausted by the claims of the law an enduring rest from their toil.

3. Paul uses kopos and kopiaō to describe his own manual labor (1 Cor. 4:12; 1 Thess. 2:9), which he performed in order to make himself financially independent. He also designates his missionary activity as a heavy burden (2 Cor. 6:5; 11:23, 27), which he sometimes feared might prove fruitless (Gal. 4:11). On the other hand, it involved the joy of encouragement (1 Cor. 15:10; Phil. 2:16). The goal of his labor was to present every person complete in Christ before God (Col. 1:29; cf. 1 Tim. 4:10).

Other missionaries labored together with Paul (Rom. 16:12; 1 Cor. 16:16; 1 Thess. 5:12) in "preaching and teaching" (1 Tim. 5:17) with the same goal and methods. It was a labor of love (1 Thess. 1:3).

See also baros, weight, burden (983).

3164 κόπτω

κόπτω (koptō), act., strike; mid., beat the breast (3164); κοπετός (kopetos), mourning, lamentation (3157).

CL & OT 1. koptō basically means to strike and was used for striking the breast in a time of sorrow. The derivative kopetos means lamentation for the dead. There is widespread evidence in antiquity for public mourning and lamentation for the dead. Smiting the breast and cheeks, loud wailing, and dirge singing were originally intended to drive away the spirits of the dead or to honor the dead. Various mourning customs, some of them violent, extend into the Hel. period. These customs became increasingly a general expression of grief at death.

2. The OT reflects numerous parallels to the burial customs of the surrounding world. koptō is used for lamentation in, e.g., Gen. 23:2; 1 Sam. 25:1; 28:3; Jer. 16:5–6. The Israelites had a variety of customs associated with mourning for the dead (Gen. 23:1–2; 37:34–35; 2 Sam. 3:31–34): cutting oneself, shaving off one's hair, eating mourning bread, drinking from the cup of consolation (Jer. 16:5–7), calling in mourning women (9:16–21), putting on sackcloth (Isa. 15:3), removing one's beard (7:20), beating one's breast (Nah. 2:7; cf. Jer. 31:19). The most prominent and abiding feature of mourning was wailing (Isa. 15:2; Jer. 22:18; 34:5; Amos 5:16) and the funeral dirge (2 Sam. 1:17–27; 3:33–34).

3. Mourning for the dead held a special place in the preaching of the prophets. While Lam. bewails and interprets the divine judgment that has already befallen Judah and Jerusalem, the prophets announce—often in the form of a lament for the dead—a catastrophe that lies in the future (Jer. 9:10; Ezek. 32:1–16; Amos 5:1–2, 16–17; Mic. 1:8). By doing this they aim to arouse the people and call them to repentance (Jer. 9:18; Ezek. 19; 27:30–34). It is characteristic of Israel's faith that again and again, even as the message of destruction rings in their ears, it changes into hope in God, who will deliver them and turn "wailing into dancing" (Ps. 30:11).

4. In Jud., heathen mourning practices were forbidden (Lev. 19:28; Deut. 14:1), but it was customary before or at a burial to wail and lament for the dead, to beat the breast, and so to fulfill one's loving obligations toward the deceased. In the Hel. period, attempts were made by the state to check the extravagances that had crept into mourning customs, though they met with little success. A marked feature of this period was the funeral song, used by men and women, relatives, and professional mourners.

NT 1. In the Synoptics koptō occurs 4x in the mid. to mean "mourn" (Matt. 11:17; 24:30; Lk. 8:52; 23:27) and 2x in Rev. (1:7; 18:9). kopetos is used only in Acts 8:2. Jewish mourning customs in the time of Jesus are suggested by Jesus' parable of the children lamenting the dead when playing funeral (Matt. 11:17; cf. Lk. 7:32). The story of Jairus's daughter (Matt. 9:23; Mk. 5:38; Lk. 8:52) shows that immediately after a person's death, a lamentation was begun by a great crowd of relatives, neighbors, and mourning women. After the death of Lazarus (Jn. 11:17, 30) and four days after the burial, a great crowd of neighbors and acquaintances from Jerusalem gathered in Bethany, weeping (11:33) and consoling Mary and Martha (11:19, 31). Mourning women followed Jesus on the way to Golgotha (Lk. 23:27), and in the early church "godly men" came together after Stephen's death and "mourned deeply" over him (Acts 8:2).

2. Why did Jesus weep on the way to the grave of Lazarus (Jn. 11:35)? His tears express his compassion for people, subject as they are to death and all its woe. But he also weeps because of the faithless and hopeless lamentation for the dead with which he finds himself surrounded. He has come to take on himself human suffering and distress and become the conqueror of death. His saving, life-giving work puts an end to such lamentation (Lk. 7:13). His cross and resurrection manifest his victory over death. In our natural grief after the death of a loved one we are sustained by the hope of the resurrection of the dead.

3. Thus the characteristic of the Christian church is not lamentation for the dead, but the hope of life in Christ Jesus (Rom. 6:23). Since God's gift in Jesus is eternal life, lamentation for the dead belongs to those who are far from God, who are under the sentence of death, and who have no hope. Believers, by contrast, can look forward to the time when "there will be no more death or mourning or crying or pain, for the old order of things has passed away" (Rev. 21:4). By faith in the conqueror of death we enter into the truth of Christ's promise: "Your grief will turn to joy" (Jn. 16:20).

See also klaiō, weep (3081); lypeō, inflict pain (3382); brychō, gnash (1107); pentheō, be sad, grieve, mourn (4291); stenazō, to sigh, groan (5100).

3167 κορβᾶν

κορβᾶν (korban), corban, gift (3167); κορβανᾶς (korbanas), temple treasury (3168).

OT The Gk. word korban is transliterated from the Heb. noun qorbān and denotes a gift consecrated to God (Lev. 1:2; 22:27; 23:14; Num. 7:25; Ezek. 20:28; 40:43). The offerings mentioned include both sacrifices and gifts.

Later the word was used in a more technical sense. Josephus mentions those who "dedicate themselves to God, as a corban, which denotes what the Greeks call a gift" (Ant. 4.73). Release from the vow could be obtained by payment of an appropriate sum. Rab. practice was formulated in the Mishnah in the tractate Nedarim. The rabbis were divided over the extent to which a gift vowed as corban (also later termed kōnām) was binding. The school of Shammai apparently held that duty to one's parents constituted grounds for release from a gift vowed to God (m. Ned. 9:1). The school of Hillel took the more rigorist view: "If anyone expressly lays such a corban on his relatives, then they are bound by it and cannot receive anything from him that is covered by the corban" (m. Ned. 3:2). The context of these pronouncements shows that the question was not so much the handing over of certain things to God but their withdrawal from use by specified persons.

NT The rigorist position that permitted a man to neglect the care of parents on the grounds that the gift is dedicated to God as corban was denounced by Jesus in Mk. 7:11 (the par. in Matt. 15:5 uses dōron, gift, present; → 1565). This act is condemned as an act of hypocrisy in the words of Isa. 29:13 (cf. Matt. 15:7–9; Mk. 7:6–7). Jesus characterizes the Pharisees' teaching on this point as "tradition" that nullifies the "word of God" (7:13). They had allowed obligation to something that was relatively trivial to take precedence over a fundamental, humanitarian command (in this case the fifth commandment, Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16).

korbanas (Matt. 27:6) denotes the temple treasury in which everything offered as korban (or the price of its redemption) was collected. The chief priests declined to put into it Judas's thirty pieces of silver on the grounds that they were "blood money."

See also arrabōn, down payment, pledge, earnest (775); dōron, gift, present (1565).

3168 (korbanas, temple treasury), → 3167.

3175 (kosmeō, arrange, put in order, adorn), → 3180.

3176 (kosmikos, earthly, worldly), → 3180.

3177 (kosmios, respectable, honorable), → 3180.

3179 (kosmokratōr, ruler of the world), → 3197.

3180 κόσμος

κόσμος (kosmos), adornment, world (3180); κοσμέω (kosmeō), arrange, put in order, adorn (3175); κόσμιος (kosmios), respectable, honorable (3177); κοσμικός (kosmikos), earthly, worldly (3176).

CL 1. The noun kosmos denoted originally building and construction, but more esp. order, both generally and specifically (e.g., battle array, the regulation of life in human society, the constitution). It could also mean ornament and adornment (esp. of women). In Gk. philosophy kosmos came to be the basic term for the world order, the world system, the cosmos, the universe, and also the inhabitants of the earth, humanity.

The vb. kosmeō was used as a technical term, e.g., to marshal an army, to arrange battle formation, and also generally to organize, put in order, and frequently to adorn.

2. The concept of cosmos in Gk. philosophy may be seen against the background of the question: How is it possible that, with all the individual things conflicting with one another (heaven and earth; God, humans, and living beings), the world is not destroyed? The basic answer is that these are held together by an all-embracing order, designated by the word kosmos.

(a) Plato was the first to teach that the origin of the cosmos was due to a Demiurge (→ dēmiourgos, 1321), who fashioned the world according to the idea of the perfect living being. For him the cosmos is an animated body, a rational being, and thus a manifestation of God. The cosmos is not creature and not creation, but a copy.

(b) Aristotle conceived of the world as a spherical earth, surrounded by various heavenly spheres, which rests unmoved in the center of a spherical cosmos. The cosmos is the sum total of everything linked to space and time. Beyond that is the transcendent world of God, which leads an unchangeable and thus perfect life. God has not fashioned the world. He moves everything, but he himself remains unmoved and does not intervene in world events.

(c) To the Stoics, the cosmos does not owe its origin to a new beginning but is the restoration of that which once was. The disappearance of the cosmos in a universal conflagration is not its end; it arises anew in a cosmic rebirth.

(d) In Neo-Platonism the dualism that one finds in Plato reaches its climax. The intelligible world and the world of appearances are mutually opposed. Although the empirical world is the beginning of evil, Plotinus can boast of its size, order, and beauty; how much more praiseworthy, then, must be the true cosmos, the archetype of this world.

Gnosticism had conflicting statements about the cosmos. On the one hand, the separation between God and world had become absolute. The cosmos was a creation of demonic powers from the chaos of darkness; it had been rid of every element of divinity. It is purely material and fleshly, a fullness (→ plērōma, 4445) of evil. It is therefore a prison from which the preexistent human soul longs for liberation, for which the heavenly figure of light, the Son of God, gives him help. On the other hand, the kosmos is also considered a mythological figure and is designated inter alia "Son of God."

OT 1. In the LXX kosmos can mean ornaments and decoration, but also the hosts of heaven (and earth), the stars (cf. Gen. 2:1; Deut. 4:19). The meaning "world" for kosmos occurs only in the Apocr. It probably adopted this meaning under the influence of Hel. Jud. (see below).

2. The OT has no word corresponding to the Gk. kosmos. It calls the universe "heaven and earth," later "all things" or "the all" (e.g., Ps. 103:19; Jer. 10:16). The OT also lacks the Gk. concept of the cosmos. It never regards the world and its elements as an independent entity in itself, but always in its relation to God, the Creator (→ ktisis, creation, creature, 3232); they are only instruments of God. It is true that the account of creation in Gen. 1:1–2:4a is interested in cosmology, in that it speaks of the deep and the waters, the firmament, the heavenly ocean, and the stars. But its statements have the sole intention of witnessing to God as the Lord over everything, including chaos. The primary objective of Gen. 1 is clearly the creation of humans.

Humanity's vocation is to recognize its task in the world as accountable to God and to exercise rulership over the creation (Gen. 1:26, 28; 2:15, 19; cf. Ps. 8). Gen. 1 expresses God's lordship over the nations of the world and their history. When it states that "all that he had made . . . was very good" (1:31), it is not the world as such that is being praised but God, who made it and established his dominion over it for the salvation of the human race (cf. Ps. 33; 65; 136; 148; Amos 4:13; 5:8; 9:5–6).

3. The OT draws on contemporary oriental ideas, which it uses in its own particular way as the framework for its own proclamation. The world is thus represented as tripartite. (a) The "expanse" (RSV "firmament"; NRSV "dome") of heaven divides the waters above from the waters below (Gen. 1:6–20). This vault rests on "pillars" (Job 26:11; cf. Ps. 104:3), and the stars are set in it as luminaries (Gen. 1:14–17).

(b) The earth is sometimes pictured as a disc, whose middle point is the central sanctuary (Jdg. 9:37; Ezek. 38:12). It too rests on pillars (Job 9:6; cf. Ps. 104:5) or is suspended over nothing (Job 26:7). The waters above it and below it are restrained by God's providential care (Gen. 1:7; 7:11; 49:25; Exod. 20:4; Deut. 33:13).

(c) The underworld (Heb. šᵉʾôl; Gk. hadēs, 87) is the kingdom of the dead, from which there is no return (Job 10:21). In complete contrast with contemporary religions, the OT does not engage in speculative embellishment about the underworld.

4. Philo uses the word kosmos with strikingly greater frequency than the OT, but in statements that conflict with one another. He distinguishes between the kosmos that can only be apprehended by the mind and the kosmos that is apprehended by the senses (the "visible world"). Yet at the same time he can insist that there is only one cosmos. Philo also speaks of the cosmos as a living and animate being. Starting from the picture of God as the Father of the cosmos, he can even call it "son of God."

5. In Hel. Jud. kosmos acquired the spatial meaning of world, universe, world of humanity. Together with the Jewish apocalyptic doctrine of the two ages (→ aiōn, 172), this concept conditioned Jewish views of the world. "This world," like "this age," is under the domination of Satan, sin, and death. Such thinking led to a moral depreciation of the existing cosmos. But since Jud. never lost its belief in creation, it did not adopt a gnostic dualistic worldview.

NT 1. (a) In the NT, as in secular Gk. and Hel. Jud., the noun kosmos denotes the world. The sole exception is 1 Pet. 3:3, where it means adornment. It occurs 186x in the NT (78x in Jn., 24x in the Johannine letters, 47x in Paul, 15x in the Synoptics, and 22x in the rest of the NT). This frequent usage indicates both its theological importance and its point of confrontation. The concept of kosmos demands clarification when the gospel comes into contact with Gk. thought.

(b) The adjs. are rare, found only in the later NT writings: kosmios, honorable, virtuous (1 Tim. 2:9; 3:2); kosmikos, earthly, worldly (Tit. 2:12; Heb. 9:1). The vb. kosmeō, put in order, decorate, adorn, occurs 10x (e.g., Matt. 12:44; 25:7; Tit. 2:10).

2. The use of the noun kosmos in the inclusive sense of "world" exhibits three nuances. (a) It can denote the universe (e.g., Acts 17:24) or the world as the sum total of created things (cf. Jn. 1:3). (b) It can also mean the world as the sphere or place of human life, the earth, the oikoumenē (→ 3876). This usage takes precedence in the Synoptics (e.g., Matt. 4:8, "all the kingdoms of the world"; Mk. 8:36, "to gain the whole world"). The phrases to come "into the world" (e.g., Jn. 1:9), to be "in the world" (e.g., 1:10), and "to leave this world" (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:10) can also be understood in this sense. (c) Finally, kosmos can stand for humanity (cf. Jn. 3:19; 2 Cor. 5:19), where, especially in Paul and John, it designates the place and object of God's saving activity.

3. As early as Paul, the term kosmos is given a typically anthropological and historical stamp. (a) The course of the world is determined by humanity, through whose fall death "entered the world" and rules over it (Rom. 5:12–14). "The whole world" (i.e., human world) has become guilty before God (3:19). Even the created world (8:20–22, using ktisis) has been subjected to transience and longs for liberation. The kosmos is thus also the whole creation subject to futility.

This understanding of the world primarily finds verbal expression in Paul's references to "this world" as analogous to "this age" (e.g., 1 Cor. 3:19; Eph. 2:2; → aiōn, 172). God passes judgment on the kosmos (Rom. 3:6), which belongs to the present age. The degree to which kosmos denotes the present world threatened by futility can also be seen in that the future redeemed world is never called kosmos in the NT, but the "kingdom of God" or "a new heaven and a new earth." There is no phrase such as "the coming world." God and kosmos are strictly disparate.

(b) But it is into this world as it is, a world that has fallen into the power of sin and destruction, that God has sent his Son in order to reconcile it to himself (2 Cor. 5:19–21). And in this cosmos, whose form is passing away (1 Cor. 7:31), the Christian church lives as a sign of Christ's presence. Believers must neither unconditionally surrender to nor deny the world. Because they live in the kosmos (5:10; Phil. 2:15), they must deal with it. But they must do so as if they had no dealings with it (1 Cor. 7:29–31). Moreover, the church can be assured that the world and everything in it belongs to them, yet they themselves belong not to the world but to Christ (1 Cor. 3:21–23). The world has thus become the field for obedience and maintenance of faith. Christians are free from the world and its regulations (7:20–24; cf. Matt. 17:24–27).

(c) Col. shows how early Christianity had to come to grips with confronting the kosmos. The principalities and powers have been defeated by Christ (2:15). Therefore the elements of the cosmos (2:8, 20a) cannot be the object of ritual celebration or veneration. Christians who through Christ have died to the elements of the world no longer live "in the kosmos" (2:20b), but have been completely freed from subjection to its precepts and constraints.

4. In Jn. kosmos almost always denotes the world of humans, esp. the world of sinful humanity that opposes God, resists the redeeming work of the Son, does not believe in him, and indeed hates him (Jn. 7:7). Out of love for this world (a completely un-Gk. thought!) God sent his Son (3:16), not to judge but to save the world (3:17; 12:47). As "the Lamb of God" he bears the sins of the world (1:29; cf. 1 Jn. 2:2). But the Son, who has come into the world to bring salvation, at the same time becomes its judgment (Jn. 3:19), since it does not know him and is blind to him (1:10).

The kosmos is ruled by its prince (Jn. 12:31; 16:11), the evil one (1 Jn. 5:19). Still, the Son remains the victor over the world (Jn. 16:33). This does not lead to the world's extinction but to its redemption, creating those who are not born "of the world" (15:19; 17:14, 16) but of God (1:12–13) and the Holy Spirit (3:5). These people endure much anguish in the world but are removed from its domination (16:33).

Even though believers are no longer conditioned by the world and its values, they are not taken out of the world (Jn. 17:15); they remain in the Son (15:4–7) and are able to demonstrate in the world their belief in and practice of the new commandment to love (13:34–35; 14:15, 23; 15:9–17). When the Christian church is warned to maintain its distance over against the world (e.g., 1 Jn. 2:15), we are concerned with the cosmos in its transience (2:17). The church is to keep itself free from its seductive power. For anyone who loves this world does not have any share in the love of God that reaches out to him, and is therefore incapable of love as instructed in the command of the Lord.

See also gē, earth, world (1178); oikoumenē, earth (3876); agros, field (69); chous, soil, dust (5967).

3187 (krabbatos, mat, bed), → 3111.

3189 κράζω

κράζω (krazō), cry aloud (3189); ἐπιφωνέω (epiphōneō), call out, shout (2215); κραυγάζω (kraugazō), shout, cry out (3198).

CL & OT krazō originally reflected the raucous cry of the raven and then the noise of frogs. More commonly it is applied to human beings. Its religious connection is usually in the sphere of the demonic. Witches, for example, cry out magical incantations. epiphōneō means call out, proclaim, exclaim, or, in a weaker sense, tell of.

In the LXX krazō is flexible enough to cover the shout of war (Jos. 6:16 = LXX 6:15), the cry of childbirth (Isa. 26:17), the wild call of a raven (Job 38:41), and the braying of an ass (6:5). Humans cry to the Lord in individual or national distress, and God hears and delivers (Exod. 22:22–23; Jdg. 3:9; Ps. 22:5; 34:17). Although Yahweh invites such crying (cf. Isa. 40:3–26), he will not listen to the cry of the ungodly (Mic. 3:4). The crying depicted in the Psalms pulsates with assurances that God will answer (e.g., 4:3; 22:24; 55:16). Two distinctive uses deserve note: the worshipful crying of angels who stand in Yahweh's presence (Isa. 6:3–4), and the quietness of the servant of Yahweh (42:2).

epiphōneō is used 3x in the LXX in quasi-liturgical responses of the people (1 Esd. 9:47; 2 Macc. 1:23; 3 Macc. 7:13).

NT In the Synoptics, krazō is used mainly for cries of help springing out of need and/or fear (e.g., Matt. 9:27; 14:26, 30; 15:22–23) and for the cries of demons, whether articulate (8:29) or inarticulate (Mk. 5:5; Lk. 9:39). An element of praise is introduced by the personification metaphor of Lk. 19:40: The stones would cry out if Jesus were to hush the crowd. But more resonant are the cries of hate demanding Jesus' death (Matt. 27:23; Mk. 15:13–14; epiphōneō in Lk. 23:21). Jesus himself is quiet; Isa. 42:2 is fulfilled in him (Matt. 12:19, using kraugazō). When he does cry out (27:50), it is not an inarticulate sound (cf. Lk. 23:46), but a prayer to his Father, which brings his work on the cross to its blessed climax.

John customarily employs kraugazō where the Synoptists prefer krazō (e.g., Jn. 12:13; 18:40; 19:12). Likewise, Jesus calls forth Lazarus from his tomb (11:43). John's four occurrences of krazō bear the distinctive meaning of proclaim. Each refers to some facet of Christ's person or work: the Baptist's proclamation of the superiority of Jesus (1:15), and Jesus' crying out his message to the people (7:28, 37–38; 12:44–50).

Acts contains several references to the cries of Christians: e.g., in petition for others (7:60), in protest (14:14), and in public outcry (19:28). epiphōneō is used for the incoherent but denunciatory uproar against Paul (21:34; 22:24 [kraugazō in 22:23]), and for the people's cry in idolatrous worship of Herod (12:22).

Paul utilizes krazō 3x: in the sense of prophetic proclamation (Rom. 9:27), and in the Spirit's enabling the believer to cry "Abba, Father!" (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). In Jas. 5:4, injustice, or more explicitly, withheld pay, is personified and cries out to heaven. The personification is reminiscent of Lk. 19:40.

Rev. uses krazō for a call for help (6:10); a cry of jubilation (7:10); an angelic cry (10:3), command (7:2; 19:17), proclamation (18:2), or address to the Son of Man (14:15); the wail of a woman in childbirth (12:2); and lamentation over fallen Babylon (18:2). The plethora of dramatic cries reinforces the thought that the end comes quickly and cataclysmically.

See also boaō, call, shout, cry out (1066).

3193 (krataios, strong, mighty), → 3197.

3194 (krataioō, make strong, strengthen), → 3197.

3195 (krateō, to be strong, to take possession of, hold, grasp, seize), → 3197.

3196 (kratistos, most honorable, illustrious, excellent), → 3197.

3197 κράτος

κράτος (kratos), power, might, rule (3197); κρατέω (krateō), to be strong, to take possession of, hold, grasp, seize (3195); κραταιόω (krataioō), make strong, strengthen (3194); κραταιός (krataios), strong, mighty (3193); παντοκράτωρ (pantokratōr), the Almighty (4120); κοσμοκράτωρ (kosmokratōr), ruler of the world (3179); κράτιστος (kratistos), most honorable, illustrious, excellent (3196).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. krateō can mean to be strong, possess might, be in control of, be master of, obtain victory over, or gain the upper hand over. This vb. can also indicate the act of seizing and esp. that of arresting, or it can express a continuous action, i.e., holding fast. In the legal sphere the word acquired the meaning to have the right of possession. (b) kratos denotes power and strength, such as the physical strength or power possessed by humans, rulers, or gods. This word is also a title of royalty and means rule, dominion, or victory. (c) krataios means mighty, full of power; it is sometimes found in combination with cheir, hand (i.e., "with strong hands").

2. (a) All the above-mentioned meanings of krateō, except the legal one, can be found in the LXX, where it occurs about 170x, frequently as a translation of ḥāzaq (hiph.). It can mean be strong (Jer. 20:7), rule (Prov. 16:32; 4 Macc. 1:5), take control (1 Macc. 10:52; 2 Macc. 4:27), seize (Jdg. 8:12; Ps. 137:9), and hold (Song 3:4). The expression to seize by the hand is found at Gen. 19:16; Isa. 42:6.

(b) kratos denotes the power and strength of humans and things (e.g., Ps. 89:9), and esp. the power of God (e.g., 62:11), which can be given to us (86:16).

(c) krataioō, to make strong, take courage, gain the upper hand over, is not found before the LXX (e.g., 2 Sam. 1:23; 11:23; Job 36:22; Ps. 105:4), where it occurs 64x.

(d) The LXX usually applies the adj. krataios to God (e.g., Deut. 7:21; Ps. 24:8; 71:7; Prov. 23:11). The adj. is combined with "hand" 31x, almost all of them referring to the mighty hand of God (e.g., Exod. 3:19; 13:3, 9, 14, 16; Deut. 7:8, 19, 21; Ps. 136:12).

(e) pantokratōr, the Almighty, occurs first in the LXX and is a title for deities, both secular and Yahweh. The LXX translates ṣᵉbā'ôt and šadday by pantokratōr (e.g., Job 5:17; 8:5; Hos. 12:5; Amos 3:13; 5:14–16; Zech. 1:3–17; 8:1–23; Mal. 1:4–14).

(f) kosmokratōr, ruler of the world, not found before the 1st cent. A.D., generally denotes the rulers of the universe on whom the fate of humanity depends.

(g) kratistos (a superlative adj.) is found several times in the LXX. It occurs 2x in Ps. 16:6 ("pleasant," "delightful") and is translated "better off" in Amos 6:2.

NT 1. (a) In the Synoptic tradition krateō is sometimes a technical term meaning to arrest or seek to arrest (Matt. 14:3; Mk. 6:17, on the arrest of John the Baptist; 12:12; 14:1, 44, on the plan to arrest Jesus; 14:46, on his actual arrest). Lk. seems to avoid the word with this meaning (except for Acts 24:6).

(b) krateō also means generally to take hold of: Jesus took hold of the dead child's hand (Matt. 9:25; Mk. 5:41; Lk. 8:54) and that of a sick woman (Mk. 1:31). Often a miracle worker touches a patient's hand in order that miraculous power may flow into the other's body. Matt. mentions an owner's taking hold of a sheep that has fallen into a well on the Sabbath (12:11) and the disciples' taking hold of Jesus by his feet (28:9).

(c) Holding fast to Jewish tradition is called in question in Mk. 7:3–4, for such tradition often consists of human ordinances rather than God's command (7:8). In the course of time a Christian tradition developed, observance of which was laid down as binding (2 Thess. 2:15; Heb. 4:14; 6:18; Rev. 2:13, 25; 3:11); those who clung to false doctrines were opposed (2:14–15). Mk. 9:10 tells how the disciples kept the word of Jesus to themselves and did not pass it on. The OT and Jewish concept of sins being retained (cf. Matt. 16:19; 18:18) is expressed by krateō in Jn. 20:23.

(d) The Emmaus disciples saw Jesus but failed to recognize him; their eyes "were kept [krateō] from recognizing him" (Lk. 24:16). In Acts 2:24 death is said to have been unable to "keep its hold" on Jesus. The lame man, once he was healed, clung to Peter and John (3:11), showing that he owed his healing to them and ultimately to God. In 27:13, the sailors supposed they "had obtained" the wind they wanted. As these examples show, in Lk.'s use of krateō, he thinks of holding fast rather than of taking hold or arresting.

2. kratos is an attribute and honorific title for kings, emperors, and their households, but it is also applied to God (1 Pet. 5:11; Rev. 5:13) and to Christ (1 Tim. 6:16; 1 Pet. 4:11; Rev. 1:6; 5:13). Power that is not used directly on people, i.e., that is not soteriological in character, describes God's majesty and grandeur. The holding of the seven stars and the four winds (Rev. 2:1; 7:1, krateō) and the seizing of the dragon (20:2) are apocalyptic and symbolic ways of expressing power and might. Passages, however, that reveal the effects of God's power are anthropological: e.g., in the Magnificat God puts forth his strength in order to scatter the proud (Lk. 1:51).

Acts 19:20 describes God's power at work among humans: God's word (i.e., the gospel and its proclamation) has had a success that can only be ascribed to God. Eph. 1:19, although in the form of a doxology, teaches that "the working of [God's] mighty strength" (lit., "the working of the strength [kratos] of his might [ischys, → 2709]") is seen in believers; similarly in 6:10, "his mighty power" is to become effective in those addressed (cf. Col. 1:11). The power of death, according to Heb. 2:14, has been taken from the devil.

3. krataioō is used in Lk.'s birth narratives to describe John the Baptist and the child Jesus growing and becoming strong in spirit (Lk. 1:80) and wisdom (2:40). Paul uses this vb. in his encouragement to the Corinthians to "be strong" (1 Cor. 16:13) and in his prayer to the Ephesians that God will "strengthen" them in their inner being (Eph. 3:16).

4. krataios occurs only in 1 Pet. 5:6: The hand of God, under which we are called to humble ourselves, is a "mighty" hand.

5. pantokratōr, the Almighty, the Lord of all, occurs both in connection with OT quotations (2 Cor. 6:18; cf. Isa. 43:6; Hos. 1:10) and independently (Rev. 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:22). In both cases the title serves to describe the immense greatness of God, who has power over all creation.

6. kosmokratōr occurs only in Eph. 6:12 (in the pl.), where it refers to the cosmic rulers, the evil spirits, against whom we are to wage war.

7. kratistos, most excellent, honorable, seems to be a warm, respectful form of address applied to Theophilus in Lk. 1:3. When applied to Felix and Festus, however (Acts 23:26; 24:3; 26:25), it is used in its official sense as a form of address applied to members of the equestrian order in Roman society.

See also bia, force, violence (1040); ischys, strength, power, might (2709); keras, horn (3043).

3198 (kraugazō, shout, cry out), → 3189.

3200 (kreas, flesh, meat), → 4922.

3203 (kremannymi, hang), → 5089.

3210 κρίμα

κρίμα (krima), dispute, decision, verdict, judgment (3210); κρίνω (krinō), separate, judge, consider, decide (3212); ἀνακρίνω (anakrinō), investigate, examine (373); κρίσις (krisis), decision, crisis (3213); κριτής (kritēs), a judge (3216); συγκρίνω (synkrinō), compare, interpret (5173); κατάκριμα (katakrima), punishment, condemnation (2890);

κατακρίνω (katakrinō), condemn (2891); κατάκρισις (katakrisis), condemnation (2892); καταγινώσκω (kataginōskō), condemn (2861); αὐτοκατάκριτος (autokatakritos), self-condemned (896); κριτικός (kritikos), able to discern and decide, critical (3217); ἀκατάκριτος (akatakritos), without a trial, uncondemned (185).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. krima, judgment, is derived from krinō, to judge, which in its numerous compounds came to occupy a major place in legal terminology. (a) The original meaning of krinō, to separate, sift, came to be used in connection with human value judgments: to discriminate, distinguish, approve, prefer. Along with this came an assessment, so that krinō means (technically) to judge, pronounce judgment, decide, condemn. In the mid. and pass. it means to dispute, debate, or fight.

(b) The compound synkrinō reveals a similar process in its meanings to compare, judge, measure; also to explain, expound, and interpret (dreams). anakrinō expresses the questioning process that leads to a judgment: to examine, cross-examine, interrogate, inquire, and investigate.

(c) The noun krima, like krinō, embraces a variety of meanings: decision, verdict, controversy, dispute (human or divine); also condemnation or punishment. krisis, a derivative of krima, means decision (of a referee), crisis (in battle, sickness, etc.), also separation, dissension, dispute. The person making the decision is called kritēs: critic, judge, referee. A derivative adj. (kritikos) denotes a competent, experienced judge.

(d) The compound katakrinō means to condemn. Two nouns are related: katakrisis, condemnation, and katakrima, punishment, damnation. autokatakritos is a rare word, formed from the adj. katakritos and the prefix auto, self. It is a moral word that means self-condemned. A moral assessment is also expressed by kataginōskō, meaning to recognize as guilty, despise, condemn.

2. In the LXX krinō acquired a meaning beyond its general cl. Gk. usage, for the Heb. word underlying it, dîn, not only means to judge, but also to punish, vindicate, and obtain justice for a person (Gen. 15:14; 30:6; Deut. 32:36; 2 Sam. 19:9; Jer. 5:28). šāpaṭ, a frequent OT word, adds further shades of meaning to the Heb. concept, so that to judge comes to mean to rule (Exod. 2:14; 1 Sam. 8:20; 2 Sam. 15:4). One who judges brings salvation, peace, and deliverance, esp. to the persecuted and oppressed (cf. Deut. 10:18; Ps. 72:1–2). The judges in the book of Jdg. (LXX kritai), are deliverers or saviors raised up by God. They obtain justice for the tribes of Israel in the face of their enemies by annihilating or driving out their oppressors, thus bringing salvation, rest, and peace to the land (Jdg. 3:9, 15). krima can mean statute (Lev. 18:5; 20:22), and in Jer. 51:10 (= LXX 28:10) righteousness or vindication.

3. (a) In Israel justice was dispensed with a view to restoring peace within the community (the family, the tribe, or the nation). In difficult cases it meant removing an offending member. After the conquest justice was dispensed partly by the heads of families and tribal elders, and partly by the local community elders sitting in the gate of a town or village, all full citizens having the right to speak (Ruth 4:1–2). In Jerusalem certain officials were appointed as judges.

(b) In Israel all justice is ascribed to God: Yahweh is Lord and judge (Deut. 1:17). As such he helps his people (Jdg. 11:27; 2 Sam. 18:31). He never deviates from justice (Ps. 7:11) and will not suffer his honor to be brought into disrepute. Heaven and earth are often called upon to act as a tribunal (Isa. 1:2; Jer. 2:12; Mic. 6:1). Yahweh judges all the nations (Gen. 11:1–9; Ps. 67:4; Joel 3:2; Amos 1:2–2:3; Mal. 3:2–5), especially on the "day of the LORD," when he will destroy all ungodliness (Isa. 2:12–18; 13:9; Jer.

46:10; Ezek. 30:3; Zeph. 1:7–18). He comes to the aid of anyone suffering violence and injustice (Gen. 4:9–12), and one must submit to his inscrutable judgment (Job).

The Lord's judgments are just, i.e., they are in harmony with his faithfulness, whereby he espouses the cause of his chosen people, guides them, and ensures their safety. Thus God's judgment is motivated by love, grace, and mercy, and its outcome is salvation (Ps. 25:6–9; 33:5; 103:6–14; 146:7; Isa. 30:18).

(c) God's judgment on Israel receives the most attention in the judgment discourses of the prophets (Isa. 48:1–11; Jer. 2:4–9; Hos. 4:1; Amos 5:18; 6:8–14; Mic. 1). Since Israel is the elect nation, it will be judged (Ezek. 20:33–38; Amos 3:1–15). Moreover, Yahweh the judge is king of the universe and uses nations and powers as instruments of his judgment (Hab. 1). Ultimately, however, God will preserve his people.

(d) The description of God's judgment acquired certain apocalyptic features in the postexilic period. Its character as punishment is emphasized: God's enemies (either human or supernatural) will be dashed to pieces. The "congregation of wickedness" will be annihilated, while the "sons of light" will attain salvation (cf. 1QS 3–4; 1QM 3:9–19). The doctrine of retribution led people to regard any calamity as God's judgment on them; this in turn had an adverse effect on their social life and shook their faith in divine justice. Belief in a further judgment after death (Pss. Sol. 3:1ff.; 1 Enoch) offered a way out of this mental anguish. Judgment would still fall, even though we might not live to see it. God or the Son of man is the judge of the world at the "last day" (2 Esd. 7).

NT 1. The NT contains much legal and semi-legal language where krima, krinō, and their derivatives are used with the same complex meanings as outlined above.

(a) krinō has a wide variety of meanings: to distinguish, give preference, esteem (Rom. 14:5); consider, regard as (Acts 13:46; 16:15; 26:8); speak or think ill of, decide, judge (Matt. 7:1–2; Lk. 7:43; Acts 4:19; 15:19; Rom. 14:3–4, 10, 13; 1 Cor. 4:5); decide, resolve (Acts 3:13; Rom. 14:13; 1 Cor. 2:2; Tit. 3:12). synkrinō means to interpret (1 Cor. 2:13; cf. 2 Cor. 10:12). anakrinō means to inquire (Acts 17:11; 1 Cor. 10:25, 27), examine, interrogate (Lk. 23:14; Acts 4:9; 12:19; 1 Cor. 9:3), form an estimate of (2:14).

(b) krinō and krima are often used in the NT in a strictly judicial sense. krinō means to judge; in the mid. to dispute; in the pass. to bring to trial, condemn, punish. People judge according to the law (Jn. 18:31; Acts 23:3). The apostles and the church judge (1 Cor. 5:12; 6:2–3). Paul is put on trial (Acts 23:6). On two occasions he asserted his rights as a Roman citizen to the Roman authorities that he should not be beaten apart from a trial (akatakritos; lit., uncondemned, 16:37; 22:25). The people cannot come to a right judgment (Lk. 12:57). People go to law to settle disputes (Matt. 5:40; 1 Cor. 6:6). The noun krima is used similarly: The disciples of Jesus should not judge, and with the judgment that one pronounces on others will oneself be judged (Matt. 7:1–2). The Christians in Corinth, unfortunately, have lawsuits with one another (1 Cor. 6:7). krisis can mean judgment by the authorities (Matt. 5:21), judgment passed either by one person on another (Jn. 7:24) or by the angels on the devil (2 Pet. 2:11; Jude 9). kritēs means the authorized (Matt. 5:25; Lk. 12:14, 58; 18:2) and unauthorized (Jas. 2:4; 4:11) judge—anyone who brings injustice to light (Matt. 12:27). autokatakritos (only in Tit. 3:11) is one who is self-condemned.

kataginōskō (Gal. 2:11; 1 Jn. 3:20–21) means to be recognized as guilty and condemned by one's own heart or conduct. Human condemnation is also expressed by katakrinō: The people of Nineveh will appear at the last judgment and condemn the present generation (Matt. 12:41; cf. Heb. 11:7). Note the similar use of this vb. in Jn.

8:10–11; Rom. 2:1; 8:34. Jesus is condemned to death (Matt. 20:18; 27:3; Mk. 14:64). The noun katakrisis occurs twice: "the ministry that condemns" (2 Cor. 3:9) and "not ... to condemn you" (7:3).

LXX influence appears when krisis means justice (Matt. 12:18; 23:23; Acts 8:33) and when krima means rule. Authority to rule is given to the disciples and martyrs (Lk. 22:30; Rev. 20:4); the twelve apostles will rule over the twelve tribes (Matt. 19:28).

(c) God and Jesus judge (e.g., Jn. 5:22, 29–30; Acts 17:31). Each is called kritēs, judge (Acts 10:42; 2 Tim. 4:8; Heb. 12:23; Jas. 4:12; 5:9), and God's word is called kritikos, a discerner (Heb. 4:12). When the passive form is used, the reference is similarly to the activity of the divine judge (Rev. 11:18). Christ judges the living and the dead (2 Tim. 4:1; 1 Pet. 4:5–6), the secrets of humans (Rom. 2:16), the world (Acts 17:31), and everyone according to his or her deeds (1 Pet. 1:17; Rev. 20:12–13; cf. 2 Cor. 5:10).

The noun krima is used of divine judgment: Jesus brings judgment (Jn. 9:39), and God's activity as a judge begins with the church (1 Pet. 4:17); future and eternal judgment is in his hands (Acts 24:25; Heb. 6:2). Similarly, krisis can denote the judgment of God or of Christ (Jn. 5:30; 2 Thess. 1:5) or the day of judgment (Matt. 10:15; 2 Pet. 2:9; 3:7; 1 Jn. 4:17; Jude 6; Rev. 14:7). Divine judgment brings separation (Jn. 3:19) as well as destruction (Heb. 10:27). Those who hear Jesus' word and believe him do not come into judgment (Jn. 5:24). The dead who have done evil will arise to judgment (5:29).

Divine judgment often includes punishment (Jn. 3:17–18; Rom. 2:12; 3:6; 2 Thess. 2:12; Heb. 10:30; 13:4; Jas. 5:9). God's condemnation is just (Rom. 2:2–3; 3:8) and swift (2 Pet. 2:3). Thus, the prince of this world is condemned (Jn. 16:11). Divine condemnation is expressed by katakrima (Rom. 5:16, 18; 8:1) and katakrinō (God condemned sin in the flesh, Rom. 8:3; cf. also 14:23; 1 Cor. 11:32; 2 Pet. 2:6).

2. Just as in the OT all judgment is ascribed to God, so also in the NT all human judgment and punishment stands within the wider context of God's sovereign judgment, a principle expressed with the utmost clarity in Matt. 7:1: "Do not judge, or you too will be judged." The church of Christ has been entrusted with the task of judging in matters that affect its members (1 Cor. 5:12; 6:2). Measured by the standard of God's perfect righteousness, no one is righteous in his sight but all are under his wrath (Rom. 1–3). This is the reason why ultimately no human being has a right to judge another.

The unsearchable nature of God's judgments (Rom. 11:33) means that the doctrine of retribution can no longer be rigidly upheld. The human principle of "tit for tat" has no place in the divine judge's dealings with us (cf. Lk. 6:37; 13:1–5; Jn. 9:2–3). That God is judge is basic to the NT, but words like judgment and judge are incapable of expressing the unsearchableness of God, particularly when his unsearchable decrees reveal his love. This is the other side of God's character, displayed throughout the NT.

Jesus, like John the Baptist, preached by word and deed the nearness of divine judgment, which should stir us to hope and repentance (Lk. 13:6–9) but will bring woe on the unrepentant (Matt. 11:20–24; 12:41–42). Coming judgment means that all are advancing towards God's final verdict on them and their works. Before God nothing is forgotten, whether deed or word. The only way to escape condemnation is forgiveness.

Divine patience gives us time to repent and believe in Christ, who has been made "to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor. 5:21; cf. Rom. 3:23–26; Gal. 3:13; Col. 2:13–15). Judgment already rests on unbelievers because they refuse the Savior, while believers escape condemnation (Jn. 3:16–18; 11:25–26). They can have confidence as they anticipate the day of judgment.

See also paradidōmi, deliver up, give up, hand over (4140); bēma, judgment seat (1037); katadikazō, condemn (2868).

3212 (krinō, separate, judge, consider, decide), → 3210.

3213 (krisis, decision, crisis), → 3210.

3216 (kritēs, a judge), → 3210.

3217 (kritikos, able to discern and decide, critical), → 3210.

3218 κρούω

κρούω (krouō), knock (3218).

CL & OT krouō is used in both cl. Gk. and the LXX (e.g., Song 5:2) for striking something, esp. knocking on a door.

NT To knock at a door is the strict meaning in all 9 NT instances of the vb. (Matt. 7:7–8; Lk. 11:9–10; 12:36; 13:25; Acts 12:13, 16; Rev. 3:20). Apart from the passages in Acts, the context is in each case metaphorical. The saying "Knock and the door will be opened to you" (Matt. 7:7; Lk. 11:9) is probably a common proverb since it is found also in Jud. This knocking does not mean seeking to enter the kingdom (cf. Matt. 7:13–14) but bringing one's petitions before the Lord; note that the situation presupposed in Lk. 11:5–8 is that of a persistent friend at midnight, who eventually gets what he asks for. Lk. refers the spiritual message of this parable ultimately to the gift of the Holy Spirit (11:13). Knocking in 12:36 and 13:25 is a detail of the parables of the returning master and of those excluded from entering the narrow door; the vb. here has eschatological significance.

Rev. 3:20 pictures the risen Lord standing at a door, knocking and inviting those inside to open and receive him. He is addressing the spiritually lukewarm church at Laodicea, and the anticipation of his return means victory and a place in the presence of his Father. This prediction of his confrontation with idle church people is both a disturbing warning that apathy will not go unheeded and a gracious encouragement that the Lord will not allow his people to remain ineffective, but intends rather to establish them in victorious living. The background to the image may be the Lord's Supper.

See also aiteō, ask, ask for, demand (160); gonypeteō, fall on one's knees, kneel down before (1206); deomai, ask, request, beseech, beg (1289); proseuchomai, to pray, entreat (4667); proskyneō, worship, do obeisance to, prostrate oneself, do reverence to (4686); erōtaō, ask, ask a question, request (2263); entynchanō, meet, turn to, approach, petition, pray, intercede (1961).

3220 (kryptos, hidden, secret), → 3221.

3221 κρύπτω

κρύπτω (kryptō), hide, conceal (3221); ἀποκρύπτω (apokryptō), hide (648); κρυπτός (kryptos), hidden, secret (3220); ἀπόκρυφος (apokryphos), hidden (649); κρυφαῖος (kryphaios), hidden (3224).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kryptō, to hide, conceal, has a fig. meaning, to keep secret. The derivative apokryptō also means to keep secret. One cannot draw an absolute distinction between these vbs. and kalyptō, to hide. The adjs. kryptos, apokryphos, and kryphaios all mean hidden. Gk. and Hel. religion does not emphasize the hiddenness of the deity greatly, though there are occasional references to it. The biblical doctrine of God, with his transcendence and unapproachability, is largely foreign to the Gk. mind. The word apokryphos, however, plays a major role in describing the content of books of magic and astrology.

2. In the LXX kryptō is found both in the lit. sense of to hide (e.g., Gen. 3:8, 10) and the fig. sense of to keep secret (e.g., 18:17; 1 Sam. 3:17–18). apokryptō, to hide, usually has the fig. meaning (Isa. 40:27; Wis. 6:22). The adj. kryptos is used in both the lit. and the fig. senses (Deut. 29:29; 2 Macc. 1:16). apokryphos is used in Isa. 45:3; Dan. 11:43; and 1 Macc. 1:23 of secret treasures. The expression en apokryphō, in secret, is also found (e.g., Deut. 27:15; Ps. 10:9).

3. (a) The hiddenness and unapproachability of God is depicted impressively in the OT in the story of the call of Moses. Moses is not allowed to approach the God who has revealed himself to him in the burning bush, but turns his face away; he is afraid of God's face (Exod. 3:6). Similarly, the Israelites do not dare to approach God at Sinai; Moses alone dares to go forward into the darkness (20:21).

In later OT books, God hears his people's cry of distress in the secret place of thunder (Ps. 81:7). At the consecration of the temple Solomon declared that God dwells in darkness (1 Ki. 8:12). In a fig. sense, the painful misfortunes of Israel are regarded as divine judgments in which his comfort remains hidden (Hos. 13:14). The God of Israel is a hidden God, though he remains the Savior. He hides his face in wrath, but he returns to his people with everlasting grace (Isa. 45:15; 54:8). Though Israel's way may be hidden from God, it is not cut off from the comfort of the Lord, who gives power and strength to the weary (40:27, 29).

(b) Although God hides himself from us, we cannot hide from him. He is the Lord who fills heaven and earth (Jer. 23:24). Everywhere we are surrounded by God's presence; God's eye sees even in the darkness, and nothing is hidden from him (Ps. 139:7–12, 15; Sir. 39:19). To flee from God, as the case of Jonah shows (Jon. 1:3), is therefore a hopeless quest. Above all, human sin is not hidden from God (Ps. 69:5; Jer. 16:17). There is no darkness where evildoers can hide and do their evil deeds (Job 34:22; Sir. 17:15, 20). To sinful people God is like a bear lying in wait or a lion in hiding (Lam. 3:10).

The awareness of personal guilt and distance from God finds strong expression in Ps. All the more urgent, therefore, is the plea made to God by the righteous: "Do not close your ears to my cry for relief" (Lam. 3:56). Nor can the sighing of the righteous remain hidden from God (Ps. 38:9). They therefore must stand before God with their sin and confess it; if they do not hide it, they can obtain God's forgiveness (32:5). The righteous also ask for this forgiveness for hidden faults (19:12). One effect of this attitude of faith and trust is the desire to hide God's commands in one's heart, i.e., to be their guardian (119:11, 19).

(c) The OT expresses in a variety of ways the tension between the hiddenness of God and his revelation. God reveals what is hidden, such as the hidden things that concern the future (Dan. 2:22; Sir. 42:19; 48:25). This opens up the way to Jewish apocalyptic lit., beginning with the book of Daniel. God is revealed in his judgments as the righteous Judge, who brings to light what is hidden (Eccl. 12:14; 2 Macc. 12:41; cf. Gen. 18:23–33).

3. In 1st-cent. Jud., the apocalyptic lit. that continues the tradition of the book of Daniel concerns itself with the hidden things, esp. insofar as they have to do with the future. In 1 Enoch, for example, the chosen one intends to reveal all the treasures of what is hidden, and all secrets of wisdom will proceed from his mouth (46:3; 51:3). The Qumran texts speak of a secret knowledge of God's will that remains hidden to outsiders and is attainable only to the community (1QS 4:6; 9:17; 11:6; 1QH 5:24–25). Even in rab. Jud. the awareness of God's hiddenness and mysteries does not totally disappear, but it is balanced by the conviction of the pious Jew that the full and valid revelation of God has been given in the Torah.

NT 1. (a) In the NT kryptō occurs 18x; apokryptō, 4x; kryptos, 17x; apokryphos, 3x (Mk. 4:22; Lk. 8:17; Col. 2:3); kryphaios 2x (Matt. 6:18). Mk. 4:22 (cf. Matt. 10:26, which uses kalyptō, → 2821; Lk. 12:2) reads: "Whatever is hidden [kryptos] is meant to be disclosed, and whatever is concealed [apokryphos] is meant to be brought out into the open." Thus, no clear line of distinction can be drawn between kryptō words and kalyptō words (cf. Lk. 23:30 with Rev. 6:16).

(b) The kryptō words are often used in a lit. sense. Matt. 13:44 mentions the treasure hidden in a field, while in the parable of the talents the unfaithful servant hides his money in the earth (25:18, 25). Similarly the woman hides leaven in the flour (13:33, enkryptō). In a reference to Exod. 2, Heb. 11:23 records the hiding of the baby Moses after his birth.

2. Of theological significance are sayings in the Gospels that deal with the hiddenness of revelation and of the revelatory work of God. The revelation God gives through Jesus to babes remains hidden from the wise and prudent (Matt. 11:25 par. Lk. 10:21). The hiddenness of revelation corresponds to the hiddenness of the kingdom of heaven. This is the message of the parables of the leaven and of the hidden treasure (Matt. 13:33, 44). Just as the kingdom is hidden, so must the disciples' almsgiving, prayers, and fasting be done in secret; the Father, who sees in secret, will reward them. Jesus emphasizes this in the face of a type of piety that seeks to display itself (Matt. 6:4, 6, 18). The passion predictions of Jesus indicate that for the disciples the divine plan remains for the present hidden; it will not be revealed to them until after the resurrection (Lk. 18:34). Similarly, Jerusalem has failed to recognize the salvation Jesus desires to bring her; the things that have been made for her peace remain hidden from her eyes (19:42).

In Matt. 10:26–27 Jesus commissions the disciples to spread his message; in this way what is "hidden" will "be made known." In Matt.'s rendition of the purpose of parables, they are intended to express what has been "hidden since the creation of the world" (Matt. 13:35; cf. Ps. 78:2). A city set on a hill cannot be hid, and a light is not placed under a bowl or hidden in a corner but is put on a lampstand so that all may see it (Matt. 5:14–16; cf. Lk. 11:33, kryptē).

Joseph of Arimathea is a secret (a form of kryptō) disciple for fear of the Jews (Jn. 19:38). In contrast to this, Jesus confesses at his trial before the high priest: "I said nothing in secret" (18:20). His task was to manifest the Father's name before others (17:6). In 7:8–10 Jesus says he does not plan to go up to Jerusalem for the Feast of Tabernacles (7:2–5). Later, however, he goes "in secret" (7:8, 10). On another occasion he hides from the Jews and leaves the temple when they try to stone him (8:59). He will give up his life at his own time, when his hour has come (7:8; 13:1; 17:1).

The hiddenness of Jesus exposes his lack of dependence on humans and his majesty and union with God. It does not mean that his revelation will remain hidden to all, for Jesus is the light of the world (Jn. 8:12). But it is given only to his disciples (Jn. 17); unbelievers are subject to the judgment of total blindness (9:39).

3. (a) Paul declares that his apostolic message is the "secret wisdom" of God, which he ordained from all eternity for our glory (1 Cor. 2:7). It has its origin in divine revelation (Rom. 16:25; 1 Cor. 2:10; Gal. 1:12). Its content is Christ, whom God has made wisdom for us (1 Cor. 1:30); that Spirit-inspired message brings us the deep knowledge of God (2:10–11).

(b) Eph. and Col. carry these ideas further. The message is "the mystery . . . kept hidden for ages and generations, but . . . now disclosed to the saints" (Col. 1:26) and to the holy apostles and prophets (Eph. 3:5). It proclaims to us the Christ present in Christians and his unsearchable riches (3:8; Col. 1:27). In this Christ "are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (2:3).

Moreover, Christ is also the hidden life of the Christian. Christians are buried with him in baptism and raised by faith to a new life (Col. 2:12). This life is "hidden with Christ in God" (3:3). Therefore, they can take no part in "secret and shameful ways" (2 Cor. 4:2), i.e., in works of darkness that take place in secret and yet cannot remain hidden (Eph. 5:12, kryphē; cf. 1 Tim. 5:25).

(c) In 1 Pet. Christian wives are called to a life of holiness, evident by not adorning themselves with costly outward finery, but by adorning "your inner [kryptos] self, the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit" (1 Pet. 3:4). The mark of this hidden, inner person is a life of hope, submission, and fear of God (3:2, 5–6).

4. (a) Paul describes true believers in Rom. 2:29 as Jews "inwardly" (lit., "in secret"). Through the Spirit they have received a circumcision of the heart, a circumcision made without hands (Col. 2:11–12; cf. Phil. 3:3)—which means baptism, through which they share in Christ's burial and resurrection (cf. Rom. 6:3–10). Thus, believers become the "Israel of God" (Gal. 6:16). By contrast, outward Jews rely mainly on the circumcision of the flesh.

(b) Rev. 2:17 speaks of the "hidden manna," a gift from the heavenly world. Manna was the secret food provided by God to the Israelites, which they received from heaven on their journey through the desert (Exod. 16:4). Jews expected that manna would be given to Israel anew at the end of the ages. Ultimately this hidden manna is Christ himself: He is the bread of God that comes down from heaven (Jn. 6:33–35).

5. (a) As to the future, God is the Judge, who will bring into judgment "men's secrets" (Rom. 2:16); he will also "bring to light what is hidden in darkness and will expose the motives of men's hearts" (1 Cor. 4:5), just as the Spirit of God already at work in Christians discloses "the secrets of [the] heart" (14:25).

(b) Rev. takes up OT prophecies (Isa. 2:10–11; Jer. 4:29; Hos. 10:8) and describes how on the judgment day the kings and great men of the earth will have to hide in caves and clefts of the rocks; they will cry out to the mountains and rocks, "Fall on us and hide us from the face of him who sits on the throne" (Rev. 6:16; cf. Lk. 23:30).

(c) The idea of judgment is only one side of NT expectation concerning the future. First and foremost the NT looks forward to the coming of the Lord, when Christ, the hidden life of Christians, will appear and they will appear with him in glory (Col. 3:3–4). Then the knowledge that is here enjoyed only in part and cannot lift the veil of God's hiddenness will no longer be obscure. It will no longer be a matter of seeing "a poor reflection as in a mirror" (1 Cor. 13:12), but will be turned into sight, face to face.

6. The English word apocryphal has passed into common usage because of the so-called apocryphal lit. These writings were secret, hidden writings, which were not to be read out in church. The way was paved for the appearance of this lit. by the fact that in the NT period the authority of the Scriptures was already established, but the question of which writings belonged to the canon had not yet been fully resolved. The specific term Apocrypha denotes those books included in the LXX that do not appear in the Heb. canon of the OT. These books were accepted by the Roman Catholic Church as canonical during the Council of Trent in 1546. Protestants in general have seen them as good and useful to read but not canonical.

See also kalyptō, cover, hide, conceal (2821).

3224 (kryphaios, hidden), → 3221.

3228 (ktēma, property, possessions), → 5975.

3231 (ktizō, create, produce), → 3232.

3232 κτίσις

κτίσις (ktisis), creation, creature (3232); κτίζω (ktizō), create, produce (3231); κτίσμα (ktisma), created thing, creature (3233); κτίστης (ktistēs), originator, creator (3234).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ktizō early on took on the meaning bring into being, set in operation, colonize. ktisis means primarily the act of creation or the created thing (the result of this act); ktisma does not occur before the LXX and is generally synonymous with ktisis. ktistēs is most often a name for rulers in their function as founders and originators, in particular as restorers of the old order. Applied to a deity, it means creator.

2. LXX has two terms for create: dēmiourgeō, work on or with a material, manufacture; and ktizō, which expresses the decisive act of will that brings something into being. The latter is preferred as a description of God's creative activity. Nevertheless, the exclusiveness implied by the Heb. bārāʾ (see below) remains largely hidden in the LXX (esp. Pent. and Isa.), since poieō, make, is often used instead of ktizō (note that later versions of the OT, such as Theod., Aquila, and Sym., use ktizō in the Pent. and latter portions of Isa.). ktizō occurs 66x in the LXX.

(a) Heb. bārāʾ (trans. ktizō 16x) is a theological term whose subj. is always God. It is the word used to convey Israel's explicit faith in creation, expressed in Gen. 1 and the later chapters of Isa. bārāʾ expresses the incomparable creative activity of God, in which the word and act of creation are one (cf. Gen. 1; Ps. 148:5). It refers not only to God's activity in calling the world and individual creatures into being, but also to his actions in history that lie behind election, temporal destiny, human behavior, and even justification.

Referring to the original creative activity of God, bārāʾ is used of the creation of the heavens and earth (Ps. 148:5), the north and south (89:12), the mountains and the wind (Amos 4:13), and humanity (Deut. 4:32; Ps. 89:47). It also expresses God's new work of creation extending into history. Thus Ps. 104:30, echoing Gen. 2, declares: "When you send your Spirit, they are created." In Eccl. 12:1 (lit., "Remember him who created you"), the reference is to the creation of the individual. A people yet to be created will praise God (Ps. 102:18). In the well-known text, "Create in me a pure heart, O God" (51:10), bārāʾ is again used in this sense. These last two references reveal the rift that runs through the original creation, which makes it necessary for God to intervene on behalf of his chosen people and the individual sinner.

The link between statements of God's original creation and those concerning his creative work in history becomes clear in Isa. 45:7, where God created not only light and darkness but also says, "I bring prosperity and create disaster." He who created the weapons that threaten has also created the destroyer of those weapons (54:16). The people whom God has created nonetheless profane the covenant (Mal. 2:10).

(b) qānâ (trans. ktizō 4x in LXX) means create, produce. Gen. 14:19, 22 speak of God Most High, in blessing and prayer respectively, as he who has made heaven and earth. Wisdom (Prov. 8:22), probably seen here as a heavenly being with a mediatorial role, exists before God's creation of the world.

(c) yāṣar (trans. ktizō 2x) means form, fashion (like a potter), plan. It can refer to the spontaneous action of God in history: He directs destinies (Isa. 22:11).

(d) kûn (trans. ktizō 2x) is used both of the original creation and of God's working in history. Thus precious stones were prepared (Ezek. 28:13), and Yahweh is the one who has established Israel (Deut. 32:6b).

(e) ktizō is used once for yāsad (Exod. 9:18); once for ʿāmad, stand forth at God's creative word (Ps. 33:9); and once for šākan, be established, of the tabernacle (Lev. 16:16).

3. In 39 occurrences of ktizō, there is no Heb. equivalent (most of these belong to the Apocr.). These uses give priority to the doctrine of creation over that of redemption. Confession, praise, and prayer to the Creator become the sole basis and content of faith (1 Esd. 6:13; Jdt. 13:18; Bel 5 [Theod.]; 3 Macc. 2:3, 9). God has created all things that they might exist (Wis. 1:14), and the world was created out of formless matter (11:17). He has created humanity for incorruption in the likeness of his own nature (2:23). God is called the "author of beauty" in connection with the creation of the stars (13:3).

Emphasis on the preexistence of the hypostasized figure of wisdom as the first created being accompanies a dehistoricizing of the concept of God. God becomes absolutely transcendent and exercises only mediate influence on present history. It also dehistoricizes creation (Wis. 10:1; Sir. 1:4, 9–10; 24:8–9). This reverses what happened with the emergence of an explicit doctrine of creation. History must now be seen from the viewpoint of creation, in which all is foreseen. From the beginning goodness is determined for the good. Winds, fire, hail, famine, and plague are created for punishment; and death, bloodshed, strife, sword, devastation, corruption, hunger, and tribulation for the ungodly (cf. Sir. 23:20; 39:21–30; 40:10).

One of the theological emphases of wisdom lit. is the extension of the doctrine of creation to include joy in the good things that have been made. Wine has been created to make us glad (Sir. 31:27 = LXX 34:27). Even tilling the soil is an ordinance of the Most High (7:15), and we have God to thank for doctors and medicines (38:1, 4, 12).

4. The noun ktisis has only 2 Heb. equivalents, each occurring 2x and meaning goods, wealth, possessions (Ps. 105:21; Prov. 1:13; 10:15); only in Ps. 104:24 does this word have the sense of creatures. Of more interest are the 15x that have no Heb. equivalent. Most of these underline the doctrine of creation in prayer (Ps. 74:18; Tob. 8:5, 15; Jdt. 9:12; 16:14; 3 Macc. 2:2, 7; 6:2). Since God is the Creator through his word, he can be taken at his word and addressed as the Lord of creation. God's power in history is no longer seen to be direct in its operation but mediated by his creation. He arms the ktisis, for example, to bring vengeance on his enemies (Wis. 5:17; 16:24; 19:6).

The proper attitude of humanity to creation is to marvel at its wonders (Sir. 43:24–25), praise the Creator (Tob. 8:5, 15), and serve fellow humans (Jdt. 16:14). On the other hand, it is despicable to misuse the creation in order to gain purely selfish enjoyment, as the ungodly encourage one another to do (Wis. 2:6).

5. ktisma occurs only in the Apocr. In Wis. 9:2 the author prays for wisdom, which is seen as the instrument of creation. In Sir. 36:20 a prayer for God's intervention is based on the continuing interest of God in his creation. According to Wis. 13:5 and 14:11 (cf. Rom. 1:20), the greatness and beauty of created things enable us to draw conclusions regarding their Creator, but idols are an abomination within the created order.

6. The noun ktistēs, creator, used 9x (including 2 Sam. 22:32; Isa. 43:15 in Sym.), gives us a glimpse of the central position occupied by the doctrine of creation in the two centuries before Christ. The Creator of the universe is invoked in confession (2 Macc. 7:23; 4 Macc. 11:5). To him is committed in prayer the salvation of Israel (2 Macc. 1:24–29) and the outcome in holy war (13:14). The hypostasized figure of wisdom stands as mediator in direct relation to him (Sir. 24:8).

7. The Qumran sect brought a demonological and anthropological dualism to the doctrine of creation. God has created the spirits of light and darkness and based every work on them. The doctrine of double predestination corresponds to this in the historical creation of the righteous and the ungodly—the one intended for the day of favor, the other for the day of conflict. This dualistic thinking allows the seas and floods to have been created and not merely separated. The idea of the new, eternal creation after the breakup of the old is consistent with the eschatological future envisaged by the righteous.

NT 1. ktizō, create, produce, occurs 15x; ktisis, creation, created thing, 19x; ktistēs, creator, only in 1 Pet. 4:19. The latter concept is, however, expressed 8 times by a relative clause or a part. The limited occurrences of this group of words do not, however, exhaust the terminology of creation. Note also poieō, make; plassō, form; kataskeuazō, prepare (Heb. 3:4); themelioō, found; and dēmiourgos, artisan, shaper. Certain other statements directly refer to creation events (Rom. 4:17) or repeat phrases from the creation narratives (2 Cor. 4:6).

2. The NT presupposes the OT doctrine of creation, but it gains the historical power of faith in the God of creation as it proclaims God's kingdom at hand and dawning in Christ. A key text here is Matt. 6:24–34 (cf. esp. 6:33), which testifies to the vital link between a person's faith in historical salvation ("Seek first. . .") and in creation ("all these things will be given to you as well"). The same is true of the Lord's Prayer (cf. the first three petitions with the fourth).

In the preaching and actions of Jesus, people are brought to unbroken, healing confidence in the Creator. The Sabbath was made for humans (Mk. 2:27 par.). Foods do not defile a person (Matt. 15:11 par.). Fasting is not appropriate in the presence of Jesus (Mk. 2:18–20 par.). In his service there is no lack of life's necessities (Lk. 22:35). Monogamy and the indissolubility of marriage are based on the creation ordinance from the beginning (Mk. 10:6 par.), as against the practice of divorce, which arose later from hardness of heart. Jesus does not succumb to the temptation arbitrarily to use the creation in opposition to God's will (Matt. 4:1–11 par.).

Moreover, Jesus demonstrates his creative power in the so-called nature miracles (the feeding miracles, walking on the water, and stilling the storm). In his exorcisms, healings, and raising of the dead, his creative power is exercised for the benefit of those who belong to a fallen creation. Thus the whole creation needs the gospel of Christ (cf. Mk. 16:15).

3. It is therefore a necessary consequence of the self-revelation of God that the post-resurrection confession of faith should include worship of the ascended one, who now sits at God's right hand, as the original mediator of creation (Jn. 1:1–3; 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2, 10). The whole creation was made through him and with him in view (Jn. 1:3, 9–12). It has its basis (Rev. 3:14) and its goal in him (Heb. 1:11–12).

4. References in Paul's letters to the doctrine of creation may be grouped into (a) those regarding the nature of the first creation, and (b) those that have as their subject the new creation, kainē ktisis, which has begun in Christ.

(a) The Creator alone is worthy of worship and veneration; the creature is limited by the fact that it is created. Where worship is nevertheless offered to creatures, God gives up those who have thus transgressed to their own evil ways (Rom. 1:24–28). Since the creation (ktisis) of the world, God's invisible nature has been clearly seen and recognized in his works (1:20; cf. Wis. 13:5), so that no one has an excuse. Yet all have failed to make use of this opportunity and are therefore dependent on God's free gift in the redemptive work of Jesus Christ (Rom. 3:21–26).

Everything created (ktisma) by God is good, and nothing that God has created is to be rejected. This includes foods, which are to be received with thanks (1 Tim. 4:3–4). However, because of human arrogance and rebellion the creation is in danger of becoming a temptation to humans and of separating them from the love of God in Christ (Rom. 8:39). Since humankind is the pinnacle of creation, the state of the created order is determined by them. All the hopes and longings of every created thing (ktisis) are therefore directed to them. But the created world has become subjected to futility, and it sighs and groans in its sufferings (8:19a, 20, 22).

In a polemical passage (1 Cor. 11:9), Paul bases his teaching on the behavior and role of women in worship on the principle of the original creation, whereby woman was made for man (Gen. 2:18). In Gal. 3:28, however, he declares the equality of the sexes in the unity that exists in Christ. While he ascribes to man an authority that he does not ascribe to woman, he nevertheless asserts their mutual dependence on each other and their joint dependence on God (1 Cor. 11:11–12).

(b) Because of what humans have done, all creatures are dependent on the restoration of a right relationship between God and humans in the created world, which can come about only through his intervention (see Rom. 8:19b). The hope of the final revelation of God's children is also the hope that looks for the liberation of all creatures from their bondage to decay (8:21). Believers are already hidden in Christ (Col. 3:3). Paul can therefore speak with full assurance that when a person belongs to Christ, new creation is a fact (2 Cor. 5:17). Former things that hitherto determined life have passed away.

In Christ the old privileges that people use to erect barriers between themselves (e.g., circumcision and uncircumcision) are no longer valid. Only belonging to him counts—the new creation; the past has been canceled by the cross. Therefore the world, as the embodiment of the old creation, is unable to make any claims on Christ. Christians cannot live in dependence on the world; they are dead to each other (Gal. 6:14–15.).

Similarly, in Eph. 2:15 the removal by Christ of the basic distinction among humans is regarded as the decisive act of reconciliation. "One new man" has been created in Christ, who now stands before God representing all humans, so we must see ourselves as his workmanship (2:10). We must "put on the new self, created to be like God" (4:24). Whereas the old self was characterized by acts that destroy fellowship with God and with other people, the new self is marked by a new knowledge emanating from God's will. This knowledge allows us to become truly an image of our Creator in acts of neighborly love (Col. 3:10–12). The new self accepts the rightness of God's gracious verdict on us, is separated for service to him in holiness, and lives in dependence on him who is the truth, i.e., Christ (Eph. 4:24).

5. The occasional references in the General Letters to the old creation and the new are essentially no different from Paul's. Christians are "the firstfruits of all [God] created," having been born again through "the word of truth" (Jas. 1:18). Heb. emphasizes God's eternal creative power; someday, all his creatures will have to give account of their actions (4:13; cf. Rom. 1:20b). Heb. also stresses the infinite superiority of the new covenant over the old. The worship center for the old covenant belongs to this present created order; it is made with hands. The sphere of operation of the one heavenly high priest, Christ, is not subject to such limitation (9:11). Peter attributes the ability of Christians to put their life at God's disposal for good works, even if this means suffering, to the faithfulness of the Creator (1 Pet. 4:19).

The interpretation of ktisis in 1 Pet. 2:13 is debated. But seeing that ktisis can mean the act by which an authoritative body is created and hence also the result of that act, the word there probably means authority or institution. The Christian hope of the return of Christ is defended in 2 Pet. 3:4 against those who maintain that there is a perpetual continuity "since the beginning of creation" and use it to justify their self-assurance.

6. The language of Rev. depicts a visionary anticipation of the creation of the world to come. In hymns and acts of heavenly worship it proclaims what is already true in faith and will one day be objectively true forever (see 21:1–5). He who sits on the throne is worthy to receive glory, honor, and power, for he has created all things and they owe their existence to his will (4:11). Worship and praise from every creature (ktisma, 5:13; cf. 10:6) belong not only to him but also to the Lamb (the crucified and exalted one). Startling in its applicability to the present day is the vision of the death of a third of the creatures (ktismata) in the sea, when a mountain of fire is thrown into it (8:8–9).

See also katabolē, foundation, beginning (2856); dēmiourgos, maker (1321).

3233 (ktisma, created thing, creature), → 3232.

3234 (ktistēs, originator, creator), → 3232.

3236 (kybernēsis, administration), → 4565.

3245 κυλλός — κυλλός (kyllos), crooked, crippled, maimed (3245).

CL & OT The background of kyllos was predominantly medical. It was used of crooked or disabled legs, bent outward by diseases such as rickets or disabled through badly reduced fractures or other forms of surgical accident; also of disabled feet or ears. kyllos does not occur in the LXX or other Gk. versions of the OT or Apocr.

NT kyllos occurs only 4x in the NT. Matt. 15:30–31 does not indicate the type of disability; the persons involved may have been congenitally afflicted or sustained crippling accidents. Matt. 18:8 and Mk. 9:43 describe the voluntary amputation of a hand as a means of forestalling sin from a source that is jeopardizing entry to eternal life. The severing of the hand at the wrist was an ancient oriental method of punishing thieves.

See also chōlos, lame, halt, maimed (6000).

3248 (kyminon, cummin), → 3303.

3257 (kyria, lady, mistress), → 3261.

3258 κυριακός

κυριακός (kyriakos), belonging to the Lord, the Lord's (Supper or Day) (3258).

OT kyriakos, belonging to the Lord, is an adj. derived from kyrios, Lord (3261). This word is not used in the LXX. It does occur in inscriptions and papyri from 68 B.C. with the meaning of belonging to or connected with a lord, a proprietor, or the emperor.

NT 1. kyriakos is used only 2x in the NT. In 1 Cor. 11:20 Paul refers to the kyriakon deipnon, the Lord's Supper, which presumably means "the supper instituted by the Lord" or "belonging to the Lord." It is impossible to partake of the Lord's Supper and thus receive food from him and at the same time to take part in pagan sacrificial meals, whereby one enters into communion with demons (10:19–22). In patristic writings this adj. is used of "the words" of Christ, the covenants, the people, the house, the cross, but most commonly of the Lord's Day.

2. The most likely meaning of the phrase "the Lord's Day" in Rev. 1:10 is the name that has come to be given to the first day of the week. This is definitely the meaning from the late 1st cent. on. It may be taken for granted that the adj. was used here to differentiate it from "the day of the Lord" (2 Thess. 2:2). But since this adj. had already been attached to the Lord's Supper, where it hinted at a special connection with Christ in its institution, it may well carry something of this meaning in Rev. 1:10.

3. If indeed "the Lord's Day" referred to the Christian Sunday, the first day of the week, in order to see its theological significance we must examine other passages that refer to the first day of the week. The earliest reference appears in 1 Cor. 16:2, where Paul asks the Corinthian Christians to lay something aside on each first day of the week. Although the laying aside was at home, the day's connection with Christian worship would make it easy to remember this duty. This suggests that the first day was becoming the regular day of worship.

In Acts 20:7 we find Paul meeting with the Christians at Troas to break bread, probably the Eucharist, on the first day of the week, even though he was with them for seven days. In the Did. (late 1st cent.), this day was the regular day of worship for the church. The strong emphasis on the first day of the week as the day on which Christ rose from the dead suggests that the theological reason for the change from the seventh to the first day was the resurrection of our Lord (Matt. 28:1; Mk. 16:2; Lk. 24:1; Jn. 20:1).

From the biblical data regarding the OT institution of the Sabbath with its humanitarian and spiritual advantages (→ sabbaton, 4879), of Christ's insistence that it was made for humanity, of Paul's insistence that no day in itself has any special sacredness, and of warnings against legalistic involvement in the Jewish ritual calendar, we may assume that the Christian church was guided by the Holy Spirit to attach the same privileges and blessings of one sacred day of rest in seven to the new Lord's Day.

See also kyrios, Lord (3261); sabbaton, Sabbath (4879).

3259 (kyrieuō, be lord, master, rule), → 3261.

3261 κύριος

κύριος (kyrios), lord, master, owner, Lord (3261); κυρία (kyria), lady, mistress (3257); κυριότης (kyriotēs), lordship, dominion (3262); κυριεύω (kyrieuō), be lord, master, rule (3259); κατακυριεύω (katakyrieuō), rule over, conquer, be master of (2894).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. kyrios is an adj., having power, authoritative, derived from the noun to kyros, power, might. As a subst. kyrios meant lord, ruler, one who has control. kyrios always contains the idea of legality and authority. Anyone occupying a superior position can be referred to as kyrios and be addressed as kyrie (fem. kyria).

(b) In early Gk. kyrios was not used as a divine title. Although the term was applied to the gods, there was no general belief in a personal creator Lord. The gods were not creators and lords of fate but were, like human beings, subject to fate. The Gks. of this period did not feel dependent on a god or personally responsible to the gods. Only insofar as the gods ruled over particular spheres in the world could they be called kyrioi.

(c) The situation was different in the East. The gods created humans who were personally answerable to them. They could intervene in human lives to save, punish, or judge. They also established justice and law, which they communicated to human beings, e.g., through the king. Therefore they were called lords.

(d) Instances of the title kyrios in Hel. times with reference to gods or rulers do not occur until the 1st cent. B.C. kyrios basileus, "lord and king," is found often between 64 and 50 B.C. In 12 B.C. Emperor Augustus was called theos kai kyrios, "god and lord," in Egypt. kyrios was also used of Herod the Great (ca. 73–4 B.C.), Agrippa I (ca. 10 B.C.–A.D. 44), and Agrippa II (A.D. 27–ca. 100). Other high officials also received this title. kyrios was used of the gods who, in contemporary popular thought, were referred to as lords. Where kyrios was used of a god, the servant (→ doulos, 1528) using the term stood in a personal relationship of responsibility to the god. Individual gods were worshiped as lords of their cultic communities and of the separate members of the fellowship. The worship of other lords was not excluded, however, for no god was worshiped as universal lord.

(e) The Roman emperors Augustus (31 B.C.–A.D. 14) and Tiberius (A.D. 14–37) rejected the title kyrios and all that it meant. But Caligula (A.D. 37–41) found the title attractive. During and after the time of Nero (A.D. 54–68), who was described in an inscription as "lord of all the world," the title kyrios occurs more frequently (one of the oldest instances is Acts 25:26). In and of itself the title kyrios does not call the emperor god, but when he is worshiped as divine, the title lord also counts as a divine predicate. It was against such religious claims that the early Christians rejected the totalitarian attitudes of the state.

2. (a) kyrios occurs over 9,000x in the LXX. It translates ʾādôn, lord, which refers 190x to men as the responsible heads of groups (e.g., 1 Sam. 25:10). It is used only 15x for baʿal, which means the owner of a wife or a piece of land (e.g., Jdg. 19:22–23). Yahweh is rarely called owner (Hos. 2:16), but more frequently Lord of the community belonging to him (cf. Ps. 123:2). kyrios can also mean commander or ruler.

(b) In over 6,000 instances, however, kyrios replaces the Heb. proper name of God, the tetragrammaton YHWH (Yahweh). The LXX thus strengthened the tendency to avoid the utterance of God's name and finally to avoid its use altogether. Where kyrios stands for ʾādôn or ʾᵃdōnay as a word relating to God, there is genuine translation; but where it stands for Yahweh, it is an interpretative circumlocution for all that the Heb. text implied by the use of the divine name: Yahweh is Creator and Lord of the whole universe, of humans, Lord of life and death. Above all he is the Lord God of Israel, his covenant people. By choosing kyrios for Yahweh the LXX also emphasizes legal authority. Because Yahweh saved his people from Egypt and chose them as his possession, he is the legitimate Lord of Israel. As Creator Yahweh is also the legitimate Lord of the entire universe, with unlimited control over it.

(c) kyrieuō occurs more than 50x in the LXX, generally with the meaning to rule.

3. In post-OT Jewish lit. kyrios appears as a term for God in Wis. (27x; e.g., 1:1, 7, 9; 2:13), then esp. often in Philo and Josephus. Philo seems to have been unaware that kyrios stood for the tetragrammaton, for he used theos ("God") to indicate the gracious power of God, while kyrios describes God's kingly power.

NT Of the 717x in which kyrios occurs in the NT, the majority are found in Luke's writings (210x) and Paul's letters (275x). This one-sidedness can be explained by the fact that Luke wrote for, and Paul wrote to, people who lived in areas dominated by Gk. culture and language. On the other hand, Mk., more firmly based in Jewish Christian tradition, uses the kyrios title only 18x, and these mostly in quotations. The remaining occurrences of kyrios are spread over the other NT books. The uses of kyrios accords with its varied use in the LXX.

1. The secular use of kyrios. The kyrios stands over against the slave (Matt. 10:24–25; 18:25, 27; 25:19; Lk. 12:36–37, 46; Eph. 6:5, 9; Col. 3:22). kyrios means owner (Matt. 15:27; Mk. 12:9; Lk. 19:33; Gal. 4:1) or employer (Lk. 16:3, 5). The husband faces his wife as kyrios, i.e., as superior (1 Pet. 3:6). kyrios used as a form of address can emphasize the power of a superior over an inferior, but it can also simply be politeness (Matt. 18:21–22; 25:20–26; 27:63; Lk. 13:8; Jn. 12:21; 20:15; Acts 16:30). The term is also used to address angels (10:4; Rev. 7:14) and the unknown in the heavenly vision outside Damascus (Acts 9:5; 22:8, 10; 26:15). A twice-repeated kyrios corresponds to Palestinian usage (Matt. 7:21–22; 25:11; Lk. 6:46).

2. God as the kyrios. God is frequently called kyrios, esp. in the many quotations from the OT in which kyrios stands for Yahweh, corresponding to the custom of pronouncing the title kyrios instead of the tetragrammaton in public reading (e.g., Rom. 4:8 = Ps. 32:2; Rom. 9:28–29 = Isa. 10:22 and 1:9; Rom. 10:16 = Isa. 53:1). In Lk.'s birth narratives kyrios frequently denotes God (e.g., 1:32; 2:9). In the gen. accompanying another word it corresponds to OT usage: e.g., the hand of the kyrios (1:66); the angel of the kyrios (Matt. 1:20); the name of the kyrios (Jas. 5:10); the Spirit of the kyrios (Acts 5:9); the word of the kyrios (Acts 8:25). The formula "says the kyrios" (e.g., Rom. 12:19 = Deut. 32:35) also comes from OT. The formula "our Lord and God" (Rev. 4:11) is reminiscent of the title adopted by Domitian.

Jesus is adopting Jewish forms of speech when he addresses God the Father as "kyrios of heaven and earth" (Matt. 11:25; Lk. 10:21). God is "the Lord of the harvest" (Matt. 9:38). He is the only ruler, the King of kings and the kyrios of lords (cf. Dan. 2:47), who will cause our kyrios Jesus Christ to appear (1 Tim. 6:15). God is the Creator and as such Lord of all (Acts 17:24). By acknowledging God as kyrios, the NT esp. confesses him as Creator—his power revealed in history and his just dominion over the universe.

3. Jesus as the kyrios. (a) The earthly Jesus as kyrios. This word applied to the earthly Jesus is first of all a polite form of address. This no doubt goes back to the title Rabbi (cf. Mk. 9:5 with Matt. 17:4; see also "sir" in Jn. 4:15; 5:7; 6:34). This address also implies recognition of Jesus as a leader and willingness to obey him (Matt. 7:21; 21:29–30). As Son of Man Jesus is also kyrios of the Sabbath; he has control over the holy day of God's people (Mk. 2:28–29). Even after his death and resurrection the words of the earthly Jesus have authority for the Christian community. Paul appeals to words of the kyrios to decide a question (1 Cor. 7:10, cf. 25; 1 Thess. 4:15; cf. Acts 20:35).

(b) The exalted Jesus as kyrios. The confessional cry used in worship, kyrios Iēsous ("Jesus [is] Lord") originated early in the Christian community. This confession is one of the oldest Christian creeds, if not the oldest. Note the Aramaic formula Marana tha (see 1 Cor. 16:22, NIV text note), which means "Lord, come," "Our Lord has come," or "The Lord will come"(cf. Rev. 22:20).

With this confession the NT community submitted itself to its Lord, but at the same time it also confessed him as ruler of the world (Rom. 10:9a; 1 Cor. 12:3; Phil. 2:11). God raised Jesus from the dead and "gave him the name that is above every name" (Phil. 2:9; cf. Isa. 45:23–24), i.e., the name kyrios, and with it the position corresponding to the name. The exalted kyrios rules over humanity (Rom. 14:9, kyrieuō). All powers and beings in the universe must bow before him. When that happens, God the Father will be worshiped (cf. Eph. 1:20–21; 1 Pet. 3:22).

Jesus Christ is called the ruler over all the kings of the earth, King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev. 17:14; 19:15–16). In this way he has received the same titles of honor as God himself (1 Tim. 6:15; cf. Dan. 2:47). According to contemporary Jewish thought, the different spheres of the world in nature and history were ruled by angelic powers. Since Christ has now been raised to the position of kyrios, all powers have been subjected to him and must serve him (Eph. 1:20–21; Col. 2:6, 10). When Christ has overcome every power (1 Cor. 15:25), he will submit himself to God the Father. Thus his lordship will have achieved its goal and God will be all in all (15:28). The one God and the one kyrios Jesus stand in opposition to the many gods and lords of the pagan world (8:5–6; Eph. 4:5–6).

Scriptural evidence for the exaltation of Jesus and for his installation as Lord was found in Ps. 110:1, the most quoted Ps. in the NT (cf., e.g., Matt. 22:44; 26:64; Acts 2:34; Eph. 1:20; Heb. 1:3, 13). The Jewish interpretation of this passage looked forward to the messianic future, but in the faith of the Christians this hope was transferred to the present. The lordship of the Messiah, Jesus, is a present reality. He is exercising in a hidden way God's authority and lordship over the world and will bring it to completion in the future. This faith was articulated in Thomas's confession (Jn. 20:28): "My Lord and my God." Early Christianity saw no infringement of monotheism in the installation of Jesus as Lord, but rather its confirmation (1 Cor. 8:6; Eph. 4:5; Phil. 2:11). It is God who exalted the Lord Jesus (Acts 2:36) and made him Lord of all things.

As far as we can establish, the NT church did not formally reflect on the relationship of the exalted Christ to God the Father as the church did later. Perhaps we can say that there is no developed doctrine of the Trinity in the NT, but that the writers thought in Trinitarian forms.

(c) kyrios and the Lord's Supper. kyrios figures frequently in expressions connected with the Lord's Supper. Note the phrases that are partly pre-Pauline: "the Lord's table" (1 Cor. 10:21), "the Lord's death" (11:26), "the cup of the Lord" (10:21; 11:27), "arouse the Lord's jealousy" (10:22), "the Lord's Supper" (11:20; → kyriakos, 3258), "judged by the Lord" (11:32), and "guilty of sinning against the body and blood of the Lord" (11:27). These expressions indicate that the Lord's Supper is the place where the Christian community submits itself in a special way to the saving work of the kyrios and receives a share in his body and power (see also deipnon, 1270).

(d) kyrios and Spirit. Paul taught the Christian community to distinguish between the one who is speaking in the Holy Spirit and the one who is not (1 Cor. 12:3). A person can only say "Jesus is Lord" if he or she is filled with the Holy Spirit. Anyone who, by acknowledging allegiance to Jesus as kyrios, belongs to the new covenant, belongs to the sphere of the Spirit and no longer to that of the old covenant and of the letter. Such a one stands in freedom: "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom" (2 Cor. 3:17).

(e) kyrios in epistolary greetings. In the opening greetings of Paul's letters the "Lord Jesus Christ" is frequently mentioned beside God the Father (e.g., Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3). The concluding greeting, with the phrase "the grace of the kyrios Jesus be with you," continued the pre-Pauline tradition that may have had its origin in the Lord's Supper (cf. 1 Cor. 16:23; 2 Cor. 13:14; Phlm. 25). The description of God as the "Father of our kyrios Jesus Christ" goes back to the early Christian community (Rom. 15:6; 2 Cor. 1:3; 11:31; cf. 1 Pet. 1:3). The formula was introduced into an originally Jewish context (the praise of God). Christian missionaries did not just call people to faith in God the Father but also to faith in the kyrios Jesus (Acts 5:14; 18:8).

4. The lordship of the kyrios. (a) The activity of the church before the kyrios Jesus. In every expression of its life the Christian community stands before the kyrios who has authority and exercises it over the community (1 Cor. 4:19; 14:37; 16:7). He causes the community to grow (1 Thess. 3:12–13), bestows authority on the apostles (2 Cor. 10:8; 13:10), and gives different ministries to the members of his body, the church (1 Cor. 3:5; 7:17; 12:5). The kyrios also gives visions and revelations (2 Cor. 12:1). The whole life of the Christian community is determined by its relationship to the kyrios (Rom. 14:8). The body, i.e., the complete earthly existence of the Christian, belongs to the kyrios; this precludes dealings with prostitutes (1 Cor. 6:13–17).

The kyrios gives to each one the measure of faith (1 Cor. 3:5; 7:17; Eph. 4:5). He is the kyrios of peace and gives peace (2 Thess. 3:16), mercy (2 Tim. 1:16), and insight (2:7). On the basis of faith in the kyrios Christ, even earthly relationships between masters and slaves take on a new aspect. Faithful service of earthly masters (kyrioi) is service of the kyrios of the church (Col. 3:22–24; cf. 1 Pet. 2:13).

(b) The formulae "through" and "in" the kyrios. The formula "through the [our] Lord Jesus [Christ]" occurs in the most varied contexts: e.g., thanksgiving (Rom. 7:25; 1 Cor. 15:57), praise (Rom. 5:11), and exhortation (15:30; 1 Thess. 4:2). In such phrases kyrios is used in order to claim the power of the exalted Lord for the life of the church and of the individual.

The phrase "in the Lord" occurs esp. in Paul and means the same as "in Jesus Christ," e.g., in the Lord: a door was opened for mission (2 Cor. 2:12), Paul affirms and exhorts (Eph. 4:17; 1 Thess. 4:1), Paul is convinced (Rom. 14:14), people are received (16:2; Phil. 2:29), and the church is to rejoice (3:1), stand firm (4:1), and greet one another (Rom. 16:22; 1 Cor. 16:19). Christians are to marry in the Lord (7:39), be strong in the Lord (Eph. 6:10), and walk in the Lord (Col. 2:6). People are chosen (Rom. 16:13) and loved (16:8; 1 Cor. 4:17) in the Lord; in him their work is not in vain (15:58). The whole of life, in both the present and the future, is determined by the fact of Christ expressed by this formula: Paul and his churches stand in the presence and under the power of the kyrios.

(c) Statements about the Parousia. At present Christians are separated from the kyrios and long to be with him (2 Cor. 5:6, 8). Those who are alive at the Second Coming will be caught up to meet the kyrios (1 Thess. 4:17). Thus, the NT church looks forward to the future, visible return of Christ and to a final union with the Lord of life and death. We read about the day of the Lord (1 Cor. 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor. 1:14; 1 Thess. 5:2; 2 Thess. 2:2), "the coming [parousia] of our kyrios" (2 Thess. 2:1), and the "appearing [epiphaneia] of our kyrios" (1 Tim. 6:14). When he comes, the exalted kyrios is Judge (2 Thess. 1:9; 2:8) and Savior (Phil. 3:20).

5. Derivatives of kyrios. (a) kyria (fem. of kyrios) means lady, owner, mistress of the house. In the NT it occurs only in 2 Jn. 1, 5, where it refers to the church (cf. v. 13, where the churches are sisters and their members children). In addressing the church as "lady," the author is expressing his respect for it and honors it as a work of the kyrios.

(b) kyriotēs, lordly power or position, dominion. In the NT this word occurs in the pl. with reference to angelic powers (Eph. 1:20–21; Col. 1:16). The NT letters stress that the exalted Christ rules over these dominions. kyriotēs occurs in the sing. in Jude 8 and 2 Pet. 2:10, where the thought is not of angels but of God's dominion.

(c) kyrieuō, be a lord, act as master. In the NT this vb. occurs 7x. The rule of kings over their people is characterized by ambition (Lk. 22:25), because they misuse their power for selfish ends; the disciples are to seek rather to serve, as Jesus did (22:26–27). Paul uses kyrieuō to describe relationships of power. Because Christ has risen, death no longer has any power over him (Rom. 6:9). Christ died and rose in order that he might reign over the living and the dead (14:9). God is the ruler of those who rule (1 Tim. 6:15). Since Christians have been baptized into Jesus' death and have risen with him (Rom. 6:3–4), sin must not reign over them any longer (6:14). For they no longer stand under law but under grace (7:1, 6). Paul does not want to lord it over the faith of the Corinthians but to work with them for their joy (2 Cor. 1:24).

(d) katakyrieuō, rule over, conquer. The prefix kata- has a negative force. In the NT the word occurs 4x. It is a characteristic of Gentile rulers to exercise their rule to their own advantage and contrary to the interests and well-being of the people (Matt. 20:25; Mk. 10:42). The vb. also describes the man with an evil spirit who leaped on the seven sons of Sceva and "overpowered" them (Acts 19:16) as they attempted to imitate Christian exorcism. Finally, Peter exhorts elders not to exercise their office by lording it over the congregation, but to be examples to the flock (1 Pet. 5:2–3).

See also theos, God (2536); Emmanouēl, Immanuel (1842); despotēs, lord, master (of a house), owner (1305); kyriakos, belonging to the Lord, the Lord's (3258).

3262 (kyriotēs, lordship, dominion), → 3261.

3263 κυρόω

κυρόω (kyroō), confirm, ratify, make valid (3263); προκυρόω (prokyroō), establish, confirm beforehand (4623).

CL & OT kyroō, from kyros, means authority or validity. It expresses the thought of ratifying and making firm in all sorts of contexts. In the LXX this word occurs 3x, 2x times in the pass. voice of confirming possession (Gen. 23:20; Lev. 25:30; cf. also 4 Macc. 7:9).

NT In Gal. 3:15, 17, both kyroō and prokyroō appear in connection with the ratification of a will. In 2 Cor. 2:8 Paul uses the former word in his plea to the Corinthians to "reaffirm" their love for an errant brother.

See also bebaios, sure (1010); themelios, foundation (2529); asphaleia, firmness, certainty (854).

3266 κωλύω

κωλύω (kōlyō), hamper, hinder, prevent, restrain, forbid (3266).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. kōlyō originally meant to cut short, then to hinder. There are familiar idioms connected with this vb., such as ti kōlyei, why not? and ouden kōlyei, proceed by all means.

2. The vb. occurs 33x in the LXX, of which 19 are in the Apocr. Its basic meaning is to hinder (cf. Job 12:15; Ezek. 31:15); it is used mostly in the sense of restrain, withhold. The subj. of the vb. can be God (1 Sam. 25:26; Ezek. 31:15) or people (e.g., Moses, Num. 11:28; the writer, Ps. 40:9; 119:101), while the obj. of the vb. can be people (Gen. 23:6; Num. 11:28; Ps. 119:101) and things (e.g., wind or water, Job 12:15; Eccl. 8:8; Ezek. 31:15). The contexts can be either secular (e.g., Gen. 23:6) or religious.

NT 1. kōlyō occurs 23x in the NT, most often in Lk.'s writings. Besides a purely secular use in connection with tax evasion (Lk. 23:2), he has also a theological use. (a) From the point of view of the object, the hindering relates mostly to people: Soldiers are prevented from killing Paul (Acts 27:43); children are prevented from coming to Jesus (Mk. 10:14); Paul was prevented from going to Rome (Rom. 1:13) and from continuing his mission (1 Thess. 2:16). In 1 Cor. 14:39 one notes an exception, since what is not to be prohibited is speaking in tongues.

(b) There are a variety of subjects of this vb.: a Roman centurion (Acts 24:23; 27:43), disciples (Mk. 10:14), a believer (Lk. 6:29), the Holy Spirit (Acts 16:6), circumstances (Rom. 1:13), or death (Heb. 7:23).

(c) Most frequently, the vb. relates to the preaching of the gospel (Acts 16:6; Rom. 1:13; 1 Thess. 2:16; in a wider sense, 1 Cor. 14:39). In Acts 16:6 Paul is prevented by the Holy Spirit from preaching the gospel in the Roman province of Asia. Here Luke demonstrates God's leading along the road toward Europe. In Lk. 11:52 Jesus condemns the experts in the law for hindering people from knowledge of the law (Matt. 23:13 has "kingdom of heaven" and kleiō, shut [see 3090], here).

2. It is striking that both Paul (implied in Rom. 1:13) and Luke (cf. Acts 16:6) see the ultimate origin of hindrances affecting Christians not in the actions of people but in God himself (or his Spirit, or Jesus). However, a disciple's own decisions and actions clearly affect whether his or her faith is able to grow and develop or whether it is constricted and hindered (cf. 1 Cor. 9:4, 7–18; 1 Pet. 3:7). The same applies to the church as a whole.

3. An important use of this vb. developed in the idea of withholding baptism. As early as the 1st cent., kōlyō became the technical term for refusing or not refusing baptism—due in part, perhaps, to this vb.'s being used in connection with baptism in the NT (Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17). Mk. 10:14 and par. Matt. 10:13; Lk. 18:15–16 were regularly used in arguments against scruples over infant baptism.

See also enkoptō, hinder, thwart (1601).

3273 κωφός

κωφός (kōphos), deaf, dumb (3273).

CL & OT kōphos has the general sense of blunt or dull in cl. Gk., but more specifically can mean either deaf or dumb. In Jewish usage kōphos means dumb in Wis. 10:21 and deaf in Exod. 4:11; Ps. 38:13; Isa. 43:8. A fig. use of this word is applied to idols in Hab. 2:18.

NT kōphos is found only in the Gospels. In Mk. 7:32, 37 the word must mean deaf since the text also uses the rare word mogilalos (having a speech impediment) and the miracle includes the gift of hearing (7:35). In 9:25 kōphos is used for a demon-possessed boy. This spirit was dumb (alalos, 9:17), and, in addressing it, Jesus also calls it kōphos, implying deafness. In Matt. 11:5; Lk. 7:22, part of the evidence demonstrating the reality of Jesus' messiahship to John the Baptist is the fact that the kōphoi hear.

But kōphos can also signify dumbness. In Matt. 9:32–33; 12:22; Lk. 11:14 the criticism that Jesus heals by devilish power is prompted by the healing of a man who was kōphos but who now speaks (cf. Matt. 15:30–31). In Lk. 1:22, Zechariah's vision in the temple renders him unable to speak (kōphos).

Λ lambda

3275 λαγχάνω

λαγχάνω (lanchanō), obtain by lot, draw lots for (3275).

CL & OT The basic cl. meaning of lanchanō is obtain something by lot. At Athens, both political offices and permission to bring suits in the law courts were awarded by lot. More broadly, the word denotes getting anything as if by lot, i.e., out of the blue—by chance rather than by one's effort. In the LXX the vb. is used of Saul's obtaining the monarchy, which he did by God's appointment (1 Sam. 14:47; cf. also Wis. 8:19; 3 Macc. 6:1).

NT In Jn. 19:24 lanchanō appears in the nonclassical sense of casting lots for Jesus' coat. Otherwise, it indicates divine appointment irrespective of personal quality. In Lk. 1:9 Zechariah obtains by lot the honor of offering incense in the Holy Place of the temple. In Acts 1:17 Peter refers to Judas's having obtained through Christ's choice a share in the apostolic ministry. In 2 Pet. 1:1 Peter addresses those (presumably Gentiles) who have obtained by grace "a faith as precious as ours."

See also kathistēmi, bring, appoint (2770); horizō, determine, appoint (3988); paristēmi, place, put at the disposal of (4225); procheirizō, determine, appoint (4741); tassō, arrange, appoint (5435); tithēmi, put, place, set, appoint (5502); prothesmia, appointed date (4607); cheirotoneō, appoint (5936).

3278 (lailaps, a tempestuous wind), → 847.

3281 (laleō, to talk, chat, speak), → 3364.

3284 λαμβάνω

λαμβάνω (lambanō), take, receive (3284); ἀναλαμβάνω (analambanō), take up, take to oneself (377); ἀνάλημψις (analēmpsis), reception (378); ἐπιλαμβάνομαι (epilambanomai), lay hold of, grasp, catch (2138); καταλαμβάνω (katalambanō), seize, grasp, attain, make one's own, take possession (2898); μεταλαμβάνω (metalambanō), receive a share (3561); μετάλημψις (metalēmpsis), sharing, receiving (3562); παραλαμβάνω (paralambanō), take to oneself, take with or along, take over (4161); προλαμβάνω (prolambanō), anticipate, take, get (4624); προσλαμβάνω (proslambanō), take, receive or accept into one's society (4689); πρόσλημψις (proslēmpsis), admission, acceptance (4691); ὑπολαμβάνω (hypolambanō), take up, think, assume, be of the opinion that (5696); ἀπολαμβάνω (apolambanō), receive, get back (655); ἀνεπίλημπτος (anepilēmptos), above reproach, without blame (455).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. lambanō originally meant to take or grasp. It can indicate both benevolent and hostile actions and have as obj. either people or things; e.g., take a wife, collect taxes, accept a verdict, take a road, and fig. take courage. Fear or terror can also seize a person. lambanō also came to mean to receive; it was used to embrace all areas of life, from simple things to spiritual benefit.

(b) The compounds strengthen or enlarge the basic meaning. analambanō means receive up (on) high, receive to oneself; the corresponding noun, analēmpsis, means lifting or taking up. hypolambanō means take up from below, take hold, and mentally apprehend, believe, hold an opinion. epilambanō means to lay hold of, occupy, assist; mid. obtain for oneself. katalambanō strengthens the original intention and means to seize, take a firm grip, attack; mid. seize for oneself; mental apprehension is basically appropriation and understanding. metalambanō means to gain a share in, get, receive; metalēmpsis denotes participation, acceptance. prolambanō means take in advance, forestall. proslambanō means to take in addition, draw in; mid. take aside, admit; the corresponding noun is proslēmpsis, admission, acceptance. paralambanō means to draw someone to oneself, take over an office or a thing.

2. (a) lambanō and its compounds occur frequently in the LXX, mostly translating lāqaḥ; the act. meaning of take dominates: e.g., take a sword (Gen. 34:25) or a wife (4:19). In Exod. 15:15, trembling seizes the leaders of Moab. The pass. meaning of receive is rarer: e.g., receive presents, bribes (1 Sam. 8:3), or an office or reward (Ps. 109:8; Prov. 11:21).

(b) The following compounds may be mentioned. analambanō is used regularly in the LXX; it is theologically significant in the aor. pass. for the translation of Enoch (Sir. 49:14) and of Elijah (2 Ki. 2:11; Sir. 48:9; 1 Macc. 2:58). The LXX uses epilambanō in its basic meaning of holding or taking hold in 2 Sam. 13:11; Isa. 3:6; Jer. 31:32 = LXX 38:32; Zech. 14:13. katalambanō describes God's holding grip. God's hand takes hold of the world (Isa. 10:14). He traps humans (Job 5:13) and comprehends the incomprehensible (34:24). Humans ask how they are to conceive of God and lay hold of his righteousness and wisdom, i.e., make it their possession (Sir. 15:1; 27:8). The powers of destruction also clutch at humankind and attack them (Gen. 19:19; Num. 32:33). proslambanō denotes the way in which God draws his people or elect out of danger and destitution to himself (Ps. 18:16; 27:10; 65:4; 73:24; Wis. 17:11).

(c) paralambanō has a distinct meaning in Hellenism and Jud. It means to receive and indicates the way one takes over a tradition, whether the teaching and training of a philosopher or the mysteries and rites of the mystery religions. In Jud. tradition limited itself to the Torah and its exegesis (cf. Mk. 7:4). The rabbis, too, passed on certain subject matter in teaching under conditions of strict secrecy in order to prevent misunderstandings amongst the religiously impure.

NT 1. In the NT lambanō is attested 258x, esp. in Matt., John, and Rev. (a) This vb. has a broad range of meaning: to take (in an act. sense), e.g., bread, lamps, the tithe, and (fig.) one's cross upon oneself (Matt. 10:38) or the form of a servant (Phil. 2:7). It also means to remove or take possession of, e.g., remove money (Matt. 28:15), diseases (8:17, cf. Isa. 53:4), a crown (Rev. 3:11), peace from the earth (6:4). In a theological context Jesus has the power to take his life back again (Jn. 10:18). The enemy also has the ability to attack people's lives (cf. Matt. 21:35–39) or to seize the sick (Lk. 9:39). Emotions take control of people (5:26; 7:16). Further, lambanō has the sense of to admit someone into a house; also to receive Jesus (Jn. 1:12; 5:43; 13:20) or to receive his words (12:48; 17:8).

(b) In a more pass. sense lambanō means to receive: e.g., a bite, money, alms. It is important with theological objects: eternal life (Mk. 10:30), the Spirit (Jn. 7:39), grace (Rom. 1:5), condemnation (Mk. 12:40), forgiveness (Acts 10:43), and mercy (Heb. 4:16). lambanō is also used as a circumlocution for the pass.; e.g., receive edification, be edified (1 Cor. 14:5).

This vb. is theologically significant: God gives, and humans receive. (i) Jesus received his commission, the Spirit, and power (Jn. 10:18; Acts 2:33; Rev. 2:27). He is God's gift and lives by receiving. In taking the form of a servant (Phil. 2:7) and taking away our infirmities (cf. Matt. 8:17 with reference to Isa. 53), he took on himself the death of a sinner and fulfilled the commission he received from the Father (Jn. 10:18). So too in resurrection and exaltation: The crucified one is worthy to receive "power and wealth and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and praise" (Rev. 5:12).

(ii) Only when we receive do we find ourselves and stand within the God-given order and plan that Jesus Christ reveals. For those who hear the witness of Jesus, the acceptance of that word decides over life and death. At this point, Jn. distinguishes the various objects that are received, accepted, or laid hold of. Those who receive the martyria, the witness of Jesus, set their seal to this "that God is truthful" (Jn. 3:33). Those who accept Jesus' words gain knowledge of his revelation: Jesus comes from God and receives his life from God (17:8; cf. 1 Cor. 2:12). So Jesus himself, who is the Word of God, can become the obj. of believing acceptance. Those who receive him have a share of his inexhaustible grace and receive the Holy Spirit (Jn. 1:16; 7:39; 20:22). Those who do not accept him, i.e., do not recognize or acknowledge him, will be judged (12:48). That same word of Jesus will be judge on the last day.

(iii) For Paul lambanō means sharing in the fulfillment of the promise in Christ (Gal. 3:14), receiving the Spirit (Rom. 8:15), and receiving grace and the gift of righteousness (5:17), just as he himself received his apostleship as a special token of God's grace (1:5). Although poor in God's sight, those who receive are exceedingly rich (1 Cor. 4:7), for when they accept, they receive salvation, fellowship with Christ, and life in the future world (Phil. 3:12–14).

2. The compounds analambanō and hypolambanō develop the aspect of taking up. (a) analambanō means to take with or take up, take someone on board (Acts 20:13–14; 2 Tim. 4:11). Paul's command to "put on [take up] the full armor of God" it is a powerful picture of the active fight of believers against the powers of darkness (Eph. 6:13; cf. also 6:16). In the aor. pass. the vb. is used of the ascension of the resurrected one (Acts 1:11; 1 Tim. 3:16). analēmpsis, lifting up high, being taken up, is found in the NT only in Lk. 9:51 and is generally interpreted of Christ's ascension, but analēmpsis can also mean death, decease. Both ideas are implied in the NT expectation of Jesus' death, since the death includes the exaltation of the Lord.

(b) hypolambanō occurs 5x in the NT: e.g., Acts 1:9: "a cloud hid [took] him from their sight." This taking suggests a taking up from below. In 3 Jn. 8 the author exhorts that strangers are to be taken up, i.e., offered hospitality and cared for. When extended to mental processes hypolambanō can mean pick up someone's words (Lk. 10:30), imagine (Acts 2:15).

3. The compounds epilambanomai and katalambanō intensify the original meaning of the word and mean seize. (a) epilambanomai denotes both violent apprehension and trustful holding of the hand. For example, Paul is seized by his opponents (Acts 17:19; cf. 9:27; 16:19; 18:17; 21:30, 33; 23:19). Fig. epilambanomai means to catch somebody in speech, such as when Jesus' opponents attempt to catch him in his words (Lk. 20:20). Jesus touched the blind, children, and a man with dropsy (Mk. 8:23; Lk. 9:47; 14:4), and he stretched out his hand to Peter as he began to sink (Matt. 14:31). Paul finds epilambanomai the right word for characterizing the movement of faith as directed to eternal life: "Take hold of . . . eternal life" (1 Tim. 6:12). anepilēmptos, irreproachable (1 Tim. 3:2; 5:7; cf. 6:14), is a qualification for bishops and church members in their care of widows.

(b) katalambanō in the NT designates the attack of evil powers as well as the grip of Christ on people. The boy with epilepsy was attacked by a dumb spirit and dashed to the ground (Mk. 9:18). The darkness has not received the light, i.e., has neither accepted nor comprehended Christ (Jn. 1:5, cf. 1:11); darkness overtakes those who do not have Christ (12:35). Paul warns his readers against a false reliance on their faith in light of the coming day of the Lord (1 Thess. 5:4). On the positive side, katalambanō marks the hold of Christ on a believer. Paul has been apprehended by Jesus Christ; he is Christ's possession and therefore is stretching out toward the goal of the high calling (Phil. 3:12–13). Only someone who has been laid hold of strives to obtain the victor's imperishable crown of eternal life (1 Cor. 9:24). The mid. of katalambanomai denotes grasping truth, by which one may recognize God's hidden actions (Acts 4:13; 10:34; 25:25). In Rom. 9:30 the Gentiles attain righteousness, even though they have not pursued it, and in Eph. 3:18 the believer comprehends the extent of God's love.

4. metalambanō (7x) and metalēmpsis (only in 1 Tim. 4:3) indicate participation in physical and spiritual benefits. Food is taken and eaten (Acts 2:46; 27:33; cf. 2 Tim. 2:6); God created it to be "received with thanksgiving" (1 Tim. 4:3). The earth "receives the blessing of God" (Heb. 6:7). God waits for the Yes that responds to his offer, for the obedience and thankfulness that respond to the giver and his gifts. Heb. 6:4–8 includes the warning that a blessing that has been received is forfeited forever by an act of conscious apostasy from Christ. Every kind of discipline serves toward our participation in God's holiness (12:10).

5. In prolambanō the temporal significance of pro is retained, for the woman anointed Jesus with the jar of perfume in advance of his death (Mk. 14:8). Her action was a prophetic sign of his death and a substitute for anointing the entire body. In 1 Cor. 11:21 certain individuals were going ahead of others with their own meals at the Lord's Supper; Paul condemns their actions as unworthy. In Gal. 6:1 Paul encourages clemency toward a sinner, if one "is caught in a sin." The pro here suggests that the sinner has been forcibly laid hold of by sin without thinking. Thus, Paul requests gentleness and brotherly assistance.

6. proslambanō is found in the NT only in the mid. It means to take along (Acts 17:5), take (of food, 27:33, 36), and take aside to engage in an intense personal conversation (Mk. 8:32; cf. Matt. 16:22; Acts 18:26). This vb. has a theological importance when it means admit into fellowship: "God has accepted" someone who is weak in faith (Rom. 14:3). Paul exhorts the Romans to seek out those who have a weak faith, because strong and weak are equally accepted into fellowship with God through Christ's death (15:7). Even for Jews, who by their rejection of Christ are rejected from salvation, Paul anticipates their proslēmpsis, acceptance, by God (11:15).

7. In the Gospels and Acts paralambanō is frequently followed by the acc. of person, i.e., take someone with oneself, choose out from a large number, offer fellowship to a chosen one, or introduce a particular plan. Thus Jesus took to himself three disciples in order to reveal himself to them (Matt. 17:1; 20:17; 26:37; cf. Mk. 5:40). He "came to that which was his own, but his own did not receive him" (Jn. 1:11). But for believers there stands the promise: "I will come back and take you to be with me" (14:3).

Paul further uses paralambanō to denote the acceptance of mental and spiritual benefits and refers to the receiving of teaching and ethical traditions passed down to others, among which are the words of institution of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:23), the exhortation of Phil. 4:9, "the word of God" (1 Thess. 2:13), the "gospel" (1 Cor. 15:1–3), and Jesus Christ as Lord (Col. 2:6).

paralambanō is also used in the sayings about the two men in the field and the two women grinding at the mill—one being taken and the other left (Matt. 24:40–41; Lk. 17:34–35). The point of these sayings is to encourage the hearers to watch and be ready for the coming of the Son of Man (cf. Matt. 24:39, 44; Lk. 17:22–30), for no one knows the hour. Just as when the flood came only Noah and his family were prepared, so the coming of the Son of Man will find people engaged in identical activities, but some will be ready and others not. paralambanō is also used generally for taking someone along (e.g., Matt. 2:13–14, 20–21; 17:1; Lk. 9:28), including the spirit that took seven other spirits to help him (11:26).

8. apolambanō means: to receive (e.g., adoption, Gal. 4:5; rewards and punishments, Lk. 23:41; Rom. 1:27; Col. 3:24; 2 Jn. 8); to receive in return, get back (the same amount, Lk. 6:34; the lost son, 15:27); and to take aside (Mk. 7:33).

See also dechomai, take, receive, accept (1312).

3286 (lampas, torch, lamp), → 3290.

3287 (lampros, beaming, bright, shining, radiant, gleaming, beautiful), → 3290.

3288 (lamprotēs), brilliance, splendor, large-heartedness), → 3290.

3289 (lamprōs, brilliantly, splendidly, sumptuously), → 3290.

3290 λάμπω

λάμπω (lampō), shine (3290); λαμπάς (lampas), torch, lamp (3286); λαμπρός (lampros), beaming, bright, shining, radiant, gleaming, beautiful (3287); λαμπρότης (lamprotēs), brilliance, splendor, large-heartedness (3288); λαμπρῶς (lamprōs), brilliantly, splendidly, sumptuously (3289); ἐκλάμπω (eklampō), shine forth (1719); περιλάμπω (perilampō), surround with light (4334).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. lampō is generally intrans. and means to shine. In its lit. sense it refers to sources of light such as the sun, lightning, a torch, or a lamp. But it is frequently used fig. in reference to humans, e.g., eyes flashing with anger, shining faces, radiant beauty. The compound perilampō means to surround with light, while eklampō means to shine forth, e.g., of the sun. The noun lampas means a torch or a lamp (i.e., an oil-vessel with a wick). lamprotēs, by contrast, is abstract, meaning brilliance, or fig. large-heartedness. Finally, the adj. lampros means beaming, gleaming, shining white, and the adv. lamprōs means brilliantly, splendidly, sumptuously.

(b) While in its primary sense lampō describes the function of light (phōs) in illuminating darkness, used metaphorically it can refer to a shining hero striking fear into human hearts. Justice and certain virtues are also said to shine forth.

2. In the LXX lampō and eklampō can mean both to shine, illumine. lampas means torch (Gen. 15:17; Jdg. 7:16, 20; 15:4–5); it was used in the OT to describe something of brilliant or dazzling appearance, such as the undulating light in the midst of the four creatures (Ezek. 1:13; cf. Dan. 10:6). In Nah. 2:4 the word describes the gleaming of chariots; in Job 41:19, the exhalations of Leviathan; in Isa. 62:1, the visible manifestation of Israel's deliverance among the nations. In Zech. 12:6 the clans of Judah are likened to a flaming torch that ignites sheaves.

These words are important theologically since, in certain contexts, God manifests himself as light and hence as a source of illumination. For the most part the radiance of his glory (→ doxa, 1518) is represented in terms of man-made or natural luminaries. Thus flaming torches indicate the presence of God (Gen. 15:17; Ezek. 1:13; cf. Exod. 19:18; 24:17). In Zech. 4:1–10 the vision of the seven-branched candlestick with lamps symbolizes the eyes of the Lord that survey the whole earth. Certainly the seven-branched lampstand (Exod. 25:31–40) is a symbol of life and light; to the godly, it points back to God as the source of all blessings. Even Job 41:10–34 fits this context of ideas, for Leviathan, pictured as a crocodile spitting out sparks of fire (41:19), is an impressive illustration of the power and greatness of the Creator.

Hence in the OT lightning, flaming torches, and lamps frequently accompany a theophany or draw attention to Yahweh's glory. There is also a close connection between flaming torches and divine judgment (cf. Num. 16:35), an association vividly portrayed in Zech. 12:6, where the princes of Israel, as instruments of divine justice, are compared to flaming torches ready to consume Israel's enemies (cf. Nah. 2:4). The future of the covenant people is radiant with light and life (cf. Ps. 36:9), while that of the godless is dark (Prov. 4:18–19).

NT 1. In the NT, words in this word group occur a total of 30x, mostly in Matt. and Rev. The words are used in their lit. sense to denote the shining of the sun (Acts 26:13; cf. 2 Cor. 4:6, where Paul stresses the creative act of God in causing light to break forth); also of lightning (Lk. 17:24; cf. Rev. 8:10) and of a light on a lampstand (Matt. 5:15–16). The pl. of lampas is used both for torches (Jn. 18:3; cf. Rev. 8:10) and for oil lamps (Matt. 25:1–4, 7–8; Acts 20:8).

2. The adj. lampros can denote the magnificence of a garment, indicating affluence or luxury (Jas. 2:2–3; cf. Lk. 23:11; Rev. 19:8). It also pictures the faded splendor of the prostitute of Babylon (18:14), or, adverbially, the luxurious living of the rich man in Lk. 16:19. In these passages the words begin to have metaphorical significance, for true splendor comes only from heaven. Thus Paul, on his way to Damascus, is suddenly surrounded by a light "brighter than the sun" (Acts 26:13); similarly, in Lk. 2:9, the shepherds are surrounded with the radiance of angels, who appear as shining figures in a blaze of light (cf. Acts 10:30; 12:7; Rev. 15:6).

3. Supremely it is Jesus Christ himself who was so transfigured by divine radiance that his face shone (lampō) like the sun and his garments became gleaming white (Matt. 17:2; cf. Mk. 9:2–3; Lk. 9:29). John sees Jesus as the "bright Morning Star" (Rev. 22:16). As the lightning illuminates the whole sky, so will it be at Christ's Parousia (Lk. 17:24): "Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. 13:43, alluding to Dan. 12:3). Until then Christ's disciples have the task of shining like lights on a lampstand (Matt. 5:15–16; cf. Rev. 1:12, 20; 2:1), which is made possible only by sharing with Paul in the experience of 2 Cor. 4:6.

See also lychnos, lamp, light (3394); phainō, shine (5743); emphanizō, reveal, make known (1872); phōs, light, brilliance, brightness (5890).

3295 λαός

λαός (laos), people (3295).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. laos first meant a number of men, a crowd, esp. an army, a military company. Later this meaning disappeared, and the word meant the common people, population; in the pl., the multitude of individuals out of whom the people is made up.

2. (a) In the LXX laos occurs about 2,000x. The pl. (approx. 140x) always means nations and so is synonymous with ethnos (→ 1620). laos sometimes means the people in contrast to the ruler or ruling class (cf. Gen. 41:40; 47:21; Exod. 1:22; Jer. 23:34). Even the dead can be termed laos (Gen. 25:8; 49:33). Such passages are not, however, typical.

(b) To the translators of the LXX the term laos, infrequently used in the Gk. of their time, seemed ideally suited for expressing the special relationship of Israel to Yah-

weh. laos serves in the overwhelming majority of cases as a translation of the Heb. ʿam and means Israel as the chosen people of God, just as the Heb. gôy is used esp. for the Gentiles (ethnē).

In one of the oldest passages in the OT (the song of Deborah), the expression "the people of the LORD" means the army, the levy of the people as they march down to battle (Jdg. 5:11, 13; cf. also 2 Sam. 1:12, where the NIV translates ʿam by "army"). As the nation developed, however, the entire people became known as laos. About 10x Israel is called the "people of the LORD." In another 300x we find the phrase "my people," where "my" refers to Yahweh (e.g., Exod. 3:7, 10; cf. also "your people" in 5:23).

(c) In the prophetic crisis, when the relationship between Yahweh and the people has been broken (Isa. 1:3; 5:25), Yahweh turns in words of judgment and threats against "my people Israel" (Amos 7:8, 15; 8:2). To fall away and follow Baal is all the more serious to Yahweh, because for him Israel is "my people" (Hos. 4:6–12). Thus the exhortation addressed to them is, "Return to your God" (12:6). Hosea's third child is called lō'-ʿammî (LXX ou-laos-mou), "not my people," and the reason given by Yahweh is, "You are not my people, and I am not your God" (1:9); i.e., Israel has behaved as if she were not Yahweh's people. In contrast to this comes the promise, "You are my people" (2:23); i.e., when Yahweh turns again to Israel, she will again become "my people."

(d) One of the most important passages in the Pentateuch is Deut. 26:16–19, which records a mutual declaration between Yahweh and Israel in the style of an adoption ceremony: Israel is to be Yahweh's people, he will be their God, and they are to walk in his ways and obey him. Thus originated the formula, traced back to the time of Moses: "I will be your God and you will be my people" (Jer. 7:23; cf. 11:4; 24:7; 30:22; 32:38 = LXX 39:38; Ezek. 11:20; 14:11; Zech. 8:8).

(e) Since Israel is Yahweh's people, they are further defined as "the people of his inheritance" (Deut. 4:20), "his treasured possession" (7:6), "a people holy to the LORD" (e.g., 7:6; 14:2). The theme of Deut. is the people of God; the covenant formula is embedded in instruction for the keeping of the law (cf. 26:12–19). God's gracious approach to his people remains, however, the starting point (cf. Jer. 11:3–5). It appears again projected into the future in the promise of the "new covenant" (31:31–33; cf. 24:7; 32:38–40; Ezek. 36:26–38). Note that the promise of the prophets can also go beyond Israel and embrace the Gentile world, who will become "my people" (Zech. 2:11).

3. What makes Israel the laos is Yahweh's election and grace, not national, natural, or historical factors. This grace must be repeatedly confirmed by faithfulness and obedience. From an earthly point of view, unfaithfulness on the part of the people makes them lose everything that makes them God's people. They will then become like all the other nations, and indeed worse off (Deut. 28:58–64). But because Yahweh keeps faith with his people despite all apostasy and unfaithfulness, Israel remains God's laos. When all is said and done, they live not through any achievement of their own, but only because of Yahweh's faithfulness and grace.

4. (a) In the rab. literature and the Pseudepigrapha part of the foundation of all faith is that Israel is God's chosen people, his possession. Israel's special relationship with God is expressed in metaphors taken from family life: Israel is Yahweh's firstborn son (cf. 2 Esd. 6:58); the Israelites are God's brothers and kinsmen, royal children. As a special token of Yahweh's love it has been revealed to them that they are children of God. Israel is also called the bride, the betrothed, the spouse of God. Many other such OT ideas are reflected in rab. literature.

(b) At Qumran ʿam often means Israel. The community there saw themselves as the people chosen from all peoples (1QM 10:9), with whom God made an eternal covenant (13:7) and whom he redeemed to be a people forever (13:9). They are God's redeemed people (14:5), whom he will not allow to be destroyed by other nations (1QpHab 5:3). The wicked among God's people he will destroy (5:5). They are the "saints of the covenant" (1QM 10:10), the "elect of the holy people" (12:1). The "people" is the army in the final conflict (9:1; 10:2). In the hierarchy of Qumran the "people" had third place after the priests and Levites (1QS 2:21; 6:8–9).

In other places, however, ʿam (and pl. ʿammîm) mean the nations, the Gentiles. God is praised as the Creator, who has brought about the division of the nations (1QM 10:14). A sword is coming over all nations (16:1). Their heroes will be brought low by God (11:13), and their princes will be thrust down (1QSb 3:27; 5:27).

NT 1. laos occurs 142x in the NT (more than half of these are in Lk. and Acts). In many cases the language and concepts of the LXX exert an influence, though laos often follows a previous reference to ochlos (→ 4063) and carries the same meaning (e.g., Lk. 7:24, 29; 8:42, 47; cf. Matt. 27:24–25; Mk. 14:2) or stands instead of ochlos in a parallel passage (cf. Lk. 19:48 with Mk. 11:18; Lk. 20:45 with Matt. 23:1). Used on its own, laos can mean also crowd, common people (e.g., Lk. 1:10; 7:1; 20:1, 9; Acts 2:47). Many of these passages refer to the activity of John the Baptist, Jesus, or the apostles, whose ministry was practically restricted to Israel (cf. Matt. 4:23; 26:5; 27:64), and Israel is, after all, the laos and not an ethnos (an exception is Jn. 11:50, where both words are used).

The pl. laoi is parallel to ethnē (→ 1620) in Lk. 2:31–32 (cf. Isa. 40:5–6; 42:6); Rom. 15:11 (cf. Ps. 117:1); Rev. 10:11 (cf. Dan. 3:4). The great multitude (ochlos) standing before the Lamb comes from every ethnos and laos (Rev. 7:9; 11:9; 17:15), and here it means the whole of humanity.

The word pas, all, often precedes laos (e.g., "all the people" in Lk. 3:21; 7:29; Acts 3:9; 5:34). As in the LXX, laos can mean the people in contrast to the ruling classes (Lk. 22:2; 23:5; Acts 6:12), or in a cultic setting the broad mass of the people as opposed to the priest (Heb. 5:3; 7:27), or again, the ordinary people as opposed to the few witnesses of the resurrection (Acts 10:41; 13:31).

2. In keeping with the LXX, Israel is described as the laos (e.g., Acts 4:10; 13:17) or "this/these people" (cf. OT quotations in Matt. 13:15 [cf. Isa. 6:10]; Matt. 15:8 [cf. Isa. 29:13]; Acts 28:26–27 [cf. Isa. 6:9–10]). The idea is also alluded to when the high priests, elders, or leaders of the laos are referred to (e.g., Matt. 2:4; 21:23; Lk. 19:47; Acts 4:8) and when it is said that Jesus will save his people from their sins (Matt. 1:21), that God has visited his laos by sending Jesus (Lk. 7:16; 24:19), or that he will not reject his laos, Israel (Rom. 11:1–2; cf. Ps. 94:14). Even an assembled synagogue can be called laos (Acts 13:15).

The same line of thought is present when Israel as the laos is set over against the Gentiles as ethnē (Acts 4:25–27; 26:23; Rom. 15:10). In the first of these, Pilate is identified with the ethnē, Herod and Israel with the laoi. Frequently qualifying phrases or the context show that laos means Israel (e.g., the parallel of "our people" in a list along with "our law" and "this place" in Acts 21:28, or in the comment in 10:2 that the God-fearing Gentile Cornelius had done much good to the laos).

3. (a) Finally, the honored title of Israel's being God's laos is transferred to the Christian church. God has taken from the ethnē a laos for his name (Acts 15:14). He has called a church from the Jews and the Gentiles (Rom. 9:24–26). This church (even as a local church, cf. Acts 18:10) is the temple and laos of God (2 Cor. 6:14–16, where quotations from Lev. 26:12; Ezek. 37:27 are applied to the Christian church). The description of Israel as "my/his treasured possession" (lit., "a people of my/his possession," Exod. 19:5–6; Deut. 7:6; 14:2) is likewise claimed for the Christian church (Tit. 2:14; 1 Pet. 2:9).

(b) In Heb. esp., the statements of the OT cultus, seen as types of Christ, are transferred to the church. The Son of God is a human being who atones for the sins of the laos (Heb. 2:17), which he sanctified with his blood (13:12). The church is the laos of God for whom a Sabbath rest remains (4:9). Similarly in Rev. 18:4 (cf. Jer. 51:45) and 21:3 (cf. Ezek. 37:27; Zech. 2:10) OT passages are applied to the church as the new people of God. By faith in Jesus Christ as Lord, the church becomes the people of God, irrespective of the national background of its members (cf. 1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:26–29; Col. 3:11).

(c) That is not to say, of course, that in the NT the church has simply taken the place of Israel as the people of God, as if Israel has lost the priority given to her by God. This is a major problem that Paul wrestles with in Rom. He concludes that Israel remains God's laos and has not been rejected by God (cf. Rom. 9–11, esp. 9:4–5; 11:1–2, 25–26, 32).

See also dēmos, people, populace, crowd, popular assembly (1322); ethnos, nation, people, pagans, Gentiles (1620); ochlos, (throng of) people, crowd, mob (4063); polis, city, city-state (4484).

3301 (latreia, service or worship [of God]), → 3302.

3302 λατρεύω

λατρεύω (latreuō), serve (3302); λατρεία (latreia), service or worship (of God) (3301); θρῆρσκος (thrēskos), pious (2580); θρησκεία (thrēskeia), service of God, religion (2579).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. latreuō meant to work for wages and then to serve without wages. It was originally used mainly for physical work, but then came to be used more generally and could include cultic service. latreia has the same meaning, i.e., work for wages, work, care, service. This word later had a cultic use, honoring of the gods, worship.

2. (a) latreuō occurs about 90x in the LXX, esp. in Exod., Deut., Jos., and Jdg. Almost everywhere it translates ʿābad, serve, esp. where this vb. has a religious reference. Thus in Exod. 4:23; 8:1, 20; 9:1, Moses asks Pharaoh to let the people go that they may serve or "worship" their God. According to the OT, however, what constitutes true worship of the Lord is not primarily meticulously performed cultic acts but obedience to his voice, in gratitude for what he has done for us in the history of salvation (cf. Deut. 10:12–13).

Hence, in the LXX latreuō is close to leitourgeō (serve, → 3310) in meaning, though the latter is used exclusively for the service of the priests, while the former means the service of God by the whole people and by the individual, both outwardly in the cult and inwardly in the heart. The noun latreia is found only 9x in the LXX; with the exception of 3 Macc. 4:14 (where it means forced labor) it is used in the same way as the vb. In Exod. 12:25–26; 13:5 it refers to the sacred custom of the Passover (see also Jos. 22:27; 1 Chr. 28:13; 1 Macc. 1:43; 2:19, 22).

(b) As in the OT, Jewish writings express the relationship of humanity to God as service. Humans are servants or slaves of God. Thus, ʿābad and its derivatives can denote worship of the true God or of false gods. The meaning of worship has been perpetuated in the synagogue. But it is used also of the inner worship of the heart: With reference to Deut. 11:13 and Dan. 6:11, 16, it is said that to serve the Lord means prayer.

NT 1. (a) latreuō occurs 21x in the NT, all in a religious sense (e.g., Matt. 4:10; Lk. 4:8; Acts 7:7), including the worship of strange gods (Acts 7:42; Rom. 1:25). Its use throughout the NT is fixed by the OT. This is true of passages such as Lk. 1:74; 2:37 and those where the God of the fathers is mentioned, whom Paul (Acts 24:14) or the twelve tribes (26:6–7) worship. But by and large latreuō has lost its cultic connotation in favor of that of the inner worship of the heart by faith (cf. 24:14b) and prayer.

(b) Heb. shows the closest links with the OT. Of its six uses, four refer to worship in the temple/tabernacle (8:5; 9:9; 10:2; 13:10). There is no need, however, to restrict these passages to the priest's vicarious acts for the people in the sacrificial worship, for the people are included in the worship. Heb. 9:14; 12:28 emphasize that only the conscience that has been cleansed and brought to life by Christ, only the one who has been received into the true and eternal community of God, can worship God acceptably "with reverence and awe."

(c) When Paul wants to describe the Christian's daily walk with God, he uses latreia ("spiritual act of worship" in Rom. 12:1) and says of himself that he serves (latreuō) God with his whole heart as he preaches the gospel (1:9). Similarly in Phil. 3:3, he writes of those "who worship by the Spirit of God" or "who worship God in spirit." These passages give clear expression to Jesus' statement that true and genuine worship must be in Spirit and through the Spirit, for God himself is Spirit (Jn. 4:23–24; proskyneō is used 4x here for worship, → 4686). Such worship is freed from all the restrictions of cultic rules, circumcision, and the struggle to attain righteousness through works. Those who have been reconciled and renewed carry out their worship of God through the Spirit by presenting their whole being to God.

2. latreia, apart from Rom. 12:1 (see above), is found only 4x more in the NT. In Rom. 9:4, Heb. 9:1, 6 it refers to OT cultic acts; in Jn. 16:2 it expresses the service that those who hate the gospel think they bring God whenever they persecute Christ's witnesses.

3. There is little difference between latreia and thrēskeia, which means worship of God (Jas. 1:26–27), worship of angels (Col. 2:18), and religion in general (Acts 26:5). Correspondingly the adj. thrēskos (Jas. 1:26) can be rendered pious or "religious."

See also diakoneō, serve, support, serve as a deacon (1354); leitourgeō, serve (3310).

3303 λάχανον

λάχανον (lachanon), herb, vegetable (3303); βοτάνη (botanē), plant (1083); ἄνηθον (anēthon), dill (464); ἡδύοσμον (hēdyosmon), mint (2455); κύμινον (kyminon), cummin (3248); πήγανον (pēganon), rue (4379).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. lachanon denotes garden herbs and vegetables as opposed to wild plants. botanē is used of pasture, herbs, weeds; anēthon means dill; hēdyosmon (this word lit. means sweet smell) is mint; kyminon is cummin, an aromatic seed grown for flavoring dishes; and pēganon is rue, a culinary and medicinal herb.

Three of the above terms appear in the LXX, but with one exception only in the lit. sense. lachanon stands for edible herbs and vegetables (Gen. 9:3; Ps. 37:2). botanē means grass (Gen. 1:11; Jer. 14:5) or herbage in general (Exod. 9:22; Job 8:12). kyminon occurs in Isa. 28:25, 27.

NT 1. In the NT lachanon is consistently used for herbs (Lk. 11:42) and chortos for grass (Matt. 14:19) or the early grasslike blades of crops (13:26). Jesus deplores the Pharisees' concern for tithing insignificant herbs (lachanon) like mint (hēdyosmon), rue (pēganon), dill (anēthon), and cummin (kyminon), while neglecting the more important matters of the law (Matt. 23:23; Lk. 11:42).

2. In Rom. 14:2 Paul refers to certain converts from Jud. eating only vegetables (lachanon) because their feeble grasp of Christian liberty keeps them from disregarding either Jewish dietary laws or the possibility that meat sold in the marketplace has been associated with pagan sacrifices. In Heb. 6:7 responsive believers are compared to fertile land that produces good crops (botanē).

3306 (legō, collect, count, say), → 3364.

3307 (leimma, remnant), → 3309.

3309 λείπω

λείπω (leipō), leave, leave behind, lack (3309); λοιπός (loipos), remaining, other (3370); λεῖμμα (leimma), remnant (3307); καταλείπω (kataleipō), leave, leave behind, leave over (2901); περιλείπομαι (perileipomai), survive, leave behind (4335); ὑπόλειμμα (hypoleimma), remnant (5698); ὑπολείπω (hypoleipō), to be left remaining (5699); διαλείπω (dialeipō), to leave off, cease (1364); κατάλοιπος (kataloipos), the rest (2905); ἐγκαταλείπω (enkataleipō), abandon, desert (1593).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. leipō means to leave, leave behind, leave over. As an intrans. act., it can assume the meaning of to be lacking. The compound kataleipō means to leave behind, leave remaining; perileipomai, to survive. Later derivatives are the adjs. loipos, remaining, and kataloipos, left over. The rare nouns leimma and kataleimma mean remnant, residue. Neither vbs. nor nouns acquired any special nuance or religious meaning.

2. (a) In the LXX leipō and its derivatives denote what is left or remains. The noun leimma occurs only once (2 Ki. 19:4), meaning remnant. The vb. leipō occurs 8x, and the adj. loipos more than 120x. Most frequent is kataleipō (300x), meaning to be left, to forsake. The adj. kataloipos usually means remnant (cf. Amos 9:12, quoted in Acts 15:17); the noun kataleimma (21x) also means remnant. enkataleipō (over 150x) can simply mean leave (2 Ki. 2:2, 4, 6), but also desert, abandon (tents, 7:7; God deserting his people, Neh. 9:17, 19, 28, 31). In a number of cases, God is praised for not abandoning his people (Ps. 9:10; 16:10; 37:25, 28) or, conversely, petitioned to show his care for those who feel abandoned (22:1 [see below]; 27:9; 71:9, 18). Less frequent is hypoleimma, remnant (9x).

(b) In general most of the words of this group describe a total destruction of things with nothing remaining (e.g., Exod. 10:15, 19) or refer to a remnant that survives (e.g., Isa. 10:19, where only a few forest trees remain; 44:17, 19, where what is left of a tree is fashioned into an idol).

(c) The terms "remnant" and "survive" describe the activity of Yahweh in preserving what he has created. Thus in the flood story we find the words: "Only Noah was left [kataleipō], and those with him in the ark" (Gen. 7:23). In 1 Ki. 19:18 it refers to the preserving activity of Yahweh in his promise to Elijah: "I reserve [kataleipō] seven thousand in Israel—all whose knees have not bowed down to Baal and all whose mouths have not kissed him."

3. (a) The first explicit mention of the idea of a remnant of Israel occurs in the early prophets. In Amos 5:15 the prophet says that "perhaps the LORD God Almighty will have mercy on the remnant of Joseph." In Isa. the military concept of a remnant is given a theological content. In the context of the prophet's exhortation to King Ahaz not to be afraid (cf. Isa. 30:15) but to trust in Yahweh, we find reference to the prophet's son Shear-Jashub, meaning "a remnant will return" (7:3). The object of Isa.'s exhortation is to save God's people from a catastrophe in which, while they will not be totally destroyed, only a remnant will survive. Here the concept of the remnant serves to underline and confirm the dreadfulness of the catastrophe.

(b) During the time of the catastrophic downfall of the southern kingdom in 597 and 587 B.C., there is no mention of a remnant remaining in the land of Israel who could maintain the hope of a new beginning. Jer. testifies that Yahweh will let Judah be annihilated (19:11). He compares those who have been left in the land under Zedekiah to bad figs (24:8). The remnant of Judah under Gedaliah forfeits the possibility of remaining in the land when Gedaliah is murdered by Ishmael (40:11–41:3).

In Ezek., the concept of the remnant is either excluded (9:8; 11:13; 17:21) or used in an entirely different way. There is a remnant remaining in Jerusalem after the judgments of Yahweh, but the only purpose is to bring home to the exiles proof of the massive destruction of Jerusalem and its inhabitants. For Jer. and Ezek. alike, the true remnant is represented by the exiles, i.e., by those who survive the catastrophe through deportation. They are the ones, according to Ezek., to whom God appears.

(c) It was during the exile that the concept of the remnant acquired a fixed theological content, namely, the hope of Yahweh's preserving and saving work. Behind this was the discovery that, although in the national catastrophe Yahweh had executed a terrible judgment, even this judgment was limited by his will to maintain and preserve his people. We have a witness to this hope in Isa. 46:3–4, when Yahweh addresses the exiles as "you who remain of the house of Israel," whom he will "sustain," "carry," and "rescue." In the second half of Isa. we also find the concept of a remnant applied to the "fugitives from the nations" (45:20) who, embarrassed as a result of their idolatry, "take counsel together" before Yahweh (45:21).

(d) In the late exilic and postexilic periods, when the temple is rebuilt by the returned exiles, the concept of the remnant gains increasingly in importance (cf. Mic. 2:12–13; 5:7–8; 7:18; Zeph. 2:7, 9). In Obad. 17 we find the concept of the remnant linked with the hope for Jerusalem or Zion, and Zech. announces the return of Yahweh to Zion and awakes in the survivors the hope of the preservation of Jerusalem (8:3, 6, 11–12).

(e) In Joel 2:32 the concept of the remnant is linked to Zion. In the books of Ezr. and Neh. the idea of the remnant is applied several times to the exiles who have returned (Ezr. 9:8, 15; Neh. 1:2–3). The latter chapters of Zech. speak of a remnant that will be purified (13:8–9) and that will survive when the nations assemble to fight against Jerusalem (14:2, linked with apocalyptic ideas about the day of the Lord).

4. (a) In extracanonical apocalyptic writings, the remnant concept is occasionally applied to the whole creation: "And now, my son, arise and make a petition to the Lord of glory, since you are a believer, that a remnant may remain on the earth, and that he may not destroy the whole world" (1 Enoch 83:8). More frequent are the remnant sayings that refer to Israel or the synagogue: 2 Esd. 9:7–8 refers to "my salvation in my land and within my borders" in connection with those who have been saved (cf. 12:34; 13:48).

(b) The linking of the remnant concept to Israel led, in Palestinian Jud., to the making of exclusive claims for particular groups and consequently to an intensification of the idea. The Qumran community, for instance, saw in itself the holy remnant promised in the OT (CD 1:4–5), enjoying God's assistance (1QM 13:8; 14:8–9), while their enemies were utterly destroyed (1:6; 4:2; 14:5). Likewise, the Pharisees attempted, by voluntary submission to priestly ordinances regarding cleansing, to set themselves up as the holy remnant.

(c) In rab. Jud. the primary condition for belonging to the remnant was observance of the Torah. Those who survive will return to Zion, and those who have kept the Torah will remain in Jerusalem.

NT 1. In the NT the noun leimma, remnant, is found only once (Rom. 11:5), and the vb. leipō, to lack, be in want of, 6x (Lk. 18:22; Tit. 1:5; 3:13; Jas. 1:4–5; 2:15). The adj. loipos, remaining, other (mostly in the pl.) or adverbially ("finally"), occurs 55x—occasionally with a critical undertone, when it refers to those who are hardened (Lk. 8:10; Rom. 11:7), who do not believe (Mk. 16:13; 1 Thess. 4:13), who act as hypocrites (Gal. 2:13), or who do not repent (Rev. 9:20). perileipomai occurs 2x, both references to those who are left alive at the coming of the Lord (1 Thess. 4:15, 17).

As in the LXX, the most common compound is kataleipō, again with various meanings, such as to leave (a region, Matt. 4:13; father and mother, 19:5; cf. Gen. 2:24; possessions, Lk. 5:28), fall behind, neglect (Acts 6:2), and leave behind (someone, e.g., 18:19). The following appear once each: kataloipos, the rest (Acts 15:17; cf. Amos 9:12); dialeipō, to leave off, cease (Lk. 7:45); hypoleipō, to be left remaining (Rom. 11:3; cf. 1 Ki. 19:10, 14); and hypoleimma, remnant (Rom. 9:27; cf. Isa. 10:22).

2. (a) In the NT, the OT remnant concept is taken up only in Rom. 9–11. Here Paul deals with the fact that the majority of Jews refuse to believe in Christ. Indeed, a central theme of Rom. is the question of the standing of the Jewish people in relation to salvation in Christ alone. Rom. 1–8 deals with the basis of salvation, showing that the OT anticipates the way of salvation in Christ, while 9–11 deals with the position of the Jews as God's chosen people in the light of their rejection of Christ and God's overall purposes. What attitude should the early church, composed as it is of both Gentile and Jewish Christians, adopt toward this fact? Does this rejection of Christ mean that Israel's election no longer applies? Paul holds on to the special position of Israel among the nations. This special position, however, is based on God's free elective grace (9:11; 11:5), as is the calling of Gentiles into the community of the new people of God (9:24).

To show that the Gentiles are accepted as children of God, Paul cites Hos. 2:23 and 1:10 (Rom. 9:25–26). This is followed immediately (9:27) by the warning of Isa. 10:22–23, which speaks of the decimation of Israel down to a remnant that repents; but like the LXX, Paul does not say that "the remnant will return," but rather, "the remnant will be saved." In Rom. 9:29 Paul adds a citation of Isa. 1:9, where the LXX has already introduced a greater note of hope: for the Heb. śārîd, remnant (NIV "survivors"), both the LXX and Paul have sperma (lit., "seed," i.e., descendants).

This combination of OT citations displays clearly the direction of Paul's reinterpretation of the remnant. In setting a reference to the remnant of Israel alongside the prophecy of the Gentiles' acceptance as the children of God, Paul is altering the status of the former. The remnant in OT prophecy merges into the new people of God, constituted on the basis of faith in Christ. The remnant of Israel is not eliminated, but it stands alongside those Gentiles, who are called to be members of God's new people. The remnant (Isa. 1:9 MT), or the descendants (Isa. 1:9 LXX), are those whom God has called, together with the Gentiles, into the church of Christ.

In Rom. 11:3–5, the concept of the remnant is introduced by a reference to Elijah's complaint on Mount Horeb (1 Ki. 19:10) and Yahweh's reply (19:18). Paul uses this reference as evidence that God has not rejected Israel. The "remnant chosen by grace" is, however, based not on Israel's efforts, but on God's set purpose (Rom. 11:5), and it is characterized by faith in Christ. Paul's hope is that through this remnant, and through the Gentile Christians who with them form the church, the "fullness" (plērōma, Rom. 11:12; → plēroō, 4444) of Israel can be won for Christ. Thus in the remnant of Israel, which confesses faith in Christ, there is a new beginning for all Israel. This remnant is a challenge to all the Jews.

(b) Paul uses the adj. loipos, remaining, 2x of those who mourn because they have no hope (1 Thess. 4:13) or those who are asleep in the sense that they are not expecting the Parousia (5:6). In Rom. 1:13 it is used of other nations, or Gentiles, in contrast to those being addressed in the letter, and in Gal. 2:13 it refers to other Jewish Christians who joined Peter in acting hypocritically in separating themselves from eating with Gentiles in Antioch. Otherwise Paul uses the adj. without any specialized meaning, like other NT writers.

loipos is used adverbially in various expressions of time: (to) loipon, from now on, henceforth (1 Cor. 7:29; 2 Tim. 4:8) or finally (Acts 27:20; 1 Cor. 1:16; Phil. 3:1; 4:8); tou loipou, from now on, in the future, finally (Gal. 6:17; Eph. 6:10).

3. In the Synoptics the adj. loipos sometimes describes those outside the rule of God. Thus in the parable of the royal wedding feast (Matt. 22:1–13), the pl. refers to "the rest" (22:6) who mock and kill the servants sent by the king to invite them; in 25:1–12 it refers to "the others [virgins]" (25:11), those excluded from the wedding feast. Jesus' cry of dereliction from the cross is received by "the rest" with the words: "Now leave him alone. Let's see if Elijah comes to save him" (27:49). In Lk. 8:10 the "others" (those outside the band of the disciples, who do not understand the parables because they are hardened; cf. Rom. 11:7) stand in contrast with the disciples. The parable of the Pharisee and the publican (Lk. 18:9–14) is addressed to those who, in their own faithful observance of the law, despise "everybody else" (18:9; cf. "other men" used by the Pharisee, 18:11).

4. The vb. leipō occurs in Lk. 18:22 of the decisive shortcoming that hinders the rich man from the life of discipleship, namely, his riches: "You still lack [leipō] one thing. Sell everything you have and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. Then come, follow me." In Jas. 1:4–5 and 2:15 the vb. means to lack, have need of (cf. Tit. 3:13). In Tit. 1:5 it is used of the defects that Titus is to amend in the church in Crete.

5. (a) enkataleipō is used in Ps. 22:1, which Jesus quotes in his cry from the cross, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46; Mk. 15:34). The theological issue of how Jesus, who was both Son of God and God himself, could be forsaken by God is not directly addressed in the NT. Suffice it to say that through this cry, accompanied by the three hours of darkness, Jesus was suffering the ultimate punishment of sin. Some scholars think that while on the cross, Jesus may have quoted the entire psalm, which contains several messianic prophecies. If so, note that the psalm ends with a message of triumph.

(b) enkataleipō also occurs in Ps. 16:10, where David expresses the assurance that God will not leave his soul in Sheol. Peter sees in this verse a prophecy of the resurrection of Jesus; he notes that David remains buried in Jerusalem, but Jesus' body did not stay in the grave but was raised from the dead (Acts 2:27–31).

(c) This same vb. also occurs in Deut. 31:6, where God promises never to leave or forsake his people as they conquer the promised land. Heb. applies this same promise to Christians who are undergoing persecution for their faith (13:6). This same writer also encourages believers not to "give up meeting together," even though such meetings might expose them to danger (10:25).

6. In Rev. the adj. loipos is found 8x; in two cases it has a meaning reminiscent of the remnant idea. In 11:13 we read of the "survivors" of the judgment on the city who give glory to God; in 12:17 it is used in the context of the war waged by the dragon on the "rest" of the woman's offspring, "who obey God's commandments and hold to the testimony to Jesus" and against whom both the beasts fight (ch. 13). Although it is possible to see behind these sayings a wealth of Jewish apocalyptic material, these references are not to the remnant in the sense of a new beginning.

3310 λειτουργέω

λειτουργέω (leitourgeō), serve (3310); λειτουργία (leitourgia), service (3311); λειτουργός (leitourgos), servant (3313); λειτουργικός (leitourgikos), serving (3312).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. leitourgeō meant do public work at one's own expense. It was a political, almost legal, concept. leitourgia similarly meant service for the people. In the later cl. period it was as common a term as "taxes" today. We seldom find the noun leitourgos in cl. Gk.; where it does occur it usually means an artisan.

(b) In Hel. Gk. leitourgeō covers all kinds of service to the community that a person had to do because of the size of his income, though it could also be carried out voluntarily. The concept gradually expanded, esp. in Egypt, to cover every conceivable compulsory service for the state, often regulated by specific rules. Then it widened further to cover any sort of service. Beside this legal meaning in public life, there developed an entirely new, religious, and cultic use of the words.

2. (a) In the LXX leitourgeō occurs about 100x and leitourgia about 40x. They are used almost exclusively for the service of priests and Levites in the temple and occur esp. in those sections that describe priestly functions and ritual (e.g., Exod. 28–39; Num. 1–4; 8; 1 Chr. 23; Ezek. 40–46). These words were esp. suited for expressing the cultic service since the activities of the priests were public, fixed, and regulated by law, and the welfare of God's people depended on it. The LXX also used these words for heathen cultic worship (e.g., Ezek. 44:12).

(b) In intertestamental Jud., esp. as it was developed in the synagogue and in the Diaspora, we find a gradual spiritualizing of this concept of service, most notably in the interpretation of prayer as "sacrifice" (cf. Wis. 18:21).

NT 1. In the NT leitourgeō occurs only 3x, leitourgia 6x, leitourgos 5x, and leitourgikos only once. In Heb. and in some passages in Paul and Lk., the word group is used in its cultic-sacred sense. (a) In Lk. 1:23, leitourgia is used lit. for Zechariah's priestly service in the temple.

(b) Heb. seeks to make clear the unique meaning of the cross and exaltation by using the cultic concepts of the OT. In 8:2 Christ, as leitourgos, exercises the service of the high priest in the true, heavenly sanctuary. There he is the one, true high priest, who has obtained a superior "ministry" (8:6, leitourgia). Christ has accomplished through his suffering and death the one eternally valid sacrifice (cf. 10:10); by so doing he has shown that through the daily performance of the religious duties of the priest (10:11), no sins can be taken away. We find leitourgia again in 9:21 in reference to the OT cultic "ceremonies."

(c) Rom. 15:16 also presupposes cultic usage. Paul justifies the boldness of what he has written by pointing to the fact that by the grace of God, he had become Christ's leitourgos (i.e., minister) to the Gentiles, "with the priestly duty of proclaiming the gospel of God" so that the converted Gentiles may be brought as a sacrifice to God. By this Paul expresses not only his complete dedication to and dependence on God;

he also redefines the nature of sacrifice and priestly service in terms of the gospel and its service and fruit. We should also add Phil. 2:17 here, where Paul sees himself as the messenger of Christ performing the "service" (leitourgia) of offering up the obedient faith of the Philippians to God. His own self-giving in martyrdom is seen as a libation on the sacrificial offering of their faith.

2. The use of leitourgeō in Acts 13:2 has a meaning derived from the LXX. Here the cultic meaning is spiritualized and applied to Christian worship in prayer.

3. There is no consensus as to how leitourgeō in Rom. 15:27 and leitourgia in 2 Cor. 9:12 are to be understood. Some commentators see the cultic use here also, so that the words denote the loving service in the collection for Jerusalem. If so, then Paul is stressing that this project is a religious service to God. Others interpret the words in terms of the cl. Gk. usage, which makes the collection the official and public aid to the Jerusalem community. We can no longer be certain whether Paul implied anything beyond general service in his use of these words. Note that in both Rom. 15 and 2 Cor. 8–9 this word group and the diakoneō word group (to serve, → 1354) stand parallel.

4. Clearly there is no cultic background to the use of the leitourgeō word group in Phil. 2:25, 30. Epaphroditus had become a leitourgos (2:25), helper, when he served Paul during his hour of need. He rendered to Paul the "help" (leitourgia) that the church in Philippi, owing to circumstances, was unable to render (2:30). Similarly in Rom. 13:6, political authorities are God's "servants" (leitourgos); in 13:4 Paul uses the word diakonos for the same concept; no priestly functions are ascribed to the state.

In Heb. 1:7 leitourgos also lacks cultic connotation. Citing Ps. 104:4, this passage calls angels "servants"; in 1:14 they are called "ministering [leitourgikos] spirits." The angels stand in contrast to the immutability of Christ (1:8–9), for their form and function are controlled by God.

See also diakoneō, serve, support, serve as a deacon (1354); latreuō, serve (3302).

3311 (leitourgia, service), → 3310.

3312 (leitourgikos, serving), → 3310.

3313 (leitourgos, servant), → 3310.

3319 (lepra, leprosy), → 3320.

3320 λεπρός

λεπρός (lepros), leprous, chiefly used as a noun describing a leper (3320); λέπρα (lepra), leprosy (3319).

CL & OT 1. Cl. writers used lepros to describe anything rough, scabby, or scaly, including items made from roughly textured animal skins or hides. Hippocrates used the word to describe a leprous person, i.e., someone with a scaly skin affliction such as psoriasis. In Herodotus and the medical authors, lepra was a disease that gave a scaly or uneven texture to the skin. Another use of the word was for a whitish spot on the skin, the result of loss of pigmentation. The Gk. medical authors used the term elephas to describe a different and much more serious chronic disorder, which was found frequently in Egypt, the symptoms of which corresponded largely to those now associated with clinical leprosy.

2. (a) lepros occurs in the LXX in Lev. 13:44–45; 14:2–3; 22:4; Num. 5:2, etc. as a skin disease. It could describe any kind of skin eruption, of which clinical leprosy (Hansen's disease) was one form. Note that the instructions given in Lev. 13 to the priests to enable them to detect leprosy also suggest that skin afflictions other than clinical leprosy may be present. In other words, lepros was sufficiently flexible to include common dermatological conditions as impetigo, psoriasis, eczema, and acne vulgaris.

The Heb. ṣāraʿat, traditionally translated "leprosy," is an eruptive condition (forms of fungus or molds) that can appear on leather (Lev. 14:55), clothing (13:47, 59), and the walls of houses (14:44), in addition to human beings. Because of this variety of nuances, the ancient Heb. technical terms are difficult to understand.

(b) Preliminary symptoms of human ṣāraʿat included a swelling, a localized tissue crust on the epidermis, and a whitish-red swollen spot. Since any or all of these could presage clinical leprosy, sufferers had to present themselves to the priest for examination. If subcutaneous penetration was exhibited along with a whitening of the small local cuticular hairs, a malignant state was suspected and the patient was declared unclean. But if the skin tissue, while swollen, was not actually inflamed (13:4) or the hair discolored, the patient was quarantined for seven days. If on reexamination the swollen area of the whitish spot had not increased in size, a further seven days' quarantine could be followed by a priestly diagnosis of a benign skin condition.

If, however, there was a spreading of the eruption in the skin, it was diagnosed as leprosy (Lev. 13:8). A chronic state of leprosy was indicated by depigmented hairs and ulcerated tissue in an area of swollen white skin, rendering the sufferer unclean. But if the whole body was covered with patches of depigmented skin, the individual who manifested this condition was pronounced clean (13:13). Differential diagnosis turned on the degree of cutaneous penetration of the disease. Scalp disease was treated in the same manner as other forms of skin eruptions, so that an itchy condition such as ringworm could be differentiated from more serious cutaneous diseases.

3. The development of Hansen's disease may exhibit three forms. (a) The nodular type produces lumps in the facial tissues and a form of cutaneous induration that results in a characteristic scabby appearance. Degenerative changes also occur in nose and throat membranes. (b) An anaesthetic variety attacks the nerves of the skin, producing depigmented areas in which there is no feeling. Blisters and ulcers frequently form on these patches, and it is common for the extremities of the arms and legs to be affected. In such cases necrosis occurs and the diseased part is rejected by the body, leaving a well-healed stump. (c) A third form of leprosy combines the symptoms of the first two kinds in varying degrees and is chronic in nature.

NT 1. lepros occurs 9x in the NT. Jesus heals lepers in Matt. 11:5; Mk. 1:40–42; Lk. 7:22; 17:12. Lk. 4:27 cited the OT miracle whereby Elisha healed the leprosy of Naaman (2 Kings 5:1–14). lepros was also used of Simon, formerly a leper, in Matt. 26:6; Mk. 14:3. This word was used in as broad a sense as its OT counterpart, and the fact that some clinical manifestations called for a priestly declaration of cleanness implies that the conditions described by lepros varied in severity.

2. lepra occurs 4x, only in passages apparently describing the same incident (Matt. 8:3; Mk. 1:42; Lk. 5:12–13). Lk. noted the advanced nature of the condition, but apart from this it is not easy to determine its true nature. The sufferer seems to have been moving around in society to some extent, although the possibility of an advanced case of clinical leprosy should not be discounted.

3321 λεπτός

λεπτός (leptos), small copper coin (3321).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. leptos means thin, slender, small, or delicate. In the LXX this word was used for the thin, emaciated cows that Pharaoh saw in his dream (Gen. 41). It was also used to describe the "thin" flakes of manna (Exod. 16:14). The word occurs frequently in connection with idolatry. Moses ground the golden calf "to powder" and threw the particles into the Israelites' drinking water (32:20; Deut. 9:21). Josiah did the same thing with the idols of his predecessors (2 Chr. 34:7). Isa. prophesies a day in which idols will be broken into pieces and ground to fine powder (27:9; 30:14, 22).

NT Coins were frequently minted and used throughout the Roman empire. In general Jews did not object to using coins with figures on them for secular purposes, provided that these symbols were inoffensive to Jewish sensibilities. Herod Archelaus (4 B.C.–A.D. 6), for example, introduced the grape cluster and the tall, double-crested helmet. Symbols on lepta employed by Roman governors were wheat ears or barley, palm branches, or palm trees. Pilate aroused considerable resentment when he tried to employ such cultic implements as an augur's wand or a simpulum (a type of ladle used in connection with Roman sacrifice). When Herod Agrippa I was installed as king (A.D. 37–44), he reverted to inoffensive types, such as triple ears of wheat.

While coins with pagan symbols would never have been allowed for use in worship in the temple, lepta with nondescript images seem to have been permitted. The most notable example of bronze coinage presented in the temple treasury is the contribution of two lepta, placed in the offering box, by a poor widow whom Christ commended (Mk. 12:42; Lk. 21:2). These coins may have been those from Roman government officials, though they may have gone back to the days of the Hasmoneans (e.g., John Hyrcanus II), which are common in Jewish burial sites throughout Israel even to this day. The lepton is also mentioned at Lk. 12:59, where Jesus warns the crowd to seek reconciliation with an adversary, lest they be thrown into prison by the magistrate: "You will not get out until you have paid the last penny" (the par. Matt. 5:26 has kodrantēs, the Roman quadrans).

3322 Λευί

Λευί (Leui), Levi (3322); Λευίτης (Leuitēs), Levite (3324); Λευιτικός (Leuitikos), Levitical (3325).

OT A Levite was any descendant of Jacob's third son, Levi (Gen. 29:34), but the term is seldom so used in OT. Normally it refers to the male descendants of Levi apart from the priests, the descendants of Aaron—i.e., to those entitled to serve in the sanctuary in a subordinate role.

In the course of time the Levites diminished in importance, largely for economic reasons. Num. 18:21, 24 gave the whole tithe to the Levites, who were expected to give a tithe (tenth) of it to the priests (18:26–32). It seems clear that as the priestly clans multiplied, the Levites were squeezed out of the more important roles, esp. after Josiah's reform, and did not continue to receive their share of the tithe. Thus few Levites returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (cf. Ezr. 2:40 with 2:36–39). In fact, Ezra had great difficulty in persuading any to accompany him (8:15–20).

Nehemiah restored the tithe position (Neh. 10:37–38), but later Josephus suggests that they were again taken from the Levites in favor of the priests. This is confirmed in rab. sources. The teaching function of the Levites was largely taken over by the scribes. Moreover, the lower ranks of temple servants gradually obtained the right to call themselves Levites. This helps explain the rarity of their mention in the NT.

NT 1. Levi occurs as a proper name 8x in the NT: the son of Jacob (Heb. 7:5, 9; Rev. 7:7); two ancestors of Jesus (Lk. 3:24, 29); and a son of Alphaeus, presumably Matthew (Mk. 2:14; Lk. 5:27, 29).

2. Levites are referred to 3x in the NT. (a) The leading Pharisees in Jerusalem ("the Jews") sent priests and Levites to question John the Baptist (Jn. 1:19). The choice was probably motivated by the fact that the tribe of Levi historically had the divinely given privilege of teaching (Deut. 33:10).

(b) A priest and a Levite are linked in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk. 10:31–32). Neither paid much attention to the wounded traveler.

(c) Barnabas, a native of Cyprus, was a Levite (Acts 4:36). It is impossible to establish whether he ever functioned in the Jerusalem temple.

3. Heb. 7:11a uses the expression "the Levitical priesthood." It stresses that the priests were of the tribe of Levi, unlike the priest forever "in the order of Melchizedek," who was of the tribe of Judah (7:11b–17). The fact that Melchizedek received offerings from Abraham and that Levi, at the time, could be said to be "in the body of his ancestor" Abraham (7:10) demonstrates the superiority of the Melchizedekian priesthood (which climaxed in Christ) to the Levitical.

3324 (Leuitēs, Levite), → 3322.

3325 (Leuitikos, Levitical), → 3322.

3328 λευκός

λευκός (leukos), white (3328); κονιάω (koniaō), whitewash (3154).

CL & OT leukos means light, bright, clear, white. In the LXX it means the color white (Gen. 49:12; Zech. 1:8), though it may include half-yellow. White is the color of God himself (Dan. 7:9). It also symbolizes the state of being purified from the defilement of sin (cf. leukainō in Ps. 51:7; Isa. 1:18). Thus, the priest's linen clothing is white. From the 1st cent. A.D. on, the dead were buried in white linen. This may be connected with the imagery of the garments of glory worn by the saints in their transfigured state (1 Enoch 62:14–16). On a negative note, white is also used in the diagnosis of leprosy (Lev. 13).

NT leukos occurs only in the Gospels, Acts, and Rev. It is used of the yellowish-white, ripe corn ready for harvest (Jn. 4:35), in a context that suggests that the eschatological harvest is at hand and the disciples are now being sent out as reapers (cf. Matt. 9:37).

White is an eschatological color in various other contexts, esp. in the description of garments. In the transfiguration of Jesus, his garments appeared brilliantly white (Matt. 17:2; Mk. 9:3; Lk. 9:29). So too was the appearance of the angels at the tomb (Matt. 28:3; Mk. 16:5; Jn. 20:12; cf. Lk. 24:4), and of the two men who addressed the disciples after Jesus had ascended (Acts 1:10).

White is also the color of the garments of the saints in the afterlife (Rev. 3:4–5, 18; 4:4; 6:11; 7:9, 13; 19:14). Here white is associated with eschatological and transcendent existence, not with Godhead as such. However, the throne of God is white (20:11), and in an earlier vision John has seen "one 'like a son of man'" seated on a white cloud, wearing a golden crown, and bearing a sharp sickle (14:14). The glorified Christ appeared with white hair like wool and snow (1:14), associating the risen Christ with the "Ancient of Days" (Dan. 7:9). Since white is the color of God himself, the white garments of the saints symbolize the holiness and purity that only God bestows. In keeping with this, the glorified Christ who comes in judgment is seen riding "a white horse" (Rev. 19:11), and the armies of heaven who follow him are clad in "fine linen, white and clean," riding "white horses" (19:14).

In the letter to the church at Pergamum, those who overcome are promised "hidden manna" and "a white stone with a new name written on it, known only to him who receives it" (Rev. 2:17). Various images may lie behind this. The white stone was used by Gk. jurors to signify acquittal. A rab. tradition taught that precious stones fell along with the manna in the desert. The tribes of Israel were represented by precious stones in the high priest's breastplate (Exod. 28:15–21). Perhaps John is combining some of these ideas with that of confessing the name of Christ as Lord (cf. Matt. 10:32; Mk. 8:38; Lk. 12:8; Rom. 10:9–13; 1 Cor. 12:3; Phil. 2:11).

All of this stands in contrast with the vb. koniaō, whitewash, which is used of the tombs that were whitewashed annually before the Passover, lest pilgrims inadvertently tread on them and so become defiled (Matt. 23:27; cf. Lk. 11:44). Jesus denounced the teachers of the law and the Pharisees as hypocrites, being "like whitewashed tombs, which look beautiful on the outside but on the inside are full of dead men's bones and everything unclean" (Matt. 23:27). Similarly, Paul denounced Ananias as a "whitewashed wall" (Acts 23:3, perhaps combining the idea of a tomb built into a wall and that of the whitewashed fragile wall in Ezek. 13:10–16).

3334 λῃστής

λῃστής (lēstēs), robber, highwayman, bandit, revolutionary (3334); κλέπτω (kleptō), steal (3096); κλέπτης (kleptēs), thief (3095).

CL & OT 1. In. cl. Gk. kleptō emphasizes the secrecy, craft, and cheating involved in the act of stealing or embezzlement. By contrast, lēstēs includes the element of violence, though not necessarily of dishonesty: a soldier exercising his right to seize plunder can be termed lēstēs. The word usually meant robber, bandit, pirate.

2. In the LXX kleptō includes the sense of stealth. Theft is a sin against God, as is stated in the Decalogue (Exod. 20:15 = LXX 20:14; Deut. 5:19) and its echoes (Lev. 19:11; Jer. 7:9). What is stolen may include objects of value (Gen. 44:5; Exod. 22:6 = LXX 22:7), animals (Gen. 30:33), humans (40:15; Exod. 21:16 = LXX 21:17), things devoted to God (Jos. 7:11), household gods (Gen. 31:19), and genuine words of God, stolen by false prophets (Jer. 23:30). To be guilty of theft incurs punishment (Exod. 22:1–2; Deut. 24:7). Even when prompted by need or poverty, stealing dishonors God (Prov. 30:9 = LXX 24:32; cf. 6:30).

The noun lēstēs, which seldom occurs in the LXX, translates three Heb. words, all associated with violence (see Jer. 7:11; 18:22; Obad. 5). By referring to both bandits and Zealots as lēstai, Josephus and the rabbis reveal their opposition to the methods employed by these nationalists.

NT 1. The requirements of the Decalogue, including "do not steal" (kleptō), still apply in the Christian era. Jesus quotes this command to the rich young ruler (Matt. 19:18; Mk. 10:19; Lk. 18:20), as does Paul in Rom. 13:9; it is alluded to in 1 Cor. 6:10 and 1 Pet. 4:15. As the breaking of a divine command, theft is an offense against God's will and, in terms of human relationships, it betrays fellowship (Jn. 12:6). The positive fulfillment of this commandment, as of the others in the second table, is brought about by loving one's neighbor (Rom. 13:9–10; cf. Matt. 22:39). In practical terms, a thief must stop stealing and instead do honest work, so that such a person can serve not his or her own selfish ends but the needs of those who lack (Eph. 4:28).

2. Jesus also warns against reliance on accumulated wealth, for thieves can easily dig through house walls made of mud brick and steal one's property (Matt. 6:19–20). By contrast, treasures in heaven, i.e., what wins divine approval and reward in the coming kingdom, are beyond the reach of thieves or inflation.

Judas, who pilfered money, was a kleptēs (Jn. 12:6); Barabbas, who was implicated in violence, was a lēstēs (Jn. 18:40). In Matt. 27:64 the Jews fear that the disciples may quietly steal the body of Jesus, and in 28:13 they decide to put it about that this explains the empty tomb. The vb. kleptō and the noun kleptēs are used to describe the sudden arrival without warning of the messianic age. As an alert householder is able to forestall a thief approaching secretly, so the disciple needs to be on the watch for the Parousia of the Lord (Matt. 24:43–44; Lk. 12:39). The same simile illustrates the unexpected moment of the Lord's coming in 1 Thess. 5:2, 4; 2 Pet. 3:10; Rev. 3:3; 16:15.

The Fourth Gospel's discourse on the good shepherd opens with a description of a prospective sheep stealer as both kleptēs and lēstēs, i.e., using either stealth or force to get into the sheepfold (Jn. 10:1). Jesus goes on to use the pl. "thieves and robbers" in 10:8 to define all who came before him: false messiahs, such as Theudas and Judas the Galilean (cf. Acts 5:36–37). Such a kleptēs destroys life by furthering his own ends. By contrast, Jesus has come to give a full life, even at the expense of his own (10:10).

In the parable of the good Samaritan the plural lēstai (Lk. 10:30, 36) may not refer to bandits in the general sense, but bear the rab. meaning of Zealots. The victim is a Jew. But he is not killed, and his injuries may have been due to his resisting the attack. When Zealots robbed to raise supplies for themselves, they usually did not take more than was necessary from their own countrymen. If this is so, it adds to Jesus' response to the question from the teacher of the law about the neighbor, for the Pharisees were constantly pressing Jesus to declare his attitude towards this nationalistic movement (Matt. 22:15–22).

At the cleansing of the temple, Jesus charges the merchants trafficking there with making God's house of prayer (Isa. 56:7) into "a den of robbers [lēstai]" (Mk. 11:17; cf. Jer. 7:11). Apart from profiting by high prices, the Jews' market in the forecourt robbed the Gentile nations (Mk. 11:17) of the only area in the temple that was available to them as a place of prayer (Matt. 21:13; Lk. 19:46). If lēstēs also has the technical sense of Zealot, Jesus is saying that by their activities the temple authorities are opening the way for the building to be turned into a Zealot stronghold, as did happen in the revolt of A.D. 68–70.

At his arrest in Gethsemane, Jesus ironically demands to know whether his enemies, armed to the teeth, now take him for a lēstēs, a bandit or insurrectionist who would sell his life dearly (Matt. 26:55; Mk. 14:48; Lk. 22:52). The two men crucified with Jesus are described as lēstai (Matt. 27:38, 44; Mk. 15:27), probably bandits rather than revolutionaries in view of the use of kakourgoi, criminals, in Lk. 23:33. Paul includes lēstai, bandits, among the perils he faced on his travels (2 Cor. 11:26).

See also sylaō, plunder, rob (5195); apostereō, rob, defraud, deprive (691); andrapodistēs, slave-dealer, kidnapper (435); spēlaion, cave, den (5068).

3337 λίβανος

λίβανος (libanos), frankincense (3337); λιβανωτός (libanōtos), frankincense (3338); θυμίαμα (thymiama), incense (2592); θυμιάω (thymiaō), burn incense (2594); θυμιατήριον (thymiatērion), censer, altar of incense (2593).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. libanos is the frankincense tree and, by extension, the tree's aromatic gum frankincense, for which libanōtos is also used. thymiama (incense) is the general term for fragrant substances burned with sacrifices or for fumigation purposes, or used in embalming. The vb. thymiaō means to burn so as to produce smoke, more particularly to burn incense or to fumigate. The related noun thymiatērion is the censer.

1. (a) Apart from two instances of libanōtos (1 Chr. 9:29; 3 Macc. 5:2), the LXX always uses libanos for frankincense. Brittle, glittering, and bitter to the taste, frankincense produced a gratifying if expensive fragrance when burned (Song 3:6; 4:6). Besides being an ingredient of a special incense constantly used in OT worship, pure frankincense was burned with bread of the Presence (Lev. 24:7) and grain offering (2:2).

(b) thymiama (incense) and its vb. thymiaō (make sacrifices smoke) occur frequently in the LXX. thymiatērion always means censer (2 Chr. 26:19; Ezek. 8:11; 4 Macc. 7:11). The holy incense was a special compound reserved for the divine service (Exod. 30:34–35) and used according to strict instructions (Lev. 16:12–13; cf. 10:1–11). Morning and evening the high priest burned incense before the veil of the Most Holy Place (Exod. 30:7–8). On the Day of Atonement he entered the Most Holy Place carrying burning incense, the fumes of which provided an atonement for him as he approached the atonement cover of the ark (Lev. 16:12–13; cf. Num. 16:46).

Rising incense smoke symbolized praise (Isa. 60:6) and prayer (Ps. 141:2), worship fragrant to God. In the messianic age converted Gentiles will gladly bring abundant incense to the temple (Isa. 60:6), indicative of their worship of God.

NT 1. In the NT libanos occurs only 2x (Matt. 2:11; Rev. 18:13) and has its lit. meaning of frankincense. In Rev. 8:3, 5 libanōtos uncharacteristically means not frankincense but censer, the vessel for carrying incense. thymiaō (burn incense) occurs only in Lk. 1:9–11, together with the noun thymiama. In the second temple ordinary priests took turns, chosen by lot, in the daily offering of incense. Zechariah was carrying out this duty for the only time in his life when he had his vision. thymiatērion appears only in Heb. 9:4, where it means altar of incense.

2. libanos (frankincense), brought to the infant Jesus (Matt. 2:11), symbolizes both his divinity and priestly office of intercession (Heb. 7:25). The bringing of frankincense by Gentiles to the Messiah was a Jewish hope (Isa. 60:6). In Rev. 8:3, 5 the association of one and the same censer (libanōtos) with intercession and judgment shows the potency of Christian prayer in fulfilling God's purposes. In Rev. 5:8; 8:3–4 thymiama, incense, represents the prayers of the saints in the heavenly temple.

See also smyrna, myrrh (5043).

3338 (libanōtos, frankincense), → 3337.

3339 λιβερτῖνος

λιβερτῖνος (libertinos), freedman (3339).

CL & OT libertinos is a Gk. borrowing of the Lat. libertinus, found in cl. Gk. only in an inscription. The normal Gk. word here is apeleutheros (cf. 1 Cor. 7:22, → eleutheria, freedom, 1800) or exeleutheros. The libertinus was a freed slave who after either buying or having been given freedom underwent manumission, a process whereby freedom was secured publicly. But such freedom did not amount to full citizen rights; e.g., such a person could not petition for legal action without permission or gain high military office. Some freedmen, however, as employees of the state or of wealthy patrons, amassed considerable wealth and wielded political power.

NT The only place in the NT where this word occurs is Acts 6:9, which talks about the "Synagogue of the Freedmen (as it was called)—Jews of Cyrene and Alexandria as well as the provinces of Cilicia and Asia," where Stephen debated about Jesus as the Christ. These were probably Jewish freedmen, but we do not know whether they had come from Cyrene, Alexandria, Asia, and Cilicia (cf. NIV) or whether they were different from the Cyrenians and the others (e.g., descendants of Jews brought to Rome by Pompey in 63 B.C. and later set free). Note that large towns often had more than one synagogue; this particular one in Jerusalem seemed to be for Hel. Jews whose ancestors had once been slaves.

See also aichmalōtos, captive, prisoner of war (171); desmios, bind (with bonds) (1300); doulos, slave (1528).

3342 (lithazō, to stone), → 3345.

3343 (lithinos, of stone), → 3345.

3344 (lithoboleō, to stone), → 3345.

3345 λίθος

λίθος (lithos), stone (3345); λίθινος (lithinos), of stone (3343); λιθάζω (lithazō), to stone (3342); λιθοβολέω (lithoboleō), to stone (3344); μύλος (mylos), mill, millstone (3685); μυλικός (mylikos), belonging to a mill (3683); μύλινος (mylinos), belonging to a mill (3684).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. lithos can be used for stones of every sort; lithinos means of stone. In particular one can distinguish building stones and precious stones.

2. (a) Usually the LXX translates the Heb. ʾeben by lithos (used 350x), though it translates other Heb. words that mean, e.g., millstones, boundary stones, piles of stones, precious stones, etc., usually without differentiating them. The most important of the occurrences of lithos are those in a theological context and are taken up in the NT. The vb. lithazō occurs only in 2 Sam. 16:6, 13, where it refers to pelting someone with stones. For the OT method of execution by stoning, the vb. lithoboleō is used (e.g., Lev. 20:2, 27; Deut. 13:10; Josh. 7:25).

(b) The word mylos, mill, occurring in cl. Gk. and the LXX (cf. Exod. 11:5; Deut. 24:6; Isa. 47:2), denotes two round, flat stones between which grain was placed and the husks removed by grinding. In Jdg. 9:53 Abimelech was killed by a millstone thrown by a woman as he besieged the tower at Thebez.

3. (a) In a threatening passage the prophet Isa. warns his people not to free themselves from the danger of an Assyrian invasion through self-sufficient and faithless exertions (Isa. 8:11–15). He testifies that the real danger for Judah is not the Assyrians but the proximity of God as their judge, who will become a "stone that causes men to stumble" (8:14). As someone might stumble over a stone in the middle of the night, God's people will be smitten unexpectedly by his judgment (see also petra, rock, 4376).

(b) Isa. 28:16a uses the image of the building of a house and the foundation stone. In contrast to the Jerusalem rulers' policy of alliances against Assyria, a policy doomed to fail, Yahweh is laying in Zion a firm foundation stone, which gives a stable base for the walls and the whole building. Isa. 28:16b—"The one who trusts will never be dismayed"—interprets the foundation stone, on which the building of the nation and state is to be erected, as faith and trust in Yahweh's help, which makes a search for alliances superfluous (for more on this passage, → gōnia, cornerstone, 1224).

(c) Likewise Ps. 118:22 cites what looks like a proverb about a cornerstone. The psalmist thanks Yahweh for the salvation he shares. He likens his existence, threatened by death, to a stone that the builders discarded as useless and his rescuing by Yahweh to a cornerstone or keystone of a building.

(d) Zech. makes several references to stone in his prophecy about the completion of the building of the postexilic temple by Zerubbabel: "'What are you, O mighty mountain? Before Zerubbabel you will become level ground. Then he will bring out the capstone [lit. in LXX, the stone of inheritance] to shouts of "God bless it! God bless it!" . . . Men will rejoice when they see the plumb line [lit. in LXX, the tin stone] in the hand of Zerubbabel'" (Zech. 4:7–10). The thought here is that mountains of opposition to God's work cannot impede it. The completion of the temple is symbolic of the victory of God's Spirit (cf. 4:6). It is possible for the "tin stone" to refer to a plumb line, though plumb lines were usually made of lead. The cause of rejoicing is the placing of a final ceremonial stone on the height of the temple walls by Zerubbabel.

(e) Dan. 2:34–35 tells of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, in which he saw a stone break off from a mountain without any human agency and shatter the great image on its feet of iron and clay. The image was dispersed without trace. "But the rock that struck the statue became a huge mountain and filled the whole earth." In 2:44–45 the dream is interpreted as the establishment of God's kingdom, which will crush all other kingdoms of the earth.

4. In intertestamental and post-NT Jud. the various sayings about stones were given a messianic interpretation. Already in the LXX the phrase "in him" was added to "the one who trusts" in Isa. 28:16. Jud. expected a glorification or renewal of the temple. The Qumran community regarded itself as the eschatological Israel, as God's true temple, and cited Isa. 28:16 as evidence (1QS 8:7–8).

NT In the NT most instances of the word lithos are in the Synoptic Gospels, esp. Matt. It is used lit. of a millstone (Lk. 17:2), a boulder (Matt. 27:60; 28:2), or a precious stone (Rev. 18:12, 16; 21:11, 19). Its fig. use is chiefly in connection with various OT quotations, which receive a messianic interpretation.

1. (a) The saying about the stones crying out (Lk. 19:40) is to be understood against an OT and Jewish background, where we occasionally get references to the accusing cry of lifeless objects (Gen. 4:10; Hab. 2:11; 2 Esd. 5:5).

(b) John the Baptist's saying that "out of these stones God can raise up children for Abraham" (Matt. 3:9; Lk. 3:8) means that God can fashion a new Israel from those who can claim no qualifications (like descent) of their own (cf. Rom. 4:9–25).

(c) In the saying that no stone of the temple will be left standing on another (Mk. 13:2), Jesus is most likely looking ahead to the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem, which took place in A.D. 70. This need not, however, indicate that the Gospel of Mk. was written after the Roman victory, for Jesus presumably has the ability to predict future events.

2. (a) Occasionally Jesus is likened to a stone. Mk. 12:10; Lk. 20:17–18 cites Ps. 118:22 in connection with the parable of the husbandmen: The stone rejected by the builders has become the cornerstone or keystone. He who is rejected by humans is the one exalted by God. According to Acts 4:10–11, this exaltation has already taken place in Jesus' resurrection. Eph. 2:20–22 also makes Jesus the cornerstone or keystone, which holds the whole building together, while the apostles and prophets form the foundation (→ gōnia, corner, 1224).

(b) On the other hand, Jesus is likened in Lk. 20:18 to a destroying stone that will crush its opponents, an allusion to Dan. 2:34. In Rom. 9:32 Paul quotes Isa. 8:14 and interprets the stone of offense as Christ, who has been the undoing of the Jews.

(c) In Rom. 9:33 and 1 Pet. 2:4–8 (cf. also Lk. 2:34) the positive interpretation of Jesus as the cornerstone or keystone is combined with the negative one of him as the destructive stone of offense by combining different OT quotations (→ petra, rock, 4376). This serves to show the significance of Jesus as both gospel and law, as both salvation and disaster. It is the faith of individual people that decides whether Christ the stone has a vital (1 Pet. 2:4) or a fatal (Lk. 20:18) effect.

3. In 1 Pet. 2:5 Christians are likened to "living stones ... built into a spiritual house" (cf. Eph. 2:20). The inanimate image of a building here is inadequate for the truth expressed. Because Christ lives, the foundation and thus the entire building is living; moreover, because Christians live through him they can be addressed as "living stones."

4. The word mylos, mill, figures in Jesus' warning about the suddenness of the Parousia and how unprepared some will be for it: "Two women will be grinding with a hand mill; one will be taken and the other left" (Matt. 24:41; cf. Num. 11:8). The fact that "the sound of a millstone will never be heard in you again" is a vivid way of expressing judgment on Babylon, i.e., godless civilization (Rev. 18:22). This follows 18:21: "Then a mighty angel picked up a boulder [lithos] the size of a large millstone and threw it into the sea, and said, 'With such violence the great city of Babylon will be thrown down, never to be found again.'" The judgment on Babylon recalls Jer. 51:60–64 (cf. 7:34; 16:9; 25:10), and the destruction by a stone is reminiscent of Dan. 2:34–35.

The millstone in Rev. 18:22 denotes a harmless and necessary activity, whereas the millstone in 18:21 becomes an instrument of destruction, as in Jesus' saying: "If anyone causes one of these little ones who believe in me to sin, it would be better for him to be thrown into sea with a large millstone tied around his neck" (Mk. 9:42; cf. Matt. 18:6; Lk. 17:1–2). The mylos onikos of Matt. and Mk. means lit. a "donkey stone"; Lk. has lithos mylikos, stone belonging to a mill, which signifies a large stone worked by donkey power. This was a serious warning for any who try to prevent the exercise of faith in Jesus' name; by graphic language it impresses the seriousness of the matter on the hearts of Jesus' listeners.

5. lithazō is used 9x in the NT and lithoboleō 7x, in each case referring to the act of execution or attempted execution via stoning (lithazō in Jn. 8:5; 10:31–33; Acts 14:19; lithoboleō in Matt. 21:35; Acts 7:58–59).

See also petra, rock (4376); gōnia, corner (1224); margaritēs, pearl (3449).

3349 λίμνη — λίμνη (limnē), lake (3349).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. limnē was used of a fresh- or saltwater pool or marsh; many Gk. poets used limnē for the sea. Gk. papyri used the word in the more modest sense of lake. limnē occurs occasionally in the LXX (e.g., Ps. 107:35; 114:8; 1 Macc. 11:35; 2 Macc. 12:16).

NT Lk. uses limnē for fresh-water lakes, being associated with the Sea of Galilee (Lk. 5:2; 8:22–33), also called the Lake of Gennesaret (5:1). Fig., limnē occurs in Rev. 19:20; 20:10–15; 21:8 for the lake of burning sulfur in which the ungodly will be destroyed.

See also thalassa, sea, lake (2498); pēgē, spring, source (4380); hydōr, water (5623); kataklysmos, a deluge, flood (2886); Iordanēs, the river Jordan (2674).

3350 (limos, hunger, famine), → 4277.

3356 λογεία — λογεία (logeia), collection (of money), tax (3356).

CL & OT The use of logeia in the pre-Christian era is not attested apart from occurrences in the papyri and inscriptions from the 3d cent. B.C. on. Where it does occur, it means a collection of money. There are no uses of this word in the LXX.

NT 1. logeia occurs 2x in the NT, both in 1 Cor. 16:1–2. Possibly in answer to a question from the Corinthians concerning the collection for the Jerusalem saints that had been posed in a letter to Paul, the apostle repeats instructions he had given to the Galatian churches. Every Sunday each believer was privately to set aside and store up some money in proportion to the income of the previous week, so that collections would not be needed after Paul arrived.

While some Jerusalem Christians may have regarded this collection as a sort of tax on Gentile Christians that was the rightful due of the mother church in the holy city (analogous to the Jewish temple tax), Paul promoted it both as an act of service to God (2 Cor. 9:12–13) that would honor Christ (8:19) and as a spontaneous gesture of brotherly love (cf. Rom. 12:13; 15:31; 1 Cor. 16:3; 2 Cor. 9:1, 5; Gal. 6:10) that called for generous giving (2 Cor. 8:7, 24; 9:5–14). He emphasizes that this giving should be voluntary, an act of free will, a noncompulsory sharing of one's material possessions with no stipulated amount (→ dekatos, tithe, 1281). The apostle also regarded it as a tangible expression by Gentile believers of their spiritual indebtedness to the church at Jerusalem (Rom. 15:19, 27).

2. Paul had earlier been involved in bringing money to Jerusalem for famine relief (Acts 11:27–30). His more systematic collection during his third missionary journey presumably began as an act of charity, motivated by the love of Christ. But as tensions increased between the Gentile mission led by Paul, with its more liberal attitude toward the law, and those at Jerusalem who clung to Jewish practices, the collection took on a Christological and soteriological significance. It became an expression of the solidarity of the Christian fellowship, showing that God had also called the Gentiles to faith. The high value the apostle placed on this collection in part explains his insistence on going to Jerusalem after his third missionary journey despite obvious dangers (20:3, 23; 21:4, 10–14). While we do not know the extent to which Paul accomplished his goals in the collection, his instructions have been immensely fruitful in formulating principles of Christian giving.

See also statēr, stater, a silver coin worth four drachmas (5088); telōnion, customs house, tax office (5468).

3357 λογίζομαι

λογίζομαι (logizomai), reckon, think, credit (3357); λογισμός (logismos), thought (3361).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. logizomai means to count, collect, reckon, calculate; also consider, deliberate, draw a logical conclusion, decide. Accordingly logismos means a counting or calculation; reflection, argument, thought, plan; the ability to draw a logical conclusion. The concept implies an activity of the reason that, starting with ascertainable facts, draws a conclusion, esp. a mathematical one or one pertaining to business, where calculations are essential. Plato uses it for thought unaffected by the emotions.

2. logizomai in the LXX often means to think, account (e.g., Gen. 15:6; 31:15; Num. 18:27, 30). But the vb. receives a new and personal slant here, for it can mean to care for, plan, intend. The objective reckoning of the intellect is replaced in the meaning of this word by the feeling of the heart conditioned by individual personality (e.g., Ps. 140:2; Isa. 10:7; Zech. 8:17). The personal element is seen also in the reckoning of guilt or righteousness (e.g., Gen. 15:6; 2 Sam. 19:19), often in Ps. (e.g., 32:2) and in the cultic imputation of guilt or purification (e.g., Lev. 7:18 = LXX 7:8; 17:4).

logizomai is sometimes used for one's relationship to God and often for God's purposes with us, whether they are thoughts of peace (2 Sam. 14:14) or punitive judgments (Jer. 49:20 = LXX 29:20; 50:45 = LXX 27:45), or whether he will change them, if his people will only repent (26:3 = LXX 33:3; 36:3 = LXX 43:3). Hence, this concept, which in Heb. expresses the emotional and personal and in Gk. the objective understanding of calculation and evaluation, can express both sides of the biblical message. God's personal, righteous dealings with his people on the basis of his law alone enable them to believe and to count on God. God does not act in an arbitrary and incalculable fashion; he has revealed his purpose and plan of salvation through the prophetic word.

NT 1. logizomai occurs 40x in the NT, of which 34x are in Paul. He uses logizomai and logismos in relating the foundation of faith to the righteousness of God. Since the apostle associates righteousness with the facts of the cross and resurrection of Jesus, he never separates the concept of logizomai from the personal activity of God in Jesus Christ. For him, faith is not an objective observing from a neutral vantage point, but being conquered by the crucified and risen Lord.

(a) When Paul in Rom. 2:15 mentions the "thoughts" (logismos) that can accuse or defend a person, he is not thinking of unemotional, philosophical thought, but of that reckoning and deduction that separates the good from the evil in a person's conscience. According to Paul, it is the living God who bears testimony in the human heart. Behind all the strivings of the heathen lies a standard that God has fixed—the work of natural law written in a person's inner being. Failure to reach this standard is recognized as guilt by the conscience, and the thoughts of the heart reckon in practice with God's judgment.

Humans can, however, use their thoughts to fortify themselves against the knowledge of the true God and his claims to obedience (2 Cor. 10:4–5). Therefore, Paul is concerned in his missionary work to reveal the divine purpose and act in Christ, and in the full authority of God to take clever human thoughts prisoner, so that their proud arrogance should bow to Christ in conquered and liberated freedom (cf. 10:5). Even so, this obedient logismos remains partial until it is perfected in eternity (1 Cor. 13:12).

(b) When the noēma, the mind (→ nous, mind, 3808), is so conquered, it grasps God's purpose and action in the cross; thereupon, the mind gladly acknowledges itself as conquered. Paul expresses this divine reckoning in 2 Cor. 5:19: "God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting [logizomai] men's sins against them." This does not mean that God does not take sin seriously. The reverse is true, but he deals with it in Christ. Since he does not impute sin to us, it has been truly removed (cf. Col. 2:13) in Christ and his work. Indeed, God "made him . . . to be sin for us" (2 Cor. 5:21). Sin has been completely settled on the cross.

This completely trustworthy attitude of God, in which he acts in this way for the sake of his righteousness, has its background in the prophetic oracle: The servant of the Lord "was numbered [logizomai] with the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12), where the suffering of the servant of the Lord is foretold. The passive ultimately implies God and his will; he bruised or crushed his servant not because of his sin, but because of ours. God laid the punishment on him so that we might have peace. That is how Lk. 22:37 understands this passage.

The converse of this statement is the reckoning of faith as righteousness in Paul's letters, linking it with Gen. 15:6 in Rom. 4:3–6, 8, 10, 22–24, and in Gal. 3:6. Faith was a merit for many of the rabbis, but Paul wished to reckon as God did, who reckoned salvation and righteousness to Abraham on the basis of faith in him and his word. God reckons on the basis of his promise (Rom. 9:8), and what he promises he performs.

(c) Because of the foregoing, those reconciled through Christ may and should so reckon and think. Hence, Paul draws clear theological (Rom. 3:28) and practical conclusions for himself and his readers (2 Cor. 10:7; cf. Rom. 2:3). The standard for our logizomai is, therefore, because of the cross, not a principle but a fact, to which every act and thought should conform.

Paul, therefore, in Rom. 8:18 already reckons with the glory that at some future time will be revealed and that will reduce all present suffering with Christ to insignificance. As Christ's sufferings, death, and resurrection have led to glory, so the church's suffering with him will lead to being glorified together with him. Thus, we also may count confidently on the coming glory.

(d) The sharing of the logizomai through faith is not a case of merely holding something to be true but is also an inspiration and activity. Thus, 1 Cor. 13:5 and Phil. 4:8 are to be expounded in the light of Zech. 8:17. This kind of thinking is not solely an intellectual construction, but can arrive at factual conclusions that demand corresponding actions (Rom. 14:14), just as word and act are one with God. Therefore, we should evaluate others and ourselves rightly, not by false standards, but as they and we stand in God's sight (1 Cor. 4:1; 2 Cor. 10:2; 11:5; 12:6; Phil. 3:13).

2. (a) John also writes of God's act on which faith is based (1 Jn. 1:1) and of the love revealed in this act (Jn. 3:16). But his purpose was not the same as Paul's. The latter was involved in conflict with Jud., and the unity of judgment and grace in the divine saving activity was the focus of his teaching. John's witness centers on the testimony that truth and life can be found only in Jesus Christ, who came in the flesh, died, and arose again. Hence, John found little use for the concept logizomai. He uses the word only in Jn. 11:50, in reporting the high priest Caiaphas's unconscious prophecy: "You do not realize [logizomai] that it is better for you that one man die for the people than that the whole nation perish."

(b) We find the word also in Acts 19:27; 1 Pet. 5:12, while Heb. 11:19 uses it in its full theological sense. Jas. 2:23 uses the quotation from Gen. 15:6 about the reckoning of faith as righteousness in his own way by pointing to Abraham's active obedience.

See also dialogizomai, ponder, consider, reason (1368); dokeō, trans. think, believe, consider; intrans. seem, appear (1506).

3358 (logikos, intellectual, rational, reasonable, spiritual), → 3364.

3359 (logion, saying), → 3364.

3360 (logios, eloquent, cultured), → 3364.

3361 (logismos, thought), → 3357.

3362 (logomacheō, to quarrel about words), → 3364.

3363 (logomachia, quarreling about words), → 3364.

3364 λόγος

λόγος (logos), word, utterance, meaning (3364); λέγω (legō), collect, count, say (3306); προλέγω (prolegō), say before, tell ahead of time (4625); λογικός (logikos), intellectual, rational, reasonable, spiritual (3358); λόγιον (logion), saying (3359); λόγιος (logios), eloquent, cultured (3360); ἄλογος (alogos), irrational, without speech (263); λαλέω (laleō), to talk, chat, speak (3281); λογομαχέω (logomacheō), to quarrel about words (3362); λογομαχία (logomachia), quarreling about words (3363).

CL 1. Early usage. Homer uses logos only 2x, both pl., as a synonym for mythos (myth) and epos (word, speech). Post-Homeric reserves epos for epic lit. based on the Homeric meter and mythos for fictitious stories (esp. of the gods), which have an inner content of truth. logos stays restricted to the meaning of discourse.

2. Philosophical usage. (a) The decisive change in the use of logos begins with Heraclitus (ca. 500 B.C.). For him logos can mean didactic discourse (teaching), word, and even reputation. But it can also denote proportion, meaning, universal law, and truth. Heraclitus was concerned with getting hold of the unity of the One and the All through the existence of the universal law of proportion that underlies continuous change. logos for him expresses both the thought process and its conclusion. Thus, logos originally had nothing to do with talking or speaking. Everything one sees is explored with the mind and is related together; this relationship is the logos of individual objects, contained in the objects themselves, and exhibits a law common to all existents.

Heraclitus's contemporary Parmenides combined logos with the idea of pure thought undisturbed by the senses. Thus he transplanted the realm of the logos to the other side of the deceptive world of appearances, in the world of pure being. Three things become evident for the first time in the logos-concept: antithetical argument, dualism, and the narrowing down of the concept of logos to the subjective sphere of the activity of thinking and the thought itself.

(b) For the Sophists (mid-5th cent.), philosophical reflection is directed toward humanity and toward the relationship between the individual and society. Through logos, discourse, people are able to play a sensible part in political life. In this scheme, logos takes on the meaning of the individual method of argument, the only important thing being to defend one's own proposition. Every logos contains a counter-logos, so that antithetical argumentation (good and bad; truth and falsehood) is recognized as the basic principle of debate. Thus people saw a great force in the logos; it had a pedagogic power by which the bad is reproved and the good praised.

(c) Socrates viewed discussion and debate as a community-producing activity as long as people were struggling for truth. Their purpose is not talking for talking's sake, but via reflection through dialogue to discover the logos of things.

(d) Plato, whose thought was concerned primarily with the concept of ideas or forms, added nothing decisively new to the understanding of logos. Even with Aristotle no new ground is broken; for him, humanity alone has logos, because their actions are determined by the word, and they are capable of speech and understanding.

(e) With the Stoics, a spiritualization of logos takes place. Their main question was not one of abstract truth but of ethics: How must I live in order to be able to be happy? The logos is the expression for the ordered and harmonious purpose of the world. It is equated with God; it is the constitutive principle of the cosmos, which extends through matter. For the Stoics truth derives from a specific point of origin in the Logos-God. There is a right logos or universal law that bestows on humans the power of knowledge and thus of moral behavior. In this connection a distinction is made between the inner logos (thinking), given by the God-Logos, and the logos ordained for articulation (speaking).

(f) In the post-NT era, logos thinking developed in Neo-Platonism, so that logos was conceived as a force that invests material objects with shape, form, and life, and is even bracketed together with life. In the mystery religions of this era, reflection did not focus on philosophical inquiry, but on cultic actions leading to purification and even deification. What one used for this was a sacred text (hieros logos), revealed by the founder of the cult or by those inspired by the divinity.

3. Usage in grammar, logic, and rhetoric. (a) Apart from its use in philosophical formulations, the word logos is used with striking precision in the field of grammar as a word, which is able to express everything that exists. Since a word is made up of various letters and words can be combined into a sentence, its possible uses are limitless. From this perspective developed grammar (the teaching of sentence analysis) and metaphysics (the teaching of the "logical" shape of the cosmos).

(b) Aristotle systematized this use of logos in that he first investigated the words in themselves before placing them in a meaningful context. The sentence gives the individual word its sense and defines its meaning, so logos came to mean the definition. Moreover, for Aristotle, logos means the conclusion, i.e., the final proposition of a line of syllogism. Finally, logos means the proof itself. As a result of this thinking, it becomes clear that the art of rhetoric works with the idea of logos, so that the logos becomes the stylistic form of orators.

OT 1. Heb. terms for word. Heb. has four terms for word: dābār, ʾēmer, ʾimrâ, and millâ. In the OT historical books logos is the primary rendering for dābār, while in the prophets rhēma (→ 4839) predominates. Note that dābār means word, report, and command, but also thing, matter, affair. The vb. legō stands chiefly for ʾāmar, to speak, say. The expression "word of Yahweh" (dᵉbar yhwh) is found 241x in the OT and has three main nuances. It is primarily a technical term for the prophetic revelation of the divine word, but it also designates the divine commandment and will for justice (e.g., Exod. 34:28) and the creatively efficacious activity of God in creation (Gen. 1) and nature (Ps. 29; 33). For more on these three nuances, see secs. 3–5.

2. Ancient oriental notion of the word of God. In the ancient Orient a word could be used as an indicative bearer of meaningful content (the noetic aspect of the word), but it was esp. a power that was efficacious in incantations and magical spells, in blessings and curses, even in the spatial and material world. A curse, for example, could penetrate the affected person like some disintegrating substance and bring destruction by spreading outward from within (the dynamic aspect of the word). In Israel, the creative word of God was purified of magical understanding to become the word of the God who by claim and promise gives shape to the world and to history. Note that what God says even in a "gentle whisper" is more powerful than wind, earthquake, or fire (1 Ki. 19:9–14).

3. The forms of the prophetic proclamation of the word of God. The subject matter of prophetic proclamation is the word of God. It is not the prophet who avails himself of the word, but Yahweh's word that takes the prophet into its service. (a) The word of God is a word of vocation. The special nature of prophetic proclamation finds expression in accounts of calls where the authority of the prophetic word is grounded solely in the word of God that gives the prophet his commission. Two forms of call can be distinguished: a direct appointment by divine discourse, often with a reluctance to accept the assignment (e.g., Jer. 1:4–10), and a vision seen by the prophet, where the call is a result of a consultation of Yahweh with his council (e.g., Isa. 6; Ezek. 1). In both forms, the word is essential. Thus, when the Lord speaks, the prophet cannot help but prophesy (Amos 3:8).

(b) The word of God is the word of a messenger. One of the most striking marks of the prophetic proclamation throughout the OT is the introductory formula, "This is what the LORD says." This formula presupposes that the messenger has received a message; sometimes, in delivering his message, he may refer back to this occasion (cf. Gen. 32:4–6; 2 Ki. 18:19, 29, 31). The adoption of this messenger formula indicates that the prophet is passing on the entrusted word of God. In the case of Ezek., this is pictured as the prophet ingesting God's word prior to his speaking it (3:1–11). The words that are spoken can contain both information from the Lord or rebuke.

(c) The word of God is often a word of judgment. The prophet names the crime and announces Yahweh's judgment, which can be directed against an individual king (e.g., 1 Ki. 21:17–19) or against Israel or Judah as a whole (e.g., Isa. 8:5–8; Amos 4:1–3). In the writing prophets, judgment is also pronounced on nations other than Israel (e.g., Isa. 13–21; Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 25–30; Amos 1; Obad.). As a word of judgment, the word of the Lord has power. The story of the scroll in Jer. 36 shows that even if people want to burn Yahweh's word (36:23), it remains in force nonetheless (36:32).

(d) The word of God can also be a word of deliverance and salvation. Esp. in the exilic and postexilic prophets one finds sections in which the prophet sees God restoring his people and reestablishing them in the promised land (e.g., Isa. 40; Jer. 30–33; Ezek. 37; 40–48). Yahweh is, after all, sovereign over all nations, and his word creates history.

4. The word of God as covenant commandment. (a) God's specific commandments, the proclamation of God's will for justice, are called "the Ten Commandments [lit., words]" in Exod. 34:28 and described more precisely as "the words of the covenant." These words are God's will for justice among his people and are introduced in 20:1 by: "God spoke all these words." The proper response to God's words is obedience. Thus the people "responded with one voice, 'Everything [lit., all the words] the LORD has said we will do.'" To facilitate this obedience, Moses wrote down "everything [lit., all the words] the LORD had said" (24:3–4).

(b) Time and again, when the prophets speak their words of judgment, they come back to the old covenant regulations as the basis for what they say. The people have disobeyed the word of the Lord by oppressing the poor and perverting justice (Amos 2:7–8; 3:9–10). Because they have transgressed the covenant law, the Lord will abrogate his covenant (Hos. 4:2–6). In Jer.'s temple speech the people have their sin uncovered in a Decalogue-like array of justice (cf. the enumeration of stealing, murdering, committing adultery, and perjury, 7:9).

(c) In Deut. not only is the covenant commandment designated as (lit.) "the ten words" (4:13; 10:4), but the multiplicity of commandments are designated as "words" (e.g., 1:1; 4:10), and an individual commandment as a (lit.) "word" (e.g., 15:15; 24:18, 22). In fact, "word" can be used in the sing. to denote God's entire law (e.g., Deut. 4:2; cf. Jos. 1:13), and in consequence to express total human dependence on this word (cf. this word is "your life," Deut. 32:47).

5. The word of God as the word of the creator. (a) Yahweh's word in creation, by which he has called heaven into existence (Ps. 33:6), is at the same time the word of salvation (33:4–5). Note that the creation narrative of Gen. 1, in which God's word figures so prominently, is also the opening chapter of the history of the covenant. This association of the word of the creator with salvation history corresponds with Isa. 40–55.

(b) There is also a correlation of the word of the creator with God's word of law. In Ps. 147:15–19 the creative "word" of God is specifically linked with meteorological phenomena (e.g., snow and hail, 147:16–17). But this same word that holds sway over nature is none other than the word of the covenant law, by which Yahweh lays claim to Israel: "He has revealed his word to Jacob, his laws and decrees to Israel" (147:19). Israel understands God's word as one word, evident both in creation and in redemption.

6. (a) In the Dead Sea Scrolls dābār occurs with the meaning word (esp. in hymns or exegetical works) or thing, matter (esp. in legal stipulations). The human word and the faculty of speech are considered to be particular miracles of the divine creation (1QH 1:28–29). But dābār also means the word of God, his commandment (4:35), and his promise (1QS 2:13). With the meaning affair, concern, dābār is the object of consultations in the community (6:1, 4, 16).

(b) In Philo rhēma is overshadowed by logos and simply means word; in grammar it means verb. Sometimes it is used to distinguish a thought from a deed.

(c) In rab. lit., and in Heb. generally, dābār means both word and matter. Humans have received, as something unique to them, words in their mouths. The rabbis warned, however, against loquaciousness, which leads to sin. In the practice of teaching, the dābār is associated with the all-dominant Torah, though this word is also used for "words of the tradition" and the "words of the scribes." With the meaning matter or thing, dābār is often used as a general designation for legal cases. The formula "another matter" sometimes indicates things that one does not want to mention by name, such as idolatry or sexual intercourse.

(d) In Targums the Aram. mêmrā', word, is used as a periphrasis for the God who reveals himself.

NT 1. The occurrence and significance of logos and legō in the NT. logos occurs 330x in the NT, meaning such things as statement (Matt. 5:37), utterance (12:32), question (21:24), report (28:15), discourse (15:12), command (Lk. 4:36), matter (Mk. 9:10), word of Scripture (1 Cor. 15:54), motive (Acts 10:29), instruction (Lk. 4:32), and Jesus as the Word (Jn. 1:1, 14). legō, to say, occurs 2353x in the NT, usually without special significance. laleō, to speak, occurs 296x, primarily in Luke and Paul.

2. The word of Jesus Christ. (a) The proclamation of Jesus. At the center of Jesus' message stands the proclamation of God's nearness and the inauguration of his kingdom, already present in Jesus' person and words. His words thus announce neither simply the presence nor exclusively the future of God's kingdom. Rather, he spoke of a coming of the future kingdom, which was already present in his words. Jesus rarely uses logos to mean "the word of God" in an absolute sense (cf. Mk. 4:13–20, the parable of the sower).

(i) Nowhere does Jesus follow the OT prophets in prefacing his words with the formula, "This is what the Lord says." The only thing in the NT that bears similarity is Lk. 3:2: "The word of God came to John." Lk. uses rhēma (word, → 4839) here of John the Baptist, the last of the prophets (cf. 16:16). Thus, Jesus' proclamation cannot be understood simply in prophetic categories. This is undoubtedly because of the close association of Jesus with God the Father and because Jesus himself is the Word (see below).

(ii) Jesus sets his message in contrast to that of the OT: e.g., "You have heard that it was said to the people long ago.... But I tell you ..." (Matt. 5:21–47). Jesus modifies the statements of the past that were regarded as having divine authority, setting his own I in the place where, in the prophets, we find Yahweh's. Jesus is not here claiming to be merely the legitimate interpreter of God's law. Rather, he is setting himself and his words up directly alongside God and the word of God.

The same is true of the formula, "I tell you the truth" (e.g., Mk. 3:28; 8:12; → amēn, amen, truly, 297). This formula was normally used to strengthen someone else's words and was used in OT times to introduce words of blessing or cursing. But Jesus uses it without exception in order to preface and strengthen his own words, thereby characterizing them as something sure and trustworthy.

(iii) Jesus intends his word to take the place of the Torah. Note Matt. 7:24, where he insists that those who hear his words and obey them will be like a wise man who builds his house on a rock. He claims divine authority for what he says. This authority is also illustrated in his call to discipleship, when Jesus says to certain men, "Follow me" (Mk. 2:14; cf. 1:16–20). This call of Jesus requires obedience. The power of Jesus' word is further reflected in the response of the hearers: They either take offense at his words (10:22) or are amazed "because he taught as one who had authority, and not as their teachers of the law" (Matt. 7:29).

(iv) The power of Jesus' word is also shown in the stories of healing, which take place through his word (Matt. 8:8; Mk. 2:11) or command (9:25). Note the close connection between Jesus' word of forgiveness (2:5) and his word of healing (2:11). The word of the judge of the entire world, who has the power to forgive sins, is proved in the healing of a paralyzed man to be an effective and a creative word.

Jesus' healings may never be detached from his proclamation. In Lk. 4:18 Jesus relates the prophetic word of Isa. 61:1–2 to his own mission: God sent him to bring good news to the poor and to give sight to the blind. In this unity of word and deed, the superiority goes to the word, for his primary task is to "preach" (Mk. 1:38); the healings are physical expression of his word.

(b) The heart and soul of Jesus' message is that of his suffering and death. This probably explains why he forbids people to spread the news about his miracles (e.g., Mk. 1:43–45), since he does not want them to get to know him as the Messiah by hearing tales of miracles. The true mystery of his messiahship and the center of his story are revealed in his passion and crucifixion. When Jesus speaks in parables, he is veiling his message (4:10–12); when he tells his disciples about his coming death and resurrection, he is speaking "plainly" (8:32).

3. The word concerning Jesus Christ. (a) Paul calls the message he proclaimed to his congregation "the word of God" (1 Cor. 14:36; 1 Thess. 2:13) or "the Lord's message [logos]" (1 Thess. 1:8). (i) Paul insists that the word he proclaims is founded directly on the revelation of the Son of God (Gal. 1:1, 15–16), but he also stresses that his message and that proclaimed by the Jerusalem apostles are the same. Closely following an early church confession, Paul preaches the message of the Son of God, who, on the basis of the resurrection, has been designated Son of God in all his power (Rom. 1:3–4). In 1 Cor. 15:1–8, the apostle reminds the church in Corinth that his message is the one he has received—Christ died, was buried, rose again, and appeared to eyewitnesses. By this message people are saved.

(ii) Paul describes the center of his proclamation as "the message of the cross" (1 Cor. 1:18). He publicly proclaimed the crucified Christ in the Galatian congregations (Gal. 3:1) and made it the sole content of his preaching (1 Cor. 2:2). This word stands in absolute opposition to "the wisdom of the world" (1:18–2:16), in that it makes nonsense of the wisdom of this world and the boasting of those who claim superior knowledge (4:8). Thus, it stands in opposition to a theology of glory consonant with such a wisdom, where the cross and the crucified one no longer have any place (cf. 2:8). That word of the cross is at the same time "the word of life" (Phil. 2:16).

(iii) Paul calls the word of the cross "the message [logos] of reconciliation" in 2 Cor. 5:19. This word, which is passed on by the apostolic "ministry of reconciliation" (5:18), is founded on the event of reconciliation in Jesus' death, which took place "while we were still sinners" (Rom. 5:8–10). Reconciliation with God is available for all humans (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14, "one died for all"; also Col. 1:19–22). Still, this word of reconciliation must be distinguished from the reconciliation itself. Paul himself distinguishes between the historical event of the reconciliation of the world and the speaking event of the word concerning this event.

(iv) As Paul in Rom. 9:9 designates the word of election to Isaac as the word of God, so Christ, the "Yes" of God's promises (2 Cor. 1:19–20), makes the word of proclamation an unambiguous word of salvation (1:18). His representative death and the curse laid on him fulfills the word of promise given to Abraham (Gal. 3:6–14; cf. Gen. 12:3; 15:6; 18:18), which retains its validity for Israel, even though they rejected the Messiah. Thus, the question as to the validity of God's word in view of Israel's rejection of the Messiah becomes the keynote of Rom. 9–11: "It is not as though God's word had failed" (9:6). For Paul, the question of the fulfillment and the abiding validity of the OT word of promise means nothing less than that the whole perspicuity and trustworthiness of the word of reconciliation and justification are at stake. At times NT writers use prolegō to refer to God's message spoken beforehand through OT prophets (e.g., Rom. 9:29; Heb. 4:7; 2 Pet. 3:2).

(v) The word of God, which according to Paul is promulgated in the shape of a human word, might easily be confused with other human words. This is why Paul thanks God that the church at Thessalonica accepted what they heard from him "not as the word of men, but as it actually is, the word of God" (1 Thess. 2:13).

When Paul arrived in Thessalonica, he worked hard to earn his own living and proclaimed the word of God to the people there without any attempt to impress by appearances (2:9–10). He consciously avoided proclaiming the word of God like the wandering apostles of the day; he did not use enthusiastic speech or human power, did not draw on impressive words of wisdom, and did not falsify God's word (1 Thess. 2:5; cf. 1 Cor. 2:1, 4, 13; 2 Cor. 2:17; 4:2). Instead, and in order to legitimate the word of God, he pointed to his human weakness (cf. 10:10) and to his persecution as a disciple of the cross (Gal. 6:17). Knowing the humanity of the word of God, Paul also instructed the church to give precedence in worship to intelligible language rather than unintelligible indulgence of one's own possession of the Spirit (1 Cor. 14:9, 19).

(b) The author of Heb. begins by pointing out how God has spoken repeatedly and in various ways through the prophets. But in these last days he has spoken through his Son (1:1–4) as God's final word, which ushers in the turning point of the ages. As a word of promise directed toward a coming fulfillment, it is "living and active" and "sharper than any double-edged sword" (4:12). This word of God, which had its beginning in the words of Jesus (2:3), is grounded in the exaltation of Jesus to the right hand of God (1:5–13) and in his installation as eschatological high priest (7:1–8:2).

This installation into the authority of the high priest, grounded in the divine (lit.) "word of the oath" (Heb. 7:28), introduces us to "a better hope" (7:19), to God's decisive word of promise guaranteed by oath. That word of promise is also the effective summons to the church to "hold unswervingly to the hope we profess" (10:23). As a "word of exhortation" (13:22), Heb. itself is directed to the church, now grown weary in the face of the persecutions and sufferings.

(c) Acts uses, as a regular periphrasis for the apostolic preaching, the "word of God" (e.g., 6:2, 7; 13:5), "the word of the Lord" (e.g., 8:25; 13:49), or even simply "the word" (e.g., 8:4). This is linked with "the message [logos]" that God sent to the Israelites (10:36), which has for its content the word event of the historical Jesus (10:37–43). This apostolic proclamation of Christ (8:25; 13:5, 46), which God himself (17:30) proclaims, is "the message [logos] of salvation" (13:26), intended for both Jews and Gentiles. The word of God is commended to the church (20:32), is powerful (19:20), grows (6:7; 12:24), and spreads throughout the land (cf. 1:8). Acts closes (28:30–31) with Paul proclaiming the kingdom of God and the gospel of Jesus Christ in Rome.

4. Jesus Christ as the Word. (a) John's Gospel, like the Synoptics, identifies Jesus' preaching as the proclamation of the word of God. Jesus' words are those of the Father, in which the work of the Father is performed (14:24). Anyone, therefore, who hears Jesus' words and accepts them in faith hears God's word (5:24; 12:48–49; 14:24). Because Jesus' word is at the same time the word of the Father, it is therefore the word of life (5:24), salvation (8:51), and truth (17:17). But over and above the statement that Jesus' word is the word of God, Jesus is himself called "the Word" (Jn. 1:1, 14; 1 Jn. 1:1; Rev. 19:13).

(b) Many scholars consider the prologue to the Gospel of Jn. (1:1–18) to be a hymn to Christ, either written by John or picked up (and adapted) by him. It has four main themes: the divine existence of the Word and his function in creation (1:1–3); the function of this Word as light and life for the world of humanity (1:4–5, 9); the rejection of the Word and his work in the world both before and after his incarnation (1:10–11); and the event of the incarnation of the Word and its believing acceptance in the Christian community (1:14, 16).

This prologue stresses the preexistent being of the Word even before time began. The Word was not only with God, he was God. By this Word, the universe was created and humans have life and the benefit of light (Jn. 1:1–4). The Logos then came into the world, to whom John the Baptist bore witness (1:6–8). He was rejected by his people in an incomprehensible way (1:9–11), although some did come to faith and thus became children of God (1:12–13). Without surrendering his essential divinity, the Word became a mortal human (sarx, flesh, → 4922), took up residence among the human race, and, as the presence of God's glory, signified the gift of God's grace and covenant faithfulness to them (1:14, 16), surpassing the OT revelation of the word (1:17–18).

(c) The source of this concept of Jesus as the Logos continues to be a matter of scholarly debate. As has been noted in the cl. Gk. section (see above), logos became an increasingly important word in the Gk. philosophical tradition. But logos was also important in the OT (also see above)—though we should stress that the OT never uses that word as a person and certainly never as an incarnate divine being. Thus, Jn.'s concept transcends the OT concept of logos. In Jewish speculations on wisdom, wisdom participates in the creation of the world, is sent into the world by God, and rejected by humans (e.g., Prov. 8:22–36; Sir. 24:3–12). But note that the word logos is never used for this concept. This would argue against a direct derivation of Jn.'s logos concept from Jewish wisdom speculations. A derivation of the logos concept from Aram., rab., or gnostic sources is also doubtful.

Perhaps the most likely source for Jn.'s use of logos is Hel. Jud. In Wis. 18:14–19, for example, God's all-powerful logos comes down from heaven and brings judgment on the Egyptians. Esp. Philo's doctrine of the logos provides a strong contact with Jn.'s concept of the logos. In Philo not only is Jewish wisdom identified with the Logos (which Philo understands as a mediating power between God and the creation and to which he ascribes divine predicates), but he also combines OT statements of creation by the word with Stoic statements of the Logos as the world soul and Platonic elements of the Logos as the archetype of the created world.

Yet even here there are contrasts. In Philo, the divine Logos binds together the heavenly and earthly world and rules over and through both macrocosm and microcosm. In Jn. 1, however, the Logos no longer works "spiritually" but is found embodied in a mortal human. It no longer embraces the whole world in a simultaneous transcendence and immanence in order to mediate salvation through inspiration, but the Logos becomes one man and takes human sin on himself. As the Word, God himself (1:1–2) in his divine glory (1:14–15) assumes the full reality of historical objectivity, human transience, and human death. Jesus, the Logos, signifies the presence of God in the flesh. A religious or philosophical parallel to this statement has not been found.

5. Cognates. (a) Apollos is described in Acts 18:24 as a "learned [logios] man." Whether or not the Apollos faction in Corinth was attracted to him because of such learning cannot be known for sure (1 Cor. 1:10–12).

(b) logion (only in pl. logia in NT) is used in the LXX for an oracular saying (Num. 24:4, 16), an individual saying (Isa. 28:13), and the commandments (Deut. 33:9); but it is also used as a general statement about the word of God (e.g., Ps. 12:6; Isa. 5:24). Similarly, in Acts 7:38 Moses is said to have received "living words [logia]," i.e., the Torah or perhaps the Decalogue (cf. Deut. 32:46–47), while in Rom. 3:2 Paul lists among the advantages of the Jews the fact that they were entrusted with the "very words [logia] of God" (cf. 15:8). But these advantages did not turn out to be an abiding benefit, for the Jews did not use them for salvation. The readers of Heb. 5:12 are rebuked for needing instruction again in "the elementary truths of God's word [logia]," which suggests a failure to grasp not only the OT revelation but the word of God in Jesus Christ (cf. 1:2). In the context of an exhortation to use gifts for one another, Peter urges: "If anyone speaks, he should do it as one speaking the very words [logia] of God" (1 Pet. 4:11); i.e., no one should speak his or her own opinions but only what God has revealed, to his own glory.

(c) prolegō, speak ahead of time, in addition to referring to the OT prophets, is also used to refer to prophecies of Jesus (Matt. 24:25) and his apostles (Jude 17), as well as to warnings that Paul gave on earlier occasions to his churches (2 Cor. 13:2; Gal. 1:9; 5:21; 1 Thess. 4:6).

(d) alogos in Acts 25:27 has the sense of without reason, but in 2 Pet. 2:12 and Jude 10 it can mean either without reason or dumb.

(e) In 1 Pet. 2:2 the author writes: "Like newborn babies, crave pure spiritual [logikos] milk, so that by it you may grow up in your salvation." Although this Gk. word usually meant reasonable or rational in cl. Gk., it seems best to translate it as "spiritual" here. This meaning also suits Rom. 12:1, where Christian worship in the Spirit is set over against Jewish conceptions of religion. But logikos may have been chosen in both these places because of the ambiguity of both spiritual and rational. Paul, for example, may be emphasizing the need for charismatic worship to express itself in forms that were at once spiritual and rational rather than ecstatic and free-floating.

(f) The vb. logomacheō and the noun logomachia each occur once in the Pastoral Letters. Paul ends 1 Tim. with a warning about contentious teachers who have a craving for controversies and "quarrels about words," which disrupt and even destroy the church (1 Tim. 6:3–5). Similarly, Paul urges Timothy to warn God's people "against quarreling about words," which ruins the hearers (2 Tim. 2:14). These passages probably refer to the heretics in view in these letters, who occupy themselves with myths and endless genealogies (cf. 1 Tim. 4:3; 6:20; 2 Tim. 2:14–18; Tit. 1:14–16; 3:9). The precise nature of the teaching is obscure, though it would seem to be some form of early Gnosticism.

See also glōssa, tongue, language, speech (1185); rhēma, word, utterance, thing, matter, event, case (4839).

3366 λοιδορέω

λοιδορέω (loidoreō), insult, abuse, revile (3366); λοιδορία (loidoria), insult, abuse, railing (3367); λοίδορος (loidoros), railing, abusive, a reviler (3368); ἀντιλοιδορέω (antiloidoreō), abuse or revile in turn (518).

CL & OT 1. This word group is frequently found in cl. Gk., though generally not in a religious sense. Rather it was in the political and social life of the Gks. that importance came to be attached to slander, insult, and disparagement of an opponent, e.g., as an orator's weapon in a political dispute. For a Gk. person one of the arts of life was to know how to insult others or how to bear insults against oneself.

2. In the LXX these words are similar to cl. Gk. They occur altogether only 21x. The vb. means to quarrel, accuse, rebuke (e.g., Gen. 49:23; Jer. 29:27 = LXX 36:27; 2 Macc. 12:14). loidoria means slander (e.g., Exod. 17:7; Num. 20:24; Prov. 10:18; 20:3). loidoros means strife, contention (Prov. 25:24; 26:21; 27:15; Sir. 23:8).

NT 1. In the NT these words occur only 10x. They retain the meaning they have in cl. Gk., although they are used chiefly in religious contexts. The suffering of slander and insults is part of the cross that the Christian disciple is called to bear (1 Cor. 4:12; 1 Pet. 2:23). This is more than simply imitating Christ. As those who have been freed in order to obey, we constantly encounter the unredeemed character of the world and share our Lord's suffering in it. We must maintain the faith in the form of love even toward our enemies (cf. loidoria in 1 Pet. 3:9). When reviling is answered with blessing, we manifest the power of Jesus Christ (cf. 2:23) and of the gospel to overcome the world, which has to be worked out in faith.

We therefore find loidoros twice in lists of sins, indicating conduct not becoming to the Christian (1 Cor. 5:11; 6:10). Nor should Christians themselves give any cause for evil gossip (1 Tim. 5:14), because their lives should be a testimony to our Lord. They will, however, have to endure reviling for their Lord's sake (cf. Jn. 9:28).

2. The case is different in Acts 23:4–5. loidoreō is here used in the same way as blasphēmeō. Paul utters a curse, pronouncing God's judgment on the high priest, because he was misusing the authority given to him by God. Paul's statement that he did not know he was addressing the high priest should probably be understood as ironical: Ananias was not behaving as a high priest in the way he executed his office. If he had been behaving in a proper manner, Paul's curse would have been blasphemy.

See also blasphēmeō, slander, defame, blaspheme (1059); katalaleō, speak evil of, rail at, slander (2895); oneidizō, insult, denounce, rebuke (3943).

3367 (loidoria, insult, abuse, railing), → 3366.

3368 (loidoros, railing, abusive, a reviler), → 3366.

3370 (loipos, remaining, other), → 3309.

3373 (loutron, bath, washing), → 3374.

3374 λούω

λούω (louō), wash (3374); ἀπολούω (apolouō), wash, wash away (666); λουτρόν (loutron), bath, washing (3373).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. louō means wash, (mid.) wash oneself, take a bath; generally it indicates washing the whole body in contrast to niptō, which was used for washing parts of the body, and plynō, which was used of objects, especially clothes. apolouō is a strengthened form of louō. loutron means the place where one has a bath or simply the bath.

Washing for ritual purification was common among ancient peoples of the Orient. The origin of religious lustrations lies in animistic religion, when people believed that certain waters were impregnated with the power of deity and that this power was communicated to persons and objects plunged in them. Such washings safeguarded a person approaching a deity and seeking protection from demonic assaults. When the nature of religious belief changed, the lustrations were spiritualized and extended in their application. Thus, washing was required before prayer, in preparation for initiation into religious cults, and after bloodshed in war.

2. Similar phenomena may be traced in the OT, though with an emphasis more in keeping with the OT view of sin and uncleanness. When Aaron approached the holy God in the Most Holy Place on the Day of Atonement, he had to bathe his body in water, put on holy garments (Lev. 16:4), offer a sacrifice (16:6), and burn incense in the sanctuary "so that he will not die" (16:13).

The processes of birth, sickness, and death all entail ritual uncleanness. Purification by washing in water is required after sexual emissions (Lev. 15:16–18), menstruation (15:19–30), birth (12:1–8), and contact with leprosy (13:1–14:32) or death (Num. 5:1–3; 19:11–22). The conviction of Israel's exclusive relationship with Yahweh possibly lent to these rites a polemic aspect. If Israel's neighbors resorted to magical rites to secure aid from the gods in the critical moments of life, the answer of Israel's priests was to urge cleansing from them all and to be exclusively devoted to Yahweh. In the last days God himself promised to sprinkle water on his people and to give them a new heart and a new spirit (Ezek. 36:25); he would open up a fountain to purify them from sin and uncleanness (Zech. 13:1), and he would purge them with fire and fuller's bleach (Mal. 3:1–4).

3. At Qumran, the sectaries stressed the necessity for repentance if the ritual bath was to be efficacious for religious cleansing.

NT 1. (a) louō occurs only 5x in the NT. In Acts 16:33 it has a nonreligious meaning, but in Jn. 13:10 it relates to washing for purification and entails a contrast between washing the entire body (louō) and rinsing individual limbs (niptō). It is improbable that any reference to Christian baptism is intended in this passage.

(b) In Heb. 10:22, however, Christians have their "hearts sprinkled (rhantizō) to cleanse us from a guilty conscience" and their "bodies washed (louō) with pure water." We should not interpret this as a contrast between internal cleansing by the blood of Christ's sacrifice and external cleansing by baptism. If the sprinkling and the washing do not both refer to cleansing waters (as in Ezek. 36:25 and the Qumran writings), the cleansing blood of Christ is thought of as effective in baptism, just as the cleansing power of baptism is the shed blood of Christ (cf. Rom. 6:1–4).

(c) In Acts 22:16 apolouō undoubtedly relates to baptism. The similarity of language in 1 Cor. 6:11 indicates that it, too, has in view the cleansing of sins in baptism. One should note in both cases the aor. tense of the verbs, pointing to a single occasion of washing, sanctification, and justification. "In the name of Jesus Christ" reflects the use of Jesus' name in baptismal formulas; "by one Spirit" links the action of the Spirit with baptism (cf. Acts 2:38; 1 Cor. 12:13; etc.).

2. loutron appears twice in the NT, both in contexts that relate to baptism; they denote the act rather than the place of washing. Eph. 5:26 may allude to the ceremonial bath taken by a bride in preparation for marriage. For the bride of Christ (→ nymphē, 3811), the counterpart to this bath is baptism, in which the members of the body are cleansed "by the washing with water through the word" (i.e., the confession that "Jesus is Lord" [Rom. 10:9]). In Tit. 3:5 baptism is "the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit." The "washing" is not that which effects the renewal. Rather, it is the occasion when the Spirit creatively works in the individual, just as he made the community of disciples the body of Christ at Pentecost (Acts 2:33) and at the end will produce a new creation (Matt. 19:28).

See also baptizō, baptize, immerse (966); niptō, wash (3782).

3382 λυπέω

λυπέω (lypeō), inflict pain (3382); λύπη (lypē), sorrow, pain (3383).

CL & OT 1. lypē denotes physical pain and emotional suffering. Joy and sorrow are part and parcel of human life. Hel. philosophy understood sorrow as the antithesis to the joy that is worth striving for. The Stoics held that a human being's task was to overcome sorrow through frugality and impassiveness. Only later, esp. in Gnosticism, was a more positive understanding of sorrow attained: Through accident, sickness, and pain humans are refined and brought to salutary repentance.

2. lypeō occurs approximately 50x in the LXX to denote physical hardship, pain, sorrow, grief, mourning, fear, displeasure, and anger (mainly in the later OT writings and the Apocr., esp. Dan., Prov., Sir., and Macc.). In the ANE emotions are a part of everyday life and are not subjected to any kind of theoretical analysis.

The explanation of sorrow and pain given in Gen. 3 is that lypē is sent by God as a result of the fall (3:16–19). Wisdom lit. speaks of the lypē that is present even in joy (Prov. 14:13) and has to be overcome (Sir. 30:21–23). When Isa. (1:5) says that the "whole heart" of the people is "afflicted" (lit., "in pain"), he means that they are in the worst state imaginable. Eschatological salvation is promised as a time without sorrow and sighing (35:10; 51:11); the age to come will know nothing but joy and glory (cf. 2 Esd. 7:13).

NT In the NT (as in the LXX) there are fewer references to mourning than to its opposite, joy. Specifically, lypeō occurs 26x and lypē 16x, whereas chairō (→ 5897) and chara occur 74x and 59x respectively. While Matt. prefers the vb. lypeō and Jn. the noun lypē, both vb. and noun occur most frequently in 2 Cor., a fact that indicates Paul's profound personal understanding of "godly sorrow." The sufferings of this present time are regarded as contrary to the purpose of creation—hence the longing to be free of them.

1. In general lypē in the NT denotes both physical and emotional pain. Jesus experienced fear and dread before his death (Matt. 26:37–38). Paul was "grieved" (perhaps ill-treated) by a member of the Corinthian church (2 Cor. 2:5). In 2 Cor. 2:1–5 Paul hopes that the Corinthians will cause him no further grief. The OT expectation of salvation is reflected in the NT as future consolation and is promised to those now sorrowing. Rev. looks forward to a new heaven and a new earth from which pain and sorrow will be banished (cf. 7:17; 21:4).

2. Paul portrays lypē as an essential mark of the Christian life. In 2 Cor. 7:8–11 he contrasts "godly sorrow" with "worldly sorrow." The latter laments personal disappointment and the transitoriness of life, but godly sorrow brings one to see one's own guilt and leads to repentance (7:10). Within the framework of his theology of the cross, Paul speaks of himself as taking up the cross of Christ (cf. Gal. 6:14). This lays on his shoulders the cross of this world's sorrow and pain—hence the list of his sufferings in 2 Cor. 4:8–12 and 11:23–33. While non-Christians fear loss of their lives, Christians find new life (4:11; Phil. 3:10–11) in being crucified with Christ (Rom. 6:6). This leads to a paradox in the believer's experience, for all the normal values relating to life and suffering are reversed (cf. the antitheses of 2 Cor. 6:3–10).

3. What Paul describes as a paradox in Christian experience is set out in Jn. 16:20–22 as a temporal sequence. The church at the present time "grieves" because of Christ's departure and apparent absence, though for the "world" this is a cause for rejoicing. Jn. shows that the present lot of the church is to endure loneliness and the world's hatred. At the same time, however, the departing Christ promises his church joy at his return; this joy no one will take from her (16:22).

See also klaiō, weep (3081); koptō, strike (3164); brychō, gnash (1107); pentheō, be sad, grieve, mourn (4291); stenazō, to sigh, groan (5100).

3383 (lypē, sorrow, pain), → 3382.

3386 (lysis, release, divorce), → 3395.

3389 λύτρον

λύτρον (lytron), price of release, ransom, ransom price (3389); ἀντίλυτρον (antilytron), ransom, ransom price (519); λυτρόω (lytroō), to ransom, redeem (3390); λύτρωσις (lytrōsis), redemption, deliverance, release (3391); ἀπολύτρωσις (apolytrōsis), redemption, deliverance, release (667); λυτρωτής (lytrōtēs), redeemer (3392).

CL & OT 1. lytron and antilytron (only postbiblical in secular Gk.) denote the means or money for a ransom. The pl. lytra is common. We find also the meaning of recompense. Among the Gks. a ransom was often paid to free slaves, but the word is seldom found in cultic contexts. lytroō means to free by a ransom, redeem. It is used only in act. in cl. Gk., but is mid. or pass. in biblical Gk. lytrōsis and apolytrōsis, synonyms meaning freeing, redeeming, are rare. lytrōtēs, redeemer, is found only in biblical Gk.

2 (a). In the LXX the sing. lytron is found only in Lev. 27:31; Prov. 6:35; 13:8; otherwise it is always in pl. lytron often translates Heb. kōper, which denotes the gift in exchange for a life, which according to the sacred law is forfeited or has come under the punishment of God (Exod. 21:30; 30:12). A ransom was not to be paid for a murderer (Num. 35:31–32). It is not usually clear whether God or those who represent him (i.e., priests) are the recipients of the ransom money. This use of lytron has included the notion of reconciliation (for more on the related vb. kipper, to reconcile, → hilaskomai, 2661).

(b) lytron is used for words derived from pādâ, ransom, redeem (cf. Lev. 19:20; Num. 3:46–51; 18:15). This has to be paid for those who by sacred law belong to God (e.g., a firstborn man or animal). It can be paid by animal sacrifice (Exod. 13:13, 15; 34:20) or money (30:13–16). Lev. 19:20 uses lytra for the ransoming of a slave girl.

(c) lytra also renders the noun gᵉʾullâ, redemption (from the vb. gāʾal, redeem, act as kinsman; → lyō, 3395). The redeemer (gōʾēl) was originally the closest relative who, as the avenger of blood, had to redeem the blood of the murdered victim (Num. 35:19, 21, 24, 25, 27; Jos. 20:3, 5) as well as a family possession that had been sold (Lev. 27:13, 15, 19–20, 31), and even the person whose economic plight had caused him to sell himself to a non-Jew (25:48–49). In 25:26, 51–52 the gᵉʾullâ is the price of redemption. In 25:24 it means redemption, while in 25:29, 31–32, 48; Ruth 4:6; Jer. 32:8 it signifies the right of redemption.

(d) The duties prescribed by these OT laws are understandable against the background of the covenant that made Israel Yahweh's unique possession (Exod. 19:5), among whom he dwelt (25:8). The land was Yahweh's and given to Israel through Yahweh's saving intervention as Lord of history. Therefore the land was not to be sold in perpetuity (Lev. 25:23), but rather to be redeemed (25:24). By being redeemed out of Egypt, Israel had become Yahweh's servants (25:38, 55; cf. Deut. 15:15); thus, the impoverished Israelite who had sold himself into slavery was either to be redeemed (Lev. 25:55) or to be released in the Year of Jubilee (25:50, 54).

3. The vb. lytroō occurs more frequently in the LXX than lytron. In most cases Yahweh is the subj. (e.g., Exod. 6:6; Deut. 7:8; 9:26; Neh. 1:10; Ps. 25:22; Isa. 51:11; Jer. 15:21; Hos. 7:13). The basic idea of making free by a ransom can be seen in Exod. 34:20; Lev. 19:20; 25:25. But in other places, lytroō no longer refers to a material price paid but simply to the redeeming activity of God, who freed Israel from slavery in Egypt. It is the use of his power in the service of his love and faithfulness that redeems from bondage. In Isa. the deliverance is in the first place the freeing of Israel from Babylonian captivity and the return of the people (41:14; 47:4). The foreign nations are to receive no ransom for them; in fact, God gives them as ransom for Israel (43:1–4; 45:13).

4. In the intertestamental period, since the dominion of foreigners over Israel continued, words in this group received a political and nationalistic connotation (Pss. Sol. 9:1; 12:6). The Qumran texts also stress this aspect (1QM 1:12–13; 14:5–6). Redemption was often conceived of in a wider sense. Especially in Ps. the thought is of the individual: God redeems a person from oppression and wrong (Ps. 31:5; 72:14), from destruction (103:4; Sir. 51:2), and from sin (Ps. 130:8).

5. In Lev. 25:29, 48 lytrōsis means the right of redemption of property that has been sold. Ps. 49:8 states that there is no ransom from death. In Isa. 63:4 the judgment on the heathen appears to Israel as "the year of my redemption." Ps. 111:9 thinks of Israel's redemption in general and 130:7 of redemption from sin. apolytrōsis is used in the LXX only in Dan. 4:34 of the freeing of Nebuchadnezzar from his madness. God is twice called lytrōtēs, redeemer (Ps. 19:14; 78:35).

6. Jud. reflected much on the OT statements about ransom money. Above all, the good deeds of the martyrs appeared as a ransom with atoning power (cf. 4 Macc. 6:28–29; 17:22). On the other hand, it is stressed that there is no ransom for the Gentiles in the final judgment (cf. 1 Enoch 98:10). gā'al is used only once in the Qumran texts as kinsman or protector (CD 14:16); pādâ is more important. In 1QH, for example, the author praises God for delivering him from his enemies (2:32, 35) and from destruction (3:19).

gā'al is often used of the exodus deliverance in rab. lit. Both gā'al and pādâ are frequent in the Mishnah in cases of legal and cultic redemption. gā'al is also applied to Israel's future deliverance when all afflictions will be ended. The rabbis used gō'ēl for the coming Messiah, the redeemer of the glorious future.

NT 1. In the NT lytron is found only in the saying of Jesus in Matt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45: "The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom [lytron] for many" (cf. also Lk. 22:27, which stresses the serving nature of Jesus, but does not include the ransom element). Mk. 10:45 has often been interpreted in the light of the suffering servant of Isa. 53 (esp. 53:10–12), where the sacrifice of one man is contrasted with the many, for whom it is made. Note that in Qumran "the many" is sometimes a technical term for the elect community. Thus, Mk. 10:45 seems to combine the substitutionary redemption of Isa. 53 by the one on behalf of many with the idea that the many are the elect community.

The reconciling significance of Jesus' passion, which in Mk. 10:45 is designated by the word lytron, corresponds to what in Heb. was expressed by the kipper word group (→ hilaskomai, reconcile, 2661). In the earliest form of NT proclamation it was expressed in the formula that "Christ died for [hyper] our sins according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. 15:3). Whereas atoning value is ascribed to the sufferings of the Jewish martyrs in 2 Macc. 7:37; 4 Macc. 6:28; 17:21–22, this passage offers a parallel and a stark contrast. It affirms that atonement is made by suffering, but it implicitly denies that such atonement can be made by Jewish martyrs; rather, it is brought about by Jesus alone. The prep. hyper suggests that Jesus' suffering is a substitute suffering, in the place of those condemned to sin and death; by his suffering, he sets us free.

In other words, the ransom notion has not only an atoning but also a liberating aspect. The many are set free not only from guilt, but also from its consequences, death and judgment. In Mk. 8:37 Jesus asks: "What can a man give in exchange for his soul?" (→ katallassō, reconcile, 2904). The question finds its answer in Mk. 10:45. The same Jesus, who completes his service in giving up his life, is the Son of Man who will come in glory (Matt. 25:31). Jesus does not say who will receive the ransom. Since Mk. 8:33 pictures Satan as endeavoring to prevent Jesus' path of suffering, we can think only of God in this context.

2. The rare word antilytron, ransom, not found in the LXX, occurs in the NT only at 1 Tim. 2:6 in the context of an exhortation to prayer for all people, including kings and those in high positions: "For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom [antilytron] for all men . . ." (1 Tim. 2:5–6). The saying points back to Mk. 10:45. Whereas Mk. 10:45 speak of a lytron anti ("a ransom for"), Paul uses a noun that combines the noun lytron and the prep. anti in a single word, suggesting a ransom that has been completely paid. The use of anti may even accentuate the notion of exchange. The word "all" in "all men" denotes either that the effect of Jesus' death is available for all people or that he is a ransom for all kinds of people, including pagan rulers (cf. 1 Tim. 2:1), whom some Christians might deem to be beyond the pale. What is clear in 2:6 is that Paul extends the "many" of Mk. 10:45 to include not only the Gentiles who have actually responded to the gospel but to pagan rulers who at the time might be hostile.

Similar thoughts on Christ's death as a ransom given in love may be found elsewhere in Paul. His self-giving in death is grounded in love (Gal. 2:20; Eph. 5:2). Believers are bought with a price (1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23) that was paid to atone for sin and its consequences (Gal. 1:4; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14). Christ's death is a propitiation (Rom. 3:25) that brings about reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:18–21).

3. lytrōsis, deliverance, release, redemption, occurs twice in the birth and infancy narratives of Lk. and once in Heb. Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, sang a song of prophecy after the birth of his son John, which begins: "Praise be to the Lord, the God of Israel, because he has come and has redeemed [lytrōsis] his people" (Lk. 1:68; cf. 1:69, which develops this theme further). Similarly, the prophetess Anna gave thanks to God on seeing the infant Jesus in the temple "and spoke about the child to all who were looking forward to the redemption [lytrōsis] of Jerusalem" (2:38; cf. also 24:21, where those on the road to Emmaus hoped that Jesus was going "to redeem" [lytroō] Israel). The idea of ransoming or purchasing does not stand out explicitly, but it cannot be discounted.

It is questionable how far the idea of ransoming is present in Heb. 9:12, although clearly atonement is here made by blood. The death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus is here understood in terms of the Day of Atonement ritual of Lev. 16: Christ "entered the Most Holy Place once for all by his own blood, having obtained eternal redemption [lytrōsis]." The sacrifices of the Day of Atonement were not strictly speaking a ransom, although the shedding of blood made propitiation (→ hilaskomai, reconcile, 2661).

4. lytrōtēs occurs only in Stephen's speech in Acts 7, where it is applied to Moses: "This is the same Moses whom they had rejected with the words, 'Who made you ruler and judge?' He was sent to be their ruler and deliverer [lytrōtēs] by God himself" (7:35; cf. Exod. 2:14). The point of the argument is to show that the Jews' treatment of Jesus is consistent with the Jews' attitude to divinely appointed leaders and deliverers down through the ages. Moses, whom the Jews regarded as the leader and deliverer par excellence, is a type of Christ in two ways here: He is a ruler and deliverer, and he was rejected by the Jews (cf. Acts 7:52).

5. apolytrōsis occurs 10x in the NT. In Paul's writings it figures largely to designate the deliverance from sin and its penalty brought about by the propitiatory death of Christ. In this sense it is a present reality grounded exclusively in Christ: We "are justified freely by his grace through the redemption [apolytrōsis] that came by Christ Jesus" (Rom. 3:24; see also 1 Cor. 1:30; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14).

But this redemption also has a future aspect, for its full realization will only come with the Parousia: "Not only so, but we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption [apolytrōsis] of our bodies" (Rom. 8:23; cf. Lk. 21:28; Phil. 3:21). Similarly, Eph. 1:14 sees the present sealing by the Spirit as the guarantee of our inheritance until our final redemption.

Heb. 9:15 combines the Pauline association of redemption and the death of Christ with the characteristic theme in Heb. of the comparison of the new covenant with the old: Jesus is the mediator of a new covenant, and "he has died as a ransom [apolytrōsis] to set them free from the sins committed under the first covenant." In 11:35 apolytrōsis has the secular sense of "release" from one's captors (cf., perhaps, the story in 2 Macc. 7).

6. The vb. lytroō (3x, only in mid. and pass.) occurs in Lk. 24:21 (see comments under 3, above). Tit. 2:14 interprets Christologically the thought of Ps. 130:8 (cf. also Deut. 14:2; Ezek. 37:23); it describes the Christian life as renouncing irreligion and worldly passions and living in a godly way, awaiting the appearing of Christ, "who gave himself for us to redeem [lytroō] us from all wickedness." In 1 Pet. 1:18–19 lytroō refers both to that from which the believer is ransomed or redeemed and to the means of the ransom—"not with perishable things such as silver or gold [cf. Isa. 52:3] . . . but with the precious blood of Christ [cf. Eph. 1:7; Heb. 9:12, 22; Rev. 1:5], a lamb without blemish or defect" (cf. Isa. 53:7). The Passover lamb and animal sacrifices were to be without blemish (Exod. 12:5; 29:1; Lev. 22:17–25; Ezek. 43:22–23).

See also lyō, to loose, untie, set free, release, annul, abolish (3395); rhyomai, rescue, deliver, preserve, save (4861); sōzō, save, keep from harm, preserve, rescue (5392); sōtēr, savior, deliverer, preserver (5400).

3390 (lytroō, to ransom, redeem), → 3389.

3391 (lytrōsis, redemption, deliverance, release), → 3389.

3392 (lytrōtēs, redeemer), → 3389.

3393 (lychnia, candlestick, lampstand), → 3394.

3394 λύχνος

λύχνος (lychnos), lamp, light (3394); λυχνία (lychnia), candlestick, lampstand (3393).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. lychnos means light, lamp. Later it came to denote some form of oil lamp that was placed on a lampstand to diffuse the beam.

2. Among the Israelites, lamp and lampstand were important both as everyday objects (cf. 2 Ki. 4:10) and as a part of public worship (cf. esp. the seven-branched candlestick in the tabernacle and the temple, e.g., Exod. 25:31–40; Heb. 9:2).

NT In the NT lychnos occurs 14x, lychnia 12x. The importance of lights and lamps (e.g., for the household, Lk. 15:8) explains why Jesus used them to illustrate his disciples' function in the world: As a lamp on the lampstand lights up the surrounding darkness, so disciples are to have an illuminating effect on their environment (Matt. 5:15–16; Mk. 4:21; Lk. 8:16; 11:33). The eye is called "the lamp [lychnos] of the body" (Matt. 6:22; Lk. 11:34); its health determines whether the blessings of light come to us.

While Jesus described himself as light (Jn. 8:12; 9:5; → phōs, 5890), his forerunner John the Baptist is likened to a burning and light-giving lamp (lychnos, 5:35). Similarly, the two witnesses are compared to two lampstands (Rev. 11:4, cf. Zech. 4:3, 11–14), and the seven churches are symbolized by seven golden lampstands (Rev. 1:12–13, 20; 2:1). The source of this light is indicated in 2 Pet. 1:19, where the word of prophecy is called "light" that looks forward to the glory of Christ. It is clear from Rev. 2:5 that the light of Christian witness can become dull and even go out, and that it can be renewed only by repentance (cf. Heb. 6:4–8, on the apostasy of "those who have once been enlightened").

Babylon is warned that when she sinks into ruin, "the light of a lamp will never shine in you again" (Rev. 18:23). But the heavenly Jerusalem will be illuminated by the glory of God (21:23), which makes all lamps superfluous (22:5), for God himself will be the sole light. Until then, Christians live in eschatological tension; we are to be watchful, as in the vivid metaphors of Lk. 12:35: "Be dressed ready for service and keep your lamps burning."

See also lampō, shine (3290); phainō, shine (5743); emphanizō, reveal, make known (1872); phōs, light, brilliance, brightness (5890).

3395 λύω

λύω (lyō), to loose, untie, set free, release, annul, abolish (3395); λύσις (lysis), release, divorce (3386); καταλύω (katalyō), destroy, demolish, abolish (2907); κατάλυμα (katalyma), lodging, guest room (2906); ἀκατάλυτος (akatalytos), indestructible (186); ἐκλύω (eklyō), become loose, become weary, become weak (1725).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. lyō means to loose, make free. When used with a pers. obj. it means to set free, ransom, deliver, both lit. and metaphorically. The meaning to dissolve gives the further sense of to destroy. Already in Homer it was used of the deliverance that the gods give to humans, e.g., from difficulties and need, but without any recognizable link with sin.

2. The LXX uses lyō to translate a variety of Heb. vbs. It can mean to open (Gen. 42:27), free those in bondage (Ps. 105:20), draw off (e.g., sandals, Exod. 3:5), loosen [knots], i.e., solve difficulties (Dan. 5:12), be pleased with, accept favorably (Isa. 40:2), lift up, take away [sins] (Job 42:9), and destroy (Ezr. 5:12).

katalyō is used 67x. It often means to lodge, pass the night, esp. in historical narratives (e.g., Gen. 19:2; 24:23; Num. 22:8; Ruth 4:14). It can also mean to break down (2 Ki. 25:10) or dissolve, abolish (2 Macc. 2:22).

eklyō commonly has the meaning of losing one's strength, letting one's heart become faint, or relaxing one's hands (e.g., Deut. 20:3; Jos. 10:6; 18:3; Isa. 13:7; Lam. 2:12, 19; Ezek. 7:17). However, in Job 19:25 it stands for gō'ēl, a participial form of a Heb. vb. that means redeem, act as a redeemer: "I know that my Redeemer [lit. in LXX, the one about to redeem me] lives." The gō'ēl in Heb. was the kinsman redeemer, who as the closest relative was responsible to redeem the blood of a murdered victim, to buy back family possessions, to redeem from bondage, and to take a kinsman's widow as wife (→ lytron, ransom, 3389).

The meaning of Job 19:25 is notoriously difficult. Some regard the gō'ēl as "vindicator," for the context is not concerned with deliverance from Sheol but with the vindication of Job's name before other people. But others relate this verse to 16:19: "Even now my witness is in heaven; my advocate is on high." Job is thinking of God himself as his gō'ēl (cf. the use of this Heb. word with reference to God in Ps. 19:14, "my Redeemer"; LXX has lytrōtēs here). In both cases the emphasis is on vindication and help. Whether there is also an element of buying back depends on the degree to which it is possible to speak of this factor in the general idea of the gō'ēl. However, it seems implied that the gō'ēl rescues that which was forfeited and restores justice to those who are not in a position to help themselves.

NT 1. In the NT lyō is used in the lit. sense of untying the thong of a sandal (Mk. 1:7; Jn. 1:27; Acts 13:25), untying a donkey's colt (Matt. 21:2), unwrapping Lazarus from his grave clothes (Jn. 11:44), and removing Paul's bonds (Acts 22:30). In a weakened sense in 13:43 it denotes being dismissed from a synagogue.

2. The sense of setting free, untying, and thus loosing is applied to angels (Rev. 9:14–15) and Satan (20:3, 7; on this and the question of the millennium, → chilias [5942]). In 9:14–15, the sixth angel with a trumpet is commanded: "'Release the four angels who are bound at the great river Euphrates.' And the four angels ... were released," killing a third of human population. The river represents the boundary of Assyria and Babylon, the area from which invasions came in OT times. In Rev. Babylon represents the wicked world in its ongoing manifestations (see chs. 17–18). The number four probably represents completeness. The significance of the vision depends on how Rev. as a whole is interpreted—esp. whether the visions are consecutive or parallel. In any case, destruction and loss of life gives occasion for repentance, even though many do not take it (9:20–21).

3. Satan is mentioned in connection with binding and loosing in Lk. 13:16 in the description of a woman crippled for eighteen years: "Should not this woman, a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan has kept bound for eighteen long years, be set free [lyō] on the Sabbath... ?" There is probably a play on lyō here that underlines the hypocrisy of Jesus' enemies, for they were complaining about Jesus' practice of healing on the Sabbath, yet they themselves would "untie" their animals to lead them to water on the Sabbath (13:15).

lyō is also used in the case of the healing of the deaf man with an impediment in his speech: "At this, the man's ears were opened, his tongue was loosened, and he began to speak plainly" (Mk. 7:35).

4. lyō can also have the sense of to break or destroy. In Rev. 5:2 the scroll of ongoing history, held by God who is seated on his throne, is sealed with seven seals, which no one is "worthy to break" and open. However, "the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, has triumphed" and so is able to open the seals (5:5). Acts 27:41 tells of the breaking up of the stern of the ship on which Paul was bound for Rome. Likewise, Peter in 2 Pet. 3:10–12 describes the eschatological conflagration, when "the elements [→ stoicheion, 5122] will be destroyed [lyō] by fire" and there will be a new heaven and earth (cf. Matt. 19:28; Mk. 14:25; Lk. 22:30).

5. lyō also has the sense of loosing or freeing from sin (Rev. 1:5) and death (Acts 2:24). Rev. 1:5 relates remission of sin to the death of Jesus in that he "has freed us from our sins by his blood." The KJV reads louō (wash) rather than luō here; both ideas find parallels elsewhere in the book: washing robes in the blood of the Lamb (7:14), and ransoming people by his blood (5:9). But the context fits the idea of redemption as a new exodus of God's people. The Lamb of God frees us from slavery to sin, as typified in the Passover lamb. In Acts 2:24 lyō is applied to the resurrection of Jesus: God raised up Jesus, "freeing him from the agony of death" (on the imagery of the cords of Sheol and death, see 2 Sam. 22:6; Ps. 18:4–6; 116:3).

6. lyō is found in various senses in connection with the institutions of Jud. In each case the divine origin of the institution is recognized either explicitly or implicitly. But the coming of Jesus demands a fresh understanding in the form of either a renewed attitude to what stands or the realization that what was formerly regarded as valid and binding is now superseded.

(a) In his Sermon on the Mount Jesus says: "Do not think that I have come to abolish [katalyō] the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish [katalyō] them but to fulfill them. I tell you the truth, until heaven and earth disappear, not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will by any means disappear from the Law until everything is accomplished. Anyone who breaks [lyō] one of the least of these commandments and teaches others to do the same will be called least in the kingdom of heaven . . ." (Matt. 5:17–19). The attitude Jesus expresses here is essentially the same as that found in Mk. 7:6–13; 10:1–12; 11:15–19; Lk. 11:45–52, in which he upholds the intention and spirit of the law in contrast with the scribal interpretations that stultify its demands. Note too the emphasis in Matt. on fulfilling the prophets (→ plēroō, 4444).

The Gk. text in Matt. 5 contains a play on words between katalyō, destroy, abolish, and lyō, relax. In 5:17 Jesus emphatically states that he has not come to katalyō the Law and the Prophets; in 5:19 he gives dire warning to anyone who would lyō the least of these commands. This is related in 5:20 to the scribes and Pharisees, and Jesus proceeds to give examples of how commandments have been relaxed: e.g., murder and anger (Matt. 5:21–26; cf. Exod. 20:13; Deut. 5:17); adultery and lust (Matt. 5:27–30; cf. Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18); divorce and adultery (Matt. 5:31–32; cf. Deut. 24:1–4; Matt. 19:9; Mk. 10:11–12; Lk. 16:18); loving one's neighbor (Matt. 5:43–48; cf. Lev. 19:18; Prov. 25:21–22). In all these instances Jesus, far from relaxing the law, ratifies it and applies it to one's inner attitudes as well as outward acts. (For Jesus' teaching on the law elsewhere in Matt. see 7:12; 11:13; 22:40; for his denunciation of those who make a mockery of the law by their hypocrisy see 15:1–11; 23:1–39.)

A consistent picture emerges in Matt. Jesus is presented not only as one who upholds the law, but as one who insists that the law must be rightly interpreted and applied. To that extent the true disciple is also a teacher (23:34), but one who has to be "instructed about the kingdom of heaven," so that he might bring "out of his storeroom new treasures as well as old" (13:52; see also thēsauros, treasure, 2565; grammateus, teacher, 1208). The point is that not all interpretation and application are wrong. Jesus and the disciples engage in it. But it is wrong where it fails to bring out the true meaning of the law and when it substitutes human tradition for God's word. Misguided interpretation is seen as relaxing the commandments. Still, one's attitude to the commandments determines one's place in the kingdom; because of their fundamental lack of righteousness, many Jewish teachers are excluded.

(b) lyō is twice used in connection with the temple. In Jn.'s account of the cleansing of the temple the Jews ask for a sign of Jesus' authority. "Jesus answered them, 'Destroy [lyō] this temple, and I will raise it again in three days'" (Jn. 2:19). Jn. goes on to point out that the temple Jesus was referring to "was his body" (2:21), a point that the disciples understood after the resurrection (2:22). At his trial before the Jewish leaders, false witnesses claimed: "We heard him say, 'I will destroy [katalyō] this man-made temple and in three days will build another, not made by man'" (Mk. 14:58). lyō and katalyō are often used for the destruction of buildings (Matt. 27:40; Mk. 13:2; 14:58; 15:29; Acts 6:14). Jn. 2:19–22 implies that Jesus' own person has already replaced the temple as the divinely appointed place of meeting between God and humankind. It further implies that Jewish disobedience is directly responsible for the destruction of this temple, just as it was for the destruction of the first one (2 Ki. 25:9, 13–17).

Eph. 2:14 uses lyō to make a different point: "For he himself is our peace, who has made the two one and has destroyed [lyō] the barrier, the dividing wall of hostility." The dividing wall may refer to the inscription in the wall of the Jerusalem temple that forbade, on penalty of death, any non-Jew from going within the sanctuary. By contrast, with Jesus, the new temple, both Jewish and Gentile believers may now "become a holy temple in the Lord" (2:21). The dividing wall between Jewish and Gentile believers before God is gone as a result of the reconciling death of Jesus (2:15–16). Note that in contrast with the Gospels, where Jesus never actually says that he will destroy the temple, in Eph. 2:14 he is in fact the subject of the vb.

(c) In Jn. 5:18 lyō is used in a phrase about breaking the Sabbath: "For this reason the Jews tried all the harder to kill him; not only was he breaking [lyō] the Sabbath, but he was even calling God his own Father, making himself equal with God." The occasion was the healing of a paralytic man by the pool of Bethesda. Jesus defended his action on the basis that his Father continues to work (5:17). This answer is intended to show that there is a sense in which God is working on the Sabbath both in general in sustaining the world and in particular in the case of this healing, in which Jesus is cooperating with the Father.

(d) The same issue is taken up again, but this time with reference to the law, in Jn. 7:23: "Now if a child can be circumcised on the Sabbath so that the law of Moses may not be broken [lyō], why are you angry with me for healing the whole man on the Sabbath?" There is an irony between circumcision performed on the male sexual organ (which causes some suffering) and the healing of the whole body, which banishes suffering. Jesus' stance implies that just as in healing he was not breaking the Sabbath, so also he is not breaking the law. The point is extended to Scripture in general in 10:35–36, where Jesus insists that the Scriptures cannot be broken.

(e) The binding and loosing [lyō] with which Peter was authorized in Matt. 16:19 and that was given to the disciples and the church at large in 18:18 stands in contrast with rab. usage. The authority of the rabbis as teachers was shown by their being able to forbid or allow certain things. They were apparently even able to excommunicate, i.e., exclude a person from the synagogue. The authority given to the church, however, is independent of any Jewish notion, for it has its own God-given power. For more on this, → deō, bind (1313); kleis, key (3090).

(f) lyō and the unique noun lysis occur in 1 Cor. 7:27 in connection with divorce. The word lysis as used here is a somewhat untechnical word for divorce (in contrast to the words used in 7:10–11). Perhaps Paul was using a more general term that covers not only formal divorce but also separation. What he says here must be seen in light of "the present crisis" (7:26), whatever that may mean, and it should probably be read as advice, not as a strict ruling that all must obey. Nevertheless, it is not a sin for those who find themselves "unmarried" (lit., "free [lyo] from a wife") to marry (7:28).

7. Compounds of lyō are not infrequent in the NT (see also apolyō at 687). (a) katalyō means to throw down, detach a stone from a building (Matt. 24:2) or destroy, demolish, (26:61; Mk. 14:58); metaphorically it can refer to Paul's demolition of the Jewish understanding of salvation and way of life (Gal. 2:18), to the destruction of the human body at death (2 Cor. 5:1), and to tearing down God's work in the church (Rom. 14:20) over questions of eating what is unclean. It can also mean to abolish, make invalid—of the law (Matt. 5:17), of the church (which Gamaliel said would fail if it was of humans, Acts 5:38–39)—and to halt (i.e., unharness the pack animals), hence to find lodging (Lk. 9:12; 19:7). katalyma means generally lodging, but more particularly a guest room or dining room (Mk. 14:14; Lk. 2:7; 22:11). akatalytos occurs only in Heb. 7:16, meaning indestructible or endless; it refers to Jesus as the eternal high priest.

(b) eklyō means to become loose, to become weak and weary; it is used of the hungry crowds in the desert (Matt. 15:32; Mk. 8:3), of a believer's certainty of reaping the harvest of well doing if one does not grow weary (Gal. 6:9), and of not losing one's courage in adversity, since discipline is a sign of being a child of God (Heb. 12:5, quoting Prov. 3:11).

See also lytron, price of release, ransom, ransom price (3389); rhyomai, rescue, deliver, preserve, save (4861); sōzō, save, keep from harm, preserve, rescue (5392); sōtēr, savior, deliverer, preserver (5400).

M mu

3404 μαγεία

μαγεία (mageia), magic (3404); περίεργος (periergos), meddlesome, curious, belonging to magic (4319); μαγεύω (mageuō), practice magic (3405); μάγος (magos), magus, magician (3407); φαρμακεία (pharmakeia), magic, sorcery (5758); φάρμακον (pharmakon), poison, magic potion, charm, medicine, remedy, drug (5760); φάρμακος (pharmakos), poisoner, magician (5761); γόης (goēs), sorcerer, juggler (1200); πύθων (pythōn), the Python, spirit of divination (4780); μαντεύομαι (manteuomai), foretell, utter oracles, prophesy (3446); βασκαίνω (baskainō), bewitch (1001); φάντασμα (phantasma), apparition, ghost (5753).

CL & OT 1. Magic is the technique of manipulating supernatural or supernormal forces to attain one's own ends. It may be a means of bending spirits of various grades to carry out one's wishes or of developing psychic powers so one can project an inner force onto some person or situation. Magic is invoked to deal with what cannot be controlled by known natural means. Evidence of magic dates back at least to Paleolithic culture, where, for example, cave art depicts animals stuck with darts with a view to causing the same thing to happen in a future hunt. The dividing line between magic and religion is often indistinct. A distinction is sometimes drawn between white and black magic, with the former being benevolent in intention (e.g., rain-making), whereas the latter is malevolent (loss of health or property, destruction, and death).

2. Common features of magic are: (a) the spell, i.e., the utterance of words according to a set formula; (b) the rite, i.e., a set of actions designed to convey the spell to the object concerned; and (c) the condition of the performer, who must not breach any relevant taboo and must be in the requisite emotional state to perform the prescribed actions.

Magic abounds in Gk. mythology, with various beings accredited with supernatural powers. The most renowned enchantress was Medea. Gk. and Lat. literary writers give pictures of magic and witchcraft. The growth in knowledge and progress of Gk. civilization led to the suppression of magic. Nevertheless, as secularization increased in the higher social levels during the 4th cent. B.C., there was a renewed outburst of interest in magic in the lower levels.

3. (a) Evidence of magic is found throughout the cultures that form the backdrop of the OT: e.g., Sumero-Akkadian and Canaanite religious lit. Behind it lies the belief that no single power has ultimate control over the universe. Even the gods must resort to powers they themselves do not possess.

(b) The reality of these occult powers is recognized in the OT. Deut. 18:10–14 lists the various practices of the surrounding peoples, but categorically prohibits the Israelites from any such practices: divination, sorcery, interpreting omens, witchcraft, casting spells, spiritism, and necromancy. Elsewhere in the OT are references to other occult phenomena, such as charms, enchanting, soothsaying, astrology, and stargazing.

(c) The OT saw any magic as a potential rival to the worship of Yahweh and a threat to the well-being of the people. It was forbidden by law, and those who practiced it were to be put to death (Exod. 22:18; Lev. 19:26, 31; 20:6, 27; cf. Mic. 5:12). As Deut. 18:10–14 shows, such practices were ranked with human sacrifice as an abomination to the Lord (cf. also 2 Ki. 17:17; 2 Chr. 33:6). The prophets denounced it as lies and deception (Isa. 44:25; 57:3; Jer. 27:9–10; Ezek. 22:28; Zech. 10:2; Mal. 3:5). Jezebel was condemned as a sorceress (2 Ki. 9:22), and Manasseh's apostate practices included various forms of magic, soothsaying, and human sacrifice (21:3–6). His grandson Josiah abolished all forms of the occult (23:24).

4. The most significant evidence of magic in the Hel. world is found in certain papyri from Egypt dating from the 3d and 4th cents. A.D. In addition numerous cursing tablets, inscriptions on thin sheets of lead known as tabellae defixionum, amulets, and ostraca have been found. Magic here was a fusion of the Gk. spirit with Egyptian influences. Among them were the belief that magic words gained additional power if written on a gem; belief in monstrous beings, half animal and half human; belief that while magic allows one to control the gods, it was at the same time a gift and revelation from the gods; and prominent figures such as Seth, Thoth, and Osiris. There was also a Persian influence, which included the idea of magic as a defense against evil spirits rather than as a means of manipulating the high gods.

Magical practices were also rife in Jud. Justin Martyr testifies to the use of the name of God in exorcism, and the use of Iaō, Sabaoth, Adonai, and Yahweh is common in the magical papyri. Apart from divine names, that of Moses appears with that of Thoth and Zoroaster, and Solomon was important. The Heb. language itself, as a sacred language, had a special use. Angels and demons figured esp. in Jewish magic. The normal magical ceremony consisted of two parts: the invocation to the gods and the ritual. The latter could take various forms involving the use of amulets, sacrifices, the mixing of special substances and potions, libations, and secret writing. Elaborate ceremonies could take several days.

NT 1. The NT names several magicians: (a) Simon, commonly referred to as Simon Magus (Acts 8:9–24), practiced spectacular magic in Samaria but professed conversion in response to Philip's preaching. He was astounded by the manifestations of the Holy Spirit that followed the laying on of hands by Peter and John and, being still under the influence of his old ideas, assumed that the apostles had some secret technique that he might acquire as a Christian magician. For this he was roundly rebuked by Peter. Christian writers of the 2d cent. speak of him as a heretic of gnostic type and as the founder of the Simonians.

(b) Bar-Jesus or Elymas (Acts 13:4–12), a magician on Cyprus in the employ of Sergius Paulus (the proconsul), resisted Paul and Barnabas but was struck with temporary blindness. The name Elymas is probably connected with the Arabic ʿalîm, wise, magician.

(c) Jannes and Jambres are named in 2 Tim. 3:8 as two of the Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses. They are not named in Exod., but they do occur in Jewish writings.

2. The following descriptive words are found in the NT. (a) periergos, "sorcery" (Acts 19:19). This text refers to the voluntary burning of books by those who had previously practiced various magic arts at Ephesus, an event seen as testimony to the growth and power of the word of the Lord (19:20), esp. since the value of the books was put at fifty thousand pieces of silver. periergos has the root idea of being concerned with other people's business and is translated "busybodies" in 1 Tim. 5:13 (→ 4318).

(b) magos, magus, magician; mageia, magic; mageuō, practice magic. According to Herodotus, the Magi were originally Medians who became priests under the Persian empire. Like the Chaldeans of Dan. 1:4 and 2:2–12, 48, they merged their racial identity in their profession, and their name was applied to any practitioner, such as the magos Bar-Jesus (Acts 13:6, 8). The noun mageia and the vb. mageuō also occur in 8:9, 11 of the magic of Simon Magus. magos is also used of the Magi from the East, who saw a special star and came to Bethlehem sometime after the birth of Jesus (Matt. 2:1–16). In their search of holy books to interpret the appearance of that star, they must have come across Num. 24:17: "A star will come out of Jacob; a scepter will rise out of Israel."

It is clear that the Magi were neither crude practitioners of the occult arts nor ordinary astrologers. They believed that God showed signs in heaven and that a certain heavenly body (whether planet, star, comet, or supernova) indicated from its appearance and position that God had fulfilled a royal promise, of which they had doubtless heard from Jews in the East. The Pseudepigrapha (e.g., T. Levi 18:3–4) and other Jewish writings also testify to Num. 24:17 as messianic (cf. also 2 Pet. 1:19; Rev. 22:16).

(c) pharmakos, magician (Rev. 21:8; 22:15); pharmakeia, magic, sorcery (Gal. 5:20; Rev. 18:23). The root word pharmakon occurs in the NT only in 9:21, but its meaning of medicine, magic potion, or poison gives the underlying idea of the related words. Potions include poisons, but there has always been a magical tradition of herbs gathered and prepared for spells, and also for encouraging the presence of spirits at magical ceremonies. Such activity is classed among the works of the sinful nature in Gal. 5:20.

(d) goēs, sorcerer, juggler, occurs only in 2 Tim. 3:13. In cl. Gk. this word can mean a magician or wizard. In view of Jannes and Jambres in 3:8, some have translated goēs in this manner. But cl. Gk. also knows the meaning of imposter for this word, since spellbinders could make false claims for their powers. The NIV prefers this translation in 2 Tim. 3:13 in the light of the closing words of this verse.

(e) The word pythōn was connected with the oracle at Delphi, where Apollo slew the mighty serpent Python that guarded the oracle. Later on pythōn came to designate a spirit of divination or a ventriloquist, who was thought to have such a spirit inside his or her belly. In Acts 16:16 a girl at Philippi had a "spirit by which she predicted the future" (pneuma pythōna); the vb. manteuomai is used for her "fortune-telling." She probably had second sight fostered by a possessing spirit. This spirit was forced to admit the truth of the gospel, just as other spirits had confessed Jesus Christ during his earthly ministry (Matt. 8:29; Mk. 1:24; Lk. 4:34), but neither Jesus nor Paul accepted testimony from this source, and they cast out such spirits.

(f) baskainō can mean to cast a spell by what is called the evil eye. Paul uses the word of the deceived Galatians in Gal. 3:1 ("Who has bewitched you?"). Some believed that the effect of the spell, if the evil eye was detected at the time, could be averted by spitting, and some hold that this was in Paul's mind in his use of ekptyō in 4:14 (lit., spit out; NIV "scorn").

3. Whatever heresy Paul has in mind in Col. 2, much of what he says is applicable to practitioners of the occult. Paul's theme is the absolute supremacy and sufficiency of Christ. If Christians are linked to Christ, they share in his supremacy over the spirit world, good and bad, and, to say the least, one is foolish to think he or she can gain more power through intermediate spirit beings. Thus 2:8 and 20 speak of the Christian's deliverance from "the elemental spirits of the universe" (NRSV; stoicheia, → 5122). In 2:15 there is the conquest of "the powers and authorities" (cf. Eph. 6:12) and Col. 2:18 refers to "the worship of angels" and induced visions. Finally 2:21–23 may be describing the rigorous ritual of the magician to produce and safeguard contacts with the spirits.

4. Mediumship (also called spiritualism) is an attempt to communicate with the departed, but there is no relaxation in the NT of the OT ban against such endeavors (e.g., Lev. 19:31; Deut. 18:10–11; 1 Chr. 10:13–14; Isa. 8:19–20). It may be true that the argument is from silence, but it is from significant silence. When Paul, for example, speaks of the departed, he assures Christians that their loved ones have not perished, but that they will meet them again (cf. 1 Cor. 15:17–19; 1 Thess. 4:13–18), for both they and the departed believers are "in Christ." He never suggests that Christian mediums can put the bereaved in touch with those who have passed on.

The NT shows that God may allow a departed spirit to return for purposes of his own: e.g., Moses and Elijah returned on the Mount of Transfiguration to reassert the testimony of the Law and the Prophets to the sacrifice of Christ on the cross (Matt. 17:3; Mk. 9:4; Lk. 9:30–31).

There are two other references to spirits or ghosts in the NT. When Jesus walked on the water, the disciples thought they were seeing a phantasma (Matt. 14:26; Mk. 6:49), a general word used to describe an apparition. The more important reference is Lk. 24:37–41, where Jesus appeared to his disciples after his resurrection. Some thought he was a pneuma, a spirit or ghost. Jesus did not deny the existence of ghosts but demonstrated that his resurrection body was of a different order altogether from a spirit form.

5. Some have sought to relate Jesus' miracles, at least in part, to the principles of magic. The evidence for magical practices in the Gospels is slim, however. In the accounts of the healing of the woman with the issue of blood (Matt. 9:20–22; Mk. 5:25–34; Lk. 8:42–48), it is true that the woman may have had a certain magical sense in that she believed that she would be healed if only she could touch Jesus' clothes. But all three Evangelists avoid any support for connecting the healing with magic in giving Jesus' reply: "Your faith has healed you."

Moreover, whereas magicians used names in connection with spells, neither Jesus nor the apostles used secret rituals or esoteric signs to gain control over supernatural powers. Still less is there any trace of trying to coerce a reluctant God to further one's own ends. Although Jesus' enemies insinuated that Jesus cast out demons in the name of Beelzebub, the self-contradictory nature of the charge is at once evident in the light of the exorcisms that Jesus performed (Matt. 12:25–37; Mk. 3:23–30; Lk. 11:17–23). For Jesus the control over evil spirits was not an end in itself. He told his followers: "However, do not rejoice that the spirits submit to you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven" (10:20).

3405 (mageuō, practice magic), → 3404.

3407 (magos, magus, magician), → 3404.

3408 (Magōg, Magog), → 4483.

3411 (mathēteuō, to instruct, make disciples), → 3412.

3412 μαθητής

μαθητής (mathētēs), learner, pupil, disciple (3412); μαθητεύω (mathēteuō), to instruct, make disciples (3411); μανθάνω (manthanō), learn (3443).

CL & OT 1. (a) manthanō denotes the process by which one acquires theoretical knowledge. The word therefore plays an important role in speculative thought from Socrates on. When a person is learning something, one should penetrate deeply into the nature of everything and proceed beyond this insight to a knowledge of morality.

(b) A person is called a mathētēs when one binds oneself to someone else in order to acquire practical and theoretical knowledge. Such a person may be an apprentice in a trade, a student of medicine, or a member of a philosophical school. One can only be a mathētēs in the company of a didaskalos, master or teacher, for which a fee was usually paid. In contrast to the Sophists, Socrates refused any kind of payment from his pupils. From his time on mathētēs largely fell into disuse.

2. (a) manthanō in the LXX means grow accustomed to, make oneself familiar with, learn. In most of these passages the vb. has no special theological emphasis (e.g., "nor will they train for war anymore," Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3). A theological use of manthanō is clear in Deut., where Israel is in danger of forgetting Yahweh's goodness and of forfeiting its election and the divine promises of salvation (cf. 6:10–12; 8:17–18; 9:4–6; 11:2). They must learn again to fear the Lord and obey his will (4:10; 14:23; 17:19; 31:12–13). Learning means the process by which the past experience of God's love is translated by the learners into obedience to God's Torah (cf. 4:14). It means fully understanding the story of the saving actions of God's will.

Similarly in Ps. 119:7–8, 71, 73, the psalmist prays for a right attitude of learning the Torah, which is here understood as an all-embracing guide and direction. The goal of learning is action that corresponds to God's word (119:101). Among the objects of manthanō are a correct disposition (Isa. 1:17; Bar. 3:14), insight (Sir. 8:9), and wisdom (Wis. 6:9; 7:13).

(b) mathētēs is found in the LXX only in alternative readings of Jer. 13:21; 20:11; 46:9 = LXX 26:9. The lack of OT vocabulary for a learner is linked with Israel's consciousness of being an elect people, in which the individual mattered little. There was no disciple-master relationship among humans, for even the priest and the prophet did not teach on their own authority. Note that the attendants of Moses and the prophets are aides and servants, not pupils (Exod. 24:13; Num. 11:28; 1 Ki. 19:19–21; 2 Ki. 4:12). The vb. mathēteuō does not occur in the OT.

3. The situation is different in rab. Jud. The talmîd is one who is concerned with the entire Jewish tradition: the written and oral Torah. He belongs to his teacher, to whom he subordinates himself in almost servile fashion. Since the rabbi's knowledge gives one direct access to the Scriptures, which facilitates understanding, the rabbi becomes a kind of mediator between his pupils and the Torah. Learning is determined by the authority of a teacher and his interpretation of the Torah, not by a personal study of the Torah. In other words, the talmîd appropriates the knowledge of his teacher and examines it critically by comparing it against the Torah. Only one who has studied for an extensive period can become a ḥākām, one who can teach with authority.

NT manthanō occurs 25x in the NT—only 6x in the Gospels, where one would have expected it most as a mark of discipleship; much more common is didaskō, teach. mathētēs occurs 261x, exclusively in the Gospels and Acts. It indicates discipleship as total attachment to someone, not the cl. Gk. idea of pupil. Matt. 10:24 ("A student is not above his teacher, nor a servant above his master") and Lk. 6:40 does not contradict this, since the issue there is the relationship of a disciple to Jesus as master. matheuō occurs 4x.

1. (a) On some occasions manthanō reflects the specifically OT sense of learn the will of God or learn to devote oneself to that will (Matt. 9:13; Jn. 6:45; cf. Mk. 13:28 par.). Jesus is the only point of reference, from whom alone one can know God's will (Matt. 11:29). He does not introduce a new law to be learned. Instead, he restores God's law to its original function of enabling people to recognize his will and do it. In concrete terms, learning means putting one's faith in Jesus and following him in his work of compassion.

(b) manthanō has a similar meaning in the letters; it refers to the message or teaching of Jesus (Rom. 16:17; Eph. 4:20; Col. 1:7; 2 Tim. 3:14). To hold to the teaching that the recipients have received means to hold to their faith. Learning implies not only acquiring teaching about Christ, but also acceptance of Christ himself, beginning the new life of discipleship in him (cf. 1 Cor. 4:6; Phil. 4:9).

(c) The Hel. play on words in Heb. 5:8 is unique. It says that Jesus "learned obedience from what he suffered." Learning here means recognition of the Father's will in his suffering and affirmation of that will in acceptance of his suffering.

2. The main NT interest in this word group falls on the noun mathētēs. The Evangelists probably took it over from Hel. Jud. but gave it a new character through their association with Jesus. They also employed the word with a wider frame of reference in such expressions as the disciples of John the Baptist (Matt. 11:2 par.; Mk. 2:18 par.; Lk. 5:33; Jn. 1:35, 37), of Moses (9:28), and of the Pharisees (Matt. 22:16; Mk. 2:18).

(a) The disciples of John the Baptist formed a solid group. They were not far away when he was in prison (Matt. 11:2 par.) and later buried his body (Mk. 6:29 par.). They had their own form of prayer (Lk. 11:1) and fasting (Mk. 2:18 par.), and they became involved in controversy with the Jews (Jn. 3:25). In all these particulars they were no longer "pupils" like the talmîdîm of the rab. schools. Jn. 1:25–42 reports that Jesus' first two disciples originated from the Baptist's circle of disciples.

(b) The NT may have used mathētēs in connection with the Pharisees as an explanatory term to readers unfamiliar with the system of the talmîdîm. The Pharisees, like the teachers of the law, the Sadducees, and the high priests, were enemies of Jesus and together with their followers stand typically for the entire Jewish nation.

3. It is indisputable that the earthly Jesus called people to be his disciples and to follow him. From the Gospels we can list various characteristics of that discipleship.

(a) Clearly, Jesus appeared in many respects to be a rabbi. He taught and discussed like one (Mk. 12:18–40) and was asked to make legal decisions (Lk. 12:13–14). Even if he was not recognized as such by many, since he had not passed through a rab. school (Mk. 6:2; Jn. 7:15), he was certainly addressed as "Rabbi" by his disciples (Mk. 9:5; 11:21; Jn. 1:38; 4:31) and outsiders (cf. 3:2). Even here one can see a parallel with the rabbis of Jud. in that Jesus gathered a circle of disciples around him. But at several decisive points Jesus went beyond the recognized limits for a rabbi, which gives his disciple-master relationship its own distinctive coloring.

(b) Whereas in rab. circles and in Gk. philosophical schools one made a voluntary decision to join the school of his master and so become a disciple, Jesus' call was decisive (Mk. 1:17 par.; 2:14 par.; Lk. 5:1–11; cf. Matt. 4:18–22).

(c) Gk. pupils and the rab. students bound themselves personally to their master and looked for objective teaching, with the ultimate aim of themselves becoming a master or a rabbi. But Jesus' call to discipleship did not lead to eventually becoming a master (cf. Matt. 23:8). Following him as a disciple meant unconditional sacrifice for one's entire life (10:24–25, 37; Lk. 14:26–27; Jn. 11:16). To be a disciple meant to stay bound to Jesus and to do God's will (Matt. 12:46–50; cf. Mk. 3:31–35). The disciple literally had to "follow" Jesus (→ akoloutheō, 199).

(d) Unlike the rabbis, Jesus broke through the barriers that separated the clean from the unclean, the sinful from the obedient. Thus he summoned a tax collector who stood outside the worshiping community to abandon his old association for discipleship (Mk. 2:14), just as he did a Zealot (Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13) and some fishermen (Mk. 1:16–20).

(e) It is important for understanding Jesus' discipleship to realize that the call to be a disciple always included the call to service (e.g., the call to be "fishers of men" in Mk. 1:17; cf. Lk. 5:10, a colloquial phrase that meant the disciples were to bring people into the kingdom by preaching the gospel and working in Jesus' name; cf. Matt. 16:15–19). When Jesus sent out the Twelve (Mk. 6:7–13 par.) and later the Seventy-Two (Lk. 10:1–17), they were to go out in pairs, healing, bringing salvation and peace, and proclaiming the kingdom of God. This service led the disciple into the same dangers as his master (cf. Mk. 10:32). A disciple could expect no better fortune than his Lord (Matt. 10:24–25; 16:24–25).

(f) In the Gospels we read about the disciples' lack of understanding. This applies not only to Jesus' message (Mk. 4:10–11 par.), activity (10:13–16, 48), and the goal of discipleship (10:35–45), but above all to Jesus' suffering (Matt. 16:22–23; Mk. 14:47; Lk. 18:34).

(g) The promised reward was fellowship with God through Jesus and thus a share in Jesus' authority. It was also the new and future life (cf. Matt. 16:25; Jn. 14:6).

(h) The mathētai are not simply the Twelve. The circle of the Twelve was not only a symbolic representation of the twelve tribes of Israel, and thus of the whole people of God, but also a section of the larger circle of disciples that Jesus summoned to discipleship from a still wider group of adherents. The disciples would have been a circle of immediate followers who were commissioned to particular service.

4. (a) As a rule, the Gospel passages that speak of following and of discipleship are already reflections on its meaning. Renunciation (Matt. 23:7–12), humility (18:1–4), poverty (19:23–30), and readiness to suffer (10:17–33) are all characteristics of discipleship. Decisive in understanding mathētes is faith (Mk. 16:16; Lk. 17:5; 22:32) in Jesus himself (Matt. 18:5; esp. Jn. 2:11; 6:69; 11:45). Lk. 12:8–9 expresses both the promise and the dangers of discipleship. The disciple's faithfulness to the Lord is crucial.

(b) Reflection on discipleship is particularly characteristic of Jn.'s Gospel. Not only do the categories of the narrower and wider circles of disciples point beyond themselves to the Christian community being addressed (cf. 6:60, 66), mathētēs is often simply a term for Christian (8:31; 13:35; 15:8) or for the gathered community. In Jesus' farewell discourses (Jn. 13–17), the disciples are no longer bound to the presence of the earthly Jesus. But through the Spirit they remain in full fellowship with him (14:15–17; 15:26–27), which finds its visible expression in the manner of their service. Everyone is to be able to recognize disciples of Jesus by seeing their love (13:34–35) and by their fulfillment of duty in being witnesses to the Lord (→ martyria, 3456).

(c) This becomes clearer from the way the word is used in Acts, where mathētēs simply means Christian, one who believes in Jesus and witnesses for him (cf. 6:1–2, 7; 9:1, 10, 19, 25–26, 38; 11:26, 29; 13:52; 14:20, 22, 28; etc.).

5. The vb. mathēteuō is primarily used of someone who has become a disciple (applied to Joseph of Arimathea in Matt. 27:57; of a large number of people in Acts 14:21). In Matt. 28:19, Jesus' parting instructions of his disciples was to "go and make disciples of all nations."

See also akoloutheō, follow (199); mimeomai, imitate, follow (3628); opisō, behind, after (3958).

3419 μαίνομαι

μαίνομαι (mainomai), rave, be mad, be out of one's mind (3419); μανία (mania), madness, frenzy (3444).

CL & OT Cl. Gk. used mainomai esp. for excited thought, being in ecstasy, raving: (a) rage, rave; (b) be intoxicated; (c) be passionately in love; (d) be mad (i.e., opposite of sōphroneō, 5404); (e) be entranced, as one possessed by the spirit of a god. This vb. became the technical term of the cult of Dionysus and of the inspired "mantic" divination, the best-known representatives of which were the Sibyls. mania was one of the oldest attributes of Dionysus. This god could also free a person of madness and allow him or her to return to quiet self-consciousness through an act of purification.

The LXX uses mainomai in Jer. 25:16 (= LXX 32:16) of the peoples who have drunk from God's cup of wrath. Yahweh threatens them all with the terror of war as punishment. In 29:26 (= LXX 36:26) "any madman" is placed beside "who acts like a prophet" in a context intended to bring Jer.'s prophetic opponents into discredit. In 4 Macc. 8:5; 10:13 Antiochus Epiphanes considers as madness the loyalty of the priest Eleazar and his sons to their faith, which led to their death as martyrs.

NT mainomai is found 5x and mania once in the NT. In Acts 12:15 Rhoda was told, "You're out of your mind," when she came with unbelievable news. Festus (26:24) believed that Paul was out of his mind in his enthusiasm to penetrate into the ultimate secrets. However, Paul placed the sober and reasonable truth (sōphrosynē) in antithesis to mania (26:25). In 1 Cor. 14:23 Paul used mainomai to describe the impression that speaking in tongues would make on invited or casual visitors to the church.

A good Jew was not allowed to listen to a demon-possessed man. In Jn. 10:20 unbelieving Jews reacted to Jesus' message by saying, "He is demon-possessed and raving mad." Therefore, since Jesus had lost his wits through the action of an evil demon (cf. Jn. 7:20; 8:52), they were absolved from the responsibility of listening further. Others, however, saw the healing of the blind man as God's vindication of Jesus' message. In other words, we have here a strong, religiously motivated repudiation of Jesus. The use of mainomai here reminds us of the madness in the cult of Dionysus.

See also ekstasis, distraction, confusion, ecstasy (1749); ekplēssō, amaze, astound (1742).

3420 (makarizō, call or consider blessed, happy), → 3421.

3421 μακάριος

μακάριος (makarios), blessed, fortunate, happy (3421); μακαρίζω (makarizō), call or consider blessed, happy (3420); μακαρισμός (makarismos), blessing (3422).

CL & OT 1. makarios originally meant free from daily cares and worries. In poetic language it described the condition of the gods and those who share their happy existence. Later, it became a common word, like our "happy." The word most frequently occurs in the formalized language of blessing, makarios hos(tis), "happy is he who...." People were congratulated on happy events, such as parents on their children, the rich on their wealth, the wise on their knowledge, the pious on their inward well-being, and initiates on their experience of God.

2. In the LXX makarios and makarizō generally translate the Heb. ʾešer, happiness, well-being; ʾāšar, pronounce happy; and ʾašrê, well-being to. Stylized blessings are found in the wisdom lit., irrespective of whether the reference is to earthly blessings (Ps. 127:5; Sir. 25:8), prosperity (Job 29:10–11), a wise life (Prov. 3:13; Sir. 14:20), or fulfilling God's commandment (Ps. 1:1; 41:1; 119:1). Psalms that have been influenced by the wisdom tradition pronounce as blessed those who trust in God (e.g., 2:12; 32:1–2; 34:8). A connection between religious happiness consisting in Yahweh's favor and earthly happiness through his gifts is basic in wisdom lit.

This formula always ascribes well-being to a human. That is, Yahweh himself is never called makarios. The benediction (→ eulogia, 2330), an authoritative and efficacious word, is much different.

3. In the later Israelite period (e.g., Sir. 25:7–10), more elaborate pronouncements of this sort and even whole series of them are found, especially in apocalyptic texts (Dan. 12:12; Tob. 13:14–16). Pronouncements of blessedness are often supplemented by a contrasting series of woes (2 Enoch 52:1–8; cf. 1 Enoch 103:5). In substance these pronouncements have the force of an eschatological consolation (see 58:2).

NT 1. In the NT makarizō occurs only 2x (Lk. 1:48; Jas. 5:11), makarismos 3x (Rom. 4:6, 9; Gal. 4:15; the former two suggest use of a formula). Makarios, however, occurs 50x, generally in the context of pronouncing someone or something blessed.

2. Stylistically the NT pronouncements follow the tradition of those in apocalyptic texts (see above). Corresponding to the Heb. style, the eschatological pronouncements in Jesus' preaching and the gospel records are made in the third person. Almost uniformly they are furnished with a reason or a description of the bliss ascribed (see sec. 3). Contrasting woes are explicitly set against the ascriptions of blessing in Lk. 6:20–26 and implicitly in the visions of Rev. 14:13; 16:15; 19:9. Paul aligns himself stylistically with the pronouncements of the wisdom tradition. A clearly Hel. usage is found in 1 Tim. 1:11 and 6:15, where God himself is pronounced blessed.

3. The pronouncements of the Sermon on the Mount (e.g., "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," Matt. 5:3) dominate the NT scene. These eschatological pronouncements are distinguishable from apocalyptic ones by their paradoxical statements (the kingdom belongs to the poor in spirit, the powerless, the sorrowful) and by the fact that this kingdom of God is bound up with the life and message of Jesus. They explain Matt. 11:5–6: The message of joy is brought to the poor.

Present and future are related to one another in these pronouncements. This is clearest in Lk.'s version of them in 6:20–26, where the word "now" is inserted 2x in 6:21, underlining this relationship: "Blessed are you who hunger now, for you will be satisfied. Blessed are you who weep now, for you will laugh." All the benefits praised in the OT are now eclipsed. Hence the pronouncement also applies to all those who share the experience of the arrival of God's kingdom (Matt. 13:16–17), who face this encounter in the right way (16:17; Lk. 1:45; Jn. 20:29), and who are not offended at it (Matt. 11:6). They remain steadfast and faithful (24:46; Lk. 12:37–38; Jas. 1:12; Rev. 16:15). Although the pronouncements in the NT are varied, their futuristic character is not to be understood in the sense of consolation and subsequent recompense. The promised future always involves a radical alteration of the present.

See also eulogia, praise, blessing (2330).

3422 (makarismos, blessing), → 3421.

3426 (makran, far), → 1584.

3428 (makrothymeō, be patient, longsuffering), → 3429.

3429 μακροθυμία

μακροθυμία (makrothymia), patience, longsuffering (3429); μακροθυμέω (makrothymeō), be patient, longsuffering (3428).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. makrothymia, unlike other compounds of thymos (anger, wrath), is rare. It denotes a typically human virtue: the prolonged restraint of thymos, i.e., patience, longsuffering, for whereas the gods know nothing of affliction, humans must bear their lot in patience. There is always an element of resignation in the word, even when it describes the kind of endurance that one can only admire. Positively it expresses a persistence or unswerving willingness to await events rather than trying to force them. In ancient Greece makrothymia is concerned primarily with the molding of a person's inner character; it is not a virtue exercised toward one's fellow human beings.

2. In the LXX the related adj. makrothymos frequently denotes an attribute of Yahweh, namely, his being slow to anger (e.g., Num. 14:18; Ps. 86:15; 103:8; Joel 2:13; Nah. 1:3). It denotes, therefore, the idea of restrained wrath, forbearance being exercised for a limited period only. The Israelites make frequent reference to God's forbearance (e.g., Exod. 34:6) and even appeal to it when conscious of guilt (Wis. 15:1–2). They know that, being a God of forbearance, Yahweh is ready to bestow grace on his people.

Yet at the same time, the godly Israelite is aware of the tension between grace and wrath, for it is possible to exhaust God's patience and cause his anger to burst forth (Ps. 7:11–16). Even the obedient sometimes find it hard to acquiesce in God's forbearance (Jer. 15:15; Jon. 4:2), but patience increasingly becomes a virtue required of the wise (Prov. 19:11; Sir. 29:1–8) and is given prominence in wisdom lit. (Prov. 14:29; 16:32; 25:15).

NT In the NT forbearance is a characteristic both of God and of the person who is united with Jesus Christ. The noun is used only in NT letters. The subject is treated thematically in Heb. 6:9–15; Jas. 5:7–11; and to some extent in 2 Pet. 3:4–15.

1. The connection between divine and human patience is made clear in the parable of the unforgiving servant in Matt. 18:21–35 (note the use of makrothymeō, have patience, 18:26, 29). This parable follows Jesus' instructions on what to do if a fellow believer sins against you (18:15–20) and his command to Peter to be willing to forgive not only seven times but seventy-seven times—i.e., an unlimited number of times (the reverse of Gen. 4:24).

The parable of the unforgiving servant illustrates the divine attitude toward forgiveness and our dealings with our fellow human beings. The heavily indebted servant asks the king to "be patient" (makrothymeō) and he will repay everything (Matt. 18:26). But the king actually does more: He remits the entire amount. However, this servant does not act the same way toward a fellow servant who likewise asks for patience (again makrothymeō, 18:29); instead, he becomes harsh. On learning the true facts of the case, the king has the first servant put in prison "until he should pay back all he owed" (18:34). The parable concludes with the pronouncement: "This is how my heavenly Father will treat each of you unless you forgive your brother from your heart" (18:35)—a verse that recalls the fifth petition of the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:12; cf. 6:14–15).

2. The contrast in the parable between a debt so enormous as to defy repayment and one that could easily be met out of normal income is a vivid way of expressing the incomparable greatness of God's longsuffering. At the same time longsuffering makes possible our entry into newness of life. In Rom. 2:4 Paul reminds us that God's "patience" leads us to repentance. The background in this passage is God's righteous anger, but his patience, being linked with kindness (chrēstotēs; → chrēstos, 5982), assumes the character of benevolence. Paul puts the matter clearly in 9:22: "With great patience" God bore with those who are appointed to wrath, in order to display his power and mercy in the salvation of the elect (cf. 1 Pet. 3:20).

In 1 Tim. 1:16 Paul speaks of the "unlimited patience" of Christ (cf. 2 Pet. 3:15) as an example to those who were to believe in him for eternal life. By following this example, Paul demonstrates divine patience, a proof of God's mercy to sinners. Timothy, in turn, should follow his example of "patience" (2 Tim. 3:10; 4:2).

3. In the parable of Matt. 18 human patience is related to, and dependent on, divine patience. God in his longsuffering holds open the door to newness of life, but such new life in believers is proved genuine by the fact that they practice forgiveness. Thus makrothymia comes into its own in the NT lists of virtues. Paul incorporates these lists in his practical exhortations, such as "the fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22; cf. Col. 1:11; 1 Thess. 5:14; 2 Tim. 3:10) or our living "a life worthy of [our] calling" (Eph. 4:1–2; Col. 3:12). makrothymia in the NT is not what Gk. humanism held it to be, namely, a virtuous attitude cultivated exclusively in one's own interests. Rather, it is something that makes a believer always prepared to meet a neighbor halfway and to share one's life with him or her. In other words, human patience or forbearance is not a character trait but a way of life. Indeed, it is a primary expression of love, for "love is patient [makrothymeō], love is kind" (1 Cor. 13:4).

4. James points out another aspect of the patience required of believers. In view of "the Lord's coming" (Jas. 5:7), he links together the forbearance we must extend to our fellow human beings and the patience needed to cope with all the trials and tribulations of this world. Thus, he exhorts his readers to be "patient" (5:7–8, 10). We must not grumble at each other, for the judge is standing at the door (5:9). We are to follow the example of the suffering and "patience" of the prophets (5:10) and be steadfast like Job (5:11; cf. Job 1:21–22; 2:10), remembering that the Lord is compassionate and merciful (Jas. 5:11; cf. Ps. 10:18; 111:4).

5. Patience is an aspect of faith and hope that was exhibited by Abraham, and it will likewise enable believers to inherit the promises of God: "We want each of you to show this same diligence to the very end, in order to make your hope sure. We do not want you to become lazy, but to imitate those who through faith and patience [makrothymia] inherit what has been promised" (Heb. 6:11–12). We should be like Abraham, who "after waiting patiently ... received what was promised" (6:15; cf. Gen. 22:16–17).

6. In 2 Pet. 3 Peter discusses the apparent delay in the Parousia. This is not to be taken as an indefinite postponement but as a sign of God's patience to give people full opportunity to repent. The Lord "is patient with you" because he does not want anyone to perish, but everyone to reach repentance (3:9). A few verses later Peter relates this to Paul's teaching: "Bear in mind that our Lord's patience [makrothymia] means salvation, just as our dear brother Paul also wrote you with the wisdom that God gave him" (3:15).

7. The interpretation of Lk. 18:7 has been the subject of much discussion. This verse follows the parable of the unjust judge (18:1–6), which Jesus told in order to teach the disciples "that they should always pray and not give up" (18:1). In the parable the widow finally gets the judge to grant her justice because of her constant petitioning. Then Jesus asks: "And will not God bring about justice for his chosen ones, who cry out to him day and night? Will he keep putting them off [makrothymeō]?" Most likely what this phrase means is: "Will not God be patient with their complaint?" A loving and kind God will be patient with his people and hear their cries.

See also anechomai, bear, endure (462); kartereō, be strong, steadfast, persevere (2846); hypomenō, be patient, persevere, endure, be steadfast (5702).

3433 μαλακία

μαλακία (malakia), weakness, softness, sickness (3433).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. malakia came to be used of effeminate men. In the medical writers it describes weakness or illness.

2. malakia occurs in the LXX as a general term for sickness (cf. Deut. 7:15; 28:61; Isa. 38:9; 53:3). Passages such as Deut. 7:15 emphasize the punitive function of illness, but this view is modified in the work of the divine servant (Isa. 53:4), who bore our diseases and carried our pains. Matt. 8:17 relates this passage to divine healing as an integral part of Christ's saving work.

NT This word occurs only 3x in the NT (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 10:1) in the sense of weakness or sickness. The healing of physical conditions was for Matt. an important feature of the gospel of the kingdom.

See also astheneia, weakness, sickness, disease, timidity (819); nosos, illness, sickness (3798); paralytikos, paralytic (4166).

3440 μαμωνᾶς

μαμωνᾶς (mamōnas), money, wealth, property (3440).

NT 1. (a) The Gk. word mamōnas is first found in the NT. It renders the emphatic state māmônā' of the Aram. māmôn. Most scholars link it with the vb. 'āman, to believe in, trust, as "that in which one trusts," though it may also denote what is entrusted to humans. In Lk. 16:11 there is an apparent play on words with this root meaning: "So if you have not been trustworthy [pistos; → pistis, 4411] in handling worldly wealth [mamōnas], who will trust [pisteuō] you with true [alēthinos; → alētheia, 237] riches?" The three Gk. words pistos, pisteuō, and alēthinos all appear to translate words from the same Aram. root 'mn, from which mammon is formed.

(b) The Aram. word is found in rab. writings, where it has the sense of profit or money, or, more generally, one's possessions. In itself the word may be neutral, but it acquired in negative contexts the connotation of possessions dishonestly gained, as in bribery.

2. mamōnas occurs 3x in sayings appended to the parable of the shrewd manager (Lk. 16:1–8). At the end of the parable "the master" (or perhaps "the Lord") commended the dishonest manager because of his shrewdness, "for the people of this world are more shrewd in dealing with their own kind than are the people of the light" (16:8). This parable is addressed to Jesus' disciples, teaching them prudence in handling this world's goods. They are to use the goods of this world in a way that is righteous and will benefit others. The manager's action in remitting various debts owed to his master achieved a double object. On the one hand, the master had been charging exorbitant interest, forbidden by the Mosaic law, and the manager was actually putting his master right in the eyes of the law. On the other hand, he was doing himself a favor by ingratiating himself with his master's debtors.

Lk. 16:9 then adds: "I tell you, use worldly wealth [mamōnas] to gain friends for yourselves, so that when it is gone, [they] will be welcomed into eternal dwellings." The injunction is not to befriend wealth but to use it for the benefit of others. In this verse "they" (NIV "you") may refer to those who have benefited from such use of wealth, it may be a Hebraism referring to God without actually mentioning his name, or it may refer to God and his angels. The point is that wealth itself does not endure, but it can be used to achieve something enduring. Mammon itself is material, but its use has personal dimensions.

Lk. 16:11 (see above) contrasts the relatively minor value of material things with true riches that exist on a higher and personal plain. Stewardship of material possessions is thus a probationary test for further stewardship (cf. the parables of the pounds [19:11–27] and the talents [Matt. 25:14–30]). Lk. 16:12 implies that worldly wealth is not something that one actually possesses but belongs, in fact, to someone else. The disciple has to prove to be a faithful and wise manager of this before he or she may be entrusted with something greater. But neither should one be the servant of Money, for Money (personified in 16:13) inevitably becomes our master if we try to make ourselves its master by acquiring it for its own sake. We are confronted by the stark choice: Serve either God or Money; we cannot do both.

3. The only other place in which mamōnas occurs is Matt. 6:24, which is verbally identical with Lk. 16:13 but set in the context of the Sermon on the Mount. The message is essentially the same: We cannot serve both God and Money.

See also thēsauros, treasure box, chest, storeroom, treasure (2565); peripoieō, save for oneself, acquire, gain possession of (4347); ploutos, wealth, riches (4458); chrēma, property, wealth, means, money (5975).

3443 (manthanō, learn), → 3412.

3444 (mania, madness, frenzy), → 3419.

3445 μάννα

μάννα (manna), manna (3445).

OT Heb. mān is a name for the sap that is sucked from the manna-tamarisk in the Sinai desert in the rainy season by a kind of scale insect, which then drops in the form of small, sweet balls. These balls melt and disperse in the heat of the midday sun. That it was this phenomenon that the Israelites met in the desert as a helping miracle from God has been considered certain since Josephus and Origen. Exod. 16:15 offers a Heb. etymological explanation of the name, expressing the amazement of the people: mān hû', which means, What is it? Manna was not, of course, the Israelites' sole source of food in the desert, for they brought flocks and herds with them out of Egypt (cf. 12:38) and found other food in oases (15:27) and from defeated enemies (Num. 31:25–47). But this does not diminish the OT's feeling for the miracle of food that kept Israel from perishing of hunger.

Exod. 16 and Num. 11 (the miracle of quail) are concerned only with the actual food. Deut. 8:3 uses the memory of the miraculous food to stress that "man does not live on bread alone but on every word that comes from the mouth of the LORD" (cf. Matt. 4:4; Lk. 4:4). The concept was increasingly spiritualized. Note Ps. 78:24–25, where mān is called "the grain of heaven" and "the bread of angels," and where it is used together with God's other gracious acts to his people as symbolic of divine salvation.

In later Jewish writings manna plays a considerable role. It is linked with the tradition that the Messiah will bring back the ark and its contents, which had been hidden by Jeremiah (2 Macc. 2:4–12); this would include the pot of manna stored by Moses in the ark (cf. Exod. 16:33). Moreover, manna is the heavenly bread that will come down from heaven to feed the believers who experience this age. Finally, the Messiah will parallel Moses in various respects, including the giving of manna.

NT Rev. 2:17 perhaps reflects the notion of the "hidden manna." Heb. 9:4 mentions the preservation of manna in the ark. In Jn. 6:31–34 the Jews refer to the belief that the miracle of the manna will be repeated in the messianic age. Jesus rejected this parallelism by pointing out that it was not Moses but God himself who had given bread in the desert.

In Jn. 6:49–51a the manna of the desert wanderings is contrasted with the true bread from heaven. The manna had not kept those who had eaten it from dying; true bread from heaven is that which alone can impart eternal life. This can be found only in the one who says, "I am the living bread that came down from heaven" (6:51).

See also artos, bread, loaf (788); epiousios, daily (2157); deipnon, meal, supper (1270).

3446 (manteuomai, tell fortunes, utter oracles, prophesy), → 3404.

3448 μαράνα θά

μαράνα θα (marana tha), maranatha, i.e., "Our Lord has come!" "Our Lord is coming!" or "Our Lord, come!" (3448).

NT 1. marana tha is an Aram. phrase found in the NT only in 1 Cor. 16:22: "If anyone does not love the Lord—a curse be on him. Come, O Lord [marana tha]!" Its precise meaning is disputed, though it is certainly a combination of the Aram. māran or māranā' ("our Lord") and the verb 'atā' ("to come"). The expression should thus be seen either as a perf. (māran 'ᵉtā'), i.e., "Our Lord has come," or as an imperative (māranā' tā'), i.e., "Our Lord, come!"

Apart from 1 Cor. 16:22, the phrase is found in the prayers associated with the Lord's Supper in the Didache (10:6; ca. A.D. 100), but all subsequent references are based on 1 Cor. 16:22. Where the phrase originated is a matter of debate, although most scholars regard the Jerusalem church as the most likely source. Both the ascription of lordship to Jesus in that church (e.g., Acts 2:36) and its presence in this Aram. formula suggest that it goes back to the early Jerusalem church.

2. (a) Both translations of the phrase are possible. By and large the church fathers understood it as a perf., though this interpretation may also include the present: "Our Lord has come and is now here." In this case, Phil. 4:5 ("The Lord is near") may allude to the phrase marana tha. The statement of 1 Cor. 16:22 is then a warning. The words, "If anyone does not love the Lord—a curse be on him," are being emphasized because the Lord is near. The same may be true of the call to repentance in Did. 10:6.

(b) The imperative, however, is the more likely interpretation. Appeal may be made to Rev. 22:20, where the words, "Amen. Come, Lord Jesus," appears to be a free rendering of the original Aram. prayer. Note the parallel with another Aram. word 'abbā', "Father" (Mk. 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6), which is likewise a prayer. It makes sense that these brief prayers should be passed on in their original form. No immediate connection with the context is essential.

3. Since in Did. 10:6 the phrase marana tha occurs in prayers associated with the Lord's Supper, the expression may be assumed to have been used in the liturgy of the Supper, perhaps from the very beginning. We know from 1 Cor. 11:26 that early on the Lord's Supper looked forward in hope to the Lord's coming (cf. also Matt. 26:29; Mk. 14:25). The prayers associated with the Supper in the Did. 9–10 show how alive this hope remained even at a later period. Thus marana tha is to be understood, in the light of Rev. 22:20, as a prayer for the coming of the Lord in the sense of the last advent.

This need not be the only thought, however, for just as Jn. 14:18 speaks of the risen Lord coming to his own, marana tha may also include this idea within its scope. Such a prayer is in fact partially answered whenever the church celebrates the Lord's Supper. The Lord comes in the elements of the bread and the cup.

See also hēmera, day (2465); parousia, presence, appearing, coming, advent (4242).

3449 μαργαρίτης

μαργαρίτης (margaritēs), pearl (3449).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. margaritēs, pearl, is a rare phenomenon in the ancient world. Pliny describes how pearls originate as dewdrops falling into open oysters.

2. There are no certain references to pearls in the OT, and margaritēs does not occur in the LXX. The use of pearls for the gates of the new Jerusalem was a familiar messianic picture in Jewish lit. (e.g., m. B. Bat. 37:1; Exod. Rab. 15.114.4).

NT 1. In Matt. 7:6 Jesus urges discrimination in offering "what is sacred," that which stands in special relation to God, to the irresponsible and unappreciative, an action that is tantamount to casting costly "pearls to pigs." Pearls are mentioned in 1 Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4 as extravagances of feminine finery, and in Matt. 13:45–46; Rev. 18:12, 16 as articles of merchandise.

2. In Matt. 13:45–46, a parable told by Jesus, a prudent merchant is prepared to sell all that he has to acquire a single pearl of great price. It is suggestive that of all the precious stones only the pearl results from an injury done to a living organism (the oyster). This precious pearl represents the church that Jesus purchased with his own blood (cf. Acts 20:28). Entrance into the Father's presence is only by way of the work of Jesus himself (Jn. 14:6)—hinted at in the use of pearls in Rev. for the gates of heaven.

3. Each gate of the heavenly city is a gigantic pearl, some 200 feet across (Rev. 21:21; cf. Isa. 54:12). On each gate is inscribed the name of one of the tribes of Israel (21:12). The large number of gates suggests free and ample access to the city. The names of the twelve tribes on the gates should be related with the names of the twelve apostles on the foundations (21:14). The implication is that the true children of God under both old and new covenants alike share in the heavenly city. The gates of the city are not intended to stand against assault—indeed, they are always open (21:25). The angels on duty (21:12) are not armed (cf. Gen. 3:24), but form a guard of honor.

See also petra, rock (4376); gōnia, corner (1224); lithos, stone (3345).

3455 (martyreō, bear witness, testify), → 3456.

3456 μαρτυρία

μαρτυρία (martyria), testimony, testifying, attestation (3456); μαρτυρέω (martyreō), bear witness, testify (3455); μαρτύριον (martyrion), testimony, evidence, proof (3457); μαρτύρομαι (martyromai), testify, bear witness, affirm (3458); μάρτυς (martys), a witness (3459); διαμαρτύρομαι (diamartyromai), charge, adjure, bear witness to, testify of (1371); καταμαρτυρέω (katamartyreō), bear witness against, testify against (2909); συμμαρτυρέω (symmartyreō), testify in support, confirm (5210); ψευδομαρτυρέω (pseudomartyreō), bear false witness (6018); ψευδομαρτυρία (pseudomartyria), false witness (6019); ψευδόμαρτυς (pseudomartys), one who gives false testimony (6020).

CL & OT 1. (a) martyria means the making of an active appearance and statements as a witness (martys). From the 5th cent. B.C. come the derived vbs. martyreō, to bear witness, confirm something, testify that something is the case; martyromai, call someone as a witness; and the noun martyrion, evidence, proof. The gods can be invoked as witnesses in oaths, but humans can also be summoned as witnesses. symmartyreō means to testify in support, confirm evidence; katamartyreō, to give evidence against someone; diamartyromai, to call in as a witness, certify, or urge strongly, conjure. A pseudomartys is one whose statement does not accord with the truth but who twists or covers it up (cf. pseudomartyria, false testimony; pseudomartyreō, to bear false witness).

(b) The original setting of the word group in cl. Gk. is clearly the legal sphere. Witnesses give evidence in a trial concerning past events or formally provide substantiation for the future, e.g., for legal transactions or for confirmation in the finalizing and signing of agreements. The martyria in a trial is to be given freely, i.e., without constraint or against one's better knowledge (such could take place by torture). The invocation of the gods as witnesses has its place where human witnesses or given circumstances cannot be adduced.

(c) Esp. from the time of the Stoics, martyria entered the field of moral or philosophical convictions. The Stoic or Cynic philosopher regarded himself as a witness who was called to give evidence on behalf of divine truth and testified to his ideas and doctrines by living appropriately in spite of adverse circumstances. This kind of martyria is related to but not identical with the later Christian concept of martyrdom (related to the word martys).

2. (a) In the LXX the most common member of this word group is martyrion (nearly 300x). Most of these are in the Pentateuch, where it may refer to the "two tablets of the Testimony" (Exod. 31:18; 32:15), the "Tent of Meeting" (29:4, 10–11), or "the ark of the Testimony" (40:3). martyrion here accords with its later usage in cl. Gk., namely, a piece of evidence that calls to mind a particular event (e.g., the founding of the covenant or the law).

As to other uses of martyrion, in Gen. 31:44 Laban and Jacob set up a stone "as a witness between us" (cf. Jos. 22:27–28; 24:27). In Wis. 10:7, the desolation of Sodom and Gomorrah stands as "evidence of [human] wickedness" and God's ensuing judgment. In Ps. 119 (23x), this word refers to God's law or precepts as that which gives direction to the psalmist's way of life (e.g., 119:2, 14, 88, 119); it is the expression of the covenant and the means whereby one knows Yahweh.

(b) martyria occurs 12x in the LXX. In 1 Sam. 9:24 it means "occasion." In Prov. 12:19; 25:18; Sir. 31:23–24 (= LXX 34:23–24) this word describes the act of giving testimony, which can be characterized as truthful, lying, or unjust. martys (54x) is used in the cl. Gk. sense for one who gives testimony on the basis of observation or who in the legal sense is enlisted to confirm a state of affairs, an agreement (e.g., Ruth 4:9–11; cf. Deut. 19:15–18). In 1 Sam. 12:5, Samuel invokes Yahweh as witness that he has not taken any bribe (cf. Job 16:19 = LXX 16:20; Wis. 1:6). In the prophetic oracle of Jer. 29:23 (= LXX 36:23), Yahweh likewise comes forward as a witness against his people and their behavior. In Isa. 43:10, 12; 44:8, God calls the nation to come forward as witnesses to the uniqueness and righteousness of Yahweh.

(c) martyreō occurs only 16x: for legal testimony (Num. 35:30; Deut. 19:15, 18), but also for the commemorative function of a monument (Gen. 31:46–48) and the Song of Moses (Deut. 31:19, 21). katamartyreō (5x; e.g., 1 Ki. 21:10, 13 = LXX 20:10, 13; Prov. 25:18) denotes false evidence that leads to condemnation. pseudomartyreō means to bear deliberate false testimony (Exod. 20:16; Deut. 5:17 = LXX 5:20). diamartyromai can mean to call up or enlist someone as a witness (e.g., Deut. 4:26; 31:28; Mal. 2:14), but it is also used for the passing on of instructions received from Yahweh (Exod. 18:20; 19:10, 21). It can therefore have the sense both of to warn, testify on oath (e.g., in the name of God, Ps. 50:7), and to certify, promise (e.g., Zech. 3:6 = LXX 3:7).

(d) By and large the words of this group are essentially the same as in cl. Gk. One is a witness for something one has experienced, or one is enlisted as such for an event. It is something one has experienced or something that a person will testify to. Esp. where God is mentioned or invoked as witness, the partisanship of the witness for the right of the covenant is clearly felt. The OT does not know the subjective idea of testimony as what one presents on behalf of one's religious conviction (e.g., witnessing to the truth of God's Word).

(e) The thought of suffering involved in bearing witness to one's faith even to the point of death and the high esteem paid to martyrdom were widespread in Jud. (cf. esp. 4 Macc. 18:11–24). But we should note that terms like martys, martyria, or martyreō and even martyrion were never used for such heroes of faith.

NT This word group is esp. important in Acts and Johannine lit. katamartyreō occurs only in Matt. 26:62; 27:13; Mk. 14:60 in questions directed to Jesus as to whether he did not wish to answer the evidence presented against him. symmartyreō is used exclusively by Paul in Rom. 2:15; 8:16; 9:1, expressing a confirmatory, reinforcing, or accusatory cotestimony of the Spirit or of human conscience. diamartyromai occurs 15x (9x in Acts, where the vb. is used as a special expression for proclamation or warning; cf. 1 Thess. 4:6; 1 Tim. 5:21; 2 Tim. 2:14; 4:1).

1. The legal use of the word, common to cl. Gk. and the LXX, dominates the examples in the Synoptics (e.g., martyria in Mk. 14:55, 56, 59; Lk. 22:71; martys in Matt. 26:65; Mk. 14:63, each of which are related to false evidence produced against Jesus; cf. also Acts 6:13; 7:58). The citations of Deut. 19:15 (Matt. 18:16; Jn. 8:17) and Deut. 17:6 (Heb. 10:28) are to be understood in the same sense.

2. Paul's use of the words is also closely linked to LXX usage (e.g., martyreō in Rom. 10:2; 2 Cor. 8:3; Gal. 4:15; Col. 4:13). In Rom. 3:21 he calls "the Law and the Prophets" as that which testifies to God's righteousness. In 1:9; 2 Cor. 1:23; Phil. 1:8; 1 Thess. 2:5, 10, he calls on God as witness. But Paul is perhaps also the first to give martyrion a new meaning and content when he says in 1 Cor. 1:6: "because our testimony [martyrion] about Christ was confirmed in you." This word no longer means a piece of evidence or a recollection giving encouragement or warning; the word is used in the sense of the gospel, the proclaimed message of salvation in Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 2:1; 15:15; 2 Thess. 1:10).

3. The Synoptics also expand the conceptual area of witness above the legal usage noted above. The sacrifice of the healed man is offered "as a testimony [martyrion]," as documented proof that the healing has taken place (Matt. 8:4; Mk. 1:44; Lk. 5:14). The same expression occurs in Matt. 10:18 (the sending out of the Twelve), where the arrest and trial of the disciples will be "as witnesses" to the Jews and Gentiles. Such tribunals will provide opportunities for testifying to Christ in public.

4. In Acts, martyreō is sometimes used in the sense of human attestation regarding good conduct (6:3; 16:2; 22:5, 12) and martys of false witnesses brought against Stephen (6:13; 7:58). But martyreō occurs for the first time in 23:11 without an obj., meaning to testify in the sense of proclaiming Christ. This corresponds with the meaning of martyrion in 4:33, where the apostles testify to a message with great power; it also links with the word martys, witness, in Lk. 24:48 and Acts 1:8, where the risen Lord calls his apostles as his witnesses to the ends of the earth. This witness is more precisely defined in 1:22 as witness of the resurrection of Jesus (cf. 2:32; 3:15; 13:31; 26:16) and of his deeds. From this meaning it soon becomes clear that the way of a witness is a way of rejection, suffering, and possibly of death ("your martyr Stephen," 22:20). Luke likes to use diamartyromai for testimony to Jesus as the Christ (18:5) and the proclamation of the grace of God (20:24; cf. 2:40; 8:25; 28:23).

5. The concept of witness has a more central theological significance for Jn. than for all the other NT writers. He summarizes the content of the Christ event and of the gospel in the concept of the logos (word, → 3364) and adopts the vb. martyreō and the noun martyria in order to express the event of the divine communication of revelation in all its aspects. (a) John is aware, to be sure, of the cl. Gk. use of the word in the sense of human attestation or testimonial (see Jn. 2:25, where Jesus says he does not need human testimony to form an opinion about someone; 12:17, where people bear witness to the resurrection of Lazarus; 18:23, where Jesus challenges the temple guard who struck him to give proof of his improper speech; cf. also 3 Jn. 3, 6, 12).

(b) But it is precisely against this background that the specific character of Jn.'s concept of witness surfaces in three aspects of the meaning of witness as being specific testimony borne to Christ. (i) More strongly in Jn. than in the other Gospels John the Baptist is portrayed as the forerunner, the final prophet. His task was to point to or witness to the Coming One: "He came as a witness [martyria] to testify [martyreō] concerning that light, so that through him all men might believe" (Jn. 1:7; cf. 1:15, 32, 34; 3:26, 31–32; 5:33). Thus witness here is proclamation that points to Jesus as the revealer of God.

(ii) A central theme of Jn.'s Gospel is that Jesus testifies of himself. Against the Jewish leaders, who maintain that because he is testifying to himself, his martyria cannot be true (8:13, 17; cf. Deut. 19:15), Jesus sets his word in Jn. 8:14. When Jesus says something about himself, his martyria is true, because he knows where he has come from and where he is going. This is not self-glorification (cf. esp. 5:31, which is in tension with 8:14). Rather, his legitimation is: "The very work that the Father has given me ... testifies that the Father has sent me" (5:36; cf. 10:25). Moreover, the Father too is a witness to his Son (5:32, 37; cf. 6:65; 10:32). In addition, in 5:39 the Scriptures are named as a witness. What is meant is finally expressed in the trial scene before Pilate: "For this I came into the world, to testify to the truth" (18:37). In short, Jesus himself is the mediator of the testimony, i.e., of the revelation of God to the world (8:14), which hates him and thus rejects his testimony (3:11, 32).

(iii) For those who have accepted the truth about Jesus and thus confirmed or certified the truth of God (Jn. 3:33), their message becomes testimony about Jesus. This happens first with the Samaritan woman, whose testimony led the way to the Samaritans to believe in him (4:39). In 15:26, Jesus promises that the Paraclete, the Spirit, will testify about him. He opens the world's eyes to the truth of God and the truth about itself. Jesus then expands this in the phrase, "you also must testify" (15:27). In 1 Jn. 1:2 the apostle emphasizes that he testified to the life, who has appeared (cf. 4:14; 5:10–11). Similarly, 5:6, speaking of the witness of the Spirit, takes up Jn. 15:26.

(c) This martyria concerning Jesus Christ as the revelation of the significance of Jesus, communicated and accepted in faith, is for the seer of Rev. identical with "the word of God" (1:2, 9; cf. 12:11). The martyria is more precisely qualified as "the spirit of prophecy" (19:10), which may mean testifying to what has been here revealed concerning the future. To be touched by the testimony of Jesus Christ places one in the service of witness. It obliges one to pass it on, though doing so almost inevitably means suffering and persecution (cf. 6:9; 12:17). But such people are also assured of victory (12:11; cf. 20:4).

In Rev. 1:5, Jesus is specifically called "the faithful witness" (cf. 3:14). Those who suffer and are killed because of their relationship with Jesus are likewise called faithful witnesses (see Antipas in 2:13; cf. 6:9; 11:3, 7). Note how the great prostitute, Babylon, is drunk with the blood of Jesus' witnesses (17:6). To be sure, what stands in the foreground is still not so much one's death but one's appearance as a trustworthy witness of Jesus.

6. Heb. is different from the other NT writings in that it uses the vb. martyreō exclusively in the pass. and chiefly in Heb. 11. The one who bears witness, confirming the faith of the one named, is God himself (11:2, 4, 5, 39). Those whose fate bears all the signs of the martyrdom of faith obtain a witness, i.e., are recognized by God. It is in accord with this that these people, who have been accredited on account of holding firm to the hope of their faith, are in 12:1 called a "cloud of witnesses" for the church of the present time.

7. What is the application of this theme for believers today? (a) The frequent use of the witness theme in the NT stresses the importance of the historical foundations of the Christian religion. The apostles, who were with Jesus from the beginning of his ministry, are eyewitnesses to vouch for the facts of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. The Gospels testify to this, as does Paul in 1 Cor. 15:1–8. This is a powerful message in the light of those who reject the historicity of much of the Gospels.

In terms of the legal meaning of this word group, the Gospel of Jn. esp. provides the setting for the most sustained controversy in the NT. Here Jesus has a lawsuit with the world. His witnesses include John the Baptist, the Scriptures, the Father, his own words and works, and later the apostles and the Holy Spirit. They are opposed by the world, which is represented by the unbelieving Jews. John has a case to present, and for this reason he advances arguments, asks juridical questions, and presents his witnesses.

(b) In Rev. the stress falls on Christ, "the faithful and true witness" (3:14), who serves as the archetype for the faithful band of believers, who must maintain the same testimony even at the sacrifice of life itself (cf. also 1 Tim. 6:12–16). The faithful witness often entails suffering and persecution. Christians are about to enter a time of severe persecution, and some of them will be brought before courts and sentenced to death. For this reason the seer of Patmos encourages them to "hold to the testimony of Jesus" (Rev. 12:17; cf. 20:4). Thus it is not surprising that wherever Christians have faced opposition and hostile law courts for the sake of their testimony, this book has been a source of inspiration.

3457 (martyrion, testimony, evidence, proof), → 3456.

3458 (martyromai, testify, bear witness, affirm), → 3456.

3459 (martys, a witness), → 3456.

3463 μαστιγόω

μαστιγόω (mastigoō), whip, flog, scourge, chastise (3463); μάστιξ (mastix), whip, lash, scourging, torment (3465); μαστίζω (mastizō), strike with a whip, scourge (3464); κολαφίζω (kolaphizō), beat (3139); δέρω (derō), beat (1296); πατάσσω (patassō), strike, hit (4250); πληγή (plēgē), blow, stroke, wound (4435); ὑπωπιάζω (hypōpiazō), strike under the eye, treat roughly, maltreat (5724); φραγέλλιον (phragellion), whip, lash (5848); φραγελλόω (phragelloō), flog, scourge (5849).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. a variety of words denote physical violence, often distinguished by the manner in which the violence is inflicted. Of those that occur in the NT, derō originally meant flay or skin, but came to mean beat. mastizō and mastigoō refer to a more severe form of punishment and are later applied (together with the Lat. loan words phragellion and phragelloō) to the Roman punishment of scourging that accompanied capital offenses. hypōpiazō derives from the world of boxing (lit., strike under the eye; hence, treat roughly, maltreat). Some of these terms also developed fig. meanings (e.g., plēgē could mean a misfortune sent by a god).

2. The most frequent of the above words in the LXX are plēgē, patassō, and mastigoō. Besides their lit. usage, they are all applied fig. to the plagues and sorrows inflicted by God both on the nations and on his own people. plēgē is used of the plagues in Egypt (Exod. 11:1; 12:13) and of the suffering servant as "a man of sorrows" (Isa. 53:3). Gen. 8:21 uses the fut. of patassō: "Never again will I destroy all living creatures." Ps. 39:10 pleads, "Remove your scourge [mastix in pl.] from me." derō is found only in the sense of flay (Lev. 1:6).

NT 1. These various words are used in a lit. sense in the NT. (a) derō (Lk. 22:63), phragelloō (Matt. 27:26; Mk. 15:15), and mastigoō (Jn. 19:1) describe the scourging Jesus received. He was also struck by the soldiers (rhapizō, Matt. 26:67; rhapisma, Mk. 14:65; Jn. 19:3; Matt. and Mk. also have kolaphizō). mastigoō occurs in the passion predictions (Matt. 20:19; Mk. 10:34; Lk. 18:32). Jesus' parabolic teaching shows that he anticipated such treatment of himself (derō in Matt. 21:35; Mk. 12:3, 5; Lk. 20:10–11).

(b) Several texts refer to punishment from the Jews. The disciples can expect scourging (mastigoō, Matt. 10:17; 23:34) and beating (derō, Mk. 13:9). Acts 5:40 and 22:19 describe instances of beating by Jewish authorities. The example of those who were scourged for their faith is held up by Heb. 11:36.

(c) Punishment by civil magistrates is also mentioned, perhaps sometimes as a mode of examination under torture (Acts 16:23, 33; 2 Cor. 11:23–24, plēgē; Acts 16:37, derō; 22:24, mastix).

2. Some of these words are used in a fig. sense. (a) God corrects and chastises (mastigoō) his own people for their good (Heb. 12:6; cf. Prov. 3:12). Paul encourages believers to forestall this through self-discipline (1 Cor. 9:27, hypōpiazō; cf. 11:30–31).

(b) In Mk. 3:10; 5:29; Lk. 7:21 mastix denotes a bodily illness in the sense of suffering or affliction. It reflects the belief that illness was a chastisement from God, though Jesus denied any necessary connection between sickness and sin (Jn. 9:3).

(c) At the crucifixion the shepherd himself was smitten (patassō) by God (Matt. 26:31; cf. Zech. 13:7; Isa. 53:3–4) and thus shouldered God's judgment. In 1 Pet. 2:24 mōlōps expresses the paradox: by his wound(s) you have been healed.

(d) God inflicts judgment on all who have rebelled against him in order to lead them back to repentance. plēgē is repeatedly used in Rev. for manifestations of God's wrath. When people fail to repent, they are finally destroyed (9:20–21; 11:6; 15:1).

(e) kolaphizō is used lit. in Matt. 26:67; Mk. 14:65; 1 Pet. 2:20; in 2 Cor. 12:7 it is used fig. of Paul's "thorn in [the] flesh, a messenger of Satan, to torment" him. Presumably this is some sort of physical affliction or possibly of those opposing him. In response to Paul's prayer three times for its removal, the reply is given, "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness" (12:9).

See also paideuō, instruct, train (4084); rhabdos, rod, staff (4811).

3464 (mastizō, strike with a whip, scourge), → 3463.

3465 (mastix, whip, lash, scourging, torment), → 3463.

3467 (mataiologia, useless talk, empty prattle), → 3469.

3468 (mataiologos, idle talker), → 3469.

3469 μάταιος

μάταιος (mataios), empty, useless, worthless, futile (3469); ματαιότης (mataiotēs), emptiness, futility, worthlessness (3470); ματαιόω (mataioō), render futile (3471); μάτην (matēn), in vain, to no end (3472); ματαιολογία (mataiologia), useless talk, empty prattle (3467); ματαιολόγος (mataiologos), idle talker (3468).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. mataios means null as both cause and effect. Hence it means both fallacious, fictitious, groundless, and in vain, ineffectual, aimless. This word and its cognates have as their background certain set values, moral standards, and religious realities. The conduct of anyone who ignores or transgresses these falls under the judgment of being mataios. One's life thus becomes a deceptive appearance, and such a person can be called a fool or even a criminal. The Gk. world counseled reflection and prudence to guard against such aberrations.

To check mataiotēs, Aeschylus coined the counter-idea mē mataion, which manifests itself in sōphrosynē (5408). The gods did not possess the power effectively to overcome negative mataiotēs. Evidently the conflict between mataios and mē mataion, between one's mere appearance and his or her being, slackened off in a later age.

2. The LXX used this word group to translate various Heb. words that denote different aspects of vanity, deception, or nothingness. Those who can be called mataios resist the reality of God in his revelation and claims on them. An example of Yahweh's uncompromising confrontation with vanity is the third commandment: "You shall not misuse the name of the LORD your God" (Exod. 20:7).

mataios occurs in the OT chiefly in three contexts. (a) Prophets who speak without being commissioned and utter the revelations of their imaginations as God's word speak vanity. Their words are lies and deception and are under God's judgment (cf. Jer. 23:16–32; Lam. 2:14; Ezek. 13:6–9; Zech. 10:2). Anyone who follows them falls prey to vanity. Zeph. 3:13 promises the eventual cessation of lies and vanity.

(b) mataios is often used as a designation of idols, of the making of idols, and of their worship. ta mataia (the empty things or vain things) is often used as a trans. for the names of gods of foreign peoples (2 Chr. 11:15; Isa. 2:20). They are "nothings."

(c) The godly person in the OT is not unaware of the futility and vanity of human life (Ps. 103:14–16; Job 14:1–6 and often elsewhere) and thought (Ps. 94:11). In Eccl. this awareness is intensified to the point of apparent skepticism: "All is vanity" (mataiotēs; NIV "meaningless"; Eccl. 1:2; cf. 2:1 and often). The Teacher's skepticism can understand neither God's government nor the meaning of his own life. There remains only the resignation of tragic existence, which has lamentation for the vanity of existence. This may be partly explained by the author's distance in time from God's mighty acts in history and by the absence of God's intervention in the course of the world in the present. Nevertheless, the Teacher is held back from plunging into nihilism by such affirmations of life as 2:25; 3:13; 7:14; 9:7–10.

NT In contrast to the frequent use of mataios in the prophets, this word and its cognates occur in the NT only 14x. Generally this word group denotes emptiness and futility. With the same sharpness as in the OT, the judgment mataios is passed on everything that is opposed to God and his commands, such as the presumption of human thought (Rom. 1:21; 1 Cor. 3:20), pagan idolatry (Acts 14:15), and a deceitful way of life (Jas. 1:26; 1 Pet. 1:18).

1. In 1 Cor. 3:20 Paul contends against worldly pseudo-wisdom. The cross of Jesus makes those who would be clever foolish before God and humanity. Paul finds confirmation of this in Ps. 94:11. The Lord "knows the thoughts of man; he knows that they are futile." The wisdom of the worldly wise stands in contrast to the foolishness of the cross, which is God's wisdom for those who believe (1 Cor. 1:24). The cross appears foolish, weak, and vain to natural thinking.

In 1 Cor. 15:17 Paul describes as vain a faith that denies the reality of the risen Christ. It is still under the power of sin and removes the basis of the kerygma, the message of Christ. Paul uses kenos (→ 3031) 2x in 1 Cor. 15:14. However, because the resurrection of Jesus actually happened as the act of God, faith is not "futile" (mataia).

2. The prophetic attack on idols is continued in missionary preaching (Acts 14:15). The revelation of God in Christ does not permit foreign gods, humans, or images to be worshiped as divine. Through the preaching of the gospel people turn from these "worthless" nonentities (such as Zeus and Hermes, 14:12) to the living God.

3. The church's sanctified way of life is contrasted with the pagan way in 1 Pet. 1:14–18. Christ's sacrificial death brings about redemption from the futile way of life inherited from one's ancestors (1:18). The Gentile Christian would understand mataios here as the worship of idols, which was the root of the former unrestrained way of life. According to Jas. 1:26, one's religion is "worthless" if one is outwardly pious but at the same time devoted to unrestrained prattle (cf. 2 Pet. 2:18).

4. In Rom. 8:20 Paul sees the whole creation subject to mataiotēs ("frustration"). It is in bondage to decay (8:21). But this corruptibility also passes, because it is not self-elected but imposed on it by the Creator, so that he may reveal to it its future splendor. Thus there is not only sighing (8:22), but a well-founded waiting for redemption (8:19). According to Eph. 4:17, mataiotēs is the characteristic of the pagan way of thought and life. In ingratitude human beings forsake God, the fountain of life, and give themselves over to a life of immorality through "the futility of their thinking."

5. mataioō occurs in the LXX almost entirely in the pass. in the sense of being given over to vanity (cf. Jer. 2:5). Rom. 1:21 speaks of humans as being responsible for this (cf. comments on 8:20). They are given over to futility because they ungratefully deny God the honor that is justly his.

6. matēn, in vain, occurs in Matt. 15:9; Mk. 7:7; cf. Isa. 29:13. mataiologia (1 Tim. 1:6) means empty prattle, "meaningless talk." This comes about when people do not keep to what God has appointed for them: "love, which comes from a pure heart and a good conscience and a sincere faith" (1:5; cf. 2 Pet. 2:18). There are many "mere talkers" (mataiologoi, Tit. 1:10) and deceivers, especially among the circumcision party.

See also kenos, empty, without truth or power (3031).

3470 (mataiotēs, emptiness, futility, worthlessness), → 3469.

3471 (mataioō, render futile), → 3469.

3472 (matēn, in vain, to no end), → 3469.

3479 (machaira, sword), → 4483.

3480 (machē, battle, fighting, quarrels, strife, disputes), → 4483.

3481 (machomai, fight, quarrel, dispute), → 4483.

3483 (megaleios, mighty deed), → 3489.

3484 (megaleiotēs, grandeur), → 3489.

3486 (megalynō, make large, great, magnify), → 3489.

3488 (megalōsynē, majesty), → 3489.

3489 μέγας

μέγας (megas), large, great (3489); μεγαλύνω (megalynō), make large, great, magnify (3486); μεγαλειότης (megaleiotēs), grandeur (3484); μεγαλωσύνη (megalōsynē), majesty (3488); μεγαλεῖος (megaleios), mighty deed (3483); μείζων (meizōn), greater than (3505).

CL & OT 1. (a) megas, great, is the antonym of mikros, small (→ 3625). Its use ranges from the measurement of physical shapes and spaces to designations of rank. According to the context, megas can mean fully grown, important, magnificent, powerful. Used as an epithet of honor, it occurs frequently in the formula of acclamation megas theos ("great god"), and in connection with the names of gods. meizōn is the comparative and megistos the superlative.

(b) The derived vb. megalynō means to make great and can be used fig. in the sense of to praise, glorify. megaleiotēs, grandeur, splendor, and megalōsynē, majesty, splendor, are not attested in pre-Christian lit. megaleia, good and mighty deeds, is the neut. pl. of megaleios used as a noun.

2. (a) In the LXX megas occurs about 820x in various OT writings; megalynō occurs 93x. megas translates a variety of Heb. words, which suggests that the translators were not trying to find a corresponding Gk. term for each Heb. word, but were generalizing.

(b) In contrast to the wide-ranging use of the adj., the derived nouns in the LXX have a clear denotation. In addition to two verses in the Apocr. (1 Esd. 1:5; 4:40), megaleiotēs is used in Jer. 33:9 (= LXX 33:9) and Dan. 7:27 in connection with the fact that God's activity in Israel will extend to all peoples on earth in power and glory. megalōsynē occurs 27x, mainly in expressions of God's surpassing greatness and power (e.g., 2 Sam. 7:23), evident esp. in his redemption of Israel. Similarly the word is used in 1 Chr. 17:19 and Ps. 150:2 to assert God's creative will and his lordship over history. There is a twofold emphasis here: (a) to describe God's greatness, and (b) to summon people to see and praise God's greatness, i.e., to glorify him.

(c) megaleia has the same almost exclusive reference to Yahweh's mighty acts (e.g., Deut. 11:2; Ps. 106:21). At times the OT presents Yahweh as greater than all gods (cf. Exod. 18:11; Ps. 77:13).

NT 1. The megas word group is attested over 200x in the NT. The adj. occurs esp. frequently in Lk.'s writings; it is also prominent in later NT letters, while the group rarely appears in the earlier Pauline writings. It is in Rev. that the greatest number of occurrences (80x) are found. The phrase "small and great," meaning all without distinction, is typical of Acts and Rev. (e.g., Acts 8:10; 26:22; Rev. 11:18; 20:12; cf. Gen. 19:11; 1 Sam. 30:2).

(a) megas is important in various Synoptic sayings of Jesus. These reveal his rejection of the rab. striving after piety as it was practiced in a world strictly divided into great and small, i.e., into people of higher and lower standing. The sayings concern rewards and true greatness in the kingdom of heaven. They cut across the Pharisaic attitude to commandments (Matt. 5:19–20), warn about human enmity, and call for love of one's enemies (cf. Lk. 6:23, 35, both using polys). Jesus' own attitude surfaces in his teaching on the Sabbath, which leads to the declaration that "one greater than the temple is here" (Matt. 12:6, meizōn), namely, the order of the kingdom of God, already present in the actions and person of Jesus.

(b) The instances of megas in Rev. are bound up with the apocalyptic form of the book (cf. also Matt. 24:21, 24, 31; Lk. 21:11, 23). It is used in the larger-than-life symbolism that characterizes the eschatological dimension of events, e.g., the day (Rev. 6:17), the earthquake (16:18), and the city (18:2, 10, 16, 18–19, 21). Particularly striking are the 21 occurrences of phōnē megalē, "a loud [lit., great] voice." This expression indicates the sovereignty of God, which drowns all other sounds of his messengers (e.g., Rev. 1:10; 5:2; 7:2; 10:3; 11:15; 16:1; 21:3). The note of divine sovereignty is also heard in the loud voice of the multitude praising him (5:12; 6:10; 7:10; 19:1). The phrase has a similar meaning in the Gospels, where it is used both of the cry of Jesus on the cross (Matt. 27:50; Mk. 15:37; Lk. 23:46) and of the demons' cry of terror (4:33).

2. megaleiotēs is used 2x for God's majesty, supremacy, and splendor (Lk. 9:43; 2 Pet. 1:16) and once for the presumed "divine majesty" of Artemis (Acts 19:27). megalōsynē occurs in Heb. 1:3; 8:1; Jude 25 as a surrogate for God, expressing his sublime majesty. megaleios occurs only in Acts 2:11 (pl.), where the Jews of the Diaspora visiting Jerusalem express amazement at hearing the followers of Jesus declaring "the wonders" of God in their own languages.

3. In Jn. the comparative meizōn brings into prominence Jesus' claims and the unique effectiveness of his work. In authority he is "greater" than Jacob, Abraham, or anyone else, for he brings life (4:12; 5:20, 36; 8:53). His works have been given him by the Father, who, despite the unity and equality that exist between the two, is "greater" than Jesus himself (10:29; 14:28). The commission with which the Father sends the Son is balanced by the Son's obedience in carrying out his work of love.

4. megas takes on special significance in a number of passages with particular theological importance. Jesus' teaching presents something new.

(a) In Matt. 22:36, 38 Jesus is asked a controversial question about the "the greatest [lit., great] commandment" (cf. Mk. 12:28). The use of the positive megalē instead of the superlative megistē is a Semitism. Some rab. teaching emphasized the equal importance of all commandments, but there was also a tendency in Jud. to seek a single principle. Jesus replies by referring to the double command to love God and one's neighbor. He thus makes an organic connection between Deut. 6:5 and Lev. 19:18, a connection rarely made in Jewish legal thought. Moreover, the works that Jesus does and the "greater works" the disciples will do are to be understood as combining this love for God and love for other people. According to Jesus, love in the form of service must underlie all our works (→ agapē, 27).

(b) In the parallel section in Lk., Jesus' answer is linked with the parable of the Good Samaritan (10:25–37). This makes clear how, in Jesus' understanding of love, a special standard for reckoning greatness and smallness applies. That story is the standard example for those who want to obey the twofold "greatest" commandment: A person shows love for God by loving his or her neighbor.

(c) Thus, as regards function, the "greatest commandment" goes hand in hand with the definition of greatness and smallness in the kingdom of heaven, as it appears in the passage where the disciples argue about personal precedence (Matt. 18:1–5; Mk. 9:33–37; Lk. 9:46–48). Jesus demonstrates the supremely valid guideline for his disciples. He puts a child in their midst and declares, "Whoever humbles himself like this child [i.e., acknowledges his own smallness] is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18:4).

(d) In this devaluation and revaluation of worldly orders of precedence, the structure of the Christian community, determined by the model of Christ, emerges as a fellowship based on service to others (cf. Lk. 22:26–27, where "the greatest" is used as a synonym of "the one who serves"; cf. Matt. 20:26; 23:11; Mk. 10:43–44).

The discussions about the greatness or smallness of John the Baptist should be understood in the same way (Matt. 11:11; Lk. 7:28). Jesus, insofar as he ushers in the kingdom of God, performs the greatest work, while the Baptist still belongs to the previous era of expectation.

See also mikros, small, little (3625).

3493 (methermēneuō, translate), → 2257.

3494 (methē, drunkenness), → 3501.

3497 (methodeia, method, esp. scheming, craftiness), → 3847.

3499 (methyskō, cause to become intoxicated), → 3501.

3500 (methysos, drunkard), → 3501.

3501 μεθύω

μεθύω (methyō), be drunk (3501); μεθύσκω (methyskō), cause to become intoxicated (3499); μέθυσος (methysos), drunkard (3500); μέθη (methē), drunkenness (3494); πάροινος (paroinos), given to drunkenness (4232).

CL & OT These words occur regularly in Hel. Gk. in connection with intoxication. In Gnosticism drunkenness is often linked with agnōsia in opposition to true gnōsis (cf. also Odes Sol. 11:8). In the LXX methyō, intoxicated with wine, is familiar enough (cf. Gen. 9:21; Isa. 19:14; 28:1; Joel 1:5). The word can also be used of the refreshment brought by rain to dry ground (Ps. 65:10; Isa. 55:10). methē, drunkenness, occurs in Prov. 20:1; Isa. 28:7; Ezek. 23:33. Sometimes methyskō is used fig., as in Isa. 34:5, where the sword of Yahweh drinks its fill, with blood as the intoxicating liquid (34:7; 49:26).

NT In the NT methysos and methē occur in lists of vices (Rom. 13:13; Gal. 5:21; 1 Cor. 5:11; 6:10); drunkenness is seen here as an element of the old way of life now abandoned. Typical of the Pauline attitude is 1 Thess. 5:6–7, where, with an awareness of the imminence of the end, the apostle issues a strong warning against the perils of drunkenness. The argument is based on the conviction that Christians now live in the light of Christ's new day. Since drunkenness is a nighttime experience, it is incompatible with authentic Christianity (cf. also Matt. 24:49; Lk. 12:45; 21:34).

This incompatibility can also be deduced from the fact that the Christian is Spirit-filled (Eph. 5:18; cf. Acts 2:15), a condition that shows itself not so much in ecstasies or mystical experiences, but in liturgical praise (Eph. 5:18–20) and in ethical commitment (5:21–6:9). The incongruity of drunkenness and Christian experience emerges clearly in the context of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:20–21). Perhaps the Dionysus cult, with its stress on religious intoxication, was affecting some Christians in Corinth.

In Rev. 17:2 idolatry is vividly depicted as a drunkenness with the wine of adultery, probably with direct allusion to the intoxicating and orgiastic character of some of the current cults. In 17:6 the woman, symbolizing power opposed to God within the world, is drunk with the blood of the saints.

paroinos is the distinctive word for drunkenness in the Pastoral Letters; in 1 Tim. 3:3 and Tit. 1:7 it is one of the disqualifying factors for the office of bishop. Two other words, kraipalē, intoxication (Lk. 21:34), and oinophlygia, drunkenness (1 Pet. 4:3), each occur once, both as a characteristic that is incompatible with Christian life.

See also nēphō, be sober (3768).

3505 (meizōn, greater than), → 3489.

3506 μέλας

μέλας (melas), black (3506).

CL & OT melas means dark, black, and in a transferred sense sinister, enigmatic. It occurs in the LXX as black (cf. Song 1:5; Zech. 6:2); Philo and Josephus use melas metaphorically as the sign of a stranger, of mourning, and of personal misfortune.

NT The neut. to melan means ink at 2 Cor. 3:3; 2 Jn. 12; 3 Jn. 13. melas is contrasted with leukos, white (→ 3328), in Matt. 5:36: "And do not swear by your head, for you cannot make even one hair white or black." Here we have perhaps a complex of ideas. Swearing was sometimes made by the head, and in some cases the vow was symbolized by not cutting one's hair (cf. Jdg. 13:5; Acts 18:18). Moreover, several times disciples are assured that the hairs of their heads are all numbered and thus they will not perish (Matt. 10:30; Lk. 12:7; Acts 27:34). We have no control over the course of time; our vows cannot turn the clock back by turning white hair again to the black hair of youth. Nevertheless, we can trust in the Father's providential care that nothing will befall us without his will.

At Rev. 6:5 the rider of a black horse holds a balance, while a voice quotes high prices for food, probably a sign of famine sent as judgment. The apocalyptic image is derived from the four horses in Zech. 6:2, which represent the universal lordship of God. In Rev. 6:12 the sun becomes "black like sackcloth," a sign of mourning. The darkening of the sun is a recurrent eschatological symbol of the Lord's coming in judgment that the NT takes over from the OT (Isa. 13:10; 50:3; Ezek. 32:7; Joel 2:10, 31; Amos 8:9; Matt. 24:29; Mk. 13:24; Lk. 23:45; Acts 2:20; Rev. 6:12; 9:2).

3508 (melei, be concerned, be worried about), → 3533.

3516 μέλλω

μέλλω (mellō), be about to, be on the point of, intend, propose (3516).

CL & OT mellō is commonly followed by an infinitive, which denotes the intentions of the subject. Thus mellō means "I am able to, I can." With a future infinitive it denotes "I am about to, I intend to." When the action is regarded as compelled by the gods, fate, or some law, mellō denotes something inevitable and determined. When the action in question is delayed so that it never comes about, mellō means hesitate. The part. mellōn means the future, what is about to come.

In the LXX mellō is often used with a present infinitive, usually as the equivalent of the imperfect future form of the Heb. vb. Some LXX MSS of Isa. 9:5 (= LXX 9:6) have patēr tou mellontos aiōnos (Father of the age to come).

NT 1. In the NT mellō means the same as in cl. Gk: intend, have in mind (e.g., Matt. 2:13; Lk. 10:1; 19:4; Jn. 6:6, 15; 7:35; Heb. 8:5). It occurs frequently with the present infinitive (84x) and occasionally with the aor. infinitive. ti melleis (Acts 22:16) means, "What are you waiting for?"

2. mellō means must, have to, in the context of events that happen according to the will and decree of God. It occurs in statements about Christ's saving work, esp. his suffering and death. Thus, Jesus "told them what was going to happen to him" (Mk. 10:32); "the Son of Man is going to be betrayed into the hands of men" (Matt. 17:22). It occurs in the context of God's action in grace and judgment (Mk. 13:4; Acts 17:31; Rom. 4:24; 8:13; Gal. 3:23; 1 Thess. 3:4; Heb. 10:27; Rev. 1:19; 3:10). With this may be included prophetic utterances made with divine certainty (Acts 11:28; 24:15; 26:22).

3. Participial forms of mellō are used both as adjs. and nouns in the sense of coming, future (Lk. 13:9; Rom. 8:38; 2 Pet. 2:6). In this sense, it is incorporated in an important NT eschatological formula. The teaching of the two ages (→ aiōn, 172) provides the foundation for the NT doctrine of the kingdom of God. The present age, which is passing away, has been broken into by the age to come (mellōn aiōn). This coming world (Heb. 2:5; cf. Eph. 1:21) is alone the realm of Christ. At present, believers have no abiding city; they seek a future (mellousa) one (Heb. 13:14), a heavenly city (11:16; 12:22), prepared by God. This new world is described in terms of future glory (Rom. 8:18; cf. 1 Pet. 5:1). It is already present with God and is ready to be revealed.

In light of the future, the sufferings of the present age are to be counted as nothing. But those who "live according to the sinful nature ... will die" (mellete apothnēskein, Rom. 8:13). This is the inevitable outcome of the coming judgment and God's wrath (Matt. 3:7; Acts 24:25). Christ is the coming Son of Man (Matt. 16:27) and judge (2 Tim. 4:1). Godliness is of value as it holds promise for the present life and the life to come (1 Tim. 4:8). It is possible to taste the powers of the age to come (Heb. 6:5). The law is only the shadow of the good things to come (10:1; cf. Col. 2:17).

See also erchomai, come, go (2262); katantaō, come to, arrive at (2918).

3517 μέλος

μέλος (melos), member, part, limb (3517).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. melos means limb; also musical member, phrase, hence song or music to which a song is set. In pre-Socratic writers the pl. can mean members. The sing. is used later for a member of a body or a city (where the city is understood as an organism). In Hel. mystery religions and Gnosticism the idea of the body and its members has a religious application in creation mythology and especially in gnostic redemption myths. The redeemed are lost members of the redeemer's body, which have now been found.

melos occurs 12x in the canonical books of the LXX. In Exod. 29:17 it denotes the dismembered parts of the sacrifice; in Jdg. 19:29 it is used of the dismembered body of the Levite's concubine. Since the word is not used of the limbs of a living human body, there is no thought of the body and its members in a theological or a sociological sense. The OT is, however, interested in the function of individual parts of the body. The heart, for example, is mentioned 851x (rarely referring to the physical organ); it is associated with human thoughts and feelings, similar to the way in which we today associate the heart with our emotions (cf. Isa. 6:10; Lam. 2:11). The lower parts of the body, such as the liver and kidneys, are the emotional center of a person (Prov. 12:10; 26:22).

In combining Jewish thinking with Gk. philosophical thinking, Philo taught that the dismembered parts of the sacrificed animal have ontological significance. The apologetic intention is clear. The physiological fact derived from the OT, which saw the part in relation to the whole, conceals the philosophical principle that the parts receive their function from the whole and must work for the benefit of the whole.

In rab. lit. the number of members that make up the human body illustrates the totality and universality of the Mosaic law. The body has 248 members, which corresponds to the 248 positive commands of the Torah. (There were 365 negative commands, corresponding to the number of days in the year.) Elsewhere, rab. theologians relate their observations on the function of the individual members to assessments of their worth and mutual relations.

NT Most instances of melos in the NT occur in Rom. 6:13, 19; 7:5, 23; 12:4–5; 1 Cor. 6:15; 12:12–27. (See also Eph. 4:25; 5:30; Col. 3:5; Jas. 3:5 [sing.]; 3:6; 4:1.) It occurs only twice in the Gospels in the parallel sayings of Jesus in Matt. 5:29–30.

1. "If your right eye causes you to sin, gouge it out and throw it away. It is better for you to lose one part of your body [lit., one of your members] than for your whole body [sōma] to be thrown into hell" (Matt. 5:29; similarly in 5:30 regarding the hand). Jesus clearly did not intend the sayings to be taken literally. They apply rather to the evil functions of which the eye and hand are instruments—the lustful look and the malicious act. It is these that must cease. Evil must be rooted out if one's body (i.e., the whole person) is to be saved from judgment, and the whole body will be redeemed if just a single part is rooted out.

With the same eschatological sharpening and clarity, Jas. 3:5–6 describes the tongue as a little member that destroys like a devouring fire. Jas. 4:1 shows that passions can arise from all the members of the body, which can destroy the life of the church.

2. In describing the Christian's new life in Rom. 6, Paul writes: "Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness, but rather offer yourselves to God . . . and the parts of your body to him as instruments of righteousness" (6:13, cf. 6:19). The test of whether we have this new life is whether we practice righteousness in our relationships in the world. At the same time, this reveals the tension between what we desire to do as Christians and the sinful nature that still remains with us (7:22–23, cf. 7:5). This tension remains as long as we live on earth (7:25).

The thought of the members of the body as instruments is renewed in 1 Cor. 6:15 and Col. 3:5. The former precludes prostitution for a Christian. Insofar as a man is a believer, his members are the members of Christ. To have sexual relations with a prostitute is to become one body with her (6:16). In such a case, the members of Christ become the members of a prostitute.

3. Rom. 12 and 1 Cor. 12 teach that the church is the body (→ sōma, 5393) of Christ in both reality and function. It is made a reality by the presence of the Holy Spirit, whose gifts are enjoyed and practiced by many individuals. But taken by themselves in isolation these gifts have no significance; they find their importance only in relation to the whole fellowship: "To each one the manifestation of the Spirit is given for the common good" (1 Cor. 12:7). In this extended sense of members (i.e., individual believers as members of the body of Christ), Paul's greatest concern is with the well-being of the body, the church as a whole (cf. also Eph. 4:25; 5:30).

See also sōma, body, (5393).

3519 Μελχισέδεκ

Μελχισέδεκ (Melchisedek), Melchizedek, ancient Canaanite king of Salem (3519).

OT Melchizedek (Heb. meaning "king of righteousness" or "my king is righteous") was a Canaanite king. He emerges without warning in OT history (Gen. 14:18–20), following Abram's rout of the forces of Kedorlaomer. He is introduced as "king of Salem," presumably monarch of Jerusalem. As an expression of Near Eastern hospitality, Melchizedek supplies bread and wine for the refreshment of Abram and his victorious warriors. The Gen. narrative concludes with the remarkable observation that the Canaanite king blessed Abram and received a tenth of the spoils of battle from him, Abram thereby acknowledging the prominence of Melchizedek's priesthood.

The only other mention of Melchizedek in the OT occurs in Ps. 110:4, where the LORD (Yahweh) addresses David's Lord (ʾādôn) with the acclamation: "You are a priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek." This verse thus suggests that the priest-king of messianic expectation will be installed in a new non-Aaronic order, patterned after that of Melchizedek. In both pre-Christian and early Christian eras this psalm was interpreted by the Jews in a messianic sense; the Jews dropped a messianic interpretation A.D. 50 and 250 (probably because of Christian interpretation). Rab. Jud. saw Melchizedek as Shem, as an incarnate angel who performs priestly functions, as the archangel Michael, or as an idealized high priest of the messianic age who would emerge alongside the Messiah.

Philo clothes the OT figure of Melchizedek in the garb of Platonic philosophy and allegorizes the historical features of the text. Melchizedek is royal Mind (nous), who, unlike despotic kings, decrees pleasing laws and offers to the soul the food of joy and gladness. He is priestly Reason (logos), who with the gift of wine releases the soul from earthly contemplation and intoxicates it with heavenly virtues. Thus through his offering of bread and wine Melchizedek mediates the soul's direct access to God.

In pre-Christian Samaritan tradition Melchizedek figured prominently in the establishment of the sanctuary of the sect, apparently as its first priest. Salem is identified with Shechem, and Mount Gerizim is named after Melchizedek, priest of God Most High.

Melchizedek occupies a prominent place in the 11QMelch Qumran scroll, which quotes Ps. 82:1–2 and transfers its meaning to Melchizedek. The king is depicted in the scroll as a heavenly angel standing in God's tribunal, who preserves the faithful and executes judgment on the perverse spirits.

NT Only the author of Heb. in the NT takes interest in the enigmatic figure of Melchizedek. The idea of the Melchizedekian priesthood of Christ is introduced in 5:6, 10, but its full explication is interrupted by a paraenetic digression (5:11–6:19) necessitated by the dullness and immaturity of the readers. Heb. 7 then contains a detailed development of the novel concept of priesthood "in the order of Melchizedek" (7:1–10) and its application to the high priest of the new covenant (7:11–28).

According to Heb. 7:1–2a, Melchizedek's name ("king of righteousness") and title ("king of peace") points to the Messiah, whose person and ministry is characterized by righteousness (Isa. 32:1; Jer. 23:5–6; 33:15–16) and peace (1 Chr. 22:9; Zech. 9:10; Eph. 2:14–15). The writer then establishes Melchizedek as a fitting model of the radical nonlegal priesthood embodied by Jesus (Heb. 7:3; cf. Ps. 110:4). Since the OT lists no parentage for Melchizedek, his priesthood violates the conditions of the Aaronic order, which stipulate paternal descent from Aaron (Exod. 28:1; Num. 3:10; 18:1) and maternal descent from a pure Israelite (Lev. 21:7, 13–14; Ezek. 44:22). Melchizedek thus adumbrates the messianic high priest, who was descended from the tribe of Judah.

Melchizedek was symbolically what Christ is in reality: a ministrant who suddenly emerged from the distant reaches of eternity and who later vanishes into its depths equally as mysteriously. He exercises a priesthood of uninterrupted duration, since he neither succeeded another priest nor was himself succeeded in office.

Having sketched Melchizedek's similarity to Christ, the writer then argues Melchizedek's dissimilarity to Abraham (and hence to the Levites), thereby demonstrating Christ's superiority to the antiquated legal order (7:4–10). Melchizedek receives tithes from Abraham, which was a priestly right; hence, Levi (Abraham's grandson) is seen as giving tithes to this greater high priest. Moreover, the patriarch Abraham receives a blessing from this Gentile (Gen. 14:19–20), and Melchizedek "lives on" in Scripture, unlike the Levitical priests, who succumbed to death.

The remainder of the chapter (Heb. 7:11–28) delineates the merits of Christ as the Melchizedekian high priest. Using Ps. 110:1, the writer demonstrates that the high priest of the new covenant is vastly superior to the ministrants of the old order. Christ is high priest forever "in the order of Melchizedek." His priesthood is indissoluble (Heb. 7:16), inviolable (7:24), efficacious (7:25), and perfect (7:28).

See also Salēm, Salem, seat of Melchizedek's rule (4889).

3522 (memphomai, find fault), → 289.

3523 (mempsimoiros, fault-finding), → 289.

3524 (mempsis, reason for complaint), → 289.

3531 μένω

μένω (menō), remain (3531); ἐμμένω (emmenō), stay or remain in, persevere, abide by (1844); ἐπιμένω (epimenō), stay, remain, continue (in) (2152); παραμένω (paramenō), remain, stay on, continue in (4169); προσμένω (prosmenō), remain, stay with, remain longer (4693); περιμένω (perimenō), wait (4338); μονή (monē), staying, tarrying, dwelling place, room, abode (3665).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. menō means to remain: in one place, at a given time, or with someone. Fig., it can mean to keep an agreement, remain in a particular sphere of life, or make a stand against difficult circumstances (e.g., illness or death). Hence menō can be used of what remains valid in law, e.g., a will. In religious language, it is used for the gods, or what is inspired by them (e.g., mind, ideas), as having continuing existence. As a trans. vb. (seldom used), it means to wait for, expect someone or something. The noun monē has various meanings, such as abiding, persistence, continuance, permanence.

2. In the LXX menō occasionally means to remain in one place (e.g., Exod. 9:28; Lev. 13:23). Sometimes it means to wait (e.g., Gen. 45:9; Job 36:2). Generally it is concerned with the existence or continuing validity of something. A vow is valid (Num. 30:4, 9) or invalid (30:5, 12). The wealth of the godless does not endure (Job 15:29), while the salvation of the righteous endures (remains) forever (Ps. 112:3, 9).

It is, therefore, particularly used of God. His relationship with humanity is not severed by him but endures (Ps. 112:3, 9), as does his word (Isa. 40:8) and truth (Ps. 117:2). God waits to have mercy (Isa. 30:18). Esp. in Ps. and Isa., God's constancy is stressed as a characteristic in contrast to the changeability of false gods and the transitory nature of the world. We do not find this as a merely abstract theological statement but always in the living context of the worship and praise of God. God is the living one who endures forever (102:12; Dan. 6:26). Humans opposed to God perish under his judgment and wrath, but the new heavens, the new earth, and God's people remain (Isa. 66:22). Just as Yahweh abides, so does his name, plan, or counsel (Ps. 33:11; Isa. 14:24), his righteousness (Ps. 111:3), and his praise (111:10).

NT 1. menō occurs 118x in the NT (40x in Jn. and 27x in 1–2 Jn.). The cl. Gk. uses of the word are found in the NT. (a) Intrans., menō means to remain: e.g., to stay in a place (Lk. 19:5) or with someone (24:29; Matt. 26:38), to continue to exist for a specific time (11:23), to live (Jn. 1:38); metaphorically it means to hold fast, remain steadfast: e.g., in a teaching (2 Tim. 3:14; 2 Jn. 9), in fellowship with someone (Jn. 14:10), or in an unmarried state (1 Cor. 7:40); to stand firm, pass the test: e.g., when one's works are judged (3:14); to live on and not to have died (15:6). (b) Trans., menō means to wait for (Acts 20:5, 23).

2. Like the OT, the NT speaks of the unchanging character of God, who maintains his word (1 Pet. 1:23; cf. Dan. 6:26; 1 Pet. 1:25, quoting Isa. 40:8); he continues and carries through his plan of election in human history (Rom. 9:11). God's constancy has been made visible in the sending and life of Jesus, the Messiah, who continues forever (Heb. 7:24). Those who have been born anew receive from the Holy Spirit not only ecstatic experiences from time to time, but the power of God abides continually in them (1 Jn. 2:27). Those who confess that Jesus is God's Son in God, i.e., are bound to him by God's love (4:14–15). They do not seek for an enduring city here (Heb. 13:14), but have lasting possessions in heaven (10:34).

Paul points out that in contrast to the service by Moses, which was transitory, the new service of the Spirit and of righteousness is permanent (2 Cor. 3:7–11); along with them faith, hope, and love (1 Cor. 13:13) remain—but above all, love (cf. 13:8).

3. Since Christ will bring about the final and lasting state, human effort for change and self-fulfillment in this transitory life loses its attraction. With this new focus, Christians should give up personal social advancement as their goal in life and the expectation that marriage will fulfill every hope. It is best to remain quietly as they are. That is why Paul advises the Christians in Corinth, "Were you a slave when you were called? Don't let it trouble you" (1 Cor. 7:21). The unmarried and widows should remain unmarried unless they cannot exercise self-control (7:8–9). All their energies should be concentrated on the dawning kingdom of God, and all their efforts should be given to remaining in love and true faith (1 Tim. 2:15; 2 Tim. 3:14).

4. Jn.'s use of menō en ("remain in") is parallel to Paul's conception of Christ's dwelling in the believer (Rom. 8:9–11) and the believer's dwelling in Christ. In fact, it is expanded and strengthened. (a) menō expresses the closest possible relationship between Father and Son: "The Father, living in me, . . . is doing his work" (Jn. 14:10). The work of Jesus is therefore the work of God. Unlike a prophet, Christ has not been called for a particular task and a limited period; his whole person remains in a lasting and unique nearness to the Father (1:32), just as a son, in contrast to the slave, continues forever in his father's house (8:35). Christ acted in continual oneness with his Father.

(b) Jn. describes the closest possible relationship between Christ and the believer; Jesus calls us to remain in fellowship with him and guarantees that we also will remain in him (Jn. 15:4–5). This abiding of Jesus in believers is proclaimed in the promise that the Holy Spirit will remain in them (14:17; 1 Jn. 2:27).

The statement that Christ remains in the believer contains an indubitably mystical element; it creates an inner unity. One of Paul's ways of expressing this relationship is to use the picture of the body, but that is not found in Jn. This does not mean that God is absorbed into humanity; rather, Christ's abiding in his own is inseparably linked with the abiding of his word in them (Jn. 15:7; 1 Jn. 2:24; cf. Jn. 8:31) and with the acceptance of the reconciling power that flows from the death of Jesus. This is expressed above all in the words: "Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him" (6:56). This concept expresses the real meaning of the Lord's Supper for Jn.

(c) Such a remaining in Christ makes us Christ's property right down to the depths of our being. It is not confined to a spiritual relationship, but denotes the present experience of salvation and hence life (Jn. 6:57). Therefore "whoever claims to live in him must walk as Jesus did" (1 Jn. 2:6). The indwelling Christ, or life through the word of Christ, forms a life in conformity to his spirit and nature and brings about sanctification: "The man who does the will of God lives [lit. remains] forever" (2:17).

Remaining in Christ is the same as bearing fruit (Jn. 15:5). If there is no fruit, it is a sign that the fellowship has already been interrupted (15:6; 1 Jn. 3:6). Wherever this is true, the wrath of God rests on such people (Jn. 3:36). Our relationship with God is ultimately determined by how we relate to the word of Jesus. To remain in Jesus also means that we will remain in love (cf. 15:9–17). Abiding in love becomes a reality in action (15:10), in the bearing of continuing fruit (15:16), which becomes visible in unbounded love of our fellow believers (1 Jn. 2:10; 3:14–15).

5. (a) emmenō occurs only 4x in the NT. After their initial missionary work, Paul and Barnabas returned to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, "strengthening the disciples and encouraging them to remain [emmenō] true to the faith" (Acts 14:22). Acts ends with Paul staying in Rome two whole years at his own expense, welcoming all who came to him and preaching the kingdom of God (28:30–31). emmenō has the sense of "continue to do" in Gal. 3:10, where Paul cites Deut. 27:26 to show the impossibility of keeping the law as a way of salvation. In Heb. 8:9 (citing Jer. 31:32) it has the sense of "remain faithful to" God's covenant. In its place, Yahweh promises a new covenant written on the heart (Heb. 8:10)—a covenant now established by Christ (8:6–13; 10:14–18).

(b) epimenō, stay, remain, is used in a lit. sense in Acts 10:48; 21:4, 10; 28:12, 14; 1 Cor. 16:7–8; Gal. 1:18. The reason for staying in a particular location is usually connected with Christian service. In Phil. 1:24 Paul, reflecting on his possible imminent execution, writes: "But it is more necessary for you that I remain [epimenenō] in the body." Hence, he is convinced that his life will be spared for the sake of continued service. Yet should he die, it would be gain (1:21) for that would bring release from earthly troubles and usher him into the immediate presence of Christ.

epimenō also has the fig. sense of continue, persist in, persevere. Thus, Peter continues knocking on the door after his escape from prison (Acts 12:16). In the story of the woman taken in adultery, the Jews keep on asking Jesus what to do until he says: "If any one of you is without sin, let him be the first to throw a stone at her" (Jn. 8:7; cf. Lev. 20:10; Deut. 13:10; 17:7; 22:20–22).

The fig. use of this vb. is used in the sense of continuing in sin in Rom. 6:1, which Paul rejects on the grounds that to desire to do so is utterly incompatible with dying and rising with Christ as represented by baptism. The freedom we have through justification by faith is not a freedom to sin but to live out the life of Christ. Later on in Rom. Paul discusses the status of the Jews as God's people with regard to his saving purposes, using the image of pruning and grafting into the olive tree. He encourages present believers to "continue in [God's] kindness" and assures them that if unbelieving Jews "do not persist in unbelief," they will be grafted back into the tree (Rom. 11:22–23). For the present, however, they are no longer the people of God, for the church is God's new people. Note too that the continuance of the Gentiles is also conditional on their continuing in God's kindness (cf. epimenō in Col. 1:23; see also the warnings in Heb. 3:15–4:13; 6:1–8).

In all these passages where epimenō is used in connection with salvation, there is a paradox: reconciliation and redemption are free gifts of God, but they must be appropriated and lived out. Continuance and perseverance are essential features of the life of faith.

In 1 Tim. 4:16 Paul exhorts Timothy to "persevere" in life and doctrine in order to save both himself and his hearers. Here again there is stress on perseverance, but it is now expressly linked with teaching (didaskalia; → didaskō, 1438). Not only must believers persevere in personal faith, but also, in view of the false teaching and the dangers of the times, they must be guided by a defined body of truth.

(c) paramenō, remain, stay on, continue in, occurs 4x in the NT. Paul, faced with the prospect of execution, tells the Philippians that he would prefer to be with Christ but that it is more necessary to remain in the flesh on their account. "Convinced of this, I know that I will remain [menō], and I will continue [paramenō] with all of you for your progress and joy in the faith" (Phil. 1:25). Heb. 7 argues for the superiority of Christ's priesthood after the order of Melchizedek. In his discussion, the author contrasts Christ's permanent and continuing ministry with the temporary nature of the Levitical priesthood; death prevented them "from continuing in office" (7:23).

In the course of his argument that true believers should show their faith by good deeds, James argues that those who look into the perfect law, the law of freedom, "and continue to do this," will be blessed in what they do (Jas. 1:25). The vb. also occurs in 1 Cor. 16:6 in the sense of Paul's plans to physically stay in Corinth for some time.

(d) perimenō, expect, await, occurs only once in the NT, where it signifies waiting for the gift promised by the Father, i.e., the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:4). The disciples are to stay in Jerusalem until they receive it.

(e) prosmenō, remain, stay with, stay longer, occurs 7x in the NT. It is used of the crowds who have been with Jesus for three days (Matt. 15:32; Mk. 8:2; cf. also Acts 18:18; 1 Tim. 1:3). Barnabas exhorts the believers at Antioch "to remain true to the Lord" (Acts 11:23), while Paul and Barnabas urge their followers in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch "to continue in the grace of God" (13:43). In 1 Tim. 5:5 Paul gives part of his description of the true widow: one who "continues night and day to pray."

(f) monē occurs 2x in the NT. In Jn. 14:2 Jesus refers to the many "rooms" that are being prepared for believers in his Father's house. In Jewish belief there were various compartments or dwelling places in heaven (e.g., 1 Enoch 39:4–8). Our earthly state is transitory and provisional compared with the blessedness of being eternally with God. By contrast, monē in 14:23 refers to Jesus and the Father's coming to make their "home" with those who love him and obey his teachings (cf. the uses of menō in Jn., above).

See also adialeiptos, unceasing, constant (89).

3532 μερίζω

μερίζω (merizō), divide (3532); διαμερίζω (diamerizō), divide, separate (1374); διαμερισμός (diamerismos), division (1375); μερισμός (merismos), dividing, distribution (3536).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. merizō means to divide something into parts or to distribute, while merismos denotes a partitioning or distributing. diamerizō also means to divide, but it has a fig. meaning of causing dissension (i.e., division in people's thinking).

2. merizō is used most frequently in the LXX for the dividing of spoils after battle (Exod. 15:9; 1 Sam. 30:24; Isa. 53:12) and the dividing of the land of Canaan by lot to the various tribes (Num. 26:54, 55–56; Jos. 13:7). But it could also be used for the dividing of people into factions (1 Ki. 16:21). merismos is used for tribal divisions (Jos. 11:23; Ezr. 6:18). diamerizō is basically a synonym (e.g., Gen. 10:25; Jdg. 5:30; Ps. 60:6; Zech. 14:1).

NT 1. The words in this group can have a lit. meaning. Jesus divided (merizō) the fish among the people in the feeding of the 5,000 (Mk. 6:41); he also divided (diamerizō) the cup among his disciples at the Last Supper (Lk. 22:17). A young man once came to Jesus and asked him to make his brother divide (merizō) the inheritance with him (12:13). The soldiers at the cross divided up (diamerizō) Jesus' clothes (Matt. 27:35; Jn. 19:24). The early Christians shared (diamerizō) their possessions with those who were needy (Acts 2:45).

2. But the words in this group also take on a fig. meaning. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus refers to the dividing of a kingdom against itself (Matt. 12:25–26; Mk. 3:24–26 use merizō; Lk. 11:17–18 uses diamerizō). Jesus also predicts a time of division within families because of the attitude of its members to him (12:51–53 uses both diamerizō and diamerismos). Paul employs merizō when he asks the question in the context of the factions in Corinth: "Is Christ divided?" (1 Cor. 1:13). Later in this letter he uses the same word for a husband's internal conflict between tending to the needs of his family and to the interests of Christ (7:34).

3. The NT also uses these words for God's actions. He has divided (merismos) his gifts among his people (Heb. 2:4; cf. also merizō in Rom. 12:3). He has also "assigned" each of us a place in life (1 Cor. 7:17; 2 Cor. 10:13). In a different vein, God's powerful word works "even to dividing [merismos] soul and spirit" (Heb. 4:12). While some use this last verse to differentiate the human soul from the human spirit, it is not at all certain that the writer of Heb. is trying to establish this point; the emphasis is rather on how the word of God penetrates our lives.

3533 μέριμνα

μέριμνα (merimna), care (3533); μεριμνάω (merimnaō), care, be anxious (3534); προμεριμνάω (promerimnaō), be anxious beforehand (4628); μέλει (melei), be concerned, be worried about (3508); ἀμέριμνος (amerimnos), free from concern (291).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. the noun merimna and the vb. merimnaō have the same range of meaning as the Eng. term concern. Thus merimna can denote either an anxious fear or a providing care, and merimnaō can mean either being anxious or worried or taking responsibility for someone or something. As seems obvious, these words are usually oriented to the future. melei, it concerns (someone) about, is the 3d pers. sing. of melō, be concerned about. It is usually used impers.

In the LXX these words appear infrequently and have the same range as in cl. Gk. The noun merimna (12x) means anxious care (e.g., Job 11:18; Dan. 11:26; 1 Macc. 6:10); the vb. merimnaō (9x) means be anxious (2 Sam. 7:10; 1 Chr. 17:9) or be troubled. The same word is used in a weaker sense in Exod. 5:9, be concerned for. Wisdom lit. uses the vb. and the noun in the positive sense of caring, providing (e.g., Prov. 14:23; 17:12), although merimna can mean anxious care (e.g., Sir. 30:24; 42:9).

NT In the NT merimna, care, occurs 4x in the Synoptics, once in Paul, and once in 1 Pet.; merimnaō, be anxious, care for, occurs in Matt. (7x), Lk. (5x), and Paul (7x). Like the OT, the NT understands care chiefly as a natural human reaction to poverty, hunger, and other troubles that befall us in daily life. Oppressed by burdens, we imagine ourselves delivered to a fate before which we stand powerless. We try to protect ourselves as best we can from what confronts us.

1. The most comprehensive summary of the NT's witness on worry is found in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:25–34) or the Sermon on the Plain (Lk. 12:22–31). It is directed against the error that denies God's care and love by supposing that we can secure our own future by temporarily securing what we need for our daily lives. Worry is foolish because life is more than food (Matt. 6:25) and anxiety cannot make life secure (6:27). If hēlikia in 6:27 is translated as stature and not length of life (→ 2461), then the folly of worry is emphasized by this reductio ad absurdum. For if something as unimportant as bodily size cannot be guaranteed by human worry, how much less life itself.

We can take the saying of Matt. 6:34 in the same ironic sense. The disciple who adds tomorrow's concerns to today's is acting absurdly and is put to shame by secular wisdom, which has long recognized the fact. Besides being foolish, worry is also God-less because it impugns his care for humans. If God feeds the birds of the air and decks the transitory flowers of the field with beauty, he will do "much more" for creatures made in his image (6:26, 30). He is the Father who knows what his children need (6:32). Those who forget that and, in the weakness of faith, give way to worry are acting like Gentiles (6:32; → mamōnas, 3440).

By contrast, the knowledge that the kingdom of God is dawning liberates us from anxiety and worry. Those who welcome this kingdom and the righteousness proclaimed in it with zeal and trust find that everything needful for life is provided by God (6:33). In his kingdom all our needs are put in their rightful place, because the Father's love supplies things great and small, daily needs and special ones. It is therefore superfluous to make anxious provision to secure one's life. Because God is concerned (melei) about us and cares for us, we can unload our cares onto him (1 Pet. 5:7).

2. Luke's picture of Mary and Martha (Lk. 10:38–42) exhibits the same contrast of attitudes as the Sermon on the Mount. The "many things" over which people worry in order to secure the necessities of life stand in contrast with the "one thing" that is necessary: the question concerning life's purpose, which Mary sees answered in Jesus' teaching. Worry is contrasted with zeal for God's kingdom. Similarly the parable of the sower sees the word imperiled by cares (Mk. 4:19 par.). Lk. 21:34 warns against being weighed down by "the anxieties (merimnai) of life," i.e., worries about our daily needs. Finally, Jesus assures us that we do not need to "worry beforehand about" (promerimnaō) what to say if we are brought to trial for our faith, since the Holy Spirit will give us the necessary words (Mk. 13:11).

3. merimna and merimnaō can also have a positive sense, such as showing concern for others whom God entrusts to us. Thus Paul views himself as one who must care for all the churches (2 Cor. 11:28). God has fashioned the church like a body so that "its parts should have equal concern for each other" (1 Cor. 12:25). Paul commends Timothy to the church in Philippi as someone who will care for their interests like no one else (Phil. 2:20). Such concern is a part of seeking the interests of Jesus Christ (2:21).

In 1 Cor. 7:32 Paul manifests his awareness of the dangers in caring about other people. Because he wants believers to be without worries (amerimnous), he recommends the unmarried not to marry in view of the eschatological situation (7:29, 31), and the married to live to the Lord (7:29).

In the exhortation of Phil. 4:6 ("Do not be anxious about anything"), merimnaō once again has the meaning anxious care. The reason for this freedom from care lies in the Lord's proximity (4:5) and in the church's privilege of being able to present all their requests in prayer to God with thanksgiving.

3534 (merimnaō, care, be anxious), → 3533.

3535 (meris, part, portion), → 3538.

3536 (merismos, dividing, distribution), → 3532.

3538 μέρος

μέρος (meros), part, share, portion, lot (3538); μερίς (meris), part, portion (3535).

CL & OT 1. meros means a part, e.g., of the body, a landscape, a territory, and esp., in the pl., a locality. Metaphorically it means a share, a concern, a social class, a business. It often stands in adverbial phrases with prepositions (see NT uses).

2. In the LXX meros most frequently expresses locality: e.g., border (Exod. 16:35; Jos. 18:19–20), area of land (2:18; 1 Sam. 30:14), end, edge (Jos. 13:27; 15:2). When things are being described, meros means side (e.g., Exod. 26:26–27; 32:15), while in Prov. 17:2 it is a share in an inheritance, and in 2 Macc. 15:20 a place.

NT In the NT meros means a part of the body, an estate, or one's dress (Lk. 11:36; 15:12; Jn. 19:23), the side of a boat (21:6), a party (e.g., of Pharisees or Sadducees, Acts 23:6, 9). Often it denotes a district or place (Matt. 2:22; 15:21; 16:13). The meaning of "the lower, earthly regions [merē]" (Eph. 4:9) is uncertain. It means either Jesus' descent among the dead in his death or simply his coming down to the earth in his incarnation.

In Acts 19:27 meros means occupation or trade and in 2 Cor. 3:10; 9:3 case or matter. In the story of Jesus' washing his disciples' feet, the Lord says to Peter: "Unless I wash you, you have no part with me" (Jn. 13:8). This sharing is enjoyed by Christians, who are each a living "part" of the body, the church (1 Cor. 12:27; Eph. 4:16). One can also have one's "place" with the hypocrites and godless (Matt. 24:51; Lk. 12:46). It depends on the group to which one belongs whether one has a share in the first resurrection and the tree of life (Rev. 20:6; 22:19) or in the fiery lake, the second death (21:8).

meros is used adverbially with various prepositions. apo merous (Rom. 11:25) denotes that a "hardening in part" that has come on Israel. apo merous means "on some points" (15:15), "in part" (2 Cor. 1:14), and "to some extent" (2 Cor. 2:5), while ana meros means "one at a time" (1 Cor. 14:27). ek merous means "in part" or "imperfect" in 13:9–10, 12, where Paul stresses the incomplete, fragmentary, and transitory character of knowledge in contrast with love. When the perfect comes, the imperfect will pass away. en merei means "with regard to" (Col. 2:16), and kata meros (Heb. 9:5) "in detail."

meris means part, in the sense of a "district" in Acts 16:12, and share or portion in Lk. 10:42; Acts 8:21 (cf. Deut. 12:12); 2 Cor. 6:15 ("What does a believer have in common [meris] with an unbeliever?"); Col. 1:12.

See also klēros, inheritance, lot (3102).

3541 (mesiteuō, mediate, confirm, act as surety), → 3542.

3542 μεσίτης

μεσίτης (mesitēs), mediator, intermediary, guarantor (3542); μεσιτεύω (mesiteuō), mediate, confirm, act as surety (3541).

CL & OT 1. mesitēs, mediator, denotes a person who stands between two parties. Already in cl. Gk. mesos became a legal term meaning a neutral place between two parties in conflict, occupied by the arbitrator who sought to judge and settle. The mesitēs could be the conciliator or arbitrator in cases that had not yet come before a court of law, so as to prevent this happening. He was also the witness to legal business that had been settled, with the responsibility of guaranteeing that the decision would be carried out.

2. (a) There is no single term for a mediator in OT. The comprehensive Gk. term mesitēs is found in the LXX only in Job 9:33, but here it is not a question of arbitrating between the two parties, but of listening to accusation and defense and restoring the infringed law by dealing with the guilty party—unless, of course, the accusation was rejected. Thus the relationship between the parties was restored. Israel had no civil code that functioned by upholding a golden mean between conflicting interests. There was only divine law, which bound together the members of God's people as fellow citizens. It was ultimately God who chastened and judged (cf. Ps. 5:2). Hence there could hardly be any real difference between an arbitrator and an official judge in Israel.

(b) Where the concept of mediator appears in the OT, it means something different from that in the Gk. world. The priest and prophet were mediators between God and his people, but never in the role of a neutral third party. Still, two mediators stand out in Israel's history. Moses mediated salvation at the Red Sea (Exod. 14:15–18); he was the mediator of the covenant at Sinai (24:4–8) and, as such, of the law and of revelation (33:7–11). In Isa., the awaited Servant of Yahweh is the bearer of God's revelation (42:1–4) and salvation to the nations (49:1–6). He takes the guilt of humanity on himself and blots it out by his suffering (52:13–53:12).

3. In post-biblical Heb. and Aram. sarsōr means middle man, negotiator, interpreter. It acquires a theological meaning when applied to Moses, who was the mediator par excellence of the Torah. Philo uses mesiteuō to express the activity of the invisible God and of the Logos (Word), who is also called mesitēs.

NT mesitēs occurs only 6x in the NT. As applied to Christ, mesitēs is qualified by the gen. diathēkēs, of a covenant (of a better covenant, Heb. 8:6; of a new covenant, 9:15; 12:24), or by the gen. theou kai anthrōpou, "between God and men" (1 Tim. 2:5). The word also refers to another figure who once mediated the law (Gal. 3:19–20).

1. According to Gal. 3:19–20, the law was not given directly by God, but revealed to Moses by angels. The age of the law, and so of Moses and the angelic powers he represented, was brought to an end by Christ, who had been referred to in God's promise to Abraham 430 years earlier. Unlike Moses he is not a mesitēs, but its fulfillment. Hence the age of the mediator has passed and that of the Son has come (Gal. 4:4; cf. Jn. 1:17).

2. In Heb. mesitēs has a different meaning, that of guarantor. The author is concerned with the surety for our attaining to the heavenly land of rest. We have this right because of what God has done through Christ in his death. As mesitēs, Christ has procured and guarantees that right. On the one hand, this right is "founded on better promises" (8:6); on the other hand, it is the presupposition of the fulfillment of the promise (9:15) that was "confirmed" (mesiteuō) by God "with an oath" (6:17).

mesitēs thus denotes the one who guarantees us salvation, both as its creator and giver. As the ever-present high priest who has been exalted by his obedience, sufferings, death on the cross, and sacrifice accepted by God, Jesus has by his own blood transformed the right of vengeance into the right of forgiveness (cf. mesitēs in 12:24). Thus mesitēs in Heb. is similar to a term Paul uses regarding the Holy Spirit, arrabōn (→ 775).

3. One passage in the NT explicitly calls Jesus Christ a mesitēs "between God and men" (1 Tim. 2:5). This concept links directly with the fact that our whole salvation is found in the one man Jesus (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14; Gal. 3:12–19). God has provided no other mediator besides Jesus Christ.

4. While there is only one passage in the NT where Jesus Christ is called mediator in the full sense of the word, other passages contain the same concept. Note, for example, Jn. 14:6, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (cf. also Matt. 11:25–30). Furthermore, the figure of the high priest in the OT, who stood between the people and the Lord in a mediating role, is fulfilled in Jesus Christ as our eternal high priest who "always lives [in the presence of the Father] to intercede for [his people]" (Heb. 7:25).

See also diathēkē, covenant (1347); engyos, guarantor (1583).

3546 μεσότοιχον

μεσότοιχον (mesotoichon), dividing wall (3546).

CL & OT mesotoichon is a combination of mesos (middle) and toichos (wall). It is found only a few times outside the NT, where it refers to a partition wall or barrier. Josephus uses the separate words (meson toichon) to refer to the partition between the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place in the temple.

NT mesotoichon occurs in the NT only in Eph. 2:14, where it may allude to the balustrade in the temple courtyard that separated the court of the Gentiles from the more sacred precincts, though no document is known where this word refers to that wall. That barrier carried warnings in Gk. and Lat., telling Gentiles that they could be killed if they crossed over. Although Ephesus was a Gentile city far from Jerusalem, Paul's allusion to the mesotoichon would have been clear to the Christians there. For Paul himself had narrowly escaped death two or three years before when it was rumored that he had violated that sacred space by taking the Gentile Trophimus, an Ephesian, into one of the inner courts (Acts 21:28–29). To Paul, this wall symbolized the enmity between Jews and Gentiles. It has been removed by the sacrifice of Jesus, so that through him we all now have access to the Father.

Another suggestion for the mesotoichon is the invisible wall of separation between God and humanity. The fall brought humans into enmity with God (Eph. 2:16); the cross of Christ reconciles us with the Father by removing the stain of our sin.

See also phragmos, fence, wall, hedge (5850).

3549 (Messias, Messiah), → 5986.

3552 (meta, with), → 5250.

3553 (metabainō, pass over), → 326.

3561 (metalambanō, receive a share), → 3284.

3562 (metalēmpsis, sharing, receiving), → 3284.

3563 (metallassō, to exchange), → 2904.

3564 μεταμέλομαι

μεταμέλομαι (metamelomai), change one's mind, regret, repent (3564); ἀμεταμέλητος (ametamelētos), not to be regretted, hence irrevocable (294).

CL & OT metamelomai is linked with the impers. melei, it concerns (someone). In cl. Gk. this vb. expressed a changed feeling towards a thing, but it cannot always be clearly distinguished from metanoeō, which implies that one thinks differently about a matter.

The LXX did not distinguish between metanoeō or metamelomai. The latter word occurs in Exod. 13:17 for purely human regret, while in Ezek. 14:22 it involves humble agreement with God's righteous judgment, for good or ill. When God is said in the OT to repent, there are two possibilities: God can reject humans because they have turned against him in disobedience (1 Sam. 15:11, 35); however, God can also turn again to them in grace and mercy (1 Chr. 21:15; Ps. 106:45; cf. Jon. 3:9–10). When the OT clearly stresses that God does not repent (Ps. 110:4; cf. Jer. 4:28), it is the guarantee that God will not deviate from the plan that he conceived at the first.

NT metamelomai occurs 6x in the NT. In Jesus' parable in Matt. 21:28–32 the father asks both of his sons to work in his vineyard. One refuses, but then regrets his answer and goes; the other agrees to go, but does not. Here the word can be translated "change one's decision." Jesus directed the parable at the high priests and elders of Israel. The first son changed his attitude to his father, just as the tax collectors and harlots had believed John the Baptist's message and had repented. The religious leaders, however, had continued in their unbelief and disobedience (oude metemelēthēte).

The example of Judas makes it clear that metamelomai and metanoeō are not simply interchangeable in the NT. When Judas recognized that Jesus had been wrongly condemned, he regretted (metamelomai) his betrayal (Matt. 27:3). However, he did not find the way to genuine repentance (metanoia). We find the same differentiation in 2 Cor. 7:8–10. Paul did not regret that he had written a sharp letter to the Corinthians, for the sorrow it caused had led its recipients to true repentance (metanoia), to an inner turning to God. Paul argues that there is no need to regret such a repentance, for it serves our salvation.

The oath that God will never regret serves both to guarantee the superiority of Jesus' high priesthood over that of the OT and to express the unchangeable faithfulness of God (Heb. 7:21, quoting Ps. 110:4).

The adj. ametamelētos occurs 2x; it refers to something of which God (Rom. 11:29) or a human (2 Cor. 7:10) will not repent, and hence means irrevocable.

See also epistrephō, turn, turn around, turn back, be converted (2188); metanoia, change of mind, conversion (3567); prosēlytos, proselyte (4670).

3565 μεταμορφόω

μεταμορφόω (metamorphoō), change into another form or image, transform (3565).

CL & OT 1. The idea of transformation from one appearance or form into another is presented in two Lat. works called Metamorphoses. Ovid's work is a series of tales involving supernatural beings as well as humans, who experience different kinds of transformations. Apuleius describes, in autobiographic style, being transformed into an ass and finally being restored by the power of the goddess Isis. This experience illustrates the concept of religious change and release, which was idealized in Hel. religion.

2. metamorphoō does not occur in the LXX. But the skin of Moses' face shone after his conversation with God on Mount Sinai (cf. Exod. 34:29–35, esp. as background to 2 Cor. 3:12–18). The vision of Dan. 10:5–6 does not involve a transformation, but it does provide an apocalyptic imagery useful in the study of the description of Jesus' transfiguration. Dan. 12:3 describes the shining of the "wise" in the future resurrection.

NT metamorphoō occurs 4x in the NT (Matt. 17:2; Mk. 9:2; Rom. 12:2; 2 Cor. 3:18) and is presumably avoided once. This omission is in Lk.'s account of the transfiguration of Jesus, for presumably he did not want to use a word that could invite comparison with the pagan ideas of transformation.

1. (a) In Matt. 17:2 and Mk. 9:2 metamorphoō describes the transformation of Christ's features and clothing during his transfiguration. Matt. 17:2 uses the image of the shining sun to express the transfigured radiance of Jesus' face. A comparison may be drawn with the radiance of Moses' face in Exod. 34, although it must be remembered that the LXX terminology is different. In Jesus' transfiguration, moreover, his clothing also was rendered brilliant: "white as the light" (Matt. 17:2), more dazzling than bleached cloth (Mk. 9:3), and "bright as a flash of lightning" (Lk. 9:29).

(b) This experience is called a horama (vision, Matt. 17:9; → horaō, 3972), a word that denotes a thing of supernatural quality that becomes observable (cf. Acts 7:31; 9:10, 12; 10:3, 17, 19). Note how 2 Pet. 1:16–18 uses Jesus' transfiguration as evidence of the reliability of the Christian gospel. This event is thus ascribed a reality beyond that sometimes implied in our word vision.

(c) The meaning of the transfiguration is to be found in the biblical context. The imagery is that of Dan. 7:13–14 (note the elements in the narrative that suggest a glorified Son of Man motif, e.g., the cloud). This point of reference does not exhaust the meaning, however. For not only are there messianic motifs, but the imagery of the exodus is also prominent. In that OT event, God also made his presence known in a cloud. The six-day interval of Matt. 17:1 and Mk. 9:2 may recall the period of waiting when Moses ascended a mountain to receive God's commandments (Exod. 24:9–16). Moreover, a cloud was present at that time as well, both as a covering and as a vehicle for the manifestation of God's glory. The very fact that Moses appears with Jesus on the mount of transfiguration suggests that the exodus motif is prominent. Furthermore, Luke records that Moses and Elijah were discussing with Jesus the "departure" (Gk. exodos) that Jesus was about to accomplish at Jerusalem (9:31).

It is thus important to see this event from both a typological (exodus) and eschatological (Parousia) perspective. The latter is reinforced by the presence of that great Jewish figure of eschatological significance, Elijah (cf. Mal. 4:5). The essential meaning is, however, not centered in either a past or future event, but in the person of the one transfigured. This is made clear by the voice from heaven, which uses terminology from four Christologically important OT texts: Ps. 2:7, about the royal son; Gen. 22:2, about the beloved only son; Isa. 42:1, about the chosen servant; and Deut. 18:15 ("listen to him") about the prophet Moses. The transfiguration is to be understood, therefore, as an affirmation by God of the messiahship and unique sonship of Jesus, who will fulfill his mission as the suffering servant according to Mk. 8:27–9:1.

2. The other two occurrences of metamorphoō are related to the Christian experience. In Rom. 12:2 believers are to be characterized by a continuing process of transformation, which is accomplished by an inner renewal of the mind and by resisting the influence of the world (or age, aiōn, → 172). A more detailed explanation of the Christian's transformation is given in 2 Cor. 3:18, where the experience of Moses in Exod. 34:29–35 serves as an imperfect model. The glory brought by the gospel is not temporary, like the radiance of Moses' face, but enduring. Believers have an open relationship with the Lord of glory, which has a transforming effect.

See also metaschēmatizō, change the form of a person or thing (3571).

3566 (metanoeō, change one's mind, repent, be converted), → 3567.

3567 μετάνοια

μετάνοια (metanoia), change of mind, repentance, conversion (3567); μετανοέω (metanoeō), change one's mind, repent, be converted (3566); ἀμετανόητος (ametanoētos), impenitent (295).

CL & OT 1. Lit., metanoia means a change of mind about something. The word group is rare in cl. Gk.; the vb. and noun are more frequent in Koine Gk. However, Gk. society never thought of a radical change in a person's life as a whole.

2. The LXX uses metanoia only 5x, most notably in Wis. 11:23; 12:10, 19 with reference to God, who shows mercy and patience so that people will repent. The vb. metanoeō is used either of God (cf. 1 Sam. 15:29; Jer. 18:8; Joel 2:13–14; Amos 7:3, 6) or of humans (Jer. 8:6; 31:19 = LXX 38:19) as a trans. of the Heb. niḥam. The thought of turning round, preached by the prophets with the Heb. vb. šûb, is rendered by epistrephō in Gk. (Amos 4:6; Hos. 5:4; 6:1; → 2188). The prophetic call to turn presupposes that the relationship of the people and the individual to God must be understood in personal terms. Sin and apostasy disturb and break this relationship. Turning means turning away from evil and returning to God.

3. The Qumran community continued the prophetic call to repentance by demanding that its members be converted from all evil and return to every commandment of the Mosaic law. Its members therefore called themselves the converts of Israel.

NT 1. The NT uses metanoeō to express the force of the Heb. šûb, turn round. The choice of metanoeō rather than epistrephō shows that the NT does not stress the concrete, outward turning implied in the OT use of šûb, but rather the thought, the will, the nous. The ideas of repentance and conversion come to the fore, stressing a decision by the whole person to turn around. Along similar lines, ametanoētos (Rom. 2:5) means impenitent.

2. The closest link with the prophetic call to repentance is found in John the Baptist, who called the people to repent and to "produce fruit in keeping with repentance" (Matt. 3:2, 8 par.). Corresponding to the OT pattern, this call was addressed to the entire people (cf. Acts 13:24; 19:4), including the pious, who believed that they did not need to repent (Matt. 3:7–12). But John based the urgency of his message on a different foundation from that of the prophets. In the OT motivation for repentance and returning to the true road of God's righteousness was linked with Israel's social unrighteousness and idolatry. For John it was that "the kingdom of heaven is near" (3:2). Hence, there can be only one way for people to escape judgment. They must repent, so that entire lives are changed and brought into a new relationship with God (3:10).

John linked his call to repentance with baptism as sign of the forgiveness of sins (Mk. 1:4 par.), having repentance as its goal (Matt. 3:11; cf. Acts 13:24; 19:4). Repentance was regarded both as an act open to humans and as a duty on them.

3. According to the Synoptics, Jesus' preaching resembled that of the Baptist. Indeed, Matt. 3:2 and 4:17 record the identical call, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is near." The clear difference between them is that Jesus did not, as did John, look for one to follow him (cf. 3:11). He saw in his own coming the beginning of God's decisive work (11:6; Lk. 11:20; 17:21), which explains the woes addressed to the towns that were not ready to repent (Matt. 11:20–24 par.). That is why the inhabitants of Nineveh will find it better in the day of judgment than will Jesus' contemporaries. The former repented at the preaching of Jonah, and "now one greater than Jonah is here" (12:41 par.). Repentance is now no longer obedience to a law but to a person. The call to repentance becomes a call to discipleship.

There are many passages in which the word metanoeō does not appear, but in which the thought of repentance is clearly present (e.g., see Matt. 5:3; 18:3, 10, 14; Lk.

14:33). Jesus did not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance (Lk. 5:32). Conversion and repentance are accompanied by joy, for they mean the opening up of life for the one who has turned. The parables in Lk. 15 not only bear testimony to the joy of God over sinners who repent but also call on us to share this joy. To the repentant God promises life. Note the comment of the father in the parable of the prodigal son: "This son of mine was dead and is alive again" (Lk. 15:24; cf. 15:32).

4. Primitive Christian preaching continued the call for repentance (cf. Mk. 6:12 and the sermons in Acts). This missionary preaching linked with the call for repentance the elements already mentioned: faith (Acts 20:21; cf. 19:4; 26:18), the demand to be baptized (2:38), the promise of forgiveness of sins (Lk. 24:47; Acts 3:19; 5:31), and the gift of life and of salvation (11:18; 2 Cor. 7:9–10). Conversion is turning from evil (Acts 8:22; 2 Cor. 12:21; Rev. 2:21–22) to God (Acts 20:21; 26:20; Rev. 16:9). In Acts 3:19 and 26:20 metanoeō and epistrephō are placed side by side; metanoeō describes the turning from evil and epistrephō the turning to God.

5. The fact that this group of words occurs seldom in Paul's letters (only 6x) and not at all in Jn.'s Gospel or letters does not mean that the idea of conversion is not present there, but only that a more specialized terminology developed. Paul speaks of a person, through faith, as being in Christ, as dying and rising with Christ, as a new creation, or as putting on the new self. John represents new life in Christ as new birth, as a passing from death to life or from darkness to light, or as the victory of truth over falsehood and of love over hate.

6. The early church faced the issue of whether a person could turn repeatedly to God. A most difficult passage in Heb. (6:4–8) seems to reject the possibility of a second repentance. On the one hand, in keeping with the view of the rest of the NT, the possibility was rejected to stress the absoluteness of conversion over against a form of Christian faith that was lapsing into apathy or apostasy. On the other hand, it showed that conversion was not just a human act but that God must give a chance to repent (12:17). A person who deliberately sins after conversion incurs God's judgment (6:8; 10:26–27).

Such a heavy emphasis on the finality of conversion does not exclude God's all-embracing desire to save. He does not want "anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (2 Pet. 3:9). Rather, it stresses the absoluteness of God's mercy. God saves completely and finally, and thus conversion to God must be complete and final.

See also epistrephō, turn, turn around, turn back, be converted (2188); metamelomai, change one's mind, regret, repent (3564); prosēlytos, proselyte (4670).

3571 μετασχηματίζω

μετασχηματίζω (metaschēmatizō), change the form of a person or thing (3571).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. metaschēmatizō means to alter or transform the outward appearance of a person or thing. The word is also used in the field of astronomy with reference to the changing of the constellations. In the LXX metaschēmatizō only occurs in 4 Macc. 9:22, where it refers to the transforming of martyrs upon their death into incorruptibility. In Sym.'s OT, this word denotes the disguise Saul used to make himself unrecognizable to the witch at Endor (1 Sam. 28:8).

NT 1. metaschēmatizō occurs 5x in the NT. In 1 Cor. 4:6, it has a general meaning of Paul's application of the preceding discussion about being faithful stewards of God's word to himself and Apollos. In a different application, Paul uses the word in Phil.

3:21 to describe the future transformation of our "lowly bodies" by the power of God. No detail is given of the exact nature of this transformation.

2. In 2 Cor. 11:13–15 metaschēmatizō occurs 3x. The thought is not that false apostles have actually transformed themselves into apostles, but that they have masqueraded as such. At this time people did not sharply define what constituted an apostle. Paul's opponents called themselves apostles and earnestly presented themselves in this manner. In the eyes of many, these opponents really were apostles, but to Paul they were impostors. Perhaps, however, Paul is ironically describing them as actually transforming themselves into apostles: They identified themselves with the apostles—but they were false apostles.

The same process applies to Satan (1 Cor. 11:14). He not only masquerades as an angel of light and plays at being such, he actually identifies himself with an angel of light and assumes the character of one. The interpretation that this is only an appearance is due not so much to the vb. metaschēmatizō as to the insertion of the word hōs ("as") in 11:15. Both Satan and his servants present themselves "as though" they were servants of righteousness.

See also metamorphoō, change into another form or image, transform (3565).

3572 (metatithēmi, to transfer, change the position of, turn away), → 773.

3576 (metechō, share, participate in), → 2400.

3580 (metochē, sharing, participation), → 2400.

3581 (metochos, partaking, sharing, a partner, companion), → 2400.

3582 (metreō, take the dimensions of, measure, give out, deal out, apportion), → 3586.

3583 (metrētēs, measure [a unit of measure equal to ten gallons]), → 3586.

3586 μέτρον

μέτρον (metron), measure (3586); ἄμετρος (ametros), without measure (296); μετρέω (metreō), take the dimensions of, measure, give out, deal out, apportion (3582); μετρητής (metrētēs), measure (a unit of measure equal to ten gallons) (3583).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. metron means a measure, proportion, order, and measure in verse, while in philosophy it denotes the measure by which all things are measured; Plato identifies the measure with God. The vb. metreō means to measure, traverse, evaluate, judge.

2. In the LXX metron is used of the measurements of the tabernacle and temple (esp. Ezek. 40–48), weights and measures that stand under Yahweh's surveillance (Lev. 19:35; 1 Chr. 23:29; Prov. 20:10; Amos 8:5), the measures of the world in connection with creation (Job 11:9; 28:25; 38:5; Wis. 11:20), and standards used in pronouncements of judgment and salvation (e.g., 2 Ki. 21:13; Isa. 5:10; Lam. 2:8; Ezek. 4:11, 16).

NT 1. In the NT the noun and the vb. are found esp. in contexts of judgment and of the gift of grace allotted to believers. (a) Both words occur in Matt. 7:2: "In the same way you judge others, you will be judged, and with the measure you use, it will be measured to you." In other words, if you condemn others, you will exclude yourself from God's forgiveness. Jesus may have been quoting a common proverb to bring home a truth of judgment from which no one is exempt (cf. m. Sotah 7:1). It is the reverse of Jesus' exhortation to forgive (Matt. 6:14–15), and it is on a par with other exhortations in the Sermon on the Mount to leave everything to God—e.g., rewards (6:1–6), petitions in prayer (6:7–13), and concerns for worldly needs and cares (6:19–34).

(b) In the context of condemnation for shedding the blood of the prophets, Jesus declares: "Fill up, then, the measure of the sin of your forefathers" (Matt. 23:32). This may be an allusion to the Jewish view that the final judgment will come only after people have reached the absolute nadir of sinfulness.

2. (a) Jn. 3:34 states: "For the one whom God has sent speaks the words of God, for [he] gives the Spirit without limit." Although this may mean that the Son gives the Spirit to believers without measure, the most likely reference is that the Father gives the Spirit to the Son without measure (cf. also 14:26; 15:26).

(b) The noun metrētēs, a type of liquid measure, occurs only in the account of the Cana wedding, where each jar is said to contain between two and three measures. Most interpreters see a measure as equal to the Heb. bat (about ten gallons).

3. metron occurs 6x in Paul. (a) In Rom. 12:3 Paul instructs Christians not to think too highly of themselves but to think of themselves "with sober judgment, in accordance with the measure of faith God has given you." The phrase "measure of faith" probably means a standard by which a person can measure his or her Christian faith, namely, Jesus Christ. He is, after all, the norm for our faith.

(b) In Eph. metron occurs in connection with gifts: "But to each one of us grace has been given as Christ apportioned it [lit., according to the measure of Christ]" (4:7); "until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God and become mature, attaining to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ" (4:13); "from him the whole body, joined and held together by every supporting ligament, grows and builds itself up in love, as each part does its work [in its measure; NIV does not translate metron here]" (4:16). The church is not a body in which every part is like every other part; rather, God has created variety in the church, and each individual is to function according to the task and ability God has given.

In 2 Cor. 10:13 metron is translated "field" (2x, once in connection with kanōn). Paul is stressing here the geographical spheres in which he ministers and his refusal to boast about work done in areas not assigned to him by God—in contrast to the infiltrators in Corinth, who try to boast about the great work they are doing in Paul's area. (For more on this passage, → kanōn, standard, 2834.) The action of these opponents contrasts with Jesus' teaching on measuring. The adj. ametros, without measure, beyond limits, occurs 2x, only in 10:13, 15.

4. (a) In Rev. 11:1–2 Jn. is given a measuring rod like a staff and is told: "Go and measure the temple of God and the altar, and count the worshipers there. But exclude the outer court; do not measure it, because it has been given to the Gentiles." This vision takes up the theme of Ezek. 40–48, where the measuring was with a view to reconstructing the new temple after the destruction of the old, but here the people are measured in addition to the temple. The passage symbolizes the separation of the church, the new temple of God, from the rest of the world, with the implied promise that God will preserve it.

(b) Rev. 21:15–17 again takes up the measuring theme from Ezek. in connection with the dimensions of the new Jerusalem with its perfect proportions (→ dōdeka, twelve, 1557).

See also kanōn, rule, standard, norm (2834).

3613 μήτηρ

μήτηρ (mētēr), mother (3613).

CL & OT 1. (a) A high estimation of motherhood can be traced everywhere in antiquity. The earth became the great mother who first gives everything and then in death takes everything back into herself. Thus in many regions the oldest figures of the gods are earth mothers. Veneration of them often led to cultic prostitution in order to gain an immediate share in their life-controlling powers. Yet the picture of the mother deity can also be spiritualized, detached from the highly erotic domain of the figure of Venus (e.g., the Egyptian goddess, Isis, the embodiment of the true wife and mother).

(b) In Gk. philosophy the mother concept is used in a fig. sense, as when Plato speaks of matter as the mother of all. Philo designates wisdom as the mother of the world and of the Logos.

2. In the LXX mētēr occurs more than 300x. (a) In the OT we find many traces of the mother deities of the heathen world. The prophets fought a ceaseless battle against the Canaanite Astarte cult. The worship of the goddess of fertility was bound up for the most part with cultic prostitution (cf. 1 Sam. 31:10; 2 Ki. 23:13). Such prostitution became a symbol of idolatry and apostasy from Yahweh (Hos. 4:13–18).

(b) By and large the world of the OT was patriarchal; e.g., a mother who has borne sons enjoys a special position of honor among mothers and women. A maternal judicial praxis perhaps still operates in formulations such as "your own mother's son" as a synonym for brother (Ps. 50:20; cf. Jdg. 8:19) and "her mother's household" (e.g., Gen. 24:28), or when the mother sought a wife for her son (21:21).

(c) Motherhood is also guarded in the fifth commandment (Exod. 20:12), and the death penalty rests on anyone who strikes or curses father or mother (21:15–17). In marriage, a man is to leave his father and mother and be united to his wife (Gen. 2:24).

(d) The concept was also carried over into the preaching of the prophets: The people of God are called the mother of Israel (Jer. 50:12 = LXX 27:12). In Hos. they become an adulteress (2:4, 7 = LXX 2:2, 5); in Ezek. 16:3, 15, a prostitute. In Isa. 50:1 Israel is the mother whom God divorces for the sins of her children. The picture of a mother is also used for the capital city Jerusalem, Mount Zion, about which the people cluster as children about their mother (2 Sam. 20:19; cf. Gal. 4:26).

NT 1. Jesus. In the NT mētēr occurs 83x, though this concept is never exalted to a religious symbol or used in mythological presentations. In the Gospels, besides explicit mention of many mothers, we find the whole gamut of the natural relationship between mother and child. (a) Jesus accepted the fifth commandment in all its absoluteness, even in respect of the consequences of its violation (Matt. 15:4; Mk. 7:10; cf. Exod. 20:12). A Pharisaic softening of the commandment is firmly rejected (Matt. 15:5–6). Nevertheless, as in the OT, the spousal relationship in marriage takes precedence over that to a mother (see Matt. 19:5; Mk. 10:7–8; cf. Eph. 5:31).

(b) Jesus clearly delineates the limits of parental power that deny the claims of God. For the sake of the kingdom of God adherence to the parental home must be put aside (Matt. 10:35; Lk. 12:53).

2. Paul. For Paul, respect for motherhood is an obvious manifestation of divinely given life (Rom. 16:13; cf. also 1 Thess. 2:7, which uses trophos, "mother"). He compares his pastoral passion for new Christians with that of a mother, just as he can also call himself a father to those whom he has begotten in the faith (Gal. 4:19; Phlm. 10). He praises Timothy's mother, Eunice, and grandmother, Lois (2 Tim. 1:5), and urges him to treat older women like mothers and younger ones like sisters (1 Tim. 5:2). Our mother is the Jerusalem that is above, a contrast to the present Jerusalem, which is in bondage (Gal. 4:26–27). On the other hand, Rev. 17:5 describes Babylon as "THE MOTHER OF PROSTITUTES AND OF THE ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH."

3. The status of Jesus' mother. (a) Mary's psalm, the Magnificat (Lk. 1:46–55), is set in the context of the annunciation of Jesus' birth (1:26–38) and the family relationship between Mary and Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist (1:5–25). It is significant that this song is part of recorded Scripture. Whereas Matt. records Joseph's reaction to Mary's pregnancy and the subsequent visit of an angel (1:18–25), the visit of the Magi to Bethlehem, and the flight into Egypt (2:1–23), Lk. records the birth in Bethlehem and the visit of the shepherds, including the fact that Mary pondered in her heart the things that she was experiencing (2:1–20).

(b) For all his respect for his mother (e.g., his remaining subject to her at age twelve, Lk. 2:51) and all his care for her (e.g., during the crucifixion, Jn. 19:26–27), there remains a clear distinction between Jesus and his mother (cf. Lk. 2:49). He prevents her when she would have hampered him in his messianic office (Matt. 12:46–50; Mk. 3:31–35; Lk. 8:19–21), and he appears to brush her aside at the time of the wedding at Cana (Jn. 2:4). Lk. 11:27–28 is also significant. Jesus turned the personal adulation for his mother into a general injunction: "Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and obey it."

(c) The status of Mary in early Christendom is in accord with Jesus' attitude. After the resurrection the NT mentions her incidentally only once (Acts 1:14). Note that Mary found her salvation not in her position as Jesus' mother, but by her faith in Jesus and in her association with the church. The later adoration of the virgin Mary is a development subsequent to the NT.

See also gynē, woman (1222); parthenos, maiden, virgin (4221); chēra, widow (5939).

3620 μιαίνω

μιαίνω (miainō), defile (3620); μίασμα (miasma), defilement, pollution (3621); μιασμός (miasmos), defilement, pollution (3622); ἀμίαντος (amiantos), undefiled, pure (299).

CL & OT The basic meaning of miainō is to color something by painting or staining it. In this sense the word is morally neutral. But early on it was used metaphorically for causing oneself or other people or places to be "stained," i.e., unclean, so that they needed ritual cleansing. In a broader moral sense miainō was used for profaning religion and justice, sullying someone's fame, and polluting one's soul. miasma, defilement, and miasmos, the defiled state, have a corresponding range of meanings, while amiantos signifies freedom from defilement in both moral and religious senses.

In the LXX, miainō is used most frequently for ritual defilement in Lev., Num., and Ezek. In Lev. 13:3 miainō means pronounce unclean. Since the OT does not separate ritual and moral defilement, miainō is used also of the defilement that moral and spiritual transgressions cause (e.g., Isa. 47:6; Ezek. 14:11; Hos. 6:10 = LXX 6:11). Disregard for God's law, esp. sexual license, is highlighted as a source of defilement. In the canonical LXX miasma occurs 3x; in the Apocr. it is found 5x, miasmos 2x, and amiantos 5x (Wis. 3:13; 4:2; 8:20; 2 Macc. 14:36; 15:34).

NT In the NT miainō denotes the ritual uncleanness Jews feared from entering Gentile premises (Jn. 18:28), as well as the moral defilement of mind, conscience, and flesh that results from becoming a faithless libertine (Tit. 1:15; Jude 8). Heb. 12:15 expresses the fear that one apostate will defile others, presumably by drawing them to follow his bad example. miasma comes only in the phrase "corruption of the world" (2 Pet. 2:20); miasmos appears only in 2:10, in a phrase meaning "corrupt desire of the sinful nature," apparently referring to sexual and perhaps homosexual self-indulgence.

amiantos expresses the purity of Christ as high priest (Heb. 7:27), of our heavenly inheritance (2 Pet. 1:4), of sexual relations within marriage (Heb. 13:4), and of practical religion (Jas. 1:27); what it affirms in each of its applications is the absence of anything that constitutes guilt before God.

See also molynō, defile (3662).

3621 (miasma, defilement, pollution), → 3620.

3622 (miasmos, defilement, pollution), → 3620.

3625 μικρός

μικρός (mikros), small, little (3625); ἐλάσσων (elassōn), smaller, younger (1781); ἐλάχιστος (elachistos), very small, the least (1788); ὀλίγος (oligos), little, small, few (3900).

CL & OT 1. The adj. mikros, small, is the antonym of megas, great (→ 3489). In evaluations and comparisons these two words express a quantitative or qualitative difference that can refer to things, living beings, and periods of time. elassōn (smaller, younger) is the comparative and elachistos (very small, the least) the superlative. oligos also occurs in cl. Gk. lit.; it designates a small quantity, a small number, a few people, or a few days.

2. (a) The LXX uses the words in this group about 190x to translate various concepts: e.g., little houses (Amos 6:11 = LXX 6:12), a small light (Gen. 1:16), something almost (lit., by a little) happened (Ps. 73:2), a small boy (1 Sam. 16:11; Isa. 11:6). The combination "small and great" has the sense of all (e.g., Deut. 1:17; Ps. 115:13 = LXX 113:21). The LXX also uses oligos (103x) for a few days (Gen. 29:20), a small number of Israelites (Deut. 4:27), a short life span, indicating God's punishment (Job 10:20; Ps. 109:8).

(b) The LXX also uses mikros and its derivatives to denote humility toward God. Gideon calls himself the least in his family, from the weakest clan (Jdg. 6:15). The language of Solomon's prayer after succession to the throne uses the courtly style of ancient oriental kingly formulas: "I am only a little child" (1 Ki. 3:7). Self-effacement before God on the part of God's elect enjoys his favor (cf. Isa. 60:22).

(c) The OT clearly emphasizes that Yahweh is frequently on the side of the very people who have little in the way of possessions (e.g., Ps. 37:16–17). He often helps by means of small things (e.g., "Nothing can hinder the LORD from saving, whether by many of by few," 1 Sam. 14:6).

NT 1. The lines laid down by the OT are continued in the NT. Thus mikros (46x) is used in such expressions as small of stature (Lk. 19:3), of little value (Jn. 2:10, elassōn), younger in age (Rom. 9:12; 1 Tim. 5:9, elassōn). The juxtaposition of small and great as a phrase for "all" also occurs (e.g., Acts 8:10; Heb. 8:11; Rev. 11:18; 13:16; 19:5, 18). oligos (40x) is similarly used. The reversal of values is theologically significant (e.g., Matt. 25:21, 23; cf. Lk. 19:17): God will not treat human faithfulness in matters of little importance with contempt, but will reward it.

2. The Pauline writings contain the word group relatively rarely. The proverb about the far-reaching effects of a little yeast are mentioned in 1 Cor. 5:6 and Gal. 5:9. The subst. to mikron and the superlative elachistos occur in contexts in which Paul speaks of himself in the same self-effacing manner as noted in the OT (e.g., 1 Cor. 15:9; 2 Cor. 11:1, 16; cf. also Eph. 3:8, with the special form elachistoteros—"less than the least of all God's people"), while 1 Tim. 4:8 declares that bodily training is of a little (oligon) value.

3. With one exception Jn. uses mikros only in a temporal sense, i.e., "a little while" (e.g., Jn. 12:35). The heaping up of the word in 16:16–19 denotes first of all the time between Jesus' discourse and his coming arrest in Gethsemane "in a little while," and then the short interval until his disciples meet him after his resurrection. An element of comfort is implied in this section (cf. also Heb. 10:37).

4. The Synoptics use mikros in one significant way that differs from Hel. and Jewish lit. Jesus' contemporaries undervalued the "little ones" and "children." Jesus, however, was esp. concerned for their protection. He sharply warns anyone who causes the least of those who believe in him to stumble (Mk. 9:42; Lk. 17:2). Conversely, those who do good to the least of these are promised eternal reward (Matt. 10:42; 25:40, 45).

The implications for the Christian community in Matt. 18:1–6, 10, 14 (cf. Mk. 9:33–34, 37, 42; Lk. 9:46–48; 17:1–2) clearly correspond to the character and ways of God. The kingdom of God is not attained by quarrels over precedence and lust for greatness but by being least, by self-effacing service, and by poverty, which rely entirely on the sufficiency of God's help.

The sayings about the little grain of mustard seed (Matt. 13:31–32; Mk. 4:30–32; cf. Lk. 13:18–19) that becomes a great tree, the little flock (Lk. 12:32), and John the Baptist's being less than the "least in the kingdom of God" (7:28) are also to be interpreted from this standpoint. In the Christian community, and therefore before God, the only thing that counts is the renunciation of all the greatness that one has striven after.

See also megas, large, great (3489).

3628 μιμέομαι

μιμέομαι (mimeomai), imitate, follow (3628); μιμητής (mimētēs), imitator (3629); συμμιμητής (symmimētēs), fellow-imitator (5213).

CL & OT 1. mimeomai means imitate, mimic what one sees someone else doing; emulate, follow; represent reality by imitation (as in the arts). A symmimētēs is an imitator, esp. a performer or artist. The words were used ethically to express the modeling of a hero or the imitation of the good example of one's teacher or parents. In Platonic cosmology, the lower world of appearances is the imperfect, visible copy or likeness of the invisible archetype in the higher world of the Ideas. The phrase "to imitate god" means reflection on the image of the Idea that sticks in the memory; it is not an ethical expression.

2. The LXX only attests mimeomai and mimēma in the Apocr. (Wis. 4:2; 9:8; 15:9; 4 Macc. 9:23; 13:9; Ps. 31:6 in B^1 is an error). In rab. lit. we find the first expressions of imitating God in the sense of developing the image of God in us (see also T. Ash. 4:3; Let. Aris. 188, 210, 280–81).

NT In the NT mimeomai occurs 4x; mimētēs, 6x; and symmimētēs once. All uses have an ethical aim and are linked with the obligation to a specific kind of conduct.

1. The words are applied to particular persons as living examples of the life of faith. For example, when Paul puts himself forward as such a model (1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1; Phil. 3:17; 2 Thess. 3:7, 9), he does not offer himself personally as the embodiment of an ideal that must be imitated. In fact, just prior to the demand to imitate him, Paul deliberately places a confession of his own imperfection (Phil. 3:12). The reason for his life being an example is that it is in fellowship with Christ. To be an imitator of the apostle accordingly means to lay hold of Christ and let one's life be remolded by him (see 1 Cor. 4:16–17).

2. (a) On two occasions Paul specifically names Christ alongside himself as the one to be imitated. Believers share Christ's lot passively in what they suffer (1 Thess. 1:6) and actively by imitating him in his love (1 Cor. 11:1). When Paul refers to Christ here, he is not thinking so much of the earthly life of Jesus, but of the authority of the Exalted One present in his Word and Spirit and of the kind of behavior that would be consistent with the sphere of his lordship. Paul's appeal to imitate Christ is also conveyed by other expressions (Rom. 15:7; 2 Cor. 5:14; 8:9; 10:1; Eph. 5:2, 25; Phil. 2:5–13; cf. Mk. 10:45; Jn. 13:15).

(b) Heb. uses the word group much as Paul does. The attitude of faith evident in the OT saints (6:12) and the believers' own teachers (13:7) is exemplary of those who have finished their course and strengthens the conviction and confidence of believers who find themselves still en route.

(c) Eph. 5:1 is the first place where the idea appears that God should be imitated, though not as a metaphysical Being with certain attributes, but in his nature as revealed in Christ. What believers are to imitate is Christ's obedient adherence to the Father's will, shown in love and forgiveness (cf. Matt. 5:48 par.).

3. Imitation in the NT is thus not presented as the reproduction of a given pattern. It is the way of life of those who derive their being from the forgiveness of God. It is an attitude of thanks in response to the salvation that has been given to us. The summons to discipleship can only be fulfilled when one is grasped by Christ and undergoes the transformation that existence under the lordship of Christ involves.

See also akoloutheō, follow (199); mathētēs, learner, pupil, disciple (3412); opisō, behind, after (3958).

3629 (mimētēs, imitator), → 3628.

3630 μιμνήσκομαι

μιμνήσκομαι (mimnēskomai), recall to mind, remember (3630); μνεία (mneia), remembrance, memory, mention (3644); μνήμη (mnēmē), recollection, memory (3647); μνημονεύω (mnēmoneuō), remember, mention (3648); μνημόσυνον (mnēmosynon), memory, recollection (3649); ἀνάμνησις (anamnēsis), reminder, remembrance (390); ὑπόμνησις (hypomnēsis), recollection (5704); ἀναμιμνήσκω (anamimnēskō), remind (389); ὑπομιμνήσκω (hypomimnēskō), remind (5703).

CL 1. In cl. Gk. words in the mimnēskomai word group mean essentially to recall to mind, remember. The simple and compound forms of both vbs. and nouns are used interchangeably, with no fundamental difference in meaning. The following principal meanings are attested: (a) to remind oneself or someone else; recollection, memory; (b) to mention (verbally or in writing), make known, warn; (c) to consider, think of, ponder; (d) to remember for good or ill, concern oneself with; (e) to be mindful of, take into account, comply with.

anamnēsis has special significance in Plato. Seeing that it is possible to probe behind the externals of things, events, etc., and to recall their "ideas," he deduces a bodiless, free, spiritual preexistence of the soul and its survival after death.

2. mnēmē is an idea central to Gk. and Hel. cults and religio-philosophical systems. (a) In Homer, Hades is the kingdom of lēthē, i.e., oblivion and forgetfulness; its inhabitants are silent and unremembered.

(b) In Orphism mnēmē is personified as a goddess Mnēmosynē; also, under the figure of water from a divine spring, it is a gift of the goddess, i.e., the immortality of the human soul. Here memory is not only a natural power but also the process that this power sets in motion.

(c) In Gnosticism the human soul has left its heavenly home and thus become separated from unity with the divine (→ heis, 1651). Its tendency is to forget that divine origin through contamination by earthly evil. Recollection is the soul's first step in returning to its heavenly home; this recollection is evoked by the arrival of a redeemer through a "call." This call is the magic formula that sets the process in motion.

(d) This line is carried further in the mystery cults, where the fortunes of the particular god being worshiped are recalled in sensual fashion by means of ceremonies frequently based on a mixture of mysticism and magic.

OT 1. (a) In the LXX words from mnē- group generally correspond to derivatives of the Heb. vb. zākar and are used as in ordinary Gk. meanings: to remember (e.g., Gen. 8:1; 40:23; Wis. 12:2); to consider (e.g., Isa. 47:7; Sir. 41:1–2); to remember for good or ill (e.g., Gen. 30:22; Deut. esp. has remembering as a central theme); to be mindful of (e.g., Deut. 15:15); to mention (Est. 2:23).

(b) But words of this group also have unique biblical nuances. (i) For example, people recall things in prayer to God or even call God to remembrance (e.g., Ps. 74:18; see below).

(ii) To proclaim, celebrate. The existence of Israel, their faith in Yahweh as Savior and Redeemer, their obedience to him as the sovereign Lord of history, their public worship—all these things are grounded in their experience of his gracious help in the past. Hence, at their festivals the people of God are publicly called upon to remember his deeds; as they do so, the same God addresses them once again in the present. In this way, the words spoken, sung, or heard take up redemptive history and turn it into something requiring present commitment.

(iii) To believe, obey, become converted. To remember God in this sense means to serve, adore, obey, and follow him, to recognize him as Creator and Lord (Num. 15:39–40; Tob. 1:11–12). The phrase "to remember God" can be a formula summing up one's religious standing (Jdt. 13:19; Tob. 2:2). Thus in Ps. 22:27–28 mimnēskomai refers to the act of turning in faith to the Lord (cf. Pss. Sol. 4:21).

(iv) To confess with praise and adoration, give adoring testimony. When used in this way, words of this group always include the idea of public confession or acknowledgment of God (e.g., Ps. 6:5; 30:4; 97:12; cf. Sir. 17:27–28).

2. In rab. Jud., the specifically biblical usage recedes. Remembrance for good or ill comes to be heavily rationalized. For example, in the midrash on Gen. 30:22 God's remembrance is interpreted as his recollection of Rachel's good works. Yet the biblical meaning to help, be gracious, lived on in Jewish liturgy. The use of ʾazkārâ, remembrance, can even stand in place of hašēm, the Name of God. In the Qumran texts God remembered the old covenant and gave the new covenant for his elect, while in the eschatological war he will remember the sons of light and help them against the sons of darkness.

3. The topic of memory and remembering is an important theological concept in the OT. (a) When the vb. is used of God, it often occurs in psalms of complaint in an indirect plea for mercy or for God to rise up and act on behalf of his people. In Ps. 79:8, for example, the psalmist cries out: "Do not hold [lit., remember] against us the sins of the fathers" ; in 74:18, "Remember how the enemy has mocked you, O LORD." Jeremiah is more direct in his address for Yahweh to remember him; he uses the imperative to call on God to take vengeance on his enemies: "Remember me and care for me. Avenge me on my persecutors" (15:15).

Other psalms, rather than using pleas or commands, employ the indicative for Yahweh's remembering his covenant faithfulness and promises (e.g., Ps. 98:3; 105:8, 42). This memory is not confined to past events; it is active in the present and will continue into the future (e.g., 103:14; 105:8; 111:5). In each case, memory serves as a source of comfort and encouragement to the psalmist of God's care and concern for him.

(b) But Israel also remembers. God's people have not been cut off from their redemptive history; rather, they encounter the same covenant God through a living tradition. Memory links the past and the present (cf. Deut. 7:18; 9:7; 25:17). Here the Sabbath plays an important part, for Israel observes the Sabbath in order to call to mind her slavery in Egypt and God's remarkable deliverance in the exodus (5:15). Memory is to shape Israel's actions in the present (cf. "do not forget" in 8:11–20).

In prophetic passages such as Mic. 6:5, an appeal to memory is characteristic of a defendant's speech in a law court. The present rupture with Yahweh stems from Israel's failure to understand his saving acts. In Isa. 43:18; 44:21; 46:9 we see both continuity and discontinuity with Israel's past. There is continuity because of the one purpose of God; there is discontinuity because of Israel's failure. God's people are to use the experiences of the past to shape their future. The prophet Ezekiel (e.g., 16:22, 61; 36:31) calls on God's people to remember their sins. The goal is the same: that they might "know that I am LORD" (6:10; 16:62; 20:44; 36:23) and adjust their lives accordingly.

Ps. contains the largest number of instances of Israel's remembering, often in psalms of complaint (e.g., 42:4; 77:3; 143:5). The psalmist can remember a situation quite different from the one he is in and uses this memory to call out to the Lord for aid. In Ps. 77, for example, the psalmist grieves that Yahweh has changed his attitude toward him. He remembers when times were different and cries out in bitter frustration (77:3–9), but his attitude changes when he "remembers the deeds of the LORD ... [the] miracles of long ago" (77:11), and the rest of the psalm is a reflection on God's mighty deeds.

4. One important feature of memory in the OT is use of the memorial sign, the zikkārôn (23x in the OT). In the pass. sense it means a memorandum, a thing worthy to be remembered, such as a memorial written in a book that will serve to bring to mind the defeat of the Amalekites (Exod. 17:14). In the act. sense it means a memorial that calls something else to remembrance. Two onyx stones in the high priest's ephod with the names of the twelve tribes is a "memorial before the LORD" (Exod. 28:12); the Passover is a memorial festival so that generations to come might remember the great saving act of their God (12:14; cf. also Jos. 4:7). Signs and memorials serve to maintain for each generation their eternal relationship with the Lord God. The cultic acts of Israel continually remind God of this eternal covenantal order.

5. The Gk. noun anamnēsis, remembrance, which features in the words of institution in the Lord's Supper, is comparatively rare in the LXX. In Lev. 24:7 it stands for ʾazkārâ, which was a memorial offering. This offering was evidently intended to be a perpetual reminder of the covenant, to be offered every Sabbath (24:8–9). The memorial aspect seems to be an appeal to Yahweh to remember his covenant faithfulness as well as to Israel to do the same. The fact that only the priests might eat this offering indicates its holy character and their representative role on behalf of the people. Similarly in Num. 10:10 anamnēsis is linked with offerings as "a memorial for you before your God."

The word anamnēsis also occurs in the titles to Ps. 38 and 70 (NIV, "a petition"). It is difficult to know precisely what the word means here; perhaps the psalmist is calling on God to remember him in his present crisis. In the Apocr. anamnēsis occurs only in Wis. 16:6; in recalling the incident of the biting fiery serpents and of the bronze serpent as a means of deliverance, the writer says: "They ... received a symbol of deliverance to remind [anamnēsis] them of your law's command."

NT 1. The majority of NT passages using this word group reflect normal Gk. usage. (a) To remember, call to mind. Thus, "Peter remembered [mimnēskomai] the word Jesus had spoken ... and he went outside and wept bitterly" (Matt. 26:75; cf. Mk. 14:72, which uses the pass. of anamimnēskō, remind; Lk. 22:61, which uses the passive of hypomimnēskō, remind). In 2 Tim. 1:6 Paul uses anamimnēskō: "For this reason I remind you to fan into flame the gift of God, which is in you through the laying on of my hands." In each case theological lessons are drawn. Peter's memory of Jesus' warning about his denial, for example, underlines the folly of his self-confidence. In the other passage, remembering plays an important part in sustaining the life of faith.

(b) To consider. "Remember [mnēmoneuō] Lot's wife" (Lk. 17:32). The example of Lot's wife in refusing to give herself totally to escaping the judgment on Sodom and Gomorrah was a warning for consideration in both Jewish and Christian teaching. Note also Heb. 10:32: "Remember [anamnēskomai] those earlier days ... when you stood your ground in a great contest in the face of suffering" (according to 12:4 this was probably a persecution that had stopped short of martyrdom). Remembering in the form of considering should play an important part in one's conduct of life (cf. also Lk. 16:25).

(c) To remember in a way that will benefit a person. Here the passages are either OT quotations or have strong OT overtones. Mary's song contains the following: "He has helped his servant Israel, remembering to be merciful" (Lk. 1:54; cf. Pss. Sol. 10:4). Zechariah's psalm blesses God for fulfilling his promises "to show mercy to our fathers and to remember his holy covenant" (Lk. 1:72; cf. Exod. 2:24; 6:5; Ps. 105:8). Heb. 8:12 also operates within the theology of the covenant, taking up the promise of Jer. 31:34: "For I will forgive their wickedness and will remember their sins no more." The plea of the penitent thief ("Jesus, remember me when you come into your kingdom") means essentially, "Save me!" (Lk. 23:42). Rev. 18:5 expresses the converse aspect of this kind of remembering in the oracles against Babylon: "For her sins are piled up to heaven, and God has remembered her crimes."

(d) To be mindful of. In most of these cases the translation "to remember" is too weak. Rather, the remembering is seen as a positive force that affects one's behavior. Thus Heb. 11:15 reads: "If they had been thinking [mnēmoneuō] of the country they had left, they would have had opportunity to return." When Abraham left Ur and sojourned in the promised land, he did not keep pining after the country he had left (Gen. 11:31–12:9). Peter instructs us "to recall the words spoken in the past by the holy prophets and the command given by our Lord and Savior through your apostles" (2 Pet. 3:2). Similarly Timothy is exhorted: "Keep reminding [the people] of these things. Warn them before God against quarreling about words" (2 Tim. 2:14; cf. also 1 Cor. 11:2; 2 Tim. 1:5; Jude 5, 17).

(e) To mention. hypomimnēskō in 3 Jn. 10 means "I will call attention to," i.e., the elder will raise the question of the actions of Diotrephes before the church. In the vision of Rev. 16:19, "God remembered [i.e., arraigned] Babylon the Great and gave her the cup filled with ... his wrath."

2. About one-fourth of the NT uses of this word group reflect the unique biblical usage. (a) To mention in prayer, to remember in prayer. mnēmoneuō in 1 Thess. 1:3 means to intercede, pray for. In Acts 10:4 Cornelius the centurion is told by an angel of God, "Your prayers and gifts to the poor have come up as a memorial offering before God." Some scholars see in the use of mnēmosynon a "sacrificial efficacy" in Cornelius's conduct (cf. also 10:31).

(b) To proclaim. "So I will always remind [hypomimnēskō] you of these things, though you know them and are firmly established in the truth you now have. I think it right to refresh your memory [hypomnēsis] as long as I live in the tent of this body" (2 Pet. 1:12–13). Here the reminding is understood in terms of presenting again the known truth of the gospel. According to Jn. 14:26, such reminding is the work of the Holy Spirit. As Christ's hearers bring to mind the message they have heard from him, the Holy Spirit enables them to proclaim the Lordship of Christ in ways that are relevant to each succeeding generation. There are overtones of this sense of proclamation also in 1 Cor. 4:17. Similarly, the woman who anointed Jesus becomes part of the NT proclamation: "Wherever the gospel is preached throughout the world, what she has done will also be told, in memory [mnēmosynon] of her" (Mk. 14:9; cf. Matt. 26:13).

Exhortation in the form of anamnēsis or hypomnēsis is a marked feature of the Christian message. Note Tit. 3:1: "Remind [hypomimnēskō] the people to be subject to rulers and authorities, to be obedient, to be ready to do whatever is good."

(c) To believe. "Remember Jesus Christ [mnēmoneue Iēsoun Christon], raised from the dead, descended from David. This is my gospel" (2 Tim. 2:8). What is to be remembered is a short creedal statement.

(d) To confess. Referring to the sacrifices under the old covenant, Heb. 10:3 declares: "But those sacrifices are an annual reminder [anamnēsis] of sins." Here the allusion may well be to the Day of Atonement ritual (Lev. 16), which involved public acknowledgment of sins committed in the past year.

3. The only other NT instances of anamnēsis occur in Paul's and Lk.'s accounts of the Last Supper: "When he had given thanks, he broke it and said, 'This is my body, which is for you; do this in remembrance [anamnēsis] of me.' In the same way, after supper he took the cup, saying, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood; do this, whenever you drink it, in remembrance [anamnēsis] of me'" (1 Cor. 11:24–25; cf. Lk. 22:19).

Traditionally, these words have been understood to mean that the Lord's Supper was Jesus' appointed means of being present in the hearts and minds of the assembled church. At one end of the scale is the Zwinglian interpretation, which sees the Lord's Supper as a kind of stimulus to the act of mental recollection of Jesus' atoning death. Zwingli believed that the physical body of Christ was risen, ascended, and seated at the right hand of the Father and therefore could not be present in the Lord's Supper. Moreover, he held that it is the Spirit that gives life (Jn. 6:63); thus, the access we have to Christ in remembering him is through the Spirit.

At the other end of the scale is the Catholic interpretation, which speaks of the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, involving the doctrine of transubstantiation in which the substance of the bread and the wine is changed into the body and blood of Christ, though outwardly it remains bread and wine. The Protestant Max Thurian takes these words to mean: "with a view to my memorial, as the memorial of me." This memorial is not a simple subjective act of recollection but a liturgical action that makes the Lord and his sacrifice present to us. Jeremias understands "in remembrance of me" to mean: "that God may remember me."

Perhaps it is best to have a comprehensive view of the word anamnēsis in the Lord's Supper. The command to "do this in remembrance of me" may be paraphrased as follows: "Do this, by eating the bread and drinking the cup (i.e., by participating in my life and death), by the preaching of the word (1 Cor. 11:26), and the singing of praise."

4. The original meanings of the mimnēskomai word-group were entirely nonreligious, ranging from sexual desire to the heights of philosophy. However, as a result of their adoption into the LXX as renderings of Heb. equivalents, the Gk. words underwent a significant expansion of meaning, particularly along the lines of public worship. What makes this so significant is the fact that the Gk. of the NT possesses so many other words relating to public worship, yet the words of this group are introduced into early Christian vocabulary for use in this special area, with the result that what was a peripheral meaning in cl. Gk. becomes central.

Undoubtedly the main reason for this is that public worship of God belongs to the sphere of the historical, stretching from yesterday, through today, and on into the future—from Sinai to Calvary, from the OT covenant people to the church of Christ, then on to us, and eventually to the end of the age and God's eternal kingdom. In worship believers recall historical events. The biblical view of history is linear, not cyclical. This is true of proclamation, which aims to give outward expression to something that has happened in the past by removing it from the wrappings of memory or of oral or written tradition and so recalling it to our minds. The same applies to the Lord's Supper, instituted at a precise time and place to be a "remembrance" of Christ throughout the church's history "until he comes" again (1 Cor. 11:26).

God's remembrance of his people (expressed in preaching) dovetails with his people's remembrance of him in praise and testimony. Within the context of revelation, God's remembrance is expressed verbally (i.e., it is addressed to our minds and is personal), but it is not mere words. God's remembering is a creative event. Thus it can bring blessing (Gen. 30:22) or judgment (Rev. 16:19). Our response is similarly remembrance, expressed not only verbally in the ordinance of public worship, but in a manner that involves the whole person as only eating and drinking can do, i.e., in the Lord's Supper; and, over and above all this, expressed tangibly in collecting money for the poor (see Gal. 2:10).

3631 μισέω

μισέω (miseō), hate (3631).

CL & OT 1. miseō in cl. Gk. means hate, abhor, reject. It connotes not only antipathy to certain actions, but also a permanent and deep-seated human hostility toward others or even toward deities. It is further used of the gods' abhorrence of the base aspects of human nature and of divine hatred of those who are unrighteous.

2. In the LXX miseō can mean several things. (a) It can denote hate as an emotional impulse. Joseph's brothers hated him because he was his father's favorite (Gen. 37:2–4). Wisdom teaches that hatred (misos) stirs up strife, but love covers all offenses (Prov. 10:12). Yahweh forbids hatred against fellow members of Israel and commands that love be extended to them as to oneself (Lev. 19:17–18).

(b) The pass. miseomai, especially the part. misoumenē, can also be used of a wife who is not loved (Gen. 29:31, 33; Deut. 21:15–17; 22:13–16; Isa. 60:15). The transformation of strong desire into utter loathing is portrayed in 2 Sam. 13.

(c) The word haters is often a synonym for enemies (Deut. 7:15; 30:7; 2 Sam. 22:18; Ps. 18:17)—also where the reference is to God's enemies (Num. 10:35; Ps. 68:1; 139:21). Similarly one's enemies are those whom one hates (Ezek. 16:37; 23:28).

(d) Those who hate God are also those who are disobedient to him (Exod. 20:5; Deut. 5:9; 7:9–11). They hate anyone who reproves them in the name of Yahweh (1 Ki. 22:8; Amos 5:10), right knowledge (Prov. 1:22, 29), and the righteous or godly (Ps. 34:21; 69:4, 14; Prov. 29:10).

(e) God hates wickedness (Jer. 44:3–4 = LXX 51:3–4; Zech. 8:17; Mal. 2:16, divorce) and those who do it (Ps. 5:5, an aphorism; Prov. 6:16–19; Jer. 12:8; Hos. 9:15). Israel therefore is also to hate wickedness (Amos 5:15; cf. Ps. 26:5, the company of evildoers; 119:104, the way of lying; Ps. 139:21, those who hate God).

(f) To hate oneself is folly (Prov. 15:32 = LXX 16:3; cf. 29:24).

3. Ancient Jud. recognized the destructive power of hatred. Baseless hatred destroyed the second temple, for hatred is more serious than immorality, idolatry, and the shedding of blood put together (b. Yoma 9a). At the same time there is a hatred that is commanded: "Hate the Epicureans [free-thinkers], those who seduce and mislead, and likewise those who betray" (ʾAbot R. Nat. 16; cf. Ps. 139:21–22).The Qumran community spoke in a similar vein. Its members were to "do what is good and righteous before him [God] as he commanded by the hand of Moses and all his servants the prophets . . . [to] love all the sons of light, each according to his lot in God's design, and hate the sons of darkness, each according to his guilt in God's vengeance" (1QS 1:2–3, 9–11; cf. 9:21–23).

NT 1. According to Jesus, God now accepts his enemies as sons (Matt. 5:43–48; cf. Lk. 15:11–32). Hence it no longer makes sense for the righteous to hate "the sons of darkness." Rather, with the authority of God Jesus demands: "You have heard that it was said, 'Love your neighbor and hate your enemy.' But I tell you: Love your enemies" (Matt. 5:43–44), and "do good to those who hate you" (Lk. 6:27). It is, of course, right for the Christian church, just as it is for "the Son" (Heb. 1:9), to hate evil and evil deeds (Rev. 2:6; cf. also Jude 23; Rev. 3:4). But within the church, "anyone who claims to be in the light but hates his brother is still in darkness" (1 Jn. 2:9), and "anyone who hates his brother is a murderer" (3:15; cf. 4:20). Still, in the last days there will be hatred even within the church (Matt. 24:10), though this is the mark of non-Christian humanity (Tit. 3:3).

2. Jesus' radical command to love one's enemies brings the disciples into line with God's action toward both good and evil people (Matt. 5:45–48; Lk. 6:35). But Jesus also stated: "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, his wife and children, his brothers and sisters—yes, even his own life—he cannot be my disciple" (14:26; cf. Jn. 12:25). Comparison with Matt. 10:37 suggests the meaning here for "hate" is "love less." Like God himself (Deut. 13:6–11), Jesus requires that obedience to God must take precedence over all human obligations.

The world, however, like everyone who does evil, hates the light (Jn. 3:20). It hates Christ without cause (15:25), because he bears witness that its works are evil (7:7). This hatred is directed also against Jesus' disciples (Matt. 10:22; Mk. 13:13; Lk. 21:17; Jn. 15:18–25; 17:14; 1 Jn. 3:13). They are counted blessed when people hate them (Lk. 6:22) for Christ's sake (Matt. 5:11).

3. Paul uses miseō in two difficult passages. (a) In Rom. 7:15 he says of those under the law: "I do not understand what I do. For what I want to do I do not do, but what I hate I do." The reference is not to one's inability to become righteous in terms of God's law (as Phil. 3:6 shows), but one's inability to discern the outcome of an attempt to fulfill the law. We do not attain to life, as we want, but to death, which we hate, since sin is able to make use even of the law for its own ends.

(b) In Rom. 9:13 Paul cites Mal. 1:2–3: "Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated." Even before the two sons of Isaac could give any grounds for acceptance or rejection, God chose the younger one, Jacob, as the heir of his promise, and rejected Esau, the older brother, in order to show that his salvation rests on his promise alone, not on natural descent or similar prerogatives (Rom. 9:7–8, 11–12).

4. miseō is used in a sense completely in line with the OT at Lk. 1:71 (of enemies) and Rev. 18:2 (of unclean birds, loathed by God).

See also echthros, hostile, hated, enemy (2398).

3632 (misthapodosia, recompense), → 3635.

3633 (misthapodotēs, one who pays wages, a rewarder), → 3635.

3634 (misthios, hired servant), → 3635.

3635 μισθός

μισθός (misthos), pay, wages, reward (3635); μισθόω (misthoō), hire (3636); μισθωτός (misthōtos), hired servant (3638); μίσθωμα (misthōma), contract price, rent (3637); μίσθιος (misthios), hired servant (3634); μισθαποδοσία (misthapodosia), recompense (3632); μισθαποδότης (misthapodotēs), one who pays wages, a rewarder (3633).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the noun misthos denotes reward or pay for work. It occurs mainly in industrial or commercial contexts. More rarely, examples can be found of good fortune being given to humans as a reward for their ethical endeavors. But misthos is not used in cl. Gk. in a religious sense, since Gk. religion did not rest on the basis of rewards. In general, what a person received in the afterlife was based on honor or virtue.

From Hel. times on, the idea of reward penetrated religious thought. Belief in rewards and punishments in the next life begins to play a decisive role in the religions of Serapis-Isis and of Mithras. In Roman religion the commercial conception of payment and of reward expanded to include the relationship of humans to the gods, illustrated by the basic phrase do ut des, I give (to you) so that you can give (to me). The concept of reward is linked here with the language of sacrifice.

2. (a) In the LXX the noun misthos translates a variety of Heb. words and means hire, wages, or reward, depending on context (e.g., Gen. 15:1; 30:18, 28, 32–33; 31:8; Exod. 2:9; 22:14 = LXX 22:13; Num. 18:31; Ezek. 27:15; Tob. 2:12, 14; Wis. 2:22; 5:15). The vb. misthoō normally translates verbal forms derived from śākar, to hire (Gen. 30:16; Deut. 23:5 = LXX 23:4; Jdg. 9:4; Neh. 6:12; 13:2; Isa. 7:20; 46:6). misthios means a hired servant (Lev. 19:13; 25:50; Sir. 7:20); misthōma, hire (Hos. 2:14 = LXX 2;12; Mic. 1:7); misthōtos, hired servant (Exod. 12:45; Lev. 19:13; 22:10; 25:6; Isa. 28:1, 3; 1 Macc. 6:29).

(b) Reward in the OT is primarily used in its secular sense summoning Israelites to social action. Laborers are to be paid their wages daily in order to avoid possible want or starvation (Deut. 24:14; Jer. 22:13).

(c) Semitic and Israelite thought is largely determined by the connection between human dealings and fortunes. Earthly rewards and punishments are part of the obvious makeup of OT faith. Leah receives her son Issachar as a reward from God (Gen. 30:18; cf. Ps. 127:3), while Yahweh punishes the Amalekite crimes by putting them under a ban and destroying them (1 Sam. 15:2–3). The negative aspect of punishment and retribution tends to stand out. Note esp. Amos 1:3–2:16, which connects the bleak fate of Israel and the other nations with God's judgment. Ezek. replaces the concept of wholesale recompense by that of punishment, and takes note of more individual offenses (18:20), while Deut. unfolds a positive understanding of reward, linking together obedience and blessing (cf. 28:1–14), and their antithesis, disobedience and curse (cf. 28:15–68).

But it is in the wisdom lit. that the concept of reward receives its distinctive stamp. Here for the first time a systematized pattern is developed, possessing authority for the whole of life; there is reward for the righteous and punishment for the godless (cf. Prov. 11:18, 21, 31). Job's attack on the theology of his friends (cf. Job 8:4–6) is a protest against this theory of retribution for good and bad, because it does not do justice to the suffering of the godly. The Preacher also reveals his dissatisfaction with an over-neat correlation of rewards and punishments (Eccl. 8:14).

(d) But note how different the concept of divine reward is from our own human concepts. God is a sovereign Lord who rules his servants but is not obliged to reward the amount of work they do. Redemption is a gift that he gives, a royal bounty, which far exceeds in value any service from his subjects (see esp. Ps. 127:3, where the reward from God is not payment for services or remuneration for achievement but a free gift from a generous king). The blessings of salvation and the reward of God are generally understood in earthly terms (cf. Deut. 28:3–14; 30:15).

3. In intertestamental Jud., a reward from God was considered as having significance beyond this life. But hand in hand with this development went a fateful modification in the understanding of reward—that one could earn God's grace through good behavior. Good works became the means of attaining grace and the precondition of the expected reward. The Mosaic law ceased to be the fence that held Israelites inside the saving boundaries of the covenant and became instead a ladder and a means of acquiring salvation, now thought of as lying in the future. Yahweh's covenant became a starting position for self-justification instead of something one aimed to fulfill in its own right; yet one could never be certain whether enough had been credited to one's account. Eschatological expectation can never become a matter of certain hope where a concept of reward has been perverted into a system of merit and achievement.

NT 1. In the NT misthos appears 15x in the Gospels (esp. Matt.) and 6x in Paul. Two surprising compound words are found only in Heb.: misthapodosia, reward or recompense (3x), and misthapodotēs, one who rewards or recompenses (once).

(a) misthos is a basic part of Jesus' preaching concerning the coming kingdom of God. Some references give the impression that Jesus took over the prevalent Jewish conception of reward. If you sell all your possessions, you will win a treasure in heaven (Matt. 19:21, though not using misthos), while God will not withhold the reward for godliness if it is directed to him (6:1). Jesus placed all human action and existence under the coming judgment, but this raises the question whether this does not open the flood-gates to "works-righteousness."

The parable of the workers in the vineyard (Matt. 20:1–16) answers this. Note that the landowner is entirely free and under no external constraint (20:15), a characteristic made even clearer in the parable of the talents (25:24). The reason why those who worked only an hour were paid the same wage as the others who had "borne the burden of the work and the heat of the day" (20:12) is not that their work was of a higher quality or that God reckoned their small efforts worth the same pay. Rather, payment is made on the grounds of freedom and generosity rather than reward.

God not only repays far beyond any merit (cf. Lk. 19:17, 19); payment of reward is independent of a worker's achievements. Its root lies in God's sovereign generosity:

"Don't I have the right to do what I want with my own money? Or are you envious because I am generous?" (Matt. 20:15). Every claim to one's deserts must fall silent in the face of the demand for total obedience: "So you also, when you have done everything you were told to do, should say, 'We are unworthy servants; we have only done our duty'" (Lk. 17:10). Nevertheless, even the smallest act of service in the kingdom of God will not go unrewarded (Matt. 10:42; cf. Mk. 9:41).

(b) Jesus' polemic against the false piety of the Pharisees is also instructive (Matt. 6:1–18). A Pharisee who is putting his piety on show is not looking for God's acceptance and honor but for compliments from other people. If they admire him and his virtues, his reward has already been paid out to him (6:2, 5, 16). The genuinely pious, however, do everything for God's sake; hence God will reward them in his judgment. Faith that stands on the side of God, ready to suffer for Jesus' sake, results in a reward in heaven (5:11–12). Profession of faith in the Lord is not only verbal; it also means accepting "the least of these brothers of mine" in his name (25:40; cf. 10:42; 25:45). Such an attitude is rewarded insofar as a person occupies the place in the kingdom of God that has been prepared.

Thus, our works have no intrinsic moral value that can accrue merit with God. Rather, they are integral parts of faith and of our confession of Christ. Even the reward is based solely on our acceptance by the eschatological judge (Matt. 10:32); it includes full salvation and eternal life (Mk. 8:36; 10:29–30; cf. Matt. 19:29; Lk. 18:29–30). In making the concept of reward subsidiary to the prior category of the coming kingdom of God, Jesus makes a clean break with the Jud. of his day.

2. (a) Paul was well acquainted with the thought of judgment based on works (cf. Rom. 2:6; 2 Cor. 5:10). But with him the rab. Jewish concept of merit is replaced by his doctrine of justification by faith. How is this to be understood? The nature of misthos is explained by the use of other concepts: The righteous man receives "praise" (Rom. 2:29), "glory, honor and immortality" (2:7), and the "prize for which God has called me heavenward" (Phil. 3:14) in the judgment. What we have earned is death; life is what God gives us by his grace (Rom. 6:23). He does not owe us this reward (4:4).

(b) This does not mean that the misthos has no place in a Christian's activity. There is the prize that beckons the victor into the race (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24; Phil. 3:14). The wise master-builder of the community will receive a reward (1 Cor. 3:14), but there can only be a question of reward when it is given for something done voluntarily. Paul felt under obligation to preach the gospel (9:16), but he freely waived the church's obligation to maintain his upkeep, lest he be regarded as under obligation to others (9:15). Although Paul speaks to the Corinthians of his reward, his understanding of it is paradoxical. For it turns out that the reward he seeks is not something that he covets for himself, but to make the gospel free of charge (9:17–18). He wants no obstacle in the way of the gospel (9:12). It is a further aspect of his conduct as a skilled builder (3:10) and an apostle who is content to suffer (4:9–13).

(c) In connection with misthos, Paul distinguishes between the builder and one's work, which, if unserviceable, will be burned up in the fire of judgment. God's grace does not allow such a person to be lost (1 Cor. 3:15) even though the work is. Note too Eph. 2:10, that even the good deeds we do perform are a gift of God's grace. It is God "who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose" (Phil. 2:13). All personal vainglory is excluded.

3. Heb. reveals by its choice of vocabulary that reward can be spoken of only in terms of the sovereign act of God. According to 10:35–36 it is the blessing of the promise that richly rewards us (misthapodosia, which denotes here the bestowal of eternal life; cf. 11:6). No human action can in any way counterbalance this in value. Rather, this gift is intended for those who seek God with a bold faith. Faith is indeed bound up with patience and not giving "up meeting together" (10:25), but there is never any mention of merit that leads to salvation.

True, Heb. contains repeated warnings against despising the grace of God and the day of opportunity (e.g., 3:7–19; 4:1–13; 6:4–8; 10:35–39; 12:3–6, 15–17, 25–27). There comes a point of no return from sin. But believers have not come to Mount Sinai and all its terrors of judgment, but "to Mount Zion . . . to the spirits of righteous men made perfect, to Jesus the mediator of a new covenant . . ." (Heb. 12:22–24). The prospect of judgment for the faithful is not a petty reckoning up of human values and achievements, but a joyful hopefulness (10:35). Moses is an example of such faith, for "he regarded disgrace for the sake of Christ as of greater value than the treasures of Egypt, because he was looking ahead to his reward [misthapodosian]" (11:26).

4. In Jn. 4 Jesus' discourse with the disciples after his conversation with the Samaritan woman indicates that the "harvest," the eschatological age of salvation, has already broken in. Indeed, the "reaper" is already drawing "his wages [misthon], even now he harvests the crop for eternal life" (4:36; cf. Lev. 26:5; Deut. 28:33; Jdg. 6:3). The thought of wages here is not a matter of merit. The "work of God" that has eternal life as its consequence is faith (Jn. 6:29). It is in this sense that 2 Jn. 8 speaks of the misthos of faith: "Watch out that you do not lose what you have worked for, but that you may be rewarded fully."

5. The OT and the NT together testify that eternal life is a gift that comes from outside ourselves, from God himself who, as our judge, pronounces us righteous despite ourselves. All rewards lie in his gift. Yet there is a connection between the anticipated reward and our conduct. God rewards those who serve him without thought of reward. Whatever reward we receive is a further token of the free grace of God that enables us to act in the first place.

See also apodidōmi, give away, give back, sell, recompense (625); kerdos, gain (3046); opsōnion, wages, payment (4072).

3636 (misthoō, hire), → 3635.

3637 (misthōma, contract price, rent), → 3635.

3638 (misthōtos, hired servant), → 3635.

3640 Μιχαήλ — Μιχαήλ (Michaēl), Michael (3640).

OT The name probably means "who is like God?" Michael appears in the OT only in Dan. Like Gabriel, he is a celestial being, but he has special responsibilities as the champion of Israel against the rival angel of the Persians (10:13, 20), and he leads the heavenly armies against all supernatural forces of evil in the last great battle (12:1).

This military patronage is frequently attested in other late Jewish writings, and his name as protector of Israel is also on the shields of one division of the Sons of Light at Qumran. Michael also has an intercessory role and was considered to be the recording angel. He was therefore the intermediary between God and Moses at Sinai.

NT In the NT Michael appears on two occasions. Jude 9 refers to a dispute between Michael and the devil concerning Moses' body. The theme of Dan. 12:1 is taken up in Rev. 12:7, which presents Michael as the vanquisher of the primordial dragon, identified as Satan and representing the supernatural forces of evil.

3644 (mneia, remembrance, memory, mention), → 3630.

3645 (mnēma, tomb), → 2507.

3646 (mnēmeion, memorial, tomb), → 2507.

3647 (mnēmē, recollection, memory), → 3630.

3648 (mnēmoneuō, remember, mention), → 3630.

3649 (mnēmosynon, memory, recollection), → 3630.

3655 (moichalis, adulteress, prostitute), → 3658.

3656 (moichaō, commit adultery), → 3658.

3657 (moicheia, adultery), → 3658.

3658 μοιχεύω

μοιχεύω (moicheuō), commit adultery (3658); μοιχεία (moicheia), adultery (3657); μοιχός (moichos), adulterer (3659); μοιχαλίς (moichalis), adulteress, prostitute (3655); μοιχάω (moichaō), commit adultery (3656).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. moicheuō means to commit adultery, sometimes to seduce a woman, violate. Adultery was punishable in law codes going back to the 2d millennium B.C. Every form of sexual relationship outside marriage was forbidden to the wife, for she was the real guarantor of the integrity of the family and clan; by adultery she broke her own marriage. A man, by contrast, committed adultery only by sexual relationships with a married woman, i.e., when breaking into another's arrangement. Traces of older concepts from different cultures can be detected here as well: (a) Adultery with a married woman involved an offense against a man's property, and (b) the woman committing adultery opened the clan to the influence of evil powers. The punishment of adultery (death, ill-treatment, or the payment of a fine) was normally left to the initiative of the wronged husband or his clan.

2. In the LXX adultery, as in other societies, covered every extramarital sexual relationship by a married woman, and the extramarital sexual relationship of a man with a married or engaged woman (Gen. 38:15–16; Lev. 19:20–22; Deut. 22:28–29). Adultery was punishable by death, normally by stoning (but cf. Gen. 38:24) both parties (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22–27; Ezek. 16:40; cf. Jn. 8:5). In contrast to society outside Israel, adultery offended not only the personal rights of marriage and family but also the law of God (Exod. 20:14) and so threatened the basis of the people's existence (Deut. 22:22b). Hence, the punishment had to be inflicted by the community. If a woman was suspected of adultery, a test of guilt or innocence was prescribed to be carried out by the priests (Num. 5:11–31).

3. Marriage and adultery are used symbolically for the relationship between Yahweh and his people in Hos. (→ gameō, 1138). When Israel began to sacrifice to strange gods, the nation acted as an adulteress who leaves her husband and plays the prostitute with other men (2:2). Yahweh will severely punish this adultery (5:7–15), though the goal of this is not the destruction of the adulteress but her repentance (3:5). This picture is later taken up by Jer. (cf. 2:2; 3:1–10; 5:7; 13:22, 26) and Ezek. (cf. 16:1–63; 23:37–45).

4. The serious warnings against adultery in wisdom lit. (cf. Prov. 6:20–35; Sir. 25:2) show a weakening of strict marriage morality in the course of Israel's history (cf. esp. Prov. 6:35; Mal. 2:14–16). It is the mark of the fool to be led astray by a prostitute. His action brings disgrace and ruin (cf. also Prov. 2:16–19; 7:5–27; 30:20). The serious social consequences of adultery were also a cause for concern.

NT 1. This word group is used in the NT with the same meanings as outlined above. In several places the NT quotes Exod. 20:14 (e.g., Matt. 19:18; Mk. 10:19; Lk. 18:20; Jas. 2:11). At the same time, however, the NT's understanding of marriage and adultery is carried forward to a position known neither to cl. Gk. nor the OT. (a) Adultery on the man's part is unreservedly measured by the same standards as in the woman (Matt. 5:32; Mk. 10:11–12; Lk. 16:18).

(b) The desire, i.e., the willingness, to commit the act is equivalent to adultery itself (Matt. 5:27–28).

(c) Since the NT considers marriage to be indissoluble (Mk. 10:8), remarriage following divorce, permitted by the OT on the grounds of the hardness of human hearts, enters the realm of adultery (Matt. 5:31–32). In 19:9, Jesus applies the statement equally to the mán who divorces his wife, marries again, and so commits adultery. Matt. does recognize an exception that permits divorce (→ porneuō, 4519).

(d) Adultery is incompatible with the hope of life in the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:9–10) and is under God's judgment (Heb. 13:4). Thus, a destructive libertinism (2 Pet. 2:14) goes hand in hand with doubts about the return of Christ and the judgment to follow (3:3–7).

2. Jesus' severe condemnation of adultery does not exclude God's mercy to the repentant sinner, whose conversion he desires (Lk. 18:9–14; cf. 1 Cor. 6:9–11). Thus the adulteress in Jn. 8:3–11, who had earned the death penalty, had her guilt forgiven while the apparently guiltless multitude had a mirror held up to their hypocritical self-righteousness. However, all impenitent sinners are excluded from the kingdom (1 Tim. 1:10; Heb. 13:4; Rev. 21:8; 22:15).

3. The theme of adultery is used in the NT, as in OT prophecy, in a metaphorical sense (cf. Jas. 4:4, where adulterers are considered lovers of the world). Similarly the Jewish people are called "a wicked and adulterous generation," esp. as exemplified by their religious representatives: Pharisees, teachers of the law (Matt. 12:39), and Sadducees (16:4). A metaphorical explanation is most likely here. This contemporary generation, a people shown to be disloyal to God by their rejection of Jesus (cf. Mk. 8:38), is characterized by its desire for a sign when there is already enough proof of God's love present in Jesus.

See also gameō, marry (1138); nymphē, bride (3811); koitē, bed, marriage bed, intercourse (3130); hyperakmos, past the peak, begin to fade; be overpassionate (5644).

3659 (moichos, adulterer), → 3658.

3662 μολύνω

μολύνω (molynō), defile, befoul (3662); μολυσμός (molysmos), defilement (3663).

CL & OT The lit. meaning of molynō is besmear, soil, by applying mud or other filth. It is used in ethical and religious contexts for actions that demean and pollute oneself and/or others, esp. in sexual matters. molysmos has a comparable range of meaning.

In the LXX, molynō occurs 19x, used both lit. (dirtying feet and clothes, Gen. 37:31; Song 5:3; Isa. 59:3) and fig. (causing defilement before God, 65:4; Jer. 23:11). molysmos occurs only in Jer. 23:15; 1 Esd. 8:82; 2 Macc. 5:27.

NT molynō is used in its metaphorical sense 3x in the NT: in 1 Cor. 8:7, of a weak conscience that is defiled, i.e., made to feel guilty, through doing things about which one has scruples; in Rev. 3:4; 14:4, of not lapsing into impure, disobedient ways. molysmos appears only in 2 Cor. 7:1 for the defilement that comes from a pagan lifestyle.

See also miainō, defile (3620).

3663 (molysmos, defilement), → 3662.

3665 (monē, staying, tarrying, dwelling place, room, abode), → 3531.

3666 (monogenēs, only), → 3668.

3667 (monon, only), → 3668.

3668 μόνος

μόνος (monos), alone, only (3668); μονογενής (monogenēs), only (3666); μόνον (monon), only (3667).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. monos means only, lonely, alone; in an extended sense it means unique. The adv. monōs or monon (neut.) means only, solely. The uses of the adj. and the adv. run into one another.

2. In the LXX monos can mean in separation from or in solitude from. To be alone implies a troubled mind and restlessness (e.g., Isa. 49:21; Jer. 15:17, where the prophet, bent down by God's hand and cut off from human contact, sits alone). This sense is also found in Gen. 2:18, where God says that "it is not good for the man to be alone. I will make a helper suitable for him."

monos is frequently used for God's uniqueness (e.g., Deut. 32:12; Job 9:8). It occurs in confessional statements in 2 Ki. 19:15, 19; Isa. 37:16. It occurs frequently in Ps. (e.g., 4:8; 51:4; 148:13) and is thus used in statements about the exclusive worship of the one God (e.g., Exod. 22:20; Ps. 71:16). Ezek. 14:16 shows that the righteous alone will be delivered. Exod. 24:2 uses monos to stress Moses' uniqueness. monos can be intensified. Thus in 1 Ki. 19:10, 14, Elijah, persecuted by Jezebel, says in his despondency that he has survived being monōtatos, utterly alone, as the Lord's prophet.

NT 1. monos is found 48x in the NT and monon (neut. used as adv.) 66x. (a) The adv. means "only" (Matt. 9:21; 1 Cor. 15:19); "not only ... but also" (Matt. 21:21); "not only ... but now much more" (Phil. 2:12). (b) The adj. can mean alone, unaccompanied (Matt. 17:8; Jn. 8:16; Rom. 11:3); alone, by oneself (Mk. 4:10; Lk. 9:18); single (Jn. 12:24); without any help (Lk. 10:40). (c) With a noun or pron. monos means only in the sense of exclusively (e.g., Matt. 12:4; Heb. 9:7; Rev. 15:4). (d) The word can also denote the one and only God (Jn. 17:3; Jude 4, 25).

2. monos becomes theologically significant when it is used in the confession of the one and only God, esp. in doxologies (Jn. 5:44; Rom. 16:27; 1 Tim. 1:17; 6:15–16). It is significant that the confession of the one holy God in Rev. 15:4 is found in the song of the martyrs who "had been victorious over the beast" (15:2). Similarly in Jn. 17:3, monos is linked with "true," presumably in contrast to the deceptive appearance of all other gods and revealers; in 5:44 it stands in contrast to the false praise of the world, which does not seek the true praise (doxa, → 1518) of the one and only God.

3. There is a dialectic use of monos in regard to Jesus. On the one hand, the earthly Jesus is not "alone" even if all forsake him, since the Father is with him (Jn. 8:16, 29; 16:32). On the other hand, in Jude 4 Jesus is called without qualification "our only Sovereign and Lord" (cf. Jn. 20:28; Rom. 9:5; Tit. 2:13).

4. monogenēs (lit., of a single kind) is found as a Christological title only in Jn. This word marks out Jesus as unique, above all earthly and heavenly beings, yet the soteriological meaning is more strongly stressed than that of ontology or origin (Jn. 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18; 1 Jn. 4:9). It reflects what the OT says of Isaac (Gen. 22:2, 12, 16; cf. Heb. 11:17, where monogenēs is used). Jesus as monogenēs is the only one who can say, "I and the Father are one" (Jn. 10:30). Included in the uniqueness of God, Jesus does not disappear in history and the historical, but stands over them as Lord.

See also hapax, once (562); heis, one (1651).

3671 μορφή

μορφή (morphē), form, outward appearance, shape (3671); σύμμορφος (symmorphos), having the same shape, similar in form or appearance (5215); συμμορφίζω (symmorphizō), be conformed to, take on the same form as (5214); μόρφωσις (morphōsis), embodiment, formulation, outward form, appearance (3673); μορφόω (morphoō), form, shape (3672).

CL & OT 1. (a) By and large in cl. Gk. morphē denotes form in the sense of outward appearance. It can also mean the embodiment of the form, the person insofar as he or she comes into view. Gk. philosophy was concerned with the question of matter and form. Plato presents Socrates as saying that an exact description of the nature of the soul will enable us to see "whether she be single and the same, or, like the morphē of the body, multiform" (Phaedr., 271). Aristotle worked out a more precise set of concepts. He distinguished matter (hylē) from form (morphē, also eidos). Matter has within itself a great number of possibilities for becoming a form and thus becoming manifest as a form.

These concepts do not imply that form and matter are separable, as husk and kernel are. Rather, they represent different principles and ways of looking at the same object. The outward appearance cannot be detached from the essence of the thing; the essence of the thing is indicated by its outward form.

(b) Similarly, morphōsis means embodiment, receiving form; symmorphos, having the same form; symmorphizō, to take on the same form; and metamorphoō, to be transformed (→ 3565).

(c) Of special interest is the use of morphē in the lit. of Gnosticism and the Hel. mystery religions. The main issue here is the transformation of a human into divine form. It is not merely the external appearance that is changed. Rather, the external can recede behind that of essential character. The external appearance is undoubtedly meant not as an antithesis to the essential character, but as the expression of it. Thus the Hel. mystery religions contain a great number of stories about transformations. The initiate is transformed by dedication and rites into divine substances and so is deified.

2. morphē occurs 12x in the LXX (e.g., Job 4:16; Isa. 44:13; Dan. 3:19). The OT spoke of God in anthropological terms. Inevitably humans have to speak of God in this way. Gen. 18:1–2 may be taken to mean that God appeared to Abraham in the form of three men, although the LXX never uses morphē to speak of the form of God.

3. Jewish apocalyptic expected a transformation of the present world at some point in the future. According to 2 Bar. 51:1, when that appointed day has passed, the appearance of sinners is transformed, so that those who have acted righteously appear glorified.

NT morphē and its cognates occur only rarely in the NT. morphē occurs only 3x. By and large the words in this group are confined to Paul's writings.

1. It is a matter of debate whether Phil. 2:6–11 forms a single unit and whether Paul incorporated into his letter an already existing hymn. Nevertheless, there is a virtual consensus that these verses do constitute a hymn about Christ in which the expressions en morphē theou ("in the form [NIV, very nature] of God") and morphēn doulou ("the form [NIV, very nature] of a servant") occur. The prep. en does not mean that the essential nature of Christ was different from the form, as if it were an outer shell or a part played by an actor. Rather, it means that the essential nature of Christ is defined as a divine nature, which is thought of as existing "in" divine substance and power.

Regarding this divine mode of existence, the hymn says that Christ existed in it in the past ("being," 2:6). The word used here for "being" (hyparchō) suggests Christ's preexistence prior to his incarnation. en morphē theou characterizes, therefore, that existence before his earthly life. But then he "emptied himself" (NIV, "made himself nothing"), taking the morphēn doulou ("form of a servant"). Some interpreters see this as a new form that replaced the "form of God," that is, that Christ's mode of being was essentially changed from a divine one to a human, servant one. Most evangelicals, however, regard Christ as adding on a human form (nature) without divesting himself of his divine form or nature. (For further comments, → kenos, 3031.)

Christ's new mode of existence in his earthly life is described as that of a "servant." This has been interpreted in various ways. According to some, Christ entered into a mode of existence that was under bondage and serfdom to the rule of cosmic powers and the elements of the world. It is perhaps best, however, to see this as a title of honor, corresponding to the Servant of the Lord in Isa. 53, who suffered on our behalf.

2. Phil. 3:21 contains the word symmorphos, in that Christ, by his power, will some day "transform" (on this word, → schēma, 5386) our bodies so that they "will be like his glorious body." The thought here is not that of clothing, in the sense that Christ covers over our essential character, but that of the essential transformation of the lowly body into a completely different glorified body. symmorphos does not mean becoming like, similar, or equal. Rather, it signifies an existence in Christ whose own mode of body permeates us without dissolving our own persons. Christ and ourselves are not sharply separated individuals according to the modern understanding of personality. We have our existence in the realm of the power of Christ.

In addition, Rom. 8:29 declares that "those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness (symmorphous tēs eikonos) of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers." This passage presupposes that Christ is the image of God, that in Christ God is really present. Again, symmorphos means here that we will not only be similar to or like Christ but that we will come into the same realm of power as he is in. We will be identified with the same substance and enter into the same essential nature as Christ. Nevertheless, within this relationship Christ retains separate identity ("the firstborn among many brothers"; cf. also 2 Cor. 3:18).

Phil. 3:10 relates the word symmorphizō to Christ's death: "I want to know Christ and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of sharing in his sufferings, becoming like him (symmorphizomenos) in his death." The thought here is not that Paul might through martyrdom become like Jesus on the cross but that in his suffering he sees the death of Christ becoming a reality in his own death. The death of Christ acquires a morphē in the death of the apostle. The death of Jesus is not simply a historical datum of the past for Paul. It is a present event. Still, here too Paul and Christ remain two separate personalities.

3. In Gal. 4:19 Paul speaks of being "in the pains of childbirth until Christ is formed (aor. pass. of morphoō) in you." Paul's thought is that of coming into the world as a child comes into the world through conception and birth. Christ himself is to be formed in the Galatians in the reality of their being.

4. Rom. 2:20 refers to the Jew as "an instructor of the foolish ... because you have in the law the embodiment (morphōsis) of knowledge and truth." This may be a reference to a Jewish work of propaganda that contained the word morphōsis in its title. Knowledge and truth are contained in the law and are really present in it.

5. The passages cited above may reflect the religious background of Gnosticism and the mystery cults, but that is not the case of the remaining passages. In 2 Tim. 3:5

Paul speaks of those "having a form (morphōsis) of godliness but denying its power." Here morphōsis means "appearance." The heretics are not really pious; they are only apparently devout.

6. In the longer ending of Mk. Jesus is reported to have appeared "in a different form (morphē)" (16:12). If, as seems likely, this refers to the incident recorded in Luke 24:13–32, the two people on the way to Emmaus did not recognize Jesus until he broke the bread. But Mark does not raise or answer the question as to how Jesus' form was in fact different from the pre-resurrection Christ.

See also eidos, form, outward appearance, sight (1626); schēma, outward appearance, form, shape (5386); hypostasis, substantial nature, essence, confidence (5712).

3672 (morphoō, form, shape), → 3671.

3673 (morphōsis, embodiment, outward form, appearance), → 3671.

3677 (mochthos, labor, hardship), → 3160.

3679 (myeō, initiate, instruct), → 3696.

3680 μῦθος

μῦθος (mythos), myth, story (3680).

CL & OT 1. (a) Homer uses mythos of any kind of speech and even of unspoken thought, a plan conceived in the mind. More particularly he uses this word of a story, whether true or false. In this usage there is no distinction between mythos and logos (→ 3364). Gradually, however, a distinction appeared between mythos, fiction, and logos, factual narrative.

(b) When philosophical debate leads Plato so far on his quest that he cannot proceed further, the poet in Plato takes over and expresses in the form of an imaginative story or parable (mythos) the insight that is the goal of his quest. mythos was also a technical term in cl. Gk. for the plot of a tragedy or comedy. The mythos was a sacred story involving the gods, and the drama was the ritual enactment of the story.

2. The term myth has been frequently used in studies of the OT, esp. to describe what are perceived as religious rituals of Near Eastern culture adapted in the Heb. religious practices. But this word has nothing to do with the use of mythos in the LXX. In fact, mythos rarely occurs in the LXX, and only in the Apocr. In Sir. 20:19 an ungracious man is compared to "an inappropriate story [mythos] . . . on the lips of the ignorant." In Bar. 3:23 "the story-tellers [mythologoi] and the seekers for understanding have not learned the way to wisdom." The word here has its most general sense of story.

NT 1. In NT mythos is found only in the Pastoral Letters and 2 Pet., always in a disparaging sense. Timothy is told to forbid "certain men" at Ephesus from devoting "themselves to myths and endless genealogies" (1 Tim. 1:4). The context suggests a Jewish element in these myths (cf. a similar injunction in Tit. 3:9). Presumably the heresy here warned against was a mixture of Jewish and incipient gnostic speculation. The "godless myths and old wives' tales" of 1 Tim. 4:7 are probably of the same sort, as are the "myths" into which hearers with "itching ears" are led astray by false teachers (2 Tim. 4:3–4) or the "Jewish myths" that the Cretan Christians must be admonished to refuse to hear (Tit. 1:14).

These myths are subversive of sound faith and are set in contrast to "the truth." The gospel belongs to a different category. It is a record of fact, for "we did not follow cleverly invented stories [mythos] when we told you about the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eyewitnesses . . ." (2 Pet. 1:16).

2. The term myth became popular in NT studies with R. Bultmann's so-called program of demythologizing the NT. He felt that the gospel, if it is to make proper impact in contemporary society, must be freed from those features that belong to the worldview of the culture in which it was first preached: e.g., the three-stage universe (cf. Phil. 2:10), the concept of our world as open to invasion by transcendent powers, the preexistent Christ, his virgin birth, his historical resurrection, and the personal activity of the Holy Spirit. While his aim of making Christianity relevant in the modern world may have been noble, he had to deny much of what the Bible presents as fact, esp. anything miraculous. In our post-modern world, people are much more ready to accept the active intervention of God in the world of space and time.

Quite different is the approach of C. Williams, C. S. Lewis, and others, who maintain that in Christianity the ancient myths have come true; in other words, when God became a human being, as Lewis put it, "Myth became Fact," so that the aspirations and insights of the human soul that have from ancient times found mythological expression have been given a satisfying answer in the historical events of the gospel.

3683 (mylikos, belonging to a mill), → 3345.

3684 (mylinos, belonging to a mill), → 3345.

3685 (mylos, mill, millstone), → 3345.

3693 (myron, ointment, perfume), → 5043.

3696 μυστήριον

μυστήριον (mystērion), mystery, secret (3696); μυέω (myeō), initiate, instruct (3679).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. mystērion comes from myō, to shut (the mouth), and means that which must not or cannot be said. The pl. is almost exclusively a technical term for festivals such as those that took place in Eleusis from the 17th cent. B.C. on and were widespread during the Hel. period as the mysteries associated with Isis, Attis, Mithras, etc. grew. The mystery celebration gave a ceremonial and dramatic representation of the deity suffering and overcoming death. The initiated attained salvation and deification by sharing in the deity's fortunes through sacramental acts such as baptism, cultic feasts, and ceremonies of death and resurrection. The cultic acts and symbols were kept strictly secret. myeō meant originally to initiate into the mysteries and then took on the meaning of to instruct, teach.

(b) As early as Plato, ideas and terms from the mystery cults were transferred to philosophy. He describes the path of knowledge for immutable being as the path of true initiation. In later mystic philosophy, esp. in Neoplatonism, mystērion is that which by its very nature cannot be put into words. Mystic speech is the negation of speech.

(c) In Gnosticism the mystēria become secret revelations granted only to the "perfect" (teleioi), with a view to the redemption of their souls.

2. (a) In the LXX mystērion occurs only in later writings, i.e., those belonging to the Hel. period; the same is true of apokalypsis, revelation (→ apokalyptō, reveal, 636), in its theological sense of the revelation of a mystery. In general the OT stresses that God's words and deeds in history are openly manifest in that they take place before the eyes of the whole world. Numerous passages demonstrate this. For example,

God does not speak in secret (Isa. 45:19; 48:16). Amos 3:7 would likewise take issue with the concept of "mystery" in the mystery religions: "Surely the Sovereign LORD does nothing without revealing his plan to his servants the prophets."

(b) When mystērion does occur in the LXX, mystery terminology can sometimes refer to heathen cults (Wis. 14:23). Nevertheless, in 2:22; 6:22 the way to divine wisdom is described approvingly in terms of mysteries. But even here (6:22) the authentic OT note is still sounded in that the way of wisdom is faithfully and uncompromisingly set forth.

(c) Dan. uses the word mystērion in a definite theological sense, that of "eschatological secret," the vision of what God has decreed will take place in the future (2:28). When given in the form of a dream, it can be interpreted only by a Spirit-inspired seer (4:6, 18), for the revelation of mysteries belongs to God alone (2:28–29).

(d) In writings other than Wis. and Dan., mystērion occurs with secular meanings, such as the secret plans of a political leader (Tob. 12:7; Jdt. 2:2), military secrets (2 Macc. 13:21), or secrets shared among friends (Sir. 22:22; 27:16–17, 21).

3. The use of mystērion in Dan. serves as a transition to the special use of the term in intertestamental Jewish apocalyptic, where mystēria can denote eschatological events: e.g., the judgment and punishment of sinners (1 Enoch 38:3), the reward of the righteous (103:2–4), and the cosmic upheaval at the denouement of world history (83:7). Future events, insofar as they belong to the divine decrees, are present realities in the heavenly sphere and are revealed in vision to the apocalyptic seer. He knows even now about "the approach of the ages" (2 Bar. 81:4), and what must, of divine necessity, come to pass in the last days. But what he beholds remains a secret in that he may pass it on only in symbolic, oracular language and for the exclusive benefit of a given circle of initiates (2 Esd. 12:36–38).

4. (a) In rab. lit. there are also references to "secrets" in connection with the interpretation of the written and oral tradition. The secrets of the Torah reveal the inner workings of the Lawgiver's mind and, being also "the secrets of creation," throw light on his purposes for the world (cf. 3 Enoch 11:1). Such secrets are part of an esoteric scheme of doctrine reminiscent of Gnosticism.

(b) In true apocalyptic tradition the Qumran texts speak of the secrets that God has prepared for humans, frequently in stereotyped association with wonders or miracles. The "wondrous secrets" are God's decrees, according to which, in strictly dualistic and predestinarian fashion, he has set apart one section of humankind, the sons of righteousness, for the way of light (1QS 3:20), and the other section, the sons of evil, for the way of darkness (3:21). Certain people are given the ability to interpret these mysteries. The secrets give information about God's purposes for the world from its beginning to its end: about his creation, his deeds in history, and cultic arrangements, interpreted along the lines of Qumran observance. All this is arrived at through a kind of spiritual exegesis of the written tradition, with correction and reinterpretation of existing prophecies.

NT In the NT mystērion is comparatively rare, occurring only 28x. It is significant that it is found most frequently (21x) in Paul, perhaps because it is here that the mystery cults and Gnosticism were most prominent. mystērion occurs in the pl. in Matt. 13:11; Lk. 8:10; 1 Cor. 4:1; 13:2; 14:2; everywhere else it is sing.

1. Mk. emphasizes that with Jesus, the kingdom of God has arrived (1:14–15). In 4:11, Jesus stresses that "the secret" of his kingdom and its appearing are expressed in his parables. The meaning of the parables, i.e., Christ's teaching as a whole, has to do with his way to the cross. Only this will usher God's kingdom into the world. One of the ideas basic to Mk.'s Gospel is that neither the people nor the disciples realized until after the resurrection that this way to the cross was according to God's will (cf. 3:35), even though the Twelve had received clear teaching on the matter (see 8:32–38; 9:31–32; 10:33–34). Only the evil spirits knew from the beginning that the turning point of the ages had come (1:24).

In Matt. 13:11 and Lk. 8:10 (the par. to Mk. 4:11), the pl. "secrets" is used. This pl. does not stress the messianic secret, but rather indicates that the decrees of God concerning Christ and his church, latent in the OT but now explainable to the disciples, are at last being fulfilled (cf. the frequent references to the fulfillment of OT prophecies: e.g., Matt. 2:17, 23; 3:3). Christ's way of suffering and that of his church are a matter of divine necessity (24:26) and will issue in the glory of heaven (cf. 23:43; Acts 7:55).

2. The mystery with which Paul firmly confronts his opponents in 1 Cor. is that of the cross of Christ, revealing as it does God's redemptive decree for the world. Paul is concerned to set before humans only Jesus Christ and him crucified (1 Cor. 2:2; cf. 1:23). This is the essence of "the mystērion of God" (2:1; NIV reads matryrion, testimony [→ matryria, 3456], though mystērion is a well-attested variant). Although the apostle uses terminology of the "mystery" religions (teleioi, "perfect," NIV "mature," 2:6; en mystēriō, "in a mystery," NIV "secret," 2:7; psychikos "physical," NIV "without the Spirit," and pneumatikos, "spiritual," 2:14–15), he interprets this "mystery" in an eschatological manner.

Before the beginning of time God in his wisdom, through the prophets, predestined the cross of Christ to our glory, i.e., with a view to our glorification at the end of time (1 Cor. 2:7; cf. Rom. 16:25). That which has already been prepared in heaven and promised in OT prophecy has now taken place in time and history (1 Cor. 1:19 quotes Isa. 29:14; 1 Cor. 2:9 quotes Isa. 64:4). The rulers of this age have not known the secret of the divine decree (1 Cor. 2:6); but those who have been enlightened by the Spirit (2:12) now acknowledge it in humble submission. Paul is left speechless before its unfathomable depth (1:23; 2:3), yet his grasp of it is sufficient to bind him irresistibly to its service for life (9:16) and to rule out all boasting of self (1:31; 3:21).

Only thus, in weakness and humility, are the apostles, as servants of the crucified Christ, "entrusted with the secret things [mystēria] of God" (1 Cor. 4:1). They submit to the "administration [oikonomia, → 3873] of this mystery" (Eph. 3:9). Their sole ground of boasting is that in spite of all their weakness and insufficiency, God can still use them as instruments of his grace (1 Cor. 1:26–27; 2 Cor. 1:12).

3. In most cases, wherever mystērion occurs in the NT, it is found with vbs. denoting revelation or proclamation, i.e., the mystērion is something that is revealed. In a sense, it is no longer secret, for it is now being revealed; it may have been hidden in the past, but today it is something dynamic and compelling.

This is vividly expressed in Col. By his office Paul discloses (Col. 1:26) or proclaims the mystery of Christ (4:3). By bearing in his own body that which "is still lacking in regard to Christ's afflictions" (1:24), Paul gives practical expression to the "mystery" and carries it on toward its final consummation. The riches of the mystery (1:27) are summed up as "Christ in you, the hope of glory" i.e., the worldwide church with Christ as its head, having reconciled humanity to himself through his death (1:18, 20). This was concealed from earlier generations (1:26), but now people have been appointed to proclaim it to all (1:28), so that all may share in the power of the firstborn from the dead (1:18) and be incorporated into his resurrection body (1:28).

In Eph. also the mystery of Christ is essentially the fact that through Christ the Gentiles have been given access to the Father of all creation (3:15; cf. 2:18; also Rom. 16:25). They are members of the worldwide church of Jews and Gentiles, described in Eph. 1:22–23 as a body whose "head" is the pivot of all creation and in 2:20–21 as a building whose "chief cornerstone" is Jesus Christ. This mystery was God's will before time began (3:9; cf. 1:9) and was all part of his great purpose and plan (3:6). It was kept secret in the past, but now, since the time is fulfilled (1:10), God has made known his will to those who proclaim the gospel (3:8), that through them his purpose may come to fulfillment (1:9–10). This mystery is now being proclaimed throughout the whole world, though it is meeting with much opposition along the way (6:19).

The only other Christological passage with the word mystērion is 1 Tim. 3:9, 16, where the "deep truths [mystērion] of the faith" and "the mystery [mystērion] of godliness [or our religion]" both refer to the confession of Christ and his redeeming work; i.e., mystērion here is a paraphrase for a formulated confession of faith.

4. The same divine economy that directs the course of history toward its predestined goal also concerns itself with the destiny of Israel. In Rom. 11:1 the apostle is appalled at the thought that God may have rejected his people, even though their present hardness of heart might lend color to the idea. Against all the dictates of reason and experience (11:9–19, 25a), he unfolds "the mystery" of God's final acceptance of his chosen people. Israel has been stricken with blindness only for a limited period, in order that the gospel may have free course among the Gentiles and that their fullness (plērōma; → plēroō, to fulfill, 4444) may come in. Believing Gentiles, knowing that they are now God's elect people, are to respond not with pride or arrogance but with reverent, adoring fear (11:20). They are also to be humbled by the fact that the Jews who at present are hard of heart will one day be saved. Truly the mystery of free grace is unfathomable (11:33–36)!

5. (a) In 1 Cor. 14 Paul warns against too high an estimation of speaking with tongues. In his judgment it is subordinate to preaching, for to outsiders it is not intelligible of itself and does not serve to build up the church (14:2, 16). The "mysteries" uttered in ecstatic, unintelligible sounds need to be interpreted (14:13), and in any case no such ecstatic experience of divine mysteries can bear comparison with love (13:2).

(b) Paul writes 1 Cor. 15:51 in the light of the imminence of Christ's Parousia. He reveals to the Corinthians "a mystery," namely, that on the day of resurrection, which is imminent, all those still living will be changed into imperishable bodies (cf. Phil. 3:20–21).

(c) In Eph. 5:32 Paul uses mystērion with reference to his interpretation of Gen. 2:24, that ultimately it refers to the relationship between Christ and his church. The apostle's phrase "I am talking about" excludes other interpretations.

(d) The context of 2 Thess. 2:7 deals with the events that are to precede the Parousia. Before Christ returns, there will come a period of apostasy, in which the "man of lawlessness" will gain the upper hand (2:3–4). At present there is a power that hinders his appearing, but already "the secret power [mystērion] of lawlessness" is working and the day of Antichrist is dawning (2:7).

6. In Rev. mystērion is used for apocalyptic events that, occurring in a time of distress, will precede the return of the Lord. These mysteries are presented in the form of OT symbols and metaphors that require interpretation. But God reveals them to his church through the mouth of the prophets (10:7) and through Jn., the seer (17:7; cf. 1:9). The victory is God's (18:2; 19:6), and this knowledge comforts his church as it passes through severe affliction and persecution.

Rev. 1:20 introduces the seven letters by referring to the "mystery" of the seven churches and their angels. As the mystery unfolds, these churches are enlightened as to their true standing in the eyes of God, who sees through all pretense of virtue and goodness, and they are exhorted to repent.

3701 (mōrainō, make foolish, pass. be foolish), → 3702.

3702 μωρία

μωρία (mōria), foolishness, folly (3702); μωραίνω (mōrainō), make foolish, pass. be foolish (3701); μωρός (mōros), foolish, stupid (3704); μωρολογία (mōrologia), foolish talk (3703); ἄφρων (aphrōn), foolish, senseless (933); ἀφροσύνη (aphrosynē), lack of sense, folly, foolishness (932).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. mōros means foolish, stupid; mōria, foolishness; and mōrainō, to be foolish, act foolishly, make foolish. The word group denotes inappropriate behavior, thought, or speech, both of single lapses as well as a permanent attribute. It is concerned equally with lack of knowledge and lack of discernment. Sometimes these words are used for a state of mental derangement or for one's behavior when acting under the influence of one's desires.

(b) aphrōn, senseless, foolish, and aphrosynē, lack of sense, foolishness, indicate lack of insight and reason, esp. deficient perception of value and truth.

2. (a) The Heb. words for fool, foolish, and folly (from kāsal) are usually rendered in the LXX by aphrōn (used 134x total in the LXX) or aphrosynē (36x). nābal, also common, is rendered by aphrōn mainly in Job and Ps., but by mōros in Deut. and Isa. The instances based on nābal are unequivocal in insisting that foolishness is not lack of knowledge but rebellion against God. Hence, a fool is one who denies God, a blasphemer (cf. Ps. 14:1; 53:1; Isa. 32:5–6; Sir. 50:26). Such a person also destroys fellowship with other humans (see Ps. 39:8; Isa. 32:6; Jer. 17:11).

(b) For the Qumran community the one who remains outside the fellowship is counted a fool (CD 15:15). Wisdom and folly lie struggling together in the human heart (1QS 4:24). Folly is listed as one of the major sins (4:9–11), which will be annihilated at the end of time (4:12–14).

NT In the NT the aphrōn word group is found 15x, whereas the mōria group numbers 22x. The latter occur esp. in Matt. and in Paul's letters.

1. Synoptic Gospels. (a) The picture of salt becoming insipid (mōrainō, Matt. 5:13; Lk. 14:34) may have its background in Jesus' promise that the gospel, like salt, must never lose its force. The saying is shaped as a warning to take care that we do not let the gospel become insipid in our lives.

(b) The meaning of the term of abuse "you fool [mōros]!" in Matt. 5:22 is disputed (see also rhaka, 4819). The best interpretation still appears to be the association of this word with the word "godless" (cf. Matt. 23:17).

(c) mōros is used in parables by Matt. as an opposite to phronimos, wise (7:24–27; 25:1–13; → phroneō, to think, 5858). Here, too, the associated sense deriving from the OT plays a role: Foolishness is not stupidity but rebellion against God. People prove themselves foolish when they decline God's offer and fall into judgment. Obedience is the prudence of believers (cf. the parable of the rich fool, aphrōn, Lk. 12:20).

2. Paul's letters. (a) Paul uses mōria and mōros to characterize the preaching of the cross over against the wisdom of the world, which rejects the cross of Christ (1 Cor. 1:23); in Corinth this is part of the theology of the Corinthian spiritual party, which despised the lowliness of the apostle. To Paul, God has turned this sort of wisdom into foolishness through Christ's death on the cross (1:20; 3:19; see also sophia, wisdom, 5053).

The preaching of the cross, which appears so foolish, is in fact foolish merely from a worldly standpoint. After all, where else is power best displayed in weakness? Paul, therefore, contradicts the Corinthian spiritual party by explaining that the "foolishness [mōron] of God [i.e., his freely chosen way of dealing with the world in the cross of Christ] is wiser than man's wisdom, and the weakness of God is stronger than man's strength" (1 Cor. 1:25). To share in the folly of degradation of the cross means to share in the power of God (1:18), for God's "power is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. 12:9). This is why Paul can offer the paradoxical advice that one should become foolish in order to become wise (1 Cor. 3:18) and why he can call himself and the apostles "fools for Christ" (4:10).

(b) Paul uses aphrōn and aphrosynē in 2 Cor. 11–12 to define his boasting, which he feels forced into because of his opponents, who wished to be wise (phronimos, 11:19; cf. 11:1, 16–17, 21; 12:11 for aphrōn and aphrosynē). If it is appropriate, in a foolish way, to boast, the apostle can go along with them; but he decides to boast of his weakness (2 Cor. 11:30; 12:9).

(c) Paul calls on the believers in Ephesus not to be foolish but to inquire after the will of the Lord (Eph. 5:17). aphrōn stands here close to asophoi, unwise (5:15); obviously Christians should guard themselves from undisciplined behavior. In 5:4 Paul warns the believers to avoid "foolish talk" (mōrologia), which is out of place for them.

(d) In 2 Tim. 2:23 Paul warns against "foolish [mōros] and stupid arguments," that is, unprofitable discussions over hair-splitting minutiae such as genealogies and the law (Tit. 3:9), which only lead to senseless quarrels.

3. In 1 Pet. 2:15 Peter urges the congregation, by its good deeds, to "silence the ignorant talk of foolish men" and so to do God's will.

See also sophia, wisdom (5053); philosophia, love of wisdom, philosophy (5814).

3703 (mōrologia, foolish talk), → 3702.

3704 (mōros, foolish, stupid), → 3702.

3707 Μωϋσῆς

Μωϋσῆς (Mōysēs), Moses (3707).

OT 1. The Gk. form of the name Moses (from the LXX on) perhaps originates from Egyptian sources. The Bible describes this man's life in great detail. He lived 120 years (Deut. 34:7), forty years each in Egypt, Arabia, and the desert (cf. Acts 7:23, 30, 36).

2. The book of Exod. sets Moses' birth in the context of the history of the Israelites, who went to Egypt during a famine and remained there after Joseph's death. Whereas they had once been favored on his account, "a new king, who did not know about Joseph, came to power in Egypt" (1:8). Fearing the growth of this nation, this king subjected them to slavery, forcing them to work on the store cities of Pithom and Rameses (1:11). When Moses was born, there was a decree commanding the death of all male Israelites at birth (1:16, 22). Moses, however, was saved by being hidden in a basket among the reeds along the bank of the Nile and by being found and adopted by Pharaoh's daughter (2:1–10). His name is explained in 2:10 from the vb. māšâ, draw out, for she said, "I drew him out of the water." His own mother served as his nurse.

As a young man, Moses killed an Egyptian beating a fellow Israelite and then fled for his life to Midian in the Arabian Peninsula (Exod. 2:11–15), where he adopted a nomadic way of life, marrying Zipporah, the daughter of Reuel or Jethro (cf. 2:18 with 3:1), a priest of Midian; she bore Moses a son, Gershom (2:16–22). When Yahweh heard the groaning of his people in Egypt (2:23–25), he revealed himself to Moses in the theophany of the burning bush at Horeb, the mountain of God, declaring his name and commissioning Moses to lead his people out of Egypt "into the land of the Canaanites, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites and Jebusites—a land flowing with milk and honey" (3:17).

Initially Moses was to ask Pharaoh to let the people go three days' journey into the desert to sacrifice to Yahweh. When Moses hesitated to assume this daunting task, he was given signs (Exod. 4:1–9) and was permitted to let Aaron, his brother, be his spokesman (4:10–17). Moses returned to Egypt and, together with Aaron, delivered Yahweh's call to the people of Israel, who responded in faith (4:27–31). They then confronted Pharaoh with the request to let the people go into the desert to sacrifice to Yahweh. Pharaoh responded by doubling the burdens of the Israelites (5:1–23). Then follows the ten great plagues sent on Egypt (7:14–12:30). The final one was the slaying of every firstborn son throughout Egypt (11:1–12:30), though Israelite families were spared as they celebrated the Passover for the first time (12:1–28). At this point Pharaoh relented and the exodus commenced (12:31–42).

The Israelites were guided by a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. After the miraculous crossing of the Red (or Reed) Sea, the people headed out into the desert. They frequently grumbled for want of food and water; they were supplied with quail and manna (Exod. 16) and with water from a struck rock (17:1–7). The Israelites eventually arrived at Mount Sinai, where Moses and the people prepared to receive a fresh revelation (19:1–13). They received the Ten Commandments (19:14–20:17) and various other laws for the community (21:1–23:33), and Moses renewed the covenant between Yahweh and Israel (24:1–18). Details of the tabernacle and its contents were given to Moses by God (25:1–31:18).

While Moses was with Yahweh on Mount Sinai, the people turned back to the worship of other gods, symbolized in the golden calf made by Aaron, which Moses destroyed after his return from Mount Sinai (Exod. 32). Moses' indignation led him to break the tablets of the law (32:19). Moses went back up the mountain, where Yahweh revealed his glory to Moses, though he was not allowed to see the Lord's face directly (33:12–23), and then renewed the tablets of the law (34:1–4). When Moses returned, he covered his shining face with a veil (34:28–35). The rest of Exod. tells how Moses superintended the building of the tabernacle (35:1–40:38).

In Num. 1:1–54 Moses is charged with numbering the people; 2:1–34 gives their camping and marching orders. In 10:11, the journey to the promised land continues. When the Israelites arrived at its border, spies were sent out, the majority of which inspired fear into the people that they would not be able take the land because of its walled cities and giants. As a result the people sought to return to Egypt. The Lord punished this rebellious nation by requiring them to wander in the desert for forty years until that unbelieving generation had died (13:1–14:35). Num. records several other rebellions by the Israelites, plus the abortive attempt of Balak to make Balaam curse Israel (22:1–24:25).

Deut. is presented as the renewal of the covenant with the Lord as the Israelites are once again on the border of Canaan. Deut. concludes with Moses' song (32:1–43), blessing (33:2–29), and death (34:1–12). He is permitted to see the promised land from Mount Pisgah, but not to enter it (34:4) because of his sin at Meribah (Num. 20:12). Deut. concludes with the declaration: "Since then, no prophet has arisen in Israel like Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face, who did all those miraculous signs and wonders . . ." (34:10–11).

The authorship of the Pentateuch has traditionally been ascribed to Moses, except of course the account of his own death. However, only the following passages are explicitly ascribed to him: the historical and legal narrative of Deut. 1:1–31:23, the song of Moses (32:1–43), and the blessing of Moses (33:1–29; cf. also Ps. 90). Note too the places where Moses writes what God tells him to write: Exod. 17:14; 20:1–17; 24:4, 7; Num. 33:2; Deut. 31:9.

3. In the Hel. world, information about Moses is found almost without exception in anti-Jewish utterances. Moses was regarded as lawgiver, organizer of the nation, and founder of the Jewish state, its capital, and temple. He was seen as the scorner of every cult or as a magician and a deceiver—his name was often used in magical formulas. Hecataeus and Posidonius alone spoke of Moses in terms of admiration.

Hel. Jud. produced its apologies in reply. Since the Hel. world regarded Egyptian culture as the most ancient, the apologists attributed this to the patriarchs and also extolled Moses as the discoverer of writing. Various other legends grew up surrounding Moses.

4. Throughout Palestinian Jud. Moses was the revealer without equal. For the rabbis, the prophets were simply the bearers of the oral tradition that Moses had received at Sinai, as were their successors, the scribes or teachers of the law (Matt. 23:2). Moses and his age were counted as the pattern of the messianic age, with a second exodus marking the inauguration of salvation. As Moses suffered, so also the redeemer will suffer. Moses was also named and celebrated as a lawgiver of Israel at Qumran.

NT Moses is the most frequently mentioned OT figure in the NT (80x; Abraham, 73x). Jesus shook the foundations of contemporary Jud. by coming forward as a revealer like Moses—not as his interpreter, as the OT prophets had been—preaching and living in the name of the final arrival of the kingdom of God. The NT tradition presents the relationship between Moses and Christ in differing ways.

1. Mark. Moses is recognized as lawgiver (Mk. 1:44). His law establishes the resurrection of the dead, contra the Sadducees (12:19, 26), and the commandment of Exod. 20:12, as against scribal tradition (Mk. 7:10–11; note that in 7:14–15 Jesus reveals his own new authority). At the transfiguration, Elijah and Moses appear; they had both suffered (as did Jesus) under the hatred of their own people (9:4–5). Peter misunderstands the heavenly appearance, thinking that it is an earthly one and that the new period in the desert has begun, since Moses, Elijah, and the Messiah are here united.

2. Matthew sees a close correspondence between Jesus and Moses. Just as the Israelites were called out of Egypt, so was Jesus (cf. Matt. 2:15 with Hos. 11:1; → plēroō, 4444). Jesus stayed in the desert for forty days without food and drink, as did Moses on Mount Sinai (Matt. 4:1–2; cf. Exod. 34:28). Above all, Jesus is the new lawgiver (cf. Matt. 5:1 with Exod. 19–20), who, like Moses, dispenses blessings (Matt. 5:3–11) as well as curses (23:13–36). The Mosaic teaching office of the scribes is recognized (23:2–3) but at the same time superseded in that, under the guidance of Jesus, one is to display a better righteousness than that of the Pharisees (5:17–20).

3. Luke sees Jesus' connection with Moses as given in the function of the prophet. Acts 3:22 and 7:37 quote Deut. 18:15 (cf. 18:18): "a prophet like me [Moses]." As Moses was mighty both in word and deed (Acts 7:22), so Jesus was a mighty prophet before

God and the people (Lk. 24:19; cf. 4:24; 7:16; 13:33). Like Moses, Jesus gives a share in his power and Spirit (10:1, 17–19) to his disciples, to the seventy-two, and to the whole church. Just as Moses suffered (Acts 7:25–29) and was disowned by the people, even though God had sent him as a ruler and redeemer (7:35), so Jesus had to be consigned to death by the chief priests and teachers of the law and raised by God to be ruler (Lk. 24:27, 44; cf. Acts 26:22; 28:23). Thus anyone who does not listen to Moses and the prophets will also not believe the one whom God resurrected (Lk. 16:29–31).

Despite accusations to the contrary, Stephen (Acts 6:11–14) and Paul (21:20–21; cf. also 18:18; 21:24–29) did not preach a regression from the customs of Moses. In fact, freedom from the requirement of circumcision was demanded by Paul, with Peter's concurrence, only for the non-Jews (15:1–21; cf. 16:3). But the righteousness of faith, which Jesus gives as a gift, Moses' law cannot bring (13:38).

4. Paul places Moses and Christ in antithesis to one another. As lawgiver (Rom. 5:14; 1 Cor. 9:9), Moses gives only the letter. The one who fulfills the righteousness of the law will live by it (Rom. 10:5), but true righteousness can only come by faith (10:6). Moses' "ministry that brought death" possesses only a fading glory (2 Cor. 3:7; cf. Gal. 3:17–25). By way of contrast, the "ministry that brings righteousness" (2 Cor. 3:9) possesses the Spirit and a permanent glory. To this day the Jews have a "veil" over their hearts "when Moses is read" (3:15). But the new Israel beholds the glory of the Lord "with unveiled faces" and is transformed from one degree of glory to another. All this comes from the Lord, who is the Spirit (3:17–18). If Jews open their hearts to the Lord, the veil will disappear (3:16), and Moses will be recognized as a witness to the true righteousness of God.

God chooses solely on the basis of his promise, not on the basis of human zeal (Rom. 9:15–16). Indeed, the calling of the Gentiles shows that Israel's law creates no privilege in God's sight (10:19). Baptism into Moses was a promise, not a natural law. Those baptized did indeed receive the gifts of the Spirit, but since they did not remain within the promise, they perished (1 Cor. 10:2–5).

5. John stands starkly opposed to Jud. The teaching of Jesus comes directly from God (Jn. 7:15); anyone who wants to do God's will should know that his teaching is from God (7:17). Yet none of the Jews truly keep the law, for they base their lives on its letter and not, as the law itself demands, on God and his revealer (7:19). In the end, Moses' law is surpassed by Jesus (1:17).

The people rightly recognize that Jesus is the promised prophet (Jn. 6:14), but in trying to make him king they fail to understand that his kingdom is not of this world (6:15; 18:36). The leaders of the people call themselves Moses' disciples, but in untruth (9:28–33). Jesus is the true bread of life, while those who ate the bread Moses gave them died (6:32–35, 48–51). Likewise, Moses lifted up the serpent in the desert to preserve people's earthly lives, but when Jesus is "lifted up," everyone who believes in him will have eternal life (3:14–15).

6. Hebrews stresses that the pattern given by Moses has been surpassed and fulfilled in Christ. Jesus' faithfulness is greater than Moses', because he, as the Son, came from God's high heaven and is not merely, like Moses, a servant in God's house (Heb. 3:2–6). Jesus is the high priest in the heavenly sanctuary, which Moses once saw and after which he patterned an earthly copy (8:5). The church of Christ is not led to Mount Sinai, which terrified Moses and the people with its fire, smoke, lightning, and thunder (12:18–19). Rather, we can approach the Lord with confidence. Yet we must not refuse him who is speaking (12:25), for judgment awaits those who spurn God. Moses is pictured in 11:23–29 as a pattern for faith, even in suffering.

7. There are three final isolated references in the NT to Moses. In Rev. 15:3 the passing through the sea is a pattern for the deliverance of the saints from suffering in the last days. Jude 9 is based on post-OT traditions preserved in the apocryphal Assumption of Moses, which said that Satan fought with Michael over the body of Moses. In 2 Tim. 3:8, Jannes and Jambres are the names tradition assigned to the Egyptian magicians who imitated Moses' miracle of turning a staff into a serpent (cf. Exod. 7:11).

N nu

3716 Ναζαρηνός

Ναζαρηνός (Nazarēnos), Nazarene, from Nazareth (3716); Ναζωραῖος (Nazōraios), Nazarene, from Nazareth (3717) .

NT 1. Since many in the 1st cent. had the name Jesus (→ Iēsous, 2652), it was necessary to distinguish among them with an additional appellation. Thus, Jesus is sometimes called in the Gospels "the son . . . of Joseph" (Lk. 3:23; 4:22; Jn. 1:45; 6:42) or even "Mary's son" (Mk. 6:3, evidently after Joseph's death). In addition the designation of Jesus as Nazarēnos or Nazōraios achieved importance and lasting significance. In the NT textual tradition these two words are sometimes given as alternates. This compels the conclusion that the writers and copiers saw no difference in meaning between them.

2. (a) Mk. consistently uses Nazarēnos (1:24; 10:47; 14:67; 16:6). Lk. 4:34 no doubt depends on Mk. 1:24 with its Nazarēnos; otherwise, Luke (except for Lk. 24:19) consistently uses Nazōraios (18:37; Acts 2:22; 3:6; 4:10; 6:14; 22:8; 26:9) and by this procedure expresses the fact that for him the two words mean the same. Matt. (2:23; 26:71) and Jn. (18:5, 7; 19:19) have only Nazōraios. Neither word occurs anywhere else in the NT. In most of these uses, the writers are communicating that Jesus came from Nazareth in Galilee.

(b) As a term to denote Christians in Gk. areas (Acts 24:5), Nazōraios ("the Nazarene sect") seems to have disappeared early in favor of Christianos (11:26), while it was retained in this sense in Jewish areas and survives today in Heb. noṣrî as a designation for one who believes in Jesus.

3. A word needs to be said about "Nazarene" in Matt. 2:23. Matt. sees Jesus' being brought up in Nazareth as a fulfillment of "what was said through the prophets: 'He will be called a Nazarene.'" Note first that there is no specific prophecy to this effect in any single OT text. But it seems clear from Jn. 1:46 ("Can anything good come from [Nazareth]?") that the town of Nazareth had undertones of dissociation and contempt (cf. 7:42, 52). There are several OT passages that clearly prophesy that the coming Messiah would be a man of contempt and lowliness (e.g., Ps. 22:6–8; 69:8, 20–21; Isa. 49:7; 53:2–3). Thus, the town of Jesus' upbringing led to the fulfillment of such prophecies, for he was considered without status or prestige in the surrounding world.

See also Iēsous, Jesus (2652); Christos, Christ (5986); Christianos, Christian (5985).

3717 (Nazōraios, Nazarene, from Nazareth), → 3716.

3724 ναός

ναός (naos), temple, shrine, sanctuary (3724).

CL & OT 1. (a) The noun naos originally meant a dwelling, esp. the dwelling of a god, a temple, or the innermost area of such. In the Hel. period heaven, as the dwelling of the gods, could also be described as naos. naos must consequently be distinguished from temenos (cf. Lat. templum, Eng. temple), which is older in terms of religious history but is not found in the NT. This word meant a space fenced in, or at least clearly marked, as being an area where a theophany once occurred and was expected again on the ground of tradition. It was usually a place marked out by nature: e.g., a grotto, rock cleft, or holy grove. In the special place, not made by human hands, the god appeared as a revealer, healer, or giver of fertility, though he did not dwell there.

(b) For the sake of clarity naos can thus be translated temple. Such temples are found, in the earliest days of human buildings, in various forms, such as temple towers, pillared temples, round temples, and even portable ones.

2. In the LXX naos is used 61x, 55 of which translate the Heb. hêkāl, palace, temple. As a building constructed as a dwelling for the gods, it is used for sacrifice, worship of the gods (idols), and oracles, and hence it requires a local priesthood. In 1 Chr. 28:11; 2 Chr. 8:12; 15:8; 29:7, 17, naos designates the temple porch.

(a) Even in the OT one may observe a distinct reserve in the use of the term hêkāl. The tower of Babel (Gen. 11), the places where the Philistines sacrificed (Jdg. 16:23–30), and the shrines at Bethel and Dan are never called by this word. The OT refers much more often to the temple by means of the simple Heb. term bayit (Gk. oikos), house. When religious sites are in view, only Solomon's edifice in Jerusalem (1 Ki. 6–7), and before that the shrine at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:9; 3:3), from which the ark of the covenant was finally brought to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6), are described as hêkāl.

(b) Whereas the OT thus uses its terminology to distinguish true worship from false, the LXX (except for Ps. 45:15) never uses naos where the Heb. hêkāl means palace; it uses oikos instead (e.g., 2 Ki. 20:18; Isa. 13:22). Thus, naos becomes a purely cultic term for the true temple of God. After the desecration of the temple in Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, the ruins are never called naos (cf. Ezr. 6:5). In Ps. 45:15, where the king's palace is called naos, the LXX seems to have adopted a symbolic interpretation of this ancient love song: The community is Yahweh's bride.

Ps. tends to focus attention on the temple not so much as a place of sacrifice and hence of the priesthood, but as the place above all others that is longed for (27:4), to which a cry for help (28:2) or an individual's worship is directed (5:7; 138:2), and hence where comfort (65:4), God's response (18:6), and God's might (68:28–29) can be found.

(c) In postexilic times, rather than being a national sanctuary, the temple gained a new significance for the prayers of the faithful, and as the symbol of the nation's longing it also became the sign of the new thing promised by God. This new view may have arisen because of the dangers that were apparent in the false sense of security that the preexilic Israelites saw in the existence of the Jerusalem temple. We cannot draw this distinction absolutely, however, for even before the exile, the temple was used for the prayers of the faithful, and after the exile sacrifices were offered there. Note also the high estimation of God's house to which the design of the new temple in Ezek. 40–43, the work of Hag., and the books of Macc. bear witness. The splendor of the new building erected by Herod the Great mainly between 19 and 9 B.C. was also an object of pride.

Yet as early as the 2d cent. B.C. a group of priests separated themselves from the temple because they regarded it as polluted by sin (CD 1:5–11). In doing so they clearly continued the prophetic tradition of criticism of the cult, and they founded in the desert of the Dead Sea at Qumran a community that regarded itself as the true sanctuary of God (cf. 1QS 8:5; 9:6). The place of the Jerusalem cultus was now taken by the chosen community, which lived in strict obedience to the Torah, awaiting the revelation of God's righteousness.

NT In the NT naos is found most frequently in Rev. (16x) and Paul (8x). The Synoptics use it for the most part only in the passion narrative (16x; esp. Matt., 9x), and the Johannine writings (apart from Jn. 2:19–21) do not use it at all.

1. Paul stands clearly on the basis of Jewish tradition when he speaks of the naos: The redeemed community is the temple of God (1 Cor. 3:16–17), and God's Spirit dwells in her (6:19; cf. 1 Ki. 8:16–17, where God's name dwells in the temple). If, however, the church allows itself to be led astray, the adversary dwells within her (2 Thess. 2:4). To be the community in which God makes his dwelling implies separation from the ungodly (2 Cor. 6:16). In Eph. 2:21 this concept is developed further.

In Acts 17:24 Paul declares to the Athenians that "the God who made the world and everything in it is the Lord of heaven and earth and does not live in temples [naos] built by hands." Acts 19:24 refers to "a silversmith named Demetrius, who made silver shrines [naos] of Artemis," which brought much business to Ephesus; he accused Paul of turning many people away by his preaching and teaching (19:26). Here naos refers to pagan temples.

2. The return to the language of the OT and Jud. is clearly evident in Rev. Those who conquer will be preserved and will adorn the heavenly temple (3:12; cf. Ps. 144:12). Indeed, just as Ezekiel's temple was measured (Ezek. 40–42), so the eschatological community will be (Rev. 11:1–2). The Apocalypse speaks often of the heavenly temple (7:15; 11:19; 14:15–17; 15:5–8; 16:1, 17). Yet in 21:22 it is expressly stated that in the new Jerusalem there will no longer be a naos, since God himself will be the temple for the community. God himself is the dwelling place of his people; the community and the temple are coextensive (21:3). Thus the central idea of the covenant promise "I will be your God, and you will be my people" will be fulfilled (→ diathēkē, covenant, 1347).

3. (a) In contrast to Paul and Rev., the Synoptics use naos with reference to the Jerusalem temple, which will be subject to eschatological criticism (cf. the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70, Mk. 11:15–17; 13:1–2) or at least in need of purification (Lk. 19:45–48). True, the Synoptic writers speak mostly of the hieron (→ 2639), but in several passages that reveal the influence of the OT they also use naos, temple. In Mk. 14:58 special importance is attached to a saying attributed to Jesus that he would destroy the temple and build it in three days (cf. Jn. 2:18–21); this statement (which presumably showed disrespect for the temple) was used as false evidence against him during his trial.

In Mk. 15:29, however, the saying is taken up by the mockers at the foot of the cross, and its secret meaning is revealed. It is not a matter of saving the physical body of Jesus, but rather of God's new creation, before which the old must pass away, i.e., a matter of death and resurrection. In keeping with this Matt., in his polemic against the Pharisees, attacks with particular severity the Jewish practice of swearing by the temple (Matt. 23:16–21): God does not want casuistry, but honesty and obedience.

(b) Luke places the temple in the setting of the history of salvation. The period before Jesus was a period of priestly service in the temple (naos), as Lk. 1:9, 21–22 illustrate with the narrative about Zechariah. It is true that Jesus repeatedly went to the temple (cf. Lk. 20–21) in order to teach there; but he kept to the outer courts (hieron), which were open to all Israelites, as did also the early Christian church at first (Acts 3:1–10, etc.). Not surprisingly Lk. also gives the greatest prominence to Jesus' teaching in the synagogues, where all Jews could assemble. This practice was continued in Acts, insofar as the apostles typically began their preaching in the synagogue.

See also hieron, temple (2639).

3738 νεκρός

νεκρός (nekros), dead, dead person (3738); νεκρόω (nekroō), put to death (3739); νέκρωσις (nekrōsis), death, deadness (3740).

CL & OT 1. As a noun nekros means dead person, corpse; as an adj., dead. The vb. nekroō, kill, put to death (more often used passively, die) and the noun nekrōsis, the process of dying or the state of being dead, are Hel. forms from the medical sphere; they indicate the mortification of a part of the body because of illness.

2. Stoic writers use nekros esp. in a fig. sense. They distinguish three criteria: (a) What is nekros is what is not controlled by the psychē, soul, or nous, mind. (b) nekros is the physical part of humans, i.e., the sōma, body—the part that one has in common with the animal world and that separates one from what is divine. (c) nekros describes that which does not accord with one's own standards of judgment, determined by nous. In sum, whatever does not come under the control of nous is dead.

3. In the LXX nekros occurs about 60x, both as a noun and as an adj. It usually means one who has died, a dead person, a corpse. It is consistently used of people who are in the state of death (e.g., Abraham's wife, Gen. 23:3–15). The dead are to be buried (Tob. 2:8; 12:12); it is regarded as a terrible punishment if they are left uncovered, to be eaten by animals (Deut. 28:26; Jer. 7:33; 19:7).

Num. 19 draws a boundary between the sphere of death and that of life. Those who come directly or indirectly in contact with the dead are unclean, i.e., separated from Yahweh. The dead know and see nothing (Eccl. 9:5; Isa. 26:14; cf. Ps. 88:4–5). God has no more dealings with them (88:10), and they do not praise him (115:17 = LXX 113:25). There is no hope for them (143:3; Wis. 13:10), and so "a live dog is better off than a dead lion" (Eccl. 9:4). This marks off Israel's religion sharply from the cult of the dead and the oracles of the dead that were so common in the surrounding world. Not until the exile do we find the clear beginnings of a hope for resurrection. This hope at first takes the form of a confidence that even death cannot separate from Yahweh (cf. Isa. 26:19; Sir. 48:5; cf. also Ezek. 37:9).

4. The lit. of Qumran does not depart from OT usage. But in rab. lit. a metaphorical use is occasionally found. The ungodly can be described as dead. In the Eighteen Benedictions mention is made of God, "who makes the dead to live."

NT 1. In the NT nekros, dead person, corpse, occurs 129x, both as an adj. and as a noun. nekroō, kill, is found 3x (Rom. 4:19; Col. 3:5; Heb. 11:12); nekrōsis, death, putting to death, occurs only at Rom. 4:19 and 2 Cor. 4:10. In Rom. 4:19 Paul makes use of the latter two words to indicate the ending of Abraham's and Sarah's capacity to have children (cf. Heb. 11:12). In 2 Cor. 4:10 nekrōsis tou Iēsou, the "death [dying] of Jesus," which the apostle speaks of carrying about in his own body, refers to the symptoms of a loss of strength and suffering marked by death. It is, as it were, a sharing in the passion of Christ that takes place in this life.

2. The NT use of nekros differs from both cl. Gk. usage and the OT. Death is no longer a final state for humans but must be viewed in the light of Jesus' resurrection. No less than 75x nekros is the obj. of egeirō, awaken, anastasis, resurrection, or cognate words. In addition to this are combinations with such words as zōopoieō, make alive (e.g., Rom. 4:17), and prōtotokos, firstborn (e.g., Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:5).

(a) This association of terms gives expression to a set of doctrines underlying them. The basis of the Christian proclamation lies in the fact that God raised Jesus from the dead (e.g., Acts 3:15; 4:10; 10:40–41; 13:30, 34), that he is the "firstborn from among the dead" (Col. 1:18), and that he is "the Living One" (Rev. 1:18). This testimony is most extensively developed in 1 Cor. 15:3–57.

(b) In the OT it was still necessary to say that God was God not of the dead, but of the living, i.e., the dead no longer had a relationship with God (cf. Lk. 24:5). When, however, the statement is taken up in the mouth of Jesus at Mk. 12:27 par., it is put into the context of the expectation of the general resurrection. It is thus changed in light of Jesus' death and resurrection. He is "Lord of both the dead and the living" (Rom. 14:9), "the one whom God appointed as judge of the living and the dead" (Acts 10:42; cf. 1 Pet. 4:5). Death is no longer a realm inaccessible to God and beyond the range of his power. It has been conquered by Jesus.

The Gospel accounts of Jesus' raising the dead to life (Matt. 9:23–25; Lk. 7:11–15; Jn. 11:1–44; 12:1, 9) provide graphic backing for this assertion. When Jesus provides a prophetic background of his miracle-working power as proof to John the Baptist of his messiahship (see Matt. 11:5 par.), he adds "the dead are raised" to the formulas from Isa. 35:5–6; 61:1–2. Jesus grants the same power to his disciples in Matt. 10:8, and resurrection miracles are recorded for both Peter and Paul (Acts 9:36–43; 20:9–12).

3. In only a few places does nekros occur apart from a resurrection context in the lit. sense of corpse. Rev. 11:18; 20:5, 12–13 speak of the dead in the final judgment. Matt. 8:22 par. sets the word in its lit. sense alongside a figurative usage: "Let the dead bury their own dead." In 28:4 and Mk. 9:26, nekros is used in a simile. In Acts 5:10 it refers to the dead body of Sapphira.

4. (a) As in the Stoic writers, the NT can use nekros in a fig. sense. In the parable of the prodigal son, Luke calls the one son "dead" (15:24, 32): as far as the father was concerned, the son had left the company of the living. Paul uses nekros in sacramental language concerning the doctrine of baptism at Rom. 6:11, 13, where he exhorts Christians to consider themselves "dead to sin" and to give themselves to God as "those who have been brought from death to life" (cf. also 8:10). In Eph. 2:1, 5; Col. 2:13, the state of being nekros is grounded in our transgressions and sins.

(b) In Heb. 6:1; 9:14, human attempts, apart from Christ, to obtain life are described as nekros, dead. Jas. 2:17, 26 goes a step further and characterizes even faith as dead if it does not result in outward manifestations of life.

See also apokteinō, kill (650); thanatos, death (2505); katheudō, sleep (2761).

3739 (nekroō, put to death), → 3738.

3740 (nekrōsis, death, deadness), → 3738.

3741 (neomēnia, new moon, first of the month), → 4943.

3742 νέος

νέος (neos), new, young, fresh (3742); νεότης (neotēs), youth (3744); νεόφυτος (neophytos), newly planted (3745); ἀνανεόω (ananeoō), renew (391).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. neos generally denotes a temporal sense of new, fresh; in a fig. sense it can be used of persons with some recently gained honor or position. neos is most commonly used (esp. in the comparative neōteros) to designate the age range of youths between 20 and 30 years old as distinct from the presbyteroi (older people) or gerontes (old people), although it can also denote an inexperienced person, a novice. There is little differentiation between neos and synonymous adjs. kainos (→ 2785) and prosphatos (→ 4710).

2. The LXX uses neos chiefly in the comparative neōteros, for a younger or even youngest person (see, e.g., Gen. 9:24; 19:31, 34–35; Jdg. 8:20; 2 Chr. 13:7; Job 24:5). In Num. 28:26 the word "firstfruits" is ta nea (lit., "the new things"); similarly, the month Abib, which is the first month of the liturgical year, is lit. "the month of the new things" (Exod. 13:4; 23:15; 34:18; Lev. 2:14) because it is the month of the ripening of grain.

3. In the Apocr. and intertestamental lit. neos comes increasingly to denote youthful inexperience, immaturity, and susceptibility (e.g., Tob. 1:4; Sir. 9:10; 1 Macc. 6:17; 11:54, 57; 4 Macc. 2:3).

NT 1. The uses of neos in the NT, though not as frequent as kainos, are scattered in various writings. The temporal aspect is dominant, marking out the present moment as compared with a former: "new batch" of dough (1 Cor. 5:7), freshly prepared and not yet blended with leaven; "new wine," still fermenting (Matt. 9:17; Mk. 2:22; Lk. 5:38); the "new self" (Col. 3:10); the "new covenant" as contrasted with the old covenant broken by God's people (Heb. 12:24). In some of these references, kainos is used in the context to denote the same thing.

neos, when it means a young(er) person, is mainly used in the comparative in the NT (Lk. 15:12; Jn. 21:18; Acts 5:6; 1 Tim. 5:1–2, 11, 14; Tit. 2:4, 6; 1 Pet. 5:5). In some cases, as in the LXX, the comparative neōteros can mean "the youngest" (Lk. 22:26). neotēs means youth (Mk. 10:20; Lk. 18:21; Acts 26:4; 1 Tim. 4:12), while neophytos, newly planted, refers to one who is a "recent convert" and thus should not serve as a church leader (1 Tim. 3:6).

2. neos thus characterizes the new thing that Jesus brought to us both as gift and as task, the new life that commences at his coming and that will be completed at his return. neos stands in opposition to that which was old (cf. Heb. 1:1; → palai, 4093). The old self is the autonomous self under sin (Rom. 7:6), which is laid aside (Eph. 4:22) and must be purified from the old leaven of unregenerate ways. God himself has declared that the earlier worship of his people is obsolete (Heb. 8:13) and that his will is that believers serve him in the newness of the Spirit (→ kainos, 2785).

3. Both neos and kainos denote the new salvation Christ has brought and the new life of faith in him. The picture of new wine and old wineskins (Matt. 9:17; Mk. 2:22; Lk. 5:38) makes a sharp distinction between the new (the person and preaching of Jesus) and the old (Jud. and John the Baptist's followers). Jesus calls for a clean break between old and new, since both can only be linked together with resultant mutual disadvantages. The new, fresh wine at the wedding feast at Cana also shows that the new is better than the old (Jn. 2:1–11), even though "new" and "old" are not used in the account.

4. The picture of the congregation as a "new batch" of dough that is separated from "the yeast of malice and wickedness" takes the thought a step further (1 Cor. 5:7–8). Just as the old yeast had to be purged annually at the Passover (Deut. 16:3–4) and a fresh start made, so nothing of the old life should be allowed to corrupt the new. In context Paul is referring to the boasting of the Corinthians regarding their recent case of gross immorality (1 Cor. 5:1–6). He goes on to urge them to celebrate the festival "with bread without yeast, the bread of sincerity and truth" (5:8), for the church has entered a new era: "Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed" (5:7).

5. The vb. ananeoō occurs only at Eph. 4:23, where it signifies that our inner nature or attitudes must "be made new" (cf. anakainoō in Col. 3:10). Eph. 4:24 adds that we must "put on the new [kainon] self, created to be like God in true righteousness and holiness."

See also kainos, new (2785); prosphatos, fresh, new, late (4710).

3744 (neotēs, youth), → 3742.

3745 (neophytos, newly planted), → 3742.

3749 (nephelē, cloud), → 847.

3753 νεωκόρος

νεωκόρος (neōkoros), temple keeper (3753).

CL neōkoros is derived from neōs (the Attic form of naos, temple) and koreō, to sweep. From "temple sweeper" it came to mean "temple keeper" and became a title for cities in Asia Minor that had built a temple in honor of their patron god or the emperor. The word does not occur in the LXX.

NT In Acts 19:35 this title is ascribed to Ephesus, where a temple was built in honor of the goddess Artemis.

3758 νήπιος

νήπιος (nēpios), infant, minor (3758).

CL & OT The noun nēpios denotes an infant, child, or minor in cl. Gk; it also often carries overtones of helplessness, inexperience, simplicity, and even foolishness. Gk. philosophers who wanted to communicate true knowledge of the world and the life of reason dismissed with biting sarcasm the unperceptive person with no experience of life as nēpios, a fool.

The LXX uses nēpios to translate 5 different Heb. words (e.g., 1 Sam. 15:3; Prov. 23:13; Isa. 11:8; Ezek. 9:6; 45:20). In these contexts the most important characteristics of the nēpios are the weakness, helplessness, and submission of the child to the adult (cf. Lam. 1:5). Hos. 11:1 represents the origins of Israel (i.e., the exodus from Egypt) as the people's youth (nēpios). By contrast with the period of apostasy in Canaan, Israel followed Yahweh with undivided loyalty. The LXX also uses nēpios in Ps. 19:7, where it denotes the person with a simple faith (cf. also 116:6; 119:130), who stands under God's protection and pays attention to his instruction.

NT 1. (a) Matt. 21:16 quotes Ps. 8:2 in the account of Jesus' cleansing of the temple. Jesus answers the indignation of the chief priests and teachers of the law at the Hosanna of the children with the question, "Have you never read, 'From the lips of children (nēpioi) and infants you have ordained praise'?" This OT quotation had undisputed authority for his opponents, so that their accusations immediately lost all substance.

(b) Matt. 11:25 and Lk. 10:21 are both placed after the woes pronounced on Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum: "I praise you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because you have hidden these things from the wise and learned, and revealed them to little children." nēpioi here draws a contrast with the wise and learned and refers either to children who, by comparison with adults, are usually considered immature and unwise (cf. 1 Cor. 14:20), or generally to the simple, without any emphasis being laid on the age of the "children."

2. (a) Paul also refers to the child/adult contrast in 1 Cor. 13:11. Just as an adult thinks differently from a child, one's knowledge in the coming age will be transformed. But faith, hope, and especially love hold good now and will abide in the age to come (13:13). In Rom. 2:20 the child/adult contrast is applied to the teacher/pupil relationship. Jews, who have the law, are conscious of being in the role of teacher, who instructs the nēpios. But their failure to see their own hypocrisy in the light of the law undermines this role and brings dishonor to God (2:22–24).

In 1 Cor. 3:1 the spiritual is contrasted with the fleshly and childish. The "not yet" (3:2) and the "in Christ" with nēpios stand in contrast to the development that should take place, as the further metaphor of milk and solid food indicates. What is at issue here is not a pre-Christian stage in contrast to the Christian life, but Christian life that has begun but still needs to develop. Childishness is a transitional phase that one should grow out of (see also Heb. 5:13–14).

Paul uses a similar picture in Eph. 4:14: "Then we will no longer be infants (nēpioi), tossed back and forth by the waves, and blown here and there by every wind of teaching and by the cunning and craftiness of men in their deceitful scheming." The apostle is not distinguishing between Christians and non-Christians, but referring to those Christians who are as easily led astray as immature children. His concern is about their growing (4:15) and becoming complete (4:13).

(b) Paul's argument in Gal. 4:3 is different from the above passages. Here he uses legal and temporal categories. The pre-Christian period (i.e., the time before Jesus' coming, 4:4) was the nēpios period of immaturity and slavery. The nēpioi were held bound "in slavery under the basic principles of the world." But Christ has come "to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (4:5, → huios, 5626) The two periods stand in clearly marked contrast.

See also pais, child, young man, son, servant (4090); teknon, child (5451); huios, son (5626).

3763 (nēsteia, fasting, fast), → 3764.

3764 νηστεύω

νηστεύω (nēsteuō), to fast (3764); νηστεία (nēsteia), fasting, fast (3763); νῆστις (nēstis), not eating, fasting (3765).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. this word group means generally to abstain from food (usually for a limited period), sometimes to starve. Fasting was most frequently undertaken as a religious ritual. Fear of demons, for example, led to fasting; it was considered an effective means of preparing oneself for an encounter with the deity, for it created an openness to divine influence. The mystery religions used fasting as part of the initiation ritual for novices. In magic and with the oracles fasting was regarded as a preparation necessary for success. The custom of fasting following a death was widespread. It was believed that there was a danger of demonic infection in eating and drinking while the soul of the dead person was still near. Fasting was also required in certain fertility rites. Fasting for ethical motives (asceticism) was uncommon in the ancient world.

2. (a) In the LXX the words in this group generally translate only the Heb. verb to fast. A conceptually related Heb. expression meaning to afflict oneself (lit., to humble one's soul) as a purification rite (in which fasting played a part) is translated by tapeinō (e.g., Lev. 16:29, 31; 23:27, 32; Isa. 58:3). We also read of occasions when there was no eating of bread or drinking of water (e.g., Exod. 34:28).

(b) Fasting took place in Israel as a preparation for meeting God (Exod. 34:28; Deut. 9:9; Dan. 9:3). An individual might fast when oppressed by great cares (2 Sam. 12:16–23; 1 Ki. 21:27 = LXX 20:27; Ps. 35:13; 69:10). The entire nation fasted in times of imminent danger (Jdg. 20:26; 2 Chr. 20:3; Est. 4:16; Jdt. 4:9, 13; cf. Jon. 3:4–10), during a plague of locusts (Joel 1–2), for success of the return of exiles (Ezr. 8:21–23), as an expiatory rite (Neh. 9:1), and in connection with mourning the dead (2 Sam. 1:12).

Fasting and prayer belonged together (Ezr. 8:21, 23; Neh. 1:4; Jer. 14:11–12). A fast usually lasted from morning to evening (Jdg. 20:26; 1 Sam. 14:24; 2 Sam. 1:12), although Est. 4:16 speaks of a three-day fast. In Ps. 109:24 the description of the torments of fasting during the period of accusation are at the same time a reflection of the inward torments suffered by the suppliant.

The Israelite law ordained fasting (lit., afflicting oneself) only on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:27–32; Num. 29:7). After the destruction of Jerusalem (587 B.C.) four fast days were laid down as days of remembrance (Zech. 7:3–5; 8:19).

3. In the course of time the deeper meaning of fasting—as an expression of one's humility before God—was lost for Israel. Increasingly it came to be regarded as a pious achievement. The struggle of the prophets against this depersonalization and emptying of the concept was without success (cf. Isa. 58:3–7; Jer. 14:12). By the time of Jesus those earnest about their religion, esp. the Pharisees, were required to keep two fast days each week (cf. Lk. 18:12). The disciples of John had a similar rule (cf. Mk. 2:18).

NT In the NT nēsteuō occurs 20x, all in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts. nēsteia occurs 5x (3x in Lk. and Acts, 2x in Paul), and nēstis 2x (Matt. and Mk.).

1. The entirely new view brought by the NT to the question of fasting is most clearly expressed in the words of Jesus, "How can the guests of the bridegroom fast while he is with them?" (Mk. 2:19 par.). The advent of God's kingdom, the presence of the Messiah, the good news of salvation not dependent on good works—all this means joy, something excluded by fasting in the Jewish sense. In the light of the Messiah-centered preaching of Jesus, such fasting is a thing of the past, belonging to a bygone era.

In the Gospels the answer to the question about fasting is linked to the parables of the new patch on the old garment and the new wine in the old bottles (Mk. 2:21–22 par.). In other words, fasting has been superseded by Jesus.

2. A number of passages, however, raise questions about the consistency of this picture. (a) According to Matt. 4:2, Jesus himself fasted for 40 days and 40 nights before beginning his public ministry. It can be argued, of course, that this took place on the threshold of the coming of salvation.

(b) In Matt. 6:16–18 Jesus does not condemn fasting as such, merely ostentatious fasting. Fasting is not to be practiced before other people but before God, who is unseen and "sees what is done in secret." Here, however, Jesus may be addressing not the community of his disciples, but the Jews.

(c) According to Matt. 17:21, there are certain conditions of demonic enslavement from which a person can only be released "through prayer and fasting." Many NT MSS, however, omit this verse (see NIV note; cf. also Mk. 9:29).

(d) In Acts 13:3 and 14:23 we read that occasionally in the Christian church, prayer was backed up by fasting.

We may thus conclude that fasting does have a value, but only if it is voluntary. The early Christian churches, esp. predominantly Jewish-Christian ones, retained the practice of fasting in order to demonstrate that their prayers were in earnest (cf. Acts 13:3; 14:23). In those passages that concentrate on the ascetic tendencies of some (Rom. 14 and Col. 2), however, fasting is not mentioned. The two occasions of "fasting" mentioned in Paul's letters (2 Cor. 6:5; 11:27) are autobiographical and may refer only to "hunger."

3765 (nēstis, not eating, fasting), → 3764.

3767 (nēphalios, temperate), → 3768.

3768 νήφω

νήφω (nēphō), be sober (3768); νηφάλιος (nēphalios), temperate (3767); ἐκνήφω (eknēphō), become sober, come to one's senses (1729); ἀνανήφω (ananēphō), become sober (392).

CL & OT This word group carries the idea of sobriety, the opposite of intoxication (→ methyō, 3501). In Hel. Gk. the words can be used lit. of a state of abstinence from wine, but also fig. to indicate complete clarity of mind and its resulting good judgment.

NT For the NT writers, the fig. sense is also prominent. nēphō occurs 2x in 1 Thess. 5:6–8, denoting the alertness required in light of an imminent Parousia, and once in the Pastoral Letters (2 Tim. 4:5), where it indicates the clarity of mind able to resist the subtle attractions of deviant mythologies (cf. also the use of eknēphō in 1 Cor. 15:34). Likewise, in 1 Pet., nēphō points to the appropriate frame of mind for the imminent appearance of Jesus (1:13) and for prayer in the end time (4:7). The ferocious hostility of the devil is evident in these days, making an alertness able to resist essential (5:8).

nēphalios occurs only in the Pastorals and denotes the abstemious lifestyle required of bishops (1 Tim. 3:2), women (3:11), and elders (Tit. 2:2). The main point here is the self-control necessary for effective ministry. ananēphō occurs only in 2 Tim. 2:26 and indicates the clarity of mind demanded of a teacher if opponents are to be silenced.

See also methyō, be drunk (3501).

3771 νικάω

νικάω (nikaō), be victorious (3771); νῖκος (nikos), victory (3777); νίκη (nikē), victory (3772); ὑπερνικάω (hypernikaō), be more than victorious (5664).

CL & OT 1. In Gk. lit. nikaō frequently means to be victorious, both in military and legal combat. The vb. expresses visible superiority in the natural rivalry that takes place among people or, occasionally, among the gods. The vb. can also be translated surpass, overcome, be stronger. It presupposes achievement in physical or spiritual combat. The corresponding noun is nikē, victory or the power that confers victory. Nikē is also the name of a Gk. goddess, who is often represented in art as a symbol of personal superiority. The gods assist humans in their conflicts and give the victory to the side of their choice.

2. In the LXX nikaō occurs 26x and nikē 11x. By far the majority are to be found in Macc. The rest typically render the Heb. vb. nāṣaḥ, to defeat, have control of, or noun nēṣaḥ, splendor, endurance.

The OT is familiar with the phenomenon of human rivalry (e.g., between Hagar and Sarah, Gen. 16:1–16; Joseph and his brothers, 37:2–35), but nikaō is used in the LXX almost exclusively to denote victory over hostile powers. Here the real victor is God, who has power over his own enemies and those of his people and of the righteous (cf. 1 Chr. 29:11, where NIV translates nēṣaḥ as "majesty"). The people's victory does not primarily depend on the strength of their soldiers but on whether God has delivered the enemy into the hands of the Israelite armies (cf. Jdg. 7; 1 Macc. 3:19). For this reason the rallying cry for the Maccabean "holy war" was "Victory with God!" (2 Macc. 13:15). Finally, the faith of Israel waits and prays for the time when God will defeat all their enemies.

In the wisdom lit. this word group acquired a spiritualized meaning. The wise man does not allow himself to be conquered by the beauty of an adulteress (Prov. 6:25), but rather reason overcomes instinct (4 Macc. 3:17; 6:33).

NT The NT usage of this word group generally presupposes the conflict between God or Christ and opposing demonic powers. nikaō occurs most frequently in Rev. and 1 Jn. nikē occurs only in 1 Jn. 5:4; hypernikaō only in Rom. 8:37. The terms occur seldom in Paul, but when they do, they have particular theological significance.

1. In the Synoptic tradition the word group appears only in Matt. 12:20 in a quotation from the first Servant Song (Isa. 42:1–4: "he leads justice to victory") and in Lk. 11:22, where the stronger man overcomes, disarms, and despoils the armed strong man. The metaphor explains Jesus' superiority over the demonic powers: "If I drive out demons by the finger of God, then the kingdom of God has come to you" (11:20). The earthly Jesus demonstrates by his actions that he is the hidden victor over the forces opposed to God, though it is not until the resurrection that he achieves the final victory over sin, death, and the devil.

2. In 1 Cor. 15 Paul speaks forcibly about overcoming the world and death through the redemptive work of Jesus Christ. Jesus' death on the cross and resurrection mean that no power in the world can finally have the victory. "Death has been swallowed up in victory. 'Where, O death, is your victory?'" (1 Cor. 15:54–55). As children of God, believers are included in this victory. Our victory is not an achievement or reward, but is given us (15:57). We are thereby placed in a position in which we ourselves can overcome evil (Rom. 12:21).

In this life we are often oppressed by trouble, anxiety, danger, persecution, and hunger. But these forces have lost their controlling power. Our struggle against the rule of these demonic forces is conducted under the promise of victory and thus takes on the character of overcoming: "No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us" (Rom. 8:37).

3. John sums up the forces opposed to God in the term kosmos (world). Jesus' coming, suffering, and return to the Father signify victory over the world. The evil one, the ruler of this world, has had his power restricted by Jesus, the stronger man who has freed his people from the dominion of the evil one. The battle has thus been decided, even if it is not yet over. By faith Christians participate in this victory and are thus placed in a position to overcome the world for themselves. Faith is the victory over the world (1 Jn. 2:13–14; 4:4–5; 5:4–5).

4. The seven letters of Rev. 2–3 are directed to troubled churches in Asia Minor suffering under persecution. Each letter concludes with a call to overcome, introduced by the formula "he who overcomes" or "to him who overcomes" (2:7, 11 etc.). The conflict and the trials of this present life in the world and in the church are not final. The church's anticipated victory has its foundations laid in the victory already won by Jesus. The promise of an inheritance is to those who overcome (cf. 21:7).

The end, however, will be preceded by an apocalyptic conflict between God and the demonic powers, the theme of Rev. The world powers often gain victories in this conflict (6:2; 11:7; 13:7), but they are only fleeting. In the end the Lamb will prevail. Christians have followed him and have poured out their blood in martyrdom (11:7–12). In the middle of the picture of the plagues and the wrath of God John sees the victors standing, singing a hymn of praise (15:2–4). Thus the victory the Lamb has won and has promised to his people is already secure, despite confrontations with the demonic powers, for the Lamb is the King of all kings and the Lord of all lords (17:14). This is the origin of the Christian symbol of the Lamb with the banner of victory.

See also athleō, compete (123); agōn, fight (74); brabeion, prize (1092); thriambeuō, lead to a triumphal procession (2581).

3772 (nikē, victory), → 3771.

3774 Νικολαΐτης

Νικολαΐτης (Nikolaitēs), Nicolaitan (3774); Νικόλαος (Nikolaos), Nicolas (3775).

NT 1. The Nicolaitans were members of an early Christian sect, apparently formed from the personal name Nicolas or Nicolaus. The word occurs in the NT only at Rev. 2:6, 15, in the letters to the churches in Ephesus and in Pergamum. The first passage commends the church's rejection of them without specifying the nature of their teaching. It is an open question whether they are to be identified with the false apostles of 2:2.

The more explicit context of Rev. 2:15 must be the basis for any interpretation of the tenets of the group. There the Nicolaitans are equated in some sense with Balaam. Although this man's evil counsel is never explicitly recorded in the OT, the inference from comparing Num. 31:16 with 25:1–3 is that he was responsible for contriving the sin of Israelite men marrying the daughters of Moab—thus encouraging both their "eating food sacrificed to idols and . . . sexual immorality" (Rev. 2:15). These same sins are ascribed to the teaching of "Jezebel" at Thyatira (2:20), though she is never called a Nicolaitan. Both passages concern errors of practice rather than of speculative doctrine, although the phrase "Satan's so-called deep secrets" (2:24) may suggest some kind of gnostic background for Jezebel's teaching. In other words, Nicolaitanism was, to some extent, a libertarian or antinomian movement.

Note that Balaam is unexpectedly prominent in Jewish tradition. He represented a type of lawless wickedness and was the antagonist of Moses the lawgiver. Jude 11 and 2 Pet. 2:15 contain references to controversies involving Balaam's name. So perhaps a polemical use of the name was already current in the milieu of the Asian churches (cf. the messianic use of Balaam's prophecy in Num. 24:17, echoed in Rev. 2:26–28). Balaam's advocacy of eating food sacrificed to idols and of sexual immorality also recalls the terms of the apostolic decree of Acts 15:20, 29, which itself echoes Num. 25:1–2 and to which Paul assented. Paul was, of course, sensitive to the charge of antinomianism (Rom. 6:1–2). In Rev. John rejects the application of the term "Balaam" to Christians, turning the word against a perversion to which the gospel of faith apart from works was open.

2. The value of later references in the church fathers to Nicolaitans is debatable. Irenaeus regards them as the earliest exponents of the error of Cerinthus and ascribes to them a gnostic cosmology. This may, however, be an inference from 1 Tim. 6:20, to which Irenaeus seems to refer in his discussion of this heresy.

3. The churches of Asia Minor do appear to have been under severe pressure to secure their earthly position by accommodation either to Jud. or to pagan society. The Nicolaitans (and Jezebel) are mentioned in connection with churches in those three cities where pagan compromise seems to have been most insistent. The temptation to idolatry at Thyatira may be connected with the strength of the pagan trade guilds in that city; Christians who valued their livelihood were under pressure to participate in the idolatrous feasts of the guilds. At Ephesus was the power of the Artemis cult. Pergamum was the provincial center of the imperial cult, and a new rigor of enforcement of that cult by Domitian faced the church with an acute dilemma. Safety might be assured only by what John saw as amounting to apostasy. The Nicolaitans and their kind were plausible advocates of the pagan compromise.

3775 (Nikolaos, Nicolas), → 3774.

3777 (nikos, victory), → 3771.

3780 Νινευίτης

Νινευιτης (Nineuitēs), Ninevite (3780).

CL & OT 1. Nineveh (Gk. Ninos) is cited frequently in cl. Gk. historians such as Xenophon, Herodotus, Cassius Dio, Diodorus, and Strabo. Josephus refers often to the city, attributing its founding to Assyras.

2. Nineveh is mentioned 17x in the OT. According to Gen. 10:11–12, Nimrod founded the city; in 2 Ki. 19:36 (see also Isa. 37:37), Sennacherib returned to his royal residence at Nineveh after his failure to conquer Jerusalem. The city figures most prominently in Jonah's prophecy (1:2; 3:2–7; 4:11), where its wickedness is described as the cause for its threatened destruction. The three days' journey required to cross it (3:3) possibly refers to the administrative district of Nineveh. The preaching of the prophet Jonah led to repentance on the part of its citizens, so that the impending catastrophe was averted (3:10).

Nineveh also figures prominently in Nahum's prophecy, an oracle dealing solely with the destruction of Nineveh (cf. 1:1; 3:7). The reference to the opening of the river gates (2:6) may picture the inundation of part of the city by a coalition of Medes, Babylonians, and Scythians, who conquered Nineveh in 612 B.C. This city is also cited in Zeph. 2:13, where its destruction is mentioned along with others in an oracle about God's judgment on Israel's enemies and Israel's eventual vindication.

Nineveh is mentioned in cuneiform sources from the reigns of Gudea (ca. 2200 B.C.) and Hammurabi (ca. 1750 B.C.). Archaeological excavation at the site of ancient Nineveh has revealed occupation from prehistoric times. With the restoration of Assyria's fortunes under Shalmaneser I (ca. 1260 B.C.), Nineveh gained in importance and became one of his royal residences. The Assyrian king who made the greatest contribution to Nineveh was Sennacherib, who rebuilt its defenses and constructed a system of dams and canals.

After the death of Ashurbanipal (669–627 B.C.), the Assyrian empire declined and Nineveh was eventually destroyed. Thereafter the city became a symbol of Assyria's utter collapse. In its day, Nineveh was the crystallization of the culture and power of that kingdom. As such, it represented to the OT prophets the seat of the cruelty and oppression that the Assyrian empire brought to bear on Israel.

NT Jesus refers to Nineveh in his saying about the sign of the prophet Jonah: "The men of Nineveh will stand up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and now one greater than Jonah is here" (Matt. 12:41; Lk. 11:32). The point of this saying and the accompanying one about the Queen of the South's visit to Solomon is to contrast the responsiveness of outsiders to God's message with the faithless response of God's chosen people, whom Jesus calls "this generation." Not content with what Jesus had already said and did, the Jews sought a sign (cf. also Matt. 16:1; 1 Cor. 1:22). Jesus replied that "a wicked and adulterous generation asks for a miraculous sign! But none will be given it except the sign of the prophet Jonah. For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of a huge fish, so the Son of Man will be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12:39–40; cf. Lk. 11:29).

This pericope is enigmatic, for the Ninevite generation was not judged but the prophet himself was (cf. Jon. 1:4, 10, 12, 15). But it also suggests that death will not be the end of the Son of Man, just as being thrown into the sea was not the end of Jonah. Jesus' vindication will come soon. Then follows the reference to the citizens of Nineveh, who responded to Jonah's preaching that the Lord intended to destroy their city (cf. 3:1–10). The contrast between Jonah and Jesus in Matt. 12:41 (Jesus is "greater than Jonah") challenges Jesus' hearers to think for themselves as to who he is and what their relation should be to the kingdom of God.

3782 νίπτω

νίπτω (niptō), wash (3782).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. niptō means to wash, when the obj. is part of the body (→ louō, 3374). In religious contexts niptō is commonly used of the ceremonial washing of hands (e.g., before prayer or sacrifice).

A similar use of niptō appears in the LXX, both in a secular sense (e.g., Gen. 18:4) and for religious washings (Exod. 30:18–21). The prescriptions relating to priests washing their hands amidst religious duties was extended to a demand that Jews generally rinse their hands before meals (see Mk. 7:3).

NT The Pharisees criticize the disciples of Jesus for eating with "unwashed" (aniptos), i.e., ceremonially unclean, hands (Mk. 7:2–3). In his disciples' defense Jesus not only rejects the tradition that included the custom (7:5–13), but denies several fundamental presuppositions concerning uncleanness that it involves (7:14–23).

The narrative of the foot-washing may contain a reference to current Jewish teaching on purification: "A person who has had a bath needs only to wash his feet; his whole body is clean" (Jn. 13:10). That is, the action of Jesus in washing the disciples' feet represented a complete bath (louō). If 13:7 hints that more is involved in the act than a lesson in humility (13:13–17) and that it cannot be understood until after the crucifixion, it is likely that we are to interpret Jesus' foot-washing as an acted parable regarding the Lord's humiliation unto death.

See also baptizō, baptize, immerse (966); louō, wash (3374).

3783 (noeō, apprehend, perceive, understand, gain insight into), → 3808.

3784 (noēma, thought, mind), → 3808.

3785 (nothos, born out of wedlock), → 2302.

3788 (nomikos, pertaining to the law, hence legal expert, lawyer), → 1208.

3789 (nomimōs, conforming to the law, according to rule), → 3795.

3791 (nomodidaskalos, teacher of the law), → 1437.

3792 (nomothesia, law-giving, legislation), → 3795.

3793 (nomotheteō, make laws, legislate, ordain, enact), → 3795.

3794 (nomothetēs, lawgiver), → 3795.

3795 νόμος

νόμος (nomos), law, norm (3795); νομίμως (nomimōs), conforming to the law, according to rule (3789); νομοθεσία (nomothesia), law-giving, legislation (3792); νομοθετέω (nomotheteō), make laws, legislate, ordain, enact (3793); νομοθέτης (nomothetēs), lawgiver (3794); ἀνομία (anomia), lawlessness (490); ἄνομος (anomos), lawless, unlawful (491); ἀνόμως (anomōs), apart from the law (492); ἔννομος (ennomos), under law, orderly (1937); παρανομέω (paranomeō), break the law, act contrary to the law (4174).

CL 1. (a) The noun nomos is formed from the vb. nemō, distribute, assign, esp. in the sense of assigning property. In other words, this vb. refers to processes essential for humans to live together in a community. Relationships to earthly possessions must be determined in a legally binding fashion, so that private and communal ownership may become a reality. Thus nemō covers shades of meaning from merely handing something over for a given period of time to transferring something, once and for all, to the ownership of another. (b) The fig. sense of the vb. has the idea of to watch over, protect; also to esteem, respect.

2. In the same way, the word nomos originally referred to distributing something and what followed from it. It meant that which was laid down or ordered—esp. the results of this, namely, arrangements that become regularized and attain the status of tradition. The word thus denotes custom, statute, law, esp. in the distribution of goods and in law and order.

The legal, ethical, and religious meanings of nomos are inseparable in antiquity, for all goods were believed to come from the gods, who upheld order in the universe and in relations among humans. Hence comes the universal conviction that law is linked to the divine. The close interrelationship between the worship of the gods, the customs of the time, and one's duty to the state was expressed in the charge leveled at Socrates, namely, that he failed to reverence the gods officially worshiped by the city, or at least that he did not worship them as everyone else did.

3. Used in a political context, nomos was regarded as the most essential feature of the polis or city-state, i.e., the judicial norm, legal custom, the "law of the land." From the 5th cent. B.C. on, nomos was written down as nomoi (pl.), thereby acquiring the meaning of specific written laws, the constitution, which had to be obeyed on pain of punishment. Many Gk. tragedies rest on the fact that one law stands over against another, both claiming validity but being mutually incompatible. Hence, people are caught in the midst of such conflict. Indeed, nomos is sometimes disparaged as a human exaggeration as compared with physis (nature) or universal law.

4. Gk. philosophy kept alive the awareness that since human laws are often fallible, humans cannot exist unless they conform to cosmic, universal law. Only when one is inwardly in harmony with the universe does one have peace of mind amid the vicissitudes of life. Whereas the Sophists criticized the absolute validity attached to nomos, Plato and Aristotle (each in his own way) connected it with the nous, the human spirit, and thereby once again with the divine.

OT 1. In the LXX nomos occurs about 430x. About half have no Heb. equivalents; for the rest, the commonest equivalent is tôrâ. In the canonical OT, nomos is concentrated most heavily in the Pentateuchal books other than Gen. Next come Ezr. and Neh., then Ps. (40x, of which 27 are in Ps. 119). The frequent use of the word in the Apocr. (100x in the books of the Macc., 30x in Sir.) indicates the importance of law in the Jewish thought of the last two centuries B.C.

2. This section deals with passages in the LXX where tôrâ is translated by nomos. Note first that tôrâ frequently does not mean law in the modern sense of the term. The Jews, in a manner similar to the Gks., viewed law as the transcript of an eternal norm. (a) Originally tôrâ meant an instruction from God, a command for a given situation. Instruction for given situations was also given by the prophets (e.g., Isa. 1:10; 5:24; Jer. 6:19; Mic. 4:2), the priests (Deut. 17:9, 11–12; Jer. 2:8; Ezek. 7:26; Hos. 4:6), or a judge (Deut. 17:9, 11–12). The prophets threatened judgment on priests and prophets who issued their own instruction without having received it from Yahweh (Jer. 2:8; 8:8; Ezek. 22:26; Zeph. 3:4).

(b) Human counsel given by a teacher of wisdom was also called tôrâ and hence nomos (Prov. 13:14; 28:4, 7, 9).

(c) Also called nomos are the specific instructions for the different kinds of offerings (Lev. 6), for priestly procedure (Num. 5:29), or for the Nazirites (6:13, 21).

(d) After the reform of Josiah, after which the book of Deut. became prominent, phrases such as "the law of the LORD" became widespread, epitomizing the laws in general and without any further qualification (Jer. 8:8 and passim; cf. 2 Ki. 10:31; Amos 2:4). Deut. is itself called "this Book of the Law" (Deut. 28:61; 30:10; 31:26; cf. also 29:20), and after the exile the whole Pentateuch is called this (Neh. 8:3). Corresponding to this is the formula "written in the Law," found in the postexilic lit. (8:14; 10:35, 37 = LXX 10:34, 36; Dan. 9:11; cf. 2 Chr. 23:18), where the law is seen as a written norm.

(e) The vbs. used in connection with tôrâ indicate whether the latter is conceived of as oral instruction or as written law. Oral instruction is implied by such expressions as to teach instruction (Exod. 18:20), to hear it (Isa. 42:24), to forget it (Hos. 4:6), or to despise it (Isa. 5:24). Other phrases indicate written law: to observe or keep the law (Ps. 119:34, 44; Prov. 28:4), or to walk in it, i.e., to order one's life by it (Exod. 16:4; 2 Chr. 6:16; Ps. 78:10).

3. ḥōq (another Heb. word translated by nomos) can refer to: (a) Yahweh's sacrificial requirement, his right to receive sacrifice (Lev. 6:15); or (b) the legal system proclaimed in the cult, to which Israel is bound (Jos. 24:25). The fem. ḥuqqâ means: (a) creation ordinances, laws of nature (Jer. 31:35); (b) the ordinance of the Passover (Exod. 12:43; Num. 9:3, 14); (c) statutes regulating everyday life (Lev. 19:19, 37); or (d) sacrificial ordinances (Jer. 44:23).

4. The equivalent dāt occurs only in the late OT writings, always denoting a written law—either God's law (Ezr. 7:12, 14, 21, 25, 26; Dan. 6:6; Est. 3:8) or that of the king (Ezr. 7:26; Est. 1:8, 13, 15, 19; 3:8; 4:16).

5. This survey is sufficient to show that we cannot speak simply of "the law in the OT" as if it expressed a uniform concept, much less of the OT itself as law. There are essentially three types of "law" to be distinguished:

- casuistic law, which denotes legal custom. It has its setting "in the gate," where the law was administered. Large sections of the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21:1–23:19) contain such lists of laws, each with the characteristic "if . . . , then . . ." form.
- apodictic law, set out in series of ten or twelve for ease of memorizing: "anyone who . . . shall surely be put to death" (Exod. 21:12, 15–17); or "I am the LORD . . . you shall not . . ." (as in the Decalogue, Exod. 20:2–17). Here the setting is the worshiping community, esp. at the feast of covenant renewal. In the OT, incidentally, the Ten Commandments are never called "law."
- cultic regulations, to be carried out and expounded by the priests.

The laws inherent in such passages were part and parcel of the covenant. It was the rule of life for those who had been redeemed (see Exod. 20:1–2), and God's people were expected to obey them. The law thus had a prophetic character. In the postexilic period, the law came to be viewed more as a set of rigid rules, instead of serving the community as an ordinance of salvation.

6. (a) In the Jud. of the last two centuries B.C. and at the time of Jesus, the law was an absolute in itself and was independent of the covenant. Fulfillment of the law determined one's relationship to God. Israel no longer saw her special status as the result of Yahweh's living self-revelation in the course of her history, but considered this status to rest on the obedience of those who were righteous in terms of the law.

Observance of the law distinguished true Israel both from non-Jews and from the godless Jewish masses. In other words, the law had assumed a dominant role as mediator between God and humanity. The whole of life was regulated by the law.

In Hel. Jud., the law came to stand alongside wisdom, which had likewise come to be seen as having a hypostasis. In this respect the law became separated from its original setting, namely, the covenant as given by God. In addition, it could now be presented as universal law, i.e., as universally valid. Further, its universality was extended backward in time. The patriarchs, it was claimed, already knew it; in fact, it antedated the whole of creation. In this manner, Hel. Jews were able to give the law a rational basis and proclaim it as a superior philosophy. The method they adopted was to allegorize it, which involved cutting it loose from its historical roots.

(b) Similarly, rab. Jud. no longer saw God's self-revelation as tied to the covenant, but rather to the Torah as a covenant ordinance. Thus the Torah came to occupy the place of a "canon within the canon," even before the latter was finally determined. The Torah became normative over against the Prophets and the Writings, which were held merely to develop what was already germinally present in the Torah. The Torah (= the Pentateuch) had been delivered by God to Moses. God had committed himself to it, but not only so, he is eternally committed to it. Human life and death hang upon fulfilling its commands (cf. Lk. 18:9–14). As an aid toward this goal, use was made both of casuistry and of summaries of the law in the form of a few commands or even of one basic command.

NT In the NT the noun nomos (194x) occurs most often in Paul (119x). It does not occur in Mk., in the General Letters apart from Jas., or in Rev. Its infrequent appearance in the Synoptics should not blind us to the fact that Jesus dealt intensively with the whole issue of the law (cf. Mk. 2:23–28; 10:1–12).

1. The summaries of Christ's work as given in Jn. 1:17 and Eph. 2:14–18 also apply to his preaching. In all that he said and did, Jesus removed the law from its mediatorial position and opened up immediate access to God (cf. the parables in Lk. 15; 18:9–14; also Matt. 11:28–30).

(a) In Matt. 11:7–19, John the Baptist is Elijah come again (11:14), who brings one divine dispensation to an end and proclaims the arrival of a new one, the kingdom of God (cf. Mal. 4:5; Matt. 17:10–13; Lk. 1:17; Jn. 1:21). Thus the teaching of the Prophets and the Law reaches its goal (Matt. 11:13) and comes to an end. "The Prophets and the Law" here are regarded to some extent as constituent parts of the OT, but the primary reference is to their content as salvation history. The wording draws attention not only to the precedence accorded to the Prophets over the Law, but also to the dynamic view of both: They proclaim, preach, and prophesy. From now on the kingdom of God is proclaimed directly, like the news of great victory (→ basileia, 993).

Similarly, in the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:21–48) Jesus put an end to all self-satisfaction at having kept individual commands of the law (5:20, 46). At root God's law required absolute conformity to the requirements of his divine majesty in thought as well as in deed (5:20, 48). Thus Jesus made the unprecedented claim that what was said in the law (5:21, 27, 31, 33, 38) is now made out of date by himself: "But I tell you ..." (5:22, 28, 32, 34, 39, 44). To those who did not acknowledge him as bringing in God's kingdom or recognize his teaching as being the new rule of life, this claim must have made his condemnation for seeking to abolish the law (5:17) a foregone conclusion.

(b) Jesus makes it clear, however, that his claim was not leveled against the law as such (Matt. 5:17–19), but against a person's self-righteous attitude to the law (5:19–20; cf. Paul in Rom. 7:12). Jesus set himself to fulfill in detail the law's demand for a life of utter obedience to God (Matt. 5:17; cf. 3:15), as he had done already from his circumcision on and continued to do until his death on the cross. Even his condemnation was in accordance with established Jewish law (cf. Jn. 19:7). The inviolability of the law (Matt. 5:18) likewise determined Christ's attitude in conversation with the teachers of the law (nomikoi, specialists in ethical interpretation of the law) and the theological leaders of the Pharisees. Jesus shared the view that the law could be summed up in two great commandments (Matt. 22:34–40; cf. Lk. 10:25–28), but he rejected the Pharisees' gradations within the double commandment. In his repeated cries of "Woe to you!" (Matt. 23:13–16, 23, 25, 27, 29) he condemned their failure to recognize the basic intent of the law, namely, justice, mercy, and faith (23:23).

(c) In the words of Jesus his reference to nomos is generally to the whole law as a part of Scripture, without any further delineation of content. Thus Jesus referred to "the Law" (Matt. 5:18), "the Law or the Prophets" (5:17; cf. 7:12), "Moses and all the Prophets" (Lk. 24:27), and "the Law of Moses" (24:44).

2. Paul, confronted as he was by his own Pharisaic past and by his Jewish and Jewish-Christian opponents, developed a theology of the law connected historically with the promise and on a personal level with Christ. His teaching remains within the limits previously laid down by Jesus; he merely brings out the basic significance of Christ's work, now completed in the cross and resurrection. As Lk. 10:25–37 shows, it is possible to keep the law fully (10:37) only by being in fellowship with Christ, listening to his loving voice, and following him. In the same way, after his resurrection, it is those who are "in Christ" who can keep the law, not with any thought of works-righteousness, but rather out of gratitude and in the liberty of one set free to love and obey.

Paul also follows Jesus in denying both the absoluteness of the law and the idea that it is the way to salvation. He takes this position, however, not because of any emotional complexes arising from his being a converted Pharisee (cf. Phil. 3:5–11), but because he saw the uniqueness and newness of Christ. As the apostle to the Gentiles, he has the prophetic insight to realize that without a comprehensive theology of law, the universal claims of the gospel lack all credibility (see Rom. and Gal.).

Paul uses nomos for the Pentateuch (Rom. 3:21b; Gal. 4:21) as well as for the whole of Scripture (Rom. 3:19; 1 Cor. 14:21, citing Isa. 28:11–12; Deut. 28:49), but esp. for the Mosaic law, and the Decalogue in particular (Rom. 2:14a, 17; 3:28; 7:12; Gal. 5:3), with its demand for unconditional obedience from the Jews. Rom. 2:14b is to be translated, "The Gentiles are law for themselves," for God has given them the law in another way (cf. 2:15). Paul also uses nomos to indicate a part of the law (e.g., 7:2b) and in the metaphorical sense (e.g., 3:28, divine commands in the widest sense). Paul often personifies the law, in that it speaks (3:19; 7:7), works (4:15), and rules (7:1). He is not here subscribing to the idea of law as a hypostasis, but he means that the law is the mouthpiece of the living God.

Paul views the law against the background of the cross of Christ. (a) In his death on the cross Jesus upheld the law's condemnation of all humanity. He became a curse (Gal. 3:13; cf. Deut. 21:23). He was made sin, yet only as the representative for the sins of others (2 Cor. 5:21; cf. Lk. 22:37, quoting Isa. 53:12). These statements indicate a deliberate, vicarious act by Jesus on our behalf.

(b) At the same time Christ fulfilled all the obedience required by the law (Phil. 2:8), so that now that he has fulfilled the law, salvation rests not on our meeting certain conditions, but on the simple fact that the law has now been fulfilled (Rom. 3:31).

(c) Because they believe in Jesus, Christians are no longer under the law (1 Cor. 9:20b). They are free to be as people "not having the law [anomos] . . . so as to win those not having the law [anomois]" (9:21). They are also free to fulfill the law in love (Rom. 13:10b; Gal. 5:14, 22), to be as those under the law in order to win those under the law, i.e., the Jews (1 Cor. 9:20). The author and inspirer of such love is the Holy Spirit, who brings believers from the realm of the law and flesh with its resulting sin and death (Rom. 8:4; Gal. 5:18, 22).

(d) Since Christ is the end and goal (telos) of the law for believers (Rom. 10:4), Paul can look back from his vantage point, as it were, and describe the law both as having no more role to play in salvation and at the same time as possessing a valid function apart from Christ (Rom. 5:20–21; Gal. 3:19–29). The law, which is holy and good (Rom. 7:12), was one of God's gifts to Israel (9:4, here nomothesia means giving of the law). It came in "so that the trespass might increase" (5:20; cf. 7:8–13; 1 Cor. 15:56b) and so that people might be "held prisoners by the law" and sin, with no prospect of escape until Christ should come (Gal. 3:22–23)—a dreadful thought, were it not for God's superabundant grace (Rom. 5:20b) and his gift of sonship (Gal. 3:25–29)!

(e) Those who stand before God "under the law" (Rom. 2:12b, i.e., the Jews) must reckon with the following consequences: The law demands entire obedience (Gal. 3:10, quoting Deut. 27:26); only those who do the law will live and be justified (Gal. 3:12b, quoting Lev. 18:5), while those who do not obey are condemned (Rom. 2:12b; Gal. 3:10). No one is justified before God merely by hearing or knowing the law (Rom. 2:12–13a). To be justified one must be made alive, which is precisely where the law fails (7:9–10; Gal. 3:21). Indeed, only those who have faith in Christ are made alive (3:26–27). Thus law is linked with sin, and faith with promise. But the law is not contrary to the promise (3:17) but has an educational part to play, both within redemptive history and in individual experience, driving us to Christ and to faith in him.

The law is a paidagōgos, a custodian or tutor (Gal. 3:24–25). A paidagōgos was usually a slave whose duty it was to take the pupil to school and to supervise his conduct (→ paideuō, 4084). The law produces a startling realization of sin that does not save (Rom. 3:20; 7:7); it calls forth a cry for help in one's lost condition (7:24), a cry that can be answered effectively only by Jesus Christ (7:25).

(f) Even those "who sin apart from the law" (anomōs in Rom. 2:12a), i.e., before Christ came or outside the bounds of Christianity, do not conform to God's will (3:23). Outside the law people are judged by God according to what they have done (2:6–7), for the Gentiles can know what is good, the work of the law being "written on their hearts, their consciences also bearing witness" (3:15; cf. 1:32). Deep within themselves they know they are sinners. Thus whether a people live within the Jewish law or outside of it, both Jews and Gentiles will meet the same judgment, without respect of persons (2:11–12, 16), according to their works.

Destruction and death await everyone (Rom. 3:23, 27; 6:23; 7:10, 11c, 13), for no one has put into practice his or her knowledge of what is good (3:23; 7:18–19, 21). All humans, therefore, depend for salvation on Christ's work, which has to be appropriated by faith (3:25–26, 29–30), apart from observing the law (3:28).

(g) This indicates the fundamental weakness of the law, namely, that its only answer to sin is to forbid and condemn it. The law cannot overcome sin, since it depends on the cooperation of the flesh (NIV, "sinful nature"), which is weak (Rom. 8:3). Here "the flesh" (sarx, → 4922) means would-be autonomous human nature, incapable of obedience. The law is part of the fabric of this world (→ stoicheion, 5122) and thus cannot lead us beyond it. What the law demands can be wrought only by the Spirit on the basis of the work of Christ (8:4). The law is essentially a letter that kills, while the life of the new covenant is the Spirit who makes alive (7:6; 2 Cor. 3:6).

(h) The commandment to love, which can be fulfilled in the Spirit, can now be called the "law of Christ" (Gal. 6:2; cf. 1 Cor. 9:21). It is the Torah of the Lord, which he himself has lived out. On raising us to spiritual life, he can require of us its fulfillment.

(i) Occasionally the law is invoked as a secondary authority, in order to provide scriptural support for Paul's injunctions to the church. In 1 Cor. 9:8–12 Paul uses Deut. 25:4 to back up his claim that, as an apostle, he had the right to be materially supported by the church. In 1 Cor. 14:21 he combines quotations from Deut. 28:49 and Isa. 28:11–12 in order to regulate speaking in tongues. Basically, however, the life of the church is controlled not by the principle, "Anything contrary to the law is sin," but rather, "Everything that does not come from faith is sin" (Rom. 14:23).

3. Eph. and the Pastorals contain statements in complete accord with Paul's theology of the law, but they also have other statements that indicate that a controversy had arisen over the law's function and that uphold the law as a regulative principle. (a) Eph. 2:15 is fully in line with Paul's doctrine of the law (see above 2 [b]).

(b) Within the struggle against libertinism and asceticism 1 Tim. 1:8 repeats the assertion of Rom. 7:12 that the law is good. But whereas Rom. develops the role of the law in provoking and convicting of sin, 1 Tim. 1:9–10 enumerates various categories of sin condemned by the law. Tit. 2:14 adds that Christ appeared "to redeem us from all wickedness [anomia, lawlessness]" (quoting Ps. 130:8). The "righteous" in 1 Tim. 1:9 no longer appear to be (as in Rom.) people justified by faith (cf. Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11). Nor did Paul say in Rom. that "the law is good if one uses it properly [nomimōs]" (1 Tim. 1:8). The false teachers of the law (nomodidaskaloi, 1 Tim. 1:7) are those who preach antinomianism as well as those who lead the church astray with their ascetic demands (4:1–3). This passage is thoroughly Pauline in its exhortation to receive God's good gifts of creation in a spirit of faith and thanksgiving and not to stand aloof from them in the interests of ascetic regulations. Like 1 Tim., Tit. 3:9 recommends the avoidance of quarrels about the law.

In 2 Thess. 2:1–12 the fact that Christ's return has not yet occurred is explained that the "man of lawlessness [anomia]" (2:3) or the "lawless one [ho anomos]" (2:8) must first appear, and the "secret power of lawlessness [anomia]," although already at work, is not yet revealed (2:7; cf. Matt. 24:12).

4. The writer of Heb. sees the law, esp. the sacrificial law, as a manifestation of the old covenant, inferior to and now superseded by the new covenant (8:13; 10:9b). Heb. contains extensive passages proving the superiority of the single, once-for-all sacrifice of Christ, the great high priest, over the offerings of the OT priests—a sacrifice, moreover, in which he himself is both offering and offerer (4:14–5:10; 7:1–10, 18). Thus in working out his teaching on inferiority and superiority, the writer puts nomos in the negative part of his comparisons (e.g., cf. 7:5 with 7:6–8; 7:12 with 7:13–15; 7:16a with 7:15–16b; 8:4–5a with 8:5b–6; 9:19–22 with 9:24–28; 10:1 with 10:2b; etc.).

The vb. nomotheteō, to give laws, is used to present the same antithesis: The people of the old covenant received the law under the Levitical priesthood (7:11); Christ is the mediator of a better covenant, legally instituted on the basis of better promises (8:6).

Christ's overcoming of lawlessness (anomia) is the ground on which the new covenant is based. The Son has hated lawlessness (Heb. 1:9, quoting Ps. 45:7), and the Holy Spirit, speaking through the prophets, promised that one day sin would be finally forgiven; that day has now come (10:17, quoting Jer. 31:34). Since the new covenant is now a reality, the writer can state that the law never made anything perfect (Heb. 7:19; 10:1) and that the OT sacrifices are finished (cf. 10:18).

5. In the Gospel of Jn. Christ and the Jews clash vehemently over the question of the law. Jesus claims personally to reveal God, whereas they represent the rebellious "world." They measure him by the law (7:23, 52; 8:5; 12:34, quoting various OT passages treated as law), and he in return measures them by the law. He has an absolute knowledge of it, expounds it, and uses it to expose their hypocrisy (7:19; 8:17; 10:34; 15:25; in the last two passages Ps. 82:6 and 35:19 are called "law").

The Gospel of Jn. develops the basic thesis (1:17) that, as compared with the law given through Moses, the knowledge and truth revealed in Jesus Christ bring the full revelation of God. Christ's repeated use of "your own Law" (8:17; cf. 10:34) and "their Law" shows that the Son is not subject to the law. He charges the Jews with appealing to Moses merely in self-justification; none of them keeps the law (7:19; cf. Rom. 2:17–24). When it comes to healing and forgiveness, Jesus cuts through the pedantry and complacency with which the leaders treat the law (Jn. 7:23; 8:5–7). He uses the OT writings to support his testimony to himself (cf. 8:17 with Deut. 19:15; Jn. 10:34 with Ps. 82:6). The Jews, by contrast, are prevented from recognizing God's present revelation in Christ, since the Scriptures are nothing but rules and regulations to them (Jn. 5:39; 12:34).

The extent to which the handling of the law had become a matter for the specialists and thus something to be exploited is shown by the debate in the Sanhedrin after an abortive attempt to arrest Jesus. "This mob . . . knows nothing of the law" (Jn. 7:49), say the Pharisees, while one of their number, Nicodemus, points out their own disregard of the law (7:51).

The last legal debate (before Pilate) over the fate of Jesus demonstrates the utter paradox of his opponents' enslavement to the law. As an occupied people, the Jews were not permitted to carry out the death penalty laid down in Exod. 20:7; Lev. 24:16 (cf. Jn. 5:18). By demanding that Christ's accusers should judge him according to their own law, Pilate adroitly extracts from them admission of their hatred and also of their impotence (Jn. 18:31). Only by appealing to their own law, that of Moses (19:7), can the Jews get their prisoner put to death, albeit by a method that treats their law with contempt. But by thus rejecting the revelation of Christ, they make his willing sacrifice a reality. At the same time the judgment of the law falls not only on him, but on them (15:2–6).

6. In 1 Jn. 3:4 the equation of sin with lawlessness or transgression of the law (anomia) occurs twice. This does not imply some new legal ethic but combats what many scholars regard as the gnostic heresy of sinlessness (see 1:8, 10; cf. 2 Pet. 2:1–2). To counteract this teaching, 1 Jn. distinguishes between "sin that leads to death" (5:16b), which is apostasy from true faith in Jesus, the Son of God (5:1–12), and "sin that does not lead to death" (5:16a, 17), which can be confessed and forgiven (1:9). Those who remain in the true faith acknowledge that they need forgiveness for transgressions against the law (anomia) and that such forgiveness is available to them. Everything depends on abiding in Christ (2:1b; 3:6); such people then do what is pleasing to God (3:22–24).

7. On two occasions James uses the seemingly contradictory phrase "the law that gives freedom" (1:25; 2:12), both times in connection with his peculiar emphasis on not merely hearing but doing the word (1:22). This phrase probably comes from the Jewish-Christian Diaspora and refers primarily to those collections of Christ's sayings, such as the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5–7), that were regarded as the rule of the Christian life. Anyone putting them into practice was thereby set free from a literal observance of OT law. On both occasions James asserts a reward of blessedness to those who obey the law that gives freedom.

The preceding context and Jas. 2:13 make it clear that mercy is the chief element in this law of liberty, which Jas. also calls the "royal law" (2:8). It can be summarized in the command to love one's neighbor. Those who keep this command are free from the fear of having to keep the whole of the Jewish law by a minute observance of every single command (2:10–11; cf. Gal. 3:10). It remains true, however, that those who ride roughshod over this royal law by showing partiality will finally fall under "judgment without mercy," exactly as if they had not kept the OT law (2:13a).

Like many of James's other sayings, the prohibition of slander and judging (Jas. 4:11–12) has its origins in both the OT (Lev. 19:16) and NT (Matt. 7:1–5; cf. Rom. 2:2). Regardless of its source, the import remains the same. To speak ill of a fellow believer is to speak ill of the law and to sit in judgment on it. Again, God wants us to observe the law, but the Lawgiver (nomothetēs) and Judge are one, and one who judges another has ultimately to do with him whose judgment is final (Jas. 4:12; cf. Rom. 14:4). The twofold use of "one" for the divine name in Jas. 4:12 enables the reader to identify the "Lawgiver" as both the Father and the Son. (On the attitude of James and Paul to justification, faith, and works, → pistis, 4411.)

8. Acts provides a vivid picture of the controversies over the law that arose in the early church. Many Jewish Christians remained true to the law, but there were also Hel. Christians who thought in universal terms. With the exception of 15:5 and 23:29, all references to the law are found in discourses, which accords well with the author's historical approach and bring both persons and situations into sharp relief. There is a striking parallel between the accusations and prosecution that the Hel. Christian leaders had to face and the treatment meted out to Jesus. To that extent the disciples are indeed not above their master (Matt. 10:23–25).

The charges leveled against Christians were as follows: speaking against the temple and the law (Acts 6:13; cf. 6:11); persuading people to worship God in "ways contrary to the law" (18:13, against Paul in Corinth); teaching "all men everywhere" against the people, the temple, and the law (21:28, against Paul in Jerusalem; cf. 21:21). In the course of his defense, Stephen asserts that the temple is not God's dwelling place (7:48–49) and goes so far as to charge the Jews with not keeping the law (7:53; cf. Jn. 7:19; Rom. 3:19–20). This so provokes the Jews that he is immediately stoned (7:57–60). Paul, on the other hand, when defending himself against his Jewish accusers before Festus, opens his speech with the assertion that he has committed offense neither against the law of the Jews nor against the temple (25:8).

This is in line with the policy Paul had adopted ever since his arrival in Jerusalem. Having welcomed him to the city with joy, Jewish Christians pointed out that they had remained zealous for the law (Acts 21:20) and referred to the unfavorable reports about him in circulation, esp. that he taught Jews to forsake Moses, circumcision, and Jewish customs. Since his life was in danger, they advised him to show the Jews and Jewish Christians that he was true to the law (21:24) by financing the discharge of four destitute Nazirites, an act of charity considered particularly pious among the Jews. This advice to Paul and the fact that they insisted again that Gentile Christians should observe the so-called apostolic decree (cf. 15:28–29) show the efforts undertaken by the Jerusalem church leadership to maintain the utmost loyalty to the Jews and at the same time not to lose contact with Gentile Christianity as promoted by Paul.

Paul complied with the Jerusalem church's request and behaved as a devout Jew (Acts 21:26), but being recognized again by Jews from Asia Minor who protested publicly against his missionary activities (21:27–28), he was nearly killed. The tribune of the Roman forces, however, permitted Paul to address the people after his arrest, whereupon he emphasized his upbringing in the law (22:3) and also Ananias's loyalty to the law (22:12). The high priest, who had him struck during interrogation, was accused by Paul of violating the law even while administering it (23:3).

This positive attitude toward the law is explained by Paul's freedom from the law (cf. 1 Cor. 9:19–20). Paul knew that he was in the service of the gospel and thus saw no inconsistency between his present attitude and his insistence that in God's purposes of salvation the law has now come to an end (Rom. 10:4; cf. 11:13–14). The picture of Paul that emerges from Acts is of an apostle who opposed Jewish-Christian demands that Gentile converts be obliged to practice circumcision and keep the law (15:8), but who also delivered the terms of the apostolic decree to the churches (16:4; cf. 15:28–29), and even had his (half-Jewish) assistant Timothy circumcised out of regard for the Jews (16:3). Indeed, when preaching in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch, Paul presented Christ as completing the justification left unfinished by the law (13:38).

It is noteworthy that the Roman authorities tended to reject the charge of illegality leveled against the preaching of the early Christians and treated such matters as mere controversies over Jewish law (e.g., Gallio, Acts 18:15; Claudius Lysias, 23:29).

See also ethos, usage, custom (1621); stoicheion, elements, rudiments (5122); entolē, command (1953); grammateus, teacher of the law, scribe (1208).

3796 (noseō, to be ill, be ailing), → 3798.

3798 νόσος

νόσος (nosos), illness, sickness (3798); νοσέω (noseō), to be ill, be ailing (3796); ἄρρωστος (arrōstos), sick, ill (779).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. nosos and noseō carry primarily the meaning of illness, to be ill. nosos can be used specifically for calamity, torment, and madness. But it can be used in a fig. sense for a plague afflicting a city, chronic disease of the state, weakness of character, or depravity. noseō occurs more frequently than nosos in general contexts and in fig. expressions.

(b) Like many in the ancient world, the Gks. drew a connection between sickness and attacks of invisible deities, whose wrath they sought to appease through sacrifice and other ritual practices. This conclusion was later modified by critical reflection from the philosophers, who explained disease in anthropological terms, i.e., the outward disease corresponds to an inward suffering, which consists of ignorance. Medicinal therapy and philosophical instruction and virtue are thus closely related.

2. (a) In the LXX nosos occurs only 13x and noseō 2x. Sickness is also rendered by the nouns malakia (→ 3433) and arrōstia (not in NT). The fact that a general word for illness is not often found in the LXX may be due to the OT tendency to be concerned less with generalities than with concrete manifestations (e.g., specific skin diseases, cf. Lev. 13–14). Israel may have found it difficult to come to terms with the fact of disease, for there is scarcely any recognition of a fig. or spiritualized understanding of illness.

(b) The OT view of sickness fits into the pattern of the general understanding of disease in the ANE in that, like sexual discharges and death, it belongs to the sphere of the unclean (→ katharos, 2754). When healing takes place, there has to be a corresponding purificatory rite (cf. Lev. 13–14; Lk. 17:12–14). Moreover, often sin and disease are linked together (e.g., Ps. 32:1–5; 38:3–8, 18). The prophets compare Israel's sin to a person who is mortally ill (Isa. 1:5–6; Jer. 30:12–13). The recognition that disease is ordained, or at least permitted, by Yahweh leads the OT believer to see it as a divine judgment on sin (2 Sam. 12:15–19; 24:10–15; cf. esp. the friends of Job). Recovery, by contrast, leads to thanksgiving for forgiveness (Ps. 103:3; Isa. 38:16–17).

(c) In Jud. the dogma of retributive suffering reaches its most consistent extreme (cf. Jn. 9:2), for the rabbis were able to name the sin that corresponded to every disease. At the same time, however, the Jews developed the concept of discipline imposed out of love; with this came encouragement to visit, pray for, and help the sick, since God is esp. near to those who are ill.

NT 1. In the NT nosos (11x) and arrōstos (5x) occur mostly in the Gospels and Acts. The single occurrence of noseō (1 Tim. 6:4) has a fig. meaning. The NT thus retains the realism of the OT: The problem of disease is primarily that which concerns its concrete manifestations. Other elements taken over from the OT are the idea of the influence of demonic powers (Lk. 13:11, 16; Rev. 16:2) and the connection between disease and sin (Jn. 5:14; 1 Cor. 11:30).

2. Although the NT occasionally views sickness as divine punishment or judgment (e.g., 1 Cor. 11:32; Rev. 6:8), it also addresses the beneficial chastening that results from God's love (Heb. 12:4–13; cf. Prov. 3:11–12). The primary insight of the NT, however, is that disease and disease-bringing demons, even if they are permitted by God to act (Acts 12:23; 2 Cor. 12:7–9), have to do with the power of hostile forces that oppose God's rule (Mk. 1:23–24; 3:27). Jesus' battle against disease accords with this. He broke the terrible connection of sin and disease (Mk. 2:5–12) by his assurance of forgiveness and brought in the dawn of God's kingdom by casting out demons and healing the sick (Mk. 5:1–13; esp. Lk. 11:20; → iaomai, to heal, 2615).

3. (a) In Matt. 9:12–13 sinners are described in a parabolic saying as those who are sick (cf. Isa. 1:5–6). Jesus' commission in coming to the earth is to transform our plight by his call to repentance and his works of healing.

(b) Matt. 8:17 uses Isa. 53:4 to summarize Jesus' ministry of healing: "He took up our infirmities [astheneia] and carried our diseases [nosos]." Matt. interprets this verse as referring to the removal of disease by the power of Jesus. For both Isa. and Matt. sin was the root cause of disease.

(c) In Jn. 9:2–3 the disciples' question about the cause of a man's blindness is dismissed as inappropriate and replaced by an indication of its purpose: "that the work of God might be displayed in his life."

(d) Paul regards his own infirmity (2 Cor. 12:7–10; cf. Gal. 4:13–14; → skolops, thorn, 5022), along with persecutions and other troubles (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23–28), as part of the suffering laid on the followers of Christ (cf. 1:5–7), in which by a dialectic process God's power becomes apparent: "For when I am weak, then I am strong" (12:10).

(e) The use of noseō in 1 Tim. 6:4 corresponds to the Hel. usage of the vb. Craving for controversy and disputes about words point to a sick condition in the inner self. The comparison of the spreading nature of false teaching with the progress of a cancerous tumor (2 Tim. 2:17) likewise belongs to the realm of Hel. thought.

See also astheneia, weakness, sickness, disease, timidity (819); malakia, weakness, softness, sickness (3433); paralytikos, paralytic (4166).

3803 (notos, south wind), → 847.

3804 (nouthesia, admonition, warning, instruction), → 3805.

3805 νουθετέω

νουθετέω (noutheteō), warn, advise (3805); νουθεσία (nouthesia), admonition, warning, instruction (3804).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. noutheteō and nouthesia, derived from nous (mind) and tithēmi (put), describe exertion of influence on the nous. By means of admonition, advice, warning, reminding, teaching, and exhorting, a person can be redirected from wrong ways so that one's behavior is corrected. In contrast to didaskō (teach, → 1438), which is concerned with the development and guidance of the intellect, noutheteō has to do with a person's will and feelings.

2. Except for 1 Sam. 3:13, the LXX uses noutheteō only in the wisdom lit. (e.g., Wis. 11:10; 12:2, 26, warn). The noun occurs only in Wis. 16:6, where the plague of serpents during Israel's desert wanderings was God's "warning" for the people. In the book of Job the vb. has the act. sense of instruct (Job 4:3). But it can also be used in a negative sense (30:1). The more unusual pass. meaning, to let oneself be taught, is also found in Job (23:14; 36:12; 37:14; 38:18).

NT In the NT noutheteō is found only in Paul's letters and Acts 20:31, where Luke reports a speech of the apostle; the noun occurs only at 1 Cor. 10:11; Eph. 6:4; Tit. 3:10.

In Ephesus Paul worked as a faithful and exemplary church leader with constant zeal for the continued life of the church, showing concern for every individual and "warning [them] with tears" (Acts 20:31). Elsewhere he warns the church leaders in Corinth as his "dear children" (1 Cor. 4:14). Even if he has to write to them in a correcting and critical vein, it is done out of his love for them and for their own good.

Col. 1:28 and 3:16 use noutheteō with didaskō in reference to the proclamation of Christ. Warning and teaching belong inseparably together, as the constant counterpart of knowledge and action. The aim of this teaching and warning ministry is that believers might become mature in Christ.

An important task of apostles, church leaders, and elders is to admonish the members of the church; on its part, the church should accept and recognize this ministry in love (1 Thess. 5:12). Admonition as a form of spiritual counseling is also the task of the whole church toward one another (Col. 3:16), provided that it is spiritually fit to do so (cf. Rom. 15:14). Individual members, when disobedient, must also be corrected by the church, so that they may be made aware of the wrongness of what they are doing and won back again (1 Thess. 5:14; 2 Thess. 3:15). Failure to respond to such admonition can under certain circumstances lead to a total rejection of the one being warned (Tit. 3:10).

According to Eph. 6:4, the right way to bring up children is "in the training [paideia] and instruction [or correction, nouthesia] of the Lord." Such activity is not determined by the use or nonuse of certain educational helps, but by whether it is directed toward the Lord. These two words used are close in meaning. It is not the educational method, but the purpose for which it is used, that characterizes Christian upbringing. In 1 Cor. 10:11 nouthesia is used (as in Wis. 16:6) in the sense of warning. The list of punishments that befell the Israelites because of their sins should serve as a warning to the readers.

See also parakaleō, summon, invite, exhort, encourage (4151); epitimaō, rebuke (2203).

3808 νοῦς

νοῦς (nous), mind, intellect, understanding, reason, thought (3808); νοέω (noeō), apprehend, perceive, understand, gain insight into (3783); νόημα (noēma), thought, mind (3784); ἀνόητος (anoētos), unintelligent, foolish (485); ἄνοια (anoia), folly (486); διανόημα (dianoēma), thought (1378); διάνοια (dianoia), understanding, intelligence, mind, thought (1379); δυσνόητος (dysnoētos), hard to understand (1554); ἔννοια (ennoia), thought, knowledge, insight (1936); κατανοέω (katanoeō), notice, observe, consider, contemplate (2917).

CL 1. (a) The Gk. word nous has a variety of meanings: disposition, resolve, understanding, insight, reason, mind. Along with feeling and will, understanding belongs, like the ability to think, to the inner powers of a person. nous can also denote a moral attitude determined by the reflection of one's mind.

(b) In Gk. philosophy and religion nous came to mean reason or mind as the organ of thought that comprehends the world and human existence. It perceives, orders, and controls everything. In Plato nous denotes the ruling principle of pure thought, the highest of the three parts of the soul. True and divine reason rules in a human and in the universe, in the microcosm as well as in the macrocosm. Reason comprehends truth. In one's reason lies one's awareness of God.

Aristotle set understanding above the powers of the soul. He distinguished a theoretical nous from a practical nous. This reason, the most important part of the human mind, is immortal and divine. This linking of nous and the divine is also characteristic of Stoicism. Reason is the essence of God.

2. A whole group of words is derived from the root nous. dianoia, the act or faculty of thinking and reflection, is the special philosophical power of thought in contrast to sensory perceptions and feelings. dianoia also means way of thinking, disposition, intention, purpose, design. ennoia meant originally the act of thought, then the result: thought, realization, insight, disposition. In Gk. philosophy ennoia means idea, concept (e.g., the concept of time, the idea of the beautiful). noēma is that which is thought, also concept, plan. The meaning of dianoēma is similar: thought, notion, resolve, plan; it can also mean ulterior motive. anoia means folly, lack of understanding. Plato distinguished two kinds of lack of understanding: that resulting from madness and that resulting from lack of teaching.

3. Corresponding to these nouns is a group of vbs. that give expression to the process of thinking and to thought itself. noeō originally meant to perceive with understanding, including both sensory and mental impressions. In the philosophy of Parmenides, thought and being are made almost identical. A strengthened form of noeō is katanoeō, to direct one's mind toward something, to notice it. Thus it can mean to observe, test, comprehend, understand.

4. The verbal adj. noētos means intelligible; its opposite is anoētos, unintelligible, unimaginable; also senseless, foolish, indicating a lack of understanding and judgment. dysnoētos means difficult to understand.

OT 1. (a) In comparison with the central role played by the nous in the world of Gk. thought, it is surprising how little use is made of this group of words in the LXX. The most common word is dianoia (75x), whereas nous and noeō each occurs only about 35x, and the other derivatives even less. This sparing use of these words in the LXX is linked to the fact that the Heb. has no term equivalent to the Gk. nous. The Heb. lēb or lēbāb is translated in the LXX 6x by nous (e.g., Exod. 7:23; Isa. 10:7b) and 38x by dianoia (e.g., Gen. 8:21; Exod. 35:22; Isa. 35:4), but the rest of the time (about 800x) by kardia, heart (→ 2840). In other words, in OT thought the heart is the seat of intellectual processes. This implies that understanding lies within the realm of moral decisions. An unusual use of nous is its translation of rûaḥ, spirit (Isa. 40:13).

(b) ennoia (13x) render various Heb. words, esp. in Prov. (1:4; 2:11; 3:21; 4:1; 5:2; 8:12; 16:22; 18:15; 19:7; 23:4, 19; 24:7; Wis. 2:14). All the Heb. equivalents mean understanding, wisdom, knowledge; thus, ennoia retains its sense of reflection, insight, perception, wisdom, though not the theoretical meaning of concept.

(c) noēma (3x) appears in the LXX in the sense of evil intention, plot (Sir. 21:11; Bar. 2:8; 3 Macc. 5:30). dianoēma can mean wise thought, insight (Prov. 14:14; 15:24; Isa. 55:9) or that element in the wicked that decides to worship idols (Ezek. 14:3–4).

(d) anoia (14x) means lack of understanding, folly, esp. in a moral sense (Prov. 14:8; 22:15), or even wickedness (2 Macc. 4:6, 40; 14:5; 15:33).

(e) OT anthropology knows nothing of the Gk. division of the soul into three parts, so human understanding does not become pushed into the foreground. Understanding belongs with the will and aims less at theoretical contemplation than at right conduct. The intellectual sphere is thus anchored more firmly in the whole person, body and soul, than in Gk. thought.

While words in the nous word group are more frequent in wisdom lit., they come into their own in the Gk. writings of the LXX (esp. Macc.). In other words, the Gk. concept of nous did not enter the OT tradition until the Apocr., which can speak of keeping in mind (2 Macc. 15:8), an understanding mind (4 Macc. 1:35; 2:16), and an innocent mind (Wis. 4:12). dianoia in intertestamental lit. means spirit, mind, consciousness, disposition, esp. in a moral sense. Philo writes of dianoia in the same way as he does of nous—the divine element in humankind, which makes us immortal.

2. (a) The intellectual element of the word group is displayed clearly in the use of the vb. noeō, for it goes back to the Heb. bîn, to understand, perceive, observe (e.g., Prov. 20:24; Jer. 2:10), or śākal, understand, have insight (e.g., Prov. 1:3; Jer. 10:21). Insight and understanding mean in the OT the process of judging and exploring the relation of things to one another. The difference from Gk. thought is that this insight is not regarded as an independent achievement of using one's critical faculties, but as a gift of Yahweh. All true knowledge comes from God.

(b) katanoeō (30x) is used in the LXX in the sense of to notice, regard, look at (e.g., Exod. 19:21; Ps. 22:17; Isa. 5:12). It can also mean spy, watch (e.g., Ps. 37:32). Philo uses it in the sense of meditative reflection, in referring to the beauty of an idea.

(c) anoētos means foolish, without sense (Deut. 32:31; Prov. 15:21; 17:28; Sir. 21:19; 42:8). It occurs alongside mōros (→ mōria, 3702) in a moral and religious sense: senseless, foolish (Sir. 21:19–20; 42:8).

3. (a) In Philo's writings we find all the elements of the Gk. concept of nous. The mysterious element of thought and understanding comes in, however, for stronger emphasis here than in cl. Gk. God is the reason behind all things, the perfect world-reason. Because reason is inspired by God, it leads to the knowledge of God. More important for Philo than knowledge of God gained by reason is an ecstatic knowledge of God, conveyed by God's Spirit.

(b) For the Qumran community understanding and insight belong only to God and the children of light. The mysteries of the insight and wisdom of God will bring wickedness to an end at the appointed time (1QS 4:18–19). Those who would join the community must first be tested for their insight (CD 13:11). The Qumran hymns praise God, who has lent to his own the insight to recognize his wonders and mighty deeds (1QH 11:22–23; 12:13; 13:9).

NT 1. If one goes strictly by statistics, the nous group of words in the NT does not play a central role. nous is found only 24x, noeō and katanoeō 14x each, and the other words even less. This statistical survey gives, however, a false impression. True, the concept of nous has only a peripheral place in the Gospels (but cf. Luke–Acts, which uses katanoeō 8x) and in the general letters of the NT. But we find this Hel. terminology more frequently in Paul (nous occurs 21 of the 24x). The apostle was not only the historical link between the early church and its Hel. environment, but also thought out the fundamental theological relationship between faith and knowledge. Although he adopted concepts and ways of formulating problems from Hellenism, he rejected Gk. attempts at solving them and relegated reason to its proper and inalienable place, both limiting and freeing it by means of the Christian faith.

All in all, it may be said that the NT gives this word group its own interpretation. All these words are associated more firmly with the will, and the understanding spoken of is an understanding of God and his will in salvation, an understanding of the word in Scripture and preaching. Understanding itself becomes a disposition, an attitude, and thus a standpoint of faith.

2. (a) The noun nous means mind, faculty of judgment, insight (e.g., 2 Thess. 2:2). But this understanding is a religious understanding, a religious faculty of judgment, set alongside the conscience (Tit. 1:15). nous is a term parallel to faith, which in the Pastorals means the same thing as religion: The false teachers are corrupt in their religious discernment and not to be trusted in matters of Christian religion (2 Tim. 3:8; cf. also 1 Tim. 6:5).

In Rom. 7:23 Paul writes: "I see another law at work in the members of my body, waging war against the law of my mind [nous]." In 7:25 he goes on: "So, then, I myself in my mind [nous, i.e., understanding] am a slave to God's law, but in the sinful nature a slave to the law of sin." This nous is the same thing as the inner person or egō, the real self, which can distinguish between good and bad. The self agrees with the law that it is good; it wishes to fulfill the law. But against this law, the law of religious understanding, there fights the other law of sin. nous is here the religious knowledge and insight that honors and recognizes God's law.

Understanding, i.e., the faculty of religious discernment, is what is meant in Eph. 4:18 by dianoia. Here we read about the darkening of one's understanding—parallel, incidentally, to the futility of the nous. On the positive side we read of the gift of understanding, the ability to recognize religious truth, which from the hand of Christ Christians are enabled to discern him who is true, namely, God (1 Jn. 5:20).

(b) dianoia comes close in meaning to nous and means the ability to think, faculty of knowledge, understanding; then mind, and particularly disposition. NT usage is different from that of Gk. philosophy but close to that of the LXX. This is shown by citations of the OT in which dianoia stands in parallelism to kardia, heart (Heb. 8:10; 10:16, from Jer. 31:33; → kardia, 2840; see also Lk. 1:51). In the sense of understanding or mind, dianoia is counted among the inward powers of a human (Matt. 22:37). Yet dianoia can in some contexts mean the power of the disposition or the will and thus acquire a religious flavor. It is the spiritual consciousness, the disposition, the attitude of faith. It can be sincere (2 Pet. 3:1), but it can also be hostile (Col. 1:21). It can be fig. girded up, like one's loins (1 Pet. 1:13).

(c) Similarly, the NT uses ennoia in the sense of one's attitude. It is found alongside enthymēsis, thoughts (→ thymos, 2596), with the gen. "of the heart" (Heb. 4:12). Peter exhorts believers to arm themselves with the same thought with which Christ was filled when he suffered (1 Pet. 4:1).

(d) noēma is found only in Paul (5x in 2 Cor., once in Phil.). Even here we find a religious sense: the understanding of the divine will concerning salvation or thinking concerned with this topic. This thinking can be corrupted, so that it no longer concerns itself simply with Christ (2 Cor. 11:3). It can be hardened and made inaccessible to God's Word and the understanding of Scripture (3:14). It can become blind, so that it no longer perceives the illumination that comes from the gospel of the glory of Christ (4:4). The apostle, in the authority of his position and his commission, makes it his business to take every thought captive, so that it will submit, not to him, but to Christ (10:5). noēma is thus the general faculty of judgment, which takes decisions and pronounces verdicts right or wrong, depending on the influences to which it is exposed. In 2:11 the pl. refers to the designs of Satan.

At the climax of Phil. the apostle urges his readers to continual rejoicing, forbearance, and freedom from anxiety by committing everything to God in prayer. He then adds: "And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds [noēma] in Christ Jesus" (4:7).

(e) dianoēma appears only in Lk. 11:17, where it refers to hostile thoughts. The par. in Matt. 12:25 uses enthymēseis, thoughts, and refers to the Pharisees (cf. 9:4).

(f) anoia is lack of understanding, the absence of nous and dianoia. Those without understanding have no comprehension of Jesus' action toward a sick man on the Sabbath (Lk. 6:11). They do not understand the saving work of God in Christ. The folly of false teachers will come to light (2 Tim. 3:9).

3. (a) The vb. noeō means to perceive, recognize in a religious sense, with special reference to God, his acts, and his will. The juxtaposition of noeō and kardia, heart, in the quotation from Isa. 6:10 shows that noeō is regarded as an activity of the heart, a spiritual recognition (Jn. 12:40). According to Paul, through visible creation, "God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen" (Rom. 1:20; cf. Wis. 13:4–5). Ultimately this recognition depends on faith. That the world was created by the word of God, only faith can "understand" (Heb. 11:3).

The parenthetical expression, "let the reader understand" (Matt. 24:15), calling the reader to understand the text aright, uses noeō in the sense of an understanding of the divine plan of salvation. In Eph. 3:4, Paul trusts that the church will have the spiritual understanding (noeō with synesis; → 5304) of the divine, secret plan that he proclaims in his writings.

(b) The use of katanoeō, see and perceive, inspect, follows a similar pattern. The speck in the brother's eye is seen, but the log in one's own eye should be paid "attention to" (Lk. 6:41; cf. Matt. 7:3). Lk. 20:23 shows that katanoeō includes what goes on behind the scenes. In the same way, Heb. 3:1 stresses that it is not the outward figure of Jesus that we should look to, but who he really is, the emissary of God, the true high priest, the proper object of Christian faith. We are exhorted to focus our attention on our standing as Christians, working in love, good works, and mutual fellowship (10:24).

(c) The anoētos is the person who lacks understanding, knowledge, and spiritual insight; such people are "the foolish" (Rom. 1:14), the opposite of the sophos, wise. The Galatians, who do not understand the freedom that their salvation has given them, are anoētoi, foolish (Gal. 3:1, 3). So are the disciples who do not understand God's plan of salvation, embracing as it does the death of Jesus (Lk. 24:25); they do not understand the OT and its promises about the Messiah.

(d) dysnoētos, hard to understand, occurs only once in the NT (2 Pet. 3:16), where it refers to difficult passages in Paul's letters.

4. (a) The understanding of one's nous has particular reference to the OT Scriptures. The risen Christ opened the minds of the disciples that they might understand the Scriptures (Lk. 24:45). Those with understanding know its real meaning and the ways in which God manifests himself there; in other words, they know the secrets of the divine plan (Rev. 13:18; 17:9). Here nous and sophia, understanding and wisdom, are interchangeable terms. Divine wisdom has been given to those who are spiritual.

(b) Rom. 11:34 speaks about the nous of God, about his plan of salvation: "Who has known the mind of the Lord?" (cf. Isa. 40:13–14). In 1 Cor. 2:16 we read again of the nous of the Lord, of his plan to save the human race (also quoting Isa. 40:13). After this quotation Paul adds: "We have the mind of Christ." This is in keeping with 1 Cor. 2:12, that Christians have received the Spirit from God in order that they may know what God has given them.

In this context we should also consider Paul's remarks about speaking in tongues. The one who speaks in tongues is filled with the Spirit. Thus one's spirit prays, but the "mind [nous] is unfruitful" (1 Cor. 14:14). Paul also contrasts speaking with the mind and speaking in tongues (14:19). Note, of course, that speaking with the mind is also the work of the Spirit. Even where the Spirit and the mind are separated (14:14), it is only a matter of two different modes of the Spirit's operation. What is described in 14:24, the conviction of the outsider when he comes into the Christian assembly, is a conscious experience, the result of the comprehensible prophetic charisma.

(c) nous in the sense of right understanding leads to a right attitude of mind. The heathen have a foolish attitude of mind because they lack right knowledge (Eph. 4:17). Christians, by contrast, must be renewed in the spirit of their mind (4:23). The Spirit upholds and fills the mind of the Christian. The hortatory part of Rom. begins with the command to be transformed by the renewing of the mind (12:2), so that everyone may be convinced in his or her decisions and knowledge (14:5). Paul appeals to the Corinthians, beset by divisions, to continue in one mind and opinion (1 Cor. 1:10).

See also phronēsis, way of thinking, frame of mind, intelligence, good sense (5860); synesis, faculty of comprehension, understanding, insight (5304); epistamai, know, understand (2179).

3811 νύμφη

νύμφη (nymphē), bride (3811); νυμφίος (nymphios), bridegroom (3812); νυμφών (nymphōn), wedding hall, bride chamber (3813).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. nymphē means the bride or betrothed. The term can be applied to a virgin, a young woman, a bride at a wedding, or a young wife. Similarly nymphios means the betrothed, a bridegroom, or a young husband. nymphē is also a term for feminine deities of lower rank.

In Hellenism, and esp. in Gnosticism, the picture of bridegroom and bride is used for the relationship of the sōtēr, savior, to humanity, and is taken into the concept of a sacred marriage. This prepared the way for religious eroticism and sacred prostitution.

2. The OT occasionally refers to customs that preceded the wedding (e.g., Gen. 24:59–67; Jos. 15:18–19; Jdg. 14; Isa. 61:10; Song). A girl was capable of marriage at age twelve, a young man at fifteen. While personal choice probably played some role, an agreement made between their families was essential. nymphē could also, therefore, mean daughter-in-law.

In the foreground of the OT passages mentioning bride and bridegroom stands the joy that they have in one another. This finds its finest expression in Song of Songs, which many Jews saw as an allegory of the relationship between Yahweh and his people (cf. also Isa. 61:10; 62:5; Jer. 7:34; 16:9). This joy is applied metaphorically to the relationship between Yahweh and Israel, esp. to the worship in which the congregation rejoiced in Yahweh as the eternal king and founder of the kingdom of peace in Zion (cf. Ps. 45; Isa. 60:1–9). This picture corresponds to the title of Israel as bride of Yahweh (Isa. 49:18; 62:5; Jer. 2:2).

NT nymphē is used almost exclusively as a metaphor in the NT. In Matt. 10:35 and Lk. 12:53 it means, as in Jewish usage, daughter-in-law. The bride can also be called gynē ("woman," → 1222), because by Jewish laws of marriage the engaged woman was already regarded as wife (see Matt. 1:20, 24; Rev. 19:7; 21:9). nymphios in the NT is bridegroom, lit. and fig. (Matt. 25:1, 6; Jn. 2:9; 3:29; Rev. 18:23). The "guests of the bridegroom" were indispensable for the carrying through of the festive ceremonial (Matt. 9:15; Mk. 2:19–20; Lk. 5:34).

1. The wedding period is, as in the OT, a time of joy. In Matt. 9:15; Mk. 2:19–20; Lk. 5:34 Jesus rejects the need to fast at the present time. The time of the Messiah's presence was commonly compared to a wedding (Isa. 62:5); with Jesus the messianic age has dawned. Thus, the disciples were filled with joy. The parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1–13) belongs also in this setting, though it is also a parable of judgment stressing the need for being awake and waiting. The OT parallelism of bride and bridegroom, symbolizing Israel and Yahweh, is here applied to the church and Jesus.

2. In Jn. 3:29–30 the relationship of John the Baptist to Jesus is described as that of the bridegroom's "friend," whose part was that of the best man. The final age begins with Jesus, but the friend prepares the way for him and has no greater joy than in seeing the wedding take place.

3. The picture (though not the vocabulary) of the bridegroom and bride applies to Christ and the church in 2 Cor. 11:2. Paul presents believers "as a pure virgin" to her one husband, to Christ (→ parthenos, 4221). But he fears that they might be led astray from pure devotion, just as Eve was (11:3). The picture of marriage is also applied to Christ and the church in Eph. 5:22–32 (→ gameō, 1138).

4. In Rev. 19–22, which describes the final consummation, we find the church-bride waiting for her heavenly bridegroom, here called the Lamb of God. Joy again stands in the foreground (19:7, 9). The church rejoices and adorns herself so as to welcome Christ as her Lord (21:2, 9–21). She is the heavenly Jerusalem, the eschatological church, who longs like a bride for the final fulfillment of her existence and calls out, "Come, Lord Jesus" (22:17, 20).

See also gameō, marry (1138); moicheuō, commit adultery (3658); koitē, bed, marriage bed, intercourse (3130); hyperakmos, past the peak, begin to fade; be overpassionate (5644).

3812 (nymphios, bridegroom), → 3811.

3813 (nymphōn, wedding hall, bride chamber), → 3811.

3814 (nyn, now), → 2789.

3815 (nyni, now), → 2789.

3816 νύξ

νύξ (nyx), night (3816).

CL & OT nyx, night, means the period without sunlight that is divided into 3 or 4 watches. In a fig. sense it means darkness, obscurity, blindness, powerlessness, death. In cl. Gk. nyx is only occasionally seen positively (i.e., as the time of refreshment in sleep). In general, night is ominous and brings fear.

In the OT nyx can simply indicate time (e.g., Gen. 7:4; Jon. 1:17 = LXX 2:1). But it can also be the hour of terror (cf. nykterinos in Ps. 91:5) and the time of drunkenness (Gen. 19:33), thieves (Jer. 49:9 = LXX 29:9), sexual misdeeds (Jdg. 19:25), murder (Neh. 6:10), and occult practices (1 Sam. 28:8). At night one is particularly prone to worry and to the attacks of the evil one (Job 7:3; Ps. 6:6). Yet nyx is also God's time, when he shows the way by a pillar of fire (Exod. 13:21) and makes himself known in dreams (Gen. 20:3) and visions (Dan. 7:2; Zech. 1:8). At the last day, when salvation is fulfilled, there will be no more night (14:7).

NT nyx occurs 61x in the NT, usually as an indication of time. In the 4th watch of the night Jesus walked on the water (Matt. 14:25). He spent the night praying (Lk. 6:12, dianyktereuō). Nicodemus chose the quietness of night for his visit with Jesus (Jn. 3:2). nyx is also the hour of escape (Acts 9:25), betrayal (Jn. 13:30), and denial (Matt. 26:34). Particularly in Acts, nyx is the time for the activity of divine powers: when angels perform their services (5:19; 12:6–7; 27:23; cf. Lk. 2:8–9), when God speaks in visions (cf. Acts 16:9; 18:9; 23:11), and when he instructs in dreams (cf. Matt. 2:12, 22).

Metaphorically, nyx can have the meaning of skotia, darkness, describing estrangement from God or Christ (Jn. 9:4; 11:10). In a similar vein, Paul contrasts nyx with hēmera, day, in connection with the era of salvation that has dawned in Jesus Christ (1 Thess. 5:5–7; see also Rom. 13:12). Those who cling to Christ are no longer under the curse of night (1 Thess. 5:5) but are awake (5:6; cf. 1 Cor. 16:13; 1 Pet. 5:8). When the last day breaks in "like a thief in the night" (1 Thess. 5:2; cf. Lk. 17:34), night will end (Rev. 21:25), "for the Lord God will give [his people] light" (22:5).

See also skotos, darkness, gloom (5030).

3820 Νῶε

Νῶε (Nōe), Noah (3820).

OT 1. Noah was the tenth in line of descent from Adam (Gen. 5:28–29) and figures as the hero of the flood narrative (6:11–9:19), as an outstandingly righteous man (6:9; 7:1) who "found favor in the eyes of the LORD" (6:8), and as the first man to plant a vineyard (9:20). With his wife, his three sons, and their wives, he survived the flood in the ark he constructed at God's command and became the ancestor of a new world.

Ezek. 14:14, 20 affirms that if Noah were living in Jerusalem in the period preceding its destruction by the Babylonians, his righteousness would avail to deliver himself alone. On a more cheerful note, on the eve of return from the exile, Jerusalem is assured that Yahweh's steadfast love for her will be as irrevocable as his covenant with the human race in "the days of Noah" (Isa. 54:9–10; cf. Gen. 9:8–17).

2. Jewish wisdom writers found in Noah an example of true wisdom. Because he "was found perfect and righteous ... a remnant was left to the earth when the flood came" (Sir. 44:17). Again, "when the earth was flooded ... wisdom again saved it, steering the righteous man in a paltry piece of wood" (Wis. 10:4). Philo notes that Noah is the first man recorded in Scripture as righteous. Various Jewish apocalyptic writings reflect on Noah, esp. on the fall of the angels in Gen. 6:1–4 that led to the flood.

NT 1. Jesus used the flood of Noah's day, like the destruction of Sodom and the other cities, as a pattern of the judgment that will overtake the world at the coming of the Son of Man, esp. in its swiftness and suddenness (Lk. 17:26–27; cf. Matt. 24:37–39).

2. Heb. 11:7 emphasizes Noah's faith, the quality of which was shown by his obedience to the divine command (Gen. 6:22). Thus "he condemned the world" (i.e., exposed the perversity of those who refused to believe God) and was justified by faith.

3. In 1 Pet. 3:19–20 is a reference to the spirits imprisoned because of their disobedience "when God waited patiently in the days of Noah while the ark was being built. In it only a few people, eight in all, were saved through water." To these spirits Christ is reported to have made proclamation—presumably of his triumph that ultimately sealed their doom. The relevance of the flood narrative to 1 Pet. lies in its providing an OT counterpart to Christian baptism, which the readers of the letter were "now" receiving (3:21).

4. In 2 Pet. 2:4–5 the preservation of Noah "and seven others" is set in antithesis to the imprisonment in Tartarus (→ tartaroō, 5434) of the rebel angels until the final judgment (cf. Jude 6)—a guarantee of God's power to preserve the godly and punish the wicked. Noah is here called "a preacher of righteousness." In 2 Pet. 3:5–7 the destruction by water of "the world of that time" is viewed as a harbinger of the destruction of the present world by fire.

5. The absence of any mention of Noah in Paul's letters is noteworthy. Although Noah was the second father of the human race, he is not treated as a typical figure, as Adam is (Rom. 5:12–21). Nor does Paul make any reference to the "Noachian decrees" (Gen. 9:1–7), which were held in rab. teaching to be binding on all of Noah's descendants, Gentiles as well as Jews. Paul, instead, regarded the ungodliness of the pagan world (Rom. 1:18–32) as disobedience to God's creation ordinances.

The "Noachian decrees" may be reflected in the apostolic ruling of Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25, esp. in the Western text, where its emphasis on food restrictions gives a mainly ethical requirement that Gentile converts to Christianity should abstain from idolatry, sexual immorality, and "blood" (it is left uncertain whether this means eating meat with blood in it or shedding human blood).

Ξ xsi

3825 (xenia, kindness to strangers, lodging), → 3828.

3826 (xenizō, receive as a guest, entertain; think it strange), → 3828.

3827 (xenodocheō, show hospitality), → 3828.

3828 ξένος

ξένος (xenos), adj., strange, foreign; noun, stranger, alien (3828); ξενίζω (xenizō), receive as a guest, entertain; think it strange (3826); φιλοξενία (philoxenia), hospitality (5810); φιλόξενος (philoxenos), hospitable (5811); ξενοδοχέω (xenodocheō), show hospitality (3827); ξενία (xenia), kindness to strangers, lodging (3825).

CL & OT 1. (a) In primitive society strangers were generally seen as enemies, because they were unknown. People were afraid of aliens and those around them. Thus, they were often outlawed and either killed or driven away. They had no rights. Later, however, a pattern of relationship with strangers emerged, which originally developed out of fear. The alien was seen as a messenger of the gods and out of fear was given a helping hand and hospitality. The stranger thus came under the protection of religion and the law.

(b) Homer saw the stranger and the beggar as coming from Zeus; hence strangers must be treated with respect. For the Gks. in general it was a sign of barbarity if aliens were treated as though they had no rights and were mistreated. Strangers stood under the protection of Zeus and the Dioscuri. Anyone who injured an alien was subject to the wrath of the Erinyes. Conversely, those who honored the gods also honored strangers. Hence temple and altar assumed the role of an asylum for the stranger who desired refuge there or sought the protection of the priests. The first hospices for aliens sprang up in the vicinity of holy places in the 4th cent. Worshipers came from far and wide and needed to be housed and fed.

(c) Through close contact with non-Gk. cities and nations from the time of the Persian wars, changes set in. The foreigner was simply someone who did not belong to one's own cultic community or polis. This did not prevent agreements from being made with strangers. Only if trouble developed could they be banished. But the situation in religion was ambivalent. On the one hand, people were opposed to "new" and "strange" gods, since they did not belong to the nation and endangered morals. On the other hand, the doors were opened wide to innumerable foreign cults.

(d) In Rome up to the imperial period the stranger in theory had no rights. Only those who had a patron had any chance of lodging and protection of the law. The expulsion of a troublesome alien was always a possibility.

(e) The custom of regular hospitality to strangers persisted into late antiquity. The motive of both Gks. and Romans was not only fear of the gods but also love of humankind. In ancient catalogues of vices, injustice to foreigners is ranked immediately after godlessness and irreverence to parents. The ethics of popular philosophy exhorted everyone to show friendship to the stranger. On their part, resident aliens had obligations toward the state, such as payment of taxes and military service.

(f) Gk. philosophy from the 4th cent. on developed the thought of one's being a stranger. The soul was seen as an alien in the world, since its true home lay beyond the material sphere. Being a xenos became an anthropological category. The human body, like the world, was only a temporary lodging for the soul.

2. xenos occurs 21x in the LXX. (a) In the OT, hospitality was a self-explanatory practice and duty (Gen. 18:1–8; 19:1–11; 2 Sam. 12:4; Job 31:32). Thus Jael's action was a serious breach of the right of a guest (Jdg. 4:17–21), which could only be justified by the extremity of God's people in their struggle for survival. Israel's law forbade affliction of aliens, because the nation itself had been an alien in Egypt (Exod. 22:21; 23:9; Deut. 24:14). Like the Israelites, aliens were to enjoy the Sabbath rest (Exod. 20:10). Yahweh also loves and protects them (Deut. 10:18). At the consecration of the temple Solomon interceded for aliens, that they might honor Yahweh and that he might hear them (1 Ki. 8:41–43).

(b) The people of Israel were themselves "aliens" in the land of Canaan (Lev. 25:23). The land did not belong to them; it was Yahweh's property and could not be sold permanently. But since they were God's possession, they enjoyed his protection (1 Chr. 29:15; Ps. 39:12; 61:4–5; 119:19). Ultimately the Israelites were aliens in the world (Est. 3:13; but cf. already Num. 23:9), a view based on the recognition that Yahweh himself is not an immanent power within the world. Rather, as its Creator and Lord he stands over it, and his acts can be "strange" and "alien" (Isa. 28:21).

(c) It was a great misfortune whenever foreigners conquered the land that God had given his people as a dwelling place (Lam. 5:2). It was seen as the Lord's punishment as they were led away into foreign countries out of the land God had given them (e.g., Deut. 29:28; Jer. 5:19).

(d) The protection afforded to an alien in Israel was not extended to foreign religions. Such cults were condemned and punished as idolatry (Deut. 4:25–28; Jos. 24:23; 1 Ki. 11:4–6; Jer. 5:19).

(e) Yahweh is Lord over all the nations (cf. Amos 9:7). Hence the prophets spoke of the coming proclamation of God's glory among the heathen (Isa. 42:6–7; 66:19) and promised their turning to Yahweh (14:1; 45:14–24; 56:1–8; Ezek. 47:22–23; Zech. 14:16). The godless were threatened with annihilation (Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 25–32). In practice after the exile there was a strict segregation from the heathen (Neh. 13:1–9). Mixed marriages were prohibited and dissolved (Ezra 9–10; Neh. 13:23–28).

3. Rab. Jud. held hospitality in high esteem. Those who practiced were promised a rich reward in the age to come. It is of great significance for subsequent ages that the LXX never (apart from Job 31:32) translated the Heb. gēr (stranger) by the Gk. word xenos, but almost always by prosēlytos (→ 4670) or paroikos (→ 4230). This led to the OT regulations and commands concerning hospitality to aliens being applied only to full proselytes. Some Gk. practices did penetrate Jud. through the Hel. Diaspora: regular hospitality (Tob. 5:6) and the establishment of inns (cf. Lk. 10:34). The Essenes kept hospices in every city for strangers.

4. For part of the Hel. period there was considerable danger of Israel's being swamped by foreign practices even in the sphere of religion (1 Macc. 1:11–15). The Maccabean reaction and revolt were directed against this. Those loyal to the law restricted trade with the heathen. They refused fellowship and marriage with them. They were afraid of entering Gentile houses for fear of defilement. But the rabbis also zealously took up missionary work, sometimes with considerable success in making proselytes (cf. Matt. 23:15). Philo and Josephus strove to refute the charge of hostility to strangers, which was leveled against Jews.

NT 1. xenos occurs in the NT 14x. In Matt. 25:31–46 (4x), care of the xenos is equivalent to care of Jesus himself; refusal to provide hospitality to a stranger is to exclude Jesus. According to 27:7, with the "blood money" flung down by Judas the high priests bought the potter's field for the burial of strangers, i.e., non-Jews.

2. The Gospel records show Jesus as a frequent recipient of hospitality in his public ministry (e.g., Mk. 1:29–31; 2:15–17; Lk. 7:36–50; 10:38–42). Hospitality also figures in the parables of Jesus (e.g., 10:33–35; 11:5–8). God's summons to his kingdom is depicted as a banquet (13:29; 14:16–24). Jesus sent out his disciples to proclaim the kingdom, expecting that they would enjoy hospitality in the towns and villages (Matt. 10:11–14; Lk. 10:5–11). Note that in Jud. hospitality was urged especially toward rabbis.

3. Missionaries enjoyed the hospitality of the early church (e.g., Acts 10:6; 16:15). In Rom. 16:23 Gaius appears as a xenos, i.e., as Paul's host. In 3 Jn. 5 another Gaius is praised for what he has done for believers from abroad. xenia (2x) denotes the lodging where Paul entertained people in Rome (Acts 28:23) and the kind reception Paul hoped soon to receive from Philemon (Phlm. 22).

4. On occasion, the idea of God as a stranger to someone occurs without the word xenos actually being used (Jn. 8:19; cf. Acts 17:23; cf. 17:20). Christ is "not of this world" and so is alien in this sense (cf. Jn. 8:14, 25–29; 9:29–30).

5. Eph. 2:19 says that, before their call to faith in Christ, Gentile Christians were xenoi ("foreigners") and paroikoi ("aliens"; → 4230). As such, they had no part in Israel's call to be God's people and were excluded from his promises. But now in Christ they are "fellow citizens with God's people," i.e., Jewish Christians, and "members of God's household." As Christians thus become citizens in God's sight, they have their citizenship in heaven (Phil. 3:20; cf. Gal. 4:26; Eph. 2:6; Heb. 11:15–16; 12:22–23; 13:14). The patriarchs provide the pattern for this. They did not receive the promises but saw them from afar, thereby showing that they lived as xenoi ("aliens") and parepidēmoi ("strangers"; → 4215) on the earth (11:13). Christians are thus put under a new divine law of life, which shields them from the vices of the heathen, who regard them as strange (xenizō, 1 Pet. 4:4).

6. The Athenians supposed that Paul wanted to preach "foreign gods" (Acts 17:18). Anyone living in Athens (both Athenians and "the foreigners") were eager for what was new (17:21). But Paul preached "strange ideas" (part. of xenizō) to their ears (17:20). By contrast, the church is warned in advance against being led astray by "strange (xenos) teachings" (Heb. 13:9). The sufferings that befall the church are not "something strange" but belong to the Christian's lot (1 Pet. 4:12).

7. philoxenia (hospitality) is expected from the whole church (cf. 1 Pet. 4:9). It is recommended as a virtue to Christians (Rom. 12:13; Heb. 13:2). It is even connected with a promise: Because some have practiced hospitality (xenizō), they have entertained angels without knowing it (13:2; cf. Gen. 18:3; 19:2–3). In the NT many a door was opened to a messenger of the new covenant and the host was thus blessed. Cornelius received Peter, and Publius took in Paul and his companions (Acts 10:23; 28:7). Paul also requested Philemon to have a guest room (xenia) ready for him (Phlm. 22). The Pastoral Letters indicate the importance set by hospitality in the young church. It is not only the bishop who should be hospitable (philoxenos, 1 Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:8), but even the true widow was expected to show hospitality to strangers (1 Tim. 5:10).

See also allotrios, alien, hostile (259); diaspora, dispersion (1402); parepidēmos, staying for a while in a strange place; stranger, resident alien (4215); paroikos, stranger, alien (4230).

3830 ξηραίνω

ξηραίνω (xērainō), dry up (3830); ξηρός (xēros), dried up (3831).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. xērainō generally occurs in the pass. Both the vb. and noun are normally used in a lit. sense: of plants or of dry land, but sometimes of human ailments. In the LXX an act. form of xērainō occurs in Isa. 42:15 with reference to plants (cf. Jer. 51:36 = LXX 28:36). The pass. is more usual, however, and occurs in connection with trees (Ezek. 17:24; Joel 1:12), water (Gen. 8:7; 1 Ki. 17:7; Isa. 19:5–6), and Jeroboam's withered hand (1 Ki. 13:4). xēros often means dry land (e.g., Gen. 1:9); it can also be used of a sea that has been dried up (Jon. 1:9; 1 Macc. 8:23, 32). In Hos. 9:14 it is used of milkless breasts.

NT In the NT xērainō occurs in the act. only in Jas. 1:11, where it refers to the scorching effect of the sun's heat on grass. This effect is likened to the transience of a rich man's wealth.

The pass. form occurs in the story of Jesus' cursing of the fig tree (Matt. 21:19–20; Mk. 11:20–21), which illustrates Jesus' perception of the Jud. of his day—a leafy appearance of righteousness but without the fruit. In Matt. the tree withers at once, while in Mk. it happens overnight. Judgment is also central in Jn. 15:6, where a severed and withering branch is fit only for burning. In Lk. 23:31, set in the crucifixion narrative, dry wood (xēros) symbolizes times of testing and difficulty; a fearsome fate will overtake those guilty of the crucifixion in the less propitious times that are coming.

The parable of the sower uses the vb. of plants that lack good roots and therefore cannot withstand the heat of the sun (Matt. 13:6 par.). Here again a judgment motif is central, for the coming of the kingdom does not meet with universal recognition. In 1 Pet. 1:24 (a quotation from Isa. 40:7), the idea of withering stresses the fleeting nature of human existence in contrast to the permanence of God's Word. In Rev. 14:15 the vb. must be understood as to be ripe (or possibly overripe), i.e., fruit ready for harvesting.

The drying up of the Euphrates (Rev. 16:12) also appears in a prominently judgmental context; this is a prelude to the final battle between God and his adversaries. In Heb. 11:29 the word refers to the drying up of the Red Sea. When Jesus refers to the proselytizing activity of the Pharisees in Matt. 23:15, xēros is used of land in general.

Several occurrences of both words can be found in connection with the healing ministry of Jesus: a man with a withered hand (Matt. 12:10 par., likely a form of paralysis; cf. "paralyzed" in Jn. 5:3), the woman with the flow of blood (Mk. 5:29), and the condition of rigidity to which an evil spirit reduces a young boy (9:18).

3831 (xēros, dried up), → 3830.

3833 ξύλον

ξύλον (xylon), wood, pole, gallows, tree, cross (3833).

CL & OT 1. xylon is commonly used in cl. Gk. for wood as a building material, fuel, and that from which utensils and cultic objects are made. xylon as a tree is rare.

2. xylon is mentioned in the LXX (over 200x) as fuel (Gen. 22:3), building material (6:14; Exod. 25:10–13; 1 Ki. 6:15), and an instrument of torture (shackles, Job 33:11). Unlike cl. Gk., the meaning tree is common, denoting fruit trees, cypresses, and trees planted by running water (Gen. 1:11; Ps. 1:3; Isa. 14:8).

In the Garden of Eden, the tree of life represents the fact that all life comes from God as a gift; the tree of the knowledge of good and evil symbolizes the benevolent character of God's commands (Gen. 2:9). In setting the tree of knowledge as a limit, God lets humankind know that he both gives to them and requires obedience. But disobedience turns a created thing into a god, and the tree becomes a cultic object and the carving an idol. The prophets condemned Israel's apostasy as "adultery with stone and wood" (Jer. 3:9; cf. Isa. 40:20; 44:13–14; Ezek. 20:32).

Wood is rarely mentioned in the LXX as an instrument of torture and execution. However, executed criminals were "hung on a tree" (Deut. 21:22–23; cf. Jos. 10:26).

NT 1. The NT mentions xylon as a weapon (Matt. 26:47; Mk. 14:43) and as building material (Rev. 18:12). Jesus asked figuratively: "For if men do these things when the tree is green, what will happen when it is dry?" (Lk. 23:31). In other words, if Jesus himself was not spared divine judgment, how much more will Israel burn like dead wood in the fire of judgment?

In 1 Cor. 3:12 wood is mentioned metaphorically in the context of a series of materials ranging from gold to straw. There is only one possible foundation for the church—Christ. But we may build a variety of structures on this foundation, all of which will be tested by fire. Those that are perishable, like wood and straw, will be consumed, though the foundation will remain. One's work may be burned up, but the person will be saved, yet only as through fire (3:13–15).

2. The concepts of the tree (cross) as a curse and the tree of life are theologically more central. Peter accused the Jewish leaders of killing Jesus "by hanging him on a tree" (Acts 5:30; cf. 10:39). This expression, reminiscent of Deut. 21:23, stresses the shame of the crucifixion. As someone hanged on a tree, Jesus stood under the curse of God (see Gal. 3:13). He took on himself in our place and for our benefit the curse of the law, and by his death he has destroyed it (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21). Alluding to Isa. 53:4, 12, Peter declares: "He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness" (1 Pet. 2:24). The tree is the place at which Christ's body, laden with our sin, was killed. Through his death on the cross, sin was annulled.

The tree of life reappears in Rev. 2:7. What was forbidden to Adam and Eve after their sin is available in the new Jerusalem, where that tree grows on either side of the river of life (22:2). The righteous alone have access to this tree (22:14, 19). It symbolizes life and presents a contrast with the cross as the wooden instrument of death. But the significance of the cross is retained, for it is the place where God bears and overcomes suffering and death, so that he may give life to a world overcome by sin and death (22:14).

See also stauros, cross (5089); dendron, tree (1285).

O omicron

3838 (ogdoos, eighth), → 3893.

3842 (hodēgeō, to lead, guide), → 3847.

3843 (hodēgos, leader, guide), → 3847.

3847 ὁδός

ὁδός (hodos), way, road, highway, way of life (3847); μεθοδεία (methodeia), method, in biblical and Christian literature only in an unfavorable sense, i.e., scheming, craftiness; (pl.) tricks (3497); εἴσοδος (eisodos), entrance, access (1658); ἔξοδος (exodos), departure, exit (2016); ὁδηγός (hodēgos), leader, guide (3843); ὁδηγέω (hodēgeō), to lead, guide (3842); εὐοδόω (euodoō), to lead on a good road, succeed (2338).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. hodos denotes a walk, journey, or voyage by land or sea; in a spatial sense, the path or road where one goes, drives, or marches; also the passage a ship takes. The term is used early on in a fig. sense for the means and way of reaching or carrying out something, measures, procedure, the style in which one lives. Life is occasionally compared to a way.

(b) eisodos denotes entering, going into, entry; in the spatial sense the entrance or access to a place or building, the door (also fig.). exodos is the opposite: going out, departure; exit, door; fig., disappearing, the outcome of an event, end. In the sense of the end of life (death), it is rare. Anyone who does not know the way needs a hodēgos, a leader, to show the way (hodēgeō). Sometimes this vb. can mean to lead in the context of the journey of the soul to heaven.

(c) In Gk. lit. one often encounters the picture of the two ways: aretē (virtue) and kakia (badness). Whoever decides for virtue must be ready to undertake hard work and exertion. The motif of the two ways is frequently used in Hel. times with reference to the ethical decisions of humankind.

2. In the LXX hodos occurs nearly 900x, in both lit. and fig. senses. In most cases it translates Heb. derek, way. (a) God led his people by a way—out of Egypt, forty years in the desert, and then into the promised land. The way through the desert was a testing ground (Deut. 8:2).

(b) hodēgeō, to lead, occurs 44x, always with reference to God (e.g., Exod. 13:17; 15:13), mostly in Ps. in confessions of God's leading in an individual's life (e.g., 23:3) and in requests for his care and leading (e.g., 5:8). In Isa. 43:16, 19; 51:10, God is the one who makes the hodos, but wisdom replaces God in this leading in wisdom lit. hodēgos, leader, is found in a few late texts; only in Wis. 7:15 does it refer to God. exodos sometimes refers to Israel's departure from Egypt (e.g., Exod. 19:1; Num. 33:38; Ps. 105:38); elsewhere it is combined with eisodos in the sense of going in and out, which denotes continuous fellowship or all one's activities (e.g., 1 Sam. 29:6; Ps. 121:8).

(c) The expression "the way of God" often denotes the saving activity of God (Ps. 67:2; 145:17). His ways surpass human ways and cannot therefore simply be apprehended by people (Isa. 55:8–9). It is a different matter, however, with the ways God appoints as he bids us to walk in his commandments (e.g., Gen. 18:19). The frequent expression "to walk in the ways of God" means to act according to his will revealed in his law (1 Ki. 2:3; 8:58). That law is called "the way of the LORD" (Jer. 5:4), for which the prophets have to struggle to see that it is observed, because Israel repeatedly succumbs to the temptation to evade his demands (Exod. 32:8; Mal. 2:8). Other related expressions were also used: e.g., "way of your testimonies," "way of truth," "way of your commandments" (Ps. 119; cf. "[wisdom's] ways" in Prov. 3:17).

(d) Human life as a whole or in its individual aspects can be called a way (Isa. 53:6; cf. Ps. 119:105). God's eyes see all our ways (Jer. 16:17; 32:19 = LXX 39:19); he has them in his hand (Dan. 5:23, Theod.). Thus it is good to entrust our ways to him (Ps. 37:5) and not go "in the way of sinners" (1:1). When we die, we go "the way of all the earth" (1 Ki. 2:2).

(e) The way by which God leads his people has salvation as its goal. The same applies to the ways he enjoins on us (Deut. 30:15–16), which is "the path [way] of life" (Ps. 16:11; Prov. 5:6). Turning from these ways leads to destruction and God's judgment (cf. Deut. 30:17–18). Wisdom maintains that wise conduct leads to a successful life, but foolishness leads to death (Ps. 1).

3. (a) Philo's use of hodos is influenced by general philosophical usage. The important lines of OT usage (i.e., "ways of God") are not found in him. The "royal" road that leads to God, the king of the universe, is equated with Wisdom, by which the spirit reaches its goal, knowledge of God. Asceticism plays an important role here. Philo also speaks of the necessity of a leader, since humanity does not know the way. It is the Logos, above all God himself, who, as the compassionate redeemer, leads the nous, the mind, on the right way.

(b) The rest of Jewish lit. shows the effect of the OT view. How God wants us to walk finds absolute expression as "the way" (2 Esd. 14:22). The way of the Lord is the way of the law or of righteousness. Probably the earliest attested reference to the expression "the two ways" in Jewish writing is T. Ash. 1:3: the way of light and the way of darkness. Likewise, the Qumran community speaks of two ways: that of truth and of wickedness. The children of righteousness walk in the ways of light; the children of error walk in the ways of darkness (1QS 3:17–21).

NT 1. (a) hodos in the lit. sense is found 55x in the NT, mostly in the Synoptics. The roads Jesus took are not mentioned, although he was often en tē hodō, i.e., en route with his disciples (e.g., Matt. 5:25; 15:32; Mk. 8:3; 10:52), and events happened along the way (e.g., Matt. 20:30; Mk. 10:46). "The way of a day" (lit., Lk. 2:44) is the distance one can cover in one day, a day's journey. "A Sabbath day's walk" (Acts 1:12) denotes the distance a Jew was allowed to walk on the Sabbath without transgressing Exod. 16:29 (about a half mile).

(b) hodos occurs 46x in a fig. sense, spread over the whole NT. It stands in part, like the OT usage, for God's deeds and saving activity (e.g., Rom. 11:33; Heb. 3:10; Rev. 15:3) or will (e.g., Matt. 22:16; Mk. 12:14; Lk. 20:21), often in OT quotations and phrases (Acts 2:28; cf. Ps. 16:11), and for one's way of life (Acts 14:16; Rom. 3:16; Jas. 1:8; 5:20). A further peculiarity in the NT is the absolute use of "the Way" in Acts as a designation for the Christian community and its preaching (see below).

(c) eisodos, entrance, access, approach, occurs 5x in the NT (Acts 13:24; 1 Thess. 1:9; 2:1; Heb. 10:19; 2 Pet. 1:11). exodos occurs 3x (Lk. 9:31; Heb. 11:22; 2 Pet. 1:15).

2. (a) Matt. 3:3; Mk. 1:3; Lk. 3:4 quote Isa. 40:3 with the call to "prepare the way" for the Lord. John the Baptist, the forerunner of Jesus, did so by announcing Jesus' coming and by calling people to repent and be baptized.

(b) In his Sermon on the Mount Jesus gives the double picture of the two ways and the two gates (Matt. 7:13–14). As in cl. Gk., the goals to which the two ways lead are brought into view. But here it is not the ethical problem of conduct, but the question of life or death, salvation or destruction, that is put before the hearers. The picture of the two ways figures in both Jewish and early Christian writings, though this saying is most closely related to Deut. 30:19.

(c) In connection with the conception of Jesus' high priesthood, Heb. 9:8 and 10:19–20 speak of the "way" or "entrance into the sanctuary," whereby hodos almost acquires the sense of eisodos, access. Jesus, the author of our salvation (12:2), has opened a previously nonexistent and living way of access for us to God through his sacrificial death. What separates us from God is sin; through Jesus' death we are freed from a guilty conscience (10:22). The underlying imagery here is the Day of Atonement ritual (cf. Lev. 16), in which the high priest entered the Most Holy Place once a year by means of sacrificial blood. Under the old covenant only the high priest had access to Yahweh; now we all do.

(d) In John's Gospel hodos is applied to the person of Jesus in a manner unique in the NT (14:1–6). Jesus there reveals himself to his disciples as the only way that leads to the Father: "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me" (14:6). The goal of this way is fellowship with the Father.

(e) In Acts hodos occurs 20x. In addition to other uses as already discussed, Acts uses "the Way" as a designation for the Christian religion (e.g., 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14). Perhaps this comes from such expressions as the Christian proclamation being termed "the way to be saved" (16:17), "the way of the Lord" (18:25), and "the way of God" (18:26). When Paul admits that he persecuted "the followers of this Way" (22:4), he means the Christian community and its message of the resurrection of the Crucified One. Included in this expression is the fact that this message also comprises a particular walk of life.

(f) The "most excellent way" of which Paul speaks in 1 Cor. 12:31b means living a life governed by love, agapē (→ 27), which is ranked above any aspirations after spiritual gifts (cf. 1 Cor. 14:1; Phil. 2:1–5). Note also 1 Cor. 4:17, where Paul uses the expression "my way of life in Christ." There he is dealing with conformity with Christ, and he summons the congregation to be his "imitators," i.e., to walk in that way.

(g) In 2 Pet., in order to combat heresy, Christianity is called "the way of truth" (2:2) and "the way of righteousness" (2:21). It is viewed from the angle of the new morality that it brings, which distinguishes it from paganism. The false teachers, by contrast, left the "straight way" and followed the "way of Balaam" (2:15; cf. Num. 22–24), thus bringing Christianity into disrepute. This and the similar expression in Jude 11 ("way of Cain"; cf. Gen. 4:3–8) should be understood from the viewpoint of later Jewish tradition, which saw Cain and Balaam as the originators of all libertines and heretics.

3. (a) The noun hodēgos, leader, guide, is found only 5x in the NT. In Acts 1:16 the word is used lit. of Judas, who guided those who arrested Jesus. In Matt. 15:14; 23:16, 24, Jesus refers to the Jewish leaders as "blind guides." Similarly, in Rom. 2:19, Paul characterizes the Jew who is instructed in the law as one who presumes to be "a guide for the blind."

(b) hodēgeō, to lead, guide, also occurs 5x. In Matt. 15:14; Lk. 6:39, it is used in Jesus' statement about the blind leading the blind. But it is used in Jn. 16:13 with reference to the Spirit of truth, who will "guide ... into all the truth," and in Rev. 7:17 of the Lamb who, as a shepherd, will "lead" those who have been made perfect to springs of living water. In Acts 8:31, this vb. is used fig. for guiding someone in understanding the Scriptures.

(c) methodeia occurs only 2x in the NT, both in the negative sense of scheming or cunning devices (Eph. 4:14; 6:11)—threats to which Christians are exposed.

(d) euodoō means to lead along a good road; in the NT it is always fig., i.e., to prosper, succeed (Rom. 1:10; 1 Cor. 16:2; 3 Jn. 2).

See also anastrephō, to overturn, turn back, turn round; fig. behave, conduct oneself, live (418); peripateō, go about, walk (4344); poreuomai, go, to journey, to travel, to walk (4513).

3857 οἶδα

οἶδα (oida), know, understand (3857).

CL & OT oida is a defective perf. of the stem eid-, to see, with a pres. meaning, to know. In other words, if one has seen something, one knows it. The emphasis here, however, is on intellectual or theoretical knowledge (i.e., "I have perceived" = "I know"). ginōskō, by contrast, tends to stress the acquisition of knowledge (to come to know; → 1182).

As time went on, however, esp. in the development of Hel. Gk., ginōskō and oida became virtually synonymous. For example, in Isa. 59:8 ("the way of peace they do not know"), the LXX has oida and a variant reading has ginōskō. Note also Sir. 34:9–10 (= LXX 31:9–10): "An educated person knows [ginōskō] many things . . . an inexperienced person knows [oida] few things" (NRSV).

NT 1. oida occurs well over 300x in the NT, about 100x more than ginōskō. Paul uses oida 103x, Jn. uses it 84x in his Gospel and 16x in 1 and 3 Jn., the Synoptics use it 70x. One is hard-pressed to find any significant difference in Koine Gk. between these two words. In scholarly circles, however, the latter tends to get more attention, probably because of the relationship of ginōskō/gnōsis to the philosophical movement called Gnosticism (see further, ginōskō, 1182). When biblical writers appear to have an early form of this movement in mind in the context of their writing, they tend to use ginōskō rather than oida (though this is less true of Jn.).

2. On the similarities in use between ginōskō and oida, note such par. passages as Matt. 16:3 (ginōskō) and Lk. 12:56 (oida), "know how to interpret." Both Jn. in Jn. 7:27 and Paul in 2 Cor. 5:16 use the two vbs. synonymously in virtually identical phrases. Note also the various places where oida serves as a textual variant for ginōskō (e.g., 1 Cor. 8:2; Phil. 2:22) and vice versa (e.g., Lk. 6:8; Jn. 21:4; Rom. 15:29).

3. Briefly, as far as uses of oida are concerned, the subj. of the vb. is generally a person (e.g., Mk. 11:33) or a spiritual being (e.g., 1:24, 34). Regarding the obj. of one's knowing, one can know (or not know) God (Jn. 8:19; 1 Thess. 4:5; 2 Tim. 1:12) or another person (Matt. 25:12; 26:72, 74; Mk. 1:24; Jn. 1:31)—in the sense of either recognizing who that person is or knowing him or her personally. Esp. prominent is the knowing of facts or teachings (e.g., Mk. 10:19, the commandments; Rom. 2:2, God's judgment; 2 Tim. 3:15, the Scriptures); in such cases oida is often followed by hoti, that ("I know that . . . ," e.g., Jn. 5:32; Rom. 5:3). One can also know how to do something (e.g., Matt. 7:11, how to give good gifts; Phil. 4:12, know how to handle poverty and plenty). Paul uses this vb. in the sense of remember (1 Cor. 1:16).

Jesus had the ability to know a person's thoughts (Matt. 9:4; 12:25; Mk. 12:15), though the Son does not know the day or the hour set by the Father for his return (13:32). The disciples sometimes had difficulty understanding what Jesus was trying to communicate—e.g., in his parables (4:13) or in his reference to leaving for a little while and then returning (Jn. 16:18).

See also ginōskō, know (1182); epistamai, know, understand (2179).

3858 (oikeios, belonging to the house, member of the household), → 3875.

3860 (oiketēs, slave, household servant), → 3875.

3861 (oikeō, dwell, inhabit), → 3875.

3864 (oikia, dwelling, house), → 3875.

3866 (oikodespoteō, be master of a house, rule one's household), → 1305.

3867 (oikodespotēs, the master of a house), → 1305.

3868 οἰκοδομέω

οἰκοδομέω (oikodomeō), build, build up (3868); οἰκοδομή (oikodomē), the process of building, a building (3869); ἐποικοδομέω (epoikodomeō), build on something, build further (2224); ἀνοικοδομέω (anoikodomeō), rebuild (488); συνοικοδομέω (synoikodomeō), build together with (5325).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. oikodomeō means to build, build up, and is used in many ways both lit. and fig. oikodomē, building up, building, originally meant the process of building.

2. In the LXX oikodomeō occurs almost 350x, mostly in the lit. sense for the erection of a building. oikodomē, on the other hand, occurs rarely and mostly in later writings. The fig. use of oikodomeō, which occurs esp. in Jer., is interesting. To "plant" and to "build" go together (24:6); they are God's work and have their opposites in God's judgment to "uproot" and to "destroy" (1:10). God himself will rebuild Israel (31:4; 33:7 = LXX 38:4; 40:7) by putting his words in the mouths of the prophets (cf. 1:9–10). He leads the nations into the fellowship of Israel and thus builds them up (12:14–16). This OT use of the concept particularly influenced Paul's usage (→ oikos, 3875).

NT 1. The opposites build (oikodomeō) and destroy (katalyō) were used in the accusation against Jesus at his trial (Matt. 26:61; Mk. 14:58; cf. also Jn. 2:19–20); the passages speak of destroying the temple with hands and in three days building another, not made with hands. Jn. 2:19–22 interprets this in terms of Jesus' resurrection and even uses egeirō, to raise, rather than oikodomeō. Mk. 14:58, however, can be understood perfectly well as a prophecy of the erection of the new fig. temple, i.e., the eschatological community. Such an interpretation agrees with the promise about building the church in Matt. 16:18. In any event, both passages ultimately refer to the believing community as the eschatological building of God.

2. The use of this word group in Acts must likewise be seen against its OT background. anoikodomeō in Acts 15:16 refers to Amos 9:11 and perhaps to Jer. 12:15–16 and promises the eschatological restoration of the people of Israel.

3. The most important passages for understanding this concept occur in Paul's letters, where almost all the occurrences of the noun are found (though the verbal use is more important). oikodomē has the meaning of a building only in 1 Cor. 3:9 and 2 Cor. 5:1; otherwise it denotes the process of building and has the same meaning as the vb.

(a) oikodomē describes Paul's apostolic activity (2 Cor. 10:8; 12:19; 13:10) against the background of OT models (cf. Jer. 1:10; 24:6; esp. the opposites of "destroy" and "build up"). In 1 Cor. 3:5–17 Paul combines the two images of planting and building in order to illustrate the process of building the temple of God (i.e., the Christian community, 3:16).

(b) Apart from the activity of the apostle, oikodomeō and oikodomē describe the inner growth and outer expansion of the community through the Spirit. There is one rule that applies to everything that takes place within the church: It must serve to build up the community (Rom. 14:19; 15:2; 1 Cor. 14:12, 17, 26; Eph. 4:29; 1 Thess. 5:11). Thus the gifts of grace and offices are judged according to what they contribute to that building up (1 Cor. 14:3–5; Eph. 4:12). Paul scolds the Corinthians: "Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up" (1 Cor. 8:1). The enthusiasts in Corinth perhaps had a slogan, "Knowledge builds up," which Paul here corrects. Similarly in 10:23 Paul corrects the Corinthian slogan that "everything is permissible" by urging people to ask themselves whether their actions are conducive to building up the community.

(c) The positive use of oikodomeō always refers to the community. Paul uses sharp words to criticize anyone who speaks in a tongue simply to edify (oikodomei) himself or herself (1 Cor. 14:4). Edification not aimed at serving others is self-centered and pointless.

4. In Eph. 4:12, 16, the image of the body of Christ appears alongside that of building. This leads to the thought that the building grows (like an organism). The same idea of a building growing (the cornerstone of which, Jesus Christ, has indeed already been put in position) appears in Eph. 2:19–22 (cf. also Matt. 21:42; Acts 4:10–11; 1 Pet. 2:7). To be built into this growing building means to be put in as "living stones" (1 Pet. 2:5). All these passages are concerned with the unity and holiness of the Christian community.

5. oikodomē is used as an anthropological term in an individualistic perspective only in 2 Cor. 5:1. The transient tent of the earthly body is contrasted with an eternal oikodomē, prepared by God, not made with hands.

6. synoikodomeō (build together; pass. be built into, Eph. 2:22) and epoikodomeō (build on something) underline again the idea of fellowship contained in the concept of "building up." Believers are rooted and built up in Christ (Col. 2:7). The Christian community is also built up together through the cooperation of all the participants (1 Cor. 3:10–14) and in unity with the apostles and prophets (Eph. 2:20), to become the one holy community of the Lord.

See also oikos, house, dwelling place (3875); oikonomia, management, office (3873).

3869 (oikodomē, the process of building, a building), → 3868.

3872 (oikonomeō, manage, administer, plan), → 3873.

3873 οἰκονομία

οἰκονομία (oikonomia), management, office (3873); οἰκονόμος (oikonomos), steward (3874); οἰκονομέω (oikonomeō), manage, administer, plan (3872).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. oikonomia referred primarily to the management of a household, but was extended to the administration of the state and then to any kind of activity resulting from the holding of an office. oikonomos was used of people and has a more concrete meaning. It denotes the house steward and by extension the managers of individual departments within a household (e.g., porter, head cook, accountant, who were domestic officials recruited from among the slaves). Similarly, oikonomeō means to manage as a house steward, order, regulate.

2. The use of these words in the LXX does not give much help toward understanding the NT concept. oikonomia occurs only in Isa. 22:19, 21, where it means administration, office. oikonomos appears more frequently and is likewise used in the technical sense of a court official, chiefly the royal palace governor (e.g., 2 Ki. 18:18, 37; 19:2; Isa. 36:3, 22; 37:2). oikonomeō is used in Ps. 112:5 to describe how one "conducts" one's affairs (cf. also 2 Macc. 3:14; 3 Macc. 3:2).

NT This word group does not appear frequently in the NT: oikonomia occurs 9x, oikonomos 10x, and oikonomeō only once (Lk. 16:2). Nevertheless, a specific NT usage has been established that has two main different aspects.

1. (a) The words are used in their technical sense, both lit. and fig., to denote household and state managers and their tasks (Lk. 12:42; 16:1–8; cf. its use as a title with the name Erastus, Rom. 16:23). Also belonging in this category is Gal. 4:2, where oikonomos describes humanity's being like a minor child prior to the coming of Christ, but it also serves within the metaphor as the designation of an occupation, in order to clarify a legal concept: "He is subject to guardians [epitropous] and trustees [oikonomous] until the time set by his father." In Lk., the only Gospel in which oikonomos and oikonomia appear, oikonomos may be used alternately with doulos, slave (12:42–47; but cf. 16:1–8). Admittedly both of these passages are parables, so one can on this ground speak in a certain sense of a fig. use of the words.

(b) This use of the word group is found elsewhere in the NT. For example, in 1 Cor. 4:1 Paul uses oikonomos to describe his apostolic task and then names faithfulness as an essential requirement in a steward (4:2). Likewise, Tit. 1:7 requires that "an overseer ... entrusted with God's work [oikonomos] ... must be blameless." In 1 Pet. 4:10 one reads that all the members of the community, as recipients of the gifts of grace, are administrators of God's grace.

(c) To understand the concepts of this word group we must note that its root lies in the concept of the house, oikos (→ 3875). God's people, God's community, form his house, which he builds up through those whom he has called to the task and to whom he has entrusted its administration. Such people must regard these household affairs as their own; they are merely stewards of the gifts entrusted to them and will have to give an account of their activities (Lk. 16:2; cf. Matt. 25:14–30; Lk. 19:11–27, which describe the same concept though without the word oikonomos). In addition to the gifts of the Spirit (1 Pet. 4:10), it is esp. the gospel that is entrusted to stewards. Thus Paul refers to himself and his fellow workers as "servants of Christ and as those entrusted with the secret things of God" (1 Cor. 4:1). Likewise in 9:17 Paul calls the preaching of the gospel a "trust" that has been committed to him (his oikonomia), from which he cannot withdraw. Eph. 3:2 and Col. 1:25 perhaps belong here as well. In all these passages the divine office committed to the apostle is under discussion.

2. The NT use of oikonomia moves in a second direction in the sense of God's plan of salvation. This meaning, related to salvation history, could have arisen on the basis of the breadth of meaning of the Gk. word. In Eph. it is used for God's plan of salvation, hidden from eternity in God (3:9) but now, in the fullness of time, realized in Christ (1:10).

3. The two meanings of the term are not completely independent. Because God allows his plan of salvation to be proclaimed through human beings (1 Cor. 4:1; Eph. 3:9), the work of the oikonomos is rooted in the divine oikonomia. Since time has its function in God's plan, a definite period of time is given to the steward, even though he or she may not himself know how long it is (Lk. 12:46). At the end one must render account. Thus in God's plan of salvation time itself is a gift entrusted to us, to be used (Eph. 5:15–16; Col. 4:5) and managed responsibly.

See also oikos, house, dwelling place (3875); oikodomeō, build, build up (3868).

3874 (oikonomos, steward), → 3873.

3875 οἶκος

οἶκος (oikos), house, dwelling place (3875); οἰκία (oikia), dwelling, house (3864); οἰκέω (oikeō), dwell, inhabit (3861); κατοικέω (katoikeō), inhabit (2997); κατοικητήριον (katoikētērion), dwelling place, habitation (2999); κατοικίζω (katoikizō), settle (3001); ἐνοικέω (enoikeō), live in, dwell in (1940); οἰκεῖος (oikeios), belonging to the house, member of the household (3858); οἰκέτης (oiketēs), slave, household servant (3860).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. oikia originally denoted the specific dwelling place, oikos the whole house, the premises, the family property, and even the inhabitants of the house. Later, esp. after the LXX, the distinctions were not maintained and the words became synonyms. In popular speech oikos meant any kind of house, but frequently a particular house, even a temple. In such cases the divine name attached to oikos indicated the god to whom the temple was dedicated. The vb. oikeō, used intrans. means to have one's dwelling, dwell; trans. to inhabit, occupy.

2. oikos and oikia appear frequently in the LXX, both denoting a building (house, palace, or temple). But because Heb., like Gk., has no word for the small social unit we call the family, bayit (and hence oikos) also acquired the meaning of household (those bound together by sharing the same dwelling place); in a broader sense, family and clan; and even still bigger, tribal unit (e.g., the house of Judah). When Ps. 127:1 states that God must build the house if it is to endure, it refers both to those who live under one roof and to their heirs and descendants (2 Sam. 7:11–29), who must give one another unconditional protection.

3. (a) Used with God's name, oikos means the temple, the sanctuary. Beside criticism of the idea that anyone could build God a house (2 Sam. 7:5–6; 1 Ki. 8:27; Isa. 66:1), we find sincere expressions of joy at the privilege of being in the house of the Lord, esp. in Ps. (e.g., 23:6; 26:8; 27:4; 84:4, 10; 122:1). To this feeling corresponds the longing for God's house on the part of those who are prevented from being there (cf. 42:4).

(b) It is doubtful whether the idea of the "house of God" is transferred from the temple to the congregation worshiping in that place in the same way as oikos meant both house and family. All the statements about the house of God remain firmly attached to the earthly sanctuary. The only verse that expressly lies behind the NT understanding of the congregation as the "house of God" (Num. 12:7 = Heb. 3:2, 5) does not refer directly to the temple but to the land in which Yahweh (through his people) has settled and therefore reigns. Most likely an extended use of "house of David" for the people of God prepared the way for the idea that the community was "God's house" and "God's building."

4. In the Qumran documents "house" denotes the Qumran community, which understood itself as a temple or sanctuary (1QS 8:9; 9:6; CD 3:19).

NT oikos and oikia are virtually synonymous in the NT and have the same range of meaning as in cl. Gk. and the LXX. Nevertheless, they occur in a number of characteristic phrases peculiar to the NT. In these oikos appears more frequently.

1. The most frequent use of both oikos and oikia is in the lit. sense of house (e.g., Matt. 2:11; 7:24–27; 9:7; Mk. 7:30) and in the simple metaphorical sense of family, household (e.g., Matt. 13:57; Mk. 6:4; Jn. 4:53; 1 Cor. 1:16; 16:15; 2 Tim. 1:16; 4:19).

2. Passages that use oikos theou ("house of God") for the temple are self-explanatory (e.g., Mk. 2:26; 11:17; Jn. 2:16–17). The only question has to do with Acts 7:46–50, whether Stephen is here criticizing Solomon's building of a house for God (7:47) in contrast with David's request to be allowed to make God a dwelling place (skēnōma in 7:46; → skēnē, 5008). The statement, illustrated by the allusion to Isa. 66:1 that "the Most High does not live in houses made by men" (7:48), may support such an interpretation. In any case, Stephen's words had a blasphemous ring for the Jews.

3. Passages that speak of "the house of Israel," "the house of Jacob," or "the house of Judah" (e.g., Lk. 1:33; Acts 7:42; Heb. 8:8, 10) are linked with the metaphorical sense of house, family, race (cf. "house ... of David" Lk. 1:69; 2:4), which they extend in the direction of the people of God. In this they are following the OT example.

4. (a) The NT designation of the Christian community as the house of God goes beyond the OT model (Heb. 3:2–6; 10:21; 1 Pet. 2:5; 4:17). Behind this, perhaps, lies the OT concepts of God's proprietary rights over his people (expressed there, admittedly, more through the images of the vine, the vineyard, and the plantation, Ps. 80:8–16; Isa. 5:7; Jer. 2:21; Hos. 10:1; cf. 1 Cor. 3:6–9), but which apply equally in the case of the house. Further, note that Qumran documents also see the community as a holy house, built on the foundation of truth (1QH 7:8–9).

(b) In its exposition of Num. 12:7, Heb. 3:1–6 is linked to the OT in its terminology, but it extends the thought. Moses and Christ are contrasted: Moses was "faithful in all God's house" as a servant, while Christ was the "son" and "builder" of the house and thus superior. Whatever sense "house" may have had in Num. 12:7 (Israel as God's people or God's royal household), for the writer of Heb. it meant that the Christian community is "God's house," as 3:6b concludes: "We are his house, if we hold on to our courage and the hope of which we boast."

(c) What is important in this connection is not only that God or Christ is regarded as the builder of the house, but also that the Christian community as a whole is designated as a house. Moreover, Paul's references to the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 3:16; cf. 6:19), an idea undoubtedly connected with the idea of the house of God, are to be understood as the Christian community and the problems that arise from the fellowship.

(d) Eph. 2:19–22 shows that the ideas contained in the terms "household" of God and "temple" of God naturally run into one another. Here, no less than six different derivatives of oikos (though not oikos itself) are used to describe the spiritual reality of the community under the metaphor of the temple and of a building. In 1 Pet. 2:4–5 the images also overlap. Christians should allow themselves to be built up as spiritual stones into a spiritual house (→ oikodomeō, 3868), in order to present spiritual sacrifices to God as (here the picture changes) a spiritual priesthood. When 4:17 reckons that the judgment will begin with "the family [oikos] of God," the natural assumption is the Christian community. Similarly, 1 Tim. 3:15 expressly identifies "God's household [oikos]" with "the church of the living God, the pillar and foundation of the truth."

(e) Given the fig. use of the terms, it was inevitable that numerous related concepts and images would be introduced to elucidate the truth concerning the Christian community as God's house. There is the idea of the foundation (1 Cor. 3:10–12; Eph. 2:20; 2 Tim. 2:19), of Christ as the capstone or cornerstone (Acts 4:11; Eph. 2:20; 1 Pet. 2:4), of Christians as living stones (1 Pet. 2:5), of pillars (1 Tim. 3:15), and above all of the temple (1 Cor. 3:16–17; 6:19; 2 Cor. 6:16; Eph. 2:21).

5. (a) The idea of the church as the family of God came into being in the early Christian community through the house churches. The household as a community (the family included slaves) formed the smallest unit and basis of the congregation. The house churches mentioned in the NT (Acts 11:14; 16:15, 31, 34; 18:8; 1 Cor. 1:16; 2 Tim. 1:16; 4:19; Phlm. 2) no doubt came into being through the use of the homes as meeting places. The gospel was preached in them (Acts 5:42; 20:20), and the Lord's Supper was celebrated there (2:46). The conversion of the head of the house brought the whole family into the congregation and—however it is to be understood—into the faith (16:31, 34; 18:8).

The NT also speaks of the baptism of whole households in the same way (Acts 16:15; 1 Cor. 1:16; cf. Acts 16:33; 18:8). For the question whether one may conclude from this that the early church practiced infant baptism, → baptizō, 966.

(b) The formation of the house churches was of the greatest significance for the spreading of the gospel. With them the early church took over the natural order of life without falling into idealization of the house churches. The way in which the Gospels take up Micah's prophecy of the end times (Mic. 7:6; see Matt. 10:35–36; Lk. 12:53) indicates that the Christian community had to reckon with the disruption of the family for the sake of the gospel. Those who believe in Jesus are promised "in this present age ... homes, brothers, sisters, mothers, children" (Mk. 10:30 par. Matt. 19:29; Lk. 18:29–30). The place of the disrupted family is taken by the new family of God, the Christian community.

6. Jesus in Jn. 14:2 promises his disciples "many rooms" in his "Father's house," into which the disciples will be received when the Lord returns to establish God's kingdom. Most likely behind this lies the notion of Christ's followers as forming a house or family.

7. (a) The vb. oikeō, live, occurs in the NT both in a lit. and fig. sense. Belonging to the former category is 1 Cor. 7:12–13, which deals with marriages of Christians and non-Christians, while 1 Tim. 6:16—God "lives in unapproachable light"—stands on the borderline between lit. and fig. meanings. In a fig. sense oikeō describes the inner processes in humans; for example, the phrase "sin living in me" (Rom. 7:20, cf. 7:18) depicts the old self, while the truth about the new self is reflected in the confession of faith, "the Spirit of God lives in you" (8:9; cf. 8:11; 1 Cor. 3:16). katoikizō occurs in the same sense in Jas. 4:5.

(b) The compound katoikeō occurs more frequently in the NT than oikeō. Beside the widespread use of the word in its lit. meaning, it is also used for the possession of a person by God, by Christ, or by ungodly powers. Demons "live" in a person (Matt. 12:45). To believers God's purpose is "that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith" (Eph. 3:17). Col. 2:9 can declare that in Christ "all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form" (cf. 1:19; → plēroō, 4444). The noun katoikētērion, dwelling place, home, occurs in connection with the great picture of the Christian community as the spiritual building and temple (Eph. 2:19–22).

(c) Another compound, enoikeō, dwell in, indwell, is only used in the fig. sense in the NT, similarly to katoikeō. God himself will live among us (2 Cor. 6:16), and the Holy Spirit now lives in believers (Rom. 8:11; 2 Tim. 1:14). But the word of Christ (Col. 3:16) and faith (2 Tim. 1:5) are also said to dwell in us. On the other hand, the same may be said of sin (Rom. 7:17, oikeō).

(d) The adj. oikeios is only used as a substantive meaning member of the household. The lit. meaning appears in 1 Tim. 5:8. In the other two passages it denotes the congregation as the household of God. Eph. 2:19 assures the Gentiles that they are no longer strangers but have been accepted into full fellowship of the house of God. Gal. 6:10 reminds Christians of their duty to do good to everyone, but to begin with "those who belong to the family of believers."

(e) oiketēs is a word sometimes used only 4x for a household servant, far less frequently than doulos (→ 1528). Lk. uses it in Lk. 16:13 in the phrase that "no servant can serve two masters" (Matt. 6:24 simply uses "no one" in the par. passage). The household servants in Acts 10:7 are called by this term; Peter instructs slaves to submit to their masters (1 Pet. 2:18).

See also oikodomeō, build, build up (3868); oikonomia, management, office (3873).

3876 οἰκουμένη

οἰκουμένη (oikoumenē), earth (3876).

CL & OT oikoumenē (with gē understood) is the pres. pass. part. of oikeō, inhabit. It means the inhabited (earth) and was used first for the world inhabited by Gks. in contrast to those lands inhabited by "barbarians," then for the entire inhabited world (as opposed to unsettled areas). In the Roman period, it became more of a political concept than a cultural one, denoting the Roman empire.

The LXX uses the word 46x, especially in Ps. and Isa. In Ps. it often occurs in confessional expressions: "He will judge the world in righteousness" (9:8; cf. 67:4; 96:13; 98:9); "to the ends of the world" (19:4; cf. 72:8); "all the people of the world" (33:8; cf. 49:1). In Isa. it appears esp. in the oracles against the nations (e.g., 13:5, 9, 11; 14:17, 26; 23:17). Throughout the OT, the word means the inhabited world (e.g., Exod. 16:35, where Canaan is defined as "a land that was settled").

NT oikoumenē is found 15x in NT. The political and imperial usage is clearly the main one in Lk. 2:1, where Emperor Augustus ordered a census of the whole oikoumenē, i.e., the territories over which he ruled. The entire population of the oikoumenē suffers under satanic powers for religious, but primarily political, reasons (cf. Rev. 3:10; 12:9; 16:14). In the story of Christ's temptation, Lk.'s use of oikoumenē in 4:5 (cf. kosmos in Matt. 4:8) suggests a strong political connotation, even though "the kingdoms of the world" prevents a direct identification with the Roman Empire. In Lk. 21:26; Acts 11:28; Rev. 3:10 it is used in apocalyptic prophecies. In Acts 17:6 the enemies of the apostles attack them by insisting that evangelism was a political crime directed against the emperor by those "who have caused trouble all over the oikoumenē" (cf. also 19:27; 24:5).

It is striking that the term is not used by Paul except in Rom. 10:18, where he quotes Ps. 19:4. Perhaps Paul saw the state in a friendlier light than Luke and Rev. and thus avoided using for it an expression with negative overtones. The believers' place of fellowship is the ekklēsia (1711), not the oikoumenē. The church, however, lives in the oikoumenē, and she claims it for her Lord, who has been brought into the oikoumenē as God's firstborn (Heb. 1:6) and who therefore is its ruler.

See also gē, earth, world (1178); agros, field (69); chous, soil, dust (5967); kosmos, adornment, world (3180).

3880 οἰκτιρμός

οἰκτιρμός (oiktirmos), compassion, pity (3880); οἰκτίρω (oiktirō), have compassion, show pity or mercy (3882); οἰκτίρμων (oiktirmōn), compassionate (3881).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the root word oiktos means to lament or regret a person's misfortune or death, then metaphorically to show sympathy, pity. oiktirmos was originally a poetic form of oiktos. oiktirmōn, compassionate, seldom occurs. The vb. oiktirō means to have compassion, pity, in the sense both of mere feeling and of merciful action; it is often a synonym of eleeō (→ eleos, 1799).

2. The words of this group occur about 80x in the LXX and with the same range of meaning as in cl. Gk. They translate the same Heb. words as eleos and its derivatives. They are found most frequently in Ps. (e.g., 2 Sam. 24:14; Ps. 25:6; 40:11; 51:1; Isa. 63:15).

NT 1. Words in this word group occur 10x in the NT, far less than the eleos words. Since God is "the Father of compassion" (lit., "mercies") and as such shows mercy to humans (2 Cor. 1:3), Paul can use "God's mercy" in Rom. 12:1 as the bridge between doctrine and moral exhortation. Just as this phrase sums up God's saving acts and plan of salvation as outlined in Rom. 11, so also that same mercy is the presupposition—the grounds of the "therefore" (12:1)—for the Christian life. Because of God's compassion, believers should likewise be compassionate in their dealings with each other (Phil. 2:1; Col. 3:12). Heb. 10:28–29 points out that the punishment of someone who has "insulted the Spirit of grace" and has "trampled the Son of God under foot" will be less merciful (hence, more severe) than that meted out to a violator of the law of Moses.

2. The vb. oiktirō is found only in Rom. 9:15 (a quotation of Exod. 33:19), where it is parallel to eleeō, have compassion.

3. The adj. oiktirmōn in Jas. 5:11 (alluding to Ps. 103:8; 111:4) expresses "mercy" as a quality of God. In the Sermon on the Plain (Lk. 6:20–49) Jesus calls for us to be merciful (6:36), putting God's merciful attitude as the measure of human action.

See also eleos, compassion, mercy, pity (1799); splanchnon, inward parts, hence as the seat of emotion, the heart, love (5073).

3881 (oiktirmōn, compassionate), → 3880.

3882 (oiktirō, have compassion, show pity or mercy), → 3880.

3884 (oinopotēs, wine-drinker), → 306.

3885 (oinos, wine), → 306.

3886 (oinophlygia, drunkenness), → 306.

3893 ὀκτώ

ὀκτώ (oktō), eight (3893); ὄγδοος (ogdoos), eighth (3838).

NT Eight, like six in Lk. 13:14, is occasionally involved in the significance attached to seven, but is rarely important in itself. Thus "eight days" is just inclusive reckoning for a "week" (9:28; Jn. 20:26). The Jewish male child was circumcised on the eighth (ogdoos) day (cf. Gen. 17:12; Lev. 12:3; Lk. 1:59; 2:21; Phil. 3:5).

A difficulty is raised by two much debated passages, 1 Pet. 3:20 and 2 Pet. 2:5. In the latter case "Noah the eighth" (lit. trans. of ogdoos) gives the sense "Noah . . . and seven others." It is parallel, then, with 1 Pet. 3:20 ("only a few people, eight in all, were saved"), and the two passages have a similar reference. Peter's emphasis is on the small number of those saved from the flood. The concepts of 3:20 were the subject of allegoric interpretation in Justin Martyr (2d cent. A.D.), where the eight persons stand for the eighth day of resurrection and salvation.

3897 ὄλεθρος

ὄλεθρος (olethros), destruction, ruin, death (3897); ὀλοθρευτής (olothreutēs), destroying (3904); ἐξολεθρεύω (exolethreuō), destroy utterly (2017); ὀλοθρεύω (olothreuō), destroyer (3905).

CL & OT olethros means destruction, ruin, death; it can also refer to that which brings destruction. It often connotes sudden destruction, esp. destruction of life. In some cases it can mean the loss of things. exolethreuō, the intensive form of olothreuō, means destroy utterly, annihilate.

In the LXX, words of this group often carry the meaning of an eschatological destruction as a result of God's judgment (e.g., Jer. 5:6; 22:7; 25:36 = LXX 32:22; Ezek. 6:14; 14:16; Hag. 2:22 = LXX 2:23). The vb. exolethreuō is used in Deut., Jos., and Ps. to describe punishment by God. It expresses his wrath over human sin and the disobedience of his people Israel.

NT In the NT olethros occurs only 4x, all in Paul; olothreuō, olothreutēs, and exolethreuō are used one time each. In comparison with apōleia (→ 724), this seldom-used word group is used only for the destruction of persons.

1. exolethreuō occurs in Acts 3:23 in connection with a quotation of Deut. 18:15, 18–19, which is actually made more severe with this word. While Deut. 18:19 only says that God will "call [the sinner] to account" for disobedience to the words of the prophet, the actual punishment is now named: This person will be "completely cut off from among his people" (cf. Lev. 23:29). Peter probably modifies this OT text in order to bring home to his hearers the seriousness of their situation and the need for repentance. The same object may lie behind Paul's use of olothreutēs in 1 Cor. 10:10, where he warns the Corinthians about "the destroying angel" in the desert. This is likewise the significance of olothreuōn, destroyer, in Heb. 11:28, again in the context of a message from OT history (cf. Exod. 12:12–13, 23; Wis. 18:25).

2. In 1 Thess. 5:3 olethros refers to eschatological destruction suddenly breaking into a situation of apparent security and taking people unawares, like labor pains coming on a pregnant woman. Special candidates for this final destruction are the rich, whose end will be olethros and apōleia (1 Tim. 6:9). They, of course, are only one group among the ungodly, who will all suffer "everlasting destruction" (2 Thess. 1:9; cf. Ps. 37:17).

3. The context of 1 Cor. 5:5 suggests that the judgment of olethros may even fall within the province of the church. The Corinthian church has apparently countenanced a case of gross immorality, and Paul urges that the offender be "put out of your fellowship" (5:2). The goal behind this judgment is "to hand this man over to Satan, so that the sinful nature (sarx) may be destroyed (eis olethron) and his spirit saved on the day of the Lord" (5:5). Paul here envisions expulsion from the church (cf. 1 Tim. 1:20; also Rom. 6:6) into the realm dominated by "the god of this age" (2 Cor. 4:4). The offender in question is to be excluded from the sphere of grace and its promises, as mediated by the Word and sacraments, in the hope that he will be driven back to God in penitence. This expulsion is to take place at a formal meeting of the church (1 Cor. 5:4). Paul's recommendations suggest the proceedings laid down in Matt. 18:15–20, where the church is given power to bind and loose in heaven and on earth when gathered in the name of Jesus.

Elsewhere in Scripture, Satan is portrayed as one who in God's providence is permitted to afflict the flesh for the ultimate benefit of a person. Satan was allowed to afflict Job; despite every trial, however, Job retained his faith and integrity (Job 2:3–10). Paul's own "thorn in [his] flesh, a messenger of Satan" (2 Cor. 12:7), made him realize that God's strength is made perfect in human weakness (12:9). In 1 Cor. 5:5, however, the word olethros and the circumstances of the offense suggest that this case is so serious that the judgment of exclusion from the church and thus from the realm of grace are necessary. Paul's stated goal is that the person might suffer some severe illness or even succumb to physical death, as did Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11; cf. 1 Cor. 11:30). To be cut off from the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:12–26) is to be exposed to the reign of evil and death. The destruction of God's temple invites destruction by God (1 Cor. 3:17).

At the same time, Paul's expressed intention is that this man's "spirit [may be] saved on the day of the Lord" (1 Cor. 5:5; cf. 1:8; 3:13; 15:22–28). The destruction here envisaged is not the ultimate and complete outworking of God's wrath (as in 2 Thess. 1:9; 1 Tim. 6:9). The body may waste away, but the self will be clothed in life (2 Cor. 4:16; 5:4). Perhaps this man will be saved, "but only as one escaping through the flames" (1 Cor. 3:15). Or maybe Paul hopes that some temporal judgment will bring about in the man the "godly sorrow" that "brings repentance that leads to salvation" and not the "worldly sorrow" that "brings death" (2 Cor. 7:10). Some see Paul's remarks in 2 Cor. 2:5–11 as relating to the same situation as 1 Cor. 5, though this is by no means certain.

See also apōleia, destruction (724); phtheirō, destroy, ruin (5780); exaleiphō, wipe away, blot out (1981).

3900 (oligos, little, small, few), → 3625.

3901 (oligopsychos, fainthearted, timid), → 6034.

3902 ὀλιγωρέω

ὀλιγωρέω (oligōreō), despise (3902).

CL & OT oligōreō in cl. Gk. means think little of, make light of. In the LXX, it is used only in Prov. 3:11, which contains a warning against despising God's paideia, training.

NT The warning of Prov. 3:11 is quoted in Heb. 12:5 as an admonition from the heavenly Father to his persecuted children telling them to see their sufferings as a providential means of sanctifying them for the life God has in store for them.

3904 (olothreutēs, destroying), → 3897.

3905 (olothreuō, destroyer), → 3897.

3906 (holokautōma, whole burnt offering), → 2604.

3915 (ombros, rainstorm), → 847.

3920 (homichlē, mist, fog), → 847.

3923 ὀμνύω

ὀμνύω (omnyō), swear (3923); ὅρκος (horkos), oath (3992); ὁρκίζω (horkizō), adjure, implore (3991); ἐνορκίζω (enorkizō), adjure, cause someone to swear (1941); ἐπιορκέω (epiorkeō), swear falsely, commit perjury, break one's oath (2155); ἐπίορκος (epiorkos), perjured, perjurer (2156); ὁρκωμοσία (horkōmosia), asserting on oath, taking an oath (3993).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. omnyō is a parallel form to omnymi, both of which mean to hold fast and hence to swear. horkos meant originally the staff that was grasped and raised in swearing, thus oaths in general. The corresponding vb. horkizō means to put on oath, adjure. The compound enorkizō is a stronger form and means to adjure. epiorkeō means to swear falsely, commit perjury or break an oath; correspondingly epiorkos means perjurious. The noun horkōmosia is infrequent and means asserting on oath.

(b) The original idea behind the oath lay in guaranteeing one's word. An undoubtedly higher court of appeal was frequently provided by calling upon a deity. The formula of the oath had the character of conditionally cursing oneself if a statement should prove not to correspond to the truth. One can distinguish between assertive oaths, which are concerned with past and present events and are taken primarily in court, and promissory oaths, which promise a future activity and play an important part in religious as well as private life.

(c) The Gks. applied oaths to many areas, for many reasons, and in many forms. Their original setting was a cultic one, but the practice of swearing oaths found a place in politics and law with oaths for officials, citizens, and judges. Even the appropriate deities were fixed by the legislator, so that the oath in public life received religious sanction. Oaths were also used in contracts whose reliability might be guaranteed by the pledging of valuable property (children, the marriage bed, or weapons). The Gks. also used oaths in medicine: The Hippocratic oath is generally attributed to Hippocrates (ca. 460–ca. 357 B.C.), a physician who was a native of the island of Cos.

(d) In earlier times people almost always swore by the gods. In the Hel. period, oaths by deities were supplemented or replaced by those involving kings or emperors, either the person or the entire dynasty of the ruler of the day. It was the custom among the Romans for those who took oaths to take a stone in the hand and ask to be hurled forth like this stone if they broke their word.

(e) The increasing frequency of oaths led to a decline in their power and authority, and some ancient sources (esp. Roman) offer evidence of an attempt to ban the oath. For example, the Pythagoreans prohibited their disciples from using oaths. Plutarch declares that an oath, being a constraint on the spirit of a free person, was an indignity. These efforts to abolish oaths met with no success in Greece.

2. (a) The LXX usually translates the niph. of *šāba*ᶜ by omnyō, the hiph. by horkizō. The original meaning of *šāba*ᶜ is to come under the influence of seven things (cf. *šeba*ᶜ, seven). Gen. 21:30–31 offers evidence that in early times an oath was ratified by the sacrifice of seven animals (cf. 15:10).

(b) An ancient form of oath involved the practice of calling Yahweh to witness between two partners: "God is a witness between you and me" (Gen. 31:50; cf. 1 Sam. 20:12). Special weight is given to an oath by the ancient practice of invoking a curse on oneself if the oath is broken: "May the LORD deal with me, be it ever so severely, if . . ." (1 Sam. 20:13). The most frequent form is the phrase, "As the LORD lives" (20:3); this could be varied into an oath by the life of the king (17:55) or of the person addressed (1:26; 20:4).

(c) In treaties (between Abraham and Abimelech, Gen. 21:23; Jacob and Laban, 31:50) and bequests by father to son (Jacob and Joseph, 47:31), the oath had its original promissory function: The partners placed themselves under the power and judgment of Yahweh, who was invoked and recognized as witness for the validity of the promise. Thus the OT oath contained by implication a confession of faith in Yahweh (Deut. 6:13; 10:20). Therefore, to swear falsely is tantamount to a misuse of Yahweh's name (Exod. 20:7; Lev. 19:12). The OT does not know the assertive oath of a witness before a law court; instead it has the so-called oath of purification in which the accused, in the absence of pertinent witnesses, asserts innocence before Yahweh and corroborates this with curses if perjury is committed (Num. 5:11–28). Since perjury can rarely be detected, the person guilty of it is generally assigned to the judgment of God (1 Ki. 8:31–32).

(d) Whereas in Gen. we read chiefly of oaths taken by human beings, other places in the Pentateuch speak of Yahweh's oath. Yahweh swears by himself, and the form of oath is: "As surely as I live . . ." (Num. 14:21; Deut. 32:40). Yahweh guarantees with an oath the truth of his word, so that his oath is tantamount to a corroboration of his promise. He swore to give the land of Canaan to the patriarchs (1:8; 6:10, 18, 23) and sealed with an oath the covenant he made with the "forefathers" of Israel (4:31; 7:8, 12; 29:12–15). The basic elements contained in Yahweh's promises to the patriarchs (people [Gen. 12:2], land [13:15], and covenant [17:7]), are taken up again in the exhortations of Deut. and their validity is reinforced by references to Yahweh's oath (8:1, 18).

(e) Yahweh's oath also takes the form of a curse with which he punishes the disobedience of his people. Thus the grumbling Israelites will die in the desert (Num. 14:21, 28; Deut. 1:34–35; 2:14); Moses will not enter the promised land (4:21); the guilt of Eli will not be expiated (1 Sam. 3:14). The double-sided nature of Yahweh's oath, serving as it does both as corroboration of his promise and curse of disobedience, corresponds to the structure of blessing and curse (cf. Deut. 28; 30:19).

3. In rab. Jud. the practice of oath-taking became widespread. We read of the following types of oath: corroborative oath, oath of testimony, oath under pledge, judge's oath, rabbinical oath, and perjurious oath. As in Hel. culture, there were efforts to limit the excessive use of oaths (Sir. 23:9–11). Philo, like the Stoics, advocates the abolition of oaths. In his opinion it is best not to swear, second best to swear truly, but the worst thing of all is to commit perjury. The most radical rejection of oath-taking is found among the Essenes, who instead prized the plain word, though they did have oaths of initiation.

NT 1. (a) omnyō occurs 26x in the NT, most often in Matt. and Heb. The corresponding vb. horkizō occurs only in Mk. 5:7 and Acts 19:13, enorkizō only in 1 Thess. 5:27, epiorkeō only in Matt. 5:33, epiorkos only in 1 Tim. 1:10, and horkōmosia only in Heb. 7:20–21, 28.

(b) Matt. 5:33–37, in the Sermon on the Mount, contains Jesus' decisive pronouncement on oaths. It is joined to the OT prohibition of perjury (Lev. 19:12) and the commandment to keep one's vows (Num. 30:3–4; Deut. 23:23). In contrast to the OT, Jesus pronounces a total prohibition: "Do not swear at all" (Matt. 5:34). In order to exclude any misunderstanding that might water the teaching down, four explanatory phrases are added to give sharpness and clarity: not by heaven, earth, Jerusalem, nor one's own head is one permitted to swear (5:34–36). This constitutes an attack on the contemporary Jewish practice of oath-taking, in which an attempt was made to avoid misusing God's name in numerous oaths by means of circumlocution.

According to the Mishnah, swearing by the heavens and the earth was not binding on witnesses (m. Sheb. 6:13). Such an oath would thus be ambiguous and indeed a contradiction in terms. In Matt. 5:35 "by Jerusalem" means "toward Jerusalem" and may reflect the rab. view that a vow made "by Jerusalem" is nothing unless it is sworn while facing in the direction of Jerusalem. An oath "by your head" is referred to in m. Sanh. 3:2; a person's head is determined by God. In invoking these other authorities, in other words, one still had God to reckon with, for he is the Lord of all of them.

(c) Jesus' third woe against the teachers of the law and Pharisees (Matt. 23:16–22) attacks with like severity their casuistic attitude to oaths and vows. Those who swear by the altar, the temple, or heaven include in their oaths him who has given these things their authority, namely, God. In this way the hair-splitting rules governing the Jewish practice of oath-taking are reduced to absurdity. With these explanations, it is impossible to be in any doubt about the universal validity of Jesus' prohibition: Jesus forbids every oath, whether made in the religious sphere, court, everyday life, or private. For the oath adds nothing to the simple affirmation or negation.

(d) In view of the freedom with which oath-taking is presupposed and practiced in the OT, why does Jesus prohibit swearing? The oath was developed to combat lying and demands total truthfulness in what one says; indirectly it presupposes lying in everyday human speech. Lying, however, creeps into even the taking of oaths in the form of perjury and the misuse of God's name. Jesus therefore prohibits swearing in order to fight against lying. His aim is stated in the last sentence of the teaching: "Simply let your 'Yes' be 'Yes,' and your 'No,' 'No'; anything beyond this comes from the evil one" (Matt. 5:37; cf. also Jas. 5:12). The follower of Jesus is by no means released from responsibility before God. On the contrary, not only isolated statements, but one's whole speech takes place in the presence of the all-knowing God. Each word is to be nothing but the truth. Since an oath casts a shadow of doubtfulness over all one's other words, it is therefore "from the evil one."

(e) The words of Jesus are frequently introduced by the formula (lit.): "Truly [amēn, Amen, → 297] I say to you" (Matt. 5:18; cf. the Gospel of Jn.). This is not a form of oath, but rather the underlining of Jesus' words by the authority of his person (cf. Matt. 5:22, 28, 32, 34, 39, 44). He is "the truth" (cf. Jn. 14:6), and his words are therefore true. As Paul notes, "For no matter how many promises God has made, they are 'Yes' in Christ. And so through him the 'Amen' is spoken by us to the glory of God" (2 Cor. 1:20). Granted, before the Sanhedrin Jesus was pressed to state on oath that he was the Son of God, but Jesus refused the oath and simply affirmed what the high priest had asked: "Yes, it is as you say" (Matt. 26:63–64).

(f) Matt. 14:7–9 (cf. Mk. 6:23) provides an example of the rash practice of oath-taking. Herod, intoxicated at his birthday feast, casually swore to grant whatever his step-daughter might ask. Her mother, Herodias, took the opportunity to demand the head of John the Baptist, who had been imprisoned by Herod for denouncing Herod's liaison with Herodias. In his denial scene, Peter maintained that he did not know Jesus and corroborated this lie with an oath and curses on himself (Matt. 26:72–74; Mk. 14:71; cf. Lk. 22:60). Such an incident shows the danger of using oaths, as Jesus had earlier discussed.

2. No forms of oath are found in Paul's writings, only asseverations to underline the sincerity of his words. Particularly in his battle for the churches in Galatia and Corinth, he calls God to witness for the truth of his life story (Gal. 1:20) and his actions (2 Cor. 1:23). In Rom. Paul asserts the truth of his gospel (1:9) and stresses beyond all doubt his concern for his own nation: "I speak the truth in Christ—I am not lying, my conscience confirms it in the Holy Spirit" (9:1).

3. As in the OT, so in the NT we read of God's oath. In Lk. 1:73; Acts 2:30; Heb. 6:13, the oath of God means no more than his promises given to Abraham and David. Heb. even carries over the negative divine oath, God's curse on the disobedient Israelites in the desert (3:11, 18; 4:3; cf. Num. 14:21–23, 26; Deut. 1:34), in order to add a warning exhortation to obedience and zeal for the promised rest of God's people (Heb. 4:9–11). Heb. 6:16–17 alludes to the practice of oath-taking in order to contrast human oaths by someone or something greater with God's plain oath by himself.

Heb. 7:20–22 (horkōmosia) goes still further, drawing a distinction between God's plain word and his word under oath. In contrast to the appointment of the Levites as priests, which was made without an oath, God swore with an oath in Ps. 110:4 to demonstrate confidently that Christ's priesthood is better and unchangeable.

4. Rev. 10:6 echoes Dan. 12:5–7, in which an angel announces the end with an oath.

See also exorkistēs, exorcist (2020).

3924 ὁμοθυμαδόν

ὁμοθυμαδόν (homothymadon), unanimous, of one mind (3924).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. homothymadon means unanimous, with one accord, though the word is later weakened simply to mean together. In the political sphere it is used esp. for the visible, inner unity of a group faced by a common duty or danger. This unanimity is not based on common personal feelings but on a cause greater than the individual.

2. The LXX uses this word 36x. In the canonical books, homothymadon generally has the weaker meaning of together (e.g., Exod. 19:8; Job 2:11; Jer. 5:5). In the Apocr. it has both the earlier sense of unanimity (e.g., Jdt. 4:12; 15:2, 5; Wis. 10:20) and the weaker sense of together (e.g., 18:5; 3 Macc. 4:4).

NT 1. Apart from Rom. 15:6, homothymadon is used only in Acts (10x). In Acts 12:20 it means no more than that Tyre and Sidon join in sending envoys to King Herod Agrippa I. In the other cases a unanimity is indicated: the eleven with the women and Mary in prayer (1:14), the growing church worshiping in the temple (2:46–47; 5:12), the prayer after the release of Peter and John (4:24), the sending of Judas and Silas with the decisions of the Jerusalem meeting (15:25). There is unanimity even in the close attention paid to Philip's message (8:6) and in the hatred of the Jews (7:57; 18:12–13) and Hellenists (9:29) when faced with the message of the crucified and exalted Jesus.

Thus Acts manifests a double kind of unanimity—of the church and of its enemies. The cause is the same, the preaching of Christ as Savior and Lord. The reaction can be either faith and worship or hatred and rejection. The church's enemies are united when they reject the claims of Christ, for they see either their religious traditions or their commercial interests threatened. In a similar manner, the church's unanimity is not based on the sharing of the same human or religious feelings and convictions, but on the reality of Christ, who has brought together Jews and Gentiles (cf. Acts 15:11).

When the local church lives and works homothymadon, it is in harmony with its origin. If Lk. plays down most of the elements that militate against such unanimity in his picture of the early church (Acts 6:1–6; 15:37–40; cf. 8:1), it is hardly because he wants to idealize it. It does have its tensions and controversies (cf., e.g., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal.). Rather, Lk. wants to show the essential unity of the church, an expression of its nature and thus a pattern for later generations. As a unified body, it carries out its work of witness (Acts 1:8) in a world that rejects the salvation offered to it.

2. Paul envisages the same goal, the unanimous praise of God with one voice, in Rom. 15:5–6. He prays to God for "one heart" in service that comes from Christ and that surmounts all differences in understanding and knowledge.

3926 (homoiopathēs, with the same nature), → 3927.

3927 ὅμοιος

ὅμοιος (homoios), like, of the same nature, similar (3927); ὁμοίως (homoiōs), likewise, so, similarly, in the same way (3931); ὁμοιόω (homoioō), make like, compare (3929); ὁμοιότης (homoiotēs), likeness, similarity, agreement (3928); ὁμοίωμα (homoiōma), likeness, image, copy, appearance (3930); ὁμοίωσις (homoiōsis), likeness, resemblance (3932); ὁμοιοπαθής (homoiopathēs), with the same nature (3926); παρόμοιος (paromoios), like, similar (4235); παρομοιάζω (paromoiazo), be like (4234); ἀφομοιόω (aphomoioō), make like, similar (926).

CL & OT 1. The adj. homoios has four different though related meanings: (a) Of the same kind or condition, referring to persons and things. When linked with isos (→ 2698), homoios tends to emphasize similarity of kind rather than sameness. (b) Of the same character, endowed with the same rights (fellow member of a party, likeminded companion). Thus hoi homoioi means one's peers, the citizens who possessed the same right of access to office. (c) What is divided equally to all. (d) In geometry similar figures in the sense of equal.

2. (a) The vb. homoioō remains within this range of meaning. It means (act.) to make someone like a person or thing, hold in similar regard, compare; (pass.) to be like, resemble. (b) The nouns homoiotēs, homoiōsis, and homoiōma are virtually synonymous, meaning likeness, resemblance. (c) homoiopathēs means lit. suffering the same, then generally of similar disposition. (d) The rare paromoios means similar in the sense of almost the same (with minor differences). paromoiazō, to be similar, occurs first in the NT (Matt. 23:27). (e) aphomoioō means to make like, to copy; to become like.

3. In the LXX homoios is used in comparisons of the same or similar types, e.g., of animals in Lev. 11:14–22. homoioō means to be like; the nouns homoiōsis and homoiōma, pattern, shape, image (e.g., Exod. 20:4; Deut. 4:16–18), likeness. In Ezek. 1:5, 16, 22, 26; 2:1; 8:2–3; 10:1, 8, 10, 21–22; 23:15 homoiōma denotes the mysterious forms that the prophet saw. homoioō, as in cl. Gk., occurs often in the introduction to illustrations and parables (e.g., Ps. 144:4; Song 2:17; 7:8 = LXX 7:7; Sir. 13:1). It also features in statements about Yahweh's incomparability; e.g., "To whom will you compare me?" (Isa. 46:5).

In contrast to Yahweh's incomparability, Gen. 1:26 states that God created humans "in our image [→ eikōn, 1635], in our likeness [homoiōsis]." Humanity is here accorded a special creaturely worth and even has a special glory (Ps. 8:5). But the primary focus of this statement is not on how humans look but on the purpose for which the image is given, namely, to be God's authorized agents on this earth.

NT The majority of NT occurrences of the adj., adv., and vb. are in the Gospels, though homoios also occurs 21x in Rev. Most of the instances of the nouns, by contrast, are in the Pauline writings and Heb. homoioō and aphomoioō occur once each in Heb., while homoiopathēs occurs once each in Acts and Jas.

1. In the Gospels homoios and homoioō are found mostly in the introductory formula to Jesus' parables, esp. in Matt.: e.g., "the kingdom of heaven is like . . ." (13:24, 31, 33, 44, 45, 47; 18:23; 20:1; 22:2). The point of comparison is not, e.g., in 13:45 the merchant but the pearl; in 22:2 it is not the king but the wedding feast, etc.

2. In other passages homoios is found in varied connections. (a) In Matt. 22:39, in the double commandment, love for one's neighbor is placed beside love for God as its necessary counterpart and illustration. According to Jn. 8:55, Jesus would be a liar like his opponents if he were to be silent and avoid giving offense.

(b) homoios also occurs in connection with the polemic against the worship of false gods. In Acts 17:29 the idea that God cannot be depicted physically struck a chord among educated Gks., but it was to such people that Paul's speech before the Areopagus sought to present an apology for Christianity as the model of the only true worship of the "UNKNOWN GOD" (17:23). Rom. 1:23 also belongs to the polemic against the worship of false gods. Through their images the heathen have "exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like [en homoiōmati] mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles." Thereby the revelation of the true God is negated.

In Acts 14:11 the crowd thought that their gods, Zeus and Hermes, had taken on "human form" (homoioō) in Barnabas and Paul. The apostles protested, indicating that they too were ordinary humans "like" (homoiopathēs) the people of Lystra and mere messengers of the living God (14:15). homoiopathēs also occurs in Jas. 5:17, where Elijah is cited as a mortal person "just like us."

(c) Christians can expect that we will be "like" (homoioi) Jesus at his Parousia because we will see him as he is (1 Jn. 3:2). For the present we are instructed to seek the true knowledge of Christ in his Word, which only allows us a token knowledge of his true being (cf. 1 Cor. 13:12). At the Parousia, however, an unimpaired relationship will be possible. Yet the writer does not intend this isolated remark to be a speculative description of future likeness to God.

In Rev. 1:13 and 14:14 the "someone 'like a son of man'" is to be interpreted within the framework of Son of Man Christology (→ huios tou anthrōpou under huios, 5626). The "son of man" of Dan. 7:13, the divinely appointed, kingly judge of the world, is the exalted Christ, the coming Messiah.

(d) homoios occurs elsewhere in comparisons without having any particular stress of its own: e.g., see "and the like" in Gal. 5:21; cf. also the comparisons in Rev. 2:18; 4:3, 6–7; 9:7, 10, 19 in symbolic comparisons; homoiōma is used of a comparison in 9:7.

3. homoiōma plays an important role in the Christological statements of Rom. and Phil. to express both the divinity of the Preexistent One and the humanity of the Incarnate One. (a) Rom. 5:14 asserts that humankind as a whole, like Adam, has been subjected to the rule of death, even if it has not sinned in exactly the same way "as did Adam." Adam is the type of Christ, the last Adam (cf. 1 Cor. 15:45). What Christ brings about by grace surpasses by far the equivalent effect of the fall of the first man.

(b) Rom. 6:5 presents certain exegetical difficulties: "If we have been united with him like this [homoiōma] in his death, we will certainly also be united with him in his resurrection." The interpretation depends on whether one understands homoiōma here concretely as a picture (i.e., the symbolic representation of something else) or as the actual realization of an event by means of a symbolic representation. If one prefers the second alternative, the text then means: "In the act of baptism, the death of Jesus Christ is present, although in a different form from that on Golgotha," and we are "received into the same saving event."

(c) Rom. 8:3 also presents difficulties: "For what the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature, God did by sending his own Son in the likeness [homoiōma] of sinful man to be a sin offering. And so he condemned sin in sinful man." This text is difficult because of the theological problem of grasping conceptually the incarnation, i.e., the paradox of how Christ can be fully God and fully human, and applying it to the justification of the sinner. But by remaining obedient under the form of our bodily existence and bearing its burden, Jesus became in a unique way a sign of God's righteousness.

(d) Similarly in Phil. 2:7 the Incarnate One is described as "being made in human likeness [homoiōma]." He took on human form and became like a human being. Rather than understand this verse as reflecting only an apparent rather than a real likeness (which tends to Docetism) or as ethical (Jesus' coming into human flesh is merely a model for the obedience of faith), this passage applies unequivocally what has just been mentioned regarding Rom. 8:3: Christ has in fact taken a historically unique, unambiguously human form. He was in fact delivered to death, the curse of sinful humanity (cf. Gal. 3:13), even though he himself was sinless (cf. Heb. 4:15). Thus at a specific point in time he broke the power of sin and death.

4. (a) Heb. likewise uses homoioō, aphomoioō, and homoiotēs in connection with Christological statements. Christ "had to be made like [pass. of homoiōo] his brothers in every way" (2:17). Hence he was tempted "in every way, just as [homoiotēs] we are" (4:15). That Christ took flesh and blood and was thus placed in the situation of humanity before God is seen in the light of theological reflection as a matter of necessity. For only thus can the sentence of death, which hangs over humanity, be averted.

(b) In Heb. 7 the Son of God is compared with Melchizedek in the form of type and antitype. Melchizedek is said to be "like [aphomoiōo] the Son of God" (7:3). His priesthood is not limited in time. No genealogy is given for him, and his birth and death find no mention in the OT. Hence he possessed a special being and office. Thus, when Christ is installed in his priestly office "like [homoiotēs] Melchizedek" (7:15), he has both an office not limited in time and a share in "the power of an indestructible life" (7:16), to which he has opened the way of access (cf. 10:19–22) for us as our pioneer or originator (12:2).

5. The only verse in which homoiōsis occurs (Jas. 3:9) warns against sins of the tongue. The tongue is capable of contradictory opposites: blessing God and cursing humans, who have been created "in God's likeness" (cf. Gen. 1:26). In short, to curse humans is indirectly to curse God.

6. The term homoousios ("of the same substance," not used in the NT) became crucial in the history of Christian doctrine in view of its central importance in the Arian controversy. Arius and his followers denied Christ's divinity—specifically, he was not of the same substance as the Father. At the Council of Nicea (A.D. 325) homoousios was inserted into the creed to express the faith of the church. That initiated a debate as to whether homoiousios ("of a similar substance") might not express better the relationship between the Father and the Son. But nearly sixty years later, at the Council of Constantinople (A.D. 381), homoousios was reaffirmed. For more on this topic, see books on the history of Christian doctrine.

See also isos, equal, corresponding to (2698).

3928 (homoiotēs, likeness, similarity, agreement), → 3927.

3929 (homoioō, make like, compare), → 3927.

3930 (homoiōma, likeness, image, copy, appearance), → 3927.

3931 (homoiōs, likewise, so, similarly, in the same way), → 3927.

3932 (homoiōsis, likeness, resemblance), → 3927.

3933 ὁμολογέω

ὁμολογέω (homologeō), promise, confess, declare, praise (3933); ἐξομολογέω (exomologeō), promise, confess, praise (2018); ὁμολογία (homologia), confession (3934).

CL & OT 1. homologeō and homologia are compounds of homos, the same, similar, and legō, say. Hence homologeō means say the same thing, i.e., agree in one's statements; homologia means agreement, consent. The legal connotation is dominant. The religious use of the words is probably derived from the use of the word in the language of treaties and law courts. Those who bind themselves by an oath (homologeō) enter into a treaty relationship with the deity. The meaning of solemn confession of wrongdoing before a law court led to use of this word as the confession of sin to the deity.

2. In the LXX homologeō is used in the language of vowing and swearing. More common, however, is exomologeō (120x), praise, confess. It is sometimes used along with psallō, sing praises, or aineō, thank. The subject of a confession of praise is God's majesty and power (1 Chr. 29:12–13), his mighty acts in history (Ps. 105:1–6), his gracious goodness (118:1–4), his saving of people from distress (107:1, 8, 15, 21, 31), and his deliverance from enemies (9:1). The LXX also uses this word group for the confession of an offense to God (Jos. 7:19; 1 Ki. 8:33–36; 2 Chr. 6:24–27). The association of confession of sin and praise of God may seem strange to us (though note that we do use the word "confess" both for a confession of faith and of sin).

In Israel praise of God is linked with a definite past action of God, with a saving event in history, or even with an act of judgment. When the one praying confesses in thanksgiving that God is right and so recognizes one's own fault and the rightness of the subsequent punishment, the lawsuit against this person is closed. This gives a clue to the understanding of passages such as Jos. 7:19, where Achan is called on to give glory to God before his execution.

NT homologeō is found 26x in the NT with a wide range of usage; the same is true of exomologeō, which occurs 10x. The noun homologia (6x), however, is confined to the Christian confession (2 Cor. 9:13; 1 Tim. 6:12–13) and is used with a fixed liturgical connotation (cf. Heb. 3:1; 4:14; 10:23).

1. Herod promises with an oath to carry out his step-daughter's wish (homologeō, Matt. 14:7); Judas bound himself with an oath to betray Jesus (exomologeō, Lk. 22:6). In both cases the "confessing" is tantamount to promising or swearing (cf. also Acts 7:17). Heb. 11:13 means either that on the threshold of the promised land the patriarchs "admitted" that they were only strangers on the earth or that they were in effect proclaiming that.

2. homologeō and exomologeō can both have the LXX meaning of praise. Jesus praised God's actions by gladly accepting his plan for his life (Matt. 11:25; Lk. 10:21). Praise to the glory of God begun in Christ is to be taken up and continued by the Gentiles (Rom. 15:9). Heb. 13:15 calls on the church to praise the name of God through Christ.

3. This word group is used most often in the sense of confess, state openly. (a) Paul, on trial before Felix, openly acknowledged that he worshiped Israel's God through his involvement with the Christian Way (Acts 24:14). Similarly, John the Baptist confessed openly that he was not the one the Jews were awaiting (Jn. 1:20).

(b) In 1 Jn. 1:9, homologeō means a confession and acknowledgment of sins. Those who acknowledge their faults honestly experience God's faithfulness and justice in the forgiveness of their sins. Confession is a sign of repentance and thus a mark of the new life of faith. Note Mk. 1:5 par., where public confession of sins means also being set free from them (cf. also Acts 19:18; Jas. 5:16).

(c) Believers respond to the saving act of God in Jesus Christ by publicly acknowledging Jesus Christ as Lord and affirming his resurrection (Rom. 10:9–10, which undoubtedly reflects an early Christian confessional formula; cf. 1 Tim. 6:12, which may refer to baptism). When belief and confession, heart and mouth, are in unison, there is a promise of justification and salvation for eternity. Obedience to one's confession leads to practical loving action (2 Cor. 9:13; cf. Tit. 1:16).

An integral part of true faith is the public confession of the incarnate Son of God (1 Jn. 4:2; cf. Jn. 1:14); fellowship with God is dependent on it (1 Jn. 2:23; 4:15). It is a mark of true Christology in the face of heretical movements that denied that Jesus is the Christ (2:22; 4:2–3). In Jn. 9:22; 12:42, the apostle relates that anyone who openly confessed Jesus as the Messiah was put out of the synagogue. He calls on the church to distinguish in its meetings between true and false confessions (cf. 1 Jn. 4:1–2).

When homologeō stands in contrast to its opposite, arneomai, deny (Jesus) (→ 766; cf. Lk. 12:8–9; Jn. 1:20; Tit. 1:16; 1 Jn. 2:22–23), the eschatological aspect of the confession is esp. emphasized. The decision made determines how God will act in judgment (Matt. 10:32–33; Rev. 3:5, 8; cf. Mk. 8:38). Thus believers who confess Jesus before other people are making that confession, as it were, before God's judgment seat. Confession here includes not only what one says but also whether one is obedient to the will of God. Lack of total obedience is equivalent to denial; Jesus "will tell [such people] plainly" (homologeō) on the day of judgment, "I never knew you" (Matt. 7:23). In the end, however, every power and might will have to confess Jesus as the Christ, i.e., recognize and do homage to him (Phil. 2:11).

3934 (homologia, confession), → 3933.

3941 ὄναρ

ὄναρ (onar), dream (3941).

CL & OT onar occurs widely in cl. Greek, but not in the LXX, where enypnion is used for dream. In the ANE generally, dreams were understood to contain messages from the divine (Job 33:14–18), particularly dreams experienced by kings and priests. Dreams with divine content often occurred at sanctuaries (e.g., Jacob at Bethel [Gen. 28:12–17], Samuel at Shiloh [1 Sam. 3], Solomon at Gibeon [1 Ki. 3:4–15]). In Gen. dreams are a regular means of divine communication (e.g., 20:3; 28:12; 31:11). The dream was also a medium by which truth was conveyed to a prophet (Num. 12:6), while the dreams of old men are a part of the contact with God to be experienced in the latter days (Joel 2:28; quoted in Acts 2:17).

In most cases the content of the divine message is conveyed to the dreamer clearly and unambiguously (e.g., Gen. 20:3; 31:10–13; 1 Ki. 3:4–15). But in two cycles of stories, the skills of professional interpreters are required: the Joseph stories (Gen. 37:5–10; 40:5–13; 41:1–32) and the Daniel narratives (Dan. 2). These special skills are God-given (Gen. 40:8; Dan. 2:27–28) and involve an ability to read the pattern of future events in the various symbolic features of the dream.

Still, dreams and their interpretations were not accepted uncritically by everyone. The polemic against false prophecy in Jer. contains scathing criticism of lying dreamers (23:32; 27:9); Zech. offers similar criticism (10:2). A dreamer whose word encourages apostasy is to be put to death (Deut. 13:2–6). Qoheleth's skepticism extends to the dream world (Eccl. 5:7), and witness to its fleeting, insubstantial character is found in Job 20:8; Ps. 73:20; 90:5.

NT onar is found only in Matt., 5x in Jesus' birth narrative: to Joseph, explaining through an angel Mary's pregnancy (1:20); to the wise men, warning them not to return to Herod (2:12); to Joseph, telling him through an angel to flee with his family to Egypt (2:13); to Joseph, telling him to return from Egypt (2:19); to Joseph, warning him against settling in Judea (2:22). This means of communication and guidance conveys God's particular provision for the infant Jesus in the face of various uncertainties and threats. It serves to reinforce a theme in Matt. that this Jesus is God's chosen and anointed one.

The only other occurrence of onar is in Matt. 27:19, where, at the trial of Jesus, Pilate's wife reports a disturbing dream she has suffered on Jesus' account. In Acts Paul often receives direction and encouragement in visions of the night (Acts 16:9; 18:9; 23:11; 27:23–24), but onar is not used.

3943 ὀνειδίζω

ὀνειδίζω (oneidizō), insult, denounce, rebuke (3943); ὀνειδισμός (oneidismos), insult, disgrace (3944); ὄνειδος (oneidos), disgrace (3945); ἐμπαίζω (empaizō), mock, ridicule (1850).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the primary sense of the oneidizō word group is disgrace, shame, reproach. Much of the ancient world was shaped around what has been called an "honor-shame" culture (still prevalent in the Middle East). One of the worst things a person can do is to bring dishonor or shame to oneself or one's family by doing what is immoral or against the law. Conversely, in interpersonal conflicts a person might try to heap shame or insult on an enemy.

2. (a) The LXX notes how humans are often subject to insult, shame, and disgrace. At times it comes as a result of a person's situation. Not to be married, for whatever reason, brings disgrace (Isa. 4:1), as does not having children (Gen. 30:23). When Nahash intended to gouge out the right eye of the men of Jabesh Gilead, he did so with the intent of bringing disgrace (1 Sam. 11:2). In a more general sense, "sin is a disgrace [elassonousi] to any people" (Prov. 14:34).

(b) Goliath insulted God's people with his defiant taunts (1 Sam. 17:10, 36), as did the field commander of Sennacherib (2 Ki. 19:4). Evil people can also taunt God-fearing individuals (e.g., Ps. 42:10; 44:16; 69:9). It is equally possible to defy or insult God (Isa. 65:7). In the future, God will avenge the insults brought against him (Zeph. 2:8, 10) and bring shame to such people by exposing their nakedness (Isa. 47:3). In doing so, he will also take away our reproach (54:4).

NT 1. oneidizō occurs 9x in the NT, empaizō 13x, oneidismos 5x, and oneidos only in Lk. 1:25, where it deals with the notion of social disgrace: the barrenness of Elizabeth, which was removed through the birth of John the Baptist. In Lk. 14:29–30, Jesus tells the parable of a man who begins a major building project but is unable to complete it; such an individual is subject to ridicule.

2. oneidizō is used twice for reproaches from Jesus: on the cities who refused to believe in him (Matt. 11:20) and on those disciples who refused to believe that he was risen from the dead (Mk. 16:14).

3. Insults and mockery were heaped upon Christ as he hung upon the cross. empaizō is used of the general crowd's mockery of Jesus (e.g., Matt. 20:19; 27:29, 31, 41); oneidizō is used for the mockery of the two robbers hanging with Jesus (27:44; Mk. 15:32). In fact, Jesus' very crucifixion can be termed as his bearing disgrace (Heb. 13:13).

4. In several places words in the oneidizō group have to do with the insults and disgrace that believers experience from the unbelieving world. Jesus knew that this would occur and told his followers that they should consider themselves blessed when it does (Matt. 5:11; Lk. 6:22). Both Heb. and 1 Pet. were written to people experiencing such abuse (Heb. 10:23; 13:13; 1 Pet. 4:14). In a proleptic sense, Moses "regarded disgrace for the sake of Christ as of greater value than the treasures of Egypt" (Heb. 11:26).

See also blasphēmeō, slander, defame, blaspheme (1059); katalaleō, speak evil of, rail at, slander (2895); loidoreō, insult, abuse, revile (3366).

3944 (oneidismos, insult, disgrace), → 3943.

3945 (oneidos, disgrace), → 3943.

3950 ὄνομα

ὄνομα (onoma), name (3950); ὀνομάζω (onomazō), to call, name (3951); ἐπονομάζω (eponomazō), call by a name, give a surname (2226); ψευδώνυμος (pseudōnymos), bearing a false name (6024).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. onoma means name. Derived from the noun are two vbs.: (1) onomazō, name, specify, designate, tell; and (2) eponomazō, apply a word as a name, give a second name or nickname. pseudōnymos, formed from the addition of pseud-, false, means bearing a false name; or incorrectly, inappropriately named.

(a) In the thought of virtually every people group one's name is inextricably bound up with the person, whether of a human, a god, or a demon. Anyone who knows the name of a being can exert power over that being. In magic the potential energy that resides in the name can be translated into effective power if the name is mentioned or used in an oath.

(b) Gk. philosophy struggled with the relationship between the name and the thing named. To Plato, for example, words are phonetic symbols, which receive their meaning through custom and are thus of little relevance for true knowledge. For the Stoics, by contrast, words represented things in accordance with their nature; as regarded content, the spoken word, the concept, and the object itself are all alike.

(c) The names of the gods also entered into these discussions. Hesiod tried to find the key to the nature of the gods from the etymology of their names. Others insisted that the higher a god stood, the more names he had. The Stoics tried to overcome polytheism by transferring all the many names to one god, Zeus; here, the plurality of names expressed fullness of being. The magical formulas found on the papyri of late antiquity reveal the belief in the power and effectiveness of the names of gods and demons.

2. The Heb. šēm appears 770x in the OT; the Gk. onoma occurs over 1000x in the LXX. (a) The Israelites were well aware of the significance of personal and proper names. The best-known example is that of Nabal, who is a fool, as his name suggests (1 Sam. 25:25). In this context belong also the numerous etymological interpretations that are offered where people and places are given names: e.g., Eve, "the mother of all the living" (Gen. 3:20); Babel, "because there the LORD confused the language of the whole world" (11:9). To give a name means to exercise lordship and dominion: e.g., Adam's naming of the animals in 2:19–20. As the one who gives names to the stars, Yahweh is their Creator and Lord (Ps. 147:4).

(b) Name changes also testify to their significance (Gen. 41:45; 2 Ki. 23:34). Yahweh can change someone's name when he gives that person a new importance for the present or the future. Thus Abram becomes Abraham, the father of many nations (Gen. 17:5); Jacob becomes Israel, because he fought with God (32:28).

3. (a) Of primary significance is the name of Yahweh, which he himself made known in his revelation (Exod. 3:14; 6:2; cf. Gen. 17:1; → theos, 2536). An essential feature of the biblical revelation is the fact that God is not without a name; he has a personal name by which he can and is to be invoked. When people appeal to Yahweh, he comes near and makes his promise true: "Wherever I cause my name to be honored, I will come to you and bless you" (Exod. 20:24; cf. Num. 6:24–26). Priests and Levites, even the king, bless in the name of Yahweh (6:27; Deut. 10:8; 2 Sam. 6:18). The name of Yahweh, indeed, is such a powerful expression of his personal rule and activity that it can be used as an alternative way of speaking of Yahweh himself (Lev. 18:21; Ps. 7:17; Amos 2:7; Mic. 5:4).

(b) Yahweh's historical dealings with people in the past (Exod. 3:6, 13, 15), present (20:7), and future (Ezek. 25:17; 34:30) are inextricably bound up with his name. Misuse of this name in magic or in false oaths is forbidden (Exod. 20:7). The name of Yahweh is committed in trust to Israel; the heathen do not know it (Ps. 79:6). Israel has the task of hallowing his name, which takes place in the cult, at sacrifice, in prayer, in blessing and cursing, and also in holy war (29:8)—in other words, in serving Yahweh, and him alone, and in obeying his commands. To take part in the worship of another god, therefore, profanes the name of Yahweh (Lev. 18:21).

(c) According to Deut., Yahweh lives in heaven, but he chooses on earth a place where he causes "his Name" to dwell (12:11; 14:23–24; 16:2, 6, 11; cf. 2 Sam. 7:13; 1 Ki. 3:2; 5:3). In that his name dwells in the temple, Yahweh's presence is itself guaranteed, but only in such a way that even if the temple is profaned, Yahweh's transcendence remains preserved (cf. 8:13, 27–28). Yahweh's name, like he himself, remains sovereign.

(d) Thus, Yahweh's name assumes a powerful and independent existence of its own, although it is naturally still closely linked with Yahweh himself. Through its mighty sway, the godly experience Yahweh's protection and help (cf. Ps. 54:6; Prov. 18:10; Mal. 1:11). His name almost becomes a hypostasis of Yahweh himself (cf. Ps. 54:1; 89:24; 118:10–12).

(e) In later OT writings Yahweh's name is frequently used in the sense of his "praise" or "glory" (Isa. 26:8; 55:13). Phrases like "the LORD Almighty is his name" (e.g., 51:15; Jer. 10:16; Amos 4:13) indicate Yahweh's claim to sovereign glory in the world and among nations to whom Israel makes it known (Isa. 12:4).

4. (a) The Heb. expression bᵉšēm ("in the name") occurs frequently in the OT. Linked with the names of places or people it can mean by name (Jos. 21:9), after the name of (Jdg. 18:29), in the name of (1 Ki. 21:8; Est. 3:12), and on behalf of (1 Sam. 25:9). The phrase appears most often in association with the name of Yahweh, with the primary meaning of calling on Yahweh by his name, i.e., worshiping him (cf. Gen. 4:26; 12:8). The formula is also used in order to swear, since by the use of the expression, Yahweh's might is called on to interpose (Deut. 10:8; 2 Sam. 6:18; 2 Ki. 2:24). The appeal of false prophets to Yahweh is illegitimate, for they have received neither their commission nor their words from him (Deut. 18:20; Jer. 14:14–15; 23:25; 29:9).

5. (a) It is possible that Josephus, a priest, knew the Heb. name Yahweh, but he never uses it. He does not even use the Gk. kyrios, Lord, which the LXX used to translate Yahweh. This shows the extent to which fear of uttering the name of God had gone. Instead, he uses onoma and has a predilection for prosēgoria, address, appellation, title, even where Yahweh's name is under consideration. In his rendering of Exod. 3, he adds that he is not allowed to say anything about God's name. Israel's temple bears God's name, like heathen temples that bear the names of their gods.

(b) Qumran writings follow the same paths as the OT as far as the use of God's name is concerned.

(c) God's name is important in rab. tradition. One may pass on a doctrine or tradition only if one names the authority from whom one has received it. Still, the name of Yahweh is avoided if at all possible, in order to keep from disobeying the third commandment (Exod. 20:7). Yahweh's name was still used in the high priest's blessing on the Day of Atonement, but in scriptural quotations Yahweh came to be replaced by šēm (Heb. "name"). So the tetragrammaton YHWH ceased to be used, and its pronunciation was forgotten. Thus, the name of God became a secret name used as a means of magical power, esp. in the piety of the lower strata of society.

NT In the NT onoma (which can mean reputation [Mk. 6:14; Rev. 3:1] and person [Acts 1:15; Rev. 3:4; 11:13]) occurs 231x, most commonly in Lk. (34x in Lk.; 60x in Acts). onomazō occurs 10x, while eponomazō is found only in Rom. 2:17, and pseudōnymos is used only in 1 Tim. 6:20.

1. Names of humans and other beings. (a) The names of the twelve apostles on the foundation stones of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:14) and the names of the twelve tribes of Israel on its gates (21:12) proclaim the final unity of the old and the new people of God. Jesus proves himself to be the good shepherd by calling his sheep by name and knowing them personally (Jn. 10:3). In giving his disciples new names, he draws them in a special way into his service (Matt. 10:2–4; Mk. 3:16–19; Lk. 6:14–16): Jesus gives to Simon the name Peter (→ petra, 4376); Mk. 3:17 mentions that to James and John, sons of Zebedee, "Jesus gave the name Boanerges, which means Sons of Thunder." The fact that the names of the disciples are written in heaven (Lk. 10:20) means that they belong to God and to his kingdom (Rev. 3:5). The new name that the one who overcomes receives expresses one's inalienable fellowship with Christ himself (2:17).

(b) Evil spirits have names also, which predicate something of their nature or power. In Mk. 5:9, Jesus discovers that the name of a multitude of demons is "Legion," and he gains power over them. The "beast" in Rev. 13:1 bears blasphemous names—he is given names and honorific titles that belong to God or to Christ. His name is contained in a number (13:17–18), which his adherents also bear (13:17; 15:2). The name of the "great prostitute" (17:1, 3) is "BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF PROSTITUTES AND OF THE ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH" (17:5); she stands in contrast to the woman of Rev. 12, who bears the male child and is the mother of all the faithful.

2. The name of God. God's name belongs with his revelation. He reveals himself as the loving Father, and he glorifies his name in Jesus' saving work (Jn. 17:12, 26). Thus Jesus, and he alone, reveals the name of God as the Father (17:6). In 12:28 "Father," "glorify," and "name" are closely bound together. That the disciples are kept in the name of God indicates that they live in the sphere of an effective power, which protects them from ruin and unites them with each other (17:11–12). The goal of proclaiming the name of God as Father is that the love of the Father for the Son is also to be found in believers (17:26). In these affirmations of Jn.'s Gospel, and above all in the high priestly prayer of Jesus (17:1–26), we have the Christological interpretation of the OT affirmations concerning the name of Yahweh.

Jesus thus acts in the name of and on behalf of God in fulfillment of his will and as proof of his sonship (Mk. 11:9–10; Jn. 10:24–25). At his Parousia he will come "in the name of the Lord" (Matt. 23:39). When the name of God is conjoined with that of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, it assumes the character of completeness and fullness (28:19); this is Trinitarian thought, even if a precise Trinitarian formula is lacking. The first request of the Lord's Prayer concerns hallowing God's name (6:9), presumably through our own lives. A person who despises God's will and commands, or a Christian slave who is disobedient to his master, is in effect slandering God's name (Rom. 2:24; 1 Tim. 6:1).

3. The name of Jesus. (a) The significance of Jesus' life and activity is evident in his name (Matt. 1:21; → Iēsous, 2652; Emmanouēl, 1842). He bears the sublime name of Son (Heb. 1:4–5). His name is "the Word of God" (Rev. 19:13; cf. Jn. 1:1), and God's name of Lord also becomes his name (Phil. 2:9–10; Rev. 19:16). Above and beyond this, he bears a name that he alone knows (19:12). The name "Jesus" can be replaced simply by "the Name" (Acts 5:41; 3 Jn. 7). The whole content of God's saving truth revealed in Jesus is comprised in his name (Acts 4:12; 1 Cor. 6:11). To believe in the name of the Son (Jn. 3:18) is God's command (1 Jn. 3:23; 5:13). Anyone who believes in his name receives forgiveness of sins (Acts 10:43; 1 Jn. 2:12), has eternal life (Jn. 20:31; 1 Jn. 5:13), and escapes the judgment (Jn. 3:18). A Christian's whole life is to be dominated by the name of Jesus (Col. 3:17).

Jesus' name is the basis of the proclamation of the gospel to all nations (Acts 8:12; 9:16; Rom. 1:5). The authorities at Jerusalem prohibited the apostles from preaching "in the name of Jesus" (Acts 5:40). Faith and proclamation include confession of that name (Rev. 2:13; 3:8) and readiness to suffer for its sake (Matt. 10:22; 24:9). The name of Christ contains the implication of glory, so that 1 Pet. 4:14 declares: "If you are insulted because of the name of Christ, you are blessed, for the Spirit of glory and of God rests on you" (cf. Isa. 11:2). Moreover, whoever calls on the name of the Lord belongs to the church (Acts 9:14; 1 Cor. 1:2) and is saved (Acts 2:17–21; Rom. 10:13; cf. Joel 2:32). Believers were called Christians because of the name of Christ (Acts 11:26; cf. 26:28; 1 Pet. 4:16; → Christianos, 5985). One of the gifts of final perfection is that the victors will bear the name of the Lamb (Rev. 3:12; 14:1; 22:4).

(b) The formula "in the name of Jesus." God gives the Holy Spirit in the name of Jesus (Jn. 14:26). Thanks are given in that name (Eph. 5:20). The nations place their hope in it (Matt. 12:21; cf. Isa. 42:4), and in that name the congregation prays (Jn. 14:13–14; 15:16); this is the reason why their prayers are heard. Since the disciples are sent out by Jesus, they can perform miracles and acts of compassion in his name (Lk. 10:17; cf. Mk. 9:38–39). After Easter, the name of Jesus continued to maintain its power (Acts 3:6; 4:10). Jesus himself gives help in his name (9:34), though not if unbelievers try to misuse it in magical exorcisms (19:13–16). Statements such as this show that the OT manner of speaking of the name of Yahweh has been transferred to Jesus and his name.

(c) Baptism "in the name of Jesus." Baptism symbolically assigns the person baptized to Christ for forgiveness of sins (Acts 8:16; 19:5; 1 Cor. 1:13, 15; cf. Matt. 28:19). The fullness of Christ's saving work is contained in his name (as Yahweh's saving work was in his name) and is present in the church. This is symbolized by an individual's baptism, since he or she has been caught up into Jesus' death and resurrection (Rom. 6:1–11; Col. 2:12; cf. 2 Cor. 4:10).

4. The vb. onomazō occurs 10x in the NT. The name and service of an apostle are traced back to Jesus (Lk. 6:13). A man who bears the name of brother but lives unworthy of it is to be denied fellowship (1 Cor. 5:11). The congregation is so detached from sin that it is not even to be named in it (Eph. 5:3; cf. 2 Tim. 2:19). God names every family in heaven and on earth and so is the Father of all (Eph. 3:15). eponomazō, to name after, give a second name, occurs only in Rom. 2:17: "if you call yourself [eponomazē] a Jew." Here "Jew" is a title of honor, signifying an heir to the legacy described in 2:17–20. Paul attacks the inconsistency of claiming to be a Jew and at the same time countenancing sin. Jews stand under the same divine judgment as Gentiles.

5. pseudōnymos occurs only at 1 Tim. 6:20: "Turn away from godless chatter and the opposing ideas of what is falsely called [pseudōnymou] knowledge." Here Paul warns against a movement that gives the lie to its name and leads one into error (cf. 6:21).

3951 (onomazō, to call, name), → 3950.

3954 (oxos, wine vinegar), → 5958.

3957 (opisthen, from behind), → 3958.

3958 ὀπίσω

ὀπίσω (opisō), behind, after (3958); ὄπισθεν (opisthen), from behind (3957).

CL & OT opisō is an adv. of place, meaning behind, to the rear. opisthen also means from behind and is equivalent to opisō. Each occurs as an adv., noun, and prep.

1. In the LXX these words indicate following behind, as in processions after the ark (cf. Jos. 3:3; 6:9 = LXX 6:8), following in war (1 Sam. 11:7), political allegiance (Jdg. 9:3–4; 2 Sam. 2:10; Ezek. 29:16), following as a prophet's servant (1 Ki. 19:20–21), devotion to a lover (Ruth 3:10; fig. in Jer. 2:5; Hos. 2:5, 13), following after spiritual objects (2 Ki. 13:2; Isa. 65:2; Jer. 3:17), and dedication and obedience to a god/God (Deut. 13:4; Jdg. 2:12–13; 1 Ki. 19:21; Jer. 2:23; 7:6, 9; Ezek. 20:16).

2. As a rab. expression, following after someone refers to the state of being a pupil, largely with respect to the shared life with the teacher (→ mathētēs, 3412).

NT opisō can be used as a time preposition meaning after (e.g., Matt. 3:11; Jn. 1:15, 27, 30) and as a phrase indicating attachment (e.g., Lk. 21:8; Jn. 6:66; 12:19; Acts 5:37; 20:30; Rev. 13:3). It is mostly used in the NT with the gen. of persons. Those passages where the gen. opisō mou refers to Jesus (e.g., Matt. 10:38; Mk. 1:17 par.; 8:34 par.) are particularly significant. opisō here takes on the meaning of akoloutheō, follow, go behind someone (cf. Mk. 2:14). Mk. 1:17 has this call to discipleship in its simplest form: (lit.) "Come after me (opisō mou), and I will make you to become fishers of men."

"Going behind" means having a share in the fellowship of Jesus' life and suffering (Matt. 10:38 par.; 16:24 par.; cf. Lk. 23:26). According to Matt. 16:23, it is precisely this pattern of suffering that Peter does not understand. In discipleship, Jesus goes on ahead and prescribes the way. Looking back is out of the question for one who is fleeing persecution (Lk. 17:31–32 par.), who is plowing (9:62), or who, as a runner, has one's eye on the goal (Phil. 3:13–14). One ought not look back at associations that have been left behind or on past achievements.

See also akoloutheō, follow (199); mathētēs, learner, pupil, disciple (3412); mimeomai, imitate, follow (3628).

3959 (hoplizō, equip, arm), → 4483.

3960 (hoplon, weapon), → 4483.

3965 (optasia, vision), → 3972.

3969 (horama, sight, vision), → 3972.

3970 (horasis, vision, appearance), → 3972.

3971 (horatos, visible), → 3972.

3972 ὁράω

ὁράω (horaō), see (3972); ἰδού (idou), see! behold! look! (2627); ὁρατός (horatos), visible (3971); ἀόρατος (aoratos), invisible (548); ὅραμα (horama), sight, vision (3969); ὅρασις (horasis), appearance, vision (3970); ὀπτασία (optasia), vision (3965); ἐποπτεύω (epopteuō), observe (2227); καθοράω (kathoraō), look at (2775); θεάομαι (theaomai), behold (2517); θεωρέω (theōreō), watch (2555); ὀφθαλμός (ophthalmos), eye (4057).

CL & OT 1. (a) The vb. horaō is only found with the root hor- in the pres. stem and in the perf. act stem. The fut. mid. (dep.) opsomai and the fut./aor. pass. ōphthēn are derived from the Gk. root op-, and the aor. act. eidon from the root id-. The vb. is common and in the act. means to see, look, perceive, observe; it also often means to look toward something. Already by Homer's time it had the meaning of to conceive or experience, and even to be present at or participate. In a fig. sense it means to understand, recognize, consider, attend to. From the pass. used with an intrans. sense it came to mean appear, become visible.

(b) The verbal adj. horatos and the negative form aoratos mean, respectively, visible and invisible. Three important nouns formed from horaō are horasis, vision, appearance; horama, what is seen, view, vision; and optasia, view, sight, vision.

(c) Compound vbs. include prooraō, to foresee the future, see something that one has seen before; and kathoraō and epopteuō, to look at, regard, observe.

(d) The noun ophthalmos, eye, derived from the root op-, can have a specialized use in the poetic sense of the eye of heaven, the sun and the moon, as well as expressing the ideas of light, well-being, and that which brings comfort. In general the eye is the highest means of contact with the world around. It is the organ of perception. Fig. ophthalmos means that which is dearest and most loved (cf. the apple of the eye). The eye is often associated with a person's relation to God, to one's fellow humans, and to the world around. In Gk. the "eye of the soul" gains insight into the cosmos. Moral concepts are associated with the eye (e.g., to look covetously, to cast jealous glances).

(e) theaomai means to view, behold, watch. theōreō, also to watch, look at something, has the fig. meanings of reflect on, notice, understand, comprehend; in the pass. it means become visible or be looked at.

(f) The Gk. vbs. of seeing or beholding have religious and philosophical significance, for Gk. religion, like that of antiquity in general, was a religion of seeing. Jud., by way of contrast, emphasized the role of hearing. Insight into the cosmic order and the rationale of this world was understood religiously. That applied both to the world on the grand scale, in the sense of the macrocosm, and to the world on a small scale, in the sense of the microcosm. The "eye of the soul" is particularly significant here.

Human actions were governed by this insight into the cosmos. In Plato God is more an object than a subject and being seen is predicated of him. From that Plato arrives at the concept of the vision of the ideas (→ eidos, form, appearance, 1626), which denote the knowledge of supernatural things achieved by the spirit: pattern, idea, essence.

In general the Gk. deity is regarded as invisible. Yet from Homer on we find the notion of the gods going about in bodily form (anthropomorphism). They "appear" in human disguise and have human qualities and propensities. But in general their invisibility is still emphasized. The "vision of god" serves as the way to be like the immortals.

2. (a) horaō (with its 2d aor. eidon) occurs some 1450x in the LXX. Generally it means to see with one's own eye, become aware (Gen. 27:1). Fig. it can denote perceive intellectually or spiritually; notice, become conscious (Ps. 34:8); experience, suffer (e.g., see death, 89:48). It also means to regard (e.g., misfortune, 106:44), attend to, know (Deut. 11:2), or be concerned about something (Gen. 37:14). Seeing in the OT can refer also to perception by means of other senses, e.g., hearing (Jer. 33:24 in MT) or understanding (1 Sam. 12:17; 1 Ki. 20:7 = LXX 21:7). In the pass. it is used for letting oneself be seen; here the idea is of true perception in contrast to the imagination. God let himself be seen, disclosed, or revealed in visions (horama). Through this action the one who sees as well as the hearer is encouraged or commissioned (Gen. 15:1; 46:2).

(b) Seeing can also refer to prophetic perception. Prophetic seeing, which sometimes assumes the character of a vision, occurs frequently in the OT. Hence the prophet can also be designated a seer (Heb. ḥōzeh; LXX horōn; 1 Chr. 21:9; 2 Chr. 9:29). The seer's visions generally have a twofold reference: the thing seen, the vision (horama), or the appearance of the vision (Exod. 3:3; Dan. 7:1); and the effect on the seer, who is encouraged, chosen, shocked, pardoned, etc. (Gen. 15:1; Dan. 7:13). This prophetic vision involves primarily a revelation of God and his word, and only then a visual impact: God lets it be known what he wants or what he is going to do and "shows" it to someone whom he has chosen.

(c) It is simply assumed in the OT that God sees and watches humans. He sees injustice (Lam. 3:34–36, 50, 59–60), the death of his prophet (2 Chr. 24:22), and the distress of his own (Exod. 3:7). He looks for faithfulness (Ps. 101:6) and for trust (Jer. 5:3). He also has his eyes on the sinful kingdom (Amos 9:8). No one can hide from him (Ps. 139:3, 7, 16). God sees into our innermost being (1 Sam. 16:7).

(d) Even though the OT speaks of God's becoming visible in visions (theophanies), it contains no inquisitive speculation into his form. God appears to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses (Num. 12:8) face to face and in human form. Several passages extend this bodily imagery (Gen. 3:8; Exod. 33:23; Isa. 6:1–4; Amos 9:11–15). Through these modes of manifestation OT saints recognized and understood God's nature. Fire, gale, clouds, and the like are mentioned as important elements in these manifestations.

In a theophany God's glory (Gk. doxa, → 1518) is revealed (Exod. 33:18; Num. 14:22; Ezek. 1:28 = LXX 2:1). Heaven opens (1:1), and the transcendent breaks through and is visible. Supernatural brightness (Ps. 18:12; 50:2; Hab. 3:4), the likeness of sunrise (Hos. 6:3), and storm and tempest (Job 38:1; Nah. 1:3) are mentioned as concomitant phenomena for God's presence.

(e) In the context of the theophanies God's face denotes his very person (→ prosōpon, face, 4725). It reveals something of God's nature (Gen. 32:30–31). The parts of God's form that are mentioned (the eye, ear, and hand) illustrate his faithfulness and care. It is significant that qualities like those attributed to the Gk. gods (e.g., sexuality) are not ascribed to God in the OT. The OT seeks instead to disclose God's nature, not to provide a concrete visual image of him. God's holiness and majesty prevent humans from seeing his face. Our consciousness of guilt leads to a consciousness of distance (Isa. 6:5). Seeing God's glory can kill a person (cf. Exod. 33:20).

The OT theophanies express God's partnership with humanity. People in the OT see themselves as God's creatures and at the same time know themselves as his partners. The OT God is one who meets us, consorts with us, and is known as such.

(f) In the OT the future constantly appears in visions. In view are the coming redemption, conquest of one's enemies, and establishment of God's kingdom (1 Chr. 29:11; Ps. 22:28–29; Isa. 11:6–9; 57:19). The goal is to see God face to face (Ps. 42:2), perhaps in a future life. However, this last point is not unambiguously attested in the OT (cf. 17:15). The promise of Matt. 5:8 and the confident assertion of 1 Jn. 3:2 have no direct OT parallels.

3. In Jud. of the intertestamental period seeing gave way to hearing, esp. in Philo. Seeing is frequently separated from the grasping of sense-perceptions. horaō and its derivatives came to mean attaining knowledge and, occasionally, seeing God. Philo held that the world (creation) should lead to a knowledge of God (cf. Rom. 1:20, kathoraō).

NT 1. Survey of words. This group of words occurs frequently in the NT: horaō and the fut. opsomai occur ca. 110x, the aor. eidon 336x. Generally they have the same sense as in cl. Gk. and the OT. (a) horaō, opsomai, and eidon generally mean see, perceive (e.g., Matt. 28:7; Mk. 16:7; Jn. 16:16). These vbs. can be used fig. for perceiving, recalling, ascertaining, realizing (e.g., Matt. 13:14) as well as for a vision of the spirit or intellect (Lk. 2:30, seeing salvation; Acts 2:17; 26:16, seeing visions or appearances).

(b) The verbal adjs. horatos and aoratos mean visible and invisible, respectively. They emphasize God's invisibility (Rom. 1:20; Col. 1:15–16; 1 Tim. 1:17).

(c) The nouns horasis, horama, and optasia are used in the same sense as in the OT. horasis means appearance (Rev. 4:3) or vision (Acts 2:17; Rev. 9:17) and horama the thing seen, the vision (Matt. 17:9; Acts 18:9), including the vision seen in a dream (16:9). In keeping with the OT perspective, the NT represents its effects on the visionary as pardoning, encouraging, or commissioning (9:10, 12; 10:3). optasia, the appearance of the vision, is found in Lk. 1:22; 24:23 of the appearances of angels, and in 2 Cor. 12:1 probably of ecstatic experiences.

(d) There are various horaō compounds. kathoraō means to perceive; thus in Rom. 1:20 it refers to the invisible, which is perceived in the external and visible. epopteuō, to look at, is used in 1 Pet. 2:12; 3:2 with reference to a Christian's manner of life that the Gentiles will notice. For prooraō, foresee, see ahead, → 4632.

(e) theaomai means to visit (Rom. 15:24), look at (Matt. 22:11), and notice something (Lk. 23:55). theōreō, to look at, behold, but also experience (Matt. 27:55; Lk. 14:29), is also used of intellectual seeing (Jn. 4:19; Acts 4:13). In the pass. it means become visible.

(f) ophthalmos, eye, occurs 100x in the NT, whereas the ear is mentioned only 36x. It often occurs in conjunction with moral concepts, esp. in the Synoptics: to look enviously (Matt. 20:15; Mk. 7:22) or ingenuously or with evil (Matt. 6:22–23). It can be the occasion of taking offense or inciting to sin (5:29; 2 Pet. 2:14). It is also the organ of understanding and knowing. Eph. 1:18 speaks of "the eyes of your heart." Rarely does the NT refer to God's eyes (Heb. 4:13; 1 Pet. 3:12).

(g) The use, esp. in the Synoptic Gospels, of idou or kai idou (adapted from the OT but not found in cl. Gk.), is also noteworthy. This construction is used to attract attention, esp. at the beginning of a conversation (Mk. 3:32; 10:28). Matt. and Mk. also use it with a predicate, to advertise something surprising or new (Matt. 12:2; Mk. 2:24). This formulation also occurs in the context of the proclamation of salvation (Lk. 2:34), while at other times it draws attention to the fulfillment of a promise (Matt. 12:41; Mk. 14:41–42; Jn. 4:35) and assures the fulfillment of what has been announced (Mk. 10:33; Jn. 16:32). These two words serve a kerygmatic purpose, addressing the hearer, before whose eyes the message is proclaimed.

2. Jn.'s concept of seeing. In Jn. the vbs. of seeing take on a special significance. He loves to use horaō for that which the preexistent Son saw when he was with his Father (Jn. 3:11, 32; 6:46; 8:38). theaomai is used of seeing Jesus' doxa, glory (1:14), and of the Spirit's descending (1:32).

(a) Jn. uses the vbs. of seeing in a threefold sense. (i) They are used in connection with seeing earthly things and events that are taking place (Jn. 1:38, 47; 9:8). (ii) They denote the perception of supernatural elements, which only certain people enjoy. Hence, John the Baptist sees the Spirit descending in the form of a dove (1:32–34). (iii) Jn. also thinks of seeing as the perception of a revelatory event. This is a spiritual act of seeing, the sight of faith. The disciples see the Son's glory (1:14), which is also revealed to them in his signs (cf. 2:11).

The real nature of the Son, his doxa, is disclosed to those who believe. That which in the OT was proclaimed and appeared only symbolically now has become a historical reality in the incarnate Word. Faith, discerning it through hearing and seeing, responds to God's revelation in Jesus Christ. It also discerns Jesus Christ's doxa in the signs (2:11). Unbelievers do not discern it; they are spiritually blind (cf. 9:39–41). The believer perceives in the Son the Father who sent him (12:45; 14:9). Those who see the Son also see the Father.

(b) Although the seer is only occasionally important in the NT (cf. Jn. on Patmos, Rev. 1:9), there is a stronger emphasis in Johannine literature on the eyewitness (cf. "the man who saw it" in Jn. 19:35), whose testimony is valid (1 Jn. 1:1; cf. Lk. 1:1–4).

(c) Jesus' own seeing is important in the event of revelation (Jn. 12:45; 14:9). He sees the Father (1:18). This is characteristic of Jesus' special relationship with him and is the basis of his message. He sees what is in us and discloses it. He sees Nathanael under the fig tree (1:48) and the thoughts and inner nature of a person (cf. 2:25).

(d) Hearing and seeing can be used interchangeably in relation to faith (cf. Jn. 5:24; 8:45; with 5:37–39; 6:40), and the concept of eternal life is associated with seeing. Seeing as well as hearing again and again provide the impetus to faith (2:11; 20:8), lead to knowledge (14:9), and minister to inner perception (e.g., "I can see that you are a prophet," 4:19). Faith recognizes the coming Messiah. Seeing is thus an encounter with Jesus. However, faith based on seeing has no advantage, for Jesus pronounces a special blessing on those who believe without seeing (20:29).

3. The theological meaning of these words in the rest of the NT. (a) One's eyes and ears are not just for physical perception; they are symbols of spiritual perception. They see God and hear him speak.

(b) Spiritual perception as a function of seeing comes to mean make the acquaintance of (Lk. 23:8), meet (Acts 20:25), watch or look out for (cf. Mk. 13:33; Phil. 3:2). Spiritual seeing is at the same time an experience (Lk. 2:26; Jn. 8:51) or the conceiving of or experiencing of God's love (1 Jn. 3:1).

(c) Seeing acquires a new perspective with reference to faith. In the Synoptic Gospels it is used to express obtaining a share in salvation (Lk. 2:26). Hence, seeing takes on the character of a decision (Matt. 21:32; Mk. 8:18); the unbeliever does not perceive (Matt. 13:13–14; Mk. 4:12).

(d) Theophanies do not occur in the NT, though appearances of angels are mentioned in connection with Jesus' coming (Lk. 2:13), the temptation (Matt. 4:11), the passion (Lk. 22:43), and the resurrection (Matt. 28:2, 5). There are also occasionally revelatory dreams (e.g., Matt. 1:20; 2:13, 19). There are various accounts of visions of the risen Christ (horama and optasia), given by God, who causes his Son to be seen (Acts 9:10, 12; 10:3). They have a dramatic effect on those who see them.

4. For the NT God is utterly invisible (Jn. 6:46; Col. 1:15; 1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16), though the resurrection narratives stress that the risen Christ is visible. There he is encountered as a person and recognized by his actions (Matt. 28; Lk. 24), esp. that of eating. The Gospels use a rich vocabulary to describe these visible encounters with him in the body (Matt. 28:17; Lk. 24:31, 36–37; Jn. 20:14–29). That the risen Christ is seen is an event of revelation. In Jn. 20:25 the disciples come to believe through seeing the risen Christ ("We have seen the Lord"). These encounters lead to faith, commitment, witness, and sending.

Paul attests that the risen Christ was seen or appeared with the aor. pass. of hōraō (1 Cor. 15:5–8). The appearances are never only visual, but are always bound up with hearing the word of the risen Christ; yet hearing should not be stressed at the expense of seeing. Thus the Easter message is summed up in Jn. 19:35: "The man who saw it has given testimony, and his testimony is true. He knows that he tells the truth, and he testifies so that you also may believe."

5. The vbs. of seeing are also used in the NT with respect to the future. The promise for the future contains three essential elements: (a) seeing God's glory (Jn. 17:24); (b) seeing God's kingly rule (3:3); and (c) supremely, seeing God (Matt. 5:8; 1 Jn. 3:2) and living in fellowship with him (Rev. 21:3). The angels already see God's face (Matt. 18:10). In the coming era of fulfillment, God will restore the fellowship with us that was broken by sin. He does not put himself at our disposal, nor does he give himself up to human clutches, but he does open the way to fellowship with himself. Now we still wait in faith, yet the watching community knows that the day is coming when we will see God (Matt. 5:8).

See also kollourion, eye salve (3141); blepō, look at, see (1063); atenizō, look at a person or thing intently, gaze on (867); theatron, theater, place of assembly, a spectacle (2519).

3973 ὀργή

ὀργή (orgē), anger, wrath (3973); ὀργίζω (orgizō), be or become angry, make angry (3974); ὀργίλος (orgilos), inclined to anger (3975); παροργίζω (parorgizō) enrage, make angry (4239); παροργισμός (parorgismos), anger (4240); παροξύνω (paroxynō), provoke to anger (4236); παροξυσμός (paroxysmos), sharp disagreement (4237).

CL & OT 1. orgē, a cognate of orgaō (be puffed up, swell, be excited), means a natural impulse, disposition; anger, wrath. A word in the gen. following it indicates the subj. of the anger or the occasion of the anger. The obj. of the anger is usually designated by the prepositions eis, pros, or epi with the acc.

(a) In the main, orgē is seen in humans as a character defect that one should strive to lay aside. Anger as the expression of unrestrained passion stands in contradiction to reason and conflicts with the image of the wise person. Its only appropriate human use is for a judge in the pursuit of righteousness.

(b) But orgē is also a prominent characteristic of the Gk. deities, directed either against other gods or against human beings. It is provoked as a rule by violating one of the fundamental demands of life, morals, or law. In the Roman world the idea of wrathful gods and their punitive judgments, afflicting individuals with sickness, suffering, and natural catastrophes, is even more strongly historicized. The great historical writers often allude to divine anger as the effective cause of historical incidents.

2. (a) The OT speaks frequently of God's anger and of human anger. At least 7 different Heb. words are translated in the LXX with either thymos or orgē.

(b) In parts of the OT both orgē and thymos designate a human reaction in a neutral or even a positive sense. Zebul's anger (Jdg. 9:30), for example, is thoroughly justified. Still more legitimate is David's anger with the rich man in Nathan's fable (2 Sam. 12:5). Moses' indignation at the sin of the people dancing round the golden calf is even presented as a holy anger, in which Moses places himself on the side of God (Exod. 32:19; cf. 16:20; 1 Sam. 11:6; Job 32:2–3; Jer. 6:11).

But elsewhere in the OT outbursts of anger are depicted as a vice (cf. Job 36:13; Ps. 37:8) and are rejected (cf. Gen. 49:7, where anger is cursed). It is not only cruel (Prov. 27:4) but leads to quarreling and wrangling (cf. 30:33). It disunites people (1 Sam. 20:30) and can lead to bloody acts (Gen. 49:6). By anger one shows oneself to be unwise (Prov. 29:8), for it is a mark of fools (12:16; 27:3). We should avoid it at all costs (Job 36:18).

(c) The role of the divine anger in the OT is of greater significance. Yahweh is repeatedly described as a jealous and angry God. His anger can be presented in drastic terms (Ps. 2:5; Isa. 13:13; 30:27–28; Jer. 30:23–24 = LXX 37:23–24). A human encounter with the holy could be dangerous (Gen. 32:25–31; Exod. 4:24–26; 19:9–13; Isa. 6:5), for the anger of Yahweh expresses his holiness and righteousness. It points to the living, personal nature of God, whose ways are beyond humans (Exod. 4:24; 1 Sam. 26:19; 2 Sam. 16:10–12; 24:1).

The behavior of specific individuals can provoke divine anger (Exod. 4:14; Num. 12:9; Deut. 29:18–21; 2 Sam. 6:7; 2 Chr. 19:2; 25:15; cf. Sir. 47:20; Pr. Man. 9–10), but most often it is provoked by the apostasy, unfaithfulness, and disobedience of God's covenant people (Num. 25:3; 32:10; Deut. 29:25–28; Jdg. 2:14, 20; Ps. 78:21). The prophets (esp. Amos, Hos., Isa., and Mic.) referred to divine wrath as an appropriate reaction to the people's way of life, social and economic attitudes, political behavior, and particularly cultic practice. Within the framework of covenant theology Yahweh's wrath is an expression of rejected and wounded love. This is the deepest root of wrath, and in this light one can fully understand the overwhelming force of the message.

Yahweh's anger can equally be directed against the nations (Isa. 10:25; 13:3; Jer. 50:13 = LXX 27:13; Ezek. 30:15; Mic. 5:15), although never without prior warning (cf. Exod. 22:23–24; 32:10; Deut. 6:13–15). "The nations that have not obeyed [him]" (Mic. 5:15; cf. Jer. 42:18 = LXX 49:18; Lam. 3:42–43), who did not walk in accord with the divine ordinances (Ezek. 9:8–10; 22:31), are punished. God passes judgment on whole nations (including his own), sending sword, hunger, and pestilence (6:11–14), trampling under foot (Isa. 63:6; Hab. 3:12), annihilation (Deut. 29:22 = LXX 29:23), devastation (Jer. 25:37–38 = LXX 32:37–38), and burning of the land (Isa. 9:18–19; 30:27). He treads the nations in his winepress (63:1–3) and gives them the cup of his fury to drink (51:17; cf. Jer. 25:15–16).

But God's anger will not last forever. The "moment" of anger is spoken of repeatedly (cf. Ps. 30:5; Isa. 26:20; 54:7–8); behind it shines grounds for hope (cf. 2 Sam. 24:16; Isa. 40:2; 51:22; 54:8–10; Hos. 14:4), which is nourished on observation that God's saving will prevails again and again (Ps. 78:38; 103:6–13). People are able to hold to this hope if they humble themselves (cf. 2 Chr. 12:12; 32:26), turn to God in penitent prayer (Exod. 32:12, 14; 2 Sam. 12:13; Ps. 6:2; Dan. 9:15–16; Hab. 3:2), and reaffirm the covenant in obedience (Num. 25:6–11; Jos. 7:1–26; cf. Jon. 3:7–10). Then God's anger has fulfilled its task and has brought about restoration (Isa. 42:25; Jer. 4:4; 36:7 = LXX 43:7).

3. In Jud. and Qumran some passages deal with justified anger (directed against sinners). But the negative judgment on anger as a vice incompatible with wisdom is forcefully exemplified (Wis. 10:3; Sir. 27:30). The rich (28:10) and rulers (47:20–21; 2 Macc. 14:27) appear to be esp. susceptible to anger. In every case anger and rage are an abomination that the godless pursue (Sir. 27:30). But God's wrath is directed against the godless (Wis. 11:9; 19:1; Sir. 5:7; 16:6–7). This must be taken as seriously as his compassion (16:12). It is an admonition to genuine repentance (5:7).

Jud. also spoke of an ultimate day of wrath, when God will sit in judgment (cf. Ezek. 7:19; Dan. 8:19; Zeph. 2:2–3). This day is presented in strong apocalyptic colors as "a day of trouble and ruin, a day of darkness and gloom" (Zeph. 1:15), as a day of "the fierce anger of the LORD" (2:2). Then the righteous and unrighteous will be divided according to how they have walked (Ezek. 7:3). God will accept those who turn to him in penitence, but his righteous anger will destroy the others.

NT In the NT the noun orgē occurs 36x and relates both to human and divine anger. All the other cognate words speak only of human anger: orgizō, be angry (8x); orgilos, angry (only in Tit. 1:7); paroxynō, become angry (Acts 17:16; 1 Cor. 13:5); parorgizō, make angry (Rom. 10:19; Eph. 6:4); parorgismos, anger (Eph. 4:26); paroxysmos, strong disagreement (Acts 15:39) or ardent incitement (Heb. 10:24).

1. As a human passion, orgē is by and large synonymous with thymos. The latter tends to be preferred for depictions of sudden outbursts of anger (Lk. 4:28; Acts 19:28), whereas in orgē there is an occasional element of deliberate thought. Yet both words are condemned as vices, in some cases in the same breath (Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8).

Though perhaps the anger of the king in the parable of the wedding feast (Matt. 22:7; cf. Lk. 14:21) is justified, the anger of the elder brother in the parable of the prodigal son (15:28) is certainly not. A prohibition of anger directed against a fellow human is clearly expressed in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:22).

In most of the rest of the NT, statements on human anger move within these same lines. In Eph. 6:4 fathers are enjoined not to provoke their children to anger (parorgizō). Jas. 1:19–20 lays down a general rule: "Everyone should be quick to listen, slow to speak and slow to become angry, for man's anger does not bring about the righteous life that God desires." When someone becomes angry (whether for good or bad reasons), that person should not let the sun set on the anger (parorgismos) and so give the devil a foothold in one's life (Eph. 4:26–27). Further, prayer is incompatible with anger (1 Tim. 2:8).

It is understandable, therefore, why anger is repeatedly named in NT lists of sins (Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8; Tit. 1:7). orgē is among those things on account of which God's wrath "comes on those who are disobedient" (Eph. 5:6; cf. Col. 3:6). Note Eph. 4:32: "Be kind and compassionate to one another, forgiving each other, just as in Christ God forgave you." Love is the attitude and lifestyle that Christians should adopt (Col. 3:14; cf. 3:8). Being orgilos ("quick-tempered," Tit. 1:7) disqualifies a man from being a bishop (episkopos).

2. However, in a few places human anger is not evaluated negatively. Eph. 4:26, quoting Ps. 4:4, may be paraphrased: "You may be angry, only do not sin." The anger of the king with those who refused his invitation (Matt. 22:7; cf. Lk. 14:21), and even more clearly that of the king with the unforgiving servant (Matt. 18:34), may thus appear thoroughly justified. Perhaps in these cases anger is understood as human participation in God's anger. The reality of Jesus' anger (Mk. 3:5) suggest this possibility, even if the words themselves do not always occur (e.g., against Peter, Matt. 16:23; Mk. 8:33; the Pharisees, Matt. 23; or where God's honor is insulted, Matt. 21:12; Mk. 11:15–17; Lk. 19:45–46; Jn. 2:14–17).

Paul can even regard the ruler of the secular state as "God's servant, an agent of wrath to bring punishment on the wrongdoer" (Rom. 13:4). Believers must not avenge themselves, "but leave room for God's wrath, for it is written, 'It is mine to avenge; I will repay,' says the Lord" (12:19; cf. Lev. 19:18; Deut. 32:35; Heb. 10:30).

3. (a) As in the OT, the NT also uses the orgē word group to illustrate the character of God. The future wrathful judgment of God plays an important role in the preaching of John the Baptist (Matt. 3:7; Lk. 3:2–17) and Jesus (Lk. 21:23; cf. Matt. 22:7). Only those who repent (→ metanoia, 3567) will be able to escape that wrath; merely appealing to being children of Abraham does not suffice (cf. Jn. 8:31–41).

(b) The future wrath of God is unfolded on a massive scale in Rev., which speaks of the anger of the nations (11:18) and of the anger of the dragon, a power opposed to God (12:17). That wrath will finally culminate in judgment, and those who destroy the earth will be brought to destruction (11:18; cf. 6:16). The descriptions of the judgment include the pictures of the rod of iron and "the winepress of the fury of the wrath of God Almighty" (19:15; cf. 14:19), and the "cup of his wrath" (14:10), from which those who worship the beast and also Babylon must drink (16:19; cf. 17:4; 18:3).

4. While attention is thus forcibly drawn to the awful wrath of God in the future, it is viewed in Pauline theology on the horizon of an eschatology that is already being realized in the course of history from the time of Christ's coming. By nature, as children of this world, humans stand under God's wrath (Eph. 2:3; cf. Rom. 1:18–3:20). That wrath does not merely await them on the day of judgment (cf. Jn. 3:36), although Paul can also speak of it as a future event (Rom. 2:5; cf. Eph. 5:6; Col. 3:6).

God's wrath is first directed against the unrighteous, law-breakers, irreverent (→ sebō, 4936), and those who disdain the Creator (Rom. 1:18, 21–32). But his anger is also aroused by the attitude of the so-called pious, who through their observance of the law allow themselves to be driven into a feeling of their own self-esteem. No one can satisfy the Mosaic law; therefore, the law brings wrath (4:15). The lost situation of all humans as prisoners in sin and thus under God's anger has now been revealed by God through the sending of Jesus Christ. That is the central statement of Rom. 1:18. In him God shows the world his righteousness (dikaiosynē), which embraces both his wrath (orgē) and his grace (charis) and compassion (eleos).

On account of the two aspects of this revelation people are placed in a situation that inescapably demands a decision. On the one hand, they may persist as "objects of his wrath" (Rom. 9:22), as—to Paul's sorrow—do most of the Jews of his time (1 Thess. 2:16). On the other hand, they may turn to Jesus Christ and allow him to save them from God's wrath in the realm of his love (Rom. 5:8–9; 1 Thess. 1:10). Thus, the coming of Jesus Christ does not simply mean "cheap grace" for all. If God has destined us to be "objects of his mercy" (Rom. 9:23) "to receive salvation" (1 Thess. 5:9), the offer of salvation requires acceptance. This comes about through faith. Only those who believe in the Son need no longer fear God's judgment, for only to them is the promise of eternal life given. In both Jn. and Paul, eternal life describes the contrast between destruction, the fruit of the divine anger, and compassion, the fruit of the divine mercy (Jn. 3:36; Rom. 2:7).

See also thymos, anger (2596).

3974 (orgizō, be or become angry, make angry), → 3973.

3975 (orgilos, inclined to anger), → 3973.

3977 ὀρέγω

ὀρέγω (oregō), strive (3977); ὄρεξις (orexis), desire (3979).

CL & OT oregō means stretch oneself, stretch out. It is used esp. with a metaphorical meaning. orexis denotes striving of the heart and mind, or (relatively seldom) of bodily desire. The Stoics gave it the special sense of a striving of the soul, following on a deliberate decision of the will guided by human reason.

oregō does not occur in the LXX, orexis only in the Apocr. It is used in a good sense in Wis. 16:2–3, where God satisfies the desire of Israel in the desert with quails. In a bad sense it is found in Sir. 18:30 and 23:6, where Ben Sira warns against perversions at banquets.

NT oregō occurs 3x in the NT and orexis once. In 1 Tim. 3:1 and Heb. 11:16 the words have a good sense. The latter speaks of the desire of faith for a better and heavenly homeland, a home with God. Such desire does not come from within a person but from response to God's promise (cf. 11:9, 13, 15). It manifests itself in reliance on the promise and the obedience of faith (11:8, 17). In 1 Tim. 3:1, oregō refers to the appropriate desire one may have for church office.

In a bad sense, when the goal of our striving is not salvation, we fall victim to destructive powers, such as the love of money (1 Tim. 6:10). In Rom. 1:27 orexis is used in Paul's attacks on perverted forms of sexual desire, such as homosexuality.

See also epithymia, desire, lust (2123); hēdonē, pleasure, (2454).

3978 (oreinos, hilly, mountainous), → 4001.

3979 (orexis, desire), → 3977.

3980 (orthopodeō, walk uprightly, act rightly, be straightforward), → 3981.

3981 ὀρθός

ὀρθός (orthos), upright, straight, right (3981); ὀρθῶς (orthōs), rightly, correctly (3987); διόρθωσις (diorthōsis), improvement, reformation, new order (1481); ἐπανόρθωσις (epanorthōsis), correcting, restoration, improvement (2061); ὀρθοτομέω (orthotomeō), cut straight, lead in a straight way, rightly handle (3982); ὀρθοποδέω (orthopodeō), walk uprightly, act rightly, be straightforward (3980).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. orthos means standing upright, continuing in a straight direction; fig., right, true. It often denotes ethically correct behavior. Both in the cl. period and for the Stoics, the word refers to an objective quality or virtue. diorthōsis denotes straightening what has become disordered or right treatment; fig., correction of a mistake. epanorthōsis means restoration (e.g., of what has been destroyed); fig., improvement (e.g., of laws).

2. In the LXX orthos is also used in the sense of walking upright (Mic. 2:3). It has a special use in the wisdom lit., where it means right, correct, true (e.g., Prov. 8:6, 9, right words; 11:6, an upright person; 16:25, a right way). Thus orthos refers to the kind of right attitude, speech, and action that accords with a proper relationship to Yahweh. It does not describe a virtue so much as a relationship.

NT 1. In the NT letters none of the words occurs more than once or twice. In the Gospels only the adv. orthōs occurs, where it is used to confirm the correctness of a speech or answer (Lk. 10:28; 20:21). In Acts 14:10 orthos is found with its lit. sense, where Paul heals a lame man by calling, "Stand up [upright] on your feet." Heb. 9:10 speaks of the time of a right and better order (diorthōsis), which has begun with Christ's coming and is contrasted with the provisional nature of the OT covenant.

2. Other instances of this word group belong to the sphere of NT ethics and exhortation. (a) Heb. 12:13 exhorts a church that has become weary not to lose sight of the risen Lord and the goal toward which it is moving. The "level paths" (quoting Prov. 4:26) refer to the proper ethical direction set for God's people. Thus orthos is here used in the sense of an appropriate alignment for the Christian church.

(b) Gal. 2:14 deals with the delicate question of Peter's behavior (ouk orthopodeō, "not acting in line") toward the Gentile Christians of Antioch, for when people from James came from Jerusalem, Peter changed courses. By right behavior or walking uprightly, Paul means obedience to the gospel of Christ in its freedom from the law.

(c) In 2 Tim. 3:16 Paul lists the uses of Holy Scripture in ethical and didactic categories. They serve progressively to convert, to restore and improve (epanorthōsis), and to instruct in righteousness.

3. orthotomeō (cf. LXX at Prov. 3:6; 11:5 for cutting a path in a straight direction) occurs only at 2 Tim. 2:15: "Do your best to present yourself to God as one approved, a workman who does not need to be ashamed and who correctly handles [orthotomeō] the word of truth." Some suggest this means to guide the word of truth along a straight path, like a road that goes straight toward its goal. Others suggest it means to teach the word aright, expound it soundly, shape it rightly, and preach it fearlessly.

See also axios, of like value, fit, worthy, worth (545); artios, suitable, complete, capable, sound (787).

3982 (orthotomeō, cut straight, lead in a straight way, rightly handle), → 3981.

3987 (orthōs, rightly, correctly), → 3981.

3988 ὁρίζω

ὁρίζω (horizō), determine, appoint (3988); ἀφορίζω (aphorizō), separate, set apart, appoint (928).

CL & OT horizō originally meant set bounds; hence, establish, determine. The gods establish laws or determine human fate. Later authors transfer the force of the vb. to temporal relationships. The compound aphorizō means separate, choose, determine.

horizō is found 21x in the LXX. It means set a boundary (Num. 34:6; Jos. 13:27; 15:12; 18:20); bind oneself by a vow (Num. 30:3–12, 9x); and separate, decide between (Prov. 18:18). aphorizō is found over 50x in the LXX, always with the connotation of separating, cutting off (cf. Gen. 10:5, "peoples spread out"; Lev. 13:4; Deut. 4:41).

NT 1. In the NT horizō (8x) means determine, establish, appoint. Jesus' messianic claim and his death on the cross were irreconcilable opposites for the Jews. Peter counters this offense by showing that Jesus was crucified by blinded Jewry as a result of God's "set" plan and purpose (Acts 2:23). Similarly in Lk. 22:22 the Son goes the way "decreed" by God for him, "but woe to that man who betrays him." This Jesus has been "appointed" by God as judge of all humanity (Acts 10:42).

In Paul's speech to the Areopagus, he observes that after God had "determined" allotted periods and boundaries for the human race so that they should seek him, he "appointed" a man to judge the world on his set day (Acts 17:26, 31). Heb. 4:7 declares that after the day of testing in the wilderness (3:8), God "set" another day, a new period of salvation beginning with Christ, that offers the opportunity to repent.

In Rom. 1:3–4 Paul may be quoting an early Christian creed when he states that the man Jesus, a descendant of David, "was declared with power" to be God's Son by the resurrection. This does not mean that Jesus was first installed Son of God after his resurrection, for Paul holds that Jesus was his Son from all eternity (cf. 8:3). horizō here means being determined beforehand and now publicly declaring.

In one place alone (Acts 11:29) the vb. has humans as subject: The disciples "decided" to send relief to their fellow Christians in need.

2. aphorizō occurs 10x, meaning separate, choose for, determine. The good are separated from the evil (Matt. 13:49; 25:32). Unbelievers exclude the believers (Lk. 6:22), and conversely the church withdraws from unbelief (Acts 19:9; 2 Cor. 6:17). In Gal. 2:12 Paul accuses Peter of separating himself from meal fellowship with Gentile Christians after Jewish Christians had come from Jerusalem to Antioch; this act made Paul angry, since Peter was recognizing the validity of Jewish dietary laws and thereby breaking apart the unity of the church.

Paul knows himself to have been "set apart" for the service of the gospel (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:15). He did not appoint himself as an apostle, but God did (Acts 13:2).

See also kathistēmi, bring, appoint (2770); paristēmi, place, put at the disposal of (4225); procheirizō, determine, appoint (4741); tassō, arrange, appoint (5435); tithēmi, put, place, set, appoint (5502); prothesmia, appointed date (4607); cheirotoneō, appoint (5936); lanchanō, obtain as by lot (3275).

3991 (horkizō, adjure, implore), → 3923.

3992 (horkos, oath), → 3923.

3993 (horkōmosia, asserting on oath, taking an oath), → 3923.

4001 ὄρος

ὄρος (oros), mountain, mountain chain or region (4001); ὀρεινός (oreinos), hilly, mountainous (3978).

CL & OT 1. The Mesopotamians were conscious of the height and power of mountains, and the Gks. viewed Mount Olympus as the supreme home of the gods. In the Ras Shamra texts, Zaphon, a hill north of Ras Shamra, is the abode of Baal.

2. In the LXX oros generally translates har. Mountains and ravines could be an obstacle to communication (2 Ki. 19:23; Isa. 37:24). Growth of grass on them for pasture is a sign of God's love (Ps. 147:8). Most of the hills in Palestine do not rise above 3,000 ft. and so could be used for beacons. The beacon as a signal of invasion is used in an oracle of judgment (Isa. 13:2; cf. 30:17). The view Moses had from the top of Pisgah was a revelation of all that God would give Israel (Deut. 34:1–4), though Moses was not allowed to set foot in the promised land. Prophecy and parable were delivered from mountains (Jdg. 9:7), and people were addressed from them (2 Chr. 13:4; cf. 2 Sam. 2:25–26). Mountains could be places of refuge (Jdg. 6:2; Ps. 11:1).

3. Mountains are frequently associated with Yahweh's presence. Isaac was to be offered on a mountain (Gen. 22:2). During the battle with the Amalekites Moses prayed on top of a hill (Exod. 17:9–10). Elijah went to the top of Mount Carmel to pray (1 Ki. 18:42), and later received a theophany on Mount Horeb (19:8–18). Blessings and curses were invoked from Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim (Deut. 11:29; 27:12–13). The ark was set on a hill in the promised land (1 Sam. 7:1; 2 Sam. 6:3), and sacrifices were offered on high places (1 Sam. 9:12–14, 25; 1 Ki. 3:4). David captured the elevated Jebusite fortress at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:6–10), which subsequently became the site of the temple erected by Solomon.

4. Esp. in Ps. and the prophetic writings mountains demonstrate Yahweh's power. He made them and was before them, and he has power to destroy them even though they are rooted in the earth (Job 28:9; Ps. 65:6; 83:14; 90:2; 95:4; Hab. 3:6).

5. Mountains also figure in eschatological expectation. They will drip with wine as a symbol of plenty (Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13). The leveling of hills and valleys is a symbol of God's overruling in return from exile (Isa. 40:4; 45:2). The Mount of Olives, overlooking the temple, will be split (Zech. 14:4). Mount Zion (→ Ierousalēm, Jerusalem, 2647) will be higher than other hills, and the Gentile nations will stream to it (Isa. 2:2–4; Mic. 4:1–3). Zion is here the focal point of meeting with Yahweh. The Gentiles will be included with Israel, and the earth will enjoy universal peace.

NT 1. oros ranges from a simple geographical location, including several references to the Mount of Olives, to passages of great theological significance. Jesus apparently often sought the isolation of rugged elevated locations in order to pray or to be alone with his disciples (Matt. 14:23; Mk. 3:13; 6:46; Lk. 6:12). The identification of the mount of transfiguration is unknown. Mount Tabor was occupied by a fortress in Jesus' day, and Mount Hermon seems too far away both for the great crowd at its base, which included some teachers of the law (Mk. 9:14), and for the reference to the return trip being "through Galilee" (9:30). The highest mountain in Galilee was Mount Meron (3,926 feet), which fits the description of Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2.

2. The adjective "high" (hypsēlos; → hypsos, high, 5737) modifies oros 4x in the NT: once to describe the mount of temptation (Matt. 4:8; cf. Lk. 4:5), 2x in reference to the mount of transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2), and once to describe a vantage point to which the seer John was taken (Rev. 21:10).

3. Most important is the theological symbolism of mountains. Certainly the associations with Mount Sinai are strong in the transfiguration narrative: e.g., the appearance of Moses, the cloud, reference to tabernacles, and mention of Jesus' approaching "departure" (Lk. 9:31, Gk. exodos, lit., exodus). Likewise, the mountain on which Jesus gave his sermon with its authoritative comments on the law (Matt. 5–7) may represent a new Sinai (→ Sina, 4982), though this association rests on assumptions regarding Matt.'s intention to establish an exodus motif in his narrative (a matter of debate).

4. Lk.'s references to the leveling of mountains and hills at the coming of the Lord (Lk. 3:4–6) and his omission of the Mount of Olives in 21:5–7 (cf. Matt. 24:1–3) have raised the question whether he envisions an eschatological landscape without mountains. It seems more reasonable to assume that he shares the biblical view of God's sovereignty over even the majestic mountains. As the Lord brings "salvation" (3:6), everything must make way for his coming. Flight to the mountains in time of eschatological distress (Matt. 24:16; Mk. 13:14; Lk. 21:21) is a normal reference to hills and their caves as places of refuge.

5. The saying about the power of faith to remove a mountain (Matt. 17:20; Mk. 11:23) may well have as its background a proverbial expression for overcoming difficulties (cf. Isa. 40:4; 49:11; 54:10), but in context "this mountain" may signify the mount of the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1, 9). In view of this association, the power ascribed to faith to remove "this mountain" is all the more striking. Through that power, Jesus' followers will have the ability to do incredible works for the kingdom of God (cf. Phil. 4:13).

6. The Sermon on the Mount contains the statement: "A city on a hill cannot be hidden" (Matt. 5:14b). It is preceded by, "You are the light of the world" (5:14a), and followed by the saying about putting a lamp on a lampstand and the exhortation to let one's light shine before others (5:16). This saying focuses on the raison d'être of the disciples. Because of their calling, they cannot remain obscure; the character of their lives should be such that others will have cause to glorify God through their witness (cf. Isa. 2:2, 5). Perhaps too we must see here the fulfillment of the promise that in Abraham and his seed all the nations of the earth will be blessed (Gen. 12:3; 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14; cf. Acts 3:25; Gal. 3:8). As the light is manifested in the community of disciples as the people of God, so the nations will come to them as the new Jerusalem to receive blessing and glorify God.

7. Rev. 8:8 perhaps alludes to the eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79, seen as a fulfillment of Jer. 51:25. Rev. 17:9 takes up into the symbolism of world powers the seven hills on which Rome was founded, while 6:14 and 16:20 go beyond the OT expectation of the leveling of the mountains; they will disappear, heralding a new heaven and earth (cf. 20:11; 21:1).

See also erēmos, abandoned, solitary, desolate, deserted (2245); Sina, Sinai (4892).

4003 ὀρφανός

ὀρφανός (orphanos), orphan (4003).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. orphanos as an adj. means without parents, or more generally, bereaved; as a noun, orphan. Careful provision was made in ancient Greece for orphan children. A guardian, usually a near relative, was appointed, who was responsible for the orphan's maintenance and education. Any assets the children inherited were protected until they came of age. Orphans were exempted from the regular taxes. orphanos was also used fig. of disciples left without a master.

2. In the LXX an orphanos is someone who has lost a father, regardless of whether a child's mother has died (cf. Job 24:9). Without the father, "the father's house," the primary unit of family life, ceases to exist and the remaining members of the household become vulnerable to abuse. This is why orphans and widows are often grouped together (e.g., Deut. 10:18; Ps. 146:9). Because the orphans are so helpless—they are "wandering beggars" (109:10)—there can be nothing more wicked than to exploit them (Deut. 27:19; Job 6:27; 22:9; 24:3, 9; Ps. 10:18 = LXX 9:39; Jer. 5:28; Ezek. 22:7).

Thus, the OT law code demanded that the rights of orphans be upheld and their needs met. Orphans were to have a share in the special tithe (Deut. 14:28–29; 26:12–15) and were to be included in the annual feasts (16:11, 14). The sheaves, olives, and grapes that remain after the harvest were to be left for "the alien, the fatherless [orphanos] and the widow" (24:19, 21). The repentance and moral renewal called for by the prophets must include care for orphans (Isa. 1:17; Jer. 7:6; 22:3; Zech. 7:10).

Behind this insistence on provision for orphans lies the conviction that it is ultimately Yahweh himself who "defends the cause of the fatherless" (Deut. 10:18; cf. Exod. 22:22–24; Ps. 146:9; Prov. 23:10–11; Hos. 14:3 = LXX 14:4). He is "a father to the fatherless" (Ps. 68:5; cf. 10:14 = LXX 9:35).

Concern for orphans is also apparent at Qumran (CD 6:16–17; 14:14). One of the nonbiblical psalms of that community gives praise to the Lord, who has not "forsaken the orphan" (1QH 13:20). Philo uses the image of the orphan as a collective symbol of the people of God. Rab. Jud. continued to safeguard the rights of orphans, to legislate for their welfare, and to regard their care as meritorious. Until an orphan boy or girl marries, he or she is to be maintained from charity funds. Deserving of special praise and reward is the one who cares for an orphan in his or her home.

NT 1. orphanos occurs 2x in the NT. In Jas. 1:27, James enjoins practical concern for those least able to help themselves: "orphans and widows." He follows the OT in mentioning the two groups together, more fundamentally in insisting that claims to be religious are futile unless the one who makes them exercises justice and compassion.

2. In Jn. 14:18, Jesus says, "I will not leave you as orphans." Here orphanos is used in a fig. sense, recalling the use of the term in cl. Gk. to describe the feelings of disciples bereft of their teacher. But the image draws its force from the OT estimate of the family as primarily "the father's house," a household living a single corporate life whose center and source is the father. With the father's death the house is no more, and thus the desolation of the orphan is the loss of all by which he lives. The relationship of Jesus to his disciples is presented here as that of a father to his children (cf. 13:3). His death will make them "orphans."

But they will not be left in this pitiable situation. He will come to them. The time for this return is most likely the resurrection (rather than at the coming of the Spirit or at the Parousia), for orphans, unless intervention is swift, have little hope of survival. Easter will end the disciples' bereavement and their fear of being left as orphans.

4008 ὅσιος

ὅσιος (hosios), holy, devout, pious (4008); ὁσιότης (hosiotēs), holiness, devoutness, piety (4009); ἀνόσιος (anosios), unholy (495).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the earliest form of word from this group is hosiē, which stood for what was in accordance with divine direction and providence. hosios could mean the obligations laid on a person in ritual and ceremonies, e.g., burial rites. It then came to have the general sense of sanctioned or allowed by divine or natural law, but did not denote something inherently sacred. Used of people, hosios means pious, religious; of actions, pure, clean.

2. hosios by and large translates Heb. ḥāsîd, which denotes the one who readily accepts the obligations that arise from the people's relationship to God, the loyal, the pious one. This Heb. word occurs most frequently in the pl. and means the congregation gathered for worship (e.g., Ps. 50:5; 85:8) and serving God (79:2). The Gentile nations are not ḥāsîd, and within the people of God the ḥ^asîdîm are contrasted with those declared guilty (Ps. 15). Even in the context of strict observance of the law, ḥāsîd can have the sense of trusting (e.g., 32:6; cf. 52:9–10). The Hasidim as the name of a particular group within Jud. does not occur until the time of the Maccabees (1 Macc. 2:42; 7:13; 2 Macc. 14:6). This group seems to have strictly observed the Torah. The absence of the word in the Qumran documents is, however, striking.

3. God is several times described as hosios in the LXX (see Deut. 32:4; Ps. 145:13, 17). He supports the fallen, satisfies the hungry, and is near to those who pray. God takes hosiotēs as an invincible shield (Wis. 5:19; cf. Rev. 15:4). ta hosia (Deut. 29:19) are the kindnesses that one expects from God, and in Isa. 55:3 the successes that David could expect from God.

NT 1. In the NT hosios is a rare word (8x, of which 5 are in quotations); hosiotēs and anosios both occur 2x. The most important OT use (hosioi, the congregation) does not appear. Rather, the members of the Christian community are called "the chosen" (eklektoi; → eklegomai, 1721) and saints (hagioi, → 41). In Lk. 1:75, hosiotēs is used of Jewish piety, and in 1 Tim. 1:9 the negative anosios refers to the law laid down for the unholy (cf. 2 Tim. 3:2). Eph. 4:24 mentions hosiotēs as one of the qualities of the new person in Christ.

2. God is twice called hosios in quotations. The hymn of Rev. 15:3–4 goes back to Ps. 145:17 and its context. Rev. 16:5 recalls Deut. 32:4: God is equally dikaios (just) and hosios (holy) in judgment when he condemns evildoers.

3. The use of hosios in Heb. 7:26 is unique. It is used absolutely in the way in which elsewhere it can be used only of God. As high priest, Christ is completely hosios, completely sinless and utterly pure, so that his offering is sufficient, once for all. Acts 2:27 and 13:35 (quoting Ps. 16:10) refer to God's promise not to let his Holy One (hosios) see destruction—a promise not fulfilled in David but only in Christ. By virtue of the resurrection Jesus is the true Holy One, even though he was condemned by the religious authorities as a religious criminal.

See also hagios, holy, sacred (41); hieros, holy (2641).

4009 (hosiotēs, holiness, devoutness, piety), → 4008.

4011 ὀσμή

ὀσμή (osmē), smell, scent (4011); εὐωδία (euōdia), fragrance, aroma (2380).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. osmē means smell, scent. Antiquity conceived of smell in strongly material terms, so that the trunk of a tree was said to receive new life and vitality from the scent of water (cf. Job 14:9). Smell contained a life-giving force. This materialistic idea of smell as something charged with energy also appears in the sphere of religion. In the revelation of deity the smell proceeding from it is important as the bearer of divine life.

2. Some passages of the OT refer to the power of physical smell: The bridegroom in the Song of Songs sings of the ravishing fragrance of his beloved (e.g., Song 4:10); the smell of fresh hide indicates to Isaac the presence of his firstborn son, a strong, virile hunter (Gen. 27:27). In a fig. sense the power of Moab is compared with that of mature wine and its "aroma" (Jer. 48:11 = LXX 31:11). Wisdom is said to diffuse fragrance (Sir. 24:15), while 39:14 calls the praise of God by his people a sweet smell. But the materialistic background is still present here, in that the fragrance diffused by wisdom and godliness contains a life-giving power.

In the OT religious sphere, offerings are made to the Lord for a "pleasing aroma" (Gen. 8:21; Lev. 2:12; cf. 1:9; 13, 17; Num. 28:1–2). But note Lev. 26:31 and Amos 5:21, which show that God is not dependent on offerings or their smell.

NT 1. osmē is found only 6x in the NT, two of which are in the combination osmē euōdias (Eph. 5:2; Phil. 4:18; lit., "scent of an aroma"; NIV "fragrant offering"). Elsewhere euōdia occurs only in 2 Cor. 2:15, between two verses each containing osmē.

2. In the story of the anointing at Bethany (Jn. 12:3), the house is said to have been filled with the fragrance of the ointment. In addition to the lit. sense, there is doubtless symbolism here: As the fragrance of the ointment filled the house, so the fragrance of the gospel will fill the whole earth. In Eph. 5:2 osmē euōdias describes Christ's death as a sacrifice that is "a fragrant offering . . . to God." The fig. usage is esp. apparent in Phil. 4:18, where Paul calls the financial aid sent to him by the Philippians "a fragrant offering." The idea here is not simply that of a sacrifice in the strict sense of the word; rather, the Philippians' gift is a symbol of every gift we bring to God.

3. The idea of osmē as a life-giving or death-giving force is prominent in 2 Cor. 2:14–16. The fragrance of the knowledge of God is being diffused by the work of the apostle; indeed, Paul himself is the bearer of the fragrance of Christ. This fragrance has a twofold effect: To those who obey the gospel it brings divine life, while to those who refuse the message it brings eternal death. That is, the gospel divides humans, calling for individual decision and emphasizing the divine power inherent in the gospel.

Moreover, the apostle stresses here that in all his weakness, suffering, and lack of acclaim and in his message of the cross, he is like the stench of death to those who only see defeat and a morbid message. But in reality, his sacrificial service for the gospel of Christ's sacrifice is sweet, recalling the sweet savor of the OT sacrifices (cf. Gen. 8:21; Exod. 29:18; Lev. 1:9; Num. 15:3; Ezek. 6:13; Dan. 4:34). The apostles, in other words, are the smoke that arises out of the sacrifice of Christ to God, diffusing as it spreads out the knowledge of God communicated in the cross.

4017 ὀστράκινος

ὀστράκινος (ostrakinos), made of earth or clay, earthenware (4017).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ostrakeus meant a potter. In the cl. and Hel. periods, the sing. noun ostrakon denotes either a clay vessel or a fragment of such a vessel, a potsherd. From the practice at Athens and elsewhere of using potsherds for voting on the banishment of a citizen, the vb. ostrakizō was coined to speak of the ostracizing of someone. The adj. ostrakinos was used in Hel. Christian writings to describe as useless and lifeless the terracotta images of pagan idols.

2. (a) In the LXX the adj. ostrakinos simply identifies the material from which a vessel was made as clay (Lev. 6:28; 11:33; 14:5, 50; Num. 5:17; Jer. 32:14 = LXX 39:14). Pleasant speech concealing an evil heart is compared to a clay jar covered by silver glaze (Prov. 26:23, ostrakon). The humiliated sons of Zion, who were "once worth their weight in gold," are considered of no more value by their captors than common earthenware (Lam. 4:2). In Dan. 2:33, 34, 41–42 ostrakinos describes the great image Nebuchadnezzar saw in a dream, whose feet were partly of iron and partly of clay.

The related meaning, potsherd, also occurs in the LXX. Judgment is pronounced on Israel's unbelief in terms of the ruthless smashing of a potter's vessel into small fragments (Isa. 30:14). The familiar sight of shards of pottery bleached by the scorching sun provided an image for the parched sufferer who complains that his strength is dried up "like a potsherd" (Ps. 22:15, ostrakon). Both nuances of the word are evident in the instruction given to Jer. to purchase an earthenware flask from the potter but to smash it before the elders to represent what will happen to Jerusalem for her sins (19:1, 11). In Sir. 22:7, futility is pictured as gluing together a smashed pot (ostrakon).

NT 1. ostrakinos occurs 2x in the NT. In 2 Cor. 4:6 Paul describes the gospel as "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ," but in 4:7 he maintains that this treasure has been committed to jars "of clay," a metaphor that compares the apostle and his colleagues to common clay pots. The striking contrast between the splendor of the treasure and the ordinary nature of the vessel in which it is stored directs attention away from preachers to the glory of their message. It was not unusual in the ancient world to conceal valuable treasures in clay urns. Paul's detractors had described his bodily appearance as weak and had dismissed his words as inconsequential (10:1, 10; 11:6). His self-description as ostrakinos attests that human weakness presents no barrier to the accomplishment of the divine intention when it is undergirded by God's power.

2. Paul also uses ostrakinos when he urges Timothy to separate himself from false teachers such as Philetus and Hymenaeus, who have subverted the faith of some at Ephesus (2 Tim. 2:14–19, 22–26). But why are there disloyal persons in the congregation? Paul responds by comparing the church to a large house in which it is normal to find vessels of differing material serving differing functions (2:20). As the presence of wood and clay (ostrakinos) vessels devoted to disreputable use occasions no surprise, so base leadership in the church can be anticipated. But whether a vessel is made of gold, silver, or clay, it may be clean in order to be ready for honorable service. By separating himself from false teachers and cleansing himself from their disreputable actions, Timothy will be prepared for any task to which God calls him.

See also keramion, an earthenware vessel, jar (3040); pēlos, clay, mud, mire (4384); phyrama, a mixture, a lump (5878).

4026 οὐαί

οὐαί (ouai), woe, alas (4026).

CL & OT ouai is an onomatopoeic exclamation of pain or anger, infrequently used in cl. Gk. It occurs 69x in the LXX, usually representing the Heb. hôy. ouai can express grief (Prov. 23:29), despair (1 Sam. 4:8), lamentation (1 Ki. 13:30), dissatisfaction (Isa. 1:4), pain (Jer. 10:19), and fear in the face of a threat (Ezek. 16:23). The Heb. hôy is also used simply to attract attention (Isa. 55:1, untranslated in the LXX).

NT In the NT ouai expresses primarily condemnation, though in some cases the idea of sympathetic sorrow is also apparent.

1. (a) In Matt. 11:21; Lk. 10:13 Jesus cries condemnatory woes on Korazin and Bethsaida (later Capernaum, the base of Jesus' ministry, cf. 4:13; 11:23–24) for their utter lack of response to his message and miracles. Jesus compares these cities' lack of response with the reaction that Tyre and Sidon would have had (repentance) if these notoriously wicked cities (Isa. 23) had been given similar opportunities to witness God's mighty signs. Matt. 18:7 ("Woe to the world!") offers a warning for those who cause esp. the weak and unsuspecting to sin. Such sin is culpable.

(b) The seven woes Jesus pronounces on the teachers of the law and Pharisees in Matt. 23:13–29 are denunciatory. These leaders' casuistry makes it virtually impossible for people to devote themselves to the fidelity that leads to the kingdom of heaven. Sympathetic sorrow is present here as well, as is clear from Jesus' closing lament over Jerusalem (23:37–39).

The first woe (Matt. 23:13) is directed against the lawyers, who block the way to the kingdom of heaven by their misinterpretation of Scripture. The second (23:15) condemns the lengths to which these men go to secure converts from among Gentiles, but only to their own sectarian brand of Pharisaism. The third woe (23:16–22) exposes the casuistry that subverts morality: even after an oath people need not tell the truth if the oath was not made in a particular way. The fourth woe (23:23–24) refers to Pharisaic scrupulousness in the application of the law of tithing (Lev. 27:30–33; Deut. 14:22–29). The fifth woe (23:25–26) condemns the punctilious observance of ritual purifications in the kitchen to the neglect of plain moral obligations. In the sixth (23:27–28), whitened tombs appear clean and attractive on the outside, but their interiors are full of foulness; such were the Pharisees. Finally, the seventh woe (23:29–33) condemns the Pharisees' hypocrisy in building fine tombs to honor prophets murdered by their ancestors, while plotting to do away with Jesus, the living prophet in their midst.

(c) Jesus utters four woes in Luke 6:24–26, both to warn those who do not follow him and to express his sadness at what he knows is their inevitable end. Such people may be rich in worldly terms, but in what really matters, things of the Spirit, they are empty.

(d) Jesus' woe on the fate of Judas (Matt. 26:24; Mk. 14:21; Lk. 22:22) combines divine wrath and intense sorrow, for Judas is putting himself outside God's mercy.

(e) In Jude 11 the writer utters a prophetic woe on heretical teachers, whom he describes in terms of the sins and fates of Cain, Balaam, and Korah, the classic examples of what happens to those who are jealous, greedy, and proud. In NT times Cain was not only a murderer, but also as a personification of selfishness, self-sufficiency, and power over the lives of others for evil. Balaam reflects the unprincipled character known in Hel. Jud. as the prototype of mercenaries who shrink from nothing for financial gain. Korah is someone who took others with him in his blasphemous insubordination (Num. 16).

2. In Matt. 24:19 (Mk. 13:17; Lk. 21:23) ouai expresses primarily pity and compassion for those who on account of family responsibilities will be hindered in their escape from the doomed city of Jerusalem.

3. In 1 Cor. 9:16 Paul offers a special use of ouai. In this context he stresses his personal decision not to accept support from the Corinthian church while ministering there. But in one respect he has no liberty: Preach he must. The compulsion he feels to proclaim the gospel of Christ is both an inward divine constraint and an outward burden pressing on him (cf. Isa. 8:11; Jer. 20:9). ouai for him if he does not do so. The meaning is not that God will punish him, but that for Paul to be unfaithful to the trust given to him would be the greatest misery imaginable.

4. Rev. includes ouai 14x. In 8:13 the threefold warning of ouai from an eagle corresponds to three trumpet blasts about to be sounded in succession by three angels who announce drastic judgments to fall on an unbelieving world (9:12; 11:14). In 12:12, after the devil is expelled by Michael and his angels, the inhabitants of heaven rejoice, but a loud ouai warns that heaven's deliverance means a redoubling of the devil's wrath against the earth. In 18:10, 16, 19 ouai is a cry of self-pity by national leaders (18:9), traders (18:11), and merchant sailors (18:17; cf. Ezek. 27:29–36) on the spectacular collapse of the mighty commercial but self-seeking and sinful city of Babylon; they know that their source and means of financial profit have been swept away.

4039 (ouranios, heavenly), → 4041.

4040 (ouranothen, from heaven), → 4041.

4041 οὐρανός

οὐρανός (ouranos), heaven (4041); οὐράνιος (ouranios), heavenly (4039); ἐπουράνιος (epouranios), heavenly (2230); οὐρανόθεν (ouranothen), from heaven (4040).

CL ouranos embraces everything and is thus divine. In Gk. mythology Uranos derived from the earth, Ge, which he impregnated in a holy marriage. He was castrated and deposed as a god by Kronos, the son of Uranos and Ge. In Homer, heaven rests on pillars that Atlas carries. In it dwell the gods, esp. Zeus.

As the ancient mythological concepts dissolved, ouranos became simply the firmament, and ouranios (what is in heaven, heavenly) was applied to phenomena appearing in this firmament. In Plato heaven was equated with the all, the cosmos. The starry heavens, the dwelling place of the gods, became the starting point for the investigation of existence and absolute knowledge. Hence Plato used ouranios to denote what really is and what is truly coming to be. The Stoics understood heaven as the outermost layer of the ether and then also as the directing world principle. The expression "earth and heaven" denoted the whole world.

OT 1. OT concepts of heaven. (a) The OT concepts of heaven contain certain echoes of ancient cosmology. The underworld, the earth, and heaven together form a cosmic building. Several OT references suggest the picture of the earth as a flat disc, surrounded by the ocean, above which heaven or the firmament forms a vault like an upturned bowl; above this is the heavenly ocean (Gen. 1:8; Ps. 148:4–6). According to the ancient cosmology, there are many other heavenly spheres beyond the firmament, which is visible from the earth. Such concepts are echoed in the expression "the highest heavens" (Deut. 10:14; 1 Ki. 8:27; Ps. 148:4).

The OT uses poetic imagery that reflects the language of the ancient myths to describe heaven. Heaven has windows (Gen. 7:11; 2 Ki. 7:2), through which waters restrained by the firmament can pour. Above the firmament are the storehouses of snow, hail (Job 38:22), wind (37:9; Ps. 135:7; Jer. 49:36), and waters (Job 38:37; Ps. 33:7), which return to heaven after it has rained (Job 36:27; Isa. 55:10). Heaven rests on pillars (Job 26:11) or on foundations (2 Sam. 22:8). It is like a pitched tent (Ps. 104:2; Isa. 40:22; 44:24). It is an unrolled scroll and can be torn (64:1). Together with the earth and the water under it, the heavens make up the universe (cf. Exod. 20:4; Ps. 115:15–16 = LXX 115:23–24). It is compared to a house in which the heavens are like a loft (104:3; Amos 9:6).

(b) In the sense of horizontal expanse it is possible to speak of the four ends of heaven (Jer. 49:36 = LXX 25:15; Dan. 7:2; Zech. 6:5). Humans cannot ascend to heaven (Deut. 30:12; Prov. 30:4 = LXX 24:27), and to attempt to do so is folly (cf. the Tower of Babel story, Gen. 11:4–9).

(c) Heaven is the embodiment of permanence (Deut. 11:21; Ps. 89:29), though prophetic preaching also refers to catastrophic judgment on the heavens (Isa. 13:13; 34:4; 50:3; 51:6; Jer. 4:23–26). Isa. speaks of the creation of a new heaven (65:17; 66:22).

(d) The "heavenly array" or "heavenly host" means the stars (Deut. 4:19; cf. Gen. 2:1) or supernatural beings (1 Ki. 22:19; Job 1:6–2:2). The latter is under a commander (cf. Jos. 5:14) and has fiery horses (2 Ki. 2:11; cf. 6:17). In the OT, however, heaven is never accorded a ruling function. Even the stars in the firmament are mere lights to divide up the calendar (Gen. 1:14), not gods. The ancient worldview has, in this respect, been demythologized. Astrological ideas that elsewhere in the ANE were richly developed appear only on the periphery (Deut. 18:9–13; Isa. 47:13; Jer. 10:2). But under foreign influence "the starry hosts" became an object of worship, a practice against which the prophets protested (e.g., 2 Ki. 17:16; 21:3).

(e) The OT reflects a correspondence between the heavenly and the earthly, esp. in the things that have a sacral value. Thus, the tabernacle was built following a heavenly model (Exod. 25:9, 40). Ezek. speaks of a scroll that preexisted in heaven (2:9–3:2). The eschatological order of salvation is prefigured and has happened in heaven, so that it precedes the earthly event (Zech. 2–3).

2. Yahweh and heaven. (a) More important for faith than these cosmological concepts is the statement that Yahweh created the heavens and the earth, i.e., the whole universe (Gen. 1:1; cf. Ps. 33:6; Isa. 42:5). Like the whole creation, the firmament and the heavens praise Yahweh (Ps. 19:1). The heavenly beings praise Yahweh because of his acts, for everything that happens on earth reveals his glory (29:9).

(b) The main concern of the OT writers was not with where Yahweh lives but on his dealings with Israel and the nations. Thus Yahweh can dwell either on Mount Sinai (e.g., Deut. 33:2; Jdg. 5:4–5) or on Mount Zion (Isa. 8:18; Amos 1:2). In 1 Ki. 8:12–13 Yahweh is said to dwell in the darkness of the Most Holy Place, i.e., in the temple. By contrast, several verses later (8:27) Solomon says that "even the highest heaven" cannot contain him. Neither the visible nor the invisible world can enclose Yahweh, for both were created by him.

(c) Numerous passages describe Yahweh as the God or king of heaven (Ezr. 5:11–12; 6:9–10; 7:12, 21, 23; Dan. 2:28, 37, 44; cf. Gen. 11:5; 24:3; Ps. 29:10). He rides on the clouds (Deut. 33:26; Ps. 68:4; Isa. 19:1) and has built his palace on the heavenly ocean (Ps. 104:3). Yahweh is enthroned in heaven, surrounded by heavenly beings and taking counsel with them (1 Ki. 22:19–22; Job 1:6–12; Ps. 82:1; Isa. 6:3–8; Dan. 7:9–10). The gods of the Canaanites become Yahweh's servants, and he is the only God in heaven and on earth (Deut. 4:39; 10:14).

(d) According to the theology of Deut., Yahweh lives in heaven and speaks from there (4:36; 26:15). Only his "Name" dwells on earth (12:5, 11, 21). The eternal word of God has its place in heaven (Ps. 89:2; 119:89). The godly, praying in their need, complain that Yahweh is hidden (Lam. 3:1–9) and ask him to rend the heavens and come down (Isa. 64:1 = LXX 63:19). In prayer, suppliants raise their hands to heaven (Exod. 9:29, 33).

(e) It is possible for Yahweh to take chosen people to himself in heaven (2 Ki. 2:11; cf. Gen. 5:24; Ps. 73:24). This is a particular favor and honor, for on the OT view heaven is not otherwise the place where the dead or souls go.

3. The LXX and Judaism. (a) With few exceptions, ouranos in the LXX (667x) always translates šāmayim. It is in the pl. 51x (partly because the Heb. word is a pl. form, i.e., dual). In later writings the frequency of the pl. increases, indicating that the ancient oriental conception of several heavens began to have an effect (Tob. 8:5; Wis. 9:10; 2 Macc. 15:23; 3 Macc. 2:2).

In Jud. the tendency to avoid the use of God's name became increasingly stronger (cf. Exod. 20:7). In its place substitutes were used, among them "heaven"

(1 Macc. 3:18–19; 4:10–11; 12:15). ouranios only occurs 9x in the LXX—for the God of Israel (1 Esd. 6:15), his power (Dan. 4:23, Theod.), the angels as a heavenly army (4 Macc. 4:11; cf. Lk. 2:13), and the children of God (2 Macc. 7:34). epouranios only occurs 7x in the LXX.

(b) Contact with the intellectual climate of the ANE resulted in a variety of cosmological speculations in pseudepigraphic and rab. writings. In them apocalyptists and rabbis undertake journeys to heaven and give revelations about things on the other side, but no generally binding doctrines about these things were ever arrived at. Some apocalyptic writings know of only one heaven (1 Enoch, 4 Esd., 2 Bar.). Others speak of three (T. Levi 2–3) or five heavens (3 Bar.); 2 Enoch, T. Ab., and rab. tradition speak of seven heavens. A further result of Eastern influence is the doctrine that everything corresponds to an archetype and pattern in heaven and that all earthly events are prefigured in heaven (→ anō, 539).

(c) In certain writings Paradise is located in heaven, either in the 3d (2 Enoch 8:1–8; Assum. Mos. 37), or esp. in rab. tradition in the 7th. Even hell (→ geenna, 1147) can be located in heaven. After death the righteous go to heavenly dwelling places. Satan can also be found in heaven. In connection with OT traditions he is viewed as the accuser of humans before God (cf. Job 1–2) as well as an evil power opposed to God. Jewish traditions about heavenly treasure-houses are important. In them are kept the good works of people and the fate of earthly beings. Also recorded are the rewards and punishments that await the last judgment.

(d) Philo combined Gk. and OT ideas. The ouranos noētos, the immaterial heaven of conceptual thinking present only in idea, must be distinguished from the ouranos aisthētos, the tangible heaven, which must not be deified. Heaven actualizes the unity of the cosmos. Philo spoke of the heavenly person as ouranios, a copy of God. Insofar as every person is a part of him, every person is also an inhabitant of heaven.

NT In the NT ouranos occurs 273x, most frequently in Matt. (82x), esp. in the phrase "the kingdom of heaven." Apart from Matt., it occurs mostly in the sing. ouranios occurs 9x, of which 7 are in Matt. in the phrase "your/my heavenly Father" (5:48; 6:14, 26, 32; 15:13; 18:35; 23:9). epouranios is found 19x in the NT, clearly preferred over ouranios. Occasionally ouranos means "sky" (Lk. 4:25; Rev. 11:6), but usually it has more theological nuances.

1. General statements. (a) Rev. makes the most statements about heavenly beings and objects, though the interest is not cosmological but theological and soteriological. There is no attempt, as in certain rab. writings, to give definitive instruction about the geography of heaven. It is striking that there is no mention of several heavens in Rev. but only of one. One NT passage speaks of three heavens (2 Cor. 12:2–4), but we are not given any more precise information. As in the OT, the expression "heaven and earth" means the universe (e.g., Matt. 5:18, 34–35; 11:25). Occasionally a reference to the sea is added, giving rise to a tripartite formula (Acts 4:24; 14:15; Rev. 14:7).

Since, according to this world picture, heaven is "above" (→ anō, 539), people raise their hands or their eyes toward it (Mk. 6:41; 7:34; Lk. 18:13; Jn. 17:1; Acts 1:11; 7:55; Rev. 10:5). The air can also be called heaven (Matt. 6:26; 8:20; 16:2; Mk. 4:32; Lk. 8:5; Acts 10:12; 11:6; → aēr, 113). In heaven, i.e., the firmament, are set the stars, which in eschatological discourse about the Parousia fall to the earth (Mk. 13:25; Lk. 21:26; Rev. 6:13; 8:10; 9:1; 12:4). Portents are seen in heaven (12:1, 3; 15:1).

(b) There are angels in heaven, who serve as God's messengers and servants (Matt. 18:10; Mk. 12:25; 13:32; Eph. 3:15; Rev. 12:7; 19:1, 14). They come from and return to heaven (Matt. 28:2; Lk. 2:15; 22:43). They appear in the visions of John (Rev. 10:1; 18:1). Satan is thrown out of heaven as the consequence of Christ's saving work so that he may no longer accuse Jesus' disciples (Lk. 10:18; Jn. 12:31; Rev. 12:12). At this, heaven and the martyrs in heaven rejoice (5:13; 11:12; 18:20). Thus, everything dark and evil vanishes from heaven, so that it becomes a world of pure light. Where evil powers in heaven are mentioned, the reference is primarily to the air or to the firmament (Acts 7:42; Eph. 2:2; 3:10; 6:12). Their sphere of influence, therefore, is entirely on this side of God's realm of light.

(c) In agreement with the OT it is stated that God created heaven and earth (Acts 4:24; 14:15; 17:24; Rev. 10:6; 14:7) and that he will recreate them (2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1). The present heaven will pass away like the earth (Mk. 13:31; Heb. 12:26; 2 Pet. 3:7, 10, 12; Rev. 20:11), but Jesus' words will remain (Mk. 13:31). God is Lord of heaven and earth (Matt. 5:34; 11:25; Acts 7:49; 17:24; cf. Isa. 66:1).

(d) God is said to dwell "in heaven," but there is no reflection on difficulties inherent in this statement. Occasionally God is referred to by the OT expression "God of heaven" (Rev. 11:13; 16:11). Heaven itself is God's throne (Matt. 5:34; Acts 7:49; Heb. 8:1; Rev. 4–5). It follows from this that heaven can be used as a substitute for God (Matt. 5:10; 6:20; Mk. 11:30; Lk. 10:20; Jn. 3:27), esp. in Matt.'s expression "the kingdom of heaven."

It is more important theologically that God is called "Father in heaven" (Matt. 5:16, 45; 6:1, 9; 7:11, 21; 10:32–33; 12:50). Because God is in heaven his revelation takes place from there (11:27). At Jesus' baptism and at other crises in his earthly ministry God's voice was heard from heaven (Mk. 1:11; Jn. 12:28; cf. Heb. 12:25). The seer heard voices from heaven (Rev. 10:4, 8; 11:12; 14:13; 18:4; cf. 21:3), and the Holy Spirit came down from heaven (Mk. 1:10; Acts 2:2; 1 Pet. 1:12). In the same way God's wrath goes forth from heaven (Lk. 17:29; Rom. 1:18).

(e) Acts 14:17 states that God gives rain and fruitful seasons ouranothen, "from heaven," implying both the physical and the spiritual source. The only other occurrence of this word is in 26:13, where it is an alternative to ek tou ouranou ("from heaven," 9:3).

(f) The NT also speaks of treasures of salvation in heaven (Matt. 6:20). Rewards are in heaven (5:12), and the names of the disciples are recorded in heaven (Lk. 10:20; cf. Heb. 12:23). Their inheritance is there as well (1 Pet. 1:4). Christians have a building (2 Cor. 5:1–2) and their citizenship or home in heaven (Phil. 3:20). There is mention of a heavenly Jerusalem, which is the Christians' true home (Gal. 4:26; Heb. 12:22; Rev. 3:12; 21:2; 10), and even of a temple in heaven (11:19; but cf. 21:22).

2. Christological statements. (a) The statements about heaven are particularly important when they stand in relation to Jesus Christ. At his baptism the heavens opened, the Holy Spirit descended on him, and God the Father acknowledged him (Matt. 3:16–17). Heaven was open above him because he himself was the door of heaven and of God's house on earth (Jn. 1:51; cf. Gen. 28:12). Jesus taught his disciples to pray for God's will to be done on earth as in heaven (Matt. 6:10). When Jesus gave authority to Peter or to the disciples, their actions were valid in heaven, i.e., with God (16:19; 18:19).

Jesus of Nazareth will sit at God's right hand and will come with the clouds of heaven (Mk. 14:62; cf. Ps. 110:1; Dan. 7:13). At the Parousia the sign of the Son of Man will appear in heaven (Matt. 24:30), at which time he will gather his elect from one end of heaven to the other (Mk. 13:27). All power in heaven and on earth has been given to the Risen One (Matt. 28:18). He is Lord (→ kyrios, 3261), and to him everything on earth and in heaven will pay homage (Phil. 2:10). He bestows the Holy Spirit from heaven and displays wonders and signs in heaven (Acts 2:17–20, 32–36). The Christian community's task is to wait for him to come to judge and to save (Phil. 3:20; 1 Thess. 1:10; 4:16; 2 Thess. 1:7), not to look up into heaven (Acts 1:10–11).

As the Lamb who has been exalted to God's throne, Christ has the authority to open the sealed book and thus to set in motion the final phase of the world's history (Rev. 5:3–6:1). Thus, the whole of creation praises him (5:11–14). This means, moreover, that Christ does not belong to the realm of the world, but to the realm of God. As the one who has come from heaven and returned there, Jesus Christ reveals himself as the true bread from heaven, by means of which God bestows eternal life (Jn. 6:31–33, 38, 41–42, 50–51; cf. Exod. 16:4, 13–15).

(b) As in the OT (Exod. 25:9), the earthly sanctuary in Heb. is a copy of the heavenly one. But it is only a shadow; the heavenly sanctuary is the only true and real one. This heavenly sanctuary is still, eschatologically speaking, to come (Heb. 8:5; 9:23–24). Since Christ has entered the heavenly sanctuary, he has shown himself to be the true high priest (8:1–2). The Christian's calling to faith is also epouranios (3:1; cf. Phil. 3:14), as are the gifts, the salvation that Christians have tasted (Heb. 6:4; cf. 9:28). The homeland of the pilgrim people of God (11:16) and their Jerusalem, viewed as an eschatological goal, are likewise epouranios (12:22).

According to Heb., Jesus' exaltation (1:3; 8:1) signifies the fulfillment of his high priestly office. He has passed through the heavens and has been raised higher than they (4:14; 7:26; 9:11, 23–24), since he has reached the very throne of God. There he performs his real, true priestly service (8:1–2), at the same time fulfilling and surpassing that of the OT.

(c) Certain special emphases are found in Eph. and Col. Christ existed before anything created came to be, and he himself was not created (Col. 1:16). He is the instrument, the agent, and the goal of creation; without him nothing can exist (cf. also Jn. 1:3). Special emphasis is laid on the fact that everything, including the heavenly powers, has been created "in Christ" and is reconciled through him (Col. 1:15–23). Christ is head over all principalities and powers.

The exalted Christ has penetrated all the heavenly spheres and come down to earth. He has broken through the barrier erected by the evil powers that isolated humans from God (Eph. 1:10; 4:9). Similarly 1:23 and 4:10 apply to Christ the OT statement that Yahweh fills heaven and earth. This is a consequence of the thought of 1:10 (cf. Col. 1:16, 20) that every created thing has its goal to be united in Christ and has no independent existence apart from him. Creation is strictly related to the Redeemer and to redemption.

3. (a) In Jn. ouranos, heaven, occurs only in the sing. God's will to save and the salvation effected by Jesus Christ determine the statements about heaven. Jesus comes from heaven and returns there. In principle the Son of Man, who has come down from heaven, has much to say about heavenly things (epourania) and the plans of God concealed there. But not everyone can believe and understand these things, so Jesus concentrates on God's present activity on earth (Jn. 3:12–13, 31–32).

(b) Paul refers to the bodily form of heavenly beings—either stars or angelic powers—in 1 Cor. 15:40. Christ, the preexistent, risen, and coming one, is the heavenly man, whose image, i.e., whose bodily form, Christians will receive at the Parousia (15:48–49). God has seated Jesus "at his right hand in the heavenly realms" (ta epourania, a circumlocution for heaven) and thus blessed Christians with spiritual blessing (Eph. 1:20; cf. 1:3). Spiritually we have already risen with Christ and been exalted to heaven (2:6; cf. Ps. 110:1). The manifold wisdom of God will be made known to the principalities and powers in heaven (Eph. 3:10); the saving work of Christ thus has cosmic significance. According to 2 Tim. 4:18, Christ's kingdom is epouranios, i.e., it possesses heavenly authority and glory, and is therefore superior to every temptation and persecution the apostle has to suffer.

See also anabainō, go up, mount up (326); anō, above, upward (539).

4045 (ousia, substance, property), → 5975.

4050 (opheiletēs, debtor), → 4053.

4051 (opheilē, obligation), → 4053.

4052 (opheilēma, what is owed, a debt), → 4053.

4053 ὀφείλω

ὀφείλω (opheilō), owe, be indebted to (4053); ὀφείλημα (opheilēma), what is owed, a debt (4052); ὀφειλέτης (opheiletēs), debtor (4050); ὄφελον (ophelon), O that, would that, if only (4054); ὀφειλή (opheilē), obligation (4051).

CL & OT 1. (a) The word group formed from the stem opheil- belongs originally to the sphere of law. When linked with an obj., opheilō means to owe someone something, e.g., money; when used with an infinitive, to owe in the sense of being indebted. An opheiletēs is a debtor or someone under an obligation to achieve something. opheilē (rare) and the more common opheilēma denote a debt, esp. of a financial nature. ophelon (originally an aor. part. of opheilō with estin [is] added) became the set expression for the optative, "O that," "would that," "if only."

(b) There are also moral obligations in respect of people or of state laws. Thus a culprit may be punished by being required to pay compensation to an injured party. Infringement of divine regulations and thanks owed in return for benefactions of the gods make humans debtors, requiring from them some cultic penance or act.

2. (a) In the LXX opheilō occurs only 22x (10x in the Apocr.), either in the optative formula ophelon (e.g., Num. 14:2 = LXX 14:3; 20:3) or in connection with the law of debt (e.g., Isa. 24:2; Ezek. 18:7). In Deut. 15:2 loans are regulated in such a way that for sacral law in Israel, as distinct from other nations of the ANE, monetary debts were not permanently enforced for life. Every seven years they were to be remitted by the creditor. The stipulation concerning a pledge (opheilēma) in Deut. 24:10 has a pronounced humanitarian character (cf. 1 Macc. 10:43; 13:39).

(b) The OT does not make use of the concept of legal debt in order to depict obligation to Yahweh. This was due to the fact that a person's relationship with God in the OT was not yet conceived on the analogy of a business agreement between partners, but as obedience to his will (cf. dei, 1256).

The situation is different in intertestamental Jud., where opheilō eventually meant to come off badly (from what is demanded of one), i.e., to be guilty, liable to punishment; and (positively) to be indebted. opheilēma referred to arrears in payment, a debt, obligation. In this context, sin is no longer conceived of as intrinsic disobedience but as an outstanding debt, for which one can compensate by appropriate means.

NT opheilō is used mainly in two sets of contexts: to designate our relationship with God (in the Gospels, esp. Matt.), and as a paraenetic concept (in the letters, esp. Paul's).

1. From a formal point of view Jesus spoke of humans as debtors to God, just as Jud. did. The difference lies in the fact that, unlike Jud., Jesus took the business relationship to be not the reality, but a parable of our relationship to God. Thus, the concept of debt (opheilēma) is linked by Jesus not with achievements or demands concerning payments of arrears, but with forgiveness (aphesis; → aphiēmi, 918).

(a) Both these differences are made clear in the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18:23–35). The picture of the creditor and the debtor (opheiletēs) reveals our dependence on and responsibility to God, who will settle accounts with his servants (18:23). The fantastically high sum of money that is owed (10,000 talents, i.e., a debt that one cannot hope to pay) is from the outset an illusion. Only through the compassion of the creditor can it be remitted. But the parable also reveals our duty (18:33; dei, 1256). By virtue of the great debt that has been remitted by God, we ought to forgive one another the small debts owed to us.

(b) A certain parallel is offered in the parable of the two debtors, which Lk. has woven into the narrative of the sinful woman (Lk. 7:41–43), in order to point out the connection between the greater or lesser degree of love and the greater or lesser degree of debt forgiven (cf. also 16:5–7).

(c) In Matt. 6:12 opheilēma means debt in the sense of sin. This fifth request of the Lord's Prayer stresses the correspondence between divine forgiveness of debts and human readiness to forgive. Human forgiveness is an echo and an obligation of the forgiveness received (cf. 6:14–15).

2. In the NT letters opheilō predominantly denotes the positive sense of responsibility that arises out of our belonging to Christ. In Rom. 13:8 Paul uses the double meaning of opheilō to exhort his readers to a love that is both a task and a debt to one's neighbor that can never be paid. In 15:1–3 the connection between ethical obligation and Christ's foundation work becomes particularly clear: "We who are strong ought [opheilomen] to bear with the failings of the weak, and not to please ourselves. . . . For even Christ did not please himself. . . ."

In 1 Cor. 11:7, 10 Paul speaks of the duty of discipline in the congregation; in 2 Thess. 1:3; 2:13, of the duty of gratitude for the spiritual growth of the congregations; and in 2 Cor. 12:14, of responsible parenthood. In 1 Jn. 4:11 John speaks similarly of brotherly love; in 3:16, of the sacrifice of one's life. These thoughts are summarized in 2:6: "Whoever claims to live in him must [opheilei] walk as Jesus did." Heb. uses opheilō in parallel to dei and prepei, in order to underline the divine purpose in what befell Christ (2:17; cf. 2:1, 10; see also 5:3).

3. The optative particle ophelon is found only in Paul (1 Cor. 4:8; 2 Cor. 11:1; Gal. 5:12) and in Rev. 3:15. opheilē denotes monetary debt in Matt. 18:32, civil dues in Rom. 13:7, and the command to marital sexual intercourse in 1 Cor. 7:3. opheiletēs denotes a debtor (Matt. 6:12) and one under obligation (Paul in Rom. 1:14) to world mission. In Gal. 5:3 it expresses the obligation to keep the whole law if one practices circumcision. By contrast, Rom. 8:12 speaks of believers who "have an obligation—but it is not to the sinful nature," and 15:27 of what Gentile believers owe Jewish believers.

See also anankē, compulsion (340); dei, it is necessary, one must (1256); prepō, be fitting, seemly or suitable (4560).

4054 (ophelon, O that, would that, if only), → 4053.

4057 (ophthalmos, eye), → 3972.

4058 ὄφις

ὄφις (ophis), snake, serpent (4058).

CL & OT 1. The attitude of people toward the snake has always been ambivalent. On the one hand, it has been regarded as a strange and threatening animal, dangerous to life and full of cunning, deceit, and evil. On the other hand, because of its nearness to the earth and the subterranean waters, it has been linked with the subterranean gods and their powers to give and renew life. It was also a symbol of the gods who grant healing. Thus, it became a symbol of the earth itself, which both gives life and then receives it back.

2. ophis is found 37x in the LXX. In Gen. 3, it is introduced as an exceptionally clever, sly animal, which led humankind into disobedience. This recondite figure conveys the mystery of the breaking in of evil into the world, which God created good. In Num. 21 the Israelites' murmuring against God and Moses is punished by a plague of snakes. But Yahweh turns again in grace to his people: Anyone who looked to the symbol of a bronze snake was saved. According to 2 Ki. 18:4, this bronze snake survived until the time of Hezekiah, who destroyed it because the people were burning incense to it.

In later Jewish writings the snake became an established instrument of the devil or was even identified with him. Occasionally it was identified with the Angel of Death. These writings contain speculations about the motives that moved the snake in Paradise to attack humankind, such as envy, sexual desire, or desire for world rule.

NT Jesus' condemnation of the teachers of the law and the Pharisees in Matt. 23:33 (cf. 3:7) calls them "snakes" in view of their evil and unwillingness to repent, possibly indicating their link with Satan. He threatens them with the judgment of geenna (→ 1147). In his call to prayer in faith, Jesus stressed that no father would give his son a snake instead of the fish he had asked for (7:10; Lk. 11:11), i.e., something evil and dangerous instead of food. How much more will God give that which is good when asked by the disciples. Gen. 3:1 and Song 5:2; 6:9 lie behind the paradoxical exhortation to wisdom and innocence in Matt. 10:16.

Because Satan has been cast down, the disciples have obtained authority to tread on snakes and scorpions, the instruments of the Evil One (Lk. 10:19; cf. Ps. 91:13; Mk. 16:18; cf. also Acts 28:1–6, which uses echidna, viper).

In Rev. 9:19 the horses of the demonic cavalry have tails like snakes, by which they do harm. In 12:9; 20:2 the snake recalls Gen. 3 and is identified with Satan (→ drakōn, 1532). The Gen. story is also recalled in 2 Cor. 11:3, where the church is warned against listening to Satan's whispered suggestions and so being led astray from sincere devotion to and trust in Christ. Jn. 3:14–15 looks back to Num. 21:8–9: Just as looking at the bronze snake that had been lifted up on the pole brought salvation, so faith saves the one who looks to the Son of Man exalted on the cross and on the throne of God.

See also drakōn, dragon (1532).

4063 ὄχλος

ὄχλος (ochlos), (throng of) people, crowd, mob (4063).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ochlos means a crowd, throng; the public, in contrast to individual people; and esp. in contrast to the nobility or people of rank, a mob or insignificant mass. In the military world the word means a company, troop, army.

2. In the LXX ochlos occurs about 60x, with the meaning crowd (1 Ki. 20:13 = LXX 21:13), army (Num. 20:20; Ezek. 17:17), people (Jer. 38:1 = LXX 45:1; Dan. 3:4), throng (Jer. 31:8 = LXX 38:8), or mob (Ezek. 16:40; 23:24). It is sometimes combined with synonyms, such as laos (→ 3295) or ethnos (→ 1620).

NT In the NT ochlos occurs 174x. Of these 4 are in Rev., and all the others in the Gospels and Acts. In Mk. 14:43 the word means the armed crowd at the arrest of Jesus, but usually it is an unorganized crowd of people with no particular characteristics. A crowd comes to hear John the Baptist (Lk. 3:7, 10) or Jesus (Matt. 4:25; 5:1). It is esp. to these people, who have nothing particular to offer, that Jesus directs his teaching and his compassion (9:33) and his provision of food (14:19; Lk. 9:16; Jn. 6:5). The contrast to these is provided by the ruling classes, the Pharisees and teachers of the law, who despised the ochlos as the ignorant masses who did not keep the law. To them the masses were accursed (Jn. 7:31, 48–49).

In Jn. 7:49 ochlos doubtless refers to "the people of the land." In the preexilic age the people of the land denoted full citizens who were liable to military service. But in the postexilic age it denoted the foreign or mixed population as distinct from the returned exiles. It became a term of abuse, connoting ignorance of and a lax attitude toward the law. Jesus and later Paul were accused of leading the ochlos astray (Jn. 7:12; Acts 19:26).

Herod Antipas hesitates to kill John the Baptist because he fears the ochlos (Matt. 14:5). The ruling class similarly fear the ochlos and do not dare to lay hands on Jesus (21:26, 46), but they later stir up the ochlos against him (27:20). Pilate acts under pressure from the ochlos (Mk. 15:15). Jesus tells parables to the ochlos (Matt. 13:34). He has a whole ochlos of disciples (Lk. 6:17; cf. Acts 1:15). A great ochlos goes to Bethany to see Jesus and Lazarus (Jn. 12:9). Before the throne of God and of the Lamb stands an innumerable ochlos (Rev. 7:9); in 17:15 nations are meant.

See also dēmos, people, populace, crowd, popular assembly (1322); ethnos, nation, people, pagans, Gentiles (1620); laos, people (3295); polis, city, city-state (4484).

4066 (opsarion, fish for eating), → 2716.

4069 (opsimos, late [rain]), → 847.

4072 ὀψώνιον

ὀψώνιον (opsōnion), wages, payment (4072).

CL & OT opsōnion refers to the cash one needs to buy food (1 Esd. 4:56). In the pl., it refers esp. to a soldier's maintenance allowances, which he received above and beyond natural provisions. Finally, it means wages in general (1 Macc. 3:28; 14:32), occasionally the salary of government officials. opsōnion thus denotes what one is entitled to receive. It is a minimum subsistence wage rather than an appropriate reward for work carried out.

NT 1. opsōnion occurs 4x in the NT. John the Baptist advises the soldiers to be satisfied with their wages (Lk. 3:14).

2. In 1 Cor. 9:7 Paul uses the pl. to refer to the support to which he was entitled from the various congregations as remuneration for his missionary work (cf. 2 Cor. 11:8). This is not only an allusion to soldiers' pay, comparing his missionary work with military service; it also implies the legal claim of the apostle on the congregations. Paul's waiving of his opsōnion underlines that God's gift of grace costs nothing, just as it is offered to all in the apostolic preaching without any conditions.

3. According to Rom. 6:23, sin pays out wages, which is death. Sin promises life and gives death. This death does not just begin at the end of our temporal lives; it is the current payment we already receive. It is the only right to which we can lay claim as sinners. But over against this right stands God's gift of grace, which we receive in service under him (3:23b). Yet no one in God's service can claim anything as a right; he or she receives eternal life as a free gift from God.

See also apodidōmi, give away, give back, sell, recompense (625); kerdos, gain (3046); misthos, pay, wages, reward (3635).

Π pi

4077 (pathēma, suffering, affliction, misfortune), → 4248.

4078 (pathētos, subject to suffering, capable of suffering), → 4248.

4079 (pathos, suffering, passion), → 4248.

4080 (paidagōgos, custodian, guide, guardian), → 4084.

4081 (paidarion, little boy, child, youth), → 4090.

4082 (paideia, upbringing, training, instruction, discipline), → 4084.

4083 (paideutēs, instructor, teacher), → 4084.

4084 παιδεύω

παιδεύω (paideuō), bring up, instruct, train, educate (4084); παιδεία (paideia), upbringing, training, instruction, discipline (4082); παιδευτής (paideutēs), instructor, teacher (4083); παιδαγωγός (paidagōgos), custodian, guide, guardian, the man (usually a slave) who took boys and youths to and from school and generally superintended their conduct (4080).

CL & OT 1. (a) The underlying root of this word group is pais, child, boy (→ 4090). paideuō thus lit. means to be together with a child, hence, to bring up, educate, instruct, teach. Derived from this is the noun paideia, which is found as early as the 6th cent. B.C. in the sense of education and which connotes the process of education, development of culture. Later the word was extended to cover adult education as well and was used generally of scientific training. Other derivatives are paidagōgos, one in charge of boys, custodian, tutor (usually referring to slaves), and paideutēs, teacher, educator.

(b) Though the word paideuō was not used, education and the ideals of education of each new generation to moral and legal traditions through example and imitation were important. The Sophists were probably the first to emphasize consistently the equality and hence educability of all people. They thus held courses of lectures, which anyone who paid might attend. In contrast to the formal principle of the Sophists, Socrates maintained the concrete principle of the agathon, the good, which could be brought to light by an individual's study and growth in wisdom and knowledge through mind-guiding conversation.

In Plato education is the only possible way to overcome injustice and to create a true, just state. The basis for this is education in music and gymnastics. Since children belong to the state rather than to their parents, school should be compulsory. For the elite who are fit to govern, there is also a gradual introduction to philosophical thinking, the object of which is to arouse in the individual the memory, already present, of the ideas, the archetypes of reality. Aristotle took as his aim in education the aesthetically and ethically cultured citizen. Exhortation and habit both played a part. Aristotle did not include the sciences as a part of education. In the Hellenism of the NT period, the Stoic ideal of the leader who is responsible to himself and to reason, standing above the people, is of crucial importance in cultured circles.

To summarize, wherever the concept of education prevailed, the central position was occupied by humans, since they are creatures endowed with reason and thus capable of being educated. The aim of education is the complete person, i.e., the person who exercises mastery over aretē (virtue). By and large the Gks. never understood the principle of education in a perfectionist sense. Concepts like fate, deity, and (later) chance and personal freedom had too much influence on Gk. thought for that.

2. paideuō (84x in the LXX) is used 41x for the Heb. yāsar (mostly piel), to chastise, discipline, correct. The noun paideia (103x in the LXX) occurs 37x for mûsār, chastisement, discipline. The words are found esp. often in Ps., Prov., and Sir.

(a) The OT bears witness to God's self-revelation to Israel and intervention in the lives of his chosen people. In response to his love and care for them, God expects trust and obedience, reflecting his holiness. The trouble that God has with his people forces him to severe disciplinary measures or chastening (yāsar/mûsār). But God does not educate in order to achieve an ideal; he watches over his people's faithfulness, which should flow from trust and from a constant readiness to hear and truly listen that arises from obedience to his Word.

Originally Israel as a nation was seen as being subject to God's discipline (Deut. 4:36; 8:5; Hos. 7:12; 10:10); but later, in proverbial wisdom, it was more a matter of God's education of the individual (Prov. 3:11; 15:33 = LXX 16:4; Sir. 18:14). This education, which Israel was ever trying to escape, is shared equally by all members of the nation. Thus there is no independent religious education of the young. It is God who educates, and the upbringing of children takes place within the sphere of this God, who instructs in love and punishes because of the recalcitrance of his own people.

The Heb. words yāsar/mûsār refer primarily to the chastisement that a father must inflict on his son (Deut. 21:18; Prov. 13:24; 19:18; 23:13; 29:17) and that God allows to be inflicted on his servant for the sake of his people's salvation (Isa. 53:5). Thus in Deut. 11:2 the paideia of the Lord is his guidance, his educational dealings with Israel in history. Because of sin he chastises and corrects (Lev. 26:18, 28), but always "with justice" (Jer. 10:24; 46:28 = LXX 26:28). We are able to accept or despise, love or hate this education (Ps. 50:17; Prov. 12:1; Jer. 5:3).

In Prov. one observes a gradual change from the process of discipline to its effect, namely, "instruction," which has to be learned (1:2), bought, and kept (23:23). But God, not the child or an ideal, is always central and forms its content. His educational aim is to lead his people to the realization that they owe their existence to the saving will of Yahweh alone and therefore owe obedience to their divine instructor (Deut. 8:1–6).

How then does the education of the young proceed in Israel? God commands that they obey their parents, who are next to him in importance. The father acts like a priest to the family, handing on the tradition as well as God's law to the family (cf. Deut. 6:6–9). He can do so in response to the questions of his children (Exod. 12:26–27), and his answer is a confession of God's saving activity of Israel. The children are told of this not only in words but also by means of impressive signs in the form of monumental stones (Jos. 4:6–7, 21–24). The OT has no theory of education, no special educational institutions, but the young become accustomed to the life of the nation, which stands under God's loving discipline. Watching and listening, they enter into the inheritance of their ancestors. Those who hear aright will obey.

In wisdom lit. we find a moralizing and humanizing tendency. The aim of education here is wisdom (Prov. 1:7; 8:33), which recognizes at the bottom of things a prevailing order to which the wise submit. In the LXX the vb. paideuō remains nearer in meaning to the OT vb. "chasten," although the noun paideia tends more in the direction of the Hel. idea of instruction. But even though now an educational ideal has developed in Israel, the point of reference remains God's revelation and commandments. In summoning Israel to keep God's commands as they enter the promised land, Deut. 11:2 calls on them to reflect on Yahweh's past dealings with them, and in so doing provides the expression paideia kyriou, "the discipline of the Lord."

In Palestinian Jud. education was still closely associated with the OT: Its aim was to produce a person who obeyed God's will, esp. as determined in the law. In the period following the exile, this goal became more and more an absolute, standing over Israel as a timeless demand and forming the basis of the people's relationship to God. This notion of education had its classic expression in the rab. schools, where the Torah was taught. In Hel. Jud., by contrast, education was more strongly influenced by Gk. ideas. Typical of this are the philosophical schools of Alexandria, with Philo as the main representative.

NT 1. Words of this group occur 24x in the NT. (a) paideuō is used 2x with the meaning of to teach, instruct: Moses was instructed in Egyptian wisdom (Acts 7:22), and Paul was educated by Gamaliel (22:3).

(b) paideuō is also used 2x in the sense of to scourge, whip, punish (Lk. 23:16, 22). It is no longer possible to determine whether here, as in so many parts of the passion narrative, allusion is being made to an OT prophecy (Isa. 53:5) or whether paideuō here is taken simply from popular Gk. usage.

2. (a) The concept of education by God underwent decisive further development in Jud., with the idea that God's teaching and therefore loving hand was to be experienced in suffering (e.g., Jdt. 8:25–27; 2 Macc. 6:12–17; Pss. Sol. 3:4; 13:9). Hints of this idea are found even in the OT (e.g., Deut. 8:5; 11:2; 2 Sam. 7:14–15).

(b) This view of chastening as God's loving action in order to preserve people from the final judgment is taken over in Heb. 12:5–6 (which cites Prov. 3:11–12). "The Lord's discipline" is a sign of his love and is not therefore any ground for losing courage. This scriptural quotation is followed by a discussion in Heb. 12:7–11. God is the one who educates his people. His method of education is illustrated by human upbringing, which is a weak reflection of the former. God is the Father who chastens because he loves, in order to keep us in the status of being his children and to cause his children to turn around and come home. We can resist this discipline, defy God, and doubt his fatherly love (12:6), although in doing so we are rejecting divine sonship; for it is precisely in discipline that God's fatherly activity is experienced.

If in the bringing up of a family the status of a true son is to be recognized by the fact that his father educates and "disciplines" him, how much more so with regard to God. Human fathers exercise discipline without ultimate insight and are open to mistakes, but the Lord does so with the ultimate object of making us share in his holiness (Heb. 12:10). The aim of this discipline is peace with God (12:11), which is also the starting point for God's educative activity, education in divine sonship. Although the Stoics talked in similar terms, the peak of their education is found in the self-perfection of a person.

In this context Heb. 12:9 uses the comparatively rare word paideutēs, instructor, teacher, one who disciplines. The same word is also found in Rom. 2:20 of the Jew who sets himself up as a teacher of the law, oblivious to his own failings in the light of the law.

(c) The idea that it is precisely in discipline that God's love becomes visible is found also in Paul, in connection with his exhortations about the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:32). Christians are not spared illness and death caused by sin. Here discipline overlaps with God's judgment. But since this judgment has the nature of discipline, believers are graciously spared God's final judgment over the world (11:32b; see also Rev. 3:19). Paul knows from his experience in carrying out his apostolic commission (2 Cor. 6:9) that discipline does not contradict God's love, but is rather to be understood on the basis of it.

(d) The NT view of education through discipline is, however, fundamentally different, not only from the Gk. concept of education (i.e., toward an ideal), but also from the rab. teachings, which accord to suffering as a result of chastening an expiatory power. In the NT discipline at God's hand is a practical necessity in order that believers can recognize that they are in a proper position of sonship.

(e) A different kind of education is brought about by God's Word in the OT (2 Tim. 3:16). Since here too God himself is really the one who is speaking, the NT church finds in the OT instruction as to God's will and is thus trained up to live a sanctified life pleasing to God. Tit. 2:11–13 speaks even more directly of God's educative grace: Everything flows together into the message of the cross (2:13–14). Here too education is an outworking of grace; the language in both these passages is Hel., but the basic thought belongs to the OT.

(f) Finally, Paul also speaks of the educative function of the law (Gal. 3:24–4:7). The law is the paidagōgos, custodian or taskmaster, that leads us to Christ. The paidagōgos and the didaskalos (teacher, → 1437) were differentiated. Whether Paul was thinking of the slave to whom boys were entrusted and who sometimes beat them, or whether he was thinking in more positive terms, cannot be determined. In any case he means the person who keeps the boys in order.

The purpose of God's law was broader, however: to uphold his order and reveal human disobedience. The law itself was good and holy (Rom. 7:12). With the coming of Christ, who introduces and brings in the new age, this function has ended (Gal. 3:25). Through faith in Christ a young person becomes a mature child of God (4:1, 4–7). The apostle is here speaking in terms of salvation history. Humanity in their sinful state cannot keep the God-given law; when they recognize the validity of the commandment and thus their own guilt, they are driven to Christ. But those who are in Christ are free from the Mosaic law and are under the law of the love (Rom. 13:10b; cf. 10:4).

3. In 1 Tim. 1:20 Paul refers to those who have been delivered to Satan for punishment. What we have here is an act of church discipline (probably a form of excommunication), in which Satan embodies God's wrath, afflicting with illness and death those who are destroying God's church. Even this chastening, however, is not directed toward the final destruction of sinners, but rather toward bringing them to their senses and to repentance (1:20b).

4. Education is also a human activity. Paul's exhortation that children are to respect their parents is followed in Eph. 6:4 by a word to fathers, that they should bring up their children "in the training [paideia] and instruction of the Lord." The phrase "of the Lord" may mean that God is behind human upbringing (obj. gen.), or the reference may be to education that has to do with the Lord (subj. gen.). In any case, the Christian who declares with Paul that "Jesus is Lord" (1 Cor. 12:3) must renounce the demands of all other masters and be totally faithful to him. Like other aspects of life, the sphere of education is, for believers, under the lordship of Jesus and can proceed in the faith that overcomes the world (1 Jn. 5:4–5).

See also didaskō, teach (1438); didaskalos, teacher, master (1437); didaskalia, teaching, instruction (1436); katēcheō, inform, instruct (2994); paradidōmi, to deliver, hand down (4140).

4086 (paidion, very young child, infant), → 4090.

4087 (paidiskē, servant girl), → 4090.

4090 παῖς

παῖς (pais), child, young man, son, servant (4090); παιδίσκη (paidiskē), servant girl (4087); παιδίον (paidion), very young child, infant (4086); παιδάριον (paidarion), little boy, child, youth (4081); βρέφος (brephos), unborn child, embryo, baby, infant (1100).

CL & OT 1. pais usually means son, though it can also denote a daughter in relation to descent. It normally denotes a child between seven and fourteen years, as distinct from a little child or a youth. pais also suggests the child's lowly position in society and ancient function as a slave. The word could therefore also mean servant or slave. paidion and paidarion, both diminutives of pais, denote a little child up to seven years or a young slave, although occasionally a young man. Finally, brephos denotes an unborn or newborn child, infant.

2. In the LXX pais occurs some 500x and stands for 10 different Heb. words (esp. ʿebed, slave, servant; → doulos, 1528). Its breadth of meaning is the same as in cl. Gk. paidion and paidarion in the LXX, as in secular Gk., denote baby (Gen. 21:7), little child (21:14), lad (22:5, 12), and young man (Jdg. 8:14). This word group frequently emphasizes the serving capacity of young people as companions (Gen. 22:5), messengers (Jdg. 7:10 = LXX 7:9), armor-bearers (9:54; 1 Sam. 14:1), or servants (Ruth 2:5–6; Neh. 13:19).

3. The phrase pais theou, servant of God, has a specialized meaning in the LXX. (a) Of the 870 occurrences of ʿebed in the Heb. OT, pais is used 340x, doulos, 327x (also used are therapōn, servant, attendant, 46x; and oiketēs, household slave, 36x). In Jdg. to 2 Ki. pais is used of the free servant of the king and doulos for enforced bondage.

doulos is used in religious contexts to identify oneself or others as servants of God, thus expressing the great difference between humans and God. In the other OT books the religious idea of the doulos is prominent as well, but in Job it can be replaced by therapōn and in Isa. by pais. Although the "Servant" passages of Isa. are mostly rendered with pais and may be collectively interpreted, a messianic figure seems to have been discerned behind Isa. 52:13–53:12.

(b) pais theou occurs seldom in the lit. of Gk.-speaking Jud., since it was overshadowed by the doulos concept. But where it was used, it usually meant servant of God and referred to Moses (cf. Bar. 1:20; 2:28), the prophets (2:20), or the righteous (Wis. 9:4–5). Less often pais means child of God (cf. 2:13; 12:7, 20; 19:6). In 2 Esd. 13:32, 37, 52; 14:9 and 2 Bar. 70:9 we find an apocalyptic tradition that refers to the Messiah as son, child, youth, or servant. Behind these translations lies the older ʿebed tradition transmitted by pais theou. Older prophecies involving the destiny of Israel and the nations are used here, but the revelation of God's elect is the central idea. Apocalyptic accentuates the element of transcendence in the ʿebed tradition.

Hel. Jud. understood the ʿebed passages in Isa. collectively of the people of Israel (cf. 42:1) or of the righteous (Wis. 2:13). No agreement has been reached as to whether the "Servant" passages in Isa. were messianically interpreted in Palestinian Jud. in pre-Christian times. The references to Isa. 53 are not always obvious. The passages could also be derived from the concept of the atoning death of the righteous, which was widespread in late Jud. Qumran continued the OT tradition in referring to the prophets as "God's servants." It is striking how the Teacher of Righteousness adopts the title of "God's servant" in the Qumran hymns.

In any event, at least prior to A.D. 200 official Jud. had not interpreted Isa. 53 in terms of a suffering Messiah. On the contrary, perhaps influenced by anti-Christian polemic, Jud. had eradicated or drastically reinterpreted any statements there about his suffering. The idea of a suffering Messiah only appears late in Jewish writings.

NT 1. The centurion's servant is called a pais (Matt. 8:6, 13; Lk. 7:7) and the children in the market place are paidia (Matt. 11:16; Lk. 7:32). Matt. uses pais of Herod's servants (14:2) and paidion (14:21; 15:38) in the great feedings (the number given excluded women and children). paidiskē occurs 13x in the NT, always for a female servant (Matt. 26:69; Acts 12:13; Gal. 4:22–23).

Lk. is the only Evangelist to use brephos, chiefly in the infancy narratives, of the unborn child (Lk. 1:41, 44) and the newborn baby (2:12, 16; cf. Acts 7:19). In using brephos instead of paidion in 18:15 (though not 18:16–17; cf. Matt. 19:13–14; Mk. 10:13–15), Lk. was perhaps thinking esp. of babies. But pais also occurs in Lk. 2:43 of the twelve-year-old Jesus; in 8:51, 54 of a girl; and in 12:45; 15:26 of servants. He uses paidion in 1:59 of a child at a circumcision and in 11:7 of children in the parable of the friend at midnight.

Jn. also uses pais (Jn. 4:51), paidion (4:49), and huios (son, 4:50) of the same child. He uses paidion of the newborn child (16:21) and paidarion (6:9, the only NT occurrence of the word) of the lad with five loaves and two small fishes.

In 1 Cor. 14:20 Paul warns against being childish ("stop thinking like children" [paidia]). Thus the picture of the child is here used negatively (contrast Mk. 10:15). Otherwise, the word group occurs in Paul only in Gal. 4:22–23, 30–31, in the comparison of the bondage of Jud. with Sarah's female slave (paidiskē; cf. Gen. 16:15; 21:2, 9–12). Heb. uses paidion 3 times (2:13–14; 11:23). brephos appears in 2 Tim. 3:15 (apo brephous, "from infancy") and 1 Pet. 2:2 ("Like newborn babies, crave pure spiritual milk, so that by it you may grow up in your salvation"). The latter passage speaks of newborn children in a metaphorical sense.

2. With the exception of paidiskē in Gal. 4:21–31 (Paul's allegory of Sarah and the slave woman Hagar; → Hagar, 29; Sarra, Sarah, 4925), in the above passages no special theological significance attaches to pais, paidiskē, and paidion. But in three groups of passages children are related to God's kingdom. (a) Matt. 19:13–15; Mk. 10:13–16; and Lk. 18:15–17 relate the incident of Jesus' blessing the children despite the protests of his disciples. Their reluctance to allow adults to bring children to Jesus has been attributed to a concern that Jesus was tired. But perhaps there was also the feeling that children were too young to make a responsible commitment. Certainly they would not be of the age of accountability at which they could take on themselves the yoke of the Mosaic law.

Jesus replied that children should come to him, for the kingdom of God belongs "to such as these." Jesus then took the children in his arms, blessed them, and laid his hands on them (Mk. 10:14–16). The phrase "such as these" may suggest "these and other actual children" or "these and others who, though not literally children, share the characteristics of children." (On the role of children in the divine order see Ps. 8:2; Matt. 11:25; 21:15–16.) But Mk. 10:15 suggests that the second interpretation is the better one, so that Jesus is reversing the apparent understanding of the disciples. The reason why the kingdom belongs to children is not because of any subjective qualities that they may have; rather, it lies in their objective helplessness (cf. Jn. 3:1–8, Jesus' discourse with Nicodemus comparing entry into the kingdom with rebirth).

Some have seen implications of infant baptism in this story. There is no solid evidence, however, for inferring that Jesus or the early church linked this event with baptism. On the other hand, Jesus' categorical statement that the kingdom belongs to such does suggest that they may be full members of the church and thus fit subjects to receive the sacrament of incorporation.

(b) A similar saying occurs in Matt. 18:3–4 in the course of a dispute among the disciples regarding who would be the greatest in the kingdom. Jesus set a child (paidion) in their midst and said: "Unless you change and become like children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven. Therefore, whoever humbles himself like this child is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven." This passage stresses the need to become humble like little children in order to enter the kingdom (on humility, see 5:3; 20:26; 23:11).

(c) Mk. 9:37 (see also Lk. 18:17) reads: "Whoever welcomes one of these little children in my name welcomes me; and whoever welcomes me does not welcome me but the one who sent me." This underlines again the role that children have in their own right in God's kingdom. But it is also related to a theme that finds recurrent expression in the Gospels: Jesus is present (albeit incognito) in those who are his. This is said of appointed witnesses to Christ (Matt. 10:40; Lk. 10:16; Jn. 13:20), of children (in the present passage), of those in need (Matt. 25:35–45; cf. Mk. 9:41), and of those in prayer and service (Matt. 18:20; cf. Jn. 15:4–7). These passages carry with them the corollary that those who maltreat representatives of Christ bear a terrible responsibility.

3. (a) The NT uses the title pais theou 5x of Jesus (Matt. 12:18; Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27, 30). It is noteworthy how it is used in an OT quotation early in Acts (cf. 3:13 with Exod. 3:16; Isa. 52:13; and Acts 4:27 with Ps. 2:2–3). In Acts 4:27, 30 the meaning "servant" is confirmed by 4:25, where David is called God's "servant" (pais) and not his "child." (For the interchange of doulos and pais, cf. Lk. 7:2–3, 7–8.)

(b) But the influence of the title pais theou in its application to Jesus is not to be limited to the occurrences of this particular phrase. The doulos concept in Mk. 10:44 has certainly been molded by Isa. 53:10; i.e., behind it stands the ʿebed (pais in LXX) of the Servant Songs, who was interpreted as a servant by ancient tradition and thus related to Jesus. Perhaps the ʿebed of Isa. 42:1 also lies behind the huios, son, of Matt. 3:17 par. (Jesus' baptism) and 17:5 par. (Jesus' transfiguration). Certainly in Johannine literature (though pais is not used of Jesus) the motif of Jesus as a servant appears in Jn. 13:4–17 (the washing of feet was one of the most menial jobs of a slave). In 1:29, 36 the servant of Isa. 53 undoubtedly lies behind the reference to the Lamb of God.

Moreover, the ʿebed of Isa. 53 seems also to lie behind the hyper formula, esp. the phrase hyper pollōn, "for many" (Mk. 14:24; → polys, 4498); note also the anti pollōn, "for many" (Matt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45), and peri pollōn, "for many" (Matt. 26:28). One might also add the formulaic use of paradidōmi, deliver over, in the pass. voice in Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 11:23; that of didonai heauton, give oneself, in Gal. 1:4; 1 Tim. 2:6; and that of tithenai tēn psychēn, lay down one's life, in Jn. 10:11, 15, 17–18. All these may be based on Isa. 53:12.

(c) Without doubt the Servant concept exercised a considerable influence on the developing theology of the early church, esp. in traditional formulations of doctrine. As the most obvious statement of the death and vindication of God's Servant in the OT, it is highly probable that the reference to Christ's death "according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. 15:3–4) conceal allusions to Isa. 53. The Servant figure can even be seen in the old hymn of Phil. 2:6–11. Allusions to Isa. 53:12 may also be present in Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 9:28.

The pervasiveness of these allusions to the Servant figure of Isa. prompts the question as to whether Jesus himself gave the impulse to the church to interpret his person and work in this way. Whether or not huios replaces an original pais in Mk. 1:11, the baptismal narrative certainly contains an allusion to Isa. 42:1–4 ("with you I am well pleased"). In Lk. 22:37 Jesus quotes Isa. 53:12, and in Lk. 4:18–19 he relates Isa. 61:1–2 to himself (a passage that some Jewish traditions saw as a Servant passage). These references strongly suggest that Jesus saw his vocation as the Son of Man in terms of the suffering and humiliation of the Servant of Yahweh.

(d) The NT, however, does not restrict the title pais theou to Jesus. It is used of Israel in Lk. 1:54, a hymn built up of OT quotations, and of David in 1:69 and Acts 4:25. The use of the title for the people of Israel and for David is in line with the usage that had been current since the times of Isaiah.

(e) pais theou is not used of Christians in the NT, but such a differentiation is only significant in Gk.-speaking areas. Paul is certainly conscious of being God's servant in accordance with Isa. 49:1 (Gal. 1:15); this shows the variety of ways in which the NT uses this concept. Paul also uses it with a wider sense when he calls himself (Rom. 1:1), his fellow workers (Phil. 1:1; Col. 4:12), and all Christians (1 Cor. 7:22) douloi, servants, of Christ (cf. also Jas. 1:1; Rev. 1:1).

Here too the effects of the biblical concept of faith as service are to be seen, but now this service is concentrated esp. in the relation of Christians to Christ. A fundamental distinction can be drawn between the new filial relationship and the old servile one (Rom. 8:14–17; Gal. 4:1–7). This attachment to Christ does not alter this biblical perspective of faith as service, but it does lift it clear of the servile nature of the pre-Christian existence. The servant task is also reflected in the mission of the church in Acts 13:47 (Isa. 49:6); Rom. 10:16 (Isa. 53:1); and Rom. 15:21 (Isa. 52:15).

See also nēpios, infant, minor (3758); teknon, child (5451); huios, son (5626); doulos, servant, slave (1528).

4093 πάλαι

πάλαι (palai), formerly, earlier (4093); παλαιός (palaios), old (4094); παλαιότης (palaiotēs), age, obsoleteness (4095); παλαιόω (palaioō), grow old, make or treat as old (4096).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the original meaning of palai focuses on the earlier or past in contrast with the present. Thus it means old: (a) positively, as existing for a long time and hence venerable; (b) negatively, as obsolete, worn out, and hence worthless. It is a synonym of archaios, though this latter word is used almost always positively.

2. In the LXX palaios usually has the meaning of old, last year's, antiquated (cf. Lev. 25:22). palaioō can mean (trans.) cause to pass away (Job. 9:5), and (intrans.) pass away, fall into decay (14:18), reach old age (21:7). palaioō is used metaphorically in the exilic and postexilic writings of the OT for the transience and wasting away of one's life and work, and also of heaven and earth (e.g., 13:28; Isa. 50:9). By giving the whole creation over to decay and corruption, God passes judgment on the sin and fall of humankind (Ps. 102:26; Isa. 51:6).

NT 1. In the NT palai points to something that lies in the recent or remote past: e.g., God spoke "in the past" (Heb. 1:1); they would have repented "long ago" (Matt. 11:21; cf. Jude 4); "past" sins (2 Pet. 1:9); Pilate asked if Jesus had "already" died (Mk. 15:44).

2. In palaios and palaiotēs the old, obsolete past stands in contrast with the completely new (→ kaino, 2785; neos, 3742). The salvation of God in Jesus Christ has broken into this present age and made it obsolete, together with its institutions and practices (2 Cor. 5:17). The final fulfillment is still awaited. With the coming again of the Lord this age will be brought to an end and world history will be completed (2 Pet. 3:13).

(a) The parabolic sayings of Matt. 9:14–17; Mk. 2:18–22; Lk. 5:33–39 are probably to be understood in this context. Jesus here stresses that the age of the old world has passed and that of salvation has begun. Thus the old age is compared to an old garment (Mk. 2:21) and old wine (2:22). A garment (→ himation, 2668) and wine (→ ampelos, vine, 306) were traditional symbols of the cosmos or the age of salvation. In the Synoptic context the passage can also mean that the new excludes the old; the new age of salvation demands a new manner of life that cannot be inserted in the old customs, such as fasting and mourning. The old is fulfilled in the new (cf. Matt. 5:17).

The proverb of Lk. 5:39 in this context is evidently ironical: "No one after drinking old wine wants the new, for he says, 'The old is better.'" It implies that some (i.e., those who cling to Jewish traditions) are incorrigibly attached to the old ways.

In Matt. 13:52 Jesus says, "Every teacher of the law who has been instructed about the kingdom of heaven is like a owner of a house who brings out of his storeroom new treasures as well as old [palaia]." This saying stands at the conclusion of Matt.'s account of seven parables. The "teacher of the law" is one who knows both the old, the message of the OT Scriptures, and their fulfillment in the new, the message and person of Jesus. These teachers expound the OT Scriptures as they have been fulfilled by Jesus (5:17–18). Note that they are not first of all trained in the law; rather, they are trained in the kingdom and thus are able to bring out old and new treasures. In this respect they stand in contrast with those teachers trained in "the tradition of the elders" (15:2), who for the sake of human tradition make void the word of God (15:6–7).

(b) In Paul and Heb. the opposition between old and new is to be understood in the same way as in the Synoptic Gospels. Baptism represents the death of the old self and the birth of the new. In the picture of the old and new self we no doubt have part of early Christian baptismal exhortation (Rom. 6:6; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9). The "old" means everything connected with the fall of the human race and with our subjection to the distress and death of a transitory life, separated from God. In this concept we hear undertones of God's wrath and the wages of sin. At the same time we are pointed to the completely new, to that healing and salvation given to us when we are crucified with Christ and raised with him (Rom. 6:3–10).

palaiotēs, age, obsoleteness, that which is outdated, occurs only at Rom. 7:6, where Paul emphasizes the incompatibility of the old and the new as ways of salvation and life: We serve in the newness of the Spirit and not in the oldness of the letter. Paul has been using the analogy of divorce: A woman is bound to her husband by law as long as he lives and is only free to marry someone else if he dies. By dying to the law "through the body of Christ" (7:4), we have died "to what once bound us [and] have been released from the law" (7:6a). We are therefore free to serve "in the new way of the Spirit." Life comes as something new apart from the law and thus makes the letter of the law old (in that it came first) and obsolete (in that it is superseded by the Spirit of Christ) (cf. Rom. 7:6 with 8:5–11; also 2 Cor. 3:6; → nomos, law, 3795).

Because Jesus is the new man and those who believe in him are born again to a new life, the old life, alienated from God, is dead. The old self is without power or rights, so it must daily be given over to death. In 1 Cor. 5:7–8 Paul alludes to an OT command (cf. Exod. 12:19; 13:7; Deut. 16:3–4). Just as the last remnants of the old yeast had to be eliminated before the Passover, so the evil and crookedness of the old life, the old yeast of sin and disobedience, must be cleared out to make room for the new life of sincerity and obedience. Jesus' message and work bring the new that is promised in the OT and fulfills the old or deprives it of power.

Heb. 8:13 takes up the promise of the "new covenant" of Jer. 31:31–34: "By calling this covenant 'new,' he has made the first one obsolete [palaioō]; and what is obsolete [palaioō] and aging will soon disappear." This is entirely God's work. In Christ the first covenant is regarded as old and fulfilled (2 Cor. 3:14). Indeed, it may be said that the NT speaks of the old only from the standpoint of the new and for the sake of the new.

3. palaios is used in another sense only in 1 Jn. 2:7. The writer is not communicating a "new command" to his readers, but the "old command" they had known "since the beginning," i.e., since their conversion. In the context of 2:1–6 "old" refers to the early Christian tradition, not to Lev. 19:18.

4094 (palaios, old), → 4093.

4095 (palaiotēs, age, obsoleteness), → 4093.

4096 (palaioō, grow old, make or treat as old), → 4093.

4098 παλιγγενεσία

παλιγγενεσία (palingenesia), rebirth, regeneration (4098).

CL & OT 1. palingenesia is a compound noun from palin (again) and genesis (birth, origin). In everyday speech it denotes various kinds of renewal: the return or restoration of something, termination of captivity, restoration to health following a birth or illness. The Stoics used the word in a cosmic context. The cosmos would periodically perish through a world conflagration and then arise anew in a rebirth (palingenesia). But for the Stoics, the cosmos did not attain to a new mode of being or quality through the rebirth; the world that has passed away was there once again. palingenesia was also used to express the rebirth of individuals in a new cosmic age.

The idea of rebirth occupied a significant place in the Hel. mystery religions. All of the mystery religions spoke about a deity who died and awoke to new life. In the cultic rites this was not taught as a doctrine, but represented in a dramatic way in which the initiate shared in the life-giving and renewing power of the deity. Rebirth was a renewal to a higher, divine existence.

2. palingenesia does not occur in the LXX. The closest phrase that one finds is heōs palin genōmai, a free rendering of Job 14:14: "If a man dies, will he live again?" There is no thought here of the rebirth of an individual in a new age, as in the NT. There is, however, the thought of eschatological renewal in Ezek. 11:19, where God promises his people a new heart and spirit (cf. Isa. 60:21; Jer. 24:7; 31:18, 33). This change is proclaimed as a future blessing of salvation that the Lord himself will bring about; the people are not themselves capable of such a change (Gen. 6:5; 8:21; Jer. 13:23). Therefore the person of faith prays to God: "Create in me a pure heart, O God, and renew a steadfast spirit within me" (Ps. 51:10).

One should also note the promises of a restoration of Israel (e.g., Isa. 11:11–6; Ezek. 36:24–38; Mic. 4:6–7), the establishment of a new covenant (Jer. 31:31–32; Ezek. 34:25), the building of a new Jerusalem (Zech. 14:10–11, 16), and the creation of a new heaven and a new earth (Isa. 65:17). The NT idea of rebirth or regeneration thus appears to have its roots in the OT prophecy of restoration and renewal in the messianic age.

In Hel. Jud. palingenesia occurs frequently. Philo uses it to denote the renewal of the world after the flood and also of individuals. Josephus describes the revival of Israelite national life after the exile as the palingenesia of the land. In contrast to the Stoics, regeneration is unique and does not occur in cycles.

NT 1. palingenesia occurs only 2x. (a) Matt. 19:28 refers to the "renewal (palingenesia) of all things, when the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne." This is an eschatological term denoting the renewal of the world. Both the title of majesty "Son of Man" and the reference to judgment connect the regeneration with the end time (cf. Rev. 21:1–5). It may also denote the new lifestyle of those who participate in God's reign.

(b) Tit. 3:5 declares: "He saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy. He saved us through the washing of rebirth (palingenesias) and renewal (anakainōseōs) by the Holy Spirit." palingenesia denotes a saving act of God, performed on humans but not by them (cf. 3:3–4). The imagery suggests baptism (cf. Eph. 5:26), in which believers receive the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; → baptizō, 966). The washing and the reception of the Spirit are here seen as a unity (cf. Jn. 3:5). Those born again live in the hope that, in the righteousness of God that has been promised to them, they will be heirs of and participants in future life. In this renewal a new lifestyle, opposite the former one (Tit. 3:3), becomes possible. Regeneration does not, however, bring sinless perfection. Rather, it leads to daily renunciation of worldly passions and to sober, upright, godly living in this world (2:12).

2. Alongside and linked in meaning to palingenesia and the corresponding vb. anagennaō (→ gennaō, 1164) are anakainoō (renew) and anakainōsis (renewal); on these, → kainos, 2785.

See also gennaō, beget, become the father of, bear (1164); ginomai, be born, become, happen (1181); ektrōma, miscarriage (1765); tiktō, bring forth, bear, give birth to (5503); eugenēs, well-born, noble in descent or character (2302).

4110 (panoplia, full armor, panoply), → 4483.

4111 πανουργία

πανουργία (panourgia), craftiness, cunning (4111); πανοῦργος (panourgos), crafty, cunning, knavish (4112).

CL & OT The word group derives from the two roots pan- (all) and erg- (work), giving the basic meaning "capable of all work." In cl. Gk. its connotation is usually pejorative, an unprincipled "capable of doing anything." In the few instances where the word bears a positive sense, there is a hint of arrogance or perhaps deceptive evaluation.

In the LXX, the word group can mean crafty, sly (e.g., Jos. 9:4; Job 5:12), but in Prov., where it occurs most frequently, it takes on an unconditionally positive nuance: prudent, clever (1:4; 8:5; 12:16; 13:1; 21:11; 28:2). panourgia has been invested with new meaning, probably due in part to the belief that the person who fears God and is blessed by him can indeed successfully accomplish any task.

Positive uses continue in the Apocr. (e.g., Sir. 6:32; 21:20), where panourgia derives from wisdom springing from divine revelation. When, however, panourgia throws off this restriction, it degenerates to panourgia in the negative sense (21:12; cf. 19:25). In both Josephus and Philo, the term is consistently negative and heads a long list of vices.

NT In light of this background, it is perhaps surprising that panourgia is used only negatively in its 5 NT appearances. The scribes and chief priests are guilty of "duplicity" in their question to Jesus (Lk. 20:23). God catches the wise in their "craftiness" (1 Cor. 3:19), since one's ability to reason cannot stand up against divine sovereignty. Opponents of the truth are accused of deceptively distorting God's Word (2 Cor. 4:2; Eph. 4:14); therefore Paul fears that the minds of the Corinthian converts might be led astray from purity of devotion to Christ, as the serpent by his "cunning" deceived Eve (2 Cor. 11:3). The one occurrence of panourgos in the NT bears the added weight of irony (12:16): Paul claims he is "crafty," meaning, however, that he is not.

4112 (panourgos, crafty, cunning, knavish), → 4111.

4120 (pantokratōr, the Almighty), → 3197.

4123 παρά

παρά (para), beside, alongside (4123).

CL This is one of the few Gk. preps. that occurs in all three cases. In the gen. it means (in general) from the side of, in the dat. at the side of, and in the acc. to the side of.

NT 1. Basic sense. In the NT para occurs with all three cases. With the acc. (60x) it generally designates movement to a position beside (Mk. 4:4; Acts 4:35); with the gen. (78x), movement from beside (Jn. 1:6); with the dat. (50x), rest or position beside (Lk. 9:47; Jn. 8:38; 19:25).

2. Extended meaning. By transference from the local sense this prep. bears with the gen., para with the acc. came to mean "beyond," then "contrary to." Thus, when Paul anathematized anyone who preached a gospel "other than" (para) the gospel he proclaimed and the Galatians had received (Gal. 1:8–9), he implies that Judaistic teaching was not conforming to the apostolic norm. The opposite of para in this sense is kata (in accordance with, → 2848).

para can also mark a comparison by indicating that one thing lies beyond and therefore is superior to something else (e.g., Rom. 14:5, "one man considers one day more sacred than [para] another"). When this comparison is heightened, the sense is not merely one of preference ("more than") but of exclusiveness ("instead of"). One aspect of Paul's indictment of humankind in Rom. 1:18–32 is that they worshiped and served created things "rather than" the Creator (1:25). In Lk. 18:14 the tax collector went home justified "rather than" the Pharisee.

The phrase para [tō] theō (lit., "in the sight [judgment] of God"; Rom. 2:13; 1 Cor. 3:19; 7:24; Jas. 1:27; 1 Pet. 2:20) indicates the ultimate standard—the purity of the divine life and the clarity of the divine vision—by which all aspects of thought and conduct, whether human or angelic, should now be assessed and will in the end be judged.

3. In the Gospel of Jn. Here para figures prominently in denoting the relation of the Son to the Father, where "is from [beside]" (6:46; 7:29; 9:33) means "came from [beside]" (16:27–28; 17:8). In 1:14, "from [para] the Father" (following "the One and Only") denotes that the Son's mission can be traced back to God the Father. Note also that not only Jesus (9:33) but also John the Baptist came "from" God (1:6). Similarly, 15:26 explains that Christ sent the Spirit "from [para] the Father," just as the Son himself came forth "from [ek, → 1666] God" (8:42).

4124 (parabainō, go aside, turn aside, transgress), → 4126.

4125 (paraballō, throw alongside, compare), → 4130.

4126 παράβασις

παράβασις (parabasis), overstepping, transgression (4126); παραβαίνω (parabainō), go aside, turn aside, transgress (4124); παραβάτης (parabatēs), transgressor (4127); ἀπαράβατος (aparabatos), unchangeable (563); ὑπερβαίνω (hyperbainō), overstep, transgress (5648).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the vb. parabainō lit. means to walk beside, go beside, pass by, and refers both in its spatial and fig. senses to deviation from an original and true direction. Trans. the vb. means to transgress, neglect. It takes as its objects those words that the Gks. used to indicate the standard and norm by which they regulated their lives: e.g., righteousness, law, oath, morals, etc. Later parabainō was used absolutely to mean sin, usually some obligation that is not kept. It was also used in a religious context in the sense of ceasing to reverence the gods.

(b) parabasis is found with the same objects as parabainō; it is seldom used absolutely. It is used either spatially or fig. of deviation, trespassing, transgressing. Almost nowhere does parabatēs occur in a fig. sense. It means a bystander, comrade, companion. aparabatos, a rare word, means that which cannot be superseded, thus unchangeable, inviolable, eternal.

(c) hyperbainō follows the many senses of its prefix. Lit. it means to step over, go over the bank, thence injure, transgress, err, but also presume, pass over someone in silence.

2. This group of words is not common in the LXX; where they do occur, the fig. sense predominates. parabatēs, transgressor, evildoer, occurs only in Sym. (Ps. 17:4; 139:19; Jer. 6:28). parabainō occurs ca. 80x and has such meanings as pass on, cross over, turn aside, deviate. The objects associated with parabainō are such things as God's words (Num. 14:41; Deut. 1:43), the word of the Lord (1 Sam. 15:24), legal demands (1 Esd. 1:48), and esp. often the covenant (Jos. 7:11; Ezek. 16:59; 17:15–19; Hos. 6:7 = LXX 6:8; 8:1). The noun parabasis is associated with more general concepts (way, word, covenant) rather than with individual commandments. Thus its basic meaning in the LXX is to neglect God, break the covenant, fail to maintain an obedient relationship with God (see 2 Ki. 2:24; Ps. 101:3; Wis. 14:31; 2 Macc. 15:10).

NT The NT's use of these concepts follows on from that of the OT. While adikia (→ 94) and anomia (→ nomos, law, 3795) are conceived of in general terms and refer to injustice in the sense of antisocial and unlawful actions, and while asebeia, irreverence (→ sebō, to revere, 4936), and hamartia (sin, 281) are oriented toward the person of God, parabasis is related to God's gracious ordinances, such as his covenant (Heb. 9:15) and law (Rom. 2:23–27; 4:15; Jas. 2:9–11), his commands and tradition (Matt. 15:2–3). Since those OT ordinances of God appear in a completely new light on account of the Christ-event, hamartia becomes the essential idea of sin, while parabasis decreases sharply in importance.

1. (a) In Matt. 15:1–6 parabainō is associated with paradosis, tradition, and entolē, command. Jesus is attacking the superficiality of the Pharisees' observance of the law. He turns the charge of parabasis back on them and shows that when the kingdom arrives, it is not the Pharisaic law that will matter but the new dispensation (e.g., as described in the Sermon on the Mount). The OT law is not abandoned (cf. 5:17–18), but in the light of this new dispensation the paradosis of the Pharisees is shown to be but a human ordinance.

(b) The original spatial meaning of these words is still recognizable in Acts 1:25. Judas's sin consisted in abandoning his place or position of service in order to go his own way. Judas has abandoned his discipleship.

2. Almost all the instances of the nouns parabasis and parabatēs occur in Paul's letters. (Jas. 2:9–11 is an exception; sin is here understood as transgression of the law.) As in Matt. 15, so also in Paul the law is no longer central in the Christian faith. It has been displaced from its function as a way of salvation by faith, which is made possible through the coming, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Thus the concept chiefly appears in Paul where he is involved in argument with Jewish law theology.

(a) By their transgression of the law the Jews stand before God as sinners, just as the Gentiles do (Rom. 2:17–29). They are ostensibly striving to obtain God's righteousness, but their actions show that they fall far short of it. Nevertheless, God's claim on both Jew and Gentile is binding (2:14–15). God is still the judge who demands good works, even of Christians (1:18–3:20; 2 Cor. 5:10).

(b) Faith in Christ does not replace the law, but it provides a way to righteousness even for those who do not know the law and therefore cannot transgress it. By faith they can become children of Abraham (Rom. 4:13–16) and receive a share in the promise. Therefore parabasis can no longer be the main content of the concept of sin, as it was for the Jews. Sin is measured by God himself and no longer by the law alone. Only in 4:14–20 is sin as a universal fact referred to as a "transgression" (parabasis). This is because Adam is a type of sin as the transgressing of God's commandment.

(c) Christ renders the way of the law as a way of salvation powerless and replaces it with faith in him. From faith comes righteousness (Gal. 3:22–25). What part does the law now play? Paul's answer in 3:19 is that the law's purpose in the history of salvation lies in its function of showing sin to be sin. It stirs us up to transgression (cf. Rom. 5:20) and so leads us to sin; in this process, it ultimately leads us to Christ (7:7–12).

3. (a) In 1 Tim. 2:14 Paul amplifies Rom. 5:14 in the light of the narrative of Gen. 2–3 (on the role of Eve, → Heua, 2293). In these passages human sin is presented as a rebellion against God and his commandment.

(b) Heb. 2:2 and 9:15 speak of parabasis in the context of the OT period. The allusion to the punishing of parabasis and disobedience in the OT serves to underline the warning in 2:2 against neglecting the salvation given in Christ; 9:15 stresses the significance of Jesus' death as redemption from the transgressions committed under the first covenant.

4. aparabatos, unchangeable, occurs only in Heb. 7:24, where it retains a clear echo of the lit. meaning. The OT priesthood, which was tied up with the law and thus was liable to violation and transgression (7:11), is contrasted with Jesus' priesthood, which is eternal and unchangeable; it is not exposed to any parabasis.

5. hyperbainō occurs only in 1 Thess. 4:6, where Paul instructs believers not to "wrong" each other.

See also adikia, wrongdoing, unrighteousness, injustice (94); hamartia, sin (281); paraptōma, transgression, trespass, false step, sin (4183).

4127 (parabatēs, transgressor), → 4126.

4130 παραβολή

παραβολή (parabolē), type, figure, parable (4130); παραβάλλω (paraballō), throw alongside, compare (4125); αἴνιγμα (ainigma), riddle, indistinct image (141); ἀλληγορέω (allēgoreo), speak allegorically (251).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. parabolē is derived from paraballō, to place alongside, compare. It has such meanings as comparison, meeting, venture. (a) In cl. rhetoric parabolē became the technical term for a specific form of speech alongside other figures of speech, such as metaphors, comparisons, images, illustrative stories, and allegories. In these what is unknown is compared with what is known to the listener, in order to help that person grasp a certain truth. In general, the imagery is drawn from life.

(b) In rhetoric allegory is clearly distinguished from the other forms. The vb. allēgoreo probably originated in Hel. times and means to speak allegorically or to allegorize. Allegorizing has always played an important role in sacred writings. When they become antiquated, a new, contemporary content is injected into them by means of allegorical explanations so that their canonical authority is preserved.

(c) ainigma, dark or puzzling saying, riddle, is the opposite of a plain, straightforward, or simple word. Though it may use the literary form of metaphor, it should be understood as a wise saying. The riddle was considered, therefore, as a touchstone of wisdom.

2. In the LXX parabolē is always the equivalent of the Heb. noun māšāl or the vb. māšal. The Heb. noun denotes a saying that contains a comparison or taunt or a wise saying, perhaps in parabolic form. The Heb. vb. means to speak or tell a māšāl.

(a) The vb. māšal acquired a broad semantic field. It was used first of all as a technical term for various types or forms of comparisons. Thus the noun māšāl, in popular speech, means a proverb (→ paroimia, 4231), which often contains a comparison (1 Sam. 10:12; 24:14; Ezek. 18:2). If the saying makes fun of a person or disparages one as a bad example, it denotes a taunt (Isa. 14:4; Hab. 2:6).

(b) Later māšāl became a technical term among the wise and meant a wise saying, rich in comparisons (cf. Prov. 26:7, 9) and the instruction of the wise. In the LXX the superscription to Prov. and the collections within it carry the word paroimia (1:1) or paideia (25:1; → paideuō, 4084) as the translation of māšāl. The wise person in the OT loves the enigmatic, dark saying. In this context māšāl approaches the Heb. word ḥîdâ, riddle, for which it can even be used as a synonym (1:6).

(c) The LXX translates ḥîdâ appropriately by ainigma, i.e., riddle, dark saying. The riddle (1 Ki. 10:1; 2 Chr. 9:1) was part of the cult of wisdom at Solomon's court and has its place in the wisdom lit. (Prov. 1:6). The only OT riddle given word for word is in Jdg. 14:12–20. An ainigma requires explanation. God speaks to humans—though not to Moses—in ainigma-type language (Num. 12:8); prophetic speech also is enigmatic (Ezek. 17:2).

(d) In the realm of prophecy (→ prophēteia, 4735) māšāl has its place. On the one hand, it occurs as proverb and taunt (see above). On the other hand, although the word is not present, various parabolic forms occur in prophecies. The later prophets used more developed forms of māšāl in order to clarify, strengthen, and lend urgency to their messages. Allegory, too, aims at urgency, but goes about it another way: through a certain veiling of the truth, it seeks to attract the attention of the listener. In the latest OT books, actual allegorical visions occur (e.g., Dan. 2; 4; 7; 8; Zech.; 2 Esd. 9:26–13:56). The symbolic actions of the prophets, whose meaning is called māšāl, stand in close relationship to the prophetic parables.

NT In the NT parabolē occurs only in the Synoptic Gospels (48x) and in Heb. (2x); ainigma only in 1 Cor. 13:12; and allēgoreō only in Gal. 4:24. parabolē in the NT has the following meanings.

1. The ritual of the tabernacle is seen as a parabolē ("illustration") of the time of salvation (Heb. 9:9), and the restoration of Isaac as a picture of the resurrection ("figuratively speaking, he did receive Isaac back," 11:19). In Matt. 15:15; Mk. 7:17 parabolē means a saying, and in Lk. 4:23 a proverb. In all other occurrences in the NT it has the meaning of parable in one or other of its various senses, as listed below.

(a) In figurative sayings image and reality are placed together without a comparative adv. (as), so that the image (the known) may elucidate the reality (the unknown): e.g., "You are the light of the world" (Matt. 5:14). This type of saying takes on the character of a metaphor.

(b) The metaphor is a fig. expression in which a name or descriptive term is applied to some object to which it is not literally and properly applicable. It often involves the transference of the concrete to the abstract: e.g., "Enter through the narrow gate" (Matt. 7:13), where access to the kingdom is viewed as that which requires effort and difficulty. Similarly, the mission of the church is viewed as a harvest (9:37–38). Metaphor places the image not beside the reality, as in the figurative saying, but in place of the reality. One has to know beforehand what reality lies behind the metaphor or it remains unintelligible.

(c) The simile is a sentence in which reality and image are placed beside one another by means of a comparative adv., e.g., "as" or "like." In this case there is only one principal point of comparison: e.g., "Be as shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves" (Matt. 10:16). Similes are not frequent, since often the concept has passed over into a metaphor.

(d) The parable is a story that has developed out of a simile or a figurative saying. Two similar things, events, or situations are compared, so that the known can elucidate the unknown. The image depicts a typical event or circumstance, and there is, strictly speaking, only one main point of comparison: e.g., "The kingdom of heaven is like yeast . . ." (Matt. 13:33).

(e) The parabolic story differs from the pure parable only in that its picture, which is a fictional story, is recounted as if it had once happened. Thus, the parabolic story of the unjust judge begins: "In a certain town there was a judge . . ." (Lk. 18:2–5).

(f) The illustrative story is a freely invented story that gives an example, a model case, that has to be generalized by the hearer. Thus the story of the good Samaritan ends with Jesus saying: "Go and do likewise" (Lk. 10:37). Conversely, the illustrative story of the Pharisee and the tax collector in the temple ends with a statement about who will be justified (18:10–14). It is noteworthy that the NT illustrative stories occur only in Lk.

(g) An allegory is a freely invented story that says something other than it appears to say on the surface by heaping metaphor on metaphor. It is a continuous metaphor: e.g., "The kingdom of heaven is like a king who prepared a wedding banquet for his son . . ." (Matt. 22:2–10). Like metaphor, allegory rests on convention. It is only intelligible when the metaphors are known, for they have to be translated step by step, and when the matter they depict is known. It is a literary form intelligible only to the initiated. Ezek. 17:12–21 offers a model exposition. Allegories of this kind occur in the NT, but they are designated parabolē, not allēgoria (e.g., Matt. 22:1).

2. In the interpretation of parables, several general principles should be kept in mind. (a) In parables and the related forms a distinction may be drawn between the image and the reality. The purpose of the parable comes where these two halves intersect, the point of comparison.

(b) The story portion of the parable is usually told as concisely and simply as possible. Irrelevant emotions and motives are not disclosed. In most instances there are no more than three characters or groups of characters in a parable and never more than two actors in one scene. If the conclusion is self-evident, it may be omitted.

(c) In general, the drama of the parable is recounted from only one point of view, though there are exceptions to this rule.

(d) For the expositor the stress comes at the end of the parable.

(e) The material for the drama is taken from the world of the hearer and reflects his or her experiences and thoughts. Frequently a parable is told in response to a question, which draws the listener into the parable and may even find him or her portrayed in the parable.

(f) Still, many parables have acquired new addressees in the course of their transmission, so that a parable originally directed to, e.g., an expert in the law (Lk. 10:25–37) becomes relevant to the disciples and even to believers today.

3. The NT parables contain the same Christological significance as the miracle narratives. There are two main groups of themes, the kingdom of God and repentance. (a) The parables of growth belong to the first group (Matt. 13; Mk. 4; Lk. 8; 13:18–21) as do the parables that speak of God and his activity (Matt. 20:1–16; 25:14–30; Lk. 15:11–32). (b) The second group enjoins the urgency of repentance (12:16–21; 13:6–9), which demands decisive (16:1–8), radical (Matt. 13:44–46) and watchful action (24:42–25:13), because the kingdom is near. The parables that speak of action towards one's neighbor also belong to this group (18:23–35; Lk. 10:30–37).

4. A number of parables are contained in Gospel of Thomas, a 4th-cent. Coptic document found around 1945. This work is a collection of 114 sayings attributed to Jesus. Some parables are substantially the same as those contained in the canonical Gospels: e.g., the sower (No. 9), the mustard seed (No. 20), the rich fool (No. 63), and the great supper (No. 64). Some parables appear to have a significantly different thrust from the canonical Gospels (e.g., the parable of the lost sheep, No. 107, the thrust of which is the love of the shepherd for the one lost sheep more than all the others), and some parables are entirely new (e.g., No. 97, about a woman who carries a jar of meal a long way but inadvertently loses all of its contents by the time she reaches home).

5. One of the most puzzling elements in the interpretation of parables is their expressed purpose as stated in Mk. 4:10–11 (cf. Matt. 13:10–15; Lk. 8:9–10). One might gather from this that Jesus told parables to confuse people rather than to enlighten them. Several comments can be made here. (a) The "so that" (hina) clause of Mk. 4:12 can be understood as a result clause rather than as a purpose clause. In other words, for those who do not care to delve into the personal meaning of a parable, the result is that they will understand the story but not its eschatological meaning.

(b) In Mk. 4:12 the hina clause introduces an OT quotation (Isa. 6:9–10). Through Jesus' telling parables, he is fulfilling the prophecy given in the time of Isaiah, that to people hardened by unbelief, all preaching falls on deaf ears. In view of this general statement about the way God works, Mk. 4:12 deals not only with Jesus' parables but with his preaching in general.

(c) We should also recognize that, if considered by themselves, the meaning of the stories told in the parables is not always clear (e.g., if a preacher today told, as the entire sermon, a really good story, then sent the people home, they might wonder, "What's the point?"). Jesus wanted his dedicated followers to probe further the significance of his stories and to ask him about them, precisely as the disciples did (Mk. 4:10). This process separated the dedicated followers of Jesus from the merely curious, who came to be entertained by Jesus' story-telling ability. The truth about God and humankind cannot be learned as if it were a series of mere facts that involves no personal commitment.

6. Apart from the use of parabolē and the numerous instances of verbal parables in the Gospels, one may also speak of the parabolic actions of Jesus. Just as OT prophets sometimes performed symbolic acts that were in themselves a message from Yahweh to those with eyes to see (e.g., Hosea's marriage to an adulteress [1:2–3:5], Jeremiah's purchase of a field [32:7–15]), so also some of Jesus' actions may be construed as unspoken parables. Such actions might include his characteristic reception of outcasts (Lk. 15:1–2; 19:5–6), his endorsement of the disciples' plucking of grain on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:1–8; Mk. 2:23–28; Lk. 6:1–5), his choosing of twelve disciples (patterned on the twelve tribes of Israel [→ dōdeka, 1557]), his entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1–9; Mk. 11:1–10; Lk. 19:29–38), and the Last Supper (→ deipnon, 1270).

7. The vb. allēgoreō occurs only in Gal. 4:24. Note first of all that "allegory" here is not related to "allegory" as defined in 1(g), above. There an allegory is a continuous metaphor that includes within itself the intention of having more than one point and has the various characters and elements in the story each representing something. What we are discussing in this paragraph is the allegorical interpretation of sacred writings (cf. the cl. Gk. section, above). The Scriptures have undergone a long history of allegorical interpretation, beginning already with Philo's method of interpreting the Jewish law in terms of the Hellenistic philosophy (ca. 20 B.C.–ca. A.D. 50). In this process, the OT is "found" to contain hidden, spiritual meanings that are often significantly different from the apparently intended or historical ones. Such meanings are read into a story in a way alien to its original intention.

Does Paul use allegory in this sense in Gal. 4:24–31? In this passage the apostle relates Hagar to the old covenant delivered at Mount Sinai. He goes on to compare Mount Sinai with the present Jerusalem, symbolizing bondage to the law, which contrasts with the Jerusalem that is above, which is free and is "our mother." Though the passage may appear somewhat fanciful, a strong case can be made that Paul is here dealing with typology (→ typos, 5596), not allegory, as it came to be understood in the history of the church.

What about a passage like 1 Cor. 9:9, where Paul appeals to Deut. 25:4 in support of his contention that apostles have the right to be supported by the church (cf. 1 Tim. 5:18)? Some have charged Paul with inappropriate allegory here. But one should note that there is a common principle here underlying the original OT pronouncement and the application Paul draws: Those who labor on anything (whether a human or animal) have the right to sustenance for their work. This applies to the quotation from Deut. 25:4 and to all the other illustrations that Paul adduces in support of the point.

8. The riddle or dark saying (ainigma) is not a NT literary form. The word occurs only at 1 Cor. 13:12 in the NT. In the context Paul is contrasting knowledge with faith, hope, and love (13:13) and points out (lit.), "For now we look through a glass in a riddle." Looking glasses were made at Corinth, and the fact that they do not give a direct vision of reality underlines Paul's point about the limitations of knowledge. The preposition dia (through) is to be explained by the fact that the image in the mirror appears to lie on the further side. "In a riddle" may be based on Num. 12:8, where God says that he will speak to Moses "face to face, clearly and not in riddles," (i.e., not obscurely). For Paul what we apprehend in the present life is like a riddle; it is obscure and enigmatic. It contrasts with knowledge in the future state, when "we shall see face to face" and "know fully, even as [we are] fully known" (1 Cor. 12:12; cf. Matt. 5:8).

See also paroimia, proverb, wise saying; dark saying, riddle (4231).

4132 (parangelia, order, command, precept, advice), → 4133.

4133 παραγγέλλω

παραγγέλλω (parangellō), give orders, command, instruct, direct (4133); παραγγελία (parangelia), order, command, precept, advice (4132).

CL & OT parangellō (vb.) and parangelia (noun) mean order or command. These words were used by persons of different kinds of authority, such as military commands, the instructions of the philosophers, and even the instructions of a god. The essential element is that someone is put under an obligation.

The noun does not occur in the LXX (though 1 Sam. 22:14 has parangelma). The vb. is used of the military proclamations of kings and generals (1 Sam. 15:4; 23:8), the command of leaders (Jos. 6:7 = LXX 6:8; 2 Chr. 36:22), etc. The instructions of Daniel and Judas Maccabaeus also had a religious character (Dan. 2:18; 2 Macc. 13:10). However, Nebuchadnezzar's command to worship the image of his cult was opposed to God (Dan. 3:4).

NT 1. Both words are used in the NT in a general sense, such as the command given by the authorities at Philippi to imprison Paul and Silas (Acts 16:23–24; see also 4:18; 5:28, 40; 23:22, 30). In the early church were Jewish Christians who claimed that Gentile Christians should be "circumcised and required to obey the law of Moses" (15:5).

2. In the Gospels only the vb. is used and exclusively for Jesus' commands. In the feeding of the four thousand, for example, Jesus commanded the crowd to sit down on the ground (Matt. 15:35; Mk. 8:6; see also Lk. 5:14; 8:29, 56; 9:21; Acts 16:18). The statements in Matt. 10:5 and Mk. 6:8 refer to the instructions the Lord gave to the disciples when he sent them out. The risen Christ commanded his disciples not to leave Jerusalem before Pentecost (1:4). The authority of Jesus continued in the apostolic preaching, which stood under the command of Jesus and through which God commands everyone to repent (10:42; 17:30).

3. The apostolic letters present the same picture. Paul based his prohibition of divorce on the "command" of the Lord (1 Cor. 7:10). Here he distinguished between Jesus' authority and his own, showing that the commands he gave "from the Lord" were binding for the church (7:25; cf. also 1 Thess. 4:2). Apostolic authority lay behind the directions for the behavior of women in worship and the exhortations to Christians to behave respectably in a pagan world and to work in peace and eat their own bread (1 Cor. 11:17; 1 Thess. 4:11; 2 Thess. 3:12). Regardless of whether the instructions were written or oral, the apostle expected the church to comply with them. They were to keep away from anyone who did not walk according to such commands (2 Thess. 3:4, 6, 10–15).

In 1 Tim. 6:13–14 Paul commanded (parangellō) Timothy, "Keep this command [entolē] without spot or blame until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ." Earlier he writes, "The goal of this command (parangelia) is love, which comes from a pure heart and a good conscience and a sincere faith" (1:5). Timothy is therefore charged to wage a good warfare (1:18) and to "command certain men not to teach false doctrines any longer" (1:3). The solemn appeal to God and Christ makes clear the nature of authority behind the apostolic commands (6:13–14).

See also dogma, decree, ordinance, command (1504); entolē, command, order (1953); keleuō, command, order (3027).

4136 (paradeigmatizō, expose to public disgrace, make an example of), → 1259.

4137 παράδεισος

παράδεισος (paradeisos), garden, park, paradise (4137).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. paradeisos, a loanword from the Middle Iranian, means a garden, park, or paradise. Myths from many nations speak of a land or a place of blessedness in primeval times or on the present edge of the known world, where the gods lived and where distinguished mortals were carried away after death.

2. In the LXX the word is found 46x, mostly as trans. of Heb. words meaning garden. Of these passages it occurs 13x in Gen. 2–3, 4x in Ezek., and 3x in Isa. In each case the reference is to the garden of God, present or future. In Neh. 2:8; Eccl. 2:5; Song 4:13 it means orchard, forest.

(a) Though there is no full description of paradeisos in the OT, a few common motifs appear: the tree of life, the tree of knowledge, the water of life (Gen. 2–3; 13:10; Ezek. 28:13; 31:8–9). Paradise is conceived of as a lovely orchard in which both the tree of life and the tree of knowledge stood. Here God walked and handed over the garden to humankind for cultivation. As a result of the first sin, Adam and Eve were driven out of paradise. Return to it is impossible, since a cherub guards all access.

(b) Later Jewish writers wrote numerous speculations about the paradise of Gen. 2–3. For example, because of Adam's sin it was removed and hidden at the edges of the earth, on a high mountain, or in heaven. With the infiltration of the Gk. doctrine of the immortality of the soul, paradise became the dwelling place of the righteous during the intermediate state. Pious imagination increasingly embellished the conception of paradise: It had walls and gates, angels watched over it, light shone on the righteous, the tree of life was within it, and fragrant streams flowed through it.

In a renewed creation paradise will emerge from its concealment. God or the Messiah will bring it to a renewed earth, to Palestine, near Jerusalem. The righteous will study the Torah there, and God will prepare for them a messianic meal. Above all, they may then enjoy the fruit of the tree of life.

NT 1. In the NT paradeisos occurs only 3x. (a) Lk. 23:43 may reflect contemporary Jewish conceptions that refer to the hidden and intermediate abode of the righteous. Jesus promises the criminal on the cross fellowship with him "today ... in paradise" and thus allows him to share in forgiveness and blessedness. The intermediate state thereby becomes essentially fellowship with Christ (cf. Acts. 7:56; 2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23).

(b) In 2 Cor. 12:4 Paul speaks of a personal experience in the Spirit in which he was "caught up to paradise" and there heard words that a person is "not permitted to tell." This statement is parallel to what he says in 12:2 about being "caught up to the third heaven." Paul's reference to this experience "fourteen years ago" underlines the fact that it occurred long before the foundation of the Corinthian church. That this visionary experience took place either "in the body or out of the body" (he is not sure) rules out the Damascus road experience, for Paul did not regard this as a vision.

Ancient cosmology pictured three, five, seven, or ten heavens, three being a commonly accepted number. Paul's use of "the third heaven" and "paradise" may reflect a widely accepted image for something that by his own account is indescribable (cf. 2 Cor. 12:4). The idea of hearing "inexpressible things" is possibly related to the idea of a sealed revelation found in the OT (Isa. 8:16; Dan. 12:4; cf. Rev. 14:3), though similar language is found also in the mystery religions and in apocalyptic writings of Paul's day. In all this the apostle is using contemporary images of the transcendent world to describe an ecstatic experience that was evidently far more impressive than anything of which his opponents could boast. But this experience was something for his own private, personal edification. What a Christian should boast about is one's weaknesses, that God may be glorified in and through him or her.

(c) In Rev. 2:7 the Spirit promises to the church of Ephesus: "To him who overcomes, I will give the right to eat from the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God." This takes up the thought of Gen. 3, where after the fall humanity was barred from the tree of life. Those who overcome the trials and temptations of this world are promised not only restoration of what Adam lost but access to life in a way that Adam never had. Note also Rev. 22:1–2, 14, which gives a final vision of the tree of life in the new Jerusalem, which though not called paradise in Rev., is related to paradise in other pseudepigraphical writings.

2. In the course of church history many extrabiblical motifs, pictures, and ideas have been absorbed into the conception of paradise, in order to paint the state of the blessed after death in bright colors. Jesus' statement to the criminal (Lk. 23:43) was generalized and referred to every believer. Moreover, with the increased popularity of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, theologians insisted that the soul receives judgment after death and attains to paradise (thought of as other-worldly), whereas sinners go to hell. In such doctrinal works, the images of Rev. 21–22 are used to describe heaven and paradise.

4140 παραδίδωμι

παραδίδωμι (paradidōmi), deliver up, give up, hand over; to hand down, pass on, transmit (4140); παράδοσις (paradosis), tradition (4142).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. paradidōmi denotes all aspects of deliberate giving or giving over: to deliver up, give away, offer, hand over, betray. As a legal term, it means to bring before a court, deliver up a prisoner. It extends from the handing over of a captive to the reprehensible act of betrayal, whereby a free man of good repute, who may well be innocent, is ruined.

(b) The vb. can also have a positive sense of hand down, pass on instruction from teacher to pupil. In the Hel. mystery religions the word is used in connection with the delivery of a holy teaching.

(c) The noun paradosis denotes (actively) a handing down, (passively) that which is handed down, tradition.

2. (a) The LXX uses paradidōmi about 200x. Roughly 150x it translates the Heb. nātan, to give, hand over, deliver. The formula "to deliver into someone's hands" stems ultimately from the wars of Yahweh. The subject of this vb. is almost always God, and that in most cases implies handing over to ruin, defeat, or death. Before a battle began, a priest or a prophet would consult the Lord; if all was well, Yahweh would deliver the enemy into Israel's hand. But if Israel was disobedient, Yahweh would deliver them into the hands of their enemies (Jdg. 2:14; 6:13; Isa. 65:12; Jer. 32:4 = LXX 39:4). In Deut. the formula came to mean the annihilation of the earlier inhabitants of the land (e.g., 1:8). Note esp. the analogous use of this vb. in Isa. 53:6, 12, where the Lord delivered over his servant to death for our sins.

(b) In the other use of paradidōmi, the handing down of sagas, narratives, laws, and lists of names (tradition properly so-called) came into being when Jud. was confronted with aggressive Hellenism in the last two centuries B.C. and with Christianity in the 1st cent. A.D. The Heb. word māsar, translated paradidōmi, refers to the strictly regulated process of handing down received expositions of the law. Josephus characteristically uses the expression "the tradition [paradosis] of the fathers" for the scribes' oral exposition of Torah. The Heb. equivalent is māsōret, which occurs in the OT only in Ezek. 20:37. Much later this led to the term "Masoretic," the officially handed-down text of the OT.

NT In the NT paradidōmi occurs 119x; paradosis 13x (Matt. 15; Mk. 7, and 5x in Paul, all in the sense of the transmission of doctrine).

1. The most common meaning of paradidōmi in the NT is to deliver up to judgment and death. (a) John the Baptist's being delivered up (Matt. 4:12) signifies his imprisonment leading to his execution. The adversary delivers to the judge (5:25), and the judge to the officer (Lk. 12:58). Jesus' followers will be delivered to the council (Matt. 10:17) and to synagogues (Lk. 21:12) and exposed to persecution and oppression (Matt. 24:9). Brother will be delivered up by brother to death (Mk. 13:12; cf. also Acts 8:3; 12:4; 22:4).

(b) Most of the passages in which paradidōmi occurs, however, refer to Jesus' being betrayed or delivered up "into the hands of men" (Matt. 17:22), to the high priests and scribes (20:18), to the Gentiles (20:19), to Pilate (27:2), and to crucifixion (26:2; cf. also 1 Cor. 11:23). Judas, the person who delivered him up, is the betrayer. This frequent use of paradidōmi in the NT reflects its technical legal use.

(c) The vb. is occasionally used for deliverance to something other than a human court, such as to "the sinful desires of their hearts" (Rom. 1:24). The Gentiles "have given themselves over to sensuality," which in itself is a judgment (Eph. 4:19); likewise, God gave Israel "over to the worship of the heavenly bodies" (Acts 7:42). In 1 Cor. 5:5 and 1 Tim. 1:20 Paul delivers men to Satan, the executor of the divine judgment.

(d) Finally, paradidōmi is found in the context of giving up one's life (Jn. 19:30), risking one's life (Acts 15:26), and Jesus' giving himself up for us (Gal. 2:20; cf. Eph. 5:25).

2. In a number of passages, however, paradidōmi occurs in a context other than that of judgment and death. (a) It can denote Jesus' messianic sovereignty, in the sense of things having been committed to him by his Father (Matt. 11:27; Lk. 10:22; cf. 1 Cor. 15:24). But the devil also asserts he can grant power to whomsoever he will, since it has been placed at his disposal (Lk. 4:6). In Acts 14:26 Paul and Barnabas in Antioch are "committed to the grace of God," i.e., placed under its protective power.

(b) The vb. also conveys the idea of handing down tradition, both in Jewish and Christian circles. In Mk. 7:13, the obj. of paradidōmi is the rab. exposition of the law. Similarly, in Acts 6:14 false witnesses testify against Stephen that the Jesus whom he preaches will change the customs Moses "handed down."

(c) In Acts 16:4 Luke uses paradidōmi in connection with the decisions of the apostolic council that Paul handed over to the churches in Lycaonia and elsewhere. The use of this vb. in Lk. 1:2 is significant. Its obj. is the account of those who from the beginning were eyewitnesses of Jesus' life. The story of Jesus is now a tradition handed down.

(d) In Rom. 6:17, the subj. of a pass. form of paradidōmi is a teaching handed down to believers. In 1 Cor. 11:2, 23; 15:3 the obj. of the vb. is Christian doctrines—both those handed down to Paul and those that he handed on to the Corinthians. In 11:23 he names the "Lord" as the source of the tradition: "For I received from the Lord what I also passed on to you." The phrase "from the Lord" expresses Paul's belief that, as the ensuing words of institution of the Lord's Supper derive from the Lord himself, his word is of supreme authority (cf. 9:14). Though 15:3 does not locate the source of the tradition, most likely Paul is referring to the earliest church tradition.

(e) Likewise in 2 Pet. 2:21 ("the sacred command that was passed on to them") and Jude 3 ("the faith that was once for all entrusted to the saints"), traditions that must be preserved and passed on to others are in view.

3. (a) Regarding the noun paradosis, in Mk. 7:3, 5 (par. Matt. 15:2), the phrase "the tradition of the elders" means Jewish tradition of the law that is not laid down in the Bible and which Jesus in the same context (7:8) calls "the traditions of men."

According to Mk. 7, this rab. exposition of the law is in conflict with God's true will (cf. the use of paradosis in Gal. 1:14).

(b) In 1 Cor. 11:2 and 2 Thess. 2:15 Paul's "teachings" are called paradoseis. The word here does not refer to a fixed canon of writings handed down and supplemented by oral tradition but to Paul's written and oral admonitions to the church, which the church has duly accepted (cf. 2 Thess. 3:6).

(c) In Col. 2:8, the phrase "human tradition" does not mean Jewish exposition of the law as in Mk. 7:8, but is a polemical way of referring to the "hollow and deceptive" teachings that Paul's Colossian opponents regarded as revelations of "the basic principles of this world" (→ stoicheion, 5122). The Colossian believers are not to receive such traditions, since they have already "received Christ Jesus as Lord" (2:6).

See also krima, dispute, decision, verdict, judgment (3210); bēma, judgment seat (1037); katadikazō, condemn (2868).

4142 (paradosis, tradition), → 4140.

4148 (paraiteomai, ask for, request, excuse, refuse), → 160.

4151 παρακαλέω

παρακαλέω (parakaleō), summon, invite, exhort, encourage, (4151); παράκλησις (paraklēsis), encouragement, exhortation, appeal, comfort (4155).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. parakaleō basically means to call in. From this follow the other meanings, which are often hard to distinguish from one another: to ask (sometimes used of invoking the gods), exhort, request, and speak consoling words (esp. in cases of bereavement).

2. In the LXX parakaleō frequently means to be moved to comfort (e.g., Gen. 37:35; Ps. 119:50). To bring comfort is part of a prophet's task (cf. Isa. 40:1). But this word can also mean to be sorry, have compassion (e.g., Jdg. 2:18; Ps. 135:14), encourage, strengthen (Deut. 3:28; Job 4:3), lead astray (Deut. 13:6), or lead along (Exod. 15:13). In 1st-cent. Jud. the "consolation of Israel" (cf. Lk. 2:25) means "the fulfillment of the messianic hope."

It is striking that more is heard of asking and exhortation in the Hel. world, while the emphasis is on comfort where the influence of the OT is felt. Perhaps this reflects the lack of comfort that burdened Hellenism and the consolation hoped for in the world of the OT.

NT parakaleō occurs 109x in the NT and means (1) to summon, invite, ask, implore; (2) to exhort; (3) to comfort, encourage. The noun paraklēsis means exhortation, encouragement, appeal, request, comfort, consolation.

1. The sense of summon (or ask) is found in Acts 28:20. In 28:14 it should be translated in the special sense of invite. In all the strands of the Synoptic tradition parakaleō means to ask or implore, in the context of needy people who come with their requests to Jesus (e.g., Matt. 8:5, 31; 18:29; Lk. 15:28). Only at Matt. 26:53 is it said of Jesus himself that he could request from his Father angelic assistance. In Acts 16:9–10 (cf. also 8:31; 13:42) the reference is to a request for missionary ministry.

2. Obviously prior to Paul, exhortation had its place in the life of the church, esp. as the task of the early Christian prophets. Thus in 1 Cor. 14:30–31. Paul sees the need of requiring the local prophets to speak one after another in order, so that all may be exhorted. In Acts 15:32 the prophets Judas and Silas are said to have exhorted and strengthened the church. Exhortation is an almost stereotyped part of the church's life

(cf. 16:40). Paul sends Timothy, among other things, to exhort the church (1 Thess. 3:2; cf. Rom. 12:8). This ministry of exhortation, attested as it is from the earliest Christian period, is probably the setting for the hortatory passages found at the end of Paul's letters. The apostle sees it as his duty to exhort the community (12:1; Phil. 4:2; 1 Thess. 4:1).

Theologically, however, Paul gives to exhortation a specific basis. He does not give his readers direct moral instruction, but addresses them "through" (dia) God or Christ, so that the apostle thinks of his admonition as mediated, for example, "in view of God's mercy" (Rom. 12:1; cf. 12:3), "by our Lord Jesus Christ and by the love of the Spirit" (15:30), or "by the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (2 Cor. 10:1; cf. also 1 Thess. 4:1; 2 Thess. 3:12).

Consideration of the special basis for exhortation in Paul leads us to the fundamental and much wider problem of ethics and the imperative in Paul. This imperative can only be properly understood when it is viewed in the light of the indicative. The believer's life is a gift from God, which leads in turn to a believer's desire to live as God would have us live. Thus Paul exhorts the Corinthians not to receive God's grace "in vain" (2 Cor. 6:1), which would be the case if they did not prove themselves in their lives. The apostle can describe himself as their example in view of his "way of life in Christ" (1 Cor. 4:17; cf. 1 Thess. 2:12; 4:1, 10; 5:11).

Luke also offers a strong emphasis on right conduct in this life. Now is the time when it is important to prove oneself. Therefore John the Baptist, Judas, Silas, and others exhort people to walk aright (cf. Lk. 3:18; Acts 15:32). It is necessary to warn them to remain faithful to the Lord (11:23) and to the faith (14:22), and to save themselves (2:40). The necessity of mastering the present leads further in Eph. 4:1, the Pastoral Letters, Heb., and 1 Pet. to the exhortation to "live a life worthy of [our] calling."

3. The sense of "comfort," which connotes friendly speech as much as exhortation (e.g., Acts 16:39), is found with special frequency in 2 Cor. 1:3–6. Here Paul sets consolation over against tribulation, suffering, and death, identifying his own sufferings with those of Christ and at the same time sharing in Christ's comfort. This line of thought is carried further by the application of the apostle's suffering and his experience of comfort to the situation of his readers. In 7:4–7 the tribulation and comfort theme is again taken up. Paul is now comforted by Titus and what he has to tell of the situation in Corinth (cf. also 1 Thess. 3:7).

The comfort promised to the mourners in Matt. 5:4 is paralleled by the woes promised to the rich in Lk. 6:24. Suffering is met by God's consolation. Luke presents the alternative: Those who are rich in this life cannot expect the consolation of God in the life to come (cf. also 16:25). Finally, comfort (along with hope, Rom. 15:4; 2 Thess. 2:16) is part of Christian experience in this world (Heb. 6:18; 12:5).

See also noutheteō, warn, advise (3805); epitimaō, rebuke (2203).

4155 (paraklēsis, encouragement, exhortation, appeal, comfort), → 4151.

4156 παράκλητος

παράκλητος (paraklētos), helper, intercessor, advocate (4156).

CL & OT paraklētos is a cognate of the vb. parakaleō, which in cl. Gk. meant call in, summon, exhort, encourage, comfort. The noun paraklētos is derived from the verbal adj. and means called (to one's aid). Its first occurrence in a legal context (in the court of justice) means legal assistant, advocate.

This word appears in the LXX only in Job 16:2 (Aquila, Theod.), where it designates Job's "comforters." One might ask whether there is a correspondence between the "comforters" and Satan (cf. Job 1:6–2:7, 11–12). They are ostensibly friends who come to admonish Job but are unable to do so. Philo used the word in the sense of intercessor and adviser or helper. Rab. Jud. used the word as a loanword in the sense of advocate, counsel, defender, especially of humans before God. Only later did the meaning of "comforter" penetrate early Christian lit. through its connection with parakaleō (exhort, → 4151).

NT The passages in which paraklētos occurs in the NT show that the pass. sense of someone called in to help is alien to its meaning. The paraklētos is not called in by people but sent by God (Jn. 14:26; 15:26; 16:7), given, and received (14:16–17). He does not merely put in a good word, but brings active help. The sense of helper and intercessor is suitable in all the occurrences of the word. In 1 Jn. 2:1–2 the word has a soteriological character in calling "Jesus Christ, the Righteous One" both "one who speaks ... in our defense" (paraklētos) and the "atoning sacrifice [hilasmos] ... for the sins of the whole world" (→ hilaskomai, reconcile, make atonement for, 2661).

The descriptions of the paraklētos in Jn.'s Gospel go beyond the task of an intercessor. He will "convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment" (16:8; cf. also 16:9–11; → elenchō, convict of guilt, 1794). He will "teach you all things and will remind you of everything I have said to you" (14:26). Although the world will not know the paraklētos, the disciples "know him, for he lives with you and will be in you" (14:17). He will "testify about" Jesus (15:26).

All this indicates that the role of the paraklētos is to continue the revealing work of Jesus. The Spirit of truth "will guide you into all the truth. He will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come. He will bring glory to me by taking from what is mine and making it known to you" (Jn. 16:13–14). His purpose is not to satisfy our curiosity about the future, but to continue the work of the historical Jesus in the Christ proclaimed by the church. These sayings led to a stage in early Christian history that Luke treats in his description of the bestowal of the Spirit (Acts 1; 2; 10). The Spirit honors Jesus and gives prominence to his work. At the same time, the church has the gift of the Spirit and thus stands in continuity with Jesus.

Only Jesus together with the Spirit is called paraklētos in the NT (Jn. 14:16; 1 Jn. 2:1). This restriction of the title requires a theological interpretation that is at the same time polemical. Only these two—and not the multitude of non-Christian revealers and helpers—are real paracletes. This accounts for the repeated and stressed connection with the Father. On the one hand, it is Jesus who sends the paraklētos from the Father (Jn. 15:26). On the other hand, the Father sends the paraklētos at the request of Jesus (14:16, 26). According to 14:16, 26, Jesus himself is a paraklētos, who is distinct from the other paraklētos whom the Father will send in his name.

It is striking that the term paraklētos is only found in the Johannine writings, and apart from 1 Jn. 2:1 occurs only in Jesus' farewell discourses (Jn. 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7; cf. 16:12–15). Still, the other Evangelists express aspects of this teaching in other ways. Matt., for example, speaks of Christ's continued presence and help in a way that does not involve his physical presence (Matt. 18:20). This presence is linked with the Father and the Holy Spirit (28:19–20; Lk. 24:48–49). Furthermore, Jesus promised the assistance of the Holy Spirit in enabling his followers to speak under trial (Matt. 10:20; Mk. 13:11; cf. Lk. 21:15). Matt. and Lk. speak of a commitment of Jesus to his followers in such a way that those who receive them receive him and him who sent him (Matt. 10:40; Lk. 10:16; cf. Jn. 13:20). This presence of Jesus in those who are his forms the basis of the conviction of the nations in judgment (Matt. 25:31–46). In other words, what in Matt. and Lk. is depicted as the continuing presence and work of Jesus in the post-resurrection church is depicted by Jn. as the activity of the paraklētos of Jesus.

The trans. of paraklētos into Eng. presents obvious difficulties. The word "advocate" reflects the early Christian Lat. equivalent (advocatus) with all its legal connotations, as does the trans. "Counselor" (RSV, NIV), though the latter may also have overtones of giving advice. While this trans. may well fit Jn. 16:7–11 and 1 Jn. 2:1, the legal connotation seems to be absent from the other passages. The trans. "Comforter," which goes back to Wycliffe, is weak and misleading, unless one reads into it an etymological sense (Lat. con with; fortis strong). This leaves either the Gk. loanword "paraclete" or "helper." "Paraclete" has the advantage of being neutral, but it is essentially meaningless, unless the Gk. background is known. "Helper" is the one English word that is both meaningful and fits all the passages in which paraklētos occurs in the NT.

See also pneuma, spirit (4460).

4157 (parakoē, disobedience), → 201.

4158 (parakoloutheō, accompany, understand), → 199.

4159 (parakouō, fail to hear, take no heed), → 201.

4161 (paralambanō, take to oneself, take with or along, take over), → 3284.

4165 (paralogizomai, cheat, deceive, delude), → 4414.

4166 παραλυτικός

παραλυτικός (paralytikos), paralytic (4166); παραλύω (paralyō), to loose from the side, release, set free (4168).

CL & OT This word is infrequent in cl. Gk. and appears only once in the papyri. When paralytic disability is described, medical authors prefer the perf. part. pass. of paralyō; this was a chronic condition with organic degeneration. paralytikos does not occur in the LXX; paralyō has a variety of meanings, such as experience judgment (Gen. 4:15), plan (Isa. 23:9), expose (Ezek. 25:9), and tremble (Isa. 35:3; Ezek. 7:27; 21:7).

NT In the NT, paralytikos occurs only in Matt. 4:24; 8:6; 9:2, 6; Mk. 2:3–10. In Matt. 8:6, the paralysis is perhaps a disease that begins in one's legs and proceeds quickly to the arms and neck, generally being fatal within three weeks. The paralysis of 9:2 was probably some form of paraplegia, in which paralysis affects the lower half of the person's body. Lk. uses the perf. part. pass. of paralyō instead of paralytikos (cf. Lk. 5:18, 24; Acts 8:7; 9:33). In Heb. 12:13 paralyō alludes to Isa. 35:3 in its call for strengthening "weak" knees by depending on the plan and power of God.

See also astheneia, weakness, sickness, disease, timidity (819); nosos, illness, sickness (3798); malakia, weakness, softness, sickness (3433).

4168 (paralyō, to loose from the side, release, set free), → 4166.

4169 (paramenō, remain, stay on, continue in), → 3531.

4170 παραμυθέομαι

παραμυθέομαι (paramytheomai), encourage, cheer up, console (4170); παραμυθία (paramythia), encouragement, comfort, consolation (4171); παραμύθιον (paramythion), encouragement, consolation (4172).

CL & OT paramytheomai has the general meaning of speaking to someone in a positive, benevolent way. It also means encourage, exhort, comfort, soothe.

Heb. has no direct equivalent to paramytheomai. The LXX uses the word in the sense of comfort, console, encourage (2 Macc. 15:8–9; cf. Wis. 3:18). The OT mentions various kinds of comfort and comforting (→ parakaleō, 4151), but not with the sentimental overtones that the word has acquired in our language. Isa. 57:17–18 speaks first of God's anger and punishment; then God alters his plan and brings healing and comfort. The Word of God has life-giving power and thus brings comfort in affliction (Ps. 119:50).

NT Paul uses paramytheomai in conjunction with parakaleō, exhort, in 1 Thess. 2:12. He reminds his readers that when he visited Thessalonica, he comforted them "as a father deals with his own children" (2:11) and urged (martyromai) them "to live lives worthy of God." In 5:14 he urged the entire church to "encourage [paramytheomai] the timid."

Encouragement is an outworking of love, forming one of the foundations of church life as lived out in the sphere of Christ (Phil. 2:1). Thus at Corinth those with the gift of prophecy were expected to build up, encourage, and console (paramythian) the church (1 Cor. 14:3–4). In other words, giving comfort was part of the apostle's missionary activity and of the life of the young church. Such comfort was extended both to individuals and to the church as a whole.

In Jn. 11:19, 31 paramytheomai is a technical term for expression of sympathy.

See also tharseō, be of good courage, take heart (2510).

4171 (paramythia, encouragement, comfort), → 4170.

4172 (paramythion, encouragement, consolation), → 4170.

4174 (paranomeō, break the law, act contrary to the law), → 3795.

4176 (parapikrainō, embitter, make angry, provoke), → 4394.

4177 (parapikrasmos, rebellion), → 4394.

4178 (parapiptō, fall beside, go astray, err, sin), → 4183.

4183 παράπτωμα

παράπτωμα (paraptōma), transgression, trespass, false step, sin (4183); παραπίπτω (parapiptō), fall beside, go astray, err, sin (4178).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. parapiptō means to fall at the side; thence, accidentally bump into something; (later) to turn out amiss, miss one's way or the truth, fail in one's duty. Used absolutely it means make a mistake, err, meaning an accidental and excusable oversight. Correspondingly the noun paraptōma means oversight, error, mistake (unintentional).

2. In the LXX both the noun and the vb. are found most frequently in Ezek. parapiptō means to commit acts of unfaithfulness (e.g., 14:13; 15:8; 18:24; 20:27). paraptōma expresses conscious and deliberate sinning against God (rebellion, Job 36:9; Ezek. 14:11; 18:22; injustice, 3:20; 18:26). There are only isolated instances of its meaning of unintentional sins committed in weakness (Ps. 19:12) and negligence in official duties (Dan. 6:4).

NT 1. parapiptō occurs in the NT only in Heb. 6:6. It means to fall away, be unfaithful (similar to aphistēmi [fall away, → 923] in 3:12 and the expression used in 10:26). This is certainly not meant in the sense of a single lapse but rather expresses the abandonment of the Christian truth. This would, of course, manifest itself in specific behavior. The idea is one of a person's self-rejection by one's rejection of the grace of God continually being offered.

2. Apart from Paul's writings, paraptōma is only found in Matt. 6:14–15; Mk. 11:25. As in the OT, it is used as one of several words for sin, but it emphasizes strongly the deliberate act (only in Rom. 5:20 is it used of a universal fact) with its fateful consequences. Hence, it means an action through which one falls and loses the position granted by God. Thus trespasses committed by one individual against another directly affect one's relation to God and in the final judgment provide the standard by which a person is judged. Consequently, we must help to put any failure right (Gal. 6:1).

The sinful act of Adam (Rom. 5:15–18; cf. Wis. 10:1 = LXX 10:2) brought in its train a mass of sin and woe (Rom. 5:18, 20) and even death (5:15, 17–18), so that even before physical death a person is in the power of death (Eph. 2:1, 5; Col. 2:13). Thus Christ died (Rom. 4:25) in order that we might receive forgiveness for our sins (2 Cor. 5:19; Eph. 1:7; Col. 2:13). According to Rom. 11:11–12, Israel's fall consists in its rejection of the gospel.

See also adikia, wrongdoing, unrighteousness, injustice (94); hamartia, sin (281); parabasis, overstepping, transgression (4126).

4184 (pararreō, flow past, drift away, let slip), → 4835.

4186 (paraskeuazō, get ready, prepare [oneself]), → 2941.

4187 (paraskeuē, day of preparation), → 2941.

4190 (paratēreō, watch [closely], observe), → 5498.

4191 (paratērēsis, observation), → 5498.

4205 (pareimi, be present, have come), → 4242.

4209 (pareiserchomai, come in, step in), → 2262.

4212 (paremballō, throw up a palisade), → 4483.

4213 (parembolē, fortified camp, barracks), → 4483.

4215 παρεπίδημος παρεπίδημος (parepidēmos), adj., staying for a while in a strange place; noun, a stranger, alien, exile (4215).

CL & OT parepidēmos is derived from dēmos (people) and is found only twice in the LXX (Gen. 23:4; Ps. 39:12). It means someone who lives in a foreign place as an alien.

NT parepidēmos occurs 3x in the NT. In 1 Pet. 1:1 and 2:11 this word is applied to believers, calling them "strangers." In the latter it stands in parallel to paroikoi (aliens, → 4230), pointing back to Gen. 23:4 and Ps. 39:12. Because our true home is in heaven (cf. Phil. 3:20), we as God's elect have been drawn out of all natural ties and relations. We now live on earth as exiles.

This call and vocation give rise to the warning to abstain from sinful desires (1 Pet. 2:11). Rather, we are to live according to the decrees and laws of our true homeland. Heb. 11:13 depicts Abraham and the patriarchs as patterns for the Christian. Abraham looked toward the future city (11:10), living as a stranger and exile on the earth.

See also allotrios, alien, hostile (259); diaspora, dispersion (1402); xenos, foreign; stranger, alien (3828); paroikos, stranger, alien (4230).

4216 (parerchomai, go by, pass by), → 2262.

4217 (paresis, letting pass, passing over), → 918.

4220 (parthenia, virginity), → 4221.

4221 παρθένος

παρθένος (parthenos), maiden, virgin (4221); παρθενία (parthenia), virginity (4220).

CL & OT 1. As in many centers of culture, virginity was esteemed highly among the Gks. In religion virginity is a characteristic of many goddesses; e.g., the Gk. goddess Athene or Parthenos (whose Athenian temple was called the Parthenon) was not born of a woman. In apparent variance with virginity, these goddesses, esp. Artemis, were often the guardians of birth, motherhood, and the fertility of the land and animals. Here the emphasis lies less on chastity than on youthful vitality with its magical power.

2. Heb. has two main words for maiden (ʿalmâ and bᵉtûlâ). parthenos (64x in LXX) is used primarily to translate bᵉtûlâ (44x), which means an untouched maiden. Like a young man, she is the embodiment of hope (cf. Amos 8:13), so the word can serve as a designation of Israel (5:2), Jerusalem, (Lam. 1:15), and Zion (2:13). ʿalmâ denotes a young girl or a woman from the age of puberty (cf. Prov. 30:19) until she gives birth to her first child. Only twice is this word translated by parthenos (Gen. 24:43; Isa. 7:14). In Gen. 24:43 ʿalmâ refers to a virgin (cf. 24:16), though it is debated whether the word itself carries this meaning. In Isa. 7:14 it may likewise be questioned whether a virgin as such is implied, for otherwise bᵉtûlâ would most likely have been used (see further, Emmanouēl, Immanuel, 1842). It is interesting to note that other Gk. translations (e.g., Theod., Aquila, Sym.) have neanis (young girl, a word not used in the NT) instead of parthenos here.

NT 1. parthenos occurs 15x in the NT. It carries a general meaning in the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1, 7, 11). In Acts 21:9 unmarried daughters are meant. Lk. 2:36 speaks of Anna living with her husband seven years after her parthenia (i.e., her marriage and its subsequent loss of virginity).

2. (a) In Rev. 14:4 parthenos probably means those who, in contrast to the promiscuous and idolaters, are able to devote themselves entirely to the Lamb. In 2 Cor. 11:2 Paul hopes that he may be able to present the church to the coming Lord as a "pure virgin," i.e., people who have not cast about for another Savior.

(b) The precise meaning of parthenos in 1 Cor. 7:25, 28 is debated. Some scholars think that the term refers to married women whose spiritual ideals cause them to live as virgins; but since Paul describes this situation in 7:1–7 and does not use parthenos there, that interpretation is unlikely. In 7:25–38, the couples in question are not married. More likely Paul has in mind the relation of a man to his betrothed, who is a virgin in the ordinary sense.

(c) Where the NT speaks of Mary as a virgin, it has in mind the period up to the birth of Jesus. Statements regarding Jesus' supernatural conception are limited to the nativity narratives in Matt. 1 and Lk. 1. Jesus' divine sonship is based on a miracle that went beyond the experience of Elizabeth (Lk. 1:36). Matt. adds a quotation from Isa. 7:14 and indicates Jesus' conception as fulfilling OT prophecy. Matt.'s genealogy denotes Mary's legal relation to Joseph, since for the sake of his Davidic sonship Jesus must pass legally for a son of Joseph (1:16; cf. Lk. 3:23). In spite of its importance in Christian theology, Paul makes no explicit reference to the virgin birth (see Rom. 1:3; Gal. 4:4, for his references to the birth of Jesus).

See also gynē, woman (1222); mētēr, mother (3613); chēra, widow (5939).

4225 παρίστημι

παρίστημι (paristēmi), place, put at the disposal of, present (4225).

CL & OT The basic meaning of paristēmi is (trans.) place beside, (intrans.) stand beside, and (mid.) place before oneself. Various nuances developed, such as: (trans.)

put down, place at someone's disposal, bring (a sacrifice); (intrans.) approach (the emperor or an enemy), help someone, wait on (as a servant), be present.

The word is used in the LXX about 100x. It could refer to a foreigner entering God's service (Isa. 60:10), a servant standing before a master (a position of honor, cf. 1 Sam. 16:21; 2 Ki. 5:25), and angels (Job 1:6) and martyrs (4 Macc. 17:18) standing before God. The word also expresses God's standing by someone to reveal himself (Exod. 34:5), to help that person (Ps. 109:31), or to charge someone with sin (50:21).

NT 1. In the NT paristēmi is used intrans. of Paul's standing before Caesar (Acts 27:24) or humanity's standing before God's judgment (Rom. 14:10). God supported Paul by standing at his side (2 Tim. 4:17), an angel stood beside Paul (Acts 27:23), and Phoebe was to be supported by the local church (Rom. 16:2). Gabriel stands before God (Lk. 1:19) (note that in heaven, only God sits; all created beings must stand before him).

2. The trans. use is found primarily in Acts and Paul's letters. In Lk. 2:22 it denotes the presentation of Jesus to the Lord in the temple (cf. Exod. 13:2). Passages where paristēmi is used in the sense of make or present are of special importance. Col. 1:22 implies that because of Jesus' death, a new, holy community is being presented to God. Since Christ is perfect, the church can also be presented perfect to God (1:28). Just as Jesus presented himself as alive after Easter to his apostles in various appearances (Acts 1:3), so God will present believers raised to a new life with Jesus in his presence (2 Cor. 4:14). By his self-sacrifice Christ has presented the church in the splendor of a bride (Eph. 5:27; cf. 2 Cor. 11:2; Col. 1:22). Similarly, we should do our best to present ourselves as approved to God (2 Tim. 2:15).

Neither the supposed freedom of those who think themselves strong nor the scrupulous self-denial of those weak in faith will "bring us near to God" (1 Cor. 8:8). Rather, the members that were once yielded to impurity are now to be offered to God in the service of righteousness (Rom. 6:13–19). Those who have been justified by faith "offer" their bodies to God as living sacrifices (12:1). Paul may be adopting Hel. sacrificial terminology here for Christian service to Jesus as Lord.

See also kathistēmi, bring, appoint (2770); horizō, determine, appoint (3988); procheirizō, determine, appoint (4741); tassō, arrange, appoint (5435); tithēmi, put, place, set, appoint (5502); prothesmia, appointed date (4607); cheirotoneō, appoint (5936); lanchanō, obtain as by lot (3275).

4228 (paroikeō, inhabit as a stranger, live beside), → 4230.

4229 (paroikia, the stay of a noncitizen in a strange place), → 4230.

4230 πάροικος

πάροικος (paroikos), stranger, alien (4230); παροικέω (paroikeō), inhabit as a stranger, live beside (4228); παροικία (paroikia), the stay of a noncitizen in a strange place (4229).

CL & OT 1. paroikos is a compound of para (by) and oikos (house). It was originally an adj. but was later used as a noun meaning neighbor, noncitizen, one who lives among citizens without having citizen rights yet enjoying the protection of the community. The vb. paroikeo means to live beside, inhabit as a stranger. paroikia means sojourning.

2. In the LXX paroikos occurs over 30x, translating gēr and tôšāb, both words meaning an alien or stranger. paroikeō occurs over 60x, esp. as the equivalent of gûr, to sojourn. paroikia is found 16x. Words in this group designate non-Israelites who lived in Israel (2 Sam. 4:3; Isa. 16:4). The Israelites had definite obligations to resident aliens. For example, an adequate living should be made possible for them (Lev. 25:35–47). They were allowed to share the food of the Sabbath year (25:6), although they were prohibited from eating the Passover lamb (Exod. 12:45) or the sacrificial gift (Lev. 22:10). They had the right of asylum (Num. 35:15), and, like widows and orphans, they stood under the protection of the law (cf. Exod. 22:21). The devout, even if aliens, could live in the tent of Yahweh (Ps. 15) and so experience fellowship with him. Ezek. 47:22–23 promises the equality of Israelites and resident aliens. Still, resident aliens also had obligations. For example, they were required to keep the Sabbath (Exod. 20:10).

Repeated stress in the OT was laid on the fact that the patriarchs were aliens (Gen. 12:10; 17:8; 19:9; 20:1; 23:4; 35:27; 47:4; Exod. 6:4). Moses was an alien in Midian (2:22), as was the entire nation of Israel in Egypt. Israel's attitude toward aliens was to be motivated by this fact (cf. 22:21; 23:9). In one sense the Israelites were always aliens, even when they lived in the promised land (1 Chr. 29:15; Ps. 39:12; 119:19, 54; 120:5; 3 Macc. 7:19). The earth and soil of Palestine, as indeed the whole earth (cf. Ps. 24:1), belongs to Yahweh. For this reason the land could not be sold (Lev. 25:23).

3. For Philo, the godly man is a paroikos, for he lives far off from his heavenly home. Philo combined the ancient world's denial of the world with OT ideas.

NT The words of this group are found only in Lk., Acts, Eph., Heb., and 1 Pet. Each passage contains a quotation or reference to the history of Israel (cf. Acts 7:29 with Exod. 2:15; Acts 7:6 with Gen. 15:13). In Acts 13:16–17 Paul recalls Israel's paroikia in Egypt, while Heb. 11:9–10 stresses that Abraham lived as an alien in the promised land as in a foreign country, since by faith he was a citizen of the heavenly city. The same thought occurs in the use of xenos (→ 3828) and parepidēmos (→ 4215) in 11:13. In Jesus Christ Gentile believers are no longer xenoi and paroikoi, but fellow citizens with the saints and members of God's household. Consequently, the promises made to Israel and the call to the kingdom of God are also valid for them (Eph. 2:19).

From this point of view, Christians are also in a new sense paroikoi and parepidēmoi here on earth—hence the warning to abstain from sinful desires (1 Pet. 2:11). They are to live in their time of sojourning in the fear of God (1:17). paroikeō means "live" only in Lk. 24:18. Perhaps even here the thought is that the "visitor" in question is a member of the Jewish dispersion living at Jerusalem, or that he is a pilgrim temporarily staying in the city to attend the Passover.

See also allotrios, alien, hostile (259); diaspora, dispersion (1402); xenos, foreign; stranger, alien (3828); parepidēmos, staying for a while in a strange place; stranger, resident alien (4215).

4231 παροιμία

παροιμία (paroimia), proverb, wise saying; dark saying, riddle (4231).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. a paroimia states an accepted truth in a short and pointed form, expressing general timeless truth (e.g., a proverb). Its popular and traditional form distinguishes it from the aphorism and the maxim (gnōmē; → ginōskō, 1182). Aristotle linked it with metaphor because of its vivid imagery; others, with fable.

2. In the LXX paroimia occurs only 7x (Prov. 1:1; 25:1; Sir. 6:35; 8:8; 18:29; 39:3; 47:17; see also the title to Prov.). In these two books it is virtually a technical term for instruction by the wise. Philo uses it with the meaning proverb.

NT 1. The Gospels contain many sayings of Jesus that are similar to the OT instruction of the wise (e.g., Matt. 5:13–15; Mk. 9:50). Proverbs are also quoted in some of the NT letters (e.g., Rom. 12:20, quoting Prov. 25:21–22; Heb. 12:5–6, quoting Prov. 3:11–12). In 1 Cor. 15:33 Paul actually quotes a secular proverb from Menander's lost comedy Thais: "Bad company corrupts good character." But in none of these instances is paroimia used. The only occurrence of this word in that sense is in 2 Pet. 2:22, where Peter quotes two "proverbs ... 'A dog returns to its vomit,' and, 'A sow that is washed goes back to her wallowing in the mud.'" Both are intended to demonstrate the contemptible conduct of false teachers.

2. In Jn. paroimia occurs in the sense of fig. saying or riddle (Jn. 10:6; 16:25, 29). This meaning reflects the Heb. equivalent māšāl and the consequent approximation to parabolē (→ 4130). In retrospect Jesus' discourse on the shepherd (10:6) and, indeed, his discourses in general (16:25), are characterized as fig., somewhat obscure sayings. They stand in contrast to the later, clear revelatory sayings (16:25, 29). The former are not difficult to understand because words are difficult, but because the hearer tries to understand them intellectually rather than in the light of Jesus and his kingdom. Those who have a relationship with Jesus understand his words "plainly" or "clearly" (16:25, 29; → parrēsia, 4244).

See also parabolē, type, figure, parable (4130).

4232 (paroinos, given to drunkenness), → 3501.

4234 (paromoiazo, be like), → 3927.

4235 (paromoios, like, similar), → 3927.

4236 (paroxynō, provoke to anger), → 3973.

4239 (parorgizō, enrage, make angry), → 3973.

4240 (parorgismos, anger), → 3973.

4242 παρουσία

παρουσία (parousia), presence, appearing, coming, advent (4242); πάρειμι (pareimi), be present, have come (4205).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. pareimi covers both the pres. tense idea of "being there" and the perf. idea of "having come." parousia means, therefore, both presence or (in a more neutral sense) property, fortune, military strength; and arrival, someone's coming in order to be present. Technically the noun was used for the arrival of a king, emperor, or ruler (the corresponding Lat. term is adventus). From this it is an easy step to speak of an appearing of the gods on behalf of human beings. Such a parousia is not thought of merely as future, but is experienced as a reality in the present.

2. The Greek translations of the OT use the vb. pareimi for seven different Heb. words, most of which mean to come (e.g., Num. 22:20; 1 Sam. 9:6; 2 Sam. 5:23; 13:35; Isa. 30:13; Lam. 4:18). The noun parousia is virtually absent from the LXX (Jdg. 10:18; 2 Macc. 8:12; 15:21; 3 Macc. 3:17; it occurs in some MSS. of Neh. 2:6). Nevertheless, the idea is there, for from the earliest times the OT speaks of the coming of God: God manifests himself in victory (Jdg. 5:4), in dreams (Gen. 20:3), in his Spirit (Num. 24:2), with his hand (1 Ki. 18:46), in his word (2 Sam. 7:4), and in the last days (Isa. 2:2; → hēmera, 2465). God also comes as king of the world (Exod. 15:18; Ps. 24:7–10; 95:3–4). There are also references to the coming of the anointed one (Zech. 9:9–10).

Important for the NT view is the expectation of God's coming in the Jewish apocalyptic texts (whose present texts may have Christian influence). Note, for example:

"A king shall arise out of Judah and shall establish a new priesthood for all the Gentiles after the fashion of the Gentiles. And his appearing is greatly desired as a prophet of the Most High, of the seed of Abraham our father" (T. Levi 8:14–15; see also T. Jud. 22:2; 1 Enoch 38:2; 49:4). Josephus uses parousia to mean the presence of God in the Shekinah, which is revealed to his people and even to the pagan governor, Petronius. Philo says virtually nothing about a coming of Yahweh or the Messiah.

NT 1. (a) Paul uses pareimi with the meaning to be present. He distinguishes his personal, bodily absence (apeimi) from his being present (pareimi) in spirit (1 Cor. 5:3); the latter also refers to his presence in Corinth (2 Cor. 10:2, 11; 11:9; 13:2, 10) and among the Galatians (Gal. 4:18, 20; cf. Jn. 11:28; Acts 10:33; 24:19; Rev. 17:8). In Col. 1:6 the apostle refers to the gospel "that has come to you." Similarly in Jn. 7:6 the time has not yet come (→ kairos, opportunity, 2789). In Heb. 12:11 the vb. is used in an expression that means "at the time," that is, for the present moment.

(b) The noun parousia occurs 24x in the NT, of which 14 are in Paul. It denotes generally presence and arrival, though Paul is the only NT writer to use it in this way. He rejoices over the presence of Stephanas (1 Cor. 16:17); he is comforted by God through the arrival of Titus (2 Cor. 7:6–7); he speaks of his coming to Philippi (Phil. 1:26; 2:12) and suffers the reproach of being strong in his letters but weak in his personal presence and speech (2 Cor. 10:10).

2. In its special NT sense, parousia is linked with NT eschatology. Jesus proclaimed the kingdom of God as imminent and his parousia (Matt. 24:3, 27, 37, 39) as having a decisive effect on how we are to live now in the light of this coming event (cf. also Mk. 13:26; Lk. 17:23–24). Though the present and the future are viewed as a chronological succession, the future affects the present, not in the sense of being already realized in the present, but in the sense that we make our decisions as those who must give account at the imminent appearing of the kingdom of God.

With Jesus' death and resurrection, the idea of the parousia becomes bound up with the church's expectation of Christ's appearing at the end of the age. Where Christ's presence and the present experience of salvation are stressed (e.g., Gal. 2:20), the parousia may be relativized to some degree in that its blessings are already being experienced here and now (cf. Jn. 6:39–40; 11:24, 26). It is true that the delay of the parousia led to difficulties in the church, but believers remained confident in Christ's salvation and agreed that his parousia would come suddenly (cf. Lk. 17:23–24; 1 Thess. 5:1–11). Note that other words are also used to describe the parousia of Christ (e.g., hēmera, day, 2465; epiphaneia, appearance, 2211).

The earliest NT passage that speaks of the parousia is 1 Thess. 4:15: "According to the Lord's own word, we tell you that we who are still alive, who are left till the coming [parousia] of the Lord, will certainly not precede those who have fallen asleep." Paul's reference to "the Lord's own word" may have in view Matt. 24:30–31, an otherwise unknown saying of Jesus, a private revelation to Paul (2 Cor. 12:1–4; Gal. 1:12), or a statement of what the apostle believes accords with the mind of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 2:16; 7:10, 12). Here resurrection and parousia are closely intertwined, for when the latter occurs believers who have previously died will have no disadvantage, nor will the living enjoy any advantage.

Paul expresses a similar thought in 1 Cor. 15:23, where he reflects on the decisive moment: "But each in his own turn: Christ, the firstfruits; then, when he comes [lit., at his coming, parousia], those who belong to him." The parousia will involve different categories of people, but it does not follow that the apostle has in mind two resurrections of the dead, an intervening millennial kingdom, or a systematic, chronological sequence of eschatological events. Paul breaks with traditional apocalyptic ideas by insisting that eschatology is already being worked out: Believers are to live not in sadness but in hope (1 Thess. 4:13; 5:23). And although separated from the Thessalonian church, Paul can still describe this church as his "hope," "joy," and crown of boasting "in the presence of our Lord Jesus when he comes" (1 Thess. 2:19).

In 2 Thess. we see a different situation. A tension is apparent here between the presence of Christ experienced right now and the parousia at some future date (2 Thess. 2:2). Evidently some claimed that "the day of the Lord has already come," purporting to have communication from Paul to this effect (2:2). Others made the imminence of the return of the Lord an excuse for idleness, to which Paul replied: "For even when we were with you, we gave you this rule: If a man will not work, he shall not eat" (3:10). The letter thus attacks those who claimed a present experience of events that in reality were still future. This leads Paul to give a vehement warning about Satan and the parousia of the lawless one, which will take place before the parousia of Christ (2:7–12).

3. The delay in Christ's parousia led people to question whether that day would ever come. In this situation Jas. 5:7–8 calls for patience "until the Lord's coming." After using the example of a farmer patiently waiting for a harvest, James goes on: "Be patient and stand firm, because the Lord's coming is near." Likewise, in 2 Pet. 1:16 and 3:4–12 believers are urged to continue expecting the parousia despite the fact that so far nothing has happened.

Matt. presents a dialectical tension. On the one hand, Jesus is present whenever his church assembles (18:20) and is with his people to the end of the age as they spread the gospel (28:20). On the other hand, the coming of the Son of Man is still future (24:39), its date being unknown to anyone (24:36). His coming will occur suddenly, when people are living entirely for the present (24:27, 37–38). This tension between the already and the not yet permeates much of the NT teaching about the parousia (→ aiōn, age, 172).

See also hēmera, day (2465); marana tha, maranatha (3448).

4244 παρρησία

παρρησία (parrēsia), openness, confidence, boldness, frankness (4244); παρρησιάζομαι (parrēsiazomai), speak out, speak openly, speak boldly (4245).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. parrēsia referred to freedom of speech. In practice this freedom encountered opposition from time to time, so the word acquired the further meaning of boldness, frankness. A negative overtone is also perceptible in some cases where freedom of speech has been misused to the point of bluntness and shamelessness. In an extended sense parrēsia can mean confidence and joyfulness. The corresponding vb. parrēsiazomai means to speak openly or boldly, and to have confidence.

2. (a) In the LXX this word group occurs rarely (parrēsia, 12x; parrēsiazomai, 6x), and in most cases there is no corresponding Heb. word. The concept is used both of God and of those who stand over against him. It is used of God in Ps. 94:1, where parrēsiazomai translates a Heb. vb. meaning shine forth: God is called on to shine forth as the avenger and requite the ungodly of their wickedness. A link between such a manifestation of God and divine utterance is given in Prov. 1:20, where the LXX reads, "In the broad places of a city [wisdom] acts with confidence."

(b) parrēsia occurs in Job 27:10, where the LXX reads: "Or when trouble comes upon him, has he any confidence [parrēsia] before [God]?" The vb. features in 22:26:

"Then you will have confidence before the Lord and look up to heaven with cheerfulness." The remaining instances of parrēsia occur at Lev. 26:13; Est. 8:13; Prov. 10:10; 13:5; Wis. 5:1; Sir. 25:25; 1 Macc. 4:18; 3 Macc. 4:1; 7:12; 4 Macc. 10:5; of parrēsiazomai at Ps. 12:5; Prov. 20:9; Song 8:10; Sir. 6:11.

NT parrēsia occurs 31x in the NT; parrēsiazomai, 9x. The two words vary in meaning from the equivalent of eleutheria, freedom, to elpis, hope.

1. In Jn. parrēsia is used in the unique sense of openly, in public: "Here he is, speaking publicly, and they are not saying a word to him" (7:26; cf. 11:54; 18:20; also Mk. 8:32). In each of these passages in Jn. the word refers to Jesus' boldness in teaching in public. In Jn. 7:4, Jesus' brothers urge him to do something in public in order to convince them of his power. By contrast 7:13 reports that no one spoke of Jesus openly for fear of the Jews.

When Jesus spoke openly in public, parrēsia can also mean that he spoke unambiguously and plainly, not in allusions (Jn. 11:14; cf. 10:24–25) or veiled parables (16:29). But Jesus spoke so freely only for believers (16:25, 29), while to the world he spoke in parables (→ paroimia, 4231), which could not be understood without faith. Hence, there is a tension between parrēsia and paroimia, which corresponds to the Johannine dualism of life and death, truth and the lie, etc., which demands a decision and can only be resolved in faith.

2. Corresponding to the parrēsia of Jesus, there is the open and authoritative testimony of the apostles. Again and again Acts reports how fearlessly Peter, Paul, and others stand before the Jews or Gentiles and proclaim the works of God (parrēsia in Acts 2:29; 4:13, 29, 31; 28:31; parrēsiazomai in 9:27–28; 13:46; 14:3; 18:26; 19:8; 26:26). This boldness evokes astonishment (4:13), division (14:3–4), and persecution (9:27). It is not something that one has under one's control; rather, it is the fruit of the Holy Spirit (4:31) that has to be sought again and again (4:29).

3. This is the view of the parrēsia of the witness taken by Paul. It characterizes effective preaching of the mysteries of God (Eph. 6:19) and the honoring of Christ in life and death (Phil. 1:20). Since perseverance is demanded of the disciple (cf. Eph. 6:20), parrēsia has here also the sense of boldness and courage (1 Thess. 2:2). Such courage is not a human quality; it comes from God (2:2) and Christ (Phlm. 8).

We should approach the future not in fear of judgment but in full confidence, in openness to God, and in the hope of the fullness of God's glory (cf. 2 Cor. 3:11–12). We should abide in Christ (Heb. 3:6; 10:35; 1 Jn. 2:28), who has already triumphed over the principalities and the powers in "public" (Col. 2:15) and made possible access into the Most Holy Place (Heb. 10:19; cf. 4:16). Those who persevere in faith hold to Christ in love (cf. 1 Jn. 4:17; cf. also the emphasis laid on assurance gained through faithful service, 1 Tim. 3:13), and those who are not condemned by their own hearts will have "confidence" in prayer (1 Jn. 3:21; 5:14). Moreover, they will also "be confident and unashamed before him at his coming" (2:28). Thus, parrēsia contains the ideas of trust in God, certainty of salvation, power to pray, and hope for the future.

4245 (parrēsiazomai, speak out openly, speak boldly), → 4244.

4246 πᾶς

πᾶς (pas), each, all, the whole (4246); ἅπας (hapas), all, the whole (570).

NT pas as an adj. in the sing. (a) without the art., means each; (b) before a noun with the art., means all (e.g., "all Judea" in Matt. 3:5); (c) between the art. and noun, means the whole, all (e.g., "the entire law" in Gal. 5:14). Here the stress lies on the sum total as opposed to the parts, the complete as opposed to the separated portions. pas in the pl. means all.

pas as a noun means each, everyone; linked with tis it means any. to pan means all, the whole, the main point. The neut. pl. panta means all, ta panta, all this (2 Cor. 4:15), all things (Rom. 11:36; Col. 1:16–17). hapas is a strengthened form of pas, often used with the same but sometimes with an intensive meaning: the whole, all, everybody.

1. The concept of pas expresses a collective totality; polys (→ 4498) often bears a similar meaning. For the Jews, God alone is one. The world remains a plurality, showing many differences, and is unified only by the creative sovereignty of God over it. This understanding is based on the OT, as 1 Cor. 8:6 shows: "For us there is but one God, the Father, from whom all things (ta panta) came and for whom we live; and there is but one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom all things came and through whom we live." All comes from God and returns to him. God is the beginning and the end, origin, and goal; he has made himself known in his Son.

2. Paul expresses the same point in Rom. 11:36: "For from him and through him and to him are all things (ta panta)" (cf. Isa. 44:24). This witness to the uniqueness and universality of God is fully aware of the first commandment and rejects every power (except, of course, that of Jesus Christ; cf. 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:15–16) that claims to have shared in God's work of creation. Christ is the executor of God's will (1:19–20). All beings exist because he exists, live because he lives, and are under God's rule because he rules them (Jn. 1:3; Col. 1:16–18). Those who separate themselves from the Son cut themselves off from the root of his life.

3. The exaltation of the Son confirms that all authority (→ exousia, 2026) has been given to him (Matt. 28:18). His office as ruler embraces the fullness and majesty of God. Hence, he has authority in heaven, and on earth nothing has power apart from him (Jn. 1:3; Col. 1:15–18; cf. Matt. 11:27).

Our Lord's power over the entire cosmos was not there merely to comfort the disciples. They were to proclaim it in all the world to every creature (Matt. 28:18–20; Mk. 16:15; Col. 1:23). This power gives motive and success to the apostolic preaching, to mission and evangelism. The church is to reach its fulfillment in Christ (Eph. 1:22; Col. 3:11). Eventually the whole creation will recognize and acknowledge Christ as Lord (Phil. 2:9–11). If all authority had not been given him, the proclamation of the gospel would be a fruitless venture. But Christ lifts people from striving after security for their own existence and raises them to participate in the work of the creation.

See also polys, many (4498).

4247 πάσχα

πάσχα (pascha), Passover (4247).

OT pascha is the Gk. transliteration of the Aram. pasḥā', which corresponds to the Heb. pesaḥ. The meaning is not completely clear. Exod. 12:13, 23, 27 indicate a connection with the Heb. pāsaḥ ʿal, pass over, spare. The Gk. word has in origin nothing to do with paschō, to suffer, although a kinship was postulated in the patristic age.

1. In OT and Jewish lit. pascha is used in various senses. It can mean (a) the Passover festival (Exod. 12:11; Num. 9:2), which took place between Nisan 14 and 15 (Lev. 23:5); (b) the animal killed at this festival (Exod. 12: 21; Deut. 16:2); and, in Jud., (c) the seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:6–8).

2. In the OT the Passover festival is associated with the events of Israel's exodus from Egypt (Exod. 12:21–23) and is dedicated as a memorial of this event in the history of God's salvation of his people (12:11–14; Deut. 16:1). The way in which it was observed underwent changes in the course of time, the most radical of which was in connection with the religious reforms of Josiah (621 B.C.). Josiah seems to have nationalized a festival that had earlier been celebrated locally by the individual clans, linking it with the temple worship in Jerusalem (Deut. 16:1–8; 2 Ki. 23:21–23).

3. (a) In NT times the Passover was the chief festival of the year. Thousands of pilgrims from the entire Jewish world streamed to Jerusalem (cf. Lk. 2:41; Jn. 11:55). The Passover meal took place in houses and, because of the great number of those taking part (more than 100,000), also on roofs and in courtyards. It was held in small groups of at least 10 persons and began after sunset on Nisan 15. The killing of the lambs in the inner forecourt of the temple, which was carried out by representatives of the individual groups (the only duty of the priests was the sprinkling of the blood of the lambs on the altar of burnt offering), and the preparation of the Passover meal took place the previous afternoon. The meal itself was eaten reclining.

(b) Numerous traditions developed as to the liturgy of celebration. (i) To begin with, the head of the household spoke a word of dedication over a first cup of wine, from which he and after him all the members of the household drank. Then a preliminary dish was eaten (various herbs with a sauce of fruit purée). After this the main meal (Passover lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and purée, together with wine) was brought in, and a second cup of wine poured out. (ii) Neither of these was touched, however, before the next event of the Passover liturgy took place. The head of the family related the story of Israel's exodus from Egypt (cf. Deut. 26:5–11) and explained the meaning of the special items in the meal (the lamb, the unleavened bread, and the bitter herbs). Then followed communal singing of Ps. 113 and/or 114 (the first part of the Passover Hallel). (iii) The main meal was then eaten, the head of the family introducing this with a prayer over the unleavened bread and ending it with a prayer over a third cup of wine. (iv) The end of the feast, which was not to continue beyond midnight, was formed by singing Ps. 114–117 or 115–118 (the second part of the Passover Hallel) and by a blessing pronounced by the head of the family over a fourth cup of wine.

(c) This feast served in ancient Jud. as a reminder of the redemption of the people from the slavery of the Egyptians and the joy over the freedom thus attained. In addition, it was an occasion for looking forward to the coming redemption to be brought by the Messiah. Passover time, particularly during the Roman occupation of Palestine, was always a time of increased messianic expectation (cf. Mk. 15:7; Lk. 13:1–3; Jn. 6:15).

NT In the NT pascha has the same range of meanings as in contemporary Jud. Its chief meaning is for the Feast of the Passover, including the Feast of Unleavened Bread (e.g., Matt. 26:2; Lk. 2:41; 22:1; Jn. 2:13, 23; 6:4; 11:55; 12:1; Acts 12:4). But the word can also refer to the Passover lamb (Matt. 26:17; Lk. 22:7–8; Jn. 18:28; 1 Cor. 5:7). The expressions "to prepare the Passover" and "to eat the Passover" could also refer to the entire main part of the feast.

1. (a) The only NT reference to the event of the original Passover is at Heb. 11:28. Moses believed God's promise to spare the people on the basis of the Passover blood, and he showed his faith by keeping the Passover.

(b) The Passover background plays a special part in the Passion narrative. All four Gospels record that Jesus' Last Supper, arrest, trial, and condemnation took place at Passover time (Matt. 26–27; Mk. 14; Lk. 22–23; Jn. 18–19). According to the Synoptics, the Last Supper was itself a Passover meal (Mk. 14:12–26 par.), and Jesus was arrested, tried, and condemned on the Passover night and crucified the next day. According to Jn., however, these events happened 24 hours prior to the Passover (cf. 18:28; 19:14), so that the death of Jesus took place at the time when the Passover lambs were killed (the afternoon of Nisan 14).

Some regard John's record as a later alteration of the date, perhaps occasioned by the comparison, found elsewhere in the NT (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:19; cf. Rev. 5:6, 9, 12), of Jesus with the Passover lamb. Others, however, hold that different Jewish groups in the 1st cent. followed different calendars and that John follows a different calendar from the Synoptics.

2. Apparently the early church continued to celebrate the Passover (see Acts 20:6). As in Jud., the feast took place on the evening following Nisan 14 and in expectation of eschatological redemption. As we can see from 1 Cor. 5:7–8 and 1 Pet. 1:13–19, the early church regarded itself as the people of God redeemed in the eschatological Passover. The baptized are exhorted, as were those involved in the first Passover, to live holy lives in readiness to depart (1:13, 17), redeemed "with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (1:19; cf. also 1 Cor. 5:7, "Christ, our Passover lamb"). Likewise, the church receives the call to "keep the Festival" and to cleanse itself from the old yeast, "that you may be a new batch without yeast" (5:7–8). The eschatological Passover feast has begun with Good Friday, and its fulfillment in the return of Christ is awaited at any time in the Passover night.

3. This form and interpretation of the Passover festival disappeared early in the history of the church. During the 2d cent. the celebration of Easter on a Sunday became general, with its emphasis on remembering the sacrificial death of Jesus, the true Passover lamb. This process gives clear expression both to the break between Jud. and Christianity and to the decline of eschatological expectation within the early church.

See also heortē, feast, festival (2038); deipnon, supper, banquet (1270).

4248 πάσχω

πάσχω (paschō), suffer, endure (4248); κακοπάθεια (kakopatheia), suffering (2801); κακοπαθέω (kakopatheō), suffer evil, endure hardship (2802); συγκακοπαθέω (synkakopatheō), endure hardship together with someone (5155); συμπαθέω (sympatheō), have compassion, sympathize with (5217); συμπάσχω (sympaschō), suffer the same thing as, suffer together with, sympathize with (5224); πάθημα (pathēma), suffering, affliction, misfortune (4077); παθητός (pathētos), subject to suffering, capable of suffering (4078); πάθος (pathos), suffering, passion (4079).

CL & OT 1. The basic meaning of paschō is that of experiencing something that stems from outside oneself but that affects me, either for good or ill. (a) This vb. originally meant nothing more than to be affected by; how one was affected was expressed by additional words, e.g., kakōs paschō, to be in a bad situation; eu paschō, to be in a good situation. But since such additions tended to be negative, the vb. itself gradually came to have a negative meaning, unless there were clear indications to the contrary. In most cases it is a matter of being delivered up to an adverse fate or to malevolent gods and humans.

(b) The situation is similar with the noun pathos; it means that which is passively experienced. But for the most part pathos describes the emotions of the soul, i.e., human feelings and impulses one does not produce within oneself but finds already present and by which a person can be carried away. pathos acquired a predominantly negative meaning, that of passion, esp. among the Stoics.

(c) At an early period questions were asked concerning the purpose and meaning of suffering. Salutary lessons can be learned from one's own suffering and that of others; trials can make a person wise, according to Hesiod. The Gk. tragedies teach the profound truth that through suffering we can learn who we are and what station befits us in life.

(d) The Stoics extended the idea of suffering into something universal and cosmological: All nondivine beings are subject to suffering, i.e., are affected by external influences and emotions. But such emotions hinder true knowledge and the practice of virtue, so the passions must be overcome in order that the ideal of "dispassionateness" (apatheia) may be attained.

2. paschō occurs only 22x in the LXX and means to feel compassion (Ezek. 16:5; Zech. 11:5) or to be affected, impressed (Amos 6:6). In spite of its infrequency, however, the ideas expressed by this vb. and its derivatives are clearly present in the OT, where the question of suffering is approached from various angles.

(a) The cause of suffering lies mostly in the inherent causality of an evil deed, which brings its own retribution by virtue of its consequences and so produces suffering. In some cases, the suffering caused by an evil deed can affect a group of people (Gen. 20:3–7; 1 Sam. 14:24–46) or even an entire nation (Jos. 7). But usually the suffering is restricted to the individual, esp. in the wisdom poetry (e.g., Prov. 26:27). Each individual is personally responsible for the moral decisions he or she makes and for any consequences.

(b) These two ideas, however, are not mutually exclusive but indicate that whenever the Israelites were called upon to suffer, they always tried to understand what Yahweh was doing. Since Yahweh is a living God, both good and evil come from him (Job 2:10; Amos 3:6), although he may use secondary causes as well. The OT therefore leaves little room for suffering that is fortuitous (Jdg. 9:23; 1 Ki. 22:19–23; Job 1:1–2:10). Suffering is not regarded anthropologically with a view to obtaining a deeper insight into one's own existence but is instead a matter of God's providence. The story of Joseph, for example, is seen ultimately as God's directing of painful affairs for the ultimate good of his people (cf. Gen. 50:20).

(c) The fact that there is no tension between the problem of suffering as such and the problem of one's own individual suffering is indicated by the psalms of lament, which show the psalmist overwhelmed with every conceivable kind of trouble (e.g., Ps. 22). Such psalms are not biographies of the psalmist, nor do they give allegorical accounts of his spiritual experiences; rather, they are liturgical formularies for common use within the OT community. Important for the psalmist is not the analysis of his personal sufferings but his experience of comfort from the priestly oracle or from seeking refuge in Yahweh (e.g., 17:8).

3. The issue of the purpose of suffering is one that emerges only in the course of time. (a) Prov. 12:1; 13:1 refer to its educational value: Suffering improves character.

(b) The book of Job in particular is radical and uncompromising in its attitude toward suffering. In his own case Job sees no causal connection between guilt and suffering (6:24) but recognizes that humans cannot enter into litigation with Almighty God (9:32–33). Thus, the book ends with a hymn in which God declares his own omnipotence; his inscrutable wisdom reduces humankind to silence even in the face of unaccountable suffering (38:1–42:6). For who can claim to understand the mysteries of human life or presume to give God counsel or reproof? Thus this book challenges us not to offer blind allegiance to a theological scheme linking sin with suffering, but rather to submit to God.

(c) A further aspect of the suffering of the innocent is the exemplary suffering endured by chosen individuals (e.g., Moses, Num. 11:11; Elijah, 1 Ki. 19; Hosea, Hos. 1–3; Jeremiah, Jer. 15:10; 18:18; 20:14–18), men whose very office exposed them to suffering. The Israelites refused the prophet's message and thus rejected the God from whom the message came. Hence the fate experienced by the prophets demonstrates Israel's hostility to Yahweh. In other words, Yahweh's own suffering as a result of his people's sin is exemplified in the suffering of certain chosen individuals.

(d) The concept of vicarious suffering comes to a climax in Isa.'s message concerning the suffering servant (→ pais, son, servant, 4090). His suffering is seen as punishment for the sins of others (53:4–6).

(e) In Wisdom of Solomon the educational aspect of suffering once again emerges (12:22). Israel's enemies suffer by way of punishment and warning (12:20, 25–27). When God's children suffer, God is carefully leading them to repentance (12:19, 21). However, the educational aspects of suffering receive less emphasis than its teleological and redemptive aspects. According to 2 Macc., even the God-fearing suffer as punishment for their sins (7:18, 32), though joy comes from suffering as a martyr "in the fear of God" (6:30).

4. (a) Josephus frequently deals with this subject. He sees the possibility of pious Jews suffering any extreme for their law. paschō in his writings usually has the sense of to endure, suffer punishment, or even suffer death.

(b) But not all suffering leads to death. In rab. Jud., esp. after the destruction of Jerusalem and the consequent cessation of the sacrifices, atoning power was attributed to all suffering for sin; since suffering was intended to lead the sinner to repentance, one could only thank God for it. Further, the rabbis developed a doctrine of vicarious suffering and of meritorious suffering. In fact, earthly sufferings could mitigate retribution in the world to come (cf. 1 Pet. 4:1). Thus the righteous could actually see God's love at work in their sufferings, while the unrighteous, having no sufferings to bear, were deprived of the chance to make amends. Gen. Rab. 44:6 on Gen. 15:1 contains the statement (perhaps directed against Christianity) that in every generation there is one righteous man who makes atonement for sin through his sufferings.

NT 1. (a) The vb. paschō is used 42x in the NT, most often in the Synoptic Gospels, Acts, Heb., and 1 Pet. The noun pathēma occurs 16x (in Paul, 1 Pet., and Heb.). synkakopatheō (2 Tim. 1:8; 2:3) and kakopatheō (2:9; 4:5) occur with reference to suffering as followers of Christ; in addition, kakopatheō is used more generally in Jas. 5:13. The adj. pathētos occurs only in Acts 26:23 (Christ was subject to suffering), while sympatheō is used 2x, that the exalted Christ (Heb. 4:15) and his people (10:34) are able to exercise compassion. pathos occurs only in Rom. 1:26; Col. 3:5; 1 Thess. 4:5.

Since the Synoptic Gospels are, in a sense, passion accounts extended both backward and forward in time, it is striking how little use they make of paschō and pathēma. In Jn. the whole life of the incarnate Logos is presented as his passion (cf. 1:5, 11), through which he is glorified. Despite this emphasis, however, Jn. makes no use of this word group, so that the importance of the passion idea in the NT cannot be inferred from mere statistics of specific words.

(b) There are only a few places where paschō and its derivatives are used in a general sense. Pilate's wife is badly frightened by a dream (Matt. 27:19), and the woman with the issue of blood has suffered a great deal at the hands of many physicians (Mk.

5:26; cf. also Lk. 13:2; Acts 28:5; Gal. 3:4). In the main, however, the word group serves to describe the suffering of Christ and of his disciples.

2. The suffering of Christ. (a) paschō has a twofold use in reference to Jesus' passion. (i) It can refer exclusively to his death, esp. in phrases in which, although death is not explicitly mentioned, his suffering stands alongside something else, such as his resurrection (Lk. 24:46; Acts 3:18; cf. 3:15; 17:3), his entrance into glory (Lk. 24:26), or his showing himself alive (Acts 1:3). In such passages his suffering is pathēma tou thanatou (Heb. 2:9, lit., "suffering of death"), i.e., death itself (13:12).

(ii) In the statements where the forthcoming sufferings of Christ are first announced (e.g., Mk. 8:31; 9:12), the phrase "suffer many things" probably refers to those sufferings prior to his trial before the high priest and not to his death. Note how Jesus' being killed receives separate mention as the third element of the four mentioned. Lk. 17:25, however, has only "suffer many things" and "be rejected." Matt. extends the scope of "suffer many things" to include Christ's sufferings up to and including his death, for Jesus is to suffer these things "at the hands of the elders, chief priests and teachers of the law" (16:21).

(b) The NT strongly insists that Christ's passion is no accident but is of divine necessity (→ dei, it is necessary, 1256; cf. Matt. 16:21; Lk. 13:33; 17:25; 24:26; Acts 17:3) and has been predicted in the OT (Mk. 9:12; Lk. 24:26; Acts 3:18; 1 Pet. 1:11). Thus, the author of Heb. says that, like the OT sin offering (Lev. 16:27), Jesus suffered outside the gate of Jerusalem (Heb. 13:11–13).

(c) Christ's suffering acquires its soteriological significance from the fact that it is substitutionary in character: He is the atoning sacrifice for our sins (Heb. 13:12; 1 Pet. 2:21). This is proved by quotations from Isa. 53 (cf. 1 Pet. 2:22, 24 with Isa. 53:9, 5). Thus through his death (Heb. 2:9–10), Christ becomes the author (archēgos; → archē, 794) of our salvation (sōtēria, salvation, → 5401).

(d) The uniqueness of Christ's sufferings follows from this, as is shown by the fact that in the Synoptics Christ uses paschō only to refer to his own coming passion. Heb. also uses the vb. only in connection with Christ (but cf. the noun in 10:32) and emphasizes the uniqueness, all-sufficiency, and completeness of his atoning sacrifice (see 7:27; 9:12; cf. Rom. 6:10; 1 Pet. 3:18).

(e) Christ's vicarious suffering does not mean for his followers, however, deliverance from earthly suffering but deliverance for earthly suffering. He has suffered and been tempted as we are (Heb. 2:18), yet he was without sin (4:15); indeed, since Christ has shared in all his people's experiences, he is able as the exalted one to "sympathize with [their] weaknesses" (sympatheō, 4:15). His suffering was a test that he was called on to undergo and in which he learned obedience (5:8). Having been tested by suffering, he is our pattern and example (1 Pet. 2:21). His suffering requires us as his followers to walk a similar path (Heb. 13:12–13; 1 Pet. 2:21).

(f) Christ is described as pathētos, subject to suffering, only in Acts 26:23. As suffering and resurrection are mentioned together, the thought here is similar to that in Lk. 24:26 and Acts 17:3. Hence, the question is not whether Christ, being God, could suffer. This was a post-NT discussion inspired because of the heresy of Docetism, which argued from his deity that Jesus was unable to suffer. Such thinking never became a part of orthodox Christianity.

3. The suffering of Christ's people. (a) Suffering and fellowship. The idea of suffering is inseparable from the NT concept of koinōnia (fellowship, → 3126). Thus, those who arm themselves with the mind Christ must suffer in the flesh (1 Pet. 4:1; cf. 2 Cor. 11:23–29). To suffer "as a Christian" (1 Pet. 4:16) means to share in the sufferings of Christ (Phil. 3:10; 1 Pet. 4:13), to suffer with him (sympaschō, Rom. 8:17). Indeed, such a mystic union exists between Christ and his body that the sufferings of believers may be identified as one and the same (2 Cor. 1:5). Different churches are united by the bonds of common suffering (1 Thess. 2:14; 1 Pet. 5:9), and the same applies to any individual church. If the members of a fellowship are to show not merely sympathy with one another but active and practical compassion (sympaschō), then true unity in the faith is required (1 Cor. 12:26; Heb. 10:34).

Fellowship in suffering can also exist between the apostle and the local church (2 Cor. 1:6–7) or the apostle and an individual disciple (2 Tim. 1:8; 2:3). The great example of this process is Jesus Christ (1 Pet. 2:21), not only for an apostle himself as a "witness of Christ's sufferings" (1 Pet. 5:1), but also for those who follow an apostle (2 Tim. 3:10–11) or who are called on to imitate an apostle (1 Cor. 11:1). Just as the prophets were good examples of how to endure unjust suffering (kakopatheia, Jas. 5:10), so now the apostles set a good example. Their sufferings are part of their ministry (→ diakoneō, serve, 1354) and serve to identify the true servants of the church (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23–29). What Paul suffers for the church is not redemptive but missionary (Col. 1:24).

But not all suffering is fellowship with the sufferings of Christ. For suffering to be in this category, the apostles and the church must suffer for the sake of their office or of their Christian calling; i.e., they must suffer as Christians (1 Pet. 4:16), unjustly (2:19–20), and not as evildoers or murderers (4:15; cf. Lk. 23:32–33)—who suffer justly. True suffering in this sense is called suffering "according to God's will" (1 Pet. 4:19), "for [the] name" of Jesus Christ (Acts 9:16; Phil. 1:29), "for the gospel" (2 Tim. 1:8), "for what is right" (1 Pet. 3:14), and for "the kingdom of God" (2 Thess. 1:5).

(b) The eschatological aspect of suffering. Just as Christ's suffering was not an end in itself but a means to a great end, perfection (Heb. 2:10), the same applies to his people (1 Pet. 5:9). The goal for which Christians suffer is that of God's kingdom. Compared with the hope of "eternal glory," this present period of suffering shrinks to "a little while" (5:10). In Rom. 8:18 Paul emphasizes that the sufferings of the present bear no comparison with future glory, so that even suffering may be regarded as a precious gift (Phil. 1:29; 1 Pet. 2:19) from "the God of all grace" (5:10).

Paul speaks of the aim of his new life as being to enter experimentally into the knowledge (first) of the power of Christ's resurrection, and (only then) of the fellowship of his sufferings (Phil. 3:10). Again and again in the NT suffering and glory (Rom. 8:17; 1 Pet. 5:1, 10), as well as suffering and patience (2 Thess. 1:4–5; Heb. 10:32), are mentioned in the same breath. Indeed, Paul can take the idea of suffering as being temporary because it is advancing toward final glory, and he extends it to cover the whole of creation (Rom. 8:18–25). Thus believers await not the end of suffering but its goal.

4250 (patassō, strike, hit), → 3463.

4251 (pateō, tread, trample), → 4344.

4252 πατήρ

πατήρ (patēr), father (4252); πατριά (patria), family, clan (4255); πατρίς (patris), fatherland, homeland, home city (4258); ἀπάτωρ (apatōr), fatherless (574).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. patēr means not only father but also the patriarch of a family or (in the pl.) ancestors generally. In a fig. sense patēr is used as a title of respect for a venerable old man. It also denotes intellectual or spiritual fatherhood, so that a philosopher may be called the "father" of his followers, and in the mystery religions the one who conducts the ceremony of initiation can be described as "father" of the newly initiated.

patria, lineage, clan, indicates descent from the same father and ancestral patriarch (cf. Lk. 2:4; Acts 3:25; Eph. 3:15); patris means fatherland (cf. Jn. 4:44; Heb. 11:14) or home city (cf. Matt. 13:54, 57; Lk. 4:23); and apatōr means fatherless (see Heb. 7:3). The last term is used of orphans, children born out of wedlock, outcasts, and outlaws. Whenever gods are described as "fatherless," the word denotes their miraculous origin.

2. (a) The use of the title "father" for a deity in the religions of the ancient world is based on mythical ideas of an original act of begetting and the natural, physical descent of all humans from God. Thus the god El of Ugarit was called "father of humankind," and the Gk. Zeus "father of humans and gods." In Egypt the pharaoh was regarded as the son of the deity in a physical sense. The term father denotes above all the absolute authority of one who can demand obedience, but at the same time his merciful love, goodness, and care. People should respond by recognizing their own powerlessness and dependence on the deity and should trust and love him.

(b) The idea of the fatherhood of God is given a philosophical interpretation in Plato and the Stoics. The former, in his cosmological elaboration of the father idea, emphasizes the creator relationship of God, the "universal father," to the entire cosmos. According to Stoic teaching, Zeus's authority as father pervades the universe; he is the creator, father, and sustainer of human beings.

(c) In the ancient mystery cults the regeneration and deification of the initiate is seen as an act of begetting by the deity; hence the latter is invoked in prayer as "father."

(d) The gnostics also describe the supreme God as the father or first father. Here, however, the personal relationship between the deity and humankind disappears.

3. The LXX uses the word patēr (Heb. ʾāb) almost exclusively (ca. 1180x) in a secular sense. Both the OT and the lit. of ancient Palestinian Jud. have a marked reserve in the use of this word in a religious sense. Diaspora Jud. tended to use "Father" in reference to God more frequently.

(a) Secular usage. Physical fatherhood is the gift and command of the Creator (Gen. 1:28). As bearer of the divine blessing (cf. Gen. 27), the father is head of the family and an authority that must be respected under all circumstances (Exod. 20:12; 21:15, 17; Prov. 23:22). Not only is it his task to feed, protect, and educate his family, but, more important, he is the family priest (Exod. 12:3–11) and teacher (12:26–27; 13:14–16; Deut. 6:7; 32:7, 46; Isa. 38:19). The father is responsible for seeing that family life is in accordance with the covenant and that the children receive religious instruction. Even servants may address a master as "my father" (2 Ki. 5:13).

Earlier generations of Israel are called "fathers" (Ps. 22:4; 106:7), as are outstanding men of God of previous ages (Sir. 44:1–19)—particularly the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the bearers and mediators of the covenant promises of God (Jos. 24:3; 1 Chr. 29:18).

Father is also used as a title of honor for a priest (Jdg. 17:10; 18:19) or prophet (2 Ki. 6:21; 13:14). In rab. Jud., father was frequently used of respected scribes, and the metaphor of father and child is occasionally applied to the relationship between a teacher of the Torah and his pupil.

(b) Religious usage. (i) God as Father in the OT. Apart from comparisons with an earthly father (Ps. 103:13; Prov. 3:12; cf. Deut. 1:31; 8:5), the word "father" is used of God only 15x in the OT—13x as an epithet and 2x directly in prayer (Jer. 3:4, 19).

God as Father in the OT refers only to his relationship with the people of Israel (Deut. 32:6; Isa. 63:16 [2x]; 64:8; Jer. 31:9 = LXX 38:9; Mal. 1:6; 2:10) or, more specifically, with the king of Israel (2 Sam. 7:14; 1 Chr. 22:10; 28:6; Ps. 89:26; cf. 2:7), never to humankind in general. The basic difference between this and the views of the fatherhood of the deity held by Israel's neighbors is that in the OT God's fatherhood is not understood in a biological or mythological sense, but in a soteriological one. To be God's child is grounded in the miracle of divine election and redemption (cf. Exod. 4:22; Deut. 14:1–2; Hos. 11:1–4). Even where the language of divine begetting is used, the reference is to the historical, elective action of God.

When God, the one who elects and redeems, is described as Father, expression is given both to his merciful, forgiving love (Jer. 31:9, 20 = LXX 38:9, 20; cf. Hos. 11:8) and to his claim to respect and obedience (Deut. 32:5–6; Jer. 3:4–5, 19; Mal. 1:6). Because the Israelites share in being children of God, they have a special obligation to be loyal to one another (2:10). If the individual sees God as Father, it is because of that person's status as a member of the people and because he or she has experienced the work of God in a way corresponding to his redemption of Israel (Ps. 68:5 in the context of 68:4–10).

(ii) God as Father in Palestinian Judaism. As in the OT, in Palestinian Jud. before the birth of Christ the description of God as Father is rare (e.g., Tob. 13:4; Sir. 51:10; Jub. 1:24–25, 28; 19:29); the Qumran texts provide but a single example (1QH 9:35–36). In rab. Jud. of the 1st cent. A.D. the use of Father became more widespread, but it was still far less frequent than other descriptions of God. God is known as "Father in heaven," the addition of "in heaven" indicating the distance between God and humankind. But in contrast to the OT, any individual worshiper can speak of God as his or her "Father in heaven." The indispensable condition for this personal relationship is obedience to God's commandments (cf. Sir. 4:10).

As an invocation of God, we find in the 1st cent. A.D. the expression "our Father, our King." But this is only in liturgical prayers of the whole congregation, not in the normal spoken Aram., but in the Heb. language of worship—thus drawing attention both to the fatherhood of God and to his majesty. We have yet to find an example of an individual addressing God as "my Father." Sir. 23:1, 4 appears in the Gk. text as "Lord, my Father," but the Heb. original has "God of my father" (cf. Exod. 15:2).

(iii) God as Father in Diaspora Judaism. The Greek-speaking Jews of the Diaspora were more frequent and less reserved than the Jews of Palestine in their use of the term father as a description of God (3 Macc. 5:7; Wis. 2:16). Philo and Josephus both reveal the influence of the Gk. concept of the universal father. In the Diaspora even individuals could address God as "Father" (cf. 3 Macc. 6:3, 8; Wis. 14:3).

NT The range of meaning of patēr, father, in the NT corresponds to that of ʾāb and patēr in the OT. In contrast to the OT, however, the number of examples of patēr in the religious sense (245x) far exceeds the number of those in a secular sense (158x).

1. The secular use of patēr. (a) According to the Synoptic tradition, Jesus specifically emphasized the binding validity of the commandment to honor one's parents (Mk. 7:9–13 par.; 10:19 par.; cf. Exod. 20:12). Even more important, however, is the obligation Jesus makes to follow him (Matt. 10:37; Lk. 14:26). The family rules laid down in Eph. and Col. likewise underline the commandment of obedience toward father and mother, but they also point to the human and spiritual responsibility of a father toward his children (Eph. 6:1–4; Col. 3:20–21).

(b) The close connection between Israel and the church, which receives extended treatment in Rom. 9–11, is the basis of Paul's words in 1 Cor. 10:1, when he speaks of God's people of the OT as "our forefathers," even though he is addressing Gentile Christians (cf. also Rom. 9:10; Heb. 1:1).

(c) The idea of spiritual fatherhood appears in 1 Cor. 4:14–15 and also indirectly where spiritual sonship is mentioned (1 Tim. 1:2, 18; 2 Tim. 1:2; 2:1; Tit. 1:4; Phlm. 10; 1 Pet. 5:13). The apostle is regarded as "father" of those Christians who owe their faith to his preaching, but Matt. 23:9 forbids the use of the term father as a title of honor.

(d) Among the derivatives of patēr, apatōr (without father, Heb. 7:3) deserves special mention. The author of Heb. describes Melchizedek as "without father or mother, without genealogy, without beginning of days or end of life." The writer arrives at this remarkable conclusion with the help of the rab. principle, "What is not mentioned in the Torah does not exist." In the silence of the OT (Gen. 14:18–24) about the descent, parentage, birth, and death of Melchizedek, he finds a cryptic reference to the miraculous, heavenly origin of the priest-king and to his eternal priesthood. As a heavenly being (cf. 11QMelch), Melchizedek is superior to the Levitical priests, for whom priestly descent is a precondition for service (Neh. 7:63–64; cf. Lev. 21:13–23). Hence he is for the writer of Heb. a prophetic prefiguring of the preexistent Son of God and eternal high priest Christ, who is similarly not descended from the tribe of Levi (Heb. 7:13–14).

2. God as Father. In the concept of the fatherhood of God we see one of the central ideas of early Christian theology (see also abba, 5; hyios, 5626).

(a) Jesus uses the title "Father" for God nearly 150x. Note that Jesus never calls God the "Father of Israel." He speaks of God as "my Father" and as the father of the disciples ("your Father"). But he never joins with them together in a common "our Father." (The Lord's Prayer is a prayer he gave to the disciples to use!)

Jesus' reference to God as his Father is based on a unique revelation of God given him from above and on his incomparable status as Son (Matt. 11:25–27; Lk. 10:21–22). In the mission of Jesus, in whose word and works the kingdom of God is dawning, God reveals himself as Father.

Insofar as Jesus spoke to his disciples about God as "your Father," he did not teach the idea that God is the Father of all human beings. Rather, he linked the fatherhood of God to one's relationship to him. God shows himself to be the Father of the disciples in his mercy (Lk. 6:36), goodness (Matt. 5:45), forgiving love (Mk. 11:25), and care (Matt. 6:8; 6:32 par.; Lk. 12:30). He gives them the gifts of the age of salvation (Matt. 7:11) and is preparing for them full salvation at the close of the age (Lk. 12:32). The disciple's experience of God's fatherly love places one under a special obligation to treat one's fellow human beings properly (see Matt. 5:44–45; Lk. 6:36).

Except for Jesus' cry from the cross in Matt. 27:46 and Mk. 15:34, where he quotes Ps. 22:1 ("my God"), Jesus always addresses God in his prayers with the words "(my) Father." Insofar as this appellation was new in Palestine, it must have seemed nothing short of outrageous.

(b) Other NT witnesses, especially Paul and John, are unanimous in making the fatherhood of God rest on a basis of Christology and soteriology.

Paul describes God as Father 40x, normally in liturgical formulas (blessings: Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; 2 Cor. 1:2; doxologies: Rom. 15:6; 2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3; creeds: 1 Cor. 8:6; Eph. 4:6; prayers: Eph. 5:20; Col. 1:12). When he uses the phrase "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," as he frequently does (e.g., Rom. 15:6; 2 Cor. 1:3; cf. 11:31), he is emphasizing that God has revealed himself as Father in Jesus Christ and can hence be recognized as such only in him. The fatherhood of God is not a fact of nature, but an eschatological miracle (cf. Rom. 8:14–17; Gal. 4:1–7).

John stresses Jesus' unique relationship to the Father (Jn. 6:57; 10:30; 14:10–11). As the Son who has been accorded a complete knowledge of God (3:35; 10:15a; 16:15a), he reveals the Father (1:18; 8:26–29; 14:7, 9). He thus imparts to his own the status of children of God, which can only be attained through him (1:12; 14:6; 17:25–26) and can only be received as a gift of divine love (1 Jn. 3:1–2).

Only 3x in the NT does a concept of God's fatherhood possibly appear without a Christological anchor. In Eph. 3:14–15 God in his capacity as Creator of the world is called "the Father, from whom all fatherhood [patria] in heaven and on earth derives its name" (NIV note; cf., however, "from whom his whole family" in NIV text). In Heb. 12:9 in his capacity as the Creator of human souls God is called "Father of spirits" (NRSV). In Jas. 1:17 as Creator of the stars, he is called "Father of the heavenly lights."

See also abba, father (5).

4255 (patria, family, clan), → 4252.

4258 (patris, fatherland, homeland, home city), → 4252.

4266 (pachynō, thicken, make insensitive), → 5017.

4272 (peitharcheō, obey), → 4275.

4273 (peithos, persuasive), → 4275.

4275 πείθω

πείθω (peithō), convince, persuade; (mid. pass.) believe, obey (4275); πεποίθησις (pepoithēsis), trust, confidence (4301); πειθός (peithos), persuasive (4273); πειθαρχέω (peitharcheō), obey (4272); πεισμονή (peismonē), persuasion (4282); ἀπειθέω (apeitheō), be disobedient (578); ἀπειθής (apeithēs), disobedient (579); ἀπείθεια (apeitheia), disobedience (577); πιθανολογία (pithanologia), persuasive speech, art of persuasion (4391).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the stem peith- has the basic meaning of trust. Trust can refer to a statement (i.e., to put faith in) or to a demand (i.e., to be persuaded, hence to obey). The original intrans. act. peithō (trust) became trans., to convince, persuade, and the meaning of trust was taken over in the pass. peithomai. Only the 2d perf. pepoitha retains in the act. the original intrans. meaning (strictly, to have taken hold of trust with the effect continuing into the present); it has the present meaning of trust firmly, rely on. The mid. pass. of the 1st perf. pepeismai likewise means to be convinced.

(b) apeitheō (be disobedient) and apeitheia (disobedience) are derived from apeithēs (disobedient).

(c) The act. meaning convince, persuade, is especially characteristic of Gk. thought. It is significant that Peitho is regarded as a goddess. But peithō can also extend the meaning of persuade to include lead astray, corrupt.

2. (a) Heb. has no word for persuade, convince. In the few places where tenses other than the perf. of peithō and peithomai occur in the LXX (chiefly in 2 and 4 Macc. and Tob.), there is no Heb. equivalent.

(b) It is otherwise in the case of the perf. pepoitha, which occurs about 80x for the Heb. bāṭaḥ, trust, rely upon. This Heb. word and its derivatives are translated almost as often by pepoitha as by the vbs. elpizō and epelpizō and the noun elpis (→ 1828). pepoitha serves to draw attention to the object and ground of Israel's hope and refuge, especially in Isa. 10:20, Jer., proverbial wisdom, and (together with the more common elpizō) in psalms expressing trust (cf. Ps. 25:2; 57:1). This trust lies in God's covenant fidelity, election, and promise, and it is to be distinguished from trust in humans, idols, and material goods (cf. Ps. 118:8; Isa. 17:7–8; 32:3; 36:6; Jer. 7:4). The noun pepoithēsis occurs in the LXX only in 2 Ki. 18:19.

(c) apeitheō and apeithēs are used to characterize the people who disobey God, esp. in Deut. and Isa. (e.g., Deut. 1:26; 9:23–24; Isa. 3:8).

NT peithō (including the mid. pass. peithomai and the 2d perf. pepoitha) are common in the NT; they occur most frequently in Paul (22x) and Acts (17x). Paul, like the LXX, used the act. (nonperf.) forms rarely (2x), but the perf. forms of pepoitha most often. The noun pepoithēsis is found 6x in Paul. peitharcheō occurs only in Acts (3x) and Tit. 3:1.

The negative forms occur less frequently: apeitheō occurs 13x (5x in Rom., 4x in 1 Pet.), the noun and the adj. are each found 6x.

1. The range of meaning of the vb. may be ascertained by looking at its tenses with regard to the beginning, end, and duration of the action concerned. (a) The act. form of peithō in the aor. (e.g., Matt. 27:20; cf. Acts 12:20; 14:19; 19:26) always has the meaning of persuade, induce, and even to mislead or corrupt. It has no special theological significance. By contrast, the imperf. expresses the attempt to influence a person to adopt a particular attitude or action. Acts uses the vb. to describe Paul's preaching to the Jews and Greeks. He was not trying to evince faith in the one God, but to persuade them of the newly given grace in Christ (Acts 13:43) through teaching (18:4; → dialogizomai, 1368). The same applies to the pres. part. In 19:8 Paul argues for three months in the synagogue, attempting to convince the Jews of the kingdom of God.

(b) The pres. ind. denotes not only the duration of the action but the fact that it is taking place at the present time. Here the context determines the meaning. In three texts the meaning is disputed. Some see King Agrippa in Acts 26:28 as acknowledging that he has come within a hair's breadth of conversion. Others, however, insist that Agrippa's words indicate just how far he was from taking the step, as if to say, "Do you think in such a short time you can persuade me to become a Christian?" (cf. NIV). There is no consensus on interpretation here. In any case, Agrippa sees himself in a dilemma. If he says that he rejects the prophets (26:27), his reputation for orthodoxy will be damaged. But if he agrees with Paul's reasoning, he realizes that he is being maneuvered into a position of public agreement with Paul.

In 2 Cor. 5:11 and Gal. 1:10 Paul admits he has to defend himself against the claims of spurious authorities who have been working against him. In 2 Cor. 5:11 he says: "Since, then, we know what it is to fear the Lord, we try to persuade men." In Gal. 1:10 he asks: "Am I now trying to win the approval of men, or of God?" In these two passages the apostle is stressing the fact that he strives to convince people by argument, not because it is necessary for his personal authority, but for the sake of the gospel.

(c) The fut. act. comes close to the aor. in meaning to persuade. It also means to reassure. The thought of corruption seems to be in the background of Matt. 28:14. In 1 Jn. 3:19 ("This then is how we know that we belong to the truth, and how we set our hearts at rest [peisomen] in his presence"), it is a question of true self-knowledge. The point is a double one. On the one hand, it is a question of being in the truth or not, which is shown by whether love is shown in action. On the other hand, it is a question of whether God will condemn us. These two points are not simply parallel. Those who are merely of the truth can still condemn themselves before God, although this does not inevitably follow (cf. 3:21). If one's heart drives a person to it, he or she may still reassure it before God. For God knows better than ourselves not only about our guilt, but also that which he has newly created in us.

2. The mid. and pass. dep. peithomai stresses the result and outcome of being influenced. This applies to the aor., imperf., and fut., which occur only in Luke's writings in the NT. (a) The aor. occurs 3x. Acts 17:4 shows the success of Paul's teaching in the synagogue of Thessalonica (cf. 17:2), while 5:40 refers to the council of Jewish leaders being persuaded by Gamaliel. Luke uses the same form of the vb. in both passages and in 23:21, a warning against being influenced by false advice. The dat. following the vb. refers to the persons exerting influence. The following are possible meanings: to be persuaded by someone, to yield to (cf. 23:21), to listen to in the sense of obey.

(b) Similarly, the imperf. means to heed, to pay attention to someone's words or actions so that one is influenced by them. According to Acts 27:11, the centurion "followed the advice" of the pilot and the owner of the ship rather than "listening to" Paul's advice. With reference to the behavior of the Roman Jews, 28:24 expresses a contrast: "Some were convinced [epeithonto] by what he said, but others would not believe [ēpistoun]." peithomai here has the meaning of believe (Paul's words). The vb. can also denote followers of a leader, as in the case of Theudas and Judas the Galilean (5:36–37).

(c) In the only passage in the fut. (Lk. 16:31), peithomai means to be convinced: "If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, they will not be convinced even if someone rises from the dead." Whereas in Acts Paul seeks to convince the Jews by arguments that any Jew must accept, Lk. 16:31 expresses the corollary, that where agreement to such argument is refused, nothing will convince such a person.

(d) The pres. has no particular theological significance in Acts 21:14 and 26:26, where it simply means to be convinced, and in Heb. 13:18 ("we are sure"). In other places it means to obey or follow (Gal. 5:7; Heb. 13:17; Jas. 3:3). In Rom. 2:8 disobedience (→ apeitheō below) to the truth is seen as being grounded in subjection to unrighteousness, which is abolished by faith. But where there is a renewed regard for the law, disobedience to the truth necessarily follows (cf. Gal. 5:7; peismonē below).

(e) The perf. always denotes a situation in which the act of examining and weighing up has been concluded and a firm conviction has already been reached (cf. Lk. 20:6; Rom. 8:38; 14:14; 15:14; 2 Tim. 1:5, 12; Heb. 6:9). This can refer to convictions concerning facts or people as well as to the all-embracing, unshakeable certainty that has been attained in faith (Rom. 8:38–39).

3. The 2d perf. pepoitha with the prep. epi or en always means to depend on, trust in, put one's confidence in. It indicates a conviction as the basis for further thought and action. Thus it can refer to one's trust in one's own righteousness or one's own flesh (Lk. 18:9; 2 Cor. 1:9; Phil. 3:3–4). But it can also refer in a good sense to trust that can be placed in someone. Thus Paul expresses confidence in the church (2 Cor. 2:3; 2 Thess. 3:4, "in the Lord"; cf. Gal. 5:10; Phil. 1:25; 2:24). However, in both the former passages the vb. can be understood in relation to the following hoti, so that, as in other passages, pepoitha hoti can be translated to be confident that. epi, like eis in Gal. 5:10, means "in view of." Thus the confidence would refer not so much to the persons as to the circumstances brought about by God in which Paul trusts "in the Lord," such as God's faithfulness in completing the work he has begun. In any case, the trust is ultimately in the Lord himself.

Confidence is also expressed by forms of pepoitha followed by the infin. "If anyone is confident [pepoithen] that he belongs to Christ [einai plus gen.], he should consider again that we belong to Christ just as much as he" (2 Cor. 10:7; cf. Rom. 2:19).

When followed by the dat., the vb. means simply to trust, believe in (Phil. 1:14; Phlm. 21). The entrusting of oneself to God that is characteristic of Ps. finds direct expression only in OT quotations that are applied to Jesus (see Matt. 27:43; Heb. 2:13; cf. Isa. 8:17). Trust in God now coincides with faith in Jesus Christ. This also applies to 2 Cor. 1:9, where trust in God who raises the dead comes from faith in the risen Christ.

4. The noun pepoithēsis, confidence, has the same meaning in Phil. 3:4 as the vb. in 3:3–4. It is likewise connected with en sarki, "in the flesh," and refers to the self-confidence that grows out of observance of the law. On the other hand, 2 Cor. 3:4 refers to the confidence that grows out of the apostolic commission (cf. 3:5–6), which leads Paul to describe the Corinthian church as his letter of commendation, written by God's Spirit on hearts of flesh (3:3). Confidence in human beings (8:22, where the prep. eis is used for "in"; cf. Gal. 5:10) is set in the context of confidence in God (pros ton theon, 2 Cor. 3:4), while the confidence expressed in 1:15 is to be understood in the light of the hope of 1:13–14. The confidence of 10:2 is grounded in Paul's commission as an apostle (see above on 3:4), which enabled him to risk coming into violent conflict with certain people. In Eph. 3:12 this boldness of approaching God is further defined by the words "with . . . confidence."

5. In 1 Cor. 2:4 there is a textual question as to whether Paul is using the adj. peithos (persuasive) or the noun peithō (persuasiveness). The meaning of the text remains the same in either case, for Paul is clearly stating that the Corinthians did not come to faith through human wisdom and its ways of persuading. The latter are described in Col. 2:4 as pithanologia ("fine-sounding [but false] arguments"), by which people are deceived.

6. The noun peismonē in Gal. 5:8 ("persuasion") may be understood actively in relation to peithō. But there may be here a play on words with peithesthai in the preceding verse, which means to obey: "Who . . . kept you from obeying the truth? That kind of persuasion does not come from the one who calls you." The result of this persuasion that did not come from God would thus be that the Galatians are no longer allowing themselves to be persuaded by the truth.

7. The vb. peitharcheō (obey) is used for obedience both to God (Acts 5:29) and to other humans (27:21; cf. peithomai in 27:11). In Tit. 3:1 it is identified with being submissive to rulers and authorities.

8. (a) apeithēs (disobedient) occurs in Acts 26:19 in the form of a double negative that is designed to stress Paul's obedience: "So then, King Agrippa, I was not disobedient to the vision from heaven." In Rom. 1:30 and 2 Tim. 3:2 the word occurs in catalogues of vices in connection with disobedience to parents.

(b) In all other passages where apeithēs, the noun apeitheia (disobedience), and the vb. apeitheō (be disobedient) occur, the context suggests disobedience to God, mostly in contrast with faith. This is the sense of the LXX (cf. Lk. 1:17, which speaks of Elijah being sent to turn "the disobedient to the wisdom of the righteous"; cf. Mal. 4:6). It is exemplified by Jn. 3:36; Acts 14:2; 19:9 (of disbelieving Jews); Rom. 15:31; Eph. 2:2; 5:6 (contrast "those who are disobedient," i.e., non-Christians, with the "children of light," 5:8); and Tit. 1:16. A distinctive use is offered in the way 1 Pet. qualifies disobedience as disobedience to the word or the gospel (2:8; 3:1; 4:17). It also speaks of the defective obedience of people before the flood despite the patience of God (3:20).

Heb. 3:18 and 4:6 hold up to Christians (cf. 4:11) the behavior of the Israelites in the desert as a warning example. Those who stop their ears to God's instructions for the present time will come to grief; they are not ready to receive the future from the hands of God in utter trust. Because of her faith Rahab the harlot was unlike those people, and she did not meet with the destruction that came on the disobedient citizens of Jericho (11:31). The Gentile Christians were themselves once likewise disobedient (Rom. 11:30; cf. Tit. 3:3). But now, through the apeitheia of Israel, in which God's covenant people as a whole did not wish to enter the new covenant in Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 10:21), Gentiles have received mercy. Israel's disobedience is intensified through their opposition to the mercy that has come on the Gentiles (11:31). But in turn they may through all this now receive mercy.

The climax of the argument of Rom. 9–11 shows that this lack of trust, obedience, faith, and acceptance of God's will is the normal situation of the human race (11:32). Only God himself can save us by having mercy on us and granting us faith.

See also pistis, faith (4411).

4277 πεινάω

πεινάω (peinaō), hunger (4277); διψάω (dipsaō), to thirst (1498); δίψος (dipsos), thirst (1499); λιμός (limos), hunger, famine (3350).

CL & OT 1. (a) The range of meaning of the above words is not limited to physical hunger or thirst, but extends to the intellectual and spiritual life. They express a passionate longing for something without which one cannot live, e.g., freedom, honor, fame, wealth, praise, enlightenment. Hunger and thirst are often bracketed together.

(b) The ancients attributed famine to the wrath of the gods. Vegetation gods were thus supposed to guarantee the provision of food. In the mystery religions these old fertility gods satisfied human hunger for enduring eternal life. It was the task of rulers (e.g., the pharaohs of Egypt) to protect their subjects against hunger. But every case of hunger and thirst presented an obligation to help whoever was in need.

(c) Gk. philosophers generally attempted to educate their adherents to free themselves from enslavement to bodily needs. Thus the Stoics sought to make themselves independent of all the vicissitudes of life by the practice of asceticism, and the gnostics to free themselves from a sensual attachment to the world through the denial of the body in order to attain to the realm of the spirit.

2. While peinaō and dipsaō or dipsos each occurs about 50x in the LXX, limos occurs over 100x. Hunger and thirst are the worst forms of lack, and of the two thirst is more distressing in the sun-drenched East. Among the causes is failure of the rains, with consequent failure of the harvest (1 Ki. 17:1), so that one can even speak of the thirst of the land. Hunger and thirst are also connected with war, wanderings in the desert (Ps. 107:5), idleness (Prov. 19:15), and esp. godlessness (Ps. 34:10; Isa. 65:13; Sir. 40:9). God sends hunger and thirst as judgment and as a means of humbling the godless attitudes of people (Deut. 32:24; 2 Sam. 24:13; Ezek. 5:15–16).

During times of famine Israel sought help in more fertile Egypt (Gen. 12:10; 41:53–57; 42:1–5). But it was in such times of need (both during the wandering in the desert and in the land of Canaan) that Israel learned that God was her real Savior from need (Exod. 16:3–18; 17:3–7; cf. 1 Ki. 8:37–40). Yahweh takes up the cause of the hungry who belong to the dispossessed poor (1 Sam. 2:5). Judgment is pronounced on those who are filled, but there is the promise of salvation for the hungry (Ps. 107:36–42; 146:7; Isa. 65:13). God demands from the devout a corresponding attitude to the poor (58:7, 10; Ezek. 18:7, 16), among whom even their enemies must not be overlooked (Prov. 25:21).

3. (a) This word group is occasionally used fig. of thirst for God (Ps. 42:2; 63:1; 143:6) and of striving after wisdom (Sir. 51:24). Amos 8:11–13 speaks of a hungering after the word of God alongside an actual famine: God can in the end withhold everything as a punishment. Several passages meant for the Jewish people during the Babylonian exile have particular significance. Though at present discouraged (Isa. 40:27–31) and poor (41:17–18; 49:9–10; 55:1), they will be allowed by God to return home. He will transform the arduous route through the desert into an oasis journey (41:18; 43:20; 48:21), and their wasted homeland itself into a garden of salvation (Ezek. 34:29; cf. Isa. 35:1, 6–7). This material well-being includes the idea of salvation (44:3; Jer. 31:12 = LXX 38:12).

(b) In Pss. Sol. 5:1–12; 10:1–6; 13:7–10, hunger and thirst serve as inducements to better keeping of the law.

NT peinaō occurs 23x in the NT, mostly in the Synoptics (esp. Matt.). dipsaō occurs 16x and limos 12x. Both OT and NT take human physical needs seriously. But it is not only the stomach but the whole person that needs to be satisfied. External well-being and inner salvation are most closely related. This explains the fact that many NT statements about hunger and thirst show a peculiar ambiguity, making it scarcely possible to distinguish the literal from the metaphorical.

1. Like the OT, the NT speaks of famines (Lk. 4:25; Acts 7:11). These are among the terrors of the end time (Matt. 24:7; Rev. 6:8; 18:8) and the occasion of special measures of assistance (Acts 11:28). Hunger can move a person to conversion, where questions about food raise questions about faith (Lk. 15:14, 17).

2. (a) Luke esp. depicts Jesus as the advocate of the poor and hungry (Lk. 1:53; 6:21), understanding hunger in the broadest sense. Believers should not fear hunger, for in the coming order God will act on behalf of the needy. Thus, Jesus calls them blessed already in view of the coming day of God. For those who can expect nothing from this world and direct all their hope toward God, there will be no more hunger (6:21). There is no promise, however, for those who are satisfied in this world. Instead, they are threatened with the prospect of mourning and weeping (6:25).

(b) In contrast to Lk., the beatitude of Matt. 5:6 understands hunger as "hunger and thirst for righteousness," a longing to be right with God and to live right (cf. 6:10). Those who hunger are the same as those who believe and long for the kingdom of God (6:33). Their promised filling begins with the coming of Jesus and continues until everything else is theirs.

(c) Hunger and thirst in the Johannine writings have a double meaning. Natural thirst (Jn. 4:13) and physical hunger (6:1–13) convey the longing for life in general. Jesus seizes upon this longing in order to show that it is only through contact with himself, the giver of life, that it is satisfied (4:14–15; 6:35; 7:37). But what is promised in all the sayings about the satisfaction of hunger and thirst is only fully received in God's new world, when all physical and spiritual needs will end (Rev. 7:16; 21:6; 22:17).

3. The description of Jesus himself having to suffer hunger and thirst demonstrates his humanity. After his forty days of fasting, the devil used Jesus' hunger to tempt him to use his authority as Son of God to satisfy his own need through a miracle (Matt. 4:2; Lk. 4:2). Only by obeying God's Word was he able to stand firm, for "man does not live on bread alone, but on every word that comes from the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:4; cf. Lk. 4:4; Deut. 8:3). Jesus cursed the fig tree that did not satisfy his hunger for fruit (Matt. 21:18–19) and thereby demonstrated in parabolic fashion how a curse will fall on all who do not bear the fruit of righteousness. On the cross he thirsted, though he offered himself as the living water to satisfy all thirst (Jn. 19:28).

4. The disciples shared Jesus' poverty. He defended their action of plucking ears of grain on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:1–8; Mk. 2:23–28; Lk. 6:1–5). Hunger and thirst were also among the deprivations Paul underwent for the crucified Christ, in contrast to the enthusiasts in Corinth, who believed they already enjoyed full possession of all the good things of the coming world (1 Cor. 4:8, 11; 2 Cor. 11:27). When they assembled for worship, these enthusiasts pitilessly took no notice of the hungry among them (1 Cor. 11:21, 34).

Hunger and thirst are not necessarily signs of God's disfavor. They may afflict, but they cannot separate us from the love of God (Rom. 8:35). Yet if Paul was able to overcome them, he did so not on the basis of asceticism or superior knowledge, but through Christ alone (Phil. 4:12).

5. Hunger and thirst are occasions for the exercise of love. Their satisfaction is reckoned among the works of mercy that will serve as a basis of judgment (Matt. 25:35, 37, 42) and that should include one's enemy (Rom. 12:20). We must remember also that in those who hunger and thirst Jesus Christ himself meets us incognito (Matt. 25:37, 42).

See also brōma, food (1109); geuomai, taste, partake of, enjoy, experience (1174); esthiō, eat (2266); pinō, drink (4403).

4278 (peira, attempt, trial, experiment), → 4280.

4279 (peirazō, try, test, put on trial, tempt), → 4280.

4280 πειρασμός

πειρασμός (peirasmos), test, trial, tempting, temptation (4280); πεῖρα (peira), attempt, trial, experiment (4278); πειράω (peiraō), try, attempt, endeavor (4281); πειράζω (peirazō), try, test, put on trial, tempt (4279); ἐκπειράζω (ekpeirazō), put to the test, try, tempt (1733); ἀπείραστος (apeirastos), without temptation, untempted (585).

CL 1. The noun peira, attempt, and the vb. peiraō, to test, try, together with the intensive form (rare in cl. Gk.) peirazō, to tempt someone, put to the test, are related to peraō, to drive across, pass through, to strive to get through, and express an intention that includes a certain element of resolution. Thus peiraō and peirazō convey the general sense of to try, and in view of the effort required, to exert oneself, strive. Referring to competition against other persons, peiraō, usually in mid. or pass., means to measure oneself against someone, strive for someone's favor, lead into temptation (esp. in the sense of unchastity), and then to get to know by experience.

Along the same lines as the vbs., the noun peira means attempt, trial, test, risk, attack, experience. peirasmos means a medical test; ekpeirazō and apeirastos are lacking in cl. Gk.

2. (a) In the LXX peirazō and peirao stand exclusively for nāsâ in the piel form of the vb. (e.g., Gen. 22:1; Exod. 15:25; 16:4; Isa. 7:12; Dan. 1:12, 14). They also occur in the Apocr. and some canonical writings without Heb. equivalent (e.g., Dan. 12:10; Tob. 12:14; Wis. 1:2; 2:17, 24). Similarly, ekpeirazō always translates nāsâ in the piel (Deut. 6:16; 8:2, 16; Ps. 78:18), while peirasmos usually stands for the cognate noun massâ (Exod. 17:7; Deut. 4:34; Ps. 95:8), and has no Heb. equivalent in Sir. 2:1; 27:5, 7; 1 Macc. 2:52.

(b) These words are found in their purely secular senses: to try to do something (Deut. 4:34; 28:56), try something out (Eccl. 2:1; 7:23 = LXX 7:24; Dan. 1:12), put to the proof (1 Ki. 10:1); the noun peirasmos means trial in Deut. 7:19; 29:2 = LXX 29:3.

(c) In the OT, esp. in Deut. and the Deuteronomic history, the ideas of tempting and putting to the test become religious concepts. (i) Yahweh may put his people to the test. Their obligations to him are defined in such words as to fear God, love him, worship him, be faithful to him, listen to his voice, obey his word, walk after his commands, etc. Thus when the OT speaks of Yahweh testing his covenant people, it means that he arranges a test to find out whether they will remain faithful to the covenant. The classic example is the testing of Abraham, when God commanded Abraham to offer the covenant son of promise, Isaac (Gen. 22; for other tests of individuals, see Deut. 33:8 [Levi]; Jdt. 8:26 [Isaac]). As for testing his entire covenant people, in Exod. 16:4 Yahweh tells Moses of his decision to let bread rain down from heaven for the people, who are to gather only enough for each day, to "test them and see whether they will follow my instructions" (cf. also 20:20; Deut. 8:2; Jdg. 2:22).

(ii) Unbelief, disobedience, and murmuring among God's people constitute a challenge to Yahweh, putting him to the test. Note that when the OT refers to Israel's testing of a divine being, it is always Yahweh and never a pagan god. "Tempting God" is the inexplicable way for God's people to behave. Still, it occurred and is described in such passages as Num. 14:22; Ps. 78:40–41; Isa. 7:12; Mal. 3:15. The classic instance for tempting God was at Massah (which the LXX translates peirasmos, testing) in the desert (Exod. 17:2, 7; Deut. 6:16; 9:22; 33:8; Ps. 95:8–9; in the last two instances Massah is linked with Meribah).

(iii) Religious testing is also something that God's people on occasion ought to do. Deut. 13:1–5 admits the possibility of false prophets performing wonders in order to lead the people astray. The people are to test such people, not by questioning whether the wonder has actually occurred but by asking whether their teaching agrees with the commands that Israel has received.

(d) Testing is one of the means by which God carries out his saving purposes. Those tested often do not know until afterward whether or why God has been testing them, i.e., only after they survive the tribulation with a stronger faith, having been preserved, proved, purified, disciplined, and taught. Abraham later became an oft-quoted example of someone kept through great testing (e.g., Apoc. Ab.; Jub. 17–19). Israel also knew about defeat that resulted from failing the testing, when it caused them to go astray and fall away from God. God is the one who works in everything, and therefore he is the one who tests. At times, of course, he allows Satan to do the testing (cf. Job 1:11–12; 2:6–7; → diabolos, devil, 1333).

3. (a) Rab. lit. exhibits a tendency of Satan to become independent in his role as tempter. He is depicted as the head of a kingdom opposed to God, which tries to frustrate God's saving purposes by leading humankind into sin and accusing them before God (e.g., Tanḥ. 40b; b. Sanh. 89b). In this he makes use of the evil impulse already present in humans, which now becomes the gate through which temptation makes its inroads (e.g., m. B.Bat. 16).

(b) The independence of the evil one is even more strongly marked in the Apocr. and Pseudepigrapha. Suffering and evil are now experienced as so oppressive and devilish that it was felt inappropriate to link them in any way with God.

NT In the NT the intensive form peirazō occurs 38x—not only for the temptation of Jesus by Satan or Jesus' opponents, but also for the temptation of Christians. In addition, the word can have a secular sense of to try, attempt. ekpeirazō is used 4x (Matt. 4:7; Lk. 4:12; 10:25; 1 Cor. 10:9), and peirāō once (Acts 26:21). New to the NT is the verbal adj. apeirastos, incapable of temptation (Jas. 1:13). The noun peirasmos, temptation, trial, occurs 21x; peira, attempt, trial, is found only in Heb. 11:29, 36.

1. Examples of the secular sense of this word group are: to make an attempt (Heb. 11:29), get experience of (11:36), attempt (Acts 9:26; 16:7; 24:6), and test (2 Cor.

13:5; Rev. 2:2). Four passages contain the OT ideas of testing God (Acts 5:9; 15:10; 1 Cor. 10:9; Heb. 3:8–9).

2. The world of ideas behind the NT use of peirasmos in the religious sense is generally dependent on the OT. Believers are constantly being tempted to fall away from God. They must protect themselves with spiritual armor (Eph. 6:10–17) against the attacks of the "prince of this world" (Jn. 12:31; 14:30; 16:11; cf. Eph. 2:2) and stand firm or be watchful (1 Pet. 5:8), always with prayer (Eph. 6:18). Thus the willing spirit controls the weak flesh, so that the beleaguered entry gate for satanic temptations may remain closed (Mk. 14:38).

What entices us into temptation is the weakness of the human nature, also described as desire (epithymia, Jas. 1:14; → 2123), so that the power of the evil one closes over us like a trap (1 Tim. 6:9). Satan uses all sorts of devices to lead us into temptation (1 Cor. 7:5; 1 Thess. 3:5). In fact, almost anything can become a temptation (1 Cor. 10:13; Gal. 6:1). Paul admits in 4:14 that his situation when he arrived in Galatia (whatever that was; perhaps his "thorn in [the] flesh"? 2 Cor. 12:7) could have been a "trial" to them, but they brushed it off and received the apostle as "an angel of God."

3. To have to suffer as a Christian is a form of testing. But it can also be a mark of true discipleship and therefore a ground for joy (1 Pet. 1:6; 4:12), esp. when one knows, by looking back to the great examples of Abraham and Job, that it is possible to emerge from temptation approved and preserved in patience (Jas. 1:2). At the end of the testing God never turns out to be an enemy, but one who rewards.

In stark opposition to any attempt to hold God responsible for human failures, Jas. maintains that God, who is himself apeirastos, incapable of being tempted by the evil one, tempts no one (Jas. 1:13). Rather, he helps and rescues from temptation (1 Cor. 10:13; 2 Pet. 2:9). The question of the origin of temptation is left open. At most we can say, as noted above, that God allows the evil one to send us trials, which may tempt us to turn our backs on him.

Jesus commanded his disciples to pray against temptation (Mk. 14:38) and taught them to ask the Father, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one" (Matt. 6:13). Here God, having been asked for the forgiveness of sins, is asked not to allow his church to come into the kind of satanic temptation that might lead them to fall away, but to rescue them from the power of the evil one and so let his kingdom come. The ultimate coming of God's rule cannot be separated from the present fight against the kingdom of the tempter. But with God's help, we can endure the hour of trial and overcome (Rev. 2:10; 3:10). And we can be sure that our Savior is praying for us during times of severe trial (cf. Lk. 22:28–34).

4. (a) Jesus was the subject of temptation throughout his life. This is brought out esp. by Lk. (4:13; 22:28) and Heb. (2:18; 4:15). For this very reason he can help his followers in their temptations. Jesus was without sin, so Satan constantly attacked him in many forms, trying to break down his resistance. When his opponents tried to take him in with trick questions, it was only a covering action (Matt. 22:35; Mk. 10:2; 12:15; Lk. 10:2; Jn. 8:6). Because of false, human expectations among the people, the Pharisees and the disciples were ever seeking to divert Jesus from his life's task. They are thus temptations and hindrances for the Messiah, who remained obedient to God (Matt. 16:1; Mk. 8:11; Lk. 11:16). In the struggle in Gethsemane Jesus even asked the Father to remove the cup from him (Mk. 14:35–39).

(b) The nature of the constant temptations in Jesus' life is epitomized in the story of the temptations that preceded his public ministry (Matt. 4:1–11; Lk. 4:1–13). The Spirit led Jesus into the desert, where he was tempted by Satan. That scene recalls the testing of Israel as God's son in the desert wanderings prior to their entry into the promised land (cf. Deut. 6–8). There is indeed a parallel between the forty years of desert wandering and the forty days of Jesus in the desert.

(i) The first temptation is not merely an invitation to perform a spectacular miracle for selfish ends by turning stones into bread. Rather, it must be seen against the background of OT promises of how Yahweh provides food for his children (cf. Deut. 2:7; 28:1–14; Neh. 9:21; Ps. 23:1; 33:18–19). Yahweh gave his people manna and quails, but once their immediate needs were satisfied, they grumbled about what God had given them and wanted something better (Exod. 16:2–12; Num. 11:4–6, 33–34; 21:4–5; Deut. 8:2–3; 9:22; 29:5; Ps. 78:18–22, 26–32).

Jesus' reply to Satan's first temptation comes from an OT passage that recalls the desert wanderings and Yahweh's provision of manna (Deut. 8:3; cf. Matt. 4:4; Lk. 4:4). Israel did not withstand this temptation; the people were seized with craving, discontent, doubt, and unbelief, grumbling because they wanted a different kind of food. The tempter wants to entice Jesus into this same sin. It is not without significance that the Sermon on the Mount records the saying: "Which of you, if his son asks for bread, will give him a stone?" (Matt. 7:9).

(ii) The second temptation in Matt.'s account and the third in Lk.'s is set on the pinnacle of the temple (see also pterygion, wing, edge, 4762). Its background may be the promises of divine protection for Israel in their desert wanderings (e.g., Exod. 19:4–6; Deut. 1:31; 32:10–14). But God's promised protection was not confined to the desert generation. The temple was the place par excellence where this protection could be expected, for there the divine presence was concentrated. It was an inviolable place of sanctuary (cf. Ps. 36:7–8; 61:4).

This perspective is particularly true of Ps. 91, which the rabbis associated with both the temple and the desert wanderings. Satan issues the temptation to Jesus to cast himself from the wing of the temple on the basis of 91:11–12: "For he will command his angels concerning you to guard you in all your ways; they will lift you up in their hands, so that you will not strike your foot against a stone" (cf. Matt. 4:6; Lk. 4:10–11). There is probably a play on words between the "wing" (pterygion) of the temple and the clause "under his wings [pterygas] you will find refuge" (Ps. 91:4). This temptation is not simply a demand, like that of the Pharisees, for a spectacular sign. Rather, Satan wants Jesus to tempt God, i.e., to demand from God some token that he is a God who keeps his covenantal promises.

But this temptation is rejected by a quotation, which (like the previous one) is taken from Deut.: "Do not put the Lord your God to the test" (Matt. 4:7; Lk. 4:12; cf. Deut. 6:16). To put God to the test in this way breaks the great commandment to love God above all (Deut. 6:4–5). Note also how later on, the power of the disciples over the demons is noted as a sign that God is honoring the promises of Ps. 91, for Lk. 10:19 quotes Ps. 91:13, where the disciples' power over the enemy is seen as a fulfillment of the Ps. and evidence of Satan's fall.

(iii) In the third temptation in Matt. the devil takes Jesus to a high mountain, shows him all the kingdoms of the world, and says to him, "'All this I will give you ... if you will bow down and worship me'" (Matt. 4:8–9; cf. Lk. 4:5–7, where it is the second temptation). This passage is rich in OT associations. Moses went up to the top of Mount Pisgah, where Yahweh showed him the promised land (Deut. 34:1–4). Note that in many OT contexts, mountains are the scene either of revelation (e.g., Sinai, Exod. 19:3; 34:2–3) or of idolatrous worship (Deut. 12:1–3). Deut. also stresses that the riches of the promised land should not lead Israel to forget Yahweh and follow other gods (6:10–12; cf. 8:10–20)—a warning that follows the command to love Yahweh above all and precedes the command not to put him to the test (6:16). This connection with Deut. is confirmed by the fact that Jesus resists Satan's third temptation by citing Deut. 6:13: "Worship the Lord your God, and serve him only" (Matt. 4:10; cf. Lk. 4:8).

Whereas Israel as God's son succumbed to this temptation to worship other gods (and hence, Satan, Deut. 32:15–17), Jesus as God's Son overcomes it through living by God's word, just as Israel should have done. By rejecting the false promise of the riches of the land that Satan promises, Jesus is able to enter into his true inheritance as God's Son, although this comes by the way of the cross. In this sense Jesus lives by the third beatitude, "Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth" (Matt. 5:5). The fulfillment of the promise lies in a way different from that envisaged by Satan. While rejecting the temptation leads to hardship and suffering for Jesus, ultimately it spells Satan's defeat. Note esp. Matt. 4:11: "Then the devil left him, and angels came and attended him."

By resisting these temptations, Jesus gains victory over Satan and thus makes it possible for his people to inherit God's promises. By placing the temptation concerning the kingdoms of the world at the climax of the temptations, Matt. sees the victory here in the light of the triumph of the kingdom of heaven over the kingdom of this world. Note too how this Gospel ends with the words of the risen Christ to the effect that Jesus now legitimately has the authority Satan promised deceitfully: "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me" (28:18). In Mk., even though the writer does not describe Jesus' temptations (1:12–13), he assumes that Jesus resisted Satan here, for throughout the rest of the book, Jesus manifested complete power over demons and evil spirits (e.g., 1:21–26; 5:1–20; 9:14–29).

See also dokimos, tested, approved, genuine, esteemed (1511).

4281 (peiraō, try, attempt, endeavor), → 4280.

4282 (peismonē, persuasion), → 4275.

4287 (pempō, send), → 690.

4288 πένης

πένης (penēs), poor (4288); πενιχρός (penichros), poor (4293).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. penēs is linked with ponos, burden, trouble. It refers to the person who cannot live from one's property, but has to work with one's hands. Hence the penēs is not like the ptōchos (→ 4777), who is poor enough to be a beggar and needs help. A penēs, therefore, is only relatively poor—the opposite of plousios, wealthy (→ ploutos, 4458). It includes the handworker and small peasant. Although at one time property was considered the best guarantee of a virtuous life and penia, poverty, the root of moral offenses, the Gks. eventually came to accept that penia could lead to virtue, which is the true ideal in life. A life in poverty can be rich and free. No religious value was attributed to poverty.

2. (a) In the LXX penēs is used about 75x; penichros, 3x (Exod. 22:25; Prov. 28:15; 29:7). Normally penēs denotes the economically and legally oppressed (e.g., Ps. 72:4, 13; 86:1; Amos 2:6; 4:1; 5:12; 8:4, 6). It is virtually synonymous for ptōchos, perhaps because in the Israelite concept of property and social order, poverty ultimately was created by unrighteousness, i.e., by a failure of the community to obey God and his law.

(b) In Hel. Jud. writers such as Philo tend to follow the cl. Gk. meaning of penēs (ptōchos does not occur in Philo, even in quotes where it appears in the LXX). By so doing he uses the less offensive, more polite term for poor, thus making the Bible more suitable for Gk. ears.

NT The NT follows OT thought about the poor but not the LXX's choice of words. penēs occurs only in 2 Cor. 9:9, a quotation from Ps. 112:9; the normal NT word for "poor" is ptōchos. penichros is found only in Lk. 21:2, of the widow at the temple treasury, who was visibly poor (the par. in Mk. 12:42 uses ptōchos).

See also ptōchos, poor (4777).

4291 πενθέω

πενθέω (pentheō), be sad, grieve, mourn (4291); πένθος (penthos), grief, sadness, mourning (4292).

CL & OT 1. pentheō means to lament or mourn, usually for someone; penthos has the sense of mourning or sorrow. It is used esp. of the external signs of mourning, as when mourning for the dead.

2. In the LXX pentheō connotes the act of mourning, usually as a result of realized or impending misfortune. It can be used fig. of inanimate objects such as the earth, the land, or parts of the structure of cities on which catastrophe has come or is yet to come (cf. Isa. 3:26; 19:8; 24:4; 33:9; Jer. 4:28; 23:10; Lam. 2:8; Hos. 4:3). It is also used of mourning over the death of an individual (Gen. 23:2; 50:3; 2 Sam. 14:2; 1 Chr. 7:22), of remorse in general (Neh. 8:9), and of the sorrow experienced during the absence of a loved one (2 Sam. 13:37; 19:1). In Isa. 16:8 it denotes the languishing of fields.

The noun penthos denotes mourning (e.g., Gen. 27:41; 50:10; Amos 5:16; 8:10).

NT 1. pentheō occurs in Matt. 9:15 in the sense of sorrow over the absence of a loved one, and in Mk. 16:10 of those who mourned the death of Christ. Paul uses it of the sorrow he may have to experience when he learns that some have not repented of their sins (2 Cor. 12:21). In Lk.'s account of the Beatitudes pentheō occurs as the antithesis of laugh (Lk. 6:25), describing the eventual mourning of those who laugh now. Those who are not contrite will later experience the results of their lack of contrition. In Matt. 5:4 pentheō refers to sorrow in a general sense.

In Rev. 18:11, 15, 19, the judgment on Babylon is mourned by those who trafficked with her. The deep sense of loss at the destruction of their source of wealth pervades the description of their reaction.

Paul and James use pentheō in a sense closely paralleling the concept of godly sorrow or repentance. In 1 Cor. 5:2 the vb. describes the attitude that should characterize the Corinthian Christians relative to the immorality among them. He describes their present attitude over an incestuous man as "proud" and indicates that they should rather be "filled with grief" over the situation. James exhorts sinners to "mourn and wail" as an aspect of their humbling themselves before God (Jas. 4:9).

2. James uses the noun penthos in Jas. 4:9 similarly to the vb., i.e., in the sense of godly sorrow. He calls on sinners to draw near to God, cleanse their hands, purify their hearts, and to change their laughter "to mourning." The section closes with an exhortation to humble themselves before the Lord, for he will then exalt them.

In Rev. 18:7–8 penthos describes sorrow as a result of catastrophe and loss. Mourning will come on Babylon at her fall. By contrast 21:4 uses the word for sorrow in general, the removal of which will lead to the joy experienced by those who will inhabit the new Jerusalem.

See also klaiō, weep (3081); koptō, strike (3164); lypeō, inflict pain (3382); brychō, gnash (1107); stenazō, to sigh, groan (5100).

4292 (penthos, grief, sadness, mourning), → 4291.

4293 (penichros, poor), → 4288.

4297 πέντε

πέντε (pente), five (4297).

NT Five is common and natural as a round number wherever the decimal system is used (e.g., Matt. 25:20; Lk. 12:52; 14:19; 16:28). There is no clear evidence that this number should be given any symbolic meaning in the NT. The "five months" of Rev. 9:5, 10 are just a limited period of chastisement.

4300 πεντηκοστή

πεντηκοστή (pentēkostē), Pentecost (4300).

OT 1. pentēcostē is a fem. noun formed from the numeral pentēkostos, 50th, which occurs in cl. Gk. In Jewish and Christian lit. the word stands for hē pentēkostē hēmera, the 50th day, referring to the festival celebrated on the 50th day after Passover (Tob. 2:1; 2 Macc. 12:32). In Deut. 16:10 it is called "the Feast of Weeks."

Pentecost was the second great feast of the Jewish year, a harvest festival, when the firstfruits of the wheat harvest were presented to Yahweh. It was celebrated seven weeks after the beginning of the barley harvest (hence "Feast of Weeks"), fifty days after the Passover (hence "Pentecost"; see Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:15–21; Num. 28:26–31; Deut. 16:9–12).

2. Jewish thinking about Pentecost developed during the period before and after Jesus. In Jub. 6:17–21 (ca. 100 B.C.) Pentecost is noted as the feast of covenant renewal (probably also at Qumran). This meant a link between Pentecost and the covenant of Sinai; Exod. 19:1 specifies "the third month" (the month during which Pentecost was celebrated) as the time of the arrival of the Israelites at Sinai. In rab. Jud. Pentecost thus became associated with the giving of the law. But this link between Pentecost and Sinai is not documented before the 2d cent. A.D.

NT 1. Although Luke may have been aware of an association established in Jud. between Pentecost and the law giving at Sinai, it plays no role in his narrative in Acts 2 or elsewhere.

2. (a) To the early Christian community, Pentecost meant the outpouring of the Spirit promised by God for the end time. Charismatic and ecstatic manifestations attributed to God's Spirit were a distinctive feature of both Palestinian and Hel. Christianity (cf. Matt. 3:11; Jn. 7:38–39; Acts 2:38; 6:3–5; 8:14–17; 10:44–48; 19:1–7; Rom. 8:9, 14–15; 1 Cor. 12:13; Eph. 4:8). In particular, Pentecost was seen as the fulfillment of Joel 2:28—"in the last days" (Acts 2:17); the language of Joel 2:28 ("pour out") has stamped itself on early Christian talk about the Spirit (Acts 2:17–18, 33; 10:45; Rom. 5:5; Tit. 3:6). Acts 20:16 even hints that the Jerusalem church observed Pentecost as the anniversary of the Spirit's outpouring (cf. 1 Cor. 16:8).

(b) The first Christian Pentecost was an ecstatic experience involving vision (sound like wind, tongues as of fire) and glossolalia (Acts 2:1–13). It resulted in an enthusiastic community, bound together by their common loyalty to the risen Jesus and by their common experience of the Spirit (3:19–20). The resurrection of Jesus and the gift of Spirit constituted the start of the end-time harvest of final resurrection (Rom. 8:23; 1 Cor. 15:20, 23). They doubtless regarded themselves as the eschatological Israel (cf. Matt. 16:18–19; 19:28; Acts 1:6, 21–22).

The first Christians experienced the Spirit primarily as the prophetic Spirit, in accordance with Jewish expectation (see Joel 2:28). This was the privilege of all and not just the prerogative of a few (Acts 2:1, 4, 17–18, 38–39). The link between Pentecost, covenant renewal, and the giving of the law perhaps prompted the first believers to interpret their experience of the Spirit as the fulfillment of the promise of a new covenant, as the law written in their hearts (Deut. 30:6; Jer. 31:31–34; Ezek. 36:26–27; 37:14; cf. 1 Cor. 11:25; Heb. 10:15–16, 29). But the implications of this insight for continuing faith and conduct were not recognized and elaborated until Paul (Rom. 2:28–29; 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:4–18; Gal. 3:1–4:7; Phil. 3:3; Col. 2:11; 1 Thess. 4:8).

(c) The outpouring of the Spirit was attributed to the exalted Jesus, as implied by John the Baptist's predictions (Matt. 3:11; Acts 1:5; 11:16) and by Acts 2:33. Yet the relationship between the exalted Jesus and the Spirit did not receive much analysis prior to Paul and John.

3. (a) For Luke Pentecost is the fulfillment of the divine promise (Lk. 24:49; Acts 1:4; 2:33, 38–39). Thus it is also the fulfillment of covenant promise (2:39; 3:25; 13:23, 32; 26:6), with Pentecost being the institution of the new covenant. For Luke Pentecost is the birthday of the church (2:38, 41–47), and the Spirit of Pentecost is preeminently the prophetic Spirit, the inspirer of speech (2:4, 18; 4:8, 31; 6:10; 10:46; 13:9; 19:6).

(b) Luke also presents Pentecost as the beginning of world mission, as prophesied by Jesus in Acts 1:8. The gospel begins in Jerusalem, branches out to Judea and Samaria, and goes "to the ends of the earth" (note how the book of Acts ends in Rome, the capital of the empire). Those who bear witness to the effects of the Spirit's outpouring and hear the gospel proclaimed by Peter represent "every nation under heaven" (2:5), while the appended list of nationalities embraces a wide sweep of the eastern Mediterranean (2:9–11). The glossolalia is identified as the languages spoken by these foreign Jews (2:4, 6, 8, 11). Finally, Peter's sermon ends with an open invitation and offer of the promised Spirit to "all who are far off" (2:39).

(c) Luke plays down the eschatological dimension of Pentecost-engendered enthusiasm. Pentecost is not so much the precursor of the end as the beginning of a whole new epoch of salvation history. It becomes most explicit in the sharp distinction that Luke draws between the epoch of Jesus, ended by resurrection appearances and ascension, and Pentecost, the beginning of the epoch of the Spirit. The two are separated by a period of ten days when neither the risen Jesus nor the inspiring Spirit are in evidence and the election of Matthias has to revert to the old epoch's use of lots (Acts 1:26).

4. Jn. 20:22 has sometimes been called "the Johannine Pentecost," not because John is contesting Lk.'s dating of the outpouring of the Spirit, but because he wishes to bring out other theological aspects. (a) John esp. emphasizes that the gift of the Spirit is not to be separated from the event of Jesus' death, resurrection, and ascension; it is the immediate and direct result and consequence of Jesus' "glorification" and "ascending" (6:62–63; 19:30; cf. 19:34 with 7:38–39).

(b) John also affirms the immediate continuity between Jesus and the Spirit. The Spirit is the other Counselor (14:16–17), whose coming fulfills Jesus' promise to return and live in his disciples (14:18–24). The Spirit given by the ascended Jesus enables the believer to share in the life of the risen, glorified Christ (4:14; 6:62–63).

(c) John brings out the epochal significance of the Pentecostal Spirit even more clearly than Luke by the word "breathed" in 20:22. Clearly echoing the same word in Gen. 2:7; Ezek. 37:9; Wis. 15:11, John presents the act of Jesus as a new creation.

(d) Finally, the earlier emphasis on mission is retained by bracketing 20:22 with 20:21 and 23; forgiveness or retention of sins is a charismatic authority and a part of Pentecostal mission; "the disciples" thereby commissioned are not "the twelve" or "the apostles" (never in John) but those gathered round Jesus during his passion (including women), who represent all who believe in Jesus (7:37–39).

4301 (pepoithēsis, trust, confidence), → 4275.

4309 περί

περί (peri), about, around (4309).

CL & OT The basic, local sense of peri is around or encircling; it can also mean concerning, in connection with. Generally the LXX renders the Heb. phrase translated "for a sin offering" with peri hamartias (lit., "in connection with sin"; e.g., Lev. 16:5; Ps. 40:6b). With this abbreviated phrase one should understand the word "offering," i.e., "the offering that relates to sin."

NT 1. The local sense of peri occurs in Acts 22:6 (a bright light flashed "around" Paul). In a derived, fig. meaning, peri designates a center of activity around which something or someone revolves. Thus hoi peri Paulon (13:13; lit., "those around Paul") marks out the apostle as a sun with several satellites. Standing absolutely at the beginning of a sentence, peri (de) means "(now) concerning" and marks a new section of thought (e.g., 1 Cor. 7:1, 25; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1), a point of importance for the reconstruction of the Corinthian letter to Paul (1 Cor. 7–16).

2. In Heb. 10:6, 8 (citing Ps. 40:6, LXX) and probably in Heb. 13:11 (cf. Lev. 16:27) the phrase peri hamartias (see above) means "sin offering." It is possible that the same phrase in the pl. has this nuance in Heb. 5:3b (peri occurs 2x) and 1 Pet. 3:18, but not in Heb. 10:18, 26; 1 Jn. 2:2 (where the phrase is dependent on a noun meaning sacrifice). In Rom. 8:3 peri hamartias can mean "in reference to sin" (i.e., "to atone for sin"), but, given OT usage, the rendering "to be a sin offering" (NIV) or "as a sacrifice for sin" seems more appropriate.

4318 περιεργάζομαι

περιεργάζομαι (periergazomai), meddle, be a busybody (4318); περίεργος (periergos), meddlesome, curious, belonging to magic (4319).

CL & OT periergazomai combines the prep. peri (around, beyond) and ergazomai (work). Thus, its root meaning is to do superfluous work. It does occur in a good sense (investigate thoroughly), but more often it has a bad connotation (take more pains than necessary, be a busybody). The derived adj. periergos has the same range.

In the LXX periergazomai appears in a positive sense in Wis. 8:5 (S^1 only) to describe how wisdom works or accomplishes all things, in a negative sense for meddling in Sir. 3:23. In addition, the vb. appears in two alternative readings in Sym., where it means to seek diligently (2 Sam. 11:3; Eccl. 7:30).

NT periergazomai is used only in 2 Thess. 3:11, where there is a deliberate wordplay on ergazomai. Paul condemns those who are not working but instead are busybodies. periergos refers to young women on the church widows' register who become busybodies through having nothing constructive to do (1 Tim. 5:13). In Acts 19:19 it has a semi-technical sense of sorcery (NIV) or magic arts (see further 3404).

4319 (periergos, meddlesome, curious, belonging to magic), → 3404 and 4318.

4320 (pierchomai, wander), → 2262.

4322 (perizōnnymi, gird with, gird around), → 2439.

4326 (perikatharma, filth, offscouring), → 4370.

4330 (perikephalaia, helmet), → 4483.

4334 (perilampō, surround with light), → 3290.

4335 (perileipomai, survive, leave behind), → 3309.

4338 (perimenō, wait), → 3531.

4342 (periousios, chosen, special), → 4347.

4344 περιπατέω

περιπατέω (peripateō), go about, walk (4344); ἐμπεριπατέω (emperipateō), go about, walk (1853); πατέω (pateō), tread, trample (4251); καταπατέω (katapateō), trample (2922).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. pateō and its compounds denote a stepping movement of the feet: trans. to tread, set foot on, trample down; fig. to treat contemptuously, maltreat, plunder; intrans. to go, walk. katapateō denotes complete crushing or trampling down, often fig. to treat disdainfully, despise. peripateō occurs only with the lit. meaning of strolling; not until the 1st cent. B.C. does one find the meaning to live.

2. In the LXX peripateō is found 34x, most often in the wisdom lit.; emperipateō occurs 9x. In general these two vbs. mean simply to go or to walk about (e.g., Exod. 21:19; 1 Sam. 17:39). Several times God's walking about is spoken of anthropomorphically (Gen. 3:8, 10; Ps. 104:3), as also is Satan's (Job 1:7; 2:2). Occasionally peripateō denotes fig. a way of life (e.g., 2 Ki. 20:3; Eccl. 11:9). The LXX prefers to use poreuomai, to go, in combination with hodos, way, to express that one should conduct one's way of life in the paths indicated by God.

3. According to the Dead Sea Scrolls, God has set two spirits for humans to walk in until the time of their visitation, namely, the spirits of truth and of perversity (1QS 3:18–21). The sons of righteousness walk in the ways of light (i.e., according to the will of God, 5:10); the sons of wickedness walk in the ways of darkness (3:20–21).

NT 1. In the NT peripateō occurs 95x, half of which are lit. and half fig. In the Gospels, Acts, and Rev., the vb. usually means to go, walk about. In 1 Pet. 5:8 it is applied to the devil, who is compared to a lion walking about seeking whom he may devour. In Rev. 2:1; 3:4; 21:24, peripateō denotes walking in the perfection and light of the heavenly Jerusalem. emperipateō occurs only in 2 Cor. 6:16 (cf. Lev. 26:12), of God's covenant relationship with his people, in which he walks among them; this now applies to the church. The simple form pateō, tread, trample, is found at Lk. 10:19; 21:24; Rev. 11:2, in each case with overtones of judgment and power. katapateo means to tread underfoot (Matt. 5:13; 7:6; Lk. 8:5; 12:1), despise (the Son of God, Heb. 10:29).

2. In the fig. sense of to conduct one's life peripateō is found mainly in Paul's and Jn.'s writings (though cf. Mk. 7:5; Acts 21:21; Heb. 13:9, where it refers to observing Jewish customs and traditions). The vb., in itself neutral, is more precisely fixed by designating positively or negatively that to which one conforms one's life.

(a) In Paul two ways of life stand opposed to one another: the (former) heathen way of life (Eph. 2:2, walking in "the ways of this world"; cf. Rom. 8:4; 1 Cor. 3:3), and the (present) walk in Christ (Rom. 8:4, walking "according to the Spirit"; cf. Gal. 5:16; Eph. 5:8; Col. 2:6; NIV often translates as "live"). Since the Christian message involves leading a person dominated by a self-seeking "I" (Gal. 5:16) into a new life (Rom. 6:4) dominated by God and his will, "how to live in order to please God" (1 Thess. 4:1) is a part of this preaching.

(b) Paul starts from the position that humans under the law are under bondage and thus unable to fulfill God's will. By faith in Christ we are promised freedom from these compulsions (Eph. 2:1–10), so that we can now serve God and our neighbor (Rom. 7:6). But we must again and again be exhorted to live in this new reality, because as believers we still live "in the flesh" (2 Cor. 10:3 KJV) and thus remain open to the temptation to living "like mere men" (1 Cor. 3:3), i.e., in a self-seeking way.

As Christians who walk "by faith, not by sight," we must try to please the Lord (2 Cor. 5:7–9; cf. Eph. 5:8–10, 15) and so conduct our lives in a way that corresponds with our holy calling (4:1; 1 Thess. 2:12). This also means an attitude that is sensitive to those who do not belong to the congregation and to what they think about believers (Col. 4:5; 1 Thess. 4:12). In 2 Thess. 3:6 the Thessalonians are urged to keep away from those who are "idle and [do] not live according to [Paul's] teaching."

emperipateō, walk about, move, occurs only in 2 Cor. 6:16, which quotes the promise of Lev. 26:12 that God will walk among his people. Paul sees this covenant promise fulfilled in the Christian community, which is now "the temple of the living God."

(c) In Jn.'s writings peripateō occurs in both lit. and fig. senses. In Jn. 11:9–10 Jesus speaks about walking in daylight or at nighttime, but this verse has a fig. implication for the life of faith versus the life in unbelief. The expressions "walk in the light," "walk in the truth," and "walk in darkness" do not refer to moral or immoral behavior, but existence governed either by God or the world. To walk in the light means to live with one's face turned to God, by faith in Jesus Christ (12:35–36), while to walk in darkness means to have one's life closed to God. Those whose lives are closed to God miss real life (12:35; 1 Jn. 2:11). Jesus, however, has come as the light of the world so that we may find life through him (Jn. 8:12).

Walking in the light (1 Jn. 1:7; 2 Jn. 4; cf. 3 Jn. 3–4) has an ethical side, as the letters of John show. Not mere words, but the whole way one lives, will lead to fellowship with God (1 Jn. 1:6–7). This is the way Jesus himself walked (2:6; cf. 2 Jn. 6), which serves as our example (Jn. 13:14; 1 Jn. 4:11, 19). Living in the light also leads to fellowship with one another (3:16–17). By way of contrast, walking in darkness means having no fellowship with God (1:6); such a life is not determined by love, but by hate (2:11).

See also anastrephō, to overturn, turn back, turn round; fig. behave, conduct oneself, live (418); hodos, way, road, highway, way of life (3847); poreuomai, go, to journey, to travel, to walk (4513).

4346 (peripiptō, fall into, among), → 4406.

4347 περιποιέω

περιποιέω (peripoieō), save for oneself, acquire, gain possession of (4347); περιποίησις (peripoiēsis), gaining, obtaining, acquisition, a possession, property (4348); περιούσιος (periousios), chosen, special (4342); ἴδιος (idios), one's own, possessions, property (2625).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. peripoieō means to cause to save up, procure, keep for oneself. The noun peripoiēsis means keeping safe, preservation, gaining possession of. periousios means having more than enough, rich, wealthy.

2. peripoiēsis occurs in Hag. 2:9 (= LXX 2:10), where (in a LXX addition) the writer speaks of a peace of mind that is acquired by those who work hard to raise the temple. The word is also in Mal. 3:17, where God's chosen people are his treasured "possession." In a similar phrase, periousios is used of God's chosen people at Exod. 19:5; Deut. 7:6; 14:2; 26:18. The idea behind periousios is not just that of Israel as God's property but that of his rich possession.

NT 1. In the NT peripoieō (3x) and peripoiēsis (5x) are preferred to periousios (once). The idea of salvation stands in the background. The vb. occurs at Lk. 17:33 ("Whoever tries to keep [peripoieō] his life will lose it"); Acts 20:28 ("Be shepherds of the church of God, which he bought [peripoieō] with his own blood"); and 1 Tim. 3:13 ("Those who have served well gain [peripoieō] an excellent standing and great assurance in their faith").

peripoiēsis occurs in Eph. 1:14, where the Spirit is said to be "a deposit guaranteeing our inheritance until the redemption of those who are God's possession [peripoiēseis]." In 1 Thess. 5:9 Paul assures his readers that God has destined us "to receive [peripoiēsis] salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ"; in 2 Thess. 2:14 it is the glory of the Lord Jesus that we "share." Heb. 10:39 refers to those who believe and "are saved" (lit., "for the preserving [peripoiēsis] of the soul"; cf. Lk. 17:33). Finally, 1 Pet. 2:9 takes up the thought of Exod. 19:5, where one of Peter's phrases for God's people is "a people belonging [peripoiēsis] to God."

2. periousios occurs only in Tit. 2:14, which describes the work of Christ, who redeems us from all wickedness and purifies for himself "a people that are his very own [periousios], eager to do what is good." As in the OT, we see the idea of God's treasured people (cf. Exod. 19:5; Deut. 14:2), but it is applied to the church not to Israel. Paul draws attention to the kind of deeds that God's people should be zealous to perform.

3. The adj. idios (113x in the NT) means own and is used in a variety of contexts and meanings: e.g., each according to one's own ability (Matt. 25:15), each receiving wages according to one's own work (1 Cor. 3:8), one's own (private) interpretation (2 Pet. 1:20), his own sheep (Jn. 10:3–4), each in turn (1 Cor. 15:23), with our own hands (4:12). As an adv. idia means by oneself, privately (Matt. 14:13; 1 Cor. 12:11).

The neut. pl. (ta idia) means one's home or one's things. In the NT it appears to mean "home" in Jn. 16:32. In 1:11 we read: "He came to that which was his own, but his own did not receive him." The first "his own" is neut. pl., whereas the second "his own" is masc. pl. The first perhaps refers to the world that Christ created and everything in it (a concept prominent in the context), whereas the masc. pl. almost certainly means the Jewish people, who by and large rejected Jesus as the Messiah.

Lk. 18:28 follows the story of the rich young ruler, who refused to sell all he had to give to the poor and follow Jesus. ta idia here may be translated as homes or possessions: "Then Peter said, 'Look, we have left our homes [ta idia] and followed you'" (NRSV; the par. in Matt. 19:27 and Mk. 10:28 have panta, all things). In response, Jesus assures that those who have put him ahead of "home or wife or brothers or parents or children" will receive much in this age and eternal life in the age to come (Lk. 18:29–30).

See also thēsauros, treasure box, chest, storeroom, treasure (2565); mamōnas, money, wealth, property (3440); ploutos, wealth, riches (4458); chrēma, property, wealth, means, money (5975).

4348 (peripoiēsis, gaining, acquisition, possession, property), → 4347.

4353 (perisseia, surplus, abundance), → 4355.

4354 (perisseuma, abundance, fullness), → 4355.

4355 περισσεύω

περισσεύω (perisseuō), be more than enough, be left over, be abundant, abound, excel (4355); περισσός (perissos), exceeding the usual number or size, extraordinary, abundant (4356); περισσότερος (perissoteros), greater, more (4358); περισσοτέρως (perissoterōs), adv. more (4359); περισσῶς (perissōs), exceedingly, beyond measure (4360); ὑπερπερισσεύω (hyperperisseuō), increase all the more (5668); ὑπερπερισσῶς (hyperperissōs), beyond all measure (5669); ὑπερεκπερισσοῦ (hyperekperissou), beyond all measure (5655); περισσεία (perisseia), surplus, abundance (4353); περίσσευμα (perisseuma), abundance, fullness (4354).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. perisseuō is used intrans. in the sense of to be over and above, go beyond, be more than enough, remain over. perissos means beyond the regular number or size, out of the common, extraordinary, more than sufficient, excessive. perissōs means extraordinarily, exceedingly.

2. perisseuō and its cognates are not common in the LXX. (a) perisseia occurs only in Eccl., usually in the sense of gain, advantage: "What does man gain from all his labor at which he toils under the sun?" (1:3). The wise man like the fool (2:14b; 6:8) and humanity like the animal world (3:19) must leave this world and be forgotten. God freely bestows earthly goods (6:2), so we should enjoy them in gratitude and not haggle with God over the place allotted to us (6:9–10). Such wisdom that recognizes the freedom of the Creator is real gain (7:12, 19).

(b) perisseuō means to have precedence (1 Macc. 3:30), posterity (1 Sam. 2:33, 36), but elsewhere to have abundance (Sir. 11:12). According to 19:24, the one who is too sure of wisdom stands in greater danger of transgressing the law.

(c) perissos denotes what is over, the remainder (Exod. 10:5; 2 Ki. 25:11), that which is superfluous and useless (Eccl. 2:15). But it also denotes what is extraordinary and outstanding (Dan. 5:12, 14, Theod.).

3. Certain books of intertestamental Jud. expected in the end time an abundance and blessed profusion of all desirable goods: numerous offspring, possessions, superabundant crops (1 Enoch 10:17–11:2; 2 Bar. 29:5–8), as well as joy (1 Enoch 51:5), righteousness, and wisdom (48:1).

NT In the NT perisseuō occurs 39x; perissos and its comparative and adverbial forms 38x; perisseuma 5x; perisseia 4x; and forms with the prefix hyper- 6x. All the words occur mainly in the Pauline writings and the Gospels. An element of excess and fullness that overflows the set bounds is inherent in all the words. The existing standards and rules are transcended, and what was comparable becomes incomparable.

1. (a) In the Gospels perisseuō and its cognates are found with the primary meaning to have abundance, have many goods. Thus Mk. 12:44 tells of the widow who gave all that she possessed, whereas others gave of their abundance. Lk. 12:15 warns of misplaced trust in the abundance of possessions. The proverbial utterance in Matt. 12:34 declares: "For out of the overflow of the heart the mouth speaks." The more Jesus commanded people not to tell of his healing work, "the more" (mallon perissoteron) they proclaimed it (Mk. 7:36). The secret of his person exerted pressure on others to proclaim it openly in view of his mighty acts. The people "were overwhelmed" (hyperperissōs) with amazement (7:37), and likewise the disciples were "completely" (ek perissou) amazed at Jesus' walking on the water and quieting the storm (6:51).

(b) As the one who prepared the way for Jesus, John was more than a prophet (Matt. 11:9). But the victorious breaking in of the kingdom with Jesus showed that John stood at the threshold of a new era. This is brought out strikingly in the accounts of the feeding of the four thousand (Matt. 15:32–39; Mk. 8:1–10) and the five thousand (Matt. 14:13–21; Mk. 6:30–44; Lk. 9:10–17; Jn. 6:1–13). All the accounts mention the quantities of bread that were left over (e.g., 7 baskets "left over" [perisseumata], Mk. 8:8). Those who belong to Jesus have life and have it "to the full" (perisson, Jn. 10:10). The prodigal son reflected that his father's servants had bread enough and to spare (Lk. 15:17). All this shows that the father has abundant grace that he holds out to the lost.

(c) Corresponding to the offer of abundant grace is the requirement that the disciples' righteousness must exceed greatly (perisseusē . . . pleion) that of the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 5:20; cf. 5:47). Jesus' radical expectation raises the anxious question as to who can be saved (19:25; Mk. 10:26; Lk. 18:26). The NT precludes all self-security, riches in their widest sense (Matt. 19:24), and Pharisaic casuistry (5:37; 15:4–5). Faith should rely on the fact that with God all things are possible (19:26), and therefore God can make obedience possible to faith.

The two great commandments to love God with one's entire self and one's neighbor as oneself are the foundation of the Law and the Prophets (Matt. 22:37–40). There are no greater (perissoteron) commandments than these (Mk. 12:33). By contrast, those who devour widows' houses and for a pretence make long prayers will receive the greater (perissoteron) condemnation (12:40; Lk. 20:47). Those who receive more from the Lord will be asked to give "much more" (perissoteron, 12:48; cf. Matt. 13:12).

2. (a) Paul uses perisseuō and its cognates in Rom. when he speaks of God's justifying grace. Thus he explains, "The law was added so that trespass might increase. But where sin increased, grace increased all the more (hypereperisseusen)" (5:20). The glory of the law now seems to have no glory because of the "surpassing glory" of the ministry of Jesus, inasmuch as "the ministry that condemns men" is surpassed by "the ministry that brings righteousness" (2 Cor. 3:9–10). As sin gained dominance in Adam, so grace abounded (eperisseusen) in Christ (Rom. 5:15; cf. 10:4). Because the abundance (perisseia) of grace cannot be exhausted, there can be no place for reliance on fulfilling the law (3:20). The advantage (perisson) of the Jews (3:1) consists in the fact that they were entrusted with the oracles of God. But their denial cannot hinder the victorious course of grace. Rather, it brings about the fact that whatever humankind does enhances God's glory (3:7). Moreover, it means that God's grace has now come to the Gentiles (11:11).

Jew and Gentile alike are utterly dependent on grace (cf. Rom. 11:32). In view of this, Paul prays: "May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace as you trust in him, so that you may overflow (perisseuein) with hope by the power of the Holy Spirit" (15:13). Eph. 3:20 states that by the power at work in us God is able to do "immeasurably more" (hyperekperissou) than what we can ask or imagine, while 1:7–10 defines the riches of his grace that "he lavished" (eperisseusen) on us as "redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins." Being rooted and built up in Christ, believers should live in him, "overflowing (perisseuontes) with thankfulness" (Col. 2:7).

(b) Just as Paul, prior to conversion, was obsessed (perissōs) with persecuting the church (Acts 26:11) and the traditions of the law (Gal. 1:14), he pursued with the same zeal the saving work of Christ in the building up and sanctification of the churches (cf. 1 Cor. 15:58; Phil. 1:9, 26; 1 Thess. 3:12; 4:1, 10; in each case the vb. perisseueō appears). In 3:10 Paul states that he prayed "most earnestly" (hyperekperissou) day and night that he might be with the Thessalonian church to supply what was lacking in their faith (cf. 2:17). He urged the Corinthians to use their gifts for building up the church, so that they might "excel" (1 Cor. 14:12).

The apostle knows how to be in need and how to "have plenty" (perisseuein), according to whether the former is commanded or the latter given (Phil. 4:12; cf. 4:18). He has striven more and suffered more (perissoterōs, 1 Cor. 15:10; 2 Cor. 11:23; 12:15). He thus had more cause for boasting than his opponents (1:12; 10:8). But his way is to be satisfied with the power that proves itself in weakness (12:9). Hence, imprisonment and suffering arouse in him more courage to bear witness (Phil. 1:14).

(c) In 2 Cor. perisseuō is featured in a particular way in connection with the collection for the Jerusalem church. Paul is concerned with more than the money that is brought in. It is a test of love for the churches, which shows whether it corresponds to Christ's self-sacrifice (8:8–9). Thus he praises the churches of Macedonia that "out of the most severe trial, their overflowing (perisseia) joy and their extreme poverty welled up (eperisseusen) in rich generosity" (8:2). The apostle expresses his conviction that "God is able to make all grace abound (perisseusai) to you, so that ... you will abound (perisseuēte) in every good work" (9:8). Perhaps a further play on words is intended by his introductory remark that "there is no need (perisson) for me to write to you about this service for the saints" (9:1). The collection represented and established a key link between the Jerusalem church and the Gentile churches: "This service ... is also overflowing (perisseuousa) in many expressions of thanks to God" (9:12).

3. Heb. warns the church, threatened by persecution, to keep its eyes on its goal and to pay more careful (perissoterōs) attention to the teaching it has been given (Heb. 2:1). When God desired to make "very clear" (perissoteron) to the heirs of promise his unchangeable character, he interposed with an oath (6:17). Finally, the character of Christ's priesthood becomes "even more (perissoteron) clear" (7:15) in view of the testimony of Ps. 110:4 to being a priest forever in the order of Melchizedek.

See also gemō, to load, be full (1154); plēthos, number, multitude, crowd (4436); plēroō, fill, complete, fulfill, accomplish, carry out (4444); chortazō, to feed, fatten, fill (5963); chōreō, have or make room, give way, go (6003).

4356 (perissos, extraordinary, abundant), → 4355.

4358 (perissoteros, greater, more abundant), → 4355.

4359 (perissoterōs, adv. more, greater), → 4355.

4360 (perissōs, exceedingly, beyond measure), → 4355.

4361 (peristera, dove), → 4374.

4362 περιτέμνω

περιτέμνω (peritemnō), circumcise (4362); περιτομή (peritomē), circumcision (4364); ἀπερίτμητος (aperitmētos), uncircumcised (598); κατατομή (katatomē), mutilation (2961); ἀκροβυστία (akrobystia), foreskin, uncircumcision, hence Gentiles (213).

CL & OT 1. peritemnō means lit. cut round. From cl. times on it was used as a technical term for the separation or removal of the male prepuce or of the female clitoris. peritomē was the technical term for circumcision. aperitmētos means unmutilated, uncircumcised. In secular Gk. this word group with its religious associations was used only with reference to foreign peoples, esp. the Egyptians, for the Greeks did not practice circumcision.

2. The words of this group are of great theological importance in the OT, where they are used exclusively to identify circumcision as a cultic practice. (a) Circumcision gained significance through its connection with faith in Yahweh and its obligatory role as a distinguishing mark of membership in the covenant. It is first described in Gen. 17:1–14, where Yahweh commanded it as the sign and seal of his covenant with Abraham.

Circumcision was evidently not practiced among adult males at certain periods in Israel's history (Jos. 5:2–7). But its mandatory use is clearly reflected by the ordinances in Gen. 17:12; 21:4; and Lev. 12:3. Not merely the children of Jewish parents, but also slaves, whether born in the house or bought, were to be circumcised (Gen. 17:12–13). This applied also to the foreigner who came to believe in Yahweh (cf. Exod. 12:48). Only the circumcised might eat the Passover meal (12:43–48). Anyone refusing circumcision was in breach of the covenant and was to be cut off from the people (Gen. 17:14).

(b) In addition to the physical meaning of circumcision, the OT knows a spiritualized sense. Only the man who lets his heart be circumcised (i.e., who humbles himself before God, accepts the punishment of his iniquity [Lev. 26:41], and so repledges his loyalty to the covenant) is really circumcised "to the LORD" (Jer. 4:4; cf. 9:25; Ezek. 44:9). The recognition that physical circumcision could in some circumstances cause false confidence led to the use of this deepened meaning of the concept as a call to Israel to repent: "Circumcise your hearts, therefore, and do not be stiffnecked any longer" (Deut. 10:16). Paul's thought coincides with this understanding of circumcision as a new noncultic, but complete surrender to God (cf. Rom. 2:25–27).

3. In Hel. and Roman periods circumcision was a confessional sign of Jud. Antiochus IV Epiphanes (176–163 B.C.), for example, threatened those who circumcised their children with the same penalty as murder (1 Macc. 1:48–50). But Jewish women preferred death to abandoning God's holy law, refusing to have their children circumcised (1:60–61). For the Jews apostasy, renunciation of faith, and breach of the covenant were expressed by the word epispasmos, the surgical replacement of the foreskin. The spiritual interpretation of circumcision is found in Qumran.

NT peritemnō, circumcise, is found 17x in the NT; peritomē, 36x. It has three main meanings: circumcision itself, the fact of being circumcised (e.g., Phil. 3:5), and a euphemism for the Jews (e.g., Tit. 1:10). aperitmētos, uncircumcised (Acts 7:51), and katatomē, mutilation (Phil. 3:2), are each found once. The opposite of peritomē (akrobystia) occurs 20x in the NT, mostly in Paul. Like peritomē, it means the foreskin, the fact of being uncircumcised (e.g., Rom. 4:10), and the Gentiles (e.g., 3:30).

1. In the Gospels, circumcision is used only in its physical meaning. Lk. 1:59 and 2:21 tell of the naming of John the Baptist and of Jesus on the occasion of their circumcision on the eighth day after birth (cf. Acts 7:8; Phil. 3:5). Jn. 7:22–23 assumes the Jewish custom and its position in the law in order to throw doubt on the rab. concepts of how the Sabbath was to be hallowed. The contradiction lay in the fact that, when the eighth day fell on a Sabbath, circumcision, far from profaning it, was actually commanded. Yet the Jews were angry with Jesus "for healing the whole man."

2. The word group is important chiefly in the Pauline letters and Acts, where it illustrates the tension between Paul and the circumcision party. Early Christian communities saw a tension between believers from among the circumcised (i.e., Jewish Christians; Acts 10:45; cf. 11:2; Rom. 3:30; Gal. 2:12; Col. 4:11; Tit. 1:10) and those called the uncircumcision (i.e., Gentile Christians; Eph. 2:11; cf. Acts 11:3; Rom. 4:10; 1 Cor. 7:18). These two groups constantly clashed, because the Jewish Christians insisted that circumcision was necessary for salvation: "Unless you are circumcised, according to the custom taught by Moses, you cannot be saved" (Acts 15:1; cf. 15:5).

James and the elders of the Jerusalem church held discussions with Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, because they had heard rumors that he taught that not merely Gentile Christians but also Jewish Christians were free from the law of circumcision (Acts 21:21). After all, Paul made freedom from the law through Christ's death and resurrection a central point in his proclamation. He stressed that the gospel for the uncircumcised (the Gentiles) had been entrusted to him, even as that for the Jews (the circumcised) had been to Peter (Gal. 2:7). This clearly implied freedom from the law of circumcision. This freedom had been supported at the Apostolic Council (Acts 15:19–20; cf. Gal. 2:6–10) and had included his fellow workers like Titus (2:3).

Is there a contradiction, then, in Paul's circumcision of Timothy (Acts 16:3)? Not at all. According to Jewish law, Timothy was a Jew and so should have been circumcised; thus Paul was only making good what should have been done years before. Moreover, since Paul claimed to "have become all things to all men so that by all possible means I might save some" (1 Cor. 9:22), this included becoming as a Jew in order to win Jews (cf. 9:20). Paul's witness in the synagogues would have been seriously curtailed and damaged had he left the Jew Timothy uncircumcised (cf. also Acts 21:17–26).

If Paul had a "sharp dispute and debate" with the Jewish Christians about circumcision (Acts 15:2), it was not that he was concerned merely with a cultic act. The issue was linked with the whole question of law and freedom, for anyone who accepted circumcision obligated himself to keep the whole law. That is why he was so intransigent and why he took Peter's vacillation on the matter so seriously (Gal. 2:11–14). Jews believed that circumcision made one a member of the covenant people once and for all. Using Jewish arguments, Paul took an extreme position on the relationship of circumcision and the Mosaic law, stressing that only for those who did the will of God without reserve was circumcision a true sign of the covenant. Breaking the law meant that circumcision becomes uncircumcision (Rom. 2:25; cf. also Phil. 3:2). To keep the law completely by one's own unaided power is impossible. Life must be lived by the grace revealed in Christ, for "Christ is the end of the law" (Rom. 10:4; cf. also Gal. 3).

For the church, therefore, circumcision can never have the importance it had in Jud. For Paul, believers "are the circumcision, we who worship by the Spirit of God, who glory in Christ Jesus, and who put no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. 3:3; cf. 3:5; Gal. 6:13–14). In Rom. 3:1–2 Paul speaks of a relative value attached to circumcision because of the promises connected with it. But he means only to stress that the fulfillment of the promises is solely dependent on faith, irrespective of circumcision. For God "will justify the circumcised by faith and the uncircumcised through that same faith" (3:30).

Rom. 4:7–12 shows that from the standpoint of eternity it is immaterial whether or not a man is circumcised. There Paul calls Abraham as his chief witness for his concept of the equal value of Jewish Christian and Gentile Christian faith. Abraham is equally "father" of both groups (4:11–12). If in 15:8 Paul can warn the Gentiles against pride by pointing out that, historically speaking, Christ "has become a servant of the Jews [lit., circumcised]" for the sake of God's trustworthiness and faithfulness, it has to be understood in the context of 11:17–24 (cf. 15:5–13).

Fundamentally neither circumcision nor uncircumcision have any decisive value in God's sight. The main question is how one reacts to the total claim of God. We may reject it, as, to Paul's grief, many circumcised did, or we may put our faith in Jesus and allow it to become effective through love (cf. 1 Cor. 7:19; Gal. 5:6; 6:15; Col. 3:11). Theologically, the question of circumcision turns on whether one is circumcised in heart through the Spirit (Rom. 2:29; cf. Acts 7:51). Jesus Christ has made the circumcised and the uncircumcised one (Eph. 2:14–22), a new creation (Gal. 6:15).

This new nature is put on in the act of baptism, which is depicted in Col. 2:11–12 as spiritual circumcision. When the old nature is put off and the new one put on, old contrasts are suspended by a new reality. Now "there is no Greek or Jew, circumcised or uncircumcised . . . but Christ is all, and is in all" (3:11).

4364 (peritomē, circumcision), → 4362.

4368 (periphroneō, despise), → 2969.

4370 περίψημα

περίψημα (peripsēma), filth (4370); περικάθαρμα (perikatharma) filth, offscouring (4326).

CL & OT From peripsaō, wipe round, rub clean, peripsēma means that which is wiped off, refuse, scum; or that which effects cleansing (lit., bath towel; fig., expiatory sacrifice). Communities often placated angry gods by offering a human sacrifice as a scapegoat. For such sacrifices the "scum" of society (e.g., criminals, paupers, deformed persons) were regularly recruited; thus the pejorative sense of peripsēma was reinforced. perikatharma is almost synonymous with peripsēma: a guilt-laden expiatory sacrifice, particularly a human one, and a term of contempt for the victims (human rubbish).

In the LXX peripsēma occurs only in Tob. 5:18, meaning a sacrifice or ransom in virtue of which God will protect Tobias's life. perikatharma occurs only in Prov. 21:18, where God in his providence expends the wicked in order to preserve the upright (cf. Isa. 43:3–4); note how this pattern was reversed in Christ's cross (cf. 1 Pet. 3:18).

NT In the NT, both words occur once only, in 1 Cor. 4:13, as Paul's ironic description of the apostles as those who, by throwing away their lives, were bringing benefit to others (see 2 Cor. 4:10–17; 6:10; Phil. 2:17; Col. 1:24).

See also rhypos, dirt (4866); skybalon, refuse, dung (5032).

4374 πετεινόν

πετεινόν (peteinon), bird (4374); περιστερά (peristera), dove (4361).

CL & OT The adj. peteinos, able to fly, winged, as a subst. means bird. In the Greco-Roman world some birds were held as sacred and could even represent the deity.

Among those animals created by God are "every winged bird" (Gen. 1:21; cf. Ps. 78:27). The OT law distinguishes between clean and unclean birds (Lev. 11:13–19; Deut. 14:11–20); generally speaking, the latter are birds of prey. Numerous references to hunters, fowlers, and traps suggest that birds were eaten for food (Lev. 17:13; Job 18:8–10; Ps. 124:7; Prov. 6:5; Jer. 5:27; Hos. 7:12; Amos 3:5). Doves and pigeons were offered in sacrifice (Lev. 1:14–17; cf. Gen. 8:20). On the birth of a child the mother was to offer a lamb for a burnt offering and a young pigeon or turtledove for a sin offering to make atonement; in cases of poverty two turtledoves or two young pigeons were sufficient (Lev. 12:6–8). The fact that the parents of Jesus offered the latter is an indication of their poverty (Lk. 2:24).

Birds often took on a fig. significance in the OT. Referring to the exodus, Moses reminds the people how Yahweh bore them "on eagles' wings" and brought them to himself (Exod. 19:4; cf. Ps. 103:5; Jer. 49:22; Obad. 4). The eagle also appears as one of the four living creatures in Ezek. 1:10 and in contexts of judgment (Deut. 28:49; Jer. 49:16; Hab. 1:8; cf. Lam. 4:19; Hos. 8:1). In Job 39:27–30 the eagle represents the unfathomable wisdom of God.

Birds can depict desolation (Ps. 102:6–7; Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14). But they can also be the object of God's care (Job 38:41; Ps. 84:3; 147:9). By way of contrast, the flitting of the sparrow and swallow illustrates the ineffectuality of a causeless curse under the providence of God (Prov. 26:2). Birds can also serve humans (Gen. 8:6–12). Elijah subsisted for a time on the food brought by ravens (1 Ki. 17:4–6). Flocks of quail providentially provided Israel with food in their desert wanderings (Exod. 16:13; Num. 11:31–32; Ps. 105:40).

NT As in the OT, birds in the NT illustrate the workings of divine providence. Apart from Peter's denial of Jesus three times before the rooster crowed (Matt. 26:34, 75; Mk.

14:30, 72; Lk. 22:34, 61; Jn. 18:27), virtually all the other allusions to birds have a theological significance. Jesus urged his disciples not to be anxious about the necessities of life. God provides for the birds, who know nothing of anxious toil, and humans have more value than they (Matt. 6:26; Lk. 12:24). Jesus' comment that foxes have holes and birds have nests but that the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head (Matt. 8:20; Lk. 9:58), is a summons to utter trust and abandonment to the providence of the Father.

The question "Are not two sparrows sold for a penny? Yet not one of them will fall to the ground apart from the will of your Father" (Matt. 10:29; cf. Lk. 12:6) underlines the stark realities of the situation. The birds were not sold as pets but as food for the poor. This saying follows a warning not to fear those who kill the body and can do no more, but to fear him who has power to kill and to cast into hell. The saying, therefore, does not promise being spared from suffering and death but gives assurance of God's love and providential ordering in life and death. It expresses poignantly what Paul expressed in his exultant celebration of God's providence in Rom. 8:28–39.

Birds feature in the parables of the sower and the mustard seed. In the former they depict the activity of the devil in removing the seed of the word that is not understood (Matt. 13:4, 19; Mk. 4:4, 15; Lk. 8:5, 12). In the latter, the fact that birds can make nests in the branches of a tree emphasizes the sureness of the growth of the kingdom from apparently insignificant beginnings (Matt. 13:32; Mk. 4:32; Lk. 13:19).

One of the most striking sayings in the Gospels is Matt. 23:37–39, where Jesus expresses his love over Jerusalem in terms of a hen and her chicks, but also his judgment for their refusal to accept his care. He is addressing the crowds, commenting harshly on the teachers of the law and the Pharisees (cf. 23:1–36). Far from being a source of light and refuge, the religious leaders have been misleading the people and persecuting the prophets of God—both in the past and in Jesus' own day. The temple, which should have been the true sanctuary of God for the people, was not fulfilling that role. Thus, Jesus may be implying that he is the true sanctuary and assuming the role of both the temple and Yahweh as the refuge of the people.

The context in Matt. 23:37–39 also suggests a wider application. Jesus' saying follows the denunciation of these who build the tombs of the prophets and upon whom will come the blood of the righteous from Abel to Zechariah (Matt. 23:29–36; cf. Lk. 11:45–52). Jesus' desire to protect the children of Jerusalem in his earthly ministry is but the climax of the same divine desire throughout history. Thus Jesus makes it clear that the day of opportunity is irrevocably lost. Judgment on the house of Israel is now inevitable. At the same time it will vindicate Jesus, whose messianic return will be welcomed.

The dove became a symbol of virtues for the early Christians. This finds expression in the saying: "Be as shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves" (Matt. 10:16). At Jesus' baptism the Holy Spirit appeared "like a dove" (3:16; Mk. 1:10; Lk. 3:22; Jn. 1:32). The symbolism here may recall the Spirit of God brooding on the waters (cf. Gen. 1:2), suggesting the guiding presence of the Creator Spirit in the new creative work about to begin through Christ (cf. Jn. 1:1–10; 2 Cor. 4:6 for passages that link Christ's work with that of creation).

Peter's vision of a great sheet containing all kinds of animals, reptiles, and birds (Acts 10:12; 11:6), which he was commanded to kill and eat, symbolized that God has now accepted what was hitherto unclean. The way was open to receive Gentiles into the fellowship of the church, since they had already received the Holy Spirit.

4376 πέτρα

πέτρα (petra), rock (4376); πέτρος (petros), stone, rock, Peter (4377); Κηφᾶς (kēphas), Cephas (rock, the Aram. name given to Peter) (3064); πετρώδης (petrōdēs), rocky (4378).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. petra means rock, boulder, and stone as material; by the 5th cent. B.C. it could denote hard-heartedness. petros means a (broken off) piece of rock, stone. A strict distinction of meaning cannot be maintained, however, for petros can mean rock, and petra, stone.

2. In the LXX petros is found only at 2 Macc. 1:16 and 4:41, in the sense of stone; petra, rock (occurring about 100x), usually translates the Heb. ṣûr, rock, or sela', rock, crag, cliff (e.g., Exod. 17:6; Num. 20:8). Rocks provide a refuge for animals (Ps. 104:18; Prov. 30:26 = LXX 24:61) and for humans (1 Sam. 13:6). On the day of Yahweh people will creep into the clefts of the rocks to escape from the terrible majesty of God (Isa. 2:19). Since a rock affords protection and thus also strength, God himself is described as David's "rock" (2 Sam. 22:2; cf. Gen. 49:24). The LXX avoids the word petra in Gen. 49:24 and instead makes use of a circumlocution (cf. also Ps. 31:4; 62:7).

A rock is also the scene of divine revelation (Jdg. 6:20–21; 13:19). The numinous character of the divine revelation is evident in the way rocks are torn apart by God or by his word (1 Ki. 19:11; Jer. 23:29; Nah. 1:6). The memory of the miracle recorded in Exod. 17:1–6, Num. 20:1–13, where Moses brought water out of the rock by striking it at God's command, is reflected in such passages as Neh. 9:15; Ps. 78:15–16. A similar miracle, the feeding of the people with honey from the rock, is recorded at Deut. 32:13; Ps. 81:16. In a transferred sense the rock is also a symbol of firmness and resolution (Isa. 50:7; Ezek. 3:9) and of stubborn resistance (Jer. 5:3).

The rabbis, taking up Isa. 51:1–2, describe Abraham as a rock. The Qumran community is compared to a building with foundations on the rock; the image of the cornerstone is likewise present in Qumran writings.

NT 1. In the NT petros occurs 155x, all but Jn. 1:42 as a second name for Simon. petra occurs 15x. In the parable at the end of the Sermon on the Mount Jesus refers to those who hear and do his word as those who build a house on a rock, i.e., on a firm, sure foundation (Matt. 7:24–25; cf. also Deut. 28:15, 30). The parable of the sower speaks of the seed that falls on the rock (Lk. 8:6, 13); Matt. 13:5, 20; Mk. 4:5, 16 speak of "rocky ground" (petrōdēs). According to Matt. 27:51, the death of Jesus is accompanied by earthquakes and the splitting of rocks; Joseph of Arimathea laid Jesus' corpse in a tomb hewn out of the rock (27:60; Mk. 15:46). According to Rev. 6:15–17 people will hide themselves in the caves and rocks of the mountains; behind this description lies not only Isa. 2, but a recollection of Hos. 10:8.

2. Three sets of passages require particular attention: Rom. 9:33 and 1 Pet. 2:8; 1 Cor. 10:3–4; and Matt. 16:18.

(a) Rom. 9:33 and 1 Pet. 2:8 refer to "a rock that makes [men] fall," which is interpreted Christologically (a quotation from Isa. 8:14). This is further developed in Isa. 28:16 to that of the cornerstone (→ gōnia, 1224), which, according to Ps. 118:22, was rejected by the builders. Isa. 8:13–15 promises that Yahweh will be a sanctuary to those who fear him, but those who disdain him will break themselves on him.

Paul sees a fulfillment of Isa. 8:14 in the Jewish rejection of Christ, esp. because Israel pursued a righteousness based on law and works and not on faith (Rom. 9:33; cf. 9:31–32). But the Gentiles who did not pursue righteousness have found it through faith (9:30). In 1 Pet. 2:8 the Isa. passage underlines the contrast between the disobedient (i.e., the old Israel, who rejected Christ) and the "spiritual house" of God, the "holy priesthood" that offers spiritual sacrifices (2:5; i.e., the church, cf. 2:7).

(b) In 1 Cor. 10:3–4 Paul refers to the miracles of Exod. 17 and Num. 20: The fathers in the desert "all ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink, for they drank from the spiritual rock that accompanied them, and that rock was Christ." Regarding these two OT passages, Jewish rabbis had concluded that the rock that provided the water kept following the Israelites on their journey, though they did not give a messianic interpretation of the passage. Paul also interprets the OT miracle in the light of the Lord's Supper, which is spiritual food and spiritual drink having its origin in Christ. This OT narrative is a type foreshadowing the Christ event (cf. also Jn. 6:35–58; 7:37).

(c) (i) In Matt. 16:18 Jesus calls Peter the rock on which he will build his church: "And I tell you that you are Peter [petros], and on this rock [petra] I will build my church, and the gates of Hades [hadēs, 87] will not overcome it." The basis here is a play on the words petros and petra. According to Mk. 3:16 and Jn. 1:42, Jesus gave Simon the name Peter. Jn. 1:42, the only place in the NT where the noun petros is used in its normal sense, states that Kēphas (Cephas) means petros. Both the Aram. transliteration and the Gk. translation, kēphas/petros, can mean rock, and thus petra in Matt. 16:18 can be translated as rock. The assonance of the words makes it immediately evident that Peter is the "rock-man," the foundation on which Jesus will build his church. Normally one would expect petra in both halves of Matt. 16:18, but since petra is a fem. noun, the NT chooses the less usual masc. Gk. word petros, which is Peter's name.

(ii) But in what sense is Peter the rock? Note that as early as the beginning of the 3d cent. A.D. the Roman pope began using Matt. 16:18–19 to support his claim to be head of the church, asserting that this position had been given to him by Christ as the successor of Peter. The Gospel account, however, makes no mention of Peter's successors. Furthermore, the follow-up comment about binding and loosing is extended to all the apostles in 18:18. Peter, therefore, is in 16:18 a representative of all the apostles, who together formed and laid the foundation of the church (see Eph. 2:20; Rev. 21:14).

For many evangelicals, however, this interpretation is not satisfactory. In Matt. 16:18 Jesus is not speaking of the laying of foundations, but of building the church. Note how Paul, who acknowledges Peter's apostleship (Gal. 2:8), states clearly in 2:14 that "the truth of the gospel" stands as the norm binding on all apostles, even on Peter. It is this truth that underlies the conferring of apostolic authority on Peter in Matt. 16:18. It is implied in the confession that Jesus is the Christ, for like the gospel itself this confession is based on divine revelation (Matt. 16:17; Gal. 1:12). This confession, which is the source of all apostolic authority, points us to Christ as the true foundation of the church (1 Cor. 3:11).

Understood in this light, the words of Matt. 16:18 are simply an interpretation of Peter's confession of Christ in 16:16. This view accords with that of the Reformers. They did not see the church as founded on the person of Peter, certainly not on his subjective act of faith; for them the rock foundation on which Christ built his church was the eternal, unchangeable truth of Peter's confession about Christ. The church founded on this rock is covered by Christ's promise even today, that the gates of hell will not prevail against it.

(iii) Even if Peter himself is seen as the rock, the passage gives no grounds for thinking that Jesus gave the name Cephas because of his stable character. In fact, his vacillation under pressure gives a certain irony to the name (cf. Matt. 26:31–35, 69–75; Gal. 2:11–21). It would appear, therefore, that Peter is the rock in the sense that he is the first member of the church proper. He is the first to confess Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God. As such, he is informed and assured that flesh and blood has not revealed this to him but the Father in heaven (Matt. 16:16–17).

In the mission outreach of the church, Peter uses the keys of the kingdom (Matt. 16:19; cf. Isa. 22:22; Rev. 1:18; 3:7; → kleis, key, 3090) in opening the church first to the Jews (Acts 2) and then to the Gentiles (Acts 10) by proclaiming the gospel to them. He exercises leadership in the appointment of Matthias to the apostolic band as a replacement for Judas (1:15–26) and discipline in the case of Ananias and Sapphira (5:1–11). He figures prominently in the early days of the church in bearing witness before the Jews and their leaders (4:8–22; 5:15, 29; 9:32).

However, once the church is thereby opened and established, Peter's foundational role is essentially over. After his imprisonment (Acts 12) he begins to occupy a less prominent place. Peter's work is confined to the Jewish mission (Gal. 2:8). In the first great council of the church recounted in Acts 15 it is James, the Lord's brother, who presides (15:13–21). Although Peter plays an important part in the debate (15:7–11), James delivers the decisive judgment. Moreover, nowhere in the NT does Peter lay claim to primacy. In the opening verses of the two epistles of Peter, the author describes himself simply as an apostle, and this is how Paul views him (1 Cor. 9:5).

There apparently were tensions in the apostolic church centering on personalities, which may explain certain passages in which Paul counterbalances possible claims by a Petrine faction. In 1 Cor. 1:12 he rebukes those who claim to belong to Paul, Cephas, or Apollos. Baptism into Christ precludes any such factious divisions (1:13), while in 3:11 Paul may even be countering a partisan understanding of Peter's foundational role: "For no one can lay any foundation other than the one already laid, which is Jesus Christ" (→ themelios, foundation, 2529). Paul's subsequent remarks may also be influenced by this: his warning about what one builds on the foundation that will be tried by fire (3:12–15), and the reminder that believers form God's holy temple and God's Spirit lives in them (3:16–17).

In Gal. 2:9 there is a certain irony in the allusion to James, Cephas, and John, who were "reputed to be pillars," since Paul goes on to discuss Peter's vacillation in the face of the Jewish circumcision party (2:11–14). Eph. 2:20 allows a foundational role to the apostles and prophets but insists with the Gospels that Christ is the cornerstone. Similarly the new Jerusalem in Rev. 21:14 is built on the foundation of the apostles. This theme is taken up by Peter himself when he describes believers as "living stones . . . being built into a spiritual house" (1 Pet. 2:5). There is no hint of the foundation of Peter continuing right through the building. Peter never claims primacy for himself or any successors.

While it seems probable that Peter visited Rome and probably even died there (cf. 1 Pet. 5:13), there is no evidence that Peter was ever bishop of Rome. Indeed, the primary document for the church at Rome in the subapostolic age is 1 Clem., but this letter reflects little of the primacy of a bishop at Rome. Rather, the church of Rome at that time seems to be governed by a college of presbyters. The letter was sent in the name of the church and is attributed to the individual Clement only by a variant ending preserved in some later manuscripts.

See also gōnia, corner (1224); lithos, stone (3345); margaritēs, pearl (3449).

4377 (petros, stone, rock, Peter), → 4376.

4378 (petrōdēs, rocky), → 4376.

4379 (pēganon, rue), → 3303.

4380 πηγή

πηγή (pēgē), spring, source (4380); ποταμός (potamos), river, stream (4532).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. pēgē designates the source of streams or rivers. potamos denotes flowing water, esp. dangerous rivers or streams. In popular Gk. belief, rivers and springs were personified as inferior divinities.

2. (a) For Israel rivers possessed special significance in geographical and political respects. Settlements were established by rivers, which were often bitterly fought over as boundaries and providers of water. The rivers most frequently mentioned are the Nile, the Jordan, the Euphrates, and the Kebar (Ezek. 1:1).

(b) Springs and rivers, together with the sea (→ thalassa, 2498), belong to the mass of water created by God, on which he founded the earth (Ps. 24:2) and over which he rules (Exod. 7; Ps. 78:44). But while the role of the sea is viewed mainly in negative terms, springs and rivers are viewed positively as that which makes human, animal, and plant life possible (though cf. 18:15; 124:4–5). Yahweh causes springs to flow, and human beings and animals to quench their thirst (104:10–11); the river of God waters the land and provides nourishment and prosperity (65:9). Important decisions are often made at a well (e.g., Gen. 24:11–18; 29:1–4). By bathing in the Jordan, Naaman is healed of leprosy (2 Ki. 5:1–19). By the Kebar River Ezekiel receives his call (Ezek. 1:1–2:8) and message (3:15–21). As creations of Yahweh, rivers join in praising their creator (Ps. 98:8).

(c) Several times Israel experienced Yahweh as the Lord of the springs and the rivers and gratefully testified to these facts of its salvation history (Ps. 66:6, the miracle of the Red Sea and the crossing of the Jordan). God's provision of water from a spring in the rock (Exod. 17:5–6) is often praised (Ps. 74:15; 78:16). The hope of thirst-quenching water in plentiful abundance forms an essential part of statements concerning the coming reign of peace (e.g., Isa. 12:3; 30:23–25; 35:7).

(d) Spring water is also part of the OT conception of Paradise. Gen. 2:10–14 states that the river that rises in Eden divides into the four branches: Pishon, Gihon, Tigris, and Euphrates. Since the last days are depicted in terms analogous to the original state (though excelling it), the eschatological speculations of OT and Jewish lit. attach themselves to this river in Eden. The river rising in the eschatological temple and banked by trees of life (Ezek. 47:1–12) serves for purification and irrigation (Joel 3:18; cf. Zech. 13:1–2; 14:8). Various OT prophecies refer to the irrigating and thirst-quenching function of rainfalls, rivers, and streams in the last days (e.g., Isa. 12:3; 43:19–21; 44:3; cf. Sir. 24:30–33).

(e) Springs and rivers also have a fig. use. God's blessings flood his people and land as an irrigating river (Isa. 66:12), and the God-given peace of the righteous is like a peacefully flowing river (48:18). Yahweh himself is a spring of living water (Jer. 2:13). The compassionate person is compared with a well-watered garden and a never-failing spring of water (Isa. 58:11). But note also that God's wrath comes "like a pent-up flood" on his enemies, sweeping them away with elemental power (59:19).

NT 1. potamos, river, as a purely geographical designation, is found for the Jordan (Matt. 3:6), the Euphrates (Rev. 9:14; 16:12), and the little stream on whose banks was the place of prayer in Philippi (Acts 16:13).

2. (a) NT theological statements about springs and rivers reflect the OT background. God has not only created heaven, earth, and sea, but also the fountains of water (Rev. 14:7). God has full right of disposal over rivers and fountains, so that in the end times he can either revoke the blessing and gift of drinking water (8:10; 16:4) or cause rivers to dry up (16:12). Jesus reveals himself to the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well (Jn. 4:5–15). Using the water in the well as a starting point Jesus refers her to the water of life, which is eternally brimming over. The Jordan is the place for the prophetic symbolic action of the Baptist (Matt. 3:6) and thus also the scene of Jesus' baptism (3:13) and God's self-revelation in Spirit and in Word (3:16–17).

(b) The experience of the dangerous threat to life caused by swollen rivers (Matt. 7:25, 27) leads to regarding streams of water as the instrument of demonic powers (Rev. 12:15–16). Thus the dragon attempts to do away with the woman who gave birth to the male child and who symbolizes the mother of Jesus and the church.

(c) Eschatological speculation, linking on to prophetic promises (e.g., Ezek. 47:1–12; Joel 3:18), is vitally interested in the healing character of the river that surpasses the river of Paradise in Gen. 2:10–14 and will at the end of time both quench thirst and spread abroad life, salvation, and purity (Rev. 22:1–2, 17). The throne of God and of the Lamb (22:1) takes over the place of the temple of Ezek. 47:1 as the source of this river: God himself pours out in Christ the water of life (21:6). Jn. 7:37–38 should be similarly understood, which interprets Ezek. 47:1 of Jesus (cf. also Isa. 44:3; 55:1; 58:11). This water of life quenches thirst for all time and, as a spring of life, flows out from the one who has previously drunk it (Jn. 4:13–14). Note that 7:39 expounds the streams of living water expressly in terms of the Spirit, which passes from Jesus to those who believe in him.

See also thalassa, sea, lake (2498); hydōr, water (5623); kataklysmos, a deluge, flood (2886); Iordanēs, the river Jordan (2674); limnē, lake (3349).

4384 πηλός

πηλός (pēlos), clay, mud, mire (4384).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. pēlos means mud, muck, dung, or clay. It denotes dust or soil mixed with some fluid, esp. water, with the result that the material becomes soft and pliable. The word commonly designates the clay or earth used by masons and potters. The skill of the potter in molding clay suggested an image for describing humans as clay figurines. In the Hel. period the thought of a human as a piece of clay is common. In the Roman period there is some evidence for the use of mud or clay in medical procedures.

2. The LXX uses pēlos for mud or mire (e.g., 2 Sam. 22:43; Ps. 69:14), loam or clay (e.g., Isa. 29:16; 41:25; Jer. 18:6). It is esp. the work of a potter in preparing and shaping the clay that suggested lines of thought that were theologically important.

(a) The account that God formed the first man out of dust (Gen. 2:7; 3:19) finds a distinct echo in the book of Job, where people are described as those "who live in houses of clay" (4:19). Job chides God for having fashioned him "like clay," then turning about to destroy him (10:8–9). The fragility of clay provides an apt figure for Job's powerlessness when overcome by affliction and impending death.

The image of God fashioning humans as a potter forms clay vessels becomes explicit in Isa. 29:16, where those who believe they can conceal their plans from the Lord are cautioned not to confuse themselves with God, who made them, "as if the potter were thought to be like the clay." A rebellious person who strives with God is like clay that disputes with the potter (45:9; cf. Sir. 33:10–13 = LXX 36:10–13).

(b) Jer. found in the action of a local potter working at his wheel an object lesson that illumined the sovereign judgment of God on the nation (18:1–12). When the recalcitrant clay refused to conform to the potter's purpose and the intended vessel was spoiled, he reworked the clay into another vessel. So God remains master of the clay (i.e., Israel as a nation), and he will shape it to his intended purpose (18:6).

(c) In the preparation of clay for his trade, a potter kneads the clay by treading on it with his feet (cf. Nah. 3:14). This common practice furnished Isa. with a vivid image for the ruthless treatment Babylon can expect from an invader who will approach from the north (41:25). As a potter treads on the clay, this conqueror will trample under foot his enemies.

(d) In Wis. 15:7–17 the writer focuses on a pagan potter who makes his living from the manufacture and sale of terracotta figurines. From the same lump of clay he molds "counterfeit gods" (15:9) and sewer tiles (15:7). Here the biblical motif of God as creator and humankind as clay are mockingly combined with a defense of the second commandment, which prohibits the fashioning of graven images (15:13).

NT 1. The NT uses pēlos in two ways. In Jn. it designates the mixture of dirt and spittle that Jesus applied to the eyes of a man born blind (Jn. 9:6–15), a practice that was widespread in Jewish healing arts. The repeated reference to the claylike mixture (5x in Jn. 19:6, 11, 14–15) suggests a deeper level of meaning. By his action on this man, Jesus performs a creative activity that provides humans with sight and thus demonstrates that he is the light of the world (cf. Jn. 1:4–9; 8:12; 9:5).

2. In Rom. 9:20–21 Paul draws on the common OT image of God as the potter who exercises sovereign control over his creation. In the context humans are described as molded clay and God as the one who molds it for his own purposes. The rhetorical question, "Does not the potter have the right to make out of the same lump of clay some pottery for noble purposes and some for common use?" is indebted to Isa. 29:16; 45:9. The imagery underscores God's freedom and sovereignty in relationship to us as his creatures, and we must not confuse our claims with the divine prerogative.

See also keramion, an earthenware vessel, jar (3040); ostrakinos, made of earth or clay, earthenware (4017); phyrama, a mixture, a lump (5878).

4391 (pithanologia, persuasive speech, art of persuasion), → 4275.

4393 (pikrainō, make bitter, embitter), → 4394.

4394 πικρία

πικρία (pikria), bitterness (4394); πικρός (pikros), bitter (4395); πικρῶς (pikrōs), bitterly (4396); πικραίνω (pikrainō), make bitter, embitter (4393); παραπικραίνω (parapikrainō), embitter, make angry, provoke (4176); παραπικρασμός (parapikrasmos), rebellion (4177).

CL & OT In cl. Gk., pikros means pointed, sharp, pungent, bitter tasting, and in a transferred sense painful, angry, relentless, embittered. This word group occurs often in the LXX, occasionally with a lit. sense (e.g., Exod. 15:23; Jer. 23:15), but mostly with a metaphorical sense (see Deut. 29:18; Prov. 5:4; Lam. 3:15, 19; cf. Amos 6:12 = LXX 6:13), such as the bitterness associated with grief, disappointment, and anger—both in God (e.g., Isa. 28:21 [trans. "strange" and "alien"]) and in humans (e.g., Ruth 1:20; Lam. 3:15, 19). parapikrainō is often used in the LXX for provoking God to anger (e.g., Jer. 32:29; 44:3 = LXX 29:29; 51:3).

NT In Heb. 12:15 ("bitter root," lit., "root of bitterness"; cf. Deut. 29:18) bitterness (pikria) is associated with anger as in the OT. Rom. 3:14 (a quotation of Ps. 10:7) associates the word with cursing; Paul uses the verse to show that both Jews and Gentiles are "under sin" (Rom. 3:9). In Acts 8:23 Peter accused Simon Magus of being "full of bitterness and captive to sin" after he tried to purchase the Holy Spirit. pikria comes first in a list of vices that the Christian is called upon to put away (Eph. 4:31).

The adj. pikros is found only at Jas. 3:11 (bitter water as a symbol of the evil that issues from the tongue) and 3:14 (bitter envy). Such conduct is incompatible with a Christian profession and must be done away with. The adv. pikrōs is found only at Matt. 26:75 and Lk. 22:62, where Peter acknowledged his denial and "wept bitterly."

Husbands are not to be harsh or bitter (pikrainō) toward their wives (Col. 3:19). In Rev. 8:11 pikrainō means to make water bitter through wormwood (cf. OT). It describes one of the afflictions of humankind in the vision of the angels and trumpets. In 10:9–10 the vb. describes the scroll that the angel commanded John to eat, which was sweet in his mouth but made his stomach bitter. The image suggests the anguish that the prophetic message caused him.

parapikrainō is found only at Heb. 3:16 (see Ps. 95:7b–11). The noun parapikrasmos, rebellion, occurs in Heb. 3:8, 15 (both from Ps. 95:8). The OT text refers to the exodus rebellion (cf. Exod. 15:23; 17:7; Num. 14; 20:2–5), and the author of Heb. cites this incident as a warning against disobedience.

4395 (pikros, bitter), → 4394.

4396 (pikrōs, bitterly), → 4394.

4398 (pimplēmi, fill, complete, fulfill), → 4444.

4403 πίνω

πίνω (pinō), drink (4403); ποτίζω (potizō), water, give to drink (4540); ποτήριον (potērion), cup (4539); πόμα (poma), a drink (4503); πόσις (posis), drinking, a drink (4530); πότος (potos), drinking, i.e., revelry (4542); καταπίνω (katapinō), swallow, overwhelm (2927).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. pinō means to drink. The related vb. potizō has the trans. meaning, to enable someone to drink, to give to drink, to water (of animals). posis denotes the act of drinking or what is drunk, the drink; poma and poton both mean drink. potērion is the drinking vessel, the cup or goblet.

(b) Drinking satisfies thirst and refreshes. In popular opinion drinking was considered a pleasure, and it could become a passion. In philosophical discussions a life of drinking too much runs up against criticism. Drinking had a special place in the mystery religions, esp. in sacral meals.

2. In view of frequently occurring shortages of water, thirst (Exod. 17:1–7; → peinaō, 4277) and drinking (1 Ki. 17:3–4) are esp. significant in the OT world. Rain transforms the land into a watered garden (cf. Isa. 55:10), while lack of it causes vegetation to wither and results in catastrophic famines (1 Ki. 18:2–6). Closely connected with the shortage of water is the presence of bad and undrinkable water (Exod. 15:23).

3. The ability to satisfy thirst is attributed to God: "You care for the land and water it; you enrich it abundantly. The streams of God are filled with water to provide the people with grain" (Ps. 65:9). Drink is a gift that is continually received anew from God and is a cause of thanksgiving. Correspondingly, thirst that cannot be quenched is understood as God's anger and punishment (Isa. 5:13). When the quenching of thirst is taken for granted, God has been forgotten (Jer. 2:6).

4. Fig., drinking can stand for the way God's judgments or gifts come to humans: "the cup of his wrath" (Isa. 51:17; cf. Ps. 75:8; Jer. 25:15–29) or his "cup of salvation" (Ps. 116:13; cf. Isa. 55:1). Amos 8:11 speaks of thirst for the word of God that can be quenched only if God wills.

NT 1. The NT speaks of drinking and eating in a variety of connections. (a) Like eating (→ esthiō, 2266), drinking is referred to lit., though eating and drinking, like dress, are relativized (Matt. 6:25–27, 31). Life itself is more important than either of these, and we can rely on God to take care of these matters. Seeking the kingdom of God and his righteousness (Matt. 6:33; cf. Lk. 12:31) should take priority, and then the matters of daily living will settle themselves.

(b) Observing the distinction between clean and unclean foods belongs to the old covenant (Acts 10:14). Peter's vision symbolizes the abolition of Jewish exclusiveness and the inclusion of the Gentiles into the people of God.

(c) The materialistic attitude that looks no further than this life is rejected (1 Cor. 15:32; cf. Lk. 12:19). Those given to eating and drinking and fail to recognize their responsibility toward God (Matt. 24:48–51; Lk. 12:19) will be called to account (Matt. 24:38–39; cf. Lk. 17:27–30).

2. (a) Thus, eating and drinking are not to be seen as ends in themselves or as pleasures for the self-indulgent, but in the light of one's responsibility to God and other people. Paul saw the problem in terms of the church. Although believers have complete freedom to eat and drink what they like (1 Cor. 9:4), they must take account of their fellow believers (Rom. 14:21). The question is seen Christologically in Matt.: In the poor to whom a drink is given (potizō) Christ himself is encountered (25:37, 42).

(b) The problem was understood eschatologically by John the Baptist. The seriousness of imminent events cast its shadow over the present age (Mk. 1:5–6). Therefore John neither ate nor drank beyond a minimum sustenance (Matt. 11:18).

(c) The behavior of the Son of Man is depicted as a direct contrast to this, for he both ate and drank (Matt. 11:19). A number of stories refer to his eating and drinking with sinners (Mk. 2:16; cf. Lk. 5:30, 33), perhaps anticipating the messianic banquet. Jesus did not come "to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (Lk. 5:32).

3. (a) Drinking takes on a deeper significance when, along with eating, it expresses the unity that exists among those who share a meal. On the day of judgment, some, in order to claim a place at his side, will recall that they have eaten and drunk with Jesus (Lk. 13:26). But he will reply that he never knew them (13:27; cf. Matt. 7:21–23; 25:41; Lk. 6:46), for the relationship was merely formal. By contrast, the disciples are promised that they will eat and drink at Jesus' table (22:30).

(b) The request of the sons of Zebedee to sit at Jesus' side in eternity has an apocalyptic-eschatological character (Matt. 20:20–21; Mk. 10:35–37; cf. Lk. 22:24–30), but it is striking that Jesus' answer points rather to his death: The cup is understood as the cup of suffering, the baptism as the baptism of death (Matt. 20:22; Mk. 10:38). The "cup" of suffering is mentioned later in the Gospels, where Jesus requested his Father to let that cup (potērion) pass from him but submitted himself to God's will (Matt. 26:39; Mk. 14:36; Lk. 22:42).

4. (a) Drinking is referred to fig. in 1 Cor. 10:4 (cf. Exod. 17:6; Num. 20:11). It is not certain how this drinking from Christ is to be understood. Some think Paul may be alluding in 1 Cor. 10:3–4 to the Lord's Supper as a saving event already anticipated in the time of Moses (cf. the use of "spiritual," i.e., pertaining to the Spirit, in 10:4). If so, there is a real identity between the ancient and the new saving events. Others, however, look at the passage typologically, that the rock from which the Israelites drank in the desert pointed forward to Jesus Christ as the one who gives living water.

(b) In 1 Cor. 10:16, Paul, using language of the early Christian tradition, calls the cup (potērion) "a participation in the blood of Christ." Through the communion cup, believers are united with Christ in his death. Note also Paul's words in 11:23–26, where eating the bread and drinking the cup unites us with the body and the blood of the crucified and risen Lord (see also pascha, 4247).

(c) katapinō is used fig. for the fact that death will be "swallowed up in victory" at the resurrection on the last day (1 Cor. 15:54; cf. 2 Cor. 5:4). By contrast, Satan prowls around, looking for some prey to "devour" (1 Pet. 5:8).

5. Jn. 4:10–15 raises the question of the water of life (4:11). Ordinary water quenches the thirst only for the time being (4:13), but the water Jesus gives bestows eternal life (4:14). One must therefore come to Jesus (7:37; cf. Isa. 55:1), i.e., have faith in him. While the gift here is Jesus himself (cf. also Jn. 6:51–58), in 7:39 it is related to the Spirit as the Spirit of Christ.

See also peinaō, hunger (4277); brōma, food (1109); geuomai, taste, partake of, enjoy, experience (1174); esthiō, eat (2266).

4405 (piprask̄o, sell), → 4797.

4406 πίπτω

πίπτω (piptō), fall (4406); ἐκπίπτω (ekpiptō), fall off or from, lose one's way (1738); ἐπιπίπτω (epipiptō), fall on (2158); καταπίπτω (katapiptō), fall down (2928); περιπίπτω (peripiptō), fall into, among (4346); πτῶμα (ptōma), that which has fallen, corpse (4773); πτῶσις (ptōsis), falling, fall (4774).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. piptō has the basic meaning to fall (from a height or an upright position); it can also mean to fall in battle but also to fall into life (i.e., to be born). In a fig. sense piptō means to fly into a rage, to fall into misfortune, shame, and the like; also to be ruined. The nouns ptōsis, act of falling, and ptōma, that which has fallen, signify misfortune or disaster. ptōma also denotes a corpse, esp. of one killed violently.

ekpiptō means to fall out of something, e.g., lose the way, give up hope; in the pass., to be driven out, excluded. As a technical naval term it means to be driven off course, to be cast ashore, because of inability to follow the course on which one has set out. peripiptō means to fall around. It is also used of events that befall one.

2. The LXX mostly uses piptō to translate forms of nāpal. These words exhibit here the same broad range of meaning as they do outside the Bible. piptō has a fig. meaning for the most part in the OT wisdom lit., i.e., to have a mishap through no fault of one's own (Ps. 37:24; Prov. 24:16; Eccl. 4:10); to go to ruin, be destroyed (Job 18:12, ptōma; Prov. 24:17; Sir. 5:13, ptōsis). The Heb. manner of expression remains concrete even in metaphorical use: "The wicked are brought down by [lit., fall into] their own wickedness" (Prov. 11:5; cf. Isa. 8:14–15; Jer. 8:4; Mic. 7:8). The NT sense of losing one's salvation has no parallel in the OT (though cf. Prov. 11:28; Sir. 1:30; 2:7).

NT 1. Words of this group are found most often in the lit. sense: of the collapse of buildings (Lk. 13:4; Heb. 11:30); of things falling down (Matt. 13:4–8 par.; 15:27; Jn. 12:24), esp. the falling off of dead flowers as an image of the shortness of life (Jas. 1:11; 1 Pet. 1:24; cf. Isa. 40:7); the falling of animals (Matt. 10:29); and the unintentional falling of humans (15:14; cf. Mk. 9:20; Acts 20:9).

2. Even abstract things such as fear and darkness can be said to fall on someone. The word here conveys the idea of suddenness and inescapability. Usually a heavenly vision or some other manifestation of God brings this about (Lk. 1:12; Acts 13:11; 19:17; Rev. 11:11). God's Spirit also falls on people; it comes with irresistible power, silencing all opposition and doubt (Acts 10:44; 11:15; cf. 8:16; 1 Sam. 18:10).

3. The piptō words also appear in idiomatic sayings. When a person's love is aroused, he has the urge to fall on someone's neck, i.e., "embrace" that person (Lk.

15:20; Acts 20:37; cf. Gen. 45:14; 46:29). The "falling" of the lot indicates a decision having nothing to do with human choice, a divine verdict (Acts 1:26; cf. Ps. 16:6; Jon. 1:7). "Not a hair will fall from your head" (Acts 27:34, lit. trans.) means "No evil will befall you."

4. Like the OT (Jos. 23:14; 1 Sam. 3:19; 2 Ki. 10:10), the NT says that God's word does not (lit.) "fall to the ground," but retains its validity and efficacy (Lk. 16:17; Rom. 9:6; cf. 1 Pet. 1:24). Neither will love "fail" (1 Cor. 13:8), since faith, hope, and love form the three unchanging gifts of God's grace (13:13).

5. To fall on one's face before someone (Jn. 11:32; cf. Gen. 17:3, 17; 44:14; Ruth 2:10) is an expression of deferential greeting. Slaves do this to indicate subjection to their master (Matt. 18:26). It can be done to make a request (18:29; Mk. 5:22; Lk. 5:12) or give thanks (17:16). It is the humblest posture for prayer (Matt. 26:39) and the attitude of self-abasing reverence (before a king, 2:11; a supernatural being, 4:9; Acts 10:25; Rev. 19:10; 22:8; God and Christ, 1 Cor. 14:25; Rev. 4:10). It can be the effect of a revelation from God (Matt. 17:6; Lk. 5:8; Acts 9:4; 16:29; cf. Mk. 5:33; Jn. 18:6; Rev. 1:17; → gonypeteō [1206] and proskyneō [4686]).

6. piptō can also mean to fall down dead, be killed (Lk. 21:24; Acts 5:5, 10; 1 Cor. 10:8; Rev. 17:10). ptōma, corpse, is used of human corpses (Matt. 14:12; Mk. 15:45; Rev. 11:8–9) and perhaps also animal carcasses in Matt. 24:28. It marks the place where the vultures gather.

7. Words in this group are used in various ways in the portrayal of apocalyptic horrors of the end times. Everything that is makeshift will collapse in a flood-like catastrophe (Matt. 7:25, 27), and great parts of cities (Rev. 11:13), even whole cities (16:19), will become heaps of ruins. The great world power, hostile to God, will be overthrown (14:8; 18:2; cf. Isa. 21:9; Jer. 51:8). In their terror at the desolation of the last days, people will cry out in their longing to die for a great earthquake, which will make mountains with their rocks fall on them (Lk. 23:30; Rev. 6:16).

In a cosmic upheaval stars will fall from heaven like meteorites (Matt. 24:29; Mk. 13:25; Rev. 6:13; cf. Isa. 34:4). These stars can also stand for political powers, since in Isa. 14:12 the expression is used of the fall of a powerful ruler. The fall of great stars from heaven makes the water on which life depends unusable and unleashes the powers of darkness (Rev. 8:10; 9:1). The picture of Satan's fall from heaven in Lk. 10:18 is intended to show that the end has come for the devil's dominion. The mighty ruler who up until now has terrorized the world has lost his power and his position as accuser before God in a fall as rapid as a flash of lightning.

8. The Gospels, Paul, Heb., and Rev. use a fig. sense of piptō peculiar to the NT. Apart from Rev. 2:5 and perhaps Rom. 11:11, 22, all the following passages speak of incurring guilt and the consequent loss of salvation. It is a catastrophic fall, which means eternal ruin. If it were not so, the warnings against falling lose their threatening urgency.

(a) It lies in the background of images like that in Matt. 7:25, 27 of total human downfall and in 15:14 of the blind leading the blind (cf. Lk. 6:39). In Lk. 2:34 Christ is the stone on which many will meet their doom, while 20:18 describes the annihilating effect of this stone on all who reject the claim and the person of Jesus. Either they will fall over the stone or the stone will fall on them (i.e., Christ will shatter his enemies).

(b) Paul uses the metaphor of standing and falling (cf. Prov. 24:16; Jer. 8:4; Amos 5:2; 8:14) in Rom. 14:4, where he alludes to the ancient law whereby a slave is subject to his master's jurisdiction, who alone decides whether his performance of a task is satisfactory or whether he must be condemned. In the same way the Christian is responsible to no one but his Lord, who alone decides whether one has done well or failed. The same idea is present in 1 Cor. 10:12, with its warning to guard against false security. As long as the eschatological tribulation with its satanic power has not run its full course, the possibility of falling must not be forgotten (piptō here echoes 10:8).

(c) "To fall from grace" is an expression arising from the concept of grace as the new sphere of life given to the Christian, into which the believer has "gained access" (cf. Rom. 5:2). Those who depart from it deny God's unconditional mercy, the redeeming work of Christ (Gal. 5:4). Christians must abide in this state of grace and not fall prey to any false teaching (2 Pet. 3:17). In Rom. 11:11, 22 piptō is again used of falling into destruction. The fall of Israel (despite God's gracious desire not to give up his people) demonstrates the severity of his judgment. In Heb. 4:11 falling (i.e., apostasy) is the result of disobedience. According to 10:31, the apostate faces a terrible future (see also aphistēmi, 923).

(d) Rev. 2:5 reminds a church of the love in which it stood at first. But it has moved quickly downwards and has fallen a long way. A return is nonetheless still possible, for the corruption has not yet gone too far.

See also aphistēmi, cause to revolt, go away, depart (923).

4409 (pisteuō, believe), → 4411.

4411 πίστις

πίστις (pistis), faith (4411); πιστεύω (pisteuō), believe (4409); πιστός (pistos), pass. trustworthy, faithful; act. trusting, believing (4412); πιστόω (pistoō), rely, convince (4413); ἀπιστία (apistia), unbelief (602); ἀπιστέω (apisteō), disbelieve (601); ἄπιστος (apistos), unbelievable, faithless, unbelieving (603).

CL 1. (a) In cl. Gk. pistis denotes the trust that someone may place in other people or in the gods, credibility, credit in business, guarantee, or something entrusted. Similarly, pisteuō means to trust something or someone; it can refer to and confirm legendary tales and mythical ideas. With reference to people, pisteuō means to obey; the pass. means to enjoy trust. The adj. pistos means trusting or being trustworthy. The vb. pistoō has the meaning of binding someone or oneself to be faithful.

Apistia, by way of contrast, means mistrust, unreliability, and incredibility; apisteō, to be mistrustful, disbelieve, be disobedient; apistos, distrustful, undependable.

(b) Very early the words in this group also denoted faithfulness and fidelity. For example, in order to obtain a pause in battle, it was necessary to make agreements pledging fidelity while negotiations took place.

(c) The word group also had religious overtones at an early date. The gods vouch for the validity of an alliance or treaty. The words were also applied directly to the divinity in cases of the trustworthiness of an oracle. Unquestioned obedience to the will of the gods was required of humans.

2. (a) In the Hel. period, during the struggle with skepticism and atheism, pistis acquired the sense of conviction as to the existence and activity of the gods. The didactic element now emerged as the general and basic meaning. pistis as faith in God stood for theoretical conviction. But stress was laid on the belief that life was constituted in accordance with this conviction. To that extent pistis could assume the practical features of the older eusebeia (piety). Neo-Platonism had a materialized concept of faith that called for a definite, intellectualistic conviction, which was conditioned by tradition.

(b) The Stoic understanding of pistis is particularly important. Here the philosopher expressed his recognition of the divine ordering of the world, the center of which was himself as an autonomous moral person. pistis reveals the essence of humankind. Fidelity to one's moral destiny leads to fidelity towards others.

(c) In the mystery religions faith denotes abandonment to the deity by following his teaching and by putting oneself under his protection. Besides Jud. and Christianity, the mystery religions stand out in their demand of faith in their divinities and in the revelations and teaching delivered by them. In this way salvation (equated with divinization in the mystery religions) was promised to the believer.

OT 1. The concept of faith. (a) In Heb. the root 'āman in the niph. means to be true, reliable, faithful. It can be applied to humans (e.g., Moses, Num. 12:7; servants, 1 Sam. 22:14; prophets, 3:20; a witness, Isa. 8:2; a messenger, Prov. 25:13) and to God, who keeps his covenant and gives grace to those who love him (Deut. 7:9). Particular stress is laid on God's word preserving its dependability and being confirmed by subsequent action (1 Ki. 8:26; 1 Chr. 17:23–24). In many passages 'āman acquires the meaning of to be entrusted with (e.g., Num. 12:7; 1 Sam. 3:20; Hos. 12:1). In an ancient strand of tradition going back to an original promise, the Davidic dynasty is called an "established" house (2 Sam. 7:8–16). This state of being confirmed does not rest on the qualities of the members of the dynasty or on human measures, but on the action of God initiated by his promise (2 Sam. 7:16; cf. 1 Sam. 25:28).

A related idea is expressed by the root bāṭaḥ (→ peithō, convince, 4275; elpis, hope, 1828), with the meaning to trust, rely on. The negative evaluation of such action is dominant: humans trust in false security (Hab. 2:18) or set their hope on something false (Hos. 10:13). But it was also early on applied to Yahweh, the true ground of security (2 Ki. 18:30; Jer. 39:18).

(b) Later the root bāṭaḥ was assimilated in meaning to the root 'āman. Basic for the OT idea of faith are the statements of Exod. 4:1–9, 27–31. The question is how will Moses assert his authority as the one sent by God before the people. In reply to Moses' objection that the people will doubt his commission, God promises three miracles through which they will believe in his mission and the coming redemption. Faith is here related to a mission expressly confirmed by divine authentication.

(c) The absolute use of 'āman in Isa. is important. In a confrontation with Ahaz in view of the political threat, Isaiah dares to say: "If you do not stand firm in your faith, you will not stand at all" (7:9). The survival of the people lay alone in firm trust in the eternal God. Political action was called for that corresponded to this trust. Thus Isa. 28:16 states, "See, I lay a stone in Zion, a tested stone, a precious cornerstone for a sure foundation; the one who trusts will never be dismayed." In the coming catastrophe only the believer can be sure of divine protection. The prophet himself is an example of believing trust: "I will wait for the LORD, who is hiding his face from the house of Jacob. I will put my trust in him" (8:17). The prophets stood in the midst of national catastrophe as spokesmen for the God who had placed them in an almost hopeless situation. The faith that is set before the people is the way of deliverance from catastrophe to a future beyond the disaster.

(d) Gen. 15:6 is also critical for the connection between the OT and the NT (cf. Rom. 4:3, 9, 22–23; Gal. 3:6; Jas. 2:23). The passage speaks of Abraham's faith as his readiness to lay hold of God's rich promises. The crediting of faith constituted a declaratory act, which was formerly customary with the priests. God treats this trust of Abraham as the behavior appropriate to the covenant relationship. In fellowship with God lies a claim one fulfills when he or she trusts. The statement in Gen. 15:6

does not describe Abraham's entire relationship with God. But in view of a particular situation God's gracious, overarching judgment was pronounced over him.

(e) The prophetic context of Hab. 2:3–4 is also important for the Jewish and Christian traditions. The vision granted by God is confirmed and preserved for the end; it will not fail to appear. Those who are "puffed up" are condemned by God's word, but life is promised to the "righteous" in view of their faithfulness (the arrogant stand on the side of the hostile world power, the "righteous" on that of the people of Judah). "Faithfulness" and "faith" stand here close together in the Heb. word ʾemûnâ. The idea is that of unwavering hold of God's word against all contrary appearances. The sense is changed by the promise in the LXX translation: "The righteous will live by my faithfulness [ek pisteōs mou]."

(f) Later in the OT, the trustworthiness of the commandments is firmly underlined (Ps. 119:66). Through them the godly receive instruction in God's will; they know they receive wisdom and knowledge from them and can rely on them in the temptations of life. Postexilic Jewish piety cannot be called legalistic without qualification. The law and God's word were living entities received by the godly in obedience and trust, and were praised with thanksgiving and testimony.

To sum up, heʾemîn and ʾemûnâ describe a living act of trust in the OT as well as the dimension of human existence in a historical situation. Special stress is laid on the future. The past was the starting-point but not the goal of trust. The whole emphasis falls on overcoming the opposition of the ungodly and the realization of the divine purpose. Above all, it is clear in the prophets that faith must pass through extreme need and judgment before it attains its goal in the salvation that lies in the future.

2. The influence of the terms in later Judaism. (a) In later Jud. the main emphasis falls on the behavior of the individual. Sotah 48b preserves an aphorism of R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanus: "If anyone has bread in his basket and says, what shall I eat tomorrow? he belongs to those who are small in trust." One knows that faith is frugal (Prov. 30:8) and one must overcome anxiety about possessing too much. "Small in faith" becomes a deprecatory word-picture that represents failure. The expression "men of faithfulness" (ʾanšê ʾemānâ) in rab. lit. is the mark of definable, exemplary conduct.

Faith is taught and inculcated in the manner of the wisdom lit. Because of its identity with faithfulness, faith remains the most important feature of righteousness. The celebrated "Song of Faith" in Mek. Exod. 14:31, which begins with the words "Great is faith," is concerned with the teaching of Exod. 14:31: faith in God and his servant Moses. Those who believe in the shepherd of Israel believe in God himself, who spoke and called the world into being. There follows praise of faith and its reward in the style of the wisdom writings. The "reward" is understood as the Holy Spirit, who praises the saving acts of God in hymn and confession (Exod. 14:31; 15:1).

(b) At Qumran the basic passage Hab. 2:4 was interpreted of all doers of the law—thus of the members of the community. God will save them from the house of judgment on account of their suffering and their faithfulness to the teacher of righteousness (1QpHab 8:1–3). The doing of the law is the supreme and decisive idea. Faithfulness to the teacher means holding to the knowledge revealed to him.

(c) The idea of faith played a particular role in later apocalyptic lit., because expectation of the future made a radical demand of faith. In such apocalyptic circles the concept of faith drew a dividing line between the true community and their opponents.

(d) In Hel. Jud., faith as the confession of the OT revelation stood in opposition to the surrounding pagan world. The contrast between the "godless" and the "righteous" and their differing views of life is typical of wisdom lit. (Wis. 2:1–3:19). Faith in wisdom belongs to the teaching about righteousness and wisdom (1:2; 3:9). It is expressed in fixed formulas such as hoi pepoithotes, those who trust (→ peithō, 4275); hoi pistoi, the faithful; hoi eklektoi, the elect (→ eklegomai, 1721). Faith enters the realm of philosophical interpretation and becomes an outlook and a virtue.

In Philo also faith in God can be trust and the presupposition of all human existence and conduct. In his or her relation to God the wise person is the "believer." For his part God bestows trust through his promises. As formerly in Jud. at large, faith is regarded as the source and sum of every other attitude.

NT The call to believe in the name of God as he has revealed himself in Christ is the special mark of the Christian missionary preaching in the ancient world. Yet there are several stages in the early Christian tradition that should not be overlooked. John the Baptist set repentance, not faith, at the center of his preaching. Still, his overthrow of all contrived security (Matt. 3:9) is reminiscent of the tension between godly ʾāman and false bāṭaḥ. Moreover, the mission of the Baptist raises the question of its legitimacy and thus also of faith (expressed in 21:25, 32). Yet not until Jesus do we hear the specific call: "Repent and believe the good news" (Mk. 1:15). In time the good news became a fixed tradition of teaching that was to be accepted by every hearer. This development is examined in the following survey.

The NT use of the pistis/pisteuō word group involves the development of the OT and Jewish tradition. The frequent use of pisteuō eis, believe in (e.g., Jn. 1:12; 3:18; Gal. 2:16), is a striking departure from ordinary Gk. and from the LXX. pisteuō hoti sentences (believe that ...), which relate faith to a particular event in the history of Jesus (Rom. 10:9; 1 Thess. 4:14) or to a Christological statement (Jn. 20:31), are significant for the linguistic usage of the NT church. They involve the incorporation of a specific, historical content into the Christian confession. "Repentance from acts that lead to death" and "faith in God" were important elements in the teaching of the early Christian catechism (Heb. 6:1). More important is the pointed use of pistis in Paul's writings to denote the reception of Christian proclamation and the saving faith that was called forth by the gospel (Rom. 1:8; 1 Thess. 1:8). For Paul pistis is indissolubly bound with proclamation.

1. Jesus and the Synoptic tradition. The miracle stories often contain reference to the faith of the sick or of those around them (Matt. 8:10; Mk. 2:5; 5:34, 36; 10:52). What is meant here is trust in Jesus' mission and his power to deliver from trouble. These saving acts were performed in the service of his commission and were intended to confirm an existing faith. Jesus not only sought to deliver people from physical need, but also to make them witnesses of his saving work. Faith was not a condition on which he acted; rather, Jesus was concerned with a goal beyond the physical process: to be a helper in God's name. He was therefore more concerned to ask for faith than to demand it. Human trust presented the possibility for God to do his work.

Mk. 6:5–6 contains an account of the opposition in Nazareth, Jesus' hometown. Refusal to believe was so strong that he could perform no miracles there. He confined himself to helping a number of sick individuals. If his saving work was bound up with faith, refusal to believe likewise brought conflict with him, though the Evangelists did not intend to convey the impression that it was absolutely impossible for Jesus to do miracles here because of the unbelief of the Nazarenes.

The Gospel writers record several sayings of Jesus that appear to go beyond the specific situation in which they occur (Matt. 17:20; Mk. 9:23–24; 11:22–24; Lk. 17:5– 6). The distinctive feature of these sayings about faith lies in the fact that they present the believer with unlimited possibilities and that Jesus expressly summons his disciples to this sort of boundless faith. The pictures of faith moving mountains (Mk. 11:23) and uprooting a fig tree (Lk. 17:6) confirm the word of power that is able to transform the created order. The instructions to the disciples in Mk. 11:23–24 show the connection in Jesus' teaching between the promise that rests on the word of power and supplication. The supplication is the prerequisite of the word of power.

Faith in God means for Jesus being open to the possibilities that God presents (cf. Mk. 11:22: "have faith in God"), and Jesus encouraged others to follow his example. Such faith also involves a reckoning with God that is not simply content with the thing given and the events that have come about. Expressions like "have faith in God" and "increase our faith" (Lk. 17:5) denote a special kind of faith. The antithesis between small and great (17:6; cf. Matt. 17:20) presents a contrast between the human attitude and the greatness of the promise. That is, what takes place in a human being is small compared with the greatness that comes from God.

However, Jesus spoke of a boundless faith as if of something new. He did not build on something that was already there. Yet his teaching was distinct from wild enthusiasm, because it was not divorced from constant wrestling with God and speaking with him. It stood within the circle of trust and knowledge. Jesus turned to the individual, because his people as a whole were summoned to the decision of faith (cf. Lk. 19:42).

Statements about faith in the Synoptic tradition are always qualified. Every summons and statement of Jesus contain the elements of faith, trust, knowledge, decision, obedience, and self-direction. Jesus' faith was deeply involved in the act of living and was on a completely different plane from hypothetical abstractions.

2. Paul and the Pauline tradition. Paul's teaching presupposes a continuity with the teaching of the Palestinian Jewish and the Hel. church. His calling by the risen Lord led him to grapple with the particular questions raised by these churches. Paul addressed his readers as believers (hoi pisteuontes, Rom. 1:16; 3:22; 4:11; 1 Cor. 1:21). Their turning to God is described as "believing" (1 Cor. 15:2, 11). "Faith" means receiving the message of salvation and conduct based on the gospel (Rom. 1:8; 1 Cor. 2:5; 15:14, 17). It is explicitly a saving faith, based on the death and resurrection of Jesus (15:3–4).

This unique event is the divinely appointed norm that determines every theological statement and every aspect of Christian conduct. The righteousness received by faith is a gift of grace. It contradicts all human boasting and undermines any attempt to base one's relationship with God on keeping the Mosaic law (Rom. 3:27–31; Gal. 3:10–14, 23–25). The new covenant supersedes the old both in its historical form and its effect on humans (2 Cor. 3:6; Gal. 3:23–4:7, 21–31). Faith recognizes the eschatological saving event anticipated in the call of Abraham (Rom. 4:9–15; Gal. 3:17–18); it finds its goal in the Gentile mission (Rom. 4:17–18; Gal. 3:26–29). Paul stressed historical facts and our eschatological goal (2 Cor. 5:7). Since faith contains the element of being sustained (Heb. ʾāman), as well as trust (Heb. bāṭaḥ), it merges into hope (Rom. 8:24; 1 Cor. 13:13).

Of special importance is the way Paul links together the triad of faith, hope, and love (1 Cor. 13:13; Col. 1:4–5; 1 Thess. 3:5, 8). These three are different aspects of the Christian life and form the basis of the life of the church. The transforming eschatological prospective reveals what is unique here: Faith and hope come to fulfillment, while love alone determines the new aeon (1 Cor. 13:13; → aiōn, 172).

The Pauline triad of faith, hope, and love must not be regarded as charismatic gifts, for they are distinct from the latter. They are the practical application of the gospel itself and are obligatory for all members of the church, without exception. Charismatic gifts have a different structure (→ charis, 5921). At the same time, however, Paul's endeavor to set out the fullness of gifts in his doctrine of the Spirit led him to include faith as a gift along with the others (1 Cor. 12:9). Justifying faith is not meant here. Nor perhaps is the faith that can move mountains (13:2). What is clear is that it is distinct from "the message of wisdom" and "the message of knowledge" (mentioned in 12:8).

There is a tension between the invisible and the visible. This points to the fact that we do not have the future at our disposal. There is a contrast between what is accessible to us and what is accessible to God alone (cf. 2 Cor. 4:18; 5:7). The invisible mentioned here is not a Platonic immaterial world, but the goal of Christian existence perceived in faith and trust. The cross of Christ is always the focal point of attack against legalism (Gal. 2:21) and speculative wisdom (1 Cor. 1:17). The resurrection opens the way to the gift of a new existence through baptism (Rom. 6:4; 2 Cor. 5:17).

Thus Gal. 5:6 teaches: "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision has any value. The only thing that counts is faith expressing itself through love" (cf. also 1 Cor. 7:19; Gal. 6:15). Through baptism a new law that transcends all the previous differences has come into operation. God's will, expressed in the demands of the law, finds its eschatological fulfillment in love. This solution that Paul stresses places faith in the context of eschatological transformation. It thus corresponds directly with Paul's doctrine of the Spirit. His teaching on faith and the gift of the Spirit are brought together in baptism.

Another important element of Paul's teaching is his understanding of the life of faith, characterized by the tension between indicative and imperative. Believers who are justified must become what they are, yet they find themselves in a struggle between the Spirit and the sinful human nature (Rom. 8:4–13; Gal. 5:16–25). We must not evade the tasks of the Spirit or avoid living according to the fruit of the Spirit. Without such obedience, faith does not gain the power required in this conflict (1 Cor. 2:4).

The idea of being "weak" in faith (Rom. 14:1) introduces a particular discussion bound up with making critical judgments. For Paul there is such a thing as growing in faith (2 Cor. 10:15), being steadfast in faith (1 Cor. 15:58), and self-critical examining whether one's attitude springs from faith (cf. Rom. 14:23). All these exhortations starkly show how faith is not only exposed to critical judgment, but submits itself repeatedly to it. The fact that the gospel finds its ultimate expression and foundation in the cross of Christ means that faith must constantly measure itself by this norm. Faith is dynamic movement that involves adjustment and self-adjustment. In this respect also the situation corresponds to Paul's doctrine of the Spirit.

Eph. 4:3 calls believers to maintain "the unity of the Spirit." Despite diversity of groups and differences of opinion, postapostolic tradition tried to maintain a general outlook. Eph. 4:5 speaks of "one faith" together with "one Lord" and "one baptism," as if this triad reflected the baptismal act. The common outlook conferred by baptism is a process directed towards a goal (4:13) and guided by Christ himself.

3. The Johannine tradition. Here, as in the OT, the vb. comes to the forefront. The noun is found only occasionally in the letters (1 Jn. 5:4) and Rev. (2:13, 19; 13:10; 14:12). The adj. pistos can be applied to Jesus, his witnesses, and the church (Jn. 20:27; 1 Jn. 1:9; Rev. 1:5; 2:10, 13). The link with Sem. thought is clear esp. in Rev. Faith and the act of believing assume the character of fidelity. Rev. also contains didactic lists of qualities and actions in which "deeds" predominate (2:2, 19); pistis here comes close to being the motive of faithfulness (2:19). It is basic for the Johannine tradition that the attitude of faith should be modeled on and formed by the testimony recognized by the church, notably, eyewitness testimony.

The thought forms are different from elsewhere in the NT. Faith arises out of testimony, authenticated by God, in which signs also play a part. It is addressed to all (Jn. 1:7). Faith and knowledge (6:69), knowledge and faith (17:8; 1 Jn. 4:16), are not two entities distinct from each other, but instructive coordinates. Faith alone receives the testimony and possesses knowledge; those who know the truth are pointed to faith. The hearer should understand that acceptance of the testimony and personal response conforming to the testimony are both involved in salvation. The distinction in Jn. 4:42 is important.

Faith and life are intimately connected. Those who believe in the Son have the promise that they will not perish but have eternal life (Jn. 3:16–18; 11:25–26). The promise points to a fulfillment already in the present. The world's enmity toward God is not a metaphysical one; it is a reaction to the one sent by God (3:20; 7:7; 15:18, 23). Even the disciples are drawn into it. Believers are able to endure this conflict with the world through no longer being subject to its motive power and by seeking the will of God (1 Jn. 2:15–17).

The blessing pronounced on those who believe and love the Lord even though they have not seen him (Jn. 20:29; cf. 1 Pet. 1:8) is particularly relevant to certain questions raised by the Easter tradition. The original saving event belongs in the past. Faith and love represent further instruction for new situations in life that developed out of baptismal teaching (cf. 1 Tim. 2:15; 4:12; 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22).

4. The understanding of faith in the rest of the NT. The linguistic usage of Acts often points back to formulas and expressions drawn from the terminology of mission. People come to faith in God (Acts 16:34) or in the Lord (5:14; 18:8). Exhortations to faith are directly connected with the promise of salvation (16:31). There is also a new trust in Christian circles in what is "written" (24:14; 26:27). There thus grew up a way of looking at salvation history analogous to Jewish Hel. piety.

The book of Heb. represents an independent tradition of teaching. It makes extensive use of OT motifs and draws on the history of the patriarchs in connection with words of the pistis-group. Thus in its exhortation, Heb. takes up the promise of faith as well as the warning against unbelief (10:37–38 = Hab. 2:3–4). Above all, Heb. 11:1 presents an instructive definition that combines OT and Hel. motifs: "Now faith is being sure of what we hope for and certain of what we do not see." This is not a comprehensive summary of all the elements in faith, but of those that were fundamental for a church under persecution. The future and what is hidden from view are closely connected here.

This definition introduces the survey of patriarchal history in Heb. 11 and the picture of the church in 12:1–11. Jesus Christ appears as the "author and perfecter of our faith" (12:2). He has been made perfect by God and can now bring the struggle for perfection to its conclusion. As those given the promise, God's people are charged with acting on faith. The next world is the goal promised by the word of God. The tension between the here and now and the beyond finds new expression.

The essence of Paul's thought reappears in the Pastoral Letters. But it is restated in a context that is opposed to wild enthusiasm and false teaching. Thus 1 Tim. 1:5 puts forward the thesis: "The goal of this command is love, which comes from a pure heart and a good conscience and a sincere faith." A tendency opposed to enthusiasm may be detected here. The command to love is reformulated so as to include faith. Soundness in faith (Tit. 1:13; 2:2) sets a new standard that distinguishes the Christian life from all false teaching. We now get a reference to "the faith," an established body of Christian truth (1 Tim. 3:9; 4:1, 6; 5:8; Tit. 1:4, 13; 3:15). The overtones of philosophy and wisdom strengthen the self-awareness of a church that is consolidating itself.

As in the paraenetic tradition elsewhere, Jas. is conscious of the need to prove one's faith (1:3; cf. 1 Pet. 1:7). He demands renunciation of all conduct that conflicts with living faith and one's confession (Jas. 1:6–8). For him, faith and obedient conduct are indissolubly linked. Faith understood merely as trust and confession of certain elemental truths is not able to save. Only through obedience (→ hypakoē, 5633) and conduct that fulfills God's commands does faith come to completion (Jas. 2:22). The opponents that the author has in mind do not attack the Christian faith but exempt themselves from obedience.

Some scholars hold that the teaching of Jas. stands in conflict with that of Paul, esp. on the question of justification. But Jas. is responding to those who have apparently taken Paul's doctrine of justification by faith out of context, concluding that Paul's repudiation of works as the ground of justification relieved them of the need for good works and a changed life (Paul deals with this issue in Rom. 6:1–22; 12:1–2; Gal. 5:15–26).

It is striking that Jas. 2:23 quotes Gen. 15:6 (as does Paul) and illustrates the argument by referring to Abraham's example. But whereas Paul appeals to Abraham's belief in the promise of God that was the occasion of the verdict of justification in Gen. 15, Jas. appeals to the story in Gen. 22, which shows Abraham's willingness to sacrifice Isaac. Jas. 2:22 draws the conclusion: "You see that [Abraham's] faith and his actions were working together, and his faith was made complete by what he did." For both Paul and Jas. justify means to declare righteous. However, in the case of Paul, it is God who declares believers righteous. In the case of Jas., our works declare us to be righteous by showing that we are people of faith (cf. 2:17).

5. The act, structure, and content of faith. Christianity is a unique faith-event; this gave the most powerful expression to its understanding of the historical situation and its outlook in view of the claims of the gospel. The act of faith, together with the thought-forms and structures bound up with it (i.e., the gospel, the kerygma, the word of God), has a special significance in Christianity. It is only in relation to the gospel and the claims of God's word that faith can declare what it has to say. Christians know that they have received grace and are summoned to follow a particular path towards a goal. The saving act of God goes before them. The basis of faith is God's revelation of himself. Faith remains subordinate to knowledge, but knowledge belongs to the substance of faith.

See also peithō, persuade (4275).

4412 (pistos, pass. trustworthy, faithful; act. trusting, believing), → 4411.

4413 (pistoō, rely, convince), → 4411.

4414 πλανάω

πλανάω (planaō), lead astray, cause to wander, mislead (4414); πλάνη (planē), wandering, delusion, error (4415); πλανήτης (planētēs), wandering (4417); πλάνος (planos), leading astray, deceitful, deceiver, imposter (4418); ἀποπλανάω (apoplanaō), go astray, wander away (675); ἀπατάω (apataō), trick, deceive (572); ἐξαπατάω (exapataō), trick, deceive (1987); ἀπάτη (apatē), deception, trickery, deceitfulness (573); παραλογίζομαι (paralogizomai), cheat, deceive, delude (4165).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. planaō in the act. means to lead astray, esp. by one's behavior or words; in the mid. and pass., to go astray, be led astray. It can refer to a person's judgment or to actions in the realm of morals. apoplanaomai, to wander from or roam about, can be used of humans, powers, animals, rumors, and even of blood or breath pulsing through the body; it does not always have a negative undertone. In a transferred sense the vb. can mean to wander off course, miss the mark in thought, speech, or action. Here again the word carries no implication of guilt.

(b) In Gk. tragedy one's mistakes are seen as a fate laid on a person by the gods. In Plato the way to right insight leads through error. The gnostics and the mystery cults used the word for a person's entanglement in the world from which one must be released.

(c) Similar meanings characterize the other derivatives of this group of words. planos means going astray, roaming; also unsteady, deceiving; as a noun it means deviation or imposter. planē means vacillation and error as characteristics of human life.

(d) apataō, exapataō, and apatē are sometimes synonymous with words from the root plan-. The basis for deceit and trickery here, however, is not ignorance so much as epithymia (→ 2123), desire. apatē accordingly comes to mean pleasure, enjoyment. A negative sense was not at first attached to it, though this develops later.

(e) paralogizomai is a negative form of logizomai, which means to calculate, reckon, or consider. It connotes deception, cheating by false reasoning.

2. The cl. meaning of planaō is taken over in the LXX. The spatial sense of the vb. is found in the context of leading the blind astray (Deut. 27:18), and it is also the basic concept behind the description of people staggering as a result of drinking wine (cf. Isa. 19:13–14; 28:7).

planaō is frequently used in combination with hodos, way, to denote Israel's way of life as wandering sheep (Ps. 119:176; Isa. 13:14; 53:6; cf. Deut. 22:1). The wandering of the people in the desert is a punishment of God for their disobedience (Num. 14:29, 33; cf. also Deut. 2:14). The people go astray by ignoring God's commands and practicing idolatry (cf. 13:6 = LXX 13:5). What leads them astray are idols (Amos 2:4), false prophets (Jer. 23:32), and unfaithful kings (2 Chr. 33:9). Even God himself appears as one who leads astray (Job 12:24–25; Isa. 63:17; Ezek. 14:9). Turning from this erroneous path and salvation are necessary. Thus this basic relationship to God is aptly expressed by the picture of sheep who cannot exist without a shepherd (→ probaton, → 4585).

3. apataō means to deceive, seduce, lead astray. The deception can be used as a human stratagem to dupe others (e.g., Samson in Jdg. 14:15; 16:5). Gen. 3:13 speaks of the serpent's deception in enticing Eve to eat the forbidden fruit. The prophet Micaiah in a vision sees a spirit who offers, in Yahweh's royal council, to become a lying spirit and to entice King Ahab and his prophets (1 Ki. 22:20–22). By contrast, note the psalmist's testimony: "I sought God ... and I was not deceived" (Ps. 77:2, LXX).

4. In the intertestamental period some important elements are added to the concept of being led astray. The agents are often spirits or powers (e.g., sons of God [Gen. 6:1–4] and the devil). Apocalyptic lit. predicts the planē as a precursor of the end of the world, the day of the Messiah. The Qumran texts speak of a wandering astray of the children of light, brought about by evil spirits (1QS 3:21; CD 2:17; 3:4, 14), and of those who have appeared as deceivers of the community (20:11; 1QH 2:14, 19; 4:7, 12).

NT 1. (a) planaō and apoplanaō in the act. are used mostly in an apocalyptic context (e.g., Matt. 24:4–5, 11, 24; Rev. 2:20; 12:9; 20:3, 8, 10) and of false teachers who lead others astray (2 Tim. 3:13; 1 Jn. 1:8; 2:26; 3:7). The nouns also often appear in this context (e.g., 2 Thess. 2:11; 2 Pet. 2:18; Jude 11, 13; 2 Jn. 7). The spatial sense is seen most clearly where the picture of sheep is offered (Matt. 18:12–13; 1 Pet. 2:25). There is always a theological meaning associated with its use.

The mid. planaomai and apoplanaomai have the sense be wrong, be led astray, err (Matt. 22:29; Mk. 12:24; 1 Tim. 6:10; Tit. 3:3; Heb. 3:10; 5:2; Jas. 5:19). The formula mē planasthē means, "Do not be deceived" (e.g., Gal. 6:7). The noun planē refers to a specific mistake (Matt. 27:64; 2 Pet. 3:17; Jude 11) or to more general confusion, error, lack of discipline, and restraint (Rom. 1:27; Eph. 4:14; 1 Jn. 4:6).

(b) planētēs occurs in Jude 13 in the sense of a wandering star or planet, with which Jude compares the false teachers. The apparently irregular movement of the planets, which seems to violate the order of the heavens, is attributed to the disobedience of the angels controlling them. planos is used both as an adj. (of deceitful spirits, 1 Tim. 4:1) and as a noun (deceiver, imposter; Matt. 27:63; 2 Cor. 6:8; 2 Jn. 7).

(c) apataō, exapataō, and apatē occur in 2 Cor. 11:3 and 1 Tim. 2:14 with reference to the fall, the archetype of deception and disobedience as a result of desire; in 2 Thess. 2:3; Eph. 5:6; Col. 2:8 in connection with false teachers; and in Matt. 13:22; Rom. 7:11; 2 Thess. 2:10; Heb. 3:13; 2 Pet. 2:13 in the ethical sense of enticement to sin. apataō in Jas. 1:26 refers to a person who "deceives himself."

(d) paralogizomai occurs only at Col. 2:4 and Jas. 1:22, meaning to delude or to deceive oneself (by being merely a hearer and not a doer of the word).

2. The NT takes up the OT picture of a sheep that wanders and gets lost (Matt. 10:6; 12:11–12; 18:12; 26:31; Lk. 15:4; Jn. 10; 1 Pet. 2:25). Most places where planaō words are used may be interpreted in terms of this background, even if it is not expressly mentioned. Jesus is the way (hodos) and the truth (Jn. 14:6); to be removed from him, the shepherd, means to wander about without guidance or protection and so be in danger of getting lost.

Where we read of nations going astray (Rev. 18:23), of people having wandered from the right way (Jas. 5:20; 2 Pet. 2:15), or God's people going astray (Heb. 3:10; 5:2), the underlying shepherd image is sometimes coupled with the desert wanderings of Israel. It is also implicit in passages where mention is made of false teachers who lead astray (e.g., Matt. 24:4–11; Jn. 7:12; 1 Jn. 3:7; Rev. 20:8–10).

3. Life prior to becoming a Christian is described as planē, error and being deceived (Rom. 1:27; Eph. 4:14; cf. Tit. 3:3; 1 Pet. 2:25). People are without the guidance and support of a Lord and shepherd. To wander away from the faith (1 Tim. 6:10) or the truth (Jas. 5:19–20) or to have one's heart go astray (Heb. 3:10, 13) is sinful and incurs guilt (cf. also 2 Thess. 2:10). Riches are seductive (Matt. 13:22; Mk. 4:19; 1 Tim. 6:10), but there are also other desires lying in wait to deceive the believer (Rom. 16:18; Eph. 4:22; 2 Pet. 2:13).

In the background are dark powers, such as the spirit of deception (1 Tim. 4:1; 1 Jn. 4:6), the Antichrist (2 Jn. 7), and ultimately Satan himself (Rev. 12:9; 20:10).

4. The danger for Christians is deceiving themselves (1 Cor. 3:18; 1 Jn. 1:8), which can lead to falling away from right doctrine. Hence the need for the warning "Do not be deceived" (1 Cor. 6:9; 15:33; Gal. 6:7; Jas. 1:16; cf. 2 Thess. 2:3). Those not firmly grounded in the faith are in danger of missing the true knowledge, since numerous false teachers threaten the church (Eph. 4:14; Col. 2:8; 1 Thess. 2:3; 2 Thess.

2:3; 2 Tim. 3:13; 2 Pet. 2:18; 3:17; 1 Jn. 2:26; 3:7; 4:6). To be led astray by false teaching and to be led astray into definite acts of sin go hand in hand. On the opposite side is the truth (Jas. 5:19–20), which must be held firmly by faith in him who is the truth.

5. Jesus was hated and persecuted by the Jews because they saw him as one who led the people astray (Matt. 27:63; Jn. 7:12, 47). In the eyes of those who did not believe the apostles were imposters (2 Cor. 6:8), although they were servants of the truth. In the struggle to uphold the truth the church is pointed to him who himself experienced human weaknesses (Heb. 5:2) and who can therefore provide support. Faith in him is the yardstick of truth and error. Seen in this light, the church's opponents turn out to be deceivers who themselves have been deceived, and the Pharisees are those who really lead the people astray (Matt. 22:29; Mk. 12:24, 27; cf. 2 Tim. 3:13).

6. The final demonstration of the truth lies in the future, in the final revelation of Jesus Christ at his second coming. In the meantime, the era of the church is the era of fighting for the truth. The apostles' testimony is proclaimed to all nations (Matt. 28:18–20), but at the same time the powers increasingly bring in confusion and error (24:4–5, 11, 24; Rev. 20:3, 8). It is against the background of this final climax of the struggle that most of the texts containing the terms we have been considering are to be understood. When the Lord returns, he will end all planē, deception (2 Thess. 2; 2 Pet. 3; Rev. 12:9; 13:14).

4415 (planē, wandering, delusion, error), → 4414.

4417 (planētēs, wandering), → 4414.

4418 (planos, leading astray, deceitful, deceiver, imposter), → 4414.

4424 πλάτος

πλάτος (platos), breadth, width (4424); πλατύνω (platynō), make broad, enlarge, open out (4425); πλατύς (platys), broad, wide (4426).

CL & OT The vb. platynō means (act.) widen; (pass.) to grow wide, be opened; and in a transferred sense, open (the heart) and expand (the understanding). platys, wide or level, in an extended sense can mean widespread, strong (oaths), brackish, or flat (of the sea).

NT In Eph. 3:18 platos, width, occurs together with length, height, and depth, an idiom that represents the universe of experience known in God. In Rev. 21:16 (2x) the word simply denotes width. In 20:9, the NIV translates "the breadth of the earth." This phrase, as used in Dan. 12:2 LXX ("dust of the earth"), denotes the place of the dead awaiting everlasting life or everlasting contempt.

platynō in Matt. 23:5 may refer to ostentatious wearing of wider phylactery straps by the teachers of the law and the Pharisees or to large leather cases containing texts (cf. Exod. 13:16). In 2 Cor. 6:11, 13, Paul uses this vb. to demonstrate and appeal for a show of generous, expansive affection.

platys is found only in Matt. 7:13, where it refers either to a road (and thus means wide or level) or to a gate (and thus means wide; for background on the road to destruction see Ps. 1:6; Prov. 13:15; 14:12; Sir. 21:10). Jesus stresses the need for believers to separate from the masses who follow the easy way that leads to destruction.

4425 (platynō, make broad, enlarge), → 4424.

4426 (platys, broad, wide), → 4424.

4429 πλεονάζω

πλεονάζω (pleonazō), to be or become more or great, to grow, to increase (4429); ὑπερπλεονάζω (hyperpleonazō), to be present in great abundance (5670).

CL & OT 1. pleonazō is formed from pleon (more, comparative of polys) and the ending -azō; it means to be or become (too) much or many. The augmented form hyperpleonazō, to be present in excessive quantity, is rare. Its developed meaning (intrans.) is to exceed the correct amount and thus become presumptuous, to overflow (of a sea or a river), to become (too) numerous (e.g., the Jews in Rome), to be present in plentiful abundance, to be rich in something, to have more than is necessary. Trans. pleonazō means to make rich, to increase or multiply, or to cause to grow. In ethical contexts this vb. denotes in a censorious way that which violates the ideal of moderation, reason, and wholeness.

2. In the LXX pleonazō (27x) generally means to be surplus, to be or become many: e.g., of goods (Exod. 16:18, 23), people (1 Chr. 4:27; 5:23; Jer. 30:19 = LXX 37:19), money (2 Chr. 24:11; 31:5; Sir. 35:1 = LXX 32:1), and sins (23:3).

NT In the NT pleonazō occurs 9x; hyperpleonazō only in 1 Tim. 1:4. The vb. expresses a process of growing, multiplying, or increasing. It stands in contrast with perisseuō (→ 4355), which expresses (often in an eschatological sense) the element of the abundance that far exceeds all measurement and of the fullness that overflows all previously fixed boundaries. pleonazō, on the other hand, renders more the idea of development, the growth process of something: "that grace may increase" (Rom. 6:1); "love . . . is increasing" (2 Thess. 1:3); "in increasing measure" (2 Pet. 1:8).

1. In Rom. 5:20 Paul is formulating the relationship between law and grace. Through the law (→ nomos, 3795) sin increases (pleonazō) to its full extent and exposes the hopelessness of humanity in the face of death. But grace has abounded all the more (hyperperisseuō) in the new age. The more hopelessly we entangle ourselves in increasing sin, the greater is God's liberating act in granting pardon. This view of the relationship between sin and grace apparently led to a misunderstanding, which Paul addressed in Rom. 6:1–22. In 6:1 he uses pleonazō with reference to grace, not, as one might have supposed, perisseuō. Paul is concerned with the process of grace becoming greater; it cannot be stimulated by a conscious persistence in sin.

2. Paul links pleonazō with charis (grace) in 2 Cor. 4:15, explaining that as grace extends to more and more people, thanksgiving overflows (perisseuō) to the glory of God.

3. In Phil. 4:15–17 Paul uses language from the world of business (e.g., the settlement of giving and receiving, 4:15). With reference to the contribution of the Philippians the apostle says, "Not that I am looking for a gift, but I am looking for what may be credited [pleonazonta, from pleonazō] to your account." Paul's use of perisseuō in 4:18 ("I have received full payment and even more") shows again the thrust of pleonazō.

4. Paul prays that the Lord will grant the Thessalonians the ability to grow (pleonazō) and overflow (perisseuō) in love for one another (1 Thess. 3:12). pleonazō is thus intensified by perisseuō.

5. pleonazō occurs in the sense of perisseuō in the OT quotation (Exod. 16:18) in 2 Cor. 8:15: "He who gathered much did not have too much," i.e., had no more than was necessary.

See also auxanō, grow, cause to grow, increase (889).

4430 (pleonekteō, take advantage of, cheat), → 4432.

4431 (pleonektēs, one who is greedy, covetous person), → 4432.

4432 πλεονεξία

πλεονεξία (pleonexia), greediness, avarice, covetousness (4432); πλεονεκτέω (pleonekteō), take advantage of, defraud, cheat (4430); πλεονέκτης (pleonektēs), one who is greedy, a covetous person (4431).

CL & OT Etymologically, pleonexia combines pleon (more) and echō (to have). Cl. Gk. writers used the word not only for a covetous desire for more material possessions, but also for immoral lust for power and inappropriate sexual desire. There was no room for pleonexia in a just society. Together with philotimia (ambition), it was a decisive force in human action and the progress of history. The Cynics and Stoics repudiated all desire, for possessions of any kind meant attachment to what is empty.

In the LXX this word group appears chiefly in the prophetic denunciations and warnings about dishonest gain and the enrichment by violence of the politically powerful (Jer. 22:17; Ezek. 22:27; Hab. 2:9; 2 Macc. 4:50). The emphasis thus falls on the ungodly character of covetousness.

NT 1. Except for pleonexia in Mk. 7:22; Lk. 12:15; 2 Pet. 2:3, 14, in the NT this word group is found only in Paul. The action denoted by these words is always judged negatively, and except in 2 Cor. 2:11 it is always directed towards material gain.

2. In Paul's catalogs of vices pleonexia is a mark of a life that lacks knowledge of God (Rom. 1:29; 1 Cor. 6:10–11), faith, and obedience (5:10–11; Eph. 5:3). Where the bond between creature and Creator is severed, human society falls into disorder. Those who no longer have God as their goal or focus seek fulfillment in themselves, their possessions, and their acquisitiveness. Ultimately they make themselves into an idol that strives to subject everything to itself. For that reason Col. 3:5 identifies covetousness with idolatry (→ eidōlon, 1631).

Similarly, in Matt. 6:24 and Lk. 16:13 "Money" (→ mamōnas, 3440) is an idol that holds in its sway those who seem to control it. Thus 1 Thess. 4:6 lays down the rule that no one should "wrong his brother or take advantage [pleonekteō] of him." It is not clear whether this rule refers to sexual relations outside marriage (as the prior context suggests) or to business conduct.

3. Christians should not associate with a greedy person in the church (1 Cor. 5:11). By pleonexia such people exclude themselves from it and ultimately from the kingdom of God (6:10; Eph. 5:5). Like immorality and impurity, covetousness must be kept out of the life of the church (5:5). Col. 3:5 urges believers to "put to death . . . whatever belongs to your earthly nature: sexual immorality, impurity, lust, evil desires and greed, which is idolatry." This recalls Matt. 5:29–30 and urges that the physical nature enslaved in sin be subjected to the rule of the new spiritual life, with its transforming liberating power revealed in Christ (→ sarx, 4922; pneuma, 4460).

4. False teachers are characterized by their greed for material gain (2 Pet. 2:3, 14). Along the same lines, Paul's opponents "peddle the word of God for profit" (2 Cor. 2:17). Against this Paul can point out that as a rule he earned his keep with his own hands (Phil. 4:15; 1 Thess. 2:9) and that even in Corinth he and his coworkers did not try to enrich themselves by their service (2 Cor. 7:2; 12:17). But with regard to the collection for Jerusalem, Paul could ask in urgent terms for a liberal gift (2 Cor. 8–9).

See also philargyria, love of money, avarice (5794).

4435 (plēgē, blow, stroke, wound), → 3463.

4436 πλῆθος

πλῆθος (plēthos), number, multitude, crowd, throng, assembly, people (4436); πληθύνω (plēthynō), increase, multiply, grow (4437).

CL & OT 1. plēthos (linked with the root plē-, full) means a crowd or multitude in contrast to a small number or an individual. It can be used for a great number of things and, in connection with time, duration. With persons, it means a multitude, crowd; as a military term, a mass of troops; from a sociological standpoint, the mass that lacks culture and moral understanding; in a democracy, the total number of voters, the majority that turns the scales in political decisions, or the assembly (e.g., of the citizens of Athens); in religious communities, the body of members, the congregation. The pl. can be used to give emphasis (crowds, flocks). The vb. plēthynō means increase, enlarge, multiply; intrans. to be full, to increase in number.

2. In the LXX plēthos is found nearly 300x; plēthynō, about 200x. Most often it translates words related to the root rābâ, be or become much, many, great. The various forms are used to describe the abundant fullness of God's giving: in the blessing of creation (Gen. 1:22, 28); in the promise to the patriarchs and the people of God of great posterity (17:2, 4; 22:17; Exod. 1:7, 20; 32:13); in the bestowal of rich blessings (Deut. 28:11) and salvation (Ps. 5:7; 31:19; 51:1). God's fullness of glory (Exod. 15:7) and majesty (Ps. 150:2) is to be praised. Humans, by contrast, should not trust in the abundance of their strength (33:16), nor should God's people trust in the multitude of their warriors (Hos. 10:13) or sacrifices (Isa. 1:11). We stand before the great God with an abundance of guilt (Gen. 6:5; Amos 4:4; Sir. 5:6; 23:3, 16).

NT plēthos occurs 31x in the NT; plēthynō, 12x—most are in Luke's writings. The words can describe the fullness of God's giving. This is illustrated by passages from the OT that refer to the growth of God's people in fulfillment of the divine promises (Acts 7:17 = Exod. 1:7; Heb. 6:14 = Gen. 22:17; Heb. 11:12 = Gen. 15:5). plēthynō also occurs in the formula of greeting that prays that grace and peace (1 Pet. 1:2; 2 Pet. 1:2), or mercy, peace, and love (Jude 2) may "be yours in abundance."

Jas. 5:20 and 1 Pet. 4:8 (= Prov. 10:12) declare that the love that brings back a sinner from the error of his or her ways and the mutual love practiced in the community cover "a multitude of sins." This expression is not so much concerned with the number of sins committed, as if they were counted up in some divine bookkeeping, but with the effect of love that shows itself to be all the greater in undoing sin. Similarly, 2 Cor. 9:10 (cf. Isa. 55:10; Hos. 10:12) promises that God will see to it that no gift of love will make a person poor, but will "increase" rich blessings.

Luke frequently uses these words to describe the great impact made by Jesus and the gospel on the populace (Lk. 8:37; Acts 14:4; 21:36), which caused a large crowd to follow him (Lk. 6:17 par.; Mk. 3:7; Lk. 23:27; Acts 5:14, 16; 14:1; 17:4). Peter's apostolic missionary work and the harvest of the gospel among the Gentiles is anticipated by the great catch of fishes (Lk. 5:6; Jn. 21:6). The vb. plēthynō esp. is used to indicate the increase of the church through the spreading of God's Word (Acts 7:17; 9:31; 12:24; reminiscent of the OT increase of the people of God as a sign of blessing).

Lk. also makes a literary use of plēthos to focus attention on a small group of individuals alongside the anonymous multitude: the priest and the multitude (Lk. 1:10), the angel of the Lord and the heavenly host (2:13), the disciples and the people (6:17), and the Twelve and the great body of the church (Acts 6:2, 5). It means company or assembly in Acts 4:32; 14:4; 23:7, and underlines the corporate character of the action of the group in Lk. 19:37; 23:1; Acts 4:32; 25:24. In Lk. plēthos can also mean a religious assembly: participants in worship (Lk. 1:10; Acts 19:9), the company of believers (4:32), and the great body of the church (6:2, 5; 15:12, 30).

Matt. 24:12 speaks of the increase of wickedness in the end times. The disciples are not to lose their zeal under the pressure of such events, esp. when anti-Christian forces gain control even in the church and the widespread rejection of God's law makes life unbearable.

See also gemō, to load, be full (1154); perisseuō, be more than enough, abound, excel (4355); plēroō, fill, complete, fulfill, accomplish, carry out (4444); chortazō, to feed, fatten, fill (5963); chōreō, have or make room, give way, go (6003).

4437 (plēthynō, increase, multiply, grow), → 4436.

4441 (plērēs, full, filled, complete), → 4444.

4442 (plērophoreō, bring in full measure, fulfill, fully persuade), → 4444.

4443 (plērophoria, fullness, full assurance), → 4444.

4444 πληρόω

πληρόω (plēroō), fill, complete, fulfill, accomplish, carry out (4444); πλήρης (plērēs), full, filled, complete (4441); πλήρωμα (plērōma), that which has been completed, fullness (4445); ἀναπληρόω (anaplēroō), fill up (405); πληροφορέω (plērophoreō), bring in full measure, fulfill, fully persuade (4442); πληροφορία (plērophoria), fullness, full assurance (4443); πίμπλημι (pimplēmi), fill, complete, fulfill (4398); ἐμπίμπλημι (empimplēmi), fill full, fill up, satisfy (1855).

CL & OT 1. (a) Most of these words contain the common root plē-, full, fullness. plēroō, as well as empimplēmi, means lit. to fill a vessel, so that the result can be described by plērēs or plērōma. It is used in an extended sense of fulfilling a wish, hearing a prayer, satisfying a desire, stilling wrath and anger, meeting an obligation, and carrying out work. It has the further sense of bringing to full measure, delivering a reward or tribute, filling a gap, and enlarging. It is used in a temporal sense in the pass. of expiring, coming to an end, e.g., a full (plērēs) year, a full number (plērōma) of years.

(b) Just as a person can be full of pain, joy, love, and virtue, he or she can also be filled with God, i.e., possessed and inspired by God (e.g., it is applied to those who uttered oracles). Elsewhere in Gk. thought is the notion that God fills or permeates the universe. According to Plato, the transcendent God fills the universe by his presence and working.

2. (a) plēroō and pimplēmi are almost equally common in the LXX. They have the same range of meaning as in cl. Gk.: e.g., the lit. sense (Gen. 21:19; 2 Ki. 4:4); of the divine ordinance to fill the earth (Gen. 1:28; 9:7). In an extended sense, plēroō and its derivatives are used of hearing prayers (Ps. 20:5), finishing work (1 Ki. 7:51), paying tribute (2 Macc. 8:10), confirming the words of someone else (1 Ki. 1:14), and bringing a punishment to full measure (Wis. 19:4).

(b) plēroō is used frequently in the LXX (pimplēmi less so) in connection with expressions of time: to make a time full, mainly in the pass. in the sense of expiring, coming to an end. The idea implies a definite amount of time that must inevitably come to an end, because nature (Gen. 25:24), a vow (Num. 6:5), the law (Lev. 8:33), or God's word (Jer. 25:12; cf. 2 Chr. 36:21) decrees or determines it. The OT also speaks about the filling up of sins, such as the iniquity of the Amorites being not yet complete (Gen. 15:16; cf. also 2 Macc. 6:12–16). The attainment of the full measure of sins means the end of the dominion of the four godless kingdoms (Dan. 8:23).

(c) There is a specific OT use of the term when the word of God spoken by the prophets is said to be fulfilled (cf. 1 Ki. 2:27; 2 Chr. 36:21–22; 1 Esd. 1:57). Yahweh himself is the one who executes what has been prophesied in his name (1 Ki. 8:15, 24).

(d) There are numerous references to being filled (empimplēmi) by the Spirit of God. It is the distinguishing mark of the prophets (Sir. 48:12) and can be transmitted by the laying on of hands (Deut. 34:9). Skilled craftsmen are also said to be filled by a spirit, that of knowledge and craftsmanship (Exod. 28:3; 31:3). Being filled by the Spirit is also given to those who seek the Lord and study the law (Sir. 39:6–10).

The statement of Wis. 1:7 that "the spirit of the Lord has filled the world" is not to be understood in a pantheistic sense; rather, it is a confession that God hears and knows everything and punishes sin (see the context). Similarly, the rhetorical question of Jer. 23:24, "Do not I fill heaven and earth?" means that God sees all things. The statement that God's glory fills the earth (cf. Num. 14:21; Ps. 72:19; Isa. 6:4) means that God will reveal himself in full measure. Originally this glory was confined to the tabernacle (Exod. 40:34–35) and the temple (1 Ki. 8:10–11; 2 Chr. 5:14; 7:1; Hag. 2:8). But in the end time, "the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea" (Hab. 2:14).

3. The Qumran writings mainly use the idea of filling to denote the completion of a period of time (cf. 1QS 7:20, 22), as well as in the eschatological sense that all existence and events are fulfilled according to a firm plan already fixed by God (3:16; 1QM 17:9). In the time of salvation expected at the end God will fill his land with the rich bounty of blessing and all the wealth of the nations will be brought together at Jerusalem (12:12–16; cf. 14:4).

NT The NT usage of these terms is in line with the foregoing. pimplēmi (24x) and empimplēmi (5x) remain close to the lit. meaning. Both are used most often by Luke, the former to denote endowment by the Spirit, pictured in a physical and visual manner, the latter to denote satisfying with physical food (Lk. 1:53; 6:25; Acts 14:17).

plēroō is more significant, not only because it is more frequent (86x), but also because it is virtually a technical term used in connection with the fulfillment of Scripture as well as with the fulfillment of time in an eschatological sense. plērēs is used lit. in the Synoptic Gospels, although it is also used for one full of the Holy Spirit, full of faith, or full of good works (cf. Acts 6:3, 5; 9:36). plērophoreō and plērophoria (10x total) come close in meaning to the vb. perisseuō (→ 4355). plērophoria can mean lit. fullness and fig. also full assurance, conviction. It is difficult to determine whether plērōma (a favorite Pauline word) focuses on the process of filling or the fact of being filled. In the rest of this article, we will focus on the more theological uses of these words.

1. Fulfillment of OT Scripture. (a) The NT church was conscious that it lived in continuity with the OT. It found its strength in the OT, and not merely in the way it made use of the OT in authenticating its apologetic and mission vis-à-vis Jud. Right from the beginning, going back to Jesus himself, the church felt the need to base its life on the OT. It appealed to the OT with a sometimes surprising self-confidence in a manner characterized by the key concept of fulfillment. The usual term was plēroō, although anaplēroō and pimplēmi occur once each in this connection (Matt. 13:14; Lk. 21:22).

(b) The fulfillment is often introduced by the conjunctions hopōs or hina ("so that"). This is esp. true of those fulfillment quotations that have their origin in the church's understanding of its faith (e.g., Jas. 2:23) or episodes in the life of Jesus that were seen as the fulfillment of the divine plan of salvation revealed in the OT. In this sense writers speak of the fulfillment of the Scriptures. The entire OT can be in mind (e.g., Lk. 24:44), though the prophetic writings stand out (e.g., Matt. 26:56). Hence, writers may speak of the fulfillment of prophecy (13:14) or of the words of the prophets (Acts 13:27).

Sometimes the prophets are named whose words are cited as Scripture (e.g., Isa. in Matt. 4:14; 8:17; Jer. in Matt. 2:17; cf. 16:14). At other times the reference is simply to "the prophet" (1:22; 2:5, 15; 21:4). Matt. expressly characterizes the prophet's activity as a subordinate one with the preposition dia, through ("through the prophet," 10x). Behind the Scripture stands the true author, God himself (cf. 1:22; 2:15). He is the one who declared it beforehand (Acts 3:18).

(c) Just as God is the originator, he is also the fulfiller of the word spoken by him. This finds expression in the frequent circumlocution using the pass. voice, to be fulfilled. Although God brings about fulfillment (Acts 3:18; 13:33), this does not preclude human participation. By their failure to understand the utterances of the prophets the inhabitants of Jerusalem fulfilled Scripture (13:27).

The NT also speaks of the fulfillment of the words of an angel (Lk. 1:20) and of Jesus (Jn. 18:9, 32). In any case, the process of evaluating scriptural proofs cited in the NT starts from the eschatologically understood present and reaches back to the OT Scripture (cf. the frequent kathōs gegraptai, "as it is written," e.g., Mk. 9:13; Lk. 2:23). Generally it is the wording of the LXX and not the Heb. text that is referred to. Certain passages are understood as mysteriously presaging the present advent of the final events (→ apokalypsis, 637). Faith discovers in the OT the promise of the salvation that is now coming to pass.

One can sometimes note in such passages a striking freedom in dealing with the wording of the OT. Jesus' attitude to the wording of the OT was already discriminating (cf. Matt. 5:17; Mk. 10:2–9). Paul also distinguished between the Spirit and the letter (2 Cor. 3:6–11). Sometimes he expounded the OT in an allegorical manner (Gal. 4:21–31; cf. also 1 Cor. 9:9; 1 Tim. 5:18 with Deut. 25:4). The author of Heb. used the form of a homily in which he expounded on a connected string of OT passages step by step.

It is sometimes suggested that the apologetic interest of the NT writers led them to wrest OT passages out of their original contexts in order to give them a Christological interpretation. Thus the quotation of Hos. 11:1 ("and out of Egypt I called my son") by Matt. 2:15 appears in its context to have nothing to do with the infant Jesus returning from Egypt. Rather, it refers to the original exodus of the people of Israel. Similarly, the Immanuel prophecy of Isa. 7:14, quoted in Matt. 1:23, appears to lose its point for Isaiah's time if the fulfillment did not occur until the birth of Jesus. If these and other OT quotations are regarded as direct predictions of events that did not happen until Jesus, then the NT writers cannot be exonerated of the charge of taking texts out of context, displaying indifference to the original meaning of the text.

But we should understand these NT passages from the standpoint of an eschatological present. The OT passages are treated not so much as predictions as anticipations. From the standpoint of the Israelite living at the time of the original prophecy, the utterance was about something significant in the history of the Jewish people. Matt.'s idea of fulfillment says, in effect, that the event that the Jews thought was significant turns out to be an anticipation of an event of a similar kind but ultimately more significant in God's purposes for the salvation of humankind. It is in this sense that the latter fulfills the former.

2. The fulfillment of time. (a) In a general sense, the expression of the fulfillment of time (e.g., Lk. 1:23, 57; 2:6, cf. 43; Acts 7:23) refers to a certain period of time coming to an end. It is always pass. in the NT.

(b) The idea of fulfillment in Lk. 21:24 is significant. The execution of divine judgment on Jerusalem will go on "until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled." There is more emphasis here than in (a) above on the thought that God determines the times and the seasons, since God is the implied subj. in these pass. constructions. Time (→ aiōn, 172) has a function in God's plan of salvation. Similarly, 9:51 speaks of the fulfillment of the time for Jesus' being taken to heaven, and Acts 2:1 of the day of Pentecost being fulfilled (both using symplēroō).

(c) According to Mk. 1:15, Jesus' first public preaching began with the notion that the time appointed by God and awaited by Israel has come. This may be compared with Jesus' declaration in the synagogue at Nazareth after reading from Isa. 61:1–2 (Lk. 4:18–19): "Today this scripture is fulfilled in your hearing" (4:21). By way of contrast, Jesus declares in Jn. 7:8, "The right time has not yet come (peplērōtai)." Although the time of God's intervention in Christ has already come, the events of Jesus' earthly life are still fully in the hands of God. No one, not even Jesus himself, can control them (cf. 2:4; 7:30; 8:20). The proper time is only revealed to Jesus later (12:31; 13:1; 17:1).

(d) In this connection, Paul makes use of the noun plērōma: "But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (Gal. 4:4–5). This does not mean only that an appointed time has come. Rather, it means that in the divine economy of salvation time has reached its full measure. Similarly in Eph. 1:10 Paul links God's plan of salvation with the times reaching their fulfillment (plērōma). He wishes to stress that the Christ event does not lie in the realm of human factors and possibilities but in the counsel of God (1:9).

3. The fulfillment of God's law. (a) The NT discussion of fulfillment of the law is always concerned with the basic thought that "love is the fulfillment (plērōma) of the law" (Rom. 13:10, cf. 13:8). Similarly in Gal. 5:14 Paul says, "The entire law is summed up in a single command: 'Love your neighbor as yourself'" (quoting Lev. 19:18). Concretely, this can mean: "Carry each other's burdens, and in this way you will fulfill (anaplērōsete) the law of Christ" (Gal. 6:2).

(b) In his Sermon on the Mount Jesus said that he had not "come to abolish the Law and the Prophets [i.e., the OT Scriptures in which God has made his will known] but to fulfill them" (Matt. 5:17). However one attempts to resolve the tension between 5:18–20 and 5:21–48, it is clear that fulfillment is not to be understood in a formal way. Here too the basic motive is love. Jesus shows this love from the start in fulfilling "all righteousness" (3:15).

(c) Although the righteous demand of the law still remains, the sting of death is removed. Through the righteous act of Christ, righteousness has come to us (Rom. 5:18). The sending of God's Son and the condemnation of sin in the flesh (8:3) effect what the law could not do, "in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met (plērōthē) in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit" (8:4).

4. Being filled with the Spirit. In this connection pimplēmi and plēroō are used only in the pass., since God is always thought of as the giver. The adj. plērēs also occurs. The thought is specifically Lukan. Paul develops his doctrine of the Spirit in a different way.

(a) John the Baptist is said to be "filled with the Holy Spirit" from his mother's womb (Lk. 1:15). Likewise, John's parents, Elizabeth (1:41) and Zechariah (1:67), are full of the Holy Spirit in their prophesying.

(b) Mk. 1:12 offers a dynamic view of Jesus' relationship with the Sprit: The latter drives (ekballei) Jesus into the desert as a personal power (cf. the temporary endowment by the Spirit of the charismatic leaders in the book of Jdg., e.g., 6:34; 11:29; 14:19). Lk., however, presents the concept of a special act of bestowing the Spirit in baptism, which endows the recipient with an enduring, miraculous power, so that Jesus returns from his baptism "full of the Holy Spirit" (Lk. 4:1).

(c) What until Pentecost, the decisive date for the universal church, was the privilege of only a few individuals, is from that day forward the most important characteristic of the Jewish and subsequently the Gentile church (cf. Acts 10). According to 2:4, all of the believers present "were filled with the Holy Spirit." This was manifested in the gift of tongues. This connection between being filled and speaking also comes out in 4:8, 31 (cf. 13:9). This filling is not an end in itself, but the condition for speaking with boldness in the missionary situation (cf. esp. 4:31). Although being filled with the Spirit appears to be a mark of the Christian in general, it is esp. stressed in the case of certain individuals, such as Stephen (6:5; 7:55), Paul (9:17), and Barnabas (11:24).

(d) Acts 6 shows that various gifts were apparently bestowed together with the gift of the Spirit: wisdom (6:3, 10), faith (6:5), grace, and power (6:8). Without the Spirit one can be filled with bad qualities, such as wrath (Lk. 4:28; Acts 19:29), fury (Lk. 6:11), and jealousy (Acts 5:17; 13:45). Peter, filled with the Spirit, unmasked their originator as Satan (5:3; 13:9). There is evidently no neutral position for a person between Christ and Satan (Lk. 11:23).

(e) Paul saw humans as standing between these two alternatives: bringing forth "the fruit of the Spirit" or living according to "the acts of the sinful nature" (Gal. 5:19, 22; → karpos, 2843, and sarx, 4922). To be filled with the power of the Spirit (cf. Eph. 5:18) means to "live by the Spirit" (Gal. 5:25), to be "in Christ," or to "have the mind of Christ" (1 Cor. 2:16). All of these mean that one has the fullness of the gifts of grace that flow through oneself as a member of the body of Christ.

5. The fullness of Christ. A few passages in the NT speak of "the fullness" (plērōma) of Christ. It is not easy to attribute a single, unambiguous meaning to this noun. In Rom. 11:12 it means full inclusion; in 11:25, "full number"; in 15:29, "full measure"; and in 13:10, "fulfillment" in the act. sense.

(a) Jn. 1:16 says that the incarnate Word possesses a "fullness," which has already been referred to in 1:14, where the Logos is described as being "full of grace and truth." This fullness denotes, like the glory in 1:14, revelation. Humanity can see the fullness and have a part in this glory.

(b) According to Col. 2:9, "in Christ all the fullness (plērōma) of the Deity lives in bodily form." This fullness, described in Col. 1:15–18, is related to Christ's cross (1:20), death (1:22), and resurrection (1:18). For this reason believers also have this fullness in Christ (2:10). By his cross, death, and resurrection they are reconciled through faith (2:12–14), renewed, and made to participate in his triumph. Many scholars see this doctrine of Christ as the fullness as an answer to the so-called Colossian heresy, which apparently taught that one could attain fullness with the Deity through some sort of angelic hierarchy (a sort of incipient Gnosticism).

(c) Believers "have been given fullness (peplērōmenoi) in Christ" (Col. 2:10). But the fact of their salvation does not exclude their own contribution to this fullness. Eph. 3:19 contains the prayer that the readers may "know this love [of Christ] that surpasses knowledge—that you may be filled to the measure of all the fullness of God." It is clear that such knowledge is not given automatically. It depends on the building up of the church as the body of Christ. Christian service must contribute to the realization of the unity of faith and the knowledge of the Son of God. This in turn leads "to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ" (4:13), in which believers are no longer carried about by every wind of doctrine (4:14). This faith-knowledge is assured by Christ and is given to the church, "which is his body, the fullness of him who fills everything in every way" (1:23).

6. The filling up of the measure of sin. We noted in the OT section that the filling up of the measure of sin in the OT was applied to the Gentile nations. Tob. 14:5 restricts it to them and argues that God will protect the people of Israel against it. But in Matt. 23:32 Jesus says expressly to the Jewish leaders: "Fill up, then, the measure of the sin of your forefathers." This implies that they are sinning just as much as their fathers did, or that they fill out what was still lacking in sins. Paul likewise turns the expression against the Jews in 1 Thess. 2:15–16: The Jews killed the Lord Jesus and the prophets, drove the Christian missionaries out, and displeased God by keeping them "from speaking to the Gentiles so that they may be saved. In this way they always heap up their sins to the limit (anaplērōsai). The wrath of God has come upon them at last."

7. Filling a need. In the Pauline letters anaplēroō, antanaplēroō, and prosanaplēroō are linked with hysterēma, lack (both in sing. and pl.), in the sense of filling a lack that someone has. Thus, the coming of Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus made up for Paul's being separated from the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 16:17). Epaphroditus served Paul as the representative of the Philippian church in their stead (Phil. 2:30).

Most important is Col. 1:24, where Paul declares: "Now I rejoice in what was suffered for you, and I fill up in my flesh what is still lacking in regard to Christ's afflictions, for the sake of his body, which is the church." The sufferings of the church are not to be separated from those of Christ, so that one can speak of Christ's still being afflicted (→ thlipsis, 2568)—not that these sufferings make satisfaction for sin, only that they are edificatory both for oneself and for the church. Note how in Acts 9:4 the Lord asks the persecuting Saul, "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" Not all persecution fell to the historical Jesus; a part remains for the members of his body, the church. Paul, the servant (Col. 1:23, 25), felt that the great suffering that was his lot was in a certain measure suffering for the body of Christ. He thus rejoiced in his suffering.

8. Complete joy. In Jn. and the Johannine letters there is a frequent connection between joy as a subject and the vb. plēroō in the pass. This joy is the joy of Jesus (Jn. 15:11; 17:13), which he brings through his coming (3:29), his words (15:11; 17:13), and his return (16:22) to his disciples (15:11; 17:13). It replaces the sorrow that fills their hearts (16:16, 20). Thus Christ's joy becomes their joy (15:11; 16:24; cf. 1 Jn. 1:4). This joy characterizes the life of the disciples in their walk with Jesus, and it becomes complete (Jn. 3:29; 15:11; 16:24; 17:13; 1 Jn. 1:4; 2 Jn. 12). The pass. underlies the fact that it is God who completes this joy.

See also gemō, to load, be full (1154); perisseuō, be more than enough, abound, excel (4355); plēthos, number, multitude, crowd (4436); chortazō, to feed, fatten, fill (5963); chōreō, have or make room, give way, go (6003).

4445 (plērōma, that which has been completed, fullness), → 4444.

4446 πλησίον

πλησίον (plēsion), neighbor (4446).

CL & OT plēsios basically means near, nearby. The noun derived from it, ho plēsion, means the one standing near, one's neighbor or fellow human being. In the vast majority of cases plēsion in the LXX represents rēaʿ, which can represent every form of human relationship: someone belonging to my surroundings and life (without any reference to blood relationship or nationality), or one with whom I have to do, such as my neighbor (Exod. 11:2), friend (2 Sam. 13:3), or fellow human being (Prov. 6:1, though plēsion is not used in the latter two cases).

The appearance of rēaʿ in legal texts is ambiguous. In the law of love (Lev. 19:18) only members of the covenant community are in view; the alien is not mentioned until 19:33–34. This suggests that the concept of rēaʿ developed in the history of Israel. At first it meant only those incorporated in the covenant people. But later it came to mean simply one's fellow humans. By choosing plēsion the LXX arrayed itself with the wider interpretation. In stricter Jewish circles, only Jews and full proselytes were included under plēsion; in the Qumran community the word was confined to its members.

NT The NT clearly adopts the wider meaning of the LXX. This is seen esp. in Matt. 5:43–47 and Lk. 10:29–37, which form the basis for the interpretation of the command to love. Jesus did not agree with restricting Lev. 19:18 to the brother and friend. He demanded the inclusion of even the enemy.

Jesus placed the law of love under the gospel. The statement "Anyone in need is always my neighbor" is subordinate to the statement "My neighbor is the one who shows me mercy" (cf. the good Samaritan in Lk. 10:37). The question as to whom I am to love is foolish, because the Samaritan, the former enemy, has become my neighbor by his compassionate treatment of me and so challenges me to act in love. In other words, the experience of being loved comes before the challenge, the encouragement before the claim, the gospel before the command. Jesus himself is the key to the parable. The phrase "he took pity on him" (10:33b; → splanchnon, 5073), which in the Gospels is applied generally only to Jesus, indicates that Luke saw Jesus shining through the Samaritan.

The NT combines the two OT commands of love to God (Deut. 6:5) and love to one's neighbor (Lev. 19:18) into a double command (Matt. 22:37–40 par.; cf. Rom. 13:9; Gal. 5:14; Jas. 2:8). It sees them embodied together in Christ. Jesus awakens love for himself in us bruised and miserable humans. His call to "go and do likewise" (Lk. 10:37) demands action that is capable of awakening love in my neighbor. Christ meets me in the other person, whether he is brother or enemy, helper or beggar. He gives me his love and fills me with it, so that it flows over to the other. This moves love to my neighbor out of the dangerous region of new legalism and puts it under the sway of love, which both takes and gives. It opens up a wide sphere of Christian action (Eph. 4:25–5:2) and creates new fellowship and service to God (Mk. 12:28–34; cf. Hos. 6:6).

See also adelphos, brother (81); hetairos, companion, friend (2279).

4454 (plousios, rich, a rich man), → 4458.

4455 (plousiōs, richly), → 4458.

4456 (plouteō, be rich, become rich), → 4458.

4457 (ploutizō, make rich), → 4458.

4458 πλοῦτος

πλοῦτος (ploutos), wealth, riches (4458); πλούσιος (plousios), rich, a rich man (4454); πλουσίως (plousiōs), richly (4455); πλουτέω (plouteō), be rich, become rich (4456); πλουτίζω (ploutizō), make rich (4457).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. this word group initially meant abundance of earthly possessions. Later its meaning divided into two directions: riches in a technical and material sense, and riches in a more general sense, used in such phrases as riches of wisdom, honor, mercy, etc. All the words in this group can bear this double meaning.

(b) In Homer external wealth and virtue are not separated; rich is a comprehensive term for a fortunate life blessed by the gods. Plato and Aristotle judge riches by their effect on society, i.e., if they do not serve the community, they are to be rejected. The Cynics despised material possessions because they brought commitments and anxieties with them. The Stoics believed that the chief danger of riches lay in the creation of a feeling of false security, but they also recognized their value because of the opportunities of developing one's personality. In Gk. culture riches did not seem to have the sociologically divisive influence as they did in other cultures. At the same time, the idea did not develop that riches should be shared with the poor.

2. In the LXX the words in this word group translate a variety of Heb. words, esp. from the root ʿšr. Riches in the earlier parts of OT are seen as having positive value. They consisted mainly of flocks and herds, children and slaves (e.g., Gen. 13:2; 30:43), and were a gift from God. In the nomadic or semi-nomadic period riches presented no problem, for there were no blatant differences between rich and poor. At the conquest of Canaan Yahweh gave everyone a share. Since the land belonged to God, he extended protection to the individual's property (cf. the laws in Exod. 23:1–19, expanded in Deut.).

The period of the monarchy saw the development of royal cities and courts. With the growth of commerce and trade a major social differentiation developed. There was a small upper class of the rich and influential, who, as may be seen in the prophets (Isa. 5:8–12; Jer. 5:26–28; 34:8–11; Amos 2:6–7; 5:10–12; Mic. 2:1–2), destroyed God's people by injustice and violence and so brought deserved judgment on the nation.

In the OT wisdom lit., where the word group is most frequent, we often find unaffected praise of riches (e.g., Prov. 10:4, 15). But there are also references to their relative value (e.g., Ps. 49:16; Prov. 22:1) and their power to lead people astray (e.g., Ps. 49:6; 52:7). At the same time we find in Job and Ps. the problem of vindicating the divine rule (esp. Job 21; Ps. 37; 49; 73).

3. The members of the Qumran community adopted "the poor" as a title of honor. They practiced community of possessions (→ ptōchos, 4777). For Enoch the end will bring with it a complete reversal of all earthly possession and fortune (1 Enoch 96:4; 100:6; 103:4–5). Among the Pharisees only the righteousness derived from keeping the law had real value, although riches enabled one to do good works, carrying with them corresponding obligations. All circles where eschatological hopes were earthly or nationalistic had a high opinion of riches.

NT 1. Occurrences. ploutos is found in the Gospels only in Matt. 13:22; Mk. 4:19; Lk. 8:14, where it means wealth in terms of earthly goods (cf. 1 Tim. 6:17; Jas. 5:2; Rev. 18:17). The word is linked with God (Rom. 9:23), Christ (Eph. 3:8), and churches (2 Cor. 8:2). plousios, as adj. or noun, describes persons rich in this world's goods (e.g., Matt. 19:23–24; 27:57; Mk. 12:41; Lk. 6:24; 12:16; Jas. 1:10–11; 2:6; Rev. 3:17; 13:16). Followed by the dat., it expresses the riches of God (Eph. 2:4) or of the Christian (Jas. 2:5). In 2 Cor. 8:9 and Rev. 2:9 it means those rich in spiritual possessions.

The vb. plouteō is used absolutely in Lk. 1:53; 1 Tim. 6:9; Rev. 18:15 in the reference to earthly possessions, and in 1 Cor. 4:8; 2 Cor. 8:9; Rev. 3:17–18 of spiritual possessions. Rom. 10:12 indicates that God's riches are available for all. ploutizō means make rich, enrich. God makes the church rich in all things (1 Cor. 1:5); the Christian passes on those riches given by God so as to make others rich (2 Cor. 6:10; 9:11). The adv. plousiōs occurs only at Col. 3:16; 1 Tim. 6:17; Tit. 3:6; 2 Pet. 1:11, each of which has a spiritual sense of God's rich grace.

2. Theological significance. (a) Matt. exhibits no ascetic rejection of possessions and riches. Granted, he stresses the dangers inherent in them that may hinder the kingdom of God, but they are not basically satanic (cf. 27:57). If Jesus mercilessly attacks attachment to earthly possessions (13:22; 19:23–24), his denunciation applies to riches in exactly the same way as it does to every human self-contrived security and obsession that make it impossible for us to see the kingdom of God. The seed that falls among thorns is choked by worry and "the deceitfulness of wealth" (13:22). Anxiety is a characteristic of this age (cf. 6:25–32), and every kind of riches is deceitful when it so appeals to people that they are hindered from hearing the message of the kingdom. By contrast, poverty in the Beatitudes means being open for the kingdom of God.

We find the same theme in Matt. 19:23–24, where "hard" is explained by Jesus' answer in 19:26. The reaction of the disciples in 19:25 shows that more is meant by "rich man" than economic standing, for they realized that they were being included. In other words riches are a characteristic of the inner self. In all this teaching Jesus entertains no possibility of someone attaining the kingdom of God (i.e., life) as one stands. The new righteousness, which carries life within it, comes alone from God's power. We must receive it in repentance and faith. In other words, Jesus' view of riches cannot be separated from the crucial hour of decision.

(b) In Mk. the judgment on riches is expressed more mildly. By speaking of "the desires for other things" (4:19) Jesus expresses the danger in terms of a subjective threat to the individual psyche. Riches encourage confidence in oneself and so become a great obstacle on the way to the kingdom of God (10:23–25).

(c) The rich landowner in Lk. 12:16–20 represents rich people in general, who often forget that God is the giver of what they have and thus put their confidence in their riches, or who give themselves up to unrestrained enjoyment of riches and so miss God's purpose for their lives (cf. 16:19–31). The Pharisees scoffed at Jesus' warning against money (16:13–14; → mamōnas, 3440), for they were lovers of wealth (cf. 1 Tim. 6:10; 2 Tim. 3:2; → thēsauros, 2565). The general verdict and context of the passages in which Lk. deals with the rich suggest the possibility that the term is used for Jesus' enemies, or that they are collectively identified by that name. As a result, there is a complete rejection of the rich.

God's kingdom brings with it the reversal of all earthly relationships (Lk. 1:53; 6:24–25; 16:25). Those who reject Jesus and his message because they are enslaved by the present age and its deceitful riches lose the future in their attempt to secure the present. Salvation comes to those who are liberated by the gospel and know that their riches lie in the future, which is even now dawning. The reversal of all earthly values, which will become evident at the end of the age, will confirm that only those riches that have been stored up with God have lasting value and bring salvation (16:9). Zacchaeus's behavior (19:8) and the admonition of 14:12–14 are models for this.

(d) The selfish rich are completely rejected in Jas., which echoes the judgment of the OT prophets and depicts the rich as the unrighteous (2:6; 5:1–6), who can only expect calamity in the coming transformation of the world (1:10–11; 5:1–6; cf. Isa. 40:6–8). By contrast, it is the poor, the rich in faith, whom God has chosen (Jas. 2:5).

(e) Paul is not interested in the material understanding of the term riches. He gives it a deeper meaning by applying it to God, Christ, and the church. Fullness marks out God, the only truly rich one, e.g., in glory (Rom. 9:23; Eph. 3:16) and grace

(1:7; 2:7). The church shares in these riches (1 Cor. 1:5; Eph. 1:7, 18). To be rich is a spiritual gift unconnected with material possessions. Though the apostle is himself poor, he makes many rich by his preaching (2 Cor. 6:10). Seeing that Christ could make us rich only by emptying himself and becoming poor (8:9; cf. Phil. 2:5–11), the Christian's pathway through the world is one of self-emptying and helping fellow believers (2 Cor. 8:2; 9:10–15). Israel's rejection of Christ means riches for the Gentiles, for the message of salvation is now directed to them (Rom. 11:12). The eschatological nature of these riches is missed if they are used as the justification for self-praise within the church (1 Cor. 4:8).

(f) In 1 Tim. earthly riches are not rejected, but the rich are warned against putting their confidence in that which is transient; they are called on instead to become rich in good works by a right use of their possessions (1 Tim. 6:17–19). Heb. 11:26 has a Pauline flavor: Transient abuse became riches for Moses as he looked to the future reward, and his sufferings for God's people anticipates the sufferings of Christ (→ thēsauros, 2565).

(g) Rev. contains a double message: (i) The rich are unable to stand before the wrath of the Lamb (6:15–16), and those who have been enriched by Babylon fall together with it (18:3, 15, 17, 19). (ii) The church in Smyrna, perhaps because it is persecuted for the sake of the faith, is truly rich (2:9). By contrast, Laodicea is poor, because it thinks itself spiritually rich. It is called on to become rich by turning to the Lord (3:17–18). Riches are mentioned in 5:12 in the praise offered to the Lamb.

See also thēsauros, treasure box, chest, storeroom, treasure (2565); mamōnas, money, wealth, property (3440); peripoieō, save for oneself, acquire, gain possession of (4347); chrēma, property, wealth, means, money (5975).

4460 πνεῦμα

πνεῦμα (pneuma), spirit, wind (4460); πνέω (pneō), to blow (4463); πνοή (pnoē), wind, breath (4466); ἐκπνέω (ekpneō), breathe out (1743); ἐμπνέω (empneō), to pant (1863); πνευματικός (pneumatikos), spiritual (4461); πνευματικῶς (pneumatikōs), spiritually (4462); θεόπνευστος (theopneustos), God-breathed, inspired by God (2535).

CL & OT 1. (a) The Gk. root pneu- denotes dynamic movement of the air. Of its derivatives, pneō means to blow (of wind and air generally, also on a musical instrument); breathe; emit a fragrance; radiate heat, anger, courage, benevolence, and the like. pnoē refers to blowing, breathing (esp. panting), inspiration (by a deity), steam, evaporation. ekpneō means to breathe out, blow out, stop breathing (i.e., die), get out of breath. empneō means to breathe (in), be alive, blow on or into something, inspire.

(b) pneuma, spirit, denotes the result of the action of breathing, namely, air set in motion, with an underlying stress on its inherent power. It thus can mean wind or breath, but increasingly it took on the functions of related concepts, so that by the Hel. period it was a term of some importance, though still with a somewhat materialistic connotation.

The air that we breathe was considered to be the bearer of life. From the 5th cent. on Gk. physicians drew a distinction between one's inward, innate pneuma and the air one breathed. In Aristotle this pneuma was the formative power that, beginning already in the embryo, gradually produced the mature individual and then became the instrument whereby the soul controlled the body.

pneuma, in other words, approached the meaning held by psychē, soul (→ 6034), the distinction being that the latter was a purely functional term, while pneuma was regarded as a substance. In Stoic philosophy, however, pneuma took over the functions of psychē in relation to the senses and to thought and speech (some even identified pneuma with nous, the human power of intellect, → 3808). Stoicism also regarded pneuma as an elemental principle that gave coherence to the different entities in creation, while at the same time differentiating them from each other. Thus, it arranged the world in terms of a descending scale, without which the world's existence would be impossible. It came to be regarded as the fifth element (along with air, fire, water, and land).

Probably under Stoic influence, pneuma came to denote inspiration, a material substance that filled a human and enabled one to prophesy. This prophetic pneuma was ecstatic, visionary, demonic, holy, even divine. It played an active role in popular religion (always given to magic and soothsaying). Finally, pneuma is also found in the sense of spirit or demon in Hel. inscriptions and papyri.

(c) The adj. pneumatikos shares the meanings of pneuma and is used from the pre-Socratic school on. theopneustos (inspired by God) is rare, not being used before the Hel. period and then only with reference to divination.

2. In the LXX the Heb. equivalent of pneuma is almost always rûaḥ. Of the 377x rûaḥ occurs in the MT, 264 are translated by pneuma (the next most frequent rendering is anemos, wind, 49x; → astrapē, lightning, 847). The idea behind rûaḥ is the extraordinary fact that something as intangible as air can move; at the same time it is not so much the movement per se that excites attention, but the energy manifested by such movement.

(a) In roughly one third of all occurrences, pneuma is used for the wind, which has God as its immediate cause (e.g., Gen. 8:1; Ps. 104:4; Amos 4:13). In this same connection, rûaḥ takes on two special senses: the direction of the wind (e.g., Ezek. 37:9; 42:16–20) and fig., because of the wind's ephemeral nature (cf. Ps. 78:39), nothingness (e.g., Eccl. 5:15, LXX anemos).

(b) The same phenomenon occurs in the breath, both of humans (Ezek. 37:8, 10) and of animals (Eccl. 3:19, 21). It denotes the life-force of the individual (Jdg. 15:19) and of the group (Num. 16:22), that which is lacking in idols (Jer. 10:14) but not in God (Ps. 33:6) or the Messiah (Isa. 11:4). God gives (42:5) and protects it (Ps. 31:6) but is free to take it back again (104:29), whereupon it returns to God (Eccl. 12:7). As a life-force it manifests itself in varying degrees of intensity, the dominant idea being that of its vitality. It can be adversely affected by emotions ranging from anxiety (Gen. 41:8) and grief (26:35) to utter despair (Job 17:1). It is heightened by jealousy (Num. 5:14) or anger (Jdg. 8:3), while there is a clear echo of the word's basic meaning in the vivid phrase expressing God's wrath: "the blast [pneuma] of your nostrils" (Exod. 15:8).

This reveals the manner in which the OT speaks of the human being: not clinically, with human attributes neatly classified, but concretely; in other words, the OT writers take humans as they find them and assess their behavior toward others and the attitude displayed toward God's law. So concrete is the OT's approach that the terms it uses are taken from the ordinary and tangible phenomena of the world about us. The thought implicit in rûaḥ is that breathing, with the movement of air that this involves, is the outward expression of the life-force inherent in all human behavior.

This is true of behavior requiring a greater or a lesser degree of energy: behavior in which energy has to be directed along certain channels (e.g., Ezr. 1:1, to stir up one's spirit, i.e., bring a person to a decision), in which case spirit may be synonymous with plan or intention (Isa. 19:3); behavior toward others, whether humble or proud (Prov. 16:19; Eccl. 7:8 = LXX 7:9), patient or impatient (Eccl. 7:8 = LXX 7:9; Prov. 14:29); behavior toward God, guileless (Ps. 32:2), steadfast (51:12; 78:8), broken in penitence (34:18; 51:17), or disobedient (Isa. 29:24; Hos. 4:12).

(c) pneuma frequently stands alongside "heart" (e.g., Exod. 35:31–35), the ideas behind these two words being similar. The difference is that the heart dwells within a person, having indeed been created by God; it is not a fleeting, oscillating gift like the breath of a person's spirit. The heart denote one's aims, resolves, and courage, while one's spirit denotes the direction in which one's vitality flows, the self-expression involved in one's behavior—including ecstatic behavior.

(d) pneuma is never used for that higher quality in a person that distinguishes him or her from animals. Rather, just as the wind comes from God and the human spirit is God's gift, spirit is essentially of God. About 100x it is expressly called the Spirit of God (e.g., Gen. 1:2) or of Yahweh (e.g., Isa. 11:2), while in 31:3 spirit is the power of God contrasted with the impotence of mere creatures; such power is inescapable and universally present (Ps. 139:7).

God's pneuma can come mightily on a person (Jdg. 14:6, 19; 1 Sam. 16:13–16), "clothe" someone (Jdg. 6:34), enter into someone (Ezek. 2:2), descend on someone (2 Ki. 2:9; Isa. 11:2), and impel someone (Jdg. 13:25). All these indicate the powerful operation of God on a person, enabling him or her to perform some supernatural deed (e.g., the salvation of Israel by the judges; Jdg. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 1 Sam. 11:6; 16:13), or the office and utterances of the prophets (Num. 11:25–27; 1 Sam. 18:10; Ezek. 3:12; 8:3; 11:1, 24). God's Spirit is also the source of poetic utterance (e.g., 2 Sam. 23:2), of the craftsman's skill involved in the building of the tabernacle (Exod. 31:3), or indeed of any outstanding ability (Dan. 6:3).

(e) Even destructive evil is a spirit sent by God, for, as far as the OT is concerned, there is no power of evil independent of him (1 Sam. 16:14–16, 23; Isa. 29:10).

3. The writing prophets have a clearly delineated doctrine of the Spirit. According to Isa. 32:15–20 (cf. 44:3), God will conclude his judgment of the proud and complacent by pouring out from on high his Spirit, which, like rain, will bring about fertility, i.e., righteousness, peace, and security. This salvation will be wrought by David's offspring (11:1–8), who, being ordained by God's Spirit, will exercise a dominion of perfect integrity and righteousness amid conditions of heavenly peace.

Through the process of judgment and salvation, God heals his people's idolatry and backsliding (Hos. 4:12; cf. Isa. 29:24), giving a new spirit of godliness not only to the nation at large (Ezek. 11:19–20; 18:31; 36:26–27; 39:29), but also to the individual (Ps. 51:10). Ezekiel declares this to be nothing less than Israel's resurrection from the dead—their death having been caused by unbelief (Ezek. 37:1–14, a vision which, as the whole prophecy indicates, refers to the restoration of God's people as a whole).

The later chapters of Isa. proclaim the same message: The servant of the Lord extends the blessings of his rule to include Gentiles (42:1–4; 49:1–6), the covenant promise being fulfilled in God's irrevocable gift of his Spirit (59:21; cf. Joel 2:28–29). Similarly in the past, the period of salvation at the exodus was marked by the gift of the Spirit to Moses; indeed, that whole national deliverance took place in the power of the Spirit (Isa. 63:11–14). The postexilic prophets see this promise fulfilled in the reestablishment of Israel in Jerusalem (cf. Hag. 2:5 = LXX 2:6; Zech. 4:6: "Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit"). God's almighty, all-pervasive but intangible Spirit is linked with the covenant, for the latter reveals that God works not only for the salvation of his people but brings their lives into active conformity with his holy will.

4. In Jud. under the influence of its Hel. environment, pneuma was a vital force divinely breathed into humankind and forming a distinct part of one's being; it was not distinguished from the "soul" as far as terminology was concerned, but was contrasted rather with the body: The body is of the earth, the spirit stems from heaven (Wis. 15:11). In Palestinian Jud. the body was never the prison house of the soul or its seducer into sin. Philo, on the other hand, called the flesh a "burden," which weighed down pneuma and confined it in earthly fetters; hence its appetites must be denied for the sake of the spirit. Palestinian Jud. also differed from its Hel. counterpart in regarding the spirit not as part of a divine substance but rather as something divinely created and therefore to be clearly distinguished from its Creator. It possessed immortality (12:1) and at a later stage was also credited with preexistence.

5. At Qumran, the spirit manifested its presence when a person conducted life wisely and with a view to pleasing God (1QS 5:21, 24), while apostasy of spirit led to sinful conduct (7:18, 23); in other words, spirit expresses the basic orientation of a person's life. We find references to a "broken" (8:3) or "apostate" (8:12) spirit; the word could also be used collectively of "the spirit of the fellowship of [God's] truth" (13:7–8). This spirit was either an eschatological gift or something eternally predestinated.

6. Although in the OT God is never said to dwell among spirits, this pl. came to be used throughout Jud. as a collective term for heavenly beings (e.g., 1 Enoch 15:4, 6). "Spirits" (with or without the epithet "evil") also denoted the demons so familiar to Jud. (e.g., 15:6–10). Linked with this and found throughout apocalyptic lit. was the belief in Satan and his evil spirits, God's adversaries who tempt humans to sin.

The Qumran texts also developed the theory of two spirits, one of "righteousness" or "light," the other of "iniquity" or "darkness." As the principles of good and evil that God had established, these two are locked in perpetual conflict in this world (1QS 3:13–4:26). Each had a retinue of virtues or vices respectively, likewise described as spirits.

7. The "Spirit of God," the "divine Spirit," and the "holy Spirit" sometimes meant the God-given Spirit living in humans. But it esp. meant that spiritual reality that performed God's work on earth, e.g., creation (Wis. 1:7; 12:1) and esp. prophecy (Sir. 48:12). The rabbis believed this Spirit spoke in the Scriptures. Stress was laid on Isa.'s promise of a Messiah who would have a special endowment of the Spirit and on Joel's prophecy (Joel 2:28–29) about the pouring out of the Spirit on the godly in the last days.

NT pneuma occurs 379x in the NT. As in Jewish thought, it denotes the power that humans experience that relates them to the spiritual realm, the realm of reality that lies beyond ordinary observation and human control. Within this broad definition pneuma has a wide range of meaning. By far its most frequent reference is to the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit (250x).

1. The human spirit. At one end of pneuma's spectrum of meaning is the human spirit, or perhaps better, the human person insofar as he or she belongs to and interacts with the spiritual realm. In this sense pneuma occurs in the NT nearly 40x. Thus the human spirit is that aspect of a person through which God most immediately encounters him or her (Rom. 8:16; 1 Cor. 2:11; Gal. 6:18; Phil. 4:23; 2 Tim. 4:22; Phlm. 25; Heb. 4:12; Jas. 4:5), that dimension whereby human beings are most immediately open and responsive to God (Matt. 5:3; Lk. 1:47; Rom. 1:9; 1 Pet. 3:4), that aspect of human awareness most sensitive to matters of the spiritual realm (Mk. 2:8; 8:12; Jn. 11:33; 13:21; Acts 17:16; 2 Cor. 2:13; 7:13).

It is not clear whether the language refers to the spirit of a person, to a particular force that one experiences through this dimension of one's being, or to a spirit or power from without. Hence, scholars differ over certain passages as to whether the reference is to the human spirit or the Spirit of God (e.g., Mk. 14:38; Lk. 1:17, 80; Rom. 8:15; 11:8; 1 Cor. 4:21; 6:17; 14:14, 32; Gal. 6:1; Eph. 1:17; 4:23; 2 Tim. 1:7; Rev. 22:6).

The NT writers can speak of the (human) spirit as though it was something possessed by the individual, but this does not mean that they envisaged it as a divine spark incarcerated, as it were, in the physical body. This language is more a natural and easy way of speaking about the human person as he or she belongs to the spiritual realm and that relates one to the beyond (e.g., Lk. 8:55; Rom. 8:16; 1 Cor. 2:11; 5:5; 7:34; 16:18; 2 Cor. 7:1; 1 Thess. 5:23). Here too persists the ancient Hebraic idea of pneuma (rûaḥ) as the breath of God (2 Thess. 2:8; cf. Jn. 20:22), the breath of life (Rev. 11:11; 13:15).

So also death as a giving up of one's spirit (Matt. 27:50; Lk. 23:46; Acts 7:59) is to be interpreted not so much as the release of one's soul from the body but in terms of the physical body ceasing to be the embodiment of the whole person. At death a human being ceases to exist both in the realm of the physical and in the realm of the spiritual, and continues existing instead only in the spiritual; the physical body, ceasing to be the embodiment of the whole person in the observable world, becomes merely a corpse (Jas. 2:26). In Paul's terms, the danger confronting humans in the world is that they live solely on the level of the physical world ("according to the sinful nature [lit., flesh]") and not also and predominantly on the level of the spirit ("according to the Spirit," Rom. 8:4), so that when the body dies the whole person dies in the destruction of the flesh (cf. 1 Cor. 15:42–50), a danger Paul evidently seeks to counter in 1 Cor. 5:5.

From this it follows also that a dead person can be thought of simply as a pneuma, as belonging wholly to the spiritual realm (Lk. 24:37, 39; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 12:23; 1 Pet. 3:18–19; 4:6). Paul also seems to have thought that a human being was able, while still in this life, to leave the body temporarily and project oneself through the spiritual realm into heaven (2 Cor. 12:2–4, though Paul did not know how to understand this experience) or into the presence of others (1 Cor. 5:3; Col. 2:5, though these two passages may simply be earnest expressions of empathetic concern and feeling).

2. Evil spirits and good spirits. (a) It was natural in the worldview of the 1st cent. that the mysterious powers that afflict people should be thought of as evil spirits and demons (more than 40x, mainly in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts; e.g., Matt. 8:16; Mk. 1:23, 26–27; Lk. 4:36; Acts 19:12–16; cf. 1 Tim. 4:1; Rev. 16:13–14; 18:2). The evil spirit can also be depicted as a spirit that dominates the world of humankind, the spirit or god of this world (1 Cor. 2:12; Eph. 2:2; cf. 2 Cor. 11:4; 1 Jn. 4:6). These evil forces are understood as personal forces from the spiritual realm, evil or unclean because they injure and hinder one's full relationship with God and one's fellow human beings.

But at no time do NT writers give way to a dualism, where the evil that thus manifests itself is as strong as God. Rather, the evil spirits are inferior to God and subject to the power of his Spirit operating through his agents (e.g., Christ and the apostles). Indeed, it was precisely this effective power over evil spirits in his ministry of exorcism that Jesus saw as proof that the end-time kingdom was already present, since it indicated that the final rout of Satan had already begun (e.g., Lk. 10:17–18; 11:19–20).

(b) Other forces operating on the human world from the spiritual realm are considered to be good spirits or angels (Acts 23:8–9; Heb. 1:7, 14; 12:9). But esp. Paul and John recognize the ambiguity of such experiences of spirits and the need for a discernment of spirits to distinguish good from evil (see 1 Cor. 12:10; 14:12; 2 Cor. 11:4; 1 Thess. 5:19–22; 2 Thess. 2:2; 1 Jn. 4:1, 3, 6).

3. Jesus and the Spirit. (a) If we are to understand Jesus' teaching on the Spirit as fully as possible, we must recall that his ministry follows that of John the Baptist. John is a prophet of judgment (Matt. 3:7–12; Lk. 3:7–9, 15–18); his proclamation centers on the imminent coming of one who will administer God's final judgment. In particular, the coming one will baptize "with the Holy Spirit and with fire" (3:16). The coming one's baptism is in some sense a promise to those who accept John's baptism of repentance.

John's metaphor about the baptism Jesus administers is perhaps best understood as a variation on a prominent theme within intertestamental apocalyptic expectation: the belief in the messianic woes, the conviction that the new age will be inaugurated only after a time of affliction and suffering (e.g., Dan. 7:19–22; 2 Bar. 25–30). Thus "fire" denotes judgment and purification (e.g., Amos 7:4; Mal. 3:1–2; 4:1), as does pneuma (e.g., Isa. 4:4; Jer. 4:11–12), and the river or flood vividly portray overwhelming calamity (Ps. 69:2, 15; Isa. 43:2). Notice how these three elements are combined in Isa. 4:4; 30:28; Dan. 7:10.

John's baptism in the Jordan (presumably by immersion) was a potent symbol of the end-time tribulation. Those who acknowledge their liability to judgment by submitting to John's baptism will experience the messianic woes as a cleansing by a spirit of judgment and by a spirit of burning (Isa. 4:4). Those who deny their guilt and do not repent will experience the coming one's baptism in Spirit and fire as the bonfire that burns up the unfruitful branches and chaff.

(b) Jesus' understanding of his mission in terms of the Spirit comes to clearest expression primarily at two places: his explanation for his success as an exorcist and his consciousness of inspiration. (i) Jesus' statements in Matt. 12:24–29; Mk. 3:22–29; Lk. 11:14–22 embody a claim to exorcise by God's power. In Matt. 12:28 ("But if I drive out demons by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you"), the emphasis in the Gk. falls on two phrases: "Spirit of God" and "kingdom of God."

The significance of this saying is twofold. First, the presence of the kingdom of God (the distinctive note in Jesus' proclamation) is defined in terms of the effective power of the Spirit. The end-time rule of God can be said to be already operative, because the end-time power is evidently at work conquering demonic power. Second, Jesus is claiming a unique empowering by the Spirit. There were other exorcists, but their work did not bear the same significance (Matt. 12:27; Lk. 11:19). Jesus' exorcisms were so effective that he was able to conclude that his was the power of the end-time rule of God; he was beginning the final battle with Satan.

(ii) Jesus' consciousness of inspiration is clearly implied in his astonishingly authoritative claims ("But I tell you . . . ," Matt. 5:22, 28, etc.) and in his understanding of himself as a prophet (esp. 13:57; Mk. 6:4). Since the Spirit was principally regarded as the Spirit of prophecy in the Jud. of that time, Jesus' claim was in effect a claim to be inspired by the Spirit. And since the rabbis taught that the Spirit had been withdrawn from Israel since Malachi and would be given again only in the last days, Jesus was in effect claiming to be the eschatological prophet (see esp. Deut. 18:15, 18–19; Isa. 61:1–2). In fact, Jesus himself regarded Isa. 61:1–2 as fulfilled in his own ministry (Lk. 4:16–21). This understanding of his mission as a Spirit-anointed proclamation of good news to the poor is clearly implied in the first of the Beatitudes (Matt. 5:3–6; Lk. 6:20–21) and in Matt. 11:5; Lk. 7:22.

There are several key points here: Jesus attributed his ministry and its effectiveness to an anointing with the end-time Spirit (presumably at Jordan, as the Gospels affirm). Thus, in his ministry the hopes for the new age were already being realized; the Spirit was so bound up with Jesus that he himself was part of the offense of his own ministry (Matt. 11:6).

(c) Jesus thus saw his ministry in relation to the Spirit in terms more of eschatological blessing than of judgment. His response to the Baptist in Matt. 11:5; Lk. 7:22 seems deliberately to pick up the promise of blessing in Isa. 29:18–19; 35:3–5; 61:1–2 and to ignore the threat of judgment in these three passages. But Jesus did not reject the Baptist's message outright, for he did see his ministry also in terms of dispensing fiery judgment (Mk. 9:49; Lk. 12:49–53), and the parallelism of 12:49–50 suggests that Jesus anticipated his own death as a fiery baptism, i.e., as a suffering of the messianic woes (cf. Mk. 10:38–39; 14:27, 36; cf. also Isa. 53; Dan. 7).

Did Jesus see himself as dispenser of the Spirit, as a baptizer in the Spirit? Note first how Lk. has "Holy Spirit" where Matt. has "good gifts" (Matt. 7:11; Lk. 11:13). Certainly Jesus saw his disciples as receiving the Spirit during times of persecution and trial (Mk. 13:11). Moreover, Jesus' words in Acts 1:5, 8 foretell his outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. Finally, the Paraclete promises of Jn. 14–16 also refer to his dispensing of the Spirit to his disciples (e.g., 15:26; 16:7–11).

(d) The Gospel writers have no doubt that Jesus was the unique man of the Spirit. Jesus' conception was effected by the power of the Spirit without the agency of a human father (Matt. 1:18–25; Lk. 1:35; cf. also Isa. 7:14). At the Jordan Jesus was anointed with the Spirit and thus entered his messianic role (Matt. 3:16; Mk. 1:10; Lk. 3:22; Jn. 1:33; cf. 3:34). Jesus also went forth to his temptations at the instigation of the Spirit (Matt. 4:1; Mk. 1:12; Lk. 4:1). Moreover, his ministry was effective by the power of the Spirit (see Matt. 12:18 [Isa. 42:1]; Lk. 4:18 [Isa. 61:1]; see also Acts 10:38). Jesus' post-resurrection ministry is also characterized in terms of the Spirit (1:2), with his outpouring of the Spirit explicitly referred to in Jn. 20:22 and Acts 2:33.

In Luke–Acts, Jesus, in his relation with the Spirit, provides a bridge between the old age of Israel and the new age now recognized as the age of the church. Thus the conception and birth of Jesus by the Spirit's power take place in the context of a sporadic reappearance of the Spirit of prophecy (Lk. 1:15, 17, 41, 67; 2:25–27), a last flare-up of the spiritual power and vitality of the divine revelation of the OT era before Jesus alone fills center stage. As a result of the descent of the Spirit on Jesus at his baptism, Jesus, already the Son of God (1:35; 2:49), enters a higher stage of his messianic mission as God's Son (3:22, citing Ps. 2:7; Acts 10:38). But only with his ascension does he enter the fullness of sonship and messianic office (2:36; 13:33), and only then does he become Lord of the Spirit, the one who dispenses the Spirit to others not only by virtue of his own anointing, but by virtue also of his death and exaltation (2:33).

4. The Spirit in the earliest Christian communities and in Acts. The Holy Spirit, through his supernatural power, works through and directs believers. This is nowhere more evident than in Acts, where the Spirit is presented as a tangible force, visible in its effects. This power of the Spirit manifests itself in three main areas in Luke's account of the early church.

(a) The Spirit is a transforming power in conversion. Christianity dates from the earliest experiences of the Spirit after Jesus' death and resurrection. Luke locates the outpouring of the Spirit in Jerusalem at the first Pentecost after Jesus' resurrection. It was a dramatic experience and ecstatic in nature (including visionary elements and prophetic speech). It transformed the disciples into a confident and dynamic group of believers, keen to propagate and live out their faith in Jesus as Messiah and as the returning Son of Man. In Acts 2–5 Luke has caught much of the atmosphere of excitement of these early days.

This first experience of the Spirit set a pattern for the reception of the Spirit thereafter (cf. Acts 11:15–16). The Spirit was the eschatological gift par excellence, and its possession was the mark of one who belonged to the messianic community of the last days (hence the promise of the Spirit as the climax to the first sermon of Peter, 2:38–39). Moreover, reception of the Spirit was indicated by the visible transformation of the individual, usually reckoned in manifestations of ecstasy, such as in prophecy and speaking in tongues (cf. 4:31). Consequently, at critical or problematic moments of the early mission, what was looked for above all else was the reception or possession of the Spirit (9:17; 11:15–16; 15:8; 19:1–2) as testified by clear-cut manifestations of spiritual power or ecstasy (8:15–19; 10:44–47; 19:6).

Luke links the Spirit with ecstatic manifestations to such an extent that the presence of the Spirit cannot be assumed in the absence of such tangible effects. Indeed, it is precisely their absence in the cases of the Samaritans in Acts 8:12–16 and the Ephesians in 19:1–5 that leads the apostles to conclude that the Spirit has not yet been given to them, and it is the obvious presence of the Spirit in Cornelius and his company (10:44–48) and Apollos (18:25) that proves that they already belong to the new Christian community (cf. 11:15–18).

(b) The Spirit is the Spirit of prophecy. For the earliest Christians, the Spirit was most characteristically a divine power manifesting itself in inspired utterances. The same power that had inspired David and the prophets in the old age (Acts 1:16; 4:25; 28:25) has now been poured out in all its fullness, as Joel had foretold (Acts 2:17–21; cf. Joel 2:28–32). Moses' ancient hope had been fulfilled, that all the Lord's people were prophets, that the Lord had put his Spirit on them (Num. 11:29; cf. Acts 2:17–18, 38–39; 4:31). What indicated the coming of the Spirit was inspired utterance (2:4; 10:44–48; 19:6).

Beyond conversion, this power was experienced as a surge of inspiration in moments of crisis and relief, providing both words and boldness of speech (Acts 4:8, 13, 29–31; 7:55; 13:9). More generally the Spirit was understood as the power enabling effective testimony and teaching (5:32; 6:10; 18:25). But while this Spirit was given to all and all experienced his filling, there also arose a recognition that certain individuals had a fuller bestowal of the prophetic Spirit, or at least were more regularly inspired to prophesy—hence the appearance of both resident and wandering prophets in the earliest communities (11:27–28; 13:1; 15:32; 20:23; 21:4, 9–11).

The Spirit of prophecy, a gift known sporadically in the old age (Lk. 1–2), has become in the new age the prerogative of all ("and they will prophesy" in the Joel quotation in Acts 2:18). Luke does not link the Spirit specifically with any of the miracles performed in Acts (although such a link may be implied in 2:19, 43; 4:30–31; 6:8), perhaps because the link with prophecy is so dominant.

(c) The Spirit is the director of mission. The Spirit pervaded the early community and gave its early leadership an aura of authority that could not be withstood (Acts 4:31; 5:1–10; 6:10; 8:9–13; 13:9–11). With the movement out from Jerusalem after Stephen's death, the Spirit becomes much more regularly understood as the power of mission (cf. 1:8), directing the apostles and other believers into the new developments that continually opened up before them (8:29, 39; 10:19; 11:12; 13:2, 4; 15:28; 16:6–7). In this expansion visions also played a significant role (esp. 9:10; 10:3, 7, 10–16; 16:9–10; 22:17–18), though these are not specifically linked to the Spirit (despite 2:17).

In Luke's presentation this compulsion to mission and outreach characterized the earliest community's understanding of the Spirit from the first (cf. Acts 1:8; 2:5–11). So also the more formally structured leadership of presbyters or overseers is attributed specifically to the Spirit in 20:28 (cf. 15:28). However, the fundamental theological question as to the relation between the exalted Christ and the Spirit is not clarified: Christ introduces "the last days" by dispensing the Spirit (2:33), but thereafter the two are brought together only in the enigmatic reference to "the Spirit of Jesus" in 16:7.

5. The Spirit in the Pauline letters. Of the NT writers, Paul most deserves the title "the theologian of the Spirit," for he gives a more rounded and integrated teaching on the Spirit than we find in any other of the NT books or the apostolic fathers.

(a) The Spirit as the fundamental mark of belonging to Christ. As with the early church, so with Paul, the gift of the Spirit makes us members of Christ (Rom. 8:9; cf. 1 Cor. 2:12; 2 Cor. 11:4; 1 Thess. 4:8) and unites us with him (1 Cor. 6:17), so that we share in his sonship (Rom. 8:14–16; Gal. 4:6). The Spirit is, as it were, the exalted Lord's steward taking possession of his property on his behalf (1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19–20). It is the reception of the Spirit through faith that marks the beginning of the Christian life (Gal. 3:2–3), a gift that fulfills the promise to Abraham and is therefore another name for justification (1 Cor. 6:11; Gal. 3:14). Alternatively expressed, it is by being baptized in the one Spirit that individuals become members of the one body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:13).

For Paul it is precisely the gift of the Spirit that distinguishes Christian from Jew, the new age from the old (Rom. 2:29; 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:6–8; Gal. 4:29; Phil. 3:3). The Spirit constitutes that immediacy of personal relations with God that Moses had fitfully enjoyed (2 Cor. 3:13–18) and that Jeremiah had only foreseen from afar (3:3, referring to Jer. 31:33–34; cf. Eph. 2:18). In all this, "Spirit" is almost synonymous with "grace" in the sense of God's action in reaching out to us and establishing a positive relation with us (see, e.g., Rom. 3:24; 1 Cor. 15:10; 2 Cor. 6:1; Gal. 1:15; Eph. 2:8).

It is important to realize that for Paul too the Spirit is a divine power whose impact on a life is discernible by its effects. In some cases this manifestation was charismatic utterance and act (1 Cor. 1:4–7; Gal. 3:5), but in others it was evidently an overwhelming experience of being accepted by God (Eph. 1:7–8), of being swamped by divine love (Rom. 5:5), or of experiencing a joy that made light of affliction (1 Thess. 1:6). In still others it was an experience of illumination as to the significance of Jesus (1 Cor. 2:10–13; 2 Cor. 3:14–17; 4:6; Gal. 1:12, 15–16; cf. Eph. 1:17; 3:5), of liberation from the deadening effect of the law and of sin's power (Rom. 8:2; 2 Cor. 3:17), or of moral transformation dramatic in its suddenness (1 Cor. 6:9–11). The Spirit is like a seal affixed to goods or documents to indicate ownership (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30).

(b) The eschatological Spirit. As for Jesus so for Paul, the Spirit is the power of the new age that has already broken into the old, not to bring the old to an end or render it ineffective, but to enable believers to live in and through the old age in the power and in the light of the new. In Tit. 3:5 the Spirit is the power of regeneration and renewal poured out by Christ (cf. Jn. 3:5–8; Acts 2:33); he is also called the down payment and guarantee (→ arrabōn, 775) that God will complete the work begun in us through the Spirit (2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:13–14). The Spirit is the "firstfruits" of God's harvest at the end of time (Rom. 8:23), the first installment of the believer's inheritance in the kingdom of God (8:15–17; 14:17; 1 Cor. 6:9–11; 15:42–50; Gal. 4:6–7; 5:16–24).

This means also that (i) the gift of the Spirit is only the beginning of a lifelong process of being saved, of sanctification, of being conformed to the image of Christ (2 Cor. 3:18; 2 Thess. 2:13; cf. Rom. 8:28; 15:16; Gal. 6:8; Eph. 3:16–17).

(ii) Our lives in the present are characterized by a tension and even warfare between the old age and the new, between the desires of the flesh and those of the Spirit, between the powers of death and of life at work in us, each seeking to gain mastery over us (Rom. 7:14–25; 8:10–13; Gal. 5:16–17).

(iii) The final consummation of God's redemptive activity is the completion of what he has already begun in the gift of the Spirit and is achieved when the Spirit takes full control over the whole person, i.e., in the resurrection of the body, when we become spiritual bodies, wholly belonging to the new age, wholly like Christ, wholly under the Spirit's direction (Rom. 8:11, 23; 1 Cor. 15:44–49; 2 Cor. 5:1–5; Eph. 1:14).

(iv) Therefore, there is no foundation in Paul for a distinctively second or third gift of the Spirit, since the Spirit always has the essential character of that power that begins the process of salvation and carries it through to completion. Nor is there room in Paul for a gift of the Spirit in this life that sets the believer free from the eschatological tension and warfare between flesh and Spirit. On the contrary, the Spirit's activity in the present age is marked more by hope than by fulfillment or complete victory (Rom. 5:5; 8:18–25; 15:13; Gal. 5:5; Eph. 1:17–18), and prayer in the Spirit is at the same time the inarticulate groaning of this-worldly weakness (Rom. 8:26–27).

(c) Life in the Spirit. For Paul, believers have a responsibility to live in the power of the Spirit. In general terms that means we must be molded by God according to the pattern of Jesus Christ—not as something we achieve for ourselves, but as something that by attentive openness to God he allows the Spirit to produce through us ("fruit," 2 Cor. 3:18; Gal. 5:18–23; cf. Rom. 8:28; 9:1; 14:17; 15:13, 30; 2 Cor. 6:6; Gal. 6:1; Col. 1:8). In particular, it means that one's daily conduct is a walking or living by the Spirit, a being led by the Spirit, an ordering of one's life by the Spirit (Rom. 8:4–6, 14; Gal. 5:16, 18, 25; cf. Rom. 8:13; Gal. 6:8).

The apostle contrasts this experience of daily guidance with the sort of dependence on the rule book of the law that characterized his previous religious practice (Rom. 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:6; Gal. 5:16). That is to say, he experienced the Spirit precisely as the fulfillment of the prophetic hope that the law would be written on the heart, not just on tablets of stone, so that we will know God for ourselves and be able to discern his will immediately without having to refer to the Scriptures and the case-law of tradition (cf. Rom. 12:2; 2 Cor. 3:3; cf. Jer. 31:31–34). Similarly worship and prayer are not a matter of liturgical rote or outward form. Worship is characterized as worship in or by the Spirit of God (Rom. 2:28–29; Phil. 3:3; cf. Eph. 2:18, 22), and prayer as prayer in the Spirit (6:18).

(d) The charismatic Spirit. It is important for Paul that the Spirit is a shared gift; it is a centripetal force drawing believers together into the one body of Christ. Thus, on the one hand, the corporate life of Christians arises out of their shared experience of the Spirit. That is, they are constituted the one body of Christ by their common participation in the one Spirit (1 Cor. 12:13; 2 Cor. 13:14; Eph. 4:3–4; Phil. 1:27; 2:1). On the other hand, the existence and unity of a church depends on sharing that Spirit, who creates community by seeking to manifest himself in the gifts of grace that build up the community to full maturity in Christ (Rom. 12:4–8; 1 Cor. 12:14–26; 14:12, 26; Eph. 4:11–16).

For Paul these manifestations of the Spirit are given, not achieved; expressions of divine energy, not human talent; acts of service that promote the common good, not talents for personal edification or aggrandizement (cf. 1 Cor. 12:4–7). These spiritual gifts may be individual acts or utterances (e.g., Rom. 1:11; 1 Cor. 12:8–11; 14:26) or more regular ministries (e.g., Rom. 12:6–8; 1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11).

In 1 Tim. 4:1 the Spirit was the inspirer of prophecy in the period prior to these "later times." The Spirit also preserves tradition as well as leads into new truth (2 Tim. 1:14). But he esp. seeks to express himself today in prophecy, which builds up the church most effectively (Rom. 12:6; 1 Cor. 14:1–5, 13–19; see also 2:13–14; 7:40; 12:3), just as speech inspired by the Spirit is most effective to convict and convert the unbeliever. The importance Paul places on the gifts of the Spirit explains his concern lest they be restricted in their range or expression (Eph. 4:30; 5:18–19), but he is equally concerned lest they be abused by overemphasis on some or by failure to exercise critical discernment (Rom. 12:3; 1 Cor. 2:12–14; 1 Thess. 5:19–22).

(e) The Spirit of Christ. Most significant, the Spirit for Paul has been stamped with the character of Christ. Christ by his resurrection entered wholly upon the realm of the Spirit (Rom. 1:4; 8:11). He is mentioned in the liturgical formula of 1 Tim. 3:16 as the mode of Jesus' exalted life. Indeed, Paul can conclude that Christ by his resurrection became "a life-giving Spirit" (1 Cor. 15:45). That is to say, the exalted Christ is now experienced in, through, and as the Spirit. Christ cannot be experienced apart from the Spirit; the Spirit is the medium of union between Christ and the believer (6:17), so that those who belong to Christ have the Spirit and are led by the Spirit (Rom. 8:9, 14). Conversely, the Spirit is now experienced as the power of the risen Christ. It is the confession of Jesus' lordship that marks out that inspiration that is the Spirit's (1 Cor. 12:3).

It is precisely the reproduction of Jesus' own distinctive Abba-prayer that marks out the Spirit as the Spirit of the Son (Rom. 8:15–16; Gal. 4:6), and the transformation of the believer's character into the character of Christ marks out the eschatological Spirit (2 Cor. 3:18). The Spirit is now nothing less and nothing more than the Spirit of Christ (Rom. 8:9; Gal. 4:6; Phil. 1:19; cf. 2 Thess. 2:8). The more formless and impersonal power that characterized the Spirit in the old age has been given sharper definition and personality. Only that which makes an individual or the church more like Christ can claim fully to be an expression of the Spirit of Christ.

6. The Spirit in the Johannine writings. The Spirit is also of considerable importance in John's theology. (a) His understanding of the Spirit overlaps with that of other NT writers. In particular, the new life of the Spirit is presented through vigorous metaphors such as birth from above (Jn. 3:5–8; 1 Jn. 3:9), new creation (Jn. 20:22, the vb. echoing Gen. 2:7; Ezek. 37:9; Wis. 15:11), life-giving water and bread (Jn. 4:14; 6:63; 7:38–39), and anointing (1 Jn. 2:20, 27). In the Johannine letters as elsewhere in the NT the Spirit is detectable by the effects of his coming (Jn. 3:8), so much so that the immediacy of the Spirit's indwelling is one of the tests of life (1 Jn. 3:24; 4:13).

(b) More distinctive of John's theology of the Spirit is the way in which he expresses the relation between the Spirit and Christ. (i) Although his Christology is high (Jesus as the incarnate Logos), John clearly mentions Jesus' being anointed with the Spirit at the Jordan (Jn. 1:32–33; 3:34).

(ii) He links Jesus' gift of the Spirit closely to Jesus' death, in that to receive the Spirit of the ascended Jesus is to eat his flesh given for the life of the world (Jn. 6:51–58, 62–63); it is the crucified Jesus who "gave up his spirit" (19:30), and it is Christ newly risen and ascended who bestows the Spirit on the disciples (20:22).

(iii) The unity of Christ and the Spirit in personality and mission is neatly expressed by identifying the Spirit as "another Counselor" (Jn. 14:16), where Jesus is by implication the first Paraclete (cf. 1 Jn. 2:1), so that the Paraclete continues the presence and work of the Son once he has departed (Jn. 14:16–28; → paraklētos, 4156) or, stated differently, that the Spirit becomes the seed of sonship, the Spirit of the Son (1 Jn. 3:9, 24; 4:13). As in Paul, the Spirit is conformed to Christ's character and work and only that Spirit that displays Jesus' character and testifies to him as the Christ can to be recognized as the Spirit of God (1 Jn. 4:1–3, 6; 5:6–8).

(c) The chief role attributed to the Paraclete is that of witness, revealer, and interpreter; this embraces both recalling the teaching originally given (Jn. 14:26; 15:26; 16:14; cf. 1 Jn. 5:6–8) and leading into new truth (Jn. 16:12–13; cf. Isa. 42:9; 44:7; 1 Jn. 2:27). That is, new revelation and original teaching are held in tension for John, so that the Spirit's role is never simply that of repeating the original teaching or that of revealing new truth unrelated to the old, but rather that of reinterpreting the old to give it contemporary significance and of revealing the new in a way that is consistent with the old. This balance between the freedom of present inspiration and the constraint of earlier revelation is present in the description of true worship in Jn. 4:23–24: As God is Spirit in his communion with us, so we must worship in the liberty of the Spirit and in accordance with his definitive revelation in Christ.

(d) Finally, we may note the Spirit's role in mission in Jn. 16:8–11. Together with 1 Cor. 14:24–25, this is the only passage that talks of the Spirit's role in convicting of sin. Note that for John the chief sin is failure to recognize the real significance of Jesus, that he has conquered the prince of this world. But when people respond to the Spirit-inspired mission of the disciples, their sins are forgiven (Jn. 20:22–23).

7. The Spirit in other NT writings. The Spirit is not as prominent in the rest of the NT. (a) Heb. recalls the charismatic vitality of the early Christian mission (2:4), and conversion is still understood as sharing in the Spirit and in the illumination and eschatological powers by which he manifests himself. The statements of 3:7; 9:8; 10:15 reflect the traditional view of the Spirit as the inspirer of Scripture, which is thus the voice of the Spirit. More distinctive is the fierceness of the warning that the new relation of grace can be so abused that the Spirit of grace can be lost (6:4–8; 10:29), and the author's assertion that Christ was enabled to offer himself up in death by the power of the eternal Spirit (9:14).

(b) Jas. 4:5 is not at all clear. To what Scripture does James refer? Is he referring to the human spirit as the breath of God, as in ancient Heb. thought (cf. Gen. 6:3; Job 33:4), or of the divine Spirit as given in conversion, as more regularly in the NT?

(c) Peter's understanding of the Spirit is typical of the NT: the Spirit of prophecy (1 Pet. 1:11), the inspirer of mission and the power of the gospel (1:12), the power that sets us apart for God (1:2) and changes us into the image of God's glory through suffering and persecution (4:14), the mode of existence in life beyond death (3:18; 4:6). In 2 Pet. 1:21 one encounters a view of inspiration that involves the prophets' complete surrender of mind and will to the overpowering Spirit.

(d) Jude 19–20 is Pauline in character: Believers are those who by definition have the Spirit, whereas those who boast of their spirituality give evidence of their lack of spirituality (cf. 1 Cor. 2:12–3:4). Jude alone outside Paul's letters exhorts his readers to pray in the Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 14:15; Eph. 6:18).

(e) The seer of Rev. attributes his inspiration and visions to the Spirit (1:10; 4:2; 14:13; 17:3; 21:10; 22:17) and writes to the seven churches at the Spirit's dictation (2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22). The author is probably referring to the Spirit of God under the symbolism of the seven spirits (1:4; 4:5), esp. as he implies they form the Spirit of the exalted Jesus (3:1; 5:6). Perhaps his most interesting reference is to "the testimony of Jesus" as "the spirit of prophecy" (19:10), presumably an affirmation that prophecy must be understood in relation to Jesus Christ. Note also 11:11, where pneuma is the breath of resurrection life, a divine power that the antichrist tries to ape in order to deceive (13:15).

8. Spiritual. pneumatikos, the adj. formed from pneuma, conveys the sense of belonging to the realm of spirit/Spirit and embodying or manifesting spirit/Spirit. Within the NT it is almost exclusively a Pauline word (though cf. 1 Pet. 2:5). More than half of the occurrences of this word are in 1 Cor. Where the word is introduced at key points in that letter (2:13–3:1; 12:1; 14:1, 37; 15:44–46), Paul may be both taking over and reformulating the language of his opponents, thus meeting the challenge of what may be characterized as an incipient Gnosticism expressing a perfectionist spirituality.

Paul uses the word in three ways. (a) As an adj., a spiritual something. Whatever gift (charisma) Paul shares with the Romans will be spiritual, from the Spirit and expressing the life and power of the Spirit (Rom. 1:11). The law is spiritual in the sense that it derives from the Spirit (i.e., given by revelation and inspiration) and was intended to achieve a fruitful encounter between the divine Spirit and the human spirit (7:14). The resurrection body is spiritual in that it embodies the Spirit (1 Cor. 15:44, 46). The spiritual (body) does not precede the natural; rather, the spiritual (body) succeeds the natural (body). It is in some sense a re-creation of the natural, and so is not yet (→ psychē, soul, 6034). According to Eph. 1:3, the blessings are spiritual in that they derive from the Spirit and take their character from the Spirit (cf. also 5:19; Col. 1:9; 3:16; 1 Pet. 2:5).

In 1 Cor. 10:3–4, pneumatikos is best understood as a midrash with allegorical elements (cf. 2 Cor. 3:7–18; Gal. 4:22–31). The "rock" that accompanied the people in the wilderness in a Jewish legend is interpreted as equivalent to Christ in his presence with his people; the manna and water from the rock are to be taken as pictures of the Christian's supernatural sustenance. In this case pneumatikos is used in a slightly extended sense, almost equivalent to "allegorical" (cf. also 1 Pet. 2:5; Rev. 11:8, where pneumatikōs denotes a spiritual reality or conveys a spiritual meaning).

(b) As a masc. noun, spiritual person. Both Paul's opponents and the apostle himself claim that some Christians are "spiritual" and others are not—i.e., some are possessed by and manifest the Spirit of God more than others (1 Cor. 2:13, 15; 3:1; 14:37; Gal. 6:1). But whereas for Paul's opponents this higher spirituality is marked out by superior wisdom and speech and divisive self-concern, for Paul the spiritual person is marked out by love and concern for others, by a lack of self-conceit and envy, and by an ability to distinguish what is loving from what is merely lawful, what is of God from what is merely inspired, what is for the benefit of the whole community from what merely edifies the individual (1 Cor. 2:13–15; 14:37).

(c) As a neut. noun, spiritual things. In Rom. 15:27 and 1 Cor. 9:11 "spiritual [things]" denotes the whole range of activities, attitudes, experiences, etc. that ultimately depend on and derive from the Spirit and that draw their significance from the Spirit—in contrast to the merely material or to those activities, attitudes, etc., that derive from the sinful human nature (→ sarx, flesh, 4922) and draw their significance from what is merely physical and worldly. In 1 Cor. 12:1; 14:1 (and probably 2:13) pneumatika is used in a more restricted sense with reference to spiritual gifts, more or less equivalent to charismata. Of the two words the latter seems to be Paul's preferred choice (cf. Rom. 1:11; 12:6; 1 Cor. 1:7). His use of pneumatika in Eph. 6:12 in reference to evil spirits confirms that pneumatika is more ambiguous than charismata in Paul's mind and underlines the ambiguous nature of "spiritual things" that necessitates that discernment (1 Cor. 2:13–15; 14:37).

9. Other words used in connection with the Spirit. (a) The noun pnoē, wind, occurs in the description of the "violent wind" as a manifestation of the Spirit at Pentecost (Acts 2:2). The account recalls the moving of God's Spirit over the waters in creation (Gen. 1:2), and possibly the wind that preceded God's speaking to Elijah (1 Ki. 19:11). In both cases the movement of the wind precedes the utterance of the word of God. In Acts 17:25 pnoē means breath (cf. Gen. 2:7) in the proclamation that the God who made all things does not live in shrines and "is not served by human hands, as if he needed anything, because he himself gives all men life and breath and everything else."

(b) The cognate vb. pneō occurs in the parable of the houses built on the rock and the sand, signifying the day of reckoning (Matt. 7:25, 27), in the saying about the south wind (Lk. 12:55), in the account of the storm (Jn. 6:18; cf. Acts 27:40), in the vision of the four winds held back by the angels (Rev. 7:1), and in the description of the movement of the Spirit that humans cannot discern (Jn. 3:8).

(c) ekpneō means to breathe out, breathe one's last, expire (Mk. 15:37, 39; Lk. 23:46).

(d) empneō means to breathe on and is used fig. of Saul's threats of murder against the disciples of the Lord (Acts 9:1).

(e) Using theopneustos, God-breathed, inspired by God, Paul writes in 2 Tim. 3:16–17: "All scripture is God-breathed [theopneustos] and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work." The adj. theopneustos does not imply any particular mode of inspiration, such as divine dictation, nor does it imply the suspension of the human authors' normal cognitive faculties. Yet it is something different from mere poetic inspiration. The sacred Scriptures express the mind of God, but they do so with a view to their practical outworking in life.

4461 (pneumatikos, spiritual), → 4460.

4462 (pneumatikōs, spiritually), → 4460.

4463 (pneō, to blow), → 4460.

4464 (pnigō, strangle), → 4465.

4465 πνικτός

πνικτός (pniktos), strangled (4465); ἀποπνίγω (apopnigō), strangle (678); πνίγω (pnigō), strangle (4464); συμπνίγω (sympnigō), strangle (5231).

CL & OT pnigō and related vbs. mean strangle, choke, cause choking, harass; in the pass. they mean drown. The adj. pniktos, strangled, means steamed, stewed. In the LXX this word group is rare (1 Sam. 16:14–15; Nah. 2:12); pniktos does not occur.

NT 1. In the story of the demoniac at Gerassa the herd of pigs drowned in the lake (Mk. 5:13; Lk. 8:33). In the parable of the sower thorns choked the seed (Matt. 13:7; Mk. 4:7; Lk. 8:7). The unforgiving servant choked his fellow servant to force him to pay his debt (Matt. 18:28), while in Lk. 8:42 we are told hyperbolically that the multitude choked Jesus ("the crowd almost crushed him").

2. The adj. pniktos is of theological importance in Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25. The context is a command about food, which the Jewish Christians imposed on Gentile Christians and which is closely linked to the prohibition against eating blood. The command goes back to Lev. 17:13–14 and Deut. 12:16, 23. An animal should be so slaughtered that its blood, in which is its life, should be allowed to drain out. If the animal is killed in any other way, it has been "strangled." The reason behind the prohibition was possibly that among the heathen, animals were often killed by being strangled, especially in the sacrificial cultus. Presumably such customs are here being forbidden.

4466 (pnoē, wind, breath), → 4460.

4472 ποιέω

ποιέω (poieō), do, make (4472); ποίησις (poiēsis), doing, working, deed (4474); ποίημα (poiēma), what is made, work, creation (4473); ποιητής (poiētēs), one who does something, maker, doer (4475).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. poieō is the basic term for all activity, both of gods and of human beings. Regarding the gods, the word can take on the meaning of to create, generate, give shape to. Human doing and making can refer to any kind of activity. The noun poiēsis means both directed action and the manufacture of objects. poiēma denotes the finished work. It is executed by a poiētēs, a doer, an author (also a poet).

2. The LXX poieō can occur as an independent vb. (e.g., Exod. 30:25), but it is also used many times to help formulate a thought with a determinative noun: e.g., to do the commandment (Jos. 22:5), to do work (Exod. 20:9–10), to do good or evil (Ps. 34:14; Jer. 2:13), to make peace (Isa. 27:5), to construct an idol (44:9; 46:6).

(a) As far as God's work is concerned, the Heb. uses both ʿāśâ and bārāʾ (this latter word is used exclusively for the work of Yahweh, esp. creation). Both can be translated by poieō (e.g., Gen. 6:7), though ktizō (→ ktisis, creation, 3232) is often used for bārāʾ. But Yahweh also acts in history, esp. directing the fortunes of his people Israel. He does wonders (Exod. 15:11; Jos. 3:5), makes the days (Ps. 118:24), and does great things (Job 5:9).

(b) The use of poieō for human actions branches out in many directions. It can simply denote what a person does (e.g., Abraham holds a feast, Gen. 21:8; Jacob will work for Laban, 30:31), but also obedience to God's will and law (e.g., Deut. 29:29 = LXX 29:28; Ps. 40:8; Isa. 44:28). The pious Jew recognized in his or her deed the required seriousness of moral or cultic acts.

NT 1. In the NT poieō occurs 568x, mostly in the Gospels. (a) The NT reaffirms the OT statements of God as Creator (e.g., Mk. 10:6; Acts 4:24; Rev. 14:7). poiēma (Rom. 1:20; Eph. 2:10) means the works of God's creation and new creation. NT statements concerning God's activity of salvation history also belong here. The NT writers speak confidently of God's mighty historical acts (e.g., Rom. 4:21; 1 Thess. 5:24; Rev. 21:5).

(b) The loving dealings of God are revealed in Jesus' work and deeds (e.g., Acts 2:22). Again and again the question crops up as to the motivation, justification, and significance of Jesus' work. He fully performed the will and the works the Father gave him as Son to do (Jn. 5:19; 6:38; 8:53; 10:37–38). According to Eph. 2:14–15, Jesus' work consisted in "making peace" between God and humankind by his death on the cross. The author of Heb. also describes Jesus' saving work with poieō. He "provided purification for sins" (1:3) and "sacrificed for ... sins once for all" (7:27). According to Rev. 1:6 and 3:12, believers are "made" kings and priests, and pillars in the future temple of God.

2. (a) Purely secular human activity is not particularly stressed in the NT, though poieō can be used for various activities (e.g., Mk. 11:3, 5; Jn. 19:12; Acts 9:39; Jas. 4:13).

(b) More decisive is the assessment of human action in God's sight. Human work is never neutral; it is either obedience or disobedience before (1 Cor. 10:31). This expectation is expressed emphatically in Jesus' parables (e.g., Matt. 5:36; 20:11–15; 21:31; Lk. 12:17–18). Human actions are subject to Jesus' claim to lordship (cf. Lk. 6:46; Jn. 7:17). They reveal their worth when they are performed in love for one's neighbor (Matt. 25:40, 45). Because of the central significance of such actions, there is a frequent summons in the gospel of Jesus and the apostles to put God's word into practice (Matt. 7:24–26; Jn. 14:12; Phlm. 21).

(c) The discourses of Jn.'s Gospel stress right action, grounded in the Lord (13:15) and made possible by his Spirit. Without Christ believers can "do nothing" (15:5). Jn. 8:34–44 deals with the contrasting attitude in committing sin, which is of the devil and does not stem from God and his truth. In 1 Jn. 2:29 (cf. 2:17; 3:7–10; 5:2), the author emphasizes the imperative of right action.

3. (a) As to poiētēs, the NT calls us to be doers of the word and the law (Rom. 2:13; Jas. 1:22, 23, 25). Only Acts 17:28 uses this noun in the secular Gk. sense of poet.

(b) poiēsis occurs only in Jas. 1:25. For a discussion of two Gk. words that combine agathos, good, and poieō, → agathos (19).

See also ergazomai, work, be active (2237); prassō, accomplish, do (4556).

4473 (poiēma, what is made, work, creation), → 4472.

4474 (poiēsis, doing, working, deed), → 4472.

4475 (poiētēs, one who does something, maker, doer), → 4472.

4477 (poimainō, to herd, tend), → 4478.

4478 ποιμήν

ποιμήν (poimēn), shepherd (4478); ποίμνη (poimnē), flock (4479); ποίμνιον (poimnion), flock (4480); ποιμαίνω (poimainō), to herd, tend (4477); ἀρχιποίμην (archipoimēn), chief shepherd, over-shepherd (799).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. poimēn, herdsman, shepherd, is a word that is frequently used in fig. senses: leader, ruler, commander, even lawgiver. poimainō means to be a shepherd, tend; fig., to care for. poimnē or poimnion is the herd, esp. a flock of sheep. Plato calls attention to the religious use of the word when he compares the rulers of the city-state to shepherds who care for their flock.

(b) In the ANE, shepherd at an early date became a title of honor applied to divinities and rulers alike, both in Sumerian king lists and in Babylonian texts. The custom seems to have been followed throughout antiquity. Pastoral terminology was much in vogue throughout the Hel. world.

2. (a) Before Israel settled in Canaan, various ethnic groups depended on constant wandering with their herds and flocks. The patriarchs (cf. also Job) were nomads who owned sheep and goats along with cattle. The shepherd's task was undertaken preferably by family members, by daughters only in the immediate vicinity of the dwelling (cf. Exod. 2:16). The shepherds and the servants who worked with them were expected to show caution, patient care, and honesty. In the dry summer on poor soil it was not easy to find new pasture as the flocks passed through lonely regions or to balance properly grazing, watering, rest, and travel. The shepherd had to care tirelessly for these animals (cf. Ezek. 34:1–6). Devotion to duty was proved in the nightly guarding of the flock against wild animals and thieves. In this respect hired shepherds frequently disappointed their employers.

(b) By poimnion the LXX means a herd of small livestock, esp. a flock of sheep (cf. Gen. 29:2–3; 30:40). In NT times such a herd would consist of from 20 to 500 animals (Lk. 15:4 refers to 100 sheep). Sheep and goats grazed together but were separated in the evening, for the goats spent the night in the center of the pen or the walled enclosure, where it was warmer (cf. Matt. 25:32).

(c) Even after the occupation of Canaan the raising of livestock played a dominant role, alongside cultivation, as a means of earning a living. Still, the memory of the classical nomadic days of ancient Israel before the occupation, when the people lived as aliens in tents, remained alive, because God's activities in salvation history were bound up with it. For this reason the Levites did not receive any arable land at the occupation but remained herdsmen (Jos. 21). The sect of the Recabites held fast in prophetic times to the pastoral way of life as an example (Jer. 35).

3. (a) Yahweh is the only shepherd of his people, Israel (see Gen. 48:15; 49:24). In certain Psalms and prophetic writings, the fig. idea of the shepherd comes into great prominence (e.g., Ps. 23; 78:52–53; 80:1; 95:7; Isa. 40:10–11; 49:9; Jer. 23:2; 31:10; Ezek. 34:11–12; Mic. 4:6–7; 7:14). The acknowledgment that Yahweh was Israel's shepherd grew out of the living religious experience of the people and is thus to be distinguished from the cold courtly style of the ANE. In invocation, praise, and prayer for forgiveness, but also in temptation and despair (Ps. 73), worshipers knew that they were safe in the care of God, the faithful shepherd. At the same time the recognition of God's unlimited sovereignty over his flock is not absent. Rather, it coexists in creative tension with the overwhelming consciousness of God's spontaneous love.

(b) The people are Yahweh's flock (cf. Ps. 79:13; 95:7; 100:3; Isa. 40:11; Jer. 13:17; Ezek. 34:31; Mic. 7:14; Zech. 10:3). As God's chosen people, Israel applied the metaphor of Yahweh's flock only to themselves. Sir. 18:13 is the sole instance of the metaphor being applied universally to all people, who at the end of time will be gathered together into one flock.

The shepherd theme is also applied to Israel's leaders (e.g., to David in 2 Sam. 5:2; 1 Chr. 11:2; Ps. 78:71–72). But by and large, in the light of God's faithfulness, they failed as shepherds. The prophets denounced the political and military shepherds in unquestionably negative terms; these had all failed because of their arrogance and disobedience to God (cf. Isa. 56:11; Jer. 2:8; 3:15; 10:21; 22:22; 23:1–5; 25:34 = LXX 32:34; 50:6 = LXX 27:6; Ezek. 34:2–10; Zech. 10:3; 11:5–6).

In Isa. 44:28 God calls Cyrus, king of Persia, "my shepherd." In accordance with God's will, he was concerned for the well-being of the returning exiles and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and of the temple. In a different manner Jer. 25:34–38 threatens the shepherds, the rulers, of the foreign nations with judgment and destruction (cf. Nah. 3:18).

4. When national disaster was breaking loose, the title of shepherd suddenly appeared as a designation of the future Davidic Messiah. At first the references were to "shepherds" (pl.), but these prophecies pointed to the figure of a single shepherd (Jer. 3:15; 23:4; Ezek. 34:23; 37:24). This figure of a future messianic ruler remained mysterious. The shepherd, described as Messiah or David, was particularly emphasized in postexilic times in Zech. 13:7 (cf. 12:10).

5. Intertestamental Jud. drew distinctions between shepherds. After the exile the Pharisaic rabbis prompted a striking devaluation of the shepherd occupation in Palestinian Jud. According to their writings, in a time of poor pay, shepherds were suspected of dishonesty. The pious were forbidden to buy wool, milk, or meat from them. At Qumran, however, the Overseer of the Camp functioned as a shepherd with his sheep (CD 13:7–9).

NT 1. poimēn occurs 18x in the NT; poimnē and poimnion each 5x; poimainō, 11x. Jesus' contemporaries despised the shepherd, but this view is not taken over into the NT. Rather, the shepherd's devotion to duty is painted in glowing colors (cf. Lk. 15:4–6; Jn. 10:3–4; cf. Matt. 18:12–14). Jesus used the metaphor to glorify God's love for sinners and to reveal his opposition to Pharisaic condemnation of them (cf. Lk. 15:4–6). Only in Lk. 2:8–20 do actual shepherds play a role in the NT; elsewhere they appear only in parables and figures of speech.

2. The Synoptic parable of the lost sheep speaks of God as shepherd (Matt. 18:12–14; Lk. 15:4–7). The shepherd's joy at finding a lost sheep after an anxious search is compared to God's joy over one repentant sinner in contrast to ninety-nine supposedly righteous people. Elsewhere Jesus is the messianic shepherd promised in the OT, referred to in three ways.

(a) Jesus begins to fulfill this messianic role by gathering the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matt. 9:36; 10:6; 15:24; cf. Lk. 19:10 with Ezek. 34:15). This marks the dawning of the era of salvation announced by the prophets. Jesus is the ruler of Israel, promised in Mic. 5:3–5, who gathers the shepherdless flock (Matt. 2:6; 9:36; Mk. 6:34; cf. Ezek. 34:5). But this does not mean any abandonment of the nations, for he is also the universal shepherd (cf. Jn. 10:16).

(b) But Jesus must first die for his flock and rise again (Matt. 26:31–32; Mk. 14:27–28). Jesus takes up the words of Zech. 13:7 and claims to be the promised shepherd anticipated in the OT, the shepherd whose representative death ushers in the time of salvation (cf. also Isa. 53).

(c) The era of salvation during which the flock, the people of God, is gathered under the good shepherd reaches its climax in the day of judgment. When all the nations are gathered around his glorious throne, Jesus will separate the sheep from the goats (→ probaton, sheep, 4585). He will sit in judgment, an event that will bring to an end the era of world mission, in which, since his death and resurrection, his flock has been called together from out of every nation (Matt. 25:32).

3. (a) The good shepherd of Jn. 10:1–30 is contrasted with both the thief and the stranger. The shepherd enters through the door; his sheep know him and follow him willingly. In typically Johannine fashion the unique relationship between this shepherd and his flock is expounded—a relationship elsewhere expressed in other metaphors (e.g., the vine and the branches in Jn. 15).

This relationship is made possible by the shepherd's voluntary laying down of his life, the special contribution of Jn. 10 to the theme of Jesus as shepherd (esp. 10:17–18). The hireling will not do this, for he flees in the hour of danger. The links with the OT are obvious (cf. Ezek. 34). Most scholars see Jesus' statements in the light of the OT background.

(b) As the shepherd stands for their Lord (→ kyrios, 3261), so the flock (poimnē, Jn. 10:16), the sum total of his sheep, stands for his people. This is one of several powerful images Jn. uses in his Gospel for the church. The risen Christ gathers his flock like a "good shepherd" (10:10–11). They know him as he knows them, and no one can snatch them out of his hand (10:27–28). Jesus unites all his followers, including Gentiles, into one great flock (10:16).

4. In Paul's speech to the elders at Ephesus, he juxtaposes poimainō and poimnion with ekklēsia (Acts 20:28). In his letters, however, he uses the shepherd theme only twice: in 1 Cor. 9:7, where he compares his claim on the church for hospitality with the shepherd's claim on the produce of his flock, and in Eph. 4:11, where he refers to certain church leaders as "pastors" (see below).

Peter, however, looks back to the image of the shepherd and his flock (1 Pet. 2:25); Jesus is "the Shepherd and Overseer" of human souls. Later Peter exhorts the elders to "be shepherds [poimainō] of God's flock." That is, they are not to be self-seeking masters over the Christian community, but examples of service to it, so that they may pass the test when Jesus, the chief shepherd (archipoimēn), appears (5:3–4). In Heb. 13:20 Christ is the "great Shepherd" who, in accordance with the theme of the letter, has surpassed all prototypes, including Moses himself. According to Rev. 7:17, "the Lamb" (arnion; → amnos, sheep, 303) will be the shepherd of his flock, and the sheep will gladly follow him (cf. 14:4).

5. In the list of church leaders in Eph. 4:11 we find the phrase "pastors [poimēn] and teachers [didaskalos; → didaskalia, teaching, 1436]." Since pastor is by no means an official title yet, the emphasis here is on function, not on title. Pastors are to care for the spiritual welfare of the flock (Jn. 21:15–17; Acts 20:28; 1 Pet. 5:2–4) as well as seek the wandering and lost (cf. Matt. 12:30; 18:12–14; Lk. 11:23). In these cases the leaders have to prove themselves worthy examples to the flock. This is the background of Peter's appointment to pastoral office by the risen Christ to "take care of [poimainō] my sheep" (Jn. 21:16), a passage that suggests a special responsibility given to Peter for the whole flock, the whole church.

See also amnos, sheep (303); probaton, sheep (4585).

4479 (poimnē, flock), → 4478.

4480 (poimnion, flock), → 4478.

4482 (polemeō, make war, fight), → 4483.

4483 πόλεμος

πόλεμος (polemos), war, battle, fight, strife, conflict, quarrel (4483); πολεμέω (polemeō), make war, fight (4482); στρατεία (strateia), expedition, campaign (5127); στράτευμα (strateuma), army, detachment, troops (5128); στρατεύομαι (strateuomai), serve as a soldier (5129); στρατηγός (stratēgos), general, chief magistrate, praetor (5130); στρατιά (stratia), army (5131); στρατιώτης (stratiōtēs), soldier (5132); στρατολογέω (stratologeō), gather an army, enlist soldiers (5133); στρατόπεδον (stratopedon), camp, body of troops, army (5136); ἑκατοντάρχης (hekatontarchēs), centurion (1672); κεντυρίων (kentyriōn), centurion (3035); μάχαιρα (machaira), sword (3479); μάχη (machē), battle, fighting, quarrels, strife, disputes (3480); μάχομαι (machomai), fight, quarrel, dispute (3481); Ἁρμαγεδών (Harmagedōn), Armageddon (762); Γώγ (Gōg), Gog (1223); Μαγώγ (Magōg), Magog (3408); ὅπλον (hoplon), weapon (3960); ὁπλίζω (hoplizō), equip, arm (3959); πανοπλία (panoplia), full armor, panoply (4110); θώραξ (thōrax), breastplate (2606); θυρεός (thyreos), shield (2599); περικεφαλαία (perikephalaia), helmet (4330); βέλος (belos), arrow, dart (1018); ῥομφαία (rhomphaia), a large, broad sword (4855); παρεμβολή (paremboleē), fortified camp, barracks, army in battle array, battle line (4213); παρεμβάλλω (paremballō), throw up a palisade (4212).

CL & OT Note that the basic cl. Gk. definitions are given in the NT section.

1. The works of Homer testify to the close link between war and the rule of the gods in the ancient world, though it is an open question whether one can speak of gods of war. True, Hesiod reports how Athene rejoiced in war and battle. But Ares, the so-called god of war, was never elevated to the status of an Olympian deity. Alongside the glorification of heroism in war is a detestation of the lack of fidelity that causes war through breach of a treaty. More championed than war was peace; note how the great pax Romana instituted by Augustus led to emperor worship.

2. War was a common experience in the OT. Israel, like the surrounding nations, knew few periods of real peace, and the OT is filled with accounts of war from Gen. 14 to 2 Ki. 25. The main theological interest of the OT centers on God's role in war. Deut., Jos., Jdg., and Sam. describe Yahweh, the divine warrior (cf. Exod. 15), taking the initiative and instructing his people on how to participate for what has been called "holy war." They are to prepare themselves as they would for worship, and they are to take neither booty nor prisoners. For Yahweh's role in war, note the common phrase used of the exodus: "with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm" (e.g., Deut. 5:15; 1 Ki. 8:42; Ps. 136:12).

The practice of holy war ceased during the reign of David. With the consolidation of the state and the established authority of the king, war changed more to a defensive rather than an offensive mode in the promised land. While the practice of holy war changed, the ideas that had supported it did not die. The view of God as the divine warrior (cf. Ps. 24:8) continued in the title "Lord of hosts." Yahweh was the commander of all the supernatural powers as well as the armies of Israel.

Prophets were consulted before joining battle (cf. 1 Ki. 20; 22). They also spoke about Yahweh's control of world politics. God would judge the nations through wars that he controlled and used (e.g., Isa. 13–23; Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 25–32; Amos 1–2). The prophets challenged Israel's right to continue claiming the status of holy war. They even announced that Yahweh, the divine warrior, would direct battles against Israel and bring about their downfall (cf. Amos 2:6–16).

Israel's relation to war changed after the exile. Except for the brief Hasmonean period of independence after 165 B.C. and the revolts against Roman rule in A.D. 70 and 132, there was no opportunity for military experience. But the ideology of the divine king and warrior did not fade. Yahweh ruled the powers of heaven and exercised authority over those of history. With the birth of apocalyptic thinking, holy war and the concept of the divine warrior came into their own again, depicting God's triumph over all his enemies on behalf of his people.

The theology of war played a great role in the Qumran community, as evidenced by the War Scroll, a work that draws inspiration from Dan. 11:40–12:3 and describes the eschatological battle between the "sons of light" (the Qumran community) and "the sons of darkness, the army of Satan" (1QM 1:1). The two sides are evenly matched, but by God's intervention, the wicked are vanquished.

NT 1. polemos means war, battle; fig. strife, conflict, quarrel. (a) It stands for a single battle in Rev. 9:7, 9; 12:7; 16:14; 20:8. In 1 Cor. 14:8 Paul asks: "If the trumpet does not sound a clear call, who will get ready for battle?" The context is a discussion of speaking in tongues (cf. 14:6), and he uses this and other illustrations to describe unintelligibility, which has no practical value to the hearer. Tongues are useless if there is no interpreter (cf. 14:11–12, 23–24, 27–28).

(b) Heb. 11:34 alludes to great military events in Israelite history, describing people who through faith "became powerful in battle and routed foreign armies" (e.g., Joshua in Jos. 6:1–27; Gideon in Jdg. 6:15–7:25). Victory was in the last analysis the work of Yahweh (1 Sam. 14:6), and the battle was his (2 Chr. 20:15). One man could therefore put a thousand to flight and two ten thousand (Deut. 32:30; Jos. 23:10).

(c) Jesus foretells wars and rumors of wars in his eschatological discourse (Matt. 24:6); they precede the final judgment. This theme is also taken up by Rev., where war is made on the saints (11:7; 12:17; 13:7). Among the features of the ultimate conflict in Rev. is the battle at Armageddon (16:16), a transliteration of the Heb. Har Magedōn, the mountains of Megiddo (cf. Zech. 12:11; 14:2). The gathering of the kings here takes up the picture of Ezek. 38–39 with its reference to Gog and Magog (cf. also Rev. 20:7–10), where Gog is the prince of Magog. Jewish apocalyptic writers use Gog as a term for the nations generally, who combine in assault on Israel. But the enemies of God's people will be destroyed by fire from heaven, and the devil will be thrown into the lake of fire with the beast and the false prophet.

(d) polemos is used in the fig. sense of strife, conflict, quarrel in Jas. 4:1: "What causes fights [polemos] and quarrels [machē] among you? Don't they come from your desires that battle [strateuomai] within you?"

2. (a) The cognate vb. polemeō means to fight, make war (Rev. 2:16; 12:7; 13:4; 17:14; 19:11). These passages possess strong symbolic overtones, and the subject can be either the opponents of the church or believers, the Spirit of Christ or the exalted Christ. machomai is used in the lit. sense of fight (between two persons) in Acts 7:26 (cf. Exod. 2:11–15; fig., theomachos means one who fights against God, Acts 5:39).

(b) polemeō is used of disputes among Christians in Jas. 4:2. machomai is also used fig. in this verse (see also Jn. 6:52).

3. strateia means an expedition or campaign, though in 2 Cor. 10:4 it means warfare: "The weapons [hoplon] we fight with [lit., of our warfare, strateia] are not the weapons of the world. On the contrary, they have divine power to demolish strongholds." The picture is that of a siege engine attacking an embattled position. Paul's opponents had evidently accused Paul of operating in a worldly way (cf. 1:17), whereas they themselves were "spiritual" (cf. 1 Cor. 3:1). Paul turns the tables on his opponents, implying that pseudo-spirituality is an obstacle to the knowledge of God.

The cognate vb. strateuomai, do military service, serve as a soldier, occurs in 2 Cor. 10:3. Both the noun strateai and the vb. occur again in 1 Tim. 1:18, where Timothy is urged to fight the good fight. God is presumably the commander-in-chief.

4. In addition to 2 Cor. 10:4, hoplon, weapon, also occurs in Rom. 13:12: "The night is nearly over; the day is almost here. So let us put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor [hoplon] of light." This mixed metaphor picks up the twin ideas that armor is worn during the daytime when battles were fought, implying that the Christian is to take the offensive and also that the Christian should wear armor appropriate to the light, in contrast to darkness. In 2 Cor. 6:7 Paul speaks of "the weapons [hoplon] of righteousness" in the context of a discussion of Christian virtues and attitudes in the face of adversity. hoplon is used lit. of weapons in Jn. 18:3; in Rom. 6:13 it means a tool.

The cognate vb. hoplizō is used in 1 Pet. 4:1: "Therefore, since Christ suffered in his body, arm yourselves also with the same attitude." Christians are to follow Christ who has died, is risen, and has ascended (3:18–22). We belong to him and thus to a different way of life from the ungodly (cf. 3:13–17; 4:2–7).

5. (a) In 1 Cor. 9:7 Paul asks rhetorically: "Who serves as a soldier [strateuomai] at his own expense?" Along with other analogies, Paul is demonstrating that Christian workers have a right to be supported by the church. In 2 Tim. 2:3–4 the same imagery occurs in an exhortation to single-hearted devotion: "Endure hardship with us like a good soldier [stratiōtēs] of Christ Jesus. No one serving as a soldier [strateuomai] gets involved in civilian affairs—he wants to please his commanding officer [stratologeō]." The vb. strateuomai is used of the Christian struggle against "sinful desires, which wage war [strateuomai] against your soul" (1 Pet. 2:11).

(b) Elsewhere stratiōtēs occurs in the lit. sense for Roman soldiers (e.g., Matt. 8:9; 27:27; 28:12; Acts 10:7). strateuma means an army (Rev. 19:14, 19), a detachment (Acts 23:10, 27), and troops (Matt. 22:7; Lk. 23:11; Rev. 9:16). stratēgos is used both for the chief magistrates in the Roman colony of Philippi (e.g., Acts 16:20, 22) and the captain of the temple (Lk. 22:4, 52; Acts 4:1; 5:24). stratia, army, is used for the heavenly host of angels (Lk. 2:13) and the host of heaven as an object of idolatrous worship (Acts 7:42). stratopedon means lit. a camp, and then a body of troops, an army (Lk. 21:20).

6. The Roman centurion (an officer in charge of a hundred soldiers) generally appears in a positive light in the NT. Two main words are used: hekatontarchēs (e.g., Matt. 8:5, 8, 13; Acts 10:1, 22; 27:1, 31) and the transliterated kentyriōn (Mk. 15:39, 44–45). Note Jesus' comment about the centurion at Capernaum: "I tell you, I have not found such great faith even in Israel" (Lk. 7:9). This man had drawn an analogy between his own authority and that of Jesus and felt unworthy to receive Jesus under his roof. The Jews, by contrast, sought signs and argued with Jesus. The comment of the centurion by the cross, "Surely this man was the Son of God" (Mk. 15:39), likewise stands in marked contrast with that of the chief priests and teachers of the law (15:31–32).

7. parembolē means a camp, esp. a fortified camp (e.g., Exod. 29:14; Lev. 4:12, 21). It has this sense in Heb. 13:11, 13, where the author alludes to Lev. 16:27 and draws an analogy to the crucifixion of Jesus outside Jerusalem. The present Jerusalem is no "enduring city" (Heb. 13:14); it is in fact a "camp" (13:13). It is therefore better to suffer rejection with Christ and be part of the true pilgrim people of God. Elsewhere parembolē means the barracks or headquarters of the Roman troops in Jerusalem (Acts 21:34, 37). paremballō means to throw up a palisade and is used in Jesus' pronouncement of judgment on Jerusalem (Lk. 19:43).

8. Various weapons and items of armor are mentioned in the NT, esp. in connection with defense against spiritual attack. The breastplate as "faith and love" and the helmet as "the hope of salvation" (1 Thess. 5:8) are elaborated in Eph. 6:10–17 in a comprehensive description of the Christian's warfare and weapons in the fight against the supernatural powers of evil. The "full armor [panoplia] of God" is needed in order to stand against the devils' schemes (6:11).

The loins are to be girded with truth (Eph. 6:14). The breastplate (thōrax) is the metal breastplate that protects the soldier's chest. To Paul it is either righteousness (6:14) or faith (1 Thess. 5:8). In view of the link between righteousness and faith, the same piece of armor can be viewed from complementary perspectives, for righteousness is the gift of God appropriated by faith. Eph. 6:15 speaks of the believer's feet being "fitted with the readiness that comes from the gospel of peace." The "shield [thyreos] of faith" is designed to quench "the flaming arrows [belos] of the evil one" (6:16). For the Roman soldier, this shield had an iron frame and several layers of leather soaked in water that would extinguish any flaming arrows. Finally, the believer must take "the sword [machaira] of the Spirit, which is the word of God" (6:17). The word of God comes from the Holy Spirit and is the weapon he provides.

machaira occurs 29x in the NT (e.g., Matt. 10:34; 26:47; Acts 12:2; Heb. 4:12; Rev. 6:4). It denotes a short sword, in contrast to the rhomphaia, which denotes a large, broad sword (see Rev. 1:16; 2:12). The latter is used lit. in 6:8; 19:15, 21 and fig. for anguish and pain in Lk. 2:35. Heb. 4:12 speaks of the word of God as "sharper than any double-edged sword [machaira]." Jesus' response to the disciples in Lk. 22:38 about two swords is no doubt ironical. His initial remark about going out to buy a sword (22:36) is probably an intimation of what is about to take place. The sudden appearance of two swords may suggest that some of the disciples had links with the zealots or at least were ready to resort to arms. The words, "It is enough," may imply that that is enough of that kind of talk.

4484 πόλις

πόλις (polis), city, city-state (4484); πολίτης (politēs), citizen (4489); συμπολίτης (sympolitēs), fellow citizen (5232); πολιτεύομαι (politeuomai), be a citizen, take part in government, live, conduct one's life (4488); πολιτεία (politeia), rights of a citizen, commonwealth, state (4486); πολίτευμα (politeuma), commonwealth, state, colony, citizenship (4487); πολιτάρχης (politarchēs), politarch, civic magistrate (4485).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. polis means a city, state, and politēs a citizen. politeuomai means to be a citizen or administer the state. The abstract noun politeia means citizen's rights, the condition or way of life of citizenship, also civil policy, constitution. The closely related noun politeuma had originally the same meaning. It was then used for individual political acts or measures, or for the constitution and acts of public administration. Still later the word meant political commonwealth or the state generally.

(b) The development of the city-state in Greece is a typically Gk. phenomenon. The rule of warrior kings was effective primarily during times of war. There arose an increasing desire for concentration of the political will in individual, overseeable territories or districts. In the 8th and 7th centuries B.C. there arose a large number of settlements, mostly dependent on those already in existence. The concentration of political life within the new framework enabled the nobility, as the assistants of the king, to strengthen their own power and finally to supplant the monarchy. During the period that followed, the city-state or polis became the expression of Gk. culture, to which the free citizen gave total allegiance. This formation of independent city-states hindered the unification of larger areas of the Gk. mainland. But with the rise of the Macedonians and the spread of their superstate, the ancient polis came to an end.

2. (a) In the LXX polis occurs about 1,600x, in most cases meaning city (e.g., Gen. 4:17; 10:11–12; 11:4–5, 8) or town (e.g., Jos. 15:9, 13, 15–16). In Israel the city had a different function from the polis in Greece. Israel's constitution was tribal, which distinguished them from the Canaanite city-states with their monarchy. In the OT, therefore, every fortified height could be called a "city." The city afforded its inhabitants protection against enemies and enabled them to withstand attackers. Often cities are spoken of when the inhabitants are meant. Thus the city was to a considerable extent, as in Greece, a community of persons (cf. 1 Sam. 4:13; Isa. 40:9).

(b) Of particular importance as a city is Jerusalem. It is sometimes referred to simply as "the city" (Ezek. 7:23). Yahweh has chosen it (2 Chr. 6:38) and makes his name dwell there (cf. Deut. 12:5; 14:23). Prayers and sacrifices may be offered there. Jerusalem is the "city of God" (cf. Ps. 46:4; 48:1, 8; 87:3), the "city of the Great King" (48:2), the "holy city" (cf. Isa. 48:2; 52:1). When its citizens did not live up to the character God expected, prophets called them to repentance (e.g., Ezek. 22:2–4). In latter days a new Jerusalem, more in keeping with its original calling, is expected (Isa. 1:26; 32:18; Jer. 31:38 = LXX 38:28; Joel 3:17).

3. The nouns derived from polis are found primarily in the books of Macc. (a) politēs generally denotes one's neighbor (e.g., Prov. 11:9, 12; 24:28 = LXX 24:43; Jer. 31:34 = LXX 38:34). In the sense of citizen, it occurs only at 2 Macc. 9:19; 3 Macc. 1:22. (b) politeia (9x in 2–4 Macc.) usually means devout way of life (2 Macc. 8:17; 4 Macc. 17:19); in 3 Macc. 3:21, 23, citizens' rights. (c) politeuomai always means to live in a certain manner (Est. 8:12; 2 Macc. 6:1; 11:25; 3 Macc. 3:4; 4 Macc. 2:8, 23; 4:23; 5:16). (d) politeuma occurs only at 2 Macc. 12:7, where it means community.

NT In the NT polis is found 162x: in Luke, 39x; Acts, 42x; Matt., 27x; and Rev., 27x. It always means city, in the sense of an enclosed settlement or its inhabitants (Matt. 8:34; 21:10; Mk. 1:33). The distinction between it and kōmē, village (27x), often disappears. In keeping with OT and Jewish usage Jerusalem is called the "holy city" (Matt. 4:5; 27:53; Rev. 11:2). This city kills the prophets (Matt. 23:37) and Jesus (Rev. 11:8; cf. Lk. 13:33). Her downfall is certain (Matt. 24:2–25; Lk. 21:6–24).

1. (a) Over against the "present city of Jerusalem" stands "the Jerusalem that is above," the free Jerusalem, the mother of Christians (Gal. 4:25–26; → parabolē, 4130, for comments on allegory and typology here).

(b) Heb. esp. contrasts the present and the future Jerusalem. Even the patriarchs knew of this new city and set their hope on it. Compared with it all earthly cities are temporary tent-camps. For the sake of this coming city the patriarchs regarded themselves as strangers and aliens (11:10, 16). This city is "Mount Zion" and "the city of the living God" (12:22). It awaits the Christians, who have here no continuing city (13:14; cf. Rev. 3:12; 22:14). The earthly Jerusalem is only a copy and a shadow (Heb. 8:5; 10:1) or an "illustration" (9:9) of the city that is to come and that is already present in heaven. In this new city those who conquer in times of persecution have citizens' rights (Rev. 3:12). The new Jerusalem will come down on the new earth (21:2, 10–27).

2. politēs, citizen, occurs only 4x in the NT. It has political emphasis only in Acts 21:39, where Paul says that he is a citizen of Tarsus. Perhaps Paul was born at Tarsus, where his father, liberated, became a Roman citizen. The other instances of politēs occur at Lk. 15:15; 19:14; Heb. 8:11 ("neighbor," quoting Jer. 31:34).

3. sympolitēs, fellow citizen (Eph. 2:19), indicates that Gentile Christians share through Christ in the calling of Israel, God's people, as fellow-citizens.

4. politeia in Acts 22:28 reflects on the Roman citizenship of Paul. In Eph. 2:12 it means the privileged position of Israel in salvation history, to which Gentile Christians now have access by faith in Jesus Christ.

5. politeuma occurs only at Phil. 3:20, where Paul contrasts Christians with those who are "enemies of the cross of Christ" (3:18): "But our citizenship [politeuma] is in heaven. And we eagerly await a Savior from there, the Lord Jesus Christ." This translation stresses politeuma as the present status of the believers. Others, however, → politeuma as reflecting a political entity (i.e., a city) that keeps its citizens on a register. Note that the second half of the verse requires a place to be meant here, in order to make sense of the remark that "from there [or it]" we await a Savior. It is also significant that Philippi was a Roman military colony directly under Rome's control. As Roman subjects, the Philippian Christians owed allegiance to the far-off capital city of Rome. At the same time, they had "another king, one called Jesus" (Acts 17:7). Hence, on earth they were resident aliens, living in a foreign country but with their capital and homeland elsewhere (cf. Jas. 1:1; Heb. 11:13; 1 Pet. 1:1; 2:11).

6. politeuomai is found only at Acts 23:1 and Phil. 1:27, where (as in LXX) it means to walk or live in a way in keeping with the faith.

7. politarchēs is a civic magistrate, a politarch. In Macedonian cities and occasionally elsewhere, a number of politarchs formed the city council. There were five or six in Thessalonica before whom the Jews dragged Jason (Acts 17:6, 8), accusing him of harboring "these men who have caused trouble all over the world" and "defying Caesar's decrees." But the politarchs dismissed the charge, thereby putting the Jews in a bad light and the Christians and authorities in a good one. Yet to keep the peace, they required (through a bond posted by Jason) that Paul and Silas had to leave the city.

See also dēmos, people, populace, crowd, popular assembly (1322); ethnos, nation, people, pagans, Gentiles (1620); laos, people (3295); ochlos, (throng of) people, crowd, mob (4063).

4485 (politarchēs, politarch, civic magistrate), → 4484.

4486 (politeia, rights of a citizen, commonwealth, state), → 4484.

4487 (politeuma, commonwealth, state, colony, citizenship), → 4484.

4488 (politeuomai, be a citizen, take part in government, conduct one's life), → 4484.

4489 (politēs, citizen), → 4484.

4498 πολύς

πολύς (polys), much, many; often in the pl. (polloi), the many (4498).

CL & OT hoi polloi in secular Gk. means the most, the majority. But in the LXX it often represents the Heb. rabbîm, which tends to mean "all." Hence while the Gk. use drew a distinction between a majority as contrasted with a minority, Heb. use is capable of an inclusive meaning, denoting the many individuals forming a totality (cf. Deut. 7:1; 15:6; 28:12; Isa. 52:14–15; Ezek. 39:27).

Used in this way, rabbîm in the OT occurs with ʿammîm or gôyîm of non-Israelite peoples. Many peoples stream to Zion to come under God's protection and enter his service (Isa. 2:2–5); the Servant of God bears the sins of the many (53:11–12).

NT The interpretation of this word in the NT depends on its grammatical position. Three usages may be distinguished.

1. As a noun with the art. hoi polloi is twice used with the meaning of "the most" (Matt. 24:12; 2 Cor. 2:17). Elsewhere the phrase has the summarizing meaning of the OT (cf. "many" in Mk. 6:2, where Lk. 4:22 has "all"; similarly Mk. 9:26).

In Rom. 5:15–21 "the many" in the sense of "all" are contrasted with the one who puts an end to the dominating power of sin and death. Just as through one man (Adam) sin and death came to all, so also through one individual man, Jesus, righteousness and life was brought to all. That hoi polloi has here a summarizing meaning can be seen from the context (cf. 5:15 with 5:12 and 1 Cor. 15:22, which have pantes, meaning all; cf. Rom. 5:19 with 5:18, which has pantes). In addition, the section has clear references to Isa. 53:11–12, which makes an interpretation in the Heb. sense more likely. Paul contrasts here the totality of Adam's descendants with the totality of believers. He leaves an open question here whether the totality of believers will ever include the whole of humankind.

Rom. 12:5 and 1 Cor. 10:17a speak of the many (hoi polloi) as being one body in Christ, referring to all the members of the church (cf. pantes in 1 Cor. 10:17b; 12:13). In Heb. 12:15 the reference to "many" suggests that the whole congregation might be defiled through the bitterness of some.

2. As a noun without the art. The question arises whether polloi without the art. or used as an adj. is used with a summarizing meaning in the sense of "all." The question is important in cases like Matt. 22:14, "Many are invited, but few are chosen"; Mk. 10:45 (Matt. 20:28), "The Son of man [came] . . . to give his life as a ransom for many"; Mk. 14:24 (Matt. 26:28), "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many"; Heb. 9:28, "Christ was sacrificed once to take away the sins of many people."

It is doubtful whether polloi has the summarizing meaning in Matt. 22:14. The many who have come together to hear God's word are in fact called, but their mere presence is no guarantee that they are the chosen for the world to come. Therefore, the "many" here means a majority in contrast with the "few," a minority who have true fellowship with God (cf. 7:21–23). The other passages, however, do reflect the summarizing meaning, for they all look to Isa. 53, where "the many" means all the nations of the world. Jesus, the Servant of God, gives his life as a ransom for all and sheds his blood for the reconciliation of the whole world (cf. hoi polloi in Heb. 12:15). This does not imply, however, that all people have in fact been reconciled to God through Christ.

3. As an adj. In Rom. 5:16 and Lk. 7:47 polloi is linked with sins and transgressions. In Rom. 5:16 a summarizing meaning may be deduced from the context: God's free gift of grace covers not only the majority of transgressions but all of them in bringing justification. The Gk. of Lk. 7:47 says lit.: "Her sins, the many, are forgiven." This implies the totality: "All her sins—and they are many—are forgiven."

See also pas, all (4246).

4499 (polysplanchnos, sympathetic, compassionate), → 5073.

4503 (poma, a drink), → 4403.

4504 (ponēria, evil, badness, wickedness), → 4505.

4505 πονηρός

πονηρός (ponēros), sick, bad, evil (4505); πονηρία (ponēria), evil, badness, wickedness (4504).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ponēros and ponēria are often used as synonyms of kakos and kakia. In a pass. sense it designated something laden with toil, full of suffering, unfit, miserable. The act. force is also found in the sense of bad, causing disaster, dangerous, esp. in the political and social arena, where it describes an enemy of the state. This leads to the moral concept of ethically reprehensible, bad.

2. In the LXX ponēros frequently represents Heb. raʿ (→ kakos, 2805), evil, bad, of little value. When used of animals it can mean dangerous, harmful (Gen. 37:20). It can also mean damaging to a person's reputation (e.g., Deut. 22:14) or evil in relation to the human spirit (e.g., 1 Sam. 16:14–16). Ethically ponēros means evil, worthless, depraved, corrupt, whether of persons (cf. Gen. 13:13; Isa. 9:17) or of things (cf. 3:9). Like kakos, ponēros has not merely a moral but also a religious connotation. It implies separation from and opposition to God and his will (Amos 5:14–15). In contrast to the NT, the LXX never uses this word to denote the devil. The expression "good and evil" (kalos kai ponēros) in Gen. 3:5, 22 means in the widest sense everything.

The noun ponēria shares many of the meanings of the adj. Unlike kakos, which can refer to the harm or calamity that God brings on humanity (e.g., Isa. 45:7; Jer. 2:3), ponēria and its cognates are restricted to the evil that humans do against God or their fellow human beings (Jdg. 11:27; Neh. 6:2).

NT 1. ponēros is used 78x in the NT. It is used physically of the eyes in Matt. 6:23 and Lk. 11:34. It is probably used here in an ethical sense, but even if it refers to sickness of the eye, the parable intends for us to understand it in a metaphorical sense. In Matt. 18:32 ponēros refers to worthless servants. It is used of trees and useless fruit in 7:17–18.

2. ponēros is used ethically in the sense of being opposed to God. (a) Jesus uses it as an adj. of humans in general, whom he calls evil (cf. Matt. 7:11 par.). God alone is good (cf. Mk. 10:18). The Pharisees were evil in the sense of being hardened (Matt. 12:34), just as the Jews were the evil generation (12:39; 16:4; Lk. 11:29), who showed their character in their opposition to Jesus. Anyone who decides against Jesus is evil (cf. 2 Thess. 3:2; 2 Tim. 3:13). Out of the evil treasure of one's heart one brings forth evil (Matt. 12:35 par.).

Thoughts too can be evil (Matt. 15:19). In Col. 1:21 and 2 Tim. 4:18 it is used with ergon ("work, deed" [→ 2237]) to denote evil human actions. ponēros can also be used in connection with boasting, words, insults, conscience, the name of Christian (Lk. 6:22), the present age (Gal. 1:4), and the present day (Eph. 6:13). John's contrast of ponēros with God's light, work, and word is particularly striking (Jn. 3:19; 17:15; 1 Jn. 2:13; 3:12; 5:18–19; 2 Jn. 11; 3 Jn. 10).

(b) When used as a noun, ponēros has a double meaning. (i) It can mean a bad person (e.g., Matt. 5:39; 22:10). Matt. 13:49–50 states that in the final judgment the ponēroi will be separated out by God and condemned (cf. 22:13–14). The church should exclude the evil person from its midst (1 Cor. 5:13). But the goodness of God is available even for the evil as long as they live on earth. Hence Christians should show them love (Lk. 6:35).

(ii) ho ponēros, standing absolutely, is the evil one (i.e., Satan; see Matt. 13:19 [note par. Mk. 4:15, Satan; Lk. 8:12, the devil]; cf. also Jn. 17:15; Eph. 6:16). It is used noticeably often in 1 Jn. (cf. 2:13–14; 3:12; 5:18–19). Interpreters are divided over the meaning of this expression in the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:13b): "Deliver us from the evil one" (NIV) or "deliver us from evil." Arguments pro and con are equally divided among scholars. If 6:13a refers to protection against the testing of God through false prophets and false saviors, then we must understand ponērou in 6:13b as masc. It is a prayer to be snatched out of this power.

See also kakos, bad, evil (2805).

4506 (ponos, hard labor, toil, distress), → 3160.

4513 πορεύομαι

πορεύομαι (poreuomai), go, to journey, to travel, to walk (4513); τρέχω (trechō), run, move quickly (5556); συντρέχω (syntrechō), run together (5340); δρόμος (dromos), course, race (1536); πρόδρομος (prodromos), running before, forerunner (4596).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. poreuomai, to go, journey, travel, march, denotes by contrast with peripateō (→ 4344) going in a particular direction or with a particular intention. It is rarely used fig. (e.g., traveling along the path of life). trechō means to move quickly, run, esp. at a contest in a stadium. This vb. is also found in statements that express effort or achievement in respect of mental and spiritual matters.

2. In the LXX poreuomai occurs some 750x, chiefly for Heb. hālak, to go. (a) It often has the lit. sense of journeying, traveling (e.g., Gen. 12:4–5; Deut. 1:19, 33). It can take on the fig. sense of following (i.e., obeying) someone (e.g., of David following God, 1 Ki. 14:8). It can also denote departure from life (2:2), and in later times the journey to Sheol or Hades (e.g., Job 10:21; 16:22 = LXX 16:23; Eccl. 9:10).

(b) This vb. often stands in the LXX in the fig. sense of way of life (e.g., 1 Ki. 3:14), esp. in the characteristic combination with hodos, way. To travel in the "ways of God" (i.e., his commandments; e.g., Deut. 8:6; 10:12; Jer. 7:23), can also be called "walking before God" (1 Ki. 8:25). Other phrases and terms can also modify poreuomai, such as "the law of the LORD" (Ps. 119:1), "righteousness" (Isa. 33:15), and "truth" (Prov. 28:6).

(c) trechō, to run, occurs 60x in the LXX, mostly for lit. running (e.g., Gen. 18:7; 1 Ki. 18:46). It does appear in a fig. sense for living according to God's commands (e.g., Ps. 119:32), taking delight in lies (62:4), and for "running the course toward immortality" (4 Macc. 14:5).

NT 1. poreuomai occurs 153x in the NT. (a) It mostly has the lit. sense of to go (e.g., Matt. 28:19; Lk. 7:8), travel, journey (e.g., 9:53). In 22:22 it means going in the sense of dying; in Jn. 14:2–3 it denotes Jesus' departure to return to the Father (cf. also Acts 1:10–11). It can also mean departing into the eternal fire at the final judgment (Matt. 25:41).

(b) poreuomai rarely has the sense of walking in the commandments and regulations of the Lord (cf. Lk. 1:6; Acts 9:31; for this, peripateō is usually used). In 1 Pet. 4:3; 2 Pet. 2:10; 3:3; Jude 11, 16, 18 the vb. occurs in statements concerning a bad way of life.

2. trechō, to run, occurs in the NT in the lit. sense, including those running to or from the empty tomb (e.g., Matt. 28:8; Lk. 24:12; Jn. 20:2, 4). In 2 Thess. 3:1 it is used of the word of the Lord spreading rapidly. Paul usually uses this vb. in a fig. sense to express how the Christian life as a whole is directed toward a goal (Gal. 2:2; 5:7; Phil. 2:16). Using an athletic analogy, Paul stresses that what matters most is applying maximum effort and holding out to the end (1 Cor. 9:24–26; cf. Heb. 12:1). But he also points out that when all is said and done it is not our "effort" (running) but God's mercy that counts (Rom. 9:16). syntrechō, run together, occurs in Mk. 6:33; Acts 3:11 (of people); 1 Pet. 4:4 (fig. of people plunging together into debauchery).

3. (a) In 2 Tim. 4:7 Paul uses dromos, race, fig. for his career and work as an apostle. In Acts 13:25, it refers to the course of John the Baptist's life and in 20:24 to the complete course of Paul's ministry. (b) prodromos, forerunner, occurs only at Heb. 6:20, where Jesus is seen as a forerunner, having become a high priest forever and having entered the inner sanctuary, i.e., the immediate presence of God, on our behalf. As a priest after the order of Melchizedek, Jesus belongs to an order superior to that of the Levitical priests, who as mortals had to perform the rite annually.

See also anastrephō, to overturn, turn back, turn round; fig. behave, conduct oneself, live (418); hodos, way, road, highway, way of life (3847); peripateō, go about, walk (4344).

4518 (porneia unchastity, prostitution, immorality), → 4519.

4519 πορνεύω

πορνεύω (porneuō), practice prostitution or sexual immorality (4519); πόρνη (pornē), prostitute (4520); πόρνος (pornos), immoral person, fornicator (4521); πορνεία (porneia) unchastity, prostitution, immorality (4518).

CL & OT 1. porneuō means (trans.) to prostitute. It is usually used in the pass. for a woman: to prostitute oneself, become a prostitute. But it is also used of the man, meaning commit sexual immorality. pornē means a woman who is for sale, a prostitute; pornos, one who has sexual intercourse with prostitutes, also an immoral man, male prostitute; porneia, prostitution, unchastity (including homosexual activity).

This word group describes various extramarital sexual modes of behavior insofar as they deviate from accepted social and religious norms (e.g., homosexuality, promiscuity, pedophilia, and esp. prostitution). Cultic prostitution was often included as part of ancient fertility rites, under the belief that performance of sexual intercourse in the sanctuary would ensure the fertility of everything living in the land and prevent the loss of the procreative and generative faculties. Evidence of cultic prostitution is first found in Babylon. Noncultic sexual activity outside of marriage, such as with one's own slave girls and with prostitutes, was accepted in many cultures in the ANE.

2. The pornē word group in the LXX generally stands for the Heb. zānâ, to engage in prostitution, whereas moicheuō, to commit adultery (→ 3658), regularly represents nā'ap. (a) Prostitution was not unknown in Israel, though in the beginning it does not appear to have been considered a serious moral problem (cf. Gen. 38:15; Jdg. 16:1; 1 Ki. 3:16). Thus in certain circumstances both female prostitution and extramarital intercourse on the part of the man (e.g., with a maid—Gen. 16:1–2; 30:1–13) were sanctioned.

(b) Prostitution became a serious problem through Israel's confrontation with the fertility cults, particularly the Baal cult. Male devotees had sexual intercourse with a prostitute in the sanctuary, which was supposed to bring him into cosmic harmony; this had a strong attraction for the educated Israelites. The bitter struggle of the prophets was directed against the belief of many in Israel that they owed the blessings of the land to the rites of the Baal cult, the spirit of prostitution, which had gained acceptance in the Yahweh cult. Israel "has not acknowledged that I [Yahweh] was the one who gave her the grain, the new wine and oil, who lavished on her the silver and gold—which they used for Baal" (Hos. 2:8).

In other words, what shocked the prophets was Israel's lack of personal faithfulness. The priests disregarded the tradition of Yahweh's word and lost their orientation (cf. Hos. 4:4–19). Cultic prostitution had taken on disgusting forms (cf. Jer. 3:1–9; 5:7–17; Ezek. 16; 23). Thus, prostitution became a figure used for Israel's apostasy from Yahweh. As a result, there arose in Israel a sharp rejection of any kind of prostitution.

3. Rab. Jud. frowned on any kind of prostitution or extramarital sexual intercourse. Incest and all kinds of unnatural sexual intercourse were viewed as porneia. One who surrenders to it shows ultimately that he or she has broken with God (cf. Wis. 14:27–28). The Book of Jubilees goes so far as to call porneia an unforgivable sin (33:13, 18). In order to avoid fornication, early marriage was recommended. In the so-called lists of vices of Hel. Jud., adultery and prostitution are found alongside idolatry, sorcery, and murder. The Dead Sea Scrolls give frequent warnings against sexual immorality.

NT In the NT the main weight of this word group (used 55x) falls in Paul (21x) and in Rev. (19x). In other words, the question of porneia comes up for discussion esp. in the confrontation with the Gk. world and in the context of the final judgment.

1. Prostitution existed in Israel at the time of Jesus. But whereas, according to Jewish law, prostitutes and tax collectors were excluded from the community of God and thus from salvation, Jesus proclaimed to them God's forgiveness on the basis of their faith and offered them salvation (Matt. 21:31–32; cf. Heb. 11:31; Jas. 2:25). The faith they displayed is held up as an example for the self-confident priests and elders of the people. But this in no way softens Jesus' rejection of prostitution (Mk. 7:21 par.).

It is not clear whether porneia in the so-called "exceptive clause" (Matt. 5:32; 19:9) is to be understood simply as extramarital sexual intercourse in the sense of moicheia or as including prostitution. Most interpreters tend to favor the former interpretation. In this clause, Matt. is apparently dealing with a vital question that Mk. and Lk. do not consider, namely, the question of remarriage after divorce for marital unfaithfulness. Note that Matt. 19:9; Mk. 10:11; and Lk. 16:18 agree in abrogating the permission to divorce that is implied in Deut. 24:1–4. The Mosaic law was not concerned with divorce for adultery (for which death was the prescribed penalty, see 22:22), so it did not need to consider the question of remarriage in such an event. Jesus, therefore, felt a need to give God's will on this issue (see also apostasion, 687).

2. The pornē word group denotes any kind of illegitimate sexual intercourse in Paul's letters. porneia was particularly an issue in the church at Corinth (the word group appears 14x in 1 Cor.), in part because that city had a significant number of temple prostitutes and because, as an important port city, it was open to the syncretism of the ancient world and was stamped with sexual licentiousness in the slums around the harbor. From 1 Cor. 1:26 and 2 Cor. 12:21, we can deduce that many members of the Corinthian church came from precisely that area. Moreover, certain elements in the Corinthian community boasted of their freedom in the Spirit to live as they pleased (cf. "everything is permissible," 1 Cor. 6:12; 10:23). They appear to have held to a dualism that maintained that what believers did with their bodies did not affect them spiritually.

It is against this background that the problem of incest must be seen (intercourse of a son with his step-mother, 1 Cor. 5:1–13). Paul maintains that if the congregation does not separate from such immoral persons, the whole church is endangered (5:9–11) and is subject to God's judgment (→ olethros, 3897). Since the dualism prevalent in Corinth saw the human body as something that would perish anyway, sexual needs could be expressed freely and spontaneously. Paul passionately resisted this outlook (6:9–20). The human body is not intended for immorality (6:13). Because a human does not have a sōma (body) but is sōma, what he or she does with the body matters a great deal (6:15–17; cf. Heb. 12:16). One must flee from sexual immorality and honor God with one's body (1 Cor. 6:18–20).

3. In Rev. unbridled sexual excess is mentioned among the chief sins of the pagans (9:21), just as the sexually immoral are mentioned among the sinners who are threatened by the second death (21:8; 22:15). In the fig. sense Babylon (chs. 17–19, probably a symbol of Rome), the great prostitute, is named as the embodiment and the personification of enmity to God. Prostitution is meant both lit. and fig. (as a reference to Rome's wooing for political and economic favors).

4520 (pornē, prostitute), → 4519.

4521 (pornos, immoral person, fornicator), → 4519.

4525 πορφύρα

πορφύρα (porphyra), purple (4525); πορφυροῦς (porphyrous), purple (4528).

Purple (porphyrous, Rev. 17:4) symbolizes wealth and luxury (18:16; cf. Lk. 16:19). The noun porphyra originally meant the purple shell-fish (murex), then the dye obtained from it, and finally cloth, clothing (cf. Acts 16:14, porphyropōlis). It is used of the garment that the Roman soldiers put on Jesus (Mk. 15:17, 20; Jn. 19:2, 5), mocking him as a king.

4528 (porphyrous, purple), → 4525.

4530 (posis, drinking, a drink), → 4403.

4532 (potamos, river, stream), → 4380.

4539 (potērion, cup), → 4403.

4540 (potizō, water, give to drink), → 4403.

4542 (potos, drinking, i.e., revelry), → 4403.

4547 (pragma, deed, matter, thing, task, lawsuit, dispute), → 4556.

4548 (pragmateia, activity, occupation, undertaking), → 4556.

4549 (pragmateuomai, do business, trade), → 4556.

4551 (praktōr, officer), → 4556.

4552 (praxis, act, action, deed, function), → 4556.

4556 πράσσω

πράσσω (prassō), accomplish, do (4556); πρᾶξις (praxis), act, action, deed, function (4552); πρᾶγμα (pragma), deed, matter, thing, undertaking, task, lawsuit, dispute (4547); πραγματεία (pragmateia), activity, occupation, undertaking (4548); πραγματεύομαι (pragmateuomai), do business, trade (4549); πράκτωρ (praktōr), officer (4551).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. prassō means to accomplish, do something. In monetary contexts, prassō means collecting or exacting payment of taxes or debts. Intrans., prassō means to act. It is often met in the formula "to do and to say." Linked with an adv., it expresses the condition or state of a person (e.g., eu prassō, I am doing [feel] well). It is rarely used of gods. In contrast to poieō (→ 4472), which tends to signify more concrete deeds, prassō is used where a philosopher seeks to assess human action in general.

(b) The meanings of praxis and pragma overlap. praxis denotes acting, activity, and can refer to some completed act or work, the way an activity is carried out, or a planned action. It can also mean a business or an undertaking. pragma means deed, act, business, task, but also a general matter or thing, or even a lawsuit, trial.

2. (a) In comparison with poieō in the LXX, prassō occurs infrequently. When it is used, it often describes human behavior, either bad (e.g., Gen. 31:28; Job 27:6) or good (e.g., 4 Macc. 3:20).

(b) pragma occurs approximately 125x in the LXX, praxis only 23x. Whereas the latter refers only to human acts, pragma can be used for divine acts (e.g., Isa. 25:1; 28:22).

NT 1. prassō occurs 39x in the NT. It never refers to divine, creative activity. Rather, it often denotes negative and more or less abstractly conceived human action; in some places it is used for positive dealings or has a neutral value. (a) In connection with money matters, John the Baptist instructs tax collectors not to "collect" more than they should (Lk. 3:13; cf. also 19:23). In 12:58 praktōr is an officer in charge of the debtor's prison.

(b) prassō refers to the human condition in Eph. 6:21; linked with the adv. eu it has the sense of doing well in Acts 15:29. The shout to the jailer in Philippi is also intended to serve personal well-being: "Do yourself no harm!" (lit., 16:28).

(c) Finally, prassō has a neutral sense in 1 Thess. 4:11, where it means one's own affairs. Acts 5:35 speaks generally of human action, which can turn out either well or badly.

2. prassō often has religious or ethical overtones. (a) It indicates a deed that can stand neither in the regular earthly courts (cf. Lk. 23:41; Acts 17:7; Rom. 13:4) nor before God (cf. Jn. 5:29; Rom. 2:2–3). Formulaic phrases speak of offenses that deserve death (e.g., Lk. 23:15; Acts 25:11, 25; Rom. 1:32). An individual, concrete deed (unchastity) is named in 1 Cor. 5:2; prassō also refers primarily to sexual sins in 2 Cor. 12:21.

(b) In Acts 19:19 the vb. is used of those who "practiced" sorcery. It also refers to Jesus' betrayal (Lk. 22:23), the killing of Jesus brought about in ignorance by the people (Acts 3:17), and Saul's hostilities directed against the name of Jesus (26:9).

(c) In Rom. 7:14–25 prassō and poieō are used alongside each other in connection with doing evil. Temptation must be resisted, for anyone who does evil hates the light (Jn. 3:20), and anyone who does the deeds of the sinful nature (Gal. 5:21) will not inherit God's kingdom. In the old covenant, it was important to act in accordance with the law (Rom. 2:25), but in Acts 26:20 Paul enjoins his hearers to prove their repentance by their deeds, which gives prassō a positive significance (cf. also Phil. 4:9).

The notion that right action has its reward receives clear expression in 1 Cor. 9:17. The definition of the relationship between human action and its eschatological valuation is developed in Jn. 5:29 in the form of general validity, in both positive and negative directions. One day the dead will leave their graves, those who have done (poieō) good deeds will receive the resurrection of life, while those who have done (prassō) evil, the resurrection of judgment.

3. (a) praxis occurs 6x in the NT. The word has a neutral and abstract meaning in Rom. 12:4, where Paul writes that not all the members of Christ's body have the same function. In Matt. 16:27 praxis should be understood ambivalently: The deeds that will be judged at the Parousia can be good or bad. In the other 4 places praxis refers to obviously evil actions (Lk. 23:51; Acts 19:18; Rom. 8:13; Col. 3:9).

(b) pragma (11x) has a wider range of nuances. It has neutral value in Matt. 18:19, where it is used of a prayer request, and in Rom. 16:2, where it refers to Phoebe's affairs. In 1 Thess. 4:6 it probably refers to some business transaction. It is used of judicial proceedings in 1 Cor. 6:1, and it has the sense of historical events in Lk. 1:1. Acts 5:4 and 2 Cor. 7:11 are concerned with a concrete offense (cf. Jas. 3:16). In 2 Tim. 2:4 pragmateia means the affairs of everyday life, whereas the vb. pragmateuomai means to do business, trade (Lk. 19:13).

(c) The use of pragma in Heb. provides a striking contrast. In 6:18 pragma means two "things" (the promise and oath of God) by which God declares his truth, while 10:1 contrasts the shadow of the good things to come contained in the law with "the realities" (pl.) themselves. Faith relates to these things, even when it cannot see them (11:1).

See also ergazomai, to labor, be active, work, bring about (2237); poieō, do, make (4472).

4557 (praupathia, gentleness), → 4558.

4558 πραΰς

πραΰς (praus), gentle, humble, considerate, meek (4558); πραΰτης (prautēs), gentleness, humility, considerateness, meekness (4559); πραϋπαθία (praupathia), gentleness (4557); ἐπιεικής (epieikēs), mild, yielding, gentle, kind, forbearing (2117); ἐπιείκεια (epieikeia), mildness, forbearance, gentleness, graciousness (2116).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. praus means friendly, mild, gentle; the noun prautēs means gentleness, mild friendliness. The virtually synonymous epieikēs and its noun epieikeia mean the proper way of life, or later, forbearance, mildness. Words from the praus group are used of things (e.g., mild words, soothing medicine), animals (tame), and people (benevolent). It is a quality shown by friends, while stern harshness may be expected from an enemy. epieikēs came to be used for a considerate, thoughtful attitude in legal relationships, which was prepared to mitigate the rigors of justice, in contrast to the attitude that demands rights to be upheld at all costs.

Both concepts are opposed to unbridled anger, harshness, brutality, and self-expression. They represent character traits of the noble-minded, the wise who remain meek in the face of insults, the judge who is lenient in judgment, and the king who is kind in his rule. Hence these words appear often in pictures of the ideal ruler and in eulogies on men in high positions.

2. (a) epieikeia is found 10x in the LXX and epieikēs, including the adv., 6x. They describe God's gracious gentleness in his rule (1 Sam. 12:22; Ps. 86:5; Wis. 12:18), and also the actions of a king (2 Macc. 9:27), a prophet (2 Ki. 6:3), and the pious (Wis. 2:19).

(b) praus, found 17x in the LXX, translates ʿānî (3x), poor, afflicted, humble, defenseless; and more generally its later variant ʿānāw, poor, humble, meek (cf. Ps. 25:9). The poor were those in Israel who had no landed property. They were wrongfully restricted, disinherited, and deprived of the fullness that God willed (→ penēs, 4288). They were often the victims of unscrupulous exploitation (Job 24:4; cf. Ps. 37:11, 14; Isa. 32:7).

(c) Yahweh, however, takes the part of the ʿānî in the Mosaic law (Exod. 22:21–24; Deut. 24:14–15), the prophets (Isa. 3:14–15; Amos 2:7; 8:4; Zech. 7:10), and wisdom lit. (Prov. 14:21; 22:22; 31:9, 20). He hears and comforts those who find no mercy among their fellow Israelites (Job 36:15; Isa. 29:19) and will finally reverse all that is not now in their favor (Ps. 37:11; 147:6; Isa. 26:6). Hence ʿānî (and esp. ʿānāw) changes its meaning from those who are materially poor to those who, in deep need and difficulty, humbly seek help from Yahweh alone (e.g., Ps. 40:17; Isa. 41:17; 49:13; 66:2; Zeph. 2:3; 3:12) so that the word is sometimes used with the meaning meek, humble, modest (Num. 12:3; Eccl. 6:8).

(d) In the messianic passages of the OT God's king is depicted as the helper of all who have been deprived of their rights and of all the needy (Ps. 45:4; 72; Isa. 11:4; 61:1). The term ʿānî is never applied to God, but in Zech. 9:9 it is a title of honor given to the promised Messiah. As he rides the donkey, the animal used by the socially insignificant, rather than the horse, his way leads to the poor and those deprived of their rights and offers them peace.

NT 1. Both prautēs and epieikeia are marks of Christ's rule. In contrast to the representatives of a political messianism, Jesus repudiates the use of force to bring about God's rule. His activity on earth is that of the OT king who brings salvation without using force or war (Matt. 11:29; 21:5; cf. Zech. 9:9). Matt. 11:29 stresses the human humility of the Messiah. In 2 Cor. 10:1 Paul mentions prautēs and epieikeia as characteristics of Jesus' attitude toward humans during his life on earth and holds them out as an example to the church.

2. These words express an attitude demanded of Christians, though they are applied also to non-Christians (Acts 24:4, where the Jewish spokesman Tertullus uses epieikeia in addressing Felix; cf. 1 Pet. 2:18, of masters). These words also stand in lists of virtues as expressions of Christian love (Col. 3:12; 1 Tim. 6:11; 1 Pet. 3:4), of "the wisdom that comes from heaven" (Jas. 3:17), and of the fruit of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:23). They state the rule for the way in which Christians and non-Christians should live together (Phil. 4:5; Tit. 3:2). They also apply in dealing with Christians who have committed sins (1 Cor. 4:21; Gal. 6:1; 2 Tim. 2:25) and in living in the midst of enmity and persecution (1 Pet. 3:15). Christians, esp. bishops (1 Tim. 3:3), should set an example of this (Jas. 3:13).

3. The relationship between praus and ʿānî may help explain Matt. 5:5: "Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit [klēronomeō] the earth." Since the vb. to inherit appears in Deut. 4:1; 16:20; Ps. 37:11; 69:35 with reference to possessing the land of Israel, Jesus' thought here is of possessing or inheriting the new promised land. Just as obedience and righteousness were the conditions of entering Canaan, so humble obedience to his teaching is the condition of entering the new land of God's kingdom. Those who are now oppressed and despised and have nothing to call their own (like Israel prior to the conquest of Canaan) will enter the inheritance of God's rule on earth. At the same time Matt. 5:5 is a veiled statement about Jesus himself.

See also tapeinos, lowly, humble (5424).

4559 (prautēs, gentleness, humility, meekness), → 4558.

4560 πρέπω

πρέπω (prepō), be fitting, seemly or suitable (4560).

CL & OT prepō in cl. Gk. usually occurs in the impers. forms eprepen, it was fitting, and prepei, it is fitting. Whereas dei and opheilō relate to necessity and obligation, prepō expresses what is proper and appropriate. It is found in the LXX in Ps. 33:1; 65:1; 93:5. In the Apocr. it occurs in Sir. 33:28; 32:3 = LXX 30:27; 35:3; 1 Macc. 12:11; 3 Macc. 3:20, 25; 7:13, 19.

NT In the Gospels prepei occurs only in Matt. 3:15 in Jesus' reply to the protestations of John the Baptist at his request for baptism: "Let it be so now; it is proper [prepon] for us to do this to fulfill all righteousness." In discussing the question of the veiling of women in worship, Paul asks: "Judge for yourselves: Is it proper [prepon estin] for a woman to pray to God with her head uncovered?" (1 Cor. 11:13). Eph. 5:3 asserts that no hint of immorality, impurity, or covetousness should exist among believers, as is proper (prepei) for God's people.

The Pastoral Letters give direction for appropriate conduct for women and Christian teachers. Women should adorn themselves "with good deeds, appropriate [prepei] for women who profess to worship God" (1 Tim. 2:10). Titus is urged to "teach what is in accord [prepei] with sound doctrine" (Tit. 2:1).

Finally, Heb. makes two observations on the appropriateness of Jesus' actions. First, "It was fitting" (eprepen) that in order to bring many to glory, Jesus should be made perfect through suffering (2:10). God also had to produce a high priest who could meet (eprepen) our needs, one who was holy, blameless, and pure (7:26).

The common factor in all these instances of prepei is the absence of external constraint and absolute necessity. In each case the person concerned could have acted otherwise. However, righteousness and the exigencies of the situation made the conduct specified not only appropriate but imperative.

See also anankē, compulsion (340); dei, it is necessary, one must (1256); opheilō, owe, be indebted to (4053).

4561 (presbeia, embassy, ambassador), → 4565.

4563 (presbeuō, be older, be an ambassador, rule), → 4565.

4564 (presbyterion, council of elders, rank of elder or presbyter), → 4565.

4565 πρεσβύτερος

πρεσβύτερος (presbyteros), older, elder, presbyter (4565); πρεσβεύω (presbeuō), be older, be an ambassador, rule (4563); πρεσβυτέριον (presbyterion), council of elders, rank of elder or presbyter (4564); πρεσβύτης (presbytēs), old man (4566); πρεσβεία (presbeia), embassy, ambassador (4561); προΐστημι (proistēmi), be at the head of, rule, be concerned about (4613); κυβέρνησις (kybernēsis), administration (3236).

CL 1. presbys, old, presbyteros, older, and presbytatos, oldest, first denoted a person's age relative to others; then, greater importance; and finally, more honored. In ancient Gk. society older people received respect and authority on the grounds of their experience and wisdom. This meaning determines the use of the other words from this root. Thus the noun presbytēs denotes age, rank, or an older man who is no longer a neaniskos (young man) and is probably over 50 years old. The fem. presbytis means old woman. The vb. presbeuō means to be older; later, to take the first place

Hence the words from this root came to be used for institutional functions in society, for which the wisdom of age is regarded as a prerequisite. presbeuō is used for the activity of an ambassador, who represents the people who send him and negotiates for them. presbeia means embassy, ambassador. Older people often had an advisory role within the political community. Hence, the vb. could mean command, and presbyteros could be the title of an office of state. In Egypt, the pl. presbyteroi appears as the title for members of associations or religious bodies, or elected agents of village councils, who had judicial and administrative duties.

2. proistēmi means (lit.) to set before or over someone or something. It could refer to the functions of leadership in an army, state, or party, positions that required guarding or protecting. Thus the verb could also mean support, care for.

3. kybernaō was originally used of the action of a ship helmsman. Later, the derivative noun came to designate a leading statesman. Divine guidance and rule were also described by cognate words of this group.

OT 1. In the LXX words derived from the root presb- are used in three primary areas. (a) presbytēs occurs 30x to designate someone older in years (e.g., the old man Eli, 1 Sam. 2:22); presbyteros occurs 50x with this meaning (e.g., Gen. 18:11). presbeion denotes advanced age as well as the right of the eldest as firstborn (43:33; Ps. 71:18).

(b) presbyteroi (usually pl.) denotes a group of men within a tribe, family, people, or community of settlers who have some leadership role (see below).

(c) presbeutēs and presbys are used in rare instances in the cl. sense of ambassador, envoy, negotiator (e.g., 2 Chr. 32:31; Isa. 57:9).

2. proistēmi occurs only 8x, meaning to be head of a household (2 Sam. 13:17; Amos 6:10), govern the people (1 Macc. 5:19), and even take trouble (Isa. 43:24).

3. kybernēsis is a function of rulers (Prov. 1:5; 11:14). But kybernaō is also used of the wily plans of the wicked (12:5).

4. In the OT there is no theological significance in age except in the case of the rights of the firstborn. But the existence of elders as an institution was of considerable significance in the life of ancient Israel and the Jewish synagogue community. They were an established part of the patriarchal clan and tribal system, where authority belonged to the heads of families.

(a) In Exod. 12:21–27, all the elders of Israel (the LXX translates this by gerousia, council of elders) are called together and given instructions about the Passover celebrations within their families. These men have authority over these communities.

(b) In the rest of the Pentateuch the elders are representatives of all Israel. Moses must inform them of Yahweh's resolve to deliver his people, and they are to be witnesses of his plea at Pharaoh's court (Exod. 3:16, 18; 4:29). They see the miracle of the spring at Horeb (17:5) and take part in the feast with Jethro (18:12). They witness the punishment of Dathan and Abiram (Num. 16:25).

A considerable number of men receive the title presbyteros, for Moses twice chooses out 70 "of the elders of Israel" to form a body representative of the representatives (see Exod. 24:1; Num. 11:16–30). The original ethnic office of elder took on a new function within the framework of the Mosaic covenant (cf. Exod. 18:13–26; Deut. 1:9–18, though admittedly the men assigned juridical duties are not described as elders; but cf. Isa. 24:23). This fact was later seen as a type of the rab. ordination, as is clear from the number 70 in the constitution of the Sanhedrin (see below).

(c) After Israel settled in the promised land, the elders controlled the local communities as a kind of patrician class (cf. Jos. 20:4; Jdg. 11:5–11; Ruth 4:2–11; 1 Sam. 16:4; 30:26). They were responsible for judicial, political, and military decisions within the towns. Their task, together with that of the judges, was to make sure that the requirements of the Mosaic law were kept (Deut. 21:2; 25:8, etc.).

At the same time, the title of elder also continued to be applied to the ruling class of the individual tribes (cf. 2 Sam. 19:11). They made the decision to send the ark against the Philistines (1 Sam. 4:3) and demanded the introduction of a monarchy (8:4). How much the kings depended on their goodwill is demonstrated by Saul's pleas to Samuel (15:30), David's ascent of the throne (2 Sam. 3:17; 5:3), Absalom's threat to it (17:4, 15; 19:12 = LXX 19:11), etc. (see 1 Ki. 12:6–24; 20:7–8 = LXX 21:7–8; 21:8, 11 = LXX 20:8, 11; 2 Chr. 10:6–13).

Finally, elders appear as representatives of the entire people at Solomon's dedication of the temple (cf. 1 Ki. 8; 2 Chr. 5), along with the heads of the tribes and families. Their critical, occasionally conspiratorial, attitude towards the monarchy is doubtless due not least to the threat that the formation of a royal civil service and the growth of dynastic power posed to their influence.

(d) The deeply rooted position of the elders is demonstrated by what happened after the monarchy ended and large portions of the population went into exile, for the elders once again appear as the guardians and representatives of the Jewish community (see Jer. 29:1 = LXX 36:1; Ezek. 8:1–12). But a change also took place during this period. Influential families supersede the clans and gain a position of eminence among the people as a whole. The heads of these families become an aristocratic ruling class (cf. Ezr. 8:1–14).

(e) At the end of the 3d or the beginning of the 2d cent. B.C., under the Seleucid king Antiochus III, we have evidence of a council of elders consisting of 70 (or 71) members, the Sanhedrin. At first, all the members generally are spoken of as presbyteroi. But the word is used more and more to designate the lay members of the Sanhedrin, who probably came from the patrician families of Jerusalem (cf. the NT, "the chief priests and the elders," Matt. 27:3, 12, 20). The "teachers of the law," who were increasingly taking over the actual leadership, were mainly orthodox Pharisees.

(f) After the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), the newly constituted Sanhedrin of Jamnia, whose function is restricted to the exposition and application of the Mosaic law, consists solely of teachers of the law. Consequently, the term elder came to be used as a title of honor for outstanding theologians. It implies, if not membership of the council, as least ordination. At the same time the presidents of the Jewish synagogues are also called presbyteroi. They preserve the traditional order with disciplinary powers.

NT 1. (a) presbeia occurs only in Jesus' parables (Lk. 14:32; 19:14) in the sense of a political delegation, embassy. The vb. presbeuō is used 2x by Paul: In 2 Cor. 5:20 it expresses the official character of the message of reconciliation that believers bring as "Christ's ambassadors" (see also Eph. 6:20). presbytēs refers simply to older men (Lk. 1:18; Tit. 2:2; Phlm. 9; cf. presbytis, "older women," in Tit. 2:3). presbyterion in Lk.

22:26; Acts 22:5 refers to the Jewish Sanhedrin, while in 1 Tim. 4:14 it means office of elder, which is conferred by laying on of hands.

(b) proistēmi occurs only in the writings of Paul. In 1 Thess. 5:12 it refers to those who labor in the church and "are over you in the Lord," i.e., a group exercising church leadership. In Rom. 12:8, one who exercises "leadership ... [must] govern diligently." Insofar as this person is listed alongside those who teach, exhort, show mercy, and the like, this word seems to designate an activity rather than an office.

In the Pastoral Letters, proistēmi is used mostly in a general sense for those who "devote themselves" to good works (Tit. 3:8, 14). Behind 1 Tim. 3:4, 5, 12 is the picture of a patriarchal head of the household or father of the family. If one manages this role well, one fulfills a vital qualification for being a church leader (episkopos [→ 2176] or diakonos [→ 1354]). In 1 Tim. 5:17 the participle proestōtes is closely linked with presbyteroi. This passage refers to presiding elders; it appears by this time that the church had an organized system of offices.

(c) kybernēsis (referring to those with gifts of administration) is used in 1 Cor. 12:28 in a list beginning with apostles, prophets, and teachers, and progressing to various charismatic gifts. The position of kybernēseis after the "gifts of healing" and "those able to help others" and before "different kinds of tongues" suggests that it denotes a mediating function of keeping order within the whole life of the church (cf. kybernētēs in the sense of helmsman in Acts 27:11; Rev. 18:17).

2. presbyteros is found 65x in the NT and is used in four main senses. (a) In Acts 2:17 (a quotation from Joel 2:28) the old as opposed to the young are meant (see also Lk. 15:25; Jn. 8:9; 1 Tim. 5:2; Heb. 11:2; 1 Pet. 5:1, 5).

(b) In general in the Synoptic Gospels and at the beginning and end of Acts, presbyteros designates the lay members of the Jewish Sanhedrin (cf. above). They are regularly listed after the "chief priests" (→ hiereus, 2636), which shows their close association with and dependence on the latter. The priestly members of the Sanhedrin are the real agents and instigators of Jesus' crucifixion (→ stauros, 5089).

Matt. emphasizes the close association of the chief priests and elders, generally with no mention of the teachers of the law (→ grammateus, 1208), while Mk. tends to mention the teachers of the law but not the elders. The choice of terms denotes the viewpoint of each writer. Mk. seeks to underline the part played by the teachers of the law in Jesus' passion, while Matt. emphasizes more heavily those who represent all Israel. He is the only one to use the expression "elders of the people" (21:23; 26:3, 47; 27:1). John speaks merely of Jesus' opponents as "the Jews."

In Mk. 7:3, 5, the tradition of "the elders" refers to the teachers and interpreters of the law (the Pharisees). In this case, presbyteros is a title of honor for the grammateus. In Lk. 7:3 elders refers to the members of the presiding body of the local synagogue, who approach Jesus on behalf of a Roman officer.

(c) Lk. is the first not only to use the term Christianoi (Acts 11:26), but also to introduce the presbyteroi in the same context as those who exercised leadership in the church at Jerusalem (11:30; cf. 21:18). On the analogy of the Sanhedrin, this presupposes a gerousia, a council of elders, in which the apostles (→ 690) play the leading role. Both are mentioned together in Acts 15:2, 4, 6, 22–23; 16:4. Lk. thus cites a continuity between the old covenant and the new in the structure of the church. He also uses the term in describing the Pauline churches (cf. 14:23; 20:17).

In Paul's description of the church offices in 1 Tim. 5:17, 19 and Tit. 1:5, presbyteros has become the title of honor for those who care for the members and the spiritual life of the church. Mention of them in conferring the gift of prophecy suggests the collegiate character of their work (1 Tim. 4:14). From this body those who "direct the affairs" of the church, along with preachers and teachers, are drawn (5:17). Here we find the root of the present-day presbyterian system of church government.

Tit. 1:5, 7 implies that the terms presbyteros and episkopos are interchangeable (cf. Acts 20:17, 28). Besides meeting general personal and moral requirements, they have the special tasks of exhorting and refuting objectors. In other words, they continue the juridical role of synagogue elders in the form of a presiding group (see also Jas. 5:14). Insofar as Titus is to appoint elders in individual churches (Tit. 1:5), we see the beginnings of a more hierarchical church structure.

The writer of 2 and 3 Jn. refers to himself as presbyteros (v. 1 in both cases). This may be a title of honor for one who bears and delivers the apostolic tradition, but more likely it refers to a man valued and respected widely in the churches of the day. This person's authority lies solely in the importance of what he says, in the power of truth and of the Spirit.

(d) Finally, presbyteroi are mentioned 12x in the visions of Rev., always as a group of 24 men (4:4–10; cf. 7:11). They wear white clothes and are crowned. They sit around the throne of the Almighty, separated from it only by the four heavenly creatures. They praise God for his saving acts in history (4:10–11; 5:6–14; 11:16–18) or are present when others sing God's praises (14:3). Occasionally one of them comes forward to say something (5:5; 7:13).

Although these visions suggest the idea of a heavenly counterpart of the office of elders in the earthly churches, thus elevating that office to a higher plane, it is not possible to verify this suggestion. The number 24 is probably derived from the leaders of the 24 divisions of Jewish priests (1 Chr. 24:7–18) or of the temple singers (25:9–31), who were called "elders" in later Jud. They may also represent the twelve patriarchs and the twelve apostles whose names are written on the gates and foundations of the holy city (Rev. 21:12–14).

See also episkopos, overseer (2176).

4566 (presbytēs, old man), → 4565.

4585 πρόβατον

πρόβατον (probaton), sheep (4585).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. probaton in its widest sense denotes all four-footed animals (esp. domestic ones) as opposed to swimming and creeping animals. In mixed herds the probata were the small livestock (esp. the sheep). At first the word was used only in the pl. (i.e., of a flock or herd), but later the sing. appeared for a specific sheep. The word could be used metaphorically as a term of abuse for anything inferior or stupid or as a positive descriptive word for someone who needed guidance.

2. probaton in the OT means primarily the sheep as a useful and gregarious animal (Gen. 30:38; Isa. 7:21; Amos 7:15) and less as a sacrifice (Lev. 1:2; for this the more frequent word is amnos, → 303). probaton (usually in the pl. probata) metaphorically denotes God's people (Ps. 74:1; 77:20; 78:52), under the king as poimēn (→ 4478), shepherd (2 Sam. 24:17). The essential point is the sheep's need of protection. Without the shepherd's guidance the flock is scattered (Ezek. 34:5–6), as each sheep goes its own way (Isa. 53:6). Since sheep wander about and fall victims to the dangers of the desert (Ezek. 34:5–6), they need to be guided by a skillful shepherd to the right pastures, if they are to survive (Ps. 23). Hence, the people of Israel in the desert, without a leader, are "like sheep without a shepherd" (Num. 27:17). The individual also, without God's guidance, has "strayed like a lost sheep" (Ps. 119:176).

Yahweh provides for his scattered flock by appointing shepherds such as the messianic king (Jer. 23:1–4; Ezek. 34:22–23), Moses (Ps. 77:20; Isa. 63:11). God himself acts as shepherd of his people (Ps. 78:52–53; 80:1; Isa. 40:11). By repeatedly calling themselves God's sheep, the people of Israel were acknowledging that, left to themselves, they were defenseless and that they needed to trust the guidance of their good shepherd, Yahweh himself (Ps. 23; 95:7; 100:3).

NT 1. probaton occurs 39x in the NT, mostly in Matt. (11x) and Jn. (19x). From the use Jesus makes of sheep in his parables and teaching, it is clear that his contemporaries understood how utterly lost a sheep is if left to itself without a shepherd's care (Lk. 15:4). A sheep's great need is loving, unselfish protection (Matt. 12:11). Without a shepherd a sheep is "harassed and helpless" (9:36), goes "astray" (1 Pet. 2:25), and is "lost" (Matt. 10:6; 15:24).

Following OT usage and likening his people to a flock of sheep without a shepherd (Mk. 6:34; cf. Num. 27:17; 1 Ki. 22:17), Jesus stresses that they are heading for certain destruction unless deliverance is forthcoming. In the same way Christians in 1 Pet. 2:25 are reminded that before their conversion they, like sheep, were hopelessly lost and at the mercy of false shepherds (cf. Ezek. 34:5). But Jesus is the "great Shepherd of the sheep" (Heb. 13:20), who is sent first to "the lost sheep of Israel" (Matt. 15:24).

2. The word sheep is also applied in Matt. to the exclusive band of disciples gathered by Jesus. As he sends them forth to preach (10:16), Jesus likens them to defenseless sheep sent by the shepherd into the midst of ferocious wolves. The sheep are under the constant threat and specter of dispersal by their enemies: "I will strike the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock will be scattered" (26:31; Mk. 14:27). This quotation from Zech. 13:7 is interpreted Christologically, with the implication that Jesus' followers are the true Israel and that it is God who will smite Jesus. The "sheep," who consciously or unconsciously have done God's will, will not be finally separated from the goats until the shepherd himself separates them on the day of judgment (Matt. 25:32–33).

3. In Jn. probaton denotes Christ's elect people, "his own" (Jn. 10:4). The sheep know the voice of their shepherd, hear his call, and follow him. As the good shepherd, Jesus knows his sheep, calls them, guards them from the wolf, and lays down his life for them (10:1–11). The shepherd comes forth from God in order to reveal him, while the flock is the church listening to his voice. When there is "one flock and one shepherd" (10:16; cf. 17:20–21), i.e., when at last Jews and Gentiles are gathered into one church under one Lord, then the purpose of Christ's saving work is achieved.

4. As in the OT, probaton hardly ever means a sacrificial animal (only in Jn. 2:14; Acts 8:32), this idea being expressed in the NT mainly by amnos and arnion.

See also amnos, lamb (303); poimēn, shepherd (4478).

4589 προγινώσκω

προγινώσκω (proginōskō), know beforehand, know in advance (4589); πρόγνωσις (prognōsis), foreknowledge (4590).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. proginōskō (pro, before, with the vb. ginōskō, perceive, understand, know) means to know or perceive in advance, to see the future. The corresponding noun prognōsis (attested as a medical technical term since Hippocrates and continuing even today) denotes the foreknowledge that makes it possible to predict the future.

The early Gks. understood prognōsis as nonverbal foreknowledge of a dream-like kind, which can however be apprehended and communicated by those who are clever enough to do so. It belongs to the realm of destiny. It is often both hidden from humans and open to them. It is capricious, like the gods themselves. Both gods and humans are subject to it. Its power controls the rise and fall of gods and nations.

Hel. thinkers, especially the Stoics, transformed the concept and understood it in a pantheistic way as an expression of the purposefully creative order of the divine world-force that includes both nature and humankind. Fate itself is subject to this order and can be a factor in the order. Divinity, destiny, order, and necessity become identical. Everything is arranged rationally and harmoniously, or at least in the direction of a development toward a harmonious consummation.

2. In the OT these two words occur only in the Apocr. proginōskō occurs only 3x. Two of these occurrences concern sophia (wisdom), conceived in personal terms: Wisdom knows in advance those who desire her (Wis. 6:13), and Wisdom has foreknowledge of signs and wonders (8:8). The other reference concerns the foreknowledge that the Israelites in Egypt were given of the destruction of the Egyptian firstborn (18:6). prognōsis occurs only 2x: Jdt. 9:6, of God's foreknowledge decreeing the fall of the Egyptians; and 11:19, of prophetic foreknowledge.

NT 1. In the NT the vb. proginōskō occurs 5x. Two occurrences are in Paul (Rom. 8:29; 11:2). Acts 26:5 speaks of people who "have known" Paul for a long time (cf. 1 Pet. 1:20; 2 Pet. 3:17). The noun prognōsis, foreknowledge, occurs in Acts 2:23; 1 Pet. 1:2.

2. In Paul proginōskō demonstrates the character of God's activity among humans. It assumes a personal relationship with a group of people that originates in God himself. Rom. 8:29 declares that those whom "God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son." In 11:2 the vb. expresses God's election and love of Israel, which opposes the idea of a final rejection of Israel.

3. According to 1 Pet. 1:20, Christ "was chosen before the creation of the world." In 1:2 the noun prognōsis denotes "the foreknowledge of God," which is said to be the ground of election for the Christians scattered throughout the world. Membership of the community in a differently orientated and partly hostile environment is thus grounded in the relationship that God takes up with his people as their Father.

In 2 Pet. 3:17 the apostle speaks of the advance knowledge of believers. They are aware that the Parousia is coming, despite its delay. The point at issue here is misunderstandings and disagreements over statements of Paul (cf. 3:15–16). They are, therefore, urged to watchfulness to counteract the danger of apostasy. Human foreknowledge thus gains a theological stress in paraenesis here.

4. In Acts 2:23 prognōsis characterizes the events surrounding Jesus of Nazareth before and up to his execution: He was "handed over to [his enemies] by God's set purpose and foreknowledge."

5. In sum, both the vb. and the noun speak primarily of God's action toward Christ or toward humans, witnessing to that activity as planned and directed. Any interpretation in terms of an impersonal constraint (e.g., destiny, fate, or doom) or of an autonomy that removes itself from the normal course of world events contradicts the NT use of these words.

See also pronoeō, perceive beforehand, foresee, provide, care for (4629); prooraō, see in advance, foresee (4632); proorizō, decide on beforehand, predestine (4633); protithēmi, mid. display publicly, plan, propose (4729).

4590 (prognōsis, foreknowledge), → 4589.

4592 (graphō, to write beforehand, set forth publicly), → 1210.

4596 (prodromos, running before, forerunner), → 4513.

4598 (proelpizō, hope in advance), → 1828.

4600 (proepangellō, announce before, promise before), → 2039.

4601 (proerchomai, go forward, advance), → 2262.

4602 (proetoimazō, prepare beforehand), → 2289.

4603 (proeuangelizomai), announce the good news beforehand), → 2295.

4606 (prothesis, presentation, display, plan, purpose, resolve), → 4729.

4607 προθεσμία

προθεσμία (prothesmia), appointed date (4607).

CL & OT Derived from thesmos (law in the sense of what is laid down), prothesmia signifies a time limit appointed in advance for completing legal, financial, or political transactions.

NT prothesmia occurs in Gal. 4:2, where "by his father" suggests a special guardianship of a child operating during the father's lifetime, which ended automatically when he reached a "set" age.

See also kathistēmi, bring, appoint, (2770); horizō, determine, appoint (3988); paristēmi, place, put at the disposal of (4225); procheirizō, determine, appoint (4741); tassō, arrange, appoint (5435); tithēmi, put, place, set, appoint (5502); cheirotoneō, appoint (5936); lanchanō, obtain as by lot (3275).

4611 (proïmos, early [rain]), → 847.

4613 (proïstēmi, be at the head of, rule), → 4565.

4615 (prokatangellō, announce, proclaim beforehand, foretell), → 33.

4616 (prokatartizō, get ready, arrange in advance), → 787.

4620 (prokopē, progress, advancement, furtherance), → 889.

4621 (prokoptō, go forward, advance, make progress, prosper), → 889.

4623 (prokyroō, establish, confirm beforehand), → 3263.

4624 (prolambanō, anticipate, take, get), → 3284.

4625 (prolegō, say before, tell ahead of time), → 3364.

4628 (promerimnaō, be anxious beforehand), → 3533.

4629 προνοέω

προνοέω (pronoeō), perceive beforehand, foresee, provide, care for (4629); πρόνοια (pronoia), forethought, foresight, provident care (4630).

CL & OT 1. (a) pronoeō (pro, before, with the vb. noeō, observe, notice) meant initially to observe in advance, notice beforehand, foresee. But in most cases it had the meaning of care, attend to, make provision for. For the noun pronoia, the temporal meaning of foresight or foreknowledge was likewise rare. The predominant meaning was foresight in the sense of forethought, care, providence.

(b) In Herodotus, however, pronoia designated divine providence, and a generation later it became a philosophical technical term. Even later, in Stoic philosophy, it became an important concept for describing the emanation of the purposeful operations of a world-force possessing divine status and working for the benefit of humankind as well as the perfection of nature. This word thus gained a religious significance and became an expression of religious piety. In fact, among the Stoics it was raised to the level of an indisputable dogma. Chance is ruled out, because everything runs its course according to an implanted divine law of development, which is itself divine.

The characteristics of this understanding of providence are twofold. (i) Providence is implanted as a law, as the divinity of nature, humanity, and history. Thus, the imperative is understood as an indicative. (ii) Everything evolves automatically in line with this providential power; everything repugnant is excluded.

2. In the LXX the vb. pronoeō occurs only 11x, mostly in the Apocr. Only in Wis. 6:7 is the vb. used of God: "He takes thought for all (small and great) alike." The noun pronoia occurs 9x, almost exclusively in the Apocr. The hoped-for human assistance of King Seleucus IV is spoken of in 2 Macc. 4:6. All the other passages speak either of God's care or provision: God's care steers the ship (Wis. 14:3); by God's provision the jaws of the lions remain shut (Dan. 6:19 = LXX 6:18; cf. 3 Macc. 5:30; 4 Macc. 9:24). The word also refers to God's eternal (Wis. 17:2), omniscient (4 Macc. 13:19), or divine providence (17:22), which redeems the nation through the blood of the martyrs as a way of propitiation.

3. This word for providence, therefore, has no corresponding equivalent in the Heb. OT. Similarly, the idea of providence did not take on any distinctive didactic stamp in the OT. Rather, the idea itself and its didactic expression stem from Gk.-Hel. thought.

4. The acceptance of the Hel. idea of providence into Jewish thought becomes particularly evident in Philo and Josephus. The attestations for pronoeō and pronoia are numerous. God's providence and provision become clear in the ruin of a persecutor of the Jews and in God's care for the world.

NT In the NT the vb. pronoeō is found only in Rom. 12:17; 2 Cor. 8:21; 1 Tim. 5:8. All three instances refer to human endeavor in goodness, honesty, and sincerity (probably with ref. to the LXX wording of Prov. 3:4: "And provide for good things in the presence of God and men"). The noun pronoia (Rom. 13:14) also means concern or forethought. In this case it refers to refusing to think about how to gratify the desires of the flesh. In Acts 24:2 the advocate Tertullus flatters Felix for his caring provision. Thus, neither vb. nor noun is used of God's caring activity.

The fact that pronoia, in the sense of a divine wisdom of the world, does not appear in the NT despite its representation as a central concept of the surrounding world is not accidental. It is a sign that the NT speaks an equally eloquent language by avoiding some Hel. concepts, as it does by accepting and recoining others (e.g., agapē, love).

See also proginōskō, know beforehand, know in advance (4589); prooraō, see in advance, foresee (4632); proorizō, decide on beforehand, predestine (4633); protithēmi, mid. display publicly, plan, propose (4729).

4630 (pronoia, forethought, provident care), → 4629.

4632 προοράω

προοράω (prooraō), see previously, see in advance, foresee (the future) (4632).

CL & OT 1. The vb. prooraō (pro, before, with the vb. horaō, see, notice, 3972) is attested in the spatial sense of seeing in front of someone since Homer and in the sense of foreseeing or knowing the future in advance (first in Pindar).

2. In the LXX prooraō is found only in Ps. 139:3 ("you are familiar with all my ways") of God's forward-reaching sight and knowledge; in 16:8 of keeping the Lord before one's eyes; in Gen. 37:18 of Joseph being seen from a distance by his brothers; and in 1 Esd. 5:63 of those who had seen the former house of God.

Philo used the word largely in the temporal sense of foreseeing dangers and in combination with pronoia, the providence of God, by which God foresees what is coming. In Josephus we find the added meaning to make provision for.

NT In the NT prooraō occurs 4x. In Gal. 3:8 Paul says, with reference to Gen. 12:3, that the Scripture (here personalized) "foresaw that God would justify the Gentiles by faith." The three other passages are in Acts. In 2:25, Peter quotes Ps. 16:8 (cf. above). In Acts 21:29, the vb. refers to what the Jews had "previously seen" when they saw Paul in the temple with Trophimus. In 2:31, Peter says that David spoke with foresight or foreknowledge about the resurrection in Ps. 16:10. The vb. is thus not used in the NT to describe the activity of God.

See also proginōskō, know beforehand, know in advance (4589); pronoeō, perceive beforehand, foresee, provide, care for (4629); proorizō, decide on beforehand, predestine (4633); protithēmi, mid. display publicly, plan, propose (4729); horaō, see (3972).

4633 προορίζω

προορίζω (proorizō), decide upon beforehand, predestine, foreordain (4633).

CL & OT The compound proorizō (pro, before, with the vb. horizō, to ordain, determine) means to preordain in cl. Gk. It is not found in the LXX.

NT The NT uses proorizō 6x to speak exclusively of God's decrees.

1. Paul uses the vb. in Rom. 8:29 together with proginōskō, foreknow (→ 4589) and prothesis, plan, decision (→ 4729), in order to ground God's call in his prior decree. In 8:30 proorizō is taken up again in order to specify the end to which God's dealings with humans are directed, namely, to justify those who are called and to give them a share in his glory. In 1 Cor. 2:7 Paul speaks of God's wisdom that he himself "destined for our glory." God's predestination is thus described as an activity of his directed towards the fellowship of humans with him.

2. Essentially on the same lines is Eph. 1:5, which describes how our sonship shared in Christ is grounded in God's predetermining love. In 1:11 the vb. is again used with prothesis in order to characterize the inheritance that Christians themselves are and that Christ has made possible. All of this derives from God's will, who "works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will."

3. In Acts 4:27–28 expression is given to the conviction that Herod, Pontius Pilate, the nations, and people of Israel were only able to do to Jesus what God had previously determined. proorizō is thus here intended to underline that even the sinful actions of people are drawn into the realization of the divine plan of salvation.

See also proginōskō, know beforehand, know in advance (4589); pronoeō, perceive beforehand, foresee, provide, care for (4629); prooraō, see in advance, foresee (4632); protithēmi, mid. display publicly, plan, propose (4729).

4639 πρός

πρός (pros), to, toward (4639).

CL In cl. Gk. this prep. took all three cases. In its basic spatial sense pros denotes motion from the presence of when followed by the gen. case, near when followed by the dat. case, and direction toward when followed by the acc. case.

NT 1. In the NT pros occurs only once with the gen. (Acts 27:34) and 6x with the dat., but 691x with the acc. It can have a spatial sense (e.g., Matt. 26:57; 1 Thess. 3:6), but the developed sense of mental direction or tendency followed naturally, referring to friendly (e.g., Jn. 6:37; 2 Cor. 3:16; Gal. 6:10; Eph. 3:14) or hostile (e.g., 1 Cor. 6:1; Col. 2:23) relationships. This notion of psychological orientation led to the use of pros to express the ideas of estimation (Matt. 19:8), purpose (1 Cor. 10:11), conformity (Lk. 12:47), and reference (18:1).

2. John 1:1b. Jn. 1:1a speaks of the pretemporality of the Logos, but even more so John implies the eternal preexistence of the Word, whose true sphere is not time but eternity. Having defined the relation of the Word to time, John specifies his relation to the Father, that "the Word was with [pros] God." Two meanings seem possible here. pros with the acc. can be regarded as equivalent to para (beside, → 4123) with the dat., denoting position: "with." Support for this view may be found in the NT parallels where pros with the acc., often following the verb to be, denotes not linear motion but punctiliar rest (e.g., Matt. 26:18; Mk. 6:3; 9:19; 1 Cor. 16:6–7, 10; Phlm. 13). This usage reflects the blurring of the notions of movement and rest in Hel. Gk., and the reduction of the dat. case and the extension of the acc. case in Hel. Gk. But one should note that elsewhere John uses para to express the proximity of one person to another (e.g., Jn. 1:39; 4:40).

Perhaps a better view is the sense that "the Word was (in active communion) with the Father." This seems to be the import of John's statement, whether or not pros bears a dynamic sense, for when pros describes a relationship between persons it connotes personal intercourse rather than simply spatial juxtaposition. Used of divine persons, pros would point to eternal intercommunion (though we should not read all of later Christology into this one verse).

3. 2 Corinthians 5:8. In 2 Cor. 5:6 Paul states that as long as he continues to dwell in a mortal body he is (spatially) absent from the Lord. Therefore, he prefers to leave his present form of embodiment and take up residence "with [pros] the Lord" (5:8). The prep. phrase may simply mean being in the presence of the Lord, for in itself pros contains no idea of reciprocal action. But if a believer's future destiny may be summed up as being "with Christ" (Phil. 1:23), something more is likely signified than simply a spatial proximity to Christ. An eternal human-divine relationship is being depicted in 2 Cor. 5:8, so that pros implies dynamic interpersonal communion, a settled mutual fellowship.

4. 1 John 5:16–17. In the context these two verses identify a prayer of intercession that is "according to [God's] will" and thus will be answered (1 Jn. 5:14–16; cf. 3:21–22), i.e., prayer for a fellow believer who has sinned. But John places one restriction on the scope of such prayer: He does not counsel intercession for a person who has committed a sin "that leads to [pros; lit., toward] death," since the granting of pardon or life to such a person is contrary to God's will. This prep. phrase may be rendered either "tending to death" or "issuing in death." It is difficult to understand "life" and "death" here as referring to eternal life and eternal death, since eternal life can scarcely be said to be given to an erring believer as a result of vicarious intercession, and John likely did not think some sins would not "result in" eternal death. It is best here to understand death as physical death, regarded as a penalty administered not by human beings (cf. Num. 18:22; Deut. 22:25–26) but by God (see 1 Cor. 11:30–32; cf. Acts 5:1–10).

On this view the apostle is encouraging intercession for any believer whose sin has not met with immediate divine judgment. As a result of intercessory prayer God will grant such a person the boon of further physical life and of renewed spiritual life—in spite of his or her open, willful sin. But he discourages intercession for any believer who has experienced God's judgment of death. Such prayer for the dead is contrary to his will. As for the identification of the "sin that leads to death," it may be the open and deliberate rejection of Christ (1 Jn. 2:22; 4:2–3; 2 Jn. 7; i.e., apostasy), blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Mk. 3:28–30), or deliberate, defiant sin (cf. Heb. 10:26–31; also Num. 15:30–31), such as premeditated murder or persistent hatred.

4656 (prosdeomai, need [in addition or further]), → 1289.

4657 (prosdechomai, receive, welcome), → 638.

4659 (prosdokaō, wait for, look for, expect), → 638.

4660 (prosdokia, expectation), → 638.

4665 (proserchomai, go to, approach), → 2262.

4666 (proseuchē, prayer), → 4667.

4667 προσεύχομαι

προσεύχομαι (proseuchomai), to pray, entreat (4667); εὔχομαι (euchomai), request, vow (2377); εὐχή (euchē), prayer, oath, vow (2376); προσευχή (proseuchē), prayer (4666).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. euchomai is a technical term for invoking a deity and so covers every aspect of such invocation: request, entreat, vow, consecrate; in a word, to pray. In Gk. culture prayer was often accompanied by an offering in order to make the gods favorably disposed. Here prayer takes the form of supplication. In earlier Gk. writings, the vb. is used almost exclusively with reference to tangible benefits; later the words have in view spiritual and ethical values or denote prayer for preservation from spiritual or moral harm. Characteristically, any assurance of being heard is lacking, for the Gks. did not hold to an omnipresent divine being. In the Hel. mystery religions, the person at prayer could experience the nearness of the deity; at such times prayer was replaced by silent rapture.

2. In the OT prayer is all-important because of that which characterizes and constitutes the nation of Israel, one's relation to God. The whole history of Israel is therefore permeated and borne along by prayer. At all important points God's people converse with him, even if specific words for prayer are not heard. Expressions like to speak, call, or cry out are often used instead. To indicate intense emotional involvement, vbs. such as to groan, sigh, or weep occur.

However urgently they prayed, people in the OT never forgot that they were addressing the holy, almighty God—an utter impossibility apart from his kindness and grace. This is shown by the frequent prostrating of oneself before God, which may indicate a customary posture in prayer (although there is also evidence of prayer being offered from a standing position). The parallel expression, to fall down on one's knees, is also used. Such phrases indicate the humility of mind that must characterize a person as he or she prays. In addition, the OT contains many expressions for prayers of praise and thanksgiving, along with other expressions such as to shout with joy, exult, and sing.

In the LXX proseuchomai occurs many times to translate various Heb. vbs. that mean to pray (e.g., Gen. 20:7, 17; 1 Sam. 1:10; 2:1; 1 Chr. 17:25; Ezr. 10:1; Ps. 5:2; Isa. 16:12; Jer. 7:16). proseuchē translates corresponding Heb. nouns for prayer (e.g., 2 Sam. 7:27; 1 Ki. 8:38, 45; Neh. 1:6, 11; Ps. 4:1; Prov. 28:9; Jon. 2:8; Hab. 3:1).

3. Prayer in the OT is characterized by being directed to the one true God, who is both the God of Israel and the Lord of the nations and of the whole earth, having revealed himself as such to his people (1 Ki. 8:22–53; 2 Ki. 19:15). Therefore, the Israelite always prays first as a member of the people, not as an individual (Ps. 35:18; 111:1), and knows what to expect of God. God's people know that he hears their prayers and answers them if they are in agreement with his will (3:4; 18:6; 65:2; Jer. 29:12). They thus pray with firm confidence in God (Ps. 17:6–7). They experience temptation and doubt, to be sure, but these are possible only against the background of such confidence.

The Israelites also know that in the eyes of a holy God there can be no question of their prayers counting as pious works that God must honor with his blessing (cf. the prayer of Elijah, Yahweh's prophet, with that of the priests of Baal, for whom it is nothing more than a technique aimed at manipulating their god, 1 Ki. 18:26, 29). They also know that God is a person, so they pray in a thoroughly personal and specific fashion, aware that they are actually speaking to God, not merely invoking some lifeless deity (cf. Gen. 18:22–33; 1 Sam. 1:10–11; Ps. 77:1–11). Such speaking to God can become a veritable wrestling with God, esp. in the case of intercession on behalf of others (Exod. 32:11–14; Num. 14:13–19; Deut. 9:26–29; Neh. 1:4–11). The suppliants may refer to God's promises, remind him of his saving deeds in the past and of his election of Israel, and appeal to his honor and his nature, which is of forbearance, grace, and mercy. In addition, the suppliants thank God for the miracles he has wrought in the history of his people (Ps. 105; 106) and ask for further guidance and continued deliverance from all possible distresses. Prayer and thanksgiving can cover all the material and spiritual needs of both the individual and the community.

As an aid to prayer mention is sometimes made of fasting (Ezr. 8:23; Neh. 1:4; Jer. 14:12; Joel 1:14; 2:12, 15), probably as an expression of that humble penitence before God that should lie at the root of all prayer.

4. Prayer is not restricted to any special place of worship but can take place anywhere (Gen. 24:26–27, 63), though of course it is esp. fostered in the early sanctuaries and later in the temple at Jerusalem.

5. The OT distinguishes between true and false prayer. True prayer is of the heart, i.e., it involves the whole person and means that one comes before God with one's whole being and in an attitude of humble submission (Jer. 29:12–14). False prayer, by contrast, is offered merely with the lips, i.e., with words and phrases that have no self-surrender, do not offer one's heart and life to God (except perhaps as a pure formality), and show no intention of fulfilling God's revealed will (Isa. 1:15–16; 29:13; Amos 5:23–24).

The OT also speaks of hindrances to prayer, which make an answer difficult or even impossible to obtain: e.g., disobedience (Deut. 1:43–45; Isa. 1:15–17; 59:1–2), lovelessness toward others (58:3–10), and injustice (Mic. 3:1–4).

6. Prayer also played a large part in the piety of rab. Jud. Of all devout exercises, fasting and praying were the most prominent, although the texts of prayers found at Qumran indicate a great variety of prayers, both as regards form as well as content. Pharisaic orthodoxy had been extending its systematization, from the closing years of the 1st cent. B.C. on, to include the piety of prayer. This applied not merely to public prayers offered in the synagogue, which included the ancient Shema (Deut. 6:4–5) and the Eighteen Benedictions, but also to private prayer. The prayers handed down from individual rabbis prove to be remarkably uniform. The idea of achieving righteousness dominated the Pharisees' piety and left its imprint on prayer.

NT In the NT, proseuchomai occurs 85x and proseuchē 36x, both esp. frequent in Acts. The simple vb. euchomai is found only 7x in the NT, euchē 3x.

