Introduction

The NIV Theological Dictionary of New Testament Words is first of all an abridgment of the popular New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology, edited by Colin Brown. This four-volume set is itself a translation of a German work, Theologisches Begriffslexikon zum Neuen Testament, published in the 1960s and early 1970s and edited by Lothar Coenen, Erich Beyreuther, and Hans Bietenhard.

But the present work is much more than an abridgment. The arrangement of the material as it occurs in NIDNTT has been completely revamped and new entries have been added. Let me explain.

1. NIDNTT is arranged according to English topics. Sometimes an English category is linked to a single Greek word, but many times two or more Greek words are discussed, all of which have nuances of the English word. One of the more controversial decisions regarding this abridgment was to rearrange the material so that each Greek word is discussed in its own place in Greek alphabetical order. As I examined the NIDNTT, it became apparent to me that there was often little discussion of the interrelationship of Greek words within a particular semantic field. That is, rather than being a discussion of semantic domains, NIDNTT is a discussion of individual Greek words that have been grouped together according to English meaning. It therefore made as much sense to discuss these words in their sequence in the Greek alphabet. (Note that this is the method used in the New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis, edited by Willem VanGemeren and published by Zondervan in 1997.)

That does not mean that readers no longer have access to the discussions of other Greek words with similar English meanings, since (like NIDOTTE) at the end of many entries are cross-references to other Greek words. For example, the NIDNTT entry "Death, Kill, Sleep" discusses four Greek words and their cognates: apokteinō, thanatos, katheudō, and nekros. At the end of each of these words in this abridgment is a cross-reference to the other three words. You are encouraged to look up all four of these words if you want to make a thorough study of this English topic.

2. In this abridgment, each of the Greek words has a number, according to the Goodrick-Kohlenberger numbering system. This numbering system (similar but superior to Strong's) was introduced in The NIV Exhaustive Concordance, published in 1990 (available now as Zondervan NIV Exhaustive Concordance) and edited by Edward W. Goodrick and John R. Kohlenberger III. (The same numbering system forms the basis of The Greek-English Concordance to the New Testament and The Exhaustive Concordance to the Greek New Testament.) Thus, if you use the New International Version (NIV), you can look up an English word in the Exhaustive Concordance, find its corresponding GK number, and turn to that number in the NIV Theological Dictionary of New Testament Words for a discussion of that word. An easier means of finding GK numbers is the soon-to-be-released The NIV English-Greek New Testament, by William D. Mounce. This book contains the running text of the NIV with Greek words rearranged underneath the English words, together with parsing information and the GK number of each word.

If you use a reference work that has Strong's numbers, conversion charts are available in the back of the present work.

3. Even though the initial lexical paragraph of each entry in this abridgment has Greek words written in Greek letters (always followed by transliteration), the rest of the entry uses only transliteration. Therefore you can read and understand this theological dictionary even if you do not know Greek. And you can easily find the cross-reference entries as well, since these too are cited both by Greek transliteration and by GK number.

4. Some material is obviously deleted in any abridgment. So what has been deleted from NIDNTT? (a) As a matter of policy, all references to secondary literature, including the extensive bibliographies, have been eliminated. These references only went as far as the mid-1970s (when the four-volume set was published), so these scholarly references are dated. If you want to know which works were consulted for any particular article in NIDNTT, you can go to the larger work for that information.

(b) NIDNTT also contained a number of full-length articles on specific topics, such as "Revelation in Contemporary Theology" and "Infant Baptism: Its Background and Theology." These articles fit more in the category of systematic theology than that of biblical exegesis; in addition, they too are dated. Thus, they have been eliminated.

(c) Some articles of NIDNTT discussed the pros and cons of various interpretations of particular passages of Scripture. In general I have eliminated these discussions and simply given the conclusions. Also, in NIDNTT the editors made various additions to certain German original articles in order to make their content more palatable to evangelical Christians; sometimes these added comments even contradicted the original. In this abridgment, each article is a homogenous whole rather than a hybrid.

(d) The discussion of the history of a particular word in classical Greek has usually been abbreviated more substantially than the rest of the original article. The important thing for the exegete to know is how a particular word was used in Hellenistic Greek, not what its presumed root meant nor how it was used in Homer, Hesiod, Plato, Aristotle, and the like. Furthermore, sometimes the authors of NIDNTT went into long discussions of Old Testament theology that had little or nothing to do with the particular Greek word being discussed; these too have been significantly shortened.

(e) In a good number of cases, the same Greek word was discussed under more than one English category, usually with virtually identical information in both places. Such multiple entries have been merged into a single entry.

5. The present work is more than an abridgment, however. It became apparent to me as I was working on this material that there were significant New Testament Greek words with deep theological significance that were omitted from the present work. For example, while NIDNTT contains a lengthy article on ginōskō, to know (1182), it has no discussion of two other Greek words that are also translated "know": epistamai (2179) and oida (3857). The present work now has entries for all three of these words. To give one more example: There is no discussion of the verb hypotassō (submit, be subject to, 5718) in NIDNTT, but anyone wanting to study the words used in the New Testament regarding the relationship of husbands and wives in Ephesians 5:21–33 or between slaves and masters in 1 Peter 2:18 will need to study this word. Thus, I have added hypotassō to this abridgment and discussed its meaning.

6. One final note on Bible versions and translations. All direct Scripture translations have been made to correspond to the NIV unless otherwise noted. Regarding the Old Testament, especially the LXX, all the references given are those of the English Bible, with differences between English versification and LXX versification noted when necessary. In the book of Psalms, however, where most chapters and many verses vary by one between English translations and the LXX, only the English chapter and verse numbers are given. Finally, if a particular Greek word occurs in the LXX and has no corresponding word in the Hebrew Bible or the NIV translation, the LXX reference is given and then is so noted.

This book would not have seen the light of day if it had not been for the help of others, to whom I am deeply grateful. Britt Dennison of Zondervan New Media arranged to have the present NIDNTT keyed so that he could make this book available on CD-ROM. Nancy Wilson developed the necessary macros to convert the CD-ROM material into a usable format for me to work on, and she designed the present work and did the typesetting. Stan Gundry, vice-president and editor-in-chief at Zondervan, gave me as senior academic editor the assignment of abridging NIDNTT and encouraged me as I argued for its rearrangement in GK number order. A special word of thanks must be given to Bob Buller of Loveland, Colorado, who edited and proofread this entire abridgment after me and offered invaluable help in making it clearer and more focused.

I pray that this present work will serve interpreters of God's Word to understand better the message of the New Testament and so help them in their preaching and teaching to give guidance to God's people for many years to come.

5	ἀββά

ἀββά (abba), father (5).

OT 1. In Aram. ʾabbāʾ is originally, like the feminine equivalent ʾimmāʾ, a word derived from baby language (like our "dada"). Already in the pre-Christian era the word underwent a considerable extension of meaning, replacing not only the older form of address common to biblical Heb. and Aram., ʾābî, my father, but also the Aram. terms for "the father" and "my father." In other words, ʾabbāʾ as a form of address to one's father was no longer restricted to children but was also used by adult sons and daughters. The childish character of the word ("daddy") thus receded, and ʾabbāʾ acquired the warm, familiar ring that we may feel in such an expression as "dear father."

2. Nowhere in the entire wealth of devotional literature produced by ancient Jud. do we find ʾabbāʾ used as a way of addressing God. The pious Jew knew too much of the great gap between God and humanity (Eccl. 5:1) to be free to address God with the familiar word used in everyday family life. The literature of rab. Jud. contains only one indirect example of ʾabbāʾ used in reference to God (b. Taanith 23b).

NT abba occurs in the NT only 3x: Mk. 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6. In each case it is used in calling on God in prayer. In the other Gk. literature of early Christianity abba is found only in quotations of these passages.

1. It seems clear from the Gospel tradition—indirectly confirmed in Rom. 8:15 and Gal. 4:6 (see below)—that Jesus addressed God in his prayers as "my Father." In so doing, he made use of the warm, familiar term ʾabbāʾ, used in the everyday life of the family. The only exception is the cry of dereliction from the cross (Mk. 15:34 par.), which is a quotation from Ps. 22:1.

(a) The invocation ʾabbāʾ is expressly attested in the Markan text of Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane (Mk. 14:36). But in the other prayers of Jesus recorded by the Evangelists (→ patēr, 4252), there is good reason to argue that the Aram. ʾabbāʾ underlies, either directly or indirectly, the various Gk. versions of his invocation of the Father.

(b) This use, unthinkable for the pious Jew, of the familiar term ʾabbāʾ in prayer denotes the unique relationship of Jesus to God. It expresses not only his attitude of trust and obedience toward the Father (Mk. 14:36 par.), but also his incomparable authority (Matt. 11:25–27 par.).

2. The early church took over the use of ʾabbāʾ in prayer. Note esp. Rom. 8:15 and Gal. 4:6, where Paul may have been thinking of the Lord's Prayer. In the oldest version of this prayer (Lk. 11:2–4), the invocation reads patēr, "[dear] Father," and suggests ʾabbāʾ as the Aram. original. Thus, when Jesus gave his disciples the Lord's Prayer, he gave them authority to follow him in addressing God as ʾabbāʾ and so granted them a share in his status as Son (cf. Jn. 1:12). Accordingly, Paul sees in the invocation "Abba" clear evidence of our adoption as sons through Christ and of the eschatological possession of the Spirit (Rom. 8:14–17; Gal. 4:4–7). The fact that the church, like Jesus, may say "Abba" is a fulfillment of God's promise: "I will be a Father to you, and you will be my sons and daughters" (2 Cor. 6:18; cf. 2 Sam. 7:14; also Jub. 1:24–25).

See also patēr, father (4252).

Ἀβραάμ (Abraam), Abraham (11).

OT The name derived either from the Babylonian Abam-rāmā, he loves the Father (i.e., God) or from the Aram. lengthening of the Canaanite name Âb-rām, the Father (i.e., God) is exalted. The popular etymology of the Heb. ʾabrāhām (Gen. 17:4–5) makes the name signify "father of a multitude."

1. The tradition of Gen. 11:27–25:11 depicts Abraham as the first of the so-called patriarchs, the ancestor of the later people of Israel. Admittedly, he continues to have the second place in the OT behind the patriarch Jacob, as is already indicated by the name Israel, which Jacob received and which was applied to the nation (→ Israēl [2702]), Iakōb [2609]). But a profound and far-reaching significance was attached to Abraham.

(a) Abraham stands for the prophetic experience of Israel. He is not only called a "prophet" (Gen. 20:7; cf. 15:13–16), he was also tested as a prophet (22:1), to see whether in his person God's people would esteem God enough to be willing to offer human sacrifice. Abraham held to the word of his God almost to the point of killing his only son. God then released him and the people of Israel, because he loves faithfulness and not sacrifice.

(b) Abraham was the recipient of a promise of land, which steadily grew despite the scanty beginnings. His life constantly appeared threatened by the lack of a son and heir (Gen. 15:2–3), and the latter was only born when Sarah was past the age of childbearing (18:1–15). In the panoramic perspective of the Pentateuch the theme of the land is not brought to fulfillment but looks towards fulfillment with the dying Moses (Deut. 34). Yet insofar as the land was never merely a physical possession but was constantly seen as a spiritual heritage (representing freedom, peace, and well-being in and with God), later Israel remained profoundly conscious of the fact that it still looked for the ultimate fulfillment of the promise to Abraham.

(c) The making of the covenant in Gen. 17 develops this theme and ensures that the land promised as a possession to Abraham and his posterity is not understood in a nationalistic way as personal property, but as the place of worship appropriate to the creator of the world (Gen. 1). In Gen. 17 the message is formulated that enabled Israel to survive even the terrible situation of national collapse and the far from glorious period of reconstruction under Persian rule.

(d) This insight was decisively influenced by the declaration that Abraham was called so that "all peoples on earth will be blessed through [him]" (Gen. 12:3). This declaration stands in the context of the promise of the land that looks forward to the kingdom of David (15:18) and relates these words, with their ring of power politics, to an antinationalistic perspective. Humankind, including Israel and the patriarchs, had fallen prey to the desire to be like God (3:5), to the mysterious couching of sin before the door of the heart (4:7), and to the need to establish a name for itself in a single kingdom (11:1–9). But the Lord of the world made a new beginning with Abraham, the man who unconditionally remained true to the promise (of the land) despite its meager fulfillment.

Alongside the instances where Abraham is mentioned in Gen., there is the particularly important and oft-repeated expression, esp. in Deut., "the land that the LORD swore he would give to your fathers—to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" (cf. Deut. 1:8; 6:10; 9:5, 27; 29:13; 30:20; 34:4). Amid the despair of the exile, this expression denotes the fixed point on which election depended: a solemnly attested promise of God that made it possible for the Israelites after the loss of the land and in the anxiety of being remote from God (Isa. 63:15–64:11; cf. esp. the complaint of 63:16!) to accept their sin as sin, because they understood God as the one who is dependable. Thus Abraham is the ancestor to whom the promise was the basis of his life; God counted this to him as righteousness (Gen. 15:6).

2. The special position of Abraham, already foreshadowed in this development, reached its highest expression in Jud. Because of Abraham's election, all who confess themselves as his descendants have a place in the coming kingdom of God. Rab. Jud. saw Abraham's life as a series of acts of obedience; according to it, Abraham had kept the whole law. By contrast, Hel. Jud., esp. Philo, stressed his trust in God's promises, esp. those about the final judgment and the kingdom of God, and attributed the beginnings of belief in a world to come to his time.

NT 1. Since Abraham was the ancestor of Israel, the descent of Jesus from him became of great importance for the proclamation of Jesus as the Messiah. It underlined the continuity in God's saving activity both for his people and the world (cf. the genealogy in Matt. 1:1–17).

2. (a) For the Jews in general it was a special title of honor to be known as "children of Abraham" (Matt. 3:9; Lk. 3:8), for according to the popular belief, Abraham's merits guaranteed Israel a share in the kingdom of God—an idea John the Baptist attacked. According to him, to be descended from Abraham was in itself of no value. Only those who set their hearts and minds on the coming kingdom of God, brought forth the true fruit of repentance, and by baptism anticipated the final judgment had any right to hope for a place in the kingdom. God could raise up from stones children for Abraham. That is why Jesus considered it so important to search for the lost sheep of Israel. He healed a "daughter of Abraham" (Lk. 13:16), cured the woman with an issue of blood who had been excluded from the community (8:43–48), and caused salvation to come to the house of Zacchaeus as "a son of Abraham," although he had been living outside the Mosaic law (19:9).

When Luke records that the apostles addressed their hearers as descendants of Abraham and mentions the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, he intends his readers to understand how aware the apostles were of their loyalty to the faith of their ancestors and how strenuously they had sought to win Jesus' people despite their unwillingness (Acts 3:12–13, 25; 13:26).

(b) "Abraham's side" (Lk. 16:22) means the pouch above the girdle made by pulling up the garment slightly. It suggests special care, as that of a mother loving her child whom she carries in the folds of her dress over her breast, or the place of honor at table beside Abraham (cf. Jn. 13:23). Jud. frequently expected intercession by Abraham, who lives with God (Lk. 16:22–31), as well as by Isaac and Jacob. The Jewish belief that those who have lived with God (e.g., the patriarchs) must remain alive after death was shared by Jesus, who justified it by saying that where God is, there also must be life (cf. Matt. 22:32; Mk. 12:26–27; Lk. 20:37–38.). The one who lives with God can die but cannot cease to live. It is from this angle that we must understand the resurrection of Jesus.

3. When Paul explains Abraham's importance, he is concerned above all with justification (righteousness) by faith. His exposition both in Gal. 3:6–20 and Rom. 4:1–13 is not a deductive proof in the strict sense. Rather, in the light of the revelation of Christ, Paul recognizes that Scripture had long before spoken of justification by faith.

(a) The details of the apostle's arguments about Abraham were partly determined by the ideas of his Judaizing opponents, who maintained that Moses' law was the definitive revelation that brought salvation. It followed that Abraham must have lived by it, even before it had been revealed at Sinai. By contrast, Paul maintains in Gal. that anyone who wishes to live by the works of the Mosaic law is under a curse (Gal. 3:10), since it implies that people must earn their salvation. Such persons do not permit God to be the God who alone can give humankind that which is good without qualification and save them (Rom. 7; cf. Gen. 3). As Paul sees it, Scripture shows clearly that Abraham was justified not by works of the law but by faith (Rom. 4:3; Gal. 3:6; cf. Gen. 15:6).

Scripture even foresaw the placing on an equal footing of the lawless pagan and the pious Jew through faith (Gal. 3:6–9), because faith excludes every basis for human honor. The Mosaic law was given to reveal that sin, in the last analysis, is directed against God and not against human beings. It thus prepared us for the recognition that our only hope is in God (3:24) and that Jesus is the promised offspring of Abraham (3:16–17). By abrogating the law, God opened to everyone the possibility of living by faith and so sharing the heritage of Abraham in all its fullness.

(b) In Rom. 4 these thoughts are expressed with even greater clarity. Abraham had nothing to boast about, for it was faith that was reckoned to him for righteousness (4:1–3). No one can earn wages from God (4:4–8; cf. Ps. 32:1–2). Following methods of rab. argument, Paul maintains that God's blessing does not result from circumcision, which Jud. regarded as a sign of the fulfillment of God's law and of turning away from transgression (Rom. 4:9–12). Abraham was, after all, justified before he was circumcised. Circumcision was simply a seal of the righteousness by faith reckoned to the Gentile Abraham. Hence Abraham is the father of believers who come from the Gentiles (4:16).

Paul then adds another example of Abraham's faith (Rom. 4:18–22). Just as we are dead before God and have nothing to hope for, so Abraham and Sarah's procreative power was dead. But trust in God created and creates new life. The point of comparison is the deadness, the lack of any prerequisite conditions, not the willingness to yield oneself.

Paul's view of obedience in faith was not always accepted in the early church. Jas. 2:14–26 pointedly shows that Pauline concepts were misused even by Christians. For some only the relationship of the soul to God was important; the deeds of our transient bodies were considered to be relatively unimportant. Against such a view it was necessary to stress that faith expresses itself in works and that faith will be judged, as with Abraham, by the way it works itself out in life.

4. This false security with which Jews and Judaizers alike deluded themselves by appealing to Abraham contributed in great measure to this attitude. The way in which it hindered faith in Jesus is the background to the discussion about Abraham in Jn. 8:30–40, 48–59. The first section (8:30–40) makes it clear that the newly found faith of the Jews was not genuine but only superficial, for they were not doing the works of Abraham (8:39–40). Abraham relied solely on God's liberating word, but they wished to silence that word when it stood before them incarnate in Jesus. They thought that descent from Abraham guaranteed their freedom, whereas in fact only Jesus and holding fast to his word could give them true freedom.

The second section of the discussion (Jn. 8:48–59) begins with the Jews' suggestion that Jesus was demon-possessed when he proclaimed himself as God's word. When Jesus promised eternal life to those who kept his word (8:51), he was, according to the Jews, blaspheming God. To them, he was a mortal man like Abraham and the prophets, who had died (8:52). But Jesus is greater than Abraham in the sense of being more than human. God had given him authority to grant eternal life. Jesus went on to say that Abraham had called himself happy in that he should see the day of God's word (Jesus) (8:56). Then comes the vital sentence: "Before Abraham was born, I am" (8:58). The Word of God was, is, and ever will be. Hence Jesus is truly eternal, but Abraham lived and died.

5. The descendants of Abraham in Heb. 2:16 are presumably all who live by faith as did Abraham—i.e., all who believe in Christ. In Heb. 6:13, Abraham is presented as a model of the believing patience and perseverance that obtain the promise (see also 11:8–12, 17–19). Salvation, however, does not come from Abraham and his descendants (7:2, 4–10). They remain its recipients. Abraham recognized one greater than himself, Melchizedek. In the same way, the Levitical priests were only temporary, for they too, as descendants of Abraham, gave tithes to Melchizedek. Hence the one who has been proclaimed a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek must be greater.

ἄβυσσος (abyssos), abyss, pit, underworld (12).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. abyssos is an adj. meaning bottomless, unfathomable. Used by itself with the noun gē (earth) understood, it means a bottomless place, hence abyss. In late Gk. the word stood for the primal deep, the primal ocean, the realm of the dead, the underworld.

2. abyssos occurs about 25x in the LXX, mostly to translate Heb. t^ehôm, the primal ocean (Gen. 1:2), "deep" waters (Ps. 42:7), and the realm of the dead (Ps. 71:20). Rab. Jud. also maintained the meaning primal flood for t^ehôm. The word also stands for the interior of the earth, where bodies that cause uncleanness are found.

NT In the NT abyssos is the prison for demons (Lk. 8:31; Rev. 9:1–2). It is closed, but the smoke of subterranean fires rises from it (9:1–2). It is ruled by a prince—not Satan but Apollyon (9:11). Weird creatures emerge from it (9:3–11), including "the beast" (11:7; 17:8). Satan is bound in it for the thousand-year reign of Christ (20:1, 3). Rom. 10:7–8, following Ps. 107:26, uses it to describe the realm of the dead. It is impossible for the living to descend into the abyssos.

ἀγαθός (agathos), good (19); ἀγαθοεργέω (agathoergeō), do good (14); ἀγαθοποιέω (agathopoieō), do good (16); ἀγαθοποιός (agathopoios), doing good, one who does good (18); ἀγαθοποιΐα (agathopoiia), doing good (17); ἀγαθωσύνη (agathōsynē), goodness, uprightness, generosity (20).

CL & OT 1. As an adj. in cl. Gk. agathos means serviceable, good, excellent. The subst. to agathon and the pl. ta agatha mean the good or good things that evoke a state of well-being; these may be material, intellectual, moral, or religious, depending on one's ideal for life. (a) In Gk. philosophy the concept of the good plays a major role. For Plato the idea of the good is the all-embracing, highest, and indeed dominant idea or form. The good is the power that preserves and supports, in contrast to evil, which spoils and destroys. Aristotle applied the good as a formal concept to the totality of human relations. In his Ethics he defines the goal of all action as the attainment of some form of good.

(b) In Hel. thought the ancient humanistic attitude to life was shattered and the predominant meaning of the concept of good once again became religious. According to the Hermetic writings, the salvation brought about by the deity (i.e., deification) is the good. Thus God is the good, for he alone is free from attachment to the material. In Hel. Jud., Philo names moderation, fear of God, and wisdom as the highest possessions by means of which the soul finds the way to God, the highest good.

2. In the Hebrew Bible the concept of the good is indissolubly linked with personal faith in God. The good is always a gift from God and is thus outside the control of human strength (Gen. 3:5). God is the one who is good. This realization is further developed within the OT in the course of a deepening relationship of individuals to God (e.g., Ps. 23:6; 34:10; 84:11). The LXX often translates ṭôb by to agathon and thus approaches the Hel. outlook. God becomes a person's highest good, and human beings become the recipients of this good in the sense that they acquire a right to "good" treatment, as long as they regard God as their highest good.

3. That God is the one who is good is made clear in his saving dealings with his chosen people, in his giving of the Mosaic law (Deut. 30:15; Prov. 28:10), in the historical events of the exodus from Egypt (Exod. 18:9), and in the conquest of Canaan (Num. 10:29–32). The Israelites found renewed reason for praising God as the one who is good by realizing that everything that comes from him is good, whether it be his work in creation (Gen. 1:18, 31 [note, however, that kalos is used here]), his word (Isa. 39:8), or his Spirit (Ps. 143:10), even if appearances seem to say the opposite (Gen. 50:20).

The constant tension between God's promises and their incomplete fulfillment was bearable for Israel because they recognized that God's promises in all their temporal fulfillments always look beyond themselves towards a final, eschatological fulfillment. The good that God has promised his people will come to its real fulfillment in salvation in the end times (see, e.g., Isa. 52:7; Jer. 32:41 = LXX 39:41).

Recognition of the goodness of God could not be taken away from the remnant even by hard, shattering, historical events like the exile. Yet Yahweh's goodness, his benevolent action in history, had been temporarily withdrawn from Israel. Wisdom literature contains striking expression of the way in which God's people saw their own limitation without illusion in the presence of the incomprehensible God. They recognized the uncertainty of all life's values and the vanity of existence (Eccl. 3:12; 5:17), and they saw clearly one's inability to achieve good (7:20 = LXX 7:21). But in the last analysis even this skepticism could not destroy the knowledge of the goodness of God.

Postexilic Jud. and rab. theology also held firmly to the fact that God is good. God's goodness brings salvation. It is revealed in his law, which is good. In carrying out God's law, human beings can now themselves do good and be good. Nevertheless, essential goodness can only be realized in one's personal relationships with God and one's fellow human beings (Mic. 6:8; kalos in the LXX).

4. The people at Qumran radicalized this unshaken confidence that good could be achieved into a strict asceticism and linked it with the command to hate forever the sons of wickedness. But here too—as consistently throughout the OT—it is the newly emerging songs of praise that are the genuine expressions of the sect's piety. They begin and end with the praise of God and his benevolent actions even in the midst of need and oppression. What stands out is what has been asserted in every period of Israel's history and expressed most completely in the Psalms (e.g., Ps. 16:2; 118:1), namely, that God himself is the one who is really and exclusively good.

NT agathos occurs 102x in all the different types of NT writings (Gospels, Acts, and letters) except Rev. (where kalos does not occur either). The compounds formed with poieō are rare; agathoergeō occurs only twice (Acts 14:17; 1 Tim. 6:18); agathōsynē occurs 4x.

1. Jesus clearly reaffirms the OT statement about God's essential goodness: "No one is good—except God alone" (Mk. 10:18; cf. Matt. 19:17; Lk. 18:19). But this does not prevent a natural application of the predicate "good" to the moral differences among human beings, who do good as well as evil (Matt. 12:35; 25:21; cf. Lk. 6:45; 19:17), an application that includes within it the goodness of God (e.g., Matt. 5:45; 22:10).

But this admission of normal differences and the demand for works of love (see Matt. 5:16, where kalos is used instead of agathos, and 25:31–45) must not be separated from Jesus' preaching as a whole. Jesus calls sinners to repentance. In this connection it is impossible to ignore the call: "Unless your righteousness surpasses that of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, you will certainly not enter the kingdom of heaven" (5:20); "be perfect . . . as your heavenly Father is perfect" (5:48).

2. Jn. 5:29 proclaims judgment according to works. But this statement too has to be seen within the context of Jesus' whole message (cf. 10:27–29; 15:5–8). It is only in Christ that we receive a new opportunity of existence. Insofar as we receive a share in God's goodness, we also can pass on good to others by doing good. According to 10:11, 14, Jesus is the good (kalos) shepherd who lays down his life and makes available the eternal good of redemption (here kalos is a synonym for agathos). In 1:46 the skeptical question posed, "Can anything good (agathon, i.e., salvation) come from [Nazareth]?" is most likely the utterance of a man who could not conceive of the Messiah coming from such an insignificant place as Nazareth.

3. Paul takes up the message of the Synoptic Gospels. He too acknowledges the relative difference between good and evil people. Within God's sustaining order of things, for example, civil authorities have as their task to maintain law and order and punish evildoers, not those who do good (Rom. 13:1–4). The concept agathopoios is similar: "Those who do right" will receive praise from the authorities (1 Pet. 2:14).

But the distinction that is justified among human institutions breaks down before God. The natural self is irretrievably in bondage to the powers of sin and death and has no right to claim the attribute "good." Even for those who are fanatical observers of the Mosaic law, which is good, it only works death for them (Rom. 7:18–24; cf. 3:20; 6:23; Gal. 3:10–13). But through redemption in Christ goodness overflows to the believer: "We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him" (Rom. 8:28).

In Christ believers are created for good works (Eph. 2:10) and receive a good conscience (cf. Acts 23:1; 1 Tim. 1:5, 19). This also underlies the urgent exhortations to bear fruit in good works (Col. 1:10), to seek to do good (1 Thess. 5:15), and to do it to everyone (Rom. 15:2; 16:19; Gal. 6:6, 10). Likewise, in several places believers are exhorted to "goodness" (agathōsynē; see Gal. 5:22; Eph. 5:9; cf. Rom. 15:14). Paul uses agathoergeō in 1 Tim. 6:18 to encourage the wealthy to do good.

Those who do good and "seek glory, honor and immortality" will receive eternal life (Rom. 2:7). Paul also maintains the concept of judgment according to works

(2 Cor. 5:10; Gal. 3:10), though comparison with Rom. 8:31–39 is not intended. The gift and the task of the new life are kept in tension, with both aspects fully emphasized.

4. In the remaining NT writings agathopoieō, to do good, is used only in 1 Pet. 2:15, 20; 3:6, 17; 3 Jn. 11; and in Lk. 6:9, 33, 35. agathopoiia, doing good, is employed only in 1 Pet. 4:19. Such right action is the visible proof that a person has really and gratefully grasped the new opportunity for existence as one's own. In 1 Pet. 3:16, 21, we read of the good conscience that the believer ought to demonstrate to the pagan.

In contrast, Heb. 9:11 and 10:1 lay their emphasis on future, eschatological gifts (cf. 1 Pet. 4:19). In the present age there is a permanent tension between God, who is good and who gives good gifts, and reality, characterized by sin and death, in which the Christian's life is caught up. It is in this perspective that the promise of Phil. 1:6 stands and has meaning: "He who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus." Therefore the warning of Gal. 6:9 also holds good: "Let us not become weary in doing good [kalos], for at the proper time we will reap a harvest if we do not give up."

ἀγαλλιάω (agalliaō), exult, rejoice greatly, be overjoyed (22); ἀγαλλίασις (agalliasis), exultation, great joy (21).

CL & OT 1. agalliaō, exult, shout for joy, and the corresponding noun agalliasis, exultation, are found only in the LXX, the NT, and writers dependent on them. They are later formations derived from the cl. Gk. agallō and agallomai, to adorn, glorify, revere, boast, enjoy. This is the basic human emotion of joy.

2. In the LXX agalliaō and agalliasis indicate the festive joy that expresses itself publicly over God's acts of salvation in the past and present (e.g., Ps. 32:11). The significance of these words soon extended beyond the sphere of public worship. agalliaō came to express both corporate and individual attitudes of thankful joy before God (cf. Ps. 9:14; 16:9; 21:1; 31:7; 35:27; 92:4), not only for past experiences of God's salvation, but for his faithful dealings that are still future (cf. Hab. 3:18), because they are ensured by Yahweh. The rejoicing embraces even the created universe, the silent witness to God's mighty acts (e.g., the heavens, earth, mountains, islands), which all join in the jubilation (Ps. 19:5; 89:12; 96:11; 97:1). Even God joins in (Isa. 65:19).

Under the prophets during and after the exile, Israel's rejoicing in God, even in wretched situations, broadened out to include anticipatory gratitude for final salvation and messianic joy (Isa. 61; cf. esp. v. 10). It was in this eschatological direction that the Heb. attitude of thanks and praise reached its profoundest expression (cf. Ps. 126:2, 5; Isa. 25:9).

3. (a) Loud, exultant rejoicing over God's acts of salvation in the past, present, and future continued as characteristic of the theology and the piety of rab. Jud. The whole aim of the Jew's life was to glorify God.

(b) By contrast, the Qumran community held that the day of salvation had already begun. In praise and prayer (esp. 1QH; 1QS 10:11) they rejoiced in God, who in his mercy had granted them salvation and given them insight into his secrets.

NT 1. In the NT agalliaō occurs 11x and agalliasis 5x. In the OT exultant rejoicing arises from gratitude and unshakeable trust in the God who has helped and is still helping his people Israel. He will do away with all want and distress in his final act of deliverance at the coming of Messiah. In the NT the rejoicing turns to the God who now in Jesus Christ has already inaugurated the age of salvation and will gloriously complete it on Christ's return.

(a) In the Gospels there is jubilation even before the coming of Jesus. Zechariah sang for joy when the forerunner of the Lord was born (Lk. 1:14; cf. vv. 67–79), and even the child in Elizabeth's womb shared in the rejoicing (1:44). Jesus spoke of devout Israelites who for a short time rejoiced in the light of John the Baptist (Jn. 5:35). In her song of praise Mary rejoiced that she had been granted a place in God's saving purpose (Lk. 1:47).

Jesus, the one who brought salvation, not only called on people to rejoice but joined in himself. The Beatitudes conclude with the exhortation: "Rejoice and be glad [agalliaō], because great is your reward in heaven" (Matt. 5:12; cf. Lk. 6:23). Jesus rejoiced because the time of salvation was at hand; it was revealed to babes but at the same time, since it also involved judgment, it was hidden from the wise (Lk. 10:21; cf. Matt. 11:25). Even Abraham rejoiced that he had a part in the day of salvation (Jn. 8:56).

The early church regarded itself as the elect of the last days because of God's saving work in Jesus Christ. It made his cross, resurrection, and future return the basis of its rejoicing, and thus interpreted David's joy Christologically (Acts 2:26; cf. Ps. 16:10). The Philippian jailer rejoiced with his whole family because he had come to faith and had been incorporated into the saved community through faith and baptism (Acts 16:34). When the early church believers broke bread, they sang with joy as they anticipated the Parousia of the risen Christ (Acts 2:46).

(b) Paul does not use this word group, but he is no stranger to the idea. He expresses it partly through the vb. kauchaomai, to boast (→ kauchēma, 3017).

(c) In Heb. 1:9 God himself addresses Christ in the words of Ps. 45:7: He anoints his Son with "the oil of joy," i.e., with consecrated oil as used at joyous feasts. In Jude 24 the church bows in praise before the one who is able to present us before his glorious presence "with great joy." Peter calls on the church to look away from its sufferings in the last days, for they are insignificant in comparison with the rejoicing that will break forth at the end of time (1 Pet. 1:6, 8; 4:13). In Rev. believers are summoned by a voice that cries, "Let us rejoice and be glad [agalliōmen] and give him glory!" (19:7).

2. agalliasis thus becomes the characteristic attitude of the NT church, whose public worship is full of joy, and of the individual Christian. We feel joy through the salvation achieved by Jesus Christ in the past, personally experienced in the present, and confidently expected in the future. Looked at in this way, the sufferings of the present are alleviated. For even though they weigh heavily on us, we have good reason to rejoice.

ἀγαπάω (agapaō), to love (26); ἀγάπη (agapē), love (27); ἀγαπητός (agapētos), loved, beloved (28); φιλόστοργος (philostorgos), tenderly loving, affectionate (5816); ἄστοργος (astorgos), without natural affection (845).

CL & OT 1. Cl. Gk. has a number of words for "to love"—the most important being phileō, stergō, eraō, and agapaō. (a) phileō (→ 5797) is the most general word for love or regard with affection. This vb. denotes the attraction of people to one another who are close together, both inside and outside the family; it includes concern, care, and hospitality, as well as love for things in the sense of being fond of something.

(b) stergō means to love, feel affection, esp. of the mutual love of parents and children. It is also used of the love of a people for their ruler, the love of a tutelary god for the people, and even of a dog for its master. It is less common for the love of husband and wife and does not occur in the NT, apart from the compounds astorgos (Rom. 1:31; 2 Tim. 3:3) and philostorgos (Rom. 12:10).

(c) The vb. eraō and the noun erōs denote the love between man and woman, which embraces longing, craving, and desire. Sensual ecstasy leaves moderation and proportion far behind, and the Gk. tragedies knew the irresistible power of Eros—the god of love bore the same name—that forgot all reason, will, and discretion.

There was also a more mystical understanding of erōs, whereby the Gks. sought to go beyond normal human limitations in order to attain perfection. The fertility cults, of course, glorified the generating Eros in nature, and the mystery religions had rites intended to unite participants with the godhead. Here spiritual and psychical unity with the god came into the foreground more and more, however much erotic pictures and symbols were used. Plato and Aristotle sought to raise spiritual love above the physical. For them erōs was the striving for righteousness, self-possession, and wisdom; it was the embodiment of the good, the way to attain immortality.

(d) Though the vb. agapaō appears frequently in Gk. lit., the noun agapē is a late word. Only one reference has been found outside the biblical and related lit., in a papyrus document that gives the goddess Isis the title agapē. agapaō is colorless as a word, appearing frequently as a synonym with eraō and phileō and meaning to be fond of, treat respectfully, be pleased with, welcome. When, on rare occasions, it refers to someone favored by a god, it is clear that, unlike eraō, it is not our longing for worth that is meant, but a generous move by one for the sake of the other. Such a notion is expressed above all in the way agapētos is used, mostly of an only child to whom all the love of the parents is given.

2. In the LXX agapaō is the preferred word to translate the Heb. vb. ʾāhēb. The noun agapē finds its origin here to translate the corresponding Heb. noun (the vb. occurs far more frequently than the noun). The vb. can refer to both persons and things and denotes both human relationships with each other and God's relationship with us.

(a) Love and hate represent two of the basic polarized attitudes to life. The phenomenon of love in the OT is experienced as a spontaneous force that drives one to something or someone over against itself. agapē means the vital urge of the sexes for one another (cf. Hos. 3:1; 4:18; Jer. 2:25; Ezek. 16:37). The powerful perception of marital love as an enriching gift derives both from Gen. 2:18–24 and esp. from Song of Songs, which celebrates the strength of passionate love: "Love is as strong as death, its jealousy unyielding as the grave. Its burns like blazing fire, like a mighty flame" (Song 8:6).

(b) The blood relationship with father and mother and the spiritual bond between friends is also described by agapē. Heb. does not distinguish between the ideas conveyed by eraō and agapaō. Thus, the friendship love of Jonathan and David for one another is expressed in terms of a communal fellowship deeper than love for a woman (2 Sam. 1:26; cf. 1 Sam. 18:1, 3; 20:17 in A).

(c) In a further sense, love lies at the root of social community life: "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19:18). Love in this context means devotion towards one's neighbors for their sake, accepting them as brothers and sisters and letting them come into their own. This aspect is illustrated by social legislation that is esp. concerned with the rights of aliens (19:34), the poor (cf. 25:35), and orphans.

3. The word love in the OT is used less commonly and with greater caution to describe the relationship between God and human beings. In this respect the OT contrasts with Gk. lit. in being far removed from any mystical thinking. In the OT humanity can never ascend to God; rather, all human thought, feeling, action, and worship are a response to a previous movement by God. Thus, the LXX prefers the simpler word agapē to the more loaded erōs.

(a) At the beginning of the OT stands not only the God who loves, but also the God who elects and who acts directly in nature for the sake of his people, with whom he has made a covenant (Exod. 24). The great deeds of Yahweh are the deeds of his history with his people, such as the exodus, the gift of the land, and the Torah. Righteousness, faithfulness, love, and grace are some of the concepts embodied in such actions. The people reply with jubilation, praise, and obedience.

God's judgment and grace permeate the entire OT. God holds to his covenant, despite Israel's frequent relapses, which draw God's wrath on them. The only ground for this is to be found in his electing grace and love (e.g., Hos. 11:1). Statements concerning this devotion of God to his people reach the level of suffering love (cf. Isa. 53, where such love is prophesied of the coming Servant of the Lord).

(b) The prophets elaborated on the theme of God's love as the main motif of his electing work. It was an enormity of unique proportions for Hosea, surrounded by the Canaanite world of sexual fertility cults and love feasts, to represent the relationship between Yahweh and his people as that of a deceived husband and a prostitute. Yet, despite the fact that Israel had broken the covenant and thus become an adulteress, Yahweh wooed back his faithless wife, the godless covenant people, with an inconceivable love (cf. Hos. 2:19–20).

Besides using this picture of marriage, Hosea also used the picture of a father to describe Yahweh's unfathomable love for Israel, whom he loved in Egypt and drew to himself with bonds of love (11:1–4). But Israel turned away. So Hosea pictured the struggle going on inside Yahweh himself as that between the jealous wrath of a deceived father and his glowing love (see 11:8–9). This description by Hosea of the passionate and zealous love of God is unprecedented in its boldness. The Godness of God does not express itself in destructive power, but in tender and compassionate love, which precedes any responsive human love and suffers through the faithlessness of his people (6:4).

The later prophets took over, with modifications, Hosea's picture of love and the theme of the beloved. Jeremiah spoke of Israel's first love in the desert and of its growing cold in the promised land (2:1–8). But Yahweh's love is everlasting (31:3 = LXX 38:3), and he will help the degenerate people again (cf. 3:6–10; 31:4). In Isa. 54:4–8 it is not the wife who has left her husband but Yahweh who has left his young bride, to whom he now again turns in compassion. One can even speak of Yahweh's political love, recognized in the return of the exiles from Babylon (43:4).

(c) Deut. expresses similar ideas. But whereas in the prophets Yahweh's love is the sole and incredible basis for his future actions in saving his lost people, the allusions to Yahweh's electing love in Deut. always provide the ground for exhorting Israel to love God and to follow his directing (Deut. 7:6–11). This theme is summarized in 6:5: "Love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength." Such love for God is realized in keeping the covenant law (Exod. 20:6; Deut. 10:12–13) and in loving one's neighbor (Lev. 19:18; cf. 19:34 as an example).

4. (a) In Hel. and rab. Jud. agapē became the central concept for describing God's relationship with his people and vice versa. God loves his people through every distress. Proof of his love is the Torah, and the believer reciprocates God's love by obeying his law, emulating God's zealous compassion, and remaining true to him, even to the point of martyrdom (4 Macc. 13:24; 15:3). Loving one's neighbor is the chief commandment to the pious Jew. There are even examples of commands to help one's enemy.

(b) The Qumran community believed it had been chosen in God's love, but this love referred only to the children of light. God loves the angel of light and hates all who belong to the company of Belial. There is an often repeated command: "Love everyone whom God elects, hate everyone he hates" (1QS 1:3–4; cf. Matt. 5:43–47). Since God's love is not conceived as having universal application, even love for one's neighbor is restricted to members of the sacred community.

NT 1. (a) In the NT love is one of the central ideas that express the whole content of the Christian faith (cf. Jn. 3:16). God's activity is love, which looks for a reciprocal love from people (1 Jn. 4:8, 16).

(b) It is significant that stergō occurs only 3x in the NT, once in the compound philostorgos, loving with devotion, in a section in which Paul emphasizes the need for love in the church by piling up words for love: "Be devoted to one another in brotherly love" (Rom. 12:10). stergō also occurs in Rom. 1:31; 2 Tim. 3:3 in the compound astorgos, heartless, without love. Moreover, erōs and eraō do not occur at all. The reason for this is presumably that the anthropocentric way of thinking that is bound up with these words does not correspond with the NT approach.

phileō, on the other hand (→ 5797), appears frequently, both by itself and in compound words. But it remains a more limited and colorless word. The main emphasis of this word group is on love for people who are closely connected, either by blood or by faith (e.g., Jn. 11:36; 15:19; 16:27).

agapaō and phileō are used synonymously in Jn. 3:35 and 5:20 (cf. 16:27) of the Father's love for the Son, and in 21:15–17, when Jesus asks Peter whether he loves him and in Peter's reply. In 1 Cor. 16:22 phileō is clearly used of love for the Lord Jesus: "If anyone does not love the Lord—a curse be on him. Come, O Lord!"

(c) By contrast, agapē and agapaō are used in nearly every case in the NT to speak of God's relationship with us—not unexpectedly, in view of the OT usage. Where agapē is obviously directed toward things (cf. Lk. 11:43), the very use of the vb. agapaō is intended to make it plain that love here is directed to the wrong ends, i.e., not toward God. Thus the vb. is used of misdirected love in Jn. 3:19 (love of darkness), 12:43 (love of human glory), and 2 Tim. 4:10 (love of the present age).

In the case of the noun agapē there is no corresponding negative usage in the NT. It is always in the sense of the love of God, either subj. gen. (i.e., God's love of us) or obj. gen. (i.e., our love of God), or in the sense of the divine love for other human beings that the presence of God evokes. This brings agapē close to concepts like faith, righteousness, and grace, all of which have their point of origin in God alone.

2. (a) In the Synoptic tradition the main emphasis falls on the preaching of the kingdom of God and of the new way of life that breaks in with Jesus himself. God sends his beloved (agapētos) Son, to whom to listen is to be saved (Mk. 1:11; cf. 9:7; Lk. 3:22; see also Ps. 2:7; Isa. 42:1). agapētos also figures in the Christological interpretation of Isa. 42:1 in Matt. 12:18. Jesus' activity among us reveals the mercy and love of God: Jesus himself is the one who truly loves, and he takes to himself the poor, the sick, and sinners. The word agapē is not found in the passion narrative, though the underlying thought of mercy and love as the way God intends to redeem lies clearly in the background.

The Sermon on the Mount is best understood when the Beatitudes are seen in the first instance as statements by Jesus about himself (Matt. 5:3–11; cf. Lk. 6:20–22; → makarios, 3421). Jesus is the first to keep the radical demands of discipleship and so fulfill the law. The command to love one's enemies (Matt. 5:44; cf. Lk. 6:27), the word of forgiveness from the cross (Lk. 23:34), and the promise to the criminal on the cross (23:43) all fit into the same pattern.

(b) In the Synoptics love for God is based on the twofold summary of the law (Matt. 22:34–40; cf. Lk. 10:25–28). Here too, through God's mercy, grows the new reality of love revealed in Jesus' ministry. His followers enter and share this and so fulfill the demands of the Sermon on the Mount. Discipleship, however, also involves suffering, and when disciples suffer, they are recognized by God (Matt. 10:37–39; 25:31–40). This demand indicates the hardship love has to face; it can only succeed in this world by way of suffering. If love cost God what was most dear to him, the same applies to us.

(c) This approach provides a different interpretation for loving one's neighbor. It is God's love, creating the new realities among humankind, that is itself the basis and motivation for love between people. Note again the twofold command to love as a summary of the law (Matt. 22:37–40; Mk. 12:29–31). The second half, love for one's neighbor, is also quoted in Rom. 13:9; Gal. 5:14; Jas. 2:8. Jesus decisively stepped over the boundaries of Jewish and rab. tradition in his radical command to love one's enemies (Matt. 5:43–48; Lk. 6:27–28, 32–36). Jesus, the Son of God, loves those who crucify him; in fact, he dies for them. Jesus' interpretation of the command to love in the parable of the Good Samaritan implicitly extends love to include everyone (Lk. 10:37; cf. 7:47).

3. (a) Paul stands entirely in the line of OT tradition when he speaks of God's love. agapē is for him electing love. Rom. 11:28 shows in particular how this word in Paul's thought links up with the Israelite election tradition (cf. 9:13–26). The "called" are the agapētoi ("loved," Rom. 1:7; cf. Col. 3:12). As in the OT, the motive for the election is God's love, which can also be rendered by eleos, mercy (→ 1799). This love becomes a revealing activity in Christ's saving work (Rom. 5:8; 8:35–39). The circle of guilt, wrath, and judgment is broken through, for in Jesus Christ God appears as love. Indeed this love is predicated of Jesus Christ himself (e.g., Gal. 2:20; Eph. 5:2; 2 Thess. 2:13).

The contrasting concept in Paul is orgē, wrath (→ 3973). Human beings under the law find themselves on a direct road leading to God's judgment; from this destiny God in his electing love rescues those who believe (1 Thess. 1:10). If God's action can be defined as love (cf. 2 Cor. 13:11, 14), then the great love song of 1 Cor. 13 is not merely a chapter of ethics, but a description of all God's activity. In place of the word "love" we can put the name of Jesus Christ. This does not mean that God becomes the "good Lord" who lets anything pass, for there is still the possibility in unbelief of judgment to come. But God's righteousness is realized in the fact that the beloved Son stands in the place of the unrighteous (cf. 2 Cor. 5:18–21).

The electing love of God is also in the background of Eph. 5:22–33, where the relationship between husband and wife is compared with the love of Christ for the church.

There are two points of contact here. On the one hand, there is the election of Israel (cf. Rom. 9); the church is the called-out body, the new Israel, which has come to faith in Christ. On the other hand, there is the OT picture of marriage, dating from the time of Hosea, with the implication of a relationship of fidelity and covenant love. What is true for the Christian community is true also for the individual and for marriage. God's love is able to overcome every kind of difficulty and infidelity.

Certainty of salvation consists in knowing that God's loving activity is stronger than any other power, including death (Rom. 8:37–39; 1 Cor. 15:55–57). The resurrection is the crowning act of God's love, in which is displayed his victory over these forces (cf. 2 Cor. 5:16–21).

(b) A believer is a sinner who is loved by God. When one realizes this, one enters the sphere of God's love and becomes loving. Hence, as in the OT, so also in Paul love for God and love for one's neighbor derive from God's own love. This love of God is poured into our hearts by the Spirit (Rom. 5:5; 15:30). Human response to God's saving act is described by Paul most often as faith or knowledge, but also as agapē (cf. 1 Cor. 8:3; Eph. 3:19; 6:23; 1 Tim. 1:14). Through the Spirit, knowing God and being known by him become the same thing. The same applies to being loved by, and loving, God (Rom. 8:37; cf. Gal. 4:9). Those loved by God become active in love (Gal. 5:6; 1 Thess. 3:6). Thus love is part of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22).

Paul's formula "in Christ" speaks of the existence of a believer in the sphere of God's love. When I am "in Christ" or Christ is "in me," this love has taken hold of me and is making me, a believing person, into a loving person (cf. Gal. 2:20; 1 Tim. 1:14; cf. also 2 Cor. 5:14 with v. 17). The law has been fulfilled because Jesus is love and has died for sinners. Insofar, therefore, as Christians love one another, they too fulfil the law. agapē is also a reflection of what is still to come (1 Cor. 13:9, 12–13).

4. (a) In John, God's nature and activity are illustrated with particular clarity by his use of agapē. That partly arises from the fact that agapē is used here more frequently than in Paul in its absolute form—i.e., as a noun with no gen., or as a vb. with no obj. God is essentially love (1 Jn. 4:8), and his purpose right from the beginning has been one of love. The love of the Father for the Son is the archetype of all love. This fact is made visible in the sending and self-sacrifice of the Son (Jn. 3:16; 1 Jn. 3:1, 16). For us to "see" and "know" this love is to be saved. God's primary purpose for the world is his compassionate and forgiving love, which asserts itself despite the world's inimical rejection of it. In God's agapē his glory is simultaneously revealed (cf. Jn. 12:16, 23–28). The believer, taken up into this victory, receives life (cf. Jn. 3:36; 11:25–26; 1 Jn. 4:9).

(b) Whereas Paul describes the way we turn to God as faith, John's term is agapē. The relationship between Father and Son is one of love (Jn. 14:31). In this relationship believers are included (14:21–24; 15:9–10; 17:26). They are to love Father and Son with an equal love (8:42; 14:21–24; 1 Jn. 4:16, 20). The continual oscillation between the subj. and obj. of love in John shows that the Father, the Son, and the believers are all united in the one reality of divine love; the alternative is death (1 Jn. 3:14–15; 4:7–8). John's typical phrase "remain in" can refer equally to Jesus or to love (Jn. 15:4–10; 1 Jn. 4:12–16).

(c) In John, love for other human beings is grounded even more clearly than in Paul in the love of God (Jn. 13:34; 1 Jn. 4:21). Love is a sign and a proof of faith (1 Jn. 3:10; 4:7–21). Without love for other believers there is no relationship with God. In this connection John takes up the command to love (Jn. 13:34; 15:12, 17; 2 Jn. 5). To love is to keep the law (Jn. 14:23–24).

5. (a) Love found expression for itself in early Christian circles by way of the kiss of fellowship, which was a regular part of the worship of the congregation (Rom. 16:16). In 1 Pet. 5:14 it is called the "kiss of love," though no details of this rite are known.

(b) agapē also denotes an early Christian ceremony known as the "love feast." In 1 Cor. 11 it is linked with a celebration of the Lord's Supper. Later it became separated from the Lord's Supper and was celebrated in its own right (cf. Jude 12; perhaps also 2 Pet. 2:13). This common meal had its central significance in celebrating and displaying the special fellowship that believers shared in their agapē. It also seems certain that this service provided an opportunity for congregations to give practical expression to their love in generous social action (cf. Acts 6:1–6).

27 (agapē, love), → 26.

28 (agapētos, loved, beloved), → 26.

29	Ἁγάρ

Ἁγάρ (Hagar), Hagar (29).

OT Hagar was Abraham's concubine and the mother of Ishmael. The two OT stories about her (Gen. 16:1–16; 21:8–21) recount the hostility of Sarah, the expulsion of Hagar, and Ishmael's ultimate home in the desert. They reflect the conviction that Israel was related to the warlike Bedouin peoples of Palestine and seek both to explain the connection and give the reason for the Ishmaelites' wild way of life. Their status as children of the slave-concubine is clearly inferior.

NT In the NT, Paul makes allegorical use of this inferiority to urge the superiority of the new covenant (Gal. 4:21–31). Hagar and her son represent the bondage of the old Jewish dispensation, which is in stark contrast to the new freedom experienced by those for whom Isaac, as son of the free woman, is the allegorical prototype. The Hagar of the allegory represents Sinai, because Sinai is in Arabia, where Hagar lived.

32 (angelia, message), → 33.

ἀγγέλλω (angellō), announce (33); ἀγγελία (angelia), message (32); ἀναγγέλλω (anangellō), report, announce, proclaim (334); ἀπαγγέλλω (apangellō), report, announce, proclaim (550); διαγγέλλω (diangellō), make known, proclaim (far and wide) (1334); ἐξαγγέλλω (exangellō), proclaim, report (1972); καταγγέλλω (katangellō), proclaim (2859); καταγγελεύς (katangeleus), proclaimer (2858); προκαταγγέλλω (prokatangellō), announce, proclaim beforehand, foretell (4615).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the vbs. of this group are largely interchangeable; the simple angellō is predominant. Regarding the compounds, apangellō tends to be a more official word than anangellō. di-, ex- and katangellō often indicate an elevated, ceremonious style of proclamation, though exangellō can emphasize the secret nature of what is being told, sometimes in the sense of gossip. katangellō can denote making a claim concerning oneself. The noun angelia can mean either message or command. The one who conveys the message is the katangeleus, herald.

(b) In general, these words refer to the activity of a messenger who conveys a message given to him either orally or in writing, and who in this way represents the sender of the message. The content of the message may be private family news or news concerning political events: war, victory or defeat of an army, the solemn proclamation of a ruler, or the accession of an emperor. Good news (angelia agathē) is also called euangelion (gospel, → 2295).

(c) Just as the messenger who brings the news stands under the special protection of the gods, so too his message can acquire a sacred significance. This is esp. true where it is associated with the cultic veneration of rulers and gods: e.g., where the messenger solemnly proclaims the successful completion of a sacrifice that brings blessing or the approach of a ceremonial procession. He proclaims the manifestation of a god, announces the reign of a new king, or recounts the mighty deeds of his god or emperor.

2. (a) In the LXX angellō appears 5x and means to announce. In contrast, anangellō and apangellō occur frequently in the sense of report, announce (e.g., Gen. 9:22; 37:5), proclaim (e.g., Ps. 19:1; 51:15), speak out openly (e.g., Gen. 12:18; 1 Sam. 9:19), and instruct (e.g., Deut. 24:8). diangellō, exangellō, and katangellō seldom occur in the LXX—9x, 12, and 3x, respectively.

(b) The OT is clear that where the lordship of the divine ruler is proclaimed and his mighty deeds made known, no room is left for proclaiming the lordship of other gods. The power of the Lord God is declared to all the world (Exod. 9:16; Ps. 64:9), as is his righteousness (Ps. 22:30–31), faithfulness (30:9), wondrous deeds (71:17), and steadfast love (92:2). He himself, the Lord, proclaims what is to come (Isa. 42:9; cf. 46:10), which idols cannot do (44:7–20).

(c) It is primarily the prophets, God's chosen messengers, who make known his saving acts among his people and in all the earth (Isa. 12:5), who proclaim his will (Mic. 6:8), and who announce what is to come (this last notion comes strongly into focus in intertestamental writings). In Hag. 1:13 and Mal. 3:1 a prophet is even called angelos (angel, messenger, → 34). Proclamation or announcement takes place at the behest of Yahweh or in the knowledge of his acts of salvation.

NT 1. In the NT angellō occurs only once (Jn. 20:18) and angelia 2x (1 Jn. 1:5; 3:11). The compounds occur more frequently, meaning simply to relate or speak: anangellō (14x; e.g., Acts 14:27), apangellō (45x; e.g., Matt. 2:8; 28:11), and katangellō (18x; e.g., Rom. 1:8). The other derivatives occur infrequently in the NT: prokatangellō (Acts 3:18; 7:52), diangellō (Lk. 9:60; Acts 21:26; Rom. 9:17), exangellō (1 Pet. 2:9), and katangeleus (Acts 17:18).

2. Usually the words in this group mean proclamation in a special, technical sense: making known God's activity, his will to save. This proclamation, the authority of which is derived from its ultimate source, enters deeply into the life of the messenger and makes total demands on him. When used in this way, these terms can scarcely be distinguished in meaning from euangelizō, proclaim (good news; → euangelion, 2295). Note 1 Jn. 1:5, for example: "This is the message [angelia] we have heard from him and declare [anangellō] to you: God is light; in him there is no darkness at all," as well as Lk. 9:60: "Let the dead bury their own dead, but you go and proclaim [diangellō] the kingdom of God."

(a) John uses the words of this group exclusively in a theologically pregnant sense, whereas euangelizō and kēryssō (preach, → 3062)—words often used in the Synoptic Gospels, Acts, and Paul—do not appear in his writings. John also prefers martyreō, to bear witness (→ martyria, 3456); what has already happened and been experienced is the subj. of witness. According to the Samaritan woman's words in Jn. 4:25, when the Messiah comes, "he will explain [anangellō] everything to us." Note too the prediction of Jesus regarding the coming Spirit: "He will tell [anangellō] you what is yet to come" (16:13). In these passages it is not so much a matter of a proclamation of an event or the heralding of a new age that is already dawning in the Messiah, as it is the revealing, the reporting, of "that which was from the beginning" (1 Jn. 1:1). Believers may go forward with confidence into the darkness of the future, because the full truth of the Word will one day be revealed to them by the Spirit.

The content of the announced message in Jn. is both information, or reminder, of the saving event and commandment. angelia can be thus rendered as message or command in 1 Jn. 1:5; 3:11. The difference between this and the dynamic, dramatic announcement of the new age, which is conveyed by kēryssō and euangelizō, is made clear in 1:2–3: "We proclaim [apangellō] to you the eternal life, which was with the Father and has appeared to us. We proclaim [apangellō] to you what we have seen and heard, so that you also may have fellowship with us." The message is that God is light (1:5), and therefore believers must not walk in darkness (cf. 1:7) but in love.

(b) Luke and Paul use the words of the angellō word group in a variety of senses, ranging from the simple sense of giving notice (Acts 21:26, diangello), informing (2 Cor. 7:7, anangellō), to the more theologically significant giving a report (e.g., Acts 14:27; 15:4), to the special meaning of command (Acts 17:30), confess (1 Cor. 14:25), proclaim, (e.g., Acts 4:2; 13:5; 26:20; cf. also 1 Pet. 2:9), and finally to the solemn, liturgical type of proclamation that results from the sacred celebration of the Lord's Supper: "For whenever you eat this bread and drink this cup, you proclaim [katangellō] the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor. 11:26). The proclaiming here refers probably both to the symbolic action of breaking the bread and pouring out the wine and to the recital of the passion narrative during the Lord's Supper.

Luke and Paul, in contrast to John, are dealing with the proclamation of a completed event or the announcement of one in the future. The subj. of the proclamation is new to the hearers (Acts 4:2; 16:17; 1 Cor. 9:14) and becomes operative by being proclaimed (Acts 13:38; 1 Cor. 2:1).

(c) The message of Christ is the message of the risen one. apangellō becomes, in the resurrection narratives of the Gospels, a technical term for witness to the resurrection (Matt. 28:8, 10–11; Mk. 16:10, 13; Lk. 24:9; Jn. 20:18 [angellō]). The word is here used in its original sense: A messenger conveys the news, which he or she has received directly beforehand from the sender of the message (the risen one, Matt. 28:10; Jn. 20:18; angels, Lk. 24:6–10). It is no coincidence that Luke uses the same word in his account of Jesus' transfiguration (9:36), in that the disciples do not pass on to anyone the message that they have seen Jesus transfigured.

(d) Jesus is proclaimed as the one in whom the prophetic promises (cf. prokatangellō and katangellō in Acts 3:18, 24; 7:52) have found fulfillment. Paul opened the Scriptures and explained "that the Christ had to suffer and rise from the dead. 'This Jesus I am proclaiming [katangellō] to you is the Christ,' he said" (Acts 17:3). It is not surprising, then, that the commission to proclaim is itself backed by a variety of OT quotations (e.g., Rom. 9:17, cf. Exod. 9:16; Rom. 15:21, cf. Isa. 52:15).

See also kēryssō, announce, make known, proclaim (aloud) (3062).

34	ἄγγελος

ἄγγελος (angelos), angel, messenger (34);
ἀρχάγγελος (archangelos), archangel (791);
ἰσάγγελος (isangelos), like an angel (2694).

CL & OT Cl. Gk. uses angelos for a messenger or ambassador in human affairs, who speaks and acts in the place of the one who has sent him. He is under the protection of the gods.

1. (a) In the OT angels are heavenly beings, members of Yahweh's court, who serve and praise him (Job 1:6; cf. Isa. 6:2–3). Yahweh is their creator, and angels never became autonomous or had cults dedicated to them in Israel. Sometimes they appear in warlike contexts (e.g., Gen. 32:1–2; cf. Jos. 5:13–15). They witnessed the creation of the world (Job 38:7), but as created beings they are not without fault (4:18; cf. 15:15). They can be mediators of revelation (Zech. 1:9, 11–19; 2:2–5; cf. Ezek. 40:3). Also mentioned are "destroying angels" (Ps. 78:49) and "the destroyer" (Exod. 12:23).

Special kinds of angels are the cherubim, who show traits of both men and animals (Gen. 3:24; Ezek. 1:5–12; 10:19–22; 11:22; Ps. 18:10 [Heb. 11]), and the seraphim, who have six wings (Isa. 6:2). In Dan. angels appear as powerful intermediate beings with personal names: archangels, watchers, and angels of the nations. Millions surround God's throne (cf. 4:13, 17; 7:10; 8:16; 9:21; 10:5–6; 12:1).

(b) We should distinguish these from "the angel of the LORD." He is a heavenly being given a particular task by Yahweh, behind whom the angel's personality entirely disappears. Hence it is wrong for the one to whom the angel has appeared to try and fathom his nature (or name, cf. Jdg. 13:17–18). This angel almost always appears to help either Israel or an individual. He is virtually a hypostatic appearance of Yahweh (Exod. 14:19; Num. 22:22; Jdg. 6:11–24; 2 Ki. 1:3–4). Only in 2 Sam. 24:16–17 do we find him opposing Israel. Sometimes it is impossible to distinguish between Yahweh and his angel.

2. In later Jud. popular belief in angels greatly increased. Provided that they were not regarded as independent and no angel cult formed, belief in angels was considered an extension of OT piety. Angels represented Yahweh's omniscience and omnipresence, formed his court and attendants, and were his messengers. They were linked with the stars, elements, natural phenomena, and powers, which they ruled as God's representatives. The individual had a guardian angel, and national guardians were set over the peoples, including Michael over Israel (Dan. 10:13, 21; 12:1). Groups of angels included archangels, powers, dominions, thrones, lords, and authorities.

In the scrolls of the Qumran community angels are a feature of a cosmic dualism. God has created two kingdoms, light and darkness, and each has a prince (śar) or angel set over it (→ daimonion, 1228). Under these princes are all human beings and other angelic beings (also called princes or spirits). The angels of light are often called "sons of heaven" or "sons of God." The "disobedient heavenly watchers" have fallen, and God has judged the angels. In the last days war between God and his heavenly warriors and the sons of darkness will scourge the earth.

NT angelos is found 175x in the NT. It is used of men only 6x (Matt. 11:10; Mk. 1:2; Lk. 7:24, 27; 9:52; Jas. 2:25). In general the Jewish concepts of the OT are taken over. Angels are representatives of the heavenly world and God's messengers. When they appear, the supernatural world breaks into this one. Because God is present in Jesus, his way on earth is accompanied by angels (Matt. 1:20; 2:13, 19; 28:2, 5; Mk. 1:13; Lk. 1:19; 2:9, 13; 22:43; Jn. 1:51; cf. Acts 1:10). At his coming again they will be at his side (Matt. 13:49; 16:27; 25:31; 2 Thess. 1:7). As Son of God, Jesus stands indisputably above the angels (Mk. 13:27; Heb. 1:4–14).

The concept of the guardian angel occurs in Matt. 18:10 as an expression of God's love for the "little ones" (cf. Acts 12:15). Angels are mediators of God's judgment (12:23). They act on behalf of the apostles (5:19; 12:7–11) and make God's will known to them (8:26; 10:3–8; 27:23–24).

In Paul Christ dominates the angels (Eph. 1:20–21; Phil. 2:9–11). No creature or elemental angel can separate us from the love of God (Rom. 8:38; cf. Gal. 4:3). The apostle attacked gnostic veneration of angels because it obscured the recognition of Christ's unique position as mediator (Col. 1:15–20; 2:18; cf. Rev. 19:10; 22:8–9). But he recognized various categories of angels (Rom. 8:38–39; 1 Cor. 15:24; Eph. 1:21; Col. 1:16). Angels took part in the giving of the Mosaic law at Sinai (Gal. 3:19; cf. Acts 7:53; Heb. 2:2); they take an interest in the fate of people (Lk. 15:10) and the apostles (1 Cor. 4:9).

Angels surround God's throne and fill the heavenly world with songs of praise (Rev. 5:11; 7:11). They mediate revelation, give visions (1:1; 10:1–11; 14:6–11; 17:1), and carry out God's judgments (7:1; 8:2–3; 9:1, 13; 11:15; 12:7–9; 14:15, 17–20; 15:1, 6–7; 18:1–2; 19:17; 20:1–3). On the other hand, Satan also has angels (Matt. 25:41; 2 Cor. 12:7). Peter (1 Pet. 3:19–20; 2 Pet. 2:4) and Jude (6) speak of the fall of the angels. "The angels of the churches" (Rev. 1:20; 2:1; etc.) are probably angels and not pastors.

archangelos (archangel) is found in the NT only in 1 Thess. 4:16 and Jude 9. The concept, however, may also be found in Rev. 8:2, 7–8, 10, 12; 9:1, 13; 11:15. The only names given are Gabriel (Lk. 1:19) and Michael (Jude 9; Rev. 12:7).

isangelos, like an angel, is found only in Lk. 20:36 (cf. Matt. 22:30; Mk. 12:25). The word describes the condition of those who have been raised from the dead, who are no longer subject to the natural conditions of earthly life, including marriage.

ἅγιος (hagios), holy, sacred (41); ἁγιάζω (hagiazō), make holy, consecrate, sanctify (39); ἁγιασμός (hagiasmos), holiness, consecration, sanctification (40); ἁγιότης (hagiotēs), holiness (42); ἁγιωσύνη (hagiōsynē), holiness (43).

CL & OT 1. In its origin, hagios is related to hazomai, which means to stand in awe of the gods or one's parents, to respect. hagios can be applied to the shrine of Aphrodite, an oath, the gods, and even certain people. Most of its derivatives are late and occur chiefly in the LXX. In contrast to hieros (→ 2641), this word expressed not something holy in and of itself, but the challenge to worship that issues from the holy.

2. In the LXX this word group serves predominantly to translate Heb. qādôš and its derivatives. The decisive element in the OT concept of the holy is not so much the awesome divine power. Rather, through certain places, objects, or occasions people enter into direct contact with the divine power. The basic idea is not that of separation (though this is favored by many scholars), but the positive thought of encounter, which inevitably demands certain modes of response (e.g., Ps. 24:3–4). hagios is a concept that posits ethical values. This ethic is the expression of the holiness of Yahweh in a world of both similar and different sacred practices. For example, sexual intercourse is in no way immoral. But compared with sacred practices, it is a profane act that therefore makes one impure for coming into contact with the holy (1 Sam. 21:4–6; cf. Exod. 19:15).

3. (a) The vb. hagiazō, to make holy, sanctify, is used more uniformly in the context of its setting than the noun and the adj. A man had to sanctify himself after he had been temporarily excluded from the life of the community by uncleanness (2 Sam. 11:4) or when he came into contact with God (e.g., via theophany, Exod. 19:10–24.; holy war, 1 Sam. 21:5; family sacrifice, 1 Sam. 16:5). One could also sanctify people (1 Sam. 7:1, to the priesthood) or things (1 Ki. 8:64; cf. Jos. 6:19) and thus place them at God's disposal. As Num. 6:1–21 shows, the case of the Nazirite is a special form of consecration.

(b) The OT makes reference to various things that are holy: e.g., bread (1 Sam. 21:4) or sacrificial flesh (Jer. 11:15). The psalmist speaks of various things as holy: Yahweh's temple (e.g., Ps. 5:7), his hill (3:4; 15:1), Zion (2:6), heaven (20:6), the height from which he hears (102:19), and his throne (47:8). Yahweh himself is terrible and holy (99:3). None of the gods is holy as he is, for none casts down the exalted and raises the humble as he does (1 Sam. 2:2).

4. (a) The use of hagios is vividly illustrated in Isa. After the thrice-repeated "holy" of the heavenly attendants Isaiah acknowledges himself to be a man of unclean lips, whereupon his guilt is taken away and his sin covered (Isa. 6:3–7). The prophecies of Isa. frequently contain the expression "the Holy One of Israel," which is used esp. in two contexts in earlier parts of Isa. (i) Instead of leaning on the Holy One of Israel, the people have relied on horses and chariots (31:1; cf. 10:20; 30:15). (ii) The sinful people, laden with guilt, have despised the Holy One of Israel (1:4; cf. 30:12–13) and will thus be smitten by him. But in Isa. 40–55, the Holy One, who is the Creator of the world and the Lord of the nations (40:25), will redeem Israel out of slavery like a kinsman (43:14). He was sufficiently removed from his people to punish them without bias, but he is also sufficiently powerful, after the punishment, to create something utterly new. Therefore nations will run to the Holy One of Israel, because he will glorify Israel (55:5).

(b) Another aspect of holiness occurs in the Deuteronomic formula "the holy people." Insofar as the people are holy to Yahweh, their God (Deut. 7:6; 14:2, 21; 26:19), the formula explains their separation from the practices and cult objects of foreign religions (e.g., 7:5; 14:21). The whole Torah is what distinguishes Israel from the foreign nations. Deut. 26:18–19 declares that through keeping the whole Torah Israel will become a people holy to Yahweh. The underlying thought here finds expression in the Holiness Code (Lev. 17–26). Note esp. Lev. 11:44, "Be holy, because I am holy" (cf. 19:2; 20:7).

(c) Jeremiah made little use of the word group. Note, however, Jer. 1:5, where Yahweh consecrated Jeremiah from his mother's womb to be a prophet to the nations. The words occur more frequently in Ezek. Special mention should be made of the phrase to show oneself holy before someone, which generally refers to the house of Israel (i.e., Judah). The clearest example is Ezek. 36:23. Yahweh's name has been profaned through the scattering of the people, and the exiles have contributed to its further profanation. But when Yahweh gathers his people from the four corners of the earth, he will manifest himself in them before all the nations as the Holy One, and the nations will come to acknowledge that he is Yahweh.

5. By far the most extensive occurrences of the word group are to be found in the cultic, ritual texts of the OT (Exod. 25–Num. 10; Ezek. 40–48; cf. also parts of 1 and 2 Chr.). (a) Everything that belongs to the realm of the cultus is holy—such as holy occasions (e.g., the great feasts, New Moons, Sabbaths, Year of Jubilee) and holy objects that serve the cultus (e.g., temple, tent and ark, altars and their equipment, firstfruits, anointing oil, incense). In the ritual of the oath, holy water is used (cf. Num. 5:17). The temple has holy money (1 Chr. 29:2–9, 16); the priests have holy garments (Exod. 28:2–43); the high priest has a breastplate with the inscription "HOLY TO THE LORD" (28:36 = LXX 28:32).

Sometimes holiness can be thought of almost physically: It is transferred by contact (Exod. 29:37; 30:29), and improper contact can be fatal (Num. 4:15, 20). Thus, it is the duty of everyone who takes part in the cultus to be pure (to sanctify oneself). Whoever is unclean must quickly take steps to purify himself. There are also holy people (priests, Levites, Nazirites) and the holy anointing of the Davidic kings (Ps. 89:20; cf. 1 Sam. 24:6). A distinction can be drawn between the holy and the holiest (e.g., the Most Holy Place in the tabernacle and temple). The sense of this distinction, however, is less a gradation of the holiness that derives from God than a gradation of human dealings with the Holy One.

(b) Three additional details should be noted. (i) Occasionally the term hagioi, holy ones, saints, stands for heavenly companions of God (e.g., Zech. 14:5). (ii) Only rarely are the members of the holy nation called saints or holy ones. (iii) On only three occasions is Yahweh's Spirit called holy (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10–11).

6. (a) Intertestamental Jud. introduced no real innovations into this scheme of holiness, apart from the fact that the Scriptures were now also called holy (1 Macc. 12:9). This change was revolutionary, for from now on the Scriptures were to form the new pivotal point for the system of holiness in Jud., thereby replacing the temple. This process was, admittedly, only completed in the rab. writings with their belief in the Holy Spirit as the Spirit who speaks in the Scriptures. Hence, those who obeyed the Torah were in particular regarded as holy, and holiness focused more and more on daily life.

(b) An important feature was the slow development of the term "the saints" for the members of the Jerusalem cultic community (e.g., Wis. 5:5; 18:9).

(c) In the book of 1 Enoch a new theme develops that qualifies the righteous as holy, who will be vindicated in due course (48:8–9, cf. v. 7).

(d) In Qumran the community saw itself as the eschatological, priestly community of the saved, in which the ordinances of purification that were originally obligatory only for the priests were made binding for all the members. The concept of holiness plays a big part in the Qumran texts. The community described itself as "the saints of his people" (e.g., 1QM 6:6), God's "holy people" (1QM 14:12), "men of holiness" (1QS 8:13, etc.), and the "remnant of holiness" (1QS 8:21). Thus there prevailed at Qumran a priestly concept of holiness in which the temple cult was replaced by special ways of obedience to the Torah, such as washing, cultic meals, and esp. observance of the religious calendar (1QS 9:3ff.).

NT 1. In general, two facts stand out regarding hagios in the NT. (a) God is seldom described as holy (Jn. 17:11; 1 Pet. 1:15–16; Rev. 4:8; 6:10), and Christ is only once called holy in the same sense as God (Rev. 3:7; cf. 1 Jn. 2:20). The concept of holiness is determined rather by the Holy Spirit, the gift of the new age. (b) The proper sphere of the holy in the NT is not the cultus but the prophetic. The sacred no longer belongs to things, places, or rites, but to manifestations of life produced by the Spirit. As time went on, however, use was made of the holy priesthood of all the saints. Hence cultic conceptions of holiness were again taken up in the early church.

2. (a) A number of passages reflect the framework of OT tradition: God's name is called holy (Lk. 1:49), as is his covenant (Lk. 1:72), his angels (Mk. 8:38; Lk. 9:26; Acts 10:22; Jude 14; Rev. 14:10), his attendants (Eph. 2:19; Col. 1:12; 1 Thess. 3:13; Rev. 18:20), the prophets (Lk. 1:70), and the Scriptures (Rom. 1:2), esp. the Torah (Rom. 7:12).

(b) The Synoptic tradition introduces the NT emphasis. Jesus is addressed by demons as "the Holy One of God" (Mk. 1:24; Lk. 4:34). This expression indicates that Jesus was endowed at his baptism with the Holy Spirit and was driven into the desert for forty days by the Spirit, like an ancient prophet or a Nazirite, before he performed his first miracle (Mk. 1:21–26). We probably find the same concept in Lk. 1:35: "So the holy one to be born will be called the Son of God." As Samson was a holy one of God from his mother's womb (Jdg. 13:7), Jesus was holy from his conception, i.e., filled by the Holy Spirit (cf. Mk. 6:20 of John the Baptist).

A somewhat different, but analogous, idea is evident in Acts 4:27 (cf. 3:14), where Jesus is called God's "holy servant." The inhabitants of Jerusalem rejected him, as they had always denied and killed the prophets in the past (7:51–52). In all these cases holy means belonging to and authorized by God. Hence, resisting Jesus is equivalent to resisting God.

(c) The first petition of the Lord's Prayer contains the words: "Hallowed be your name" (Matt. 6:9; Lk. 11:2). The vb. hagiazō appears only here and at Matt. 23:17, 19 in the Synoptic Gospels. This expression here (perhaps based on an ancient Aramaic prayer) means not only to reverence and honor God but also to glorify him by obeying his commands. This petition and the next one ("your kingdom come") are a cry from the depths of distress. From a world enslaved by evil, death, and Satan, the disciples are to lift their eyes to the Father and cry out for the revelation of his glory and kingdom, knowing in faith that he will grant it. The goal for which the Christian prays is not the sanctification of the world through God, but the sanctification of God through the world (cf. Matt. 5:48; also Num. 14:21; Isa. 11:9; Hab. 2:14).

3. (a) In Paul's letters those who name Jesus as their Lord are called hagioi, saints. This is not primarily an ethical expression but a concept parallel to "called" (Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:2), "chosen" (Rom. 8:33; Col. 3:12), and "faithful" (Col. 1:2); it implies association with the Holy Spirit. Christ is their sanctification as well as their righteousness and redemption (1 Cor. 1:30), and thus the one in whom they become holy to the true God (see 1 Cor. 6:11; cf. 2 Thess. 2:13; 1 Pet. 1:1–2). The power to do so comes from the risen Christ, who operates according to the Spirit of holiness (Rom. 1:4). Holiness is a condition of acceptance at the Parousia and of entering the inheritance of God's people (Acts 20:32; 26:18; Col. 1:12). In all these cases holiness implies a relationship with God that is expressed not primarily through the cultus but through the fact that believers are "led" by the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:14). As in the OT, holiness demands behavior that rightly responds to the Holy Spirit.

(b) Sanctification is like a growing fruit that results in eternal life (Rom. 6:19–22; cf. 1 Thess. 4:3–7). Spiritual worship is the offering of oneself as a living, holy sacrifice, acceptable to God (Rom. 12:1). An essential aspect of sanctification is love for all the saints (Eph. 1:15), sharing with them in need (Rom. 12:13), and not profaning the sacred by bringing disputes with fellow believers before secular authorities (1 Cor. 6:1–2). In Paul's judgment, a non-Christian marriage partner does not profane the Christian. Rather, the non-Christian partner is sanctified by the Christian, just as the children of the marriage are also sanctified (1 Cor. 7:14). Because it is God himself who sanctifies (1 Thess. 5:23), bearing fruit unto sanctification is all the more important (Rom. 6:22; cf. Phil. 2:12–16).

4. (a) Heb. presents a highly specialized aspect of holiness. Christ, as the high priest, is the one who sanctifies his people (2:11; 13:12) and officiates in a sanctuary not made with hands (8:2; 9:24). The division of Israel's earthly sanctuary (ta hagia) into the Holy Place and Most Holy Place (9:2–3) shows that ultimate access to the sanctuary has not yet been achieved. But Christ has entered the true, heavenly sanctuary once for all with the gift of his blood and has achieved eternal redemption (9:12; 10:14). His self-offering makes obsolete the animal sacrifices of the temple. By the will of God "we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (10:10).

But, Heb. goes on to warn us, "since we have confidence to enter the Most Holy Place" (10:19), we must not defile the blood of the covenant, through which we have been sanctified; "for we know him who said, 'It is mine to avenge; I will repay,' and again, 'The Lord will judge his people'" (10:30; cf. Deut. 32:35–36). Therefore we are to strive for peace with everyone and for the holiness without which no one can see God (12:14). Conversely, holy fellow believers (3:1) are to recognize the discipline that God applies as a help, for God disciplines in order that we may win a share in his holiness (hagiotēs, 12:10; cf. Prov. 3:11–12).

(b) This concept is particularly developed in 1 Pet. To the idea of "the sanctifying work of the Spirit" (1:2) there is added the blunt warning, "As obedient children, do not conform to the evil desires you had when you lived in ignorance. But just as he who called you is holy, so be holy in all you do; for it is written, 'Be holy, because I am holy'" (1:14–16; cf. Lev. 19:2). This theme is continued in 1 Pet. 2:5: "You also, like living stones, are being built into a spiritual house to be a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (cf. 2:9–10). Thus the dynamic of the outpouring of the Spirit is here restated in terms of the holy functions of the priesthood.

(c) Believers are again seen as priests in Rev. 1:6; 5:10; 20:6. But Rev. also depicts the future abode of Christians as the holy city, the new Jerusalem (21:2, 10; 22:19). The most significant feature of ancient Jerusalem was the fact that it contained the temple, the focal point of meeting between God and humankind. But in the new Jerusalem there is no temple, "because the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb are its temple" (21:22). These pictures present both a continuity with the divinely appointed institutions of Israel and a radical break. The historical institutions in Israel are now obsolete. Yet the use of the concepts of priest, temple, and holy city in this dynamic and spiritual way affords a perspective to the suffering, persecuted church to see its situation and role in terms of God's historical purposes for his people.

(d) In the Fourth Gospel the adj. hagios is used only of the Father (Jn. 17:11), the Spirit (1:33; 14:26; 20:22), and the Son (6:69). This latter passage occurs in Jn.'s account of Peter's confession. In Jn. Peter does not confess Jesus as the Christ (cf. Matt. 16:16; Mk. 8:29; Lk. 9:20; though cf. Jn. 1:41; 4:25; 7:41; 11:27; 20:31), with all its Jewish overtones, but as the "Holy One of God." This expression is rare, occurring elsewhere in the NT only in the address of the demoniac at Capernaum (Mk. 1:24; Lk. 4:34). The fact that John uses the epithet "holy" elsewhere only of the Father and the Spirit sets Jesus with God and not humankind. The expression "the Holy One" occurs in the only instance of hagios in the Johannine letters: "But you have an anointing from the Holy One, and all of you know the truth" (1 Jn. 2:20). The reference is evidently to the Holy Spirit, but the context links this closely with the Father and the Son (cf. 2:22–27).

The vb. hagiazō occurs 4x in Jn. and is absent from the Johannine letters. In the first instance it denotes the special consecration of Jesus to do the will and work of the Father (Jn. 10:36). The other three occur in Jesus' high priestly prayer: "Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth.... For them I sanctify myself, that they too may be truly sanctified" (17:17, 19). In the background here is the use of hagiazō in the LXX for the sanctifying of priests (e.g., Exod. 28:41; 29:1, 21) and sacrifices (e.g., 28:38; Num. 18:9). In context here it surely refers to Jesus' own sacrificial death, which he does for the sake of his disciples. The ultimate goal of his cross is that they might be set apart for God and thus be able to live according to God's truth.

ἀγνοέω (agnoeō), not know, be ignorant (51); ἀγνόημα (agnoēma), error (52); ἄγνοια (agnoia), ignorance (53); ἀγνωσία (agnōsia), lack of knowledge (57); ἄγνωστος (agnōstos), unknown (58).

CL & OT agnoeō means not to know and is used against the full background of the Gk. concept of knowledge (→ ginōskō, 1182). It does not refer merely to something not grasped by the mind, but can also mean to make a mistake or be in error. Similarly, agnoēma (Heb. 9:7 is its only NT occurrence) is used not merely for error but also for an offense done in ignorance. agnoia similarly refers not only to not knowing, but also to ignorance or lack of education. The positive opposites are gnōsis ("knowledge") and sophia (→ 5053). The Stoics considered ignorance to be the root of all evil and sometimes identified the two. If someone was living without knowledge, it was either because that person had not received the revelation or had refused it.

In legal settings agnoia means ignorance of the law (e.g., Lev. 22:14). The LXX uses agnoia concretely in the sense of agnoēma, also meaning (unintentional) guilt, offense, error (e.g., 5:18). agnōstos means both unknowable and unknown.

NT 1. (a) agnoeō means first not to understand, in the sense of not being able to grasp something (Mk. 9:32; Lk. 9:45, in each case of a passion prediction by Jesus).

(b) It also means not to know, not to be informed (e.g., 2 Pet. 2:12, where the godless blaspheme in matters they do not know). It is esp. prominent in the phrase "I do not want you to be unaware," i.e., uninformed (Rom. 1:13; 11:25; 1 Cor. 10:1; 12:1; 2 Cor. 1:8; 1 Thess. 4:13), always with the address "brothers." Through this expression Paul stresses his desire to end his readers' lack of knowledge. agnoeō is used also in the formula "or don't you know?" (Rom. 6:3; cf. 7:1), with the force of failing to realize. Here a present knowledge is presupposed that implies a need to respond to the gospel.

These passages never mean merely a lack of intellectual knowledge that can be removed by a neutral statement of facts. Rather, agnoeō is used in the OT sense. This lack of knowledge can be removed only by knowledge intimately linked with recognition and acceptance by God.

(c) agnoeō denotes ignorance that leads one astray. In 1 Tim. 1:13 Paul, looking back on his past, says, "I was shown mercy because I acted in ignorance and unbelief." Ignorance marked out Paul's life, leading him astray, until his conversion to the Christian faith, which included proper knowledge. The same shade of meaning is found in Heb. 5:2 where, using OT language, the author contrasts unintentional sins with deliberate ones. agnoeō is expanded here from unknowing to unwanted, so that it denotes sins for which there is atonement in contrast to those for which there is none.

(d) agnoeō means also a failure to know in the sense of a disobedient closing of the mind to the revealing word of God (Acts 13:27; Rom. 10:3). This is not simply a lack of knowledge, but a false understanding. Ignorance and disobedience are here used as parallels; ignorance is the guilty turning away from the revelation of God in Jesus Christ. The guilty ignorance of the Jews can only be dealt with by God himself as he forgives and reveals himself in the gospel. This passage reflects the OT link between knowledge and right conduct. One should probably include 1 Cor. 14:38 in this connection. To reject a command is to reject God, with the implied corollary that this involves nonrecognition by not only Paul but by God himself.

(e) Finally, agnoeō means to be unknown. In 2 Cor. 6:9 Paul says that he is "unknown," i.e., to the world, for he is not included among its great ones. On the other hand, he is well known to God and the church (see also Gal. 1:22).

2. (a) In Acts 3:17 agnoia is used in the juridical sense of the LXX. The guilt of the Jews is, from the viewpoint of the subj., a sin arising from ignorance. On the other hand, the Stoic-Jewish sense is found in the other cases of its use, among them being some that betray gnostic usage (→ ginōskō, 1182). Acts 17:30, for example, refers to heathenism (cf. 14:16; Rom. 3:25). Since the period of humankind before the decisive revelation of God in Christ was characterized by ignorance, "God overlooked such ignorance, but now he commands all people everywhere to repent" (Acts 17:30).

(b) agnōstos in Acts 17:23 means simply unknown in the inscription "TO AN UNKNOWN GOD" on an altar at Athens. Paul addressed the Athenians as those who had until then honored the unknown God without their being aware of it, but he was now proclaiming this God as the revealed God, the true and only God, the God of the OT and of salvation history. Paul's mention of ignorance was not intended to justify or excuse the pagans; it was to introduce them to God's saving purposes and to lead them to the joy of repentance.

ἁγνός (hagnos), pure, holy (54); ἁγνίζω (hagnizō), purify (49); ἁγνεία (hagneia), purity, chastity, propriety (48); ἁγνισμός (hagnismos), purification (50); ἁγνότης (hagnotēs), purity, sincerity (55); ἁγνῶς (hagnōs), sincerely (56).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hagnos originally meant that which inspires (religious) awe. It refers primarily to an attribute of deity, then to things having some relation to the deity. It thus comes to mean holy, in the sense of pure. Ritual purity is in mind here, e.g., avoidance of blood-guilt or of touching corpses. Since to the primitive mind sexual intercourse also makes a person ritually unclean, hagnos came to mean chaste. This cultic term was then transferred to the sphere of morality and is frequently used in the Hel. period in the sense of innocent, morally faultless.

From hagnos came the vb. hagnizō, to purify (by means of expiatory rites), and the noun hagnismos, purification; both words are limited to the cultic sphere. hagneia is used of cultic purity, chastity, purity of mind. hagnotēs (unknown outside the NT) means purity, moral blamelessness.

2. (a) In the LXX hagnos occurs 11x (the word normally used for cultic purity is katharos, → 2754). In distinction from hagios (holy, set apart for God, → 41) and katharos, the nuance of hagnos is one of integrity (e.g., Ps. 12:6; Prov. 20:9). It is significant that hagnos is found chiefly in the wisdom literature.

(b) More common in the LXX is the vb. hagnizō, which describes measures taken to achieve eligibility for the cult. Whereas hagios always includes the thought of the power and might of that which is holy, hagnizō expresses the removal of what is not seemly (e.g., Exod. 19:10, washing of garments; Num. 6:3, abstinence from alcohol), esp. in the sense to purify oneself from sin or uncleanness (e.g., Num. 8:21; 19:12). Likewise, hagneia refers to ritual purity (e.g., Num. 6:2–21; 2 Chr. 30:19; 1 Macc. 14:36).

NT 1. In the NT only hagnizō and hagnismos (only at Acts 21:26) occur in their proper meaning, ritual purification—in connection with the Jews before the Passover (Jn. 11:55) and with Paul's vow in Jerusalem (Acts 21:24–26; 24:18). In Jas. 4:8; 1 Pet. 1:22; 1 Jn. 3:3, on the other hand, hagnizō refers to moral purification.

hagnos occurs only in NT letters, where Hel. influence is noticeable. It means: (a) chaste (2 Cor. 11:2; Tit. 2:5); (b) innocent with regard to something (2 Cor. 7:11); and (c) morally pure, upright—said of Christ (1 Jn. 3:3), of a Christian's behavior (Phil. 4:8; 1 Tim. 5:22; 1 Pet. 3:2), and of wisdom (Jas. 3:17). The adv. hagnōs refers to sincerity in Christian service (Phil. 1:17); the noun hagneia denotes moral purity and blamelessness (1 Tim. 4:12; 5:2).

2. This survey of the hagnos word group in the NT shows that the original significance (i.e., ritual purity) no longer has a great part to play. This is understandable, since it was only the Jewish-Christian community in Jerusalem that clung to the temple cult and thus observed the ordinances connected with it (Acts 3:1; 21:18–26). To all the Gentile churches, ritual purification meant little or nothing, for nowhere in the NT—apart from the apostolic decree (Acts 15:28–29), which was intended to make it possible for Gentile and Jewish Christians to live together in mixed churches—are cultic regulations for Christians to be found.

Purification gains a new meaning in the NT, however, for these words are used to express the moral purity demanded of Christians. The starting point is the fact that Christ is hagnos, pure, i.e., without sin (1 Jn. 3:3). Because of this, those who belong to him should also be pure. Through his sacrificial death Christ has not only made the normal sacrifices of the temple cult unnecessary, but he has also exposed their real meaning. Purity and integrity are, moreover, not merely human virtues; they indicate the relation of a person to God. Therefore, this word group is no longer the preferred means of referring to sexual purity or abstinence; the NT word for that is enkrateia (self-discipline, → 1602).

ἀγοράζω (agorazō), buy (60); ἀγορά (agora), market (59); ἀγοραῖος (agoraios), frequenting the market (61); ἐξαγοράζω (exagorazō), redeem (1973).

CL & OT Originally any place of public assembly, the agora became identified with the marketplace, a center of community life regularly used for political meetings, judicial hearings, and esp. for trade. The derived adj. agoraios (lit., belonging to the agora) could be used in a good sense to describe those who did business in the marketplace, but more frequently it applied to loafers who hung around the agora looking for excitement or trouble. agorazō came to mean buy in the marketplace, thence buy in general. In Hel. times it was also in common use as a term for buying slaves. exagorazō could be applied to the redeeming of slaves.

In the LXX agora describes the trading activity of Tyre (Ezek. 27:12–22). A girl seeks her lover there (Song 3:2), and Eccl. 12:4 uses the shut doors of the agora as a figure for deafness. agorazō normally refers to commercial purchase (e.g., Gen. 41:57; Neh. 10:31). Dan. 2:8 preserves an interesting use of exagorazō, where the Babylonian astrologers attempt to evade their fate by gaining (buying) time.

NT agora is used 9x in the Synoptics, 2x in Acts. It serves as a place for children to play (Matt. 11:16 par.), an employment exchange (20:3), a center of public life where the Pharisees love to be conspicuous (23:7 par.), and a focal point of Jesus' healing ministry (Mk. 6:56). Paul found himself on trial in the Philippian agora (Acts 16:19) and seized evangelistic opportunities among the crowds in Athenian agora (17:17). Acts 17:5 refers to the agoraioi, the marketplace rabble-rousers; the same word reappears in 19:38 with a semitechnical sense of court sessions (agoraioi hēmerai).

agorazō is found 25x in the NT with its usual commercial meaning, mostly in the Gospels (e.g., Matt. 13:44; Lk. 22:36), though 5x it describes the buying (redeeming) of Christians. This clearly reflects the contemporary terminology of the slave market. In 1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23 (cf. Rev. 14:3) the emphasis is not the freedom of the redeemed but their new status as slaves of God, bought with a price to do his will. Hence the sheer effrontery of heretics "denying the sovereign Lord who bought them" (2 Pet. 2:1). The price Christ paid for his people (his blood) is spelled out in Rev. 5:9.

exagorazō also means redeem in Gal. 3:13; 4:5, where the idea of escaping from the consequences of breaking God's law is added. This word also occurs 2x to express the different idea of (lit.) "redeeming the time (kairos)" (Eph. 5:16; Col. 4:5), which probably means buy up intensively; i.e., snap up every opportunity that comes.

66 (agrielaios, wild olive), → 1778.

67 (agrios, of the field, wild), → 69.

ἀγρός (agros), field (69); ἄγριος (agrios), of the field, wild (67).

CL & OT In secular Gk., agros typically denotes a piece of cultivated land, but it can also mean the countryside as distinct from the town or village. Similarly, the adjective agrios sometimes describes trees, animals, or crops to be found "in the fields," but more often it has the sense of "wild." In this latter sense it is frequently applied figuratively to people (savage, fierce) and to things and circumstances (cruel, harsh).

Most of the above usages are found in the LXX. Any piece of land under cultivation is an agros (e.g., Exod. 8:13; Ruth 2:2). At the same time agros describes the untilled open country beyond the town or village boundary (e.g., Deut. 22:27; 1 Sam. 30:11), where the traveler might expect to meet a wild animal (Hos. 13:8; cf. Jer. 14:5).

Such beasts are naturally agrios, wild (Job. 6:5; Ps. 80:13). The adj. is not applied figuratively to people in the LXX or other Jewish writings, but it can describe a "malignant" ulcer (Lev. 21:20; Deut. 28:27) or "wild" waves (Wis. 14:1).

NT agros occurs 35x in the Gospels, 18 of which refer to land under cultivation or destined for it (e.g., Matt. 13:24; Lk. 14:18; cf. Acts 4:37). agroi can also mean countryside, where farmhouses may be found (Lk. 9:12). Otherwise (though cf. Matt. 27:7–8, 10), the reference is to the countryside (e.g., Mk. 15:21). The adjective agrios is used in its lit. sense ("wild" honey, i.e., honey "found in the open field," Mk. 1:6) and fig. to describe the "wild" waves of the sea (Jude 13).

ἀγρυπνέω (agrypneō), keep oneself awake, be awake, keep watch, guard, care (70); ἀγρυπνία (agrypnia), wakefulness (71).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. agrypneō means to lie awake, be watchful; the noun agrypnia means sleeplessness, usually accompanied by watchfulness. In the LXX the vb. occurs 11x, usually with the meaning watch (e.g., Job 21:32; Ps. 102:7; 127:1). The noun occurs in the LXX only in the Apocr. (once in 2 Macc. 9x in Sir., e.g., Sir. 31:1–2, 20 = LXX 34:1–2, 20).

NT In the context of his eschatological discourse, Jesus charged his disciples to be on the alert (Mk. 13:33; Lk. 21:36). A similar charge is repeated in Eph. 6:18 at the climax of the discourse on the Christian's armor: Believers must "keep alert" because the spiritual forces of evil continually threaten their moral and spiritual lives. In Heb. 13:17 the author urges obedience to church leaders because "they keep watch over you as men who must give an account." agrypnia occurs in the pl. in 2 Cor. 6:5 and 11:27, where it refers to Paul's "watching" or "sleepless nights" endured for the sake of the church.

See also grēgoreō, watch, be on the alert, be watchful (1213); tēreō, preserve, keep (5498); phylassō, guard, preserve, keep (5875).

ἀγών (agōn), fight (74); ἀγωνίζομαι (agōnizomai), fight (76); ἀνταγωνίζομαι (antagōnizomai), fight against (497); ἐπαγωνίζομαι (epagōnizomai), fight for (2043); καταγωνίζομαι (katagōnizomai), conquer, defeat (2865); συναγωνίζομαι (synagōnizomai), fight along with, help (5253); ἀγωνία (agōnia), agony, anxiety (75).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk., agōn (from agō, drive, lead) can mean gathering, gathering place, or a struggle or fight (in war, politics, or law; also in a sporting contest). agōnizomai has the same shades of meaning even when compounded with various prepositions. agōnia has higher style ranges in meaning, from effort to anxiety. In Cynic and Stoic diatribes the outlook and terminology of the stadium is used for exercise in virtue and for life's moral struggle.

2. In stark contrast to the above stands OT Jud., to which this range of concepts is alien. In the LXX agōn occurs almost exclusively in the Apocr. (15x, particularly 2 and 4 Macc.) and translates a Heb. word only in Isa. 7:13, where God rebukes Ahaz for contending (NIV "try the patience") with him. agōnizomai likewise appears only in the Apocr., and its compounds are altogether absent. On the other hand, 4 Macc. 12:15 speaks of the struggle for virtue (aretēs), Sir. 4:28 of the struggle for truth, and Wis. 4:2 of moral striving. It is also used frequently for military conflict.

The suffering of the martyrs that took place in the hippodrome is also described in Macc. in the imagery of the stadium. Expressions like agōn theios, divine struggle, or hieroprepēs, holy struggle (4 Macc. 17:11; 11:20), indicate that, just as the games were held in honor of a deity, the sufferings and deadly combats of the martyrs were considered to be to the glory of God. These ideas had a powerful influence on early Christianity, esp. in Heb. and Rev.

NT 1. In the Gospels agōnizomai occurs only 2x: Jn. 18:36, of Jesus' servants, who would fight for him with weapons; and Lk. 13:24, "Make every effort to enter [salvation] through the narrow door." The remaining occurrences of this word group are predominantly in the writings of Paul, a native of a Hel. city who used technical terms from the stadium.

The prep. compounds of agōnizomai are only used 4x, but without any change of meaning (Rom. 15:30; Heb. 11:33; 12:4; Jude 3). In Lk. 22:44 agōnia may mean effort, fear, excitement, alarm, or anxiety. This Gethsemane passage (cf. Heb. 5:7) should not be translated "as he fought with death" (which imports the meaning of the English word "agony" but which is not in the original), but rather "as he was afraid" or "as he was concerned for victory" in face of the approaching battle on the cross.

2. The transforming power of the Christian faith shows itself also in a language that reverses in a positive sense realities like the cross and slavery (which seem completely negative to the natural self). It also draws into its range of imagery things such as spiritual armor and contending against unseen spiritual forces (cf. Eph. 6:10–18). In addition to Paul in Eph. and the Pastoral Letters, Heb. and Lk. also find a place for the image of a fight. Three groups of ideas can be distinguished:

(a) agōn emphasizes the conscious application of one's powers for the achievement of a goal. Jesus encourages us to strive to enter the kingdom through the narrow door (Lk. 13:24, here agōnizomai). Paul's work is not merely the fulfillment of an obligation but an agōn, which is linked with kopos (burden) and ponos (hardship) (see Col. 1:29; 1 Tim. 4:10). What matters is the highest, imperishable, and only rewarding goal, the brabeion (prize). Therefore, not only supreme effort but also supreme renunciation are demanded.

According to 1 Cor. 9:24–27, everyone who competes must go "into strict training." This does not mean a kind of asceticism, which keeps the body in submission out of contempt for it. Rather, the Christian exercises discipline by having his or her body under control and directing it toward a goal in accordance with one's own will. For this, godly exercise (1 Tim. 4:7–8) is necessary. This is the race, the good fight, which Paul has himself completed (2 Tim. 4:7) and which he recommends to Timothy (1 Tim. 6:12).

(b) The obj. of this agōn, however, is not primarily the perfection of the individual, i.e., a private salvation, but the spread of the gospel. That is, the apostles strive for the salvation of God's elect, "that we may present everyone perfect in Christ" (Col. 1:28). So we are always dealing with an agōn hyper, a struggle for, on behalf of, others (Rom. 15:30; Col. 2:1–2; 4:12), which takes place above all in prayer. In prayer we can intercede for someone else and make this cause and suffering our own (Rom. 15:30; Col. 4:3; 1 Thess. 5:25; 2 Thess. 3:1; Heb. 13:18).

The proclamation of the divine message leads to conflict with opponents (2 Cor. 7:5; Heb. 12:3–4). But in the last analysis the adversaries against which we struggle are not human but "the rulers . . . the authorities . . . the powers of this dark world . . . the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 6:12).

(c) This struggle through suffering is particularly expressed by the prep. syn. The compounds synagōnizomai and synathleō (Rom. 15:30; Phil. 1:27; 4:3) do not just convey the bearing of the same conflict as the apostle (Phil. 1:30), but a suffering with Christ while looking up to him (Heb. 12:1–4), "sharing in his sufferings" (Phil. 3:10), being "poured out like a drink offering on the sacrifice and service coming from your faith" (Phil. 2:17; cf. 2 Tim. 4:6), and completing "what is still lacking in regard to Christ's afflictions, for the sake of his body, which is the church" (Col. 1:24). Therefore, the agōn with all its sufferings brings joy to the Christian, the joy of the team that is indebted to its captain for the victory.

Ἀδάμ (Adam), Adam (77).

OT Adam (probably from the common Sem. root ʾdm, [to be red], Heb. ʾădāmâ, the red arable soil in contrast to the lighter colored desert) is a collective term for humankind, people. A single person is called ben-ʾādām (lit., son of man). ʾādām is the ordinary Heb. word for a human being.

Adam as a proper name is found in the OT only in Gen. 4:25; 5:2–5; 1 Chr. 1:1 (possibly also Gen. 2:20; 3:17, 21). Only Gen. 2–3 is of importance for the use of Adam in the NT, which tells how, in spite of the goodness of God's creation, humanity experienced evil and death.

When God created heaven and earth, he formed the man out of the earth and breathed the breath of life into him (Gen. 2:7; cf. Ps. 104:29–30). Hence human beings are entirely dependent on God. Without his sustenance they are only a pile of earth.

To give the first man an understanding of his true nature, God brought him the animals to be named, at which time he realized that they could not be a real partner for him. This prepared him for the creation of woman as his partner. A human being is really human only when he or she is with other human beings. This occurs above all in the mutual relationship of husband and wife.

The first human beings were allotted a place to live in, a garden containing the tree of life, where uninterrupted life with God was to be found. There was also the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The fact that the first couple was not allowed to approach it and take of its fruit suggests that though evil existed, God desired at first to spare them the knowledge of all that it involved, for only God himself could overcome it.

But then the cleverest of the animals (the serpent) attacked humankind at its most vulnerable spot. It suggested that God was leaving them foolish and ignorant so that he might not lose his unique authority. The result of Adam and Eve's transgression (→ parabasis, sin, 4126) was not that God was no longer God, but that human beings experienced evil—first subjectively in the experience of shame (3:7), then objectively through death and God's curse. Evil affected the relationship of humans and animals (3:15, "enmity"), woman and childbirth, one's work, and personal relationships (3:16–19).

NT 1. In Pauline theology Adam as a type is important (see 3 below). The name Adam is found 9x in the NT. Jude 14, quoting 1 Enoch 1:9, mentions Enoch as the seventh from Adam, the first man. In Lk. 3:38 Adam is mentioned last in the genealogy as "the son of God." Luke wishes to affirm that Adam, and with him the whole human race, is of divine origin (cf. Acts 17:28). His purpose is probably to show that Jesus is the revealer for all humanity and not only for Jews. Jesus reveals what was intended by Adam, as the representative of humankind. Note too that Jesus is the only one after Adam who is said to be of divine origin (Lk. 1:34–35).

2. A different question is in view in 1 Tim. 2:13–15 when it says that Adam was formed first, then Eve; and Adam was not deceived, but the woman was deceived and became a transgressor. Paul's main point in this section is that Eve was the one who succumbed to the blandishments of the serpent.

3. In Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:20–22, 45–49, Paul sets out the contrast between the old and new ages, between humanity under sin and under salvation, by a typological parallelism of Adam and Christ, where Adam is the type and Christ the antitype (→ typos, image, 5596).

(a) The transgression of God's commandment brought about a loss of trust in both God and other human beings (see Gen. 3). Thus, Paul writes, "Sin entered the world through one man" (Rom. 5:12, → hamartia, sin, 281). The thought here is not that of the transmission of sin by physical inheritance, but of the creation of a situation of mutual mistrust that no one can avoid. Hence, sin permeates the whole of humanity.

(b) Death is not the natural result of sin but God's judgment on it (Rom. 6:23). Hence death came through sin to all human beings (5:12), or put more briefly, "In Adam all die" (1 Cor. 15:22).

(c) Before the giving of the Mosaic law, human beings did not sin as Adam did (Rom. 5:14). In contrast to Adam and those under the law, they had no express commandment. They died because they had sinned, but there was no exact bookkeeping. Sin takes on the explicit character of transgression and disobedience directed against God in the light of the law (Rom. 7:7–11). To that extent Adam typifies fallen humanity before God.

(d) Adam is also a type of that which is to come—the age to come, the kingdom of God (Rom. 5:14). The sentence, "For as in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made alive" (1 Cor. 15:22; cf. Rom. 5:14–19), means that humanity, which has lost its real life through sin, is typified by Adam. The Risen One is the personal agent of new life, for he represents the beginning of the general resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. 15:20). In Jewish thought this was linked with the beginning of the new creation, the forgiveness of sins (cf. Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:17). This creates for all the possibility of being freed from the compulsion to sin, the root of which is mistrust of God.

The Risen One is the beginning of a new humanity, for he accepted the validity of God's sentence of judgment, allowing God to be God. He put his trust in him alone and expected from him nothing but what was good. In so doing, he undid humanity's basic sin, that of Adam (Gen. 3).

(e) When Paul speaks of Jesus as Adam's antitype, he uses the idea of "the second man" (1 Cor. 15:45–49). The term suggests the true, original man who came into the world to impart the saving truth by which he himself lived. Whatever personalities Jud.

may have expected in the last days, Jesus as the Risen One exceeded all expectations, for in his individual person he represented the general resurrection, and with it the advent of the kingdom of God, the new creation, and the forgiveness of sins (1 Cor. 15:24–26; Col. 1:18).

Paul may have used this picture to express to the Greeks and the Hel. world the message proclaimed to Palestinian Christians of the resurrection, the advent of the kingdom of God, and the forgiveness of sins. The Greeks conceived of salvation as the truth, the "idea" that lies behind the world and has been obscured by the transitory, vain world of appearances. Therefore, only the original man can bring about the true being of humanity, for he incorporates the original purpose of God for humankind. But this true man, Paul says, is not Adam but Christ. As the original man revealed in the resurrection, Jesus can make the new creation a reality for the Greeks.

4. Paul insists on the corporeality of the resurrection body. Resurrection does not mean that the spiritual element in human beings is now with God. What makes us sinners is not the fact that we exist in "flesh" as transient beings, but that we live "according to the flesh" (→ sarx, flesh, 4922). That is, we allow ourselves to be determined by that which is transitory in our lives. Hence, resurrection is not without a body. The corporeality given to humanity at creation is not that given at the resurrection. The original man is not merely the simple original picture of humankind; the concept is eschatological. The Risen One brings us a new and for us unknown existence with God (1 Cor. 15:44–54.). Hence the new creation is more than a mere restoration of the original; it brings into being something new and until now unknown.

ἀδελφός (adelphos), brother (81); ἀδελφή (adelphē), sister (80); ἀδελφότης (adelphotēs), brotherhood (82); φιλάδελφος (philadelphos), loving one's brother or sister (5790); φιλαδελφία (philadelphia), love for brother or sister (5789); ψευδάδελφος (pseudadelphos), false brother (6012).

CL & OT 1. adelphos (a compound word from delphys, womb, and a, not; hence one out of the [same] womb) was originally used for brother in the physical sense, while adelphē was a sister. The masc. pl. covered all the children of a family. Soon it came to signify all close relatives, such as nephew, brother-in-law, etc. Later it metaphorically came to mean companion, friend. In the addressing of letters, adelphos was also applied to a fellow official or a fellow member of a society. Members of a religious group could call each other brothers. In some elements in Gk. philosophy, brotherhood was understood from the standpoint of a universal humanity.

2. adelphos in the LXX is similarly used for a physical brother and adelphē for a physical sister (Gen. 4:8–11; 12:13; 44:20). Gen. 29:12 (NIV relative) indicates that it could be applied to other relatives as well. Examples also occur of adelphos being used for fellow Israelites (i.e., ancestors of Jacob's sons; see Ps. 22:22). In Exod. 2:11 Moses' fellow Hebrews are called brothers (NIV "his own people"; cf. Gen. 16:12; Deut. 2:4). In Gen. 19:7 Lot calls the Sodomites brothers.

Hosea uses the words son and brother in his picture of God's relationship to his people (Hos. 1:10–2:1[Heb. 2:1–3]). Here we see the transference of brother from physical to spiritual relationships. Deut. 15:1–11 demands love for the poor brother; here brother and neighbor become synonymous. In the command to love (Lev. 19:17–18), brother and neighbor are used interchangeably. The difference between plēsion (neighbor) and adelphos in the OT is that the latter includes blood relationship. In religious use there is little difference.

3. In Qumran texts, brother refers only to members of the Qumran community, which considered itself the true Israel. They could hate all others. The rabbis made a stricter distinction between brother and neighbor. The former was any adherent to Jud. (including proselytes), while neighbor was a non-Israelite inhabitant of the land.

NT 1. The same variety of uses for adelphos (343x) and adelphē (25x) occurs in the NT as in the OT. This fact creates the differences of interpretation concerning the brothers and sisters of Jesus (Mk. 6:3 par.; 3:31–35 par.; Jn. 7:5; Acts 1:14; 1 Cor. 9:5). Were they children of Joseph from an earlier marriage (Orthodox interpretation), close relatives of Jesus (Roman Catholic interpretation), or later children of Joseph and Mary (general Protestant interpretation)?

2. adelphos sometimes means fellow Israelites in the NT (e.g., Acts 2:29; 3:17; 22:1). In Rom. 9:3 Paul defines them as "brothers ... according to the flesh" (lit. trans.). Note that Paul does not use adelphoi when speaking to a Gentile audience (17:22). Christians are the new people of God (2 Cor. 6:16–18; Heb. 8:8–12; 1 Pet. 2:9–10). Hence the word adelphos was applied to fellow Christians (Acts 15:32–33, 36). The decision of the apostolic council explicitly applied the term to Gentile Christians (15:23).

The NT uses the terminology of the family of God (cf. Gal. 6:10) far more commonly than that of the people of God. God is the Father. Through faith in Jesus Christ Christians become his sons and daughters (cf. Rom. 8:14; 2 Cor. 6:18; Gal. 3:26; → huios, 5626) or his children (Jn. 1:12–13; Rom. 8:16–17; → teknon, 5451). All this makes intelligible the use of adelphos as a title for a brother in the faith. The children of God are his household (Eph. 2:19).

The coming of Jesus underlines the sharp distinction between relationship to God and relationship by birth. Jesus, for example, pointed up the tension in his own life (Mk. 3:31–35 par.; 13:12–13 par.) and demanded that, if need be, one should leave one's natural family for the new community (10:28–31 par.; Lk. 14:26).

Jesus is the one and only natural Son of God. But he is also the firstborn brother of believers (Rom. 8:29), "the firstborn over all creation" (Col. 1:15), and "the firstborn from among the dead" (1:18; cf. Rev. 1:5). In his humiliation he became the brother of believers (Heb. 2:11–12, 17). Thus, Jesus can speak of his disciples as his brothers (Mk. 3:33–35 par.). Yet even as brother he remains Lord. So Paul calls himself the doulos, slave, of Christ, and the adelphoi he entitles syndouloi, fellow slaves (Col. 1:7; 4:7).

3. Because Jesus became our brother, we are brothers of one another. The ruling principle in this brotherhood is agapē (love, → 26; cf. esp. 1 Jn.), a uniquely Christian perspective. When Paul addresses Christians as adelphoi (pl.), he prefers to add agapētoi, beloved (1 Cor. 15:58; Phil. 4:1). The spiritual community is based on the love of God, which creates a new reality from God among humankind.

Love as typified in natural relationships is sometimes expressed by philia (→ 5797). Note esp. its use in compound terms like philadelphos, "love as brothers" (1 Pet. 3:8), and philadelphia, "brotherly love" (Rom. 12:10). It has been attracted to the superior concept of agapē and, applied to love among people, has become a synonym of it. The same is true of the concept adelphotēs, brotherhood (1 Pet. 2:17; 5:9).

The professing Christian who does not obey God, esp. the command to love his or her brother, is still walking in the dark (1 Jn. 2:9). Anyone spreading false teaching or accepting it is a pseudadelphos, false brother (2 Cor. 11:26; Gal. 2:4). By one's actions one excludes oneself from fellowship with God and no longer belongs to his family.

4. It should be noted that the NT demands love for the brother and love for the neighbor equally. This means that the two terms are considered synonymous as far as their claim on us is concerned. But we can make a distinction with regard to the object of love. Those passages that demand love for one's neighbor (plēsion, → 4446) look directly or indirectly to Lev. 19:18. This presumes that love is to extend beyond the circle of those to whom one is linked by physical or spiritual relationship. Since in Matt. 5:43–48 the command to love includes one's enemies, any limits one may give to adelphos are transcended. The scope of human love is as wide as the scope of God's salvation.

See also plēsion, neighbor (4446); hetairos, companion, friend (2279).

82 (adelphotēs, brotherhood), → 81.

ᾅδης (hadēs), Hades, the underworld, the realm of the dead (87).

CL & OT 1. hadēs occurs in Homer as the proper name of the god of the underworld; in the rest of Gk. lit. it stands for the underworld as the abode of the dead, who lead a shadowy existence there. After Homer it can mean the grave, death. Only gradually did the Greeks also attach to this concept the ideas of reward and punishment. The good and the righteous were rewarded in hadēs, while the wicked and the godless received a variety of punishments.

2. In the LXX hadēs occurs more than 100x, most of them to translate Heb. šᵉ'ôl, the underworld that receives all the dead. It is a land of darkness, in which God is not remembered (Job 26:5–6; cf. 10:21–22; Ps. 6:5; 30:3, 9; 115:17; Prov. 1:12; 27:20; Isa. 5:14). The dead are cut off from him and outside his activity in history (Ps. 88:3–5). In death there is no proclamation or praise (Isa. 38:18; cf. Ps. 88:11). The dead are unclean and therefore, in contrast with surrounding religions, Israel's dead enjoyed no sacral worship. Necromancy was expressly forbidden (Deut. 18:11). No Israelite comforted himself or herself with the hope of one day being reunited with the departed. The shades themselves suffer under their decay (Job 14:21–22).

By contrast, šᵉ'ôl not only lies on the border of life in the beyond but also penetrates the circle of the living on every side—through illness, weakness, imprisonment, oppression by enemies, and death. Thus the psalmist acknowledges that he has already in a sense been in šᵉ'ôl but has been rescued by Yahweh. Wherever the voice of Yahweh is not heard or he abandons a person, the reality of death and šᵉ'ôl begins (Job 12:24–25). Dying, therefore, is not merely a biophysical process; it is the ending of one's life relationship with Yahweh. Nevertheless, Yahweh's power does not cease at the frontier of hadēs (Ps. 139:8; Amos 9:2). Only exceptionally in the OT did faith (Job 14:13–22) or poetic imagination (Isa. 14:9–20; Ezek. 32:20–32) concern itself with the realm of the dead. There are isolated hints of hope beyond death (cf. Job 19:25–27; Ps. 49; 73:23–28; Dan. 12), where the possibility of resurrection appears.

2. In rab. Jud., under Persian and Hel. influence, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul appeared, and this altered the concept of hadēs. The earliest attestation of this doctrine is 1 Enoch 22: Reward and punishment begin, after death, in hadēs. According to Josephus, this was the position of the Pharisees and the Essenes, in contrast to that of the Sadducees. A later view states that the souls of the righteous, after death, enter heavenly blessedness, while the souls of the ungodly are punished in hadēs. Thus, hadēs has lost its role as the resting place of all souls and become a place of punishment for the ungodly.

NT 1. In the NT hadēs occurs 10x (only in Matt., Lk., Acts, and Rev.). Hades lies within the earth, so that one has to go down to it (Matt. 11:23; Lk. 10:15). It is a prison (phylakē, 1 Pet. 3:19; Rev. 20:7; → 5871). Like a city or town it has gates (Matt. 16:18) and is locked with a key that Christ holds in his hand (Rev. 1:18). Those gates will never imprison any who belong to the messianic community. In Rev. 20:13–14 Hades is personified; at the resurrection it must give up its dead. Thus, it is not an eternal but only a temporary place or state. According to Acts 2:27, 31 and Lk. 16:23, 26, all the dead are in Hades. According to other passages, however, only the spirits of the ungodly are there (1 Pet. 3:19; Rev. 20:13–14).

2. Jesus has risen to an eternal life (Heb. 7:16). He has conquered the power of death and the devil (2:14) and is Lord both of the dead and of the living (Rom. 14:9). According to the NT, Hades cannot affect the church (Matt. 16:18–19; 1 Pet. 3:19–22; 4:6; Rev. 1:18). Any Christian who dies is united with Christ (2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23)—even though that person is naked (i.e., without a body, 2 Cor. 5:2–3), in the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. 12:22), under the heavenly altar (Rev. 6:9), or before God's throne (7:9; 14:3). Christ preached to the spirits in prison (1 Pet. 3:19–20; 4:6). His saving work embraces the dead, and nothing is beyond his grace.

3. The fact that in the NT there is no description of the geography of the beyond must be connected with this emphasis on the all-embracing dominion and grace of Christ. This is in sharp contrast to descriptions in certain rab. and Christian writings, down to Dante's Divine Comedy. Perhaps, however, it was the silence of the NT about these details that excited the curiosity of the pseudo-pious and led to dissatisfaction with placing one's hope in Christ alone. Yet another factor contributing to this expansion was the substitution of the Gk. doctrine of the immortality of the soul in place of the NT doctrine of the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. 15).

ἀδιάλειπτος (adialeiptos), unceasing, constant (89); ἀδιαλείπτως (adialeiptōs), unceasingly, constantly (90).

CL & OT Both the adj. and the adv. are comparatively rare in cl. Gk. In the LXX only the adv. occurs and then exclusively in the Maccabean literature (1 Macc. 12:11, 2 Macc. 3:26; 9:4; 13:12; 15:7; 3 Macc. 6:33). It is also found in other intertestamental sources.

NT In Rom. 9:2 Paul describes "unceasing" anguish of heart for the Jews, for whose sake he could wish himself accursed and cut off from Christ (9:3). For although they are descended from Israel and have all God's promises, they are not truly of Israel. Paul's yearning for the salvation of Israel may be compared with Jesus' concern for Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37–39). In 2 Tim. 1:3 adialeiptos is used of Paul's constant remembrance of Timothy in his prayers.

The adv. adialeiptōs is likewise only found in the Pauline literature. In 1 Thess. 1:2 it is used of Paul's continual prayers for the Thessalonian Christians (cf. also Rom. 1:9). Likewise, Paul thanks God constantly for the response of the Thessalonians to the word of God (1 Thess. 2:13) and urges them to pray unceasingly (5:17).

92 (adikeō, do wrong, commit injustice, deal unjustly, injure), → 94.

93 (adikēma, unjust deed, a wrong), → 94.

ἀδικία (adikia), wrongdoing, unrighteousness, injustice (94); ἀδικέω (adikeō), do wrong, commit injustice, deal unjustly, injure (92); ἀδίκημα (adikēma), unjust deed, a wrong (93); ἄδικος (adikos), unjust (96); ἀδίκως (adikōs), unjustly (97).

CL & OT 1. (a) adikeō and its derivatives occur often in Gk. lit. As the initial a (alpha privative) indicates, they denote the opposite of the positive concepts dikē, dikaiosynē, and dikaios (→ dikaiosynē, righteousness, 1466)—i.e., the unjust are the opposite of the just. The vb. adikeō means to commit an injustice; with an obj., deal unjustly with someone, injure, harm; in the pass., suffer injustice. The noun adikēma denotes the individual unjust deed. Unjust deeds can also be described as adikia, but this noun is used esp. for the concept of injustice. adikos is the adj. of both nouns, but it has a more general meaning of wrong, useless, not of a right nature.

(b) The meaning of words in this group are usually dependent on how justice is perceived at a certain time. adikos covers all that offends against morals, custom, norms, or decency (dikē), all that is unseemly, unspeakable, or fraudulent. What is "unjust" is not measured by laws laid down in writing, as is the case with anomos, lawless (→ nomos, law, 3795).

(c) adikia, however, is frequently rooted in legal thinking. It is a synonym of parabasis (transgression, → 4126) and can refer also to particular crimes such as theft, fraud, incest, etc. In lists of vices adikia is used as a general description of a wide range of things.

(d) These words are also used in a religious context. adikeō can mean the neglect of one's duties toward the gods. The unjust do not match up to the claims of the deity and are thus guilty before him. They offend eusebeia, reverence for God (→ sebō, revere, worship, 4936).

2. (a) The LXX uses these words to translate a variety of Heb. equivalents (e.g., adikeō translates 24 different Heb. words). The adj. adikos, often used as a noun, and the adv. adikōs usually represent a word meaning deceit, fraud, lie (Ps. 63:11; Prov. 6:17; Jer. 5:31). adikēma is rare in the LXX and means an unjust act committed against the law or an offense against God (e.g., Lev. 16:16; Jer. 16:17). By far the most common of these words in the LXX is adikia (ca. 250x), which represents 36 different Heb. words; it usually means offense, guilt, punishment; in some cases perversity, wickedness (e.g., Hos. 10:13); violent act, injustice (e.g., Ps. 7:16); and lie (e.g., 119:104).

(b) The fact that adikia occurs mostly in the sing. shows that attention is focused not on the individual act but on the whole phenomenon of transgression. Sin in ancient Israel was above all an offense against the sacral order of divine justice (1 Sam. 3:13–14). As such, it affected the community, whose existence was intimately connected with the preservation of divine justice. Hence, sin in the OT is regarded as a phenomenon of theological and social import, as something that destroys the community. For that reason the covenant people must purge evil from their midst (cf. Lev. 16:21–33; 17:4, 9).

An offense that incurs guilt sets in motion a process of destruction whose effects recoil on the offender as well as the community unless the fateful connection of deed and consequence is broken (Gen. 4:13; Num. 32:23). The offense is, in the first place, regarded objectively as a harmful event even if it is committed in error (Gen. 20:3–7; 1 Sam. 14:24–45). These harmful effects can only be checked by the punishment of the offender, by the vicarious slaying of an animal, or by the offering of an atonement offering.

3. In the later OT writings and in Judaism adikia tended to be limited to the concrete individual act, but it was extended to apply to all people. In this context it is significant that occasionally the LXX translates šeqer, lie, by adikia (Ps. 52:3; 119:29, 69; 144:8, 11). Philo and Josephus mention adikos and asebēs in the same breath. Just as dikaios is prominent in Philo's teaching on virtue, so adikos is prominent in his teaching about wickedness. Jewish apocalyptic regarded the whole period before the coming of the Messiah as the "world of unrighteousness" (1 Enoch 48:7), which the Messiah will destroy (91:5–13; Pss. Sol. 17:29, 36).

NT 1. (a) adikeō occurs only 28x in the NT, mostly in Acts and Rev. It means to act unjustly, harm in relation to other people (e.g., Matt. 20:13; Acts 7:24, 26, 27; Gal. 4:12). In Rev. it has things as its objects (6:6; 9:4). The pass. used with the meaning to suffer injustice is always found in the context of relations between human beings (Acts 7:24; 1 Cor. 6:7–8; 2 Cor. 7:12). adikēma occurs 3x. In Acts 18:14 and 24:20 it denotes a criminal act; in Rev. 18:5 it is parallel to hamartia and is used in relation to God. adikia is virtually limited to Lk.'s and Paul's writings, while adikos is occasionally used absolutely (e.g., Matt. 5:45; Lk. 18:11). Both of these denote behavior that does not conform to the moral norm. The adv. adikōs occurs only in 1 Pet. 2:19.

(b) These concepts become more theologically significant in contexts where they are contrasted with dikaios, just, and dikaiosynē, righteousness, justice (Acts 24:15; Rom. 3:5; 1 Pet. 3:18) or with alētheia, truth (e.g., Jn. 7:18; Rom. 1:18; 2:8). The NT's use of these words shows that we are dealing with commonly accepted categories of injustice, whose meaning in each case we discover only through a close examination. Hence we must seek to learn the meaning of each individual passage from its context or from what qualifies it or is contrasted with it.

2. adikia and hamartia (sin, → 281) convey the most important concepts in the NT doctrine of sin. Of these adikia is, as in the LXX, the less specific and more varied in its nuances of meaning. The definition in 1 Jn. 5:17 juxtaposes the two. hamartia is the main idea; adikia probably means unjust deeds and injustice among human beings, which are not to be regarded as mortal sins but are to be forgiven.

In comparison with hamartia, adikia describes more powerfully the outwardly visible characteristics of that which stands under the power of sin. Hence, in the parable of the unjust steward, mention is made of "worldly wealth" (Lk. 16:9; lit., "mammon of unrighteousness"), in Jas. 3:6 of the injustice perpetrated by the tongue, and in Lk. 18:1–8 of the "unjust" judge.

3. (a) Paul never uses hamartia in Rom. 1:18–32, where he discusses various sins of the Gentiles, only adikia and asebeia. God's wrath rests on those who as his creatures should have known him and honored him (Rom. 1:18, 21, 25; 2:8). In 1:29 adikia is a comprehensive term at the start of a list of vices. Similarly, 1 Cor. 6:1 contrasts the unrighteous (i.e., Gentiles who do not yet recognize righteousness through faith and have thus fallen victims to their adikia and God's wrath) with the saints; the former will not inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:9).

(b) The criterion for unrighteousness is God's righteousness (Rom. 3:5, 26; 9:14), which discloses human unrighteousness (3:5). The gulf opened by the contrast of God's righteousness and human unrighteousness is bridged by Christ, who as the righteous one stands in our place (3:24; 2 Cor. 5:21; cf. also 1 Pet. 3:18). A new division of the righteous and the unrighteous has appeared because the truth has been received (Rom. 1:18; 2:8).

Just as adikia was often used in the OT to mean lie, falsehood, so also Paul and John use adikia in contrast to alētheia (truth, → 237; Jn. 7:18). The consequence of faith in Christ is not merely the elimination of sin as a power but also conversion to a life in righteousness (2 Thess. 2:9–12). Within the community there is no longer any place for legal litigation, so Paul in 1 Cor. 6:1–11 warns the Corinthians to cease from it and to prefer suffering unjustly (cf. 1 Pet. 2:19). The basis of this is that Christians are controlled by love (1 Cor. 13:6). A preoccupation with one's rights, which can lead to fighting against and suing a neighbor, is shattered by the love of one's neighbor and one's enemy. This idea, which is a continuation of the OT command to love one's neighbor (Lev. 19:13–18), goes back to Jesus himself (Matt. 5:43–48).

4. (a) This fundamental vision of the Christian life likewise shines through in later NT writings. In 2 Tim. 2:19 Paul warns the community that unrighteousness is incompatible with calling on God's name. Heb. 8:12 picks up the message of Jer. 31 regarding God's forgiving love in the new covenant and gives it a Christological interpretation, for Christ makes forgiveness for unrighteousness possible (1 Jn. 1:9).

(b) In 2 Pet. 2 the apostle emphasizes the final judgment and the condemnation of the adikoi (2:9, 13, 15).

(c) The ungodly world is judged in the apocalyptic final judgment described in Rev. This book frequently uses adikeō for judicial actions performed against human beings and things (2:11; 6:6; 7:2–3; 9:4, 10, 19; 11:5 [2x]; cf. 22:11).

ἀήρ (aēr), air (113).

CL & OT According to cl. concepts, aēr, air, filled the space between the earth and the moon. The Greeks considered it impure and was thus the home of the spirits.

NT aēr appears 7x in the NT. It is used (a) for the space above us (Acts 22:23; 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 16:17); (b) in idioms: beat the air (1 Cor. 9:26), speak into the air (14:9); (c) in connection with God's judgments (the smoke from the abyss [→ abyssos, 12] darkens it and the sun [Rev. 9:2]; an angel pours his bowl of wrath into it [16:17]).

Since the air fills the space between heaven and earth, it is the place where Christ meets the church at the Parousia (1 Thess. 4:17). Satan is the evil spirit who rules

"the kingdom of the air" (Eph. 2:2; cf. 6:12) and is at work in the godless. That is, the evil spirits are subservient to the ruler of the realm of darkness.

ἀθετέω (atheteō), set at naught, reject (119).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. atheteō means to set aside a treaty or promise, to break faith, and in general to deny and do away with what has been laid down.

In the LXX atheteō is frequently used for breaking faith with God and other human beings, and for profanely disregarding and abusing something holy (e.g., God's sacrifice, 1 Sam. 2:17; God's law, Ezek. 22:26).

NT In the NT, the word is used for acts of irreligion: rejecting God (1 Thess. 4:8), his command (Mk. 7:9), his purpose (Lk. 7:30), Jesus Christ (Lk. 10:16; Jn. 12:48), God's grace (Gal. 2:21), Moses' law (Heb. 10:28), one's first faith (1 Tim. 5:12), and "dominion" (Jude 8)—probably the authority of Christ in his ministers. Exceptions to this meaning occur in Mk. 6:26; 1 Cor. 1:19; Gal. 3:15.

See also katargeō, abolish, nullify (2934); exoutheneō, reject with contempt (2024).

ἀθλέω (athleō), compete (123); ἄθλησις (athlēsis), contest (124); συναθλέω (synathleō), contend with (5254).

CL & OT The word group athlēsis, athleō, synathleō is used for sporting contests. It may, however, be used metaphorically of anything requiring effort.

NT Of the four NT passages that contain forms of athleō (2 Tim. 2:5; synathleō Phil. 1:27; 4:3; athlēsis Heb. 10:32), three are connected with suffering. In the Heb. passage the accompanying theatrizomenoi indicates the crowd of spectators who are present at the abuse and torture, as in 4 Macc. 17:14–17.

Αἴγυπτος (Aigyptos), Egypt (131); Αἰγύπτιος (Aigyptios), Egyptian (130).

OT In the LXX, Aigyptos translates Heb. miṣrayim, a word of uncertain meaning. The significance of Egypt in the OT may be surveyed under seven heads. (1) It is first of all part of God's world. In Gen. 10:6, 13, miṣrayim (LXX, Mesrain) appears as an ancestral or eponymous figure for Egypt and the Egyptians, securing them their place in God's world among the families of the earth. At the opposite extreme from the Euphrates, the Nile of Egypt was an outermost bound of the lands covenanted with Abraham (Gen. 15:18). Culturally, Egypt was a land of great antiquity (cf. Isa. 19:11), known for luxurious products such as fine linen (Prov. 7:16; Ezek. 27:7) and dashing chariots and steeds (1 Ki. 10:28–29; Song 1:9). Though it was a powerful country, it was subject to God's summons (Zech. 14:18–19). The sweeping onset of her annual Nile flood was used as a symbol of devastating judgment on Israel (Amos 8:8; 9:5).

(2) Egypt was a place of refuge and sojourn. After Bethel (cf. Gen. 12:8), Abraham, pressed by famine, sought deliverance not from God but in Egypt (12:10–13:1). From there he brought Hagar, by whom he and Sarah sought a human solution to their childlessness (Gen. 16). In due time (cf. 15:13–14), Egypt was the divinely provided refuge for Israel's family (Gen. 37; 39–50) through Joseph (45:7–8; 50:20).

(3) In OT tradition, Egypt became above all else "the land of slavery," from which God saved Israel by his might and wonders (Exod. 20:1) at the exodus (Exod. 1–15). This deliverance was recalled in the desert (Exod. 23; 32; Lev. 11:45; 25:38; etc.) and impressed Israel's foes (Jos. 9:9; 1 Sam. 4:8; 6:6). Forever after it reechoed down the centuries as a major starting point for Israel as a nation. The psalmists sang of it (e.g., Ps. 78:12, 43, 51; 80:8; 106:7, 21), and the prophets swelled the chorus (e.g., Jer. 2:6; Ezek. 20; Dan. 9:15; Hos. 12:9, 13; Amos 2:10; 9:7; Hag. 2:5). Israel came forth from Egypt as God's "son" (Hos. 11:1).

(4) Egypt further became a symbol of spiritual bondage, e.g., of servitude to idolatry in future exiles (Hos. 8:13 and 9:3 in a context of Assyrian threat), although it would not again be the place of exile of the whole Hebrew nation (11:5). Future deliverances for Israel were to be measured by the Egyptian deliverance (Isa. 11:11; Hos. 11:11; Zech. 10:10).

(5) After the exodus period, Egypt's role in the OT varies—occasionally an ally (1 Ki. 3:1) or a refuge (1 Ki. 11:40; Jer. 26:21–23), sometimes an outright foe (1 Ki. 14:25–26; 2 Ki. 23:33–34), but above all as a snare, an object of misplaced confidence for help (e.g., 2 Ki. 17:4). Trust in Egyptian "strength" rather than in God's provision led to new forms of bondage (cf. Isa. 30–31; Jer. 2:18, 36; 37:5, 7; 41:17; 42–44; Ezek. 17:15; 23; Hos. 7:11, 16; 12:1).

(6) The Lord pronounced judgment on Egypt by his word through Isaiah (Isa. 19–20), Jeremiah (Jer. 46), Ezekiel (Ezek. 29–32), and even Joel (3:19), because of pride, self-assertion, and attacks on the covenant people.

(7) But Egypt was also to know restoration and divine healing. Along with Assyria and Israel it was to become God's people (cf. Isa. 19:19–25) and never again be a snare or be exalted over other nations (cf. Ezek. 29:13–16).

NT In the NT, Egypt's roles correspond to those in the OT. (1) At Pentecost, along with others, Egyptians heard God's works proclaimed in their own tongue (Acts 2:10). God was offering them salvation.

(2) Deliverance from Egypt at the exodus remained a paradigm of God's saving power (see Acts 7; 13:17), and Israel's subsequent unfaithfulness after the exodus was a paradigm of human sin (see Acts 7:39; Heb. 3:16; 8:9; Jude 5).

(3) Just as Israel and his family were divinely sustained in Egypt (Gen. 45:5, 7), from where God later called forth Israel as his "son" (Hos. 11:1), so the infant Jesus was taken into refuge in Egypt by divine command (Matt. 2:13), and from there he came forth in final fulfillment of Hosea's words (Matt. 2:15, 19) (→ plēroō, 4444).

(4) Egypt is also a symbol of worldliness and materialism. The author of Hebrews, in his account of the heroes of faith, recalls how Moses rejected Egypt's blandishments of rank and material treasures in favor of God's call to deliver his people (11:24–27). This theme of rebel worldliness in opposition to God finds focus also in Rev. 11:8, where the bodies of faithful slain lie in the street of a city "figuratively called Sodom and Egypt." Finally, Paul draws from Gen. 16 the example of Hagar/Ishmael and Sarah/Isaac to illustrate human legalistic devising and divine promise and fulfillment, and to make clear the distinction between law and grace. The former is born of human self-will, under law; the latter is the heir of promise, God's gift from above (Gal. 4:21–31).

132 (aidios, eternal), → 172.

αἰδώς (aidōs), modesty, reverence, respect (133).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl Gk. the noun aidōs, related to the vb. aideomai, to have respect for, stand in awe of, means awe, reverence, modesty. In contrast to hybris, pride, aidōs signifies a respect for the established sacred institutions (e.g., home, marriage, laws of hospitality) or for the privileges of certain people (e.g., king, priest, orator). It also connotes fear of any damage or change to existing circumstances.

(b) At a later period aidōs became an independent concept in individual ethics, signifying the Greeks' sense of self-esteem, honor, or shame. aidōs in this sense came to be associated with sōphrosynē, prudence, discipline, and eleutheria, freedom, as the attitude of the worthy person. This word is limited in use to the language of the elite and to the ethics of the aristocracy in a society divided by a class system.

2. Heb. possesses no equivalent for aidōs. The word is found in the LXX only at 3 Macc. 1:19 in the sense of modesty and in 4:5 for reverence for age. The vb. aideomai occurs 7x in the LXX (5x in Macc.), meaning to stand in awe or show respect.

NT In the NT aidōs occurs only in 1 Tim. 2:9, where Paul writes that women should behave "with decency and propriety." The background of Greek and Stoic ethics is unmistakable, and the context (2:10) makes it clear moderation in dress is not being stressed here as much as "good deeds" as the true adornment of a woman. The noun also occurs in variant texts of Heb. 12:28, where it denotes reverence toward God.

See also aischynē, modesty, shame, disgrace, ignominy (158).

αἷμα (haima), blood (135).

CL & OT 1. Early on haima is used physiologically as the bearer of life and the life force. It is a prerequisite for both in human and animal life. It can also metaphorically denote lineage. Since blood is the seat of life, "shedding blood" becomes a synonym for "kill." Blood guilt had to be atoned for by blood.

haima gained special importance in cultic usage, for it was the most important element in sacrifices. Sacrificial blood was regarded as having strengthening and cleansing power. Greeks and Romans had blood sacrifices for the dead; originally blood was poured over the dead, then later onto the funeral pyre, and finally into the grave and on the grave mound.

Various blood rituals involving the drinking or sprinkling of blood, often including human blood, were employed esp. in magical rites to bring rain, welfare, love, or harm. The drinking of blood, esp. that of a killed enemy, brought strength and gave the gift of prophecy. In a blood covenant human blood was collected in drops in a cup and drunk in wine by all participants.

2. Like the classical world, the OT sees blood as the seat of life (Gen. 9:4; Lev. 17:11, 14; Deut. 12:23). God is the sole Lord of all life. He is sovereign over the blood and life of humankind (cf. Ezek. 18:4). Hence he avenges the shedding of innocent blood (Gen. 9:5; cf. Jer. 51:35–36 = LXX 28:35–36).

Animal blood also belongs to God. It is holy, and its consumption is forbidden on pain of death (Lev. 3:17; 7:26–27 = LXX 7:16–17; 17:10, 14; Deut. 12:23; 1 Sam. 14:32–34). The blood of the sacrificial animals is given back to God, being poured out at the base of the altar. It was used for sprinkling the altar (Exod. 29:16; Lev. 3:2), the high priest (Exod. 29:21), and the tabernacle veil (Lev. 4:6; Num. 19:4). Sacrificial blood also has power for atoning (Lev. 16:6, 15–19; 2 Chr. 29:23–24), purifying (Lev. 14), and sanctifying (Exod. 29:20–21) people. It belongs to the making of the covenant (24:6–8). Blood put on the doorposts protected the firstborn from death (12:22–23).

Later Jud. continued this understanding of blood. The idea of the holiness of blood esp. lived on. The expression sarx kai haima, flesh and blood, is a typical description of humankind in this period.

NT haima is found 97x in the NT. It is used for human blood, both lit. (Mk. 5:25; Lk. 13:1; Jn. 19:34) and fig. (i.e., shed blood, Matt. 23:35); in the combination sarx kai haima, flesh and blood (5x); for the blood of animals in general (Acts 15:20, 29; cf. Lev. 17) and the blood of sacrificial animals in particular (12x in Heb.); theologically most important, for the blood of Christ, where it is linked directly 25x with the saving significance of the death of Jesus; and as an apocalyptic sign (9x).

1. haima as human blood (Jn. 19:34) is the bearer of life (see NIV text note on Jn. 1:13). The expression shedding blood refers to a person's violent death at the hand of others (Rom. 3:15). This idea is to be understood in Heb. 12:4, "You have not yet resisted to the point of shedding your blood." In the same way the blood of Jesus can refer to his violent death, of which Judas (Matt. 27:4), Pilate (27:24) and Israel (27:25; Acts 5:28) are guilty.

God alone is the Lord of all life. Since he controls the blood and life of humanity, he avenges innocent human blood (Gen. 9:5), esp. the blood of the martyrs, of prophets and righteous men (Matt. 23:30, 35; Lk. 11:50–51), and of saints and witnesses to Jesus (Rev. 6:10–11; 16:6–7; 17:6; 18:24; 19:2) who lost their lives for the sake of God's word. Blood can denote the entire person in God's sight, for which each individual will have to give account to God. When Paul said, "Your blood be on your own heads" (Acts 18:6) and "I am innocent of the blood of all men" (20:26), he was looking back to Ezek. 3:17–19: Paul had fulfilled his task of proclaiming the gospel, and the Ephesians were solely answerable to God for their life both now and in eternity.

2. The expression sarx kai haima, flesh and blood, characterizes humanity's weakness and transitoriness and, ultimately, slavery to sin and death. Fear of death (Heb. 2:14–15) is an important sign of our fallen state as creatures (as "flesh and blood"). In our natural state we cannot share God's glory, for "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. 15:50).

The severe limitations of human knowledge are bound up with one's incapacity as a result of sin. Only God has infinite powers of knowledge and revelation. Therefore, true knowledge of God is possible only by his own self-revelation. "This was not revealed to you by man (lit., flesh and blood), but my Father in heaven" (Matt. 16:17). This means the final abandonment of all effort to base the divine revelation on human authority (Gal. 1:16). Christians are engaged in a battle of faith with hostile powers, which are "not . . . flesh and blood" (Eph. 6:12). Hence we cannot find weapons in our own psychological or moral powers, but must turn to God for aid.

3. The NT took over from the OT the concept of sacrificial blood. Heb. 9:7, 12–13, 18–22, 25; 10:4; 11:28; 13:11 mention the sacrificial blood of animals, which serves as a type of the superior blood of Christ, the NT antitype. Jesus' death has a reconciling significance, and his sacrificial blood brings forgiveness and sanctification, establishes peace with God, and provides the foundation of fellowship with him.

In practice the sacrifice was carried out by the haimatekchysia, the shedding of blood. This word is found in the NT only in Heb. 9:22 and cannot be found in non-Christian usage. In context, it refers primarily to the making of the covenant at Sinai (Exod. 24:5–8) and specifically to the killing of the sacrificial animal. Probably the word also includes pouring out blood at the base of the altar (29:12; Lev. 4:7, 18, 25, 30, 34; 8:15; 9:9), throwing it against the altar (Exod. 24:6; Lev. 1:5, 11; 9:12), and throwing it on the people of Israel (Exod. 24:8; Heb. 9:19). In Heb. 11:28 the pouring (or sprinkling) of the blood refers to the Passover sacrifice (Exod. 12:7, 13, 22–23). The OT gave typological expression to the power of the blood to remove sin and save. The NT sees in the death of Christ the ultimate significance and fulfillment of this idea.

Occupying a central position in NT thought is the blood of Jesus Christ (1 Pet. 1:2), the blood of Jesus (Heb. 10:19; 1 Jn. 1:7), the blood of Christ (1 Cor. 10:16; Eph. 2:13; Heb. 9:14), the blood of the Lord (1 Cor. 11:27), the blood of the Lamb (Rev. 7:14; 12:11). It derives its meaning from the sacrifices of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). It is sacrificial blood that Christ, in perfect obedience to God (Rom. 5:19; Phil. 2:8; Heb. 5:8), shed on the cross (Heb. 9:12–14). In his suffering and death Jesus offered the true sacrifice for the removal of sins and reconciliation with God.

By his blood Christ also ransomed and freed the church, the new people of God, from the power of the devil and other evil powers (Acts 20:28; Eph. 1:7; 1 Pet. 1:18–19; Rev. 5:9; 12:11). That blood justifies all who appropriate for themselves his sacrificial death (Rom. 3:25; 5:9) and cleanses them from their sins. God blots out the entire guilt of those who confess their sins to him in faithful trust (1 Jn. 1:7–10; Rev. 1:5; 7:14). Thus, it is possible to have a clear conscience before God (Heb. 9:14; 10:22; 13:18).

In the OT reconciliation and purification were two different, though related, actions. Reconciliation resulted from the bringing of the sacrificial blood into the Most Holy Place on the Day of Atonement; purification could be achieved at any time in the year outside the Most Holy Place. Both are given in the NT in the salvation through the blood of Christ.

In Jesus' blood lies the power for sanctification (Heb. 13:12). It also gives us access to God (Eph. 2:13, 18; Heb. 10:19), and we receive assurance of faith, confidence in prayer, and a changed life (1 Pet. 1:13–23). As the "blood of the covenant" (Matt. 26:28; Mk. 14:24; 1 Cor. 11:25; Heb. 10:29; 13:20), it is the basis of the new divine order, guaranteeing the promises of the new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34).

Blood is sometimes used fig. for the atoning work of Christ (Jn. 6:53–56; Rev. 19:13), the part being used for the whole saving act and work of Jesus (Eph. 1:7). In most of the passages that have been cited, however, one cannot simply substitute the death of Christ for the blood of Christ. Rather, the blood means the application of Jesus' death to the individual. This is clearly indicated in the phrase "the sprinkled blood" (Heb. 12:24). In the OT community reconciliation was carried out visibly with the blood of an animal. In the NT church it is an invisible spiritual reality through the blood of Jesus (1 Pet. 1:2; Heb. 9:13–14; 10:22). As believers appropriate the blood of Jesus, the power of his sacrificial death becomes theirs in all its effects.

4. Blood (and its color, red) symbolically express the eschatological terrors on earth and in heaven in the last days. Here too are direct links with the OT. The NT takes over from Joel the prophecy of the change in the moon's color (2:31[MT 3:4]; cf. Acts 2:20; Rev. 6:12). Similarly, blood and fire are used to picture war (Joel 2:30 [MT 3:3]; cf. Acts 2:19; Rev. 8:7). The change of water to blood refers to eschatological catastrophes (Exod. 7:17–21; Rev. 8:8; 11:6; 16:3–4). The blood of grapes, in the OT a metaphorical expression for wine (Gen. 49:11; Deut. 32:14), becomes a picture of the great judgment on the nations (Rev. 14:19–20; cf. Isa. 63:2–3), when God will destroy all powers opposed to Christ at the end of history.

136 (haimatekchysia, shedding of blood), → 135.

139 (ainesis, praise), → 140.

αἰνέω (aineō), to praise (140); αἶνος (ainos), praise (142); αἴνεσις (ainesis), praise (139); ἐπαινέω (epaineō), praise (2046); ἔπαινος (epainos), praise (2047).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. aineō meant to mention (esp. honorably and so to praise), and to vow, promise, or simply say. The noun ainos meant a saying that is esp. pregnant with meaning or is cleverly phrased, needing explanation. Thus, it also came to mean proverb, story, fable; praise, eulogy. The compound verb epaineō meant to approve, sanction; also to praise, give a public mark of esteem. The corresponding noun epainos meant praise, approval, agreement, song of praise (about a person; for a deity hymnos, song, hymn, was used; → 5631).

2. The LXX uses aineō to translate the Heb. hālal, chiefly in the piel (e.g., 1 Chr. 16:4, 36; Isa. 62:9; cf. Ps. 18:3), though it translates other Heb. vbs. as well. Likewise, epaineō chiefly stands for hālal (e.g., Gen. 12:15; Jdg. 6:20; Ps. 10:3). The noun ainesis is relatively common in the LXX, while ainos and epainos are rare.

The LXX uses aineō only in the sense to praise. There is, however, a striking variation as regards the Heb., where hillēl is used in secular contexts (e.g., in Gen. 12:15, of a beautiful woman; in 2 Sam. 14:25, of a handsome man; in Ps. 10:3, of praise by the wicked; in Jdg. 16:24, of the praise of Dagon). The LXX tends to avoid aineō in its rendering of such passages, keeping it for the regular praise of God in proper worship, esp. in Ps. 146; 150. epaineō and epainos are used for the praise of God by his people, and also for praise among human beings.

NT 1. aineō occurs 8x in the NT (Lk. 2:13, 20; 19:37; Acts 2:47; 3:8, 9; Rom. 15:11 [quoting Ps. 117:1]; Rev. 19:5). ainos occurs only in Matt. 21:16 (quoting Ps. 8:2) and Lk. 18:43, ainesis only in Heb. 13:15. We find the usage of the LXX carried through rigorously; both vb. and noun are used only of the praise of God. The compounds epaineō and epainos are used for both God and human beings.

2. In contrast to cl. Gk., this word group in the NT does not mean praise for a special achievement; it is applied to the whole person and not merely to specific acts. The manner in which epainos and epaineō are used shows clearly that ultimately only God can give this recognition in his saving verdict on the day of judgment (Rom. 2:29; 1 Cor. 4:5; 1 Pet. 1:7). At the present time, however, an individual may receive praise from the church (2 Cor. 8:18), the apostle (1 Cor. 11:2, 17, 22), and authorities appointed by God (Rom. 13:3–4; 1 Pet. 2:14).

3. This word group is preferred where it is a question of the formal praise of God in thanksgivings, prayers, and hymns (Matt. 21:16; Lk. 2:13, 20; 18:43; 19:37–38; Acts

2:47; 3:8–9; Rom. 15:11; Eph. 1:3–6; Phil. 1:11). This praise is given in the present, but it reaches its full development in the new creation (Phil. 1:11; Rev. 19:5). ainesis occurs in the expression "sacrifice of praise" (Heb. 13:15), where the Christian's sacrifice is contrasted with Jewish sacrifices.

αἱρέομαι (haireomai), choose (145); αἵρεσις (hairesis), sect, school, party, group (146); αἱρετικός (hairetikos), factious, heretical, heretic (148); αἱρετίζω (hairetizō), choose (147); διαιρέω (diaireō), distribute, divide (1349); διαίρεσις (diairesis), allotment, division (1348).

CL & OT 1. haireō (act.) is found frequently in cl. Gk. in the sense of take, seize, grasp, understand. But the mid. haireomai, take for oneself, seize for oneself, choose for oneself, is also commonly used. The noun hairesis denotes (a) taking, acquisition, conquest; (b) choice; (c) aspiration, inclination; and (d) purposeful decision or resolve. Thus it always contains an element of action and personal decision.

The adj. hairetikos describes someone who is capable of choice. hairetizō is an intensive form, meaning to choose someone. The derivative diaireō means to take apart or divide in order to differentiate (i.e., to distinguish, separate), then also to allocate. The noun diairesis similarly means dissection, distribution, allocation, and classification. As in the case of hairesis, the emphasis is on the action and only secondarily on the effect.

In later cl. writers and esp. in Hel. Gk., hairesis denotes the teaching or the school of a particular philosopher with which a person identifies by one's own choice. A school of philosophy, which gathered around the authoritative figure of its teacher, was defined by its dogmas, to which the followers assented. Plato used dihairesis as a term for the dialectic method, as employed for the purpose of classifying words.

2. This word group appears infrequently in the LXX. This may be due to the character of the OT concept of election, which was not based on the pattern of free, political choice or of complete freedom to choose a set of teachings or an outlook on life. haireomai occurs 11x and means choose, prefer, delight in. hairesis occurs 5x and denotes a freewill offering or free choice. More frequent is the intensive form hairetizō, choose, which is often used with eklegomai for God's act of choosing (cf. 1 Chr. 28:4, 6, 10; Ps. 25:12; 119:30). The sense of adoption is also present in some examples (Hag. 2:24; Mal. 3:17). diaireō is found chiefly in the sense of classify, apportion (cf. Gen. 32:7; Jos. 18:5; 1 Chr. 24:3–5; Ezek. 37:22). The noun diairesis usually means distribution, part, division (e.g., 1 Chr. 27:1–15), or even clan (Jdg. 5:16).

3. The writings of Philo and esp. those of Josephus contain a specific development of these nouns. hairesis was used to describe both Gk. schools of philosophy and the religious groups within Jud.—the Essenes, the Sadducees, and the Pharisees. The Heb. equivalent in rab. Jud. is mîn, which denotes a member of a sect (hairetikos), not the sect itself. The meaning of the word then underwent a decisive change, being used more often for a heretical sect in a bad sense. This change, which came around A.D. 100, eventually led to mîn being used not to distinguish between groups within the Jewish community, but to designate people of other faiths, e.g., Christians or gnostics. These people stood outside the believing community and were thus considered outside the sphere of salvation.

NT 1. In the NT haireomai occurs only 3x, always in the mid. voice. At Phil. 1:22 and Heb. 11:25 it has the weakened meaning of prefer. Here it overlaps in meaning with thelō (→ 2527) and boulomai (→ 1089). thelō expresses more a sovereign decision with clear, resolute intent, whereas boulomai means a wish and desire based on asserted authority.

In 2 Thess. 2:13 haireomai has a specialized biblical meaning not found in cl. Gk., elect someone to something (here, God's election of the church to salvation). In this sense of God's elective decision, it is to be distinguished from eudokeō, have good pleasure (→ 2305), which expresses God's sovereign choice, and klēroō (→ klēros [3102]), which promises to the chosen, as those called, their appointed destiny. eklegomai (→ 1721), on the other hand, emphasizes the selective aspect of the choice, and dechomai (→ 1312), acceptance and reception on the ground of God's good pleasure.

2. The NT meaning of hairesis follows the usage in Hel. Gk. and Jud. In Acts, where 6 of the 9 examples are found, it refers to the parties of the Pharisees and Sadducees as groups within the Jewish community (5:17; 15:5; cf. 26:5). From the Jewish point of view, Christians too are described as belonging to a sect, that of the Nazarenes (24:5; cf. 24:14; 28:22).

Because of its universal character, the Christian church did not view itself as a hairesis, i.e., a private, unauthorized school or party. Hence in Gal. 5:20 haireseis is listed as one of the works of the sinful nature. Justification for this is provided in 1 Cor.: Anyone who splits the church or breaks it up into parties is dividing Christ, whose body is the church (1 Cor. 1:10–13; 11:18–19; cf. 12:27). Paul draws a distinction between haireseis and schismata. Whereas the latter denotes splits in the church brought about by personally motivated disputes, haireseis add to the division an eschatological aspect. The ruinous haireseis are caused by activities of false teachers, who deny Christ (cf. 2 Pet. 2:1).

In contrast to cl. Gk., hairetikos is used in biblical Gk. for the adherents of a hairesis, i.e., a heretic. In Tit. 3:10 we see the church's procedure for disciplining heretics, following principles stated in Matt. 18:15–20 and 2 Jn. 10.

3. diaireō should be translated in the NT to divide, distribute (e.g., Lk. 15:12: "He divided his property between them"). In 1 Cor. 12:11 Paul speaks of the distribution of spiritual gifts, which the Spirit apportions to the members of the church as he wills. The noun diairesis occurs in the NT only in 1 Cor. 12:4–6 (3x), where it refers to the manifold nature of the gifts of the Spirit and their distribution among the members of the body in the unity of the single grace of God.

αἴρω (airō), to raise up, take away (149); ἐπαίρω (epairō), to lift up, take up (2048).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. airō means to raise up or carry. When a ship raised its sail, it was ready to start out; thus the vb. came to mean to set sail or, more generally, to start out. The vb. was also used in the sense of raising someone's courage. Later it developed the additional meaning of to kill (i.e., to lift up and take away one's life, put an end to). epairō had a more metaphorical meaning of to arouse a person's emotions, to excite; also, to magnify, exalt.

2. Both of these words occur frequently in the LXX. airō often means simply to lift up and carry (e.g., Lev. 10:4–5; Jos. 3:3, 6). But it also had theological significance, as in lifting up one's hands (Ps. 28:2; 119:48), one's eyes (123:1) or one's soul (25:1) to the Lord, or in taking away, forgiving sins (1 Sam. 15:25; 25:28). epairō is essentially a synonym of airō (e.g., lift up one's eyes, Gen. 13:10; lift up one's hands, Ps. 134:2; cf. esp. 24:7, 9, which uses both airō and epairō in parallel). Note, however, that Isa. 6:1 uses epairō when Isaiah sees the Lord exalted on his throne.

NT 1. airō is used 101x in the NT. In most cases, it simply means pick up, take away, carry (e.g., Matt. 14:12, 20; Mk. 2:3). In Jn. 19:15, the crowd calls for Pilate to take Jesus away and crucify him. In Rev. 10:5 an angel raises his right hand to swear an oath.

But airō also has fig. uses similar to the LXX. In Jn. 11:41, Jesus lifts up his eyes and prays to God (note how this verse uses the same vb. for taking away the stone from the tomb of Lazarus), and in Acts 4:24 the early Christians raise their voices in prayer to God. In Col. 2:14 Paul emphasizes that Jesus has taken away or removed our sins by nailing them to the cross, and John points out how the Son of God appeared "so that he might take away our sins" (1 Jn. 3:5). This is probably also the meaning of John the Baptist's affirmation about Jesus as the Lamb of God "who takes away the sin of the world" (Jn. 1:29).

Another specialized use of airō occurs in Matt. 16:24; Mk. 8:34; Lk. 9:23, where Jesus invites and challenges us to deny ourselves, "take up" our cross, and follow him. Our Lord calls us to a dedicated discipleship, even if it means martyrdom.

2. epairō occurs 19x in the NT. Similar to airō, it can denote crying out (lifting up one's voice, Lk. 11:27; Acts 2:14), seeing (lifting up one's eyes, Lk. 16:23; 18:13), and praying (lifting up one's hands to the Lord, 1 Tim. 2:8). Jesus "lifted up his hands" and blessed his disciples (Lk. 24:50), after which he was "taken up" into heaven (Acts 1:9).

αἴσθησις (aisthēsis), experience (151); αἰσθητήριον (aisthētērion), organ of sense, faculty (152).

CL & OT 1. aisthēsis in cl. Gk. means perception by the senses (in contrast to knowledge through rational deduction), experience, sensation; in an ethical context it means judgment.

2. In the LXX aisthēsis is used predominantly in the wisdom literature, esp. meaning knowledge, wisdom, true insight; it frequently includes ethical discrimination and decision. aisthētērion is the organ where such discrimination is made (cf. Jer. 4:19). This insight stands in contrast to inexperience (Prov. 1:4), lack of discipline (12:1), and folly (15:7).Wisdom brings true knowledge of God (2:3–6), which begins with "the fear of the LORD" (1:7).

NT In the NT aisthēsis and aisthētērion are each used only once. In Phil. 1:9 Paul places "insight" (aisthēsis) and "knowledge" (epignōsis, → ginōsko, 1182) side by side as two of love's expressions and functions. Knowledge is directed primarily toward God; discernment is necessary for human relationships, where it must distinguish between good and evil and judge accordingly (cf. esp. 1:10).

Heb. 5:14 says of "the mature" that they have their faculties (aisthētēria) "trained . . . to distinguish good from evil." The concrete organ of sense has here become virtually a habitual ability. It is a spiritual gift, however, that must be developed.

See also ginōskō, know, understand, comprehend, recognize (1182); agnoeō, not know, be ignorant (51).

αἰσχύνη (aischynē), modesty, shame, disgrace, ignominy (158); αἰσχύνομαι (aischynomai), be ashamed, be put to shame, be disgraced, be confounded (159); ἀνεπαίσχυντος (anepaischyntos), not to be ashamed (454); ἐπαισχύνομαι (epaischynomai), be ashamed (2049); καταισχύνω (kataischynō), to dishonor, disgrace, put to shame; pass. to be dishonored, be disappointed (2875); αἰσχρός (aischros), ugly, shameful, base, disgraceful (156); αἰσχρότης (aischrotēs), ugliness, wickedness (157); αἰσχροκερδής (aischrokerdēs), greedy for base gain (153); αἰσχροκερδῶς (aischrokerdōs), greedy for money (154); αἰσχρολογία (aischrologia), foul talk (155).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. aischynō occurs almost exclusively in the mid. or pass. with the meaning to feel shame, be ashamed, or to be confounded, be disconcerted. epaischynomai is a strengthened form of the mid., and kataischynō of the act. and pass. meanings of aischynō. The noun aischynē has the subj. sense of modesty (understood as fear of what is aischron, ugly) and the obj. sense of shame (that which results from an aischron, shameful deed). aischynē is mainly a sociological concept; it exposes a person to the ridicule of society, which he or she tries to escape by being ashamed.

(b) aischros is used lit. and fig. in the sense of base (e.g., base gain). aischrotēs means ugliness.

2. (a) In general the LXX uses aischynō to mean to put to shame; aischynē means shame. This group of words is found most frequently in Isa., Jer., and Ps.; the emphasis is not on the sociological, but on the theological, aspect of aischynō. Frequently Yahweh is the implied or the stated subj. of aischynō, as may be seen from the pass. construction used as a circumlocution for God (cf. Isa. 1:29; 20:5; Jer. 2:26). The psalmists pray for (cf. Ps. 6:10; 35:26; 40:15) and the prophets foretell (Isa. 1:29; 41:11; Jer. 2:26) Yahweh's judgment, which will put their enemies and the ungodly to shame (Ps. 40:14; 83:16–18). Thus in the OT aischynō refers primarily to the obj. ruin of evildoers or of the whole nation (cf. 69:4–7, 19–20).

(b) In the sexual sense aischynō is found frequently in Ezek. (16:36–37; 23:10, 18) and in the normative statement in Gen. 2:25, "The man and his wife were both naked, and they felt no shame." Here shame in the body is the most primitive expression of the feeling of guilt, the sign of a lesion going through one's bodily nature and casting doubt on the unity of body and spirit. This disturbance results from an act of disobedience against Yahweh, and Adam and Eve react to the obj. loss of innocence, and the innermost disturbance of their relationship with God, by the feeling of shame (3:7).

NT This group of words is found much less often in the NT than in the LXX. The noun and vb. together occur only 11x, aischros 4x, epaischynomai 11x, kataischynō 13x, aischrotēs and aischrologia once each, and aischrokerdēs 2x. NT usage is closer to that of the LXX than that of cl. Gk.

1. (a) Mk. 8:38 and Lk. 9:26 use epaischynomai in the sense of to be ashamed. The point of reference is not, however, a virtue or vice, but one's confession of Christ. Being ashamed, i.e., submitting to fear of human ridicule, is rejected as conduct because it denies the eschatological and universal authority of the Son of Man (cf. 2 Tim. 1:8, 16; 1 Pet. 4:16).

(b) In a similar way to the prophets (cf. Jer. 8:9), Paul speaks in 1 Cor. 1:27 of God as actively putting to shame, i.e., nullifying, the wise and the powerful, while he chooses what is foolish and weak in the world, i.e., gives it standing and worth. Through the cross of Christ glory and shame have undergone an exchange of values. Similarly in Rom. 5:5, Paul affirms (lit.): "Hope does not put to shame," i.e., it does not rest on something that does not exist and hence will never disappoint us; instead, it rests on God's promises (cf. 8:24–25).

Rom. 1:16 uses epaischynomai as part of an early Christian confession. The negative phrase, "I am not ashamed," means positively, "I confess." The statement is not psychological but rather forensic: With the gospel I will not be put to shame. Paul takes up the same thought in a pass. form at 9:33, in a quotation from Isa. 28:16: The believer "will never be put to shame," i.e., his or her existence is secured (cf. also 1 Pet. 2:6). It is the apostle's continual concern that he should not be put to shame in his missionary work (2 Cor. 7:14; 9:4), i.e., that he not work in vain (cf. Gal. 2:2; Phil. 2:16; 1 Thess. 3:5). In 2 Tim. 2:15 it is Paul's wish that Timothy should not be ashamed of (anepaischyntos) the gospel but should rightly handle the word of truth. As in the OT, so in Paul's use of kataischynō, the primary meaning is obj., to be put to shame; human feelings of shame are the subj. side of the coin.

(c) The author of Heb. uses epaischynomai with reference to God's saving activity: Christ is not ashamed to call human beings his brothers and sisters (2:11), and God is not ashamed to be called their God (11:16). Christ even takes the public shame (aischynē) of death on the cross upon himself (12:2).

2. aischynē in the NT means shame suffered or self-inflicted (2 Cor. 4:2; Jude 13). Phil. 3:19 and Rev. 3:18 use aischynē with a sexual sense. aischros, disgraceful, is found in the NT chiefly in the phrase aischron estin, "it is a disgrace" (1 Cor. 11:6; 14:35; Eph. 5:12). Peter uses aischrokerdē (an adv. meaning greedy for money) to encourage "shepherds" to serve the church because they want to, motivated neither by guilt nor greed (1 Pet. 5:2). Finally, aischrologia, foul talk (Col. 3:8), and aischrokerdēs, greedy for base gain (1 Tim. 3:8; Tit. 1:7), are found listed in catalogues of sins.

See also aidōs, modesty, reverence, respect (133).

159 (aischynō, be ashamed, be put to shame, be confounded), → 158.

αἰτέω (aiteō), ask, ask for, demand (160); αἴτημα (aitēma), request, demand (161); ἀπαιτέω (apaiteō), demand back (555); ἐξαιτέω (exaiteō), ask for, demand (1977); παραιτέομαι (paraiteomai), ask for, request, excuse, refuse, decline (4148).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the basic meaning of aiteō is to ask or demand; mid., to ask (or desire) for oneself. The noun aitēma, therefore, means the thing asked for, in the sense of a request, desire, or demand. apaiteō intensifies the idea of demanding, usually in the sense of demanding back. exaiteō means to ask for oneself, while paraiteomai, because of the sense attaching to the prefix par-, means to ask to be released from an obligation, to present one's apologies.

2. The Heb. equivalent for asking, wishing, requesting for oneself is šā'al (Deut. 10:12; Jdg. 5:25; 1 Sam. 12:13; Job 31:30; etc.). Used with reference to God, it approximates closely the idea of prayer and is often associated with thanksgiving for answered prayer (e.g., 1 Sam. 1:20; Ps. 105:40). In legal language it can mean to examine (Deut. 13:15), consult. šā'al is rendered by aiteō generally when the desire is for something specific (e.g., Exod. 3:22; Jos. 14:12; Jdg. 5:25; 1 Sam. 12:17); Hannah asks for herself a son from Yahweh and Eli promises her "what you have asked of him" (1 Sam. 1:17). Similarly in Ps., whenever aiteō expresses a promise of answered prayer, it concerns a specific request (e.g., Ps. 2:8; 21:4; 27:4).

NT 1. In the NT aiteō and aiteomai occur 70x. It generally means to request, ask (for oneself). (a) On a human level the mid. form (aiteomai) is almost always used in addressing superiors (e.g., Matt. 14:7; 27:20; Lk. 23:23; Acts 9:2) and thus has an official flavor. In general, the act. form of the vb. (aiteō) has no special nuances. Only in Matt. 5:42 does aiteō have a trace of unpleasantness: to demand something unpleasant, or at least to ask in a way that the other person feels unpleasant (hence it can almost be translated here "accost"). Jesus emphasizes that his followers should respond even to requests such as these. The ethical implications should be noted: I am to overcome my reluctance and open both heart and hand to the person making the request, for the request is nothing less than God calling me to open my heart to him.

(b) In those passages where a request is made to God, no difference in meaning is discernible between the act. and mid. forms of the vb. Such requests are supplicatory prayers (cf. Matt. 21:22), though in the NT other words can also be used (see the cross-reference entries at the end of this article). It is striking that aiteō is never used of Jesus' own requests and prayers, but always deomai or erōtaō (e.g., Lk. 22:32; Jn. 14:16; 16:23–26). This is presumably because erōtaō usually relates to asking a question and retains the flavor of intimate conversation.

(c) Wherever the NT speaks of requests made to God, it emphasizes that such requests are heard by God (cf. Matt. 6:8; 7:7–11; 18:19; 21:22; Mk. 11:24; Jn. 14:13–14; 15:7, 16; 16:23–24, 26; Jas. 1:5; 1 Jn. 3:22; 5:14–15). This fact encourages us to pray with certainty. If there is doubt in our hearts, prayer dies.

What is the basis for this certainty? In Matt. 7:8 the fact that requests are heard is stated as a basic principle of the kingdom of God: "Everyone who asks receives." On the basis of this principle, Jesus says: "Ask and it will be given to you" (7:7). The ultimate foundation of this principle is given in 7:9–11 (cf. also 6:8; Jn. 15:16; 16:23, 26–27; Col. 1:9–12): God is the Father who loves his own more than an earthly father loves his child and who therefore cannot permit their requests to be unavailing, but gives them what they need. In other words, certainty is based on God's fatherly goodness and love. Moreover, God is a living God who hears and sees and has a heart full of compassion.

As God deals with us, so should we deal with our neighbors and respond to their requests (Matt. 5:42). We are to give to them because we experience afresh every day the generosity and fatherly goodness of God.

(d) The NT repeatedly makes the point that the prayer that God hears must be the right kind of prayer. This is alluded to in Matt. 7:7–8, where the vbs. seek (zēteō, 2426) and knock (→ krouō, 3218) are used in parallel with ask. Frequently in the Bible, seeking has God as its obj. It denotes a God-oriented attitude on our part. True prayer must be in keeping with the nature of him to whom it is addressed, in which case our requests will be well-pleasing to God and according to his will (cf. 1 Jn. 5:14). To ask from God means to ask from him something right and good (Matt. 7:11). Lk. interprets this specifically as asking for the Holy Spirit (11:13). In other places true prayer is described as asking in faith (Matt. 21:22; Jas. 1:5–6). In prayer we are never to forget whom we are addressing: the living God, the Almighty One with whom nothing is impossible, and from whom therefore all things may be expected.

To doubt God is to do him an injustice, for it belittles his deity, misjudges his character, and therefore receives nothing from him (Jas. 1:7). True prayer is bound up with faith. Various Johannine passages expand the idea of asking in faith: Jesus' words must remain in us (Jn. 15:7); we must keep his commands and do what pleases him (1 Jn. 3:22); and we must ask in Jesus' name (Jn. 14:13–14; 15:16; 16:24, 26). Since such prayer is heard and since I can be certain of that fact, the result is joy (16:24). Matt. 18:19 may be relevant here: United prayer by several disciples indicates that all selfish desires have been renounced, for selfish prayer is false and receives nothing from God (Jas. 4:3; cf. Mk. 10:35).

2. When the obj. of aiteō is a subordinate person, it easily assumes the meaning to require, demand (Lk. 1:63; Acts 16:29); this is also true when a creditor demands back from a debtor goods given on loan or trust (predicated of God in Lk. 12:48). In 1 Pet. 3:15, "give an answer" (regarding the Christian's hope) means to demand proof of its truth and credibility, or simply to demand information.

This meaning throws light on the implications lying behind the Jews' demand for "signs" (1 Cor. 1:22; → sēmeion, 4956). Those who take this attitude set themselves above God and call him to account; they are demanding that God should justify himself in relation to what he had done in Christ. It is little wonder that Jesus denied their request (Matt. 16:1–4, though erōtaō is used here).

3. (a) The noun aitēma occurs in its nonreligious sense in Lk. 23:24. In its religious sense, i.e., when addressed to God, it means a request and esp. any individual request viewed in relation to its content (e.g., Phil. 4:6; 1 Jn. 5:15).

(b) The compound vb. apaiteō often carries the intensified meaning to demand, but is used particularly in the sense of reclaiming either stolen goods (Lk. 6:30b) or goods loaned out for a limited period (12:20, where God requires back a person's life).

(c) exaiteō occurs only in Lk. 22:31 in the sense of to demand that someone (Peter) be handed over. This demand was made by Satan to Peter's master, namely, God himself, with the alleged purpose of testing the genuineness and steadfastness of Peter's faith, but with the ulterior motive of bringing about his downfall.

(d) In Mk. 15:6 paraiteomai means to ask for someone's release, while in Lk. 14:18–19 it means to ask for one's own release (from the obligation of accepting an invitation). Should the obligation be considered intolerable, then the vb. can mean to refuse, decline (e.g., Acts 25:11, regarding the Roman death penalty; Heb. 12:19, 25, regarding God and his word) or to reject (e.g., 1 Tim. 4:7; 5:11; 2 Tim. 2:23). In Tit. 3:10, church disciplinary measures are in view. The act of rejection here acquires an official character, though whether it refers to official excommunication or merely to the breaking off of fellowship remains an open question.

αἰτία (aitia), ground, cause, reason, charge (162); αἴτιος (aitios), responsible, guilty (165); αἰτίωμα (aitiōma), charge (166); ἀναπολόγητος (anapologētos), inexcusable (406); ἀναίτιος (anaitios), innocent (360); ἀνέγκλητος (anenklētos), blameless, irreproachable (441).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. aitia means the ground or motive of a thought or action, in a causal sense the origin or occasion of a thing, event, or phenomenon. Nevertheless, aitia is seldom used in a good or neutral sense. Usually it carries the sense of charge, accusation, blame, indicating the responsibility and guilt that attaches to an act. Likewise aitiōma, a word not found before Acts but occurring in cl. Gk. in the form aitiama, means a charge against a wrongdoer. aitios means culpable, responsible. The compound adj. anapologētos is used in the same context to indicate the hopelessness of a case for the defense at law; it is found in the 2nd century B.C. with the meaning without excuse.

2. The LXX uses aitia consistently. It occurs over 21x, mostly in the Apocr. (esp. 1–4 Macc.). Apart from 4 Macc. 1:16, where the philosophical concept of causation dominates, the LXX uses deal with some event that belongs to the darker side of life: e.g., fighting (2 Macc. 4:42), idolatry (Wis. 14:27), death (18:18; 1 Macc. 9:10), sensual pleasure (Sus. 14). In Gen. 4:13, Cain cries out: "My punishment [aitia] is more than I can bear." The culpable act and the punishment as its inevitable consequence are for him causally related. Job 18:14 contains an aphorism on the inescapable destiny of the wicked to be smitten by a fatal disease (the LXX here differs from the MT, using aitia in its description of death as a kind of majestic stroke of fate). Prov. 28:17 concludes that "a man tormented by the guilt [aitia] of murder" will go to the grave wandering in insecurity.

3. aitios is used 7x in the LXX: 6x in the Apocr., where it means having become guilty, and at 1 Sam. 22:22, where David declares that he is "responsible for the death" of a family of priests. anapologētos and aitiōma do not occur in the LXX.

NT 1. aitia occurs 20x in the NT. Some texts use the word in a purely causal sense, stating the reason why something happens. Thus the woman with an issue of blood gives Jesus the reason why she touched him (Lk. 8:47). Peter inquires the reason for the visit by Cornelius's men (Acts 10:21). Timothy's mother and grandmother serve as a "reason" for a special reminder by Paul (2 Tim. 1:6). Similar uses are found in 2 Tim. 1:12; Tit. 1:13; Heb. 2:11. The noun aitios is used in Heb. 5:9 in a positive sense of Christ as the "source of eternal salvation for all who obey him."

2. aitia is also used in connection with legal charges and accusations brought against someone. At Matt. 19:3 the Pharisees ask whether divorce is lawful for "every reason," as though it were the inevitable consequence of such causes, whereas Jesus' answer makes possible a new beginning for the disordered marriage. In 19:10, however, aitia means a case or "situation." Possibly there is an allusion here to a concurrent discussion on the connection between marriage and discipleship, which presented a choice between a wife and the Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 7:32–35).

In Acts 22:24; 23:28; 25:18, 27, Luke writes about Paul's trials and is concerned to bring to light the ground of the charges against him or to show that they cannot be established. Acts 25:7 uses for such unprovable allegations the noun aitiōma, accusation (here only in the NT). aitios is used in a similar sense in the story of the disturbance led by Demetrius (Acts 19:40); there is danger that a charge will be laid against the city because of the disorder, for which no satisfactory "account" can be given.

3. A third grouping of NT texts has to do with the occasion for a death sentence. (a) The inscription on the cross specified the "charge" on which Jesus was condemned to death (Matt. 27:37; Mk. 15:26). This indicated to the onlookers that his execution was inevitable because of his claim to kingship. The Gospels, however, testify to a deeper necessity than the immediate human factors, for Jesus' death sprang from the purpose of God. In Acts 13:28 this "proper ground" of death is mentioned in a speech of Paul and is described as unjustified in terms of human justice.

(b) In the report of the trial before Pilate (into which are interwoven many legal ideas), Pilate pronounces his repeated conclusion that he can find no guilt in Jesus deserving death (aitia in Jn. 18:38; 19:4, 6; aitios in Lk. 23:4, 14, 22). Hence in the Gospel accounts the crowd, by demanding the death of an innocent man, is all the more culpable.

(c) Acts 28:18 uses aitia twice, first for the charge made against Paul of committing a capital crime. Since, however, there was insufficient reason (aitia) for the accusation, the Romans wished to save him from unjust condemnation to death.

4. Paul uses anapologētos twice in Romans to mean the state of having no excuse in a legal sense. In the light of eschatology, the ungodly are "without excuse" as they stand before God's destroying wrath (Rom. 1:20). No one is able, under any circumstances, to make an "excuse" to God (2:1). Everyone, whether Jew or Gentile, deserves death; therefore, as the argument of Rom. 2 continues, we are totally dependent on God's free grace and goodness in Jesus Christ. He took our sentence of death on himself and by this means truly "excused" us. The theological emphasis given to the theme that Christ had to suffer is a logical counterpart to the ideas associated with this group of words (cf. Mk. 8:31; 9:12; Lk. 24:26–27; → dei, 1256).

5. The adj. anaitios, innocent, is used in Matt. 12:5, 7 to describe the guiltless condition of priests who "desecrate" the Sabbath by serving in the temple. anenklētos means blameless, irreproachable, and is spoken of Christians who will be presented blameless by Christ on the day of the Lord (1 Cor. 1:8; cf. Col. 1:22). A blameless life is also required of Christian leaders (1 Tim. 3:10; Tit. 1:6–7).

See also elenchō, bring to light, expose, convict, punish (1794); enochos, guilty, subject to, liable to (1944); amemptos, blameless (289).

165 (aitios, responsible, guilty), → 162.

166 (aitiōma, charge), → 162.

168 (aichmalōsia, captivity), → 171.

169 (aichmalōteuō, capture, put in prison), → 171.

170 (aichmalōtizō, capture, take captive), → 171.

αἰχμάλωτος (aichmalōtos), captive, prisoner of war (171); αἰχμαλωτίζω (aichmalōtizō), capture, take captive(170); αἰχμαλωτεύω (aichmalōteuō), capture, put in prison (169); αἰχμαλωσία (aichmalōsia), captivity (168); συναιχμάλωτος (synaichmalōtos), fellow prisoner (5257).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. aichmalōtos means lit. one caught by the spear; hence it denotes a person taken as a prisoner of war. The vb. aichmalōtizō means to take as a prisoner of war, to take prisoner; aichmalōteuō, to lead away into captivity.

2. (a) aichmalōtos occurs 25x in the LXX and usually means to lead off as captive (Num. 21:29; Isa. 14:2) or go into exile (5:13; Amos 6:7). The noun aichmalōsia is far more frequent (130x) and means imprisonment, prisoner, banishment, exile. Usually it refers to the Babylonian exile or the exiles (e.g., Isa. 45:13; Jer. 1:3; Ezek. 1:1–2). aichmalōteuō (45x) and aichmalōtizō (23x) mean to lead into captivity.

(b) Originally Israel had no experience of prisoners of war. The holy war waged under Yahweh's orders required the complete annihilation of the enemy (e.g., Jos. 6:17–21; 1 Sam. 15:3). Gradually, however, changes took place, and the victors began to sell prisoners as slaves (1 Sam. 15:8–9). Women were often regarded as part of the booty (Gen. 34:29; Num. 31:9; Deut. 21:10–14).

(c) The problem of prisoners crops up esp. with the exile, when entire groups of the Israelite population were deported by Assyria and Babylon. For the Israelites the horror of captivity did not merely lie in their being given up into the hands of those ill-disposed toward them. Rather, banishment from their own land meant above all the loss of their claim to that well-being promised by Yahweh as a pledge of his covenant. To live in a foreign and hostile land was tantamount to being cut off from fellowship with the creator and guarantor of their own existence (cf. Ps. 137:1–6). These people knew that captivity and banishment were a punishment inflicted by an angry God (Ps. 78:61–62; Jer. 15:2).

NT 1. This group of words occurs only 12x in the NT. In representing deportation by the Gentiles as God's final punishment (Lk. 21:24), NT apocalyptic echoes the OT's horror at the idea of captivity. It is significant that Lk. 4:18 (quoting Isa. 61:1) explicitly includes the freeing of prisoners among Jesus' various saving acts. The NT understands the freedom that Jesus brings as both facilitating and improving human relations and reconciling humankind with God.

In two OT quotations aichmalōsia occurs in a modified sense (Eph. 4:8 quotes Ps. 68:18; Rev. 13:10 adapts Jer. 15:2). Jer. 15:2 was a message of judgment directed to Jerusalem, but in the case of the church Christians may be called to suffer captivity for their faith. However, they must not resort to force of arms, as Peter did in Gethsemane. In 2 Tim. 3:6 aichmalōtizō means capture, gain control over.

2. Reflecting on his Christian struggle against sin, Paul writes that he sees a principle at work in him that makes him "a prisoner of the law of sin" at work within him (Rom. 7:23). By contrast, Paul's concept of the new life as an exclusive union with the Lord allows him to use aichmalōtizō of the service of Christ: "We take captive every thought to make it obedient to Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5; cf. 2:11; 3:14; 4:4).

3. Paul refers to the imprisonment he shares with various Christians when he calls those esp. close to him synaichmalōtoi, fellow prisoners (Rom. 16:7; Col. 4:10; Phlm. 23).

αἰών (aiōn), aeon, age, life span, epoch, long time, eternity (172); αἰώνιος (aiōnios), without beginning or end, eternal, forever (173); ἀΐδιος (aidios), eternal (132).

CL & OT 1. The Gk. word aiōn, perhaps derived from aei, always, does not consider time so much from the point of view of an abstract period as from the point of view of the time in which one has lived. In Homer aiōn is often parallel with psychē, soul, life; in other poets it denotes a life span or generation. Thence it can mean the time that one has already lived or will live, i.e., it can relate to both past and future. It thus appeared appropriate to later philosophers to use the word both for the dim and distant past and for the far future, eternity.

In Plato, aiōn is developed to represent a timeless, immeasurable, and transcendent super-time, an idea of time in itself. Plutarch and the Stoics appropriate this understanding, and from it the Mysteries of Aion, the god of eternity, could be celebrated in Alexandria. In Hel. philosophy the concept of aeons contributed toward a solution of the problem of the world order. The aeons were assumed to be mediating powers that bridge the infinite qualitative distinction between God and the world. They are an emanation of the divine plērōma, the fullness of the divine being (→ plēroō, to fulfill, 4444). As differing levels of being of the divinity, they rule the various historical periods, which follow one another in a perpetual circular movement. The thought of personal divine aeons was widespread in the speculation of the ancient Orient.

2. (a) aiōn occurs over 450x in the LXX, over 100 in Ps. alone. It is the LXX equivalent for Heb. ʿôlām, a long time or duration, which is also used as an adv. meaning forever, for all time. This fact is not, however, due to this later speculative development in the meaning of the word, but to the primary meaning of life span. This is clearly shown by the way in which the LXX uses the two adjs. aiōnios (ca. 160x) and aidios, both meaning eternal. The latter word, a term of steadiness and unalterability stemming from the syncretism of Hel., Egyptian, and Oriental thought, is found only in Wis. 7:26 as a predicate of wisdom and in 4 Macc. 10:15. By contrast, the frequent occurrence of aiōnios in both OT and NT shows that we are concerned here with a characteristically biblical concrete idea that must be understood in relation to the whole duration of a person's life.

The OT ʿôlām, duration, must always be distinguished from moment, for which regaʿ is used (chronos, → 5989; cf. Isa. 54:7–8). For the point of time of a unique event, the word ʿēt (kairos, → 2789; cf. Mic. 5:3) is available. If ʿôlām/aiōn in the OT thus denotes the time of life, one cannot begin to explain it from those passages in which it is remote antiquity that is regarded as ʿôlām. Rather, it is a case, in the first instance, of an extent of time, e.g., for which a slave is obligated (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17), for which Samuel is consecrated to the temple service (1 Sam. 1:22), and for the priestly service of the sons of Aaron (Exod. 29:9). In all these cases it extends throughout a person's whole life, but is also limited to it. All this comes to an end with the death of the person concerned.

(b) This is also the case in statements made of generations (e.g., Exod. 32:13; 40:15; Ps. 18:50) or of the whole nation (Jos. 4:7; Jdg. 2:1). With the decline of these entities the time here indicated is also ended, without this appearing as a particularly noticeable break, since it was indeed "their" time.

This provides us with the simplest explanation of the so-called eternity formulae: e.g., "Praised be Yahweh the God of Israel, from eternity to eternity [apo tou aiōnos kai heōs tou aiōnos]" (1 Chr. 16:36, lit. trans.). Israel is summoned to constant thanksgiving and praise (16:34), linked with the continuing of the nation in its generations. In fact, "eternal" and "for a thousand generations" stand in parallel in 16:15. The formula "from eternity to eternity" is thus best derived from the other formula "to eternity to the generations [eis ton aiōna eis tas geneas autōn]" (Exod. 40:15, lit. trans.; cf. Isa. 13:20). The formula thus regains its true sense in that even here it is not a question of an eternity conceived of in abstract and infinite terms, but in terms of one's life and praise in relation to God. The content of God's eternal promises is never an abstract unchangeability, but a mutual relationship with human beings (cf. 1 Sam. 2:30; 3:13–14): As long as it is intact, it is eternal, but it can fall to pieces.

(c) Even the great promises, which are established forever, are not simply timelessly and irrevocably valid. They remain bound to their living point of reference in the living God (e.g., in 1 Ki. 9, the eternity of the temple is bound to God's living presence; 2 Sam. 7 refers to the eternity of the Davidic monarchy). Human life is limited (Gen. 6:3); it cannot therefore be the ground of endless duration. But because the eternal God lives (cf. the polemic against the dead idols in Isa. 40 and 44), his action and his salvation are eternal (45:17), his covenant endures (55:3), and his will is incontestable (Exod. 12:14–24; 27:21).

(d) This explains why ʿôlām is able not only to designate subsequent and future time (Gen. 13:15; Exod. 14:13, Deut. 13:16; 23:3, 6; 29:29; Jos. 8:28; Mic. 4:7) but also remote antiquity (Gen. 6:4; Deut. 32:7; Mic. 5:2). All time is related to the action in history of the living God (Joel 2:1–11). It is true that there are tendencies in the later portions of the OT toward abstract concepts of eternity (Ps. 9:5; 21:4; cf. Sir. 1:2), and there are even passages in the Apocr. that speak of an eternity entirely removed from time (with Prov. 8:23 as the point of departure). But it remains significant that in the OT ʿôlām/aiōn always retain the relatedness of time to life. The idea that the time in which human beings live is not eternity and that eternity is the "time" in which God lives does not correspond with the OT conception.

3. This sense of the word is also continued in the older Jewish apocalyptic writings (e.g., 1 Enoch) and in the Dead Sea Scrolls. The word ʿôlām pales increasingly until it becomes an epithet for everything connected with God and his heavenly world—angels, the final judgment, the blessings of salvation, even the pious.

It is only in the rab. Jud. at the turn of the era and in the apocalyptic lit. of the 1st cent. A.D. (e.g., 2 Esd.) that one finds a new use of ʿôlām, which exhibits a spatial significance as well as a temporal one. Under the influence of Persian thought, the OT statements concerning primal and final time (Isa. 24–27; Joel 2) are systematized into a doctrine of the two worlds (aeons), whose only remaining common factor is that God is the Lord of this world as of that, the Lord of this age as of that. They are related antithetically, for this age is the time of unrighteousness, sin, and pain. But when the age to come supersedes this one, all this will come to an end, since there will then be a new earth, where the righteous will live.

The NT affinity of the terms aiōn, aeon, and kosmos, world (→ 3180), is also based on this idea. The expected Messiah either brings in the future age himself, or "the days of the Messiah" are thought of as an interim period, which are followed by the new age. This is reflected in the terms "this age" and "the age to come."

NT 1. In the NT the noun aiōn occurs over 100x, the adj. aiōnios 70x, and aidios only 2x (Rom. 1:20 of the unchangeable power and deity of God; Jude 6 of the eternal chains of the fallen angels). aiōn has the following meanings: (a) A long time, duration of time, where both a specifically limited period of time as well as an unlimited period can be meant; it is chiefly linked with a preposition. The meaning "eternity" is only appropriate with certain qualifications, since the OT idea of time, which predominantly conditions the NT, does not regard eternity as the opposite of temporality.

(b) An age, epoch, era (of the world), especially in Matt. with reference to the end of the world (13:39; 28:20). This denotes the course of world events. It is also used in the pl. with this meaning (e.g., Heb. 9:26; 1 Cor. 10:11). The underlying idea is that the world runs its course in a series of successive ages.

(c) Occasionally we see a meaning of aiōn in the spatial sense, probably going back to the influence of Jewish apocalyptic (e.g., Mk. 4:19; 1 Cor. 2:6; esp. (pl.) Heb. 1:2; 11:3).

2. The simple grammatical evidence of the use of aiōn in the NT points back to two sources: the OT and Jud. influenced by Persian thought. The prepositional use of aiōn in the NT (more than 60x) does not elucidate the connection between aiōn, time, and life for the reader as well as its use in the OT. It is true that even here one can scarcely deny the connection (eis ton aiōna means "never" in 1 Cor. 8:13; "forever" in Lk. 1:55), but, insofar as a preposition precedes it, one can only consider the designation of "antiquity" or the "far future" as the essential NT use of the word.

(a) The meaning of antiquity (with prepositions apo, from, pro, before, ek, from) is rare. It occurs in Lk. always in the context of statements that God has from of old spoken through the prophets (Lk. 1:70; Acts 3:21; 15:18), and—as all three passages make clear—through the primal prophet Moses (cf. Lk. 24:27). It is also found in Jn. 9:32 in the sense of "never since the world began [ek tou aiōnos]." In 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26; and esp. Jude 25 the meaning verges on pretemporal eternity.

(b) The same shift of meaning can also be seen in the far more widely attested statements about the future, which are uniformly linked only with eis, into (and generally with the sing. of aiōn). It is further clear that passages such as Matt. 21:19; Mk. 3:29; Lk. 1:55; Jn. 13:8; and 1 Cor. 8:13 are speaking of a future within time that is linked with the duration of that to which reference is made. Yet the statements of the Johannine writings, which cannot always be pinned down with absolute certainty of meaning (e.g., Jn. 4:14; 6:51, 58; 8:35, 51–52; 1 Jn. 2:17; 2 Jn. 2), Heb., where the meaning is clear (e.g., 1:8, quoting Ps. 110:4; Heb. 5:6; 6:20), and naturally those cases where aiōn is used in the pl., all reveal a strong inclination to conceive of a timeless, posttemporal, eternity.

These uses stand in theological (Jn.), Christological (Heb.), or doxological contexts (pl. statements, e.g., Rom. 1:25; 11:36). As in the OT, these statements reveal the background conviction that God's life never ends, i.e., that everything belonging to him can also never come to an end. So it comes about that even where the conception of the age is intensified (e.g., eis tous aiōnas tōn aiōnōn; lit., "to the eternity of eternities"), the connection with the basic meaning of aiōn as life span is still not lost. What appertains to the living God is "eternal." But one must not forget that this God is also the final judge, so that even perdition must be called aiōnios (Matt. 18:8; 25:41, 46; Mk. 3:29; 2 Thess. 1:9; Heb. 6:2; Jude 7).

3. It is quite a different matter with the use of the word aiōn occurring as a noun (40x). This must be seen against the background of Jewish apocalyptic lit. The word serves as the principal term for the NT's understanding of its history and eschatology. This meaning of aiōn, age, occurs throughout the NT.

(a) For the Synoptics, the most important fact is that the kingdom of God has dawned. If details are taken over from apocalyptic, then it is only in order to say that the present age is approaching its end because the kingdom of God has come. The contrast between the two ages is scarcely discernible; it merely serves to throw into relief the different nature of the course of the world under the reign of Christ. His return and the resurrection of the dead follow on his own resurrection. The new age has dawned with Jesus. The period until the Parousia enables the Christian community to proclaim the gospel.

Matt. displays the fullest and most vivid conception of the aeons in the sense of distinguishing between two successive worlds of space and time, for here alone is found the typical distinction between "this age" and "age to come" (12:32). In answer to the question concerning the time of the end of the world and the signs of the messianic future (24:3), Matt. is able to give a clear reply, not only in the subsequent apocalypse (chs. 24–25, here without the word aiōn), but even more clearly in the interpretation of the parable of the wheat and the weeds (13:36–43, cf. 13:49). But this is vastly different from, e.g., the conceptions in Qumran: There is no final battle and no dualism of different worlds, rulers, and subjects. The Son of Man is Lord; the devil may well be able to bring ruin, but he is no real counterpart to the Son of Man. The world is and remains God's creation. The aeons are not authorities in their own right, nor are they emanations of God or his delegates.

(b) Paul also makes use of apocalyptic concepts in his eschatology. He uses aiōn to designate the course of the world apart from Christ and under the control of sin (Gal. 1:4, Christ "rescued us from the present evil age"; cf. Rom. 12:2). Satan is admittedly "the god of this age" (2 Cor. 4:4), and the present world is dominated by evil, demonic powers. But against the power of darkness is ranged the victorious kingdom of Christ (cf. Col. 1:13).

It is clear from Paul's confrontation with his opponents in Corinth that he understands the course of the world from the perspective of Jewish apocalyptic. The enthusiast group believed that, with baptism, they had already reached the goal of redemption and the resurrection from the dead (1 Cor. 15:12–24; cf. 2 Tim. 1:18). The Corinthian pneumatists replaced future eschatological expectation with a present eschatology; final salvation had already come to them. Paul, too, could stress that the fullness of time (Gal. 4:4) and the new creation has already begun (2 Cor. 5:17), in which Christ has delivered his church from the present evil age (Gal. 1:4). But in 1 Cor. 15:20–28, by contrast, his starting point is that the rule of Christ has not yet achieved its final goal; and later Eph. 1:21 maintains that this age still persists and that the future one is still awaited.

Thus Paul does not develop any systematic doctrine of aeons, nor does the rest of the NT. The ages are interlocked. Eschatology is determined solely by the revelation of Christ, with Christ as the turning point of time. With him the now of salvation has arrived (cf. Rom. 3:21; Col. 1:26). For the believer, the present age (1 Cor. 1:20; 3:18; 10:11) belongs to the past. The proper antithesis to this age is God himself, his righteousness, and his kingdom.

(c) In Heb. this age is called "the present time [kairos, → 2789]" (9:9) and the new age "the time [kairos] of the new order" (9:10). The equation of aiōn and kosmos (1:2; 9:26; 11:3) probably originates in Jewish linguistic usage, but it can also be evidenced in Gnosticism. The frequent pl. aiōnes, meaning world (in the spatial rather than the temporal sense), goes back to the conception of the various layers of the world frame or of a multiplicity of world systems. Four and even seven aeons can be found in Jewish writings.

Yet despite the adoption of many Hel. linguistic and conceptual elements, Heb. holds fast to the primitive Christian eschatological proclamation. It knows the sequence of two ages (which in Heb. are Christologically defined), for the end of the ages (9:26) has come because Christ has appeared in order to abolish sin by the sacrifice of himself. The present age is defined by sacrifice and the first tent, while the new age is concerned with God's working in the heavenly sanctuary. There Christ has already instituted the priestly ministry, and the Christian community is already on the way there (9:8–15; cf. 10:19; 13:14). The new age reaches out from the heavenly world into the present time. Even if hidden, it is already present (6:5).

(d) In 2 Pet., by contrast, the author develops a distinctly futurist eschatology. Even though the mighty Parousia of Jesus Christ (1:16) and entrance into his eternal kingdom (1:11) are expressly mentioned, interest is directed rather to the future blessings of salvation—the reward of the righteous, participation in the divine nature (1:4). The letter concentrates on the proclamation of the end time, the certainty of judgment (2:4–10; 3:5–10), the dissolution of the existing order (3:11–12), and the promise of "a new heaven and a new earth, the home of righteousness" (3:13). The letter closes with the doxology: "To him be glory both now and forever [lit., to the day of eternity]! Amen" (3:18).

4. The expression "eternal life," corresponding to the basic meaning of aiōn as defined by the OT, should be understood primarily as life that belongs to God. From the book of Dan. on, "eternal life" is an expression of the longed-for eschatological blessings of salvation, life in the age to come (cf. Dan. 12:2). In the Synoptics (e.g., Matt. 18:8; 19:16, 29; 25:41, 46), Paul's letters (e.g., Rom. 2:7; 5:21; Gal. 6:8; 1 Tim. 1:16; 6:12), and Jude 21, there is a temporal understanding of eternal life (→ zōē, 2437). This is a life that is awaited in the future along with the resurrection of the dead, just as the term can be used in Jud. alternately with the kingdom of God (cf. Matt. 25:34; 1 Cor. 6:9–10) to denote salvation.

Jn. understands eternal life in relation to Christ through faith and love and in keeping the commands of Christ (e.g., Jn. 3:15–16, 36; 4:14, 36; 17:2–3). The word "eternal" here indicates a definite quality: It is a different life from the old existence typified by hate, sin, pain, and death. Eternal life does not therefore just begin in the future; it is already the possession of those who have entered fellowship with Christ. Thus 3:15 speaks of having eternal life in the present. But there is also a temporal sense, so that eternal (aiōnios) indicates the quantity of this life: Because it belongs to Christ, who himself is the life (14:6), it has no end. It will not cease even at death (8:51; 11:25–26). One must also observe that the NT does not use the phrase "eternal death," because the idea of eternity is so closely connected with life that the negation of eternal life can also only be understood as the experience of ruin.

5. Surveying the usage of the word aiōn, aeon, and the connected eschatology, one can establish that, with all the varied accentuations, the NT speaks of eternity in the categories of time. Any dualism between two world systems is thus foreign to it. The world is and remains God's creation, and Christ is the Lord of the worlds, even if his lordship is hidden. Thus, the expression ho mellōn aiōn, the age to come, is used with great caution. It is "today" that stands in the center of the statements, and what is coming is only relevant in view of the respective present. Everywhere the NT exercises conscious discretion in the face of events of which knowledge is forbidden (Matt. 24:37–44; 1 Thess. 5:1–3). This is also a warning to Christians today not to speculate about God's mystery.

ἄκανθα (akantha), thorn (180); ἀκάνθινος (akanthinos), thorny, of thorn (181).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. akantha denotes a thorn tree or bush as well as any prickle, whether of plant, animal (e.g. porcupine), or fish. The adj. means thorny, made of thorn wood, and is even used of "thorny questions."

2. The LXX uses akantha with literal reference in Exod. 22:6; Jdg. 8:7, 16; Song 2:2. But the symbolic is never far away. Literal and symbolic combine in Gen. 3:18 (= LXX 3:19), where the growth of thorns symbolizes the new perversity of nature after Adam and Eve sinned. The main figurative uses are for affliction (Ezek. 28:24) and that which is hazardous, full of difficulty (Prov. 15:19), painful, or out of place (26:9). "Thorns for grapes" typifies disappointed and blighted hopes (e.g., Isa. 5:2, 4, LXX only) and looks back to Gen. 3:18 as its origin. Thorns are the wild growth that comes when cultivation ceases (Isa. 5:6), not only physically but spiritually and religiously (e.g., Isa. 34:13; Hos. 10:8).

NT The literal meaning blends with symbolic in Jesus' "crown of thorns" (Matt. 27:29; Mk. 15:17; Jn. 19:5): He is not only in intense suffering but bearing the fruit of the curse of Gen. 3:18. Thorns are the enemy of growth (Matt. 13:7) and spiritually are specified as the anxious care typical of this world, the deceptive allure of riches, and all manner of desires (13:22; Lk. 8:14). They evidence failure to respond to God's Word and reveal an unregenerate heart (Heb. 6:8).

ἀκαταστασία (akatastasia), disorder, revolution (189); ἀκατάστατος (akatastatos), restless, unstable (190).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. this word generally has a political meaning, referring primarily to the disorder, anarchy, or confusion that can result from a variety of disruptions in the state. akatastatos, by contrast, has the much more psychological meaning of being restless, unsettled. The LXX uses akatastasia in Prov. 26:28 to denote the ruin caused by a flattering mouth and a lying tongue. In a similar vein, Tob. 4:13 speaks of "great confusion" that is brought about as a result of giving in to the sin of pride (here, by refusing to take a wife from among one's own people). The related adj., akatastatos, addresses the city of Jerusalem in a state of restlessness, tossed by the storms of life (Isa. 54:11).

NT 1. akatastasia occurs 5x in the NT. It can mean, as in cl. Gk., political instability. In his eschatological discourse, Jesus predicts the coming of wars and "revolutions" as one sign of the end of this age (Lk. 21:9). Disturbances also resulted as Paul spread the gospel in the Greco-Roman world. On more than one occasion he was imprisoned after his enemies had caused "riots" (2 Cor. 6:5; cf. Acts 16:16–24) in their opposition to the apostle.

2. But the NT also uses this word to refer to disruption among human beings in general and esp. in the church. In Jas. 3:16, the author stresses that if we harbor envy and selfishness in our hearts, it will result in "disorder" in our relationships with others and in other sorts of evil practices. Paul expresses a fear that if he returns to Corinth, things will erupt into a total state of disarray because of the hard feelings between himself and some of the believers in Corinth. One of the words he uses to describe this potential situation is akatastasia, disorder (2 Cor. 12:20).

3. Finally, akatastasia has a liturgical connotation in 1 Cor. 14. In that chapter Paul is dealing with the problem of spiritual gifts, esp. that of tongues and prophecy. He does not want glossolalia to get out of hand in the church, and he endorses prophecy as superior to speaking in tongues. But even in prophecy it can happen that several people feel led to utter a prophecy at the same time. Thus the apostle encourages those who have that gift to wait their turn and insists that the prophecies that are uttered must be evaluated by the prophets. His final conclusion to this issue is a general statement about God: "For God is not a God of disorder but of peace" (14:33; see also eirēnē, peace, 1645).

4. akatastatos is used in Jas. 1:8 to describe someone who continually doubts the will and power of God; such a person is double-minded and "unstable" in all that he or she does. The same word is used later in this book to denote one of the features of the tongue, that it is "restless" and capable of great evil (3:8). No one is able to tame the tongue.

Ἀκελδαμάχ (Hakeldamach), Akeldama (192).

This place name is found only in Acts 1:19, where it refers to a field that Judas purchased with the thirty pieces of silver and where he presumably committed suicide. It can be identified with the field purchased by the priestly authorities (Matt. 27:3–10), the two being linked by the popular designation of the place as "Field of Blood."

Problems surround several aspects of this matter.

1. The acquisition of the field. Matthew's account (27:7) says that the priests made the purchase, whereas Acts 1:18 makes Judas the purchaser. Since Matt. 27:3 associates Judas's contribution with the condemnation of Jesus and records that he took immediate steps to relieve himself of the accursed money, we ought to understand Acts as merely intending to make a direct link between that which was paid to Judas and the purchase of the field. In this regard, the priests were but his agents.

2. The relation of Akeldama to the death of Judas. Matt. explains that the name "Field of Blood" arose from the use of blood money in its purchase. Acts does not absolutely require more than this; it does not specify that Judas's suicide took place there; at most it offers the circumstance of his death as additional justification for such a repellent nomenclature. In any event Judas's suicide became notorious through the grim details as recorded in Acts. After his hanging, the body fell—before or after death, or perhaps in the actual death throes of the unfortunate man.

ἀκολουθέω (akoloutheō), follow (199); ἐξακολουθέω (exakoloutheō), follow (1979); ἐπακολουθέω (epakoloutheō), follow (2051); παρακολουθέω (parakoloutheō), accompany, understand (4158); συνακολουθέω (synakoloutheō), follow (5258).

CL & OT 1. akoloutheō means go somewhere with someone, accompany, follow, and (with hostile intentions) pursue. It developed a metaphorical meaning: follow the drift, understand. Substantival forms meaning disciple or discipleship also occur. Among the Stoics akoloutheō had philosophical connotations. To follow nature or God is the basic direction of the philosophical life.

2. The cl. Gk. meanings continue in the LXX. Elisha wants to follow Elijah as his servant (1 Ki. 19:20). Usually the words have no theological force (e.g., Ruth 1:14). There are no OT precedents for the more specific NT usage of akoloutheō; it never speaks about becoming like God, only obeying him.

2. In rab. Jud. the words describe the relationship of a pupil to a teacher of the Torah. The pupil who subordinates himself to a rabbi follows him everywhere, learning from him and serving him. His obligation to serve is an essential part of learning the Mosaic law. The goal of such learning and training is a complete knowledge of the Torah and the ability to practice it in every situation.

NT 1. The restricted use of these words in the NT is important. (a) akoloutheō appears almost exclusively in the Gospels. The compound vbs. are used less and are not usually applied to people, except for synakoloutheō, accompany (Mk. 5:37; 14:51; Lk. 23:49).

(b) Following does not always involve being a disciple. When the Synoptics speak of crowds following Jesus (cf. Matt. 4:25; 8:1; 21:9; Mk. 10:32), they use the word in a neutral sense.

(c) The word has special significance when it refers to individuals. On Jesus' lips it often appears as an imperative, as when he calls disciples to follow him (Matt. 9:9 par.; 8:22 par.; 19:21 par.; Jn. 1:43; 21:19–22). Those called do follow (e.g., Lk. 5:11). akoloutheō is thus the call to intimate discipleship of the earthly Jesus. Jn. hints at its spiritual implications for fellowship with the Exalted One (esp. Jn. 12:26). In Rev. 14:4 akoloutheō denotes those who have shared in the lot of suffering of the slaughtered and exalted Lamb.

2. akoloutheō in the Synoptics connotes going behind. This fact supports the idea of an affinity with the teacher-pupil relationship of the rabbis. But there are characteristic differences between the disciples of Jesus and those of the rabbis.

(a) Jesus did not wait for voluntary followers. He called people with divine authority as God called the prophets in the OT (Mk. 1:16–18 par.; Matt. 8:22).

(b) Jesus did not call his followers to master certain traditions. He pointed them instead to the future dawn of the kingdom of God (Lk. 9:59–60). To be a disciple of Jesus was a calling to help in the service of the kingdom (Mk. 1:15). Those called shared in his authority. They were sent to the same people (cf. Matt. 15:24 with 10:5–6), with the same message (cf. Matt. 4:17 with 10:7), to do the same mighty deeds (Mk. 3:14–15). They will sit with him on the throne to judge (Matt. 19:28; Lk. 22:30).

(c) One who takes up the new calling gives up an old one. This is not an oppressive precondition, however; it follows self-evidently (Mk. 1:16–20; Matt. 9:9). Note the rich young ruler (Mk. 10:17–22) who could not free himself from his old ties. Even the disciple who is already following Jesus is not exempt from the danger of making new reservations in the life of discipleship (cf. Matt. 8:21–22 par.).

(d) Since the disciple cannot expect any better fortune than one's Lord (cf. Matt. 10:24–25), readiness for suffering becomes a part of discipleship: "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me" (Mk. 8:34; cf. Matt. 10:38). To take up one's cross means being ready for death (→ stauros, 5089). Readiness to suffer is only made possible through self-denial, which consists in freedom from oneself and from all forms of personal security.

3. John takes over Synoptic phraseology (Jn. 1:43) but tends to see it more within the framework of his total vision. Jesus appeared as light and life in a world of death and darkness. Anyone who follows him (8:12) walks in the light and is saved. Thus, following Jesus means accepting his revelation (cf. Jn. 12:44). People's lives find a new purpose as they are directed into the true life. To follow the call of the Shepherd (10:4, 27) means both safety in Christ and fellowship in suffering with him (12:26), which in turn means exaltation with him (12:32).

4. The rest of the NT expresses fellowship with Christ in such words as Paul's concept of being in Christ or in his idea of imitation (→ mimeomai, 3628) of Christ.

See also mathētēs, learner, pupil, disciple (3412); mimeomai, imitate, follow (3628); opisō, behind, after (3958).

ἀκούω (akouō), hear, listen, attend, perceive by hearing (201); ἀκοή (akoē), hearing, the ear, a thing heard, message, teaching, report, rumor (198); ἀκροατής (akroatēs), hearer (212); εἰσακούω (eisakouō), obey, pass. to be heard (1653); ἐπακούω (epakouō), listen to, hearken to(2052); ἐπακροάομαι (epakroaomai), listen attentively (2053); παρακούω (parakouō), fail to hear, take no heed (4159); παρακοή (parakoē), disobedience (4157); ἐνωτίζομαι (enōtizomai), pay attention to, hear (1969).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. akouō refers primarily to the perception of sounds by the sense of hearing. The person or thing heard is in the acc.; the person from whom something is heard is in the gen. or uses the preps. apo, para, or ek. Hearing, however, covers not only sense perception but also the apprehension and acceptance by the mind of the content of what is heard. The related noun akoē means the sense of hearing, the act of hearing, the organ of hearing (the ear), and the content of hearing (the message).

(b) Hearing plays a part in every religion. The general tendency of the Gk. and Hel. world, however, was to stress seeing the divinity. Nevertheless, the idea that the gods hear and listen is not foreign to paganism.

2. In the LXX akouō or akoē stands consistently for Heb. šāmaʿ and shares the shades of meaning of that vb. Here too the primary meaning is sense perception by the human ear. But apprehension is immediately involved as soon as one receives a statement, piece of news, or message (Gen. 14:14). Such apprehension demands listening (4:23; 23:11), understanding (11:7; 42:2), and acceptance of the thing heard. Hence, šāmaʿ and akouō acquired the meaning obey. The akouō compounds also occur in the LXX for šāmaʿ with little difference in meaning.

3. (a) In biblical revelation hearing has much greater significance than in the Gk. or Hel. world. For God meets human beings through his Word, and we are charged with hearing that Word. This does not, of course, exclude God's revelation in the visible sphere. For example, God revealed himself to Moses in the burning bush (Exod. 3:1–6); and in the vision that constituted his call, Isaiah saw Yahweh in the temple surrounded by seraphim singing his praises (Isa. 6:1–7). But, as in most cases of the visible revelation of God's commission, here each visible revelation was linked with a verbal prophetic mission, which had to be heard and followed. Likewise, the visions that are frequently described in the prophetic writings (e.g., Amos 7–9; Jer. 1:11–19) require interpretation. Here too seeing and hearing form a unity.

(b) Moses, with whom "the LORD would speak ... face to face" (Exod. 33:11), lived in the memory of his people as the model bearer of the divine, verbal revelation. The Decalogue given to him (Exod. 20:1–17; Deut. 5:6–21) is introduced by the solemn "Hear, O Israel" (Deut. 5:1). This command also stands as an urgent warning before the command to love God (Deut. 6:4–5).

The prophetic revelation presupposed that the content of God's will was already known (Mic. 6:8). As bearers of the divine revelation, the prophets warned the people, the nations, and even heaven and earth to hear God's word, which was coming through themselves (Isa. 1:2, 10; Jer. 2:4; 7:2; 9:20 = LXX 9:19; Mic. 1:2). But equally we hear the prophets complaining that Israel had not heard the voice of its God and was unwilling to do so (Hos. 9:17; Jer. 7:13; Ezek. 3:7). Thus the preexilic prophets in particular became preachers of judgment. God lets his judgment fall on a people who will not hear, nor is he himself any longer willing to hear this people (Isa. 1:15; cf. Ezek. 8:18). In the catastrophes that overtook Israel, culminating in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Babylonian captivity, the postexilic prophets saw God's judgment on the people for their unwillingness to hear (Zech. 7:8–14).

The end result of the exile was that Israel became the people of the law, who sought to render the obedience they owed to God by the painstaking fulfillment of his will down to the last detail. For this reason the most important part of the tradition was the Torah, the law, contained in the Pentateuch. These five books contain a strong emphasis on the relation between hearing and doing (Exod. 19:5, 8; Deut. 28:1; 30:11–14). As the divinely commissioned bearers of revelation, the prophets stood beside the Torah at the center of religious faith. "The Law and the Prophets" is in the NT a comprehensive description of the OT writings. To hear them is the task of the pious Israelite (cf. Matt. 5:17–20; 22:40; Lk. 16:29).

(c) The tendency to listen to the law was strengthened in Jud. by the rise of synagogues with their regular Sabbath worship. The synagogue became the focal point of the Jewish communities beyond the borders of Palestine. The recitation of the Shema (consisting of parts of Deut. 6:4–9; 11:13–21; and Num. 15:37–41) had a fixed place in their worship. In addition, the pious Jews recited daily the Shema as an obligation of faith and witness. In principle any suitably qualified member of the community could expound the Torah in the synagogue services. Yet the formation of a class of expositors, called rabbis, is understandable. Their expositions of Scripture were handed down orally until they were fixed in writing in the Mishnah and later the Talmuds (2d cent. A.D. and later). Thus, hearing acquired even greater significance in Jud., esp. since in the rab. view the time of revelation was over.

4. Just as people hear God, God hears them. This is the major way whereby the living God differs from idols, which have ears but do not hear (e.g., Ps. 115; 135:17; Wis. 15:15). Thus the psalmists pray, "Give ear to me and hear my prayer" (Ps. 17:6; cf. 31:2; 86:1; etc.). And in the figurative sense the OT often speaks of the "ears" of God, who hears what people say (Num. 12:2), such as their cry for help as well as their grumbling (Exod. 3:7; Num. 14:27).

Not only does God hear prayer, he also answers it. This too can be expressed by šāmaʿ and akouō (Ps. 30:10). But in these cases we more often find the LXX using the compounds eisakouō and epakouō, which are particularly frequent in the language of prayer (e.g., Ps. 3:4; 20:1, 6, 9; Isa. 49:8). enōtizomai, pay attention to, hear, is derived from ous, ear. Thus, the OT contains a whole range of statements in which pious Israelites express their certainty that God hears and answers prayer. It is put particularly beautifully in Ps. 94:9: "Does he who implanted the ear not hear?" On the other hand, guilt can step between God and humankind and make his ear deaf, so that he does not hear (Isa. 59:1–2).

NT 1. The NT use of akouō (more than 400x) follows the cl. Gk. and OT uses. The noun akoē (24x) denotes the sense of hearing (1 Cor. 12:17), the act of hearing (Rom. 10:17; 2 Pet. 2:8), the ear (esp. the pl.; cf. Mk. 7:35; Acts 17:20), and a message or report (Rom. 10:16; 1 Thess. 2:13; Heb. 4:2). Hence the "hearing of faith" (lit. trans. of Gal. 3:2, 5; cf. Rom. 10:17) is the apostolic message that has faith as its content and is spoken and received as God's word (1 Thess. 2:13).

Of the compounds, eisakouō (5x) is used of God hearing (Lk. 1:13; Acts 10:31) and of people hearing (i.e., obeying; 1 Cor. 14:21, in dependence on Isa. 28:11–12). parakouō (3x) means fail to hear, leave unheeded in Mk. 5:36; in Matt. 18:17 it means refuse to hear, be disobedient. The noun parakoē (3x), disobedience, refers to Adam's disobedience to God (Rom. 5:19), to the Corinthians' disobedience to Paul (2 Cor. 10:6), and to human disobedience to the word of God spoken through angels (Heb. 2:2). enōtizomai (used once) means "listen carefully" in Acts 2:14. The rare word epakroaomai (used once) means to listen to (Acts 16:25), while the related noun akroatēs (4x), listener, occurs in Rom. 2:13; Jas. 1:22, 23, 25, where the hearer of the law (or of the word) is contrasted with the doer.

2. (a) The many shades of meaning of akouō become apparent when we ask the theological question how one hears the NT message. The content of this message is Jesus Christ, the Messiah promised under the old covenant. To those who believe in him are given the fullness of salvation and a new revelation that surpasses that of the OT. This revelation, which has been manifested in Christ, is perceived not just through hearing but also through seeing (Lk. 2:20; Jn. 1:14; Acts 4:20; 1 Jn. 1:1; see also horaō, 3972). Jesus pronounced a blessing on the eyes and ears of those who became witnesses of the salvation longed for by the godly of former generations (Matt. 13:16–17; Lk. 10:23–24). To those sent to him by the imprisoned Baptist Jesus said: "Go back and report to John what you hear and see" (Matt. 11:4). Alongside his words stand Jesus' mighty acts.

(b) Not only Jesus' earthly appearance but also the events of Easter and Pentecost are perceived by hearing and seeing. Paul's crucial vision of Christ (1 Cor. 15:9) is amplified by Acts 22:14–15: He was to be a witness of what he had "seen and heard." The Gospels testify that seeing the risen Christ is bound up with hearing the apostolic commission to be witnesses (Matt. 28:18–20; Mk. 16:15; Lk. 24:46–49; Jn. 20:21; cf. Acts 1:8). The events of Pentecost were perceived originally through seeing and hearing (Acts 2:33; cf. also 2 Cor. 12:1–6). Hearing also plays an important part in the visions of Rev. (e.g., 1:10; 5:11, 13). Nevertheless, the mystery of our salvation is unfathomable; what God has prepared for those who love him, no eye has seen and no ear heard, nor has any human heart conceived (1 Cor. 2:9).

(c) The message of Christ is grounded in a revelatory event, rooted in the OT (Rom. 1:2). Receipt of the Christian message requires faith. But faith presupposes hearing, and this in turn rests on preaching (Rom. 10:14–19; cf. Deut. 32:21; Ps. 19:4). On the other hand, as Jn. 20:29 implies, seeing is not a necessary condition for faith.

(d) The NT does not distinguish between Jesus' word and that of the apostles in the sense that "he who listens to you listens to me" (Lk. 10:16; cf. Matt. 10:40; Jn.

13:20; Gal. 4:14). The apostles are fully authorized witnesses of Jesus. The word Jesus spoke has been reliably handed on by those who heard it (Heb. 2:3). To hear the message is to hear Christ and to hear the word of truth (Eph. 1:13; 4:20–21) or the word of God (Acts 13:7, 44).

3. Like the OT, the NT connects hearing and doing. In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus expounds God's will revealed in the Mosaic law and expresses his authority, which marks his essential difference from the teachers of the law (Matt. 7:28–29; Mk. 1:22). Thus, in the parable that concludes this sermon the Lord compares the man who hears and does his word with a man who builds his house on rock (Matt. 7:24–27). In Lk. 11:28 Jesus pronounces a blessing on those who hear and keep (→ phylassō, 5875) his word. Jn. 10:16, 27 refer to the sheep who hear Jesus' voice and follow it.

In Rom. 2:13 Paul contrasts the doers of the law with the hearers (akroatai, pl. of akroatēs). The mere hearers are unbelieving Jews, who do not let the Mosaic law point them to Christ; the doers are believing Gentiles who demonstrate that the works of the law are written in their hearts (2:14–15; cf. Jer. 31:33). Similarly, in Jas. 1:22–23 the doers of the word are contrasted with the hearers. The NT understands faith not merely as hearing but as obeying.

In Mk. 12:29–30 (par. Matt. 22:34–40)—in response to a question by a teacher of the law, "Of all the commandments, which is the most important?" (Mk. 12:28)—Jesus cites the Shema, which includes the command to love the Lord above all (see OT section, above). To the Shema he adds of his own accord a second commandment, drawn from Lev. 19:18: "'Love your neighbor as yourself.' There is no commandment greater than these [two]" (Mk. 12:31). Lk. 10:25–37 also brings together Deut. 6:5 and Lev. 19:18, though here Jesus gives it in response to a question from a lawyer about inheriting eternal life. Jesus goes on to discuss the practical outworking of the Mosaic law expressed in the parable of the good Samaritan. These incidents imply that hearing the law is never enough; doing must follow.

4. (a) Hearing the word does not always lead to faith, i.e., to the acceptance of God's Word (Mk. 4:16; Lk. 8:13). Understanding must be added to hearing if the sown seed of the Word is to bear fruit (Matt. 13:23; 15:10). The contrary attitude, which does not understand the Word and will not accept it, eventually results in hardening (→ sklēros, 5017). Thus we find repeatedly in the NT, esp. with respect to the Jewish nation, references to the sentence of hardening pronounced in Isa. 6:9–10 (cf. Matt. 13:13–15; Acts 28:27; Rom. 11:8). In Jn. the Jews are plainly told that such hearing is in reality no hearing (5:37; 8:43). This is what Stephen meant when he described the judges at his trial as having "uncircumcised hearts and ears," and their subsequent behavior bore out the accusation (Acts 7:51, cf. 57). Even Jesus' disciples were not protected against failure to hear and understand (Mk. 8:17–18).

A contrast to this hardening is presented by the receptivity of those whose ears God has opened (Isa. 50:5), and who keep his Word in a pure and good heart (Lk. 8:15). It is only to this kind of hearing that the mystery of the kingdom of God is revealed (Matt. 13:11). But although such hearing and understanding are God's gift, human activity is by no means excluded. We see this in the numerous and varied calls for attention (e.g., "He who has ears, let him hear," Matt. 11:15; cf. also 15:10; Mk. 4:24; Rev. 2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22).

(b) Jn. 5:25, 28 deals with hearing at the time of consummation; the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God and awaken either to life or to judgment. The raising of Lazarus, whom Jesus called out of his grave with a loud voice (11:43), anticipates this final event.

5. Less is said in the NT about God's hearing than in the OT. The "ears" of God are mentioned twice in quotations from the OT: Jas. 5:4 (cf. Isa. 5:9); 1 Pet. 3:12 (cf. Ps. 34:16). Rev. 9:20 adopts from the OT the statement that idols do not hear. God hears the godly who do his will (Jn. 9:31), and believers may be confident that God hears their prayers when they are in accordance with his will (1 Jn. 5:14). Stephen's speech (Acts 7:34, quoting Exod. 3:7) refers to Israel's being heard in Egypt. epakouō occurs in the NT only in the quotation of Isa. 49:8 (2 Cor. 6:2). eisakouō is used in the NT in the sense of hearing and answering only in the pass. In Lk. 1:13 and Acts 10:31 it refers to the hearing of the prayers of Zechariah and Cornelius. In Matt. 6:7 Jesus criticizes those who, like the Gentiles, hope to succeed in making their prayers heard by the multiplication of words. On several occasions Jesus expresses the certainty that God hears prayer (Matt. 7:7–12; Lk. 11:5–13; Jn. 16:23–24).

Heb. 5:7 deals with God's hearing of Jesus' prayers (esp. his prayer in Gethsemane, cf. Matt. 26:36–46). Heb. sees the answer to these prayers in Jesus' exaltation as "the source of eternal salvation for all who obey [hypakouō, → 5634] him" as high priest after the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 5:9). This confirms the assurance, expressed in the story of Lazarus, that God always heard and answered Jesus (Jn. 11:41). Correspondingly, Jesus always heard God as his Father, and as mediator passed on the revelation he heard from his Father (8:26, 40; 15:15). Christ's relationship with his Father has its deepest roots in this mutual hearing.

ἅλας (halas), salt (229); ἁλυκός (halykos), salty (266); ἁλίζω (halizō), to salt, season with salt (245); ἄναλος (analos), saltless, insipid (383); συναλίζω (synalizō), to assemble with, eat (salt) with (5259).

CL & OT 1. (a) In. cl. Gk. halas (more commonly hals) essentially means salt; poetically, the sea; proverbially, to have eaten salt together, i.e., be old friends, enjoy hospitality. halizō means to supply with salt; to salt food; to collect, assemble, as military forces. halykos means salty; analos, without salt, unsalted; synalizō, to bring together, collect; eat (salt) with, i.e., eat at the same table.

(b) The domestic and medicinal value of salt both as condiment and preservative was as universal in the ancient world as it is today. Salt on sacrifices probably is related to the primitive idea of sacrifice as the meal of a god, but the association of salt with the deity also balanced the notion of spoilage and corruption commonly linked with demons. Lasting alliances were made by eating bread and salt or salt alone. Several ancient authors also refer to salt's ability to improve the productivity of the soil.

2. In the LXX the Heb. vb. mālaḥ, to salt, is translated by halizō, and the corresponding noun melaḥ by hals or halas. halykos occurs only in reference to the Dead Sea

(e.g., Num. 34:3). The main source of salt in Palestine was from the so-called Hill of Salt, which stretched for about seven miles along the SW corner of the Dead Sea. Salt was also obtained by evaporation of water in salt pits in the same area (cf. Zeph. 2:9; 1 Macc. 11:35) and from the incrustation of marshes along the shore (Ezek. 47:11). Salt was seen as a necessity for a people whose diet relied heavily on vegetables (Ezr. 7:22; Sir. 39:26). The commercial value of salt is illustrated by references to taxation (e.g., 1 Macc. 10:29). Salt was also used to preserve fish and meat (Bar. 6:28 = Ep. Jer. 6:28). Rubbing a newborn baby with salt (Ezek. 16:4), still practiced among Arabs, may have been to preserve life or to drive away evil spirits.

The impressive scene of desolation around the Salt (Dead) Sea formed a natural boundary (Num. 34:3) and offered a perpetual reminder of the ability of large quantities of salt to destroy vegetation (Deut. 29:23) and leave an area uninhabitable (Jer. 17:6). Sowing an enemy city with salt after its capture (Jdg. 9:45) may not have involved using massive quantities to render the ground useless for cultivation. Rather, token amounts could be sprinkled as a sign of cursing the city with infertility and barrenness. The miracle of healing carried out by Elisha (2 Ki. 2:19–22) at the beginning of his ministry made use of the symbolism of salt staying corruption and death.

Small amounts of salt sprinkled on fodder were beneficial as an antiseptic for animals (Isa. 30:24), and a light application on soil to improve its quality for crop bearing was well known. To eat someone's salt, i.e., bread, was to enjoy that person's hospitality, while to eat the salt of the palace (Ezr. 4:14) meant being on the royal payroll (cf. the word "salary," derived from Lat. sal, salt). But the uppermost thought behind the expression is that of loyalty in the relationship of employee to employer. In a similar way, the salt of the covenant (Lev. 2:13) refers to the solemn and irrevocable character of the relationship between God and his people—hence the custom of salting sacrifices (Exod. 30:35; Ezek. 43:24).

NT 1. (a) Salt is mentioned in six NT passages. In Matt. 5:13 commentators usually take salt to be a preservative, but the context ("of the earth") may suggest rather the stimulating property of salt as a fertilizer. Jesus came not to keep the world from spoiling but to save it (Jn. 3:17) and to provide life in abundance (10:10). There is only one instance in the LXX of salt being used to prevent spoilage, a reference to the priests' wives salting down the priestly portion of sacrificial meat for later use by their families (Bar. 6:28 = Ep. Jer. 6:28).

Matt. 5:13, therefore, is probably best translated, "You are salt for the soil," balanced in parallelism with 5:14, "You are light for the world." Although one cannot see salt that has been added to food, it can be tasted. Salt is noticed by the tongue and light by the eye; in both cases the user is gratified. A city on a hill cannot be hidden, even at night, because of its lights. Salt in food, or its absence, cannot be kept from the eater's knowledge. Note that it is not the Jewish teachers of the law who are the salt and light, but Jesus' disciples. Moreover, savorless salt and a covered lamp are useless; thus, the Christian disciple who fails to be stimulating and bright in the work that God wants done is good for nothing.

(b) The stability of sodium chloride as a chemical compound has raised a problem about salt being said to be liable to lose its quality of saltiness. But Jesus is likely referring to one of the impure salts of Palestine in everyday use, which could and did lose their savor through physical disintegration or through being mixed with windblown gypsum dust. Thus, "if the salt loses it saltiness" should perhaps be translated as whenever, since what follows is not a contrary to fact condition but a real possibility.

2. (a) Mk. 9:49 presents interpretive difficulties because there are three major textual readings. The best attested reading is, "everyone will be salted with fire." Other MSS have, "for every sacrifice will be salted with salt" (Lev. 2:13); still others, a combination of both readings. Interpretation of this verse is at best uncertain. The secondary textual reading may be right in interpreting "salted with fire" as a reference to the Christian disciple being seasoned with salt, as were the OT sacrifices. This can take place through trials (1 Pet. 1:7, 4:12; cf. 1 Cor. 3:13), and everything contrary to God will be purged away. The self-sacrifice metaphor in Mk. 9:42–50 is appropriate to a situation of suffering in which the principle of sacrifice is severely tried. Taken this way, Jesus' teaching is a challenging pronouncement on suffering, which sheds light on the experience of the church in Nero's Rome (possibly the context for this Gospel).

(b) The organic union of Mk. 9:49 and 9:50 has been questioned, esp. since the latter saying occurs in a different context in Matt. 5:13 and Lk. 14:34. Matthew and Luke use the vb. mōrainomai ("lose saltiness," also meaning "become fools") rather than Mk.'s "become unsalty" (analos). If there is a relationship between savorless and foolish and between salt and wisdom, then "have salt in yourselves" may have a similar meaning to what it does in rab. writings with regard to instruction to disciples by teachers in order to become wise. In Mk. 9:50 eschatological wisdom is meant, i.e., the wisdom of disciples lived out in their religious attitude, faith, and conduct, keeping in mind the last events to come (Matt. 10:16; Eph. 5:15–16). These events provide the organic link between Mk. 9:49 and 50.

(c) How does the last phrase of Mk. 9:50 ("be at peace with each other") fit in? This is probably an example of two Gk. imperatives in conditional parataxis, linked by the consecutive kai ("and"): "If you have salt in yourselves [i.e., learn wisdom together], then you will be able to maintain peace with one another." Note in the context that the disciples have been arguing about who would be greatest (9:34). But salt made those who ate at the common table friends, and there should be no quarrelling among friends. Such a covenant was inviolable.

(d) A reference to ancient practices throws light on the unity and meaning of Mk. 9:42–50 as a whole. Amputation of the hand was known in biblical times (Deut. 25:12). Ancient peoples in general cut off a guilty person's hands or feet in cases of theft, robbery, or forgery. Similarly, the eye was taken for adultery (cf. Gen. 19:11; Job 31:1; Matt. 5:29–30). (Recent movements in some Islamic countries have revived this practice.) Punishment by amputation was considered humane in an age when the death penalty was common for theft, robbery, sedition, and even adultery. In such cases, the stump had to be cauterized, or else gangrene would set in. Salt was a primitive treatment for wounds, including injuries left after amputation.

In other words, Jesus may be using a metaphor encouraging his followers to avoid the supernatural fire of the next world by applying a symbolic fire in this. If salt is a medicament for damaged tissue, then Jesus is calling us to symbolic amputation to this life; in this way we will not only avoid the circumstances whereby actual amputation might result but will also avoid the fire to come.

3. Lk. 14:25–34 is a discourse on the need for persistent wholeheartedness in following Jesus. That takes precedence even over the family. Anyone who lays down his or her cross has no further testimony. Anyone who leaves a house roofless is a laughingstock. The one who sues for peace before a battle starts is beaten without a struggle. Salt that has lost its flavor is like all these—good neither for a fertilizer nor for the manure pile.

4. In Col. 4:6 Paul states that a Christian's speech should always be gracious, "seasoned with salt." Salt gives flavor to discourse and recommends it to the palate (cf. Job 6:6), and this may be the primary idea of the metaphor here. Salt also preserves from corruption and renders wholesome. Eph. 4:29 carries similar ideas: "Do not let any unwholesome speech come out of your mouth but only what is helpful for building up others according to their needs, that it may benefit those who listen." But salt in Col. 4:6 can also be understood as a metaphor for wisdom (cf. above discussion): "Your talk should always be with grace; it should be wise, and you should learn how to answer everyone."

5. halykos occurs only at Jas. 3:12. In nature it is impossible for both saltwater and fresh to come from the same spring. It ought to be just as unnatural for the tongue of the Christian to pour out curses as well as blessings.

6. The only occurrence of synalizō in the NT (Acts 1:4) poses difficulties, both textual and interpretive. But seeing that having salt together was a euphemism for eating together, the NIV is probably correct in translating it, "while he was eating with them." That the resurrected Jesus did take food with his disciples is affirmed in Lk. 24:41–43 (cf. Acts 10:41), to convince them of the reality of his presence.

ἀλείφω (aleiphō), anoint (230).

CL & OT In the ancient Near East, anointing gained special significance in early times. The cleansing and strength-giving properties of ointments and oils were applied not only for purposes of purification, bodily hygiene, and beautification, but also to treat wounds and cure diseases. The healing properties were linked with magic, for every ailment was associated with the power of gods or demons.

Anointing acquired a further significance, which may be traced to these magical ideas, when practiced at the institution of an official or vassal king in Egypt or a priest in Babylon. Here the action indicates obligation and honor as well as protection for the one who is anointed (→ chriō, 5987). Trees, idols, and even weapons were anointed.

Anointing in the OT is close in its uses and in its significance to practices outside Israel. In the LXX aleiphō is normally used for anointing for the care of the body or for beauty's sake (Ruth 3:3; 2 Chr. 28:15; Dan. 10:3; Jdt. 16:8). Anointing by a host is a mark of care and honor for one's guest (Ps. 23:5, though a different Gk word is used here). It is omitted during a period of mourning (2 Sam. 14:2; cf. 12:20). In Ezek. 13:10–16 aleiphō is used for whitewashing. Occasionally this word is synonymous with chriō.

NT In the NT aleiphō occurs only 9x. In contrast with the more important word chriō, it refers to the physical action of anointing, performed exclusively on people. Ointments used are olive oil, or the more expensive myrrh, and balsam. On the theological significance of anointing in the NT, three ideas may be distinguished.

1. In the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:17), Jesus commands all who fast also to anoint themselves with oil. This is seen as a normal expense for personal hygiene and a general expression of joy, which should be continued during the fast. Only what is done secretly before God and not before other people has true worth.

2. The background of Lk. 7:38–50 is the Jewish custom of anointing the head of a guest (cf. also Jn. 12:3). Jesus here exposes the Pharisee who failed to show him this honor and who now has to watch Jesus receive it at the hands of a humble woman whom the Pharisee would regard as one of the lost. Here anointing becomes an expression of faith and its omission an expression of unbelief.

3. Anointing a sick person with oil (Mk. 6:13; Jas. 5:14; cf. Lk. 10:34) reminds us of the anointing of the sick elsewhere in the ancient world. Medicinal properties were attributed to the anointing. The healings performed by the disciples or elders of the church were accompanied by anointing, and it took place in the context of preaching and prayer. Healing, and thus anointing also, came to be seen as a visible sign of the beginning of God's reign.

ἀλήθεια (alētheia), truth, sometimes faithfulness (237); ἀληθής (alēthēs), true, sincere, real, correct, faithful, trustworthy, genuine (239); ἀληθινός (alēthinos), genuine, real, true, valid, trustworthy (240); ἀληθῶς (alēthōs), truly, certainly, indeed, in very truth (242); ἀληθεύω (alētheuō), to speak the truth (238).

CL 1. (a) In Homer alētheia is usually used in contrast to telling a lie or withholding information. However, this is not his only meaning. For example, he uses the word to describe a woman who is careful, honest, accurate, or reliable.

(b) In Gk. history writers alētheia most often stands for truth in opposition to falsehood.

(c) This usage also persists in later Hel. writers, such as Epictetus (who contrasts telling the truth with deceiving flatteries) and Philo (who writes that the evil spies who spied out the promised land preferred deceit to truth).

(d) Josephus uses alētheia in several different senses. (i) Truth is that which corresponds to the facts of the matter. (ii) Truth is also proved to be such by historical events; e.g., the words of a prophet are proved true. (iii) alēthēs is used in the sense of "genuine" or "real."

2. The use of alēthēs in Gk. philosophical texts has its own unique emphases. (a) Parmenides asks about the nature of real being and draws a contrast between the way of truth and the way of seeming. Change belongs only to the material world, which is the realm of mere appearance. There can be no change in what really exists. Hence truth, in contrast to appearance, belongs to the extrahistorical realm of the changeless.

(b) The Sophists held a different view. Protagoras, for example, wrote about wind, which may seem warm to one person and cool to another. It is not necessary, he urged, to say that one view is true and the other false. Each may be true for the person concerned. In this way Protagoras comes near to the modern notion of existential truth.

(c) Plato rejects this view. (i) If "true" and "false" are only relative to the individual, then as soon as someone says that the philosophy of Protagoras is false for him, it is therefore false. Falsehood, for Plato, is a matter of deception. It conceals reality. By contrast, the divine and divinity are free from falsehood. God is true in deed and word and neither changes himself nor deceives others. Plato thus returns to the earlier view of Parmenides, that truth stands in contrast to appearance and to change, although he goes further in locating it in the realm of eternal ideas. (ii) At the same time, Plato also uses alētheia and alēthēs in more ordinary ways. alētheia sometimes means simply "the facts of the matter" and can stand in contrast to legend.

(d) Aristotle takes us closest to the view of truth found in modern propositional logic. He distinguishes between the genuine proposition, which is either true or false, and sentences such as pleas or commands. Logically, a true proposition entails the denial of its contrary. He also argues that the truth of a proposition consists in corresponding with facts. Often, however, Aristotle uses the actual word alētheia in its ordinary, everyday sense without philosophical content.

(e) Philo uses alētheia in ordinary ways. As a Jewish theologian he speaks of "true doctrine." But as a speculative writer influenced by Platonism he also contrasts truth with mere appearance. He also sees the truth of God manifested in historical events.

3. (a) alēthinos frequently means real or genuine, but it may also mean simply truthful. (b) The adv. alēthōs, truly, varies in force from context to context. At its weakest it may simply mean indeed or certainly. But it may sometimes be used more solemnly to mean in very truth. (c) The vb. alētheuō usually means to speak the truth, though it can also mean to prove true or (in the pass.) to be fulfilled.

OT 1. (a) The Heb. word that is the nearest equivalent to alētheia is ʾemet. The LXX generally translates this word either as alētheia or as pistis, faith, faithfulness (→ 4411). Similarly, Eng. versions sometimes render ʾemet as "truth," sometimes as "faithfulness." Indeed, many OT scholars claim that for Heb. writers the notion of truth is close to faithfulness in meaning, suggesting the idea of stability, firmness, or reliability. They use etymology to strengthen this conclusion (ʾemet being derived from the root ʾmn, to be firm). But such a method of determining meaning can be misleading and simplistic, esp. since words get their meaning more from context than from etymology.

(b) Although ʾemet is translated as both alētheia and pistis, this does not mean that these two words are interrelated in meaning; this may simply be a case of the same word having two different meanings. That is, ʾemet means truth in some contexts, faithfulness in others. To use an analogy: Just because we use the Eng. word "taste" to mean taste by eating as well as taste in aesthetics does not mean there is a connection between aesthetics and enjoying food. If there is a connection between truth and faithfulness, it is not because of etymology but because God is said to act both faithfully and with integrity; otherwise said, he acts faithfully in accordance with his spoken word. Hence believers may lean confidently on God and find him faithful.

(c) When ʾemet is used in the sense of faithfulness, it frequently occurs in parallelism with the word ḥesed, steadfast love. This conjunction of these two words can have different nuances, according to context. For example, when Abraham's servant Eliezer asks Bethuel and Laban to show ḥesed and ʾemet to Abraham (Gen. 24:49), he is probably requesting them to act with honesty and integrity. Earlier in the same chapter, however, when he first meets Rebekah, Eliezer praises God, "who has not forsaken his ḥesed and ʾemet," meaning that God has remained loyal and faithful to his covenant promises to Abraham (24:27).

Characteristically, it is in Ps. that both praise and prayer are offered repeatedly on the basis of God's faithfulness. Over half of the occurrences of ʾemeṯ in the book have this meaning (e.g., 25:10; 57:3; 115:1). God's steadfast love is manifested as an expression of his faithfulness, and his faithfulness endures forever (117:2). But it would be a mistake to infer from these examples that ʾemet always means reliability in a theological sense, rather than simply "truth" in contrast to deceit or falsehood. For example, ʾemet in 119:43 almost certainly means "word of truth" (cf. NIV; logon alētheias in LXX; cf. also 43:3; 45:4).

(d) ʾemet is used in contrast to deceit or falsehood in a number of places. In Gen. 42:16 Joseph wishes to establish whether the brothers have told the truth. In Exod. 18:21, Moses selects men of truth, those who hate a bribe, to help him with the burden of administration. The emphasis here rests on honesty and integrity—their ability to make judgments on the basis of truth. In 1 Ki. 17:24 the widow acknowledges the truth of Elijah's word after he restored her son to life.

(e) In wisdom lit., ʾemet is sometimes used in the sense of faithfulness (Prov. 3:3; 16:6), but more often against the background of a contrast between truth and falsehood or deception. When Wisdom says, "My mouth speaks what is true" (8:7), the point is that she will not deceive the one who embraces her. In 12:19 truthful lips are set in contrast to a lying tongue, and the whole passage attacks lies, deceit, and false witness (12:17–22; cf. also 22:21; 23:23).

(f) The prophets also use ʾemet in the sense both of faithfulness and of truth in contrast to falsehood. In Isa. 43:9, the nations are to come together as a judicial assembly to determine whether the claim of Yahweh or that of the pagan gods is true. The claim is reliable only if it accords with the facts of the matter. In Isa. 59:14–15, the complaint that truth is lacking may be alluding to Israel's unfaithfulness, but the real cause of complaint is "uttering lies" (59:13b; cf. also Jer. 9:5; Zech. 8:16–17).

2. Let us now sum up what the OT has to say about ʾemet. (a) In the vast majority of contexts truth is not an abstract and theoretical concept. Certainly it is never located, as it is in Plato, in some timeless, extrahistorical realm. The God of Israel reveals his truth not only in his words but also in his deeds, and this truth is proved in practice in the experience of his people. Similarly, people express their respect for truth not in abstract theory, but in their daily witness to their neighbors and their verbal and commercial transactions. It is not surprising, then, to find in the OT what would nowadays be called an existential view of truth. But it is not only existential truth. Note how Ps. 119:105 sees God's law as a lamp that shows the believer the true state of affairs.

(b) Such truth is firm and can be relied on. But this insight is not arrived at on an exclusively theological basis. Certainly a believer may confidently rely on God because of his covenant faithfulness. But this particular use of ʾemet does not lie behind every occurrence of the word. The Hebrews recognized the logical truth that others also recognized, that a true word can be relied upon because it accords with reality, and that both for a God of truth and for a person of truth, word and deed are one. Those who call on God "in truth" (Ps. 145:18) do so honestly.

3. (a) In the Apocr., alētheia is used mostly (though not always) to mean truth in contrast to falsehood. In 1 Macc. 7:18 the real issue is the deceitful use of words. In Sir. 7:20 the servant works reliably indeed, but the main point is that he is "true," in the sense of being honest. In Tob. 7:10 truth is used of giving a true report. However, sometimes alētheia does duty for ʾemeṯ in the sense of faithfulness (pistis), esp. when a writer alludes to earlier OT writings. Thus in Wis. 15:1 the writer declares, "You, our God, are kind and true [alēthēs]," probably in paraphrase of Exod. 34:6. Here the word probably means faithfulness, because the sense of Exod. 34 is too clear to be lost.

(b) Truth is esp. prominent in the Dead Sea Scrolls, most of all in the Thanksgiving Hymns. God is the God of truth (1QH 15:26); the phrase "truth of God" also occurs (1QS 11:4; 1QM 4:6; cf. 1QS 3:7). Truth is emphasized as a quality of moral behavior. Entrance into the Qumran community is a conversion to truth (1QS 6:15), and the initiates bind themselves to the precepts of truth by oath (1:11–15). They are now within the sphere of influence of the spirit of truth (3:24). The community are "true witnesses to justice" (8:6).

NT 1. Synoptic Gospels and Acts. The words in this group occur only 23x in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts (out of a total 183x). (a) On the lips of Jesus these words occur only in Lk. 4:25; 9:27; 12:44; 16:11; 21:3. In most of these the forms (lit.) "the truth is" or "truly I tell you" serve to introduce a solemn statement and are presumably Lk.'s translation into Gk. of the characteristic amēn formula used elsewhere by Jesus.

(b) At the same time the isolated occurrences of alētheia and alēthēs in the Synoptics do not exhaust what we may infer about Jesus' attitude to truth. (i) Negatively, many of his sayings attack hypocrisy or, more generally, any discrepancy between word and deed or between word and reality (e.g., Matt. 23:2–3, 23–24; Lk. 11:46). The Jewish leaders display attitudes that are untruthful and deceitful, based on a contrast between word and deed. (ii) Positively, Jesus' own words always accord with his deeds and with actuality. He preaches grace to the outcast; thus, he eats with tax collectors and sinners. He is Messiah in word, proclaiming the advent of God's kingdom; therefore he is also Messiah in deed, demonstrating the advent of the kingdom by works of power. Jesus' life of integrity culminates in the cross.

(c) Other occurrences of alētheia and alēthēs in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts either have the sense of truth in contrast to falsehood, concealment, or deception, or else refer to honesty or sincerity. In Matt. 22:15–16 (cf. Mk. 12:14), the Pharisees seek to trap Jesus with their questions and introduce this query with the words, "We know you are a man of integrity [alēthēs] and that you teach the way of God in accordance with the truth [alētheia]." The point here is that Jesus will not conceal the truth through any fear of consequences. He is honest in stating his views.

The same meaning of alētheia occurs in Mk. 5:33, when the woman with a flow of blood who touched Jesus in the crowd tells "the whole truth," i.e., conceals nothing about what she has done. However, in 12:32, to speak "right" (alētheia) is simply to state the facts of the matter accurately or correctly (cf. also Acts 26:25).

(d) alēthinos occurs in the Synoptics only in Lk. 16:11: "Who will trust you with true riches?" Here the meaning is clearly that of "genuine" or "real."

2. Paul's letters. (a) One of Paul's most distinctive uses of alētheia in the NT is his use of the phrase "the truth" to characterize the gospel itself. Although this is most prominent in the Pastorals, this meaning already occurs in Gal. and perhaps in 2 Thess. In Gal. 2:5 Paul declares that what is at issue in his conflict with the Judaizers is "the truth of the gospel." In Paul's judgment, enticement to compromise the gospel is an enticement to compromise the truth, and vice versa. To give way is to deny the truth, both in the sense of his own integrity and in the sense of the actual situation in salvation history as it now is. Hence, in 5:7 "the truth" is synonymous with the gospel itself or (more probably) that which is real: "Who ... kept you from obeying the truth?"

(b) Paul also uses alētheia in a broader sense to mean God's revelation of his will or even of his being, either through the law or, at one point, through creation. This use is characteristic of Rom. 1–2. Human beings by their wickedness "suppress the truth" (1:18) and exchange the truth about God for a lie (1:25). Hence there will be wrath for those who do not obey the truth (2:8). The law itself, by contrast, is "the embodiment of knowledge and truth" (2:20). The truth at issue here is not primarily the truth of the gospel, but the rejection of the truth about God as creator and judge. The Gentile world has not willfully rejected gospel truth, but it has willfully suppressed what may be seen about God and his sovereign claims from creation (1:20).

(c) Truth in Paul often stands in contrast to lying or deception. Indeed, together with Wis. 13–14, Paul inherits the traditional Heb. prophetic view that divine truth stands in contrast to idolatry, precisely because idolatry is a deception and delusion (cf. Rom. 1:25). Paul uses alētheia in a thoroughly natural sense when he asserts, "I speak the truth in Christ—I am not lying" (9:1) and "everything we said to you was true" (2 Cor. 7:14). Practical integrity is as important to Paul as it was to Jesus. For both, truth becomes a matter of correspondence between word and deed.

(d) These two aspects of alētheia are brought together in a striking way in 2 Cor. On the one hand, Paul is accused of vacillation and change and asserts his own concern for the truth in the sense of an honesty or integrity in which word and deed correspond. Indeed, he urges, it is the false apostles who need artificial commendation. But the apostle has also been accused of veiling his gospel. Again he urges that it is not he but his opponents who tailor the gospel message to conform to human expectations and demands. He renounces disgraceful, underhanded ways and refuses to tamper with God's word, but "by setting forth the truth plainly we commend ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (2 Cor. 4:2). Side by side with this emphasis on speaking the truth, Paul stresses his unity of word and conduct (see 6:4–7).

(e) Paul believes in the power of truth. Truth exposes lies (Rom. 3:4, where divine truth exposes human falsehood for what it is). Love of the truth can even lead to salvation (2 Thess. 2:10), although this does not mean mere theoretical truth, but commitment to the truth as this is expressed in the gospel. To encounter the truth as it is in Jesus leads on to transformation of life, which enables the believer to turn away from old deceits (Eph. 4:21–22). Thus, in 2 Cor. 6:7 "truthful speech" occurs in parallel with "the power of God" and "weapons of righteousness." Paul does not use the weapons of power politics or psychological pressure, but with honest integrity speaks and acts in truth and righteousness (cf. also Eph. 6:14, where truth is part of the Christian's armor).

(f) Truth is demanded of Christians as a corollary of their union with Christ and status as a new creation. In 1 Cor. 5:8 the believer celebrates the festival of new life with "sincerity and truth," banishing all impurity and deception or dishonesty, just as the Jews banished the old leaven from their houses at Passover. The new life is to be untarnished, free from anything that spreads corrupting influences by virtue of its impurity or duplicity. The same idea occurs in Eph. 4:25, with more explicit reference to falsehood. Because the believer has put on the new nature (4:24), Paul insists that everyone must "speak truthfully to his neighbor, for we are all members of one body." In 1 Cor. 13:6, Paul probably means that love is brave enough to face the truth. It has nothing to conceal.

(g) The Pastoral Letters reflect a distinctive outlook, although they develop a trend we have already seen in Gal. and Rom. Truth is essentially the revealed truth of the gospel message. Note that in these letters, the problem of false doctrine looms as large as it did earlier in Gal. To become a Christian is "to come to a knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. 2:4; cf. 2 Tim. 3:7). By contrast, the great danger under attack is that people will listen only to teachers who "turn their ears away from the truth and turn aside to myths" (2 Tim. 4:4); such people "have been robbed of the truth" (1 Tim. 6:5). "The truth" in the Pastorals, esp. in the sense of Christian revelation, is wholesome and sound.

(h) The verb alētheuō occurs only 2x in the NT, both times in Paul. In Gal. 4:16 Paul exclaims, "Have I now become your enemy by telling you the truth?" Here the irony has the most point if truth means the facts of the gospel as they really are, in contrast to the deceptions of Paul's opponents. Even if alētheuō is understood to mean little more than "to proclaim the Christian message," the contrast between Paul and his opponents loses its point if this is not specifically a truth proclamation that hides nothing from the hearer. In Eph. 4:15 Paul commands Christians to speak the truth in love. alētheuō here probably entails integrity of life in addition to truthful speech.

(i) The adjective alēthinos occurs only once in Paul, where "to serve the living and true God" (1 Thess. 1:9) has its characteristic meaning of real or genuine. The real God stands here in contrast to idols or so-called gods. The adv. alēthōs also occurs only once in Paul. In 2:13 the Thessalonians received the message of Christ not as mere human words, but "as it actually [genuinely] is, the word of God."

3. Jn.'s writings. Considerations about word frequency alone suggest the importance of truth in Jn.'s writings, which contain nearly half the occurrences of alētheia (45x), 17 out of 26x for alēthēs, and 23 out of 28x for alēthinos. The discussion should not be whether Jn. reflects a Gk. or Heb. view of truth, but what is the nature of the concept of truth Jn. reflects. Jn. uses this word group regularly in the sense of reality in contrast to falsehood or mere appearance.

(a) Special attention must be given to the phrase "full of grace and truth" in Jn. 1:14 (cf. 1:17). Many scholars find the background to this in Exod. 34:6, that the Lord God abounds "in love [ḥesed] and faithfulness [ʾemet]." Certainly the Exod. 34 background of seeing God is appropriate to Jn.'s thought (cf. Jn. 1:14–18), but what Jn. stresses here is not the covenant faithfulness of God, but that in Christ, the Logos, we can see God in his genuine actuality and reality (cf. 1:17). The law does indeed constitute a witness to God, as does Moses, but the reality itself is encountered in Christ.

(b) There can be no doubt that sometimes in Jn. alētheia and alēthēs mean simply truth in contrast to falsehood. In Jn. 4:18 the woman of Samaria speaks the truth about her marital status. In 10:41 it is affirmed that everything that John the Baptist said about Jesus is true. The statement "I tell you the truth: It is for your good that I am going away" (16:7) dispels any suspicion that the words may have been tailored to provide some illusory comfort. In 1 Jn. a liar is one who does not speak the truth (2:4; cf. 2:21, 27). To err from the truth is to be deceived (1:8). The notion of witness is prominent in Jn.'s Gospel, and much is made of the fact that the witness to Christ is true (5:31–32). But the notion of a witness that is true rather than false leads to the question of the validity of that witness and thereby to the use of alētheia in the sense of validity.

(c) The debate about truthful witness is developed more fully in Jn. 8:13–58, where the issue is validity of the witness. The witness to Jesus Christ is valid because there is no higher court of appeal than God himself. The witness of those who judge "by human standards" (8:15) is not necessarily dishonest (though cf. 9:41), but such testimony is untrue in the sense that it is invalid. Valid witness depends on revelation.

(d) One of the most important uses of alētheia and alēthēs in Jn. is to convey the idea of reality in contrast to whatever the situation may seem to look like on the surface. (i) The clearest example of this is the use of the adj. alēthēs to mean "real." Thus, in 6:55 Jesus says that his flesh is real food, his blood real drink. This real food gives more lasting satisfaction and nourishment than other things people call food. (ii) Those who worship God in spirit and in truth (4:23–24) are not those who worship in sincerity. Jesus does not criticize the Samaritans for lacking sincerity. Rather, true worship is that which accords with reality, which people grasp on the basis of revelation. That is why it is associated with the Holy Spirit.

(e) Special attention should be given to the phrase "doing the truth" in Jn.'s writings. This phrase combines an allusion to the way of Christian revelation with an additional reference to the contrast between truth and falsehood. Thus in Jn. 3:21 the statement, "Whoever lives by [does] the truth comes into the light, so that it may be seen plainly that what he has done has been done through God," cannot simply refer to the one who lives up to his or her aspirations faithfully. Rather, the phrase emphasizes that the one who practices a Christian faith and life will have nothing to hide. In 1 Jn. 1:6 the author similarly combines the notion of truth as revelation with truth in contrast to falsehood. A tension between profession of faith and actual practice is inconsistent with Christian revelation and also in principle self-contradictory. Hence if we claim to have fellowship with God but walk in darkness, "we lie and do not live by [do] the truth."

(f) There are several passages in Jn. in which the meaning of alētheia or alēthēs is too broad to be equated with any of the five categories discussed above. (i) One of the most important of these is Jn. 14:6, where Jesus declares, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me." The way leads to the Father; that is primary, and "the truth" describes the way. Nevertheless, as the truth Jesus is also the goal of our search, for "anyone who has seen me has seen the Father" (14:9). So when Jesus declares that he is the truth, a number of ideas are combined. First, truth is not abstract or suprahistorical but revealed in the actual personal life of the Word made flesh. Second, Christ is also the truth because he is the revelation of God and thus his own witness is valid. Third, truth also stands in opposition to deception or falsehood. In the case of divine revelation, this means that Christ is both truth and reality.

(ii) The same range of meaning probably applies to the assertion "your word is truth" in Jn. 17:17. The context is the distinctiveness of the community of believers as over against the world. The community is holy, for it belongs to God and is founded on his Word. However, the very word on which the community depends for its existence and consecration is also a word of commission that sends it out into the world (17:18). In both respects, this word from God is valid, effective, in no way false; it accords with reality. Thereby the community's sanctification is assured and its commission validated.

(iii) In Jn. 8:44–45, the truth spoken by Jesus is set in contrast to the lie spoken by the devil. The devil does not hold "to the truth, for there is no truth in him." Here truth is primarily contrasted with falsehood or deception. There is doubtless an allusion here to the deception by the serpent in Gen. 3:4–5. The implication is that by opposing the truth of Jesus (here, also in the sense of the authentic divine revelation), Jesus' enemies are actually doing the devil's work. The devil also seduces us away from reality and life.

(iv) By contrast, the Spirit of God is the Spirit of truth (Jn. 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; cf. 1 Jn. 4:6; 5:6). It is striking that this phrase is repeated in no less than three of the five Paraclete sayings. The Paraclete (paraklētos, → 4156) can be understood as a prosecuting counsel who exposes (elenchō, → 1794) the facts of the matter (Jn. 16:8; NIV "convict"). The Spirit places the Christian community in the light of judgment that belongs, strictly speaking, to the last day. Hence, his verdict is absolutely valid and does not need to be modified by fresh knowledge. One other idea, however, must be added. The Spirit of truth, as Paraclete, continues the work of Jesus as Paraclete, whereby proponents of truth and falsehood are shown up to be what they are (cf. Jesus' self-proclaimed task as bearing witness to the truth, 18:37). Falsehood is exposed in all its seductive deception as a lie. The truth is shown to be reality, based on God's revelation (cf. 14:6 again).

(g) In Jn.'s writings alēthinos often has its characteristic meaning of genuine, real. In Jn. 1:9, Jesus is the real light, in contrast to John the Baptist. This "light" exposes a person to the light of judgment. True, John the Baptist did indeed expose people's actions and called them to repentance, but the real crisis of division, which brings to light the direction in which people are going, is Jesus Christ. We have already seen that "true worshipers" (4:23) are those whose worship is based on reality, not on human aspiration. In 6:32 Jesus tells his hearers that whereas Moses gave Israel bread from heaven, God now gives them the real bread, to which the manna merely pointed—Jesus himself. Similarly in 15:1 Jesus is the real vine, worthy of the name. Israel as vine was unproductive and wild; real fruitfulness is to be found only in Christ.

Nevertheless, alēthinos may also have the same range of meaning as alēthēs. It may denote a true saying (Jn. 4:37) or true judgment (8:16). Sometimes the two senses merge, as when the meaning is primarily or partly, though not exclusively, that of real, genuine, e.g., "the only true God" (17:3).

It is difficult to determine how narrowly or otherwise we should interpret the meaning of alēthinos in Rev. God is "him who is holy and true" (3:7), "the faithful and true witness" (3:14). Note also: "Just and true are your ways" (15:3); "true and just are your judgments" (16:7); "these are the true words of God" (19:9); "these words are trustworthy and true" (21:5; cf. 6:10; 19:2; 22:6). It must not be forgotten that Rev. uses only alēthinos and never alēthēs or even alētheia. Hence it would be unwise to try to draw too clear-cut a distinction between them. In Hel. lit. alēthinos is used of divine beings to mean "that which truly exists," and this may well form part of the meaning in Rev. But God is also true in contrast to the deceits and falsehoods of idolatry and the Antichrist. The martyrs and faithful believers may also rely on his truth.

(h) The adv. alēthōs occurs 7x in Jn., once in 1 Jn., but not in Rev. Sometimes it is used in the sense of real or genuine, as an adverbial equivalent to alēthinos. Thus Nathanael is (lit.) "really an Israelite" (Jn. 1:47); that is, he is a man really worthy of the name. Usually, however, the adv. is used in the sense of truly or indeed.

4. Other NT writings. (a) In 1 and 2 Pet. we find "the truth" or "the way of truth" used as in the Pastorals virtually as a synonym for the truth of the gospel. Christians are those who have become obedient to the truth (1 Pet. 1:22); false prophets and false teachers deny Christ and thereby cause others to revile the way of truth (2 Pet. 2:2).

Sometimes true means in accordance with the facts of the matter. Thus, "the true grace of God" (1 Pet. 5:12) means the grace that the readers have proved true in their experience and that was based on reality and not delusion. A true proverb (2 Pet. 2:22) states truth as it is in the light of experience.

(b) At first sight "the word of truth" in Jas. 1:18 seems to mean simply the message of the gospel. But the context suggests that what is at issue here is that God acts reliably and consistently. God does not tempt us to sin (1:13–16), and with him is no shadow due to change (1:17). Because of this reliability, his word is the word of truth. To wander from the truth (5:19) may also seem to mean to turn away from the gospel. But once again the term here is broader, meaning the right path. In what sense does selfish ambition lead one to "deny the truth" (3:14)? Most likely James is warning his readers that selfish ambition and arrogance lead people to put considerations about their own status even above those that concern the truth. Often lies stem from a concern to defend or assert the claims of one's own status in the eyes of others.

(c) The reference in Heb. 10:26 to receiving "the knowledge of the truth" certainly means knowledge of the truth of the gospel. But alētheia here also underlines the absoluteness and finality of the Christian message. If a person turns his or her back on that which is the truth, indeed there is nothing else. alēthinos occurs 3x in Heb. In 8:2; 9:24 it describes "the true tabernacle." Like Jewish apocalyptic writers the author contrasts the heavenly sanctuary as it existed in the mind of God and the earthly tabernacle, which reflected this heavenly reality. alēthinos in 8:2 and 9:24 bears its characteristic meaning of genuine or real. In 10:22 a true heart means one that is honest and without deceit.

238 (alētheuō, to speak the truth), → 237.

239 (alēthēs, true, sincere, real, faithful, trustworthy, genuine), → 237.

240 (alēthinos, genuine, real, true, valid, trustworthy), → 237.

242 (alēthōs, truly, certainly, indeed, in very truth), → 237.

245 (halizō, to salt, season with salt), → 229.

248 (allassō, to change, exchange), → 2904.

251 (allēgoreō, speak allegorically), → 4130.

ἀλληλουϊά (hallēlouia), hallelujah (252).

OT The best explanation for the Heb. word halᵉlû-yāh is that it is composed of two elements: the 2d pers. pl. masc, piel imperative of the root hālal, to praise; and the abbreviated form of the divine name yāhweh as yāh. The vb. is used widely of secular (e.g., Gen. 12:15) and religious (e.g., Jdg. 16:24) praise, and in its usage combines the notions of admiration, adulation, and rejoicing. The fact that halᵉlû-yāh is followed immediately by halᵉlû ʾeth-yāhweh (e.g., Ps. 148:1) suggests that from early days it had become a recognized shout of praise to the Lord.

Praise is offered to Yahweh for his works in creation (e.g., Ps. 104), his deliverance in the exodus and his patience in the desert days (105; 106), his universal rule through the Melchizedek priest-king (110), and his eschatological purpose to make the whole world at the end what his chosen people are now (145–150).

NT This word occurs only in Rev. 19:1, 3, 4, 6 and reflects the LXX usage (which transliterated the word rather than translated it). The heavenly hosts praise the Lord for his victory over the "great prostitute," ascribing to him salvation, glory, and power.

See also amēn, amen (297); hōsanna, Hosanna (6057).

254 (allogenēs, foreign), → 259.

ἄλλος (allos), other (257); ἄλλως (allōs), otherwise (261); ἕτερος (heteros), other (2283); ἑτέρως (heterōs), differently (2284).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. heteros and allos have essentially the same meaning: another, other. They will often introduce a new person, thing, or group. Originally heteros had the notion of the other of two options or groups, though this distinction is not rigidly kept.

2. In the LXX allos refers to that already mentioned in contrast to others and can even render a demonstrative pron. heteros had a personal connotation and was used to translate words like man, neighbor, brother. allos is used about 100x, heteros about 250x.

NT In the NT there is little distinction between heteros (98x) and allos (155x). The use seems to depend mostly on author's preference (e.g., Lk. prefers heteros). The polemic factor is one of the reasons why allos is found so frequently in 1 and 2 Cor.

1. (a) Both words are used to denote another person, thing, or group; e.g., allos (Matt. 5:39; 12:13; Jn. 5:32); heteros (Lk. 5:7; 23:40). tē hetera can mean the next day (Acts 20:15; 27:3). (b) The same use is found in the pl. (e.g., Matt. 20:3, 6; Lk. 10:1; Jn. 7:12; 9:16; Acts 2:13). (c) In enumerations (Matt. 13:5, 7–8; Lk. 8:6–8) and in contrasts (Heb. 11:35–36) heteros and allos are used interchangeably. (d) Used as a noun, ho heteros has the force of a neighbor whom God has put in my way (Rom. 2:1; 13:8; 1 Cor. 10:24; Gal. 6:4).

2. These words become important theologically when they express a more or less qualitative difference, external or internal (e.g., Mk. 12:32; 1 Cor. 3:11; 2 Cor. 1:13). Jesus appeared to his disciples after his resurrection "in a different form" (Mk. 16:12), so that they did not recognize him (cf. Lk. 24:16; Jn. 20:15). At his transfiguration "there came another appearance on his face" (Lk. 9:29, lit. trans.). In 1 Cor. 15:39–41 Paul reflects on various kinds of flesh in his discussion of the resurrection body. Matt. 11:3 implies a question whether the Messiah must be some other person besides Jesus.

(a) The interpretation of Acts 2:4 ("in other [heteros] tongues") raises the question of whether the gift of tongues at Pentecost was a form of ecstatic utterance or whether the disciples were in fact speaking other languages, which they presumably did not know before (→ glōssa, tongue, language, speech, 1185). The mistaken presumption of some of the onlookers that "they have had too much wine" (2:13) suggests that this was ecstatic speaking in tongues (as in 10:46; 19:6; 1 Cor. 12:10, 30; 14:1–4). Yet Luke also writes that visitors from various parts of the Roman empire were asking in amazement: "Are not all these men who are speaking Galileans? Then how is it that each of us hears them in his own native language?" (Acts 2:7–8).

(b) The story of Pentecost is a preparation for the apostles' missionary preaching and pictures the outpouring of the Spirit in a twofold manner: the speaking in tongues as a sign of the outpouring of the Spirit as prophesied by Joel 2:28–32 (cf. Acts 2:17–21), showing the last days have now come; and the proclamation of the word of God (Peter's Pentecost sermon in 2:14–36). At Pentecost the gospel was proclaimed to Jews and proselytes in Jerusalem—an event that marks the beginning of the fulfillment of Acts 1:8 and forms the transition to Peter's missionary preaching.

Note, however, that the perception that these are all Galileans comes from the onlookers. It is not impossible that among the hundred and twenty or so followers (Acts 1:15) were those who already knew some of the languages mentioned (e.g., Simon of Cyrene, Matt. 27:32; cf. Acts 2:10; and "men from Cyprus and Cyrene," 11:20). Note too that there were various synagogues in Jerusalem, including some that catered to people of the Diaspora (cf. 6:9). If so, the miracle of Pentecost may be that those filled with the Spirit were now preaching Jesus Christ boldly and with confidence in their own native language. It may also be significant that the emphasis in Acts 2 is not on the speaking of these languages but on the hearing by the audience (2:8, 11).

(c) In 2 Cor. 11:4 and Gal. 1:6–9, Paul stresses the uniqueness of the salvation offered by his gospel. "A different gospel" would not be the gospel, any more than another spirit can be the Holy Spirit. Such a gospel as the teaching of the Judaizers, which insisted on circumcision for Gentile converts, is thus no gospel. To Paul such a demand involves a matter of principle concerning the basis of salvation. To attempt to fulfill the demands of the law in order to be saved puts forward a righteous act by human beings as needed for salvation. The whole theme of Gal. treats the issues involved with the choice of the free grace of God in Christ versus salvation by human endeavor. The "gospel" of this latter alternative is anathema to Paul (Gal. 1:8; → anathema, 353).

(d) In Rom. 7:23 "another law," i.e., the carnal egoistic urge, as a tool of the law of sin, fights against the good law of God, which the mind agrees with (cf. 7:25).

3. Phil. 3:15 contains the only NT instance of the adv. heterōs, differently. Paul seems to be arguing here against enthusiasts who claimed perfection and special revelations for themselves. He takes up their slogan and applies it to Christians. Those who are truly "perfect" (teleioi; → telos, 5465) or mature are, in fact, those who know that they are imperfect and need to press on to what lies ahead (3:12–13). They have not yet reached their goal and do not yet possess "the prize for which God has called [them] heavenward in Christ Jesus" (3:14). The practical conclusion is given in 3:15: "All of us who are mature should take such a view of things. And if on some point you think differently, that too God will make clear to you." This last point is presumably directed at the claim to special revelations. Paul is confident that by being realistic and patient, they will grow in insight.

4. Several Gk. words are related to allos, such as allotrios, strange, alien, hostile (259); allogenēs, foreign (254); and allophylos, foreign (260); for these words → allotrios (259).

ἀλλότριος (allotrios), adj., belonging to another, strange, alien, hostile; noun, a stranger (259); ἀλλογενής (allogenēs), foreign (254); ἀλλόφυλος (allophylos), alien to the race, hence from a Jewish standpoint a Gentile, heathen (260); ἀπαλλοτριόω, apallotrioō, alienated (558).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. allotrios (from allos [another]) means another, strange, foreign, alien to people or land, hence unsuitable and even hostile. apallotrioō means to alienate, estrange. allogenēs (from allos and genos [race]) means foreign, strange. allophylos (from allos and phylē [tribe]) means alien to the race, strange.

2. In the LXX, allotrios translates different Heb. words and means foreign, alien (e.g., Gen. 31:15; Lev. 10:1; Deut. 14:21; 15:3; 32:16). Sometimes allogenēs is used with a similar meaning (e.g., Exod. 29:33; Lev. 22:10; Num. 16:40; Joel 3:17). Aliens are still foreigners (Exod. 12:43–49), though they have certain rights and duties in the community.

NT 1. allotrios occurs parabolically in Matt. 17:25 in the discussion of the propriety of paying the half-shekel temple tax (cf. Exod. 30:11–16; 38:26). Jesus asks whether kings take tribute from their own sons or "from others." Peter replies, "From others"; to which Jesus says, "Then the sons are exempt." However, he counsels payment of the tax to avoid giving offense. The incident implies that Jesus' disciples are "sons of God" and that the Jews are in fact "others."

In Lk. 16:12 allotrios ("someone else's property") stands parallel to "worldly wealth" (v. 11; → mamōnas, 3440). Money and possessions belong to another person. The implication is that they do not belong to the disciple, who is instead a steward of such things. In Jn. 10:5 the sheep, who belong to the shepherd and follow him, do not recognize the voice of a stranger. The implication is that Jewish (and other would-be) teachers are strangers disowned by the true flock of God, whereas Jesus is the true shepherd, known and followed by the true people of God.

In Acts 7:6 (referring to Gen. 15:13), the gē allotria ("a country not their own") is the land of Egypt, whereas Palestine is the homeland of Israel. But for Abraham even the promised land was a foreign country (Heb. 11:9) because it was not his true, heavenly home. Therefore, he lived in tents, and by it testified that he was a stranger in this world.

Christians are servants of Christ. Therefore, they should not judge "someone else's" servant (Rom. 14:4). Paul refuses to boast of the work or methods that "others" have done (2 Cor. 10:15–16), because he will not adorn himself with borrowed plumage. He will not even preach in a place where others have already been at work, refusing to build on a foundation laid by someone else (Rom. 15:20). Timothy is warned not to be hasty in laying hands on a man and entrusting him with a ministry. Otherwise, he might participate in the sins "of others" and be called to account for them (1 Tim. 5:22). The Jewish high priest entered the Holy Place with blood "that is not his own" (Heb. 9:25); Jesus, however, brought his own blood into the heavenly sanctuary. In Heb. 11:34 allotrios occurs in the expression "routed foreign armies."

2. apallotrioō occurs only in Eph. 2:12; 4:18; Col. 1:21—in each case as a passive part. translated "excluded," "separated," or "alienated." Before their conversion, Paul's readers were not citizens of Israel, the chosen people of God. They stood—like the heathen now—outside God's covenant and promises and were thus subject to wrath. They did not know God and lived in sin. Since they have now become Christians, they are not to return to their sinful state.

3. allogenēs occurs only in Lk. 17:18. The grateful Samaritan who returns to give thanks after being healed of his leprosy is called a "foreigner," for he is not a Jew. allophylos occurs only at Acts 10:28. Jews were forbidden to have fellowship with any "Gentile" (lit., "someone from another nation"), for the heathen were ceremonially unclean and such association would make a Jew unclean. In Christ, however, these barriers of the law have been abolished.

See also diaspora, dispersion (1402); xenos, foreign; stranger, alien (3828); parepidēmos, staying for a while in a strange place; stranger, resident alien (4215); paroikos, stranger, alien (4230).

260 (allophylos, alien to the race; a Gentile), → 259.

261 (allōs, otherwise), → 257.

263 (alogos, irrational, without speech), → 3364.

266 (halykos, salty), → 229.

279 (hamartanō, to sin), → 281.

280 (hamartēma, a sin, transgression), → 281.

ἁμαρτία (hamartia), sin (281); ἁμάρτημα (hamartēma), a sin, transgression (280); ἁμαρτάνω (hamartanō), to sin (279); ἁμαρτωλός (hamartōlos), adj., sinful; noun, a sinner (283); ἀναμάρτητος (anamartētos), without sin (387).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. hamartanō originally meant to miss the mark, not share in something, be mistaken. The Gk. view of a mistake was intellectually oriented, so that hamartanō is the result of some agnoia, ignorance. The cognate noun is hamartia, mistake, failure to reach a goal (chiefly a spiritual one). The result of such action is hamartēma, failure, mistake, an offense committed against friends or one's own body. From these words developed the adj. and noun hamartōlos, the thing or person that fails.

(b) In the Gk.-speaking world the noun hamartēma prevailed over the vb. hamartanō. Aristotle placed it between adikēma (injustice) and atychēma (misfortune), as an offense against the prevailing order, but one without an evil intention. hamartia became a collective term with a relatively indefinite sense: offending against right feeling. It can mean anything from stupidity to law-breaking, anything that does not conform to the dominant ethic, to the respect due to social order and the polis.

(c) The Gk. view of guilt finds its deepest expression in conjunction with the fateful infatuation of the human being as cl. tragedy depicts it. Guilt is not just an action, but a reality rooted in one's innermost being. Guilt is the cause of suffering. Guilt and fate are inextricably interwoven.

(d) In its attempt to escape the determinism of fate, Hellenism severed the connection between guilt and fate through various rites and gnosis in the mystery religions. In addition, the concept of guilt was intellectualized and rationalized in the Stoa; it could be surmounted through better understanding and correct behavior. Both views work from the presupposition that a human being is basically good.

2. (a) In the LXX the two words hamartia and adikia (injustice, → 94) represent almost the whole range of Heb. words for guilt and sin. hamartia and its cognates particularly represent the Heb. words ḥaṭṭā't, lapse, sin, and 'āwôn, guilt, sin as a conscious deviation from the right way. The vb. hamartanō corresponds to that semantic range of the nouns. hamartōlos usually means evildoer, lawless one.

(b) Unlike the NT, the OT has no primary, general word for sin. Yet sin, over and above the guilt of the individual, was clearly recognized as a reality that separates human beings and the nation of Israel from God. Yahweh himself is the yardstick for right and wrong. His covenant with the people, his commandments and law, his word spoken by chosen servants all express his normative will. Sin is an estrangement from God and thus brings harm and punishment on itself.

(c) The OT's view of sin is the negative reverse side of the idea of the covenant, and thus is often expressed in legal terms. The nation's history is often depicted as a history of apostasy, of punishment, of Yahweh's gracious intervention, and of returning.

Gen. 3–11 provides a clear example of the OT idea of sin, depicting in masterly fashion humanity's independent and self-sufficient behavior. Sin spreads in a series of fresh outbreaks, starting with the fall of Adam into sin in Gen. 3 and leading on to fratricide (4:1–8), the song of Lamech (4:23–24), to the apex of evil in the world before the flood (6:1–6), and finally to the building of the tower of Babel (11:1–9). The tendency to depart from the order given by God and to establish oneself in one's own position and to go one's own way is seated in the heart (Gen. 6:5; 8:21).

(d) Sin is both a falling away from a relationship of faithfulness to God and disobedience to his commands and law. The former is described as unfaithfulness to God's covenant (Hos. 2; Jer. 3:10), while the latter is a violation of God's word (1 Sam. 15:23–26; Ps. 78). In both cases God's people shut themselves off from fellowship with him and become God-less (cf. Jer. 2:29).

(e) The sin of the individual cannot be separated from that of the nation. The earlier OT writings concentrate on the nation's history of recurrent apostasy (Jdg. 2:6–3:6); later traditions put more emphasis on the fate of the individual (Ps.; Job).

3. (a) Sin is universal. No one can exist in the presence of God's holiness (Isa. 6:1–7). His accusation is against the people as a whole (Hos. 12). The universality of sin is esp. emphasized in Gen. 6:5; 8:21; Isa. 64:6–7. This view forms a starting point for a doctrine of original sin, but nowhere in the OT is this teaching given any systematic formulation. The consequence of sin is death (Gen. 2:17). If that does not happen at once, it is due to God's sovereign grace, in which he delays the consequence of destruction and does not allow punishment and judgment to be his last word. Rather, God makes them the basis of renewal, as in the cases of Noah (Gen. 6–9) and the new covenant (Jer. 31; Ezek. 37). The rebellious can only hope for God's mercy until at last they hear the message of the servant of God, who, although without sin, bears the sins of others (Isa. 53).

(b) The various OT sacrifices, including the great day of atonement ritual described in Lev. 16, were designed to cover sin. But forgiveness of sins is linked with confession of guilt (cf. Gen. 50:17; 2 Sam. 12:13; Ps. 51).

4. In Jewish thinking the concept of sin was more strongly oriented toward the law, even as it became more superficial under the influence of speculative and casuistic thinking. Gentiles do not know God's commands and are therefore all sinners. For the religious Jew the essence of sin was above all the transgression of God's laws and commandments. Idolatry, unchastity, and bloodshed were regarded as unforgivable sins. The possibility of atonement for sins committed unintentionally was found in sacrifice, purificatory rites, good works, suffering, and martyrdom. As to the question of the origin of sin, Judaism found the answer in Adam and Eve or the fallen angels (Gen. 6:1–6). The consequences of sin are sickness, death, and eternal damnation. The religious had their sights fixed on the possibility of sinlessness, their examples being Abraham, Moses, Elijah, and Enoch. The complete removal of sin was expected in the messianic kingdom.

NT Following the prominent use of hamartanō and its cognates in the LXX, the NT uses them as the comprehensive expression of everything opposed to God. The Christian concept of sin finds its fullest expression and its deepest theological development in Paul and John. hamartia occurs 173x (64x in Paul, 25x in Heb., and 17x each in Jn. and the Johannine letters); hamartanō occurs 42x (7x each in Rom. and 1 Cor., 10x in the Johannine letters and 3x in Jn.). hamartēma occurs only 4x and refers to the individual sinful act (e.g., 1 Cor. 6:18); it is used in the context of forgiveness (Mk. 3:28; Rom. 3:25), and in Mk. 3:29 it is used of the unpardonable sin. The adj. anamartētos occurs only in Jn. 8:7 and means without actual sin. hamartōlos, sinful, is the usual adj. (47x); used as a substantive, its nuances follow those of hamartia.

1. (a) Jesus used the OT and Jewish concept of sin that was familiar in the world around him. This becomes clear from the fact that in the Synoptic Gospels hamartia and hamartēma are found almost exclusively in the context of the forgiveness of sins. hamartanō is frequently used absolutely, i.e., in its usual and familiar sense (cf. Matt. 18:15; Lk. 17:3–4). The use of the nouns chiefly in the pl. shows that the dominant idea is that of individual faults committed against the law or one's fellow human beings. The sinner is the one who does not abide by the law and the Pharisaic interpretation of it. As a result, the sinner is put on the same level as the tax collector (Matt. 9:10; Mk. 2:15–16) and is likened to the Gentile or the ungodly (Matt. 26:45; Mk. 14:41; Lk. 6:32–34). The combination "adulterous and sinful generation" in Mk. 8:38 implies that sin separates one from God; hence repentance and forgiveness are necessary.

(b) Jesus' preaching went beyond the Jewish concept of sin when, as in the Sermon on the Mount, he radicalized the law and set up his coming and his person as a new standard that brought about a new state of affairs (Matt. 7:21–23; 12:31; Mk. 3:28–35; Lk. 12:10). This is true even though these passages do not often explicitly mention sin. The new situation is disclosed by Jesus' mixing with sinners. Jesus comes to sinners, not to the righteous (Matt. 9:13; Mk. 2:17; Lk. 5:32). He pronounces the poor blessed (Matt. 5:2–11) and calls the burdened to him (11:28).

In connection with this mission Jesus is called "a friend of . . . 'sinners'" (Matt. 9:10–11; 11:19). His fellowship with sinners is particularly prominent in Luke (Lk. 7:36–50; 15:1–32; 18:9–14; 19:1–10). Jesus' remarks about the Pharisees in Matt. 23:1–36; Mk. 12:37–40; Lk. 20:45–47 make it esp. clear that with his coming the criterion for distinguishing righteous from sinful has been altered. Those who according to Jewish legal standards were reckoned righteous are shown to be sinful before God in view of their self-righteousness and their rejection of Jesus.

(c) In the passion narrative, esp. in the account of the Last Supper, Jesus' whole life and preaching are seen clearly from the perspective of the cross (Matt. 26:28). Jesus replaces ritual atonement with the sacrifice of his own life. Here the righteous and unrighteous alike are seen to be sinners. This insight is anticipated in Peter's cry in Lk. 5:8 ("Go away from me, Lord; I am a sinful man!") and is summed up in the evangelists' overall interpretation of Jesus' mission as the one who will save his people from their sins (Matt. 1:21; Lk. 1:77). Thus baptism, which John the Baptist viewed in terms of repentance (Mk. 1:4), takes on a new meaning. Both baptism and forgiveness of sins are grounded by the apostles in the death and resurrection of Jesus (Jn. 20:23; Acts 2:38; 5:31; 10:43).

2. (a) Paul's primary statements about sin are found in Rom. 1–8, but it is striking that hamartia and its cognates scarcely occur in 1:18–3:20. Here Paul speaks about both Jews and Gentiles, who alike fall short when they are confronted with God's righteousness. As a result of our unbelief and unrighteous acts, we all fall under God's wrath. The law (nomos, → 3795) produces knowledge of sin, but not mastery of it (Rom. 3:20; 5:20; 7:7–12; Gal. 3:22). The law is not thereby invalidated (Rom. 3:31), but rather serves to lead us to faith in Christ (Gal. 3:23–25). God's righteousness cannot be attained by the way of the law. Law–sin–death: that is the fateful road we all tread without Christ and without faith. Adam is an example of this (Rom. 5:12–21). Through his sin he brought death into being, both for himself and for the entire human race (cf. Rom. 1:32; 6:16; 7:5–11; 8:13; 1 Cor. 15:56).

It is only when one comes to know Christ that the full power of sin is disclosed. Those who struggle against God's Spirit are imprisoned in the flesh (sarx, → 4922), which, as God's enemy, produces sin and death. Spirit and flesh fight against one another in a person under the law (Rom. 7:13–25; cf. Gal. 5:16–26). Paul almost always uses hamartia in the sing., implying that sin is almost a personal power acting in and through humanity (Rom. 5:12, 21; 6:6, 17; 7:9–23). The same is also true of sarx (Gal. 5:19, 24) and thanatos (death, → 2505; Rom. 6:9b). This vivid way of putting things contributed, along with Paul's statements on the universality of sin since Adam (Rom. 5), to the church's doctrine of original sin.

(b) Jesus Christ, as the counterpart of Adam (1 Cor. 15:45), has by his coming broken this circle. He took on himself the curse of the law in place of all human beings (Gal. 3:10–14). He endured death (Rom. 5:8; 6:3–10; 1 Cor. 15:3) and dealt with sin by bearing it (Rom. 8:1–4). He himself became sin (2 Cor. 5:21) in order to establish God's righteousness (Rom. 5:11; 11:15; 2 Cor. 5:18–19; → katallassō, to reconcile, 2904). Through his victory, Jesus overpowered the law, sin, and death, replacing them by righteousness and life.

The way of the law, which Paul himself had earlier tried to walk, does not lead to life but rather to death. Paul saw in his own persecution of Christ and the Christians the sin of his life (1 Cor. 15:9; 1 Tim. 1:15). But God's grace opened up a new way

(Rom. 5:15; 1 Cor. 15:10–11), the way of faith (Rom. 3:21–30). Abraham, who became righteous through faith (Rom. 4), serves as a type of this new way.

Christ's reconciling death has taken place for us once for all (Rom. 3:25–26; 5:8), so that those who believe receive peace with God (5:1–5). Through baptism believers are taken up into the Christ-event. By dying and rising with Christ, they are torn from the dominion of death in order to participate in Christ's new life (6:1–11). This indicative is immediately followed by an imperative, that Christians are now to free themselves from the bondage of sin in order to enter the service of righteousness (6:12–18). The freedom to put oneself at the disposal of the Spirit is realized in love (Gal. 5:13–26; cf. Rom. 8:9–17). As a result, all self-righteousness as well as all confidence in the self is excluded (Rom. 10:3; 1 Cor. 1:18–31). Thereafter, all that does not arise from faith and so from union with the living Christ is sin (Rom. 14:23).

(c) Thus we have two strands in Paul's teaching on sin. (i)All human beings are subject to the power of sin, from which they can be redeemed only through God's once-and-for-all act of reconciliation in Jesus Christ. (ii) God calls everyone to turn to this new righteousness in faith, to be servants of Christ instead of servants of sin, and then to walk in the Spirit or in Christ. It is the juxtaposition and interweaving of these two strands that shows the depth and seriousness of sin as a ruling power and the greatness of God's act of grace, and that at the same time gives the reason for our responsibility for faith and actions.

3. (a) In the Johannine literature the concept of hamartia is set within the context of the Christ-event. Jesus came into the world (Jn. 1:1–14) and bore its sin as the Lamb of God (1:29; 1 Jn. 3:5). He himself was without sin, but he shed his blood for the sin of the world—i.e., for those imprisoned in their alienation from God (1 Jn. 1:7; 2:2; 4:10; Rev. 1:5). Any will or power that opposes Jesus is sin. This was clear in the case of Judas Iscariot (Jn. 6:70–71; 19:11), but also in the way the Jews reacted to Jesus (8:44–47). They supposed Jesus to be a sinful human being, but they were the ones who were sinful, since they did not recognize him as the Redeemer (9:16–41). Here sin is equated with unbelief, and people are faced with a decision for or against Jesus (15:22–24). Through belief or unbelief people decide either for life or for death (8:24; 9:41; 16:8–9). Thus by his coming Jesus exposed sin as such (15:22–24) and, insofar as he brought life, stripped the prince of this world of his power (12:31; 16:11).

(b) Sin is seen as the opposite of love in 1 Jn. (3:1–10). It is true that purification from sin has taken place through Christ (1:7) and that sin is an impossibility for those born of God (3:8–9), but no one can consider himself or herself sinless or dispense with forgiveness (1:8). On the contrary, Christ forgives our sins when we confess them (1:9). Thus 1 Jn. also preserves the tension between Christ's redemptive act, ethics, and human actions. The test lies in one's love of fellow believers (1:9; 4:7; cf. 1:4; 2:7; 3:10). However, 1 Jn. also knows of the serious mortal sin, by which Jn. probably means apostasy and idolatry (5:16–21).

4. Hebrews seeks to show that Jesus became a human being in every sense (2:14), even to the point of being tempted (4:14–16; 5:7–8), yet he yet remained free from sin (4:15). Heb. deals with sin in the context of sacrifice. Christ as the true high priest (7:25–27) offered himself once and for all for our sin, replacing the repeated sin offerings of the OT. Jesus is the unique sacrifice that makes the offering of further sacrifices superfluous (10:4–10, 18); they are replaced by the possibility of forgiveness through faith (11:1–40). Jesus' unique sacrifice liberates us once and for all from sin; his example helps us in our struggle against the peril of continuing in sin (12:1–4).

For those who fall away from the faith, eternal judgment is waiting (6:4–6; 10:26–31). This is the sin that excludes further repentance.

5. The letter of James warns of lust that produces sin and death (1:15) and of the danger of failing to act on the knowledge provided by faith (4:17). At the same time, James exhorts his readers to confess their sin, knowing that God will forgive them (5:15–20).

6. In his first letter, Peter cites Isa. 53 to encourage his readers to stand firm in the midst of suffering by taking as our example him who once suffered for us and thereby redeemed us from our sins (1 Pet. 2:21–25; 3:18; 4:1).

ἄμεμπτος (amemptos), blameless (289); ἀμέμπτως (amemptōs), blamelessly (290); μέμφομαι (memphomai), find fault (3522); μεμψίμοιρος (mempsimoiros), fault-finding (3523); μέμψις (mempsis), reason for complaint (3524).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. amemptos usually means blameless, without reproach. It may be used of persons or things. On occasion amemptos was used with the connotation "content," in the sense that one is not characterized by blaming others. The vb. memphomai means to blame, find fault with. With the dat. and acc. of the person it may connote the idea of regarding someone as blameworthy. The adj. mempsimoiros characterizes one who is apt to find fault, while mempsis indicates the ground of, or reason for, complaint or blame.

2. (a) In the LXX amemptos can mean clean, pure, perfect, complete, righteous, and possibly straight, upright. In parallelism with katharos (clean) in Job 11:4, it describes the blamelessness of Job's character (see also 1:8). In 15:14 this word occurs in parallelism with dikaios (righteous; cf. also 22:3). It occurs in Wis. 10:5, 15; 18:21 in the sense of moral purity. The adv. amemptōs occurs in an LXX addition to the Heb. text of Est. 3:13 in the sense of honorable, with regard to Artaxerxes' well-intentioned efforts to unify his empire.

(b) In Job 33:10 mempsis is parallel with the phrase "considers me his enemy." The sense is that of reason for complaint. In 39:7 the same word describes the shouts of a driver to the wild donkey, connoting the idea of scolding or censuring. In 15:15 (A); 33:23; Wis. 13:6 the word connotes fault or blame.

NT 1. (a) amemptos occurs in the NT in the sense of moral purity in Lk. 1:6, where it describes Zechariah's blamelessness with regard to the commandments of the Lord. In Phil. 3:6 Paul uses the word to describe his standing as a Pharisee with regard to the law of God; he was not guilty of disobedience. The word occurs in a similar sense in 2:15 to describe the moral purity of those believers who do not grumble or question; they are further described as "pure" (amōmos). In 1 Thess. 3:13 Paul expresses his desire that the Thessalonian Christians be "blameless" at the Parousia (cf. Matt. 25:34–40). This blamelessness is the result of their abounding love one for another (1 Thess. 3:12). amemptos is applied to the first covenant in Heb. 8:7 in a negative sense. If there had been "nothing wrong" with it, there would have been no need for another one.

(b) The related adv. amemptōs occurs in 1 Thess. 2:10 to describe Paul's activity among the Thessalonians in regard to there being no cause for censure or blame on his part, and in 5:23 to denote the effect of the total work of sanctification at the Parousia.

2. The vb. memphomai has the basic connotation of blame or finding fault. In some later MSS of Mark 7:2 it is used to express the reaction of the Pharisees to those disciples who were eating with unwashed hands: They were open to blame because they were guilty of violating Jewish tradition.

In Rom. 9:19 Paul uses memphomai in a rhetorical question on a matter of human responsibility that occurs in an exposition of the sovereignty of God: "Why does God still blame us?" This vb. clearly connotes guilt or blameworthiness here, for Paul argues that God's sovereignty does not free sinners of guilt before God.

In Heb. 8:8 memphomai occurs with the dat. of the pers. in a sense similar to the above but in contrast to amemptos (8:7). The Sinaitic covenant is described as not being faultless (amemptos). It has fault in that the people to whom it was given did not keep it, for "God found fault [memphomenos] with" them (8:8). It is not that the intrinsic nature of the commandments was changed, but rather the mode of reception of the covenant (8:8–12, quoting Jer. 31:31–34).

3. mempsimoiros (lit., finding fault with one's lot [moira]) occurs only in Jude 16, where it describes a grumbler or malcontent.

297 ἀμήν — ἀμήν (amēn), amen (297).

OT 1. Amen is a transliteration of the Heb. ʾāmēn, derived from ʾāman—show oneself dependable (niph.); know oneself to be secure, have faith (hiph.)—it means certain, true.

The Heb. word was used 30x in the OT (trans. by amēn 3x, by genoito 23x) on solemn occasions to confirm a curse or adjuration by identifying oneself with it, to accept a blessing, or to associate oneself with a doxology. To say "amen" confirms a statement by someone else. In Num. 5:22 the woman suspected of adultery confirmed the priest's adjuration with a double "Amen" (genoito). In Deut. 27:15–26 the people give a twelvefold confirmation (genoito) to the curses pronounced against certain transgressors of the Mosaic law (see also Neh. 5:13 [amēn]; Jer. 11:5 [genoito]). Since God himself is a witness of such confirmation, he is called in Isa. 65:16 "the God of [the] amen" (lit. Heb.; LXX and NIV "the God of truth").

The doxologies at the end of the first four books of the Psalms (41:13; 72:19; 89:52; 106:48) are closed by "Amen"(Heb.; LXX genoito). Neh. 8:6 (cf. also 1 Chr. 16:36) shows it to be the people's expression of response. By declaring "Amen" the people affirm that which has been said as certain, positive, valid, and binding.

2. In rab. sources amen is found only as a confirmatory and emphatic answer to what has been said by another. Those saying "Amen" to a prayer or doxology made it their own. In a similar manner, saying "Amen" to an adjuration, blessing, or curse made it binding on oneself. Jews were to say "Amen" to any doxology. Those who said "Amen" properly would be richly rewarded by God. Amen is seldom found at the end of a prayer.

When someone joined the Qumran community, the priests repeated doxologies to God's glory and blessed all who belonged to God's portion, while the Levites cursed all who belonged to Belial's portion. All those entering the covenant answered these doxologies, blessings, and curses with a double "Amen."

NT Amen is found 129x in the NT. In the Gospels it is found only in the mouth of Jesus, generally in the phrase, "Amen, I say to you...." Sometimes Luke translates an original amen by alēthōs ("truly," 9:27; 12:24; 21:3) or ep' alētheias ("in truth" 4:25). John has a double amen 25x, either for liturgical reasons or to strengthen the amen. By introducing his words in this way, Jesus labeled them as certain and reliable and made them binding on himself and on his hearers. They expressed his majesty and authority.

Amen appears in the other NT writings at the close of prayers and doxologies in order to strengthen and confirm them (Rom. 1:25; 9:5; 11:36; 16:27; Eph. 3:21; Heb. 13:21). Anyone hearing a thanksgiving in a worship service answers it with "Amen." Hence that element must be expressed in a language he or she understands (1 Cor. 14:16). In the NT letters it is assumed that the congregation will answer with an amen (Rom. 15:33; Gal. 6:18; Rev. 1:7).

In Rev. 7:12 amen stands at the beginning and end of a doxology, and in 19:4 it is linked with "Hallelujah." In 22:20 the church answers a divine "surely" with its amen and so endorses the promise. When Christ calls himself "the Amen" in 3:14 and affirms that he is "the faithful and true witness" (virtually a trans. of amen), he is taking up Isa. 65:16 (LXX). In 2 Cor. 1:20 Paul sees all the promises of God fulfilled and guaranteed in Christ.

ἀμνός (amnos), lamb (303); ἀρήν (arēn), lamb (748); ἀρνίον (arnion), lamb (768).

CL & OT amnos denotes a lamb as distinct from probaton, sheep. In the LXX and NT both amnos and arēn are used; arnion is no longer a diminutive. amnos in the OT is used chiefly in passages of a cultic and sacrificial character. Lambs are presented at the sanctuary as burnt offerings and sacrifices (Lev. 9:3; Num. 15:5) to atone for sin and to cleanse people—either as a whole or as individuals (e.g., lepers, Lev. 14:10).

At the annual Passover feast each family was to kill and eat a lamb without blemish, a male a year old, in memory of the exodus from Egypt (Exod. 12:5 in A). At the exodus event itself the blood of the lamb was smeared on the doorframes and lintels of Jewish houses (cf. 12:7, 13, 23). In his prophecy of the new temple Ezek. mentions lambs as gifts for the Sabbath-offering and the feast-offering (Ezek. 46:4, 11).

In Isa. 53:7 the patiently suffering Servant of the Lord is compared with a lamb being led to the slaughter but remaining silent as though before shearers. Here for the first time a person is spoken of as fulfilling the function of a sacrificial animal. Acts 8:32 sees in this passage a reference to the "good news of Jesus" (Acts 8:35).

NT 1. In the NT Jesus is described 4x as amnos. In Jn. 1:29, 36, John the Baptist describes Jesus, whom he has baptized, as "the Lamb of God"—not merely like a lamb, but as the Lamb of God. John further describes this lamb as one "who takes away the sin of the world." This links the phrase with Isa. 53:6 about the Servant of the Lord on whom God "has laid ... the iniquity of us all."

If "lamb" stands for "offering," then the Baptist's statement becomes clear: No offerings brought by human beings can take away the sin of the world, but God himself provides an offering, which does indeed take it away. He gave his only Son and did not spare him (cf. Rom. 8:31–32, perhaps an echo of Gen. 22). Jn. 1:29 must be seen against the background of Jesus' baptism (1:32–34), when he publicly identified himself with sinners and their lot. The eschatological time of salvation has begun.

Two other NT passages stress other aspects of Jesus' being compared to a lamb: Acts 8:32 stresses his patient suffering, while 1 Pet. 1:19 emphasizes the sinlessness and perfection of his sacrifice.

2. arēn occurs once in the NT, where Jesus says the disciples will be as defenseless as lambs among wolves (Lk. 10:3; Matt. 10:16 uses probaton, → 4585).

3. In Jn. 21:15 Christ exhorts Peter: "Feed my lambs [arnia]." The only other places where arnion occurs is in Rev. (29x). The Judge of all the earth is the one who died for us, and even as sovereign Lord he still bears the marks of his passion (Rev. 5:6). In 5:6, 8, 12–13, Christ is seen in this twofold aspect. He is the Lord, the one who opens the seals and who is to be worshiped. At the same time he is "the Lamb, who was slain," having redeemed people of all races to God by his blood and made them a kingdom and priests (5:9–10). He is both arnion and leōn, lion (→ 3329).

The eschatological wrath from which kings, rulers, free persons, and slaves all wish to hide is "the wrath of the Lamb" (Rev. 6:16). In ch. 7 the blood of the Lamb has cleansing power. The robes of the martyrs were cleansed not by their martyrdom but by the blood of the Lamb, who is worshiped as God (7:10). Rev. 19:7, 9 speaks of the marriage of the Lamb, the church being the bride. The twelve apostles are called "apostles of the Lamb," and God and the Lamb illumine the new Jerusalem (21:14, 23).

ἄμπελος (ampelos), vine, grapevine (306); ἀμπελουργός (ampelourgos), vinedresser, gardener (307); ἀμπελών (ampelōn), vineyard (308); οἶνος (oinos), wine (3885); οἰνοπότης (oinopotēs), wine drinker (3884); οἰνοφλυγία (oinophlygia), drunkenness (3886).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. and in the LXX ampelos means a vine (e.g., Gen. 40:9–10; 49:11; Isa. 24:7). ampelōn means vineyard (Gen. 9:20; Deut. 20:6). ampelourgos, a rare term in the LXX, means a vineyard worker (2 Ki. 25:12; Jer. 52:16). oinos means wine in cl. Gk. and mostly translates Heb. yayin, wine.

2. Viticulture is one of the oldest forms of agriculture (cf. Gen. 9:20–21). The twin themes of the vine and wine both as symbols of fertility and well-being and as causes of debauchery and shame run throughout Scripture. Grape-growing was an important part of OT economy. As with other crops, the owner was not permitted to reap the vineyard twice in one harvest; gleanings were to be left for those who lacked possessions (Lev. 19:10; Deut. 24:21). Vineyards were to lie fallow every seventh year (Exod. 23:10–11; Lev. 25:3–7) and were not to be sown with other plants (Deut. 22:9).

3. (a) The symbolism of Israel as a vine is found in Ps. and prophetic books. Ps. 80:8–13 asks why Yahweh has allowed his vine, Israel, to be ravaged. Isa. 5:1–7 uses ancient vineyard practice in a fig. sense; Israel is the vineyard, Yahweh the gardener, and a harvest of wild grapes comes instead of ripe, juicy grapes (cf. also Jer. 2:21). The infidelity of Israel as a spreading vine is reproached in Hos. 10:1. The wood of the vine is good for nothing but fuel (Ezek. 15:1–8; cf. 19:10–14); its ceasing to bear fruit is a symbol of judgment. In 17:1–10 "the seed of [the] land" (Zedekiah) is planted by "a great eagle" (Nebuchadnezzar) and becomes "a low, spreading vine," but it will be transplanted by another eagle (Hophra). This allegory closes with the question whether the transplanted vine will survive when the east wind strikes it.

(b) In Ps. 128:3 the wife of him who fears Yahweh "will be like a fruitful vine within your house." The abundance of vineyards is a sign of Yahweh's favor (Hos. 2:15). Superabundance at the grape harvest will characterize the end times (Amos 9:13; cf. Joel 2:24; 3:18; Zech. 10:7). In Sir. 24:17 the vine is a symbol of wisdom.

4. Wine is often mentioned in lists of produce (e.g., Gen. 27:28; Deut. 7:13; 11:14; 18:4). Because of its color it can be called the "blood of the grape" (Deut. 32:14; Sir. 39:26; cf. Isa. 63:3; Rev. 14:20). The misuse of wine brings numerous evils, beginning with the nakedness of Noah and the curse of Canaan (Gen. 9:20–27). Those whose lives are in the grip of wine are denounced by the prophets (Isa. 5:11, 22; 28:7; Mic. 2:11; Hab. 2:5). Priests were forbidden to drink wine when engaged in their duties (Lev. 10:9; Ezek. 44:21). Similarly, Prov. has numerous warnings against inordinate love of wine (e.g., 20:1; 21:17). The Nazirites took vows never to drink wine or the products of the grapevine (Num. 6:3; cf. Jdg. 13:4, 7, 14), and the Rechabites abstained both from wine and from building houses (Jer. 35:6–7 = LXX 42:6–7).

But wine was also part of daily life and was often safer to drink than water. Wine was drunk at feasts and was an honored gift (cf. 1 Sam. 25:18; 2 Sam. 16:1). It was an article of trade (2 Chr. 2:8–10, 15). It is praised by the psalmist as gladdening the human heart (Ps. 104:15). Libations of wine were also used in sacrifice, both to false gods (Deut. 32:37–38) and to Yahweh (Exod. 29:40; Lev. 23:13).

5. In the prophets judgment is expressed under the symbolism of wine: The wicked will be forced to drain the cup and will not be able to stand (Ps. 60:3); the wine harvest (Joel 3:13) and the treading of the grapes (Isa. 63:2–6) are pictures of judgment.

NT 1. Vineyards often feature in Jesus' parables. (a) In Lk. 13:6–9 the center of interest is the fig tree, which is planted in a vineyard (ampelōn) and tended by a caretaker (ampelourgos), who pleads for it to be spared one more year after three successive years of failure to bear fruit. If it fails then, it will be cut down. The parable pictures judgment on the Jewish people in the light of their failure to respond to the preaching of Jesus (cf. 13:5b). The ultimate disaster came with the Jewish War and fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

(b) Matt. 20:1–16 records the parable of the workers in the vineyard. Each worker receives a denarius regardless of how long he has worked. Two meanings are possible for this parable. It may be teaching God's sovereign grace that, in contrast with the grumbling attitude of the Pharisees, welcomes latecomers and sinners into the kingdom (cf. the three parables in Lk. 15). But note that the parable follows Jesus' response to Peter's declaration of having left all to follow Jesus (Matt. 19:27). Jesus replies that the disciples will sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel and will inherit eternal life (19:28–29). Thus, this parable may be encouraging the disciples not to be proud and self-seeking but to accept whatever they receive as God's gift.

(c) The parable of the two sons, the first refusing to work in the vineyard but then going and the second promising but not actually going (Matt. 21:28–32), has a similar theme to the parable of the lost son in Lk. 15:11–32. Here again the first-last theme recurs: Tax collectors and prostitutes go into the kingdom of God before hypocrites.

(d) This is followed by the parable (or perhaps allegory) of the wicked tenants, which is a Christological restatement of Isaiah's parable of the vineyard (Matt. 21:33–46; Mk. 12:1–12, Lk. 20:9–19; cf. Isa. 5:1–7). The tenants (the Jewish nation) have killed servants (the prophets down to John the Baptist) sent by the owner (God) to get his fruit. By killing the heir (Jesus), they believe the vineyard will be theirs to use as they wish. But the owner will put the tenants to death and replace them with "other tenants, who will give him his share of the crop at harvest time" (Matt. 21:41), i.e., a new people of God.

(e) Jn. 15:1–11 contains Jesus' great description of himself as the true vine, the Father as the gardener, and the need of the disciples to remain in him in order to bear fruit. This is more precisely defined in terms of Jesus' words remaining in them (15:7) and of their remaining in his love (15:9), which means keeping his commandments (15:10). All this is said that the joy of Jesus may be in them to the full (15:11). Whereas Israel was the vine or the vineyard in the OT, the vine is now narrowed down to Jesus himself; the only way for the branches to live and flourish is to remain in him. Paul uses a similar picture in the olive tree from which the natural branches have been removed and those of a wild olive grafted in (Rom. 11:17–24; → dendron, 1285; elaion, olive tree, 1778).

2. (a) Wine is generally understood lit. in the NT and never in a cultic sense. John the Baptist abstained from drinking wine (Lk. 1:15), perhaps following a Nazirite vow. Jesus, by contrast, was accused of being "a glutton and a drunkard [oinopotēs]" (Matt. 11:18–19). Jesus justifies his refraining from fasting on the grounds that the presence of the bridegroom is a time for festivity; but when the bridegroom is taken away, the disciples will then fast (Matt. 9:14–17; Mk. 2:18–22; Lk. 5:33–38). The saying has not only messianic implications but hints of Jesus' death. Lk. 5:39 adds: "No one after drinking old wine wants the new, for he says, 'The old is better.'" Jesus here warns against the attitude of his opponents, who stick to the old and familiar, thinking that they know that the old is better simply because it is old.

(b) The NT maintains a similar attitude to wine as the OT. On the one hand, it is one of God's gifts of creation to be enjoyed. Paul exhorts Timothy to drink a little wine for his stomach's sake (1 Tim. 5:23), and wine is a means of healing in Lk. 10:34. On the other hand, to refrain from drinking wine may be necessary for the gospel, so as not to make a fellow believer stumble (Rom. 14:21). Moreover, drunkenness (oinophlygia) is a characteristic Gentile way of life (1 Pet. 4:3), and Jesus and Paul both warn against it (Lk. 21:34; Eph. 5:18). Elders and deacons must not be drunkards (1 Tim. 3:3, 8; Tit. 2:3).

(c) There is an outward correspondence between the symptoms of drunkenness and of being filled with the Spirit. Note how Paul exhorts the Ephesians not to be drunk on wine (as perhaps some were) but to be Spirit-filled (Eph. 5:18). At Pentecost the bystanders made a contrasting mistake, concluding that the disciples were filled with new wine, whereas in fact they were filled with the Spirit (Acts 2:13).

(d) Jesus' first miracle was that of turning water into wine at a wedding (Jn. 2:1–11). The story is symbolic not only of Jesus' transforming power, but also of the new age foretold in the OT, in which wine would be present in abundance.

(e) oinos is not mentioned in the accounts of the Last Supper, but Jesus did say that he would not drink of the fruit of the vine until he drank it new in the kingdom of God (Matt. 26:29; Mk. 14:25). Elsewhere the consummation is pictured in terms of an eschatological meal (cf. Matt. 8:11; 22:1–14).

(f) Wine is often mentioned in Rev., but only once lit. (18:13), where it is a commodity that cannot be sold in the days of judgment. In 14:10; 16:19; 19:15 it pictures the wrath of God, recalling OT imagery on wine and the cup of God's wrath. Rev. 14:8 celebrates the fall of Babylon, "which made all nations drink the maddening wine of her adulteries" (cf. 17:2; 18:3). Here the debauching effects of wine are descriptive of worldly passion that will be requited by the wine of God's wrath.

ἀναβαίνω (anabainō), go up, mount up (326); καταβαίνω (katabainō), descend (2849); μεταβαίνω (metabainō), pass over (3553).

CL & OT 1. bainō, the root word of anabainō, though absent from the NT, means to go, walk. anabainō indicates movement up toward a destination: to go up, ascend, grow up. The spatial meaning predominates: One climbs a mountain, mounts a platform, or goes upstairs. If the destination is a holy place, the going up involves performance of some cultic act. The mystic is promised ascent to the world of the gods, heaven, or Olympus.

2. In the LXX anabainō is used particularly of going up the mountain of God, the sanctuary, and Jerusalem (Exod. 34:4; 1 Sam. 1:3; 2 Ki. 19:14). In Gen. 28:12, Jacob's dream pictured a ramp or stair-like pavement, which, in accordance with the ancient concept of the world, led up to the gate of heaven. This was the place where intercourse between the earth and the upper divine world took place. God's messengers were going up and down, doing God's commands or supervising the earth. In Jon. 2:7 descent into the underworld signifies condemnation and death, while ascent signifies pardon and life.

NT 1. anabainō occurs 82x in the NT. It retains the basic spatial sense of climbing a mountain or going up to Jerusalem for the Passover (Lk. 2:4; 18:10; Jn. 7:8–10; Acts 3:1; Gal. 2:1). It stands in contrast to katabainō (81x), which reverses the spatial direction. anabainō occasionally denotes the growth of plants (Matt. 13:7); fig. it can denote the rise of ideas (Lk. 24:38; 1 Cor. 2:9 ["conceived"]) and the ascent of prayers to God (Acts 10:4).

2. The specific cultic connotation fades in the Synoptics behind a more general spiritual meaning. When Jesus came up out of the water of the Jordan after his baptism, he received the Spirit (Matt. 3:16). When he climbed a mountain, his ascent was the prelude to some action on his or God's part (Matt. 5:1; 14:23; 15:29; Mk. 3:13; Lk. 9:28).

3. Jn. uses anabainō as a fixed expression for the ascent of the Son of Man (similarly Acts 2:34; Rom. 10:6–7; Eph. 4:8). In this sense the vb. is complemented by katabainō, descend. These concepts describe a movement that originates from heaven and is directed toward the earth, or vice versa. The stress is not on some kind of journey to heaven; the decisive element is Jesus' going from and to God.

Christ, as the preexistent Logos, bridges the gulf between heaven and earth and becomes a man (Jn. 3:13; cf. Prov. 30:4; Jn. 6:33, 38, 41–42). Then, after his elevation on the cross he ascends "to where he was before" (Jn. 6:62). His descent reveals the Father's love; his ascent, God's sovereign power. In his descent Jesus is the revealer; in his ascent, the perfecter through whom his people receive God as Father (Jn. 20:17).

In his descent and ascent he bridges the gulf between God and the world, between light and darkness.

The Son stands in a permanent relationship to the Father, which is described with the help of the vision of the ascending and descending angels (Jn. 1:51; cf. Gen. 28:12). Thus, in the earthly presence of the Son of Man, descent and ascent are repeated, in that his thoughts are derived from the Father and his acts are directed to the Father.

4. (a) Jn. uses metabainō to describe the passage from death to life. As Jesus crosses the frontier in his elevation on the cross, so human beings do in the obedience of faith. The believer passes over into the risen Christ's sphere of life (Jn. 5:24; 13:1; 1 Jn. 3:14).

(b) In addition to the spatial uses noted above, katabainō also denotes the eschatological arrival of the Lord at his second coming and the descent of the heavenly Jerusalem (1 Thess. 4:16; Rev. 3:12; 21:2, 10). But already God's good and life-giving gifts are coming down to us, above all his trustworthy word, so "that we might be a kind of firstfruits of all he created" (Jas. 1:17–18). Similarly Jesus is the living bread that has come to us from God himself and has been made a present reality (Jn. 6:50, 58).

5. The ascent and descent of Christ in Eph. 4:8–11 calls for special attention. Paul refers to this motif in connection with a discussion of unity and gifts in the church. In 4:8 he alludes to Ps. 68:18: "This is why it says: 'When he ascended on high, he led captives in his train and gave gifts to men.'" There are two main differences from Ps. 68. The latter is in the 2d pers. sing. rather than 3d sing., and it refers to receiving rather than giving gifts. In Ps. 68 this verse most likely suggests the return of warrior Yahweh from a war and the voluntary or enforced gifts given to him. (Note, however, that the idea of giving rather than receiving gifts is supported by the Syriac version of the OT and the Targum, where the passage is interpreted of Moses' ascent of Sinai to receive God's law.)

How should we understand the alterations Paul gives to Ps. 68:18? Eph. 4:8 is probably best regarded not as a direct OT quotation of a prophecy regarding the bestowal of gifts but as an interpretative gloss on the Ps., explaining what God is doing now in contrast with the situation described in the Ps. The introductory words, "it says" occur again in Eph. 5:14, introducing a quotation not to be found in Scripture. It is possible that "Scripture" should be supplied as the unexpressed subj. (as in Rom. 10:11), with the idea that God (or the Spirit) is interpreting for the church now what was said in a different context in the OT. This Ps. must now be read in the light of the descent and ascent of Christ, which has brought about a reversal of the situation in which the victors received gifts from the vanquished. That is, the victor gives gifts.

Paul's argument in Eph. 4:9–10 goes on to state that the words "he ascended" imply that Christ "also descended to the lower, earthly regions"—possibly a reference to his incarnation. The ascent is fulfilled in his resurrection and ascension (cf. Phil. 2:8), the ultimate purpose of which is that he might "fill the whole universe" (Eph. 4:10; cf. 1:23; Col. 2:9). The gifts that are then enumerated as a result of that ascension might at first sight appear as anticlimactic: apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers (Eph. 4:11). But in the context of the argument, God's ultimate purpose for humankind is growth in personal maturity in Christ (4:12–16). These gifts are directly related to that growth, for they carry on the ministry of Christ to the church (cf. 4:7).

ἀναγινώσκω (anaginōskō), read (336); ἀνάγνωσις (anagnōsis), reading (342).

CL & OT 1. anaginōskō is a compound derived from ginōskō, recognize, know (1182). Originally anaginōskō had an intensive force (know exactly) but came to mean read, read aloud (in the cl. world anyone reading alone always did so aloud). In legal orations anaginōskō was often used to call the court secretary to read documents. anagnōsis means reading, reading aloud, esp. in meetings or before a court.

2. The cultic reading of the divine commandments was an early practice at the great Israelite festivals (Exod. 24:7; cf. Jos. 24:25). At that time the main incidents in Israel's history were probably also recounted (Exod. 15:1–18; Jdg. 5). Jer. substituted a reading of his oracles for a prophetic sermon he was not allowed to give (Jer. 36:5–10 = LXX 43:5–10). Ezra's reading of the Mosaic law had to be supplemented by a Levitical explanation (Neh. 8:8). There was also private reading of and meditation on the Scriptures (Deut. 17:18–20; cf. Ps. 1:2; Isa. 30:8).

3. Jewish synagogue worship had a reading from the Torah on the Sabbath, all festivals, the New Moon, fast days, Mondays, and Thursdays, and a reading from the Prophets on the Sabbath, festivals, and fasts. Any member of the congregation could read (Lk. 4:16–17). In the LXX God's command to the prophets to proclaim the word (Jer. 3:12; 11:6; etc.) was translated by anaginōskō, thereby implying reading in a service or some public place.

NT In the NT anaginōskō occurs 32x; anagnōsis 3x. Normally, reading the OT is meant, as in the Synoptics and in Acts 8:28; 13:15, 27; 15:21; 2 Cor. 3:14–15. It is used also for the reading of a letter (Acts 15:31; 2 Cor. 1:13; 3:2), esp. in a service (Col. 4:16; 1 Thess. 5:27).

Jesus held that an intensive reading of Scripture was necessary for theological discussion, as indeed for all knowledge of God—hence his frequent reproach, "Have you never read?" (Mk. 2:25; 12:10; etc.). But, as Paul argued in 2 Cor. 3:14–15, there was a veil over the minds of the Jews. They did not rightly understand the OT, for their reading took place without conversion to Christ (3:16) and so without the Spirit (3:17). Without the illumination of the Spirit one cannot understand the Scriptures (1 Cor. 2:14), which are a witness of Christ (cf. Jn. 5:39; → graphē, 1210).

The NT letters were from the first intended to be read in Christian services (1 Thess. 5:27). They were not confined to the local church to which they were addressed (Col. 4:16). Ultimately, reading these letters ranked equally with reading the OT.

ἀνάγκη (anankē), compulsion (340); ἀναγκαῖος (anankaios), necessary (338); ἀναγκάζω (anankazō), compel, force (337); ἀναγκαστῶς (anankastōs), by compulsion (339).

CL & OT 1. The words based on the stem anank- denote in varying gradations every form of outward or inward pressure exerted on human beings. For the Greeks ankē was the power that determined all reality, the principle dominating the universe. At various times they ascribed a divine character to it; Plato even ranked it higher than the gods. We are under a constraint because of our natural being; the final limitation of our existence by death is part of this compulsion.

2. In the OT the naturalist outlook of the Gk. world is replaced by a historical one. ankē translates Heb. words that denote the afflictions and distresses of illness, persecution, enmity, etc., which were often understood by Israelites to indicate God's alienation from them (cf. its use in such passages as 1 Sam. 22:2; Job 7:11; 15:24; 36:19; Ps. 107:6, 13, 19, 28; Tob. 4:9; 2 Macc. 6:7; 15:2; 4 Macc. 5:13, 16, 37; 6:9, 24). In the last resort, Yahweh alone can save one from ankē (Ps. 25:17). He will raise up the great "distress [→ thlipsis, 2568] and anguish [ankē]" on the day of his wrath (Zeph. 1:15), a conception that had powerful effect on the thought of postexilic Jud.

NT In the NT the noun ankē occurs 17x, the adj. ankaios 8x, and the vb. ankazō 9x—mostly in Paul's letters. ankazō describes a compulsion that does not rely on an outward force (Matt. 14:22; Lk. 14:23; Acts 28:19; Gal. 2:3). The adj. ankaios refers once to "close" friends to whom one is bound (Acts 10:24), but otherwise means necessary. In Acts 13:46 this necessity is to be understood analogously to dei (cf. Lk. 24:7, 26; Acts 1:16, 21; → 1256) as an exposition of the concept of salvation history that is sustained by a belief in God's providence governing the processes and events of history.

The noun ankē often denotes compulsion (Lk. 14:18; cf. 1 Cor. 7:37). In Phlm. 14 and 2 Cor. 9:7 constraint is contrasted with free will. The law involves all kinds of legal necessities (Heb. 7:12; 9:16, 23), of which one (the daily sacrifice the high priest offers for himself and the people) is no longer necessary on account of Christ's unique sacrifice (9:25–26). The thought of providence in the history of salvation is found in passages such as Matt. 18:7; Rom. 13:5; and 1 Cor. 9:16.

Without being confined to any particular phase of salvation history, ankē is used almost as an alternative to thlipsis to describe the tribulations that continually recur and break in on believers from the outside (1 Cor. 7:26; 2 Cor. 6:4; 12:10; 1 Thess. 3:7). It is against this background that Lk. 21:23 should be understood: "There will be great distress [ankē] in the land" (Lk. omits the relative clause of Mk. 13:19 and changes thlipsis to ankē; cf. Matt. 24:21). ankē here does not mark the end of the aeon, only that of Jerusalem (cf. Lk. 21:20), and with this the times of salvation for the Gentiles begin (21:24).

ἀνάθεμα (anathema) cursed, accursed (353); ἀνάθημα (anathēma), votive offering (356); ἀναθεματίζω (anathematizō), execrate, lay a curse on (354); κατάθεμα (katathema), that which is devoted to the deity and hence accursed thing (2873); καταθεματίζω (katathematizō), curse (2874).

CL & OT 1. anathema means lit. that which is set up (from ana [up] and tithēmi [place]). From this several meanings evolved: consecrated gift, offering (set up in the temple of the deity); what is handed over (to the wrath of the gods); what is dedicated (to destruction); and what has fallen under the power of a curse or ban.

2. The LXX uses anathema regularly to translate the Heb. ḥērem, ban (cf. Num. 21:3; Jos. 6:17; 7:12; Jdg. 1:17; Zech. 14:11). What is banned (persons or things) is directly given up to God and so cannot be redeemed (Lev. 27:29). The OT recognizes the destruction or annihilation of what has been banned, mostly by fire (27:29; Deut. 13:16–17; Jos. 10:28–40). But also it may be assigned in some instances to the priests for their maintenance or disposal (Num. 18:14; Ezek. 44:29).

3. Besides the understanding of the ban as dedication, the ban can also be punishment (Lev. 27:29). Those who appropriate to themselves what has been banned or refuse to accept the anathema in all its extent come under the power of the ban themselves (Deut. 7:26; cf. 1 Ki. 20:42). Likewise, when an offense against the sacred covenant is suspected (Jdg. 21:11) or punishment by God is spoken of (e.g., Zech. 14:11; cf. ḥērem in Isa. 34:2, 5; 43:28; Jer. 50:21, 26; Mal. 3:24), anathema occurs as punishment.

4. Ezr. 10:8 distinguishes between a ban on all belongings and personal exclusion from the community. Ban and excommunication are always measures. Those excommunicated are exiled from the community and so from the sphere of salvation, but they are not directly given over to God and destroyed.

NT 1. The old form anathēma is found only in Lk. 21:5, where it means consecrated gift. Such gifts offered in the temple are votive offerings that were often costly (2 Macc. 2:13; cf. Jdt. 16:18–19).

2. Paul takes over a restricted use of anathema from the LXX: the cursed thing, what has been dedicated to destruction. (a) Paul's Jewish kinship is not abolished by his membership in the church of Jesus Christ. He is even willing to come under the curse (anathema), that is, to be annihilated by God and delivered to eschatological judgment, in order to save Israel (Rom. 9:3). Paul speaks here in the prophetic style of the OT (cf. Exod. 32:32).

(b) In 1 Cor. 12:3 Paul distinguishes between ecstasy that is the work of the Spirit of God and ecstasy that issues from demonic influence. Persons in ecstasy who pronounce an anathema on Jesus (i.e., who uttering the ban deliver the man Jesus to annihilation by God) cannot possibly speak by the Holy Spirit; they have become the mouth and instrument of demonic powers.

(c) Most likely the curse formula in 1 Cor. 16:22, like other formulas at the end of 1 Cor., stems from the liturgy of the Lord's Supper. The anathema calls on those participating to test their faith before the meal so that anyone unworthy may be excluded (cf. 11:28). The formula "a curse be on him" pronounces for a specific case the sentence that comes from God and delivers the offender to the punishment of God.

(d) Paul uses anathema in the same sense in Gal. 1:8–9: Anyone who preaches a false gospel is delivered to God for destruction. It is not an act of church discipline in the sense of excommunication; rather, the curse exposes a culprit to the judicial wrath of God.

3. In this act of being handed over to God lies the theological meaning of the consecrated gift and the ban curse. Just as the consecrated gift is a sign of submission (cf. 1 Ki. 10:25), of atonement for wounded honor (Gen. 12:16; 20:16), and of reconciliation (32:14–15), so a person sentenced by anathema is delivered up to the judgment of God. At the same time, hope of a last-minute change of mind is not discounted. On the contrary, it is emphasized (cf. 1 Tim. 1:20).

4. anathematizō means bind with an oath or curse and thus confirm an agreement that has been made (Acts 23:12, 14; cf. Deut. 13:15; 20:17). In the LXX this vb. means carry out the ban (Num. 21:2–3; Deut. 13:15; 20:17; Jos. 6:21). But it also may mean spread a curse over, execrate. In Mk. 14:71 it is simply curse—the same meaning as katathematizō in Matt. 26:74. katathema (Rev. 22:3) is essentially the same as anathema and denotes what has been delivered up to God, what has a curse laid on it.

See also kakologeō, speak evil of, revile, insult (2800); katara, curse, malediction (2932); rhaka, empty-head, fool (4819).

ἀνάπαυσις (anapausis), rest (398); ἀναπαύω (anapauō), give rest; mid. rest, take one's rest (399); ἐπαναπαύομαι (epanapauomai), rest, take one's rest, rely on (2058); καταπαύω (katapauō), bring to rest, rest, stop, resting (2924); κατάπαυσις (katapausis), rest, place of rest (2923).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. anapauō in its act. form means to make to cease, bring to an end; to rest (trans.), make to halt, refresh. In mid. and pass. it means to cease, take rest from, recover, come to rest; later also, to die. katapauō means to stop, put an end to; with reference to persons, to hinder, depose, kill; also to appease, calm. anapausis means repose, relaxation, a rest from something.

2. The concept of rest is important in the OT, esp. in connection with the idea of Yahweh giving his people rest from their many enemies. The vb. nûaḥ is frequently used for to come to rest, e.g., of an army or swarms of locusts. In the religious realm the use was extended to the idea of God's Spirit resting on human beings and things (Num. 11:25; Isa. 11:2), the resting of God's hand (25:10), and resting in the grave (Job 3:17).

Probably the most important use theologically is that of the hiph. of nûaḥ, in the sense of to give rest to (Isa. 14:3; 28:12), usually with Yahweh as subj. He gives rest to his people by the provision of the promised land and the conquest of their enemies (Deut. 3:20; 12:10; 25:19; Jos. 1:13, 15; 21:44). Typical of the concrete and this-worldly hopes of the OT faith in Yahweh is this promise of peace in the land, where Judah and Israel will dwell securely, "each man under his vine and fig tree" (1 Ki. 4:25).

The idea of the Sabbath rest (Heb. šabbāṯ; LXX anapausis or katapauō) gained special significance for Israel. The first creation narrative accounts for this by referring to Yahweh's rest on the seventh day of creation (Gen. 2:2–3; Exod. 20:11). The Sabbath rest was by no means confined to the religious, worshiping community or to a privileged class; male and female slaves, aliens, and even cattle are included in the instructions about the day of rest devoted to Yahweh (Exod. 16:23, 25; 20:10). Along with the curse of work (Gen. 3:17–19), God's people are given the blessing of rest, in which to rejoice in their God and his works.

anapausis is used in intertestamental Jud. to refer to the rest promised to the disciples of wisdom—the refreshment that comes from the possession of wisdom given by God (cf. Sir. 6:28; 24:7; 30:17; 51:27).

NT 1. In the NT anapauō means to take one's rest in the normal bodily sense (Matt. 26:45; Mk. 14:41), to calm someone who has become disturbed (Matt. 11:28), and to refresh by giving pleasure, comfort, or compensation (1 Cor. 16:18; 2 Cor. 7:13; Phlm. 7, 20). This may come about through Christian love, fellowship, or action. Jesus called his disciples to come apart and rest for a while in body and spirit because of the many who were coming and going (Mk. 6:31). Unclean spirits also seek rest (Matt. 12:43; Lk. 11:24), but self-reformation only makes the last state worse than the first, for the spirit returns with seven other spirits more evil than himself. Matt.'s account of this saying applies it to contemporary Jud.: "That is how it will be with this wicked generation" (Matt. 12:45c).

In Rev. the meaning of anapauō is extended to signify rest from hardship and affliction in the eschatological consummation (6:11; 14:13). The four living creatures praise God without rest (anapausis, 4:8); by contrast, those who worship the beast have no rest from torment (14:11).

The concept of rest receives a key development in Matt. 11:28–30. Everyone—whether under the law (Jews) or far off from God (Gentiles)—whose life lacks peace and security is called to become a disciple of Jesus. Only here does one find true rest: not the invulnerability and calm of the Stoic, but peace, contentment, and security in God the Father, revealed by Jesus.

2. The concept of rest is esp. important in Heb. (which uses katapausis and katapauō). Joshua had been called to bring God's people into their rest in the promised land (Heb. 4:8); that rest is regarded as having been fulfilled only in a limited sense and is linked up with the true rest of God on the seventh day (4:4; cf. Gen. 2:2; also Heb. 3:11 [= Ps. 95:11], 18; 4:1, 3, 5, 10–11). The thought of this letter here shows a similarity to the interpretation given in some passages of Deut. to the fulfillment of the promise made to the people. This fulfillment is not a guarantee of permanent rest but gives rise to new promises, which accompany God's people on their way through history and are realized in topical events (cf. Deut. 5:33; 12:10; Heb. 4:1–11). In Heb., God's new covenant people are exhorted to claim the ancient promise of God's rest, available to them in Jesus Christ, and to lay hold of it in hope, by faith in Christ as Lord.

3. In 1 Pet. 4:12–19 Christians are urged not to give occasion for just punishment on their part. They may, of course, experience suffering, but they are to rejoice insofar as they suffer for Christ's sake and even share in his sufferings (4:13). Indeed, suffering of this kind may be taken as a sign of being owned by God: "If you are insulted because of the name of Christ, you are blessed, for the Spirit of glory and of God rests [anapauō] on you" (4:14). This passage recalls Jesus' own promise about the blessedness of being persecuted for righteousness' sake (Matt. 5:11; Lk. 6:22).

Peter may be directing this passage against certain individuals in the early church who taught that those who truly enjoy the gifts of the Spirit are exempt from suffering (cf. Paul's thorn in the flesh, 2 Cor. 12:1–10). This teaching is countered by arguing almost the opposite; i.e., not that possession of the Spirit makes suffering inevitable, but that if one suffers for the sake of Christ, it is a sign that the Spirit rests on the believer.

Note the connection here between Christ and the Spirit: The Spirit is the Spirit of Christ (cf. 1 Pet. 1:11). In addition, the Christ who lived and died in history (1:19; 2:21–25; 3:18) is present to believers through the Spirit both before and after Christ's coming (1:10–12; 3:8), and indeed it is the Spirit who made Christ alive after his death (3:18; cf. 1:13). The believer's life should be lived for Christ (1:3–9; 3:16; 5:1). The Spirit is bestowed esp. on the persecuted; note Jesus' saying in Matt. 10:19–20 and the comment about Stephen, who "saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God" (Acts 7:55).

Peter uses OT imagery in 1 Pet. 4:14 to show that the glory that manifested itself in the pillar of cloud and in other ways in the OT (cf. Exod. 33:9–10; 40:34–35; Isa. 40:1–7; Hag. 2:7) is now a present reality in the life of the persecuted Christian (cf. 1 Pet. 1:7; 5:4; also 2 Cor. 4:17; Col. 3:4). His wording seems to be inspired also by Isa. 11:2: "The Spirit of the LORD will rest [anapauō] on him—the Spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the Spirit of counsel and of power, the Spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD" (cf. Isa. 42:1; 48:16; 61:1; Jn. 1:32; 16:13; 1 Cor. 1:30; Eph. 1:17–18). What was first applied to the servant of Yahweh and then to Christ is here applied to the believer, for the believer belongs to Christ through the Spirit and shares in his suffering and life.

4. katapausis occurs outside Heb. only at Acts 7:49, where Stephen, quoting Isa. 66:1, states: "Heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool. What kind of house will you build for me, says the LORD? Or where will my resting place be?" The context in Acts 7 is a polemical attack on the notion of God being tied to the temple. The vb. katapauō also occurs only in Acts outside of Heb., where Paul and Barnabas attempt to "keep the crowd" of Lystra from offering sacrifices to them (Acts 14:18).

5. epanapauō is a late and rare word. In Lk. 10:6 it is linked with the disciples' greeting of peace as they go upon their evangelistic mission: "When you enter a house, first say, 'Peace to this house.' If a man of peace is there, your peace will rest on him; if not, it will return to you" (Lk. 10:5–6). This greeting was no mere formality. In the context of the mission it was decisive as to where the recipients stood in relation to Jesus. But even where it was spurned, it would not be made void, for it would return and remain with those who brought this peace in all its fullness.

In Rom. 2:17 epanapauō means to rest on, i.e., "rely on," the Mosaic law. In context Paul is addressing Jews who rely on formal adherence to the law and fail to see that their actions are at variance with it and that they are condemned by it.

399 (anapauō, give rest, mid. rest, take one's rest), → 398.

404 (anapiptō, recline, sit down), → 3111.

405 (anaplēroō, fill up), → 4444.

406 (anapologētos, inexcusable), → 162.

411 (anaseiō, stir up, incite, excite), → 4940.

ἀνάστασις (anastasis), resurrection (414); ἐξανάστασις (exanastasis), resurrection (1983); ἀνίστημι (anistēmi), raise, intrans. rise (482); ἐξανίστημι (exanistēmi), raise up, awaken, intrans. rise (1985); ἀναζάω (anazaō), come to life again (348).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the vb. anistēmi, when used trans., means to make to stand up, awaken, rouse (of persons lying down or sleeping); its meaning was widened to include appointing to an office or task. When used intrans. it could mean stand up, rise, appear, with the connotation of a revolt or political uprising. Esp. with the part., anistēmi could express the beginning of an action, e.g., of a conference. In post-Homeric Gk. it was also used of things, such as to set up or repair statues, altars, and the like. Occasionally it means to get well. exanistēmi has the same meaning. anastasis and exanastasis have the intrans. meaning of getting up, rising up (also from the dead).

The doctrine of the transmigration of the soul into some other body was a philosophical doctrine in ancient Greece; it was a characteristic doctrine of the Pythagoreans and found its cl. expression in Plato. Evidence of a belief in direct translation to the heavenly abode is more rare. Some myths included such a story about Ganymedes (who was carried off to become the cup-bearer of Zeus), Menelaus, and Apollonius of Tyana.

In his Phaedo Plato defends the idea of the soul's immortality in the course of a dialogue between Socrates and his friends prior to the former's execution by drinking poison. Socrates does not fear death because of the immortality of the soul, which he defends on the basis of the Platonic doctrine of forms, the eternal realities behind our transient, physical world. The soul possesses a certain likeness to the forms, so that when the body dies the soul goes on. It is an essential feature of the soul to partake in life; thus, at death the soul retires elsewhere.

Plato sets out his doctrine of the transmigration of souls in the myth of Er at the end of his Republic. Er, a soldier, is killed in battle, but after several days there are no sign of decay, and he returns to life on the funeral pyre to report what he has seen in the beyond. At death the soul goes to a spot to be judged. Er sees the just souls ascending to a thousand years of happiness; the unjust tell of a thousand years of travail on the earth, where they have been sent as punishment, each soul receiving tenfold retribution for the evil it has done. The very wicked are cast forever into Tartarus (→ tartaroō, 5434), where they receive terrible torture. After spending seven days by a meadow, the soul journeys to a place where it must choose the next form of its life.

There was a strong tradition in Gk. thought that denied the possibility of resurrection, although some passages do entertain the idea of resurrection as an isolated miracle. Evidently the physician Aesclepius enjoyed the reputation of being able to raise the dead. Note Acts 17:31–32, which records how Paul's preaching of the resurrection at Athens elicited skeptical amusement, and 17:18, where the Athenians believed that Paul was preaching two new gods whom they had never heard about: Iēsous (Jesus) and Anastasis (Resurrection).

2. (a) The older portions of the OT seem to contain no statements of a recognizable hope of resurrection from the dead. Death is the definite end, the destruction of human existence (Gen. 3:19; Job 30:23). This concept is not invalidated by the accounts of isolated individuals returning to life: the widow's son in Zarephath (1 Ki. 17:17–22), the Shunammite's son (2 Ki. 4:18–37), and the man thrown hurriedly into Elisha's grave (13:20–21). That Enoch (Gen. 5:24) and Elijah (2 Ki. 2:11) did not die but were snatched away from earth before their death was a proclamation of the power of death to destroy life and the general lack of hope beyond it.

Some suggest that Job 19:25–27 teaches a doctrine of resurrection, but the interpretive difficulties in this passage should not be overlooked. First, the Heb. of 19:26b–27a can be read either as an affirmation ("I will see God; I myself will see him," so NIV) or as a wish ("I would see God; I want to see him myself"). If the latter is correct, then Job is stating his desire for a face-to-face meeting with God before he dies (cf. 13:15–24), which he deems far better than a postmortem vindication of his case by some unnamed defense attorney (19:25). Second, Job has already declared that physical death is the end of one's existence (14:7–22), so it is unlikely that he would now affirm the opposite. Thus, although one might argue that 19:25–27 allows for a doctrine of the resurrection, one should not conclude that it teaches such a belief.

(b) The lack of a clearly defined doctrine of resurrection is confirmed by statements in Ps. in which prayer is made for salvation and preservation from the domain of death (which destroys life), but not from a death that has already been experienced. Thus the author of Ps. 88 prays to be delivered from Sheol (Heb. šᵉʾôl; Gk. hadēs; → 87) and Destruction (Heb. ʾabaddôn; Gk. apōleia, → 724), where the dead are evidently cut off from Yahweh (88:5, 10–11). Conversely, those who have been saved by Yahweh sing of salvation in the same or similar terms (30:2–3, 11; 86:12–13; 103:1, 3–5; Isa. 38:17).

The salvation referred to in Ps. 16:10 appears to be this-worldly, although it also points beyond the grave: "because you will not abandon me to the grave, nor will you let your Holy One see decay." Some scholars see no mention of a life after death in Ps. 16, whereas others do. Without doubt, both Peter and Paul see this passage as a prediction of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, which is the ultimate fulfillment of the psalm (Acts 2:25–28, 31; 13:35).

Another passage deserving attention is Ps. 49:15: "But God will redeem my life from the grave; he will surely take me to himself." Some suggest that the psalmist expects to be taken to heaven in a way similar to Enoch or Elijah, though others seriously doubt this. It is probably best to exercise the same caution here as earlier. Ps. 49 does not teach a clear doctrine of resurrection, though it does envisage an ongoing life with Yahweh in which the believing Israelite is saved from the power of Sheol.

A similar thought is probably expressed in Ps. 73:24: "You guide me with your counsel, and afterward you will take me into glory." As with Ps. 49, the psalmist does not use any special vb. implying resurrection, and "glory" probably means honor and prosperity in this life. Still, the psalmist's language is odd if he is referring to this life only, for he speaks of God as receiving him somewhere, not only of his bestowing material blessings on him. Earlier the psalmist declares his enjoyment of fellowship with God, and if God is to receive him, it must presumably be to future fellowship after death.

In sum, all we can say is that the psalms give glimpses of the hope of a blessed existence after death. They do not, however, reflect on what part of an individual survives death, such as one's soul or spirit.

(c) Outside of Ps., Deut. 32:39 (part of the Song of Moses) and 1 Sam. 2:6 (part of the Song of Hannah) proclaim that Yahweh kills and makes alive. Note esp. the latter passage: "The LORD brings death and makes alive; he brings down to the grave and raises up." Although a full-blown doctrine of the resurrection is not included here, these songs both stress the extraordinary power of the God of Israel, who can freely dispose of life, bestow it, withdraw it, and then give it again. The main point of these passages is a simple assertion that the living God can intervene in one's darkest hour.

3. The connection between the living God and the continuation of life for those who are his forms the premise of Jesus' interpretation of Exod. 3:6 in his debate with the Sadducees over the resurrection and the problem case of levirate marriage. In Mk. 12:26–27, Jesus states: "Now about the dead rising—have you not read in the book of Moses, in the account of the bush, how God said to him, 'I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob'? He is not the God of the dead, but of the living. You are badly mistaken!" (cf. par. Matt. 22:31–32; Lk. 20:37–38). The Sadducees, of course, regarded death as extinction. But if God is unable to deliver people from the ultimate disaster—death—then his promise of protection is of little value. These Jewish leaders failed to appreciate the essential link between God's covenant faithfulness and the resurrection. Jesus is also confounding the Sadducees here (for whom every word of the Torah possessed validity) by using their own methods of exegesis against them.

4. The two OT passages dealing with translation to heaven without dying require further comment. (a) Enoch differs from the rest of the antediluvian patriarchs mentioned in Gen. 5 in one key way: "Altogether Enoch lived 365 years. Enoch walked with God; then he was no more, because God took him away" (5:23–24). Heb. 11:5 regards Enoch as an example of faith that is pleasing to God, which was the cause of his translation. The LXX uses the vb. metatithēmi, to change the position of, convey to another place, for the Heb. lāqaḥ, take, which is followed by the author of Heb.

Considerable Jewish lit. grew up to supply elaborate details of Enoch's translation. The most important such work, 1 Enoch, exists in its entirety only in Ethiopic (hence the frequent title Ethiopic Enoch). The work purports to contain revelations to Enoch on such topics as the origin of evil, angels and their destinies, Gehenna, and paradise (cf. Jude 14–15, which quotes 1 Enoch 1:9). Yet another work, 2 Enoch (Slavonic Enoch) has the title "The Book of the Secrets of Enoch" in some MSS; it is not clear whether 2 Enoch is a Jewish work or a Christian reply to 1 Enoch. A third book attributed to Enoch, 3 Enoch (Hebrew Enoch), is a Jewish, possibly anti-Christian, work dating from the Christian era. All three books provide details about Enoch's life and departure that are wanting in the OT account.

Enoch is also mentioned in Jub. 4:17 as "the first among men that are born on earth who learned writing and knowledge and wisdom." Elsewhere Enoch is seen as a type of the righteous man: "Enoch pleased God and was taken up, an example of repentance to all generations" (Sir. 44:16). This thought is amplified in Wis. 4:10–15, which stresses Enoch's innocence in the midst of wickedness and points out that "while living among sinners [he was] taken up." Philo likewise includes speculations about Enoch and his translation to heaven. In short, what in Gen. 5:21–24 began as a cursory statement regarding Enoch's life and translation developed in later Jud. into a view of Enoch as a model of wisdom and righteousness, culminating in elaborate theories of how he was taken away.

(b) The translation of Elijah is described in 2 Ki. 2:1–15; he is taken up into heaven by a whirlwind and by a chariot and horses of fire (2:11). The description of Yahweh here in terms of chariots and horsemen may emphasize his power, as opposed to Israel's need in this very area (cf. 2 Ki. 13:7; Ps. 20:7). The whirlwind may be compared with the manifestations of Yahweh's power in the elements in 1 Ki. 18:38, 45; 19:11–14, and possibly also with the motif of Baal as the rider of the clouds. A subsequent search fails to find Elijah's body (2 Ki. 2:16–18), and Elisha succeeds him. The end of no other OT prophet is described in these terms. Again the vb. lāqaḥ is used for this removal of Elijah from earth.

The only safe conclusions one can draw from these two accounts is that both Elijah and Enoch enter Yahweh's presence at the end of their earthly lives and that Yahweh himself takes the initiative. In neither case is death mentioned. Rather, Yahweh's power is manifested through their avoidance of death.

5. A number of prophetic passages are also relevant to this discussion. (a) Hos. 6:1–2, for example, states: "Come, let us return to the LORD. He has torn us to pieces but he will heal us; he has injured us but he will bind up our wounds. After two days he will revive us; on the third day he will restore us, that we may live in his presence." The historical background of this passage is the Syro-Ephraimite War (735–734 B.C.; cf. 2 Ki. 15; 18; Isa. 7–8), and the passage constitutes a call to national repentance and faith in Yahweh for restoration, using the language of healing after being stricken for apostasy. Perhaps Hosea is consciously using the language and idioms of Baal worship polemically against the Baals. If so, Hosea's point is that it is Yahweh, not the Baals or their cults, who will restore Israel to health and vitality.

(b) Hos. 13:14 declares: "I will ransom them from the power of the grave. I will redeem them from death. Where, O death, are your plagues? Where, O grave, is your destruction?" Paul takes up the phrasing of 13:14b to celebrate the resurrection of the dead: "When the perishable has been clothed with the imperishable, and the mortal with immortality, then the saying that is written will come true: 'Death has been swallowed up in victory' [Isa. 25:8]. 'Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting?'" (1 Cor. 15:54–55).

In context, Hosea's words do not refer to the resurrection hope of the individual but to Yahweh's power over the death and the destruction of the nation in history. They testify to the extraordinary power of Israel's living God, before whom the dominion of death must yield. When Paul uses this passage, he is not basing an argument for individual resurrection on this particular Scripture, but he is writing freely, in scriptural language, of the ultimate victory of Christ over death. To be more precise, Paul makes use of OT testimonia (strings of OT texts), following a Jewish pesher style of exegesis, to interpret the meaning of the original passage in the light of the point he is making. In this sense, Hosea's words find their ultimate fulfillment in the resurrection, where people are ransomed from the grave and redeemed from death.

(c) Isa. 26:19 expresses a fleeting confidence in the resurrection of Israel: "But your dead will live, their bodies will rise. You who dwell in the dust, wake up and shout for joy. Your dew is the dew of the morning; the earth will give birth to her dead." Under the assumption (as most commentaries make) that Yahweh is the speaker here, this passage clearly teaches a belief in the resurrection, though the focus of this belief is more national than individual. Isa. 25:8 contains a similar perspective: "He will swallow up death forever. The sovereign LORD will wipe away the tears from all faces; he will remove the disgrace of his people from all the earth. The LORD has spoken."

(d) Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones (Ezek. 37) has often been understood as a prediction of the resurrection. In a vision Yahweh asks the prophet whether dry bones can live (37:3). Ezekiel replies that Yahweh alone knows. Then Yahweh commands Ezekiel to prophesy to the bones, promising to cause sinews and flesh to come on them and breath to enter them so that they live (37:4–6). The prophet does so, and what is promised comes about (37:7–11). The prophet is then given the interpretation: "'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: O my people, I am going to open your graves and bring you up from them; I will bring you back to the land of Israel. Then you, my people, will know that I am the LORD, when I open your graves and bring you up from them. I will put my Spirit in you and you will live, and I will settle you in your own land. Then you will know that I the LORD have spoken, and I have done it, declares the LORD'" (37:12–14).

The background of this passage includes the fall of Jerusalem, the capture of the temple, and the exile, which had left the Israelites saying: "Our offenses and sins weigh us down, and we are wasting away because of them. How then can we live?" (Ezek. 33:10). In this context, then, the vision of the valley of dry bones is one of national restoration. Ezekiel is probably basing his view of Yahweh's creative power on Gen. 2:7, and the vision he sees derives from the countless corpses scattered on the battlefield in the wake of Nebuchadnezzar's armies. The prophet is not concerned with the resurrection of individual dead people as such, although the symbolism used undoubtedly raised the question of renewal of life for those who have died.

(e) Dan. 12:2 is the only OT verse that manifests a clear and undisputed reference to the resurrection of the dead. The context describes a great tribulation, Michael arising to take charge of God's people, and a book containing the names of all those to be delivered: "Multitudes who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake: some to everlasting life, others to shame and everlasting contempt." Dan. 12 is concerned only with a resurrection within Israel: some to salvation and others to condemnation. But this passage did lend itself to the doctrine of the resurrection that became championed by the Pharisees in the NT. To them, justice required resurrection, for only that doctrine provides the answer to the problem of the death of the most faithful servants of the living God.

6. The lit. of the intertestamental period exhibits a variety of beliefs about the afterlife and resurrection. (a) Jesus ben Sirach, writing about 180 B.C., had no conception of resurrection or life after death and thus held a position comparable with that of the Sadducees in the time of Christ. Sheol is the ultimate abode of the dead. It is devoid of pleasure (Sir. 14:16), a place of darkness (22:11), endless sleep (46:19), silence (17:27–28), and corruption (10:11). No one can praise God there (18:28). There is no return from death (38:21), which is a state of eternal rest (30:17). The only immortality known to Sirach is a good name (39:9; 41:11–13; 44:8) or the perpetuation of one's name in one's children (11:28; 46:12).

(b) However, 2 Macc. describes in resurrection terms the hope of the martyrs of Israel in their struggle against Antiochus Epiphanes (see esp. 2 Macc. 7:9, 11, 14, 22–23, 29; 12:43). Thus an elder named Razis tore out his entrails rather than fall into the hands of the Greeks. He flung his bowels at the crowds, "calling upon the Lord of life and spirit to give them back to him again" (2 Macc. 14:46).

(c) The Apocalypse of Baruch (2 Bar.) was written late in the 1st or early in the 2d cent. A.D. as a reflection on the tragedy of the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. One's only hope lies in the world to come. For the author the dead will be raised in exactly the same form (50:2). They will thus be recognizable (50:3–4). After that they will be changed and glorified so as to inhabit a world that does not die; the wicked are changed only to be tormented (51:3–6). This book makes resurrection dependent on adherence to the practice of the law.

(d) The book of 2 Esdras, also written ca. A.D. 100, describes the coming of the Messiah. After an interim kingdom of four hundred years, all the dead will be raised and the Lord will sit on his throne of judgment, where he will reward people according to what they have done. The two possible places to go to are "the pit of torment" and "the place of rest," "the furnace of hell [Gehenna; → geenna, 1147]" and "the paradise of delight" (2 Esd. 7:32–36). The nations will also be raised for judgment (7:37–43). The saved are those who "keep the law of the Lawgiver perfectly" (7:89). The face of the righteous in the resurrection will "shine like the sun" (7:97).

(e) The resurrection of righteous Israelites (though not of others) is implied in 1 Enoch 90:33. The wicked have no hope of rising from their beds (46:6), but the righteous will be raised as the chosen of the Elect One, the heavenly Son of Man (51:1–3). The nature of the resurrection is described in 62:13–16; 103:4, though the message is not consistent. The first passage speaks of resurrection in terms of a transfigured body, the second as a reshaped soul.

(f) The Qumran community expected a grand final conflict between the sons of light and the sons of darkness, but they do not seem to have been much concerned about the fate of the dead. Their view seems more in line with an immortality of the soul rather than a resurrection of the body. The sect clearly shared a belief in some form of future life. According to Josephus, the Essenes (a group similar to those at Qumran) believed in both the resurrection of the body and the immortality of the soul.

(g) In the main, later Talmudic lit. accepted the idea of resurrection, the coming to life of the dead. In b. Sanh. 90b, the Sadducees ask Gamaliel where in Scripture was the evidence that the Holy One brings the dead to life. Gamaliel replied by citing from the Law Deut. 31:16, from the Prophets Isa. 26:19, and from the Hagiographa Song 7:10. But the Sadducees are not satisfied, and Gamaliel finally quotes Deut. 11:9, claiming that the promise of the land "to them" implied resurrection of the dead.

7. Neither the OT nor the intertestamental lit. has a uniform eschatological expectation. In various places there is the growing belief that because Yahweh lives, his faithful people will also live. The nature of such an existence is rarely defined, although there is an implied continuity of identity. While Sheol is depicted as the ultimate end of a person, some writings begin to suggest a richer and more worthwhile survival in another world and even to propose a resurrection to life on earth.

Many suggestions have been offered as to the source of this new thinking (many of them linked with other ancient religions), but it seems best to relate the development of this doctrine to progressive revelation in Scripture. The idea of an afterlife has its deepest root in an awareness of the living God himself: Because Yahweh lives and is the covenant God of Israel, his people, one can expect an ongoing and living relationship with him. This awareness developed over the course of Israel's history.

NT 1. Both anistēmi (used 107x in the NT) and anastasis (42x) are found in the NT in general senses not connected with resurrection. (a) The vb. is used of raising up children for a deceased brother in a levirate marriage (Matt. 22:24; cf. Gen. 38:8), of rising to speak (Matt. 26:62) or read Scripture (Lk. 4:16). It is also used with the meaning of appear or come, e.g., a king (Acts 7:18), a priest (Heb. 7:11, 15), accusers (Matt. 12:41; Mk. 14:57; Lk. 11:32), a questioner (10:25), and an enemy rising up against someone (Mk. 3:26; Acts 5:36; 6:9). There is also the weakened meaning indicating the beginning of an action expressed by another vb., i.e., rise, set out, get ready (Matt. 9:9; Mk. 2:14; 7:24; 10:1). In fact, most instances of anistēmi do not refer to the resurrection; this is the opposite of what occurs with egeirō, to raise up (→ 1586).

(b) Luke uses anastasis in 2:34 ("This child is destined to cause the falling and rising of many in Israel") to draw attention almost at the outset of his Gospel to the role of Jesus in God's purposes and to his divisive effect within Israel, a fact borne out by the succeeding narrative. In the case of this noun, however, most uses of it do refer to the resurrection.

2. The richest theological meaning of anistēmi and anastasis in the NT centers around the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. Thus used, the root becomes virtually synonymous with egeirō. At first sight, there seems little difference between these two word groups. Closer study shows that egeirō, esp. in the pass., is used predominantly for what happened at Easter, i.e., the raising of the crucified Jesus to life, while anistēmi and anastasis refer more often to the raising of people during Jesus' earthly ministry and to the eschatological and universal resurrection (1 Cor. 15:25–26 makes the difference between the two clear, although the Eng. does not always make it sufficiently clear that two different roots are being used).

The intrans. meaning predominates with both verbal stems, and Christ is almost always the subj. of both (except in 1 Cor. 15). When the trans. meaning is used, God is usually the subj. and Christ the obj. In other words, the general rule in the NT is that God's action on and through Christ is expressed by egeirō, while anistēmi expresses, as it were, what happens in the realm of human experience.

3. Of central importance for the NT are statements about Jesus' resurrection, including his predictions (e.g., Mk. 8:31; 9:9, 31; 10:34) and the testimony by Mary Magdalene (Matt. 28:8, 10) and the disciples (e.g., Acts 1:22; 2:31; 4:33). Through an act of God, the dead and buried Lord was raised to life again (cf. Acts 2:31, 34; Eph. 5:14) with a body that was new and material, not identical with the old but not merely visionary (cf. Jn. 20–21). He appeared to his disciples in a form that could be seen and felt (Lk. 24:16, 31, 39; Jn. 20:27; Acts 1:2, 9; cf. 1 Jn. 1:1–3), though he might not always permit the latter (Jn. 20:17). Although Jesus possessed the light and spirit body of the new age, he maintained normal human fellowship with his disciples by eating and drinking with them (Lk. 24:29–30, 42–43; Jn. 21:12–13; Acts 1:4; 10:41).

The disciples' testimony was not based on their observation of the actual event of Jesus' resurrection, which no one saw (note that in Matt. 28:4 the guards fainted), but on their meetings with the Risen One (Acts 1:22). The fact that Jesus did not remain among the dead but was alive (Lk. 24:5) gave the disciples, who until then had vacillated, the certainty that they had to do with the Lord, God's Son (Rom. 1:4). Jesus' resurrection thus became the sign of God's triumph over the power of sin and death. It had cancelled the fall of Adam and all the human slavery that had resulted from it, for the Crucified One had entered God's glory as the first among many. This is the foundation of all Christian hope and preaching (1 Pet. 1:3; 1 Cor. 15); it also explains why baptism is the sign of salvation (Rom. 6:5; 1 Pet. 3:21).

Jesus incorporates "the resurrection and the life" (Jn. 11:25) in the mystery of his person. In other words, the resurrection, which Jews had regarded as something only in the future, begins at the point where he appears and sets his Spirit to work. Anyone who is linked to him by faith and who has been possessed by his power experiences the beginning of the transition from this transient age to the new one, to the liberation from sin and death (Phil. 3:10). This is testified to in the Lord's Supper (Jn. 6:54). Hence, faith may be interpreted as a dying and rising again with Jesus (Rom. 6:11).

4. Although John gives us a concept of resurrection as something apparently already realized, it is only the beginning. In 2 Tim. 2:18 Paul expressly rejects the idea that the general resurrection of the dead has already taken place in the resurrection of Jesus; the contexts of Col. 2:13 and Eph. 2:6 do not suggest it either. The general resurrection, one of the fundamentals of the Christian faith (Lk. 14:14; 2 Cor. 5:10; Heb. 11:35), was taught by Jesus (Jn. 6:39–40, 54). It meant the resurrection of the body, not just a continuation of being or a reawakening of the soul. Moreover, it was linked with judgment (Heb. 6:2). This doctrine, a key point of contention to the gospel message, was rejected by the Sadducees (Matt. 22:23), who claimed that the resurrection was not taught in the Torah. It was equally rejected by the Greeks, because the teaching was too materialistic for their spiritualized thinking (Acts 17:18, 32; 1 Cor. 15:12).

5. Concerning the term resurrection, as in Jewish apocalyptic, two lines of thought are discernible with respect to the scope of its effects. Besides the general resurrection as depicted in Matt. 25:31–46; Rev. 20:11–15 (which is linked with the return of Christ and the separation of the good and bad), the NT also speaks of a prior "resurrection of the righteous" (Lk. 14:14), of the dead in Christ (1 Thess. 4:16; perhaps also 1 Cor. 15:23–24, where to telos may mean "the rest" rather than "the end"). In Rev. 20:4–6, the dead in Christ who have come to life in "the first resurrection" are said to reign for a thousand years; the remainder of the dead appear before the throne of God for the first time on the day of final judgment (20:11–15). (For interpretations of the millennium → chilias, 5942).

While it is true that, in the general resurrection, individual identity persists in spite of death, so that all will stand before God in their complete being, one notes a fuller language used with respect to believers. They will be "like the angels" (Lk. 20:36), free of all human impulses, including sexual ones (Matt. 22:30; 24:38). They will also be like Jesus, for they will "see him as he is" (1 Jn. 3:2). We must remember that the analogy of seed and harvest has only a superficial resemblance to the process of resurrection. God gives a body as he wills (1 Cor. 15:38), and he alone guarantees the identity of the person.

6. In Phil. 3 Paul describes how he, in order to gain Christ, considers as "rubbish" all the things in which he had previously gloried as a Jew (3:8). His desire is to have a righteousness not of his own, but "that which is through faith in Christ" (3:9); his goal is "to know Christ and the power of his resurrection [anastasis] and the fellowship of sharing in his sufferings, becoming like him in his death, and so, somehow, to attain to the resurrection [exanastasis] from the dead" (3:10–11). It is debated whether exanastasis simply means anastasis, as is normally the case, or whether Paul is alluding to an earlier transformation and the church's being lifted up to be with Christ (cf. 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 20:4). This cannot be answered in any conclusive way.

The background in Phil. 3 may be a polemical confrontation with perfectionists who were claiming that knowledge of the heavenly Lord was all important and that believers were already raised with Christ to new life (cf. Phil. 3:12–16; also 1 Cor. 15:12; 2 Tim. 2:18). To counteract this, Paul insists that the only way to enter into the power of Christ's resurrection is by being willing to share in his sufferings and so become like him in his death. The last phrase is clearly baptismal (cf. Rom. 6:1–11;

2 Cor. 4:7–15; Col. 2:12, 20; 3:1; 2 Tim. 2:11). Paul's reference to knowing "the power of his resurrection" (Phil. 3:10) suggests a present experience. Yet in 3:11 Paul testifies to the hope that completely conforming to our Lord (3:21) will come at the time of the resurrection, which will complete God's saving plan for his people. Thus, the phrase ei pōs ("somehow") is not an expression of doubt about the reality of Paul's resurrection but about the way in which it will be his, i.e., by martyrdom in the near future or by some other means at a more distant time.

7. The vb. anazaō, come to life again, is rare in cl. Gk. Paul uses it in Rom. 7:9 to describe how the law (esp. the command not to covet) provoked and condemned sin: "Once I was alive apart from law; but when the commandment came, sin sprang to life and I died." Paul is arguing that the law identifies sin for what it is (7:7). But sin uses the law in an attempt to justify itself, by assuming that one can actually fulfill the law (7:8–11). This is a deception, and it results in killing the person concerned (7:11), because failure to keep the law brings condemnation. anazaō is also used of the prodigal son after his return: "For this son of mine was dead and is alive again" (Lk. 15:24, cf. 32).

See also egeirō, wake, rouse, raise up (1586).

416 (anastauroō, crucify), → 5089.

ἀναστρέφω (anastrephō), to overturn, turn back, turn round; fig. behave, conduct oneself, live (418); ἀναστροφή (anastrophē), turning back; fig. way of life, conduct, behavior (419).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. anastrephō means trans. to upset, turn upside down; intrans. to turn back, turn round. It eventually took on the fig. meaning of human behavior, i.e., to conduct oneself, live in a particular way. anastrophē denotes a turning round or a turning movement; then fig. way of life, conduct. In Gk. inscriptions one's anastrophē can be termed good, praiseworthy, blameless, fearless, etc.

2. The LXX uses anastrephō 80x for Heb. šûb, to turn round, return, and 8x for hālak, to walk; only in 1 Ki. 6:12; Prov. 8:20; 20:7 does the fig. sense of walking (in God's commands, in righteousness, etc.) apply. anastrophē occurs only in the Apocr. (3x) and only with the fig. meaning of one's conduct of life (Tob. 4:14; 2 Macc. 5:8; 6:23).

NT In the NT the vb. occurs only 9x, the noun 13x—mostly in 1 and 2 Pet. and Heb. The lit. sense of the vb. occurs in Acts 5:22; 15:16; otherwise only the fig. meaning is found.

1. (a) Since both noun and vb. are neutral terms, they can designate a pre- or non-Christian (Jewish, Gal. 1:13; heathen, Eph. 2:3) way of life as well as a Christian one (2 Cor. 1:12). The determining factor of a person's life can be an ethical value system or one's faith (cf. Gal. 1:13). Lack of any moral obligation leads to an unbridled manner of life, where a person follows only his or her desires (1 Pet. 1:14; 2 Pet. 2:7) and finally is destroyed (Eph. 4:22).

(b) Turning to Christ implies a turning away from one's previous way of life, for which Christ frees and enables that person. The main point is to translate knowledge into practice. By faith and baptism we are introduced into the domain of power of Jesus Christ; we live "in Christ" and thus in a new fellowship with God. The knowledge of our earlier perversity (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14–16; Gal. 1:13; Eph. 2:1–3; 4:22; Col. 1:21; 3:1–17) helps us to set aside the old, makes us conscious of the new, and frees us for a new life of obedience, piety, and holiness (2 Cor. 1:12; 1 Pet. 1:15, 17; 3:16).

This new conduct can itself assume exemplary significance (1 Tim. 3:15; 4:12) and be crowned by an appropriate end of life (Heb. 13:7). Such Christian conduct, however, is threatened by a double danger: reversion to heathen modes of conduct (2 Pet. 2:18) and legalism (cf. 1 Tim. 4:12 in the context of 4:1–3).

2. The word group has particular significance in the paraenesis of 1 Pet. Here the present, in which Christians live in the world "as aliens and strangers," is seen as a time of testing for faith (1 Pet. 2:11–12). The exhortation to live in a Christian way is grounded in having been called out by a holy God, in invoking the Father, who is also judge of all and cannot be bribed, and in the sacrificial death of Jesus, understood as a ransom "from the empty way of life [anastrophē]" handed down from one's ancestors (1:15–18). A way of life in conformity with Christ is also important because we live under the critical eyes of a heathen environment, so it serves as a witness to them (2:12; 3:1, 16).

See also hodos, way, road, highway, way of life (3847); peripateō, go about, walk (4344); poreuomai, go, to journey, to travel, to walk (4513).

419 (anastrophē, way of life, conduct, behavior), → 418.

422 ἀνατέλλω

ἀνατέλλω (anatellō), to rise, cause to rise (422); ἀνατολή (anatolē), rising sun, east (424).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. anatellō means to rise, come to light. It was used esp. of the rising of the sun or moon. As a result, the related noun anatolē came to mean the east, since that is the direction in which the sun rises.

2. In the LXX anatellō can simply mean to rise or sprout, as of plants (Isa. 44:4; cf. 61:11; Jon. 4:8). In Gen. 3:18 God tells Adam that thorns and thistles will sprout up from the earth as a result of his sin. In 2 Sam. 10:5 the vb. is used of the growing of beards and in Jdg. 9:33; 2 Sam. 23:4 of the rising of the sun. anatellō occurs in several messianic prophecies: In Num. 24:17, a star will rise out of Jacob. In Isa. 60:1, the glory of the Lord will soon rise in Israel. In Mal. 4:2 the sun of righteousness will rise with healing in its wings. Note esp. Zech. 6:12, where God promises to send "the Branch" (anatolē), who will "branch out [anatellō] from his place" (cf. also 3:8 = LXX 3:9; Jer. 23:5). As in cl. Gk. anatolē in the LXX often means the rising of the sun, thus also east.

NT 1. anatellō occurs 9x in the NT. In most places it refers to the rising of the sun (e.g., Matt. 5:45; 13:6). But 2 Pet. 1:19 likely alludes to Num. 24:17, where the messianic bearer of light will arise in our hearts. In Heb. 7:14, the author (probably alluding to the "Branch" metaphor of the OT) writes that Jesus descended (i.e., sprouted) from the tribe of Judah, not Levi. Matt. 4:16, a quotation of Isa. 9:2, uses anatellō instead of the LXX's lampō for to dawn.

2. anatolē in the NT usually denotes the east (e.g., the place from which the Magi came, Matt. 2:1–2; cf. also 2:9; Lk. 13:29; Rev. 7:2). Zechariah, in his song in Lk. 1, uses this word in a specialized sense as a designation for the Messiah (1:78). He is probably alluding to the promise of the coming star of Num. 24:17 or to the coming light in Isa. 60:1 (although "the Branch" in Jer. 23:5; Zech. 3:8; 6:12 may also be in view).

424 (anatolē, rising sun, east), → 422.

433 (anapsyxis, refreshing), → 6034.

434 (anapsychō, to refresh, cheer), → 6034.

435 ἀνδραποδιστής

ἀνδραποδιστής (andrapodistēs), slave-dealer, kidnapper (435).

CL & OT andrapodistēs derives from the verbal idea of catching human beings (andra) by the foot (pod-) and selling them into slavery. It does not occur in the LXX, though the cognate andrapodon (slave) is used in 3 Macc. 7:5.

NT In 1 Tim. 1:9–10 Paul refers to those who disregard God's law in general and break God's laws in particular. Among those named are andrapodistai, slave-dealers or kidnappers (cf. Exod. 21:16; Deut. 24:7), who are guilty of breaking the eighth commandment. This term may include those who break into Christian homes to carry off any belonging to the Way (Acts 9:1–2). By extension, it may also refer to those who by false teaching (1 Tim. 1:3–7) drag away believers from their rightful place before God and rob them of their liberty in Christ.

See also lēstēs, robber, highwayman, bandit, revolutionary (3334); sylaō, plunder, rob (5195); apostereō, rob, defraud, deprive (691); spēlaion, cave, den (5068).

437 (andrizomai, behave in a manly way), → 467.

441 ἀνέγκλητος

ἀνέγκλητος (anenklētos), not accused, without reproach, blameless, irreproachable (441); ἄμωμος (amōmos), unblemished, blameless (320); ἄσπιλος (aspilos), spotless, without blemish (834); ἀμώμητος (amōmētos), unblemished (318).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. anenklētos means a person or thing against which no accusation can be made, being free of guilt. Its meaning changed from the original sense to that of respectability without reproach. In the LXX it is only found at 3 Macc. 5:31.

2. aspilos, spotless, is not found in the LXX. amōmos, faultless, is used esp. in legal OT texts (e.g., Exod. 29:1; Lev. 3:1, 6; Num. 6:14) of sacrificial animals that were free from blemish, but also in Ps. in a moral sense. amōmētos, unblemished, is in origin a term of praise, almost equivalent to anenklētos.

NT 1. anenklētos, not accused, without reproach, takes on theological ideas in the NT. (a) In 1 Tim. 3:10; Tit. 1:6–7, in a discussion on qualifications for deacons or elders, Paul stresses the need to be beyond reproach, in the ordinary sense of common respectability. Thus, in addition to spiritual qualifications, ordinary standards of decency also become preconditions of office in the church, for the sake of the church's good name in the world.

(b) This word has its original, legal sense in 1 Cor. 1:8 and Col. 1:22. In the former, God promises to keep believers firm to stand blameless or innocent on the judgment day. This blamelessness is not an ethical quality, as if it is the Christian's own achievement, but follows from holding fast to fellowship with Jesus to the end (1:9). Col. 1:22 also speaks of judgment. It is Christ's reconciling word, which has been achieved by his death, that forms the basis of our blamelessness. Alongside anenklētos, Paul uses amōmos, faultless, a word drawn from the language of Jewish ritual (cf. Eph. 5:27; Phil. 2:15; 1 Pet. 1:19). Through faith in Jesus Christ we are delivered from well-merited accusation (Col. 1:22–23), so that we can appear blameless before him (cf. Rom. 8:33–34).

2. amōmētos occurs in 2 Pet. 3:14, where the author exhorts us to live blamelessly until the great day of the Lord comes, even if troubles come our way. Such a lifestyle is possible only if we are at peace with the Lord through Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 5:1).

3. amōmos means unblemished in the cultic sense of free from defects; hence Christ is described as "a lamb without blemish [amōmos] or defect [aspilos]" (1 Pet. 1:19). He "offered himself unblemished [amōmos] to God" (Heb. 9:14). amōmos is used in the moral and religious sense of blameless of the Christian community (Eph. 1:4; 5:27; Phil. 2:15; Rev. 14:5; cf. Jude 24). For amiantos, → mianō, to defile, 3620.

462 ἀνέχομαι

ἀνέχομαι (anechomai), bear, endure (462); ἀνοχή (anochē), delay, limited period, restraint, forbearance (496); ἀνεκτός (anektos), bearable, tolerable, endurable (445).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. anechomai occurs both in an active and deponent form. It means (with an obj.) to hold up, honor, hold back; (without an obj.) to stand out, persevere, endure. The mid. deponent form predominates in the NT and other Gk. literature.

2. In the LXX anechomai translates several Heb. roots, all of which express the idea of restraining some action or emotion. Such statements can refer to human beings (Gen. 45:1) or to God (Isa. 1:13; 42:14). The pressure building up behind such restraint can cause it to burst forth with dire results. There is a tendency to portray God as exercising restraint, while human beings give way to the vehement reaction, such as crying out in anguish at the silence and inaction of God (63:15; 64:12). anochē occurs only in 1 Macc. 12:25, where it refers to an armistice or an "opening" to reenter the land.

NT 1. (a) In the NT anechomai occurs 15x, mainly in Paul (10x), but with little consistency of usage. Its meaning is difficult to determine because of its frequent use in formal phrases and in passages that go back to an earlier tradition. In Col. 3:13 its proximity to a catalogue of five virtues is significant, but the pres. part. is intended to qualify the final item enumerated in the list, namely, makrothymia (patience; → 3429): (lit.) "Put on then ... patience, forbearing one another. ..." The pers. obj. ("one another") indicates a characteristic aspect of NT usage. When forbearance is exercised, virtue is no longer self-centered; rather, an essential part of a Christian's calling is the service of others (cf. also Eph. 4:2, "bearing with [anechomai] one another in love").

(b) In love there is mutual forbearance; hence Paul's plea to the Corinthians: "Put up with a little of my foolishness" (2 Cor. 11:1). The apostle appears to them as weak and insignificant, without any of the outward marks of apostolic authority borne by the "super-apostles" (11:5). But he is an apostle and, as such, a bearer of the truth of Christ; Christ bears the Corinthians in his love, so they should bear with Paul. The strong theological content of mutual forbearance becomes apparent here. When the believers in Corinth are admonished or instructed, they are to accept the message as from its divine source, from the God who is longsuffering toward them (cf. 2 Tim. 4:3). There is a play on the vb. throughout 2 Cor. 11 in the contrast drawn with the way the Corinthians are already "putting up with" false teachers (11:4, 19–20) but want to dispense with Paul.

(c) anechomai in 1 Cor. 4:12 should be construed as having a pers. obj., by analogy with the surrounding vbs. In other words, Paul does not simply "endure" when persecuted; he is longsuffering toward his persecutors. Paul's words are certainly reminiscent of Jesus' teaching in Matt. 25:35.

(d) In Acts 18:14 the vb. is used as a technical legal term for receiving an accusation on the part of Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia, who says, "If you Jews were making a complaint about some misdemeanor or serious crime, it would be reasonable for me to listen [anechomai] to you."

(e) The only occurrence of the vb. in the Synoptic Gospels is in the question of Jesus: "O unbelieving and perverse generation ... how long shall I stay with you? How long shall I put up [anechomai] with you?" (Matt. 17:17; Mk. 9:19; Lk. 9:41). The occasion is the disciples' failure to cast out a dumb spirit afflicting an epileptic boy. These words express Jesus' exasperation at the blindness of those who refused to accept God's presence and power in him.

(f) In 2 Thess. 1:4 the vb. refers to enduring afflictions: "Therefore among God's churches we boast about your perseverance and faith in all the persecutions and trials you are enduring [anechomai]." By contrast, 2 Tim. 4:3 and Heb. 13:22 refer to Christian teaching and exhortation. In the former passage the allusion is to the fickleness of those who "will not put up with" sound teaching; in the latter the author wants his readers to "bear with" his word of exhortation.

2. The noun anochē occurs only in Rom. 2:4 and 3:25, where it refers to the "tolerance" or "forbearance" of God. The religious Jew is not exempt from judgment just because he or she is a member of God's chosen people. Anyone who thinks that is showing contempt for God's kindness, "tolerance," and patience (Rom. 2:4). Later on Paul explains that "in his forbearance" God left the sins committed before the coming of the Messiah unpunished, while awaiting his arrival. That is, God restrained his wrath until he openly displayed his righteousness in Christ and brought to an end the period of the Mosaic law.

Apart from the fact that in the NT anochē is used only of God, there is no clear-cut distinction between anochē and makrothymia (→ 3429). Yet certain nuances are detectable. makrothymia is undoubtedly less active and vigorous and may be translated patience. It also has stronger eschatological overtones, looking forward to God's final judgment, whereas anochē denotes the period of God's gracious forbearance with particular reference to Israel and the period up to the cross of Christ.

3. The adj. anektos (bearable, tolerable) occurs in the comparative form in Jesus' pronouncement on the Jewish cities that had rejected him. It will be "more bearable" for Tyre and Sidon (Matt. 11:22; Lk. 10:14; cf. Isa. 23; Ezek. 26:2–28:24; Joel 3:4; Amos 1:9–10; Zech. 9:2–4) and Sodom and Gomorrah (Matt. 10:15; 11:24; Lk. 10:12; cf. Gen. 19; Isa. 1:9) in the day of judgment. Note the paradox that these places mentioned in the OT were notorious centers of wickedness, whereas the places in Galilee on which Jesus pronounces judgment (e.g., Korazin and Bethsaida) are relatively insignificant. There is an implicit claim that Jesus' appearance is more crucial than any prophetic pronouncement, and thus the guilt of rejection is all the greater.

ἀνήρ (anēr), a man (467); ἀνδρίζομαι (andrizomai), behave in a manly way (437).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. anēr has all the meanings known in the LXX and the NT: (a) a man, in contrast to a woman; (b) husband, also bridegroom; (c) adult and warrior; (d) manliness; also gentleman, hero; (e) humankind, as genus (see esp. anthrōpos, 476).

2. anēr is used to translate a number of Heb. words used in the OT. The man is lord of the wife (Gen. 3:16). He alone is competent in legal and cultic proceedings (Exod. 23:17; 34:23, → arsēn, 781; 1 Sam. 1:3–4, → anthrōpos, 476). But alongside this typically oriental and patriarchal way of life, one can find allusions to men's responsibilities to women (cf. Deut. 20:7; 21:14; 22:13–19; 24:5; see also gynē, 1222).

NT 1. As in cl. Gk., anēr in the NT can mean: (a) man in contrast to woman (Matt. 14:21; 1 Cor. 11:3–15); it is a typical form of address in Acts 15:7, 13 and elsewhere; (b) husband (Mk. 10:2, 12 [cf. Matt. 19:3, 9]; Rom. 7:2–3; Eph. 5:22–33; Tit. 1:6) or a betrothed person (cf. Matt. 1:19; 2 Cor. 11:2; Rev. 21:2); (c) adult (1 Cor. 13:11; cf. Jas. 3:2); (d) manliness, including maturity and dignity (Lk. 23:50; Acts 6:3, 5); (e) humankind, as a genus (Lk. 5:8; Jas. 1:20).

Paul often uses anēr to distinguish man from gynē (e.g., 1 Cor. 7:1–16). Lk. uses it in the more general meaning of anthrōpos (e.g., Lk. 11:31; 19:7; Acts 2:5).

2. The organization and leadership of the Christian community in the NT was largely male-oriented, just as Jesus' circle of the Twelve comprised only men. But the man did not receive his special position because of some sort of natural fitness. It came rather from Christ, by whom he was honored and whom he was called upon to reflect (1 Cor. 11:7). In the sequence God—Christ—man—woman (1 Cor. 11:3–15), each one is the "head" of the following, and, conversely, each member is the reflected splendor of the preceding one (→ doxa, 1518).

This qualification of the man, however, does not indicate preferential status but special task and responsibility. For before God, man and woman are on the same level (see Gal. 3:28; cf. 1 Pet. 4:7). This establishment of the equality of the sexes before God is something new and worthy of note in Christianity. It throws into sharp relief the distinction between the Christian view and the otherwise widespread contempt for women in the ancient world.

When Christ and man are put in parallel in Eph. 5:25 and 28 (cf. also Col. 3:19; 1 Pet. 3:7), the point of comparison is the responsibility of the man to love his wife in the same way as Christ loves his church, i.e., with a life of total, selfless, self-sacrificial devotion. The exhortation to "be men of courage" (andrizomai in 1 Cor. 16:13) is a summons similar to being on one's guard and standing firm in the faith (also in that verse). It is a powerful form of demand aimed at the whole community: Their ultimate goal should be to become "a perfect man [andra teleion]" (Eph. 4:13 KJV; "mature," NIV).

3. anēr is used in the sense of husband in the phrase "husband of one wife," which occurs in the Pastoral Letters as one of the qualifications for bishops (1 Tim. 3:2), deacons (3:12), and elders (Tit. 1:6). Some view the phrase to mean "married only once" (cf. NRŠ). While such an interpretation may agree with later developments in the church, the view that a man should not have more than one living wife seems to fit the first-century situation better. On the one hand, it excludes polygamy, which did occur in the first century and in this respect would meet the OT norms for marriage. On the other hand, it also excludes divorcees who had remarried, since the first wife was still regarded as the wife despite the divorce (cf. Mk. 10:11; Lk. 16:18b).

The converse of this phrase occurs in 1 Tim. 5:9 in the case of the enrollment of widows, who must be (lit.) "the wife of one husband." To refuse to help widows who had been "married more than once" (NRS) seems unjust, esp. in cases of levirate marriage (→ gameō, 1138). But this ruling is understandable if we see the situation as a woman's not having been involved in divorce or a polygamous marriage (cf. NIV, "faithful to her husband"). It should be remembered too that this passage is not concerned about welfare in general and the Christian's attitude to anyone in need, but with those within the church who have a claim on church resources. Elsewhere Paul advises remarriage in case of need (1 Cor. 7:8–9, 39–40).

ἄνθρωπος (anthrōpos), human being (476); ἀνθρώπινος (anthrōpinos), human (474).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. anthrōpos means a human being, sometimes a male person. The fem. equivalent is woman, often in a contemptuous sense. The adj. anthrōpinos means human, belonging to humanity. anthrōpos is contrasted to beasts and to gods. In a contemptuous sense, it can mean a slave. There is also a voc. usage that has undertones of reproachfulness: "Man!"

2. (a) The Heb. words corresponding to anthrōpos are ʾādām, ʾîš, and ʾenôš. ʾādām is human nature as contrasted with God (1 Sam. 15:29) and with animals (Gen. 1:26). In its generic use it includes both men and women (cf. Gen. 1:27). ʾîš occurs in Gen. 2:24; ʾenôš often signifies the aspect of weakness, mortality (cf. Ps. 8:5).

In both Gen. 1:1–31 and 2:4b–24, the creation of humankind is the high point. One's humanity resides in the life one has been given (2:7b) in correspondence to God (1:27a). A person is deemed worthy to be spoken to by God and is given a task (1:28; 2:15–17). Through disobedience humankind falls victim to death. ʾādām, a word connected with ʾādāmâh, earth, now no longer simply alludes to one's creatureliness (2:7) but also to one's transitoriness (3:19).

3. The OT is not acquainted with anything corresponding to the Gk. division of a human being into two or three parts, consisting of nous, psychē, and sōma (mind, soul, and body). The following concepts indicate, in rough outline comparison, different aspects of a person, always seen as a whole. They do not represent different parts.

(a) Flesh (Heb. bāśār), often indicating transitoriness (Ps. 78:39). (b) Spirit (Heb. rûaḥ) denotes a person as a living being (146:4). (c) Soul (Heb. nepeš) denotes a person as life bound up with one's body (1 Sam. 19:11b), as an individual (Deut. 24:7a; Ezek. 13:18–19). The soul is neither preexistent nor immortal, for it is the whole person (Gen. 2:7). (d) Heart (Heb. lēb) is the essential, inner person as opposed to outward appearance (1 Sam. 16:7b; Job 12:3).

4. (a) A pessimistic conception of humankind is found in some places in wisdom literature (e.g., Job 14; Eccl.). These concepts are radicalized in Qumran texts, where the transitoriness and sinfulness of human beings are presented in a wide variety of formulations.

(b) Another branch of Jud. reveals the development to a body-soul dualism (4 Macc. 2:21–22), which in Hel. Jud. led to an attitude of loathing for the body (2 Esd.

7:88, 100). According to Josephus, there was widespread belief that redemption is the liberation of the soul from the body. The image of God in us is restricted to the nous, mind or reason.

(c) This dualistic view of humanity in the Hel. world is found esp. in Gnosticism, an early form of which certain sections of the NT seem to combat (e.g., John).

NT In the NT, as in the OT, the question about humankind is that concerning sin and redemption. Abstract definitions find no place here. Humanity differs from animals and plants (Matt. 4:19; 12:12; 1 Cor. 15:39; Rev. 9:4), from angels (1 Cor. 4:9; 13:1), from Christ (Gal. 1:12; Eph. 6:7), and from God (Matt. 7:11; 10:32–33; Mk. 10:9; Jn. 10:33; Acts 5:29; Phil. 2:7). anthrōpos is used in order to belittle in Jas. 1:7 (with reference to Jesus in Matt. 26:74; Jn. 19:5). Jesus is called anthrōpos in respect of his true humanity in Phil. 2:7 and 1 Tim. 2:5. Jesus' own self-designation was "the Son of Man" (see under huios, 5626). kata anthrōpous (1 Pet. 4:6) and kata anthrōpon (Rom. 3:5; 1 Cor. 3:3; 15:32)—lit., "according to men, in a human fashion"—are used as common synonymous phrases for anthrōpinos, human (Rom. 6:19; 1 Cor. 10:13). Sometimes anthrōpos can mean a male person (see Matt. 11:8; 19:5; 1 Cor. 7:1).

The NT is not interested in an isolated, self-contained anthropology any more than the OT. Statements about humanity are always partly theological pronouncements. The emphasis in this word is on our creatureliness (as distinct from other creatures and from God), on our being addressed and chosen by God, on our transitoriness and disobedience, and on our being subject to the wrath and grace of God. The unity and equality of humankind are not postulates of abstract ideas; they are realized in the Christian community (Gal. 3:28; cf. Rom. 3:22, 29; 10:12; Jas. 2:1–9). Through Christ the "one new man" (Eph. 2:15) comes into being. At the same time new differentiations come to light through God's electing activity in Christ (Matt. 20:16) and through the variety of the gifts of the Spirit in the church (1 Cor. 12).

1. The Synoptics. Human beings owe God obedience and service without any prior claim to reward (Lk. 17:17–19). Jesus' universal call to repentance assumes that all are sinners (Matt. 6:12; Mk. 1:15; cf. Matt. 5:45; 9:13; Lk. 15:7). At the same time, God puts great value on human beings (Matt. 6:26b; 10:29–30), even as sinners (Lk. 15). One's vocation is to be a child of the Father and to be perfect like him (Matt. 5:45, 48). The expression in Lk. 2:14 relates to human beings as recipients of the divine favor (cf. Lk. 3:22), i.e., the elect messianic community.

2. Paul. (a) The old self without Christ, i.e., the unconverted person, is either devoted to the law (Rom. 2:17–29) or in rebellion against it (1:18–20); such an individual perverts knowledge of God and in so doing becomes perverted himself or herself (1:21–32). Alongside statements about one's responsibility stand those about one's incapability (cf. the inexcusability in 2:1 with the inability to do good in 7:18–19). This is a tension that Paul sees removed only in God and overcome in Christ (Phil. 2:12b–13). Through Christ, "the new man" and "the last Adam" (Rom. 5:9–21; 1 Cor. 15:21–22, 45–49), we become free. We become "a new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17; cf. Eph. 4:22–24; Col. 3:1–4:6).

Baptism signifies the death of the "old self" with Christ (Rom. 6:6). Through incorporation into the body of Christ we are born as a new people (→ palingenesia, 4098). To the "new self" is directed the imperative to be what Christ has made us (Eph. 4:22–5:21; Col. 3:9–17; cf. Rom. 6:6–14). It is not in our natural capacities to become this; it comes about through being renewed in Christ and in living out this new life.

Rom. 8:1–17 depicts this in terms of being led by the Spirit. Paul distinguishes further between the inner and outer self (2 Cor. 4:16), that is, between our essential being (often expressed in terms of the heart) and our outward appearance.

(b) Paul has several other important anthropological concepts. (i) sōma (→ 5393), body, is not only the physical body but the whole person, the self, the "I" (see Phil. 1:20; also cf. 1 Cor. 15:44 with Phil. 3:21).

(ii) sarx (→ 4922), flesh, occasionally synonymous with sōma, speaks of the transience of humankind (2 Cor. 4:10–11). It furthermore signifies one's sinful nature (Rom. 8:1–14; 1 Cor. 15:50).

(iii) psychē (→ 6034), soul, denotes a person as a living being (2 Cor. 12:15). In 1 Cor. 15:44 Paul relates its existence to this life as contrasted with the next: "It is sown a natural body [sōma psychikon], it is raised a spiritual body [sōma pneumatikon]."

(iv) pneuma (→ 4460), spirit, in some passages overlaps in meaning with that of sōma and psychē and refers to the inner self. It can resemble the modern concept of self-consciousness (cf. Rom. 8:16, where the Spirit is said to bear witness with our spirit that we are children of God).

(v) From Gk. thought, and found primarily in Paul, are: nous (→ 3808) mind, which focuses attention on a human being as a conscious, rational being; and syneidēsis (5287), conscience. Rom. 2:15 refers to the conscience of the Gentiles and its role in their knowledge of God.

3. John. Johannine statements view humanity as prey to the kosmos, the world in opposition to God, and therefore missing the real self (→ pseudomai, 6017, on Jn. 8:41–47; 1 Jn. 1:10; 2:22; 5:10; Rev. 2:2). The coming of Jesus confronts human beings with a decision: either to remain the way we are or to be born again (Jn. 3:3–8). This decision demonstrates whether we are "of the world" or "from God" (cf. Jn. 8:47 and 1 Jn. 4:5 with Jn. 5:24; 6:44, 65; 12:32). There is, however, no depreciation of matter here (see Jn. 1:14). On the contrary, the whole person is made free through Jesus (Jn. 8:31–36) and thus gains life (5:24; 11:25–26).

4. The NT and Modern Psychology. Biblical psychology is practical rather than scientific, but it is understandable in its context. Thus, since strong emotion frequently affects the lower parts of the body from the solar plexus down, the bowels (→ splanchnon, 5073) is the term used where we today, in equally popular terms, would speak of the heart (e.g., 2 Cor. 6:12; 7:15; Phil. 1:8; Phlm. 7, 12). At the opposite extreme nous is the mind, intellect, or understanding (e.g., Rom. 12:2; 1 Cor. 14:19). kardia (2840), heart, stands somewhere between the two; it is sometimes emotional, though less warm than splanchna (e.g., Rom. 1:24; Jas. 3:14), and sometimes it represents the inner set of one's life pattern, including volition (e.g., 2 Cor. 4:6; 9:7; Eph. 4:18).

Thus the NT seizes on common sense terms to describe centers of emotion, feeling, volition, and comprehension. The Bible is concerned not with theory, but with bringing every single part of the person into an effective whole through the Holy Spirit's giving of continuous life to the human pneuma, spirit (e.g., Jn. 3:6; 1 Cor. 2:10–16). The human being is seen as a whole being, and whatever touches one part affects the whole.

There is nothing in NT teaching that runs counter to sound contemporary psychological practice, but the NT stresses the importance of a relationship with God as necessary for the full maturity of the human being in himself or herself as well as in relation to others in church and in society.

478 ἀνθύπατος

ἀνθύπατος (anthypatos), proconsul (478).

Consul was originally the title of the two chief magistrates of the Roman republic. Holders of the office were of senatorial rank and served for one year in Rome before going to administer in the provinces. The office was somewhat modified in the empire, when even children could be given the title.

Luke uses this word in Acts 13:7–8, 12; 18:12; 19:38, where he shows civil power exercising its legitimate authority in an appropriate manner.

ἀνοίγω (anoigō), open (487); ἄνοιξις (anoixis), opening (489); διανοίγω (dianoigō), open, explain (1380).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. anoigō means to open, remove that which obstructs. Fig. it can mean to reach the high seas. The vb. can be used trans. (to open a door, a place, an object, a part of the body) and intrans. (to open; partly in the pass. sense of to be opened).

2. In the LXX anoigō can mean to open the mouth (Ezek. 3:27); one's eyes and ears (e.g., Gen. 21:19; Isa. 35:5; 37:17); a container (e.g., a bag, box, vessel, or grave; Exod. 21:33; Jdg. 4:19; Ps. 5:9), a window, door, or gate (1 Sam. 3:15; 2 Ki. 13:17; Isa. 22:22; 26:2); or a book (Neh. 8:5). If the act of opening is related to human beings, God is often the subj.; objects include the womb (Gen. 29:31), mouth (Exod. 4:12, 15; Num. 22:28), eyes (Gen. 21:19; Isa. 35:5), ears (Isa. 50:5), or God's hands (Ps. 145:16).

NT In the NT anoigō is found 78x, esp. often in the Johannine literature. Following the LXX pattern the vb. is usually trans. and only rarely intrans. (Jn. 1:51; 1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 6:11). The sole occurrence of anoixis (Eph. 6:19) has a trans. meaning in Paul's request for prayer "that whenever I open my mouth [lit., in the opening of my mouth], words may be given me so that I will fearlessly make known the mystery of the gospel."

Objects of the vb. anoigō include (as in the LXX) the mouth (Matt. 5:2; Lk. 1:64; Acts 8:35; 10:34; 18:14), eye (Matt. 9:30; Jn. 9:10, 14; 10:21; Acts 9:8, 40), ear (Mk. 7:35), a door (Acts 12:10, 14; 14:27; 1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12; Rev. 3:20), a place (Matt. 3:16), or a scroll (Rev. 5:2–5). If we leave aside those passages where "to open the mouth" means to begin to speak (e.g., Matt. 5:2; 13:35), which reflects a Semitic idiom (cf. Job 3:1; 33:2; Dan. 10:16), the vb. is used mostly with a theological sense: It is God himself who opens.

1. In Paul's writings anoigō occurs in his quotation of Ps. 5:9 in Rom. 3:13a, in the catena of quotations demonstrating that human beings are all guilty sinners: "Their throats are open graves." In 2 Cor. 6:11 Paul writes: "We have spoken freely to you [lit., our mouth is open to you], Corinthians, and opened out hearts wide [platynō, make wide] to you." Paul has kept no secrets back from the Corinthians, and he yearns for them.

Apart from these references, Paul uses God as the subj. of opening. He opens a door for Paul to do fruitful and effective missionary work (1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12; Col. 4:3; cf. Acts 14:27; Rev. 3:8). Note that he never uses anoigō with Christ as subj.

2. Rev. 3:20 speaks of our opening the door to Christ: "Here I am! I stand at the door and knock. If anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in and eat with him, and he with me." The underlying idea here is the kingdom of God seen as a feast (Isa. 25:6–9; Matt. 8:11; 22:1–14; Mk. 13:29; 14:25; cf. also the idea of a judge standing at the doors in Jas. 5:9). There are also promises of feeding on Christ himself (Jn. 6:35–40, 48–58) and living with him (Jn. 14:2–3, 23). Rev. 3:20 is in a letter addressed to the lukewarm church at Laodicea, but the sing. subj. invites individual response.

Elsewhere in the writings of Jn. God is the one who opens. He opens heaven (Jn. 1:51; Rev. 19:11), the temple (Rev. 11:19), and the holy tent of heaven (15:5). On his authority an angel opens the abyss of the underworld (9:2). But the exalted Lord has the authority to open the way of access to God. Note the beginning of the letter to the church at Philadelphia: "The words of him who is holy and true, who holds the key of David. What he opens no one can shut, and what he shuts no one can open.... See, I have placed before you an open door that no one can shut" (3:7–8). Reference to "the key of David" (→ kleis, 3090) recalls God's promise to Eliakim (Isa. 22:22), who was given authority to open and shut. Here in Rev. the metaphor is construed as access to God and eternal life, as in Rev. 1:18: "I was dead, and behold I am alive for ever and ever! And I hold the keys of death and Hades" (cf. also Matt. 16:19).

In Rev. 5:2–9 it is the exalted Lord, the slain Lamb who has ascended to the throne, who alone is worthy to open the scroll with the seven seals that contains the record of God's plan in history in the last days. The earthly Jesus is here equal with God. The Fourth Gospel contains a counterpart to this in the fact that Jesus opens the eyes of the blind, which is something God alone can do (see Jn. 9; 10:21). He is also the shepherd for whom "the watchman opens the gate ... and the sheep listen to his voice" (10:3).

3. In Matt. 2:11 the Magi open their treasures. Elsewhere in Matt. Jesus opens the eyes of the blind (9:30; 20:33; cf. Mk. 7:35). As in Jn., opening in Matt. is implicitly or explicitly the act of God. He opens the heavens at the baptism of Jesus (Matt. 3:16), symbolizing the favor and openness of God to Jesus and confirming the action. To those who knock, the kingdom of heaven will be opened (7:7; cf. 7:13–14). But to those who do not come at the hour of opportunity, the door of the kingdom will not be opened (25:11). Here it is the eschatological Lord who is speaking and who thus has the authority of God to open and shut. Matt. 27:52 refers to the opening of the tombs and the raising of the dead at the moment of Jesus' death.

4. In the writings of Lk. anoigō is esp. associated with the concept of time. At the right time, Zechariah opens his mouth (Lk. 1:64), and the heavens open after Jesus' baptism (3:21). The public ministry of Jesus begins when Jesus enters the synagogue at Nazareth, opens the book of the prophet Isaiah, reads from Isa. 61:1–2, and identifies himself with the one on whom the Spirit of the Lord rests (Lk. 4:17). Jesus is the one who opens and closes the door of the kingdom (13:25) and the one to whom the servants must be ready to open (12:36).

The sayings about asking, knocking, and opening in Lk. 11:9–10 are rounded off by the promise of the Spirit: "If you then, though you are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father in heaven give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him!" (11:13). He follows this with the Beelzebub controversy concerning the power and authority by which Jesus acted (11:14–26). These references suggest that the ability and authority to open ultimately rest with God.

Acts 8:32 quotes Isa. 53:7: "As a lamb before the shearer is silent, so he did not open his mouth." This is interpreted Christologically by Philip to the Ethiopian eunuch. Acts 9:8, 40 refers to the opening of physical eyes, but 26:18 uses the metaphor spiritually in an account of Paul's commission to the Gentiles: "to open their eyes and turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God." The words recall the mission of the servant (Isa. 42:6, 17), and in the light of Lk. 4:17 constitute an extension of Jesus' own mission.

Peter's vision of the great sheet containing clean and unclean animals (signifying God's inclusion of the Gentiles in his people) descends from heaven. The fact that heaven is opened in order to let down the sheet (Acts 10:11) signifies the divine origin of the vision. Several passages in Acts refer to the opening of doors. In 5:19, 12:10, and 16:26–27, prison doors are opened by divine agency. This contrasts with the doors closed by humans, either to imprison the apostles (5:23) or to keep Peter from entering John Mark's mother's house (12:14, 16). God also opens the door of faith, as Paul reports to Antioch how God "had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles" (14:27).

5. dianoigō occurs 8x in the NT. It is used in the expression (lit.) "every male that opens the womb [i.e., every firstborn male] will be called holy to the Lord" (Lk. 2:23; cf. Exod. 13:2, 12). In this passage the infant Jesus is being presented in the temple and sacrifices are being offered for him. The same vb. is used in Stephen's vision just before his martyrdom, when he saw "heaven open and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God" (Acts 7:56). As elsewhere, the open heaven signifies God's acceptance and blessing of the one who sees heaven open, and it confirms the rightness of this person's actions.

The imperative of dianoigō, "Be opened," is given as a translation of Ephphatha (Mk. 7:34; cf. v. 35) in the healing of the deaf and dumb man. This is not a meaningless magical formula but an intelligible performative utterance.

In Lk. 24:31 dianoigō is used of opening the eyes in the sense of understanding (cf. Gen. 3:5, 7; 2 Ki. 6:17) in the self-disclosure of the risen Christ to the two disciples at Emmaus. At the moment of recognition, he vanishes from physical sight. In Lk. 24:32 the same vb. refers to understanding the significance of the Scriptures in relation to Jesus as the Christ (cf. also 24:45). Lk. uses the word again of Paul's missionary work among the Jews at Thessalonica, "explaining [dianoigō] and proving that the Christ had to suffer and rise from the dead. 'This Jesus I am proclaiming to you is the Christ,' he said" (Acts 17:3). In each instance human beings needed help in order to see Christ. Both one's understanding and the Scriptures require opening.

ἀντί (anti), for, because of, instead of (505).

CL & OT The root sense of anti is over against, opposite. Thus, the prep. naturally came to denote equivalence (for), exchange (for the price of, in return for), and substitution (instead of). Exod. 21:23–25, for example, uses anti for equivalence in the famous lex talionis ("life for life, eye for eye..."). But the prevailing sense in the LXX, as in nonbiblical Gk., is substitutionary exchange. Abraham offers up the ram as a burnt offering instead of (anti) his son Isaac (Gen. 22:13). Judah offers to remain in Egypt instead of (anti) Benjamin as a slave to Joseph (44:33). Lamenting the death of his son Absalom, David says, "If only I had died instead of [anti] you" (2 Sam. 18:33).

NT 1. Equivalence. Jesus quotes the lex talionis in Matt. 5:38 and carries it one step further: Rather than seeking for equivalence in injury, we should love and forgive our enemies. In 1 Cor. 11:15 Paul's point is not that a veil is superfluous for a woman, since nature has given her hair in place of a covering; rather, from the general fact that "long hair is given to her [to serve] as [anti] a covering," he infers that the long hair of a woman shows the appropriateness of her being covered when she prays or prophesies in the Christian assembly.

2. Exchange. In return "for [anti] evil" Christians are not to do evil back (Rom. 12:17; 1 Thess. 5:15); when insulted believers are not to return insults (1 Pet. 3:9). Also, Esau exchanged his birthright for the price of a meal (Heb. 12:16).

3. Substitution. The half-shekel tax alluded to in Matt. 17:24 was regarded as redemption money (cf. Exod. 30:12) that released the donor from hypothetical slavery or absolved the donor from divine anger. Thus, when Jesus commanded Simon Peter to give the collectors the shekel he would find in the fish's mouth "for [anti] my tax and yours," Matt. probably wants his readers to understand the redemption tax as a substitutionary offering designed to release the giver from obligation. Archelaus reigns over Judea in place of (anti) his father Herod (Matt. 2:22; cf. also Lk. 11:11; Jas. 4:15).

4. Special uses. (a) In Jn. 1:16 charin anti charitos ("one blessing after another"; lit., "grace for grace," KJV) denotes a perpetual and rapid succession of blessings, as though there were no interval between the arrival of one blessing and the reception of the next. Alternatively, the notion of the replacement may be prominent here, as if the blessings of "old" grace are being replaced by those of "new" grace (sometimes taken to refer to the spiritual presence of the Holy Spirit in place of the physical presence of Christ).

(b) When the author of Heb. observes that Jesus endured the cross "for [anti] the joy set before him" (12:2), the meaning of the prep. phrase could be (i) "in exchange for" or "as the price for" the joy that was in prospect for him, i.e., that of seeing "the light of life" (Isa. 53:11); or (ii) "instead of" the joy of continued fellowship in God's immediate presence, which lay within his grasp. The second alternative seems preferable in light of the use of prokeimai ("set before") in Heb. 6:18; 12:1 (cf. 2 Cor. 8:12) to denote a present reality, the prevailing substitutionary sense of anti, the absence of any hint of bargaining between Jesus and God or of personal advantage as a motive of Jesus for his suffering, and the parallel in Heb. 11:25–26 with reference to Moses.

(c) Finally, "for [anti] many" in Mk. 10:45 (also Matt. 20:28) should be linked not with the vb. "give" but with lytron (ransom, i.e., "a ransom in the place of many"). The life of Jesus, surrendered in a sacrificial death, brought about the release of forfeited lives. He acted on behalf of the many by taking their place. As with hyper ("on behalf of," → 5642) in 1 Tim. 2:6 ("for all"), the notions of exchange and substitution are both present. It is not sound hermeneutics to appeal to a contestable "wider" sense of anti (i.e., "on behalf of") in Matt. 17:27 (or Gen. 44:33) as the key to the proper understanding of anti in this passage, where the customary sense of the prep. (i.e., exchange and/or substitution) gives an unobjectionable meaning and the term lytron is applied to a human life.

508 (antidikos, enemy, opponent), → 2398.

ἀντιλέγω (antilegō), speak against, contradict, object (515); ἀντιλογία (antilogia), argument, opposition (517).

CL & OT 1. antilegō has the basic meaning of to speak against or contradict someone. But it can also have a stronger meaning of actively opposing someone. Similarly, antilogia can mean a controversial discussion but also a rebellion.

2. Isa. 22:22 uses antilegō in a messianic passage; it reads lit. in the LXX: "I will give the glory of David to him and he will rule, and there will be no opposing person." Isa. 65:2 is quoted in Rom. 10:21 about God's people being a disobedient and "obstinate" people, though earlier the prophet says that he has not been "rebellious" (50:5). antilogia is used in Num. 20:13; 27:14; Ps. 81:7; 106:32 for Meribah (Heb. word meaning quarrelling). The word is also used several times in OT legal material for disputes (Exod. 18:16; Deut. 17:8; 19:17), though the contentions can be other than legal in nature (Ps. 18:43; 31:20; 55:9).

NT 1. antilegō occurs 11x in the NT. It refers once to the disagreement between the Pharisees and the Sadducees about the resurrection (Lk. 20:27) and to the severe objections that the Jews had to Paul's preaching (Acts 13:45). The vb. is used in the Jewish legal challenge against Jesus as someone who opposes Caesar (Jn. 19:12) and later in the legal proceedings against Paul (Acts 28:19). In a Christian setting, antilegō is used of heretics who oppose sound teaching (Tit. 1:9). Note also how the aged Simeon prophesies that the son of Mary and Joseph will be "a sign that will be spoken against" (Lk. 2:34).

2. antilogia is used 4x in the NT. Heb. 6:16 says that an oath puts an end to "argument," 7:7 that there is no argument that a lesser person is blessed by a greater. In 12:3, Jesus endured "opposition" from sinful people. In Jude 11 the word is used of Korah's rebellion.

532 ἀντίχριστος

ἀντίχριστος (antichristos), Antichrist (532); ψευδόχριστος (pseudochristos), false Christ (6023).

The words antichristos and pseudochristos are first found in the second half of the 1st cent. A.D. and are creations of Christian literature. The prep. anti originally meant "in the place of" and then "against." It indicates a fundamental, dualistic opposition of a kind familiar in Hellenism (both contemporary with the NT and later in the expression antitheos, anti-God). The compound with pseudo, false, gives the word the ethical connotation of being false or deceptive.

OT The background of this word is to be found in Jewish apocalyptic literature, which was especially interested in calculating and describing the end of this age, the coming of the Messiah (→ Christos, 5986), and the setting up of the kingdom of God. Dan. 7–12, the earliest expression of this type of literature, was influential. Apocalyptic brings together eschatological expectations of Jewish prophecy (e.g., Isa. 26; 35; Jer. 5:1–7:34; Ezek. 37–48), classical theories about the ages (→ aiōn, 172), and explanations and veiled judgments on contemporary political events. Examples of pre-Christian apocalyptic writings are the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and most of the 1 Enoch.

Regular features of this literature are the birth pains of the Messiah, the dissolution of the old age, and the transition to the new age with all its terrors (including plagues, diseases, wars, earthquakes, and signs in the heavens; see 2 Esd. 4:48–5:8; 6:21; 1 Enoch 80:4–8; 99). Human apostasy will increase, and all the powers of evil will arm themselves under the leadership of Satan against God and his people. Satan, through his personification, is the rival of the Messiah, who is either the forerunner or the central figure of the kingdom of God. The greater the tribulation, the more fervently the Messiah was awaited by the godly.

The typical example of such personification is King Antiochus IV Epiphanes (reigned 175–164 B.C.). Some scholars see him in Dan. 8:23ff. His desecration of the Jerusalem temple with an altar to Zeus and the sacrifice there of a pig was considered to be an "abomination of desolation" (→ bdelygma, 1007) and his reign to be the breaking in of the anti-God. In Assum. Mos. 6ff., traits of his personality have clearly been united with those of Herod the Great to form an anti-God figure. Such traits were also seen in Caligula, the Roman emperor (reigned A.D. 37–41), who wished to erect a statue of himself in the temple.

NT If we base our thoughts only on the NT, one thing is certain: All that is said of the Antichrist is essentially negative in relation to the picture of the Christ. It gives the dark background against which Christ's victory and kingdom shine out the more brightly. The actual word is found only 5x (in 1 and 2 Jn.). But outlines of the Antichrist can also be found unmistakably in Matt. 24; Mk. 13; Lk. 21; 2 Thess. 2:3–12; and Rev.

1. Mk. 13:14 speaks of "the abomination that causes desolation" (cf. Dan. 9:27; 12:11). It is personified, for the neut. word "abomination" is followed by a masc. part. Also mentioned (Mk. 13:21–22) are false prophets (pseudoprophētai) and those who falsely claim to be the Christ (pseudochristoi). These may all apply to the Antichrist, the opponent of God in all his disguises and masks. No distinction need really be made between sing. and pl.

2. In 2 Thess. 2:3–4, Paul speaks of "the man of lawlessness," who exalts himself "over everything that is called God or is worshiped" and who takes his seat in the temple of God. Jesus will annihilate him with the breath of his mouth (2:8).

3. Rev. gives the fullest picture of the Antichrist and his war against the church. Here too the word is missing, but everything said in ch. 13 about the two beasts clearly contains the traits of a personified power opposed to God, which is in fact a blasphemous parody of the Christ (→ thērion, 2563). The details of this figure include traits from Dan. 7:7–12, 23–25. On an eschatological interpretation, everyone who deceives and persecutes the church and blasphemes the Christ is no doubt intended. In both cases the conqueror is Christ.

4. In the Johannine letters (1 Jn. 2:18, 22–23; 4:3; 2 Jn. 7), teachers of false doctrines are called "antichrists." They claimed special fellowship with and love for God (cf. 1 Jn. 1:5–6; 2:4–5; 5:1–2), but they denied that Jesus is the Christ and that he became a man (4:2–3). Moreover, they apparently did not take sin seriously (cf. 3:6–10). Here the deception does not come from outside but from inside the church. Members of the church had become servants of the Antichrist.

CL & OT 1. anō, meaning above, upward, earlier in time, can describe land or mountains in contrast to the sea, or the sky and heaven in comparison with the earth, or even the earth in contrast to the underworld.

2. Jud. emphasized strongly the contrast between above and below, i.e., between heaven as God's sphere and the earth as humanity's sphere. Yet there is a parallelism between what exists above and what exists and happens on earth. As heaven cannot exist without the twelve constellations, earth cannot exist without the twelve tribes. Similarly, God studies the Torah in heaven as people do on earth. In this case, that which is above is prior in time.

Stimulated by Hel. ideas, Philo worked out an extensive speculation on above and below, though this did not prove significant either for Jud. or the NT. Philo saw the upper and lower worlds as divided into levels. The lowest level is the material, and on the highest God stands. The sky forms a spiritual material, the transitional level between the upper and lower worlds.

NT 1. The NT contains no cosmological speculations that set God and the world in radical opposition, attributing created reality to some other deity. God is the Maker and Lord of the entire world. Nevertheless, a distinction is drawn between the holy God and the sinful world.

Jesus looked "up" (anō), i.e., toward heaven, where God lives according to the ancient world concept (Jn. 11:41; cf. Acts 2:19). In contrast to his enemies who are "from below [katō]," from this sinful world, he is "from above [anō]," from God, to whom he will return (Jn. 8:23).

In Gal. 4:25–26 is a reference to "Jerusalem that is above," which is free and is the mother of Christians, in contrast to the present Jerusalem, which, with her children subject to the Mosaic law, is in slavery.

The "heavenward" call toward which Paul presses is the call of God in Jesus Christ (Phil. 3:14). Correspondingly, Paul encourages his readers to "set [their] minds on things above" (Col. 3:1–2). This is more narrowly defined by a reference to the fact that "Christ is seated at the right hand of God" (3:1).

2. The meaning of anōthen in Jn. 3:3, 7 has been a matter of debate among scholars. It can mean that a person must be born "again," but it can also mean that one must be born "from above." Perhaps we do not need to choose between the two, for when we are born from above (i.e., born of the Spirit of God), we experience rebirth (i.e., we are born again).

See also anabainō, go up, mount up (326); ouranos, heaven (4041).

ἄξιος (axios), of like value, fit, worthy, worth (545); ἀξίως (axiōs), worthily, in a manner worthy of, suitably (547); ἀνάξιος (anaxios), unworthy (396); ἀναξίως (anaxiōs), unworthily (397); ἀξιόω (axioō), consider or think worthy, make worthy (546); καταξιόω (kataxioō), deem worthy, consider worthy (2921).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. axios meant originally tipping or balancing the scales. Two entities, either of the same or of different (anaxios) weight, are compared. The meaning of axios is then extended to cover the relationship between persons or things that correspond (or do not correspond) to one another—that is, fit, appropriate. Since this relation of fitness implies corresponding worth, axios comes finally to mean worthy or worth. The adv. axiōs is esp. used in this sense. anaxios is the negative form, not suitable, unworthy. The vb. axioō means to think worthy, think suitable, or to request, ask. kataxioō has the same meaning, intensified: to deem worthy.

2. This group of words has no great significance in the LXX. axios often means deserving. In Prov. 3:15 it has the notion of comparison: "Nothing you desire can compare with [wisdom]." In relation to God, axios becomes a quality belonging to the zealous keeper of the law, who uses personal worthiness as the foundation for a claim on God (2 Macc. 7:20; 4 Macc. 17:8–12).

NT 1. In contrast to the Jewish concept of merit, the prodigal son makes it clear that no one can make a claim on the father (God): "I am no longer worthy to be called your son" (Lk. 15:19, 21; cf. Jn. 1:27; Acts 13:25). The Capernaum centurion, who in the Jewish view deserved Jesus' help because he had built a synagogue, did not consider himself worthy for Jesus to be troubled with him, but simply asked Jesus to say a word of healing for his servant (Lk. 7:7). Instead, it is the grace of God in the gospel that imparts worth and makes one worthy of fellowship with him. On the other hand, Jesus teaches that, "Anyone who does not take his cross and follow me is not worthy [axios] of me" (Matt. 10:38)

In Lk. 20:35; Acts 5:41; and 2 Thess. 1:5 the undeserved gift of salvation is expressed by kataxioō. Our worth before God is decided by whether we come into contact with the message of Christ and obey it.

2. In the NT letters axios frequently has the meaning of fitting, in accord with. This is esp. evident in the use of the adv. axiōs in exhortations that demand a right lifestyle in accord with the gospel of Christ (Phil. 1:27), the Lord (Col. 1:10; 1 Thess. 2:12), or our calling (Eph. 4:1). In a similar vein, Paul warns in 1 Cor. 11:27 against celebrating the Lord's Supper "in an unworthy manner" (anaxiōs). Paul is not requiring a particular moral quality in the participants; rather, he is looking for a manner of life that accords with the gospel, namely, mutual love (cf. 11:17–34).

axios can also describe the value of human actions. A much-quoted proverb says, "The worker deserves his wages" (1 Tim. 5:18; cf. also Matt. 10:10; Lk. 10:7; 1 Cor. 9:14). Sinners do things for which they deserve (axios) to die (Rom. 1:32), but Paul's enemies can find nothing in his behavior deserving death, with which to accuse him (Acts 25:11, 25). Christians are worthy to be clothed in white in the age to come (Rev. 3:4).

At Rom. 8:18 Paul uses axios in its original sense of a comparison between two entities: "Our present sufferings are not worth comparing" to our future glory.

3. At Rev. 4:11 axios is used with reference to the exalted Lord. No one is worthy of such glory and honor as God (because of creation, 4:11) and the Lamb (because of Christ's sacrificial death, 5:12). In the end, the Lamb alone is worthy to be entrusted by God with the execution of his plans of salvation and of kingship (5:2, 4, 9).

ἅπαξ (hapax), once (562); ἐφάπαξ (ephapax), once for all (2384).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the fundamental meaning of hapax includes numerical singularity and completeness that needs no additions. In the LXX hapax generally means once or one time (e.g., Gen. 18:32; Exod. 30:10; Ps. 62:11), or once and for all (e.g., 1 Sam. 26:8). In Hag. 2:6 the prophet says that Yahweh will shake the earth, sea, and dry land once more (hapax), implying the need for readiness and watching in view of the coming of the messianic kingdom.

NT 1. hapax is found 14x in the NT. It means once in contrast to twice, thrice, etc. (2 Cor. 11:25; Phil. 4:16; Heb. 9:7), and once in the sense of an event that cannot be repeated. It is so used of the sacrificial death of Christ (Heb. 9:26–28; 1 Pet. 3:18), of what the OT sacrifice did not do (Heb. 10:2), of God's saving activity (Jude 3, 5), and of the coming judgment (Heb. 12:26 = Hag. 2:6). With the uniqueness and finality of Jesus' saving work the NT writers contrast the uniqueness and finality of human reaction, either in faith or in unbelief.

The derivative ephapax (not found in pre-Christian writings) means "at the same time," i.e., together, in 1 Cor. 15:6. It is used 4x more (Rom. 6:10; Heb. 7:27; 9:12; 10:10), where it refers to the once-for-all sacrificial death of Christ.

2. The theological importance of both terms lies in the fact that they stress the historical nature of God's revelation. Just as God revealed himself to Israel in history when he brought them out of Egypt, so he revealed himself to his covenant people once for all, unrepeatably, and finally, in Christ. This is of decisive importance in confronting those religions where salvation is an ideal concept, based on the mere idea of deity and divorced from history (as in Gnosticism).

In contrast to the situation of the OT covenant people, Heb. argues that in view of the once-for-all sacrificial death of Jesus, we are now in the end time (ephapax, Heb. 10:10; heis, 10:12, 14, → 1651). The author draws a contrast between the single, complete act of Christ and the repeated sacrifices of the old covenant, which are temporary and imperfect since they had to be repeated every year. Otherwise those who brought these sacrifices and worshiped God through them would have ceased to bring them. As mere shadows of the future and perfect sacrifice of Christ, they served merely to bring sins to mind (10:3) and so to point to the one who is to come.

This indicates that the very nature and purpose of the OT sacrificial system were not to purify once for all but to point to the final sacrifice and purification in Jesus, who is both the sacrifice and high priest. Just as human beings finally die and face the judgment, so Jesus' giving himself in death to put away sins is final (Heb. 9:26–28). This sacrifice distinguishes the activity of the Son from that of the earthly high priest with his temporal sacrifice and with its limited validity, offered daily for himself and the people.

The author of Heb. sees the death of Christ as the once-and-for-all sacrifice and the resurrection and ascension of Christ in terms of the high priest entering the Most Holy Place on the Day of Atonement (Heb. 9:12; 10:12; cf. Lev. 16). In the OT the high priest did this on an annual basis. After sacrificing, he entered the Most Holy Place with the blood of the sacrifice on behalf of God's people. But Christ has entered the immediate presence of God through his heavenly exaltation by his own blood to represent his people before God and obtain for them eternal salvation (cf. 9:14; 10:19–25).

In Rom. 6:10 Paul writes: "The death [Christ] died, he died to sin once for all [ephapax]; but the life he lives, he lives to God." The statement comes at the climax of a discussion of the problem of antinomianism. If we are saved by "the gift that came by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ" (5:15), and not because of anything that we have done, then why not go on sinning that grace may abound (6:1)? Paul replies that baptism implies baptism into Christ's death (6:3) and that just as he was raised by the glory of the Father, we too should walk in the newness of life (6:4). The whole purpose of his death was to free us from the enslavement of sin (6:5–9). This he has done once for all, and now he lives to God (6:10). "In the same way, count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus" (6:11).

The finality and unrepeatability of the historic act of salvation is paralleled by the finality of personal salvation. If it is frittered away, it is also unrepeatable: "It is impossible for those who have once [hapax] been enlightened . . . if they fall away, to be brought back to repentance" (Heb. 6:4–6). Warnings against apostasy occur throughout Heb. (cf. 3:1–4:16; 6:1–20; 10:26–39; 12:1–29; 13:9–14, 22).

Jude 3 urges its readers "to contend for the faith that was once for all [hapax] entrusted to the saints." Faith here means an orthodox body of beliefs that the church adheres to. The source of this teaching is ultimately God himself, but it is mediated by the apostles and other human agents (cf. Jude 17 with Lk. 1:2; Acts 16:4). The emphasis on a body of truth as opposed to heretical doctrines is more pronounced in later NT writings, such as the Pastoral Letters (cf. 1 Tim. 1:3; 4:6; 2 Tim. 2:2; 4:3–4; Tit. 1:9), though from the start we see evidence of the gospel as an authoritative message handed down in the church (e.g., Acts 2:42; Rom. 16:17; 1 Cor. 11:2, 23; 15:1–3; Gal. 1:23; 6:10).

Jude 5 goes on to remind readers that they "already [hapax] know" many of the truths of Scripture, such as the story of the exodus but also the deaths of the rebellious people in the desert, and uses this story to warn them against apostasy (cf. Heb. 6:4–6). The similar illustration in 1 Cor. 10:5 and Heb. 3–4 suggests that the use of the exodus generation formed part of common Christian instruction.

ἀπαρχή (aparchē), the gift of the firstfruits, offering, gift (569).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. aparchē is a technical term that denotes firstfruits of any sort (e.g., of natural products or livestock) that were sacred to the deity and had to be consecrated to it before the whole could be used for oneself. In religious contexts there is also occasional mention of the offering of individual people to lifelong service in the sanctuary or of whole groups to the deity. Later aparchē included the payment of regular taxes in the secular sphere.

2. In the LXX aparchē translates initially the Heb. word meaning firstfruits—that is, the offering of the firstfruits of natural products, such as wine and grains, that were consecrated to Yahweh, the giver of fruitfulness (Num. 18:12; Deut. 18:4; 26:2, 10; 2 Chr. 31:5). aparchē also translates the Heb. word for contribution, offering, which denotes the contribution of natural products or money to the cult for the priests and Levites (Exod. 25:2–3; Deut. 12:11, 17; 2 Chr. 31:10, 12, 14), also understood as a thank offering to Yahweh. This practice is supported by the Israelite belief in creation: Yahweh is the glory and owner of human, animal, and plant life. The gift of the firstfruits of everything living belongs to him (Exod. 23:19; Num. 18:15).

NT 1. In the NT aparchē occurs only 9x, mostly in Paul. In Rom. 11:16 Paul takes up the thought of Num. 15:17–21: "If the part of the dough offered as firstfruits is holy, then the whole batch is holy; if the root is holy, so are the branches." Admittedly, there is a certain difference between the OT example and Paul's use of it. In the case of the Israelites, the rest of the dough could be put to secular use. Paul's point is that since the patriarchs (the root; cf. 11:28) are holy, the nation as a whole is consecrated. Thus, by means of this exegesis, he guarantees the role of the entire nation of Israel in salvation history.

2. aparchē has a similar fig. sense in Rom. 16:5, where Paul speaks of Epenetus as the firstfruits (i.e., the first convert) of the province of Asia. Similarly, in 1 Cor. 16:15 the household of Stephanas is called the firstfruits of Achaia. The same idea is found in a variant reading of 2 Thess. 2:13, where "from the beginning" (Gk. ap' archēs) is read as aparchēn (firstfruits; see NIV text note).

More generally, James addresses his readers as the firstfruits of God's creation: "He chose to give us birth through the word of truth, that we might be a kind of firstfruits of all he created" (Jas. 1:18). Christians are considered here as the firstfruits of the new created order that supersedes the old Israel. In Rev. 14:4 the 144,000 are similarly so described "as firstfruits to God and the Lamb."

3. Rom. 8:23 reverses the OT relationship between giver and receiver: "Not only so, but we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies." Here it is not God but believers who receive the firstfruits. The Holy Spirit given to believers is seen as the first installment and guarantee of the final redemption of our bodies.

4. In 1 Cor. 15:20 aparchē is used in connection with the resurrection: "But Christ has indeed been raised from the dead, the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep." The assertion follows Paul's reflections on the drastic consequences for believers if there were no resurrection from the dead (15:12–19)—both preaching and faith, for example, would be empty (15:14). But Christ has indeed been raised, and his resurrection is a guarantee of our resurrection. The thought is further developed in 15:23 in relation to the eschatological order of resurrection life: "But each in his own turn: Christ, the firstfruits, then, when he comes, those who belong to him."

ἀπαύγασμα (apaugasma), radiance, effulgence, reflection (575); αὐγάζω (augazō), shine forth, illuminate, see (878); αὐγή (augē), dawn, daybreak (879); διαυγάζω (diaugazō), to shine through, dawn (1419).

CL & OT apaugasma is found only in Hel. writers, where it means either radiance (in the act. sense) or reflection (in the pass. sense). It is not attested before Wisdom of Solomon. Philo uses it to say that what God breathed into Adam was "an effulgence" [apaugasma] of his blessed nature. The only LXX text is Wis. 7:25–26, where divine wisdom is hailed as "a reflection [apaugasma] of eternal light . . . and an image [eikōn, → 1635] of his goodness." In this setting wisdom is hypostatized as a source of light, whose shining forth (apaugasma) can be understood as reflection.

NT apaugasma derives from augazō, to shine forth, or to illuminate (cf. 2 Cor. 4:4). The vb. diaugazō, to shine through, dawn, occurs in 2 Pet. 1:19. The cognate noun augē, radiance, is found in Acts 20:11 and means dawn or daybreak, i.e., when the sun shines forth.

The only NT use of apaugasma is in Heb. 1:3, where the Son of God is referred to as "the radiance [apaugasma] of God's glory." This verse stands in a doxological, possibly hymnic tribute to the cosmic Christ, who is described as either the radiance of the divine glory (as sunlight conveys the brightness and intensity of the sun) or as God's reflection (as the moon reflects the light of the sun). The act. sense of "radiance" is preferable to "reflection" (cf. NIV). But either way, the verse is a piece of wisdom Christology that interprets Christ as the supreme and final revelation of the Father.

ἁπλότης (haplotēs), simplicity, sincerity, uprightness (605); ἁπλοῦς (haplous), single, simple, sincere (606); ἁπλῶς (haplōs), sincerely, generously (607); διπλοῦς (diplous), double (1487); δίψυχος (dipsychos), double-minded (1500).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. haplotēs and haplous mean singleness, single (opposite of diplous, double). In addition to this numerical meaning grew a positive ethical connotation for the word group, so that haplotēs came to mean straightness, openness, speaking without a hidden meaning. This meaning grew over time, but the meaning based on intellectual outlook diminished in importance, so that haplous came to mean simple, silly.

2. In Judaism and the LXX we find the basic meaning of single (e.g., Wis. 16:27). haplous also means unambiguous, clear. The wise, who accept God's commands wholeheartedly, have a clear walk in their lives (haplōs, Prov. 10:8–9). David gave God his silver and gold in singleness of heart (1 Chr. 29:17). When haplous is used in the context of human relationships of giving, it implies goodness, kindness, and generosity, understood as a quality of the heart (Prov. 11:25). diplous occurs in such passages as Exod. 16:5, where the Israelites are told to pick up twice as much manna on the sixth day, and 22:4, where a thief must pay back double what he has taken.

NT 1. This word group is infrequent in the NT. haplotēs generally means personal wholeness, undividedness, and hence uncomplicated simplicity. Paul, using the picture of devotion of a bride to one man (2 Cor. 11:2–3), shows the completeness of human surrender to Christ. The basis of such a demand is Christ's complete self-surrender for us (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14–20). Hence, a similar personal integrity should be a mark of the Christian in his or her dealings with others.

Paul viewed the collection made by one church for another as a true expression of a unity transcending the local church. So haplotēs receives a universal connotation (2 Cor. 8:2; 9:11, 13) and means a oneness of heart, generosity. Generous giving within the local church (Rom. 12:8) is also an expression of unity within the body of Christ (cf. 12:4). But unity should also be internal, for Eph. 6:5 and Col. 3:22 instruct slaves to obey their masters "with sincerity of heart."

2. In Matt. 6:22; Lk. 11:34, in a parable of Jesus, haplous denotes singlehearted devotion and service to Christ. But if we serve Christ with a view to our own advancement, our lives will be filled with darkness.

3. haplōs occurs in Jas. 1:5 in a reference to God who gives "generously," to show the undividedness and honesty of his giving in contrast to the inner division of the one who doubts, who is "double-minded" (dipsychos, 1:8; → psychē, soul, 6034).

4. diplous is found in 1 Tim. 5:17, where Paul states that a teaching elder is worthy of double honor. In Rev. 18:6, God promises to pay Babylon back double for her sins.

ἀπό (apo), from, away from (608).

CL In general apo (from) in cl. Gk. denotes motion from the edge or surface of an object, while ek (out, out of; → 1666) denotes motion from within going out. But in Hel. Gk. the distinction between these two was becoming blurred, so that the meaning of these two words overlaps considerably. Note, for example, how Lk. uses apo at least 10x with exerchomai (to go out; in most cases, this construction refers to the casting out of demons).

NT 1. General meanings. In the NT both apo and ek are used in the following senses: (a) temporal (e.g., apo, Matt. 11:12; ek, Jn. 9:1); (b) causal (apo, Matt. 18:7; ek, Jn. 4:6); (c) instrumental (apo, Matt. 11:19; ek, Lk. 16:9); (d) adverbial (apo, 2 Cor. 1:14; ek, 9:7); (e) to denote place of origin (apo and ek together, Jn. 1:44; 11:1); (f) to denote membership (apo, Acts 12:1; ek, 6:9). Such overlapping of function makes one hesitate to distinguish between "out of [ek] the water" in Mk. 1:10 and "out of [apo] the water" in Matt. 3:16, as though Matt. reflects a later tradition of baptism by affusion rather than by immersion (the Markan tradition).

2. Notable instances. (a) In 1 Cor. 11:23, Paul records what he received "from [apo] the Lord." The phrase here can mean either that the Lord Jesus was the ultimate origin of a tradition that reached Paul in reliable form through other apostles, or that Jesus was the immediate source of the tradition. The prep. does not tend to either possible interpretation, although "received" (paralambanō, → lambanō, 3284) and "passed on" (paradidōmi, see 4140) were technical terms for the transmission of tradition.

(b) The typical Gk. prep. for personal agency is hypo (by, → 5679). When apo is used for agency, it generally denotes less immediate and indirect causation (though this nuance cannot be pressed in all cases). In such cases apo may be rendered "at the hands of" (e.g., 2 Cor. 7:13), "by the will of" (e.g., Rev. 12:6), or "as a result of " (9:18). This is esp. relevant in Jas. 1:13a, where a view is expressed of God as the ultimate cause of temptation but not directly as the tempter. James begins by stating: "Let nobody say when he is tempted, 'I am being tempted by circumstances and influences that come from God or are permitted by him.'" However, the following rebuttal of this sentiment (lit., "he himself tempts no one," 1:13c) shows that a direct divine temptation is also in mind.

(c) Heb. 5:7 says that Jesus offered up fervent prayers during his time on earth and he "was heard because of [apo] his reverent submission [eulabeia]." apo here could mean that Jesus was heard and thus delivered from an anxious dread (of death), but most likely apo here is causal (cf. the use of eulabeia [fear, awe; → 2325] in 12:28 and the related vb. eulabeomai in 11:7).

(d) The remarkable phrase in Rev. 1:4 ("peace to you from him who is, and who was, and who is to come"), where the words after apo are in the nom. rather than the gen., has been given various explanations: e.g., the result of the seer's reverence for the divine name, a paraphrase of the indeclinable tetragrammaton YHWH ("he who is"), and a nom. apposition originally preceded by four dots standing for the tetragrammaton.

ἀποδίδωμι (apodidōmi), give away, give up, give back, sell, give back what is due, recompense (625); ἀνταποδίδωμι (antapodidōmi), give back, repay, return, requite, pay back in his own coin (500); ἀνταπόδοσις (antapodosis), repaying, reward, recompense (502); ἀνταπόδομα (antapodoma), repayment, requital, recompense (501).

CL & OT 1. In. cl. Gk. apodidōmi means primarily to give up, render, give back. In the mid. it means to sell. Hence it acquired the specific meaning of giving something up that one must give up because of an obligation (thus, to pay out a wage). This gives the word the technical sense to render, requite, in both good and bad senses. antapodidōmi and its derivatives express this meaning of the word in the Hel. period.

2. (a) In the OT act and consequence are linked like cause and effect, such as sowing and harvest (e.g., Job 4:8; Prov. 22:8; cf. Gal. 6:7–9). The idea of a personal judge and recompenser is present here insofar as God is the one who maintains this order and allows an action to return upon a doer (cf. 1 Sam. 26:23–24; 2 Sam. 16:8). Thus, he avenges wrongdoing (Jer. 15:15). The most important Heb. term for recompense is šālam in the piel, which means to restore, repay, pay damages (cf. Exod. 22). In legal usage it means to requite, because the judge repays a claim that a person has earned by action either on the good side (reward) or on the bad (punishment; see esp. Prov. 19:17; cf. 2 Sam. 3:39; Ps. 62:12; Jer. 25:14; 50:29).

(b) The idea of recompense is found first and foremost in the negative sense of God's punishment for the disobedience of Israel as a nation. (Ezekiel was the first to declare that no individual will die on account of another's sin; Ezek. 18.) God punishes his people for their unfaithfulness to the covenant between him and his people. The Deuteronomic History (Jdg.–2 Ki.; cf. Deut. 28) finds in the recompense of God the key to understanding the history of Israel (cf. esp. Jdg. 2:6–23).

3. The OT regarded fellowship with God as a free gift, which had come to the people by grace in their deliverance from Egypt and the bestowal of the land of Canaan. But in the intertestamental period the idea of recompense came to be related exclusively to the Jewish law. The latter was no longer anchored in the historic event of the old covenant; it was no longer a set of instructions on how to remain within the grace of the covenant. It became an absolute norm, according to which each person's actions were assessed and by means of which one hoped to attain to salvation (which is seen as other-worldly and future). Recompense was now not simply the punishment of faithlessness and apostasy; it also determined who has succeeded in reaching the height of fellowship with God through personal good works. This legalistic understanding of recompense leads the LXX to translate the Heb. equivalents into the legal terms antapodidōmi, to requite, and antapodoma, requital.

NT 1. In the NT apodidōmi occurs 48x. The whole range of the word is represented: to hand over (Matt. 27:58), give or pay back (Matt. 18:23–34; Lk. 4:20), sell (Acts 5:8, mid.), pay what has been agreed (Matt. 20:8), perform what one has sworn to do (5:33), and then esp. to forgive. antapodidōmi (7x) fits into the same pattern; it emphasizes the character of what is given in return. antapodoma and antapodosis are used in reference to the divine recompense (Rom. 11:9; cf. Lk. 14:12) at the final judgment (Col. 3:24).

2. apodidōmi has its home in the NT expectation of judgment and punishment. The NT concept of recompense can best be illustrated from Mk. 8:38: "If anyone is ashamed of me and my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of man will be ashamed of him when he comes in his Father's glory with the holy angels." As in the OT, what determines our fate on the last day is our attitude to the Lord (i.e., Jesus Christ). This is the meaning of the parable of the last judgment in Matt. 25:31–46. (Note, of course, that this attitude is expressed in our relationships with our neighbors.) The decisive factor is whether we are true to Jesus and his word, whether we confess him or reject him (cf. Heb. 10:26–30). The NT, like the OT, thinks in terms of a covenant already established and expects recompense to operate against those who withdraw from Jesus Christ.

3. This gives us the background of the NT use of apodidōmi. All people are responsible to the heavenly judge, whether they are Christians or unbelievers (Rom. 2:6; cf. 1 Cor. 3:13–15; 2 Cor. 5:10). apodidōmi does not imply an evaluation of human works on the basis of some inherent moral worth in the works themselves (Matt. 16:27; Rom. 2:6; 2 Tim. 4:14; Rev. 22:12). The works are rather the expression either of opposition to Christ (and subsequent rejection) or of allegiance to him and to the new covenant.

Esp. instructive is Rev. 20:11–15. All are judged according to their works as recorded in books (v. 12). When it comes to the book of life (vv. 12, 15), however, the pattern of recompense is no longer carried through consistently. Believers are withdrawn from the judgment. Through election they have a righteousness that leads to life. For them the recompense consists of the "inheritance" God gives (cf. Col. 3:24). Since recompense comes with final judgment, Christians are forbidden to take vengeance in the present age (Rom. 12:17; 1 Pet. 3:9; cf. 1 Thess. 5:15).

ἀποκαλύπτω (apokalyptō), uncover, disclose, reveal (636); ἀποκάλυψις (apokalypsis), disclosure, revelation (637).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the vb. apokalyptō, unveil, denotes the disclosure of previously hidden things; the noun apokalypsis, disclosure, revelation, is only used from the 1st cent. B.C. on, predominantly in a religious sense. The religious and theological use of both words is rare in the Gk.-Hel. world. There is no sense in secular Gk. of revelation in the NT sense of the word. God has not left himself without a witness among the heathen (Acts 14:17), but even if they had the ability to recognize an invisible power and godhead from the works of God, they have perverted this knowledge through worship of idols (Rom. 1:18–23). If there is a reality behind heathen idol worship, it is the reality of demonic powers (1 Cor. 10:20).

2. (a) The noun apokalypsis occurs in the LXX only in 1 Sam. 20:30 for ʿerwâ, nakedness, and 3x without Heb. equivalent (Sir.11:27; 22:22; 42:1). The vb. apokalyptō (80x) almost without exception represents forms of the Heb. vb. gālâ, in particular the niph., to strip, and piel, expose, uncover. In Gen. 8:13, it is used of removing the roof of the ark; elsewhere it often refers to the exposure of the otherwise covered sex organs for the purpose of sexual union (e.g., Lev. 18:6–19). The goal of the uncovering is thus not distant observation, but entrance to the most intense form of encounter that can involve an individual. This picture was most notably taken up by Ezek. in order to characterize Israel's guilty and corrupt state (e.g., 13:14; 16:36–37, 57).

In a fig. but still everyday use, apokalyptō means to reveal, make known. It is thus used of human speech in Jos. 2:20; 1 Sam. 20:2, 13; 22:8, 17; and of human plans in 1 Macc. 7:31. The noun apokalypsis is used in Sir. 22:22 and 42:1 in a secular sense for the revelation or publication of secrets. Perhaps there is theological significance in 11:27; at the end of one's life "one's deeds are revealed." Here the thought may be of God's judgment.

(b) apokalyptō is found relatively rarely in the LXX with a theological significance. In the story of Balaam's prophetic experience (Num. 22:31; 24:4, 16), God opened the prophet's inner eye and presented him with a true view of reality that did not accord with the wishes of Balak, who wanted him to curse Israel. God gave Balaam knowledge of the Most High so that he could hear and speak his word. In a time when revelations were rare, God revealed himself to Samuel (1 Sam. 3:1, 7); Samuel's prophetic authority is grounded in a series of further revelations (3:21). In 9:15 and 2 Sam. 7:27, Samuel and David are able to hear God's instructions and promises. "Open my eyes that I may see wonderful things in your law," prays the psalmist (Ps. 119:18). To his servants the prophets, God reveals his divine plan (Amos 3:7; for additional aspects of God's revealing, see Ps. 98:2; Isa. 52:10; 53:1; Sir. 1:6).

3. (a) For most of Jud. at the time of Jesus the content of divine revelation was set down in Scripture. New prophecy was extinct. Consequently the apokalyptō word group rarely occurs in Jud. apart from the LXX. There were the ideas that the Messiah would give a new exposition of the law and that he would give a new Torah. The Dead Sea Scrolls, however, indicate that there were Jewish circles with a continuing consciousness of prophetic revelation and illumination (e.g., 1QH 1:21; 5:9; 6:4).

(b) In this connection, Jewish apocalyptic lit. describes how God had entrusted holy men of antiquity with revelations of the last things, the coming of the Messiah and his kingdom, the resurrection of the dead, the judgment, and so on. Determinative for such apocalyptic thought is the contrast between the two worlds, the present age and the age to come. Linked with assertions concerning the future are all kinds of portrayals of the heavenly world and speculations about the constellations and the course of history. It is also a typical apocalyptic motif for an angel to appear as a mediator of revelation. Apocalyptic lit. also penetrated into early Christianity.

NT 1. apokalyptō occurs 26x in the NT, and apokalypsis 18x. Most of these are in Paul's writings (cf. also Matt., Lk., 1 Pet., and Rev.). The noun always has theological significance; the vb. is found in Lk. 2:35 in an everyday sense (of thoughts being revealed). On the borderline of secular-theological usage is the aphorism of Matt. 10:26: "There is nothing concealed that will not be disclosed" (cf. Mk. 4:22, where phaneroō is used as a synonym; Lk. 8:17 uses phaneros; → epiphaneia, appearance, 2211). By contrast with the LXX, the prevailing significance of apokalyptō in the NT is religious and theological.

2. A theological understanding of the NT revelation is first orientated around the content and only secondarily around the act and event of the revelation. Nevertheless, the latter must also be considered. As in the OT eyes and ears were opened by God, so in the NT there is a becoming visible, an appearance of God or Christ (2 Tim. 1:10; Tit. 2:11; 3:4) or a speaking by God (Heb. 1:1–2). God's revelation must become perceptible in the earthly world. In accordance with this, the apostles preach what they have heard and seen and have even touched with their hands (Acts 4:20; 1 Jn. 1:1).

The content of this seeing is Jesus Christ, the Word become flesh, the Word of life (Jn. 1:14; 1 Jn. 1:1). The disciples are called blessed because they have been allowed to hear and see what was denied to many prophets, what the righteous longed for, and what angels themselves long to see (Matt. 13:16; Lk. 10:23–24; 1 Pet. 1:12). To hear and see in this way, and in faith to perceive the glory of God (Jn. 11:40), are distinguished from the hearing and seeing of unbelief, which in truth is no hearing or seeing at all (in this connection Isa. 6:9–10 is cited 6x in the NT: Matt. 13:13–15; Mk. 4:12; Lk. 8:10; Jn. 12:39–41; Acts 28:26–27; Rom. 11:8).

The knowledge of a new revelation of God surpassing the previous one is characteristic of the attitude of faith of NT Christians. The earlier revelation given to the prophets is a pointer to Christ and the gospel (Rom. 1:2; 1 Pet. 1:11–12). But when unbelieving Jews read the OT, a veil lies over their hearts, which can only be removed when they are converted to Christ (2 Cor. 3:14–16).

3. (a) In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus is the bearer of divine revelation. Simeon describes Jesus as "a light for revelation to the Gentiles" (Lk. 2:32; cf. Isa. 42:6). Jesus further confronts us as revealer in the words of Matt. 11:25–27, where he praises the Father and Lord of the world for giving his revelation not to the wise and understanding but to babes. Knowledge of God through the old covenant has been surpassed; thus it can be regarded as only the first step towards the knowledge that the revelation of Jesus mediates.

(b) Although in Jn.'s Gospel the noun is lacking and the vb. occurs only in 12:38 (in a quotation of Isa. 53:1), the theme that Jesus is the mediator of the divine revelation is expounded even more powerfully than in the Synoptics (the word "to reveal" is primarily phaneroō [e.g., 1:31; 2:11; 3:21; cf. 1 Jn. 1:2; 2:19, 28]). He is the only Son who has made the Father known (Jn. 1:18), and he speaks what he has heard from his Father (3:32; 8:26; 15:15).

(c) The central content of the revelation is Christ himself. The Father in heaven revealed to Peter who Jesus is—"this was not revealed ... by man" (Matt. 16:17). The disciples are to declare openly what has been revealed to them and what Jesus has said to them (10:26–27). Thus, in the disciples' preaching the event of revelation is continued: The one who hears the disciples hears Jesus himself (Lk. 10:16). In Jn.'s Gospel Jesus promises his disciples the Spirit of truth, who will teach them everything and lead them into the full truth (Jn. 14:26; 15:26; 16:13).

4. (a) This foregoing is important for understanding Paul. He, too, is aware of himself as a bearer of divine revelation. He stresses that Christ works and speaks through him (Rom. 15:18; 2 Cor. 13:3). From Christ Paul received his apostolic commission (Rom. 1:5), which is grounded in the fact that he has seen the resurrected Lord (1 Cor. 9:1; 15:8). Thereby he belongs to the circle of Easter witnesses and apostles (15:11).

The authority with which Paul attacks the heresy threatening the Galatians is founded on the revelation of the resurrected Christ. He insists that he did not receive his gospel from other humans, but God revealed (apokalyptō) his Son in him (Gal. 1:16). To the Thessalonians Paul stresses that the gospel they received from him is "not ... the word of men, but ... the word of God" (1 Thess. 2:13). In 1 Cor. 2:10 the Holy Spirit appears as the author of what "God has revealed" to the apostle (cf. also Rom. 16:25; Eph. 3:5). The NT does not draw a distinction between the message of Jesus and the apostolic message, as if only the former is a revelation of God's word (cf. Lk. 5:1; 8:21 with 1 Cor. 14:26; Col. 1:25). That is, early Christianity accepted both the words of Jesus transmitted in the Gospels and the apostolic writings into the canon and gave both recognition as divine revelation.

(b) The word apokalypsis is not confined in Paul to the foundation message of Christ. In Gal. 2:2 Paul reports that he traveled to Jerusalem to the apostolic council on the basis of a "revelation"; i.e., he undertook the journey on the basis of divine direction, although we are not given any more exact details of the way he received it. In 2 Cor. 12:1–7 (cf. also 1 Cor. 14:6) Paul refers to his own "visions and revelations." In this connection he also mentions the word that the exalted Lord spoke to him: "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. 12:9).

Still, however important these revelations were for the apostle's personal faith and life, we must distinguish them from the basic revelation of Christ. Such a revelation can be shared by other Spirit-filled Christians (1 Cor. 14:26, 30; Phil. 3:15). This explains Paul's prayer that God might give the Ephesians "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation" (Eph. 1:17). For the Spirit who guides the disciples into all truth opens up the understanding of revelation that is given them in the words of Jesus and of the apostles (cf. 2:18; also Jn. 16:13).

(c) Alongside the revelation through words stands revelation through God's acts. Paul is thinking of this when he speaks, from the standpoint of a man imprisoned under the law, of the message of faith that is to be revealed. The thought there is not only of the message itself but also of its content, the salvation event in Christ (Gal. 3:23). In the gospel is disclosed God's great gift of salvation—the "righteousness of God," through which sinners are justified (Rom. 1:17; 3:21).

This revelation, of course, contrasts with another: the revelation of God's wrath, which falls on sinful humanity and allows it to sink even deeper into sin (Rom. 1:18–32; cf. 2:5). This revelation is anticipated by the gospel and the cross of Christ, which show both God's love for sinners and his enmity against sin. In 1 Cor. 3:13 Paul speaks of the purifying fire that will be revealed on the day of the Lord. Preceding that day (2 Thess. 2:2), however, will be the revelation of the anti-Christian power that seizes control of the sanctuary of God, which the Lord will then destroy (2:3, 6, 8).

This advent is the day when "our Lord Jesus Christ [will be] revealed," when he appears in the fullness of his power (1 Cor. 1:7; 2 Thess. 1:7). With it is linked the revelation of the sons of God in their heavenly glory, which will cause them to forget the sufferings of the time (Rom. 8:18–19). Whenever Peter uses the apokalyptō word group (apart from 1 Pet. 1:12), he has this end revelation in view. The revelation of Christ is the revelation of his glory, in which Christians who are now led through suffering and manifold temptations will also have a share. They should therefore set all their hope on this salvation and grace (1:5–9, 13; 4:13; 5:1).

Such an apokalypsis is also the great theme of Rev. (cf. 1:1), which ends its vision of the future with the prayer: "Amen. Come, Lord Jesus" (22:20). The hope of this eternal future is a part of the Christian belief in revelation that cannot be surrendered.

638 ἀποκαραδοκία

ἀποκαραδοκία (apokaradokia), eager expectation (638); ἐκδέχομαι (ekdechomai), expect, wait for (1683); ἐκδοχή (ekdochē), expectation (1693); ἀπεκδέχομαι (apekdechomai), wait, wait eagerly (587); προσδέχομαι (prosdechomai), receive, welcome (4657); προσδοκάω (prosdokaō), wait for, look for, expect (4659); προσδοκία (prosdokia), expectation (4660).

CL & OT apokaradokia does not occur in pre-Christian Gk., but the simple vb. karadokeō (wait for) does. With the prefix apo- the vb. suggests to anticipate something longingly but anxiously. For more on the root dechomai, to accept, → 1312.

NT 1. apokaradokia only occurs 2x in the NT. In Phil. 1:20 Paul expresses eager expectation that Christ will be exalted in him. Rom. 8:19 ascribes to creation an intense longing for the revelation of God's children, who alone know that the creation has been subjected to decay "in hope" (→ elpis, 1828). Hope does not remove the tension from apokaradokia, but it frees it from fear and uncertainty. By contrast, ekdochē (Heb. 10:27–28) and prosdokia (Lk. 21:26; Acts 12:11–12) are only used of fearful anticipation.

2. (a) ekdechomai means await, wait for. It occurs 6x, of which three refer to ordinary waiting (Acts 17:16; 1 Cor. 11:33; 16:11) and one has a fig. use (Jas. 5:7, of the farmer who waits for the fruit of the fields). The other two refer to eschatological waiting (Heb. 10:13; 11:10): Christ, seated at the right hand of the Father, is waiting for the moment when his enemies will be made his footstool (cf. Ps. 110:1); Abraham was waiting for the city with sure foundations (a picture of heaven as a world of blessedness and perfect communion with God).

(b) apekdechomai (8x) means to wait eagerly for something. That expectation is directed toward the returning Lord (Phil. 3:20), who will transform our bodies; toward our entry into the full riches of sonship through the resurrection of the body (Rom. 8:23); and toward righteousness in the last judgment (Gal. 5:5). Since human and nonhuman creation share equally in the effects of the fall and in salvation, creation's anticipation of freedom from the curse of death is directed toward the time when God's children will enter into glory (Rom. 8:19). Aware of the nature of hope (8:24), they wait in patient endurance while suffering in the present age (v. 25).

(c) prosdechomai refers either to persons (meaning to admit someone to a place or into a community) or to things (meaning to accept something). This vb. occurs 14x in the NT and means mostly to wait. Where it refers to expectations of faith it denotes the messianic expectation of Israel (of Simeon and Anna in Lk. 2:25, 38, who were waiting for the salvation of Jerusalem) and the eschatological goal of salvation (resurrection, Acts 24:15; mercy in the judgment, Jude 21; the incomparable glory that will come with the epiphany, Tit. 2:13).

3. prosdokaō, to wait, look for someone or something, occurs 16x. In Matt. 11:3 it appears in the Baptist's question about the expected Messiah. In 24:50 it is used of Jesus' Parousia, which will come unexpectedly. In 2 Pet. 3:13 prosdokaō identifies the goal of expectation as "a new heaven and a new earth, the home of righteousness," and in 3:12 as the arrival of "the day of God." Those who wait "speed its coming" through their holy conduct (3:11–12).

640 ἀποκατάστασις

ἀποκατάστασις (apokatastasis), restoration (640); ἀποκαθίστημι (apokathistēmi), reestablish, restore (635).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the vb. apokathistēmi meant originally to restore to a previous state, then generally to restore. In a literal and nonreligious context, it was used for giving back something lent or the restoration of a sick person; later, more generally, the renewing of the world. apokatastasis, derived from the vb., means the reestablishment of a former state, restoration. Here again it occurs chiefly in secular contexts, such as the improvement of a road or the reconstitution of a city's affairs.

(b) These words developed a specialized use in connection with astronomical and cosmological speculation in the Hel. age. Ancient, and esp. Stoic, thought imagined the course of the universe in terms of an infinite series of cyclical cosmic periods, of which the apokatastasis was always the final stage of the old period and the point at which the new one began. In Stoicism and the Hermetic literature, the concept of apokatastasis could be associated with political expectations. The neo-Platonism of the post-Christian era applied this concept anthropologically to the soul of an individual—the repeated entry of the immortal soul into the mortal body through reincarnation, with a view to being cleansed from matter and reattaining its original condition.

2. Only the vb. is found in the LXX, usually to translate the root šûb: in the qal meaning to turn back, return; in the piel to bring back; and most frequently hiph. to bring back, restore. In nonreligious contexts apokathistēmi takes on a wide range of meanings: e.g., Abraham paying money to Ephron (Gen. 23:16), a stone being rolled from the mouth of a well (29:3), a man being reinstated in his office (41:13), and water flowing back (Exod. 14:26–27).

2. More important is the use of the word in the prophets. While apokathistēmi is found but rarely in the preaching of the early prophets (e.g., Hos. 2:3; 11:11; Amos 5:15), it has a special theological significance in the announcement of eschatological salvation in exilic and postexilic prophecy. Yahweh will bring Israel back from exile into his own land (Jer. 16:15; 23:8; 24:6). Ezekiel draws a parallel between the restoration of Israel and her beginnings (16:55), and Mal. 4:6 prophesies of a returned Elijah who will turn the hearts of fathers and sons toward each other again. Thus in the LXX, apokathistēmi becomes more and more the term for the eschatological, and in part messianic, hopes of Israel for restoration of her former state.

3. This tendency grew stronger in the last few centuries B.C. Here apokathistēmi acquires at times a specifically political character. In Dan. 4:33–34 it is used of Nebuchadnezzar's recovery of power and dominion, while 1 Macc. 15:3 speaks of the plans of Antiochus VII to regain control of the kingdom of "our fathers" and to reestablish the former state of affairs. Josephus used apokatastasis in describing the return of the Jews from exile, while Philo linked this idea with the mystical one of the restoration of the soul.

NT 1. In the NT the vb. is found 8x (mostly in the Synoptic Gospels). (a) In Mk. 3:5 (par. Matt. 12:13; Lk. 6:10) and Mk. 8:25 the original nonreligious meaning of apokathistēmi is found in connection with the healing of the sick: a hand or a blind man's sight is restored, i.e., healed. Note also Heb. 13:19 ("so that I may be restored to you soon," i.e., that I may come to you soon), which also goes back to ordinary Gk. usage.

(b) Mk. 9:12 (par. Matt. 17:11) alludes to Mal. 4:5–6. In his discussion with his disciples about the Messiah, Jesus counters their political messianic hopes, which center on the figure of a revived Elijah who "restores all things," by referring to the fate of the Son of Man, who "must suffer much and be rejected." Thus, the Jewish political Messiah associated with apokathistēmi is transformed into the doctrine of the suffering Son of Man, so this meaning of the vb. recedes.

A similar tendency may be seen in Acts 1:6–8. To the question of the disciples, still conceived in terms of a political Messiah, "Are you at this time going to restore the kingdom to Israel?" Jesus replies by forbidding reckoning and calculation and points to the promised gift of the Spirit. In other words, in the era of the church it is not political control that matters, but the interim kingdom of the Spirit and of power.

2. (a) apokatastasis occurs only once in the NT, in Peter's sermon from the temple portico (Acts 3:21). He calls on the people to repent so that their sins may be blotted out and that God may send Christ back to them: "He must remain in heaven until the time comes for God to restore everything, as he promised long ago through his holy prophets." This sentence accords with the eschatological messianic hope of OT prophecy and Judaism. The restoration of all things does not mean the conversion of all humanity, but the universal renewal of the earth. It emphasizes the objective side of the coming age, the permanent condition of a renewed world.

(b) In the early church Origen used Acts 3:21 as the basis for a theory of the Apokatastasis, i.e., the doctrine of the restoration of all created things. Central to this is the view that God's work of salvation has as its aim the removal of all the disorder in creation that has resulted from sin, i.e., the medical, political, and cosmic restoration of all created things to the harmony of one, all-embracing order of being. In the history of Christian thought, this thinking has led to universalism, though evangelical Christianity has never accepted universal salvation as a teaching of the Scriptures.

ἀποκτείνω (apokteinō), kill (650); τελευτάω (teleutaō), come to an end, die (5462); τελευτή (teleutē), end, euphemism for death (5463).

CL & OT 1. apokteinō in cl. Gk. expresses any kind of violent ending to one's life. It can thus mean kill, have put to death, murder, and execute. teleutaō originally had the general meaning of bring to an end (e.g., one's work), come to an end; hence also die.

2. apokteinō is found over 150x in the LXX. It refers to homicide (Gen. 4:8), penal execution (Exod. 32:27), or the carrying out of mass killing in a holy war (Num. 31:7–8; 1 Sam. 15:3). It also occurs in prophetic visions of judgment (Amos 4:10; 9:1; Ezek. 23:10). teleutaō means simply die, with no distinction as to whether the death is from natural causes (e.g., Exod. 1:6) or is sudden and violent (19:12; 21:16–17; Amos 9:10).

NT 1. apokteinō, kill, occurs 74x in the NT, especially in the four Gospels. The vb. nearly always refers to the violent killing of God's messengers, whether in direct narrative (Matt. 14:5; cf. Mk. 6:19), in parables (Mk. 12:5–8 par; cf. Matt. 23:37 par.), or prophetically with reference to the disciples (Matt. 24:9). Its use in the three Synoptic passion predictions (Mk. 8:31; 9:31; 10:34; par.) is of central significance; the person who is to be killed is the Son (cf. 1 Thess. 2:15). In Jn. apokteinō is usually combined with zēteō, seek, or bouleuō, plan (e.g., Jn. 7:1, 19–25; 11:53).

Jesus' followers also come within the scope of the threat of being killed (Acts 21:31; 23:12–14). This is indicated especially in Rev. 6:11 (cf. also 11:7), though the vb. is used in this book more often of the execution of God's judgment (see 6:8; 9:15–18; 19:21). Metaphorically, Eph. 2:16 declares that by his death Jesus has "killed" the hostility between Jew and Gentile and thus brought about reconciliation. In Rom. 7:11 sin as a power is said to kill a person by means of the commandment. In 2 Cor. 3:6 the meaning is the same: gramma, letter, is said to kill in contrast to the life-giving Spirit.

2. The noun teleutē occurs only in Matt. 2:15 for the death of Herod. teleutaō is used 11x in the NT (3x in OT quotations: Matt. 15:4; Mk. 7:10; 9:48). In Matt. 9:18 and Jn. 11:39 it refers to dead persons who are raised to life by Jesus; the vb. is used in order to emphasize that Jairus's daughter and Lazarus have really died. The vb. is also used of the death of Herod (Matt. 2:19), in the parable of the seven brothers who died (22:25), and in historical allusions to the deaths of David, Jacob, and Joseph (Acts 2:29; 7:15; Heb. 11:22). The dominant word for die in the NT, however, is apothnēskō (→ thanatos, 2505).

664 ἀπολογέομαι

ἀπολογέομαι (apologeomai), defend, make defense (664); ἀπολογία (apologia), defense (665).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. these words are used primarily in a legal setting, where one defends oneself in a court of law against specific charges. A speech of defense is called an apologia. apologeomai is used in Jer. 12:1 for the prophet as he brings a case before the Lord. In 31:6 (= LXX 38:6) the vb. denotes the watchmen who cry out on the hills of Ephraim. The noun does not occur in the OT (but cf. Wis. 6:10).

NT 1. apologeomai occurs 10x in the NT, apologia 8x. The predominant meaning is legal, esp. in the defenses Paul makes after his arrest in Jerusalem (vb.: Acts 24:10; 25:8; 26:1–2, 24; noun: 22:1; 25:16; cf. 2 Tim. 4:16). In Phil. 1:7, 16, Paul indicates how the judicial process became an opportunity for him to preach the gospel.

2. Paul also uses this word group in his struggle to defend himself before the Corinthians, who were siding with his opponents and against the apostle (1 Cor. 9:3; 2 Cor. 12:19).

3. Christians should always be ready to defend their faith against any who oppose it or even just inquire about it (1 Pet. 3:15). In a legal setting, Jesus indicates that his followers may have to defend themselves before kings and judges; yet they do not need to worry, since words will be given to them by himself (Lk. 21:14) or by his Spirit (12:11).

ἀποστάσιον (apostasion), decree of divorce (687); ἀπολύω (apolyō), set free (668).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. apolyō means set free, release, free from; it can be used of releasing prisoners or freeing a person from legal charges. It also means dismiss, occasionally used of dismissing a wife. apostasion refers to the relinquishment of a property upon sale.

2. Both words are rare in the LXX. apolyō is used in a variety of senses, including divorce (1 Esd. 9:36). apostasion occurs 4x with reference to a deed of divorce (Deut.

24:1, 3; Isa. 50:1; Jer. 3:8). OT law allowed divorce if a man found "something indecent" in his wife, but forbade it to a man who had been compelled to marry a girl whom he had raped (Deut. 22:28–29). The penalty for a wife who was discovered not to be a virgin was death (22:13–21), and the penalty for both partners in a case of adultery was death (22:22). In general divorce was frowned upon, but cases did occur (Mal. 2:14–16). After the exile Jewish men who had married foreign wives were required to put them away (Ezr. 9–10; Neh. 13:23–27).

NT 1. In the NT apolyō has the cl. Gk. meaning release a prisoner (Mk. 15:6–15 par.; cf. Matt. 18:27); set free from disease (Lk. 13:12); acquit (6:37); send people away (Mk. 6:36, 45; 8:3, 9); dismiss from the duties of life, allow to die (Lk. 2:29). It is esp. used of divorcing a wife (Matt. 1:19; 5:31–32; 19:3, 7–9; Mk. 10:2, 4, 11–12; Lk. 16:18). apostasion means divorce (Matt. 5:31; 19:7; Mk. 10:4).

2. Divorce was an accepted fact of life in NT times. A husband was at liberty to put away his wife, provided that he followed the proper legal process of granting her a notice of divorce. But the grounds on which a husband might divorce his wife were disputed between the two rab. schools of Shammai and Hillel (teachers in 1st cent. B.C.), who allowed divorce only for adultery or for marital incompatibility, respectively.

The teaching of Jesus in Mk. 10:1–12 affirms that God's purpose in creation was that husband and wife should become one flesh and that divorce is inconsistent with God's will (10:6–9). Jesus admitted that Moses allowed divorce, provided that proper legal forms were followed. But this concession was allowed only "because your hearts were hard" (10:5)—i.e., either because of human obstinacy towards the law of God or in order to bring such obstinacy out into the open. What is not clear is how this teaching should affect the Christian attitude toward legislation in a non-Christian society or how the church should treat Christians involved in divorce (see, however, Jn. 7:53–8:11).

In the ensuing discussion (Mk. 10:11–12), Jesus explains why divorce is wrong by defining it in terms of adultery: A man who divorces his wife and remarries is committing adultery against his first wife. Jesus was going beyond the existing Jewish view of adultery as an offense against a husband. He insists here that the wife is on the same level as a husband. The same principle is applied in 10:12 (cf. Luke 16:18a) to a wife who divorces her husband (as was possible in the Roman world, but not among Jews) and remarries; remarriage after divorce is adultery. Lk. 16:18b stresses that the man who marries a divorcée commits adultery against her first husband, thus stating that the existing Jewish understanding of adultery must be applied to remarriage as well.

Matt. 19:9 agrees with Mk. 10:11 but adds the caveat, "except for marital unfaithfulness" (→ porneuō, 4519). This exception pertains to the issue of remarriage and follows the rule of Shammai by allowing for remarriage only if a wife has been guilty of adultery. An alternative view is that the adultery in question is misconduct on the part of a betrothed woman before the consummation of her marriage, in which case Jewish law demanded that the wedding should not proceed (cf. Matt. 1:18–25; note how Joseph proceeded to marry Mary only upon a divine revelation that she was free from adultery).

A further form of Jesus' teaching appears in Matt. 5:32, where he states that a person who divorces his wife (again, "except for marital unfaithfulness") is responsible for making her and her second husband commit adultery against him.

3. Paul gives a similar teaching. Only after the death of a person's partner is one allowed to remarry (Rom. 7:1–3). He repeats the command of Jesus that husband and wife should not separate from each other; if, however, they do separate, they should not remarry (1 Cor. 7:10–11). In cases where only one partner has become a Christian, the Christian should not regard this as a reason for divorce. (This issue arises perhaps because of a fear that there was something unholy about union between a believer and an unbeliever.) The marriage bond itself is not a cause of defilement, since the unbelieving partner and any children are "sanctified" by the believing partner (7:14). However, if the unbelieving partner seeks a separation, the Christian should allow it. What is not clear is whether in such a case the Christian partner was free to remarry.

ἀποστέλλω (apostellō), send (690); ἐξαποστέλλω (exapostellō), send out (1990); πέμπω (pempō), send (4287); ἀπόστολος (apostolos), envoy, ambassador, apostle (693); ἀποστολή (apostolē), apostleship (692); ψευδαπόστολος (pseudapostolos), false apostle (6013).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. apostellō means send away, send off. Where a delegation for a particular purpose is involved, the cause for sending is often stressed through this word. Since the envoy has full powers and is the personal representative of the one sending him, a close connection is established between the sender and the recipient. The other verb for send, pempō, stresses the mere fact of sending. In popular Stoic philosophy the idea of the envoy's authority to represent his master acquires a religious significance. A Cynic peripatetic teacher considered himself an envoy sent by Zeus. Hence apostellō is also a technical term denoting divine authorization.

(b) apostolos (derived from apostellō) first meant a cargo ship or the fleet sent out. Later it denoted a commander of a naval expedition or a band of colonists sent overseas. In the papyri it could mean an invoice or even a passport. Josephus uses the word for a group sent on a mission. All its usages have two ideas in common: a commission, and being sent overseas.

2. The LXX uses apostellō and exapostellō about 700x, almost exclusively to render šālaḥ, stretch out, send (pempō occurs only 26x). The translators rightly realized that the Heb. vb. does not describe the mere act of sending so much as its essential purpose, the authorization of the messenger (cf. Jos. 1:16; 1 Ki. 5:8; 2 Ki. 19:4). Hence two conclusions may be drawn: (a) The LXX, following the Heb. text, uses apostellō to denote not the institutional appointment of someone to an office, but the authorization of that person to fulfill a particular function or a task that is normally clearly defined. (b) If the sending is linked with a task in the use of apostellō, the stress falls on the sender, that is, the one who gives his authority to the one sent. In the story of Isaiah's call, the messenger is not even named (Isa. 6:8).

3. The Jewish legal institution of the šālîaḥ is important for NT exegesis. What has been said above of the use of apostellō applies equally to the šālîaḥ. The term does not denote a continuing office, but the exercise of a function limited in scope and duration by a definite commission and terminating on its completion. Rab. Jud. in Jesus' time recognized the function of a messenger as the proxy or representative of the one who had given him the commission (cf. 1 Sam. 25:40–41; 2 Sam. 10:4, 6). The šālîaḥ acted with full authority for someone else. The leader in synagogue prayer was the šālîaḥ of the community. Rabbis were sent as representatives of the Sanhedrin for inspections and collections, at home and in the Diaspora.

But these representatives were not missionaries. Jud. in NT times did not know of officially sent out missionaries. Thus, šālîaḥ could not be used of those trying to win others for Judaism. Strangely enough, the word šālîaḥ is not applied to the prophets in spite of Isa. 6:8, though to have done so would have been an easy deduction from their position as messengers. Certain great men of the past (e.g., Moses, Elijah, Ezekiel) are called God's šᵉlûḥîm (pl.) because of the mighty acts performed through them.

NT A. apostellō is used 132x in NT; exapostellō, 13x; pempō occurs as a virtual synonym esp. in Jn. (32x) but also in Lk. and Acts (10x and 11x). John's use of apostellō and pempō side by side without any obvious difference seems to stress the purely functional aspects of the term in contrast to the institutional concepts already being attached to apostolos (see below), and also to underline more strongly the authority of the Lord who sends (cf. Jn. 4:34; 7:16; 14:24 with 5:36; 7:29; 17:21, 25).

B. 1. In contrast to the LXX (which uses the noun apostolos only in 1 Ki. 14:6, where the Lord commissions the prophet Ahijah with a hard message for Jeroboam's wife), the frequent occurrence of this noun in the NT (80x) is striking. It always has the general sense of messenger, and particularly as the fixed designation of a definite office, the primitive apostolate.

(a) With the exceptions of Lk. 11:49 and Acts 14:14, Luke applies apostolos expressly to the Twelve. They had been called by the historical Jesus to their office (Lk. 6:13) and had been with him throughout his ministry from the time of John's baptism. The risen Lord had met them in various appearances (Lk. 24:36–51; Acts 1:3), so they had the best possible knowledge of what Jesus had said. Before the ascension they had received the promise of the Spirit (Acts 1:4) and the command to evangelize (1:8). At Pentecost (Acts 2) they were made bearers of the Spirit, the great authorities of early Christianity who, based in Jerusalem, guarded the true tradition that went back to Jesus.

According to Luke, there could be no other independent authorities beside the apostles. They had to make or confirm every important decision. They commissioned the Seven (6:6), resolved theological disputes (15:1–31), and began the mission to the Gentiles (10:1–11:18). Except in 14:14, Luke never calls Paul an apostle. He clearly did not fulfill the preconditions for the office of an apostle that were fulfilled by the Twelve. According to Luke's account, the gap left in the circle of the Twelve by Judas's betrayal was closed by the election of Matthias (1:16–28).

(b) It is remarkable that such a fundamental concept as apostolos should appear rarely in the other three Gospels. In Jn. 13:16 apostolos cannot be understood as an office, for here it obviously means no more than messenger. In Matt. 10:2 the term is found at the head of the list of the Twelve before they are sent out (cf. Mk. 3:14), and in Mk. 6:30 they are called by this name when they return. Both remind us of the šālîaḥ concept.

(c) The Pauline letters are the oldest source of information about the technical use of apostolos and apostolē in the NT. The following features and assumptions emerge from Paul's understanding of the office of apostle in his debates with his opponents:

(i) The call and commissioning to lifelong service of an apostle is not through any human being "but by Jesus Christ and God the Father" (Gal. 1:1; cf. Rom. 1:5; 1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1). It comes about through meeting with the risen Lord (1 Cor. 9:1; 15:7; Gal. 1:16), who himself gives his apostle the message of the gospel (1 Cor. 11:23; 2 Cor. 4:6; Gal. 1:12). The apostle delivers it as Christ's "ambassador" (2 Cor. 5:20).

(ii) In contrast with the Jewish šālîaḥ, the call to apostleship is bound with the duty of mission among the Gentiles (Rom. 11:13; cf. 10:15; 1 Cor. 1:17; Gal. 2:8). Presumably the apostles were originally sent out two by two (Gal. 2:1, 9; cf. Mk. 6:7; Lk.

10:1; Acts 15:36–40). Special signs and wonders attend their work (2 Cor. 12:12; cf. Rom. 15:19). Their task is primarily to preach and not to baptize (1 Cor. 1:17).

(iii) Suffering is an inescapable part of the apostle's service (1 Cor. 4:9–13; 15:30–32; 2 Cor. 4:7–12; 11:23–29).

(iv) Like the prophets, apostles have a special insight into the mystery (→ mysterion, 3696) of Christ (1 Cor. 4:1; Eph. 3:1–6).

(v) Paul gives no suggestion that his special position as an apostle exalts him above the church and distinguishes him from the others with spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12:25–28; cf. Eph. 4:11; Rom. 1:11–12). His spiritual gifts are there to fulfill definite functions in the church (→ charis, 5921). His authority is not derived from some special quality within himself (2 Cor. 3:5) but from the gospel itself in its truth and power to convict (Rom. 15:18; 2 Cor. 4:2). That is why Paul takes pains to make it clear when he is giving his own opinion (1 Cor. 7:10, 12).

(vi) Paul met the risen Lord as last of the apostles (1 Cor. 15:8); if we are to take "last of all" absolutely, then there was no possibility of continuing the apostolate by calling others to it.

It is not completely clear whom Paul reckoned as apostles in a technical sense. Paul certainly belonged to their number (affirmed 14x in his letters), as did Peter (Gal. 1:18–19), Junias, Andronicus (Rom. 16:7), and Barnabas (cf. Acts 14:14 with Gal. 2:1, 9, 13). Some doubt whether he considered James, the Lord's brother, to be an apostle, as the ei mē ("only") of Gal. 1:19 is ambiguous. It is uncertain if he included Silvanus (2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1).

At any rate, Paul never applies the title of apostle to the Twelve as a defined group. When Paul calls Titus, Epaphroditus, and others "representatives [lit., apostles] of the churches" in 2 Cor. 8:23 (cf. Phil. 2:25), he is clearly not using apostolos as a technical term for a member of the Christian apostolate. In other words, we cannot be certain whether the characteristics Paul attributes to the apostles are necessarily applicable to the NT apostle as such.

(d) Light is thrown on the question whether we can equate the Twelve with the apostles by the fact that only in Rev. 21:14 are they expressly called that in the other NT writings. In Heb. 3:1 the title is given to Jesus.

(e) It is clear then that, apart from the general meaning of messenger or envoy, two differing concepts lie behind the NT use of apostolos. We must ask the questions: Where did the idea and institution of Christian apostleship come from? When did the Twelve begin to bear the name apostolos? What is the relation between their apostleship and that of Paul? What was the origin of the differing concepts of Paul and Luke? If the circle of apostles in the time of Paul was obviously wider than that of the Twelve, how was the title attributed and even confined to them? These questions may not be answered by questioning the textual accuracy of our sources or by a false harmonization, which may involve the elimination of certain passages from consideration.

2. NT scholars have offered various attempts to trace the sources of the concept of apostleship and the reasons for its varied forms, often by using the results of investigation in the history of religion and in the historic background and development of the period.

(a) For a long time scholarship was dominated by the view that both linguistically and functionally Christian apostleship was derived from the Jewish institution of the šālîaḥ. After a period for hearing and learning, Jesus appointed his disciples as apostles by sending them out and setting them to active work (Matt. 10:1–5; Mk.

6:7–11; Lk. 9:10). In other words, the apostolate was originally not an office but a commission. Later it was renewed and modified by the risen Lord, and the apostles were now called for life as missionaries to an authoritative position as Spirit-empowered witnesses of the resurrection. The apostle Paul forms an exception to this rule, and he felt compelled to establish his apostleship.

But it is impossible to prove exegetically, except perhaps from Luke, that Jesus transmitted the office of apostle to the Twelve, either during his earthly activity or immediately after his resurrection.

(b) A second view claims that the Twelve were instituted as apostles by the historical Jesus but that apostleship was not limited to these men. Paul considered himself as an apostle like the rest; the apostles are essentially the foundation-laying preachers of the gospel. Any limitation of the apostles to the Twelve occurred after Paul's death. But if this is so, how are we to understand the commissioning of the Twelve by the historical Jesus? And was the apostolic circle later limited to the Twelve or transferred to them? Did Paul coin the formula "apostle of Jesus Christ," or did he take it over and become responsible for its establishment as a technical term?

(c) Other scholars see no relationship between the concept of šālîaḥ (which does not even occur before A.D. 140 and is a juridical term) and apostolos (which has a religious connotation, is eschatological in character, is lifelong, and has the missionary charge). Rather, they argue that the notion of apostleship derived from Jewish gnostic circles, where it was used as a title for redeemer figures or heavenly emissaries. Paul developed the title, which was then quite naturally extended to others among the Twelve, as tradition increasingly identified them with the leadership of the Gentile mission. But this view fails to explain why, when the title of apostle came to be applied to the Twelve, all the others who had previously been called apostles lost their status. Moreover, at best Paul came into contact with Gnosticism only late in his life. This view also virtually requires Acts to be dated in the 2nd cent.

(d) Still other scholars suggest, on the one hand, that it is perhaps best to admit a darkness lying over the beginnings of the primitive Christian apostolate. If we take the growth of the canon seriously, we must recognize that the concepts of the apostolate vary in NT writings.

On the other hand, we should note that the missionary commission was an essential part of the primitive Christian apostolate. If we remember that the Twelve were tied to Jerusalem by their eschatological role as representatives of the twelve tribes of Israel, it is unlikely that Jesus, either before or after his resurrection, appointed them as apostles in the sense in which that authoritative office was later understood. How could a circle of disciples with such authority have lost its power by the time of the apostolic council (Acts 15), which contains no reference to "the Twelve"?

The starting point for understanding the technical term apostle must be the meaning of the vb. apostellō. Already in secular Gk. "to send" was used as a technical term for a divine authorization, and its substantive was used, admittedly rarely, with the meaning messenger. Since the Hel. churches most likely would not have understood the concept of the šālîaḥ, the Gentile Christians understood apostolos as a divinely sent messenger. If we consider too that the LXX uses this term for the mission of the prophets, OT prophecy also served as a positive basis for the special concept of apostleship in the early church. If that is so, the early church chose, as it so often did, an unfamiliar word, seldom used in the secular language, with little ready-made content, in order to fill it with one expressing its own conceptions.

Missionaries specially called by the Lord, then, bore this title. It was soon applied to Peter, the only disciple (at least known to us) active in missionary work. Paul was included in this circle because of his special commission from the risen Lord. After his time, when the Twelve became more and more regarded as the only legitimate bearers of the message of Jesus as the Christ and believers became convinced that they had been the initiators of the mission to the Gentiles, the title apostolos (primarily through Luke's influence) was gradually transferred to the whole circle of the Twelve, indicating their role as guarantors of the legitimate tradition.

(e) The above hypotheses (representing, in general, European scholarship) draw a sharp distinction between the picture in Luke–Acts and that in the Pauline writings and other Gospels. Scholars in the English-speaking world, while recognizing Luke's special interests, are less inclined to see such a conflict of attitudes. Luke's neglect to make explicit reference to the "Twelve" at the Jerusalem council (Acts 15) is probably due to his taking their identity for granted in the light of his previous identification of the Twelve as apostles (Lk. 6:12–16; Acts 1:13–26). We should note too the collegiate character of church leadership that Acts consistently depicts (1:13–26; 6:2–6; 8:14–17; 11:1–18; 13:1–4).

Moreover, Acts certainly does not play down the call and commissioning of Paul, which it records no less than 3x (Acts 9:1–19; 22:1–21; 26:2–18). We would hardly expect Paul to be given the title apostolos at his conversion. Nevertheless, the Lord reveals to Ananias that Paul is "my chosen instrument to carry my name before the Gentiles and their kings and before the people of Israel" (9:15), and Luke's account of Paul's words contain the vbs. exapostellō ("Go; I will send you far away to the Gentiles," 22:21) and apostellō ("I am sending you to [the Gentiles] to open their eyes and turn them from darkness to light," 26:17–18). Moreover, in encountering the risen Christ on the Damascus road, Paul fulfilled a basic qualification for apostleship, that of being "a witness . . . of his resurrection" (1:22) (though he did not fulfill the other condition, that of being a follower of Jesus in his earthly ministry). In short, the picture that Acts paints is not that Paul was not an apostle, but that he was an apostle extraordinary, which is precisely what Paul himself says in his letters (1 Cor. 9:1–6; 15:5–9; Gal. 1:12–17).

Moreover, Luke is certainly careful to point out that Paul is equal in power and authority to Peter. Note how every significant event that transpired with Peter in the first half of Acts also transpires with Paul in the second half. Both preach similar messages (2:4–36; 13:16–41), heal a cripple (3:1–10; 14:8–10), appear before Jewish authorities (3:5–21; 22:30–23:10), perform miracles by proxy (5:15; 19:11–12), receive a beating (5:40; 16:22–23), oppose a sorcerer (8:14–24; 13:6–12), heal an older man (9:33–34; 28:7–8), raise a dead person (9:36–42; 20:7–10), receive a vision concerning the Gentile mission (10:9–23; 11:1–18; 22:17–21; 26:13–18), and are miraculously released from prison (12:3–11; 16:22–28). And while Acts presents the Jerusalem apostles as a closely knit body working separately from Paul (e.g., 8:14; 9:27; 15:2; 16:4), it does speak of Paul and Barnabas as "apostles" (14:4, 14).

The difference of emphasis between Luke and the other Evangelists is also less sharp than may appear at first sight. apostolos occurs in Matt. 10:2 (= Lk. 6:13) and Mk. 6:30 (= Lk. 9:10). Luke's Gospel uses the term only 4x more, of which 11:49 may simply mean one sent by God, and the other occasions are patently synonyms for the disciples (17:5 [cf. 17:1]; 22:14; 24:10). The use of the word in all four Gospels appears to be the application of a term familiar at the time of writing but which was not necessarily current at the time when the incidents described happened. All four Gospels give accounts of the call of the disciples (Matt. 10:2–4; Mk. 3:16–19; Lk. 6:13–16 [cf. Acts 1:13]; Jn. 1:35–43). In all four (but especially Matt.) the disciples are called the Twelve. During the earthly ministry of Jesus they figure as learners (→ mathētēs, 3412). And in all four they are sent as witnesses to the risen Christ (Matt. 28:16–20; Mk. 16:7 [cf. 3:14]; Lk. 24:46–49 [cf. Acts 1:8]; Jn. 20:21–23, 30–31; 21:15–19, 24).

Finally, one thing is certain. The NT never betrays any understanding of the apostolate as an institutionalized church office, capable of being passed on. The adoption and transformation of the concept of apostleship by the early church had an important and possibly decisive influence in preventing the disintegration of the witness to Christ and maintaining the continuity of its tradition down to the time when the canon of the NT was fixed. It was due to the office of the apostolate that the link with the crucified and the exalted Lord was preserved.

3. In 2 Cor. 11:13 Paul calls those who oppose his authority and ministry in Corinth "false apostles" (pseudapostolos). Scholars have debated whether these are the same as the "super-apostles" of 11:5, though most tend to agree that they are not. If anything, the "super-apostles" is a somewhat tongue-in-cheek term Paul uses for the original twelve apostles, perhaps because his opponents are using that expression. Paul makes clear that the latter are false apostles, agents of Satan, "masquerading as apostles of Christ."

ἀποστερέω (apostereō), rob, defraud, deprive (691).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. apostereō means refuse to pay a debt or return property or money deposited with another for safekeeping; defraud; become a defaulter; withdraw from a person or thing; in logic, to draw a negative conclusion.

2. In Exod. 21:10 a husband who takes a second wife is warned not to "deprive" the first of food, clothes, or her conjugal rights. Mal. 3:5 threatens judgment against those who "defraud" wage earners.

NT In Mk. 10:19 Jesus quotes the commandment mē aposterēsēs ("do not defraud") to the rich young ruler. Although no OT commandment is written in precisely this way, these words are probably intended to summarize the tenth commandment, for one who covets what belongs to another has in his or her heart already deprived that person of it.

In 1 Cor. 6 Paul censures the Corinthians for engaging in lawsuits with one another before secular courts. As those who should know the law of love and presumably Christ's teaching in Matt. 5:39–48, they ought rather to accept being cheated (1 Cor. 6:7) and certainly not actively defraud others (6:8). Similarly, James assails those who have "failed to pay" their workers (5:4).

Paul uses the verb again in 1 Cor. 7:5. Because a married couple belong to each other, an attempt by one partner to spiritualize the marriage amounts to fraud, a withholding of what is due. Sexual abstention can be lawful only if it is by mutual consent, for a good purpose (prayer is Paul's example), and as a temporary measure. In 1 Tim. 6:3–5 Paul assails those who teach that an outward show of religion can be made a means of gain. Such people are depraved in mind and "robbed of" the truth they once knew.

ἀποτρέπω (apotrepō), mid. turn away from, avoid (706); ἐκτρέπω (ektrepō), pass. turn away from, avoid (1762).

CL & OT 1. Both verbs occur more in cl. Gk. than in biblical Gk. apotrepō is commonly used fig. (in the act. voice) of dissuading, deterring, or diverting a person from a course of action and (in the mid. and pass. voices) of avoiding danger or rejecting truth; ektrepō often denotes a literal turning aside, as of a tributary from a river or a person from a road.

2. apotrepō occurs only in the Apocr, where it refers to such matters as averting reproofs (Sir. 20:29), relinquishing pleasures (4 Macc. 1:33), or diverting people from their intents (3 Macc. 1:23). ektrepō occurs only in Amos 5:8 (God turns darkness into morning).

NT 1. In Heb. 12:13 the author encourages the disheartened to make straight paths for their feet "so that the lame may not be disabled [ektrepō], but rather healed." Minor injuries ("the lame") were to be bound up ("healed"), so that major injuries (such as total disability) would be avoided. In other words, ektrepō here carries its technical medical sense of "disabled" (as in Hippocrates) rather than its general sense of "turn away."

2. In 2 Tim. 3:5b Paul enjoins Timothy (and indirectly the church at Ephesus) to have "nothing to do with" (apotrepō) any persons who are characterized by the vices he lists in 3:2–4, for they have a form of godliness but deny its power (3:5a). Such people are to be denied church membership as much as the quarrelers of 2:23–26.

3. apotrepō in 2 Tim. 3:5 is virtually synonymous with ektrepō in 1 Tim. 6:20, where Timothy is told to "turn away from godless chatter" and the subtle and endless distinctions that belong to "what is falsely called knowledge." Those who give their attention to such matters wander from the faith (6:21).

4. In the remaining three uses of ektrepō in the Pastoral Letters, the idea of doctrinal or ethical deviation is uppermost. As a result of neglecting the Christian triad of love, a good conscience, and sincere faith, the false teachers "have . . . turned to" useless talk (1 Tim. 1:6). Paul warns Timothy that the time is coming when people will find a crowd of teachers to satisfy their craving for novelty; such people reject the truth and "turn aside to myths" (2 Tim. 4:4). Already some widows have become busybodies and gossips (1 Tim. 5:13) and "turned away" to become Satan's servants (5:15)—perhaps an allusion to immorality.

ἅπτω (haptō), to touch (721).

CL & OT 1. In Homer haptō in the act. means to fasten to, take hold of, kindle. It occurs more frequently in the mid. haptomai, to touch, eat (i.e., touch food), attack (i.e., touch with hostility). In cl. Gk. it is used also for sexual relationships with women and can mean as well to seize, attack, concern oneself with, and finally understand. Stories are told how the god of healing, Asclepius, healed miraculously by a touch.

2. (a) Occasionally the LXX uses haptō (more usually haptomai) for touching (or not touching) persons and things that have been made particularly sacred (e.g., the tree of knowledge of good and evil [Gen. 3:3]; Mount Sinai [Exod. 19:12]) or, in contrast, things through which one became unclean (e.g., unclean animals [Lev. 11:8]; corpses [Num. 19:11]; tombs [19:16]). More than external and superficial contact is implied in Gen. 20:6, for the issue there is sexual intimacy. In 2 Sam. 5:8 and Zech. 2:8 haptomai means to kill or attack. (b) An angel touched Jacob's thigh and made him limp (Gen. 32:25); another angel touched Daniel and raised him up from his deep sleep (Dan. 8:18). (c) God himself can touch us, either to change our hearts (1 Sam. 10:26) or to afflict us with illness (2 Ki. 15:5) or distress (Job 19:21).

NT 1. In the NT the act. haptō is found 4x for the lighting of a lamp (Lk. 8:16; 11:33; 15:8) or a fire (Acts 28:2). The mid. haptomai is used of sexual relations in 1 Cor. 7:1, of the touching of unclean foods in Col. 2:21 (cf. Matt. 15:11), and of not touching unclean, idolatrous things in 2 Cor. 6:17 (quoting Isa. 52:11). In Lk. 7:39 we see the difference between Jesus and the crowd, for he does not shrink from the touch of an unclean woman. After his resurrection Jesus forbade Mary to touch him (Jn. 20:17), i.e., to "hold on to" him.

2. (a) The most frequent use of haptomai (30x) is in the Synoptic reports of Jesus' acts of healing. Isa. 6:5–7 was fulfilled in Jesus once for all. The Lord touched a leper so that he blotted out his impurity (Mk. 1:40–42). In healing a deaf man with an impediment in his speech, Jesus put his fingers into his ears, spat, touched his tongue, and said to him, "Ephphatha" (Mk. 7:33–34).

(b) The stories of healing in Mk. 1:41; 3:10–11; 6:56 involve touch. Because the sick realized that "power was coming from [Jesus]" (Lk. 6:19), they pushed forward to touch him (Mk. 3:10), his garment (Matt. 9:20–21; Mk. 5:27–30, Lk. 8:44–45), or even its fringe (Matt. 14:36; Mk. 6:55–56). Those who in faith touched even his clothes became well, for whether they knew it or not they had touched the form of glory and life.

Most notable here is the woman with the bleeding problem. Jesus does not know at first who has touched him, only that power has gone forth from him (Mk. 5:30; Lk. 8:45–46). It should be remembered that a woman's menstrual flow was regarded as a source of uncleanness (Lev. 15:19–24; 2 Sam. 11:4), which precludes sexual intercourse (Lev. 15:19, 24; 18:19; Ezek. 22:10). A discharge of longer duration causes everything the woman touches to be unclean (Lev. 15:25–30). Hence, the woman is not only physically ill but debarred from normal human relationships. She knows that to touch anyone under these circumstances is out of the question, but she acts in true and simple faith. Those who do not believe touch Jesus only superficially (Mk. 5:31) and do not experience his power. Those whom Jesus touches of his own volition share in his divine power (Mk. 9:27), and God himself turns to them.

(c) Also significant in the stories of Jesus are the mothers who bring their children to Jesus so that he may touch them, bless them, and pray over them (Matt. 19:13–15; Mk. 10:13–16; Lk. 18:15–17).

724 ἀπώλεια

ἀπώλεια (apōleia), destruction (724); ἀπόλλυμι (apollymi), destroy (660); Ἀπολλύων (Apollyōn), Apollyon, Destroyer (661).

CL & OT 1. As a trans. vb. apollymi means (a) lose (e.g., father, spouse, courage, life); or (b) annihilate (e.g., a crowd of people in war), destroy, kill. The mid. intrans. form means (a) disappear, get lost, be lost; or (b) die, go to ruin through financial disaster or violence. apōleia means destruction, downfall, annihilation. apollyōn means the destroyer and contains a pun on Apollōn, the god of plagues. The ideas conveyed by this group of words usually involve injury (of a violent nature), destruction, or the end of earthly existence.

2. In the LXX apollymi usually means be lost, perish, or destroy. It can be used of the destruction of a city, a group of people, or a tribe (cf. Num. 16:33; 32:39; 33:52). Of great importance are the requirements of the Holiness Code, which warn transgressors of the law, such as those who make child sacrifices to Molech and those who are sorcerers, that they will be "cut off" by stoning from God's covenant people (Lev. 20:3, 5, 6).

The exhortations at the end of Deut. confront the nation with the alternatives of receiving the blessing of a long life for obedience or the curse of extinction for disobedience (e.g., Deut. 28:20; 30:18). Thus, apōleia involves not only exclusion from belonging to Yahweh, but also destruction and loss of life. Although in most OT writings apōleia is understood in the sense of earthly death, later texts occasionally link the words of this group with hadēs, the underworld (→ 87), and thanatos, death (Prov. 15:11; 27:20; cf. Job 26:6; 28:22, → 2505).

3. Jewish apocalyptic lit. of the intertestamental and NT periods speaks of an eschatological destruction of the world, sometimes conceived in terms of a conflagration. The ungodly will perish along with the world.

NT 1. apollymi occurs 90x and apōleia 18x in the NT. Lk. 15:4, 8 uses apollymi for the losing of a sheep and a coin; similarly, the mid. refers to the state of being lost (15:4, 6, 24, 32). apollymi has the sense of kill, destroy (a person) in Matt. 2:13; 27:20; Mk. 3:6 par.; 9:22; 11:18 par. The vb. has an impers. obj. in Paul's quotation of Isa. 29:14 at 1 Cor. 1:19: "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise." The mid. can also have the sense of die or perish: with reference to things (food in Jn. 6:12, 27; gold in 1 Pet. 1:7; heaven and earth in Heb. 1:11; world in 2 Pet. 3:6), or to people (Matt. 26:52; Mk. 4:38 par.; Lk. 13:3, 5, 33; 1 Cor. 10:9–10). Finally, apōleia usually means ruin, destruction (Matt. 7:13; Rom. 9:22; Phil. 1:28; Rev. 17:8), though occasionally it means waste, squandering (Mk. 14:4 par.).

2. The theological use of these words is prominent in the three parables of Lk. 15, portraying the human condition of being lost. People without God are like lost sheep (cf. Ps. 119:176), doomed to perish unless rescued by the shepherd. Jesus is pictured as this shepherd (cf. Jn. 10:11–16), who has come "to seek and to save what was lost" (Lk. 19:10). He is commanded not to lose those whom the Father has given him (Jn. 6:39; 18:9). Those who endeavor to secure their life by self-effort will lose it, while those who lose it for Christ's sake and the gospel's by giving themselves to him (cf. Matt. 8:19–22; 16:24) will keep it (10:39; Mk. 8:35 par.; Lk. 17:33; Jn. 12:25). For with him is life; "whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life" (Jn. 3:16).

3. The specific theological sense of these words in the NT is brought out by Jn. and Paul. Just as sōtēria (salvation) and zōē aiōnios (eternal life) connote sure and lasting salvation or eternal life (Jn. 10:28), so apollymi and apōleia mean definitive destruction for all eternity (1 Cor. 1:18; cf. 2 Cor. 2:15; 4:3). It is the fate awaiting those who do not come to repentance (2 Pet. 3:9; cf. Matt. 13:3, 5), who reject love of the truth (2 Thess. 2:10), who go on the broad way "that leads to destruction" (Matt. 7:13), or who are enemies of the cross of Christ (Phil. 3:18–19). Judas (Jn. 17:12) and the Antichrist (2 Thess. 2:3) are described as two people "doomed to destruction."

4. Apollyōn (only in Rev. 9:11) is given as a translation of ʾabaddôn (cf. Job 26:6; 28:22; Ps. 88:11; Prov. 15:11). It refers to the angelic king of the underworld, the prince of the scorpions, the Destroyer.

ἀργύριον (argyrion), silver (736); ἄργυρος (argyros), silver (738); ἀργυροῦς (argyrous), made of silver (739); ἀργυροκόπος (argyrokopos), silversmith (737).

CL & OT The Gk. word derives from the adj. argos, shining, white, and occurs first in Homer. While the word denotes anything silver, it often has the significance of money. In the LXX argyrion occurs frequently in the OT, often in connection with gold. Silver was less plentiful in ancient Babylon and Egypt. The Bible mentions it early on as a medium of exchange (Gen. 23:15), and this use predominates in the OT. But it was also used for jewelry (Exod. 3:22; Song 1:11) and was sometimes fashioned into an idol (Jdg. 17:3). Mining for silver is mentioned in Job 28:1, and because it was rarely found in pure form, it regularly needed refining, whereby the dross was burned away in a hot fire and the pure silver remained. The OT refers to this process as symbolic of God's refining process in human hearts, so that he can make them pure and valuable to his service (Ps. 12:6; 66:10; Isa. 48:10; Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:3; cf. Dan. 11:35; 12:10).

NT The NT frequently uses words in this word group. argyrion occurs 20x; argyros, 5x; argyrous, 3x, and argyrokopos, once.

Silver was used far more frequently than gold (→ chrysos, 5996) in the NT world as an exchange of currency. Undoubtedly this was because silver was seen as not worth as much as gold. When Peter and John encountered a crippled man while they were entering the temple, Peter said, "Silver or gold I do not have" (Acts 3:6). Peter did not have money to give to this man, but he did have the power of Jesus to make him walk. Similarly, when Jesus sent out the Twelve on their mini-mission journeys, he instructed them not to take "any gold or silver or copper in your belts" (Matt. 10:9; cf. Lk. 9:3); rather, they were to be dependent on the people with whom they stayed for physical needs. When Judas bargained with the Jewish authorities about a price for betraying Jesus, he was given thirty silver coins (Matt. 26:15; 27:3–9). Note that the NIV translates argyrion as "money" more than half of its occurrences in the NT (e.g., Matt. 25:18, 27; 28:12, 15).

Like gold, silver was also used as a precious metal for a wide variety of purposes, both decorative and religious. It could be used as a commodity in its own right (Rev. 18:12), for valuable articles in one's home (2 Tim. 2:20), and for idols (Acts 17:29; 19:24; Rev. 9:20). In connection with this last item, a riot erupted at Ephesus when the association of silversmiths, led by Demetrius, realized that their business of making silver shrines of the temple to Artemis in Ephesus was suffering because of the success of Paul's preaching of the gospel (Acts 19:23–40).

As with any worldly possession, silver or gold can easily become an object of coveting (Acts 20:33). It has no lasting value; the only thing that makes life worth living is the "precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect," which has redeemed us (1 Pet. 1:18–19). James points out the temporary nature of silver and how it can become "corroded" and thus lose its value (Jas. 5:3). When the apostle Paul uses picturesque language to refer to building fruitful, enduring lives on the foundation of the church, which is Jesus Christ, he talks about using "gold, silver, costly stones," in contrast to those who build with elements that will not stand the test of God's fire of judgment, "wood, hay or straw" (1 Cor. 3:12). This last reference points to the metaphorical use in the Bible of the refining process of silver (see OT, above).

ἀρέσκω (areskō), strive to please, accommodate, please (743); ἀρεστός (arestos), pleasing (744); ἀρεσκεία (areskeia), the desire to please (742); εὐάρεστος (euarestos), acceptable, pleasing (2298); εὐαρεστέω (euaresteō), please (someone), take pleasure in (2297); ἀνθρωπάρεσκος (anthrōpareskos), one who tries to please people (473).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. areskō denotes the pleasure that human beings or the gods derive from something. From the vb. are derived the adjs. arestos, pleasant, euarestos, pleasing, content, and areskeia, pleasure, grace.

2. (a) Formations peculiar to the LXX are euaresteō, find pleasure, be content, and anthrōpareskos, someone who seeks to please people (only in Ps. 53:5, a mistranslation of a Heb. word meaning "he who encamps against you"; it also occurs in Pss. Sol. 4:7, 8, 19).

(b) areskō occurs 60x in the LXX, arestos 33x, as a translation of good, right. The former is often a part of the expression, "It will please God . . ." (Num. 23:27; cf. also Mal. 3:4). A word may be said to please someone, meet with approval—e.g., the king and the assembly (2 Chr. 30:4), the king and his commanders (1 Macc. 6:60).

(c) areskeia is found only in Prov. 31:30; euarestos only in Wis. 4:10; 9:10. The vb. euaresteō occurs 14x, generally for the Heb. word meaning to walk (with God; e.g., Gen. 5:24, where the Heb. stresses that "Enoch walked with God," whereas the LXX says that "Enoch pleased God").

NT 1. In the NT areskō is found 17x (14x in Paul). (a) Paul's use of the vb. 3x in Rom. 15:1–3 is noteworthy. He charges the self-styled "strong" Christian with being concerned about pleasing himself, i.e., being self-centered (15:1); instead everyone should seek to please one's neighbor, to build that person up (15:2). This does not mean pleasing others in the sense of looking for approbation and recognition from them (cf. Eph. 6:6), but doing God's will in the form of loving one's neighbor—esp. a weak fellow believer. The basic direction of Christian conduct is grounded in the attitude of Christ (15:3), who did not live to please himself. Rather, he assumed the attitude of the OT servant of God (Ps. 69:9), who submitted himself in obedience toward God.

(b) areskō in Paul is thus a term that characterizes an attitude to life. He knows this from his own experience. Through his conversion he was freed from concern about pleasing other people, for he stood under the Lord's command. Now, therefore, he seeks to please God and Christ, not human beings (see 1 Thess. 2:4). Aligning himself with Christ and the goal set by him of saving everyone, Paul seeks to "please everybody in every way," that they may be saved (1 Cor. 10:33; cf. also Rom. 12:17–18; 1 Cor. 9:22, though the vb. is not used in these verses). The Christian congregation must also see how they can please God (1 Thess. 4:1).

(c) In 2 Tim. 2:4 Paul adopts the picture of the soldier used elsewhere in Hel. moral teaching (cf. 1 Cor. 9:7; Phil. 2:25; Phlm. 2). A soldier on active service does not get involved in civilian life but aims to please his commanding officer. A believer must therefore not be diverted from his or her work for Christ by concern about earthly welfare. Similarly, the unmarried man who is not tied by marital considerations can direct all his energy into gaining Christ's approbation and recognition (1 Cor. 7:32). On the other hand, "those controlled by the sinful nature cannot please God" (Rom. 8:8). The Jews who put Jesus and the prophets to death "displease God and are hostile to all men" (1 Thess. 2:15).

2. arestos, pleasing, occurs 4x in the NT. In Acts 12:3 the execution of James is said to have been pleasing to the Jews. Elsewhere God is the object of the pleasing. In Acts 6:2 the expression "it would not be right [i.e., before God]" uses this adj. In Jn. 8:29, Jesus says that he always does what pleases God, i.e., what is consonant with his will. Because Christians keep God's commandments and do what pleases him, they receive from him in prayer whatever they ask (1 Jn. 3:22).

3. euarestos, pleasing (8x in Paul and once in Heb.), also has God or Christ as its object (except for Tit. 2:9, though even here, God is in the picture of slaves as they try to please their masters; cf. Eph. 6:6). Children are to obey their parents, because "this pleases the Lord" (Col. 3:20). Paul thanks the Philippians for their gift, which is a "sacrifice, pleasing to God" (Phil. 4:18). The Christians in Rome must offer their bodies as sacrifices, "holy and pleasing to God" (Rom. 12:1; cf. v. 2). Believers exist "to please" God (2 Cor. 5:9). Anyone who serves Christ in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit "is pleasing to God" (Rom. 14:18). Therefore, we must pray that God may work in us through Christ "what is pleasing to him" (Heb. 13:21).

4. euaresteō, please, occurs 3x in Heb. In 11:5–6 the author takes up the Enoch story of Gen. 5:24. Enoch "pleased God" as a believer (cf. comments above about the use of euaresteō in this verse in the LXX); without faith no one can "please God" (11:6). In the Christian life acts of love are "sacrifices" with which "God is pleased" (13:16).

5. areskeia occurs only in Col. 1:10. Paul prays that the Colossians may be filled with the knowledge of God's will and with wisdom so that they may walk worthily of the Lord and "please him in every way."

6. anthrōpareskos occurs only in Paul's rule to slaves (Eph. 6:6; Col. 3:22), who must obey their masters not only to "win their favor," but out of reverence for the Lord.

See also eudokeō, be well pleased, regard favorably, take delight in (2305).

744 (arestos, pleasing), → 743.

ἀρετή (aretē), virtue (746).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. aretē was used with reference to things, animals, human beings, and gods. It could connote the excellent quality of arms or horses. Homer speaks of the aretē of the gods and demonstrations of their power. This religious usage goes into the Hel. period. Usually, however, the reference is to human qualities: e.g., aretē of feet, in fighting, or of the mind. Thus aretē is used of the whole person, of both physical and spiritual abilities. It can describe quality of women or courage of men.

(b) The meaning of aretē as virtue is limited in the case of Socrates, who used it to describe not general human qualities that are outwardly apparent, but inner morality. He made aretē into something based on one's striving for the good and suggested that virtue may be learned.

Plato saw aretē as conditioned by the soul, and in his doctrine of the soul he developed the sequence of the four classic virtues: sophia, wisdom; andreia, courage; sōphrosynē, prudence; and dikaiosynē, justice. This scheme of the four cardinal virtues is taken over by the wisdom lit. and Cicero.

In contrast to the psychology of Plato, Aristotle regarded aretē as the permanent pattern of behavior in a person, depending on one's qualities and decisions. He distinguished between ethical (practical) virtues (e.g., courage, temperance, and generosity) and dianoetic virtues (e.g., insight, wisdom, knowledge, and art). aretē is defined as the mean between two extremes.

The Stoics emphasized the agreement between the virtues and human nature; to live according to nature means to live according to virtue. They serve no outside purpose, such as the interests of the state or of the gods, but are an end in themselves, bringing the goal of happiness.

2. (a) The Heb. language has no word corresponding to aretē. The only places where this word occurs in the canonical books of the LXX are Isa. 42:8, 12; 43:21; 63:7; Hab. 3:3, where it means praise of Yahweh, praiseworthy deed; and Zech. 6:13, where it refers to the majesty of Joshua, the priestly messiah-designate.

(b) aretē is often mentioned in the books of Macc., esp. 4 Macc., where it often means the martyrs' loyalty to the faith, which they kept until death (7:22; 9:8, 18). In 2 Macc. 6:31 the martyrdom of Eleazar is called a memorial of his aretē (cf. 4 Macc. 1:8, 10). At the same time, we find the Gk. concept of aretē as courage (2 Macc. 15:17), manliness (4 Macc. 17:23), cleverness (1:2), or reason (1:30). Gk. influence can be detected also in Wis. 5:13, where virtue is contrasted with wickedness, and in 4:1, where it is linked with immortality. In 8:7 the four Platonic cardinal virtues are named.

NT aretē does not play a crucial part in the vocabulary of the NT, where it appears only 5x. More important are the catalogues of virtues (and vices), in which the virtues of the Christian (and vices of the non-Christian) are spelled out.

1. In 1 Pet. 2:9 and 2 Pet. 1:3 it is God's aretē that is mentioned. Since 1 Pet. 2:9 is a citation of the LXX of Isa. 43:21, the acc. pl. aretas should be rendered as praiseworthy acts. These are to be proclaimed by God's people. More Gk. thought may be recognized in 2 Pet. 1:3–4, which mentions, along with aretē, doxa (glory) and dynamis (power). aretē here means God's attribute of perfection, which through its manifestations of power has granted gifts to us by which we are to become partakers of the divine nature (cf. Matt. 5:48). In the background here is the Gk. idea of the relatedness of divine nature and human nature (cf. also Acts 17:28).

2. Phil. 4:8 and 2 Pet. 1:5 speak of human virtue. In both cases aretē forms part of a series in a comprehensive list of virtues, and both series have parallels in cl. lit. aretē is used here as in 4 Macc. but is a general term for good and correct behavior in Christians.

3. The connection between individual words for various NT virtues and corresponding lists in non-Christian Gk. lit. is indisputable, even though aretē is not used. Note how Paul speaks unreservedly about "what is good" (Rom. 12:9) or about

"whatever is right, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely" (Phil. 4:8) as the goal Christians ought to strive to attain. The earliest church was thus fully aware of good qualities in the heathen and brought conscience (Rom. 2:14) and virtue into its Christian proclamation.

Nevertheless, we should not overlook the differences between Stoic and Christian lists of virtues, or between the Gk. and NT concepts of virtue. The Platonic scheme of the four cardinal virtues does not appear in the NT catalogues. Instead, all the Christian virtues are brought under the main concepts of love (Gal. 5:22; Eph. 4:32–5:2; Col. 3:12) or of faith (Eph. 4:2–5; 2 Pet. 1:5) and are controlled by these. Nor does the NT know the Aristotelian distinction between practical and theoretical virtues. It stresses rather the totality of our actions, both as practical acts and as expressions of obedience.

Finally—and this is of great importance—the Stoic's view of a person being autonomous in one's virtues is foreign to the NT. Here the virtues are the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22–23), subservient to mutual love and the glorification of God. Hence, the NT virtues are seen as gracious gifts of the divine Spirit; they are the actions and the marks of God's new creation.

748 (arēn, lamb), → 303.

749 (arithmeō, to number), → 750.

750 ἀριθμός

ἀριθμός (arithmos), number (750); ἀριθμέω (arithmeō), to number (749).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. arithmos denotes a quantity, total, number, amount (e.g., of gold). It can also mean the assessment of numbers, i.e., count, muster, and then a troop or military unit. Where arithmos is understood as quantity as opposed to quality, it can mean the virtual embodiment of what is worthless (e.g., "number of words" can mean "empty words"). Occasionally arithmos has the sense of code, cipher.

(b) In popular and religious Hel. thought, gematria (the process of encoding a word by adding together the numerical value of its component letters) gained popularity. The decoding of a gematrical number was only possible for the initiated.

2. In the LXX arithmos most commonly means number (e.g., Gen. 34:30; Exod. 16:16). It can also mean measure (Ps. 39:4), sum, or total (Num. 1:49; 1 Chr. 7:5; Isa. 34:2). In 2 Chr. 17:14 it has the idea of enrollment.

2. In rab. and Jewish Hel. literature, gematria is also found as an exegetical method and for solving problems. Tg. Onq., for example, replaces the information in Num. 12:1 that Moses took a "Cushite" (heathen) wife by the information that the woman was "lovely to look at," since both words produce the numerical value 736.

NT 1. arithmos occurs only 18x in the NT (10x in Rev.); arithmeō, 3x. By and large, the noun simply means "number" (e.g., Rom. 9:27; Rev. 20:8) and is used for numerical details (e.g., Jn. 6:10, untranslated in the NIV; Acts 4:4; Rev. 5:11; 7:4). The meaning in Lk. 22:3 is perhaps "company" (i.e., lit. "Judas . . . being among the company of the Twelve"). Jesus uses arithmeō when he says that the hairs of our head are numbered, showing God's incredible care in our lives (Matt. 10:30; Lk. 12:7); the vb. is also used for the great multitude in Rev. 7:9 that "no one could number."

2. In Rev. 13:17–18 arithmos denotes a code or cipher for the number 666. Doubtless we have here a functional gematria, which puts into code the name of the person intended. The context speaks pictorially of a "beast" (→ thērion, 2563), which has traditionally been understood as the Antichrist. "The number of the beast," which is stated as being a "man's number," shows that behind the beast and its number is concealed a human figure known to the hearers and readers of the text of that time. This excludes all attempts to decode the number that do not relate to a human figure. Note, of course, that the text does not make it explicit whether one is to use the Gk. or Heb. alphabet for interpreting the number, though the text itself is in Gk.

Of the many attempts at interpretation, the consonantal Heb. script for "Caesar Nero" (qsr nrwn = 100 + 60 + 200 + 50 + 200 + 6 + 50 = 666) has some probability. This solution is all the more attractive in that, combined with Rev. 17:11 ("the beast who once was, and now is not"), it may refer to the legend of Nero redivivus, so that the Antichrist is thus being painted in the colors of the hated Nero. That this legend story is also known from Jewish apocalyptic lit. supports this. But no definitive interpretation of 13:17–18 can be given.

3. As the process of gematria has shown, numbers in the ancient world do not merely indicate quantities but also qualities. Some numbers possess an almost fixed symbolic meaning. This is esp. true in the NT of four, seven, and twelve. For more on such numbers, see one, heis (1651); two, dyo (1545); three, treis (5552); four, tessares (5475); five, pente (4297); seven, hepta (2231); eight, oktō (3893); ten, deka (1274); twelve, dōdeka (1557); forty, tesserakonta (5477); seventy, hebdomēkonta (1573); and a thousand, chilias (5942).

4. Care must be taken not to attribute theological significance to the use of particular numbers when it is unclear that such significance was intended. Many cases are best treated as literal or rhetorical or round-number approximations.

Yet some cases are less obvious. In Matt. 1 the genealogy of Jesus is schematized into sequences of fourteen, which is double seven. The enumeration here is selective and cannot be treated as being exhaustive. It is therefore reasonable to suppose that the generations listed have been chosen with some purpose in mind, though we do not know whether that purpose was theologically significant or simply rhetorical or mnemonic.

The total of 153 fish in Jn. 21:11 is another debatable instance. Several church fathers opted for a symbolic interpretation. Some modern scholars have explained the figure by gematria or as a "triangular" number, following Augustine. But perhaps it is best just to take the number literally. Ancient sources do suggest the practice of counting a catch of fish in order to share them among the participating fishermen. Note that John elsewhere gives precise numbers where it is superfluous to look for a symbolic meaning (e.g., 46 in 2:20; 38 in 5:5), and Jn.'s constant emphasis on witness belies the esoteric.

There is no doubt, of course, that numbers are often used symbolically in Rev. It is surely significant, for example, that there were seven churches in Asia being addressed. Yet note that the choice of seven is in part dictated by geographical particularities, for the seven cities mentioned were the most efficient centers of communication for the churches of the province.

754 ἀριστερός

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. aristeros meant the opposite of dexios (→ 1288), that is, left (as opposed to right). The fem. by itself (with cheir understood) denoted the left hand or left side. Derivative meanings include clumsy and unlucky, foreboding. euōnymos (a combination of eu and onoma) etymologically meant honorable, of good name. For some reason very early this word became a euphemistic synonym of aristeros.

2. Both aristeros (e.g., Gen. 14:15; 24:49) and euōnymos (e.g., Exod. 14:22, 29; Num. 20:17) occur in the OT. Significance is attached to which hand Jacob used in blessing the sons of Joseph in Gen. 48:14. The left is a symbol for folly and ill fortune in Eccl. 10:2.

NT In general the NT avoids these words' sinister connotations and uses them for the left hand or side. Regarding aristeros Paul speaks of having "weapons of righteousness in the right hand and in the left" (2 Cor. 6:7) in his defense of his ministry. James and John use the expression ex aristerōn in expressing their desire for the chief places at the right and left hand of Jesus in his kingdom (Mk. 10:37). Lk. 23:33 mentions the two malefactors crucified on the right and left of Jesus. euōnymos is used in the same contexts in Mk. 10:40 and 15:27 (cf. Matt. 20:21, 23; 27:38). This word also has a neutral sense in Acts 21:3 (NIV "south") and Rev. 10:2. But euōnymos does have a pejorative sense in Matt. 25:33, 41 in the parable of the sheep and the goats; those who are judged are placed on the judge's left.

See also dexios, right, right hand, right side (1288); cheir, hand (5931); epitithēmi, to put on, lay on (2202).

757 (arketos, enough, sufficient, adequate), → 758.

ἀρκέω (arkeō), be enough, suffice, be adequate; pass. be satisfied or content with (758); ἀρκετός (arketos), enough, sufficient, adequate (757); αὐτάρκεια (autarkeia), sufficiency, contentment (894); αὐτάρκης (autarkēs), self-sufficient, independent, content (895).

CL & OT 1. In Homer arkeō, to suffice, be sufficient, pass. be satisfied, had the meaning to give protection, ward off, have power, help. Later it means to suffice, satisfy. The adj. arketos does not occur until the 1st cent. A.D. and means sufficient; the noun autarkeia denotes a sufficiency of means, competence, such as that enjoyed by an independent, self-supporting person. Similarly, autarkēs means self-sufficient, hence strong, and is frequently found with the vb. einai, to be, in the sense of to be satisfied.

In the moral philosophy of Stoicism the ability to be content became the essence of all the virtues. To practice this virtue was to acquiesce wisely in that which suited one's nature. Stoics prided themselves in becoming independent of things and relying on themselves or in submitting to the lot meted out by the gods.

2. The LXX makes little use of this word group. In Num. 11:22 arkeō means be sufficient; in 1 Ki. 8:27, contain, be sufficient for; in Prov. 30:15 [= LXX 24:50]; 2 Macc. 5:15; Wis. 14:22; 4 Macc. 6:28, to satisfy. But OT piety knows more about contentment than this mere incidence of words might imply (cf. Ps. 73:23–28; 131; Hos. 12:8–9; 13:6).

NT 1. The words in this group are not widely used in the NT. arkeō expresses the idea that something is sufficient (e.g., oil, Matt. 25:9; bread, Jn. 6:7); it also describes the attitude of mind that is satisfied or content with what is available (Heb. 13:5), with food and clothing (1 Tim. 6:8), or with wages (Lk. 3:14).

2. arketos, enough, is used as an adjectival predicate in Matt. 6:34; 10:25; 1 Pet. 4:3. In 2 Cor. 9:8, Paul uses autarkeia to show the Corinthians that if they give from the heart, they will have "all that [they] need," i.e., God will richly bestow on them the necessities of life. The mark of autarkeia is no longer autonomy and self-sufficiency but freedom to give to others; we are not to live exclusively for ourselves. In 1 Tim. 6:6 Paul uses the same word to say that contentment, when linked with godliness, is great gain.

3. (a) Such an attitude of contentment presupposes in the NT the trust and confidence that God's children have in their heavenly Father. Since they are secure in his love, they can be content with what they have, because it is allotted to them by God himself. In his promises, he undertakes to watch over his people all their lives (Heb. 13:5). Such confidence banishes anxiety about the future because the future, like the present, is provided for by God (Matt. 6:34). His children are delivered from anxiety about themselves so that they may be free to care for others.

(b) In Phil. 4:11 Paul describes his own attitude: He has learned, in whatever state he is, to be content (autarkēs). Such contentment springs from complete readiness to accept whatever God gives. The apostle makes no distinction between the necessary and the superfluous, but simply gives thanks for everything. He can accept both abundance and want as part of his life, and he gives thanks that he has received both as a gift, together with God's gracious forgiveness and quickening power. As an example of this attitude we should note Paul's thorn in the flesh. He exercises contentment here and requests no more than God is graciously pleased to give. This thorn serves as a repeated reminder to Paul that he is utterly dependent, in all that he does, on the enabling power of his Lord (2 Cor. 12:1–10).

4. The scope of this word group becomes clear in Jn. 14:8. Philip claims that if he and the other disciples were shown the Father, then "that will be enough [arkeō] for us." Jesus answers that their true need, like that of all people, is in fact more limited: It is sufficient to see Christ, for those who see him also see the Father. Christ's revelation of God is the most comprehensive and complete revelation conceivable to anyone.

762 (Harmagedōn, Armageddon), → 4483.

ἀρνέομαι (arneomai), refuse, deny, dispute, disown, disregard (766); ἀπαρνέομαι (aparneomai), deny, disown, renounce (565).

CL & OT arneomai means deny, refuse, reject; its opposite is didōmi, grant, give. Regarding a matter needing clarification, the vb. means dispute, contest; its opposite is homologeō, agree, assent to. Later arneomai developed the meaning disown, renounce. It is in this sense that the originally intensive form aparneomai is mostly used in the NT.

In Gen. 18:15 arneomai means dispute, deny; aparneomai (Isa. 31:7) means reject. In the Apocr. arneomai has the sense of refuse (Wis. 12:27; 16:16; 17:10) and renounce (4 Macc. 8:7; 10:15).

NT 1. arneomai occurs 33x in the NT and aparneomai 11x. In addition to the senses of refuse (Heb. 11:24) and deny (Jn. 1:20), the vbs. have the specific sense of disown in relation to Jesus Christ.

2. Denial and rejection of Jesus Christ can be the result of ignorance (Acts 3:13–14, cf. v. 17). Generally, however, arneomai means that one falls back from a previous relationship with him into unfaithfulness (2 Pet. 2:1; Jude 4). This is the meaning of Peter's denial (Mk. 14:30, 68, 70). In 1 Jn. 2:22–23, certain heretics were denying that Jesus was the Messiah. The opposite of denying Jesus Christ is holding fast (Rev. 2:13) or being faithful (2:10) to him. Used absolutely, arneomai can mean to abandon fellowship with the Lord (2 Tim. 2:12).

Denial of Jesus is not only a matter of the lips; it is failure in discipleship. At a time of suffering there is particular danger of denying the Lord (Rev. 2:13; 3:8; cf. 2 Tim. 2:11–12). The motive for denial is usually fear of others, fear of suffering ridicule or persecution, or anxiety about what others will think.

3. Denial of Christ is also present where one refuses to fulfill one's responsibility before God (1 Tim. 5:8). Moreover, denial of God on our part will be met by a denial of us on God's part (Lk. 12:9; 2 Tim. 2:12). For denial is a rejection of God's offer of salvation and a conscious renunciation of his grace. God, however, "cannot disown himself" (2 Tim. 2:13); he remains true to his own nature.

4. To follow him who "made himself nothing" (Phil. 2:7) implies to deny oneself and take up one's cross (Matt. 16:24; Mk. 8:34; Lk. 9:23; → stauros, 5089). Interpreted in the light of Peter's denial, this means to say no to oneself and to surrender oneself totally, even if it means dying a martyr's death. But the connection with Paul's remarks about being buried with Christ (Rom. 6:4–5) and being crucified with Christ so that he lives in us (Gal. 2:20) should not be overlooked. Self-denial is not therefore a legalistic demand, but the way forward into life "in Christ."

768 (arnion, lamb), → 303.

771 (harpagē, robbery, plunder, greediness, rapacity), → 773.

772 (harpagmos, robbery, prize, booty), → 773.

773 ἁρπάζω

ἁρπάζω (harpazō), snatch, seize (773); ἁρπαγμός (harpagmos), robbery, that of which someone is robbed, prize, booty (772); ἁρπαγή (harpagē), robbery, plunder, greediness, rapacity (771); ἅρπαξ (harpax), rapacious, ravenous, a robber, swindler (774); μετατίθημι (metatithēmi), to transfer, change the position of, change, turn away (3572).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. harpazō is related to Lat. rapio, seize, snatch, and means to snatch, seize, carry off, rob, plunder, ravish. harpagmos means both robbery, rape, and the thing of which a person is robbed, a prize to be grasped.

2. harpazō in the LXX means to take away, rob (e.g., Lev. 6:4; 19:13; Jdg. 21:23; Ps. 7:3; Isa. 10:2; Mic. 3:2), tear (in pieces) (e.g., Gen. 37:33; Ps. 22:13; 104:21; Amos 3:4). In Ps. 50:22, Yahweh, facing an apostate people, is compared to a lion rending his prey in pieces.

Only once in the LXX does harpazō have the meaning rapture, being caught up: Wis. 4:11, apparently referring to Enoch and Elijah, says that they "were caught up" (metatithēmi is used elsewhere in the LXX and in cl. Gk.; e.g., Gen. 5:24; Wis. 4:10; Sir. 44:16; 49:14). The translation of Enoch (Gen. 5:24) appears frequently in Jewish lit.; thus, it is important to discuss what is meant by the rapture in Gen. 5:24. Enoch, because his life pleased God, was taken directly into God's presence without first going to Sheol (→ hadēs, 87). The manner in which this took place is not mentioned (cf. Heb. 11:5, where metatithēmi is used). Elijah was taken directly into God's fellowship in a fiery chariot (2 Ki. 2:11–12; for further discussion, → anastasis, 414).

NT 1. (a) harpazō is found 14x in the NT. As in cl. Gk. and the LXX, it can mean steal, carry off, drag away (Matt. 12:29; Jn. 10:12). It also means to lead away forcibly (Jn.

6:15; 10:28–29; Acts 23:10; Jude 23). It is used of the Spirit's carrying someone away in Acts 8:39; 2 Cor. 12:2, 4; 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 12:5.

(b) We must distinguish in the NT between movement from one place on earth to another and being caught up into a supernatural world. (i) Following the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, "the Spirit of the Lord suddenly took Philip away" (Acts 8:39). This should be taken spatially and really. It has close links with 2 Ki. 2, even in verbal details (cf. esp. 2:12). But it may also be compared with the Spirit driving Jesus into the desert after his baptism (cf. Matt. 4:1; Mk. 1:12; Lk. 4:1).

(ii) But 2 Cor. 12:2–10 is based on a different concept. There Paul tells of an experience between just God and himself, in which he was "caught up into the third heaven." He is not even sure how to explain it, but this rapture gave him a high degree of ecstatic experience. There he hears "inexpressible things," which leaves an indelible impression on him. Still, in contrast to his opponents, Paul knew that he had not reached final perfection in his rapture, for that would have made faith unnecessary. Moreover, because he was uncertain what to make of the experience, he was reluctant to write about it.

(c) In 1 Thess. 4:17 Paul deals with the final rapture into the fellowship of the redeemed at the last day. He addresses this topic because some members of the Thessalonian church had questions about the fate of believers who had already died. Paul answered this concern through the certainty of resurrection. Christians who are still alive when Jesus returns on the clouds of heaven will not die but will be taken up directly into the fellowship of those who have already been raised. They will meet the Lord Jesus in the air; the language is that of contemporary Jewish apocalyptic (On the view that paralambanō in Matt. 24:40–41; Lk. 17:34–35 refers to the same event, → lambamō, to take, 3284.)

(d) In Rev. 12:5 the male child (representing Jesus) is "snatched up" to God to escape the persecution of the dragon; this is the expression in picture language of incidents like that recorded in Matt. 2:13–18.

(e) On the use of harpazō in Matt. 11:12, → bia, force, 1040.

2. The noun harpagmos is found only in Phil. 2:6, where Paul refers to Jesus Christ, "who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped [harpagmon], but made himself nothing." This sentence occurs in what was probably an early Christian hymn (2:5–11). harpagmos most likely means a thing seized, like the spoil, booty, or prize of war. It denotes that which Christ refused to seize and hang on to for himself, namely, his being equal with God. He had every right to do so, of course, since he was God and shared God's throne. But he chose to empty himself (→ kenoō, 3033) and took the form of a servant, which in turn provides the pattern for Christian conduct.

3. In Heb. 10:34, harpagē means robbery, plunder, namely, the forcible confiscation of Christian property. In Matt. 23:25; Lk. 11:39 it denotes the root cause of something that is plundered, namely, greed. Jesus charges the Pharisees with hypocrisy, i.e., having a clean outside but inside being filled with greediness. Elsewhere Jesus describes the greed of the Pharisees, who "devour widows' houses" (Lk. 20:47), i.e., betraying the financial trust that widows placed on them to manage their affairs after a husband's death and finding ways to take all their property.

4. harpax means rapacious, ravenous—of wolves (Matt. 7:15); and as a noun, a robber (Lk. 18:11; cf. 1 Cor. 5:10–11; 6:10).

774 (harpax, rapacious, ravenous, a robber, swindler), → 773.

ἀρραβών (arrabōn), first installment, down payment, deposit, pledge, earnest (775).

CL & OT arrabōn is a legal concept borrowed from Sem. languages. It is rare and means (1) an installment with which one secures a legal claim on a thing as yet unpaid for; (2) an earnest, an advance payment, by which a contract becomes legally valid; and (3) in one passage (Gen. 38:17–20) a pledge. In each case a payment is involved by which a person guarantees further payment to the recipient.

NT arrabōn occurs 3x in the NT, all of them related to the Holy Spirit. Eph. 1:14 interprets the other two: The Spirit is the present earnest of our future inheritance, guaranteeing our complete, final salvation, i.e., eternal communion with God. This statement, as in 2 Cor. 1:22, is probably associated with baptism. In the sealing (→ sphragis, 5382) of the believer through baptism, the Holy Spirit is given to the human heart as an earnest. The future reality represented by this earnest appears in 2 Cor. 5:5 as the "house" expected from heaven, which will one day replace the present "tent," our earthly body (5:1–4). This is similar to Paul's emphasis on our having "the firstfruits of the Spirit" (Rom. 8:23; → aparchē, 569). The present reality of the Spirit is a sign and pledge of that which is to come.

In all three NT passages, however, the arrabōn should not be understood to imply that, in giving the earnest of the Spirit, God is legally our debtor. Even the installment of the Spirit remains a free, undeserved gift of God to us.

779 (arrōstos, sick, ill), → 3798.

780 (arsenokoitēs, male homosexual, pederast, sodomite), → 781.

781 ἄρσην

ἄρσην (arsēn), male (781); θῆλυς (thēlys), female (2559); ἀρσενοκοίτης (arsenokoitēs), male homosexual, pederast, sodomite (780).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. arsēn means male as opposed to female, thēlys (which with the art. can mean woman).

2. arsēn occurs 54x in the LXX. It appears in the phrase "male and female" in Gen. 1:27, regarding the creation of male and female in the image of God (cf. also 5:2; 6:19–20; Lev. 12:7; note that in Gen. 7:2–3, 9, 15–16; Lev. 3:1, 6, arsēn can refer to the male of an animal species). Male is referred to apart from female in passages such as Gen. 17:14, 23 (the institution of circumcision as the covenant sign); Exod. 1:16–18, 22; 2:2; 12:5 (the Passover lamb had to be a male without blemish); Mal. 1:14 (in connection with sacrifice); Lev. 18:22; 20:13 (in condemnation of homosexual practices); and Num. 1:2 [= LXX 1:3]; 3:40 (in the census of the people).

The references to male and female correspond to those of man and woman generally in the OT. On the one hand, there is a recognition in Gen. of the divinely instituted parity in that man and woman together constitute the image of God, and of their complementary roles in the transmission of life in both the human and the animal realm. On the other hand, there are certain roles (e.g., in receiving the covenant sign, in the priesthood, and in certain sacrifices) that only the male may fill.

NT 1. Matt. 19:4 refers to the creative act in Gen. 1:27 in connection with divorce. Jesus' reply to the Pharisees takes it as the major premise for his teaching on marriage: "At the beginning the Creator 'made them male [arsēn] and female [thēlys].'" This leads to the minor premise quoted from Gen. 2:24: "For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and the two will become one flesh" (Matt. 19:5). The conclusion is drawn: "So they are no longer two, but one. Therefore what God has joined together, let man not separate" (19:6).

2. In Lk. 2:23 Jesus' parents offered the sacrifice prescribed for males in Exod. 13:2, 12.

3. Paul's use of arsēn exhibits a tension between the creation ordinances and their abolition in the gospel age. By contrast, the ungodly have abolished the creation ordinances for perverted sexual relations in a way that can only bring judgment.

(a) In Rom. 1:27 arsēn is used 3x to denote (homo)sexual perversion as a result of worshiping the creature rather than the Creator. Because human beings have put something else in the place that properly belongs only to God, natural male-female relationships have been altered. Paul also uses the noun arsenokoitēs (a male homosexual, pederast, sodomite) as one who is excluded from the kingdom (1 Cor. 6:9) and condemned by the Mosaic law (1 Tim. 1:10; cf. Gen. 19; Lev. 18:22, 29; 20:13; Deut. 23:17).

(b) Gal. 3:28, by contrast, asserts that in Christ Jesus "there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female." This, however, is not a call to abolish all earthly relationships. Rather, it puts these relationships in the perspective of salvation history. As Paul goes on to say, "If you belong to Christ, then you are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:29; cf. also Rom. 10:2). All who are in Christ have the same status before God, but they do not necessarily have the same function. In the context of the circumcision question in Gal., the assertion is doubly relevant, for women could not receive the sign that Judaizers were insisting as a prerequisite for full salvation. There may also be an underlying Adam-typology in the passage, in that some rabbis asserted that Adam was originally androgynous.

4. Rev. 12:5, 13 takes up the imagery of Isa. 66:7 and Ps. 2:9 in the vision of the dragon's attack on the woman with the male child: "She gave birth to a son, a male child, who will rule all the nations with an iron scepter.... When the dragon saw that he had been hurled to the earth, he pursued the woman who had given birth to the male child." Whereas the child is here clearly Christ, the woman represents both the mother of Jesus and the church, whose other offspring are now pursued by the dragon.

785 (arti, now, just, immediately), → 2789.

ἄρτιος (artios), suitable, complete, capable, sound (787); καταρτίζω (katartizō), put in order, restore, make complete, prepare (2936); καταρτισμός (katartismos), preparation, equipment (2938); κατάρτισις (katartisis), being made complete, completion (2937); προκαταρτίζω (prokatartizō), get ready, arrange in advance (4616); ἐξαρτίζω (exartizō), finish, complete, equip, furnish (1992).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. artios means suitable, appropriate, fitting a situation or requirements; hence also normal, perfect, sound in physical, intellectual, moral, and religious respects. In mathematics it describes what is straight and denotes even numbers (in contrast to perissos, odd). katartizō means put in order, restore, furnish, prepare, equip. katartismos and katartisis mean restoration.

2. The LXX uses katartizō 19x for various Heb. vbs. It is used for completing the building of the wall and temple by the postexilic community (Ezr. 4:12–13, 16; 5:3, 9, 11; 6:14). Other meanings of the vb. include: to set up, establish, in a literal sense (Ps. 8:2; 74:16); to hold one's steps fast to Yahweh's paths (17:5); to equip (40:6); and to restore (68:9). Frequently Yahweh is the subj. of sentences that refer to his work of establishing and founding. artiōs is used in the LXX only as a temporal adv. meaning until now (2 Sam. 15:34).

NT Of this group of words only katartizō is used with any frequently in the NT (13x), while artios (2 Tim. 3:17), katartisis (2 Cor. 13:9), and katartismos (Eph. 4:12) occur only once each.

1. At Matt. 4:21; Mk. 1:19, katartizō has the secular sense of repairing fishing nets. The NT also uses the vb. for to prepare (Matt. 21:16 [Ps. 8:2]; Rom. 9:22; Heb. 10:5 [Ps. 40:6]), to form (Heb. 11:3), and to equip (13:21; 1 Pet. 5:10). God is the subject of sentences that express his power to strengthen and establish.

2. Of particular importance are those passages in which artios and its derivatives are used in connection with the preparation and equipment of believers and the church for the service of God and their fellow believers. artios occurs in 2 Tim. 3:17 with the perf. pass. part. of exartizō, where it describes the OT Scriptures as an indispensable, God-given guide for equipping believers for every good work. So too in Eph. 4:12, katartismos refers to the preparation of the church for works of service, so that we may become mature believers (cf. 4:13).

artios and katartismos thus have not so much a qualitative meaning as a functional one. This standard hortatory use of artios and its derivatives arises from the fact that all imperatives are founded on the one indicative, i.e., the firm promise of salvation. The life of the saints is to correspond to God's free grace, which is itself the standard to which they are to aspire. It is on this ground that in 2 Cor. 13:11 and Gal. 6:1, katartizō can mean to restore; in 1 Thess. 3:10, to make up, to put in a fit state. katartisis in 2 Cor. 13:9 also comes into this category, where it refers to the restoration and perfection of the church.

3. At 2 Cor. 9:5 prokatartizō is used of arranging or gathering and making ready Paul's collection for Jerusalem; at Acts 21:5 exartizō means that "our time was up."

ἄρτος (artos), bread, loaf (788).

CL & OT Early on artos designated bread baked from various kinds of flour. Together with meat it was the most important form of food. Originally, Israelite bread was made from barley flour mixed with broad beans, lentils, and the like. Later, wheat bread became more common, but only the better off could afford it. Both forms of bread were made from ground grains to which yeast was normally added. It was baked on a griddle (Lev. 2:5) or in clay ovens (Hos. 7:4, 6–7). The flat loaves were about half an inch thick and could be as much as twenty inches in diameter.

When there were unexpected guests (Gen. 19:3) or when people were busy as at harvest time (Ruth 2:14), bread was baked from unleavened dough, or the grain was simply eaten roasted. Because the latter kept almost indefinitely, it was taken on sudden journeys (cf. 1 Sam. 17:17). The use of unleavened bread is linked especially with the exodus from Egypt (Exod. 12:8, 11, 34, 39). The annual observance of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (12:14–20; 13:3–10) meant the cultic representation of that rescue.

In the Israelite sacrificial system, flour or bread found a place as gifts in the grain offering (cf. Lev. 2). The twelve loaves of "the bread of the Presence" were placed on a special table in the sanctuary (Exod. 25:30; 1 Chr. 28:16). They were of unleavened bread and were placed as an offering before Yahweh.

In the early rab. period, the head of the house took the loaf from the table and pronounced a blessing. His guests answered, "Amen." He then gave a piece of bread to each guest but ate first himself. Jesus also offered a blessing at mealtime, as is suggested both in the accounts of the feeding of the five and four thousand (Mk. 6:41 par.; 8:6 par.) and of the Last Supper.

NT Since bread was such a staple, it was often used as a synonym for food and the support of life in general. The prodigal son in the far country remembers that his father's paid servants "have bread enough and to spare" (NIV, "have food to spare," Lk. 15:17). To eat bread means to have a meal (cf. Isa. 65:25); to break one's bread for the hungry means to feed and care for them (58:7, 10); not to eat another's bread without paying means to work with one's own hands (2 Thess. 3:8); to eat no bread and drink no wine means to live as an ascetic (Lk. 7:33). The fourth petition of the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:11) is concerned with all our bodily and spiritual needs. In quoting Deut. 8:3, "Man does not live on bread alone," Jesus was referring to material things in general, to which he opposed the life-sustaining power of God's word (Matt. 4:4).

The miracles of the feeding of the five thousand (Matt. 14:13–21 par.) and of the four thousand (15:32–39 par.), where a few loaves and a couple of fish fed many people, show that Jesus, the messianic Lord, gives the true bread of life (see Jn. 6:25–28, which follows the miracle). Behind the concept of the bread of life lies the ancient widespread desire for a food that would impart everlasting life (cf. 6:34). Jesus' answer was: I am what you are asking for; those who want to share in this eternal life must know that I myself am the bread and that I will give it to those who come to me. In saying this, Jesus opposes all others who claim to be or to have the bread of life.

ἀρχή (archē), beginning, cause (794); ἄρχω (archō), to begin, to rule (806); ἄρχων (archōn), ruler, prince (807); ἀρχηγός (archēgos), ruler, leader (795); ἀρχαῖος (archaios), old, ancient (792).

CL & OT 1. In Gk. philosophy archē denotes the starting point, the first cause, and power, authority, or rule. The vb. archō commonly means be the first (to do something), begin by doing something, rule (as leader). Its part. archōn means ruler, prince; archēgos has a similar meaning. The adj. archaios denotes that which has been from early times; hence old, ancient.

When one spoke of the beginning (archē) in Gk. philosophy, the end (telos) was also in view. Since the beginning, the first cause of all that is, comes out of the infinite, so the end will also lose itself in the infinite. Gradually, archē developed its meaning from the underlying cause to the underlying laws that determine the development and progress of the cosmos.

2. The LXX uses this word group to translate over 30 Heb. words. (a) The vb. archō usually indicates the beginning of an action (e.g., Gen. 6:1; Deut. 1:5). This usage has no theological coloring.

(b) The concept of a beginning in time that is dominant in the vb. can be seen in an even more specialized sense in the noun archē, when it is used to translate Heb. ʿôlām, a distant time (Jos. 24:2; Isa. 63:16, 19), or qedem, antiquity, of old (e.g., Hab. 1:12; Ps. 74:2; Mic. 5:2). So used, it does not mean only the distant past in time, but the state that once was, the beginning of a nation or of the world. The adj. archaios, old, has more or less the same range of meaning (→ palai, 4093).

(c) The meaning of foremost or highest rank is found alongside the temporal meaning. This comes from its rendering of Heb. rōʾš, head, with its wide range of nuances, thus forcing archē to take on a wide range of meanings (e.g., Jer. 22:6, summit; Num. 1:2, census; Exod. 12:2, first [months]; 1 Ki. 21:9, 12 = LXX 20:9, 12, prominent [place]; → prōtos, 4755). The connotations of beginning and highest rank sometimes come together (e.g., Ps. 111:10, where the fear of the Lord is the archē sophias ["beginning of wisdom"]).

(d) From the Heb. rōʾš, archē takes on the meaning of command or the military unit command (Jdg. 9:34; 1 Sam. 11:11). The element of ruling is particularly clear when it is used to render memšālâ, rule, dominion (Gen. 1:16; Jer. 34:1 = LXX 41:1; Mic. 4:8).

(e) This lies behind the relatively unambiguous use of archōn (450x) and archēgos (34x) as a translation for rōʾš when it means a political or military leader, or a head of a family (e.g., Num. 25:4; 30:1 = LXX 30:2; 1 Chr. 8:6, 28; Neh. 11:3). archōn also is used for śar, holder of authority and power, leader (e.g., Gen. 12:15; Jdg. 8:3), and nāśîʾ, head of a tribe, patriarch (e.g., Num. 2:3, 5, 7; Ezek. 7:27), while archēgos denotes an elected charismatic leader in time of need (Heb. qāṣîn, Jdg. 11:6). Thus, archēgos refers more to the actual exercise of power and archōn more to the authority behind it. archōn can also extend to the celestial beings who represent the nations in the world of spirits and who in great measure are hostile to God's people (Dan. 10:13; cf. 7:27, archē).

NT The NT uses this word group in much the same way as secular Gk. They esp. denote a first point in time and indicate an area of authority.

1. (a) archē (55x in NT; 18x in the Johannine Gospel and letters) can mean beginning, commencement (Mk. 1:1; 13:8; Heb. 3:14). In Heb. 5:12; 6:1, it carries the meaning of groundwork, elementary teaching. The phrases apʾ archēs and ex archēs denote the first point in time, its occasion being determined from the context (e.g., "the beginning" of Jesus' activity, Lk. 1:2; cf. Jn. 15:27; 16:4). Jesus knew "from the beginning" whether someone believed (Jn. 6:64); John points to the command to love that the church had "since the beginning" (1 Jn. 2:7; cf. 2:24; 3:11; 2 Jn. 5–6); the devil was a murderer and liar "from the beginning" (Jn. 8:44; cf. 1 Jn. 3:8); Mk. 13:19 and 2 Pet. 3:4 look back to the beginning of the world. Acts 11:15 thinks of the first days of the church in Jerusalem, and Phil. 4:15 of the beginning of Paul's missionary activity.

(b) Jn. 1:1 implies something before time, i.e., not a beginning within time, but an absolute beginning, which can be affirmed only of God, of whom no temporal categories can be predicated. The Logos (Word) is in the strictest sense preexistent before the world began, and so before time began (cf. also 1 Jn. 1:1; 2:13–14).

(c) In Col. 1:18 archē may mean first cause or perhaps firstfruits (cf. aparchē, 569), in the sense of Christ as the firstfruits and the firstborn from the dead. Paul may be calling Christ here the First Cause of creation, but it is equally possible that his existence before time is meant (cf. also Rev. 21:6; 22:13).

(d) archē can mean power, authorities, rulers (cf. Lk. 12:11; 20:20; Tit. 3:1, where it is linked with exousia, authority, and refers to the civil [Roman] or religious [Jewish] authorities). Persecution may come from the leaders of the synagogues (Lk. 12:11). Tit. 3:1 calls for obedience to the civil powers and the authorities in general.

(e) In some NT passages archē means an angelic power. As in early rab. Jud., the world and all its manifestations and powers are regarded as under the control of angels and guided by them. While various categories of supernatural, heavenly beings are recognized (e.g., archai, dynameis, exousiai, cf. Col. 1:16), the NT sees no importance in working out their levels or specific functions. Rather, it stresses that they have been created through Christ and for him. Accordingly, Christ's reconciling act embraces the whole cosmos (1:20).

Christ is the head of every archē and exousia (Col. 2:10; cf. Phil. 2:10–11). These evil rulers and authorities, ruled by the devil (Eph. 6:12), brought him to the cross without recognizing him (1 Cor. 2:8); but on the cross Christ disarmed them, robbing them of their might (Col. 2:14–15). By his resurrection Christ was exalted to God's right hand above all these powers (Eph. 1:20–21). Nothing can now separate believers from the love of God (Rom. 8:38–39).

It is striking that the mystery (→ mystērion, 3696) of the call of the Gentiles to Christian faith should be made known to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places through the church (Eph. 3:10). This mystery has a cosmic meaning that reaches out into the spiritual world. In the end times, when God's kingdom will be established, Christ will destroy every archē, dynamis, and exousia (1 Cor. 15:24).

2. archō is found 86x in the NT. In the act. it means be the first, rule (Mk. 10:42; Rom. 15:12); in the mid., begin, commence. Often it occurs in an idiom that serves as a formal introduction to a speech or action (e.g., "he began to say . . . ") and can thus be left untranslated.

archō has its full meaning in Lk. 3:23: Jesus was about thirty years old when he began his work. Similarly, it marks a temporal beginning in Matt. 16:21 and in Lk. 24:27, where the resurrected Jesus explains the Scriptures, beginning with Moses and the Prophets. In 1 Pet. 4:17 judgment comes first to the household of God and then to the others.

3. archaios occurs 11x in the NT. The people of an older generation are called hoi archaioi, i.e., ancestors (Matt. 5:21). Some thought that Jesus was one of the prophets "of long ago" (i.e., who had lived in OT times and had come back to life; Lk. 9:8, 19). Mnason of Cyprus was an archaios mathētēs, a disciple who had known Jesus from the first days of the church (Acts 21:16). The "ancient world" (2 Pet. 2:5) is the world before the flood. Satan is "that ancient serpent"—alluding to the Eden story (Gen. 3)—who was active at the beginning of the world and of human history (Rev. 12:9; 20:2). Those who are in Christ are a new creation, in whom the "old," earthly nature with its sinful existence has passed away (2 Cor. 5:17).

4. archēgos (4x in the NT) is applied only to Jesus. (a) He is prince or "author of life" (Acts 3:15). The expression here means that Jesus Christ brings people to new life (cf. Jn. 1:4). God raised up Jesus, who had been murdered on the cross, and exalted him to his right hand as archēgos (Acts 5:31), i.e., "as Prince" (and Savior). The expression is parallel to 2:36: God has made Jesus kyrios (Lord) and Christ.

(b) Heb. 2:10 speaks solemnly of Christ as archēgos tēs sōtērias ("author of . . . salvation"; cf. 5:10; 6:20). Moreover, because Christ has himself reached the goal, he is not only the "author" but also the "perfecter" (teleiōtēs) of salvation (12:2).

5. archōn has several referents in the NT. (a) It is found 37x meaning ruler, prince. Only in Rev. 1:5 is it used of Christ, where (cf. Ps. 89:27) he is called the archōn of the kings of the earth (cf. Phil. 2:11; Rev. 19:16; → kyrios, 3261). Otherwise, the archontes are those who rule over the nations (Matt. 20:25; cf. Mk. 10:42). In Acts 4:25–26 (cf. Ps. 2:1–2) Herod and Pilate, both archontes, cooperated at the crucifixion of Jesus.

(b) archōn is also used to denote the synagogue authorities (e.g., Matt. 9:18, 23; Lk. 8:41), the lay members of the Sanhedrin (e.g., 23:13, 35; Jn. 3:1), members of the highest Jewish authorities (7:26, 48; Acts 3:17; 4:5, 8), and the high priest (23:5). Exod. 2:14 is quoted in Acts 7:27: An Israelite refused to recognize Moses as his ruler, or as one set in authority over him. In Lk. 14:1 it refers to a "prominent Pharisee." In Acts 14:5 Jewish and Gentile authorities are hostile to the apostle. Paul and Silas were dragged before the archontes of Philippi (16:19). In his teaching about the state Paul says that the authorities (archontes) are not a cause of fear to those who do good (Rom. 13:3).

(c) In addition evil spirits can be called archontes (→ daimonion, 1228). The Pharisees accused Jesus of driving out demons by the power of the archōn of the demons, meaning Beelzebub as the diabolos (Matt. 9:34; 12:24; cf. 10:25; Mk. 3:22; Lk. 11:15). Satan, prince (archōn) of this world (cf. Eph. 2:2), has been judged (Jn. 16:11) and cast out of heaven through the death and exaltation of Jesus (12:31). He tries in vain to get hold of Jesus and destroy him (14:30). The whole of the present world is under archontes, who are on their way to destruction (1 Cor. 2:6). They have a wisdom that contrasts with the wisdom of God. It is these archontes who crucified Christ (2:8).

ἄσβεστος (asbestos), inextinguishable, that which is not or cannot be quenched (812).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. this word means unquenchable, though its meaning is extended to signify ceaseless. As a noun it was used of unslaked lime and subsequently of plaster. Later, fireproof asbestos fibers were made into fire-resistant clothing.

2. In the LXX asbestos occurs only in Job 20:26. It apparently translates a Heb. phrase meaning not blown upon or unfanned.

NT asbestos occurs only 3x in the NT. In Matt. 3:12 and Lk. 3:17 it is part of the teaching of John the Baptist regarding the coming Messiah, that he will burn up "the chaff with unquenchable fire." In Mk. 9:43 the word refers to the unquenchable fires of hell. Fire was the most powerful destructive force known in the ancient world, and the NT use of asbestos implies utter and complete destruction of whatever is rejected by God as unsuitable or unworthy.

See also sbennymi, quench, extinguish, quell (4931).

813 (asebeia, impiety, godlessness), → 4936.

816 ἀσέλγεια

ἀσέλγεια (aselgeia), licentiousness, debauchery (816); ἀσωτία (asōtia), dissolution, profligacy (861); ἀσώτως (asōtōs), dissolutely, wildly (862).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. aselgeia denotes licentiousness in lifestyle, which can mean excess in areas such as food or sex. asōtia had an original nuance of incurable but usually meant those who by their manner of life destroy themselves. This word is often linked with other vices, esp. those characterized by a wild and undisciplined life. It is esp. used of the person who is reckless and wasteful of his or her resources.

2. aselgeia does not occur in the OT (but cf. Wis. 14:26; 3 Macc. 2:26). asōtia occurs only in Prov. 28:7, where a person who lives a dissolute lifestyle brings dishonor to his or her father (see also 2 Macc. 6:4). In Prov. 7:11 the related asōtos describes a wanton, flighty woman who never stays home but is out looking for wild excitement.

NT 1. aselgeia occurs 10x in the NT, mostly in vice lists, where it is often linked with other sexual sins (e.g., Rom. 13:13; 2 Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19; 1 Pet. 4:3). According to Jesus, it is one of the vices that destroys a person from within (Mk. 7:22). aselgeia was one of the chief sins of Sodom and Gomorrah (2 Pet. 2:7) and is characteristic of godless paganism (Eph. 4:19; Jude 4).

2. asōtia occurs 3x in the NT, asōtōs once. The latter word describes the "wild living" of the prodigal son as he wasted his wealth. asōtia is used to describe wild and disorderly conduct rather than extravagance. In Eph. 5:18, Paul writes that drunkenness leads to "debauchery." The children of those chosen to be elders are not to be "wild" and disobedient (Tit. 1:6). In 1 Pet. 4:4 asōtia is one of a number of words that describe the wanton lifestyle of pagans, who make fun of the sober and moral choices of the believer.

ἀσθένεια (astheneia), weakness, sickness, disease, timidity (819); ἀσθενής (asthenēs), without strength, weak (822); ἀσθενέω (astheneō), to be powerless, weak (820).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. this group of words conveys the meaning of powerlessness, weakness, lack of strength. It relates primarily to bodily weakness, e.g., sickness, though it can also express other sorts of weakness, such as the frailty of woman, the weakness of human nature, or economic weakness (poverty). Only rarely is it used for lack of conviction, moral weakness.

2. (a) In the LXX astheneia occurs only 7x. In the Pentateuch asthenēs occurs only 2x (Gen. 29:17, Leah's weak eyes; Num. 13:18 = LXX 13:19, on whether the Canaanites are strong or weak). The remaining books likewise use asthenēs infrequently.

These words can mean sickness (e.g., Dan. 8:27), but also human weakness (Jdg. 16:7, 11, 17), social insignificance (6:15), and political weakness (2 Sam. 3:1).

(b) astheneō acquires a specific character in prophetic lit. It is found chiefly in prophecies of judgment, describing in a fig. sense the people who have rebelled against Yahweh and who will therefore stumble and fall (Jer. 6:21; 18:15; Hos. 4:5; 5:5; Nah. 2:5; 3:3).

(c) In Ps. and in the wisdom lit., astheneō can express the stumbling of the ungodly and of enemies (Ps. 9:3; 27:2; cf. Job 28:4). Words in this group may also be used for human poverty and human wretchedness (Ps. 6:2; 31:10; Prov. 21:13; 22:22). Theodotion is esp. fond of using astheneō.

NT 1. The Gospels and Acts tend to use the words in this group for bodily weakness or sickness (e.g., Matt. 10:8; Lk. 13:11; Jn. 4:46; Acts 9:37). The pres. act. part. can be used as a noun meaning a sick person (Jn. 5:7), usually pl. (e.g., Mk. 6:56; Jn. 6:2).

2. In Paul, the words in this group undergo theological reflection and are developed in relation to our sinful nature, to Christology, and to ethics. (a) In Rom. 6:19 Paul refers to being "weak in your natural selves" (lit., "weakness of the flesh [sarx, → 4922]"), i.e., natural human weakness. Rom. 8:26 defines astheneia as human powerlessness over against God, needing the help of the Spirit's power. In 1 Cor. 15:43, astheneia stands opposite to "power" (dynamis, → 1539).

In Rom. 8:3 Paul develops the concept of weakness further by associating it with the law, which is powerless because it is "weakened by the sinful nature [sarx]." That is, our inability to do what is good demonstrates a weakness in the law. Paul does not use weakness here in the sense of a relative quantity, but of an absolute one: incapability. His strongest formulation comes at Rom. 5:6, where he equates being powerless (lit., being weak) with being ungodly and being sinners (see 5:8; cf. Heb. 4:15; 7:28).

(b) Paul introduces another train of thought in seeing weakness as the place where God's might can be exhibited. In the course of arguing against his opponents in Corinth, the apostle unfolds his theology of the cross. In the crucified one the "weakness of God" comes to light, which to human eyes appears to be powerlessness and folly (1 Cor. 1:25, 27; cf. 2 Cor. 13:4). But since God has demonstrated his power in weakness (i.e., in the death of Christ) by raising him from the dead (2 Cor. 13:4), it is in the very sufferings of his followers that God's creative, life-giving power is revealed. Paul regards his own weakness as a mark of discipleship and fellowship in Christ's sufferings (1 Cor. 2:2–3; 4:10). At the same time the power of God is at work in weakness amid the conditions of suffering and alienation. Thus Paul concludes that he would rather boast of his weakness (2 Cor. 11:30; 12:5, 9–10; 13:9), for God's "power is made perfect in weakness" (12:9).

(c) Paul also uses this word group to distinguish between the strong (Rom. 15:1) and the weak (14:1) in faith. Paul is probably taking up catchwords or familiar slogans used by groups within the churches of Corinth and Rome (cf. Rom. 14:1–15:13; 1 Cor. 8:10). Those known as the "weak" have a weak conscience (1 Cor. 8:7) and have not yet reached a full knowledge of the faith (8:11). Thus, they abstain from meat and perhaps wine (Rom. 14:2), esp. from meat offered to idols (1 Cor. 8:7), observe certain special days (Rom. 14:5), and evidence ascetic and legalistic tendencies. The strong, by contrast, know that nothing is unclean in itself (Rom. 14:14), since they know only one Lord, from whom all things come (1 Cor. 8:6). Hence, they will eat anything (Rom. 14:2), even meat offered to idols (1 Cor. 8:1), and they regard all days alike (Rom. 14:5).

Although Paul regards himself as belonging to the "strong" (Rom. 14:14; 15:1; 1 Cor. 8:4), he stresses the importance of strong and weak living together in love (1 Cor. 8:1–3) before their common Lord (Rom. 14:6–8). The strong should not place a stumbling block (Rom. 14:13, 20; 1 Cor. 8:9) in the way of the weak or cause them offense (Rom. 14:13), thus troubling their conscience (1 Cor. 8:13), leading them astray (Rom. 14:21, 23; 1 Cor. 8:10), and bringing about their ruin (Rom. 14:21; 1 Cor. 8:11; cf. the OT use of this word group for stumbling and falling).

3. asthenēs also has a general sense of weakness. In 1 Pet. 3:7 women are spoken of as "the weaker partner," and Paul's personal appearance in Corinth is described as weak (2 Cor. 10:10). General human weakness is the subject of the epigrammatic saying in Matt. 26:41: "The spirit is willing, but the body [sarx] is weak." Gal. 4:9 should probably also be included here: The "basic principles [stoicheion, → 5122] of the world" (4:3) are described as "weak and miserable," i.e., disarmed and therefore powerless (cf. Col. 2:14). Economic weakness in the sense of need, poverty, is likely meant in Acts 20:35, so that the wealthy are to help the needy ("weak"), for "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

ἀστήρ (astēr), star (843); ἄστρον (astron), star, constellation (849).

CL & OT 1. The lit. use of astēr and astron is found in cl. Gk. writers and the LXX. In the OT, the stars, like the sun and moon, are God's creation (Gen. 1:16). Both cl. writers and the LXX refer to stars as indicating time (by their appearance) and having a fixed order as well as light and beauty. The most frequent use of astēr and astron in the LXX is in reference to their incalculable number, usually with the descendants of the patriarchs in mind (cf. Gen. 15:5; 22:17; 26:4; Exod. 32:13; Deut. 1:10; 10:22; 28:62).

2. The fig use of astēr and astron is also common in Gk. lit. and the LXX. Most frequent is the application to an illustrious person. In the LXX, those "who lead many to righteousness" will shine "like the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. 12:3). Often similes employ the beauty or glory of the stars (e.g., 1 Chr. 27:23; Wis. 7:29; Sir. 50:6). Obad. 4 speaks of pride as setting one's nest among the stars; in a similar way Isa. 14:12 refers to Heōsphoros (NIV: "morning star"), who in his proud heart will ascend above the stars of God and make himself like the Most High (14:13; cf. 2 Macc. 9:10).

In Num. 24:17, an astron is prophesied to come forth out of Jacob, a man out of Israel who will rule in victory. This text was understood messianically at Qumran but was not utilized in the NT, unless possibly in Rev. 22:16. This text may also be behind the Magi's decision to go to the land of Israel when they saw the "star in the east" (Matt. 2:1–2, 9). Along similar lines, astron was applied to Simon Bar Kokhba (whose name in Aram. means "Son of a Star"), the leader of the Jewish rebellion against the Romans in A.D. 132.

3. Astrology and the worship of the stars are known both in Gk. writers and the LXX. Although the stars are sometimes personified in the LXX (e.g., Jdg. 5:20; Ps. 148:3; Bar. 3:34), a strong stance is taken against astrology and the worship of the stars (Deut. 4:19; Isa. 47:13; Jer. 8:2; Amos 5:26).

4. The imagery of darkened stars is associated with suffering and judgment in the LXX (Job 3:9; 9:7; Eccl. 12:2; Wis. 17:5). The failure of the stars to give light becomes standard apocalyptic language used to describe historical and eschatological judgment (Isa. 13:10; Ezek. 32:7; Joel 2:10; 3:15). Occasionally the imagery varies, referring to stars falling, the host of heaven rotting away, and the skies being rolled up like a scroll (Isa. 34:4; cf. Dan. 8:10).

NT 1. Both astēr and astron are found in the NT; the difference between the two is stylistic (e.g., Lk.–Acts uses only astron, Rev. astēr). These two words occur 28x in the NT, only some of which are literal: Acts 27:20 (as guides to navigation at sea); 1 Cor. 15:41 (where astēr occurs 3x to refer to differing orders of glory); Heb. 11:12 (fig. of Abraham's innumerable descendants); Acts 7:43 (where Stephen alludes to the worship of stars in the OT period).

2. Unique to the infancy narrative of Matt. is the story of the Magi and the astēr that led them to Bethlehem (2:1–12). The ancient world often associated the birth of a great ruler with extraordinary phenomena in the heavens. Whether in Matt. we have to do with a miraculous star or something natural (e.g., the conjunction of planetary bodies, such as the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in 7 B.C., or a supernova) is uncertain. The Magi were experts in esoteric knowledge, persons for whom astrology was important (→ mageia, magic, 3404). Theologically viewed, the star was a sign of the dawning of the new and glorious era of the kingdom that the birth of the King inaugurates.

3. (a) The metaphorical use of astēr is frequent in the NT, esp. in Rev. Seven stars are mentioned 5x in Rev. 1–3. These stars are held in the right hand of the one who discloses himself to John in a vision (1:16, 20; 2:1; 3:1). In 1:20 the mystery is explained: The stars are "the angels of the seven churches" (the seven lampstands symbolize the seven churches). The number seven probably derives from the common seven-branched candelabra of Israel, if not from the symbolic perfection of the number itself. The seven stars may also be linked to the sovereignty symbolized in the ancient world by the seven planets. Whatever the case, the point is that true sovereignty, as opposed to the sovereignty claimed by the Roman emperors, lies with Christ and his people.

(b) The symbolism of the "morning star" in Rev. 2:28 and 22:16 is likewise difficult to understand. Although it can be related to the words of Num. 24:17, more probably it alludes to the morning star Venus, with the connotation not only of beauty but of daybreak, and also of sovereignty and victory (attested in Roman times). In Rev. 2:28, then, we may also understand the morning star given to the faithful as symbolic of sovereignty or rule.

(c) Further fig. use of astēr is found in the crown of twelve stars worn by the woman of Rev. 12:1, where the stars symbolize the twelve tribes of Israel. Jude 13 speaks of ungodly and heretical persons as "wandering stars" destined to an eternal darkness.

4. Stars are associated with the sun and moon in the apocalyptic imagery of eschatological judgment. In contrast to the LXX, where the darkening of the stars is common, only Rev. 8:12 in the NT refers to this. Elsewhere the NT speaks of stars falling from the sky (Matt. 24:29; Mk. 13:25; cf. Lk. 21:25), a phenomenon mentioned only 2x in the LXX. What is symbolized here is an event of great significance. If, as is probable, this language alludes to the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the theological continuity with and anticipation of the final eschatological judgment is not to be missed.

Further use of the falling stars imagery is found in Rev. At the opening of the sixth seal the stars fell to the earth "as late figs drop from a fig tree when shaken by a strong wind" (6:13). The blowing of the third trumpet announces the falling of "a great star, blazing like a torch . . . from the sky," which has the name Wormwood and makes bitter a third of the waters (8:10–12). At the fifth trumpet another star falls "from the sky to the earth" (9:1). Finally, the tail of the dragon "swept a third of the stars out of the sky and flung them to the earth" (12:4).

In the apocalyptic language about the sun, moon, and stars a recurrent question concerns how literally it is to be understood. One may debate the possibility of these luminaries being literally darkened, but not that the stars fall to earth. These statements about the stars underline the fig. nature of apocalyptic language. The real meaning of this language is theological. In the NT we move into the era of fulfillment prior to the consummation of God's purposes. Momentous events have occurred and are yet to occur—all of which are part of the same fabric of judgment and blessing and call for the most exalted language.

CL & OT Note that the basic cl. Gk. definitions are given in the NT section.

In neither Gk. nor Heb. is there a word corresponding to our word weather, but the ancients used a variety of words with which they discussed aspects of weather, and clearly some of those aspects mattered to them. In general the Gks. related meteorological phenomena to the gods. For example, the gods might use clouds for concealment when watching a battle on earth or when making love on a mountaintop, or they might use them as chariots. Note too that Iris ("rainbow") is the messenger goddess, and Nephele ("cloud"), the mother of the Centaurs.

There is much more than this in the OT, where God uses the weather to set forth his purposes. Note Deut. 11:13–17, where Yahweh says that if the people love him and serve him, he will give them rain; but if they worship other gods, he will withhold rain, the land will give no fruit, and the people will perish (cf. Lev. 26:4; 1 Ki. 17:14; Ps. 68:9; Jer. 5:24; Amos 4:7). Such a link between the people's religious life and the weather is often found. Great deliverances like that under Deborah and Barak are due to storms (Jdg. 5:20–21; cf. Jos. 10:11). Note Ps. 148:8: "lightning and hail, snow and clouds, stormy winds that do his bidding."

Phenomena such as clouds are associated with theophanies (e.g., Exod. 19:9; 24:16; 34:5; Lev. 16:2; Ps. 97:2). God makes the clouds his chariot and the winds his messengers (104:3–4; cf. Isa. 19:1). The coming day of the Lord is "a day of clouds and blackness" (Joel 2:2). The lightning is God's weapon (2 Sam. 22:15; Ps. 144:6) and the thunder his voice (Job 37:5; cf. Ps. 77:18; 104:7). He is often pictured as sending the wind or using it (e.g., Exod. 10:13, 19; 15:10; Num. 11:31), sometimes as the instrument of his wrath (Ezek. 13:13).

NT 1. astrapē means lightning, beam of light. In the OT astrapē is God's weapon, brilliantly lighting up the world (Ps. 77:18); it is also connected with rain (Jer. 10:13). In the NT it denotes the suddenness and the visibility of the coming of the Son of Man (Matt. 24:27; Lk. 17:24) and occurs in comparisons—e.g., Satan's fall (10:18) or an angel's face (Matt. 28:3). astrapē occurs 4x in Rev. (4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18), each time linked with other phenomena (voices, thunders, earthquake, and/or hail), proving that God is judge.

2. anemos normally denotes the winds that blow on the earth. This is the most common use of anemos in the NT (e.g., the winds that beat against the houses built on rock and on sand in Matt. 7:25, 27; the great storm that shipwrecked Paul in Acts 27:4, 7, 14–15). Jesus is supreme over the elements, as becomes clear from his stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:26–27; Mk. 4:37, 39; Lk. 8:23–25) and his walking on the sea (Matt. 14:24–32; Mk. 6:47–51). God is in control of the winds, for in Rev. angels hold back the four winds so they will not blow on the earth (7:1). The word is used fig. of "every wind of teaching" (Eph. 4:14), where someone not well established in the faith may depart quickly from sound doctrine.

3. brochē, rain (cf. brechō, to rain) is normally used for precipitation from the clouds; fig. it denotes what comes on human beings in abundance. In the NT there are two fig. uses: "Fire and sulfur rained down" on Sodom (Lk. 17:29), and the sinful woman "wet" (lit., "rained on") Jesus' feet with her tears (Lk. 7:38, 44). Jesus uses the fact that God makes rain fall on the just and the unjust to teach the universality of his love (Matt. 5:45). Rain is here symbolic of God's gifts in general. God is in control of rain, for Elijah prayed that it might not rain and it did not (Jas. 5:17). With this we should class the power of the two witnesses to prevent rain (Rev. 11:6).

4. brontē means thunder. In the NT it is used for a mighty voice on a number of occasions (Jn. 12:29; Rev. 6:1; 10:3–4; 19:6). In Rev., thunder is linked 4x with lightning (4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18). The one other fig. use of brontē is Mk.'s explanation of the name "Boanerges . . . Sons of Thunder," which is applied to the sons of Zebedee (3:17). Precisely why James and John receive this name is uncertain (though cf. 10:35–40; Lk. 9:51–55).

5. eudia is derived from eu and Dios, genitive of Zeus, to give the meaning "a good sky" and thus "fair weather." Its only NT use is Matt. 16:2, where it refers to the ability of the Pharisees and Sadducees to predict the coming of good weather as contrasted with their inability to discern what is more important, "the signs of the times."

6. iris means rainbow; fig. it denotes a halo or the iris of the eye. The Gks. personified the rainbow as the messenger goddess Iris. In the OT the rainbow appears as a sign of God's covenant that he will no longer send floods to destroy the earth (Gen. 9:13; note, however, that the LXX uses toxon [hunter's bow, reflecting the Heb. word], not iris). The LXX uses iris once only for the name of a plant (Exod. 30:24). In the NT the word occurs only in Rev. 4:3; 10:1. The first refers to a rainbow (or halo) around God's throne, "resembling an emerald"; the second refers to a strong angel robed in a cloud with a rainbow round his head. In both places the rainbow symbolizes the permanence of God's covenant and his will to be gracious to us.

7. The word lailaps is a tempestuous wind, whipping up so great a storm that the boat begins to fill (Mk. 4:37) and the disciples are in danger (Lk. 8:23). In 2 Pet. 2:17 this word refers to certain false teachers, who are likened to mists driven by a lailaps.

8. nephelē means a cloud or cloud mass. In the NT clouds are most often associated in some way with Jesus (though cf. Lk. 12:54; 1 Cor. 10:1–2; Jude 12). The Synoptics tell of the cloud at Jesus' transfiguration, which is plainly linked with the presence of God and from which the heavenly voice greets Jesus as "my Son, whom I love" (Matt. 17:5; Mk. 9:7; Lk. 9:34–35). At his ascension a cloud receives Jesus out of the sight of the disciples (Acts 1:9). When Jesus comes again at the Parousia there will be clouds (Matt. 24:30; 26:64; Mk. 13:26; 14:62; Lk. 21:27; 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 1:7). In Rev. 14:14–16, a reaper is sitting on a cloud at the judgment.

9. notos means the south wind (see Lk. 12:55; Acts 27:13; 28:13), but also south as a direction (Lk. 13:29; Rev. 21:13) and land to the south (Matt. 12:42; Lk. 11:31).

10. ombros signifies a rainstorm (cf. Lk. 12:54, only place in NT).

11. homichlē, mist or fog, is used of false teachers, who are compared to mists driven around by a strong wind and have nothing substantial about them (2 Pet. 2:17).

12. opsimos simply means late, but it was commonly used in the LXX with proïmos to indicate the late (and early) rains. In Palestine the proïmos is important to get the crops started and the opsimos to mature the grain before the dry season starts. Both words occur only in Jas. 5:7 in the NT.

13. rhipizō, to blow (of winds), occurs only in Jas. 1:6, where James likens the doubter to a wave blown about by winds; the thought is that of instability.

14. hyetos denotes a heavy shower in contrast to ombros (continuous rain). In the NT it is once used of rain as unpleasant (Acts 28:2); otherwise it is a gift of God (14:17), given in response to prayer (Jas. 5:18). It is linked with his blessing (Heb. 6:7) and is withheld in fulfillment of his purpose for his witnesses (Rev. 11:6).

15. Hail (chalaza) occurs in the NT only in Rev. It follows the blowing of the first trumpet (8:7), is one of the phenomena following the opening of the ark of God's covenant in heaven (11:19), and is the last of the horrors that followed the pouring out of the seventh bowl (16:21). The violence of a mighty hailstorm is a suitable picture of God's power and underlines the truth that his judgments are irresistible.

16. Snow (chiōn) is used in the NT only as a way of indicating whiteness. It is the color of the angel's robe (Matt. 28:3) and the head and hair of the glorious Lord (Rev. 1:14).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. asphaleia means security against stumbling, assurance from danger, certainty, the convincing nature of an argument, and a security or pledge as a technical legal term. asphalēs means immovable, steadfast, unshaken, and the vb. asphalizō means to secure, safeguard, and even to arrest.

2. In the OT asphaleia occurs 19x. It denotes the security that the Lord promises his people (Lev. 26:5; Deut. 12:10; cf. Prov. 8:14). It is also used of the foundations of the earth (Ps. 104:5). The word is used 6x in 2 Macc. (e.g., 3:22; 4:21), where it means security. Similar nuances occur for other words in this word group (e.g., the vb. is translated "I will uphold you with my righteous right hand" in Isa. 41:10).

NT asphaleia is used in a physical sense in Acts 5:23 ("we found the jail securely locked"). It is used fig. of the "certainty" of the things in which Theophilus has been instructed (Lk. 1:4). It denotes "safety" in 1 Thess. 5:3, where Paul is warning against a false sense of security. asphalēs is translated "safeguard" in Phil. 3:1. The adv. asphalōs denotes securely in the sense of being "under [secure] guard" in Mk. 14:44 (cf. also Acts 16:23). It is used fig. in the sense of being "assured" of the truth about who Christ is in Acts 2:36. asphalizō means to guard or make secure (the tomb of Jesus) in Matt. 27:64–66 and to fasten in Acts 16:24.

ἀτενίζω (atenizō), look at a person or thing intently, gaze on, observe (867).

CL There is little cl. use of this word that goes beyond the normal use in the senses listed above. In the Hel. period it was used in connection with magical activity. The word appears only 2x in the LXX, once with a fig. meaning (to "look diligently" to help those constructing the temple, 1 Esd. 6:28) and once lit. (3 Macc. 2:26).

NT atenizō occurs 14x in the NT. In each use it seems to emphasize the intensity of the look. When Jesus read from Isa. 61 in his hometown synagogue, all eyes were "fastened on him" (Lk. 4:20). When Peter was trying to avoid identification with Jesus after his arrest, he found himself scrutinized by a servant girl (22:56). In Acts 1:10 the disciples gaze at their ascending Lord (cf. also 3:12; 6:15; 7:55; 10:4; 11:6; 23:1). In 2 Cor. 3:7, 13, atenizō describes the way the Israelites would have stared at Moses' radiant face, had it not been hidden by the veil.

Three times atenizō is used in connection with a miracle (Acts 3:4; 13:9; 14:9). Peter "looked straight at" the crippled man in 3:4 and called for his attention (though the actual healing in 3:6–8 does not include any reference to eye contact). In 14:9 Paul looks directly at a crippled man, apparently to determine if he has faith. Only in 13:9 is the look directly incorporated in a context of cursing. It is not stated or implied, however, that anything like an evil eye is employed in the curse.

αὐξάνω (auxanō), grow, cause to grow, increase (889); αὔξησις (auxēsis), growth, increase (890); ὑπεραυξάνω (hyperauxanō), grow abundantly (5647); προκοπή (prokopē), progress, advancement, furtherance (4620); προκόπτω (prokoptō), go forward, advance, make progress, prosper (4621).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. auxanō means to cause to grow, to cause to increase. Trans. it is used esp. for natural growth, such as that of fruits, but also for increase and advancement in respect and power. The mid.-pass. can also mean to be exalted, glorified, or praised. The noun auxēsis means growth. hyperauxanō means to grow abundantly, plentifully, or extravagantly. auxanō is also used for the waxing of the moon and the sun. No specific philosophical or religious significance for this word stands out in the Gk. world, but prokoptō and prokopē in Stoic philosophy and in Philo denote ethical advance.

2. In the LXX auxanō means to be or make fruitful, plentiful. God is mainly the subj. of the process of causing growth (Gen. 17:20; 35:11; cf. Jer. 3:16; 23:3). It is frequently linked with plēthynō, to fill, multiply, and occurs in the original creation mandate, later renewed, to be fruitful and multiply (Gen. 1:22, 28; 9:1, 7; cf. 17:6). In the parabolic promise of Isa. 61:11 the process of growth is not viewed as something automatic. The point of the comparison is the difference between the first state and the last. The surprising thing is that the beginning and end stages are completely different. Where previously there was nothing, God's creative will becomes effective: He creates righteousness and praise. Sir. 43:8 speaks of the waxing of the new moon.

NT 1. Natural growth is alluded to directly only in Lk. 1:80 and 2:40, where the child Jesus is said to grow physically and in the Spirit.

2. (a) auxanō features in the parable of the sower (Mk. 4:8), the parable of the mustard seed (Matt. 13:32; Lk. 13:19), and the saying about the lilies of the field (Matt. 6:28). The picture of plantlike growth illustrates the coming of the kingdom through the gospel in the face of all opposition. God is the one who causes to grow that which he himself sows through Jesus or through his servants (cf. also 1 Cor. 3:6–7; 2 Cor. 9:10).

(b) In Paul's letters auxanō is not used in relation to the doctrine of justification but belongs to paraenesis. Only God can cause the church to grow (1 Cor. 3:5–11). Only by remembering its foundation or origin, which is Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 3:11), can the church truly grow (→ themelios, 2529). The thought here is not solely of numerical increase but also of maturity and the consolidation of the community in Christ from which good works naturally grow (2 Cor. 9:6–11).

(c) Eph. 2:20–22 does not contradict the picture of 1 Cor. 3:11, where the apostles and prophets are said to be the foundation on which the building grows, for Eph. 2:20 identifies Jesus Christ as "the chief cornerstone" (cf. Ps. 118:22; Matt. 21:42; Mk. 12:10–11; Lk. 20:17; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:7; → gōnia, 1224). Moreover, the church was by this time uniquely dependent on the witness of the apostles and prophets for the preaching about Christ. Thus, the growth of the church derives ultimately from Jesus Christ, who also holds the building together (cf. Eph. 2:20–21 with 1:5–7, 10; 2:10; 4:15–16).

Growth does not mean that the gospel calls people into some kind of extrahistorical existence. Because Christians are placed in the fellowship of the people of God, they are placed in a historical process that is determined by the promise of the worldwide rule of Christ. The existence together of Jews and Gentiles as children in the presence of the Lord of the church opens up a new dimension for the church as it grows into a single structure, a structure that continues to grow in personal holiness in Christ.

(d) Paul also uses the concept of a growing body to picture growth in the church (Eph. 4:15–16; Col. 2:19). Eph. 4:15–16 shows the way that this growth is to take place. When truth is spoken in love and love takes effect, the church grows into Christ, the one head. According to Col. 1:6, all growth springs from the gospel. As people are moved by the gospel, they grow in knowledge of God (Col. 1:10–11) and in grace (cf. 2 Pet. 3:18).

3. The NT can also speak of growth in faith (2 Cor. 10:15; 2 Thess. 1:3). Faith is conditioned by one's personal circumstances as well as by God's saving acts in history. It is brought about and renewed by the Word, the living Christ himself. But it undergoes transformation in the life of the Christian. Believers have their own particular history in relation to their Lord. They live between the "no longer" and the "not yet."

The decision that leads to baptism admittedly takes place only once, but faith needs to be constantly renewed (cf. Rom. 14:1; 1 Thess. 3:10). Faith grows out of the obedience of believers in the fellowship of the Christian community (2 Thess. 1:3; cf. Phil. 1:25–26). It leads to a more effective witness in the world (2 Cor. 10:15–16). Quantitative and qualitative growth are closely connected. The final goal of growth in faith is the day of Christ (Phil. 1:6). Growing faith always works outward, bringing fruit and bearing witness (2 Cor. 10:15; 2 Thess. 1:3).

4. In Acts growth is an important word for the missionary activity of the community (6:7; 12:24; 19:20). Acts 7:17 ("the number of our people in Egypt greatly increased") provides a clear reminder of OT salvation history. The experience of Israel (Exod. 1:7) is eschatologically applied to the Christian community (Acts 12:24).

5. The expression in Jn. 3:30, "He must become greater; I must become less," probably derives from the ancient linguistic usage of increasing or decreasing in esteem or importance. John the Baptist points to his Lord and withdraws his own light so that the one to whom he points may be seen.

6. auxanō is distinguished from the noun prokopē (Phil. 1:25; 1 Tim. 4:15) and the vb. prokoptō (Lk. 2:52; Rom. 13:12; Gal. 1:14; 2 Tim. 2:16; 3:9, 13), meaning advance, progress, in that in the NT the former occurs exclusively in a positive sense. It has thus more positive theological associations, for not every "advance" is also "growth." Note, for example, Paul's testimony of his advance in Judaism beyond people of his own age, illustrated by his zeal for persecuting the church (Gal. 1:13–14).

See also pleonazō, become more or great, grow, increase (4429).

ἀφίημι (aphiēmi), let go, cancel, remit, leave, forgive (918); ἄφεσις (aphesis), release, pardon, cancellation, forgiveness (912); πάρεσις (paresis), letting pass, passing over (4217).

CL& OT 1. In cl. Gk. aphiēmi (apo, from, and the vb. hiēmi, to put in motion, send) denotes the voluntary release of a person or thing over which one has legal or actual control. With a pers. obj., it means to send forth, send away (of a woman, to divorce), to leave, dispatch; with an impers. obj., to loose (e.g., a ship into the sea; to end a meeting), to discharge (e.g., arrows), to give up. In its fig. sense the vb. means to let alone, permit, neglect, give up, even to lose one's life. The legal use is important: to release from a legal bond, to acquit, to exempt (from guilt, obligation, or punishment). The noun aphesis means release, pardon, or remission. None of these meanings is found in a religious sense.

2. The LXX uses aphiēmi in such cl. Gk. senses as to let go (Jdg. 3:1), leave, give up (9:9, 11, 13, all only in A), leave behind (2 Sam. 15:16; 20:3), allow (16:10), leave over (Ps. 17:14), and release in the year of release (Deut. 15:2). It is seldom used in the sense forgive. Where it is, it usually renders the Heb. nāśā', to release from guilt or punishment (e.g., Gen. 18:26; Ps. 32:1, 5; Isa. 33:24), or sālaḥ, to forgive, pardon (e.g., Lev. 4:20–35; Num. 14:19; Isa. 55:7). Sometimes it stands for kipper, to cover, make atonement (Isa. 22:14). The one who forgives is God (though cf. Gen. 50:17). Through that act, the destroyed relationship between God and his people is reconstituted.

aphesis occurs about 50x in the LXX; 20 are in Lev. 25 and 27 (for the Year of Jubilee [release]) and 5 in Deut. 15:1–9 (for release from debts in the Year of Jubilee). It is also used of the release of captives and slaves (Isa. 61:1; Jer. 34:8, 15, 17 = LXX 41:8, 15, 17; Ezek. 46:17). Only once does aphesis perhaps have the sense of forgiveness (Lev. 16:26), though even here it may simply have the sense of send away, release.

In other words, these words, which in the NT are central to the issue of forgiveness, are not used in the LXX to convey that concept. Israel experienced God's grace of forgiveness largely in the context of OT worship; various terms were used to express the idea (e.g., washing, cleansing, covering).

3. Forgiveness in the OT. A number of preexilic Psalms (e.g., Ps. 25:11; 65:3; 78:38; 79:9) and passages in the prophets (e.g., Isa. 6) show a significant degree of reflection on the consciousness of sin and forgiveness. Sin is opposition to God, grounded in the inmost part of one's nature. It can only be brought to an end by a gracious gift of God (cf. Ps. 65:3–5).

Already in the Pentateuch we find references to sacrifices for sin and forgiveness (e.g., Exod. 32:11–14; 43:6). Sacrifices for atonement and forgiveness were instituted at the time of Moses and the exodus. Israelites did not think of sin in the abstract, but as a localized sphere arising out of transgression. It could not simply be forgotten; rather, it had to be dealt with by expiatory ritual, by which God broke through the continued outworking of the act and, as in Lev. 16, passed it on to the animal and so removed the guilt (Lev. 16:20, 22; cf. 17:11). The essential point is that God alone is the one who frees and forgives in all acts of atonement. However, not every sin could be atoned for and so forgiven by rites of atonement (e.g., offenses against the law of circumcision, Gen. 17:14; against the laws of the Sabbath and the Passover, Exod. 12:15; Num. 9:13).

In Isa. 40–55 the prophet recognizes that atonement by means of the blood of animals is not enough. Moreover, he sees that in the situation of the exile expiatory ritual will disappear. In the coming Servant of God Isaiah heralds the one on whom the sin of Israel and of the other nations will be laid, and through whom God will bring about an all-embracing atonement and forgiveness of sin (Isa. 53; cf. 55:6–13).

4. Judaism. aphiēmi and aphesis are found as terms for forgiveness in Josephus and Philo. However, a tension appears between this and the forgiving goodness of God that is associated in the OT with his righteousness (cf. Ps. 143:11). This is especially apparent in Josephus. The idea of one's working together with God and God's justice causes this Jewish historian to turn forgiveness into leniency on God's part. Where there is confession of sin and a change of mind, God is ready to be reconciled and hence to remit punishment. But this kind of forgiveness does not mean that evil is overcome and sin removed.

Rab. Judaism developed a thoroughgoing system of casuistry, in which God's forgiveness is catalogued. A distinction is made between (a) forgiveness of sins in this world by virtue of repentance and propitiatory sacrifices (e.g., on the great Day of Atonement); (b) forgiveness of sins in the world to come by means of expiation in the fire of Gehenna, or by means of divine grace; and (c) forgiveness of sins, or preservation from sins, in the messianic age. In connection with the latter, it is said that the Messiah will gain forgiveness for Israel on the grounds of his intercession and sufferings (Tg. Isa. 53:4ff.), but there is nowhere a reference to the Messiah forgiving sins by virtue of his own authority. God alone has the right to forgive sins. As in the OT, however, there are unforgivable sins (e.g., blasphemy against the name of God).

5. Qumran. There are a number of passages (e.g., 1QS 2:8, 16; 3:6–12; 11:3; CD 2:3–4; 3:18) that speak of God's forgiveness. In addition to a strong consciousness of election and mission, every single member of the community had a marked sense of sin and worthlessness. This awareness and at the same time knowledge of election by God was emphasized by a strong insistence on sin and forgiveness and with it a confession of utter dependence on God's grace. Forgiveness at Qumran was not tied to bloody rites of propitiation; rather, it was obtained by those who saw the error of their ways and turned from it in humility and a right spirit. Those who did not repent sincerely, but clung to Belial (Satan), excluded themselves from forgiveness and thus from the new covenant.

NT 1. aphiēmi occurs 143x in the NT. Of these 47 occur in Matt., 34 each in Mk. and the Lucan writings, and 15 in Jn. This leaves only 13x in the rest of the NT. In most instances aphiēmi denotes the original senses of to let, dismiss, divorce, release, leave, leave behind, or abandon. Only 45x does it bear the sense to forgive. Of these 45x, it is used occasionally in a secular sense (Matt. 18:27, 32), but usually in the religious sense (e.g., Matt. 12:32 par.)—e.g., forgiveness of sins (Mk. 2:5, 7, par.; Lk. 7:47–49), debts (Matt. 6:12), or trespasses (Mk. 11:25–26; Matt. 6:14–15).

aphesis, by contrast, occurs 17x in the NT, of which 15 have the sense of forgiveness (cf. Mk. 1:4 par.; Matt. 26:28; Lk. 1:77; Acts 2:38; Heb. 9:22), and 2 release from captivity (Lk. 4:18). In Paul's writings, aphesis occurs only in Eph. 1:7 and Col. 1:14.

paresis, passing over, letting go unpunished, occurs only at Rom. 3:25. There are, in addition, further circumlocutions for forgiveness (some of them echoing OT ritual language), such as kalyptō, to cover (→ 2821); airō, to take away, cancel (e.g., Jn. 1:29; → 149); apolouō, to get oneself washed (→ louō, 3374). In Paul the idea is expressed in more precise theological terms: dikaioō, to justify (→ dikaiosynē, 1466); and katallassō, to reconcile (→ 2904).

2. (a) The mere fact that we are sinners has destroyed our relationship with God (→ hamartia, 281), so forgiveness takes the central place in Christian proclamation as the means whereby this relationship is restored. It stands as the action of God in the face of human sin and is based on Christ's work (Col. 1:14; Eph. 1:7), whose power to forgive sins is made known in preaching (Lk. 24:47; Acts 10:42–43; 13:38), baptism (cf. Acts 2:38; Rom. 6:1–4), and the Lord's Supper (Matt. 26:28; cf. Jn. 6:53–58). The OT proclamation of forgiveness is here taken up and preached afresh as the fulfillment in Christ of what was promised of the old covenant (Jer. 31:34; 33:8) in the eschatological present (cf. Lk. 1:77; 4:18–21). The Synoptic Gospels and Acts often use the phrase "forgiveness of sins" (cf. Mk. 1:4–5 par.; Acts 5:31). The terms preferred by the other NT writers—such as redemption (apolytrōsis), reconciliation (katallagē), justification (dikaiōsis)—concentrate more on the work of Christ.

(b) According to Mk. 10:45 par., the preaching of Jesus reached its climax in the forgiveness brought by him (Matt. 18:21–35; Lk. 4:18–21; 15:11–32). It appears as the activity appropriate to him (Mk. 2:7, 10, par.; Lk. 7:49). In Mk. 2:1–12 par. (the healing of the paralytic), we see forgiveness taking, despite all the objections, the place it is to occupy in the activity of Jesus as the one proper essential work he has come to do. Jesus' attitude to notorious sinners underlines his preaching by action (Lk. 7:36–50; 19:1–10).

(c) Forgiveness includes both making of no account the sin that has been committed (Mk. 2:5 par.; cf. Jn. 8:11) and the acceptance of the sinner (Lk. 15:20–32; cf. also Col. 1:13–14, which speaks of deliverance from the dominion of the powers and transference to Christ's kingdom), to whom a new life is given and with it the promise of eternal life (Matt. 5:43–48; Lk. 23:43; Jn. 14:19b). Early Christian preaching shows that this acceptance is at the same time an acceptance into the church. It therefore includes a share in the forgiveness that is continually pronounced there, because it is continually needed (Matt. 18:18; cf. 16:19; Jn. 20:23).

Forgiveness is closely associated with the death of Jesus on the cross (cf. Jn. 3:16; Rom. 8:32; Heb. 9:22). As the "Lamb of God," he takes away the sin of the world (Jn. 1:29; cf. 1 Pet. 2:21–24). In the Lord's Supper reference is made to the reconciling effect of Jesus' death in the words "blood of the covenant ... poured out ... for the forgiveness of sins" (Matt. 26:28). In 1 Cor. 15:17 it is linked to the resurrection of Jesus (cf. Rom. 4:25; 14:9; 2 Cor. 5:15b; cf. also Acts 5:31).

(d) Repentance (metanoia, → 3567) and confession of sins (Mk. 1:15; Acts 2:38; 5:31; 1 Jn. 1:9) are not "works" offered up to God. Rather, they are the acceptance, brought about by God himself, of his verdict on the "old self" and an openness to his word of deliverance (cf. Acts 19:18). Nor can the readiness of a person to forgive a fellow human being, with which the divine declaration of forgiveness is closely linked (Matt. 6:12 par.; 14–15; Mk. 11:25; Lk. 6:37), be regarded as a meritorious precondition. It belongs to the new life that has been given by Christ. Where this has been received, it is the natural, daily sign of the forgiven sinner's gratitude.

This process is demonstrated negatively by the example of the wicked servant (Matt. 18:32–35). The passages cited from the Sermon on the Mount are also directed at those who have already received God's forgiveness, in whom gratitude is to be expected, showing itself in one's imitation of Christ and his forgiveness (cf. Col. 3:13; Eph. 4:32). One's forgiveness of a debtor (Matt. 6:12 par.) and even of an enemy (Matt. 5:38–48; Rom. 12:19–21) comes about as the consequence of God's forgiveness in Christ.

(e) As noted above, in Paul the terms aphiēmi and aphesis virtually disappear (cf. Rom. 4:7). This is because the proclamation of forgiveness appears there as a systematized doctrine. The fact that forgiveness is not merely a remission of past guilt, but includes total deliverance from the power of sin and restoration to fellowship with God, is expressed by Paul in his doctrine of justification (cf. Rom. 3:21–28; 4:22, 25; Gal. 3:6–9) and of reconciliation (of the sinner, Rom. 5:10–11; 2 Cor. 5:18; of the world, Rom. 11:15; 2 Cor. 5:19) with God. These have taken place in Christ as God's own free act and form the center of the gospel. Forgiveness takes place because God gives himself completely in the sacrifice of his Son (Rom. 8:32; 2 Cor. 5:21) and so gives a person a share in his own righteousness (Rom. 3:21–28). Thus, "in Christ" we become pardoned sinners (Rom. 8:1) and new creatures (2 Cor. 5:17).

(f) The task of proclaiming this message of forgiveness is given to the church, which carries it out in preaching, in the personal declaration of forgiveness to individuals, and in the rites of baptism and the Eucharist. The last of these is not a case of mere reference to and repetition of something past. Each celebration of the Lord's Supper is a fresh act of proclamation, coming from Christ himself to the concrete situation of the present (1 Cor. 11:26). The validity of forgiveness is grounded in the authority given by Christ to the church (Matt. 18:18; cf. 16:19; Jn. 20:23; cf. also 1 Jn. 5:16) and always remains conditional on obedience to him.

Moreover, forgiveness comes about through the renewed realization of forgiveness in the real situations of everyday life, with their call to decision, and not in some timeless application. This prong is shown by the commission to retain sin along with the commission to forgive sins (krateō used rather than aphiēmi, Jn. 20:23; cf. Matt. 18:18; 16:19). Without this, forgiveness would be in danger of being trivialized. In this connection see Acts 5:1–11; 1 Cor. 5:1–5; Heb. 6:4; 10:26–27; 1 Jn. 5:16–17.

ἀφίστημι (aphistēmi), trans. cause to revolt, mislead; intrans. go away, withdraw, depart, (923); ἀποστασία (apostasia), rebellion, state of apostasy, defection (686).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. aphistēmi means trans. to put away, remove: (a) in a spatial sense; (b) from a condition or relationship; or (c) from association with a person. It also means to turn someone against a person, to cause to revolt. Intrans. it means to remove oneself, go away; withdraw from, give up; fall away. From it are derived the nouns apostasis (later apostasia), revolt, apostasy; apostatēs, deserter, political rebel; and apostasion, a legal term for handing over at the time of purchase, also used of a bill of divorce (Deut. 24:1, 3; Matt. 5:31; 19:7; Mk. 10:4).

2. In the LXX words of this group occur more than 250x, rendering about 40 different Heb. words. They are of special interest theologically when used to translate forms of māʿal, to act unfaithfully or against the law (2 Chr. 26:18; 28:19, 22); pāšaʿ, to rebel, transgress (21:8, 10); and mārad, to rebel, revolt (Gen. 14:4; Jos. 22:18). The meaning of aphistēmi is like that in cl. Gk.: removal in a spatial sense (Gen. 12:8), separation of persons (1 Sam. 18:13; Ps. 6:8), withdrawal from a relationship (Num. 8:25) or from a state (Prov. 23:18; Isa. 59:9), and political revolt (Gen. 14:4; 2 Chr. 21:8, 10; Ezek. 17:15).

A meaning not found in cl. Gk. is the use in religious contexts: God departs from people (Jdg. 16:20; 2 Ki. 17:18; 23:27) and withdraws his gifts (Num. 14:9, protection; 2 Sam. 7:15, steadfast love; Isa. 59:11, 14, salvation and righteousness). The underlying cause is our own willful departure from God (Deut. 32:15; Jer. 2:5; 3:14) and scorn of his gifts (Num. 14:31; Neh. 9:26). This rebellion expresses itself in the cultic worship of other gods (Deut. 7:4; 13:10, 13; Jdg. 2:19 A) and in ethical behavior of disobedience toward God (Ezek. 33:8 A; Dan. 9:9–11). Against this background we should understand exhortations to resist sin (Exod. 23:7; Ps. 119:29; Isa. 52:11).

3. At Qumran the act of turning away from the community and its rules was condemned as apostasy. The literature of the sect sets down a two-year period of repentance for the apostate member who wanted to return (1QS 7:18ff.), but anyone who had belonged to the community for more than ten years was completely excluded if he became guilty of apostasy (1QS 7:22ff.).

NT 1. In the NT this group of words is found only in Luke, Paul, and Heb. 3:12. On the word apostasion, bill of divorce, also part of this word group, → 687.

2. aphistēmi occurs in the spatial sense in Lk. 2:37 ("she never left the temple"). More often it refers to the separation of people: holding back from carrying out a punishment (Acts 5:38; 22:29), Mark's withdrawal from helping Paul in his work (15:38), the departure of the Christians from the Jewish synagogue (19:9), and the disappearance of supernatural beings from human presence (Lk. 4:13; Acts 12:10; 2 Cor. 12:8). In Lk. 13:27 (citation of Ps. 6:8) believers are warned against unfruitful discipleship. Those who fail to grasp the present hour of grace may one day find themselves separated forever from the Lord. In 2 Tim. 2:19 aphistēmi refers to moral behavior: "Everyone who confesses the name of the Lord must turn away from wickedness." Acts 5:37 uses the word for political defection.

3. Of theological importance is falling away in the religious sense. In Acts 21:21 (cf. 2 Macc. 5:8) Paul is accused of leading the Diaspora Jews astray by teaching them to disregard the OT law. The absolute use of apostasia in 2 Thess. 2:3 is a common expression in Jewish apocalyptic, with its prophecy of a period of apostasy shortly before the appearance of the Messiah (1 Enoch 5:4; 93:9). Paul locates this event in an anti-Christian period directly preceding the return of Christ. In 1 Tim. 4:1 he states that some will "abandon the faith" in the last days in terms of falling into false, heretical beliefs.

Lk. 8:13 probably refers to apostasy as a result of eschatological temptation. Here are people who have come to believe, who have received the gospel "with joy." But under pressure of persecution and tribulation arising because of the faith, they break off their relationship with God. According to Heb. 3:12, apostasy consists in an unbelieving and self-willed movement away from God.

aphistēmi thus connotes the serious situation of becoming separated from the living God, after a previous turning toward him, by falling away from the faith. It is a movement of unbelief and sin.

952 ἄψινθος

ἄψινθος (apsinthos), wormwood (952).

CL & OT apsinthos refers to some variety of the plant group Artemisia, of which several varieties occur in Palestine. All of them have a bitter taste. apsinthion (a neut. form) occurs in Aquila's translation of Prov. 5:4; Jer. 9:15; 23:15, but the word group appears nowhere else in the LXX.

NT apsinthos should be understood lit. in Rev. 8:11: "The name of the star is Wormwood. A third of the waters turned bitter [lit., became wormwood), and many people died from the waters that had become bitter." It is part of a vision of judgment on the ungodly world.

The problem with this use of apsinthos is that it both refers to the name of a star and then describes the water into which the star fell. Obviously the water became bitter and the name of the star is connected with this bitterness. In Rev., however, the water causes death, whereas wormwood, while bitter, is not known to be poisonous. The author may have in mind a genuinely poisonous substance, other than the wormwood we know. Or he may be using a way of speech clearly evident in antiquity, whereby bitterness and poison were connected. Perhaps John is reasoning from the bitterness of the taste to the bitterness of the results. This fits in also with the fact that in the OT wormwood is used of God's punishment of the wicked, including their death; e.g., "This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'See, I will make this people eat bitter food and drink poisoned water'" (Jer. 9:15; cf. 23:15).

B beta

956 Βαβυλών

Βαβυλών (Babylōn), Babylon (956).

CL & OT 1. (a) We do not know when Babylon was founded. The earliest known reference, from the time of Shar-kali-sharri of Akkad (c. 2500–2290 B.C.), is to Bab-ilim, gate of god, which appears to be a popular etymology of a pre-Sem. name, Babila. The Gk. form expresses the later pl. variation Bab-ilani, gate of the gods.

(b) The town had little historical importance prior to Hammurabi (18th cent. B.C.), who made it the cultural leader of the Near East. This was partially due to making Marduk the city god of Babylon, and so the head of the Sumerian-Akkadian pantheon of some 1,300 deities. It brought all the religious traditions into one system. Babylon made great advances, independently of Greece, in philology, medicine, mathematics, and astronomy (cf. Dan. 1:4, 17).

(c) Babylon regained political power during the time of the Chaldean kings (625–539 B.C.), the most important of whom was Nebuchadnezzar (605–562). Its immense riches came from its far-reaching commercial traffic.

2. Gen. 10:8–12 traces back the concept of world dominion to Babylon, after which it passed to Assyria. In 11:1–9 the architecture of the giant temple of Babylon is stigmatized as the expression of human pride that wishes to storm heaven.

3. As a result of the exile we find four types of statements concerning Babylon. (a) The king of Babylon is Yahweh's instrument for the destruction of Judah and its allies (Jer. 25:9; 27:6–7). He bears Yahweh's sword in his world conquest (Ezek. 30:24–25). Judah will be destroyed because of its harlotry with Assyria and Babylon, in view of the introduction of their cults when on friendly terms with them (23:11–32).

(b) Toward the end of the exile, the downfall of Babylon and the deliverance of the exiles were proclaimed (Isa. 47; 48:12–16a, 20–22; 21:1–10; Jer. 50; 51). In this connection the total desolation of Babylon in war was expected.

(c) Isa. 13 expects the eradication of sinners and the destruction of tyranny to coincide with the destruction of Babylon, and 14:1–23 mocks Babylon as a fallen power, the end of which will bring peace and salvation to all peoples. Here Babylon appears as a type of the power that opens to those who are evil every possibility in the world. When it falls, they perish. As the later chapters of Isa. show, the polemic against Babylon exceeded in seriousness anything that had gone before.

(d) Contrary to expectation, Babylon was not destroyed, and the freeing of the exiles did not mark the opening of a new era of salvation. Dan. 2 and 7 speaks of four world powers that eliminated one another: Babylon, Media, Persia, and Greece. The destruction of the last of them would be followed by a final kingdom of salvation.

NT 1. The mention of Babylon in Acts 7:43 picks up OT threads: The Babylonian exile happened as punishment for Israel's persistent idolatry. According to Matt. 1:11, 17, the second phase of Israel's history ended with the exile. After the passing of fourteen more generations (as in the previous two periods), the fulfillment of all God's promises was to be expected—esp. the promise of Jesus, the Messiah.

Babylon in 1 Pet. 5:13 (seen against the background of Jewish parallels) most likely refers to Rome. The significance of this name, which is probably more than a mere disguise, is as follows: As the Jews once lived in exile in Babylon, so the Christians now live as exiles in the world; they are strangers in the dispersion (1 Pet. 1:1), attacked with hate by a totalitarian world that seeks to have its own way (cf. 4:12–18; 5:8–9).

2. The most important references to Babylon are in Rev. 14:8; 16:19; 17:1–19:10, which links up with Isa. 13 and 14. Here Babylon is the type of worldly power in rebellion against God and the antitype of the heavenly Jerusalem (21:1–22:5). In the last analysis history consists in the great struggle of worldly power against the rule of Christ. As Christ is killed and passes on his way through death to resurrection and redemption, the powers of this world continually manifest their might, riches, and abominations. But in the end they will be conquered by the slaughtered Lamb on the throne.

Babylon the Great has some of the features of historic Rome. Like Rome, she sits "on many waters" (17:1) and has seven hills (cf. 17:4, 9). She wears a fillet with a name, as worn by Roman harlots (17:5). The description of the woman riding on the beast (17:3–4) recalls pictures of oriental gods and goddesses, esp. Cybele of Rome.

βάθος (bathos), depth (958); βαθύς (bathys), deep (960).

CL & OT 1. (a) In. cl. Gk. bathos denotes the extension of a thing in any spatial dimension (downward, horizontal, or even upward). In military usage it indicates the number of men standing behind one another. Used fig. bathos expresses the completeness, intensity, or greatness of an object or human quality (wisdom, understanding, soul) as well as its inscrutability and hiddenness. The derived adj. bathys has the same shades of meaning as the noun.

(b) Hel. and esp. gnostic religion took up the fig. meaning in speaking of the depth of deity and of God as depth. God was thought of primarily as apersonal, not as Thou or He.

2. (a) In the LXX bathos is rarely used lit., though it does refer to the sources of rivers (Job 28:11; Zech. 10:11;) and the depths of the sea (Wis. 10:19). In its fig. sense it always denotes that which is separated from God. bathos thus stands for the inner need of a person troubled by guilt and sin (Ps. 130:1) and the external need of pressing circumstances (Ps. 69:2, 14). It also expresses the most extreme separation from God (the depths of the sea, Jon. 2:4; Mic. 7:19) in passages where the frontier between lit. and fig. meanings is fluid. In Ezek. bathos means the underworld (cf. Ezek. 26:20; 31:14, 18; 32:18–19, 24), which also expresses separation from God.

(b) It is significant that although Heb. t^{e}hôm is generally translated the deep (e.g., Gen. 1:2), the LXX does not render it bathos but abyssos (→ 12). While bathos always contains the idea of separation from God, abyssos suggests a final, terrible, and mysterious depth.

NT 1. bathos appears 8x in the NT; the adj. bathys, 4x. The lit. sense of bathos occurs only in the Synoptics: depth of soil (Matt. 13:5), the depth of the sea (Lk. 5:4). In 2 Cor. 8:2 it denotes "extreme poverty."

2. Rom. 11:33 and 1 Cor. 2:10 speak of the depth of God or the depth of the knowledge of God. This refers to the unfathomable nature of his ways and judgments in contrast to the superficiality of human insight. But it also suggests a richness of the ways and means available to God to pursue his plan of salvation. It is important that God is not reduced here to an impersonal it. He is not described as the ultimate ground of all being, but as the one who has revealed himself in Jesus Christ, in whom are hid the ultimate mysteries.

3. Similarly, in Eph. 3:18 bathos expresses the comprehensiveness of God's grace and of Christ's love. Christian faith should not be satisfied with the fragmentary or the superficial.

4. In Rom. 8:39 bathos is linked with hypsōma ("height," cf. Isa. 7:11) and clearly describes some kind of power that oppresses humanity. In astrology bathos is the part of heaven below the horizon, from which the stars rise. Powers emanating from the stars are perhaps intended here. What is theologically decisive is the statement that even these powers have been defeated by the power of God's love in Jesus Christ—a statement of great relevance even today.

5. In Lk. 24:1; Jn. 4:11; Acts 20:9, bathys has a somewhat lit. meaning: "very early" in the morning, a "deep" well, and a "deep" sleep. But Rev. 2:24 is of theological significance. Here Jesus refers to the "deep secrets" of Satan as promoted by "that woman Jezebel" (2:20). These involve participation in the immorality and ungodliness of this world. To plunge into such depths does not mean control over these powers but surrender to them and the loss of salvation.

960 (bathys, deep), → 958.

966 βαπτίζω

βαπτίζω (baptizō), dip, immerse, baptize (966); βάπτω (baptō), dip (970); βαπτισμός (baptismos), dipping, washing (968); βάπτισμα (baptisma) baptism (967); βαπτιστής (baptistēs) baptizer, Baptist (969).

CL & OT 1. In secular Greek baptō means dip, dye, draw (water). baptizō is an intensive form of baptō, meaning dip, cause to perish (as by drowning a man or sinking a ship). For ritual washings, in general louō, wash (the whole body), niptō, wash or rinse (parts of the body), and rhainō, sprinkle, were used.

2. In the LXX baptō usually translates the Heb ṭābal, dip (13x). baptizō occurs only 4x, translating ṭāba only in 2 Ki. 5:14, where it is used in the mid. of Naaman's sevenfold immersion in the Jordan. The use of baptizō in the story of Naaman may have been decisive for its later use in the mid. to signify taking a ritual bath for cleansing.

It seems that baptizō, both in Jewish and Christian contexts, normally meant immerse and that even when it became a technical term for baptism, the thought of immersion remains. The metaphorical uses of the word in the NT appear to take this for granted, such as the prophecy that the Messiah will baptize in Spirit and fire (Matt. 3:11), the "baptism" of the Israelites in the cloud and the sea (1 Cor. 10:2), and Jesus' death as a baptism (Mk. 10:38–39; Lk. 12:50). The Pauline representation of baptism as burial and resurrection with Christ is consonant with this view.

3. The Jewish baptizing sects (including Qumran) do not appear to have used ṭābal and baptizō for their lustrations. It is doubtful whether these lustrations should in any sense be classed with baptism, seeing that they were repeated often while baptism is received only once; nevertheless, it does seem as if a novice's first lustration had the character of initiation into full membership of the community. Note too that these lustrations were accompanied by penitence and submission to God's will and were thus viewed as effective for the cleansing of moral impurity.

4. A Gentile convert to Judaism at the beginning of the Christian era was required to receive circumcision, undergo a ritual bath, and offer a sacrifice. The Heb. and

Aram. word ṭābal is used for this so-called "proselyte baptism." The few references to this event in Gk. lit. employ baptō, not baptizō. The extent to which proselyte baptism influenced the baptism of John and early Christian baptism is a much-debated question, esp. since the earliest references to it belong to the latter half of the 1st cent. A.D. Note that the decisive event for proselytes was circumcision, not baptism. The Christian understanding of baptism in terms of dying and rising is determined by its character as a baptism into the Messiah, who died and rose and thereby inaugurated the "age to come."

NT 1. John's baptism is universally described in the NT by the vb. baptizō; this is also true of Christian baptism throughout the NT. baptō occurs 4x (Lk. 16:24; Jn. 13:26 [2x]; Rev. 19:13), and only with the meaning dip. Of the noun forms baptismos occurs only 4x; baptisma occurs 19x and refers to John's baptism, Christian baptism, or the baptism (death) that Jesus had to undergo. John himself is often called baptistēs, the baptizer (12x, only in the Synpotics).

2. The baptism of John. John's baptism, which was a "baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mk. 1:4), had two focal points: It marked the "turn" (repentance) of a Jew to God, associating a person with the penitent people and assuring that person of forgiveness and cleansing, and it anticipated the messianic baptism with Spirit and fire, assuring the penitent one a place in the kingdom (cf. Matt. 3:11). Isa. 4:2–5 and Mal. 3:1–6 suggest that this messianic baptism was symbolic of a universal judgment that would refine God's people and fit them for the kingdom, but that would consume the wicked.

3. Jesus' baptism and the command to baptize. Christian baptism is rooted in the redemptive action of Jesus. His submission to the baptism of John (Mk. 1:9) demonstrated his solidarity with sinful humanity. The divine approval it received (1:10–11) showed it to be the initiation of the movement of salvation. The authorization of baptism during Jesus' ministry (Jn. 4:1–2) was provisional. The command to baptize belongs in the resurrection era, after redemption was achieved, universal authority was given to the risen Lord, and the mission of the church to the world began (Matt. 28:18–20).

4. The early church. (a) Baptism seems to have accompanied the proclamation of the gospel from the beginning of the church's mission (Acts 2). Baptism required repentance (2:38) and was administered "in the name of Jesus Christ," i.e., in relation to Jesus Christ and with the use of his name, so that the baptized called on the name of Christ (22:16) even as the name was called over them, signifying to whom they belonged (cf. Jas. 2:7). It was "for the forgiveness of ... sins" and with a view to receiving the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38). Variations from this norm (notably 8:14–17; 10:44–45; 19:1–6) reflect the variety of circumstances and of experiences of the Spirit in a period of transition.

(b) Paul's interpretation of baptism in Gal. 3:27 is significant. Baptism is "into Christ" (a shorthand expression for "into the name of Christ"); it relates believers to Christ in such a way that they are "in Christ" (cf. 3:26). From this basic view flow the other features of baptism that appear in Paul.

- Baptism "into Christ" is baptism "into his death" (Rom. 6:3–4); it relates believers to Christ's redemptive action, so that Christ's death on Golgotha was their death; it entailed an end ("death") to the life of estrangement from God and the beginning of life in Christ.
- Baptism into Christ is baptism into the church, for to be in Christ is to be a member of the body of Christ (Gal. 3:27–29; 1 Cor. 12:13).

- Baptism into Christ is baptism into the Spirit of Christ (1 Cor. 12:13), for the Spirit and Christ are inseparable (Rom. 8:9–11; 2 Cor. 3:17).
- Baptism into Christ involves a life after the pattern of Christ's dying to sin and rising for righteousness (Rom. 6:4; cf. the baptismal ethics of Col. 3:3–13).
- Baptism into Christ is for life in the kingdom to be revealed in the day of Christ (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30).

This eschatological relation of baptism explains the adoption by the church of the custom of baptizing the living for the dead (cf. 1 Cor. 15:29), that the latter might share in the kingdom of God. The practice cannot be reconciled with Paul's proclamation and was used by him only as part of a polemic against those who denied the resurrection.

Baptism into Christ is subordinate to the gospel of Christ (1 Cor. 1:17). Paul as an apostle usually left it to others to administer (1:14–16). This is not to minimize baptism but to clarify its function. It embodies the gospel of grace and the occasion for confessing it. Confessional declarations in the NT letters may have originated as baptismal confessions (e.g., Rom. 10:9; Phil. 2:6–11; Eph. 4:4–6; Col. 1:13–20).

(c) The relation between "washing" and the "word" is reflected in Eph. 5:26 (cf. 4:5). In harmony with this, 1 Pet. 3:21 defines baptism as "the pledge [or response, cf. NIV note] of a good conscience toward God." In this context the power of the resurrection becomes known (baptism "saves you by the resurrection of Jesus Christ").

In Jn 3:3–5 and Tit. 3:5 baptism is associated with regeneration (→ gennaō, 1164). In both passages the operation of the Spirit is in the foreground. In Tit. 3:5 (a baptismal hymn?) the pertinent clause should be rendered, "He saved us through the washing characterized by the regeneration and renewal wrought by the Holy Spirit," while Jn. 3:3–5 affirms the necessity of a new beginning from God ("from above," see NIV note) through submission to baptism and the recreative work of the Holy Spirit. Through the lifting up of Jesus on the cross (3:14–15) and the sending of the Holy Spirit (3:8; cf. 7:39), the two "baptisms" have been brought together.

(d) In Acts and the NT letters baptism appears as a divine-human event. Both elements are given due weight. (i) Divine. Since baptism signifies union with Christ (Gal. 3:27), all that Christ did for humankind in his redeeming acts is joined with baptism in the apostolic writings: union with Christ (Rom. 6:1–5; Col. 2:11–12), forgiveness of sins and cleansing from sins (Acts 2:38; 22:16), bestowal of the Spirit (2:38; 1 Cor. 12:13), membership in the body of Christ (12:13; Gal. 3:27), renewal by the Spirit (Tit. 3:5), and the promise of the kingdom of God (Jn. 3:5). (ii) Human. In order to receive these benefits of Christ and his saving grace, human beings must exercise faith. This joining of divine action and human faith within the context of baptism implies two things: that God's gracious gift to the faithful belongs to the context of baptism, and that his gift in baptism is only to those with faith (see esp.1 Pet. 3:21).

A word of caution is, however, required. Acts demonstrates that all statements about the action of God in baptism must allow for divine freedom in bestowing salvation and the Spirit. At Pentecost, for example, the Spirit was poured out on a company of men and women who had not received Christian baptism (i.e., baptism in the name of Jesus), and we do not know how many of them had received any other baptism. The complicated phenomena regarding baptism and the Spirit in the stories of the Samaritan believers (Acts 8:14–17), Cornelius and his company (10:44–48), and the Ephesian "disciples" (19:1–6) doubtless were not solitary in the early church. Life is more complex than formulations of doctrine, and God is able to meet every variation from the norm.

5. Infant baptism. The belief that the apostles commanded the baptism of infants as well as of responsible persons is attested as early as Origen (3d cent. A.D.). Apart from some notable exceptions, it became the unquestioned conviction of Christendom until the present century. The rise of the critical study of the Bible caused a widespread change of opinion, so that by 1940 the majority of NT scholars agreed that in the apostolic age baptism was administered to believers only.

This revised view was contested in the 1950s and 1960s, above all by O. Cullmann and J. Jeremias. It was maintained that the traditional arguments for the apostolic institution of infant baptism are vindicated by sound theology and by modern biblical and archaeological research. For example, that household baptisms (Acts 11:14; 16:33; 18:8) included infants is strengthened by the contention that the term oikos (house) had gained an almost technical significance among Jews and had special reference to little children. The terminology of Jewish proselyte baptism is perhaps suggested in 1 Cor. 7:14, with the presumption that the Jewish customs of baptizing young children of proselytes was accepted by the primitive church. The saying of Jesus concerning little children and the kingdom of God (Mk. 10:14) has been given form-critical evaluation: The story is said to reflect the Sitz im Leben of a church seeking to answer the question, "Should we baptize our children?" and the answer is implied, "Yes, bring them to baptism as they were once brought to Jesus." This conclusion is supported by the contention that the command "Do not hinder them" reflects an early liturgical use of the term in baptism (→ kōlyō, 3266).

The Reformed view of the one covenant with its continuing sacraments, stressing the close relation between circumcision and baptism, is supported by typological exegesis, hinted at in 1 Cor. 10:1–6 (where baptism is seen as symbolized by the passing through the Red Sea) and Col. 2:11–12. Evidence from early Christian burial inscriptions is given as proof of the baptism of infants in the earliest church.

These views have met with differing reactions. Some consider the rise of infant baptism to be no earlier than the close of the 2d cent. A.D. Others believe that infant baptism is excluded from the horizon of the apostolic writers, not only because of the lack of explicit reference, but also by their equation of the gift of baptism with the gift of faith. Moreover, according to the NT, baptism imparts to the baptized not only a blessing but esp. Christ and his full salvation. This is comprehensible only in a milieu where baptism and personal conversion are inseparable (cf. Acts 2:41; 16:33).

6. (a) baptismos, dipping, immersion, represents Jewish ritual cleansing (by immersion) of vessels in Mk. 7:4; in Heb. 9:10 it refers to the purification of persons. Presumably this reflects the Jewish usage of the term. Among Greek-speaking Jews this word was probably used for proselyte baptism. In Heb. 6:2, "instruction about baptisms" (baptismoi) denotes instruction about the contrast between Christian baptism and all other religious washings.

(b) The word baptisma appears for the first time in the NT. Since its earliest use is for the baptism of John, it may have been coined by John's disciples, though it is more likely a Christian innovation that was then referred back to John's baptism. It seems that baptisma was formed on the analogy of its Heb. equivalent, ṭᵉbîlâ, in order to express the Christian conviction that baptism was a new thing in the world, differing from all Jewish and pagan purificatory rites.

βάρος (baros), weight, burden (983); βαρύς (barys), heavy, burdensome, weighty, important, fierce (987); βαρέω (bareō), load, burden, weigh down (976); βαρέως (bareōs), heavily, with difficulty (977); βαρύτιμος (barytimos), very expensive or precious (988); ἐπιβαρέω (epibareō), to burden (2096); καταβαρέω (katabareō), to burden, weigh down (2851); φορτίον (phortion), burden, load (5845); φορτίζω (phortizō), burden, load (5844).

CL & OT baros in cl. Gk. and Hel. usage means a weight or burden; the adj. barys means heavy. The vb. bareō means load, burden, weigh down. The diminutive phortion (from phortos) means a load or burden carried by an animal or person, hence also cargo. All these words came to be used interchangeably.

In the LXX baros and bareō occur only rarely; barys is more frequent. The adv. bareōs in conjunction with akouō (hear) denotes being heavy of hearing (Isa. 6:10; cf. Matt. 13:15; Acts 28:27). Isaiah is called to prophesy and make the heart of the people calloused, their ears dull (heavy), and their eyes shut; "otherwise they might see with their eyes, hear with their ears, understand with their hearts, and turn and be healed."

NT 1. (a) baros is used in Matt. 20:12 of the burden of daily toil. The Jerusalem council desired to lay no greater burden on the Gentile Christians than that they should abstain from meat sacrificed to idols, from blood, from what had been strangled, and from sexual immorality (Acts 15:28–29). Teaching in Rev. 2:24 is also described as a burden. In 2 Cor. 1:8; 5:4, Paul speaks of being burdened (bareō; NIV "pressure" in 1:8) by persecution on the one hand and the general human condition on the other; these are overcome by confidence in God, who raises the dead, and by hope of ultimate triumph. bareō is used of eyes heavy with sleep (Matt. 26:43; Lk. 9:32), of being weighed down with dissipation and drunkenness (21:34), and of the church being burdened by unnecessary financial demands (1 Tim. 5:16).

(b) Affliction prepares for us "an eternal glory that ... outweighs (baros doxēs) them all" (2 Cor. 4:17). Paul's use of baros here may be influenced by the fact that weight and glory in Heb. come from the same root, kbd. In Gal. 6:2 Paul encourages his readers to bear one another's burdens—to come to the aid of one another, if overtaken by a fault. Such joint bearing does not do away with the personal responsibility of Christians, however, for everyone also has to bear his or her own load (phortion, 6:5) before God. In 1 Thess. 2:7, baros denotes the weight of authority that Paul might have exerted at Thessalonica, had he so wished. It also denotes the financial burden he spared them by working to support himself (2:9, epibareō).

(c) While bareō is used in the NT only in the pass., compounds are used in the act.: epibareō (2 Cor. 2:5; 1 Thess. 2:9; 2 Thess. 3:8) and katabareō (2 Cor. 12:16). Both mean to burden.

2. (a) The adj. barys occurs only 6x in the NT. In Acts 20:29 false teachers who break into the church are described as weighty (fierce, savage) wolves, of whom the church must beware. In 25:7 the Jews brought weighty charges against Paul. The apostle's opponents at Corinth sneered at his weighty (bareiai) letters (2 Cor. 10:10).

(b) Both the burden of suffering and the burden of the Mosaic law figure in the teaching of Jesus, the latter esp. in his discussions with the teachers of the law and the Pharisees. Matt. 23:4 (phortia barea, heavy loads) and Lk. 11:46 (phortizete ... phortia, lit. burden with burdens) speak of the heavy burdens that the hypocrites lay on people without themselves touching them with a finger. They stress the multiplicity of external commandments and fail to consider "the more important matters (ta barytera) of the law—justice, mercy and faithfulness" (Matt. 23:23; cf. Mic. 6:8).

Compared with this yoke under which Judaism stood, Jesus' "yoke (zygos, → 2433) is easy and [his] burden (phortion) is light." For that reason he calls to himself all who are weary and burdened (phortizō) (Matt. 11:28–30). There are, it is true, commands for Jesus' disciples, but they are not heavy, for Jesus is yoked with those who heed this call. In the words of 1 Jn. 5:3, "his commands are not burdensome (bareiai)," for the commands are the enactment of love.

βάσανος (basanos), torture, torment (992); βασανίζω (basanizō), to torture, torment (989); βασανισμός (basanismos), torturing, torment (990); βασανιστής (basanistēs), torturer (991).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. basanos signified originally a means of testing, esp. for gold; then torture as a means of examination, and finally torment generally.

2. In the LXX two-thirds of the occurrences of this word group (the vb. 30x, the noun 40x) are found in 4 Macc. (e.g., 4:26; 5:6; 6:5, 10–11, 27, 30) and in the wisdom lit. (e.g., Wis. 3:1), where it means torment or torture (esp. of Jewish martyrs). In other words, it is a typical word formation of the Hel. epoch. In early Christian lit. it was used of the torture of Christian martyrs. Elsewhere in the OT basanos denotes means of reparation for guilt (1 Sam. 6:3–4, 8, 17), shame or disgrace (Ezek. 16:52, 54), a cause of sin or misfortune (3:20; 7:19), or God's punishments (16:52, 54, of Jerusalem; 32:24, 30, of the heathen nations).

NT 1. In the NT the words in this group occur a total of 22x. (a) basanos in Matt. 4:24 is the physical afflictions of the sick that Jesus healed; in Lk. it refers to the torment that the rich man suffered (16:23) in Hades, the "place of torment" (16:28).

(b) The vb. basanizō, to torment, oppress, is used of the servant of the centurion from Capernaum who was tormented by his sickness (Matt. 8:6). The demons were afraid that Jesus would torment them (8:29; Mk. 5:7; Lk. 8:28). The disciples on the sea were hard pressed by the wind and waves (Matt. 14:24; Mk. 6:48). In 2 Pet. 2:8 the apostle depicts how righteous Lot felt his soul tortured by his observation of the dissolute activities of the people of Sodom. The vision of Rev. 12:2 mentions the "pain" of the mother of the Christ child, about to give birth. Elsewhere in Rev. basanizō is used of the torments that are the consequence of divine judgment (9:5; 11:10; 14:10; 20:10).

2. The word basanismos occurs 6x in Rev. It is used of the torments that are occasioned after the fifth trumpet by the eschatological locusts (9:5). In 14:11 those who worship the beast are threatened by the angel with eternal torment, while 18:7, 10, 15 deal with the basanismos that the prostitute Babylon, i.e., the anti-Christian city under God's judgment, must undergo.

3. basanistēs is used of jailers who torture the unforgiving servant in Jesus' parable (Matt. 18:34).

βασιλεύς (basileus), ruler, king (995); βασιλεία (basileia), kingship, kingly rule, kingdom (993); βασιλεύω (basileuō), to be king, rule (996); συμβασιλεύω (symbasileuō), share the rule (5203); βασίλειος (basileios), royal (994); βασιλικός (basilikos), royal, kingly (997); βασίλισσα (basilissa), queen (999).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. basileus was originally a general term for a ruler. In Homer it denoted a hereditary, legitimate ruler whose power is traced back to Zeus. Thus Odysseus was a basileus in Ithaca. After monarchy had given place to the rule of an aristocracy, and then in various Gk. cities one noble set himself up as monarch, a new term came into being, tyrannos, i.e., one who has gained the rule by illegitimate means. After the "slaying of the tyrants" (514 B.C. in Athens), tyrannos took on a negative meaning, and the term basileus reemerged as the title of a just and legal ruler.

(b) The Hel. concept of divine kingship is derived from the political traditions of the Macedonian monarchy and the overshadowing personality of Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.). The Hel. idea of divine kingship surfaced again in the Roman emperor cult. As a result, Augustus (63 B.C.–A.D. 14) was able to comprehend in his own person the imperium as a single whole, a unification for which there was neither national nor cultural precedent. The effect of the confession "Jesus is Lord," used by Christians, was to destroy this vital ideology of the Roman imperium. This led to the persecution of Christians during the first three centuries.

(c) The abstract noun basileia originally denoted the fact of being king, the position or power of the king, and it is best translated office of king, kingly rule. Besides this meaning came a second meaning, which emphasized the geographical aspect of basileia, the area over which a king reigned: his kingdom.

(d) The vb. basileuō means to become or be king, to reign. symbasileuō expresses the idea of ruling with. The adjs. basileios and basilikos both express that which appertains to a king, i.e., royal. Finally, in Hel. times the fem. term for king (i.e., queen) was basilissa (superseding the Attic forms basilis and basileia).

2. In the LXX the words of this root are frequent, mostly as translations of the Heb. root mālak, to be king, reign. The term basileus appears frequently in almost all OT books and esp. in the historical writings. The words are used first and foremost for earthly kings and their secular government, and only secondarily of Yahweh's kingship. This means that the concept of Yahweh's kingly rule can only be presented in connection with the Israelite monarchy.

(a) Every nation with whom Israel came into contact after the conquest had a king. The Israelites, however, did not adopt monarchy as an institution until relatively late. Rather, they continued for two centuries as a sacred confederation of tribes with a central sanctuary. Israel's initial hesitation to adopt the institution of monarchy is bound up with the concept of the holy war, which Yahweh himself conducted on Israel's behalf (Exod. 14:14; Jos. 23:10; Jdg. 7:22). Yahweh was seen as commander in chief of the Israelite army and as the one to whom the land unconditionally belonged.

(b) Israel's constant harassment by the Philistines provided the surface reason for the introduction of the monarchy, but the OT records a tension in its institution. According to 1 Sam. 9:1–10:16; 11:1–11, 14–15, Yahweh approved the concept, in view of his people's request, by telling Samuel to anoint Saul the Benjaminite king (9:16; cf. also the laws in Deut. 17:14–20). But there was also a questioning of the monarchy as a threat to the theocratic lordship of Yahweh. Note esp. 1 Sam. 8:1–22a; 10:17–27, where the people's request of Samuel, "Appoint a king to lead us, such as all the other nations have," receives Yahweh's answer, "They have rejected me as their king" (8:5, 7). That is, the monarch was seen both as Yahweh's gift and as his rival.

3. Of decisive significance for the Judahite monarchy was the religious ratification it received through Nathan's prophetic promise to David (2 Sam. 7:1–11b, 16). The house of David was promised everlasting duration (7:16). Because of this Davidic covenant, the right of David's hereditary successors to the kingdom of Judah was never called into question. The dynasty was assured of continuance despite the ups and downs of its history. By contrast, the monarchy of the northern kingdom never achieved the stability of the Davidic dynasty. In the north, the most powerful and charismatic leader became king.

Another feature of Judah's theology of kingship, in contrast to the Egyptian concept of a king who is divine by nature, was the adoption of the ruler as Yahweh's son. This was celebrated at a festival of enthronement and hymned in royal psalms (e.g., Ps. 2:7; 45:7; 110:1). However, the less the kings of Judah measured up to the standards set forth in the theology of kingship, the more strongly did the expectation of an eschatological messianic king develop, who would finally fulfill the prophecy of Nathan and the associated concepts of kingship (Amos 9:11–15; cf. Gen. 49:8–12). Isaiah in particular, a prophet with close associations with Judah's king, prophesied of a branch of David who would bring in a new era of righteousness and peace (Isa. 11:1–9; 9:2–7; cf. also Mic. 5:2–5; Jer. 23:5–6; Ezek. 17:22–24).

4. The kingship of Yahweh is not addressed much in the wisdom literature, in the oral teaching of the prophets, or in many of the historical narratives. It is frequent, however, in the hymns of the Psalter (the so-called enthronement psalms); the later prophetic writings, including the prophecies against the nations in Jeremiah (e.g., 46:18; 48:15; 51:57); and in the narrative parts of Daniel.

(a) One of the earliest examples of the title king being used of Yahweh is Isaiah 6:5, "My eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty." It is no coincidence that this title for Yahweh appears during a vision that came to Isaiah in the central sanctuary at Jerusalem, because the idea of "God Most High" had been associated with the title king (cf. Gen. 14:18–19). The divine title melek (Heb. king) brought with it a claim to universal authority, which found expression esp. in lordship over the pantheon of gods. Yahweh's kingship has a cosmic dimension: He is the creator of the world (cf. Ps. 24:1; 93:1; 95:3–5); "the LORD Most High [is] the great King over all the earth" (47:2); he is the king of the nations (cf. 47:3; 99:2; Jer. 10:7).

(b) In addition to this concept of Yahweh's being king, we find the dynamic concept of Yahweh becoming king. This finds expression especially in the enthronement psalms in the cry (lit.) "Yahweh has become King!" (Ps. 47:8; 93:1; 96:10; 97:1; 99:1;

Eng. versions have "the LORD reigns" for this Heb. perf.). The inseparability of the two concepts "Yahweh is King" and "Yahweh has become King" is esp. evident in the later chapters of Isaiah. Yahweh is "Jacob's King" or "Israel's King" (41:21; 44:6). Put in the context of announcing the new exodus, a herald now brings to the city of Jerusalem the message: "Your God reigns [has become King]" (52:7).

(c) In the OT's messianic theology, the lordship of Yahweh is combined with the hoped-for lordship of the Messiah. Thus Isaiah was the first to use the royal title for Yahweh and almost always related it to the currently reigning son of David. Even the messianic prince of the future is for Isaiah no autocrat, but one who is appointed and receives his office from God (9:7; 11:1–2). The rule of the future, messianic son of David is thus a delegated exercise of authority, representing the kingly rule of Yahweh.

5. basileia (Heb. malkût) means kingdom, reign; the reference is to power rather than to locality. The word in the OT usually refers in a purely secular sense to political kingdoms (cf. 1 Sam. 20:31; 1 Ki. 2:12; 1 Chr. 12:23; 2 Chr. 11:17; Dan. 9:1). There are, however, occasional references to God's rule as his basileia or malkût, kingship, which he is presently exercising (Ps. 103:19; 145:11–13; Dan. 4:3 = LXX 3:33). This is analogous to the use of basileus or melek, king, as an epithet of Yahweh.

In later texts Yahweh's kingship is interpreted in an eschatological sense. The recognition begins to emerge of a kingdom of Yahweh at the end of time that breaks through all national barriers. One day Yahweh will rule over the whole earth. His throne will be in Jerusalem, and all nations will make their pilgrimage to Zion to worship him (Isa. 24:23; Zech. 14:9). This coming kingdom of Yahweh is always presented as immanent.

In Dan. 7, this eschatology is elevated to a transcendent level in the concept of the kingdom of the "son of man" (7:13–14) and the kingdom of "the people of the Most High" (7:27). The son of man is an individual (7:14) who represents the Most High (7:27), just as the king of Judah represented the people. In other words, when power is committed to him, it is at the same time being given to the saints of the Most High. This transfer takes place within the heavenly realm, so that the earthly empires symbolized by the four beasts are replaced by the transcendent rule of the saints of the Most High represented by the son of man. We have already here the most important elements of apocalyptic.

6. (a) The expression "kingdom of heaven" owes its origin to the endeavor of rab. Judaism to find an alternative for the divine name in the phrase kingdom of Yahweh. Kingdom of heaven is thus an expression that implies the essential idea that God rules as King. Since it is not evident in this world, it is necessary to choose for or against it by a decision of will. The opportunity to accept or reject the kingdom will, however, come to an end when Yahweh reveals himself at the end of time.

(b) There is a tension in Judaism between the expectation of the Messiah as a nationalistic, Israelite king at the end of time, and the hope of the eschatological revelation of the kingdom of God. In the last days the Messiah will come, ascend the throne of Israel, and subject all the nations of the earth to himself. Not until then will the hitherto hidden kingdom of heaven emerge from the transcendent realm. But there is in Judaism no inner connection between the coming of the national messianic king and the coming of the rule of God. This is further confirmed by the fact that the people of Israel receive no mention in statements concerning the kingdom of God. Membership within the nation can no longer be a determining factor when a personal decision before God is required.

(c) The Apocr. in general follow the OT pattern of thought about the kingdom of God. In some places, however, we may detect Hel. influence. Thus the LXX can identify the basileia with the four cardinal virtues (4 Macc. 2:23), and in Wis. 6:20 we read, "The desire for wisdom leads to a kingdom." This shift to an ethical meaning is completed by Philo, where the content of the basileia is the rule of the sage, seen as the true king. Thus, the eschatological character of the term as used in the OT was lost.

NT In the NT basileia is used more frequently than basileus and basileuō. Words from this root occur chiefly to the Synoptic Gospels. In Matt. and Lk.–Acts they play a positively decisive role. The two nouns are used only occasionally in Jn., the Pauline letters, and the other NT letters, but they come to the fore again in Rev. By contrast, the vb. basileuō appears only occasionally in the Synoptic Gospels, more often in Rev. But it has its maximum theological significance in Paul (Rom. and 1 Cor.).

1. basileus and basileuō in the NT. The NT follows closely the precedent set by the OT and Judaism in giving to God and Christ alone the full right to the title king. Human kings, by contrast, are generally regarded as of limited importance.

(a) The earthly kings referred to are frequently those who set themselves against God and his Christ: Pharaoh (Acts 7:10; Heb. 11:23, 27), Herod the Great (Matt. 2:1–3; Lk. 1:5), Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:9), Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:1, 20), Herod Agrippa II (25:13–14), Aretas (2 Cor. 11:32), and the Roman emperor (1 Tim. 2:2; 1 Pet. 2:13; Rev. 17:9–18). These rulers are called "kings of the earth" (Matt. 17:25; Acts 4:26; Rev. 1:5), "kings of the Gentiles" (Lk. 22:25), or "kings of the whole world" (Rev. 16:14).

Just as the OT is at variance with oriental views of divine kingship, so the NT is opposed to Hel. and Roman ideas of this kind. The earthly king is not an incarnation of the deity, since no one but God or the Messiah can occupy such a position. Thus in Rev., in sharp contrast to the presumptuous claims to divinity of Domitian, only God is recognized as "King of the ages" (15:3) and only Christ as the "King of kings" (17:14; 19:16). The "kings from the East" (16:12) are a rod in God's hand, and he will destroy them at the last day if they do not submit to him (17:2–14; 19:18–21; 21:24).

(b) Only David and Melchizedek receive a positive assessment in the NT as earthly kings: David, because as the king chosen by God (2 Sam. 7) he is the forefather of Jesus Christ (cf. Matt. 1:6; Acts 13:22); Melchizedek, because as the priest-king of Salem (Gen. 14:18) he is the OT type of the high priesthood of Christ (Heb. 7:1–3).

(c) Jesus, "who as to his human nature was a descendant of David" (Rom. 1:3; cf. Matt. 1:6) is the messianic Son of David, King of the Jews, or King of Israel. These titles are used principally in the section of the Gospels portraying his trial before Pilate (Matt. 27; Mk. 15; Lk. 23; Jn. 18–19), exclusively on the lips of Jesus' Jewish opponents, of Pilate, and of his soldiers. Note, for example, the many references to "king of the Jews" (Mk. 15:2, 9, 18, 26, to cite only Mk.'s references). Like the soldiers on guard (Lk. 23:37), the rulers of the people mocked as they passed by, "Let this Christ, this King of Israel, come down now from the cross, that we may see and believe" (Mk. 15:32).

If it is true, as the Roman inscription on the cross makes probable, that Jesus was condemned on a charge of claiming to be the messianic king of Israel, and if this claim is never found on the lips of Jesus in the Gospels, presumably the basis of the charge is to be found largely in the way Jesus behaved. It is unlikely, in other words, that the Jewish leaders were acting out of pure malice in accusing Jesus of being a claimant to the throne or that Pilate had no other intention in ordering the inscription on the cross than to make mock of Jewish messianism (cf. Jn. 18:36–37). Rather, note that Jesus himself saw his miracles of healing, his casting out of demons, and his preaching of the gospel to the poor as the fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecies (Isa. 29:18–19; 35:5–6; 61:1–2), and accordingly as messianic events (Matt. 11:2–6; Lk. 4:16–27).

Moreover, his two principal actions during the last days at Jerusalem—the entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1–9; Mk. 11:1–10; Lk. 19:28–38; Jn. 12:12–19) and the cleansing of the temple (Matt. 21:12–13; Mk. 11:15–19; Lk. 19:47–48)—make it clear that Jesus knew himself to be the fulfiller of messianic prophecies (for OT allusions in these narratives cf. 2 Ki. 9:13; Ps. 118:26; Isa. 62:11; Zech. 9:9; and Exod. 30:13; Lev. 1:14; Isa. 56:7; Jer. 7:11).

It is also demonstrable that Jesus was confronted during his ministry with the question of whether or not he was the Messiah, as, for instance, in connection with the feeding of the five thousand, when the people wanted "to make him king" (Jn. 6:15). Similarly, John the Baptist used a term for the Messiah that was not common among the Jews, "the one who was to come," when he asked whether Jesus was that person (Matt. 11:3; Lk. 7:19–20). Jesus did not respond to the question directly with an open declaration of his messiahship. Instead, he pointed to the fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecies in veiled language that challenged the hearer to make up his or her mind (Matt. 11:5; Lk. 7:22). The fact that Jesus saw himself to be the king of the Jews and Messiah of his people, and yet concealed it in this way, is his "messianic secret" (→ Christos, 5986).

The same point is brought out by the short answer of Jesus, recorded in the Gospels, to Pilate's question whether he was the king of the Jews: "It is as you say" (Matt. 27:11; Mk. 15:2; Lk. 23:3). Only once did Jesus openly reveal this messianic secret: in the trial before the Sanhedrin (Matt. 26:57–75; Mk. 14:53–72; Lk. 22:54–71). To the high priest's question, "Are you the Christ?" he replied unequivocally with the statement, "I am ... and you will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One and coming on the clouds of heaven" (Mk. 14:62; cf. Matt. 26:64; Lk. 22:69).

In Acts and the writings of Paul, there is no mention of "King of Israel" or "King of the Jews." Nevertheless, it can be seen from a passage like Acts 17:7 that Christians in Thessalonica were being denounced by the Jews for confessing allegiance to Jesus as another king. There is a certain irony in the way the Jews accused Christians of opposing the quasi-divine claims of the Roman emperor. However, it is basically true to say that with the application of the messianic title Christ to Jesus, the proclamation of Jesus as king of Israel faded eventually into the background, giving way to a soteriological message that focused on his cross and resurrection (cf. Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:3–4).

(d) In Exod. 19:6, the people of God share in his kingship: "You will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (cf. Isa. 61:6). This thought is applied to Christian believers in Rev. 1:6 and 5:10 (basileia is used in both cases). The former passage refers to believers in the present time; the latter is part of the "new song" of the saints before the Lamb. The same thought occurs in 1 Pet. 2:9: "But you are a chosen people, a royal [basileion] priesthood, a holy nation, a people belonging to God, that you may declare the praises of him who called you out of darkness into his wonderful light." This verse accords with Rev. 5:10, where the glorified saints "will reign on the earth" (cf. 1:6).

The vb. basileuō, reign, is used of the reign of believers in Rom. 5:17 (in contrast to the reign of death, cf. 5:14, 17, 21; cf. also the reign of sin, 6:12), in 1 Cor. 4:8 (here ironically of the lordly behavior of the Corinthians, which falls short of true reigning), and in Rev. 20:4, 6; 20:5 (of the reign of the saints on earth and in glory). For the idea of reigning expressed in other terms, see Eph. 2:6; 2 Tim. 2:12; Jas. 2:5.

(e) basilissa, queen, occurs only 4x in the NT. Matt. and Lk. both record the saying about the Queen of the South in the context of the sign of Jonah (Matt. 12:42; Lk. 11:31; cf. 1 Ki. 10:1–10; 2 Chr. 9:1–12). She serves as an example of the lengths to which a non-Jew might go in seeking wisdom. Gentiles thus have all the more reason to leave their ways, for in Jesus the Galilean preacher is "one greater than Solomon." In Acts 8:27 the Ethiopian eunuch is described as the treasurer of "Candace, queen of the Ethiopians." He too was a seeker, who had come "to Jerusalem to worship." The episode is all the more pointed in the light of the persecution by the Jews that had just scattered the Jerusalem church (8:1), the eunuch's study of Scripture (Isa. 53:7–8; Acts 8:32–33), and the fact that he was a eunuch. By contrast Babylon, who plays the queen, is judged (Rev. 18:7).

2. basileia in the NT. (a) For an earthly, human king there is an earthly, human kingdom. In this sense basileia means, according to context, the office of king (e.g., Lk. 19:12, 15; Rev. 17:12) and also the area governed, domain (e.g., Matt. 4:8; Lk. 4:5; Mk. 6:23; Rev. 16:10). In almost all these passages the earthly kingdoms seem to stand in contrast to the kingdom of God, since they are subject to the god of this world, Satan (Matt. 4:8). In Matt. 12:26 there is even explicit mention of the basileia of the devil.

(b) The kingdom of God (usually changed to kingdom of heaven in Matt., though cf. 12:28; 19:24; 21:31, 43) is an expression of central importance only within the Synoptic tradition.

(c) In order to understand Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God, it is best to start with those passages that deal with the coming of the kingdom of God in the near future. Mk. 1:15 records the theme of Jesus' preaching in a pregnant sentence: "The kingdom of God is near" (cf. Matt. 3:2; 5:17; Lk. 17:20–21; 21:31). Jesus did not preach that there was already a kingdom of God to which one must confess allegiance but that the rule of God was coming.

Just as summer is known to be near when the fig tree puts out leaves, so the events of the present reveal that God's rule will soon break in on the world (Matt. 24:32–33; Mk. 13:28–29; Lk. 21:29–31). It is to this sudden, unexpected, imminent irruption of the kingdom of God that Jesus' parables of the Parousia point: the sudden coming of the flood (Matt. 24:37–39; Lk. 17:26–27), the unexpected entrance of the burglar (Matt. 24:43–44; Lk. 12:39–40), the surprise of the doorkeeper and the servant at the homecoming of their master (Matt. 24:45–50; cf. Lk. 12:42–46), and the sudden arrival of the bridegroom (Matt. 25:1–13). "I tell you the truth, some who are standing here will not taste death before they see the kingdom of God come with power" (Mk. 9:1).

For Jesus the advent of the kingdom was so imminent that he vowed not to "drink again of the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God comes" (Lk. 22:18). The Parousia of the Son of Man will take place even before the disciples have finished proclaiming the kingdom of God in Israel (Matt. 10:23). From these references it may be concluded that Jesus proclaimed the imminent advent of the kingdom of God within the lifetime of his hearer.

(d) Although for Jesus the realization of God's rule is still in the future, its urgent proximity already casts its shadow over the present: "If I drive out demons by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Matt. 12:28; cf. Lk. 11:20). The casting out of demons reveals that the devil has been bound by one stronger than he (Matt. 12:29; Mk. 3:27; Lk. 11:21). The disarming of Satan, an event the Jews expected in the end time, has taken place (10:18); in the works of Jesus the kingdom of God is already a present reality.

To the Pharisees' question when the kingdom of God was coming, Jesus can therefore answer, "The kingdom of God is among you" (Lk. 17:20–21; not as NIV, "is within you"). Because the kingdom is already present, the friends of the bridegroom cannot fast (Mk. 2:19; cf. Matt. 9:15; Lk. 5:34), and it is the Father's good pleasure to give Jesus' disciples the kingdom (12:32). With the appearance of John the Baptist, the new era has begun and is already present (cf. Matt. 11:12–13; Lk. 16:16).

(e) Jesus insists that the verdict to be passed on to people in the final judgment is already determined by the attitude they adopt to himself in the present age: "Whoever acknowledges me before men, I will also acknowledge him before my Father in heaven" (Matt. 10:32; cf. Lk. 12:8). Those who hear and do Jesus' words will survive the eschatological crisis. The unrepentant cities, on the other hand, will be condemned, because in spite of the miracles done in them by Jesus they did not repent (Matt. 11:21–24). Jesus himself will appear as the eschatological judge (25:31) and will disown those who merely say, "Lord, Lord" (7:22–23; cf. Lk. 13:27); he will plead before the Father the cause of those who have confessed him (Matt. 10:32; cf. Lk. 12:8). One's final destiny is decided by the attitude adopted to Jesus' words and actions (Matt. 7:24–27; cf. Lk. 6:47–49), in other words, by one's attitude to Jesus himself. After all, Jesus' view of the kingdom of God is inextricably bound up with his person.

Thus Jesus preached the kingdom of God neither solely as a present reality (also known as "consistent eschatology") nor exclusively as a future event (futuristic eschatology). Rather, he was aware that the future rule of God was present in his actions and in his person. He spoke, therefore, of the future kingdom, which would suddenly dawn, as already realizing itself in the present. His eschatology is, therefore, an "already but not yet" eschatology.

3. The kingdom of God in the preaching of Jesus. (a) According to Jesus, the kingdom of God is totally in the hands of God. We can, therefore, neither hasten its coming by doing battle with God's enemies (as the Zealots hoped) nor force it to appear by scrupulous observation of the law (as the Pharisees hoped). We can only await its coming with patience and confidence, as in the parables of the mustard seed (Matt. 13:31–32; Mk. 4:30–32), the yeast (Matt. 13:33), and the seed growing secretly (Mk. 4:26–29).

(b) This kingdom is coming in the form of a cosmic catastrophe (Lk. 17:26; Mk. 13:26; 14:62), ushered in by the appearance of the Son of Man. Jesus thus aligned himself, not with the concept of an earthly, nationalistic messiah, but with the apocalyptic tradition in Judaism and its expectation of the Son of Man. Although he clearly used apocalyptic imagery (e.g., the heavenly feast in the kingdom of God, Matt. 8:11; Mk. 14:25), he rejected all attempts to predict the time of the end (13:28–34).

(c) Jesus upheld the OT doctrine of election (Matt. 10:6) with the associated belief that God wants to reach the entire world through the nation of Israel. This is not to say that Israel has a special claim on God's favor. Indeed, Israel is in danger of being put to shame by the heathen on the day of judgment (12:42; Lk. 11:31). The kingdom will be taken from Israel and given to the Gentiles (Matt. 21:43). God will cast the sons of the kingdom (Israel) into outer darkness (8:12; cf. Lk. 13:28). But Jesus promised the Twelve, as the representatives of a new Israel, the office of judges and rulers in the future kingdom of God (Matt. 19:28; Lk. 22:28–30; cf. Mk. 10:35–45).

(d) A person can receive the kingdom only as a child (Mk. 10:15; Lk. 18:17; cf. Matt. 18:3; Jn. 3:3) and must wait for it (Mk. 15:43; Lk. 23:51). Particularly frequent is the metaphor of entering the kingdom of God (Matt. 5:20; 7:21; 18:3; 19:23–24; 23:13; Jn. 3:5). Such entry in the fullest sense lies in the future (Matt. 25:34; Mk. 9:43–47), but the presence of the kingdom of God in the person of Jesus faces the individual with a clear-cut, yes-or-no decision (cf. Matt. 5:30; 7:24–27; 18:8–9; Mk. 9:43–48; Lk. 9:62). When a decision is made, it involves a readiness for sacrifice, which may mean self-denial to the point of being hated by one's own family (Matt. 10:17–22, 37). Yet this decision produces overwhelming joy at the greatness of God's gift (cf. the parables of the hidden treasure and the pearl of great price, Matt. 13:44–46).

(e) The kingdom of God is transcendent and supernatural; it comes from above, from God alone. When it does, the hungry will be filled and the sad will be comforted (cf. the Beatitudes of Matt. 5:3–10; Lk. 6:20–22). It requires us to love our enemies (Matt. 5:38–42; Lk. 6:27–28, 32–36) and to be as free from care as the birds of the air and the lilies of the field (Matt. 6:25–33; Lk. 12:22–31). Here again Jesus himself, in whom alone the future kingdom of God is present, is the one whose words and deeds attest the presence of the kingdom—the proof of which is in his seeking out the company of tax collectors and sinners, offering them fellowship and promising them forgiveness of sins.

As the king invites beggars and the homeless to his feast (Matt. 22:1–10), as the father's love receives back again the lost son (Lk. 15:11–32), as the shepherd goes out after the lost sheep (15:4–7), as the woman searches for the lost coin (15:8–10), as the master out of the goodness of his heart pays the workers hired at the last hour a full day's pay (Matt. 20:1–15), so Jesus offers to the poor in spirit the promise of forgiveness, "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (5:3). Only sinners can appreciate the remission of sins through God's goodness(cf. Matt. 9:12; Mk. 2:17; Lk. 5:31).

4. The kingdom of God and the kingdom of Christ outside the preaching of Jesus. (a) Jesus spoke primarily of the kingdom of God, though he also made references to "my kingdom" (e.g., Lk. 22:30; Jn. 18:36). After his resurrection the church, convinced that he had been exalted to the status of Lord (Acts 2:36; Phil. 2:9–11), introduced a Christological emphasis in the preaching of the kingdom. The apostles thus continued the inseparable connection between Jesus and the kingdom.

In 2 Tim. 4:18, Paul speaks of the confidence of being delivered from every kind of evil and of being brought "safely to [the Lord's] heavenly kingdom" (cf. 2 Tim. 4:1; 2 Pet. 1:11). The inseparable connection between the person of Jesus and the presence of God's kingdom is expressed most clearly when Jesus Christ himself becomes an equivalent for "kingdom of God," as is shown by the following sample comparisons. Whereas Joseph of Arimathea was waiting for "the kingdom of God" (Mk. 15:43), believers are awaiting "the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. 3:20). Whereas Jesus' message may be summed up as "the kingdom of God is near" (Mk. 1:15), James says, "The Lord's coming is near" (Jas. 5:8). In Samaria Philip preached "the good news of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 8:12; cf. 28:31).

The phrase "kingdom of Christ" and the equation of "kingdom of God" with Jesus Christ are thus the result of the changeover from an implicit to an explicit Christology. Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God was in no way displaced in the early church as it preached Jesus. The postresurrection Christology, in which Jesus Christ is the center of the kerygma, is rather the outcome of the realization that the kingdom of God is present only in the person of Jesus Christ, so that one can only properly speak of the kingdom of God by speaking of Jesus Christ.

(b) The kingdom of God has only a peripheral place outside the Synoptics. In its place we find the Christological kerygma of the cross and resurrection of Jesus, the expectation of the Parousia, the resurrection of the dead, and the use of terms such as life and righteousness. Is there a sequence from Jesus' preaching of the kingdom to the Christological kerygma and the Pauline doctrine of justification-righteousness?

A survey of the synonyms used in the Synoptic tradition for "kingdom of God" is illuminating. Matt. 6:33 says that we are to seek God's "kingdom and his righteousness." In a single passage we find the expressions "to enter life" (Mk. 9:43, 45) and "to enter the kingdom of God" (9:47). Following the question of the rich young man, "What must I do to inherit eternal life?" (10:17), Jesus remarks to his disciples, "How hard it is for the rich to enter the kingdom of God!" (10:23). Likewise, the phrase "to inherit eternal life" (10:17) has a counterpart in "take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you" (Matt. 25:34). Paul says in Rom. 14:17: "the kingdom of God is ... righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." Thus, when Paul declares that the righteousness of God consists in justifying "the wicked" (4:5), he is taking up the central concern of Jesus' preaching of the kingdom, namely, the promise of salvation to sinners.

The futurist eschatology in the preaching of Jesus is likewise retained in the expectation of his Parousia and the general resurrection of the dead. Pauline theology, which is a development of Christology, contains, like the preaching of Jesus, both a present and a future element, since the crucified and risen one is also the one who is coming again. By tying salvation to the person of Jesus and by developing Christology along the lines of soteriology, pneumatology, and eschatology, Paul has maintained a consistent and legitimate extension of Jesus' preaching of the kingdom of God, although he has adapted this to the postresurrection situation as regards the cross and resurrection.

(c) Evidence that the kingdom of Jesus Christ is the same as the kingdom of God is also demonstrated in that both expressions are found together, sometimes God being named first, sometimes Christ. Thus it is equally acceptable to speak of "the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. 5:5), and of "the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ" (Rev. 11:15). The rule of Christ and the rule of God are, in other words, identical. When the rule of Christ has become established, it is taken up into the rule of God (5:10; 20:4, 6; 22:5); at the end of time Christ hands back to the Father the kingdom he has received from him (1 Cor. 15:24–28).

βαστάζω (bastazō), carry, bear, endure (1002); δυσβάστακτος (dysbastaktos), difficult to carry (1546).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. bastazō means to lift up and carry away. It can have a fig. meaning to endure or suffer; also, to exalt, extol. In the LXX this vb. is used primarily in a physical sense. In Jdg. 16:30 (except A), Samson pushes with all his might to break down the pillars of the Philistine temple. In Ruth 2:16, Boaz instructs his workers to "pull out" extra stalks of grain for Ruth to glean. In 2 Ki. 18:14, Hezekiah agrees to turn over or "pay" to the Assyrians whatever they ask, if they will only withdraw from his land. A fig. sense occurs in Job 21:3, where Job asks his friends to "bear" with him as he speaks.

NT 1. bastazō occurs 27x in the NT. Fewer than half of the uses refer to physically carrying something (e.g., a jar of water, Lk. 22:10; a coffin, 7:14). The word is used for Jesus carrying his own cross (Jn. 19:17) and for Paul being carried by the soldiers as they rescued him from the mob in Jerusalem (Acts 21:35). bastazō can even be used to describe carrying a child in the womb (Lk. 11:27).

2. More important is the fig. use. In three places, this word group is used to express the burden of the law on the Jews. Matt. 23:4 and Lk. 11:46 use dysbastaktos to describe the heavy burdens that the Jewish leaders placed on the people, while Peter insists that neither they nor their fathers have been able to bear (bastazō) such a heavy yoke (Acts 15:10). In Matt. 8:17, the author cites his own trans. of Isa. 53:4 to the effect that Jesus, the servant of God, carried our diseases (as demonstrated in his miracles). The church at Ephesus has "endured" hardships for Christ's sake (Rev. 2:3), and Paul bears in his body the marks of Jesus (Gal. 6:17). In fact, Jesus instructs all of us to carry our cross and follow him (Lk. 14:27).

3. God told Ananias that he had chosen Paul to "carry" the name of Jesus before Gentiles (Acts 9:15); perhaps the implication is that Paul's mission work would involve much suffering and endurance. Paul exhorts believers to fulfill the law of Christ by bearing each other's burdens (Gal. 6:2), though he also admits that we each have our own individual burdens to carry (6:5). In a similar vein, Paul instructs the strong in faith to "bear with" the weaknesses of the weak (Rom. 15:1) rather than insisting on their own rights in areas of Christian freedom.

βδέλυγμα, in the phrase τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως (to bdelygma tēs erēmōseōs), the abomination of desolation (1007).

CL & OT The phrase to bdelygma tēs erēmōseōs occurs in Mk. 13:14 and its parallel, Matt. 24:15. It is taken from the LXX of Dan. 12:11 and appears with slight variations in Dan. 9:27; 11:31; and 1 Macc. 1:54. In Dan. the Heb. expression signifies "the abomination that causes (spiritual) desolation," i.e., it creates either a horror in the mind of the beholders or an objective condition of spiritual devastation. In the OT an abomination denotes chiefly something that is abominable to God, esp. objects offensive in the light of the ceremonial law; hence, it frequently describes idolatrous objects (see Ezek. 5:11). Some have argued that the phrase "abomination that causes desolation" originated as a typical Jewish term of contempt for a heathen deity. In 1 Macc. 1:54, Antiochus Epiphanes (reigned 175–164 B.C.) caused a pagan altar to be erected on the great altar in the Jerusalem temple; this altar is described as "the abomination of desolation." The temple of God was thus turned into a heathen temple. The command to render such worship, in Jerusalem and beyond, led to the Maccabean revolt.

NT In Mk. 13:14 the desolating abomination appears to be well known to the readers, so no further explanation is given. Many exegetes, observing that "abomination" is neut. in gender, but the participle "standing where it does not belong" is masc., have concluded that the abomination is the Antichrist, who steps into the place reserved for God (cf. 2 Thess. 2:4; note, however, that in Matt. 24:15 the participle is a neuter, so that the possible reference to the Antichrist applies only in Mk. 13:14).

If the term Antichrist be extended to mean a power that sets itself against God, it could be employed in this context, but the later developed doctrine, such as appears in Rev. 13 and 17, should not be read into Mk. 13:14. To Jesus the term abomination probably connotes idolatry of some sort.

Luke paraphrases Jesus' words by the expression "Jerusalem being surrounded by armies" (Lk. 21:20). It is possible that this is closer to Jesus' intention than is commonly recognized, for the Roman armies affixed idolatrous images to their ensigns, which were set in the ground at night and accorded worship. By agreement with the Jews, these ensigns were never brought into the Roman fortress in Jerusalem. But if they were set in the holy place, that could only be as a result of brute force, and it would entail war to the death. The "abomination" would thus bring about the desecration of the city and sanctuary and would lead to destructive warfare, so bringing to pass the fulfillment of the prophecy of Jesus in Mk. 13:2.

The use of the expression "abomination that causes desolation" for the desecration and ultimate destruction of the temple and city indicates that Jesus viewed such an event in the light of the day of the Lord, as the OT prophets before him, and above all Daniel, in his references to that abomination.

βέβαιος (bebaios), sure (1010); βεβαιόω (bebaioō), confirm (1011); βεβαίωσις (bebaiōsis), confirmation (1012).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. bebaios means firm, durable, reliable; and in the legal sphere, valid, legal. bebaioō similarly means make firm, strengthen, confirm; also, guarantee. bebaiōsis means establishing, confirmation, or (in legal language) guarantee (valid confirmation of a legal act). In the LXX this word group rarely occurs and usually has the same meaning as in cl. Gk. (e.g., Ps. 119:28, where it means to strengthen).

NT In the NT the words in this group occur 18x (7x in Heb. alone). They connote validity, i.e., the confirming evidence of the divine Word (Mk. 16:20; Heb. 2:2–3) and of the gospel (Phil. 1:7). Here the NT has adopted the technical sense that these words had acquired in the legal sphere. This word group can also denote that a thing is firm and reliable because it has a firm foundation. Thus one's hope and confidence are firmly secured, as by an anchor, when the object of trust is God's Word (cf. Heb. 6:16, 19).

1. (a) The promises of God, the Word of God, and the gospel are absolutely certain to be fulfilled because they have been legally confirmed by God through an oath (Heb. 6:16–20) and so form the foundation of the faith (eis bebaiōsin is a recognized Gk. legal term for a guarantee). God's promise stands secure, and believers may depend on it. God has given the promise "by grace" to those who believe, not on the basis of the Mosaic law, so the promise is "guaranteed" (Rom. 4:16). It depends for its validity and efficacy on God alone; that is what makes it sure.

Another reason for the confirmation or legal validation of God's promises to the fathers is given in Rom. 15:8: Jesus Christ has himself given them this legal validation. His whole life was one of "service" to the Jews and the Gentiles in order to make God's promises sure for them. He showed them how all the promises of God were fulfilled in him and thus proven true. He thereby made evident "God's truth" and faithfulness, which form the ultimate basis for our confidence and certainty in the foundations of faith. God's promise is compared in Heb. 9:15 with a will that comes into force when the person who issued it dies (9:17). This throws a special light on the death of Jesus.

(b) Rather than God's promise, it is often the logos, the word (of God), that is described by these words as trustworthy. Heb. 2:2 states that if the message declared by angels (i.e., the OT law) was sure, impregnable, and valid, so that "every violation and disobedience received its just punishment," how much more is the word that comes from the Lord, who is so much "superior to" angels (1:4). For God himself has borne witness to that word and has confirmed it by "signs, wonders and various miracles" (2:4). In Mk. 16:20, the validity of the word (of the disciples) was confirmed by "signs that accompanied it." These signs indicate that the living Lord himself is speaking and working through his witnesses; their witness is therefore true and reliable.

If God's truth and faithfulness are the primary basis for the validity of his Word and thus for the whole of the Christian's assurance concerning his or her faith, then these subsequent signs are a less important confirmation of one's confidence in God's promises. According to 2 Pet. 1:19, "we have the word of the prophets made more certain," because it has been confirmed by divine actions and manifestations from the heavenly world, namely, at the transfiguration of Jesus. These experiences (like the Easter experiences) strengthened the disciples' confidence in the absolute reliability and validity of the Word of God.

(c) This use of this word group leads also to the sense of witnessing and witness (to the gospel), as in 1 Cor. 1:6; Phil. 1:7; and Heb. 2:3. Here there is also the idea that God's Word is so sure and reliable that it must be believed when it is preached. Thus the idea drawn from the legal sphere, that God's Word is here and is now made valid by the witness that is borne to it, is often present.

2. (a) The believer's assurance about salvation is to be understood on this basis of the legal foundation and validity of God's Word and promise. Often the two meanings are directly related to one another (cf. Heb. 6:16 and 6:19; 1 Cor. 1:6 and 1:8; 2 Pet. 1:10 and 1:19). The certainty of the believer's hope is inextricably rooted in the legal validity of God's Word. This is worked out impressively in Heb. 6:19. Since God's promise is unchangeable and his oath (6:16) valid (God does not lie!), the believer's hope is firm and assured, like a ship that is firmly anchored.

(b) Because of this, the whole position of the Christian gains an element of assurance and certainty. It is God himself who establishes believers or makes them firm in Christ (2 Cor. 1:21; cf. 1 Cor. 1:8), who seals them with the Holy Spirit. Such people are "strengthened in the faith" (Col. 2:7). Likewise, the author of Hebrews insists that our hearts are "strengthened by grace, not by ceremonial foods" (13:9).

1033 Βηθλέεμ — Βηθλέεμ (Bēthleem), Bethlehem (1033).

OT This is the modern Beit Laḥm, a town in the Judean hill country five miles southwest of Jerusalem. The Heb. bêt leḥem means "house of bread." Ephrath was likely the surrounding district, hence the distinctive form "Bethlehem Ephrathah" (Mic. 5:2).

Another Bethlehem was part of Zebulun (Jos. 19:15) and was situated some seven miles northwest of Nazareth in NT Galilee. The NT refers only to the Judean town.

Prior to the monarchy Israel's hold on this part of the Judean hills was insecure (cf. 2 Sam. 23:14). Israelite tribal tradition remembered the town as the birthplace of the Levite who ultimately founded the sanctuary at Dan (Jdg. 17:7) and of the concubine whose death fomented an intertribal war (19:1). Two texts link the town with Rachel's burial place (Gen. 35:19; 48:7; cf. 1 Sam. 10:2). Bethlehem remained one of Judah's smaller towns (Mic. 5:2), though according to the Chronicler, it was rebuilt or fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. 11:6). The postexilic lists of exiles indicate a small community there (Ezr. 2:21; Neh. 7:26).

Bethlehem's permanent theological significance rests exclusively in its claim to be David's birthplace (1 Sam. 16:4; 17:12, 15; 20:6, 28). This claim is integral to the story of Ruth, which links both Ruth and her family with Bethlehem (1:22) and with David himself (4:22). With the development of an eschatological theology, in which a Davidic Messiah was central, it was naturally held that Bethlehem would be his place of origin. In intertestamental literature the Judean origins of a Messiah are regularly affirmed, though Bethlehem itself does not figure with any prominence.

The crucial OT text for NT theology is clearly Mic. 5:2, one of the foundation stones for Christian messianic interpretation. This text stresses the contrast between the numerical insignificance of Bethlehem's population and its theological importance as the place from which, like David of old, Israel's ideal ruler would come.

NT Matt. identifies Bethlehem as the birthplace of Jesus (2:1) and as the place to which the Magi are directed (2:5, 8). The main purpose here is to show the fulfillment of Mic. 5:2 in predicting where the Messiah would be born (→ plēroō, 4444). This quotation is just one element in a substantial network of OT texts that are interpreted and elaborated in Matt. 1–2. In the context of Matthean theology as a whole, Jesus' birth at Bethlehem conveys the fact that he is Messiah (→ Christos, 5986).

In Luke this specialized Jewish interest is absent, for he draws no explicit theological conclusion from Jesus' birth at Bethlehem. Yet Luke does adhere firmly to this tradition of Jesus' birth there (Lk. 2:15). The description of the census (2:1–3) is Luke's means of showing how Jesus, a Galilean, came to be born at Bethlehem.

βῆμα (bēma), judgment seat (1037).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. bēma can mean step or stride, as in walking. It is also used as a platform for a public speaker and, in legal contexts, denotes the place where litigants stood for trial.

2. In the LXX bēma occurs in Deut. 2:5 in the sense of a unit of measure. Here the Lord affirms to Moses that he will not allow the people of Israel to take any territory belonging to the descendants of Esau, "not even enough to put your foot on" (lit., "not even a bēma of a foot," cf. Deut. 11:24; Jos. 1:3, where a similar idea without bēma occurs). In Neh. 8:4 and 1 Esd. 9:42 the word denotes the wooden platform on which Ezra stood to read from the book of the law. In Sir. 19:30 the word occurs in the pl. in the sense of the steps of a person, i.e., one's manner of walking that reveals one's character.

NT 1. In the NT bēma occurs once in the sense of step as a unit of measure (Acts 7:5). There is it translated "foot of ground," i.e., a small area (cf. Deut. 2:5).

2. The word is used most frequently of the platform on which was placed a seat for an official. In Acts 12:21 it is the platform from which orations were made; in

Matt. 27:19; Jn. 19:13; Acts 18:12, 16–17; 25:6, 10, 17, the seat where civil officials held session to hear certain legal cases and to render judgment. Thus Jesus was brought before Pilate's bēma, and the Jews at Corinth accused Paul before the tribunal of Gallio. Later Paul appeared before the bēma of Festus at Caesarea.

3. The word is used 2x in Paul's letters, in both cases with regard to divine judgment. Rom. 14:10 speaks of "God's judgment seat," and 14:11 cites Isa. 45:23 as confirmation that all will appear before it. The emphasis here is on the role of the litigant before the bēma: "So then, each of us will give account of himself to God" (Rom. 14:12). In 2 Cor. 5:10 Paul speaks of "the judgment seat of Christ," stressing that Christ will judge everyone (cf. Matt. 16:27; 25:31–46). Here the emphasis falls on the judgment rendered: "that each one may receive what is due him for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad."

Note the reversal of roles that takes place: Jesus, who appeared before a human judgment seat and suffered unjust judgment, will one day sit in righteous judgment over the unjust. But Paul reminds his readers that believers are not exempt from this judgment. Although we are reconciled (cf. 2 Cor. 5:20–21) and justified (Rom. 5:1; 8:1), we still must give account and have our work tested (cf. 1 Cor. 3:13–15).

βία (bia), force, violence (1040); βιάζω (biazō), to use force or violence (1041); βιαστής (biastēs), a violent man (1043); βίαιος (biaios), violent (1042).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. bia means bodily strength, force, might. The vb. biazō is rare in the act., but in the mid. expresses the idea of forcible action in deed and word. Trans. it means to violate, rape; intrans. to use force, enforce one's will; pass. to suffer violence. biastēs means a violent person and carries a derogatory sense.

2. (a) The LXX uses bia infrequently. Occasionally God's power is described as bia (Isa. 28:2; 30:30), and in the LXX of Ezek. 44:18 the new order of priests is said to be without power. bia also occurs in Exod. 14:25; Neh. 5:14–15, 18; Est. 3:13 [S^1 only]; Isa. 17:13; 52:4; 63:1; Dan. 11:17; Hab. 3:6; Wis. 4:4; 5:11; 7:20.

(b) biazō occurs 18x in the LXX, always with the idea of forcible action: to urge (using friendly constraint; e.g., Gen. 33:11; Jdg. 13:15–16 [A]; 19:7; 2 Sam. 13:25, 27), to rape (Deut. 22:25, 28), and to break through (Exod. 19:24).

NT 1. In the NT bia occurs only in Acts (3x) and denotes force or violence (cf. also biaios, "violent [wind]," in 2:2). Thus in 27:41 it refers to the force of waves smashing a ship. In 21:35 the author records the violence of the mob threatening Paul, while in 5:26 Peter and the apostles are arrested, but the Jewish leaders do "not use force," for fear of the crowd. In every case of bia the violence is a potential threat to human lives.

2. These passages in Acts may give us an insight into biazō in Lk. 16:16: "The Law and the Prophets were proclaimed until John. Since that time, the good news of the kingdom of God is being preached, and everyone is forcing his way [biazō] into it" (cf. Matt. 11:12). Some take this passage to mean that everyone acts against the kingdom of God with violence. This would imply a background of persecution, such as Lk. describes in Acts; that is, ever since the kingdom of God has been preached, violence has been used against it. Note the context in Lk., where Jesus is replying to mockery of the Pharisees. However, basing their argument on Lk.'s use of eis (into) rather than of pros or epi (against) as the preposition that goes with "it" (i.e., the kingdom of God), most exegetes consider the meaning to be that everyone presses his or her way into the kingdom of God.

Matt. 11:12 contains a parallel passage, but its interpretation is also difficult: "From the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven has been forcefully advancing [biazō], and forceful men [biastēs] lay hold [harpazō] of it." To take biazō here (a mid./pass. form) as a mid. gives the unlikely meaning that the kingdom of heaven uses force, it coerces. To take it as intrans. gives a more probable interpretation: The kingdom of God accomplishes its purpose mightily, and those who violently press toward it seize (upon) it. But this translation is also unsatisfactory, since it depicts the kingdom as "suffering violence" in a good sense, with people pressing toward it and striving vehemently to grasp it, whereas biazō usually denotes hostile action.

The best interpretation of Matt. 11:12, therefore, is the one that takes biazō as pass. in an unfavorable sense: The kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and violent men assault it, meaning either that they place hindrances in its way or that it is forcibly introduced. Perhaps Matt. has in the background here the accusation leveled at Jesus that he had sought to snatch at equality with God (cf. Phil. 2:6; → harpazō, seize, 773). If so, then Matt. 11:12 is saying that it is not Jesus but the persecutors who are laying violent hands on the kingdom of heaven.

If this interpretation is correct, the allusion may be to the assault of Satan and evil spirits against the kingdom or to Herod's assault on John the Baptist. Or perhaps in Matt.'s mind are the Zealots, who were trying to bring in the Davidic kingdom by using force against the Romans, or even Jewish antagonists, who continued to persecute Christians. The context suggests that the fate of John the Baptist is uppermost in Jesus' thoughts. But his warning does not preclude the other suggestions.

βίβλος (biblos), book (1047); βιβλίον (biblion), book (1046).

CL & OT 1. biblos is derived from an older form byblos, which meant the papyrus plant, or its fibrous stem, that was exported to Greece through the port of Byblos in Syria. From there it came to mean any material used in writing, such as a clay tablet, leather, parchment. From there developed the meaning scroll, book, writing, letter, order. In Koine Gk. biblos is often replaced by its diminutive biblion. Eventually these words came to denote an ancient holy book (cf. the magical books in Acts 19:19). Josephus and Philo call the Heb. Scriptures hierai bibloi, holy books.

2. In the LXX biblos, or more commonly biblion, translates Heb. sēper, and its meaning is fixed by OT usage. It is used for anything that has been written. Examples are a war diary (Exod. 17:14; cf. Num. 21:14), a law book (Deut. 17:18; cf. Exod. 24:7), a private letter (2 Sam. 11:14), a divorce document (Deut. 24:1, 3; cf. Mk. 10:4), a land register (Jos. 18:9), and various chronicles of the kings (1 Ki. 15:31). There is a religious connotation only insofar as Yahweh is a witness of what has been written and watches over its fulfillment, esp. in cases of contracts.

3. In the sing. these words are used for individual OT writings (1 Chr. 27:24; Tob. 1:1), in the pl. for groups of writings (Dan. 9:2; 1 Macc. 12:9). Important in this connection is their use in the sing. for the book of the law, the Torah. This usage springs undoubtedly from the fact that the Torah was written on a special scroll. Since this scroll contains God's holy will, biblion became in the LXX a solemn expression for the book of the law (Deut. 28:58; cf. Jos. 1:8). Various later books stood beside the Torah and the other OT writings, but by the end of the first cent. A.D. the canon was closed.

4. Various other "books" are mentioned in Jewish writings, esp. apocalyptic. The book is here a picture of God's eternal purposes for the future of his people, his world, or his creatures. There is the book of the divine plan (cf. Ezek. 2:8–10), the book of life (cf. Exod. 32:32–33; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 12:1; Jub. 19:9), the book of human history (Ps. 40:7; 139:16), and the book of judgment (Isa. 65:6; Dan. 7:10; 1 Enoch 89:61–64). These books express God's sovereign will and work in history.

NT 1. The NT uses biblion 34x, biblos only 10x (though they are interchangeable). Particularly noticeable are the 23 occurrences of biblion in Rev. OT usage reappears in Matt. 1:1, "a record (biblos) of the genealogy" (cf. Gen. 5:1), and Matt. 19:7; Mk. 10:4, "a certificate (biblion) of divorce" (cf. Deut. 24:1, 3). Both words are used for the Torah (Gal. 3:10; Heb. 9:19) or for other books of the OT canon (cf. Mk. 12:26; Lk. 3:4; 4:17; 20:42; Acts 1:20; 7:42). The writer of the Fourth Gospel also calls his work a biblion (Jn. 20:30; cf. 21:25).

Book is used in a special way in Rev.: the book in which all the things revealed are to be written (1:11); the book sealed with 7 seals, which contains the plan for the world in the last days (5:1–9); the book of life, in which are found the names of those who are to enter eternal life (13:8; 20:15; cf. Phil. 4:3); and the books of judgment (Rev. 20:12). While this is the language of apocalyptic, it has been given a new force and significance.

2. The books of the Bible contain a message that awakens and demands faith. Only where this message is believed are they rightly read and understood (Jn. 20:30–31). But when John speaks of his book in this connection, he is not necessarily using the word with any theological significance.

It is otherwise in Rev. As in Jewish apocalyptic, the biblion contains divine decrees concerning what will happen in the world and among God's people until the return of Christ, who will ultimately triumph over every power that is opposed to God. In contrast to Jewish apocalyptic, however, the seer John passes on a prophetic message under his own name to the contemporary churches known to him. He wants to provide comfort and warning (cf. Dan. 12:4, 9; Rev. 1:11).

Rev. 5:1–9 speaks of a scroll like that in Ezek. 2:9–10. It is written on both sides and sealed with 7 seals, presumably a deed and probably a will, and contains God's eschatological plan. The history of God's dealings with the world has already been decided. Only one, the crucified and exalted Christ, is worthy to break the seals and to make God's plans a reality and to fulfill them. Confession of Christ is decisive for the concept of history in Rev.

The end time is the time of judgment. In this context Rev. takes up once more the pictures of the book of life and the books of judgment (20:12). The names of those who will be preserved from judgment are contained in the book of life (cf. Lk. 10:20; Phil. 4:3). They are the conquerors (Rev. 3:5), or those who have been predestined "from the creation of the world" (17:8). But that does not mean that predestination makes the call to obedience unnecessary, for a name can be blotted out of the book of life. Human victory and divine predestination are here linked, just as are faith as a gift and as a personal decision.

βίος (bios), life (1050); βιόω (bioō), live (1051); βίωσις (biōsis), way of life (1052); βιωτικός (biōtikos), pertaining to life (1053).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. bios denotes life in its concrete outward manifestations. It is used generally for "lifetime" or "duration of life," and specifically for an individual's way of life. Aristotle gave an ethical meaning to the term, such as a political life or a contemplative life. Later bios acquired the concrete meaning of livelihood, trade, or wealth (cf. biōtikos, pertaining to life, everyday).

2. The LXX adopts mainly the temporal meaning of bios, i.e., the duration of life. That meaning is clearest in Job, where it occurs 13x. A person's lifetime, in all its wretchedness, is compared to forced labor (7:1), a shadow (8:9), vanity (7:16), and sorrow (15:20). Wisdom, by contrast, promises the godly length of life (Prov. 3:2), which is a gift she holds in her right hand (3:16), while the godless are punished with a short life (Wis. 2:1, 4, 5). In Song 8:7 bios means wealth, and in Prov. 31:14 food.

In 4 Macc., Hel. influence replaces the temporal meaning of bios with an ethical meaning. The author describes a way of life that is true to the Mosaic law (5:36; 7:15): upright (1:15), pleasant (8:23), and even divine (7:7). In Wis. 4:9; 5:4 bios means conduct.

NT 1. bios is surprisingly rare in the NT, occurring only 11x (bioō only once, 1 Pet. 4:2). It has a clearly temporal meaning (duration of life) only in a variant reading of 1 Pet. 4:3; bioō in the previous verse denotes living one's earthly life. In 1 Tim. 2:2 and 2 Tim. 2:4 it has the more general sense of living one's everyday life.

2. The NT uses bios 6x in the concrete, somewhat external sense of wealth, fortune, or possessions. In Mk. 12:44 and Lk. 21:4 the poor widow puts "all she had to live on" into the treasury, while Lk. 15:12, 30 tells of the prodigal son wasting his inherited "property." Real love shows itself in sharing one's "material possessions" with a fellow believer in need (1 Jn. 3:17).

3. Paul uses biōsis to describe his manner of life as a Pharisaic Jew (Acts 26:4). The meaning of bios as "manner of life" occurs seldom in the NT. "The pride of life" (lit. trans. of 1 Jn. 2:16) refers to ostentatious living, and in Lk. 8:14 there is an allusion to "life's worries." The reason why this Gk. conception of bios is not adopted by the NT is that we should not conduct our lives for ourselves; rather, we must live in the service of others.

βλασφημέω (blasphēmeō), slander, defame, blaspheme (1059); βλασφημία (blasphēmia), slander, defamation, blasphemy (1060); βλάσφημος (blasphēmos), slanderous, blasphemous, a blasphemer (1061).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. blasphēmeō means to speak harm, bring into ill repute, slander, blaspheme; it refers to a strong expression of personal defamation. blasphēmia (an action noun) means profane language or slander, defamation, by which another person is damaged. blasphēmos expresses the quality of the action or the doer. False representations of a deity—e.g., in anthropomorphic terms—can be described as blasphemy; so too can doubts about the deity's authority.

2. Words in this group appear only 22x in the LXX, most frequently in 2 Macc. They are always either directly or indirectly against the majesty of God; with a few exceptions (e.g., Isa. 66:3; Wis. 1:6; Sir. 3:16), they refer to the reviling of the people of Israel by heathen enemies. Thus in a comparison with the king of Assyria, Yahweh is written off as powerless, reviled (2 Ki. 19:4, 6, 22); when Israel is under attack, Yahweh is blasphemed (2 Macc. 8:4; 9:28; 10:4, 34); the Edomites rejoice over Jerusalem's fall and in so doing blaspheme Yahweh (Ezek. 35:12–13).

In Isa. 52:5 the lament of the rulers over the continual despising of God's name through the exile is the basis for Yahweh's saving intervention (cf. 52:6). The God of Israel is not as a rule a source of hope and help, or even of fear, for the heathen; this fact alone is enough to earn them the title of blasphemers (Dan. 3:29). Surprisingly, perhaps, the LXX does not use this vb. in Lev. 24:16 for someone who blasphemes the name of the Lord; rather it refers to (lit.) "anyone who names the name of the Lord." In Jewish circles, even to name Yahweh's name was considered blasphemy. This applies not only to Israelites but also to the nations, whose blasphemy may be requited by God with death (cf. blasphēmeō in 2 Ki. 19:6; blasphēmos in 2 Macc. 9:28).

3. (a) The concept of blasphemy is found elsewhere in the OT where the technical terms are lacking. It is blasphemy to make false, irreverent use of God's name: "You shall not misuse the name of the LORD your God, for the LORD will not hold anyone guiltless who misuses his name" (Exod. 20:7; cf. Deut. 5:11). Similarly, the king or priest was not to bring discredit on his sacred office (1 Sam. 2:27–36; 3:13; 2 Sam. 12:14), oppose God's chosen (Num. 16:30), break the covenant (Deut. 31:20; Isa. 1:4), or doubt Yahweh's power either in judgment or salvation (Num. 14:11, 23; 20:10–12; 2 Ki. 18:30–35; Isa. 5:24; 10:8–12). Blasphemy is closely linked to cursing. Job's wife and Satan expected Job to curse God and thus blaspheme (Job 1:11; 2:5, 9). But his friends regarded his protestations of innocence as blasphemy (15:2–6; 34:35–37).

(b) In numerous OT passages the innocent appear to reproach Yahweh, but this is not regarded as blasphemy. It is more a confession of faith and of utter dependence on him to act (e.g., Exod. 5:22; Num. 11:11–15; Jos. 7:7; Isa. 38:13; Jer. 12:1–4; 15:15–18; 20:7–10; Lam. 3:10–11). By contrast, genuine blasphemy merits death and is punished by human judges (Lev. 24:10–16; 1 Ki. 21:13) or by God himself (Exod. 20:7; Num. 16:30; 2 Macc. 9:4, 12). The forms of the penalties suggest the extermination of the guilty party.

NT Words of the blasphēmeō group are found in the NT 56x (the vb. 34x). As in the OT and in rab. Jud., the terms are used in the NT in a religious sense, i.e., with direct or indirect reference to God (except for Jude 9). Blasphemy against God amounts to words or conduct injurious to his honor and holiness.

1. This sin against God's majesty can consist of blasphemy against God's person (Acts 6:11; Rev. 13:6; 16:11, 21), against his name (Rom. 2:24; 1 Tim. 6:1; Rev. 16:9), against his word (Tit. 2:5), or against his angels (2 Pet. 2:10–12).

Since Jesus claims for his words and actions messianic authority and assumes rights and powers (e.g., to forgive sins, Lk. 5:21) that, in the view of the religious Jews and teachers of the law, belong to God alone, he is regarded in these circles as a blasphemer (Matt. 9:3; Mk. 2:7; Jn. 10:36). The sentence of death against him is therefore based, among other things, on a charge of blasphemy (Matt. 26:65; Mk. 14:64). In 1st-cent. Jud., blasphemy was still an offense deserving death. According to m. Sanh. 7:5, a blasphemer is not culpable unless he pronounces the divine name itself (cf. Lev. 24:10–16); the judges were to rend their garments on hearing the evidence. Jesus' egō eimi ("I am") in Jn. 8:58 was apparently understood as a claim to the divine name, whereupon the Jews took up stones to stone him (8:59).

2. From a NT point of view, the real blasphemers are those who deny the messianic claims of Jesus and therefore revile and mock him. Some such people were at the cross, who "hurled insults [blasphēmeō]at him ... saying, 'You who are going to destroy the temple and build it in three days, save yourself! Come down from the cross, if you are the Son of God!" (Matt. 27:39–40). Those who impugn the dignity of the one sent by God commit an offense against God himself.

3. Since the church of Christ and its members bear witness by their existence to Christ himself, they too undergo the abuse that was directed against their Lord (1 Pet. 4:4; Rev. 2:9). Thus Paul suffers as Christ's disciple (Acts 13:45; 18:6) the persecutions he had previously inflicted on Christians (1 Tim. 1:13). To revile the church that bears Christ's name can be to mock Christ and thus, indirectly, to blaspheme against God.

4. Christians for their part must take care that they do not, by their conduct, give cause for blasphemy against God or his word (1 Tim. 6:1; Tit. 2:5). Indeed, the behavior of Christ's disciples (even toward each other) should contribute to the glory of the Father (cf. Matt. 5:16). This is probably the sense in which we should interpret NT lists of sins, which typically contain prohibitions of blasphemy (Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8; 1 Tim. 6:4; 2 Tim. 3:2). Blasphemy is mentioned in them as characteristic of the heathen and of apostate Christians. By contrast, Rom. 2:24 adapts the LXX of Isa. 52:5, which blames Israel for reviling God's name by living a hypocritical life.

5. The sin of blasphemy, including blasphemy against the Son of Man, can be forgiven; only blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is unforgivable (Matt. 12:31–32; Mk. 3:28–29; Lk. 12:10). This statement has been the subject of much discussion. Among the many attempts at exegesis, the most convincing is the suggestion that the person committing this sin is one who recognizes that the Holy Spirit is working through Jesus but who consciously and deliberately ascribes this work to the devil instead. Such a person is declaring war on God. This is what the context suggests, since Jesus' enemies cannot deny that God's Spirit is working through Jesus because of an exorcism he has just performed (Matt. 12:22), so they accuse him of casting out demons by Beelzebub, the prince of demons (12:24; → diabolos, devil, 1333).

Thus, blasphemy here is much more serious than simply taking the divine name in vain, which a believer may have done before coming to repentance and faith. One of the prime works of the Spirit is leading a person to salvation in the name of Christ (cf. Rom. 8:15–16). Resisting the Holy Spirit's call, therefore, and remaining in hardened unbelief is tantamount to blasphemy against the Spirit. Thus, those who might be tormented by fear that they may have committed the unforgivable sin show by their very concern that they have not committed it.

6. Another passage that has been the subject of debate is Jude 9: "But even the archangel Michael, when he was disputing with the devil about the body of Moses, did not dare to bring a slanderous accusation [blasphēmia] against him, but said, 'The Lord rebuke you!'" In v. 7 the false teachers are compared with the people of Sodom and Gomorrah and in v. 8 are accused of polluting their own bodies, rejecting authority, and reviling the celestial beings (probably angels). Presumably an archangel was sent by God to bury the body of Moses after his death (Deut. 34), and Satan did his best to prevent this, claiming as lord of the material order that the body was his and possibly accusing Moses of murdering the Egyptian (cf. Exod. 2:12). The point of the observation is that even the archangel Michael did not respond with like reviling but committed the responsibility for rebuking Satan to God, using an imprecation found in Zech. 3:2.

Perhaps in the background here is notion that we should be very careful, both in uttering a curse and in reviling, not to challenge a power too great for us to cope with. Note what Jude 10 says: "Yet these men speak abusively against [blasphēmeō] whatever they do not understand; and what things they do understand by instinct, like unreasoning animals—these are the very things that destroy them" (cf. 1 Cor. 2:7–16). That is, the unspiritual not only fail to understand but even blaspheme God in the process. Thus the sense may be comparable with blasphemy against the Holy Spirit in the Gospels. There may also be the sense here in which the believer should leave judgment to God (cf. Rom. 12:19; cf. Deut. 32:35).

7. blasphēmos, abusive, slanderous, blasphemous, occurs at Acts 6:11; 2 Tim. 3:2; 2 Pet. 2:11; and as a noun, blasphemer, at 1 Tim. 1:13.

βλέπω (blepō), look at, see (1063); ἀναβλέπω (anablepō), look up (at), see again (329); ἐμβλέπω (emblepō), look, look at, look in the face, consider (1838).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. blepō, see, is near to horaō (→ 3972) in meaning but gradually came to be used less frequently. Originally blepō applied only to the function of the eyes, seeing, looking, watching. It later came to mean to look at, view, look into; also to give heed to, pay attention to something. Fig. it can mean observe, notice.

(b) The use of anablepō, to look up, see again, goes far back into cl. times. In the LXX it almost always means simply to look up, but Is. 42:18 has the sense connected with blindness, "Look [anablepō], you blind, and see [aor. of horaō]." The idea of recovery of sight is described as early as Herodotus and in an inscription from the temple of Asclepius.

NT 1. blepō occurs 132x in the NT. In general it simply refers to the capacity to see (Matt. 12:22; Lk. 7:21). Otherwise it can mean to watch, look at, look into (Matt. 5:28; Rev. 5:3–4). It also represents intellectual functions such as attending, paying attention to (Mk. 13:33; 1 Cor. 1:26), heeding something (2 Cor. 10:7), or being careful. Fig. it can mean to perceive or observe (Rom. 7:23; Heb. 2:9).

2. anablepō occurs 24x in the NT. The generic meaning to look up is found in several passages (e.g., Mk. 16:4; Lk. 19:5; 21:1). Jesus looked up to heaven when giving thanks for the bread to be multiplied for the crowd (Matt. 14:19; Mk. 6:41; Lk. 9:16) and when healing the deaf man in Mk. 7:34. The man whose vision was restored by a double touch of Jesus looked up after the first touch (8:24). The vb. means to see again in Jesus' message to John the Baptist about his messianic works (Matt. 11:5; Lk. 7:22). In Acts 9:12, 17, 18, it refers to the restoration of Saul's vision. Jn. 9:11, 15, 18 describes the healing of the man born blind by using anablepō, although obviously the prefix ana- cannot mean "again" here, since the man had never been able to see.

3. (a) The NT uses of emblepō (12x) are generally straightforward, usually signifying a look of interest, love, or concern. Jesus "looked" at the rich young man and loved him (Mk. 10:21). He later "looked" at the disciples as he discussed an important issue (Matt. 19:26; Mk. 10:27). A servant girl who thought Peter may have been associated with Jesus "looked closely" at him (14:67). When Jesus applied the parable of the vineyard, he "looked directly" at his audience (Lk. 20:17). In the poignant passage about Peter's meeting with Jesus after the denial, Jesus "looked straight at" him (Lk. 22:61).

(b) On one occasion emblepō describes the perception of a formerly blind man after a second healing touch by Jesus (Mk. 8:25). Conversely, Saul was unable to see (emblepō) after his exposure to the light on the road to Damascus (Acts 22:11; cf. 9:8, which uses the simple blepō). It is uncertain whether the usage of emblepō in Jn. 1:36, 42 implies some sort of special insight or perception. Since John sometimes varies his vocabulary without special meaning (and conversely, may employ one word with several levels of meaning), one must be careful when attributing a spiritual meaning to a word. In this case, however, the significance of the recognition may justify understanding a similar significance in emblepō.

See also horaō, see (3972); kollourion, eye salve (3141); atenizō, look at a person or thing intently, gaze on (867); theatron, theater, place of assembly, a spectacle (2519).

βοάω (boaō), call, shout, cry out (1066); ἀναβοάω (anaboaō), cry out (331); βοή (boē), cry, shout (1068).

CL & OT boaō means cry out, call out (e.g., Gen. 39:14; Isa. 36:13; 1 Macc. 13:45). In many contexts it is expressive of the extremities of human needs and joys. Both boaō and anaboaō can be used for calling out in distress (e.g., Num. 20:16; Jdg. 10:10). The noun boē occurs, among other places, in Exod. 2:23 and 1 Sam. 9:16. In each case the cry of God's people in their affliction does not go unheeded by God.

The OT gives numerous warnings about abusing the needy so that they cry out to God (Exod. 22:22–27; Deut. 24:15; Job 31:38; Mal. 3:5). There is also an extended use of the idea of crying in the sense of a murder crying out for justice and retribution (e.g., Gen. 4:10). If the victim is dead, the deed itself is an accusing witness.

Crying is used in the context of the coming salvation promised in Isa. 40:3, which refers to the triumphant return of the exiles from Babylon through the deserts, led by the Lord himself. In the next stanza the prophet is told to cry of the transitoriness of humankind compared with the word of God (40:6, 8). Isa. 54:1 refers to crying aloud for joy—a passage that recalls the increase of the nation despite adverse circumstances.

NT The same range of reference is found in the NT, where the Isa. passages are seen as finding their fulfillment in events attending the coming of Christ. boaō is used in Mk. 15:34 for Jesus' cry of anguish (anaboaō in Matt. 27:46). This cry uses the words of Ps.

22:1 to express the desolation of a sense of abandonment by God. Taken at face value, the words suggest that Jesus experienced the desolation that the people of God experienced throughout their history. But there is an irony in the situation. For this was the Son of God experiencing the desolation, and it was at the hands of God's people. Some commentators hold that the cry was not one of despair but that of a righteous sufferer trusting in God's protection and expecting vindication (cf. Ps. 22:22–31).

boaō is used of evil spirits leaving a person (Acts 8:7), of the sick (Lk. 9:38; 18:38), and of the shouts of a crowd (Acts 17:6; 25:24). Crying to God is a form of prayer that God answers (Lk. 18:7). The vb. also occurs in the quotation from Isa. 40:3 that all four Evangelists apply to John the Baptist (Matt. 3:3; Mk. 1:3; Lk. 3:4; Jn. 1:23). His is the voice that cries, and his message is a Christological interpretation of Isa. 40:3. The preparation of the desert for the coming of the Lord is a type of the preparation of God's people for the coming of the Lord in the person of Jesus Christ. In Gal. 4:27, Paul applies Isa. 54:1 to the joy of freedom found in the church.

boē is used only in Jas. 5:4 for the cry of the oppressed.

See also krazō, cry aloud (3189).

1070 βοηθέω

βοηθέω (boētheō), to help, assist (1070); βοήθεια (boētheia), help, assistance (1069); βοηθός (boēthos), helpful, helper (1071).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. boētheō means to go to the assistance of, help. The noun often has a military connotation of an auxiliary or allied troop going to help fellow soldiers in battle.

2. The LXX often uses this word group in military contexts (e.g., 2 Sam. 18:3; 1 Ki. 1:7). But when all is said and done, Israel's real helper is Yahweh, as the stone named Ebenezer was to indicate (1 Sam. 7:12). The psalms are filled with recognition of the Lord as Israel's helper (Ps. 18:2; 19:14 [rock]; 79:9; 118:7), and God's people should go nowhere else for aid (60:11; Isa. 10:3; 31:1).

NT 1. boētheō occurs 8x in the NT, boētheia 2x, and boēthos only once. A physical use of the noun occurs in Acts 27:17, where the sailors passed "helps" (i.e., "ropes") under the ship to hold it together during the storm. Five instances of the vb. are in the imperative, three of which are calls uttered to Jesus for help (Matt. 15:25; Mk. 9:22, 24). In Paul's vision at Troas, a man from Macedonia asks him to "come over . . . and help us" (Acts 16:9), which initiated his mission in Macedonia and Greece. The other call for help came from the Asian Jews who were trying to lynch Paul in the Jerusalem temple (21:28).

2. Just as the OT called on God as Israel's helper, so in the NT believers recognize Jesus as their helper (cf. Heb. 13:6, quoting Ps. 118:7). In Jesus the Son of God we "may receive mercy and find grace to help us in our time of need" (Heb. 4:16), and he can help us in our temptations, since he too has been tempted (2:18).

1071 (boēthos, helpful, helper), → 1070.

1087 (boulē, will, resolve, purpose), → 1089.

1088 (boulēma, will, intention, purpose), → 1089.

βούλομαι (boulomai), to will, wish, want, desire (1089); βουλή (boulē), will, resolve, purpose (1087); βούλημα (boulēma), will, intention, purpose (1088); ἐπιβουλή (epiboulē), plot, plan (2101).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. boulomai meant originally to prefer, favor, then to want, elect, decide. It is synonymous with (e)thelō (→ 2527). In Hel. Gk. boulomai occurs the less frequently of the two. boulē denotes an intention, a deliberation, as well as the result of a deliberation in a sense of a decision, resolution, or edict. From this boulē developed the meaning of an assembly of people who had power to make decisions. A later word is boulēma, describing the will more as a purpose, intention, or tendency.

2. (a) boulomai occurs over 100x in the LXX, the same as with thelō. Different translators tended to prefer one over the other. Thus boulomai is found more frequently in Exod., 1 Sam., and Job. It means to like, want (Isa. 1:11), find pleasure in (2 Sam. 24:3), desire (Job 13:3). It can express the varied nuances of general human volition, but is also commonly used for the will of God (e.g., 1 Sam. 2:25; Isa. 53:10).

(b) boulē also occurs over 100x in the LXX, this time in contrast with thelēma (49x). It denotes one's consideration that precedes a decision (e.g., Deut. 32:28). It can even be found in the sense of wisdom (Prov. 2:11; 8:12). The "Spirit of counsel," i.e., of considered reflection, is a gift of God (Isa. 11:2). The word can also mean advice, whether good (Gen. 49:6; 1 Ki. 12:8) or foolish (Ps. 1:1; Isa. 19:11). As in cl. Gk., it can denote the council as a political institution (1 Macc. 14:22) or the resolution of an assembly (3 Macc. 7:17). Above all, boulē can designate the will or purpose of God (e.g., Ps. 33:10–11; 73:24), which is trustworthy and reliable (Isa. 25:1). His purpose includes Israel's salvation (14:26).

(c) The divine will and purpose plays a special role in the Dead Sea Scrolls. The elect community must perform God's will (1QS 9:13, 23), and nothing takes place apart from that will (1QH 1:8; 10:9). It is the irrevocable prerequisite for every insight into right action (14:13).

NT 1. (a) As in Hel. Gk. generally, the NT tends to use thelō rather than boulomai (207x versus 37x), though they are virtually interchangeable. boulomai generally denotes conscious volition, a decision of the will. Such volition presupposes the possibility of freedom of decision. (i) It denotes human volition (1 Tim. 2:8; 5:14; Tit. 3:8), usually without any theological significance (e.g., Mk. 15:15; Acts 12:4; Jas. 4:4). (ii) But it also denotes the volition of God (Lk. 22:42; Heb. 6:17; Jas. 1:18), Jesus (Matt. 11:27), or the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12:11). (iii) It can designate a wish determined by personal inclinations (Acts 25:22; Phlm. 13; 1 Tim. 6:9).

(b) As a rule, boulē (12x) refers to the free decision of the will, which is prepared to carry it out. It can refer either to human decisions (e.g., Lk. 23:51; Acts 27:12, 42) or to the counsel or purpose of God (e.g., Lk. 7:30; Acts 2:23; 4:28; Eph. 1:11; Heb. 6:17). epiboulē (4x in the NT) is a synonym and refers onlys to human plots against Paul (Acts 9:24; 20:3, 19; 23:30).

(c) boulēma (3x), in contrast to boulē, stresses the will more as mental direction and should be translated as intent, intention (Acts 27:43; Rom. 9:19; 1 Pet. 4:3).

2. Theological significance is found esp. where this word group speaks of the counsel, intention, or will of God (or Jesus or the Holy Spirit). It is always a case of an unalterable determination.

(a) In Lk.'s writings boulomai and boulē elucidate vital aspects of Lk.'s Christological proclamation as the fulfillment of God's purpose. Lk. 10:22 ("those to whom the Son chooses to reveal him") shows the indivisible unity between Father and Son. Jesus' death on the cross is part of "God's set purpose" or "will" foretold in Scripture (Acts 2:23; 4:28, both boulē). Despite this will, however, the Jewish leaders are not absolved from the fact that they crucified him. The Jews did not realize that the promises given to David in Ps. 16:10 point beyond him to God's plan with Jesus (Acts 13:34–37; cf. also 2:25–36).

It is one's attitude to the humiliated and crucified one that decides to whom the revelation will be disclosed. "To whom the Son chooses to reveal him" (Lk. 10:22) means, therefore, that with respect to knowledge of God, all human willing here reaches its limits. But note that this is not a rule of arbitrary predestination here, but rather a conscious awareness of the revealed will of God. Lk. 22:42 makes it clear that Jesus, in unity with the Father, carries out only the divine will: "Father, if you are willing [boulomai], take this cup from me; yet not my will [thelēma], but yours be done."

Paul stresses in Acts 20:26–31 that in spite of threatening heresies, he had testified to "the whole will [boulē] of God" (20:27), namely, God's gracious approach to sinners in the sacrifice of his Son (20:28).

(b) In the rest of the NT this word group is used only 7x for the will and purpose of God. In Rom. 9:19, when Paul refers to the Gentiles' relationship to the will of God, he makes use of boulēma (the opponent gives the excuse, "Who resists his will?"); in 9:18, however, where he himself speaks as a believer of the double will of God, he uses thelō. Since boulēma expresses more an intention, which is often found to be dark and impenetrable, this word takes on the tone of arbitrary willfulness or caprice in the mouth of an opponent.

In 1 Cor. 12:11 Paul points out that all gifts in the community derive from the one Spirit of God, apportioned "just as he determines." In Eph. 1:11 boulē means the purpose of God; that is, in Christ, God "works out everything in conformity with the purpose [boulē] of his will [thelēma]." In the context of 1:3–5 Paul is stressing that the purpose of divine election precedes the act of the historical election of Israel. Heb. 6:17 uses boulē similarly for the unalterable purpose of God. Peter stresses in 2 Pet. 3:9 that God's promise to send Jesus back is firm, despite its seeming delay; his will is the salvation of all. In Jas. 1:18, our rebirth is the choice of God's saving will.

βραβεῖον (brabeion), prize (1092); βραβεύω (brabeuō), award prizes, judge, rule (1093); καταβραβεύω (katabrabeuō), decide against, condemn (2857).

CL & OT 1. The noun brabeion, victor's prize (which could be wreaths made of olive, laurel, ivy, pine, flowers, palm branches, or myrtle; fixed money prizes; oil or barley; shields as gifts of the deity; accompanying rights throughout the home cities), is a technical term from the world of ancient sports. brabeuō denotes the function of the umpire, but was also used metaphorically to mean lead, determine, rule. Just as brabeus, umpire, can have the meaning of prince, brabeion is also used with the sense of scepter.

2. Heb. lacks the idea of the prize. Despite the LXX's use of the imagery of the fight, it does not make use of brabeion. brabeuō appears in the LXX only in Wis. 10:12, where Wisdom was the umpire at Jacob's struggle with the angel (see Gen. 32:24–30).

NT To be accurate, brabeuō (only in Col. 3:15) should be translated: "Let the peace of Christ decide as umpire in your hearts." It is striking that Paul also uses in Col. the word katabrabeuō, withhold the victor's prize (2:18); it stands parallel in meaning to the krinō (judge) of Col. 2:16.

In 1 Cor. 9:24–27 and Phil. 3:10–14 (both of which contain brabeion), extraordinary emphasis is placed on the determination with which a contest is to be pursued. Paul instructs believers to run vigorously with purpose, "not . . . aimlessly," in order to obtain the victor's prize (1 Cor. 9:26), which the Christian obtains only with effort—perhaps even requiring the sacrifice of one's life (cf. Phil. 2:16–17)—and through koinōnia, sharing in the suffering of Christ (cf. 3:10). This process has nothing to do with ethical perfection; Christians have entered the race (1 Cor. 9:24), are mature (teleioi, Phil. 3:15), and have been made Christ's own only through faith in him (3:9, 12). The "prize" in Phil. 3:14 means participation in the resurrection of the dead—not, of course, in the general resurrection of the good and evil, but probably the so-called first resurrection at Christ's return on the clouds before his thousand-year reign (1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Thess. 4:14–17; Rev. 20:6).

βρύχω (brychō), gnash (1107); βρυγμός (brygmos), gnashing (1106).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. brychō is used for the act of eating noisily or greedily as well as for the act of gnashing the teeth. It is also used metaphorically in the sense of the eating away of a disease. The noun brygmos connotes a biting and a gnashing of the teeth.

2. In the LXX brychō occurs in poetic literature, where the gnashing of the teeth is a demonstration of anger (Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16; 37:12; 112:10) or perhaps of mocking (Lam. 2:16). brygmos in Prov. 19:12 denotes the wrath of a king. In Sir. 51:3 the noun means biting, for the writer gives thanks to God for deliverance from "grinding teeth about to devour me."

NT In the NT brychō is used only once (Acts 7:54), where it describes the angry reaction of those listening to Stephen's speech. The noun brygmos always occurs in the expression "there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Lk. 13:28)—a description of the condition of the wicked in their future existence. The association of this word with klauthmos ("weeping," → klaiō, 3081) and the figure of torment that accompanies the expression in Matt. 13:42, 50 suggests that the gnashing of the teeth reflects extreme suffering and remorse.

See also klaiō, weep (3081); koptō, strike (3164); lypeō, inflict pain (3382); pentheō, be sad, grieve, mourn (4291); stenazō, to sigh, groan (5100).

βρῶμα (brōma), food (1109); βρῶσις (brōsis), eating, consuming, food (1111); βρώσιμος (brōsimos), edible (1110); γάλα (gala), milk (1128).

CL & OT brōma and brōsis both mean food and the process of eating. Rarely is each used in a fig. sense (e.g., the food of immortality). In the LXX both words usually mean food, rarely eating as a process (e.g., Jer. 15:3). God, who has assigned food to both humans and animals (Gen. 1:29–30; 2:16; 9:3), also looks after his people's food throughout their history (cf. Gen. 41:35–49; Ps. 78:18, 30). The food God gives is an expression of the righteousness he has also given (Joel 2:23 LXX).

NT brōma occurs in the NT 17x, both lit. (e.g., Matt. 14:15; Mk. 7:19; Rom. 14:15, 20) and fig. (e.g., Jn. 4:34; 1 Cor. 3:2; 10:3). brōsis (11x) denotes the act of eating (e.g., Rom. 14:17; 1 Cor. 8:4; 2 Cor. 9:10), as the synonym of brōma both lit. (Heb. 12:16; cf. Matt. 6:19 with the idea of consuming rust) and fig. (Jn. 4:32; 6:27, 55).

1. Lit. use. In the NT, as in the OT, food is a gift from God. We should ask for it daily (cf. Matt. 6:11) and receive it thankfully (cf. 1 Tim. 4:4). Ascetic and ritual tendencies, which classed certain foods as taboo, are rejected by the NT as false teaching (Col. 2:16–17; 1 Tim. 4:3–7; Heb. 13:9). No food is unclean as such (Mk. 7:18–19; cf. Acts 10:14–15), and no food possesses any special significance for our relationship to God (1 Cor. 8:8; cf. 6:13). The kingdom of God is realized not in eating or drinking but in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit (Rom. 14:17).

But Christians can be commanded to avoid a particular food (e.g., meat offered to idols) if a fellow Christian by eating will be plunged into a conflict of conscience (Rom. 14:15, 20; 1 Cor. 8:13). Out of love for that tempted believer for whom Christ died, the "strong" Christian must be willing to forego a particular food.

2. Fig. use. (a) brōma is used in contrast to gala, milk, in 1 Cor. 3:2, to contrast the basics of the faith with deeper teachings. Since faith involves a process of maturing, "infants" in the faith cannot yet "digest" the deepest truths of divine wisdom. The "spiritual food" referred to in 10:3 is the manna that miraculously kept the Israelites alive when naturally grown food was lacking. This food is interpreted typologically with reference to the Lord's Supper (→ pinō, 4403).

(b) In Jn. 4:32 Jesus startlingly describes the work he did in fulfillment of his Father's commission as the food (brōsis) on which he lived. His whole life constituted a revelation that did not have its origin in himself but that he received from his Father. brōsis is mentioned three more times in Jn. in connection with feeding on Christ as "food that endures to eternal life" (Jn. 6:27). His flesh is "real food" (6:55), for he is the bread of life. To eat this bread is another way of describing what it is to believe in Jesus (6:35).

Γ gamma

1120 Γαβριήλ

Γαβριήλ (Gabriēl), Gabriel (1120).

OT The name comes from the root geber (man or strong) together with ʾēl (God). This suggests two meanings: man of God or God is strong. In the OT Gabriel appears only in Daniel, where as a heavenly messenger he makes his appearance as a man (Dan. 8:16, 9:21), in order to reveal the future by interpreting a vision (8:17) and to give understanding and wisdom to Daniel himself (9:22).

Jewish intertestamental texts (esp. in the various books of Enoch) display much more interest in Gabriel. Particularly noteworthy is his position at God's left hand and his authority over all powers. His functions extend beyond those in Daniel to intercession and destruction of the wicked.

NT In the NT Gabriel appears only in the Lukan birth narrative, where he is the angelic messenger announcing the births of John (1:11–20) and Jesus (1:26–38). As the one who comes from the immediate presence of God, he brings reassurance to Mary of her standing in God's sight (1:30).

1126 γαζοφυλάκιον

γαζοφυλάκιον (gazophylakion), treasure room, treasury (1126).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. gazophylakion means a treasury. The word is used a number of times in the canonical books of the LXX for living quarters (Neh. 3:30; 13:7) or for a room or chamber connected in some way with the temple (2 Ki. 23:11; Neh. 10:38–39 = LXX 10:37–38; 13:4–5; Ezek. 40:17); once it is used for the royal treasury of a pagan king (Est. 3:9). In the Apocr. it refers either to the sacred or the royal treasury (e.g., 1 Macc. 3:28; 14:49; 2 Macc. 3:6, 24, 28, 40; 4 Macc. 4:3, 6).

NT There are no references in the NT to the temple treasury where valuables were stored. In Mk. 12:41, 43 and Lk. 21:1, gazophylakion refers to one of the thirteen trumpet-shaped collection boxes in the temple, into which the Jews (including the widow lady noticed by Jesus) threw coins. These were marked to indicate the use to which the funds were put. Jn. 8:20 refers to the gazophylakion as the place where Jesus taught in the temple precincts; he was probably standing in the Court of the Women, where the collection boxes were placed.

1128 (gala, milk), → 1109.

γαμέω (gameō), marry (1138); γάμος (gamos), wedding (1141); γαμίζω (gamizō), give in marriage (1139); γαμίσκω (gamiskō), give in marriage (1140).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. gamos means wedding, marriage, consummation of marriage, or the wedding feast. The vb. gameō means to marry, celebrate a wedding, have sexual relations. gamizō and gamiskō are later forms, meaning give (a daughter) in marriage.

(b) Even though we find traces of polygamy and polyandry in the Gk. myths, monogamy predominated in the Gk. world. Morality within marriage was strict, at least on the part of the wife. She was to be faithful and inviolable, a good mother and manager of the home. But the man had greater freedom. He could have concubines or relations with prostitutes. Adultery in the Gk. states was severely punished, esp. in the case of the woman.

In the Hel. period marriage morals had become looser. There was much prostitution in the towns, esp. in ports such as Corinth. Certain cults had introduced sacred prostitution. Sexual relationships with priestesses became part of the cult and granted a sharing in the divine; it was referred to as sacred marriage.

2. gameō and gamos are infrequent in the LXX. In the OT proper, gamos occurs only at Gen. 29:22; Est. 2:18; 9:22 (but cf. 1:5 in the LXX); in the Apocr., gamos is used 17x. The OT law contains no prescribed form of marriage ceremony. Nevertheless, marriage was important. In the genealogies (e.g., Gen. 5) marriage and the begetting of children (esp. males) are the most important features mentioned. Even though from Abraham down to the kings there is evidence for polygamy (e.g., Gen. 16:1–16; 25:6; 29:21–30; 1 Sam. 18:27; 25:42–43; 2 Sam. 3:2–5), monogamy occupies the central position (see esp. Gen. 1:26–28; 2:18–24). The royal law in Deut. demands that the king "must not take many wives, or his heart will be led astray" (17:17; cf. 1 Ki. 11:1–11).

In the OT marriage is clearly regarded from the husband's standpoint and serves above all for the generation of offspring (cf. Gen. 1:28). To achieve this end a man might take another wife (cf. 16:1–16, of Abraham; Deut. 25:5–10, of levirate marriage; but note Lev. 20:21). At the same time the wife is to be loved and taken seriously as a partner (Gen. 2:23–24); in 2:18 she is described as a "helper." The partnership continues in the Fall and in the problems of sexuality created by it (ch. 3).

3. Adultery was outlawed in the OT and subject to severe punishment (Exod. 20:14; Lev. 18:20; 20:10; Deut. 5:18; 22:22–27). Even if committed unwittingly, adultery is hateful to God (Gen. 20:3–7). Adultery was a feature of paganism, but God's people were to be different in sexual practices and marriage.

In the OT divorce depended solely on the man (cf. Deut. 24:1–4; Jer. 3:8). The many laws about various sexual offenses show how the elemental power of sexuality, which threatens family and society, should be restrained and directed into the channels willed by God. One of the chief concerns was the problem of marriages with foreigners, which were forbidden (Deut. 7:3–4; 20:16–18; Ezr. 9–10; but cf. 21:10–14), though earlier cases of such marriages are exemplified (Gen. 41:45; Exod. 2:21; Num. 12:1; 2 Sam. 11:3). Heathen marriages undermined allegiance to Yahweh, esp. in the case of Solomon (1 Ki. 11:1–11).

4. If adultery was a violation of the divine law and thus an offense against the covenant, participation in the Canaanite fertility rites was an offense against both marriage and God. Hosea was the first to express the people's apostasy as prostitution and a breach of the marriage bond between God and Israel (Hos. 1–2; cf. Isa. 50:1; Jer. 2:2, 10, 25; 3:1–25; Ezek. 16, 23). Hosea's own act of marrying a prostitute at God's command (Hos. 1:2) was symbolic of Yahweh's relationship with Israel. It was God's mercy, stretching far beyond all law, that caused him not to annihilate or cast off his people as the law of marriage demanded, but to turn to them again in spite of all Israel's disloyalty and even to promise them a new covenant.

5. The Mosaic law restricted marriage and sexual intercourse to only those partners and times approved by God (Lev. 18:6–18). The Israelite was forbidden to have sexual intercourse with any close female relative. Intercourse during menstruation was prohibited, as was adultery, homosexual practices, and defilement with animals (18:19–33). Certain of these offenses were punishable by death (Deut. 27:20–23), others by problems such as childlessness (Lev. 12:6–18; 20:19–21; but cf. Gen. 38).

Certain prohibitions were attached only to the priesthood. The high priest was permitted to marry only a virgin selected from his own people (Lev. 21:13–14), and priests were forbidden to marry prostitutes and divorced women (21:7). Num. 36:5–9 contains a prohibition against an heiress marrying outside her own tribe (cf. Tob. 7:10).

A man falsely accusing his new bride of not being a virgin could be fined one hundred shekels, whipped, and compelled to take her as his wife (Deut. 22:13–19). But if his accusation proved true, the woman was to be stoned to death (22:20–21). A man who raped a virgin already engaged was liable to the death penalty (22:25–27). But in the case of a woman not pledged to marriage, the man was to take her as his wife and pay the girl's father fifty shekels (22:28–29).

6. The so-called levirate marriage (from Lat. levir, brother-in-law) refers to the marriage of a man to his deceased brother's widow when he died childless. The widow was not to remarry outside the family, and the unmarried brother was to perform the duties of a husband to her to raise up children to the deceased, so as to perpetuate his name in Israel. If the man refused, the woman was entitled to subject him to public disgrace before the elders (Deut. 25:5–10). The OT contains two instances of levirate marriage: the story of Onan in the patriarchal period (Gen. 38:8–10), and the story of Ruth offering herself to Boaz, who married her as a near kinsman to her deceased husband.

7. No restrictions on the age of marriage are given in the OT, though early marriage is sometimes spoken of with approval (Prov. 2:17; 5:18; Isa. 62:5). During the patriarchal age the bridegroom's father was to secure a bride for his son (Gen. 24:3; 38:6; Exod. 2:21; but cf. Gen. 21:21, where a mother does so). The selection of the bride was followed by formal betrothal, confirmed by oaths and a dowry (Gen. 34:12; Exod. 22:16; 1 Sam. 18:25). The marriage feast could last as long as seven or even fourteen days (cf. Jdg. 14:12; Tob. 8:19).

The fact that Jacob was permitted to take Laban's other daughter, Rachel, seven days after taking Leah, suggests that polygamy was openly countenanced. The OT Heb. expression for marrying was (lit.) "to take a wife" (cf. Num. 12:1; 1 Chr. 2:21). The bridegroom normally took the bride from her father's house to his own or his father's. Companions attended the groom (Jdg. 14:11). He was preceded by singers or musicians (Gen. 31:27; Jer. 7:34; 16:9; 1 Macc. 9:39) and accompanied by torchbearers or lamp-bearers (2 Esd. 10:2; Jer. 25:10; cf. Matt. 25:7; Rev. 18:23). The bride awaited the groom with her maidens, whereupon the whole party returned to the groom's home (Song 3:11; cf. Matt. 25:6). A newly betrothed and married man was exempt from military service for a year (Deut. 20:7; 24:5).

8. There is evidence of polygamy in Palestine in NT times. Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.), for example, had ten wives. The ongoing practice of levirate marriage evidently led to polygamy, which was countenanced by the school of Shammai but not by that of Hillel. The practice of taking a second wife, if there was dissension with the first, was often due to the high price fixed in the marriage contract for divorce.

9. The Essenes by and large condemned marriage, although one order of Essenes allowed it so as to propagate the race. At Qumran, 1QSa permitted marriage on reaching maturity (i.e., age twenty). In the main, however, total renunciation meant complete holiness, esp. in a priestly sect.

NT 1. The use of the gamos word group in the NT can hardly be distinguished from that in cl. Gk. Marriage was taken for granted. Hence, gameō (e.g., Mk. 6:17; Lk. 14:20) and gamos (Jn. 2:1–2) can be used without any theological connotation. Yet the NT deals with questions concerning the relationship of husbands and wives far more frequently than the use of this word group might suggest. Sexual offenses are fundamental offenses against marriage. Note how often such sins are repeatedly mentioned in lists of offenses (e.g., Rom. 13:13; 1 Cor. 6:9).

2. Marriage as an institution is clearly presupposed in the NT. It is based on God's commandment, esp. as noted in the creation story (e.g., Matt. 19:4–5; Mk. 10:6–7; 1 Cor. 6:16; Eph. 5:31). Though the NT essentially looks on marriage from the man's standpoint (as the head, cf. 1 Cor. 11:3; Eph. 5:23), the OT traditions are so transcended that the man's special rights fall away, and the shared life of husband and wife stands in the foreground (cf. 1 Cor. 7:3; Eph. 5:21–33; Col. 3:18–19). The NT attacks both divorce and sexual impurity. In 1 Tim. 4:3 Paul criticizes false teachers who forbade marriage. An unbroken marriage is assumed as something self-evident for the Christian (Matt. 5:27–31; 19:9; Mk. 10:11–12; Lk. 16:18; 1 Cor. 7:10–16; 1 Thess. 4:4; 1 Tim. 3:2, 12; Heb. 13:4).

3. (a) In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus is, as it were, a second Moses, the lawgiver of the eschatological era. In his instructions he speaks about the seventh commandment (Matt. 5:27–28; cf. Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18). In the dawning kingdom of God adultery is a sin that shows that one's heart is attached to oneself, not to God. In God's sight the lustful eye and the desiring thought are reckoned as the completed act. The story about the woman taken in adultery (Jn. 7:53–8:11) shows Jesus, the Judge, as the Savior who is prepared to forgive this sin. Thereby he shows himself to be the sovereign Lord of creation, of its order, and of the law.

(b) The Sermon on the Mount also addresses divorce (Matt. 5:31–32). Deut. 24:1 in principle permitted divorce, but the rabbis disagreed as to the grounds that justified it (Matt. 19:3). Jesus prohibited divorce (Mk. 10:2–12), granting it only on the grounds of immorality (Matt. 5:32; 19:9; → porneuō, 4519). The issue of divorce also surfaces in 1 Cor. 7:10–11.

(c) The practice of levirate marriage is presupposed in the question of the Sadducees concerning the marital status in the resurrection of a woman who had married seven brothers, each dying childless (Matt. 22:22–33; Mk. 12:18–27; Lk. 20:27–38). Jesus' reply rebuked the Sadducees for not knowing the Scriptures or the power of God. For in the resurrection one's present marital relationships are transcended and the dead raised are like the angels (Matt. 22:30, Mk. 12:25; Lk. 20:36). God is the God of the living.

(d) The question concerning eunuchs (Matt. 19:12) must also be understood eschatologically. The exigencies of the times call for celibacy from those who have the gift. Such people should voluntarily renounce marriage in order better to serve God (i.e., "because of the kingdom of heaven"). Marriage is only provisional in the light of the coming kingdom (cf. 1 Cor. 7:1–9, 26–29).

4. Both in the OT and among Jesus' contemporaries a wedding was the occasion for a festive meal. Hence gamos can also mean the wedding feast (see Jn. 2:1–11). In Matt. 22:1–14 Jesus uses a royal wedding feast as a parable. As background here we have the parallelism of God and the king, the concept of the eschatological feast (cf. Isa. 25:6), the picture of the marriage feast of the Messiah with his people, and the prophetic picture of marriage as representing the relationship between Yahweh and Israel. Earthly marriage will be superseded by the union of God with his people. As Messiah, Jesus is the true bridegroom (→ nymphē, 3811). The decisive factor is sharing his feast (Matt. 25:1–13; cf. Lk. 12:36–40). The marriage feast of the Lamb (Rev. 19:7–9) means the final union of the triumphant Christ with his own.

5. (a) Arising out of questions in the Corinthian church, Paul warns against various kinds of sexual immorality (1 Cor. 6:18–20) and then deals with marriage itself (ch. 7). He appeals to Jesus and rejects divorce (7:10; cf. Mk. 10:9–12). Paul also sees marriage as secondary when compared to faith, going so far as to recommend celibacy as a special gift in the light of the near end (1 Cor. 7:1, 7; cf. Matt. 19:12). Marriage, like all worldly activity, stands under the hōs mē ("as if not," 1 Cor. 7:29–31); that is, those with spouses should live as if they had none.

This is the standpoint from which the question of mixed marriages with unbelievers is handled (1 Cor. 7:12–16). The unbelieving partner is to decide whether it is to continue; the Christian partner should be prepared to let it continue. The consecration of such a mixed marriage by the believing partner is to be understood as a real power, for here grace is stronger than the unbelief of the heathen partner. It is the means of bringing the children within the covenant relationship, for otherwise they would be unclean. It may also lead to the salvation of the unbelieving partner.

The meaning of 1 Cor. 7:36–38 is unclear. Some take it to refer to a couple living together ascetically in so-called spiritual marriage, to whom Paul gives permission later to enter into full physical union. It seems more likely, however, that the passage refers to a father (or guardian) who did not wish to offend custom by not marrying off his daughter at the usual age. The verb gamizō (a synonym of gamiskō) occurs in the NT only in Matt. 22:30; 24:38; Mk. 12:25; Lk. 17:27; 20:34–35; 1 Cor. 7:38. Except in the last passage it clearly means to give in marriage. The NIV and NRSV, however, put the first interpretation in the text; the NIV puts the second in a note.

(b) Paul also saw marriage as a picture of our relationship with God. In Rom. 9:25 he quotes Hos. 2:23, alluding to the names of Hosea's children (Not Love and Not My People; cf. Hos. 1:6–10). For despite these names Yahweh will have mercy on his people and restore them. Paul sees in this promise grounds for the inclusion of Gentiles among the people of God. He uses the picture of marriage in 2 Cor. 11:2 to warn against apostasy. It is reversed in Eph. 5:22–33. Because Christ is the bridegroom of the church, marriage should be held holy. In 5:32 the marriage relationship is described as a mystery, symbolic of the relationship of Christ to the church. It is all the more reason why husbands and wives should love one another.

The picture of marriage lies also behind the expression "adulterous generation" (Matt. 12:39; 16:4; Mk. 8:38). Jesus is probably alluding to the people's attitude to God here. "That woman Jezebel" (Rev. 2:20–25) and "the great prostitute" (17:1) are pictures of the great apostasy from God, who is the great Husband and Lord. The former passage alludes to the wife of King Ahab, who served Baal and sought the life of Elijah (1 Ki. 16:31; 18:4, 13; 19:1–2). The church at Thyatira must not tolerate those who practice and teach things characterized by Jezebel. Regarding Rev. 17:1, the great prostitute is identified as Babylon, who typifies the world.

γέεννα (geenna), Gehenna, hell (1147).

OT The word geenna does not appear in the LXX or Gk. literature. It is the Gk. form of the Aram. gêhinnām, which in turn goes back to the Heb. gê hinnōm. This term originally denoted a valley lying to the south of Jerusalem, "the valley of the son [or sons] of Hinnom" (Jos. 15:8; 18:16; Isa. 66:24; Jer. 32:35). Child sacrifices were offered in this valley (2 Ki. 16:3; 21:6), for which reason Josiah desecrated it (2 Ki. 23:10); and it will be the place of God's judgment (Jer. 7:32; 19:6–7).

Jewish apocalyptic assumed that this valley would become the hell of fire (1 Enoch 27:1–2; 54:1–6; 56:3–4; 90:26–27). Hence, geenna came to be applied to the eschatological hell in general, even when it was no longer localized at Jerusalem. In time geenna became simply the place of punishment and so attracted the corresponding ideas about Hades (→ hadēs, 87). geenna thus became a temporary place of punishment (until the final judgment).

At the end of the first cent. A.D. or the beginning of the second, a doctrine of a fiery purgatory arose among the rabbis. All those in whose cases merit and guilt are equally balanced go to geenna, where they are purified and, if they do penance, inherit paradise. Alongside this was the concept of an eschatological geenna judgment, limited in time, after the last judgment.

NT In the NT geenna was a preexistent entity and a fiery abyss (Matt. 25:41; 13:42, 50, all referring to the "eternal fire"). It was the place of eternal punishment after the last judgment (23:15, 33; cf. 25:41, 46;). Body and soul are judged in it (Mk. 9:43, 45, 47–48). It must be distinguished from Hades, which houses the souls of the dead before the last judgment. The same fiery punishment will overtake Satan and the demons, the beast from the abyss, the false prophet, death, and Hades (Matt. 8:29; 25:41; Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14–15). In contrast with later Christian writings and ideas, the NT does not describe the torments of hell, nor does it contain the idea that Satan is the prince of geenna, to whom sinners are handed over for punishment.

γελάω (gelaō), laugh (1151); καταγελάω (katagelaō), laugh at, mock (2860); γέλως (gelōs), laughter (1152).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. this word group covers a wide range of meanings—from joyous laughter to ridicule and scorn. The compound katagelaō is an intensification, meaning either laugh loudly or sneer. The words were applied not only to humans but also to the gods. Merry laughter was a divine characteristic that often featured in theophanies.

(b) Three categories of humor and irony in the cl. Gk. world are of interest by comparison and contrast with the biblical presentation. (i) Gk. comedy. The production of a combination of comedies and tragedies in connection with the festival of Dionysus continued well into the NT era. The plots of the comedies included fantasy and burlesque, and the satirical element was strong. Prominent men in society were parodied, and even mythology and theology were treated with great irreverence.

Still, although the gods were made to appear foolish and cowardly, the reality of their power was assumed. Moreover, the religious humor should be understood not as laughing at the gods, but rather as taking part in their joy.

(ii) The dramatic irony of the tragedies. The themes of classical tragedy most often concerned the relation of humans to the powers controlling the universe and how these powers determined their destiny. Frequently the audience was given a glimpse behind the scenes and could foresee the course of events.

(iii) Socratic irony. Socrates, as portrayed by Plato, was a teacher of philosophy who employed humor to great effect as a means of education. He often said less than he thought, confessing his own ignorance, and by means of relentless ironical questions forced his disciples to abandon their self-confident opinions.

2. (a) In the LXX gelaō and gelōs usually translate Heb. words with the radicals ṣḥq or śḥq. The Heb. words generally denote true or supposed superiority toward another expressed in scorn or laughter (e.g., 2 Chr. 30:10; Job 12:4; Ps. 52:6; Prov. 1:26; Eccl. 7:6). They are rarely used for religious joy (but cf. 2 Sam. 6:5, 21; 1 Chr. 13:8; Ps. 126:2). In Gen. 17:17; 18:12, 13, 15, the contrast is between laughter and belief. In Prov. 10:23 gelōs is the mark of a fool. Laughter is rarely attributed to God (Ps. 2:4; 37:13; 59:8; cf. Prov. 1:26), and then only to express his absolute superiority over the ungodly, who will not accept him as God even though they are nothing beside him.

(b) Certain exceptions, however, should be noted. (i) In Gen. 21:6 laughter appears to refer to two different things: a God-given joy for Sarah ("God has brought me laughter") and a human scornful skepticism ("everyone who hears will laugh with [over] me"). The LXX gives the whole clause a positive meaning by substituting synchairō (rejoice with) in the second clause. (ii) In Job 29:24 the positive meaning of the Heb.—"I smiled at them"—is interpreted by the LXX to refer to ridicule. (iii) In Ps. 126:2 laughter is associated with the joy of the time of salvation.

(c) The above conclusions should not be taken to indicate that the OT is humorless. Scholars are divided on this question, some regarding humor, i.e., playfulness, as inappropriate to the seriousness of the subjects treated. It must be conceded that the assessment of humor is a subjective process; for example, if Nebuchadnezzar's madness in Dan. 4 is regarded by some as humorous, the dividing line between tragedy and comedy is a narrow one.

Yet there is a general consensus about the existence of certain types of humor in the OT. (i) Lighthearted portrayal of people and situations: e.g., the characterization of Jacob and Esau (Gen. 25:27–34); Jacob meeting his match in Laban (29:15–30); the story of Balaam (Num. 22); Abimelech's death at the hands of a woman (Jdg. 9:50–54); David being dressed in armor (1 Sam. 17:38).

(ii) Extensive use of wordplay. Names are often seen as significant. In Gen. 25:26 "Jacob" suggests "following at the heel" in order to supplant (cf. Gen. 27:36; Jer. 9:4). The prophets' words include many bitter puns. "The Sovereign LORD showed me . . . a basket of ripe fruit [qayiṣ]. . . . Then the LORD said to me, 'The time is ripe [qēṣ] for my people Israel'" (Amos 8:1–2; cf. also Isa. 5:7; Hos. 8:7; 12:11).

(iii) Quiet educational humor. This is best illustrated by the book of Proverbs, where the teacher gently teases his disciples and makes sinners look ridiculous (e.g., Prov. 6:9–10; 19:24; 27:15). It is also possible to understand Ecclesiastes in this way (cf. Eccl. 3:16–22).

(iv) Dramatic irony. This is used to good effect in the story of Joseph (Gen. 42:6–45:4) and is present throughout Job. Insofar as the reader is admitted beforehand into the knowledge of God's activity in Job, it might even be called divine irony.

(v) Prophetic irony of varying degrees, from mild sarcasm to bitter satire. This is used on the one hand with the intent of giving God's people a true awareness of their rebellion against him: e.g., Samuel's descriptions of kingship (1 Sam. 8:10–18; cf. the ironic words of God himself in Job 40:6–14). On the other hand, ironic scorn and ridicule are hurled at other nations and their gods, who have dared to challenge the God of Israel: e.g., Elijah's taunts at the prophets of Baal (1 Ki. 18:27), Isaiah's mockery of idols and those who make them (Isa. 44:9–20), and the comical picture of the arrival of the king of Babylon in Sheol (14:3–21). When this reaches the point of simple exultation over the weakness and downfall of one's enemies, as in Nahum, there does not appear to be much humor in it.

3. Rab. literature in general maintained the majesty of God. Thus, the rabbis seldom speak of his laughter. The OT verses noted above where God is said to laugh were considered a surprising phenomenon; the rabbis even repointed the vb. in Ps. 2:4 to say that God will make his enemies the objects of mutual derision. Yet this has no bearing on the rab. attitude toward humor in general. Talmudic literature makes a wide use of humor. Satan, for example, is shown in a ridiculous light. The main characteristics of rab. humor are self-irony and educative humor, but never humor for its own sake.

NT 1. The incidence of the gelaō word group follows the usage of the OT rather than cl. Gk. gelaō usually does not denote joy or true humor (but cf. Lk. 6:21). As with paizō (play, make sport) or empaizō (ridicule, mock), it is associated with irreverence. In the account of Jairus's daughter, for example, katagelaō is the scornful, superior laughter of those who ridiculed Jesus, believing he could do nothing about someone already dead (Matt. 9:24; Mk. 5:40; Lk. 8:53). This story illustrates the power of God in Jesus over our ultimate enemy, death, and at the same time the emptiness of unbelief.

In Jas. 4:9 gelōs denotes activity that is inappropriate because it is engaged in by sinners: "Grieve, mourn and wail. Change your laughter to mourning and your joy to gloom" (cf. Eccl. 2:2; 7:2–6; Tob. 2:6; Sir. 21:20; 27:13). This verse may reflect the Sermon on the Plain: "Blessed are you who weep now, for you will laugh.... Woe to you who laugh now, for you will mourn and weep" (Lk. 6:21b, 25b). The laughter in 6:21b is associated with salvation joy, with no thought of triumph over enemies (→ klaiō, 3081), but in 6:25b laughter denotes a mockery of things spiritual. Lk.'s thought may be influenced by Ps. 126:1–2: "When the LORD brought back the captives to Zion, we were like men who dreamed. Our mouths were filled with laughter, our tongue with songs of joy." For joy in the NT, → chairō, 5897.

2. One can isolate various categories of humor in the NT. (a) The humor of Jesus in the Synoptics. Jesus has a sense of the comic in the situations of daily life: e.g., a man rushing out of the temple and leaving his offering behind (Matt. 5:23–24), a man trying to take a splinter out of someone's eye when he has a log in his own (7:3–5), or the idiotic attitude of a man who does not prepare against robbery unless he knows a thief is coming (24:43). Jesus also uses wordplays (e.g., Petros ... petra ["Peter ... rock" in 16:18]), exaggeration (the two debt loads in 18:23–35), and paradox ("whoever wants to save his life will lose it," 16:25). Many of the questions Jesus directed at his opponents have an ironical ring (9:5; 12:12; 21:25). There is also irony in the way he takes well-known concepts and gives them a different meaning (e.g., 9:13, where "righteous" means "self-righteous"). Matt. 23 is comparable with the biting irony of the OT prophets.

(b) Divine irony. John's Christology, which so markedly presents a human Jesus and an eternal Christ in the same person, introduces into the Gospel a certain type of dualism and hence a special kind of irony. Words and ideas carry two senses at the same time (cf. Jn. 1:36; 2:19–22; 4:32; 6:20; 11:50; 12:7), and this enigma is highlighted by questions that reveal people's failure to understand Jesus' words and deeds (cf. 2:18, 20; 3:4; 4:11). To a certain extent all the Gospel writers make use of this motif, esp. in the Passion narratives (cf. the widespread use of the title "king" in questions, accusations, taunts, and the inscription over the cross).

(c) Lighthearted portrayal of people and situations. Note the gently humorous description of Zacchaeus in Lk. 19:1–6, Peter's reactions in Jn. 13, the escape from prison in Acts 5:17–32, and Peter's being left knocking at the door in 12:12–16.

(d) The humor of Paul. Paul, a Pharisee, enjoyed scholarly argumentation, and there is considerable humor and irony in the tussles he has with his opponents. He poses paradoxical questions (Rom. 3:29; 6:1; 7:7; Gal. 2:17) and uses humorous illustrations (e.g., the pottery and the potter in Rom. 9:20–23 [cf. Isa. 29:16; 45:9]; the protest of the different parts of the body in 1 Cor. 12:14–26). He also uses wordplays (e.g., "not busy ... busybodies" in 2 Thess. 3:11; the name of the runaway slave Onesimus, whose name means useful or beneficial [Phlm. 11]). Finally Paul speaks of himself in humorous terms. He is a nervous and unimpressive speaker (1 Cor. 2:3), a laughingstock in the arena (4:9). Moreover, his boasting turns out to be a list of his sufferings and weaknesses (9:15–18; 2 Cor. 10:1–13:4).

(e) Humor in the other NT books. Note James's humorous similes: the double-minded man (Jas. 1:6–8), the rudder and the fire (3:1–6), and the idiotic statement, "keep warm and well fed" (2:16).

3. Although humor and irony are not dominant in the Bible, they are more theologically significant than scholars have usually allowed. Every good teacher knows that one's words must be spiced with humor and irony if they are to rivet attention, esp. of those who are reluctant to listen. True humor is not the self-security of arrogance but the consciousness of being master of the situation. God, while condemning mocking that is a sign of rebellion against him, cannot help seeing the ridiculous and comical aspects of the revolt and fighting of helpless creatures bent on frustrating his purposes. Laughter can also be seen as a humble reaction to the amazing and ridiculous fact of our being recipients of God's honor and blessing. Jesus came with a joyful message, and though he took the opposition seriously, he was profoundly conscious that the victory lay with God—hence his lighthearted humor.

Certainly irony is written into the basic facts of redemption: God promised a childless man who was "as good as dead" (Heb. 11:12) that he would be father of a nation; he chose not a great and powerful nation to serve his purposes, but a small one that was despised and often at the mercy of its powerful neighbors; the climax of the world's rejection of God—the cross—was in fact the means he used to redeem the world (1 Cor. 2:6–8); hence Christians know that they are strongest when most aware of their weaknesses (2 Cor. 12:10). Biblical theology has irony in its very essence.

γέμω (gemō), to load, be full (1154); γεμίζω (gemizō), to load (1153).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. gemō (used only in pres. and imp.) and gemizō were used of loading a ship or animals and of being full, e.g., a harbor with craft. These words are found in an extended sense also: full of truth, evil, over-boldness, disproportion, and ugliness.

2. In the LXX gemō and its cognates are used only 10x, in the sense of bearing spices or gold (Gen. 37:25; 2 Chr. 9:21), loading beasts (Gen. 45:17), and being full (Ps. 10:7 = LXX 9:28; Amos 2:13).

NT Of the 20x these vbs. occur in the NT, most convey the sense of filling an object with something. In a metaphorical sense, they can denote filling with something intangible and usually uncomplimentary, such as being full of greed and other sins (Matt. 23:25; Lk. 11:39), of cursing and bitterness (Rom. 3:14; cf. Ps. 10:7), of God's wrath (Rev. 15:7), of abominations (17:3–4), and of seven plagues (21:9).

See also perisseuō, be more than enough, abound, excel (4355); plēthos, number, multitude, crowd (4436); plēroō, fill, complete, fulfill, accomplish, carry out (4444); chortazō, to feed, fatten, fill (5963); chōreō, have or make room, give way, go (6003).

γενεά (genea), generation, family, clan, race, age (1155); γενεαλογία (genealogia), genealogy, family tree (1157); γενεαλογέω (genealogeō), trace descent (1156); ἀγενεαλόγητος (agenealogētos), without genealogy (37).

CL & OT genea, derived from the root gen-, means birth, also (noble) descent, then descendants, family, race (i.e., those bound together by a common origin). Those born at the same time constitute a generation. In the LXX genea is almost always the translation of dôr and means generation; the whole history of Israel is often regarded as a work of God extending through many generations.

NT genea occurs 43x in the NT, mainly in the Gospels and Acts; its compounds are rare.

1. The basic meaning of genea relates to the OT sense referred to above. It occurs 4x in the context of Christ's genealogy (Mt. 1:17). The remote past is denoted (as in OT, cf. Isa. 41:4) by the phrase apo geneōn, "for ... generations" (Col. 1:26; cf. Acts 15:21). The unending future is similarly expressed by a familiar LXX phrase, eis geneas kai geneas (lit., "to generations and generations"; Lk. 1:50; Eph. 3:21; cf. Lk. 1:48). Acts 13:36 refers to David's generation, and Acts 14:16 and Eph. 3:5 to earlier generations.

genealogia occurs only in 1 Tim. 1:4 and Titus 3:9, alluding specifically to the practice of searching back through one's family tree in order to establish ancestry. Presumably those doing this were Jews who, starting out from OT and other genealogies, were propagating all kinds of "Jewish myths," perhaps pre-Christian gnostic speculations. It is also possible that Ebionites were using similar arguments to attack the doctrine of the miraculous birth of Jesus circulating in the Christian church (cf. the genealogies in Matt. 1 and Lk. 3).

In Gen. 14 Melchizedek is introduced, in contrast to typical OT manner, without any statement regarding his ancestry. For that reason he is described in Heb. 7:3 as agenealogētos (cf. 7:6); that is, he had no natural ancestry like other human beings. The author of Heb. goes on to relate this priest-king to Jesus via Ps. 110:4, as someone who had a unique genealogy. The author is not attempting to call in question, however, the genuine humanity of Jesus (cf. 2:9, 14–18); rather, he is stressing our Lord's true divinity.

2. Acts 8:33 is a quotation of Isa. 53:8. The passage is interpreted Christologically, but the precise interpretation is not easy to grasp. But it does seem certain that "generation" (NIV, "descendants") is used here in its genealogical sense.

3. Almost all remaining NT genea passages use the phrase "this generation." The OT does not know this stereotyped phrase in its NT sense, though Gen. 7:1 ("this generation" and Ps. 12:7 ("such people"; cf. Deut. 1:35) come close. In the NT passages the demonstrative "this" has a pejorative character; that is, it refers to a class of people who stand over against the children of light and are described as "unbelieving" (Mk. 9:19), "unbelieving and perverse" (Matt. 17:17), "adulterous and sinful" (Mk. 8:38; cf. Matt. 12:39), "wicked" (Lk. 11:29), "corrupt" (Acts 2:40), and "crooked and depraved" (Phil. 2:15). The Song of Moses may have had a certain influence on the wording (cf. Deut. 32:5, 20). In these passages the temporal, "genealogical" element is absent.

4. In Matt. 24:34; Mk. 13:30; Lk. 21:32 (which also use "this generation" and describe it as passing away), the temporal, genealogical element does seem to be present, though it is of secondary importance. By using this phrase, Jesus appears to set a time limit for certain events, which raises the question: Which events are they?

(a) Mk. 13 has the character of a farewell discourse, not that of an apocalypse. This type of address occurs frequently in the literature of pre-Christian Judaism as well as elsewhere in the NT. Its essential and recurring features are warnings about future apostasy and persecution, a promise of coming redemption, and an exhortation to watchfulness.

(b) The main historical element in the above references is the tradition according to which Jesus announces the coming destruction of Jerusalem (e.g., Mk. 13:1–4, 14–20). Note that in the Lukan parallel (21:20–24), Lk. seems to interpret Jerusalem as the embodiment of the people of Israel, whose hearts God had hardened in judgment while the "times of the Gentiles" are being fulfilled (i.e., the time when salvation comes to the Gentiles; cf. Acts 28:24–28; Rom. 11:25–26). These times will come to an end with the coming of the kingdom of God, the Son of Man, and the day of the Lord (perhaps even within his own lifetime; cf. Lk. 18:8; 21:34–36).

(c) Only by such considerations can the phrase "this generation" in Mk. 13:30 and its parallels be explained. In Matt. it has the temporal sense of this specific generation; thus, it might appear as if Jesus expected the end of this age to occur in connection with the judgment on Jerusalem at the end of that first generation (→ aiōn, 172). But in view of what happened in A.D. 70 and its theological relation to the preaching of Paul, Lk. understood genea as a class of people, not as a generation in the first century. Since what we can hypothesize about Matt. and Lk.'s sources implies that they did not seem to link the judgment on Jerusalem and the end of the world, and since Mk. 13 in general (esp. 13:13, 24) has an indefinite and open ring, we must conclude that Jesus himself was ambiguous on this issue in his farewell discourse. But the evangelists were not copyists; they were witnesses who, led by the Spirit, testified to the word they had heard and brought it to bear on their own times.

(d) The events referred to in Matt. 24:34; Mk. 13:30; Lk. 21:32 have generally been taken to refer to cosmic events associated with the second coming of Christ. But if these events were expected within the first generation of Christians, were Jesus or the evangelists mistaken? Not at all. The failure of events to materialize can be attributed to a gracious postponement by God of the catastrophe as well as to a telescoping of events, comparable with seeing a mountain range at a distance. That perspective makes the mountains appear to stand close together, and indeed relatively speaking they do stand close together. But the closer one approaches the mountains, the more one sees distinctions among them.

We should also note that insufficient attention has been paid to the prophetic language in the passage as a whole. Here, as in the OT, the imagery of cosmic phenomena is used to describe this-worldly events, namely, historical acts of judgment. The following passages are significant, not least because of their affinities with the present context: Isa. 13:10 (predicting doom on Babylon); 34:4 (referring to "nations" and "peoples" in 34: 1, but esp. Edom in 34:5–17); Ezek. 32:7 (on Egypt); Amos 8:9 (on the northern kingdom of Israel); Joel 2:10 (on Judah). The cosmic imagery draws attention to the divine dimension of the event in which the judgment of God is enacted.

The use of Joel 2:28–32 in Acts 2:15–21 provides an instance of the way in which such prophetic cosmic imagery is applied to historical events in the present (cf. also Lk. 10:18; Jn. 12:31; 1 Thess. 4:16; 2 Pet. 3:10–13; Rev. 6:12–17; 18:1). Other OT passages relevant to the interpretation of the present context include Deut. 30:4; Isa. 19:1; 27:13; Dan. 7:13; Zech. 2:6; 12:10–14; Mal. 3:1. In view of this, Mk. 13:24–30 may be interpreted as a prophecy of judgment on Israel in which the Son of Man will be vindicated. Such a judgment took place with the destruction of Jerusalem, the desecration of the temple, and the scattering of Israel—all of which happened within the lifetime of "this generation." This disintegration of Israel as the people of God coincides with the inauguration of the kingdom of the Son of Man. But the final judgment will not take place until the Parousia, of which the events of the first century are a figure. Such an interpretation fits the preceding discourse and the introductory questions of the disciples (Mk. 13:1–4 par.).

γεννάω (gennaō), beget, become the father of, bear (1164); ἀναγεννάω (anagennaō), cause to be born again, bear again (335).

CL & OT 1. gennaō is a causal form of ginomai. Like tiktō, gennaō is used of begetting by the father and bearing by the mother. In NT times gennaō also means come into being or produce in a metaphorical sense (cf. Gal. 4:24, of partners in a covenant; 2 Tim. 2:23, of quarrels). The compound anagennaō means cause to be born again.

2. In the LXX gennaō is used chiefly for Heb. yālad, bear, bring forth. It is never used in those passages that speak of Israel as God's firstborn (Exod. 4:22; 23:4) or God as Israel's father. The OT sharply dissociates itself from pagan procreation myths. Israel is Yahweh's people not by natural procreation but by election.

3. Two passages in Ps. speak of the begetting of the king-messiah by God: Ps. 2:7 and 110:3 (only in LXX). Though the idea that the king was the "son of God" was current in the ANE, the OT was unique in that each successive king was adopted and/or declared to be a son when he ascended the throne. The relationship was confirmed, on a historical basis, at each new accession. The connection of the Ps. passages with the prophecy of Nathan (2 Sam. 7) is extensive.

The line of Christological interpretation in the NT starts here (cf. Matt. 22:43–44; Mk. 12:36–37; Lk. 20:42–43; Acts 4:25; 13:33; 1 Cor. 15:25; Heb. 1:5, 13; Rev. 2:27). The absence of physical procreation is shown by the reference to the "seed of David," which is used in the sing. collectively of David's posterity. The tension between human parentage and the role of God appears in accounts of Jesus' birth and descent (Matt. 1:16; cf. 1:1, 6, 20; Lk. 1:33b, 35b; cf. 3:23–38).

4. In Pal. Jud. the thought of God's begetting occurs only in connection with messianic expectation. In all rab. literature there is only one reference that applies Ps. 2:7 to the Messiah. This silence is apparently due to the rabbis' opposition to the Christian church, which had applied Ps. 2 to Jesus' sonship.

NT gennaō occurs 97x in the NT. However, there is significant difference between this word and others that are used: tiktō (bring forth, bear; → 5503), apokyeō (give birth, bear, in the NT only fig., Jas. 1:15, 18), ōdinō (suffer birth pains, Gal. 4:19, 27; Rev. 12:2). The meaning of gennaō must be determined by context in both its active and passive forms, since it is used both of a father and a mother. It is also used in a fig. sense.

1. Various passages apply the term to God, who is said to have begotten someone. (a) Ps. 2:7 is quoted in Acts 13:33 and Heb. 1:5; 5:5 (the latter two relate Ps. 2:7 to Ps. 110 and 2 Sam. 7:14). Jesus Christ is the true Son and God's King. He has fulfilled what the Israelite kings left unfulfilled. As the crucified and risen one, he has assumed the office of the Lord's anointed as the truly anointed one. Strikingly, the NT does not apply Ps. 2:7 to Jesus' birth narratives; thus, a physical, sexual begetting is precluded. Acts 13:33 applies the words "today have I begotten you" (lit.) to Jesus' resurrection.

It is not easy to determine the precise significance of "today" in Heb. 1:5; 5:5. One thing is clear, however: This begetting by God goes beyond the OT understanding of adoption. The Heb. passages are concerned with the declaration and proclamation of what the Son already is. Jesus' sonship denotes the mystery of the incarnation of God.

(b) The Johannine writings use the expression gennaō ek (be begotten of) to describe the origin of the believer. Believers know that their true existence does not belong to this world; their beginning and end are in God through Jesus Christ. In the dialogue with Nicodemus the references to being "born again" mean that humans must receive a new origin, exchanging the old nature for a new one (Jn. 3:3, 5, 6, 7, 8). This idea expresses the same essential idea as being born "of God" (1 Jn. 3:9; cf. 2:29; 4:7) and being born "from above" (anōthen, Jn. 3:3, 7; cf. NIV note), which John describes as an act of God (1:12–13). Jn. attributes this to the work of the Spirit (3:5–8), and only such persons can see the kingdom of God (3:5).

2. Paul uses gennaō in 1 Cor. 4:15 and Phlm. 10 of his relationship with his converts. He could even speak of being in labor (ōdinō) or suffering birth pains until Christ is formed in them (Gal. 4:19). The same thoughts lie behind those passages that speak of Paul's "son" in the faith (1 Cor. 4:17; 1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 2:1; cf. 1 Pet. 5:13).

Rab. Jud. spoke in a similar way of winning proselytes (→ prosēlytos, 4670). The command to be fruitful (Gen. 1:28; 9:7) was sometimes taken to mean that Israelites had to win others to their faith. The idea of new birth through conversion to Jud. was common among the rabbis. Paul's language in the above passages seems to have adopted Jewish ideas.

3. The vb. anagennaō occurs only in 1 Pet. 1:3, 23, where it means born again. Its meaning is similar to gennaō in Jn. 3:3–4 (see also palingenesia, 4098). Through the preached word of the living God (1 Pet. 1:23), believers have been called by God into a new life, which is summed up as "living hope" (1:3) and "love" (1:22). New birth is not something a person can take up and dispose of at will; it is only possible by God's "great mercy" (1:3) and "power" (1:5). Believers stand under the indicative: God "has given us new birth into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" (1:3). At the same time, however, they stand under the imperative: "Set your hope fully on the grace to be given you when Jesus Christ is revealed" (1:13). Those born again realize that separation from the old aeon has taken place. The decisive factor that makes rebirth possible is God's act in the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

1174 γεύομαι

γεύομαι (geuomai), taste, partake of, enjoy, experience (1174).

CL & OT geuomai means to taste; fig. to partake of, enjoy, experience. In the LXX the word occurs in the fig. sense only in Job 20:18; Ps. 34:8 ("Taste and see that the LORD is good"); Prov. 31:18. For a lit. sense, see Gen. 25:30; 1 Sam. 14:24, 29, 43; Jon. 3:7.

NT 1. In the NT geuomai occurs 15x. Taste is used in a lit. sense in Matt. 27:34; Jn. 2:9; Acts 10:10; Col. 2:21. The Colossian church was distracted by a "philosophy" (2:8) that had elements of Jewish traditions merged with those of paganism, one of which was service to "the basic principles of the world" (2:20)—probably angelic powers in charge of the universe. Part of that service to these powers involved adherence to certain Jewish ritual laws. Paul questions why these people are still acknowledging such powers when Christ has gained victory over them: "Why . . . do you submit to its rules: 'Do not handle! Do not taste! Do not touch!'?" (2:20–21). Such regulations have no value in promoting godliness or Christian piety.

The parable of the great banquet concludes with the pronouncement: "I tell you, not one of those men who were invited will get a taste of my banquet" (Lk. 14:24). Here Jesus himself is speaking through the master in the parable, rejecting those who rejected his invitation to the banquet on account of worldly concerns. The lit. sense of "taste" symbolizes participation in the messianic banquet, the kingdom of God.

2. In a fig. sense, 1 Pet. 2:3 ("You have tasted that the Lord is good") takes up the words of Ps. 34:8. The readers are urged to put away malice, deceit, hypocrisy, envy, and slander (2:1) and to grow up to maturity, for they have been "born again" (1:23; 2:2).

Ps. 34:8 may also be reflected in Heb. 6:4–6 (a passage notoriously difficult to interpret), where the author states that it is impossible to bring back to repentance those who, among other things, "have tasted the heavenly gift [and] . . . who have tasted the goodness of the word of God." It is difficult to say precisely what the "heavenly gift" is (some suggestions include the forgiveness of sins, the gift of salvation, the Holy Spirit, or Christ himself). In any case, the Christians being addressed have already experienced something of the world to come. If this is so, this passage then is an instance of the characteristic tension between the "already" and the "not yet" in the life of the Christian.

In Heb. 2:9 Christ died so that "he might taste death for everyone." His death is an act of salvation. His condemnation as a sinner does not spare us from physical death, but it does take away our fear of death, for through it the power of eternal destruction has been broken (cf.2:14–15). Note Jn. 8:51–52: "I tell you the truth, if anyone keeps my word . . . he will never taste death." The promise of Mk. 9:1 and Lk. 9:27 that some "will not taste death before they see the kingdom of God" probably anticipates three fulfillments: the transfiguration of Jesus (which took place immediately after this saying), his resurrection, and the coming of the Son of Man in judgment on Jerusalem.

γῆ (gē), earth, world (1178); ἐπίγειος (epigeios), earthly (2103).

CL & OT gē is the earth or world; the land in contrast to water; also, as part of the earth, a piece of land, a field with arable soil. The meaning "land," as the area controlled by a single state, emerged by analogy alongside these natural meanings. In ancient Gk. mythology gē and ouranos, sky, are among the oldest deities.

The LXX uses gē more than 2,000 times. Neither in the LXX nor in the NT is there any thought of divinity about it. The earth is part of God's creation (cf. Gen. 1:1–2).

NT The NT uses gē 250 times, particularly in the Gospels, Acts, and Rev. It is first of all the soil in which the sower sows his seed (cf. "because the soil [gē] was shallow," Matt. 13:5). One can sit down on the earth (Mk. 8:6); it stands in contrast to water (Matt. 14:24). All land taken together has a boundary ("the Queen of the South ... came from the ends of the earth," Matt. 12:42; the witnesses of the resurrected Jesus were to go "to the ends of the earth," Acts 1:8). The angels of judgment stood "at the four corners of the earth," controlling "the four winds of the earth" (Rev. 7:1; cf. Matt. 24:31). Christ will be, as was Jonah when he was in the fish in the midst of the water, "in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12:40). In all these passages the earth is something created.

1. The historical use of the term occurs wherever it is used in a political sense, e.g., the land of Judah (Matt. 2:6), the land of Israel (2:20), the land of Midian, and the land of Egypt (Acts 7:29, 36). It is frequently difficult to decide whether a passage is speaking of a particular country (esp. the land of Israel) or of the populated earth as a whole (→ oikoumenē, 3876). With our modern view of the world we are inclined to think globally and universally. However, the NT can use "the earth" in a particularistic way to refer to (lit.) "all the tribes of the land" (Matt. 24:30; Rev. 1:7; cf. Zech. 12:10–14). Yet the remarkable expression "from the ends of the earth to the ends of the heavens" (Mk. 13:27) means the whole earth, expressed here by joining two OT phrases (Deut. 13:7; Ps. 19:6).

2. Both earth and heaven are God's creation. Yet the earth is the scene of the imperfect (Heb. 8:4–5), of sin (Mk. 2:10; Rev. 17:5), and of death (1 Cor. 15:47). Hence Christians are to set their minds on things that are above, not on things that are on earth (Col. 3:2). Heaven and earth (i.e., the present sinful order) will eventually pass away (Matt. 5:18; 24:35; 2 Pet. 3:10), which means experiencing God's judgments. In so doing, they will make way for "a new heaven and a new earth" (2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1). Redemption extends to the furthest corner of the physical realm. That the meek will inherit the earth is the promise of Christ (Matt. 5:5); this earthly kingdom is the same as the kingdom of heaven, the coming redeemed creation (Rom. 8:21).

3. epigeios (7x in the NT) means lit. "on the earth," but it can also be linked with the dualism of heaven and earth and so mean earthly (1 Cor. 15:40; 2 Cor. 5:1; Phil. 3:19).

1181 γίνομαι

γίνομαι (ginomai), be begotten, be born, become, come about, happen (1181); ἀπογίνομαι (apoginomai), die (614); γένεσις (genesis), birth, origin (1161).

CL & OT 1. ginomai (cl. Gk. gignomai) has several shades of meaning: come into being, be produced (of things), take place (of events), become.

2. In the LXX, ginomai also occurs as a substitute for forms of einai (to be). The construction kai egeneto ... kai ("and it happened ... and" [Gen. 4:8; etc.]) renders the Heb. construction (wayᵉhî ... wa-, "and it came to pass that ..."). apoginomai (the prefix apo means from) means go away, cease, depart, i.e., die (no occurrences in the LXX). genesis (origin, birth), a cognate of ginomai, occurs numerous times in the LXX, most notably as the title of Genesis.

NT 1. ginomai is used in the NT in a variety of connections and has no special religious or theological meaning. (a) It means be born (Gal. 4:4); grow (of fruit, Matt. 21:19); arise, happen (of various occurrences, 8:26; Acts 6:1; 12:18); be made, be done (Jn. 1:3; Matt. 11:21); become something (Mk. 1:17). It is frequently used in Lk. and Acts in the construction kai egeneto ... kai (lit., "and it happened that ..."; "and it came to pass that ..."; cf. above). Paul uses the strong negation mē genoito (lit., "let it not be, by no means"; e.g., Rom. 3:4; 6:2).

(b) ginomai may also stand for einai (to be, e.g., Matt. 10:16; Mk. 4:22). With the gen. it denotes origin or membership (Lk. 20:14; 2 Pet. 1:20). With the dat. of the person it denotes belonging to (Rom. 11:5).

2. apoginomai occurs only in 1 Pet. 2:24: "He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, so that we might die (apogenomenoi) to sins and live for righteousness." It thus stands in contrast to living. It denotes the change that has come about in the lives of believers through Christ's death and resurrection, which makes a rebirth possible (→ gennaō, 1164; cf. Rom. 6:8, 11).

3. genesis means birth in Matt. 1:18 and Lk. 1:14. It also means created life or being. It is used in this sense in Jas. 1:23: He "is like a man who looks at his face (lit., the face of his created life [or natural being, genesis]) in a mirror."

Two other passages require closer examination. (a) Matt. begins his Gospel this way: "A record of the genealogy (genesis) of Jesus Christ the son of David, the son of Abraham." The formula goes back to an OT model, where genesis introduces a genealogy or family register (Gen. 2:4; 5:1; 11:10), or a family story (6:9; 37:2). The genealogies and family stories often overlap. Most likely in Matt. it functions as the title of the family register of Matt. 1:2–17 (note 1:18, which introduces the birth narrative).

(b) Jas. 3:6 contains the expression trochon tēs geneseōs, which has been translated as "wheel of life," "course of ... life" (NIV), "cycle of nature" (NRSV). The passage describes the tongue as "a world of evil," capable of corrupting the whole body and setting the whole course of one's life on fire. The expression seems somewhat related to the Orphic idea of the perpetual recurrence of nature, though it seems less a philosophical expression and more a euphemism for the ups and downs of life.

γινώσκω (ginōskō), know, come to know, understand, comprehend, perceive, recognize (1182); γνῶσις (gnōsis), knowledge (1194); γνώμη (gnōmē), opinion, judgment (1191); γνωρίζω (gnōrizō), make known (1192); ἐπιγινώσκω (epiginōskō), know, understand, recognize (2105); ἐπίγνωσις (epignōsis), knowledge, recognition (2106); γνωστός (gnōstos), known, intelligible, acquaintance (1196).

CL 1. In cl. Gk. ginōskō has a wide range of meanings. (a) Basically it means to notice, perceive, or recognize a thing, person, or situation through the senses, esp. sight.

This leads to an intelligent ordering in the mind of what has been perceived in the world of experience. Thus the vb. also means to experience, learn, get to know. The noun gnōsis also expresses the act of knowing through experience.

(b) Occasionally ginōskō means to distinguish, for experiencing different things may lead to this.

(c) Familiarity leads to personal acquaintance. Hence ginōskō can also mean to know in a personal way, to understand, and even to judge. gnōsis too is repeatedly found with the meaning knowledge, insight, and gnōmē with that of insight, reflection, and judgment or opinion.

(d) ginōskō may be used to express a relationship of trust between persons, i.e., to recognize as a friend, love as a friend. Perhaps to know in Hel. Gk., meaning to have sexual relations with, is derived from this.

(e) Knowledge of situations can be reached by reflecting, judging, and investigating, i.e., by logical thought processes.

(f) Since verdicts in criminal and civil courts were based on a weighing of given facts, they could be expressed by ginōskō in the pass., meaning to be judged.

(g) The object of knowledge may be a concrete object or an idea in the mind. Esp. in philosophy speculative cognition plays a great part. The goal of philosophical knowledge is seeing—seeing the lasting and real, which can be seen only by the eyes of the soul. With ginōskō there is always the implication of grasping the full reality and nature of an object under consideration. It is thus distinguished from mere opinion (dokeō, 1506), which may grasp an object inadequately or even falsely.

2. The above uses of ginōskō and its derivatives are also found in Hel. Gk. In addition, however, we find a growing use of the terms, based on a fairly loose link with the language of Gk. philosophy. They appear in the widely different systems of thought and conceptual schemes influenced by syncretism, which have been bracketed together under the title of Gnosticism. It lies beyond the scope of this article to survey all of gnostic thought, but certain features of Gnosticism may be mentioned.

(a) In Hel. culture people adopted a new attitude toward the world, which involved doubt about arriving at the truth concerning the world and reality along rational lines. Humans experience the world and history as an impenetrable fate, which they cannot influence and to which they are handed over like powerless slaves. The world is more a prison than a home. Hence, humans yearn for freedom and escape from the compulsion imposed on them in an alien world. One way of escape lies in gnōsis—not a mental penetration of things by logical thought, but from outside the universe, from a divine source. It comes through revelation given in grace. The means by which one can acquire knowledge of this other reality include sacramentalism, magic, mysticism, and semiphilosophical speculation.

(b) gnōsis is primarily one's knowledge of oneself, of one's true nature, which would explain the inharmonious relationship of one's manner of existence on earth and in history. It shows a person the way back to salvation through a knowledge of past, present, and future.

(c) A gnostic myth tells "the tragic history of the soul." The soul began as divine, but as the result of a primeval fall was exiled and fettered to matter, which is hostile to God. That is why human beings cannot feel at home in the cosmos, for this cosmos and the God of the soul have nothing in common. Hence, humans are plagued by a vague, hopeless longing to leave the world. The less one has been lost to the cosmos, the stronger is this longing. If one has surrendered completely to the cosmos, no hope of salvation remains. The process of salvation begins when, as a result of an external "call," this longing is replaced by instruction about the unknown God out there. If the call is heard, nothing prevents the divine soul from returning to the divinity and being deified.

(d) All this leads to a gnostic attitude toward life that is itself termed gnōsis. It expressed itself in a feeling of superiority over all non-gnostics—in Christian Gnosticism, over all mere believers. Gnostics are the only ones who really know God, and the true self is not part of the cosmos. Moral rules are either the demands of cosmic powers intended to reduce humans to slavery or purely human values. Whether by asceticism or libertinism, the gnostic seeks to scorn these values and become free from worldly ties.

OT In the OT, as with the common Gk. attitude, knowledge is derived through the senses; the thing to be known must present itself to the senses and so let itself be known. Hence we find vbs. of hearing and seeing parallel to vbs. of knowing (e.g., 1 Sam. 14:38; Isa. 41:20; cf. Exod. 16:6–7; Deut. 33:9).

1. In the LXX the ginōskō word group mainly renders words formed from the Heb. root *yāda*ᶜ, which has a wide range of meaning. It can mean (a) to notice, observe, experience (e.g., Gen. 3:7; Jdg. 16:20; Eccl. 8:5). (b) It also then means to distinguish between certain things. (c) Knowledge passed on by a third party gives the meaning of know by learning (Prov. 30:3). (d) Experience becomes a reality in a relationship based on familiarity with the person or thing known. The use of *yāda*ᶜ in wisdom literature is an example of this. Knowledge can be obtained by observing the world and life as the work of God, which in turn leads to an upright life before God (Prov. 2:6; Eccl. 8:17).

(e) Knowledge can result in technical ability, i.e., to know how to do something (1 Ki. 7:14; cf. Gen. 25:27; Isa. 47:11). (f) In certain circumstances observation and resultant action (or failure to act) become closely linked. Hence, ginōskō (*yāda*ᶜ) also means to concern oneself with, care for, trouble oneself with (e.g., Ps. 1:6, 37:18; cf. Prov. 27:23). (g) To know can also mean to have sexual relations with (Gen. 4:1; 19:8). (h) To know another person "face to face" means to have a personal and confidential relationship with another person (e.g., Deut. 34:10). When God knows a people (Amos 3:2), he chooses or elects them (cf. Num. 16:5). This knowledge is gracious and loving, but it demands a personal response. (i) The distinctiveness of the OT concept of knowledge is clearly seen in passages that speak of our knowledge of God.

2. Knowledge of God is always linked with God's acts of self-revelation. Note the formula, "And you [or they] will know that I am the LORD" (54x in Ezek., and elsewhere), which is always linked with the proclamation of some specific act by Yahweh (e.g., Ezek. 6:7, 13, 14; 7:4; 11:10–12; cf. also Exod. 6:7; 7:5, 17; 1 Ki. 20:13, 28 [= LXX 21:13, 28]; Isa. 45:3, 6–7). In 2 Ki. 5:15, Naaman the Syrian comes to a knowledge of the God of Israel through the healing of his leprosy. In Sir. 36:4–5, God is asked to reveal himself to the nations, that they too may recognize that there is no other God beside Yahweh.

The testimony to God's past actions and signs grounded in salvation history are capable of bringing about knowledge of Yahweh (Exod. 31:13; Ezek. 20:12–20). Such knowledge in the OT is not concerned with the speculative question of the being of God, but with a personal knowledge of the God who, working in grace and judgment, has turned to humanity. To know him means to enter into the personal relationship that he himself makes possible.

Israel's intimate relationship with God required that the nation's conduct correspond to God's actions. The command "Be still, and know that I am God" (Ps.

46:10) does not mean that the nations attacking Yahweh's city should undergo a purely religious conversion to Yahweh. Rather, they should abandon their rebellion in recognition of Yahweh's rule in history. In the rhetorical questions of Jer. 22:15–16, knowledge of God is clearly interpreted as doing justice and righteousness, esp. to the poor and needy. Similarly, in Hos. 4:1–2 knowledge of Yahweh is directly related to specific behavior: Lack of faithfulness and disloyalty to the covenant are bound up with lack of knowledge of God. The result is a breakdown of human relationships.

Thus, while the Gks. were concerned with detached knowledge and a speculative interest in the metaphysical nature of things, the OT regards knowledge as something that arises from a personal encounter. As Israel continually inquired into God's revelation in the past, present, and future, they discerned the purposes and demands of God in worship and in conduct.

3. (a) The confrontation between Hel. Jud. and polytheism led to the development of a semidogmatic concept of the knowledge of God. It meant above all knowing that there was one God and combating the claims of heathen deities as gods. Since rab. lit. warns against speculations about what was before creation, Jud. was obviously involved in controversy with the gnostics.

(b) There are, to be sure, some contacts between the OT and the Hel.-gnostic concepts of knowledge; in both, knowledge of God comes by revelation. In the latter, however, the place of history is consistently denied, whereas in the former the knowledge of God is inseparably bound up with his revelation in time and space.

(c) In the intertestamental period Qumran texts show a development of the OT concept of knowledge. Knowledge is one of the most important fruits of salvation enjoyed by pious members of the sect. God himself is the "God of knowledge" (cf. 1QS 3:15), i.e., the God who possesses all knowledge and from whom alone a person can acquire knowledge. There are many objects of human knowledge. Of these the "secrets" or "hidden things" are frequently mentioned, by which the sect meant the revealed secrets of creation, history, and the last days; in this we see the affinity of Qumran teaching with later apocalyptic. Alongside this the knowledge of God's will as revealed in the Torah plays an important part. On it depended a person's reception and place in the community (1QS 2:22).

NT 1. Survey of use and meaning in the NT. ginōskō is found 221x, of which 87x are in the Johannine literature, 50x in Paul, and 44x in Lk.-Acts; epiginōskō occurs 44x. gnōsis, gnōrizō, and epignōsis occur 29x, 25x, and 20x respectively. The verbal adj. gnōstos is found 15x; gnōmē (predominantly in Paul and Rev.) 9x.

In a large number of cases we have the general and popular use of the words as outlined above: to hear of (Mk. 5:43; Jn. 4:1; Phil. 1:12), notice (Matt. 16:8; Mk. 6:33 epiginōskō; 13:28–29), feel (5:29–30), recognize (Matt. 7:16; Lk. 24:16, both epiginōskō; Jas. 2:20) learn, know (Lk. 12:47–48; Jn. 1:48; 21:17), understand (Mk. 4:13), find out (Jn. 13:35; 15:18; 1 Jn. 2:3, 5), distinguish (1 Cor. 14:7), and know how to (Matt. 16:3).

The noun gnōmē is by and large found only in the usual meaning of opinion, judgment. Thus, in 1 Cor. 7:25 the opinion of the apostle is clearly distinguished from a "command of the Lord," but it is still authoritative (cf. 7:40). In Rev. 17:13 it occurs in the phrase "one purpose." In Acts 20:3 Paul "decided" to return through Macedonia.

2. The influence of OT usage. The universal use of the LXX in the early church ensured a linguistic continuity between the OT and NT. But the revelation of God in Jesus Christ gave a new stress to the OT concept of knowledge. Where it expresses a personal relationship between the one who knows and the one known, the NT concept of knowledge is clearly taken from the OT. This applies to sexual relations (Matt. 1:25; Lk. 1:34) as well as to Christ's statement in Matt. 7:23, "I never knew you," i.e., I never had anything to do with you. The statement in 2 Cor. 5:21 that Christ (lit.) "knew no sin" does not mean that he had no intellectual knowledge of sin but that Jesus had no personal truck with sin. Similarly, Rom. 7:7 should be paraphrased: "As a human I would have had no intimate dealings with sin had it not been for the law" (cf. 3:20).

ginōskō has also the sense of know personally in 2 Cor. 5:16. The meaning of this verse is the subject of much controversy: Did Paul know the earthly Jesus? In 2 Cor. 5:11–21 Paul is involved in controversy with opponents who were attacking him personally and his claim to be an apostle. They maintained he was lacking in visible spiritual qualities to authenticate his claim to be an apostle (5:13). They probably charged him with being a braggart who commended only himself (cf. 5:11–12). Part of Paul's defense is the reference to Christ's death "for all," through which "all died" (5:14–15), including the person with supposed, visible, spiritual qualities.

As a consequence of all dying with Christ (2 Cor. 5:14), Paul says, "we know no one after the flesh" [lit. trans.]; instead, we know people according to the visible demonstration of the Spirit and power. In order to show how obvious this is, Paul inserts the statement that should be clear to all, in 5:16b: "Though we once regarded Christ in this way" (i.e., the visible Christ as he was on earth), "we do so no longer" (i.e., we have to do now only with the invisible, risen Christ in whose service we stand). Because Christ died and was raised for all, he is the invisible Lord of all, and his lordship is externally inescapable. Thus both Paul and his claims to apostleship, in common with all else that has died with Christ, are not subject to judgment by external and the normal visible standards. "In Christ" only the new creation is of value. The old has passed away and a new order has begun. In light of this argument, it is clear that Paul in 2 Cor. 5:16 is neither affirming nor denying that he knew the earthly Jesus personally. Equally it has no bearing on the meaning of the historic Jesus for Paul.

(a) We find the influence of the OT most clearly in those contexts where the vb. means to give recognition to. In 1 Cor. 16:18 Paul writes regarding colleagues who have rendered devoted service, "Such men deserve recognition [epiginōskete]." In 1 Cor. 4:19 Paul tells the Corinthians that when he comes, he "will find out" the power and nature of his arrogant enemies in Corinth. In Matt. 17:12 Jesus speaks of the scribes' failure to "recognize" John the Baptist as Elijah come again, so that they "have done to him everything they wished."

Phrases such as "know God's righteous decree" (Rom. 1:32), "know the law" (7:1), and "know his will" (2:18) do not imply a mere theoretical knowledge, but the recognition that it applies to the person individually and demands obedience. The Pharisees' remark that "this mob ... knows nothing of the law" (Jn. 7:49) implies that the common people would not have gone after Jesus if they had really known and obeyed the Mosaic law. But in recording it, Jn. sees an unconscious irony in the Pharisees' own failure to see where the law was pointing them (cf. 7:42, 51 with 5:39–40.; 11:49–53). Note also the juxtaposition of "the knowledge of God" and being "obedient to Christ" in 2 Cor. 10:5.

Even where Paul borrows the concept of knowledge held by the Hel. popular philosophy, he recasts it. In Rom. 1:28, what concerns Paul is the question whether knowledge of God is personal. If such acknowledgment that manifests itself in living obedience is refused, God's judgment is inevitable. The statement in 1:21 that those who knew God had become futile in their thinking must have appeared as a contradiction in terms to Hel. thought; one's futility was a result of not knowing God (cf. Wis. 13:1; agnoeō, 51). Paul, however, considered that the knowledge of God necessarily included proper glorification and gratitude. Hence, the heathen who rejected God reduced this knowledge to mere intellectual activity, and what they considered wisdom was in fact nothing but folly (Rom. 1:22–23). True recognition of God, however, is a gift of God; it is based on his revelation (1 Cor. 13:8–12; 14:6; cf. Lk. 1:7; 2 Pet. 1:5).

Nevertheless, in apparent contradiction to its gift-like character, knowledge in the NT involves the ready will of the person who receives it. Through disobedience and ingratitude one can fail to appropriate it. Hence, the exhortations in the NT are calls to grasp that gift and use it rightly (e.g., 1 Cor. 14:27; Eph. 5:5; Jas. 1:3; 5:20). In 2 Cor. 8:9–15 we find a striking example of the outworking of knowledge in practical behavior. Here the knowledge of "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, so that you through his poverty might become rich" (8:9) finds expression in the collection for Jerusalem, which Paul was urging. Knowledge in the sense of recognition is thus linked with the practical behavior of the one who knows and involves a way of life (Col. 1:9–10) that brings credit to the one known.

(b) We also find typical OT usage in the NT in the case of God's knowledge. This refers to his loving, electing knowledge of humankind (cf. 2 Tim. 2:19, quoting Num. 16:5; also 1 Cor. 13:12; Gal. 4:9). God's knowledge in Rom. 11:33 includes his whole activity, which embraces Gentiles and Jews alike. His knowledge is eternally valid for his creatures and triumphs over guilt and disobedience.

(c) There are, however, passages where ginōskō implies theological and theoretical knowledge. This overtone cannot be immediately derived from OT usage. Matt. 13:11 and Lk. 8:10 speak of a hidden knowledge granted only to the disciples concerning "the secrets of the kingdom of God." Such knowledge made them authoritative interpreters of the parables. Col. 2:2 also refers to understanding knowledge of God, but this knowledge is described as a "mystery" that is not open to all, but only to the saints to whom God has proclaimed his secret (1:26).

But even the knowledge of theological truths (e.g., of a particular teaching about baptism) has as its object obedience that expresses itself in life (Rom. 6:6). The express purpose of such knowledge mentioned is "that we should no longer be slaves to sin."

3. The use of the word-group in the NT controversy with Gnosticism. A number of contemporary scholars see evidence of a conflict with Gnosticism in a variety of NT passages. We should first note that the extant sources of Gnosticism are substantially later than the NT. Certain gnostic ideas appear to be indebted to the NT itself. Moreover, the extant texts display a wide variety of beliefs that make it impossible to treat Gnosticism as if it were a homogeneous belief system. Yet there were people in NT times who vaunted their superior knowledge (1 Cor. 1:18–2:16; 8:1; cf. Col. 2:8; 1 Tim. 4:7; 6:20). In such passages we see incipient tendencies that later flowered into Gnosticism.

The NT writers found themselves in conflict with traveling preachers who had their own version of the apostolic message. Timothy was expressly warned against the "godless chatter and the opposing ideas of what is falsely called knowledge [gnōsis]" (1 Tim. 6:20). Similarly, Rev. 2:24 mentions opponents who claim to have learned "Satan's so-called deep secrets." There is much in Paul's letters (esp. 1 and 2 Cor.; Phil. 3:2–21; Col. [esp. 2:4–23]), in the Johannine lit., and in Jude that can be understood against the background of an antignostic controversy. Has the understanding of knowledge in these NT writers been influenced by their gnostic opponents, and if so how?

(a) Paul. In his discussion of the use of food offered to idols Paul quotes the claim: "We know that we all possess knowledge [gnōsis]" (1 Cor. 8:1). gnōsis cannot refer merely to knowledge about food here; rather, the important thing is the possession of gnōsis. The one who has this gnōsis claims to know the true being of God and his own originally divine being (cf. 2 Cor. 13:5). Such a person recognizes the nonreality of the universe and its earthly relationships and regulations, and thus finds no problem in eating food offered to idols (cf. Phil. 3:19a; Rev. 2:20) or in immorality (1 Cor. 6:12–20; Phil. 3:19b; cf. Rev. 2:20). For such a one the question of resurrection is irrelevant (1 Cor. 15:12), as is even the historical, earthly Jesus (1 Cor. 12:3; Phil. 3:18). Christian Gnosticism applied the dualism of spirit and matter to its Christology, which was always docetic.

Paul, however, measures this gnostic knowledge with the yardstick of love: "Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up" (1 Cor. 8:1b). Gnostics with their knowledge were interested only in themselves and their claim to a superior freedom loosed from all earthly ties. Love, on the other hand, is concerned with building up the church, i.e., with the salvation of others in the fellowship of Jesus Christ (including the weak, who do not possess this knowledge [1 Cor. 8:7, 9], and with outsiders and unbelievers [14:23]).

The knowledge claimed by the Corinthians is thus unacceptable to Paul. "The man who thinks he knows something does not yet know as he ought to know" (1 Cor. 8:2). This may be compared with 15:34, where Paul says that some people are "ignorant of God." In view of this, Paul is compelled to explain what he understands by knowledge. He finds it possible to express knowledge only passively, as a being known (cf. Gal. 4:9). This being known, however, is not the counterpart of some previous active comprehension of God by us, but rather of our loving God (cf. 1 Cor. 8:3). Full and real knowledge of God is ultimately part of the eschatological promise and expectation (13:12).

Paul rejected the gnostic anticipation of the end times, in which being known by God and the perfect knowledge of God come together by simply disregarding existence on earth and in the body (cf. 2 Tim. 2:18b). For Paul the whole stress lay on God's having known us before time. In short, being known by God involves election. If there is any human knowledge of God, it is the mediated knowledge of God as he revealed himself in the life and work of Christ. It is the Spirit-given "knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (2 Cor. 4:6). Prior to the end we can know God only as we know Jesus Christ (Phil. 3:10; cf. Col. 2:2–3), and only if we acknowledge him as the Lord (Phil. 3:8). Such an acknowledgment is the counterpart to being known by God. Thus love for God is the counterpart of having been known by God (1 Cor. 8:3).

Love for God, however, takes shape in a new obedience to the Lord Jesus Christ and in being free from the lordship of sin (cf. Phil. 3:10 with Rom. 6:3–13), in fellowship with Christ's sufferings, and in strenuous service by the resurrection power of Christ while one presses on to the promised resurrection from the dead (Phil. 3:10). At present such knowledge is only fragmentary (1 Cor. 13:12), but it looks to fulfillment. The Corinthian gnostics in their pride did not want anything of this knowledge. Hence, Paul ironically demanded of them to "acknowledge that what I am writing to you is the Lord's command" (1 Cor. 14:37). In the light of all this it is clear that Paul's polemics remain essentially within the limits of the OT concept of knowledge. At the same time he amplifies and works out this concept Christologically.

(b) John. It can be argued that John's statements about knowledge are spoken in the context of a gnostic thought world. For example, the very fact that knowledge can represent a mutual and inner fellowship between Jesus and his own as well as between Jesus (the Son) and God (the Father) (Jn. 10:14–15), may point to a gnostic background. Describing knowledge as fellowship is possible if the one who knows, the messenger of God who mediates the knowledge, and the utterly transcendent God who is to be known are all personally equal. Knowledge of God includes knowledge of the one he has sent and becomes coterminous with eternal life (Jn. 17:3), another gnostic thought. This knowledge, which brings salvation, is possible only through the ability to know him who is true (1 Jn. 5:20).

This reflection of Johannine language on the terminology of Gnosticism is understandable if one realizes that the recipients of the Christian message and its opponents influenced the form in which it was expressed. John's purpose is to speak to gnostics, so he uses their language. This does not make the gospel a myth or John a gnostic.

One can say that John has given the gnostic myth an entirely new orientation. The gnostic understood knowledge as self-knowledge, through which one came to realize that one was not only a stranger in the universe but also divine. A person thus experienced deliverance from the world and history alike. For John, knowledge is of a personal reality that stands over against humanity. This "other reality" is God, mediated by revelation. Since "no one has ever seen God" (Jn. 1:18), there can be no immediate knowledge of God or direct fellowship with him. But God may be known in the one he has sent, his Son. The Son is not, like the savior in Gnosticism, a mythological figure. Rather, he bears the historical name Jesus. He is the Word become flesh (1:14; 1 Jn. 1:1–4). Those who see Jesus see the Father (Jn. 14:9; 12:45). Those who know him will know the Father also (14:7). Hence, fellowship with God can come only through fellowship with Jesus (10:14–15).

Fellowship between Jesus and those who are his, made effective by mutual knowledge, does not imply, as in Gnosticism, the deification of humanity and removal from the world and history. In Jn., knowledge gains its form from the one God and his revelation in history through historical channels. In other words, true knowledge is obtained by fellowship with the historical Jesus. Moreover, by sending his Son, God revealed his love to his own (Jn. 17:23; 1 Jn. 4:9–10) and to the world (Jn. 3:16). The Son loved his own according to the measure of his Father's love for him (15:9; 17:26). Moreover, just as the Son demonstrated his love for the Father by obeying his commands (14:31), so those who know him demonstrate their knowledge by keeping God's commands (1 Jn. 2:3–6), above all that of loving fellow believers (4:7–8; cf. 2:7–11), and by not sinning (3:6).

Thus ginōskō has a double application: It means knowing the love of God shown in the sending of his Son (Jn. 17:8; 1 Jn. 3:16), and the obedience of love based on it (1 Jn. 4:6). Such knowledge is already eternal life here and now (Jn. 17:3), because it is a life in history derived from God's historical revelation. In view of all this, John's concept stands out as deliberately and diametrically opposed to that of Gnosticism. The striking equation of faith and knowledge in the relationship of humanity to God is also part of the polemic against Gnosticism, which at the very least depreciated faith in contrast to knowledge. While 17:3 attributes eternal life to knowledge, 3:36 attributes it to faith. Moreover, gnostic self-satisfaction, which is concerned only with one's own salvation, is opposed by John's emphasis on the existence of the church in brotherly love (13:35) and unity (17:21–23).

4. Later developments. (a) In the Pastorals, epignōsis receives a special stamp through the controversy with Gnosticism. In Paul's earlier letters and in John's writings, church doctrine was still under development in the controversy with Gnosticism. In the Pastorals, however, a definite doctrinal tradition is evident, and all entanglement with "godless myths and . . . tales" (1 Tim. 4:7) is forbidden. Hence, gnostic terminology has been largely eliminated and replaced by other terms.

gnōsis is regarded in these letters as a technical term for the gnostic heresy (1 Tim. 6:20), and epignōsis takes its place when reference is being made to Christian knowledge (2:4; 2 Tim. 2:25; 3:7; Tit. 1:1). It has an intellectual, semidogmatic stress. Knowledge of God's truth is of equal importance with experiential profession of the Lord. Hence, conversion to the Christian faith can be described almost technically as coming to a knowledge (epignōsis) of the truth (1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Tim. 3:7; cf. 1 Tim. 4:3; 2 Tim. 2:25; Tit. 1:1; Heb. 10:26).

(b) In 2 Pet. epignōsis is used in a similar theoretical, technical way in connection with God's call. Knowledge here is of the orthodox tradition, of the church's doctrinal teaching (1:2, 3, 8; 2:20), which must become effective in a corresponding way of life. In contrast to the Pastorals, however, gnōsis has a good sense in 2 Pet. (cf. 1:5–6; 3:18).

γλῶσσα (glōssa), tongue, language, speech (1185); ἑτερόγλωσσος (heteroglōssos), speaking a foreign language, of alien speech (2280).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the noun glōssa, tongue, language, speech, originally meant the tongue of humans and animals in the physiological sense. Fig. glōssa stands for the faculty of speech, utterance, and also language, dialect.

2. In the LXX glōssa (also glōtta) means the tongue as the physical organ in humans and animals in 100 out of 160x (e.g., Jdg. 7:5; Job 5:21); fig. it denotes the faculty of speech, language (Gen. 11:7). In the poetic and prophetic books of the OT and in Sir., the tongue is esp. the organ of sinful humanity—the tool of falsehood and evil, of arrogance and godlessness (Ps. 140:3; Isa. 3:8). Sins of the tongue are like a sword or bow and arrows (Ps. 57:4), or like a poisonous snake (140:3). "The tongue has the power of life and death" (Prov. 18:21); thus, one should keep it from evil (Ps. 34:13) and use it instead to intercede for justice and truth (35:28; 37:30) and to praise God (51:14; 126:2).

NT In the NT use of glōssa (50x) the chief theological emphasis lies in Acts and 1 Cor. 12 and 14; the tongues of fire that rested on the disciples (Acts 2:1–4) are a picture of the baptism with fire of the Holy Spirit, and the speaking "in other tongues" is a sign of the working of the Spirit (1 Cor. 12:10, 28). For the rest, the NT use of the word links on to that of the LXX (often in quotations: e.g., Rom. 3:13, quoting Ps. 5:9), whereby glōssa characterizes the tongue as a part of the body (Lk. 16:24; Rev. 16:10), as the organ of speech (Lk. 1:64; Jas. 1:26; 1 Jn. 3:18), and as language (Acts 2:11). In Rev., glōssa is used 7x in the summary phrase "every tribe and language [glōssa] and people and nation" (5:9; 7:9; 10:11; 11:9; 13:7; 14:6; 17:15) to denote the totality of peoples and nations in God's eyes.

1. The tongue as the organ of speech reveals one's inmost self. Thus it can be subject to demonic binding (Mk. 7:33, 35). Under the power of the evil one sin is revealed in many various ways through the tongue (cf. Jas. 1:26; 3:5–6, 8; 1 Pet. 3:10). But even here Jesus proves his saving power. The renewing power of the Holy Spirit is made manifest with the tongue, and by it people praise God and confess his name (cf. Phil. 2:11).

2. The phenomenon at Pentecost of speaking in tongues (or glossolalia, a word of Gk. origin but not found in the NT) is regarded in the NT as a fulfillment of OT prophecies (Acts 2:16–21 [Joel 2:28–32]; 1 Cor. 14:21 [Isa. 28:11–12]) and as a mark of the dawning of the age of salvation. Paul is also aware of ecstatic manifestations in Hellenism (1 Cor. 12:2).

(a) Paul quotes Isa. 28:11–12 in 1 Cor. 14:21 ("men of strange tongues" [heteroglōssos]) and applies the prophecy to glossolalia, which unbelievers do not understand. In Isa.'s original prophecy, Yahweh threatens his people, who have failed to respond to his word as delivered to them in their own language by Isaiah, with the foreign speech of the Assyrian invader. In 1 Cor. 14 Paul draws an analogy between the event of Isa.'s day and the enthusiasm for glossolalia in the Corinthian church. Certain members of the Corinthian congregation felt impelled by the Holy Spirit to give voice to inarticulate and enthusiastic prayer, praise, and thanksgiving in the Spirit (14:14–17). But since this phenomenon was not understood by others, it did not contribute to the edification and strengthening of the congregation (14:5) and was thus discouraged. Indeed, it might even be regarded as a judgment on the community (14:21). Prophecy was far better, since outsiders could understand what was going on, be convicted of sin, repent, and come to Jesus (14:24–25).

Paul did not forbid speaking in tongues (1 Cor. 14:39b); indeed, he himself practiced it freely (14:18). But he urgently exhorted examination, discipline, and restraint (14:14–17). In congregational gatherings, speaking in tongues should only occur if accompanied by interpretation (i.e., by a person discerning the message spoken in tongues), so that the church would be edified (14:26–28). Paul nowhere intimates that glossolalia is an indispensable proof of the reception of the Spirit or that it raises those members who have received it to a higher level of Christian living. Speaking in tongues must never contribute to the exaltation or self-assertion of pious people, but be used only to the glory of God.

(b) According to Lk.'s account in Acts 2, the bestowal of the Spirit in Jerusalem was linked with speaking "in other tongues" as together the disciples proclaimed God's great deeds (Acts 2:4, 11). At the same time, the Holy Spirit caused many to understand this proclamation in their own language. God was reversing what had happened at the tower of Babel. When later in Caesarea the first Gentiles received the Holy Spirit and became members of Christ, they also shared in this gift of grace by praising God "in tongues" (10:46; cf. also 19:6).

(c) These two sections of the NT are undoubtedly of different kinds: In Jerusalem, Luke describes the speaking in tongues as a preaching of the gospel directed to people in foreign languages or at least dialects; in Caesarea, Ephesus, and Corinth, however, it was praise and worship addressed to God in inarticulate tones. What is common is the conviction that these phenomena are rooted in the work of the Holy Spirit and are intended to glorify and praise God.

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. gongyzō is an onomatopoeic word, meaning to mutter, usually with a connotation of expressing dissatisfaction.

2. In the LXX gongyzō occurs 16x and diagongyzō 11x. In general these words are applied to the Israelites who grumbled against their leaders (Moses and Aaron), and ultimately, therefore, against the Lord (e.g., Exod. 16:7; 17:3; Num. 14:27; Ps. 106:25). In Isa. 29:24, complaining is set over against learning obedience.

NT 1. gongyzō occurs 8x in the NT and diagongyzō 2x. Jesus' enemies often grumbled and muttered against him, as when he went into the home of Zacchaeus (Lk. 19:7) or when he called himself the bread of life (Jn. 6:41, 43). In 7:32 (cf. 7:12) gongyzō does not carry as much of a negative connotation, since the people were "whispering" among themselves that Jesus might be the Messiah (as seemed evident from his miraculous signs).

2. In the early church, the Hel. Jews "complained" that the Judean Jewish widows were receiving better treatment (Acts 6:1); this led to seven leaders being chosen to handle the daily distribution of food. In 1 Cor. 10:10, Paul warns Christians not to grumble against the Lord as the Israelites did; if they do, a similar judgment awaits them. Both Paul (Phil. 2:14) and Peter (1 Pet. 4:9) instruct us to offer Christian service to one another without grumbling or complaining. To be a grumbler is, instead, characteristic of a heretic (Jude 16).

γονυπετέω (gonypeteō), fall on one's knees, kneel down before (1206); γόνυ (gony), knee (1205).

CL & OT 1. In the Gk. world, slaves kneeled before their masters and suppliants before the gods, but this practice was usually expressed by proskyneō and hiketeuō, not by gonypeteō.

2. The Oriental ceremony of kneeling appeared in Israel only when its kings adopted the style of other monarchs and demanded similar tokens of servility (1 Chr. 29:20). At the same time, however, there is evidence that the widespread custom of kneeling before the gods was also adopted, so that falling prostrate was a sign of submission and homage, of humility and awe before Almighty God (Ps. 95:6). The OT looks forward to the same practice in the messianic age of salvation (Isa. 45:23).

NT 1. Apart from Heb. 12:12 (cf. Isa. 35:3), gony occurs in the NT only in phrases that mean to bend the knee, kneel before. (a) Such activity expresses awe before a superior or homage before a king, i.e., recognition of a king's might and sovereignty (mockingly in Mk. 15:19, where the phrase occurs in parallel with proskyneō; → 4686), the adoration and veneration due to God alone and not to any idol (Rom. 11:4), the recognition of God as the supreme judge (14:11), or the acknowledgment that Jesus is Lord of all (Phil. 2:10).

(b) To fall on one's knees is esp. meaningful in Lk. 5:8, where it expresses the humble attitude of a man who, having received Christ's abundant grace, recognizes both his sinful and lost condition and the unmerited nature of the gift. Falling down before Jesus is here a sign of repentance and faith (cf. also Jn. 9:38).

(c) In other passages falling on one's knees is simply a gesture associated with prayer, emphasizing its earnestness and urgency (e.g., Lk. 22:41; Acts 7:60; 9:40).

2. The simple vb. gonypeteō occurs 4x, esp. to intensify the urgency of a request or question (Matt. 17:14; Mk. 1:40; 10:17). In Matt. 27:29 it is used in a mocking sense.

See also aiteō, ask, ask for, demand (160); deomai, ask, request, beseech, beg (1289); proseuchomai, to pray, entreat (4667); proskyneō, worship, do obeisance to, prostrate oneself, do reverence to (4686); erōtaō, ask, ask a question, request (2263); krouō, knock (3218); entynchanō, meet, turn to, approach, petition, pray, intercede (1961).

1208 γραμματεύς

γραμματεύς (grammateus), scribe, clerk, secretary, biblical scholar, teacher of the law of Moses (1208); νομικός (nomikos), expert in Jewish law, lawyer (3788).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. grammateus (derived from gramma, letter of the alphabet) is the title given to officials at Athens and elsewhere, from secretary and registrar to clerk. A grammateus saphēs, lit. accurate writer, means a scholar.

2. (a) For the most part, grammateus translates two Heb. roots. šōṭēr refers to an officer or an overseer (Exod. 5:6), the seventy elders (Num. 11:16), army administrative officers (Deut. 20:5), and magistrates (1 Chr. 23:4). sōpēr was used for the royal private secretary (2 Sam. 8:17), the military scribe who kept the muster rolls (Jer. 37:15 = LXX 44:15), and one skilled in the law of Moses (Ezr. 7:6; Neh. 8:1).

(b) In ancient Israel the writing art was preserved as a craft by certain families. Ezek. 9:2 offers a glimpse of an ancient scribe's appearance. Among the Kenites were families of scribes living at Jabez (1 Chr. 2:55). Such scribal schools trained suitable priests and Levites, who in turn instructed the people in the law on the great feast days and made legal judgments (Deut. 33:10). The most noted of scribes was the priest Ezra, who sought the law of the Lord, both to practice it and to teach its decrees in Israel (Ezr. 7:6, 10). In the latter respect he is the prototype of the scribes of later times, who were professional interpreters of the law. Moreover, Ezra's priestly lineage symbolized the close connection between the priesthood and official interpretation of the law, a connection that existed probably until the 2d cent. B.C.

During the monarchy, Levitical scribes were needed in the fiscal organization of temple operations. They recorded the priestly assignments (1 Chr. 24:6) and were involved in temple repairs (2 Ki. 12:10; 2 Chr. 34:13). Since the furnishing of written copies of the Torah and other parts of Scripture was a Levitical responsibility (Deut. 17:18; Jer. 8:8), Jehoshaphat's reforms (2 Chr. 17) are probably associated with scribes. At least one "writing prophet" employed an amanuensis (Jer. 36:4, 18, 32). A scribe also probably drew up the deed of sale in Jer. 32:10–12, since the document was entrusted to Baruch before witnesses.

Government scribes served in various ways, from giving the king counsel (1 Chr. 27:32) to mustering the army (2 Ki. 25:19). If David's cabinet is listed in order (2 Sam. 8:16–18; 1 Chr. 18:15–17), the king's scribe ranked below the military commander, recorder, and high priest, but above the palace priests. By Josiah's reign Shaphan the scribe precedes the recorder as well as the governor of the city (2 Ki. 22:3–13; 2 Chr. 34:8–21). The high status of Shaphan's family is evident from the careers of his son Ahikam and grandsons Gedaliah (master of the palace, later governor of Judea under the Babylonians) and Micaiah (chief minister of state under Jehoiakim, Jer. 36:11). Such royal scribes apparently kept offices at the palace (36:12), which illustrates their importance in the Judean government.

(c) The scribal profession received considerable impetus by the return of the Jews from exile, when the need arose to copy, study, and expound the Scriptures to make them the basis of national life. Thus the finest age of the sōp̄ᵉrîm apparently spanned the two centuries between the only bearers of the title in that period whose names we know: Ezra (ca. 398 B.C.) and Ben Sira (ca. 180).

Ben Sira's portrait of the grammateus reveals how the position of teacher was becoming less closely associated with the temple, though he retains a positive attitude toward the cult and stresses the privileges of the priesthood (Sir. 7:29; 35:6; 45:6–26). Proud of his profession, Ben Sira lauds the perfect scribe in 38:24–39:11. The scribe, schooled in Torah and religious wisdom, understands the implications of both the written law and oral tradition (39:6). Thus he enters on the heritage of the prophets (who include the lawgiver Moses, 46:1). He invites the untaught to his school (51:23), though he carefully preserves the scribe's claim to exclusiveness by seeking to bar peasants and artisans from the study of wisdom (38:25–34).

The scribe's learning makes him an important figure (Sir. 39:4), able to administer justice among the people. They regard him as esp. pious on account of his knowledge of the revealed will of God. Ben Sira claims to teach in his own name (50:27), a new development. Stressing the personality of the teacher most likely indicates that Hel. individualism was gaining significance among the Jewish people. Nevertheless, the scribe soft-pedaled the notion of his being a wisdom teacher in favor of the reputation of being one learned in the Scriptures (39:1, 7–8).

(d) During the Maccabean revolt a company of scribes, now a numerous and independent group, sought a conference with the Seleucid-appointed high priest Alcimus and the Seleucid general Bacchides (1 Macc. 7:12–14). Although this conference ultimately cost them their lives (7:16), the incident illustrates the continuing association between scribes and the priesthood. By NT times scribal rules and practices had acquired binding authority among the orthodox and were imposed on proselytes in addition to the plain sense of the written Torah.

NT 1. grammateus occurs 63x in the NT. In Acts 19:35 the word has a secular use, denoting the town clerk at Ephesus. Otherwise, it always has its Jewish meaning of one learned in Torah, rabbi, teacher of the law. nomikos, lawyer, occurs 9x. Tit. 3:13 mentions a certain Zenas as a nomikos, though it is not clear whether he was an expert in Jewish or Roman law. Elsewhere in the NT, nomikos means a Jewish expert in Mosaic law (Matt. 22:35; Lk. 7:30; 10:25; 11:45–46, 52; 14:3; but cf. Tit. 3:9).

2. Judging by the frequency of their appearance in the Synoptic Gospels, those identified by the term grammateus were clearly influential. Far from being simply clerks or copyists, they were teachers of the law (Matt. 7:29; Mk. 1:22) or lawyers; some were members of the Sanhedrin (Matt. 16:21; cf. 26:3). These men devoted themselves to several fields. (a) They studied and interpreted the Jewish law, which was both civil and religious, and determined its application to the details of daily life; decisions of the great scribes became the oral law or tradition. (b) They studied the Scriptures generally in regard to historical and doctrinal matters; i.e., "Elijah must come first" (Matt. 17:10) is attributed to scribal teaching. (c) Each noted scribe attracted around him a group of disciples (Matt. 7:29; Mk. 1:22) and a developed system of teaching of his own (Matt. 17:11; Mk. 8:11). (d) On occasion, they proselytized outsiders to the faith (Matt. 23:15).

The Synoptic Gospels show teachers of the law as active on their own account, either as individuals (4x) or as groups (16x), and in association with the priestly Sadducean party (Matt. 2:4; 21:15) or the Pharisees (mentioned together 19x, esp. in Matt. 23). When they are linked with Pharisees, usually "teachers of the law" takes precedence, probably because they were the scholars of the party. When necessary, a Pharisee could be more precisely identified as nomikos and nomodidaskalos (e.g., Gamaliel, Acts 5:34). These scholars were the leaders of what became rab. Judaism. Rabbis formed a closed order. Only a fully qualified scholar, who by ordination had received the official spirit of Moses mediated by succession (cf. Matt. 23:2), could legitimately be called a grammateus.

3. The elevated reputation of the rabbis among the people (Matt. 23:6–7; Mk. 12:38–39) rested on their knowledge of the law and oral traditions, but also of secret doctrines concealed by an esoteric discipline. Sociologically, the rabbis were the successors of the prophets, i.e., those who knew the divine will and proclaimed it in instruction, judgment, and preaching. It was they who decided what was required, in all details of conduct, in order to give practical effect to the law. This was necessary, since biblical Heb. was no longer widely understood. The teachers of the law were not individuals of wealth or property; yet this was a responsibility that gave them powerful influence, not only in the council of elders, but over public opinion as well.

Prominent rabbis, as leaders of the Pharisaic communities, formed one of the three parties in the Sanhedrin, and as such they took part in the prosecution and condemnation of Jesus (Matt. 26:57). Matt. is more specific about the Pharisees being the ones who hounded Jesus, whereas Mark often includes the teachers of the law (e.g., Mk. 2:16; 3:22; 12:35). The latter were also associated with the rulers and the elders in the persecution of Peter and John (Acts 4:5) and the martyrdom of Stephen (6:12).

At the end of the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. notes the astonishment of the crowd at the authoritative manner in which Jesus taught, "not as their teachers of the law" (Matt. 7:29). The teachers argued from Scripture and tradition, often quoting older authorities to support their claims. Jesus, by contrast, spoke with freshness, directness, and in his own name: "I say to you." In sharp contrast to rab. exposition, with its dependence on the tradition of the elders, here was the disturbing activity of a prophet directly authorized and commissioned by God.

4. Some teachers of the law apparently accepted Christ's teaching (Matt. 8:19), but most were prejudiced against him. They challenged Jesus about his disobedience to traditional practices under the law and found fault with much that Jesus and his disciples said and did (Matt. 21:15), such as eating with those who ignored the traditions (Mk. 2:16) or without first ritually washing their hands (Matt. 15:1–2; Mk. 7:5). They were affronted by Jesus' apparent blasphemy when he claimed to forgive sins (Matt. 9:3; Mk. 2:6–7; Lk. 5:21). Ignoring the miracles of healing, they demanded some other authenticating sign from God (Matt. 12:38).

For his part, Jesus attacked these teachers of the law for their misuse of "Corban" (Matt. 15:1–20; Mk. 7:1–23), for their spiritual blindness in failing to recognize him (Matt. 12:38–42; Lk. 11:16, 29–32), for ascribing his actions to Satanic inspiration (Matt. 12:24–32; Mk. 3:22–30; Lk. 11:15–22), and for their self-seeking desire for popularity (Matt. 23:5–7; Mk. 12:38–40; Lk. 20:46–47). As a by-product of the effort of study, teachers of the law came to be noted for their abilities in business and administration. This led to their being appointed as trustees for widows and orphans (cf. 2 Esd. 2:20–21), which led to the temptation to live comfortably on "expenses," thus earning a rebuke from Jesus for swallowing up the victims' estates (Mk. 12:40; Lk. 20:47).

Jesus conceded that the teachers of the law sat "in Moses' seat" (Matt. 23:2), i.e., that it was their business to teach God's will as revealed in the law of Moses. But he warned the people and his disciples not to follow their example, for they did not practice what they preached. Jesus then pronounced seven woes on the teachers of the law and the Pharisees (Matt. 23:13–36) for obscuring the real issues of belief and conduct behind casuistry and hypocrisy, making it virtually impossible for people to fulfill God's law.

5. Teachers of the law who were also Pharisees sided with Paul regarding the doctrine of the resurrection (Acts 23:9). Paul, himself an ordained teacher of the law (deduced from his part in capital punishment, 26:10), saw a fulfillment of Isa. 29:14 in the Jewish theologians' rejection of the preaching of the cross; he asks: "Where is the scholar [grammateus]?" (1 Cor. 1:19–20).

6. In the early church the Christian grammateus continued as a scholar and instructor in God's law (cf. Matt. 13:52; 23:34), so that Mosaic law was not abolished but reapplied for the needs of the Christian church. Matthew's Gospel, esp. in its proofs from Scripture, reveals a Christian grammateus at work.

γραφή (graphē), writing, in the NT always of Scripture (1210); γράφω (graphō), write (1211); γράμμα (gramma), letter, document (1207); ἐγγράφω (engraphō), write in, record (1582); ἐπιγραφή (epigraphē), inscription, superscription (2107); ἐπιγράφω (epigraphō), inscribe, write (2108); προγράφω (prographō), write before(hand), set forth publicly (4592).

CL & OT 1. (a) Originally, the root graph- meant to scratch on, engrave, with reference to reports, letters, lists, and instructions. The materials could be stone, wood, metal, wax, or leather. From the time of Herodotus this root was used generally in the normal sense of to write, and later to prescribe, order. From the practice of handing in a written accusation, graphō came to mean in judicial language to accuse.

(b) The passive forms gegraptai and gegrammenon mean that which is laid down in writing, the valid norm, esp. in the legal sphere. engraphō usually means to enter officially in documents or lists.

(c) The noun graphē originally carried the verbal sense of the act of writing, drawing, or painting; then the concrete sense of writing, inscription, letter, indictment; in Plato, the written law; in papyri of the 3d cent., a list.

(d) gramma means the product of the action, esp. where contrast with the spoken word is stressed; the ability to write; also individual letters of the alphabet as well as papers, letters, documents. The pl. grammata is used in the sense of elementary knowledge, then lit., learning. The concept of "holy writings" or "holy scriptures" became important in the Hel. period. The authority of the written word led to explanatory commentaries, such as those on the writings of Homer.

2. (a) The vb. graphō occurs about 300x in the LXX, almost always for kātab, to write. graphē (approximately 50x) always stands for (holy) writing, written decree, types of script (of different languages), letter. Only once (2 Chr. 24:27) is it used for midrāš, commentary. gramma (26x) has the meaning of writing, document, letter, book.

(b) The 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet (all consonants) were carved (Exod. 32:16) or painted (Deut. 27:3, 8; Jos. 8:32) on stones, scratched or written with ink on potsherds, carved or painted on wood (Deut. 6:9; Ezek. 37:16), and later written primarily on leather or papyrus (Isa. 8:1). They were also taught in the schools (cf. Isa. 28:9–10). With the spread of the Aramaic language, the Aramaic alphabet (the so-called square character) gained predominance in Israel. By the time of the second temple it found general acceptance.

(c) The purposes of writing can be diverse. The OT mentions books (Jos. 8:34; 10:13), letters (2 Sam. 11:14–15; 2 Ki. 10:1, 6; 2 Chr. 32:17), lists (Jos. 18:8–9), deeds of purchase (Jer. 32:10–12), bills of divorce (Deut. 24:1, 3), sentences and decrees (1 Sam. 10:25; Est. 8:8; 9:23; Ps. 149:9), and divine commandments (Deut. 17:18; 27:3; 31:9). The words of Jeremiah were written down by his disciple Baruch, at his master's dictation (Jer. 36:4, 18, 32).

3. (a) The most important act of writing in the OT concerns the laws of God. The central part of this law, the Decalogue, was written, according to the biblical narrative, by God himself, on stone tablets that he had prepared (Exod. 24:12; 31:18; 32:16; Deut. 4:13; 5:22; 9:10). Moses was involved in writing down the Decalogue and the book of the covenant when he was on the mountain the second time (Exod. 34:1a, 4, 27–28).

Apart from this central issue related to the giving of the commandments, other passages state that God himself writes things. He keeps a book in which he writes those who commend themselves to him and from which he can also blot them out again (Exod. 32:32). He also writes his law in human hearts (Jer. 31:33; cf. Deut. 6:6).

The writing of God's law was so important that Israel was commanded not only to pass it on by word of mouth, but individually and lit. to write it on the doorposts of their houses and on pieces of parchment tied to their foreheads and arms (Deut. 6:8–9; cf. Prov. 3:3). The written word served as a reminder and a witness (Exod. 17:14; Deut. 6:8; Hab. 2:2). The power inherent in the written word can even have physical effects (e.g., Num. 5:23–24). When the written word is disobeyed, it can at a future date be used as a witness against evildoers (Isa. 30:8); but where it has been fulfilled, it can become a pledge (Deut. 27:3).

(b) The written word carries great authority, which is invoked by later generations (2 Ki. 14:6; 2 Chr. 23:18; Ezr. 3:2; Neh. 10:34; 2 Macc. 10:26). Even noncanonical books are referred to in the Bible (2 Sam. 1:18; frequently in Ki. and Chr.). In other citations and allusions within the Bible we can see the beginnings of the interpretation of Scripture. Thus 1 and 2 Chr. are in part a revision of previous books in a new style and for a new audience. The prophets likewise speak God's word to Israel by referring to his traditional promises and commands, interpreting them afresh for a changed situation.

(c) During Josiah's reform in 621 B.C. (2 Ki. 23:24–25), Deut. was rediscovered in the temple by Hilkiah, the priest. After the destruction of the temple and the exile, Ezra put the "Law of the God of heaven" (Ezr. 7:21), most likely the Pentateuch, into operation among the Jews (3:2; 7:6–26; 10:3; cf. Neh. 8:1–13:28). He bore the title of sôpēr, scribe (→ grammateus, 1208), as a secretary of state at the Persian court. In the period that followed, the Scriptures were collected and set in order; nevertheless, disagreements about the canonicity of certain books (Ezek., Song, Prov., Eccl., Est.) continued into the 1st cent. A.D. Around A.D. 80, at Jamnia, the number of books was fixed at 24, divided into three groups: the Torah (Law), the Prophets, and the Writings (cf. Lk. 24:44; see also kanōn, canon, 2834).

The Scriptures were now formally constituted into a canon. The reading of them was, along with prayer, the central part of the worship service from the time of Ezra on. Indeed, it appears that the reading out of the law gave the motivation for the first meetings for worship, where the word of God was heard (Neh. 8). Already in the pre-Christian period, the reading of a portion of the Mosaic law was followed by a passage from the prophetic books (cf. Lk. 4:17; Acts 13:15), which was supposed to relate to the passage from the law or to the meaning of the day. Exposition was added, a kind of sermon, which had an important function in the service.

(d) The need to translate the Heb. passages being read arose when Aramaic superceded Heb. as the everyday language. Similarly, God's Word had to be translated so members of the Gk.-speaking Diaspora could understand it. Thus, next to the reader would stand an interpreter who gave an explanatory translation, which led to the development of written Targums in many languages.

The most significant of all these translations is the Septuagint (LXX), a Gk. translation that began in the 3d cent. B.C. in Alexandria with the Pentateuch and was probably completed in the 2d cent. The LXX became the Bible of the Christians. Most segments within Jud. had the same Bible and the same historical situation as their basis, but they drew different conclusions from it, following their doctrines and experience. Consequently, there arose side by side many legitimate possibilities for claiming Israel's history and interpreting the Bible.

4. (a) In Philo and Josephus, the most important writers of the Jewish-Hel. era, we again find the whole range of meaning covered by the words in the graphē word group. Philo uses the phrase "Holy Scripture" (sing. and pl.) esp. often to refer to the Bible. In his works this Jewish scholar attempts to bring the Jewish Bible into harmony with Gk. philosophy. Philo offers a lit. exposition for beginners, but this only forms a foundation for an allegorical interpretation, which reveals the true meaning of Scripture. Philo's writings exercised greater influence on the church fathers than on later Jud. In Josephus's historical work The Antiquities of the Jews, the traditional text of Scripture is paraphrased to cover the biblical period.

(b) In the Qumranic community, which has left a relatively large library, writing and the written word were of special importance. A wide range of different subjects were recorded in the writing room at Qumran. Much can be learned about their expectation of an imminent end from the symbolic inscriptions on their military equipment.

The residents of Qumran presupposed a canon of holy Scripture, which served as the foundation of the new covenant (1QS 7:1; CD 5:2–3; 7:15–18). The study of this was continued even by night, when scholars relieved one another in shifts. The range of books regarded as holy Scripture was wider than those of the canon adopted later by the Pharisees. For example, T. Levi 14:1 and T. Naph. 4:1 (both revered by the Qumran community) cite 1 Enoch as graphē. Other books regarded by the community as Scripture are a "Book of Time Divisions by Jubilees and Weeks" (CD 16:3–4), a "Book of Meditation" for priests and judges (10:6), and a "Rule of His Time" (1QM 15:5).

Through living with the Bible, the members of the Qumran communities came to see the events of their day as foreshadowed and predicted in Scripture; proof texts are thus used with the formula "as it is written" (1QS 5:15, 17; 8:14; CD 1:13; 5:1f.; 7:19). This is more obvious in their biblical commentaries. A text will be cited from the Bible, which they regard as inspired; then "its interpretation" follows. The latter is based not on literal or historical considerations, but on an application to the present, which is veiled in mystery and revealed only to students who have the Holy Spirit (1QH 14:12–13; 16:1–16). This is referred to as pesher exegesis. Paraphrases in the style of a Targum or midrash are also found. The community's own psalms are likewise full of echoes of the Bible.

(c) In the literature of Pharisaic Jud., kātab and its derivatives are frequently used of the writing of testaments, bills of divorce, and other documents, but particularly for the writing of biblical scrolls and phylacteries (cf. Deut. 8:4–9; 11:13–21), which required great care. It is a matter of importance that at the New Year God writes people's names in his book for life or death, which is the origin of the traditional Jewish New Year wish.

In the schools of the Pharisees, importance was attached to making children learn writing while still young, then read and memorize the text of the Bible, and finally its interpretation. In the extended midrash, the meaning for the present day is unfolded to cover the entire Scriptures. The meaning of a passage was sought in a democratic, didactic discussion and fixed in each case by the majority as far as it related to making a norm for living.

NT 1. (a) In the NT the vb. graphō occurs 191x, about half of which refer to the Bible. In about 70 cases there is an introductory formula, which is followed by a Bible citation. Among the various verbal forms, particles, and adverbs used, several characteristic features may be singled out. The formula kathōs gegraptai, "as it is written" (used in the Synoptics, Rom., and 1 and 2 Cor.), is used for setting down a norm. Luke has a preference for gegrammenon, and esp. for panta ta gegrammena, "all/everything that is written" (Lk. 18:31; 21:22; Acts 13:29, each time in connection with "carry out" or "fulfill"; → plēroō, to fill, fulfill, 4444). John prefers the perf. part. estin gegrammenon, "[it] is written" (6:31, 45; 10:34; 12:14), by which he emphasizes the permanence of the written word.

Parallel to the use of graphō in the NT is often that of legō, to say, which can be used, as in Pharisaic Jud., to express the directness with which the Scripture addresses us. Matt. typically uses the formula hina plērōthē, "that it might be fulfilled," and constantly adds to rhēthen, what was said (e.g., Matt. 1:22; 2:15, 17, 23; 4:14; 8:17). John also links plēroō, to fulfill, with logos, word, or graphē, writing. Citations of Scripture in Heb. are usually introduced by verbs of saying or have no introduction formula.

In another 17 uses of graphō, there follows no direct quotation of the OT, but a general allusion to the Scriptures (nearly always as a whole). More than half of these are in the Synoptic Gospels (cf. also Acts 13:29) and present (with the exception of Lk. 21:22) the suffering, death, and resurrection of the Son of Man, and John as his forerunner (Mk. 9:13), as events prophesied in the OT. John sees the Scriptures as pointing directly to Jesus (Jn. 1:45; 5:46). Passages of this category in Paul (Rom. 4:22–24; 15:4; 1 Cor. 9:10; 10:11; also 5:6) emphasize in a way similar to the exegetical methods of Qumran the relevance of the ancient Scriptures for the community of the present.

Only here and there is graphō used in a secular sense. Jesus wrote in the sand (Jn. 8:6, 8). Paul wrote sentences in his own hand, esp. at the end of his letters, in order to authenticate their contents (Gal. 6:11; 2 Thess. 3:17; Phlm. 19; also 1 Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18). Zechariah wrote his son's name on a writing tablet (Lk. 1:63). In the parable of the unjust steward the debtors' bills are written differently (16:6–7). Also mentioned in the NT are a letter of commendation, a letter to the governor, and the intention to write something to the emperor (Acts 18:27; 23:25; 25:26). The vb.

epigraphō is used of an altar inscription in Athens (Acts 17:23), in a quotation of Jer. 31:33 (Heb. 8:10; 10:16, though the LXX has graphō), and with regard to the names of the twelve tribes of Israel that will be "written" on the gates of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:12). The noun epigraphē is used of the inscription on an imperial coin (Matt. 22:20; Mk. 12:16; Lk. 20:24) and on the cross (Mk. 15:26; Lk. 23:38).

(b) With the use and interpretation of the canonical Scriptures for teaching purposes, an independent tradition came into being, a tradition that acquired a new authority of its own simply because it was in a written form. According to Col. 4:16 and 1 Thess. 5:27, Christian writings were read in services. Hence, the act of writing came sometimes to be emphasized, and certain writers made reference to their own writing in order to assure the church of their love (e.g., 2 Cor. 2:4), to guarantee the truth of the message (Lk. 1:3–4; Phil. 3:1; 1 Jn. 2:21; 5:13; Rev. 19:9), to remind (Rom. 15:15; 2 Pet. 3:1), to exhort (1 Cor. 4:14; 5:9, 11; 1 Pet. 5:12), to testify (Jn. 21:24; 1 Pet. 5:12), and to stimulate faith (Jn. 20:30–31).

graphō has great importance in Rev. As elsewhere in apocalyptic, the written word here acquires a directly sacramental character. Those who want to attain the promises of the book must, therefore, read (aloud) and hear this writing without adding or taking away anything (1:3; 22:18–19). As far as the letters to the seven churches are concerned, they are dictated to John by the Son of Man himself (1:10–19; 2–3). The apocalypse sealed with the seven seals is written within and without (5:1). The Lamb's book of life contains the names of those who will be saved (13:8; 20:15; 21:27). The Messiah riding on a white horse has a mysterious name, and also the title of King and Lord written on him (19:12, 16). The great prostitute likewise has a mysterious name written on her (17:5).

The two protagonists—the Lamb and the beast—mark their followers on the hand and forehead, where the Jews carried their phylacteries, which contained the confession of God's uniqueness (Rev. 13:16; 14:1; 22:4; cf. Deut. 6:4, 8). Those who persevere do not accept the mark of the beast; they receive rather a stone on which is written a new name (Rev. 2:17; 20:4). Just as the gates of the new Jerusalem have the names of the twelve tribes inscribed on them, so also the names of God, the Son of Man, and the holy city are written on the temple pillars (3:12; 21:12).

(c) In connection with the vb. engraphō we encounter the concept, universal in Jud., of the heavenly book, in which the names of the faithful are inscribed (Lk. 10:20; → biblos, book, 1047); then also the picture of an inscription written by God on human hearts as an assurance of his love. Similarly, Paul sees the church as a letter of Christ, not written with ink (2 Cor. 3:2; → epistolē, letter, 2186). The prophecy about the commandments written on human hearts and minds (Jer. 31:33) was important to all Jews (cf. Heb. 8:10; 10:16).

(d) Paul says that before the Galatians' very eyes Jesus Christ "was clearly portrayed" (prographō) as crucified (Gal. 3:1). Elsewhere, this vb. means "have already written" (Eph. 3:3), "written about long ago" (Jude 4), and "written in the past" (Rom. 15:4).

(e) The noun graphē is used 50x in the NT, nearly always absolutely in either the sing. or pl. and exclusively of holy Scripture. The sing. may refer to an individual passage (Mk. 12:10; Lk. 4:21; Jn. 13:18; Acts 8:32; Rom. 11:2; Jas. 2:8, 23) or Scripture as a whole (Jn. 20:9; 2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Pet. 1:20). The pl. hai graphai, the Scriptures, designates collectively all the parts of Scripture (e.g., Matt. 21:42; Mk. 14:49; Lk. 24:27, 32, 45; Jn. 5:39; Acts 17:2, 11; 2 Pet. 3:16). Matt. 26:56 refers to "the writings of the prophets."

At times Scripture is qualified: graphai hagiai, "Holy Scriptures" (Rom. 1:2); graphai prophētikai, "the prophetic writings" (16:26). In 2 Tim. 3:14–15, Paul urges Timothy, a convert from Judaism (Acts 16:1–3), to continue in the study of "the holy Scriptures" as a basis for his Christian life and work. Scripture is theopneustos, inspired, God-breathed (2 Tim. 3:16–17, → pneuma, spirit, 4460).

(f) gramma is used 14x in the NT. It occurs 8x (in the pl.) in a concrete sense, with a marked leaning toward the secular and the legal. It can mean letters of the alphabet (Gal. 6:11), written information (Acts 28:21), a debtor's bill (Lk. 16:6), and learning (Jn. 7:15; Acts 26:24), which for Jews implies knowledge of the Scriptures; it also can designate the writings of Moses (Jn. 5:47) and, generally, the holy Scriptures (2 Tim. 3:15).

The other 6x gramma is used in a transferred sense, placed parallel to nomos (law) and contrasted with pneuma (spirit). The tendency to make a contrast between gramma and pneuma (already established in cl. Gk. and in Jer. 31:31–33) was developed by Paul into a system (Rom. 2:27, 29; 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:3, 6, 7). The following scheme exhibits the juxtaposition of ideas set out in these passages that contrast the Jewish use of Scripture with the reality of life in Christ and the Spirit.

letter	spirit
written on stone tablets	with the Spirit on tablets of flesh law	freedom
circumcision (in the flesh)	circumcision (of the heart)
old	new
death	life

The detailed and consistent application of the contrast clearly shows that we have here a polemical scheme.

2. (a) "Scripture" in the NT is generally identical with the Greek version of the Hebrew Bible, the LXX. Sometimes, however, known pseudepigrapha (e.g., Jude 14–15 cites 1 Enoch 1:9) and unknown texts (e.g., Jn. 7:38; Jas. 4:5) are quoted. Moreover, specifically Christian writings are also given an equal authority. In 1 Tim. 5:18, for example, Deut. 25:4 is cited as "Scripture," then followed by a known saying of Jesus (cf. Lk. 10:7). Here we may see the beginnings of a development in which the words of Jesus became authoritative in their own right alongside the old holy writings.

The same can also be said for what Paul wrote. In 2 Pet. 3:15–16, Peter evidently places Paul's apostolic writings on a par with the OT: "Bear in mind that our Lord's patience means salvation, just as our dear brother Paul also wrote you with the wisdom that God gave him. He writes the same way in all his letters, speaking in them of these matters. His letters contain some things that are hard to understand, which ignorant and unstable people distort, as they do the other Scriptures, to their own destruction."

(b) In the holy Scriptures God promised the good news beforehand through his prophets (Rom. 1:2); now in the day of salvation they are being or have been fulfilled (e.g., Matt. 26:54, 56; Lk. 4:21; Jn. 13:18; 19:24, 28, 36). Scripture cannot be annulled or broken (Jn. 10:35; cf. Matt. 5:17). Scripture is frequently personified so that, as it were, it speaks (Jn. 7:42; Rom. 9:17; Gal. 4:30; Jas. 2:23; 4:5) and can be inquired of (Acts 17:11). It foresees and prophesies (Gal. 3:8; 2 Pet. 1:20), judges, gives encouragement (Rom. 15:4; Gal. 3:22), and can be the subj. of faith (Jn. 2:22). The Scripture can even become a means by which people can be made perfect (2 Tim. 3:16–17). It is an object of investigation and is read and interpreted (Matt. 21:42; Lk. 24:27, 32; Jn. 5:39). It can be used to prove and confute (Acts 18:28), but it can also be twisted (2 Pet. 3:16).

3. (a) The first Christians were Jews living among Jews. For them, therefore, as for all other Jews, the Bible was "holy Scripture," the foundation, rule, and goal for faith and life. In it they encountered the living Word of God, experienced by means of interpretation as a personal message—at first handed down in this form by word of mouth and preserved intact by amazing powers of memory. At various times and for various reasons, the oral tradition was collected and committed to writing, which became an abiding sign and a testimony that could be experienced afresh by each succeeding generation.

This constant process of appropriating Scripture did not happen without sharp tensions: between Scripture and actual life, and between various interpretations made by particular groups. Each group saw Scripture in the light of its own historical experience, while at the same time their experience of history was molded by the biblical word. Since all Jewish communities believed the interpretation of Scripture to be the work of the Holy Spirit, its results were regarded as revealed truth, having the same dignity as the original. Thus there arose, in addition to the Heb. Bible, the Mishnah on the one hand and the NT on the other, which with its Christology was analogous and at the same time superior to the OT.

(b) Methods of interpretation can be discovered by a study of the Bible quotations. The variations in the cited texts are hardly coincidental. Interpreters used textual variants and altered, shortened, or lengthened texts in the style of a midrash; quotations from different contexts were sometimes linked together under one heading because of similar words. NT citations of the OT sometimes show similarities to forms of the text that were later used by Theodotion, Aquila, and Lucian as the basis of their translations. Finally, Aram. Targums are similar to texts used by Paul and Matthew.

4. The various quotations of the OT in the NT are not incidental ornament but its very foundation. The NT is built on authoritative texts from the Heb. Bible. There is often a flowing transition from the allusion into citation; and citations without introduction are found alongside others that have an introductory formula (i.e., "Scripture says," "Moses said," "Isaiah wrote," or the like. Specifically Christian interpretation is shown esp. in those statements that point to the fulfillment of Scripture). This emphasis on the biblical text was important for the Jews as a starting point in missionary endeavors and was taken over by Christians in their mission to the heathen.

(a) Proof from Scripture gained special force and development in the conflict with Jud. It was the principal tool of apologetics. Jewish opposition to Christian preaching led Matthew in particular to include direct quotations of Scripture. The birth and passion narratives esp. were linked with the OT, since it was here that the greatest conflict arose. By means of evidence from Scripture, discouragement and doubt concerning Jesus' suffering and death could be dispelled and hostile attacks repelled. What had happened to the Lord Jesus was for Christians neither a chance event nor a catastrophe, but God's purpose from of old.

(b) This typical use of evidence from Scripture, with its testimony to the fulfillment of promise, emphasizes not only the continuity but also the break between the old era and the new. Jesus' coming gave the Scriptures a new importance for Christians, since it revealed a meaning hitherto unrealized. The NT writers saw the events of Jesus' life mapped out beforehand in the OT. In fact, it was not merely from oral tradition that the believing community composed its life of Jesus, but also "according to the Scriptures," which were understood as having been written for his sake and for their own.

(c) The NT presents a state of continual tension. On the one hand, it emphasizes strongly the authority of the Hebrew Bible (or the LXX); on the other hand, it allows this authority to fade into the background before the claims of the gospel. Understanding the unity existing within the tension is expressed particularly in typology. Here there is seen in the fulfillment of a promise, the promise of a still greater fulfillment. The historical value of types such as Adam, Abraham, Moses, Elijah, the temple, and the sacrifices does not have to dissolve because these have been overshadowed by Christ. This leads to a new goal to which God leads his people along the course of history.

γρηγορέω (grēgoreō), watch, be on the alert, be watchful (1213).

OT grēgoreō is a late pres. found in Hel. Gk. It is formed from the perf. of egeirō (rouse, stir; → 1586). In the LXX it means stand (Neh. 7:3) or watch (Jer. 5:6; 31:28 [= LXX 38:28]; Lam. 1:14).

NT Followers of Christ are exhorted to be watchful and alert, either to dangers or for opportunities. In Matt. 24:42–43; 25:13; Mk. 13:34–35, 37; Lk. 12:37; 1 Thess. 5:6, 10; Rev. 3:2–3; 16:15, this word is set in an eschatological context, in which believers must live carefully because they do not know the day or the hour of the Lord's return. In Matt. 26:38, 40–41; Mk. 14:34, 37–38, Jesus instructs Peter, James, and John to keep watch with him while he goes away to pray to the Father in the Garden of Gethsemane. In Paul's speech to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:31), he admonishes them to watch out for false prophets (wolves), who will seek to infiltrate the church with heresy. The use of grēgoreō in 1 Cor. 16:13; Col. 4:2; 1 Pet. 5:8 denotes a more general watchfulness on the part of Christians, esp. against the wiles of the devil.

See also tēreō, preserve, keep (5498); phylassō, guard, preserve, keep (5875); agrypneō, keep or be awake, keep watch, guard (70).

1214 (gymnazō, exercise, train), → 1218.

1215 (gymnasia, exercise), → 1218.

γυμνός (gymnos), naked (1218); γυμνάζω (gymnazō), exercise, train (1214); γυμνασία (gymnasia), exercise (1215); γυμνότης (gymnotēs), nakedness (1219).

CL & OT 1. gymnazō as a trans. vb. means to train someone; as an intrans. vb. it means to do gymnastics. Since athletics were performed naked, we can easily understand why the vb. was developed from gymnos, naked, poorly dressed; (fig.) unveiled, bare. gymnotēs means nakedness; (fig.) barrenness; gymnasia means exercise. In Gk. philosophy gymnos and gymnotēs are used to describe the state of the soul separated from the body.

2. In the LXX gymnos is found in the sense of extreme helplessness (Isa. 58:7; Ezek. 16:22). This helps us understand its fig. use in Job 26:6. Even the realm of the dead cannot hide itself from God but is manifest to him in its complete helplessness. gymnotēs, nakedness, is found only in Deut. 28:48. In parts of Jewish apocalyptic gymnos is a major concept meaning without a covering for the body.

NT 1. The NT use of the gymnos word group is the same as in cl. Gk. (a) gymnos is found 15x and varies in meaning from completely naked (Mk. 14:52) to forcibly stripped (Acts 19:16) and inadequately dressed (Matt. 25:36, 38, 43–44). In Jn. 21:7 Peter put his outer garment on so as not to stand gymnos before Jesus. The fig. use, unveiled, revealed, is found in Heb. 4:13; 1 Cor. 15:37; 2 Cor. 5:3; Rev. 3:17; 16:15.

(b) gymnotēs in a material context means nakedness, bareness, extreme poverty (see Rom. 8:35; 2 Cor. 11:27). It can be extended to mean spiritual poverty (Rev. 3:18).

(c) gymnazō, train, is used only metaphorically in the NT, in 1 Tim. 4:7; Heb. 5:14; 12:11; 2 Pet. 2:14.

(d) gymnasia is found only in 1 Tim. 4:8 with the meaning of training, exercise, where Paul attacks a mistaken asceticism.

2. gymnos is the only word in this group with theological importance. (a) No one can hide from God's Word (Heb. 4:13). It completely lays bare, and nothing can be hidden.

(b) In 1 Cor. 15:37 Paul compares the "naked grain" (NEB, i.e., seed), which is sown in the earth, with the plant that emerges. Paul saw here a symbol of the resurrection. Just as new plant life springs up from the naked, seemingly dead, grain, so God causes the resurrection body to come into being through the death of the earthly body. The continuity between the old and the new body is historical rather than material.

(c) In 2 Cor. 5:3 gymnos means without a body covering. As to theological interpretation, there are three possibilities. (i) Paul assumes that between death and the coming of Christ there is an intermediate state marked by "nakedness," i.e., existence without a body. Paul would gladly have avoided this state by being alive at the time of the Parousia, when the redeemed then living will have the heavenly body put on over the old one (→ dynō, 1544).

(ii) gymnos may express the fate of the unredeemed, who do not receive a body of glory.

(iii) Some scholars see Paul as combating gnostic concepts in Corinth. The gnostics denied that they had, or even wanted, a "heavenly dwelling" (2 Cor. 5:2). Their goal was to be unclothed of every form of body. Paul did not see bodilessness as the goal of redemption, for it would rob him of communion with God. He longed for the new heavenly dress, so that the unclothing (i.e., death) would end in a new existence in a God-given body.

(d) gymnos can mean inner poverty (Rev. 3:17; 16:15).The same is true of gymnotēs in 3:18.

See also dynō, set, dress (1544); himation, garment (2668).

1219 (gymnotēs, nakedness), → 1218.

1220 (gynaikarion, a little woman), → 1222.

1221 (gynaikeios, female), → 1222.

γυνή (gynē), woman (1222); γυναικάριον (gynaikarion), a little woman, contemptuously a silly woman (1220); γυναικεῖος (gynaikeios), female (1221).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. gynē denotes a woman, female being. This word may be set in contrast with a man (→ anēr, 467), goddess, wife, fiancée, mistress, maid, or female among animals. In the Gk. world the attitude to women extended from a striking disrespect for woman (in Athens) through the moderately esteemed status of the Dorian woman to the pronounced high estimate of women in Sparta. The Hel. environment of the NT shows in its great diversity strong parallels to the general Oriental picture in which, as compared with the OT, the cultic significance of women is often in evidence (e.g., in sacral prostitution).

2. (a) In the LXX gynē usually stands for the Heb. ʾiššâ. In Heb. society the woman was subject to the authority of a man (father, brother, husband), and her worth and honor lay in bearing children (cf. Deut. 25:5–10; → gameō, marry, 1138); childlessness was a curse (Gen. 29:21–30:24). Polygamy, though evident (e.g., Abraham, David, Solomon), was an encumbrance. Excluded from all official cultic business (1 Sam. 1:3–5; cf. Exod. 23:17), the Heb. woman tended to bow readily to idolatry, though she could also take a deeply spiritual lead in the worship of Yahweh (cf. 1 Sam. 1:9–19; 2:1–11).

In contrast to much of the rest of the Oriental (religious) world, she could be recognized as an individual and as a person standing side by side with men. The former point finds its highest expression in the story of Ruth, the Moabitess, and Esther, the queen of Persia. The latter point is presented in the creation account of humanity as male and female (Gen. 1:27–28; cf. 2:18–25). Note too that wisdom is personified as a woman (e.g., Prov. 8:1–3; Wis. 7:12–30).

(b) In one sense, under OT law the wife was no more than a possession. She could be coveted, like an ox or donkey (Exod. 20:17; Deut. 5:21). Even Ruth, whose character stands out, was finally bought along with the field that Boaz redeemed (Ruth 4:5, 10). Although women were members of covenant Israel, they could not receive circumcision. A father or husband could nullify a woman's vows (Num. 30). A husband had the right to divorce his wife (Deut. 24:1–4), but the wife had no similar reciprocal rights. The woman required monthly purification (Lev. 15:19–31) and remained impure twice as long after the birth of a daughter than after a son (12:2–5). In the synagogues women began to be segregated from men from the 3d cent. B.C. on.

In cases of marriage the father's consent was essential, although note that Rebekah was consulted (Gen. 24:58). Failure to produce an heir was a mark of reproach (cf. Ps. 127:3–5; 128:3–6; Isa. 54:1–4), which finds classic expression in the stories of Sarah and Hannah. In both cases the sons who were born according to the promise of Yahweh (Isaac and Samuel) became his instruments of salvation for his people.

(c) On the other side, Deut. 24:5 prescribes that a man should not be eligible for military service for a period of one year after taking a wife (though even here the emphasis falls on the man's happiness). In the OT the price of the bride became a dowry (Gen. 34:12; Exod. 22:16–17). Num. 27:1–7 shows awareness of a daughter's right of inheritance. A wife differed from material possessions in that she could not be sold.

From time to time in Israelite history women played a significant part in politics, sometimes for good, sometimes for ill (e.g., Jdg. 4:4–10; 1 Ki. 1:11–31; 21:5–14; 2 Ki. 11:1–3). They could even be prophetesses (e.g., Miriam in Exod. 15:20; Deborah in Jdg. 4:4; 5:1–31; Huldah in 2 Ki. 22:14–20). The contexts make it clear that both Deborah and Huldah were married at the time.

NT In the NT gynē means a woman, female being (Matt. 9:20; Lk. 13:11), or wife (Matt. 5:31–32; 1 Cor. 7:2–16); it can also mean someone engaged to be married (Matt. 1:20, 24). In the voc. gynai is common as an address (e.g., Matt. 15:28; Jn. 2:4; 19:26). Besides gynē is thēlys, female (→ arsēn, male [781]). gynaikarion, a diminutive of gynē, little woman, is used only once and denotes a "weak-willed" woman (2 Tim. 3:6); gynaikeios, female, occurs in 1 Pet. 3:7.

1. Women in the Gospels. (a) The parables. Several of Jesus' parables deal with women (Matt. 13:33, the woman and the yeast; Lk. 15:8–10, the lost coin; Matt. 24:40–41, the women at a mill). In the first two, the woman represents the action of God the Father. In the latter it counterbalances the men in the field, indicating that men and women have the same status in relation to salvation. Lot's wife illustrates the dire need for wholehearted commitment (Lk. 17:32; cf. Gen. 19:26); it is not without significance that this allusion draws on the action of a woman to illustrate a danger that can happen to men. Jesus follows this teaching immediately by the parable of the persistent widow, who keeps petitioning an unjust judge and gains vindication (Lk. 18:1–8). The parable of the wise and foolish virgins illustrates the need to be ready for the coming of the Son of God by both men and women (Matt. 25:1–3).

(b) Healing. Jesus gave proof of his compassion and power by healing both women and men: e.g., Peter's mother-in-law (Matt. 8:14–15), Jairus's daughter and the woman with the persistent flow of blood (9:18–26), and the Syro-Phoenician woman's daughter (15:21–28). The widow of Nain's son was raised to life out of compassion for his mother (Lk. 7:11–17). In Jn. 11:1–44 Lazarus was raised in response to his sisters, Mary and Martha.

(c) Followers of Jesus. Jesus' call went out to any on society's list of rejected people, including women, on whom he conferred a new dignity. Even in Jesus' infancy Lk. places the faith of Anna alongside that of Simeon (Lk. 2:25–38). While there was no woman disciple (perhaps because the disciples were a counterpart to the twelve sons of Jacob), we do find women as a significant element among Jesus' followers; they were more prominent than the men in their love, care, and courage after the crucifixion (Matt. 27:55–28:10; Mk. 15:40–16:8; Lk. 23:49–24:11). In fact, Jesus received financial support for his ministry from several prominent women (8:1–3). Jesus spoke to women in public; unconcerned about Jewish rules, he even taught them (Mary in 10:38–42; the Samaritan woman in Jn. 4:7–27).

Mary Magdalene or Mary of Magdala is one of the most prominent women who followed Jesus. Jesus had cast out "seven demons" from her (Lk. 8:2); she apparently found a new beginning in him and became a devoted follower. Women, perhaps surprisingly (since women could not be legal witnesses in Jewish society), were the first to the tomb on Easter Sunday and were the first to witness Jesus after his resurrection (Matt. 28:9; Jn. 20:10–18). (For Mary, the mother of Jesus, → mētēr, 3613.)

On more than one occasion, women anoint Jesus. Mary of Bethany, the sister of Martha, anoints Jesus' feet and wipes them with her hair (Jn. 11:2; 12:3). In Mk. 14:3–9, a woman in the house of Simon the leper anoints Jesus' head during the last week of his life. Jesus commends this woman in spite of the disciples' criticism of the waste of the perfume. Jesus sees this anointing as anticipating his death and sees in it also a messianic message. The title "Christ" means the "anointed one" (→ Christos, 5986), and Jesus emphasizes the intrinsic connection between his messiahship and his death (cf. Matt. 16:13–23). He was anointed at the beginning of his ministry by the Spirit (Lk. 4:18); now he receives this unprecedented anointing at the hands of a woman at the beginning of his passion.

(d) The sayings of Jesus. If Jesus' parables and actions lift women to a status equal to that of men, and if in the Gospel narratives certain women stand out, the sayings of Jesus make it clear that it is not because of their gender that women or men are important. Rather, it is their relationship with Jesus that matters. When told of the presence of his mother and brothers, Jesus replies, "Here are my mother and my brothers! Whoever does God's will is my brother and sister and mother" (Mk. 3:34–35; cf. Matt. 12:46–50; Lk. 8:19–21; Jn. 15:14). In reply to the woman in the crowd who called out, "Blessed is the mother who gave you birth and nursed you," Jesus answers, "Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and obey it!" (Lk. 11:27–28). Note also Jesus' reference to the widow of Zarephath (Lk. 4:25–26; cf. 1 Ki. 17:18–24), the story of the widow's mite (21:1–4), and the woman taken in adultery (Jn. 8:1–11; though not in the best MSS, most regard this incident as an authentic tradition).

In Matt. 21:31–32 Jesus asserts that prostitutes and tax collectors will enter the kingdom of heaven before the religious leaders, for they repented at John the Baptist's preaching. While Jesus does not condone their sin, this saying illustrates how the social outcasts find not only acceptance but also places of honor in the kingdom. A tacit witness to this is the genealogy of Matt., which includes the names of four women, all of whom were involved in sexual irregularity: Tamar (Matt. 1:3; cf. Gen. 38), Rahab (Matt. 1:5; cf. Jos. 2:1), Ruth (Matt. 1:5; cf. Ruth 3:6–18), and Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah (Matt. 1:6; cf. 2 Sam. 11:2–5). In addition, Mary herself was suspected by Joseph of having had sexual intercourse with another man (Matt. 1:18–21).

2. Paul and Acts. (a) The status of women. In Gal. 3:28 Paul asserts forthrightly that in Christ "there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male [arsēn, → 781] nor female [thēlys], for you are all one in Christ Jesus." To enter the Christian community means to join a society in which traditional male-female roles are discarded in favor of equality. God in Christ restores the original balance within the image of God that he intended when he created man and woman.

In Eph. 5:25, Paul stresses that a man should love his wife as Christ loves the church. He greets at least seven women by name in the Roman congregation (Rom. 16:6, 12, 15), and the letter was probably carried by Phoebe, a deacon of the church of Cenchrea (16:1–2). As a rabbi, Paul should hardly have deigned to address women where no men were present, but he did so unhesitatingly at Philippi (Acts 16:13).

The question arises as to whether there is a tension between this strand of Paul's teaching and a hierarchical view of woman's subordination to man in 1 Cor. 11:2–16; 14:34–35; 1 Tim. 2:11–15; and Tit. 2:4–5. In the first of these passages, Paul develops a hierarchical doctrine of headship. Although kephalē (head, → 3051) can mean ruler or superior authority, it can also mean source (e.g., the source of a river). Since 1 Cor. 11:12 reflects Gen. 2, where man is said to be the source of woman, this may also be the point in 1 Cor. 11:3. In 1 Tim. 2:11–15 Paul's premise is the ontological priority of the male, on the basis of which he does not permit women "to teach or to have authority over a man" (2:11). It is a valid question whether this is principle is universally normative or a specific command in the light of some unknown situation in Ephesus.

Most important in Paul is his understanding of the relationship of husband and wife in marriage. At first sight, he may appear to teach an uncompromising subordinationism in such passages as Eph. 5:22: "Wives, submit to your husbands as to the Lord" (cf. Col. 3:18). But one should note the context for this instruction: "Submit to one another out of reverence for Christ" (Eph. 5:21; → hypotassō, submit, 5718). Moreover, the marriage relationship is reciprocal in that husbands are to love their wives (cf. also 1 Cor. 7:1–14). He uses three principles: loving one's wife as oneself (Eph. 5:28), reflecting the second great commandment (Matt. 22:39; cf. Lev. 19:18); the one-flesh doctrine of marriage (Eph. 5:31; cf. Gen. 2:24); the pattern of Christ's love for the church (Eph. 5:25, 32; cf. Col. 3:19). In other words, the headship does not consist in authoritarianism. Rather, it is expressed in self-giving, that is, in taking the form of a servant (cf. Mk. 10:45; Phil. 2:7); this includes a husband's headship.

(b) The ministry of women. Even before Pentecost women were among those who "joined together constantly in prayer" with the disciples (Acts 1:14; cf. 12:12). The first convert at Philippi was Lydia, who was baptized with her household (16:14–15), and women evidently played an important role in that church's life (Phil. 4:2). At Thessalonica and Berea, women were among the prominent members of the church (Acts 17:4, 12). As a believer the woman is an adelphē, sister (→ adelphos, brother, 81). Among Paul's fellow workers with the apostles were Priscilla, the wife of Aquila (18:2, 26; Rom. 16:3–4), and Phoebe, "a servant [or deacon, diakonos; → diakonia, servant, 1355] of the church in Cenchrea" (Rom. 16:1). This use of diakonos may suggest an order of women deacons in the early church, parallel to men as deacons (see esp. the use of this word in 1 Tim. 3:8–11). If so, their role was not that of oversight but of service to the saints (cf. Dorcas in Acts 9:36–39). The house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, served as a place of meeting for the church (Acts 12:12).

Regarding the veiling of women in Corinth (1 Cor. 11:1–16) and Paul's instruction for women to keep silent in the churches (14:33b–36) there has been much debate. While some see Paul as inconsistently adopting a rab. attitude here, others see these rulings as valid primarily in the social, cultural, educational, and church setting of his time, which no longer obtains today. One thing is certain: There was variety and flexibility of ministry in the NT in the light of the needs of the situation, and the gifts needed for ministry were given to both men and women (1 Cor. 11:1–11). Note (in addition to the individuals mentioned above) the four daughters of Philip, who prophesied (Acts 21:9).

3. Peter. The injunctions to wives and husbands in 1 Pet. 3:1–7 are comparable with those in Eph. 5:21–33 and Col. 3:18–19. Wives are to be submissive to their husbands, and character rather than outward adornment should be their true beauty. But reciprocally, husbands are to be considerate of their wives and remember that they are fellow heirs of the grace of God.

4. Hebrews. In the great chapter on faith, women are singled out as examples among the great heroes of the OT. They include Sarah, who received power to conceive (11:11); Rahab the prostitute, who did not perish with the others in Jericho because she received the spies (11:31); and the women who "received back their dead, raised to life again" (11:35; cf. 1 Ki. 17:17–24; 2 Ki. 4:25–37).

5. Revelation. In the letters to the seven churches the church at Thyatira is accused of tolerating "that woman Jezebel, who calls herself a prophetess [and] . . . misleads my servants into sexual immorality and the eating of food sacrificed to idols" (2:20). Elsewhere, women constitute an important symbol in this book (cf. 9:8; 12:1, 4, 6, 13–17; 14:4; 17:3, 4, 6–10, 18; 19:7; 21:9).

In Rev. 12 the vision of the woman clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet, wearing a crown of twelve stars, and giving birth to a son, recalls the story of Mary giving birth to Jesus and escaping from Herod with the infant Jesus into Egypt (cf. Matt. 2:1–23). But the image of the woman also represents the community of God's people (cf. Isa. 54:5; Jer. 3:6–10; Ezek. 16:8; Hos. 2:19–20; 2 Esd. 9:38–10:59). The OT often uses birth and nurture imagery in its description of Yahweh's relationship with his people (Isa. 49:21; 50:1; 66:7–11; Jer. 4:31; Hos. 4:5; Mic. 4:9–10; Bar. 4:8–23).

In Rev. 21:2–3, the church is pictured as the new Jerusalem, coming like a bride from heaven for her husband (the bride is the wife of the Lamb, 21:9). This thought resumes in the picture of the marriage supper of the Lamb (19:7–9). By contrast Babylon, the symbol of godless civilization, is a prostitute who has by now been judged (17:1–18).

1224 γωνία

γωνία (gōnia), corner (1224); ἀκρογωνιαῖος (akrogōniaios), lying at the extreme corner, cornerstone or capstone (214).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. gōnia simply means corner. Theological interest lies esp. in the expression kephalē [head, → 3051] gōnias in Ps. 118:22: "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone." This psalm, performed at the temple gates (118:19–20, 26–27), perhaps at the time of one of Israel's great festivals, celebrates the victory and salvation that Yahweh gives in his righteousness (118:10–21) and Yahweh's steadfast love (118:1–4, 28–29) in the face of distress (118:5–9). The stone mentioned here is one of the most important parts of the building: either a large cornerstone that binds together two rows of stones, esp. in the foundations, or the keystone, which completes an arch or structure.

2. akrogōniaios has the same meaning. It occurs first in Isa. 28:16: "So this is what the Sovereign LORD says: 'See, I lay a stone in Zion, a tested stone, a precious cornerstone for a sure foundation; the one who trusts will never be dismayed.'" This saying comes in the context of the prophet's pronouncement of woe on Israel's unbelieving nobles, who have evidently made a treaty with Egypt, invoking the protection of pagan gods in order to be saved from the Assyrian armies. Isaiah denounces this as a "covenant with death" (28:15), which will be of no help "when an overwhelming scourge sweeps by." The scheming politicians should have known better than to pin their hopes on such flimsy shelter. True refuge is available only in the building Yahweh has founded in Zion, the cornerstone of which is faith and which is built in accordance with justice and righteousness (28:16–17a). Isaiah is probably thinking here of Yahweh's purposes for the Davidic monarchy, with the promises he sees attached to it.

NT 1. (a) gōnia is used in Matt. 6:5 of a street corner in Jesus' warning not to be "like the hypocrites, for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and on the street corners to be seen by men. I tell you the truth, they have received their reward in full." Here Jesus' criticism is not directed at the practice of prayer but at ostentatious displays of public prayer.

(b) In Acts 26:26, Paul reminds Festus that King Agrippa knows what has happened to Paul, "because it was not done in a corner," i.e., in secret. In Rev. 7:1 the seer sees four angels standing at the "four corners" of the earth; the ANE regarded the world as a quadrilateral (cf. Jer. 49:36, "four winds"). Rev. 20:7–9 recalls Ezek. 38–39 and describes how Satan leads forth Gog and Magog, the Gentile hosts, from the four corners of the earth to do battle against the holy city. This struggle ends with the destruction of these powers that are hostile to God.

2. kephalē gōnias occurs 5x, all of them derived from Ps. 118:22. The cornerstone as the most important stone in the foundation is laid first. Because of its position it could be "a stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall" (1 Pet. 2:8, an allusion to Isa. 8:14). The kephalē gōnias here certainly means the cornerstone (probably also Matt. 21:42; Mk. 12:10; Lk. 20:17; Acts 4:11).

The point of the NT statements about the cornerstone is the same. The builders who have rejected the stone are the Jewish nation and its leaders. They have rejected Christ, but through his death and resurrection God has made this same Christ into the cornerstone of a new building, the church (cf. Matt. 16:18; 1 Cor. 3:9–17; 14:12, where the church is also compared to a building). According to 1 Pet. 2:8, what applies to Jewish leaders also applies to all who do not accept the message of Christ. But if Jesus is for unbelievers the cause of their judgment (i.e., the stone of offense and the rock of stumbling), he is for Christians the "living Stone—rejected by men but chosen by God and precious to him" (2:4). This description of Christ as the cornerstone thus expresses powerfully the truth that our eternal destiny is decided in him.

3. akrogōniaios occurs in the NT only in Eph. 2:20 and 1 Pet. 2:6. In both passages the saying of Isa. 28:16 is given a Christological interpretation. This messianic view of the passage is visible already in Rom. 9:33 and was widely held in early Christianity (→ petra, rock, 4376). The juxtaposition in Eph. 2:20 of "foundation" and "cornerstone" shows that the apostle has the Isa. passage in mind. The foundation on which the new community is built is the apostles and prophets; the cornerstone is Jesus Christ. On this foundation the community grows into a holy temple in the Lord, into whom Christians, through the Holy Spirit, are also built (cf. also 1 Cor. 3:11, where Christ is spoken of as the foundation [themelios, → 2529] of the church). Jesus Christ is the living stone chosen by God and precious. Christians need to join him in order to be themselves built as "living stones" (1 Pet. 2:5) into the spiritual house, the church.

Δ delta

1227 (daimonizomai, be possessed by a demon), → 1228.

1228 δαιμόνιον

δαιμόνιον (daimonion), demon, evil spirit (1228); δαιμονιώδης (daimoniōdēs), of the devil (1229); δαίμων (daimōn), demon (1230); δεισιδαιμονία (deisidaimonia), reverence for the divinity, religion, superstition (1272); δεισιδαίμων (deisidaimōn), superstitious, religious (1273); δαιμονίζομαι (daimonizomai), be possessed by a demon (1227).

CL & OT 1. daimōn denotes superhuman power, god, destiny, and demon. In popular belief the world was full of demons, beings between gods and humans that could be appeased or controlled by magic, spells, and incantations. They were first of all spirits of the dead, esp. the unburied, then ghosts that could appear in varying forms (esp. at night). Demons lived in the air near the earth. Their work could be seen in the disasters and miseries of human fate. Through natural catastrophes they shook the cosmos. Above all they made people sick or insane. In some systems of Hel. philosophy, whole hierarchies of demons were drawn up. Philo considered angels and demons to be of the same nature, but angels kept their distance from the earth.

daimonion is the adj. derived from daimōn and is used as a noun meaning the divine. It expresses that which lies outside human capacity. In popular belief daimonion was used as a diminutive of daimōn.

2. Although these words appear rarely in the LXX, traces of the general popular belief are found in the OT (1 Sam. 28:13; Isa. 8:19). Necromancy was forbidden in Israel (Lev. 19:31; Deut. 18:11; 1 Sam. 28:9), as were sacrifices to evil spirits (Lev. 17:7) and all types of magic. Worship of demons is mentioned, however, in connection with Israel's idolatry (Deut. 32:17; 2 Chr. 11:15; Ps. 106:37).

The OT often combats pagan ideas about demons. For example, although the surrounding nations looked on the sun, moon, and stars as demons and worshiped them, the OT simply calls them "lights" (Gen. 1:14). Calamities and evil are attributed to God (1 Sam. 16:14; 2 Sam. 24:1), not demons. The mediator between God and humankind is the angel of Yahweh, not demons.

In the LXX daimōn occurs only in Isa. 65:11 (and then only in S); daimonion is found 19x. According to Ps. 96:5, all the gods of the nations are daimonia (cf. Deut. 32:17; Ps. 106:37; Isa. 65:3; Bar. 4:7). Tob. 6:7, 13–14 holds that an evil spirit can gain power over a person and kill him or her.

3. Judaism. (a) Rab. Jud. abandoned the reserve of OT piety. Belief in demons became widespread, though the Jews never felt themselves as strongly threatened by them as did their neighbors. The scribes believed strongly in the existence of demons and had many names for them. Numerous myths developed about demons being the result of sexual relations between fallen angels and women (cf. Gen. 6:1–4). Others thought that some of the generation of the Tower of Babel were turned into demons.

According to many rabbis, the demons are spirits, but they have bodily organs such as wings. They can propagate themselves and appear in various forms. They are innumerable and fill the world. They have access to heaven, where they can discover God's counsels. They live both in the air and on earth, preferably in deserts, ruins, and impure places (e.g., cemeteries). Although they belong to Satan's kingdom, God gives them authority to inflict the punishments imposed on sinners. Their power began in the time of Enosh (Gen. 4:26) and will end in the days of the Messiah. God's people could be protected from them by God and his holy angels, God's Word, keeping the commandments, amulets, and exorcisms.

(b) Pseudepigrapha. The commonest name for a demon is "spirit" (unclean, evil); Gen. 6:1–4 gives their origin. They are sometimes called Satan's angels. They lead people astray into magic, idolatry, war, conflict, and bloodshed (cf. Jas. 3:15). They also tempt human beings to penetrate into hidden secrets. Numerous myths developed about them and their activities. They are bound at the place of condemnation, but a remnant is at the disposal of Mastema, the lord of the spirits, to lead people astray and to harm them.

(c) Qumran. The Qumran documents present a cosmological dualism mitigated by monotheism. Two spirits are subordinate to God: Michael, the spirit (angel) of light; and Belial (Satan), the spirit (angel) of darkness. Angels of destruction serve under Belial and execute God's temporal and eternal judgments on evildoers. Those angels walk according to the laws of darkness and tempt human beings to transgress God's law. In the final eschatological battle Belial and his angels will be defeated by the sons of light.

NT In the NT daimōn occurs only in Matt. 8:31. Otherwise we find daimonion (63x) or pneuma akatharton, evil (unclean) spirit. Angels and demons are opposites. The fear of demons disappears because of faith in the triumph of Jesus Christ.

Since demons lie behind sorcery, witchcraft is rejected (Gal. 5:20; Rev. 9:20–21; 18:23; 21:8; 22:15). Heathen worship brings people into contact with demons (1 Cor. 10:20–21), for they stand behind paganism (Rev. 9:20). Demons are active today (Eph. 6:12) and teach their wisdom (Jas. 3:15); they will be especially active in the last days (1 Tim. 4:1; Rev. 16:13–14). Thus it is important to discern the spirits (1 Cor. 12:10; 1 Jn. 4:1). The demonic powers are destined for judgment (Matt. 8:29; 25:41; 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6).

Demons are subordinate to Satan and are his angels (Mk. 3:20–27; Eph. 2:2). They have power to do evil and can cause illness (Lk. 13:11, 16; cf. Acts 10:38; 2 Cor. 12:7). They can enter people, take possession of them, and change their personalities (Mk. 5:2–10). Because the kingdom of God was present in Jesus, he broke the power of the demons (Matt. 12:28) through his word of command (→ ekballō, 1675). Demons had superhuman knowledge; they knew Jesus and their own fate (Matt. 8:29; Jas. 2:19). Jesus' enemies reproached him by insisting he had a demon (Jn. 7:20; 8:48–49, 52; 10:19–21). In his answer Jesus claimed that he honored the Father (8:49).

daimoniōdēs occurs only in Jas. 3:15, where the author says that envy and selfish ambition are of the devil. deisidaimonia means reverence for the gods, superstition, religion. In the NT it is found only in Acts 25:19, where it means religion. Festus told Agrippa and Bernice that the Jews had certain disputes about their deisidaimonia and a certain Jesus. The adj. from this noun, deisidaimōn, reverent before gods, superstitious, religious, is found only in Acts 17:22, where Paul describes the Athenians as being religious. daimonizomai, be possessed by a demon, is used 13x in the Gospels, but most often in Matt. and Mk.

Δαυίδ (Dauid), David (1253).

OT In Israel, judgeship and kingship were two forms of the same theocratic ideal, in that Yahweh was both Judge and King. Thus, the divine rebuke occasioned by Israel's request for a king did not arise from the fact that monarchy as such betokened a decline from the theocratic principle, but from the fact that a permanent institution such as kingship meant that the people were not walking in confidence that Yahweh would continue to provide leadership for them. It was in this sense that they had rejected him from being king (1 Sam. 8:7); pressed by a new Ammonite threat (12:12), they were tiring of the demands of the way of faith and wanted the security of an institutionalized system.

God, however, condescended to human needs and failings and turned the monarchy into a high and noble institution, culminating especially in the reign of King David (see 1 Sam. 16–1 Ki. 2; 1 Chr. 11–29). After David had established his throne, he considered that the time for the Deuteronomic ideal of building a temple had arrived (cf. Deut. 12:10 with 2 Sam. 7:1). This was, however, forbidden him. Yet Nathan's oracle of prohibition turned into an oracle of hope: Far from David's building Yahweh a house, Yahweh would build the house of David (2 Sam. 7:11). From this prophecy of an unbroken succession of Davidic kings came the vision of the ideal kingship, focused in a single expectation.

At what point did this anticipation of an ideal messianic king arise? Presumably after the shortcomings of those kings who followed David, beginning with Solomon. Such a hope naturally arose while the promised line was still in existence, not after the Davidic line had run out into the arid sands of the exile. The Psalms clearly show a hope running beyond the dimensions of any actual king (e.g. Ps. 2; 72), and we are surely correct if we see them as taking their origin from the focal points of the reign of an actual king but consciously reaching forward to the realization of what he was failing to be.

The expectation centered around the following elements: the qualities of his kingly person and rule (e.g., Isa. 11:1–9), his universal sway (e.g., Ps. 72; Isa. 9:7), and the priestly dimension of his kingship (Ps. 110; Zech. 3:8–10; 6:12–13), even to the extent of performing the priestly rite of substitutionary sacrifice (Isa. 52:13–53:12). The OT also gives evidence of what must be called the mystery of the person of the expected king. Three examples must suffice: (a) He is a shoot from Jesse's stock, but he is also the root from which Jesse springs (Isa. 11:1, 10); (b) he can be addressed as "God" (Ps. 45:6) and yet receive anointing from "God, your God" (45:7; cf. Heb. 1:8–9); (c) he is born in David's line and yet has the title "mighty God" (Isa. 9:6–7).

NT Within the NT the life of David is alluded to in Matt. 12:3; Mk. 2:25; Lk. 6:3; Acts 2:29, 34; 7:45; 13:22, 36; Heb. 11:32. His authorship of certain psalms is asserted in Acts 1:16; 2:25; 4:25; Rom. 4:6; 11:9; Heb. 4:7. But the NT's main interest appears in those places where Jesus is connected directly with David and where Davidic concepts are applied to Jesus.

1. The ancestry theme (Matt. 1:1–17; Lk. 1:27, 32; 2:4, 11; 3:31; Rom. 1:3; 2 Tim. 2:8) stresses two things. (a) Jesus' ancestry (i.e., as a descendant of David) demonstrates the reality of his humanity, so that both the miracle and the power of his resurrection shine out (cf. the development of this theme in Heb. 2:5–18). (b) The reality of Jesus' descent from David makes him the repository of the promises vouchsafed to but never secured by his famous ancestor (Lk. 1:69; Jn. 7:42; Acts 2:29–35; 13:34–37; 15:16).

2. By the time of Jesus, messianism in Davidic terms had developed to where it was common knowledge and could even be used by non-Israelites in hopes of securing a favor (e.g., Matt. 15:22). The general acceptance of the terminology of the Davidic hope is seen in the greetings given to Jesus (e.g., Matt. 21:15; Mk. 11:10; see section "The Son of David" under huios, 5626). This theme is especially apparent in the descriptions of the royal Christ of Rev. as the possessor of Davidic authority (Rev. 3:7), as David's root (5:5), and as both David's root and descendant (22:16).

The most complete description of Jesus' self-consciousness on this point is his question to the scribes and Pharisees how the expected Messiah could be both David's Son and David's Lord (Matt. 22:41–45; Mk. 12:35–37; Lk. 20:41–44). To Jesus, David, the inspired author of Ps. 110, saw a descendant on his throne appointed by Yahweh, who was also his "Lord." How can the same person, Jesus asked, be derived from David (and hence dependent on him) and also his Lord and thus superior?

Jesus, of course, deliberately shunned any ascription of kingship as it was defined in his day. His reply to Pilate in Jn. 18:37 is most pointed: Jesus could not deny being a king, yet he could not accept the political ambitions and half-understandings linked with earthly kingship. Therefore, he wanted the religious leaders to face up to the mystery inherent in the expectations they professed and to learn to reform their thinking, first in the light of the total OT revelation of the Messiah, and second in the light of that revelation as illumined, explained, and fulfilled in Jesus.

δεῖ (dei), it is necessary, one must (1256).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. dei and deon estin, it is necessary, one must, both denote a compulsion of some undefined sort. Since the impers. verb form does not name the originator of the compulsion, the precise meaning is dependent on the context for the force that evokes the necessity. The coercive power can be someone's will, laws of the state, or even an evil spell. By far the most powerful and comprehensive force is Fate, which determines the necessities of human, historical, and cosmic life. Even the gods are subject to Fate. This led, esp. in Hellenism, to an anxiety-filled and fatalistic approach to life.

2. Heb. does not have a word corresponding to dei, since the Gk. notion of a necessity that works in the manner of fate is foreign to Israel. The OT picture of God is a complete contrast, conceiving him as a personal will powerfully active in history, who claims for himself the lives of individual people. Through the introduction of the notion of dei into the LXX, the OT understanding of God was influenced by Hellenism, though dei was itself transformed by the underlying OT idea of the necessity of the divine will.

Alongside its nontheological usage (e.g., 2 Ki. 4:13–14) dei is found esp. in the context of the Mosaic law and of apocalyptic expectation. In the LXX of Lev. 5:17, the cultic prohibitions are called (lit.) "the commands of the LORD concerning those things that one must not do." This impers. formulation makes it possible for the personal claims of Yahweh's will to retreat into the background (cf. Prov. 22:14a).

dei in the LXX most commonly translates the Heb. infin. (construct) with the prep., "in order to." In this way final or future statements receive a slightly deterministic reinterpretation. Note, for example, Dan. 2:28: God has revealed "what must take place" (LXX dei), whereas the Aram. reads "what will happen in days to come" (cf. 2:29).

NT In the NT forms of dei are used with surprising frequency (101x), mostly in the Gospels (but esp. Lk.-Acts, 40x). But dei is freed from traditional Gk. associations even more decisively than in the LXX. By being connected with God's saving work, dei is charged with new meaning. The concept of dei plays a distinct role in three contextual areas: (1) eschatological-apocalyptic expectation; (2) the salvation history interpretation of the way of Jesus; and (3) the context of the Christian life.

1. Apocalyptic contexts. dei as an apocalyptic term refers to the cosmic drama that will inevitably break in upon the world. But it is not a matter of some unalterable fate. Rather, it is a necessity determined by the divine will. Jesus' so-called eschatological discourses announce a coming time of war, hunger, and great distress: "Such things must happen" (Mk. 13:7; cf. Matt. 24:6; Lk. 21:9; cf. Dan. 2:28 in the LXX). The universal preaching of the gospel must also occur before the end comes (Matt. 24:14; Mk. 13:10).

Rev. 1:1 is also based on Dan. 2:28: "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave him to show his servants what must soon take place" (cf. 4:1; 22:6). With this "must" of judgment and salvation belong the individual acts of the final apocalyptic drama: The enemies of God's witnesses must be killed (11:5), the monster of the last days must remain a little while (17:10), and Satan must be loosed for a little while (20:3) before the ultimate victory of the Lamb (22:3).

Paul too is aware of eschatological necessity, such as the final judgment (2 Cor. 5:10), the transformation at the general resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. 15:52–53), and the reign of Christ, "until he [God] has put all his enemies under his feet" (15:25).

2. Jesus' life and way as salvation history. Through his use of dei Lk. expresses in many instances the fact that Jesus' way was not the result of chance or accident, but of the saving will of God, which made the history in Jesus' life salvation history. A divine necessity expressed by dei requires the twelve-year-old Jesus to be in his Father's house (Lk. 2:49). In his interpretation of the OT law Jesus' dei conflicts with the dei of the rabbis (13:14, 16, the healing on the Sabbath day). Justice and love are the divine dei of the Torah (11:42). Jesus' preaching is directed by the divine will (4:43; 13:33), as is his road to suffering (9:22; 17:25).

Lk. also does not depict the end of Jesus' life as the tragic failure of a prophet but rather presents his death and resurrection as necessary saving acts of God: "Did not the Christ have to suffer these things and then enter his glory?" (Lk. 24:26; cf. 24:7; Acts 3:21). The Scriptures, in other words, must be fulfilled (Lk. 24:44). The will of God, manifested and recorded in the OT, attained in Christ its complete fulfillment and exposition; this is what Lk. intends to say through his use of the divine dei regarding the way of Jesus.

In the other Gospels dei refers primarily to the death of Jesus as a divine necessity (Matt. 16:21; Mk. 8:31; Jn. 3:14)—the necessary fulfillment of the Scriptures (Matt. 26:54; Jn. 20:9).

3. The life of the Christian. The divine dei covers not only the past history of Jesus and future eschatological events; it also embraces the present life of Christians. Esp. in Acts human beings are implicated in God's saving activity. Paul is not the only one to be led in God's plan from the days of his conversion to his journey to Rome (cf. Acts 9:6, 16; 19:21; 23:11; 27:24), for God's saving will applies to everyone: "There is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved" (4:12).

Jn. 3:7 designates regeneration as a divine "must" for human beings. Moreover, the entire Christian life is subordinated to the will of God; thus, dei is found in the paranetic material of the NT: in the exhortation to persistent prayer (Lk. 18:1; Jn.

4:24; Rom. 8:26), to live in a way that is pleasing to God (1 Thess. 4:1), to discipleship (2 Thess. 3:7), and to living a peaceable life (2 Tim. 2:24).

CL & OT deiknymi, to demonstrate, show, occurs in cl. Gk., inscriptions, and papyri. deigmatizō (to expose, exhibit, make public) does not occur as often as paradeigmatizō. The prefix para- has an intensive force, so the vb. came to mean to expose to public disgrace, make a public example of someone, make oneself infamous or a sorry spectacle. In the papyri, however, one finds examples of a good sense, such as following an illustrious example.

In the LXX deiknymi occurs as a translation for a variety of Heb. vbs. Although it has a normal secular sense, it acquires a theological significance when Yahweh shows something, such as his showing Abraham the land promised to him (Gen. 12:1; cf. also God showing in 41:28; Exod. 25:9, 40 [= LXX 8, 39]; Ps. 60:3; 78:11; Amos 7:1, 4, 7).

paradeigmatizō means primarily to expose people publicly by executing them (e.g., Num. 25:4; see also Ezek. 28:17; Dan. 2:5; 3 Macc. 7:14; and Mordecai's prayer in the Gk. additions to Esther, following 4:17).

NT 1. In the NT deiknymi has various senses. (a) It can mean point out, make something or someone known to someone. Satan, for example, showed Jesus the kingdoms of the world (Matt. 4:8; Lk. 4:5). Jesus instructed a cured leper to show himself to the priest (Matt. 8:4; Mk. 1:44; Lk. 5:14). Moses was shown a pattern of the tabernacle Israel was to build (Heb. 8:5; cf. Exod. 25:40). The risen Christ showed his hands and side to his disciples (Jn. 20:20). Thomas asked Jesus to show the Father to the disciples (Jn. 14:8–9), whereas Paul showed the Corinthians the most excellent way, the way of love (1 Cor. 12:31). John received visions that the Lord showed him (Rev. 1:1; 4:1; 21:9–10; 22:1, 6, 8).

(b) The vb. can also mean to explain, prove. James challenges believers to prove their faith by their deeds (Jas. 2:18; cf. 3:13). Jesus "began to explain" to his disciples the way of suffering that lay before him (Matt. 16:21). The vision Peter received demonstrated that the Gentiles were to be admitted to the church (Acts 10:28).

2. (a) deigmatizō means to expose, make an example of. Joseph did not want to expose Mary to public disgrace, even though he thought she may have committed adultery while they were engaged (Matt. 1:19). Jesus, by his death and resurrection, "made a public spectacle" of the powers and authorities (Col. 2:15). paradeigmatizō occurs in Heb. 6:6, where those who turn their backs on Christ are, through that act of denial, crucifying him again and "subjecting him to public disgrace." Conversely, Sodom and Gomorrah serve as a warning, specifically "an example [deigma] of those who suffer the punishment of eternal fire" (Jude 7).

(b) anadeiknymi means to show clearly, reveal. In Acts 1:24, the apostles asked God to show clearly through the casting of lots who was to be the successor to Judas. In Lk. 10:1, Jesus "appointed" the seventy-two. anadeixis typically means commissioning, installation, but in the NT it is used only of the manifestation or public appearance of John the Baptist to Israel (Lk. 1:80).

(c) apodeixis appears only at 1 Cor. 2:4, where Paul writes that his message and preaching did not come with clever worldly means of persuasion, "but with a demonstration of the Spirit's power [lit., Spirit and power]." Some take this verse to refer to the convicting force of the Holy Spirit in the apostolic preaching, while others see it as a reference to the signs and wonders that accompanied Paul's preaching and could be seen in the growing Corinthian church. The apostle does acknowledge such phenomena in his own ministry (2 Cor. 12:12).

(d) apodeiknymi occurs 4x in the NT. In Acts 25:7 it means simply to prove (charges). In 2 Thess. 2:4 Paul prophesies that the man of lawlessness will "proclaim" himself to be God. In 1 Cor. 4:9 Paul claims that God "has put us apostles on display" in the role of condemned men in the arena. The amphitheater is the context here, implying not only that God appoints death for the apostles but that he also displays them publicly in this role. The Stoics used this context to picture the philosopher heroically standing out in the midst of troubles, but Paul seems rather to stress the humiliation involved in suffering for others. In Acts 2:22 the powerful deeds that Jesus of Nazareth performed demonstrate or "accredit" him as God's chosen Messiah.

(e) endeiknymi occurs 11x in the NT. In Rom. 2:15, the Gentiles show by their conscience that they have a sense of God's law imprinted on their hearts. Paul uses the same vb. in Rom. 9:17, 21 with God as the subject, where he notes how God displayed his power by raising up Pharaoh and by bearing patiently the objects of his wrath. According to Eph. 2:7, God has shown his incomparably great grace in Christ Jesus (cf. 1 Tim. 1:16). We too are called to demonstrate Christian virtues in our lives (Tit. 3:2; Heb. 6:10–11). endeixis occurs 4x in the NT. Twice Paul states how God demonstrated his justice through Jesus' sacrifice of atonement (Rom. 2:25–26). In 2 Cor. 8:24 he calls on the Corinthians to show proof of their love in participating in the collection.

CL & OT 1. (a) In ancient religions eating and drinking were mostly formal meals, i.e., acts of public or private fellowship linked with the sacred. Families, clans, and religious fellowships received a share in divine power through the common meal, which represented their union with the deity. The origin of the sacred character of the meal is connected with magic, according to which the divine is embodied in material things. The thought that deity was contained in every plant led to the idea that the deity possessed a life-giving power, which was received directly by those who shared the meal.

(b) deipnon in the sense of a cultic meal was part of the living vocabulary of Hel. religion, in which it played an important role. Participants believed they were sitting at the god's table (cf. 1 Cor. 10:21, "the table of demons") and that through the meal they entered into fellowship with the deity. They thus became partners or sharers (cf. 10:20).

2. (a) The word deipnon does not play a significant role in the LXX. Until 4 Macc. 3:9 it occurs only in Dan., where it means delicacies (1:8, 13, 15, 16) and bread (5:1). The vb. deipneō occurs only in Prov. 23:1; Dan. 11:27; Tob. 7:8; 8:1. trapeza appears over 75x in the LXX, with reference to the table holding the bread of Presence in the tabernacle or temple (Exod. 25:23–30; 7:48), a table in front of a couch (Ezek. 23:41), the "table" of judgment that God prepares for carrion-eating animals to enjoy (39:20), and, most frequently, a dining table (1 Sam. 20:29, 34; 1 Ki. 2:7; Ps. 23:5; Dan. 1:5; Sir. 14:10; 29:26).

OT festivals and sacrifices are often connected with cultic meals and can be described as eating and rejoicing before the Lord (Deut. 12:7). Table fellowship binds a person to God and takes place before God (Exod. 18:12; 24:11). A meal often played a role in the conclusion of a secular covenant (Gen. 26:30; Jos. 9:14–15), at which Yahweh was present as an unseen guest. Jacob and Laban sealed their peace treaty with a meal (Gen. 31:46, 54; see also Exod. 18:12; Jdg. 9:26–41; 1 Sam. 11:15; 1 Ki. 1:25, 41–49). Table fellowship meant the granting of forgiveness (2 Sam. 9:7; 2 Ki. 25:27–30), protection (Jdg. 19:15–21), and peace (Gen. 43:25–34). The breaking of table fellowship was the most detestable of crimes (Ps. 41:9; Jer. 41:1–2).

(b) The Passover meal (→ pascha, 4247) originated in Israel's nomadic period. A year-old lamb or kid (Exod. 12:5) was killed by the head of the household on 14 Nisan at sundown (12:6). Its blood was smeared on the doorframes, its flesh roasted and eaten by the family during the night of 14–15 Nisan (12:8–9). After Josiah's reform (621 B.C.), the killing of the Passover lambs and the Passover meal took place in Jerusalem (2 Ki. 23:21–23; cf. Deut. 16:5–7). The Jewish Passover meal in the time of Jesus recalled the sparing of the houses marked with the blood of the Passover lambs and the redemption out of slavery in Egypt. At the same time it looked forward to redemption in the future, of which the redemption from Egypt was the pattern.

(c) Joining in table fellowship meant sharing in Yahweh's blessing. This was signified by the prayer at the beginning and the thanksgiving at the end of a meal. The head of the household took the bread and spoke over it the benediction on behalf of all those present. Then he broke the bread and gave each at the table a piece. In this way every participant in the meal received a share of the benediction. A benediction also followed the meal. The head of the household took a cup of wine, the "cup of blessing" (cf. 1 Cor. 10:16), and pronounced a prayer of thanksgiving on behalf of all present. Then everyone drank from the cup of blessing in order to receive a part of that benediction.

(d) Isa. 25:6–8 (cf. 65:13) refers to a bountiful eschatological feast that Yahweh will provide "for all peoples," when sorrow and death are things of the past. This feast, with the attendant removal of "the sheet that covers all nations," is linked closely with the Lord's Supper, esp. in Lk.'s version.

3. The residents at Qumran participated daily in a cultic meal. A priest presided and pronounced the benediction over the bread and the wine at the beginning of the meal. Reference was made to an eschatological meal with the Messiah in which bread would be eaten and new wine drunk.

NT 1. The NT sources. The expression "the Lord's Supper" (kyriakon deipnon) occurs only in 1 Cor. 11:20. In meaning it is closely related to the phrase the "Lord's table [trapeza kyriou]" (10:21). Both passages indicate that the word "Lord" (→ kyrios, 3261) is firmly established in the tradition and terminology of the Lord's Supper (10:22; 11:27, 31–32). The institution of this supper has been handed down in four forms (Matt. 26:26–29; Mk. 14:22–25; Lk. 22:15–20; 1 Cor. 11:23–25), each with somewhat different wording. Many scholars believe the variations represent to some extent the liturgical text entrusted to the writer by his own community.

(a) 1 Cor. 11:23–25 is older than any of the others, reproducing perhaps the form of words current in the Christian community at Damascus, where Paul first experienced Christian fellowship in the mid-30s (Acts 9:19; Gal. 1:17); he traces this form back to Jesus and notes that he had passed it on to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 11:23). Matt.'s version is generally considered to be an expanded form of Mk.'s. Ancient MSS of Luke have a shorter version (omitting Lk. 22:19b, 20), but most scholars see this as less authentic. A comparison with Paul and Mk. suggests that Lk.'s text is a conflation of Paul's and Mk.'s. Thus we are left with Mk. 14:22–25 and 1 Cor. 11:23–25 as the oldest forms.

(b) In addition to the fourfold record of the Lord's Supper, we must also take into consideration: (i) 1 Cor. 10:16, a commentary on the Lord's Supper; (ii) 11:26, an explanatory comment by Paul; (iii) 11:27–28; 16:20, 22; Rev. 22:17–21, all perhaps parts of the introductory liturgy to the early Christian celebration of the Lord's Supper; (iv) Acts 2:42, 46; 20:7, 11, which recount the daily celebration of the Lord's Supper ("breaking of bread"); and (v) Jn. 6:51–58, with Jesus' saying about the bread: "This bread is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (6:51c).

2. The historical roots. (a) The Lord's Supper in the early church was certainly not just the continuation of the disciples' daily table fellowship with the earthly Jesus. Yet it is related to the accounts of Jesus eating with his disciples as well as with tax collectors and sinners (Matt. 9:10–13; Mk. 2:13–17; Lk. 5:27–32), and to the accounts of the feeding of the five thousand (Matt. 14:13–21; Mk.6:30–44; Lk. 9:10–17; Jn. 6:1–13) and the four thousand (Matt. 15:32–39; Mk. 8:1–10). Esp. the meals with tax collectors and other despised people (Lk. 15:1–2; 19:5–6) are parabolic actions—Jesus' word of forgiveness coming to life in events.

(b) The Lord's Supper in the early church, with its joy at present table fellowship with the exalted Jesus, is also related in some way to the table fellowship of the risen Jesus with his disciples after Easter. That is, the church's celebration of eschatological meals has roots in the meals shared during Jesus' postresurrection appearances (Lk. 24:30–31, 35, 43; Jn. 21:13; Acts 10:41). However, this connection should not be pressed too far, for when the risen Jesus ate and drank with his disciples, he was doing something extraordinary that could not be repeated. Note, for example, that the appearances of the risen Jesus were limited to the original witnesses (1 Cor. 15:5–8).

Thus, the table fellowship enjoyed at the Lord's Supper cannot be separated either from Jesus' last meal with his disciples or from the risen Lord's table fellowship with his followers. The retrospective look at Jesus' saving death (Mk. 14:22–25) was an essential constituent of the Lord's Supper from the first.

3. The words of institution. (a) There is a general consensus on the following points: (i) As already mentioned, Mk. 14:22–25 and 1 Cor. 11:23–25 are the two oldest forms of the words of institution. (ii) Behind these lies an original Aram. (or Heb.) form, which has not been preserved. (iii) While there are differences in wording between Paul and Mk., they are minor compared to the overall unity of the passages. In Mk. the saying about the bread runs, "Take it; this is my body" (14:22); the saying about the cup, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many" (14:24). In

Paul the saying about the bread runs, "This is my body, which is for you" (1 Cor. 11:24); the saying about the cup, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood" (11:25).

The main difference between the two is a certain asymmetry in Paul, for he does not have, "This is my blood" to parallel "This is my body." Many scholars hold, therefore, that Mk., for liturgical reasons, made parallel what was originally asymmetrical, so that the body and blood are identified as the two parts of the crucified Lord. Others, however, insist that the Pauline-Lukan form can be derived, according to the principles governing the handing down of tradition, from Mk.

4. The setting of the words of institution. The account of the institution, regardless of its form, appears in the NT in the setting of the Passover meal and the coming passion of our Lord. (a) That passion began with the betrayal by Judas, which led to Jesus' arrest, trial, and violent death (Mk. 9:31; 14:21; cf. 14:41)—note esp. Paul's "the Lord Jesus, on the night he was betrayed, took bread" (1 Cor. 11:23). The vb. used in the passion narrative, paradidōmi ("to betray, be delivered up," → 4140), should be understood in the context of the salvation history of God, who "gave [his Son] up [also paradidōmi] for us all" (Rom. 8:32; cf. 4:25). Both Mk. and Paul, therefore, have in their salvation history the theme of God's substitutionary delivering up of the Lord Jesus for us.

(b) The Synoptics agree that Jesus' Last Supper was a Passover meal (Matt. 26:17–19; Mk. 14:12, 14, 16; Lk. 22:7, 11–12, 15). According to them, Jesus was crucified on the day of the Passover. But according to Jn., the Passover lambs had not yet been eaten when Jesus was accused before Pilate (Jn. 13:1; 18:28); Jesus' crucifixion took place on "the day of Preparation of Passover Week" (19:14). Various explanations have been given for this difference. We do know that there were different calendars followed in the first century by different groups of Jews, and perhaps Jesus followed a calendar different from the religious leaders. Or, since Jesus knew that he would not be alive on the Friday evening and since he "eagerly desired to eat this Passover" with his disciples before he suffered (Lk. 22:15), he resolved to eat it with them twenty-four hours earlier. Provision was made in the OT for the observance of the Passover on a day other than the usual one in a case of necessity (cf. Num. 9:10–11; 2 Chr. 30:2–3, 13, 15).

5. The Lord's Supper and the liturgy of the early church. (a) Acts 2:42 describes a liturgy of early Christian worship. After teaching, there followed closely the Lord's Supper ("breaking of bread"), which was concluded with "prayer." Perhaps the "fellowship" in this verse refers to a common meal that preceded the Lord's Supper. The accompaniment of the Lord's Supper with a meal is assumed in 1 Cor. 11:20–22.

(b) Parts of the introductory liturgy to the celebration of the early Christian meal may be found in 1 Cor. 11:26–29; 16:20, 22; Rev. 22:17–21. Many scholars believe that Paul, in 1 Cor. 16:20, 22, is citing a series of liturgical phrases that originate in the introductory liturgy of the Lord's Supper—the invitation to the holy kiss, the anathema ("curse") against those who do not love the Lord, and the marana tha ("Come, O Lord"). The anathema excluded the unworthy from the Lord's Supper; to strengthen this warning, there followed the prayer for the Lord's presence in marana tha (cf. Rev. 22:20). The call "Come, O Lord" is also reflected in the "until he comes" of 1 Cor. 11:26.

6. The principal theological ideas of the Lord's Supper. (a) A theological interpretation of the Lord's Supper must begin with the Last Supper. Most likely Jesus' reference to "body" is a euphemism for himself. The words "This is my body" (Mk. 14:22c) mean, therefore, "This is myself; with this bread I am giving myself." If so, it means that the disciples receive a share in Jesus' surrender of himself.

(b) This self-surrender of Jesus is included in the words over the cup, "This is my blood ... which is poured out for many" (Mk. 14:24). There are frequent references to the shedding of blood in the OT (e.g., Gen. 9:6) and the NT (e.g., Matt. 23:35), where it denotes a violent death or the surrender of one's life. The pouring out of Jesus' blood, therefore, means that his life is surrendered as a substitutionary, atoning death for "many" (cf. Mk. 10:45; 1 Cor. 15:3, which interpret the death of Jesus in the context of Isa. 53:11–12). In short, Jesus' self-surrender (the saying over the bread) is his substitutionary death for the many (the saying over the cup).

(c) The eschatological perspective in Mk. 14:25 (about Jesus' not drinking wine until he drinks it again in the kingdom of God) gives the Lord's Supper a future reference. Jesus is placing his disciples within the sphere of God's coming reign (→ basileia, 993). Jesus' substitutionary atoning death for many makes them participants in the sovereignty of God breaking in among humanity. In the form of an oath, Jesus promises the consummation of salvation and assures his disciples that this will be his last meal with them before that time. When salvation has been fully realized, Jesus will once again break the blessed bread for his people and pass around the cup of blessing.

(d) The words of institution in the Lord's Supper are linked to the concept of covenant. The phrase "blood of the covenant" echoes Exod. 24:8 (cf. Zech. 9:11; Heb. 9:20; 10:29; 13:20) and makes a typological reference to the covenant blood sprinkled at Sinai. Just as the covenant at Sinai was confirmed by the blood of sacrificial animals, the "new covenant" (Lk. 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; cf. Jer. 31:31–34) is made effective through the blood of Jesus. The substitutionary death of Christ is superior to all the sacrifices of the old covenant because it inaugurates the covenant of salvation.

This new covenant is a covenant of the forgiveness of sins. Note the statement that Jesus' blood is poured out "for the forgiveness of sins" (Matt. 26:27–28; cf. Exod. 24:8; Jer. 31:31–34). The Lord's Supper is a present expression of that forgiveness.

(e) Paul's view of the Lord's Supper is further expressed in 1 Cor. 10:17: "Because there is one loaf, we, who are many, are one body," i.e., the body of Christ as a community. Here Paul is concerned with the relationship between the Lord's Supper and the church, both of which are vitally linked to the body of Christ. For Paul the Christological concept of the body implies the ecclesiastical one as well. That is, since the celebration of the Lord's Supper symbolizes and actualizes the one body of Christ, any Lord's Supper that does not achieve real table fellowship (11:20) is an abuse. This was, in part, Paul's answer to the Corinthian abuses, which perhaps arose when some in Corinth conceived the Lord's Supper as granting the individual participant the food of immortality.

(f) Jn.'s Gospel uses the pair of terms "flesh" and "blood" in the theology of the Lord's Supper, as well as the double notion of eating the flesh and drinking the blood (Jn. 6:51, 53–56). This made a close connection between the elements in the meal and the components of the person of Christ. However, these two phrases must not, according to Jn., be misunderstood in a literal or even sacramental sense, for 6:63 clearly shows that Jn. has in mind the personal presence of Christ spiritually through his word, and his self-offering in word and sacrament through faith (6:35, 47, 54). If so, the reference to eating the flesh, etc., is thus in an anti-docetic setting and is intended to emphasize the reality of the Incarnation. For John "eating the flesh" and "drinking the blood" of the Son of Man is the continuing sign of participation in his life by faith.

Note too that Jn. 6 is not directly about the Lord's Supper; rather, the Lord's Supper is about what Jn. 6 describes—namely, the eating and drinking that means belief in Christ (6:35), which is "eternal life" (6:54) and which is described as remaining in Jesus (6:56). Eternal life and remaining in Christ are central to faith and to one's relationship with Jesus; they are not confined to a sacramental meal but belong to the essence of one's day-to-day relationship with Christ. In presenting this discourse and in the absence of an account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, Jn. is, in effect, saying that the entire Christian life should be characterized by this kind of feeding on Christ and that this is what the sacramental meal of the church is really about.

δέκα (deka), ten (1274).

NT 1. Ten, as the decimal base, is naturally common, esp. in round numbers and approximations, as well as in its large multiples (1 Cor. 4:15; 14:19; Rev. 5:11; etc.). The most noteworthy usages are in Rev.

2. The "ten days" of Rev. 2:10 most likely denote a short, or perhaps prolonged but limited, period of tribulation. The phrase is commonly referred back to Dan. 1:12–15, though it is unclear whether this allusion would have been readily perceived in Smyrna. An interesting Apocr. parallel might be seen in the ten generations of Sib. Or. 4:45–87, which is probably close to Rev. in time and place.

3. Rev. refers to a dragon and a beast with seven heads and ten horns (12:3; 13:1; 17:3, 7, 12, 16). The beast has ten royal diadems on its horns (13:1), and the horns represent kings (17:12). The image is evidently derived from Dan. 7:24, where the horns stand for ten kings of the fourth world kingdom, though it is differently used in Rev. The number here may stand for the universal extension of the power of these kings.

See also dekatos, a tenth part, tithe (1281).

δέκατος (dekatos), tenth (fem. sing., tithe) (1281); ἀποδεκατόω (apodekatoō), give, collect a tithe or tenth (620); δεκατόω (dekatoō), collect or pay a tithe, tenth (1282).

Cl & OT 1. In cl. Gk. dekatos means a tenth (cf. deka, ten, 1274). The Eng. word "tithe" is related to the word "tenth." There are examples in Gk. literature of a tithe being a sacred matter, a sacrifice due to the deity: e.g., Agamemnon conquered Mycenae and dedicated a tenth to the gods. On conquering the Etruscans, the Liparians were said to have dedicated a tithe of the spoils at Delphi.

Instances of the vb. dekatoō are lacking in cl. Gk. and the papyri. It was probably coined to match the technical religious term dekatē (fem. form of dekatos), tithe, which outside Jewish circles denoted esp. the tenth part of the spoils of battle that Gks. regularly dedicated to some god. apodekatoō is found only in biblical Gk.

2. In the LXX apodekatoō (6x) and dekatoō (only in Neh. 10:37) mean either to pay tithes or receive tithes (depending on voice); dekatē means tithe (9x; the more common form dekatos, tenth, appears over 100x).

In the OT, dekatos takes on a specific theological meaning. (a) Overview. A tithe was considered that part of the whole that a worshiper owed to God for the support of his sanctuary and its priests. The Hebrews were obligated to tithe their crops and livestock (Lev. 27:30–33), paying their tithes to the Levites (Num. 18:20–24) or (later) to the descendants of Levi who served as priests (cf. Heb. 7:5). Payment was made in Jerusalem (Deut. 12:5–6, 11, 17–18) or each third year in their home communities (14:28–29; 26:12). The Levites themselves had to give one tenth of this tithe to the priests (Num. 18:26, 28; Neh. 10:38–39).

(b) Origin. When and why the tenth was chosen for the "sacred tax" is unclear, though the custom was widespread in the ancient world. It was not confined to Semitic peoples but included Indo-European peoples as well.

Perhaps a tenth was adopted as a result of the ancient system of counting by tens, a system made easy by the ten fingers and toes. But the tithe may also have been selected because of the views about numbers that the ancients had. Not only was ten a favorite round number (cf. Gen. 31:7), but seemingly it was also a sacred number made up of two other specially sacred numbers—three and seven. Note the many times in the OT in which the number ten figures in holy matters: e.g., the clauses "and God said," "and God saw," "and God blessed," in Gen. 1 occur ten, seven, and three times respectively, hardly a coincidence; there are ten patriarchs mentioned before the flood (Gen. 5) and ten after it (11:10–30); ten was used in measuring Noah's ark (6:15) and frequently in measuring and furnishing the tabernacle (Exod. 26).

(c) The tithe in other cultures. Although the tithe formed an important part of Israelite culture, it was nevertheless not unique to Israel. Sometimes it was a strictly political matter, a tax paid by the people to their king or one imposed on conquered nations by the conqueror. More often, however, it was a combination of the secular with the sacred. In Babylon during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar II, a tithe from the land was paid to the temple by everyone, including the king, while Babylonian kings took a tithe of all imports. Persian satraps also demanded a tithe of imports. Cyrus, the Persian king, made his soldiers give a tenth of their spoils to Zeus.

(d) Tithing in the OT. The concept of the tithe in the OT seems to have developed as time went on. Early in the record Abram gave Melchizedek a tenth of everything (Gen. 14:20), but this was spoils of war, not the produce of the land. There is no mention of any law demanding this of Abram, nor is there any explanation as to why he gave it. Jacob vowed to give a tithe to God (28:22); this too was apparently a spontaneous thought, a promise to thank God conditional on God's prospering him and bringing him back home again safely. There are no details on how this tithe would be given or who would receive it in God's behalf.

The tithe is perhaps alluded to in the so-called Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21:1–23:19), in the laws governing the giving of the firstfruits of the land (23:16, 19; 34:22–26). The first of the crop, and presumably the best, was sacrificed to God, probably in recognition that all things belong to him (Deut. 26:10). This gift of firstfruits may be the forerunner of the tithe, with the tithe being introduced to fix precisely the amount of firstfruits to be brought. But this question about the relation of the firstfruits to the tithe cannot be answered unequivocally, for biblical texts seem both to equate them (Deut. 26:1–15) and to distinguish between them (Neh. 12:44).

The OT describes various aspects of the tithe, and it is not always clear how the various parts fit together. (i) From the beginning the tithe of the land's produce—seed, fruit trees, and the like—was recognized as belonging in some unique way to the Lord. It was "holy to the LORD" (Lev. 27:30–32). Annually a person was required to bring his tithe—a personal offering of grain, wine, oil, etc.—to some designated place and eat it there with his sons, daughters, servants, and the Levites who happened to be present (Deut. 12:6–7, 11, 17). If the journey to this place was too far, the tithe could be exchanged for money and the money spent there on whatever the appetite craved. There the offerer with his household and the Levite was to eat before the Lord and rejoice (14:22–29; cf. 15:19–23).

(ii) Every third year, however, the tithe was not taken away from home and consumed by the offerer in some distant place but was stored up within local communities and used to meet the material needs of Levites, aliens, orphans, and widows in and around that community (Deut. 14:28–29; 26:12).

(iii) What is more difficult to harmonize is the biblical command that the people give their tithes to the Levites and priests (rather than consume them). The Levites and priests received no land by which to support themselves, so their maintenance and that of the sanctuary had to come from the people's gifts. Thus, in Num. 18:21 God instructs the people to give to the Levites "all the tithes in Israel as their inheritance." The Levites themselves were to oversee the collection of the tithes from all the rural towns, and the priest, Aaron's descendant, accompanied them on their rounds. From that tithe the Levites gave a tenth to the priest (18:28; Neh. 10:32–39), and in return the Levites and the priest served in the sanctuary. How this relates to the first aspect discussed above is uncertain. Since the tithe could be a substantial amount, perhaps the tithe feast used only a small portion of the tithe, with the rest being given for the Levites and the priests.

(iv) On more than one occasion Israel neglected its obligation with regard to the tithe, so that the Levites were forced to leave the sanctuary in order to support themselves by tilling the soil. As a result, the sanctuary fell into disrepair. Reforms took place under Hezekiah (2 Chr. 31:5–6), Nehemiah (Neh. 13:12), and Malachi (Mal. 3:8, 10), and the people once more gave their proper tithe, the sanctuary was restored, and the priests and Levites were able to give themselves wholly to the law once again.

(e) The tithe in Hel. Jud. and beyond. The tithe in the period of Hel. Jud. was still the chief source of income for the priests and Levites, though, as in the OT, since it was left to the conscience of the taxpayer, it often was not paid. On occasion, therefore, according to Josephus, greedy high priests made sure they received their due by sending bands of desperados to take the tithe right from the threshing floors. In the late pre-Christian and early Christian centuries the tithe was augmented by a type of poll tax for the support of the temple and its ministers: An annual half-shekel tax (Matt. 17:24; cf. m. Sheqal.; → statēr, stater [a silver coin worth four drachmas], 5088) was collected not only from the Jews in Palestine but from those of the Diaspora as well. After the destruction of the temple the rabbis still stressed the importance of tithing. They viewed it as one of the three elements by means of which Israelites could escape the lot of the wicked.

(f) Meaning of the tithe. Underlying the tithe is the fundamental idea that "the earth is the LORD's, and everything in it" (Ps. 24:1). Thus, for Israel to give a tenth was to acknowledge in a tangible way the Lord's ownership of the land and its produce. Hence, Judah's failure in this was tantamount to robbing God (Mal. 3:8, 10), not of the material things themselves—these already belonged to God (Ps. 50:10)—but of the recognition that these material things were exclusively his. One's possessions were to be seen as gifts given by God, the proper response to which was gratitude. Tithing, then, was also an expression of thanks to and faith in God for his generosity (cf. Gen. 28:20–22).

Moreover, tithing in Israel supported the Levites and priests and provided the poor with food. Tithing was viewed, therefore, as God's way of involving his people in his own redemptive activity, in his own immense concern for the poor and destitute. Just as God had shared his blessings with his people, so those who received them must share them with the less fortunate. Hence, religious leaders repeatedly reminded the Israelites of the importance of tithing: To give the tithe would bring divine blessing; to withhold it, divine cursing (Mal. 3:8, 10).

NT 1. The tithe in the NT. Since the tithe played such an important part in the OT and in the Jud. of NT times, it is surprising that never once is tithing mentioned in any of the instructions given to the church. Jesus mentions the teachers of the law and Pharisees who tithe, but he never commands his disciples to do so. In fact, the only three NT uses of apodekatoō occur in Jesus' criticism of the Pharisees (Matt. 23:33; Lk. 11:42; 18:12). The self-righteous Pharisee of Jesus' parable (Lk. 18:9–14) suggests that by tithing all sorts of income he has gone beyond the OT law and so has put God in his debt. The classic example of the Pharisees' zeal about tithing (to the neglect of "the more important matters of the law—justice, mercy and faithfulness") was their care to tithe even common garden plants used as condiments or medicinal herbs, a practice presumably not required by the Mosaic law (cf. Lev. 27:30–32; Deut. 14:22–23).

Likewise, the writer to the Heb. refers to Abraham's tithes (dekatos, in the form dekatē, tithe) to Melchizedek (hence also Levi's to Melchizedek through Abraham, 7:2, 5), but he never suggests his readers should follow this example. Paul writes about sharing material possessions to care for the needs of the poor (1 Cor. 16:1–3; 2 Cor. 8–9; Eph. 4:28) and to sustain the Christian ministry (1 Cor. 9). He urges and commends generosity (2 Cor. 8:1–5; 9:6), but not once does he demand, as a command from God, that any specific amount be given.

Paul, however, did demand (diatassō, → tassō, 5435) of his churches that a collection (logeia, → 3356) be taken "for God's people," i.e., for the Christians in the mother church at Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1–3; 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:1, 12). Since logeia can mean a collection of taxes as well as voluntary contributions collected at worship for charity, some have argued that Paul's choice of this unusual word implies a sort of required tax, similar to the poll tax paid annually by Jews. Yet all of Paul's other words for the collection (charis, grace, 1 Cor. 16:3; koinōnia, fellowship, 2 Cor. 8:4; diakonia, service, 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:1; eulogia, praise, blessing, 2 Cor. 9:5), as well as his explicit teaching on the subject (Rom. 15:25–28; 2 Cor. 8–9), argue against such a position.

Christians are to give, not a required amount, but as they have decided in their own hearts (2 Cor. 9:7) and as God has prospered them (1 Cor. 16:2). We must remember that we are slaves (Rom. 6:16; 1 Cor. 7:22; Eph. 6:6; 1 Pet. 2:16; → doulos, 1528) of Christ, that neither we nor our possessions are our own to use as we like (cf. 1 Cor. 6:20), that we are stewards responsible for our master's goods (1 Pet. 4:10), and that we will someday account for what we have done with these goods (Rom. 14:12). Our model is Christ and his generosity (2 Cor. 8:9). Hence, our giving must not be done with reluctance or compulsion (9:7), nor is it limited to an annual tithe. Rather it must be done cheerfully, voluntarily, systematically, and generously (1 Cor. 16:1–2; 2 Cor. 9:6–9).

In sum, the NT writers maintain an eloquent silence on tithing, emphasizing rather: (1) the need for spontaneous generosity (Lk. 21:4; Acts 11:28–30; 2 Cor. 8:1–3, 7; 9:5–10; Eph. 4:28; 1 Tim. 6:18; Heb. 13:16; Jas. 2:15–16) in response to God's limitless giving (2 Cor. 8:8–9; 9:15; 1 Jn. 3:17); (2) the need for individual decision (1 Cor. 16:2; 2 Cor. 9:7; cf. Acts 11:29) apart from external pressure (2 Cor. 8:8; 9:5, 7); (3) the blessedness of giving (Acts 20:35); and (4) the consequence of giving as being the glory of God or Christ (2 Cor. 8:19; 9:12–13).

2. Tithing in the early church. The writings of the early church fathers do not contain the common words for tithing, though giving continued to be an important part of early Christian worship. Irenaeus considered tithing to be a Jewish law not required of Christians, who should give without external constraint. Origen viewed tithes as something that Christians should far exceed in their giving. What guides and propels the believer is God's goodness and the inner compulsion of the Holy Spirit.

Presumably through voluntary giving, the early church was able to supports its pastors and elders (cf. 1 Cor. 9:3–11; 1 Tim. 5:17–18). Later, however, tithing was reintroduced as a means of supporting the church, based on such passages as Matt. 10:10; Lk. 10:7; 1 Cor. 9:3–4. Eventually, the power of civil law required what instruction failed to accomplish, so that by A.D. 785, people were taxed for the support of the church whether they liked it or not.

1282 (dekatoō, collect or pay a tithe, tenth), → 1281.

δένδρον (dendron), tree (1285); φυτεία (phyteia), plant (5884); ἔμφυτος (emphytos), implanted (1875); βλαστάνω (blastanō), sprout, shoot forth (1056); ῥίζα (rhiza), root (4844); ῥιζόω (rhizoō), take root (4845); ἐκριζόω (ekrizoō), uproot (1748); κλάδος (klados), branch (3080); κλῆμα (klēma), branch (3097); φύλλον (phyllon), leaf (5877); ἐγκεντρίζω (enkentrizō), to graft (1596).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. many of these words, apart from their lit. use in agricultural contexts, carry a fig. and even a philosophical or cosmological sense. They are often associated with people or families: e.g., phyteuō, to plant, of a father begetting children; blastanō, of children being born.

(b) rhiza esp. has a wide range of meanings. It is used for the foundation of the earth and the foot of a mountain. It is also regularly used for that from which other things spring, i.e., the root of evil or good and the stock of a race or family. The soul is the head or origin. The earth is the origin of all things.

2. Because of the frequency with which they are combined, our discussion on the OT will consider this group of words as a whole. The main focus will be on the application of this word group to people and nations.

(a) Miscellaneous uses. (i) Both dendron and xylon (→ 3833) are regularly used to denote idolatrous worship (e.g., Isa. 57:5; Jer. 2:27; Ezek. 6:13), esp. of Asherah poles (cf. Deut. 16:21; Isa. 27:9). xylon carries a much wider range of meanings in the LXX than in the NT and is often used as a synonym for dendron.

(ii) The planting words are often used fig. to denote promises of God's blessing, wrath, and providence. Through Ezek. comes the promise that all kinds of trees for food will grow; their leaves will not wither nor fail (47:12; cf. Ps. 1). In this context the vine and the fig tree (→ sykē, 5190) represent one's personal security (Mic. 4:4; cf. 1 Ki. 4:25; Zech. 3:10 = LXX 3:11). There is personal disaster when Yahweh strikes "their vines and fig trees" (Ps. 105:33; cf. Jer. 5:17; Hos. 2:12).

(iii) Both dendron and xylon are used in the expression "the tree of life." Apart from Gen. 2:9; 3:22, 24 (xylon), however, references are confined to Prov. The fruit of the righteous is the tree of life (11:30); a desire fulfilled is a tree of life (13:12); a gentle tongue is a tree of life (15:4).

(b) Trees and plants as parables of people. Several recurring themes are found in passages where trees and plants are used as parables of people. (i) Sometimes the tree or plant is a picture of the individual (e.g., a ruler [Jdg. 9:8]; a godly man [Ps. 1:3; Jer. 17:7–8]; Job [Job 19:10]). It can also represent the proud and arrogant man (Isa. 2:13, the cedar and oak). The tree can also represent mighty nations other than Israel: Assyria (Ezek. 31:3–4); Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon (Dan. 4:10–34); Moab (Jer. 48:32). All these trees are under God's control (Ezek. 17:24).

But most frequently Israel is pictured as a tree (usually the vine, though other trees are used as well). In Ezek. 17:5–10, Israel is a vine planted by the king of Babylon. But in the last analysis Israel is God's own planting: a vine (Ps. 80:8–9; Isa. 5:1; Ezek. 19:10); the shoot of God's own planting (Isa. 60:21; phyteuma); a tree (Isa. 65:22; xylon); a poplar, olive, cedar, and vine (Hos. 14:5–6).

(ii) Three further observations may be made here. In Hos. 14:8 the picture changes, for God himself is the tree (a cypress). Whatever fruit Israel produces comes ultimately from him. Second, nowhere in the OT is Israel pictured directly as a fig, though this is implicit, since God requires good figs as well as good grapes (Jer. 24:1–2; 8:13; cf. Mic. 7:1). Finally, chosen servants of God may be called to represent Yahweh in the work of planting. Thus Jeremiah's prophetic ministry is described as one of uprooting (ekrizoō) and planting (kataphyteuō).

(iii) Israel is a people planted in good soil. The importance of the ground where a tree is planted is a frequent thought. Water and fertile soil (Ezek. 17:6, 8) are necessary (Job 14:7–9). Yahweh has provided the right soil (2 Sam. 7:10; Isa. 5:1–2; Ezek. 19:10). He himself is the soil. If the root is not planted in him, the fruit fails or is poisonous.

(iv) Where there is a root, there is hope of a new beginning after catastrophe. With this thought Job contrasts the life of a human being with that of a tree (Job 14:7–12). The notion of root and branch or root and fruit signifies totality, usually spoken in the context of totality of destruction (cf. Job 18:16; Amos 2:9). Nebuchadnezzar is reassured that after his coming downfall, the stump of the roots will be left in the earth (Dan. 4:15, 26).

(v) rhiza is occasionally related to the future hope in the OT. It is used in connection with the holy remnant. "A remnant . . . will take root below" (2 Ki. 19:30). The servant of the Lord is seen as a young plant and "like a root out of dry ground" (Isa. 53:2). rhiza also occurs in connection with the messianic hope. In Isa. 11:1 it refers to the house of Jesse itself; hope lies in the shoot or branch (cf. 60:21). In 11:10, however, it is the rhiza itself that springs from the house of Jesse and is identified with the Messiah. The thought of the Messiah as the root continued into Jud., although there was preference elsewhere to speak of the Messiah as the branch (Isa. 4:2; Jer. 23:5; 33:15; Zech. 3:8; 6:12). The OT never speaks of Abraham as the root, though the thought is implicit (Isa. 41:8; 51:2; cf. Ps. 105:6).

(vi) The vitality of the tree is evidenced by the growth of leaves, fruit, and spreading branches (Ps. 1:3; 80:10–11; Ezek. 31:5; Hos. 14:6).

(vii) The branches that shelter birds and animals are a metaphor for a mighty kingdom offering protection to its vassals (Ezek. 17:23; 31:6; Dan. 4:21–22).

(viii) The tree is assessed by its fruit, and its fate is often a picture of Yahweh's judgment. Despite assiduous care the vine, Israel, brought forth only wild grapes (Isa. 5:4). When Yahweh wanted to gather fruit, there were no grapes on the vine or figs on the fig tree (Jer. 8:13). The cedar and forest (Assyria) is cut down (Ezek. 31:12; Isa. 10:34). The vineyard (Israel) is made a waste (5:6). The oak (Israel) is felled (6:13).

Apart from a few gleanings, the olive tree (Israel) is stripped (17:6). In the exile the vine (Judah) is plucked up and transplanted (Ezek. 19:12–13).

(ix) The vb. enkentrizō is used only once in the LXX with the meaning of to goad or spur on (Wis. 16:11). But the thought of grafting into the tree of Israel is found in the teaching of the rabbis (b. Yebam. 63a). In Philo, Jewish proselytes were regarded as grafted into the tree whose root was Abraham.

NT 1. Miscellaneous uses. (a) The NT frequently draws on illustrations from nature. Note the reference to the signs of the times in Matt. 16:1–3. The natural world also shares with humanity the results of God's blessing or wrath (Rev. 7:1, 3; 8:7; 9:4).

(b) The NT refers to the tree of life (xylon, → 3833) in Rev. 2:7; 22:2, 14, 19 and to the cross as a tree (xylon) in Acts 5:30; 10:39; Gal. 3:13; 1 Pet. 2:24. But everywhere else the word for tree is dendron.

2. Trees and plants as parables of people. These words are esp. significant when applied to people, and the OT concepts referred to above provide a framework for understanding. (a) Individuals are pictured as trees, though the references are largely to Jewish opponents: the Pharisees (Matt. 3:10; 12:33; Lk. 6:43–44), false prophets (Matt. 7:17), the ungodly and scoffers (Jude 12). In Matt. 15:13 the Pharisees are called plants (phyteia) that God has not planted (cf. 13:24–25).

The old Israel is also pictured as a tree. Matt. 21:33–34; Mk. 12:1–2; Lk. 20:9–10 use the vineyard with God as the planter (phyteuō; → sperma, seed, 5065). The fig tree (sykē) in Mk. 11:12–13 is probably Israel. But dendron also symbolizes the new community of Israel. The kingdom is like a mustard seed becoming a tree (Matt. 13:32; Lk. 13:18–19). It has insignificant origins, but its branches now extend far and wide, offering protection for all who live in it (cf. Dan. 4:21–22; Ezek. 17:23; 31:6). The church is like the branches of a vine, which is Christ (Jn. 15:1–2).

There is a strong organic connection between the old and the new trees. In Mk. 12:1–2, God is still the planter of the vineyard, but he does not destroy it. He replaces one set of tenants by another. In Rom. 11:17–18 the olive tree stands for both the old and the new communities, and the root is the same. Jesus Christ is also the one who plants. He is the sower (cf. Matt. 13:37), and his followers must do the same (1 Cor. 3:6; 9:7). The gospel preached is "the word planted [emphytos] in you, which can save you" (Jas. 1:21). But whereas the apostles plant the word, the Son of Man plants people (Matt. 13:38).

(b) Good soil is necessary. Mk. 12:1–2 and Lk. 13:6–7 speak of the care given by God to ensure the right soil. The new Israel likewise is planted in good soil, rooted (rhizoō) in the love of Christ (Eph. 3:17; Col. 2:7). But in the teaching of Jesus human hearts also represent the soil. Good soil is the heart that hears, understands, holds fast, and yields fruit (Matt. 13:23; Mk. 4:20; Lk. 8:15; cf. Jas. 1:21).

(c) rhiza is used in a variety of contexts. (i) It is used as a metaphor for source or origin. The love of money is the root of all kinds of evil (1 Tim. 6:10). Heb. 12:15 warns against allowing a root of bitterness to spring up, preventing believers from attaining to the grace of God and causing trouble and defilement. (ii) The root guarantees the life of the tree (Rom. 11:16, 18); without roots a plant dies (Mk. 4:6, 17). (iii) Jesus Christ is described as the root three times (Rom. 15:12; Rev. 5:5; 22:16; Isa. 11:1, 10 is clearly in mind). In Rom. 11:17–18 Paul perhaps adopts the Jewish thought of Abraham as the root of Israel, but we must understand this passage in the light of Gal. 3:6–7, where sharing Abraham's faith determines our relationship to him, and to be in Christ is to be a child of Abraham (3:29).

(d) The fruit (karpos, → 2843) evidences the quality of the tree. Character may be gauged from conduct (Matt. 3:8; 7:16–17; Lk. 3:8; 6:43–44). In Matt. 12:33–34 the fruit is the Pharisees' words of condemnation of Jesus. In 21:33–46 the parable of the wicked tenants in the vineyard is accompanied by two other parables, the two sons (21:28–32) and the marriage feast (22:1–14). The fruit required is the acceptance of Jesus' authority and invitation. In Jn. 15:1–2 the fruit required from the branches (klēma) is love, obedience, and prayer. It cannot be produced without complete dependence on the vine, which is Jesus Christ himself.

(e) Fruitlessness leads to destruction. The trees are cut down (Matt. 7:19). The plants are uprooted (15:13; cf. Jude 12). In Rom. 11:19 branches are broken off. In the parable of the fig tree in Lk. 13:6–9, there is a temporary stay of execution to allow one final chance for the nation of Israel to bear the fruit of repentance (cf. 13:5). The cursing of the fig tree carries this scene one step further (→ sykē, 5190, for a discussion of this incident). The time of reckoning is drawing near, and Israel will be judged shortly on how the nation has responded to the mission and message of Jesus.

(f) In Rom. 11:16–17 Paul uses the picture of grafting (enkentrizō). The process referred to is sometimes said to be untrue to actual practice, where a wild olive (agrielaios) becomes a cultivated olive (kallielaios) by engrafting it on a cultivated olive. However, the agrielaios may have been an oleaster, and the practice of such grafting in order to rejuvenate an unproductive olive was not unknown in the ancient world. Gentiles who are now members of God's people are the agrielaios. Perhaps the tension between Paul's picture and approved horticultural practice is intended to underline the miraculous nature of this work of God, which is contrary to nature.

For Paul the grafted branches are not proselytes but Gentile Christians as a body. The thrust of the passage is to illustrate what God has done by incorporating the Gentiles into his covenant people through Christ. But this passage also contains a warning to the Gentiles, lest they fall into arrogance and fail to acknowledge humbly their dependence. They are supported by the root (11:18), and they should not write off unbelieving Jews. After all, if the root is holy, so are the branches (11:16); moreover, God has power to graft in again the natural branches.

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. dexios means right (opposite to left); the fem. form by itself often meant the right hand (with cheir understood) or the right side. The right hand symbolized power, success, and loyalty. Its subsidiary meanings are skillful (opposite of clumsy) and lucky. The fem. pl. could mean contract because of the handshake that sealed it.

In the OT God's right hand is often spoken of symbolically, especially in the Psalms. It provides support (18:35) and victory (118:15). It even expresses God's omnipresence (139:10). The place at a person's right hand is important as a place of honor (1 Ki. 2:19; Ps. 45:9). Ps. 110:1 is esp. significant in the light of its frequent use in the NT. The king of Israel, placed by Yahweh at his right hand, is honored as God's coregent, who by war and victory will overthrow the enemies of Israel, and thus of God.

NT 1. dexios occurs 54x in the NT, most of which are in line with the word in cl. Gk. For the right hand sealing an agreement see Gal. 2:9. The angel in the tomb was sitting on the right side (Mk. 16:5). In the final judgment those who are chosen are summoned to the right hand of the Son of Man (Matt. 25:31–34).

2. The main theological use of dexios occurs in connection with Ps. 110:1 (quoted or referred to indirectly in the NT 19x). This psalm was probably interpreted messianically already in pre-NT times. Jesus expounded it in Mk. 12:35–37 (par. Matt. 22:41–46; Lk. 20:41–44). For the Jews the Messiah was God's eschatological, political coregent, who would establish a visible kingdom of God on earth. Jesus rejected the political aspects of messiahship and was guarded in his attitude to the title "Son of David." But he did consider himself to be the fulfillment of this verse.

The context in Matt. and Mk. is esp. significant, for Jesus' question to the Pharisees about the Messiah immediately follows a lawyer's question to Jesus about which commandment is the greatest. Jesus replied by citing Deut. 6:4–5 and Lev. 19:18 (see Matt. 22:37–39). He went on to ask whose son the Messiah was. The Pharisees responded with the traditional, "The son of David." Jesus then replied, quoting Ps. 110:1: "How is it then that David, speaking by the Spirit, calls him 'Lord'?" (Matt. 22:41–43). That is, in addition to Yahweh, whom we are commanded to serve and worship with our whole being, there is another Lord who has the same title and sits at Yahweh's right hand. The Pharisees cannot answer Jesus' question, so he pronounces judgment on the teachers of the law and the Pharisees (Matt. 23), whose teaching and practice have caused them to miss the significance of God's Word.

At his trial (Mk. 14:62; par. Matt. 26:64; Lk. 22:69), although unarmed and ridiculed, Jesus solemnly declared that he was "the Son of Man," who would sit "at the right hand of the Mighty One" (cf. Dan. 7:13, combined with Ps. 110:1). With this unheard-of claim he demanded recognition that God exercises his power in radically different way from that of the world. God works under and indeed by means of the greatest human powerlessness. The one who will come in judgment at the right hand of God's throne (→ thronos, 2585) is the Lamb who was slain (Rev. 5:6).

3. The early church clearly saw Jesus as seated at God's right hand. This is pictured in various ways. Rom. 8:34 lays emphasis on the priestly function of Jesus at God's right hand as our heavenly intercessor. Col. 3:1 stresses Christ's position at God's right hand and our being hidden "with Christ in God" (3:3) as a motivation for living a moral life on this earth. Eph. 1:20 and 1 Pet. 3:22 underline the essential meaning of Jesus' coregency.

For Heb. esp. Jesus' sitting at God's right hand is not the exercise of worldly power but the reign of the one who has offered himself as a sacrifice and has therefore been exalted above all angels (1:3, 13). This self-sacrifice, which led to his exaltation, is the unchangeable source of all the blessings of salvation toward which the tired Christian community must hasten (12:2). But Jesus' sitting at God's right hand does not yet mean the immediate defeat of all his enemies. This is reserved for the eschatological consummation (10:12; cf. 1 Cor. 15:25).

4. A polemical motive is added in Acts. The proclamation of Jesus sitting at God's right hand (2:34) and his exaltation to that position (2:33; 5:31) becomes a word of judgment on the Jews and their pride in the Mosaic law. The one they killed is the Messiah! Stephen saw Jesus standing at God's right hand (7:55–56). That he is standing rather than sitting indicates that he has the role of witness for Stephen's defense. Jesus appears before God as a witness (martys; → martyria, 3456) on behalf of his own witnesses on earth.

δέομαι (deomai), ask, request, beseech, beg (1289); δέησις (deēsis), a request, entreaty (1255); προσδέομαι (prosdeomai), need (in addition or further) (4656); ἱκετηρία (hiketēria), supplication (2656); ἔντευξις (enteuxis), petition, prayer (1950).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the basic meaning of the deomai word group is to lack, be in need of, from which developed the meaning to request, beseech.

2. (a) In the LXX deomai is used with the meaning to beseech, beg for favor (e.g., Jacob's request of the angel in Hos. 12:4; cf. Esther's request of the king in Est. 8:3 [S]). A suppliant can plead with God for mercy (1 Ki. 8:33–47; Ps. 30:8; 141:1). But deomai in the LXX can also mean to appease, placate. The person praying attempts to placate God's anger by his entreaties (Exod. 32:11; 1 Ki. 13:6; Zech. 8:21). Such a prayer can be accompanied by an offering (1 Sam. 13:12) or associated with confession of sin (Dan. 9:18).

(b) The noun deēsis in the LXX means supplication (e.g., 1 Ki. 8:28, 30; Ps. 6:9; 28:2, 6), cry of lamentation (e.g., 17:1; 61:1), or cry for help (e.g., 34:15; 39:12). It is used only for calling on God in prayer, often standing alongside proseuchē, prayer (e.g., 1 Ki. 8:38, 45; Ps. 6:9; → proseuchomai, pray, 4667).

NT 1. In the NT deomai occurs 22x, always with the meaning to ask, beseech, beg. (a) It is used in a general sense as a courtesy formula, without any particular obj. (cf. the English phrase "I beg you"; e.g., Acts 8:34; 21:39; 26:3).

(b) In some passages deomai is used in its full sense of making earnest entreaty, even imploring. There is a warmth, an attractiveness, about it (e.g., 2 Cor. 5:20; 8:4; 10:2; Gal. 4:12).

(c) In all other cases deomai has the religious sense of beseeching Jesus or God. The requests made are specific, arising out of real need and expecting definite help of an external or a spiritual nature (e.g., Lk. 5:12; 10:2). In some passages (e.g., 9:38), the reason for the request is given. In 1 Thess. 3:10 one sees how even an external request may be directed to a spiritual end.

Prayer should be made to God for forgiveness (Acts 8:22), to bring in God's harvest (Lk.10:2), and for ability to stand on the last day (21:36). In some passages, deomai is used absolutely, i.e., without God specifically mentioned as direct obj. In such cases, of course, the direct obj. has to be supplied.

(d) If the request is made not in one's own interest but on behalf of someone else, then deomai means to intercede (e.g., Acts 8:24; Rom. 1:10). Intercession is often the visible and practical expression of the heartfelt affection and fellowship that exist among Christians (e.g., 2 Cor. 9:14; Eph. 6:18; Phil. 1:4; 2 Tim. 1:3). Paul highly valued such intercession and expected great things from it (e.g., 2 Cor. 1:11; Phil. 1:19).

In Jas. 5:16, the same point is sharpened by the phrase "the prayer of a righteous man" (i.e., of a believer whose life bears out his or her faith) and the adj. qualifying deēsis ("effective"). This comes about when the prayer involves dynamic fellowship and genuine conversation with God—which in itself is a gift from God. This is exemplified by Elijah (5:17; cf. 1 Ki. 17:1; 18:1). Similarly, 1 Pet. 3:12 (quoting Ps. 34:16) says that the prayer of the "righteous" is heard by God.

(e) Whenever the request is addressed to God, deomai naturally assumes the meaning of to pray and can often be so translated (similarly deēsis, prayer). This is esp. the case when no content is stated (e.g., Acts 10:2; Heb. 5:7, where the noun stands alongside hiketēria, entreaty, petition). Thus, as in the OT, deomai and deēsis often occur with proseuchē or other synonyms (e.g., Rom. 1:10; Eph. 6:18; Phil. 4:6 [with aitēma]; 1 Tim. 2:1 [with enteuxis]). Prayer is an important evidence of true Christian faith (2:1). It is the mark of a Christian (5:5; cf. Acts 9:11). Even Jesus prayed (Heb. 5:7; cf. Lk. 22:44) and made intercession (22:32).

2. prosdeomai occurs only in Acts 17:25, meaning to be in need of. In this word the original sense of deomai reappears, and Lk. uses it here to underscore the self-sufficiency and complete independence of God, who is highly exalted above all.

δέσμιος (desmios), prisoner (1300); δεσμεύω (desmeuō), bind (with bonds) (1297); δέσμη (desmē), bundle (1299); δεσμός (desmos), bond, tether, imprisonment (1301); δεσμωτήριον (desmōtērion), prison (1303); δεσμώτης (desmōtēs), prisoner (1304); δεσμοφύλαξ (desmophylax), prison warden (1302); σύνδεσμος (syndesmos), that which binds together, bond, fetter (5278).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the root desm- conveys the basic meaning of bind. desmeuō means to bind together, chain up. A desmē is a bundle tied together. desmios means one who is in chains or in prison. desmos at first meant chain, and later imprisonment, custody. desmōtērion is a prison, desmōtēs a prisoner, and desmophylax a prison warden. syndesmos can mean either a chain that holds one or a binding that holds things together. All these words are used in a physical sense.

2. The lit. sense of words in this group dominates in the LXX: Sheafs are bound together (Gen. 37:7, desmeuō); a donkey is tied to a vine (49:11, desmeuō); Joseph is thrown into prison by Potiphar (39:22, desmōtērion); Samson is bound with cords (Jdg. 15:13–14, desmos). Because many in OT times suffered from the humiliation inflicted by chains and bondage, liberation from these was part of the salvation that awaited them: e.g., "Say to the captives, 'Come out,' and to those in darkness, 'Be free!'" (Isa. 49:9; cf. 42:7). The hymn of praise sung by those who have been freed recalls Israel's servitude in Egypt: "He brought them out of darkness and the deepest gloom, and broke away their chains" (Ps. 107:14; cf. 116:16 = LXX 115:7).

3. As with zygos, yoke (2433), desmos can refer to our true relationship with God, to the bond and covenant between him and us. Hosea speaks of the cords of divine love with which Yahweh seeks to bind his people to himself (Hos. 11:4), while Jeremiah complains of the godless nation that had torn off Yahweh's cords (Jer. 2:20; 5:5).

NT In the NT desmos occurs 18x and desmios 16x, chiefly in the Synoptic Gospels and in Paul's writings. Once again the lit. sense is more conspicuous than the spiritualized. The other words in this group occur infrequently, most often in a lit. sense (cf. Matt. 11:2; 13:30; Lk. 8:29; Acts 5:21, 23; 16:23, 26 27, 36; 22:4) in the context of prison, prisoners, and jailers.

1.The Gerasene demoniac tore his chains apart (Lk. 8:29). Pilate customarily released a prisoner at the festivals (Matt. 27:15–16). An earthquake broke the shackles of the prisoners in the jail at Philippi (Acts 16:25–27). Above all, desmos is mentioned in connection with Paul's path of suffering. In his farewell address to the Ephesian elders he speaks of the "prison and hardship" that await him in Jerusalem (20:23). Luke describes Paul's arrest in detail (21:18–36) and calls him ho desmios Paulos, "Paul, the prisoner" (23:18; cf. 25:14, 27; 28:17). But Luke also stresses that Paul was unlawfully imprisoned (23:29; 26:31), showing the apostle as a prototype of the suffering of the innocent martyr.

2. In his prison letters Paul sometimes calls himself "a prisoner of Christ Jesus" (Phlm. 1, 9; cf. Eph. 3:1; 4:1). In Phil. he connects his imprisonment with Christ and his gospel (Phil. 1:7, 13–14, 17), noting that it has helped to further the spread of the gospel. On the one hand, people in the prison and elsewhere know that he is wearing his chains for Christ's sake; on the other hand, because he is in prison, the rest of the believers venture to proclaim the gospel of Christ more fearlessly (1:12–18).

3. Occasionally desmos occurs in a fig. sense. The dumbness (Mk. 7:35) or paralysis (Lk. 13:16) of a person can be called a fetter with which he or she is bound. This bondage is not only physical; rather, the NT often saw its underlying cause in demonic powers. Eph. 4:3 speaks of peace and Col. 3:14 of love as a syndesmos, i.e., a divine bond that binds believers together (cf. Hos. 11:4) and sets them free. Ultimately, however, the Head (Christ) holds his church together (Col. 2:19). People can also be bound (desmeuō) by legalistic demands (Matt. 23:4) or be held captive to sin (syndesmos, Acts 8:23).

δεσπότης (despotēs), lord, master (of a house), owner (1305); οἰκοδεσπότης (oikodespotēs), the master of a house (3867); οἰκοδεσποτέω (oikodespoteō), be master of a house, rule one's household (3866).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. despotēs means (a) master of a house (who had absolute authority over his household); (b) master as opposed to slave; (c) owner; (d) ruler over subject peoples (transferred to the field of politics). despotēs often involves harshness and caprice, while kyrios (3261) emphasizes more strongly the idea of the legality with which someone acts. oikodespotēs, master of a house, became an astrological term in cl. Gk.; the planets were oikodespotai in particular signs of the Zodiac; in this context oikodespotēsis meant the predominance of a planet.

2. despotēs occurs only about 60x in the LXX, far less than kyrios. It expresses the arbitrary, unlimited exercise of power without any real conditions, This was foreign to Israel's concept of God, who experienced his lordship in his gracious, saving actions in history. Where despotēs is used (esp. in later writings), it emphasizes God's omnipotence (cf. Isa. 1:24; 3:1; Jer. 4:10; 15:11; Jon. 4:3; Dan. 9:8, 15–19; Wis. 6:7; Sir. 23:1; 36:1 = LXX 33:1). oikodespotēs does not occur in the LXX.

NT 1. In the NT despotēs occurs 10x. (a) God is addressed in prayer 3x as despotēs (Lk. 2:29; Acts 4:24; Rev. 6:10 [possibly alluding to Zech. 1:12]).

(b) despotēs occurs 2x with reference to Christ: 2 Pet. 2:1 (Christ the Master bought us—the background is the metaphor of the redemption of slaves) and Jude 4. In both passages the term is used in opposition to heretical ideas. The false teachers deny that Jesus is despotēs; the canonical authors emphasize here not Jesus' divine nature but his right to command and exercise influence and power.

(c) despotēs as earthly lords in the sense of owners occurs in 1 Tim. 6:1–2; Tit. 2:9 (in contrast to slaves; cf. Eph. 6:5; Col. 3:22); 1 Pet. 2:18 (in contrast to servants). Slaves are exhorted to be obedient to their masters in order that the faith may not be brought into disrepute by their disobedience. The word has a metaphorical sense in 2 Tim. 2:21 as master of the house. Those who purify themselves from false teaching are instruments for noble use, consecrated and useful to the despotēs; here Christ is to be understood as the despotēs.

2. oikodespotēs occurs 12x in the NT, esp. in Matt. (13:27, 52; 20:1, 11; 21:33; 24:43; cf. Lk. 14:21; 22:11), where it means the owner of a house or land, or a master who rules over his household. In Mk. 14:14 the owner of the house where Jesus intends to observe the Passover is called oikodespotēs. In Matt. 24:43, if the oikodespotēs had known when the thief was coming, he would have been watching. In the parable of Lk. 13:25–30 Jesus is the oikodespotēs, who will shut the door on those who come late; this term depicts him as the Lord of the kingdom.

In the context of Matt. 10:25, Jesus' opponents have apparently abused him and called him Beelzebub (cf. 9:34). How much more will the members of his household (i.e., his disciples and followers) be exposed to abuse? Here oikodespotēs is used in parallel with "teacher" and "master" (10:24–25) and characterizes the relationship between Jesus and the disciples as one of imitation of suffering.

3. oikodespoteō occurs only in 1 Tim. 5:14, where Paul gives directions to younger women to marry and "manage their homes."

δέχομαι (dechomai), take, receive, accept (1312); δεκτός (dektos), acceptable, welcome, agreeable, favorable (1283); ἀποδέχομαι (apodechomai), admit (622); ἀποδοχή (apodochē), acceptance, approval (628); ἀπόδεκτος (apodektos), acceptable, pleasing (621); εὐπρόσδεκτος (euprosdektos), acceptable, pleasant, welcome (2347); δοχή (dochē), reception, banquet (1531); εἰσδέχομαι (eisdechomai), take in, receive, welcome (1654).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the basic meaning of dechomai is to accept or receive. Letters, presents, and offerings are the principal objects. It can also be used in the sense of to receive words, i.e., to hear, understand; also to accept persons, i.e., offer hospitality. Human beings are generally the subject, who can accept things even to the point of enduring blows of fate. Rarely is the subj. a godhead who receives sacrifices and prayers. The corresponding noun dochē means primarily a receptacle; fig., reception of people, a meal for guests. dektos or dekteos indicates that which one can accept; also agreeable, welcome, favorable.

(b) apodechomai strengthens the positive significance of the simple vb. in the sense of welcoming, approving, agreeing, valuing. The common Hel. noun apodochē correspondingly means acceptance, approbation, approval. The verbal adj. apodektos has a similar meaning to dektos, i.e., acceptable, agreeable, pleasing. As with ek- or apekdechomai, it has the meaning of to expect or wait for (→ apokaradokia, eager expectation, 638).

2. (a) In the LXX, apart from everyday usage (e.g., Gen. 33:10, accept gifts), dechomai denotes primarily the readiness to receive and accept the divine word (e.g., Deut. 33:3; Jer. 9:20) and action (Zeph. 3:7). In Jer. and Zeph. it occurs in the negative declarations of judicial prosecution: Israel has not accepted Yahweh's correction (Jer. 2:30; 5:3; 7:28; Zeph. 3:2) and will therefore have to endure the divine judgment (Jer. 25:28 = LXX 32:28; cf. Hos. 4:11). dechomai thus obtains the further meaning of involuntary and necessary submission to disaster.

(b) eisdechomai, on the other hand, is found largely in prophetic announcements of salvation. Yahweh will regather his scattered people and receive them again into fellowship with him (Jer. 23:3; Ezek. 20:34; Hos. 8:10; Mic. 4:6; Zeph. 3:19–20).

(c) Occasionally, dechomai and dektos occur in priestly passages, in the so-called declaratory formula: "It is not acceptable." By this means priests made known the acceptance or rejection of an offering for Yahweh (Lev. 22:19–25). The decision about a gift's acceptance or rejection or repudiation in the mouth of the priest embraces a divine judgment as to whether the person bringing the offering is acceptable to Yahweh.

(d) In wisdom lit. dechomai characterizes the intellectually open and receptive life of the pious: The wise accept the words of wisdom (Prov. 4:10), heed commands (10:8), and receive insight (21:11). The word dektos gains a noncultic and ethical stamp in wisdom literature: "To do good is the beginning of the right way; that is more acceptable to God than to present sacrifices" (16:5 LXX; cf. Sir. 2:5; 3:17).

NT 1. In the NT the dechomai word group is found mainly in the Synoptic Gospels and in Paul, who also uses the compounds frequently. As in the ancient world and esp. in Jud., so in the NT hospitality plays a large role. Because of their wandering existence, Jesus, Paul, and the other apostles were dependent on the hospitality of others. Lk. mentions from time to time the friendly reception Jesus and Paul had among the people and in the congregations (Lk. 8:40; Acts 18:27; 21:17, apodechomai), just as Jesus and Paul willingly accepted those who approached them (Lk. 9:11; Acts 28:30). Paul thanks his congregations for their hospitality (Gal. 4:14; 2 Cor. 7:15) and exhorts them to be ready to accept others as well (Col. 4:10).

2. (a) Acceptance of disciples and apostles is not, however, simply a matter of an unwritten humanitarian law. On the contrary, Jesus' messenger represents his message and person: "He who receives you receives me, and he who receives me receives the one who sent me" (Matt. 10:40; cf. Lk. 9:48; 10:16; Jn. 13:20). The apostles' continuation of Jesus' mission means that the hospitality they are offered represents acceptance of Jesus and thus of God.

But Christ not only meets people through his messengers, he also confronts his church incognito in every unfortunate individual in need of help: "Whoever welcomes one of these little children in my name welcomes me" (Mk. 9:37; cf. Matt. 18:5; Lk. 9:48). God is being accepted or rejected in the sphere of everyday life by how we treat children and others.

(b) Thus, dektos, apodektos , and euprosdektos have lost their cultic content, as was already the case in wisdom lit. The offering pleasing to God now is the sacrifice of the individual life for daily service in the world (Rom. 15:16; Phil. 4:18; cf. Rom. 12:1). apodektos is used in 1 Tim. 2:3 and 5:4 to express what is acceptable to God: intercession for rulers, who also come within the scope of God's salvation, and the duty of children to parents. dektos occurs in Lk. 4:19 (cf. Isa. 61:2); Lk. 4:24; Acts 10:35; 2 Cor. 6:2 (cf. Isa. 49:8); and Phil. 4:18. euprosdektos is found at Rom. 15:16, 31; 2 Cor. 6:2; 8:12; 1 Pet. 2:5.

3. In the early Christian communities the phrase "to receive [dechomai] the word" became a technical term for the believing acceptance of the gospel (Lk. 8:13; Acts

8:14; 11:1; 17:11; 1 Thess. 1:6; 2:13); objects of this vb. can also be the kingdom of God (Mk. 10:15), grace (2 Cor. 6:1), and love of the truth (2 Thess. 2:10). Faith is the affirmative acceptance of God's rule, as a child accepts a gift (Mk. 10:15; cf. Matt. 18:3).

4. The Hel. word apodochē occurs only in a kerygmatic formula: "Here is a trustworthy saying that deserves full acceptance: Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" (1 Tim. 1:15; cf. also 4:9). There remains the application of Isa. 61:2 in Lk. 4:19, that with the coming of Jesus the acceptable (dektos) time of salvation has begun (cf. 2 Cor. 6:2).

δέω (deō) bind, tie (1313).

OT deō is used in the LXX mainly for Heb. ʾāsar, but only in a literal sense, never with the fig. sense of binding with an oath. It is mainly used for tying up humans (cf. Samson in Jdg. 15–16) or animals (2 Ki. 7:10 A). Love can be said metaphorically to bind (Song 7:5).

NT In the NT, deō is often used for tying up or securing an animal (Mk. 11:2) or a person (Matt. 14:3; Acts 9:2). In Col. 4:3 Paul's being bound is an expression of the mystery of Christ, a sign that even in the greatest affliction God's power is at work (cf. 2 Tim. 2:9).

deō is used symbolically in Acts 20:22, where Paul sees his plans and travels bound by the Spirit of God. This binding controls his actions like a command that he cannot avoid. The verb is also symbolic in Rom. 7:2 and 1 Cor. 7:27, 39, where it is used for the binding of husband and wife to each other.

The binding in Matt. 16:19 and 18:18 denotes both teaching authority (to determine what is forbidden) and disciplinary power (to place under a ban)—"binding and loosing" were technical terms in rab. Jud. These passages in Matt. are concerned with the judicial function exercised by Peter and the disciples. Wherever the message entrusted to them is rejected, it inevitably binds people to their unforgiven guilt to await the coming judgment (cf. Jn. 12:47–48). The authority given to the disciples is, therefore, fundamentally different from the authority claimed by rab. casuistry. Christian proclaimers do not know in the last analysis who have been loosed or bound by their message, for this rests alone with the divine Judge (for more on Matt. 16:18–19, → kleis, key, 3090).

In Matt. 13:30, the harvest is a picture of the judgment, and the binding of the weeds symbolizes condemnation (cf. also 22:13–14). Binding should not be confused with mistaken efforts to create a pure messianic community here and now by separating out sinners. The best illustration of Matt. 16:19 and 18:18 is probably 10:12–15, where people who refuse to listen to God's saving message are handed over to him for judgment.

1316 (dēlos, clear, plain, evident), → 1317.

δηλόω (dēloō), reveal, make clear, explain, give information, notify (1317); δῆλος (dēlos), clear, plain, evident (1316).

CL & OT 1. dēloō means to announce, make manifest, explain, set forth. It takes on the meaning of to interpret, clarify in Stoic philosophy. Later Hel. writers use it for the publication of divine secrets, such as those declared by an angel. It is not possible to differentiate precisely between dēloō and the other Gk. synonyms for this concept (see end of this entry).

2. dēloō has a secular sense in Jos. 4:7; Tob. 10:8. But primarily in the LXX it designates divine revelation. God makes known his name (Exod. 6:3), his purposes (33:12), his ways (1 Ki. 8:36; 2 Chr. 6:27), his mysteries (Dan. 2:28–30), and his covenant (Ps. 25:14). dēloō can also denote the revelation of God's power (Jer. 16:21) and glory (2 Macc. 2:8). The word is found frequently in Dan. 2 (14x out of 39x in LXX), occasionally in the sense of expounding, interpreting (2:5–47; 7:16).

NT dēloō occurs 7x in the NT, dēlos 3x. The vb. bears the everyday sense of making known in 1 Cor. 1:11 and Col. 1:8. dēlos in Matt. 26:73; 1 Cor. 15:27; Gal. 3:11 is also nontheological. In 1 Pet. 1:11 dēloō leads into the sphere of faith, where Peter states that the prophets tried to find out the time and circumstances concerning the Messiah, to which the Spirit at work in them "was pointing." According to 2 Pet. 1:14, the Lord "made clear" to Peter the nearness of his end.

In Heb. 9:8, the Holy Spirit revealed that the way into the sanctuary did not become visible as long as the first tent (the Jewish tabernacle) was standing, and that only with Christ, the high priest of the good things to come (8:11), did the fulfillment appear. Heb. 12:27 offers a spiritual interpretation of Hag. 2:6. The future shaking of created things spoken of here is an allusion to the everlasting kingdom, which is not transitory. In 1 Cor. 3:13 Paul deals with the final revelation of the day of judgment, which will reveal the true character and value of human works "by fire." dēloō here expresses not the imparting of knowledge, but God's final active revelation.

δημιουργός (dēmiourgos), maker (1321).

CL & OT dēmiourgos in cl. Gk. denoted magistrates and workmen, especially skilled handworkers. Beginning with Plato, the word also referred to the activity of God in creating the universe. The word group is scarcely used in the LXX (see Wis. 15:13; 2 Macc. 4:1; 10:2). Josephus and Philo both apply the word to God as the one who not only created but also fashioned the universe.

NT The virtual absence of dēmiourgos from the NT is not without significance. In Heb. 11:10 it is used of God as the technitēs and dēmiourgos of the heavenly city. The writer here uses a fine, rhetorical phrase to stress the excellence and abiding quality of the heavenly city as one built on firm foundations by God himself. In later Christian writing the word became more common; it also played a considerable role in Gnosticism, where the "demiurge" was used to explain the origin of the evil, material universe.

δῆμος (dēmos), people, populace, crowd, popular assembly (1322); ἐκδημέω (ekdēmeō), leave one's country, emigrate, take a long journey (1685); ἐνδημέω (endēmeō), be at home(1897); ἀποδημέω (apodēmeō), go on a journey, be away, be absent (623); δημόσιος (dēmosios), public (1323).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. dēmos means chiefly the people, popular assembly, population. The word often refers to the people in contrast to the king, the nobility, or the powerbrokers and landowners. In this kind of context dēmos could have a derogatory sense, though it could also have a feeling of pride insofar as it referred to free, self-governing citizens. The term diminished in importance in view of the imperialism and expansionism of the Hel. and Roman empires.

(b) The vb. endēmeō means to be in the homeland, at home, while the vb. ekdēmeō means to go abroad, go out of the country, travel.

2. In the LXX the word dēmos is found about 110x, chiefly to translate mišpāḥâ, family, clan, i.e., a smaller grouping within the whole people or tribe. In 1 and 2 Macc. there are a number of references to the dēmos of the Jews (e.g., 1 Macc. 8:29; 14:20–25; 2 Macc. 11:34).

NT 1. In the NT dēmos appears 4x, all in Acts. In 12:22 it refers to the pagan people who were present at the audience that Agrippa I gave to the representatives of Tyre and Sidon, and who flattered him in a blasphemous fashion. In 17:5 it is uncertain whether the group before which the apostles were brought in Thessalonica is the popular assembly or simply the throng of people who were present. In 19:30, 33, it is clearly a crowd that is meant, not a legal assembly (cf. 19:39; note esp. 19:33, where dēmos is parallel with ochlos, → 4063).

2. ekdēmeō and endēmeō are found in the NT only in 2 Cor. 5:6–9, where Paul plays with these words (3x each). The apostle longs for the fulfillment of Christ's work and his Parousia (4:18; 5:10), when he will receive a new body (1 Cor. 15:43–44, 48–53). In 2 Cor. 5 he contrasts two realms of existence: the this-worldly, present, earthly life, and the otherworldly, future, heavenly life. In the present time he, like everyone, has an earthly body: "We are at home in the body" (5:6). That means, however, that he is not living with Christ, i.e., in the heavenly sphere of existence; he is thus "away from the Lord" (5:6); that is, he is not among the true dēmos to which he belongs.

The clear and visible evidence of this is the earthly body in which Paul lives. Only in faith, which is a gift of God, a guarantee (2 Cor. 5:5) of the world to come, can the gap between this world and that other world—i.e., the present and the future—be bridged, and even then not visibly (5:7). For this reason faith produces the desire and longing to be with Christ and to enjoy full fellowship with him. This will happen only when one "is away from the body" and goes to be "at home with the Lord" (5:8). The present is thus marked by the combination of "already" and "not yet": We as Christians are not yet perfect or with Christ, but we live by faith with the certain hope that the consummation will come, at which time we will be united with Christ. Until then, however, whether "we are at home in the body or away from it" and with the Lord, we should strive to please Christ (5:9).

3. apodēmeō, to go out of the country, to travel, is found 6x in the NT, all in Synoptic parables. Matt. 21:33 (Mk. 12:1; Lk. 20:9) tells of a householder who rented out his vineyard to tenants and went out of the country. In the parable of the talents the man who is about to go out of the country gives his property to his servants to manage (Matt. 25:14) and "[goes] on his journey" (25:15). In these two parables apodēmeō represents God's absence and the fact that he has given his people an autonomy and responsibility of which they will have to give account.

In the parable of the lost son the younger son took his share of the inheritance and "set off [apodēmeō] for a distant country" (Lk. 15:13). The vb. here represents the action of going away from God. In the context of 15:1, it characterizes the kind of life led by the "tax collectors and 'sinners,'" who "were all gathering around to hear [Christ]."

4. dēmosios means public, i.e., belonging to the state (Acts 5:18). In the dat. form it is used as an adv., publicly (16:37; 18:28; 20:20).

See also ethnos, nation, people, pagans, Gentiles (1620); laos, people (3295); ochlos, (throng of) people, crowd, mob (4063); polis, city, city-state (4484).

1323 (dēmosios, public), → 1322.

1324 (dēnarion, denarius, a day's wage), → 5088.

1328 διά

διά (dia), through (with gen.), on account of (with acc.) (1328).

CL In cl. Gk. this prep. generally means passing through and out from, when followed by a word in the gen. case, and on account of, for the sake of, when followed by a word in the acc.

NT In Hel. Gk. and the NT dia acquires a variety of nuances it usually did not have in cl. Gk.

1. Means or instrument. From the local sense of dia developed the instrumental sense, which marks that through which an action passes before its accomplishment. In the phrase "faith expressing itself through [dia] love" (Gal. 5:6), love is the means by which faith becomes visibly operative or effective. Thus, Paul's view of the interrelationship of faith and good deeds is similar to that of James (Jas. 2:14–26). Likewise, at his judgment seat Christ will recompense us for both good and bad actions that have been "done while in [dia; lit., through the instrument of] the body" (2 Cor. 5:10). In 5:18, Paul emphasizes that God is the reconciler and Christ the divinely appointed means (using dia) of reconciliation (cf. Rom. 5:11; Col. 1:20). In 1 Cor. 8:6 Christ is portrayed as the mediator of creation ("through [dia] whom all things came and through [dia] whom we live").

2. Attendant circumstances. dia can also express the circumstances that accompany an action or state; in this function the prep. overlaps with en (→ 1877). Note the interchange of these two in Rom. 4:11, where the NIV translates "while he was still uncircumcised" for (lit.) "in [en] uncircumcision" and "have not been circumcised" for (lit.) "through [dia] uncircumcision." One cannot, therefore, insist from the prep. dia that Timothy received his gift through Paul's hand; it can equally be understood that he received his gift from God at the same time that Paul (and possibly others) laid hands on Timothy (2 Tim. 1:6; cf. also 1 Tim. 4:14). "By [dia] faith" in 2 Cor. 5:7 also probably belongs to this category of accompanying circumstances.

3. Cause or ground. dia can also mean "on account of," "because of." In some cases dia as means and dia as cause are juxtaposed. For example, Heb. 2:10 makes a reference to "God, for [dia followed by an acc.; because of] whom and through [dia followed by a gen.; by means of] whom everything exists" (cf. a similar juxtaposition in 1 Cor. 11:9).

4. Purpose. There is no unanimity among NT scholars as to whether dia can have a sense of purpose, but in several places it approaches this sense. For example, Jesus says in Mk. 2:27 that "the Sabbath was made for [dia] man," i.e., for the purpose of serving human needs not met during the rest of the week (cf. also dia in Matt. 14:2; Jn. 11:42; 12:30; Rom. 11:28).

The alleged instances most often cited are Rom. 3:25; 4:25, although it is questionable to use a meaning of purpose here since it is so infrequent, if used at all. In Rom. 3:25, Paul seems to be observing that the outcome of God's provision of Christ as a propitiatory sacrifice was the demonstration of his own righteousness, a righteousness that needed vindication because in his patience God had not exacted the full and proper penalty for sins committed previously. That is, the phrase dia tēn paresin probably means "on account of his passing over," not "with a view to his forgiving."

The matter is more complex in Rom. 4:25 ("he was delivered over to death for [dia] our sins and was raised to life for [dia] our justification"). The parallelism here would suggest that dia be taken in the same sense in each instance, yet a causal sense is difficult in 4:25b (i.e., "and was raised to life because of our justification"). Three solutions may be mentioned (in ascending order of probability). (i) dia denotes purpose in both clauses: "in order to deal with" (4:25a; cf. 1 Cor. 15:3); "in order to effectuate" (Rom. 4:25b). (ii) dia is causal in 4:25a ("because of"; cf. the LXX of Isa. 53:12,) but denotes purpose in 4:25b ("in order to achieve"). (iii) dia is causal in both clauses: "because of [the need to atone for] our sins" (4:25a); "because of [the need to achieve] our justification" (4:25b).

1330 (diaballō, accuse, bring charges with hostile intent), → 1333.

1333 διάβολος

διάβολος (diabolos), adj., slanderous; noun, slanderer, the devil (1333); διαβάλλω (diaballō), accuse, bring charges with hostile intent (1330); Βεελζεβούλ (Beelzeboul), Beelzebul, Beelzebub (1015); Βελιάρ (Beliar), Beliar, Belial (1016); Σατανᾶς (Satanas), the Adversary, Satan (4928).

CL & OT 1. diaballō means to throw over or across, divide, set at variance, accuse, bring charges, slander, deceive. From the vb. is derived the noun diabolos, slanderer, accuser, devil. It is hardly found outside the NT and LXX.

2. In the LXX diabolos occurs 22x (13x in Job 1–2). Except for Est. 7:4 and 8:1, it is always a translation of Heb. śāṭān, which is also transcribed 3x in the LXX simply as satan (1 Ki. 11:14, 23a, 25b). śāṭān, however, is also translated by other Gk. words. In the OT śāṭān refers to an adversary or wicked opponent; it rarely denotes the devil in the later sense of the word (i.e., an evil spiritual being opposing God). For example, in 1 Sam. 29:4 it is used of a potential saboteur in the ranks; in 1 Ki. 11:23, 25 it denotes the leader of a faction and later Syrian king Rezon (but see also Ps. 109:6, where the LXX gives diabolos). śāṭān is also used of the angel who stood in Balaam's way (Num. 22:22, 32).

It is in the prologue to Job that Satan first appears as a heavenly being who accuses the righteous to God's face (the public prosecutor in heaven!). He similarly appears in Zech. 3:1–2. The word is first used as a personal name in 1 Chr. 21:1, where Satan entices David to undertake the census of the people.

3. (a) In intertestamental Jud. the devil is often identified with the "evil inclination" and with the "angel of death." He now has a clearly evil character. As in the OT, he is the accuser of human beings before God. The fall of the angels plays a large role (linked with Gen. 6:1–6; → 1 Enoch 86:1–88:3; Jub. 5:1–12). The impure spirits who deceived Noah's grandsons are children of "the Watchers" (19:28). The majority of these spirits were destroyed, but a tenth remained, and with these Mastema is able to carry out his purpose among humankind (10:8). For the rest, the demons stand alongside Satan in their own right, while he functions as the sole accuser before God.

Satan tries above all to disrupt the relationship between God and Israel, but he also tries to separate the rest of humankind from God. It is only later traditions that state that Satan had been an angel of high rank. The rabbis allowed that human beings had free will, to enable them to keep the law and to ward off the evil inclination or Satan.

(b) In the writings of Qumran Belial appears as the name of the evil spirit, the angel of darkness. He lives in the hearts of his followers, the "sons of darkness" (1QS 1:10) and rules in the preacher of apostasy (CD 12:2). The enemies of the righteous are filled with "guiles of Belial" (1QH 2:16–17; 6:21; 7:4). Fornication, riches, and defilement of the temple are the "three traps of Belial" (CD 4:15). Belial threatens the world and the righteous (1QH 3:29, 32; 5:39), but God protects his righteous ones (1QM 14:9). Belial and his followers are solemnly cursed (1QS 2:4–9; 1QM 13:4–5). In the last days, after the Qumran community has cut itself off from the rest of the people, Belial is let loose against Israel (CD 4:13). At the end of the final war, the "sons of darkness," who constitute Belial's army (1QM 1:1, 13), will be destroyed (11:8–9).

4. Beelzeboul is an indeclinable noun. The origin and meaning of this name are not entirely clear. In 2 Ki. 1:2–3 baʿal zᵉbûb, lord of the flies, appears to be god of Ekron. Beelzeboul may be derived from baʿal zᵉbûl, lord of the heights—i.e., of heaven—but more likely it comes from baʿal zibbûl (from post-OT Heb. zebel, manure, dung; zibbûl meaning an idolatrous sacrifice)—lord of the idol, which is equated to dung.

NT 1. In the NT diabolos occurs 37x, Satanas 36x, Beelzeboul 7x. In addition, there are the following names: the enemy (→ echthros, 2398), the evil one (→ ponēros, 4505), the prince (archōn, → archē, beginning, 794) of this world, the adversary (antidikos, which is a literal translation of the OT śāṭān, 1 Pet. 5:8; → echthros, 2398). diaballō is used only in Lk. 16:1 of the unjust steward who was (justly) accused of and denounced for embezzlement.

2. Matt. 25:41 refers to the angels of the devil. In the account of Jesus' temptation (Matt. 4:1–11; Lk. 4:1–13), the devil arrogates to himself the position of a lord of the world, hoping by this transference of title to deter Jesus from his way. Appropriately he is called the "prince of this world" in Jn. 12:31; 14:30; 16:11. The residence of the devil is not hell; rather, the eternal fire is prepared for the devil and all his angels (Matt. 25:41). As in the OT, he has access to God in order to accuse humankind (Jn. 12:31; 16:11). Hence, Jesus prays for the faith of his disciples and teaches them to pray for deliverance from the evil one (Matt. 6:13).

According to Lk. 10:18, Jesus saw Satan's downfall. This follows the joyful return of the seventy-two, who tell Jesus: "Lord, even the demons submit to us in your name" (10:17). Rev. 12:5, 7–12 links this fall of Satan with Jesus' appearance and his ascension into heaven. In 12:9 diabolos and Satanas stand side by side as words of equal significance and weight, while in 12:8 this figure is described as a dragon (drakōn, → 1532) or serpent (ophis, → 4058), and in 12:10 as accuser (katēgōr; → katēgoros, 2991). This breaks up the dualistic view of the world held in Qumran: Jesus has defeated and disarmed the devil and can thus rob him of his plunder, i.e., Jesus is able to heal those who are demon-possessed (Matt. 12:27–29).

But even though Satan has been thrown out of heaven, this does not prevent him from being able to act. The unbelieving Jews are of their father, the devil (Jn. 8:44). Peter is addressed as "Satan" because he tried to turn Jesus back from his way of suffering obedience (Matt. 16:23). Satan also entered Judas as he was preparing to betray Jesus (Lk. 22:3; Jn. 13:27). Satan can but does not necessarily stand behind illness (Lk. 13:16; cf. Acts 10:38; 2 Cor. 12:7). In the parable of the sower, "the evil one" (Matt. 13:19), "Satan" (Mk. 4:15), or "the devil" (Lk. 8:12) snatches the saving word from human hearts lest they believe and are saved.

A person who tries to impede God's word of salvation can also be called diabolos. For instance, in the parable of the wheat and the weeds (Matt. 13:24–30), the presence of "evil" in the community is explained through the activity of an "enemy." The parable teaches that there is no such thing as an absolutely pure church; the church on earth will inevitably be a mixed body. Separation is the special task of the eschatological judge. On "evil" or "the evil one" in the Lord's Prayer, → ponēros, evil (4505).

3. (a) In Paul's letters diabolos occurs 8x (Eph. 4:27; 6:11; 1 Tim. 3:6–7, 11; 2 Tim. 2:26; 3:3; Tit. 2:3) and Satanas 10x (Rom. 16:20; 1 Cor. 5:5; 7:5; 2 Cor. 2:11; 11:14; 12:7; 1 Thess. 2:18; 2 Thess. 2:9; 1 Tim. 1:20; 5:15). In 2 Cor. 6:15 Paul makes use of the name Belial, found in the writings of Qumran. Paul attributes many misfortunes and difficulties to the work of Satan. The thorn in the flesh is a "messenger of Satan" sent to bruise him (2 Cor. 12:7). Satan wants to outwit Paul (2:11). To prevent Paul from making his journey (1 Thess. 2:18), Satan can change himself into an angel of light and with this disguise disseminate impure thoughts through those he sends out (2 Cor. 11:14). He tempts Christian communities (1 Cor. 7:5; 2 Cor. 2:11). He is wily and deceitful (Eph. 6:11), sets traps (1 Tim. 3:7; 2 Tim. 2:26), and is encountered in calamity and sin as the ruler of the air (Eph. 2:2).

(b) In 1 Cor. 5:5 the notorious sinner is to be excluded from the congregation and given over to Satan "so that his sinful nature may be destroyed." Interpretations on the meaning of this verse abound. Perhaps behind these disciplinary instructions stands the Jewish conception of Satan as master of destruction and as executor of the divine wrath, from whose control becoming a member of the congregation secured freedom, and into whose control the culprit is now thrown back. But Paul's language here may also reflect the LXX of Job 2:6, where the Lord delivered Job into Satan's hand, not to kill him but to test him. In any case, the intended result of this process is to make it possible for the spirit of this man to be ultimately saved. Accordingly, Hymenaeus and Alexander are handed over to Satan to be punished and dissuaded from their blasphemies (1 Tim. 1:20).

4. The devil's area of activity is primarily the non-Christian world (Acts 26:18; cf. 2 Cor. 6:16), and hence magic is bound up with him (Acts 13:10). An apocalyptic story, presumably originating from the Assumption of Moses and telling of an attack of the devil on the archangel Michael, is presupposed in Jude 9 (→ blasphēmeō, revile, 1059). Acts 5:3; Rev. 2:9–10; 20:7 also speak of Satan's fight against the Christian community.

5. At the time of the end Satan will send the Antichrist (2 Thess. 2:3–12; the beast of Rev. 13:17). Matt. 25:41; Rev. 20:10 (cf. 1 Jn. 3:8; Heb. 2:14); and possibly Rom. 16:20 speak of the destruction of the devil at the end. Angry and violent, he realizes that until then he only has a little time and rages wildly against God's people (Rev. 12:12, 16–17). On the binding of Satan in Rev. 20 → chilias, thousand, 5942.

6. Our help against temptation and the tricks of the devil is the armor of God (Eph. 6:11, 16), a determined turning to God (Jas. 4:7), and a sober and alert faith. This alone will cause the devil to lose his power, although he paces about like a roaring lion, irritated and dangerous (1 Pet. 5:8). The ultimate reason for his defeat, however, is the "blood of the Lamb" (Rev. 12:11), that is, the victory of Jesus through his death on the cross.

7. The NT contains no speculations about the origin or nature of the devil. Satan is also not equated with the evil inclination or with the angel of death. Indeed, death and the devil are distinguished (Rev. 20:10, 14), though Satan has power over death (Heb. 2:14).

8. In Jn.'s writings are occasional references to the role of the devil in the early history of Genesis 3 (Rev. 12:9; cf. Jn. 8:44; 1 Jn. 3:8). Jewish exegesis interpreted the serpent as the devil. Thus, the devil is a sinner right from the beginning (1 Jn. 3:8) and has been a murderer from the beginning (Jn. 8:44b). He does not have a share in the truth; when he lies, he speaks on his own account (8:44c).

But it is noteworthy here that dependence on the power of the devil can show itself both in actions and decisions. The effects of this are expressed in John by means of the predicative statements of descent and relationship. One who sins belongs to the devil, like Cain (1 Jn. 3:8, 12); or he is a devil himself, like Judas, the betrayer (Jn. 6:70). Hence, the children of God can stand over against the children of the devil (1 Jn. 3:10). Jesus' enemies are called children of the devil, i.e., those who share his nature and behavior (Jn. 8:44). When "young men" succeed in defeating the evil one (1 Jn. 2:13–14), it is a gift of Christ (cf. Jn. 17:15).

9. Beelzeboul in the NT is the name of a chief demon. Jesus' enemies accuse him of being possessed by him (Mk. 3:22; cf. Matt. 9:34; 12:24; Lk. 11:15; cf. also Matt. 10:25; 12:27; Lk. 11:18–19 for further use of the name). Similar charges persist in Jewish sources, ascribing Jesus' works to magic (e.g., b. Sanh. 43a; cf. 107b; b. Soṭah 47a). In reply Jesus reminds his accusers that if that were so, Satan and his kingdom would be divided, since he would be fighting against himself. That would be good news, signaling his end. Jesus follows up these comments with the parable of binding the strong man (Mk. 3:23–30; cf. Matt. 12:25–37; Lk. 11:17–23). Satan is the strong man who is enslaving people through sin, demon-possession, sickness, and death. Jesus' casting out of demons means that one stronger than Satan has come, restraining his activity and releasing the enslaved.

Note that by substituting "Satan" for "Beelzebub" in his reply in Mk. 3:23, Jesus puts this controversy in the perspective of a direct confrontation with Satan. Since it is unlikely that Satan fights against himself, this means that Jesus is certainly not casting out demons by the prince of demons. After all, there is much evidence that Satan continues his work. Some people are possessed by demons, and it is the mission of Jesus and his disciples to cast them out (cf. Mk. 3:15). Moreover, Satan is active among those who oppose Jesus and attribute the work of the Holy Spirit (3:29) to Beelzebub.

διαθήκη (diathēkē), covenant (1347).

CL & OT 1. diathēkē in cl. Gk. means will or testament. It denotes an irrevocable decision, which cannot be altered or canceled. A prerequisite of its effectiveness before the law is the death of the disposer. Hence diathēkē must be clearly distinguished from synthēkē, agreement, in which two partners accept reciprocal obligations.

2. In the LXX diathēkē occurs 270x for Heb. bᵉrît, covenant. (a) It may denote a covenant between two friends (1 Sam. 18:3), which was regarded as having legal force (20:8); a covenant between two rulers, fixing their spheres of interest (Gen. 21:25–32; 26:26–29; 1 Ki. 5:12) or terms of peace (20:34 = LXX 21:34); a covenant between two kings, which included their peoples. Two tribes could also make a covenant (Jos. 9:15–16). Linguistically, the LXX could have used synthēkē in these examples.

(b) The situation was somewhat different when a king made a covenant with his subjects (2 Ki. 11:4) or when a group became subjects of a leader (1 Sam. 11:1). The covenant made by Abner with David (2 Sam. 3:12–13) was intended to make all Israel (3:21) subject to David, not merely Abner.

(c) Yahweh's covenants with Noah (Gen. 6:18), Abraham (2 Ki. 13:23), and David (Jer. 33:21) are similar. Here the covenant extends explicitly to their descendants (Gen. 9:8–9; 15:18; cf. 2 Sam. 7:12–16), and the covenant with Abraham extends to Israel (Exod. 6:4–5). But in Jer. 50:5 (= LXX 27:5) the covenant can also be interpreted as a covenant of Israel with its God. Ezek. 16:8 speaks of a covenant with Jerusalem. There are exceptional usages of diathēkē, such as Yahweh's covenant with day and night (Jer. 33:25, not in LXX) and Jerusalem's with death (Isa. 28:14–18).

3. Since all these covenants were expressed by the same word, the Jews must have felt some unity behind them. Neither the relationship of the covenant partners nor the contents of the covenant agreement provided this, but there was a common pattern in how a covenant was made. There were six vital elements in such a ceremony: (a) the preamble, mentioning the names of the partners; (b) a preliminary history of the relationship of those entering the covenant; (c) a basic declaration about the future relationship of the partners; (d) details of the new relationship; (e) an invocation of the respective gods worshiped by both sides, who would act as witnesses; (f) a pronouncement of blessings and curses for keeping or breaking the stipulations of the covenant.

4. In Israel's covenant with Yahweh, the preamble is suggestive of the way in which Yahweh introduces himself (cf. Exod. 20:2, which, as in the covenant formula, is followed by a survey, however brief, of past events). This may be the source of Israel's unique interest in its history, which is seen as Yahweh's history, and hence covenant or salvation history. The third element reflects the thought that found its clearest expression in Isa. as the proclamation of salvation, the promise of divine faithfulness and peace (Isa. 54:10; 55:3). Since this promise cannot be revoked, God has proclaimed himself bound and has renounced all arbitrariness. This lays the basis for the gospel of grace.

When we compare these covenant promises of Isa. and those in Jer. 31 with the formula of the Sinai covenant, we realize that the details mentioned in 3(d) should not be understood as a condition to be first fulfilled, which would be followed by a reward for achievement. Rather, they are the regulations for the new life that God's covenant initiates (cf. Gen. 9:9; 15:13–16; Jer. 31:31). As in Deut. 26, Israel's reflection on its past history and the law belong together as instruction for its new life.

5. The relationship of the partners in the covenant is expressed by ḥesed, God's covenant loyalty (NIV unfailing love). This concept is understood in 1 Sam. 20:8 as protective action. Both partners—Yahweh and the covenant people—face one another in the bᵉrît. They are thus in a partnership, so they both share in the covenant meal (Gen. 31:54; Exod. 24:9–11), which thereby strengthens the fellowship of those involved.

The covenant did have a place in the cultus (Ps. 50), though the covenant and its renewal were not purely cultic acts (cf., e.g., Jos. 8:30–35; 24:24). The covenant belonged essentially to the daily life of the twelve tribes. The cultus could not guarantee the continuance of an intact, everlasting covenant. Yahweh alone, as founder of this covenant, could guarantee its continuance and with it the cultus in its true meaning. Only he could renew the covenant broken by human disobedience.

There is an essential continuity of the covenant concept throughout Scripture. Note the words of Jeremiah, for example, who links covenant and personal application of God's law: "'This is the covenant I will make with the house of Israel after that time,' declares the LORD. 'I will put my law in their minds and write it on their hearts; I will be their God, and they will be my people'" (31:33). Here is the same divine upholding of the covenant that is found elsewhere in the OT. The covenant relationship is summed up in the promise, "I will ... be your God, and you will be my people" (Lev. 26:12; cf. Jer. 7:23; 11:4; 30:22; 32:38; 2 Cor. 6:16; Heb. 8:10; Rev. 21:3).

6. The Qumran community attributed great importance to the covenant. They considered that the promise of the new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34) had been fulfilled in their midst and called themselves "the new covenant in the land of Damascus" (CD 6:19). While the Sinaitic covenant was for the whole people, the Qumran covenanters considered themselves to be its holy remnant, the pure community of the age of salvation. This explains their strict rules for receiving new members and their commitment to keeping the Mosaic law as it was expounded by the community.

NT While "covenant" is found almost 300x in the OT, it occurs only 33x in the NT. Almost half of these instances come in quotations from the OT, and another 5 clearly look back to OT statements. The few independent cases are almost exclusively in Heb., rarely in Paul and Acts, and never in the Johannine writings. In the three cases where the standard Gk. meaning of "will" plays a part (Gal. 3:15; Heb. 9:16–17), it is easy to recognize the intention of helping the Greeks to understand the OT concept.

These statistics are, however, misleading. The covenant question in the NT cannot be answered solely from the passages where the word is used. It involves a whole complex of theological ideas, including covenant terminology. There are three groups of issues: the question of the Lord's Supper, Paul's question about the relationship of the Christian church to Israel as the people of God, and the covenant in Heb.

1. In all four NT passages dealing with the Lord's Supper, diathēkē plays an important part: Matt. 26:28; Mk. 14:24; Lk. 22:20 (omitted in some MSS); 1 Cor. 11:25. The word is used only in connection with the cup (Paul and Lk. add the adj. "new"). The use of the formula "the blood of the covenant" with "is poured out" clearly alludes to the covenant blood of the OT (cf. Exod. 24:5–8) and with it the covenant Yahweh made with Israel. This means that the work of Jesus was, according to his own word, a taking up and fulfilling of the covenant statements of the OT (cf. also Jer. 31:31–34).

If the word diathēkē does not appear as often as one might expect, the reason is that the underlying thought has been taken over in the sayings about the kingdom of God. Linguistically, we can see this most clearly in Lk. 22:29 in the phrase diatithemai ... basileian, "confer ... a kingdom," which uses the same formula as "establish a covenant" in the LXX. The new covenant and the kingdom of God are correlated concepts.

Just as in the old covenant curse and blessing played a role, so also in the new covenant: The blessing is obviously the blessing of forgiveness of sins and membership in the kingdom; hints of a curse are found in 1 Cor. 11:27–32. Just as one could keep the old covenant only if one knew its ordinances, so in the Lord's Supper repetition is expressly intended to produce remembrance (11:25).

2. It is not easy to formulate Paul's attitude to Israel as the people of God. (a) The apostle can use only the word "mystery" (mystērion, → 3696) for the Jewish rejection of Jesus and their enmity to the gospel (Rom. 11:25). He does so in "great sorrow and unceasing anguish" (9:2). He is so deeply moved by this subject that his delineation of the righteousness of God given through Christ (Rom. 1–8) leads to an analysis of the inexplicable hardening of Israel, which nevertheless will lead to salvation in God's will (Rom. 9–11, esp. 11:11–16). This account reaches its climax in praise of the unfathomable depths of the divine action (11:33–36). In it Paul insists that Israel's rejection and unfaithfulness cannot cancel God's covenant. He also knows that the fellowship between Israel and the church cannot be removed, because it is based on the unity of the one who calls. In other words, God's people from now on include the church and Israel.

(b) In light of this, Paul concludes that a part of Israel has been temporarily hardened (Rom. 11:25), which has happened through God's will. God promised Israel that sin would be completely blotted out and that all obstacles between God and humanity would be removed. This is the force of the quotation from Isa. 59:20–21 in Rom. 11:26–27. It is, therefore, obvious that the fulfillment of this covenant promise is still to be awaited with regard to the remnant of Israel, so long as the hardening still exists.

(c) To make this clearer still, in Gal. 3:15 Paul examines the Gk. concept of a will, which cannot be annulled. If that is so with a human will, how much less can God's covenant with Israel be annulled (3:17), through which Israel received such incomparable privileges (Rom. 9:4–5) and of which Paul the Christian can boast again and again (Rom. 11:1; 2 Cor. 11:22; Phil. 3:5)?

Since God's covenant with Abraham, which consists of the free promise, came into force (Gal. 3:16), something that was added later (Rom. 5:20)—the law (Gal. 3:17)—cannot narrow this promise or annul it. We as humans will never be able to use the law of God in order to establish our own righteousness. Left to our own power, we cannot keep the law; sin is too deep-rooted in our hearts. Rather, we are saved only by God's free grace through Christ's atoning death. As far as the law is concerned, it "was put in charge to lead us to Christ" (3:24). The one who clings to the law remains a slave child (4:25). Christians, however, are children of the promise (4:26–28) and thus free, and they belong to Christ without any distinctions (3:26–28).

3. In Heb. we find a fully developed covenant theology (diathēkē occurs 17x). Since the high priestly office of Christ is the prevailing concept of Christology in this book, it expresses the new covenant in a cultic setting, which reflects the author's concern for such issues as purification, sanctification, sacrifice, atonement, and blood. He clearly contrasts the old and new covenants. The new is the better covenant (cf. 7:22). Its guarantor and mediator is Christ (8:6; 12:24), who through his death has brought redemption from the sins of the old covenant (9:5).

Against this background the author interprets the prophetic promise of Jer. 31:31–34, twice quoted (8:8–12; 10:16–17). By the promise of the new covenant the old has been declared obsolete by God and is ready to vanish (8:13). This does not mean that it has been completely ruled out, but that it has been overtaken and fulfilled by the new. In Christ the pattern (typos, 8:5) or reality (eikōn, 10:1) of God's one covenant has become apparent. The new covenant is founded on better promises (8:6; 9:15), but like the old covenant it is a covenant in blood (10:29; 12:24; 13:20). It is not, however, the blood of a sacrificial animal, but the blood of the sacrificer himself, the high priest, Jesus (9:13–15; 10:12–14). Hence, Christ's death was essential, for only through the death of the testator does his will become operative in law (9:16–17).

Seeing that the forgiveness of sins and the renewal of the human heart promised in Jer. 31:31–34 has become a reality in Christ (Heb. 10:16–23), the old covenant is explained as "a shadow of the good things that are coming" (10:1). With the coming of the new covenant, the old has been annulled in the sense that it has become obsolete and superfluous. At the same time, the writer of Heb. uses words from the old covenant (e.g., Ps. 95:7–8; see Heb. 3:7, 15; 4:7) to warn his readers against deliberate, conscious sin, for there is a point beyond which a person cannot return. We must make sure, therefore, not to harden our hearts in unbelief.

διακονέω (diakoneō), serve, support, serve as a deacon (1354); διακονία (diakonia), service, office, aid, support, distribution (of alms etc.), office of a deacon (1355); διάκονος (diakonos), servant, deacon (1356); ὑπηρέτης (hypēretēs), servant, helper, assistant (5677); ὑπηρετέω (hypēreteō), serve, render service, be helpful (5676).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. diakoneō first meant to wait at tables; this was expanded to mean to care for household needs, then to serve generally. The first meaning involved personal subjection, which was considered unworthy and dishonoring for a free man. But when used in the third sense it could denote service for a cause, e.g., for the good of the community or for a god. As such it was an honorable task, a fitting occupation for a free man. In general the voluntary giving of oneself in the service of one's fellow human being is alien to Gk. thought. The highest goal before a person was the development of one's own personality.

The derivative noun diakonia expresses the occupations implied by the vb. and means service, office. diakonos denotes the person carrying out the task—a waiter at a table, and later a servant in general.

2. Even though the OT has the concept of service and contains the commandment to love one's neighbor (Lev. 19:8), and although Israel knew charitable acts (as did the ANE generally), diakoneō does not occur in the LXX. The instances of diakonos are used exclusively for court servants (Est. 1:10; 2:2; 6:1, 3) and torturers (e.g., 4 Macc. 9:17). diakonia is used only in Est. 6:3, 5 and 1 Macc. 11:58. Instead of this word group in cultic contexts, we find the word groups douleuō (→ 1526), latreuō (→ 3302), and leitourgeō (→ 3310).

3. (a) diakoneō is found in both Philo and Josephus. Although Jud. at the time of Jesus practiced social responsibilities (e.g., to the poor), this was done mainly by alms, not by service (cf. Lk. 10:30–35). Lowly service (e.g., waiting at tables) was beneath the dignity of a free man (cf. 7:44–46). There was, however, organized care for the poor in terms of giving food. Moreover, there were common meals and alms. In the Diaspora, synagogues often set up a committee of seven for its service.

(b) Josephus writes that the Essenes served each other. He mentions regular contributions for the needy, poor, and aged (→ ptōchos, poor, 4777). Service to the poor and common meals, the latter possibly with eschatological connotations (1QSa

2:17–22), belonged to the fulfilling of righteousness and the expectation of the kingdom. The community's holding its goods in common had a temporary counterpart in the Jerusalem church (Acts 2:44).

NT 1. diakoneō occurs 37x in the NT, primarily in the Gospels and Paul's letters. diakonia occurs 34x, mostly in Acts and Paul's letters. diakonos (29x) is a predominantly Pauline concept, though it also appears in the Gospels.

(a) diakoneō occurs with the meaning of serving at a table in Matt. 8:15; Lk. 4:39; 10:40; Acts 6:2. It has the sense of service to individuals in Matt. 4:11; 25:44; 27:55; Mk. 1:31; 15:41; Lk. 8:3; 2 Tim. 1:18; of service to the church in Heb. 6:10; 1 Pet. 4:10–11. It is used specifically of the work of deacons in 1 Tim. 3:10, 13; in connection with the offering for the Jerusalem saints in Rom. 15:25; 2 Cor. 8:19–20; as an expression for the proclamation of the gospel in 2 Cor. 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:12; as an expression of Jesus' giving up of himself for others through suffering and death in Matt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45; of the voluntary self-humiliation of the disciple in Lk. 22:26–27; and of a person's following Christ in Jn. 12:26.

In other words, the concept extends beyond the limits of its former sphere of meaning. The eschatological saying in Lk. 12:37 points to a radical change in the previously held values. This is also true of 22:27, linked with the previous verse in which Jesus' humility becomes the norm for the life of the disciples.

(b) diakonia means table service in Lk. 10:40 and Acts 6:1. It is used in a general sense for loving service in 1 Cor. 16:15 and Rev. 2:19; for loving service through the making of a collection in Acts 11:29; 12:25; Rom. 15:31; 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:1, 12–13 (where the grace of Christ is clearly seen as the basis and motive); for the proclamation of the word and the Christian mission in Acts 6:4; 20:24; 21:19; 2 Cor. 11:8; 2 Tim. 4:11; for all services in the Christian community in Eph. 4:12; for service by angels in Heb. 1:14; and for ministry in the church in 2 Cor. 3:7–8; 4:1; 5:18; 6:3; Col. 4:17; 2 Tim. 4:5. Every service and every office, however, finds its meaning in the organic unity of the body of Christ (Rom. 12:7; 1 Cor. 12:5).

(c) diakonos has as its primary meaning the one who serves at table (Matt. 22:13, where there is an eschatological note; Jn. 2:5, 9). It means a servant in a wider sense in Matt. 20:26; Mk. 10:43, and a helper in Eph. 6:21; Col. 4:7. Esp. in Paul, the word receives a specifically Christian sense; e.g., a servant of the new covenant (2 Cor. 3:6), of righteousness (11:15), of Christ (11:23; Col. 1:7; 1 Tim. 4:6), of God (2 Cor. 6:4), of the gospel (Eph. 3:7; Col. 1:23), and of the church (1:25). Christ himself is called a diakonos in Rom. 15:8 (of Israel). In Rom. 13:4 the secular ruler is called a servant of God.

In Phil. 1:1 and 1 Tim. 3:8–13, diakonos is used of a man holding the office of deacon in the church; the same title is applied to a woman, Phoebe, in Rom. 16:1 (the same office may be intended by 1 Tim. 3:11). Sometimes diakonos is replaced by hypēretēs (e.g., Lk. 1:2; Acts 26:16; 1 Cor. 4:1). Elsewhere in the NT hypēretēs means the (armed) servant of someone in authority (e.g., Matt. 26:58; Jn. 18:3, 12, 18, 22). The vb. hypēreteō, serve, render service, occurs in Acts 13:36 (of David serving God); 20:34 (of Paul tending to his own needs); 24:23 (of Paul's friends tending to his necessities).

2. The NT meaning of diakoneō is derived from the person of Jesus and his gospel. It becomes a term denoting loving action for brother or sister and neighbor, which in turn is derived from divine love; it also describes the outworking of koinōnia, fellowship.

When Jesus served his disciples and humanity in general, he was demonstrating God's love as God willed it. "I am among you as one who serves" (Lk. 22:27; cf. Jn. 13:1–15), and "The Son of man did not come to be served, but to serve" (Matt. 20:28).

Jesus washed his disciples' feet as an example (Jn. 13:15) to challenge the disciples; the leader among them was to be as one who serves (Lk. 22:26; cf. Matt. 20:26). Each person should serve with the gift God has given him or her (1 Pet. 4:10). Anyone who gives food to the hungry, shelters the homeless, clothes the naked, or visits the sick and imprisoned (Matt. 25:35–36) is serving Christ himself. The service done to Jesus on earth, esp. by women (cf. Lk. 7:44–50; 8:3), will not be forgotten (Mk. 14:9).

3. The fellowship of the common or shared meal, which involved serving at tables (Acts 6:1), remains basic for the understanding of diakonia in the NT. We should think of the breaking of bread in private homes, of the love feasts in which the rich shared with the poor (cf. 1 Cor. 11:17–34), and of the house churches that had devoted themselves to diakonia, like that in the house of Stephanas (1 Cor. 16:15). This service, in which possessions were used for others, is the principal and foundational element of fellowship in the NT church (2 Cor. 9:13; cf. Acts 4:32–37; 2 Cor. 9:7). This service also extended from the local church to churches elsewhere that needed help (Acts 11:29; 12:25; 2 Cor. 8:3–4; 9:1–5). The spiritual and physical diakonia of giving and receiving took place in acknowledgment of Christ's sacrifice (2 Cor. 8:9; 9:12–15).

Such service edifies the whole body of Christ (Eph. 4:12), which is why Paul calls the charismatic gifts diakoniai (1 Cor. 12:5), services that form part of an organic whole. diakonia can also be used for each particular spiritual gift (Rom. 12:7), just as the deacon is one among all the others who serve.

Paul expanded the concept of diakonia even further. He saw the whole of salvation (i.e., God's service in Christ for and among humankind) expressed in the diakonia of the apostles. Already in the OT there was a divine diakonia ("ministry"), but it was expressed in the law and therefore brought death and condemnation (2 Cor. 3:7, 9). In Christ, however, the service of the Spirit, of righteousness, of reconciliation has begun (3:8–9), and this service has been entrusted to the apostle, who as Christ's ambassador proclaims, "Be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:20). Hence, the term diakonia is used as a technical term for the work of proclaiming the gospel (Rom. 11:13; 2 Cor. 4:1; cf. 2 Tim. 4:5). Even more, the whole church becomes a body for service in the world (Eph. 4:1–16).

4. (a) The difference between this word group and doulos (slave, → 1528) is important for one's understanding of diakonos. doulos stresses almost exclusively the Christian's complete subjection to the Lord; diakonos is concerned with a believer's service for the church and fellow believers, whether this is accomplished by serving at tables, with the word, or in some other way. The diakonos is one who serves on Christ's behalf and continues this service for the outer and inner self; such people are concerned with the salvation of others.

Hence, Paul can see himself as a diakonos of the gospel (Eph. 3:7; Col. 1:23), a servant through whom the believers in Corinth had come to faith in Christ (1 Cor. 3:5), a servant of the new covenant (2 Cor. 3:6), a servant of Christ (11:23), a servant of God (6:4), and a servant of the church (Col. 1:25). In this connection Paul was also concerned with the collection (2 Cor. 8:4; 9:1, 12–13) for the poor among the saints in Jerusalem.

(b) Paul likewise refers to his various companions and helpers, who stood with him in the work of proclaiming the gospel, as diakonoi (Eph. 6:21; Col. 1:7; 4:7) or, more often, synergoi, fellow workers (Rom. 16:3, 9, 21; 2 Cor. 8:23; Phil. 2:25; 4:3; Col. 4:11; 1 Thess. 3:2).

(c) Acts 6:1–6 also belongs in this context, though only diakoneō and diakonia are used. The Seven, who are placed alongside the apostles, took over the care of the poor in the church because the Hellenists complained that their widows were neglected in the daily distribution of food. However, they doubtless had spiritual functions as well, qualities that emerged when this particular ministry was terminated (cf. Stephen in 6:8–7:60 and Philip in 8:9–40; 21:8).

(d) The work of a deacon finally developed into a special office, whose beginnings can be traced already in the NT (cf. Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8–13). In the course of the church's history the office developed a standardized form, though its precise form is not clear from the NT. Nor does it seem to have been universal in the church. Originally all the various functions exercised in the church could be called "services" or ministries (1 Cor. 12:5). Hence, the various office-bearers (apostle, prophet, etc.; cf. Eph. 4:11–12) were diakonoi of the church (cf. 1 Cor. 3:5; Col. 1:25). But in the more specialized sense the concept of service was narrowed down to the material care of the church, which was closely linked with the office of the bishop (e.g., 1 Tim. 3:1–7, 8–13).

This means that for the diakonos there was always a task for spirit and body expressed by one's role in public worship, care of the poor, and administration. Service of God and of the poor were, after all, a unity, as the agape, the common meal often preceding the Lord's Supper, implied. Originally it was obvious that all were servants, standing in a fellowship of service, but the concept was increasingly eroded by the growth of a hierarchy with its different grades. The diakonos was retained in the Orthodox Church, but the diaconate became merely a transitional stage on the way to the priestly office in the Roman Catholic and Episcopalian Churches.

(e) The NT also recognizes the work of the female deacon, but her role is left undefined (Rom. 16:1; perhaps also 1 Tim. 3:11). This office is increasingly recognized in churches today. In the NT, this office seems closely connected with that of the widow (→ chēra, 5939).

5. In Rom. 13 Paul urges obedience to the secular ruler, even though he is not a believer, "for he is God's servant [diakonos] to do you good. But if you do wrong, be afraid, for he does not bear the sword for nothing. He is God's servant [diakonos], an agent of wrath to bring punishment on the wrongdoer" (Rom. 13:4; cf. 1 Pet. 2:13–17; also Matt. 22:15–22; Mk. 12:13–17; Lk. 20:20–26).

1359 διακρίνω

διακρίνω (diakrinō), make a distinction, judge, render a decision; doubt, waver (only in NT) (1359); διάκρισις (diakrisis), distinguishing, quarrel (1360); ἀδιάκριτος (adiakritos), unwavering, impartial (88).

CL & OT diakrinō (a form of krinō) has the basic meaning of judge, make a distinction, distinguish; separate, divide; render a decision, dispense justice. The noun diakrisis means separation, division; interval, judgment; and quarrel, struggle.

In the LXX diakrinō means primarily judge (e.g., Exod. 18:16; 1 Ki. 3:9; 1 Chr. 26:29), distinguish, make a distinction (4 Macc. 1:14); also dispense justice. The meaning take issue, to enter into judgment, is also attested (Ezek. 20:35, 36; Joel 3:2). The meaning to judge can be intensified to mean examine (Job 12:11; 23:10) and choose (9:14; 15:5). diakrisis is found only in 37:16, where it means clouds (this may be a mistake in translation by the translator).

NT 1. diakrinō is found 19x in the NT. In 3 instances it means to judge: the appearance of the sky, but not the signs of the times (Matt. 16:3), oneself (1 Cor. 11:31), and prophetic words (14:29). Twice it refers to God, who makes no distinction between Jews and pagans (Acts 15:9; cf. 11:12). The idea of making differentiating evaluation is found in 1 Cor. 4:7; 11:29; Jas. 2:4. As a legal technical term, diakrinō is found only in 1 Cor. 6:5, of dispensing justice between two believers (cf. Ezek. 34:17, 20). The vb. is used 2x in the mid. in the sense of take issue with, contend with: the circumcision party with Peter (Acts 11:2), and Michael with the devil (Jude 9).

2. diakrinō takes on the further meaning of doubt 8x (cf. the similar use of distazō in Matt. 14:31; 28:17). In Rom. 14:23 doubt appears as a lack of faith and thus as sin. Jas. 1:6–8 relates this to prayer: One must ask in faith, whereas one who asks in doubt is a divided person who lacks the power of hope. Matt. 21:21 and Mk. 11:23 teach that a faith that does not doubt can move mountains. A comparison with Matt. 17:20, where Jesus expresses the same idea with "because you have so little faith," shows that doubt is akin to faintheartedness. In Rom. 4:20 diakrinō comes close to disbelief: "[Abraham] did not waver through unbelief regarding the promise of God." Faith involves the promises of God; doubt is thus a lack of trust in those promises. According to Acts 10:20, if Peter hesitated (diakrinō), he would be failing to trust the Spirit, who was sending him on the road to Cornelius. Jude encourages us to be merciful "to those who doubt" (Jude 22).

Strictly speaking, doubt in the NT is directed against hope and confidence. Such doubt always arises in confrontation with the gospel, in that the possibility of doubt only exists where the gospel can be heard or seen. Doubt in the NT is an affair of the believer rather than of the unbeliever, although doubt can certainly lead to unbelief.

2. diakrisis is used in the sense of distinguishing: of spirits (1 Cor. 12:10), of good from evil (Heb. 5:14). In Rom. 14:1 it means quarrel or passing judgment. The noun is not found in the NT in the sense of doubt.

3. adiakritos, unwavering, impartial, occurs only in Jas. 3:17. Part of wisdom that comes from God is to be impartial in our relationship with other believers.

1368 διαλογίζομαι

διαλογίζομαι (dialogizomai), ponder, consider, reason (1368); διαλογισμός (dialogismos), thought, opinion, reasoning, consideration, argument (1369); διαλέγομαι (dialegomai), discuss (1363).

CL & OT 1. The meaning of dialegomai in cl. and Hel. Gk. is expressed by the Eng. word dialogue; it means hold a conversation. Philosophers used this word for conversation with teaching as its object: One debates and in so doing learns. The vb. dialogizomai, to consider, think through, is closely linked with it, as is the noun dialogismos, weighing, consideration, thought, discussion.

2. The LXX uses dialegomai to translate Heb. dābar, to speak, both of God and human beings speaking; it is also used with the meanings of to negotiate with someone, make a speech, sometimes to dispute, strive, contend. The related dialogizomai means to think, account, consider (e.g., 2 Sam. 14:14; Ps. 10:2 = LXX 9:23; 140:8). This vb. can be used neutrally, but more often has the depreciatory sense of harbor ill designs, intrigue (35:20; 36:4). dialogismos means thought, plan, purpose (e.g., 40:5; 94:11; 139:2; Isa. 59:7); it often denotes perverse, vain thinking that contemplates destruction (Ps. 94:11) and is turned against both God (Isa. 59:7; Jer. 4:14) and the pious (Ps. 56:5). We see this esp. in Ben Sira's picture of the fool's dialogismos as a wheel constantly turning round its axle (Sir. 33:5 = LXX 36:5). But the word is also used for God's profound (Ps. 92:5) and wonderful (40:5) thoughts.

NT 1. In the NT, dialogizomai and dialogismos are always used with a slightly depreciatory connotation. The thoughts of the human heart do not necessarily lead, as the Gks. thought, to a knowledge of the truth (cf. 1 Cor. 1:21–25), but are evil (Matt. 15:19; Mk. 7:21), full of doubt and suspicion (2:6, 8; Lk. 5:22; 6:8), full of greed (12:17; 20:14), moved by the passing moment (3:15), concerned with the superficial (Matt. 16:7–8; Mk. 8:16–17), and often sly (Matt. 21:25; Mk. 11:31). The decision humans made about Jesus shows what they really are and think (Lk. 2:35; cf. 2:34). Jesus unmasks his disciples' ambitious thoughts (Mk. 9:33–34; Lk. 9:46–47) and brings the attitude of faith to light through the example of the child (cf. Lk. 9:48).

In Rom. 1:21 Paul says that as a result of rejecting God, people became "futile" in their thinking; in 14:1 he speaks of "disputable matters" in how to live the Christian life (cf. 1 Tim. 2:8). According to 1 Cor. 3:20 we read that "the thoughts of the wise are futile," and in Phil. 2:14 we read of arguing (dialogismos) that is the germ of apathy.

2. dialegomai in Mk. 9:33–34 and Jude 9 means to argue, fight with words; but in Heb. 12:5 it is used of God's speaking through fatherly discipline. In Acts 17:2, 17; 18:4, 19; 19:8–9; 20:7, 9; 24:12, 25, the word refers to Paul's reading and exposition of the OT, activities that were, in theory at least, permitted to every adult male in a synagogue (cf. Lk. 4:16–21). Here the vb. becomes a technical term for Paul's teaching in the synagogue and approaches the idea of preaching, though it may have included dialogue and questions.

διασπορά (diaspora), dispersion (1402).

CL & OT 1. diaspora (derived from diaspeirō, disperse; → skorpizō, 5025) means dispersion. The word was first used in the LXX and occurs almost entirely in Jewish and Christian literature.

2. diaspora occurs 12x in the LXX. It has three different meanings: (a) the event or state of the dispersion of the Jews among the heathen nations (Deut. 28:25; Jer. 34:17 [= LXX 41:17]); (2) the community of those so dispersed (Ps. 147:2; Isa. 49:6; 2 Macc. 1:27; Pss. Sol. 8:28); (3) the place or country where the scattered Jews now live (Judith 5:19).

3. Although diaspora became a technical term for the scattering of the Jews, it is remarkable that it is never used in the LXX to translate the Heb. terms gōlâ and gālût, which denote their being led away into captivity and the exile. The Gk. words used for these words tended to have hard, negative ideas, suggesting captivity in a foreign country. diaspora, by contrast, is more neutral.

The change to diaspora reflects an evolution of Jewish thought. After wars of conquest, foreign rulers deported masses of Jews in order to break their military strength. The first large Jewish diaspora was in Babylonia, where Nebuchadnezzar deported a section of the vanquished (2 Ki. 24:14–16; 25:11–21) and where the majority of Jews remained even after the edict of Cyrus allowing them to return. The original deportation was seen as God's punishment (Jer. 17:1–4; Ezek. 12:15). But this outlook gradually dissipated, and out of the exile there grew communities of Jews who lived there of their own volition. Through the preaching of the prophets a more positive attitude toward the situation emerged (cf. Isa. 60; Hag. 2:6–9; Zech. 8:20–23): Through this dispersion God intended to bring all nations to himself (cf. esp. Isa. 40–66). Thus, the diaspora provided the motivation for the almost worldwide missionary activity among the Jews.

NT In the NT diaspora occurs only 3x. It is used of both the Jews and the church. Jn. 7:35 speaks of the dispersion of the Jews among the Greeks (cf. Deut. 30:4; Ps. 147:2). Jas. 1:1 and 1 Pet. 1:1 are theologically more significant. Peter directs his letter to "God's elect, strangers in the world, scattered (diaspora) throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia" (1 Pet. 1:1); James, to "the twelve tribes scattered (diaspora) among the nations" (Jas. 1:1). If these letters were written to Gentile Christians, this word has a special significance. The apostles see in Christians dispersed throughout the world a parallel to the Jewish dispersion. The true homeland of Christ's followers is not the place where they happen to live. It is in heaven (cf. Phil. 3:20), the Jerusalem that is above (cf. Gal. 4:26). On earth they are always strangers, living as aliens (→ paroikos, 4230). They are like God's seed that is sown far and wide, whose fruit will be apparent at the great ingathering (cf. Matt. 24:31).

διαφέρω (diapherō), carry through; be different, valuable (1422); διάφορος (diaphoros), different, superior (1427).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. diapherō has a trans. meaning to carry through or across. Intrans. it means to differ, be different from; sometimes, to excel or surpass.

2. diapherō seldom occurs in the LXX and usually with the intrans. meaning. The beasts in Daniel's vision are different from each other (7:3). There is no difference between the wrath of a king and the roar of a lion (Prov. 20:2). If someone loudly blesses a neighbor early in the morning, it is no different from a curse (27:14). diaphoros likewise means different (e.g., Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:9; Dan. 7:7, 19 [the last two in Theod.]).

NT 1. diapherō has a trans. meaning 3x in the NT. In concern for his Father's house, Jesus refused to allow anyone "to carry" anything connected with business through the temple (Mk. 11:16). After the preaching of Paul and Barnabas, the word of God "spread" (lit., was carried) through the region (Acts 13:49). The people on the ship headed for Rome "were ... driven" by the wind and seas for fourteen days and nights (27:27).

2. More important are the intrans. meanings (10x). Believers are of much more value to the Father than birds (Matt. 6:26; 10:31) or sheep (12:12). That is, to God human life is more important than anything else. As Paul reflects on the issue of the old and new covenants, he uses the analogy of an heir when that person is a child and when he is grown up. Until an heir comes of age, he is no different from a slave (Gal. 4:1) but is required to live according to law. But when he grows up, he is free from the laws of his father.

3. Paul writes that God has dispensed "different" (diaphoros) gifts according to his grace (Rom. 12:6). Heb. uses diaphoros to stress the superiority of Jesus' name (1:4) and ministry (8:6).

1436 διδασκαλία

διδασκαλία (didaskalia), teaching, instruction (1436); διδαχή (didachē), teaching (1439).

CL & OT 1. The noun didaskalia denotes the activity of a teacher. The word also occurs with a pass. meaning, i.e., doctrine (that which is taught). didachē, derived directly from the verbal stem of didaskō, means instruction or doctrine imparted by teaching.

2. (a) In the LXX didaskalia occurs only 4x. In Prov. 2:17; Sir. 24:33; 39:8, it denotes the law considered as the will of God, while in Isa. 29:13 it means human doctrines, which by their very multiplicity are to be distinguished from the one will of God. The reason for the rarity of didaskalia in the LXX lies in the fact that its primary meaning in cl. Gk. is intellectual teaching with a view to knowledge, whereas Israel saw teaching as meaning the law of God, to which the only appropriate response was obedience.

(b) didachē is found only in the title of Ps. 60, "for teaching." The Heb. equivalent of didachē is talmūd, study (see, e.g., m. Abot 6:2).

NT In the NT didachē occurs 30x, the majority of which are in the Gospels and Acts. didaskalia occurs 21x, most of them in the Pastoral Letters.

1. (a) Jesus' preaching is called didachē (Mk. 1:22, 27), without any further details being given as to its content (cf. Mk.'s use of didaskō, to teach, → 1438). Mk. sees Jesus' teaching as having a close connection with his miracles, which are proof, so to speak, of the divine authority behind the teaching. In 11:18 Jesus' authoritative teaching is given as the reason for the scribes' plot to kill him, while in 12:38 didachē is extended to cover his polemic against the scribes.

(b) Matt. uses didachē in 7:28 to describe the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5–7), a portion of which is Christ's exposition of the law (cf. 22:33). Matt. also uses this word for the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees (16:12).

(c) In Acts didachē is used for the early Christian preaching and appears in a variety of phrases: e.g., "the apostles' teaching" (Acts 2:42), "the teaching about the Lord" (13:12), "new teaching" (17:19); these expressions denote the testimony of the apostles to Christ (cf. 1:21). Exposition of the Mosaic law, which Matt. describes as didachē, is no longer considered part of the teaching.

(d) Jn.'s use of didachē in Jn. 7:16–17 (cf. 18:19) points in the same direction. Jesus' message is described as teaching that comes from the Father. This message becomes in 2 Jn. 9–10 the "teaching of Christ."

(e) In Rom. 6:17; 16:17 Paul uses didachē to refer to the whole of his apostolic teaching. In 1 Cor. 14:6, 26 the word denotes one of several types of "edifying speech," all contrasted with speaking in tongues. In the Pastoral Letters, didachē seems to have become a given body of doctrine that is to be inculcated (2 Tim. 4:2; Tit. 1:9). This is indicated elsewhere by the fact that "teaching" is referred to as parathēkē, that which has been entrusted (1 Tim. 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:12, 14), and didaskalia (see below).

(f) didachē in Heb. 6:2 probably also means a specific set of doctrines ("instruction about baptisms," etc.), while in 13:9 the writer describes the teachings of his opponents as didachē (cf. Rev. 2:14, 15, 24).

(g) To summarize: In the NT didachē denotes Christ's message (with his call to repentance and faith) and the early Christian preaching in the widest sense. It is striking that no explicit distinction is made between a fixed body of doctrine (handed down by tradition) and the message preached at any given time. The fact that the early church, at a relatively early stage, possessed a more or less fixed body of doctrine is indicated by the brief confessions of faith quoted by Paul, even though he himself may not yet have viewed them as sacrosanct. The material collected in the Sermon on the Mount points in the same direction. Such compilations led to such works as The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (often called the Didache [cf. 2:1; 6:1; 11:2]), which were regarded as authoritative teaching.

2. This development can be observed in the use of didaskalia as well. (a) The phrase didaskalias . . . anthrōpōn (lit., "teachings of men") is applied to the teachings of the scribes and Pharisees in Matt. 15:9; Mk. 7:7 (quoting Isa. 29:13). The same text from Isa. is in view in Col. 2:22, which describes the doctrines of the false teachers in Colosse. Similarly, 1 Tim. 4:1 refers not only to the spirits of seduction and error but also to "things [doctrines] taught by demons."

(b) In all other places in the NT, didaskalia is in the sing. In Rom. 12:7 it means the teaching office, and in 15:4 it describes the function of Ps. 69:9, quoted in Rom. 15:3, namely, to provide Christians with instruction. In Eph. 4:14 Christians wavering in spiritual discernment are said to be "blown here and there by every wind of teaching."

(c) The Gospels and Paul's other letters, with their limited use of didaskalia (6x), form a contrast with the Pastoral Letters, where the word occurs 15x. In 1 Tim. 1:10; 2 Tim. 4:3; Tit. 1:9; 2:1, the word is qualified by the word "sound" and means that relatively fixed "orthodoxy" that the churches have received and that is their duty to preserve against heresy. The same fixed doctrinal tradition is called in 1 Tim. 6:3 "godly teaching," in 4:6 "good teaching," and in 4:16 simply "doctrine" (cf. 2 Tim. 3:10). The word denotes the activity of teaching in 1 Tim. 4:13 (cf. 5:17; Tit. 2:7). In 2 Tim. 3:16 we learn that the Scripture, inspired by God (i.e., the OT), is profitable for (among other things) "teaching." Finally, in Tit. 2:10 slaves are told that their behavior should "make the teaching about God our Savior attractive" (cf. 1 Tim. 6:1).

διδάσκαλος (didaskalos), teacher, master (1437); νομοδιδάσκαλος (nomodidaskalos), teacher of the law (3791); καλοδιδάσκαλος (kalodidaskalos), teaching what is good (2815); ψευδοδιδάσκαλος (pseudodidaskalos), false teacher (6015); ἑτεροδιδασκαλέω (heterodidaskaleō), teach a different, i.e., heretical, doctrine (2281).

CL & OT 1. didaskalos is widely used in cl. Gk. in the sense of teacher or tutor. The word covers all those regularly engaged in the systematic imparting of knowledge or technical skills: the elementary teacher, the tutor, the philosopher, even the chorus master, who has to conduct rehearsals of poetry for a public performance. Since a teacher's activity is confined to specific areas, didaskalos is often more closely defined by the subj. taught. In this connection it is interesting that Socrates did not want to be known as a teacher, for virtue was not something that could be taught. Epictetus, on the other hand, recommended himself as a teacher for those striving after perfection.

2. (a) In the LXX didaskalos occurs only 2x: in Est. 6:1, where it denotes a reader, and in 2 Macc. 1:10, which refers to Aristobulus, head of the Egyptian Jewish community, who dedicated an exposition of the Pentateuch to King Ptolemy Philometor. This second usage shows a new nuance to this word, for its roots lie in Palestinian Jud. and in the Heb. vb. limmad (piel of lāmad), to teach. Not just the word but the whole Gk. notion of teacher is foreign to the OT insofar as the latter is more concerned with obedience than with the imparting of information (→ didaskō, to teach, 1438).

(b) The situation is different in the Qumran texts, where môreh (Heb. word for teacher) occurs more frequently, though usually with some qualifying phrase like "of righteousness" (e.g. 1QpHab 1:13; 2:2; CD 1:11; 20:32). The title Teacher of Righteousness probably refers to the founder of the sect, who taught the true understanding of the Torah.

Other Heb. terms for teacher are maśkîl, instructor (e.g., 1QS 3:13; 9:12, 21), and rab, teacher of the law (from which the term rabbî [lit., "my teacher"] is derived). A Jewish rabbi at the time of Christ had the task of expounding the Torah and of giving rulings in matters of the law. He had pupils who studied his exposition and his rulings and were in duty bound to respect and obey him as their teacher. In the 1st cent. A.D., rabbî became the exclusive word for an officially appointed teacher of the law.

(c) Philo's usage conforms to that of cl. Gk. He uses didaskalos not only of Moses but also of God himself. In both cases he regards a teacher as one who imparts knowledge, not as one who lays ethical demands before others.

NT In the NT didaskalos occurs 59x, most of them in the Gospels. The word refers to Jesus 41x, of which 29x represent a direct form of address. In the Gospels didaskalos also applies to John the Baptist (Lk. 3:12), Nicodemus (Jn. 3:10), and the Jewish teachers of the law (Lk. 2:46). Elsewhere in the NT, it denotes the teachers of the church (Acts 13:1; 1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11; Jas. 3:1). In 1 Tim. 2:7 and in 2 Tim. 1:11 Paul calls himself didaskalos, a term that he uses alongside kēryx, herald (→ kēryssō, to preach, 3062), and apostolos, apostle (→ 693).

1. Jesus as teacher. (a) The voc. form didaskale, master, teacher, applied to Jesus (e.g., Matt. 8:19; Mk. 9:17, 38; Lk. 10:25) or to John the Baptist (Lk. 3:12), is merely the translation of the Heb. rabbî (cf. Jn. 1:38; 20:16, where this is made explicit; cf. also Mk. 9:5; 11:21). Jesus had all the marks of the rabbi: He was asked to give rulings on disputed questions of the law (Lk. 12:13–14) and on doctrinal issues (Mk. 12:18–34); he also had pupils. The later conditions for a rabbi, namely, study and ordination, were not binding in the time of Jesus.

Matt. tends not to use the vocative didaskale in places where Mk. has it; when he does use it, it comes from the lips of Jesus' opponents or from outsiders. Perhaps Matt. discards this title for Jesus because, being in sharp conflict with the Jewish rabbis, he wishes to avoid the too-frequent ascription of that title to Jesus. Moreover, Matt. tends to use titles for Jesus that are Christological in content (see also rhabbi, 4806). Mk. and Lk. use didaskalos for the most part quite spontaneously and without attaching to it any Christological significance.

(b) In addition to its use in the voc., didaskalos is often used absolutely in the Gospels to denote Jesus (e.g., Matt. 9:11; 17:24). It occurs in the saying in Matt. 10:24–25 ("A student is not above his teacher"), where Jesus describes the relationship between him and his followers, and in 23:8, where he admonishes his disciples not to call anyone rhabbi, for they have only one teacher, Jesus; he above all others is the Teacher, whose authority continues even after his death (cf. Jn. 3:2; 11:27–28; 13:13–14, where didaskalos is used with other Christological titles).

2. The teaching office in the early church. In 1 Cor. 12:28 didaskalos is mentioned as the third charismatic office of a triad (alongside apostles and prophets). Those holding this office had the task of explaining the Christian faith to others and of providing a Christian exposition of the OT. Later Paul adds a fourth office—that of the euangelistēs, evangelist (Eph. 4:11), but in both cases the teacher is appointed to a particular church (cf. Acts 13:1, where the didaskaloi are mentioned together with the prophets). Jas. 3:1, warning against too strong an influx into the teaching office (which the writer himself appears to hold), points out that the failures of teachers will incur severe penalties in the judgment. Heb. 5:12 refers to Christians who ought long since to have been "teachers," but who instead need to be taught again the first principles of the faith. In 2 Tim. 4:3 the word appears to be applied, ironically, to false teachers.

3. The following compounds may be noted. (a) nomodidaskalos, teacher of the law, is found only in Christian writings. In 1 Tim. 1:7 it is used of false teachers who desire to be teachers of the law but who are without understanding and have fallen into vain discussion. They evidently occupied themselves with myths and endless genealogies (1:4). In Acts 5:34 the term describes the Pharisee Gamaliel, who "was honored by all the people" and urged the other leaders to leave the apostles alone, suggesting that if the Christian movement was from God, they could not stop it (5:38–39). In Lk. 5:17 it denotes the Pharisees.

(b) kalodidaskalos, teaching what is good, is found only in Tit. 2:3, where it is a description of what the older women in the church ought to be.

(c) pseudodidaskalos, false teacher, occurs only at 2 Pet. 2:1, where such men are seen as counterparts to the false prophets of old. They will secretly bring destructive heresies and even deny the Master who bought them, but they will bring swift judgment on themselves.

(d) heterodidaskaleō means to teach a different, i.e., heretical, doctrine. It occurs only 2x in the NT. Timothy is urged to remain at Ephesus and "command certain men not to teach false doctrines any longer" (1 Tim. 1:3). These people were evidently the same as those who aspired to be nomodidaskaloi in 1:7. In 6:3 the test of such a teacher is whether he agrees with "the sound instruction of our Lord Jesus Christ and ... godly teaching." The character of those who do not is delineated in 6:4–10.

See also didaskō, teach (1438); didaskalia, teaching, instruction (1436); katēcheō, inform, instruct (2994); paideuō, bring up, instruct, train, educate (4084); paradidōmi, to deliver, hand down (4140).

διδάσκω (didaskō), teach (1438); διδακτός (didaktos), taught (1435); διδακτικός (didaktikos), skillful in teaching (1434).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. didaskō occurs frequently. In the act. it means to teach, inform, instruct, demonstrate, prescribe; in the pass. to be instructed, be taught; in the mid. to learn for oneself, to think out, to master. The word is used typically for the relationship between teacher and pupil, instructor and apprentice. What is taught may be not only knowledge, opinions, or facts but also artistic and technical skills, all of which are to be systematically and thoroughly acquired by the learner through the activity of a teacher. The word is not found describing an activity of the gods until the 1st century B.C., when the goddess Isis is said to cause people to be instructed in the things of religion and culture.

2. In the LXX didaskō occurs about 100x, most commonly in Deut., Job, Ps., Prov., and Jer. But in contrast to cl. Gk., the word here does not usually denote the communication of knowledge and skills (e.g., 2 Sam. 22:35), but chiefly instruction in how to live (e.g., Deut. 11:19; 20:18), the subject matter being the will of God. God's ordinances and judgments are to be learned, understood, and obeyed. They may be taught by God himself (4:1, 10, 14), by fathers in the teaching of their children (11:19), or by the godly, who know God's will. The fact that the LXX never uses didaskō for the preaching of the prophets is a result of the close link between teaching and the law.

3. (a) The use of words for teaching in Qumran documents largely corresponds to that of the LXX. What is taught are the requirements of God's will (1QS 9:13; 1QH 2:17), the laws of the covenant (1QSa 1:7; 1QM 10:10), and requirements for battle (10:2; 14:6).

(b) In rab. Jud., as indeed in the later portions of the OT (e.g., 2 Chr. 17:7–9), teaching is again used for the communication of God's will concerning our relationship to him or our fellow human beings, this will being discerned through the interpretation of the law. The Heb. word for teaching (limmad, a piel vb. form) is used as a specialized term for the translation of the Torah into concrete directions for the life of the individual. Hence, it is best regarded as pronouncing a scholarly opinion on the basis of scriptural interpretation.

NT In the NT didaskō occurs 97x. The meaning is almost always to teach or instruct, though the purpose and content of the teaching can be determined only from each individual context.

1. Jesus' teaching work according to the Gospels. It is the unanimous testimony of the Synoptic writers that Jesus "taught" publicly—i.e., in synagogues (Matt. 9:35; 13:54), in the temple (26:55; Mk. 12:35; Lk. 21:37), or in the open air (Matt. 5:2; Mk. 6:34;

Lk. 5:3). Only Lk. 4:16–21 gives details concerning the outward form of his teaching, namely, his standing to read a portion from the Prophets, then sitting to expound it (the normal Jewish and rab. custom). didaskō is used 13x absolutely as a comprehensive term for Jesus' preaching (e.g., Mk. 2:13; 6:6; 10:1; 12:35; 14:49).

While Jesus was on earth, he taught about God, his kingdom, and his will—all themes of contemporary Jud. He differed from his rab. counterparts not in his subject matter but in the radical way in which he handled these subjects, consistently applying all he said to concrete situations in our human lives and involving himself personally in the subjects under discussion. Instead of giving merely theoretical teaching about God, his providence, his grace, or his wrath, Jesus showed God's goodness and wrath at work in concrete situations (e.g., Lk. 15:1–32). Instead of speculating on the kingdom of God, he announced its nearness (Mk. 1:15) and so issued a call to repentance and a change of behavior (Matt. 5:21–48; Mk. 7:15). And instead of inculcating the type of legal casuistry that sought to ensure salvation, he told his hearers: "So in everything, do to others what you would have them do to you" (Matt. 7:12).

(a) Mark. In Mk. 4:2 Jesus' teaching consists of parables regarding the kingdom of God, a kingdom whose nearness has already been summarized as the essence of his preaching (1:14–15). In 2:13 didaskō describes his confrontation with contemporary Jewish legalism; in 10:1–12 and 12:14–34 the vb. introduces examples of Jesus giving his ruling on controversial matters, while in 11:17 and 12:35–36 the subj. of his teaching is a passage from the OT. Mk. attaches importance to the link between teaching and doing (6:2, 34). In other words, Mk. uses didaskō not only in the sense of teaching, i.e., giving practical instructions or rulings on the basis of scriptural interpretation, but also in the sense of preaching the kingdom of God and the gospel.

(b) Luke. Lk. frequently adopts Mk.'s use of didaskō and, where he does so, uses it in senses similar to those of Mk. This applies also to passages where the vb. is peculiar to Lk. (6:6; 11:1; 12:12; 13:26; 23:5). His view of what Jesus taught emerges most clearly from his account of Jesus in the temple (chs. 20–21), where the subjects are the law, future events, and matters concerned with Christology. The main thrust in Lk. is the nearness of God's kingdom. Lk. 4:16–21 provides an example of Jesus' work during his ministry: He reads Isa. 61:1–2 and points to himself as the fulfillment of the prophetic promise. Now is the period of salvation, which is already manifest (4:21) in his miracles; they are part of the teaching itself.

(c) Matthew. Like Lk., Matt. also retains the basic sense of didaskō: to teach, preach. As regards content, however, Matt. 5:2, 19 and 28:20 are noteworthy. In Matt. 5:2–3 (the beginning of the Sermon on the Mount), Jesus is shown teaching his disciples; hence it is they whose righteousness must exceed that of the teachers of the law (5:20). For Matt., Jesus is the teacher of the church, who supersedes the Sinaitic revelation and its rab. interpretations ("you have heard that it was said") in order to lay a new foundation ("but I tell you").

After Jesus' death, Peter guarantees this foundation (Matt. 16:18), holding the office of the keys, which to the Jews meant the office of a teacher. The foundation guaranteed by him is no new law, but the fulfillment of the old, now freed from rab. distortions. Only now does the original intention of the law become clear (19:8: "from the beginning"). These two verses (16:18; 19:8) throw light on 5:19: Those who live without the Torah live without righteousness. The follower of Jesus is called not to lawlessness but to a superior righteousness, the foundation of which is the law and Christ's interpretation of it. This is why, after his resurrection, this interpretation must be passed on through teaching (28:20).

(d) John. didaskō occurs 10x in the Gospel of Jn. (6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:2, 20, 28; 9:34; 14:26; 18:20) and 3x in 1 Jn. (2:27). In most cases, Jesus himself is the subject of the vb., while the theme of the teaching is always the message of Jesus as the one who reveals God; it is a message that demands faith and is recognized as the true message from God only by those who believe. The same is true in 1 Jn. 2:27, where the author encourages the church and alludes to their "anointing," which bestows on them the Holy Spirit, the source of all knowledge (1 Jn. 3:24; cf. Jn. 14:25). Hence those who have the anointing need no further instruction: they know the truth already (cf. 1 Jn. 2:21). One of the three instances in the NT of didaktos, taught, occurs in Jn. 6:45 in the quotation from Isa. 54:13, where those who come to Jesus are seen as fulfilling the prophecy, "They will all be taught by God." It is God himself who draws people to Jesus.

2. The disciples' teaching. (a) The Synoptic Gospels speak not only of the teaching carried out by Jesus but also of that undertaken by his disciples (Matt. 28:20; Mk. 6:30). In Lk. 12:12 the Holy Spirit is promised as teacher (cf. Jn. 14:26).

(b) In Acts what is taught is the resurrection from the dead (4:2), "the word of the Lord" (5:42; 15:35), or the message about Jesus (4:18; 5:28; cf. 18:25). In 15:1 is a reference to some who were "teaching" circumcision, and in 21:21 Paul is said to have been charged with teaching apostasy from Moses; in both cases the teaching arises from the normal Jewish practice of discussing the law.

In several places in Acts (e.g., 4:2), didaskō is linked with katangellō, to preach, proclaim, or with euangelizō, to proclaim the good news (15:35). However, if only because of the rhetorical character of these pairs of words, any distinction here between "teaching" and "preaching" seems inadmissible (see esp. 18:11, 25; 28:31). The context of these passages is the postresurrection message of salvation (cf. 1:1; 4:18; 5:21, 25, 28, 42; 11:26; 15:1, 35; 20:20), and it is, therefore, salvation as understood by the postresurrection church that forms the subj. matter of didaskō in Acts. Conversely, Paul is accused of teaching the Jewish people to forsake Moses, the customs of the Jews, the temple, the people, and the law (21:21, 28). Luke regards the essence of this salvation as having become manifest in Jesus (Lk. 4:16–21; Acts 1:21–22).

(c) Paul uses didaskō 16x (e.g., Rom. 2:21; 12:7; 1 Cor. 4:17; 11:14; Gal. 1:12). His earlier life had been governed by the traditions of the fathers (Gal. 1:14), which were "taught." In Rom. 2:21 he uses didaskō in the Heb. sense of limmad when he asks the Jew: "You, then, who teach others, do you not teach yourself?" Rom. 12:7 refers to the church office of the didaskalos, teacher, whose task it is to expound the principles of the faith (cf. 1 Cor. 4:17; → 1437). In Gal. 1:12 didaskō means to hand on a tradition. Paul's language is noteworthy in 1 Cor. 11:14, where he speaks of nature teaching; this idea may have a Stoic background. The use of didaktos in 1 Cor. 2:13 is similar to Jn. 6:45 (see above).

(d) A different nuance occurs in those letters ascribed to Paul that some scholars regard as non-Pauline. In 2 Thess. 2:15 ("hold to the teachings we passed on to you, whether by word of mouth or by letter"), the reference is to 1 Thess. and to (more or less fixed) oral traditions. Here, therefore, didaskō no longer means to hear the message in a concrete situation but to receive and keep teaching handed down (reminiscent of the teaching methods used by the rabbis). didaskō also occurs in Eph. 4:21, where the phrase "[you] were taught in him," like the previous phrase to "know Christ," refers to the conversion of those who are being addressed (cf. Col. 2:7).

It is difficult to determine the meaning of didaskō in Col. 1:28 and 3:16. But the reference is probably to the practical exhortation required of all members of the church. The phrase "with all wisdom," which qualifies didaskō in both passages, probably has to do with the manner rather than the content of the teaching.

(e) In the Pastoral Letters, it is Timothy's right and duty to teach (1 Tim. 4:11; 6:2); in 2 Tim. 2:2 teaching is the task of those who meet certain requirements, while in 1 Tim. 2:12 women are debarred from teaching. In all these passages what is taught is assumed to be "good" or "sound" doctrine (didaskalia, → 1436), which is passed on and preserved. The emphasis here falls on handing it on. In Tit. 1:11 didaskō refers to false teachers, who, for the sake of gain, are teaching Jewish myths and human commands. The sole instances of didaktikos, skillful in teaching, occur in 1 Tim. 3:2 and 2 Tim. 2:24, where it is listed among the qualifications of bishops and God's servants.

(f) Closely related to the usage of the word in the Pastoral Letters is its use in Heb. In 5:12 the author reproaches his readers with the fact that, although they should already have been teachers of others, they need to be taught afresh the first principles of God's Word (i.e., the basic Christian doctrines cited in 6:1–3). In 8:11 the word occurs in the quotation of Jer. 31:31–34, where the knowledge of God, which doubtless is also knowledge of his will, is the subj. of the teaching.

(g) The two occurrences of didaskō in Rev. (2:14, 20) refer to the activity of false teachers in Pergamum and Thyatira, respectively.

δικαιοσύνη (dikaiosynē), righteousness, uprightness (1466); δίκαιος (dikaios), upright, just, righteous (1465); δικαιόω (dikaioō), justify, vindicate, treat as just, acquit, pronounce or treat as righteous, make or set free from (1467); δικαίωμα (dikaiōma), regulation, requirement, commandment, righteous deed (1468); δικαίως (dikaiōs), justly, in a just manner, uprightly (1469); δικαίωσις (dikaiōsis), justification, vindication, acquittal (1470).

CL 1. All the words in this group derive from dikē (justice, punishment, → 1472). Dike was the daughter of Zeus, who shared in his government of the world. Zeus made a difference between animals and human beings: To the former he gave a nomos (law, i.e., that they should devour each other), while to the latter, in order to make human life possible, he gave dikē, justice, whose implacable enemy is bia, violence. In its basic religious sense, therefore, and in common with all things divine in Gk. religion, dikē is an elemental cosmic force that humans recognize as superior to themselves. It is not a standard imposed on the world by God but something inherent in the very nature of being and related to living together in society.

Later dikē was also regarded as punishment or as the goddess of punishment who pursued wrongdoers. In the arguments that preceded the creation of the city-state, dikē and its derivatives were first of all battle cries; later they became concepts basic to the whole ideas of the polis. Of overriding importance here was the idea that justice prevails when everyone does what is fitting for him or her.

For Plato dikaiosynē is basic to the structure of the state and the human soul; it is the chief of human virtues for Aristotle. To these philosophers, it was right and proper to accept the existence of utterly diverse social ranks with their accompanying degrees of power and to take upon oneself that which befitted one's own station. In other words, dikē acquired the status of the axiomatic, unshakable foundation of all human life.

2. Hence, the righteous person (dikaios) was originally someone whose behavior fit into the framework of society and who fulfilled rightful obligations toward the gods and one's fellow human beings. The observance of such obligations set this individual apart from the unrighteous. Hybris and uncivilized behavior were out of keeping with the character of a righteous person; thus, the term dikaia zoē ("righteous life") was applied to a civilized way of life, i.e., one that, unlike barbarism, adhered to the rules of an orderly society. Later the meaning was extended to cover the idea of conforming to a given standard. dikaion was particularly common as a neut. noun in the sense of "that which is [legally and ethically] right." It came to mean a legal claim.

3. (a) The noun dikaiosynē denotes the quality of the righteous individual but is also in itself the standard that a judge is required to uphold, the condition he seeks to restore. Thus it is impartial justice, one of the four cardinal virtues, along with phronēsis (prudence), sōphrosynē (temperance), and andreia (fortitude).

(b) The derivative vb. dikaioō means to put right (e.g., the law on violence); to demand as a right, regard as being right, pass sentence; also to give someone one's due, either in the sense of to punish or to declare righteous, justify.

4. Two other nouns derive from the same stem. dikaiōma means right action; judgment (either of condemnation or acquittal); ordinance, decree; legal documents, credentials. dikaiōsis means condemnation, punishment; acquittal; just claim; discretion, judgment as to what is just or unjust.

OT In the LXX the noun dikaiōma often means ordinance or statute. It translates the Heb. ḥōq or ḥuqqâ some 70x, and mišpāṭ 38x. Apart from this, the dikaios word group predominantly translates words belonging to the Heb. ṣdq word group. diakaiosynē normally renders the Heb. ṣᵉdāqâ and less frequently ṣedeq. The adj. dikaios occurs some 180x for ṣaddîq. The vb. dikaioō is used 22x to translate ṣādaq. Most of these words also occasionally translate other Heb. roots.

1. Righteousness in the OT is not a matter of actions conforming to a given set of absolute legal standards, but of behavior in keeping with the relationship between God and humans. Thus the righteousness of God appears in his God-like dealings with his people, i.e., in redemption and salvation (Isa. 45:21; 51:5–6; 56:1; 62:1). His righteous acts are extolled from the earliest times (Jdg. 5:11; 1 Sam. 12:7; Ps. 103:6; Isa. 45:24 = LXX 45:25). Those who long for redemption call on God's righteousness, i.e., they plead for his intervention (Ps. 71:2; 143:11). Israel's enemies, on the other hand, discover that God's righteousness is the root of their downfall (Isa. 41:10–11; 54:17). For Israel's sake, even the land may be restored through the gift of God's righteousness (Isa. 32:15–20; Hos. 10:12; Joel 2:23). Dwelling in the land, Israel enjoys God's righteousness (Ps. 24:5).

2. In the preexilic period, little is said about individual righteousness; the main concern is that people should remain within national righteousness. Access to it is denied to any whose life falls short of God's standards (Ps. 15; 24:3–6), God's righteousness being, in effect, salvation per se. On a purely human level, judgment is pronounced not in terms of "the guilty person is justly punished," but rather "acquitting the innocent and condemning the guilty" (Deut. 25:1; lit., "the just man is made just and the guilty man made guilty").

In general before the exile, a person's righteousness is not so much in relation to God as in relation to fellow humans; this behavior is regulated on the one hand by human relationships (e.g., between family members [Gen. 38:26]; between the king and one of his officers [1 Sam. 24:15]), and on the other hand by God's law (Zeph. 2:3). Amos 5:4–6, 14 and Hosea testify generally to a concern for righteousness before God through interpersonal relationships.

The exile marks a turning point, and thereafter the OT has no hesitation in speaking of the devout person's righteousness before God. Before the exile the pledge of God's presence among the people was their free, independent possession of the land, with his righteousness covering both the people and the land they owned. But afterward, God's pledge is his law, which provides clear terms of reference for righteousness among his people, and at the same time the framework within which a person may share in Yahweh's righteousness. Hence, when the psalmists refer to themselves as "righteous" (e.g., Ps. 119), they are appealing to their membership of that nation that Yahweh has permitted to partake of his righteousness, for, as the religion of Israel had long since made clear, God alone can pronounce a person righteous.

Such a claim on the part of a psalmist is, therefore, an act of testimony. The fact that an individual joins in public worship is evidence that he or she is not cut off from the righteousness of God. Moreover, the law is considered easy to keep, so by claiming to be righteous people are joyfully acknowledging the law to be the wellspring of their daily lives. Here and there, however, a note is already heard that one's own righteousness counts for nothing in God's eyes (Job 4:17; Ps. 143:1) and that everyone is dependent on his mercy alone (Dan. 9:18). Consequently, in the intertestamental period "righteousness" takes on increasingly the character of "goodness," which counterbalances the impartial judgment of God.

3. Outside specifically theological contexts, the Heb. root ṣdq is used in connection with weights and measures, indicating conformity to the proper standards (Lev. 19:36; Deut. 25:15; Ezek. 45:10), and correct sacrifices that have been offered in accordance with the prescribed ritual (Deut. 33:19; Ps. 4:6; 51:21). A righteous person in the law is one who is "in the right" (cf. Exod. 23:7; 1 Sam. 24:17; Ezek. 16:52).

The standard of righteousness must be seen against the wider background of the covenant relationship with Yahweh. His righteousness implies the same kind of appropriate conduct that in Israel upholds the law by means of judicial procedure. God's righteousness in the Psalms is a divine attribute, occasionally personified. "The LORD loves righteousness and justice" (Ps. 33:5); that is, Yahweh loves to perform righteous and just deeds (cf. 99:4; Jer. 9:24) and is concerned about upholding righteousness and justice. In some contexts righteousness amounts to deliverance (Ps. 22:31), salvation (69:27), victory (Isa. 41:2), righteous help (Ps. 71:24), healing (40:10), and perhaps even reward (106:31). Negatively, it means punishment of the wicked (119:75).

Because the nation found its focus in the king, it depended on him for its right-ordering and well-being; thus the king has a special place in maintaining righteousness in Israel (cf. 2 Sam. 15:1–6; Ps. 72; Amos 2:6–7; 5:12–15; Mic. 3:1–2). Within Yahweh's righteousness there is a place for punishment and deliverance. Thus, in the destruction of Jerusalem the city confesses: "The LORD is righteous, yet I have rebelled against his command" (Lam. 1:18). Nevertheless, Yahweh may still deliver Israel, giving sentence in his favor because of the character of Yahweh himself (Isa. 46:12–13; cf. 51:5–8, 17).

Isa. 56–59 begins with the call: "Maintain justice and do what is right, for my salvation is close at hand and my righteousness will soon be revealed" (56:1). Righteousness is the key to national recovery (58:8–14; cf. 60:17, 21) and will ultimately spread to the nations (61:10–11). This righteousness depends on Yahweh's gift (46:12–13; 50:9; 52:13–53:12), but it calls for a corresponding righteousness in the national and individual lives of the people (cf. Deut. 6:20–25; 24:13).

4. dikaios is used in the Apocr. as in the rest of the LXX, except that there are no instances of the meaning "in the right" and "innocent." "Righteous" is applied to God, human beings, and actions (Tob. 3:2; 14:9; Wis. 2:10; 3:1; Sir. 10:23); the meaning "just" occurs at Wis. 12:15; 2 Macc. 9:18. In the pseudepigraphal Pss. Sol., dikaios denotes the upright who trust in God and keep his law, as distinct from sinners (2:34; 3:4–8; 15:6). When applied to God it describes his attitude in discriminating between the upright and the sinner (2:10, 18, 32, 34; 5:1; 8:8; 9:2; 10:5). It is also applied to the Messiah in this sense (17:32).

dikaiosynē in the Apocr. is the righteousness or righteous conduct that makes a person acceptable to God (Tob. 12:9; 14:11; Wis. 1:15). It denotes God's righteousness in discerning good and evil and saving the good and punishing evil (5:18; 12:16). In 15:3 knowledge of God constitutes righteousness. In Sir. 42:2 dikaioō means to do justice to, punish, and in 7:5; 10:29; 13:22 it means to recognize or declare to be right or righteous. The vb. also occurs in the passive, meaning to be declared innocent or to acquit and even accept (18:22).

5. In rab. Judaism righteousness was identified with conformity to the law. Many of the OT laws, esp. the ceremonial ones, were no longer relevant as they stood, but according to the rabbis, they were intended to train God's people in obedience and to provide a way for them to acquire merit in his sight. The passion for obedience was transformed into a striving for merit, to ensure one's part in God's kingdom. Acts of charity and mercy were considered esp. meritorious, the former (ṣᵉdāqâ) comprising anything that could be done by material expenditure (e.g., feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, giving drink to the thirsty), while the latter were those requiring a moral effort (e.g., mourning with mourners; visiting those who were sick or in prison; cf. Matt. 25:35–36). However, there are many passages in rab. literature that show the power of trusting in God, quite apart from meritorious works.

Few qualified for the designation "a righteous man." It was believed that no one, not even the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, could achieve righteousness apart from God's grace, but that (as it were) "God helps those who help themselves." In the day of judgment merits will be weighed against demerits. Should there be an even balance, some maintained that the persons concerned will go to hell, emerging later when purification is complete, while others believed that God will make use of his own great riches and of the merits of the righteous.

6. The Qumran community seems to have been deeply aware of its own guilt and of the transitoriness of life; hence, we read recurring appeals to justification by God: "Righteousness, I know, is not of man, nor is a perfect walk of the son of man. To the most high God belong deeds of righteousness; but the way of man will not stand, save by the spirit which God created for him" (1QH 12:30–31). But as impressively like Paul as such statements appear at first sight, it should be noted that righteousness is based not simply on the law (as it is in Jud. generally), but on the radical doctrines of the Teacher of Righteousness. The "sons of righteousness" are those who follow their Teacher's doctrine, and the justifying grace of God is seen essentially in the fact that this doctrine of radical legal piety has been revealed.

NT The NT uses the words of this group in many different ways. The adj. dikaios occurs in almost all NT books, while its related words are predominantly Pauline, occurring with particular frequency in Rom. It will make for greater clarity if we examine the usage of each writer.

1. Matthew. dikaios is applied to Christ (27:19), to righteous people (e.g., 1:19; 5:45; 9:13), and to things (20:4; 23:35). dikaiosynē occurs at 3:15; 5:6, 10, 20; 6:1, 33; 21:32; and dikaioō at 11:19; 12:37.

Matt.'s doctrine of righteousness is central to his message. Even the work of John the Baptist is described in these terms, for John came to show people "the way of righteousness" (Matt. 21:32), calling all Israel to repentance and baptism. In insisting that no one had any claim on God (3:9), John was acting in the name of God, who was even then bringing in his kingdom. In order "to fulfill all righteousness" (3:15), Jesus submitted to John's baptism. Those who hunger and thirst after righteousness are blessed (5:6), for whether they live according to the law or not (1:19), their one desire is that God may justify them.

In the light of such righteousness, Jesus was esp. concerned to address sinners rather than the righteous (Matt. 9:13), who believed they had no need of it. Admittedly, he did not dispute the righteousness of such people (in the sense that they have formally fulfilled the law; cf. 10:41; 13:17; 23:29). The conflict with the Pharisees and teachers of the law who fancied that they were in the way of righteousness (23:27–28) arose only because they could not see their righteousness as the free gift of God and so did not submit to John's baptism (21:32). They grumbled because God's calling was in the nature of a free gift and had nothing to do with just rewards (20:13–15). They adopted a holier-than-thou attitude toward others, but Jesus taught that separation between the wicked and the righteous is reserved for the final judgment of God (13:49).

In teaching this, however, Jesus was not seeking to soften the demands of God's revealed will; on the contrary: "Unless your righteousness surpasses that of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, you will certainly not enter the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:20). Jesus intensified the law or repealed it (5:21–48), depending on the character and work of God, who loves his enemies and therefore sends rain on the just and the unjust (5:44–45).

Should the practice of such righteousness bring about a conflict with the letter of the law, then the blessed are those who, like Jesus himself, are persecuted for righteousness' sake (5:10). "Seek first [God's] kingdom and his righteousness," Jesus exhorts (6:33). But this righteousness is not to be displayed before human eyes (6:1); to do so is to seek a reward not from God but from people—as do the Pharisees, who, like whitewashed tombs, appear righteous in the eyes of other people, but within (and so in God's sight) are full of unclean thoughts (Matt. 23:27–28).

2. Luke. The adj. dikaios is applied to Christ (Lk. 23:47; Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14), to people (Lk. 1:6, 17; 2:25; 14:14; Acts 10:22; 24:15), and to things (Lk. 12:57; Acts 4:19). The adv. dikaiōs occurs in the Gospels only at Lk. 23:41, in the remark of the penitent thief who recognized that he and the other thief were suffering justly but that Jesus had done no wrong. The noun dikaiōma occurs at 1:6 with regard to Zechariah and Elizabeth, who observed "all the Lord's commandments and regulations blamelessly." The noun dikaiosynē occurs at 1:75; Acts 10:35; 13:10; 17:31; 24:25; the vb. dikaioō at Lk. 7:29, 35; 10:29; 16:15; 18:14; Acts 13:38–39.

Lk. uses this word group to show that Christianity is the legitimate development of Jud., the latter being a religion receiving status by the Romans as a religio licita. Hence, special mention is made of devout observers of the Jewish law (dikaioi) who came into contact with Jesus: e.g., Zechariah and Elizabeth, Simeon, Joseph of Arimathea (Lk. 1:6; 2:25; 23:50), to whom is added the Roman centurion Cornelius (Acts 10:22; cf. 10:35).

The beginning of Lk.'s Gospel is marked by references to Jewish hopes regarding the return of Elijah, who will turn the disobedient to the wisdom of the righteous (Lk. 1:17), and to similar hopes of a life whose characteristics will be righteousness and holiness (1:75). Lk. sees this returning Elijah in the person of John the Baptist; tax-gatherers and public sinners were justified before God (7:29) by being baptized by John, while the teachers of the law and the Pharisees deceived themselves into thinking they could pass themselves off as righteous (20:20), or indeed that they were already righteous (16:15). This is vividly portrayed in the parable of the Pharisee and the publican (18:9–14).

But in heaven there is more joy over one repentant sinner than over ninety-nine righteous (Lk. 15:7). Lk. does not deny that there is joy in heaven over the righteous, but the greatest joy is over those who turn from sin. The wonderful thing about Jesus is that by his word he makes new life possible for those who are so depraved and sinful as to suffer social and religious ostracism (5:32); this applies not only to Jews but to Gentiles as well (Acts 10:22, 35). Jesus himself is thus the exemplar of a righteous person. His righteousness is openly recognized by the Roman centurion at Jesus' death (Lk. 23:47), after which it becomes fundamental to Christian preaching (Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14). As the "Righteous One" (3:14), Jesus was raised by God from the dead, in advance of the general resurrection of the righteous and the unrighteous (24:15), and has been commissioned to judge the whole world in righteousness (17:31).

3. Mark. Apart from Mk. 2:17 (cf. comments on Lk. 5:32), the only instance of this word group in Mk. is the use of the adj. at 6:20 to describe Herod's reluctance to have John the Baptist executed on account of Herodias, "because Herod feared John and protected him, knowing him to be a righteous and holy man." The usage is in line with Jewish concepts of righteousness, but the general absence of the word group is indicative of Mk.'s tendency to avoid technical language.

4. John. The adj. dikaios is applied to the Father by Jesus in his high priestly prayer (Jn. 17:25; see also 1 Jn. 1:9; Rev. 16:5), to Jesus (1 Jn. 2:1, 29; 3:7), and to humans (Rev. 22:11). It applies to Jesus' just judgment (Jn. 5:30); the Jews are likewise urged to "make a right judgment" (7:24). The noun dikaiosynē occurs only at Jn. 16:8, 10; 1 Jn. 2:29; 3:7, 10; Rev. 19:11; 22:11; dikaiōma occurs at Rev. 15:4; 19:8.

(a) The two instances of dikaiosynē in Jn.'s Gospel are used in a significant passage: The Paraclete will "convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment" (Jn. 16:8). Jesus is seeking to explain that righteousness will be manifested by his returning to the Father (16:10), for it is not to be found in the world itself; the Father alone is its source and fountainhead. Jesus must therefore go away from his disciples in order that their hopes might not be set on him in any "this-worldly" fashion but might be centered on the Father, with whom the Son is one.

(b) Two mutually exclusive spheres are described in 1 Jn.: "Dear children, do not let anyone lead you astray. He who does what is right is righteous, just as he [Christ] is righteous. He who does what is sinful is of the devil, because the devil has been sinning from the beginning" (1 Jn. 3:7–8; cf. 3:10). In other words, a person can belong only to one of these two spheres (cf. 2:29). Since only one person is completely righteous (i.e., Jesus, 2:1), and only one has sinned from the beginning (3:8), it is crucial whose side we are on, i.e., whether we recognize and confess our sin (1:8–2:2) or not.

(c) dikaiosynē is used of the rider on the white horse, Christ, who is called "Faithful and True. With justice he judges and makes war" (Rev. 19:11). In the concluding visions of Rev., there is a great separation between the righteous and the evildoers (22:11; cf. Dan. 12:9–10).

5. Paul. Paul applies the adj. dikaios to God (Rom. 3:26), Christ (2 Tim. 4:8), human beings (Rom. 1:17; cf. Gal. 3:11; 1 Tim. 1:9; Tit. 1:8), and things (Rom. 7:12; Eph. 6:1; Phil. 1:7; 4:8; Col. 4:1; 2 Thess. 1:5–6). The noun dikaiosynē occurs in numerous places in his letters, as does the vb. dikaioō. dikaiōma occurs in Rom. 1:32; 2:26; 5:16; 8:4; and the only instances of dikaiōsis in the NT are in Rom. 4:25; 5:18. The adv. dikaiōs occurs in 1 Cor. 15:34; 1 Thess. 2:10; Tit. 2:12. Paul thus makes the most frequent use of this word group and gives it its widest range of meanings.

Of all NT writers, Paul establishes the closest connection with the OT when speaking of God's righteousness and God's justification of sinners. God's righteousness is essentially his covenant dealings with his people, who are thereby constituted a new humanity, a new Israel comprising both Jews and Gentiles. This divine righteousness is revealed by the fact that God's purposes are not foiled by human sin; rather, God remains almighty as both Lord and Savior in spite of human rebellion. Since sin has been so radically dealt with, the demarcation between Israel and the Gentiles can be swept away so that the new people of God may come into being.

The transgression and unbelief of the one man (Adam, Gen. 3) brought unbelief and sin into the world (Rom. 5:12), with the result that all humans fall under God's condemnation. But now the righteous act (dikaiōma) of the one man (Christ), his absolute trust in him who justifies the ungodly, has defied the curse of sin by bringing into the world the possibility of trust in God. The result, at the appearing of Christ, will be the acquittal (dikaiōsis), the declaring righteous, of all who are members of the new humanity (5:16–19). The following strands of teaching may be distinguished:

(a) No one can be justified by the works of the law, on the basis of perfect obedience to it (Rom. 3:20, 28; Gal. 2:16; 3:11). Indeed, Christ would not have had to die if dikaiosynē were by the law (Gal. 2:21; cf. 3:21). Henceforth, those who want to be justified by obeying the law show that they have fallen from grace (5:4). Through Christ the law has lost its absolute validity (Rom. 10:4), for by its own standards, he who knew no sin was made sin for us (2 Cor. 5:21).

Rom. 2:13 seems to contradict this by stating that "those who obey the law ... will be declared righteous," not those who hear the law (cf. 10:5). But it was precisely in the matter of doing the law that Israel had failed (9:31), for people can only do the will of God when they are grasped by God's righteousness and completely taken up by it. Otherwise sin usurps the law (Rom. 7), and we are powerless against it because sin is not primarily evil deeds or inclinations but striving for our own righteousness and justification (10:3). Hence, only those who have died to sin are justified (6:7) and can do God's will (6:10).

(b) From this Paul concludes that we can be justified only by faith in Christ (Rom. 3:26, 28; 5:1; Gal. 2:16), i.e., by trusting utterly and only in God's grace, which by definition must be a free gift (Rom. 3:24). Jews and Gentiles are justified in the same way: the circumcised (Israel) on the ground of their faith and the uncircumcised (the Gentiles) because of their faith (Rom. 3:30; cf. Gal. 3:8). Here Paul appeals to the testimony of Scripture concerning Abraham, who trusted in the God who justifies the ungodly (Rom. 4:5, 9, 11; Gal. 3:6).

Similarly, in the light of the transition between Rom. 3:20 and 3:21, dikaiosynē in the latter passage must mean the manner in which God justifies sinners through faith in Christ. The outcome of this righteousness of God is therefore being "justified freely by his grace" (3:24). The same theme is taken up in 3:25–26, which may be paraphrased as follows: "God put forward Christ Jesus as a propitiation [→ hilaskomai, to reconcile, 2661] by his sacrificial death, which becomes a reality through faith. This took place to show his righteousness, because in the time of his forbearance he passed over [→ anechomai, endure, 462] former sins; it was to prove that he himself is righteous, that he might be just and the justifier of him who lives by faith in Jesus Christ."

Christ's atoning work is viewed from three different aspects. (i) It is experienced as a reality only by faith, since it was Christ's faith in him who justifies the ungodly (Phil. 2:8) that enabled him to be "made sin," i.e., treated as ungodly. To faith, therefore, Christ's atonement is something objectively real. (ii) The sacrificial death of Christ atones for sin because it is proof of God's righteousness, i.e., it was not intended to atone for Christ's alleged offense of blasphemy, but to procure justification for all believers (cf. 1 Cor. 1:30). (iii) This justification anticipates Christ's return in that it is already revealed; it enables God to be just, for he does not plunge us into sin so that we may experience his grace (see Rom. 3:5–8), but, in spite of the alienation between God and us, God enables us even now to exercise believing trust and thereby to enter into newness of life (Rom. 5:17).

(c) Since believers have died with Christ to sin and are now justified (Rom. 6:7), they live only for God (6:11). This is expressed by the phrase "slaves to righteousness" (6:18). Paul can thus speak of being subject to God's righteousness (10:4). All such phrases are but variations on the theme of the Christian's belonging exclusively to God. Similarly, Paul can speak of the service of righteousness (2 Cor. 3:9; 11:15) and of its weapons (Eph. 6:10–17), since the righteousness of God is the way in which he reveals himself and the only way in which he can be approached (Rom. 1:16–17).

(d) As the resurrection anticipates the universal manifestation of God's kingdom, in the same way righteousness at the present time (Rom. 3:26) anticipates the final revelation of God's righteousness at the Parousia of Christ, for believers "by faith . . . eagerly await through the Spirit the righteousness for which we hope" (Gal. 5:5; cf. 2:17; Rom. 5:19). Otherwise, however, Paul always speaks of believers as having been justified, that is, in the past tense. The connecting link between present and future righteousness is the fact that, while we have already become a people for God's own possession, he is still at enmity with the world as a whole (cf. "all men" in 5:18).

Hence, the justification of the individual springs entirely from that of "the many" (Rom. 5:19), so that it is not we who possess righteousness but righteousness that possesses us; we are its servants (6:18; 2 Cor. 3:9). Our justification both comes from and extends into the future.

(e) In the Pastorals righteousness is spoken of as a virtue (1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22; Tit. 1:8; 2:12). Similarly, Scripture is profitable for "training in righteousness" (2 Tim.

3:16), and the law is considered to be only for the lawless and the profane, not for the righteous, who by their virtues far surpass the law (1 Tim. 1:9). Thus, "the Lord, the righteous Judge" (cf. Rev. 19:11), will award the "crown of righteousness" to his apostle when the latter has finished his course (2 Tim. 4:7–8). The preaching of virtue is made possible, however, by our being "justified by his [Christ's] grace" (Tit. 3:7), for God "saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy" (3:5).

6. The letter to the Hebrews. The adj. dikaios occurs at Heb. 10:38 in a quotation from Hab. 2:4: "My righteous one will live by faith" (also at Heb. 11:4; 12:23). dikaiosynē occurs at 1:9 (quoting Ps. 45:7); 5:13; 7:2; 11:7, 33; 12:11; dikaiōma at 9:1, 10. (a) Righteousness "comes by faith" in the invisible God (11:7; cf. 11:4, 33–34). God's discipline (paideia; → paideuō, to discipline, 4084) leads to this righteousness (12:11), and God has prepared a place in heaven for those made perfectly righteous (12:23). The Son, as the antitype of Melchizedek, is the "king of righteousness" (7:2; cf. 1:8–9). The "regulations" of the old covenant, esp. those relating to the sacrificial system, are described as dikaiōma (9:1), further characterized as "external regulations" (9:10), i.e., those of a temporary nature.

(b) Although Heb. does not use the vb. dikaioō, relates faith directly to the invisible God (ch. 11), and draws many examples from the OT, there are certain parallels with Pauline thought. For Paul likewise tries to show that his understanding of salvation is entirely in line with that of the OT. The burden of the argument of Rom. 4 is to show from the examples of Abraham and David that justification under the old covenant was, in fact, by faith (cf. Gal. 3:15–18 with Heb. 6:13–15). Similarly, Paul's teaching on Jesus' propitiatory death is paralleled in Heb. by the argument that Jesus as our perfect high priest has offered himself in sacrifice, fulfilling the Day of Atonement ritual and thus inaugurating the new covenant (Heb. 7–10).

The new element in Heb. is the way in which the theme of the Day of Atonement ritual is carried through, so that believers have their sins dealt with and gain access to God through Jesus' sacrificial act on the cross and his exaltation (see esp. Heb. 10:19–22; cf. Lev. 16). The whole argument of Heb. 9–10 leads to the climax that Jesus has opened the new sanctuary in the temple of his body.

The writer applies this teaching with respect to the need for patience, which he supports by quoting from Hab. 2:3–4: "He who is coming will come and will not delay. But my righteous one [dikaios] will live by faith. And if he shrinks back, I will not be pleased with him" (Heb. 10:37–38). The prophet Habakkuk lived in the latter part of the seventh cent. B.C., at a time of oppression, crying out for vindication of divine righteousness. Yahweh replied by telling him to be patient, for the oppressor would reap due judgment, and the righteous would be preserved by their loyal trust in God. In the LXX version of Hab., the words have a slightly different emphasis because of the change from the Heb. "his" to the Gk. mou ("my"). Depending on where the mou is placed, the text reads either, "The righteous one will live by faith in me" or, "My righteous one will live by faith[fulness]" (pistis [faith, → 4411] can mean either "faith" or "faithfulness").

Regardless of which of these options is correct, the interpretation in Heb. focuses on one individual, God's chosen one, and on pistis. Does the author mean that God's righteous one will live in faithfulness, or that the chosen righteous one will gain life by his or her faith? Perhaps the author of Heb. is ambiguous so that he intends it to be read in both ways. For in living by faith one becomes faithful in the sense of being loyal to the promises of God, enduring temptation and hardship. This is, in fact, the theme of Heb. 11, with its many examples of faith that enabled the heroes of faith to endure.

Hab. 2:4 is quoted and interpreted twice by Paul as he lays the foundation for his doctrine of justification by faith. In Rom. 1:16–17 Paul declares that the gospel is "the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes" and that righteousness comes to those who have faith; he supports his assertions by quoting Hab. 2:4: "The righteous will live by faith." In Gal. 3:11 Paul argues: "Clearly no one is justified before God by the law, because, 'The righteous will live by faith'" (cf. Phil. 3:9, where the same thought occurs without quoting Hab. 2:4). It seems entirely possible that this OT verse was current as a testimonium in early Christian times and that both Paul and the author of Heb. used it independently, each giving a slightly different emphasis to it.

7. James. The adj. dikaios occurs in Jas. 5:6 with reference to "innocent men" and in 5:16 that "the prayer of a righteous man is powerful and effective." dikaiosynē is found at 1:20 (living in anger does not bring about a "righteous life"); 2:23 (quoting Gen. 15:6; cf. Rom. 4:3; Gal. 3:11); and Jas. 3:18 (people who live in peace produce "a harvest of righteousness"). The vb. dikaioō also occurs 3x, all in Jas. 2 with reference to the question of whether a person is justified by what one does or by faith: in 2:21, with reference to Abraham and his sacrifice of Isaac; in 2:25, with reference to Rahab and her hiding of the spies; and in 2:24, where James draws the conclusion: "You see that a person is justified by what he does and not by faith alone."

There has been a considerable debate about whether James is contradicting Paul. But the context of James is different from the context in which Paul makes his remarks. Paul is arguing about whether one must keep certain stipulations of the law in order to become righteous with God. To this the answer is no. But James envisions a situation in which the rich, content with their own "spirituality," are indifferent to the starving and ill-clad (Jas. 2:14–18), and in which church members see no inconsistency between spirituality and slander (Jas. 3:1–16). If faith makes no difference in a person's life, it is questionable whether that person has the faith that is necessary to be saved. As Paul testifies regarding the moral laxity and complacent attitudes in Corinth, more is needed in the Christian life than some nondescript attitude of faith. It may be significant that the apostle makes no reference to justification by faith in 1 or 2 Corinthians.

James, in other words, is essentially working with a different definition of faith. For him, faith means either notional assent to a doctrine or uncritical acceptance of an attitude without asking about its practical implications; even demons have this sort of faith (Jas. 2:19). Faith is not the wholehearted trust and self-commitment of which Paul speaks. Similarly, the works that justify a person in James are not the works envisaged by Paul. For Paul, works denote human attempts to procure favor with God by one's own efforts in obeying the law. With James works denote the response of a believer as he or she works out faith in daily life. Note esp. the word "alone" in Jas. 2:24: "You see that a person is justified by what he does and not by faith alone." James' position complements rather than contradicts Paul.

In both Paul and James dikaioō means to pronounce righteous. In the case of James it concerns evidence that can be seen by others, whereas in Paul it is the eschatological verdict pronounced by God on the undeserving. Paul bases his argument on Gen. 15:6, where Abraham believes God's promises and is declared righteous. Although James quotes the same passage, he illustrates his point not from that passage but from the subsequent story of the offering of Isaac (Jas. 2:21; cf. Gen. 22:1–14).

This enables him to draw the conclusion: "You see that his faith and his actions were working together, and his faith was made complete by what he did" (2:22); thus, "as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without deeds is dead" (2:26). A bare and lifeless faith is like a corpse; still, the deeds that animate faith are not the self-righteous acts that supposedly accrue merit with God but the responses of the faithful to God's living word (cf. Abraham and Rahab).

8. 1 and 2 Peter. The adj. dikaios occurs in 1 Pet. 3:12 (quoting Ps. 34:16); 3:18; 4:18 (quoting Prov. 11:31); 2 Pet. 1:13; and 2:7–9 (cf. Gen. 19:16, 29). The adv. dikaiōs occurs in 1 Pet. 2:23, which explains that the suffering Christ "entrusted himself to him who judges justly." The noun dikaiosynē occurs 2x in 1 Pet. and 4x in 2 Pet. Christ bore our sins on the tree "so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness" (1 Pet. 2:24); "but even if you should suffer for what is right, you are blessed" (3:14). Peter opens his second letter with a reference to "those who through the righteousness of our God and Savior Jesus Christ have received ... faith" (2 Pet. 1:1). In 2:5 he speaks of Noah as "a preacher of righteousness," and 2:21 describes the Christian faith and life as "the way of righteousness." Finally in 3:13 we read: "But in keeping with his promise we are looking forward to a new heaven and a new earth, the home of righteousness."

There is the sense in which a righteous person is a member of the righteous community, but in none of these passages is the notion a bare formality. Righteousness takes its character from God himself (1 Pet. 2:23; cf. Rev. 16:5), and salvation is grounded in righteousness (1 Pet. 3:18) that finds its expression in right behavior (2:24; cf. 3:12; 4:18). Those who are called to suffer for righteousness' sake are blessed (3:14), and in so doing live out the righteousness of Christ. Thus, the Christian faith and way of life can be called "the way of righteousness" (2 Pet. 2:21), and the goal of life is described in terms of righteousness (3:13).

1468 (dikaiōma, regulation, requirement, righteous deed), → 1466.

1469 (dikaiōs, justly, in a just manner, uprightly), → 1466.

1470 (dikaiōsis, justification, vindication, acquittal), → 1466.

1472 δίκη

δίκη (dikē), justice, punishment, vengeance (1472); ἐκδικέω (ekdikeō), execute justice, punish, avenge (1688); ἔκδικος (ekdikos), avenger (1690); ἐκδίκησις (ekdikēsis), vengeance, recompense, punishment (1689).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the noun dikē is the name of the goddess of just punishment. In legal language, the word means justice, a judicial case, a legal decision, vengeance, or punishment. Along with the later word dikaiosynē (righteousness, → 1466), dikē is one of the basic concepts in the Gk. legal world.

(b) The vb. ekdikeō means avenge or punish. Later, in the papyri, it means to decide a case, work as an advocate, defend or help someone to obtain legal rights. An ekdikos, therefore, is an avenger, and ekdikēsis means vengeance, recompense.

2. (a) In the LXX dikē, justice, vengeance, punishment, occurs 38x, of which 21x have no Heb. equivalent. It can be used of Yahweh's intervention to exact vengeance and punishment on his own people (Lev. 26:25; Amos 7:4). But it can also be used of his intervention against his enemies (Deut. 32:41). Other passages emphasize God's intervention to ensure justice for the person offering prayer (Ps. 9:4–5; 35:23; 43:1; 74:22) and for the poor (140:12). In the Apocr. dikē means justice (Wis. 1:8), vengeance (18:11), and punishment (cf. 2 Macc. 8:11).

(b) Through the LXX's use of ekdikeō, several different concepts of justice are brought into contact with one another. The OT's message of a justice that communicates God's will to individuals and the OT's judicial procedure, which is carried out solely with God's authority, are translated by a legal terminology that was previously neutral and secular. The OT took the thought embodied in Deut. 32:35 seriously, leaving vengeance to God (cf. Gen. 4:15; 2 Ki. 9:7; Ps. 37:28; 58:10; 79:10, the last two with ekdikēsis). Hos. 9:7 refers to the day of vengeance (ekdikēsis).

3. (a) In the OT punishment and judgment go together. Sodom and Gomorrah provide a classical instance of Yahweh's punishment of a notoriously wicked pagan city (Gen. 19; cf. Lk. 17:29, 32; Rom. 9:29). This event is often mentioned (e.g., Deut. 29:23; 32:32; Isa. 1:9–10; Jer. 23:14; Ezek. 16:46–56; Amos 4:11). Amos announced God's punishment of the surrounding nations for their crimes against humanity (Amos 1–2), but this culminates in the announcement of God's punishment of his people for their sin of idolatry (3:14) and for crimes committed against fellow Israelites (4:1; 5:7–15). The prophets construed foreign invasions as punishment for Israel's sin, culminating in the destruction of the northern kingdom in 722 B.C. (2 Ki. 15–17) and the exile of large sections of the population of Judah in 597 and 587 B.C. (2 Ki. 23–25).

(b) On an individual level the Mosaic legislation specified a range of punishments for crimes both against God and against human beings. God expected his people to obey him and to lead a holy life, based on his law. The following are crimes against God: idolatry, punishable by death (Deut. 13:10–16); infant sacrifice (cf. 2 Ki. 21:6, 16), which was involved in the worship of Molech and Canaanite idols (Deut. 18:10–11); blasphemy (Exod. 20:7; 22:28; Lev. 19:12; 24:11–23; Deut. 5:11); false prophecy (18:20–22); and violation of the Sabbath (Exod. 20:8–11; 31:13–17; Num. 15:32–36). Whereas offenses committed inadvertently could be atoned for (Lev. 16; Num. 15:27), stubbornness was punishable by being cut off from the people, i.e., death (15:30–31; Deut. 17:8–12).

(c) Civil crimes included murder, which was punishable by death (Gen. 9:6; Exod. 21:12; Num. 35:31), though those who had killed accidentally might flee to cities of refuge (35:6–25). The law provided for execution by the nearest able-bodied male relative of the deceased, "the avenger of blood" (35:19). But under the monarchy the king seems to have assumed jurisdiction (2 Sam. 14:7, 11; 1 Ki. 2:34). In the case of unsolved murder, ritual and sacrificial provision was made lest the land remain polluted (Deut. 21:1–9). Second-degree murder with no clearly specified penalty was recognized (Exod. 21:22–25).

The penalty for criminal assault resulting in serious injury was stated in terms of the lex talionis, i.e., the same injury must be inflicted on the offender: "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burn for burn, wound for wound, bruise for bruise" (Exod. 21:23–25; cf. Lev. 24:19–20; Deut. 19:21). The OT here is establishing a principle of equity so that punishments fit the crimes. Assault on one's parents was deemed serious enough to be punishable by death (Exod. 21:15). Serious injuries to slaves by their masters entitled the slaves to manumission (21:26–27). For robbery, provision was made for restitution plus punitive damages (22:1, 3, 4; Lev. 6:2–7; 19:13).

(d) The Mosaic law did not allow religious prostitution, and prostitution in general was opposed. Sodomy and homosexuality were punishable by death (Lev. 18:22, 29; 20:13), as were carnal relations with animals (18:23; 20:15). All crimes of immorality were grievous offences against God and adversely affected the community.

Remarriage of one's previously divorced wife would cause the land to sin (Deut. 24:4). Adultery committed by betrothed or married persons was punishable by stoning (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:23–24). There was, however, no set penalty for fornication. Rape sometimes carried the death penalty (22:23–27); in other cases the man was to take an unbetrothed virgin as a wife by paying fifty shekels to her father (22:28–29). Polygamy was countenanced, but there were certain forbidden degrees of marriage, and incest constituted a capital crime (Lev. 18:7–18; 20:11–21). Intercourse during menstruation brought ritual uncleanness (18:19; 20:18; cf. 15:24).

(e) The fifth commandment laid down the decree: "Honor your father and your mother, so that you may live long in the land the LORD your God is giving you" (Exod. 20:12; cf. Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16). Not only was assault on one's parents a capital offense, but so was cursing (Exod. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; Deut. 21:18–21). Kidnapping (which in ancient times was done in order to sell the victim as a slave) carried the death penalty (Exod. 21:16; Deut. 24:7). False accusation and perjury carried the same penalty as that required for the accused crime (19:19).

(f) Cases of torts (i.e., wrongs dealt with by personal actions rather than by public prosecution) were judged by the elders of a town sitting by the gate (cf. Ruth 4). Such cases included damage to crops and vineyards from straying cattle or fire (Exod. 22:5–6), injury to livestock (21:33–36; Lev. 24:18, 21), or injury to persons from livestock (Exod. 21:28–32).

(g) Stoning is the most frequently mentioned form of capital punishment in the OT. Perhaps it was used in cases affecting the community at large because it involved the maximum participation of the community, including the prosecuting witnesses (Deut. 17:7; cf. Lev. 20:2–5, 27; 24:15–16; Num. 15:32–36). In the case of murder, death by the sword is prescribed (35:19, 21). Death by burning was prescribed for certain sexual offenses that involved prohibited degrees of intercourse (Lev. 20:14; 21:9). Execution by hanging on a tree involving the public exposure of the victim involved particular shame (Deut. 21:22–23; cf. Jos. 10:26–27).

(h) Scourging to a maximum of forty stripes is stipulated in Deut. 25:1–3. It was apparently a penalty for one who unjustly accused his wife of unchastity before marriage (22:18). Imprisonment seems to have been restricted to detention prior to trial (though cf. Jer. 37:15–16). Monetary fines are mentioned in Exod. 21:22, 30–31; 22:1–4; Deut. 22:18–19, 29. Enslavement was the penalty for a thief who could not repay damages (Exod. 22:3) or for nonpayment of debts (2 Ki. 4:1; Neh. 5:5; Amos 2:6). Exod. 21:2 lays down a maximum of six years in the case of an Israelite. Voluntary slavery is discussed in Lev. 25:39–43.

NT 1. In the NT dikē only occurs 3x, of which 2 are found in the context of the expectation of the final judgment (→ krima, 3210). In 2 Thess. 1:9, Paul uses dikē of the punishment of eternal destruction meted out to those who oppress the community, and Jude 7 uses the fire of Sodom and Gomorrah "as an example of those who suffer the punishment of eternal fire." Acts 28:4 tells how the Maltese supposed that Paul, who had been attacked by a snake, was a murderer whom dikē (perhaps the Gk. goddess; cf. NIV, "Justice") "has not allowed . . . to live."

2. ekdikeō occurs 6x in the NT; ekdikēsis, 9x; ekdikos, 2x. (a) Lk. 18:3, 5 uses the vb. and 18:7–8 the noun in the secular sense. The widow in the parable of the unjust judge is seeking "justice" against her adversary. Also, ekdikēsis in Acts 7:24 denotes earthly justice taken by Moses into his own hand. Note also 2 Cor. 7:11, where ekdikēsis, punishment, and apologia, vindication—two terms from criminal law—occur together; Paul's sharp intervention against an offender produced just punishment.

Similarly, the apostle makes known in 10:6 his readiness to punish every act of disobedience.

(b) ekdikos, avenger, in Rom. 13:4 designates an office, for this passage contains a remarkable collection of expressions derived from the language of secular government. God gives to the office of avenger the power it needs. This perspective is in line with OT thinking that a political institution needs to have authority conferred on it. This applies both to the kings of Israel and to other kings to whom Yahweh has given power (cf. Exod. 22:28; 1 Sam. 15:1; 2 Sam. 1:14; 1 Ki. 19:15–16; Prov. 8:15; Isa. 10:5–19). Peter in 1 Pet. 2:13–17 confirms this theme (cf. Jn. 19:11; Tit. 3:1).

(c) ekdikeō and its derivatives are used primarily in the NT with the sense of vengeance. These occurrences appear mostly in OT quotations or phrases and express God's vengeance. Sometimes this vengeance is mentioned in connection with the coming day of judgment (e.g., 2 Thess. 1:8, which uses motifs from Isa. 66:15: God's vengeance on his enemies is compensation for those who suffer persecution; cf. also Lk. 21:22).

The use of ekdikeō in Rev. 6:10; 19:2 likewise deals with the last judgment. The first records the anguished questioning and petition of Christian martyrs for vengeance, i.e., for the final judgment. This is not fulfilled immediately; there is a short delay. Hence vengeance, purged of all human malice, is left to God; its execution is first proclaimed in 19:2 (cf. 2 Ki. 9:7), once the number of fellow servants and brothers is complete (6:11).

(d) While Rev. makes persecutors and unbelievers the recipients of vengeance, the author of Heb. 10:30, quoting Deut. 32:35, warns the Christian community itself about God's vengeance (cf. also 1 Thess. 4:6). His vengeance is a serious matter, and we must acknowledge that he is just. Paul recalls Lev. 19:18 and Deut. 32:35 when he says that vengeance is God's prerogative (Rom. 12:19–20). Instead of seeking vengeance, the Christian community must love its enemies. Those who do so heap "burning coals on [the] head" of their enemy; i.e., they bestow on such people the fruit of grace, love, and peace (cf. Prov. 25:21–22; Matt. 5:44; Lk. 6:27). But God will one day uphold his right for vengeful judgment.

διώκω (diōkō), run after, pursue, persecute (1503); ἐκδιώκω (ekdiōkō), drive away, persecute severely (1691); καταδιώκω (katadiōkō), search for, hunt for (2870); διωγμός (diōgmos), persecution (1501); διώκτης (diōktēs), persecutor (1502).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. diōkō means lit. to chase, pursue, drive away; fig. to pursue something zealously, try to achieve something, prosecute.

2. (a) In the LXX diōkō, along with ekdiōkō and katadiōkō, is used primarily of pursuit by hostile soldiers (Exod. 15:9) or by anyone with hostile intent (Gen. 31:23). The word occurs with some regularity in psalms of individual lament (e.g., Ps. 7:1, 5; 31:15; 35:3; cf. Jer. 15:15; 20:11), where the oppression referred to causes the psalmist to suffer, even though active persecution in the narrow sense is not part of the picture. (b) The LXX also uses diōkō in exhortations to pursue a goal, such as social righteousness (Deut. 16:20), peace (Ps. 34:14), and right living that honors God (Prov. 15:9). diōgmos occurs in a primarily negative sense in the LXX (Prov. 11:19; Lam. 3:19; but cf. 2 Macc. 12:23), while diōktēs does not appear at all.

NT diōkō in the NT occurs 45x, of which 30 refer to persecution (cf. the use of diōgmos [10x] and diōktēs in 1 Tim. 1:13) In 1 Thess. 2:15 the compound ekdiōkō likewise means to persecute. The fig. meaning of this vb. as pursuing a particular way of life is found only in NT letters (Phil. 3:12, 14). diōkō (Lk. 17:23) and katadiōkō (Mk. 1:36) can also mean to run after, follow.

1. Persecution. (a) God's messengers meet persecution. This was already the experience of the OT prophets (Matt. 5:12; Acts 7:52) and will be that of Jesus' disciples (Matt. 5:11–12, 44; 10:23). In this they are like their Lord (Jn. 5:16; cf. 15:20: "If they persecuted me, they will persecute you also"). Paul, once a persecutor of the church (1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13, 23; Phil. 3:6; 1 Tim. 1:13, using diōktēs), experienced this same connection (Gal. 5:11; 2 Tim. 3:11). In 2 Tim. 3:12 he writes that being a Christian is always linked with persecution.

(b) Christ himself is being persecuted whenever a Christian experiences it (Acts 9:4–5; 22:7–8; 26:14–15). According to Jn. 15:18–25, persecution is caused by the world's hatred of God and his revelation in Christ (cf. also Matt. 10:22; Mk. 13:13; Lk. 21:17; Rev. 12:13). Paul sees behind it the contrast between the hostility of the natural self against God and thus also against the person led by God's Spirit (Gal. 4:29). Hence persecution may be a sign that one is on God's side. Thus Jesus calls those blessed "who are persecuted because of righteousness" (Matt. 5:10–12).

(c) There is the danger of corrupting the message in order to avoid persecution (Gal. 6:12). Thus, Christians are challenged to maintain their faith during such times. They must meet the hatred of their persecutors by a word of blessing (Rom. 12:14).

(d) In persecution Christians experience the help, strength, and saving power of Christ (Rom. 8:35–39; 2 Cor. 4:7–12; 12:10). Paul set an apostolic example by enduring it patiently (1 Cor. 4:12). It is a special reason for giving God thanks when believers endure persecution with faith (2 Thess. 1:3–4).

2. Pursuit of Christian objectives. The fig. meaning of diōkō shows more strongly than does zēteō (seek, → 2426) that there are certain things the Christian must strive after, such as hospitality (Rom. 12:13), mutual peace (14:19; Heb. 12:14; 1 Pet. 3:11), holiness, love (1 Cor. 14:1), doing good (1 Thess. 5:15), and righteousness (1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22). These are lasting objectives in the life of faith, which has as its goal the attaining of the resurrection from the dead. Paul presses on toward this goal like the runner set on winning the victor's prize (Phil. 3:12–14), though any credit belongs to "God's mercy" (Rom. 9:16).

δόγμα (dogma), decree, ordinance, command, doctrine, dogma (1504); δογματίζω (dogmatizō), decree, ordain (1505).

CL & OT dogma (from dokeō, think, suppose) means opinion, conclusion, belief. From the noun comes the intensive vb. dogmatizō, to lay down as an opinion, decree. In the LXX dogma and dogmatizō can mean public decree or edict (Est. 4:8 in S^3 only; Dan. 2:13), a divine ordinance of the Mosaic Law (3 Macc. 1:3), and a community decision (2 Macc. 15:36).

Philo and Josephus understood the Mosaic law as a system of holy tenets, the dogmata of a divine philosophy; they were superior to any doctrines of Gk. philosophy.

NT 1. Lk. 2:1 uses dogma for the political decree of Caesar Augustus concerning the census. This edict served God's plan of salvation in having the Messiah born at Bethlehem. The Jews at Thessalonica accused Jason of aiding Paul and Silas in "defying Caesar's decrees" (Acts 17:7).

2. Acts 16:4 uses dogmata for the decisions of the Jerusalem Council that were binding on the whole church and were to be delivered to the Gentile churches. These stipulations ran the risk of turning the gospel of Christ into a legalistic religion. But they were in fact decrees proclaiming liberty within the area of social interaction among believers. This verse lays the foundation for the use of the word "dogma" for ecclesiastical decrees, requiring intellectual assent.

3. Eph. 2:15 uses dogmata for the individual "regulations" of the Mosaic law; Col. 2:14 uses the word for the "regulations" leveled against humankind, which God has nailed to the cross. In 2:20–21 the apostle forbids the church to allow regulations regarding food and cleanliness to be imposed upon it. Here the vb. dogmatizō is translated: "Why ... do you submit to its rules?"

1506 δοκέω

δοκέω (dokeō), trans. think, believe, suppose, consider; intrans. seem, appear (1506).

CL & OT 1. In. cl. Gk. dokeō trans. means to believe, think, hold, assume, conclude; intrans. to assume an appearance, appear; hence, give an impression, pose as.

2. dokeō occurs app. 70x in the LXX, generally with the same meanings as in cl. Gk. It can mean to say, think, account (e.g., Gen. 38:15; Prov. 27:14). Most of the references are in the noncanonical writings (esp. 2 and 3 Macc.) or passages where dokeō does not translate a Heb. word (e.g., Tob. 3:15; Wis. 3:2; 12:27; 1 Macc. 8:26, 28; 15:20). Occasionally we find the sense of desire, wish (e.g., Jdt. 3:8). The most usual meaning is to seem, appear.

NT 1. dokeō occurs 62x in the NT, with more than one sense. (a) In Lk. 8:18 Jesus warns us to listen carefully: "Whoever has will be given more; whoever does not have, even what he thinks [dokeō] he has will be taken away from him" (cf. Mk. 4:24). The phrase expresses the illusory state of those who think they have a tangible and permanent security. Jn. 5:45 conveys the challenge to give up an existing opinion, while 2 Cor. 11:16 speaks of an opinion that cannot yet be reached. In Matt. 3:9 John warns the Jews not to think that their position as children of Abraham makes a significant difference before God. (b) The meaning to conclude is found esp. in Acts (e.g., 15:22, 25, 28).

2. (a) In Gal. 2:2, 6, 9, Paul calls the Jerusalem apostles by the part. of dokeō, i.e., those who matter, the recognized authorities; in 2:9 he refers to those recognized as pillars or leaders, i.e., James, Peter, John. This is not necessarily an ironic point here, for this expression is often found of a recognized authority in extrabiblical lit. (b) In passages like 1 Cor. 8:2, however, the expression "the man who thinks" means an opinion based on self-deception.

3. Noteworthy is the question formed with the impers. dokei, i.e., ti dokei hymin, "What do you think?" found in Jn. 11:56 as well as various passages in Matt. (e.g., 18:12; 21:28; 22:42). It demands an answer that will commit the one questioned, unlike all mere opinions. Note that this is the question placed by the high priest before the Sanhedrin (26:66) so as to provoke them to pass a judgment on Jesus.

δόκιμος (dokimos), tested, approved, genuine, esteemed (1511); δοκιμάζω (dokimazō), test, accept as proved, approve (1507); δοκιμασία (dokimasia), test (1508); δοκίμιον (dokimion), testing, means of testing, adj. genuine (1510); ἀδόκιμος (adokimos), not standing the test, worthless, disqualified, unfit, reprehensible (99); ἀποδοκιμάζω (apodokimazō), reject, declare useless (627); δοκιμή (dokimē), the quality of being approved, hence character (1509).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. dokimos means trustworthy, reliable, approved, recognized. It is used as a technical term for genuine, current coinage, but also applied to persons enjoying general esteem. adokimos means untested, not respected. The derived vb. dokimazō means to test, pronounce good, establish by trial, recognize, while apodokimazō means to disapprove of, reject, blame.

2. The LXX uses dokimos only to recognize coins as valid currency (e.g., Gen. 23:16; 1 Ki. 10:18). Hence, worthless money or metal is called adokimos (Prov. 25:4; Isa. 1:22). dokimazō is most often used in the expression to test something for genuineness by fire. It is transferred to God, who tests human beings. In Ps. the prayer that God may test the one who is praying (17:3; 26:2; 139:1, 23) is an expression of complete trust. In the prophets, however, God's threat of testing becomes equivalent to judgment (Jer. 9:7; Zech. 13:9).

NT In the NT dokimos is used mostly by Paul in the sense of recognized, approved, accepted (Rom. 14:18; 16:10; 1 Cor. 11:19; 2 Cor. 10:18); correspondingly adokimos means worthless, rejected, in the sense of not having stood the test (Rom. 1:28; 1 Cor. 9:27; 2 Cor. 13:5; 2 Tim. 3:8; Tit. 1:16). dokimazō can mean interpret, examine, test (e.g., Lk. 12:56; 1 Cor. 3:13; 11:28; 2 Cor. 13:5; Gal. 6:4; 1 Jn. 4:1). The result of testing is either dokimazō, recognize, approve (Rom. 14:22; 1 Cor. 16:3; 2 Cor. 8:22; 1 Thess. 2:4) or apodokimazō, repudiate, reject (Matt. 21:42; Heb. 12:17; 1 Pet. 2:4). dokimē is found with the act. meaning of a test by means of instructions or tribulations (2 Cor. 2:9; 8:2), and with the pass. meaning of the result of the testing of faith (Rom. 5:4; 2 Cor. 9:13; 13:3; Phil. 2:22). dokimion is used for the means of testing in Jas. 1:3. In 1 Pet. 1:7 faith is purified as gold in the fire proves genuine.

1. All to whom God's grace has been entrusted must keep themselves in it (cf. Lk. 19:12–27). Passages that speak of testing, trial, recognition, and rejection are addressed only to members of the church. Heb. 6:8 speaks of those who by their falling away from God have become incapable of returning and hence of bearing the fruit of repentance and faith. They are thus adokimos, rejected (cf. also 12:17), for they have crucified "the Son of God all over again" (6:6). We find a virtual reversal of this process in passages like Matt. 21:42 and 1 Pet. 2:4, 7, which use apodokimazō. The stone (Jesus) that the builders (the Jewish spiritual leaders) found unsuitable and rejected (crucified), in God's eyes was found worthy to become the cornerstone.

2. What matters in testing is that we use God's gifts aright. Timothy, to whom the word of truth has been entrusted, is to show himself as an approved worker (2 Tim. 2:15) by faithful preaching. By contrast, those who do not honor God according to the knowledge granted them, who "did not think it worthwhile" (dokimazō) to know him, are given over to a "depraved" (adokimos) mind (Rom. 1:28) and to improper conduct as a punishment. Here we see how closely linked dokimazō is with peirazō (→ peirasmos, temptation, 4280). Both groups of words are concerned with testing. With dokimazō the stress falls on a positive result in which that which is tested passes and is recognized as genuine, but peirazō tends to be more negative and means a temptation to evil, in which lusts (Jas. 1:14), want and affliction (1 Cor. 10:13), or Satan himself (1 Thess. 3:5) entice one to fall.

3. God himself tests and passes judgment on the day of judgment. Paul declares in 1 Cor. 3:13 that all service for the church and all the fruit borne by it are subjected to God's testing and verdict in the fire of judgment. The determining factors will be whether faith was created (3:5) and the church built up (3:16). Those who have stood the test in faith (Jas. 1:12) will receive eternal life as the victor's crown.

4. This test is taking place already in this life. God even now shows himself as the tester of human hearts (1 Thess. 2:4). Thus, the whole of a Christian's life is subject to the testing scrutiny of God. All depends on our being found as "approved in Christ" (Rom. 16:10). Paul submitted himself to God's judgment, not to that of human beings (1 Cor. 4:3–5; 9:27), even though we can and should recognize when someone has stood the test (2 Cor. 13:3; Phil. 2:22). The content and goal of Paul's pastoral care of the individual and community is that they should be found obedient (2 Cor. 2:9).

5. That one has stood the test is manifested in various ways. (a) By a serious effort to know God's will. The gift of the Holy Spirit enables a person to recognize God's will (Rom. 12:2) and to test what is well-pleasing to him (Eph. 5:10; Phil. 1:10) and what is best (1 Thess. 5:21). The gift of testing and distinguishing of the spirits (1 Jn. 4:1) is also part of the Christian's duty.

(b) By loyalty to God. peirazō, dokimazō, and epiginōskō are used side by side in 2 Cor. 13:5, so as to move the Corinthians to the crucial task of testing their own faithfulness. If Christ dwells in us, we cannot and may not be adokimos; for if we are, our being Christians is futile.

(c) By loving one's neighbor. In his instructions on the collection (2 Cor. 9:13), Paul writes that because of the Corinthians' proving themselves in this service, many will praise God; thereby he shows that such service that is concerned with the needs of the Christian community is part of the testing of faith working in love.

(d) By holding fast to hope in the midst of tribulation. The church is exposed to attacks from within and without, from Satanic powers and godless people. It lives by faith, not by sight. In this position willed by God it maintains its living hope by remaining under God's hand, by the overflowing of the riches given by God and of the goodness created by the Spirit to others (2 Cor. 8:2), by patience (Jas. 1:2–3), and by overcoming temptations (1 Pet. 1:6–7).

δόξα (doxa), radiance, glory, repute (1518); δοξάζω (doxazō), praise, glorify (1519); ἔνδοξος (endoxos), honored, glorious (1902); ἐνδοξάζομαι (endoxazomai), honor, glorify (1901); συνδοξάζω (syndoxazō), glorify together (5280); κενόδοξος (kenodoxos), desirous of praise, conceited, boastful (3030); κενοδοξία (kenodoxia), desire for praise, conceit, vanity, illusion (3029).

CL & OT 1. This word group affords one of the clearest examples of change in the meaning of a Gk. word as it came under biblical influence. The basic meaning of doxa in secular Gk. is opinion, conjecture. It ranges from the opinion about a person or thing to the valuation placed on one by others, i.e., repute, praise. The vb. doxazō means think, imagine, suppose, magnify, praise, extol (see also dokeō, 1506).

2. The concepts of doxa and doxazō were transformed in the LXX, where the meaning "opinion" does not occur; the meanings praise and honor are shared with secular Gk. doxa is seldom used for the honor shown to a human being (for this timē is employed); it is often used for the honor and praise given to God (e.g., Ps. 29:1; Isa. 42:12). Above all, doxa expresses God's glory and power (Ps. 24:7–10; 29:3; Isa. 42:8).

3. Behind this new meaning lies the Heb. concept of kābôd, glory, honor, which the LXX represents by doxa. When it is used of God, it does not mean God in his essential nature, but the glorious revelation of his person. Characteristically, kābôd is linked with verbs of seeing (Exod. 16:7; 33:18; Isa. 40:5) and appearing (Exod. 16:10; Deut. 5:24; Isa. 60:1). We may recognize this kābôd in creation (Ps. 19:1; Isa. 6:3), but it expresses itself above all in salvation history (i.e., in God's great acts, Ps. 96:3) and in his presence in the sanctuary (Exod. 40:34–35; 1 Ki. 8:10–11; Ps. 26:8). In 1 Sam. 4:21–22 the loss of the ark of God to the Philistines meant that "the glory has departed from Israel." In the last days a full manifestation of the kābôd was expected, in order to bring salvation to Israel (Isa. 60:1–2; Ezek. 39:21–22) and to convert the nations (Ps. 96:3–9; Zech. 2:5–11).

4. The intertestamental period demonstrated a strong interest in the heavenly world. The concept of glory is not confined, as in the OT, to God's self-revelation. It is also applied to the realities of heaven: God, his throne, and the angels. In the language of liturgy and hymns, glory may be used as an epithet applied to almost any concept linked with God. For example, Adam in Paradise possessed glory but lost it through the fall. Thus, humans could share in God's glory. In Qumran it was expected that the elect would "inherit all the glory of Adam" (1QH 4:15; cf. CD 3:20).

NT 1. doxa is found 166x times in NT, doxazō 61x. The meaning of these words continues the LXX usage and the underlying Heb. kābôd, so that the ideas of opinion and conjecture are not found. (a) The meanings honor, fame, repute, and (for the vb.) honor and praise belong to general Gk. usage. The specifically biblical connotation may be seen in expressions such as giving glory to God (Lk. 17:18; Acts 12:23; Rom. 4:20; Rev. 4:9; 11:13) and "for the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10:31), in the so-called doxologies (Lk. 2:14; 19:38; Rom. 11:36; Gal. 1:5; Eph. 3:21; Phil. 4:20; 1 Tim. 1:17), and in application to Christ (Rom. 16:27; 2 Tim. 4:18; Heb. 13:21; 1 Pet. 4:11; 2 Pet. 3:18; Jude 25). The highest duty of humankind is to glorify and praise God in worship, word, and act (Matt. 5:16; Rom. 1:21; 1 Cor. 6:20; 10:31).

(b) When applied to humans or earthly powers with the meaning of splendor, radiance, glory, doxa reflects OT usage (e.g., Matt. 4:8; 6:29; 1 Pet. 1:24).

(c) doxa in the sense of God's glory, majesty, and power is preeminently the inheritance of OT usage. God is "the God of glory" (Acts 7:2), "the glorious Father" (Eph. 1:17, lit., "the Father of glory"), and "the Majestic Glory" (2 Pet. 1:17). The expression "the glory of God [or the Father]" is frequent (e.g., Acts 7:55; Rom. 1:23; 6:4; Rev. 15:8). God's power is sometimes linked with his glory (Col. 1:11; 2 Thess. 1:9; Rev. 5:13; 19:1). The concept is also applied to Christ—to his earthly life (Lk. 9:32; Jn. 1:14; 2:11; 1 Cor. 2:8), his exalted existence (Lk. 24:26; Jn. 17:5; Rom. 8:17 [syndoxazō]; 1 Tim. 3:16), his return (Matt. 16:27; Mk. 8:38; Tit. 2:13; 1 Pet. 4:13), and his preexistence (Jn. 12:41; 17:5). The vb. doxazō is used in a corresponding sense, especially in Jn. (e.g., 7:39; 11:4; 12:16; 13:31–32; 17:1).

(d) The NT also contains evidence of the concept that had been widespread since Ezekiel, that angels and other heavenly beings are endowed with glory. This is found in manifestations from heaven, where stress is laid on the visible light (Lk. 2:9; 9:31; Acts 22:11; Rev. 18:1). It is carried a step further when angelic powers are called doxai in Jude 8 (cf. 2 Pet. 2:10).

(e) When Paul speaks of the glory of the first man (1 Cor. 11:7) and explains the shining of Moses' face as the shining of glory (2 Cor. 3:7–18; cf. Exod. 34:30), he is also using Jewish concepts. Equally of Jewish origin is the idea that believers share in the glory (Jn. 17:22; Rom. 8:30; 2 Cor. 3:18) or will do so (Rom. 8:17–18, 21; Phil. 3:21; Heb. 2:10; 1 Pet. 5:1, 4, 10). The Christian hope is "the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27).

3. The other forms of the word group need only brief mention. syndoxazō (only in Rom. 8:17), be glorified together with someone, has essentially the same meaning as 1(e). endoxazomai (only 2 Thess. 1:10, 12) is synonymous with doxazō. The adj. endoxos (4x) means glorious; it can be linked with God or human beings (Lk. 7:25; 13:17; 1 Cor. 4:10; Eph. 5:27). kenodoxos (only Gal. 5:26) and kenodoxia (only Phil. 2:3) express the vain desire for honor. This meaning is not unknown in secular Gk., but it is in Christian lit. that those words first find wider usage.

4. For the Greeks fame and glory were among the most important values in life. Rabbis also had a high esteem for a person's honor. In Matt. 6:2, however, Jesus censures a piety that looks for honor from others; such an attitude is incompatible with faith (Jn. 5:44). Paul, following Jesus' example (Jn. 5:41; 8:50; cf. Heb. 5:4–5; 2 Pet. 1:17), did not seek glory from human beings (1 Thess. 2:6). Rather, he voluntarily accepted dishonor (2 Cor. 4:10; 6:8), strove to carry out his service to the honor of the Lord (2 Cor. 8:19–21), and looked to the praise Christ would give him as reward on his day (Phil. 2:16; 1 Thess. 2:19–20). Paul's statement that in the final judgment the righteous will receive "glory, honor and immortality" refers to eternal life itself (Rom. 2:7, cf. 2:10).

5. The glory of this world is depreciated in the light of eschatology, although Jesus could also recognize the glory of the creation (Matt. 6:29; Lk. 12:27). In the NT glory means the divine eschatological reality or manner of existence. Salvation lies in humanity and nature having a share in this ultimate manner of existence. The thought in the NT that the eschatological glory will take believers as well as the entire creation up into itself through a new creation or transfiguration is a development beyond the OT (Rom. 8:18, 21; 1 Cor. 15:43; 2 Cor. 3:18; 4:17; Phil. 3:21; Col. 3:4; 1 Pet. 5:1; but cf. Isa. 66:19, 22).

This concept does not, however, cancel the link with the OT kābôd. For glory manifests itself in the NT, just as in the OT, in the operation of God's power and salvation in "salvation history." It appears above all in Christ and his work of salvation (Lk. 9:29–35; Jn. 1:14; 2:11; 2 Cor. 4:4, 6), in believers (Jn. 17:22; 2 Cor. 3:18; Eph. 1:18; 3:16; Col. 1:11), and indeed already in the old covenant (2 Cor. 3:7–11).The presence of this "personal" doxa of God in Christ means the presence of salvation (Jn. 1:14; 17:22; 2 Cor. 4:4, 6).

Glory with its transforming power is operative even now among believers (Rom. 8:30; 2 Cor. 3:18) through the resurrection of Christ and our fellowship with him, who is "the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep" (1 Cor. 15:20).

6. The transfiguration of Jesus (Matt. 17:1–8; Mk. 9:2–8; Lk. 9:28–36) corresponds in the Synoptics to the continuing possession of doxa in Jn., though only in Lk. 9:32 is doxa used with reference to Jesus. The transfiguration is a parallel on a higher plane to Moses' meeting with God on Mount Sinai (Exod. 24:15–18; 33:18–34:35). However, it is not to be understood, as in the case of Moses, as merely a reflection caused by temporary contact with the heavenly world, but rather as a revelation of the glory that Jesus possessed continually but not openly. At his Parousia Jesus will be revealed in his glory and power (Matt. 19:28).

δοῦλος (doulos), slave (1528); δουλεία (douleia), slavery (1525); δουλεύω (douleuō), be subject, serve (1526); δουλαγωγέω (doulagōgeō), to bring into slavery (1524); δούλη (doulē), female slave (1527); δοῦλος[2] (doulos[2]), adj. enslaved, in slavery (1529); δουλόω (douloō), become a slave (1530); σύνδουλος (syndoulos), fellow servant (5281).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. times, personal freedom was a prized possession. To be independent of others and to manage one's own life was the essence of such freedom. Humans found their true worth in being conscious of themselves and in the free development of their potential. Because douleuō involved the abrogation of one's own autonomy and the subordination of one's will to that of another, the Greeks felt revulsion and contempt for a slave; subordination in service was debasing and contemptible.

This group of words is shown in a favorable and honorable light only in the phrase "to serve [douleuō] the laws." The idea of serving the gods appears first in the Cynic Stoics. Along similar lines, a Stoic wise man so excused himself from all obligation to serve the community (cf. the Stoic concept of world citizenship) that he made himself a free servant of his neighbor.

2. (a) In the OT the primary word for servant is ʿebed (pl. ʿbādîm). In the main, two different Gk. words are used to translate this Heb. word: doulos and pais (→ 4090). Of the 800 or so occurrences of ʿebed in the Heb. OT, pais is used 340x, doulos, 327x. In general in the LXX, doulos denotes someone in enforced bondage, while pais denotes the free servant of the king (e.g., 2 Sam. 11:24; 15:15). This latter usage in court circles led to the frequent use of ʿebed, servant, as a humble self-designation (Gen. 33:5, pais).

(b) Slaves from foreign nations often came to the Israelites via war (cf. Num. 31:7–12; Deut. 20:10–15; 1 Ki. 20:39; 2 Chr. 28:8–9). Some were presented to the tabernacle or temple (Num. 31:32–47; Jos. 9:23–27; Ezr. 8:20), others to military leaders (Deut. 20:10–14; 21:10; Jdg. 5:30). But most belonged to the king, and slaves were an important part of the Israelite economy under the monarchy (1 Ki. 9:21).

From earliest times right up to the revolt of A.D. 70, Hebrews could possess slaves from among their own people (e.g., Exod. 21:2; Jer. 34:8–11). A Hebrew was forcibly sold as a slave by a court if he could not make good the value of stolen goods, since he could not pay his debts (Exod. 21:2), or because he or she sold himself or herself because of poverty (Deut. 15:12; 2 Ki. 4:1; Neh. 5:1–5). In all cases, such slavery was normally limited to six years (but cf. Exod. 21:5–6; Deut. 15:16–17). The OT law regulates the protection of slaves (Exod. 21:2–11; Lev. 25:39–55; Deut. 15:12–18). Slaves played a full part in cultic life (circumcision, Gen. 17:12–13; Sabbath, Exod. 20:10; sacrifice, Deut. 12:18; Passover, Exod. 12:44).

(c) The memory of Israel's experiences in their captivity in Egypt, "the land of slavery [LXX douleia]" (Exod. 13:3, 14) lingered on and was the primary source of this root's essential meaning and its emphasis on being a slave, i.e., a repressive or at least dependent form of service under the complete control of a superior. Israel's recollection of Egyptian bondage determined (Deut. 15:12–15) the treatment of fellow Hebrews mentioned above (see Exod. 21:2).

3. (a) The religious use of the idea of slave was probably influenced by court practice. douleuō is the usual LXX word for worship in this context (Jdg. 2:7; 2 Chr. 30:8). As in the rest of the ancient Near East, although in contrast to ancient Gk. ideas, worshipers of God in the OT styled themselves as his servants. They thus gave expression to his awesomeness and to their duty to serve God, placing themselves under his protection.

(b) In contrast to other Sem. cultures, however, only rarely is the bestowal of a name used to designate this belonging to God—e.g., Obadiah, whose name means "servant of Yahweh" (1 Ki. 18:3–16). Just as one humbly referred to oneself as "your servant" when addressing the king (e.g., 2 Sam. 9:8), so those who prayed to God frequently designated themselves as "servant" (e.g., Ps. 19:11, 13; 31:16; 86:2, 4; 119:17, 23, 38, 49). Yahweh can also ascribe to someone the title "my servant" (e.g., Job 1:8; in such references in the LXX, sometimes doulos is used and sometimes pais). The worth of a doulos stood or fell with one's knowledge of Yahweh and relations with him. Hence, although doulos retained the element of unconditional subjection to another, it lost the character of abject baseness. As a result of God's special election, doulos became a title of honor (Ps. 89:3).

4. (b) The Heb. designation ʿebed (servant) is used of Moses (Jos. 1:1–2), Joshua (24:29), the patriarchs (Exod. 32:13; Deut. 9:27), and David (1 Ki. 8:24–26; 14:8). Even Nebuchadnezzar is called a servant of Yahweh (Jer. 25:9). Similarly, Job, who has even less connection with the people of Israel, receives the title of "servant" in the prologue and epilogue of the book (Job 1:8; 2:3; 42:7–8). From Ezekiel's time on, the sing. ʿebed is used of the people of Israel (Ezek. 28:25; 37:25), and Isa. uses the pl. of the whole body of Israelites (Isa. 54:17). In Isa. 56:6 proselytes too are called those who "serve" (douleuō) God.

(b) The "servant of God" expression in the OT can be divided into two main traditions. (i) In 2 Sam. 3:18 the king (David) is Yahweh's servant, whose special function lies in saving the people from all its enemies (cf. also Ezek. 34:23–24; 37:24–25; Hag. 2:23; Zech. 3:8). (ii) The prophets, who are the authoritative messengers of God's word (1 Ki. 18:36), impose God's will on the people, and set historical processes in motion, are Yahweh's "servants" (e.g., Amos 3:7).

(c) Most prominent in Isa. are four passages known as the "servant songs": Isa. 42:1–9; 49:1–7; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12. Some scholars, on the basis of 49:3, have identified this servant as the people of Israel collectively. Others find a movement within these songs from a collective to an individual identification of this servant. An individual interpretation of the songs is supported by 49:5–6, which sets the servant over against the people. Some suppose him to be a prophet because of his peculiarly prophetic traits (ear, 50:4–5; mouth, 49:1–2), while others, because he establishes justice (42:1, 3–4), releases prisoners (42:7; 49:9), and wields a sword (49:2), see him as a king. Such extreme language can never have been applied to a living or dead person. In other words, the servant represents someone who is yet to come—Israel's Messiah.

NT 1. doulos occurs 124x, of which 30 are in Paul, 30 in Matt., and 26 in Lk. douleuō occurs 25x, of which 17 are in Paul. douloō (8x, mostly in Paul) is a synonym for douleuō. (a) In order to appreciate the nuances of meaning in the NT, we must first see what its attitude is to the position of the slave in society, esp. as seen in Jesus' parables. Occasionally, slaves are put in positions of responsibility and command (Matt. 24:45). But a slave owed his master exclusive and absolute obedience (8:9); "no one can serve [douleuō] two masters" (6:24). A slave's work earned neither profit nor thanks; he was only doing what he owed (Lk. 17:7–10). The master could use his unlimited power over his slave for good (Matt. 18:27) or for unmerciful punishment, if the slave was guilty of some fault (18:34; 25:30).

The NT resists our contemporary verdict on slaves as a contemptible lower class, by its use of doulos in Jesus' parables to describe the relation of all people to God. It finds nothing objectionable in the division of society into master and servant, free and bond. Note too how the NT repeatedly calls slaves to be obedient to their masters in all things—even to unmerciful ones (Eph. 6:5; Col. 3:22; 1 Tim. 6:1; Tit. 2:9; cf. 1 Pet. 2:18). Paul recognizes Philemon's right to Onesimus as his possession, even if Philemon's position shows something of the tension existing between the status quo and faith in the one master, the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 7:20–24). Note 1 Cor. 7:21b: "if you can gain your freedom, do so." However, for Paul the main point is freedom in Christ (7:22f–24).

(b) The sociological problems of this state of affairs are mitigated by the fact that God's revelation in Jesus Christ shows that all are in the relentless grip of a completely different sort of slavery. Outside the sphere of Christ's rule all human beings are "slaves of sin" (Rom. 6:17, cf. 6:16). This douleia (slavery) can consist of a miserably meticulous observance of the letter of the law in the hope of gaining salvation (cf. Rom. 7:6, 25), of a slavish adoration of the mediating cosmic powers (Gal. 4:3, 8–9), of a frenzied horror of death (Heb. 2:15), or of the service of the belly (Rom. 16:18) and one's lusts (Tit. 3:3). This means in general that "everyone who sins is a slave to sin" (Jn. 8:34).

One cannot free oneself from this servitude of sin by one's own efforts or change masters by one's own decision. Only those whom the Son sets free are really free (Jn. 8:36). Christ's redemption frees one for obedient service under the command of him as Lord (Rom. 12:11; 14:18; Col. 3:24) and leads one into the service of righteousness in the new Spirit-given nature (Rom. 6:18, douloō; 7:6). Paul regards himself, called to his office as an apostle, in a special way as a doulos of Christ Jesus (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:10; Phil. 1:1).

Paul also uses the word doulos to refer to the office of some of his colleagues, such as Epaphras (Col. 4:12). In this titular sense doulos is closest in sense to diakonos (servant), a word Paul uses frequently of the apostolic service of witness (cf. Col. 4:7, "minister [diakonos] and fellow servant [syndoulos]"; → diakoneō, serve, 1354). Here, as elsewhere, the distinctive thing about the concept of the doulos is the subordinate, obligatory, and responsible nature of one's service in exclusive relation to one's Lord. At the same time, all who are called to freedom must serve (douleuō) one another in love (Gal. 5:13). Paul made himself a servant of all (1 Cor. 9:19, douloō); in the service of the gospel (Phil. 2:22) he is the doulos of the community for Christ's sake (2 Cor. 4:5). He who would be first in Christ's community must be its doulos (Matt. 20:27).

2. This last evaluation of slavery is only excelled by the dignity given to it insofar as the Lord Jesus took upon himself the title of doulos. Christ divested himself and took on "the very nature of a servant [doulos]" (Phil. 2:7). This statement shows the theological significance of this group of words. In becoming a human being, the preexistent Lord takes on the form of a slave. When Christ took on this form, he entered into full solidarity with humankind in its subjection to sin, law, and death. As servant, he was subject to the law (Gal. 4:4) and bore its curse (3:13). He took on a form "in the likeness of sinful man" (Rom. 8:3) and thus made himself a brother of the human race, "who all their lives were held in slavery [douleia] by their fear of death" (Heb. 2:15). The form of the doulos most precisely describes Jesus Christ's incarnation as the deepest self-abasement.

3. The Lord's form as a doulos unmasks the nature of the unredeemed person's life as douleia. This slavery is that of sin, i.e., obsession with the illusion that we can make or maintain our own lives and freedom in our own power. That which the Greeks regarded as the highest form of freedom (cf. above) becomes in the NT the source of abject bondage. We obstinately wave God's help aside and busy ourselves in running our own lives in our own strength, trusting in our own resources and falling into the grip of fear (Rom. 8:15; Heb. 2:15). We make use of the law and the powers of this world to create our own righteousness and are enslaved under the curse of the law (Gal. 3:13), being "slaves to those who by nature are not gods" (4:8). Since every attempt to liberate ourselves ensnares us further, our douleia is complete and is not restricted, as in gnostic dualism, to the level of matter and the body.

4. Jesus Christ alone redeems humankind from slavery to sin with the price of his death. The metaphor of sacral manumission is here united with the idea of a change of masters. Believers "have been set free from sin and have become slaves to righteousness" (Rom. 6:18; cf. also 6:19, where Paul uses the alternate word doulos [1529] to contrast our former slavery to sin with our present slavery to righteousness; see also 6:22). In other words, our manumission from bondage of a supposed independence does not lead to a new independence. Rather, the one manumitted is set free for "the obedience that comes from faith" (1:5), which he or she offers to the Lord Jesus Christ as a slave (12:11; 14:18; Col. 3:24; cf. Rom. 7:6; 1 Thess. 1:9). In fact, our servitude to Christ demands that we make our bodies our slaves (doulagōgeō; 1 Cor. 9:27) so we might not forfeit the prize for which we labor.

Yet this new relationship of master and servant is not dominated by "a spirit that makes you a slave again to fear"; rather, believers have "received the Spirit of sonship" (Rom. 8:15). However, this freedom of God's children must not become an occasion "to indulge the sinful nature"; rather, we must "serve [douleuō] one another in love" (Gal. 5:13). This sort of service of love to one's neighbors is rooted in Christ's love in taking the form of a servant (note how the exhortations of Phil. 2:1–4 are causally related to 2:5–11). As a doulos, Jesus showed his love to his disciples by washing their feet (the duty of a slave), "that you should do as I have done for you" (Jn. 13:15). The nature of Christ's loving work thereby prevents any separation between serving God and serving one's neighbor.

5. Hence, those who want to be first in Jesus Christ's community must be its slaves (Matt. 20:27). It is understandable, then, in light of this dialectical concept of Christian freedom as a douleia after the pattern of the Redeemer, that the sociological question of the freedom of slaves did not appear a pressing one in the NT. Christians were aware of the indelible distinction between master and slave. However, the liberating knowledge of the common service that both had to one heavenly Master (Eph. 6:9) was normative.

Master and servant must be subject to this Lord, because in their mutual treatment of each other they join themselves to that community whose rule is love. It is thus not left to one's individual choice to decide whether or not to subject oneself to others in the community. It is precisely the concept of douleuō, in contrast to that of diakoneō (serve), that emphasizes the obligatory character of service to God and to one's neighbor as the duty of all those set free by Jesus Christ.

1529 (*doulos*², adj. enslaved, in slavery), → 1528.

1530 (douloō, become a slave), → 1528.

δράκων (drakōn), dragon (1532).

CL & OT drakōn denotes dragon, snake, giant sea creature, or serpent. In many myths the drakōn is a picture of the primeval power of chaos, whose defeat at the hands of a god enabled the world to come into being. Such concepts may lie behind several OT passages: God killed "the gliding serpent" or "the monster" (Job 26:13; Ps. 74:13–14); someday God will kill "the gliding serpent" in the sea (Isa. 27:1); monsters or serpents live in the sea (Job. 7:12; Ps. 148:7; Amos 9:3). In calling Pharaoh a monster, Ezek. 29:3; 32:2 typifies the attitude of the OT to the mythological worldview. It praises the fact that Yahweh has removed all threats to his people in the past and will continue to do so. That is why the LXX, in the account of the signs by which Moses was to confirm his call, translates snake by drakōn, so as to give greater glory to God's action (Exod. 7:9–12).

NT In the NT drakōn is found only in Rev., where it is used exclusively as a synonym for Satan (see 12:9; 20:2; cf. Gen. 3:1–15). In Rev. 12 the dragon has 7 heads and 10 horns (cf. Dan. 7:7–8). It has power in heaven, so that its tail sweeps down a third of the stars. Demons are subordinate to it. It stands by the woman who is about to give birth to the man child so that it may devour him but is defeated by Michael and his angels and is cast down to earth together with its demons (12:7–9). There it persecutes the woman and tries to drown her in a flood of water from its mouth (12:13–17).

On earth the dragon gives its power and its throne to the "beast" (which, like the dragon, has 7 heads and 10 horns). The beast causes the inhabitants of the world to worship the dragon (13:2, 4). The dragon is thrown into the abyss by an angel for a period of a thousand years (i.e., a millennium, 20:2–3; → chilias, 5942), so that it can no longer deceive the nations. When the thousand years are past, it is released and collects Gog and Magog for the final battle against God's people; it is defeated and thrown into the lake of fire (20:8, 10). The consummation of Christ's victory will be the elimination of Satan.

δύναμις (dynamis), power, might, strength, force, ability, capability, deed of power, resources (1539); δύναμαι (dynamai), to be strong enough to, be able to (1538); δυνάστης (dynastēs), a ruler, sovereign (1541); δυναμόω (dynamoō), strengthen (1540); ἐνδυναμόω (endynamoō), strengthen (1904); δυνατός (dynatos), powerful, strong, mighty, able (1543); δυνατέω (dynateō), be strong, able, strong enough (1542); ἀδυνατέω (adynateō), to be impossible (104); ἀδύνατος (adynatos), powerless, impotent (105).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. dynamis means ability to achieve, physical strength; then troops, fighting forces, and political power. This word also figures in the realm of nature, e.g., in the power of heat and cold and the healing power of certain plants and elements. In Hel. times the word took on metaphysical connotations. The Stoics, for example, equated the all-pervading creative force with God. The gnostics honored God as the Almighty and hoped for redemption through their incorporation into the heavenly powers, often through magic. Sick people looked for healing through the power of the god Asclepius.

2. In the LXX dynamis generally means military forces (e.g., Exod. 15:4; Deut. 11:4). It can also stand for the power of a ruler (e.g., Jdg. 8:21) or of God (e.g., Ps. 68:28). The pl. was used to translate ṣᵉbā'ôt in the phrase "Yahweh Sabaoth," i.e., the Lord of the heavenly hosts (e.g., Ps. 46:7, 11; 48:8). Yahweh is in control of the transcendent powers; autonomous powers of nature and magic are pushed into the background. His might is primarily revealed at the level of history and to a particular people. The proof of God's power, so fundamental for Israel, was the miraculous deliverance by the Lord's hand at the Red Sea (Deut. 3:24).

The subsequent theological struggle with Canaanite religion led to an emphasis on God's activity in nature and his power over it; the most comprehensive demonstration of that power is his creation of the world (cf. Jer. 27:5; 32:17). On the basis of the nation's experience, individuals can also praise God as their refuge and "strength" (2 Sam. 22:31–40; Ps. 46:1). God's power, at work in the believer, is the Spirit (Mic. 3:8, dynasteia). God is Spirit, not flesh; he far transcends the whole creation (cf. Isa. 31:3–4).

3. Jewish apocalyptic lived in the expectation of the divine judgment of the world in the near future; his people hoped to see a display of the might of which they currently experienced so little. The writings from Qumran foresaw the triumph of God's power and might in the war of the children of light against the children of darkness. The end of the age brings the conclusive and world-embracing demonstration of God's mighty deeds (1QM 11:1–12:5). In this, God's power is expressed through both human fighters and the mighty angels. The Messiah too will be a victorious warrior and will be the instrument of God's final demonstration of power (Pss. Sol. 17:24, 42–43, 51). In some Jewish writings, "power" serves as a circumlocution for the name of God. Wisdom is described as a mirror of the power of God (Wis. 7:25–26).

NT The noun dynamis (119x) is esp. frequent in Paul's letters. dynamoō (2x) and dynateō (3x) are rare, but the vb. dynamai, to be able (expressing possibility or capability), occurs 210x. The compound verb endynamoō is used 7x. The adj. dynatos occurs 32x, whereas the noun dynastēs (ruler) occurs 3x, twice in reference to secular rulers (Lk. 1:52; Acts 8:27) and once with reference to God (1 Tim. 6:15). The adj. adynatos (powerless) occurs 10x, the vb. adynateō, 2x.

1. The Synoptic Gospels and Acts. Here dynamis denotes the power of God, the heavenly powers (in the pl.), miraculous power (in the pl., mighty deeds, miracles), and the power that brings salvation to completion.

(a) Mary confesses that God is the "Mighty One" (Lk. 1:49, dynatos), probably in response to the angel Gabriel, who affirmed that with God nothing is impossible (adynateō, 1:37); Jesus himself used the reverential circumlocution of "the Mighty One" to refer to God (Mk. 14:62). All his work is supported by the knowledge of the almighty power of God: "With God all things are possible" (Matt. 19:26; Mk. 10:27; Lk. 18:27; in contrast to adynatos [impossible] in all three; cf. 14:35). At the end, his power is declared preeminently in the resurrection of the dead (Mk. 12:24).

(b) The NT also speaks of "powers," i.e., cosmic, spiritual powers that can appear in person (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 1:21; 1 Pet. 3:22). Significantly, superhuman representatives of evil are also credited with having power, but it is always pointed out either that their power has already been broken or that it will shortly be abolished (cf. Matt. 12:29; Mk. 3:27; Lk. 10:19; 11:22; 1 Cor. 15:24; 2 Thess. 2:9; Rev. 13:2; 17:13–14). It is fundamental for the proclamation of the good news that, in and through Christ, those things to which both the OT and Jud. looked forward have taken place, namely, God's demonstration of power in the last days and his triumph over the rise of evil.

(c) Christ was powerful in speech and action (Lk. 24:19). His miracles are called dynameis (e.g., Acts 2:22), because in them God's rule on earth began to have a powerful effect, and the fight against the devil was carried out on the level of human existence (Matt. 12:22–30; Mk. 6:2, 5; Lk. 19:37; Acts 10:38). Jesus is the "more powerful" one (Mk. 1:7, ischys, → 2709), who, as God's representative, subdues the strong man, i.e., the devil. His miracles were done by a "power" within himself (Mk. 5:30; 6:14). Lk. links this God-given power with the Holy Spirit (Lk. 1:35; 4:14; Acts 10:38). These miracles, therefore, demonstrate that Jesus is the Messiah, the one anointed with the Spirit (Acts 2:22; 10:38). By the power of this same Spirit bestowed on the apostles (Acts 4:7; 6:8), they performed great "miracles" (dynameis in 8:13; 19:11). The apostles' authoritative preaching (4:33; cf. 6:8–10) was proof of a supernatural power.

(d) All these proofs of the Spirit and of divine power, of course, are only recognized as such where there is faith. They cannot take place in an area of unbelief (Mk. 6:5). But the final demonstration of Christ's power will be both public and irresistible. This will be at the time of his return (Matt. 24:32; Mk. 13:28; Lk. 21:29), when the kingdom of God will be consummated "with power" (Matt. 24:30; Mk. 9:1; 13:26). Believers already have a share in this final demonstration of God's power, which is why no limits are put to their actions, since all things are possible for them (Mk. 9:23; cf. adynateō in Matt. 17:20).

2. John's Gospel and Revelation. (a) dynamis does not occur in the Gospel of Jn., because here the messianic activity of Jesus is based on God's sending of his Son and on the unity of will between Father and Son. The Son "can [dynamai] do nothing" without the Father (5:19, 30); his miracles are signs (20:30; → sēmeion, 4956) that reveal the divine power of Jesus. Conversely, the inability of humans to believe in Jesus and to enter the sphere of God's reality is due to their imprisonment in the world of darkness (3:3; 8:43; 14:17). Only election (6:44) and rebirth (3:5) secure their release.

(b) Rev. sees the saints in a vision praising Christ, who, by his enthronement in heaven (→ thronos, 2585), has crowned his redeeming work on earth. Admittedly, it is God who is worshiped in the hymns of praise for his "glory and honor and power [dynamis]" (Rev. 4:11; cf. 7:12; 19:1), but the exalted Christ is also worthy to receive such sovereign power on the grounds of his sacrificial death (5:12; 12:10). For it was through Christ that God broke the power of evil rulers of the world (13:2); Christ made possible the victorious culmination of God's sovereign rule (11:17; 12:10). John's visions of the Son of Man are given a Christological interpretation (cf. 13:1–14 with Dan. 7) and are polemically contrasted with Roman world domination and the Caesar cult.

3. Paul. Paul lays a greater emphasis on the present experience of the revelation of God's power, which he understands primarily in terms of the power that raises the dead in the last days and the new creativity of the Holy Spirit. This power of God was evident in Christ, the Risen One; as the now Exalted One, he is the bearer and the mediator of this same power. Admittedly, God's invisible power can be deduced from the works of creation (cf. Rom. 1:20). But it is the resurrection of Jesus that represents the central proof of God's might (cf. 1:4; 1 Cor. 5:4; 2 Cor. 13:4; Phil. 3:10). With the resurrection belongs the exaltation (Eph. 1:20–21), whereby Christ became the "power of God" (1 Cor. 1:24). Paul uses endynamoō, to strengthen, to describe this work of the exalted Christ in the lives of individual believers in Phil. 4:13 (also Eph. 6:10; 1 Tim. 1:12; 2 Tim. 2:1; 4:17). In Christ's mediating work is a double revelation of God's power: the Word that brings salvation and the Holy Spirit who creates and makes new.

(a) The gospel is effective as the "power of God" that brings salvation (Rom. 1:16; 1 Cor. 1:18), for the preacher speaks in Christ's power (2 Tim. 1:8–9; cf. 4:17). It announces the love of God, whom we would otherwise fear as the condemning judge of the world; this love was visibly proved on the cross when Christ died for us while we were still sinners (Rom. 5:8). Believers see, through the gospel, that the OT promises have now come into force; they discover in the process the previously announced gospel of God in OT prophecy (Rom. 1:2).

(b) The natural self does not have the power to please God or to fulfill the law (cf. Rom. 8:7–8; Gal. 3:21). In our weakness we even experience the law to be a power that misleads us into sin (cf. Rom. 5:20; 1 Cor. 15:56). But as believers, like the risen Lord, we live in the power of God and of Christ (2 Cor. 6:7; 13:3–4; also Eph. 1:19). It is not obedience to the law but the love of Christ that protects us from the cosmic powers (Rom. 8:38–39). The kingdom of God is experienced in power, in sharp contrast to mere words (1 Cor. 4:19–20) and exterior piety (2 Tim. 3:5). Because God's power is intended for the glorification of Christians, there is a close link between it and his glory (→ doxa, 1518; cf. Rom. 1:4 with 6:4).

(c) Paul also connects the power of God with the Holy Spirit, who is the power of the resurrection and of the life in the new aeon as well as the power that works signs and wonders (Rom. 15:19; 1 Cor. 12:10, 28; Gal. 3:5), which also vindicate Paul's apostleship (2 Cor. 12:12). dynamis therefore denotes here the Spirit insofar as he is revealed in the mighty works of those gifted with the Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 2:13, 15; 3:1; 14:37; Gal. 6:1). The Spirit, as the power of Christ, realizes the authority of the heavenly Lord in the earthly community. For Paul, to be in Christ (e.g., Rom. 5:1; 1 Cor. 1:30) and to be in the Spirit (e.g., Rom. 8:11, 14–16; 1 Cor. 2:4, 12–13) are one and the same thing. The two thoughts are brought together in Eph. 2:18.

The Spirit has power to purify and judge the church (1 Cor. 5:4). He strengthens it and trains it in patience so that its members are kept in faith until judgment day

(cf. Eph. 3:16–17; Col. 1:11; 2 Thess. 1:11–12). Since the Spirit is the representative of the exalted Lord, he cannot be manipulated like the power of magic in the hands of a magician (cf. Acts 8:18–20). On the contrary, his supernatural origin and his characteristic as the power of God is proved by the fact that in weak human beings he is powerful (2 Cor. 12:9–10). From the human point of view, God chose weak and unworthy things to be objects of his demonstrations of might (1 Cor. 1:27): e.g., Paul, the former persecutor of Christians, and the social nonentities of Corinth.

(d) The greatest proof of this law of divine action and the justification of the despised Christian way of life is to be found in the cross. Christ died on the cross in weakness, having renounced all claims to power, and he now lives by the power of God (2 Cor. 13:4). The same is true of Christians: They are weak, but that is the very reason why God's power equips them for life with Christ. Accordingly, God's work in a believer is contrary to human expectations. Paul, though in prison, is able to say that he can do all things through the One who makes him strong (Phil. 4:13). The strong in Christ, for their part, are to regard themselves as under obligation to serve their weaker brothers and sisters. Thus they will avoid the danger of forgetting that the strength they have is not their own but has been given them by Christ. Thus they will not misuse their freedom for their own ends (Rom. 15:1).

(e) By the power of God, Christians are assured of future perfection. The present inner transformation, which has already begun, will be followed by the visible and total transformation of the body for eternal life. This will take place when we are raised from the dead by the same divine power that raised Jesus (1 Cor. 6:14; cf. 2 Cor. 4:14). Christ will then change us by his power and so will change our lowly earthly bodies to be like his own glorified body (Phil. 3:21). On this account, the Christian hope is based on the resurrection and knows the power that was made visible when Christ was raised from the dead (Phil. 3:10; cf. 1 Cor. 4:19–20).

4. The adj. adynatos, powerless, impotent, is used of the helpless lame man at Lystra, crippled from birth (Acts 14:8), who was healed in response to Paul's command to stand on his feet. In Rom. 15:1 this word is used as a noun in the contrast: "We who are strong [dynatos] ought to bear with the failings of the weak [adynatos]" (cf. a related contrast in Matt. 19:26; Mk. 10:27; Lk. 18:27).

In Heb. 6:4 adynatos denotes the impossibility of restoring those who commit apostasy, and also the impossibility of God ever proving to be false (6:18). In 10:4 this word asserts that it is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sin. This stands in contrast with the fact that without faith it is impossible to please God (11:6).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. as well as in LXX and Jud., dynō (also dyō) often refers to the going down of the sun; fig. these vbs. mean put on, arm oneself (e.g., with strength). ekdyō means undress (oneself), extract oneself from, escape. endyō means to clothe or dress (oneself), put on (e.g., a garment, weapon), and fig. assume qualities, virtues.

NT 1. dynō is found only in Mk. 1:32; Lk. 4:40, both times of the setting of the sun.

2. ekdyō has a lit. meaning (stripping a person of his or her clothes) in Matt. 27:28, 31; Mk. 15:20; Lk. 10:30. The fig. meaning occurs in 2 Cor. 5:4; Paul uses it without an obj. in the sense of undressing oneself, losing the garment of the body: "We do not wish to be unclothed." Three general lines of interpretation may be traced (see also gymnos, 1218).

(a) Paul longed for Christ's return before his death, because death would bring with it an intermediate, bodiless state (gymnos), an existence in nakedness. In other words, Paul did not wish to lose his garment (i.e., his body) through death, but instead to be further clothed at the Parousia. Note, however, that elsewhere Paul indicates he was looking forward to fellowship with Christ in the intermediate period (Phil. 1:23)

(b) Paul did not want to lose the garment of his body, because its loss is the fate of the unbelievers, who lose their earthly body in death and receive no heavenly body.

(c) Paul was combating a gnostic group in Corinth. The gnostics longed to be freed from the covering of the body. Note esp. how Paul is not stressing being unclothed, but being further clothed. At the same time, evidence for Gnosticism in the 1st cent. is slim at best.

3. apotithēmi is used fig. in the NT for the laying aside of carnal qualities (Rom. 13:12; Eph. 4:25), even one's whole being insofar as it lies under the power of the former age. Paul encourages us to "put off your old self" (Eph. 4:22; cf. Col. 3:9) and to "put on the new self" (endyō, Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10; cf. Rom. 6:4–5; Gal. 3:27). In 1 Pet. 3:21 apothesis is used for the removal of dirt; in 2 Pet. 1:14, for putting off the earthly body (i.e., death).

4. (a) apekdyomai is found in Col. 2:15 and 3:9. In the latter the obj. is a thing: "You have taken off your old self." Paul stresses with this vb. that it is a complete putting off and putting away, which makes falling back into the former manner of life impossible. apekdyomai in Col. 2:15 has the force of undressing, rendering powerless (the mid. is being used as an act.). God has "disarmed [undressed] the powers and authorities." Behind this verse lies an oriental custom. When someone in high office was deposed, he had to put off the robes of his office. In the same way God stripped the powers of their honors and gave their power to the one to whom it alone belonged, Christ.

(b) apekdysis occurs only in Col. 2:11, where it is used metaphorically. Paul uses it to describe the true circumcision, "not . . . a circumcision done by the hands of men but . . . the circumcision done by Christ." It consists of "the putting off of the sinful nature," which the Christian experiences in baptism, and baptism is being buried with Christ (2:12).

5. endyō is used 28x in the NT and endyma 8x. Jesus uses the noun in his challenge to us to consider that life is more than food and the body more than clothes (Matt. 6:25, 28; Lk. 12:23). The angel at the resurrection was wearing brilliant apparel (Matt. 28:3). Alongside the lit. meaning of the vb. (Matt. 27:31), endyō is often used fig. (a) One can put on spiritual armor (Rom. 13:12; Eph. 6:11), Christian virtues (Col. 3:12; 1 Thess. 5:8), and the spiritual, resurrection body (1 Cor. 15:53).

(b) One can also put on Christ (Rom. 13:14; Gal. 3:27). This is done both by baptism and faith. If we regarded this purely formally, Paul's linguistic usage might suggest an approximation to the rituals of the mystery religions, in which initiates sought to identify themselves with the gods by putting on ritual garments. In fact, however, Paul is concerned with a new relationship of one's personality with Christ. For him putting on Christ means sharing Christ's nature. He also writes of the putting on of the new self (Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10), which is identical with Christ (cf. Gal. 2:20).

(c) endyō is used absolutely in 2 Cor. 5:3: "when we are clothed." Paul did not desire to be freed from having a body but wished to put on a new, spiritual body. This being clothed takes place at the Parousia.

5. ependyomai is found only in 2 Cor. 5:2, 4. Paul longs to have his heavenly body put on over his present one. The mid. is used with a pass. sense.

δύο (dyo), two (1545); δίστομος (distomos), double-edged (1492).

NT 1. The word dyo occurs some 135x in the NT, but few are of real importance. Two is the smallest expression of plurality and naturally points to alternatives or contrasts (cf. Matt. 6:24; 21:28; 24:40–41). Emissaries often traveled in pairs (cf. Matt. 21:1; Mk. 6:7). "Two or three" is a frequent approximation for a very few (e.g., Matt. 20).

2. In Jn. 8:17 Jesus refers to the OT principle that "the testimony of two men is valid" (cf. Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6; 19:15). He uses it to demonstrate that he himself and the Father are the two who bear witness to him. There are several other NT references to the need for two or three witnesses (Matt. 18:16; 2 Cor. 13:1; 1 Tim. 5:19; Heb. 10:28). Perhaps this same motif can be traced elsewhere in Gospel events (e.g., Jesus' transfiguration [Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2; Lk. 9:28]; Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane [Matt. 26:37; Mk. 14:33]; Jesus' conversation with the two on the way to Emmaus [Lk. 24:13]).

3. The only significant usage of the simple number two in Rev. is in 11:4–11, where again the theme is witness. The imagery goes back to Zech. 4:2–3, 11–14. In Rev. 11:6, however, the two witnesses have powers corresponding to those of Moses and Elijah, who are not named, but represent the testimony of the Law and the Prophets.

4. In Rev. 1:16 a sharp, two-edged (distomos) sword proceeds from the mouth of the risen Christ (cf. 2:12, 16). The language recalls Isa. 11:4; 49:2, but is applied to the need of Christians at Pergamum, who faced judicial execution by the Roman authority. The double edge on this sword describes a Roman weapon, and the Roman proconsul wielded the power of the sword. But here Christ holds the ultimate executive and judicial authority. The sword is later associated with "the Word of God" (19:13; 15; cf. Eph. 6:17; Heb. 4:12).

δώδεκα (dōdeka), twelve (1557).

CL & OT 1. The number twelve gets its symbolic meaning from the twelve months; it is thus also originally an astronomical number.

2. The OT, however, does not seem to be aware of this. The number twelve is found almost exclusively for the number of the tribes of Israel (e.g., Num. 1:4–49;

10:14–28; 13:2–15; 26:4–63; 34:13–28). Even after the dissolution of the united monarchy, the OT people of God continued to understand itself as the twelve tribes of the people of Israel (cf. 1 Ki. 18:31; Ezr. 8:35; Ezek. 47:13; 48:1–35). The number twelve in Scripture primarily denotes the people of God in its totality. In Jewish apocalyptic writings an astral-theological usage of the number twelve turns up (e.g., 1 Enoch 76:1–14; 82:11), alluding to the twelve tribes.

NT 1. The thought of the twelve tribes as the people of God is alive in the NT, not only as historical reminiscence (Acts 7:8), but also when Paul, before Agrippa, counts himself as a member of the twelve tribes and appeals to the promises made to them, which apply to him (Acts 26:7, dōdekaphylon; cf. also Phil. 3:5). The circle of "the Twelve" (e.g., Matt. 10:1–2, 5; 11:1; 19:28; 20:17; 26:14, 20; Lk. 8:1; 9:12; Jn. 6:67; 20:24; Acts 6:2; 1 Cor. 15:5) is to be seen against this background of the twelve tribes, since it owes its existence to a particular calling by the earthly Jesus (see also mathētēs, disciple, 3412; apostolos, apostle, 693).

In view of the presence of the kingdom of God among the disciples (i.e., Jesus himself), their commission (Mk. 3:14–15) points them primarily to the lost sheep of the old twelve tribes of the house of Israel (Matt. 10:6; 15:24), though they also have a representative function in the post-Easter church. Thus the NT people of God can be addressed in Jas. 1:1 as "the twelve tribes scattered among the nations" (cf. 1 Pet. 1:1), whereby the continuity of salvation history is maintained.

2. There is an echo of the astral-religious significance of the number twelve in Rev. 12:1, in the vision of a woman clothed with the sun, wearing a crown with twelve stars on her head. But the woman is here only the symbol of the daughter of Zion. The twelve stars of the crown signify the twelve tribes, the OT people of God (cf. Gen. 37:9–10), from whom the Messiah comes and to whom also belong all who confess the name of Jesus (Rev. 12:17). Correspondingly, the NT people of God, composed of Jews and Gentiles, is described in 7:4–8 in the 12 x 12,000 (or 144,000) sealed from the tribes of Israel (cf. also 14:3). Thus the number 144,000 does not denote a numerical limitation of those sealed; rather, it symbolizes the final perfection of God's people. Note that when John sees this crowd, as opposed to hearing their number, he sees "a great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, tribe, people and language" (7:9).

The number twelve in the description of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:12–27) is used as an expression of its glory, which is sufficient for the eschatological people of God. The church in heaven is the completion of the twelve tribes of the OT (21:12–13) and the twelve apostles of the NT (21:14).

3. In other respects twelve is used simply in its numerical sense (e.g., Matt. 9:20; Mk. 5:42; 8:19; Lk. 2:42; Acts 19:7; 24:11).

δῶρον (dōron), gift, present (1565); δωρεά (dōrea), gift (1561); δωρεάν (dōrean), as a present, gratis (1562); δωρέομαι (dōreomai), give, present (1563); δώρημα (dōrēma), present (1564); δίδωμι (didōmi), give, grant (1443); δόμα (doma), gift (1517); δότης (dotēs), giver (1522).

CL & OT 1. dōron is from do-, the same root as didōmi. All the words in this group revolve around the idea of a present, gift, or bestowal. dōrean (acc. of dōrea) is used adverbially in the sense of gratis, undeservedly, as a present. dōron (and dōrea) denotes esp. a complimentary gift. As a gift from the gods, it can also mean dispensation. As a gift to the gods, dōron denotes a consecrated gift. It can also mean tax, tribute, or bribe.

2. The LXX uses dōron with the following main meanings: (a) a present given to another person (Gen. 24:53; 32:13); (b) tribute, booty (Jdg. 3:15, 17–18; 5:19); (c) bribe (Exod. 23:7–8; Deut. 16:19); (d) most frequently, the cultic meaning of offering (esp. in Lev. and Num.; e.g., Lev. 1:2–3, 10, 14; Num. 5:15; 6:14), usually with the vb. prospherō, to bring, offer; (e) a gift brought to God in recognition of his greatness and power (Ps. 68:29; 72:10; Isa. 18:7); (f) a gift from God (Gen. 30:20). dōrēma appears in the LXX only in Sir. 34:21 (= LXX 31:18), and then only in some MSS.

3. dōreomai is rare in the LXX. It has the sense of "giving" (a) from one person to another (Est. 8:1; Prov. 4:2), (b) from people to God (Lev. 7:15 = LXX 7:5), and (c) from God to people (Gen. 30:20). Much more frequent is didōmi, which as a rule renders the Heb. nātan, to give (likewise used in this threefold way).

4. dōrea occurs in the LXX usually in the adverbial acc. form, dōrean. It means (a) for nothing (i.e., without payment, Exod. 21:2, 11; without recompense, Gen. 29:15), (b) without cause (1 Sam. 19:5; 25:31), or (c) in vain (Ezek. 6:10; Mal. 1:10).

NT 1. (a) In the NT dōron (19x) stands once for a human gift (Rev. 11:10; cf. Matt. 7:11; par. Lk. 11:13, doma) and once for the divine gift (Eph. 2:8). For the latter, dōrea is found more often (Jn. 4:10; Acts 2:38; Rom. 5:15, 17; Eph. 4:7; Heb. 6:4). Rom. 5:16 and Jas. 1:17 have dōrēma (in the latter together with dosis). All other uses of dōron denote an offering to God (e.g., Matt. 5:23–24; 23:18–19; Mk. 7:11; Heb. 5:1; 9:9; 11:4); note esp. Matt. 2:11, where it is the gift of adoration by the Magi. The occasional combination with prospherō, to bring, offer, underlines the connection with the OT sacrificial system (→ thyō, 2604).

(b) didōmi (415x) is found in all the nuances of presenting, giving, bestowing, granting, etc., both (i) among people (Matt. 7:11a; Acts 20:35) and (ii) by God (Matt. 7:11b; 1 Jn. 4:13; Rev. 2:7, 17). The meaning to offer also occurs (Lk. 2:24), while a metaphorical meaning (i.e., to allow or provide) is found in such passages as Mk. 10:37; Acts 13:20.

(c) dōrean (9x) has the threefold meaning common in the OT: (i) gratis, for nothing (Matt. 10:8; Rom. 3:24; 2 Cor. 11:7); (ii) without cause (Jn. 15:25, OT quotation from Ps. 35:19; 69:4); (iii) in vain (Gal. 2:21).

2. dōron and didōmi as cultic terms are found in contexts where the subject matter is the regular offering (Matt. 5:23–24; 8:4; Lk. 2:24). Some passages emphasize, in keeping with OT prophecy, that religious offerings are no substitute for obedience to God's will (e.g., Matt. 15:5; Mk. 7:11; cf. Isa. 1:10–17; Mic. 6:6–8). The problem of the sacrificial cult is faced squarely in Heb. (e.g., Heb. 5:1–10; 8:3–4), where a contrast is drawn between the merely temporary OT system with its offerings (dōron and thysia) made by human beings and the final, once-for-all offering of Christ (7:26–28; 9:25–28; 10:10–14).

3. This opens up the NT teaching that God is a God who gives and that his giving is seen supremely in the redeeming work of Christ. (a) There are general statements to the effect that God "gave" his Son (Jn. 3:16) and verses where Jesus is referred to as "the gift of God" (dōrea, 4:10). The statement that Christ "gave himself" for all people or for our sins appears as a creedal formula in Gal. 1:4; 1 Tim. 2:6.

(b) Other references point specifically to Jesus' death on the cross: e.g., Jesus gave his life as a ransom for many (Mk. 10:45 par.). Similarly, Lk.'s account of the Last Supper (Lk. 22:19) speaks of Christ's body "given for you."

(c) This gives to Christians the assurance of belonging forever to the church of Christ. Jn. in particular sees the basis for this assurance in the fact that the church has been given to Christ by God (Jn. 10:28–29; cf. 17:6–12). Moreover, to belong to this church means to share in the gift of eternal life (10:28; cf. 3:14–17; 11:25–26; 17:3).

(d) In Paul the gift motif is incorporated into his preaching of the free and unmerited grace of God (cf. dōrean, Rom. 3:24), which declares sinners justified without works (→ dikaiosynē, 1466). dōrea or dōrēma (Rom. 5:15–17; 2 Cor. 9:15), taken together with charisma, sums up the whole of God's saving work of pardon, justification, and reconciliation (cf. also Eph. 2:8).

(e) God is praised as the giver of all good gifts in general (Jas. 1:17; cf. Matt. 7:11). All who call on him for his gifts can do so with the utmost confidence (7:7). The one great gift he has given to his church is his Spirit (Lk. 11:13; 2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; 1 Thess. 4:8). In the church, all other "gifts" (usually charisma, → charis, 5921) are the results of this one gift (Rom. 12:3–8; 1 Cor. 12:1–11).

(f) doma, gift, occurs only at Matt. 7:11; Lk. 11:13; Eph. 4:8; Phil. 4:17.

4. Those who have received Christ as a free gift respond to the double command to love God and their neighbor (Matt. 22:37–40) by a twofold giving. (a) They give themselves to God (cf. 2 Cor. 8:5). According to the NT, this is the only legitimate "offering" that can and should be brought to God (e.g., Rom. 12:1). It includes the "sacrifices" of word and deed (Heb. 13:15–16; 1 Pet. 2:5) and may mean even laying down one's life for Christ (Phil. 2:17).

(b) Believers give themselves to other people in love, as required by the "new command" (Jn. 13:34). This shows itself in the first instance within the church, where the giving should be a reflection of God's giving. To give simply and without ulterior motives (Rom. 12:8) is the way in which God gives (Jas. 1:5).

See also 2 Cor. 9:7 on God's love for the cheerful giver (dotēs, found only here in the NT); Mk. 12:41–44 = Lk. 21:1–4 (Jesus' verdict on the poor widow's gift); and the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:42; cf. Lk. 6:38). Christians, having received the gift of the gospel, are concerned to pass this gift on to others. This is giving in its profoundest sense (Rom. 1:11; 1 Thess. 2:8; cf. Matt. 10:8b).

1573 ἑβδομήκοντα

ἑβδομήκοντα (hebdomēkonta), seventy (1573); ἑβδομηκοντάκις (hebdomēkontakis), seventy-seven (1574).

OT The captivity of Judah in Babylon was to last seventy years (Jer. 25:11), and in Dan. seventy weeks are appointed as the period in which messianic redemption will be accomplished (9:24). Seventy elders were appointed to assist Moses (Num. 11:16).

NT Two NT passages call for brief comment. Jesus commends forgiveness until "seventy-seven times," i.e., without limit (Matt. 18:22). In contrast to Gen. 4:24 (hebdomēkontakis), unlimited vengeance has given place to unlimited forgiveness.

In Lk. 10:1 Jesus sends out seventy (or seventy-two, according to some MSS) disciples, denoting an outreach to the entire world. The textual evidence for or against dyo (two) added to seventy is finely balanced. In either case symbolic meaning has been attached to the figure. Note that the nations enumerated in Gen. 10 total seventy in the Heb., seventy-two in the LXX (see also hepta, seven, 2231).

ἔγγυος (engyos), guarantor (1583).

CL & OT engyos is derived from the vb. engyaō, pledge, engage. As an adj., it means offering surety and so becomes a noun meaning guarantee or guarantor. The arrabōn, pledge (→ 775), applied to things, whereas engyos, surety, guarantee, may be applied to persons. The engyos guaranteed that a legal obligation would be carried out. In many religions people called on a god to act as the guarantor when an oath was taken.

NT engyos is found in the NT only in Heb. 7:22, though it has an obvious par. in 8:6, where mesitēs, mediator (→ 3542), stands. Heb. 7:22 is to be linked with 7:20, which shows that the usual procedure for an oath has been reversed, for humans have not named God as guarantor, but God has placed the man Jesus as guarantor for the new divine dispensation (diathēkē, → 1347), which has the promise (8:6) as its content. Compare here Paul's statements that the Holy Spirit has come to us on earth as the pledge [arrabōn, → 775] of our redemption [2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14]. Heb. makes a similar point, i.e., that after Jesus had offered the vicarious sacrifice of himself, he ascended to God in heaven, where he now acts as the guarantor and representative of those who are still on earth awaiting the rest promised to the people of God (4:9).

This role of Christ can hardly be taken to mean that he is a guarantor before God for our faith and obedience. He is rather a guarantee to those who believe God's promise and know that it has been accomplished in Christ, though they do not yet see its fulfillment. This guarantee is anchored as our hope (6:19) in Jesus' twofold and unrepeatable work: his offering up of himself (7:27) and his entrance into the true, heavenly sanctuary (9:12). Through it our sanctification (10:10) has been accomplished once for all. In this way Christ links our future perfection with his already achieved perfection.

ἐγγύς (engys), near (1584); ἐγγίζω (engizō), approach, come near (1581); μακράν (makran), far (3426).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. engys means: (a) near (in space), near by; (b) near in time; (c) with numbers, nearly; (d) related or similar; (e) in the fig. sense of intellectual proximity. The vb. engizō is mostly intrans., meaning to approach, to come near (occasionally "to the gods").

2. (a) In the LXX engys sometimes denotes the approval of Yahweh in his drawing near to his people (a distinctive characteristic of the God of Israel; see Ps. 34:13; cf. Deut. 4:7 [engizō]). God's nearness is experienced above all in Israelite worship (cf. Ps. 145:18). Later on in Jud. this same word marked out the Israelite as distinct from non-Israelites, and within Israel the righteous as distinct from the godless. "To come near" also became a technical expression for recruiting a proselyte.

(b) In the spatial sense engizō is frequently found in phrases that describe approach to holy places (e.g., Exod. 3:5). Only the priests who conform to the requirements of the cultic prescriptions can draw near Yahweh's sanctuary (Lev. 21:23; Ezek. 40:46). This vb. can also denote more generally participation in worship (Eccl. 4:17; Isa. 29:13) or a devout attitude of nearness to God (Ps. 119:169; Hos. 12:6).

(c) As an indication of time, this word group expresses the imminent approach of the day of the Lord. In opposition to the way of thinking that saw that day in the far distance (cf. the quotations in Isa. 5:19; Ezek. 12:22, 27; Amos 6:3), the prophets proclaimed its nearness. This day always brings with it the impending judgment (Isa. 13:6; cf. Ezek. 7:7; 30:3; Joel 1:15; 2:1; Zeph. 1:7, 14), which occasions darkness and terror. Only the later chapters of Isa. announce the approach of a new age that will bring forth salvation and righteousness (46:13; 50:8; 51:5; 56:1).

(d) The pair of words "the near and the far" (Deut. 13:7; Isa. 33:13; 57:19; Ezek. 6:12) is a description of totality, embracing all.

NT 1. Both engizō and engys occur most frequently in the historical books of the NT. In the spatial sense, the adj. engys is used a greater number of times than the vb. engizō. In Acts and Jn. engys has almost exclusively a local meaning (e.g., Jn. 19:20; Acts 1:12). At times the vb. serves to indicate both place and motion (e.g., "as they approached Jerusalem," Mk. 11:1). These two words are more frequently used with a temporal meaning: e.g., the hour of Jesus' passion "is near" (Matt. 26:45); "the end of all things is near" (1 Pet. 4:7); the Passover was near (Jn. 2:13).

2. (a) The theological understanding of engizō, to come near, in the Synoptics is linked with Isaiah's proclamation of salvation: The kingdom of heaven has drawn near (e.g., Matt. 4:17; Lk. 10:9, 11; cf. CL & OT 2[c]). Behind this vb. stands the thought of the divine promise and preparation. The perf. ēngiken (the most frequently used tense of this vb.) thus expresses the end of God's time of preparation. His kingdom has drawn near; in the proclamation and work of Jesus it is already here in the present.

Corresponding to this vb. is the negative formulation ou makran, not far, which expresses the overcoming of the separation between God and humankind (e.g., Mk. 12:34).

(b) engys and engizō are also used in the context of the awaited apocalyptic end time and the return of the Son of Man. Lk. in particular awaits the future of the all-embracing kingdom of God. The desolation of Judea and cosmic catastrophes will announce the dawn of the end of the world: "Even so, when you see these things happening, you know that the kingdom of God is near" (Lk. 21:31; cf. 21:28). The connection between the dawn of the kingdom in the coming of Jesus and the awaited coming of the Son of Man to establish the reign of God is brought out by Matt. and Mk. Apart from this, both use engizō only in connection with the fate of Jesus (e.g., Matt. 21:1; 26:46).

3. Whereas in the Synoptics the vb. is used in both the perf. and fut. tenses, expressing the consequent tension between the "already" and "not yet," Paul relates these terms exclusively to the fut. In Rom. 13:12 and Phil. 4:5, the prospect of the approaching day and the coming Lord provide the basis for the admonitions to Christians to live a life full of hope. In the non-Pauline letters, the word group similarly refers to the near return of Christ and the imminent end of all things (Heb. 10:25; Jas. 5:8; 1 Pet. 4:7). Thus engizō in the NT designates almost exclusively the drawing near of God and of his salvation. Only Heb. 7:19 and Jas. 4:8 speak of a human drawing near to God.

ἐγείρω (egeirō), wake, rouse, raise up (1586); ἔγερσις (egersis), awakening, i.e., resurrection (1587); ἐξεγείρω (exegeirō), raise, raise up (1995); συνεγείρω (synegeirō), raise with (5283).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the words in this group are synonymous with the anastasis word group (→ 414). Thus the vb. when trans. means to waken, lift up, erect, stimulate; when intrans. awake, get up, stand up. When used of persons, it denotes those who are awakened from sleep, lethargy, or unconsciousness, and are stimulated to action or revolt. The noun means (trans.) a waking up, an establishing; (intrans.) a waking, a standing up, a recovery (i.e., from illness). The meaning of resurrection from death in our understanding of the term is not found.

2. The LXX use of this word group normally corresponds to Gk. idiom. It means rise up, awake, arouse, or stand up (e.g., Gen. 41:4, 7; Jdg. 2:16, 18; Dan. 8:18). That it is synonymous with anistēmi may be seen from Gen. 38:8 and 2 Sam. 7:12, where anistēmi is used both for human beings and God, while in Isa. 45:13a egeirō is used in a similar expression. At the same time, already in LXX we see a modification of the verbal connotation through its use for the raising of the dead and the work of God's Spirit in humankind (→ anastasis, 414).

NT 1. Generally speaking, this word group has the same meaning in the NT as in cl. Gk. and the LXX. egersis is found only once (Matt. 27:53), in connection with the resurrection of Jesus; elsewhere the anastasis word group is used. egeirō occurs 143x, often as an introduction to action (e.g., Matt. 1:24; 2:14; 8:26; 25:7) or for the appearance of characters on the stage of history (e.g., 24:7, 11, 24). exegeirō occurs only 2x—once for God's raising up Pharaoh to display his sovereign purposes, and once for the resurrection of our bodies (1 Cor. 6:14). synegeirō occurs 3x, all of which refer to our being raised with Christ in his resurrection (Eph. 2:6; Col. 2:12; 3:1; cf. also Rom. 6:4–6).

2. A survey of the cases in which egeirō is used with the meaning awaking to life at first creates the impression that the line of development seen in the OT and Jewish apocalyptic has been further developed (→ anastasis, 414). In several cases, people regarded by doctors as dead are reported to be brought back to life by Jesus. He took the hand of Jairus's daughter, for example, and caused her to get up and walk (Mk. 5:41); his command to "get up" was expressed by the imperative of egeirō. The same is true of the widow's son outside the gate of Nain (Lk. 7:14; but cf. Jn. 4:50 [the official's son]; 11:43 [Lazarus], where this vb. is not used). Jesus had full authority to raise the dead to life.

Jesus made it clear that (for him) the dead persons were not dead but only asleep. All four Gospels indicate that death can set no bounds to Jesus' activity, for the life that proceeded from him stripped death of its power. The spectators' laughter at such a statement about sleeping (Mk. 5:40) serves only to stress the extraordinary and incomprehensible nature of this life-giving power. What the Jews at best considered possible, apart from their belief in final resurrection (see Jn. 11:24), was that someone might be preserved from dying in the first place, even as in the OT: "Could not he ... have kept this man from dying?" (11:37). But now God, the Lord over life and death, stood in person before them.

3. This brings us to the heart of the concept, which has to do with the raising of Jesus. The letters of the NT never use egeirō, except in Phil. 1:17, in any sense but that of resurrection from the dead. It is used so often in Rom. and in 1 and 2 Cor. that it must have been a dominant element in Paul's preaching. In fact, Paul explains in 1 Cor. 15 that God's breaking into history in Jesus' resurrection is the decisive factor in the gospel, the means by which we are saved, without which all faith would be vain. Witnesses are adduced for the truth of the event; they were those to whom Jesus had "appeared" (15:5–8).

For the preacher of the gospel, the resurrection is the touchstone of its truth. One who disputes or denies the resurrection makes God a liar and faith a hollow mask (1 Cor. 15:14–17). The heart of our faith is, after all, faith "in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom. 4:24), and his Spirit lives in those who believe, giving life to our mortal bodies (8:11; cf. 2 Cor. 4:14). It is Jesus' resurrection that has removed our sins (1 Cor. 15:17) and broken the power of death (Rom. 6:4, 9, in connection with baptism). One should note that Jesus' coming back to life is not described only with God as actor but also with Jesus, for, as Jesus said (though egeirō is not used here): "The reason my Father loves me is that I lay down my life—only to take it up again.... I have authority to lay it down and authority to take it up again" (Jn. 10:17–18). While the resurrecting power issues from God, it belongs to the Son also, who is of one being with the Father.

4. This is seen most clearly in the case of the final resurrection, when it is normally left open as to who raises the dead—Christ or God. Paul writes simply: "The dead will be raised," i.e., will rise (1 Cor. 15:52; cf. Matt. 11:5). It is, however, clear that the resurrection of the dead is inseparably linked with the resurrection of Christ; it is based on it and follows from it (1 Cor. 15:13–17). Except in 1 Cor. 15 the anastasis group is normally used. In 1 Cor. 15:42–44 Paul contrasts the difference between now and then by the contrasts "perishable" and "imperishable," "dishonor" and "glory," "weakness" and "power," "natural" and "spiritual." The power to raise the dead is transferred from God to Jesus, and is promised by him to his disciples (Matt. 10:8).

ἐγκαλέω (enkaleō), accuse(1592); ἔγκλημα (enklēma), accusation, charge(1598).

CL & OT Deriving from kaleō, call, enkaleō in secular Gk. meant first to demand as one's due, then to make a claim or bring an accusation against someone, usually in a context of legal proceedings. enklēma corresponds to this developed meaning, and signifies a charge or indictment. The notion of accusation appears in the LXX in Zech. 1:4.

NT In the NT, Lk. uses enkaleō in its regular classical sense (Acts 19:38, 40; 23:28, 29; 26:2, 7). The only theological use of the word is in Rom. 8:33, where Paul dispels apprehensions lest Satan or someone else should succeed in impeaching God's elect at judgment day. enklēma is used of the charge against Paul in Acts 23:29; 25:16.

ἐγκόπτω (enkoptō), hinder, thwart (1601); ἐγκοπή (enkopē), hindering, hindrance (1600).

CL & OT The vb. enkoptō originally meant to knock in or cut into. The meaning hinder arose out of its military use. During a retreat the road might be cut into (i.e., broken up), in order to delay the pursuing enemy. The noun enkopē, therefore, denoted a temporary hindrance, later a permanent impediment. Neither vb. nor noun occurs in the LXX.

NT The noun occurs once in the NT (1 Cor. 9:12), the vb. 5x. Both words indicate something that hinders progress in the realm of faith or in the Christian life, bringing it to a standstill—if not permanently, at least for the moment.

If Paul allowed himself to receive money from the churches he was working with, he felt the proclamation of the gospel would be considerably hindered (1 Cor. 9:12). Thus, he waived his right to earn a living by preaching, which in itself could not be contested. Again, Paul's mission in Rome was only delayed by the fact that he had to complete projects he had begun in other places (Rom. 15:22). Paul wanted to go to Thessalonica, but the visit was repeatedly hindered by Satan (1 Thess. 2:18). Unfortunately, it is not possible to determine what hindrances Paul classified as Satan's work. It may have been an illness (2 Cor. 12:7; cf. Phil. 2:25–30) or the machinations of the Jews (1 Thess. 2:15–16).

In Gal. 5:7 the Christian life is compared to a race, the running of which was hindered by false teachers. The true way of faith was endangered by sectarian, legalistically inclined Jewish Christians, who were threatening to destroy the unity of the church (4:17).

Insufficient knowledge can also act as a hindrance to one's prayers (1 Pet. 3:7). The trouble here is that, under the influence of prevailing pagan custom, husbands were tending to despise their wives instead of recognizing them as partners. The passage has nothing to do with the common prayers of married couples, nor with marriage as a hindrance to prayer. Similar concepts of hindering occur in 1 Cor. 11:20–29 and 13:1 (where the vb. is not used). In the former it is a selfish lack of brotherly consideration that prevents the proper celebration of the Lord's Supper, and in the latter a lack of love that hinders effective preaching.

The meaning of enkoptō in Acts 24:4 is a matter of debate. The NIV, NASB, and several other translations use "weary." However, the basic meaning of enkoptō makes good sense: "in order not to hinder you further [i.e., by a long speech from carrying out of your administrative duties]." "Burden," "delay," or "detain" (NRSV) are also possible translations.

ἐγκράτεια (enkrateia), self-control, self-restraint (1602); ἐγκρατής (enkratēs), master of oneself, self-controlled (1604); ἐγκρατεύομαι (enkrateuomai), have control over oneself, abstain (1603); ἀκρασία (akrasia), licentiousness, lack of self-control (202); ἀκρατής (akratēs), uncontrolled, unbridled (203); ἀσκέω (askeō), practice something, engage in (828).

CL & OT 1. enkrateia and enkratēs contain the root krat-, which means power or control. enkratēs thus denotes someone who has power in the physical or intellectual sense (the opposite being akratēs). enkrateia is used absolutely of having power over oneself—i.e., perseverance or self-control (the opposite being akrasia). From enkratēs comes the vb. enkrateuomai, abstain from something. The Gk. philosophers considered enkrateia as a chief virtue, a sign of human freedom to moderate one's desires, esp. sexual desire and enjoyment of food and drink. askeō originally meant exert oneself, esp. in the sense of work or physical exercise. Later it came to mean tame the passions, esp. sexual desire.

2. In the LXX enkrateia occurs 3x (Sir. 18:15 [S], 30; 4 Macc. 5:34), where it means abstinence from excess. enkratēs (11x) and enkrateuomai (3x) denote that one is in control of something (cf. Gen. 43:31; 1 Sam. 13:12; Sir. 6:27). askeō occurs only in 2 Macc. 15:4. Apart from occasional fasting, asceticism is not practiced in the OT.

NT 1. The enkrateia word group (including akrasia in Matt. 23:25; 1 Cor. 7:5; and akratēs in 2 Tim. 3:3) is attested only 10x in the entire NT. askēo appears only in Acts 24:16 ("strive"). This statistical survey does not, however, allow us to say that there are no traces of asceticism in the Gospels. Lk. in particular underlines an ascetic trait, esp. with regard to possessions, though without using these words (cf. Matt. 5:3–12 with Lk. 6:20–23; Matt. 25:34–40 with Lk. 14:14). But viewed as a whole, asceticism in the sense of renunciation of possessions, sexual activity, and food is not a part of Jesus' teaching in the Gospels. It is only demanded where something stands in the way of following him (cf. the story of the rich young ruler, Matt. 19:21).

2. In Acts 24:25 enkrateia is found alongside righteousness and judgment as a theme of Paul's proclamation. "Self-control" may here be an allusion to the marriage of the procurator Felix, which was the result of adultery. But it may also simply be an expression of an ascetic tendency that Lk. continues in Acts (cf. 2:44–45; 4:32).

3. In 1 Cor. 7 Paul affirms sexual asceticism for himself and regards it as desirable, though not compulsory, for the members of the congregation (7:1). But he does not turn marriage and sexual intercourse into a sin (cf. 7:5, 28); it is better to remain within marriage than to aggravate suppressed drives through compulsory abstinence (cf. 7:9: "if they cannot control themselves" [enkrateuomai]). Though marriage is a concession to human drives and celibacy (7:7) is preferable (esp. in the expectation of the imminence of the end of the world), Paul elsewhere sees marriage as a picture of the relationship between Christ and his church (Eph. 5:21–33). Here Paul wants to save the Corinthians from hardships that being married involves in the final catastrophe (1 Cor. 7:25–26). They are to be free in their service of the Lord.

enkrateia is an aspect of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:23). Self-control is here a positive behavior that is set over against the fornication (porneia), impurity, debauchery, and idolatry that the sinful nature produces (5:19–20). enkrateia must be received as the gift of the Spirit in one's commitment to the gospel. Whether enkrateia in 5:23 refers only to one's sexual side or is meant more comprehensively is disputed.

4. Tit. 1:8 (enkratēs in a list of virtues) and 2 Tim. 3:3 (akratēs in a list of vices) do not betray an ascetic attitude in the Pastoral Letters. Rather, these letters see marriage as a healthy ordinance of life willed by God, in contrast to some of Paul's opponents (1 Tim. 4:1–3; 5:14–15; Tit. 2:3–5). Part of the intention of the catalogue of vices in 2 Tim. 3:1–5, with its affirmation of marriage, is to warn against the dissolution of marriage and against a false self-gratification in the last days. Furthermore, note how elders in a congregation should be chaste (Tit. 1:8), married to one woman (1:6; cf. 1 Tim. 3:2).

5. enkrateia occurs 2x in 2 Pet 1:6 in a list that characterizes the attitudes desired of believers in the post-apostolic period: faith, virtue, knowledge, self-control (enkrateia), patience, godliness, and love for all people. The list exhibits the process by which faith comes alive and becomes fruitful in love. enkrateia here means having power over oneself, not on the basis of some supposed self-realization, but on the basis of knowledge that comes from faith (1:5–6).

1620 ἔθνος

ἔθνος (ethnos), nation, people, heathen, pagans, Gentiles (1620); ἐθνικός (ethnikos), heathen, Gentile (1618); ἐθνικῶς (ethnikōs), like the Gentiles (1619).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ethnos (derived from ethos, custom) means a group with common customs, a clan; and then crowd, people. The word came to have a derogatory sense of common people or foreigners (in contrast to Greeks.). Its tone approaches barbaros, non-Gk., barbarian. Later ethnos was used to describe subject peoples.

2. (a) ethnos appears in the LXX about 1,000x (mostly in pl.); in the majority of cases it stands for the Heb. gôy and the pl. gôyim. Where mention is made of many peoples, esp. non-Israelites, ethnē is used, never laoi (e.g., Exod. 19:5–6). There is thus a contrast between laos, i.e., Israel as the chosen people (→ 3295), and ethnē, the Gentiles—though the sing. ethnos can be used to refer to Israel as God's people (e.g., Exod. 19:6; Deut. 26:5; Ps. 106:5 [in parallelism with laos]; cf. Exod. 32:10; Num. 14:12).

(b) Israel is a people for God's own possession (Exod. 19:5), while the rest of humanity is called the ethnē, the nations (Deut. 4:27; 18:9). A typical passage is Exod. 33:13, where ethnos is the multitude that by Yahweh's grace becomes his people (laos). The contrast is just as stark in Deut. 7:6: Yahweh has separated the ethnē over the earth and fixed their bounds. But Jacob as Yahweh's portion has become the laos of God (Deut. 32:8–9 LXX). Nevertheless, Yahweh is seen as King over the nations (Jer. 10:7, lacking in the LXX). This is the point behind Gen. 10, where the emphasis is not on the unity of humanity derived from common ancestors, but on nations divided according to clans and languages.

The Gentiles are first of all Israel's neighbors, some of whom live in Palestine itself (Jdg. 3:1). They entice Israel into idolatry, who then fall away from Yahweh. Thus we often read of the "detestable practices of the nations" (e.g., 1 Ki. 14:24; 2 Ki. 16:3). In the face of Israel's sin, the nations become the means and instruments of God's judgment (Hos. 8:10; Amos 9:9). But if they overreach themselves and go beyond the commission given them by Yahweh, they incur judgment themselves (Isa. 8:9; 10:5). Nevertheless, the Gentile Cyrus is called God's anointed and becomes the savior of Israel (Isa. 45:1–7).

A universalizing tendency in the LXX can be detected in Dan. 9:6, where the prophets are said to have reached every people on earth. Over against the world empires stands the kingdom of God (4:34). In the end time the nations will come to Mount Zion and there share in salvation (cf. Isa. 2:2–4; 25:6–8; Mic. 4:1–3; Zech. 8:20–23). The nations await the Messiah (Gen. 49:10 LXX). Thus the negative evaluation of the Gentile world is, in the last analysis, not lasting and permanent. Even in the present the name of Yahweh is to be glorified among all the Gentiles (Ps. 18:49; 46:10).

3. (a) In Jub. 10:22 the origin of the nations is traced to human sin (cf. Gen. 11), whereas in 2 Esd. 3:7, 12 they are said to have arisen naturally (though after the fall), because God gave humankind the blessing of fertility.

(b) In rab. Jud., the non-Israelite gôy is a stranger to God and far from him. The Gentiles are themselves to blame for this state of affairs, for they were offered the Torah, but rejected God's instruction. They are thus condemned to hell, with no hope of salvation, and have no part in the world to come. Only in exceptional cases is a share in the coming perfect world promised to pious Gentiles. God is the creator of all, but he loves Israel alone.

As individuals, Gentiles have been given up to every possible vice (e.g., idolatry, immorality). In Jewish eyes they are unclean. If in exceptional instances they do something good, God rewards them at once, in order to avoid having to reward them in the world to come. The punishment for their sins is delayed by God until the measure is full; then judgment falls on them. A great turning point will come in the messianic age, when the nations who have made Israel their subjects (esp. Rome) will be destroyed by the Messiah and end up in hell. Nations who have had no contact with Israel will be subjected to the Messiah, who will rule the world.

Some rabbis taught that the Gentiles will then be given access to the blessings of salvation. The Messiah is the light of the Gentiles, and many will join Israel as proselytes. But the political catastrophes of A.D. 66–70 and 132–135 created great bitterness among the Jews. Thus, the view arose that the messianic age will allow no more proselytes. Only a person who joins Israel during the time of his or her sufferings can be a proselyte.

(c) In the pre-Christian era and up to A.D. 70, the Jews (esp. Hel. Jews) carried out a strong missionary activity or, to be more precise, proselytism (cf. Matt. 23:15). These efforts were moderately successful (cf. the many half or full proselytes whom Paul met in the Jewish Diaspora). Once again, the position changed after A.D. 70; from then on the making of proselytes declined greatly. Those who wanted to become proselytes had to come of their own initiative. An added difficulty arose in A.D. 135, when Emperor Hadrian prohibited people from becoming Jews. It was at this point that the Christians got their great opportunity, even though the church was not always distinguished from Jud.

(d) At Qumran the attitude to Gentiles is completely negative. The Gentile nations are idol worshipers, without God, and enemies of God. God commits the judgment of all nations into the hands of his chosen ones, and the nations will reap the reward of their wickedness. It will be the Qumran people themselves, the "sons of light," who will carry out this work of punishment and destruction, and the wealth of the nations will be brought in through the gates of Jerusalem. God's people can take comfort from the fact that God will never again allow his people to be destroyed by the hand of the nations.

NT In the NT ethnos occurs 162x (43x in Acts, 54x in Paul's letters). It is used about 40x in quotations from the OT. The ethnē often mean all peoples (cf. Matt. 24:9; 28:19; Mk. 11:17; Lk. 21:24; Rom. 15:11).

1. (a) In 14 places, the Jewish people are called ethnos (e.g., Lk. 7:5; 23:2; Acts 10:22); this is true esp. in Jn.'s Gospel, apparently because they set themselves against faith in Jesus Christ (Jn. 11:48, 50–52; 18:35). In other places, however (e.g., Acts 26:23), a clear distinction is drawn between laos, the people of Israel, and the ethnē, Gentiles.

(b) ethnē clearly refers to Gentiles in Matt. 4:15 (cf. Isa. 9:1); 20:25; Lk. 21:24; Acts 4:25 (cf. Ps. 2:1–2); 7:7; 13:19; Rom. 1:5; Gal. 3:8; Rev. 10:11; 14:8; 15:3–4.

2. In about 100 instances ethnos is used in contrast to the followers of Jesus (though occasionally Paul calls Gentile Christians ethnē (e.g., Rom. 11:13; Gal. 2:12). Jesus' disciples must pray differently from the ethnē (Matt. 6:32) and not be anxious like them (Lk. 12:30). Gentiles are mentioned alongside Samaritans (Matt. 10:5). Jesus teaches the future salvation of the Gentiles, although he was sent only to the Jews (Matt. 8:10–11; 15:24). Gentiles will tread Jerusalem down "until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (Lk. 21:24). One of the horrors of the end time will be the rising of nation against nation (Matt. 24:7).

3. The distinction between Jews and Gentiles is spoken of chiefly in Acts and the NT letters, i.e., in the missionary documents of the NT. God is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles (Rom. 3:29; Rev. 15:3–4); but the Gentiles do not know God (1 Thess. 4:5) and are led astray to idols (1 Cor. 12:2). They do not know the law of God and do not keep it (Gal. 2:15); they live in the futility of their minds (Acts 14:16; Eph. 4:17). Although the word ethnos is not used, the Gentiles are meant in Rom. 1:18–32, where Paul speaks of those who do not know God, have fallen into idolatry, and have therefore been given up by God to all kinds of evil. Nevertheless, there are ethnē who fulfill the requirements of the law (2:14–15). The Gentiles begin life outside the call of God and outside the salvation of God's people (Eph. 2:11–12). Jews and Gentiles are alike in rejecting the cross (1 Cor. 1:23).

4. (a) Israel is the people whom God has appointed to be his own possession and for service to him; the Gentiles are outside this unique relationship. By God's own act, however, this difference has been overcome; the Messiah has come in the person of Jesus, so that now even those born Gentiles have a share in God's covenant and salvation. Thus Peter discovers that a God-fearing Gentile is acceptable to God and that the Holy Spirit can come on a Gentile (Acts 10:35, 45; 11:1, 18; cf. Eph. 2:11–12, 17–22).

(b) Paul is in a special way "the apostle to the Gentiles" (Rom. 11:13), in the face of Jewish opposition (1 Thess. 2:16). To him has been entrusted the mystery (→ mystērion, 3696) that the Gentiles are called to Jesus Christ apart from the law (Rom. 1:5; Gal. 1:16; 2:7–9; cf. Eph. 3:1–13). This is not to say that Paul denies the prior claim of the Jews. In fact, Paul strongly emphasizes it (e.g., Rom. 1:16). Israel is and remains God's people and thus possesses all the gifts and titles that mark it out as different (9:4–5).

The relationship of Jews to Gentiles is given extensive treatment in Rom. 9–11 (cf. also Eph. 2–3). Those Gentiles who have come to faith in Jesus Christ have been grafted into the rich olive tree (Rom. 11:17; → elaion, 1778) and are supported by it. Consequently, there can be no division between Christians and Gentiles. The Pauline churches consist both of born Jews and born Gentiles, and both belong to God's people by faith in Jesus Christ. They are children of Abraham by virtue of their faith (Rom. 4:16–17, cf. Gal. 3:7, 13–14, 26–29). Salvation has come to them through the unbelief of Israel (Rom. 11:11), and the failure of the Jews has meant riches for the Gentiles (11:12). As the apostle to the Gentiles, Paul seeks to save as many Gentiles as possible, in order ultimately to win the Jews for the gospel (11:13–14). When the full number of the Gentiles has come in, Israel too will turn to Christ (11:11–12, 25).

(c) Evidence of Jewish priority is apparent in the record of Acts, where Paul preaches to the Gentiles only after the Jews have rejected the gospel (Acts 13:46; 18:6; 19:9; 28:17–28). The question of the mission to the Gentiles as carried out by Paul was discussed and settled at the so-called Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15).

6. According to Rev., Christ has ransomed a church for himself out of every nation and has made them his kingdom and priests (Rev. 5:9–10; cf. Exod. 19:6). Along with the chosen of Israel is an innumerable multitude from the Gentiles (7:9). The exalted Christ will rule the nations with a rod of iron (12:5) and will give authority to "him who overcomes" to do so (2:26–27). He will strike the nations with the sword in his mouth (19:15). In the time of the two witnesses, the temple court is given over to the Gentiles (11:2). All nations will see the dead bodies of these witnesses (11:9). The beast has authority over all nations and peoples whose name is not written in the book of life (13:7–8). The eternal gospel will be preached to all nations (14:6).

As for the harlot Babylon, "all the nations" have drunk "the maddening wine of her adulteries" and have been deceived by her sorcery (Rev. 14:8; 18:3, 23). In the judgments of God, "the cities of the nations" will fall (16:19). During the millennium Satan is unable to deceive the nations (20:3; → chilias, thousand, 5942), but will do so again as soon as he is freed (20:8). In God's new world, the ethnē walk in the light of the new Jerusalem and bring their treasures into the new city (21:24, 26).

7. ethnikos (adv. ethnikōs) means national, foreign, like a Gentile; as a noun it means Gentile. The adj. appears only 4x in the NT, the adv. once. Gentiles salute only their brothers; any of Jesus' disciples who behave in that way make themselves like an ethnikos (Matt. 5:47). In prayer the disciple is not to heap up empty phrases as the Gentiles do (6:7). Those who refuse to listen to a rebuke by the church cut themselves off and join Gentiles and unrepentant tax-collectors (18:17). In Antioch Peter had eaten with Gentile Christians and so transgressed the Jewish ritual regulations, thus living ethnikōs, like the Gentiles; Paul argues that he thus can no longer force Gentile Christians to observe the law (Gal. 2:14). Membership in God's people is now determined by fellowship in Christ by faith, which unites Jewish and Gentile Christians.

ἔθος (ethos), usage, custom (1621); εἴωθα (eiōtha), custom (1665); ἦθος (ēthos), custom, way of life (2456).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ethos means tradition, usage, custom. Used with various preps. it means "according to principles" or "in the usual way." The related word ēthos is a more abstract term, similar to the English word ethos.

2. (a) In the LXX ethos (8x) has the sense of popular custom, esp. in connection with feasts. In the Apocr. the word always refers to a tradition within a given class or nation: e.g., giving presents to members of the royal family (1 Macc. 10:89), the custom of the ancestors (2 Macc. 11:25; 4 Macc. 18:5), or customs relating to execution (2 Macc. 13:4). Even when a tradition is reversed, the resulting custom can come to be ethically and legally binding (4 Macc. 18:5; Wis. 14:16).

(b) ēthos occurs 7x and ordinarily conveys the idea of basic human motives or attitudes (4 Macc. 1:29; 2:7, 21; 5:24), a frame of mind (13:27), or a manner of life resulting from certain ethical or psychological impulses (e.g., Sir. Prol. 27; 20:26).

(c) eiōtha (a 2d perf. of ethō) occurs in the LXX only in 4 Macc., with reference to a main principle or thesis of a rhetorical argument (cf. Num. 24:1; Sir. 37:14 for other forms of this vb.).

NT In the NT ethos occurs 12x, eiōtha 4x, and ēthos only once. The range of meaning extends from religious custom to personal habit, although no hard and fast distinctions can be drawn. Some passages merely give objective information on customs or traditions, while others reflect the clash of early Christian teaching and practice with the way of life found in Jud.

In the Gospels ethos is variously qualified as the custom of the priesthood (Lk. 1:9), the custom relating to Passover and to education of sons (2:42; when a son reached the age of 12, his father introduced him to the requirements of God's law by taking him to the three great feasts), Jewish burial custom (Jn. 19:40), or Christ's personal custom of teaching daily in the temple and spending the night near the Mount of Olives during feast days (Lk. 22:39).

ethos also occurs in Acts, where it is an important word in early Christian polemic. In 15:1 we read of the confrontation between Jewish and Gentile Christians over the necessity of circumcision (note the appeal to the custom of Moses [cf. Lev. 12:3]); both Stephen (Acts 6:14) and Paul (26:3; 28:17) were accused of altering the customs delivered by Moses or the fathers. The apostle himself appealed to Roman legal custom (25:16) in one of his defenses. The Roman slave owners at Philippi appealed to Roman political and religious law against what they conceived to be Jewish customs and religious propaganda (16:21; Romans were forbidden to become proselytes of Jud., even though it was a religio licita).

As far as eiōtha is concerned, Jesus and Paul both had a personal custom of visiting the synagogue on the Sabbath (Lk. 4:16; Acts 17:2). Jesus customarily taught the crowds whenever they gathered around him (Mk. 10:1). Pilate apparently established a custom of releasing a Jewish prisoner annually during the Passover (Matt. 27:15).

Finally, the use of ēthos and ethos shows something of the internal dangers facing the early Christian church. The church is doomed if it allows itself to be infected by the immoral habits of the surrounding world (ēthos, 1 Cor. 15:33). Here Paul cites the saying from the 4th cent. comedy Thais by Menander, "Bad company corrupts good character." Heb. 10:25 states that for some people nonattendance at public worship had already become a habit (ethos), an attitude of indifference that the church must seek to overcome in light of the imminence of the day of judgment.

εἶδος (eidos), form, outward appearance, sight (1626); εἰδέα (eidea), appearance (1624).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. eidos denotes appearance, visible form, stressing a link between the visible appearance and reality. One who praises the eidos of a woman refers not only to her outward beauty but to her true character. The word is used in Plato for the Forms or Ideas that are the existing realities behind our world. The modern distinction between the external and the internal, the visible and the invisible, and the outward form and essential content is inappropriate and foreign to this aspect of Gk. thought. For Aristotle, the eidos was different from Plato's view; it was the expression of the essence in visible form.

2. In the LXX eidos (54x) denotes the outward appearance of the whole being (cf. Gen. 29:17; Isa. 53:2–3), not merely the outer shell behind which something quite different can be supposed. God conversed en eidei with Moses (Num. 12:8); this means that Moses saw the glory of the Lord. eidea (5x) refers to the fact that Seth bore his father Adam's "likeness" (Gen. 5:3) or to the "appearance" of an individual (2 Macc. 3:16, where the high priest's appearance betrayed his anguish).

NT 1. eidos occurs only 5x in the NT (twice each in Paul and Lk., once in Jn.). "Avoid every kind of evil" in 1 Thess. 5:22 may go back to Job 1:1, 8. eidos in this case simply means "kind" or "type."

2. In 2 Cor. 5:7 Paul declares that "we live (walk) by faith, not by sight (dia eidous)." At the present time we live by faith and not by what we can see with our eyes. The interpretation of this word here is difficult, however, because eidos does not normally mean "sight" but visible form. There may, therefore, be more here. If, as seems apparent, "we" is to be understood as the subj. of both halves of the sentence, the verse may be contrasting the present time as the sphere of faith and the coming future time, in which we will have a visible form to observe. Some argue that 5:7b may also be taken to refer to the visible form of the Lord: We now walk by faith (dia pisteōs), but the Lord does not walk in visible form. Against this view, however, is the fact that it requires a sudden, implicit change of subj., for which there is no warrant in the text.

3. In his account of Jesus' baptism, Lk. says that the Holy Spirit descended on Jesus "in bodily form (eidos) like a dove" (Lk. 3:22; cf. Mk. 1:10; Matt. 3:16). This account stresses the reality of what happened. Similarly, Lk. uses eidos in his account of Jesus' transfiguration: "As he was praying, the appearance (eidos) of his face changed" (Lk. 9:29; cf. Matt. 17:2; Mk. 9:2; cf. also eidea with regard to the resurrected Jesus in Matt. 28:3). But no special tendency in Lk.'s writing can be deduced from this.

4. Jn. 5:37 contains the statement: "You (Jews) have never heard his voice nor seen his form (eidos)." This is contrasted with the first half of the verse: "The Father who sent me has himself testified concerning me" (cf. also 5:38). Part of the OT witness is that God cannot be seen in visible form (cf. Deut. 4:12), although this inability to see God physically was never intended as a reproach. Similarly, this is not the meaning of the reproach implicit in this verse. It means rather that the Jews have not obeyed God by believing in Jesus as God's Son (cf. 5:38). There may also be a further implication that Jesus has in fact heard the voice of the Father and seen his "form," so that he has a unique authority and relationship with the Father (cf. the whole argument in 5:17–47).

1627 (eidōleion, temple of an idol), → 1631.

1628 (eidōlothytos, meat offered to idols), → 1631 and 2604.

1629 (eidōlolatrēs, idolater, worshiper of idols), → 1631.

1630 (eidōlolatria, idolatry, worship of idols), → 1631.

1631 εἴδωλον

εἴδωλον (eidōlon), image, idol (1631); εἰδωλόθυτος (eidōlothytos), meat offered to idols (1628); εἰδωλεῖον (eidōleion), temple of an idol (1627); κατείδωλος (kateidōlos), full of idols (2977); εἰδωλολάτρης (eidōlolatrēs), idolater, worshiper of idols (1629); εἰδωλολατρία (eidōlolatria), idolatry, worship of idols (1630).

CL & OT 1. Homer uses eidōlon for the phantoms and shades in Hades. It can also mean any unsubstantial form, an image reflected in a mirror or water, an image or idea in the mind. It was not generally used in cl. Gk. for the images of the gods (→ eikōn, 1635).

2. eidōlon refers without exception in the LXX to the images of the heathen gods and the deities represented by them. (To express the image of God in humankind, eikōn is used.) eidōlon reflects Jewish contempt for heathen polytheism. eidōleion is a contemptuous expression for the temples of heathen idols (1 Esd. 2:10; Bel 9; 1 Macc. 10:83). Similarly, eidōlothytos means meat offered to idols (4 Macc. 5:2).

The prohibitions against making eidōla and serving other gods are linked already in the Decalogue (Exod. 20:3–4; Deut. 5:7–8). The depreciation of images based on these prohibitions leaves its traces everywhere in the OT. This does not imply, however, that there is no reality behind this idolatrous worship. Idols are abominations, behind which stand demonic powers (Deut. 32:16–17, 21). Anyone who comes into contact with these powers will move God to wrath.

Israel often succumbed to the temptation to open the doors to these powers, esp. when the rise of the Assyrian and Babylonian empires gave the impression that their gods were more powerful than the God of Israel (Isa. 36:19–20). Jer. 44:15–19 and Ezek. 8 give graphic pictures of how widely heathen idol worship had spread throughout Israel. The prophets insisted that the misfortune that had overtaken the people was God's punishment for falling away from Yahweh and compromising with the heathen cultus (Isa. 10:11; Jer. 9:13–16; Ezek. 8:17–18). The call to repentance combined a demand for just treatment of one's neighbor (Isa. 1:15–17; Hos. 4:1–3; Amos 5:14–15) with the demand to turn away from false gods (Hos. 14:8).

The prophets never grew tired of stressing to the people how impotent and vain (→ mataios, 3469) were pagan idols (1 Chr. 16:26; Ezek. 8:10), for they are merely the creation of human hands and cannot hear, see, or do anything (Jer. 14:22; Hos. 8:4–5; 13:2; Hab. 2:18–19). The sharpest polemic against such images occurs in Isa. 40:18–20; 44:9–20; 46:1–2. The making of the idols is described in language that renders them ludicrous, and the power of Yahweh, who molds history, stands in contrast with them (Isa. 45–48). He will destroy the false gods (Jer. 10:10–15; Ezek. 6:4–6, 13; Mic. 1:7), and people will throw away their idols on the day of God's judgment (Isa. 2:18–20).

NT 1. The NT continues the usage of the LXX, though it also contains new word formations. In Acts 17:16 it is said that Athens was kateidōlos ("full of idols"). We also find the compounds eidōlolatrēs, idolater (7x), and eidōlolatria, idolatry (4x), based on a linkage with latreia, service or worship of God (cf. Rom. 9:4).

2. The NT continues the OT's condemnation of the worship of false gods. The fact that this word group is not found in the Gospels suggests that the controversy had ceased to be of importance in Palestine. But as soon as the apostolic preaching moved into the non-Jewish, Hel. world, it immediately revived. For example, turning to "the living and true God" (1 Thess. 1:9) was impossible without a turning away "from idols" and pagan worship. Their retention was a sign of lack of repentance (Rev. 9:20).

Paul's arguments in Rom. 1:18–32 are particularly concerned with this controversy. He shows himself a Jew in his stress on the nothingness of the idols, but he recognizes the demonic powers behind them to which one subjects oneself when participating in the heathen cult. That is why eidōlolatria is one of the serious sins against which Christians must repeatedly be warned (1 Cor. 5:10–11; 10:7, 14). It is frequently mentioned in lists of sins (cf. Gal. 5:19–21; Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5; Rev. 21:8).

3. From this basic attitude toward idols it follows that Christians were prohibited from eating the meat of animals offered in heathen sacrifice. According to Acts, the apostles were unanimous that Gentile Christians should refrain from sacrificial meat (Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25), a decision justified by reference to Jewish practice (15:21). In this matter, therefore, Jews and Christians were basically in agreement.

In 1 Cor. 8 and 10 the practical problems that sprang from this attitude are examined in detail. In ch. 8 Paul argues with those in Corinth who believed that the eating of such meat was harmless, since they knew that the false gods had no real existence anyway (1 Cor. 8:1–6). Paul agrees that idols have no real existence (8:4), but he expects that those who realize this will, out of love, show consideration to those who do not; they must not do anything to influence these weaker believers to eat such meat (8:9–13).

Paul gives the underlying reasons for his attitude in 1 Cor. 10. Basing his argument on Deut. 32:17, he explains that demons stand behind the idols. Fellowship with Christ, which Christians enjoy in the Lord's Supper, excludes communion with these powers, and believers should not challenge the Lord. If they do, they will bring down judgment on themselves (10:7–10, 14–22). Christians are under no obligation to inquire fearfully whether meat bought in the market (generally near the temple) or served at a meal came from a sacrifice. But if someone pointed out that it was sacrificial meat, then, out of regard for that person's conscience, Christians ought not to eat it, even if their own conscience (perhaps on the strength of Ps. 24:1) permitted it (1 Cor. 10:25–30).

εἰκών (eikōn), image, likeness, form, appearance (1635).

CL & OT 1. eikōn is derived from eoika, which means to be similar, like. The word means an image (of a painting, statue, figure on a coin, figure of a god), comparison, likeness, representation, simile. In Gk. thought an image shares in the reality of what it represents. The essence of the thing appears in the image; e.g., the god is himself present and operative in his image.

2. In the OT images were strictly prohibited (Exod. 20:4; Deut. 27:15), whether as a false god or as a representation of Yahweh. An image was not the full reality and would only confuse Israel's relationship with the true God (Deut. 4:16; 2 Ki. 11:18). Among Israel's neighbors the image of a god served as a means of controlling the god. It was a source of power in the priest's hand in his dealings with the deity. In the Babylonian exile Israel learned to mock the making of idols (Isa. 40:19–20) but also to be terrified by them (Ezek. 7:20; 8:5; 16:17; 23:14). Both lines of thought can be traced in Dan. 2–3.

In contrast, Israel's relationship with God was based on his covenant and word. Religious images reveal nothing of his nature. Only human beings can be called the "image" of God (Gen. 1:26–27). The goal of the image of God in humankind is dominion over the world. The idea of the fall marring the image of God is implied in Wis. 2:23 (cf. Wis. 13–15). Some aspects of the image remain, however, such as rationality, for even after the fall human beings are referred to as being in God's image (Gen. 9:6).

NT In Matt. 22:20; Mk. 12:16; Lk. 20:24, eikōn is used of the emperor's image on a denarius. Pious Jews hated these coins, both because of their implied breach of the second commandment and because they bore the image of a foreign ruler.

In Rev. the image of the beast (13:14) is a cultic image, and worship of it means apostasy. The classical world knew of images of the gods that spoke and moved.

In Heb. 10:1 eikōn signifies the true form of the good things to come that has appeared in Christ, in contrast to the law, which is a mere shadow of these things. In 2 Cor. 4:4 and Col. 1:15 Christ is said to be the eikōn of God, but there is no difference here between the image and the essence of the invisible God, for in Christ we see God (cf. Jn. 14:9). By participating in Christ humankind has once again gained God's image (Rom. 8:29) as it was intended to be, and in communion with Christ we are transformed into his image. Paul can speak of this transformation as a present happening (2 Cor. 3:18; Col. 3:10) and also as a future, eschatological event (1 Cor. 15:49; cf. Phil. 3:21).

εἰμί (eimi), to be (1639); ἐγώ (egō), I (1609).

CL & OT This entry focuses exclusively on the expression egō eimi, I am.

1. The egō eimi formula does not occur in cl. Gk., and there are scarcely any relevant parallels in later periods. But in the wider context of the ancient Near East, an emphatic "I am" style can be demonstrated. For example, in ancient India we read:

"I am Kaksivat . . . I compel Kutsa . . . look at me!" The Mandaean analogies are esp. interesting: "I am the life, that was from of old. . . . I am the glory, I am the light"—though Christian influence cannot be excluded here.

2. The mere Heb. words that translate "I am" occur frequently in the OT and are not an exclusively religious formula. But certain "I am" formulae are noteworthy. Esp. important are those self-presentations in which Yahweh makes himself known as the saving God of the fathers (Gen. 15:7; 17:1; 28:13; 35:11; cf. also the opening of the Decalogue, "I am the LORD your God, who . . ." [Exod. 20:2]). Most important is the egō eimi ho ōn (lit., "I am the existing One") in the LXX of Exod. 3:14.

This self-presentation was necessary in the polytheistic world of the ancient Orient; it sought to secure the trust of the recipient of the revelation in this one God alone. Yahweh is the one who acts in history. Frequently in Ezek. is the phrase, "[You/they] will know that I am the LORD" (e.g., Ezek. 33:29; 36:36; 37:6, 13; 39:28). In the OT this expression means something like, "I am the Absolute." The clearest expression of this power of Yahweh over nature and history is in Isa., where Yahweh declares: "I am the LORD, who has made all things, who alone stretched out the heavens, who spread out the earth by myself" (Isa. 44:24); "I am the first and I am the last; apart from me there is no God" (44:6; cf. 43:11; 45:5, 22).

NT 1. In Jn. the "I am" sayings occur as a fixed formula. (a) These expressions have a formal structure: It begins with egō eimi ("I am") and is followed by a concrete noun and a qualifying adj. or prep. phrase (e.g., "I am the light of the world"; "I am the good shepherd"). Whether the "I" should be considered the subj. or predicate is a matter of debate. That is, is Jesus answering the question, "Who are you?" (hence, "I am the good shepherd"), or the question, "Who is the good shepherd?" (hence, "I am the good shepherd")? The former seems preferable.

(b) A further question is the meaning of the visual picture in the pronouncement. Are we dealing with parables, metaphors, or allegories when Jesus says, "I am the good shepherd"? If so, then Jesus is comparing himself with a shepherd and his followers with sheep. Or is Jesus the genuine embodiment of the shepherd and his followers the sheep (cf. Jn.'s frequent use of "true" in such passages as 1:9; 4:23, 37; 7:28; 8:16; 15:1)? If so, then Jesus is the shepherd in the fullest sense of the term, and this divine truth applies to no one else but him. The second option offers the better interpretation (see [d]).

(c) The OT and Jud. supplied the raw material for the use of some nouns (e.g., "the light," "the door," "the shepherd," "the vine") in these formulae. See, for example, Ps. 23:1: "The LORD is my shepherd" and 27:1: "The LORD is my light and my salvation."

(d) Jesus is "the bread of life" in that he is what he gives (Jn. 6:35, 41, 48, 51). This bread of life, i.e., Jesus himself, provides eternal life (6:47). It comes from heaven (6:51), and access to it is through faith (6:47). Jesus is "the light of the world" (8:12); in following him one has the light of life. In contrast to all others Jesus is "the door" (10:7, 9), for he alone gives access to salvation. The saying about "the good shepherd" (10:11) has the same meaning: Jesus gives his life for the sheep and saves them. He knows his sheep, and they know him. Anyone who has questions about the resurrection should turn to Jesus, for there is no resurrection outside of his person (11:25). Anyone who asks where, what, or who is "the way and the truth and the life" (14:6) will not only find an explanation in Jesus' teaching but discover that Jesus himself is that which these terms refer to. Finally, Jesus is "the true vine" (15:1, 5); between him and ourselves there exists a real union.

(e) Note should also be taken of the unaccompanied "I am" saying in Jn. 8:58. In Jesus' conversations with his enemies, he suggested that he had seen Abraham (8:57). When they objected, Jesus replied with the strong statement, "Before Abraham was born, I am!" Through this statement he linked himself with Yahweh as the great "I AM" of the OT (esp. Exod. 3:14b). The Jews certainly understood his saying that way, since they picked up stones to kill him, presumably for blasphemy (see Lev. 24:10–16); but since Jesus' hour had not yet come, he slipped "away from the temple grounds" (Jn. 8:59).

2. (a) In the Synoptics, the account of Jesus walking on the water (Matt. 14:22–23; Mk. 6:45–52) suggests a theophany in the tradition of the OT. The phrase "he was about to pass by them" (Mk. 6:48c) is reminiscent of Yahweh's passing before Moses on Mount Sinai (Exod. 33:18–23) or before Elijah on Mount Horeb (1 Ki. 19:11–13). Meanwhile, the disciples in the boat are in a state of panic, thinking they see a ghost (Mk. 6:49). Jesus replies: "Take courage! It is I [egō eimi]. Don't be afraid!" (6:50). Only this self-revelation of Jesus convinces them of the reality of the appearance.

Each of the six antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:21–48) distinguishes Jesus' message from what was said to the Israelites of old by the provocative formula, "but I [egō] tell you" (5:22, 28, 32, 34, 39, 44). This formula marks Jesus as the lawful and true expositor of the Torah. In contrast to the teachers of the law with their abbreviations and casuistic distortions, Jesus goes back to the original meaning of the Torah, to the will of God.

In Mk. 13:6 (cf. Matt. 24:5; Lk. 21:8) Jesus warns against people who will arise in his name and lead many astray by using the words egō eimi. Here the early church separated itself from those who unlawfully claimed the authority of Jesus. Only Jesus has the right to use those words.

Jesus, at his examination before the Sanhedrin, answered the high priest's question, "Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed One?" with the words egō eimi, "I am" (Mk. 14:61–62). In the early church there was clearly discussion about the identity of the Messiah (cf. Jn. 1:20) and Jesus. Jesus answered that question in the affirmative. The Jewish leaders knew what Jesus was saying, for they considered it blasphemy and promptly condemned him to death.

Finally, the risen Christ led his disciples to recognize his identity with the crucified Jesus through the use of the egō eimi formula. When they had difficulty believing the one standing in their midst was really the Jesus whom they had known, he showed them his hands and feet and said, "It is I myself!" (Lk. 24:39). And just before his ascension, Jesus promised his disciples: "Surely I am [egō eimi] with you always" (Matt. 28:20).

(b) In Rev. the egō of Christ's sayings and the egō of the pronouncements of God occur side by side. In fact, sometimes the same egō eimi sayings can appear on the lips of both Christ and God. In Rev. 1:8 God is the subject of the sentence, "I am the Alpha and the Omega . . . who is, and who was, and who is to come," while in 1:17–18 the Son of Man speaks, "I am the First and the Last. I am the Living One." "The First and the Last" corresponds to "the Alpha and the Omega"; both verses are derived from Isa. 44:6. The most complete identification of Christ and God is expressed at the end of Rev. The subject of the sentence in 21:6, "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End," is God; in 22:13 Jesus is the one who says, "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End." No one can contest the identity of God with Jesus here.

1644 (eirēneuō, live in peace, have peace, keep peace), → 1645.

εἰρήνη (eirēnē), peace (1645); εἰρηνεύω (eirēneuō), live in peace, have peace, keep peace (1644); εἰρηνικός (eirēnikos), peaceable, peaceful (1646); εἰρηνοποιός (eirēnopoios), peacemaker (1648); εἰρηνοποιέω (eirēnopoieō), make peace (1647).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. eirēne denotes peace as the antithesis to war or the condition resulting from a cessation of war. It is the state of law and order that gives rise to the blessings of prosperity. It can also mean peaceful conduct, although peaceableness toward others is generally rendered by philia (love, friendship) or homonoia (unity, concord). Not until the Stoics does peace occur (though infrequently) in the sense of spiritual peace. eirēneuō means to live in peace, have peace, sometimes to bring about peace. eirēnikos, peaceful, embraces everything relating to peace. The compounds eirēnopoieō, to make peace, establish peace, and eirēnopoios, peacemaker, when they occur, bear the sense of political pacification by force of arms.

2. (a) In the LXX eirēnē is almost invariably used to translate the Heb. šālôm, which occurs nearly 250x in the OT. The well-being that comes from God is regularly expressed by eirēnē. This Gk. word also corresponds to several other Heb. words that embrace the general meaning of rest, safety, freedom from care, and trustfulness.

Unlike the cl. Gk. meaning of eirēnē, the Heb. šālôm is the opposite not so much of war as of any disturbance in the communal well-being of the nation (cf. 2 Sam. 11:7). Hence, in the LXX eirēnē also acquires the sense of general well-being, the source and giver of which is Yahweh alone. Note the name of the place of Gideon's altar—"The LORD is Peace" (Jdg. 6:24). eirēnē, coming as it does from God, is close to the idea of salvation (cf. Ps. 85:10). When God withdraws his peace, mourning inevitably take its place (Jer. 16:5).

(b) Throughout the Heb. OT, šālôm covers well-being in the widest sense of the word (Jdg. 19:20); prosperity, even in reference to the godless (Ps. 73:3); bodily health (38:3; Isa. 57:19); contentedness on going to sleep (Ps. 4:8) and at death (Gen. 15:15); good relations between nations and people (Jdg. 4:17; 1 Ki. 5:26 = LXX 5:12; 1 Chr. 12:17–18); and salvation (Jer. 29:11= LXX 36:11; cf. 14:13). Participation in this peace means sharing in the gifts of salvation, while expulsion from it means the end of prosperity (Lam. 3:17). šālôm also has a close association with righteousness (cf. Isa. 48:18).

(c) The concept of peace is found at the climax of the blessing in Num. 6:24–26, where it sums up all the other blessings and is closely associated with the presence of Yahweh: "The LORD bless you and keep you; the LORD make his face shine upon you and be gracious to you; the LORD turn his face toward you and give you peace" (Num. 6:24–26). šālôm is ultimately the gift of Yahweh (Gen. 28:21; 41:16; Lev. 26:6; Jdg. 18:6; 1 Chr. 22:9; cf. 12:19; 23:25).

(d) The proclamation of peace is a theme of the OT prophets (e.g., Isa. 9:5–6 = LXX 9:6–7; 26:12; 45:7; 48:18, 22; 52:7; 53:5; Jer. 6:14; 8:11, 15; Ezek. 34:25; 37:26; Nah. 2:1 = LXX 1:15; Zech. 6:13; 8:10–19; 9:10). Jeremiah esp. preached that Yahweh withdraws his šālôm in judgment (e.g., Jer. 12:12; 14:19; 16:5; 25:37 = LXX 32:22). The theme of Yahweh as the giver of peace figures prominently in the Psalms (e.g., Ps. 4:8; 29:10–11; 37:11; 55:18; 119:165; 122:6–8); it also occurs in Prov. 3:2, 17, 23 and Job 5:24; 15:21; 25:2.

(e) After the destruction of Jerusalem (597 and 587 B.C.) the promise of peace became central to the prophetic message. The false prophets of salvation had been utterly discredited (Jer. 6:14; 8:11; Ezek. 13:10, 16). In Isa. the divine covenant of peace (54:10) comes to be viewed eschatologically: righteousness, splendor, salvation, and glory (Isa. 62:1–2) are all expected to be manifest at the end. The created world will again be made whole (11:6–9; 29:17–24; 62:1–9), for God will create new heavens and a new earth (65:17–19; cf. Rev. 21:1–4). This coming of the day of salvation is linked with the Prince of Peace (Isa. 9:5–6), who as God's anointed (61:1–2) is the founder of the kingdom of peace.

3. (a) The šālôm of Yahweh underlies the whole concept of peace in the rab. lit., but it is enlarged both in the God-human relationship and on the human plane. The phrase for "to greet" means "to ask after (someone's) peace," i.e., to wish it for someone. šālôm becomes the essence of the salvation expected by the Jews. Among the rabbis the role of the peacemaker is similar to that in the NT, though the motive is not so much positive love for one's neighbor as the desire to get rid of all that hinders šālôm.

(b) Similarly in the Pseudepigrapha, eirēnē implies salvation, which includes the cessation of war, but can also mean withholding judgment. The concept of peace becomes introverted in Philo and signifies peace of mind, though this is not divorced from the external and objectively verifiable state of peace. He also regards inward peace as being victory over temptation and lust.

(c) The Qumran community considered itself to be the eschatological community of the saved; its members had already entered into the enjoyment of eschatological peace. There are references to eternal peace (1QS 2:4), the superabundance of peace (4:7), peace without end (1QH 7:15–16), lasting peace (15:15), and peace without limit (18:30). Yet the community saw itself as still in the midst of conflict against Belial and the sons of darkness. God, however, has engraved the covenant of peace (= salvation) for all eternity with the stylus of life (1QM 12:3).

NT eirēnē is found 92x in the NT, 25x in the Gospels. Christ's farewell discourses in Jn. contain the word 6x, each one denoting Christ's gift to his disciples (Jn. 14:27 [2x]; 16:33; 20:19, 21, 26). The vb. eirēneuō appears 3x in Paul; eirēnopoios and eirēnopoieō each occurs once, and eirēnikos 2x.

1. Both in form and content eirēnē stands firmly in the OT tradition. Peace is, of course, the opposite of war (Lk. 14:32; Acts 12:20). In Lk. 11:21; Acts 24:2 it denotes external security. In 1 Cor. 14:33, peace is the opposite of disorder in the church. eirēnē is also used for harmony among human beings (Acts 7:26; Gal. 5:22; Eph. 4:3; Jas. 3:18) and for messianic salvation (Lk. 1:79; 2:14; 19:42). Hence the word can describe both the content and the goal of all Christian preaching, the message itself being called "the gospel of peace" (Eph. 6:15; cf. 2:17; Acts 10:36).

In other words, the biblical concept of peace is primarily that of wholeness. This divinely wrought reality exercises a powerful influence in the present world, although it still awaits final fulfillment. Soteriologically, peace is grounded in God's work of redemption. Eschatologically it is a sign of God's new creation, which has already begun. Teleologically, it will be fully realized when the work of new creation is complete. Only in a secondary sense does peace describe human and divine-human relationships, in which case it refers to a psychological state arising from sharing in the all-embracing peace of God.

2. (a) As opposed to akatastasia, disorder (→ 189), peace is an order established by God as the God of peace (1 Cor. 14:33; cf. also Rom. 15:33; 16:20; Phil. 4:9; 1 Thess. 5:23; Heb. 13:20). The wide-ranging scope of salvation is shown by the fact that peace is linked with love (→ agapē, 27) in 2 Cor. 13:11 and with grace (charis, → 5921) in the introductions (e.g., Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:2; Rev. 1:4; cf. 2 Jn. 3; Jude 2) and closings (Rom. 16:20; cf. 2 Cor. 13:11; Gal. 6:16; 1 Thess. 5:23; 2 Pet. 3:14; 3 Jn. 14) of NT letters. It is linked with life (Rom. 8:6) and is in contrast with tribulation (→ thlipsis, 2568).

Peace comes "from him who is, and who was, and who is to come" (Rev. 1:4; cf. Heb. 7:2, where Melchizedek is a type of the king of peace). The Gospel of Jn. insists that this peace differs not only quantitatively but also qualitatively from that of the world (Jn. 16:33) in that it is given by Christ himself. "Peace in heaven and glory in the highest" (Lk. 19:38; cf. 2:14) also form part of the expected salvation. Peace, if it is to exist at all, must be all-embracing.

(b) Christ is the mediator of peace. He brings in the kingdom of God and is the bearer of reconciliation (Lk. 2:14; Rom. 5:1; Col. 1:20). Indeed, he himself is peace (Eph. 2:14–18), as is Yahweh in the OT. Peace is described as "the peace of Christ" (Col. 3:15), which is maintained through communion with him (Jn. 16:33; Phil. 4:7; 1 Pet. 5:14). While Jn. stresses Christ's gift of peace to his disciples (14:27), Jesus stresses that his disciples are to pass peace on to others. If it is refused, it returns to the disciples (Matt. 10:13; Lk. 10:5–6). Peace may go unrecognized (Lk. 19:42) or be forgotten and obscured (Rom. 3:17). But if there is a conflict between personal well-being and God's peace, then the former must be surrendered, or else there will be disharmony instead of peace (Lk. 12:51–53). There is no room for false peace.

3. Peace, in the sense of wholeness both for humankind and the world (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15), brings a newness to human relationships. Hence the injunction: "Be at peace with each other" (Mk. 9:50) and with all people wherever possible (Rom. 12:18). The kingdom of God is righteousness and peace (14:17) in the sense of establishing a just harmony among human beings. The church is built up in peace and in the joy of the Holy Spirit (14:17, 19) because it is God who causes peace to rule in our hearts, to reign in the Christian community (Col. 3:15), and to make itself known as the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). God in Christ has come "telling the good news of peace" (Acts 10:36, possibly alluding to Isa. 52:7).

4. In 2 Tim. 2:22 and Heb. 12:14, peace in the sense of concord and harmony is to be pursued not only in the church but among people generally, so far as is possible. Matt. 5:9 states the beatitude: "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called sons of God." The word eirēnopoios, used only here in the NT, is an adj. meaning making peace. It is perhaps related to 5:48: "Be perfect [teleioi; → telos, 5465], therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect." The disciple who brings the wholeness and maturity that comes from God alone and that is intimately bound up with his presence is one who brings peace in the fullest sense. Such a person is a child of God fulfilling the destiny and title of Israel (cf. Hos. 1:10; Wis. 2:13, 18).

5. In Heb 12:11, the adj. eirēnikos expresses "a harvest of righteousness and peace" that springs from being disciplined. This leads to the exhortation to "make every effort to live in peace with all men and to be holy" (12:14). Such a lifestyle is in contrast to "godless ... Esau" (12:16; cf. Gen. 25:29–34), who, by trading his birthright, showed a failure to seek peace and holiness (Heb. 12:14). In Jas. 3:17 eirēnikos is associated with wisdom: "But the wisdom that comes from heaven is first of all pure; then peace-loving...."

6. The vb. eirēnopoieō is found only at Col. 1:20, where it refers to the cosmic scope of the reconciling death of Christ: "For God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him, and through him to reconcile to himself all things, whether things on earth or things in heaven, by making peace [eirēnopoieō] through his blood, shed on the cross" (1:19–20). The Gk. aor. tense used here is perhaps better translated as "having made peace," since it refers to the historic event of the cross (cf. 2:13–15).

7. In at least one place (Rom. 15:13) peace is to be understood as a power that, together with joy, can pervade the whole person: "May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace as you trust in him, so that you may overflow with hope by the power of the Holy Spirit." This peace is neither the Stoic's withdrawal from the world nor a pious flight into spirituality and mystical contemplation. It is the joyful assurance of sharing the peace of God as one goes through life and looks to eternity.

1646 (eirēnikos, peaceable, peaceful), → 1645.

1647 (eirēnopoieō, make peace), → 1645.

1648 (eirēnopoios, peacemaker), → 1645.

εἰς (eis), into, for the purpose of (1650).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. eis generally meant motion into something (pros expressed motion toward something; → 4639). In a similar vein, eis was used with impers. objects and pros with the personal. Also, eis was usually strictly differentiated from en (in, → 1877), which denoted a static resting within something. But Hel. Gk. (including the LXX) manifests a general tendency to confuse the categories of linear motion ("to, into") and punctiliar rest ("in"). The confusion was in both directions: eis denoting position (e.g., Gen. 37:17a; Jos. 7:22) and en implying movement (e.g., Exod. 4:21; Tob. 5:5). The obsolescence of the dat. case in Gk. meant the disappearance of en from the modern Gk. vernacular, where only eis (with the acc.) is found.

NT 1. General usage. Since the NT uses eis either for movement into something or for static position (some authors interchange eis and en more than others), we must avoid two dangers: to treat these two preps. as everywhere synonymous, or always to insist on a distinction between them.

One significant text in this respect is Jn. 1:18, where John writes about the only Son of God residing "at [eis] the Father's side [or bosom]." The general imagery suggests a deep and affectionate intimacy between the Father and the Son. What, then, is the import of eis? Some scholars give it a dynamic sense (i.e., movement toward or into), even going so far as to see the doctrine of eternal generation here. Others see eis as both static and dynamic. The prevailing view among grammarians and commentators today, however, is that eis is simply a synonym for the more classically correct en (i.e., a static sense of the word). Any notion of dynamic interpersonal relationship found here stems from "side" and "Father," not from the prep. eis.

2. Purpose. eis often expresses metaphorical direction, i.e., goal or purpose. Note Col. 1:16, where "for [eis] him" indicates that Christ is the ultimate goal of creation as well as the one through (→ dia, 1328) whom creation took place. eis can also mark the divine appointment of believers "for eternal life" (Acts 13:48), or of unbelievers "stumbling" over the Stone because of their rejection of salvation, as they were destined "for" (1 Pet. 2:8).

3. Result. It is also generally recognized now that eis, on occasion, expresses a result (e.g., its use with an infinitive in Rom. 1:20; 7:5; 12:2; 2 Cor. 8:6; Gal. 3:17; Phil. 1:10; Heb. 11:3; Jas. 3:3). Note the result use of eis in Rom. 10:10: "For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified [lit., for, eis, justification]." If the result sense of eis is recognized in 12:2, Paul's point is not that the aim of the transformation of one's character is to discern God's will, but rather that the Christian's ability to ascertain God's will naturally results from the renewal of the mind.

Often the categories of purpose (sec. 2) and result merge, for a result may be a designed consequence. Thus, it is sometimes impossible to determine what is intended (e.g., in the phrase "to [eis] the glory of God" in 2 Cor. 4:15; Phil. 1:11; 2:11).

4. Special uses. (a) One passage long debated by scholars is the use of eis in the LXX of Gen. 15:6 ("Abram believed the LORD, and he credited it to him as [eis] righteousness"), which is quoted in Rom. 4:3, 9, 22; Gal. 3:6; Jas. 2:23. With regard to Paul's usage, the verse has been interpreted in several ways: Righteousness was imputed to Abraham on the basis of his faith (cf. 1 Macc. 2:52; Rom. 9:30; 10:6; Heb. 11:7); Abraham's faith was reckoned as a substitute for law-based righteousness; or Abraham's faith in God was the equivalent of righteousness.

(b) The prep. eis is used with the vb. baptizō (to baptize). In Matt. 3:11 ("I baptize you with water for [eis] repentance") and Acts 2:38 ("be baptized . . . for [eis] the forgiveness of your sins"), a few scholars argue for a causal sense of the prep. Better options, however, are that eis in Matt. 3:11 denotes the purpose or result of baptism, or perhaps it has temporal significance (i.e., while confessing or repenting of sin). Or, since elsewhere John's baptism is termed a "baptism of [i.e., relating to, marked by] repentance" (Mk. 1:4; Lk. 3:3; Acts 13:24; 19:4), eis may simply mean "in relation or reference to." Similarly, in Acts 2:38 forgiveness of sin may be the purpose or result of repentance and baptism, or else forgiveness is regarded as conceptually (but not necessarily chronologically) connected with baptism.

In 1 Cor. 12:13 (baptism "by one Spirit into [eis] one body"), eis denotes the purpose and effect of Spirit baptism; alternately, the baptized may be conceived of as entering into the body of Christ that already exists. To be baptized "into" the death of Christ (Rom. 6:3b) is to participate in all of the saving benefits of his death to sin (6:10) or to submit to a water baptism that relates to his death.

In several passages we read about baptism "into [eis] the name" of Jesus. Most likely eis here denotes a transference of ownership, as when money is paid "into the account of" a certain person. That is, the one being baptized passes into the possession of the Triune God (Matt. 28:19) or of the Lord Jesus (Acts 8:16; 19:5; cf. 1 Cor. 1:13, 15) and comes under his control and protection.

Being baptized "into [eis] Christ" (Rom. 6:3a; Gal. 3:27) probably means being baptized into the body of Christ, the church (so that to be baptized into Christ = to put on Christ [3:27b] = to be in Christ [3:28]). But the phrase may also describe a believer's entry into personal union and communion with Christ (i.e., into fellowship with Christ).

(c) Finally, eis occurs 45x with the vb. pisteuō (believe; → pistis, faith, 4411). This is a characteristically Johannine idiom (only 8x is it used outside Jn.'s Gospel and 1 Jn. [Matt. 18:6; Acts 10:43; 14:23; 19:4; Rom. 10:14; Gal. 2:16; Phil. 1:29; 1 Pet. 1:8]). It seems clear that, for John, believing eis is intimately connected with believing "in the name" (see Jn. 1:12; 2:23; 3:18; 1 Jn. 5:13). The latter phrase probably means "believe in the person of," though it can also imply a transfer of ownership, resulting in a new allegiance.

At a minimum, eis after pisteuō introduces the object of faith or the direction of faith. In addition, the phrase depicts the commitment of oneself to the person of Christ, something more than an intellectual acceptance of his message or a recognition of the truth about Christ. The two aspects are related. Since the person of Christ is the essence of the message that is proclaimed and accepted, to truly accept that message is to accept him. To believe that naturally becomes to believe in (cf. Jn. 20:31; Rom. 10:9–11).

εἷς (heis), one (1651); ἑνότης (henotēs), unity (1942).

CL & OT 1. In pre-Socratic nature philosophy to hen, the one (neut. of heis), refers to the ultimate unity of being, eternity; the nontransient, simple being. Parmenides described being as a sphere, perfect in itself and uniform, simple and excluding all peculiarities.

The Sophists applied these fundamental concepts to ethics. Since all being is absolutely identical, value judgments become impossible. Socrates opposed these doctrines and posited an abiding unity that, over against the change and multiplicity of opinions, would be recognized by all. The basis for such universally recognized demands is universally valid concepts. Plato taught a world of ideas in which reality increases until it reaches its peak on the highest incorporeal idea of the One as the good, divine, world intellect. For the Stoics, all existence is ultimately a unity; the divine penetrates everything and manifests itself in diversity, creating order and furnishing a unitary law. The human soul is by its nature one with the world soul.

In Gnosticism, the divine world of life, light, and spirit is original and remains by nature one. In a precosmic catastrophe, pieces of it were broken off and handed over to the evil, the dark, and the many (i.e., the creation of the world). The goal of the cosmic drama is the return of all the scattered fragments of the spiritual and divine into the unity of God.

2. The comparable Heb. terms are ʾeḥād (masc.) and ʾaḥat (fem.), meaning: (a) one (Gen. 1:9); (b) the first (2:11; 8:5); (c) the one ... the other (Exod. 18:3–4); (d) one after the other (Isa. 27:12); (e) one with another (Ezek. 33:30); (f) one to another (Job 41:16); (g) anyone (Gen. 26:10); (h) one and the same (27:45); and (i) the only one (Isa. 51:2).

The unity of God is particularly stressed in Deut. 6:4. A lit. trans. of the Heb. is: "Yahweh our God, Yahweh one"; the LXX translates this, "[The] Lord our God is one [heis] Lord" (cf. NIV: "The LORD our God, the LORD is one"). These words form the Shema, i.e., the daily Jewish confession of the unity of God, the basic creed by which it separates itself from paganism and idolatry. Some parts of the OT speak of the existence of other gods (e.g., Exod. 15:11; 1 Sam. 26:19 [ironic]). Explicit monotheism became increasingly dominant from the 7th cent. B.C. on (e.g., 1 Ki. 8:60; Jer. 2:11; esp. Isa. 41:29; 43:10; 44:8). But the unique reality of God was firmly anchored in the faith of Israel from the beginning. This forms the basis for the call to unity among the people (Mal. 2:10). In rab. Jud. "the One" became a surrogate for God.

NT 1. Survey of heis in the NT. (a) As a simple numeral. (i) One (e.g., Matt. 5:41; Jn. 9:25): One thing can be decisive (Mk. 10:21); the plagues of judgment come on one day (Rev. 18:8); there is one sacrifice of Christ (Heb. 10:12, 14; cf. hapax, once, 562). The one who repents is more valuable than the ninety-nine who do not need to repent (Lk. 15:7). (ii) The one ... the other (e.g., Matt. 24:40–41). (iii) Every one (e.g., 1 Cor. 12:18–19). (iv) One by one (e.g., Mk. 14:19). (v) The first (e.g., Matt. 28:1). (vi) Alone (Mk. 2:7). Note that heis can stand parallel to monos, only (→ 3668; e.g., Mk. 2:7 [heis]; Lk. 5:21 [monos]).

(b) The one God and Father. The Shema (Deut. 6:4; see above) is quoted in Mk. 12:29. Jas. 4:12 declares, "There is only one Lawgiver and Judge." In warning against the temptation to exalt oneself to positions only God can occupy, Matt. writes that we have only "one Father" in heaven and "one Teacher, the Christ" (Matt. 23:8–10). The uniqueness of God is asserted over against idols in the controversy about eating meat offered to idols (1 Cor. 8:4–6). This means that "for us there is but one God, the Father, from whom all things came and for whom we live; and there is but one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom all things came and through whom we exist" (8:6). Therefore, idols have no real existence (8:4). Still, on grounds of love and expediency Paul urges the Corinthians not to eat meat that has been first offered to idols.

Eph. 4:3 urges unity and peace in the church on the grounds of the unity of God: "There is one body and one Spirit—just as you were called to one hope when you were called—one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all" (Eph. 4:4–6). In 1 Tim. 2:5 Paul writes a parenthetical reminder that "there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." There is a unity in the human race that derives from our common origin from God, who created the world (Acts 17:24): "From one man he made every nation of men" (17:26).

There is one abiding will of God (Matt. 5:17–18), and in conformity with that will there is one church composed of Jews and Gentiles. One of the main themes of Rom. is to demonstrate the continuity of the divine purposes revealed in the OT in the light of the work of Christ and the inclusion of the Gentiles: "There is only one God, who will justify the circumcised by faith and the uncircumcised through that same faith" (Rom. 3:30).

(c) One Christ. In addition to Jesus Christ's being our only teacher and mediator, the NT also testifies that he is one with the Father (Jn. 10:30; 17:11, 21–23). He is also the one shepherd with one flock (Jn. 10:14–16).

(d) One Spirit. Paul bases his teaching on the multiplicity of gifts in the church and the necessity of order and harmony in their use on the unity of the Spirit, who is the giver of these gifts (1 Cor. 12:9, 11, 13). Jews and Gentiles are no longer alien in Christ, "for through him we both have access to the Father by one Spirit" (Eph. 2:18; cf. also the "one Spirit" in 4:4). The word henotēs, unity, occurs only in Eph., where it expresses the unity of the church in maturity, based on the divine unity: "Make every effort to keep the unity of the Spirit through the bond of peace" (4:3); "until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God and become mature" (4:13).

(e) The one church of the one Lord. (i) There is a unity of believers with their Lord. There is also a unity of husband and wife that comes about through sexual intercourse; for this reason a believer should not be joined to a prostitute (1 Cor. 6:16; cf. Gen. 2:24; Matt. 19:5; Eph. 5:31). The believer's union with Christ is not physical but spiritual: "But he who unites himself with the Lord is one with him in spirit" (1 Cor. 6:17; cf. the marriage analogy of Christ and the church in Eph. 5:28–33; Rev. 21:2).

(ii) In Heb. 2:11, "out of one" (lit.; NIV, "the same family") points to the closest possible unity of believers with Jesus, which is here uniquely expressed in terms of "brothers" in the quotation in 2:12 from Ps. 22:22. There is also a unity of believers in the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:12–13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:15) through and in the Holy Spirit (Eph. 4:4). Our unity in the one Lord causes the wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles, broken down at the cross, to be abolished once and for all; now there exists instead only one, new people of God in Christ (Eph. 2:13–16). This is a particular emphasis in Jn. (see 11:52; 17:11, 21, 23). Those who are made one have a common life (Acts 4:32; Rom. 15:6; 1 Cor. 12:26; Gal. 6:2; Phil. 2:2). Conversely, those who are in rebellion against God have one purpose and will against him (Rev. 17:13).

2. The theological meaning of heis in the NT. Unity in the NT is always seen from the standpoint of Christ, in whom alone is salvation (Acts 4:12). In Gk. and Roman philosophy the unity of God and the world was demanded by educated reason. In the OT the unity of God is a confession derived from God's revelation. The decisive advance in the NT is the basing of the unity and uniqueness of God on the unique revelation through the one man Jesus Christ, the Revealer and Lord (1 Cor. 8:4–6; 1 Tim. 2:5–6).

That is why Paul, after saying in 1 Cor. 8:4 that there are no real idols in the world and that there is no God but one, can recognize in the following sentence that there are in fact many gods and lords. But (and this is the justification for the original statement) these gods have no reality and are therefore only "so-called gods." They have no claim to lordship over us. We know this because there is one Lord Jesus Christ (8:6).

This truth is expressed esp. clearly in Jn. 10:30, which should not be interpreted to mean that the oneness of Jesus with the Father consists of the joining of two persons or beings who were formerly separated. We must rather understand it in the light of Jn. 14:9: "Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father." No one can speak of God unless he or she is speaking concretely of Jesus. The unity of the Spirit is based on Jesus as well (Eph. 4).

"The one man, Jesus Christ," is decisive for the salvation of "the many" (Rom. 5:15). He died for all the one, decisive death (Jn. 11:50, 52; 2 Cor. 5:14). The obedient death of this one man is interpreted by the "much more" of Rom. 5:17. The one man Adam became a curse for humanity "because all sinned" (5:12); by way of contrast, the one man Jesus Christ brought righteousness and life for all (5:17).

The foundation and continuity of the church's unity are grounded in him as the one shepherd of the one flock (Jn. 10:14–16). Paul expresses this fact through his picture of the one body, in which the members are linked and are mutually dependent. The several members cannot live in diversity without the one head (1 Cor. 12). The counterpart to this in Jesus' high priestly prayer in Jn. 17 is the concept of mutual indwelling, where Jesus prayed "that all of them may be one . . . that they may be one as we are one: I in them and you in me" (17:21–23).

1666 ἐκ — ἐκ (ek), out, out of (1666).

CL Originally ek signified an exit "from within" something. Consequently, it came to denote origin, source, derivation, or separation. The prep. was thereby also used of the material out of which something is made, the country of one's origin, and a person with whom a connection is severed. In Hel. Gk. ek and apo began overlapping in usage (→ apo, from, 608).

NT 1. The NT continues many of the basic nuances of ek in cl. Gk. In Matt. 27:29 ek denotes the material out of which something is made, in Acts 23:34 the country of one's origin, and in Jn. 17:15 a person with whom a connection is to be severed. But in the stereotyped use of ek plus a noun preceded by an article (e.g., hoi ek pisteōs, "those who believe," lit., "those of faith," Gal. 3:7, 9), the notion of belonging is more prominent than that of origin.

The frequently used phrase ek (tou) theou (lit., "[out] of God") can depict (a) the agency of God in effecting spiritual regeneration (e.g., Jn. 1:13; 1 Jn. 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18a), corresponding to the role of the male in the act of physical procreation (cf. Matt. 1:18); or (b) God as the source of Jesus' teaching (Jn. 7:17), the giver of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 2:12a) and spiritual gifts (7:7), the source of both physical (11:12b) and spiritual (2 Cor. 5:18) life, the one who empowered Paul to carry out his divine commission (3:5b), the architect of believers' resurrection bodies (5:1), and the one true source of love (1 Jn. 4:7).

2. Notable uses. (a) In Jn. 15:19 (2x); 17:14, 16, Jesus refers to living in the world but not "belonging to the world" (lit., "of [ek] the world"). Christians must live in the world but must not display its characteristics.

(b) Rom. 1:3–4 refers to two successive stages of Christ's existence, not to two coexisting states. With respect to human descent (cf. 9:5), Jesus Christ was born (lit.) "out of [ek] the seed of David." His installation as Son of God in power, performed by the Holy Spirit, took its rise "by [ek, i.e., as a result of] his resurrection from the dead." Further, Paul views the resurrection of all believers as ideally achieved in Christ's resurrection (cf. 1 Cor. 15:20, 23; Col. 1:18). The inclusive category, "the resurrection of the dead," includes the first determinative instance, "his resurrection from the dead."

(c) Many proposals have been made in regard to the meaning of the phrase ek pisteōs eis pistin ("by faith from first to last"; lit., "out of [ek] faith into [eis, → 1650] faith") in Rom. 1:17. Suggestions include: from the faith of the preacher to the faith of the hearer; from God's faithfulness to human faith; from smaller to greater degrees of faith; from faith as a starting point to faith as a permanent condition. But it seems best to construe ek as indicating not a source or starting point ("from faith") but a basis or means ("by faith," as in Hab. 2:4), with the eis pistin either intensifying the effect (as in NIV, quoted above) or denoting the goal of God's impartation to us of a righteous status ("leading to faith"). On either of these latter views, faith is portrayed as the vital and perpetual characteristic of Christian experience.

(d) Two different preps. are used in Rom. 3:30: God will justify the Jews "by [ek] faith" and the Gentiles "through [dia; → 1328] that same faith." Many commentators have sought a distinction between the two preps. But if any distinction is intended, it is formal, not substantial: God justifies the Jew as a result of faith and the Gentile on the same ground (i.e., by means of that same kind of faith). Note that both prep. phrases may mean "through faith" or "by faith," since both can express either effective means or efficient cause. Elsewhere Paul can use ek or dia to denote the immediate means of justification or salvation (ek: Rom. 1:17; 3:26; 5:1; dia: 3:22, 25; Gal. 3:26; Eph. 2:8; cf. a change from dia to ek in Rom. 3:26 [on this, → dia, 1328]; Gal. 2:16). Above all, any suggestion of two distinct means of justification undermines Paul's earlier insistence that there is no difference between Jew and Gentile with respect to sinfulness (Rom. 3:22–23) or the ultimate ground (= grace) and means (= redemption) of justification (3:24).

(e) Without the wider context of 2 Cor. 10–13, one would be tempted to translate 13:4, "he was crucified in [ek; i.e., a condition of physical] weakness," but ek probably bears a causal sense: "because of [his weakness]." The "weakness" Paul suggests is not physical or moral, but the "weakness"—in human eyes—of nonretaliation or nonaggressiveness (cf. 10:1–2, 10–11; 11:20–21, 30; 12:9–10; 13:4b, 9–10). But in such weakness, divine power comes to full strength (12:9).

ἐκβάλλω (ekballō), drive out, expel, send out, take out (1675).

CL & OT ekballō can mean drive out from a place (see Gen. 3:24), divorce (Lev. 21:7), and forcibly expel one's enemies (Exod. 34:24; Jdg. 6:9). By the 1st cent. A.D. this word could be used in a favorable sense, send out.

NT ekballō is used 81x in the NT, with a wide range of meanings. The slave wife Hagar is cast out (Gal. 4:30; cf. Gen. 21:10). A disciple of Jesus is thrown out of the synagogue (Jn. 9:34–35). The name of Christ is rejected (Lk. 6:22). While Jesus rejects no one who comes to him (Jn. 6:37), Diotrephes excludes Christians from the church (3 Jn. 10). The taking out of a splinter (Matt. 7:4) and the removal of an eye (Mk. 9:47) imply the use of force. But the vb. can also have a positive sense: the Spirit's sending Jesus into the desert (1:12), sending out reapers (Matt. 9:38 par.), and bringing out treasures (13:52).

The word has a theological bearing only in connection with casting out demons (cf. Matt. 7:22; 8:16 par.; 9:34; 12:26–27; 17:19 par.; Lk. 13:32). While the pagans and Jews of the NT world tried to drive out the demons by magic and exorcism, Jesus needed only his word of command (Matt. 8:16). Because he possessed the authority of God (cf. Mk. 1:24 par.), demons had to yield to his power. Jesus also gave his disciples authority to cast out demons (Matt. 10:1, 8). His dominion over these powers was a sign that the kingdom of God had come in his person (12:22–28).

ἐκκλησία (ekklēsia), assembly, meeting, congregation, church (1711); συναγωγή (synagōgē), assembly, synagogue (5252); ἀρχισυνάγωγος (archisynagōgos), ruler of the synagogue (801); ἀποσυνάγωγος (aposynagōgos), put out of the synagogue (697).

CL 1. (a) ekklēsia, derived from ekkaleō (call out), denotes the popular assembly of the competent citizens of a polis, city-state (in Athens, they met 30–40x a year, more in times of emergency). Decisions were made on suggested changes in the law, on appointments to official positions, and on every important question of internal and external policy (contracts, treaties, war and peace, finance). To these was added, in special cases (e.g., treason), the task of sitting in judgment, which normally fell to regular courts. The ekklēsia opened with prayers and sacrifices to the gods. Every citizen had the right to speak and propose matters for discussion; a decision was valid only if it won a certain number of votes.

(b) Thus, ekklēsia was clearly characterized as a political phenomenon, rooted in the constitution of the democracy. The scope of its competence varied in the different states. In only three known cases was this word used for the business meeting of a cultic guild.

2. In contrast to ekklēsia, synagōgē exhibited a wide breadth of usage. It denoted the collecting of things (books, letters, possessions, fruit at harvest) and people (including troops). The word found its most clearly defined meaning in the activities of the guilds, used for their regular, mostly festive assemblies, which were almost without exception cultic fellowships. It also denoted their business meeting and (rarely) the guild itself. The use of synagōgē for a specific place of assembly originated within Jud.

OT 1. In the LXX ekklēsia occurs about 100x, mostly for the Heb. qāhāl (though this Heb. root is translated by other words as well, such as synagōgē, ochlos, crowd, or plēthos, multitude). By contrast, synagōgē appears (225x) as the usual translation for Heb. ʿēdâ, congregation (which is never translated by ekklēsia).

2. (a) qāhāl means a summons to an assembly and the act of assembling. What assembles is the ʿēdâ, the ʿām (people), Israel, Judah, the elders, or the princes. This breadth of usage indicates that the decisive meaning of the word is to be determined from the noun, not from the vb. Who make up the qāhāl? In the earliest strata of the OT, the word stands primarily for the summons to war of all the men capable of bearing arms (Gen. 49:6; Num. 22:4; verbal form in 2 Sam. 20:14; 1 Ki. 12:21). To a certain extent, the soldiers represent the people (the ʿām), but occasionally the word stands for the whole congregation of the people (Num. 16:33).

In Deut. qāhāl means primarily the congregation summoned by Yahweh to conclude the covenant with him at Sinai (Deut. 9:10; 10:4). They are bound by the rules he has given, and their participation in his covenant is maintained by obedience. Thus, qāhāl could also have a religious element alongside that of a special, solemn assembly.

In the subsequent period (Jos. to 2 Ki.), the word lost once again its strictly religious character (e.g., 1 Ki. 8:65; 12:3) and came to mean simply the general assembly of the people; it included women and perhaps even children in Jer. 44:15 and in postexilic passages such as Ezr. 10:1; Neh. 8:2. In Ezek. (15x), it is used without religious significance for the mustering of the army and even refers to nations other than Israel (17:17, Egypt; 27:27, Tyre; 32:22, Assyria). The LXX understandably translates it not by ekklēsia but by synagōgē or ochlos.

In Chr. (32x), qāhāl appears both in a representative sense for the assembly of Israel's leaders summoned by the king to make decisions, which may be either religious (1 Chr. 13:2, 4) or political (29:10), and for the crowd gathered for sacrifice and worship (e.g., 2 Chr. 20:5, 14; 30:2, 4). This crowd (gathered in the temple) is also designated qāhāl in Ps. (e.g., 22:22; 89:5; 149:1)—though 26:5 refers to a qāhāl of evildoers.

(b) The primary word for the assembly of God's people is ʿēdâ, which occurs in the Pent. (109x; 82x in Num. alone), the prophets (only at Jer. 6:18; 30:20; Hos. 7:12), and 10x in Ps. This word is related to the root yāʿad, appoint. It implies, therefore, an appointed place and/or time when resolutions are made before Yahweh. It is not difficult to see that the significance of this root agrees closely with the deuteronomistic use of qāhāl. The reference to time is clear in Exod. 9:5 and 1 Sam. 13:8, 11, which have a word derived from the stem, môʿēd, appointed time, assembly, appointed festival.

The ʿēdâ can be defined as the expression coined for the people (ʿām) gathered before the ʿōhel môʿēd, the Tent of Meeting (Exod. 33:7–11). The people were the people of the covenant and thus of the Mosaic law. In the desert narratives this ʿēdâ is divided up into tribes, clans, and families, led by elders, heads, and princes. The word expresses a concept of corporateness, in which the stress falls not on the total of individuals, but on the unity of the fellowship.

The ʿēdâ appears to have been constituted with the divine command to leave Egypt and to celebrate the Passover (its first occurrence is Exod. 12:3). It is Israel that travels through the desert, that rebels, and that experiences God's help (Exod. 16:1–35; Num. 20:1–29). But Israel is also the witness of God's revelation and receiver of his commands (Exod. 34:31–32; 35:1). Israel offers sacrifices (Lev. 4:13–21) and can become guilty through the sin of individuals (10:6). But Israel also keeps watch over the maintenance of the covenant to the point of carrying out its sentences (see 24:14, 16; Num. 15:35–36). In preserving Israel's purity, the priests play an important role as representatives and mediators to God (cf. Lev. 4:13–21; 8:3–13; 9:5–7; Num. 3:7; 8:9, 20; 15:22–26).

But ʿēdâ means not only the community centered in the cult or the law (Num. 35:12, 24). In the sense of ʿām it also represents the community as a people. It is the ʿēdâ that receives and deplores the report of the spies (13:26; 14:1–10). It is to the ʿēdâ that the troops returning from battle (31:12–14) and the leaders of the people (Jos. 9:18–21) have to justify themselves. Still, the ʿēḏâh itself does not wage war, but appoints forces to do it (cf. Num. 31:3–6). Otherwise, however, the word in practice covers the people as a community in all its functions.

On the other hand, the ʿēdâ is not bound to a particular land or place. The generation of the desert did not yet have a specific place, and the generation of the exile had it no longer. The tent and the ark were the symbols and the source of that obedience to the law that so strongly characterized the postexilic community. For this reason, in contrast to qāhāl, ʿēdâ never refers to any people other than Israel and clearly needs no other special qualification: only 4x is the name of Yahweh added.

(c) The above differences become clear from those passages in which both words occur in the same context (e.g., Exod. 12:1–6; 16:1–3; Num. 14:1–7; 20:1–8). ʿēdâ is the unambiguous and permanent term for the covenant community as a whole, while qāhāl is the ceremonial expression for the assembly that results from the covenant. It can also stand for the regular assembly of the people on secular (Num. 10:7; 1 Ki. 12:3) or religious occasions (Ps. 22:25), as well as for a gathering crowd (Num. 14:5; 17:12).

3. Where ekklēsia is used in the LXX for qāhāl, it indicates the assembly of the people or a judicial assembly (e.g., Deut. 9:10; 23:3–8; Jdg. 21:5, 8; Mic. 2:5), i.e., a political body (e.g., the returned exiles Ezr. 10:8, 12; Neh. 8:2, 17). It also indicates, especially in Chr., the assembly of the people for worship (e.g., 2 Chr. 6:3; 30:2, 4, 13, 17; cf. Joel 2:16). Still, even in these cases ekklēsia is only used where it is a question of the people as God's assembly, characterized by having answered Yahweh's call. Admittedly the word is used esp. where the historic greatness of Israel is implied and avoided where it could be a merely political claim. Perhaps that is why, in legal passages regulating the life of the community, qāhāl is translated by synagōgē.

synagōgē, on the other hand, apart from its general use as assembly, place of assembly, and the mustering of troops, was clearly used to denote the religiously defined community of Yahweh. It took over none of the usual Gk. terms for cultic assemblies but was a word without previous associations. Hence, we can understand why in the Pent. qāhāl was also translated by synagōgē. This choice of word could give expression to the fact that the present community had been given the law or that the laws were regularly read in public worship. Thus synagōgē is at the same time a reminder of the great events of salvation history and of the promises to Israel (cf. Num. 14:7–9). The term also acquired eschatological significance from its context (Isa. 56:8; Ezek. 37:10).

4. At Qumran, qāhāl occurs only seldom, and then for the summoned assembly of the community. ʿēdâ, on the other hand, serves both as a designation for the unified congregation and for the remnant of Israel. It also appears as a word for the elect. But we also read in Qumran documents of the congregation of Belial, of wickedness, of scoffers, etc. This reflects the struggle between true and false congregations, which can be decided only by obedience to Yahweh.

NT 1. The origin of the Jewish synagogue is somewhat of a mystery, though many scholars think it started during the time of the exile, when what held the Jews together as a people was their common bond in their Scriptures. During NT times, the synagogue was the regular place where Jews everywhere in the Roman world met for worship and teaching. It was the place where the apostle Paul regularly began his ministry in a new city (e.g., Acts 13:14; 14:1;17:1–2). The official whose duty it was to take care of the physical arrangements for the worship services was the archisynagōgos. Toward the end of the first century, it appears as if Christians were no longer welcome in the synagogue. Whatever process that may have been used to "evict" them is perhaps anachronistically reflected in the aposynagōgos of Jn. 9:22; 12:42; 16:2.

2. (a) It is striking that Jesus' followers did not describe their meetings and community as a synagōgē (except for Jas. 2:2), for that word would have been natural for a group that sprang from Jewish roots and, at least in the beginning, counted itself a part of Jud. synagōgē occurs in the NT (apart from Jas. 2:2; Rev. 2:9; 3:9) only in the Gospels and Acts. It describes either the meeting place of the local Jewish community or the congregation itself (often the word carries both meanings).

Acts 6:9 mentions that Stephen's opponents came from the "Synagogue of the Freedmen (as it was called)—Jews of Cyrene and Alexandria as well as the provinces of Cilicia and Asia." There were several synagogues in Jerusalem, no doubt formed according to the country of origin of the members. Rev. 2:9 and 3:9 describe the Jewish assembly as a whole as "a synagogue of Satan." Their claim to be a congregation of God, the true Israel, is disputed and the title claimed for the Christians.

The polemic of Jn., Acts 6, and Rev. suggests why the early church avoided synagōgē as a term to describe itself: This term came to be regarded as the symbol of the Jewish legal religion. Once the law of Moses effectively took central place in Jewish life and liturgy (cf. Matt. 23:2), the idea of the synagogue must have seemed so rigid to Christians that they separated from it in favor of a reformed Christian assembly. A word with such connotations could not be used to describe a fellowship and an event, at the center of which was the proclamation of a gospel of freedom from law and of salvation available only through faith in Jesus Christ.

(b) What is immediately striking about ekklēsia is that, except for Matt. 16:18 and 18:17, the word is absent from the Gospels. The fact that Luke uses the word 23x in Acts suggests that he consciously avoided using it for the group belonging to the period of Jesus' earthly activity. By far the majority of occurrences of the word appears in Paul's letters (62x out of 114x). It is Paul in particular who shaped this concept.

3. The primitive community. The absence of the word ekklēsia from the Gospels cannot be explained by saying that at the time of their writing the concept was not in current use, since the Gospels received their literary form contemporary with or later than Paul's letters. One can say with certainty that all the early Christian writers used ekklēsia only for those fellowships that came into being after the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus. Though Jesus himself called together the Twelve, he did not found the ekklēsia as such in his own lifetime.

But equally clearly a consciousness of the church arose as early as the primitive Christian community. Its roots lie in the fact that some of the disciples became witnesses of resurrection appearances and were commissioned to bear the news that the time of salvation had dawned. In other words, the concept of the church developed through the consciousness of being in the eschatological situation created by the resurrection appearances (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3–11). The early Christian ekklēsia understood itself as the herald of the lordship of Christ, which was already being realized in their midst. But the church was also aware that it was still part of this age and was therefore not identical with the basileia, the kingdom of God.

4. Paul's letters. (a) When Paul speaks of the ekklēsia, which he does in individual letters with different emphases, his starting point is the proclamation of Christ. When people receive the salvation message in faith, Christ becomes present and real in their experience. The ekklēsia appears as the event in which God fulfills his election through his personal call (Rom. 8:29–30). For this reason he can speak of the klētoi, the called, when he means the Christian community (e.g., Rom. 1:6–7; 1 Cor. 1:2).

For the same reason Paul addresses his letters to Thessalonica to the ekklēsia of the Thessalonians en theō patri, in God the Father (1 Thess. 1:1–2; 2 Thess. 1:1–2), a formula that links the idea of the church as event with that of the local church. It is not difficult to recognize the basic idea of the OT qāhāl. But the ekklēsia of the Thessalonians also introduces the claim that the call of God, which has gone out through the apostle and other preachers in the form of the offer of reconciliation (cf. 2 Cor. 5:19–20), has brought together this assembly. It represents for this place God's new creation.

It is not only the church's origin that lies with God. The ekklēsia can only be understood in relation to the Lord as the ekklēsia tou theou, the congregation of God (1 Cor. 1:2; 11:16, 22; 15:9; 2 Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:13; 1 Thess. 2:14; 2 Thess. 1:4). Only Gal. 1:22 and Rom. 16:16 have the qualifying en Christō, in Christ, or tou Christou, of Christ.

(b) The fact that ekklēsia has the nature of an event does not, however, exclude the factor of continuity. The church expresses itself in permanent forms and institutions, where the Lord will continue to make his presence real. Coming together (synagō) must be reckoned an essential element in ekklēsia (cf. 1 Cor. 11:18). Hence the ekklēsia should be thought of in purely concrete terms.

Paul never uses the word ekklēsia to express an invisible body—a concept that arose in the context of hypocrisy and deceit. The church fathers who developed this concept insisted that those who belong to God are visible to him alone. The idea recalls 2 Tim. 2:19: "The Lord knows those who are his." It extends to the church, in other words, what Paul said of Israel, that they are not all Israel who belong to Israel, but only "the children of the promise" (Rom. 9:6–8). It recognizes the danger, which church members are warned against, of reaping corruption through sowing to the flesh (Gal. 3:7; cf. Rom. 8:12–13). Thus, while the precise application of invisible to the word ekklēsia may be missing, the concept of an invisible church is present (cf. Matt. 13:24–43; 25:31–46; Heb. 2:3; 3:7–4:14; 6:1–12; 10:26–39; 12:12–28).

The ekklēsia has its location, existence, and being within definable geographical limits. The apostle thus writes of "the church of God in Corinth" (1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Cor. 1:1), indicating both that it belongs to the people of that place and has a new and different quality. Those who are drawn into the ekklēsia live in the sphere of power of the new creation (2 Cor. 5:17). But they are not removed from their position in the social order. They remain Israelites, Romans, slaves, freedmen, etc. (cf. 1 Cor. 7:17–24). But these differences lose the divisive power that prevents unity and fellowship (cf. Gal. 3:27–29). Thus, those counted among the "saints," as Paul calls the members of the ekklēsia (1 Cor. 1:2; Phil. 1:1; → hagios, 41), are those whom the Lord calls, to whom he gives faith, and whose participation in the new life is indicated by baptism (Rom. 6:3–4).

(c) Paul best expressed his understanding of the Christian community by calling it a body (sōma, cf. Rom. 12:1–5; 1 Cor. 12:12–27; → 5393). The fact that the Christian community is a body, and the body of Christ at that (1 Cor. 12:27), takes up the spatial idea. Belonging to Christ means becoming like a limb, part of an organism in which each unit has its own special function and gift (→ charis, 5921), to be exercised in mutual giving and receiving.

There is no gradation according to importance in the ekklēsia. Rather, it embraces gifts of leadership and organization, as well as of healing, speaking in tongues, and the discernment of spirits (Rom. 12:4–8; 1 Cor. 12:14–31). These are all manifestations of the working of the one Spirit, i.e., of the presence of the exalted Lord in this his body. Their development and orderly growth requires Christian community life (1 Cor. 14:33).

Paul did not intend to secure this reality by means of a rigid system of offices. The exercise of the gifts must be thought of concretely. Paul understands ekklēsia as the living, assembled congregation. Only in meeting and living together can love, described in 1 Cor. 13 as the supreme gift, be made real, just as it is only in this way that the other God-given gifts can be acknowledged and used. The situation at Corinth appears to be prior to the general adoption of institutionalized offices, such as bishop and elder (see Phil. 1:1; Acts; the Pastoral Letters). But even in 1 Tim. 3:15 the congregation is accorded greater intrinsic value than the office-holders, for it is the congregation that is the oikos theou, the house of God.

(d) The fact that the ekklēsia in the full sense exists in several places at once arises out of the concreteness of Paul's concept, for it points to the present manifestation of the expected rule (kingdom) of the crucified Christ (→ basileus, 995). This is why ekklēsia occurs so frequently in the pl., whether it refers to the different congregations in an area (e.g., 1 Cor. 16:1; Gal. 1:2, 22), to a number of churches, or to all of them (e.g., Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 7:17; 14:33–34).

The fact that small groups in individual houses are called churches (Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:19; Phlm. 2; cf. Col. 4:15) indicates that neither the significance of the place nor the numerical size of the assembly determines the use of the term. What counts is the presence of Christ among them (cf. Gal. 3:1), Christ's revelation of himself to them (cf. 1 Cor. 3:4–10), and faith nourished by him. Hence, the collections for Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1; 2 Cor. 8:19) are not an expression of respect for the superiority of the Jerusalem church, but an expression of fellowship under the one Lord.

(e) While ekklēsia generally refers to its particular local form, there is nevertheless one ekklēsia. The passages that make this clear are those in which Paul recalls the time when he still persecuted the church (1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13; Phil. 3:6). There is one church because the Lord of the church is one. Baptism seals the relationship with Christ, and in the Lord's Supper those who are in Christ experience their corporate nature. These are particular events, tied to particular places, and yet at the same time they are related to the body of Christ in its totality. Therefore, despite differences of detail, there can exist not only the one faith, but beyond that, common rules and even ordinances (1 Cor. 7:17; 11:16; 14:40; 16:1), laid down and enforced by the authority of the apostle.

(f) In Col. and Eph., the church as body (sōma) is developed in terms of the relationship of the members to the head (kephalē, Col. 1:18). Those who have been rescued by the Father out of the realm of the powers of darkness and transferred into the kingdom of the Son become a part of this body (1:13). They share in redemption and the forgiveness of sins and have entered the peace that Christ has created (Col. 1:20; cf. Eph. 2:12–22). The reconciliation achieved by Christ in his death and announced by his messengers is the beginning of the ekklēsia, in terms both of chronology and of relative significance. The sōma of the ekklēsia thus becomes a way to describe the sphere towards which Christ's lordship is directed.

Eph. develops this thought in the assertion that through the ekklēsia the wisdom of God is made known even to the cosmic powers (Eph. 3:10; 4:8–10). They have lost their influence (Col. 2:14–15, 20), for Christ, who in any case stands over them, has reconciled heaven and earth (Eph. 1:20–21; Col. 1:15–20). The emphasis in Eph. falls on the mystical unity of the body (esp. Eph. 4:3–13). It serves as a picture of growth to maturity (4:13; Col. 2:19). A sharp contrast is now made between the head and the body—the Lord stands over against his church, which is completely dependent upon him.

The concept also takes on an organizational aspect, related to the role of offices (cf. Eph. 4:11). What was earlier to be the concern of the whole congregation is now the responsibility of specific officials: to equip the saints to carry out their duty (4:12).

5. Matthew and Luke. (a) From the context, ekklēsia in Matt. 18:17 is to be understood as the number of those living and meeting in one place. Matt. is interested in tracing the outlines of an order for the new community. This suggests that ekklēsia is used here in the OT sense of ʿēdâ, synagogue.

The interpretation of Matt. 16:18 is more difficult. Does the "I will build," for example, refers to Jesus' lifetime or to the period after his death? In general, it is best to see the future tense as referring to the period after Jesus' death. Jesus is not speaking here of a church coming into being at this moment. Rather, ekklēsia here is the eschatological assembly of the true people of God. The statement that "the gates of Hades (i.e., the powers of death) will not overcome it" has its foundation in the fact that this community is linked to the risen Christ as victor over death.

(b) For Luke the period of the church is a particular segment of salvation history between Jesus' resurrection and return. This follows directly from the use he makes of the word. While ekklēsia is completely absent from his Gospel, he uses the term 23x from Acts 5:11 onwards (but not in Acts 2).

(c) In Acts, as in Paul, ekklēsia indicates first of all Christians living and meeting in a particular place: e.g., the early community in Jerusalem (5:11; 8:1; 11:22; 12:1, 5), the church at Antioch (13:1), and elsewhere. Acts 20:28 characterizes the ekklēsia as ekklēsia tou theou, the church of God, an idea that may be understood throughout. It becomes this through the Spirit, who incorporates individual members into the church. It is the Spirit who moves and equips the church (1:5, 8; 2:4–21; cf. 4:31–37) and for whose sake it is attacked and persecuted (7:55–60).

In Acts too the ekklēsia is ultimately one. Admittedly, it appears only as it gathers in particular places (cf. 14:27), but it always implies the totality. As in the OT (cf. 7:38, which refers to Israel in the desert period), the ekklēsia is those who follow the call of God and come together (cf. synagō in 14:27); yet even when their meeting is over, they retain their quality of ekklēsia. It is one throughout the world, yet is at the same time fully present in every individual assembly. Luke can use the sing. to refer to the church at large (8:3) as well as to "the church throughout Judea, Galilee and Samaria" (9:31).

6. The Johannine writings. (a) Jn. focuses attention on the fact that in this world of death and unbelief, which cannot recognize the Lord (Jn. 1:10; 14:17), people can still experience birth from above (3:3–21; cf. 1:12–13) and pass from death to life. Unlike Acts, with its households and local groups, Jn. always refers to individuals who come to this faith and knowledge.

The application to Jesus of Jewish concepts for the eschatological people of God (e.g., vine, 15:1–8; shepherd and flock, 10:1–18) shows Jesus to be the one revealer and fulfiller. Jn. draws attention to the unbridgeable gulf between faith and unbelief and recognizes that only God can bring a person to Jesus (6:44; 17:2). This emphasis on the individual is balanced by Jesus' command to mutual love (13:34–35), without any organizational forms and terms coming into view. Allegiance has long ago been determined by God (10:1–6; 26–30; 17:6), so even coming together in unity can only be his work (17:21).

(b) In Rev., however, ekklēsia (as in Acts) means the congregation that has grown up, exists, and meets in a particular place. Until 22:16, all the references occur in the letters of chs. 2 and 3 or in the vision of the seven lampstands (1:4, 11, 20; i.e., the seven ekklēsiai in Asia). In 22:16, the exalted Jesus speaks to the churches through his angel. The references in 3 Jn. 6, 9, 10 are all to a local Christian assembly.

7. James and Hebrews. Jas. 5:14, which deals with the elders of the ekklēsia, uses the word in the technical sense for a local congregation organized according to the pattern of a Jewish synagogue; Heb. 2:12 cites Ps. 22:22 (Heb. qāhāl) and means the cultic festival gathering. Heb. 12:23 is different. Here the word occurs in a series of eschatological terms taken from Jewish tradition: Believers are qualified as "the church of the firstborn, whose names are written in heaven." Entrance into this "church" is understood as entering into fellowship with "righteous men made perfect" and with "Jesus the mediator of a new covenant." It is not here a question of the description of a group, but of the characterization of the eschatological event (the service of worship).

8. There remains the question of other terms used to denote the Christian community, particularly in writings in which ekklēsia is absent or rare.

(a) The Gospels frequently (e.g., 68x in Matt.; 58 x in Jn.) use mathētēs, disciple, to refer to Jesus' followers. In the NT (it is absent from the LXX), it occurs primarily in the pl. The word originally denoted those who were devoted to the teaching of a master and were committed to passing it on. Since mathētēs does not occur outside the Gospels and Acts, we have a stratum of tradition in which the corporate concepts for the Christian community have not yet been formulated. It belongs to the period of the first gathering of people around the earthly Jesus, and in Acts around the exalted Jesus, thought of as present in the Spirit.

(b) It is different with the pl. hoi hagioi, the saints, which occur 4x in Acts (always in narratives about Paul) and 38x in Paul for the members of the churches. The saints are also called the elect (Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:2), those who have been sanctified by God. The word indicates the true Israel and was probably first used for the original congregation in Jerusalem (Acts 9:13; 1 Cor. 16:1) and then for Christians in general.

(c) This conviction led Peter to use a whole series of Jewish expressions shaped by the OT. The letter is addressed to "God's elect, strangers" (1 Pet. 1:1), who are called to be hagioi, holy (1:15), and already "believe in God" (1:21). They are described as "a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people belonging to God" (2:9)—all of which reflect OT language. The Christian community is nothing new; it is to be understood as the fulfillment of the promises and hopes given to Israel. They come together as living stones in a spiritual house (2:5–8) and serve one another with different gifts as God's grace is revealed in them (4:10). In the process, the OT order of elders seems to have been taken over (cf. 5:1–4; → presbyteros, 4565). In all this, according to the terminology of shepherd and flock, Christ stands at the head as chief shepherd, i.e., as Messiah.

(d) The members of the congregation are also called adelphoi, brothers (→ 81). The term occurs most frequently in Paul (96x), but also in Acts, the Johannine letters, Jas., and Heb.

See also synagō, gather (5251).

1719 (eklampō, shine forth), → 3290.

1721 ἐκλέγομαι

ἐκλέγομαι (eklegomai), pick out for oneself, choose (out) (1721); ἐκλεκτός (eklektos), chosen (out) (1723); ἐκλογή (eklogē), picking out, election, selection (1724).

CL 1. In cl. Gk., words in this word group refer to the election and/or selection of persons or things. eklogē is sometimes used of the general conscription of men for military service or the selection of individual soldiers from the army for a particularly difficult or glorious mission. eklegomai and eklogē are esp. used in a political sense, for the election of people to perform a certain task or administer a certain office (e.g., the elders of the polis). Such election placed a responsibility on the elected person, usually to act with a concern for the well-being of the other members of the community.

2. The words may be applied to objects. eklegomai is used to denote a decision in favor of what is intellectually or aesthetically good, or the selection of esp. treasured passages from lit. eklogē can also refer to the requisition of material (e.g., ships) or the levying of official tribute and taxes. In every case a part has been claimed from a greater quantity by an independent act of decision for a particular purpose.

3. Certain Stoic writers use this word for a single person's free decision between two or more possibilities with respect to one's manner of life, livelihood, or use of material goods.

OT 1. (a) The noun eklogē does not occur in the LXX, primarily since there is no comparable Heb. noun. The fact that only verbal forms are found results in an emphasis not on the action but on the person who chooses and the one chosen (eklektos). The act. form of eklegō occurs only 10x, especially in the books of Ki. and Chr. The mid. eklegomai nearly always renders forms of the Heb. vb. bāḥar, choose, select, prefer. This Heb. vb. has roughly the same range of meanings as the Gk. vb. (see Isa. 40:20, where it denotes one's choice of suitable material for an idol; Gen. 6:2, the carefully considered choice of a wife; 13:11, Lot's choice of the part of the land that seemed to him most favorable).

In Prov. the niph. of bāḥar portrays one object as desirable in comparison to another, e.g., a devout and obedient life before God as preferable to gold and silver (Prov. 8:10, 19; 16:16). The vb. is also used for the people's election of a king (1 Sam. 8:18). The part. bāḥûr and the adj. bāḥîr can describe specially chosen elite troops (cf. Jdg. 20:15–16; 1 Sam. 24:2; 2 Chr. 25:5) or particularly suitable material (Exod. 14:7).

bāḥar (translated with eklegō) also refers to the basic religious decision of choosing between Yahweh and other gods (Jos. 24:15), or between life in God's temple and life in the world of evildoers (Ps. 84:10).

(b) In the majority of cases where bāḥar (and thus eklegō) is found, God is the one who chooses. In Deut., besides the people whom God has singled out for a special mission (4:37; 7:7; 14:2), the referent is above all the one place God has appointed for his people as a center for worship and for sacrifices (cf. 16:6–7; 18:5–6; 26:2). In 1 Ki. (cf. 11:13, 32; 14:21) and 2 Chr. (cf. 6:34, 38; 12:13), this is defined more closely as Jerusalem, the city of David. David himself is also described as chosen (1 Ki. 8:16; 11:34). In the cultic sphere we find God's choice of the priests (Deut. 18:5; 1 Sam. 2:28; 1 Chr. 15:2; 16:41). Saul and David were chosen by God as kings (1 Sam. 10:24; 16:8–10; 2 Sam. 6:21). Finally, the later chapters of Isa. refer to God's choice of his Servant (Isa. 43:10) and of Jacob and Abraham (41:8).

2. This emphasis on God's action is further strengthened by the fact that the part. bāḥûr, which points to the quality of the object, is not used of Israel as the chosen people; instead, the adj. bāḥîr is used (in Gk., eklektos is used for both words). This means theologically that the OT is concerned with not drawing attention to the importance or status of the nation. Rather, God chooses freely out of grace, not because of human merit. bāḥîr (cf. 2 Sam. 21:6; Ps. 105:43; Isa. 42:1; 65:22 = LXX 65:23) also indicates that the purpose of that choice is some commission, and that such election can only meaningfully retain its validity in the fulfillment of that service. The whole outlook of Deut., as well as that of Isa., sees in this activity of God the creation among the nations of a new, different type of community, whose purpose is to show God's sovereign acts and grace and the seriousness of his demands.

The doctrine of election is thus an indissoluble part of the knowledge of God's holiness, uniqueness, and unconditioned sovereignty. It expresses the total claim he makes in keeping with these aspects of his nature. This line of thought reaches its climax in the passages of Isa. that speak of God's servant (pais theou, → 4090), who appears as God's agent in the redemption of all humanity. God's election is not based on human qualifications, nor does it create a position of privilege. Hence, it can only be maintained meaningfully where it leads to a response of love for God, obedience, and the kind of life presupposed by the commandments. It is not a goal already reached, but a beginning that has to be confirmed. Thus, we find a warning that God may reject again those whom he has drawn to him in this way (cf. 1 Sam. 16:1; Jer. 14:19).

3. There is, however, a danger of thinking and speaking of those who are chosen, their qualifications, and the difference between them and other people, as if it belonged to an elite who deserved preference by reason of their struggles, sufferings, stricter discipline, or greater self-sacrifice. Rab. theology, and even more so apocalyptic (→ mystērion, 3696), effected such a transformation in the interpretation of suffering in connection with the Servant passages in Isa. They saw proof of election in unyielding resistance in times of affliction. Therefore, utmost importance came to be attached to the possession and knowledge of the Torah as a basis for belief in election, giving Israel an advantage over others (cf. 2 Esd. 5:23–27). This was expressed particularly in thoughts of vengeance, which also influenced this line of thought (cf. 1 Enoch 62:11–15).

Election thus became a status and privilege that could be recognized and achieved by means of dubious merits. It was a continuation of these ideas when the OT teaching about the difference between the true, spiritual Israel and mere political and physical membership of the people, esp. in the context of resistance to Hellenistic "infiltration," led the devout to separate themselves off into exclusive groups. Inevitably this brought the concept of individual election further to the fore. This is esp. apparent in the Qumran texts (e.g., 1QS 4:22; 8:1–15), in which consciousness of being chosen led not only to a feeling of superiority over other nations and over the ungodly but also to a direct hatred for those who have been rejected (1:3–4). Certain aspects of Pharisaic piety, such as their contempt for the common people (ʿam hāʾ āreṣ), are also expressive of such an attitude (→ Pharisaios, 5757).

NT 1. In the NT, the vb. eklegomai and the part. eklektos (used as a subst.) each occur 22x, relatively seldom in comparison with the LXX. The noun eklogē, not found in the LXX, is found 7x, chiefly in Paul.

(a) Matt. and Mk. use eklektos in the pl. in the context of eschatological sayings. This use is clearly in the same sense as Jewish tradition, according to which the object of election is a body of people, even though it is spoken of as many individuals (cf. also the genos eklekton in 1 Pet. 2:9). The sing. is applied to Jesus Christ in Lk. 23:35 and 1 Pet. 2:4, 6. It is used once (Rom. 16:13) of an individual church member. It occurs also in 2 Jn. 1 and 13 with kyria or adelphē, but the references there are hardly to individual persons, but rather to churches.

(b) Of the 22 uses of eklegomai, always mid. (most of them in Lk. and Acts), the subj. of the vb. may be grouped under four heads. (i) In 4 places in Acts (6:5; 15:22, 25; possibly 1:24) the vb. indicates appointment by the church to a particular office. (ii) Lk. 14:7 describes the self-esteem in which human beings indulge when they choose special seats at table. (iii) In Lk. 10:42 Mary's decision to devote herself exclusively to the words of Jesus is described by saying that she has chosen the good part (cf. 1 Sam. 15:22). (iv) In all other cases, it is used in connection with God's or Christ's work of election. John consistently represents Christ as the agent of election (Jn. 6:70; 13:18; 15:16, 19); in Lk. 6:13 Luke speaks of Jesus' selection of the Twelve.

(c) The noun eklogē is used unambiguously and exclusively for God's act of election: in Rom. 9:11; 11:5, 7, 28, each time with reference to Israel; in 1 Thess. 1:4 and 2 Pet. 1:10, where the church is reminded that God's election is the basis of her existence; and in Acts 9:15, the only case in which the meaning is slightly different, for Paul is described in the words of the exalted Lord as a skeuos eklogēs, a vessel of election—i.e., an instrument by means of which God operates and makes effective his choice.

2. If we concentrate on those passages in which God is the subject, we should note first what is said about the circumstances and purpose of God's elective activity, and then about the unique position given to Christ or attributed to him. It is necessary to speak in these terms since all the statements about election arose as a result of reflection on the part of these witnesses to God's work after they had encountered him and been added to the church. It was then that they began to face the question of where the fundamental starting point lay on their own road to faith, and of what was the foundation of a church that was able to survive temptation and persecution.

In other words, NT writers were asking themselves whether faith and discipleship were the fruit of human temperament and human decision, or whether the secret lay elsewhere as to how an obedient response came to be made to the call that went out through the preaching of the gospel. Statements about election are thus an attempt to express the truth that the existence of a people of God can be explained only on the basis of God's plan, will, and action, and not from a series of human resolves.

The problem is presented most clearly in Matt. 22:14, where we find added to a parable the epigrammatic saying: "Many are invited (klētoi), but few are chosen (eklektoi)." Historical experience offers a surprising result, for not all to whom God shows favor actually arrive at the goal of this call. This saying of Jesus directs attention to two facts: (1) Between the first stage and the last God is active in relation to humankind; and (2) arrival at this goal is based solely on God's gracious choice.

3. In Rom. 9–11 Paul, whose whole outlook on life has been shaken to the roots, wrestles with this problem as it relates to Israel's position before God in view of her rejection of Christ. Paul comes to the conclusion that Israel is counted as God's chosen people because of a free decision of God, dependent not on any conditions, but solely on the one who elects. The nation continues to enjoy God's love in election, not because of blood descent, but because of God's promise (Rom. 9:11–12; 11:28). Since election was a free act of God's grace, not all have in fact reached the goal (cf. Matt. 22:14). But although the majority have gone astray, there remains a remnant (Rom. 11:5, 7). Moreover, God does not abandon his aim, even though for the time being all seems lost. The interval during which Israel rejects God's purpose serves rather to extend the horizon of his grace to the Gentiles (Rom. 11:28–32).

In Paul's speech in Acts 13:17, he likewise draws attention to the choice of Israel through the patriarchs. Luke also gives expression to the Pauline thought of Rom. 11 in Peter's address in Acts 15:7. This is the only passage in which ta ethnē, the nations or Gentiles (→ 1620), are expressly named as the object or sphere of operation of God's elective activity. The barrier is now broken down; salvation is available to all. This does not mean, of course, that the mystery of God's electing grace has been fathomed. It is based on a plan, yet it is not an automatic process that one can predict. It is the action of God in history that is always open to modification.

4. Is there any discernible reason for God's activity of selecting those whom he chooses? As before, Luke hints at the answer in his Gospel. In the story of the Transfiguration, where the heavenly voice bears witness to the greatness of Jesus (Lk. 9:35), Lk. uses eklelegmenos, chosen, where the other Synoptics have agapētos (cf. Matt. 17:5; Mk. 9:7). In other words, the whole elective activity of God reaches its culmination in his Son, who abstains in his behavior from every attempt to assert himself. Jesus is God's Chosen One. The ultimate goal of all previous election was to prepare the way for him to be revealed.

If we add to this the teaching of 1 Pet., we find that through Jesus is revealed also the lack of understanding among humanity in general and even among God's own people. The possibility of recognizing God's work in and through Jesus is closed to them. It is the one rejected and cast out by humankind (cf. 3 above) whom God makes his chosen cornerstone (1 Pet. 2:4, 6; cf. Ps. 118:22; Isa. 28:16). The consequences of being God's chosen one becomes apparent in his life.

5. It is on this cornerstone, Christ, that God builds up his church from the nations. At the same time the continuity of the covenant is assured in him. As humans are called by election, the church comes into being as the body of Christ, the new genos eklekton (1 Pet. 2:9), the chosen race. Wherever we read of the election of the church (e.g., 1 Thess. 1:4), the underlying thought is that of the basis of its existence in Christ. It is significant how seldom this is mentioned in the NT. Generally, its existence is attributed directly to God's grace.

However, in the "little apocalypse" (Mk. 13 par.) and Lk. 18:7, the church is spoken of as the elect (eklektoi). This appears in the context of the persecution believers are to endure, the suffering they are to bear in the course of discipleship, and the protection they will be given by God, who entirely for their sake will go so far as to shorten the time (Mk. 13:20 par.). Only their belonging to Christ will protect the church's members from judgment and condemnation (Rom. 8:33).

With direct reference to the apostles but also as an example of what is true of disciples generally, John shows Christ as the one who chooses and puts God's election into effect. In Jn. 6:70; 13:18; 15:16, 19, Jesus is the explicit subj. (with an emphatic egō, I) of eklegomai. Lk. 6:13 likewise refers to Jesus' choice of the apostles (see also Acts 1:24). The Chosen One of God is God's agent of choice. In Christ, God's favor has already been bestowed on us, and it comes to us effectively in the call that goes out and invites us through Christ.

6. As to what underlies God's choice, the NT is clear that he bestows favor upon human beings and joins them to himself solely on the basis of his own free decision and his love, which are not dependent on any temporal circumstances. This is the deeper meaning of Eph. 1:4, where the expression "before the creation of the world" is not to be understood in a purely temporal sense. Rather, it refers to a decision rooted in the depths of God's nature, like his prognōsis (foreknowledge) or prothesis (purpose). (Cf. the chain of verbs in Rom. 8:29–30, whose tense suggests that all these actions are already past.) In any case, what is revealed of God's work of election runs across all the usual human standards. With majestic independence he passes by those who are worthy of respect (or have they scornfully rejected his call?) and presents as his elect the poor (Jas. 2:5), the weak, the foolish, and the despised of this world (1 Cor. 1:27–28).

Does this result in a pure community of the elect? As far as their character in God's eyes is concerned, yes. But the question attributed to Jesus in Jn. 6:70 gives food for thought. Among the company of the elect there is a devil! Is it possible to fall from grace? Certainly the assurance of election must never be allowed to turn into a false sense of security. As early as 1 Thess. 1:4, but stated more clearly in Col. 3:12 and 2 Pet. 1:10, we find the reminder of the manifestation of God's grace linked with an imperative, an exhortation also to live in it, to prove oneself as one whom God has sanctified. Only when faith is lived out is election evident (cf. Tit. 1:1). We can only really speak of election when we also give due weight to what Jn. emphasizes, but which is always implicit: the commission to fruit-bearing service, obedience, and a God-fearing and God-trusting life.

ἐκπλήσσω (ekplēssō), amaze, astound (1742).

CL & OT The root meaning of ekplēssō is to strike out or expel. The vb. is found with this sense in cl. Gk., but it occurs far more frequently with its derived meaning of astound or amaze. Among the sources of amazement expressed by this vb. in nonbiblical lit. are fear, desire, love, joy, and pleasure. In Eccl. 7:16 (= LXX 7:17) this vb. means "be appalled" in the sense of "be destroyed." In Wis. 13:4 it is used with reference to those who are ignorant of the true God and are "amazed" at the powerful deeds of false gods (here fire, wind, and the luminaries). This vb. is also used to describe the amazement that pagans felt when God's people willingly underwent martyrdom (2 Macc. 7:12; 4 Macc. 17:16; cf. 8:4).

NT ekplēssō occurs 13x in the NT, though only once outside the Gospels (and then in Acts). It is always found in the pass. ("be amazed"). In most cases it expresses the astonished reaction of uncommitted onlookers to Jesus' teaching (e.g., Mk. 1:22 par.; 6:2 par.); once it refers to a demonstration of his healing power (Lk. 9:43). Only Luke names individuals as the subject of this vb.: Mary and Joseph are amazed to find the boy Jesus sitting among the temple teachers (2:48), and the proconsul Sergius Paulus is "amazed at the teaching about the Lord" (Acts 13:12).

ἔκστασις (ekstasis), distraction, confusion, astonishment, terror, trance, ecstasy (1749); ἐξίστημι (existēmi), trans. drive out of one's senses, confuse, astound; intrans. lose one's mind, be amazed (2014).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. ekstasis originally meant a change of location, then metaphorically confusion, terror, madness. The specific meaning ecstasy, in which consciousness is partially or entirely nonoperative through the work of a divine power, is found esp. in Philo. The vb. existēmi means confuse, terrify; in the mid. lose one's wits.

Neither vb. nor noun is used in the LXX with the specific sense of ecstasy (for such states prophēteuō [→ 4736] is used). ekstasis often means confusion, terror, madness (Deut. 28:28; 1 Sam. 11:7; 14:15; Jer. 5:30 [S]; Zech. 12:4). existēmi in the act. sense occurs in Exod. 23:27; Jdg. 4:15; 8:12 with the same force as in secular Gk. The mid. existamai means lose one's wits in Isa. 28:7, but the meaning of be terrified, be frightened is more common (e.g., Ezek. 26:16; 27:35).

Ecstatic phenomena are found in the OT, such as the ecstasy of the elders in the desert (Num. 11:24–29) and the description of Balaam's trance condition (24:4). The ecstatic character of the early Israelite prophetic bands is described in 1 Sam. 10:5–6, 10; 19:20–24. When at times prophets are said to be mad (2 Ki. 9:11; Hos. 9:7) or drunken (Isa. 28:7; Jer. 23:9), prophecy and ecstasy are linked. Israelite prophets claimed their visions as divine messages (cf. Jer. 23:16–17). False prophets also appeared in Israel and neighboring countries as ecstatics and visionaries (e.g., the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel, opposed by Elijah, in 1 Ki. 18:28). Ecstasy, visions, and the claim to an oracle are not infallible signs that distinguish the true from the false prophet; only the message will do that. In the intertestamental period prophecy gradually died out.

NT In the NT ekstasis and existēmi express human reaction of astonishment to the wonderful acts of God (Mk. 2:12; 5:42; Lk. 5:26; Acts 3:10), as do thaumazō and related expressions (→ thauma, 2512). The act. of existēmi occurs in Lk. 24:22 and Acts 8:9, 11, with the meaning terrify, amaze.

The statement of Jesus' relatives about him can be understood in the specific sense of ecstasy (Mk. 3:21), which would mean that he was taken to be an ecstatic.

More likely, however, they were saying he was out of his mind, for the Gospels contain no ecstatic traits in Jesus' life of faith and prayer.

According to Acts 10:10; 11:5; 22:17, the visions seen by Peter in Joppa and Paul in Jerusalem occurred during a trance (ekstasei). Acts also records speaking in tongues, recognizing in it the work of the Holy Spirit (10:44, 46; 11:15, 17; 19:6), though without using words of this group to refer to it. But in 1 Cor. 14 Paul clearly regards this phenomenon as ecstatic (cf. 12:23). Paul even states in 12:18 that he was no stranger to speaking in tongues. This verse and Acts 22:17 suggest that the visions and revelations of 2 Cor. 12:2–7 were ecstatic experiences. The same may be true of John (Rev. 1:10; 4:1–2). If so, he was seized by the Spirit and carried up to heaven, just as Paul was in 2 Cor. 12:2, 4.

Paul's reticence in 2 Cor. 12 and his sober evaluation of speaking in tongues in 1 Cor. 14:19 show that one must not overrate the importance of ecstasy for the early church. Paul did not regard his initial vision of Christ on the road to Damascus as ecstatic (1 Cor. 9:1; 15:8; Gal. 1:16). The strong spiritual consciousness that meets us in the NT is founded on the certainty that the church has been given a new revelation in Christ, transcending all that has gone before. The examples of ecstatic pious experiences must be seen as a result, not as the cause, of this faith.

1759 ἐκτινάσσω

ἐκτινάσσω (ektinassō), shake out, shake off (1759); ἀποτινάσσω (apotinassō), shake off (701).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ektinassō means shake out, as in cleaning clothes; search thoroughly, make a disturbance. apotinassō means shake off.

2. (a) ektinassō occurs 21x in the LXX. The Lord shook off the Egyptians in the midst of the sea, i.e., out of their chariots as they turned to flee (Exod. 14:27; Ps. 136:15). Neh. sealed an oath taken by the priests by shaking out his lap, symbolizing that anyone breaking the promise would be cursed by a life of homeless wandering, emptied of all his possessions (5:13). Fig. this word can express weakness: e.g., shaken off as easily as a locust (Ps. 109:23). Captive Jerusalem is told to stand up and shake herself free from the dust of despair in captivity and from the Gentiles (Isa. 52:2).

(b) In 1 Sam 10:2 apotinassō denotes how Saul's father ceased to be concerned about the lost animals. In Lam. 2:7 apotinassō means abhor, reject: The Lord has disowned, cast off, his sanctuary.

NT 1. (a) In commissioning the Twelve, Jesus tells them that where their message is not accepted, they are to "shake the dust off" (ektinassō, Matt. 10:14; Mk. 6:11; apotinassō, Lk. 9:5) their feet, a gesture of abandonment. No trace of association with the house or city is to remain; these inhabitants are thus branded as no better than the heathen outside the covenant. Many Jewish travelers shook off the dust of Gentile territory from their sandals and clothes before reentering the promised land. Once the apostles have discharged their responsibilities to preach, those rejecting the gospel will suffer judgment, heavier even than that inflicted on Sodom and Gomorrah. The fate of those cities is often an OT type of fearful retribution for aggravated sin (Deut. 29:23; Isa. 13:19; Jer. 49:18; 50:40; Amos 4:11; Zeph. 2:9).

(b) Paul also follows Jesus' advice and makes use of the same dramatic symbolism when the Jews stir up opposition to his preaching in Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:51) and when he makes his final break from the synagogue in Corinth (18:6).

2. apotinassō is used in its lit. sense to describe Paul's action in shaking the snake from his hand after the shipwreck on Malta (Acts 28:5).

1762 (ektrepō, pass. turn away from, avoid), → 706.

1765 ἔκτρωμα

ἔκτρωμα (ektrōma), miscarriage (1765).

CL & OT ektrōma is connected with the vb. ektitrōskō, to have a miscarriage. It is found esp. in medical language to denote a premature still birth. It occurs in the LXX in the suggestion that an untimely still birth would have been preferable to life (Job 3:16; Eccl. 6:3), and in the appearance of an aborted fetus (Num. 12:12).

NT In the NT the word occurs only in 1 Cor. 15:8, where Paul describes his encounter with the risen Christ: "Last of all he appeared to me also, as to one abnormally born (tō ektrōmati)." The definite art. (tō) in this passage draws attention to this birth as something singular and even shocking; it is softened only by the addition of the word "as" (hōsperei). The words "to me also" stand at the end of the Greek sentence in a place of emphasis and contrast Paul with the other apostles.

In the interpretation of this verse, 15:9 is decisive. Here Paul alludes to his unworthiness to be called an "apostle" (a title of honor), because he formerly persecuted the church. If ektrōma is thus understood not as premature birth but as still birth, the significance of Paul's choice of the word lies in his joyful gratitude that God chose him to be an apostle despite his utterly reprobate life as a former persecutor.

ektrōma was probably a term of abuse. It might refer to Paul's physique or infirmities, to which there are numerous allusions in his writings (e.g., 1 Cor. 2:3; 4:10; 2 Cor. 11:30; 12:7–10; Gal. 4:13–14). It might contain a hint that Paul was still too much influenced by the law and was not as spiritual as his opponents in Corinth (cf. 1 Cor. 2). There may be in it the suggestion that Paul was still an embryo believer, lacking the same period of "gestation" that the other apostles had. (These suggestions are not necessarily mutually exclusive.)

But Paul's words must also be understood in the context of the argument of 1 Cor. 15. Paul is concerned in 15:3–7 with the proof of Jesus' resurrection, based on his appearances to the apostles and to others. Referring to his own encounter with Christ on the Damascus road, Paul writes (lit.), "Last of all, as to the ektrōma, he appeared also to me" (1 Cor. 15:8; cf. 9:1; Gal. 1:16; Acts 9:3–6; 22:4–16; 26:9–18). The thought of the risen Christ's appearance to him leads immediately to the thought of his apostleship (1 Cor. 15:9), which some questioned (9:1). After all, Paul was a former persecutor of the church. Moreover, he lacked the two qualifications that were laid down when the other apostles considered a replacement for Judas: He had not been a disciple of Jesus in his earthly ministry, and he was not a witness like them of Jesus' resurrection (Acts 1:21–22).

Against this, Paul claimed to receive his apostleship directly from the risen Lord, whom he had seen (cf. the above references). Admittedly, he had not known the earthly Jesus and his encounter had happened after the ascension. Nevertheless, Paul insisted that he had encountered the risen Christ and received his apostleship directly from him. As such, the description of him as the aborted one may be triply apt. As a person Paul was not as acceptable as others. He was premature in the sense that he had not served the period of discipleship like the Twelve and had become an apostle at his conversion. But above all, he had encountered Christ as "one abnormally born"—sometime after the resurrection appearances to the others had ceased.

1772 ἐκχέω

ἐκχέω (ekcheō), pour out (1772); ἐκχύννομαι (ekchynnomai), pour out (1773); σπένδω (spendō), pour out (a drink offering) (5064); πρόσχυσις (proschysis), pouring or sprinkling (of blood) (4717).

CL & OT 1. The simple form cheō, pour, is still in use in cl. Gk., but compounds (esp. ekcheō, pour out) gradually displace it. ekcheō is used of pouring liquids, sometimes with the idea of draining. It can also be used with regard to scattering solid objects and, metaphorically, for squandering money. ekchyn(n)ō is a Hel. Gk. form.

2. In the LXX ekcheō is a general word for pour, often used in purificatory rites (Exod. 30:18; Num. 19:17). It occurs esp. in the pouring or shedding of blood—either in sacrifices or, more frequently, in murder (cf. Gen. 9:6; 37:22; Deut. 19:10; 1 Sam. 25:31; Ps. 13:3). It is also used of pouring out offerings, generally of water, to Yahweh (e.g., Jdg. 6:20; 1 Sam. 7:6) or to other gods (e.g., Isa. 57:6). The technical term for offering libations (of wine) is spendō (Exod. 25:29 = LXX 25:28; 30:9; Num. 4:7; 28:7).

Among nonliteral uses, a common expression is to pour out anger on someone, as in God's acts of judgment (e.g., Ps. 79:6; Ezek. 7:8). People can also pour out their soul, i.e., their complaint, before God (1 Sam. 1:15; Ps. 142:2). One special use is the promise that God will pour out his Spirit on the human race (Joel 2:28–29; cf. Ezek. 39:29; Zech. 12:10). A Jewish inscription uses ekcheō of shedding the blood of an innocent martyr.

NT 1. ekcheō is used in the lit. sense in Matt. 9:17; Lk. 5:37 (of wine running out); Jn. 2:15 (of money "scattered"); Acts 1:18 (of Judas's bowels being "spilled out").

2. The use of shedding blood as a synonym for murder or martyrdom occurs in Matt. 23:35; Acts 22:20 (both ekchynnomai); Rom. 3:15; Rev. 16:6. Heb. refers to the sprinkling or pouring of blood in the OT sacrificial ritual with proschysis (Heb. 11:28; cf. Exod. 12:22) and haimatekchysia (Heb. 9:22; → haima, blood, 135). The latter is found exclusively in Christian writings, but cf. ekchysis haimatos, pouring out of blood (1 Ki. 18:28; Sir. 27:15).

3. These two OT senses of shedding blood—murder or martyrdom and sacrifice—come together in the crucial words of Jesus in the institution of the Lord's Supper, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out [ekchynnomai] for many" (Mk. 14:24; cf. Matt. 26:28); Lk. 22:20 reads, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, which is poured out [ekchynnomai]for you." Jesus is both a martyr, an innocent victim of murder, and a sacrifice "for many."

Several OT passages are alluded to in these words; two are esp. important. "This is my blood of the covenant" echoes Exod. 24:8, the sacrificial offering that instituted the old covenant of Sinai, which is now being replaced (as Jer. 31:31–34 predicted) with a new covenant, sealed by Jesus' sacrificial death. "For many" points to Isa. 53:11–12, where the "many" are to be made righteous by the death of God's Servant bearing their sin; he is said in Isa. 53:12 to have "poured out his life unto death." Thus, the pouring out of Jesus' blood introduces us into a new covenant relationship with God.

4. Paul takes up the pouring of libations as a metaphor for his approaching martyrdom in his use of spendō in Phil. 2:17 and 2 Tim. 4:6. The libation is not, like the blood sacrifices, an atoning offering, but an expression of dedication to God.

5. The more metaphorical uses of pour in the OT are also echoed in the NT. The pouring out of God's fury provides the imagery of the seven bowls of God's wrath poured out in Rev. 16, where ekcheō occurs 9x. More characteristically, God's love is "poured out" in the hearts of believers (Rom. 5:5), and this has been done by the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, who is several times said, following Joel 2:28–29, to have been "poured" on those who receive Christ (Acts 2:17–18, 33; 10:45; Tit. 3:6).

1773 (ekchynnomai, pour out), → 1772.

1777 (elaia, olive tree, olive), → 1778.

1778 ἔλαιον

ἔλαιον (elaion), olive (oil) (1778); ἐλαία (elaia), olive tree, olive (1777); ἐλαιών (elaiōn), olive orchard (1779); ἀγριέλαιος (agrielaios), wild olive (66); καλλιέλαιος (kallielaios), cultivated olive (2814); Γεθσημανί (Gethsēmani), Gethsemane (1149).

CL & OT 1. elaion refers to the oil of the olive, the most commonly used oil in the ancient world. It was a regular part of the diet of most Mediterranean peoples and was also used as fuel for lamps and medicine. The Greeks also used it for anointing the body after bathing and before wrestling and other sports.

2. In the LXX elaion was normally olive oil, though it could also denote a fragrant ointment compounded from various spices with olive oil as its base. Oil was a basic agricultural product of Palestine and a staple element in the diet (1 Ki. 17:12–16; cf. the common formula "grain, new wine and oil," e.g., Deut. 7:13; 11:14). It was also used cosmetically (2 Sam. 14:2; Ps. 104:15), esp. at banquets (Ps. 23:5; cf. Amos 6:6), and so is sometimes a symbol for joy (Ps. 45:7; cf. Isa. 61:3).

A fragrant oil was used to anoint the priests. Anointing with oil became a symbol of investing with authority, whether as priest (Exod. 29:7; cf. 40:15), king (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:1, 13; 1 Ki. 1:39), or (on at least one occasion) prophet (cf. 19:16). Oil was used in the consecration of the tabernacle and its vessels (Exod. 40:9; Lev. 8:10). In temple ritual it was mixed with grain offerings and used in ritual anointing (e.g., Lev. 2:1–16; 5:11; 6:15, 21). It also provided fuel for the lamps (Exod. 27:20; Lev. 24:2). The prophets frequently refer to oil (Isa. 41:19; 61:3; Jer. 31:12; 40:10 = LXX 47:10; Hos. 2:5, 8, 22; Joel 1:10; Mic. 6:7, 15; Hag. 2:12 = LXX 2:13), esp. Ezek. (e.g., 16:9, 13, 18–19; 23:41). Oil is mentioned in Ps. (e.g., 45:7; 92:10; 141:5) and Prov. (21:17; cf. 5:3; 21:20).

elaia and elaiōn mean both the olive tree and its produce. The olive tree matures slowly, so that to grow olives and enjoy their fruit was a common picture of a settled and prosperous condition. The fruitfulness of the olive makes it a suitable metaphor for those who enjoy God's blessing (Ps. 52:8; 128:3), esp. Israel (Jer. 11:16; Hos. 14:6 = LXX 14:7; Hab. 3:17). Gethsēmani is a transliteration of Aram. gaṯ šᵉmānê, oil press.

NT 1. Most of the practical uses of the olive and its oil mentioned in the OT reappear in the NT. Jas. 3:12 mentions the olive as a crop; its oil as an item of commerce appears in Lk. 16:6; Rev. 18:13 (cf. Matt. 25:9). For its use as fuel for lamps, see Matt. 25:3–8.

The injunction in Rev. 6:6 to spare the oil and wine even though there is to be a famine of grain is probably an echo of the standard OT formula, the "grain, new wine and oil"; only one-third of the produce is to be affected while the rest is spared, as in the following vision ("a fourth of the earth," 6:8) and in the plagues introduced by the seven trumpets in chs. 8–9. It may also be significant that while grain is an annual crop, olives and vines take much longer to recover from devastation; it is, therefore, a temporary famine, not total destruction. This point is reinforced by the highly inflated price of wheat and barley, which are necessities more basic than oil and wine. A "quart of wheat" was generally regarded as the amount of food that a working man would eat in a day, and a denarius was a day's wage for a laborer (cf. Matt. 20:2–13; Mk. 6:37; Jn. 6:7). Thus an entire day's wages would be spent on wheat alone.

2. Matt. 6:17 (aleiphō, anoint, → 230) suggests that the cosmetic use of oil was still normal in Palestine. In Lk. 7:46 it is expected that the host would anoint his guest at a banquet; the Pharisee's neglect of this simple courtesy is contrasted with the woman's lavish use of the much more expensive myron, oil of myrrh.

The use of anointing with oil as a symbol of joy and honor in Ps. 45:7 is taken up in Heb. 1:9 with reference to Christ, no doubt with the thought of his "anointing" for his messianic task (for which see Lk. 4:18; Acts 4:27; 10:38).

3. The medicinal use of oil on an open wound (cf. Isa. 1:6) is seen in Lk. 10:34 and is in line with widespread ancient practice. The NT also mentions the practice of anointing with oil in miraculous healing (Mk. 6:13; Jas. 5:14), although its effect here is not so much medicinal as it is symbolic—probably a symbol of the protection and blessing of God on the patient (→ aleiphō, 230).

4. The olive tree (elaia) is used 2x as a symbol in the NT. (a) The two witnesses of God in Rev. 11:4 are described as "the two olive trees and the two lampstands that stand before the Lord of the earth." This is an allusion to Zech. 4:2–14, where the two olive trees whose oil feeds the golden lampstand represent "the two who are anointed to serve the Lord of all the earth" (4:14, normally taken to be Zerubbabel and Joshua, whose combined leadership was the channel of God's power to enable Israel to live up to its calling). The two witnesses in Rev. 11 symbolize the faithful witness of the church, esp. Christian martyrs, and the point of the allusion to Zech.'s vision is that their faithful witness, in the power of the Spirit (cf. Zech. 4:6), is the channel of God's power to fulfill his purpose in a hostile world.

(b) In Paul's famous allegory in Rom. 11:17–24, the olive tree represents the people of God. The cultivated olive (kallielaios) is Israel, from which some of the branches were broken (many Jews rejected Christ and so lost their place as God's people), while shoots of wild olive (agrielaios) grafted into their place represent the inclusion of Gentiles into the people of God. Eventually, however, God is able to graft the natural branches back into their own stock (Jews who "do not persist in unbelief" will be restored, and thus "all Israel will be saved," 11:23, 26). The stock remains the same; it is only in the branches that changes take place. Israel, the people of God, remains a continuous entity, but its membership is subject both to the exclusion of native Israelites and the inclusion of the alien stock of Gentile believers.

Some commentators remark that Paul's theology is better than his knowledge of horticulture. But while modern agriculturists look askance at the attempt to graft the wild olive onto the cultivated olive, this is independently attested in ancient times as a device to rejuvenate an unproductive olive. Philo applied a similar figure of speech to Israelites and proselytes. Where Paul does, quite consciously, go beyond nature is in his comment that after branches have been cut off, "God is able to graft them in again" (Rom. 11:23). This is the miracle of God's grace.

5. The Mount of Olives (or Olivet) is the ridge on the east side of Jerusalem, across the Kidron Valley, on which olive orchards still grow. It must be crossed by a traveler entering Jerusalem from the east and so is mentioned in the accounts of Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21). Its commanding view of the temple area accounts for Jesus' lament there over Jerusalem's impenitence (Lk. 19:29–44) and his teaching there on the approaching ruin of the temple (Matt. 24:1–3).

Somewhere on this ridge Jesus and his disciples spent the nights of his last week (Lk. 21:37), probably in the place known as Gethsemane, to which they went after the Last Supper (Mk. 14:26, 32) and which was their regular rendezvous (Jn. 18:1–2). Gethsemane was the scene of Jesus' final commitment to his redemptive suffering as well as of his arrest. It was also on this Mount that Jesus ascended to heaven (Lk. 24:50–51; Acts 1:12); Acts 1:11, taken with Zech. 14:4, has led to the conclusion that it will also be the scene of his return.

ἐλέγχω (elenchō), bring to light, expose, set forth, convict, convince, punish, discipline (1794); ἔλεγχος (elenchos), proof, evidence, conviction, reproof, correction (1793); ἐλεγμός (elegmos), conviction, reproof, punishment (1791); ἔλεγξις (elenxis), conviction, rebuke, reproof (1792).

CL & OT 1.(a) elenchō originally meant blame, insult; then test, examine, inquire into a matter. Plato and Aristotle used it of the logical exposition of the facts of a matter for the purpose of refuting an opponent's argument. Thus the word developed its principal meaning of convince, refute. In Stoicism the basic concept was applied to philosophical ethics. Philo and Josephus spoke of the correction that people receive from their own consciences, the Logos, the truth, or God. elenchō eventually acquired a sense that brought it near to paideuō, to teach (→ 4084).

(b) The noun elenchos has a similar variety of meanings: proof, conviction, correction, reproof. The nouns elegmos and elenxis, common in the LXX and the NT, are found chiefly in the Hel. period and have as a rule the meaning of conviction or correction.

2. In the LXX elenchō is used in the great majority of cases to mean to bring to account, to correct; elenchos generally means rebuke, correction. Words of this group are found in this sense mainly in the later books of the OT (Job, Ps., Prov.) and in the Apocr. (Wis., Sir.). elegmos is used in Isa. 37:3; 50:2 with the meaning rebuke, reproach, disgrace. At Num. 5:18–19, 23–24, 27, the LXX translates the "water of bitterness" used in the ordeal by the phrase hydōr tou elegmou, water of conviction. elenxis occurs only at Job 21:4; 23:2, where it means concern, complaint.

3. (a) The historical books occasionally use elenchō in secular contexts: Because of a dispute about a well, Abraham complained to Abimelech, the king of Gerar (Gen. 21:25); in the quarrel between Jacob and Laban, the kinsmen were to judge who was in the right (31:37). In these cases elenchō refers to the clarification of a practical point at dispute, not an intellectual question.

(b) In prophetic proclamation elenchō has a legal character, as seen from its use alongside words for righteousness and judgment. The task of the priests to pronounce judgment and give advice is clearly presupposed (Ezek. 3:26; Hos. 4:4; cf. Isa. 29:21; Mal. 2:7). In a negative sense, the prophetic message of judgment spoke of divine reproof and the coming day of punishment (Jer. 2:19; cf. Hos. 5:9). Positively, the prophets proclaimed salvation in terms of justice for the poor (Isa. 11:3–4) and the healing instruction Yahweh would give to the nations (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3).

(c) This word group comes into its own in the poetic lit., chiefly in the sense of correction and punishment. The psalmist prays for preservation from divine punishment (Ps. 6:1), yet the correction that comes from Yahweh or from just people is regarded as a help and benefit (141:5; cf. Job 5:17). In proverbial wisdom, while the ungodly neither accept or deserve correction, the wise are grateful for it, for they recognize in it God's love (Prov. 3:11–12; 9:7–8; cf. 29:15). As may be seen from the repeated parallel use of elenchō and paideuō (e.g., 3:11–12), or elenchos and paideia (e.g., 6:23), this word group comes close to the Stoic ideal of education and character training. The godly are trained by correction and discipline to follow the right path in life (6:23; 5:12–13; 19:25; Sir. 18:13).

4. On grounds of the command in Lev. 19:17, "Rebuke your neighbor frankly," correction played an important part in Jud., both as a command to love one's neighbor and as a task that earns merit. It had a special importance in the Qumran texts. One who observes a fellow member transgressing the law must censure him, at first before witnesses (CD 7:2). If this correction achieves nothing, the case must be brought before the whole community, which then proceeds to punish the sinner (1QS 3:6).

NT 1. The words of this group are found in the NT in the Gospels (especially Jn.) and in the later letters (esp. the Pastorals). In Jn. elenchō means, as in the prophetic warnings of judgment, to reveal and convict of sin. It is the negative, reverse side of God's saving work of revelation (Jn. 3:20; 16:8; cf. also Eph. 5:13; Jude 15). Examples of what is revealed are sin, righteousness, and judgment (Jn. 8:46; 16:8–11), an illegitimate marriage (Lk. 3:19), and deeds of ungodliness (Jude 15).

2. elenchō is found particularly often in hortatory passages (e.g., Eph. 5:13). The Pastoral Letters assign to the leader of the community the task of rebuking church members (1 Tim. 5:20; 2 Tim. 4:2; Tit. 2:15) and of convicting opponents of their error (1:9, 13). The corresponding activity is called elegmos in 2 Tim. 3:16 and elenxis in 2 Pet. 2:16. Mention should also be made of the instructions about church order in Matt. 18:15–17, where Jesus says that erring church members should first be told privately of their fault, then in the presence of several witnesses, and, if this be fruitless, before the whole church (cf. the procedure at Qumran).

3. It may be seen from the citation of Prov. 3:11–12 at Heb. 12:5 and Rev. 3:19 that the Hel. concept of education has found its way into the NT. In both cases elenchō and paideuō are used in parallel.

4. The interpretation of elenchos in Heb. 11:1 presents difficulties. Its meaning here can be deduced only from its context, in the definition of faith given in this chapter. The sentence falls into two parallel parts. elenchos strengthens hypostasis, and pragmata ou blepomena, things not seen, explains elpizomena, things hoped for. The concepts are Hel. in character. The purpose of the statement is not so much to encourage subjective assurance of faith, as if faith could give the status of reality to what lies in the future. It is rather to secure a link with objectivity.

Thus, elenchos should not be interpreted subjectively (as if it denoted absence of doubt), in a hortatory sense (as if it meant correction), or even in an intellectual sense

(meaning evidence). Rather, it should be understood in its context in the theology of Heb. in a strictly theological sense, as referring to conviction about the power of the future world promised by God, which is here described in the language of secular Gk. as "things not seen" (see also hypostasis, 5712). Heb. 11:1 would then mean: "But faith is the pledge of things hoped for, the conviction of things we cannot see."

1799 ἔλεος

ἔλεος (eleos), compassion, mercy, pity (1799); ἐλεέω (eleeō), feel compassion, show mercy or pity (1796); ἐλεήμων (eleēmōn), merciful, compassionate (1798); ἐλεεινός (eleeinos), pitiful (1795); ἐλεάω (eleaō), show mercy (1790); ἐλεημοσύνη (eleēmosynē), charity, alms (1797); ἀνέλεος (aneleos), without pity (447); ἀνελεήμων (aneleēmōn), merciless (446).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. eleos means compassion, pity, mercy—the emotion that arises when one sees another person's affliction. It is the reverse of envy at someone else's good fortune. Behind it may be an element of fear that we will someday suffer in the same way ourselves. eleos is also a technical term for the conclusion of a defendant's speech, in which the accused tried to awaken the compassion of the judges. In one of history's most famous cases, Socrates refused to conform to this pattern and ended up having to drink the hemlock. The derived noun eleēmosynē originally meant the same as eleos but was then applied to an act of kindness as a result of compassion. It then obtained the specialized meaning of a gift to the poor; it finds its earliest use in the LXX (Dan. 4:24).

aneleos, meaning unmerciful, without compassion, is not found in cl. Gk. (anēleēs was used). aneleēmōn also means without compassion. eleeinos is mainly used of a person's passive condition as evoking compassion, hence pitiable, distressing. eleeō means to have compassion, be sorry for, be merciful, sympathize with. The cry eleēson ("have mercy") was addressed to the gods.

2. eleos and its derivatives are found nearly 400x in the LXX. The relevant Heb. concepts, which are legal in nature, thus betray a different background of thought from the predominantly psychological one in Gk. (a) ḥesed (the Heb. word most often translated by eleos) means proper covenant behavior, the solidarity that the covenant partners owe one another. The covenant may be between equals or by one who is stronger than his partner. In either case it may result in one person giving help to the other in his need. Thus, the connotations of eleos meaning ḥesed may stretch from loyalty to a covenant to kindness, mercy, pity.

This is esp. the case when eleos is linked with oiktirmos (→ 3880; e.g., Ps. 25:6; Isa. 63:15; Hos. 2:21 = LXX 2:19; Zech. 7:9). Because of Yahweh's superiority as the partner in the covenant who remains faithful, his eleos was understood for the most part as a gracious gift. He promised it at the making of the covenant, and he constantly renewed it. Hence Israel requests eleos from him, including the mercy of forgiveness, when it broke the covenant (e.g., Num. 14:19; cf. Exod. 34:9; Jer. 3:12). In such cases, the stress is not on the basic attitude in eleos but on its manifestation in acts.

(b) The Heb. ṣᵉdāqâ (normally translated dikaiosynē, righteousness, → 1466) is also rendered sometimes by eleēmosynē (e.g., Isa. 1:27). Just as Yahweh enforces his covenant law mercifully, so eleēmosynē may be used for human kindness, charity, and even for alms when these conform to the pattern of this law.

NT eleos and its derivatives are found 78x in the NT, mostly in Paul (25x) and Luke-Acts (20x).

1. In the Synoptics eleeō is found mainly in the narratives (though see Matt. 5:7; 18:33; Lk. 16:24). The noun eleos, by contrast, usually occurs in reports of speech (though see Lk. 1:58). (a) The vb. denotes the divine mercy of Jesus Christ, expressed in the context of human misery as he sought to heal people. Jesus answered the cry for help, "Have mercy on me" (Matt. 9:27; 15:22; 17:15; Mk. 10:47–48; Lk. 17:13), from sick people or from relatives of the demon-possessed (Matt. 15:22; 17:15) by healing them. On one occasion he commanded a man from whom he had driven out demons to tell people at home how the Lord had had mercy on him (Mk. 5:19).

Normally on these occasions Jesus is addressed by the messianic title "Son of David," though the title "Lord" (kyrios, → 3261) or "Teacher" (didaskalos, → 1438) is also used (cf. Matt. 17:15 with Mk. 9:17; Lk. 9:38). This makes the cry, "Lord, have mercy," a confession of faith in the divine authority of Jesus.

(b) Mercy from one person to another is expressed by eleeō or eleēmōn 2x in Matt. and once in Lk., but in each case the motivation is clearly God's mercy. In Matt. 5:7 "the merciful" (eleēmōn) are promised God's mercy—the vb. is pass. to avoid using God's name. In the parable of the unforgiving servant (18:23–35) the demand for mercy (18:33) is based on the limitless compassion of his master (18:27, 35; → splanchnon, 5073). In Luke 16:24, the suffering rich man, who had been merciless during his life, calls on Abraham with the same words for mercy as are used only in calling on God.

(c) In Matt.'s and Lk.'s used of eleos, a reference, often direct, to the OT is noticeable. In his controversies with the Pharisees Jesus bears witness to the sovereign mercy of God, which seeks a response not in ritual detail but in solidarity through action with the lowly and hungry (Matt. 9:13; 12:7; cf. 1 Sam. 15:22; Hos. 6:6). In his "woes" leveled against them Jesus includes the charge that in their interpretation of the law the Pharisees have shifted the main stress from "justice, mercy and faithfulness" to a more casuistic formalism (Matt. 23:23; cf. also Lk. 10:37). Lk.'s two great songs in Lk. 1 announce one of his main themes—that the covenant loyalty of God, promised in the OT and shown throughout the history of Israel, will reach its climax in the gracious self-humiliation of God to the humble in the event of Christ (1:50, 54, 72, 78). These two songs are filled with OT quotations and allusions.

(d) Matt. reports Jesus' criticism of hypocrites' attempts to obtain public praise and acknowledgment by openly giving alms to the needy (eleēmosynē, see Matt. 6:1–4). Lk. 11:41 and 12:33 both lay down the giving away of one's possessions to the poor as a pattern for Jesus' followers. In Acts Tabitha (9:36) and Cornelius (10:2) are both singled out for their charity and thus become recipients of singular blessing. The former was perhaps a Hel. Jewess, a resident of Joppa. She fell sick and died (9:37), but was restored through Peter. Cornelius, a centurion of the Italian Cohort at Caesarea and a "devout and God-fearing" man (10:2), had his prayers and alms come up before God (10:4, 31). God sent Peter to preach to him, and he received the Holy Spirit and became the first Gentile into the church (10:44–48).

In his defense before Felix, Paul identifies his bringing of alms for the poor as the purpose of his last journey to Jerusalem (Acts 24:17). In 3:1–8 Peter did not have monetary alms for the crippled man but ended the man's time of begging and imperfect mercy by the full mercy brought in the name of Jesus Christ (3:6).

2. Paul. (a) Paul regarded himself as one who "was shown mercy" in order that he might become an apostle (1 Tim. 1:13, 16); "by the Lord's mercy" he had been made trustworthy (1 Cor. 7:25). In view of the wide-scale rejection of the gospel by Israel, Paul tried in his letter to the Romans to make clear that God's free mercy did not contradict his covenant loyalty (Rom. 9:15–16, 18; 9:15 quotes Exod. 33:19). God's plan of salvation for both Jews and Gentiles (Rom. 9:23–24; 11:30–32; 15:9) is based on his mercy (eleos), not on good works (Eph. 2:4–9; Tit. 3:5). Hence Paul admonishes believers to pass on the mercy they have experienced (2 Cor. 4:1) and to do so cheerfully (Rom. 12:8). Thus, mercy becomes one of the signs by which a disciple can be known (cf. Jas. 3:17), while being "ruthless" (aneleēmōn) is the lowest rung in the downward ladder of Rom. 1:29–32.

(b) Paul and other NT writers (2 Jn. 3; Jude 2), in their confidence in God's gracious giving, greet their readers at the beginning (1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2) or end (Gal. 6:16) of their letters with a prayer for the mercy of God and of Jesus Christ—mostly combined with "grace" and "peace." God's mercy can heal (Phil. 2:27); it is a present gift for the "household" (2 Tim. 1:16) and the final, future gift ensuring salvation (1:18). Paul proclaims the Christian hope of a future resurrection of an imperishable body by contradicting the group in Corinth that affirmed that the bodily resurrection was already past; he describes those who confine hope only to this life as "to be pitied more than [eleeinoteroi] all men" (1 Cor. 15:19).

3. Other NT Writings. (a) Peter begins by praising God's mercy (1 Pet. 1:3), by which Christians have been given "new birth into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" (cf. Eph. 2:4; 1 Cor. 15:19). As in Rom. 9:25–26, Peter praises the enlargement of God's mercy to take in the Gentiles (1 Pet. 2:10) by using Hosea's words (Hos. 2:23).

(b) James impressed on an indolent church that mercy shown here on earth has its bearing on the final judgment, and that "judgment without mercy" (aneleos, only here in the NT) awaits the one who has shown no mercy (2:13; cf. Matt. 18:33–34; 25:40, 45; Lk. 16:24–25).

(c) Jude, after mentioning the love of God believers have experienced and their expectation of a final merciful judgment by Jesus Christ, urges his readers to exercise a discriminating mercy to those around them (Jude 21–23).

(d) Rev. 3:17, like 1 Cor. 15:19, convicts the church at Laodicea of its "pitiful" (eleeinos) condition in spite of its earthly riches, and places it under the judgment of Christ, which alone is valid.

(e) Heb. uses the high priest in the OT and his functions on the great day of atonement (Lev. 16) as a type pointing to Christ, who is greater than any high priest and who exercises a "merciful" understanding (2:17; cf. 4:15). In this way he gives the despairing church confidence to draw near the throne of grace to find mercy (4:16).

1800 ἐλευθερία

ἐλευθερία (eleutheria), freedom, liberty (1800); ἐλεύθερος (eleutheros), free, independent, not bound (1801); ἐλευθερόω (eleutheroō), to free, set free (1802); ἀπελεύθερος (apeleutheros), freedman (592).

CL eleutheria means freedom, independence. This way of speaking arose in contrast to the bondage of slaves. Similarly, eleutheros means free, not bound, of free birth, being one's own master. Later the noun and adj. were occasionally used to denote the mental attitude that made use of freedom. It could be used in the good sense of being in control of oneself, magnanimous, generous. But it could also be used in the less frequent and negative sense of being reckless or unrestrained. The adj. apeleutheros follows the original sense and denotes a freedman, i.e., one who was not free by birth. The vb. eleutheroō means to free, set free, although not exclusively in relation to slaves. It could refer to freeing someone from any bond that prevented him or her from acting freely.

1. In secular Gk. eleutheros had primarily a political sense. The eleutheros is the full citizen who belonged to the polis, the city-state, in contrast to the slave, who did not enjoy full rights as a citizen. Freedom consisted in one's right to participate in public debates over civic matters and decide about one's own affairs within the polis. Aristotle considered freedom to be the essential good of the polis.

But in order to preserve that freedom, the law (nomos) was required as the principle of order. Freedom and law were thus not contradictory. They belonged together and qualified each other. The constant danger was a rejection of the law in the name of a misconceived freedom that was purely arbitrary, because it was willing to grant itself more freedom than it was willing to grant others. This idea of freedom was also naturally applied to relations between states, which gave rise to the idea of sovereignty.

2. In Stoic philosophy this political idea of freedom was transformed by the collapse of the polis. Freedom was understood in a philosophical and religious sense. For the Stoic, humanity in the final analysis is not in control of external things, such as the body, money, honor, and political freedom. To the Stoics, therefore, eleutheria meant withdrawal from the apparent reality of this world. It was a deliberate surrender to the law and rule of the cosmos, or the deity that ruled the cosmos. This meant that humans must free themselves from whatever bound them too closely to the world: passions (such as anger, anxiety, and pity) and the fear of death. Freedom required one to be so adjusted and detached as to live in complete harmony with the cosmos or the gods. This freedom must be perpetually renewed through constant struggle and unending effort.

3. The mystery religions had their own answer to the question of freedom. Through cultic rites, initiates were freed from this hopeless world and obtained a part in the destiny of the deity.

OT 1. In the LXX, eleutheria and its cognates are used primarily in the context of slavery (e.g., Exod. 21:2, 5, 27; Lev. 19:20; Deut. 15:12–13) and prisoners of war (21:14). It is striking that the specific word is not found in connection either with the liberation of Israel from Egypt or their return from exile. The political use of eleutheria is apparently foreign to the LXX. As the forced labor during Solomon's reign suggests, under the monarchy the Israelites were not free subjects, but were the king's slaves. Only a few privileged men stood out as truly free.

This is not the way it should have been, however. Yahweh was Lord over his people, and through his laws he promised protection for the helpless and weak, including slaves. An enslaved Israelite, for example, could never become another's permanent property (Deut. 15:13–18). After six years the slave was to be set free without payment being made to the owner (Exod. 21:2–4). Yet Jer. 34:8–16 indicates that there were those in Israel who wanted to follow the pattern in the surrounding nations of keeping slaves for life. Because of these social injustices, Jer. derisively proclaimed to Israel "'freedom' to fall by the sword, plague and famine" (34:17; cf. Amos 2:6–16).

2. However, the conclusion should not be drawn from the narrow range of meaning of the eleutheria word group that the issue of freedom did not exist for Israel. Rather, Israel's political freedom was a part of the redeeming and saving acts of God. Freedom for Israel meant being set free by Yahweh, as, for example, from bondage in Egypt (cf. Exod. 20:2; Deut. 7:8). Thus it was identical with redemption. It was not given by nature but was always experienced as the gracious gift of God.

The fact that Israel, even as a political entity, existed on the basis of this act of liberation has several consequences. (a) The gift of freedom remained bound to the one giving it. Desertion of Yahweh had the necessary consequence of loss of freedom. This is shown by the era of the judges, which was an age of falling away from Yahweh, followed by slavery, repentance, and liberation (Jdg. 2:10–3:6). The history of the northern and southern kingdoms was similar. The Assyrian conquest was the result of the godlessness of the northern kingdom (2 Ki. 17:7–23), just as the Babylonian captivity resulted from the godlessness of the southern kingdom (2 Ki. 21:10–15; 22:19–20; 23:25–27).

(b) God's acts are fundamental to communal human life. According to the Decalogue, God wanted his people to live in freedom in all aspects of their life. This high regard for freedom was extended to the stranger (Exod. 22:21; 23:9; Lev. 19:33–34) and to the slave. The escaped slave was even to be afforded protection from his former master (Deut. 23:15–16).

(c) The struggle to preserve this freedom played a repeated and significant role in the message of the prophets, who developed it in their own particular ways (e.g., Isa. 1:23; 10:1–4; Jer. 7:5–6; Amos 2:6–7; 4:1; Mic. 3:1–3). Enslavement by the nobility of whole strata of society that were originally free was a breach of divine law. The promise was given to those bound that the Messiah would come "to proclaim freedom for the captives and release from darkness for the prisoners" (Isa. 61:1).

3. By the time of Jesus, freedom was understood predominantly in an external, political sense (cf. the typical misunderstanding in Jn. 8:33). Freedom movements with a religious basis were repeatedly formed to implement the promised freedom by force against the pagan secular authorities. The best known of these were the Maccabees in the 2d cent. B.C., who wanted to ensure religious freedom through political freedom, and the Zealots at the time of Jesus (cf. Acts 5:37; 21:38).

NT 1. (a) In the NT eleutheria occurs 11x, eleutheros 23x, eleutheroō 7x, and apeleutheros only at 1 Cor. 7:22. These words are found chiefly in Paul (esp. in Rom. 6–8; 1 Cor. 7–10; Gal. 2–5) and Jn. 8:32–36.

(b) NT usage exhibits some interesting nuances. eleutheria is never used in the secular sense of political freedom. From this it may be inferred that the recovery of Israel's political freedom no longer played a role in the thinking of the NT writers. Jesus was no political messiah. The NT also dissociates itself from the idea of freedom as power to do with oneself and one's life whatever one wants. Rather, eleutheria is to be seen in the light of "the glorious freedom of the children of God" (Rom. 8:21) that takes place through Christ (Gal. 2:4; 5:1). It is present only "where the Spirit of the Lord is" (2 Cor. 3:17). When Jas. 1:25 and 2:12 speak of "the law that gives freedom," eleutheria means the new way of life in which one lives in accordance with God's will. Even the vb. eleutheroō is used in the NT exclusively for the act that occurs or has occurred through Jesus: "The truth will set you free" (Jn. 8:32; cf. Rom. 6:18, 22).

On the other hand, eleutheros has primarily the secular sense of being free in contrast to being a slave (Gal. 3:28; Eph. 6:8; Col. 3:11; Rev. 6:15) or being independent with respect to a law (Rom. 7:3). Gal. 4:22–23 is therefore used with a double meaning and leads in 4:26, 31; 5:1 to the specifically NT idea of being free in Christ. The characteristic of this free person is not the contrast with the slave but the fact that, as a free person, one is at the same time Christ's slave (1 Cor. 9:19; 1 Pet. 2:16; cf. Paul's self-designation in Rom. 1:1; Phil. 1:1). The apeleutheros kyriou ("the Lord's freedman") is at the same time the doulos Christou ("Christ's slave"; 1 Cor. 7:22).

2. (a) What does freedom mean? In contrast to the secular Gk. mind, the NT sees every human as basically unfree (Jn. 8:39; Rom. 6:20; 2 Pet. 2:19). We are unable to free ourselves and order our lives as though we are not in bondage. Our perennial efforts to take ourselves in hand, however we attempt it, lead to the greatest bondage in which we miss what we were meant to be (Matt. 16:25; Jn. 12:15). Our true freedom does not consist of the unfettered power to direct our lives, either in a political or in a Stoic sense. It lies rather in life with God, lived as he originally intended it (Rom. 6:22; Gal. 5:1, 13; 1 Pet. 2:16). We only gain this as we deny ourselves (Matt. 16:24).

Paradoxically, those who are free do not belong to themselves (1 Cor. 6:19; 9:19; 1 Pet. 2:16). They belong to him who has set them free (Rom. 6:18, 22; Gal. 5:1), "who died for them and was raised again" (2 Cor. 5:15). The NT idea of freedom thus follows from the OT. The gift of freedom is bound to the giver: "All things are yours . . . and you are of Christ, and Christ is of God" (1 Cor. 3:21–23). The realm of this freedom even extends to the supernatural powers and rulers that are robbed of their authority, because they have been conquered by Christ and can no longer separate us from Christ (Rom. 8:38; 1 Cor. 15:24; Gal. 4:3, 9). The impenetrable horizon becomes transparent in the light of this freedom.

(b) What are humans freed from? In our natural state we are subject to the powers of this age (→ aiōn, 172; cf. Matt. 17:18; Lk. 13:16; Eph. 6:12; 1 Pet. 5:8). The NT idea of freedom goes far beyond that of the OT in that it sees true freedom as liberation from those powers that suppress true humanity: sin (Jn. 8:31–36; Rom. 6:18–22; 8:2–11), Satan (Matt. 12:22; Lk. 13:16; Eph. 6:12), law (Rom. 7:3–6; 8:3; Gal. 2:4; 4:21–31; 5:1–13), and death (Rom. 6:20–23; 8:21). It is a liberation from the "old self" (Rom. 6:6; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9).

Sin in the NT is not a single act that with time will disappear. It has a permanent bondage for those who lend themselves to it (2 Pet. 2:19). They are no longer free to serve God but are compelled to sin. Yet there is no magical insurance against sin. Believers are called to a constant struggle with sin (e.g., Rom. 6:12, 19; 1 Cor. 6:18–19; Eph. 6:10–18). They are exposed to the tempter (2 Cor. 2:11; 1 Thess. 3:5) and remain sinful. Side by side with the indicative statement that "we died to sin" (Rom. 6:2) stands the imperative not to let sin reign in us (6:12) but instead to live in Christ to God (6:11). These statements are not in contradiction. The imperative follows from the indicative. As liberation from the compulsion to sin, eleutheria (Rom. 6:18) opens up the hitherto impossible possibility of serving God (cf. Jas. 1:25; 2:12).

The OT law declared God's irrevocable intention of leading us to life in fellowship with him (Rom. 7:10; 10:5). But in fact it had the opposite effect, because it prompted us more than ever to sin (5:20; 7:7–13) and revealed our profound godlessness (Gal. 3:19). Hence, no one can stand in righteousness before God's law (Rom. 3:19–23). What was to point us to salvation became a curse to us (7:10; Gal. 3:10). Christ, however, has freed us from this curse (3:13).

Yet the fact that we can be free from the law does not mean that the law is completely set aside (Matt. 5:17; Rom. 3:31; 6:15). It remains for believers the expression of God's holy will (7:12, 14; cf. Matt. 5:18–19), which now finds fulfillment in love (Jn. 13:34–35; Gal. 5:13–14). But it is no longer the impossible way to life. As a way of salvation, the law had its end in Christ (Rom. 10:4). Those who live in servitude under the law (Gal. 4:3) can through Christ (4:5) live as children and heirs (4:7). Therefore, anyone who tries to resurrect the law as a way of salvation by trying to fulfill its demands stands under a curse (1:8–9; 3:1–5; 5:11–15).

Death is the harvest we reap from a life under sin and the law (Rom. 6:21, 23; 7:10–11, 23–24; 1 Cor. 15:56). Death has a double meaning in that it denotes death in time and in eternity (Rom. 8:6). Just as Rom. 6 presents freedom from sin and Rom. 7 freedom from the law, Rom. 8 follows the sequence by presenting freedom from death (cf. 1 Cor. 15:26). The thought here, as in the case of these other powers, is not their utter abolition, but liberation from the inevitability of their compulsion and claim. Christians must die, but for us the sting of death has been removed (1 Cor. 15:55) because we know of the resurrection of Christ as the pledge of our own resurrection. Freedom from death means that God has promised us a future in Christ beyond our own death. Nothing more can stand between us and God (Rom. 8:38–39); we are liberated from fear of death.

(c) The means of freedom. The liberation of believers does not lie within the realm of our own capacities. For this reason there is in the NT no summons to contend for freedom. It has already been given through what Christ has done for us (Gal. 5:1). Only the Son, because of his sacrifice on the cross (3:13), can open up the possibility of existence in eleutheria (Jn. 8:36). It becomes a reality for us when we open our lives to the call of the gospel (2 Cor. 5:20–21) and believe in Christ and his Word (Jn. 8:31–32; Rom. 10:13–15). The Bible's message of freedom summons us from the only possible way of life open to us (living according to human standards and thinking) to live instead according to the Spirit (Rom. 8:12–13; Gal. 6:8). True freedom exists only where the Holy Spirit works in us as the principle of life and where we do not block his working (Rom. 8:1–11; 2 Cor. 3:17; Gal. 5:18).

(d) The goal of freedom. Freedom can be misused "as a cover-up for evil" (1 Pet. 2:16). This occurs when freedom is misunderstood in the Gk. sense of being master of all our decisions. This leads to libertinism or antinomianism instead of serving our neighbors (Gal. 5:13–14). Those who are truly free show their freedom in being able to serve God (1 Thess. 1:9), righteousness (Rom. 6:18–22), and their fellow human beings (1 Cor. 9:19; Jas. 1:25). "Christ's love compels us" to this sort of life (2 Cor. 5:14). Those who are free become servants of Christ (Rom. 1:1; 1 Cor. 7:22; Phil. 1:1). As Luther put it, "A Christian is a perfectly free lord of all, subject to none. A Christian is a perfectly dutiful servant of all, subject to all." The ultimate decisive factor in living this way is to live in love (1 Cor. 13). The deeper we penetrate into the "perfect law that gives freedom," the more free we become for such action (Jas. 1:25; 2:12).

(e) The demand for political freedom. Political freedom plays a subordinate role in the NT. Jesus swept aside all misunderstanding here. He and his kingdom do not live by external freedom. If they did, it would not have been so readily abandoned (Jn. 18:36). Even when Jesus stresses his earthly authority (Matt. 28:18), he draws no conclusions about claims for political freedom. He disappointed all the Jewish expectation of a political messiah. The kind of freedom he preaches is that which comes through returning to the Father (Matt. 4:17; Lk. 24:47; Jn. 8:34–36).

For Christians, freedom is no longer a highest good, which, if need be, justifies resort to war and force. We know of a freedom in Christ in which we can live even as the world and the human race remain unchanged, although it is often hidden among sufferings (Jn. 8:31, 38; Rom. 8:18–23).

At the same time, the fact cannot be ignored that within the church, as with the prophets, there was a move towards freedom in the sense of equal rights for all. The old distinctions that reflected the environment of the ancient world between the free and the slave (cf. Phlm.) and the behavior of men and women (1 Cor. 14:34) still remained. However, in the final analysis such distinctions are invalid (Gal. 3:28; 1 Cor. 12:13; Col. 3:11). The freedom granted by God was given to operate above all in the communal life of the people of God. The Christian church is the community of the truly free (Gal. 4:21–31).

1818 Ἕλλην

Ἕλλην (Hellēn), a Greek (1818); Ἑλλάς (Hellas), Greece (1817); Ἑλληνικός (Hellēnikos), Greek (1819); Ἑλληνίς (Hellēnis), a Greek woman (1820); Ἑλληνιστής (Hellēnistēs), a Hellenist (1821); Ἑλληνιστί (Hellēnisti), adv. Greek, in the Greek language (1822); βάρβαρος (barbaros), barbarian, foreigner, non-Greek (975).

CL & OT 1. Hellēn refers to a Gk., as opposed to a barbaros (non-Greek; lit., barbarian). Gk. mythology contains the mythological genealogies that invented a hero, Hellen, son of Deucalion (there is also a tradition that he is a son of Zeus), father of the Doric and Aeolian tribal heroes. The opposition between Gk. and non-Gk. was one of culture and not religion. In the period after Alexander the Great, especially in the East, all who had adopted the Gk. language, culture, and way of life were counted as "Greeks," even though they were of a different ethnic origin.

2. In the LXX Hellēn is sometimes used for Heb. yāwān or *y*ᵉ*wānîm* (actually the Ionians; Dan. 8:21; 10:20). The experiences of the Jews under Antiochus IV Epiphanes resulted in the word Hellēn taking on the additional shade of meaning "hostile to the Jews" (e.g., 2 Macc. 4:36; 11:2; cf. Hellēnikos in 4:10, 15; 6:9; 11:24; 13:2). It thus had the overtone of pagan. In this way Hellēn, originally a term of respect, was surrendered to the language of religious contempt, since Jews began from belief in the one God, whereas the Greeks, in their contempt for the Jews, began from philosophical culture.

Elsewhere in the LXX words in this group are found in Isa. 66:19; Jer. 46:16 = LXX 26:16; 50:16 = LXX 27:16 (in both cases the Heb. is different); Ezek. 27:13; Joel 3:6; Zech. 9:13; Dan. 11:2; 1 Macc. 1:1, 10; 8:9, 18; 3 Macc. 3:8; 4 Macc. 8:8; 18:20.

3. The world that Christianity entered was characterized by the pervading influence of Gk. culture, esp. in the eastern part of the Roman empire. The conquests of Alexander the Great and his policy of Hellenization, continued by his successors, caused the Gk. language and ways to become the decisive cultural factor. Gk. cities arose everywhere, including Syria and Palestine, bursting the old tribal groupings of the native peoples. The upper strata in these cities spoke Gk., which became the language of trade and was widely understood in Palestine. Just how far the process of Hellenization had gone can be seen in the case of the Jews of Alexandria in Egypt, for whom a Gk. translation of the Bible, the LXX, had to be made in the 3d cent. B.C. Many of these people no longer understood or spoke their ancestral Heb. or Aram. tongue.

Philo of Alexandria (ca. 20 B.C.–ca. A.D. 50) was a Hellenistic philosopher and writer who sought to restate Jewish belief in terms of Gk. philosophy. He developed an allegorical method of interpreting the OT, which saw Gk. philosophical ideas embodied in the history and institutions of Israel. In his system he accorded a central place to the Logos (Word) as the creative power that orders the world and the intermediary that enables people to know God. Numerous other Jewish authors also used Gk. language and thought forms to proclaim and spread as missionaries Jewish belief in God and the Mosaic law. Chief among these was Flavius Josephus (ca. A.D. 37–ca. 100), who wrote his celebrated history of the Jewish War (ca. 77) and his Antiquities of the Jews (ca. 94) with a view to gaining Roman sympathies.

One discovers in 1 Macc. an account of the heavy inroads of the Gk. spirit and attitude toward life into the Jerusalem priesthood. There was even a risk of losing fundamental religious tenets, and many were prepared to apostatize from their fathers' faith in God and turn from the law. This and the violent and clumsy attempts at Hellenization made by Antiochus IV Epiphanes (d. 163 B.C.) provoked a reaction in the circles loyal to the law, which resulted in the Maccabean movement (cf. 2 Macc. 6–8). Soon, however, the Maccabees themselves became Hellenized. Thus, even the ranks of pious Jews, loyal to the law, were penetrated by Gk. thought, teaching, and myths. The rabbis understood Gk. and were acquainted with Gk. lit. The numerous Gk. loanwords in the Talmud and Midrash are evidence of the cultural supremacy of Greece even among Jews.

NT In the NT Hellas, Greece, occurs only in Acts 20:2. Hellēn, a Gk. person, occurs 26x. Hellēnis is found in Acts 17:12, where it refers to Gk. women in Thessalonica, and in Mk. 7:26, where it describes the Syrophoenician woman; she was probably a Gk. by birth who happened to live in the province of Syria and in the area of Phoenicia. Hellēnikos, Gk. (adj.), occurs only in Rev. 9:11 (the word "language" should be supplied). Hellēnisti means "in Gk."; the title on Jesus' cross was written in Aram., Latin, and Gk. (Jn. 19:20). The officer who rescued Paul from the mob was surprised to discover that Paul understood Gk. (Acts 21:37). Hellēnistēs refers to a person who speaks Gk. and lives as a Gk. (Acts 6:1; 9:29). In 9:29 it refers to a group of Jews in Damascus who sought to kill Paul, and in 6:1 to Gk.-speaking Jewish Christians who were not Greeks at all.

1. In Jn. 7:35 the Jews wonder if Jesus intends to go to "where our people live scattered among the Greeks [Hellēnes], and teach the Greeks." In Jn. 12:20–22 the same word refers to Gk.-speaking proselytes (→ prosēlytos, 4670), not pagans, for they wanted to worship in the temple; they wanted to see Jesus. This gives rise to a prospect of the mission to the Gentiles, for which Jesus' death is a prerequisite. Gk.-speaking Jewish Christians first preached the gospel to the Greeks (Acts 11:20). This was advanced above all by Paul and his companions (17:4; 19:10; etc.). Whenever the Jews refused his message, Paul turned to the Greeks. Yet of the "islanders" on Malta to whom Paul ministered after his shipwreck, Luke uses the word barbaros (Acts 28:2, 4).

Jews and Greeks lived everywhere side by side, with the result that mixed marriages took place. From one of these came Timothy (Acts 16:1). Paul was accused of taking Greeks into the temple and thus defiling it (21:28). Sometimes the word Hellēn can also mean a proselyte (14:1; 17:4).

2. The expression "Jews and Greeks," which occurs esp. in Paul's writings, can stand for the whole of humanity (1 Cor. 1:24; 10:32; 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). The Jews are mentioned first as an expression of their privileged place in salvation history

(Rom. 3:1–2; 9:4–5). But God is just as much God of the Greeks as of the Jews (10:12). Paul was set aside in a special way to exercise his apostolic ministry among the Greeks (Rom. 1:14; cf. ethnos [→ 1620] in Gal. 1:16; 2:9; Eph. 3:6–7; 1 Tim. 2:7). Not all pagans were Hellēnes, for alongside them Paul refers also to "non-Greeks" (barbaros, Rom. 1:14) and to "barbarian [and] Scythian" (Col. 3:11). barbaros in 1 Cor. 14:11 ("foreigner") refers to someone who speaks a language not commonly understood (hence probably not Gk.). The Hellēnes were characterized by their seeking wisdom, which made the cross of Christ seem folly to them (1 Cor. 1:22–23).

The picture painted by Paul in Rom. 1:18–32 of the Greeks (1:16) or the heathen (→ ethnos, 1620) is a gloomy one. Nevertheless, God directs his message as much to them as to the Jews (Rom. 1:16; 2:9, 3:9). If a Gk. does good and fulfills what the law requires, he or she will receive honor like the Jew (2:9–10, 14–16; cf. Jer. 31:33–34). Since the Greeks were all pagans from the beginning, the concepts pagan and Gk. are interchangeable, when contrasted with that of the Jew (cf. Rom. 3:29–30 with 1 Cor. 1:22–24); thus, the Greeks figure here as the foremost representatives of the pagan world. The church in Corinth was given the warning not to offend "Jews, Greeks or the church of God" (1 Cor. 10:32). The non-Christian population of Corinth fell into the two first-mentioned groups, alongside which the church now stood as a new people.

In this new people of God (→ laos, 3295), differences of origin are removed. God, who in reality had always been the God of the Greeks (Rom. 10:12), although they did not recognize him, has now become consciously and in fact their God, in that they have believed in Jesus Christ and through the Holy Spirit have been baptized into one body (1 Cor. 12:13). Whoever has been baptized into Jesus Christ is God's child and has put on Christ, whether Jew or Greek, so those who are born Hellēn now belong to the offspring of Abraham (Gal. 3:26–29). Being a Greek or Jew belongs to the old self, which has to be put away along with all its evil characteristics (Col. 3:11; cf. 3:5–10, 12–13).

ἐλπίς (elpis), expectation, hope (1828); ἐλπίζω (elpizō), expect, hope (1827); ἀπελπίζω (apelpizō), expect back (594); προελπίζω (proelpizō), hope in advance (4598).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. elpis is a general word for the anticipation of future events of all kinds, of good (hope) or evil (fear). Thus it means not only hope, but also expect, suppose, think. Living hope as a fundamental religious attitude was unknown in Gk. culture. In the final analysis people had to stand without hope before the hostile forces of guilt and death.

2. (a) In the LXX, elpizō primarily translates Heb. vbs. of trusting (→ pistis, 4411). Hoping as an act occurs in promises and exhortations, but mostly as a confession of assurance, especially in Ps.

(b) Of 146 OT passages in which vbs. or nouns describe hope, half do so in a secular sense. In these it is an expectation combined with certainty and tension, directed toward some definite desired object or event lying in the future. What characterizes the judgment of this hope is that in many passages, despite its personal intensity, the hope is described as futile. Prov. emphasizes, for example, that a fool's hope will come to nothing (11:7).

(c) Hope in God is often the subject of the OT even where specific words do not occur. In formal structure it resembles secular hope, but is essentially different in content, basis, and effects. In many passages the faithful of Israel name Yahweh as the object and guarantor of hope: e.g., "You have been my hope, O Sovereign LORD" (Ps. 71:5). Jeremiah spoke of Yahweh as the "hope of Israel" (Jer. 14:8; 17:13). People wait for his name (Ps. 52:9), his word of forgiveness (130:5), his arm (Isa. 51:5), and his salvation (Gen. 49:18).

In eschatological passages the content of the hope is not expressed in abstract terms but in the form of a vision. For this reason words of hope seldom occur there (but see Isa. 25:9; 42:4; 51:5; Hab. 2:3). The horizon of hope in the OT stretches far beyond what most witnesses could see in terms of personal hope for their individual lives. It embraces Yahweh's coming in glory, his reign over a new earth, the conversion of Israel and the nations, and the new covenant, based on the forgiveness of sins.

An important element in the maintenance of a true hope was the struggle of the Lord's prophets against false prophets, with their false hope and dreams of salvation. Throughout her history so frequently marked by judgment, Israel repeatedly looked to God for the continuation of his gracious dealings with them (cf. Ps. 40:1; Isa. 40:31; Jer. 31:17; Hos. 12:7). Such hope was a gift of God (Ps. 62:5; Jer. 29:11). Wherever, humanly speaking, the future seemed a dead end, prophets of judgment such as Hosea, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel opened up the divine perspective of a new beginning (cf. Jer. 29:1–14; 31:31–34; Ezek. 36:37; Hos. 2).

(d) As a subjective attitude, the hope of faith, like secular hope, is a concrete personal expectation. It looks forward confidently, although not without tension. Yahweh knows and brings to pass what the future holds, so hope attains unparalleled assurance in the realm of revelation. Everything at present may run counter to the promise, but the one who hopes trusts God not to disappoint the hope awakened through his word (Ps. 42:5; Isa. 8:17; Mic. 7:7).

Hand in hand with confident anticipation of God's gracious dealing goes submission to his sovereign rule. The time and manner of fulfillment are left to him. Therefore, hope and the fear of God are often parallel (e.g., Ps. 33:18; 147:11; cf. Prov. 23:17–18). To those who fear the Lord a future and hope are promised, and they can endure anxiety while waiting. They demonstrate new strength (Isa. 40:31) by overcoming temptation and actions directed toward the hoped-for future. During the siege, for example, Jeremiah bought a field to bear witness to the word of God that houses, fields, and vineyards would again be purchased (Jer. 32:6–15).

2. Intertestamental Jud. is characterized by a variety of eschatological expectations, directed toward the coming of the Messiah and the restoration of the kingdom of Israel. These hopes were often disappointed. Men rose with messianic claims and set the enthusiasm of the people ablaze, but sooner or later all these movements collapsed. This explains the pessimistic streak that accompanied the eschatological expectations of the rabbis. God's kingdom could only come when Israel was completely obedient to the law. But who could really say what complete obedience was? This made the individual's personal hope uncertain as well, for who could say that God was really pleased with him or her?

The community of Qumran, by contrast, continued to affirm that there was hope, founded on God's saving actions. Nevertheless, this hope was valid only for the elect of God. In Hel. Jud. the messianic hope retreated behind the idea of the immortality of the soul (see esp. Philo).

NT 1. Remarkably, elpizō and elpis play no great role in the Gospels. Only the vb. appears, once each in Matt. (12:21 = Isa. 42:4) and Jn. (5:45), and 3x in Lk. (6:34; 23:8; 24:21), in the sense of subjective expectation. The main emphasis on hope is found in the Paul's writings (19x out of 31 for the vb.; 36x out of 53 of the noun). In Acts both vb. (2x) and noun (8x) are used particularly of the "hope of Israel," which is interpreted as hope in the resurrection.

apelpizō means to cease to hope, to give up hope, to doubt. In the NT it occurs only in Lk. 6:35. Here, however, we have a departure from the usual meaning; it means expecting to get something in return. proelpizō, to hope before, occurs only in Eph. 1:12. The "before" means either the hope Jewish Christians had before the influx of Gentile Christians or the messianic hope the Jews had prior to Christ's coming.

2. In the NT words in this word group never indicate a vague or a fearful anticipation, but always the expectation of something good. In many passages elpis denotes not a personal attitude but the objective benefit of salvation toward which hope is directed (Gal. 5:5; Col. 1:5; Tit. 2:13). Where the vb. or noun is used absolutely the reference is usually to the eschatological fulfillment (e.g., Rom. 8:24; 12:12; 15:13; Eph. 2:12).

3. All NT witnesses agree that through the coming of the promised Messiah the situation described in terms of hope in the OT has been fundamentally altered. In Christ the promised day of salvation has broken in as God's great "today." What was previously future has now become present for believers: justification, a personal relationship with God, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and a new people of God comprising both Israel and the nations. Since the "today" of salvation is only apparent by faith, it acquires a double aspect: to the "now" one has to add "not yet" (1 Jn. 3:2), to the "having" and "being in Christ" one must add hope in and looking for him.

4. Hope is so fundamental that a Christian can be described as having been reborn to a "living hope" (1 Pet. 1:3). In paganism there were ideas of a metaphysical future, but no hope providing comfort and freedom from the fear of death (Eph. 2:12; 1 Thess. 4:13). The significance of elpis is further clarified by the fact that, along with pistis (faith) and agapē (love), it forms part of the early Christian triad (see, e.g., 1 Cor. 13:13; 1 Thess. 1:3). None of the three can exist without the others; all three are rooted in Christ. Faith without hope, for example, is empty and futile (1 Cor. 15:14, 17).

5. The essential features of NT hope are given decisive shape by three factors. (a) As to its content, hope is never egocentric but always centered on Christ and on God. Its heart is not the blessing of the individual but the universal kingly rule of God, who will be "all in all" (1 Cor. 15:28). More specifically, the content of elpis is defined as: salvation (1 Thess. 5:8), eternal life (Tit. 1:2; 3:7), righteousness (Gal. 5:5), resurrection in an incorruptible body (Acts 23:6; 24:15; 1 Cor. 15:52–56), seeing God and being conformed to his likeness (1 Jn. 3:2–3), and the glory of God (Rom. 5:2; cf. 2 Cor. 3:12; Col. 1:27).

(b) As to hope's basis, it does not rest on one's own good works but on God's gracious work in Jesus Christ, who is therefore called "our hope" (1 Tim. 1:1; cf. Col. 1:27). This Christ is no stranger to the community of hope but the one whom believers recognize as the crucified and risen Lord and whose presence they know through the Spirit. Along with the gift of his Son God assures us that that he will give us everything through faith in him (Rom. 8:32). Because Christ has risen as the "firstfruits," we will also rise (1 Cor. 15:20–23). The Coming One is the Exalted One, whom God has already set over all things and given to the church as its head (Eph. 1:22).

(c) As to its nature, hope is a gift of the Father's grace (2 Thess. 2:16), like faith, and it is therefore aroused through the message of salvation (Col. 1:23). The goal of hope in all its riches gives enlightenment (Eph. 1:18), and hope unites those who have been called (4:4). Through the Holy Spirit we receive a superabundance of hope (Rom. 15:13), for God's Spirit is given to us as the firstfruits of all that we will receive (8:23); his indwelling in believers is the guarantee of their resurrection (8:11).

6. One cannot separate hope as a subjective, personal attitude from its objective content, since hope is not a theoretical knowledge about a promised future salvation but a function of a living faith. (a) It is always a confident, sure expectation of divine saving actions. Hope looks at the coming city of God; faith gives certainty to our hope (Heb. 11:1; → hypostasis, 5712). In Rom. 4:18 Abraham's faith is presented as hope "against all hope"—i.e., against what human judgment of the future declared as impossible, Abraham set his hope through God's promise. Like faith, NT hope carries unconditional certainty within itself. Therefore, confessions of hope can be introduced by words of certainty, such as "we believe" (Rom. 6:8), "I am convinced" (8:38), "[I am] confident" (Phil. 1:6). Certain that God's promises of salvation will be realized, the Christian glories in this hope (Rom. 5:2; cf. Heb. 3:6).

(b) Like faith and hope, love and hope are also essentially related in the NT. If 1 Cor. 13:7 states that love "always hopes," Col. 1:4–5 speaks of "the love you have for all the saints . . . that spring[s] from the hope that is stored up for you in heaven." NT hope extends both heart and vision. The church feels solidarity with the whole creation as it groans and hopes for the redemption of the body (Rom. 8:20–23).

(c) NT hope demonstrates its living character by the steadfastness with which it waits (→ hypomenō, 5702), patiently bearing the tension between our present as we walk by faith (2 Cor. 5:7) and our future manner of life (cf. Rom. 8:25; 1 Thess. 1:3). This waiting is something active, for it involves overcoming (Rev. 2:7, 11, 17, etc.). Although the waiting may be painful, this too is reckoned positively, as labor that announces rebirth (Matt. 24:8). Thus those who hope are comforted and confident (2 Cor. 5:8; 1 Thess. 4:18; 2 Thess. 2:16).

(d) To this context belongs the fundamental renunciation of all calculations of the future, a humble recognition of our limited knowledge, and submission to the life to which we have been appointed. The goal of our hope calls us to "watch and pray." It motivates us to personal purity (1 Jn. 3:3) and spurs us on to holy living (2 Cor. 5:8–9; Heb. 12:14). Hope requires us to hold fast our confession without wavering (Heb. 10:23) and to be ready to give an answer to anyone who asks about our hope (1 Pet. 3:15). Finally, NT hope is a joyful waiting (Rom. 12:12), which gives courage and strength. It protects the inner self as a helmet protects the head (1 Thess. 5:8). As a ship is safe when at anchor, our life is secured by the hope that binds us to Christ, our great high priest, who has entered the sanctuary on our behalf (Heb. 6:18–19).

1842 Ἐμμανουήλ — Ἐμμανουήλ (Emmanouēl), Immanuel (1842).

OT The name Immanuel, which occurs in Isa. 7:14 and 8:8, means (lit.) "God [is] with us" (Heb. ʿimmānû ʾēl). In the context of the time of Isaiah and Ahaz the name was given to a child not yet conceived, with the promise that the danger threatening Israel from Syria and Samaria would pass "before the boy knows enough to reject the wrong and choose the right." Thus, the child and its name were a sign of God's gracious, saving presence among his people.

The name Immanuel can have either a minimum or a maximum significance. It could be a general statement that the birth and naming of the special child will indicate that the good hand of God is on the Israelites. Or it could be a divine name meaning that God's presence with them is to be found in the child. In justification of the latter interpretation is the name of the child in Isa. 9:6, whom we may fairly regard as the same person. One of his names there is Mighty God.

NT Matt. 1:21–23 describes the angel's promise to Joseph about the son conceived in Mary by the Holy Spirit, the son who is to be called "Jesus, because he will save his people from their sins," in fulfillment of Isa. 7:14. This does not necessarily mean that Isaiah prophesied a virgin birth, for parthenos (→ 4221) could be used of women other than virgins (e.g., Gen. 34:3); similarly the Heb. ʿalmâ could mean a young woman married or single (Gen. 24:43; Exod. 2:8; Song 1:3; 6:8). That question rests on the interpretation of verses other than Matt. 1:23 (e.g., Matt. 1:18–20; Lk. 1:34–35).

The name Immanuel is not applied to Jesus elsewhere in the NT. The point of Matt. 1 is to see in Jesus' birth a saving act of God, comparable with the birth of the first Immanuel. Both births signify God's presence with his people through a child. But whereas the earlier event in Isaiah's day was regarded at the time as having decisive significance, in the light of the coming of Jesus the birth of that child in the time of Isaiah proves to be merely the anticipation of the truly decisive saving act and presence of God when Jesus was born (→ plēroō, 4444). "God with us" is another way of saying that Jesus is the Son of God; that child is God come to earth.

1872 ἐμφανίζω

ἐμφανίζω (emphanizō), reveal, make known (1872); ἐμφανής (emphanēs), visible (1871).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. emphanizō means to manifest, exhibit; pass. to become visible. The word also connotes the ideas of making plain, declaring, or explaining. The adj. emphanēs connotes the idea of visible, open, manifest.

2. (a) In Est. 2:22 emphanizō means to say or tell. The sense is that of making known or revealing the ways of God in Exod. 33:13, while in Isa. 3:9 the vb. indicates that certain people manifest or display their sin. In Exod. 33:18 it means to show or exhibit.

(b) Isa. 2:2 and Mic. 4:1 describe the exalted position of the mountain of the house of the Lord over the other mountains. emphanēs here is probably used in the sense of conspicuous or manifest. In Isa. 65:1 the adj. occurs in a phrase that the Lord manifested himself to those who did not ask for him. In Exod. 2:14 emphanēs denotes how Moses became aware of the fact that his murder of the Egyptian had become known.

NT 1. (a) In the NT emphanizō occurs 5x in the sense of declare, inform. In Acts 23:15 it is used in a legal context, where a group of forty men, in a plot against Paul, ask the Sanhedrin to "petition" the commander under pretense of presenting a case against the apostle (cf. also 25:2, 15). In 23:22 the word describes the act of a nephew of Paul who disclosed information to the commander about the plot against his uncle.

(b) In Heb. 11:14 the word emphanizō has the sense of show or manifest. Those who acknowledge their transience on the earth demonstrate that they are seeking a homeland.

(c) emphanizō occurs 4x in the sense of appear. In Matt. 27:53 risen saints appeared in Jerusalem after the resurrection of Christ. In Jn. 14:21–22 Jesus says he will show himself to his followers but not to the world. Here the vb. connotes a manifestation to the spiritual faculties rather than to the senses. In Heb. 9:24 the verb is used of Christ's appearance in the presence of God.

2. The adj. emphanēs is used 2x in the NT. In Acts 10:40 it refers to the post-resurrection appearance of Christ, who made himself manifest to certain witnesses. In Rom. 10:20 the word occurs in a quotation from Isa. 65:1: "I revealed myself to those who did not ask for me." This verse illustrates both the fulfillment of OT prophecy and the consistency of God in receiving the Gentiles, whereas Israel, as ever, has remained disobedient (Rom. 10:21; cf. Isa. 65:2).

1875 (emphytos, implanted), → 1285.

ἐν (en), in, on (1877).

CL & OT en takes the dat. case. In cl. Gk. its primary meaning was locative, to denote the place in which something was situated. By the time of Hel. Gk., it was by far the most common prep. and served a wide variety of purposes. It encroached on the territory of such preps. as eis (into; on this, → 1650), dia (both with gen. and acc.), meta, syn, and kata. In the LXX it was the usual prep. used to translate the Heb. *b*ᵉ (which occurs more than 15,000x).

It may seem remarkable, therefore, that in modern Gk. this prep. is no longer used. But the ultimate disappearance of en from the language is related to two facts: (a) the disappearance of the dat. case, a process completed by the 10th century, and (b) the diversified use of en in Hel. Gk. A principle of language development seems to be that the more a particular linguistic form is employed, the more it is subject to weakening and ultimate collapse.

NT 1. en is the most frequent prep. in the NT (over 2700x). Three factors that contributed to its extended NT usage are LXX usage (see above), the increasing imprecision of the dat., and the influence of distinctively Christian ideas, such as "in Christ."

2. Because of its wide variety of usage, en often leaves the exegete with ambiguities. For example, what does "all in all" mean in 1 Cor. 15:28 (cf. Eph. 1:23; Col. 3:11)? Does it express God's unchallenged supremacy in the universe, his indwelling of all members of the redeemed community, or something else? The prep. is of no help in deciding this issue, since it is too imprecise. Often all the exegete can do is to reduce the number of possible meanings of en by examining the context.

3. en often has a fig. sense in the NT, denoting the sphere within which an action occurs or the element or reality in which something is contained or consists. Phrases such as "in the Lord," "in (the) Spirit," "in the body," "in faith," and "in truth" indicate states in which God's people live and act. In Eph. 6:1 and Col. 3:20, for example, children's obedience to their parents should be en kyriō ("in the Lord"), i.e., arising from Christian motives. Similarly, the Christian widow is free to remarry (1 Cor. 7:39), but only en kyriō (lit., "in the sphere of the Lord"); i.e., she may marry only a fellow Christian. In Gal. 1:16, where Paul is describing how he received his gospel, he writes that God revealed "his Son in [en] me." Paul is here stressing the inward and intensely personal character of God's revelation to him of the risen Jesus (though one can also simply translate the phrase "to me," cf. NRSV).

4. Of considerable theological importance is "causal en" (usually regarded as a subdivision of "instrumental en"), where en means "on account of, because of." For example, in Rom. 5:3 Paul mentions that believers can rejoice "in [their] sufferings." Taking the apostle's theology of suffering into account, the most likely understanding of this verse is that believers can rejoice "because of their suffering" (for other examples of causal en, see Matt. 6:7; Jn. 16:30; Acts 7:29; 24:16; Rom. 1:21, 24; 1 Cor. 4:4; 7:14; 2 Cor. 12:5, 9; Phil. 1:13; Col. 1:21; cf. LXX examples in Deut. 24:16; 2 Sam. 3:27; Ps. 31:10; 42:9).

5. The most theologically rich use of en is Paul's en Christō ("in Christ"). en here has various nuances, of which the most important are: (a) union with Christ (Rom. 8:1; 2 Cor. 5:17, 21); (b) sphere of reference, a meaning virtually synonymous with being a Christian (Rom. 16:7; 2 Cor. 12:2; Phil. 3:3); (c) instrumentality (Rom. 3:24; 2 Cor. 3:14); (d) cause (1 Cor. 15:22; Col. 2:10); (e) location (Rom. 8:39; Phil. 2:5); and (f) authoritative basis (1 Thess. 4:1).

John also uses this formula, though he has a different nuance in his writings. He expresses the idea of personal co-inherence (Jn. 6:56; 14:20; 15:4–5; 1 Jn. 3:24; 4:13, 15–16), patterned on the archetype of divine co-inherence (Jn. 10:38; 14:10–11, 20; 17:21, 23). That is, not only are we in Christ but he is in us, just as he is in the Father and the Father is in him. Paul, it is true, does refer to Christ as being in us (cf. Rom. 8:10; 2 Cor. 13:5; Col. 1:27), but more frequently he speaks of the Spirit indwelling us (Rom. 8:9, 11; 1 Cor. 6:19; 2 Tim. 1:14).

One important use of en Christō occurs in 2 Cor. 5:19. Does Paul mean that "God lived in Christ" and in that position was reconciling the world to himself? Or is Paul using a periphrastic construction, namely, that God was reconciling the world to himself "through Christ"? Both of these embody Pauline sentiments, but grammatical considerations tend to favor the first option. A functional Christology presupposes and finds its ultimate basis in an ontological Christology. Not only was Christ God's agent in effecting reconciliation (Rom. 5:10–11; 2 Cor. 5:18; Col. 1:19–22); he also mediated the divine presence, thus giving validity to his reconciliatory sacrifice. God was in Christ and therefore acted through Christ (cf. Jn. 14:10b, "the Father, living in me ... is doing his work").

6. en is also used with baptizō, to baptize (→ 966). Generally this has a local sense: e.g., "in the Jordan River" (Matt. 3:6), "in the desert region" (Mk. 1:4), "at Aenon" (Jn. 3:23), and "in the cloud and in the sea" (1 Cor. 10:2). en hydati (lit., "in water") denotes the element in which the baptized were "immersed" or with which they were "drenched" (Matt. 3:11; Jn. 1:26, 31, 33; cf. the simple dat, hydati in Lk. 3:16; Acts 1:5; 11:16). So also with (en) pneumati (hagiō) (lit., "in the [Holy] Spirit"), which is generally contrasted with (en) hydati (Matt. 3:11; Lk. 3:16; Jn. 1:33; Acts 1:5; 11:16), believers are either immersed "in" the Spirit or drenched "with" the Spirit. Personal agency with the vb. baptizō cannot be expressed by a simple dat. or by en with the dat.; rather, it is always expressed with hypo (→ 5679) with the gen.

Thus, it seems likely that "[en] one Spirit" in 1 Cor. 12:13 means not "by one Spirit" but "in [or with] one Spirit." Note also that in the sayings about John the Baptist regarding Spirit baptism, it is always Jesus who is the baptizer, never the Spirit. Moreover, 12:13b ("we were all given the one Spirit to drink") suggests an inward participation in the Spirit to which a preceding outward immersion in the Spirit corresponds. The Holy Spirit is both around (12:13a) and within (12:13b; cf. Eph. 5:18).

7. en is used 4x with pistis (faith, → 4411; see Eph. 1:15; Col. 1:4; 1 Tim. 3:13; 2 Tim. 3:15). The prep. phrase here likely marks out the sphere or realm in which faith is operative, thus specifying the actual object of faith. For example, Col. 1:4 may be paraphrased "your faith (that rests) in Christ Jesus" or "your faith experienced in fellowship with Christ Jesus." In Mk. 1:15, the only clear case where en follows the vb. pisteuō (to believe), the expression simply means to believe in the truth of the gospel.

ἔνοχος (enochos), guilty, subject to, liable to (1944); ἐνέχω (enechō), hold fast, be subject to (1923).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. enochos means hold fast, be subject to. It is frequently used as a technical legal term: A person is made liable or subject to a certain penalty under the law. The forum (law court, laws, humans, or gods) before which one is guilty or liable is usually referred to in the dat. Frequently, enochos is also used with the gen. of a crime or its punishment.

2. The LXX has enochos 21x in the same sense as secular Gk. It is used primarily to refer to a person who is liable to death because of some serious sin, such as manslaughter, adultery, sodomy, incest (Gen. 26:11; Exod. 22:2 = LXX 22:3; Lev. 20:9–27; Num. 35:27; Deut. 19:10). In Isa. 54:17 enochos is used of those who incur guilt by engaging in a legal dispute with Israel. In Ezek. 14:4, 7, enechō is used in the sense of being entangled (cf. 3 Macc. 6:10).

NT 1. enochos occurs 10x in the NT, following the above pattern. In Matt. 5:21–22 [4x], the respective courts before which a lawbreaker is arraigned are referred to in the dat. or eis with the acc.: krisis, local court; synedrion, supreme national court; gehenna, hell. The lesser or greater degree of guilt is reflected in the nature of the court and the severity of the punishment.

2. Jas. 2:10 uses enochos of lawbreakers. Every sin, however insignificant it may appear, makes the doer "guilty of breaking all of [the law]" and therefore liable to judgment.

3. In the accounts of the trial of Jesus in Matt. and Mk., the death sentence is pronounced using the term enochos. The high priest regards the evidence of blasphemy as conclusive in Jesus' case and declares him "worthy of death" (Matt. 26:66; cf. Mk. 14:64).

4. Heb. 2:15 explains the significance of the death of Jesus, which frees those who were "held" in slavery (i.e., to the devil and to death). In 1 Cor. 11:27 Paul concludes that those who take the bread and wine in an unworthy manner become "guilty of sinning against the body and blood of the Lord." The Lord gave himself up to death for the sake of his people; their opposite action, loveless behavior toward fellow believers (cf. Matt. 5:21–22), results in guilt. Here too enochos is used of a matter of life and death. Similarly, Mk. 3:29 uses enochos with a gen. of the penalty: Anyone who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit is "guilty of an eternal sin."

5. enechō appears 3x in the NT, in each case (as in the LXX) with a negative application of the meaning "held." Herodias "nursed" a grudge against John the Baptist (Mk. 6:19); the teachers of the law "opposed" Jesus (Lk. 11:53); and the Galatians were letting themselves be "burdened" again with a yoke of slavery (i.e., the law).

1953 ἐντολή

ἐντολή (entolē), command, commandment, order (1953); ἐντέλλω (entellō), to command, give orders, order (1948); ἔνταλμα (entalma), precept, rule (1945).

CL & OT 1. entolē and entellō occur in cl. Gk. to denote instructions given by a person of high social standing to a subordinate. At an early date these words were also used of the commands of God, in a way similar to the royal or imperial decrees.

2. The vb. occurs 400x in the LXX; entolē, 244x. Both words are most concentrated in the Pentateuch (esp. in Deut.). The vb. is also frequent in Jer. and the noun in Ps. 119. It translates words derived from the root ṣwh. entalma is found only 4x (Job 23:11–12; Isa. 29:13; 55:11).

(a) The Heb. ṣiwwâ (Pi'el) means to order, direct, summon a person or thing to a place or task. Yahweh appoints a king over his people (1 Sam. 13:14; cf. 2 Sam. 6:21)and gives his angels protective charge over his own (Ps. 91:11). He decrees victories for Israel (Ps. 44:4) and orders things to be done (Exod. 4:28). Alternatively, when the vb. is linked with a negative, God forbids certain actions (Gen. 2:16; 3:11, 17).

(b) miṣwâ is used mostly of divine commands. Ps. often speak of "your commands." In other words, the command of God is something known.

(c) Other Heb. roots translated by this Gk. word group are pqd, to entrust something to someone (2 Chr. 36:23), call to account, punish (wickedness, Isa. 13:11)—God is the subject; dbr, speak, command—Yahweh or his representative(Moses, Deut. 18:18; Joshua, Jos. 4:12) issues the command; and ḥqq. This last one merits special attention. ḥōq, ḥuqqâ means lit. what is established, carved, fixed in writing, and thus a statute (e.g., Deut. 6:24; 16:12; 28:15). These statutes are handed down and experienced, and God's covenant, law, justice, and commands are thus realized. Disregard of the divine statutes brings the punishment of Yahweh (1 Ki. 11:11). In one case God refers to Israelite worship practices as "rules [entalma] taught by men" (Isa. 29:13; but cf. the LXX of 55:11 for a positive use of this word).

(d) entolē is rarely used for Heb. tôrâ (law). In such cases it has the secondary sense of the summary of God's commands and thus the normative law of God for Israel (Deut. 17:19; 2 Ki. 21:8; 2 Chr. 30:16).

3. In Qumran literature (where these Heb. roots appear), one discovers that the Qumran sect was concerned with the literal, scriptural keeping of the commands of the Pentateuch and the prophets, which would differentiate them from the more lax attitude of the Jerusalem priesthood. Moses' law is preserved through constant learning and remembrance in daily living. Observance of this normative pattern is also decisive as to whether one will stand in the impending last judgment.

4. The Jud. of the synagogues suffered from an atomistic ethic that fragmented everything into individual demands and acts. The OT Apocr. and Pseudepigrapha maintained the usage and sense of the OT and LXX. Josephus assimilated his ideas of entolē to Roman thinking and used it in a legal rather than a theological sense.

Jud. at the time of Jesus lived in a tension. On the one hand, Jews attempted to create a comprehensive list of basic commandments, the obligation of the halakah (the transmission in a kind of catechism of ethical rules) to observe in a casuistical system. On the other hand, they also tried to distinguish between the more and the less important commandments (cf. Matt. 22:34–40; Mk. 12:29–30; Lk. 20:39–40). The theological problem in Jud. lay in the lack of an authoritative, prophetic message that could apply the law in terms of commandments that were valid for the contemporary situation.

NT In the NT entolē occurs 67x; entellō, 14x; entalma, 3x. These are concentrated chiefly in the Gospels and in Paul.

1. According to the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus' teaching entered the divisive discussion of the commandments. Nevertheless, he refused to participate in casuistry or set up a hierarchical scale that would distinguish between the least, and therefore dispensable, commands (cf. Matt. 5:19) and a single, great command that would unify the entire law. Jesus refused to play off the command to love God against the command to love one's neighbor (cf. 22:36, 38).

Jesus also refused to let a clear command of God be rendered void by human ordinances, even under the pretext of a supposed love of God that had priority. He denounced these human statutes as "your tradition" (Matt. 15:3), "rules taught by men" (entalma, Matt. 15:9; Mk. 7:7), and "the tradition of men" (7:8). Instead, Jesus taught that love of God and love of humankind were inseparable. Beside the first great commandment, there is a "second ... like it.... All the Law and the Prophets hang on these two commandments" (Matt. 22:39–40; cf. Mk. 12:31). By relating the commandment to its original sense of an offer of life springing from the love of God, it is possible both to love God and one's neighbor in gratitude.

This is shown by numerous examples in the teaching of Jesus. The rich young ruler was challenged to surrender all his goods to the poor in order to live by the daily care of God as he followed Jesus (Matt. 19:16–30; Mk. 10:17–31; Lk. 18:18–30). God's original ordinance of monogamous marriage was designed to further the joy of marriage, not to sanction a casuistical approach to divorce (Matt. 19:7; Mk. 10:3, 5; cf. Deut. 24:1). Both the context and the parable of the good Samaritan (Lk. 10:25–37) show Jesus' loving attitude to his legalistic opponent. Through encounter with the love of God, the shattered unity of love for God and love for and service to one's fellow human being is restored (cf. Lk. 10:27, 29).

Jesus brought word and action into a unity. He stood in contrast to his opponents, who burdened people with commands (Matt. 11:28–30; 23:4; cf. Lk. 11:46), and displayed a regal and prophetic authority over the commands of God. He showed this in the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:21–48) and in his attitude to the Sabbath (Mk. 2:23–27). Jesus did not set aside the law; rather, he rose above the discussion of the commandments and the bondage into which we get when we administer them by pointing us to the Giver of the Law (Matt. 5:48; cf. 5:17).

Jesus completely fulfilled God's command to abandon self for others (Matt. 26:39; Mk. 14:36; Lk. 22:42; cf. Phil. 2:8; Jn. 19:30). Hence, the Johannine writings can rightly speak of "a new command" (Jn. 13:34). The missionary commission speaks of doing all that Jesus told us (Matt. 28:20; cf. Acts 1:2, 8). Paul emphasized serving God's law by the power of the Spirit (Rom. 7:25; cf. 7:1–24; 8:2).

The remaining Synoptic passages with entolē and entellō have meanings discussed under the OT section. The parents of John the Baptist observed "all the Lord's commandments and regulations" (Lk. 1:6). The women among Jesus' followers rested on the Sabbath "in obedience to the commandment" (23:56). Jesus commanded his disciples not to speak about his transfiguration (Matt. 17:9; cf. Mk. 9:9).

2.(a) The rabbis taught that God's law was the best means available to subdue one's evil inclination. In contrast, Paul developed the sharpest antithesis to this (Rom. 7:7–25). For him, the Spirit of God is the only power that subdues evil inclinations. He testifies to the revelatory function of God's law in unveiling sin's power. True, "the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, righteous and good" (7:12), and it "was intended to bring life" (7:10). However, it resulted in bringing about "covetous desire" (7:8), which brought in its train sin and death (7:9–10). In fact, the commandment can even provoke one to sin (7:11; cf. 5:20).

The service of the law, therefore, is ultimately beneficial, because its leads us to see our powerlessness before sin and the hopeless and fatal character of our struggle. That is, anyone set under the law is obligated to carry it on by himself or herself against the personal power of sin (7:24). When we realize we cannot measure up to its demands, we are driven to the saving power of the gospel of Jesus Christ (7:25; 8:1–4). The teaching of Paul, the servant of the risen Christ, is thus in line with the teaching of Jesus. Our Lord has abolished "in his flesh the law with its commandments and regulations" (Eph. 2:15). The accumulation here of the synonyms nomos (→ 3795), entolē, and dogma (→ 1504) graphically portrays how they have all been swept away by Christ.

There is no basic contradiction, then, when Paul urges us to keep "God's commands" (1 Cor. 7:19; cf. Matt. 19:17). Faith that works through love (Gal. 5:6) and the "new creation" (6:15) provide the necessary presuppositions for keeping God's commands. On this basis, 1 Cor. 7:19 repudiates Christian libertinism. Eph. 6:2 endorses the fifth commandment to "honor your father and mother" (cf. Exod. 20:12). Rom. 13:9 sees the command to "love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19:8) as a summary of all the commands of the second part of the Decalogue. Paul's imperative is grounded in the preceding indicative of Christ's saving work and the power of the Spirit given to us.

On several occasions Paul uses entolē to denote mandates he has given in his authority as an apostle. Col. 4:10 cites instructions concerning Barnabas (cf. Acts 17:15), while 1 Cor. 14:37 stresses that what he is writing is a command of the Lord and will be as such recognized by those who are spiritual. Paul charges Timothy to "keep this command without spot or blame" (1 Tim. 6:14; cf. 6:20), but the false teachers at Colossae were to be resisted because they were trying to enforce rules "based on human commands" (entalma, Col. 2:22).

(b) In agreement with Paul, Heb. systematically expounds the theme of the superiority of the heavenly, royal high priesthood of Christ over the Levitical priesthood. It demonstrates how a "former regulation (entolē) is set aside because it was weak and useless" (7:18). It is superseded by a better hope (7:19; cf. Rom. 7:7–10) and by "the power of an indestructible life" (Heb. 7:16).

3. (a) In Jn. entolē and entellō are used primarily in relation to Jesus, God's only Son, the revealer (Jn. 8:5; 11:57 offer two exceptions). Just as the Father's commands to Jesus (15:10) constitute one command (12:49–50), so Jesus speaks now of his command(s) (13:34; 14:15, 21; 15:10). These commands can really be reduced to one essential command, the command to love (15:12).

The basic relationship established by the commandment is what the Father has given to the Son (10:18; 12:49–50; 15:10). There is no conflict between the authority given to the Son and his free decision and active obedience (cf. 10:17–18; 14:31), nor is there a conflict with the words and actions of the Son (12:49). The command of the Father is eternal life (12:50)—not because anyone can fulfill it and thus gain eternal life, but because the fulfillment of this command by the Son means eternal life for the world. By keeping the Father's commands, the Son shows his love for the Father (14:31) and remains in his Father's love (15:10). This love is not a mystical love; it is active in history (3:16). It means the Father's giving of his Son and the self-giving of the Son for the disciples (14:9; 15:12–14).

The historical expression of the Son's love does not end with those who accept that love. Rather, receiving that love provides the basis, conditions, and possibility of extending this love to others (Jn. 13:34). It must be practiced; it is therefore the one new command (cf. 15:12), although historically and ethically it is by no means new. Still, it excludes both legalism and antinomianism (13:35; cf. Lk. 10:25–37; Rom. 13:9; 1 Cor. 7:3–4, 19). To abide in Jesus' command is to abide in his love, just as his abiding in the Father's command means to abide in the Father's love (15:10).

(b) Usage of these terms in Jn.'s letters is essentially the same as in the Gospel. Keeping the command is equated with keeping the word (1 Jn. 2:4–5, 7). However, here it is no longer the Son himself who proclaims the command. Rather, the discussion is about the command of God the Father, presumably the command to love as cited in the Gospel. The situation of the author and the recipients of these letters suggests a conflict with an antinomian docetism that evidently disputed both Christ's person and the need for spiritual believers to submit to an ethic binding on all. This necessitated further explanation of the commandment. "This is his command: to believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and to love one another as he commanded us" (1 Jn. 3:23; cf. Gal. 5:6; 1 Cor. 7:19).

The idea of the Father's command can also be given a new meaning: "I am writing you a new command; its truth is seen in him and you, because the darkness is passing and the true light is already shining" (1 Jn. 2:8). Thus, the command to love is now the "old command." "I am not writing you a new command, but an old one, which you have had since the beginning" (2:7; cf. 2 Jn. 5–6). Here the word old (palaian) means known of old, as opposed to the enthusiastic, new doctrine of the docetic gnostics.

This command, long observed in the churches, provides the ground for certainty that all prayers are answered by God (1 Jn. 3:22). In 1 Jn. 4:21 the twofold command of the OT and the Synoptics (cf. Mk. 12:28–34) is formulated as a single command that comes from Jesus: "He has given us this command: Whoever loves God must also love his brother." Again the stress falls on brotherly love. But there is a corollary: "This is how we know that we love the children of God: by loving God and carrying out his commands" (5:2). Moreover, overtones of Jesus' invitation in Matt. 11:28–30 and the certainty of victory in 1 Jn. 2:8 may be heard in 1 Jn. 5:3–4.

(c) In the same certainty of victory, Rev. testifies to present opposition (12:17), patience, and ultimate victory (14:12; 22:14). This is the lot of those who keep God's command and bear witness to Jesus.

4. Libertine groups in the churches are attacked even more strongly in 2 Pet. than 1 and 2 Jn. Certain opponents have turned their backs "on the sacred command that was passed on to them" (2 Pet. 2:21). Peter here refers to the entire Christian teaching, but above all to the ethical practices described in this verse as "the way of righteousness" (cf. Prov. 21:16; Job 24:13; Matt. 21:32). The sole defense against libertinism is to recall OT prophecy and "the command given by our Lord and Savior through your apostles" (3:2). Both verses understand Jesus as the proclaimer of a new law and Christian doctrine as the summary of it.

5. Finally, the hortatory passages of the Apostolic Fathers present a picture of a new legalism. The scheme of a two-ways doctrine (see esp. Barn. 19ff.; cf. Herm. Mand.) promises eternal punishment to those who do not hear or keep Christ's commandments, whereas those who do keep the commandments are promised eternal life. Ignatius exhorted the church to submit themselves to the bishop and to his commands (Ign. Trall. 13:2). He praised them because they were united in the commandments of Christ (Ign. Rom. preamble) and were "adorned from head to foot in the commandments of Jesus Christ" (Ign. Eph. 9:2).

ἐντυγχάνω (entynchanō), meet, turn to, approach, petition, pray, intercede (1961); ὑπερεντυγχάνω (hyperentynchanō), plead, intercede (5659).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. entynchanō means to approach or appeal to someone. It is found in the papyri in the sense of appealing to someone against a third person. Since petitions may be addressed to God, it has also the sense of to pray. Apart from Dan. 6:13 (= LXX 6:12), neither vb. occurs in the OT (but see Wis. 8:20; 16:28; 1 Macc. 8:32; 10:61, 63, 64; 11:25; 2 Macc. 2:25; 4:36; 6:12; 15:39; 3 Macc. 6:37). hyperentynchanō is first found in the NT.

NT entynchanō is used of Paul's appeal to the emperor in Acts 25:24. In Rom. 11:2 it denotes Elijah's pleading with God against Israel (cf. 1 Ki. 19:10). It is twice used of Christ's continuing intercession at the right hand of God (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25); this intercession is grounded in his death, resurrection, and ascension.

These vbs. are also used of the Holy Spirit, who "himself intercedes [hyperentynchanō] for us with groans that words cannot express ... [and who] intercedes [entynchanō] for the saints in accordance with God's will" (Rom. 8:26–27). This refers in some way to Christian prayer. Even a believer's prayer life exists only by God's grace. During times of spiritual weakness, the Spirit himself helps us by interceding for us.

What is most debated in Rom. 8:26–27 is the meaning of the "groans that words cannot express" (NRSV, "sighs too deep for words"). The noun used here is stenagmos (→ stenazō, to sigh, groan, 5100). Does this refer to glossolalia (speaking in tongues)? Scholars are divided over the issue. Any interpretation of this passage must reckon with the fact that in 8:22–23, the vb. stenazō occurs: The entire creation groans [systenazō, to groan together] under the effects of sin, and "we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan [stenazō] inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies." In other words, there are times in the life of every believer when the effects of sin become oppressive to our hearts and words do not come into our minds as we cry out to God. But at such times God himself, through the Spirit, becomes our advocate.

Paul is not promoting a pietistic sense of raising us above our own strength in order to bring us near to God. The Spirit does not free us from earthly things but as our proxy brings our needs to God in ways that we cannot express ourselves. The groans are a sign of the church's solidarity with the rest of the creation. The presence of the Spirit is only the firstfruits of the full reality of our adoption as God's children, the redemption of the body (Rom. 8:23). The reference to our body, which in the Gk. is sing., may refer to the corporate body of the church (cf. 12:4–5) or to the physical body; perhaps the two ideas may coalesce here.

Later in Rom. Paul defines worship in terms of presenting the body "as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God" (12:1). He then goes on to explain what this means in terms of not being conformed to the world, the renewal of the mind, proving the will of God, the exercise of gifts in the body of Christ, and daily living in a world ruled by pagan authorities (12:3–13:7). These references indicate how the worship described in ch. 8 is to be complemented. It involves the dedication of the whole person to God in a way that is rational, embracing the whole mind, and practical, reaching out into daily living in the church and in the world (→ latreuō, serve, 3302).

1981 ἐξαλείφω — ἐξαλείφω (exaleiphō), wipe away, blot out (1981).

CL & OT exaleiphō, from aleiphō (anoint, rub with oil; → 230), means lit. plaster, whitewash; metaphorically, wipe out, cancel, or destroy. In the LXX it carries both these meanings. The lit. sense plaster appears in Lev. 14:42, 43, 48; in its metaphorical sense, it denotes God's judicial work of wiping out life (Gen. 7:23) and the memory of offenders (Exod. 17:14; Deut. 9:14), and of erasing names from the book of life (Exod. 32:32–33); it also denotes God's gracious work of obliterating sins (Ps. 51:9; 109:14; Isa. 43:25).

NT exaleiphō appears 5x in the NT as a metaphor for obliterating sins (Acts 3:19), erasing names from the book of life (Rev. 3:5; cf. Exod. 32:32–33), wiping away tears (Rev. 7:17; 21:4), and canceling a bond of debt (Col. 2:14). The image implied here is probably that of smoothing the surface of a wax tablet for writing. The bond in Col. 2:14 is our obligation as God's creatures to keep his law on pain of death, which becomes a death warrant as soon as we sin.

2007 ἐξηγέομαι — ἐξηγέομαι (exēgeomai), explain, expound, interpret, tell (2007); διήγησις (diēgēsis), narrative, account (1456); διηγέομαι (diēgeomai), tell, describe (1455).

CL & OT 1. In some cl. writers exēgeomai means to lead or to govern. It can also mean to dictate or to prescribe, as when Plato speaks of "what the law prescribes." Plato also uses this word for expound or interpret, such as his reference to expounding the intentions of the lawgiver and expounding the poets. Finally, the Gk. historians use this word simply to mean tell or relate. diēgēsis means narrative or narration, sometimes with the added idea of fullness of detail. Likewise, diēgeomai means to describe or tell, sometimes with the force of setting out something in detail.

2. In the LXX exēgeomai mainly has the sense of recounting, telling, or declaring. Thus it is used of telling a dream (Jdg. 7:13), describing a miracle (2 Ki. 8:5), and declaring the Lord's glory among the nations (1 Chr. 16:24). In 1 Macc. 3:26 it introduces the telling of the story of a battle, and in 2 Macc. 2:13 the reporting of events. Josephus uses this vb. to denote interpretation or exposition. He speaks of two rabbis who give expositions or are interpreters of the laws. Philo uses words from this word group to refer to expositions of Scripture.

3. In the LXX diēgeomai occurs many more times than exēgeomai as the regular word used for to tell, recount, or declare. Thus, Abraham's servant tells Isaac all that he has done (Gen. 24:66); Jacob tells Laban of his family (29:13); and Saul is told about the men of Jabesh (1 Sam. 11:5). diēgeomai is also used for the telling of God's wonderful works (1 Chr. 16:9; Ps. 105:2; 145:5); on one occasion it denotes complaining to God (55:17). diēgēsis occurs infrequently in the LXX. In Hab. 2:6 it refers to telling a parable against someone. It occurs 7x in Sir. in the sense of godly discourse (6:35; 27:11), speech or conversation (9:15; 38:25), or a story (22:6) or saying (39:2). It is used at the beginning and end of the Letter of Aristeas to describe the narrative that the book tells.

NT 1. In the NT exēgeomai occurs once in Jn. and 5x in Lk.–Acts. Jn. 1:18 has considerable theological importance: "No one has ever seen God, but God the One and Only, who is at the Father's side, has made him known" (ekeinos exēgēsato). Two aspects of this vb.'s meaning in cl. Gk. and the OT may help in understanding what this text means. (a) The basic force of the vb. in Jn. 1:18 is simply that of speaking about things hidden in God. That is, the Logos makes known or declares the invisible God. (b) Since this word was used in a technical sense for the interpretation of the will of the gods by religious professionals, perhaps Jn. is also saying that Jesus is the one who makes known the will of God. The incarnate Word brings from the heart of God a revelation both for Jew and for Greek (cf. also Heb. 1:1–2).

2. In Lk.–Acts exēgeomai always means to relate or to tell. Cleopas and his companion relate what happened on the road to Emmaus (Lk. 24:35), and Cornelius relates his vision to his servants (Acts 10:8). In the remaining three passages in Acts people relate what God has done (15:12, 14), sometimes in great detail (21:19).

3. diēgeomai occurs 8x in the NT, meaning to tell, describe, or declare. Witnesses tell what happened to a demoniac (Mk. 5:16); the apostles tell Jesus what they have done (Lk. 9:10; cf. Mk. 9:9; Acts 9:27; 12:17; Heb. 11:32). The demoniac who is cured must declare how much God has done for him (Lk. 8:39). Once (Acts 8:33) the word occurs in a quotation of the LXX of Isa. 53:8 to mean declare or describe.

4. The noun diēgēsis is used in the sense of narrative or account in the much-discussed prologue of Lk. (1:1). Lk. has "many" predecessors whose work he describes as attempts "to draw up an account" of the words and deeds of Jesus. Many see this verse as a comment on the origins of the Gospels. Most have argued that Lk.'s predecessors are Mk. and Q, but to limit it to these two can hardly be an adequate interpretation of the word "many." When all is said and done, however, what Lk. says here about the sources for his Gospel remains a mystery.

2020 ἐξορκιστής

ἐξορκιστής (exorkistēs), exorcist (2020); ἐξορκίζω (exorkizō), charge under oath, exorcise (2019).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk., exorkizō occurs infrequently and often means the same as exorkoō, bind someone by oath, administer an oath. But the vb. can also mean to exorcise an evil spirit.

2. exorkizō is found in the LXX only at Gen. 24:3 and 1 Ki. 22:16, where it means to swear, curse. In neither of these is there any question of exorcism. The only example of what can be termed exorcism in the OT is that of Saul, when he was afflicted by "an evil spirit from the LORD" (1 Sam. 16:14). Yahweh permitted some spirit to afflict Saul, which was temporarily exorcised by David's playing of the harp.

NT 1. This word group is rare in the NT. exorkistēs occurs only at Acts 19:13, where it means one who drives out an evil spirit, and exorkizō only at Matt. 26:63, where it means to adjure, implore. In the NT the usual vb. for driving out spirits (→ daimonion, demon, 1228) is ekballō, to cast out (→ 1675). But the phenomenon of exorcism was much more widespread in the ancient world than the infrequent use of this noun and vb. suggest. This article deals with exorcism in the general sense of any form of such expulsion.

2. (a) During Jesus' ministry some afflicted people had symptoms different from ordinary human diseases. The NT refers to them as under the influence of one or more evil spirits. If we wish to regard some of these situations as what we call today mentally ill (e.g., schizophrenics), we still have the difficulty of understanding their immediate cure by a word of command in a way unmatched by modern psychotherapists. Some demon-possessed people, it is true, manifested recognizable illnesses and disabilities such as epilepsy (Matt. 17:14–18; Mk. 9:14–26; Lk. 9:37–43), and deafness and dumbness (Mk. 9:17, 25; cf. also Matt. 9:32–33; Lk. 11:14).

Present-day descriptions of illness are mainly descriptions of symptoms. Demon possession is the description of a cause. In such cases a person's psyche is affected not simply by some past event, but by the influence of an evil spirit. Nothing is said of how a spirit gains control in the first place, but possession reoccurs when the personality is merely cleaned up without being renewed and occupied by God's Spirit (Matt. 12:44–45; Lk. 11:25–26). This puts some responsibility for healing on the person.

A clear indication of demon-possession is what the spirits say when face to face with Jesus, calling him "the Holy One of God" (Mk. 1:24), "the Son of God" (3:11), "Son of the Most High God" (5:7). Yet Jesus exorcised them and refused to accept their testimony as legitimate preaching of the gospel (1:34; 3:11–12).

(b) The spirits who possess people belong to Satan's kingdom (Matt. 12:26–27) and consequently face ultimate destruction (Mk. 1:24) in the abyss (Lk. 8:31; cf. Matt. 8:29). There are grades of possessing spirits. Jesus, for example, spoke of one kind that needed intensive prayer before it could be cast out (Mk. 9:29). The argument about casting out by Beelzebub turns on the superiority of one spirit (i.e., the Holy Spirit) over another (Matt. 12:23–32; → diabolos, devil, 1333).

3. (a) Jesus commands with absolute authority an evil spirit to come out directly (Lk. 4:36). His power is "the finger of God" (11:20) or "the Spirit of God" (Matt. 12:28). The word of command is "come out" (Mk. 1:25), with the addition once of "never enter . . . again" (9:25), or simply "Go" (Matt. 8:32). The disciples were given authority to cast out in the name of Jesus (Lk. 10:17; Acts 16:18; cf. Matt. 7:22; Acts 19:13).

(b) Mary Magdalene is named with other women as "cured of evil spirits and diseases" (Lk. 8:2). Seven demons are said to have come out of Mary. An unusual factor in the exorcism of the Canaanite woman's daughter (Matt. 15:21–28; Mk. 7:24–30) is that she was freed at a distance without any audible command. The only other distant exorcism, though of a different kind, occurred when handkerchiefs were taken from Paul and applied to the sufferers (Acts 19:12). A demon-possessed girl followed Paul and Silas, declaring that they were preachers of God's salvation; Paul cast out the spirit (16:16–18).

(c) When exorcisms took place, there was sometimes a final show of violence (Mk. 1:26; 9:26) or defiance if the spirit refused to come out (Acts 19:16). Once exorcised, the spirit was like a traveler in a barren land, still looking for the relief of repossessing a victim (Matt. 12:43–45; Lk. 11:24–26). It is not easy to understand the exorcism in Matt. 8:28–34; Mk. 5:1–17; Lk. 8:26–37. The "Legion" of demons asked permission to enter a group of pigs, and Jesus allowed this. Did the demons intentionally drown their new hosts, and, if so, what did they expect to gain thereby (cf. Matt. 17:15)? Perhaps there was danger in releasing a host of demons into the crowd.

4. Apart from the Gospels and Acts, there is no other case of exorcism in the NT. Perhaps the gift of distinguishing between spirits (1 Cor. 12:10) refers to exorcists. Deceiving spirits inspired false prophets (1 Jn. 4:1–2) and were to be tested and exposed by what they said of Jesus Christ, but apparently they were not exorcised (cf. 1 Cor. 12:3).

5. In a few places in the NT, exorcisms are referred to that are not based on the name of Jesus. One such may be the unattached exorcist who "was not one of us" (Mk. 9:38; Lk. 9:49), though he may have been a believer who chose not to leave home. Jesus spoke of successful exorcists who at the judgment would be told, "I never knew you" (Matt. 7:22–23). Jesus also admits that certain Jewish exorcists did cast out demons (Matt. 12:27; Lk. 11:19).

The sons of Sceva appear to have had some success as exorkistēs until they used the name of Jesus as a magical formula (Acts 19:13–16). The evil spirit whom these sons were trying to exorcise jumped on them and overpowered them, so that they fled the house naked. It is a tribute to the effectiveness of Christian exorcism that the name of Jesus does occur in early magical formulae.

2026 ἐξουσία

ἐξουσία (exousia), freedom of choice, right, power, authority, ruling power, a bearer of authority (2026); ἐξουσιάζω (exousiazō), have the right or power, exercise authority (2027); κατεξουσιάζω (katexousiazō), exercise authority over, tyrannize (2980); ἔξεστι (exesti), 3d pers. sing. of ἔξειμι (exeimi), used impers. in the sense: it is permitted, possible, proper, or even lawful (2003).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk., exousia (derived from exesti) denotes unrestricted possibility or freedom of action; hence power, authority, right of action. From the noun comes exousiazō, to exercise one's rights, have full power of authority; and katexousiazō, an infrequent word meaning exercise, or misuse, of the authority of one's office.

(a) By contrast with dynamis, where strength is based on inherent physical, spiritual, or natural powers and is exhibited in powerful deeds and natural phenomena, exousia denotes the power that may be displayed in the areas of legal, political, social, or moral affairs. For instance, it refers to the right of a king, a father, or a tenant to dispose as he wishes, or to the authorization of officials or messengers. The word is thus used only of people; it cannot be applied to natural forces.

(b) exousia does not necessarily require enforcement; it can simply rest or even be delegated to someone else. When it is illegally seized, it denotes despotic rule. In further derived meanings, it can denote the office appropriate for the authority and (in the pl.) office-holders and "the authorities."

2. In the LXX exousia occurs somewhat infrequently (70x); the vb. is also rare. It is most commonly found in the Apocr., with the meaning of permission to do something (Tob. 2:13 S only). The book of Dan. is important as background material for the NT use of the word, where exousia means dominion, power, with reference even to the whole world. The authority of the human world rulers originates from the supernatural realm; it is delegated by God, the Lord of history. He whose rule is eternal (Dan. 4:34) installs and removes kings (cf. 2:21) and can take the dominion away from them all (7:12).

Human government is provisional at best and opposed to God. Therefore, at the end of the times, the "son of man" will be enthroned to symbolize the rule of God's mercies. He will be invested with might, glory, and sovereign authority to rule all nations. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which never passes away (Dan. 7:14). This kingdom will belong to "the saints, the people of the Most High," the true Israel of the last days (7:27). They will receive kingly power, and "all rulers will worship and obey him [the Most High]." The NT sees this passage of Dan. as fulfilled in Jesus as the Messiah.

3. Josephus and Philo follow the general Gk. usage but stress the aspect of authoritative, ruling power. It is a basic premise for Josephus that the power of the world's governments is not gained without God and that no one can escape from his power. In Qumran writings, the powers of the devil and darkness will be destroyed at the end by the kingdom of the archangel Michael and by the Israel he represents (1QM 17:7–8).

NT In the NT exousia appears 102x, most frequently in Lk., 1 Cor., and Rev. It is used in a secular sense meaning power to give orders (Lk. 7:8; 19:17; 20:20), in a concrete sense meaning jurisdiction (23:7), and in the pl. meaning officials, authorities (12:11). In Rom. 13:1, the "authorities" that exist should be understood as state officials, not (as some suggest) angelic powers.

In the NT both exousia and dynamis are related to the work of Christ, the consequent new ordering of cosmic power structures, and the empowering of believers. Both words are brought together in Lk. 9:1. Whereas Jesus' dynamis has its foundation in his being anointed, his exousia is founded on his being sent. exousia is that power, authority, and freedom of action that belong to God himself, to a commission in the last days, and to Christians in their eschatological existence.

1. God's exousia. (a) God's authority is linked with his role as the one who controls world history and is Judge of the world. By his own authority, he has fixed the dates and times of the end (Acts 1:7). He has the power to consign people to eternal ruin (Lk. 12:5). The absolute freedom of God finds its expression in his predestination: Paul compares God with a potter, who can do what he likes with the clay (Rom. 9:21; cf. Isa. 29:16; 45:9; Jer. 18:6; Wis. 15:7).

(b) God can delegate this authority, as he did to the angel who punishes at the judgment (Rev. 6:8; cf. also 9:3, 10, 19). By way of contrast, the heavenly powers (exousiai) are scarcely taken into consideration in this eschatological event. They are generally mentioned along with the archai (→ archē, 794) and have the same significance as the dynameis (Eph. 1:21; 3:10; Col. 1:16; 2:10; → dynamis, 1539). Because of Christ's exaltation, they have been subjected to him (Eph. 1:21; 1 Pet. 3:22).

But the opposition has not yet been completely broken; this means that the Messiah's rule must continue for the time being (1 Cor. 15:24). The natural self stands under the domination of darkness and the lordship of the devil (Acts 26:18; Col. 1:13). Satan appears, in fact, to have increased power; he is called the "prince [ruler] of this world" (Jn. 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), even "the god of this age" (2 Cor. 4:4). The devil, like God, can delegate his rule over the world to others, e.g., to the Antichrist (cf. Rev. 13:2, 4, 12). He even tempted Jesus with such an offer (Lk. 4:6). Nevertheless, the devil's power is allotted him by God; his activity fits into God's plan and is therefore under God's control (22:53). Note how Jesus announces his downfall (Jn. 12:31; 16:11).

2. The exousia of Jesus. (a) The work of the earthly Jesus announces that the devil and the demons have been deprived of their power; the one who has been sent by God has the authority to destroy the devil's works (1 Jn. 3:8) and to snatch people from his rule. Exorcism is therefore attributed to the authority of Jesus (Lk. 4:36), which he can also pass on to his sent-out disciples (Matt. 10:1; Mk. 3:15; 6:7; Lk. 9:1; 10:19). Jesus acted with God's authority when he forgave a man his sins and confirmed the power of his word by a healing miracle (Matt. 9:2–8; Mk. 2:3–12; Lk. 5:18–26).

Jesus' commission from God to save people brought him into collision with the law as the Pharisees understood it. Jesus rejected the literalistic understanding of the letter of the law (Matt. 12:10, 12; Mk. 3:4; Lk. 14:3; Jn. 5:10). His authority could be seen in his teaching, which provoked astonishment (Matt. 7:29; Mk. 1:22, 27; Lk. 4:32), because he did not teach as the Jewish teachers did. The latter were guided by tradition (Matt. 7:29), whereas Jesus, the anointed one, not only received his words from God's mouth but also spoke with the unique authority of the Son, who alone knows the Father and who alone can reveal him (Matt. 11:27; Lk. 10:22; cf. Jn. 3:35; 10:15; 13:3; 17:25). The cleansing of the temple (Matt. 21:12–13; Mk. 11:15–17; Lk. 19:45–46; Jn. 2:13–17) also presupposes a consciousness of messianic authority.

(b) In Jn.'s Gospel, Jesus' authority is based on the fact that he is the Son and that he has been sent (cf. Jn. 17:2); he has also been given the authority to judge at the end of time (5:27). But as in the Synoptics, Jesus seeks to save people rather than to judge them (3:17). His power is not forcible domination, but absolute freedom to be a servant to the world. He has the exousia to give his life and to take it again (10:18). Jesus' sacrifice opens the way for believers to come to the Father (3:16; 14:6). Those who receive him and believe in his name are given exousia to become children of God (1:12).

(c) As a result of Jesus' resurrection, he received all power in heaven and on earth (Matt. 28:18). This fulfilled Dan.'s vision of the enthronement and granting of power to the Son of Man (cf. Dan. 7:14). But now, in place of the collective "saints of the Most High" (7:27) stands Christ. Further, God's power is not realized by violently subjugating the nations but by spreading the gospel, winning the world to faith in Christ. Hence it is the church, not Israel, that outwardly expresses the reign of the Messiah on earth (Acts 1:6–8). The disarming of the evil one through the cross and the exaltation of Christ must be preached as good news to all the world. The exalted Lord thus sends out his messengers and empowers them for service in the gospel (Matt. 28:18–20).

Analogous with Jesus' earthly ministry and in accord with the contents of the Easter message, Christ's apostles received power to confer the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:19; 19:6; but cf. 2:38; 10:44–48) and to build up rather than to destroy (2 Cor. 10:8; 13:10). Because of his spiritual ministry as a servant in the church, an apostle has "the right" (exousia) to have his physical needs looked after by the church (1 Cor. 9:4–6; 2 Thess. 3:9).

3. The exousia of believers. The authority of a Christian believer is founded on the rule of Christ and on the disarming of all powers. It implies both freedom and service. Christians are free to do anything (1 Cor. 6:12; 10:23) because the law, as a prohibitive barrier, has been broken down through Christ's redeeming act and because we have received the Spirit of freedom (2 Cor. 3:17). Nothing is any longer under the rule of the powers. In practice, however, this theoretically unrestricted freedom is governed by what is helpful to other Christians and to the congregation as a whole. Since God's work of complete redemption has not yet been consummated, believers must be sensitive to and take into account both their own Christian lives, still linked with the sinful nature and the old self, and the consciences of weaker believers (1 Cor. 10:28, 31–33), and not plunge into unbridled freedom as if the resurrection has already taken place (2 Thess. 2:1–2).

It is just such an unrestrained use of one's freedom that can precipitate a Christian into a new servitude. Hence we must not let anything be our master. "'Everything is permissible [exestin] for me'—but not everything is beneficial. 'Everything is permissible [exestin] for me'—but I will not be mastered [from exousiazō] by anything" (1 Cor. 6:12; cf. 10:23–24). While there may be truth in these slogans from the libertines at Corinth, Paul insists that it is not the whole truth. It is all too possible to use our freedom to "be burdened again by a yoke of slavery" (Gal. 5:1; → eleutheria, 1800).

ἑορτή (heortē), festival, feast (2038); ἑορτάζω (heortazō), celebrate a festival (2037).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. since the time of Homer, heortē has denoted a festival. The Gks. celebrated festivals during the change of the seasons and the high points of the year's work from seedtime to harvest (fertility festivals), also for family events and the relationship between the individual and the community (family and tribal festivals). These festivities were almost always associated with certain deities and named after them. In addition to local festivals, there was an increasing number that were general throughout Greece. Later important political events were also given festivals (memorial feasts), e.g., the battle of Marathon and the victory of Salamis.

Processes that were natural in origin were often exaggerated to excess in festivals, such as immoderate indulgence in wine-drinking and love. Preparation for such feasts included fasting, washings, and changes of clothing. The festival itself was celebrated with prayer and song, music and dancing, processions, sacrifice, sport, games, and competitions. Hostilities were usually interrupted during a festival. Gods appeared and entertained or were entertained by their worshipers. In the end all festivals were variations of a fertility religion, which sought by magical means to further conception, growth, and life in plants, animals, and human beings.

2. The ancient farming and city culture of Canaan possessed a wealth of religious cults honoring gods such as El, Dagon, and Baal, goddesses such as Asherah, and later Egyptian and Babylonian deities. These cults were full of fertility rites, which attributed to sexual processes a religious potency. The constant temptation of Israel arising from fascination with these cults is clear, particularly in 1 and 2 Ki. On the whole, however, Israel, unlike Greece, withstood the temptation.

Israel had regular festivals, based on an agricultural economy. These are outlined in the Pentateuch (e.g., Lev. 23; Num. 28:9–29:39; Deut. 16:1–17). Every seven days brought the Sabbath, a day on which important decisions and work were avoided. In the spring the Israelites celebrated the Passover (→ pascha, 4247) and the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which celebrated Israel's exodus from Egypt. During this time the first agricultural festival, that of Firstfruits (the beginning of the wheat harvest), was also celebrated. The end of the wheat harvest saw the Feast of Weeks (which eventually also commemorated the making of the covenant and the giving of the commandments on Mount Sinai), and the Feast of Tabernacles was held at the end of the wine harvest (commemorating also Israel's journey through the desert).

Sabbaths and the feasts of pilgrimage were celebrated "to the LORD" (cf. Exod. 16:23, 25). The prophets sought to prevent Israel from relapsing into mere ritualism and heathenism in its feasts. By threatening (Amos 8:10; Mal. 2:3) and scolding (Amos 5:21; Isa. 1:13–14), they aimed to make room for God's commandments and their fulfillment along with and indeed within the sacrificial rites. Whenever it became impossible for the people to carry on the sacrifices God had ordained, the Sabbath became the most important festival for Israel, representing both a witness to outsiders and a sign of the covenant (cf. Exod. 31:12–18).

3. There were also individual and family celebrations (circumcision, marriage, and burial), national ones (accession and victory celebrations), local festivals, and occasions like a festival of sheep-shearing. In addition to Sabbath days, importance was attached to celebrating the new moon, when a day of rest was kept and special sacrifices were offered. Two further important religious festivals were held in the autumn: the New Year (Rosh Hashanah) on the first day and the Day of Atonement on the tenth day of the month Tishri (Lev. 23:26–32; Num. 29:1–11). After the exile arose the festival of Purim, associated with the book of Est. The Apocr. tells of the desecration of the feasts and the temple (1 Macc. 1:39, 45; 2 Macc. 6:6–7), the reconsecration of the temple, and the establishment of the Feast of Hanukkah (Dedication), to commemorate this event (1 Macc. 4:36–41; 2 Macc. 10:1–8).

Because different groups followed somewhat different calendars (e.g., lunar calendar vs. solar calendar), there were often slight variations on when certain festivals were celebrated.

NT 1. In the early Christian church the propriety of celebrating the festivals together with the whole of the Jewish people was never questioned. Jesus and Paul went regularly to the synagogues on the Sabbath in order to pray, read, or teach (cf. Mk. 1:21; Lk. 4:16; Acts 16:13), and the disciples and the churches took part in the pilgrim festivals. It is thus not surprising that allusions to the Jewish festival calendar find their way into the NT (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:7–8; Gal. 5:9; Col. 2:16–17). Pagans who had to give up their form of festival celebrations in order to become Christians could be taken along to the widely known Jewish festivals, whose historical background was in agreement with the spiritual and moral values that pervaded them.

2. What is tacitly assumed in the Synoptics becomes a main theme in Jn.'s Gospel: Jesus is not merely a Jew among Jews; rather, he represents the true Israel. Therefore, he demonstrates in his life, suffering, and death the proper festal celebration. Through him the meaning of the traditional festivals returns with a new, final significance and is offered afresh to the Jews in this renewed form. Weaving into his Gospel the fabric of the recurring festivals of Israel, Jn. presents Jesus' discourses on the true meaning of these festivals with himself as the center. It is significant that 17 of 25x the word heortē occurs in the NT are found in this Gospel.

John makes references to three Passover celebrations. (a) The Passover at the beginning of his Gospel, with its record of the cleansing of the temple (2:12–22), sounds a note of messianic hope. At Passover time multitudes of people thronged together, seeking bringers of salvation, messiahs. (b) In the second Passover (Jn. 6) the bread motif is emphasized: The bread of slavery becomes the bread of freedom. This chapter is an exposition on the words "bread" and "flesh." The Christian sacrament of the Lord's Supper is a substitute for the Passover sacrifice. (c) In the account of the third Passover (Jn. 12ff.) the messianic motif is again stressed, though in contrast to his attitude at the feast of the previous year Jesus now accepts the acclamation of the people (12:12–15; cf. 6:15). His ceremonial entry into Jerusalem occurs on the very day on which the Passover lambs were selected to be slaughtered, the day before the evening of the festival.

Thus the entire Gospel of Jn. points with unmistakable symbolism to the fact that Jesus is in truth the Lamb of God, who will be sacrificed for Israel. He dies on the day and at the hour when Israel kills the lambs, and (in contrast to those crucified with him, but like the Passover Lamb, cf. Exod. 12:46) no bone of his body is broken (Jn. 19:31–36; cf. also 1:29–36; 1 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:19; Rev. 5:6, 9, 12). This lamb symbolism in Jn. 12 and 19 forms a setting for the Passion discourses of chaps. 14–16.

Other festivals are mentioned in the Gospel of John as well. Most likely the "feast of the Jews" in 5:1 refers to the Feast of Tabernacles. The next year's Feast of Tabernacles is mentioned in 7:2. Later that same year, Jesus was present in the temple for the Feast of Dedication (10:22–29; cf. 1 Macc. 4:36–59).

3. In spite of the fact that the Christian festivals were rooted in Jewish tradition, differences and conflicts soon appeared. Paul writes severely against feast days that imply recognition of astral and other natural powers instead of the one God (Gal. 4:8–11; Col. 2:8–17; cf. Rom. 14:5–8). Moreover, for the apostle the significance of all feasts, whether Jewish or pagan, has been superseded by Christ. He does not reject celebrations as such, but he does require celebration of the right kind.

A similar situation is found in the Sabbath controversy of the Gospels. Jesus took part in the debates of the Jewish schools of thought on the question of rightly keeping the Sabbath. Jesus was criticized by those who held stricter views, but in answer he justified his actions on biblical grounds in the manner of his times (cf. Matt. 12:1–12 par.).

4. Along with the general adoption of the Jewish festivals by the early Christian communities, special Christian festivals began to develop, although in the NT we find only a beginning of these. In addition to the Sabbath services, Christians had special gatherings on the first day of the week in memory of the redemption brought about by the resurrection of the Lord (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2). Toward the end of the 1st cent. this day came to be called the "Lord's day" (Rev. 1:10). The fact that the two days (seventh and first) followed one another soon led to a conscious contrasting of the two (Ign. Magn. 9:1; Barn. 15:9; Did. 14:1). In the following centuries, when the days of the week came generally to be given the names of the ancient pagan planet gods, the name "Lord's day" was changed to "Sunday," which earned for the Christians the accusation that they were sun worshipers.

It was not until the end of the 2d cent. that Passover became the Christian Easter, and one hundred years later still that the Feast of Weeks became the Christian Pentecost. In the 4th cent., Ascension Day was introduced between these two special days as a purely Christian festival. The last of the great Christian festivals to appear was Christmas, around A.D. 335 in Rome. Of the many dates suggested, December 25 prevailed, perhaps celebrated in opposition to a sun cult festival around the time of the winter solstice. It is noteworthy that the date is not far removed from that of the Jewish Hanukkah festival. Both were in part known as a festival of lights.

Christians in every age have celebrated festivals, for such celebrations draw attention to historical realities. They have their basis in an appreciation of time and the refusal simply to accept continuous repetition without a break. Like the commandments, the festivals of Israel were also at first accepted without question by Jewish Christians. In the end they had to be forcibly excluded from the Jewish religious community as heretics, since for them Jesus Christ had become increasingly the real meaning of the ancient feasts, and it was through him that they regarded themselves as permanently linked to all Israel.

ἐπαγγελία (epangelia), announcement, promise (2039); ἐπαγγέλλομαι (epangellomai), announce, proclaim, promise, profess (2040); προεπαγγέλλω (proepangellō), announce before, promise before (4600); ἐπάγγελμα (epangelma), announcement, notification, promise (2041).

CL & OT 1. (a) The words in this group are derived from the root angel-, like euangelizō and euangelion (gospel, → 2295). In cl. Gk. they were originally synonymous with other words from the same root (e.g., compounds of angellō, report, 33): epangellomai means to announce, proclaim; epangelia, announcement, report. In the context of state proclamations they denote summoning. In legal usage the noun means notification of a charge. In the mid. the vb. means to announce one's accomplishments or to take up a moral position.

(b) The nearest point of contact to the NT usage of these words is the meaning to announce an intention, offer to do something, promise. It is significant that when they are used in this sense, it is never the gods who promise something to human beings, but only vice versa. In this connection, the word often carries the specific sense of a promise of money. In the Hel. world, epangelia became a technical term for a free-will payment, gift, or endowment.

2. (a) epangelia occurs only 6x in the LXX, though the OT is familiar with the concept of promise and fulfillment. The entire OT is the story of what God said and then did as a result of his promises. In some cases the fulfillment is clearly recorded (e.g., Jos. 23:14: "Not one of all the good promises the LORD your God gave you has failed. Every promise has been fulfilled" [cf. also 21:45]). But generally the fulfillment appears as a partial or token fulfillment, which does not reveal the whole of the divine plan. Hence Israel is compelled in every new situation to reinterpret the old promises and is called to new expectancy by new proclamations of salvation (→ logos, word, 3364).

Basic to the theme of Israel's existence under promise is God's triple promise to Abraham of a land, a great nation, and blessing in Gen. 12:1–3. Gen. develops the promise of the nation through the story of Isaac, the wanderings of Abraham and his descendants, and the covenant theme (Gen. 17). Jer. 31:31–34 records the promise of a new covenant at a time of national collapse, when the whole idea of surviving in the promised land was problematic. The central idea of the new covenant is that of the law written on the heart (cf. also Ezek. 18:1–32; 36:26–38, which couple a new spirit and new heart with national restoration).

The teaching of the prophets consists of promises of judgment and grace, culminating in the promises of the Servant Songs of Isaiah (Isa. 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12). The promises of return from exile and sustenance in calamity of the later chapters of Isa. renew the exodus theme (cf. Exod. 2:24–25; 12:1–42; 15:1–18; Isa. 40:1–31; Hos. 11:1). But as in Gen. 12:3, there is also a theme of blessing that extends beyond Israel, so that Yahweh promises that the servant will be "a light for the Gentiles" (Isa. 49:6). As early as Isa. 2:2–4 and Mic. 4:1–3 there is the prophecy of the nations flowing to the mountain of the house of the Lord so that they may learn the ways of Yahweh in peace and righteousness.

(b) The OT records various vows made by the righteous. But while the Law and the Prophets demand faithfulness in personal dealings (Exod. 20:15–16; Deut. 27:19; Hos. 4:1–2; Mic. 6:8), human promises are ultimately secondary to God's promises. He alone can both promise and fulfill, for he alone knows and overrules the future.

(c) Jewish writers in the Gk. language adopt Hel. usage. Thus they use epangellomai in the ordinary sense of promise (e.g., money, 1 Macc. 11:28). But they also prepare the way for Paul's use of epangelia for God's activity. In 3 Macc. 2:10 God promises to answer prayer.

(d) With the appearance of apocalyptic lit., interest is strongly attracted to the world to come (e.g., 2 Esd. 7:119). At the same time assurance of salvation is considerably dampened by the doctrine that crucial to being eternally saved is strict observance of the law.

NT 1. (a) epangellomai, to promise, is found 15x in the NT, but only 4x is it used of human promises (Mk. 14:11; 1 Tim. 2:10; 6:21; 2 Pet. 2:19). Most occurrences are in Paul's letters, Heb., and Jas.

(b) proepangellō means to announce beforehand, promise beforehand. It occurs 2x in the NT: In Rom. 1:2 Paul refers to the gospel of God that he promised beforehand in the old covenant through his prophets; and in 2 Cor. 9:5 Paul speaks of the "generous gift" for the poor in Jerusalem that the Corinthians have promised in advance.

(c) epangelia (52x) is used only once in a secular sense (Acts 23:21); it is used absolutely 33x, most of them in Paul; the sing. form is predominant, but the pl. occurs 11x. As in cl. Gk., epangelia in the NT can refer either to form or to content, though the distinction is not always clear.

(d) epangelma is a synonym of epangelia. It is used only 2x, both in 2 Pet. Peter is trying to stir up hope for Christ's return at a time when it is flagging, and he stresses God's promised creation of a new heaven and earth (3:13). Since this consummation will bring with it a share in eternal life and a partaking of his divine power, the author calls the promises that point to it "very great and precious" (1:4).

(e) Though these words seldom occur in the Gospels (only Mk. 14:11, which speaks of the promise of money to Judas, and Lk. 24:49, which refers to the promise of the Spirit), the Gospels frequently reflect on the continuity between God's message in the OT and his word now, often using the vb. plēroō (fulfill, 4444). Note, for example, Lk. 4:21: "Today this scripture [Isa. 61:1–2] is fulfilled in your hearing." Thus in spite of the absence of the term epangelia, the Gospels (esp. Matt.) deal extensively with promise and fulfillment.

2. (a) In Lk.–Acts, the giver of the promise is God alone (Acts 7:5)—"the God of glory" (7:2) or the "Father" (Lk. 24:49; Acts 1:4). The promise provides insight into his plan of salvation and carries with it the future realization of that plan, so that its fulfillment is a creative act (Acts 13:32–33).

(b) The recipients of the promise are "our fathers" (Acts 13:32), esp. Abraham (7:17), Israel as the covenant people (13:23), Jesus' disciples (Lk. 24:49; Acts 1:4), the hearers of Peter's sermon at Pentecost with their children, and those living far away from Jerusalem (2:38–39). It is through Israel that the Gentiles first hear the promise.

(c) The content of the promise is the historical sending of Jesus as Savior (Acts 13:23, 32–33; 26:6). Because he, the crucified and risen one, has earned the forgiveness of sins, all who turn to him in faith and are baptized in his name receive the Holy Spirit, the promised gift of God in the last days (2:38–40).

(d) By being fulfilled, the promise becomes the good news, the gospel (euangelion, → 2295). Acts 13:32 uses the vb. euangelizō, to bring good news, to describe Paul's testimony to the fulfillment of the promise.

3. Paul is the one who gives the most emphatic testimony that the epangelia is a gift of God's free grace. God alone has the absolute power to fulfill his word of promise (Rom. 4:21). He is the God "who gives life to the dead and calls things that are not as though they were" (4:17); he is the God "who does not lie" (Tit. 1:2).

(a) In his struggle against mixing the gospel with Jewish legalism, Paul thought through the question of the relation between God's law and his promises, his demands and his bountiful grace. In answer to the Jewish theory that humanity can enjoy the promised salvation only on the basis of prior fulfillment of all the duties required by the law, Paul set out in antithetical form three basic insights afforded by the gospel. (i) It is not the law that makes us recipients of the word of promise and its fulfillment, but justifying grace (Rom. 4:13). Since the law cannot enable a person to do God's will, the law and the promise are in reality opposites (Gal. 3:18, 21–22).

(ii) Law and promise can neither limit nor supplement one another, since the law demands works, whereas faith is not a human work or a legalistic achievement. If those who make the law into a way of salvation were able by doing so to become "heirs," then faith would be null and the promise void (Rom. 4:14).

(iii) The example of Abraham shows that the law cannot be a condition for the reception of the promise or for salvation. The promise given to him is the characteristic pattern of all other promises. It was given centuries before the revelation of the Mosaic law, and the law must not be interpreted as an added clause by means of which God invalidates his promises, as a human being might add a clause to a will. Thus Paul uses the picture of a diathēkē, will, covenant, in Gal. 3:15–18, to emphasize the irrevocability of God's promises.

(b) For Paul it is fundamental that all God's promises have been given his "Yes" in Christ (2 Cor. 1:20). The sending of Jesus and all he did is God's active ratification of all his promises of salvation. Christ's ministry to Israel demonstrated God's truthfulness and took place in order to confirm the promise given to the patriarchs (Rom.

15:8). By dying in our place under the curse with which the law threatens every transgressor, he prepared the way for the sending of the Holy Spirit. He died "in order that the blessing given to Abraham might come to the Gentiles through Christ Jesus, so that by faith we might receive the promise of the Spirit" (Gal. 3:14). Strictly speaking, the Holy Spirit is here spoken of as the promised gift of salvation (cf. Eph. 1:13–14). In view of the close association of the Holy Spirit with eternal life, it is not surprising that in Tit. 1:2 "eternal life" is mentioned as the substances of the promise.

(c) Historically, Israel was the first to receive the promise, while the Gentiles stood outside it (Eph. 2:12). In Gal. 3:16 Paul interprets the "seed" of Abraham in the sing. as referring to one individual, Christ. He is the universal heir, whereas believers are "co-heirs with Christ" (Rom. 8:17). But since it is not physical descent from Abraham but faith in Jesus Christ that makes us entitled to the inheritance, believers from among the Gentiles are also "heirs together with Israel . . . and sharers together in the promise in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 3:6).

4. (a) In the book of Heb., the question of the relation of law to promise plays no part; faith itself is in danger. Doubt is expressed as to whether the promises will be fulfilled at all. The purpose of the letter is therefore to call its readers to hold fast to the promises and to testify to God's faithfulness to his word.

(b) The writer has in mind "a great cloud of witnesses" (12:1) who have testified to their faith both by divine intervention in their lives and by personal steadfastness. These saints lived out their lives on the basis of the divine promises. The author mentions specific men and women of faith in the early history of Israel—such as Abraham (6:12–20; 7:6; 11:8–19), Isaac (11:20), Jacob (11:21), and Rahab (11:31)—who experienced the promised help of God. In 4:1–9 the example of Israel in the desert stresses that unbelief makes fulfillment of the promises impossible (cf. Ps. 95:11).

(c) The content of the promises mentioned in Heb. is the blessing of many descendants (6:14), rest (4:9–11), and the new covenant (8:1–10:18), which on the basis of the remission of sins holds out the prospect of "the promised eternal inheritance" (9:15). At the same time Heb. emphasizes that in the old covenant the promises neither were nor could be completely fulfilled. In the final analysis they are interpreted in terms of the gospel and therefore refer to complete salvation in Christ (cf. 4:2). Thus the writer declares in 11:39 that the whole cloud of witnesses who came before Christ did not receive "what had been promised." For this reason he ascribes to the patriarchs an understanding of the promise that looks far beyond historical foreshadowing and partial fulfillments to an eternal consummation (11:10–16).

The author uses the keyword kreittōn, better (12x), to describe the superiority of the new covenant to the old. Christ is the mediator of a superior covenant, "founded on better promises" (8:6). Jeremiah's promise of a new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34) is cited twice, indicating that by the better promises we should understand full forgiveness, deep knowledge of God, and a Spirit-worked obedience to his commandments (Heb. 8:8–12; 10:16–17). The content of the promises also includes all the other aspects of eternal salvation, such as the unshakeable kingdom (12:28), the future city (13:14), and the Sabbath rest for the people of God (4:9).

The new covenant has been brought into operation by the death of Jesus. This means that the fulfillment of the promises is drawing steadily nearer: "You see the Day approaching" (10:25; cf. 10:37). It is thus all the more necessary to remain steadfast, not to cast away one's confidence, and to "hold unswervingly to the hope we profess, for he who promised is faithful" (10:23; cf. 6:11–12). After all, God swore to these promises with an oath (6:13).

ἐπί (epi), on, at (2093).

CL Basically denoting position on something that forms a support or foundation, epi is the opposite of hypo (under, → 5679) and differs from hyper (above, → 5642) in implying actual rest on some object. In this primary local sense of on, upon, epi is followed by the gen., the dat., or the acc., often without distinction in meaning.

NT 1. epi has a versatility of use matched only by en. From the simple spatial meaning of epi there naturally developed a multitude of derived senses, so that it may express addition (Lk. 3:20; 2 Cor. 7:13), superintendence (Rom. 9:5), cause or basis (Acts 3:16; 1 Tim. 5:19), circumstance (Rom. 8:20; 1 Cor. 9:10), and purpose or destination (Gal. 5:13; Eph. 2:10). Of special interest is the use of epi (with the acc.) to denote the recipients of various spiritual blessings or experiences, such as a trance (Acts 10:10), the word of God (Lk. 3:2), the kingdom of God (Matt. 12:28), the Holy Spirit (Acts 10:45; Tit. 3:6), the power of Christ (2 Cor. 12:9), or the grace of God (Lk. 2:40).

2. epi to auto. In the LXX this prep. phrase means "together" or "at the same place" (e.g., 2 Sam. 2:13; Ps. 2:2; 34:3). It has the sense of "together" in Acts 4:26 (quoting Ps. 2:2) and Matt. 22:34. In Acts 2:47 the phrase seems to be a quasi-technical expression denoting the union of the Christian fellowship. That epi to auto and en ekklēsia are sometimes synonymous, signifying "in church fellowship," seems evident from the parallelism of 1 Cor. 11:18 and 20. The togetherness of the early Christians was expressed principally in their meeting for public worship "in church fellowship" or "in the assembly."

3. Rom. 5:12 has a significant use of epi in the phrase eph' hō. Interpretation of this verse falls into two main groups: that which construes hō as a relative pronoun (whose antecedent is either "death" or "one man"), with epi meaning "in" or "because of"; and that which treats eph' hō as a conjunction, "on the ground of the fact that" or "because." The former is less probable, since elsewhere in Paul (e.g., 2 Cor. 5:4; Phil. 3:12; 4:10), eph' hō is conjunctional, whatever its precise nuance. In light of Paul's linking of Adam and his descendants through his Adam-Christ analogy (cf. Rom. 5:18–19; 1 Cor. 15:22), he probably means that "death spread to all because all sinned" (either actually in Adam's primal transgression or in their federal representative, Adam), or "death spread to all because all [since the time of Adam] have sinned."

Similarly, eph' hō in 2 Cor. 5:4 has a causal sense: We groan in our human tent "because we do not wish to be unclothed but to be clothed with our heavenly dwelling." The origin of that groaning or sighing, i.e., a sense of frustration under the limitations of a flesh-dominated body, is in a yearning (5:2) or wish (5:4) for the acquisition of a spiritual body (cf. 1 Cor. 15:44), which arises because God has given us the Spirit as the pledge of the resurrection transformation (2 Cor. 5:4b, 5).

4. In 1 Pet. 2:24a, two translations have been offered for "on [epi] the tree." Christ bore our sins while his body was located on the cross, and in his body Christ bore our sins upon the cross. The second of these is the preferred translation. Note that Peter is probably alluding here to Deut. 21:23, where epi is followed by "tree" in the gen. case. In 1 Pet. 2:24a, however, epi is followed by an acc. This change of case suggests a change in nuance from Deut., from location to means or instrument. If this interpretation is correct, then the vb. "bore" (anapherō, → pherō, bear, 5770) does not mean offer in sacrifice but has the nontechnical sense of "carry up." The picture is not of Christ as a priest and the cross as an altar but of Christ as the sin-bearer (cf. Jn. 1:29) and the cross as the place where sin was destroyed (cf. Col. 2:14–15).

5. After the vb. baptizō (to baptize), there is probably little difference between "in the name of Jesus" with the prep. en (Acts 10:48; → 1877) or epi (2:38). It refers either to the candidate's confession of faith in the name of Jesus (cf. 22:16) or to the administrant's acting on the authority of Christ or his invocation of the name of Jesus during the baptismal rite.

6. With the vb. pisteuō (to believe), epi occurs 5x with the dat. case (4x with a pers. obj.: Rom. 9:33; 10:11; 1 Pet. 2:6 [all quoting Isa. 28:16]; 1 Tim. 1:16; once with an impers. obj., Lk. 24:25). When used with a pers. obj. epi denotes placing reliance on a person who affords a firm support or a solid foundation. epi also occurs 7x with the acc. case after pisteuō (Matt. 27:42; Acts 9:42; 11:17; 16:31; 22:19; Rom. 4:5, 24; cf. Wis. 12:2) and once after pistis (faith, Heb. 6:1; → 4411). The meaning in these verses seems to be the notion of turning away from former objects of devotion that brought disappointment to a new personal object of faith in whom one has confidence.

ἐπιθυμία (epithymia), desire, lust (2123); ἐπιθυμέω (epithymeō), desire, want (2121); ἐποθέω (epipotheō), long for, crave, desire (2160); ἐπιπόθησις (epipothēsis), longing (2161); ἐπιπόθητος (epipothētos), long for (2162); ἐποθία (epipothia), longing (2163).

CL & OT From the basic meaning of being excited about something (cf. thymos, urge, passion), epithymia and epithymeō in cl. Gk. meant to have an impulse, desire. epithymia developed ethically bad connotations because, like the other three passions (fear, pleasure, and sorrow), desire results from a false evaluation of the possessions and evils of this life.

In the LXX each word occurs about 50x. Both are used for human aspirations in general, such as a morally indifferent desire (Deut. 12:20–21), a praiseworthy desire (Gen. 31:30; Isa. 58:2), and an evil desire (Num. 11:4; 11:34; Deut. 9:22). If the tenth commandment (Exod. 20:17) forbids covetous desire, it is because God wants from us not merely obedience in acts but also in words, thoughts, and even wishes. He desires love from the whole heart (Deut. 6:5).

NT 1. epithymia occurs 38x and epithymeō 16x (mostly in Lk. and Paul's letters). The noun has a neutral or good sense only in Lk. 22:15; Phil. 1:23; 1 Thess. 2:17; perhaps Rev. 18:14. Often the vb. is used in a good sense; only in Paul and Matt. 5:28 does it have a bad connotation. Where the terms are used in a neutral or good sense, they express strong desire (cf. Matt. 13:17; Lk. 15:16; Phil. 1:23; 1 Thess. 2:17; Heb. 6:11).

2. Theologically, those passages are more important where epithymia is used in a bad sense of evil desire or lust. (a) In Matt. 5:28 epithymeō refers to sexual desire and lust; in Mk. 4:19 epithymia is used of the desire for all kinds of other goods and values of this world, such as riches. It is clear from both passages that Jesus considered epithymia a sin with a highly destructive power. It chokes the word (Mk. 4:19) and can break a marriage (Matt. 5:28). For Jesus, evil desires, just like evil deeds, flow out of and betray an evil heart that has separated itself from God.

(b) Paul sees epithymia as an expression of sin that rules a person. Its driving power is sarx, the sinful human nature that has turned from God (cf. Eph. 2:3). epithymia seeks gratification (Gal. 5:16) and urges us to act. When all is said and done, it expresses a deeply rooted tendency to find the focus of one's life in oneself and to trust oneself. The power of the "old self" (Eph. 4:22) is seen in epithymia.

Desires can find their expression in every direction: sexual desire, material enjoyment, or coveting another's possessions (cf. Rom. 1:24; Gal. 5:16–21; 1 Tim. 6:9; Tit. 3:3). Desires can enslave us. Those who allow themselves to be driven by desires are under the reign of sin (Rom. 6:12; Eph. 2:3; 2 Tim. 3:6; Tit. 3:3). When we become slaves of such allurements and temptations (Eph. 4:22), the heart comes under their control. Only a life turned to God's will, subject to him, and determined by him presents the opposite picture (Rom. 6:12–14; Eph. 4:22–24; Tit. 2:12–14).

Since there is something primitive and instinctive in human desire, Paul maintains that it is recognized as what it really is when the law speaks to it (as in the command, "Do not covet"). This command causes desire to become conscious sin (Rom. 7:7–8), which flagrantly contradicts God's law. God's answer to human desire is the Spirit. Those who walk by the Spirit have the power to resist desire (Gal. 5:16; cf. Rom. 8:9–15), because the Spirit replaces sinful desire as the determining power in life (Eph. 4:23).

When Paul speaks of desire and longing in a good sense, he uses epipotheō (cf. Rom. 1:11; 2 Cor. 5:2; 9:14), epipothēsis (2 Cor. 7:7, 11), and epipothia (Rom. 15:23). This word group is used 13x in the NT.

(c) In Johannine writings, the origin of desire is traced to "the world" (1 Jn. 2:16–17) and ultimately comes from the devil (Jn. 8:44; → diabolos, 1333). World here means the sphere of enmity to God and Christ. The devil entices us with "the cravings of sinful man, the lust of his eyes and the boasting of what he has and does" (1 Jn. 2:16), i.e., with allurements that appeal to the senses. He awakens hatred in us and a tendency to lie, for he is "a murderer from the beginning" and "the father of lies" (Jn. 8:44). Since desire originates from the world, it is transient like this world. Those who build their lives on it will "pass away" with it; those who are led by the will of God will abide forever (1 Jn. 2:17).

(d) In the Catholic Letters epithymia is either neutral or shows the same trend as in Paul and John. It represents the sinful nature and its passions (1 Pet. 2:11; 2 Pet. 2:10). It is related to other lusts of the senses in their desire for the material and to drunkenness, carousing (1 Pet. 4:3), and debauchery (2 Pet. 2:18). It is a power that entices and lures us, so as to bring us under its domination (Jas. 1:14; 1 Pet. 1:14; 2 Pet. 2:18). epithymia promises us complete freedom but in reality enslaves us. When that happens, it "gives birth" to sinful action, which makes us guilty before God, and leads to death (Jas. 1:15). We must always be attentive to the dangers of epithymia and turn from it. We can conquer it if we consistently live "for the will of God" (1 Pet. 4:2).

ἐπιλύω (epilyō), explain, interpret, settle, solve (2147); ἐπίλυσις (epilysis), explanation, interpretation (2146).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. epilyō may mean to loose, untie, or release. This meaning does not occur in the NT, but appears again in the 2d cent. A.D. and later. epilysis can mean release from fear. In the papyri the word is used for the "discharge" of an account. Writers of the 1st and 2d centuries A.D. use epilyō or epilyomai to mean explain, interpret, or solve a problem, or perhaps to confute an accusation. The noun epilysis often, but not always, means interpretation, such as of an oracle or a dream. Most often it means the explanation of something obscure, although in the specialized contents of medicine and magic it can mean a change of dressing or a magic spell.

2. epilyō and epilysis occur in Aquila's version of the Gk. OT to mean the interpretation of dreams (Gen. 40:8; 41:8, 12). Josephus uses the vb. in the sense of solving a problem: Solomon grasps the problems set by the Queen of Sheba and solves them quickly. Similarly, Philo describes how the president of the community discusses questions arising from Scripture and solves a problem passage.

NT In the NT the vb. epilyō occurs 2x (Mk. 4:34; Acts 19:39) and the noun epilysis once (2 Pet. 1:20).

1. The broad meaning of epilyō in Mk. 4:34 seems clear: Jesus explained or expounded the parables privately to his disciples. Perhaps the simplest explanation is that epilyō refers to the translation of parabolic speech into straightforward discourse, of which Mk. 4:14–20 furnishes one example. While in the case of the crowd Jesus was mainly concerned with initial response, in the case of the disciples he was also concerned with instruction. Important also in understanding this text may be the concept of "the secret (mystērion, → 3696) of the kingdom of God" in 4:11. Although the crowds do understand that Jesus is talking about the kingdom, his epilysis to the disciples concerns the relation of the kingdom to his own person.

2. In Acts 19:39, epilyō means to solve a problem or settle a dispute. The immediate linguistic context is decisive for this meaning: A question can only be "settled," and a problem can only be "solved." Thus the town clerk of Ephesus tells the citizens that the regular or statutory assembly will "settle" any further question that they raise in regular session (note the meaning in Josephus and Philo).

3. The meaning of epilysis in 2 Pet. 1:20 ("No prophecy of Scripture came about by the prophet's own interpretation") is controversial. The NIV adopts the position of many older commentators by understanding epilysis to refer to the biblical prophet's activity; that is, to what was in his mind as he wrote. The word ginetai (→ 1181) in this verse is thus taken to denote origin ("comes from"). This interpretation anticipates the thought of 1:21 that "prophecy never had its origin in the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit." The difficulty with this interpretation is that it is not in harmony with the ordinary force of epilysis.

Many commentators therefore take epilysis to denote the interpretation of previously written Scripture. But if so, does idias epilyseōs mean "private" in contrast to Spirit-inspired or "private" in contrast to that of the Christian community? If the former, then the passage, together with 3:16, suggests that certain false teachers had been guilty of misusing OT prophecy. Thus Peter is saying that just as the prophets themselves were led by the Spirit (2 Pet. 1:21), so no reader can "interpret" prophecies without the guidance of the Spirit. More likely, however, "private interpretation" should be understood to mean arbitrary exegesis on the basis of personal whim, without reference to others in the Christian community. That is, the author is here condemning arbitrary exegesis of the OT.

epiousios, daily, is linked with artos in the fourth petition of the Lord's Prayer. Apart from this petition it is found only once in a papyrus of the 5th cent. A.D., where its meaning is far from certain. Hence the interpretation of the word has been a matter of controversy from early times, though "daily" is found already in the 2d cent. Four possibilities emerge.

1. The term is derived from hē epiousa hēmera, the next day (cf. Acts 7:26), epiousa being the part. of epeimi, approach. In that case epiousios artos means bread for tomorrow. Matt. 6:34 would seem to contradict this meaning: "Do not worry about tomorrow." But the use of epiousa in Prov. 27:1 shows that the expression does not necessarily mean tomorrow, but can indicate the coming day in general, which could be today. Hence, some translate Matt. 6:11 and Lk. 11:3 "bread for the coming day."

2. Origen suggested we should understand it as arton epi tēn ousian, the bread necessary for existence. Since Origen's mother tongue was Gk., we cannot deny the linguistic possibility of his interpretation (cf. Prov. 30:8). It reminds us of Exod. 16:4, where the Israelites were to gather only so much manna as they needed for the day. Thus, Jesus instructs the disciples to pray daily for the bread needed for life.

3. Some take the first option but reinterpret it in terms of the final consummation. The morrow that Jesus had in mind is not the next day, but the great morning of the final fulfillment, when Jesus with his disciples will eat the bread of life in eternity (Matt. 26:29; Lk. 22:30; Rev. 2:17). Jesus is asking his disciples to pray for this bread. The church fathers similarly linked the fourth petition with the Christ who imparts himself in the Lord's Supper as "the bread of life" (Jn. 6:35). However, although these gifts for salvation may be included in the fourth petition, in the light of Matt. 6:25–34 we cannot doubt that Jesus was thinking first of all of earthly bread.

4. Other scholars believe that Matt. chose the unknown epiousios to bring out a special stress in the Aram. underlying this petition—the presumed word l^{e}yômā^{ʾ}, which had a double meaning that could be expressed in Gk. only by combining two terms: (artos) epiousios (bread) in so far as it is needed for the day, and sēmeron, for today. Thus, this petition is not merely a constant reminder to the disciples of God's fatherly faithfulness, but also that in the new age, which has already begun, prayer for provision for a longer period should no longer concern them.

ἐπίσκοπος (episkopos), overseer, guardian, bishop (2176); ἐπισκέπτομαι (episkeptomai), view, inspect, visit, afflict (2170); ἐπισκοπέω (episkopeō), take care, oversee, care for (2174); ἐπισκοπή (episkopē), visitation, affliction, position or office as an overseer or bishop (2175).

CL & OT 1. This group of words (formed from the root skep- [look] with the prefix epi [at, on]) denotes the activity of looking at or paying attention to a person or thing. It stresses active and responsible care for what is seen. The vb. can mean observe, superintend, watch over, scrutinize. The noun episkopos, overseer, was first used to describe a deity as the one who kept watch over a country or people, esp. over the keeping of treaties and the markets. But the title was also given to those who had a responsible position in the state, such as officials sent from Athens to dependent states to ensure order or to fix their constitutions. The word was later extended to religious communities, where the episkopoi were those responsible for external relationships.

2. (a) In the LXX this word group mostly translates variants of the root pāqad, take care of, look for, investigate, inspect. episkopeō is used only 5x, while episkeptomai is found 150x, of which 49 are in Num.. There the vb. gained the meaning appoint for supervision, commission (cf. the prayer in Num. 27:16).

(b) These words are also used for God's watching over and solicitous care for the land (Deut. 11:12), his elect people (Ruth 1:6; Ps. 80:14; Zeph. 2:7), and individuals (e.g., Sarah, Gen.21:1). It expresses his loyalty to the covenant and his mercy. In the prophets (esp. Jer.) it can mean visit in the sense of afflict or punish (cf. Exod. 32:34), for when God sees sin, he must judge his people to bring them to repentance.

(c) The LXX coined the subst. episkepsis and episkopē to represent p^equddâ or p^eqûdâ, the "number" of men from each tribe who could serve in the army (Num. 1:21, 23, 25, etc.; cf. 1 Chr. 24:3) and the visitation of God in judgment, either in the course of history or in the day of Yahweh (cf. Job 7:18; Jer. 11:23; 23:12).

3. episkopos can mean overseer, officer, governor (2 Chr. 34:12; Neh. 11:9, 14, 22). It is used once of God (Job 20:29). In some cases (e.g., Num. 31:14; Jdg. 9:28) particular persons in a position of authority are episkopoi, but the word can also denote the exercise of power and those who exercise it (e.g., Isa. 60:17). For the various offices in Israel and their relationship to one another, → presbyteros (4565).

NT 1. This word group is markedly less common in the NT than in the LXX. episkopeō is found only in Heb. 12:15 and possibly 1 Pet. 5:2. In the former passage it describes the effort Christians should make to see that they remain in divine grace.

2. episkeptomai occurs 11x (7x in Lk.–Acts; also in Matt. 25:36, 43; Heb. 2:6; Jas. 1:27). (a) This vb. is used in Heb. 2:6 (Ps. 8:4) and often in the Lukan writings for the loving care of God. He has chosen out of all the nations a people for himself (Acts 15:14), whom he has visited in blessing (Lk. 1:78; 7:16) and redeemed (1:68; → lytrōsis, 3391). In Heb. 2:6 the writer expresses his wonder that God should create and care for humankind.

(b) episkeptomai is used in Acts 6:3 for the church's selection of seven men to serve, in 7:23 for Moses' concern for his people, and in 15:36 for Paul's proposal to return to the churches in Asia Minor to care for their converts. In Jas. 1:27, believers show religious service to God by caring for widows and orphans. Note too Jesus' comments in Matt. 25:36, 43: Those who suffer or are in prison represent the Lord himself; the decision we make regarding them indicates our salvation or condemnation.

(c) All these uses stress the same loving care, showing with a heart moved to action. The OT meaning of visitation for punishment is lacking for this word. God's visitation took place once for all on the cross.

3. (a) Earlier uses of episkopos reach their climax in 1 Pet. 2:25, where Jesus as the exalted Christ is described as "the Shepherd (poimēn) and Overseer (episkopos) of your souls." It is no accident that episkopos is here linked with poimēn, for these two thoughts are already connected in the OT (Num. 27:17) and again in the NT (Acts 20:28). Oversight means loving care and concern, a responsibility willingly shouldered; it must never be used for personal aggrandizement. Its meaning is to be seen in Christ's selfless service, which was moved by concern for the salvation of the human race.

(b) It is significant that, as the growing band of disciples became a church, they hesitated to apply the title of episkopos to designate an office. Gk. usage may have had materialistic overtones connected with this word, and OT associations may have been reminiscent of authoritarian oversight. Its application to oversight in the church is to be seen in the context of the application of all Christ's work to the church. In other words, titles of offices in the NT are essentially titles that apply first to Christ.

The need for pastoral oversight to keep the church in the way of faith was originally a duty binding on all members, as it apparently still was in Heb. 12:15. But eventually oversight became the task of a special office. The change is somewhat reflected in Acts 20:28, which focuses on the duties of the hearers to the church. Already the church is a clearly defined group ("flock") over whom the episkopoi watch. No doubt, this title is to be distinguished from that of apostle and prophet, and perhaps too from that of teacher (→ didaskō, 1438), for overseers were linked to a specific place and church. But at first it was probably synonymous at least with that of shepherd (poimēn) and elder (presbyteros) and the ideas associated with them. The use of diakonos (→ diakoneō, 1354) was also not yet fixed.

4. episkopē (overseer) is first used in 1 Tim. 3:1 to designate a defined office to which one could aspire. It is striking how attention here shifts from the duties of the office (as in Acts 20) to the personal qualities needed for it: personal discipline, a well-ordered family, gifts of teaching and personal relationships, and a good name in the non-Christian world. The development of the episcopal office marks the transition from the missionary era of the church with its charismatic gifts to an institution with a permanent character. After the death of the apostles, the expanding church felt a need for a form of church government that would ensure continuity.

ἐπίσταμαι (epistamai), know, understand (2179)

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. epistamai means to know or understand, sometimes to know how to do something. In some writers it denotes being assured of something or even believing. The present part. can refer to someone who is knowing, wise, or skillful (as in war).

2. In the LXX this word refers primarily to what someone knows on the basis of observation or inner awareness, whether that person is God (e.g., Exod. 4:14; Isa. 37:28; Jer. 17:16; Ezek. 11:5) or a human being (Exod. 9:30; Num. 20:14; Job 38:20; Ezek. 28:19). But the word can also refer to specific knowledge that one has received from God (Num. 24:16; Isa. 41:20) or to knowledge of the future that one surmises on the basis of observing the present (Deut. 31:27). In Prov. 9:13 the woman Folly is described as one who does not know.

Jer. 1:5 uses epistamai for the divine foreknowledge of God, that even before the prophet was born, the Lord knew him and planned for him to be a prophet. Jeremiah answers using the same word, "Ah, Sovereign LORD . . . I do not know how to speak; I am only a child" (1:6). The Lord then responds by giving the prophet words in his mouth (1:9). The vb. later becomes important in Jeremiah's message that the priests, who were responsible for the religious leadership of the people, "did not know me [Yahweh]" (2:8). Ezek. on one occasion uses epistamai to refer to knowledge that God alone is aware of (37:3).

NT 1. In general in the NT, epistamai is limited to the knowledge that a person receives by observation or by hearing some information. It is used parallel with oida in Mk. 14:68 and Jude 10. The guild of which Demetrius was leader all knew that they were making a good income from the silver shrines of Artemis that they sold (Acts 19:25). King Agrippa was "familiar with" the events concerning Jesus (26:26), and the citizens of Jerusalem knew that Paul had at one time been an ardent persecutor of Christians (22:19).

2. epistamai can also take on theological nuances in the NT. Abraham launched out in faith when God called him, "even though he did not know where he was going" (Heb. 11:8). By contrast, a person who teaches false doctrines simply in order to make a good living is filled with pride and "understands nothing" about the true teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Tim. 6:4). Jas. uses the vb. to stress that everything we do should be linked with the prayer that it be God's will, for we "do not even know what will happen tomorrow" (4:14).

ἐπιστολή (epistolē), letter (2186); ἐπιστέλλω (epistellō), inform or instruct by letter, write (2182).

CL & OT 1. epistellō means send, announce, order, generally in writing. Hence, what is transmitted (originally a military or administrative order) is called epistolē. With the spread of Hel. culture a whole range of letters developed: private letters of an intimate nature, open letters (e.g., didactic letters of philosophers), and artistic letters (aesthetic treatises in letter form). Traveling philosophers and their pupils often carried letters of recommendation. Gk. letters followed a fixed pattern: the sender (nom.) to the recipient (dat.), greetings (chairein); they usually end with a short farewell greeting.

2. Preexilic letters are only briefly quoted in the OT—usually rulers' letters to other rulers or their subjects. They involve conspiracy (2 Sam. 11:14–15; 1 Ki. 21:9–10; 2 Ki. 10:1–6), mockery (19:10–13), homage (20:12), and prophetic oracle (2 Chr. 21:12–15). Naaman carried a letter of recommendation (2 Ki. 5:6).

A wider range of epistolary lit. appears in later OT writings. Because of the occupation of the land after the exile, political correspondence with the foreign rulers was necessary (cf. Ezr. 4:7–6:12; Add. Est. 13:1–7; 1 Macc. 10:3, 7, 17–20; 11:29–37; 12:5–23; etc.). The Diaspora resulted in religious letters and instructions being sent to those in exile (see Jer. 29:4–23).

NT epistolē occurs 24x in the NT; epistellō 3x. Of the 27 books of the NT, 21 are clearly letters. In addition, epistolary style as a literary form can be found in Lk. 1:3–4; Acts 1:1; 15:23–29; 23:26–30; Rev. 1:10–11.

1. Most early Christian writings took the form of occasional lit. The problems of the missionary churches, which found themselves in constant tension with their political and religious surroundings, needed explanations. Moreover, after a lengthy absence the missionary wanted to remind his converts of his message, to reaffirm it, and to develop it. Moreover, conflict about tradition and doctrine (even heresy) required responses, and there was the increasing need felt for church order. Thus, letters played a decisive role in carrying the young church through a period of outward and inward danger. Eventually these letters were assembled in collections (cf. 2 Pet. 3:16).

2. Paul gave the NT letters their original form. He was not motivated by any stylistic reasons but by his Christian message. The standard Gk. preface (cf. Acts 15:23; 23:26; Jas. 1:1) was expanded: chairein was replaced by an explicit greeting according to the Oriental pattern (e.g., charis hymin, grace be with you). An expanded preface often prepared readers for the contents of the letter (cf. Rom. 1:1–7; Gal. 1:1–5). It was followed by thanksgiving, prayer, and an assurance of remembrance (Rom. 1:8–12; Phil. 1:3–11; 1 Thess. 1:2–10); when necessary, this changed to blame and warning (Gal. 1:6–9). Similarly, the short farewell greeting became a full prayer for blessing. Paul dictated his letters (Rom. 16:22), but often penned the closing sentences himself as a sign of authenticity (1 Cor. 16:21; Gal. 6:11; Phlm. 19).

3. Paul's letters arose from situations in his churches and were written for particular circles of readers (cf. 1 Cor. 16:5–9). They often answered questions raised by the church (esp. 1 Cor.). They are molded throughout by the kerygma and Paul's apostolic office. Hence, they are public, official letters, designed to be read in church services as well as passed on (1 Thess. 5:27) (Philemon is an exception).

epistolē is found only once in a metaphorical sense (2 Cor. 3:2–3), but this instance is of great importance. When one thinks of the technique of dictating a letter at that time—slow writing on rough papyrus with thick ink, while the thought of the one dictating outran the pace of the scribe—the passage suggests the interweaving of two pictures, one derived from what had already been written, the other from what had formed itself in the author's mind.

The former picture, "you yourselves are our letter," refers back to the practice of Paul's enemies just mentioned (traveling prophets claiming to be Christians but propagating their own views). They obtained letters of recommendation from the churches to establish their competence (3:5), so that they might be paid accordingly (2:17). Paul rejected them brusquely. His competence came from God, and that was only for service (3:6). The local church itself in its spiritual and historical existence is his letter of recommendation, composed by the exalted Lord and written with the Spirit of God, with the freedom experienced and lived out under Christ's lordship (3:17). Paul was only the secretary (3:3), through whose help a church had come into existence (5:17).

This introduces the second picture: The letter is "written on our hearts . . . not on tablets of stone, but on tablets of human hearts" (3:2–3). Looking back to Ezek. 11:19 and Jer. 31:31–34, Paul prepares for the theme of the section immediately following: the contrast between the letter (the old covenant apart from the Spirit) and the Spirit (the new covenant in the Spirit). The church's attestation of the new covenant lies in its spiritual existence, in which the gospel of the cross puts an end to all self-glorification and unbridled speculation. In it the Crucified and Exalted One is alone Lord and is awaited as the coming Judge (1 Cor. 2:2; 2 Cor. 5:10, 15).

In other words, 2 Cor. 3:2–3 is concerned with what Calvin called the inner testimony of the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 2:14–16). If one reads the letter, that is, the church, unspiritually, one merely establishes the external fact of its existence. In fighting the fight of faith, the church is deprived of all tangible security and proof. It is a conflict between life and death, salvation and destruction (2 Cor. 2:15–16). Paul's polemic gained its seriousness and its clarity from his realization of this fact.

ἐπιστρέφω (epistrephō), turn, turn around, turn back, be converted (2188); στρέφω (strephō), turn, change (5138); ἀποστρέφω (apostrephō), turn away from (695); ἐπιστροφή (epistrophē), conversion (2189).

CL & OT 1. The three vbs. strephō, apostrephō, and epistrephō were used trans. and intrans.; all share the meaning of turn, turn to, turn oneself around. They describe a largely intentional turning of the body or thoughts to a person or thing. strephō has more the sense of turn over, turn around, transform; epistrephō means turn towards, return, and derivatively be converted (i.e., change one's mind and behavior).

2. Behind epistrephō in the LXX lies the Heb. šûb, which occurs ca. 1050x and means turn around, return (qal); bring back, restore (hiph.). It appears with a theological meaning of be converted, change one's behavior by returning to God ca. 120x.

Conversion in the OT is turning from evil (Jer. 18:8) to the Lord (Mal. 3:7). People can, however, be so permeated by evil (Hos. 5:4) that they resist such turning (2 Chr. 36:13). Note that when people do return, it is because they have first received the heart to do so from God (Jer. 24:7). God uses the prophets to help to bring about conversion (Neh. 9:26; Zech. 1:3–4).

Those who refuse to return to God experience his wrath in drought (Amos 4:6–8), captivity (Hos. 11:5), destruction (1 Ki. 9:6–9), and death (Ezek. 33:9, 11). Those who return to God receive forgiveness (Isa. 55:7), remission of punishment (Jon. 3:9–10), fertility and prosperity (Hos. 14:5–7), and life (Ezek. 33:14–16). The historical books of the OT always call for the return of Israel as a body, but the prophets, esp. Jer. and Ezek., stress the conversion of the individual. They look forward to the new covenant, when God will give a new heart and spirit (Jer. 33:31–34; Ezek. 11:19; 18:31; 36:26–27; 37:14). The conversion of the people as a whole will take place in the messianic age (Deut. 4:30; Hos. 3:5; cf. Mal. 4:5–6).

3. Rab. Jud. accepted this OT tradition. A condition for admittance to the Qumran community was conversion, i.e., turning from all evil and turning to Moses' law. Hel. Jewish circles also knew the concept of religious conversion. Those who turn to Yahweh are forgiven; they do not continue in sin but keep the commandments of God.

NT 1. epistrephō is found 36x in the NT, half of which have its secular meaning of turning, returning, turning away (cf. Matt. 10:13; 2 Pet. 2:22), while the other half have its theological meaning of conversion (cf. Mk. 4:12 par.; Lk. 1:16–17; 22:32; Acts 15:19; 2 Cor. 3:16; Jas. 5:19–20). Unlike the LXX, the vb. is often synonymous with metanoeō. Only in Matt. 18:3 and Jn. 12:40 does strephō have a theological meaning (be converted); likewise apostrephō only in Acts 3:26. The noun epistrophē is found only in 15:3.

2. (a) The call to conversion means a fundamentally new turning of the human will to God, a return home from blindness and error to the Savior of all (Acts 26:18; 1 Pet. 2:25). epistrephō is not concerned primarily with what a person turns from (the old life), but with turning to Christ and through him to God (cf. Jn. 14:1, 6) and so to a new life. Conversion involves a change of lords. One who until then has been under the lordship of Satan (cf. Eph. 2:1–2) comes under the lordship of God; he or she comes out of darkness into light (Acts 26:18; cf. Eph. 5:8).

Conversion and surrender of one's life to God involve faith in Jesus Christ (Acts 11:21) and result in the forgiveness of sins (3:19; 26:18). Conversion leads to a fundamental change of one's entire life (26:20)—a new outlook and new objectives. The converted serve God alone with a clear conscience (14:15; 1 Thess. 1:9; cf. Heb. 9:14).

(b) epistrephō involves a complete transformation (→ morphē, 3671) of one's existence under the influence of the Holy Spirit. The vb. metamelomai, however (→ 3564), expresses the feeling of repentance of sin, which need not involve turning to God. metanoeō (→ 3567) is much closer to epistrephō, though epistrephō has a wider meaning, for it always includes faith.

2202 ἐπιτίθημι

ἐπιτίθημι (epitithēmi), to put on, lay on (2202); ἐπίθεσις (epithesis), laying on (of hands) (2120).

CL & OT 1. This entry deals mainly with the phrase epitithēmi tēn cheira or tas cheiras, to lay the hand or hands on someone or something. Miraculous healings, performed through the laying on of hands, are attributed in Hel. lit. to Asclepius, Zeus, and other gods and wise men. The phrase with the noun, epithesis tōn cheirōn, the laying on of hands, occurs only in Philo and the NT.

2. (a) epitithēmi tas cheiras has two main associations in the LXX. The more frequent use is the one that describes how a sacrificer lays his hand on the head of a sacrificial animal. The meaning of this action is clearly seen in the ritual for the great Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), where the laying on of hands symbolizes the transference of guilt to the scapegoat. To drive out the goat meant to drive out sin itself. In other sacrifices the laying on of hands (often in Lev.) symbolizes Israel's committing to Yahweh their sin and evil and allowing him to destroy it.

(b) Though more rare, the laying on of hands can also be an act of blessing (Gen. 48:18). It is no doubt closely related to the ritual of laying on of hands on the occasion of one's installation to an office (Num. 27:18, 23). This ritual denotes that a particular quality of the one who performs the act passes that to the one on whom hands are laid. The two passages that took on the greatest significance for rab. Jud. were those dealing with Moses' appointment of Joshua as his successor (Num. 27:15–23; Deut. 34:9). In the former, by means of the laying on of hands Moses invested Joshua with his authority; in the latter, his spirit of wisdom. The Jews saw here the model and origin of their own ordination practice, which they viewed as handing on the spirit of Moses from the present teacher to the pupil.

NT 1. (a) epitithēmi tas cheiras occurs 20x in the NT, mostly in connection with miracles of healing (Matt. 9:18; Mk. 5:23; 6:5; 7:32; 8:23; Lk. 13:13; Acts 28:8) performed by Jesus and the apostles as signs that the messianic age has already dawned. The expression also appears in Matt. 19:13, 15 to denote a gesture of blessing the children brought to Jesus, which symbolized the gracious offer of a share in the kingdom of God made to those who are not of age, i.e., to such as approach God with the attitude of children.

(b) Acts 8:17–19; 9:17; 19:6 (possibly also 1 Tim. 5:22) belong in the context of baptism. The Holy Spirit is given to those who are baptized and have the apostles' hands laid on them, although the possibility of some sort of ordination cannot be excluded. Two passages take us directly into the sphere of Jewish ordination: Acts 6:6, where the seven Hellenists are appointed to serve in the daily distribution to their section of the community; and 13:3, where Paul and Barnabas are authorized, commissioned, and sent out to a specific missionary task.

2. The noun expression epithesis tōn cheirōn occurs 4x in the NT. It is used once in connection with baptism (Acts 8:18). On another occasion it denotes one of the elementary doctrines of Christianity (Heb. 6:2). Twice (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6) it denotes the rite by which Timothy was ordained. According to these two passages, Timothy had conferred on him, through the laying on of hands by the elders or Paul, the gifts needed for leading the congregation: preaching the Word and teaching or refuting false teachers.

3. It is striking that in every passage where the laying on of hands appears in connection with ordination or sending out for a particular service, it is always carried out by people who at that moment possess different gifts. In Acts 6:6 the laying on of hands for serving tables is performed by the apostles; in 13:3 for the missionary task, by prophets and teachers; in 1 Tim. 4:14, by the elders; and in 2 Tim. 1:6, by Paul. The NT does not seem to recognize the power of ordination as being restricted to a particular office, e.g., that of the apostles.

We should note also the close connection between the laying on of hands and intercessory prayer. This suggests that there is no thought of a human transfer of a particular quality necessary for office from one office-bearer to another, as if succession is occurring. The idea that the gifts needed for ministry are at someone's disposal is contradicted by Peter's clash with Simon Magus (Acts 8:18–24). It is God himself who equips his servants with his gifts and sends them out; this happens through the prayer of the church. The laying on of hands bears witness to the church's conviction that their prayers, founded on God's promises, have been heard.

ἐπιτιμάω (epitimaō), rebuke (2203); ἐπιτιμία (epitimia), censure (2204).

CL & OT The vb. in cl. Gk. means to honor, censure, penalize, and raise in price. The noun can mean penalty, value, honor, and respect.

In the LXX, people rebuke (e.g., Gen. 37:10) but should not do so (Ruth 2:16), unless they have judicial, paternal, or fraternal authority (Eccl. 7:5 = LXX 7:6; cf. Prov. 17:10). But God does have the right to rebuke, not only human beings or his enemies (Ps. 9:5; 76:6), but also the created order (106:9) and Satan (Zech. 3:2 = LXX 3:3).

NT 1. The vb. is found frequently in all three Synoptic Gospels, implying disapproval, but not exaction of a concrete penalty. The sense of censure or rebuke will suit all instances, but more precise definition is possible. (a) People rebuke one another as a sign of disapproval: The disciples rebuked those who presented children to Jesus (Mk. 10:13 par.), the crowd rebuked the blind man who sought Jesus (10:48 par.), Peter rebuked Jesus for his passion prediction (8:32 par.), and the Pharisees asked Jesus to rebuke the disciples (Lk. 19:39). In each instance Jesus disapproves of the rebuke, though he himself is free to deliver a rebuke (to Peter, Mk. 8:33; to the Sons of Thunder, Lk. 9:55). Note, however, that the situation of one brother rebuking another and the rebuke by the penitent thief do not receive adverse comment (Lk. 17:3; 23:40).

(b) Sometimes Jesus rebukes in order to repress, when he casts out demons (Mk. 1:25; 9:25), dispels a fever (Lk. 4:39), or stills a storm (Mk. 4:39). Jesus is here depicted as Lord of all on the model of Yahweh (Ps. 106:9) and as the bringer of salvation, for demons flee at his command.

(c) At Mk. 3:12; 8:30 and par., Jesus rebukes in the sense of forbidding what might happen if the disciples or cured demoniacs start publishing his deeds as Lord of all. Jesus does not want anyone to make known his deeds until he has finished his ministry of dying on the cross. In 2 Tim. 4:2, rebuking is a function of the authoritative Christian teacher, alongside preaching, convincing, and exhorting; note also Jude 9, where the archangel Michael upbraids Satan with "the Lord rebuke you" (cf. Zech. 3:2).

2. The noun epitimia appears only in 2 Cor. 2:6, where it refers to censure or even punishment meted out by the church in congregational discipline.

See also noutheteō, warn, advise (3805); parakaleō, summon, invite, exhort, encourage (4151).

2205 ἐπιτρέπω

ἐπιτρέπω (epitrepō), allow, permit (2205); ἐπιτροτή (epitropē), charge, commission (2207).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. epitrepō means to entrust something to a person, bequeath, then also permit or allow. In general, this word denotes official authority: A person in charge gives instructions or permission to someone under his authority to do something.

2. This vb. rarely occurs in the LXX, the noun only in 2 Macc. 13:14. In Gen. 39:6 Joseph is entrusted with (or given charge over) Potiphar's entire household. In Est. 9:14, the king gives permission for Haman's sons to be hung on gallows. In the LXX of Job 32:14, Elihu charges the three friends of Job with having given permission to Job to speak in the way he has. Finally, in 2 Macc. 13:14 epitropē refers Judas's commitment to God's "decision," whatever the outcome, in his battle against the Seleucids.

NT 1. epitrepō occurs 18x in the NT, epitropē only once (Acts 26:12). Behind all uses lies the notion of authority, though on different levels. On a human level, Pilate gives Joseph permission to take Jesus' body down from the cross and to bury it (Jn. 19:38). Paul asks for and receives permission to address the Jews (Acts 21:39–40), and Agrippa gives Paul permission to address him (26:1). Later, Paul was permitted to live under house arrest in Rome (28:16) rather than in some prison.

2. Matt. 19:8; Mk. 10:4 refer to the divorce permission of Moses in the OT law (Deut. 24:1–4; for more on this, → apostasion, decree of divorce, 687; chōrizō, divide, separate; be divorced, 6004).

3. Jesus was a person from whom permission was sought. Two would-be followers asked for his permission, the one to bury his father and the other to say farewell to his family before following Jesus (Matt. 8:21; Lk. 9:59, 61). Jesus, however, did not accept either of these excuses as sufficient grounds for withholding discipleship. The legion of demons sought permission from Jesus to enter into swine (Mk. 5:13; Lk. 8:32) before leaving the man in whom they were living. Consistently, Jesus manifested power over evil spirits.

4. In two of the most debated passages of the NT, Paul indicates that he does not permit women to exercise authority over men in the church (1 Cor. 14:34; 1 Tim. 2:12). Whether Paul wrote this for cultural reasons or because of absolute principles cannot be decided on contextual grounds.

5. "If the Lord permits" (1 Cor. 16:7; cf. Heb. 6:3) seems to be a standard phrase that a person might use to indicate his or her dependence on God and his will (cf. Jas. 4:15, "If it is the Lord's will," which uses the vb. thelō, to wish, desire, will, 2527).

2207 (epitropē, charge, commission), → 2205.

2211 ἐπιφάνεια

ἐπιφάνεια (epiphaneia), appearance, revelation (2211); ἐπιφαίνω (epiphainō), show, appear (2210); ἐφίστημι (ephistēmi), appear, stand beside (2392); ἐπιφανής (epiphanēs), powerful, splendid, terrible (2212); φανερός (phaneros), visible, clear, open, evident (5745); φανερῶς (phanerōs), openly (5747); φανερόω (phaneroō), reveal, make known, show, manifest (5746); φανέρωσις (phanerōsis), revelation, manifestation, disclosure (5748); φαντάζω (phantazō), make visible (5751).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. epiphaneia, derived from phainō, to appear (cf. phōs, light, 5890), originally denotes outward appearance or mode of appearance; then also, fig., glorious appearance, i.e., esteem, distinction, majesty. Later it came to express the sensation that a person or thing causes, so that by the time of Jesus, the word had almost become a technical term for the appearance of an otherwise hidden deity.

(b) Since appearances of a divinity occur principally in the temple, the whole narrative section of the Temple Chronicle of Lindos is entitled epiphaneiai. The epiphany of a god is celebrated as the feast of his birth, of his accession, of extraordinary happenings worked by him that reveal his power, or of his return from a foreign land.

(c) Since epiphaneia describes the powerful intervention of the gods, rulers who were regarded as divine kings applied the adj. epiphanēs to themselves (cf. Antiochus Epiphanes in 1 Macc. 1:10).

2. (a) In the LXX epiphainō is the chief rendering of Heb. ʾôr (hiph.), to cause to shine, though it also translates other Heb. vbs. It occurs in the Aaronic blessing (Num. 6:25) and associated passages (Ps. 31:16; 67:1; 80:3, 7, 19; 118:27). Always it is Yahweh's marvelous rescuing and redemptive vindication of his people in the sense of the OT theophany that is meant.

(b) epiphanēs is the LXX rendering of Heb. nôrāʾ (niph. part. of yārēʾ, to fear), terrible, fearful (Jdg. 13:6; Joel 2:11, 31; Hab. 1:7; Mal. 1:14). The LXX apparently confused derivatives of yārēʾ with derivatives of rāʾâ, to see (or even ʾôr, to illuminate) and so introduced an element of the terrible into the concept of this Gk. word. This becomes esp. clear in the translation of the expected "great" and/or "dreadful" day of the Lord (Joel 2:11, 31 [cf. Acts 2:20]; Mal. 4:5) by megalē and epiphanēs. By introducing through the LXX the element of the terrible into the epiphany concept, the expectation of God's appearance in the end times meant that words from this group could designate the double outcome of salvation history—fear and dread for unbelievers, glory for believers.

3. This word group is found esp. in 2 Macc. epiphaneia here denotes the intervention of God (3:24; 14:15; esp. 15:27) in the sense of an OT theophany; 3 Macc. 2:19 and 6:4, 9, go back to the OT usage corresponding with Num. 6:25. The adj. epiphanēs can describe both the "Lord" (2 Macc. 15:34; 3 Macc. 5:35), the God of Israel, and also the sanctuary of Dionysus (2 Macc. 14:33).

NT 1. By and large, epiphaneia and epiphainō occur in the Pastoral Letters, Paul's latest writings in the NT. epiphaneia is used with a twofold meaning for the visible appearance of Jesus Christ on earth. (a) It occurs with reference to the appearance of the Lord on earth at the end of history. According to 2 Thess. 2:1–12, the coming of the "man of lawlessness" will precede the visible appearance of the Lord Jesus. In fact, this man is already at work (2:7), but his coming (2:9) is being presently impeded by some undisclosed power (2:6–7). The Lord Jesus will destroy him "by the splendor [epiphaneia] of his coming [parousia]" (2:8). epiphaneia and parousia (→ 4242) are to be understood here as a hendiadys, epiphaneia stressing the powerful and effective action of the returning Christ, and parousia accentuating more strongly the fact of his reappearance.

The decisive factor at the return of the Lord is what he will do. His appearance, the judgment, and the final establishment of his kingdom belong inextricably together. The awaited judgment day of the Lord will be both terrible and glorious (cf. Acts 2:20). Because of the double possible outcome in salvation history, the need to stand one's ground in the fight of faith must be stressed (note how the thought of 1 Tim. 6:12 precedes that of 6:14, where epiphaneia occurs). Those who love the Lord long "for his appearing" (2 Tim. 4:8). The stress laid on Christ's powerful action in the designation of his return derives ultimately from the fact that the Lord Jesus can be called both "God and Savior" (Tit. 2:13) in connection with his expected epiphaneia, even though the NT is restrained in its application of "God" to Jesus Christ.

(b) Christians also applied epiphaneia to the visible earthly appearance of their Savior in his incarnation (2 Tim. 1:10). epiphainō (apart from Acts 27:20) is used in the NT solely of Jesus' earthly appearance, whether with a forward (Lk. 1:79) or a backward (Tit. 2:11; 3:4) look. To see God's powerful revelation shining in Jesus' servant form is not a judgment of one's reason, but a judgment exclusively of faith, for outside faith the revelation of God is not visible.

(c) The vb. ephistēmi (predominately used by Luke) can sometimes mean simply to come upon someone (e.g., Lk. 10:40; Acts 4:1). But it can also be used of the appearance of the angel of the Lord (Lk. 2:9; Acts 12:7) or even of the Lord himself (Acts 23:11). In 1 Thess. 5:3 the vb. is used of the sudden coming of eschatological woes.

2. (a) The early church prayed to the no longer and not yet visible Lord, who is nevertheless believed in as present and active, to reveal himself (1 Cor. 16:22; Rev. 22:20; cf. Num. 6:25). Their thought was not that of seeing him, but of his intervention and of a growing certainty that strengthens faith.

(b) In pregnant usage this word group is found in the Bible only in the context of the revelation of Yahweh in the OT and of Jesus Christ in the NT. To speak of revelation in the fullest biblical sense is to speak of Jesus Christ, our Savior. The words are never employed in connection with revelation in creation. The words accordingly do not belong to a theory of knowledge that is independent of history but to NT soteriology. The mighty saving intervention of God has already occurred, but its fulfillment will take place only at the appearance of Jesus Christ. Thus, believers live in the tension of being already reconciled but not yet redeemed (Rom. 8:23). In other words, they live in hope.

3. (a) Regarding the related words, the adj. phaneros, visible, clear, evident, is not usually a technical theological term, although it is used in important theological contexts. It stresses what is visible to the sight. It is used in connection with the messianic secret (Mk. 3:12), wherein Jesus charges his disciples not to make him known. Nevertheless, his name does become known (6:14). phaneros is also used in Jesus' declaration that in general we can do nothing in secret that will not be made manifest (Mk. 4:22; Lk. 8:17).

In Acts 4:16 the Jewish leaders are compelled to acknowledge that the apostles, Peter and John, have performed a notable deed in healing the lame man in the temple and that this was manifest to all who lived in Jerusalem. Similarly, that Paul's imprisonment was for Christ became "clear throughout the whole palace guard" (Phil. 1:13). These instances imply that God's truth will become visible and evident in God's good time, whether we try to hasten it or hinder it. phaneros also has a nontechnical sense in Acts 7:13, where Stephen refers to Joseph's making himself known to his brethren.

Rom. 1:19 declares that what may be known about God "is plain" to people in the natural order. In 2:28 those who are Jews "outwardly" (phaneros is used; lit., "in the open"), i.e., by possessing circumcision and making a formal profession of the law, are contrasted with those who are Jews inwardly, who have true, spiritual circumcision of the heart (2:29). Paul is arguing that genuine membership of God's people does not consist of possessing the outward marks of covenant membership; there must also be the inner spiritual reality. Yet where this is absent, as in the case of unbelieving Jews, it does not nullify the faithfulness of God (3:1–4, 31; cf. Ps. 51:4). God plans to use even the unbelief of the Jews to his glory, and he wills their inclusion among his people by grafting them back through their turning to him on a massive scale (Rom. 9:1–11:36).

In the day of the Lord the works of all people—including believers—will come to light (1 Cor. 3:13; cf. 14:25; Mk. 4:22; Lk. 8:17). Indeed, the present dissensions within the church make it manifest who are genuine (1 Cor. 11:19). In Gal. 5:19–23 Paul draws attention to the self-evident character of the works of the sinful nature as contrasted with the fruit of the Spirit. Timothy is exhorted to practice the duties of his ministry so that his progress may be evident to all (1 Tim. 4:15). Similarly, the believer's attitude to sin makes it plain that he or she is a child of God (1 Jn. 3:10).

(b) The adv. phanerōs means openly, publicly, so that everyone can see (Mk. 1:45; Jn. 7:10). In Acts 10:3 it can be translated "distinctly" or "plainly."

(c) The vb. phaneroō, reveal, make known, manifest, occurs 49x in the NT. (i) In Mk. 4:22 it has the character of a proverbial saying. Elsewhere, it occurs in the Synoptics only in the longer ending of Mk. (16:12, 14).

(ii) This vb., however, occurs frequently in Jn., virtually as a synonym for apokalyptō, reveal (→ 636). John the Baptist came baptizing with water so that Jesus Christ "might be revealed to Israel" (Jn. 1:31). The miraculous sign at the wedding in Cana "revealed his glory, and his disciples put their faith in him" (2:11). Those who do evil, hate the light and do not come to it; "but whoever lives by the truth comes into the light, so that it may be seen plainly that what he has done has been done through God" (3:21).

Jesus' brothers urge him to go to Jerusalem and "show [himself] to the world" (Jn. 7:4). But those words betray a lack of faith (7:5), and Jesus rejects their counsel, for his time has not yet come. Jesus explains the blindness of the man blind from birth on the grounds that it is not the blind man who sinned or his parents, but "that the work of God might be displayed in his life" (9:3). In his high priestly prayer Jesus declares: "I have revealed you to those whom you gave me out of the world" (17:6). In 21:1, 14, phaneroō is used of Jesus' revelation of himself to his disciples.

The vb. also figures prominently in 1 Jn. In Jesus "the life appeared; we have seen it and testify to it, and we proclaim to you the eternal life, which was with the Father and has appeared to us" (1:2). By contrast the action of unbelievers in quitting the community makes it clear that they were not truly of the community (2:19). In 2:28 the vb. is used of the coming of Christ. The letter proceeds to develop the tension between the two appearances of Christ and the implications this has for believers: "Dear friends, now we are children of God, and what we will be has not yet been made known. But we know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is" (3:2). Jesus has "appeared" to take away sin (3:5) and to destroy the works of the devil (3:8). Finally, God has "showed his love among us" by sending his Son so "that we might live through him" (4:9; cf. Jn. 3:16).

In Rev. 3:18 the church at Laodicea is counseled to buy white garments from the risen Christ to keep the shame of its nakedness from being made manifest. In 15:4 the song of those who have conquered celebrates the holy God and the fact that "all nations will come and worship before you, for your righteous acts have been revealed."

(iii) Paul uses phaneroō and apokalyptō as synonyms (cf. Rom. 1:17 and 3:21 on the revelation of the righteousness of God in Christ; Eph. 3:5 and Col. 1:26 on the revelation of the mystery hidden for ages). In Rom. 1:19 and 1 Cor. 4:5 phaneroō has the sense of make visible. The former passage refers to the revelation of God's "eternal power and divine nature" in the creation (Rom. 1:20); the latter refers to the coming judgment when God "will expose the motives of men's hearts." For Paul this has the practical implication that he will not pronounce judgment before the time, being content to leave it to God, and equally he does not wish to have premature commendation for the same reason.

Paul uses phaneroō 9x in 2 Cor., esp. in polemical contexts. He uses it of the revelation that comes about through his preaching (2:14; 11:6). His own apostolic way of life is itself a paradoxical revelation of Christ, in a way comparable to Christ's own way of life. For human beings naturally expect God to manifest himself in success. But in fact it is the opposite. Paul's apostolic way has been one of affliction and suffering, always carrying "around in our body the death of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be revealed in our body" (2 Cor. 4:10; cf. 4:11). By contrast, the existence of believing men and women in the church shows "that you are a letter from Christ" (3:3), vindicating Paul's apostleship in contrast with the letters of accreditation vaunted by his opponents.

Paul also uses phaneroō for the appearance of everyone before the judgment seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10–11). Moreover, "what we are is plain to God" (5:11a), and Paul hopes it is also plain to his readers (5:11b). In 7:12 Paul declares that his intention in writing as he did was so that the Corinthians could see how devoted he was to them. Despite his lack of eloquence Paul expresses the hope that his apostleship and devotion to Christ have been made "perfectly clear" to them (11:6).

Revelation takes place in proclamation (Rom. 16:25–27; Col. 1:25–26; 4:4). In Eph. 5:13 Christian conduct is seen in terms of light. The thought of revelation is further developed in terms of mystery hidden for ages but now revealed in Christ (Col. 1:26; 3:4; 4:4; cf. Eph. 3:5–6; 6:19).

In 1 Tim. 3:16 Paul takes up the theme of mystery in his quoting of an early Christian hymn, one phrase of which is that Christ Jesus "appeared in a body." phaneroō here refers to the incarnation (cf. Rom. 1:3–4 and the use of the vb. elsewhere for the incarnate ministry of Jesus in Jn. 1:31; Heb. 9:26; 1 Pet. 1:20; 1 Jn. 1:2; 3:5, 8) and possibly also his entire earthly ministry right up to the ascension. The same vb. also describes the significance of the incarnation in 2 Tim. 1:10, where Paul outlines the purpose of Jesus Christ's appearing. The incarnation is also in mind in the other reference to the vb. in the Pastoral Letters, but it is mediated by proclamation: "At his appointed season he brought his word to light" (Tit. 1:3).

(iv) The vb. occurs 2x in Heb. 9, but with somewhat different meanings. In 9:26 it refers to Jesus' incarnation, his appearance "at the end of the ages," the purpose of which was to offer a sacrifice for sins that supersedes the OT sacrifices and the Day of Atonement ritual. Christ's manifestation is unique and unrepeatable. Conversely, the author earlier argued that the structure of the tabernacle (and by implication the temple) and the prohibition of all but the high priest from entering the inner sanctuary are proof of the incompleteness of the old covenant: "The Holy Spirit was showing [dēloō] by this that the way into the Most Holy Place had not yet been disclosed [phaneroō] as long as the first tabernacle was still standing" (9:8).

(v) The vb. also occurs 2x in 1 Pet., again referring to the two manifestations of Christ in his historical life and at his second coming: He "was revealed in these last times for your sake" (1:20); and "when the Chief Shepherd appears, you will receive the crown of glory that will never fade away" (5:4).

(d) The noun phanerōsis, revelation, manifestation, occurs only 2x in the NT. In 1 Cor. 12:7 it describes the gifts of the Spirit: "Now to each the manifestation of the Spirit is given for the common good." In 2 Cor. 4:2 it is used in connection with Paul's preaching in a reply to accusations, where he insists that he has been "setting forth the truth plainly" (cf. this use with 2 Cor. 5:10–11 and the use of the vb. generally in 2 Cor. [see above]). Probably the background here is that of the law court, where this vb. was used of appearances in court.

(e) The vb. phantazō, make visible, occurs only in Heb. 12:21 of Moses on Sinai: "The sight [part. of phantazō] was so terrifying that Moses said, 'I an trembling with fear'" (cf. Deut. 9:19). For the related word phantasma, → mageia, magic, 3404.

ἑπτά (hepta), seven (2231); ἑπτάκις (heptakis), seven times (2232).

CL & OT 1. The qualitative significance attaching to the number seven (hepta) throughout the history of religions can be explained from the original amazement felt at the regularity of the passage of time in seven-day periods, consonant with the four phases of the moon, and secondarily from other astronomical observations. Since for primitive humanity there was no linear time sequence and human beings could only apprehend time as a period, seven became the symbol of the fulfilled and perfectly completed period. Philosophical speculations concerning the meaning of the number seven are known from Greece.

2. For the Israelites, seven was the symbol of perfection. The OT adopted the symbolic imagery of this number in various ways: the completion of creation in seven days (Gen. 1:1–2:4a); seven-day feasts are fulfilled times (Lev. 23:6, 34); sprinkling of blood, seven times repeated (heptakis), brought Israel complete purification (16:14, 19); Yahweh promised Cain sevenfold, i.e., comprehensive, vengeance (Gen. 4:15); Yahweh sees everything with seven eyes (Zech. 4:10); one of the marks of the fulfillment of the age of salvation is a sevenfold increase in the sun's illuminating power (Isa. 30:26). In Prov. seven can virtually signify all (26:16, MT only).

A multiple of seven stands for a round figure, comprising the whole (Gen. 46:27—70 in MT, 75 in LXX; Jdg. 20:16). In the table of the nations in Gen. 10, seventy (7 x 10) nations are enumerated (cf. 1 Enoch 89:59–60). Perhaps this concept lies behind Lk. 10:1–17, where some MSS. report that Jesus sent out seventy disciples aimed at the nations of the world (NIV reads "seventy-two"; see also hebdomēkonta, seventy, 1573). Seventy was also determinative of the name Septuagint, the translation of the OT into Gk. for the seventy nations of the world (cf. Let. Aris., with its legend that the LXX was the work of seventy Jewish elders).

NT 1. In the NT letters the number seven and its derivatives occur only with reference to the OT: Rom. 11:4 (cf. 1 Ki. 19:18); Heb. 4:4 (cf. Gen. 2:2); Heb. 11:30 (cf. Jos. 6:1–21). In Rom. 11:4 Paul adduces from 1 Ki. 19:18 that in his time there is already a Christian remnant of Israel, which represents the full total of Israel as dawn heralds the day (Rom. 11:16). In Mk. 12:18–23 the Sadducees imagine a case where an infertile woman is involved in a levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5–6) until she has had seven husbands.

2. Someone possessed by seven "spirits" (Matt. 12:43–45) or by "seven demons" (Lk. 8:2) is totally possessed. In Matt. 18:21 Peter inquires concerning the limits of forgiveness: "up to seven times?" Here the seven has numerical significance. But Jesus replies that forgiveness has to take place "seventy-seven times," i.e., totally and without limit (18:22; cf. Lk. 17:4).

3. Despite all the individual differences, the genealogical trees of Jesus in Matt. and Lk. are both orientated around the number seven. Matt. 1:17–28 has three groups of fourteen (7 x 2) generations: from Abraham to David, from David to the deportation to Babylon, and from then to Christ; Jesus begins the seventh seven. Lk. 3:23–38 cites seventy-seven ancestors of Jesus. Both evangelists are obviously interested in the fulfillment of history in the person of Jesus Christ—of salvation history (Matt.) and world history (Lk.). In other respects Matt. shows a predilection for the number seven as a scheme for the arrangement of his gospel (e.g., seven parables in ch. 13; seven woes in ch. 23). It is the stylistic expression of his theology of fulfillment.

4. Of all NT writings, Rev. uses the number seven most frequently. It is directed to seven churches of Asia, symbolic of all churches (1:4, 11). Then there are seven spirits (1:4; 4:5; 5:6), seven seals (5:1), the Lamb with seven horns and eyes (5:6), seven angels with seven trumpets (8:2–6), seven thunders (10:3–4), seven angels with seven bowls of wrath (15:1–16:21), etc. The number seven denotes in general the final eschatological appearance of God, encompassing everything. Correspondingly, on the side opposed to God, there is a final action that seeks to withstand the power of God (e.g., the dragon with seven-crowned heads, 12:3; etc.).

In fact, the number seven plays an important part in the entire structure of Rev. The book consists of seven series of visions, each in turn consisting of seven items.

Some have attempted to relate these seven visions to the seven days of creation in Gen. 1. In the idealist interpretation of this book, these seven series of visions are not consecutive, but each one looks at world history from the ascension of Christ to the consummation from a different standpoint and gradually builds up to the end of history and the new creation.

2236 ἐραυνάω

ἐραυνάω (eraunaō), search (2236); ἐξεραυνάω (exeraunaō), search out (2001); ἀνεξεραύνητος (anexeraunētos), unsearchable (451).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ereunaō (the earlier form of eraunaō) and exereunaō denoted tracking by animals, then (in the human sphere) to trace out, examine, search out, e.g., in connection with a house search, a judicial hearing, and esp. a scientific, philosophical, and religious investigation. anexereunētos means unsearchable, unfathomable.

2. (a) In the LXX ereunaō means seek, search thoroughly; it is used for Laban's angry search for his missing household gods (Gen. 31:35) and for a plundering search of houses (1 Ki. 20:6 = LXX 21:6), but also for the quest for wisdom and discernment (Prov. 2:4 exereunaō) and the contrite examination of one's way of life (Lam. 3:40 exereunaō). God and his thoughts cannot be searched out (Jud. 8:14).

(b) Philo says that humans can by searching penetrate the innermost being of God. He also uses the word to describe learned investigation of the thought and exegesis of the OT. The Qumran sect searched the Scriptures in order to fathom God's will.

NT 1. The NT use of eraunaō (6x) and exeraunaō (once) resembles that of cl. Gk. In Jn. 5:39 and 7:52, eraunaō refers to the Jewish penetrating examination of Scripture in order to obtain its meaning—presumably in the law (cf. 5:16, 45). The form eraunate in 5:39 should be understood as ind. ("you search"), not imperative ("search!"); the Jews search the Scriptures, but they are preoccupied with words and think that by merely fulfilling the letter they can ensure themselves eternal life. This very searching, however, blinds them to the pointers of true life proclaimed by the OT Scriptures. A preconceived attitude and approach to the study of the law led to the Jews' rejection of Jesus (7:52), in whom alone is life.

2. In 1 Pet. 1:10–11, exeraunaō and eraunaō refer to the prophets' eager searching and reflection over the information revealed to them by the Spirit; it must be sharply distinguished from prophēteuō (to prophesy; → prophētēs, prophet, 4737).

3. An OT concept appears in Rom. 8:27 and Rev. 2:23, that God searches human hearts (cf. 1 Sam. 16:7; 1 Ki. 8:39; Ps. 7:9). While God searches the depths of human hearts, his judgments on them are unfathomable (Rom. 11:33, anexeraunētos). Only the Spirit of God working in a human being is able to search for knowledge of that which is still hidden in the depths of God (1 Cor. 2:10; cf. Matt. 11:25; 13:11; 16:17; Eph. 3:3, 5). In 1 Cor. 2:9 Paul takes up Isa. 64:4: Where the Spirit searches, the barrier to all autonomous human search falls; through the Spirit, we are able to get a grasp of the "the deep things of God."

ἐργάζομαι (ergazomai), to labor, be active, work, bring about (2237); ἔργον (ergon), deed, action, achievement, work, thing, matter (2240); ἐργασία (ergasia), work, practice, business (2238); ἐργάτης (ergatēs), someone who does something, worker (2239); κατεργάζομαι (katergazomai), to produce, accomplish (2981); ἐνέργεια (energeia), working, operation, action (1918); ἐνεργέω (energeō), to work, be active, effect something (1919); ἐνεργής (energēs), active, effective, powerful (1921); ἐνέργημα (energēma), activity, experience (1920); εὐεργεσία (euergesia), kindness, a good deed, well-doing (2307); εὐεργετέω (euergeteō), do work, benefit, show kindnesses (2308); εὐεργέτης (euergetēs), benefactor (2309); συνεργός (synergos), working together with, fellow worker, assistant (5301); συνεργέω (synergeō), to work together, cooperate, aid (5300).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. ergon denotes a deed or action. It can refer to a specific occupational or official activity (e.g., agriculture or the military profession); it eventually had the weakened meaning of thing, matter. The vb. ergazomai has the basic meaning to work, to be engaged in something. Used trans. it means to create, produce, perform, process. ergasia can mean labor, occupation, arrangement, work, or business. ergatēs generally indicates someone who does something, a worker as the member of a class (e.g., slave) or occupational group (e.g., farm workers).

(b) energeia denotes activity; energeō means to be active, be at work; trans. to effect or do something. energēs means active, effective; energēma, that which is effected, a deed.

(c) Also belonging to this word group are euergesia, good deed, well-doing; euergeteō, to do good; euergetēs, which became in Greco-Roman culture an honorary title given to generous people, esp. kings; synergos, a fellow worker, assistant; synergeō, to work together, cooperate.

(d) Early in cl. Gk. times, work is described as having moral value; those who work hard receive commendation from the gods, whereas laziness is a disgrace. Humans show themselves fit for society by their ergon. In Plato ergon is closely related to virtue (→ aretē, 746). In Aristotle the task of aretē is to bring to perfection the ergon of an organ (e.g., the seeing of an eye). One's deeds can be called good, lovely, bad, evil, unjust, etc.

2. (a) In the LXX this word group has the whole range of meaning of the cl. Gk. uses. What is new is conditioned by Israel's particular faith in God. ergon is used at the beginning of the LXX to describe the work of the divine creator (Gen. 2:2–3). God accomplishes his work through his word (→ logos, 3364). A frequent phrase found in Heb. poetry for God's work is "the works of your hands," which embraces heaven, earth, and human beings (e.g., Ps. 8:6; 138:8; cf. Isa. 29:23). ergon is also used for the acts of Yahweh in history, through which he demonstrates his covenant faithfulness (cf. Ps. 95:9); sometimes it means miracle (e.g., Sir. 48:14). But God's deeds can also be judgment (e.g., Isa. 28:21).

(b) When ergon relates to what human beings do, it gives expression esp. to three major theological ideas. (i) In most places it has a positive meaning; it can describe the accomplishment of a task laid on people by God (cf. Gen. 2:15). Cultic actions, such as offering sacrifices, are deeds of religious worth (Num. 8:11). But also in everyday life work that fulfills God's law is judged positively (cf. Exod. 20:9–10). This applies both to one's ordinary sphere of work (cf. Deut. 2:7; 14:29; Ps. 90:17) and to particular acts of obedience (e.g., righteousness in Ps. 15:2).

(ii) In conjunction with the fall, ergon denotes work as trouble, a burden, and a curse (cf. Gen. 3:17–19; 4:12; 5:29). This idea is esp. alive in Hel. Jud., where human works are seen as essentially sinful (1 Esd. 4:37; 2 Esd. 7:119).

(iii) In still other places in the LXX, ergon has the meaning of a bad, reprehensible deed, which brings separation from God, i.e., sin (e.g., Job 11:11). It is not so much here a matter of a particular wicked act but the sinful nature of actions that are alienated from God (cf. Prov. 11:18; Isa. 59:6).

(c) energeia is used 8x in the LXX, primarily for the work of divine or demonic powers (e.g., Wis. 7:17, 26; 2 Macc. 3:29).

(d) Jud. developed the view of human works as necessary in order to fulfill the law and therefore do righteousness. The way to godliness is prescribed by a multiplicity of regulations related to such things as the Sabbath or ritual cleansings. But since not everyone follows this path in all its details, a distinction is made between the righteous and average devout individuals. This distinction led to the notion of reward and punishment through divine judgment, in that God will some day recompense humans according to their deeds. The godless will then receive their punishment, whereas the righteous can die without fear.

NT ergazomai, to work, occurs 41x in the NT; ergon, work, 169x; ergasia, business, 6x; and ergatēs, worker, 16x; katergazomai, to produce, accomplish, 22x. These basic meanings have not changed from cl. Gk. In referring to the actions of believers, ergon can be used synonymously with karpos, fruit (2843). The noun ergon can be used as an object of ergazomai, to work a work (e.g., Matt. 26:10), of poieō (→ 4472), to do a work (e.g., 23:3, 5), and in one place of prassō (4556), to do a deed (Acts 26:20).

1. (a) In the Synoptics ergazomai sometimes denotes activity in general (e.g., Matt. 21:28), the performing of some work (e.g.. 26:10). ergatēs can denote someone who works for wages (20:1, 2, 8), also a witness standing in Christ's service and sent into the world (9:37–38; Lk. 10:2), but also an evildoer, who will not stand in the judgment (13:27). In contrast to the Pharisees, whom Jesus censures for doing works "for men to see" (Matt. 23:5), the deed of the woman who anointed him is called "a beautiful thing [ergon]" (26:10). Jesus encourages his disciples to let their light so shine before others "that they may see your good deeds and praise your Father in heaven" (5:16). At the same time, the Synoptics stress that no one has legal claims before God for remuneration for one's deeds (cf. Lk. 17:10; cf. Matt. 20:1–16). ergon is related to the work of Christ in Matt. 11:2; Lk. 24:19.

(b) Jn. uses this word group to illustrate the unique activity of Jesus, which is bound up with the working of God: "My Father is always at his work . . . and I, too, am working" (5:17 cf. 4:34; 17:4). Jesus' working fulfills his divinely appointed mission (cf. 5:36; 9:4; 10:25), which aims to awaken faith in him as the one sent to reveal God (cf. 6:29). Jesus' miracles also serve this end (14:11; → sēmeion, sign, 4956). Those who believe in Jesus are given the promise that they will do even greater works than him (14:12). Works done "through God" (3:21) contrast with "deeds [that are] evil" (3:19), which are committed in alliance with the devil (8:41, 44).

(c) Paul takes up more the contemporary Jewish understanding of work as those acts required by God's law. He stresses, by way of a blunt antithesis, that it is humanly impossible to achieve righteousness in God's sight; rather, a right relation with God can only be received by grace through Jesus Christ, who is "the end of the law so that there may be righteousness for everyone who believes" (Rom. 10:4). Paul is concerned with understanding the true significance of faith, of which Abraham is adduced as an example (Rom. 4:1–25; Gal. 3:6–18). This insight into the process of salvation forms the center of Pauline theology (cf. Rom. 3:20–28; 4:6; 9:12, 32; Gal. 2:16; 3:2, 10).

Nevertheless, Paul does have passages in which works receive a positive significance. Just as Paul knows of a law of Christ besides the law that condemns (cf. 1 Cor. 9:21; Gal. 6:2), so he speaks of positive deeds besides "the deeds of darkness" or "the acts [erga] of the sinful nature" (Gal. 5:19). Missionary work, for instance, appears as a "work of the Lord" (1 Cor. 16:10), which Christ works through the apostles (cf. Phil. 1:6). Indeed, Paul puts to the Corinthians the rhetorical question, "Are you not the result of my work in the Lord?" (1 Cor. 9:1). In the sphere of ethics, Paul upholds the validity for Christians of the imperative to do good to everyone (Gal. 6:10). Believers are to work out their salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12; cf. Eph. 6:13). Good deeds are esp. stressed in the Pastoral Letters (1 Tim. 5:10, 25; 6:18; Tit. 1:16; 2:7, 14; 3:8, 14).

Paul also writes of good works in the context of the final judgment, when God "will give to each person according to what he has done" (Rom. 2:6). Not only will the works of the heathen be judged, but those of Christians as well. While our deeds do not determine our entrance into heaven, they do play a role in the reward we receive (1 Cor. 3:11–15; cf. Rom. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10).

(d) While Paul stresses faith as the decisive factor, James emphasizes works, extolled in the law of liberty (1:25). Without works faith is dead (2:17); it is only through works that faith is perfected (2:22, 24). Note that James is writing against a dead orthodoxy that considers mere confession of faith sufficient for salvation. In his own way he thus helps to describe the field of tension in which God's saving activity seeks to awaken us to faith, to whose structural elements belong obedience, hope, and love.

2. (a) energeia, working, action, occurs 8x in the NT; energeō, to be active, 21x; energēma, deed, 2x; energēs, effective, 3x. This subgroup refers, as a rule, to the working of God (e.g., 1 Cor. 12:6; Eph. 1:11; Phil. 2:13) or of his antagonist, Satan (2 Thess. 2:9), who is also ultimately subject to God (2:11); in 2 Cor. 4:12, Paul refers to death as an active, working power. Prominence is given to the efficacious power of God by which he raised Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:20; Col. 2:12). This power is at work in Christ (Phil. 3:21), in the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12:11), and in God's Word (Heb. 4:12). By it the apostles are equipped for their office (Eph. 3:7; Col. 1:29). The members of the body of Christ also come to share in it (Eph. 4:16; cf. 1 Cor. 12:10).

(b) euergetēs occurs only in Lk. 22:25, where it has the sense of an honorary title. Jesus' disciples are not to allow themselves to be called "Benefactors," as are the rulers of the world (cf. Matt. 23:8–12); rather, they are called to serve (Lk. 22:26). euergeteō, to do good, occurs only in Acts 10:38, referring to the good deeds of Jesus to which his apostles testify. euergesia is used 2x: in Acts 4:9 it denotes the healing of a sick man by the apostles; in 1 Tim. 6:2, the desired attitude of a Christian master to his slaves.

(c) synergeō, to work together, is found 5x; synergos, fellow worker, 13x. In Rom. 8:28 Paul seizes on a Jewish maxim that for those who love God, "God works for [their] good"; this will include their suffering and pain. Jas. 2:22 speaks of the necessity of faith working together with good deeds.

Otherwise, these words refer to the missionary situation. Mk. 16:20 reports that the Lord worked with the disciples, confirming their word by the accompanying signs. This ratificatory accompanying work of God is the decisive element in all missionary activity, although it does require cooperation on the part of God's servants. Paul formulates it thus: "We are God's fellow workers" (1 Cor. 3:9; cf. 2 Cor. 6:1). The content of apostolic cooperation is outlined in 1 Thess. 3:2 ("in spreading the gospel of Christ"); Col. 4:11 ("for the kingdom of God"); 3 Jn. 8 ("for the truth"); and 2 Cor. 1:24 ("for your joy").

2239 (ergatēs, someone who does something, worker), → 2237.

2240 (ergon, deed, action, work, thing, matter), → 2237.

2244 (erēmia, desolate place, desert, wilderness), → 2245.

2245 ἔρημος

ἔρημος (erēmos), abandoned, solitary, desolate, deserted (2245); ἐρημία (erēmia), desolate place, desert, wilderness (2244); ἐρημόω (erēmoō), lay waste, devastate, make desolate, depopulate (2246); ἐρήμωσις (erēmōsis), devastation, desolation, destruction (2247).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. erēmia denotes a desolate area. erēmōsis, devastation, is first found in the LXX. The vb. erēmoō can mean to set free, hand over, leave alone. A desert in the ancient world was not only land without water and vegetation and therefore uninhabited, but could also be an area that was laid waste and depopulated, an abandoned settlement. The ancient Greco-Roman world awaited the revelation of the divinity in a lonely spot, and it feared the desert as the habitat of demons.

2. (a) In the LXX erēmos occurs 345x. It usually translates Heb. midbār, desert (which also means steppe, grassland, e.g., Gen. 37:22). More than a third of the uses of erēmos are in the Pentateuch, since Exod. to Deut. recount Israel's wandering in the desert. erēmia, by contrast, is used only 7x in the LXX. The vb. erēmoō, to devastate, occurs 60x in the LXX, used almost exclusively of punitive destruction of houses, cities, and lands (e.g., Isa. 6:11; 54:3; Ezek. 26:19). erēmōsis, devastation, is found app. 20x.

(b) The desert in the OT has a double aspect: It is the place where Yahweh reveals himself, but it is also the abode of demons, who threaten humans with impurity, sickness, and death. (i) The positive valuation is represented by the many theophanies in the desert. An angel strengthens Elijah with nourishment in a desert as he flees from Jezebel (1 Ki. 19:4–6). God's appearance at Horeb (Exod. 3:1–4:17; 1 Ki. 19:11–18) or Sinai (Exod. 19) is not only a mountain but also a desert theophany. Israel's forty years of wandering in the desert was counted as a time of particular closeness to Yahweh (e.g., Hos. 9:10). The references to Yahweh's faithfulness at this time (and Israel's unfaithfulness: Ps. 78:15–19; 95:7–11; Ezek. 20) are frequent in the OT. Hope of eschatological salvation is also linked with speculations involving the desert (Isa. 40:3; Jer. 31:2 = LXX 38:2; Ezek. 34:25; Hos. 2:14–23).

(ii) At the same time the desert is a place of deadly danger, of separation from God, and of demonic powers (Deut. 8:15; cf. Num. 21:4–9; Isa. 30:6). Yahweh's terrifying east wind, like all winds conceived in personal terms, comes out of the desert (Hos. 13:15). The scapegoat is chased into the desert (Lev. 16:10, 21–22). Desert demons take possession of the ruins of Babylon (cf. Isa. 13:21–23) and Edom (34:13–15). Contemporary desolation and misery are seen as devastation (1:7; 54:3; Jer. 2:15; Ezek. 19:13). The drying up of water esp. characterizes the transformation into desert (Isa. 44:27; 51:10; Ezek. 29:10; 30:12). For Daniel's use of erēmōsis appearing in the temple in Jerusalem (Dan. 8:13), → bdelygma, abomination, 1007.

(iii) In God's promises for the future, Israel will some day find salvation in the desert (cf. Ezek. 34:25; Hos. 2:14). When that happens the desert will become arable land, water will flow in it, roads will be opened, and desolated towns will be rebuilt (e.g., Isa. 32:15–16; 35:5–6; 41:18; 58:12; Ezek. 36:10, 33–38). Where roads are constructed through the desert (Isa. 43:19), Yahweh's lordship has dawned. God's victory over his enemies and the enemies of his people is thus also a victory over the desert.

NT 1. (a) In the NT words in this group occurs 60x, mostly in the Gospels and Acts. The NT estimation of the desert is similar to that of the OT and Jud. Israel's forty years of wandering in the desert is seen as a momentous fact of God's historical activity (Jn. 3:14; 6:31, 49; Acts 7:30–44; 13:18; 1 Cor. 10:5; Heb. 3:8, 17), and the idea that end-time movements begin in the desert is still alive (Matt. 24:26; Acts 21:38). The apocalyptic flight of the woman into the desert (Rev. 12:6, 14) is to be explained from the high regard in which Israel's time in the desert was held, and it simultaneously attests to the expectation that the Messiah will come from the desert (cf. Hos. 11:1; Matt. 2:15).

The youthful John the Baptist is hidden in the desert (Lk. 1:80) and then begins his work there (Matt. 3:1). As in Jud., prophets belong in desert places and on mountains, as was proper for ascetics; thus, Heb. 11:38 localizes the miscellaneous heroes of faith in deserts, mountains, and caves. Linking up with the desert wanderers and desert dwellers of the OT, the new Israel is able to understand itself, by way of antitype, as the wandering people of God.

(b) Insofar as Jesus' significance is described as prophetic and messianic, the desert also has its place. He comes forth like Moses in the desert (Acts 3:22–23; 7:37; cf. Deut. 18:15), even surpassing him, although he is Moses' antitype (cf. Heb. 3:1–6). Jesus' infant flight into Egypt (Matt. 2:13–15, 19–21) renders possible the arrival of the Messiah from Egypt through the desert (cf. Hos. 11:1). It is in the desert that Jesus defeats Satan's temptation (Matt. 4:1–11; Lk. 4:1–13), and there he miraculously feeds his followers (Matt. 14:13; Mk. 6:32). Several times Jesus lingers in the desert to pray and fast (cf. Mk. 1:35, 45)—not only to come close to God, but also to break the power of the demons. The desert is still a favorite place for visions (Rev. 17:3; cf. Acts 8:26). Perhaps that is why Paul sought out the Arabian desert (Gal. 1:17), though it may also have been simply to escape from the clutches of his opponents.

2. The desert is qualified negatively where the sin and failure of the desert generation is noted (Acts 7:41–43; 1 Cor. 10:5; Heb. 3:8, 17). Demonic dangers threaten in the desert (2 Cor. 11:26; cf. Lk. 15:4), for that is where demons (cf. Matt. 12:43) and madmen (Lk. 8:29) live. As in the OT, the ruin (erēmoō) of houses, cities, and land is considered to be accomplished by demonic powers carrying out God's judgment of punishment (Matt. 12:25; Lk. 11:17). The idolatrous city of Babylon (= Rome) will be brought "to ruin" (Rev. 17:16; 18:17, 19) by punishing demons (18:2); again, OT models are in the background. On the NT use of "the abomination that causes desolation" (Matt. 24:15; Mk. 13:14), → bdelygma, abomination, 1007.

2255 (hermēneia, interpretation, translation), → 2257.

2257 ἑρμηνεύω

ἑρμηνεύω (hermēneuō), explain, interpret, translate (2257); ἑρμηνεία (hermēneia), interpretation, translation (2255); μεθερμηνεύω (methermēneuō), translate (3493); διερμηνεύω (diermēneuō), translate, interpret, explain (1450); διερμηνευτής (diermēneutēs), interpreter, translator (1449).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. hermēneuō may mean to explain, expound, or interpret, though it often means little more than to speak or speak plainly. Similarly, the noun hermēneia often means interpretation, but sometimes means little more than communication or speech.

(b) Closely related to the meaning of "speech" in general, hermēneuō and hermēneia are also used in the quasi-technical sense of "articulation" or "expression" of thoughts in words. Thus Xenophon refers to the "power of expression" that makes teaching and the formulation of laws possible. Plato speaks of expressing (or perhaps expounding) the laws in word.

(c) The other main meaning of hermēneuō is to translate, mainly used in writers from the 1st cent. on. The vbs. diermēneuō and methermēneuō have this same sense.

2. In the LXX the usual meaning of hermēneuō is to translate. In Ezra 4:7 it represents the Heb. targēm: A writing is made in Aram., then also a translation (see NIV note). In the prologue to Sir., the noun hermēneia and the vb. methermēneuō refer to a translation from Heb. into Gk., although in 47:17 hermēneia refers to "interpretations" alongside songs, proverbs, and parables. diermēneuō occurs only in 2 Macc. 1:36, where it should probably be translated "means."

The use of these words to mean "translate" occurs in Josephus and in Philo. But hermēneia is used in Philo in the quasi-technical sense of articulating thoughts in words. For example, Philo speaks of reproducing something in actual words and of how the image of the divine word articulates the invisible light. In one passage of Philo about Moses and Aaron, hermēneia occurs twice: Aaron is to be Moses' "spokesman"; God will give to Moses the capacity to express thought in words.

3. A purely lexicographical study of hermēneuō cannot take account of the notion of midrash in Jud. However, a broader discussion of the semantic field of "hermeneutics" would not be complete without at least briefly mentioning it. Midrash in Jud. represents both the procedure of interpreting and the result of interpretation. It thus involves investigation, analytical study, midrashic interpretation, and exposition; and then the conveying of the results arrived at. In midrashic lit., interpretation may sometimes proceed by means of specific hermeneutical rules, such as the seven rules formulated by Hillel (ca. 30 B.C.), later expanded to thirty-two in the 2d cent. A.D.

NT 1. More than half of the 20 occurrences of hermēneuō and related words in the NT mean "translate" in a fairly straightforward sense. In the pass. methermēneuō always means "is translated" or "means." Thus Immanuel means "God with us" (Matt. 1:23); the Aram. transliteration "Talitha, koum" means "Little girl ... get up" (Mk. 5:41); Golgotha means a skull (15:22); Messiah means Christ (Jn. 1:41); rabbi means a teacher (1:38); and so on (Mk. 15:34; Acts 4:36; 13:8). The pass. of hermēneuō can be used in the same way (Jn. 1:42; 9:7; Heb. 7:2), as can diermēneuō (Acts 9:36).

An interesting point arises, however, in connection with Jn. 9:7. Siloam does not strictly mean "sent," although the word in the Heb. (šīlōaḥ, Isa. 8:6) is related to the word for "send" (šālaḥ). hermēneuetai here means something broader than "is translated." Siloam conveys the thought expressed by "sent," which is an important key word for Jn. The same can be said of Heb. 7:2. Melchizedek means king of righteousness (Heb. melek, king; ṣedeq, righteousness) only in the broad sense that the name expresses the thought inspired by the language. We have already noted this kind of meaning for hermēneuō in other writers, esp. Philo. The main point about most of the passages in which hermēneuō means translate, however, is the concern of the Evangelists that this language should be intelligible to outsiders or non-Jews.

2. In Lk. 24:27 diermēneuō means to expound or interpret. Beginning with the Pentateuch and the Prophets, Jesus expounded the OT in terms of his own person and mission. Lk.–Acts suggests that this involved esp. such passages as Isa. 53:7–12 (Lk.

22:37; Acts 8:32, 33; cf. Mk. 9:12). Such expounding is parallel to Christ's opening the Scriptures in Lk. 24:32. In the light of Jesus' finished work, OT passages that hitherto had expressed only promise can now be "interpreted" in terms of fulfillment. The OT is seen not simply as an end in itself, but also as a tradition of conceptual and historical paradigms of God's acts that reach their climax in the coming of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 10:11). Thus, while the OT interprets the coming of Christ, Christ also interprets the OT. Hence the Christian interpretation of Isa. 53, for example, can never remain merely "Jewish."

3. The remaining 7 uses of diermēneuō, diermēneutēs, and hermēneia all relate to the interpretation of speaking in tongues (1 Cor. 12:10, 30; 14:5, 13, 26, 27, 28). It is tempting to imagine that this takes the form of "translating" otherwise unintelligible speech. But if speaking in tongues is, as Paul seems to imply (14:14), subrational and preconceptual, it does not provide communicable concepts that may then be "translated" into the native language of the community. Conversely, if glossolalia were already rational and conceptual, it is difficult to see why the speaker could not "interpret" his or her own utterances to the church. In at least four places, however, Paul makes it clear that often the interpreter is different from the one speaking in tongues (1 Cor. 12:10; 14:5, 13, 28).

Furthermore, ecstatic utterance is usually addressed to God rather than to the congregation (1 Cor. 14:2; cf. 14:16). Presumably, then, hermēneia in these verses is an intelligible description of the preconceptual mood or attitude that is expressed in tongues. If this is so, it is conceivable that Paul's injunction to the ecstatic to pray for the capacity to interpret his own utterance is tantamount to short-circuiting the place of tongues in public worship altogether (14:13). At the very least, Paul views tongues as being primarily a private affair between a human and God (14:2–6, 16, 19, 23, 28), but by way of concession allows a maximum of two or three ecstatic utterances in public on condition that someone is present who can interpret them (14:27–28). The basic principle expressed in these passages is the importance of rationality and intelligibility in public worship. Only that which is intelligible can build up the church.

4. We cannot leave a study of this word without saying something about the interpretation of Scripture. In the history of Christian thought up to the present, the study of hermeneutics has taken two distinct forms. (a) Traditionally, hermeneutics has involved the attempt to formulate general rules for the interpretation of biblical texts. But this approach encounters two difficulties. (i) It has become increasingly recognized in the light of biblical criticism that different types of biblical lit. require methodologies of their own. For example, methods used in the interpretation of Jesus' parables must be different from those employed in interpreting Heb. poetry or parts of the Pauline letters. The few general principles that can be universally applied to all types of biblical lit. tend to be so basic as to be obvious—e.g., the need to pay attention to the linguistic context, the historical situation, the literary genre, and the purpose of the writer.

(ii) Nowadays, it is also more widely appreciated that the process of understanding a text is not simply a matter of observing certain hermeneutical rules. Such observance may admittedly constitute a necessary precondition for the correct interpretation of a text, but it does not of itself initiate genuine understanding. It is the recognition of this latter difficulty that leads to a second understanding of the task of hermeneutics.

(b) If the interpreter is to understand a text adequately and correctly, due account must be taken of one's own subjectivity. One's presuppositions, cultural orientation, and psychological capacities shape one's understanding of the text. Some of these presuppositions may act as a barrier to understanding, yet it is more important to note that they also serve as an indispensable point of contact with the subject matter of the text, at least at the commencement of the ongoing process of understanding.

One special aspect of the problem of the relation between the interpreter and the text is that of historical distance. This problem can be illustrated with reference to Bultmann's proposals about demythologizing. He contends that belief in miracles is bound up with a 1st-cent. worldview. But we should also argue that the attitude of modern secular scientists toward miracles equally reflects their own historical position as products of a materialistic, science-oriented culture in the 20th cent. The problem of historicity, therefore, is a two-way issue and concerns the horizons of the modern interpreter as well as those of the text.

In practice the task of hermeneutics is first to recognize and accept the problem of "distance" between the interpreter and the text and then to disentangle what the text actually says from any presuppositions about what at first it merely seems to say in the absence of due critical reflection. The interpreter must not read his or her own ideas into the text. Next, the horizons of the interpreter and the horizons of the text must be brought into a relationship of active engagement and dialogue until the two sets of judgments, or of questions and answers, become eventually fused into one.

This hermeneutic endeavor takes full account of the subjectivity of the interpreter, but without losing sight of the primacy of the text itself. The term hermeneutical circle may be misleading, for in the hermeneutical movement between text and interpreter, genuine progress will be achieved towards a fusion of horizons, provided that there is both critical reflection and a humble listening to the text. It is clear that the hermeneutical problem is a genuine and important one, and it would be a mistake to avoid it by arguing that the interpretation and application of Scripture are exclusively the work of the Holy Spirit. The same might be said about the need for any theological study.

ἔρχομαι (erchomai), come, appear (2262); ἔλευσις (eleusis), coming, advent (1803); εἰσέρχομαι (eiserchomai), come in, enter (1656); ἀπέρχομαι (aperchomai), go away, depart (599); παρεισέρχομαι (pareiserchomai), come in, step in (4209); περιέρχομαι (perierchomai), wander (4320); προέρχομαι (proerchomai), go forward, advance, proceed (4601); προσέρχομαι (proserchomai), go to, approach, accede to (4665); συνέρχομαι (synerchomai), come together, assemble (5302); διέρχομαι (dierchomai), go through, come through (1451); ἐξέρχομαι (exerchomai), go out, come out, get out (2002); ἐπέρχομαι (eperchomai), come, come along, approach (2088); παρέρχομαι (parerchomai), go by, pass by, pass (4216); ἥκω (hēkō), have come, be present (2457).

CL & OT erchomai, a common Gk. word, means come or go, mostly in the lit. sense. It is used metaphorically in a temporal sense: erchontai hēmerai, days are coming (e.g., 1 Sam. 2:31; 2 Ki. 20:17), and also of destruction that comes on people (Prov. 1:26; 6:15). The rare noun eleusis denotes arrival (used in the NT only in Acts 7:52, of the coming of Jesus). hēkō is virtually a synonym for erchomai.

In the LXX the words are used mainly in a literal sense. But coming may have a religious significance. A person may come to sacrifice (1 Sam. 16:2, 5) and to worship and praise God before the sanctuary (Lev. 12:4; 1 Ki. 8:42; Ps. 100:2, 4). The heathen also go into the house of their god (2 Chr. 32:21).

In a metaphorical sense, prayer and supplication (2 Chr. 30:27; Ps. 88:2; 119:170) and human cries (Exod. 3:9; Ps. 102:1) are said to come before God. References to the coming of the Gentiles to Israel and thus to God are bound up with messianic expectation (Isa. 60:5–6; 66:18; Jer. 16:19; Hag. 2:7–8).

OT writers frequently mention God's coming in judgment. But he also comes as Deliverer (Ps. 50:3–4, 15; Isa. 35:4; Zech. 14:5–7), as the Savior who feeds his flock, as the Redeemer who takes away the sin of Jacob, and as the One who brings light to Jerusalem (Isa. 40:10–11; 59:20; 60:1). The hope of God's coming is bound up with messianic expectation. The Messiah will come as the king of peace (Zech. 9:9) and as the one who has been blessed in the name of the Lord (Ps. 118:26). Dan. 7:13 speaks of the coming of "one like a son of man" (→ ho huios tou anthrōpou under huios, 5626).

NT 1. The NT use of erchomai and hēkō follows cl. Gk. usage. The original, spatial meaning is dominant. But it merges into a religious meaning. Coming to Jesus (Jn. 1:39, 47) leads to discipleship. There are the same overtones in the coming of the wise men from the East (Matt. 2:2), which is also of the coming of the heathen. It points to their entry into the kingdom of God (cf. 8:11; Rom. 11:25). The metaphorical sense of events coming in time also occurs, esp. in eschatology: The days or hour are coming when ... (e.g., Matt. 9:15; Mk. 2:20; Jn. 2:4); the fullness of time comes (Gal. 4:4), as does faith (3:23, 25), wrath (Eph. 5:6), and judgment (Rev. 18:10).

2. The addition of various prefixes to erchomai to form compounds gives a wide range of meaning. Usage here generally agrees with cl. Gk. and the LXX.

(a) aperchomai means go away (Mk. 1:35; 6:46; 14:39). It is also used metaphorically of going away from Jesus (Jn. 6:66; Jude 7) and of "the first heaven and the first earth" and "the old order of things" passing away (Rev. 21:1, 4).

(b) dierchomai means go or pass through (Acts 14:24; 15:3, 41; etc.). It is used of death coming "to all men" (Rom. 5:12) and of Jesus as the great high priest passing through the heavens (Heb. 4:14).

(c) eiserchomai, come in, enter, is used of entering the temple or synagogue (Lk. 1:9; 4:16). It is used metaphorically of entering the kingdom, life, and rest (Matt. 18:3; Heb. 3:11, 18).

(d) exerchomai, go out, come out, spread, is used mostly in a lit. sense (e.g., Matt. 14:14). But it is also used metaphorically of the coming forth of the Messiah (2:6), of news spreading (9:26), of the issuing of an emperor's decree (Lk. 2:1), and of demons going out of a person (Mk. 1:25–26). In Johannine language it is used of Jesus' coming forth from God (Jn. 8:42; 13:3).

(e) eperchomai, come along, approach, is an intensive form of erchomai. It is used in a lit. sense (Acts 14:19), in a hostile sense (Lk. 11:22), and in a neutral sense of the coming ages (Eph. 2:7). It denotes the coming of an imminent evil (Lk. 21:26; Jas. 5:1) and of the Spirit (Lk. 1:35; Acts 1:8).

(f) parerchomai, go by, pass by, is used locally (Mk. 6:48; Lk. 18:37) and temporally (Mk. 14:35). It also has the meaning of transgress (Lk. 15:29).

(g) pareiserchomai is used of the coming in of the law (Rom. 5:20), which had a subordinate purpose in God's plan of salvation, and of false brothers who had slipped into the church at Jerusalem (Gal. 2:4).

(h) perierchomai, wander, is used of Jewish itinerant exorcists (Acts 19:13), the going around from house to house of young widows (1 Tim. 5:13), and the roaming around of persecuted witnesses to the faith (Heb. 11:37).

(i) proerchomai, go forward, advance, proceed (Acts 20:5; 2 Cor. 9:5), is used in a metaphorical sense of the precursor of Christ (Lk. 1:17).

(j) proserchomai, go to, approach, is used mostly lit. (e.g., Matt. 5:1). Heb. 4:16 speaks of drawing near to the throne of grace; 10:22 and 11:6 speak of the believer's drawing near to God in a way that far exceeds the prerogative of the high priest.

(k) synerchomai, come together, assemble, can refer to the gathering of a crowd or local church; it can also mean come together in the sense of sexual union (Matt. 1:18).

3. (a) The idea of coming has a theological significance in relation to the coming of Christ and the coming of God and his kingdom. The Synoptic Gospels present Jesus as having come to preach the gospel, not to destroy the Mosaic law but to fulfill it, to call sinners to repentance, not to bring peace but a sword, and to cast fire on the earth (Matt. 5:17; 9:13; Mk. 1:38–39; 2:17; Lk. 5:32; 12:49). The Son of Man has come to give his life a ransom for many and to seek and save the lost (Matt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45; Lk. 19:10).

Jn. bears witness to Jesus as the light of the world (Jn. 1:9; 3:19; 8:12), who came to give to those who belong to him life in all its fullness (10:10). He did not come to judge the world but to save it and to bear witness to the truth (12:46–47; 18:37). He has come from God in the name of the Father (5:43; 8:42; 16:28).

John the Baptist went before him (Lk. 1:17). He too had come and was indeed the Elijah who was to come again (Matt. 11:14, 18; 17:10; Mk. 9:11; cf. Mal. 4:5). John pointed to one mightier than himself who would come (Matt. 3:11; Mk. 1:7; Lk. 3:16).

(b) The coming of Jesus in the flesh (1 Jn. 4:2) gave rise to the doubt that even the imprisoned John entertained: "Are you the one who was to come, or should we expect someone else?" (Matt. 11:3). Jesus will come again in power and glory on the clouds of heaven (24:30; 26:64 par.). Christ will come as judge (16:27; 25:31; Rom. 2:6; 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10). The strength of the Christian hope is shown by the prayer cry Marana tha (1 Cor. 16:22)—"Come, O Lord!" (cf. Rev. 22:20).

Prayer for the coming of the Lord is bound up with prayer for the coming of the kingdom of God (Matt. 6:10; Lk. 11:2). False prophets, messiahs, and even the Antichrist will precede the coming of Christ (Matt. 24:24; Mk. 13:22–23; 2 Thess. 2:3–9; 1 Jn. 2:18). The day and hour of this coming is known only by the Father (Matt. 24:36; Mk. 13:32; Acts 1:7). The Lord will come like a thief in the night (Matt. 24:42–43; Lk. 12:39; 1 Thess. 5:2). Therefore, the disciples must be awake (Matt. 24:44; 25:13).

(c) The Fourth Gospel sees Easter and Pentecost in the light of the coming of Jesus and the Spirit. Jesus will not leave his disciples as orphans, but will return to them as the Living One. The Father and the Son will come and make their home with them (Jn. 14:16–21). Jesus promises help through the coming of the paraklētos (14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7; cf. 16:12–15; 1 Jn. 2:1; → 4156), who will bear witness to Jesus and lead the disciples into all truth.

(d) We are now called to come to this Lord, who has come and who will come again. Jesus refers to this in the parable of the great supper (Matt. 22:1–14; Lk. 14:15–24). But people can refuse to come. In the last analysis, in other words, our response to this invitation is the work of God's grace (Jn. 6:37, 44).

ἐρωτάω (erōtaō), ask, ask a question, request (2263); ἐπερωτάω (eperōtaō), ask (2089); ἐπερώτημα (eperōtēma), question, request, appeal (2090).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. erōtaō means to ask, ask a question. eperōtaō means to consult a person or to put a question. Later Gk. used it technically for putting a formal question at a meeting or in the process of making a contract. It may even mean to accept the terms of a treaty. In religious contexts both vbs. can mean to put a question to an oracle or a god. The noun eperōtēma can mean a question put to another person or to someone in authority for a formal, binding answer.

2. In the LXX erōtaō commonly means ask (e.g., Gen. 24:47, 57; Exod. 3:13; Isa. 41:28). eperōtaō is used for the same idea (e.g., Gen. 24:23; 26:7; Isa. 19:3), including inquiry of God (e.g., 65:1). eperōtēma occurs only in Theodotion's version of Dan. 4:14 and in Sir. 33:3.

NT 1. erōtaō occurs 63x in the NT; it commonly means to ask, inquire. Jesus' questions and counterquestions were part of his teaching method, designed to expose the person concerned to the implications of one's own questions or make someone reflect on one's attitudes (e.g., Matt. 16:13; 19:17; 21:24). It is also used of the theological questions put by the disciples (Mk. 4:10; Lk. 9:45; Acts 1:6). Jn. 16:23 implies that in the future salvation there will be no need to ask Jesus any more questions. Asking implies imperfect knowledge, which will be overcome by perfect fellowship with Jesus (cf. 16:30; cf. 16:5, 19). Conversely, Jesus does not need to ask questions, for he knows already what is in a human being (2:25).

In Jn. asking is characteristic of the doubting, contentious questions of the Jews (e.g., Jn. 1:19, 21, 25). But it may be compared with the question of the Greeks (12:21) and with those of Jesus, who asks things for his disciples of the Father (14:16; 17:9, 15, 20). The vb. is used of the efficacy of intercession by believers for one another in 1 Jn. 5:16. This use extends to the believer a sense of the vb. that in Jn. is otherwise applied to Jesus. In 2 Jn. 5 it describes the action of the author in begging his readers to follow love (cf. v. 6). In Acts 1:6 it means to ask (a question). Elsewhere it generally means to request: of the disciples to Jesus (Matt. 15:23; Lk. 4:38), of the Jews to Pilate (Jn. 19:31), and in Lk.'s writings of invitations (Lk. 7:36; 11:37; Acts 10:48; 18:20).

2. eperōtaō is nearly as common (56x) and is most frequent in the Gospels. The basic sense is to ask—i.e., synonymous with erōtaō (e.g., Matt. 16:1; Mk. 9:32; Lk. 2:46; 1 Cor. 14:35). However, certain nuances of meaning may be detected in some passages.

(a) Seeking. The Pharisees and Sadducees, traditionally enemies, join together to ask for a sign that might accredit Jesus with popular authority (Matt. 16:1). In Rom. 10:20, Paul quotes Isa. 65:1 regarding those who "did not seek" (→ zēteō, 2426) him and who "did not ask" (eperōtaō) for him. This verse in Isa. applies to Yahweh's willingness to be found by disobedient Israel, even though Israel did not seek him. Paul applies this principle to the Gentiles, who in times past did not seek Yahweh but now have found him through faith in Christ, whereas Israel remains disobedient and estranged. To them Isa. 65:2 still applies.

(b) Probing. In debate the opponents of Jesus ask probing questions, to which an answer must be given, and Jesus put counterquestions (Matt. 22:46; Mk. 11:29; Lk. 6:9).

(c) Questioning an authority. Several passages imply that a questioner is approaching an authority higher than himself. On feast days and Sabbaths the temple Sanhedrin informally received questions and stated their traditions, and on one such occasion the boy Jesus put questions to the temple elders (Lk. 2:46). In a similar sense, the disciples dared not question Jesus about a passion prediction (Mk. 9:32), and the Corinthian wives were to ask their husbands at home about church matters (1 Cor. 14:35).

3. The noun eperōtēma is found in the NT only at 1 Pet. 3:21 in respect of baptism: "This water symbolizes baptism that now saves you also—not the removal of dirt from the body but the pledge [eperōtēma] of a good conscience toward God." If "pledge" is an accurate meaning here, it denotes a statement of faith given by the one being baptized in answer to a formal question. This person should make such a statement with a clear conscience. Possibly it also means that baptism itself is a prayer to God for a good conscience. Or again, it may mean the answer by God to a such a question, i.e., the granting of a clear conscience toward God (cf. Heb. 10:19–25).

2266 ἐσθίω

ἐσθίω (esthiō), eat (2266).

CL & OT 1. Along with drinking, eating is necessary to maintain physical life. On a physical level there are two extremes in eating: gluttony and asceticism. Beyond the physical, people have sought to commune with the deity through sacramental meals and foods and so obtain a share in the immortal powers of life or even in the deity itself.

2. All food is understood in the OT as the gift of God, whether it is cultivated by human beings or grown naturally (Deut. 14:4). This places humankind under obligation to God and under his command (Gen. 3:2–3). Thus, abstinence from or consumption of certain foods (2:17; Lev. 7:23–27 = LXX 7:13–17) are tests of human obedience. Disobedience can bring punishment (Gen. 3:6, 17). But in general, the satisfaction of one's need of food is traced to God (Ps. 22:26); not having enough to eat or being unable to eat (102:4, 9–10) are evidences of God's anger and punishment (cf. Hos. 4:10).

The righteous and the devout do not need to worry about food (Ps. 127:2; Isa. 3:10; cf. Matt. 6:25), for their relationship with God is in order (Eccl. 9:7). After the meal God should be praised (Deut. 8:10) and not forgotten (6:11–12). Since eating is not something we should do in isolation but as an expression of our relationship with God, we must share our bread with the hungry (Isa. 58:7; cf. Lk. 16:19–25). One can eat and drink to God's glory (Exod. 24:11; cf. 1 Cor. 10:31) and make ritual sacrifices of food to him (Lev. 2:3, 6, 9–16). Isa. 22:13 describes the irresponsible behavior of those who care for nothing but eating and drinking (cf. Matt. 24:38; Lk. 12:19; 1 Cor. 15:32).

NT 1. The various traditions about John the Baptist (Matt. 11:18; Mk. 1:6; 2:18) recount that he fasted and lived abstemiously. The Gospels recount how Jesus cultivated table fellowship with others (e.g., Pharisees, Lk. 7:36) as well as with his disciples (Mk. 14:18). The complaint that Jesus was eating with tax collectors and sinners is met in Mk. 2:16–17 by the statement that Jesus had not come to call the righteous but sinners (→ pinō, 4403). Esp. important in Luke is the fact of the disciples' eating with Christ after he had risen from the dead (Lk. 24:30–31, 35, 41–43; Acts 1:4; 10:41).

The mode of life of the early Christian church was by no means ascetic. Believers had joyful common meals (Acts 2:46), and ritual prohibitions were rejected (Gal. 2:12). Table fellowship symbolized fellowship in general. Even Luke's account of the Parousia retains the significance of table fellowship in the kingdom of God (Lk. 14:15; 22:30). The stories of the feedings in Mk. 6:34–44 and 8:1–9 are part of the miracle stories that glorify Jesus' power and greatness.

2. Eating is discussed in the context of mission insofar as the missionary is entitled to support (1 Cor. 9:14; cf. Matt. 10:10; Lk. 10:7). The command to work belongs among the exhortations to the church, for whoever will not work should not eat (2 Thess. 3:10).

3. Eating and drinking became a problem in Corinth, where certain groups sought to prove their strength and freedom by deliberately participating in sacrifices to idols (1 Cor. 10:14–20). Paul had to point out that one can have communion either with God or with idols and demons, but not both; they are mutually exclusive (10:20–22). A further question was the permissibility of buying in the marketplace and eating meat sacrificed to idols. Paul answered this question in the affirmative (10:25), but with the proviso that one has to take into account "weak" believers (1 Cor. 8:9–13; 10:32; cf. Rom. 14:1–15:6).

Even the Lord's Supper gave rise to a crisis in Corinth, for in the absence of the apostle certain irregularities endangered the common meal (the love feast) that preceded the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:17–34). The more well-to-do members of the church apparently came early with food and gorged themselves on it. When the poorer people and slaves arrived, there was little food left, so that "one remains hungry, another gets drunk" (11:21). Such lack of love set a most inappropriate context for the Lord's Supper and thus desecrated the unifying body and blood of the Lord. In other words, these abuses indicated a failure of the church in Corinth to understand itself at the Lord's Supper as the body of Christ (cf. 6:15; 10:16; 11:29; 12:27). In the common celebration of the Lord's Supper, all the members of the church, rich and poor alike, ought to take part in love.

4. (a) Jn. raises other questions. The true bread that comes down from heaven (Jn. 6:32) is Jesus himself (6:35, 48). Eating of him as the bread of life means believing in him and so receiving eternal life (6:47–51). This section has traditionally been interpreted as an allusion to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, when we symbolically "eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood" (6:53, cf. 54–56).

(b) The eating of the little scroll in Rev. (10:9–10; cf. Ezek. 3:1–3) means the real appropriation of the revelation, the content of which (cf. ch. 12ff.) is described as "sweet" (denoting victory) and "sour" (symbolizing struggle).

5. It is not clear what the "altar" in Heb. 13:10 refers to. The author is here contrasting those who adhere to the old covenant with those who believe in Jesus. The latter draw spiritual sustenance from the sacrifice of Christ, which is not available to the former. There may also be an allusion here to the Lord's Supper.

2274 ἔσχατος

ἔσχατος (eschatos), (adj.) extreme, last, least; (as neut. noun), end; ἐσχάτως (eschatōs), finally (2275).

CL & OT 1. (a) In cl. Gk. the adj. eschatos (a superlative form derived from the prep. ek/ex, out of, away from) spatially meant the place furthest away (the utmost ends of the earth); temporally, the last events of a series; materially, the extreme (mostly the lowest place in order of rank). Substantivally, to eschaton meant the end in spatial and temporal respects; it could also be used as an adv., like eschatōs, to mean "finally."

(b) In Gk. thinking eschatos often designates the end point of a continuously conceived succession of circumstances. In qualitative respects eschatos designates an extreme positive or negative intensification (e.g., the greatest injustice or extreme danger). In Aristotle the term denotes the conclusion of a logical path of thought. As the expression of order of rank among human beings, eschatos means the opposite of prōtos (first). The temporal dimension is the least developed sense of eschatos. Gk. thought, for example, has no developed eschatological understanding of time, i.e., one directed toward a future goal or end of the historical process.

2. The very different historical understanding of existence in the OT is immediately apparent in that of its 150x in the LXX, eschatos has local significance only in isolated cases (e.g., Deut. 28:49; Isa. 48:20; 49:6; Jer. 6:22). Its use is predominantly in the temporal sense to mean last, finally, outcome, end. In the historical books the word plays no real role, apart from the characteristic and stereotyped phrase "from beginning to end" (cf. 2 Chr. 16:11; 20:34; 25:26). On the other hand, eschatos features particularly in prophetic and apocalyptic expectations of the future.

(a) A number of prophets use the formula "in the last days" (lit., "at the end of the days"; e.g., Isa. 2:2; Hos. 3:5; Mic. 4:1; cf. Jer. 23:20; 49:39 = LXX 25:18; Ezek. 38:16). This indicates the future-directed thinking of the prophets, which pointed Israel's self-understanding—until then largely orientated around past events—in a new direction. Moreover, the context in which this formulation is found reveals that the prophets do not think of "the end of the days" as a renewed historical time span, the final or end time.

It is noteworthy that this formula is mostly encountered in announcements of salvation. Eschatological time will be stamped by Yahweh's saving activity. Yahweh will make it possible for his people to turn back (Hos. 3:5). He will destroy his enemies (Jer. 23:20; 30:24 = LXX 37:24). The nations will come to Jerusalem and receive instruction from Israel (Isa. 2:2–4; Mic. 4:1–5). Salvation will penetrate "to the ends of the earth" (Isa. 48:20; 49:6). However much the individual pictures of salvation presented by the various prophets differ, the expectation of a comprehensive age of salvation at the end of time brought in by Yahweh himself is common to them all.

(b) Apocalyptic literature contains numerous allusions to the end of the days (e.g., Dan. 2:28, 45; 10:14; 2 Esd. 6:34; 2 Bar. 6:8). Such literature is distinguished from the prophetic expectation by the progression from the more simple pictures of the future into the realm of the visionary, allegorical, and other-worldly. A certain element of calculation concerning the final times is discernible (Dan. 8:19–25; 10:14; 12:5–12; 2 Esd. 14:5). According to the apocalyptic outlook, dramatic battles will take place between various world powers. There will be cosmic catastrophes in the end times before Yahweh establishes his transcendent, imperishable kingdom (cf. esp. Dan. 2:3–45; 7:17–27). The end of this world signifies the beginning of the coming one (2 Esd. 6:7; 7:113).

3. The formula "the end of the days" is also found in the Dead Sea Scrolls (e.g., 1QpHab 2:5–6; 9:6; CD 4:4; 6:11). The calculating tendency of apocalyptic has hardened into a rigid deterministic understanding of the final time. It is the fixed and predetermined time of divine visitation (1QS 3:18, 23; CD 8:2–3), when the godless and wickedness will be annihilated, but the righteous and truth will live forever (1QS 4:18–23; 1QH 6:30–31). It is not the saving character of the final times that stands in the foreground—as it does in the prophets—but the day of disaster, judgment, and vengeance (1QS 10:18–21; CD 19:5–16). Only a small community of elect (4QFlor 3:19) will be saved.

NT As in the LXX, the spatial aspect of eschatos in the NT fades into the background. True, in Acts (1:8; 13:47), as in Isa., the spatial formula "to the ends of the earth" has a universal eschatological significance. More important are the material overtones of the least and lowest (e.g., Lk. 14:9), frequently in the antithesis of prōtos and eschatos (e.g., Mk. 9:35). But in the NT, the chief stress falls on the temporal dimension of eschatos. In contrast to past periods of time, Jesus has come "in these last days" (Heb. 1:2). eschatos also contrasts the final future of God with the present (e.g., Jn. 11:24).

1. The Synoptic Gospels record 4x this maxim from Jesus: "Many who are first will be last, and many who are last will be first" (Matt. 19:30; 20:16; Mk. 10:31; Lk. 13:30). This aphorism possibly meant originally something like: "How quickly one's fortunes can change overnight." But in the mouth of Jesus it undergoes an eschatological radicalization as the conclusion of a discussion concerning the rewards of discipleship (Mk. 10:28–31 par.). In society, kings, rulers, and nobles are first; slaves and outcasts are the last. In the coming kingdom age, however, this precedence will be reversed, as God stands on the side of those who are the last and lowest on earth. To them, like the poor followers of Jesus, the kingdom of God is promised, whereas those who regard themselves as its first candidates are excluded (Matt. 8:11–12; Lk. 13:28–30). Jesus' followers are given the commission of realizing now in the present this eschatological reversal. Thus, Jesus answers the disciples' disputes about seniority with the reminder: "If anyone wants to be first, he must be the very last, and the servant of all" (Mk. 9:35).

2. (a) Both the way of life and the proclamation of Paul are in accord with this instruction of Jesus. He counters the Corinthian enthusiasts by saying that God has paraded the apostles as the lowest of men, like those condemned to death, a spectacle and the scum of the world (1 Cor. 4:9–13; cf. 15:8, where with the thought of negative quality is linked the significance of the chronological conclusion of the list of witnesses).

(b) Within the framework of Paul's Adam–Christ typology (cf. Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:21–22), the apostle contrasts in 15:45 the first man (Adam) with Christ ("the last Adam"). Adam and Christ are not here thought of as individual persons, but each as representative of a whole humanity. The "last Adam" therefore does not mean the last person either numerically or chronologically, but Christ as the new, the second representative of a new humanity created in his image. Paul therefore understands the risen Christ, the creator of life, as the eschatological prototype of God's new humanity. With his resurrection the final time has already begun.

(c) The letters of other authors confirm that this idea belonged to early Christian eschatology generally. In Heb. 1:2 the prophetic expectation of the final times, expressed in the formula "in these last days," relates to the present time of the early Christians, in which God "has spoken to us by his Son." With the enthronement of Jesus as Son and as Lord of creation the turning-point of the ages has come. Peter also speaks of Christ as "revealed in these last times" (1 Pet. 1:20; cf. also Mk. 12:6), and John makes the recipients of his letter emphatically aware that they are living in "the last hour" (1 Jn. 2:18). The characteristics of the final time, now dawned, include the outpouring of the Spirit (Acts 2:17; cf. Joel 2:28–32), the growth of moral corruption (2 Tim. 3:1–9), and the appearance of scoffers (2 Pet. 3:3; Jude 18) and antichrists (1 Jn. 2:18).

(d) The term eschatos does not, however, serve merely to denote the new time that began with the coming of Jesus. It also refers to the final, consummative action of God that is still to come. In 1 Cor. 15:23–28 Paul expresses the chronological sequence of the future events of the final times. In this scheme death is chronologically the last and physically the hardest enemy to be destroyed before the final goal (→ telos, 5465) of God is reached (15:26–28).

3. Only in Jn.'s Gospel is explicit allusion found to the "last day" (6:39–40, 44, 54; 11:24; 12:48). The expression takes up and continues the prophetic exposition of the "day of Yahweh." The decisive mark of the "last day" is the resurrection of the dead. The judgment of unbelievers (12:48) represents the negative side of this. Thus in the expectation of the end in Jn.'s Gospel, as in the eschatological proclamation of the OT prophets, what stands in the foreground is not judgment but all-embracing salvation.

4. Rev. presents a vision of the "seven last plagues," through which the divine wrath is discharged (15:1; 21:9). But note that the climax of this vision is not in the annihilation of enemies, but in the song of praise to the Lamb (15:3–4; 19:7–8; 21:22).

Also in Rev. is found the formula "the first and the last" as a self-designation of the exalted Christ (1:17; 2:8; 22:13). This goes back to the description of God in Isa. 41:4; 44:6; 48:12. This formula belongs essentially to the synonymous phrases "the Alpha and the Omega" (Rev. 1:8; 21:6; 22:13) and "the Beginning and the End" (22:13). The application of these divine predicates to the exalted Christ means the ascription to him of a rank equal with God in the attribution of his functions of Creator and Perfecter.

ἐσώτερος (esōteros), inner; with art., the inner shrine (2278).

CL & OT esōteros is an adj. in the comparative state, used to describe things as being further in the interior, more inward, or more intimate. In the LXX it is used as the prep. within (e.g., the inner shrine of the tabernacle or within the curtain [Exod. 26:33; Lev. 16:2, 12, 15], also the innermost part of the cave where David and his men hid [1 Sam. 24:4], and as an adj. describing doors, gates, porches, etc., in the palace-temple complex (e.g., 2 Chr. 4:22; Ezek. 8:3).

NT As an attributive adj. esōteros describes the inner cell of the prison in Philippi where Paul and Silas were kept (Acts 16:24). The subst. form with the art. is used metaphorically for the heavenly Most Holy Place, which Jesus has entered for us (Heb. 6:19). It corresponds to the inner shrine of the tabernacle, the place of the invisible presence of the God of Israel.

2279 ἑταῖρος

ἑταῖρος (hetairos), comrade, companion, friend (2279).

CL & OT The noun hetairos means "one who is linked to another" in some fashion, determined only by the context. The link may be military, religious, political, or simply friendship. It is often used of peers or in reference to inferiors: e.g., pupils associated by virtue of sharing a teacher, or soldiers linked together and addressed by a superior officer.

In the LXX hetairos commonly translates rēaʿ (friend) and its cognates, but twice represents ḥābēr (associate, companion: Song 1:7; 8:13). Philo uses the term of friends and companions, while Josephus applies it not only to soldiers and junior officials, but also to bad company. In the Jerusalem Talmud ḥābēr is applied to qualified teachers who for some reason have not yet been ordained as official rabbis. At Qumran, the same Heb. word group refers to anyone in the community.

NT hetairos is found only 3x in the NT, all in the vocative (Matt. 20:13; 22:12; 26:50). In each case, the person speaking is addressing an inferior who has insulted him in some way, though the words are without malice. Moreover, the speaker and the person addressed are in some sort of relationship. In the two parables the speaker has the last word; in the climactic incident Jesus suffers at the hands of his betrayer, yet the impression is unfailingly transmitted that Jesus is still in control of his destiny (cf. Matt. 26:53; Jn. 10:17–18).

ἕτοιμος (hetoimos), ready, prepared (2289); ἑτοίμως (hetoimōs), readily (2290); ἑτοιμάζω (hetoimazō), get ready, hold in readiness (2286); ἑτοιμασία (hetoimasia), state of readiness, preparation (2288); προετοιμάζω (proetoimazō), prepare beforehand (4602).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. this word group denotes preparation, both in the act. sense (make ready) and in pass. (readiness, ability). Only in Homer is it found with a religious sense, in connection with preparation for sacrifice.

2. In the LXX these words chiefly translate kûn (esp. niph. and hiph.); the principal meanings are to establish, set up, make, prepare, get ready. (a) Though used in a secular sense, they can have a religious meaning in connection with the Passover (2 Chr. 35:4, 6), sacrificial animals (Num. 23:1, 29), the ark (1 Chr. 15:1; 2 Chr. 1:4), and the temple (31:11).

(b) These words are also used for the divine activity of creation, preparation, and establishing. (i) God has established the heavens (Prov. 3:19; 8:27), founded the earth upon the waters (Ps. 24:2), and established the mountains (65:6). He prepares rain (147:8), provides food for his creatures (65:9), and concerns himself with their destiny (Gen. 24:14, 44).

(ii) God's creation and providence extend also to his acts of salvation in history. He has established Israel to be his people forever (2 Sam. 7:24) and sworn that he will bring them into a land appointed for them (Exod. 23:20; Ezek. 20:6). Therefore, he creates food for them (Ps. 78:19–20) and, despite their unbelief and their enemies, leads them into the sanctuary that his own hands have prepared (Exod. 15:17). Moreover, he sets up the kings of Israel (esp. David) and establishes their rule (Ps. 89:4; cf. 2 Sam. 7:12; 1 Chr. 14:2; 17:11).

(iii) God does all this because his faithfulness is established in the heavens (Ps. 89:2). There he has set up his throne from the beginning (93:2; 103:19), founded on righteousness and justice (89:14). He has established it for judgment (9:7); for the judgment day he has prepared a sacrifice (Zeph. 1:7–8).

(c) This all-embracing work of God in creating and providing for his people does, however, demand self-preparation and readiness on our part. The people and Moses are called on to prepare themselves (ritually) for the revelation of God at Sinai (Exod. 19:10–11, 15; 34:2). The prophets challenge Israel to prepare to meet their God

(Amos 4:12; cf. Mic. 6:8; 2 Chr. 27:6). This involves the preparation of the heart (Sir. 2:17; cf. Ps. 57:7; 108:1; Sir. 2:1; 18:23).

NT 1. In the NT the noun hetoimasia occurs only once (Eph. 6:15), but the vbs. hetoimazō and proetoimazō between them appear 42x, and the adj. and adv. 20x. When used with reference to objects, the meaning corresponds with that in the OT, though the words of this group are not used with reference to God's creation and providence in nature, and in a cultic setting only with reference to the Passover (e.g., Matt. 26:17, 19). Apart from their secular meaning, they connote God's activity of provision in terms of the history of salvation and one's self-preparation and readiness.

2. In his song of praise Simeon declares: "My eyes have seen your salvation, which you have prepared in the sight of all people" (Lk. 2:30–31; cf. 3:6; Isa. 52:10). The world is unable in its own light to recognize the salvation present in Jesus; God has prepared it for those who love him (1 Cor. 2:9). By his free elective grace, God makes "the riches of his glory known to the objects of his mercy, whom he prepared in advance for glory" (Rom. 9:23). Jesus comforts his disciples by saying, "I am going [to my Father's house] to prepare a place for you" (Jn. 14:2–3).

Peter likewise encourages the Christians undergoing trials in Asia Minor by telling them that they "are shielded by God's power until the coming of the salvation that is ready [hetoimos] to be revealed in the last time" (1 Pet. 1:5). He also writes them that God is "ready to judge the living and the dead" (4:5). The invitation, "Come, for everything is now ready" (Lk. 14:17; cf. Matt. 22:4, 8; Jn. 7:6), has gone out, but many have proved unworthy. No one, however, can glory in his or her own works, "for we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to do good works, which God prepared in advance for us to do" (Eph. 2:10; cf. 2 Tim. 2:21).

3. To this sphere, which is marked out by God's work of preparation arising from his free elective choice, belong also the statements about our own self-preparation and readiness. The OT call, "In the desert prepare the way for the LORD" (Isa. 40:3), is applied in the NT to John the Baptist (Matt. 3:3; Mk. 1:3; Lk. 3:4), who by his preaching of repentance prepares the way for the coming of the Lord to his people.

The Lord who has come is also the Lord who is coming, like a thief in the night or like a bridegroom to his wedding. The church is thus exhorted to be "ready" for his coming (Matt. 24:44; Lk. 12:40). Only those virgins who are ready when he arrives will be let in (Matt. 25:10). The servant who has made nothing ready despite the knowledge of his master's will stands condemned (Lk. 12:47). The church too must be ready "to do whatever is good" (Tit. 3:1), "to give an answer to everyone" (1 Pet. 3:15; cf. Eph. 6:15), and "to punish every act of disobedience" (2 Cor. 10:6). The apostle Paul notes his own readiness not only to be imprisoned but even to die for the Lord Jesus in Jerusalem (Acts 21:13).

2293 Εὔα

Εὔα (Heua), Eve (2293).

OT Gen. 3:20 derives the name Eve from the fact that she was the "mother of all the living." The first creation narrative tells of the creation of man and woman together in the image of God (1:27). In the second narrative (2:18–25), woman was formed from man to be his helper. In Gen. 3 it is the woman who heeds the blandishments of the serpent and eats the forbidden fruit before giving some to her husband. It is only after the fall that the name Eve is mentioned. She is mentioned as the mother of Cain (4:1) and Abel, but not elsewhere in the OT.

NT Eve is mentioned by name in 2 Cor. 11:3 and 1 Tim. 2:13. The latter passage alludes to Gen. 2–3 in support of Paul's argument why he does "not permit a woman to teach or to have authority over a man" (1 Tim. 2:12), for the Gen. story depicts Adam being formed first and the woman being deceived first. For Paul the story is symbolic of the role of the sexes in life in general and that of the church. In 2 Cor. 11:3 the deception of Eve by the serpent is seen as an example of how Christians may be led astray.

2294 (euangelizō, bring or announce good news, proclaim, preach), → 2295.

2295 εὐαγγέλιον

εὐαγγέλιον (euangelion), good news, gospel (2295); εὐαγγελίζω (euangelizō), bring or announce good news, proclaim, preach (2294); εὐαγγελιστής (euangelistēs), proclaimer of glad tidings or of the gospel, evangelist (2296); προευαγγελίζομαι (proeuangelizomai), announce the good news beforehand (4603).

CL & OT 1. (a) The words in this word group are derived from angelos, messenger (→ 34), or angellō, to bear a message, announce (→ 33). In cl. Gk. a euangelos, messenger, is someone who brings a message of victory or other political or personal news that causes joy. In the Hel. period the word also meant one who announces oracles. Similarly, the vb. euangelizomai means to speak as a messenger of gladness, to proclaim good news; and, where it is used in a religious sense, to promise. But the vb. is often found with its original sense weakened to make it synonymous with angellō.

(b) The noun euangelion means: (i) the reward received by a messenger of victory (since his good news brings relief to the recipients, he is rewarded); (ii) the message itself—chiefly a technical term for a message of victory, but also used of political and private messages bringing joy. Such messages are seen as gifts from the gods. When they are received, sacrifices are offered to the gods out of gratitude, but also in order to hold the gods to their gift. (iii) It is mainly in connection with oracles (i.e., the promise of some future event) and in the imperial cult that euangelion acquires a religious meaning. In this latter sphere news of a divine ruler's birth, coming of age, or enthronement, as well as his speeches, decrees, and acts, are glad tidings that bring long-hoped-for fulfillment to the longings of the world for happiness and peace. It is not difficult to trace a connection between this religious use of euangelion in the Hel. world, esp. in the imperial cult, and its use in the NT.

2. (a) At the same time the OT roots of the NT concept of euangelion must not be ignored. In the LXX euangelion never appears in the sing. form. The pl. means reward for good news (2 Sam. 4:10). Occasionally euangelia, a form unknown in the NT, also appears in the sense of glad tidings (e.g., 2 Sam. 18:20, 22).

(b) More significant is the fact that the vb. euangelizō—not found frequently elsewhere and limited to a few writings—comes to stand for the Heb. biśśar, to announce, tell, publish (e.g., 1 Ki. 1:42; Jer. 20:15). This vb. is used in Ps. 40:9; 68:11; 96:2; Isa. 52:7, to herald Yahweh's universal victory over the world and his kingly rule. With his enthronement (cf. Ps. 96 as an enthronement psalm) and return to Zion

(cf. Isa.) a new era begins. The one who brings "good tidings" (euangelizomenos, Isa. 40:9; 52:7) announces this new era of world history and inaugurates it by his mighty word. Peace and salvation have now come; Yahweh has become king; his reign extends over the whole world (Ps. 96:2–10).

This "'gospel' is effective speech, a powerful saying, a word that brings its own fulfillment. In the mouth of his messengers God himself speaks, and his word is accomplished; he commands and it is done (cf. Ps. 33:6, 9). The act of proclamation is itself the dawn of the new era. Hence it is easy to understand the special significance that attaches to the messenger of the good news. With his arrival on the scene and the delivery of his message, salvation, redemption, and peace become a reality (cf. Isa. 61:1).

3. Rab. Jud. kept alive the concept of the messenger of good tidings. He was variously expected: as an unknown figure, as the forerunner of the Messiah, or as the Messiah himself. The content of his message was already familiar from Isa. and was thus no longer of primary interest. The important thing about him was rather his coming and the fact that by his proclamation he would usher in the era of salvation. Everything depended on his appearance and proclamation (cf. Pesiq. Rab. 36).

Here we may make the same observation as was made concerning OT usage. The eschatological event finds expression in the Heb. vb. (biśśar means to preach the message of coming joy) and esp. the participial noun (mᵉbaśśēr, the eschatological messenger of joy), but not in the noun bᵉśōrâ, good news. This fact suggests that the NT term euangelion is derived from Gk. usage rather than Heb., or more precisely from the language of the imperial cult. The main difference is in the content of the euangelion.

NT 1. Although the vb. euangelizō and the noun euangelion are important NT terms, the two words are found with varying degrees of frequency in its various writings. euangelizō is found only once in Matt. (11:5); in Lk.–Acts, on the other hand, it occurs 25x, in Paul 21x. The vb. is not found in Mk., but the noun occurs there 8x, and 4x in Matt.; Luke uses the noun only 2x (Acts 15:7; 20:24), but Paul uses it 60x. Both are virtually absent from the Johannine writings. It would be a mistake, however, to assume that because certain NT writings do not use the vb. or noun, the thought expressed by them is lacking. In Johannine writings, for instance, the concept is expressed by words such as martyreō, to witness, and martyria, witness (→ 3456).

2. According to Matt. 24:14; 26:13; Mk. 1:15; 8:35; 10:29; 13:10; 14:9 (cf. also Matt. 4:23; 9:35; Mk. 1:1, 14), Jesus used euangelion (or, the Aram. word underlying it). Perhaps he used it to indicate that the words of messianic expectation in Isa. 35 and 61 are fulfilled in his words and actions (cf. Matt. 11:5; Lk. 7:22, where "the good news is preached" is euangelizontai; see also 4:18). But if so, they are fulfilled in a way that will disappoint (Matt. 11:6) the expectations popularly attached to the messenger of glad tidings in Isa. (i.e., political liberation and destruction of Israel's enemies). Certainly the answer in Matt. 11:5–6 to the Baptist's question means that the glad tidings awaited since Isa. are now being proclaimed and are already effective.

There is no doubt that Jesus saw his message of the coming kingdom of God (Mk. 1:14), which was already present in his words and actions, as good news: "Blessed are your eyes because they see, and your ears because they hear" (Matt. 13:16). This message of joy is no longer to be separated from the messenger who brings it, and this messenger is Jesus himself (cf. Matt. 5:1–2; Lk. 11:20). Moreover, he is also its subject, the one of whom the message tells. It was thus consistent for the early church to take up the term euangelion to describe the message of salvation connected with the coming of Jesus.

3. Paul solidified the term euangelion in the vocabulary of the NT, though its use preceded him. His frequent use of this word absolutely (at least 23x) suggests that he was taking over phraseology already familiar to his readers. Perhaps in the early churches this terminology had developed by analogy out of that associated with the "gospel" of the imperial cult, though in conscious opposition to the latter. In the missionary outreach, the message of salvation through Jesus Christ came into conflict with the political message because of its universal claims. It was inevitable that OT statements and ideas, esp. from Isa., would become linked with this Hel. terminology.

In Paul euangelion becomes a central concept of his theology. It means the familiar good news: that God has acted for the salvation or redemption of the world in the incarnation, death, and resurrection of Jesus (cf. the development of these ideas in confessional formulae in Rom. 1:1–4; 1 Cor. 15:3–7). Insofar as this event is promised in the OT, the OT belongs to the gospel (→ proeuangelizomai in Gal. 3:8). However, euangelion, as used by Paul, does not mean only the content of what is preached, but also the act, process, and execution of the proclamation. Content and process of preaching are one. They are not separated in thought (Rom. 1:1), apart from when they are set close alongside each other (1 Cor. 9:14, 18). For in the very act of proclamation the content of the euangelion becomes reality and brings about the salvation it contains.

The action of proclamation is denoted not only by the vb. euangelizō (as in 1 Cor. 1:17), but also by euangelion used as a noun of action. Thus in 2 Cor. 8:18 euangelion means preaching of the gospel. Similarly, the gen. in the phrases gospel "of God" or "of Christ" (e.g., Rom. 1:1; 15:16; 1 Cor. 9:12; 2 Cor. 2:12) should be taken as both obj. and subj.: Christ or God is both the content and author of the gospel. It is difficult to make a clear distinction here, since Paul sometimes stresses the one aspect and sometimes the other.

Wherever it is proclaimed, this gospel is charged with power. It creates faith (Rom. 1:16–17; Phil. 1:27), and brings salvation, life (Rom. 1:16; 1 Cor. 15:2), and judgment (Rom. 2:16). It reveals God's righteousness (1:17), brings the fulfillment of hope (Col. 1:5, 23), intervenes in the lives of people, and creates churches. Since this gospel is no human invention (Gal. 1:11), but rather God or Christ is himself speaking through his messengers, the apostles, the gospel is closely associated with the apostolate (2 Cor. 10–13; cf. also Gal. 2:7–8). Just as in Isa. 40:9; 52:7; and Nah. 1:15 the heralds and watchmen on the walls proclaim the coming of God, so the messengers proclaim the gospel (Rom. 10:15).

Paul was conscious of having been called to bring the gospel esp. to the Gentiles (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:16) and so to carry the eschatological event beyond the borders of Israel (Rom. 15:19). His whole activity was euangelizesthai (1 Cor. 1:17). As one who shares in the blessings of the gospel (9:23), he could thus speak of "my/our gospel" (e.g., Rom. 16:25; 2 Cor. 4:3). By this he meant the one gospel that was preached in Jerusalem (Gal. 1:6–9; 2 Cor. 10:13–16) but that had now broken out of the bounds of the Jewish law and become the gospel for the Gentiles, freed from the law (Rom. 1:15; Gal. 1:16; 2:7–8). Paul's opponents, by contrast, have "a different gospel" (2 Cor. 11:4; Gal. 1:6–10). But since apostleship and preaching the gospel belong together, every attack on Paul and his apostleship is an attack on the gospel and vice versa. To preach the gospel is not to commend oneself, but to commend the Lord (2 Cor. 4:5, 10:18; Gal. 1:10).

4. In Paul's later writings, these same uses continue. The euangelion was entrusted to him as a preacher, apostle, and teacher (2 Tim. 1:10–11). Its message of Jesus Christ—descended from David and risen from the dead (2:8)—is not limited to a single, past event but is experienced as a word charged with power in the present so that it cannot be fettered by human chains (2:9). It brings peace (Eph. 2:17; 6:15) and draws together those who are near and those who are far off (i.e., Gentiles and Jews, 3:1–9). It gives salvation (1:13) and has "brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tim. 1:10). In 1 Pet., the euangelion is not a human word but the word of God (1:12); it produces rebirth and new life (1:23–25).

5. In a similar manner, in the Synoptic Gospels, euangelion is the name given to the good news of the saving event in Jesus Christ as preached in the church. The separate Evangelists do, however, have different emphases when it comes to detail.

(a) Mk. stands close to the Pauline use of euangelion, always using it absolutely (except at 1:1, 14). Mk. and Paul see Jesus Christ as both content and author of the gospel. Wherever it is proclaimed, he is present and at work—present to such a degree that what is done for the gospel's sake is done for Jesus' sake as well (8:35; 10:29). The content of this gospel is the history of Jesus with its individual events (cf. 14:9). Mk. does not record these events merely out of historical interest, but rather uses the narrative about Jesus in order to express what the gospel is: the message of salvation through the suffering Son of Man, whose hidden glory as Son of God did not become apparent except (in a limited way) to his followers. Mk. therefore sets euangelion as a kind of title over his whole book (1:1, "The beginning of the gospel about Jesus Christ, the Son of God"); this means that these stories are not merely reports about Jesus, but the good news in which Jesus is proclaimed as the living Lord and in which he himself addresses the readers of Mk., bringing about and strengthening faith (1:15).

(b) Matt. and Lk. are dependent on Mk. but modify his ideas. Matt. never uses the word without further qualifying it as "the good news of the kingdom" (4:23; 9:35) or "this gospel" (26:13; cf. 24:14). In so doing he has shifted the emphasis. In the foreground now is the idea of Jesus as the bringer and proclaimer of the gospel. The content of the gospel is now chiefly the teaching in which Jesus instructs his disciples (4:23; 9:35; 24:14). But insofar as the church passes on this gospel, Jesus himself is also its content (see esp. 24:14; 26:13).

(c) In Lk.'s writings the term euangelion is found only at Acts 15:7 and 20:24. Possibly this reflects Lk.'s particular scheme, according to which the era of Jesus must be distinguished from the era of the church, and so too the preaching of Jesus from that of the apostles. Thus he can describe as euangelion the apostolic preaching, but not the preaching of Jesus. Particularly instructive in this context is the alteration of euangelion in Mk. 10:29 to basileia in Lk. 18:29.

This suggestion is not upset by the fact that Lk. has a special predilection for the vb. euangelizō, which has almost become a technical term for proclamation. Note how he uses this vb. interchangeably with other vbs. of proclamation, such as kēryssō (cf. Lk. 4:18, 43–44; 9:2, 6), katangellō (Acts 13:5, 38; 15:35–36; 16:17; 17:18, 23; 26:23), and didaskō (Lk. 20:1). Moreover, Lk. generally qualifies this oral proclamation by a phrase like "kingdom of God" (4:43; 8:1) or "Jesus" (Acts 5:42; 8:35; 11:20). Thus Lk. can also describe the Baptist's activity as euangelizō (Lk. 3:18), although he explicitly stresses that the kingdom of God was not proclaimed until after the Baptist (16:16).

6. However varied may be the emphasis and development of the term euangelion in the NT, the reference is always to the oral proclamation of the message of salvation and never to something fixed in writing, such as a book or a letter. The NT knows only the gospel; the pl. "the Gospels" is a contradiction of its nature. Nevertheless, from the 2d cent. on reference is made to the Gospels, meaning the written Gospels (cf. Iren., Haer. 3.11.8; cf. 3.1.1; Clem. Alex., Strom., 1.136.1). This is the outcome of a development that can be traced back to Mk., who associated euangelion with his written stories about Jesus, though he did not identify the two. His introductory phrase in Mk. 1:1 (see above) clearly does not mean that in what follows he is writing a biography of Jesus. This identification did, however, take place at a later stage as a result of a historicizing tendency that is already evident in Matt. and Lk. Hence, "gospel" came to be used as a description of a book, and consequently the pl. form ta euangelia became possible as a collective term for these reports.

7. euangelistēs is a term for one who proclaims the euangelion. This word, which is rare in non-Christian lit. but common in early Christian writings, is found in the NT only at Acts 21:8 (of Philip), Eph. 4:11 (as one of God's ministry gifts to the church), and 2 Tim. 4:5 (of Timothy). In these passages the evangelist is distinguished from the apostle. This is esp. obvious in the case of the evangelist Philip, whose activity had to be ratified by the apostles Peter and John (Acts 8:14–15). The term thus clearly refers to people who carry on the work of the apostles in preaching the risen Christ. But it is difficult to decide whether euangelistēs refers to an office or simply to a specific activity.

2296 (euangelistēs, proclaimer of the gospel, evangelist), → 2295.

2297 (euaresteō, please [someone], take pleasure in), → 743.

2298 (euarestos, acceptable, pleasing), → 743.

εὐγενής (eugenēs), well-born, noble in descent or character (2302); νόθος (nothos), born out of wedlock, unable to register a valid claim to ancestry (3785).

CL & OT From Homer on, eugenēs meant well-born, of noble descent. It is also used of things: animals of good pedigree, and (later) plants of good stock. nothos means born out of wedlock (though Athenian writers used it when one parent was not a citizen). It had the general derivative meaning of spurious, counterfeit, both of people and things.

The LXX uses eugenēs in Job 1:3 to translate gādôl, where it means well-favored, wealthy, esp. in this world's goods. eugenēs is also used in 2 Macc. 10:13; 4 Macc. 6:5; 9:13, 23, 27; 10:3 15, typically with reference to nobility of character as demonstrated through one's willingness to undergo martyrdom.

NT The NT also uses eugenēs sparingly. It means high-born in Lk. 19:12 and in 1 Cor. 1:26 (where it forms a third category with "wise" and "influential"). Acts 17:11 uses it of the Jews at Berea, who were of "more noble character" than the Thessalonians, for they "received the message" with complete alacrity of mind (prothymia) and tested what they heard by Scripture.

nothos only occurs at Heb. 12:8, where it denotes those unable to make an accredited claim to being children of God.

See also gennaō, beget, become the father of, bear (1164); ginomai, be born, become, happen (1181); ektrōma, miscarriage (1765); palingenesia, rebirth, regeneration (4098); tiktō, bring forth, bear, give birth to (5503).

2304 (eudia, fair weather, a good day), → 847.

2305 εὐδοκέω

εὐδοκέω (eudokeō), be well pleased, regard favorably, take delight in (2305); εὐδοκία (eudokia), good will, good pleasure, favor, wish, desire (2306).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. eudokeō means to be well pleased or content, to approve; in the pass. to be favored, i.e., prosper. The goal of the Epicurean philosophy of life is to be content.

2. (a) In the LXX eudokeō occurs over 60x. It means to take pleasure in, enjoy, decide on, choose, and denotes a passionate and positive volition. The godly rejoice over the sanctuary (1 Chr. 29:3; Ps. 102:14) and in the works of truth (1 Esd. 4:39). The people and priests decided on Simon as leader (1 Macc. 14:41). The older advisors pleaded with Rehoboam to be kind to the people and to please them (2 Chr. 10:7). With a negative, eudokeō means to spurn (Hab. 2:4).

(b) Yahweh takes pleasure in his people (Ps. 44:3; 149:4), esp. in those who are godly (2 Sam. 22:20) and who fear him (Ps. 147:11). The psalmist prays that it may please Yahweh to deliver him (40:13). But Yahweh has no pleasure in one's physical strength (147:10) or in anyone who does evil (Mal. 2:17). A penitent mind is more pleasing to him than a sacrifice (Ps. 51:16–19; Jer. 14:12).

(c) The LXX formed the noun eudokia from the vb. It occurs 26x. eudokia can denote both human will or pleasure (cf. Ps. 141:5; Sir. 9:12) and the divine good pleasure or blessing (e.g., Ps. 5:12; 51:18). Sir. esp. displays the tendency to use eudokia to describe God's good pleasure, gracious will, and activity (e.g., 1:26; 11:17; 15:15).

3. (a) The formula "to do God's good pleasure" occurs frequently among the rabbis. The expression "well-pleasing in God's sight," stemming from courtly language, is also common. The formula "may it be pleasing in [God's] sight" means "may it be [God's] will." This corresponds with the expression Jesus used in Matt. 11:26 ("this was your good pleasure"; cf. Matt. 18:14; Lk. 10:21; 12:32).

(b) At Qumran we find expressions such as "all the sons of [God's] good pleasure" (1QH 4:33; 11:9) or of "the elect of [the divine] good pleasure" (1QS 8:6). "Good pleasure" here is a term related to election. The word expresses not human good will, but God's elective pleasure.

NT 1. eudokeō occurs 21x in the NT; eudokia, 9x times. The vb. has human beings as the subject 7x, the noun 2x. For example, the congregations of Macedonia decided to make a collection for the parent community of Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26–28). Paul considered it preferable to be away from the body and be at home with the Lord (2 Cor. 5:8). He took pleasure in his weakness for the sake of Christ (12:10). He was ready to share not only the gospel with the church at Thessalonica but his own self (1 Thess. 2:8). He decided to stay behind in Athens alone (3:1). All who find pleasure in unrighteousness will be judged (2 Thess. 2:12). In Rom. 10:1 Paul says that it is his heart's wish and prayer that the Jews may be saved. During Paul's time in prison, some people preached Christ out of jealousy and rivalry, but others because they were well disposed toward Paul (Phil. 1:15).

2. (a) In all other passages eudokeō and eudokia refer to God's purpose, resolve, and choice. God is "not pleased" with sacrifices (Heb. 10:6, 8; cf. Ps. 40:6–8 in LXX) and with those who shrink back (Heb. 10:38; cf. Hab. 2:4). Christ does God's will by offering himself as a sacrifice and so gains God's good pleasure. It is God's purpose to give the kingdom to the little flock (Lk. 12:32). God "was pleased" to reveal Jesus Christ to Paul (Gal. 1:15) and to save believers by the folly of the preaching of the cross (1 Cor. 1:21). God "was not pleased" with the majority of the Israelites in the desert period and destroyed them (10:5). God decided that all the fullness of the Godhead should dwell in Christ (Col. 1:19).

(b) At the baptism of Jesus God's voice sounded out from heaven: "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17; cf. Mk. 1:11; cf. Gen. 22:2; Ps. 2:7). This voice resounded with the same words at Jesus' transfiguration (Matt. 17:5; cf. 12:18). Here, too, it is a case of God's choice and determination, by which he has installed Jesus as Messiah. eudokia in 11:26 describes the transcendent purpose of God.

(c) The best-known place in the NT where eudokia occurs is Lk. 2:14, in an expression that corresponds to that of Qumran (see above). The phrase refers to people "on whom [God's] favor rests," i.e., those whom God has elected in order to bring to salvation in Christ. The message of the angels to the shepherds of Bethlehem proclaims that God has sent his Messiah to earth. For this he is glorified in heaven; the effect on earth is divine "peace" (→ eirēnē, 1645). We are not dealing here with human goodwill. Rather, we are dealing with God's sovereign and gracious will, which elects for itself a people for salvation and sanctification.

(d) In Phil. 2:13 Paul summons the congregation to work out their salvation in fear and trembling, because God is at work in them, inspiring "to will and to act according to his good purpose [or, for his own chosen purpose]." God has chosen believers and continues to work in them so that his elective purpose reaches its goal. The passage brings together the sovereignty of God and the responsibility of humankind.

In Eph. 1:5, 9, eudokia is synonymous with "will," "purpose," and "plan." Believers have a place in God's eternal will and election, which have salvation and holy living as their goal. God's free grace is the central point of these statements. The concise formulation in the prayer of 2 Thess. 1:11 ("that . . . he may fulfill every good purpose of yours") likewise means that God's elective purpose is directed toward the conduct of Christians. Paul prays that God's will may be done and reach its goal.

2325 εὐλάβεια

εὐλάβεια (eulabeia), fear, awe, piety (2325); εὐλαβής (eulabēs), devout (2327); εὐλαβέομαι(eulabeomai), to reverence, to be afraid (2326).

CL & OT 1. The eulabeia word group originally denoted caution, discretion, and later reverence. The meanings fear and reverence are found in early Christian lit. From the basic meaning of eulabeia there evolved the additional idea of fear, dread, anxiety.

2. In the LXX the vb. occurs frequently. The original meaning of eulabeomai, to take care, is recognizable in Deut. 2:4; Sir. 18:27; 26:5. But the meaning to fear predominates in the LXX (e.g., Exod. 3:6; 1 Sam. 18:15, 29). In Hab. 2:20 it denotes the awesome reverence that all the earth should have before Yahweh. It is frequently found in combination with phobeomai, from which it cannot be sharply distinguished. But eulabeomai can also mean to trust, seek or take refuge, honor (e.g., Nah. 1:7; Zeph. 3:12). eulabeomai thus approaches the idea of devoutness. The adj. eulabēs means devout, godly; the noun eulabeia can mean fear (Jos. 22:24; Wis. 17:8) or circumspection (Prov. 28:14).

NT 1. eulabēs, devout, God-fearing, occurs 4x in the NT. This adj. describes the piety of Simeon in Lk. 2:25 and Ananias in Acts 22:12. In 2:5 the witnesses from the Jewish Diaspora on the day of Pentecost are described as "God-fearing" (cf. also the "godly men" who buried Stephen in 8:2).

2. eulabeia occurs in the NT only in Heb. 5:7 and 12:28. In 5:7 Jesus was heard for his "reverent submission" to God (cf. 5:8). The raising of Jesus from the dead was God's answer to his Son's supplication in the days of his flesh (cf. Phil. 2:8–11). In Heb. 12:28, the understanding of eulabeia as fear is suggested by 12:29 (cf. Phil. 2:12, "fear and trembling"), but the idea of devoutness is equally possible (NIV, "reverence").

3. The vb. eulabeomai is found in the NT only in Acts 23:10 (as a variant reading to phobeomai, which has the same meaning, fear) and in Heb. 11:7, where it denotes the attitude of "holy fear" in Noah while he was building the ark.

See also sebō, to reverence, worship (4936).

2326 (eulabeomai, to reverence, to be afraid), → 2325.

2327 (eulabēs, devout), → 2325.

2328 (eulogeō, speak good of, praise, bless), → 2330.

2329 (eulogētos, praised, blessed), → 2330.

2330 εὐλογία

εὐλογία (eulogia), fine speaking, praise, blessing (2330); εὐλογέω (eulogeō), speak good of, praise, bless (2328); εὐλογητός (eulogētos), praised, blessed (2329); ἐνευλογέω (eneulogeō), bless (1922); ἀσπάζομαι (aspazomai), greet (832); ἀσπασμός (aspasmos), greeting (833).

CL 1. The eulogeō word group is compounded from the adv. eu, well, and the root log-, speak (word), and thus means to speak well. (a) Applied to form, speaking well refers to its aesthetic appeal, the attractive presentation of what one is saying. (b) Applied to content, speaking well expresses praise and extolling. This praise can be of things or persons, including praise of the gods (obj. gen.). In such a context eulogeō comes close to the meaning of eucharisteō, thank (→ eucharistia, 2374). One cannot ascribe to the Gk. gods a specific activity of blessing.

2. The etymology of aspazomai is obscure. It originally expressed liking and welcoming, respect and love for persons and things. Later, its application was limited to the act of greeting as opposed to the word of greeting (cf. chaire, hail!). It included offering one's hand, embracing, kissing, and genuflection. Correspondingly, the subst. aspasmos means first embrace, love, then greeting, visit.

OT In the LXX this word group is common (eulogeō occurs 450x), most often translating forms of the root bārak (bless). Such words are particularly common in Gen., Deut., Ps., and Tob. In order to understand the OT concept of blessing, we must deal not only with the bārak/eulogeō groups of words but also with texts that describe the blessing without using this terminology.

1. Basically bārak means endow with beneficial power, which involves both the process of endowing and the condition of being endowed. Hence, blessing originally involved a self-contained beneficial force that one could transmit to another; it stood in contrast to the destructive power of cursing (→ kataraomai, curse, 2933).

2. In the OT (esp. Gen. 12–36) one can find elements of the ideas and customs of blessing that were common in the ANE religions. (a) A blessing becomes effective because words, along with actions ratifying them, are invested with beneficial power (e.g., "you are blessed," Gen. 26:29). The actions that accompany the pronouncement of a blessing have a symbolic significance—such as laying on hands (Gen. 48:13–18), raising hands or arms (Exod. 17:11), kissing or embracing (Gen. 48:10), touching clothes (2 Ki. 2:13–14), or placing the hand under the thigh (Gen. 24:9; 47:29).

(b) The imparted blessing works unconditionally and irrevocably. It is permanent and can neither be revoked nor rendered ineffective (Gen. 27:33; 2 Sam. 7:29).

(c) The blessing does not have its original setting in the sacral context of the cult, but in that of the family bonds of kinship.

(d) There are different occasions for blessing: a greeting (when one meets or leaves) (Gen. 47:7–10), and at climactic points in life—such as birth (Ruth 4:13–14; cf. Lk. 2:34), marriage (Gen. 24:60), and death (48:1–22; 49:28–33). Note esp. the blessing of the heir, by which the head of a family, before his death, conveyed his power chiefly to his firstborn son and thus passed it on to the next generation (27:1–40; 48:1–49:28).

(e) Anyone can impart a blessing or a curse. But some people were esp. endowed with a power to bless and curse, e.g., Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18–20), the seer Balaam (Num. 22), charismatic leaders like Joshua (Jos. 6), and later prophets and priests.

(f) In earlier times blessing had a mutual character. Not only did the mighty bestow a blessing on their inferiors (e.g., Melchizedek on Abraham, Gen. 14:18–20), but also the inferiors on the mighty (e.g., Jacob on Pharaoh, 47:7–10). Human beings reply to the blessings of a deity by blessing him, i.e., by recognizing his power in praise.

(g) The blessing works by producing fertility in people (Gen. 24:34–36) and in livestock and lands (30:25–43). It works vertically in the continued growth of succeeding generations, and horizontally in peace, security from enemies, good fortune, and well-being for a tribe or group (expressed comprehensively in the concept šālôm, well-being).

3. (a) The story of Balaam (Num. 22–24) demonstrates Yahweh's power to bless. Balak, king of Moab, apprehensive of an Israelite invasion into his land, called on the pagan soothsayer Balaam to help by cursing the foe (22:1–6). The point of the story is that Yahweh, Israel's God, is the master of the power to pronounce blessing. Balaam is deprived of his own innate powers and may only bless, not curse, at Yahweh's command (22:12, 31, 38; 23:3–5).

(b) The pronouncements of the blessing in the Balaam story (Num. 23:7–10, 18–24; 24:3–9, 15–24) have their true home in the formal pronouncements of blessing and cursing (cf. Gen. 9:24–26; 49; Deut. 28; 33). Blessing belongs to the language of the seer. It differs from the prophetic promise of salvation in the way it depicts salvation. It portrays the earthly well-being of the people or the land (see, e.g., Num. 24:5–6).

(c) The decisive incident of the historical understanding of the blessing in Israel's history occurs in the prologue to the story of the patriarchs (Gen. 12:1–3). The text contains a threefold command and a sixfold promise. (i) In the threefold command (12:1), Abraham must depart from his land, his tribe, and his family; he must break off his settled way of life, in order to travel on towards a vaguely indicated destination.

(ii) In the sixfold promise the root bārak occurs 5x. The blessing becomes an object of Yahweh's promise for future times. In Gen. 12:2–3 a son is not specifically named as the blessing promised to Abraham. Rather, the blessing is the great nation and the great name that this nation will obtain (fulfilled during the time of David and Solomon (cf. 2 Sam. 7:9). Genesis, however, takes up the tradition of the promise of a son or a posterity in the patriarchal stories (cf. Gen. 26:24) as what was necessary for the blessing to reach its fulfillment.

The final clause is the most comprehensive: "All tribes of the earth can obtain blessing in you" (alternate trans. of 12:3b; cf. 18:18; 28:14). This sentence is to be understood in the context of Gen. 1–11, which mentions 5x a curse on the human race (3:14, 17; 4:11; 5:29; 9:25). In contrast, 12:3b sets before "all tribes of the earth" a history of blessing. It includes liberation from vain toil (3:17), wandering (4:11–12), base servitude (9:25), and the destructive chaos of the nations (11:1–9). Thus, Gen. 12:1–3 spans the histories of patriarchs, nation, and humanity with a promise of blessing.

4. (a) After Israel's settlement in Canaan, a lengthy struggle began over whether the Canaanite fertility gods (the Baals) or Yahweh (the God of promises who brought Israel out of Egypt) was to be honored as bestower of blessing. The fierceness of this clash is esp. apparent in the accounts of the prophet Elijah (1 Ki. 17–19). Yahweh is victorious and is confessed as Lord of the land. His continued activity in bestowing blessing in the promised land of Canaan adds a new element to his actions in history.

(b) This understanding of blessing is expressed in Deut. Here the whole nation receives the gifts of civilized society as blessings from Yahweh's hand (Deut. 28:3–7; cf. 7:13–16). Yahweh's blessing is expressed here in this-worldly terms. In contrast to the concept of blessing in Gen. 12:2–3; 15:1–6; 18:18; 26:24, Deut. does not speak of blessing in the form of an unconditional promise, but in conditional sentences: "If you fully obey the LORD your God and carefully follow all his commands . . . all these blessings will come upon you" (Deut. 28:1–2; cf. 28:15–16). The blessing is thus an element in the covenant between Yahweh and Israel. As Yahweh fulfils his covenant obligations in blessing, so Israel is bound to keep the covenant.

The reverse side of this conditional blessing is the curse that attends Israel's failure to keep its obligations. That is the significance of the command of Deut. 11:29 to set the blessing on Mount Gerizim and the curse on Mount Ebal. The two possibilities between which Israel must choose (30:19) are developed at length in ch. 28.

(c) Besides Yahweh, the real bestower of blessing, there are also individual people or groups who mediate blessing: kings, prophets, and priests. The role of the king in mediating blessing is not as prominent in Israel as, e.g., in Egypt. But the promise given by Nathan (2 Sam. 7:16) shows that the Davidic kingship conveys blessing. The first temple at Jerusalem is consecrated with a twofold act of blessing by Solomon before and after the prayer of consecration (1 Ki. 8:14, 55). The extent to which the king was seen as bringing blessing is particularly clear in the messianic texts that speak of a new king who will bring his nation the blessings of well-being and peace (cf. Isa. 9:6–7; 11:1–16).

Part of the task of the early prophets was to intercede for Yahweh's blessing on the nation (Elijah in 1 Ki. 18:41–45; Elisha in 2 Ki. 6:24–7:1; Amos 7:1–6). The later literary prophets proclaimed well-being in the form of a future activity of Yahweh, which they portrayed as an earthly salvation. It is seen as a messianic kingdom of peace (Isa. 11; Zech. 9:9–10), a quiet and prosperous life (Mic. 4:3–4; Zech. 9:17), prosperity (Isa. 55:1–5), the destruction of enemies (27:1), and universal well-being (65:17–25).

5. (a) Blessing also plays an important part in Israelite worship. That is apparent in the consecration of Solomon's temple (1 Ki. 8:14, 55). The temple as the holy precinct is the true place for the mediation of blessing to the nation and the land. The blessing was bestowed at the close of worship on the members of the cultic community as they returned to their houses (cf. bārak in Ps. 65; 115:12–15; 128; 129:8; 132; etc.). The community responded by praising Yahweh, using the same word, bārak (see 18:47; 28:6; 66:20; 68:20; 124:6; etc.).

(b) The theology of blessing in the priestly tradition presupposes the institutions of the cult. The bestowal of blessing is a privilege of the Levitical priests. Lev. 9:2–23 tells of the first pronouncement of the priestly blessing at the end of the first service of sacrifice in the tabernacle. It is confirmed by the appearance of Yahweh's glory. Num. 6:24–26 records the wording of the priestly blessing, to be pronounced at the end of every act of worship: "The LORD bless you and keep you; the LORD make his face shine upon you and be gracious to you; the LORD turn his face toward you and give you peace." This rhythmic blessing falls into three parts, each of which describes Yahweh's blessing and cites his promises—protection, grace, and well-being (Heb. šālôm).

(c) While the concept of blessing in Num. 6 is related to the cultic community, the blessing pronounced in Gen. 1:28 embraces all creation: "Be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth and subdue it" (cf. 1:22). Ultimately, God intends all humanity to be blessed.

6. (a) The dramatic dialogues in Job show the limitations of the OT teaching about blessing. There can be no mechanical application of the theology of blessing of Deut., the theology upheld by Job's friends, for it does not square with the reality of Job's sufferings (cf. also Ps. 73; the skepticism of the Preacher in Eccl.). Yahweh's blessing is no longer primarily experienced in the present but is awaited in the promised eschaton.

(b) In rab. Jud. pronouncements of blessing and praise are widespread. The first tractate of the Mishnah, Berakoth, includes numerous praises introduced with the formula "Praised be the Lord." The rabbis knew of appropriate praises for the most widely varied situations of daily and cultic life.

(e) The texts of the Qumran community include hymns of praise, some of which begin with the formula "Praised are you, Lord." The extant fragments of the Blessings Scroll (1QSb) contain blessings for priests and other persons.

NT Compared with the fundamental significance of blessing in the OT, the NT gives less prominence to both the concept and the act. The group of words associated with the root eulog- occurs 67x in the NT. This group is most frequent in Lk., the major Pauline letters, and Heb.

1. The aesthetic sense of eulogia found in cl. Gk. is alluded to in a deprecatory fashion in Rom. 16:18: "Such people are not serving our Lord Christ, but their own appetites. By smooth talk and flattery (eulogia), they deceive the minds of native people."

2. (a) Far more often (40x) the root has the meaning praise, extol. The adj. eulogētos means blessed, praised. This usage derives from the basically secular Gk. meaning, speak well of someone, and from the LXX translation of the OT form of praise of God, "Blessed (i.e., praised) be Yahweh." In this context it takes on a doxological character. Zechariah's hymn (Lk. 1:68) and some letters (2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:3) begin with the formula "Praise be to . . . God (the Lord)." Another form of doxology occurs as a short interjection of praise in Paul's letters (Rom. 1:25b; 9:5; 2 Cor. 11:31). It is expanded as a hymn in Rev. (5:13b; 7:12).

(b) The greeting of a superior was expressed not by the doxological adj. eulogētos but by the perf. part. pass. of eulogeō: eulogēmenos. This expresses not only praise and greeting but recognition that God has blessed the person concerned. Jesus, for example, is greeted with this cry in his triumphal entry (Mk. 11:9 par.; cf. Ps. 118:26). This form of greeting also welcomes the coming of God's kingdom, initiated with the Messiah's coming (Mk. 11:10). It is also applied to Mary, the mother of the Messiah (Lk. 1:42).

(c) The Jewish custom of offering praise on various occasions in everyday life and in worship is also attested in the NT writings (Lk. 1:64; 2:28–29, 34; 24:53; 1 Cor. 14:16; Jas. 3:9–10). According to the Synoptics, Jesus pronounced a blessing as a prayer at table before and after meals (Mk. 6:41 par.; 8:7; 14:22–23; Lk. 24:30). As the parallelism of eulogeō and eucharisteō (→ eucharistia, 2374) in Mk. 8:6–7; 14:22–23 shows, the blessing at meals gives thanks to the Creator for his material gifts.

3. Where the eulogia word group occurs with the special sense of bless or blessing (28x), the NT is oriented more toward the theology of blessing in the OT than toward that of later Jud. But the NT presents no special theology of blessing. It refers to it incidentally as something familiar to its readers.

(a) In the Synoptics the idea of blessing is significant in three pericopes: (i) the blessing of the children, (ii) Jesus' commissioning of the Twelve, and (iii) the departure of the risen Jesus from his followers.

(i) In laying his hands on the children and blessing them (Mk. 10:13–16 par.), Jesus did nothing unusual. On the contrary, he acted like a Jewish father or rabbi. Note that his activity is not limited to adults; it also includes children and so embraces people at all stages of life.

(ii) The context of the commissioning in Matt. 10:1–16 shows that the instructions to greet houses (10:12, aspazomai) refers to the greeting of blessing (cf. 10:13, "peace"). As in Jesus' own ministry, the disciples have a twofold task: to preach the kingdom of God and to heal (10:7–8a). They are sent out as evangelists and bearers of blessing, like Jesus' own mission. Acts also shows the complementary activities of the apostles in proclaiming salvation by word and deed. There blessing does not reach its fullness until the missionary preaching has given way to the regular building up of churches. It is, therefore, not surprising that blessing is not as often spoken of in the NT as in the OT.

(iii) Behind the risen Christ's benediction in Lk. 24:50–51 lies the custom of blessing given at departure. The departing Lord shares with his church the power of his blessing, through which he remains bound to it. Its content is the presence of the exalted Lord with his church (see Matt. 28:20; cf. Gen. 26:3).

(b) Of NT writers Paul uses the concept of blessing most deliberately and gives it its new Christological form. (i) In Gal. 3:8 he cites Gen. 12:3b: "All nations will be blessed through you." The fulfillment of the blessing promised to Abraham is now seen as God's redeeming act in Christ. The gift of the blessing is no longer that of a great nation or of the fruitfulness of the land, but the promised Spirit of Christ (3:14). The common ground between the quotation from Gen. and Paul's interpretation is that both the promised blessing and its fulfillment in Christ should reach all nations (3:8, 14). In 3:8–14 Paul so interprets the relation of blessing and curse that, through Christ's taking to himself the curse of the Mosaic law in his death (3:13), believers of all nations now receive the blessing of God's redemption in Christ (3:14; cf. Eph. 1:3; Acts 3:25–26).

(ii) The phrase eulogias Christou (Rom. 15:29) does not mean an act of blessing but the effect of the preaching of Christ in the church. Paul is certain that his coming to Rome will further the growth of the community.

(iii) The connection between blessing and gifts (cf. Gen. 33:11) is shown esp. in 2 Cor. 9:5–6. Paul calls the collection he has been making for the community at Jerusalem a eulogia, a generous gift. The Corinthian church should contribute ungrudgingly (ep' eulogiais), not grudgingly, so that through this gift God's blessing may be given tangible expression in the Jerusalem church.

(c) Heb. makes fullest use of the OT concept of blessing found in the stories of the patriarchs (e.g., 6:7–8). It frequently alludes to or paraphrases OT benedictions: 6:14 (Abraham, cf. Gen. 22:16–17); 7:1–7 (Melchizedek, cf. Gen. 14:18–20); 11:20 (Isaac, cf. Gen. 27:27–40); 11:21 (Jacob, cf. Gen. 48:15–16). The book's purpose in telling these examples is stated in 6:12: "to imitate those who through faith and patience inherit what has been promised." The parallelism of blessing and promise shows that blessing here means eschatological well-being (cf. also Matt. 25:34).

(d) Finally, there are the paraenetic texts on blessing: Lk. 6:27–28; Rom. 12:14; 1 Cor. 4:12; 1 Pet. 3:9. Here Jesus' disciples are exhorted to meet the curses or reproaches of their enemies with the opposite, blessing. Blessing here means simply a friendly disposition toward one's enemies. The commandment to love one's enemies replaces the lex talionis (cf. esp. 1 Pet. 3:9). What Paul formulated Christologically is here developed in paraenesis. The opposition of blessing and cursing is abolished. Since Christ has taken the curse upon himself (Gal. 3:13), Christians can only be exhorted to bless (Rom. 12:14).

2336 εὐνοῦχος

εὐνοῦχος (eunouchos), eunuch (2336);
εὐνουχίζω (eunouchizo), castrate (2335).

CL & OT This word seems to be a Sem. loanword, denoting primarily a guardian of the harem, an office that was normally held by castrated men. Sometimes when eunouchos is used of a high official of state (cf. Acts 8:27), it is no longer clear whether it is literally a eunuch or whether it has become a mere title. The term is also used for castrated animals and plants that do not bear seed. The vb. eunouchizō denotes the act of castration.

Almost half the OT occurrences of this word are in Est. Where no stress seems intended, the Heb. word used here (sārîs) is probably simply a title of a court official (cf. the use of this word elsewhere in the OT, e.g., Potiphar in Gen. 39:1). Etymologically sārîs has nothing to do with castration. If it acquired the meaning of a eunuch, it was because many court officials fell into this class.

The eunuch was excluded from the community of Israel (cf. Deut. 23:1). This separated Israel from the fertility cults of its neighbors, which practiced both sacred prostitution and self-castration to the glory of the deity. In the last days the eunuch, who had been excluded, will find a place in God's salvation (Isa. 56:3–5).

Rab. Jud., like the OT, rejected castration, primarily because of the command to marry (see Gen. 1:28). It differentiates, however, between those who are sterile because of physical malformation and those who have been made eunuchs.

NT The treasurer of Queen Candace is called a eunuch (Acts 8:27), but perhaps it should not be taken literally (cf. OT usage). If he really was a eunuch, his conversion could be seen as a fulfillment of Isa. 56:3–5. Since the resurrection of Jesus the age of salvation and of the Messiah was dawning, and so such persons could be received into the community of salvation. The treasurer would have been a semi-proselyte; as a eunuch he could not be a full proselyte. The gospel was offered to the half-proselyte and any others who were until then excluded from the community of salvation (→ prosēlytos, 4670).

The vb. eunouchizō is found twice linked with eunouchos in Matt. 19:12, where three types of eunuchs are described: (1) those who are such from birth, because of corporal malformation, (2) those who have been made such by others, (3) those who made themselves eunuchs "because of the kingdom of heaven." Jesus is clearly speaking not merely of celibacy, but also of unfitness for marriage, esp. for physical reasons. Under the first two headings Jesus adopts the division accepted by the rabbis. Only the third category presents something new, showing that the real stress falls here. Physical inability by nature or castration is intended in the first two, but this is improbable in the third. There were those who took it lit. in the early centuries of the church (e.g., Origen), though he later clearly rejected a lit. understanding of the passage.

Perhaps Jesus is here reacting against a slander spoken against him and his disciples. Because he was unmarried he was perhaps accused of being a eunuch (cf. the charge in Matt. 11:19, "a glutton and a drunkard"). Jesus answers by referring to the kingdom of God. One's joy in it can be so great that one is prepared for the sake of the kingdom to renounce everything else—under some circumstances even marriage.

2351 εὑρίσκω

εὑρίσκω (heuriskō), find, discover (2351).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. heuriskō means to find, discover, whether by searching or chance discovery. It is used lit. of searching for and finding something, and fig. of finding oneself (mid.) and of making an intellectual discovery (e.g., a law of nature). It can also mean to fetch, obtain, and to acquire, procure for someone.

2. In the LXX heuriskō is also used in a lit. and a fig. sense. The objects of finding can be either things (Gen. 31:35) or persons (e.g., Saul, 1 Sam. 10:21). In theological contexts its objects are God (e.g., Isa. 55:6), grace (Gen. 18:3; Exod. 33:13; Num. 11:11), and mercy (Gen. 19:19; Jdg. 6:17). The OT can even refer to finding life (Prov. 21:21) and rest (Sir. 11:19). In most passages in which the combination of seeking (→ zēteō, 2426) and finding occurs, God is the one who can or should be sought and found (Isa. 55:6; 65:1; cf. Prov. 8:17; Jer. 29:13 = LXX 36:13; Wis. 13:6). Wisdom, too, as the knowledge of God, can be found (Prov. 14:6), although this notion was contested by Job in his inexplicable suffering (Job 28:12–13).

Seeking and finding God happens in prayer (Isa. 55:6) and hearing (Jer. 29:12–13 = LXX 36:12–13), in calling and answering; prayer leads in its turn to the return of the godless, who alter their way of life (Isa. 55:7) and through God's forgiveness are led to recognize that God's ideas and ways (55:8) are not the same as theirs. We must also remember that when God is found, he discloses himself to us and lets himself be found (55:6; Jer. 29:14 = LXX 36:14).

NT 1. (a) The range of meaning of heuriskō in the NT is the same as in the LXX. One can accidentally find things (e.g., a treasure, Matt. 13:44; leaves, 21:19) or encounter people (22:9; Jn. 1:41, 45). The apostle can find "children walking in the truth" (2 Jn. 4).

There will be those who seek death as an escape in the final affliction but will not find it (Rev. 9:6). What is most important is whether we are "found . . . in the book of life" (20:15).

(b) heuriskō has a theological significance in Jn. 1:41: "We have found the Messiah" (cf. 1:45). This human finding is matched by God's free giving (6:39; 17:12, 22; 18:9). The three lost and found parables of Lk. 15 express an element of joy over the lost that is found (15:7, 10, 23).

The God who meets us in Jesus Christ seeks and finds the lost (Lk. 15:6, 8–10). He acts like a conscientious shepherd (15:1–6; Jn. 10:9) and like a forgiving father (Lk. 15:20, 22–24, 32). This being lost and being found again can be represented by the ideas of death and coming to life (15:24, 32). This divine finding, which is a creative act, is matched by returning on our part, by repentance (15:7, 10, 21), and by living out one's life to the full.

(c) It is understandable that the use of the pass. construction is particularly frequent, not so much with the meaning of find oneself—be found (Lk. 17:18; Acts 8:40)—as with that of being found out, show oneself. Followers of Christ no more want to be found a sinner (Gal. 2:17) or a false witness (1 Cor. 15:15) than the pious Jew wants to show himself to be fighting against God (Acts 5:39). The former are concerned with being found to be faithful stewards (1 Cor. 4:2), to be in Christ (Phil. 3:9), and to be worthy (Rev. 5:4), blameless (2 Pet. 3:14), and established in the faith (1 Pet. 1:7). What matters is the manner of life that the returning Lord finds in his servants (responsibility for one's neighbor, Matt. 24:46; faith, Lk. 18:8; watchfulness, Matt. 25:1–13; wise stewardship, 25:14–30).

It is also possible to speak of seeking and finding, or not finding, fault. The latter is the case with the question of Jesus' guilt during his trial (Lk. 23:4, 14, 22; Jn. 18:38; 19:4, 6; Acts 13:28; cf. also 1 Pet. 2:22, where Isa. 53:9 is quoted with a Christological interpretation). But it also applies to the trials in which his disciples, Peter and John (Acts 4:21), and later Paul (23:9; 24:20), were involved. Paul can "find" a certain state of affairs in his relationship to the law (Rom. 7:21), and the church at Ephesus can discover false people in their ranks (Rev. 2:2). The meaning of acquire is found in Heb. 9:12, that Christ has gained for us eternal redemption.

2. heuriskō frequently appears in the NT with zēteō (used lit., Matt. 12:43; Jn. 7:34; 2 Tim. 1:17; used fig., Matt. 7:7–8; Acts 17:27; Rev. 9:6; used in a parable, Matt. 13:45–46). Even where zēteō does not explicitly occur, heuriskō usually implies some sort of preliminary act before finding (e.g., 10:39; 11:29; Lk. 23:4). Passages like Matt. 13:44, which clearly refer to an accidental finding, are in the minority. The NT puts the stress less on the manner and way in which it is possible to find than on what is found (e.g., Jn. 1:41, see above). It is presupposed that a seeking took place prior (Matt. 7:7; Lk. 11:9). What one strives for and finds is by nature a gift (Heb. 4:16). It is also presupposed that by our way of life we will show ourselves to be followers of Jesus Christ (cf. Phil. 2:8 with 3:9).

3. The natural self primarily seeks to hold on to natural life in the sense of an instinct for self-preservation. We are able to find our lives, but only through death for Jesus' sake (cf. Matt. 16:25; Mk. 8:35; Lk. 9:24; Jn. 12:25–26). The real thing that is to be found is the kingdom of God (Matt. 13:44–46), "the road that leads to life" (7:14), "rest" (Matt. 11:29; cf. Isa. 28:12; Jer. 6:16)—which the unclean spirit cannot find (Matt. 12:43; Lk. 11:24)—and "favor [grace] with God" (Lk. 1:30; cf. Acts 7:46; Heb. 4:16).

Jesus is depicted as the one who finds faith (Matt. 8:10) or does not find it (cf. Lk. 18:8). He wants to find people who believe in him and his message. Where Jesus does find faith, those in whom it resides find the way to life and thus to a new way of life (Phil. 2:5–11).

2370 εὐφραίνω

εὐφραίνω (euphrainō), gladden, cheer (up) (2370); εὐφροσύνη (euphrosynē), joy, gladness, cheerfulness (2372).

CL & OT 1. euphrainō in cl. Gk. means, in the act. to cheer, gladden a person; in the mid. and pass. to make merry. euphrosynē means merriment, joy, good cheer. Such joy stems largely from events and situations that give rise to communal rejoicing, such as a banquet. Philosophers also use the word for introspective and spiritual joy.

2. (a) In the LXX euphrainō occurs more frequently than chairō and is not sharply distinguished from agalliaō (→ 22). It occurs in Deut., the Deuteronomistic historical works, and esp. Ps., Lam., Eccl., and Isa. In the Apocr. Sirach uses it frequently. The distribution is similar with euphrosynē. The word is clearly the appropriate expression for the joy of the believing community expressed at cultic celebrations or sacrificial feasts.

(b) Joy can also be that of the heart of an individual, esp. in response to God's help in situations of need (cf. Ps. 13:5). euphrainō is used alongside agalliaō to express the joy in which even the heavens and the earth participate (Ps. 96:11; 97:1), God also rejoicing with them (Isa. 65:19). Joy is a feature of God's eternal world. Festive joy at the great communal feasts—the human enjoyment of eating, drinking ,and bodily refreshment—becomes a vivid picture of our joy in the coming kingdom.

(c) For the rest a wide diversity of usage can be found: joy as an emotion (e.g., Ps. 16:11), joy in someone or something (2 Sam. 1:20; Eccl. 11:9), joy in God (Neh. 8:10–12; Ps. 33:21), joy in God's word (Ps. 119:74; Jer. 15:16), and joy in the time of salvation (Isa. 35:10; 55:12).

3. In rab. Jud. joy is still of great importance. Joy in God's law now occupies a large place. The festivals, esp. Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles, are joyous occasions. In Qumran, salvation is seen as already present, and there is rejoicing over God's redemptive gifts (cf. 1QM 12:13; 13:12–16; 1QH 11:23; 18:14–16; CD 20:33).

4. Philo's piety is esp. marked by euphrosynē. Taking festive joy as his starting point, he finds joy merely in seeking God. God himself radiates joy by means of the Logos.

NT In the NT the word chairō (→ 5897) is the preferred word for joy. euphrainō occurs 14x (5 of which are in OT quotations).

1. In line with the OT, the words are clearly connected with the rejoicing found at a festive banquet. euphrainō thus denotes in the NT the joy of the festive company. In Lk. 12:19; 16:19, it refers to eating, drinking, and enjoying oneself. This is what a person without God sees as supremely worthwhile and what material possessions are thought to be for. But emphasis on the joy wrought by God is a peculiar feature of Lk.'s writings. Thus 15:23, 32, contains an invitation to make merry over the return of the lost son, while the elder son enviously desires a similar joyous feast for himself (15:29).

Acts 14:17 speaks of joy in the gifts of nature as being God's gifts in creation. Acts 2:26, 28, applying Ps. 16:8–11 to the resurrection, speaks of joy in the presence of God. On the other hand, Acts 7:41 refers to the shameless rejoicing of Israel when worshiping before the golden calf (cf. Exod. 32:4, 6).

2. In Rom. 15:10 and Gal. 4:27 Paul, influenced by OT quotations, uses this word group. In Rom. 15:10 he sees the fulfillment of Deut. 32:43—rejoicing that the message of Christ has now come to the Gentiles. Similarly in Gal. 4:27 (quoting Isa. 54:1), the call to rejoice is applied to the Jerusalem that is above, the church of the new covenant. Likewise in Rev. 12:12 and 18:20, based on OT quotations (cf. Isa. 44:23; 49:13; Jer. 51:48; not Rev. 11:10, however), eschatological rejoicing is expressed by euphrainō. Insofar as such joy often appears in the NT under the figure of a joyous feast and that Jesus himself, when on earth, did not hesitate to join in the festivities of the common meal, euphrainō is in full accord with the joyous message of the gospel.

See also agalliaō, exult, rejoice greatly, be overjoyed (22); chairō, be glad, rejoice (5897).

2372 (euphrosynē, joy, gladness, cheerfulness), → 2370.

2374 εὐχαριστία

εὐχαριστία (eucharistia), thanksgiving (2374); εὐχαριστέω (eucharisteō), be thankful, thank (2373); εὐχάριστος (eucharistos), thankful (2375); ἀχάριστος (acharistos), ungrateful (940).

CL & OT 1. eucharistia comes from the root chair-/char-, the main words of which express the feeling of joy (→ chairō, to rejoice, 5897; charis, grace, 5921); the initial eu is an adv. meaning well, rightly, properly. Thus eucharistia means a thankful attitude, an expression of gratitude, thanksgiving. The adj. eucharistos means pleasant, well-behaved, or thankful. The vb. eucharisteō means to be thankful, owe thanks, give thanks.

2. The word group is only once represented in the OT canonical books (Prov. 11:16, where the adj. translates Heb. ḥēn, charming, graceful). In the Apocr. the vb. is found 6x (e.g., Wis. 18:2; 2 Macc. 1:11; 10:7), the noun 4x (e.g., Wis. 16:28; Sir. 37:11). Both are used for thanks from one person to another and from humanity to God.

(a) In 2 Macc. 12:31 the Maccabean army thanks certain heathen people for the kindness shown the Jews living in Scythopolis. In Add. Est. 16:4, certain officials withhold the gratitude that they owe to their benefactor, the Persian king. According to Sir. 37:11, experience shows that one should not consult with a grudging person about gratitude.

(b) Reasons for thankfulness to God are salvation from oppression by enemies and persecution (2 Macc. 1:11; 3 Macc. 7:16), but also being put to the test, which is seen as an opportunity for God to work out his salvation in preservation (Jdt. 8:25). Wis. 18:2 records the thanks of the holy ones for their preservation from guilt toward those who abuse them. Wis. 16:28 advises people to begin the day before dawn with thanksgiving.

NT 1. Of the 38x eucharisteō occurs in the NT and the 15x for eucharistia, Paul uses the vb. 24x, the noun 12x. eucharistos is found only in Col. 3:15, and acharistos only in Lk. 6:35; 2 Tim. 3:5. The noun and vb. are almost exclusively reserved in the NT for thanksgiving to God. Only 3x (Lk. 17:16; Acts 24:3; Rom. 16:4) are they used for thanks to humans; the first and last instances are to be understood in the context of spiritual action, while in Acts 24:3 we have an example of respectful Jewish speech.

2. These words are common in the opening sections of Paul's letters. Whatever detailed admonition and criticism may follow, the apostle usually writes of his thankfulness to God for those to whom he is writing: for their faith and its influence "all over the world" (Rom. 1:8; cf. 2 Cor. 1:11), for the harmony between faith and love in action (Eph. 1:15–16; Col. 1:3–4; 1 Thess. 1:2–3), for the grace given to the church (1 Cor. 1:4), for sharing in the gospel (Phil. 1:3, 5), for God's work of election (2 Thess. 2:13), and for steadfastness in hope (1 Thess. 1:2–3).

3. When Paul exhorts his readers to thanksgiving, he normally uses the noun. This word is always used absolutely; it marks out thanksgiving and the showing of gratitude as basic and lasting elements of the Christian life (cf. eucharisteō in Eph. 5:20; Col. 3:17; 1 Thess. 5:18). No petition and intercession can be made without simultaneous thanksgiving (Phil. 4:6; Col. 2:7; 4:2; 1 Tim. 2:1). A life based on thanksgiving (Eph. 5:4) is the converse of an evil life.

4. The vb. is found in Matt. 15:36; Mk. 8:6; Acts 27:35; Rom. 14:6; 1 Cor. 10:30; and the noun in 1 Tim. 4:3 in the technical sense of the benediction before a meal, according to Jewish custom, beginning with the words, "You are blessed, Yahweh our God, King of the universe." The vb. is found also in the words of institution of the Lord's Supper—with both bread and wine in Lk. 22:17, 19, with the bread only in 1 Cor. 11:24 (though 11:25 "in the same way" implies it for the wine), with the wine only in Matt. 26:27; Mk. 14:23 (but the use of eulogeō, to bless, with the bread is an equivalent; → eulogia, blessing, 2330). Hence, during the 2d cent. eucharistia became the general name for the whole service of the Lord's Supper (the Eucharist).

We have prayers of thanksgiving quoted in Lk. 18:11–12 (the self-satisfied Pharisee) and Jn. 11:41–42 (Jesus at the tomb of Lazarus). The word is used absolutely in 1 Cor. 14:16–17 for a prayer of thanksgiving in a tongue.

5. Apart from the introductions of his letters, Paul often mentions praise for general and specific gifts of grace: for increasing grace (2 Cor. 4:15), for a share "in the inheritance of the saints in the kingdom of light" (Col. 1:12), for reception of the word preached as the word of God (1 Thess. 2:13), and for the gift of tongues (1 Cor. 14:18). For all that, in 1 Cor. 14:18 (cf. 1:14) there is a depreciatory note when he speaks about his thanksgiving, so as to deflect the interest of his readers to the true building up and unity of the church. Paul's collection would awaken thanksgiving to God among those who received it (2 Cor. 9:11–12).

6. Both noun and vb. can mean the thanksgiving of the doxologies in the apocalyptic hymns (Rev. 4:9; 7:12; 11:17).

2398 ἐχθρός

ἐχθρός (echthros), hostile, hated, enemy (2398); ἔχθρα (echthra), enmity (2397); ἀντίδικος (antidikos), enemy, opponent (508).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. echthros in the pass. sense means hated, hateful; in the act. sense, hostile, enemy, opponent. antidikos was originally an opponent in a trial.

In the LXX echthros occurs more than 450x, usually to designate enemies in military conflicts, the nations with which one is in a state of war (1 Sam. 29:8; Nah. 3:11, 13), or one's personal enemies (Exod. 23:4; Num. 35:23; Ps. 5:8; 13:2, 4). In the case of Israel's enemies it is not a matter merely of national enemies in the normal sense. Since Israel is God's people, its enemies are also God's enemies (Exod. 23:22; Jos. 7:8). When God's people fall away from him, his enemies can be found within Israel itself (Isa. 1:24). The ungodly are the enemies of the righteous (Ps. 5:8–12; 55:3) and of God (37:20). Hope for the future centers on deliverance from one's enemies and on their destruction (Num. 24:18; Ps. 110:1–2; 132:18; Isa. 62:8; Mic. 5:9).

NT 1. In the NT echthros (occurring 32x) is first of all someone's personal enemy (Rom. 12:20; Gal. 4:16). The NT also reflects OT usage in that the coming of the era of salvation implies deliverance from one's enemies (Lk. 1:71, 74). In the prophecies concerning Jerusalem, enemies will besiege and destroy the city (19:43). Enemies rise against the two eschatological witnesses (Rev. 11:5, 12). The enemies of the cross of Christ will come to grief (Acts 13:10; Phil. 3:18). Enemies of Christ are referred to in those passages where Ps. 110:1 is cited as a prophecy of Christ (Matt. 22:44; Mk. 12:36; Lk. 20:43; Acts 2:35; 1 Cor. 15:25; Heb. 1:13; 10:13). In 2 Thess. 3:15 the reference is to someone disobeying Paul's instructions; fellowship is to be broken off, but this person is not to be regarded as an enemy.

Satan also can be described as echthros (Matt. 13:24–39; Lk. 10:19) and even antidikos (1 Pet. 5:8). Possibly here the thought is that of accuser in the final judgment (cf. Zech. 3), for antidikos is found elsewhere in the NT only in the sense of opponent in the law court (Matt. 5:25; Lk. 12:58; cf. 18:3).

Since the natural human rebels against God in thought and action, such a person is an echthros in relation to God (Rom. 5:10; Col. 1:21). According to Rom. 11:28, those Jews who do not yet believe are "enemies" for the Gentiles' sake. Because of their stubbornness and unbelief, God's salvation has come to the Gentiles.

When in Matt. 5:43–44 the command to love one's neighbor is contrasted with a call to hate one's enemy, the reference can hardly be to any OT passage (but cf. Ps. 31:6a; 139:21–22). We can compare Jesus' comments here to certain regulations of the Qumran community. Those who belonged to this community undertook a vow to "love all that he [God] has chosen and hate all that he has rejected" (1QS 1:3); and further, to "love all the sons of light, each according to his lot in God's community, and hate all the sons of darkness, each according to his guilt, in God's vengeance" (1QS 1:9–11). Josephus also reports that the Essenes had to swear to hate the unrighteous and to support the just. In contrast, Jesus calls us to love our enemies.

2. echthra, hate, enmity, existed between Herod Antipas and Pilate (Lk. 23:12), but as a result of their common action against Jesus this turned into friendship. In the catalogue of sins in Gal. 5:19–21 echthra is explicitly named as one of the "acts of the sinful nature" (5:20). The "sinful mind" is echthra against God (Rom. 8:7, "hostile to God"). Christ, however, has brought peace, in that he has through his cross removed that hostility as well as the hostility between Jews and Gentiles (Eph. 2:14, 16).

2400 ἔχω

ἔχω (echō), have (2400); μετέχω (metechō), share, participate in (3576); μετοχή (metochē), sharing, participation (3580); μέτοχος (metochos), partaking, sharing, a partner, companion (3581).

CL & OT 1. echō means to have or hold in a wide range of senses: possess, keep, have, hold; aor. acquire, take into possession; intrans. keep, hold oneself. Thus the connection between the subj. and obj. of echō can denote a wide range of personal, material, and metaphorical meanings. Sometimes the subj. and obj. can exchange places (i.e., in Gk. one may say "he has a sickness" or "a sickness has him"). Moreover, the word can denote entry into any one of these conditions: to attain to, get hold of, come by.

metechō means to share or participate, with an obj. in the gen. The noun metochē means sharing, participation, and the adj. metochos likewise means sharing.

Two aspects of these words are theologically significant: There is the rational and material sense of having, and there is the enthusiastic sense of having, as being possessed, or mystical sharing. Various writers speak of daimonion echein (to have a demon), which acted in people. Later the idea broadened out into the pantheistic and mystical having of the divine One. In later philosophy it was no longer said that a person had nous or logos (reason). Instead, one was said to participate (metechō) in them. Plato used metochē (participation) to express the relationship of particular things to the Idea or Form. The lower and relative participates in the higher and absolute.

2. Heb. has no special word for echō. It uses instead a circumlocution, such as saying that something is in the hands of someone. echō is used to translate over 50 different Heb. expressions. It occurs more than 500x in the LXX, though many are in passages that have no Heb. original. It is the same with the compounds metechō, metochē, and metochos—words appearing only in later writings of the OT.

The theological significance of the words in this group is to be derived from the broader context of the Heb. Bible. At the heart of the OT message stands the confession that God has chosen his people, that they are his possession. The reverse is also true: He is his people's God (Ps. 33:12; 144:15; cf. Hos. 2:21–25). Therefore, there are to be no other gods beside him (Exod. 20:2–6). Because Yahweh is the God of his people, he is strength, rock, fortress, and Savior of the individual (e.g., Ps. 18:3; 27:1). Hence, Israel's confession: "Our God is a God who saves" (68:20; cf. 73:25). God is specifically the inheritance of the Levites (e.g., Deut. 10:9; Ezek. 44:28).

The relationship described through these concepts provides the basis for what the NT describes in its theological use of the idea of having. Paul, for example, clearly refers to this when he wrote that Israel had the law and boasted of it (Rom. 2:20, 23; cf. 10:2). Israel had "the adoptions as sons ... the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises ... the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ " (Rom. 9:4–5). But Israel did not have the fulfillment of all this in Christ.

NT The distribution of echō in the NT has the same broad range of meaning as in cl. Gk. and the LXX. The following aspects are theologically significant.

1. echō is used as an expression for possession and relationship. The phrase daimonion echein (to have a demon), which occurs in cl. Gk., also occurs in the Synoptics (Matt. 11:18; Lk. 7:33). But the demon is only mentioned in the context of Jesus' lordship over it. For that reason the reproach that he had Beelzebub (Satan), i.e., that he was possessed by him, is absurd and blasphemous (Mk. 3:22, 30; cf. Jn. 7:20; 8:48; 10:20–21). It may be compared with the expression akatharton pneuma echein, to have or be possessed by an evil spirit (e.g., Mk. 7:25; cf. Lk. 4:33).

The NT also has such statements as to have children, sons, brothers, a wife, etc. The lame man at the pool of Bethesda says, "I have no one to help me into the pool" (Jn. 5:7). Similarly Paul: "I have no one else like [Timothy]" (Phil. 2:20; cf. 1:7). Echō is also used absolutely for sexual intercourse (Matt. 14:4).

Having is used in a theologically significant way in those passages in which a relationship with God is involved. The Jews claimed to have God as their father (Jn. 8:41). Similarly, Paul instructs, "Masters, provide your slaves with what is right and fair, because you know that you also have a Master in heaven" (Col. 4:1). This relationship between God and humans is further defined by Christ. Believers have him as their advocate with the Father (1 Jn. 2:1) and as their high priest (Heb. 4:14; 8:1; 10:19–21). Those who despise him already have a judge (Jn. 12:48).

2. As in the OT, this having fellowship with God is characterized not by human striving, but by God's promises and gift. This was also the ground of salvation in the OT. To have salvation is to have it through Jesus Christ: "Whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life" (Jn. 5:24). This thought is stressed by Heb., Paul, and esp. Jn.

Jn. does this in his own special way. "He who has the Son has life; he who does not have the Son of God does not have life" (1 Jn. 5:12; cf. Jn. 3:15–16, 36; 2 Jn. 9). A person can know of God, talk about him, and even claim to have him, as the false teachers do, and still not have him. Here echō is the expression for genuine fellowship with God and true faith in its fullest and deepest sense. To "have fellowship" with one another and with Christ (1 Jn. 1:6–7) is to "know" him (2:3) and to "live" in him (2:6). These polemically intended words all refer to the same thing.

Jn.'s opponents see this fellowship with God as a mystical mastering of God. For Jn. this is possible only through the Son of God, who has become flesh. It comes through the witness of the Holy Spirit, whom Christians have (1 Jn. 2:20, 27; 5:10). Those who do not have the witness of the Father and his word living in them do not know God and have no life (Jn. 5:38–40). But those who stand in a personal relationship to the historical Jesus through the Spirit have the Father and life (1 Jn. 1:1–3; 4:13–16). To this also belong confession (4:2, 15), abiding in the doctrine of Christ (2 Jn. 9), and keeping his word and commandments (1 Jn. 2:3–6).

In this way Jn. takes up the prophetic message of John the Baptist, which saw the promised time of salvation break in with Christ. This is a theme that links Jn. with the Synoptics and Paul. For example, now in the present believers have peace with God (Rom. 5:1), redemption through his blood (Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14), and access to God's gracious purpose in salvation (Eph. 3:12). Now is the day of salvation (cf. 2 Cor. 6:2).

3. Paul strongly emphasizes this theme in a different way. To participate in salvation is to be in Jesus Christ through his Spirit. It is a spiritual having: "If anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, he does not belong to Christ" (Rom. 8:9). To have the Spirit means to be led by the Spirit (8:14). The believer is no longer his or her own (1 Cor. 6:19; cf. 3:16); he or she is Christ's slave (Rom. 1:1; 1 Cor. 7:22). This also means that to have the Spirit and to be bound to this Lord is to have this treasure in earthen vessels (2 Cor. 4:7) and to bear continually in our bodies the dying of Jesus (2 Cor. 4:10–12). Although the Spirit is the pledge and firstfruits (→ arrabōn, 775; Rom. 8:23; 2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5), the believer remains on this side of the barrier of death, which Christ has already broken through. But as the pledge of future resurrection glory, he gives us the certainty (Rom. 8:11) that one day our earthly house will be destroyed (2 Cor. 5:1) and we will participate in this glory.

Here lies the point of contrast between Paul and the enthusiasts in Corinth, who claimed that they already had the resurrection glory (1 Cor. 4:8, 10; 15:12). Paul opposed this with the gospel of the cross (1 Cor. 1:17, 23). In opposition to the self-seeking grandeur of "knowledge" that destroys, Paul stressed love, which builds up (8:1). Love is also opposed to libertinism (10:23–24; 13:2). For the sake of the gospel Paul had to bear much suffering, including bearing the dying of Christ in his own body (2 Cor. 4:10). But in this suffering he also received great strengthening and comfort (2 Cor. 1:5).

4. This having is to be understood neither as a permanent possession nor as absolution from obedience. This is underlined by the use of metechō in Paul and Heb. To share in dikaiosynē (righteousness, justification) puts the whole of one's life under obligation and excludes anomia (lawlessness, 2 Cor. 6:14). To be in Christ leaves no room for sin. Participation in the Lord's Supper rules out participation in pagan sacrifices, and vice versa (1 Cor. 10:17, 21). metechō is used virtually as a synonym for koinōneō (→ 3126). In Heb. the concern is above all with sharing in the sufferings and patience of Christ. Those who "share in Christ" (Heb. 3:14; cf. 6:4) are thus called to patient endurance in persecution and to holding fast to the true faith, so that they may not lose their share in future glory. To be sharers in discipline (12:8) is in fact a sign of being a true child, for the Lord disciplines those whom he loves (12:6; cf. Prov. 3:12).

5. Just as all spiritual having comes under the lordship of the present and coming Lord, so is also the possession of all material goods: "What do you have that you did not receive?" (1 Cor. 4:7). For all earthly goods God has to be asked in the right attitude (Jas. 4:2), and their use has to be seen in the light of eschatology. Paul is one who has nothing and yet possesses all things (2 Cor. 6:10). Therefore, he urges the Corinthians to have as if they did not have (1 Cor. 7:29–31). It is not simply that for the sake of future glory they are to break loose from all possessions. Such possessions are to be given to those in need (Eph. 4:28). Participation with God and with one another is now already a fact through the Holy Spirit, who establishes us in sonship, obedience, love, and hope.

ζῆλος (zēlos), zeal (2419); ζηλόω (zēloō), to be zealous (2420); ζηλωτής (zēlōtēs), a zealot (2421).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. zēlos denotes an emotional going out to a person, idea, or cause. Where the goal is good, it means eager striving, competition, enthusiasm, and even praise, glory. Where the goal is bad, it means jealousy, ill will, envy. Accordingly, zēlōtēs can denote a person seeking to reach good goals or a jealous, envious individual. Likewise, zēloō can mean to be zealous or to be jealous.

2. (a) The word group is found mostly in the later portions of the LXX (e.g., Prov. 6:34), where it often means zeal directed to God or passionate readiness for service controlled by God's will, i.e., by the law (e.g., 1 Ki. 19:10, 14; Ps. 69:9). The concept of striving for ethical perfection (Philo's use of the word) does not appear in the LXX.

(b) More frequent are passages that speak of God's zeal, sometimes translated jealousy. In Exod. 20:5 God calls himself zēlōtēs and cites two directions for his zeal: He turns it against the evildoers to punish them (i.e., zēlos connotes God's wrath; Num. 25:11; Deut. 29:20); but to those who fear him, it manifests itself as mercy (Isa. 63:15). As Lord of history, God displays his zēlos for his own people against heathen nations (e.g., 2 Ki. 19:31; Isa. 9:7; 26:11; Ezek. 36:6; 38:19). But he also manifests zēlos at Israel's unfaithfulness, which is often presented as adultery (Ezek. 16:38; 23:25–27).

(c) The OT usage continued in Jud. of the NT era. Qumran texts speak of God's zeal, which is expressed in his righteous judgments. The rabbis, however, hesitated to speak of God's zeal or jealousy, for they shied away from anthropomorphisms.

NT 1. zēlos occurs 16x in NT, zēlōtēs 8x; and zēloō 11x. Both good and bad senses of the word group occur. (a) The bad sense of jealousy is found in Acts 7:9 (of Joseph's brothers); 5:17; 13:45; 17:5 (of the Jews' jealousy of the apostles' success). Jealousy is a deadly danger to the continued existence of a church (1 Cor. 3:3; 2 Cor. 12:20; Jas. 3:16). A Christian should not show jealousy but must walk by the Spirit (Gal. 5:16, 20) and deal lovingly with others (Rom. 13:13). The NT also expresses a critical attitude toward the Jewish zeal for the law (cf. Rom. 10:2). Thus Paul rejects his earlier being "zealous for the traditions of [his] fathers" (Gal. 1:14), which had caused him to become a persecutor of the church (Acts 22:3; Phil. 3:6).

(b) But zeal in itself is not rejected. Paul rejoices that godly grief has produced repentance and zeal in the Corinthians (2 Cor. 7:11), and he explicitly calls us to be zealous for service to Christ (Tit. 2:14), who himself was zealous for God (Jn. 2:17). He praises the missionary zeal that surrounds others with good (Gal. 4:18; cf. 2 Cor. 11:2). Paul esp. instructs us to "eagerly desire" the gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor. 12:31; 14:1, 39), which is rightly used in a love that is free from jealousy (1 Cor. 13:4). Finally, the NT endorses a positive zeal for the welfare of others (2 Cor. 7:7; 9:2) and for doing what is right (1 Pet. 3:13), but here too love must take precedence over zeal.

2. In the NT era, there were several resistance groups against the Romans—from those led by Judas the Galilean (6 B.C.) to defenders of the fortress Masada (A.D. 74); zēlōtēs is a generic word for all these groups. Judas interpreted the first commandment to mean that none but God should be honored as king or Lord; thus, payment of taxes to the emperor should be rejected. The Zealots observed the Sabbath strictly, demanded circumcision even of the heathen, and had rigorous requirements for cleanliness. They willingly suffered martyrdom for their beliefs.

Jesus' disciple named Simon (Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13) is called a zēlōtēs; i.e., he had presumably at one time been a Zealot. He is likely the same as "Simon the Cananaean" (Matt. 10:4; Mk. 3:18, NRSV), where ho kananaios probably translates Aram. qan'ān, zealot, i.e., zēlōtēs. The presence of a former Zealot among Jesus' disciples does not imply, as some have argued, his endorsement of the movement, and to interpret the cleansing of the temple (e.g., Matt. 21:12–17; cf. Jn. 2:13–17) as an act of resistance against Rome goes beyond the evidence. Note too how Jesus' teaching on paying taxes to Caesar (e.g., Mk. 12:13–17) repudiates Zealot ideals, as does his attitude toward the Sabbath (e.g., 2:23–3:5) and ceremonial washing (e.g., 7:15).

ζητέω (zēteō), seek (2426); ἐκζητέω (ekzēteō), seek, search for (1699); ἐπιζητέω (epizēteō), seek after, strive for, search for, want (2118); ζήτημα (zētēma), question, controversy (2427); ζήτησις (zētēsis), investigation, argument, discussion, debate (2428); ἐκζήτησις (ekzētēsis), useless speculation (1700).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. zēteō has the general meaning of to seek. It became a technical term for striving after knowledge, used esp. for philosophical investigation. Occasionally zēteō was used as a legal term for a judicial investigation. ekzēteō and epizēteō emphasize the basic meaning of seek, investigate, strive. Apart from that, ekzēteō can refer to scientific investigation and epizēteō to legal searching or claims. The noun zētēsis could be used as a technical term for philosophical investigation.

2. The LXX uses zēteō some 400x and means to seek, aspire, demand, ask; the less frequent compounds ekzēteō and epizēteō denote an inquiry, investigation, or asking of questions. (a) zēteō can refer to nonreligious processes: Joseph sought his brothers (Gen. 37:16); Saul looked for the runaway female donkeys (1 Sam. 10:2, 14); Pharaoh sought to kill Moses (Exod. 2:15; cf. 4:19). The phrase "to seek the life of" is regularly used of the intent to kill (e.g., 1 Sam. 24:10; 25:29; 26:20; 1 Ki. 19:10, 14; Jer. 11:21). This OT seeking entails an activity that involves the whole person. People in the ANE regarded seeking as having an emotional and volitional element.

(b) When applied fig. to one's relationship to God, zēteō and its compounds denote the conscious turning of the Israelites to their God with all their being, or that of Yahweh to his people. The prophets frequently reproach the Israelites that they have not sought God (Isa. 9:13; 31:1; Jer. 10:21) and warn the rebellious people to seek their God, i.e., to be obedient to him (Deut. 4:29; Isa. 55:6; Jer. 29:13–14 = LXX 36:13–14). Esp. the Ps. (e.g., 24:6; 27:8; 83:16; 105:3–4) and 2 Chr. (e.g., 7:14; 11:16; 15:12; 18:4, 7) refer to seeking the Lord, seeking God, or seeking the face of the Lord. These expressions define what willing obedience to Yahweh means, though they also allude to cultic occasions like worship and prayers. To seek God thus acquires the meaning to seek after God where he is to be found, e.g., in the temple and in worship.

(c) Passages that refer to God's seeking are fewer but very important. Like a shepherd, God will seek his people who have wandered away and will gather them (Ezek. 34:12–16). Hence, the theological use of zēteō in the LXX serves to express the reciprocal covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel.

(d) In Philo, philosophical thinking and questions of the intellect are connected with the seeking of the heart to form a unique synthesis.

NT 1. In the NT zēteō occurs 117x, mostly in the Gospels and in Paul's letters. Its range of meaning embraces the cl. Gk. and OT elements. Thus, zēteō in the NT refers to following and seeking something (Lk. 15:8) and to probing ideas and reflections (Mk. 11:18; 14:1, 11), as well as judicial enquiry (Jn. 8:50b). It can also mean anything from deliberate striving and desiring (Matt. 6:33; 1 Cor. 10:33) to asserting one's claims (Mk. 8:12). ekzēteō occurs only 7x in the NT and has an intensive sense (Lk. 11:50–51; Acts 15:17; Rom. 3:11; Heb. 11:6; 12:17; 1 Pet. 1:10). epizēteō occurs 13x and has a similar intensive force (e.g., Matt. 6:32; 16:4; Lk. 4:32; Acts 12:19; Rom. 11:7; Heb. 11:14). ekzētēsis, useless speculation, occurs only at 1 Tim. 1:4.

2. A parable tells of a merchant looking for beautiful pearls (Matt. 13:45) or of a housewife hunting through her home to find a drachma (Lk. 15:8). The passion narratives report that Judas sought for an opportunity to betray Jesus (Matt. 26:16; Mk. 14:11; Lk. 22:6). The use of zēteō here implies an act of the will.

3. Like the prophets, Jesus called on his hearers to seek God, i.e., to put their life at the disposal of God's will and rule: e.g., "But seek first [God's] kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things [about which you worry] will be given to you as well" (Matt. 6:33; cf. 7:7–8; Lk. 11:9–10; 12:31). According to Jn.'s Gospel, the Jews opposed this call by seeking Jesus' life (5:18; 7:1, 19; 8:37) and by trying to establish their own glory (5:44; 7:18).

4. Paul gives the clearest statement of the contrast between one's self-assertion and one's seeking of God in his discussion of Israel's rebuke for wanting to establish its own righteousness (Rom. 10:3); he sets over against it the way of faith that seeks to attain to righteousness in Christ (Gal. 2:17). Similarly, he censures his opponents who look "out for [their] own interests" (Phil. 2:21), while he ventures to assert of himself that he does not seek his own advantage (1 Cor. 10:33; cf. 13:5, where he states that love does not seek its own interests). Once again, the human will is involved.

5. Paul acknowledges the nations' search for God in Acts 17:27, and in 1 Cor. 1:22 he refers to Gk. questioning and striving after wisdom. In the NT the Gk. concept of zētēsis comes to mean an argument, battle of words, or dispute (Jn. 3:25; Acts 15:2; 25:20). Such disputes do not promote the faith or build up the Christian community, but are linked to strife, envy, and slander (1 Tim. 6:4; 2 Tim. 2:23, Tit. 3:9). The related word zētēma is limited in the NT to points of religious controversy, either within the Jewish community (Acts 18:15; 23:29) or within the church (15:2).

6. Finally, God's seeking must be mentioned. It includes both God's claim to the fruits of obedience (Lk. 13:6), to true worship (Jn. 4:23), and to faithful stewardship (1 Cor. 4:2) and the dedicated pursuit of the Son of Man, whose mission it is to seek the lost and rescue them (Lk. 19:10).

ζυγός (zygos), yoke, balance (2433); ζεῦγος (zeugos), a pair (2414); ἑτεροζυγέω (heterozygeō), be unevenly yoked, fig. be mismated (2282); συζεύγνυμι (syzeugnymi), yoke together, join together (5183); σύζυγος (syzygos), yokefellow, comrade, possibly wife (5187).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. zygos has two meanings: (a) the yoke that beasts or slaves wear (means the same); the cognate vb. zeugnymi means to unite, bind; (b) a beam of a weighing balance or the balance itself (which resembles a yoke).

2. (a) The OT expressly forbids yoking together different kinds of animals (Deut. 22:10; note the context, which forbids mixing of crops, animals, and material). In Lev. 19:19, the noun heterozygos may refer to not allowing different species of animals to mate together.

(b) The OT knows both meanings of zygos. (i) It often denotes a yoke, the shaped piece of wood on the necks of working animals (e.g., Num. 19:2). But the noun was widely used fig., e.g., as a term for bondage (Lev. 26:13) or the burdensome servitude of the nation (zeugos, 1 Ki. 12:19–21). In this sense zygos became a symbol of political suppression (2 Chr. 10:4, 9–14). To this meaning belongs the yoke that Jer. wore as an acted-out parable, summoning Israel to submit to Nebuchadnezzar (27:2–11 = LXX 34:2–11). In breaking Jer.'s yoke, the prophet Hananiah proclaimed salvation from the foreign rule of Babylon (28:2–11 = LXX 35:2–11), a prophecy that was not fulfilled (28:13–17 = LXX 35:13–17). Liberation from enforced subjection is part of messianic prophecy (Isa. 9:3 = LXX 9:4; 10:27).

(ii) It can also mean scales, balances (e.g., Lev. 19:36; Isa. 40:12, 15). Yahweh requires true scales and honest dealings among people. But he also weighs human beings in his balances and finds them wanting (Ps. 62:9; Dan. 5:27). Job desires his calamities to be weighed in the balances (Job 6:2). In the background stands the idea of scales as a symbol of justice and Yahweh as the ultimate judge (31:6).

(iii) zygos receives an additional fig. meaning in the LXX in wisdom lit. Sir. 51:25–26, for example, instructs the reader to bring one's neck under the yoke of wisdom. This denotes an invitation to accept the Torah, for wisdom at this period was identified with the law. Jer. describes Israel's true relationship with Yahweh as a yoke that the wayward shake off (2:20; 5:5; the latter verse defines this relationship as knowledge of Yahweh and his law). Hel. Jud. identifies the yoke with the Torah, that one should submit oneself to Yahweh's will. This sort of burden marks out Israel from all other peoples.

(c) zeugos means a span holding a pair of animals together and hence also a pair (1 Ki. 19:19, 21; 2 Ki. 5:17; Job 1:3).

(d) zeugnymi means to bind (1 Sam. 6:7, 10; 2 Sam. 20:8); syzeugnymi occurs only in Ezek. 1:11, 23 and means to entwine, touch.

NT 1. zygos occurs only 6x in the NT. (a) Only in Rev. 6:5 does it mean a balance or scales, which the rider of the black horse has in his hand. The vision symbolizes inflation and scarcity, causing hardship among the lower classes but not seriously affecting the wealthy.

(b) In 1 Tim. 6:1 Paul addresses "all who are under the yoke of slavery," exhorting them to yield to the existing social order by showing respect to their masters.

Slaves are not to take the law into their own hands and free themselves from servitude, but are to serve their masters (esp. believing ones) even better (6:2).

(c) Jesus' invitation in Matt. 11:29–30 recalls the language of the wisdom tradition: "Take my yoke upon you and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light" (cf. Prov. 8:1–11; 9:5; esp. Sir. 51:25–26). Those who come to Jesus come to one who upholds the law (Matt. 5:17–18), but also to one whose interpretation of the law is in no sense a bondage. He is the one in whom the prophecies of the law and the prophets are fulfilled (cf., e.g., 1:22–23; 2:6, 15; 4:13–26). He is the bearer of salvation and the one in whom the kingdom of God and redemption have come (4:17; 12:28).

(d) In his speech to the Jerusalem council Peter asks the circumcision party why they want to put "on the necks of the disciples a yoke that neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear?" (Acts 15:10). He is probably taking up the Jewish language about the yoke of the law and interpreting it as a yoke of bondage. It is true that the devout Jew did not consider the yoke of the law as a burden (cf. Jn. 8:33). Yet the way the law was understood was not in fact a liberating experience (cf. Matt. 5:20; 6:2–18; 23).

(e) In Gal. 5:1, Paul likewise alludes to Jewish views about the yoke of the law, which he denounces as a yoke of slavery: "It is for freedom that Christ has set us free. Stand firm, then, and do let yourselves be burdened again by a yoke of slavery." Many Jews understood the law, esp. the law of circumcision, as something to be fulfilled as a condition of divine acceptance and salvation. The apostle saw this notion as fundamentally at variance with the redemptive death of Christ (3:10–14) and the Spirit-led life (5:18); the Christian life is based on grace and promise, and those who do not live by the promises of God are not children of God but slaves (4:28–31). Thus, he calls on his readers to take hold of their freedom in Christ and to walk by the Spirit (5:1–26).

2. The adj. syzygos (lit., yoked together) can mean yokefellow, comrade, and even wife. The identity of the "loyal yokefellow" in Phil. 4:3 is not clear. It may be a proper name (Syzygos), refer to Epaphroditus (cf. 2:25–30), or be some other person known to the Philippians but no longer to us.

3. zeugos means a yoke of two animals (Lk. 14:19) and a pair (2:24; cf. Lev. 5:11).

4. The vb. zeugnymi, to join, occurs as a variant reading in Mk. 10:9. Otherwise the compound syzeugnymi is used (see Matt. 19:6). Both vbs. are found in cl. Gk. and Josephus of marital union (→ chōrizō, to separate, divorce, 6004).

5. In 2 Cor. 6:14 Paul uses heterozygeō, alluding probably to the yoking of different kinds of animals in Lev. 19:19; Deut. 20:20. What Paul means in this section is a matter of debate. The RSV interprets the injunction as a warning against mixed marriages: "Do not be mismated with unbelievers," which is not impossible (cf. the temple imagery used in 2 Cor. 6:16, which is used in 1 Cor. 6:18 as an argument against sexual immorality). But the whole context and argument of 2 Cor. 6:14–7:1 look beyond mixed marriages to idolatry and defilement in general. Thus, Paul does not want believers to get involved in any partnership with unbelievers where they might be tempted to give up their Christian moral standards.

This is not a Christian version of the Qumran insistence on separation from the world and disobedient Israel. Christians are to remain in the world, but they are not to be a party to idolatry and moral defilement. They are to seek to win the world but must not allow their faith to be compromised, esp. by pagan idolatry and the sexual mores of unbelievers (1 Cor. 5:1; 6:12–20; 10:14–23). The church is the community of God's elect, separate from the world (1:1–9). The outward shape of the world is passing away (7:29–31), and believers will some day judge the world (6:2–3).

ζύμη (zymē), yeast (2434); ζυμόω (zymoō), ferment (2435); ἄζυμος (azymos), unleavened, made without yeast (109).

CL & OT 1. Leaven, in fermenting grain, is not, strictly speaking, yeast, but old, sour dough (stored and then used as a fermentation agent by adding juices), which was hidden in the new dough in order to permeate it and give it lightness. In the Roman state cult the Flamen Dialis was not permitted to come into contact with leaven because it sours and corrupts.

2. zymē is used in the LXX in cultic contexts concerned with regulations for feasts and sacrifices (e.g., Exod. 12:15, 19; Deut. 16:3). It was used in the peace and wave offerings (zymitēs, Lev. 7:13 = LXX 7:3), but was forbidden in the cereal offerings consumed by fire (2:11; 6:17). In the ritual of Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread all yeast was cleansed out from every Jewish home annually, and they ate only unleavened bread from that evening and the following seven days (Exod. 12:14–20), commemorating the Exodus from Egypt (12:34, 39). This process also served a hygienic purpose in breaking any chain of infection established by successive use of sour yeast.

3. Leaven was given different meanings in rab. tradition: a metaphor for human restraints on obeying God, and the Torah with its power to lead Israelites who observe it back to God. Philo allegorized it to mean not only swelling arrogance and pretension but also complete (spiritual) nourishment and blissful joy.

NT 1. zymē and zymoō appear in the Synoptic Gospels and in Paul. Each instance is in a literary figure, whose meaning varies from context to context.

(a) Parable. In Matt. 13:33; Lk. 13:21, the hidden but persistent expansion of the kingdom of God is compared to leaven hidden in dough until it permeates the whole lump. It ties in with the preceding parable of the mustard seed, which denotes enormous expansion from something minute. No indication is given of the significance of the dough, whether it is meant to refer to the culture of society or to the world as a whole.

(b) Metaphor. In Mk. 8:15 leaven is an attribute of the Pharisees and of Herod, of which the disciples are to beware. Matt. 16:11–12, in a warning against Pharisees and Sadducees, interprets the metaphor as their "teaching," and Lk. 12:1, in a warning against Pharisees alone, as "hypocrisy."

(c) Proverb. In 1 Cor. 5:6 and Gal. 5:9 Paul uses the words, "A little yeast works through the whole batch of dough." Proverbial in form, though not found outside Paul as a proverb, these words may have been associated in the Christian church with Jesus' parable of the yeast (cf. above). In 1 Cor. the proverb symbolizes the notion that the pride the Corinthians are expressing in their toleration of an open transgressor will inevitably work its way through the entire community. In Gal. the imagery refers to the influence of false teachers on the understanding of the congregation.

(d) Type. In 1 Cor. 5:7 Paul exhorts the community to "get rid of the old yeast." This is an injunction either to expel the offender (5:13) or to divest themselves of their "boasting" about associating with the transgressor. The grounds for the command are that Christ as the Passover Lamb has been sacrificed and that their church festivals are to be kept by expelling yeast ("malice and wickedness") and by partaking of bread without yeast ("sincerity and truth").

This type recalls the Passover ritual and the Christian identification of Christ with the Passover lamb (Jn. 19:14, 31; 1 Pet. 1:19). Just as the Jews removed all yeast before eating the Passover, so believers are to cast out wickedness because the Passover sacrifice has already taken place, whereby they are accepted and made new by God (1 Cor. 6:11). As occurs so often in Paul, the Christian imperative is based on the indicative (cf. also Rom. 6; 1 Cor. 6:19–20; Col. 2:20–4:1).

2. Apart from the uses of azymos in 1 Cor. 5:7–8, this word occurs in the NT in the pl. form ta azyma, meaning the Feast of Unleavened Bread. This was originally a harvest festival (Exod. 23:14–17) celebrated in the month Abib. It became part of the Passover ritual, set for 15–21 Nisan. The Jews regularly equated the Passover with the Feast of Unleavened Bread (cf. Ezek. 45:21; Lk. 22:1).

2435 (zymoō, ferment), → 2434.

ζωή (zōē), life (2437); ζάω (zaō), live (2409); συζάω (syzaō), live with (5182); ζῷον (zōon), living creature (2442); ζωογονέω (zōogoneō), procreate, give life to, keep alive (2441); ζωοποιέω (zōopoieō), make alive, give life to (2443); συζωοποιέω (syzōopoieō), make alive with (5188).

CL 1. In cl. Gk. life refers in the first place to that living quality of nature that is shared by humans, animals, and plants. For the Gks., therefore, life belongs to the category of natural science. What causes life is the psychē (soul). Just as psychē and zōē belong together in Gk. thought, so do psychē and sōma (body); natural life is made up of the components soul and body.

Not only each individual but also the whole universe is thought of as a living organism or as a world with a soul. Even the gods are considered to be living creatures (zōa), having bipartite natures analogous to the human body and soul. A third component to human life is the reason, mind, or understanding (nous), which is a divine element that enters human life from outside, enhancing it beyond one's natural life.

2. Two trends are visible in the history of Gk. philosophy: True life is progressively divorced from concrete, everyday events and transferred to a supernatural, divine world; and life is increasingly seen as something tangible, "scientific," so that true human life manifests itself not so much in the continuum of historical events as in discontinuous moments of ecstatic vision, totally divorced from history.

(a) Among the Stoics the slogan "to live according to nature" implied life that is virtuous or lived according to reason, which enables the person, who is otherwise "dead," to fulfill the purpose of his or her existence. The Stoics idealized withdrawal from the outward bustle of the world to the cultivation of one's own inner life.

(b) Neo-Platonism differentiated between life in this world and life beyond this world. Humans possessed natural life, but life that is perfect and true can be found only in the one divine realm of the One. The way to this true life leads via negation of the body and cleansing from all earthly things. In other words, life is an upward ascent.

(c) Gnosticism, by contrast, saw life as a descent. Life is essentially divine, something indestructible and immortal. In the human world this pure life is intermingled with matter, being imprisoned in the body. Hence, one must break free from this prison in order to enjoy, at least temporarily, the ecstatic vision. This true life is attained on earth only in fleeting moments of ecstasy; its full enjoyment is reserved for the future, when matter reunites with the divine world.

OT 1. The OT Israelites viewed life as something thoroughly natural, vital, and pertaining to this world. The Gk. division of life into body, soul, and reason was alien to them. It is true that soul (e.g., Jos. 10:28) or flesh (e.g., Gen. 6:13) can be used in place of life, but this is an example of the synthetic approach, where a part can represent the whole. In those passages where the life is said to be the blood (Lev. 17:11, 14; cf. Gen. 9:4; Deut. 12:23), this should be understood not as a scientific statement; rather, its aim is to draw attention to the fact that life is not ours to dispose of.

The Israelites did not think of life as a topic for scientific analysis, but primarily as duration—as the days of one's life granted a person by Yahweh, Lord of life (Gen. 25:7; 47:28; cf. Deut. 32:39). Long life was considered a divine blessing promised to the obedient (Gen. 15:15; 25:8; Deut. 5:16; 30:19; Prov. 3:1–2). The power of death invades human life in the form of sickness, hatred, or loneliness (Ps. 18:5–6; 33:19; 56:13; 116:8).

The ideal life for an Israelite was one of personal involvement—a life expressed, e.g., by hunger and thirst (e.g., Jdg. 15:18–19), hatred and love (e.g., Gen. 24:27), desires and lusts (e.g., 1 Sam. 1; 2 Sam. 13). The sheer vitality, concreteness, and diversity of life were a source of the utmost delight (1 Ki. 3:11–14; Job 2:4; Prov. 3:16); life was synonymous with health, well-being, and success (Ps. 56:13; Prov. 2:19; Eccl. 9:9; Mal. 2:5). An essential feature of life was attendance at the sanctuary, where the worshiper joined in fellowship with the living in praising Yahweh, the Creator of life, and was even granted the occasional privilege of gazing on him, albeit indirectly (Exod. 33:18–23; Ps. 27:4; 65:5; 84:5; 142:7). Only in extreme despair was there any thought of death, which puts an end to a life that was intolerable (Jer. 20:14–18; Job 3:11–12).

2. Yahweh is to be praised as the author of life (Ps. 36:9; 139:13–16; Jer. 17:13). Gen. 2:7 states that he formed the first man from the dust of the ground and breathed divine breath into his lifeless body so that he became a living being. The distinction here is between body and life. The whole physical, emotional, and intellectual life of humankind stems from God. If God withdraws his breath of life, then a human crumbles to dust (Job 34:14–15; Ps. 104:29–30).

Human trials and tribulations—toil and failure, shame and fear, pains of childbirth—were caused by humanity's fall into sin (Gen. 3). The divine punishment is not so much death as the shortening of one's life span (6:3) or experiencing the various trials of life. These are the discords that mar human existence, the original harmony of life having been broken.

3. The Israelite view of life is expressed most clearly in Deut. At the feast of covenant renewal, the worshiping community is confronted by the word of Yahweh with a choice between life and death (Deut. 30:1–20). The obedient are promised blessing, prosperity, and life, while the disobedient can expect nothing but curse, adversity, and death (30:15, 19). The living power of God's Word extends even to one's physical existence: "Man does not live on bread alone but on every word that comes from the mouth of the LORD" (8:3; cf. 32:47; Lev. 18:5).

4. In the same manner the prophets call Israel back to Yahweh; this is Israel's only chance of life, threatened as it is with imminent disaster (Amos 5:4, 14). Isa. laments over the scoffers among the people who have entered into a covenant with death (28:15). Jer. sets the way of life and of death once more before a faithless Israel (21:8), who has forsaken the source of life (2:13; 17:13). Ezek. stresses repeatedly that the righteous will live, while the godless must die (3:18–21; 14:20; 18:4, 9, 13, 17, 20–23; 33:11; 37:5). Here the gift of natural life becomes an integral part of the covenant: Obedience leads to prosperity and blessing, while the transgressor forfeits the right to live.

Jer.'s distinction between the two ways is taken up in wisdom lit., where Wisdom offers to guide us along the pathway to life, while the ways of folly lead to death (e.g., Prov. 2:18–19; 3:2, 18; 4:4, 10, 22; 6:23; 8:35).

5. In Ps. Yahweh is portrayed as the one who gives life and delivers from death (e.g., 16:11; 27:1; cf. 31:4–5). The godly, however, sometimes find that their expectations of long life and prosperity are contradicted by their day-to-day experiences. Hence, elsewhere true life is seen as arising from fellowship with Yahweh: "Your love is better than life" (63:3). Life is here viewed metaphorically in terms of spirituality that seeks refuge and finds satisfaction in fellowship with Yahweh (16:5, 9–11; 23; 36:8–12). In Ps. 73, the assurance of Yahweh's nearness and the sense of security it brings give the worshiper a hope beyond death: "My flesh and my heart may fail, but God is . . . my portion forever" (73:26).

6. To a large extent, rab. Jud. adopted the OT view of life, but under Hel. influence true life was increasingly seen as the gift of eternal life, life without end (4 Macc. 7:19; 15:3; 16:25; 17:12; 18:19). Hence, as in the NT, eternal life could be referred to simply as zōē (e.g., Pss. Sol. 15:15). From the Maccabean period on, belief in resurrection and eternal life became widespread among Jewish theologians.

In Hel. Jud., belief in the resurrection of the dead was largely replaced by the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. Earthly life lost significance (Wis. 4:8–9) or was even regarded as the prison of the soul; the act of dying gained increasing significance (2 Macc. 8:21; 4 Macc. 15:12), and true life (i.e., life that is immortal) was transferred to the world beyond (15:3; Pss. Sol. 3:16).

By contrast, the usage found in Qumran texts is similar to that of the OT, the only new feature being the rather formal association of life with the blessings of salvation (1QS 3:7; 4:7; 1QH 2:20, 31; 9:66; 1QM 1:9; 12:3; CD 3:20).

NT 1. The noun zōon, apart from its use in Heb. 13:11; 2 Pet. 2:12; Jude 10 (all of which mean animals), is confined in the NT to Rev., where it refers to the four living creatures by the heavenly throne. zōogoneō refers to the giving or preserving of life, including physical life (e.g., the physical life of Moses in Acts 7:39).

2. The NT teaching contains elements of OT, Jewish, and Gk. origin. (a) The OT view of life is recalled most strongly in the Synoptics. Natural life is regarded as a priceless possession (cf. Mk. 8:37). Jesus frequently exercised his power in order that the sick or dying might live (5:23; cf. Jn. 4:47–53), or even to restore to earthly life those already dead (Mk. 5:35–43; Lk. 7:11–15; Jn. 11:1–44). Life is regarded as something dynamic, but at the same time bounded and transient (Acts 17:28; Jas. 4:14). It is no merely natural occurrence, but an event that can succeed or fail (Lk. 15:13; 2 Tim. 3:12). True life depends on the word of God (Matt. 4:4, quoting Deut. 8:3), while to live away from God is described as being dead (Lk. 15:24, 32).

The basic necessities of life, such as food and clothing, are to be gratefully received as gifts of the Creator (Matt. 6:25–34; Lk. 12:15). God, who can kill and make alive (Matt. 10:28; Rom. 4:17), is the undisputed Creator of life (Acts 17:25); he is the living God (Matt. 16:16; 26:63) and the God of the living (Matt. 22:32; Mk. 12:27; Lk. 20:38).

(b) Over against the present life stands the life to come (Mk. 10:30; 1 Tim. 4:8). It is described as "eternal life" (Matt. 19:16; Mk. 10:17; cf. "life and immortality" in 2 Tim. 1:10). One attains this as a gift from God, who raises the dead (Matt. 22:31–32). The fact that the future life is occasionally referred to by the use of zōē alone indicates that such life is regarded as real and true (18:8–9; Mk. 9:43, 45). There is no implication here, however, of a devaluation of earthly life. On the contrary, our relationship to God's will in this present life determines our destiny in the life to come (Matt. 19:16; Lk. 10:25). Matt. 7:13–14 (cf. Lk. 13:23–24) takes up the idea of the two ways found in Deut. 30:19; Jer. 21:8. This close relationship between the present life and future life is expressed in the parable of the last judgment (Matt. 25:31–46): The disobedient will suffer eternal punishment, while the righteous enter eternal life (25:46).

3. (a) Paul's view of life is deeply affected by the resurrection of Christ from the dead (1 Cor. 15:4), which has proved the power of divine life over death (Rom. 14:9). Christ is the embodiment of God's living power, conquering death and raising the dead (2 Cor. 13:4). Life means Christ's everlasting life.

Through his resurrection Christ, the last Adam, has become the author of a new life for humankind (Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:20–22). In that resurrection, Christians are "made . . . with Christ" (Eph. 2:5; Col. 2:13). The life of Christians is thus not their own life but the life of Christ; he lives in them (Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:21), and they live the life of Christ (2 Cor. 4:10). Their life is justified by Christ (Rom. 5:18), and by his life they will be saved (5:10). The life of Christ is mediated to Christians by the word of life (Phil. 2:16; cf. 2 Tim. 1:10; Tit. 1:2–3) and by the creative power of the life-giving Spirit (Rom. 8:2, 6, 10–11; 1 Cor. 15:45).

(b) The new Spirit-wrought life of believers (Rom. 6:4) does not try to escape from everyday life into Stoic indifference and asceticism. Rather, Christians are to serve their fellow human beings responsibly, in whatever historical situation they find themselves. Since they no longer live for themselves (Rom. 14:7; 2 Cor. 5:15) but for God (Rom. 6:10–11) and Christ (14:8; 2 Cor. 5:15), their lives show positive, tangible results (Gal. 5:25–26) as they follow in the footsteps of Christ and take up his cross (2 Cor. 4:9–10). Hence, Paul can make the paradoxical statement: We are "regarded as . . . dying, and yet we live on" (6:9), since life comes from and through death. Not living for oneself means having an attitude of love for others (Rom. 13:8–10; cf. 14:11–21).

(c) In the believer's new life there is a tension between present and future, between the indicative and the imperative (Gal. 5:25). The new life exists already but has not yet been fully manifested (Col. 3:3–4). Christ's resurrection is the pledge of our own future resurrection to an eternal life, where death and all the imperfections of the present creation will be over (Rom. 8:18–21; cf. 1 Cor. 15:22).

The new life points forward to eternal life when the last enemy, death, is vanquished (Rom. 6:22; 1 Cor. 15:26, 28; Gal. 6:8). Paul depicts the transition from temporal to eternal life in terms of cosmic drama, miraculous transformation, and rapture (1 Cor. 15:20–28, 35–44, 51–57; 1 Thess. 4:13–17). This future life will be a bodily life (1 Cor. 15:35–49; 2 Cor. 5:1–10), which involves seeing face to face (1 Cor. 13:12; 2 Cor. 5:7), entering into the fullness of righteousness, peace, and joy (Rom. 14:17), being glorified (2 Cor. 3:8–9; cf. Rom. 8:17), but above all living with Christ forever (syzaō, 2 Tim. 2:11; cf. Rom. 6:8; Phil. 1:23; 1 Thess. 4:17).

4. (a) Jn. presents the Word as being eternal life even before his incarnation. He has lived eternally with God and for the benefit of humanity (Jn. 1:4; 1 Jn. 1:1–2); i.e., he is the source of divine life and power both in the old and the new creations. In his incarnation he is the revelation of God. He not only brings eternal life by his word (Jn. 6:68; 10:28; 12:50; 17:2); he himself is the true life (1 Jn. 5:20), as his various "I am" sayings indicate: "I am the bread of life" (Jn. 6:35, 48), "the resurrection and the life" (11:25), "the way and the truth and the life" (14:6). The preexistent Son of the eternal Father has been sent into the world to give life to humans both by his word and in his own person (6:33; 10:10; 1 Jn. 4:9).

(b) The life of God is received by faith. Those who believe in the Son have life (1 Jn. 5:12)—eternal life (Jn. 6:40, 47); they have already passed from death to life (5:24; 1 Jn. 3:14). This eternal life expresses itself in love (Jn. 15:9–17) and joy

(16:20–24). Brotherly love is the criterion of true life: "We know that we have passed from death into life, because we love our brothers" (1 Jn. 3:14).

5. Rev. combines the Son of Man tradition (1:13) with the figure of a slain Lamb: "I am the First and the Last. I am the Living One; I was dead, and behold I am alive for ever and ever! And I hold the keys of death and Hades" (1:17–18; cf. 4:9–10). Whereas the Gospel of Jn. concentrates on the present life, Rev. concerns itself primarily with the life to come. In the vision of the new Jerusalem, the pictures of the tree of life and the water of life, familiar from the story of the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2:9–17), reappear as symbols of the fullness of life in the new city of God (Rev. 21:6; 22:1–14, 17, 19). The vision of the new heaven and the new earth is the most wide-ranging in its promises: The last enemy, death, will be vanquished, and our eternal life with God will be utter perfection (21:3–4).

2439 ζώννυμι

ζώννυμι (zōnnymi), gird (2439); ζώνη (zōnē), girdle, belt (2438); διαζώννυμι (diazōnnymi), tie or gird around (1346); περιζώννυμι (perizōnnymi), gird with, gird around (4322).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. the vbs. in this group refer to girding oneself or someone else. The noun zōnē can mean girdle or money belt, purse (cf. Mk. 6:8).

2. (a) Generally speaking, the OT uses these words in the same way as cl. Gk. The girdle (zōnē), made of linen or leather, served to tuck in the long skirts of one's robe, in order to give greater freedom of movement. Hence the putting on of a girdle acquired the particular meaning of making oneself ready to go (2 Ki. 4:29); to lay aside one's girdle means, correspondingly, to rest. A person in authority wore a girdle as part of his finery (Isa. 22:21), an officer as his badge of rank. A richly embroidered girdle formed part of the vestments of the high priest (Exod. 28:4, 39–40 = LXX 35–36; 29:9; Lev. 8:7, 13; 16:4). A golden girdle, worn around the breast, was an angel's mark of distinction (Dan. 10:5; cf. Rev. 15:6). A broad leather girdle was used as armor, to protect the lower part of the body (1 Sam. 25:13); thus, the expression "everyone who wears the girdle" means "the men fit for war."

(b) A metaphorical use occurs in Isa. 11:5, which looks forward to the new David as an ideal king, the Messiah, of whom it is said: "Righteousness will be his belt." perizōnnymi is used fig. in Ps. 65:6 (Yahweh has "armed [himself] with strength"); 18:32, 39 (Yahweh "arms me with strength"); and 30:11 (Yahweh "clothed me with joy").

NT 1. The NT continues the same use of these words. diazōnnymi occurs in a direct sense in Jn. 21:7, where Peter girds himself with his outer garment because he does not wish to meet the Lord improperly dressed, and perizōnnymi in Lk. 17:8, where a servant girds himself in order to serve his master. In Jn. 13:4–5 Jesus changes his clothes in preparation for performing the task of a slave.

2. In some passages the vbs. in this group have, as in the LXX, the special meaning of making oneself ready to depart, i.e., to get moving, stand in readiness. Thus in Acts 12:8 Peter is commanded to prepare himself to leave prison, and in Jn. 21:18 this same vigorous Peter, who is well able to gird himself and make himself ready to go, is told that when he is old another will make him ready for a journey and determine the destination of his life (probably an allusion to his martyrdom). In Lk. 12:35 (echoing Exod. 12:11), the church is challenged to live unfettered by the world, in expectation of the Lord's coming, in readiness to depart (cf. 1 Cor. 7:29–31). In Matt. 10:9, the disciples are not to secure themselves financially by taking extra money in their "belts" (zōnē), but to leave everything to God's provision.

3. According to Mk. 1:6, John the Baptist did not wear over his clothing the linen girdle customary among nomads, but a leather one (cf. 2 Ki. 1:8). His appearance is like that of Elijah (cf. Mal. 3:1; 4:5), the forerunner of the Messiah. His clothing does not indicate hostility to culture or asceticism but is to be explained in terms of desert typology. John's garb proclaimed his conscious prophetic calling. In Acts 21:11 Agabus (like the prophets of the OT; cf. Isa. 20:2; Jer. 13:1–11) carried out a symbolic action with Paul's girdle (a long cloth worn about the waist), to indicate his impending arrest. In the vision of Rev. 1:13, the golden girdle marks the exalted Christ as the true high priest, as does his long robe (cf. Exod. 28:4).

4. perizōnnymi is used in a metaphorical sense in Eph. 6:14: Believers are to put on God's "truth" like a military girdle, which will protect them from the attacks of the evil one.

H eta

2450 ἡγεμών

ἡγεμών (hēgemōn), leader, commander, chief (2450); ἡγέομαι (hēgeomai), lead, consider (2451).

This word can refer to the emperor or a provincial governor (cf. Matt. 10:18; Mk. 13:9; Lk. 21:12; 1 Pet. 2:14), particularly the procurators in Judea—Pilate (Matt. 27:2, 11, 14–15, 21, 27; 28:14; Lk. 20:20), Felix (Acts 23:24, 26, 33; 24:1, 10), and Festus (26:30). In Matt. 2:6 it means more generally "ruler." In 1 Pet. 2:13–14 believers are expected to honor political authority.

The related vb. hēgeomai is used 7x as a participial substantive to denote a ruler or leader (Matt. 2:6; Heb. 13:7, 17, 24). Elsewhere, however, the vb. means to consider, think (e.g., 2 Cor. 9:5; Phil. 2:3, 6, 25; 1 Tim. 6:1).

2454 ἡδονή

ἡδονή (hēdonē), pleasure (2454); φιλήδονος (philēdonos), lover of pleasure (5798).

CL & OT hēdonē is from the same root as hēdys, sweet, pleasant, pleasing. Originally it meant something pleasant to the taste, and then pleasant generally. It occurs in an extended sense as feelings of pleasure, enjoyment. Finally, it came to mean desire for pleasure. When regarded as a gift of nature, hēdonē was considered good.

In Hel. times a distinction was made between higher and lower hēdonai—those of the mind and soul and those of the body. Then the concept was confined to its ethically bad elements, and it was used in contrast to chara, joy, and aretē, virtue. The Stoics used it for pleasure of the senses, esp. sex, and then for unrestricted passions. Those who let themselves be ruled by hēdonē missed the purpose of life.

In Num. 11:8 hēdonē means (good) taste, a quality in a thing that gives someone pleasure (see also Prov. 17:1; Wis. 7:2; 16:20). It is not until 4 Macc. (10x) and esp. Philo, who uses hēdonē as the power in revolt against logos, that the word is used in a primarily negative sense. hēdonē is a root of all evil impulses and can bring only trouble and pain. Rab. writings have repeated warnings against the "evil impulse" (yēṣer hā-rāʿ), which makes a person reluctant to study the Torah.

NT 1. In the NT hēdonē is found only 5x—all in later books and all with a bad connotation. The desire for pleasure fills those estranged from God. They live out their own irresistible desire for pleasure, become separated from God, and end up being slaves of the hēdonai. Only God can deliver them (Tit. 3:3–7). 2 Pet. 2:13–15 gives a picture of those who have given themselves over to their hēdonai, showing how they have become the victims of these destructive powers.

2. People estranged from God are not the only ones threatened by the insatiable desires of the impulses (Tit. 3:3). Christians also remain exposed to this power. Even prayer can be misused as a means to satisfy our passions (Jas. 4:3). If we give way to them, we become entangled in perpetual dissatisfaction and find ourselves in a chaotic condition (4:1). The NT lists of vices picture clearly the characteristics and results of hēdonē—ranging from unrestrained sexuality through lack of self-discipline to a self-centered indifference to one's fellow human beings.

3. The dangers that unchecked impulses have for faith are seen most clearly in the interpretation of the parable of the sower (Lk. 8:14). When hēdonē asserts its mastery, faith dies, choked among the thorns.

4. This process is seen clearly in those who entangle themselves in false teaching, lead others astray, and become victims of moral self-destruction (see 2 Tim. 3:1–5, where this is a characteristic of "the last days"; Paul uses philēdonoi, lovers of pleasure, in contrast to philotheoi, lovers of God).

5. We must never confound hēdonē with the desire for true joy (chara), which is never rejected by the NT. Joy is satisfied by communion with God, often even in the midst of suffering and persecution (cf. Jas. 1:2).

2460 Ἠλίας

Ἠλίας (Ēlias), Elijah (2460); Heb. ʾēlîyyâhû or ʾēlîyyâ (Yah(u) is God).

OT 1. The OT account of Elijah is found in 1 Ki. 17–2 Ki. 2. Elijah came from Tishbe in Transjordan and was active as a prophet in the northern kingdom of Israel in the first half of the 9th cent. B.C. He prepared for Jehu's revolution, which destroyed the dynasty of Omri because it had favored Canaanite culture and religion. Elijah took a stand that in Israel Yahweh's claims alone should be recognized and that faith in Yahweh should remain free from all Canaanite influences.

Elijah preached that Yahweh guided the fortunes of humanity and nations. The forces of nature (e.g., the drought in 1 Ki. 17, for which the Baal cult had no explanation) were also under Yahweh's sovereignty and served to carry out his purposes. Yahweh demanded the rule of law and justice and watched over the ethical and legal norms for life in the nation of Israel, to which the king also was subject. Yahweh, not Baal, had power over life and death. From this Elijah deduced Yahweh's claim to sole obedience from his people.

Yahweh revealed his character not merely in catastrophic expressions of his rage but also in the silence (cf. "a gentle whisper" [1 Ki. 19:12]). He worked quietly, hardly recognizable behind events (cf. "the gently flowing waters of Shiloah" [Isa. 8:6]). Elijah cast the old faith in Yahweh in a new mold and placed it on a new foundation. This justifies the tradition that placed him beside Moses. Mal. 4:5–6 presents Elijah as a figure of the messianic age. He prepares the way for God, purifies the priests, and creates peace.

2. Three parallel concepts of Elijah's return were developed in intertestamental and rab. Jud.: (a) Elijah belonged to the tribe of Gad, and he would prepare the way for God and deliver Israel in the last days. (b) Elijah belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, and he would be the forerunner of the Messiah. (c) Elijah belonged to the tribe of Levi, and he would be the high priest of the messianic age.

According to these traditions, Elijah was sinless and so obtained eternal existence. Thus, Elijah was the intercessor for Israel in heaven. He was also the one who rescued from greatest need. In post-NT times we find the idea that he was the heavenly scribe who made a record of the acts of human beings and esp. kept a register of Israelite marriages. He accompanied the souls of the dead into the other world.

Sir. 48:10 expects that Elijah will have the task of restoring the tribes of Israel, which in Isa. 49:6 is one of the tasks of the Servant of the Lord. Elijah thus receives a messianic function. It was widely believed that Elijah was a forerunner of the Messiah, proclaiming the coming days of salvation, fighting against the Antichrist, introducing the Messiah, and sometimes anointing him. Since Mal. 3:1; 4:5–6 were combined with 2:4, the Jews anticipated Elijah as the eschatological high priest, who would restore pure doctrine and a pure community and clear up controversies in doctrine, law, and difficult passages of Scripture. Hence many points in Jud. were left open. One awaited the coming of Elijah, who would decide such matters.

According to the Targum, God would gather the Diaspora through Elijah and Moses. A midrash on Ps. 43 says there are two deliverers: Elijah of the tribe of Levi, and the Messiah of the house of David (cf. the expectation at Qumran that in the messianic age there would be a priestly Messiah beside the Messiah from the tribe of Judah).

NT Elijah is mentioned 29x in the NT. Lk. 4:25–26; 9:54; Jas. 5:17; and Rev. 11:6 refer to the historical details of his life. The statement in Jas. 5:17 that the drought lasted three and a half years is based on Palestinian tradition; this verse stresses the power of prayer by quoting the example of Elijah. Lk. 4:25–26 is a threat by Jesus that it might please God to offer salvation to the Gentiles to the exclusion of Israel. In Lk. 9:54 Jesus rejects the suggestion that he should act like Elijah, for his task was to save, not to destroy.

In Mk. 15:34 par., Jesus prayed in the words of Ps. 22:1 on the cross. This prayer was misunderstood by those standing by as a call to Elijah to help, since Elijah was the helper in need (15:35–36). Since Elijah did not intervene, Jesus' messianic claim could be considered a failure.

According to the NT, some expected Elijah to come before the dawn of the end (Matt. 17:10; Mk. 9:11). Some wondered whether John the Baptist was Elijah (Jn. 1:21, 25); others thought that Jesus himself was Elijah who had returned (Mk. 6:15 par.; 8:28 par.). Mk. 9:11 expresses the Jewish expectation of Elijah as forerunner of the Messiah and restorer. The argument of the scribes was that since Elijah had not come, Jesus could not be the Messiah. Rev. 11:3 shows that the restoration was expected to come by the preaching of repentance.

Jn. 1:21, 25 states that John the Baptist personally refused to accept that he was the eschatological Elijah. In Jesus' perspective, however, the appearance of John fulfilled the expectation of the coming of Elijah (see Mk. 9:11–13 par.; Matt. 11:10–14 par.). Matt. 11:14 ("if you are willing to accept it") shows that this was a new and unusual verdict. He meant that there was to be no pure, direct embodiment of Elijah in person, but also that the promise was fulfilled. It meant also that Jesus did not take the restitution in a political or national sense, but in a religious one through repentance and forgiveness. Jesus saw his own fate foreshadowed in that of the Baptist (Mk. 9:13). The early church accepted Jesus' verdict and thereby confessed Jesus' messiahship (Mk. 1:2; Lk. 1:16–17, 76).

Elijah appeared with Moses at Jesus' transfiguration (Mk. 9:4–5 par.). Apocalyptic tradition knew of two forerunners of the Messiah, normally Enoch and Elijah (both of whom had been raptured). But in Rev. 11:3–6 they are Moses and Elijah. When Moses and Elijah appear at Jesus' transfiguration, it is an announcement of the beginning of the end time. According to Mk. 9:12–13 and Rev. 11:3–10, Elijah is a suffering figure. That he appears at Jesus' transfiguration points to Jesus' coming sufferings and confirms his prediction of suffering (Mk. 8:31–32; Lk. 9:31).

Paul refers to the OT story of Elijah in Rom. 11:2–5. He had gained the conviction from 1 Ki. 19:10, 14, 18 that also in Elijah's time God had separated for himself an elect, holy remnant, who in Paul's time were those Jews who believed on Jesus as Messiah.

2461 ἡλικία

ἡλικία (hēlikia), age, life span, stature (2461).

CL & OT In cl. Gk. hēlikia had a range of meanings: (1) the relative age in life of a person, (2) the years of discretion as an expression of manliness (en hēlikia, come of age), (3) a generation, and (4) height, stature, size of body.

In the LXX hēlikia is found only with the first two meanings, mostly in 2, 3, and 4 Macc. In Jud., as in antiquity generally, there was great respect for the older men (Lev. 19:32) because they had wisdom and understanding (Job. 15:10, Sir. 6:34–35; 25:4–6). Elders accordingly exercised a leading role among the people.

NT In the NT hēlikia doubtless means stature in Lk. 19:3. But normally it has the first two meanings above (e.g., Heb. 11:11, age; Jn. 9:21, 23, maturity). The three following points are of importance:

1. A human being cannot influence the physical age he attains; it is a gift of the Creator. Hence in Matt. 6:27 and Lk. 12:25 hēlikia means age or span of life. No amount of worrying is able to lengthen a person's life by a trifling measure of time.

2. Lk. 2:52 says that Jesus "grew in wisdom and stature." The use of the vb. "grew" (prokoptō, i.e., make progress) makes it probable that hēlikia is used here in the fig. sense of growing up to maturity, to full manhood.

3. The word is found in a metaphorical sense in Eph. 4:13, "to the measure of maturity [hēlikia] of the fullness of Christ" (lit. trans.). Maturity is that through which a person is to be distinguished from a child (cf. 4:14), who is tossed about and easily influenced. The measure of the maturity implies a goal that has been set. But here this goal is not for the individual believer but for the church, which is built up as the body of Christ (4:12). Each member contributes his or her measure of effectiveness (4:16) according to the measure of the grace given to each (4:7). The goal, however, is that all should arrive at the unity of faith and knowledge of the Son of God (4:13a) (→ plēroō, fullness [4444]). Only then will the whole body be like a mature person (4:13).

ἥλιος (hēlios), sun (2463).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hēlios usually refers to the sun, the most conspicuous of the heavenly bodies. Occasionally fig. uses of hēlios are found. The conspicuous character of the sun, its fundamental importance to life and esp. agriculture, and its daily journey across the sky all readily explain the nearly universal worship of the sun in primitive societies. Frequently the sun is personified into a god: e.g., Shamash in Mesopotamia, Helios in the Greek world, Sol Invictus in the Roman world.

2. (a) The use of hēlios in the LXX is similar to that of cl. Gk. The most common use is to mark time, whether of the day, by reference to its rising, setting, and midday heat, or of the season. Another important use is the specialized "under the sun," by which Eccl. designates life in the real world. Both the LXX and Gk. lit. use the rising of the sun to designate the direction east. The permanence of the sun and its fixed order are sometimes stressed. Throughout the LXX the sun is understood to be the creation of God, the greater light made to rule the day (Gen. 1:16).

(b) In the OT the sun can take on a fig. meaning in referring to excellence, permanence, beauty, or strength (Jdg. 5:31; Ps. 89:36; Song 6:10 = LXX 6:9; Wis. 7:29; Sir. 23:19; 26:16; 50:7). It is also associated with righteousness (Wis. 5:6).

(c) The OT clearly stands against the widespread practice of the worship of any heavenly bodies, strictly forbidding any reverence for the sun, moon, and stars (Deut. 4:19; 17:3; cf. 2 Ki. 23:5, 11; Jer. 8:2; Ezek. 8:16). We come near to a personification of the sun in Mal. 4:2: "But for you who revere my name, the sun of righteousness will rise with healing in its wings." This may reflect the representation of the sun as a winged disk common in the art of the ANE.

(d) A specialized group of references in the LXX, which are esp. important to the background of the NT, may be described as apocalyptic in tone. (i) Although the judgment oracles of the prophets refer to anticipated judgment in history, they also foreshadow the divine wrath of final judgment. Most frequent is a reference to a darkening of the sun as a prelude to or an accompaniment of divine judgment. In some passages an impending historical judgment is in view: Isa. 13:10 (Babylon); Ezek. 32:7 (Egypt); Joel 2:10, 31; 3:15; and Mic. 3:6 (Jerusalem). But there is a tendency for this language to shade into a description of the eschatological day of the Lord. Moreover, judgment may be indicated by other irregularities: e.g., the sun does not rise (Job 9:7); it stands still (Hab. 3:11); it goes down at noon (Amos 8:9) or while yet day (Jer. 15:9); it shines at night (2 Esd. 5:4). In their contexts these passages refer to shame, sorrow, and confusion.

(ii) In the eschatological blessing that follows judgment, "the sun will no more be your light by day . . . for the LORD will be your everlasting light" (Isa. 60:19).

(iii) By contrast, indicative of the incomparable glory of the promised new reality, "the sunlight will be seven times brighter, like the light of seven full days" (Isa. 30:26). This is fig. language for judgment and blessing. There are few parallels in classical lit. since the framework of eschatological expectation is lacking.

NT 1. The NT continues the ordinary usage of hēlios as the marker of time (Mk. 1:32; 16:2; Eph. 4:26) and direction (Acts 27:20; Rev. 7:2, 16:12) and as the source of scorching heat (Matt. 13:6; Mk. 4:6; Jas. 1:11; Rev. 7:16; 16:8). Consistent with the OT idea of "life under the sun," Jesus teaches that the Father in heaven "causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good" (Matt. 5:45). In his argument concerning the nature of the resurrection body, Paul speaks of the contrasting glory of the sun, moon, and stars (1 Cor. 15:41). Paul's judgment on Elymas causes a blindness that makes him unable to see the sun (Acts 13:11).

2. The NT often has a fig. use of hēlios. In the transfiguration narrative of Matt. 17:2, Jesus' face is said to have "shone like the sun." John's vision of Christ similarly describes his face as "like the sun shining in all its brilliance" (Rev. 1:16). The description of the mighty angel of 10:1 likens his face to the sun. The angel who announces the great supper of God in 19:17 is described as "standing in the sun." The woman of Rev. 12 (probably to be identified with the Zion of Isa. 66:7–16), who gives birth to the child destined to rule all nations, is portrayed as "clothed with the sun" (Rev. 12:1). Jesus teaches in Matt. 13:43 that "the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father." The light from heaven that Paul saw on the Damascus Road was "brighter than the sun" (Acts 26:13).

3. Apocalyptic references to hēlios are frequent in the NT and depend on the same imagery as in the OT. (a) Most obvious, signifying God's wrath in judgment, are various references in Rev. At the opening of the sixth seal "the sun turned black like sackcloth" (6:12); at the blowing of the fourth trumpet "a third of the sun was struck" so that its light was diminished by a third (8:12); at the fifth trumpet the sun was darkened "by the smoke from the Abyss" (9:2). Note also the saying of Jesus in the Synoptics that "the sun will be darkened" (Matt. 24:29; Mk. 13:24) or, less precisely, that there will be signs in the sun (Lk. 21:25). These words clearly have an eschatological ring to them, although their primary reference is probably to the historical event of the fall of Jerusalem.

The same issue confronts us in the quotation of Joel 2.28–32 in Acts 2:17–21. How can one understand "the sun will be turned to darkness," etc. (Acts 2:20), as it stands in the context? Certainly the main meaning is the eschatological fulfillment experienced in the reception of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. Perhaps Peter regarded the second half of the quotation (Acts 2:19–20) as simply symbolic for the inauguration of the eschatological age. Furthermore, Peter and his listeners may have associated the failing of the sun's light at the time of the crucifixion (Lk. 23:45; cf. Matt. 27:45; Mk. 15:33) with the prophecy of Joel. It is, however, consistent with the meaning of this language elsewhere (in both OT and NT) to understand Acts 2:19–20 as referring to coming judgment. The point is that the last days have begun. Warnings and the call to repentance are therefore timely (2:38, 40; 3:19, 23). Salvation is available to those who call on the name of the Lord (2:21; cf. 4:12).

(b) Like the LXX, the NT also uses hēlios in describing the glorious aspect of eschatology, here as exhibited in the city coming down out of heaven, the new Jerusalem. That city is of such splendor that there is no need of the sun (Rev. 21:23). God's servants there will not "need the light ... of the sun, for the Lord God will give them light" (22:5).

(c) It is worth noting that whereas most of the references to hēlios in the LXX are lit. rather than fig. or apocalyptic in character, in the NT the reverse is true. This is of course explained by the eschatological orientation of the NT. Moreover, there is a theological connection between God's blessings and his judgments, whereby earlier blessings may typify eschatological blessing and earlier judgments may typify eschatological judgment. So magnificent is the kingdom inaugurated by Christ at his first advent that it may rightly be characterized in language that, strictly speaking, refers to the consummation (e.g., Luke 4:18; 7:22; 10:18, 24). In the same way, the fall of Jerusalem as a judgment sign connotes the eschatological judgment and points proleptically to the end times; thus, it may be described in the boldest of language (e.g., the darkening of the sun).

ἡμέρα (hēmera), day (2465).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hēmera can denote the period of twenty-four hours, in which case it includes the night, or it may exclude the night. But it can also mean a much longer period of time, including a lifetime or even time generally.

2. In the OT, like years and months (e.g., Exod. 2:2; 2 Ki. 17:1), days serve as a division of time (Gen. 1:5–2:2; Jos. 6:3), the Heb. word being almost invariably yôm. The day can include the night, in which case it begins with the evening (Gen. 1:5), or else be distinguished from the night (Isa. 34:10). The word may indicate a particular day (Gen. 4:14, today; Job 3:1, birthday) or (in the pl.) a period of time (Gen. 6:3, lifetime; 8:22, so long as the earth remains; Ps. 90:4, a thousand years; Isa. 60:20, days of mourning; Jdg. 17:10, a year). Certain days have a special character—such as six days of the week as days of work, while the seventh day is the Sabbath, the day of rest (Exod. 20:9–10). A day in the temple courts is better than a thousand elsewhere (Ps. 84:10). Human beings have no power over the day of death (Eccl. 8:8).

3. Those passages that speak of "the day of the LORD" are esp. important theologically. But the phrase has various meanings. Originally the day of Yahweh was a day of joy (assumed in Amos 5:18, 20; cf. Zech. 14:7). The prophets, however, reinterpreted this popular idea of a day of salvation and proclaimed it instead as a day of unrelieved judgment (cf. Joel 1:15; 2:2; Amos 5:18, 20). The event in view may be a political (Ezek. 34:12) or a cultic one, or it may be the great eschatological event (e.g., Isa. 2:11–12, 17; Amos 8:9), the latter often described in cosmological language (Joel 3:14; Zeph. 1:15).

In many cases it is difficult to distinguish the one from the other. The day of Yahweh can mean the fall of Jerusalem and so belong to the past (Lam. 1:21) or, as in the eschatological passages mentioned above, still be future. It can be imminent (Ezek. 7:7), so that the hearers should give heed to the prophetic message (Mic. 1:2). Yet no time scale may be indicated (Isa. 24:21). It may even be regarded (by the sinner, at least) as a long way off (Amos 6:3; 9:10). This shows that the prophets' preaching of this day cannot be isolated from concrete situations but must always be seen to have taken place in a particular historical context.

The day of the Lord figures prominently in oracles of judgment against foreign nations (Isa. 13:6; Ezek. 30:3; Joel 3:14; Obad. 15), though Israel too may be the object of judgment (Isa. 2:12; Ezek. 13:5; Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11; Amos 5:18, 20; Mal. 4:5). There is no set technical expression for this day of the Lord. It may be referred to as "the day of disaster" (Jer. 46:21 = LXX 26:21), "the day of calamity" (Hab. 3:16), "the day of your fall" (Ezek. 26:18; 27:27; 32:10), "a bitter day" (Amos 8:10), "the evil day" (6:3), etc. But it can also be a day of salvation: the day "when the LORD binds up" (Isa. 30:26), "the day I cleanse" (Ezek. 36:33), "the day the LORD gives you relief" (Isa. 14:3), etc. Similarly, the prophets can use the pl. ("the days are coming, when . . .") in both oracles of judgment (e.g., Isa. 39:6; Jer. 7:32; 9:24 = LXX 9:25; 19:6) and salvation (30:3= LXX 37:3; 31:27, 31, 38= LXX 38:27, 31, 38; Amos 9:13).

In general, therefore, the day of the Lord involved a breaking into history in a spectacular fashion. Moreover, though judgment may be nigh, usually a golden age lay beyond it, which may be presented as being near or far. But nowhere is this day brought about by human achievement or the policies contrived by human beings.

The golden age, usually described in apocalyptic language, has a universal character (cf. Isa. 11:6; 65:17, 21; Mic. 4:4). Sometimes the nations are depicted as serving Israel (Isa. 60:10–16; 61:5; Dan. 2:44; 7:27), or Israel's king as holding universal sway (Ps. 2:8–9; 72:8–11; Mic. 5:2, 4; Zech. 9:9–10). Jer. 3:17 declares that only universal submission to God can eliminate that which militates against well-being. The thought of the Gentiles sharing the faith of Israel also comes into the prophetic vision (Ps. 22:27; 96:1–3; Jer. 16:19–21; Zeph. 3:10; Zech. 2:11; 8:22–23). Such universalism related it to the mission of Israel. Note how the Gentiles are envisaged in the books of Ruth and Jon. as included in God's universal concern. The figures of the Son of man, the suffering servant, the Messiah, and the idea of the kingdom of God all converge on the day of the Lord.

4. The Hebrews had no word for time in the abstract and similarly had no corresponding expressions for past, present, and future. Rather, the Heb. yôm is often qualified by a genitival phrase, an infinitive, or a relative clause. Thus there could be a yôm of salvation experienced in a variety of past events: the day of Israel's election (Deut. 9:24; Ezek. 16:4–5); the day of the plagues on Egypt and other days connected with the saving events of the exodus (Exod. 10:13; 12:17; Num. 11:32); the day of the dedication of the tabernacle (9:15); the day of the giving of the law (Deut. 4:10); the day of victory over the Amorites (Jos. 10:12).

Out of such expressions arose a variety of stock phrases, such as "since the day the Israelites came up out of Egypt" (Jdg. 19:30; cf. 1 Sam. 8:8; 2 Sam. 7:6; Ps. 78:42; Isa. 11:16; Jer. 7:22; 11:4; 31:32 = LXX 38:32; 34:13 = LXX 41:13; Hos. 2:17 = LXX 2:15). This day provided the model for speaking of another past day of salvation experienced in the return from exile (Hag. 2:15, 18–19 = LXX 2:16, 19–20; Zech. 4:10; 8:9), and what was true corporately for Israel could similarly be applied to the individual (Ps. 18:18; 20:1–2; 59:16; 77:2; 138:3; 140:7; Lam. 3:57).

But days could also be remembered as a day of judgment (Num. 32:10; 2 Chr. 28:6; Ps. 78:9; 95:8; 137:7; Isa. 9:3, 13 = LXX 9:4, 14; Lam. 1:12; 2:1 = LXX 2:2; Obad. 11, 14; Zech. 14:3). Whereas in some of these instances yôm is a literal day, in others it denotes a concrete time that was longer and was characterized by a specific event.

In this connection we can note that the two Gen. creation narratives both use yôm and the corresponding Gk. hēmera: the seven-day narrative (Gen. 1:5, 8, 13–14, 16, 18–19, 23, 31; 2:2–4a) and the one-day creation and fall narrative (2:4b–3:24). yôm/hēmera occurs in 2:17 regarding the tree of knowledge of good and evil: "for when [lit., in the day that] you eat of it you will surely die." This should not be understood in a literal sense of physical death within twenty-four hours. Rather, it brought a change in the human condition that affects humanity all the days of their life (3:14, 17).

Various attempts have been made to harmonize the Gen. narratives with a modern scientific view of the world, such as the view that the six days of Gen. 1 correspond to geological eras. But these place a considerable strain on both scientific theory and the biblical text. Even if the days of Gen. 1 correspond to geological eras, it does not help to harmonize 2:4b, which locates the creation of humanity "in the day that the LORD God made the earth and the heavens" (NRSV), seemingly prior to the planting of the garden of Eden. It seems best, therefore, to recognize Gen. as prescientific, symbolically representing the origin of the world from God in its order and relative autonomy. Exod. 20:11 views the six creation days followed by a rest day in Gen. 1 as a divine pattern for human activity in explaining the commandment concerning the Sabbath.

The present day may be characterized by laments and distress (e.g., 2 Ki. 19:3; Ps. 20:9; 86:7; Isa. 37:3; 61:2), but also by salvation (49:8). There is, however, a gnomic use of the word "day," esp. in teachings that have to do with popular wisdom and in cultic regulations. In the latter yôm/hēmera refers to a "today" that is continually repeated and hence continuously present (e.g., Exod. 20:8; 31:15; 35:3; 40:2; Ps. 20:9; 37:19; Prov. 11:4; Eccl. 7:15 = LXX 7:16; 9:9; 11:9; 12:1).

5. In addition to the above expressions, the OT contains adverbial expressions of time such as "on that day" (201x, of which 89 refer to the past, 112 to the future) and "today" (217x). An analysis of all these passages leads to the conclusion that the function of the references to the day of the Lord, whether in the past or the future, is to illuminate the present "today." Authors use past revelatory events to shed light on and give exhortations for living in the present. The day of Yahweh is not so much a final day of history as a day of Yahweh's decisive action in which what is happening in the present is brought to a final resolution. In fact, there can be more than one day of the Lord, but only those days actively become his day when he manifests himself in judgment and/or salvation (cf. Ps. 95:8; Jer. 28:9; Ezek. 33:33; Mal. 3:1, 3, 19–21).

In the apocalyptic writings, however, the idea is transformed. The future is increasingly abstracted from the present and has an epoch of its own. Thus, Zech. 14:21 depicts the future more in terms of a state of being than a decisive event (cf. Isa. 61:2–3; Dan. 7).

The OT writers saw time as both quantitative and qualitative. The quantitative approach provides the framework of continuity, allowing for the interconnectedness of specific events. The qualitative approach sees history as a succession of unique experiences. This view of time stands in contrast with that of the Egyptians, for whom time was an endless, meaningless continuum, caught in a perpetual seasonal pattern of alteration. But in Israel Yahweh was Lord of past, present, and future. It is the qualitative approach that gives the historical event its theological significance.

In events of the annual cult rituals the qualitative and quantitative views of time intersect. In the Passover, for example, this cultic practice could lead to a cyclical attitude to life characterized by the performance of established rites. But the whole purpose of the rite is to summon the Israelite to reflect on that day in the past in which God's people were brought out of Egypt (Exod. 13:3–10). And the exodus becomes a paradigm for a future day of the Lord as well.

6. Apocalyptic and later Jud. carried the idea of the future day further, with eschatology now becoming part of the doctrine of the last things and developing strong apocalyptic. The questions are asked: How long will this age last? When can we expect the new age? (2 Esd. 4:33, 35; cf. Mk. 13:4). The messianic age will be preceded by a time of tribulation, subdivided into twelve shorter periods (2 Bar. 27) and marked, among other things, by unrighteousness and licentiousness (2 Esd. 5:2–13; cf. Matt. 24:12). The new age will be heralded by signs (2 Bar. 25:4; cf. Mk. 13:24), and "the end" (2 Bar. 29:7–8; cf. Mk. 13:7) will be the transition to the days of the Messiah, when judgment gives way to wisdom, sinlessness, and life (1 Enoch 5:8–9).

The days of the Messiah were expected to bring in renewal, a righting of wrongs, and the restoration of all that had been lost through Adam's transgression. Thus, the nations that had oppressed Israel will be destroyed, while Israel's boundaries will be fully restored in the new temple (though on this point there was not unanimity). Israel will be rich to a degree hitherto unknown. Both human beings and nature will increase in fruitfulness. Sinful desires and the devil himself will be destroyed. The Holy Spirit will be poured out. Sickness and death will be removed and the dead will arise.

7. The Qumran texts regard the date of the eschatological day as being already fixed (1QM 13:14). It will bring the annihilation of those who do not keep the commandments (CD 8:1–3); it will be the day of God's visitation, the day of vengeance (1QS 10:19), when evildoers will be destroyed. There will be a battle with fearful carnage (1QM 1:9) as the sons of light war against the sons of darkness (1:11). God will then be praised (18:5–8), and on the day of judgment those who are willing to be added to the elect will be saved (14:7–15).

NT 1. The resurrection narratives contain striking expressions of time: "on the third day" (1 Cor. 15:4; cf. Matt. 16:21; Lk. 9:22) or "after three days" (Mk. 8:31; 9:31; cf. 10:34; also Hos. 6:2).

The situation is similar with regard to the space of forty days, which already has OT significance, for both Moses and Elijah fasted forty days and nights (Exod. 34:28;

1 Ki. 19:8). The length of Jesus' fast (Matt. 4:2) seems linked with these and other OT passages (cf. Deut. 8:2–3, 15–16). Note how the story of Jesus' temptation alludes to the desert temptation of Israel in the quotations from Deut. 8:3 (Matt. 4:4; Lk. 4:7), Deut. 6:16 (Matt. 4:7; Lk. 4:12), and Deut. 6:13 (Matt. 4:10; Lk. 4:8). There is the further parallelism between Jesus and Moses: Deut. 9:18 (cf. also the giving of the Sermon on the Mount afterward); 34:1–4; and Ps. 91. Jesus, in other words, recapitulates the experiences of Israel, particularly the desert generation.

2. (a) The expectation of the last day is found throughout the NT: Synoptics (e.g., Matt. 10:15; 12:36; Mk. 13:32; Lk. 10:12), John (Jn. 6:39; cf. also 1 Jn. 4:17), Acts (17:31), Paul's letters (Rom. 2:5; 13:12; Eph. 4:30; 2 Tim. 1:12), general letters (2 Pet. 3:12; Jude 6), and Rev. (9:6). The phraseology varies: e.g., that day (2 Tim. 4:8), the last day (Jn. 6:39–40), the day of wrath (Rev. 6:17), the day of judgment (2 Pet. 2:9), the day of the Lord (1 Thess. 5:2), the day of the Son of Man (Lk. 17:24), the day of Christ (Phil. 2:16), the great day of God (Rev. 16:14), or simply the day (1 Cor. 3:13). The pl. is also common (e.g., 2 Tim. 3:1; 2 Pet. 3:3; Rev. 9:6; 10:7).

(b) There are differing statements as to when the last day takes place. Paul teaches that an apocalyptic day is still to come (Rom. 2:5; 2 Cor. 1:14), yet at the same time he regards himself as already involved in the eschatological event. Not only does he take over the existing tradition of the nearness of the last day (Rom. 13:12), but he also calls on his readers to walk "as in the daytime" (13:13), "now" being the day of salvation (2 Cor. 6:2). In other words, the present and the future ages are intertwined. With the parousia (→ 4242) being delayed, the imminent day of Rom. 13:12 is separated out from the remote "last day" (e.g., 2 Pet. 3:8). The suddenness of the last day is taught in various places of the NT (e.g., Lk. 21:34–35; 1 Thess. 5:2, 4; 2 Pet. 3:10). The date is unknown (Matt. 24:42; 25:13; Mk. 13:32). As in the apocalyptic tradition, a period of tribulation and catastrophe will precede the last day (cf. Mk. 13; 2 Tim. 3:1; Rev. 2:10).

(c) What will happen on that last day? God (Acts 17:31) or Christ (1 Cor. 1:8; Phil. 1:6, 10; cf. 2 Cor. 5:10) will judge the world and reward each one according to his or her deeds (Rom. 2:5). A separation will then come between those who are to enter the kingdom and those who are to be cast out; i.e., in this present age the church is still a mixed body (cf. Matt. 25:34, 41). The dead will be raised (Jn. 11:24; cf. 1 Cor. 15:52). Thus the last day becomes a day of fear (Matt. 10:15) and of joy (Lk. 6:23; 21:28; 2 Tim. 4:8).

The message of the last day is not confined to the future, however, but has a definite application to the present. Paul regards the present church as being his glory on the last day (2 Cor. 1:14; Phil. 2:16). Its members are to conduct themselves even now as if living on that day (Rom. 13:13) and as answerable to God when that day comes (Matt. 25:31–46). They must be watchful since its date is unknown (24:42) and it will come suddenly (1 Thess. 5:1–6).

3. The futurity of the last day (Matt. 25:13) does not alter the fact that the exalted Lord is even now with his church (28:20). In Jn. the paraklētos (→ 4156) is the representative of Christ (cf. Jn. 16:5–15 with 16–28). A certain duration of time is indicated by phrases such as "every day" (Matt. 26:55; Mk. 14:49; Acts 2:46; 3:2; 1 Cor. 15:31), "day after day" (Heb. 7:27; 10:11), "day by day" (2 Cor. 4:16). This present time, although it merges even now with the age to come (1 Cor. 15:20–26; 2 Cor. 4:16), is still characterized by tribulation (Rom. 8:36; 1 Cor. 15:31–32; 2 Cor. 11:28).

2477 Ἡρῳδιανοί

Ἡρῳδιανοί (Hērōdianoi), Herodians (2477).

NT Although, as their name implies, the Herodians were presumably supporters of the house of Herod, little is known about them. They are twice reported in the Gospels as joining forces with the Pharisees in efforts to destroy Jesus. In Mk. 3:6 it was the direct outcome of the Sabbath healing of the man with the withered hand in a Galilean synagogue. In Matt. 22:16 and Mk. 12:13 the question was jointly raised about paying taxes to Caesar.

The Herodians were probably not members of Herod's domestic staff, for the Pharisees would hardly have allied themselves with such people, thus implying equal status. Nor were they court officers, for court officers did not inquire of any beneath them as to the legality of taxes. The Herodians, therefore, likely refers not to an organized party but to those of a particular political outlook—supporters of the house of Herod—and thus also of Roman power.

It seems most probable that the Herodians arose during the rulership not of Herod the Great but of Antipas, who apparently adopted the name Herod after the deposition of Archelaus. Antipas rebuilt Sepphoris, demolished by Varus in 4 B.C., and founded Tiberias on the west shore of the Sea of Galilee. As a cautious experiment, Antipas brought in Jewish officials to govern both cities, each with a regular Gk. constitution. Thus Antipas proved he could depend on the loyalty of the Jewish upper classes, who filled the offices in councils and magistracies.

Antipas's quarrel with Pilate, whatever its origin, no doubt caused his stock to rise among the populace, for there was widespread dissatisfaction with Pilate's rule. The rule of Roman procurators had originated in the desire of the Jews not to suffer another Herod the Great. But when they found that procuratorial rule was even less bearable, there was an upsurge of general support for the house of Herod in the person of Antipas. That support was in part given expression by the appearance in his reign of the Herodians, who as a group probably included not only the official aristocracy that Antipas had created, but other Jews of influence and standing. The Pharisees were no friends of the Herods, but for them to ally with the Herodians in the tribute money incident is understandable. Both parties were seeking to get rid of Jesus as a potential troublemaker, whose activities would sooner or later cause the Romans to intervene and thereby threaten the Jewish establishment.

But why did the Pharisees turn to the Herodians in the incident of the healing of the man with the withered hand in the synagogue on the Sabbath? The issue, on the surface at least, involved the Torah, but the Herodians were more concerned with political than religious issues. Indeed, they were probably not even present at the service described in Mk. 3:6, since the Pharisees went out of the synagogue to take counsel with the Herodians. Most likely this meeting took place since the Herodians were the only political party available in Galilee. After all, the aristocratic party of the Sadducees was based only in Jerusalem (→ Saddoukaios, 4881). The Herodians were undoubtedly not interested in the religious question involved in Jesus' apparent breach of the Sabbath, but they were concerned with preventing trouble that might lead to disturbances and so threaten the political and social order. If Jews began to suspect that Jesus might be the Messiah, there would indeed be political unrest, for any messianic claim conflicted with the Herodians' hopes for the restoration of their rule in Judea.

2483 (hēsychazō, be quiet, be silent, rest), → 2484.

2484 ἡσυχία

ἡσυχία (hēsychia), quiet, quietness, rest, silence (2484); ἡσυχάζω (hēsychazō), be quiet, be silent, rest (2483); ἡσύχιος (hēsychios), quiet (2485).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. hēsychia is used of the quietness of peace (as opposed to war), relief from pain, a place of solitude, and the life of tranquillity. The adj. hēsychios describes a quiet disposition. hēsychazō commonly denotes a cessation of speech, work, or conflict, a calming of oneself, or the imposition of silence.

2. In the LXX hēsychia can refer to freedom from war (1 Chr. 4:40; 22:9), the stillness of night (Prov. 7:9), and the tranquillity of life (11:12; Ezek. 38:11; 1 Macc. 9:58). The vb. hēsychazō is often used of the peace that follows war (e.g., Jdg. 3:11, 30; 2 Ki. 11:20), of refraining from speech (Neh. 5:8; Job 32:6), of ceasing from a course of action (32:1), and of relaxation (37:8).

NT 1. In Lk.'s writings hēsychazō denotes resting from work on the Sabbath day (Lk. 23:56), ceasing an effort to convince (Acts 21:14), and silencing potential opposition (Lk. 14:4; Acts 11:18). hēsychia in Acts 22:2 portrays the silence that descended on the agitated Jerusalem crowd when they heard Paul address them in Aram.

2. In 1 Thess. 4:11 Paul exhorts the Thessalonians to aim at leading an unobtrusive life of tranquillity (hēsychazō). Moreover, they are to avoid the disorderliness of busybodies and to attend to their business with quietness (hēsychia) and earn their own living (2 Thess. 3:12). Any eschatological excitement (cf. 2:1–2) that produces corporate turmoil or individual laziness is here repudiated.

3. In the Pastoral Letters, Paul urges Christians to pray for conditions that will permit "peaceful and quiet [hēsychios] lives" (1 Tim. 2:2), free from outward disturbance. He enjoins women to listen "in quietness [hēsychia]" to the instruction given in the church and to show the necessary deference to their teachers (2:11). The public exposition of Scripture was outside a woman's proper domain of service (though cf. Tit. 2:3–5), as was any exercise of ecclesiastical authority over a man. In the church a woman was to remain silent (hēsychia, 1 Tim. 2:12).

4. Peter insists that a woman's adornment should not be external but inward, "the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet [hēsychios] spirit" (1 Pet. 3:4), a spirit that calmly bears disturbances created by others and that itself does not create trouble.

2491 ἦχος¹

ἦχος¹ (ēchos¹), sound, noise, report (2491); ἠχέω (ēcheō), make a sound (2490); ἦχος² (ēchos²), roaring (2492).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. ēchos denotes the sound of words, of letters, or of a voice. It can, like ēcheō, be used of an echo and, in a medical sense, of ringing noises in the ears. The vb. ēcheō can describe the clanging of a metal shield or the chirp of a grasshopper.

2. In the LXX ēchos occurs 25x, and ēcheō 22x. Both words generally denote inarticulate sounds, such as the blast of the trumpet (Exod. 19:16; Ps. 150:3), the roaring of water (46:3; Isa. 17:12), or the tumult of a city or military camp (Ruth 1:19; 1 Sam. 4:5).

NT 1. ēchos occurs 4x in the NT. It denotes the roaring of the sea and the waves (Lk. 21:25), a sound (ēchos) from the sky like a violent blast of wind (Acts 2:2), a trumpet blast (Heb. 12:19), and (metaphorically) a rumor spread throughout a region (Lk. 4:37).

2. In 1 Cor. 13:1 we find the only NT use of ēcheō. Paul suggests that to exercise any spiritual gifts, including glossolalia, without love (i.e., without an interpretation that all can understand and benefit from, cf. 14:5–12, 19) is as unedifying as "a resounding [ēcheō] gong or a clanging cymbal" that might be heard in pagan worship.

Θ theta

2498 θάλασσα

θάλασσα (thalassa), sea, lake (2498).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. thalassa denotes the ocean, the open sea.

2. Mostly the LXX uses thalassa for sea, but it does not differentiate between the open sea and inland lakes. The Mediterranean (Jos. 1:4) and the Red Sea (Exod. 23:31) are called thalassa, but so are the Dead Sea (Gen. 14:3) and the Lake of Gennesaret (Kinnereth, Num. 34:11). (a) In accord with the general conception of the ancients, the OT pictures the earth as disk-shaped, surrounded by sea (Gen. 1:6–10) or water (→ hydōr, 5623). Itself a creation of God (Ps. 104:24–26), water once covered the whole earth (Gen. 1:2), but Yahweh drove it back and put it in check (1:9–10). God has founded his earth firmly on the seas and rivers (Ps. 24:2).

(b) Because of its relation to chaos (Gen. 1:2, → abyssos, abyss, 12), the sea becomes the embodiment of disaster. In the sea the power of water hostile to God and humans opposes the people of Israel (cf. Ps. 46:3–4; 65:8). The sea is the habitat of the dragon, who is God's enemy (Job 7:12; cf. Dan. 7; Rev. 13:1).

(c) But the sea trembles before Yahweh (Hab. 3:8), who fights and vanquishes its demonic monsters, leviathan, and the dragon (Ps. 74:13–14; Isa. 27:1). Yahweh is the Lord of the sea (cf. Neh. 9:6; Isa. 50:2), and he can command an annihilating flood to liberate the earth in judgment from a humanity that has lapsed into wickedness (Gen. 6–8). Indeed, Yahweh uses the sea in order to drown his enemies (Exod. 14:23, 28; 15:1). Conversely, the pious experience Yahweh's help amid dangers of water and fire (Ps. 18:17; Isa. 43:2).

(d) In Jud., the sea retains its threatening role, only now demonic powers are named even more clearly as having command over the sea. With the victory of Yahweh over the sea, the power of chaos in primeval time (Sir. 43:23), Jud. expected the destruction of the might of the sea monsters by God in the end time, whereas the waters of the sea and rivers will rage against the godless (Wis. 5:22).

NT 1. As in the OT, open sea and inland lake are not differentiated in the NT. The Mediterranean Sea (Acts 10:6, 32), the Red Sea (7:36; 1 Cor. 10:1), and the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:18) are all called thalassa. Only Lk. deliberately calls the Lake of Gennesaret (Galilee) a limnē, an inland lake (→ 3349).

2. The cosmological role of the sea is essentially the same as in the OT. God is the creator of the tripartite world—heaven, earth, and sea (Acts 4:24; 14:15; Rev. 10:6; 14:7). The "sea of glass" (4:6; 15:2) is the transparent surface of the vault of heaven with the heavenly ocean, which was thought to be the source of rain; the fire of this sea (15:2) is the lightning of the heavenly thunderstorm, here probably understood as judgment. The scene of victors standing on the heavenly sea recalls Israel's song of triumph over Egypt by the Red Sea (Exod. 15).

3. The sea also threatens life in the NT (e.g., Lk. 21:25; Acts 28:4; 2 Cor. 11:26) and so belongs on the side of that which opposes God. Rev. esp. extends Jewish apocalyptic traditions in its conception of the sea as a personal power (Rev. 7:2–3) that will be overcome in the last days; it will have to surrender its dead (20:13) and will then cease to exist (21:1). The sea is also the home of demonic beasts (13:1). In the plagues of the final times, the water of the sea will be turned into blood (8:8; 16:3).

4. Like the open sea, the Sea of Galilee is also controlled by demonic powers, which, together with the storm (cf. Jas. 1:6; Rev. 7:1), try to destroy Jesus' disciples. But the wind and the sea must obey Jesus' authoritative word (Matt. 8:23–27; Mk. 4:35–41; Lk. 8:22–25). Jesus' walking on the sea (Matt. 14:22–33; Mk. 6:45–52) may be understood as a victory over the demonic powers localized in the water (cf. also the drowning of the Gadarene pigs in Matt. 8:32; Mk. 5:13; Lk. 8:33). Water is a favored locality for a theophany (cf. the call of the first disciples at the Sea of Galilee, Matt. 4:18–22; Mk. 1:16–20; cf. also Matt. 17:24–27). There also seems to be a symbolic meaning in the sea when Peter, Andrew, James, and John are given a magnificent catch of fish (Lk. 5:1–11; Jn. 21:1–11); Jesus uses this miracle to depict a fruitful mission field.

θάνατος (thanatos), death (2505); θανατόω (thanatoō), kill (2506); ἀθανασία (athanasia), immortality (114); θνήσκω (thnēskō), die (2569); ἀποθνήσκω (apothnēskō), die (633); συναποθνήσκω (synapothnēskō), die together with someone (5271); θνητός (thnētos), mortal (2570).

CL 1. thanatos means the act of dying or the state of death. But it is also used of mortal danger, the manner of death, and the death penalty. Similarly, thanatoō means put someone to death, kill, and lead into mortal danger. Living creatures subject to death are described as thnētos, mortal. Humans are called thnētoi, mortals, in contrast to the gods, who possess athanasia, immortality. Only in exceptional cases are human beings elevated as heroes into the number of the immortal gods.

thnēskō, die, and apothnēskō, expire, denote the act of dying. Where a reference is to a death shared with others we find the compound form synapothnēskō, die together with someone.

In the Hel. period the words thanatos, thanatoō, thnēskō, and apothnēskō are also used metaphorically of intellectual and spiritual death.

2. For the Gks., death meant the end of living activity, even if the soul found a place in the realm of the dead. Death is the common destiny of everyone; its negative side is occasionally made evident, when death is personified as a demon or monster from the underworld. Since Gks. had no doctrine of creation, death did not pose for them the question "Why?" Realization of the inevitability of death found its normal consequence in the demand to enjoy life to the full (cf. the maxim in 1 Cor. 15:32, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die"). A gentle death after a long life was a great blessing, but the ancients also found comfort in death as a release from the futilities of life.

3. A way of overcoming the agony of death appears in the notion that a person lives on in one's children. Epitaphs and great funeral monuments also help to keep alive the memory of the deceased, thereby making death tolerable.

A special characteristic of the Gks. was to make death a part of life by regarding it as an act of human achievement. It was important to die gloriously, either in fighting courageously or by facing death without fear. In such cases, death was regarded as a fine thing. Gk. philosophers had various reflections on the process of dying and the meaning of death.

4. Occasionally one finds a belief in the immortality of the soul. Plato, for example, discusses it at length and gives it a philosophical basis as the corollary of a moral view of personality. In death the soul is freed from the body, the immortal from the mortal. Plato even has a doctrine of the transmigration of souls, which is connected with rewards and punishments for actions in life. The Stoics in general rejected personal immortality; in death, the individual soul becomes submerged in the divine universal soul, which permeates the cosmos.

OT All the words in the thanatos group are found in the LXX, though athanasia, immortality, occurs only in late writings (Wis., 4 Macc.). The way in which they are used is not much different from that in cl. Gk.

1. (a) Death means the final end of one's existence (2 Sam. 12:15; 14:14). Humans have been taken from the ground, and to dust they return (Gen. 3:19). Once the soul has descended to Sheol (→ hadēs, 87), no further life can come to it. This is evident in the frequent complaints that death brings with it separation from Yahweh, the source of life (Ps. 6:5; 30:9; 88:5, 10–12; Isa. 38:11). We have no option but to accept the common lot of death (Gen. 3:19; Sir. 14:18–19; 41:1–4).

If God allows us to die old and full of days, so that we achieve in this life what is possible for us, we may be thankful and content (Gen. 15:15; Ps. 91:16). True, we may sigh over the transience of life (90:3–6) and speak in our prayers of the snares of death and of descent into hell (116:3, 8), but death does not become in itself an object of fear. What is to be feared is an evil or early death, which indicates God's punishment for human guilt. For God punishes individuals by death in order to cleanse the community of his people of evildoers (cf. Deut. 13).

(b) The OT does not contain a concept of original sin or inherited death as a consequence of sin. Death in the abstract is not linked to divine punishment. Adam was threatened with early death as a punishment for a definite act of disobedience (Gen. 2:17, "when you eat of it you will surely die"). Even in Ps. 90, which refers back to the story of the fall and reflects on the connection between sin and death, it is primarily the fleeting nature of life that is attributed to human sin (cf. also Ps. 14:2; 51).

(c) Since an individual can lead life only as a member of the people of Yahweh, the idea does not occur to anyone that death may be brought about as an act of heroism. Even where the individual becomes keenly aware of the burdensomeness of life, committing suicide would be a denial of life. When Saul killed himself after the death of his sons and defeat in battle in order to avoid falling into the hands of the Philistines, there is no suggestion that this is a heroic ending to his life (1 Sam. 31; cf. 2 Sam. 17:23).

(d) Only occasionally is Yahweh seen as the Lord of Sheol (Ps. 139:8). Total confidence may be placed in him, even in the face of death (73:23–28).

2. (a) After the exile the concepts of the people and the covenant of Yahweh were given a new meaning. There was an individualization of the relationship with God (Jer. 31:29–34; Ezek. 18:2–32). This meant that for the Jews of the last few centuries before Christ, death posed a difficult problem. It was increasingly looked on as something inappropriate to human destiny. Writers stressed that Adam's sin brought death into the world: "You laid upon him (Adam) one commandment of yours; but he transgressed it, and immediately you appointed death for him and for his descendants" (2 Esd. 3:7).

(b) Where death is thus regarded as something brought on humankind in the course of history, the way is open to reflect on the possibility that God will overcome sin and death. Thus in Jewish apocalyptic we find the concept of a kingdom of God at the end of time, in which sin has been conquered and death has lost its power. The hope of a resurrection (→ anastasis, 414), first found in Isa. 26:19 and Dan. 12:2, further makes possible a faith that even for earlier generations death will be overcome by a divine act of new creation. The righteous will enter into eternal life, the unrighteous into eternal death (2 Esd. 7:31–44).

(c) There is also an increasing use of the language of death in a figurative sense. Death takes place whenever Israel, or (beginning with Ezek.) the individual Israelite, breaks away from God (Ezek. 18:21–32). Here it is the breaking off of fellowship with God, which is seen as death, just as its enjoyment is seen as life.

3. With the changes of spiritual emphasis that characterized the Hel. period, strongly dualistic ideas began to find their way into Jud. Thus the soul came to be regarded as immortal (Wis. 3:4; 4:1; 15:3). It remains in heavenly places, awaiting the resurrection (1 Enoch 102–104; 2 Esd. 7:88–99)—except for those writers who abandoned the concept of resurrection and held that an eternal, bodiless existence began immediately after death (4 Macc. 16:13; 17:12).

Another effect of Gk. influence was the way that Jewish martyrs saw their death as heroic, so that it was extolled as glorious (4 Macc. 10:1) and virtuous (2 Macc. 6:31). Josephus has the Jewish commander Eleazar encourage the Jews in the fortress of Masada to choose death rather than surrender to the Romans. If it is impossible to live with honor, one ought to die bravely. The choice of such a death leaves behind it admiration, and those who fall fighting for liberty must be regarded as fortunate.

NT In the NT thanatos, death, occurs 120x: in the Gospels, mostly with reference to the death of Jesus; in Paul, mainly of human death. thanatoō, kill, occurs 11x; thnētos, mortal, 6x, all in Paul. apothnēskō, die, is used 112x in the NT. In the Synoptic Gospels it is rarely used of the death of Jesus; in Paul, however, this use is frequent because of the confessional formula, "Christ died for our sins" (1 Cor. 15:3; cf. Rom. 5:8). synapothnēskō, die together with someone, occurs in Mk. 14:31; 2 Cor. 7:3; 2 Tim. 2:11; only in the last instance does it have a Christological reference. athanasia, immortality, occurs 3x (1 Cor. 15:53–54; 1 Tim. 6:16).

1. The NT view of death is in direct continuity with the old Jewish view. Humans are thnētos, mortal; they live in the shadow of death (Matt. 4:16; Heb. 2:15). God, the source of all life, is the only one to whom immortality belongs (1 Tim. 6:16). Death is seen as the death of an individual, and relativizing death by a reference to the continuing life of a community is foreign to NT thought.

(a) This being the case, importance is attached to the question of what causes death. The answer to this question is summed up by Paul: "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23). On the basis of this view, the devil can be regarded as the one who has power over death (Heb. 2:14), though, of course, it is God himself who can destroy both body and soul in hell (cf. Matt. 10:28; Rev. 2:23). For the NT the question as to the cause of death is a theological one. Death is universal, and it points to the universality of human guilt and our need of redemption. Where we turn our backs on God, we cut ourselves off from the root of life and become subject to death.

If we dedicate our lives to earthly things, over which we exercise control, we cut ourselves off from the source of true life. In our progress toward death we catch sight of the basic condition of life: We live as sinners in death. Death is thus the power dominating our lives and to that extent is a present reality. "Spiritual" death and "physical" death, inextricably bound up together, constitute the reality of a life in sin. Thus the sinner cries: "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" (Rom. 7:24).

(b) It is Paul who, among the NT writers, reflects most on the connection between guilt and one's mortal destiny. After pointing out that all without distinction have fallen into sin and thus become subject to death (Rom. 1–4), and that they are called to life in Christ, he goes on in 5:12–21 to develop these themes with the help of Adam–Christ typology. The life that has been brought about by Christ forms an analogy to the fact that "sin entered the world through one man [Adam], and death through sin" (Rom. 5:12; cf. 1 Cor. 15:21–22). But death is not simply a fate we have inherited, "because all sinned." That is, death is a punishment for each person's own sin. On the other hand, salvation and life, i.e., victory over death, do not come as a result of our own efforts, but only through an act of God's grace coming from outside us and appropriated by us.

In our rebellion against God, we seek to find life through our own works; consequently, whenever we avail ourselves of the law as a means of salvation, we find death instead. Therefore, law, sin, and death are on the same level: "The sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law" (1 Cor. 15:56). Accordingly, for those who try to find life on the basis of law, death becomes a present reality (see Rom. 7:9–10).

If death is the consequence of human sin, then why are nonhuman living creatures likewise subject to mortality? To this Paul replies that the "creation" has been subjected, not by its own will but as a result of human sin, to futility and impermanence. It now waits to be set free from death, together with the "children of God" (Rom. 8:19–22). Thus, Paul does not regard even death in nature as a "natural" phenomenon.

(c) From all that we have said, it is evident that in the NT death is regarded not as a natural process, but as a historical event resulting from the sinful human condition. Death is a power that enslaves one in the course of this life (Heb. 2:15). The possibility of removing the horror of death by means of intellectual insight concerning its inevitability or through a heroic act of dying is excluded in NT thought.

2. Statements about Jesus' death on the cross form the central point of the salvation story in the NT (→ stauros, 5089). They are usually found in connection with statements about his resurrection and the justification or new life of those who believe.

(a) Pre-Pauline confessions stated "that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day according to the Scriptures, and that he appeared . . ." (1 Cor. 15:3–5), and also that "he was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification" (Rom. 4:25). Jesus died our human death (Phil. 2:7–8; Heb. 2:14), and this death is for us, i.e., for our advantage (Mk. 10:45; 14:24; Rom. 5:6–8; 1 Thess. 5:10; Heb. 2:9–10). His death overcomes the law (Rom. 7:4; cf. Gal. 2:21), sin (2 Cor. 5:21; Col. 1:22), and our own death (Rom. 5:9; 2 Tim. 1:10; Heb. 2:14–15; Rev. 1:17–18). It is to make manifest this victory that the death of Jesus, the risen, present, and coming One (1 Cor. 11:26; 2 Cor. 5:14–15), is proclaimed, in order that his death may not have been in vain (Gal. 2:21).

(b) The gospel of victory over death is expressed in different ways. For example, Jesus' death was a propitiatory sacrifice that removes the guilt of sin (Rom. 3:25–26; 1 Cor. 11:24–25; cf. also Eph. 1:7; 1 Pet. 1:18–19). Here the OT ideas of the covenant sacrifice (Mk. 14:24; Heb. 13:20) and the Passover sacrifice (1 Cor. 5:7) also find a place. Christ's death was also a substitutionary sacrifice (2 Cor. 5:21) and a ransom—a concept originating in the laws of slavery, but strongly metaphorical in its Christological use (cf. Mk. 10:45; Gal. 3:13; 2 Pet. 2:1).

(c) John, in contrast to the pre-Pauline and Pauline tradition, places emphasis not on the death of Jesus as such, but on the whole event of his coming into this world of death. His death on the cross is the highest expression of the incarnation of the Logos. At the same time, when seen as an exaltation, it is a divine token of the general victory over death (Jn. 12:33; 18:32).

(d) God breaks the power of sin by identifying himself with us in the death of Jesus. Since he offers his own self as a basis for life, we are freed from compulsion to commit the primal sin of self-righteousness. We are acquitted (justified, Rom. 4:24), brought into a proper creaturely status (new creation, 2 Cor. 5:17), and given new life with Christ (Eph. 2:4–5).

3. The NT accords special importance to the defeat of death (or law or sin), accomplished through the death of Jesus and to the corresponding promise of life already present. (a) Note, for example, Rom. 6:10–11: "The death he died, he died to sin once for all; but the life he lives, he lives to God. In the same way, count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus" (cf. also Gal. 2:19–20; Col. 2:20). These passages tell us that where Christ's death on the cross has been overcome, where a person has given up to death his or her "old self"—i.e., the desire to find life independently by one's own efforts—there Christ is experienced as the power and wisdom of God (cf. 1 Cor. 1:23–24). True life is life that comes by God's grace. It begins with faith in Christ.

(b) John expresses essentially the same concept: "I tell you the truth, if anyone keeps my word, he will never see death" (Jn. 8:51; cf. also 5:24). "We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love our brothers" (1 Jn. 3:14). Freedom from death, in the sense of spiritual death as a result of sin, gives to those who know they have been accepted by God the freedom to give themselves without reserve to their neighbors.

(c) In the Synoptics the defeat of death is demonstrated especially by miracle stories, particularly the raising of the dead. Faced with death, Jesus says: "Don't be afraid; just believe" (Mk. 5:36). He can thus say to his disciples, "Follow me, and let the dead bury their own dead" (Matt. 8:22). Such sayings are consistent with viewing freedom from sin as deliverance from death and the beginning of real life lived by grace.

(d) The defeat of death here and now for the Christian has a natural corollary in the final subjection of the unbeliever to death. For the apostle's preaching is to one "the smell of death; to the other, the fragrance of life" (2 Cor. 2:16).

4. If death is the result of sin, if we have been delivered from the power of sin and death (Rom. 6:13), and if we are now new creatures (2 Cor. 5:17), why does physical death continue to reign over us? The NT gives various answers to this question.

(a) For Paul physical death links with the dialectic of the "already" and the "not yet." The idea that death is the "last enemy" (1 Cor. 15:26) and has yet to be swallowed up in victory (15:54–55) appears side by side with the believer's song of triumph: "Thanks be to God! He gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (15:57). We have received the Spirit as a pledge of eternal life, yet we await the redemption of our bodies (Rom. 8:23; 1 Cor. 15:53). The expectation of this victory over death takes the concrete form of a belief in the resurrection of the dead, which has already begun with the resurrection of Jesus (1 Cor. 15:12–21). Thus, hope in God who gives life to the dead (Rom. 4:17) becomes an integral part of our faith (2 Cor. 5:1–10; Rom. 5:1–5).

This thought is developed at the Christological level, where Christians learn to regard their suffering and death, through faith, as suffering and dying with Christ.

In the very experience of suffering and death Paul finds fellowship with God, and thus also assurance of salvation and of eternal life (Rom. 8:36–39; 2 Cor. 4:11–12; Phil. 1:20). In this sense he can regard death as simply a laying aside of the mortal body. "For to me, to live is Christ and to die is gain" (Phil. 1:21).

(b) John does not give extensive consideration to the death of a believer. He concentrates on the present tense of salvation and all but ignores the connection between death and the traditional doctrine of judgment and resurrection (but see Jn. 5:28–29). Since believers have passed through the judgment and already have eternal life, they will not die for all eternity (10:28). Hence, in 14:2–3 Jesus speaks of our being taken up into the "rooms" of his Father's house, presumably at the time of death.

(c) In the later writings of the NT, the emphasis on the present experience of salvation becomes progressively replaced by a strong moral interpretation of the Christian faith, with the result that physical death ceases to be a problem for the Christian. We must all die on account of our sins, only to find grace at the final judgment. Thus, it is easy to understand how the concept arose of a second death for those who are condemned: "He who conquers will not be hurt at all by the second death" (Rev. 2:11; cf. 20:13–14).

(d) The different traditions have in common the conviction that death does not separate believers from God, but rather leads them into fellowship with the suffering and dying Christ and thus to the source of all life. "If we live, we live to the Lord; and if we die, we die to the Lord. So, whether we live or die, we belong to the Lord" (Rom. 14:8; see also 8:38; Jn. 12:24–26; Phil. 1:20; 1 Thess. 4:13–14; Rev. 14:13).

θάπτω (thaptō), bury (2507); τάφος (taphos), tomb (5439); ταφή (taphē), burial (5438); ἐνταφιάζω (entaphiazō), prepare for burial (1946); ἐνταφιασμός (entaphiasmos), laying out for burial (1947); μνῆμα (mnēma), tomb (3645); μνημεῖον (mnēmeion), memorial, tomb (3646) ; συνθάπτω (synthaptō), be buried with (5313).

CL & OT 1. thaptō in cl. Greek means to give someone a proper burial. taphos and cognates (derived from thaptō) mean funeral rites and, later, tomb; taphē is burial, funeral, or place of burial. entaphiazō and entaphiasmos, both rare, apply to instances of inhumation or embalming. mnēma and mnēmeion, derived from mnaomai (be mindful of), mean tomb.

Both burial and cremation were widespread in antiquity. In the NT period cremation was almost universal among the Romans, but inhumation again became prevalent in the 2d century. In the Semitic East burial was dominant. It is questionable how much religious significance should be attached to differences in the manner of disposal of the dead, though in some cases, as in Egypt, preservation of the body was seen as all-important, as indispensable to the afterlife. Otherwise, the emphasis was often more on the proper care and guardianship of the tomb as a cultic place.

2. In the LXX taphos, mnēma, and mnēmeion can all mean tomb, with no real difference. taphē can mean both tomb and burial. In Gen. 50:2, 3, 26 entaphiazō, taphē, and thaptō translate the same Heb. root ḥānaṭ (to embalm) in speaking of the embalming of Jacob and Joseph in Egypt. Elsewhere thaptō means bury.

Inhumation or placing in caves or rock sepulchers was the universal Jewish practice in all periods. Tombs were the communal possession of a family (Gen. 23:4; etc.); there a dead person "was gathered to his people" (25:8; etc.). The cremation of Saul and his sons (1 Sam. 31:12) was exceptional, and such treatment may be regarded as a shameful abuse (cf. Amos 2:1) or a solemn punishment (Jos. 7:25). The law required burial of an executed criminal on the same day (Deut. 21:23), and care was taken to bury enemies slain in battle (1 Ki. 11:15; etc.). To be denied burial was a shameful indignity (Deut. 28:26; 1 Ki. 13:22).

3. It was common in NT times to practice secondary burial, placing the bones in "ossuaries" that were stored in extended family sepulchers. Scrupulous care was taken to let none be unburied. Rab. interpretation of Deut. 21:23 insisted that burial be completed, if possible, on the day of death.

NT 1. The NT uses the same three interchangeable words for tomb as in the LXX. mnēmeion occurs 40x, mnēma 8x, and taphos 7x.

2. In Matt. 23:27 Jesus likens the scribes and Pharisees to "whitewashed tombs" (cf. Lk. 11:44). It was the custom to chalk graves on 15 Adar, lest those inadvertently walking over them incur pollution before the Passover (cf. Jn. 11:55; 18:28). In Matt. 23:29–31, Jesus alludes to the Pharisees' scrupulosity in embellishing the tombs of prophets whom their forebears had rejected and killed. The contrast is between their fastidious outward observance of cleanliness and the evil of their inward motives (cf. Rom. 3:13; also Acts 23:3).

3. As to NT burial traditions, the duty fell on the family or closest associates of the deceased (Matt. 8:21; 14:12; Mk. 6:29; Lk. 9:59–60). It was carried out with the utmost possible speed (Acts 5:5–10). It was deemed a good work to make special provision for the burial of strangers (Matt. 27:7–8). In Rev. 11:9 the two witnesses are subjected to the indignity of lying dead and unburied for three and a half days. The fullest accounts of funeral practice are the narratives of Lazarus (Jn. 11) and of Jesus himself.

4. When Jesus arrived in Bethany after Lazarus had died, he had been in the tomb four days (Jn. 11:17). The lapse of time is significant. It was the custom for mourners to visit the dead for the first three days, after which the progress of decomposition was thought to be irreversible. Hence the action of Jesus demonstrated his absolute mastery over death. This episode polarized reactions to Jesus and pointed to his own resurrection.

5. Joseph of Arimathea's decision to bury Jesus was an act both of obedience to the Jewish law and of devotion to one whom he had feared to acknowledge in his life. Deut. 21:22–23 instructs that someone hung on a tree should not remain there all night but be buried the same day, so that the land be not defiled, for such a one is accursed.

Nicodemus brought an enormous quantity of myrrh and aloes for the burial (Jn. 19:39). This evidently accorded with usual practice (cf. 11:44), except that the sheer quantity of spices represented a costly act of devotion to Jesus, resembling that of Mary (12:2–11). Jesus there applied her gift to the theme of his burial (entaphiasmos, Jn. 12:7; cf. Matt. 26:12; Mk. 14:8). Note also the significant gift of myrrh to the baby Jesus (Matt. 2:11), early seen as symbolizing burial and the expectation of resurrection. Unlike the Egyptians, the Jews did not embalm, but myrrh and other aromatic spices represented the preservation of the body, and this to the Jewish mind was the prerequisite of resurrection.

6. The burial of Jesus plays a part in early Christian preaching as authenticating his death and resurrection (1 Cor. 15:4), both of them foreshadowed in the Scriptures. The words of Ps. 16:10 ("You will not . . . let your Holy One see decay") were esp. applied to the risen Christ, not to David, for the latter's body was in a tomb and had seen decay (Acts 2:27–31; 13:35–37). The focal burial text (Deut. 21:22–23) also recurs in a new application, which avers the treatment of the sin-bearing Jesus as under its curse (cf. Acts 5:30; 10:39; 13:29; Gal. 3:13; 1 Pet. 2:24).

This emphasis on Jesus' burial contrasts with a disinterest in the actual tomb. All four Gospels describe the discovery of the empty tomb, but the subject is not mentioned in 1 Cor. 15, the earliest surviving testimony to the resurrection. That same chapter, however, insists strongly on the relevance of eyewitness testimony; Paul argues that the literal and theological aspects of the resurrection are inseparable. The truth of Christ's resurrection cannot be divorced from an event to whose objectivity such testimony was relevant.

7. In Rom. 6:4 and Col. 2:12 burial (synthaptō, be buried with) is used as a figure of baptism. The disciple is identified with the Master in death, burial, and risen life.

2509 (tharreō, be of good courage, take heart), → 2510.

2510 θαρσέω

θαρσέω (tharseō), be of good courage, take heart (2510); θαρρέω (tharreō), be of good courage, take heart (2509).

CL & OT Both vbs. mean be of good courage, take heart. The imperative form tharsei, tharseite, take heart, is common in cl. Gk. The dominant form in the LXX is tharseō. It is consistently used to translate the command, "Fear not." Whether it is Moses' exhortation to the people overcome with fear (Exod. 14:13; 20:20), Elijah's words of comfort to the widow in Zarephath threatened with death by starvation (1 Ki. 17:13), or prophetic encouragement to the nation or to Jerusalem (Zeph. 3:16; Hag. 2:5 = LXX 2:6; Zech. 8:13, 15), comfort and encouragement arise from overcoming fear and are based on confident hope in God's help and promises.

NT 1. The companions of blind Bartimaeus address him with the expression tharsei, take heart (Mk. 10:49), because Jesus was calling him and offering him help. Elsewhere the imperative is found only in the mouth of Jesus. The paralytic whose sin Jesus forgives is to be of good cheer (Matt. 9:2), as is the woman with an issue of blood whom he heals (9:22). When the disciples are frightened by his appearance on the lake, Jesus' word of comfort (tharseite) is strengthened by mē phobeisthe, fear not (Matt. 14:27). In the farewell discourses of the Fourth Gospel, Jesus commands his disciples, whom he is leaving behind in a world full of tribulation: "Take heart! I have overcome the world" (Jn. 16:33). In Acts 23:11 a similar word of comfort is given by the risen Lord to Paul in prison.

2. In 2 Cor. 7:16 Paul uses tharreō to express the confidence he has in the Corinthian church. In 10:1–2 the same word is used of the boldness with which he is determined to face those who oppose him in Corinth. In 5:6, 8 he uses this vb. to speak of the confidence that fills his heart. In his life of suffering he is supported by the assurance that he has an eternal home with the Lord. Heb. exhorts its readers to a similar confidence in the face of a pagan environment hostile to them (13:6).

θαῦμα (thauma), object of wonder, wonder, marvel, miracle (2512); θαυμάζω (thaumazō), be astonished, wonder at, be surprised (2513); θαυμάσιος (thaumasios), wonderful, remarkable (2514); θαυμαστός (thaumastos), wonderful, marvelous, astonishing (2515); ἐκθαυμάζω (ekthaumazō), be greatly amazed (1703); θαμβέω (thambeō), be astounded, amazed (2501); ἐκθαμβέω (ekthambeō), be amazed, alarmed (1701); ἔκθαμβος (ekthambos), utterly astonished (1702); θάμβος (thambos), astonishment, fear (2502); θορυβέω (thorybeō), throw into disorder, pass. be troubled, distressed (2572); θόρυβος (thorybos), commotion, uproar, turmoil (2573); θορυβάζω (thorybazō), cause trouble, pass. be troubled, distressed (2571).

CL & OT 1. The word group associated with thauma designates that which by its appearance arouses astonishment and amazement. Synonymous with these is the word group associated with thambos, astonishment, dread, and thambeō, frighten. The compounds ekthambeō, terrify, and ekthambos, terrifying, terrified, are intensive. Examples of thaumazō as a human reaction to the working of a deity in the revelation of its divine power is found throughout Gk. religion, beginning with Homer.

2. In the LXX thaumazō occurs primarily in Job, Isa., and Sir., often in conjunction with prosōpon, face; it means to lift up the countenance, show favor toward, be partial (Job 13:10; Prov. 18:5). According to Deut. 10:17; 2 Chr. 19:7, God is not partisan. In a more general sense thaumazō denotes a friendly disposition that readily grants requests (e.g., Gen. 19:21), takes into consideration (Deut. 28:50), and is highly favored (2 Ki. 5:1). In this kind of usage, the element of fear is not included. Elsewhere, however, thaumazō means to be petrified with fear (e.g., Lev. 26:32; Job 21:5; Ps. 48:5; Jer. 4:9). On occasion the idea of astonishment passes over to that of horror. Human reaction to God's activity can be astonishment (e.g., Job 42:11) mingled with fear and horror (e.g., 21:5).

The adjs. thaumastos and thaumasios are found chiefly in Ps. and Sir. Daniel prays to the awesome and fear-inspiring God (Dan. 9:4 in Theodotion). God is awe-inspiring among his holy ones (Ps. 68:35); he is marvelous in the execution of his deeds, both in creation and history (cf. 9:1; 26:7; 71:17; 86:10); in 106:22 the miracles of God in the land of Ham and his "awesome deeds" at the Red Sea are compared. In 118:23–24 the rejected stone becomes the capstone, which "is marvelous in our eyes"; in the NT this is applied to Christ (cf. Matt. 21:42; Mk. 12:10–11; Lk. 20:17; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:7).

NT 1. In the NT thauma occurs only 2x: in the phrase "[it is] no wonder" (2 Cor. 11:14) and in Rev. 17:6, "I was greatly astonished." thaumasios is found only in Matt. 21:15 for the "wonderful things" of Jesus. The adj. thaumastos occurs 6x: twice (Matt. 21:42; Mk. 12:11) in the quotation of Ps. 118:23–24 concerning the "marvelous" thing about the stone the builders rejected (see above). In 1 Pet. 2:9 the light to which God has called Christians is "wonderful." In Jn. 9:30 the man healed by Jesus describes as "remarkable" the attitude of the Jews who refused to acknowledge where Jesus had come from. (For Rev. 15:1, 3, see below.) thaumazō occurs the most frequently (43x).

The word group related to thambos is comparatively rare in the NT (Mk. 1:27; 9:15; 10:24, 32; 14:33; 16:5–6; Lk. 4:36; 5:9; Acts 3:10–11). There is a similar number of instances of thorybos (Matt. 26:5; 27:24; Mk. 5:38; 14:2; Acts 20:1; 21:34; 24:18) and thorybeō (Matt. 9:23; Mk. 5:39; Acts 17:5; 20:10). Matt. 26:5; 27:24; Mk. 14:2 are concerned with disturbances in the nation that could arise from action taken against Jesus. Matt. 9:23 and Mk. 5:38–39 report the din in Jairus's house following the death of his little girl. According to Acts 17:5, the Jews in Thessalonica throw the town into an uproar in order to disrupt Paul's missionary work. In 20:1 thorybos denotes the silversmiths' riot in Ephesus (19:23–32), and in 21:34 the riot among the people of Jerusalem (21:30–32) that leads to Paul's imprisonment.

2. In the Synoptics thaumazō describes the amazement people experienced at Jesus' healing activity and miraculous power, such as in the healing of the Gerasene demoniac (Mk. 5:20), the cursing of the fig tree (Matt. 21:20), and the healing of a mute demoniac (Matt. 9:33; Lk. 11:14; cf. Matt. 15:31). In Matt. 9:33 the impression is put into words: "Nothing like this has ever been seen in Israel!" In the story of the storm on the sea note how closely astonishment and fear belong together: Matt. speaks of astonishment (8:27), Mk. of being terrified (4:41), and Lk. combines both (8:25; cf. 9:43).

thaumazō does not always include an element of fear. In Lk. 11:38 the Pharisees express amazement at Jesus' disregard for the Jewish purificatory prescriptions. Otherwise, however, thaumazō and thambeō or ekplēssō (→ 1742) are closely related in the Gospels.

In Nazareth the people are "amazed" at the gracious words Jesus uses (Lk. 4:22), though this does not stop them from trying to kill him (4:29). According to Mk. 9:15, even the sight of Jesus is enough to produce "wonder" (ekthambeō). On the way to Jerusalem Jesus' followers are filled with fear and astonishment at his persistence (10:32, thambeō). Hence, it is appropriate to ask whether the amazement to which Jesus' discussion with the Pharisees gives rise when they question him concerning tax for the emperor may not have contained an element of fear (Matt. 22:22; Mk. 12:17; Lk. 20:26). Do the Gospel writers postulate such an inkling of divine presence on the part of Pilate when they record he was amazed that Jesus did not defend himself against his accusers (Matt. 27:14; Mk. 15:5)?

There are two reports of Jesus' being surprised: at the faith of the Capernaum centurion (Matt. 8:10; Lk. 7:9) and at the unbelief of the people in Nazareth (Mk. 6:6). A case of Jesus' being distressed (ekthambeō) occurs in Gethsemane (Mk. 14:33).

Lk.'s infancy narrative (Lk. 1–2) uses thaumazō 4x. Zechariah's long delay in the temple, together with his loss of speech, surprises the people (1:21–22); they take it as an indication that something extraordinary has happened. The same is true when the child born to Zechariah and Elizabeth is given the name John by his father (1:63). The Christmas message of the shepherds arouses amazement (2:18), as does the encounter of Jesus' parents with Simeon and his words in the temple (2:33). Lk.'s Easter narrative uses the same word 2x. In 24:12 Peter is amazed at what has happened; in 24:41 the disciples are unable to believe for joy and astonishment when Jesus appears to them. The appearance of the angels at the grave is also frightening (ekthambeō in Mk. 16:5–6).

3. In the Fourth Gospel, thaumazō denotes the amazement that the Jews feel in seeing Jesus' knowledge of Scripture without his having received formal instruction (Jn. 7:15); he replies (7:16) by pointing out that his teaching comes from the Father, who has sent him. In 7:21 Jesus notes the surprise of the Jews to a miracle he has performed on the Sabbath (7:23). Jesus' works will inevitably provoke astonishment: "For the Father loves the Son and shows him all he does. Yes, to your amazement he will show him even greater things than these" (5:20). To Nicodemus Jesus directs the challenge, "You should not be surprised" (3:7). Nicodemus is not to take offense at the initially unintelligible language concerning the new birth; rather, he is to open his heart to it in faith (cf. 5:25–28; also 1 Jn. 3:13, where Christians should not be surprised at the hatred of the world).

4. According to Acts 2:7, when the Spirit was poured out the assembled crowd of Jews are "utterly amazed" (thaumazō). "Wonder [thambos] and amazement [ekstasis, → 1749]" fill the crowd at Peter's healing of a man crippled from birth (3:10; cf. 3:12). For the Sanhedrin an object of astonishment is the boldness of Peter and John and the fact that they are "unschooled, ordinary men" (4:13). Elsewhere the word occurs in Acts when OT stories are related (7:31; cf. Exod. 3:3) or quoted (Acts 13:41; cf. Hab. 1:5).

5. In the NT letters (apart from 2 Cor. 11:14, cf. above), two passages should be noted. In Gal. 1:6 Paul expresses amazement that the Galatians have so quickly allowed themselves to be won over to another gospel; this leads into a debate concerning the Galatian teachers of false doctrine. In 2 Thess. 1:10, the Lord will come in order to be glorified among his saints (cf. LXX of Ps. 68:35) and "to be marveled at" (thaumazō) among those who believe in him. In Jude 16 the author notes how some people "flatter" others in order to gain advantage over them.

6. In Rev. thaumazō occurs 4x (13:3; 17:6–8). Rev. 13:1–3 reports that at the emergence of the beast from the sea, the embodiment of the anti-Christian power, "the whole world was astonished and followed the beast" (13:3). This astonishment leads to adoration of the beast and the power behind him, namely, the dragon. The astonishment in 17:8 also refers to this adoration. The model for this apocalyptic picture is the cult of the Roman Caesars. The astonishment of the seer in 17:7, however, is different; this concerns the mystery of "Babylon the great," which is drunk with the blood of the saints and of the witnesses of Jesus (13:5–6).

Further, Rev. 15:1 speaks of a "great and marvelous [thaumastos] sign." The seer sees seven angels bringing the seven final plagues that consummate the divine judgment of wrath. But before this event of terror happens, he catches a glimpse of the multitude who have conquered and who sing the song of Moses and of the Lamb (15:2), part of which is a praise of the "great and marvelous [thaumasta] . . . deeds" of God (15:3).

θέατρον (theatron), theater, place of assembly, a spectacle (2519); θεατρίζω (theatrizō), to bring on stage, make a show of, publicly expose (2518).

CL Theaters were common in the ancient world since the 6th cent. B.C. There is literary and archaeological evidence of theaters in a number of cities, used for religious, dramatic, and civic events.

NT The theater was a natural place for the citizens of Ephesus to seize Paul's companions, Gaius and Aristarchus, during the riot over Paul's success in that city (Acts 19:29). It had a capacity of around 25,000 people. While the gathering is properly called an "assembly" in 19:32, 41 (ekklēsia, → 1711) , it was an impromptu assembly.

This word can also designate a play or spectacle itself. Thus Paul employs theatron in 1 Cor. 4:9 to describe the apostles as those who are spectacles, as in a theater. In this imagery the theater is the whole universe. Heb. 10:33 uses the vb. theatrizō to convey a similar idea: Believers are exposed to public ridicule and shame.

θέλω (thelō), wish, want, desire, will, take pleasure in (2527); θέλημα (thelēma), will, intention (2525); θέλησις (thelēsis), will (2526).

CL & OT 1. In cl. Gk. thelō (originally ethelō) means to be ready, be inclined, desire, have in mind, will, and esp. to will in the sense of compelling. The noun thelēma, used rarely, denotes intention, wish, and then chiefly will.

2. In the LXX thelō, like boulomai (→ 1089), occurs over 100x (often of an aspect of God's character). It means to take pleasure in, delight in (e.g., Ps. 18:19; Ezek. 18:23), will, be willing (Deut. 10:10). Negatively, it means to refuse (Gen. 37:35). thelēma (44x) stands mainly for the divine good pleasure (Ps. 40:8; Jer. 9:23 = LXX 9:24; Mal. 1:10), but also for the will of God (Ps. 103:7; Isa. 44:28). When thelēma is used of human beings, it can denote a wish (Ps. 107:30) or the human will.

NT thelō occurs 207x in the NT and thelēma 62x. Many uses of the vb. have a general sense of willing, desiring (e.g., Matt. 20:21; 26:17), finding pleasure in (e.g., Mk. 12:38), or claiming (2 Pet. 3:5). thelēma, by contrast, only rarely has a general sense (e.g., 1 Cor. 7:37; 16:12).

1. (a) In Paul's letters thelō and thelēma are often used to describe God's will, esp. as the ultimate source of salvation in Christ. Christ's act of self-sacrifice for the sake of our sins is "according to the will of our God" (Gal. 1:4). By this act we are called to be his children (Eph. 1:5) in accord with his comprehensive saving will (1:9); God works all things in conformity with his will, esp. his election of Israel and now his inclusion of Gentiles into the church (1:11). God's will here denotes his eternal and providential saving will, to which Paul owes his apostleship (cf. 1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1).

(b) The exegesis of Rom. 9:14–32 has caused interpreters difficulties. How are the human will and God's will related to each other? Note that Paul does not go into the question of human responsibility here (cf. for this 10:16–21), nor should we attempt to understand this passage by rational analysis. Paul is emphasizing that it is not human volition that is decisive for God's action; rather, God's saving will is the precondition for all human volition. The freedom of divine compassion is not dependent on human exertion or on human resistance (cf. 9:17). God accomplishes his will in history precisely in that he harnesses both the obedient and the obdurate into his saving plan (9:18). It is God's will to make known his compassion precisely in patience and wrath (9:22). The ultimate goal of his will is in fact not the "objects of his wrath"; rather, it is the "objects of his mercy" (9:22–23). The goal of his will is that all human beings should be helped and come to the knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. 2:4).

(c) The fact that the ultimate intention of God's will is the revelation of his glory in Christ is stressed esp. in Col. 1:27. God is moving toward the point when the mystery of his saving will is to be unveiled for believers in the Christ event. Even if this will, for the time being, has been correctly apprehended only by believers, yet it is still directed toward the redemption of all (1 Tim. 2:4). The NT church does not acknowledge a double predestination in God's will, whereby from the beginning one section of humanity has been arbitrarily excluded from salvation.

Understanding God's saving will is for the believer the precondition of a right attitude and right behavior in the age of salvation, which has already dawned. Those who are unwise and lack understanding miss the insight into the divine will and corresponding behavior (Eph. 5:17–18). Paul elaborates this with particular sharpness in Rom. 2:17–24 with regard to Jewish teachers of the law. They think they know God's will from the law and are able to guide the blind. But the very contradiction between their teaching and behavior betrays the fact that they have not yet understood God's will. For Christ is the daybreak of the new age, and this requires a renewal of the mind (12:2), i.e., thinking transformed by the bestowal of the Spirit. Whatever in God's will is good, well-pleasing, and perfect should lead us to appropriate behavior (12:2).

(d) (i) Where Paul uses thelō with religious significance in referring to humans, it is linked with vbs. of doing. Since believers no longer resist God's will, God becomes the one acting in us. Willing and working become his gifts to us (Phil. 2:13). All human volition and behavior are thus to take place out of obedience to God and in accord with his saving will (cf. 1 Cor. 7:36; 2 Cor. 8:10–11). But where Spirit and flesh are still at variance with one another, i.e., where the Spirit has not yet fully gained acceptance, willing does not turn into doing (Gal. 5:17).

(ii) There is considerable disagreement over the contrast between volition and action in Rom. 7:15–23. According to many interpreters, the contrast is that we as humans would like to fulfill God's will that confronts us in the law, but we repeatedly fall short of that will because we are bound to the sinful nature. In our own strength, we cannot overcome this fragmentation; we can only do so when, according to God's promise, we come under the law of the Spirit, who gives freedom and life in Jesus Christ (8:2). Other interpreters, however, place the discrepancy between what we as individuals deep down really want and what actually results. The split is not in our consciousness, but in the fact that we do the opposite of what we want.

It should, however, be remembered that Rom. 7:7–13 has reached the conclusion that sin works death in one through the good. This may suggest that Paul is speaking of the unredeemed person, whose radical failure is disclosed only when he or she comes to faith.

(e) Paul often uses thelō to declare to his congregations what he as their apostle wishes: e.g., "I wish" or "I would like" (1 Cor. 7:7, 32; 14:5; Gal. 3:2); "I do not want you to be unaware [or ignorant]" (Rom. 1:13; 1 Cor. 10:1); "I want you to realize" (11:3). In many places this vb. assumes the weight of apostolic authority.

2. Jn. uses thelō and thelēma to stress that Jesus, the one sent by God, does not act according to his own will but according to the will of the Father at work in him (Jn. 5:30; 6:38). He is entirely the bearer of the Father's will (4:34). That will is that Jesus, as the Savior, does not lose those appointed for life (6:39) and that those so appointed take hold of salvation in Jesus (6:40). Salvation is impossible as a human action (3:8), but it is divinely possible. The Son gives life to whom he wills (5:21; cf. 6:27, 57). The sole criterion for establishing the legitimacy of the revealer is the doing of his will

(7:17; 9:31; 1 Jn. 2:17). But ethics does not take precedence over faith here. Rather, the doing of God's will refers to the faith to which proof is given in obedience.

3. (a) In the Synoptic Gospels and Acts, this word group is found only rarely for the will of God. In Matt. 7:21; 12:50, we meet the same the formula as in Jn., "whoever does the will of my Father." But here again one must not distinguish a will of God concerned with ethics and another one concerned with a saving purpose. There is only one all-embracing will of God with which alone corresponds an equally comprehensive attitude to life by the believer. So, too, the third petition in the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:10), like the prayer in Gethsemane (26:39, 42; Mk. 14:36, Lk. 22:42), is not to be understood as an acquiescent accommodation to some unalterable power, but as an active affirmation that helps to realize the divine willing (his saving plan) and leads toward the goal of doing the divine will.

4. The interpretation of Ps. 40:6–8 in Heb. 10:5–10 corresponds with Jn.'s thinking concerning God's will and its fulfillment in the work of the one who has been sent. The author of Heb. sees Ps. 40:6–8 as a dialogue between the preexistent Christ and God. The principle of Christ's coming into his world and of the determination of his earthly life is thus presented as the exclusive fulfillment of God's will (Heb. 10:7, 9), including the presentation of his own life as a sacrifice (10:10) through which God's will has been so completely fulfilled that a transformation of humankind in sanctification has become possible (13:21). This transformation is the doing of God's will in undivided obedience (10:36). According to 1 Pet. 3:17; 4:2, 19, this obedience may include suffering.

θεμέλιος (themelios), foundation (2529); θεμελιόω (themelioō), lay the foundation, pass. be founded (2530); ἑδραῖος (hedraios), firm, steadfast (1612); ἑδραίωμα (hedraiōma), foundation (1613).

CL & OT 1. themelios was probably originally an adj. that went with lithos, stone; it is linguistically connected with the vb. tithēmi, place, stand, lay down. Hence it means that which is placed beneath, a foundation or base—both in the lit. sense (e.g., foundations of a house, city, or building) and in a metaphorical sense (e.g., in philosophical thought, the basis of a system of thought). Similarly, the vb. themelioō means to lay the foundation.

A similar meaning is conveyed by the adj. hedraios (derived from hedra, seat, chair), which generally means firm, unshakeable, stable. Thus, hedraios is used in much the same way as themelios in questions about absolute certainty and the ultimate basis of all existence (esp. by Plotinus). The reference is always to something secure and permanent in itself.

2. When the OT speaks of a basis and foundation, it is never in the Gk. philosophical sense of ultimate, self-sufficient existence. The OT speaks of the foundations of houses (1 Ki. 7:9–10; Jer. 51:26 = LXX 28:26) and cities (Amos 1:4–14), as well as of the mountains (Deut. 32:22; Ps. 18:7), the earth (Prov. 8:29; Isa. 24:18; Mic. 6:2), and the heavens (2 Sam. 22:8). Even in the last examples, foundations are here certainly to be understood in a lit. sense, in keeping with the ancient conception of the universe. The important point is that these foundations are not secure in themselves, but are laid and sustained by God (Prov. 8:29; cf. Isa. 14:32; Job 9:6) and are capable of being destroyed again (Deut. 32:22; Ps. 18:7; Lam. 4:11). The foundations of all things can tremble at a theophany (Ps. 18:7, 15), which calls into question at the same time the permanence and stability of the earth's foundations.

3. Of particular importance for the theological meaning of the term foundation is Isa. 28:16 (cf. 54:11). Here Yahweh himself will lay the foundation and cornerstone for Israel in Zion. The image of a new building is certainly not intended to point to a future great new city, but to the establishment in the city of God of a people of God who live by faith. Zion is to become a center of pilgrimage for the nations (cf. Isa. 2:2–3; Mic. 4:1–2). Not until much later (cf. Eph. 2:20; 1 Pet. 2:4–8) is the foundation stone (Isa. 28:16) seen to refer to the Messiah.

NT In the NT themelios occurs 15x and extends throughout the NT. It does not differ from cl. Gk. usage in its meaning. The vb. themelioō is used 5x; hedraios occurs only 3x in Paul (1 Cor. 7:37; 15:58; Col. 1:23), and hedraiōma once (1 Tim. 3:15, in the same sense as themelios). Lk. uses themelios only in the lit. sense of the foundation of a building (Lk. 6:48–49; 14:29). In Heb. 11:10 and Rev. 21:14, 19, it refers to the foundations of the future city of God. Paul uses the noun and vb. only in a fig. sense.

1. (a) The image of a house and house building (→ oikos, 3875, and oikodomeō, 3868) is occasionally used in the NT as a picture of how people govern and order their lives, as they found and build it (Matt. 7:24–25). Those who have the words of Jesus as the foundation are securely based. This also applies to the Christian community, the church. It is a "spiritual house" (Eph. 2:20–22; 1 Tim. 3:15; 1 Pet. 2:5), which Jesus himself plans to build (cf. Matt. 16:18) by his Spirit and Word. Just as the foundation is of decisive importance in building a house, so it is with the church. This foundation is Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 3:11), on which Paul has set the church (3:10) and on which further building must proceed (3:12–15). But whatever is built, Christ must remain the basis.

(b) Insofar as this foundation only comes to us through the proclamation of the apostles and prophets, they can themselves be described as themelios, "Christ Jesus himself as the chief cornerstone" (Eph. 2:20). In the same way, in Matt. 16:18 Peter is called the rock on which the church will be built. The church thus lives from what God has done in Jesus and what is proclaimed by the apostles.

2. Where the church rests on such a foundation, she can herself conversely be described as the foundation of the truth (1 Tim. 3:15; hedraiōma). For it is she who protects and preserves the truth in her confession (3:16), in the fight against enemies within and without. Similarly in 2 Tim. 2:19, the foundation is formed not only by God's act in Christ but, arising out of this, by the fact that the church puts away from herself all unrighteousness (cf. 2:20–21).

3. As is evident from the simile of building a house, Paul makes a fundamental distinction between two separate tasks of the preacher. The first is to lay the foundation (missionary proclamation, evangelism); the second is to build up the church (1 Cor. 3:10). His own task is primarily the former of these (Rom. 15:20; cf. 2 Cor. 10:16); he does not intend to build further where someone else has already laid the foundation.

4. In addition to these ecclesiological uses, these words can also be applied to individual Christians. The steadfastness to which they are called (hedraios, 1 Cor. 15:58) depends entirely on their relationship to the Lord, which is grounded in faith (hedraios, Col. 1:23) and love (themelioō, Eph. 3:17). There may, however, be also an allusion here to the church, for in both contexts it is mentioned as the body of Christ or by the expression "in Christ" (Col. 1:18; Eph. 3:21).

5. A completely different use is found in Heb. 6:1, where themelios means the basic doctrines of the Christian faith. The distinction made here is between the groundwork, which every Christian has to know, and further insights, which come to those who are prepared to study the Scriptures in greater depth. themelios is thus used to distinguish between the relative importance of various items of Christian teaching.

2536 θεός

CL & OT 1. (a) Gk. religion was polytheistic. The gods were represented in anthropomorphic form as personal beings who exercised a determining influence on the world and fate of human beings, but who themselves were dependent on a superior fate. Since they were not creator-gods, they were not considered as outside the universe and transcendent. The influence of the gods was not universal, but was limited by their natures and attributes. From Aeschylus, on the different gods came increasingly to be identified one with another. Their convergence into one divine being was prepared by the pre-Socratic thinkers and the ideas of classical tragedy.

(b) The Gk. philosophical understanding of god was nonpersonal. Philosophers sought the origin of all things and the principle that shaped the world. In the process of philosophical reflection, the divine forms were spiritualized and finally replaced by general concepts such as "world reason," "the divine," and "being," which influenced and formed the world as powers, giving it meaning and creating order.

In Hel. syncretism the various Gk. and non-Gk. divinities were equated as a result of the recognition that behind the diverse names stood the same entities. Not infrequently these tendencies led to the honoring of one godhead as the divine All. This development reached its height in Neo-Platonism, where the divine is the universal One, which has no obj. existence or personality. It is Being itself, manifested through a series of hypostases and emanations in the world.

2. By contrast, the religion of the OT and Jud. is monotheistic and personal. (a) In the OT the words ʾēl, ʾelôah, and ʾelōhîm, from related roots, are generic designations of God. ʾēl is a word common to all Semitic languages for god and also as the proper name for a particular god. For the patriarchs, ʾēl was the only God, whom they honored on the basis of his revelation. He appears as ʾēl ʿelyôn, "God Most High" (Gen. 14:18–22); ʾēl rōʾî, "the God who sees" (16:13); ʾēl ʿôlām, "the Eternal God" (21:33); ʾēl bêt-ʾēl, "God of Bethel" (31:13; Bethel means "house of God"); ʾēl ʾelōhê yiśrāʾēl, "God, the God of Israel" (33:20); and ʾēl šadday, "God Almighty" (e.g., 17:1; 28:3; Exod. 6:3).

ʾelōhîm, though pl. in form, is seldom used in the OT to mean "gods." In Israel the pl. is understood as the pl. of fullness: Elohim is the God who really, and in the fullest sense of the word, is God.

(b) The origin and meaning of the divine name Yahweh is somewhat uncertain. Most likely the name is connected with the verbal root hwy or hwh, to be. The OT gives an interpretation of this name at the theophany of the burning bush (Exod. 3:13–15). After Moses asked God's name in order to be able to give it to the people of Israel, "God said to Moses, 'I AM WHO I AM [ʾehyeh ʾăšer ʾehyeh]. This is what you are to say to the Israelites: "I AM has sent me to you." ' God also said to Moses, 'Say to the Israelites, "The LORD [yhwh; i.e., Yahweh], the God of your fathers—the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob—has sent me to you." This is my name forever, the name by which I am to be remembered from generation to generation.'"

There has been considered debate as to the translation and meaning of the words ʾehyeh ʾašer ʾehyeh. This is reflected in the NIV note: "Or I WILL BE WHAT I WILL BE." Of the various suggestions about the meaning of this name, the best perhaps is the phrase, "I am he who exists." That is, Yahweh is the God whom Israel must recognize as really existing. In the context of Exod. the revelation of the divine name is a proclamation to Israel of the one with whom they have to do. God is calling his people out of Egypt and promises to be with Moses for that purpose.

The proclamation of the Decalogue begins with the words: "I am the LORD [Yahweh]" (Exod. 20:2; cf. Deut. 6:5), and the first commandment requires exclusive worship and service to this God (Exod. 20:3, cf. 5). When Moses sought God's presence, he was not permitted to see God's face but nevertheless received the reply: "I will cause all my goodness to pass in front of you, and I will proclaim my name, the LORD [Yahweh], in your presence. I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion" (33:19). The God who thus revealed himself to Moses and to Israel was distinct from the deities of Egypt and Canaan, with their fertility rites concerned with the cycle of nature. He remained a mystery, yet he was graciously active in the history of his people.

Exod. 3 does not give a new name to God for the first time but rather the explanation of a name known already but now identified as that of the saving God of Israel. Although Israel did not work out a metaphysical doctrine of time, the idea of God as "he who is" is paralleled by numerous other statements about God in the OT (Ps. 90:1–2; 102:27; Isa. 41:4; 48:12). The thought of time is also bound up with that of Yahweh's ongoing presence (Jos. 3:7; Isa. 49:6, 26).

The Heb. name yhwh ṣᵉbāʾôṯ, "LORD Almighty" (KJV, "LORD of hosts"), occurs some 279x. The "hosts" in question most likely relate either to the earthly armies of Israel or to the celestial armies of spirits and angels. This expression is found most frequently in the prophets, for whom Yahweh was above all a warrior God. It refers to the totality of forces over which Yahweh rules. In the LXX the expression is usually translated by kyrios pantokratōr (Lord Almighty) or kyrios sabaōth. The term pantokratōr is taken up in the NT by 2 Cor. 6:18; Rev. 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:22; Sabaōth occurs in Rom. 9:29 (cf. Isa. 1:9) and Jas. 5:4.

The name of Yahweh was combined with various Heb. verbs to form proper names: e.g., Jehoiachin (Yahweh establishes), Jonathan (Yahweh gives), and Joshua (Yahweh is salvation). Joshua is the Heb. form that underlies the name of Jesus.

The form Jehovah arose out of a misunderstanding that also resulted in the reluctance of pious Jews to pronounce the divine name (ca. 300 B.C.). Any time they came to yhwh in the Heb. text, they uttered the word ʾadōnay ("my Lord"). In the MT the divine name was written with the consonants of yhwh and the vowels of ʾadōnay as a reminder to say the latter whenever the word was read. The LXX reflects the Jewish reluctance to pronounce the divine name and puts the word kyrios ("Lord") in its place. The NIV and other Eng. versions also reflect the practice by using LORD (in small capital letters) whenever yhwh is in the OT text.

The fact that Israel's God is both higher than and over all other gods is first given full expression in Isa. 40:25. The God of Israel is the Lord of all, whose sovereign power fills all the earth (6:3). There are no gods apart from him (41:4; 42:8; 43:10– 13; 45:3, 6; 48:11). Jeremiah strongly supported the proposition that the gods of the heathen are no gods at all (2:11).

3. The OT contains no all-embracing definition of God. But it does make an extensive range of statements that testify to the being of God and have their basis in the divine revelation. Nor does the OT attempt to prove the existence of God; rather, it merely assumes that God is (e.g., Gen. 1:1). He is the first and the last (Isa. 41:4; 44:6; 48:12), the eternal, the almighty, and the living one, the creator of heaven and earth (e.g., Gen. 1:1); he is the Lord, who guides the destinies of the nations, but who has made Israel a people for his own possession (Exod. 19:5–6). Israel stands under his protection. Yahweh leads, guides, and gives Israel his promises. But he is also the commanding God, who makes his will known and expects obedience. The history of Israel is the history of God with this people. Thus Israel's belief in God is founded on a theology of history.

The OT expresses a conception of God as personal, that God is capable of all the emotions that a person can have, such as love, anger, compassion, and repentance. But even if human characteristics can be attributed to him, he cannot be compared with any human being (Hos. 11:9). The transcendent God, who dwells in light where no one can approach, is exalted above time and space and is therefore unique in his Godhead, not to be portrayed or localized (cf. Exod. 20:4). He is the eternal king (Isa. 52:7), who rules over all the kingdoms of the world (37:16).

The most fundamental feature of God's being is expressed by the word "holy." He is "the Holy One" (Isa. 40:25; Hos 11:9; Hab. 3:3). But the holy, transcendent God steps out of his concealment through his word and his acts of revelation and repeatedly communicates with his people in demonstrations of power and glory. This holy God is just in all he does (cf. Ps. 7:11). He is the judge who condemns unrighteousness and to whom humankind must answer.

But the OT also testifies to God's grace and forgiving mercy (e.g., Exod. 34:6; Ps. 103:8). He is called Father in the OT—the father of the people of Israel (Exod. 4:22–23; Deut. 32:6; Isa. 63:16; Jer. 31:9 = LXX 38:9; Hos. 11:1). He comforts the pious (Job 15:11), blesses them, and helps them (Ps. 45:7; 90:1; 94:22). In particular he takes up the cause of the poor and needy, widows, and orphans (146:9; Isa. 49:13). Through a personal relationship between God and his people is created an I–Thou relation between God and individual believers, who can turn to him in prayer for all their needs. Therefore, already in the OT God is not just a dreaded enemy of humanity; he makes it possible for people both to trust and love him, because he himself loves his chosen people.

4. Intertestamental Jud. confessed the one God in unswerving loyalty and fought passionately against pagan polytheism. But it saw the one God working in a multitude of mediatorial and angelic beings. Dualistic concepts were introduced in apocalyptic writings. The rabbis laid great stress on avoiding the name of God, using instead a system of substitute terms: e.g., "heaven," "the Lord" (ʾᵃdōnay), and later "the Name." In addition there were abstract terms like "glory," "power," and "the Holy One, blessed be he."

5. The residents of Qumran took over a cosmological dualism—e.g., God and Belial, light and darkness. To this corresponds the anthropological opposition of flesh and spirit, the pious and the godless, sons of light and sons of darkness. However, the dualism of the two spirits that rule the world is subordinated to the fundamental OT idea of God as the creator of all things. For he created the spirits of light and of darkness, which lie at the basis of his working (1QS 3:25; cf. 3:19–26).

The Qumran doctrine of God stands out as being rigidly deterministic. God's actions are determined by a fixed plan (1QS 3:15; 11:11–12; 1QH 18:22). Nothing happens apart from his will (1QS 3:15; 11:17, 19; 1QH 1:20; 10:9), for all authority is in his power. God's hand leads the individual at all times, and his just rebuke accompanies all perversity (9:32–33). A person can only speak because God opens the mouth (11:33). God created the righteous for eternal salvation and lasting peace, but the "perverse" for the time of his wrath (14:15–33). The "lot" of Belial will result in eternal destruction (1QM 1:5); all "men of lies" will be destroyed (1QH 4:20–21).

6. Philo attempted to link the OT idea of Yahweh with the Platonic-Stoic idea of God. In speaking of Israel's God, he distinguishes between ho theos (the good Creator) and ho kyrios (the kingly Lord of the world). Philo also makes extensive use of the philosophical concept of to theion, the divine. God is fully transcendent and the active power in everything. He produces out of himself the original, typical ideas and forms them into the visible world. The Word is his mediator for creation and revelation.

NT The NT rests firmly on the OT foundation in its doctrine of God, but its emphases are new. God is now near, the Father of Jesus Christ, who justifies freely by his grace (cf. Paul's concept of the righteousness of God). His action in election bursts all claims to exclusiveness. But it is the same God who reveals himself as in the OT and whose plan of salvation, there promised, comes to fulfillment.

1. The one God. (a) theos is the most frequent designation of God in the NT. Belief in the one, only, and unique God (Matt. 23:9; Rom. 3:30; 1 Cor. 8:4, 6; Gal. 3:20; 1 Tim. 2:5; Jas. 2:19) is an established part of Christian tradition. Jesus himself made the fundamental confession of Jud. his own and expressly quoted the Shema (Deut. 6:4–5; see Mk. 12:29–30; cf. Matt. 22:37; Lk. 10:27). This guaranteed continuity between the old and the new covenants. The God whom Christians worship is the God of the fathers (Acts 3:13; 5:30; 22:14), the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Acts 3:13; 7:32; cf. Matt. 22:32; Mk. 12:26; Lk. 20:37), the God of Israel (Matt. 15:31; Lk. 1:68; Acts 13:17), and the God of Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:3).

Just as God once made Israel his people, so now he has chosen those who believe in Christ as an elect race and a holy people for his possession (Acts 15:14; 20:28; Heb. 11:25; 1 Pet. 2:9). Faith is in him (Rom. 4:3; Gal. 3:6; Tit. 3:8; Heb. 6:1; Jas. 2:23; 1 Pet. 1:21), hope is on him (Acts 24:15; Rom. 4:18; 2 Cor. 3:4; 1 Pet. 3:5), and prayer is to him. The community of Jesus may have no false gods beside him, whether money (Matt. 6:24), the "belly" (Phil. 3:19), or the cosmic powers (Gal. 4:8–11). They must serve him alone, do his will, and remain faithful to him.

(b) Confession of the one God appears in Eph. 4:6 in an expanded form ("one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all"), which glorifies the omnipresence of the rule of God. Similar formulae, referring now to God, now to Christ, occur in Rom. 11:36 and 1 Cor. 8:6.

(c) The one God is the living and only true God (Rom. 3:30; Gal. 3:20; 1 Thess. 1:9; 1 Tim. 1:17; 2:5; Jude 25; cf. Jn. 17:3). He is the God whom the heathen do not know (1 Thess. 4:5). It is true that Paul acknowledges the existence of "so-called" gods, who have authority as demonic powers over the heathen, but for Christians there is only one God (1 Cor. 8:5–6). Even if the honor and power of the gods do not belong to the stoicheia (→ 5122) that the Galatians previously worshiped, they can still intrude divisively between the young congregation and their God (Gal. 4:8–9).

This one God is called "our God" (Acts 2:39; 2 Pet. 1:1; Rev. 4:11; 7:12; 19:5). The individual believer, like Paul, can speak personally of him as his or her God (Rom. 1:8; 2 Cor. 12:21; Phil. 1:3; 4:19; Phlm. 4). Belief in the one God involves turning away from all heathen ways. Therefore in missionary preaching testimony to God is linked with a struggle against the worship of false gods (Acts 14:15; 17:24–25; 19:26).

(d) The NT letters and especially Acts give a partial picture of the excesses of the NT world and their local religious expressions. Paul was painfully impressed in Athens by the many figures of gods and shrines that he saw as he went through the city (Acts 17:16, 23). Just how strongly the cult of Artemis dominated the religious life of Ephesus is clear from 19:23–41. Here things came to a head in a violent clash when silversmiths who derived great profit from making little models of the temple of Artemis felt their economic existence threatened by Paul's preaching. The significance of sacrificial meals in the heathen cultus at Corinth is indicated in 1 Cor. 8:1–7. Magic also played an important part in Hel. times (see Acts 8:9; 13:6; 19:13–16). In Ephesus, as a result of the powerful testimony of the Christian message of salvation, books of magic were publicly burned (19:19).

Those converted to the true and living God had been freed from bondage to false gods (1 Thess. 1:9). But for many Christians the fascinating power of the heathen cults had not entirely lost its force. Therefore Paul explained to the Corinthians, "I do not want you to be participants with demons" (1 Cor. 10:20), for the heathen present their sacrifices to demonic beings and not to God.

2. The transcendent God. (a) God is the creator, sustainer, and Lord of the world (Acts 17:24; Rev. 10:6), the master builder of all things (Heb. 3:4). He exercises his lordship from heaven, for heaven is his throne and earth his footstool (Matt. 5:34; 23:22; Acts 7:49). He is the Almighty, with whom nothing is impossible (Mk. 10:27). No one can hinder, let alone destroy, his work (Acts 5:39; cf. 2 Tim. 2:9). He is the highest (Mk. 5:7; Lk. 1:32; Acts 7:48; 16:17; Heb. 7:1), the great king (Matt. 5:35), the king of the nations (Rev. 15:3).

(b) Prayer is a powerful witness to belief in the transcendent God, for prayer is directed to God who lives in heaven (Matt. 6:9; cf. Jn. 17:1). At present satanic and demonic powers still oppose God's rule on earth. Therefore the congregation of Jesus prays for the full revelation of his kingdom (Matt. 6:10a), for the full accomplishment of his will on earth as in heaven (6:10b), and for the hallowing of his name (6:9). In Jesus the kingdom of God (→ basileia, 993) has already broken in; it has been demonstrated by his powerful and wonderful acts. He has broken into Satan's realm and driven out demons by the "finger of God" (Lk. 11:20); but only the age to come will bring the full establishment of God's kingdom. Then Christ will conquer all powers opposed to God (1 Cor. 15:24; 2 Thess. 2:8; Rev. 21:8, 27). When he has completed this his last task, God will be "all in all" (1 Cor. 15:28).

3. The personal character of God. (a) We must not imagine God as possessing a limiting form. Nevertheless, we are only capable of speaking about him in concepts that belong to our categories of thought. Moreover, if the personal character of God is ignored or restricted, the meaning of revelation is drastically changed. A depersonalized God is not the God of the NT.

The God to whom the NT testifies is the God who speaks and acts; he reveals himself through word and deed. He works in sovereign, absolute power (Jn. 5:17). He makes his will known in commands and brings everything to the goal he has determined. After he had spoken in the old covenant in many ways to the fathers through the prophets, he has spoken in these last days "to us" through the Son, who reflects his glory and bears the very stamp of his nature (Heb. 1:1–3). In the preaching of the Word he addresses everyone personally and receives into his fellowship all who believe in Jesus.

(b) It belongs to the personal character of God that he is Spirit (Jn. 4:24). Activities of the Spirit and of power proceed from him. The Spirit of God descended on Jesus at his baptism (Matt. 3:16; cf. 12:18). Filled by this Spirit, he worked as the Messiah sent by God. Through the Spirit of God he cast out the evil spirits (12:28). Christians are characterized by having not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit who is from God (1 Cor. 2:12), for the natural self does not understand anything that comes from the Spirit of God (2:14–15). Only the spiritual person is capable of knowing God (2:11) and of penetrating the depths of God. God has revealed his secret wisdom to believers through his Spirit (2:10), who lives in them and thus becomes the formative power of their being (2:11).

Still, in this age limits are imposed on a believer's knowledge. God's "judgments" are "unsearchable" and his "paths beyond tracing out" (Rom. 11:33). But mysteries hidden in God from the beginning of time have now been made known through the proclamation of salvation. The apostolic ministry testifies to the world of the unfathomable riches of Christ. Through the Christian community the knowledge about God's manifold wisdom has penetrated as far as the cosmic powers (Eph. 3:8–10). Paul saw himself as the custodian of "the secret things of God" (1 Cor. 4:1).

In 1 Cor. 6:11 the apostle explains that the Spirit of God (in conjunction with the name of the Lord Jesus Christ) has washed, sanctified, and justified believers. Through the divine Spirit working in them they are no longer in the realm of the flesh but in that of the Spirit. Hence they live according to the Spirit (Rom. 8:4–14).

True confession of Christ is brought about by the Spirit of God (Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3; cf. Matt. 16:17). In situations of suffering he gives the word that is necessary for the defense of and witness to the gospel (10:20). The Spirit rests on those who are abused on account of the name of Christ (1 Pet. 4:14).

(c) The personal character of God finds special expression in the confession of God as Father. Jesus' relationship with God is essentially determined by his Father–Son relationship. As God's "one and only" Son, he is bound to God in a special way, as Jn.'s use of the monogenēs (lit., "of one kind") is intended to show (cf. Jn. 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18; 1 Jn. 4:9). In prayer Jesus called God "Abba, Father" (Mk. 14:36) or "Father" (Matt. 11:25–26; Lk. 23:24; Jn. 11:41; 17:1, 5, 11). Jesus also gave his disciples the right to approach God as "Father" (Matt. 6:9; Lk. 11:2). In the quiet room at home the individual may pray personally to his or her Father (Matt. 6:4, 6, 18). The name "Father" is applied to God in illustrations and parables (e.g., Lk. 15:11–32). As Father, God is the God who is near, to whom we can turn in believing trust with all our petitions. He receives his creatures with fatherly goodness and surrounds them with his care (Matt. 6:26–32; 10:29–31).

The NT letters use the solemn, confessional formula "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 15:6; 2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3; Col. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:3). In Christ believers are related to God as children. His Spirit testifies to them that they are God's children (Rom. 8:16), so in prayer they too may cry "Abba, Father" (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). This is a gift of grace procured through the Spirit of God's Son.

The idea of the children of God takes on a special coloring in 1 Jn. Here the statements are no longer determined, as in Paul, by the concept of adoption, of being received into the place of a child, but by that of begetting (→ gennaō, 1164). Christians are God's children because they have been begotten by God (1 Jn. 3:9; cf. 2:29; 4:7).

This means that the origin of their new being is to be found solely in God (4:4). True fellowship with God is possible only when Christians abide in God and when God abides in them (4:16). But since God is love, this means abiding in love. Out of this deep, inner relationship with God arises a completely new, concrete, ethical obligation: love of the brethren, which must lead to practical aid (3:16–17).

4. The attributes of God. (a) The NT has no fixed, systematically ordered doctrine of the attributes of God. But there is a wealth of allusions, esp. in expressions of prayer and faith and in descriptions of divine acts. More rare than in the OT but nevertheless present are allusions to the holiness of God (Jn. 17:11; 1 Pet. 1:15; Rev. 3:7; 4:8; 15:4), his (present and future) wrath (Rom. 1:18; 2:5; 9:22; Eph. 5:6; 1 Thess. 1:10; Rev. 6:17; 11:18; 14:10), and his glory (Acts 7:2; Rom. 1:23; 6:4; Eph. 3:16; 1 Thess. 2:12; Tit. 2:13; Rev. 15:8; 21:11, 23). Only once is God called teleios, in the sense of moral perfection (Matt. 5:48). Paul strongly emphasizes the faithfulness of God (Rom. 3:3; 1 Cor. 1:9; 10:13; cf. 2 Cor. 1:18). God abides by his promises and fulfills them (Rom. 9:6–8). He does not lie (Heb. 6:18; cf. Tit. 1:2); he is utterly true, and his testimony is absolutely valid (Jn. 3:33).

(b) God is the eternal (Rom. 16:26) and only wise God (16:27). He is described as invisible (1:20; Col. 1:15–16; 1 Tim. 1:17; Heb. 11:27) and immortal (Rom. 1:23; 1 Tim. 1:17). In 1 Tim. 1:11 and 6:15 he is called by an attribute taken over from Hel. Jud., the "blessed" God. The doxology in 1 Tim. 6:15–16 is reminiscent of the prayers of the Hel. synagogue. It confesses God in solemn words as "the only Ruler, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who alone is immortal and who lives in unapproachable light, whom no one has seen or can see."

Paul's description of God in his speech at the meeting of the Areopagus (Acts 17:24) also betrays Hel. influence. God created the world and everything in it. The Lord of heaven and earth does not dwell in temples made by human hands. Nor is he served by human hands, as though he needs anything, since he himself gives to all beings life, breath, and everything else. Though some of these expressions may sound strange today, Paul was concerned to testify to the true and living God in terms that were relevant to his day. This is the God whom the heathen of Athens worshiped, more unconsciously than consciously, and to whom they had erected an altar with the inscription "TO AN UNKNOWN GOD" (Acts 17:23). The apostle even pressed into his service the words of two Greek poets (17:28): "In him [God] we live and move and have our being" (Epimenides), and "we are his offspring" (Aratus).

In this connection, Paul held that humanity had a natural awareness of God that was consonant with the revelation of God in the OT and Christian experience. Human beings do not arrive at such a conclusion as the result of a metaphysical proof. Rather, they are born with this awareness, and reflection on the finite character of the natural order should be sufficient to tell them that God is not to be identified with anything or anyone within that order (Acts 14:17; Rom. 1:19ff., 32; possibly 2:12–16).

(c) A central concept in Paul's theology is the righteousness of God (Rom. 1:17, 21–22; 9:30; 10:3; 2 Cor. 5:21; Phil. 3:9). It is a judging but also a saving righteousness. God is just when he condemns sinful humanity. But he is equally just when he bestows his forgiving grace on those who believe in Christ and in the salvation procured through him. For Christ's sake, in whom God himself offered the atoning sacrifice for the guilt of humanity, he does not count their sins against them but pronounces them righteous. Thus the righteousness of God forms the foundation of Paul's doctrine of justification.

(d) Because God is the initiator of salvation, both he and Christ are called sōtēr, savior (1 Tim. 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Tit. 1:3; 2:13; 3:4; → 5400). God sent his Son into the world (Gal. 4:4) and delivered him to death for us (Jn. 3:16; 1 Jn. 4:10; cf. Rom. 8:32). This saving act of God is proclaimed through the word of the cross, understood by believers as God's power and God's wisdom (1 Cor. 1:18, 24).

Paul calls the whole message of salvation, declared to the world, the "gospel of God" (Rom. 15:16; 1 Thess. 2:2; 1 Tim. 1:11; cf. also 1 Pet. 4:17). It brings salvation to everyone who believes (Rom. 1:16; cf. 1 Cor. 2:5). At the same time the offer of salvation is universal. God desires that everyone should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. 2:4), for his saving grace has appeared to all (Tit. 2:11).

The power of God is not only at work in the gospel; it has demonstrated itself from the beginning of creation (Rom. 1:20). That same power raised Christ from the dead (Acts 2:24, 32; Rom. 8:11; 10:9) and thereby ushered in the new creation of humankind and of the universe. Believers even now experience the transcendent fullness of God's power (2 Cor. 4:7), his mighty strength (Eph. 1:19; 3:20). Hence the apostle prays that they may be continually built up through the Spirit, according to the riches of his glory, with power in the inner self (3:16). The ultimate aim of faith, knowledge, and love is to be filled with all the fullness of God (3:19).

(e) The saving power of the divine being is expressed in a series of genitives that are connected with the noun God. God is "the God of peace" (Rom. 15:33; 16:20; 1 Cor. 14:33; Phil. 4:9; 1 Thess. 5:23; cf. Heb. 13:20), "the Father of compassion and the God of all comfort" (2 Cor. 1:3; cf. Rom. 12:1), "the God of all grace" (1 Pet. 5:10, cf.12; Eph. 1:7), and "the God of love" (2 Cor. 13:11).

(f) The full depth of God's being is expressed in the statement: "God is love" (1 Jn. 4:8). His love embraces the lost world, which has turned away from him. It is the decisive reason for his saving and redeeming activity. He has proved his love by giving up his Son to death in order that all who believe on him may have eternal life (Jn. 3:16). Above all his love is for the individual believer: God loved us (1 Jn. 4:10), and we are dearly loved by God (Col. 3:12). All real love has its origin in God (1 Jn. 4:7). Whoever does not love has not known God (4:8). The love of God is poured out in our hearts through the Holy Spirit (Rom. 5:5). It is the highest spiritual gift, without which all the other charismata are meaningless (1 Cor. 13).

5. God and Christ. The uniqueness of Jesus Christ as the Son of God is most fully developed in Jn. and the NT letters. (a) "As to his human nature [he] was a descendant of David" (Rom. 1:3; cf. Matt. 1:1–17; Lk. 3:23–38; Acts 2:30; 2 Tim. 2:8), and he was "declared with power to be Son of God by his resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:4). The allusion here is to the divine decree of Ps. 2:6–8.

According to the developed Christology of Jn. 1:1, Christ already existed before his earthly existence as the divine Word (→ logos, 3364) with God. Thus he came from God (3:2; 13:3; 16:27–28). It was God himself who sent him into the world at the time that he had determined in order to carry out his saving purposes (Gal. 4:4–5). He came with divine authority; God was with him (Jn. 3:2). He is the image of the invisible God (Col. 1:15); in him "the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form" (2:9). Because he has come from God, he alone is capable of bringing a true message from God (Jn. 1:18). He is therefore the only trustworthy revealer. He and the Father are one (10:30; 14:10; 17:11, 21); whoever sees him sees God (12:45; 14:9).

(b) There is not only a oneness of being between God and Jesus Christ, but also a complete harmony in speech and action. The words Jesus speaks are words he has heard from the Father (Jn. 14:10); the works he performs are the works of God (9:4).

They serve to reveal the divine glory and therefore glorify God (17:4). This is expressed particularly in Jesus' "I am" statements, which in the OT are self-revelations of God himself. Jesus is the light (8:12; cf. 1:4, 8–9; 9:5), the life (14:6), the truth (14:6), the living bread (6:48; cf. 6:51–58, 63), and the only way to God (14:6). Rev. also has divine "I am" statements, such as "I am the First and the Last" or "I am the Alpha and the Omega," which come both from the mouth of God and from that of the eternal Christ (Rev. 1:8, 17; 21:6; 22:13). Clearly in the NT faith in God is closely bound up with faith in Christ.

(c) But Jesus Christ does not usurp the place of God. His oneness with the Father does not mean absolute identity of being. In his preexistent being Jesus was in the form of God, but he did not cling tenaciously to his equality with God (Phil. 2:6). Rather, he emptied himself (→ kenoō, 3033). In his earthly existence he was obedient to God, even unto death on the cross (2:8). He is the mediator, but not the originator, of salvation (2 Cor. 5:19; Col. 1:20; Heb. 9:15), the Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world (Jn. 1:36). After completing his work on earth, he was raised to God's right hand (Eph. 1:20; 1 Pet. 3:22) and invested with the honor of the heavenly kyrios, Lord (Phil. 2:9–10). Although coordinated with God, he remains subordinate to him (cf. 1 Cor. 15:28). This is true also of his position as eternal high priest in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 9:24; 10:12–13; cf. Ps. 110:1). He represents us before God (cf. also Rom. 8:34).

(d) A few NT texts equate the Son of God with God himself. In Rom 9:5, after Paul has expounded the position of Israel in salvation history and has emphasized as a special advantage the fact that Christ, according to the flesh, stems from this people, he adds a relative clause that runs lit., "who is over all God blessed forever. Amen." The NIV translates it appropriately as a reference to Christ: "Christ, who is God over all, forever praised. Amen." Though this translation is disputed by some scholars, to treat this doxology instead as directed to God the Father does not follow the form of doxologies elsewhere in the LXX and the NT. Moreover, the assertion of Christ's Lordship is in accord with Paul's teaching elsewhere (Rom. 1:4; 10:9; 14:9; Eph. 1:20, 23; Phil. 2:9–11; Col. 1:18–19; cf. Acts 2:36; Heb. 1:2–4).

Jn. 1:1 declares: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." Though groups such as the Jehovah's Witnesses draw theological significance from the fact that theos in the third phrase of this verse lacks an article, a correct understanding of Gk. grammar demonstrates that definite nouns in a predicate nominative position preceding the verb "to be" regularly lack the article (Colwell's Rule). The context of this verse clearly shows that theos in this verse is definite.

In Jn. 1:18 a number of very good MSS read monogenēs theos ("the only God") instead of ho monogenēs huios ("the only Son"; see NIV text and note). The unusualness of such a reading gives strong grounds for accepting its authenticity, thus further affirming the deity of the Word.

Jn. 20:28 contains the unique affirmation of Thomas addressing the risen Christ as God: "My Lord and my God." The statement marks the climax of this Gospel. God has become visible for Thomas in the form of Jesus. The climax of 1 Jn. occurs in the confessional formula of 5:20, which asserts the full identity of Christ and God: "We know also that the Son of God has come and has given us understanding, so that we may know him who is true. And we are in him who is true—even in his Son Jesus Christ. He is the true God and eternal life." The last phrase may also be translated: "This [Christ] is the true one, God and eternal life."

Finally, Tit. 2:13 speaks clearly of believers waiting for "the blessed hope—the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ." The title "great God" is firmly rooted in Jud., and it may seem surprising to have that title ascribed to Jesus. Yet that is precisely what a careful analysis of the Gk. text suggests (the Granville Sharp Rule; cf. also "our God and Savior Jesus Christ" in 2 Pet. 1:1 and "our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" in 3:18).

(e) Jesus' cry of desolation recorded in Matt. 27:46 and Mk. 15:34 ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?"; cf. Ps. 22:1) has sometimes raised problems for Christology. It was at times felt that the words imply an abandonment of Jesus by God, which is incompatible with belief in his divinity and denotes a lack of trust on Jesus' part. Nevertheless, Matt. and Mk. did not shirk to record it. This cry expresses Jesus' sense of utter desolation, such as he had not even experienced at his temptation or in Gethsemane. His faithfulness to God's will had led him to the point where that will had to be done without the conscious awareness of God's presence. This was the experience of the psalmist, and in recording the cry the Evangelists saw a further fulfillment of Ps. 22, even though they did not use a typical "fulfillment" formula (e.g., "as it is written") here.

The suggestion made by some scholars that the Evangelists deliberately put that cry into the mouth of Jesus, perhaps in the light of Ps. 22, raises more problems than it solves, for it is incredible that the church would have invented an utterance that seems to go back on all Jesus had taught. The cry reveals the anguish Jesus felt in being utterly rejected by friend and foe alike and in dying the most excruciating death. We should also understand this cry in the light of Mk. 14:36 and Paul's interpretation of Jesus' death in 2 Cor. 5:21 and Gal. 3:13.
