The original Hittites, or "Hattians," sprang from Ham, through Canaan's second son Heth (Gen. 10:15, I Chron. 1:13), and became established along the Halys River in what is now central Turkey by the mid-third millennium B.C. The Hittite dress, of heavy coats and turned-up-toed shoes, reflect the rugged cold of this Anatolian plateau. From some time after 2200 B.C. the Hattians were overrun by a vigorous, Indo-European speaking people from the north, who became Heth's ruling class, while adopting the older and often immoral Hittite culture.

Ancient monuments depict the Hittites as a stocky people with promient noses, retreating foreheads, and thick lips. The Hittite strain became widely diffused throughout Palestine, along with that of the Hurrians, whose Aryan rulers had assumed the leadership of upper Mesopotamia at about this same time. Scripture thus regularly lists "Hittites" among the peoples of Canaan (Gen. 15:20, Exod. 3:8,17; even in first place, Deut. 7:1, 20:17). They were "the people of the land" (Gen. 23:7), especially in the central hills (Num. 13:29, Josh. 11:3). At Hebron, in 2029 B.C., Abraham purchased Machpelah from the Hittites (Gen. 23:3-20, 49:29-32, 50:13); 60 years later, Esau married Hittite (or Hurrian-Hivite) wives (26:34, 36:2), to the distress of Rebekah (27:46); with Israel's conquest of Canaan, despite the Mosaic ban (Deut. 20:17) Hittite unions became common (Judg. 3:5-6); and from Solomon to Ezra (I Kings 11:1, Ezra 9:1) such intermarriage continued. Ezekiel thus condemned his people's morals and race, by exclaiming, "Your mother was a Hittite, and your father an Amorite" (16:3,45).

The history of the main body of Turkish Hittites embraces the Old Kingdom (1850-1550 B.C.) and the New Empire (1450-1200), though all Hittite dates are approximate, their hieroglyphic inscriptions furnishing no king-lists with precise regnal years. Pitkhana of Kussara founded a major dynasty W of the Halys River about 1850 B.C. His son Anitta broke a rival coalition, took Khattusa itself, and subdued all Asia Minor. The dating of Anitta's son Tudkhaliya I at about 1750 B.C. renders improbable his proposed equation with Tidal, the opponent of Abraham (Gen. 14). Detailed Hittite history begins with the Syrian raids of Labarna I (1650). His grandson, Mursil I, then succeeded in capturing Aleppo in 1570, and 20 years later sacked Babylon itself. After his assassination, however, traditional Hittite feudalism reasserted itself against weaker successors. During the early 15th century, Egypt swept N to the Euphrates; and, upon Egyptian recession, the conquering Hebrews under Joshua overwhelmed the Palestinian Hittites (1406-1400 B.C.; Josh, 9:1, 11:3).

Meanwhile, Anatolia regained capable sovereigns (cf. Judg. 1:26), who capitalized upon the newly introduced horse-drawn war chariot (I Kings 10:29). Suppiluliuma (1385-1345), greatest of the New Empire monarchs, began his reign by instigating disorders within the nominally Egyptian states of Syro-Palestine (compare the contemporaneous raids of Cushan-rishathaim of Mesopotamia; Judg. 3:8). Eventually Suppiluliuma absorbed Hurrian Mitanni, extending his borders to Lebanon, and brought order to the entire west, securing Israel's 40 years of peace under Othniel (3:11). His son, Mursil II (1340-1310), inherited the most powerful monarchy of his time.

With the rise of the Nineteenth Dynasty in the 1320's, a revived Egypt challenged Hittite supremacy, leaving Moab free to oppress Israel (3:12-14). But after defeating the Hittites on the Orontes, Pharaoh Seti I came to terms with Mursil. The famous treaty of 1315 divided the Near East into spheres of influence: Syria and the north to Heth; Phoenicia, Canaan, and the south to Egypt. The stability that resulted is then reflected in Israel's 80 years of peace following upon the victories of Ehud and Shamgar (3:30-31). Shortly before the death of Muwatal (1310-1295), Rameses II aggressively broke his father's treaty. He survived a close but desperate struggle at Kadesh on the Orontes, against superior Hittite tactics; but years of indecisive fighting followed, and in 1279 Khattusil III (1290-1260) achieved a renewal of the former treaty. Its terms were strictly enforced for the next half-century. Hittite decay ensued. The last significant monarch, Khattusil's grandson Arnuwanda III (1230-1200), suffered famine and civil revolt. Finally, invading "sea-peoples" from the west, part of that general movement in which the Achaeans of Thessaly took Troy and Crete, overwhelmed Anatolia, burned Khattusa, and forever destroyed the Hittite Empire.

Hittite culture, however, survived for another half-millennium in the city-states of Syria to the S. King Toi of Hamath, 1000 B.C., supported David (II Sam. 8:9-10); and Hittite warriors served among his heroes (I Sam. 28:6; II Sam. 11:3, 23:39). Solomon reduced the Palestinian Hittites to bondservice (I Kings 9:20), but one of Ahab's major allies against Assyria at the battle of Qarqar in 853 was Irkhuleni of Hamath. The Hittite stronghold of Carchemish fell to the Assyrians only in 717 B.C. (cf. II Kings 19:13). Independency continually plagued the Hittites and their law codes exhibit mildness toward the feudal aristocracy. This indeed produced a commendable humanitarianism, in restricted death penalties and regard for womankind. But it also legitimatized serious moral laxity. In the service of their depraved mother-goddess of fertility, "Diana of the Ephesians" (Acts 19:24-35), the Hittites became guilty of "a bestiality of which we would gladly think them innocent" and which corrupted God's people Israel (Ezek. 16:44-45). HIVITES (hī'vīts, Heb. hiwwî) one of the seven nations of the land of Canaan which Jehovah delivered into the hand of Joshua (Josh. 24:11) "the Amorite, and the Perizzite, and the Canaanite, and the Hittite, and the Girgashite, the Hivite and the Jebusite." They are generally named in conjunction with other tribes of the land. In the original table of the nations (Gen. 10) they are listed with the Canaanite descendants of Ham, Noah's youngest son. All of these differed characteristically from the Japhethites who moved westward to the Mediterranean, northward into northern Europe and eastward toward Persia and India. They differed also from the Semites who later occupied Mesopotamia, Palestine and Arabia. The word "Hivite" probably comes from a word meaning a "village of nomads" and they seem to have been located in diverse places. In the time of Jacob, the city of Shechem, in the middle of Palestine, was ruled by the son of Hamor, the Hivite, the prince of the land (Gen. 34:2). They seem to have been a peaceable commercial people (Gen. 34:21), though with Canaanite morals.

Later in Joshua's time, "the Hivite under Hermon in the land of Mizpah" is mentioned, locating them in the land E of the Sea of Galilee; and in Joshua 9:1,7 the people of Gibeon just a few miles N of Jerusalem are classified as "Hivites." This indefiniteness of locality (or at least variety of locality) plus the derivation of the word would make it seem that the Hivites were not a compact tribe, like the Jebusites of Jerusalem (Josh. 15:63) nor representatives of a great nation, like the Hittites, nor descendants of one person like the Moabites and the Ammonites (Gen. 19:37,38), but villagers moving from place to place as business or politics dictated. The latest reference to them is when Solomon raised a levy from their remnants to do task-work for him (II Chron. 8:7). Some scholars doubt whether they ever had a separate existence. There is a possibility that they were the same as the Horites. A.B.F.

HIZKIAH, HIZKIJAH (hīz-kī'à, hīz-kī'jà), found twice in KJV but in each case should be Hezekiah as in ASV. 1. The great-great-grandfather of Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1) given to show his relationship with king Josiah.

2. One of the covenanters with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:17).

HOBAB (hō'băb, Heb. hōvāv, beloved), a person who is named only twice in the Bible. In Numbers 10:29 he is called "the son of Reuel, the Midianite, Moses' father-in-law" which would seem quite clearly to make him a brother of Zipporah (Exod. 18:2) and brother-in-law of Moses. In Judges 4:11 KJV speaks of "Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses" while ASV with more deference to logic reads "Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses." It is true that the Hebrew word generally refers to one who gives his daughter in marriage, but words of relationship are used loosely by the Orientals, and the whole story fits together better by making him Moses' brother-in-law. Moses pleaded with Hobab to serve with him as a guide to Israel in the wilderness, which the aged Jethro or Reuel could hardly have done, even if he desired to leave his work as the priest of Midian. Hobab at first refused, but finally consented (Num. 10:29; Judg. 1:16; 4:11).

HOBAH (hō'bà), a place N of Damascus to which Abram pursued the captors of his nephew Lot (Gen. 14:15).

HOD (hŏd, majesty), a man of the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:37).

HODAIAH (hō-dā'yà), a son of Elioenai, a descendant of the royal line of Judah. (I Chron. 3:24). ASV, RSV, Hodaviah.

HODAVIAH (hō'dà-vī'à). 1. A chief of the half tribe of Manasseh, E of Jordan (I Chron. 5:24).

2. The son of Hasenuah, a Benjamite (I Chron. 9:7).

3. A Levite and founder of the family of the Ben-hodaviah (Ezra 2:40). Also called Hodevah (Neh. 7:43) and Judah (Ezra 3:9).

HODESH (hō'dĕsh), a wife of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:9).

HODEVAH (See Hodaviah)

HODIAH (hō-dī'à), according to KJV (I Chron. 4:19), a "wife," but ASV, RSV show that Hodiah was a man who married the sister of Naham, and who was reckoned in the tribe of Judah. See HODIJAH.

HODIJAH (hō-dī'jà). 1. A Levite of the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 8:7; 9:5; 10:10, 13).

2. A chief of the people under Nehemiah (Neh. 10:18).

HOGLAH (hŏg'là), one of the five daughters of Zelophehad, a Manassite. Their father having no sons, a new law was made, permitting daughters to inherit, provided they did not marry outside the tribe (Num. 26:33; 27:1-11; 36:1-12; Josh. 17:3,4).

HOHAM (hō'hăm), an Amorite king of Hebron, who entered into league with other kings against Joshua; one of the five kings captured in the cave of Makkedah and put to death (Josh. 10:3).

HOLINESS, HOLY, usually translate words derived from a Heb. root qadash and Greek hag-. The basic meaning of qadash is separateness, withdrawal. It is first applied to God, and is early associated with ideas of purity and righteousness. Long before the prophetic period the ethical content is plain. Greek hag- is an equivalent of qadash and its history is similar. Beginning as an attribute of deity the hag- family of words developed two stems, one meaning "holy," the other "pure." The use of words of this family in the LXX to translate the qadash family resulted in a great development of their ethical sense, which was never clear in classical Greek. What became increasingly evident in the OT is overwhelmingly explicit in the NT: that holiness means the pure, loving nature of God, separate from evil, aggressively seeking to universalize itself; that this character inheres in places, times and institutions intimately associated with worship; and that it is to characterize human beings who have entered into personal relations with God.

The words "holiness, holy" do not occur in Genesis, though implied in the dread which the presence of God inspires (Gen. 28:16,17), but from Exodus 3:5 on, where God reveals His name and nature, holiness is constantly stressed. Only samples of the many Biblical references will be given. God is "glorious in holiness" (Exod. 15:11); He acts with "his holy arm" (Isa. 52:10); His words and promises are holy (Jer. 23:9; Ps. 105:42); His name is holy (Lev. 20:3; I Chron. 29:16); His Spirit is holy (Isa. 63:10; 11; Ps. 51:10, see separate article, HOLY SPIRIT). Places are made holy by God's special presence: His dwelling in heaven (Deut. 26:15); His manifestation on earth (Exod. 3:5; Josh 5:15); the tabernacle (Exod. 40:9); the temple (II Chron. 29:5,7); Jerusalem (Isa. 48:2); Zion (Obad. 17). Anything set apart for sacred uses was holy: the altars and other furniture of the tabernacle (Exod. 30:10,29; 29:37); animal sacrifices (Num. 18:17); food (Lev. 21:22); the tithe (Lev. 27:30); first fruits (Lev. 23:20; 19:24); anything consecrated (Exod. 28:38); the anointing oil and incense (Exod. 30:23-25,34-38). Persons connected with holy places and holy services were holy: priests (Lev. 21:1-6) and their garments (Exod. 28:2,4); Israel as a nation (Jer. 2:3); individually (Deut. 33:3); many things connected with Israel (I Chron. 16:29). Times given to worship were holy (Exod. 16:23; 20:8; 12:16; Isa. 58:13).

In classical Greek hágios was first applied to sanctuaries; in Hellenistic times, to gods; then to the Mysteries (of Dionysos, etc.). Hágios came into frequent use from Oriental religions in the Hellenistic period, which wide use explains its occurrence in the LXX as the equivalent of qdsh. In the NT the holiness of things is less prominent than that of persons. What in Isaiah 6:3 was a personal revelation to the prophet is proclaimed to all from heaven in Revelation 4:8, with power and glory. God is holy and true (Rev. 6:10). Jesus prays, "Holy Father" (John 17:11). I Peter 1:15 repeats the assertion of God's holiness and the exhortation to His people to be holy, of Leviticus 19:2. Jesus' disciples are to pray that the name of God may be treated as holy (Matt. 6:9; Luke 11:2). The holiness of Jesus Christ is specifically stressed. Evil spirits recognized Him as "the holy one of God" who has come to destroy them (Mark 1:24; Luke 4:34). Jesus is holy because of His wondrous birth (Luke 1:35). The Father "hath sanctified" Him, declared Him and made Him holy (John 10:36). He is "holy and true" Rev. 3:7). To the Jerusalem church Jesus is "the holy one" (Acts 3:14), the "holy child Jesus" (Acts 4:27,30), fulfilling the prophecy of Isaiah 42:1-4, quoted in Matthew 12:16-21. In Hebrews 9 Christ is the fulfillment of OT priesthood and sacrifice, in both of which capacities He must be holy (sanctified, Heb. 2:11). Holiness in connection with the Holy Spirit is treated in a separate article, HOLY SPIRIT.

The holiness of the Church is developed in the NT. As in the OT, Jerusalem is holy (Matt. 4:5; 27:53; Rev. 11:2), so is the temple (Matt. 24:15; Acts 6:13) and the new temple, the church; collectively (Eph. 2:21,22) and individually (I Cor. 3:16,17). Stephen refers to Mt. Sinai as "holy ground" (Acts 7:33) and Peter to the Mount of Transfiguration as "the Holy Mount (II Peter 1:18). The Scriptures are holy (Rom. 1:2; II Tim. 3:15). The law is holy (Rom. 7:12). Since the earthly holy place, priests, cult apparatus, sacrifices and services were holy, much more are the heavenly (Heb. 8:5). The Church is a holy nation (I Pet. 2:9; 1:16). The argument of Romans 11:11-32 rests the holiness of Gentile Christians on their growing out of the root (11:16) of Jesse (Rom. 15:12). Christ died for the Church in order to make it holy (Eph. 5:26; I Cor. 1:2, sanctified in Christ Jesus I Cor. 6:11). Gentile Christians are now "no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the Jewish Christian "saints" (holy ones, Eph. 2:19). Thus the Church as a whole, the local churches, and individual Christians, are holy, "called . . . saints" (Rom. 1:7; I Cor. 1:2; II Cor. 1:1; Eph. 1:1; Phil 1:1; Col. 1:2; "saints" translating hágioi, holy. The life of the individual Christian is to be a living, holy sacrifice (Rom. 12:1), not only through death (Phil. 2:17), but through life itself (Phil. 1:21-26). In the OT the sacrifice was a thing, separate from the offerer: in the NT it is the offerer himself. Holiness is equated with purity (Matt. 5:8; I Tim. 1:5; II Tim. 2:22; Tit. 1:15; Jas. 1:27; Matt. 23:26), a purity which in Acts 18;6; 20:26 is innocence . The means of purification is the truth of the Word of God (John 17:17). The "holy kiss," in the early churches, was a seal of holy fellowship (I Cor. 16:20; II Cor. 13:12; I Thess. 5:26). Holiness is prominent in the book of Revelation from 3:7 to 22:11.

Of other Hebrew and Greek words translated "holy," two must be mentioned. Heb. hāsîdh and its Greek equivalent hósios mean "good, kind, pious." Hāsîdh has many translations, hósios a few. Translated "holy," hāsîdh occurs in Deuteronomy 33:8; Psalms 16:10; 86:2; 89:19; 145:17. Hósios occurs in Acts 2:27; 13:35, quoting Psalm 16:10. It or derivatives are found in Luke 1:75; Ephesians 4:24; I Timothy 2:8; Titus 1:8; Hebrews 7:26; Revelation 15:4.

Summary: the idea of holiness originates in the revealed character of God, and is communicated to things, places, times and persons engaged in His service. Its ethical nature grows clearer as revelation unfolds, until the holiness of God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, of the Church as a body, and of individual members of that body, fills the NT horizon. Holiness is interwoven with righteousness and purity. To seek holiness apart from the other qualities of a Christlike life, is to wander from the way of holiness itself. E.R.

HOLON (hō'lŏn). 1. A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:51) assigned to the Levites (called Hilen [hī'lĕn], in I Chron. 6:58); Khirbet 'Alin.

2. A town probably in the plain of Moab near Medeba (Jer. 48:21), site unknown.

HOLY OF HOLIES (See Tabernacle)

HOLY GHOST (See Holy Spirit)

HOLY PLACE (See Tabernacle)

HOLY SPIRIT (Gr. pneúma hágion, in KJV of NT, Holy Ghost), the Third Person of the Triune Godhead (Matt. 28:19; II Cor. 13:14).

That the Holy Spirit is a power, an influence, is plain from Acts 1:8; that He is a Person, the NT makes clear in detail: He dwells with us (John 14:17), teaches and brings to remembrance (14:26), bears witness (15:26), convinces of sin (16:8), guides, speaks, declares (16:13,15), inspires the Scriptures and speaks through them Acts 1:16; II Pet. 1:21), spoke to Philip (Acts 8:29), calls ministers (13:2), sends out workers (13:4), forbids certain actions (16:6,7), intercedes (Rom. 8:26), etc. He has the attributes of personality: will (I Cor. 12:11), mind (Rom. 8:27), thought, knowledge, words (I Cor. 2:10-13), love (Rom. 15:30). The Holy Spirit can be treated as a Person: lied to and tempted (Acts 5:3,4,9), resisted (Acts 7:51), grieved (Eph. 4;30), outraged (Heb. 10:29 RSV), blasphemed against (Matt. 12:31). The Holy Spirit is God; equated with the Father and the Son (Matt. 28:19; II Cor. 13:14). Jesus speaks of Him as of His other self (John 14:16,17) whose presence with the disciples will be of greater advantage than His own (John 16:7). To have the Spirit of God is to have Christ (Rom. 8:9-12). God is Spirit (John 4:24) in essential nature, and sends His Holy Spirit to live and work in men (John 14:26; 16:7).

The Heb. and Greek words translated "Spirit" are rûach and pneûma respectively, both meaning literally "wind, breath." Both came to be used for the unseen reality of living beings, especially God and man. (For the meaning of "Holy" see article HOLINESS). Therefore breath and wind are symbols of the Holy Spirit (Gen. 2:7; Job 32:8; 33:4; Ezek. 37:9,10; John 20:22). Other symbols are: the dove (Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 3:22; John 1:32) oil (Luke 4:18; Acts 10:38; I John 2:20); fire for purification (Matt: 3:11; Luke 3:16; Acts 2:3,4); living water (John 7: 37-39; 4:14; Isa. 44:3); earnest or guarantee of all that God has in store for us (II Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13,14). In the OT the Spirit of God appears from the beginning (Gen. 1:2); "My Spirit" (Gen. 6:3); and the Spirit of God comes upon certain men for special purposes (e.g., Bezaleel, Exod. 31:3; some Judges, Judg. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; David, I Sam. 16:13). This was temporary (e.g., Saul, I Sam. 10:10; 16:14); so David, repentant, prayed, "Take not the Holy Spirit from me" (Ps. 51:11). The Spirit of God is upon the Messiah (Isa. 11:2; 42:1; 61:1). God acts by His Spirit (Zech. 4:6).

In the Gospels as in the OT, the Holy Spirit comes upon certain persons for special reasons: John the Baptist and his parents (Luke 1:15,41, 67); Simeon (Luke 2:25-27); Jesus as a man (Matt. 1:18,20; 3:16; 4:1; Mark 1:8,10; Luke 1:35; 3:16,22; 4:1,14,18; John 1:32,33). Jesus promises the Holy Spirit in a new way to believers in Him (John 7:37-39, cf. 4:10-15); also as "the promise of the Father" in Luke 24:49; in detail, Acts 1:1-8. Jesus taught the nature and work of the Holy Spirit in John 14:16; 26; 15:26; 16:7-15). This work is: to dwell in the disciples as Comforter, Counselor, Advocate (Greek parákletos); to teach all things; to recall what Jesus had said; to testify of Jesus; to reprove the world of sin, righteousness and judgment; to guide the disciples into all truth; not to speak of Himself, but only what He hears; to show the disciples things to come; to glorify Jesus by showing the things of Jesus to them. The evening of the Resurrection, Jesus "breathed on" the disciples (Thomas being absent) and "saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost" (John 20:22). This was not the complete enduement of the Holy Spirit which Jesus taught and promised, and which came to pass at Pentecost; but it was provisional, and enabled the disciples to persevere in prayer until the promised day.

At Pentecost a new phase of the revelation of God to men began (Acts 2); as new as that when the Word became flesh in the birth of Jesus. With the rushing of a mighty wind and the appearing of cloven tongues like fire, the disciples were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and spoke in foreign languages (listed in 2:9-11). The excitement drew a crowd of visitors to the feast, to whom Peter explained that the prophecy of Joel 2:28-32 was being fulfilled, in accordance with the salvation which Jesus of Nazareth had wrought in dying on the cross. Three thousand souls were added by baptism to the 120 disciples, and thus began the fellowship of apostolic teaching, of breaking of bread and of prayer, which is the Church. When the first crisis which threatened the extinction of the early church was passed, again "they were all filled with the Holy Ghost" (Acts 4:31) binding them more closely together. When the first Gentiles were converted, the Holy Spirit was poured out on them and they spoke in tongues (Acts 10:44-48); likewise when Paul met a group of John the Baptist's disciples (Acts 19:1-7).

The NT is full of the work of the Holy Spirit in the lives of believers (Rom. 8:1-27): e.g., His gifts (I Cor. 12-14); that our "body is the temple of the Holy Ghost" (I Cor. 6:19); "the fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22,23). Being "filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5:18) we shall experience Christ living within us (Rom. 8:9,10). As the heavenly Father is God, and His Son Jesus Christ is God, so the Holy Spirit is God. The Holy Spirit as well as the Son was active in creation; on occasion acts in His own Person in OT times; more intensively in the gospels; and in Acts and the epistles becomes the resident divine Agent in the Church and in its members. Teaching concerning the Holy Spirit has been both neglected and distorted, but the subject deserves careful attention as one reads the NT. E.R.

HOMAM (hō'măm), son of Lotan and grandson of Seir (I Chron. 1:39). Also called Hemam (Gen. 36:22 KJV; Heman in ASV, RSV).

HOMER (See Weights and Measures)

HONEY (Heb. devash, Gr. méli, honey), at first rare (Gen. 43:11), found wild in clefts of the rocks (Deut. 32:13; Ps. 81:16), in the comb on the ground (I Sam. 14:25-43). Job 20:17 speaks of brooks of honey and butter, indicating abundance due to domestication of bees. Canaan is "a land flowing with milk and honey (from Exod. 3:8 to Ezek. 20:15). Assyria is so referred to (II Kings 18:32). Honey is a product of Palestine (Jer. 41:8; Ezek. 27:17). Samson ate wild honey found in the carcass of a lion (Judg. 14:8-18). Honey became a common food (II Sam. 17:29) even in times of scarcity (Isa. 7:15,22). No honey was put in a sacrifice but it was a first fruits offering (Lev. 2:11; II Chron. 31:5). Strained honey was kept in a jar or cruse (I Kings 14:3). Honey as food is recognized and recommended, but in moderation (Ezek. 16:13,19; Prov. 24:13; 25:16,27; 27:7). Honey is a standard of comparison for pleasant things, good or bad (S. of Sol. 4:11; 5:1; Prov. 16:24; 5:3; Ezek. 3:3; Rev. 10:9). John the Baptist ate honey (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6). The risen Jesus ate a honeycomb Luke 24:42 KJV. ASV, RSV omit "honeycomb").

HOOD (See Dress: Headdress)

HOOK, the translation of several Heb. words: 1. 'aghmôn, reed, Job 41:2a, where a rope of rushes is meant (ASV, RSV). 2. Wāw, hook or peg of gold or silver, used to support the hangings of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:32,37; 27:10,17; 36:36,38; 38:10-19,28). 3. Hah, hook, ring, fetter (II Kings 19:28; Isa. 37:29; Ezek. 29:4; 38:4). 4. Hakkâh, angle, hook, fishhook (Job 41:1a RSV). 5. Tsinnâh, thorn, hook (Amos 4:2a). 6. Shephattayîm, hook-shaped pegs, double hooks (Ezek. 40:43). 7 Fleshhook, mazlēgh, probably a small pitchfork with two or three tines, (Exod. 27:3; RSV forks). 8. Pruning hook, mazemērôth, a sickle-shaped knife for pruning vines. 9. Hôah, hook (Job 41:2b RSV; KJV has "thorn," which is probably right). 10. The Greek word, occurring only once in the NT, is ágkistron, fishing hook (Matt. 17:27), a word as old as Homer (Odyssey 4:369).

HOOPOE (See Birds)

HOPE, with faith and love, is a gift of the Holy Spirit which abides, an essential characteristic of the Christian when prophecies, tongues and knowledge pass away (I Cor. 13:8,13). The Greek noun elpis and related verbs are translated "hope," but KJV has "faith" in Hebrews 10:23 and "trusted" in Ephesians 1:12. The Biblical concept of hope is not mere expectation and desire, as in Greek literature, but includes trust, confidence, refuge in God, the God of hope (Rom. 15:13). Christ in you is the hope of glory (Col. 1:27). All creation hopes for redemption (Rom. 8:19-25 RSV). Christ Jesus is our hope (I Tim. 1:1 RSV). Hope of eternal life is bound up with "that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of . . . . Jesus Christ" (Tit. 1:2; 2:13), which motivates purity (I John 3:3). Hope is linked with faith (Heb. 11:1). It depends on the resurrection of Christ (I Cor. 15:19). Hope is little spoken of in the Gospels, while Jesus is on earth, and in Revelation, where He is again present in His own person. The Acts and Epistles are full of this Christ-centered hope. The hope which animated Paul (Acts 26:6-8) was "the hope of Israel" (Acts 28:20). In the OT "hope" translates a variety of Heb. words in KJV, which mean "confidence, trust, safety," etc., and are so translated in ASV, RSV. NT hope has deep roots in the OT.

E.R.

HOPHNI (hŏf'nī, Heb. hophnî), a son of Eli, the high priest and judge who proved unworthy of his sacred offices (I Sam. 1:3; 2:34; 4:4,17). Hophni is always associated with his brother Phinehas. The two were partners in evil practices and brought a curse upon their heads (I Sam. 2:34; 3:14). Both were slain at the battle of Aphek and this, coupled with the loss of the Ark, caused the death of Eli (I Sam. 4:17,18). Both sons disgraced their priestly office, in claiming and appropriating more than their share of the sacrifices (I Sam. 2:13-17), and in their immoral actions in the tabernacle (I Sam. 2:22; Amos 2:6-8).

HOR (hôr, Heb. hōr, mountain). 1. A conspicuous mountain, probably a day's march N or NE of Kadesh-barnea, where Aaron died and was buried (Num. 20:22-29; 33:37-41; Deut. 32:50), perhaps Jebel Maderah, a prominent, steep-sided white chalk hill. Hence Israel set out to march S toward the Red Sea (Num. 31:4), which fact renders possible the earlier identification with Jebel Neby Hārūn, SE of Kadesh-barnea, although this site is well within the borders of Edom in Mt. Seir, with which kingdom Israel had not yet made contact. 2. A mountain on the N border of the land given to the Israelites, between the Great Sea (Mediterranean) and the entrance of Hamath (Num. 34:7,8), variously identified, with no certainty as yet possible.

HORAM (hō'răm), a king of Gezer, defeated and slain by Joshua (Josh. 10:33).

HOREB (hō'rĕb, drought, desert), the mountain where Moses received his commission (Exod. 3:1); where he brought water out of the rock (Exod. 17:6); where the people stripped off their ornaments in token of repentance (Exod. 33:6); eleven days' journey from Kadesh-barnea (Deut. 1:2); mentioned also in Deuteronomy 1:6, 19; 4:10,15; 5:2; 9:8; 18:16; I Kings 8:9; II Chronicles 5:10; Psalm 106:19; Malachi 4:4, in connection with the journeys of Israel, the giving of the law, and events of the year in which the Israelites stayed nearby. Elijah fled hither (I Kings 19:8). It is geographically indistinguishable from Sinai.

HOREM (hō'rĕm, consecrated), a fortified city in Naphtali, near Iron (Josh 19:38), unidentified.

HOR-HAGIDGAD (hôr'hă-gĭd'găd, hollow or cavern of Gilgad), an Israelite camp in the wilderness, between Bene-jaakan and Jotbathah (Num. 33:32, 33), called Gudgodah in Deuteronomy 10:7. See GUDGODAH.

HORI (hō'rī, cave-dweller). 1. A son of Seir, a Horite, and founder of the Horites (Gen. 36:22, 29,30; I Chron. 1:39).

2. A Simeonite whose son Shaphat was one of the spies (Num. 13:5).

HORIM (See Horites)

HORITE, HORIM (hō'rīt, hō'rĭm), a people found in Mount Seir as early as the time of Abraham, and conquered by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen. 14:6); the early inhabitants, before the Edomites dispossessed them and intermarried with them (Gen. 36:20-30; Deut. 2:12,22). Esau married the daughter of one of their chieftains, also called a Hivite (Gen. 36:2). The Hivites are thought to be identical with, or else confused with, the Horites (Gen. 34:2; Josh. 9:7), in which case the Horites lived as far N as Gibeon and Shechem in the time of Jacob's sons, and till the conquest under Joshua. The LXX makes this identification. The Horites are now commonly thought to be Hurrians, from the highlands of Media, who before the middle of the second millennium B.C. overspread the region from Media to the Mediterranean, forming, or being merged in, the kingdom of Mitanni, subsequently destroyed by the Hittites . The Horites of Palestine then would be enclaves of this once-conquering race left behind when their empire receded before the Hittite advance. The Hurrian nobles appear to have been Aryans, the peasants non-Aryans, whether Semites or other, perhaps Armenoids, is not settled. The Hurrian language is in process of being deciphered, so that further investigation should clear up a picture which is at present confused.

HORMAH (hôr'mà, Heb. hormâh, a devoted place), perhaps Tell es-Sheriah, N of the road and about midway between Gaza and Beer-sheba. Here the disobedient Israelites were defeated by Amalekites and Canaanites (Num. 14:45; Deut. 1:44). In war with the king of Arad the place was taken by the Israelites, and given the name Hormah, meaning "devoted," because it was devoted to destruction (Num. 21:1-3). In the list of kings conquered by Joshua it appears with Arad (Josh. 12:14). Hormah was originally given to Judah (Josh. 15:30), but shortly after allotted to Simeon (Josh. 19:4), because the portion of the tribe of Judah was too large for them. Judges 1:17 relates that it was Judah and Simeon who subdued Zephath and renamed it Hormah. David sent part of the spoil of Ziklag to Hormah, as one of the cities of Judah (I Sam. 30:26-30), but Hormah was reckoned among the cities of Simeon "until the reign of David" (I Chron. 4:30).

HORN (Heb. and Aram. qeren, Gr. kéras, an animal horn). Inkhorn (Ezek. 9:2,3,11) is Heb. qeseth, translated "writing case" in RSV. In Joshua 6, Heb. yôvēl, from a root meaning "ram," a word which has puzzled interpreters. In the context here and elsewhere it appears to refer to the ram's horns which were blown on solemn occasions, and whose use gave rise to the term "Jubilee" for the 50th year of release, "the year of the ram's (horn), Qeren referred to the horn on the animal (Gen. 22:13); used as a musical instrument (Josh. 6:5; I Chron. 25:5, but RSV has "to exalt him"); or as a vessel to hold liquids (I Sam. 16:1,13; I Kings 1:39). Tusks are meant in Ezekiel 27:15, and so RSV).

The "horns of the altar" were of one piece with the frame of the altar of burnt offering, made of acacia wood overlaid with bronze (Exod. 27:2; cf. Ezek. 43:15); likewise the altar of incense (Exod. 30:2; 37:26; cf. Rev. 9:13), but overlaid with gold. Blood of sacrificial animals was on certain occasions put on the horns of both altars (Exod. 30:10; Lev. 4:7,18,25,30,34; 16:18; cf. Ezek. 43:20). To cut off its horns rendered an altar useless for religious purposes (Amos 3:14). A person seeking sanctuary might catch hold of the horns of the altar in the temple, but this did not save Adonijah (I Kings 1:50; 51; 2:28-34). Jeremiah felt that the sin of Judah was engraved on the horns of their altars (Jer. 17:1). The purpose of altar horns is in doubt. "Bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar" (Ps. 118:27) is not thought to reflect the normal practice, and RSV translates "Bind the festal procession with branches, up to the horns of the altar." Horns represent aggressive force (Dan. 8:7 literally; I Kings 22:11; II Chron. 18:10 symbolically; Deut. 33:17; Ps. 22:21; 92:10; Zech. 1:18-21; Luke 1:69, etc., figuratively). Horns in Habakkuk 3:4 are translated "rays" in ASV, RSV, because of the context (light). Multiple horns on one animal denote successive nations or rulers (Dan. 7:7-24; 8:3-22; Rev. 13:1; 17:3-16), "7" with "horns" (Rev. 5:6; 12:3) indicates perfection of power, good or evil. The beast with two horns like a lamb, which spoke like a dragon (Rev. 13:11) suggests outward lamblikeness and inward wickedness. E.R.

HORNET (See Insects)

HORONAIM (hôr-ō-nā'ĭm, two hollows, caves or ravines), a place in Moab, location uncertain (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:3,5,34).

HORONITE (hôr'ō-nīt), a designation of Sanballat (Neh. 2:10,19; 13:28), probably indicating Moabite origin (from Beth-horon or Horonaim).

HORSE (See Animals)

HORSE GATE, one of the gates of Jerusalem, between the Water Gate and the Sheep Gate; probably near the SE corner of the city (Neh. 3:28-32; Jer. 31:38-40). Here Athaliah was killed by order of Jehoiada the priest (II Kings 11:16; II Chron. 23:15).

HORSE LEECH (Heb. 'ălûqâh), a carnivorous or bloodsucking worm which clings to the flesh. There is only one reference to it in the Bible (Prov. 30:15). The RVm substitutes vampire, a ghoul believed to haunt graves and suck human blood.

HOSAH (hō'sà, Heb. hōsâh, refuge). 1. A town on the N border of Asher, near Tyre; site uncertain (Josh. 19:29).

2. A Levite porter selected by David to be one of the first doorkeepers to the ark after its return (I Chron. 16:38; 26:10,11,16).

HOSANNA (hō-zăn'à, Heb. hôsa'-nā', Gr. hosanná, save now), originally a prayer, "Save, now, pray" (Ps. 118:25), which had lost its primary meaning and became an exclamation of praise (Matt. 21:9,15; Mark 11:9,10; John 12:13). That it is transliterated instead of translated in three of the Gospels (Luke omits it) is evidence of the change of meaning. Not that the Heb. word no longer had any connection with salvation: the context, which is a reminiscence of Psalm 118:25,26, if not a direct quotation from or allusion to it, shows that in its application to God the Father and to Jesus, Hosanna was concerned with the Messianic salvation.

HOSEA (Heb. hôshēa', Gr. Oseé, salvation). Of all the prophetic material contained in the Old Testament, the writings of Hosea were the only ones to emerge from the northern kingdom of Israel. This notable eighth century B.C. prophet lived during a period of great national anxiety. He was born during the reign of Jeroboam II (c. 786-746 B.C.), the last great king of Israel, and according to the superscription of his book (1:1) he exercised his prophetic ministry in Israel when Uzziah (c. 783-743 B.C.), Jotham (c. 742-735 B.C.), Ahaz (c. 735-715 B.C.) and Hezekiah (c. 715-686 B.C.) reigned in Judah. While Hosea made no mention of the events referred to in Isaiah 7:1 and II Kings 16:5, he certainly experienced the raids of the Assyrian ruler Tiglath-pileser III on Galilee and Transjordan in 733 B.C.

The time of Hosea was marked by great material prosperity. Under Jeroboam II the northern kingdom experienced a degree of economic and commercial development unknown since the early days of the united kingdom. The development of city life attracted many people from the agricultural pursuits which had formed the basis of the Israelite economy, and this presented serious problems at a later time. Characteristic of this period was the rise of successful middle-class businessmen, which was offset by the appearance of an urban proletariat. The latter came into being because of the wanton demands made by the luxury-loving upper classes upon the increasingly impoverished peasants and smallholders. As the latter succumbed to economic pressure they were compelled to abandon their property and seek whatever employment was available in urban centers. Thus there resulted an ominous social gap between the upper and lower classes, which was a serious portent for the future of the national economy.

While there is no reference to the occupation of Beeri, father of Hosea, he may well have been a middle-class merchant, perhaps a baker. Hosea himself was an educated person, and probably hailed from a town in Ephraim or Manasseh. A man of profound spiritual vision, he was gifted with intellectual qualities which enabled him to comprehend the significance of those unhappy events which marked his domestic life and interpret them as a timely reminder of Divine love towards a wayward, sinful Israel.

Ever since the days of Joshua the religious life of the Israelites had been dominated by the influence of corrupt Canaanite worship. Archaeological discoveries in northern Syria have uncovered a great deal of information about the religion of the Canaanites, who had occupied Palestine from an early period (Gen. 12:6). This seductive worship had already gained a firm foothold in Israelite religious life before the Judges period, and by the time of Amos and Hosea Canaanite cult-worship had become the religion of the masses.

The deities chiefly venerated were the fertility god Baal (from a word meaning "lord," "master" or "husband") and his consort Anat (sometimes known as Asherah or Ashtoreth), a savage, sensual female. Both deities were often worshiped under the form of bulls and cows, so that when Jeroboam I set up two golden calves, one at Dan and the other at Bethel (I Kings 12:28), he was encouraging the people to indulge in the fertility religion of Canaan.

The cultic rites were celebrated several times each year, and were marked by drunkenness, ritual prostitution, acts of violence and indulgence in pagan forms of worship at the shrines. The widespread prevalence of cultic prostitution is evident from the fact that in Jeremiah's day, a century after the time of Hosea, prostitution flourished in the temple precincts (II Kings 23:7).

Hosea saw that this form of worship was the exact opposite of what God desired of His people. The emphasis of the Sinaitic covenant was upon the exclusive worship of Jehovah by a nation holy unto the Lord. However, the religious life of the covenant people had degenerated to the point of becoming identified with the shameless immoral worship of the pagan Canaanite deities. The emphasis upon unbridled sexual activity coupled with excessive indulgence in alcohol was sapping the vitality not only of the Canaanites but also of Israel. All this, carried out against a background of magic and pagan mythology, was vastly removed from the purity of worship contemplated in the Sinai covenant.

It was Hosea's primary duty to recall wayward Israel to its obligations under the agreement made at Sinai. On that occasion Israel had voluntarily made a pact with God which involved surrender, loyalty and obedience. As a result Israel had become God's son (11:1; cf. Exod. 4:22) by adoption and Divine grace. Of necessity the initiative had come from God. But Hosea saw that it was important to emphasize the free co-operative acceptance of that relationship by the Israelites. Hence he stressed that Israel was really God's bride (2:7,16,19) and employed the marriage metaphor to demonstrate the voluntary association of the Bride with her Divine Lover.

His own marital experience (chapters 1-3) was made a parable for all to see. He was commanded to marry a woman who would subsequently be unfaithful, to have children by her, and to give them symbolic names indicating Divine displeasure with Israel. After Gomer has pursued her paramours she was to be brought back and with patient love readmitted to his home, there to await in penitence and grief the time of restoration to full favor. This was a clear picture of wayward Israel in its relationship with God, and showed the unending faithfulness of the Almighty.

The remainder of the prophecy (chapters 4-14) is an indictment of Israel, delivered at various times from the later days of Jeroboam II up to about 730 B.C. The style of this section is vigorous, though the Hebrew text has suffered in transmission, making for difficulties in translation. The first three chapters have been regarded by some as allegorical, and though the book is generally held to be a unity, critical writers have maintained that interpolations and editorial material occur throughout the work.

R.K.H.

HOSHAIAH (hō-shā'yà, Heb. hôsha'yâh, Jehovah has saved). 1. The man who led half the princes of Judah and walked behind the chorus at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:32).

2. The father of Jezaniah (Jer. 42:1) or Azariah (Jer. 43:2), who opposed Jeremiah after the fall of Jerusalem (Jer. 42:1-43:7, see ASV, RSV). If Jaazaniah of II Kings 25:23; Jeremiah 40:8 is the same Jezaniah, this Hoshaiah was a Maacathite.

HOSHAMA (hōsh'à-mà), a son of Jeconiah or Jehoiachin, captive king of Judah (I Chron. 3:18).

HOSHEA (hō-shē'à, Heb. hôshēa', salvation). 1. Joshua's earlier name, changed by Moses (Num. 13:8,16 ASV, RSV; Deut. 32:44 RSV Joshua).

2. The son of Azaziah and prince of Ephraim in David's reign (I Chron. 27:20).

3. A son of Elah; the last king of the northern kingdom (II Kings 15:30; 17:1-6; 18:1-10).

4. A chief ruler under Nehemiah, who with others signed the covenant (Neh. 10:23).

HOSPITALITY (hŏs'pĭ-tăl'ĭ-tē, Gr. philoxenía, loving strangers). Although the word occurs but few times in the Bible (I Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:8; I Pet. 4:9; Heb. 13:2 RSV), the idea appears as early as Abraham (Gen. 14:17-19). One might be entertaining angels unawares (Heb. 13:2) as Abraham did (Gen. 18), graciously inviting chance passers-by, having their feet washed, preparing fresh meat, having his wife bake bread (vss. 1-8), accompanying them when they left (v. 16). Lot entertained the same angels (Gen. 19). The extreme to which protection of a stranger might be carried is illustrated in verses 4-9. Rebekah showed kindness to Abraham's servant, giving him and his camels water, and receiving gold ornaments as a reward (Gen. 24:15-28). Laban seconded her hospitality (vss. 29-31). Jacob fared well in the same household (Gen. 29:1-14). Joseph's hospitality to his brothers had a purpose (Gen. 43:15-34). As a refugee, Moses found welcome with Reuel, after helping his daughters water their flocks (Exod. 2: 13-22). Manoah entertained an angel (Judg. 13: 2-23), combining hospitality with a burnt offering. The plight of a stranger in a city where only one old man showed the ancient virtue of hospitality is told in Judges 19:11-28. Solomon entertained lavishly (I Kings 4:22); Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:2-8); Vashti (Esth. 1:9); Esther's dinners were private and purposeful (Esth. 5:4-8; 7:1-10). Jezebel fed 850 prophets (I Kings 18:19). The common people continued to entertain (I Sam. 28:21-25; II Kings 4:8-10). Nehemiah regularly entertained 150 (Neh. 5:17). The Law enjoined kindness to strangers (Lev. 19:33,34). Jesus exercised hospitality when He fed 5,000 (Matt. 14:15-21; Mark 6:35-44; Luke 9:12-17; John 6:4-13), 4,000 (Matt. 15:32-38; Mark 8:1-9); after the resurrection (John 21:4-13), and received hospitality from grudging Pharisees (Luke 7:36-50; 14:1-14); in a home at Bethany (Luke 10:38-42; Matt. 21:17; 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9; John 12:1-8); from Zacchaeus, self-invited (Luke 19:5-10); for the Last Supper (Matt. 26:17-30; Mark 14:12-26; Luke 22:7-39; John 13:1-18:1); at Emmaus (Luke 24:29-32). Jesus taught hospitality in Luke 10:30-37 by the parable of the Good Samaritan, and told His disciples where they would and would not find it (Matt. 10:11-15; Luke 10:5-12). Apostles were entertained and churches begun in homes (Acts 1:13; 9:43; 10:1-48; 12:12; 16:15,34; 18:3,7; 20:8, 20; 21:8,16; 28:30; Rom. 16:5; I Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15). The letters to Philemon, II and III John exhibit and exhort to hospitality. E.R.

HOST. In the OT: 1. Oftenest Heb. tsāvā', army (Gen. 21:22 RSV army); angels (Ps. 103:21; Josh. 5:14 RSV army; Dan. 8:11); heavenly bodies (Deut. 4:19); creation (Gen. 2:1); God of hosts (I Sam. 17:45). 2. Heb. hayil, army (Exod. 14:4). 3. Twice Heb. hêl (II Kings 18:17 ASV, RSV army; Obad. 20 RSV army). 4. Heb mahanēh, oftener translated "camp"; (Exod. 32:27 RSV army; Exod. 14:24). The above references are only samples.

Host occurs but four times in the NT: 1. Gr. stratiá, army (Luke 2:13 angels; Acts 7:42 heavenly bodies as objects of worship). 2. Gr. xénos, guest, also host (Rom. 16:23). 3. Gr. pandoxeús, one who receives all comers (Luke 10:35 RSV innkeeper).

HOSTAGE (Heb. ben-ta'ărûvôth, son of pledges). Jehoash (Joash), King of Israel, took hostages after his victory over Judah, to ensure that King Amaziah would keep the peace.

HOTHAM (hō'thăm), a son of Heber, of the family of Beriah. An Asherite (I Chron. 7:32). See also HOTHAN.

HOTHAN (hō'thăn), an Aroerite, whose two sons Shama and Jehiel were among David's heroes (I Chron. 11:44; ASV, RSV have Hotham).

HOTHIR (hō'thēr), the 13th son of Henan, David's seer and singer. A Kohathite (I Chron. 25:4,28).

HOUGH (hŏk, Heb. 'āqar, to hamstring an animal). In Genesis 49:6 ASV has "they hocked an ox," RSV "they hamstrung oxen," for KJV "they digged down a wall." God commanded Joshua to hough the horses of the Canaanites, and Joshua obeyed (Josh. 11:6,9, ASV hock, RSV hamstring). David houghed the horses of Hadadezer, King of Zobah (II Sam. 8:4; I Chron. 18:4, ASV hock, RSV hamstring). A cruel practice, justified only by extreme military necessity.

HOUR, found in the OT only in Daniel, Aramaic she'ā', a brief time, a moment (Dan. 3:6,15; 4:33; 5:5, where RSV has "immediately"). In 4:19, ASV has "a while," RSV "a long time." The day was divided into "degrees" (II Kings 20:9-11; Isa. 38:8, ASV, RSV "steps") on the dial of Ahaz. In the NT Greek hóra, hour, is often used of a point of time (e.g., Matt. 8:13). The day had 12 hours (John 11:9). The parable of the vineyard (Matt. 20:1-16) names the third, sixth, ninth and eleventh hours. As these are working hours, they obviously begin in the morning, and this is the Palestinian mode of reckoning. So in Acts 2:15, the third hour of the day; Acts 10:3,9, the ninth and sixth hours; Acts 23:23, the third hour of the night. Elapsed time is indicated (Luke 22:39, an hour; Gal. 2:5, RSV, a moment; Acts 5:7, three hours; 19:34, two hours). Once Gr. árti, now, is translated "this hour" in KJV (I Cor. 8:7, ASV now, RSV hitherto). In the accounts of the crucifixion, Mark 15:25 tells us that Jesus was crucified "the third hour." The supernatural darkness began at the sixth hour (Matt. 27:45,46; Mark 15:33,34; Luke 23:44-46) and lasted till the ninth hour. John 19:14-16 says that it was about the sixth hour when Pilate brought Jesus out to the people and delivered Him to be crucified. This raises the question whether John used the Palestinian reckoning of time. If so, he must have used "sixth hour" in a very general sense, for strictly the sixth hour was noon. John, writing in Ephesus late in the first century, may well have adopted the then current Roman reckoning which, like ours, numbers from midnight and from noon. John mentions the tenth hour (John 1:39); the sixth (4:6); seventh (4:52). In these cases 10 A.M., 6 P.M. and 7 P.M. respectively would be as appropriate as Palestinian reckoning 4 P.M., noon and 1 P.M. References in Revelation 9:15; 17:12; 18:10,17,19; and 8:1, half an hour, are to the brevity of a period of time.

HOUSE. In OT oftenest Heb. and Aramaic bayith, a dwelling place (Gen. 12:15); occasionally a tent (Gen. 27:15), usually of solid materials (Exod. 12:7); or its inhabitants (Gen. 12:17); or the family or race wherever dwelling (Exod. 2:1), often translated "household" or "family"; the tabernacle (Exod. 23:19; 34:26), or temple (I Kings 5:3-7:1) as the house of God; a temple of heathen gods (Judg. 16:23-30; I Sam. 31:9,10). It might be a nomad tent (Gen. 14:13,14, cf. 18:1) or a building (Gen. 19:2-11) in a city. God contrasts tent with house in II Samuel 7:6. Jacob even called a place outdoors marked by a stone "the house of God" (Gen. 28:17-22). In Psalm 83:12 KJV has houses, ASV habitations, RSV pastures, for Heb. nā'âh. In Job 1:3 Heb. 'avudâh, service, is translated "household" in KJV and ASV, "servants" in RSV. In NT Greek oikía, house, refers to a building (Matt. 2:11; 7:24-27) except Matthew 12:25; Mark 3:25; John 4:53 (RSV household); I Corinthians 16:15 (RSV household), where the inhabitants are meant. In John 14:2 "my Father's house" is the dwelling of God in heaven. In Luke 2:49 "my Father's house" (ASV, RSV; KJV has "my Father's business") translates Greek toîs toû patrós mou, the (affairs) of my Father. In II Corinthians 5:1 the first house (RSV tent; Greek "tent-house") is the physical body, the second house the resurrection body. The related Greek oîkos also refers to a building (Matt. 9:6,7, RSV home); but often to its inhabitants (Luke 19:9; Acts 11:14, RSV household); or to descendants (Matt. 10:6; Luke 1:33); or the temple (Matt. 12:4).

We read of no shelters in Eden, for probably none were needed in its mild climate; but Cain built a city (Gen. 4:17), which could have been a tent-city or a cave-city, in which probably houses were built. After the Flood, Nimrod is credited with the building of several cities (Gen. 10:10-12), where archaeologists have uncovered the remains of early houses. In Mesopotamia burned bricks joined with bitumen were used in place of stone (Gen. 11:3). Elaborate houses in Ur, of the period when Abraham lived there (Gen. 11:31) have been excavated. He abandoned these luxurious surroundings to live in a tent (Gen. 12:8) in the land of promise. Abraham found houses in Egypt (Gen. 12:15) at least one for the Pharaoh. When Lot separated from him, at first Lot moved his tent to Sodom (Gen. 13:12), but later dwelt in a house (Gen. 19:2-11). There were many houses in the numerous cities of Canaan. Finally Lot took refuge in a cave (Gen. 19:30). The house of Laban may well have been a tent (Gen. 24:31,32; 29:13,14). When Joseph arrived in Egypt he found houses there: Potiphar's (Gen. 39:2-5); that of the captain of the guard in the prison (Gen. 40:3); Joseph's own house (Gen. 43:16-34; 44:14); Pharaoh's (Gen. 45:16). The law made provision in advance of the settlement in Canaan for the cleansing of a stone house in which there was leprosy (Lev. 14:33-55). Israelite spies stayed in a house in Jericho (Josh. 2:1) with a roof where stalks of flax were dried (2:6), with a window (2:15), the house being built into the city wall (2:15).

After the conquest under Joshua, the Israelites came increasingly to live in houses in the cities and towns of Canaan; though some, like the Rechabites (Jer. 35:7,10) continued to live in tents; and some took refuge in caves in times of uncertainty (I Kings 19:9). House walls were often of rough stone as much as three feet thick; of unburned clay brick (Job 4:19), sometimes protected with a casing of stone slabs. In larger buildings the stones were squared, smoothed and pointed. In the ordinary small house, from the street one entered a forecourt, with a covered portion on one side. From the forecourt, doors opened into a living room, with two small bedchambers beyond. When the sons married, additions were made as space permitted, by using the court, complicating the design. Especially on a hilly site, a large boulder would be built into the corner to support the walls, the most necessary stone being called the corner-stone (Isa. 28:16). The importance of dedicating a new house (in earliest times by sacrifices) was recognized by excusing a man from military duty until he had done so (Deut. 20:5). The floor might be leveled rock surface, more often beaten clay. The rich might have a stone slab floor. Solomon's temple had a floor of cypress boards (I Kings 6:15). For doors there were square openings in the wall with a stone or wood lintel, doorposts (Exod. 12:22,23; I Kings 6:31) and a stone threshold. Doors might be of textiles, leather or rushes, but wooden doors fastened by a bar were used early. Stone sill and head-sockets indicate pivot hinges, requiring sturdier construction of the door. A key is referred to as early as Judges 3:25. Locks (S. of Sol. 5:5) may have been bolts. Hearths were provided, but no chimney, the smoke escaping through doors and windows. Braziers were also used (Jer. 36:22 ASV, RSV). Windows were high, small openings provided with covers like the doors, for protection, and sometimes had lattices. Roofs had beams with transverse rafters, covered with brushwood and overlaid with mud mixed with chopped straw. They were flat, and were beaten and rolled. The roof was used for worship (II Kings 23:12; Jer. 19:13; 32:29; Acts 10:9). Absalom pitched his tent on the roof for publicity (II Sam. 16:22). Three thousand Philistines used the roof of their temple as bleachers (Judg. 16:27), illustrating its strength, while its weakness was demonstrated when Samson pushed apart the middle pillars on which the structure depended. were outside stairs leading to the roof and its "upper chamber." In some cases the "upper room" may have been inside the house. In the living room a raised brick platform ran across one side of the room (in the Hellenistic period at least), sometimes with ducts to heat it, and on this the family spread their bedding by night, or sat by day. cold weather the cattle might be admitted to the lower part of the living room of a poor family.

Palaces were much more elaborate (I Kings 7:1-12). There is a sharp contrast between the humble homes of the common people and the luxurious dwellings of kings and the very rich, in Egypt, Mesopotamia, Palestine under the Hebrew monarchy and after, in Greece and Rome of the Hellenistic period. But a Christian community, many of whose members were slaves, would be familiar with the lavish contents of great houses (II Tim. 2:20). While Christians at first continued to worship in temple and synagogue, from the beginning they met also in private homes (Acts 1:13; 2:2, 46). "The church in their house" is a well-established pattern in Paul's ministry (Rom. 16:5; I Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15; Philem. 2). Special buildings for Christian churches do not appear in the NT. The family had been the religious unit from the beginning of creation (Gen. 2:8); worship centered in the house, from tent to palace. Tabernacle and temple were "the house of God" and of the larger family of God, the Chosen People. So in the NT the house where a Christian family lived welcomed other Christian brothers and sisters besides its own members to worship together, and when the temple was destroyed and the synagogue closed to Christians, the church in the home became the sole refuge of the believer, until special buildings were erected. Thus to all the human associations of home which permeate a house are added the sanctifying influences of the spiritual life. E.R.

HUKKOK (hŭk'ŏk), a border town of Naphtali, on the waters of Merom, W of Chinnereth and Capernaum at the N end of the Sea of Galilee (Josh. 19:34). Modern Yāqûq.

HUKOK (See Helkath)

HUL (hŭl), the second son of Aram and grandson of Shem. A descendant of Noah (Gen. 10:23). Also called son of Shem (I Chron. 1:17).

HULDAH (hŭl'dà, Heb. huldâh, weasel), a prophetess in the reign of Josiah (II Kings 22:14-20; II Chron. 34:22-28), the wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, who dwelt in the Second Quarter (ASV, RSV) of Jerusalem. When Hilkiah the priest found the book of the law in the temple, Josiah sent messengers to Huldah. She attested the genuineness of the book and prophesied ruin because of desertion of the law. Her message, accepted as from God, greatly influenced the reforms carried out by Josiah.

HUMANITY OF CHRIST (See Christ)

HUMILITY (Heb. 'ănāwâh, Gr. tapeinophrosúne), humility and the related substantive and verb, humble, translate several OT Heb. words, and the NT Greek tapeíno, family. The meaning shades off in various directions, but the central thought is freedom from pride, lowliness, meekness, modesty, mildness. There is a false humility (Col. 2:18, 23), properly rendered "self-abasement" in RSV. God humbles men to bring them to obedience (Deut. 8:2). To humble ourselves is a condition of God's favor (II Chron. 7:14) and His supreme requirement (Mic. 6:8). God dwells with the humble (Isa. 57:15). Humility is enjoined (Prov. 15:33; 18:12; 22:4). To the Greeks humility was weak and despicable, but Jesus made it the cornerstone of character (Matt. 5:3,5; 18:4; 23:12; Luke 14:11; 18:14). Jesus by His humility drew men to Himself (Matt. 11:28-30; John 13:1-20; Rev. 3:20). Paul emphasized the humility of Jesus (Phil. 2:1-11; II Cor. 8:9); commanded us to be humble toward one another (Phil. 2:3,4; Rom. 12:10; I Cor. 13:4-6) and spoke of himself as an example (Acts 20:19). Peter exhorted to humility toward the brethren and toward God (I Pet. 5:5,6). The above and other passages show that humility is an effect of the action of God, circumstances, other people, ourselves, or of any or all of these upon our lives. E.R.

HUMTAH (hŭm'tà), a town in the hill country of Judah near Hebron; unidentified (Josh. 15:54).

HUPHAM (hū'făm), a son of Benjamin and founder of a tribal family known as the Huphamites (Num. 26:39). Probably the same as Huppim in Genesis 46:21 and I Chronicles 7:12; and as Huram in I Chronicles 8:5.

HUPHAMITES (See Hupham)

HUPPAH (hŭp'à), a priest of the 13th course in David's time (I Chron. 24:13).

HUPPIM (hŭp'ĭm, Heb. huppîm, coast people), probably the same as Hupham, but the references leave his descent uncertain (Gen. 46:21; I Chron. 7:12,15).

HUR (hûr, Heb. hûr, whiteness). 1. One who, with Aaron, held up Moses' hands during a battle against Amalek, bringing victory to Israel (Exod. 17:10,12); appointed magistrate while Moses was on the mount (Exod. 24:14).

2. Grandfather of Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, chief workman in the tabernacle (Exod. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22; II Chron. 1:5). I Chronicles 2:19, 20 say that Caleb married Ephrath, who bore him Hur, grandfather of Bezaleel. In verse 50 KJV, ASV call Caleb son of Hur, first-born of Ephratah, but RSV divides the verse to remove the difficulty. In I Chronicles 4:1 Hur is named as a descendant of Judah, but in verse 4 he is called first-born of Ephratah, father of Bethlehem. Jewish tradition identifies Nos. 1 and 2, and calls him the husband of Miriam, Moses' sister.

3. One of five Midianite kings killed with Balaam (Num. 31:1-8); a leader of Midian and a prince of Sihon the Amorite king (Josh. 13:21).

4. In KJV, the father of one of 12 officers who supplied food for Solomon's household (I Kings 4:8); ASV, RSV treat "son of" (Heb. bēn) as part of a proper name, Ben-hur.

5. Father of Rephaiah, who helped Nehemiah build the wall; ruler of half of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:9).

HURAI (hū'rā-ī, hū-rā'ī, hū'rī), one of David's heroes from the brooks of Gaash (I Chron. 11:32). Also called Hiddai (II Sam. 23:30).

HURAM (hū'răm, Heb. hûrām, noble-born). 1. A Benjamite, son of Bela (I Chron. 8:5). See Hupham.

2. The king of Tyre who aided Solomon (II Chron. 2:3,11,12). Usually called Hiram.

3. A Tyrian artificer sent to Solomon by No. 2 (II Chron. 2:13; 4:11,16), ASV "of Huram my father's," margin, "even Huram my father" in 2:13; "Huram his father" in 4:16. RSV "Huramabi" in II Chronicles 2:13; 4:16. Elsewhere called Hiram.

HURI (hū'rī), the father of Abihail, a Gadite (I Chron. 5:14).

HURRIANS (See Horites)

HUSBANDMAN (hŭz'bănd-măn), a farmer, whether owner or tenant. The term is retained in ASV except Zechariah 13:5, "tiller of the ground," where Zechariah asserts that he is a farmer, not a professional prophet. The Heb. words mean "farmer, plowman, tiller of the soil," and RSV uses all three translations in the OT. King Uzziah loved farming (II Chron. 26:10). Farmers were left in the land when others were carried captive to Babylon (II Kings 25:12; Jer. 52:16). The farmers of Israel are promised peace, and those of Babylon destruction, in the restoration (Jer. 31:24; 15:23). Joel 1:11 and Amos 5:6 predict suffering for farmers in the national disaster. Noah (Gen. 9:20), like Cain (Gen. 4:2), was a farmer. The NT Greek word georgós means farmer, worker on the land. In the Gospel parable (Matt. 21:33-41; Mark 12:1-9; Luke 20:9-16) the farmers are tenants in RSV. The right of the farmer to the first share of the crop is recognized (II Tim. 2:6). He is held up as an example of patience (James 5:7). In John 15:1, God is the vinedresser (RSV), as the context shows.

HUSBANDRY (See Occupations & Professions: Farmer)

HUSHAH (hū'shà), a son of Ezer, the son of Hur, a Judahite (I Chron. 4:4).

HUSHAI (hū'shī, hū'shā-ī), one of David's two leading men, an Archite (II Sam. 15:32,37; 16:16-18; 17:5-15; I Chron. 27:33) — the friend and counselor of David who overthrew the counsels of Ahithophel. The Archite clan occupied Ataroth, a border town of Ephraim (Josh. 16:2,7).

HUSHAM (hū'shăm), a king of Edom, who succeeded Jobab. He came from the land of Teman (Gen. 36:34,35; I Chron. 1:45,46).

HUSHATHITE, THE (hū'shăth-īt), the patronymic of Sibbecai, one of David's 30 heroes (II Sam. 21:18; I Chron. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11) called Mebunnai in II Samuel 23:27.

HUSHIM (hū'shĭm). 1. The sons of Dan (Gen. 46:23), called Shuham in Numbers 26:42.

2. The sons of Aher, a Benjamite (I Chron. 7:12).

3. One of the two wives of Shaharaim (I Chron. 8:8,11).

HUSKS, Luke 15:16, the pods of the carob tree (so ASV margin; RSV "pods"). Greek kerátia, little horns, from their shape; Caratonia siliqua, a tree about 30 feet high, with a crown of like spread, which matures fruit in 30 years, and has glossy evergreen leaves and leathery leguminous pods with pea-like seeds embedded in a sweet pulp. A staple cattle food throughout the Mediterranean basin, the pods are eaten by the poor. Called "St. John's Bread" from a belief that carob pods rather than insects were the locusts which John the Baptist ate (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6).

HUZ (hŭz), the eldest son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. 22:21; ASV, RSV Uz).

HUZZAB (hŭz'ăb, Heb. hūtstsav). It is disputed whether the word in Nahum 2:7 is to be taken as a noun or as a verb. If a noun (KJV; ASV margin), it may be an epithet of Nineveh or of its queen (and so RSV "its mistress"). If a verb, ASV text has "it is decreed." The LXX does not help. Moffatt and the Jewish version have "the queen"; Knox has "the warriors of Nineve(h)." Archaeology has as yet shed no light here.

HYACINTH (hī'ă-sĭnth, Gr. huákinthos). 1. The name of a color, deep purple (Rev. 9:17); KJV has "jacinth."

2. In Revelation 21:20, where a precious stone is meant, RV has "sapphire."

HYENA (See Animals)

HYKSOS (hĭk'sōs, -sŏs, Egyptian hik shasu, rulers of foreign lands, or of the lands of the nomads), a West Semitic (Canaanite, Amorite) people who ruled an empire embracing Syria and Palestine; called the Shepherd Kings by the Egyptian historian Manetho. Around 1700 B.C. their use of a new weapon, the horse-drawn chariot, enabled them to conquer Egypt, where they ruled till about 1550 B.C. During their rule, which was more friendly to foreigners than were native Egyptian dynasties, Joseph came to Egypt and rose to be prime minister, bringing his father Jacob's family to dwell in Goshen, near the Hyksos capital at Avaris in the Delta. The Hyksos built great earthwork enclosures for their horses, and immense fortifications. Between 1600 and 1550 B.C. the Hyksos were driven out by a native Egyptian dynasty unfriendly to foreigners, and the capital restored to Thebes, its earlier location. From this time date the misfortunes of Jacob's rapidly increasing descendants, terminating only with their escape from Egypt.

HYMENAEUS (hī'mĕ-nē'ŭs, Gr. Hyménaios, pertaining to Hymen, the god of marriage), a professed Christian who had fallen into heresies, who tried to shipwreck the faith of true believers, and who was excommunicated by Paul (I Tim. 1:19,20; II Tim. 2:16-18).

HYMN (See Music)

HYPOCRISY (hĭ-pŏk'rĭ-sē). Hypocrite or hypocritical, in the OT, render words from a Heb. root hnph, pollute, correctly translated "profane, godless" in ASV, RSV (Isa. 32:6; 9:17; 10:6; 33:14; Job 8:13; 13:16; 15:34; 17:8; 20:5; 27:8; 34:30; 36:13; Prov. 11:9; Ps. 35:16). The LXX used Greek hypokrínomai, act a part in a play; hypókrisis, hypocrisy; hypokrités, hypocrite, which occur in the NT and are taken over in English (Matt. 6:2,5,16; 7:5; 15:7; 22:18; 23:13,15,23,25,27,28, 29; 24:51; Mark 7:6; 12:15; Luke 12:1,56; 13:15). In Galatians 2:13 KJV, ASV have "dissimulated . . . dissimulation," RSV "acted insincerely . . . insincerity." Anypókritos, without hypocrisy (Rom. 12:9; II Cor. 6:6; I Tim. 1:5; II Tim. 1:5; I Pet. 1:22 is usually rendered "sincere, genuine" in RSV. In Luke 20:20 the verb is translated "feign themselves." The thought in the NT lies close to the literal meaning "play-acting," with special reference to religion, "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof" (II Tim. 3:5), as Matthew 6:1-18; 23:13-36 plainly show.

HYSSOP (See Plants)

I

IBHAR (ĭb'hàr, Heb. yivhār, he chooses), one of David's sons, born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15; I Chron. 14:5).

IBLEAM (ĭb'lē-ăm, Heb. yivle'ām), a town in the territory of Issachar, given to the tribe of Manasseh (Josh. 17:11). The inhabitants, however, were not driven out and continued to live in the land (Judg. 1:27). Ahaziah, king of Judah, was slain near there when he fled from Jehu (II Kings 9:27). Zechariah, king of Israel, was killed there (II Kings 15:10, text of Lucian). It is generally identified with Bileam, a town of Manasseh given to the Levites (I Chron. 6:70). Ruins of the town remain.

IBNEIAH (ĭb-nī'yà, Heb. yivneyâh, Jehovah builds), a son of Jeroham, a chief man in the tribe of Benjamin in the first settlement in Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:8).

IBNIJAH (ĭb-nī'jà, Heb. yivnîyâh, Jehovah builds up), a Benjamite, father of Reuel (I Chron. 9:8).

IBRI (ĭb'rī, Heb. 'ivrî, a Hebrew), a Merarite Levite, son of Jaaziah (I Chron. 24:27).

IBZAN (ĭb'zăn, Heb. 'ivtsān), the tenth judge of Israel, who ruled for seven years. He was a native of Bethlehem (whether of Judah or Zebulun is not stated). He had 30 sons and 30 daughters (Judg. 12:8-10).

ICHABOD (ĭk'à-bŏd, Heb. 'ikhāvôdh, inglorious), son of Phinehas, Eli's son, slain by the Philistines at the battle of Aphek when the ark was taken. Ichabod was born after his father's death, and was given this name by his mother on her death-bed because she felt that the "glory (had) departed from Israel" (I Sam. 4:19ff). His nephew Ahijah was one of those who remained with Saul and his men at Gibeah just before Jonathan attacked the Philistines (I Sam. 14:2ff).

ICONIUM (ī-cō'nĭ-ŭm, Gr. Ikónion), a city of Asia Minor, visited by Paul and Barnabas on Paul's first missionary journey after they had been expelled from Antioch in Pisidia, which lay on the W, and revisited by them on their return journey to Antioch (Acts 13:51ff). On his second missionary journey Paul with Silas stopped off at Iconium to read the letter sent out by the Jerusalem Council on the Judaizing question, and at nearby Lystra he took young Timothy with him as his associate (Acts 16:1-5). In II Timothy 3:11 Paul alludes to persecutions endured by him at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra.

In the first century it was one of the chief cities in the southern part of the Roman province of Galatia. It was a city of immemorial antiquity, and was situated near the western end of a vast, level plain, with mountains a few miles towards the W, from which streams flowed which made it a veritable oasis. Two important trade-routes passed through it, and it was on the road leading to Ephesus and Rome. Geography makes it the natural capital of Lycaonia. Archaeological inscriptions found there in 1910 show that the Phrygian language was spoken there for two centuries after the time of Paul, although at neighboring Lystra the natives spoke the "speech of Lycaonia" (Acts 14:11). Hadrian made the city a Roman colony. The city has had a continuing history, and is now known as Konia, still the main trading center of the Lycaonian plain. S.B.

IDBASH (ĭd'băsh, Heb. yidbāsh, honey-sweet), a man of Judah, one of the sons of the father of Etam (I Chron. 4:3).

IDDO (ĭd'ō), the English equivalent of several Jewish names: 1. [Heb. yiddô]. a. Son of Zechariah, and a captain of the half-tribe of Manasseh E of the Jordan, under David (I Chron. 27:21). b. One who had taken a foreign wife at the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:43).

2. [Heb. 'iddô]. The head of a community of Nethinim at Casiphia who provided Ezra with Levites and Nethinim (Ezra 8:17).

3. [Heb. yiddô, ye'dô, ye'dî]. a. A Levite descended from Gershom; ancestor of Asaph (I Chron. 6:21). b. A seer and prophet, who wrote a book which was the Chronicler's source for the reign of Solomon and Jeroboam (II Chron. 9:29), and books about the deeds of Rehoboam (II Chron. 12:15) and of King Abijah (II Chron. 13:22). c. Father of Abinadab, a purveyor of Solomon at Mahanaim in Gilead (I Kings 4:14). d. Grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. 1:1,7; Ezra 5:1; 6:14).

IDOL (See Idolatry)

IDOLATRY (ī-dŏl'ă-trē, Gr. eidololatreía). Idolatry in ancient times included two forms of departure from the true religion: the worship of false gods, whether by means of images or otherwise; and the worship of Jehovah by means of images. All the nations surrounding ancient Israel were idolatrous, although their idolatry assumed different forms. The early Semites of Mesopotamia worshiped mountains, springs, trees, and blocks of stone, in which the deity was supposed to be in some sense incarnate. A typical example of such wooden representations is the sacred pole, the idol of his clan, which Gideon destroyed (Judg. 6:25-32). The religion of the Egyptians centered mostly about the veneration of the sun and of the Nile, as sources of life. They also had a number of sacred animals: the bull, cow, cat, baboon, crocodile, etc. Some of the deities had human bodies and animal heads. Among the Canaanites, religion took on a very barbarous character. The chief gods were personifications of life and fertility. The gods had no moral character whatsoever, and worship of them carried with it demoralizing practices, including child sacrifice, prostitution, and snake-worship. Human and animal images of the deities were worshiped. The Israelites, on succeeding to the land, were commanded to destroy these idols (Exod. 23:24; 34:13; Num. 33:52; Deut. 7:5).

The word "idolatry," which occurs only once in the KJV (I Sam. 15:23), has no exact Hebrew equivalent. There are, however, a number of Hebrew words which are rendered "idol" in the KJV. They all give expression to the loathing, contempt, and dread excited in godly men by idolatry. The terms are as follows. 1. aven, "emptiness," "nothingness"; that is, a vain, false, wicked thing (Isa. 66:3). 2. emah, "an object of horror or terror," referring either to the hideousness of the idols or the shameful character of their worship (Jer. 50:38). 3. el, the name of the supreme god of Canaan; used also as a neutral expression for any divinity (Isa. 57:5). 4. elil, "a thing of naught, cipher," resembling aven in meaning (Lev. 19:4; 26:1; I Chron. 16:26; etc.). 5. miphletseth, "a fright, a horror" (I Kings 15:13; II Chron. 15:16). 6. semel, "a likeness," "semblance" (II Chron. 33:7,15). 7. atsab, "a cause of grief" (I Sam. 31:9; I Chron. 10:9, etc.). 8. etseb, "a cause of grief" (Jer. 22:28). 9. otseb, "a cause of grief" (Isa. 48:5). 10. tsir, "a form," and hence an idol (Isa. 45:16). Besides the above words there are a number of others, not translated "idol," but referring to it which express the degradation associated with idolatry: bosheth, "shameful thing," applied to Baal and referring to the obscenity of his worship (Jer. 11:13; Hos. 9:10); gillulim, a term of contempt meaning "shapeless, dungy things" (Ezek. 4:2; Zeph. 1:17); shikkuts, "filth," referring especially to the obscene rites associated with idolatry (Ezek. 37:23; Nah. 3:6).

The first clear case of idolatry in the Bible is the account of Rachel's stealing her father's teraphim, which were images of household gods (Gen.

31:19). They were used in Babylonia. Without Jacob's knowledge, Rachel stole them from Laban and carried them with her to Canaan. During their long sojourn in Egypt, the Israelites defiled themselves with the idols of the land (Josh. 24:14; Ezek. 20:7). Moses defied these gods by smiting their symbols in the plagues of Egypt (Num. 33:4). In spite of the miracles of their redemption from Egypt, the Israelites insisted on having some visible shape with which to worship God, and at Sinai, while Moses was absent, they persuaded Aaron to make them a golden calf, an emblem of the productive power of nature with which they had become familiar in Egypt. The Second Commandment, forbidding man to make and bow down to images of any kind, was directed against idolatry (Exod. 20:4,5; Deut. 5:8,9). This sin seems to have been shunned until the period of the judges, when the nation was caught in its toils again.

The whole of Judges tells of successive apostasies, judgments, and repentances. The story of Micah in Judges 17,18 is an illustration of how idolatry was often combined with outward worship of Jehovah. It is significant that Jonathan, a Levite and a grandson of Moses, assumed the office of priest to the images of Micah, and that later he allowed himself to be persuaded by some Danites, who had stolen Micah's idol, to go with them as the priest of their tribe. He became the first of a line of priests to officiate at the shrine of the stolen idols all the time that the tabernacle was at Shiloh.

The prophet Samuel persuaded the people to repent of their sin and to renounce idolatry; but in Solomon's reign the king himself made compromises that affected disastrously the whole future of the kingdom. His wives brought their own heathen gods with them, and openly worshiped them. Rehoboam, Solomon's son by an Ammonite mother, continued the worst features of his father's idolatry (I Kings 14:22-24); while under Jeroboam a great and permanent schism was effected in the religion of Israel when he erected golden calves at Bethel and at Dan and had his people worship there instead of in Jerusalem. The kings that followed Jeroboam in the northern kingdom differed little from him. One of them, Ahab, to please his Zidonian queen Jezebel, built a temple and an altar to Baal in Samaria (I Kings 16:31-33); while she put to death as many prophets of Jehovah as she could find (I Kings 18:4-13). Henceforth Baal worship became identified with the kingdom of Israel, and no king ever rose up against it.

In the southern kingdom things went somewhat better. Hezekiah restored the temple services, which had been abandoned during his father's reign, but the change was only outward (II Chron. 28,29; Isa. 29:13). Not long before the destruction of Jerusalem by Babylonia, Josiah made a final effort to bring about a purer worship, but it did not last (II Chron. 34). Not even the Captivity cured the Jews of their idolatrous tendencies. When Ezra went to Jerusalem from Babylon, he found to his dismay that many Jews had married foreign wives and that the land was filled with abominations (Ezra 9:11). More than 200 years later, when Antioches Epiphanes tried to extirpate Judaism and Hellenize the Jews, many of them obeyed his command to offer sacrifices to idols, although his action led to the Maccabean war.

In the ritual of idol worship the chief elements were: offering burnt sacrifices (II Kings 5:17), burning incense in honor of the idol (I Kings 11:8), pouring out libations (Isa. 57:6), presenting tithes and the first-fruits of the land (Hos. 2:8), kissing the idol (I Kings 19:18), stretching out the hands to it in adoration, prostrating oneself before it, and sometimes cutting oneself with knives (I Kings 18:26,28). Some of these practices were analogous to the worship of Jehovah.

For an Israelite, idolatry was the most heinous of crimes. In the OT the relation between God and His covenant people is often represented as a marriage bond (Isa. 54:5; Jer. 3:14), and the worship of false gods was regarded as religious harlotry. The penalty was death (Exod. 22:20). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (Deut. 13:6-10). The God of Israel was a jealous God who brooked no rivals.

In the NT, references to idolatry are understandably few. The Maccabean war resulted in the Jews becoming fanatically opposed to the crass idolatry of OT times. The Jews were never again tempted to worship images or gods other than Jehovah. Jesus, however, warned that to make possessions central in life is also idolatry, and said, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt. 6:24). Paul, in Romans 1:18-25, teaches that idolatry is not the first stage of religion, from which man by an evolutionary process emerges to monotheism, but is the result of deliberate religious apostasy. When man sins against the light of nature and refuses to worship the Creator revealed thereby, God as a punishment withdraws the light, and man then descends into the shameful absurdities of idolatry. Christians in apostolic times, many of whom were converted from heathenism, are repeatedly warned in the epistles of the NT to be on their guard against idolatry (I Cor. 5:10; Gal. 5:20; etc.). The OT conception of idolatry is widened to include anything that leads to the dethronement of God from the heart, as, for example, covetousness (Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5).

A special problem arose for Christians in connection with meats offered to idols (Acts 15:29; I Cor. 8-10). Some of the meat sold in butcher shops had been bought from heathen temples. Should a Christian make careful inquiry about the meat he purchased, and would he countenance or indirectly support idolatry if he bought meat that had been offered to an idol? Or should a Christian invited to dinner by a friend ask before accepting whether he would be eating meat that had been offered to an idol? Many Christians had real qualms about eating such meat; while others, feeling themselves "strong" spiritually, were convinced that there was no harm in it at all. Paul does not take sides in the matter, but he urges against the latter that they should not be careless, for even though idols are nothing, they still are a tangible expression of demons who are back of them; and, moreover, Christians should never insist on their "rights," if such insistence will cause the weak to stumble. They should be governed by the law of love. In the last book of the Bible the Apostle John predicts a time of idolatrous apostasy in the last days, when the Beast and his image will be accorded divine honors (Rev. 9:20; 13:14). S.B.

IDUMAEA (ĭd'ū-mē-ȧ, Gr. pertaining to Edom, in KJV of OT Idumea). the name used by the Greeks and Romans for the country of Edom (Mark 3:8). See EDOM.

IGAL (ī'găl, Heb. yigh'āl, God redeems). 1. One of the 12 spies sent by Moses to search out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:7).

2. One of David's heroes, the son of Nathan (II Sam. 23:36).

3. A son of Shemaiah, a descendant of King Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:22).

IGDALIAH (ĭg'dȧ-lī'ȧ, Heb. yighdalyāhû, Jehovah is great), father of the prophet Hanan (Jer. 35:4).

IGEAL ĭ'ge-ăl, Heb. yigh'āl, God redeems), a son of Shemaiah, of the Davidic line (I Chron. 3:22, RV Igal).

IIM (ī'ĭm, Heb. 'iyîm, heaps, ruins). 1. A town in Judah near Edom (Josh. 15:29). The exact site is uncertain.

2. A town E of the Jordan (Num. 33:45).

IJE-ABARIM (ĭ'jē-ăb'ȧ-rĭm, Heb. 'iyê hā-'āvārîm, ruins of Abarim), a halting place in the journeyings of Israel, said to be "in the border of Moab" (Num. 33:44). Exact site unknown.

IJON (ī'jŏn, Heb. 'iyôn, a ruin), a town in the territory of Naphtali, captured by Ben-hadad, king of Syria, at the instigation of Asa (I Kings 15:20; II Chron. 16:4). Its inhabitants were subsequently carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser in the reign of Pekah (II Kings 15:29). The site is located about eight miles NW of Banias.

IKKESH (ĭk'ĕsh, Heb. 'iqqēsh, crooked), a man from Tekoa, father of Ira, one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:26; I Chron. 11:28).

ILAI (ī'lā-ī, Heb. 'îlay), one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:29); called Zalmon in II Samuel 23:28).

ILLYRICUM (ĭl-ĭr'ĭ-kŭm, Gr. Illurikón), a province of the Roman Empire, bounded on the N by Pannonia, on the E by Moesia, on the S by Macedonia, and on the W by the Adriatic Sea. The Alps run through it. The inhabitants, wild mountaineers and pirates, were conquered by the Romans in the third century B.C. In Romans 15:19 Paul, emphasizing the extent of his missionary activities, says that "from Jerusalem, and round about even unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ." "Illyricum" in this verse probably means the Roman province, not the much wider area the name sometimes included. "Unto Illyricum" must mean up to the borders of Illyricum, although the preposition "unto" may be either exclusive or inclusive. Paul's preaching tour to the Illyrian frontier must be assigned to his third missionary journey, as his movements on his first visit to Macedonia are too carefully recorded to allow for a trip to the borders of Illyricum.

IMAGE (See Idolatry)

IMAGE, NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S. Nebuchadnezzar in his second year had a dream which none of his wise men could describe or interpret for him except Daniel, to whom God had revealed the secret of the dream in a night vision. The king's dream was of a huge image with a head of gold, the breast and arms of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet of iron mixed with clay. A stone cut without hands fell on the feet and broke them in pieces, and then became a mountain, filling the whole earth. Each of the four principal parts of the image is interpreted to represent one of four successive empires. The head of gold represented Nebuchadnezzar's empire. The other three empires intended are not expressly indicated ,and it has been much disputed what they are. Among the various identification for the second empire that have been proposed are the Grecian, the Median, and the Medo-Persian. The third has been referred to Medo-Persia, Persia, Alexander, Greece, and Rome. The fourth has been thought to be Nabonidus and Belshazzar, Mohammed, Greece, Syria, the successors of Alexander, and Rome. The stone cut without hands represents the kingdom of God smiting and destroying the anti-theocratic powers of the world. The central truth of this chapter (Daniel 2) is that some day the kingdom of God will supersede all human empires. S.B.

IMAGE OF GOD. Two fundamental truths about man taught in Scripture are that he is created by God and that God made him in His own image. Man came into being as the result of special deliberation on the part of God. He is God's creature, and there is therefore an infinite qualitative difference between them; but he has been made like God in a way that the rest of creation is not. The passages in which it is expressly stated that man is made in God's image are Genesis 1:26,27; 5:1, 3; 9:6; I Corinthians 11:7; Ephesians 4:24; Colossians 3:10; and James 3:9. Psalm 8 should be added to these, although the phrase "image of God" is not used, for the creation narrative as it relates to man is given here in poetic form. Another passage where the idea is not directly stated but is implied is Acts 17:22-31 — Paul's address on Mars Hill. The words "image" and "likeness," used together in Genesis 1:26,27, do not differ essentially in meaning, but strengthen the idea that man uniquely reflects God. They are, moreover, used interchangeably elsewhere. The Scriptures do not specifically describe the nature of the image; consequently theologians differ in their views regarding it. Among the principal views are the following: God has a bodily form, and this serves as the pattern for the body of man; it consists in simple lordship over the animals; it refers to man's moral nature; it is his personality. Since it is unlikely that it consists in bodily form, for God is a spirit, it can only refer to spiritual qualities, in man's mental and moral attributes as a rational, self-conscious, self-determining creature, capable of obedience to moral law, and intended by God for fellowship with Himself. All this, of course, makes possible dominion over the animal world. The image of God is restored in the redemption of Christ (Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10). S.B.

IMAGE WORSHIP (See Idol)

IMLAH (ĭm'lä, Heb. yimlâh, fulness), the father of the prophet Micaiah, a prophet of the Lord in the days of Ahab (I Kings 22:8,9; II Chron. 18:7,8).

IMMANUEL (ĭ-măn'ū-ĕl, Heb. 'immānû'ēl, God is with us), the name of a child (occurring three times in the Bible: Isaiah 7:14; 8:8; Matt. 1:23) whose birth was foretold by Isaiah, and who was to be a sign to Ahaz, during the Syro-Ephraimitic war (Isa. 7). At this time, 753 B.C., Judah was threatened by the allied forces of Syria and Israel, who were trying to compel it to form an alliance with them against Assyria, whose king, Tiglath-pileser, was attempting to bring the whole of Western Asia under his sway. The prophet bade Ahaz remain confident and calm in Jehovah, and not to seek aid from Tiglath-pileser. To overcome the king's incredulity, he offered him a sign of anything in heaven or earth, but when the king evasively refused the offer, Isaiah, after bitterly chiding him for his lack of faith, proceeded to give him a sign, the sign of "Immanuel."

Isaiah's words have led to much controversy and have been variously interpreted, chiefly because of the indefinite terms of the prediction and the fact that there is no record of their fulfilment in any contemporary event. 1. The traditional Christian interpretation is that the emphasis should be laid upon the virgin birth of Immanuel, as Matthew does when he relates the birth of Jesus (1:22,23). Difficulties with this view are that the idea of a virgin birth is not unambiguously expressed and such an event could not serve the purpose of a sign to Ahaz, who expected a miracle to be performed in the immediate future. 2. Another explanation is that the event of the birth of the child is intended as a sign to Ahaz and nothing more. At the time of Judah's deliverance from Syria and Ephraim, some young mothers who then give birth to sons will spontaneously name them "Immanuel." Children bearing this name will be a sign to Ahaz of the truth of Isaiah's words concerning deliverance and judgment. 3. A third view, somewhat similar to the preceding one, is that Isaiah has a certain child in mind, the almah being his own wife, or one of Ahaz's wives, or perhaps someone else. Before its birth it will have experienced a great deliverance (vs. 14); before he has emerged from infancy, Syria and Ephraim will be no more (vs. 16); and later in his life Judah will be a country fit only for the pastoral life (vs. 15). 4. There are semi-Messianic interpretations, which apply the prophecy to a child of Isaiah's time and also to Jesus Christ. 5. Perhaps the most widely-held view in evangelical circles is that Isaiah has in mind the Messiah. When the prophet learns of the king's cowardice, God for the first time gives to him a revelation of the true King, who would share the poverty and affliction of His people and whose character and work would entitle Him to the great names of Isaiah 9:6. In this interpretation the essential fact is that in the coming of Immanuel men will recognize the truth of the prophet's words. He would be Israel's deliverer and the government would rest upon His shoulder (9:6). II Samuel 7:12 and Micah 5:3 show that the Messianic idea was prevalent in Judah at this time. S.B.

IMMER (ĭm'ĕr, Heb. 'immēr). 1. The ancestral head of the 16th course of priests. He lived in David's time (I Chron. 24:14). Descendants of his are mentioned in Ezra 2:37; 10:20; Nehemiah 3:29; 7:40; 11:13.

2. A priest, in Jeremiah's time, the father of Pashur (Jer. 20:1). It is possible that he was a descendant of the Immer mentioned in 1.

3. A place in Babylonia, the home of a priestly family (Ezra 2:59).

IMMORTALITY (ĭm-ŏr-tăl'ĭ-tē, Gr. athanasía, aphtharsía, áphthartos, incorruption). The Biblical concept of immortality is not simply the survival of the soul after bodily death — the bare continued existence of the soul — but the self-conscious continuance of the whole person, body and soul together, in a state of blessedness, due to the redemption of Christ and the possession of "eternal life."

Belief in some sort of survival of the soul is practically universal, but in most cases the soul lives on in a joyless, shadowy state bearing only a ghostly resemblance to life on earth. The body is looked upon as a clog, happily sloughed off by the soul. The soul, moreover, is regarded as inherently indestructible, with neither beginning nor ending. In the Bible, however, only God possesses immortality "as an original, eternal, and necessary endowment." The soul's immortality is conferred upon it by God and is therefore contingent on His will.

A number of arguments have been adduced by philosophers for the soul's immortality, among the more important the following: 1. The fact that the belief is found among all races and nations points to its being a natural instinct, something involved in the very constitution of human nature; (2) the soul is immaterial in nature; physical dissolution, therefore, cannot destroy it; (3) human nature is endowed with rich capacities and possibilities which can never be fully developed in this life and which require a future existence so that they may come to full fruition; (4) there must be a future life in order that the moral order may be vindicated, for in this life much good goes unrewarded and much evil goes unpunished.

The above arguments are not absolutely demonstrable; they do no more than furnish a strong presumption in favor of immortality. For greater assurance on this matter we must rely on the authority of Scripture. The Bible, however, nowhere explicitly mentions the immortality of the soul, and never attempts to prove it in a formal way. Everywhere it assumes man's immortality as an undisputed postulate, in much the same way that it assumes the existence of God.

The OT teaches immortality, but not with the clarity of the NT, chiefly because God's revelation in Scripture is progressive and gradually increases in clearness. 1. Unlike animals, man is composed of body and soul, and is made in the image of God. He is constantly reminded that he is constituted for fellowship with God and that he is only a pilgrim on this earth. God has set eternity in his heart (Eccl. 3:11). 2. The dead in the OT descend into Sheol (Hades, in the Greek), a word which may be rendered in a number of ways, depending on the context: grave, state of death, underworld, or hell. In Sheol they are in a state of conscious existence. 3. Belief in immortality by OT Jews is obvious from the practice of necromancy, or consulting the dead, against which there are frequent warnings in the OT (Lev. 19:31; 20:27; Deut. 18:11; Isa. 8:19; 29:4). 4. Jesus points out to the Sadducees that the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is implicitly taught in the statement in Exodus 3:6, "I am the God of . . . Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." It is explicitly taught in such passages as Job 19:23-27; Psalm 16:9-11; 17:15; 49:15; 73:24; Isaiah 26:19; Daniel 12:2; Hosea 13:14. 5. Some OT passages speak confidently of enjoying communion with God after death (Job 19:25-27; Ps. 16:9-11; 17:15; 73:23,24,26).

The doctrine of immortality is found everywhere in the NT. 1. A future state for both righteous and wicked is clearly taught. The continued existence of believers appears from such passages as Matthew 10:28; Luke 23:43; John 11:25f; 14:3; II Corinthians 5:1. The survival of the wicked is made clear in Matthew 11:21-24; 12:41; Romans 2:5-11; II Corinthians 5:10. 2. There are passages which show that future existence implies the resurrection of the body. The bodily resurrection of believers is taught in Luke 20:35,36; John 5:25-29; I Corinthians 15; I Thessalonians 4:16; Philippians 3:21; and of unbelievers, in John 5:29; Acts 24:15; Revelation 20:12-15. Paul teaches that after death the soul is in an unclothed and therefore incomplete state until the resurrection. 3. The condition of believers in their state of immortality is not a bare endless existence, but a communion with God in eternal satisfaction and blessedness. Among the blessings of the eternal state are likeness to Christ, freedom from pain and sorrow, the service of God, and a vision of the divine glory.

Those who reject belief in the personal immortality of the soul usually try to substitute for it belief in some other form of immortality, such as racial immortality, immortality of commemoration, or immortality of influence. S.B.

IMMUTABILITY (ĭ-mū-tà-bĭl'ĭ-tē, Gr. ametáthetos, unchangeableness), the perfection of God by which He is devoid of all change in essence, attributes, consciousness, will, and promises. No change is possible in God, because all change must be to better or worse, and God is absolute perfection. No cause for change in God exists, either in Himself or outside of Him. The immutability of God is clearly taught in such passages of Scripture as the following: "I am the Lord, I change not" (Mal. 3:6). He is "the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James 1:17). "The heavens shall perish, but thou shalt endure" (Ps. 102:26). "The counsel of the Lord standeth forever" (Ps. 33:11). The immutability of God must not be confounded with immobility, as if there were no movement in God. Immutability is consistent with constant activity and perfect freedom. God creates, performs miracles, sustains the universe, etc. When the Scriptures speak of His repenting, as in Jonah 3:10, "God repented of the evil that he had said that he would do unto them," one should remember that this is only an anthropomorphic way of speaking. God adapts His treatment of men to the variation of their actions and characters. When the righteous do wickedly, His holiness requires that His treatment of them must change. S.B.

IMNA (ĭm'nà, Heb. yimnā', He — God — keeps off, i.e., defends), the ancestral head of a family of Asher (I Chron. 7:35).

IMNAH (ĭm'nà, Heb. yimnâh, right hand, or, good fortune). 1. Son of Asher and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:44; I Chron. 7:30; Gen. 46:17).

2. A Levite, father of Kore, in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:14).

IMPRECATORY PSALMS. A number of OT Psalms, especially Nos. 2, 37, 69, 79, 109, 139, and 143, contain expressions of an apparent vengeful attitude towards enemies which, for some people, constitute one of the "moral difficulties" of the OT. It is thought that the spirit of the imprecatory Psalms is morally not justifiable by the standard of the ethics of the NT. Such passages may cause less difficulty when it is observed that they are not dictated merely by private vindictiveness, but spring ultimately from zeal for God's cause, with which the psalmist identifies himself, and they show a willingness to leave vengeance in the hands of God. They show, moreover, a keen sense of the great conflict constantly going on between God and His enemies, a conflict then being waged between Israel as God's covenant people and the nations which threatened to destroy Israel. They show a spirit of righteous indignation, and spring from an aroused sense of justice. S.B.

IMPUTATION (See Impute)

IMPUTE (ĭm-pūt', Heb. hāshav, Gr. logízomai), a word meaning to attribute something to a person, or reckoning something to the account of another. This sometimes takes place in a judicial manner, so that the thing imputed becomes a ground of reward or punishment. In the KJV the Heb. and Gr. words are also translated to count, to account, to reckon, to esteem, to think. The doctrine of imputation is frequently mentioned in the OT (Lev. 7:18; 17:4; II Sam. 19:19; Ps. 32:2) and the NT (Rom. 4:6-25; 5:13; II Cor. 5:19; James 2:23). It underlies the Scripture doctrines of Original Sin, Atonement, and Justification.

1. IMPUTATION OF ADAM'S SIN TO HIS POSTERITY. The story of the Fall, in Genesis 2 and 3, taken in connection with the subsequent history of the human race as recorded in the rest of the OT, implies that Adam's sin not only affected but was imputed to his posterity. This doctrine is more fully developed in the NT, especially in Romans 5:12-21, where Paul shows that it was by Adam's sin that death and sin entered the world and passed to all men. All men were condemned and made sinners in Adam.

2. IMPUTATION OF THE SIN OF MAN TO CHRIST. This is not expressly stated in the Bible, but is implied in those passages which affirm that Christ bore our sins and died in our stead. Isaiah 53 teaches that the Servant of Jehovah bore our iniquity, and God caused to fall on Him the iniquity of us all. Peter had this passage in mind when he wrote that Christ "his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree" (I Pet. 2:24). The same thought is expressed in II Corinthians 5:21 where Paul says that Christ was "made to be sin on our behalf," and in Galatians 3:13, where it is said that Christ became "a curse for us." This truth is basic to the doctrine of the Atonement.

3. THE IMPUTATION OF CHRIST'S RIGHTEOUSNESS TO THE BELIEVER. This is the basis of Paul's doctrine of justification, a judicial act of God by which He declares righteous, on the ground of Christ's expiatory work and imputed righteousness, those who put their faith in Christ as their Saviour. The NT stresses that justification is absolutely free and unmerited so far as the sinner is concerned (Rom. 3:24; 5:15; Gal. 5:4; Titus 3:7). The merits of Christ's suffering and obedience are imputed to the sinner and he is henceforth looked upon as just in God's sight. S.B.

IMRAH (ĭm'rà, Heb. yimrâh, He [God] resists), a descendant of Asher; son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:36).

IMRI (ĭm'rī, Heb. 'imrî, contraction of Amariah). 1. A man of Judah, son of Bani (I Chron. 9:4).

2. The father of Zaccur, who helped in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. 3:2).

INCARNATION. The doctrine of the incarnation is taught or assumed throughout the Bible, and comes to explicit statement in such passages as John 1:14, "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us" (cf. I Tim. 3:16; Rom. 8:3). In NT usage "flesh," by metonymy, means "human nature." "Incarnation" is from the Latin, meaning "becoming flesh," that is, "becoming human." The doctrine of the incarnation teaches that the eternal Son of God (see TRINITY) became human, and that He did so without in any manner or degree diminishing His divine nature. A somewhat detailed statement of the incarnation is found in Philippians 2:5-11. Christ Jesus, "remaining (hyparchōn)" in the "form" of God, i.e. with all the essential attributes of God, took the "form" of a servant and died on the cross.

The virgin birth is necessary for our understanding of the incarnation. In the process of ordinary birth, a new personality begins. Jesus Christ did not begin to be when He was born. He is the eternal Son. The virgin birth was a miracle, wrought by the Holy Spirit, whereby the eternal Son of God "became flesh," i.e. took to Himself a genuine human nature, in addition to His eternal divine nature. It was a virgin birth, a miracle. The Holy Spirit has never been thought of as the father of Jesus. Jesus was not half man and half god like the Greek mythological heroes. He was fully God, the Second Person of the Trinity. "In Him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead in bodily form" (Col. 2:9). At the same time He became genuinely a man. To deny His genuine humanity is "the spirit of the Antichrist" (I John 4:2,3).

The Biblical data on the incarnation came to permanent doctrinal formulation at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. That council declared that Christ was "born of the virgin Mary" and is "to be acknowledged in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably . . . the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one Person . . ." This doctrine is concisely stated in the Westminster Shorter Catechism, Q. 21. "The only Redeemer of God's elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who, being the eternal Son of God, became man, and so was, and continueth to be, God and man, in two distinct natures and one Person for ever."

The creed of Chalcedon was the culmination of more than three centuries of discussion in which the main stream of Christian thought eliminated a variety of false interpretations as follows: 1. The Gnostic Docetae, condemned in I John 4:2,3, denied the genuine humanity of Jesus, and taught that He only appeared to suffer. 2. The Ebionites in the second century denied His deity. 3. The Arians, condemned at Nicea, A.D. 325, denied that His divine nature was equal with the Father's. 4. The Apollinarians, condemned at Constantinople, A.D. 381, denied that He had a complete human nature. 5. The Nestorians, condemned at Ephesus, A.D. 431, admitted the two natures, but taught that He was two personalities. 6. The Eutychians, condemned at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, taught that the two natures were so united and so changed that He was neither genuinely divine nor genuinely human. 7. The Biblical doctrine of the incarnation formalized at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, as stated above, is the Christology of the true historical Church.

But we need an understanding of the words of our doctrine, not just a formula to repeat. First, the emphasis upon the unity of His personality means that He was, in Himself, in His ego, His nonmaterial self, the same numerical identity, the same person. The person who was God and with God "in the beginning" before the created universe, is the same person who sat wearily at the well of Sychar, the same person who said, "Father, forgive them," on the cross. Secondly, the distinction of His natures means, and has always meant to the Church, that Jesus is just as truly God as the Father and the Spirit are God, and at the same time, without confusion or contradiction, He is just as truly man as we are men. (His humanity as the "last Adam" is perfectly sinless, yet genuinely human as was Adam before the fall.)

In this second matter, we must remember that a "nature" in the Biblical usage, is not a substantive entity. A nature is not a personality in the sense in which we are speaking. A nature is a complex of attributes. Since man is made in the image of God (see Jesus' argument in John 10:34-38 as discussed in the article on TRINITY) it follows that for God the Son, without diminution of His divine attributes, to assume a genuine human complex of attributes, including a normal human body, involves no contradiction. INCENSE (ĭn'sĕns), the KJV translation of two Hebrew words which were distinct in meaning at first, although later the second came to have virtually the same meaning as the first: levônâh, frankincense, and qetōrâh, incense. Incense was an aromatic substance made of gums and spices to be burned, especially in religious worship. It was compounded according to a definite prescription of stacte, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense in equal proportions, and was tempered with salt (Exod. 30:23f). It could not be made for ordinary purposes (Exod. 30:34-38; Lev. 10:1-7). Incense not properly compounded was rejected as "strange incense" (Exod. 30:9). The offering of incense was common in the religious ceremonies of nearly all ancient nations (Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Phoenicians, etc.), and was extensively used in the ritual of Israel.

The altar of incense was overlaid with pure gold, and was set in the Holy Place, near the veil that concealed the Holy of Holies. Originally, to burn it was the prerogative of the high priest, and he did so each morning when he dressed the lamps (Exod. 30:1-9). On the Day of Atonement he brought the incense within the veil and burned it in a censer in the Holy of Holies, so that the mercy seat was enveloped in a cloud of fragrant smoke (Lev. 16:12,13). The Korahites were punished with death for presuming to take it upon themselves to burn incense (Num. 16); the sons of Aaron died for offering it improperly (Lev. 10). By the time of Christ, incense was offered by ordinary priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot each morning and evening (Luke 1:9). The offering of incense was regarded as a solemn privilege. In offering of incense, fire was taken from the altar of burnt-offering and brought into the temple, where it was placed upon the altar of incense, and then the incense was emptied from a golden vessel upon the fire. When the priest entered the Holy Place with the incense, all the people were obliged to leave the temple. A profound silence was observed by them as they prayed outside (Luke 1:9,10). When the priest placed the incense on the fire, he bowed reverently towards the Holy of Holies, and retired slowly backwards, lest he alarm the congregation and cause them to fear that he had been struck dead for offering unworthily (Lev. 16:13).

The use of incense in the temple may have been partly a sanitary measure, since the smell of blood from the many animal sacrifices must have polluted the atmosphere, and the air would have to be fumigated; but it is largely explained by the love of the Oriental for sweet odors. Incense was often offered to those one wished to honor. For example, when Alexander the Great marched against Babylon, incense was offered on altars erected to him.

Incense was symbolical of the ascending prayer of the officiating high priest. The psalmist prayed, "Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense" (Ps. 141:2). In Revelation 8:3-5 an angel burns incense on the golden altar, and smoke ascends with the prayer of saints. . S.B.

INDIA (ĭn'dĭ-ȧ, Heb. hōddû, Gr. Indiké). The name occurs in the Bible only in Esther 1:1; 8:9, of the country which marked the eastern limit of the territory of Ahasuerus. The Hebrew word comes from the name of the Indus, Hondu, and refers not to the peninsula of Hindostan, but to the country adjoining the Indus, i.e. the Punjab, and perhaps also Scinde. Some have thought that this country is the Havilah of Genesis 2:11 and that the Indus is the Pishon. Many characteristic Indian products were known to the Israelites.

INHERITANCE (ĭn-hĕr'ĭ-tăns). The English word, in the OT, is a rendering of the Hebrew words nahalâh, heleq, yerushshâh, and môrāshâh, the last two being rare. The first occurs most often — almost 200 times, and is the common term for something inherited, an estate, a portion. A fundamental principle of Hebrew society was that real, as distinguished from personal, property belonged to the family rather than to the individual. This came from the idea that the land was given by God to His children, the people of Israel, and must remain in the family. The Mosaic Law directed that only the sons of a legal wife had the right of inheritance. The first-born son possessed the birthright, i.e., the right to a double portion of the father's possession; and to him belonged the duty of maintaining the females of the family (Deut. 21:15-17). The other sons received equal shares. If there were no sons, the property went to the daughters (Num. 27:8), on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (Num. 36:6ff). If the widow was left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her; and if he refused, the next of kin (Ruth 3:12,13). If no one married her, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin (Num. 27:9-11). An estate could not pass from one tribe to another. Since the land was so strictly tied up, testamentary dispositions were of course not needed. This strong feeling regarding family hereditary privileges was chiefly responsible for the Jews' taking such care to preserve the family genealogies.

"Inheritance" is not used in Scripture only to refer to inherited property. It is also used with a definitely theological significance. In the OT, at first it refers to the inheritance promised by God to Abraham and his descendants—the land of Canaan, "thy land, which thou hast given to thy people for an inheritance" (I Kings 8:36; cf. Num. 34:2; Deut. 4:21,38; 12:9f; 15:4; Ps. 105:9-11; 47:4). The conquest of the land under the leadership of Joshua was by God's help, not by Israel's military prowess (Josh. 21:43-45). God directed the partitioning of the land among the tribes (Num. 26: 52-56; Josh. 14:1-5; 18:4-9). Israel could continue to possess the land only on condition of faithfulness to God (Deut. 4:26ff; 11:8,9). Disobedience to God would result in the loss of the land, which could be recovered only by repentance and a new whole-hearted submission to God. (Isa. 57:13; 58: 13f).

The idea finds a further expansion and spiritualization along two other directions. Israelites came to learn that Jehovah Himself was the inheritance of His people (Jer. 10:16) and of the individual believer (Ps. 16:5f; 73:26; 142:5), and that His inheritance is His elect, brought "out of Egypt to be unto him a people of inheritance" (Deut. 4:20). "For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance" (Deut. 32:9). This conception was later broadened until Jehovah's inheritance is seen to include the Gentiles also (Isa. 19:25; 47:6; 63:17; Ps. 2:8).

The conception of inheritance is very prominent in the NT too, but now it is connected with the person and work of Christ, who is the heir by virtue of His being the Son (Mark 12:7; Heb. 1:2). Through Christ's redemptive work believers are sons of God by adoption and fellow-heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:17; Gal. 4:7). As a guarantee of this "eternal inheritance" (Heb. 9:15), Christ has given to them the Holy Spirit (Eph. 1:14). The Epistle to the Hebrews shows that as Israel in the Old Covenant received her inheritance from God, so in the New Covenant the New Israel receives an inheritance, only a better one. This inheritance, moreover, is not for Jews alone, but includes all true believers, including Gentiles (Eph. 3:6). The inheritance is the kingdom of God with all its blessings (Matt. 25:34; I Cor. 6:9; Gal. 5: 21), both present and eschatological (Rom. 8:17-23; I Cor. 15:50; Heb. 11:13; I Pet. 1:3,4). It is wholly the gift of God's sovereign grace. S.B.

INK (Heb. deyô, from a root meaning slowly flowing, Gr. mélan, black), any liquid used with pen or brush to form written characters. Mentioned once in the OT (Jer. 36:18), where Baruch says he wrote Jeremiah's prophecies "with ink." Hebrew ink was probably a lamp-black and gum, as is suggested by the "blotting out" of Exodus 32:33 and Numbers 5:23; but it is possible that in the course of Jewish history various inks were used. The word occurs three times in the NT (II Cor. 3:3; II John 12; III John 13). The NT books were written on papyrus, and the black ink used was made of vegetable soot mixed with gum and moistened as the writer needed it. The better black inks were made of nutgalls, sulphate of iron, and gum. The writing of MSS of the first century is remarkably well-preserved.

INN (Heb. mālôn, Gr. pandocheíon, katáluma). The Heb. word mālôn means a "night resting-place," and can apply to any place where there is encampment for the night, whether by caravans, individuals, or even armies. The presence of a building is not implied. It was originally very probably only a piece of level ground near a spring where carriers of merchandise could, with their animals, pass the night. Inns in the modern sense were not very necessary in primitive times, since travelers found hospitality the rule (Exod. 2:20; Judg. 19:15-21; II Kings 4:8; Acts 28:7; Heb. 13:2). We do not know when buildings were first used, but they would be needed early in the history of trade as a protection from inclement weather and in dangerous times and places. The "lodging place of wayfaring men" of Jeremiah 9:2 may have been such an establishment. An Oriental inn bore little resemblance to a hotel today. It was a mere shelter for man and beast. Like the modern "khan" or "caravanserai," it was a large quadrangular court into which admission was gained by a strong gateway. The more elaborate ones were almost as strong as a fortress. In the center of the court there was a well, and around the sides there were rooms and stalls. An upper story was reached by stairways. Travelers usually brought food for themselves and their animals.

Innkeepers in ancient times had a very bad reputation, and this, together with the Semitic spirit of hospitality, led Jews and Christians to recommend hospitality for the entertainment of strangers. One of the best-known inns in Palestine was half way between Jerusalem and Jericho (Luke 10:34). The Gr. word katáluma, used of the "upper room" where the Last Supper was held (Mark 14:14), and of the place in Bethlehem that turned away Joseph and Mary (Luke 2:7), was probably a room in a private house rather than in a public inn — corresponding to a spare room in a private house or in a village, probably that of a sheikh. The vast numbers who went to Jerusalem to attend the annual feasts were allowed to use such guest-chambers; and for this no payment was taken. S.B.

INNOCENTS, SLAUGHTER OF, the murder, by Herod the Great, of all the male children in Bethlehem two years old and under, when the wise men failed to return and tell him where they found the infant Jesus.

I.N.R.I., the initials of the Latin superscription which Pilate had placed above the cross of Jesus in three languages (Greek, Hebrew, Latin). The Latin reads: IESUS NAZARENUS, REX IUDAEORUM, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews (Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38; John 19:19).

INSECTS OF THE BIBLE. Through the centuries, insects have been an important factor in the life and well-being of man. Over 600,000 described species of insects are known and there are many hundred thousand more undescribed species. The frequent mention of insects in Bible references indicates their prevalence throughout Bible lands and times.

Insects compose the class Hexapoda of the phylum Arthropoda which is the largest phylum of the animal kingdom. Arthropods are characterized by bodies composed of similar segments joined together, bearing jointed legs. Insects are the air-breathing arthropods with bodies in three distinct divisions: head, thorax, and abdomen. They have one pair of antennae, three pairs of legs and usually one or two pairs of wings in the adult stage.

Insects have two types of development. First, the complete metamorphosis consisting of four stages: egg, larva, pupa and adult. Flies have a complete metamorphosis, the larval stage being the legless maggot. Second, the incomplete or gradual metamorphosis consisting of the three stages: egg, nymph, and adult. The nymph through a series of molts passes into the adult stage. Grasshoppers have a gradual metamorphosis in which the nymphal form bears some resemblances to the adult.

The economic significance of insects is extensive. Their destructive influences include such dreaded diseases as malaria, typhoid, typhus and yellow fever, filariasis and bubonic plague of which they are the carriers or essential hosts of the causal organisms. Fernald estimates that "the loss of labor by sickness and death caused by malaria alone is at least 100 million dollars and by all insect-borne diseases is over 350 million dollars each year in the United States" (H. T. Fernald, Applied Entomology, McGraw-Hill, New York, 1935, p. 34). Studies also indicate that crop losses average annually 10 per cent and with insect outbreaks yields may be reduced to 20 or 30 per cent. Further, add to this loss the almost incalculable cost of all types of pest and disease control throughout the world.

Beneficial effects of insects are also to be listed. Some parasitic forms serve as vital predators upon insect pests. Valuable products secured from insects include honey, wax, shellac, silk, and various dyes. The estimated value of commercial products from insects is 125 million dollars annually in the United States. The flower-visiting habits of insects provide required means of pollination for many plants, including most of the fruit trees which could not produce seed apart from insect activity. Insects also serve as food for fish, birds, and mammals.

Many insects are mentioned in the Bible, especially in the Old Testament. This article discusses the various insects with the references, identification wherever possible, influence upon human welfare, and brief pertinent life history details.

I. Grasshoppers, Locusts, and Crickets.

The grasshopper is the most frequently mentioned insect of Scripture with many Hebrew words used. Edible locusts are listed in Leviticus 11:21,22 as the locust chargōl, bald locust sal'ām or edible winged leaper or consumer, the grasshopper, and the beetle which is a misnomer for cricket. The Talmud is quoted by Broadus indicating the characteristics for identifying edible locusts. In the East locusts are still eaten by the poor. "The heads, legs and wings being removed, they are boiled, stewed or roasted and sometimes dressed in butter. They are eaten both fresh, and dried, or salted" (John A. Broadus, Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew, American Baptist Publication Society, 1886, p. 37). The insects John the Baptist ate were locusts (Mark 1:6).

The bristling locust, yeleq, is designated the palmerworm in Joel 1:4, and is also listed in Joel 2:25, Nahum 3:15,16; Psalms 105:34; Jeremiah 51:14,27 and other references. The name, grasshopper, chāgāb, the "coverer" is listed in Leviticus 11:22; Numbers 13:33; Ecclesiastes 12:5 and Isaiah 40:22. The term, locust, 'arbeh, is the edible winged leaper mentioned in Exodus 10:4,12,13,14; Leviticus 11:22; II Chronicles 6:28, and many other references. The Hebrew word, ts'lātsāl, of Deuteronomy 28:42, and gāzām of Joel 1:4; 2:25; and Amos 4:9 also refer to locust. Gāzām in the latter reference is more properly translated "cutting locust" RSV rather than "palmerworm," KJV.

These insects belong to the order, Orthoptera, which includes cockroaches, mantids, walking-sticks, crickets, katydids, grasshoppers and locusts. Grasshoppers and locusts are included in the family Locustidae, a large family of most destructive insects from the earliest times. Comstock states, "It is to these insects that the term 'locust' is properly applied; for the locusts of which we read in the Bible, and in other books published in the older countries, are members of this family." (John Henry Comstock, An Introduction to Entomology, Comstock, New York, 1936, p. 253). Most species of locusts are non-migratory, but some which are small in size and countless in number "migrate in vast swarms, short or long distances, settling in grainfields, orchards, and other cultivated areas and often devastating everything before them" (E. O. Essig, Insects of Western North America, Macmillan, New York, 1926, p. 72). They are omnivorous feeders on all kinds of vegetable matter and become cannibalistic and carnivorous when natural food is lacking.

A plague of locusts in the Jordan Valley in 1959 is described, reminding us of the ravages prophesied in Scripture (Joel 1:4; Nah. 3:15; Rev. 9:3,7). Eternity magazine states, "Now the pests (locusts) are swarming into Jordan and Israel and there are ominous portents that the summer may see a fresh irruption from the inexhaustible breeding grounds of the desert locust in Arabia. A Desert Locust Survey has been founded on a permanent basis. The Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations is sponsor to an International Desert Locust Information Service which is maintained by the Anti-Locust Research Center in London" (Eternity, July 1959, "Plague of the Locusts," p. 33).

Female locusts lay eggs in the soil 30 to 60 together. These hatch in the spring into nymphs which after feeding extensively and passing through several molts mature into adults in the midsummer or fall and migrate in countless numbers great distances.

Jerome in his commentary on Joel describes his own observation of locusts. "Even in our time we have seen troops of locusts cover the land of Judah. Then, when the shores of both seas were filled with heaps of dead locusts, which the waters had cast forth, their decay and stench became harmful to the extent of infecting the air and engendering disease for both animals and men (Jerome: Commentary on Joel, II, col. 25, col. 970).

II. Scale insects.

The scarlet color often mentioned in Scripture was made from the dried bodies of scale insects belonging to the order Homoptera. This order includes the cicadas, leaf-hoppers, aphids, scale bugs, tree-hoppers, white flies, and others. The scale insects are indirectly mentioned in the Bible. The two Hebrew words, argvan and hokkinos are translated "scarlet." Argvan occurs in Genesis 38:28,30; Exodus 25:4f; Leviticus 14:4,6,51,52; Joshua 2:18,21. Hokkinos occurs in 2 Samuel 1:24; Proverbs 31:21; Song of Solomon 4:3. New Testament references also of interest include Matthew 27:28; Hebrews 9:19 and Revelation 17:3,4.

The scale insect of Scripture is Coccus ilicis, the host of which is the oak Quercus coccifera, common in Syria. It is called kirmi (Sanskrit), kermes (Arabic), and karmil (Hebrew) hence carmin. The family Coccidae includes these scale insects and also such familiar insects as mealy bugs, rose-scale, and San Jose scale. Many of the worst horticultural pests are of this family. The female is wingless and remains attached to the leaf. The young are deposited in a waxy material. The female dies and the body dries into a concave shell under which the young develop. These dried bodies when made into a powder produce the red dye.

The Cochineal Coccids have been cultivated in India, Spain and elsewhere for the purpose of gathering the females which are dried and ground into powder for dye. Aniline dyes now largely replace the insect dyes.

The lac-insect, Tachardia lacca, excretes a resinous substance useful as a source of shell-lac or shellac. The bodies are then used for lac-dye.

III. Moths and Butterflies.

The order Lepidoptera includes two groups of insects, moths and butterflies. Moths commonly called "millers" are nocturnal, with wings wrapped around the body or spread horizontally and usually thread-like antennae. Butterflies are daytime insects most of which fold wings vertically, and have clubbed antennae. There are over 9,000 species of Lepidopterous insects in America.

These insects develop through a complete metamorphosis. Larvae are caterpillars which are usually hairy. A cocoon is spun consisting of body hairs and silk or fragments of debris in which the pupal stage is passed. The larval forms of many moths and butterflies are serious chewing pests of field and orchard crops. These are not to be confused with the larval stage of many flies which are naked, legless maggots. Lepidopterous larvae vary greatly in form and appearance, usually cylindrical and provided with 10 to 16 legs, including six thoracic legs and four to ten abdominal prolegs which are shed with the last larval skin. Adults of this order are characterized by the apparently dust-like covering of the wings which is minute scales of regular and identifying shape.

The moth of Scripture is usually the familiar clothes moth of the large family, Tineidae. The moth ash is mentioned in Job 4:19; 13:28; 27:18; Psalm 39:11; Isaiah 50:9; 51:8; Hosea 5:12 and Matthew 6:19. From ancient times, the clothes moth has been a most destructive pest of valued fabrics and the symbol of the perishable.

The family Tineidae includes over 125 North American species, the clothes moth being among the most common. Three species are well-known: the naked clothes-moth, the larva of which spins some silk wherever it goes making neither case nor gallery; the case-bearing clothes-moth, the larva of which makes a case from pieces of its food material webbed together; and the tube-building clothes-moth or tapestry moth, the larva of which makes a long, winding gallery of silk mixed with cloth fragments.

Scale insects on an olive branch (from Comstock Intro. Entomology).

The adult flies at night laying eggs on woolen goods, furs, or feathers. The larvae hatch in about ten days and begin feeding immediately. Wool, hair, furs, skins, feathers, and dried animal matter all constitute suitable food material, which is often completely destroyed by holes made by the larval stage. The mature larvae pupate, after which the adults emerge, mate, and the females lay the eggs of the next generation.

Scripture also mentions silk garments (Prov. 31:22; Ezek. 16:10,13; Rev. 18:12). Silk is reeled from the cocoons of the silk worm pupae. Essig states that the Chinese or mulberry silkworm, Bombyx mori Linn., is by far the most important commercial member of the insect world. The silkworm is native to Asia and has been domesticated so long as to require human care. It is the basis of large industries in Asiatic and European countries. Wing expanse of the adults measures 40-45 mm., and the caterpillar stage 45-55 mm. Larvae mature in 45 days and pupate in a thick oval white or yellow silken cocoon. Pupae are killed in the cocoons by heat or hot water and the raw silk is reeled for later use. White and black mulberry leaves are the preferred food of the larvae, although osage orange and even lettuce can be used to some extent. By procuring the silkworm eggs, larvae can be reared easily in confinement, using mulberry leaves. Special treatises on the subject should be secured before attempting the project.

The worm of Jonah 4:7 may have been a Lepidopterous larva. Such larvae are often voracious feeders, becoming very large before pupating and emerging as adults. Most of the references to worms in the Bible refer to the larvae of flies familiarly known as maggots.

IV. Flies.

All insects properly termed flies are included in the order Diptera. Comstock states that true flies are distinguished by a single pair of wings and a pair of halteres, thread-like clubbed appendages which are the second pair of wings and bear sense organs. This large order has 8,000 described species in North America distributed in over one thousand genera.

All types of crops are attacked by flies. Many species attack humans with most serious results. Malaria, yellow fever and filariasis are transmitted by flies.

Flies figured prominently in the plagues of Egypt. The third judgment of Exodus 8:16-19 termed "lice" (kinnim) was probably a sandfly capable of inflicting a painful sting, though identification is not certain. The fourth judgment of Exodus 8:20-32 termed "flies" is considered by many to be the mosquito from the Hebrew arob, meaning to suck.

Eggs of the mosquito are laid singly or in rafts on water or mud. The larvae are the "wrigglers" found in stagnant water which pupate and emerge into adult mosquitoes. Several diseases are caused by this insect. Certain species of the genus Anopheles transmit the parasites of malaria. The complex life-cycle of this unicellular parasite requires both the Anopheles mosquitoes and man. Upon biting an infected person, the malarial parasite is transferred to the alimentary canal of the mosquito where further stages occur. From the alimentary canal the organisms move to the body cavity of the mosquito and later to the salivary glands of the host from which they pass with saliva into the next person bitten. Hence, campaigns to eliminate mosquitoes are essential in eradication of malaria. Yellow fever, dengue fever and filariasis are also mosquito-born diseases. The parasitic worms causing filariasis increase in the blood stream causing severe stoppage of the lymphatic trunks of the body. Elephantiasis is one such disease. For detailed description of mosquito-caused diseases consult William A. Riley and Oskar A. Johannsen, Medical Entomology, New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc., 1938, p. 225.

Another fly not mentioned in the Bible but probably the cause of losses to olive crops is the olive fly. Frequent references are made to such losses (Deut. 28:40; Amos 4:9; Mic. 6:16; Hab. 3:17). The olive fly is a very serious pest to ripe olives in the Mediterranean region and also occurs in Northwest India on wild olives. The adult fly deposits eggs beneath the skin of ripening olives. A maggot hatches from the egg destroying the fruit.

In Acts 12:23 Herod is described as dying the horrible death of being eaten of worms. The screwworm is capable of such ravages. The adult female fly lays eggs on decaying animal matter and also in wounds, sores, nostrils and ears of men and cattle causing serious diseases. The following vivid description is quoted by Riley and Johannsen from Castellani and Chalmers: "Some days after a person suffering from a chronic catarrh, foul breath, or ozaena has slept in the open or has been attacked by a fly when riding or driving — i.e., when the hands are engaged — signs of severe catarrh appear, accompanied with inordinate sneezing and severe pain over the root of the nose or the frontal bone. Quickly the nose becomes swollen, and later the face also may swell, while examination of the nose may show the presence of the larvae. Left untreated, the patient rapidly becomes worse, and pus and blood are discharged from the nose, from which an offensive odor issues. Cough appears as well as fever, and often some delirium. If the patient lives long enough, the septum of the nose may fall in, the soft and hard palates may be pierced, the wall of the pharynx may be destroyed. By this time, however, the course of the disease will have become quite evident by the larvae dropping out of the nose; and if the patient continues to live, all the larvae may come away naturally" (William A. Riley and Oskar A. Johannsen, Medical Entomolgy, McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc., New York, 1938, p. 385).

Several Bible verses speak of worms on dead bodies (Job 7:5; 17:14; 21:26; Isa. 14:11; 66:24). Mark 9:43-48 probably conveys the same repulsive phenomenon. The flesh-flies of the family Sarcophagidae lay eggs in the bodies of dead animals which hatch into maggots. These pass the entire larval period feeding on the decaying mass. Also the blow-flies of the family, Calliphoridae have very similar habits to the flesh-flies. They are the familiar noisy, large flies of shining greenish or bluish color. They serve the beneficial purpose of assisting in the decomposition of dead bodies.

V. Fleas.

Two Bible verses speak of the flea (I Sam. 24:14; 26:20). The flea (par'osh), belongs to the order Siphonaptera. The description given by Comstock is that of a small, wingless insect with body greatly laterally compressed. In I Samuel 24:14, David's reference to the flea is to indicate insignificance. The second reference seems to indicate the agility of the insect and difficulty of catching it. The flea illustrates this faculty with its body surface hard and smooth and its legs highly developed for jumping. Studies indicate that the human flea can jump 13 inches horizontally, and 7¾ inches vertically. Only with difficulty does one succeed in catching a flea, and having caught it, the task of killing it is still more difficult.

There are over 500 species of fleas and their distribution is very wide. They are abundant and offensive in the Orient and common in Palestine and Arabia. The bite is very irritating.

Bubonic plague of history is a flea-borne disease. It is spread by rats infected through fleas. In the 14th century, 25,000,000 deaths were caused by this disease. The simultaneous death of rats led to a study which proved the disease to be primarily a rodent disease conveyed to man by fleas. In 1665 the plague accounted for 68,596 deaths in London.

Eggs of fleas are scattered on floors of dwellings and sleeping-places of infested animals. Larvae are slender, worm-like creatures which feed on decaying particles of animal and vegetable matter. Fleas are parasitic only in the adult stage.

VI. Ants and bees.

Ants. Two Bible verses speak of the ant (Prov. 6:6; 30:25). The industry and foresight of the ant are here eulogized. Studies of their habits reveal these characteristics dramatically true. Some ants raid other ant nests, carrying away captives for slaves. Over 100 kinds of ants raise fungi for food. In large numbers they climb trees cutting leaves which they drop to the ground for the "ground crew" to gather and drag to the colony for fungi-growing medium. Ants tending root-feeding aphids carry them to protective galleries, convey them to food sources, collect and store their eggs for winter, and in the spring take them to their food. Some ants tend aphids for the honeydew secreted. The honey-ants Myrmecocystus, are so called from the characteristic of individual workers serving as reservoirs for storing honey-dew gathered by other ants of the colony. These are called "repletes." They swallow sufficient honey-dew gathered by the others to distend their abdomens to a pea-sized sphere. Now incapable of locomotion, they remain quiet in the colony disgorging their honey-dew supply for nourishment to the others in time of need.

Typical ants belong to the subfamily Formicinae, including the carpenter ant, mound-building ant, blood-red slave-maker, harvesting ants, and many others. Most harvesting ants are found in arid regions of scant food supply and are therefore compelled to feed on seeds. Solomon's ants mentioned in Proverbs 6:6 and 30:25 are harvester ants. Species of harvester ants include the small harvester ant, acrobat ant, black harvester ant, agricultural ant, and the mound-building prairie ant. The prairie ant lives in large colonies surrounded by a cleared area 6 to 15 feet in diameter with mounds 4 to 12 inches high and 2 to 3 feet in diameter. Tunnels in the soil below the surface reach a depth of 9 feet.

Ants are all social insects. There are three castes: males, female or queen, and workers. Comstock states that the most important work on the subject is that of Professor W. M. Wheeler, Ants, Their Structure, Development and Behavior, 1910.

Bees. Hornets and yellow jackets belong to the family Vespidae. In Exodus 23:28; Deuteronomy 7:20 and Joshua 24:12 the hornet is mentioned as the means used by God to drive out the enemies of Israel. Hornets are medium-sized insects, mostly yellow and black in color, and build large and small paper nests mostly above ground, but also below. They feed on flies and are beneficial insects. They possess a severe sting, a pugnacious spirit, and fast flight thus making them a formidable opponent from which to flee.

Several references in Scripture speak of bees (Deut. 1:44; Ps. 118:12; Isa. 7:18). Enemies are likened unto bees in their pursuing tactics and large numbers. Bees are very common in Palestine where the warm climate and abundance of flowers favor their increase.

The mention of a swarm of bees and honey in Judges 14:8 may refer to the honey-bee of commerce today. There is no evidence that the Hebrews cultivated honey-bees. The honey bee is a highly social insect living in colonies varying from 20,000 to 50,000 individuals. The phrase "bee hive of activity" is a graphic picture, for the hive is the residence of these many thousands of individuals each with responsible activity. Within the hive is found the nursery for rearing larvae, the place of wax production for food storage, the processing of nectar for honey, the preparation of pollen for food and plant waxes for plastering. A continuing stream of bees depart and return throughout sunny daylight hours in ceaseless work for the hive. Food gathered in the hive includes honey which is made from nectar brought from flowers and elaborated in the honey sac of the workers and stored in the wax cells of the comb. Bee bread is also a food material for larvae consisting of pollen gathered from flowers and mixed with honey. Royal jelly is a highly nutritious material secreted mostly by young adult workers and fed to all very young larvae. It is the entire food of larvae destined to become queens, for the production of queens is a voluntary activity of the workers controlled by the use of this food material exclusively.

Periodically the old queen and a large number of workers and drones leave the hive in a swarm to establish a new hive leaving ample "personnel" to maintain the old hive. [The location of the new hive varies widely.] W.M.W.

INSPIRATION. In the KJV of the Bible the word inspiration is used twice, in Job 32:8 to translate the Hebrew word neshāmâh (breathe) and in II Timothy 3:16, where it translates the Greek word theópneustos. The latter passage has given its meaning to the word inspiration as commonly applied to Scripture. Literally translated, theópneustos means God-breathed. The key to its meaning may be gleaned from the OT concept of the divine breathing as productive of effects which God Himself is immediately accomplishing by His own will and power (see Ps. 33:6). By this word, therefore, Paul is asserting that the written documents, called Holy Scripture, are a divine product.

Precisely the same idea is set forth in II Peter 1:19-21. In this passage the prophetic Word (i.e., Scripture) is contrasted with mere fables devised by human cunning. Scripture is more sure and trustworthy than the testimony of any eyewitness. The explanation for its unique authority lies in its origin. It was produced not as a merely human private interpretation of the truth, but by God's Spirit through the prophets.

In both II Timothy 3:16 and II Peter 1:19-21 the fact of the divine productivity (spiration rather than *in*spiration) of the "Holy Writings" is thus explicitly asserted. This divine (in)spiration is further confirmed by a host of NT passages. The authors of Scripture wrote in or by the Spirit (Mark 12:36). What the Scripture states is really what God has said (Heb. 3:7; Acts 4:25; and see especially Heb. 1:5ff). This is true irrespective of whether or not in the particular passage cited the words are ascribed to God or are the statements of the human author. In the mind of the NT writers any passage of Scripture was really "spoken" by God. Our Lord employed the same type of reference, attributing directly to God the authorship of Scripture (Matt. 19:4 and 5).

Because of the character of the God of truth who "inspired" (or produced) the Holy Scriptures, the result of "inspiration" is to constitute it as fully trustworthy and authoritative. Indeed, this absolute divine authority of Scripture, rather than its inspiration, is the great burden of Scriptural teaching about its own nature (see Pss. 19:7-14; and 119:89, 97, 113, 160; Zech. 7:12; Matt. 5: 17-19; Luke 16:17; John 10:34 and 35; I Thess. 2:13). Besides those passages directly teaching the authority of Scripture, such phrases as "It is written" (Luke 4:4,8,10; Matt. 21:13). "It (or He) says" (Rom. 9:15; Gal. 3:16), and "Scripture says" (Gal. 3:8; Rom. 9:17) — all clearly imply an absolute authority for the OT Scriptures.

These passages teaching the authority of Scripture indicate also the extent of inspiration. If the authority and trustworthiness of Scripture are complete, inspiration itself must also extend to all of Scripture. This completeness of inspiration and consequent authority of all Scripture is made explicit in such passages as Luke 24:25: "O, fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken" (see also Matt. 5:17-19; Luke 16: 17; and John 10:34 and 35).

The inerrant and infallible inspiration of Scripture, though not exactly synonymous terms, are nevertheless both correctly applied to Scripture in order to indicate that inspiration and authority are complete. The word inerrant suggests that the Scriptures do not wander from the truth. Infallible is stronger, suggesting an incapability of wandering from the truth ("Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the Scriptures?" (Mark 12:24).

The completeness of inspiration is further established by the fact that Scripture lacks altogether any principle for distinguishing between those parts of it which are inspired and thus possess binding authority, and supposedly uninspired parts which do not possess binding authority. The method of inspiration is never developed in the Scriptures, although the basic fact that Scripture is produced by the power of God working in and through the prophet indicates the mutual interworking of the divine and human hand. By pointing to a human author of Scripture (e.g. "David himself said by the Holy Spirit" — Mark 12:36; "Moses wrote" — Mark 12:19; and "Isaiah said" — John 12:39), by stating his purpose in the writing of a book (e.g. John 20:30 and 31 and Luke 1:1-4), and by acknowledging research in the preparation of the writing of Scripture (Luke 1:2 and 3), the Biblical authors make indubitably plain that the divine method of inspiration was not any process of dictation.

At this point great caution should be taken not to read into the Biblical idea of the origin of Scripture suggestions derived from the English word inspiration (or Latin inspiratio). The point of the Biblical teaching is never a divine heightening of the human powers of the prophet (though the Bible does not deny that in certain instances such may have taken place). Rather, by all those inconceivable means at the disposal of a sovereign God, the Holy Spirit used the writers of Scripture to produce through them the message that He wished to communicate to man. God's Spirit obviously did not need in every case to "inspire" (i.e. to raise to greater heights than ordinarily) a Micah or a Luke; rather God produced the writing He wished by His sovereign preparation and control of a man who could and freely would write just what God desired to be His divinely authoritative message to His people.

Biblical inspiration must be complemented by an interior illumination of the Holy Spirit (I Cor. 2: 14ff) in order to make that which God has given in the past really become His living, revealing Word today in the heart and mind of the believer. It is in this sense that the word inspiration is used in the Authorized translation of Job 32:8. In traditional theological terminology this latter work is generally referred to as the illumination of the Holy Spirit.

In summary, Biblical inspiration (as distinguished from illumination) may be defined as the work of the Holy Spirit by which, through the instrumentality of the personality and literary talents of its human authors, He constituted the words of the Bible in all of its several parts as His written word to men and therefore of divine authority and without error in the autographs.

K.S.K.

INTEREST (ĭn'tĕr-ĕst, Heb. neshekh, something bitten off, mashā', lending on interest, Gr. tókos, something produced by money). In the OT there is no trace of any system of commercial credit. Large commercial loans were not made in ancient Israel. Only the poor borrowed, and they did it to obtain the necessities of life. The law of Moses forbade lending at interest to a fellow Israelite (Exod. 22:25), but permitted charging interest to a foreigner (Deut. 23:20). A needy Israelite might sell himself as a servant (Lev. 25:39; II Kings 4:1). The prophets condemn the taking of interest as a heinous sin (Ezek. 18:8,13,17; Jer. 15:10). In the NT, references to interest occur in two parables — of the Pounds (Luke 19:23) and of the Talents (Matt. 25:27), and it is distinctly encouraged.

INTERMEDIATE STATE. The life of man is represented in Scripture as falling into three stages: first, the period from birth until death, which is life in the present world and in the natural body; second, life in the intermediate state, between death and the resurrection, which is life without the body; and, third, life in the resurrection body, which is the final and eternal state.

The Bible does not have a great deal to say regarding the intermediate state. Rather, it focuses attention on the second coming of Christ and the glories of heaven that will follow. For this reason, while such a state is generally acknowledged by Christians everywhere, there are differences of opinion regarding its nature: whether the soul is conscious or asleep, whether those who die unsaved have another chance in the next life, whether the wicked will be annihilated.

For the righteous the intermediate state is a time of rest and blessedness, holiness and happiness. The NT sometimes represents the state of death as a "sleeping" and the act of dying as a "falling asleep" (Matt. 9:24; John 9:4; 11:11; I Thess. 4:13,15; II Pet. 3:4), but this does not mean that the soul is unconscious until the resurrection, but that the dead person is like one asleep in not being alive to his surroundings. The story of the rich man and Lazarus represents the latter as conscious and blessed in Abraham's bosom (Luke 16:19-31). On the cross Jesus said to the penitent thief, "Today shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (Luke 23:43). John says, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works follow them" (Rev. 14:13). Paul says to the Corinthians that he is "willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be at home with the Lord" (II Cor. 5:8); and to the Philippians he writes that he has a "desire to depart and to be with Christ" (Phil. 1:23). But while the intermediate state is for believers a time of freedom from sin and pain, it is nevertheless also one of imperfection, or incompleteness. This is because the soul is without a body, which for man is an abnormal condition, and because Christ's rewards to His people for the labors of this life will not be given until His second coming. The blessings of the intermediate state are, as it were, only an earnest of the good things to come.

That the intermediate state involves conscious suffering for the unregenerate, is shown by the story of the rich man and Lazarus, in which the rich man finds himself in torment immediately upon dying, with his brothers still on earth (Luke 16:19-31).

Some scholars regard Sheol-Hades as a neutral place, neither heaven nor hell, where all men, good and bad, go and remain, either permanently or until some communal resurrection. Careful study shows, however, that the words are not always used in the same sense, but may, depending on the context, refer to the state of death, the grave, the place of departed souls, or hell. In the following passages Sheol refers to the place of punishment for the wicked: Deuteronomy 32:22; Job 21:13; Psalm 9:17; Proverbs 7:27.

The theory of "second probation," that those who die unsaved will have another chance for salvation in the next life, is based upon the erroneous principle that only the conscious rejection of Christ and His Gospel causes men to perish. Scripture, however, shows that men are already under God's condemnation when salvation is offered to them. The main Scriptural basis for this view is found in I Peter 3:19 and 4:6, which are understood to teach that Christ in the period between His death and resurrection preached to the spirits in Hades. But these passages may be interpreted quite differently, as any scholarly commentary shows. Scripture represents the state of the lost after death as a fixed state (Luke 16:19-31; John 8:21,24; II Cor. 5:10; 6:2; II Pet. 2:4,9; Jude 7-13). The final judgment is always represented as determined by things done in the body, not in the intermediate state (Matt. 7:22,23; 10:32,33; 25:34-36; II Cor. 5:9,10).

Annihilationism holds to the view that there is no conscious existence, if any existence at all, of the wicked after death. Support for it is found in those passages of Scripture which represent eternal life and immortality as a gift of God to those who believe in Christ (John 3:16; 10:27,28; 17:3; Rom. 2:7; 6:22,23; Gal. 6:8). The "death" and "destruction" with which sinners are threatened are interpreted to mean non-existence (Matt. 7:13; 10:28; John 3:16; Rom. 6:23; 8:13; II Thess. 1:9). Scripture, however, teaches that both saints and sinners exist forever (Eccl. 12:7; Matt. 25:46; Rev. 14:11; 20:10), and represents the punishment of the wicked as everlasting (Matt. 25:41,46; 18:8; Mark 9:43,44; Rev. 14:11; 20:10). The Greek word for "everlasting" (aionios) is used to describe both the blessings of the saved in heaven and the punishment of the lost. S.B.

IPHEDEIAH (ĭf-ĕ-dē'yà, Heb. yiphdeyâh, Jehovah redeems), a descendant of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:25).

IR (ĭr, Heb. 'ir, watcher), the ancestral head of a clan of Benjamin. He belonged to the family of Bela (I Chron. 7:7,12).

IRA (ī'rà, Heb. 'īrā'). 1. A chief minister, or priest, in the time of David (II Sam. 20:26).

2. A son of Ikkesh, a Tekoite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:26; I Chron. 11:28).

3. An Ithrite, one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:38; I Chron. 11:40).

IRAD (ī'răd, Heb. 'īrādh), grandson of Cain and son of Enoch (Gen. 4:18).

IRAM (ī'răm, Heb. 'īrām), a chief of Edom (Gen. 36:43; I Chron. 1:54).

IR-HA-HERES (ĭr-hă-hē'rĕz, Heb. 'ir ha-heres), a city of Egypt mentioned only in Isaiah 19:18, "In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of hosts; one shall be called, The city of destruction." The passage is difficult of exegesis because of the uncertainty of the text, and many interpretations have been given of it, especially in modern times. Many MSS and several versions read "City of the Sun," and some have thought that it refers to the city of Heliopolis in Egypt, called in the Bible

"On" (Gen. 41:50, etc.), a city of great importance in the religion of Egypt. This is the reading preferred by the RSV translators. The LXX reads "city of Righteousness." The Massoretic reading, "the city of destruction," seems to indicate that we have here not the name of a city, but merely a descriptive appellation of that city which should be destroyed. It is not possible to identify this city exactly.

IRI (ī'rī, Heb. îrî), a Benjamite of the family of Bela (I Chron. 7:7,12).

IRIJAH (ī-rī'jà, Heb. yir'îyāyh, Jehovah sees), a captain of the guard, who at the time of the Chaldean siege of Jerusalem, arrested Jeremiah, who was leaving the city at the gate of Benjamin, on suspicion of intending to desert to the enemy (Jer. 37:13).

IR-NAHASH (ĭr-nā'hăsh, Heb. 'îr nāhāsh), a town of Judah of which Tehinnah is called the "father," probably meaning "founder" (I Chron. 4:12). The site is uncertain.

IRON (Heb. barzel, Gr. sideros). Tubal-cain, of the race of Cain, is described as "an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron" (Gen. 4:22). It used to be thought that the use of iron began very late, but modern archaeology shows that there was a knowledge of iron as early as the third millennium B.C. Remains of an iron blade dating c. 2700 B.C. have been found by the Oriental Institute at the University of Chicago at a site about 50 miles NE of Baghdad. A small steel axe from Ur and other early objects of iron have also been found. The fact that not more iron objects of an early period have been found is undoubtedly due to the fact that iron oxidizes quickly. Iron was not smelted in Egypt before 1300 B.C. The Taurus Mountains, the chief iron supply of Asia Minor, were for many years controlled by the Hittites. Iron began to come into general use in Palestine in the 13th century B.C. The Israelites in the period of the judges and the early monarchy envied and dreaded the iron furnaces of the Philistines, which gave the latter a tremendous superiority in arms. It was both inconvenient and expensive for the Israelites to go to Philistia to get iron tools made or repaired (I Sam. 13:20). Lack of iron for farming implements, nails, and weapons for war kept the Israelites comparatively poor through the period of the judges. They could not drive the Canaanites out of the plains because the latter had chariots and weapons of iron (Josh. 17:18; Judg. 1:19; 4:2,3). Even in the time of Saul, his army had no swords or spears for battle, he and Jonathan alone possessing them (I Sam. 13:22). When the power of the Philistines was broken by Saul and David, the iron-smelting formula became public property, and the metal came to be widely used in Israel.

Iron ore was brought in by Tyrian traders, mainly from Spain, although it was also found in the Lebanon range (Jer. 11:4; Deut. 4:20; 8:9; I Kings 8:51) and probably Egypt (Deut. 4:20). The Jews seem to have learned the art of working in iron from the Phoenicians (II Chron. 2:14). The ore was reduced in furnaces built of stone; charcoal was used in them, and the fire was blown by bellows (Ezek. 22:20). Wrought iron, cast iron, and steel were made.

Iron was used in Bible times much as it is used today. Out of iron, blacksmiths in the Mosaic period made axes and other implements (Num. 35:16). We read that Og's bedstead was made of iron (Deut. 3:11), although some hold it was made of basalt, a black iron-like stone. In the time of Joshua and of the judges vessels were made of metal (Josh. 6:19,24). Later, of iron were made threshing instruments (Amos 1:3), harrows (II Sam. 12:31), axes (II Sam. 12:31; II Kings 6:6), other tools (I Kings 6:7), weapons (Num. 35:16; Job 20:24), armor (II Sam. 23:7), horns (I Kings 22:11), fetters (Ps. 105:18), chariots Josh. 17:16), yokes (Jer. 28:14), chisels (Job 19:24; Jer. 17:1), sheets or plates (Ezek. 4:3), gods (Dan. 5:4), weights (I Sam. 17:7). Iron was among the materials gathered by David for the building of the temple (I Chron. 22:14,16; 29:2,7). There are allusions to iron gates (Acts 12:10), prison bars (Ps. 107:10,16; Isa. 10:34), nails or bolts (I Chron. 22:3). We read that when David captured the city of Rabbah, he set the inhabitants to laboring with saws, iron picks, and iron axes (II Sam. 12:31). There is a description of a smith at work in Ecclesiasticus 38:28.

The word iron is often used figuratively in Scripture. It is made to represent barrenness (Deut. 28:23), slavery ("yoke of iron," Deut. 28:48), captivity (Ps. 107:10), moral deterioration (Jer. 6:28), political strength (Dan. 2:33), fortitude ("iron pillar," Jer. 1:18), strength "bars of iron," Job 40:18), severity ("rod of iron," Ps. 2:9), destructive power ("iron teeth," Dan. 7:7), and affliction ("iron furnace," Deut. 4:20; Ezek. 22:18-22). See MINERALS AND METALS. S.B.

IRON (ī'rŏn, Heb. yir'ōn), a fortified city in the territory of Naphtali (Josh 19:38). It is probably the present village of Yarun, ten miles W of Lake Huleh.

IRPEEL (ĭr'pī-ĕl, Heb. yirpe'ēl, God heals), a city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:27)); site uncertain, but probably near the ancient Gibeon.

IRRIGATION (ĭr-ĭ-gā'shŭn), a word for which there is no Hebrew or Greek equivalent in the Bible, although the use of irrigation for watering plants and trees is frequently implied (Eccl. 2:5,6; Isa. 58:11). There was less need of irrigation in Palestine and Syria than in Egypt and Babylonia. In Palestine it was necessary only in the summer.

IR-SHEMESH (ĭr-shē'mĕsh, Heb. 'îr shemesh, city of the sun), a city of Dan (Josh. 19:41), the same as Beth-shemesh.

IRU (ī'rōō, Heb. 'îrû), eldest son of Caleb (I Chron. 4:15); probably to be read Ir.

ISAAC (ī'zàk, Heb. yitshāk, Gr. Isaák, one laughs), the only son of Abraham by Sarah, and the second of three Hebrew patriarchs who were the progenitors of the Jewish race. He was born in the south country, probably Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:14,31), when Abraham was 100 and Sarah 90 years old (Gen. 17:17; 21:5). He was named Isaac because both Abraham and Sarah had laughed incredulously at the thought of having a child at their age (Gen. 17:17-19; 18:9-15; 21:6). His birth must be regarded as a miracle. It was 25 years after God had promised the childless Abraham and Sarah a son, that the promise was fulfilled. He is thus rightly called the child of promise, in contrast with Ishmael, who was born of Hagar, Sarah's maid, and Abraham. When he was eight days old, he was circumcised (Gen. 21:4). Fearing future jealousy and strife between the two boys when she observed Ishmael mocking Isaac, Sarah tried to persuade Abraham to cast out Hagar and Ishmael. Abraham was loath to do this because he loved the boy, and did so only when he received explicit direction from God, who said to him that his seed would be called in Isaac, but He would also make of Ishmael a nation (Gen. 21:9-13).

The next recorded event in the life of Isaac is connected with God's command to Abraham to offer him as a sacrifice on a mountain in the land of Moriah (Gen. 22). His exact age then is not stated, but he is described as a "lad," able to carry up the mountainside the wood for the burnt-offering. In this whole experience his filial acquiescence in his father's purpose, his unquestioning submission and obedience, stand out almost as remarkably as his father's faith. Bound upon the altar and about to be slain, his life was spared when an angel of the Lord interposed and substituted for him a ram, which was offered up in his stead. God's purpose in this great test of Abraham's faith is looked at in various ways, among the more important being the following: it is the last and culminating point in God's education of Abraham regarding the meaning of sacrificial obedience; it is a rebuke by God of the widespread heathen practice of sacrificing human beings; it is an object lesson to Abraham of the great sacrifice of the Messiah for the redemption of mankind.

Sarah died at Hebron when Isaac was 36 years old (Gen. 23:1). At the age of 40 he married Rebekah, a kinswoman from Mesopotamia (Gen. 24), but he and his wife were childless until, in answer to prayer, twin sons, Esau and Jacob, were born to them when he was 60 (Gen. 25:20,26). At a time of famine, God admonished him not to go down into Egypt, as he had thought of doing, but to remain in the promised land; and he pledged His word to be with him. He went to the Philistine city of Gerar, and there, fearing for his own life, he passed off his wife as his sister, as his father had done before him; and was justly rebuked by Abimelech the king for his duplicity (Gen. 26:10). He then pitched his camp in the valley of Gerar and became so prosperous as a wheat-grower and herdsman that the envious Philistines began a systematic, petty harassment by stopping up the wells which his father had dug and which he had opened again. Abimelech even advised him to leave the country in the interests of peace (Gen. 26). Isaac subsequently returned to Beersheba. There the Lord appeared to him at night and promised to bless him for his father's sake. Realizing that God was with him, Abimelech then came from Gerar to make overtures of peace, and the two men formally entered into a covenant (Gen. 26:26-31). Probably at a considerably later period, Esau, at the age of 40, brought grief of mind to Isaac and Rebekah by marrying two daughters of Caanan (Gen. 26:34,35).

The last prominent event in the life of Isaac is the blessing of his sons (Gen. 27). Esau, the elder, was his father's favorite, even though God had told him that the elder would serve the younger, while Rebekah's favorite was Jacob (Gen. 25:28). When he was over 100 years old, and dim of sight, and perhaps thinking that his end was near, he desired to bestow his last blessing upon his elder son; but through Rebekah's cunning and guile, Jacob the younger supplanted his brother, and the blessing of the birthright was bestowed upon him. To save Jacob from the murderous wrath of Esau, who determined to kill him after his father's death, Rebekah induced Isaac to send Jacob into Mesopotamia, that, after his own example, his son might take a wife from among his own kindred, and not imitate Esau by marriage with Canaanite women. Isaac invoked another blessing upon the head of Jacob and sent him away to Laban in Padan-aram (Gen. 27-28:5).

Isaac is mentioned only once more, when 20 years later, Jacob returned from his sojourn in Mesopotamia, having, agreeably to his father's command, married into Laban's family. Jacob found the old man at Mamre in Hebron, and there Isaac died, 180 years old, and his two sons, Esau and Jacob, buried him (Gen. 35:27-29).

The NT refers to Isaac almost a score of times. His sacrifice by Abraham is twice mentioned, in Hebrews 11:17,18 and James 2:21, but while the submission of Isaac is referred to, the stress is upon the triumph of Abraham's faith. He is contrasted with Ishmael, as the child of promise and the progenitor of the children of promise (Rom. 9:7,10; Gal. 4:28; Heb. 11:18). In our Lord's argument with the Sadducees on the matter of resurrection, He represents him, although gathered to his people, as still living to God (Luke 20:37). In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus proclaimed that many would come from the E and the W to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven.

Of the three patriarchs, Isaac was the least conspicuous, traveled the least, had the fewest extraordinary adventures, and lived the longest. He was free from violent passions; quiet, gentle, dutiful; less a man of action than of thought and suffering. His name is always joined in equal honor with Abraham and Jacob. S.B.

ISAIAH. Little is known about the Prophet Isaiah except what his own words reveal. His name Isaiah (Salvation of Jehovah) is almost identical in meaning with Joshua (Jehovah is salvation) which appears in the NT as Jesus, the name of the Messiah whom Isaiah heralded. That his name played a formative role in his life is not improbable since it expresses the great theme of his prophetic ministry. His father, Amoz, may have been a person of prominence, since the prophet is so often called (13 times) "the son of Amoz," but nothing is known about him. Isaiah was married and had two children to whom he gave significant names (7:3; 8:3).

Period. Isaiah prophesied in four reigns, from Uzziah to Hezekiah (1:1). The first date given is the year of Uzziah's death (6:1), which probably occurred about 740 B.C. or several years later. The last historical event referred to is the death of Sennacherib (37:38) which occurred in 681 B.C. The most important events are the Syro-Ephraimitic war in the days of Ahaz (7:1-9), which Isaiah treated, despite its devastation (II Chron. 28:5-15), as almost insignificant compared with the far greater scourge. Assyria, which was so soon to follow (vss. 17-25). Assyria is the great enemy with which much of chapters 7-39 deals; and beyond it looms an even mightier foe, Babylon, whose downfall is foretold already in chapters 13-14 and is the great theme of 40-48. Over against these terrible instruments of divine judgment Isaiah pictures the Messianic hope, first in counseling unbelieving Ahaz, and repeatedly thereafter.

Analysis. The structure of Isaiah is, in its broad outlines, a simple one, but in its details it raises many problems. It may be briefly analyzed as follows:

I. Chapters 1-5, Introductory. Chapter 1 contains the "great arraignment." Like so many of Isaiah's utterances, it combines dire threatenings with urgent calls to repentance and gracious offers of forgiveness and blessing. It is followed by the promise of world redemption (2:1-5). Then come a series of threatening passages, including a detailed description of the finery of the women of Jerusalem as illustrating the sinful frivolity of the people as a whole. The land is likened to an unfruitful vineyard, which will soon become desolate. It concludes with a series of six woes which end in gloom: "and the light is darkened in the heavens thereof."

II. Chapter 6, The Temple Vision. Whether this represents the initial call of Isaiah has been much debated. If the woe pronounced on himself by the prophet is to be understood as the seventh woe, intended to show that the prophet was as conscious of his own sin as of the sin of his people, we may assume that this chapter stands in its proper place chronologically and that this vision came to him some time after he began to prophesy. But the question must remain unsettled. It is a vision of the Holy God; and "Holy One of Israel" becomes one of Isaiah's favorite titles for the Deity in whose name he speaks.

III. Chapters 7-12, the Book of Immanuel. This group of chapters belongs to the period of the Syro-Ephraimitic war (II Kings 16:1-20; II Chron. 28). In the midst of this time of peril, Isaiah utters the great prophecies regarding Immanuel (7: 14-16; 9:6f.; 11:1-10); and he concludes with a song of triumphant faith which ends with the assurance, "great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee." Here again "woe" (10:1-4) and "threatening" (vss. 5-19) stand in vivid contrast with Messianic blessing (11:1-16).

IV. Chapters 13-23, Prophecies against the Nations. These are ten "burdens," i.e., weighty, solemn, and grievous utterances (Jer. 23:33f.) against nations which were or would be a menace to God's people: Babylon (13-14:27), Philistia (14:28-32), Moab (15-16), Damascus (17-18), Egypt (19-20), Babylon (21:1-10), Dumah (vss. 11-12), Arabia (vss. 13-17), Jerusalem (22), Tyre (23). Here prophecies regarding the near future (16:14; 21:16:cf.22:20 with 37:2) appear along with others which refer to a more distant (23:17) or a quite remote time. Thus the fall of Babylon is so certain that Israel is told the taunt-song it will sing "in that day" (14:4-20). Compare 21:6-10 which describes it as having already taken place, with 39:6 which speaks of the Babylonian Captivity as still future — a method of prophetic description frequently found in Isaiah. This group of prophecies is chiefly minatory, but it also contains wonderful promises of blessing. Israel's mightiest foes will share with her in the future blessedness (19:23-25).

V. Chapter 24 looks far into the future. It is world-embracing and may be called an apocalypse. The world judgment will be followed by songs of thanksgiving for divine blessing (26-26). A prophecy against Egypt follows (27). Then there are again six woes (28-34), the last being a frightful curse on Edom. This group also closes with a beautiful prophetic picture of future blessedness (35).

VI. Chapters 36-39, Historical (comp. parallel passages in Kings and Chronicles). They describe the blasphemous threats of Sennacherib against Jerusalem, Hezekiah's appeal to Isaiah who ridicules the invader, the flight and death of the blasphemer (36-37) — one of the most thrilling stories in the whole Bible. Probably Hezekiah's illness and the embassage of Merodach Baladan (38-39) took place during the reign of Sargon. If so, the arrangement is topical and intended to prepare for the prophecies of consolation which follow.

Chapters 40-66 have been called the Book of Consolation. The words "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people" are clearly intended to give Israel a comfort and hope not to be gathered from Hezekiah's words, which they immediately follow. These chapters fall into three parts as is suggested by the refrain-like words, "There is no peace, saith the Lord unto the wicked" (48:22; compare 57: 21) which have their terrible echo in Isaiah's final words (66:24).

Chapters 40-48 deal with the coming of Cyrus and the fall of Babylon as proof of the power of the God of Israel both to foretell and fulfill, in amazing contrast to the idols of the heathen which can do neither. The utter folly of idolatry is portrayed most vividly in 44:9-20 and 46:1-11. The last mention of Babylon, "Go ye forth from Babylon, flee ye from the Chaldeans" (48:20) is clearly to be thought of as describing flight from a doomed city, like the flight of Lot from Sodom. In the two remaining parts of the book there is no mention of either Assyria or Babylon except by way of reminiscence (52:4).

Chapters 49-57 form a logical and climactic sequel to the preceding group. The figure of the "servant" is common to both. The word occurs 20 times in chapters 40-53. Nine times he is called Israel, Jacob, or Jacob-Israel. Six times the Lord calls him "my servant." The title is used in three senses: of the servant as deaf and blind (42:18f.), sinful and needing redemption (44:22, cf.43:25); of the servant as faithful and as having a mission to Israel and the Gentiles (42:1-7; 49:1-6; 50:6-9); and finally of One who, Himself innocent, suffers for the sins of others (52:13-53:12). The first three of these four passages which are often called the "Servant Songs" can refer to the pious in Israel as sharing with their Lord in His mission of salvation. In the last the reference to the Messiah is "predominant and exclusive" (Alexander). This is one of the most precious chapters in the Bible. It speaks both of the humiliation of the Saviour and also of the glory which is to follow. The greatness of the salvation secured by the Servant is described in glowing terms and its world-wide scope is made clear in vss. 10-12 and again and again in the chapters which follow, especially 61:1-3.

Chapters 58-66 continue the same general theme which reaches its height in 66:1-3, a passage which foretells that day of which Jesus spoke to the woman of Samaria, when the true worshiper shall worship not in temples made with hands, but "in spirit and in truth" (John 4:21-24). Yet here again as constantly elsewhere warning and denunciation alternate with offers and assurances of blessing. Thus 65:17 which speaks of the "new heavens and the new earth" (cf. 66:22) follows a denunciation of those who practice abominations. And the book closes with a reference to the torments of the reprobate.

Principal Themes of Isaiah. Isaiah is preeminently the prophet of redemption. The greatness and majesty of God, His holiness and hatred of sin and the folly of idolatry, His grace and mercy and love, and the blessed rewards of obedience are constantly recurring themes. No wonder that the NT writers quote so often from Isaiah and that so much of Handel's Messiah is taken from it. Redeemer and saviour (save, salvation) are among his favorite words. It is significant that the words which describe the character of the promised Messiah (9:6) are frequently on his lips: wonderful (25:1; 28:29; 29:14), counsellor (19:17; 25:1; 28:29; 40:13f; 46:10), mighty God (30:29; 33:13; 40:17f, 26; 42:13; 49:20-26; 60:16), everlasting father (26:4; 40:28; 45:17; 55:3; 57:15; 60:19f.; 63:16; 64:8), a prince of peace (26:12; 45:7; 52:7; 53:5; 55:12; 57:19; 66:12). Isaiah has a deep appreciation of beauty and wonder of the world of nature (e.g., chap. 35). A striking figure which he uses repeatedly is the "highway" (11:16; 19:23; 33:8; 35:8; 36:2; 40:3; 49:11; 57:14; 62:10). All the barriers which separate nation from nation and delay the coming of the King to his kingdom will be removed and "the glory of the Lord shall be revealed and all flesh shall see it together" (40:5).

Importance. The importance of the book is indicated by the frequency with which it is quoted in the NT. Isaiah is quoted by name 21 times, slightly more than all the other writing prophets taken together; and there are many more allusions and quotations where his name is not given. He has been called the evangelist of the OT and many of the most precious verses in the Bible come to us from his lips. The fact that the Lord began His public ministry at Nazareth by reading from Chapter 61 and applying its prophetic words to Himself is significant of the place which this book has ever held in the Christian Church.

Unity. An article on Isaiah written today must deal with the unity of the book, since this has been vigorously assailed for nearly two centuries. The attack is not due to any discoveries that have been made, but to the new theory regarding prophecy which is widely prevalent today and which minimizes or denies prediction, declaring that the OT prophet spoke only to the men of his own time and not to future generations. This theory is refuted by the fact that the NT frequently quotes the words of the prophets, notably Isaiah, as fulfilled in the earthly life of Jesus Christ. In John 12:38-40 two quotations from this book are brought together, the one from 53:1, the other from 6:9f., and as if to make it quite clear that they have one and the same source, the evangelist adds: "These things said Isaiah, when he saw his glory and spake of him."

The main argument for a Second Isaiah is that Cyrus is referred to as one who has already entered upon his career of conquest (e.g., 41:1f.,25); and it is claimed that the writer of all or part of chapters 40-66 must have lived at the close of the Babylonian Captivity. It is to be noted, therefore, that the prophets, notably Isaiah, often spoke as if they were eye witnesses of the future events which they described. The viewpoint or situation of the one who penned Chapter 53 is Calvary. He describes the sufferings of the Servant as ended and depicts in glowing colors the glory which shall follow, yet the prophet cannot have lived at that time. He must have lived many years, even centuries, before the advent of the One whose death he so vividly portrays. Consequently, one must either hold that the prophet neither in 7-12 nor in 53 predicted the coming and work of the Messiah or that he could and did speak of future events, of the coming of Cyrus and of a greater than Cyrus, as if he were living in the glorious days of which he speaks with such delight. For those who accept the testimony of the Bible and hold that conception of predictive prophecy which it sets forth, the unity of Isaiah is not a discredited tradition but a well accredited fact. ISCAH (ĭs'kà, Heb. yiskâh), a daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah (Gen. 11:29). Identified by tradition with Sarah, Abraham's wife, but not with sufficient reason.

ISHBAH (ĭsh'bă, Heb. yishbah), a member of the tribe of Judah, the ancestor or head of the inhabitants of Eshtemoa (I Chron. 4:17).

ISHBAK (ĭsh'băk, Heb. yishbāq), a name in the list of sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:2), the names probably representing tribes.

ISHBI-BENOB (ĭsh'bī-bē'nŏb, Heb. yishbî venōv), a giant slain by Abishai as he was about to kill David (II Sam. 21:16,17).

ISH-BOSHETH (ĭsh'bō'shĕth, Heb. 'ish-bōsheth, man of shame), the fourth son of Saul (II Sam. 2:8), originally called Eshbaal, "man of Baal," but for some reason subsequently changed. After the death of Saul and his three elder sons at the battle of Gilboa, where the Philistines won an overwhelming victory, he was proclaimed king over Israel by Abner, the captain of Saul's army, at Mahanaim (II Sam. 2:8ff.), while Judah proclaimed David as its king. Ish-bosheth was then about 40 years old, and reigned two years (II Sam. 2:8-10). He was not successful in the war which he waged with David to rule over all 12 tribes, but the war did not come to a close until Abner transferred his allegiance to David because of a serious charge made against him by Ish-bosheth (II Sam. 3:6ff.). Abner fulfilled David's condition to return to him Michal, his wife, before peace could be made. It was not, however, until Abner was murdered at Hebron that Ish-bosheth lost heart and gave up hope of retaining his power (II Sam. 4). Soon after, Ish-bosheth was murdered by his own captains, but David had the assassins put to death for their crime and buried Ish-bosheth in the grave of Abner at Hebron. Ish-bosheth's death ended the dynasty of Saul.

ISHI (ĭsh'ī, Heb. 'îshî, my husband), a symbolic term, expressive of the ideal relation between Jehovah and Israel (Hos. 2:16).

ISHI (Heb. yish'î, salutary). 1. A man of Judah (I Chron. 2:31).

2. Another man of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

3. A descendant of Simeon (I Chron. 4:42).

4. The head of a family of Manasseh (I Chron. 5:24).

ISHIAH (ī-shī'à, Heb. yishshîyyâh, Jehovah forgets). 1. A man of Issachar (I Chron. 7:3).

2. The head of a Levite family (I Chron. 24:21).

3. Another head of a Levite family (I Chron. 23:20, Jesiah in KJV).

4. One of David's men at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:6).

ISHIJAH (ī-shī'jà, Heb. yishshîyâh), a son of Harim, one of those induced by Ezra to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:31).

ISHMA (ĭsh'mà, Heb. yishmā'), the ancestral head of a clan of Judah; descended from Hur (I Chron. 4:3,4).

ISHMAEL (ĭsh'mā-ĕl, Heb. yishmā'ēl, God hears, Gr. Ismaél). 1. The son of Abraham by Hagar, the Egyptian maid of his wife Sarah. Sarah was barren (Gen. 16:1); and in accordance with the custom of the age she gave to Abraham her handmaid Hagar, an Egyptian, as his concubine, hoping that he might obtain a family by her. Abraham was then 86 years old, and had been in Canaan for ten years (Gen. 16:3). When Hagar saw that she had conceived, she began to despise her mistress, so that Sarah complained bitterly to Abraham, who told her that since Hagar was her slave, she could do anything she wanted with her. Sarah made things so difficult for her that she fled, and somewhere on the road to Egypt the angel of Jehovah met her and told her to return to her mistress and submit herself to her hands, and he encouraged her by the promise of a numerous seed. Ishmael was circumcised when he was 13 (Gen. 17:25). Abraham loved him, and even after God had promised him a son by Sarah, he fervently exclaimed, "O that Ishmael might live before thee!" (Gen. 17:18).

At the weaning of Isaac, the customary feast was made, when Ishmael, now a boy of 16, was seen by Sarah to be mocking. Jealous, and probably fearing future trouble if the boys were brought up together, Sarah tried to get Abraham to cast out Ishmael and his slave-mother, but this he was unwilling to do until he was encouraged to do so by God. Sent away with bread and a bottle of water, Ishmael and his mother wandered about in the wilderness of Beersheba, and when he became faint for thirst and was on the verge of death, she put him in the shade of a shrub and sat nearby, resignedly expecting his death. For the second time in her life, the angel of the Lord appeared to her. He directed her to some water and renewed His former promise of Ishmael's future greatness (Gen. 21:19,20). Ishmael grew up and became famous as an archer in the wilderness of Paran. He was married by his mother to an Egyptian wife. When Abraham died, he returned from exile to help Isaac to bury their father (Gen. 25:9). He became the father of 12 sons and a daughter, whom Esau took for his wife. He died at the age of 137 (Gen. 25:17). In Galatians 4:21-5:1 Paul expounds the narrative of Ishmael and Isaac allegorically. Hagar represents the old covenant, and Sarah, the new; while the rivalry between Ishmael and Isaac foreshadows the conflict in the early church between those who would cling to the ordinances of the Law, which must pass away, and those who realize that through the grace of Christ there is freedom from the Law.

2. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

3. The father of Zebadiah, a ruler in the house of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 19:11).

4. The son of Jehohanan. He helped Jehoiada to restore Jehoash to the throne of Judah (II Chron. 23:1).

5. The son of Nethaniah, a member of the royal house of David. After the capture of Palestine, Nebuchadnezzar left behind as governor of Judah a Jew called Gedaliah, who promised to protect all those Jews who would put themselves under his care. Among those who came was Ishmael, who, instigated by the king of the Ammonites, intended to assassinate the governor. Gedaliah was warned of Ishmael's treachery by some loyal captains, but paid no attention to the warning. About two months after the destruction of Jerusalem, Gedaliah and others with him were murdered at a banquet held in honor of Ishmael, who then attempted to flee to the Ammonite country with some captives he had with him, including the king's daughters. His pursuers overtook him at Gibeon; but while his captives were recovered, he and a few of his men succeeded in escaping to the king of Ammon (II Kings 25:25: Jer. 40:7-16; 41:1-18).

ISHMAELITE (ĭsh'mā-ĕl-īt, Heb. yishme'ēlîm), a descendant of Ishmael, the son of Abraham and Hagar, whom Abraham sent away into the desert after the birth of Isaac (Gen. 21:14-21). The 12 sons of Ishmael, and his Egyptian wife, became princes and progenitors of as many tribes. They lived in camps in the desert of Northern Arabia, although occasionally some of them settled down, as the Nabateans. Mostly, however, they lived like Ishmael, "a wild man" of the desert (Gen. 16:12), and also like him they were famous for their skill with the bow. Joseph was sold by his brothers to some Ishmaelites (Gen. 37:25-28).

The word is apparently used in the OT in a wider sense, referring to the nomadic tribes of Northern Arabia generally (Gen. 37:28,36; Judg. 8:24). All Arabs, following Mohammed's example, claim descent from Ishmael.

ISHMAIAH (ĭsh-mā'yȧ, Heb. yishma'yâh, Jehovah hears). 1. A Gibeonite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4).

2. Chief of the Zebulunites in David's reign (I Chron. 27:19).

ISHMEELITE (See Ishmaelite)

ISHMERAI (ĭsh'mē-rī, Heb. yishmeray, Jehovah keeps), a Benjamite, son of Epaal, resident of Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:18).

ISHOD (ī'shŏd, Heb. 'ishehôdh, man of majesty), a man from Manasseh whose mother was Hammoleketh (I Chron. 7:18).

ISHPAN (ĭsh'păn, Heb. yishpān, he will hide), descendant of Benjamin, son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:22).

ISHTAR (ĭsh'tăr), a Semitic goddess worshiped in Phoenicia, Canaan, Assyria, and Babylonia. Her name is spelled in various ways — Ashtoreth, Astarte, Ashtartu (in the Amarna letters), Ishtar (in Babylonia), etc. The name and cult of the goddess were derived from Babylonia, where she was the goddess of love and war. The chief seat of her worship in Babylonia was Erech, where prostitution was practiced in her name by bands of men and women. In Assyria the warlike side of the goddess was stressed, and immoral rites were not a part of her worship. In Canaan her warlike attributes were dropped, and she became a moon-goddess and the consort of Baal. The Philistines worshipped her and built a temple for her at Ascalon. The immoral rites with which her worship was accompanied in Babylonia were transferred to Canaan (Deut. 23:18). As early as the times of Judges her cult had spread to the Hebrews (Judg. 2:13; 10:6). Solomon supported her worship (I Kings 11:5; II Kings 23:13), and the Hebrew women in Jeremiah's day gave her a high place in their worship (Jer. 44:17f).

ISHTOB (ĭsh'tŏb, Heb. 'ish tôv, the men of Tob), a place in Palestine which supplied at least 12,000 soldiers to the Ammonites in their war with David (II Sam. 10:6,8).

ISHUAH (ĭsh'ū-à, Heb. yishwâh, he will level), the second son of Asher (Gen. 46:17; I Chron. 7:30).

ISHUAI (ĭsh'ū-ī, Heb. yishwî, level). 1. The third son of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:44, Jesuai in KJV).

2. A son of Saul (I Sam. 14:49, Ishui in KJV).

ISHUI (ĭsh'ū-ī). See ISHUAI, of which Ishui is another spelling in the KJV.

ISLAND, ISLE. These words render the Hebrew 'î, which has a much wider significance than the English words. Its root-meaning is supposed to be habitable land. 1. Dry land, as opposed to water (Isa. 42:15).

2. An island as usually understood (Jer. 2:10).

3. A coastland, whether belonging to continents or islands, as the coastland of Palestine and Phoenicia (Isa. 20:6), and the coasts and islands of Asia Minor and Greece (Gen. 10:5).

4. The farthest regions of the earth (Isa. 41:5; Zeph. 2:11). The Jews were not a maritime people, and consequently there are not many references to islands in the OT. Most of them are found in Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. In the NT a number of islands are mentioned in connection with the missionary journeys of the Apostle Paul, e.g. Cyprus, Crete, Lesbos, Samos, Samothrace, Chios, Melita, and Sicily. John was banished to the isle of Patmos for the sake of the Word of God. (Rev. 1:9).

ISMACHIAH (ĭs'mà-kī'à, Heb. yismakhyâhû, Jehovah sustains), an overseer connected with the temple in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

ISMAIAH (ĭs-mā'yà, Heb. yishma'yâh, Jehovah hears).1. A Gibeonite who joined David's forces at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4).

2. A chief of Zebulunite forces in David's time (I Chron. 27:19).

ISPAH (ĭs'pà, Heb. yishpâh, firm), a Benjamite, son of Beriah (I Chron. 8:16).

ISRAEL (ĭz'ră-ĕl) is used in Scripture to designate: (a) an individual man, the son of Isaac (see Jacob); or (b) his descendants, the twelve tribes of the Hebrews; or (c) the ten northern tribes, led by Ephraim, as opposed to the southern, under Judah.

Before the year 2100 B.C., the God who directs all history chose the patriarch Abraham and called him out of Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. 11:31; Neh. 9:7). The Lord's redemptive purpose was to bring Abraham and his descendants into a saving (covenant) relationship with Himself (Gen. 17:7) and also to make of Abraham's seed a nation in Palestine (vs. 2) through which He would some day bring salvation to the entire world (12:3; 22:18). God accordingly blessed Abraham's grandson Jacob with many children. Furthermore, upon Jacob's return to Palestine in 1909 B.C., God "wrestled" with him and brought him to a point of total submission (32:25; Hos. 12:4). By thus yielding his life to God's purpose, Jacob achieved victory; and God changed his name to Israel, Hebrew Yisrā'ĕl, which means, "He strives with God (and prevails)" (Gen. 32:28; 35:10). Jacob's twelve sons were thus, literally, the children of "Israel" 42:5; 45:21). Israel, however, was aware that God would build each of them into a numerous tribe (49:7,16). The term "children of Israel" came therefore to signify the whole body of God's chosen and saved people (32:32; 34:7). It included Jacob's grandchildren and all subsequent members of the household, as they proceeded to Egypt for a sojourn of 430 years, 1876-1446 B.C. (46:8; Exod. 1:7).

I. Mosaic Period. In the space of approximately ten generations, God increased Israel from a clan of several hundred (Gen. 14:14; 46:27) to a nation of almost 3,000,000 souls (Exod. 12:37; Num. 1:46), equipped with all the material and cultural advantages of Egypt (Exod. 2:10; 12:36; Acts 7:22). Their very increase, however, seems to have aroused the envy and fear, first of the land's foreign "Hyksos" rulers (Dynasties XV-XVI, about 1730-1580 B.C.) and then of the native Egyptian Empire that followed (Dyn. XVIII), Exodus 1:8-10. Israel was thus enslaved and compelled to erect certain Hyksos store-cities in the region of the eastern Delta (1:11; compare Gen. 15:13) and was threatened with total national destruction under the anti-Semitic policy of the Empire (Exod. 1:16). Moses (born 1527) was indeed befriended by an Egyptian princess, perhaps the one who was to become the famous queen, Hatshepsut; but even he was forced to flee Egypt during the reign of the great conqueror and oppressor, Thothmes III (dated 1501-1447 B.C.).

God, however, still remembered His covenant promises with Abraham (Exod. 2:24-25). At the death of the great Pharaoh (vs. 23) He appeared to Moses in a burning bush on Mt. Sinai and commissioned him to deliver the enslaved people (3:10). Moses accordingly returned to the Egyptian court, with the cry, "Thus saith Jehovah, 'Israel is My son, My first-born: and I have said unto thee, Let my son go that he may serve Me; or behold, I will slay thy son, thy first-born' " (4:22-23). The new monarch, Amenhetep II (1447-1421), had inherited the domineering qualities of his father; and he refused to heed the divine summons. Only after a series of ten miraculous plagues, climaxing in the death of all the first-born of Egypt (see Passover), was the hard-hearted Pharaoh compelled to yield to the Lord (12:31).

In the spring of 1446 B.C. the nation of Israel achieved their exodus from Egypt (12:37-40). This date has been reduced by a number of critical scholars to about 1290 B.C. Scripture, however, is explicit in placing the Exodus in the 480th year before the beginning of Solomon's Temple in 966 B.C. (I Kings 6:1); and the 15th century date is then confirmed by other scriptural testimonies (compare Judg. 11:26; Acts 13:19 ASV). Israel marched eastward from Goshen toward the Red Sea. But when the perfidious Pharaoh pursued after the seemingly entrapped Hebrews (Exod. 14:3), the Lord sent a strong east wind that blew back the waters of the Sea (vs. 21). Israel crossed, and then the Lord caused the waters to return so that the Egyptians were destroyed to the last man (Exod. 14:28; excepting the Pharaoh, who is not mentioned after vs. 10).

Israel reached Mt. Sinai at the commencement of summer, 1446 (19:1). At this point God extended the covenant offer of reconciliation that He had made with Abraham and Israel (Jacob, Gen. 28:13-15) so as to embrace the whole nation of the sons of Israel, promising, "Now therefore, if ye will obey My voice indeed, and keep My covenant, then ye shall be Mine own possession from among all peoples: for all the earth is Mine; and ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Exod. 19:5-6). God, on His part, provided the objective way of salvation by officially "adopting" Israel as His own sons and daughters (compare Exodus 4:22) on the basis of the atoning death that Jesus Christ, the unique Son of God, would some day suffer to redeem all of God's people (24:8; Heb. 9:15-22). For Israel's choice involved a universalistic goal, that they should become a "kingdom of priests," to bring salvation to others (compare Isa. 56:6-7). Israel, however, on their part were required to fulfill certain subjective conditions, so as to share in this testamental inheritance: "If ye will keep My covenant, then . . ." Basically, they must in faith commit themselves to God, to be His people. As Moses proclaimed, "Hear, oh Israel . . . thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart" (Deut. 6:4-5). God therefore provided Israel with His fundamental moral law, the Decalogue, or "ten commandments" (Exod. 20:3-17), together with elaborations in the various other codes of the Pentateuch. God also furnished them with His ceremonial law, to depict Israel's reconciliation with their heavenly Father (see for example Lev. 23:39-40) and to provide a symbolical way of forgiveness, should they transgress His moral requirements (see for example Lev. 6:1-3,6-7). The ceremonials, however, gained their true effectiveness because they foreshadowed, or typified, the ultimate redemptive work of Jesus Christ (Heb. 9:9-14,23-24).

In May of 1445 B.C. Israel broke up camp (Num. 10:11) and marched northeast to Kadesh, on the southern border of the promised land of Canaan. But after taking 40 days to spy out the land, all the tribal representatives except Caleb and Joshua reported unfavorably on attempting any conquest of Canaan: "The people that dwell in the land are strong, and the cities are fortified and very great" (13:28). Impetuous Israel thereupon refused to advance into the promised land and prayed for a return to Egypt (14:4). Moses' intercession did save them from immediate divine wrath; but the Lord still condemned them to wander for 40 years in the wilderness, one year for each day of spying, until that entire generation should fall by the way (14:32-34).

Israel's route of march, after an extended stay at Kadesh (Deut. 1:46), is described in Numbers 33; but the various camps cannot be identified, except that they are known to have passed through Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah before a final return to Kadesh (vss. 35-36). This rough, nomadic existence forced the people into a life of dependence upon God, who tested them and yet at the same time cared for them, miraculously (Deut. 2:7; 8:2-4). This training-period was still marred by repeated "murmurings" and defections, such as the revolts of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Num. 16-17). Even Moses, when producing water for the thirsty people, failed to credit God with the glory (20:10-11) and was therefore denied entrance into the promised land (vs. 12).

In the late summer of 1407 B.C. (20:28; 33:38), the advance of the Hebrews upon Canaan was resumed. The Edomites, however (a people descended from Israel's twin brother Esau), refused to allow kindred Israel to pass through their territories (20:21). The result was that they were compelled to double back to Ezion-geber on the Red Sea and go completely around the land of Edom, marching northward up "the king's highway" along the eastern border of Edom and Moab (21:4,22). Opposite the mid-point of the Dead Sea, Israel reached the territory of the Canaanitish kingdom of Sihon of Heshbon. But though Sihon refused to allow Israel further passage, it was actually God who had hardened the king's heart (Deut. 2:30): his very attack proved the occasion for his total overthrow and for Israel's occupation of the land of Gilead (Num. 21:24). Similar aggression by Og, king of Bashan, resulted in their acquisition of northern Transjordan as well (vs. 35); and, by the end of February, 1406, Israel was able to set up camp on the Plains of Moab, across the Jordan from Jericho (Deut. 1:3-5).

During the last month of Moses' life, God's great servant conducted a "numbering" or census of the people, which indicated a figure of over 600,000 fighting men, only slightly less than had taken part in the Exodus 40 years before (Num. 26:51, compare 1:46). Moses then acceded to the request of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh to settle in the conquered lands of Transjordan (Num. 32); and he provided for the division of western Canaan among the remaining tribes (33-34). At this time Balaam, who had been employed by the Moabites to curse Israel, uttered his famous blessings. The seer climaxed his oracles by predicting the future Messianic king, whose coming constituted the purpose of Israel: "I see Him, but not now; I behold Him, but not nigh: there shall come forth a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall arise out of Israel, and shall smite through the corners of Moab, and break down all the sons of tumult" (24:17). Moses then anointed Joshua as his successor (27:23), spoke his final two addresses, that constitute most of the book of Deuteronomy, Chapters 1-4 and 5-30, and ascended Mt. Pisgah to view the promised land. There Moses died and was buried by God's own hand (Deut. 34:5-6). He had been the founder of the Hebrew nation; "And there hath not arisen a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face" (vs. 10).

II. The Conquest. At Joshua's accession, the land of Canaan lay providentially prepared for conquest by the Hebrews. Comprising nominally a part of the Egyptian empire, Canaan suffered the neglect of Amenhetep III (about 1412-1376), called "the magnificent," whose rule was one of luxury, military inactivity, and decay. Political organization within Palestine was that of many small city-states, impoverished by a century of Egyptian misrule, and deficient in cooperative defense. Canaanitish standards of living, however, were still superior to those of the invading Hebrews, a fact which was later to lend "cultural" appeal to their debased religion.

In the spring of 1406 the Jordan was in its annual flood-stage (Josh. 3:15). But Joshua anticipated a miracle of divine intervention (vs. 13), and the Lord did indeed open a gateway into Canaan. For "The waters which came down from above stood, and rose up in one heap, a great way off, at Adam," some 15 miles N of Jericho (vs. 16). Israel thus marched across the relatively dry river bed (compare 4:18), led by the ark of God's testament (3:16).

Joshua's war of conquest developed in three major campaigns: in central, southern, and northern Canaan. His first objective was the city of Jericho, to his immediate W in the Jordan Valley. But just as Israel was preparing to storm Jericho's walls, the Lord caused their collapse (Josh. 6:20); and Joshua proceeded to "devote" the city to God (vs. 21, ASVmg). Joshua ascended westward into Canaan's central ridge and, after an initial setback because of sin in the camp (7:20-21), seized the post of Ai. It seems to have served as an outer defense of the major city of Bethel (8:17), which surrendered without further resistance (12:16, compare Judg. 1:22). Joshua was thus able to assemble Israel at Shechem to reaffirm the Mosaic law (Josh. 8:33, per Deut. 27:11ff), having subdued all of central Canaan.

To the south, Gibeon next submitted and, by trickery, saved themselves from the destruction that God had decreed (Josh. 9:15; Deut. 7:2). Their action, however, provoked an alliance of five kings of the southern Amorites, under the headship of Jerusalem, which retaliated by laying siege to Gibeon (Josh. 10:5). Joshua, upon being informed, advanced by forced march to the relief of his clients (vs. 9); surprised the enemy; and, with divine aid, routed them westward down the Aijalon Valley. Israel then proceeded to ravage the whole of southern Palestine (10:28-42).

The northern Canaanites finally awoke to their danger and formed an offensive alliance under the leadership of Jabin, king of Hazor (Josh. 11:5). Joshua, however, attacked unexpectedly at the Waters of Merom, NE of Galilee, and completely routed the allied forces (vss. 7-8). Only Hazor was actually destroyed (vs. 13); but this triumph meant that within six years of the fall of Jericho (compare 14:10) all Canaan had come to lie at Joshua's feet (11:16). "So Jehovah gave unto Israel all the land which He sware unto their fathers . . . all came to pass" (21:43,45). The Canaanites had not yet lost their potential for resistance; and, indeed, what the Lord had sworn to Israel had been a gradual occupation of the land (Exod. 23:28-30; Deut. 7:22). Much still remained to be possessed (Josh. 13:1), but at this point Joshua was compelled by advancing age to divide the land among the 12 Hebrew tribes (Chapters 13-22). He then charged his people with faithfulness to Jehovah (24:15) and died.

III. The Judges. Moses had ordered the "devotion" (extermination) of the Canaanites (Deut. 7:2), both because of their long-standing immoralities (9:5; compare Gen. 9:22,25; 15:16) and because of their debasing religious influence upon God's people (Deut. 7:4; 12:31). In the years immediately following Joshua's death, Judah accordingly accomplished an initial capture of Jerusalem (Judg. 1:8; though the city was not held, vs. 21); and Ephraim and west-Manasseh slew the men of Bethel (vs. 25), which city had begun to reassert itself. But then came failure: Israel ceased to eradicate the Canaanites; no more cities were taken (vss. 27-34); and the tribe of Dan actually suffered eviction themselves (vs. 34). Tolerance of evil had to be rectified by national chastening (2:3).

The next three and one-half centuries were thus used of God to impress upon His people three major lessons. 1. The Lord's wrath at sin. For when Israel yielded to temptation, God would "deliver them over into the hands of their enemies round about, so that they could not any longer stand" (2:14). 2. God's mercy upon repentance. For the Lord would then "raise them up judges and save them out of the hand of their enemies" (2:18). 3. Man's total depravity. For "it came to pass, when the judge was dead, that they turned back and dealt more corruptly than their fathers" (2:19). The period of the 14 judges (12 in Judges, plus Eli and Samuel in I Samuel) thus demonstrates a repeated cycle of human sin, of servitude, or supplication, and then of salvation.

From about 1400 to 1250 B.C. the chief external forces that God employed for the execution of His providential dealings were the rival empires of the Hittites, N of Palestine, and of the Egyptians to the S. Neither of these powers was conscious of the way in which God was using them; but still, the years in which either succeeded in maintaining Palestinian law and order prove to be just the period that God had chosen for granting "rest" to Israel. Shubbiluliuma, for example, who took the throne of the Hittite New Kingdom in about 1385 B.C., fomented dissension among the Palestinian states that owed nominal allegiance to Amenhetep III and IV; and with this international intrigue coincides Israel's first oppression, by Cushan Rishathaim, an invader from Hittite-controlled Mesopotamia (Judg. 3:8). The underlying cause, however, lay in Israel's sin against the moral requirements of God's Sinaitic testament. (Compare the sordid events of Micah and the Danites and of the Benjamite outrage, Judg. 17-21, which belong to this period, 18:1; Josh. 19:47; 20:28). But when they "cried unto Jehovah, Jehovah raised up a saviour to the children of Israel, even Othniel, Caleb's younger brother" (3:9). The 40 years of peace that then followed correspond to the time of undisputed Hittite sway over Palestine, until some years after the death of Shubbiluliuma in about 1345.

Founded in the 1320's, however, the Nineteenth Dynasty began to reassert Egypt's territorial claims. But behind this international confusion lay the fact that "Israel again did that which was evil, and Jehovah strengthened Eglon the king of Moab [so that] the children of Israel served Eglon 18 years. But when they cried unto Jehovah, He raised them up a saviour, Ehud the Benjamite (Judg. 3: 12-15), and granted them eighty years of peace. This was the time, moreover, of the treaty of 1315 between Seti I of Egypt and Mursil II of Heth, who preserved order by dividing the Near East into respective spheres of influence. The treaty was then renewed in 1279, after a futile war of aggression by Rameses II, and was strictly enforced until the demise of the last great Hittite king, in about 1250.

Against the oppressive Canaanitish hand of Jabin II of Hazor (Judg. 4:2-3), God raised up the fourth of the judges, the woman Deborah. Her military commander, Barak, proceeded to muster the north-central tribes to the Valley of Esdraelon for war with Jabin's officer, Sisera. Then, "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (5:20, compare vs. 21): a divinely sent cloud-burst immobilized the powerful Canaanite chariotry, and Sisera himself was murdered in flight by a Kenite woman. The 40-year peace that followed Deborah's victory coincides with the strong rule of Rameses III at the turn of the century, the last great Pharaoh of the Nineteenth Dynasty.

Next came the nomadic Midianites and Amalekites out of the eastern desert to plunder sinful Israel (Judg. 6:2-6). In about 1175, however, the Lord answered the repentant prayers of His people and raised up Gideon with his chosen band of 300. "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon" then cleared Israel of the nomadic raiders (7:19-25; 8:10-12), as witnessed by the peaceful picture of Ruth 2-4 some 25 years later. The turmoil that resulted from the attempt of Gideon's son Abimelech to make himself king over Israel (Judg. 9) was rectified by the sixth and seventh judges, Tola and Jair (who must have overlapped, for no separate deliverance is ascribed to the latter, 10:1-5). But with their deaths in 1110 B.C. and the apostasy that subsequently arose, God delivered up His land to two simultaneous oppressions: that of the Ammonites in the east, and that of the Philistines in the west (10:7). After 18 years, eastern Israel was freed by Jephthah, the eighth judge (chap. 11), who was succeeded by three minor judges. Western Israel, however, remained subject to the rising power of the Philistines for a full 40 years (13:1), until the advent of Samuel in 1070. This period must therefore embrace the activity of Eli (until about 1090, I Sam. 4:18), as well as the spectacular but politically ineffective exploits of Samson, the 12th and last judge of the Book of Judges (Chapters 13-16, to about 1075 B.C., 15:20).

These Philistines were a Hamitic people. But unlike the native Palestinians, who were descended from Ham's son Canaan, they traced their descent from an elder brother, Mizraim (Egypt), through Casluhim (Cyrene, Gen. 10:14) and Caphtor (Crete, Amos 9:7). Some of these "Minoan" peoples had settled along the Mediterranean coast of Palestine as early as 2100 B.C. (Gen. 21:32; 26:14; compare Deut. 2:23; Josh. 13:23). The very name Palestine, in fact, means the "Philistine land." But with the fall of Crete to barbarian invasion in 1200 B.C., "the remnant of the isle of Caphtor" (Jer. 47:4) came to reinforce the older Minoan settlements. Though driven back from Egypt by a crushing defeat at the hands of Rameses III in about 1196, these "sea peoples," by reason of their superior discipline and equipment (cf. Judg. 3:31; I Sam. 13:22; 17:5-6), were able to mount three oppressions, commencing respectively in 1110, 1055, and 1010 B.C., and thereby to threaten the very existence of Israel.

Their opening oppression climaxed in the first battle of Ebenezer (I Sam. 4) and resulted in the deaths of Eli and his sons, in the capture of the ark, and in the destruction of the Lord's house at Shiloh (see Jer. 7:14). God in His grace, however, raised up the Prophet Samuel, who ended the oppression by a God-given victory at the second battle of Ebenezer in about 1070 (Judg. 7). But later, as Samuel turned over many of his powers as judge to his corrupt sons (8:3), the Philistines returned with barbaric cruelty (compare 31:8-10; Judg. 16:25), seeking to crush disorganized Israel.

IV. The United Kingdom of Israel was precipitated by the demand of the people themselves. Despite God's directive that they be holy and separate (Lev. 20:26), they still wished to be "like all the nations" (I Sam. 8:5), with a human king to fight their battles (vs. 20), rather than God, acting through a theocratic judge (vs. 7). They conveniently forgot that it was faithlessness that brought them under attack in the first place. Still, their rebellion served to accomplish God's purpose (see Ps. 76:10); for He had long before decreed a kingdom in Israel over which Jesus the Messiah should some day reign (Gen. 49:10; Num. 24:17). The Lord accordingly authorized Samuel to anoint a king (I Sam. 8:22), and directed him to Saul of Benjamin (Chapter 9).

Saul's accession proceeded in three steps. He was first privately anointed by Samuel and filled with God's Spirit (10:10), then publicly selected at Mizpah (vs. 24), and at last popularly confirmed at Gilgal, after having delivered the town of Jabesh- gilead from Ammonite attack (Chapter 11). The primary concern of his 40 year reign (1050-1010 B.C., compare Acts 13:21) was the Philistines. These oppressors had already occupied much of his territory, and open war was provoked in 1048 (I Sam. 13:1 ASV) when one of their garrisons was destroyed by Saul's son Jonathan (vs. 3). In the ensuing battle at Michmash, Jonathan's personal bravery (14:14), plus the Philistines' own superstitious reaction to a heaven-sent earthquake (vss. 15,20), brought about their total defeat. Saul thus terminated the second oppression but, by his failure to submit to Samuel (13:8-9), suffered the rejection of his dynasty from the throne of Israel (vs. 14).

From his capital in Gibeah of Benjamin, Saul "did valiantly" and pushed back the enemies of Israel on every hand (14:47-48). In about 1025 B.C., however, having been ordered to destroy Israel's implacable enemies the Amalekites (15: 1-3; compare Exod. 17:14), Saul disobeyed and spared both the king and the best of the spoils, under pretext of making offerings to God (vs. 15). Samuel answered, "Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice" (vs. 22) and declared Saul's personal deposition from the kingship (vss. 23,28). Samuel then privately anointed David, a son of Jesse of Judah, as king over Israel (16:13). David was about 15 at the time (compare II Sam. 5:4); but, by God's providence, he gained rapid promotion at court, first as a minstrel (vss. 21-23) and then by his victory over the Philistine champion Goliath (Chapter 17). Even Saul's growing jealousy, which removed David from court to the dangers of battle, augmented the latter's popularity (vss. 27-30). Saul's overt hostility finally drove David and his followers into exile, first as outlaws in Judah (I Sam. 20-26) and then as vassals to the Philistine king of Gath (27-30). But while Saul was diverting his resources in the futile pursuit of David, the Philistines prepared for a third, all-out attack on Israel, 1010 B.C. David barely escaped engaging in war against his own people (29:4, compare vs. 8); and Saul, routed at Mt. Gilboa, committed suicide rather than suffer capture (31:4). Israel's sinful demand for a king had brought about its own punishment.

Having learned of the death of Saul, David moved to Hebron and was there proclaimed king over his own tribe of Judah (II Sam. 2:4). But despite David's diplomacy, the supporters of Saul set up his son, Ish-bosheth, over the northern and eastern tribes (vss. 7-8). Civil war followed, but David increasingly gained the upper hand (3:1). Finally, after the death of Ish-bosheth, the tribal representatives assembled to Hebron and anointed David as king over all Israel (1003 B.C.). The Philistines now realized that their vassal had gotten out of hand and that their own future depended upon prompt action. David, however, after an initial flight to his former outlaw retreat (5:17), rallied his devoted forces (compare 23:13-17); and, by two brilliant victories in the vicinity of Jerusalem (5:9-25), not simply terminated the last Philistine oppression but eventually incorporated Gath into his own territory and subdued the remaining Philistine states (I Chron. 18:1).

The time was ripe for the rise of a Hebrew empire. The Hittites had succumbed to barbarian invasion; the Twenty-first Dynasty of Egypt stagnated under the alternating rule of priests and merchants (1100 B.C. on); and Assyria, after having weakened others, was itself restrained by inactive kings. With Philistia broken, Israel remained free from foreign threat for 150 years. David's first strategic move was to capture Jerusalem from the Canaanites. Militarily, Mt. Zion constituted a splendid fortress (II Sam. 5:6,9); politically, the city afforded David a neutral capital between the recently hostile areas of Judah and northern Israel; and religiously, Zion's possession of the ark of God's testament (6:17) centered the people's spiritual hopes within its walls (Ps. 87). From about 1002 to 995 B.C. David then extended his power on every side, from the Euphrates River on the N (8:3) to the Red Sea on the S (vs. 14).

In Jerusalem David sought to construct a fitting "house" or temple for Jehovah. This ambition was denied him because of his excessive bloodshed (I Chron. 22:8; compare II Sam. 8:2); but God's prophet did inform him, "Jehovah will make thee a house" (II Sam. 7:11). He explained, "When thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee; and he shall build a house for My name." God's promise, moreover, extended beyond Solomon and climaxed in that One in whom Israel's ultimate purpose should be fulfilled, "And I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever. I will be His [the Messiah's] Father, and He shall be My Son" (7:13-14; Heb. 1:5). The eternal Christ would indeed suffer a "testator's" death (Ps. 22:16-18), but would rise in power to give everlasting life to His own (Ps. 22:22,26; 16:10-11). Jesse's son thus experienced in his Davidic testament (Ps. 89:3; 132:12) fundamental clarifications of God's former redemptive revelation of Sinai; and he exclaimed in his psalms and other inspired writings,

"For is my house not so with God?
For He hath made with me an everlasting testament,
Ordered in all things and sure:
For it is all my salvation, though all His desire,
For will he not make it to sprout a branch?"

(II Sam. 23:5 Heb.). In his later life David became involved in sins of adultery and murder (II Sam. 11) and of failure to control his sons (13-14), and for this he received corresponding punishments (15-16, compare 12:10-12). The revolt of Absalom served also to intensify the antagonism between northern Israel and southern Judah (19: 41-43). But at his death in 970 B.C. David was able to commit to his son Solomon an empire that marked the peak of Israel's power.

Solomon, after a bloody accession (I Kings 2: 25,34,36), reigned in peace, culture, and luxury, experiencing only one military campaign in 40 years (II Chron. 8:3). He was further able to consummate a marriage alliance with the last Pharaoh of the Twenty-first Dynasty (I Kings 3:1). The king is most famous, however, for his unexcelled wisdom (4:31), which was achieved by humility before God (3:7-12), and through which he composed the inspired Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Solomon, plus numerous other works (Pss. 72, 127; compare I Kings 4:32). His greatest undertaking was the Jerusalem temple, erected from 966 to 959 B.C. (I Kings 6) out of materials lavishly provided by David (I Chron. 22). Like the tabernacle before it, the temple symbolized the abiding presence of God with His people (I Kings 8:11).

But Solomon also engaged in a number of luxurious building projects of his own (7:1-12), so that despite his great commercial revenues (9:26-28, 10:14-15) indebtedness forced him to surrender territory (9:11-12) and to engage in excessive taxation and labor-conscription. Unrest grew throughout the empire; and, while the tribute continued during his lifetime (4:21), surrounding subject countries, such as Edom and Damascus, became increasingly independent (11:14,23). More serious was Solomon's spiritual failure, induced by wanton polygamy (vss. 1-8). "And Jehovah was angry . . . and said unto Solomon, 'Forasmuch as thou hast not kept My covenant, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee and will give it to thy servant . . out of the hand of thy son' "(vss. 9-12).

V. The Divided Kingdom. Early in 930 B.C. Solomon died and his son Rehoboam went to Shechem to be confirmed as king. The people, however, were led by Jeroboam of Ephraim to demand relief from Solomon's tyranny (I Kings 12:4); and when Rehoboam spurned their pleas, the ten northern tribes seceded to form an independent kingdom of Israel. Underlying causes for the rupture include the geographical isolation of the tribes (compare the phrase, "to your tents," vs. 16) and their long-standing social tensions (II Sam. 2:7-9; 19:43). But the basic reason lay in God's decision to punish Solomon's apostasy (I Kings 11:31; 12: 15,24). Furthermore, while northern Israel possessed the advantages of size, fertility, and foreign trade-contacts, these very features diminished their devotion to Jehovah and His Word. Ephraim's spiritual laxness became immediately apparent, when Jeroboam introduced two golden calves, with sanctuaries at Dan and Bethel to rival Jerusalem (vs. 28). He did attempt to associate these images with the historic God of the Exodus; but they were still idols, "other gods" (14:9), and not mere pedestals for Jehovah's invisible presence. Each succeeding king of Israel likewise "walked in the way of Jeroboam, wherewith he made Israel to sin"; and the division thus served ultimately to separate the sinful Hebrews from the two faithful tribes of Judah and Benjamin: "For they are not all Israel that are of Israel [Jacob]" (Rom. 9:6).

The relations between Ephraim and Judah passed through seven stages. 1. Hostility marked their course for the first two generations. Initially, both kingdoms suffered from raids by Shishak, the energetic founder of Egypt's Twenty-second Dynasty (II Chron. 12:1-9). Later, Jeroboam advanced against Rehoboam's son Abijam (913-910 B.C.); but God granted a great victory to outnumbered Judah (II Chron. 13), "because they relied upon Jehovah the God of their fathers" (13: 18). Pious Asa (910-869) ended Twenty-second Dynasty threats by routing the hosts of Zerah the Cushite (Pharaoh Osorkon I?) at the turn of the century (14:9-15) and then led Judah in a revival of faith in God's testament (15:12). But when faced by Ephraimite garrisons at Ramah, only six miles from Jerusalem, the king panicked and hired Benhadad of Damascus to divert the energies of Israel (16:1-4). God's prophet condemned Asa because he "relied on the king of Syria, and not on Jehovah" (vs. 7); and the precedent of Syrian intervention had serious consequences. King Omri (885-874) founded Samaria as the new capital of Ephraim; but Benhadad laid repeated siege to the city, and Omri's son Ahab was saved only by the grace of God (I Kings 20).

2. Asa's son Jehoshaphat made peace with Ahab (22:44). The allies, together with Benhadad, did manage to halt the westward advance of Shalmaneser III of Assyria at the bloody battle of Qarqar on the Orontes (853 B.C.). But Jehoshaphat had married his son to Athaliah, the Baal-worshiping daughter of Ahab and his Phoenician queen Jezebel, the persecutor of Elijah (I Kings 19:2); and such compromise could never be honored by God (II Chron. 19:2). Jehoshaphat was almost killed at the side of Ahab at Ramoth-gilead (I Kings 22:32-35). His joint commercial projects met with disaster (II Chron. 20:35-37). Moab succeeded in revolting from Ephraim (II Kings 1: 1) and Edom from Judah (8:22); and when Jehu executed God's sentence against the house of Ahab in Israel (841 B.C.), he slew Judah's young king with them (9:27). Athaliah then slaughtered her princely grandchildren and seized the throne in Jerusalem (11:1).

3. The years between 841 and 790 saw no major dealings between Israel and Judah because of Syrian domination over both kingdoms (see II Kings 8:12). Thus, even though Athaliah was slain in Jerusalem, the boy-king Joash suffered humiliating submission to Hazael of Damascus (12:17-18).

Detail of front panels of the Black Obelisk of Shalmanezer III, recording the tribute of King Jehu, son (i.e., successor) of Omri. It shows Jehu (top panel) bowing before the Assyrian king, and this is the only contemporary picture we have of any Israelite king. BM

Jehu fared even worse, rendering tribute to Shalmaneser in 841 and then, upon Assyria's departure, forfeiting his entire Transjordanian territory to Hazael. Only an Assyrian victory over Damascus shortly before 800 B.C. brought relief to Israel (13:5).

4. By 790 Amaziah of Judah had sufficiently recovered to reconquer Edom (14:7), but his success deceived him: he dared to challenge Jehoash of Israel (see vs. 10), and Jerusalem was rendered totally subservient to Ephraim until the death of Jehoash in 782.

5. Under the strong monarchs Jeroboam II in Israel and Uzziah in Judah, the two kingdoms lived for 30 years in mutual respect and peace. It was their "Indian summer": Egypt slumbered on under the Twenty-third Dynasty; Syria was broken by Assyria; and Assyria herself, now without aggressive leadership, could be swayed even by the contemporary Hebrew prophet Jonah (14:25). But beneath the outward prosperity lay moral corruption. Amos proclaimed impending judgment on "the day of Jehovah" (Amos 5:18). Hosea, too, warned of deportation to Assyria (Hos. 10:6); but with the abrogation of God's old testament with Israel, he anticipated a future, newer testament in which men would "know God" in truth, under "David [the Messiah] their King" (2:20; 3:5).

6. In 752 B.C. Jeroboam II's son was murdered, and Uzziah (Azariah) of Judah assumed the leadership of the western states against the rising power of Assyria. The general Pul, who became Tiglath-pileser III, was able in 743 to chronicle his defeat of "Azariah the Yaudaean"; and while Judah apparently escaped with little damage, Damascus and Israel, being farther N, were laid under heavy tribute (II Kings 15:19).

7. The Syrians and Ephraimites then united in reprisals against Ahaz, Judah's new but weak and faithless ruler (16:5; Isa. 7:1-2). Isaiah admonished him to trust in God and in Immanuel, the virgin-born Messiah (Isa. 7:3-14); but in 734 Ahaz submitted to Assyria for deliverance (II Kings 16:7). Edom and Philistia continued to plunder Judah (II Chron. 28:17-18) and may thus provide the background to Obadiah (see vs. 10) and Joel (3:4,19); but Ephraim's northern tribes were taken captive by Tiglath-pileser in 733 (II Kings 15:29), and Damascus was destroyed (16:9). Shortly thereafter the energetic Twenty-fifth (Cushite) Dynasty rose to power in Egypt, and So (Shabaka?) incited Israel to a final revolt (17:4). Samaria fell to the Assyrians in 722 B.C. Sargon II (722-705) proceeded to deport 27,290 Ephraimites (17:6) and replaced them with foreign colonists, who produced the half-breed Samaritans (vss. 24-33). "Israel believed not in Jehovah their God and rejected His covenant . . . Therefore Jehovah removed them out of His sight: there was none left but Judah only" (vss. 14-15,18).

Hezekiah (725-796) meanwhile seized the opportunity to purify the Jerusalem temple (II Chron. 29) and to destroy the corrupt high places, whether outrightly pagan or claiming the name of Jehovah. His reform included even Israel, which was now helpless under Assyrian siege (31:1); and he invited Ephraimites and Judeans alike to the greatest passover since Solomon (Chapter 30). "Israel" came thus to be applied to God's faithful remnant, regardless of their previous citizenship (vs. 6; compare Ezra 9:1; 10:5). Hezekiah was warned by both Isaiah (30:1-7; 31:1-3) and Micah (1:9) to take no part in Shabaka's disastrous battle against Sargon in 720; and he managed to withdraw from the equally unsuccessful revolt of Ashdod in 711, which was sponsored by Egypt and Babylon (Isa. 20 and 39; compare 36:1). But with the accession of Sennacherib in 705, Hezekiah attempted to throw off the Assyrian yoke. Egypt, however, proved again to be a "broken reed" (II Kings 18:21): Shabaka was defeated at Eltekeh near Ekron in 701, and Sennacherib claims to have taken over 200,000 Jews captive (compare Isa. 43:5,14) and to have "shut up Hezekiah like a caged bird in Jerusalem." Hezekiah resubmitted (II Kings 18:14-16), but the false Sennacherib made further demands (vs. 17). God then rose to the defense of His chastened people (Isa. 37:6,21-35); and, when a relief army arrived under Shabaka's brother Tirhaka, it found the Assyrians smitten by the angel of the Lord (II Kings 19:9,35; compare the Egyptian legend of a plague of mice in the camp of Sennacherib, Herodotus, II,141). ranks with the crossing of the Red Sea as one of the greatest examples of God's deliverance. Isaiah thus had a sound basis for comforting Israel (40: 1-2) and directing their hope to that day when God should fulfill His redemptive purpose among them (53:6).

The reign of Manasseh (696-641) was the longest and worst of Israel's history. He surrendered Hezekiah's dearly-bought freedom by resubmitting to Assyria; and he rebuilt the high places, served Baal with human sacrifice, and mimicked Assyrian star-worship (II Kings 21:2-9). Through imprisonment (after the Babylonian revolts of 652-648?), he experienced personal conversion (II Chron. 33:11-16); but it was too late to reform the people as a whole (vs. 17; compare II Kings 21:11,15; 23:26). God, however, was yet to raise up Josiah (639-608), the greatest of Israel's reformers. While still in his teens (627 B.C.) he responded to prophetic teaching such as Zephaniah's (1:14-17) and began actively to eliminate idolatry (II Chron. 34:3-7). At this point the barbaric Scythians erupted over the Near East; and the terror they inspired seems likewise to have turned men's hearts to God. (Compare Jeremiah's earliest sermons [6:22-26]). The Scythians were finally driven back by the newly-formed Twenty-sixth Dynasty in Egypt, but their devastations did serve to release Judah from foreign control for a full 20 years. Josiah used these last precious decades to establish the testamental faith once and for all among the pious. His reforms climaxed in 621 B.C. with the discovery of "the book of the law of Jehovah by the hand of Moses" (II Chron. 24:14), perhaps the chief sanctuary scroll of the Pentateuch (Deut. 31:25-26) that had been misplaced under Manasseh (compare II Chron. 35:3). Josiah and his people reconsecrated themselves "to perform the words of the testament that were written in this book" (34:31). He removed the high places (II Kings 23:8-9), including even Jeroboam's original altar at Bethel (v. 15), and kept the greatest passover since the days of the judges (II Chron. 35). "Like unto him there was no king before him that turned to Jehovah with all his heart, according to all the law of Moses" (II Kings 23:25).

In 612 B.C. Nineveh fell to the Medes and Babylonians, just as Nahum had prophesied (Nah. 3:18-19). The Medes then withdrew, but Egypt and Babylon arose to claim the spoils. Josiah intervened to oppose the advance of Pharaoh Necho II and was slain at Megiddo in 608 B.C. (II Chron. 35:20-24). Necho, however, was decisively defeated by the Babylonians at Carchemish in 605; and Nebuchadnezzar appropriated the formerly Assyrian territories (II Kings 24:7). Josiah's son Jehoiakim was threatened with deportation to Babylon (vs. 6); but only a few of the nobility, such as Daniel (Dan. 1:3), were actually taken captive at this time. The date does mark the commencement of Israel's predicted 70 years of captivity (Jer. 25:11-12). But while the prophet Habakkuk was admonishing his people to "live by faith" (Heb. 2:4), Jehoiakim reverted to the sins of his fathers (Jer. 22:13-19). He also rebelled against Babylon (II Kings 24:1); but he died in 598 B.C., and it was his son, with 10,000 of the leaders of Judah, who suffered the second deportation, when Jerusalem surrendered on March 16, 597 (24:10-16). Finally, Jehoiakim's brother Zedekiah yielded to the inducements of Pharaoh Hophra of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty and defied Nebuchadnezzar (compare Jer. 37:11). The Babylonians advanced, Hophra withdrew, and Jerusalem fell in 586. The city and temple were burned (II Kings 25:9), the walls were dismantled (vs. 10), and most of the people were carried into exile in Babylon (vs. 11). A small, fourth deportation in 582 removed even some of the poor that were left (vs. 12, Jer. 52:30). Israel had "mocked the messengers of God and despised His words, until the wrath of Jehovah arose against His people, till there was no remedy" (II Chron. 36:16). But though the external kingdom of Israel had ceased to exist, it did so because it had accomplished its divine purpose. A remnant, albeit small, had been nurtured to the point of profiting from the fiery trial of Babylon (see Exile) so as to be ready for that ultimate day, when, "Behold, saith Jehovah, I will make a new testament with the house of Israel: and I will put My law in their inward parts, and in their heart will I write it; and I will be their God, and they shall be My people: . . . for I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin will I remember no more" (Jer. 31: 31-34; Heb. 8:6-13, 10:15-22, ASV). ISSACHAR (ĭs'ă-kăr, Heb. yissākhār, meaning uncertain). 1. The ninth son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah (Gen. 30:17,18; 35:23). Almost nothing is known of his personal history beyond his share in the common actions of the sons of Jacob. He had four sons, and with them went down with Jacob into Egypt (Gen. 46:13; Exod. 1:3). There he died and was buried. His descendants formed a tribe, consisting of five great tribal families (Num. 26:23,24).

Not much is known of the tribe. It lay S of Zebulun and Naphtali, and N of Manasseh; and was bounded on the E by the Jordan. It occupied the greater part of the very fertile plain of Esdraelon, which, however, was mostly held by the Canaanites. Along the S edge of the plain there were fortresses held by Manasseh. At the first census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 54,400 fighting men (Num. 1:28,29); at the second, 64,300 (Num. 26:25). In the days of David the figure had reached 87,000 (I Chron. 7:5). Igal, son of Joseph, was the spy from Issachar (Num. 13:7). Deborah and Barak belonged to it; and in Deborah's song (Judg. 5:15), the tribe is mentioned as having taken part in the battle against Sisera. One of the judges, Tola, belonged to it (Judg. 10:1); and so did two kings, Baasha and his son (I Kings 15:27). The princes of Issachar abandoned allegiance to Saul's family and accepted David as king of all Israel (I Chron. 12:32). Many men from the tribe attended Hezekiah's passover, although they belonged to the northern kingdom (II Chron. 30:18). The tribe is mentioned in Revelation 7:7, where we are told that 12,000 from Issachar were sealed.

2. A Korahite doorkeeper in the reign of David (I Chron. 26:5).

ISSHIAH (ĭs'shī'ă, Heb. yishshîyāhû, Jehovah exists). 1. A man Issachar, a great-grandson of Tola (I Chron. 7:3, Ishiah in KJV).

2. One of those who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:6, Jesiah in KJV).

3. A Levite of the house of Rehabiah (I Chron. 24:21).

4. A Levite of the house of Uzziel (I Chron. 23:20; 24:25).

ISUI (See Ishui)

ITALIAN BAND. A cohort of volunteer Roman soldiers recruited in Italy and stationed in Caesarea when Peter preached the Gospel to Cornelius, who was a centurion in it (Acts 10:1). It consisted mostly of Italians who could not find service in the Praetorian Guard.

ITALY (ĭt'ă-lĭ, Gr. Italía), the geographical term for the country of which Rome was the capital. Originally, it applied only to the extreme S of what is now Italy, the region now called Calabria, but gradually the application of the name was extended, until in the first century of our era it began to be used in the current sense. It is referred to four times in the NT. 1. In Acts 18:2 Aquila and Priscilla had just come from Italy because the Emperor Claudius had commanded all the Jews to leave Rome.

2. It is mentioned in Acts 27:1 as Paul's destination when he had appealed to Caesar; and in verse 6 Paul is put on board a ship of Alexandria sailing for Italy.

3. In Hebrews 13:24 Christians from Italy send their greetings along with those of the author of the epistle.

4. In Acts 10:1 it is mentioned as the country that gave its name to the cohort stationed at Caesarea, of which Cornelius was the centurion. Christianity was early introduced into Italy, but the time and circumstances are uncertain.

ITCH (See Diseases)

ITHAI (ĭth'ā-ī, 'ithay), a Benjamite, one of David's chief men (I Chron. 11:31); called Ittai in the parallel passage II Samuel 23:29).

ITHAMAR (ĭth'ă-mär, Heb. 'ithāmār), the youngest of the four sons of Aaron, the others being Eleazar, Nadab, and Abihu. Aaron and his sons were consecrated to the priesthood (Exod. 28:1), but Nadab and Abihu were put to death for offering strange fire (Lev. 10). During the wilderness wanderings he was the treasurer of the offerings for the tabernacle (Exod. 38:21) and superintendent of the Gershonites and Merarites (Num. 4:28,33). He founded a priestly family, to which Eli and his descendants belonged, and this continued after the Captivity (I Chron. 24:4-6; Ezra 8:2).

ITHIEL (ĭth'ĭ-ĕl, 'ithî'ēl God is). 1. One of two persons to whom Agur addressed his sayings Prov. 30:1).

2. A Benjamite (Neh. 11:7).

ITHMAH (ĭth'mă, Heb. yithmâh, purity), a Moabite, one of David's heroes (I Chron. 11:46).

ITHNAN (ĭth'năn, Heb. yithnān), a town in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:23). Not identified.

ITHRA (ĭth'rà, Heb. yithrā', abundance), the father of Amasa, commander of Absalom's rebel army. His mother was Abigail, David's sister (I Chron. 2:17, Jether in KJV). In II Samuel 17: 25 he is called an Israelite, but in I Chronicles 2: 17; I Kings 2:5,32 (Jether in KJV), an Ishmaelite.

ITHRAN (ĭth'răn, Heb. yithrān, excellent). 1. A Horite, son of Dishon (Gen. 36:26; I Chron. 1: 41).

2. A son of Zophah of the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:37).

ITHREAM (ĭth'rē-ăm, Heb. yithre'ām), the sixth son born to David at Hebron. His mother was Eglah (II Sam. 3:5; I Chron. 3:3).

ITHRITE (ĭth'rĭt, Heb. yithrî, excellence), a family which lived at Kiriath-jearim (I Chron. 2:53). Two of David's heroes belonged to this family, Ira and Gareb (II Sam. 23:38; I Chron. 11:40).

ITTAH-KAZIN (ĭt'ă-kā'zĭn, Heb. 'ittâh kātsîn), a place on the border of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13). Exact site unknown.

ITTAI (ĭt'ă-ī ,Heb. 'ittay). 1. A son of Ribai, a Benjamite, one of David's 30 mighty men (II Sam. 23:29; I Chron. 11:31).

2. A native of Gath who left his native Philistine city and attached himself to David. He commanded 600 men. He was loyal to David through all vicissitudes. When Absalom rebelled against David, Ittai fled with the king and refused to return to Jerusalem, where, David told him, his interests lay. David made him a commander of a third part of his army, with Joab and Abishai; and in the battle that followed Absalom was killed (II Sam. 15:18-22; 18:2,5).

ITURAEA (ĭt'ū-rē'à, Gr. Itouraía, pertaining to Jetur). This word is found only once in Scripture, in the description of Philip's territory, which the KJV renders, "of Ituraea and of the region of Trachonitis" (Luke 3:1). It was a region NE of Palestine, beyond the Jordan, and cannot now be exactly located. The Ituraeans were descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:15), who had a son named Jetur, from whom the name Ituraea is derived. The Ituraeans were semi-nomads and famous archers, a lawless and predatory people. According to an ancient writer, David warred against them. It is not known when they moved from the desert to the mountains in the N. Until the fourth century A.D. there was no defined territory called Ituraea; only the ethnic name Ituraeans was used. In Luke 3:1, according to Ramsay, the word is an adjective. In 105 B.C. Aristobulus I conquered and annexed the kingdom to Judea. In 66 B.C. Pompey defeated its king, Ptolemaeus, who purchased immunity with a large sum of money. Lysanias, the son of Ptolemaeus, was put to death by Antony, who thereupon gave the tetrarchy to Cleopatra (36 B.C.). Later Augustus gave it to Herod the Great, and after his death it passed to his son Philip.

IVAH (ī'và, Heb. 'iwwâh), a city, probably in Syria, captured by the Assyrians, according to the boast of Sennacherib's representative (II Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13).

IVORY (ī'vō-rĭ, Heb. shēn, Gr. elephántos). The word shen means a tooth, but it is also frequently used in the sense of ivory. The context always makes clear how it should be rendered. Ivory was brought to Palestine by both ship and caravan, and came from India. Solomon's throne was made of ivory (I Kings 10:18); and he imported large quantities of it. Amos denounces Israel for its luxuries, among them the use of ivory (Amos 3:15; 6:4). Even houses were overlaid with it (I Kings 22:39; Ps. 45:8).

IZCHAR (See Izhar)

IZHAR (ĭz'hăr, Heb. yitshār, the shining one). 1. A Levite, son of Kohath, whose descendants formed a tribal family (Exod. 6:18,19; Num. 3: 19; I Chron. 6:18,38).

2. A descendant of Judah, whose mother was Helah (I Chron. 4:7).

IZRAHIAH (ĭz'rà-hī'à, Heb. yizrahyâh, Jehovah arises or shines), a chief of the tribe of Issachar (I Chron. 7:3).

IZRAHITE (iz'ra-hit, Heb. yizrâh, rising, shining). Shamhuth, the captain of the fifth monthly course, is called an Izrahite (I Chron. 27:8). The name may be a corruption of "Zerahite," a descendant of Zerah of Judah.

IZRI (ĭz-rī, Heb. yitsrî, creator, former), a man of the "sons of Jeduthun," chief of one of the Levitical choirs (I Chron. 25:11). Called Zeri in verse 3.

J

JAAKAN (jā'ā-kăn, Heb. ya'ăqān), a descendant of Esau (I Chron. 1:35-42, spelled Jakan). He was the son of Ezer, who was a Horite (Gen. 36: 20-27, spelled Akan). Israel rested in the land of Jaakan where there were wells (Beeroth) and Aaron was buried there (Deut. 10:6,7). In the report of Israel's wanderings the camp is called Bene (sons of) Jaakan (Num. 33:31,32).

JAAKOBAH (jā'ā-kō'bà), a Simeonite prince. (I Chron. 4:36).

JAALA, JAALAH (jā'ā-là, jā'ā-là), a servant of Solomon whose children returned from Babylon. (Ezra 2:56).

JAALAM (jā'ā-lăm), the second son of Esau by a Hivite woman. He became a duke in Edom (Gen. 36:2,5,18).

JAANAI (jā'ā-nī), a son of Gad, who settled in Bashan near the heritage of Reuben (I Chron. 5:11,12).

JAARE-OREGIM (jā'ā-rē-ôr'ē-jĭm, Heb. ya'ărê-ōreghīm), the father of Elhanan, who slew the giant brother of Goliath (II Sam. 21:19). The title oregim means weaver and seems to have been added by a scribe who confused the real name with the size of the giant's sword. Jaare also seems to be a scribal error, since the name is given in Chronicles as Jair (I Chron. 20:5). Most authorities agree that the name in Chronicles is correct.

JAASAU (jā'ā-sāū, Heb. ya'ăsû, RV has Jaasu, RVm Jaasai), one of a number of captives who married alien women but put them away upon demand of a council headed by Ezra (Ezra 10:16-19,37).

JAASIEL, JASIEL (jā-ā'sī-ĕl, jā'sī-ĕl, Heb. ya'ăsî'ēl, God makes), a son of Abner, of the tribe of Benjamin, a leader of Benjamites (I Chron. 27: 21) and valiant warrior (I Chron. 11:47).

JAAZANIAH (jā-ăz'ā-nī'à, Heb. ya'ăzanyāhû, ya'ăzanyah, Jehovah hears). 1. A member of the tribe of Maacah whose land E of the Jordan was given to Manasseh (Josh. 13:7-11). He was captain under Gedaliah (II Kings 25:23). Jeremiah calls him Jezaniah (40:8, 42:1), and Azariah (43: 2). He joined a group who slew Gedaliah and then, contrary to advice from Jeremiah, led a band into Egypt (Jer. 43:1-7).

2. Jaazaniah was the son of a Rechabite named Jeremiah, and was among a group of refugees who refused to drink wine which Jeremiah offered (Jer. 35:1-11).

3. Another of the name was a leader in idolatrous worship which Ezekiel saw in a vision (8:10-12).

4. The son of Azur, one of a band of 25 men who led in wickedness and idolatry in Israel (Ezek. 11:1-3).

JAAZER, JAZER (jā'ā-zêr, jā'zêr, Heb. ya'ăzêr, helpful), a stronghold E of the Jordan in a fertile area (Isa. 16:8-11). It was taken from the Amorites by Moses (Num. 21:32) and made a part of the heritage of Gad (Josh. 13:24,25). Later it was given to the Levites (Josh. 21:39). It was a grazing region (Num. 32:1-5) and a good place for vineyards (Jer. 48:32). Joab considered it important enough to be included in the census (II Sam. 24:5). The city grew mighty men of valor during David's latter years (I Chron. 26: 31). Moab captured and despoiled the city (Isa. 16:8f) and later the Ammonites seized, ravaged and burned it (Josh. Ant. XII:8; 1). The Sea of Jazir (Jer. 48:32) may be identified today as Khirbet Jazzir, Sea of Salt N of the Dead Sea.

JAAZIAH (jā'ăz-ī'à, Heb. ya'ăzīyāhû, Jehovah strengthens), a descendant of Levi; temple musician of David's time (I Chron. 24:26,27).

JAAZIEL (jā-ā'zī-ĕl, Heb. ya'ăzî'ēl, God strengthens), a temple musician (I Chron. 15:18), called Aziel in verse 20.

JABAL (jā'băl, Heb. yāvāl, meaning uncertain), a son of Lamech, who was the great-grandson of Cain (Gen. 4:19,20). He and his brothers, Jubal and Tubal, are credited with the origin of civilized society (Gen. 4:21,22).

JABBOK (jăb'ŏk, Heb. yabbōq, flowing), an important river E of the Jordan about halfway between the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee. It was the northern border of the Amorite king, Sihon, (Josh. 12:2) and was captured by the Hebrews after Sihon refused to let them cross his land (Num. 21:21-25). It was also the southern border of the kingdom of Og (Josh. 12:5). At a ford on the Jabbok, Jacob had his encounter with the angel, which resulted in his being given a new name (Gen. 32:22-30). The word for wrestle is abbaq, and may have given the Hebrew name to the stream, or an ancient fortress between Damascus and Mecca, Xarka, may have furnished the name. Its modern name is Ez-zerka, river of blue. It is shallow except during occasional rains, and its fords are easily crossed. Its basin is second in size of Jordan's eastern tributaries, only the Yarmuk to the north having a larger watershed. Its banks are covered with heavy vegetation, the portion near the Jordan being semi-tropical. It rises within 20 miles of the Jordan, but runs 60 miles, at first NE, then nearly due W in a great arc before turning SW to the Jordan. This unusual course accounts for the record in Numbers 21:24, the upper section being the boundary between Sihon and Ammon, and the arc the eastern boundary of Sihon's realm. J.D.F.

JABESH (jā'bĕsh, Heb. yavēsh, dry). 1. Father of Shallum, who slew Zachariah and reigned instead for a month (II Kings 15:8-13).

2. A short term for Jabesh-Gilead (I Chron. 10:12), a town. See JABESH-GILEAD.

JABESH-GILEAD (jā'bĕsh-gĭl'ē-ăd, Heb. yavēsh gil'ādh, dry), the metropolis of the Gileadites (Jos. Ant. VI:5;1). It lay a night's journey across the Jordan from Beth-shan (I Sam. 31:11,12). It was in the area given to the half tribe of Manasseh (Num. 32:33). When the citizens refused to attend the sacred assembly at Mizpeh, an army was sent to destroy them (Judg. 21:8-15). The city was not destroyed and grew again into power and wealth. During Saul's reign over Israel, Nahash, king of Ammon, besieged the city. Appealed to for a treaty, he proposed to grant peace if every able-bodied man would have his right eye put out. A seven-day truce was granted during which time Saul's help was enlisted. He sent pieces of slain oxen throughout his land, indicating what would happen to those who refused to help in his battle for Jabesh. His army defeated Nahash; the city was saved and the nation reunited (I Sam. 11:1-15). One of the purposes behind this military aid was to secure wives for Benjamites, since Israel had sworn never to allow Benjamites to marry their daughters (Judg. 21:1). Later, when Saul's forces had been routed by the Philistines and he and his sons slain, men of Jabesh-Gilead rescued their bodies, cremated them and buried the remains in Jabesh (I Sam. 31:1-13). Upon becoming king, David sent thanks for the act (II Sam. 2:4-6) and had the remains of Saul and Jonathan exhumed and interred in the tomb of Kish in the land of Benjamin (II Sam. 21:12-14).

It is probable that the stream Wady-Yabish received its name from the city. Al-Dair (ed Dair) is now thought to be the probable site of the ancient city. It was ten miles E of the Jordan and about 25 miles S of the Sea of Galilee. J.D.F.

JABEZ (jā'bĕz, Heb. ya'bēts, to grieve). 1. The head of a family in Judah (I Chron. 4:9). His offspring are listed as scribes and as Kenites (I Chron. 2:55). He was more honorable than his brethren (I Chron. 4:9). He made an earnest appeal for a blessing and it was granted (I Chron. 4:10). Zobebah (4:8) is probably another title for him.

2. Jabez was also an unidentified town in Judah in which scribes carried on their trade (I Chron. 2:55).

JABIN (jā'bĭn, Heb. yāvîn, able to discern). 1. A king of Hazor, the leading city in the northern part of Palestine (Josh. 11:1). When Joshua had succeeded in conquering the neighboring provinces and had massed his forces at Gilgal (Josh. 10:7), Jabin led in forming an alliance against him. These tribes occupied the area S of the Sea of Galilee (Josh. 11:1-4). Joshua was cowed by the great force thus gathered against him, but was assured of God that he could defeat them (Josh. 11:6). They joined battle with Jabin at the waters of Merom. He chased the enemy all the way to the coast at Zidon, leading city of Phoenicia (Josh. 11:8). Hazor was taken and Jabin slain (11:10).

2. Another king by the name of Jabin was a Canaanite who, after the death of Othniel, enslaved Israel, who were rescued by the strategy of Deborah (Judg. 4). He seems to have been only a puppet of Sisera, since he is not mentioned in the Song of Deborah recorded in Judges 5.

JABNEEL (jăb'nē-ĕl, Heb. yavne'ēl, God causes to build). 1. A town in the northern border of Judah, just S of Joppa (Josh. 15:11), modern Jabna. It is called Jabneh in II Chronicles 26:6. It belonged to the tribe of Dan. (Jos. Ant. vs. 2,3); Judas Maccabaeus captured it (II Macc. 12·8,9). It was freed by the emperor Pompey 62 B.C. Herod gave it to Salome, who in turn gave it to the wife of Augustus. Probably through her influence Augustus returned it to the Jews, 30 A.D. (Jos. Ant. XIII:2;2). After the fall of Jerusalem it became the seat of the Sanhedrin.

2. A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33). Perhaps the same as Yemma, not far from Tiberias.

JABNEH (jăb'nĕ), the same as Jabneel 1.

JACHAN (jā'kăn), a descendant of Gad (I Chron. 5:13).

JACHIN, JACHIN AND BOAZ (jā'kĭn, Heb. yākhîn, he will set up). 1. The fourth son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10, Jarib in I Chron. 4:24). Founder of the tribe of Jachanites (Num. 26:12).

2. One of the priests in Jerusalem during the captivity (Neh. 11:10). During David's reign he was leader of the twenty-first course of priests (I Chron. 24:17).

3. Jachin and Boaz were the names of two symbolic pillars in the porch of Solomon's temple, Jachin (speed) on the S and Boaz (power) on the N. They were designed by Hiram of Tyre (I Kings 7:13-22), hence of Phoenician origin. They were at first ornamental, but came to have a religious meaning, guarding the doors to the sacred halls.

JACINTH (jā'sĭnth, Gr. hyarinthos, hyacinth), one of the precious stones in the foundation of New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20). A yellow gem, sometimes with a tinge of blue. Easily cut, it was used by the Greeks in making intaglios, by the Romans in making cameos. Hyacinth in RV. See MINERALS.

JACOB (jākŭb, Heb. ya'ăqōv, supplanter), one of the great names of history, a person about whom a multitude of traditions gathered and of whose record there is among scholars wide diversity of opinions.

1. The Background. Abraham had not long separated himself from the people of the Tigris-Euphrates Valley. Jacob's name was an old one among the Semitic people. As early as 2000 B.C. it occurs among writings of Hammurabi as Yakibula. That it was well-known among the Canaanites of pre-Abraham days is attested by records in the temple at Karnak. Among cities captured by Thotmes III are found two which are similar to the Hebrew word Joseph-el and Jakob-el. Jacob and Esau were children of faith, as was their father (Heb. 11:20). The continuing influence of Aramaean paganism which Abraham had left is seen in Rachel's act of taking her father's idols when Jacob was leaving the home of Laban (Gen. 31:19). From ancient Assyrian culture came the cunning and creative abilities which enabled Jacob to raise a family that shaped the destiny of the human race.

2. Birth and Youth (Gen. 25:19-26). At the age of 40 Isaac married Rebekah, a sister of his uncle Laban (vs. 20). In answer to prayer on behalf of his barren wife, she conceived twins (vs. 21). An unusual prenatal incident caused her to consult Jehovah who revealed to her the coming of the founders of two great nations (vs. 23). An ominous rivalry, begun in the womb, became visible during birth. Esau came first; Jacob followed at once, holding Esau by the heel, hence his name "tripper" or "supplanter" (vv. 25,26). Nothing is revealed about the childhood of the boys. Because of the ancient law of primogeniture, Isaac naturally favored the older son; but because, no doubt, of the revelation from God, Rebekah was partial to Jacob (vs. 28). Jacob's cunning was revealed in the way he induced Esau to sell his birthright (vss. 27-34).

3. Gain and Loss (Gen. 27:1-29:30). Isaac grew to be old and became blind. Knowing that his end was near, he desired to impart the paternal blessing. Esau was still the favorite son, so he asked him to prepare the favorite dish, after eating which he would pronounce the blessing (27:1-4). Rebekah overheard the request and took advantage of Isaac's blindness to further her plan to make Jacob first in every way. Jacob, as ambitious as his mother, joined in the plot. A dramatic scene is given in Genesis 27:6-45. Jacob, dressed to simulate Esau, was clad in his brother's robe, having skillfully applied goat skins to make his hands and neck hairy like his brother's. Rebekah made a savory dish which Jacob presented to his father. He deliberately told falsehoods: (1) "I am Esau"; (2) "God helped me secure the game with speed." Deceived by the odor of Esau's garments and pleased with the food, Isaac imparted the first-born's blessing to Jacob. Esau, upon learning of his brother's perfidy, wept and begged for another blessing which was granted (vss. 34-40). Rebekah, knowing of Esau's vow to kill Jacob, induced Isaac to send Jacob to Haran to choose a wife from the family of Laban (27:42-28:5).

En route to Haran, Jacob camped at Luz where he had a vision of a ladder, with angels ascending and descending. In his dream he had a promise from Jehovah both to inherit the land about him and to have a numerous progeny (28:10-15). He recognized that God had been with him, so named the place Bethel, "house of God" (28:16-19), and made a vow to tithe all his future possessions (vss. 20-22). He met Rachel at a well-side in Haran, watered her flock, revealed himself to her, and was soon at home with Laban (Gen. 29:1-14). His contract to serve seven years for Rachel ended after 14 years of indentured servitude (29:15-30).

4. The Offspring and Closing Years (Gen. 29:31-50:13). The conflict between Jacob and Esau had its counterpart in that between Leah and Rachel. Leah won favor from God and bore Reuben (See! a son!), Simeon (God heard), Levi (Added), and Judah (Praise—29:31-35). Rachel's desire for a son led her to give her maid to Jacob, and she bore Dan (Judge) and Naphthali (Wrestling — Gen. 30:1-8). Leah in turn gave her maid who bore Gad (Troop) and Asher (Gladness). She herself also bore Issachar (Pay for hire), Zebulun (Abiding), and finally Dinah (feminine for Dan or Judge). Rachel then bore a son, Joseph (Adding, 30:22-27). Then Jacob grew eager to return to his own land. After outwitting Laban in stock-breeding, he made his departure. Rachel, probably to insure her share in Laban's estate, stole the teraphim, or family gods, some small (Gen. 35:2,4), some large (I Sam. 19:13-17 marg.). Laban, learning of Jacob's flight, pursued and overtook him at Mount Gilead where they settled their difficulties by a covenant, sealed upon a memorial heap called Mizpeh or Watch tower (31:25-55).

At Mahanaim, Jacob met God, then sent messengers to Esau in Edom. They soon returned to report that Esau was near with a formidable force. Jacob went to Jehovah in prayer and received assurance that all would be well. Being alone that night, he wrestled with the angel of the Lord and secured a new name, Israel, or "Prince of God" (32:24-32). The meeting with Esau was emotion-packed (33:1-17) Jacob went to Shechem and bought land near Shalem on which he erected an altar named El-elohe-Israel "God is God of Israel" (33:18-20) Dinah was ravished at this place. To secure her marriage to Shechem, the men of Shalem submitted to circumcision (34:1-24), but while they were incapacitated by the operation Simeon and Levi slew them and pillaged the city (34:25-31). Jacob fled to Bethel. The 12th son, Benjamin, son of my right hand, was born and Rachel died (35:1-20). Jacob continued to dwell in Canaan where Joseph incurred the ill will of his brethren, was sold to Egyptians and became servant of Pharaoh's chief ruler. He saved the Hebrews (Gen. 37:1-47:31). Jacob's final act was to call his 12 sons about him, prophesy regarding the future of each one's offspring and bestow his parting blessing When he died, he was embalmed and taken by Joseph and a troop of Egyptian soldiers to Canaan and buried in the Cave of Machpelah (Gen. 49:1-50:13). JACOB'S WELL. Modern Bir Ya'kub is doubtless the well mentioned in John 4:6 as the well of Jacob (Pegè toú Iakób). For more than 23 centuries Samaritans have believed that this is true. Jews likewise have believed the same in spite of the location of the well in Samaria. The ground mentioned by John had been purchased by Jacob (Gen. 33:19). The area was later wrested by force from the Amorites (Gen. 48:22). The well is near the base of Mt. Gerizim, whose bluffs may have inspired Jesus to say "this mountain" (John 4:21). A narrow opening four feet long led from the floor of the vault into the well which was dug through limestone. The depth has not been determined. One explorer in 670 A.D. claimed it was 240 feet. Another reported in 1697 that it was 105 feet. In 1861 a Major Anderson found it only 75 feet deep. For centuries tourists cast pebbles into it until Greek Catholics bought the site and put it under guard.

JADA (jā'dà, Heb. yādhā', a wise one), a son of Onam and grandson of Jerahmeel of Judah (1 Chron. 2:26,28).

JADAU (jā'dō, Heb. yiddô), an Israelite who married an alien woman during the captivity (Ezra 10:43).

JADDUA (jā-dū'à, Heb. yaddûa', known). 1. An Israelite prince who had part in making the covenant after the return from Babylon (Neh. 10:21).

2. A son of Jonathan and great-grandson of Eliashib. He was among the priests who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:11).

JADON (jā'dŏn, Heb. yādhôn, he will plead), one of the laborers who rebuilt the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:7).

JAEL (jā'ĕl, Heb. yā'ēl, wild goat), the wife of Heber the Kenite (Judg. 4:17). Sisera fled to Heber's tent when defeated by Barak (Judg. 4: 15,17). The perfidy of Jael in ignoring rules of hospitality becomes less heinous if seen in the light of war's long record of brutality. Being a woman she could not meet Sisera in combat, so resorted to cunning, slaying him with a weapon she had long since learned to use, a tent peg. That Deborah approved of her act (Judg. 5:24) only shows to what extremes a harassed people can be driven by a brutal foe. Jael's deed was considered an act of Israel, hence the manner in which Deborah gloated over it. No question is raised in the record about the moral nature of Jael's deed, nor is it attributed to divine leading, although the victory over Sisera was (Judg. 5:20).

JAGUR (jā'gêr, Heb. yâghûr), a town in the extreme S of the heritage of Judah (Josh. 15:21). Its site is unknown.

JAH (jà, Heb. yāh), a contraction of Jahweh. It is found in poetry, as in Psalms 68:4: 118:14, RSV marg., and is seen in such compound words as Isaiah, Jah is saviour and Abijah, Jah is father.

JAHATH (ja'hăth, Heb. yahath, perhaps God will snatch up). 1. A grandson of Judah (I Chron. 4: 1,2).

2. A great-grandson of Levi (I Chron. 6:16-20).

3. A chief among the Gershonite Levites (I Chron. 23:10,11).

4. Another Levite of the Izharite clan (I Chron. 24:22).

5. An overseer of construction during the restoration of the temple under Josiah (II Chron. 34: 8-12). He was a Merarite.

JAHAZ (jā'hăz), JAHAZA (jà-hā'zà), JAHAZAH (jà-hā'zà), a city in Reuben's heritage (Josh. 13: 18) in the land given to the Merarites (Josh. 21:34-36, Jahazah). The Moabite stone tells of a king of Israel who dwelt in Jahaz during a war with Mesha in which Mesha conquered. Later Israel captured the city, conquered Sihon and took the region (Num. 21:21-25). It was once a stronghold N of the Arnon river. Isaiah (15:4) and Jeremiah (48:20,21) call it a city of Moab.

JAHAZIAH (jà-hā'zī-à, Heb. yahzeyâh, God sees), one of four who opposed Ezra's plan to rid Israel of alien wives married during the captivity (Ezra 10:15).

JAHAZIEL (jà-hā'zī-ĕl, Heb. yahăzî'ēl, God sees). 1. One of a band of ambidextrous warriors who aided David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:1-4).

2. A priest who sounded the trumpet before the ark (I Chron. 16:6).

3. A son of Hebron and one of a host called by David to help build the temple (I Chron. 23: 2-20).

4. The chief bearer of the name was a descendant of Asaph. In a time of great peril he was led by the Holy Spirit to announce a victory when defeat seemed certain (II Chron. 20:14ff). Psalm 83 may have been written by him to commemorate the victory.

5. An ancestor of one of the families of the restoration (Ezra 8:5).

JAHDAI (jà'dā-ī), either a concubine or, more probably, a male descendant of Caleb (I Chron. 2:46,47).

JAHDIEL (jà'dī-ĕl, God gives joy), a mighty man, ancestral head of a Manassite clan (I Chron. 5: 24).

JAHDO (jà'dō), a Gadite, a son of Buz and a Gileadite of Jotham's day (I Chron. 5:14).

JAHLEEL (jà'lē-ĕl), a son of Zebulun (Gen. 46: 14); founder of the Jahleel clan (Num. 26:26).

JAHMAI (jà'mā-ī), a grandson of Issachar, a chieftain in his tribe (I Chron. 7:1,2).

JAHWEH (See God)

JAHZAH (jà'zà), a town given to Reuben (I Chron. 6:78).

JAHZEEL (jà'zē-ĕl), JAHZIEL (jà'zī-ĕl), a son of Naphthali (Gen. 46:24); Jaziel in I Chronicles 7:13.

JAHZERAH (jà'zĕ-rà), a priest of Israel (I Chron. 9:12), perhaps the same as Ahasai of Nehemiah 11:13.

JAIR (jā'ĕr, Heb. yā'îr, he enlightens). 1. a son of Manasseh and a leading warrior in the conquest of Gilead by Moses (Num. 32:40,41).

2. One of the judges, a Gileadite who served 20 years (Judg. 10:3,4).

3. A Bethlehemite and the father of Elhanan who slew Goliath the Gittite (II Sam. 21:19 marg.).

4. The father of Mordecai (Esth. 2:5).

JAIRUS (jā'ĭ-rŭs, Gr. Iáeiros), a synagogue ruler whose child Jesus raised from death (Mark 5:22; Luke 8:41). The Gospel accounts vary somewhat in details, but all agree that a miracle occurred when the dead body lived again.

JAKAN (jā'kăn), a Horite (I Chron. 1:42). The same as Akan in Genesis 36:27, and Jaakan in Genesis 36:20,21,27; Deuteronomy 2:12, etc.

JAKEH (jā'kĕ, Heb. yāqeh, very religious), the father of Agur, a writer of proverbs (Prov. 30:1-27). Nothing is known about either Jakeh or Agur. "The prophecy" may mean prediction, burden, or oracle. The Hebrew word ha-massa is believed to mean the Massaite. "Jakeh the Massaite", would be a natural reading. (Gen. 25:14).

JAKIM (jā'kĭm, Heb. yâkîm, God lifts). 1. A son of Elpaal, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:12,19).

2. Head of 12th course of priests (I Chron. 24: 12).

JALON (jā'lŏn), a son of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:17).

JAMBRES (jăm'brēz), one of the magicians who opposed Moses before Pharaoh (II Tim. 3:8).

JAMES (Gr. Iákobos), the English form of Jacob. 1. James the son of Zebedee (Matt. 4:21; 10:2; Mark 1:19; 3:17) and Salome (cf. Matt. 27:56 with Mark 15:40), and the elder brother of the Apostle John (Matt. 17:1; Mark 3:17; 5:37; Acts 12:2), one of our Lord's earliest disciples (Matt. 4:21) and one of the apostles (Matt. 17:1; Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51; 9:28). It is possible that the brothers were cousins of Jesus, which may be why Salome asked special honors for them in the Messianic kingdom (Matt. 20:20). His home was probably in Capernaum. By occupation James and John were fishermen on the Sea of Galilee, in partnership with Peter and Andrew (Luke 5:10). Early in the ministry of Jesus the four were called by Jesus to leave their fishing to follow Him (Luke 5:10,11). From the reference to hired servants in the employ of Zebedee (Mark 1:20) and the mention of the fact that Salome was one of the women who ministered of their substance to Jesus and His company (Mark 15:41; Luke 8:3), it may be inferred that the family was one of some means. It is uncertain whether James was at one time a disciple of John the Baptist. He occupied a prominent place among the apostles, and, with Peter and John, became the special confidant of Jesus. Only these three apostles were with Jesus at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:37), at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1-8), and at the agony in the Garden of Gethsemane (Matt. 26:36-46). Soon after the transfiguration he and John received from Jesus the surname Boanerges, or sons of thunder, when they asked Jesus whether it was right for them to call down fire from heaven to consume the inhabitants of a Samaritan village that had refused Jesus and the apostles permission to pass through on their way to Jerusalem (Mark 3:17). The ambitious self-seeking of James and John in asking Jesus for a special place in the coming kingdom called forth the wrath of the other apostles (Mark 10:41). On Tuesday of Passion Week James was one of the four who asked Jesus the question concerning the last things (Mark 13:3,4). He was also present when the risen Lord appeared to the disciples at the Sea of Tiberias (John 21:1-14). He was the first martyr among the apostles, being put to death by King Herod Agrippa I about the year A.D. 44, shortly before Herod's own death (Acts 12:2).

2. James the son of Alphaeus and one of the apostles of Christ (Matt. 10:3; Acts 1:13). Nothing more is known about him. He is usually identified with James the Little or the Less, the brother of Joses and son of Mary (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40). In Matthew 10:3 and Mark 3:18 he is coupled with Thaddaeus, and since Matthew or Levi is also called the son of Alphaeus (cf. Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14), it is possible that he and James were brothers.

3. James, the Lord's brother (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3; Gal. 1:19). The exact relationship of the "brethren" to our Lord has long been disputed. Some think of them as His cousins; others, as His half-brothers, children of Joseph by a former marriage; others as the children of Joseph and Mary. They did not believe in Jesus during His ministry (John 7:5), but they did after His resurrection (Acts 1:14). The conversion of James apparently took place as a result of a special appearance of Jesus to him after the resurrection (I Cor. 15:7). He early appears as the head of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 12:17; 21:18; Gal. 1:19; 2:9,12). He probably took part in the election of Matthias to the vacant apostleship (Acts 1:15-25). Paul had an interview with him and Peter on his first visit to Jerusalem following his conversion (Gal. 1:19). On Peter's miraculous release from prison, soon after the death of James the brother of John, Peter went immediately to the house of Mary the mother of Mark and asked that the news of his deliverance might be sent to James and the brethren (Acts 12:17). When Paul visited Jerusalem for the second time after his conversion, the leaders of the church, James, Peter, and John gave him their approval and told him that he and Barnabas should preach to the Gentiles, while they would minister to the Jews. At the Jerusalem council James acted as the head and supported Paul's position over against the Judaizers (Acts 14). Peter's inconsistency in regard to eating with Gentiles is explained by the arrival in Antioch of some who said they came from James (Gal. 2:11-14). He appears for the last time in the NT in Acts 21, where after Paul makes a report to him of his third missionary journey, he and the elders with him warn Paul of strong Jewish feeling against him, and advise him to join in a Nazirite vow which some members of their community have undertaken. He is usually regarded as the author of the Epistle of James. Josephus says that he was martyred by the Jewish High Priest soon after the death of Festus (Antiq. xx.9,1), about the year 62.

4. James, the father of the Apostle Judas (not Iscariot), referred to in Luke 6:16 and Acts 1:13. Nothing further is known of him. S.B.

JAMES THE LESS (See James)

JAMES, EPISTLE OF. This epistle is among the last to become firmly established in the NT canon. While traces of it seem to be found in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers (90-155 A.D.), the oldest author to mention it by name is Origen (250 A.D.), who considers it canonical, although he is aware that its canonicity is not universally acknowledged. Eusebius (323 A.D.) lists it among the disputed books, but says it is read in most churches. In the East the church accepted it from a very early period, but in the West it was not received into the canon until the end of the fourth century.

The author of the epistle refers to himself as "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (1:1). The NT mentions four who bore the name of James: (1) the father of Judas the Apostle, not Iscariot (Luke 6:16), (2) the apostle, James the son of Alphaeus (Matt. 10:3), (3) the apostle, James the son of Zebedee and the brother of John (Matt. 4:21), (4) the brother of our Lord (Matt. 13:55; Gal. 1:19). The father of Judas the apostle is entirely unknown except for the mention of his relation to the apostle, and nothing is said of James the son of Alphaeus except that he was an apostle, so it is unlikely that either of these two men could have written the epistle. James the son of Zebedee was martyred about 44 A.D. (Acts 12:2), so he cannot be the author; and besides, the author of this epistle does not call himself an apostle, but describes himself merely as a servant. Tradition attributes the authorship of the epistle to James the brother of the Lord, who was favored with a special appearance of the risen Christ (I Cor. 15:7) and who from a very early date occupied a leading position in the church at Jerusalem (Acts 12:17; Gal. 1:19). Paul names him first among the three pillars of the church in Jerusalem he saw on his second visit there after his conversion (Gal. 2:9), and in Acts 15 he is described as the leader and chief spokesman of the Apostolic Council. All that is known of him shows that he was highly esteemed not only by Christians but by unbelieving Jews. According to Josephus he was put to death by the High Priest in the interregnum between the death of Festus and the arrival of his successor Albinus in 62 A.D.

All the characteristics of the epistle support the traditional attribution of it to James the brother of the Lord. The author speaks with the authority of one who knew he did not need to justify or defend his position. There is no more Jewish book in the NT than this epistle; and this is to be expected from a man whom both tradition and the rest of the NT show was distinguished by a greater attachment to the law of Moses than Paul. The whole of the epistle, moreover, bears a striking resemblance to the Sermon on the Mount both in the loftiness of its morality and in the simple grandeur of its expression.

The letter is addressed to "the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad." This ambiguous expression may be interpreted in a number of ways. 1. The Jews of the Diaspora in general, who were living throughout the Mediterranean world outside Palestine. This meaning is impossible, for the writer is addressing Christians (1:18,25; 2:1,12; 5:7-9). 2. The Jewish Christians of the Diaspora. 3. The Christian Church as the new people of God living far from their heavenly homeland. Early Christians regarded themselves as the true Israel (Gal. 6:16), the true circumcision (Phil. 3:3), and the seed of Abraham (Gal. 3:29; Rom. 4:16), so it would not be surprising if they also thought of themselves as "the twelve tribes." There is no doubt, however, that the epistle is intended for Jewish Christians, although its message is applicable to all Christians. Those to whom the author writes worship in synagogues (2:2), and the faults he attacks were characteristic of Jews: misuse of the tongue (3:2-12; 4:2,11), unkind judgments of one's neighbor (3:14; 4:11), the making of rash oaths (5:12), undue regard for wealth (2:1-13), etc. On the other hand, there is no mention of specifically pagan vices — idolatry, drunkenness, and impurity — against which Paul so often warns Gentile Christians. The object of the author is to rebuke and correct the error and sins into which his readers have fallen, and to encourage them in the heavy trials through which they were going.

The scholars who consider this epistle the work of James the brother of the Lord are not agreed on the date when it was written. Two views are held, one that it was composed shortly before the death of James, in the early sixties; the other, that it appeared in the middle forties, before the Apostolic Council. In favor of the early date are the striking simplicity of church organization and discipline, the fact that Christians still meet in the synagogue (2:2), and the general Judaic tone. All this is thought to suggest a time before Gentiles were admitted into the church in any large numbers. Scholars who prefer the later date say that the epistle gives evidence of a considerable lapse of time in the history of the Church, at least enough to allow for a declension of the spiritual fervor that characterized the church in early apostolic times. The readers are obviously not recent converts. The author has a position of long-established authority. The references to persecutions, moreover, fit a later date better than an early one.

The informal character of the epistle makes a logical analysis difficult. It is not a formal treatise, but a loosely juxtaposed series of exhortations, warnings, and instructions, all dealing with the moral and religious life. The author rules authoritatively on questions of church life and discipline which have been brought to his attention.

After the address (1:1), James first admonishes his readers on having a right attitude towards tribulations and temptations (1:2-18), and exhorts them to be doers and not merely hearers of the word of God (1:19-25). He forbids them to slight the poor and favor the rich (2:1-13), and shows them the insufficiency of faith without works (2:14-26). He then warns them against the misuse of the tongue (3:1-12), and sets forth the nature of true and false wisdom (3:13-18). He rebukes them for their avarice and concupiscence (4:1-12), and for making foolhardy plans for the future in business (4:13-17). The epistle closes with a warning to the godless rich (5:1-6), an exhortation to patience in suffering (5:7-12), a reminder of the power of prayer in every need (5:13-18), and a declaration of the joy of Christian service (5:19,20).

The section on faith and works (2:14-26) is not a polemic against Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, but a rebuke of the prevalent Jewish notion that saving faith is mere intellectual assent to a set of doctrinal propositions. He points out that saving faith manifests itself in works, and that if the works are not there the genuineness of the faith may be questioned. Paul and James are in perfect harmony in their views of the relationship of faith and works to salvation. S.B.

JAMIN (jā'mĭn, Heb. yāmîn, right hand). 1. A son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10), or clan of Simeon (Num. 26:12).

2. A son of Ram of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:3,27).

3. A teacher of the law under Ezra (Neh. 8:7).

JAMLECH (jăm'-lĕch, Heb. yamlēkh, whom God makes king), a prince of the tribe of Simeon (I Chron. 4:34).

JANNA (jăn'ą, Gr. Iannaí), an ancestor of Jesus, fifth in line before Joseph (Luke 3:23,24).

JANNES (jăn'ēz, Gr. Iannés), a magician who withstood Moses and Aaron by duplicating some of their miracles. Paul, who was familiar with rabbinical traditions, named him along with Jambres as types of evil men of the last days (II Tim. 3:8).

JANOAH (ją-nō'ą), JANOHAH (ją-nō'hą) in KJV of Joshua. 1. A town of Naphthali captured by Assyria (II Kings 15:29).

2. A town on the boundary line of Ephraim (Josh. 16:6,7).

JANUM (jā'nŭm), a town in the land of Judah, site unknown; part of heritage of Judah (Josh. 15:53 marg. Janus). Same as Janim.

JAPHETH (jā'fĕth, Heb. yepheth, God will enlarge, Gen. 9:27), a son of Noah. He was older than Shem (Gen. 10:21), but comes third in some lists of the three sons (Gen. 6:10; 9:18). Shem, however, is usually named first (Gen. 5:32; 11:10). Japheth and his wife were saved in the ark (Gen. 7:7); he aided Shem in covering the naked body of their drunken father (Gen. 9:20-27). He is the progenitor of the more remote northern peoples of southeastern Europe. That he was to occupy the tents of Shem is thought to refer to conquests of the Greeks who were descendants of Japheth. This he did during the days of Assyrian power. He had seven sons whose descendants occupied the isles of the Gentiles, Hellenes or Greeks (Gen. 10:5), an area including Asia Minor and upper Greece.

JAPHIA (ją-fī'ą, Heb. yāphîa', tall or may God make bright). 1. A ruler of Lachish who joined a coalition against Joshua (Josh. 10:1-5). In a momentous battle in the Valley of Ajalon (vss. 12-14), the allies were defeated, the five kings fled and sought refuge in a cave which Joshua sealed up and left under guard while his forces pursued the enemy. Later he had the kings executed and buried in the cave (vss. 22-27).

2. A son of David born in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15; I Chron. 3:7).

3. A small city on the eastern border of Zebulun (Josh. 19:12). It has quite definitely been shown to be modern Yafa, a site not far from Nazareth.

JAPHLET (jăf'lĕt), a great grandson of Asher, or the name of a clan descended from Asher (I Chron. 7:32).

JAPHLETI (jăf'lē-tī), an ancient clan whose land was the western border of Joseph's heritage (Josh. 16:1-3). RV has Japhletite.

JAPHO (jā'fō), the Hebrew form of Joppa, a border town of Dan's inheritance (Josh. 19:46). See JOPPA.

JARAH (jā'rà, honeycomb), a descendant of Gibeon (I Chron. 9:42), called Jehoaddah of 8:36.

JAREB (jā'rĕb, Heb. yārēv, contender), an Assyrian king to whom Ephraim went for help (Hos. 5:13). The title is not found among Assyrian records, but this may be an earlier name of Sargon. It may be a term of derision, "king who is contentious."

JARED (jā'rĕd), the father of Enoch (Gen. 5:18-20).

JARESIAH (jăr'ē-sī'à), a son of Jerohan (I Chron. 8:27), of the tribe of Benjamin. RV has Jaareshiah.

JARHA (jàr'hà), an Egyptian slave of Sheshan, a Jerahmeelite (I Chron. 2:34,35). Since Sheshan had no son, he gave Jarha his freedom so he could marry a daughter. Jewish sources claim him as a proselyte. That Ahlai (vs. 31) was the wife seems probable, although the name is masculine. Another idea is that Ahlai is the name given Jarha when he was set free.

JARIB (jā'rĭb, he strives). 1. A son of Simeon, also called Jachin (I Chron. 4:24; Gen. 46:10 marg.).

2. A chief of returning captives, sent by Ezra to secure Levites to carry on the temple worship (Ezra 8:15-20).

3. One of the priests who had alien wives during the captivity, whom Ezra compelled to be put away (Ezra 10:18).

JARMUTH (jàr'mŭth, Heb. yarmûth, height). 1. One of the numerous places included in the heritage of Judah (Josh. 15:35), which had been captured from its king, Piram, who was a member of the coalition called by the king of Jerusalem to oppose Joshua (Josh. 10:1-5). Ruins of the city have been found 16 miles W by S from Jerusalem. Walls and numerous wells show it to have been a stronghold — modern Khirbit el Yarmuk.

2. Another city of the name was given to the Gershonite Levites from the heritage of Issachar (Josh. 21:27-29), called Remeth (19:21), and Ramoth (I Chron. 6:73).

JAROAH (jà-rō'à), a chieftain of the tribe of Dan, living in land of Bashan (I Chron. 5:14).

JASHEN (jā'shĕn, brilliant), father of some of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:32). Confusion arises from I Chronicles 11:33f where his father is called Hashem, the Gizonite. This is evidently another spelling, which should be "Gunite."

JASHER, BOOK OF (jā'shêr, Jashar in RSV), quoted in Joshua 10:13, II Samuel 1:18, and in LXX of I Kings 8:53. This ancient book is thought to have been a collection of poetry, probably odes and psalms in praise of Israel's heroes and exploits. Many ideas about the book have been advanced: 1. It continued the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5). 2. It contained the book of the law. 3. It vanished during the Babylonian captivity. It was certainly a well-known bit of Hebrew literature.

JASHOBEAM (jà-shō'bē-ăm, Heb. yāshōv'ām, the people return). 1. One of the heroic men who went to Ziklag to aid David in his struggle with Saul (I Chron. 12:6). A Korahite.

2. One of David's chieftains who was a ruler of captains. He slew 300 during one battle (I Chron. 11:11, or 800, II Sam. 23:8). The LXX usually gives the name as Ishbaal. He is called Adino in II Samuel 23:8, Jashebassebet in margin. The difference in the report of the number slain has been explained by supposing that some scribe confused the words for three and eight when he copied the Samuel record. Jashobeam is supposed to have been one of the three who brought David water from the well of Bethlehem (I Chron. 11:15-19).

3. One who commanded a division of 24,000 men of Israel (I Chron. 27:2,3). This man could have been No. 2, in which case Hachmonite was an official title.

JASHUB (jā'shŭb, Heb. yāshûv, he returns). 1. A son or clan descended from Issachar (Num. 26:24). Genesis 46:13 has Job in the KJV. The LXX has Jashub in both passages.

2. Shear-Jashub, a son of Isaiah, who went to meet Ahaz (Isa. 7:3).

3. One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

JASHUBI-LEHEM (jà-shōō'bī-lē'hĕm, Heb. yāshuvî-lehem), a word of doubtful meaning. Probably a man, a member of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:22,23).

JASON (jā'sŭn, Gr. Iáson, to heal), a believer who sheltered Paul and Silas in Thessalonica (Acts 17:5-9). He was among those who sent greetings from Corinth to Rome (Rom. 16:21).

JATHNIEL (jăth'nĭ-ĕl), a son of Meshelemiah, a Korahite Levite and a temple porter (I Chron. 26:2); also a gate (threshold) guard (9:19).

JATTIR (jăt'êr), a large town in the hills of Judah (Josh. 15:20,48), given to the Levites (I Chron. 6:57). It was an important center (I Sam. 30:27). Modern Khirbet Attir is evidently its location.

JAVAN (jā'văn, Heb. yāwān, Ionian), a region settled by one of the sons of Japheth (Gen. 10:2). Javan was the name of this country to Ezekiel (27:11f), who saw it as an important trade center. So Javan (Greek, Ionia) came to be the name of Greece to the Hebrews. During the period 700-630 B.C. the Ionians carried on extensive trade in the Near East, hence all people of Greece were called Javan. When the Phoenicians developed their commerce, they often sold captives from Judah to the Greeks (Joel 3:4-6). These later became the agents of God's vengeance against Greece (Zech. 9:13). Note the contrast of "children of Greece" with "children of Sion." Critics have sought to show that Hebrews of pre-Exilic days were not familiar with the Ionians, but discoveries are proving that by Solomon's day the Hebrews had much trade with them.

JAVELIN (See Arms, Armor)

JAZER, JAAZER (jā'zêr), a city in Gilead E of the Jordan, having dependent villages (Num. 21:31, 32). Built by Gadites (Num. 32:34,35), it later became a Levitical city (Josh. 21:34-39). David found mighty men among her citizens (I Chron. 26:31).

JAZIZ (jā'zĭz), an overseer of the flocks of David (I Chron. 27:31).

JEALOUSY, WATER OF, the name given holy water which was used in determining the guilt or innocence of a wife accused by her husband of being untrue (Num. 5:11-25). The accuser brought his wife and made an offering; dust from the floor was put in the water which the woman drank after assenting to a curse on her body if guilty.

JEARIM (jē'ā-rĭm), a hill on the northern border of Judah's heritage, with Chesalon, a village, on it (Josh. 15:10).

JEATERAI (jē-ăt'ē-rī), a Gershonite Levite, grandson of Iddo (I Chron. 6:21). RV has Jeatherai.

JEBERECHIAH (jē-bĕr'ē-kī'à), the father of Zechariah, a trusted scribe (Isa. 8:2).

JEBUS (jē'bŭs, Heb. yevûs), the name by which Jerusalem was known when it was in the possession of the Jebusites (Josh. 15:63; Judg. 19:10; I Chron. 11:4). Jebus was small in area compared with the size of Jerusalem in Solomon's time. David took the city from the Jebusites and made it the capital of Israel (II Sam. 5:1-9). Its citadel was the stronghold of Zion (I Chron. 11:5).

JEBUSITES (jĕb'ū-zīts, Heb. yebûsi), a Canaanite tribe, descended from Canaan according to the table of nations in Genesis 10, and dwelling in the land before the Israelite conquest (Gen. 10:15,16; 15:21; Exod. 3:8,17; 13:5; 23:23; 33:2; Deut. 7:1; 20:17; Josh. 3:10; 10:1-5; 12:8; 18:16; Judg. 1:8). Their king, Adonizedek, was one of the five who conspired against Gibeon and was slain by Joshua. The Jebusites long lived at the site of Jerusalem (which was called Jebus), and were not dislodged until David sent Joab and his men into the city (Josh. 15:8; Judg. 19:11). David then bought the threshing floor of Ornan (or Araunah) the Jebusite as a site for the temple, and this large flat rock where the altar of burnt offering stood is now supposed to be visible in the Dome of the Rock (Mount Moriah) at Jerusalem, q.v.

JECAMIAH, JEKAMIAH (jĕk'à-mī'à). 1. A descendant of Sheshan by a freed slave (I Chron. 2: 34-41).

2. The fifth of seven sons of a king named Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:17,18).

JECOLIAH, JECHOLIAH (jĕk-ō-lī'à), mother of King Uzziah (II Chron. 26:3; II Kings 15:2).

JECONIAH (jĕk'ō-nī'à, Gr. Iechonías), a variant of Jehoiachin. He was the son of Jehoiakim and grandson of Josiah (I Chron. 3:15,17). He began to reign when 18 years of age, but after three months was captured by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 24:1-12). Contracted to Coniah (Jer. 22: 24,28; 37:1).

JEDAIAH (jĕ-dā'yà, Heb. yedha'yâh, Jehovah knows), a common name among the descendants of Aaron and Levi. To distinguish among those bearing it is difficult. 1. A descendant of Simeon and the father of a prince (I Chron. 4:37,38).

2. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel and aided in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10; 12:6,19).

3. One of the priests whose names were entered in the book of the kings which held the genealogy of the Hebrew captives in Babylon (I Chron. 9: 1-10). He received the second lot when the order of temple service was set up (I Chron. 24:7). By the time of the return from Babylon his family had grown to be very large (Ezra 2:1,36; Neh. 7:39).

4. Another priest among the captives, who was commissioned by Nehemiah to have part in the prophetic coronation of Joshua who was the son of Josedech, the high priest (Zech. 6:9-15).

JEDIAEL (jĕ-dī'ā-ĕl, Heb. yedhī'ā'ēl, known of God). 1. A son of Benjamin who became head of a mighty clan (I Chron. 7:6,11). Since the name does not appear among the three sons named in I Chronicles 8:1, it is assumed by some scholars that he and Ashbel are the same. Whether he is the same Jediael who joined David's forces at Ziklag and helped swell the host that supported him against Saul (I Chron. 19-22) is uncertain.

2. Another valiant man in David's band (I Chron. 11:45), probably the same as No. 1.

3. Another Jediael was a temple doorkeeper, a descendant of Kore (I Chron. 26:1,2).

JEDIDAH (jĕ-dī'dà, beloved), mother of King Josiah (II Kings 22:1).

JEDIDIAH (jĕd'ĭ-dī'à, beloved of Jehovah). Either David or Bathsheba named their baby boy "Solomon," but because of Jehovah's love for the child, the prophet Nathan gave him this name (II Sam. 12:24,25).

JEDUTHUN (jĕ-dū'thŭn, Heb. yedhūthûn, praise), a Levite whom, with Heman and others, David set over the service of praise in the tabernacle (I Chron. 25:1-3). They with their children were to give thanks and sing, with harps and cymbals accompanying. This Jeduthun must have been aged in David's time for his sons and their sons are mentioned as serving. In I Chronicles 25:3 he is credited with six sons, of whom five are named and the sixth was probably Shimei of verse 17. Psalm 39 by David is dedicated to Jeduthun and Psalms 62 and 77 are "after the manner of Jeduthun."

JEEZER (jē-ē'zêr), head of a family in the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:30). The name is written Abiezer "father of help" in Joshua 17:2. He was an ancestor of Gideon (Judg. 6:11 ff). ASV has Iezer.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA (jē'gàr-sā'hà-dū'thà, heap of witness), the name given by Laban to the "cairn of witness," called by Jacob Galeed (Gen. 31:47).

JEHALELEEL, JEHALELEL (jē-hăl'ē-lĕl), more correctly Jehallelel, as in ASV. 1. A descendant of Judah (I Chron. 4:16).

2. A Merarite Levite, father of one of the leaders in cleansing the temple in the days of Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:12).

JEHDEIAH (jē-dē'yà, Jehovah will be glad). 1. A direct descendant of Moses through Gershom in the days of David (I Chron. 24:20). His father is called Shubael in this passage but Shebuel in chapter 23:16 where he is called "the chief," i.e. of his family.

2. A man of the tribe of Zebulun whom David appointed to have charge of the asses which belonged to the king (I Chron. 27:30).

JEHEZEKEL (jē-hĕz'ē-kĕl, God will strengthen), a priest in David's time (I Chron. 24:16). Jehezkel in RV.

JEHIAH (jē-hī'à, Jehovah lives), one of the two doorkeepers for the ark in David's time (I Chron. 15:24).

JEHIEL (jē-hī'ĕl, God lives). 1. One of the players on psalteries set to high voices in David's time (I Chron. 15:18,20; 16:5).

2. A Gershonite Levite treasurer for Jehovah's house (I Chron. 23:8; 29:8).

3. A son of Hachmoni "the wise" who was with David's sons, probably as tutor (I Chron. 27:32).

4. A son of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 21:2).

5. A descendant of Heman the singer in Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 29:14). ASV, RSV, Jehuel.

6. One of the overseers of the offerings brought to the temple under Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

7. One of the rulers of the house of God in Josiah's time (II Chron. 35:8).

8. Father of Obadiah who came from captivity with 218 men in Ezra's day (Ezra 8:9).

9. Father of Shecaniah who in Ezra's time was the first to confess to having married a foreign wife and who proposed a covenant with God to put away these foreign wives and their children (Ezra 10:2).

10. One of the priests who confessed to having married a "strange" wife (Ezra 10:21).

JEHIELI (jē-hī'ĕ-lī), a Gershonite Levite in David's day (I Chron. 26:21,22); cf. Jehiel (I Chron. 23:8).

JEHIZKIAH (jē'hĭz-kī'à, Jehovah strengthens), a son of Shallum, an Israelite in the days of Ahaz, king of Judah, who stood against the men of the north enslaving their brethren of Judah (II Chron. 28:12).

JEHOADAH (jē-hō'à-dà), a descendant of King Saul through Jonathan (I Chron. 8:36). In ASV more correctly "Jehoaddah." In I Chronicles 9:42 he is called "Jarah," perhaps by error of a scribe.

JEHOADDAN (jē'hō-ăd'ăn), wife of King Joash of Judah and mother of Amaziah (II Chron. 25:1). In II Kings 14:2 ASV has Jehoaddin from a variant spelling.

JEHOAHAZ (jē-hō'à-hăz, Heb. yehô'āhāz, Jehovah has grasped). 1. The son and successor of Jehu, and 11th king of Israel. He is said to have reigned 17 years, c. 815-800 B.C. (II Kings 10:35; 13:1). Like his father, he maintained the calf-worship begun by Jeroboam; and as a result of his apostasy God permitted the Syrians to inflict heavy defeats upon his armed forces, until he had almost none left. His kingdom became involved in such awful straits that he in desperation called upon Jehovah for help. God answered his prayers after his death in the persons of his two successors, Jehoash and Jeroboam II, through whom Israel's ancient boundaries were restored. The life of Elisha extended through his reign. When he died he was succeeded by his son Jehoash (II Kings 13:2-9, 22-25).

2. King of Judah 608 B.C. He was the third son of Josiah, and upon his father's death he succeeded to the throne; but he reigned only three months, and was then deposed and taken in chains into Egypt by Pharaoh Necho, who had defeated Josiah in battle. The throne was given to Jehoahaz's elder brother (II Kings 23:30-45). He is also called Shallum (I Chron. 3:15; Jer. 22:10-12). He died in Egypt.

3. A variant form of the name of Ahaziah, king of Judah (II Chron. 21:17; cf. ch. 22:1).

4. The full name of Ahaz, king of Judah, according to an inscription of Tiglath-pileser III.

S.B.

JEHOASH, JOASH (jē-hō'ăsh, Heb. yehô'āsh; jō'ăsh, Heb. yô'āsh), a word of uncertain meaning, perhaps Jehovah supports or whom Jehovah gave. 1. A son of Becher and grandson of Benjamin, probably born soon after the descent into Egypt (I Chron. 7:8).

2. An early descendant of Judah through Shelah, who with his brother Saraph had dominion in Moab (I Chron. 4:22).

3. A descendant of Abiezer son of Manasseh (Josh. 17:2). Evidently his family had fallen upon hard times, for Gideon, his son, said "My family is the poorest in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house" (Judg. 6:15), but in spite of that Gideon could call upon ten of his servants for help (6:27). This Joash, though "Jehovah" was a part of his name, had succumbed to the polytheism around him and had built an altar to Baal; but when the men of his city demanded the death of Gideon for destroying the altar, Joash, truer to his family than to his god, stood by his son and said "Jerubbaal" i.e. "Let Baal plead!" This exclamation became a nickname for Gideon, whom many called "Jerubbaal" from that day forth. Gideon was later buried in Joash's sepulchre (Judg. 8:32).

4. The keeper of David's cellars of oil (I Chron. 27:28).

5. One of the brethren of King Saul who fell away to David while he was in voluntary exile at Ziklag and became one of the commanders of his forces (I Chron. 12:3).

6. A son of King Ahab who was ordered to imprison Micaiah the prophet and to feed him "with bread of affliction and with water of affliction" till Ahab would return to deal with him — but Ahab never returned and Joash presumably freed Micaiah (I Kings 22:26, copied in II Chron. 18:25,26).

7. King of Judah from 884-848 B.C. (II Kings 11-13; II Chron. 24,25). As an infant he was rescued from Athalia's massacre of the seed royal after the death of Ahaziah, in the revolt of Jehu (II Chron. 22:8,9). Jehosheba (II Kings 11:2) or Jehoshebeath (II Chron. 22:11,12), sister of king Ahaziah and wife of the priest Jehoiada, hid the baby Joash in the house of God for six years, after which Jehoiada showed him to the people and made a covenant with them. Joash became king, living a godly and useful life all the time that his uncle instructed him. See II Chronicles 24 and II Kings 12 for the details of his reign. He was succeeded by his son Amaziah.

8. The king of Israel from 848-832 B.C. (II Kings 13:10-13; 14:8-16; II Chron. 25:17-24). He was son of Jehoahaz, son of Jehu, and was father of Jeroboam II. These four comprised the dynasty of Jehu (II Kings 10:30,31). Joash, like the other kings of the north, was an idolater. See AHAZIAH, ATHALIAH, JEHU.

JEHOHANAN (jē'hō-hā'năn, Heb. yehôhānān, Jehovah is gracious). 1. One of six brothers, doorkeepers of the tabernacle in David's time (I Chron. 26:3).

2. A military leader in Jehoshaphat's time (II Chron. 17:15).

3. Father of Ishmael who assisted Jehoiada (II Chron. 23:1).

4. One who had married a foreigner in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:28).

5. A priest and head of a "fathers' house" in the days of Joiakim the high priest (Neh. 12:13).

6. A priestly singer at the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem, rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42). "Jehohanan" or "Johanan" is the origin of the name "John."

JEHOIACHIN (jē-hoi'à-kĭn, Heb. yehôyākhîn, Jehovah establishes), next to the last king of Judah, reigning at Jerusalem three months and ten days (II Chron. 36:9) in the year 597 B.C. Jeremiah thrice calls him "Coniah" (22:24,28; 37:1); he is also called "Jeconiah" seven times; and in Matthew 1:11,12 the name is Hellenized to "Jechonias" in KJV.

Jehoiachin was born to Jehoiakim, and his wife Nehushta, during the reign of the godly Josiah, his grandfather. According to II Kings 24:8, he was 18 when he came to the throne, but II Chronicles 36:9 gives his age as eight. Probably an early scribe made a mistake of ten years in copying one of these two books. The evidence favors the record in II Kings, for Chapter 24:15 speaks of his wives, and he would hardly have been married at eight years of age. Jehoiakim displayed his contempt for the Word of God by cutting up and burning the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:23,32) thereby adding to the curses which the Lord pronounced upon Jerusalem.

In Ezekiel 19:5-9, Jehoiachin is characterized as "a young lion, and he learned to catch the prey and devoured men." The prophet announced that the "young lion" would be taken to Babylon, which was literally fulfilled later. Although Jeremiah was prophesying with mighty power all through the youth of Jehoiachin, the influences of the palace were stronger than those of the prophet. Jehoiakim had been rapacious, violent and oppressive. He was "buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer. 22:13-19). In these sad conditions and under the threatening shadow of Nebuchadnezzar, Jehoiachin became king and in his three months of power, "he did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah according to all that his father had done" (II Kings 24:9). "At the return of the year King Nebuchadnezzar sent, and brought him to Babylon" (II Chron. 36:10) where he remained a captive the rest of his life, though apparently in not too hard conditions. Nebuchadnezzar died 561 B.C. and his son Evil-merodach, who succeeded almost immediately, took Jehoiachin from prison and "spake kindly to him and exalted his throne above the throne of the (vassal) kings that were with him in Babylon and changed his prison garments." After these thirty-seven years of captivity (II Kings 25:27) Jehoiachin was given a daily allowance of food the rest of his life. A.B.F.

JEHOIADA (jē-hoi'à-dà, Heb. yehôyādhā', Jehovah knows). 1. Father of Benaiah, one of David's most faithful officers. He is mentioned 20 times, but only as the father of his more notable son, who was over the mercenary troops of David. He came from Kabzeel in Judah (II Sam. 20:23; 23:20; I Kings 1:38; etc.).

2. Grandson of the preceding (I Chron. 27:34). This Jehoiada was second counselor of David, immediately after Ahithophel, who later became a traitor.

3. A powerful descendant of Aaron who with 3,700 men came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:27).

4. Son of Azariah (I Chron. 6:11) and brother of Amariah whom he succeeded as high priest. Jehoiada was a high-priest, a statesman, a man of God, by marriage a member of the royal family of Judah and, humanly speaking, the preserver of the Messianic line. He lived 130 years (II Chron. 24:15). He married Jehosheba (II Kings 11:2), otherwise called Jehoshebeath (II Chron. 22:11), and she bore him that Zechariah (II Chron. 24:20-22; Luke 11:51) who denounced the wickedness of the people that they stoned him at the commandment of Joash. When Joash was seven years old, Jehoiada prepared his coup d'état. He first revealed his plan to five of the captains of hundreds (II Chron. 23:1; II Kings 11:4) and showed them little Joash; then they went through Judah and gathered the Levites and the heads of loyal houses to Jerusalem, where Jehoiada again exhibited little Joash and started the new reign by anointing him. Athaliah appeared and they slew her, then Jehoiada made a covenant with the people to serve the Lord. During the early years of Joash's reign, he was under the instruction and guidance of the godly Jehoiada, the temple was repaired and Judah began again to prosper. Jehoiada was buried among the kings. A.B.F.

JEHOIAKIM (jē-hoi'à-kĭm, Heb. yehôyāqîm, Jehovah sets up), second son of the godly Josiah, king of Judah. He was originally named "Eliakim" (whom God sets up). In 607 B.C. Pharaoh Necho of Egypt marched northward, intending to fight the king of Assyria at the river Euphrates. Josiah imprudently intercepted him and was mortally wounded at Megiddo near Mount Carmel. The people of Judah passed by Eliakim and made his youngest brother Shallum or Jehoahaz king after Josiah (I Chron. 3:15; II Chron. 36:1). Jehoahaz reigned for three months in Jerusalem, when Necho in displeasure bound Jehoahaz at Riblah in the north of Syria, then sent him to Egypt where he died. The king of Egypt next took Eliakim, elder half-brother of Jehoahaz, changed his name to Jehoiakim, put the land under heavy tribute and made Jehoiakim king over Jerusalem where he reigned from 607-597 B.C. Jehoiakim was an oppressive and thoroughly godless king (II Kings 23:36-24:7, II Chron. 36:4-8 and compare Jeremiah, chaps. 22-36). The prophecies of Jeremiah 22:1-23 were uttered (if all at one time) soon after the death of Josiah and the taking away of Jehoahaz (vss. 10-12) and describe the wrong-doing and oppression by Jehoiakim (vss. 13-23).

The prophet wrote at the direction of the Lord the dooms of Judah and the other nations. When the princes heard these words they let Jeremiah and his clerk Baruch hide themselves, then when the king heard the words of the book, he cut out the leaves which displeased him and burned them, with the result that the book of Jeremiah was rewritten and enlarged. Jehoiakim died in disgrace "buried with the burial of an ass" (Jer. 22:19).

JEHOIARIB, JOIARIB (jē-hoi'à-rīb, joi'à-rīb, Heb. yehôyārîv, Jehovah will contend). 1. A priest in the days of David who drew first place in the divine service (I Chron. 24:7).

2. One of the first priests to return from exile with Zerubbabel (I Chron. 9:10).

3. A man Ezra sent back to Babylon to bring them Levites to assist the priests, which they did (Ezra 8:16,17).

4. The son of Zechariah, son of a man of Shiloh but of the tribe of Judah. (Neh. 11:5).

5. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 11:10; 12:6).

JEHONADAB (jē-hŏn'à-dăb, Heb. yehônādhāv, Jehovah is liberal), also appears as Jonadab (jŏn'-à-dăb). 1. Son of David's brother Shimeah (II Sam. 13:3).

2. Son of Rechab, of the Kenite clan (I Chron. 2:55). He assisted Jehu in abolishing Baal-worship in Samaria (II Kings 10). In Jeremiah 35 he is called the "father" of the Rechabites, who derived from him their primitive simplicity of manners.

JEHONATHAN (jē-hŏn'à-thăn, Heb. yehônāthān, Jehovah gave), variant form of Jonathan. 1. One of the administrators of the property of David (I Chron. 27:25).

2. One of the teaching Levites appointed by the godly Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:8).

3. A priest in the days of Joiakim, high priest (Neh. 12:18).

JEHORAM (jē-hō'răm, Heb. yehôrām, Jehovah is exalted), often contracted to Joram. 1. Son of Jehoshaphat of Judah, Jehoram was associated with his father in the kingship for the last four or five years of Jehoshaphat's reign. He took complete charge at his father's death in 849 B.C. Jehoshaphat had seven sons, and in order that there might not be rivalry for the throne, he gave the younger ones great gifts of silver and gold and precious things, with fortified cities in the kingdom of Judah (II Chron. 21:2,3) but when Jehoram became the sole ruler, he slew his own brothers with the sword. Just as we can charge a good deal of the abominable behavior of Ahab to his strong-minded but diabolical consort Jezebel, so we can guess that Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, was back of most of Jehoram's wickedness. Jehoshaphat had been a godly man, but he had made one terrible error, that of joining affinity with Ahab (I Kings 22; II Chron. 18) and through this league, Jehoram had married the wicked Athaliah. As soon as his father died (900 B.C.) Jehoram began to slip into the idolatrous ways of the northern kingdom; but because of God's covenant with David (II Kings 8:19) and no doubt because of Jehoshaphat's goodness, God did not remove the kingdom from Jehoram's hand, but God did cause him to have real troubles. Edom revolted from under the rule of Judah. Libnah in Judah, a Levitical city far enough from Jerusalem to be somewhat independent, showed its abhorrence of Jehoram's deeds by revolting at the same time (II Kings 8:22). Meanwhile, the great prophet Elijah sent to Jehoram a letter of denunciation for his wickedness. God sent a plague upon Judah, especially upon the family of Jehoram. He suffered and died unlamented from a horrible disease. The Arabians or their associated forces slew all of Jehoram's sons (II Chron. 21:17) except Ahaziah, the youngest, who succeeded his father at his death.

2. Second son of Ahab and Jezebel, he succeeded his brother Ahaziah, who died childless, as king of Israel. He reigned for 12 years (853-840 B.C.).

Mesha, king of Moab, who had been rendering tribute to Israel (II Kings 3:4) rebelled after the death of Ahab, and Jehoram made war against him. Jehoram invited Jehoshaphat of Judah to assist him in the war (II Kings 3:7) and Jehoshaphat accepted the invitation. Jehoram was not as evil as his father Ahab had been, but like all the other kings of the north he clung to the idolatry which Jeroboam had set up in order to keep the northern people from going up to Jerusalem to worship at Solomon's Temple.. While Israel and Judah, with the help of Edom, were going against Mesha, water failed and they were in despair, but Elisha in deference to Jehoshaphat (II Kings 3:14-16) told the kings to dig ditches, which they did; water came, and the Moabites, at sunrise, seeing the reflection of the rising sun in the water, took it for blood, and hastened to the prey, only to be badly defeated. Jehoram came to his end, with all his family, at the hand of Jehu (II Kings 9) and Jehu succeeded to the throne.

3. A priest in the days of Jehoshaphat whom the king sent with a group of learned Levites to go through Judah and to teach the people the law of the Lord (II Chron. 17:8). A.B.F.

JEHOSHABEATH (jē'hō-shăb'ē-ăth, Heb. yehôshav'ath, the oath of Jehovah), the name of Jehosheba (q.v.) as it is found in II Chronicles 22:11.

JEHOSHAPHAT (jē-hŏsh'ă-făt, Heb. yehôshāphat, Jehovah is judge), in KJV of NT Josaphat. 1. One of the seven priests who blew trumpets before the ark of the Lord in David's time (I Chron. 15:24, the Hebrew text and ASV here have Joshaphat).

2. Son of Ahilud, and recorder or chronicler in the time of David (II Sam. 8:16, etc.).

3. Son of Paruah, appointed by Solomon as officer of the commissariat over the tribe of Issachar (I Kings 4:17) He had to provide the household of the king with food one month of every year.

4. Son and successor of King Asa on the throne of Judah. He reigned for 25 years, including five years of rule with his father. He began to reign about 871 B.C. His mother was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi. For the account of his reign, see I Kings 22; II Chronicles 17-20. Jehoshaphat was the second of the five kings of Judah who were outstanding for godliness, the later ones being Joash, Hezekiah and Josiah. He took away the high places and Asherim from Judah (II Chron. 17:6), though he apparently was not able to keep the people from using certain high places in worshiping the Lord (I Kings 22:43). Apparently one of the first men to sense the importance of religious education for the people, he sent out in the third year of his reign princes and priests and Levites to teach the people the law of the Lord. They went throughout the cities of Judah in this work (Chron. 17:7-9). Because of Jehoshaphat's godliness, "the fear of Jehovah" fell upon the surrounding nations and even the Philistines and the Arabians brought him tribute. With all this godliness, he seems, however, to have been lacking in spiritual discernment, for he made the great and almost fatal mistake of making affinity with the wicked King Ahab of the northern kingdom; so much so that his son Jehoram married Athaliah, who was almost as wicked as her mother Jezebel.

Ahab made a great show of hospitality to Jehoshaphat during a visit to Samaria and then asked him if he would be his ally in a campaign to recover Ramoth-Gilead. Jehoshaphat suggested that they first determine the will of God. Ahab agreed and asked his prophets for their advice, and they all prophesied good success for the venture. Jehoshaphat was not satisfied, and asked if there were not a real prophet of Jehovah present, and they sent for Micaiah, a man of God, whom Ahab hated. He told them the truth, that God had put a spirit of delusion in the minds of all the prophets, so that Ahab might be doomed. Ahab partly believed this, and arranged a trick, pretending to give Jehoshaphat the glory, but Ahab was slain. Jehoshaphat died at the age of 60, about the year 850 B.C. His son Jehoram succeeded to the throne.

5. The son of Nimshi, and father of Jehu who destroyed the house of Ahab (II Kings 9:2,14).

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (jē-hŏsh'ā-făt, Heb. yehôshāphāt, Jehovah judgeth), a name used in Joel 3:2,12 as the scene where all nations shall be gathered by Jehovah for judgment. Since the fourth century the Kidron valley (q.v.) has been named the Valley of Jehoshaphat, but there is no real reason for believing that this is the spot referred to by Joel. He may have spoken of an ideal spot only. There is no evidence that any valley ever actually bore this name.

JEHOSHEBA (jē-hŏsh'ē-bà, Heb. yehôsheva', Jehovah is an oath), sister of King Ahaziah (II Kings 11:2) and daughter of King Jehoram and his wicked consort Athaliah, daughter of Jezebel. She married the high priest Jehoiada. When Athaliah usurped the throne and slew the seed royal, Jehosheba (called Jehoshebeath in II Chronicles 22:11), rescued the baby Joash, hid him with his nurse in a bedchamber in the temple, and preserved the Messianic line.

JEHOSHUA, JEHOSHUAH (jē-hosh'ū-à, Jehovah saves), a variant spelling for Joshua (Num. 13:16; I Chron. 7:27 KJV).

JEHOVAH (jē-hō'và), the English rendering of the Hebrew tetragram YHWH, one of the names of God (Exod. 17:15). Its original pronunciation is unknown. The Jews took seriously the third commandment "Thou shalt not take the name of Jehovah thy God in vain; for Jehovah will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain" (Exod. 20:7) and so, to keep from speaking the holy name carelessly, around 300 B.C. they decided not to pronounce it at all; but whenever in reading they came to it they spoke the word adhonai which means "Lord." This usage was carried into the LXX where the sacred name is rendered "Kurios," i.e. LORD. Consequently in the KJV, LORD occurs instead of Jehovah, whereas ASV renders the name "Jehovah." When the vowel points were added to the Hebrew consonantal text, the Massoretes (Jewish scribes) inserted into the Hebrew consonantal text the vowels for adhonai. The sacred name is derived from the verb "to be," and so implies that God is eternal ("Before Abraham was, I AM") and that he is the Absolute, i.e. the Uncaused One. The name "Jehovah" belongs especially to Him when He is dealing with His own, while "God" is used more when dealing with the Gentiles. See for instance II Chronicles 18:31 where "Jehoshaphat cried out and Jehovah helped him; and God moved them to depart from him."

There are ten combinations of the word "Jehovah" in the OT. Besides the five with which succeeding articles deal, are Jehovah-ropheka, "Jehovah that healeth thee" (Exod. 15:26); Jehovah-meqaddeshkem, "Jehovah who sanctifieth you" (Exod. 31:13); Jehovah-tsabaoth, "Jehovah of hosts" (I Sam. 1:3); Jehovah-elyon, "Jehovah Most High" (Ps. 7:17); and Jehovah-roi, "Jehovah, my Shepherd" (Ps. 23:1). See JEHOVAH JIREH, - NISSI, - SHALOM, - SHAMMAH, - TSIDKENU.

A.B.F.

JEHOVAH-JIREH (jē-hō'và-jī'rĕ, Jehovah will provide), the name given by Abraham to the place where God provided a ram instead of his son Isaac (Gen. 22:14).

JEHOVAH-NISSI (jē-hō'và-nĭs'ī, Jehovah is my banner), the name which Moses gave to an altar he built as a memorial of Israel's victory over the Amalekites at Rephidim (Exod. 17:15).

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (jē-hō'và-shā'lōm, Jehovah is peace), the name Gideon gave to an altar he built at Ophra to commemorate the word spoken to him by the Lord, "Peace be unto thee" (Judg. 6:24).

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH (jē-hō'và-shă'mà, Jehovah is there), the name of the heavenly Jerusalem as seen in the vision of Ezekiel (48:35 m).

JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (jē-hō'và-tsĭd-kē'nū, Jehovah is our righteousness), the symbolic name given to the king who is to rule over restored Israel (Jer. 23:6), and to the state or capital (Jer. 33:16).

JEHOZABAD (jē-hŏz'à-băd, Heb. yehôzāvādh, Jehovah has bestowed). 1. A son of Shimrith, a Moabitess, who conspired against King Joash (II Chron. 24:26).

2. One of the eight sons of Obed-edom, a doorkeeper of the tabernacle in the days of David (I Chron. 26:4). Not to be confused with the Obed-edom of II Samuel 6:10-12.

3. A Benjamite in the days of King Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:18). He was commander of 180,000 soldiers prepared for war.

JEHOZADAK (jē-hŏz'à-dăk, Heb. yehôtsādhāq, Jehovah is righteous), the high priest of Israel through most of the Babylonian captivity (I Chron. 6:14,15). His father, Seraiah, was slain by the Babylonians (II Kings 25:18-21), and Jehozadak was taken into captivity. In Haggai and Zechariah, where he is six times referred to as father of Joshua, the high priest at the first return, KJV spells his name "Josedech," and in Ezra and Nehemiah, KJV and ASV referring to him in the same way five times, call him "Jozadak," a shortened form of Jehozadak.

JEHU (jē'hū, Heb. yēhû', probably Jehovah is he). 1. Son of Obed and father of Azariah, mentioned only in the genealogy of Elishama (I Chron. 2:38).

2. A Simeonite mentioned only in I Chronicles 4:35.

3. A Benjamite of Anathoth who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

4. Son of Hanani and a prophet of Israel, who pronounced the curse of the Lord upon Baasha in almost the same words that had been used against Jeroboam (cf. I Kings 14:11; 16:4). Several years later he went out to denounce Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 19:1-3) for helping Ahab. Jehu wrote an account of the reign of Jehoshaphat which was inserted in the lost "book of the kings of Israel" (II Chron. 20:34).

5. Tenth king of Israel, and founder of its fourth dynasty. Son of Jehoshaphat, but more often called "son of Nimshi," perhaps because Nimshi, his grandfather, was better known than Jehoshaphat. Jehu appears first as a soldier in the service of Ahab (II Kings 9:25). Ahab and Jezebel were rejected for their crimes. God commanded Elijah to anoint Jehu king over Israel, a command which was fulfilled by Elisha, who sent a young prophet to Ramoth-Gilead, where Jehu was with his army, to carry out the command. Jehu was commissioned to smite the house of Ahab. When Jehu told his fellow officers that he had been so anointed, they proclaimed him king. Jehu sealed the city, that the news should not precede him, then he crossed the Jordan and drove impetuously as was his custom (II Kings 9:20) to Jezreel whither King Joram of Israel had gone after being wounded in battle with Hazael of Syria. Jehu denounced Joram and slew him, and had his body thrown into the field of Naboth (II Kings 9:24-26); then he caused Ahaziah, king of Judah, to be killed, and his servants carried him up to Jerusalem for burial. He also slew Jezebel, and would have had her buried, but the dogs had eaten her. Jehu reigned in Samaria 28 years (c. 842-814 B.C.). He executed God's judgments upon the house of Ahab and tho oughly extirpated the worship of Baal, killing all worshipers whom he could collect, but he did not depart from the sins of Jeroboam. Because of his zeal for the Lord in the matter of Ahab's house, God allowed him to set up a dynasty which lasted just over 100 years (Jehu, Jehoahaz, Joram and Jeroboam II). A.B.F.

JEHUBBAH (jē-hŭb'à), an Asherite (I Chron. 7: 34).

JEHUCAL (jē-hū'kăl, probably Jehovah is able), one whom King Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah, asking for prayers (Jer. 37:3). In Jeremiah 38:1, Jucal.

JEHUD (jē'hŭd), a town in the tribe of Dan, about seven miles nearly E of Joppa and near the modern Tel-Aviv (Josh. 19:45).

JEHUDI (jē-hū'dī, Heb. yehûdhî, a Jew), one who sat with the princes in Jehoiakim's court and who secured from Baruch the prophecies of Jeremiah and read them to the king (Jer. 36:14,21).

JEHUDIJAH (jē'hū-dī'jà, Heb. yehudhîyâh, Jewess), in I Chronicles 4:18 this word is written as a proper name, but in the Hebrew it has the definite article, and ASV properly translates it "the Jewess" to distinguish her from Bithiah, the Egyptian princess, who was the other wife of Mered.

JEHUSH (jē'hŭsh), a Benjamite of Saul's family (I Chron. 8:39). See JEUSH.

JEIEL (jē-ī'ĕl, Heb. ye'î'ēl, probably God has gathered). 1. A Reubenite (I Chron. 5:7).

2. A Benjamite of Gibeon (I Chron. 9:35).

3. Son of Hotham of Aroer and one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:44).

4. A harpist in the days of King David who also acted as gate-keeper of the tabernacle (I Chron. 15:18,21).

5. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (II Chron. 20: 14).

6. A scribe who acted as recorder of the military forces under Uzziah (II Chron. 26:11).

7. A chief of the Levites in the days of Josiah (II Chron. 35:9).

8. A husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:43).

JEKABZEEL (jē-kăb'zē-ĕl, Heb. yeqavtse'ēl, God gathers), one of the places re-inhabited by the men of Judah (Neh. 11:25).

JEKAMEAM (jĕk'ă-mē-ăm, Heb. yeqam'ām, the kinsman will raise up), the head of a Levitical house (I Chron. 23:19; 24:23).

JEKAMIAH (jĕk'à-mī'à, Heb. yekamyâh, may Jehovah establish). 1. A man from Judah, son of Shallum (I Chron. 2:41).

2. A son of King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin); in AV Jecamiah (I Chron. 3:18).

JEKUTHIEL (jē-kū'thĭ-ĕl, Heb. yeqûthî'ēl, God will nourish), a man of Judah, father of the inhabitants of Zanoah (I Chron. 4:18).

JEMIMA (jē-mī'mà, Heb. yemîmâh, a dove), the first of the three daughters born to Job after his restoration from affliction.

JEMUEL (jē-mū'ĕl, Heb. yemû'ēl, meaning unknown), a son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6: 15). Called "Nemuel" in Numbers 26:12 and I Chronicles 4:24.

JEPHTHAH (jĕf'thà, Heb. yiphtâh, opened or opener), eighth judge of the Israelites, whose history is given in Judges 10:6-12:7. He was the son of Gilead, a Gileadite, and of a woman who was a harlot. Because of his illegitimacy, his brothers born in wedlock drove him from the paternal home and refused him any share in the inheritance. Their action was confirmed by the elders of Gilead. He fled to the land of Tob, probably a region in Syria or the Hauran. There he made a name for himself by his prowess and gathered about him a band of men without employment, like David's men (I Sam. 22:2). He must not be thought of as just a captain of a band of freebooters, for he was a God-fearing man, with a high sense of justice and of the sacredness of vows made to Jehovah. At the time of his expulsion by his brothers, Israel had been for many years under bondage to the Ammonites. In the course of time, when these oppressors of Israel were planning some new form of humiliation, the elders of Gilead offered to anyone who was willing to accept the office of captain the headship over all the inhabitants of Gilead. In their extremity, as no one volunteered, they went to Jephthah and pressed the office upon him. He accepted, and solemn vows were made before the Lord that all promises would be kept. On assuming the headship of Gilead, his first effort was to secure the cooperation of the tribe of Ephraim, one of the most influential of the tribes during the period of the judges, but he was refused their help. He then sent messengers to the king of the Ammonites, asking for the grounds of his hostile action and requesting that he desist; but the king refused to listen to reason. Endued with the Spirit of the Lord, Jephthah prepared for war, but before going out to battle he made a vow that if he were victorious he would offer to God as a burnt-offering whatever first came to him out of his house. He defeated his enemies with a very great slaughter and recovered 20 cities from them. The Ephraimites then came to him with the complaint that he had slighted them in the preparation for the Ammonite campaign, but he answered their false accusation and defeated them in battle. Forty-two thousand Ephraimites were slain. Jephthah judged Israel for six years. Samuel cited him as one proof of God's faithfulness in raising up deliverers for Israel in time of need (I Sam. 12:11). He is listed among the heroes of faith in the 11th chapter of Hebrews (vs. 32).

The great point of interest in his history is his vow (Judg. 11:29-40) and the way in which it was fulfilled. On his return home after the victory over the Ammonites, his own daughter was the first to meet him from his house. A man of the highest integrity, he knew that he could not go back on his vow to the Lord, and his daughter agreed with him. She asked only that she and her companions be allowed to go for two months to the mountains to bewail her virginity. When she returned to her father, he "did with her according to his vow which he had vowed: and she knew no man" (Judg. 11:39). After that she was lamented by the daughters of Israel four days every year.

How was the vow fulfilled? Did he actually sacrifice his daughter as a burnt offering, or did he redeem her with money and doom her to perpetual celibacy? The ancient Jewish authorities and the early Church fathers, as well as many in modern times, like Martin Luther, hold that she was actually sacrificed, as a first reading of the narrative suggests. It is said that Jephthah was either ignorant of the law against human sacrifices or that he flagrantly violated it. Those who hold the other view support it by saying that Jephthah's whole history, and especially his message to the king of the Ammonites, shows him to be a man well acquainted with the history of God's dealings with His people, as given in the law of Moses, and able to appreciate its bearing on his own age. His own words, and those of his daughter(Judg. 11:34,35), imply a knowledge of the Mosaic law as to vows (Num. 30:2; Deut. 23:23). A true worshiper of Jehovah could not regard human sacrifices with anything but abhorrence. Such a thing would be impossible of Jephthah, the chosen leader of God's people, all of whose dealings are thoroughly godly; who had just been filled with the Spirit of God to carry on his work; and whose faith is celebrated in Hebrews. Leviticus 27:1-8 contemplates the possibility of a man's vowing to give himself or some person of his household to the Lord, and makes provision for the redemption of such a person in money. We know too from the experience of Samuel that sometimes persons coming under a vow were handed over for the service of the sanctuary (I Sam. 1:11). It is therefore thought that Jephthah redeemed his daughter with money and gave her up to the service of the Lord as a perpetual virgin. That is the meaning of her request that she be allowed to bewail her virginity for two months, and of the statement made in Judges 11:39, "and she knew no man." The fact is, however, that we cannot be absolutely certain of the mode of fulfilment of Jephthah's vow. S.B.

JEPHUNNEH (jē-fŭn'ĕ, Heb. yephunneh, it will be prepared). 1. The father of Caleb, one of the 12 spies. He was from the tribe of Judah (Num. 13:6).

2. A son of Jether, an Asherite (I Chron. 7:38).

JERAH (jē'rà, Heb. yerah, moon), an Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:26; I Chron. 1:20).

JERAHMEEL (jē-rā'mē-ĕl, Heb. yerahme'ēl, may God have compassion, or God pities). 1. A descendant of Judah through Perez and Hezron (I Chron. 2:9;25-27,33,42).

2. A Merarite Levite, son of Kish, not Saul's father (I Chron. 24:29).

3. One of the three officers sent by King Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. 36:26). He was probably a royal prince, though not necessarily the son of a ruling prince.

JERASH (See Gerasa)

JERED (jē'rĕd, Heb. yeredh, descent). 1. Son of Mahalaleel (I Chron. 1:2).

2. A Judahite and father of the inhabitants of Gedor (I Chron. 4:18).

JEREMIAH (jĕr'ĕ-mī'à, Heb. yirmeyâhû, Jehovah founds, or perhaps, exalts), in KJV of NT "Jeremy" and "Jeremias" (Matt. 2:17; 16:14).

The Life of Jeremiah. Jeremiah was one of the greatest Hebrew prophets. He was born into a priestly family of Anathoth, a Benjamite town two and one-half miles NE of Jerusalem. His father was Hilkiah (1:1), not to be confused with the high priest Hilkiah mentioned in II Kings 22,23. Because of the autobiographical nature of his book, it is possible to understand his life, character and times better than those of any other Hebrew prophet.

Jeremiah was called to prophesy in the 13th year of King Josiah (626 B.C.), five years after the great revival of religion described in II Kings 23. This was a time of decision, great with both hope and foreboding. Looking back, we can know it as the last religious awakening in a series which only slowed down the idolatry and apostasy of the Hebrews, which apostasy finally plunged the nation into destruction. It was the time of the revival of the Babylonian empire. After the fall of the city of Nineveh in 612 B.C., the Assyrian empire disintegrated and Babylon for a little while again ruled the world under her vigorous leader Nebuchadnezzar, who sought to subdue the whole fertile crescent to himself. Nebuchadnezzar's design on Egypt inevitably included control of Palestine, and Jeremiah's lifetime saw the fall of the Hebrew commonwealth to Babylon. This fall was preceded by a generation of unrest and decline in Judah. Many solutions to her troubles were proposed, and at court pro-Egyptian and pro-Babylonian parties vied for favor with the policy makers. This situation of deepening crisis is the background without which Jeremiah and his book cannot be understood. Jeremiah's ministry continued through the reigns of five successive Judean kings, and saw the final destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. The prophet died in Egypt, probably a few years after the city was destroyed.

Jeremiah's call is described in Chapter 1. The young priest pleads his youth (1:6) but God assures him that he will be strengthened for his task. At this time the theme of destruction from the North (i.e., from Babylon) is already introduced (1:13-15). This theme, that Judah would inevitably fall because of its apostasy, earned for the prophet the undying hostility of most of his contemporaries (even his fellowtownsmen, 11:21) and led to his being charged with treason (38:1-6) and to frequent imprisonments. Jeremiah's faithfulness to his call under the most difficult circumstances makes him a prime example of devotion to God at greatest personal sacrifice.

Undoubtedly Jeremiah supported Josiah's reform (11:1-8; 17:19-27), but as time went on he realized its inadequacy to stave off national disaster (3:10). Upon Josiah's unhappy death (609 B.C.) Jeremiah mourned Judah's last good king (II Chron. 35:25) and life became more difficult for him. Jehoahaz, son of Josiah, reigned only three months before he was deported to Egypt. Jeremiah said he would not return (22:10-12). Jehoiakim, the brother of Jehoahaz, succeeded him and reigned 11 years. A strong ruler and a very wicked man, he tried to do away with the prophet, and failing that, to silence him. In Jehoiakim's fourth year Jeremiah dictated the first edition of his prophecies to Baruch, which the king promptly destroyed (36). During this reign Jeremiah preached his great temple discourse (7-10), which led to a plot to kill him, from which he was saved only by the intervention of friendly nobles who were a remnant of Josiah's administration (26). There now also occurred the battle of Carchemish (46:1-12) in which Egypt was crushed (605 B.C.) by the Babylonian crown prince Nebuchadnezzar, who soon afterward became king of Babylon. Egypt's star quickly set, and Babylon entered her brief period of greatness. Judah was brought into the Babylonian orbit when Jerusalem fell to Nebuchadnezzar in 605 B.C. and a few Hebrews (Daniel among them) were deported to Babylon. Jehoiakim later rebelled against Babylon. Jeremiah opposed this strong-willed despot all his reign and predicted a violent death for him (22:13-19). It has been supposed that he fell in a palace coup.

Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, succeeded him to the throne. Jeremiah called this king Coniah and Jechoniah (24:1; 27:20; 29:2). After he had reigned only three months, the Babylonians attacked Jerusalem and carried off Jehoiachin to Babylon (597 B.C.) as Jeremiah had predicted (22:24-30), together with many artisans and other important Jews.

In Jehoiachin's place Nebuchadrezzar appointed Zedekiah, who maintained a precarious position on the throne for 11 years. Although a weak character, he protected Jeremiah and asked his advice, which he was never able to carry out. Jeremiah advised submission to Babylon, but goaded by the nobles, Zedekiah rebelled and made an alliance with Egypt. Finally the Babylonians came again, determined to stamp out the rebellious Judean state. A long siege resulted, in which Jeremiah suffered greatly. He was accused of treason and thrown into a vile prison from which the king transferred him to the more pleasant court of the guard (37:11-21). Now that the judgment had come, the prophet spoke of a hopeful future for the nation (32,33). As the siege wore on, he was cast into a slimy cistern, where he would have perished had not Ebed-melech, a courtier, rescued him (38:6-13). Again to the court of the guard he was taken, until the city fell (38:28).

After a siege of a year and a half, Jerusalem was destroyed. Zedekiah was blinded and carried in chains to Babylon. For the events in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem we are dependent almost exclusively on Jeremiah (40-45). The captors treated Jeremiah with kindness, giving him the choice of going to Babylon or remaining in Judah. He chose to stay behind with some of the common people who had been left in Judah when most of the Jews were deported. Gedaliah was made puppet governor over this little group. After civil unrest, in which Gedaliah was assassinated, the Jews fled to Egypt, forcing Jeremiah to accompany them. In Egypt, a very old man, he died.

The Man and His Message. Jeremiah was called to be a prophet at a most unhappy time. With the failure of Josiah's revival the final decline of the nation was under way. When he was called, it was intimated to Jeremiah that his message would be one of condemnation rather than salvation (1:10,18,19). Yet he was also given a message of hope (30:1-3,18-22; 31:1-14,23-40). Throughout his long ministry of more than 40 years his preaching reflected this theme of judgment. God had risen early and sent His servants, the prophets, but Israel would not hear (7:25; 44:4). Now the fate predicted for an apostate nation in Deuteronomy 28-30 was inevitable. Babylon would capture Judah, and it would be better for the people to surrender and so to save their lives.

This message, coming to men whose desperate nationalism was all they had to cling to, was completely rejected, and the bearer was rejected with his message. Jeremiah was regarded as a meddler and a traitor, and people, nobles and kings alternately tried to do him to death. Although he needed the love, sympathy and encouragement of a wife, he was not permitted to marry, and in this prohibition he became a sign that life as usual was soon to cease for Jerusalem (16:1-4). Because his book is full of autobiographical sections — Jeremiah's "Confessions" — Jeremiah's personality can be understood more clearly than that of any other prophet. These outpourings of the human spirit are some of the most poignant and pathetic statements of the tension of a man under divine imperative to be found anywhere in Scripture. The most important are listed below. They show us a Jeremiah who was retiring, sensitive and afraid of people's "faces," one we should consider singularly unfit for the work which was placed upon him. That he tenaciously clung to his assigned task through the succeeding years of rejection and persecution is both a tribute to the mettle of the man and to the grace of God, without which his personality would surely have gone to pieces.

Jeremiah's penetrating understanding of the religious condition of his people is seen in his emphasis on the inner spiritual character of true religion. The external theocratic state will go, as will the temple and its ritual. Even Josiah's reform appears to have been a thing of the outward appearance — almost engineered by the king, an upsurge of nationalism more than a religious revival (3:10). The old covenant had failed; a new and better one will take its place and then God's law will be written on men's hearts (31:31-34). God will give His renewed people a heart to know Him (24:7). In this doctrine of the "new heart" Jeremiah unfolds the depth of human sin and predicts the intervention of divine grace (Heb. 8:1-9:28).

The Foe from the North. Throughout Jeremiah's sermons are references to a foe from the north who would devastate Judah and take her captive. Chapter 4 is typical of these oracles: The foe will destroy like a lion or a whirlwind and leave the land in desolation like the primeval chaos. Who is this destroying enemy? The fulfillment indicates that the northern foe was Babylon. Although Babylon is on the same latitude as Samaria, her invasions of Palestine always came from the north, as the desert which separates the two was impassable. The view that the Scythians are referred to as the northern foe in some places of the book seems not to be held so widely today as it once was, and may be rejected.

Sometimes (50:3,9,41; 51:48) north is used of the origin of the conquerors of Babylon. This use of the term is difficult to pin-point. The Persians, who were the principal captors of Babylon, came from the east. Probably here north has become an expression for the source of any trouble, arrived at because Israel's troubles for so long a time had come from that direction.

Other Jeremiahs. Six other Jeremiahs are briefly mentioned in the OT: a Benjamite and two Gadites who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4,10,13), the head of a family in Manasseh (I Chron. 5:24), a native of Libnah and the father of Hamutal, wife of King Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz (II Kings 23:30,31), and the son of Habaziniah, a Rechabite (Jer. 35:3). JEREMIAH, BOOK OF.

The Composition of the Book. Jeremiah is a book of prophetic oracles, or sermons, together with much autobiographical and historical material which gives the background of these oracles. Many modern scholars believe that the book contains substantial parts by later writers whose point of view differed markedly from the prophet's. Believing that the critics have failed to prove their case for later editors, this article takes the traditional position that the oracles are essentially Jeremiah's, and that the narratives, if not dictated by the prophet (they are usually in the third person), were probably composed by Baruch.

While accepting the Jeremianic origin of the contents of the book, it is impossible to say how or when these materials were assembled in their present form. Plainly the book has gone through a number of editions, each succeeding one containing additional material. The story of the production of the first and second editions is told in Chapter 36. Baruch, the amanuensis of the prophet, wrote down certain judgment oracles of the prophet (we do not know the exact contents) at his dictation. This scroll was contemptuously burned by king Jehoiakim; whereupon the prophet dictated again to Baruch "all the words of the book which Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire, and there were added besides many like words" (36:32); i.e., a new and enlarged edition was produced. Obviously this was not our present book, which carries the history on for at least 20 more years. This account is of great interest in that it gives the only detailed OT description of the writing of a prophetic book. That Jeremiah should dictate to a secretary is normal for the times. Writing was a specialized skill, often restricted to a professional class. Learned men might be able to read but (like executives today) scorned to write. The document was probably written on a blank papyrus scroll imported from Egypt.

It has long been noted that the book of Jeremiah in the Greek translation of the OT called the Septuagint (made in Egypt before 132 B.C.) is about one-eighth shorter than the Hebrew book, from which our English translations have been made. Further, the Septuagint omits many of the repetitions which are contained in the Hebrew copy, and rearranges the material somewhat. Some scholars believe that the Greek Jeremiah was made from a different edition of the Hebrew text from our present received text. It is not now possible to arrive at any certain conclusion about the relationship of the Septuagint to the Hebrew text, nor to know how either version came to its present condition.

The material contained in Jeremiah's book is not arranged in chronological order. The outline given below indicates what seems to have been the purpose of the present arrangement — to set forth a group of oracles against the Jewish nation, then to record selected events in the prophet's ministry, then to give certain preachments of Jeremiah against foreign nations, and finally to tell the story of the fall of Jerusalem. The record of Jerusalem's fall had been given in Chapter 39; the somewhat different account at the end of the book (chap. 52) is practically identical with II Kings 24,25 and may have been added from that source to give a climactic conclusion to Jeremiah's oracles.

Outline.

I. JEREMIAH'S ORACLES AGAINST THE THEOCRACY, 1:1-25:38.
   - A. The prophet's call, 1:1-19.
   - B. Reproofs and admonitions, mostly from the time of Josiah, 2:1-20:18.
   - C. Later prophecies, 21:1-25:38.

II. EVENTS IN THE LIFE OF JEREMIAH, 26:1-45:5.
   - A. The temple sermon and Jeremiah's arrest, 26:1-24.
   - B. The yoke of Babylon, 27:1-29:32.
   - C. The book of consolation, 30:1-33:26.
   - D. Some of Jeremiah's experiences before Jerusalem fell, 34:1-36:32.
   - E. Jeremiah during the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, 37:1-39:18.
   - F. The last years of Jeremiah, 40:1-45:5.

III. JEREMIAH'S ORACLES AGAINST FOREIGN NATIONS, 46:1-51:64.
   - A. Against Egypt, 46:1-28.
   - B. Against the Philistines, 47:1-7.
   - C. Against Moab, 48:1-47.
   - D. Against the Ammonites, 49:1-6.
   - E. Against Edom, 49:7-22.
   - F. Against Damascus, 49:23-27.
   - G. Against Kedar and Hazor, 49:28-33.
   - H. Against Elam, 49:34-39.
   - I. Against Babylon, 50:1-51:64.

IV. APPENDIX: THE FALL OF JERUSALEM AND RELATED EVENTS, 52:1-34.

Chronological Order of the Book. In spite of the fact that the book is not at all in chronological order, it is possible to date many of its sections because they contain chronological notations. These sections are here listed with their dates.

1. In the Reign of Josiah.
   In the 13th year, chap. 1.
   Later in this reign, chaps. 2-6.
   Possibly much of chaps. 7-20 (except material specifically listed below) is to be dated to Josiah's reign.
2. In the Reign of Jehoahaz.
   None.

3. In the Reign of Jehoiakim.
   Early in this reign, chap. 26 and probably 7: 1-8:3; 22:1-23.
   In the fourth year, chaps. 25,36,45,46:1-12.
   After the fourth year, chap. 35.
4. In the Reign of Jehoiachin.
   22:24-30; possibly chap. 14.
5. In the Reign of Zedekiah.
   In the beginning, chap. 24, 49:34-39.
   In the fourth year, chaps. 27,28; 51:59-64.
   In unnoted years, chaps. 21,29.
   During the early part of the siege, chap. 34.
   During the interruption of the siege, chap. 37.
   During the resumption of the siege, chaps. 32, 33,38,39:15-18.
6. In Judah after the fall of Jerusalem, 39:1-4; 40:1-43:7.
7. In Egypt after Jeremiah was taken there, 43:8-44:30.

Jeremiah and the Lachish Letters. Lachish, in the Judean foothills, was one of a series of fortresses for the defense of Jerusalem against attack from the Mediterranean Plain. It was one of the last cities to fall to the Babylonians prior to the final taking and destruction of Jerusalem (34:7). An interesting light has been shed on these last hectic days of Judah's history by a discovery in the ruins of ancient Lachish. When the city was excavated (in 1932 through 1938) there were found in a guard room of the outer gate 21 letters written on broken pieces of pottery. They were written in the ancient Hebrew script with carbon iron ink at the time of Jeremiah, when Lachish was undergoing its final siege.

Many of these letters were written by a certain Hoshaiah, who was a military officer at some outpost near Lachish, to Yaosh, the commander of Lachish. Their language is very much like that of the book of Jeremiah. Hoshaiah is constantly defending himself to his superior. Could it be that he was under suspicion of being ready to go over to the Babylonians? Once he describes one of the princes in words almost like those which the princes use against Jeremiah (38:4). There is mention of "the prophet" whose message is "Beware." Is this a reference to Jeremiah? We cannot be sure. According to the book of Jeremiah, there were plenty of prophets in that troublous time. Another letter mentions the inability of Hoshaiah to see the smoke signals of Azekah, although those of Lachish are still visible. Perhaps Azekah had already fallen (34:7). Although the specific meaning of many of the references of these letters eludes us, they do throw a vivid light on the disturbed and fearful days just prior to the fall of the Judean kingdom, the days of Jeremiah. A translation of these letters may be found in Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the OT, edited by James B. Pritchard, second edition, Princeton, 1955. J.B.G.

JEREMOTH (jĕr'ē-mŏth, Heb. yerēmôth, swollen, thick). 1. A Benjamite of the family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

2. Another Benjamite (I Chron. 8:14).

3. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mushi (I Chron. 23:23; 24:30).

4. The head of the 15th course among the musicians in the reign of David (I Chron. 25:4,22).

5. A prince of Naphtali in David's reign (I Chron. 27:19).

6. Three men who consented to put away their foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:26, 27,29).

JERIAH (jē-rī'à, Heb. yerîyāhû, Jehovah sees), head of a Levitical house, the house of Hebron (I Chron. 23:19; 24:23; 26:31).

JERIBAI (jĕr'ī-bī, Heb. yerîvay, Jehovah pleads), a son of Elnaam, and one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:46).

JERICHO (jĕr'ī-kō, Heb. yerēhô, yerîhô, Gr. Iereichó, moon city).

The Site. Jericho, also called the city of palm trees (Deut. 34:3) is located five miles W of the Jordan and seven miles N of the Dead Sea, some 800 feet below sea level. Its climate is tropical, with great heat during the summer. In the winter it becomes a resort for people fleeing the colder weather of the Palestinian hill country. In ancient times date palm trees flourished here, and balsam, from which medicine was extracted, was the source of great income. Today there are many banana groves. The presence of springs of water makes the locality a green oasis in the middle of the dry Jordan rift area.

There are three Jerichos. The OT city was situated on a mound now called Tell es-Sultan, a mile NW of the modern town. NT Jericho is on a higher elevation nearby. Modern Jericho, called Er Riha by the Arabs, has a population of about 10,000 people of a very much mixed racial descent.

Jericho is probably the oldest city in the world. Its strategic site by a ford of the Jordan controlled the ancient trade routes from the East. After crossing the river these branched out, one going towards Bethel and Shechem in the north, another, westward to Jerusalem, and a third to Hebron in the south. Thus Jericho controlled the access to the hill country of Palestine from Transjordan.

Jericho in the Bible. Jericho first enters the Biblical story when it is captured by Joshua and the invading Hebrews as the opening wedge of their campaign to take Canaan (Josh. 6). The city's location made its capture the key to the invasion of the central hill country. It was regarded as a formidable obstacle by the Hebrews, requiring divine help to take it. After the two spies had searched it (Josh. 2) Joshua led the Hebrew forces against the city, marching around it daily for six days. On the seventh day they circled it seven times, then shouted and blew their trumpets and "the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city every man straight before him, and they took the city" (Josh. 6:20). The city was devoted to God, totally destroyed and burned, except for metal objects found in it (Josh. 6:17-19). Only Rahab, who had cared for the spies, with her family, was saved (Josh. 6:22,23,25). Joshua placed a curse on the place, that it might not be rebuilt (Josh. 6:26). The site seems to have remained a ruin for centuries.

Jericho next becomes prominent when it is rebuilt by Hiel the Bethelite in the days of Ahab (c. 850 B.C.; I Kings 16:34). Evidently it again became an important place during the divided kingdom era. It is mentioned in connection with Elisha's ministry (II Kings 2:5,19; see also II Chron. 28:15; II Kings 25:5; Jer. 39:5; Ezra 2:34; Neh. 3:2; 7:36).

In the time of Christ, Jericho was an important place yielding a large revenue to the royal family. Since the road from the fords of the Jordan to Jerusalem passed through it, it became a stopping place for Galilean pilgrims to Jerusalem, who came south through Perea to avoid defilement by contact with the Samaritans. Thus Jesus passed through it on a number of occasions. Nearby are the supposed sites of His baptism (in the Jordan) and His temptation (the hill Quarantania, W of the city). Near the city Jesus healed Bartimaeus (Mark 10:46-52) and two other blind men (Matt. 20:29-34). Here occurred the conversion of Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1-10), one of the most graphic of the Gospel narratives. In the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:29-37) the traveler was attacked as he was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, a winding road, often passing between crags, going through the desolate Judean wilderness, which was a frequent hiding place of criminals.

The Archaeology of Jericho. During the past 50 years there have been a number of excavations of Tell es-Sultan, OT Jericho. Between 1908 and 1910, the German scholars Sellin and Watzinger excavated there. A very important expedition, led by the British archaeologist John Garstang dug there from 1930 to 1936. The latest attempt to uncover ancient Jericho's secrets began in 1952, when the British School of Archaeology and the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem, under the leadership of Dr. Kathleen Kenyon excavated the tell. At the end of the 1957 season, this work was suspended.

The earliest evidence of settlement on this site is dated (by radiocarbon tests) to the seventh and sixth millennia B.C., when a pre-pottery neolithic town was built there. A surprisingly strong city wall, mud brick and stone houses, plastered floors with reed mats, and clay figurines of animals and the mother goddess show that the civilization was not crude. Of special interest from this period are several human skulls with the features modeled in clay and with shells for eyes, used possibly for cultic purposes. This in one of the oldest cities known to man — existing some 5,000 years before Abraham!

Of greatest interest to the Bible student is the evidence bearing on the overthrow of the city in the days of Joshua. About this (the late bronze age) city there has been dispute ever since Garstang's excavation, and Miss Kenyon's reports, which scholars had hoped would solve the mystery only accentuated the problem. Garstang believed that he had found ample evidence of Joshua's destruction of the late bronze age city, which he labeled "city D," and dated to the 15th century B.C. He found that this city had been surrounded by a double wall, which encircled the summit of the mound, the inner wall 12 feet thick and the outer six feet. These walls had been violently destroyed and had toppled down the slopes of the mound. Layers of ash and charcoal testified to the burning of the city by its captors, and great amounts of charred grain and other foodstuffs suggested the total destruction of which the Bible speaks. Not all of Garstang's fellow archaeologists accepted his reconstructions and the world of scholarship awaited Miss Kenyon's findings.

After seven seasons at Jericho, Miss Kenyon reports that virtually nothing remains of the Jericho of the period of Joshua (1500-1200 B.C.). The mound has suffered such denudation that almost all remains later than the third millennium B.C. have disappeared. The two walls which Garstang connected with his city D Miss Kenyon discovered to date from the third millennium, hundreds of years before the Exodus. Only a bit of pottery and possibly one building remain from the late bronze age. If there was once evidence of a great city of Jericho destroyed by Joshua, it has long since been eaten away by the elements. Much that has been written on this subject prior to 1952 — often written with the best intentions to "prove" the truth of the Bible — is now outmoded. Many scholars now believe that the Jericho of Joshua's day was little more than a fort.

It is unlikely that the problem of Jericho will ever be solved by further archaeological work. The many successive years of digging have left the tell in a mixed-up condition, and it may be that other cities mentioned in the conquest narrative in Joshua (e.g. Hazor) will now more readily yield their answers. In the meantime, the thoughtful Christian will not forget the mutability of scientific theories.

NT Jericho, Tulul Abu el-Alayiq, was excavated in 1950. Much of it had been built by Herod the Great as his winter capital. Here Herod died (4 B.C.). It was a magnificent Roman-style city, with pools, villas, a hippodrome and a theater. A great civic center, of the best Roman masonry, with a grand facade containing statuary niches, potted plants and a reflecting basin before it, bear witness to the grandeur of the international culture that was Palestine's during the time of Jesus. JERIMOTH (jĕr'ĭ-mŏth, Heb. yerēmôth, thick, swollen). 1. A Benjamite (I Chron. 7:7).

2. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

3. Son of David and father of Mahalath, the wife of Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:18).

4. A Levite, an overseer of the temple in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

5. A Levite musician in David's time (I Chron. 25:4).

6. A son of Mushi, a Merarite (I Chron. 24:30).

JERIOTH (jĕr'ĭ-ŏth, Heb. yerî'ôth, tent curtains), one of Caleb's wives (I Chron. 2:18).

JEROBOAM I (jĕr'ō-bō'ăm, Heb. yārov'ām, the people contend, or the people become numerous), son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, and of Zeruah, a widow (I Kings 11:26-40). He founded the kingdom of Israel when the nation was split following the death of Solomon. His father was an official under Solomon and came from the village of Zeredah in the Jordan. As a young man Jeroboam showed such ability that Solomon put him in charge of the fortifications and public works at Jerusalem and made him overseer of the levy from the house of Joseph (I Kings 11:28). He, however, used his position to stir up disaffection against the government. This was not difficult to do, as the people were already filled with bitterness over the enforced labor and burdensome taxation imposed upon them by Solomon. One day as he was walking outside Jerusalem, he was met by the prophet Ahijah of Shiloh, who tore into 12 pieces a new mantle he wore and gave 10 of them to Jeroboam, informing him, moreover, that because of the idolatrous defection of Solomon's reign, the kingdom would be rent asunder, two of the tribes to remain with David's house, while Jeroboam would become the head of the other ten. He also told him that if as king he walked in the fear of the Lord and kept His commandments, the kingdom would be his and his descendants for many a year. When news of these happenings reached Solomon, he tried to kill Jeroboam, but he escaped to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Shishak, the pharaoh who succeeded (and, it is thought, dethroned) the pharaoh whose daughter Solomon had married. As soon as Solomon died, Jeroboam returned from Egypt, and when the people met at Shechem to proclaim Solomon's son Rehoboam king, they invited Jeroboam to come and take the lead in urging their grievances. As spokesman of the people, he urged that their burdens be alleviated, but the request was contemptuously rejected; whereupon the ten tribes revolted from the house of David and made Jeroboam their king. Thus Ahijah's prophecy that the ten tribes would form a separate kingdom with Jeroboam as king was fulfilled.

Although divinely set apart for his task, and raised to the throne with the approval of the people, Jeroboam nevertheless failed to rise to the greatness of his opportunities. The prophet had told him the conditions of success as a ruler, but it was not long before he began to depart from the counsels of the Lord. Afraid that if his people went annually to Jerusalem to worship, it would not be long before they would be won back to the house of David, he decided to establish centers of worship at the two extremities of his kingdom, Dan in the N and Bethel in the S. This was at variance with the law of Moses, according to which there was to be but one altar of burnt-offering and one place of meeting God. His disobedience became much greater when, in defiance of the commandment forbidding the worship of God by means of images, he set up a golden calf in each of the new sanctuaries and quoted to the people the words of Aaron, "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt" (I Kings 12:28). These radical changes involved the necessity of others. Since priests refused to serve at the new altars, he had to supply their place from such as could be had, "the lowest of the people." Furthermore, he made a house of high places, and ordained that the feast of tabernacles, which had been held in the seventh month, should henceforth be observed on the eighth. He, moreover, sometimes took it upon himself to minister in the priests' office. The mass of people conformed to the new religious ways. This was the "sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, wherewith he made Israel to sin" (I Kings 12:30; 16:26). He sacrificed the higher interests of religion to politics. To establish his throne firmly, he led the people into the immoralities of heathenism which led eventually to the destruction of the nation. The successive kings, with possibly one exception, supported this idolatrous worship until Israel fell.

Although Jeroboam made Israel to sin by introducing religious customs that conflicted radically with those taught by Moses, God gave him a solemn warning to give heed to his evil ways through an unnamed prophet who came to Bethel from Judah. One day — apparently the very day the altar was consecrated — as Jeroboam stood ministering at the altar, the man of God suddenly appeared before the king and foretold that the time would come when a member of the Davidic dynasty would desecrate that altar by burning men's bones upon it, a prophecy that was fulfilled in the time of Josiah. When the king heard these words, he pointed to the prophet and cried out, "Lay hold on him," whereupon the hand that was extended menacingly instantly withered and became useless, and the altar was rent in two so that the ashes spilled to the ground. The king then besought the prophet to pray that his hand might be restored to him. The prophet prayed and the hand was restored. He refused the king's invitation to go home with him to dine, saying that it was against the will of God, and then left for home. In spite of this terrible warning from God, Jeroboam continued on his evil way, so that God decided to cut off and destroy his house.

At a later date, exactly when is not clear, Jeroboam's eldest son fell seriously ill. The distracted father thought of Ahijah, now old and blind, and sent his queen to him in disguise to find out from him whether the child would live. The prophet saw through her disguise and told her not only that the child would die, but that the house of Jeroboam would be utterly destroyed by someone whom the Lord would raise up to be king of Israel.

There was desultory warfare between Jeroboam and Rehoboam (I Kings 15:6), and a great battle was fought between Jeroboam and Rehoboam's successor, Abijam, in which the army of Israel was thoroughly routed and defeated with great slaughter, and Bethel, only a few miles from Jerusalem, was captured by Abijam (I Kings 15:7). Jeroboam reigned for 22 years and was succeeded to the throne by his son Nadab.

For the people of Israel the reign of Jeroboam was a supreme political and religious calamity. The warfare between the two kingdoms inevitably brought weakness and prostration to both, leaving them open to outside attack. The introduction of the golden bulls led to the "baalization" of the religion of Jehovah. In about 200 years the moral and religious corruption of the people had gone so far that there was no more hope for them, and God brought in a heathen power to lead them into captivity. S.B.

JEROBOAM II (jĕr-ō-bō'ăm, Heb. yārov'ām, the people contend, or the people become numerous), the son and successor of Jehoash, king of Isarel; fourth son of the dynasty of Jehu. He became king in Samaria c. 785 B.C., and reigned 41 years. He followed the example of Jeroboam I in keeping up the idolatrous worship of the golden calves (II Kings 14:23). In spite of this, his reign was outwardly flourishing. He ruled contemporaneously with Amaziah (II Kings 14:23) and Uzziah (II Kings 15:1), kings of Judah. He continued and brought to a successful conclusion the wars which his father had undertaken against Syria, and took their chief cities, Damascus and Hamath, which had once been subject to David, and also restored to Israel territory E of the Jordan from Lebanon to the Dead Sea (II Kings 14:25; Amos 6:14). Moab and Ammon, probably tributaries of Syria, were reconquered (Amos 1:13; 2:1-3).

All these successful wars brought much tribute to Jeroboam and his nobles. The wealthy had both winter and summer homes; some lived in houses of ivory; others in houses of hewn stone. There were many great houses. The prophet Amos, contemporary with Jeroboam in his later years, gives us a graphic description of a banqueting scene in which the perfumed guests lay upon silken cushions, eating the flesh of lambs and stall-fed calves, drinking wine from bowls, and singing songs to the music of viols. But side by side with this luxury there was also much poverty in the land. Twice the prophet says that the needy were sold for a pair of shoes (Amos 2:6; 8:6). No one, however, was grieved for the afflictions of the poor or was distressed for the corruption that prevailed in the land. Drunkenness, licentiousness, and oppression went unrebuked by the religious hierarchy.

Not that the land was devoid of religion. Worship went on not only at Dan and Bethel, but at subsidiary temples and altars at Gilgal and Beersheba (Amos 4:4; 5:5; 8:14), both places with long religious associations. Amos complains (5:21 ff) that ritual was substituted for righteousness, and that votaries prostrated themselves before altars clothed in garments taken in cruel pledge, and drank sacrificial wine bought with the money of those who were condemned (Amos 2:8).

During the reign of Jeroboam lived the prophets Hosea, Joel, Jonah, and Amos. Amos says that he was commanded by God to go to Bethel to testify against the whole proceedings there. He was to foretell the destruction of the sanctuaries of Israel, and of the house of Jeroboam with the sword (Amos 7:9). When Amaziah, the high-priest of Bethel, heard this denunciation, he sent a messenger to the king of Samaria with a report of a "conspiracy" of Amos and that Amos had declared, "Jeroboam shall die by the sword," which Amos had not done. There are some who regard this as a prophecy that was not fulfilled, as there is no evidence that the king died other than a natural death, for he was buried with his ancestors in state (II Kings 14:29) The probability, however, is that the high-priest, in order to inflame Jeroboam against him, gave the prophet's words an unwarranted twist.

In II Kings 14:25 we are told that the large extension of territory to Israel by Jeroboam was foretold by Jonah, the son of Amittai, the same prophet whose mission to Nineveh forms the subject of the Book of Jonah (1:1).

Jeroboam was succeeded on his death by his son Zechariah (II Kings 14:29), a weak king with whom the dynasty ended. S.B.

JEROHAM (jĕ-rō'hăm, Heb. jerōhām, may he be compassionate, or be pitied (by God). 1. A Levite, the father of Elkanah, and grandfather of Samuel (I Sam. 1:1; I Chron. 6:27,34).

2. A Benjamite, whose sons were chief men and lived at Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:27). Probably identical with the following.

3. A Benjamite, father of Ibneiah who dwelt at Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:8).

4. Ancestor of a priest in Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:12).

5. A Benjamite of Gedor, father of two of David's recruits at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:7).

6. Father of Azarel, chief of the tribe of Dan in the reign of David (I Chron. 27:22).

7. Father of Azariah, one of the captains who supported Jehoiada in overthrowing Queen Athaliah and putting Joash on the throne of Judah (II Chron. 23:1).

JERUEL (jĕ-rōō'ĕl, Heb. jerû'ēl, founded by God), a wilderness in Judah, "by the cliff of Ziz," in the vicinity of En-gedi, but its exact location is unknown. Jahaziel predicted that King Jehoshaphat should meet the hordes of Moabites and Ammonites there (II Chron. 20:16).

JERUSALEM, in the history of God's revelation to man in those Divine acts by which redemption has been accomplished, by far the most important site on this earth. It was the royal city, the capital of the only kingdom God has (thus far) established among men; here the temple was erected, and here alone, during the kingdom age, were sacrifices legitimately offered. This was the city of the prophets, as well as the kings of David's line. Here occurred the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, David's greater Son. Upon an assembled group in this city the Holy Spirit descended at Pentecost, giving birth to the Christian Church, and here the first great Church Council was held. Rightly did the chronicler refer to Jerusalem as the "city which Jehovah had chosen out of all the tribes of Israel to put his name there" (I Kings 14:21). Even the Roman historian Pliny, of the first century, referred to Jerusalem as "by far the most famous city of the ancient Orient" (H.N.V.14). This city has been the preeminent objective of the pilgrimages of devout men and women for over 2,000 years, and it was in an attempt to recover the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem that all the Crusades were organized.

No site in all the Scriptures receives such constant and exalted praise as Jerusalem. Concerning no place in the world have such promises been made of ultimate glory and permanent peace. As George Adam Smith has well said, "Jerusalem felt His presence. She was assured of His love and as never another city on earth has been, of His travail for her worthiness of the destiny to which He had called her."

Names of the City. While the word Jerusalem is Semitic, it apparently was not a name given to the city for the first time by the Hebrew people. Far back in the time of the Tell-el-Amarna (1400 B.C.) letters, it was called U-ru-sa-lim, that is, a city of Salim, generally taken to mean "city of peace." In the Hebrew Bible, the word first appears in Joshua 10:1 where it is spelled Yerushalayim. In the Aramaic of Ezra 4:8,20,24,51, it is Jerushlem. In the records of Sennacherib, it is called Ursalimu. In the Syriac, it is Urishlem; in the LXX, it is Hierousalem. The Romans, at the time of Hadrian, 135 A.D., changed the name to Aelia Capitolina. For some hundreds of years now the Arabs have called the city Al-Kuds al-Sharif, which means the Sanctuary. There is no reason for insisting that Salem is to be taken as the name of a Canaanitic deity, that is, the city of the god Salem. Salem was probably the earlier name for the city, the name given to it in the memorable interview of Abraham with Melchizedek, the king of Salem (Gen. 14:18; Ps. 76:2). Because the very name of the city means peace, we are told that in this place, God Himself will give peace (Hag. 2:9). The children of God are exhorted to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem" (Ps. 122:6). Isaiah, at the end of his great series of prophecies, returns to the theme, "Thus saith Jehovah, behold, I will extend peace to her like a river" (Isa. 66:12). This word Salem is the basis of the Arabic greeting "Salam," and the Jewish greeting "Shalom," both meaning "peace be with you."

The Rabbis say there are 60 different names for Jerusalem in the Bible, a characteristic exaggeration, but truly there are a great number. Jerusalem itself occurs about 600 times in the OT, though it is not found in Job, Hosea, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Haggai.

Jerusalem appears in the NT after the close of the Book of Acts rather infrequently, four times near the conclusion of the epistle to the Romans (15:17,25,26,31), once at the close of the first letter to the Corinthians (16:3), and again in the Galatian epistle (1:17,18 and 2:1). The most frequently used name for this city, apart from Jerusalem, of course, is Zion, which occurs over 100 times in the OT, beginning as early as II Kings 19:21, and found most frequently in the Book of Psalms and the prophecy of Isaiah (1:8; 4:4, 5; 62:11). Zion appears in the NT in some very interesting passages, which cannot be discussed here. Twice on the lips of our Lord (Matt. 21:5; John 12:15); twice in the epistle to the Romans, with spiritual significance (9:33 and 11:36); and similarly in I Peter 2:6 and Revelation 14:1. Jerusalem is often called in the historical books and once in the prophetical writings, "the city of David" (II Sam. 5:7, 9; 6:10-16; Neh. 3:15 and 12:37; Isa. 22:9, etc). This title is later, on one occasion, applied to Bethlehem (Luke 2:4, 11).

The greatest group of titles for this city are those which identify it as the city of God. It is called exactly this in the Psalms, as well as in the NT (Psa. 46:4; 48:1, 8; 87:3; Heb. 12:22; Rev. 3:12). It is also called the city of Jehovah (Isa. 60:14); the mountain of the Lord (Isa. 2:3 and 30:29); the mountain of Jehovah of hosts (Zech. 8:3); the holy mountain of Jehovah (Isa. 27:13; 66:20); Zion of the Holy One of Israel (Isa. 60:13). The Lord Himself refers to it, and to no other place, as "my city" (Isa. 45:13), or more often, "my holy mountain" (Isa. 11:9; 56:7; 57:13; 65:11, 25; 66:20). Because it is the city of God, where He has put His name, it is often referred to as the Holy City (Isa. 48:2; 52:1; Neh. 11:1-18), a title twice used by Matthew (in 4:5 and 27:53) and once of a future event by St. John (Rev. 11:2), and used in referring to our eternal heavenly home at the close of the Scriptures (Rev. 21:2; 22:19). Generally, the phrase, "the holy mountain," refers to this city (Ps. 48:1; Isa. 11:9; Dan. 11:45, etc.). Once it is given the beautiful name of Hephzibah, meaning "My delight is in her" (Isa. 62:4). Isaiah in one passage calls the city Ariel, the meaning of which is a very disputed matter (Isa. 29:1,2,7), a word that in itself means "Lion of God." At the beginning of his prophecy he gives two titles to the city in most radical contrast. He designates it, because of its wickedness, as Sodom and Gomorrah (1:10), but in the same passage, he promises that the day will come when it will be accurately called "the city of righteousness" (1:26).

The Site. Different from most cities that have witnessed great historical events over many successive centuries, Jerusalem has always remained on the same site. Specifically it is located 31° 46′ 45″ N lat., and 35° 13′ 25″ long. E of Greenwich. It is situated 33 miles E of the Mediterranean, and 14 miles W of the Dead Sea, at an elevation of 2,550 feet above sea level. Geologically speaking, the city rests upon three hills. The SE hill, the original city of the Jebusites, the city which David seized, later to be called Zion, occupied about eight to ten acres, and "was shaped somewhat like a gigantic human footprint about 1,250 feet long and 400 feet wide." The area of Megiddo in contrast was 30 acres. The northern hill was the one on which Solomon built the great temple, and his own palace, called Ophel. It is probable that Millo (II Sam. 5:9; I Kings 9:15f) was "either a fortress guarding the northern approach to Ophel or a fill of rocks and dirt to shore up the wall at its most vulnerable point" (Gottwald). On the E of these two hills was a deep valley known as the Kidron. To the S of the city was another deep valley called the Hinnom. Down through the middle of the city, running from N to S, was a third valley, now built over, and only discernible by careful investigation of the contours of the rock level, called the Tyropoeon Valley. On the far side of the Western hill was the Valley of Gehenna, a continuation of Hinnom. These valleys today give no idea of their original depth, for debris has filled them up in some places to a depth of 50 to 60 feet. The city never occupied what could be called a large area. Even in the time of Herod the Great, the area within the walls was not more than a mile in length, nor more than five-eighths of a mile in width. The city was off the beaten path of the great caravan routes, and was not, as most larger world capitals, on a navigable river or on a large body of water. Its site, therefore, had an exclusiveness about it. On the other hand, being 19 miles N from Hebron, and 30 miles S of Samaria, it was centrally located to serve as the capital of the kingdom of Israel. Many travelers have testified to the fact that Jerusalem "from whatever direction it is approached, can be seen only when one has arrived in its immediate vicinity: a peculiarity which always brought a moment of pleasant surprise to travelers of bygone days" (J. Simmons).

Walls and Gates. The matter of Israel's gates and walls is complicated and has given rise to a great many technical disagreements, and can be discussed here only in a general way. Because of the deep valleys on the E, S and W of the city, it was only the northern side which could be more easily penetrated by an invading army. The walls on the E and W are built on the ridges of these valleys. There was probably in early days, a southern wall extending far below the present southern wall structure. The first northern wall extended from what is called the Jaffa Gate to the middle of the great temple area. The second northern wall began at the Jaffa Gate, extended northward and then curved to the east to the Tower of Antonia, just beyond the northern end of the Temple area. The modern wall extends N and then E from the northern end of the western wall to the northern end of the present eastern wall. There was a third north wall of which we have become aware only during the days of modern excavation. The walls of the city are more elaborately described in the book of Nehemiah than in any other place in the Bible. Beginning at the southeastern end of the early wall is the Dung Gate; moving northward one comes to the Fountain Gate; and then, nearly in the middle of the wall of the old temple area, the famous, now-closed, Golden Gate. Above this is Stephen's Gate. Turning west on the northern modern wall, we come to Herod's Gate, then the much-used Damascus Gate, and then toward the end of this northern wall, the New Gate. If we turn left again at the western wall, we come to the last of the gates now in use, the Jaffa Gate, out from which the road proceeds to the Mediterranean. The present wall, though much of it is, no doubt, on the site of earlier walls, was built by Soliman II about 1540, extending for two and one-half miles, with an average height of 38 feet.

History. The early history of Jerusalem is wrapped in obscurity. Pottery from before 2000 B.C. has been found at Al Buqueia, SW of Jerusalem, though we are not acquainted with any names of individuals appearing at this site at such an early period. The first reference that we have to Jerusalem in secular annals is in the famous Tell-el-Amarna letters of the 14th century B.C., in which is some most interesting correspondence from the governor of this city, Abd-Khiba, addressed to the pharaoh of Egypt, complaining that his city is being threatened, and that the Egyptian government is not giving him the support he needs and expected. (These letters may be found in Pritchard's NET 487-488). We do, however, have a reference to the Jebusites, who are the ones who inhabited the city of Jebus, that is, Jerusalem, as early as the great ethnological passage in Genesis 10 (vss. 15-19). Actually, the first reference to Jerusalem as such is found in the story of the amazing interview of Abraham with Melchizedek, king of Salem (Gen. 14:17-24). Here is the first occurrence of the word "priest" in the Bible, and because Melchizedek was the "priest of God most high," we are compelled to believe that even before the nation Israel was founded, and perhaps 800 years before this site was taken by David, there was a witness to the true God at this place. While there is some difference of view on this point, many believe, and tradition is unanimous here, that the place of Abraham offering up Isaac at Mt. Moriah (Gen. 22:2; II Chron. 3:1) was the exact site on which, centuries later, the Temple of Solomon was built. Josephus himself affirms that Jerusalem was in existence during the days of Abraham (Ant. I X-2, VII XI-3).

The actual name Jerusalem occurs for the first time in Joshua 10:5, where we are told that the king of the city confederated with four other kings in a futile attempt to defeat Joshua. In the same book it is frankly confessed that the Israelites were unable to drive out the Jebusites (15:8, 63; 18:28). At the beginning of the book of Judges (1:7) it is stated, however, that the Israelites in an hour of victory had overwhelmed a large opposing force including Adoni-bezek and "brought him to Jerusalem," where he died. This would seem to imply that for a brief space the Israelites held part of this city, but were not able to keep it: "The children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem; but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day" (Judg. 1:21).

Nothing is known of the history of Jerusalem, either from Biblical or non-Biblical writings, from the time of Joshua's death until the capture of this city by David (II Sam. 5:6-10; prob. 998 B.C.). No doubt the fortress which David took is that which later came to be called Zion, located on the SE hill, and outside of the present walls of the city. Kraeling estimates that the population of this city during David's time did not exceed 1,230, estimating it as 250 people per acre. Later David purchased "the threshing floor of Araunah, the Jebusite" (II Sam. 24:18; I Chron. 21:18-28) on which site the great Temple of Solomon later was erected. (See TEMPLE). Upon finishing the temple, Solomon then built a magnificent palace to the N of it, of which there is not the slightest vestige today.

With the death of Solomon, the glory of Israel, and so also the glory of Jerusalem, began to dim. In the fifth year of Rehoboam, 917 B.C., Shishak, king of Egypt, without any struggle whatever, coming up to Jerusalem, "took away the treasures of the house of Jehovah, and the treasures of the king's house; he even took away all: and he took away all the shields of gold which Solomon had made" (I Kings 14:26; II Chron. 12:9). This is the first of eight different plunderings of the Jerusalem Temple occurring within a little more than 300 years. Not only must its wealth have been fabulously great, but no doubt, in times of national prosperity, the more religiously inclined citizens of Judah would bestow new treasures upon the temple. Shortly thereafter, Asa (911-871 B.C.) bribed Ben-Hadad the king of Syria, by taking "all the silver and the gold that were left in the treasures of the house of Jehovah and the treasures of the king's house and delivered them into the hand of the servants of the Syrian king" (I Kings 15:18). Twice then, within a few years after Solomon's death, Judah's kings prevented an invasion of the city only by bribing her enemies with the treasures of the Lord's House. Again during the reign of Jehoram (850-843 B.C.), in an episode about which we know very little, the Arabians and the Philistines "carried away all the substance found in the king's house and his sons also and his wives" (II Chron. 21:16,17). For the fourth time within a century and a half after the death of Solomon, the temple treasures were used for bribing a threatening enemy, by Jehoash (837-800 B.C.), who "took all the hallowed things that Jehoshaphat and Jehoram and Ahaziah, his fathers, kings of Judah, had dedicated, and his own hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of Jehovah, and of the king's house, and sent it to Hazael, king of Syria: and he went away from Jerusalem" (II Kings 12:18). Thus far it is foreign kings that are bribed with these treasures, but the fifth occasion involved the King of Israel, Joash (801-786 B.C.). Coming up to Jerusalem, he broke down the western wall for a length of 600 feet, and then "took all the gold and silver, and all the vessels that were found in the house of Jehovah, and in the treasures of the king's house, and hostages also, and returned to Samaria" (II Kings 14:13,14; II Chron. 25:23).

One attack upon the city of Jerusalem failed in the reign of Ahaz (733-714 B.C.), when Rezin, the king of Syria, and Remaliah, the king of Israel, were repulsed in their attempt to seize the temple (II Kings 16:5). However, while Ahaz was still king, there came up to Jerusalem a mighty king of Assyria, Tiglath-pileser III (745-737 B.C.), to whom Ahaz took "a portion out of the house of Jehovah and out of the house of the king and of the princes, and gave it unto the king of Assyria." However, as the text informs us "It helped him not" (II Chron. 28:20,21).

In 701 B.C. occurred an event relating to Jerusalem's history to which the OT actually gives more space, with greater detail, than even to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, namely, the threat of Sennacherib (704-681 B.C.), who cast one insult after another in the face of King Hezekiah (715-687 B.C., reminding him that he, Sennacherib, had already captured practically every city of Judah, and how could the king think Jerusalem would escape? But by divine intervention, with God's assurance that the king would this time be kept from invasion, Sennacherib's host suffered a mysterious blight and he returned to Assyria without fulfilling his threat (II Kings 18 and 19; II Chron. 32; Isa. 36). For Sennacherib's own account of this episode, see Pritchard's NET 287, 288).

Another century passes during which we know very little of Jerusalem's history. In 605 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, forced into submission Judah's king Jehoiakim. After three years, the king of Judah foolishly revolted and this brought Nebuchadnezzar back to the city for its final destruction. Within the last few years, Mr. Donald J. Wiseman of the British Museum has translated and published the hitherto unknown tablets, officially recording Nebuchadnezzar's military exploits. As Wiseman says, we "now know precisely for the first time" the exact date of Jerusalem's capitulation, March 16, 597 B.C. The destruction was on a wholesale scale. It is estimated that some 60,000 citizens were carried away to Babylon at this time, and, of course, the remaining treasures of the temple were also removed, to be restored again in the days of Ezra (II Kings 24:1-25:21; II Chron. 36:1-21 and Jer. 52). As Jeremiah vividly reminds us, "The kings of the earth believed not, neither all the inhabitants of the world, that the adversary and the enemy would enter into the gates of Jerusalem" (Lam. 4:12). "The history of the ruined city remains a blank until Cyrus" (Conder).

Though the post-exilic books of Ezra and Nehemiah are filled with details regarding Jerusalem, we can only mention the two main events they record. Under Zerubbabel, the rebuilding of the temple by permission of Darius I was begun in 538, though, due to many forms of opposition, it was not finished until 516 B.C. Some 60 years later, Nehemiah, cupbearer of the King of Persia, Artaxerxes I, successfully undertook the rebuilding of the walls of the city (Neh. 1-6), followed by a great revival under the leadership of Ezra (Neh. 8-9). The condition of the city however, even under these great leaders, was not one marked by prosperity; somehow it had lost its attractiveness for the Jews, necessitating a vigorous effort to bring people into the city who were living in areas surrounding it (Neh. 11:1). For the next 100 years, we again know very little of Jerusalem's history.

Upon the death of Alexander the Great, the rulers of Egypt and the South were known as Ptolemies, and those of Syria and the North as the Seleucidae. In 320 B.C., Jerusalem came under the rule of Ptolemy I Soter. One hundred years later, the city passed from the Ptolemies to the Seleucidae. In the year 199, but only for a year, Palestine and Jerusalem were recovered for Egypt by Scopas, the last time Egypt was to possess this city. In 198 the powerful Antiochus III (the Great) took the city, welcomed by the Jews, who were repaid for this service by the Syrian king's presenting treasures to the temple. Any hope, however, on the part of the Jews that this would be the beginning of happier days for them, was soon seen to be unjustified. For in the next generation there appeared (169-168 B.C.) the very type of Anti-Christ himself, Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), who desecrated the temple by sacrificing a pig on the altar, prohibited Jewish sacrifices, circumcision, and the observance of the Sabbath, and issuing a decree that any Jew found possessing a copy of the Holy Scriptures should be killed, and great was the slaughter. (See the opening chapters of the First Book of Maccabees).

The events that now follow must be referred to with the greatest brevity. In 165, Jerusalem was delivered from its bitter yoke by Judas Maccabaeus on the 25th of the month Chisle (our month of December). Ever since, this time of deliverance has been celebrated by the Jews as Hanukkah, or the Feast of Lights. Two years later, Antiochus IV (Eupator) overthrew the walls and the temple, but soon thereafter the city again came into the hands of the Jewish authorities. But this did not mean peace. Jealousy and schism increased, until one of the Jewish leaders himself, Alexander Jannaeus, actually crucified 800 Pharisees!

The Romans now appear on the scene. The city was besieged in 65 B.C. by a Roman general, who, however, was ordered to desist, leaving the city open for the conquest by Pompey in 64 B.C., who destroyed Jerusalem's walls. The temple was again pillaged in 55 B.C. by Crassus. Fifteen years later the area was occupied by the Parthians. The hour had struck for the rise of that cruel but gifted ruler whose name will be prominent as the New Testament narrative opens, Herod the Great, made king of the Jews by Augustus in 40 B.C. He fought for the possession of the territory that had been given to him, but was not able to take Jerusalem until 37 B.C., after a siege of three months. Herod, like many other Romans, had a passion for erecting vast buildings, and out of this was born the determination to build what came to be known as Herod's Temple, probably the most significant structure ever to stand upon that holy site. He began its erection in 20 B.C., dying himself in 4 B.C., and not until 62 A.D. was the temple finished. In our Lord's day, it presented a spectacle before which even the disciples seem to stand in amazement (Matt. 24:1).

Entire books have been written, of course, on the single subject of Jesus and the city of Jerusalem. Here we can only summarize the relevant data. One is safe in saying that of the four Gospel writers, it is Luke who, though a Gentile, seems to have had the greatest interest in this city, so that the opening events of our Lord's life occurring here are exclusively in the third Gospel and many of the concluding events are here also alone recorded. We begin with the annunciation to Zacharias, a priest in the temple (Luke 1:5-22). Our Lord, when a babe, was taken up to Jerusalem for what is called His presentation (Luke 2:22-38). Luke alone records our Lord's visit to the city at the age of 12. The principal episodes down to the last year of our Lord's life are given exclusively by John. If we place the death of our Lord in A.D. 30, then in April A.D. 27, we have the first cleansing of the temple (John 2:13-25); on April 28 the healing of the man at the pool of Bethesda (John 5:1-47); on October 29 He goes up to Jerusalem at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles where we have a detailed record (John 7:2; 10:21); on December 29, He is in Jerusalem for the Feast of Dedication (Luke 10:38-42). Of course, as all know, the final week of our Lord's life was spent in and near the city (Matt. 27:1-27:66; Mark 11:1-15:47; Luke 19:29-23:56; John 12:12-19:42). Of the five appearances of our Lord on Easter Sunday, four of them are found only in Luke's Gospel (chap. 24). The sixth appearance in Jerusalem a week later is recorded only by John (20:26-29). In Jerusalem our Lord appeared to all the disciples (Acts 1:1-8 and Luke 24:49), and from the Mount of Olives nearby He ascended (Luke 24:50-53).

Our Lord made four principal statements about the city, all of them with a note of sadness. First of all, in stating that He must go up to Jerusalem He declared, "It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem" (Luke 13:33). On Tuesday of Holy Week, He cried out, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killeth the prophets, and stoneth them that are sent unto her! how oft would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" (Matt. 23:37). We are told by Luke that as He wept over the city. He said sadly, "If thou hadst known in this day, even thou, the things which belong unto peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes" (Luke 19:42). Finally, our Lord declared that the buildings of that city, and their very walls, would be thrown down, and that Jerusalem would be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled (Matt. 24:2; Mark 13:2; Luke 21:24).

The Book of Acts opens with a group of the followers of Jesus meeting together in an Upper Room in Jerusalem, probably the place where the Lord's Supper was held, waiting for the fulfillment of the promise of Christ, that they might be endued with power from on high. The church is born in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2). The early persecutions occurred in that city toward these initial believers, and the Sanhedrin that condemned Christ was now confronted with the phenomenon of a growing company of the faithful of the crucified and risen Lord. In this city, the first great crisis of the Church was successfully faced in the first Council, deciding forever the question of salvation wholly by grace, apart from works (Acts 15). Years later in this same city, the Apostle Paul was arrested, mobbed in the temple and falsely accused (Acts 21 and 22).

The destruction of the city, after a siege of 143 days by Roman armies, under the leadership of Titus, while predicted in the Gospels, is not, strange to say, actually recorded anywhere in the NT. Before this dreadful event concluded, 600,000 Jews were slain and thousands more were led away into captivity. "Jerusalem has no history for 60 years after its destruction" (C. R. Conder). One futile and tragic attempt of the Jews to win freedom from the Romans, concentrated in the rebellion of A.D. 134, led by the false Messiah Bar Cochba, was overwhelmingly crushed, and what was left of the city was leveled to the ground, even the foundations being plowed up. Two years later the Romans began the rebuilding of the city, now to be called Aelia Capitolina. From this new city, all Jews were strictly excluded for two centuries, until the reign of Constantine. In the early part of the fourth century, due to the fervent devotion of Helena, the mother of the emperor, concerning whom traditions soon multiplied regarding divine assistance given to her, leading to the discovery of the true cross, there was built the great Church of the Holy Sepulchre called Anastasis (the Greek word for resurrection). From now on, Jerusalem became increasingly the object of pilgrimages and of rich gifts. Jerome says, "It would be a long task to try to enumerate chronologically from the day of the ascension of our Lord until our own time, the bishops, martyrs, and doctors of the Church who came to Jerusalem, believing themselves to be deficient in religion, in science, and to possess only an imperfect standard of virtue until they had worshiped Christ on the very spot where the Gospel first shone from the gibbet."

For Jerusalem's subsequent history, we must give only the barest outline. What a tragic history still awaited this originally designated city of peace! In A.D. 614, a Persian general under King Chosroes II, seized the city and slaughtered 60,000 Christians, taking 35,000 more into slavery: "The devastation in and around the city was so vast that to this day the countryside has never fully recovered." Join-Lambert does not exaggerate in saying that this awful event "sounded the knell of Christian Jerusalem." In 628, Heraclius made peace with the son of the invader Chosroes, entering Jerusalem in triumph through the Golden Gate. In 637, the city capitulated to Omar the Caliph, who entered its precincts without bloodshed. In 688 the first Dome of the Rock was erected.

Mohammed, more or less acquainted with both the OT and NT, felt it was necessary to be in some way identified with this city, holy to both Jews and Christians, and Islam soon interpreted a passage in the Koran as implying that Mohammed was miraculously carried to Jerusalem and there divinely consecrated, a journey for which there is no real evidence whatever. In 969, Jerusalem fell under the power of the Shia'h Khalif of Egypt. In 1009, the Caliph Hakim, son of a Christian mother, began his devastating work in Jerusalem, by ordering the destruction of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. By 1014 some 30,000 churches in Palestine had been burnt or pillaged! "The persecution stopped (1016) only when Hakim became convinced that he himself was divine." In 1077 a general of the Seljuk Turks drove out the Egyptians, slaughtering some 3,000 residing within the walls.

A new era, pitiful, sad, and shameful, now dawns for Jerusalem. In 1099, the Christian Army of the First Crusade encamped before this city, on June 7. The city was seized on July 14, and the awful slaughter pursued by these so-called Christian knights was something that the Moslem world has never forgotten or forgiven. For 80 years, the city knew no other enemy at her gates. There then came upon the stage of history the truly great Saladin, who, after his overwhelming victory in his battle with the Crusaders at the Horns of Hattin, encamped before the city September 20, 1187. He entered in on the second of October, enforcing strict orders that no force of violence and orgy of conquest should be engaged in by his soldiers such as the Christian Crusaders had engaged in almost a century before. By this act of mercy he put the Christians to shame. But the city was not to know peace. In 1229, it was regained by Frederick II, through negotiations. In 1244 it fell before the Kharezmian Tatars; in 1247 it was seized again by the Egyptians; in 1260 it was recaptured by the Tatars; in 1517 it was seized by the Ottoman Turks, who held it for four centuries. Passing over the (for us) inconsequential events of the next 400 years, we come down to the first World War. General Allenby of the British forces entered the city on foot, December 9, 1917, and on October 31 of the next year, the armistice was signed, when 400 years of Turkish misrule came to an end. "Thus again, after more than seven centuries, was Jerusalem entered by a Christian conqueror. Not a stone of the city had been injured. Not a soldier was allowed to enter the city except on duty, until all sacred spots had been placed under guards consisting of men of the religions to which such spots were respectively sacred" (H. O. Lock: The Conquerors of Palestine, London, 1920, p. 108).

On April 24, 1920, the mandate for Palestine and Transjordan was assigned to Great Britain, and for nearly 30 years, she suffered one reverse after another in her attempt to rule this country. On May 14, 1948, the British mandate terminated, and the National Council at Tel-Aviv proclaimed the State of Israel. There followed the bitter, often brutal war for Palestine, as a result of which nearly a million Arabs were driven from their homes. At this time there were about 100,000 Jews in the city of Jerusalem, about ten per cent of all that there were in Palestine. By the spring of the next year, Israel was recognized by 45 governments.

Until Israel's war for independence, the city within the walls for centuries had been divided into nearly four equal quarters: on the SE the Jewish quarter, on the SW the Armenian, in the NE, the largest of the four areas, was the Moslem quarter, and in the NW the Christian quarter. There are, of course, no Jews living within the walls of Jerusalem today.

It may be that we are on the threshold of some great archaeological discoveries in Jerusalem. The city has never yet been thoroughly explored archaeologically, because of the many sacred sites which cannot be disturbed, and the hereditary holdings of great numbers of families who would hesitate to give permission for excavation. However, the British School of Archaeology is now about to begin serious excavation at the Western Hill, in an area destroyed during the War of Independence, and also near the north wall of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, all under the able direction of Dr. Kathleen Kenyon, for years the Director of the excavations carried on at Jericho.

Population. In 1830 it was said by those visiting the city that there were not 100 Jews living within the walls. In 1838, there were but 3,000 Jews in Jerusalem, and only 11,000 in all Palestine. In 1872 there was a slight proportionate gain — of 21,000 in all of Palestine, 10,600 were in Jerusalem. By 1900 there was further gain — of a population in the city of 46,500, there were 29,000 Jews, 8,500 Moslems and 9,000 Christians. In 1915 there were 50,000 Jews in the Holy City. Israel's War for Independence has radically altered this entire matter — in 1957, the old city, Jerusalem proper, had a population of 80,000, of whom none were Jews. The city of Jerusalem, Israel, to the N and W of the old city, in March, 1959, had a population of 156,000, with Tel Aviv-Jaffa far ahead, with 380,000. At that time the total population of Israel was 2,054,434.

Jerusalem in Prophecy. Though there are scores of prophecies in the Bible relating to cities, rivers, and nations, no Bible encyclopedia ever includes these matters in its articles on such geographical terms. Here it is possible to give only a bare summary of those pertaining to Jerusalem.

1. In Deuteronomy 12, though no name is mentioned, six times reference is made to the future place of the sanctuary, "the place which Jehovah your God shall choose" (See also I Kings 8:29, 48).

2. The promise that Sennacherib's attempt to capture the city would fail (Isa. 29:7; 30:19; 31:4, 5; II Kings 19:32-34).

3. Of the destruction of the city by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 22:16,17; 23:7; II Chron. 34:24,25; Isa. 4:3-5; 10:11,12; 22:9-11; 32:13-15; 34:8; 39:6; 64:10,11; Jer. 4:1-6,22,23; 7:14,32,34; 9:11,19; 11:6; 11-13; 13:9,13,27; 15:5; 16:1-21; 17:24-27; 19:8, etc.; 21:5,6,9,10; 22:4-9; 35:17; 38:2,17-23; Ezek. 8:9; 24, etc.).

4. The desecration of the city by Antiochus Epiphanes (Dan. 8:11-14; 11:30-32).

5. The destruction of the city by the Romans, under Titus (Dan. 9:26; Luke 13:33-35; 19:41-44; 21:6,20,24; Matt. 24:2; Mark 13:2).

6. A prophecy concerning this city during the present age (Dan. 9:26; Zech. 12:3; Luke 21:24). (A very remarkable passage).

7. The Jewish people at the end of this age will return to Palestine, and this, of course, includes Jerusalem sometimes specifically designated (Joel 3:1; Isa .49:22,23 [probably]). This includes the erection of some kind of temple in the Holy City (Dan. 9:27; 12:11; Jer. 31:8,9; Isa. 55:11; 60:1-3; Matt. 24:15; Mark 13:14; II Thess. 2:3,4).

8. The episode of the two witnesses, to be martyred in this city (Rev. 11).

9. A final assault upon this city by the nations of the earth (Joel 3:9-12; Isa. 29:1-7, 31-34; Zech. 14:1-3).

10. A cleansing of the city of its spiritual uncleannesses (Isa. 1:25,26; 4:3,4; Joel 3:17; Zech. 14:20,21).

11. A city that will ultimately know, and permanently, the presence of the glory of God (Ezek. 43:1,2; Isa. 62:2); peace (Ps. 122:6-9; Isa. 60:17; 66:12); and joy (Ps. 53:6; Isa. 5:11).

12. To this city the nations of the earth will come for instruction and blessing (Isa. 2:2-4; Ps. 102:21,22).

Jerusalem as a Term of Spiritual Connotation. There is no doubt about it that even in the OT, Jerusalem, especially when referred to as Zion, sometimes was used to express spiritual rather than geographical or historical ideas. In the NT such interpretations are twice recognized by the Apostle Paul, who in that enigmatical passage speaks of "Jerusalem that is above is free, which is our mother" (Gal. 5:26), and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in a passage that is also fraught with difficulties, tells these Hebrew Christians that they have already "Come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem" (12:22). The exalted conception of the yet-to-come New Jerusalem, as set forth in the Apocalypse, is well known to everyone (Rev. 3:12; 21:2 ff.).

The greater Church Fathers, such as Jerome, Chrysostom, Augustine, etc., almost unanimously interpreted Zion of the Psalms and Prophets (this is not defending this exegesis) as references to the Church, see, e.g., their interpretations of Psalm 48, as collected in J. M. Neale and R. F. Littledale: A Commentary on the Psalms: from Primitive and Mediaeval Writers II. 136-150). Even the Crusaders merged earthly and heavenly ideas in their determination to repossess the Holy Sepulchre. (See Ray C. Petry: Christian Eschatology and Social Thought, N. Y., 1956, pp. 123-132).

In the 14th century, wholly divorced from the earthly site, Walter Hylton (d. 1396), an Augustinian canon of Thurgarten in Nottinghamshire, wrote the once widely-read mystical Ladder of Perfection, in which the progress of the soul in this life is likened to a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

Above all is John Bunyan's (1628-1688) The Holy City; or, The New Jerusalem, which appeared in 1665, 13 years before the first part of the far more important Pilgrim's Progress. This is an allegorical treatment of Revelation 21:10-22:4

(one wonders why he omitted 21:1-9), and his interpretations would be accepted by very few today. The Holy City here is "the gospel church, returning out of her long and anti-Christian captivity." Thus, "the building of this wall, that is here spoken of, it must be understood of the recovering again the purity of those doctrines, in which the Lord Jesus, with all his benefits, is found and made ours, for our everlasting defense and safety."

Jerusalem in Christian Hymns. As early as the sixth (or, possibly, the seventh) century, a great hymn was created by the Latin Church, known by its first two lines as Urbs beata Hierusalem, dicta pacis visio, translated by J. M. Neale (1851) as Blessed City, heavenly Salem, Vision dear of peace and love (for full discussion, see John Julian: Dictionary of Hymnology, pp. 1198-1200).

A notable hymn, Jerusalem the Golden, is a part of one of the most important compositions of the later Middle Ages, De Contemptu Mundi, of Bernard de Morlaux (of Cluny), of the 12th century. The entire poem extends to some 3,000 lines, and is devoted to the subject of the advent of Christ to judgment, with the purpose of persuading men to have only contempt for the world. It is from the section beginning Hora novissima, that the great hymn Jerusalem the Golden derives. (See Julian 532-534. The entire work is translated by Henry Preble, with extensive notes, in the American Journal of Theology, 1906, X, 72-101, 286-308, 496-516. There was a critical edition published by H. C. Hoskier, 1929. See also J .M. Neale: The Rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix, Monk of Cluny, on the Celestial Country, London, 1859. The canto beginning Urbs Syon indyta, forms our hymn known as Hail Zion, City of Our God).

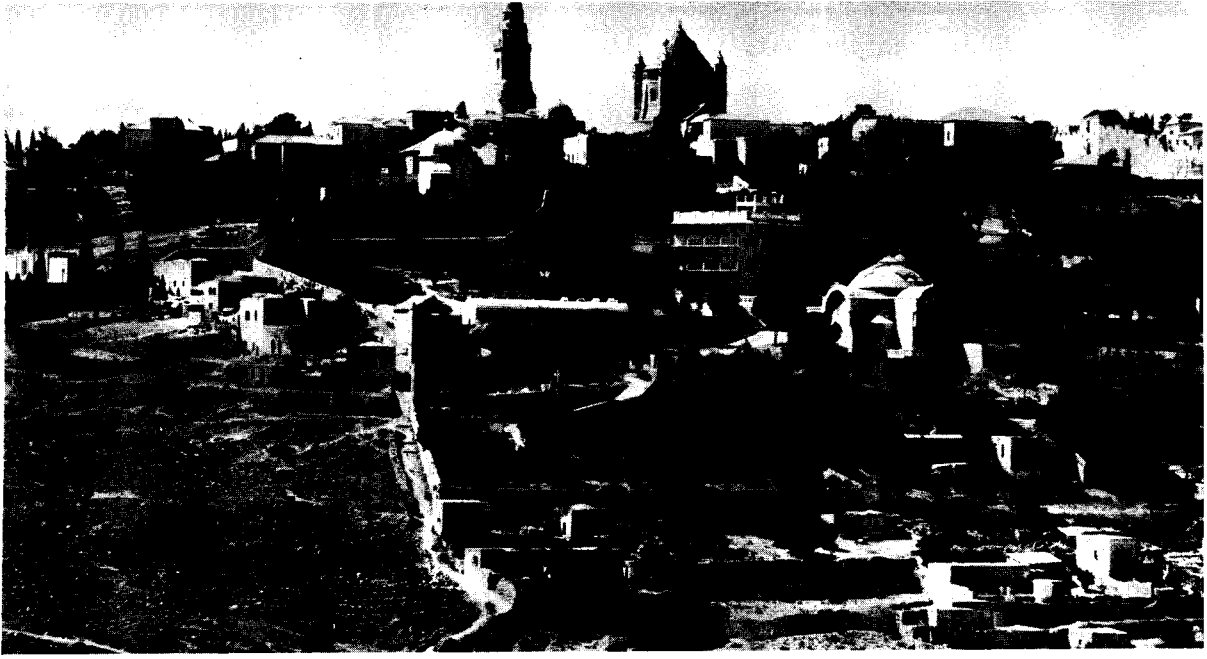
From a 15th century manuscript comes a less familiar hymn, Jerusalem luminosa, beginning, in the English form, Light's abode, Celestial Salem. (See Julian 579, 580).

The hymn Jerusalem My Happy Home, of about the beginning of the 17th century, by an unknown author, in its original form extended to 26 stanzas of four lines each. It began to appear in English hymn books as early as 1693, and from then on some of its stanzas may be found in almost all of the major hymn books of the Church. (See Julian 580-583; H. Bonar: New Jerusalem, 1852, etc. The well-known Jerusalem on High, by Samuel Crossman (1624-1684) was first published in 1664. John Newton's (1725-1807) universally used Glorious Things of Thee Are Spoken, first appeared in 1779. The lesser known Jerusalem, Jerusalem, enthroned once on high, was published in 1827 by Reginald Heber (1783-1826). The anonymous O Heavenly Jerusalem, first appearing in the Paris Brenary of 1822, was translated by I. Williams in 1839. Samuel Johnson (1822-1882), an American, joint author with Samuel Longfellow of A Book of Hymns for Public and Private Devotions (1846) was the author of City of God, how broad and fair (1864). (In Julian's Dictionary, pp. 1381, 1382, are listed 43 hymns whose first lines begin with the word Jerusalem (or Hierusalem, and, pp. 1454, 1504, thirty beginning with the words Sion or Zion, some of which refer to identical hymns).

Jerusalem in Poetry. In addition to the poetic compositions that have entered into the hymns of the Christian Church, there are many poems centered upon the history, or the hope, or the typical significance of the Holy City. By far the most famous is the Jerusalem Delivered by the gifted, though tragedy-beset Italian poet, Torquato Tasso, 1581 (1544-1595), translated into English by Edward Fairfax in 1594, in which love stories are romantically interwoven in his imaginary presentation of the episodes of the First Crusade. Possibly the best known one written in English is The Fall of Jerusalem: A Dramatic Poem, by the great ecclesiastical historian Henry Hart Milman (London, 1820. Reprinted in his Poetical Works, London, 1839. Vol. I, pp. 1-114; and, in part, in Geo. A. Kohut: A Hebrew Anthology, Part II, pp. 985-1034.)

For many others, worthy and mediocre, see Elon Foster: Cyclopaedia of Poetry, second ser. New York, 1884, pp. 259-275; and Henry C. Fish: Heaven in Song, New York, 1874, pp. 137-171, 180-184, 228-231, with two renderings of J. M. Meyfart's Jerusalem thou city fair and high, pp. 182-184 and 499-501; and the 16th century poem, O Mother Dear, Jerusalem! extending to 31 stanzas of eight lines each. Quite a number of poems on the subject of Jerusalem not found elsewhere, are in a treasury of good things, Lays of the Holy Land (second ed. New York, 1871). Lord Byron wrote on the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, beginning, "From the east hill that looks on thy once holy dome"; and Lord Tennyson also on the same tragic event, The Fall of Jerusalem in which are the lines, "Signs on earth and signs on high, Prophesied thy destiny." Kohut (Vol. I, pp. 474, 475), inserts a poem, "On Jerusalem," by Matthew A. Berk, and reprints Books X and XI from the Judaid, On the Destruction of Jerusalem (pp. 460-472), by Johnson Pierson.

Jerusalem in Art. Cities, as such, have never been a major theme in painting, and Jerusalem is no exception. Of the 750 items mentioned in the American Bible Society's The English Bible and British and American Art, only one painting on Jerusalem is mentioned (the one by Eastlake). Of course, there are a number of paintings of episodes in the life of Christ that occurred in the Holy City,



Mount Zion, as viewed from the east. At top center is the bell tower of the Church of Domitian, supposedly built over the tomb of David, and in right center is the Church of St. Peter. © MPS as Christ before the Doctors in the Temple, the Crucifixion, etc., but these do not emphasize the subject of the city as such.

There was a famous painting by Wilhelm von Kaulbach (1805-1874), The Destruction of Jerusalem, in the New Museum, Berlin, but it is not known where it might be today, since World War II. Also, on the same theme, one hung in the New Ponakothek, in Munich.

Sir C. L. Eastlake (1793-1866), president of the Royal Academy, and Director of the National Gallery, painted the well-known Christ Lamenting over Jerusalem; Thomas Seddon (1821-1856) who accompanied Holman Hunt to the Holy Land, 1853, devoted five months to his moving Jerusalem and the Valley of Jehoshaphat (see E. T. Cook: Popular Handbook to the Tate Gallery, L. 1898 pp. 51-55). A painting by Thomas Hovenden (1840-1895), Jerusalem the Golden, is in the Metropolitan Museum of Art; another, by F. E. Church (1826-1900), Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives, hangs in Cooper Union, New York City; and the Jerusalem of Kokoschka (1886-) hangs in the Detroit Institute of Arts.

Bibliography. The distinguished Dutch Biblical scholar, Dr. J. Simons, in his authoritative work mentioned below has well said, "The literature on the historical topography and archaeology of Jerusalem has assumed such proportions, that it may be considered a special province within the general science of Palestinology and is probably vaster than the combined literature on all other ancient Palestinian cities and sites" (p. 35, n. 3). For nearly half a century the great two-volume work by Dr. George Adam Smith: Jerusalem (L. 1907, 1908), was recognized as the best work covering the Biblical data, down to the destruction of 70 A.D. Much work has since been done, however, and for the Old Testament period, by far the most important work is the great quarto volume Jerusalem in the Old Testament, by J. Simons (Leiden, 1952, pp. XVI, 517, with 33 plates and 66 figures).

For volumes covering the history of the city to modern times, we must for the most part, still use such works as Besant and Palmer: History of Jerusalem (L. 1888); C. R. Conder: The City of Jerusalem (L. 1909); Lionel Cust: Jerusalem (L. 1924), and especially the more recent work Jerusalem, by Michel Join-Lambert, L., N.Y., 1958). There are excellent sections still worth reading in Baedeker's Syria and Palestine, third ed., London. 1893, pp. 19-93.

For specific periods one may consult Bevan: Jerusalem under the High Priests; Lewis B. Paton: Jerusalem in Bible Times, L. 1908; Guy L. Strange: Palestine Under the Moslems, L. 1890; Selah Merrill: Ancient Jerusalem, N.Y. 1908; G. Frederick Owen: Abraham to Allenby, Grand Rapids, 1939.

There are some very worth-while articles on Jerusalem in a number of encyclopedias, e.g., by G. A. Smith, in Encylopedia Biblica (II 1901, vols. 2408-2432); C. R. Conder, in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible (1899; II, 584-601); E. W. G. Masterman: Hastings: Dict. of Christ and the Gospels, (I, 849-859); Jewish Encyclopedia (N.Y., 1904 Vii, 118-157); by E. W. G. Masterman, in International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (1915 III, 1595-1621); more recently, Harper's Bible Dictionary, (New York, 1952, pp. 314-321); and, in the newly published Baker's Bible Atlas (Grand Rapids, 1961).

A remarkable work, not too well known in our country, published in Jerusalem in 1954, is Jerusalem the Saga of the Holy City, by various Jewish scholars. This is a quarto volume, which, in addition to 76 pages of text, contains 6 maps and 23 plates. Here are, for example, a view of Jerusalem in 1483, 13″ x 26″, in colors, with 104 sites located; a reconstruction of the city of Herod, with 60 sites indicated; a contour map of the Old City, in colors, 24″ x 29″, etc. W.M.S.

JERUSALEM, NEW, a name found twice in the Bible, Revelation 3:12 and Revelation 21:2. In both references the New Jerusalem is described as coming down out of heaven from God. In Revelation 21:2 it is also called "the holy city"; and in Revelation 21:10, "that great city, the holy Jerusalem." In Revelation 21:10-22:5 the city is described in material terms, as though it were literal. It is in the form of a cube, 1500 miles square; its walls are of jasper; its streets, of gold; the foundations of the walls are precious stones; its 12 gates are of pearls. For light it needs neither moon nor sun. A pure river of water of life flows through it; and in the midst of it there is the tree of life, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

Views on the nature of the city, whether it is literal or symbolic, and on when it comes into existence are legion. Hardly any two expositors fully agree, but, in general, there are two main views. Some hold that the city is a symbol of the ideal church as conceived in the purpose of God and to be fully realized in His own time. The Church, allegorically depicted by the city, is of course already in existence, but God's ideal for it will not be reached until the new age has been ushered in by the Lord's return. The great size of the city denotes that the church is capable of holding almost countless numbers. The fact that the city descends "out of heaven from God" means that it is the product of God's supernatural workmanship in the historic process of redemption. In support of this view it is said that in Revelation 21:9,10, when John is told that he would be shown the bride, the Lamb's wife, he is actually shown the New Jerusalem; and, moreover, as Jerusalem and Zion are often used for the inhabitants and faithful worshipers of Jehovah, so the new Jerusalem is symbolical of the church of God.

Those who look on the New Jerusalem as a literal city usually regard it as the eternal dwelling place of God — not as a special creation of God at the beginning of the Millennium, to be inhabited by the saints, first during the Millennium, and then, after the creation of the new heaven and new earth, throughout eternity. The city will, however, not be in sight during the Millennium, but will evidently be above the earthly Jerusalem. The saints in the city will have the privilege of seeing the face of God and of having His name upon their foreheads. Some expositors hold that the New Jerusalem as a literal city does not appear above Jerusalem during the Millennium: the description in Revelation 21:10-22:5 has reference to the eternal state. S.B.

JERUSHA, JERUSHAH (jē-rōō'shà, Heb. yerûsha', possessed, i.e., married), the wife of Uzziah, king of Judah, and mother of Jotham, his successor (II Kings 15:33; II Chron. 27:1). Her father's name was Zadok (I Chron. 6:12).

JESAIAH, JESHAIAH (jē-sā'yà, jē-shā'yà, Heb. yesha'yâh and yesha'yâhû, Jehovah saves). 1. A son of Jeduthun, and a musician in David's reign; he became the ancestral head of one of the courses of musicians (I Chron. 25:3,15).

2. A Levite, son of Rehabiah and ancestor of Shelemoth, one of David's treasurers (I Chron. 26:25).

3. A son of Hananiah, and grandson of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:21).

4. A son of Athaliah and descendant of Elam; he returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:7).

5. A descendant of Merari who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:19).

6. A Benjamite, the father of Ithiel (Neh. 11:7).

JESHANAH (jĕsh'à-nà or jē-shā'nà, Heb. yeshānâh, old), a town near Bethel, in Ephraim, captured by Abijah from the Northern Kingdom (II Chron. 13:19). It is probably the same as the Isanos of Josephus (Ant. XIV, xv, 12), and is represented by the modern 'Ain Sinia, 3¼ miles N of Bethel.

JESHARELAH (jĕsh'à-rē'là, Heb. yesar'ēlâh, meaning doubtful), the ancestral head of the seventh course of musicians (I Chron. 25:14), called Asarelah in Verse 2.

JESHEBEAB (jē-shĕb'ē-ăb, Heb. yeshev'āv, meaning uncertain), the ancestral head of the 14th course of priests (I Chron. 24:13).

JESHER (jē'shĕr, Heb. yēsher, uprightness), a son of Caleb (I Chron. 2:18).

JESHIMON (jē-shī'mŏn, Heb. hayeshîmōn, a waste, a desert). The word is often used as a common noun to refer to the desert of Sinai (Deut. 32:10; Ps. 78:40; 106:14; Isa. 43:19, etc.), and is usually translated "desert." Sometimes it is used as a geographical term, and probably refers to two different districts. 1. The "desert" in the Jordan Valley, NE of the Dead Sea, which was overlooked from Pisgah (Num. 21:20; 23:28). This is a bare, salty land without any vegetation.

2. The sterile plateau into which David retired before Saul. It was near Ziph and Maon, SE of Hebron. It refers to the eastern section of the Judean hills, which stretch toward the Dead Sea. For most of the year it is bare of vegetation. Its chalky hills have always been the home of outlaws (I Sam. 23:19,24; 26:1,3).

JESHISHAI (jē-shĭsh'ā-ī, Heb. yeshîshay, aged), a Gadite, descended from Buz (I Chron. 5:14).

JESHOHAIAH (jĕsh-ō-hā'yà, Heb. yeshôhāyâh, meaning unknown), a prince in Simeon (I Chron. 4:36).

JESHUA, JESHUAH (jĕsh'ū-à, Heb. yēshūa', another form of Joshua, Jehovah is salvation). 1. A name used once for Joshua, the son of Nun (Neh. 8:17).

2. Name of the head of the ninth of the 24 courses of priests (I Chron. 24:11).

3. The name of a family of Pahath-moah, which returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11).

4. A Levite in charge of the distribution of tithes in Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 31:15).

5. The high priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7, called "Joshua" in Haggai 1:1 and in Zech. 3:1ff). He helped to rebuild the altar (Ezra 3:2,8) and the house of God (Ezra 4:3; 5:2).

6. A Levitical family with oversight of the workmen in the temple (Ezra 2:40; 3:9; Neh. 7:43). It also assisted in explaining the Law to the people (Neh. 8:7), in leading in the worship (Neh. 9:4), and in sealing the covenant (Neh. 10:9). From the last passage, it appears that Jeshua was the son of Azaniah.

7. A post-Exilic town in the S of Judah (Neh. 11:26). It is identified with Tell es-Sa'weh and may be the same as the Shema of Joshua 15:26.

JESHURUN, JESURUN (jĕsh'ū-rŭn, jĕs'ū-rŭn, Heb. yeshūrûn, upright one), a poetical or ideal title of Israel. Except in Deuteronomy 32:15, where it is used in reproach of Israel, because it had departed from its moral ideal, it is always used as a title of honor (Deut. 33:5,26; Isa. 44:2).

JESIAH (jē-sī'à, Heb. yishshîyâh). I Chronicles 23:20. See ISSHIAH.

JESIMIEL (jē-sĭm'ī-ĕl, Heb. yesîmi'ēl, God establishes), a prince of Simeon (I Chron. 4:36).

JESSE (jĕs'ē, Heb. yishay, meaning uncertain), son of Obed, of the family of Perez. He was descended from Nahshon, chief of the tribe of Judah in the days of Moses, and was the grandson of Boaz, whose wife was Ruth the Moabitess (Ruth 4:18-22). From his descent and from the fact that when Saul pursued David he entrusted his parents to the care of the king of Moab (I Sam. 22:3,4), we can assume that he was the chief man of his village. He had eight sons, of whom the youngest was David (I Sam. 17:12-14), and two daughters, the latter being by a different wife from David's mother (I Chron. 2:16; cf. II Sam. 17:25). Jesse lived at Bethlehem, and probably had land outside the town wall, like Boaz. When Samuel went to Jesse to anoint a king from among his sons, neither of them at first discerned God's choice. Jesse had not even thought it worth while to call his youngest son to the feast (I Sam. 16:11). He is almost always mentioned in connection with his son David. After Saul had quarreled with David, he usually called him the son of Jesse (I Sam. 20:31; 22:7; 25:10), undoubtedly in derision of David's relatively humble origin. We are not told when Jesse died. The contrast between his small beginnings and future glory is brought out in Isaiah 11:1,10 and Micah 5:2.

JESUI (jĕs'ū-ī). 1. A son of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:44; I Chron. 7:30).

2. A son of Saul (I Sam. 14:49).

JESUS, JESUS CHRIST (See Christ)

JETHER (jē'thêr, Heb. yether, abundance, excellence). 1. In Exodus 4:18 for Jethro, father-in-law of Moses (see KJVm).

2. Gideon's eldest son (Judg. 8:20,21), who was asked by his father to slay the captives, Zebah and Zalmunna, but he shrank from doing so, and thus they escaped the shame of dying at the hands of a boy.

3. The father of Amasa, Absalom's commander-in-chief (I Kings 2:5). According to I Chronicles 2:17, he was an Ishmaelite.

4. A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:32).

5. A Judahite, the son of Ezrah (I Chron. 4:17).

6. A man of Asher, apparently the same as Ithran, son of Zophah (cf. I Chron. 7:37 with vs. 38).

JETHETH (jē'thĕth, Heb. yethēth, meaning unknown), a clan chieftain of Edom (Gen. 36:40; I Chron. 1:51).

JETHLAH (jĕth'là, Heb. yithlâh, a hanging or lofty place), a town of Dan (Josh. 19:42), about three miles E of Yalo (Aijalon).

JETHRO (jĕth'rō, Heb. yithrô, excellence), a priest of Midian and father-in-law of Moses (Exod. 3:1). Reuel, which means friend of God, seems to have been his personal name (Exod. 2:18; 3:1), and Jethro, his honorary title. When Moses fled from Egypt to Midian, he was welcomed into the household of Jethro because of his kindness to the priest's seven daughters, whom he helped water their flocks. Moses married Zipporah, one of the daughters, and kept his father-in-law's flocks for about 40 years (Exod. 3:1,2). After the Lord commanded Moses to return to Egypt to deliver the enslaved Israelites, Jethro gave him permission to depart. Moses took with him his wife Zipporah and their two sons (Exod. 4:18-20), but later sent the three back temporarily to stay with Jethro. After the deliverance from Egypt, before the Israelites reached Sinai, Jethro came to see Moses, bringing back to him his daughter and her two sons (Exod. 18:1-7). We are told that he "rejoiced for all the goodness which Jehovah had done to Israel," and offered a burnt offering to Jehovah. When he saw how occupied Moses was in deciding disputes among his people, he suggested the appointment of judges of various grades to help him dispose of cases of minor importance. Moses acted on his advice. Thereafter, Jethro returned to his own country.

JETUR (jē'tĕr, Heb. yetûr, meaning uncertain), a people descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; I Chron. 1:31). The 2½ tribes warred against this clan (I Chron. 5:18f). They are the Itureans of NT times.

JEUEL (jē-ū'ĕl, Heb. ye'û'ēl, meaning unknown). 1. A man of Judah who with 690 of his clan lived at Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:6).

2. A Levite who took part in the reformation under Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:13).

3. A leader of Ezra's company (Ezra 8:13, Jeiel in KJV).

JEUSH (jē'ŭsh, Heb. ye'ûsh, he comes to help). 1. A son of Esau by his wife Oholibamah (Gen. 36:5).

2. A Benjamite, son of Bilhan (I Chron. 7:10).

3. A Gershonite Levite (I Chron. 23:10,11).

4. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:39, Jehush KJV).

5. A son of Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:19).

JEUZ (jē'ŭz, Heb. ye'ûts, he counsels), a Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (I Chron. 8:10).

JEW (Heb. yehûdî, Gr. Ioudaios, Lat. Iudaeus). This word does not occur before the period of Jeremiah in OT literature. Originally it denoted one belonging to the tribe of Judah or to the two tribes of the Southern Kingdom (II Kings 16:6; 25:25), but later its meaning was extended, and it was applied to anyone of the Hebrew race who returned from the Captivity. As most of the exiles came from Judah, and as they were the main historical representatives of ancient Israel, the term Jew came finally to comprehend all of the Hebrew race throughout the world (Esth. 2:5; Matt. 2:2). As early as the days of Hezekiah the language of Judah was called Jewish. In the OT the adjective applies only to the Jews' language or speech (II Kings 18:26,28; Neh. 13:24; Isa. 36:11,13). In the Gospels "Jews" (always pl.) is the usual term for Israelites; and in the NT Jews (Israelites) and Gentiles are sometimes contrasted (Mark 7:3; John 2:6; Acts 10:28). Paul warns against "Jewish fables" in Titus 1:14, and speaks of the "Jews' religion" in Galatians 1:13,14. S.B.

JEWEL, JEWELRY. Orientals are much more given to adorning themselves with jewelry than Occidentals. This was true in ancient times as well as now. There are consequently many allusions to jewelry in Scripture. Among the articles of jewelry in OT times were diadems, bracelets, necklaces, anklets, rings for the fingers, gold nets for the hair, pendants, head-tire gems, amulets and pendants with magical meanings, jeweled perfume and ointment boxes, and crescents for camels. Many were acquired as booty in war. Many were personal gifts, especially at betrothals. At the court of every king there were special quarters for goldsmiths, and silversmiths were a familiar sight in the silver markets of large cities. Jewelry was used not only for personal adornment and utility, but also for religious festivals. Custom required the use of rich, festal garments and a gorgeous display of jewelry when approaching the deity. When the worship was over, they were taken off. What became of all these jewels? Many were buried in the ground for safekeeping in time of war and were never recovered; others were carried away as booty by conquerors. A surprisingly large number have been unearthed

Among the oldest jewels discovered in Bible lands are those found in 1927 by the archaeologist Sir Leonard Woolley in the Sumerian city of Ur, the heathen city which Abraham left for the Promised Land. In his excavations he found a hoard of jeweled wealth in the royal tombs, in which Queen Shub-ad, her husband, and her faithful court had been buried about 2500 B.C. Buried with the queen were 68 court ladies who in full regalia had walked alive into the tomb and had sat in orderly rows to die, thus showing their loyalty to her. In the royal tombs were found the queen's personal ornaments, including her diadem, a cape of polished gold and precious stones, rings, seals, earrings, amulets, and pins of gold. With the court ladies were found hair ribbons made of fine beaten gold. Ancient Sumerian artists were capable of producing filigree work with gold at least equal in delicacy with the best done by goldsmiths today.

The servant of Abraham, sent to Mesopotamia to find a bride for Isaac, gave to Rebekah after she had watered his camels an earring and two bracelets made of gold; and at her betrothal to Isaac gave her also jewels of silver and of gold, and to others in the family he also gave precious things (Gen. 24:22,30,53).

When the Israelites left Egypt with Moses, "they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold" (Exod. 12:35). Not much later, while Moses was on Mount Sinai receiving the law, they took the golden earrings worn by men and women and gave them to Aaron to make a golden calf (Exod. 32:2-4). As evidence of their repentance, they were commanded by Moses to strip themselves of their ornaments (Exod. 33:4-6). For the building of the first tabernacle, the people contributed, at Moses' request, bracelets, earrings, rings, tablets, and jewels of gold (Exod. 35:22).

Exodus 39 gives a description of the official garments of the Jewish High Priest, worn when discharging his peculiar duties. They were gorgeous in their jeweled splendor. The robe of the ephod, a long, blue, sleeveless garment, was adorned below with a fringe of alternate pomegranates and bells of gold. Over the robe of the ephod there was worn the ephod, a shorter, richly-embroidered vestment intended for the front and back of the body. It was made of two parts clasped together at the shoulders by onyx stones. Over the ephod there was a breastplate, described as square, made of gold thread and fine twisted linen, set with four rows of precious stones, three in a row, each inscribed with the name of a tribe of Israel. The first row was a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle; the second, an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond; the third, a ligure, an agate, and an amethyst; and the fourth, a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper. Each stone was set in a gold mounting. Golden chains and rings fastened the breastplate to the ephod of the priest at his shoulders and to the blue lacers of the woven bands. The miter was surmounted by a crown of pure gold, on which was attached a gold plate engraved with the words, "Holiness to the Lord."

In the period of the judges, Gideon, after turning down the offer of kingship, requested that every man cast into a spread garment all the gold earrings, crescents, necklaces, and camel chains captured from the Midianites. With these he made an ephod, which later became a snare to Israel when the people came to regard it idolatrously (Judg. 8:24-27).

Until about 1000 B.C. gold and silver were not common in Palestine, and even iron was so scarce that jewelry was made of it for kings. Archaeology has uncovered comparatively little indigenous Palestinian art. Fragments of jewelry that have been found in excavated palaces of kings is the work of imported artists. Such finds have been made at Megiddo, a fortress-city guarding the Plain of Esdraelon which was destroyed in the period of the judges.

David accumulated a large mass of jewels, mostly gotten in conquests against Syrians, Moabites, Ammonites, Amalekites, and Philistines. All these he dedicated to Jehovah (II Sam. 8:7,8) and passed on to Solomon for the building of the temple in Jerusalem. When his nobles saw what he was donating, they brought for the same purpose gold, silver, brass, and iron; and the common people added what they could (I Chron. 28). We are told that in the reign of Solomon gold was "not anything accounted of" (II Chron. 9:20), and silver was as abundant as stones around Jerusalem. The Queen of Sheba brought to Solomon gold and precious stones. The throne of Solomon was overlaid with gold; the steps leading to it were of gold; his footstool was of gold; his drinking cups were all of gold; and "all the vessels of the house of the forest of Lebanon were of pure gold" (II Chron. 9:20). In the succeeding reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel both monarchs and people gave increasing regard to accumulations of jewelry. Repeatedly OT prophets warned the Israelites that apostasy would be punished with the loss of their gems (Ezek. 23:26).

Not a great deal is said about jewelry in the NT, and what is said is mostly condemnatory. Jesus twice mentioned jewels, in the parable of the pearl merchant and in the saying about casting pearls before swine. Paul exhorts Christian women not to rely for adornment upon "broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array" (I Tim. 2:9). James warns his readers not to give preference to a man who comes into their assembly with a gold ring and fine apparel, as though he were better than a poor man (James 2:2). In the Revelation of John the destruction of Babylon is described in terms of merchants who can no longer sell "merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls" (Rev. 18:12). The New Jerusalem is described in Revelation 21 as having a wall of jasper, and the foundations of the walls are garnished "with all manner of precious stones" (Rev. 21:19)—jasper, sapphire, chalcedony, emerald, sardonyx, sardius, chrysolyte, beryl, topaz, chrysoprasus, jacinth, and amethyst — a list recalling the list of precious stones in the breastplate of the High Priest. S.B.

JEZANIAH (jĕz-à-nī'à, Heb. yezanyāhû, probably Jehovah hears), a captain of the forces, son of Hoshaiah, a Maacathite. He lived at the time of the fall of Jerusalem. II Kings 25:23; Jeremiah 40:7,8; 42:1.

JEZEBEL (jĕz'ĕ-bĕl, Heb. 'îzevel, meaning uncertain, perhaps unexalted, unhusbanded). 1. Daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and queen of Ahab, king of Israel (c. 874-853 B.C.) She had been brought up a zealous worshiper of Baal, and as the queen of Ahab she not only continued her ancestral religion, but tried to impose it upon the people of Israel. To please her, Ahab built a temple and an altar to Baal in Samaria (I Kings 16:32). Four hundred fifty prophets of Baal ate at her table (I Kings 18:19). She slew all the prophets of Jehovah on whom she could lay her hands (I Kings 18:4-13). When she was told of the slaughter of the prophets of Baal by Elijah, she threatened his life, and he was obliged to flee. In II Kings 9:7 we are told that the slaying of Ahab's family was a punishment for the persecution of the prophets of Jehovah by Jezebel. Later, she secured Naboth's vineyard for Ahab by causing its owner to be judicially murdered (I Kings 21). When Elijah heard of this crime, he told Ahab that God's vengeance would fall upon him and that dogs would eat Jezebel's body by the wall of Jezreel. The prophecy was fulfilled when, 11 years after the death of Ahab, Jehu executed pitiless vengeance upon the royal household. Jezebel painted her face and attired her head, and standing at an open window taunted him for being his master's murderer. Jehu asked those who were on his side to throw her down, and this was unhesitatingly done by some eunuchs. Jehu drove over her body with his chariot, and her blood spattered the horses and the wall. Later he gave directions that she be buried, but it was found that dogs had left nothing of her but the skull, the feet, and the palms of the hands (II Kings 9:7,30-37).

2. In Revelation 2:20, in the letter to Thyatira, we read of "the woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess," and led some members of the Christian Church there to commit spiritual fornication. This may be a symbolic name, given because of a resemblance between her and the idolatrous wife of Ahab. S.B.

JEZER (jē'zĕr, Heb. yetser, form, purpose), a son of Naphtali, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49; I Chron. 7:13).

JEZIAH (jē-zī'à, Heb. yizzîyâh, Jehovah unites), a faithful Jew of the family of Parosh who was one of those who put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25).

JEZIEL (jē'zĭ-ĕl, Heb. yezû'ēl, meaning uncertain), a Benjamite, son of Azmaveth, who became one of David's recruits at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

JEZLIAH (jĕz-lī'à, Heb. yizlî'âh, Jehovah delivers), a son of Elpaal, of the tribe of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:18).

JEZOAR (jē-zō'ĕr, Heb. yitshār, the shining one), a man of Judah, family of Hezron, son of Ashur (I Chron. 4:5-7).

JEZRAHIAH (jĕz-rà-hī'à, Heb. yizrahyâh, Jehovah appears, or shines). 1. A descendant of Issachar, family of Tola, and son of Uzzi (I Chron. 7:3).

2. The leader of the singing at the purification of the people in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42).

JEZREEL (jĕz'rē-ĕl, jĕz'rēl, Heb. yizre'e'l, God soweth). 1. A city on the border of the territory of Issachar (Josh. 19:18), not far from Mount Gilboa. The Israelites made their camp near it before the battle of Gilboa (I Sam. 29:1), its people remaining faithful to the house of Saul. Abner set Ishbosheth over it among other places (II Sam. 2:9). Ahab built a palace there (I Kings 21:1), and his son Joram also lived there (II Kings 8:29). Naboth was a Jezreelite, and he was stoned outside the city for refusing to give up his vineyard to Ahab (I Kings 21). Jehu ordered that the heads of Ahab's 70 sons be placed in heaps at the gate of Jezreel (II Kings 10:1-11). Jezebel met her death by being thrown from a window of the palace in Jezreel, and it was there that her body was eaten by dogs (II Kings 9:30-35). Jezreel was the scene of the meetings between Elijah and Ahab (I Kings 21:17ff).

From the time of the Crusades the site of Jezreel has been identified with the modern village, Zer'in, on the northwestern spur of Gilboa, but this identification is now questioned because excavations have failed to reveal any evidence of Israelite occupation in ancient times. From Jezreel there was a splendid view of the plain reaching toward the Jordan (Josh. 17:16; Hos. 1:5). Throughout history it has been a battlefield of nations. In the OT the term "valley of Jezreel" is applied to this valley, and not to the great plain immediately N of Carmel which is better known as the Plain of Esdraelon or the Plain of Megiddo.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah from which David obtained his wife Ahinoam the Jezreelitess (I Sam. 25:43; 27:3).

3. A descendant of Judah (I Chron. 4:3).

4. A son of the prophet Hosea, so called because God had declared that He would avenge the blood of Jezreel on the house of Jehu (Hos. 1:4,5).

JIBSAM (jĭb'săm, Heb. yivsām, fragrant), a descendant of Issachar, family of Tolah (I Chron. 7:2).

JIDLAPH (jĭd'lăf, Heb. yidhlāph, perhaps he weeps), a son of Nahor and Milcah, and the ancestral head of a Nahorite clan (Gen. 22:22).

JIMNA (jĭm'nà, Heb. yimnâh, probably good fortune), a son of Asher (Num. 26:44).

JIPHTAH (jĭf'tà, Heb. yiphtāh), an unidentified town in the Shephelah of Judah. It is named with Libnah, Ether, and Ashan (Josh. 15:43).

JIPHTHAH-EL (jĭf'thà-ĕl, Heb. yiphtah'ēl), the valley of Iphthah-el lay on the N border of Zebulun (Josh. 19:14,27). It is probably to be identified with the modern Tell Jefat, nine miles NW of Nazareth.

JOAB (jō'ăb, Heb. yô'āv, Jehovah is father). 1. The second of the three sons of Zeruiah, the half-sister of David, the other two being Abishai and Asahel (II Sam. 8:16; I Chron. 2:16). He first appears in public life in the narrative of David's war with Ishbosheth for the throne left vacant by Saul's death. He was David's captain of the host, while Abner led the forces of Ishbosheth. When the two armies met, a tournament took place between 12 men from each side, followed by a general engagement in which, after Joab's men were routed, Asahel was killed in his pursuit of Abner (II Sam. 2:12-32). When Abner transferred his allegiance to David, Joab treacherously slew him, with the connivance of Abishai, for killing Asahel at the battle of Gibeon, although Abner had done so in self-defense. David declared himself innocent of this murder, and after composing a lament for Abner, commanded that there be a period of public mourning for the dead man (II Sam. 3:31). David pronounced a curse upon Joab and his descendants, but he did not bring him to justice, perhaps because he was politically too weak to do so.

Joab was made the commander of all David's armies as a reward for his being the first to enter the fortress on Mount Zion when that stronghold was assaulted. In the war against the Ammonites, which was declared when David's ambassadors to the king had been maltreated, Joab achieved a great victory, utterly routing the enemy (II Sam. 10:1-14; I Chron. 19:1-15); and after a resumption of this war he called for David to storm the town of Rabbah, which he himself had successfully besieged, in order that David might have the credit for the victory (II Sam. 11:1; 12:26-29). It was during this war that David got Joab to put Uriah in the forefront of a battle that he might be killed and David be free to marry Bathsheba (II Sam. 11:6-27).

Joab again attempted to have Absalom restored to royal favor after a three year banishment because of the murder of his brother Amnon. He arranged for a "wise woman" of Tekoa to bring to David an imaginary complaint about a son of hers who had killed his brother and whose life was now sought, a story paralleling David's own experience with Absalom. David saw in the story a rebuke of his own treatment of Absalom, and gave permission to Absalom to return to Jerusalem, although he was to remain in his own house and was not allowed to see his father (II Sam. 14:1-24). Joab resisted Absalom's attempts to get him to intercede with his father for a complete restoration, until his barley field was set on fire by the prince (II Sam. 14:28-33). Joab then got David to receive his son back into the royal home.

When Absalom revolted, he made Amasa, another nephew of David, general instead of Joab

(II Sam. 17:24f). Joab remained loyal to David, and when the king fled, pursued by Absalom, he led one of the three divisions of the royal forces and defeated the rebels. Informed that Absalom was caught in a tree by his hair, he first scolded his informer for not having killed him, and then himself killed the prince by thrusting three darts through his heart. When David gave vent to extravagant grief at the death of his rebel son, Joab sternly rebuked him (II Sam. 19:1-8).

On David's return to Jerusalem, Joab was replaced as captain of David's forces by Amasa. Shortly after this, Sheba, a Benjamite, led a revolt against David; and when Amasa took more time than was deemed necessary to prepare to quell it, David asked Abishai to take the field. Joab seems to have gone with him. The two met Amasa at Gibeon, and there Joab, on pretense of kissing his rival, slew him. He then assumed command of Amasa's men, besieged Sheba in Abel of Bethmaachah, and arranged with a woman of the city to deliver to him the head of Shebah. Thus ended the revolt.

Joab was opposed to David's suggestion of a census, but eventually carried it out, although he intentionally did the work imperfectly (II Sam. 24: 1-9; I Chron. 21:1-6). He supported Adonijah in his claim to the throne, but deserted him on hearing that Solomon had been proclaimed king (I Kings 1:7,28-49). David on his deathbed made known that Joab should be brought to justice for the murders of Abner and of Amasa (I Kings 2:5). At the order of Solomon, Joab was slain as he clung to the horns of the altar in the court of the tabernacle. His slayer was Benaiah, chief of the bodyguard, who became his successor as head of the army. He was buried in his own house in the wilderness (I Kings 2:5,6,28-34).

2. Son of Seraiah and descendant of Kenaz of the tribe of Judah. He was father of the valley of Charashim, or valley of craftsmen (I Chron. 4:14).

3. Founder of a family of returned exiles (Ezra 2:6; 8:9; Neh. 7:11).

4. A village, apparently in Judah (I Chron. 2: 54, RV). In the KJV the name is rendered "Ataroth, the house of Joab." S.B.

JOAH (jō'ä, Heb. yô'āh, Jehovah is brother). 1. A son of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:4).

2. A Levite, son of Zimmah and a descendant of Gershom (I Chron. 6:21). He may be the Levite who helped in the religious reformation under King Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:12).

3. Son of Asaph and recorder under King Hezekiah (II Kings 18:18,26; Isa. 36:3,11,22). He was one of the three men sent by Hezekiah to speak to the Assyrian envoys at the siege of Jerusalem.

4. Son of Joahaz and recorder under King Josiah (II Chron. 34:8).

JOAHAZ (jō'ä-hăz, Heb. yô'āhāz, Jehovah has grasped), father of Joah, who was the recorder of King Josiah (II Chron. 34:8).

JOANNA (jō-ăn'ä, Gr. Ioána or Ioánna). 1. The wife of Chuza, Herod's steward. She was one of the women "which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities" who ministered to Jesus and His disciples of their substance during His Galilean ministry (Luke 8:2,3). Along with some other women, she accompanied Jesus from Galilee to Jerusalem. With them she prepared spices and ointments for His burial and went to the tomb with the intention of embalming the body of Jesus, and there received from the angels the message of the resurrection (Luke 23:55,56; 24:10).

2. An ancestor of Christ mentioned in Luke's genealogy (3:27). He lived about 500 B.C.

JOASH, I (jō'ăsh, Heb. yô'āsh, Jehovah has given), a shorter form of "Jehoash." 1. A man of Manasseh, and father of Gideon (Judg. 6:11,15). Although Gideon says that the family was the poorest in Manasseh, Joash was undoubtedly a man of substance, as Gideon was able to command ten servants to destroy the altar of Baal and the Asherah (Judg. 6:27,34). Even though the altar had been erected by Joash, he refused to hand over his son to punishment for the sacrilege, declaring that if Baal was really a god, he should avenge himself (Judg. 6:11-32).

2. A son of Ahab (I Kings 22:26; II Chron. 18:25). Ahab handed Micaiah the prophet over to the custody of Joash and Amon.

3. A Benjamite of Gibeah who joined David's recruits at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

4. A man of Judah, family of Shelah (I Chron. 4:22).

5. Son of Ahaziah, king of Judah. When Joash was an infant, his father was murdered, and he too would have been slain along with the rest of the royal family, had not the late king's sister hidden him in the temple. In the seventh year he was brought out and crowned king. He reigned for 40 years. For the first part of his reign he was under the direction of the godly high priest, Jehoiada, but after the death of this wise and pious man, he led his people into idolatry. When Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, denounced this apostasy, Joash had him murdered. After a long illness, he was slain in his bed by his servants for the murder of Zechariah (II Kings 12:20; II Chron. 24:25).

6. Son of Jehoahaz, king of Israel. He began to reign c. 800 B.C., and reigned 16 years. Although he worshiped the two calves at Bethel and Dan, he had a high regard for Elisha the prophet, who told him that he was to gain three victories over the Syrians. Amaziah, the king of Judah, forced him into a battle at Beth-shemesh, in which Joash was victorious. When he died, he was succeeded by his son, Jeroboam II.

JOASH, II (jō'ăsh, Heb. yô'āsh, Jehovah has come to help). 1. A Benjamite, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

2. One of David's officers. He was in charge of the cellars of oil (I Chron. 27:28). S.B.

JOATHAM (jō'ä-thăm, Gr. Ioátham), the KJV for RV "Jotham" (Matt. 1:9). He was a king of Judah, the son of Uzziah.

JOB (jōb, Heb. 'iyôv, meaning uncertain). The formal kinship of Job is with eastern ḥokmây (wisdom) literature. Within the canon of the OT, the function of the wisdom books (cf. also Prov.,Eccl., and in a sense S. of Sol.) was to apply the foundational Mosaic revelation to the problems of human existence and conduct as they were being formulated in the philosophical circles of the world. A figure like Job, standing outside the Abrahamic-Mosaic administrations of the Covenant, was an ideal vehicle for Biblical wisdom doctrine, concerned as it was with the common ways and demands of God rather than His peculiarly theocratic government of Israel.

Even the approximate date of the anonymous author is uncertain. The events he narrates belong to the early patriarchal period, as is evident from features like Job's longevity, revelation by theophany outside the Abrahamic Covenant, the nomadic status of the Chaldeans, and early social and economic practices. But the question is: When was the Joban tradition transformed by the inspired author into the canonical book of Job?

Modern discussions of authorship and date are perplexed by critical doubts concerning the unity of the book. Most widely suspected of being interpolations into an original poem are the prologue-epilogue, the wisdom hymn (chap. 28), the discourse of Elihu (chaps. 32-37), and parts at least of the Lord's discourses (chaps. 38-41). The LXX text of Job is about one-fifth shorter than the Massoretic but the LXX omissions exhibit an editorial pattern of reduction. The argument for interpolations, therefore, leans primarily on internal considerations — language, style, alleged inconsistencies of viewpoint. Conservative scholars, however, agree that the internal evidence points compellingly to the book's integrity, though they of course allow for corruption in textual details.

Dates have been assigned by 20th century critics all the way from the Mosaic to the Maccabean ages. The early extreme is obviated by the nature of the development of the OT canon; the late extreme, for one thing, by the discovery among the Dead Sea Scrolls of fragments of a Joban manuscript in old Hebrew script. The majority of negative critics favor an Exilic or post-Exilic date. Conservatives favor the pre-Exilic era, especially the Solomonic age because Biblical hokmâ flourished then, and there are close affinities in sentiment and expression between Job and Psalms (cf. Pss. 88, 89) and Proverbs produced at that time. The same evidence indicates an Israelite identity for the anonymous author, conceivably one of Solomon's wisdom coterie (cf. I Kings 4:29-34). The theory that he was an Edomite has found little support; that he was Egyptian, still less.

Stylistic comparison of other ancient wisdom writings with Job reveals similarities but also Job's uniqueness. The dialogue form of Job is paralleled to an extent in Egyptian and Babylonian wisdom poetry, and the various individual literary genres employed in Job (psalms of lament and thanksgiving, proverb, covenant oath, etc.), were not novelties. Nevertheless, as a masterly blend of a remarkably rich variety of forms, within a historical framework, with exquisite lyric and dramatic qualities, and all devoted to didactic purpose, Job creates its own literary species. Of particular significance is the bracketing of the poetic dialogue within the prose (or better, semi-poetic) prologue and epilogue. This ABA structure is attested elsewhere (e.g., Code of Hammurabi, The Eloquent Peasant) and thus supports the book's integrity.

The Joban revelation is a reproclamation of the fundamental stipulation of the Covenant, a call for perfect consecration to the covenant Suzerain. This call is issued through a dramatization of a crisis in redemptive history. God challenges Satan to behold in Job the triumphing of divine grace. This faithful servant epitomizes the fulfillment of God's evangelical decree, which even in its initial enunciation had taken the form of an imprecatory challenge to the tempter (Gen. 3:15). By proving under fierce temptation the genuineness of his devotion to God, Job is to vindicate the veracity of his God as the author of redemptive promise and His sovereignty in putting enmity between His people and Satan. Prostrated by well-nigh total bereavement, he utters doxology. While hopelessly despondent and protesting passionately against what he interprets as an unjust divine sentence upon him, it is still to God that Job turns and cries. And he repentantly commits himself anew to his Lord, although the Voice from the whirlwind has offered neither explanation of the mystery of his past sufferings nor promise of future restoration from his desolation. By following the covenant way, Job shows himself ready by God's grace, and contrary to Satan's insinuations, to serve his Lord for nought.

The particular purpose of Job as hokmâ is to articulate this covenant concept in terms of the current discussions of eastern sages, indicating the religious perspective which must inform the philosophical quest; in short, to point the direction for a true apologetic for the faith. The doctrine of God as incomprehensible Creator and sovereign Lord is offered, therefore, not only as the fundamental reality man must reckon with as a religious being serving God amid the historical tensions of this life, but also as the presupposition he must start with as a philosophical being bent on the interpretative adventure. This enterprise is illustrated by the debate of Job and his friends over the problem of theodicy, and the folly of the traditional methodology founded on human observation and speculation is portrayed by the silencing of the trio who represent it. The book of Job identifies the way of the covenant with the way of wisdom (cf. 28:28) and so brings philosophy under the authority of divine revelation.

No comprehensive answer is given to the problem of suffering since theodicy is not the book's major theme; nevertheless, considerable light is afforded. In addition to the prologue's contribution is that of Elihu, who traces the mystery to the principle of divine grace; sufferings are a sovereign gift, calling to repentance and life. Moreover, impressive assurance is given that God as a just and omnipotent covenant Lord will ultimately visit both the curses and blessings of the covenant on His subjects according to righteousness. Especially significant are the insights Job himself attains into the role God will play as his heavenly vindicator, redeeming his name from all calumnies and his life from the king of terrors. Job utters in raw faith what progressive revelation elaborates in the doctrines of the eschatological theophany, resurrection of the dead, and final redemptive judgment. This vision does not reveal the why of the particular sufferings of Job or any other believer, but it does present the servants of God with a framework for hope. M.G.K.

JOBAB (jō'băb, Heb. yôvāv, to call loudly, howl).

1. An Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:29; I Chron. 1:23).

2. The second king of Edom. He was the son of Zerah of Bozrah (Gen. 36:33; I Chron. 1:44,45).

3. A king of Madon. He joined the northern confederacy against Joshua, but he and his allies were thoroughly defeated at the waters of Merom (Josh. 11:1; 12:19).

4. A Benjamite (I Chron. 8:9).

5. A Benjamite (I Chron. 8:18).

JOCHEBED (jŏk'ĕ-bĕd, Heb. yôkhevedh, Jehovah is glory), daughter of Levi, wife of Amram and mother of Moses (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59). She was a sister of Kohath, Amram's father (Exod. 6:20).

JOED (jō'ĕd, Heb. yô'ēdh, Jehovah is witness), a Benjamite, descended from Jeshaiah (Neh. 11:7).

JOEL (jō'ĕl, Heb. yô'ēl, Jehovah is God).

1. The Prophet. Joel the son of Pethuel is the author of the second of the Minor Prophets books. Concerning the man, his life and times we know nothing. His name, meaning "The Lord (Yahweh) is God," was a common one, for a dozen other persons mentioned in the OT bear it (see below).

The Book. The book of Joel is without the customary dating formula used by the prophets (Hos. 1:1; Amos 1:1) and nowhere indicates the date either of the ministry of the prophet Joel or of the writing of the book. Indirect references throughout the book have been claimed in support of dates which have differed from each other by as much as half a millennium.

Scholars who follow the traditional viewpoint believe the book to be pre-Exilic, written perhaps during the reign of the boy king Joash (837-800 B.C.), for the following reasons: 1. The enemies of Judah which are mentioned, the Philistines and Phoenicians (3:4), Egypt and Edom (3:19) are those of the pre-exilic period (II Kings 8:20-22; II Chron. 21:16,17) rather than the Assyrians and Babylonians who later molested Judah. 2. Amos seems to be acquainted with Joel's prophecies (3:16; cf. Amos 1:2; 3:18; cf. Amos 9:13). 3. The fact that the elders and priests are mentioned rather than the king would seem to point to the time of Joash's minority (II Kings 11:21). 4. The location of the book between two early prophets and its style, quite different from that of the post-Exilic prophets, have also been mentioned.

Many modern scholars believe the book to have been written much later, about 350 B.C. Others deny its unity and claim that the apocalyptic elements come from a time as late as 200 B.C. Thus it is claimed that Joel is the last OT prophetic book. Some arguments for the book's late date: 1. There is no reference to the northern kingdom, Israel. 2. The Greeks are mentioned in 3:6. This is believed by some to be a reference to the Seleucid line which ruled Palestine in the second century B.C. Even if the identification of the "Greeks" with the Seleucids is tenuous, it is felt that the Hebrews would hardly have known about the Greek people before the Exile. 3. References to the destruction of Jerusalem are detected in 3:1-3,17b. 4. Certain other arguments depend on a radical reconstruction of Israel's history and hardly need to be considered here.

The unity of the book may be taken for granted, since it is conceded by many radical critics today. The arguments for a late date are not too strong. In such a short book there need be no reference to the northern kingdom, and it is quite possible that the Hebrews may have known the Greeks at a time well before the Exile. It should be added that since the book makes no claim as to its date, this matter is not of primary importance. Locust plagues are frequent in the Near East and almost any such visitation would provide a background for this book.

The occasion of the book was a devastating locust plague. Those who have not experienced such a calamity can hardly appreciate its destruction. An article, with convincing photographic illustrations appeared in the National Geographic Magazine of December 1915, describing a locust attack on Jerusalem in that year. This description of a visitation similar to that which occasioned Joel's prophecy would provide an excellent background for understanding the book of Joel. The prophet, after describing the plague and its resulting chaos, urges the nation to repent of its sins and then goes on to predict a worse visitation, the future Day of the Lord.

Outline:

I. THE LOCUST PLAGUE AND ITS REMOVAL, 1:1-2:27.
   A. The plague of locusts, 1:1-20.
   B. The people urged to repent, 2:1-17.
   C. God pities and promises relief, 2:18-27.

II. THE FUTURE DAY OF THE LORD, 2:28-3:21.
   A. The Spirit of God to be poured out, 2:28-32.
   B. The judgment of the nations, 3:1-17.
   C. Blessing upon Israel following judgment, 3:18-21.

The book opens with a description of the locust plague in terms of a human army The locusts are like soldiers (2:7) and horses and chariots (2:4,5). Once the figures of speech are understood to be such, the description is extremely vivid and entirely in keeping with the OT figurative language. The locusts are called a "northern army" (2:20). Although locust plagues in Palestine do not ordinarily come from the north, invasions of these insects from that direction are not unknown, the last having occurred in 1915. This calamity is called "the day of the Lord" (1:15; 2:1). Some commentators regard this term, in its every occurrence in the Bible, as eschatological — describing the future troubles which are to usher in the Messianic day, or referring to that day itself. If this is the case, then Joel's locust plague is a type or picture of the day of the Lord. On the other hand, while this expression is usually eschatological, there is no reason why it must always be so. The context determines meaning, and it would seem that here Joel was referring to the locust visitation as a day of the Lord's judgment and destruction. If this insect invasion, stripping the land of its verdure and making it like a desert, is a day of the Lord, how much worse will be the final divine visitation against a sinful world?

In the second chapter Joel continues to describe the plague and to urge repentance. The verbs in 2:1-11 should be rendered in the present tense, as in the RSV, for an event taking place in the prophet's own time is being described. Evidently the people responded to Joel's message, for a section follows (2:18-27) full of comfort and promise of the renewal of the land. Here, too, should be noticed the more accurate rendering of the verbs in the RSV.

The second major theme of Joel's prophecy is introduced in 2:28: after the present trouble will come the future day of the Lord, a time of great trouble for the nations when Israel will be vindicated and the Messianic age of peace brought in. This frequent theme of OT prophecy is here presented with emphasis on the outpouring of the Spirit of God which will begin it (2:28,29). Then terrifying portents will appear (2:30,31) and Judah and Jerusalem will be delivered and the nations judged (3:1-21).

Joel's greatest contribution to Christian thought is his teaching of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit "on all flesh" (2:28). This prophecy is quoted by Peter in his Pentecostal sermon (Acts 2:14-21). The Holy Spirit came upon men in OT times to enable them to serve God acceptably (Judg. 6:34; 1 Sam. 16:13) and certainly He was in the world and dwelling in the saints then as now, although they had very little consciousness of this fact. But in a special way the new age was to be one of the Spirit (Isa. 32:15; Zech. 12:10; John 7:39). All of God's people would now be priests and prophets, for the ideal stated when the law was given but never achieved would now become actual (Exod. 19:5,6; I Pet. 2:9,10).

Other Joels in the OT: 2. Samuel's firstborn son (I Sam. 8:2; I Chron. 6:33).

3. A Simeonite prince (I Chron. 4:35).

4. A Reubenite chief (I Chron. 5:4,8).

5. A Gadite chief (I Chron. 5:12).

6. An ancestor of Samuel, of the tribe of Levi (I Chron. 6:36).

7. A chief of Issachar (I Chron. 7:3).

8. One of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:38).

9. A Levite (I Chron. 15:7,11,17; probably also mentioned in I Chron. 23:8; 26:22).

10. David's officer over half of Manasseh (I Chron. 27:20).

11. A Levite of Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 29:12).

12. A Jew who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:43).

13. A Benjamite overseer (Neh. 11:9). J.B.G.

JOELAH (jō-ē'lä, Heb. yô'ē'lâh, perhaps let him help), a son of Jeroham of Gedor. He was one of David's recruits at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:7).

JOEZER (jō-ē'zẽr, Heb. yô'ezer, Jehovah is help), one of David's recruits at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:6).

JOGBEHAH (jŏg'bē-à, Heb. yoghbehâh, lofty), a city in Gilead assigned to Gad (Num. 32:35; Judg. 8:11). It is represented today by Jubeihah, a village midway between Rabbath Ammon and es-Salt.

JOGLI (jŏg'lī, Heb. yoghlî, led into exile), father of Bukki, of the tribe of Dan (Num. 34:22).

JOHA (jō'hà, Heb. yôhā', meaning unknown). 1. A Benjamite, son of Beriah (I Chron. 8:16).

2. A Tizite, son of Shimri, and one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:45).

JOHANAN (jō-hā'năn, Heb. yôhānān, Jehovah has been gracious). 1. Son of Kareah, a captain who with his men submitted to Gedaliah, appointed by Nebuchadnezzar as governor over Judah (II Kings 25:22,23; Jer. 40:8,9). He warned Gedaliah of Ishmael's plot to murder him (Jer. 40:13,14); and when the governor paid no heed and was assassinated, he tried to avenge his death (Jer. 41:11-15). Against the advice of Jeremiah, he and other Jewish leaders led the remnant down into Egypt, taking Jeremiah with them.

2. The eldest son of King Josiah (I Chron. 3:15). He seems to have died young.

3. A son of Elioenai (I Chron. 3:24).

4. Father of the Azariah who was priest in Solomon's time (I Chron. 6:9,10).

5: A Benjamite recruit of David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4).

6. A Gadite recruit of David at Ziklag who was made a captain in David's army (I Chron. 12:12, 14).

7. An Ephraimite chief (II Chron. 28:12).

8. Son of Hakkatan, of the clan of Azgad. He was one of the men who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:12).

9. Son of Tobiah, the Ammonite, who married a Jewess in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 6:18).

10. Son of Eliashib. Ezra went to his chamber and, without food or drink, mourned for the sin of those who had contracted foreign marriages (Ezra 10:6).

11. A high priest, grandson of Eliashib (Neh. 12:22). The Jews at Elephantine appealed to him for help when their temple was destroyed in 411 B.C. (Elephantine Papyri). Josephus says that he killed his brother Jesus in the temple because he feared he might be superseded as high priest (Jos. Antiq. xi. 7,1).

JOHN (Gr. Ioánnes, from Heb. Yôhānān, Jehovah has been gracious), the name of five men in the NT, and of five others in the OT Apocrypha: 1. John the Baptist (q.v.).

2. The apostle, the son of Zebedee, and brother of James (see JOHN, THE APOSTLE).

3. John Mark (q.v.).

4. Father of Simon Peter (John 1:42; 21:15,17, called Jonas in KJV).

5. A relative of Annas the high priest who took part with Annas, Caiaphas, Alexander, and other kindred of Annas in calling Peter and John to account for their preaching about Jesus (Acts 4:6).

6. Father of Mattathias, who started the Maccabean revolt against the Syrians (I Macc. 2:1).

7. Eldest son of Mattathias. He was surnamed Gaddis, and slain by the children of Jambri (I Macc. 9:36).

8. Father of Eupolemus (I Macc. 8:17). He was sent on a mission to Rome to establish friendly relations (II Macc. 4:11).

9. John Hyrcanus, son of Simon, and nephew of Judas Maccabaeus. He was civil governor and high priest from 135 to 105 B.C. (I Macc. 13:53; 16:1).

10. One of the envoys sent to treat with Lysias (II Macc. 11:17).

JOHN, THE APOSTLE. The sources for the life of John are relatively meager. All that exists is what is found in the NT and what has been preserved by tradition. One can, therefore, give no more than a fragmentary account of his life. He was the son of Zebedee, and brother of James the apostle, who was put to death by Herod Agrippa I about A.D. 44 (Matt. 4:21; Acts 12,1,2). It may be reasonably inferred that his mother was Salome (cf. Matt. 27:56 with Mark 15:40) and that she was the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Jesus and John would then have been cousins. The family lived in Galilee, probably at Bethsaida. The father and the two sons were fishermen on the Sea of Galilee (Mark 1:19,20). There are reasons for thinking that the family was not without some means. They had hired servants, and thus belonged to the employer class. Salome was one of the women who ministered to Jesus of their substance (Luke 8:3; Mark 15:40), and was also one of the women who bought spices and came to anoint the body of Jesus (Mark 16:1). The fact that John knew the high priest well enough to gain entrance to the court where Jesus was tried and could get permission for Peter to enter also suggests that the family was not exactly poor.

John is first introduced as a disciple of John the Baptist (John 1:35). He had therefore heeded the Baptist's call to repentance and baptism in preparation for the coming of the Messiah. How long he had been a follower of the Baptist is not known. In his Gospel he tells how he first met Jesus and became His disciple (1:35-39). One day as he stood with Andrew and John the Baptist, he heard his master say, as Jesus walked by, "Behold, the Lamb of God!" The two disciples of John immediately followed Jesus, and when they were asked what they wanted, they said they wanted to know where Jesus was staying. He invited them to come and see. Their stay changed their lives and was so memorable that many years later, when John wrote the story in his Gospel, he still remembered that it was about four o'clock in the afternoon. The next day he and some others accompanied Jesus to Galilee to attend a wedding feast at Cana (John 2:1-11). From Cana they went to Capernaum, and then down to Jerusalem, where Jesus cleansed the temple and had an interview with Nicodemus (John 2:13-3:21). John was with Jesus during His seven months' sojourn in the country of Judaea, calling the people to repentance and baptism. Since Jesus Himself did not baptize, he undoubtedly helped in the administration of the baptismal rite (John 4:2). When Jesus heard of the Baptist's arrest, He decided to return to Galilee. A probable factor in His leaving Judaea was His realization that the Jewish religious leaders were worried over the fact that He was acquiring an even larger following than the Baptist. On the way north, as they passed through Samaria, there occurred the incident of the Samaritan woman, so fully described in John 4. For a time after Jesus returned to Galilee His disciples seem to have returned to their normal occupations, but one day Jesus appeared by the Sea of Galilee and called Peter and Andrew, James and John from their fishing to be with Him constantly so that they might be trained to become fishers of men (Matt. 4:18-22; Mark 1:16-20; Luke 5:1-11). This was the second stage of discipleship in John's preparation for his life work. Some time later, he was chosen to the apostolate (Matt. 10:2-4; Mark 3:13-19; Luke 6:12-19). The list of the Twelve given in Mark's Gospel states that Jesus surnamed James and John, Boanerges, that is, Sons of Thunder, evidently because of the impetuosity of their temperament.

During the course of the Lord's ministry the experiences of John were common to all the apostles. There are, however, a few scenes in which he takes an important part. The Gospels make clear that he was one of the most prominent of the apostles, and his own Gospel makes clear that he was greatly loved by Jesus. He was one of the three apostles who were closest to Jesus, the other two being Peter and his own brother James. With the other two in the inner circle of the apostles, he was admitted to witness the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51); the same three were chosen by Jesus to be present at the Transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28); and they were nearest to Jesus during the agony in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33). It was John who told Jesus that they had seen someone casting out devils in His name, and that they had forbidden him because he was not of their company (Mark 9:38; Luke 9:49). The two brothers, James and John, gave evidence of their impetuosity when a Samaritan village refused to allow them to pass through on their way to Jerusalem, by saying to Jesus, "Lord, do you want us to bid fire to come down from heaven and consume them?" (Luke 9:54). They showed tactlessness and overweening ambition when they went to Jesus with their mother and requested that in the coming kingdom they be given places of honor above the others (Mark 10:35). On Tuesday of Passion Week John was among those who asked Jesus on the Mount of Olives when His prediction about the destruction of the temple would be fulfilled (Mark 13:3). He and Peter were sent by Jesus to make ready the Passover (Luke 22:8), and at the Passover feast he lay close to the breast of Jesus and asked who His betrayer would be (John 13:25). When Jesus was arrested, he fled, as did the other apostles (Matt. 26:56), but before long recovered enough courage to be present at the trial of Jesus; and, through his acquaintance with the high priest, secured entrance for Peter, too (John 18:16). He stood near the cross on which Jesus was nailed, and there received Jesus' commission to look after His mother (John 19:26). On the morning of the resurrection, when he and Peter were told by Mary Magdalene about the empty grave, together they went to see for themselves (John 20:2,3). In the account of the appearance of the risen Lord in Galilee the sons of Zebedee receive special mention, and it is John who first recognizes Jesus (John 21:1-7), and in the scene which follows, the impression is corrected that John should not die before the Lord's return. At the end of the chapter the truthfulness of the Gospel record is confirmed (21:20-24).

In the rest of the NT there are only a few scattered references to John. After the ascension of Jesus he remained in Jerusalem with the other apostles, praying and waiting for the coming of the Holy Spirit. In the Acts he appears with Peter in two important scenes. Soon after Pentecost they healed a man who had been lame from his birth, and while explaining the miracle to the astonished crowd gathered around them, they were arrested. The next day they were brought before the Sanhedrin, and after being warned not to preach about Jesus any more, they were released (Acts 4:1-22). Later, after the Gospel had been preached to the people of Samaria by Philip, Peter and John were sent by the apostles to Samaria, and they prayed and laid hands on the new converts that they might receive the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:14, 15). John's name is once mentioned in Paul's epistles — in Galatians 2:9, where Paul says that on his second visit to Jerusalem after his conversion he met and consulted with James (undoubtedly the Lord's brother), Peter, and John, who were pillars of the church and who gave him the right hand of fellowship. The only other mention of him in the NT is in Revelation 1:1,4,9, where the authorship of the book is ascribed to John.

Five books of the NT are attributed to him — the fourth Gospel, three epistles, and Revelation. The only one in which his name actually appears is the last. According to tradition, he spent his last years in Ephesus. Very likely the seven churches of Asia enjoyed his ministry. The Book of Revelation was written on the Isle of Patmos, where he was exiled for the Word of God and the testimony of Jesus (Rev. 1:9). Tradition says that he wrote the Gospel in Asia at the request of Christian friends, and that he agreed to do so only after the church had fasted and prayed about the matter for three days. He apparently died in Ephesus about the end of the century.

It is evident from all that we know of John that he was one of the greatest of the apostles. He is described as the disciple whom Jesus loved, no doubt because of his understanding of and love for his Lord. The defects of character with which he began his career as an apostle — an undue vehemence, intolerance, and selfish ambition — were in the course of time brought under control, until he became especially known for his gentleness and kindly love. JOHN THE BAPTIST, the immediate forerunner of Jesus, sent by God to prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah. John was of priestly descent on the side of both his parents. His father, Zacharias, was a priest of the course of Abija, while his mother, Elizabeth, belonged to the family of Aaron. They are described as being "righteous before God, walking in all the commandments of the Lord blameless" (Luke 1:6). He was born in a city of the hill country of southern Judaea, about six months before the birth of Jesus. His parents were then old. His birth had been foretold by an angel to Zacharias while he was serving in the temple. The angel told him that his prayer for a child would be answered and that his wife would give birth to a son who was to be named John and who was to prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah. About his childhood and youth we know only that he lived as a Nazirite in the desert and that he was filled with the Holy Spirit even from birth. It is thought by some that he was a member of a Jewish sect of monks called the Essenes, but there is no clear evidence that this was so.

His first public appearance is carefully dated by Luke (3:1,2), according to the way time was then reckoned. This was somewhere about A.D. 26 or 27. His early ministry was laid in the wilderness of Judaea and in the Jordan valley. The main theme of his preaching was the near approach of the Messianic age and the need of adequate spiritual preparation to be ready for it. His mission was to prepare the people for the advent of the Messiah so that when He made His appearance they would recognize and accept Him. His message did not harmonize with what many of his hearers expected, for while they looked for deliverance from and judgment upon the foreign oppressor, he said that the Messiah would separate the good from the bad and would cast into the fire any tree which did not bring forth good fruit. Many of the Jews, especially the Pharisees, thought that they would enter the kingdom of God automatically, simply because they were physically descended from Abraham, but John declared in no uncertain terms that this was not so at all. He called upon them to repent sincerely of their sins and to be baptized. The baptism by water which he administered signified a break with and cleansing from sin. His baptism was not something utterly new to the Jews; it had its roots in practices already familiar to them: in the various washings required by the Levitical law (Lev. 11-15), in the Messianic lustration foretold by the prophets (Jer. 33:8; Ezek. 36:25,26; Zech. 13:1), and in the proselyte baptism of the Jewish church. His baptism, however, differed essentially from these, in that while the Levitical washings brought restoration to a former condition, his baptism prepared for a new condition; the Jews baptized only Gentiles, but he called upon Jews to be baptized; and his baptism was a baptism of water only in preparation for the Messianic baptism of the Spirit anticipated by the prophets.

While the multitudes of common people flocked to the Jordan, Jesus also came to be baptized. Although Jesus and John were cousins, it appears that John did not know that Jesus was the Messiah until he saw the Holy Spirit descend upon Him at His baptism (John 1:32-34). When Jesus came to him for baptism, he saw that He had no sin of which to repent, and would have refused, had Jesus not insisted, saying that it was necessary for Him to fulfil all righteousness. Shortly after, John said to two of his disciples as they saw Jesus pass by, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John 1:29), and they left him to follow Jesus. He recognized the subordinate and temporary character of his own mission. For some unexplained reason, some of his disciples did not leave him to follow Jesus; and when some of them came to John with the complaint that all men were coming to Jesus, he said to them, "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3:30), and that he was not the Messiah, but only the forerunner of the Messiah. Little is known about John's training of his disciples beyond the fact that it included forms of prayer (Luke 11:1) and frequent fastings (Matt. 9:14); but he must also have taught them much concerning the Messiah and His work. The loyalty to him is shown in their concern over Jesus' overshadowing popularity, their refusal to abandon him in his imprisonment, the reverent care they gave his body after his death, and in the fact that 20 years later there were disciples of his, including Apollos, the learned Alexandrian Jew, in far-away Ephesus (Acts 19:1-7).

The exact time of John's imprisonment or the length of time he was in prison is not known. It is clear, however, that Jesus began His ministry in Galilee after John was put in prison and that he was in prison approximately seven months at the time he sent two of his disciples to Jesus to inquire whether He really was the Messiah. This inquiry seems strange in view of his previous signal testimonies, and is probably to be explained either in the interest of his disciples, who needed assurance that Jesus was really the Messiah, or in some misgivings of his own because the Messianic kingdom was not being ushered in as suddenly and as cataclysmically as he had expected, and perhaps because he thought he was being forgotten while others were being helped. When the two disciples returned to John, Jesus expressed Himself in the frankest appreciation of John, declaring him to be more than a prophet and God's messenger sent to prepare the way for Him (Matt. 11:10-19).

The Gospels tell that John met his death through the vindictiveness of Herodias, whose sin of living in adultery with Herod, John had denounced. Josephus, on the other hand, attributes John's death to Herod's jealousy of his great influence with the people. He also says that the destruction of Herod's army, in the war with his spurned wife's father-in-law, was regarded by the Jews as God's punishment upon him for the murder of John. Josephus undoubtedly gives, not the real reason, which he would not dare to give to the public, but the reason Herod chose that the public be given. S.B.

JOHN, EPISTLES OF.

The First Epistle of John is evidently written by the author of the fourth Gospel. The author does not give his name in either the Epistle or the Gospel, but the early church attributed both works to the Apostle John, and this attribution is supported by the internal evidence of both books. The writer of the Epistle speaks with authority, as an apostle would (1:2; 2:1; 4:6,14). He claims to have lived in personal contact with Christ and to have first-hand knowledge of the facts which underlie the Gospel message (1:1-3; 4:14). The tone and teaching of the letter are such as we should expect from the aged apostle, writing to his disciples a last message regarding the truths he had taught throughout his life. When the Gospel and the Epistle are compared, the conclusion is wellnigh irresistible that the two books are by the same person. There are striking resemblances in style, language, and thought. Among these resemblances are characteristic words used in a peculiar sense, like life, light, darkness, and world; characteristic expressions, like eternal life, a new commandment, and abide in Christ; and identical phrases, like walketh in darkness, and that your joy may be full. The divergencies, of which there are a few, are easily explainable on the basis of differences of purpose and of subject.

We cannot be sure whether the Epistle was written before or after the Gospel. Tradition says that the Gospel was written late in the life of John, towards the end of the first century. Evidences of a late date for the Epistle are that Christianity has been so long in existence that its precepts may be spoken of as an "old commandment" (I John 2:7) and signs that the Gnostic movement had begun, although it had not yet grown to its developed form.

The purpose of the author is to warn the readers against false teachers who are trying to mislead them, and to exhort them to hold fast to the Christian faith which they have received and to fulfill conscientiously the duties, especially brotherly love, which flow from it. Although he does not exactly describe the false doctrines which he attacks, there is no doubt that he has has in mind the heresy of Gnosticism, with its docetic interpretation of the person of Christ and its antinomian view of morals. The false teachers are called Antichrists (2:18,22; 4:3). They claim a knowledge of God which is superior to that of ordinary Christians, but, John says, their claims are false (I John 2:4). They deny that Jesus is the Christ (2:22), the Son of God (4:15; 5:5), and that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh (4:2). They also impugn the fundamental moral teachings of the Church by their dualistic interpretation of existence, for, according to Gnosticism, sin is not moral opposition of the human personality to God, but a physical principle inherent in all matter.

Although the Epistle does not have the usual characteristics of the ancient Graeco-Roman epistle — salutation, final greetings, messages to individuals, etc., there is no doubt that it is a genuine epistle. Most likely it is a pastoral or circular letter addressed to the churches in the province of Asia, where the church was in danger of the errors that are warned against.

The plan of the Epistle is difficult to follow, and has been differently understood. Some fail to recognize any regular plan at all. Thoughts that are repeated again and again throughout the Epistle are the necessity of doing righteousness as an evidence of divine sonship, the necessity of love for the brethren by those who claim to love God, and believing that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh.

The Second Epistle of John. Both the Second and Third Epistles of John are similar in words, style, ideas, and character to the First Epistle, and must have been written by the same author, who refers to himself simply as "the elder" (2:1; 3:1). Both are very brief, containing just the number of words which could conveniently be written on one sheet of papyrus. Although written to different people and for different purposes, there are striking resemblances of wording in them. The opening address is almost identical in both. In both Epistles the writer expresses joy in the spiritual progress of those to whom he writes, and does so in almost the same words. The conclusion in the Epistles is the same in both thought and words.

II John is addressed to "the elect lady and her children" (vs. 1). It is generally supposed that the reference is to a church and her spiritual children, although some hold that a particular individual named Kyria (Gr. for lady) is meant. The introductory greeting is followed by an exhortation to hold fast to the commandments which they had received, especially brotherly love, a warning against false teachers who deny that Christ is come in the flesh, and a prohibition against receiving them. The author concludes with a promise soon to visit them.

The Third Epistle of John. This is addressed to Gaius the wellbeloved, who is eulogized for walking in the truth and being hospitable to evangelists sent, apparently by John, to the church of which Gaius is a member. The author then censures another member of the church, the talkative, overbearing Diotrephes, who for some unexplained reason, probably jealousy, not only refused to receive the itinerant preachers, but did all he could to get the whole church to follow his course, even to the length of threatening excommunication for those who took a different view of their duty. The elder adds that he has written a letter to the church also, but apparently he has little hope that it will overcome the headstrong opposition of Diotrephes. He threatens a speedy visit to the church, when he will call Diotrephes to account for his bad conduct. There is in this Epistle no suggestion of a heretical tendency in the church. S.B.

JOHN, THE GOSPEL OF.

Authorship, Date, Place. Never was there a book written that made higher claim for its "hero." To the Jesus of history, its author gives the most exalted titles. In fact, in the very opening verse he calls him God. This becomes even more remarkable when note is taken of the fact that the author describes himself as one who belongs to the same race, stock, and family as does Jesus, in fact as an eye-witness of the scenes which he so vividly portrays. No one knew Jesus better than he did. He walked with Him from day to day. He reclined on His bosom. He stood by His cross. He entered His tomb (John 13:25; 19:26; 20:8). Yet he does not shrink from proclaiming that this Jesus of history, whom he knew so well, was and is Himself God!

Tradition holds the Apostle John to be this author, and that "the-date-and-place" of authorship was sometime toward the close of the first century A.D., Asia Minor. This tradition can be traced back from Eusebius (the church-historian) at the beginning of the fourth century to Theophilus who flourished about A.D. 170-180. The major witnesses, besides Eusebius, are Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Irenaeus, the writer of the Muratorian Canon, and Theophilus. Irenaeus, one of the earliest of these witnesses, was a disciple of Polycarp, who, in turn, had been a disciple of the Apostle John. The inference would seem to be legitimate that this tradition can be traced back to the disciple whom Jesus loved. Moreover, because of his wide travels the witness of Irenaeus may be called a representative testimony, the firm conviction of the early church which this Greek church-father knew so well. In fact, the early writers (mentioned above) show us that in the last quarter of the second century the fourth Gospel was known and read throughout Christendom: in Africa, Asia Minor, Italy, Gaul, Syria, and that it was ascribed to the well-known Apostle John.

Among the witnesses that are even earlier, Justin Martyr (Apology I.61) quotes from John 3:3-5. He uses a number of expressions from this Gospel (see also his Dialogue with Trypho, chapter 105). His doctrine of the Logos presupposes acquaintance with the fourth Gospel, which his pupil Tatian included in his Diatessaron or Harmony. Ignatius, who went to his martyrdom about the year A.D. 110, alludes to John's Gospel again and again. See Epistles of Ignatius, Short Recension. Very significant also is the testimonial of the elders of Ephesus (John 21:24). The traditional belief regarding the authorship and date of the fourth Gospel has received strong confirmation in the discovery of a very early Gospel of John fragment of a papyrus codex, which seems to have originated in the Christian community of Middle Egypt. On the basis of solid evidence it has been established that this papyrus scrap belonged to a codex which circulated in that general region in the first part of the second century. On the recto this scrap has part of John 18:31-33, on the verso part of Verses 37-38. Now if this Gospel was already circulating in Middle Egypt in the early part of the second century, it must have been composed even earlier. From Ephesus, where according to tradition this Gospel was written, to Middle Egypt, where this codex circulated, is a long distance. This means, therefore, that the traditional view with respect to the date and composition of the fourth Gospel has at length been confirmed by archaeological evidence.

Internal evidence, moreover, is in line with tradition. The author was evidently a Jew, as his style, thorough acquaintance with the OT, and intimate knowledge of Jewish religious beliefs and customs indicates (John 2:13,17,23; 4:9,25; 5:1; 6:4,15; 7:2,27,37,38,42; 10:22,23,34,35; 11:38,44,49; 12:40, etc.). He was probably a Palestinian Jew, for he has a detailed knowledge of Palestinian topography (1:28; 2:1,12; 3:23; 4:11,20; 11:1,54; 12:21); particularly, of Jerusalem and its immediate vicinity (5:2; 9:7; 11:18; 18:1; 19:17); and of the temple (2:14,20; 8:2,20; 10:22,23; 18:1,20). Having been an eye-witness, he remembers the time and place where the events occurred (1:29,35,39; 2:1; 3:24; 4:6,40,52,53; 6:22; 7:14; 11:6; 12:1; 13:1, 2; 19:14,31; 20:1,19,26). He knows that Jesus was weary when He sat down by the well (4:6); remembers the very words spoken by the neighbors of the man born blind (9:8-10); saw the blood and water issuing from Jesus' pierced side (19:33-35); knows the servant of the high priest by name (18:10); and is acquainted with the high priest (18:15). So intimate and full is his knowledge of the actions, words, and feelings of the other disciples that he must have been one of the Twelve (1:35-42; 2:17,22; 4:27; 6:19; 12:16; 13:22-28; 18:15, 16; 20:2; 21:20-23). By a process of logical elimination it can easily be shown that the author was the Apostle John and could not have been any one of the others who composed the Twelve, for though he does not mention himself by name but calls himself "the disciple whom Jesus loved," he distinguishes himself from others whom he does mention by name (Simon Peter, 1:40,41,42,44, etc.; Andrew, 1:40,44; 6:8; 12:22; Philip, 1:43-46, etc.; Nathanael, 1:45-49; 21:2; Thomas, 11.16; 14:5; 20:24-29; 21:2; Judas the Greater, 14:22; and Judas the Traitor, 6:71; 12:4; 13:2,26,29; 18:2, 3,5). Matthew's name can be eliminated for it is associated with another Gospel. So also can be the names of obscure disciples likes James the Less and Simon the Zealot. This leaves only the sons of Zebedee: James and John. But James died an early death (Acts 12), while this Gospel's author survived even Peter (who survived James). It is clearly evident from 21:19-24 that the author of the fourth Gospel was still alive and bearing witness when it first appeared (note present tense in Verse 24) though Peter had already gained the martyr's crown (Verse 19). The reasonable conclusion would surely seem to be that it was the Apostle John who wrote the fourth Gospel.

We are not saying that this external and internal evidence constitutes absolute proof. In the final analysis we accept it by faith, but a faith which is not foolish but takes account of the facts, namely, that toward the close of the first century A.D. (probably sometime between A.D. 80 and 98) at or near Ephesus the Apostle John wrote the fourth Gospel. Radical criticism has not been able to present any evidence whatever that demolishes this well-established position.

Purpose. The author states his purpose as follows: "Now Jesus, to be sure, in the presence of the disciples, also performed many other signs, that are not written in this book. But these are written in order that you may continue to believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and in order that believing you may continue to have life in his name" (Ch. 20:30,31). The faith of believers was being undermined by the errors of men like Cerinthus, who taught that Jesus was not really God and that Christ had not actually come into the flesh (had not adopted human nature). The apostle, seeing this danger and being guided by the Holy Spirit, writes this Gospel in order that the Church may abide in the true faith. Thus, Irenaeus definitely states that John seeks by the proclamation of the Gospel to remove the error which Cerinthus was trying to spread (Against Heresies III.xi.1). According to Cerinthus, at baptism the Christ in the form of a dove had descended on Jesus, but this same Christ had left him again on the eve of his (Jesus') suffering. Hence, it was not really Christ who suffered and died and rose again but Jesus (op. cit. I.xxvi.1; III.iii.4). Over against this, John defends the thesis that Jesus Christ is one, and that this one divine and human Person came not only by water (baptism) but also by blood (suffering and death). For proof see John 19:34-37; cf. I John 5:6. From the very beginning, therefore, Jesus is Himself God. He adopts human nature into personal union with His divine and keeps it ("the Word became flesh," John 1:1,14). However, combating the error of Cerinthus was not John's main aim in writing this book. It was subsidiary to the aim already quoted from 20:30,31.

The readers for whom this Gospel was primarily intended (though in the final analysis it was composed for the Church of the entire NT period, cf. 17:20,21) were living in Ephesus and surroundings. They were Christians from the Gentiles mostly. This explains why the evangelist adds explanatory notes to some of his references to Jewish customs and conditions (2:6; 4:9; 7:2; 10:22; 18:28; 19:31,41,42). It also explains the circumstantial manner in which he locates places that were situated in Palestine (4:5; 5:2; 6:1; 11:1,18; 12:1,21).

Characteristics. In harmony with John's aim, as described above, this Gospel has the following characteristics:

1. It is emphatically the spiritual Gospel, whose aim is to show who Jesus is (and this with a definitely practical purpose, John 20:31). Hence, much of what is found in Matthew, Mark, and Luke (the Synoptics) is here omitted, and on the other hand much material is added, the type of material that brings into clear focus the glory of the Lord: His Messianic office and deity. (See John 2:11; 3:16; 4:25,26,29,42; 5:17,18; 6:40; 7:37,38; 8:36,46,51; 9:38; 10:30; 11:40; 13:3; 14:6; 17:3,5; 20:28). The miracles here recorded also emphasize this same thought.

2. In close connection with (1) is the fact that here it is not the kingdom (as in the other Gospels) but the King Himself upon whom the emphasis falls. This also accounts for the seven "I Am's" (6:35; 8:12; 10:9,11; 11:25; 14:6; and 15:5).

3. This Gospel, far more than the others, records Christ's work in Judea.

4. It is far more definite than are the others in indicating the time and place of the events that are related.

5. It abounds in non-parabolic teaching.

6. It dwells at great length on the events and discourses which belong to a period of less than twenty-four hours (Chapters 13-19).

7. It records with special emphasis the promise of the coming and work of the Holy Spirit (14:16,17,26; 15:26; 16:13,14).

8. Its style, especially in the Prologue, is rhythmic. The manner in which the clauses are co-ordinated, so that often a truth is stated first positively, then negatively or vice versa (1:3; 14:6; 15:5,6; 14:18; 15:16), and its careful balancing of sentences so that antithesis is followed by synthesis, brief and pithy clauses by longer sentences: all this makes this Gospel a very beautiful book.

Contents. The arrangement of John's Gospel is superb. First, we see the Word in His pre-incarnate glory, so that His condescending love in the salvation of sinners may be deeply appreciated. In His earthly ministry He reveals Himself to ever-widening circles (a few disciples, His mother and friends at Cana, to Jerusalem, "the land of Judea," Samaria, Galilee), but is rejected both in Jerusalem and in Galilee (Chapters 1-6; especially 5:18; 6:66). Nevertheless, He makes His tender appeal to sinners, that they may accept Him (Chapters 7-10; especially 7:37,38; 8:12,31-36; 10:7,18,27,28). Meanwhile opposition grows into bitter resistance (7:20,49; 8:6,40,48-59; 9:22; 10:20,31,39). Next, by two mighty deeds — the raising of Lazarus and the triumphal entry into Jerusalem — Jesus manifests Himself as the Messiah (Chapters 11 and 12). But though the Greeks seek Him (12:20-36), the Jews repulse Him (12:37-50). By way of contrast this rejection causes the anointing at Bethany to stand out in all its beauty (12:1-8). So He turns — and this is indeed a turning-point in this Gospel — to the inner circle, and tenderly instructs the Twelve in the Upper Room, first mainly by means of example (washing the feet of His disciples, Chapter 13), and then mainly by means of His Word (of comfort, Chapter 14; of admonition, Chapter 15; and of prediction, Chapter 16), and commits Himself, them, and all later generations of believers to His Father's care (Chapter 17). In His very death (Chapters 18 and 19) He overcomes the world and brings to completion the glorious work of redemption (19:30; cf. 12:30,31; 16:33), and by means of His resurrection and loving manifestations (to Mary Magdalene, the eleven, the ten, the seven, particularly Peter and John) He proves His majestic claims and reveals Himself as the proper object of abiding trust (Chapters 20 and 21, especially 20:30,31).

Outline:

Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God

I. During His Public Ministry
   A. Revealing Himself to ever-widening circles, rejected. (Chaps. 1-6)
   B. Making His tender appeal to sinners, bitterly resisted (Chaps. 7-10).
   C. Manifesting Himself as the Messiah by two mighty deeds, repulsed (Chaps. 11, 12).

II. During His Private Ministry
   A. Issuing and illustrating His new commandment (Chap. 13).
   B. Tenderly instructing His disciples and committing them to the Father's care (Chaps. 14-17).
   C. Dying as a substitute for His people (Chaps. 18, 19).
   D. Triumphing gloriously (Chaps. 20, 21).

JOHN MARK (See Mark)

JOIADA (joi'ȧ-dȧ, Heb. yôyādhā', Jehovah knows). 1. A son of Paseah, one of those who repaired the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6; in KJV Jehoiada).

2. Son of Eliashib the high priest. One of his sons married the daughter of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, and was therefore expelled from the priesthood by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:10; 13:28).

JOIAKIM (joi'ȧ-kĭm, Heb. yôyāqîm, Jehovah raises up), son of Jeshua and father of Eliashib, the high priest (Neh. 12:10,12,26).

JOIARIB (joi'ȧ-rĭb, Heb. yôyārîv, Jehovah pleads). 1. A "teacher" of Ezra's time (Ezra 8:16).

2. A Judahite, descended from a certain Zechariah (Neh. 11:5).

3. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:6,7).

JOKDEAM (jŏk'dē-ăm, Heb. yoqedh'ām), a town in Judah, probably S of Hebron, named with Maon, Carmel, and Ziph (Josh. 15:56).

JOKIM (jō'kĭm, Heb. yôqîm, Jehovah raises up), a man of Judah descended from Shelah (I Chron. 4:22).

JOKMEAM (jŏk'mē-ăm, Heb. yoqme'ām, let the people arise), a town of Ephraim (I Chron. 6:68). It was assigned to the Kohathite Levites. The KJV in I Kings 4:12 wrongly has Jokneam.

JOKNEAM (jŏk'nē-ăm, Heb. yoqne'ām), a town on or near Mt. Carmel (Josh. 12:22). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. 21:34). It was located on the S margin of the Plain of Esdraelon, about 15 miles NW of Jezreel.

JOKSHAN (jŏk'shăn, Heb. yoqshān, meaning unknown), son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2,3). From him descended Sheba and Dedan.

JOKTAN (jŏk'tăn, Heb. yoqtān, meaning unknown), a tribe descended from Shem through Eber and from whom 13 tribes of Arabia descended (Gen. 10:25,26,29; I Chron. 1:19,20,23).

JOKTHEEL (jŏk'thē-ĕl, Heb. yoqethe'ēl). 1. A town in the lowland of Judah. Site unknown (Josh. 15:38).

2. A name given by Amaziah, king of Judah, to a place in Edom which he conquered (II Kings 14:7). It is usually identified with Petra, the capital of Edom.

JONA (See Jonah, Jonas)

JONADAB (jŏn'ȧ-dăb, Heb. yehônādhāv, Jehovah is bounteous). 1. Son of David's brother Shimeah (II Sam. 13:3). He planned for Amnon the sin against Tamar.

2. The son of Rechab (II Kings 10:15ff). After becoming head of his tribe he taught it to live in tents, live a nomadic life, and to refrain from wine; and this rule it kept, so that it became characteristic of it. He helped Jehu abolish Baal-worship in Samaria.

JONAH (jō'nȧ, Heb. yônâh, dove). 1. A prophet of Israel, the son of Amittai, and of the town of Gath-hepher in the tribe of Zebulun (II Kings 14:25). He predicted the restoration of the land of Israel to its ancient boundaries through the efforts of Jeroboam II. The exact words of the prophet are not given, nor are we told the specific time when the prophecy was uttered; but it may be deemed certain that it was pronounced sometime before the conquests of Jeroboam, either about the commencement of the king's reign, or towards the close of the preceding reign. Jeroboam ruled over a period of 40 years (790-750 B.C.). When he ascended the throne, he found the kingdom weak because ever since the time of Jehu, his great-grandfather, the people had been forced to pay continual tribute to Assyria. He became the most powerful of all the monarchs who ever sat upon the throne of Samaria, capturing Hamath and Damascus and restoring to Israel all the territory it used to have from Hamath to the Dead Sea. The Prophet Hosea also prophesied in the time of Jeroboam, but it must have been only toward the very close of his reign, as his prophetic activity extended to the time of Hezekiah, 60 years away.

The identity of the prophet with the prophet of the Book of Jonah can not reasonably be doubted. Jonah 1:1 reads, "Now the word of the Lord came to Jonah the son of Amittai, saying." It is extremely unlikely that there were two prophets with the same name. While the author of the Book of Jonah does not identify himself, the likelihood is that he is the same as the book bearing his name. It is sometimes objected that he writes in the third person; but this is true of the OT prophets in general. In all probability the book was written not long after the events recorded, in the latter part of Jeroboam's reign.

The spirit and teaching of the Book of Jonah rank with the highest of the OT prophetical books. Not as much can be said for the prophet himself, who ranks low in the catalog of OT prophets. He was a proud, self-centered egotist: wilful, pouting, jealous, blood-thirsty; a good patriot and lover of Israel; without proper respect for God or love for his enemies.

2. Father of Simon Peter (Matt. 16:17; John 1:42; 21:15).

JONAH, BOOK OF, fifth in the order of the Minor Prophets. It differs from them in that while they for the most part contain prophetic discourses, with a minimum of narrative material, the Book of Jonah is mainly occupied with a story, and the prophetic message in it is almost incidental. The chapter divisions mark the natural divisions of the book: Chapter 1, Jonah's disobedience; Chapter 2, Jonah's prayer; Chapter 3, Jonah's preaching to the Ninevites; Chapter 4, Jonah's complaints. Chapter 1 begins with the account of Jonah's call to preach at Nineveh because of its great wickedness. Instead of obeying, he took a ship in the opposite direction, to Tarshish, probably in southwestern Spain. His disobedience undoubtedly arose from his fear that the Ninevites would heed his message and repent, and that God would forgive the city which had for many years grievously oppressed his own land. He was a narrow-minded patriot who feared that Assyria would some day destroy his own people; and he did not want to do anything which might contribute to that event. He was unwilling to be a foreign missionary to a people towards whom he could feel nothing but bitterness. In the sequel of the story he frankly gives the reason for refusing to obey God's command, "Therefore I fled before unto Tarshish: for I knew that thou art a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repentest thee of the evil" (Jonah 4:2). During a violent storm at sea, the heathen sailors prayed to their own gods, who, they thought, must be offended with some person on board. They cast lots to discover the culprit, and when the lot fell on Jonah he confessed that he was fleeing "from the presence of the Lord," and volunteered to be thrown overboard for their sakes. This was done, and the storm subsided; whereupon the sailors offered a sacrifice to Jehovah.

Jehovah prepared a great fish to swallow Jonah. Surprised to find himself alive in the body of the fish, the prophet gave thanks to God and expressed the confident hope that he would ultimately be delivered. After three days and three nights the fish vomited him upon the dry land.

Commanded a second time to go to Nineveh, Jonah obeyed and delivered his message, "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown!" The effect of his message was undoubtedly greatly heightened by the story of his deliverance, which had either preceded him or been told by himself. The people of Nineveh repented in sackcloth and ashes, and God spared the city.

When Jonah learned that Nineveh was to be spared, he broke out into loud and bitter complaint, not because he felt discredited as a prophet on account of the failure of his prediction, but because he was sure that the sparing of Nineveh sealed the doom of his own country. By the withering of a gourd, the Lord taught the prophet that if a mean and perishable plant could come to have such value to him, how much greater should be the estimate put on the lives of thousands of children and cattle in the great city of Nineveh. These meant more to God than Jonah's gourd could ever mean to him.

The purpose of the book is primarily to teach that God's gracious purposes are not limited to Israel, but extend to the Gentile world. The author wishes to enlarge the sympathies of Israel, so that as God's missionaries they will lead the Gentiles to repentance and to God. The ready response of the Ninevites shows that the heathen are capable of genuine repentance. The Book of Jonah may be regarded as a great work on foreign missions. It anticipates the catholicity of the Gospel program of Jesus, and is the OT counterpart of John 3:16, "For God so loved the world."

The book is anonymous, and its authorship is in dispute. The traditional view is that the Prophet Jonah is the author, and his book is a record of his own experiences. A more recent view is that the book was written long after Jonah's time by some anonymous author, and that it is a work of fiction with a moral lesson. Among the chief arguments advanced for the second view are the following. 1. In the prayer ascribed to Jonah there are quotations from post-Exilic psalms (cf. Jonah 2:3 with Ps. 42:7; Jonah 2:5 with Ps. 69:1; Jonah 2:9 with Ps. 50:1). 2. The narrative is written throughout in the third person, with no indication that the prophet of the story was the writer. 3. There are in the book Aramaic linguistic features which are found in the late books. 4. From Jonah 3:3b it is inferred that Nineveh was a thing of the past (the city was destroyed in 612 B.C.). 5. The failure to give the name of the king of Assyria indicates that it was unknown to the author. These arguments, however, are very debatable, and therefore inconclusive.

The traditional view, that Jonah is the author and the story historically true, is supported by a number of considerations. 1. The book is written as a simple narrative, and was so regarded by both Jews and Christians until about a century ago. 2. There seems no doubt that our Lord thought of the story as history and taught it as such. On three different occasions He referred to Jonah (Matt. 12:38-41; 16:4; Luke 11:29-32), saying that as Jonah was three days and three nights in the body of the fish, so should the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, and that the men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah, while His own contemporaries for the most part rejected His message. Some critics, taking refuge in the doctrine of the Kenosis (Phil. 2:5-8), set aside the teaching of Jesus on this point as erroneous; while others, holding to a doctrine of accommodation, think that Jesus did not consider it worth while to correct the wrong views of His contemporaries; but neither of these explanations harmonizes with a Biblical view of the person of Christ.

Most modern critical scholars in the last hundred years have regarded the book as a work of the imagination. Some call it a myth; others an allegory; others a parable; others a didactic story; etc. This interpretation avoids the miraculous elements in the story, which the critics find it impossible to accept; but it does not do justice to the fact that our Lord very evidently held to the historicity of the book. S.B.

JONAN (jō'năn, Gr. Ionán, perhaps Jehovah is gracious), an ancestor of Jesus mentioned in the genealogy of Luke (3:30). He lived about 200 years after David.

JONAS (jō'năs, Heb. yônâh, Gr. Ionás). 1. The name given in Matthew 12:39-41; 16:4; Luke 11:29-32 KJV to the OT prophet Jonah.

2. The name given in John 21:15,16 KJV to the father of the Apostle Peter. In John 1:42 KJV he is called Jona.

JONATH ELEM RECHOKIM, UPON (jō'năth ē'lĕm rē-hō'kĭm, the silent dove of them that are afar off), probably the tune to the melody to which Psalm 56 was written.

JONATHAN (jŏn'ă-thăn, Heb. yehônāthān, yônāthān, Jehovah has given), a proper name met with from the time of the judges onwards. 1. A Levite, son or more distant descendant of Gershom, son of Moses (Judg. 18:30). For a time he lived in Bethlehem-judah, but left to become the priest of Micah in Ephraim. Some Danites, after stealing idolatrous images from the house of Micah, induced him to go with them and be their priest. At Laish he founded a priesthood which officiated at the shrine of the stolen idols "until the day of the captivity of the land" (Judg. 18:30).

2. Son of King Saul. See separate article, following.

3. Son of the high priest Abiathar. He helped David during Absalom's rebellion, and brought to Adonijah the news that Solomon had been crowned king (II Sam. 15:27,36; 17:17,20; I Kings 1:42, 43).

4. A son of Shimea, a nephew of David (II Sam. 21:21).

5. One of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:32).

6. A Jerahmeelite (I Chron. 2:32,33).

7. A son of Uzziah, one of David's treasurers (I Chron. 27:25).

8. David's "uncle," a wise man and a scribe (I Chron. 27:32). He may be the same as "4" above.

9. The father of Ebed, a returned exile (Ezra 8:6).

10. A son of Asahel who opposed Ezra in the matter of foreign marriages (Ezra 10:15).

11. A priest, a son of Joiada, descended from Jeshua (Neh. 12:11).

12. A priest in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

13. A Levite of the lineage of Asaph (Neh. 12:35).

14. A scribe in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer. 37:15,20).

15. A son of Kareah, probably the same as "14" (Jer. 40:8).

16. Youngest son of the priest Mattathias (I Macc. 2:5; 9-13), who initiated the Maccabean revolt.

17. Son of Absalom (I Macc. 13:11).

18. A priest who offered prayer at the first sacrifice after the return from exile (II Macc. 1:23).

JONATHAN, the eldest son of Saul, the first king of Israel (I Sam. 14:49). He first comes upon the scene soon after his father was crowned king and gained an important victory over the Ammonites, who had been harassing the Israelites. Saul's army numbered 3000 men, a third of whom he placed under the command of Jonathan at Gibeah, while the rest he retained at his headquarters at Michmash. In the valley midway between the two camps, at a place called Geba, the Philistines established an outpost and forced Saul to evacuate and fall back on Gibeah and Gilgal with a greatly reduced army, now numbering only 600 men, the rest having fled in fear to hide in caves or having been pressed into the enemy's service. In spite of this, Jonathan, attended only by his armor-bearer, surprised the Philistine outpost at Geba and killed 20 men. The resulting panic spread to the main camp, and when Saul came to attack, he found the Philistines confusedly attacking one another, and soon the whole Philistine army was in headlong flight. In this rout, the only weapons the Israelites had were farming implements (I Sam. 13:20), Saul and Jonathan alone being armed with swords and spears. The victory would have been even more complete had not Saul superstitiously ordered the people to refrain from eating until the day was over (I Sam. 14:24). Ignorant of this prohibition, Jonathan, in his hot pursuit of the enemy refreshed himself by eating wild honey. Saul would have had him put to death, but the people intervened. They recognized that, with the help of God, his energetic action had brought them to a mighty victory.

But great as were Jonathan's military qualities, he is best remembered as the friend of David. He exemplified all that is noblest in friendship — warmth of affection, unselfishness, helpfulness, and loyalty. His love for David began the day the two first met after the slaying of Goliath (I Sam. 18:1-4), and it remained steadfast despite Saul's suggestion that David would some day be king in their stead (I Sam. 20:31). When Jonathan first realized his father's animosity towards David, he interceded for his friend (I Sam. 19:1-7); and later, more than once, he risked his life for him. Once, Saul, angered by what he regarded as unfilial conduct, threw a javelin at him, as he had done several times at David. The last meeting of the two friends took place in the desert of Ziph, where Jonathan strengthened his friend in God (I Sam. 23:16). He could not take part in the proceedings of his father against his friend, who was forced to live in hiding and from whom he was separated for many years. His disinterestedness and willingness to surrender all claims to the throne for the sake of his friend gives evidence of a character that is unsurpassed. While always holding to his own opinion of David, he conformed as much as he could to his father's views and wishes, and presents a noble example of filial piety. There was one temporary estrangement between Saul and Jonathan, provoked when Saul impugned the honor of Jonathan's mother. Jonathan fell with Saul and his brothers on Mt. Gilboa in battle against the Philistines (I Sam. 31:2). Their bodies were hung on the walls of Beth-shan, but under cover of night the men of Jabesh-gilead, out of gratitude for what Saul had done for them at the beginning of his career, removed them and gave them honorable burial. One son, Mephibosheth, survived. David showed him kindness, and his posterity through him may be traced for several generations. Like their ancestors, they were famous soldiers, especially distinguished in the use of the bow (I Chron. 8:33ff; 9:40ff). S.B.

JOPPA (jŏp'pà, Heb. yāphô, Gr. Ióppe), once in KJV Japho (Josh. 19:46), an ancient walled town on the coast of Palestine, about 35 miles from Jerusalem. It was allotted to Dan, but there is no evidence that the Israelites ever possessed it in pre-Exilic times. It is mentioned in the Amarna letters. It was the seaport for Jerusalem. Timber from the forests of Lebanon were floated from Tyre to Joppa for the building of the Temple of Solomon (II Chron. 2:16), and again when the temple was being rebuilt, after the return from the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 3:7). It was then under Phoenician control. Jonah took a ship for Tarshish there when he fled from the presence of the Lord (Jonah 1:3). In Maccabean times the city was garrisoned by Syrians, but when some 200 Jews were treacherously drowned, after being induced to go aboard ships, Judas Maccabaeus in revenge set fire to the docks and the boats in the harbor, and slew the fugitives. In NT times Peter there raised Dorcas to life (Acts 9:36f), and on the roof of Simon the tanner's house he received the famous vision which taught him that the Gospel was intended for Jew and Gentile alike (Acts 10:1ff; 11:5ff). In the Jewish war of A.D. 66 the Romans killed 8,400 of its fanatical inhabitants. After that, pirates gained control of the city and preyed upon the shipping in the surrounding waters. Vespasian then captured and destroyed the city. Joppa, now called Jaffa, is built on a rocky ledge 116 feet high, at the edge of the sea. The harbor is poor because of rocks which abound in it. The city has a very picturesque setting. S.B.

JORAH (jō'rà, Heb. yôrâh, meaning uncertain), a family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:18). It is called Hariph in Nehemiah 7:24.

JORAI (jō'rā-ī, Heb. yôray, whom Jehovah teaches), the ancestral head of a Gadite family (I Chron. 5:13).

JORAM (jō'răm, Heb. yôrām, Jehovah is exalted).

1. A son of Toi, king of Hamath, who congratulated David on his victory over Hadadezer (II Sam. 8:10).
2. A Levite (I Chron. 26:25).
3. Son of Ahab, king of Israel. He succeeded his brother, Ahaziah on the throne. The name is the same as Jehoram (II Kings 8:29).
4. Same as Jehoram, king of Judah (II Kings 8:21-24; 11:2; I Chron. 3:11; Matt. 1:8).
5. A priest sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the people (II Chron. 17:8).

JORDAN RIVER, the only large flowing body of water in Palestine and, as such, it played a significant part in the history of Israel, as well as in the earlier days of our Lord's ministry. The word Jordan derives from a Hebrew word, hayyardēn, meaning "flowing downward," or "the descender," and one with any knowledge of its course can easily see the appropriateness of the name. Four rivers in Syria are recognized as the source of what later becomes the Jordan River proper. They are the Bareighit; the Hasbany, at the western foot of Mount Hermon, 24 miles long; the Leddan; and, the most famous of all, though the shortest, the Banias, five and a half miles long. On this last-named river once stood the city of Paneas, where was the well-known grotto of the Greek god, Pan. Later this was called Caesarea Philippi, and here occurred the great confession of Simon Peter (Matt. 16:13). These rivers join and pour into Lake Huleh, 20 miles long and five miles wide, the surface of which is seven feet above sea level. In recent years this lake has been drained by Israeli settlers for farm land. The Jordan then descends for ten miles to the sea of Galilee, a beautiful body of water 12 miles long and from three to six miles wide, the surface of which is 696 feet below the level of the sea. From the place where the Jordan makes its exit from the Sea of Galilee, also called the Sea of Tiberias, to the place at which it enters the Dead Sea, is, in a straight line, a length of 70 miles. But the river itself, because of its serpentine curves, is 200 miles in length! As Professor Glueck has vividly said, "Squirming frantically, burrowing madly, seeking wildly to escape its fate, the Jordan course, from its crystal clear beginning, to its literally dark and bitter end, is a helpless race to a hopeless goal." The surface of the Dead Sea is 1292 feet below sea level. The Jordan River proper varies from 90 to 100 feet in width, and from three to ten feet in depth, but the gorge which it has cut out varies from four miles at the north to 14 miles near Jericho.

Though the largest river of Palestine, the Jordan differs from other great national rivers in the fact that, due to the presence of 27 rapids between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, it carries no traffic; and because of the swampy condition of part of this valley, the terrific heat in many places, and the presence of many wild animals, especially during Israel's history, no large city was ever built directly on the banks of the Jordan. These factors led George Adam Smith to say with his usual brilliance, "There may be something on the surface of another planet to match the Jordan Valley; there is nothing on this" (p. 468).

While the Jordan is never called by any other name in the Bible, it is once referred to as "The River of the Wilderness" (Amos 6:14) and "the pride of the Jordan" (Jer. 12:5; 49:19; 50:44 and Zech. 11:3).

The natural life found in the Jordan Valley has been carefully studied, some of it proving to be quite unique. Of the 30 species of fish found in this river, 16 are said to be found nowhere else; of the 45 species of birds observed in this tortuous valley, 23 are peculiar to this area. About 162 species of plants and trees have been identified here, of which 135 are African. These included the castor oil plant, the tamarisk, willows, poplars, and near Jericho, the oleander, etc. While it is true that no large city was actually ever built on the banks of this river, still there are some geographical terms that belong to this area. Beginning in the north at the time of our Lord's advent, there was an area called the Decapolis, a federation of ten Greek cities, nine on the eastern side of the Jordan, and mentioned once at the beginning of our Lord's ministry (Matt. 4:25). Another city in this group was Pella, not mentioned in the Bible, but according to tradition, the city to which the Christians fled at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70.

Of the important rivers pouring into the Jordan, all are on the eastern side (no river emptying into the Jordan on the west is referred to in the OT). The first, four miles S of the Sea of Galilee, is the Yarmuk, not mentioned in the Bible. Here is located the great modern Rutenberg electric power plant. Below this river was the city of Beth-Shan, referred to in Joshua 17:16, the excavation of which has revealed a civilization going back to 3500 B.C. Later it was called Scythopolis. South of this site is Aenon where we are told that John the Baptist carried on some of his baptizing work (John 3:23). Not far from here may have been located the Brook Cherith, referred to in I Kings 17:2-7. The next important river, about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, is the Jabbok, famous as the place where Jacob wrestled with the angel (Gen. 32:22), later designated as a boundary (Num. 21:24; Josh. 12:2, etc.). At the junction of this river with the Jordan was the site known as Adam, where the waters of the great river were held back at the time of Israel's crossing (Josh. 3:16).

Near the Dead Sea on the western side of the river, one mile E of Jericho, stood the city of Gilgal, where Israel set up 12 stones at the command of God (Josh. 4:19,20), a place that later became an important religious center (I Sam. 7:16 and 10:8).

By far the most important single event relating to the Jordan River in the entire history of Israel is the crossing on the part of the Israelites, after the death of Moses. Actually, this crossing is referred to, in anticipation, by Moses in the book of Deuteronomy 3:20,25,27. In reality, while the Jordan River is now and then referred to as a boundary, it was not a boundary for Israel, or even for the specific tribes, for Manasseh occupied a huge territory on both sides of the river. Nevertheless, Israel was told that until this river was crossed, and the territory on the western side possessed, she would not be occupying the land flowing with milk and honey (Num. 35:10; Deut. 3:20; 11:31; 31:13; Josh. 1:2, etc.). One might say that the Promised Land more generally refers to the territory on the western side of the Jordan than to all of the land occupied by Israel. The story of the crossing of the Jordan is given in detail in the third and fourth chapters of Joshua.

The Jordan is important in only one particular in the New Testament. It was here that John the Baptist carried on his ministry (Matt. 3:6; Mark 1:5; John 1:28 and 3:26), and thus in this river Jesus Himself was baptized (Matt. 3:13; Mark 1:9; Luke 4:1). No other event occurs in the New Testament directly relating to the Jordan River.

(References to our Lord's ministry on the far side of the Jordan (Matt. 19:1; Mark 10:1) only imply that the Lord did cross the river). In the statement relating to the closing days of our Lord's ministry, when escaping from those who would make Him King, He "resorted once more to the place beyond the Jordan, where John first baptized, and there He stayed" (John 10:40, Berkeley Version). When the early Church began its great missionary work, apart from the interview of Philip with the Ethiopian eunuch near Gaza, all the ministry of the apostles and early disciples, according to the New Testament, proceeded neither south into Egypt nor eastward toward Babylon, but northward into Syria and Asia Minor, and then westward to Greece, to Italy, and probably Spain. Nothing of any great historic importance has actually happened at the Jordan River since the baptism of our Lord. In fact, the Jordan Valley, from the Sea of Galilee to near Jericho, was practically unexplored until the 19th century.

The theme of the Jordan River in the ritual of the church and in its hymnology and poetry, has never been comprehensively surveyed. With the early church fathers, it was practically ignored. However, it was given an important place in the Coptic and Ethiopian prayers. The Ethiopian prayer for the consecration of baptismal water has the following significant typological references to the Jordan: "It is Thou, O Lord, who in the days of Joshua, the son of Nave, caused the powerful waves (of the Jordan) to flow back; it is Thou — who can withstand Thy sight! — who didst mark Thine acceptance of the sacrifice of Elias in the water by sending down fire from heaven; it is Thou who didst show by Eliseus the water of the generation of life, and who didst cause that Naaman should be purified by the water of the Jordan; Thou canst do all things and nothing is impossible to Thee. Give to this water the great gift of the Jordan, and may the Holy Spirit come down upon it." (The Bible and the Liturgy by Jean Danielou, Notre Dame, Indiana, 1956, p. 99. See especially the entire chapter here on "Types of Baptism," pages 99-113).

The most famous hymn in which the Jordan is a basic theme is the one by Charles Cuff (sometimes listed as Coffin (1676-1749), originally written in Latin, and published in the Hymni Sacri, as well as the Paris Breviary, both in 1736. It appears in almost all Anglican hymnals, as well as in many others. The first stanza is as follows:

On Jordan's bank the Baptist's cry
Announces that the Lord is nigh;
Awake and hearken, for he brings
Glad tidings of the King of kings.

Another famous hymn with the Jordan theme is by an English Baptist clergyman, Samuel Stennett (1727-1795), beginning with the famous clause, "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand." This was included in the famous Sacred Songs and Solos edited by Mr. Sankey. The first stanza is as follows:

On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
And cast a wistful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie.

Among other hymns in which the Jordan River appears, is the well-known "Guide Me, O Thou Great Jehovah," by William Williams, the third stanza of which contains the two lines, "When I tread the verge of Jordan . . . Land me safe on Canaan's side." The idea of passing through death for the Christian being compared with the crossing of the Jordan on the part of the Israelites cannot be said to be a very accurate interpretation of Israel's history at this point. Israel did not enter into a time of peace when she crossed the Jordan, but was ushered into a series of wars, many oppressions and defeats, followed by victories of more or less length, and ultimately ending in disaster and expulsion from the land.

It is significant that in our large volumes of famous quotations, the word Jordan does not even appear, and even the great Oxford English Dictionary passed by this word in its original publication though adding it in the later supplementary volume (1945). W.M.S.

JORIM (jō'rĭm, Gr. Ioreím, from Heb. yehôrām), an ancestor of Jesus in the genealogy of Luke (3:29).

JORKEAM (jôr'kē-ăm, Heb. yorqe'ām), a place inhabited by members of the family of Hezron and house of Caleb (I Chron. 2:44). It may be identical with "Jokdeam" of Joshua 15:56.

JOSABAD, JOZABAD (jŏs'à-băd, jŏz'à-băd, Heb. yôzāvādh, Jehovah has bestowed). 1. One of David's recruits at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4).

2. Two Manassites who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

3. A Levite overseer in Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 31:13).

4. A Levite, son of Jeshua (Ezra 8:33).

5. One of the priests who put away their foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:22).

JOSAPHAT (jŏs'à-făt, Gr. Iosaphát), KJV for Jehoshaphat in Matthew 1:8, the genealogy of Christ. An ancestor of Jesus.

JOSE (jō'sé, Gr. Iosé), KJV form for Jesus in Luke's genealogy (3:29).

JOSEDECH (jŏs'ĕ-dĕk, Heb. yehôtsādhāq, Jehovah is righteous), father of Jeshua the high priest (Ezra 3:2,8). He went into captivity under Nebuchadnezzar.

JOSEPH (jō'zĕf, Heb. yôsēph, may God add). 1. The eleventh of Jacob's 12 sons, and the first-born son of Rachel, who said when he was born, "The Lord shall add to me another son," and therefore called his name Joseph (Gen. 30:24). He became the ancestor of the two northern tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim. The story of his birth is told in Genesis 30:22-24, and the story of the rest of his life in Genesis 37-50. He was born in Padan-aram when his father was 90 years old, and was his father's favorite child because he was Rachel's child and the son of his old age. The father's favoritism was shown in his getting for Joseph a coat of many colors, which was probably a token of rank indicating that it was his intention to make Joseph the head of the tribe; and it naturally aroused the envy of his elder brothers. Their ill will was increased when he somewhat imprudently told them two dreams he had which were suggestive of his future greatness and their subservience to him. When he was 17 years old, his father sent him to see how his brothers were doing at Shechem, where they were feeding their flocks; but when he arrived there, he found that they had gone on to Dothan, and he followed them thither. When they saw him coming, they planned to kill him, and thus make impossible the fulfilment of his dreams. Reuben, however, persuaded them not to kill him but to throw him alive into a pit, intending to rescue him later and restore him to his father. During a brief absence of Reuben, the brothers saw a caravan of Ishmaelites making their way to Egypt, and decided that instead of allowing Joseph to die in the well, they would sell him to these merchantmen. Joseph was sold. The brothers took his coat of many colors, besmeared it with the blood of a goat they had killed, and took it to Jacob, with the story that they had found the coat and assumed that their brother was dead, torn to pieces by some wild beast. The aged father, grief-stricken and disconsolate, mourned the loss of his son for many days.

In the meantime, Joseph was taken to Egypt by the Ishmaelites and sold in the slave market to an officer of the pharaoh, an Egyptian named Potiphar. The young slave proved himself to be so intelligent and trustworthy that his master soon entrusted to him all the affairs of his household, which prospered under Joseph's administration. But on the false accusations of Potiphar's wife, who had made improper advances, which he had rejected, Joseph was cast into prison, where he remained for years. God was with him, however, and the Providence that had previously saved his life now brought him to the favorable attention of the pharaoh. The prison keeper, finding that he could put implicit confidence in Joseph, committed to his charge the other prisoners. Among these were two of the pharaoh's officers, his chief butler and chief baker, who had been imprisoned for having offended the king. Joseph interpreted for them two dreams they had had; and three days later, on the king's birthday, as Joseph had foretold, the chief baker was hanged and the chief butler restored to his office (Gen. 40:5-23).

After two years, during which Joseph's circumstances remained unchanged — the chief butler having forgot his promise to mention him to the king—the pharaoh had two dreams which no one could interpret. They had to do with fat and lean kine, full and withered ears. The chief butler now remembered Joseph and told the king of Joseph's skill in interpreting dreams. Joseph was sent for. He told the pharaoh that both his dreams had the same meaning: seven years of plenty would be followed by seven years of famine, and suggested that preparation be made for the years of famine by storing up the surplus produce during the seven years of plenty against the years of famine. The king immediately made Joseph head of the royal granaries and invested him with authority of giving effect to his own proposal. As the head of a department of state, Joseph became one of the officials next in rank to the king (Gen. 41:39-44), and as a further mark of royal favor, he was given an Egyptian name and was married to the daughter of the priest of the great national temple of On. Joseph was now 30 years old. During the seven years of plenty he amassed corn in the granaries of every city, and his wife bore him two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

The famine that Joseph had predicted affected not only Egypt but all the known world, so that all countries came into Egypt to Joseph to buy corn. Joseph's brothers came too. They did not recognize him, but he knew them; and when they prostrated themselves before him he saw the fulfilment of the dreams which had aroused in them such intense jealousy. The crisis of the story is reached when Joseph, after testing their character in various ways, to see whether they had changed for the better over the years, on their second visit made himself known to them, told them that he bore them no ill will for the wrong they had done him, and persuaded them and their father to settle in Egypt. The pharaohs then reigning in Egypt were probably members of the Hyksos dynasty, and were Semites, like Joseph; and they consequently cordially welcomed Jacob and his family to Egypt.

In the years that followed, Joseph brought about a permanent change in the Egyptian system of land-tenure, so that almost all the land became the property of the Pharaoh and the previous owners became his tenants. Jacob lived with Joseph in Egypt 17 years. Before he died, he adopted Joseph's two sons, putting them on the same level as his own sons in the division of the inheritance. Joseph lived to the age of 110. Before he died he expressed his confidence that God would some day bring the children of Israel back to Canaan, and solemnly directed that his bones be buried there. His wishes were carried out, and his bones were buried finally in Shechem, in the plot of ground bought there by Jacob. He became the ancestor of the two tribes Manasseh and Ephraim, the latter being the most powerful and important in northern Israel. He presents a noble ideal of character, remarkable for his gentleness, faithfulness to duty, magnanimity, and forgiving spirit, so that he is often regarded as an OT type of Christ.

2. The father of Igal of Issachar, one of the 12 spies (Num. 13:7).

3. A son of Asaph and head of a course of musicians in the reign of David (I Chron. 25:2,9).

4. A son of Bani, who had married a foreign wife and was induced by Ezra to put her away (Ezra 10:42).

5. A priest of the family of Shebaniah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

6. The name of three ancestors of Jesus according to the KJV (Luke 3:24,26,30); the name of two according to the RVs, which read "Josech" in Luke 3:26.

7. Son of Zacharias, defeated by Gorgias, c. 164 B.C., when he disobeyed the orders of Judas Maccabaeus about going into battle (I Macc. 5:18, 55-62).

8. The husband of Mary, the mother of Jesus (Matt. 1:16; Luke 3:23). He was a carpenter (Matt. 13:55) living in Nazareth (Luke 2:4). He was of Davidic descent (Matt. 1:20; Luke 2:4), the son of Heli (Luke 3:23) or Jacob (Matt. 1:16), and the supposed father of Jesus (Matt. 13:55; Luke 3:23; 4:22; John 1:45; 6:42). After learning that Mary was with child before marriage, he was minded to put her away "privily," but an angel assured him in a dream that the child to be born was conceived by the Holy Spirit, and he thereupon made her his wife (Matt. 1:18-25). When the emperor Augustus decreed that all the world should be enrolled in their ancestral homes, Joseph went with Mary to Bethlehem, and there Jesus was born. He was with Mary when the shepherds came to do homage to Jesus (Luke 2:8-20), and when, 40 days after His birth, Jesus was presented in the temple. Warned by the Lord in a dream that Herod was plotting the murder of the child, he fled with Mary and Jesus to Egypt (Matt. 2:13-19), returning to Nazareth after the death of Herod. Every year, at the Passover, he attended the feast in Jerusalem (Luke 2:41); and when Jesus was 12, he too went with Joseph and Mary. He undoubtedly taught Jesus the carpenter trade (Mark 6:3). It is likely that he was alive after the ministry of Jesus had well begun (Matt. 13:55), but as we do not hear of him in connection with the crucifixion, and as Jesus commended Mary to John at the crucifixion (John 19:26,27), it may be inferred that he had died prior to that event.

9. One of the brethren of Jesus, according to RV (Matt. 13:55). KJV has "Joses."

10. A Jew of Arimathaea, a place probably to the NW of Jerusalem. He is described as a rich man, a member of the Sanhedrin (Matt. 27:57; Mark 15:43), and a righteous man looking for the kingdom of God (Luke 23:50; Mark 15:43). A secret disciple of Jesus because of his fear of the Jews (John 19:38), he did not take part in the resolution of the Sanhedrin to put Jesus to death. After the crucifixion, he secured permission from Pilate to remove the body of Jesus from the cross, and laid it in his own newly-hewn tomb (Matt. 25:57-60; Luke 23:50-53; John 19:38).

11. A Christian called Barsabas, or son of Sabas, and surnamed Justus (Acts 1:23). He was one of those who had companied with Jesus and the apostles from the time of Jesus' baptism, and was one of the two candidates considered by the apostles as a replacement of Judas Iscariot. The lot fell upon Matthias (Acts 1:21,26).

12. The personal name of Barnabas (Acts 4:36; in KJV "Joses"). S.B.

JOSEPH BARSABAS (jō'sĕf bär-sȧb'ăs), an early disciple of Christ who became a candidate for the apostleship against Matthias (Acts 1:21,26), in order to fill the vacancy produced by the apostasy of Judas. Matthias was chosen. He may have been a brother of Judas, called Barsabbas (Acts 15:22).

JOSES (jō'sĕz, Gr. Iosés, a Gr. form of "Joseph"). 1. One of the brothers of Jesus (Mark 6:3). In Matthew 13:55 the Gr. is Joseph.

2. A name of Barnabas, for a time a co-worker of Paul (Acts 4:36). The Gr. has Joseph in this passage.

JOSHAH (jō'shȧ, Heb. yôshâh, Jehovah's gift), a descendant of Simeon, and the head of his family (I Chron. 4:34).

JOSHAPHAT (jŏsh'ȧ-făt, Heb. yôshāphāt, Jehovah has judged). 1. One of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:43).

2. A priest and trumpeter in David's time (I Chron. 15:24, in KJV Jehoshaphat).

JOSHAVIAH (jŏsh'ȧ-vī'ȧ, Heb. yôshawyâh), son of Alnaam, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:46).

JOSHBEKASHAH (jŏsh'bē-kā'shȧ), a son or descendant of Heman and a leader in music (I Chron. 25:4,24).

JOSHEB-BASSEBET (jō'shĕb-bă'sē-bĕt, he that sitteth in the seat, II Sam. 23:8), probably a corruption of Jashobeam, as in I Chronicles 11:11. One of David's mighty men. In ASV Josheb-basshebeth.

JOSHUA (jōsh'ū-à), an Ephraimite, son of Nun (I Chron. 7:22-27), though born in Egyptian bondage, c. 1500 B.C., was named, significantly, Hoshea (Oshea), "salvation" (Num. 13:8; Deut. 32:44). Two months after Israel's exodus, 1446 B.C., he was appointed Moses' commander and successfully repulsed an Amalekite attack (Exod. 17:9). Moses changed Hoshea's name to Jehoshua yehôshûa', "Jehovah is salvation" (Num. 13:16; I Chron. 7:27), or Joshua, later forms of which are Jeshua (yēshûa', Neh. 8:17) and, in Greek, Jesus (Iesoús, Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8); compare Matthew 1:21. Joshua attended Moses on Sinai (Exod. 24: 13; 32:17) and guarded both his tent (33:11) and position (Num. 11:28). In 1445 B.C. he represented Ephraim in spying out Canaan. Joshua opposed the majority report, insisting that Israel, if faithful to God, could conquer Canaan, and almost suffered stoning (Num. 14:7-10). Subsequently, however, for having "wholly followed the Lord" (32:12), he not only escaped destruction (14:38) but also received assurance, unique to himself and Caleb (13:30; 14:24), of entering the Promised Land (14:30; 26:65).

In the spring of 1406 B.C., E of Jordan, God designated Joshua as Moses' successor (Num. 27: 18). Moses charged him to faithfulness (Num. 27: 23; Deut. 31:23), committed the "song of admonition" and other writings to him (Deut. 32:44; Exod. 17:14), counseled him on procedures (Num. 32:28; 34:17), and encouraged both new leader and people (Deut. 3:21; 31:3,7). God Himself warned Joshua of coming apostasy (31:14), but promised his successful accomplishment of the conquest (31:23; 1:38; 3:28).

Upon Moses' death, Joshua, as the oldest man in Israel, must have been in his nineties (contrast the octogenarian Caleb, Josh. 13:1; 14:7-11). Yet God assured him of victory, as he relied on the inspired Book of Moses (1:6-9). From this point onward, Joshua's history is that of Israel's occupation of Canaan. His personal actions, however, include making preparations (1:10-18), sending spies against Jericho (2:1,23-24), and then ordering Israel's advance across Jordan (3:1). His faith in anticipating its passage inaugurated a life of undiminishing esteem, similar even to that of Moses (3:7; 4:14; cf. liberalism's usually limiting Joshua to local Ephraimitic leadership, IB II: 546). West of Jordan, Joshua superintended Israel's rituals (5:2) and the construction of monuments for the faith of children yet to come (4:4-7). The theophany of "the Prince of Jehovah's host" (5: 13-15 ASV) served as a dramatic sentence upon Jericho but also as a visible confirmation of Joshua's divine call, similar to the Angel of the Lord's appearance to Moses at the burning bush (Exod. 3:2-6). Joshua worshiped and then executed the God-directed siege (Josh. 6:2-6). He "devoted" (destroyed) Jericho (vs. 17), pronounced a curse on its rebuilding (vs. 26, I Kings 16:34), and achieved widespread recognition (vs. 27).

When the disobedience of Achan brought defeat at Ai, Joshua's prayer, his zeal for God's glory, and his enforcement of divine judgment (7:6-9,19, 25) compare favorably with his subsequent faithfulness to God's orders and exemplary execution of Ai's king (8:2,29; cf. 10:24-27,40-41). With central Palestine subdued, Joshua personally wrote Moses' law on the stones at Ebal and then proclaimed this law to the whole Israelitish assembly (8:30-35). Though guilty of rashness with the Gibeonites, he later condemned these pagans to bondage (9:15,22-23,26-27); and the energy he displayed in forced marches and sudden attacks frustrated Canaanite counter-offensives in both south (10:9) and north (11:7). Basically it was Jehovah who fought for Israel, but even His prolonging of light for battle at Beth-horon (10:12-14) came in answer to Joshua's prayers (cf. Bernard Ramm, Christian View of Science and Scripture, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1955, pp. 156-161, with J. B. Payne, Bulletin E.T.S. 3:4 [1960], 95-96). In six years (14:10), Joshua took the whole land, "leaving nothing undone of all that the Lord commanded Moses" (11:15,23).

Yet Moses had anticipated a gradual occupation (Exod. 23:28-30). God had left in Canaan many nations, subdued but still powerful, to prove His people (Josh. 13:2-6; Judg. 2:21-3:4); and Joshua could not achieve Israel's final "rest" (Heb. 4:8). Thus, because of his advanced age, he forthwith allotted Canaan to the tribes (Josh. 13:6-7; 14:1; 19:51). At Gilgal he confirmed Moses' Transjordanian settlement and assigned territory to Judah, including Caleb's portion at Hebron (14: 13; 15:13), and to Ephraim and Manasseh (cf. 17:4), encouraging them to more effective conquest even while refusing to show them partiality 17:14-18). Later, at Shiloh, he exhorted the seven hesitant tribes, dispatched a commission on apportionment, and thus allotted the remaining lands (18:3,8-10), including cities of refuge and Levitical assignments (20-21). He himself requested and built Timnath-serah in Ephraim (19:49-51).

As death approached, Joshua first summoned Israel's leaders, urging them to faithfulness in conquest (23), and then assembled the tribal heads to Shechem, charging them to "choose this day whom ye will serve" (24:15). Having renewed their covenant with Jehovah, he inserted it in the book of God's law (24:25-26) and died at an age of 110 (24:29-30; Judg. 2:8-9). Throughout his days, and even thereafter, he maintained Israel in faithfulness to her Lord (Josh. 24:31; Judg. 1:1; 2:7). J.B.P.

JOSHUA, BOOK OF, stands sixth in Scripture, recording how Moses' successor, after whom the book is named, conquered Canaan, as promised (1:1; 24:31; see JOSHUA, above). But while Joshua commences "the historical books" in English (and Greek), it introduces "the prophets" in the original Hebrew canon of Law, Prophets, and Writings. These prophetical books include the "latter prophets," Isaiah-Malachi, but also the "former prophets" — Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings — since Biblical prophets, as God's spokesmen (Exod. 7:1-2), enforced their messages both from the past and from the future. Joshua thus exemplifies historical "prophetic" preaching, in respect to authorship as well as content.

Joshua's prophetic author is not named; but his statements about the deaths of Joshua and his colleagues (Josh. 24:29,31), plus his allusions to Othniel, the migration of the Danites (15:17; 19:47), and the name Hormah (12:14; 15:30; 19:4) indicate his living after the rise of Israel's judges, c. 1380 (Judg. 1:12-13,17). At the same time, his designation of Jerusalem as Jebusite (Josh. 15:8, 63; 18:16,28) and his writing before its choice as the site of God's temple (9:27), require him to antedate David, 1000 B.C. (I Chron. 11:4-6; 22: 1). His references, moreover, to Sidon rather than to Tyre as Phoenicia's leading city (11:8; 13:4-6; 19:28) suggest a date prior to 1200 B.C. Indeed, the writer must have been an eye-witness of the events he describes. For he speaks of the Lord's blocking Jordan, "until we were passed over" (5:1, consonantal Hebrew text); he identifies Israel's previous generation by saying, "God would not show them the land, which . . . He would give us" (5:6); he says of the harlot Rahab, "She dwelleth in Israel even unto this day" (6:25); and after outlining their boundaries he addresses Judah directly, "This shall be your south coast" (15:4). Compare also his detailed narratives (2:3-22; 7:16-26) and repeated use of pre-conquest place names (15:9,49,54). Since the writer follows Moses' deuteronomic style and seemingly had access to Joshua himself (cf. 5:13-15), a proposed author has been Phinehas, the son and successor of high-priest Eleazar, the son of Aaron, who ministered at Peor in 1406 (Num. 25:7-13; 31:6-8) and thereafter (Josh. 22:13-20; Judg. 20:28). Someone, then, of his standing composed the prophetical book of Joshua, approximately 1375 B.C.

"Almost all" (IB II:541) modern critics, however, attribute Joshua to four mutually contradictory source-documents, brought together over a millennium after Phinehas: not such authenticated sources as Joshua's own writings (24:26, plus other sections, cf. P. A. Fernandez, Commentarius in Librum Josue, Paris: P. Lethellieux, 1938, pp. 3-22) and the contemporary poetry (The Book of "the yāshār [Upright]," 10:13, an anthology of hero-songs, cf. David's later lament over Jonathan, II Sam. 1:18), but J.E.D.P. documents, as alleged by Wellhausen for the Mosaic writings (see PENTATEUCH), thus making Genesis-Joshua into a "hexateuch" (cf. Pfeiffer's elaborate analysis, Introduction to the Old Testament, New York: Harper, 1941, pp. 296-313; or John Bright's more cautious approach, which acknowledges the impossibility of tracing-out the "documents," even while insisting upon their existence, IB II:541; or Martin Noth's theory, Das Buch Josua, Tübingen: Mohr, 1938, of a complete, deuteronomic [non-Pentateuchal] history of Israel). In particular, the "E" and "D" records of conquest under Joshua are rejected in favor of the "earlier" "J" records, purportedly teaching a gradual occupation of Palestine by independent tribes (cf. Judg. 1; but contrast W. F. Albright's opposition to Noth and insistence upon Joshua's historicity, though dated in 1230 rather than 1400, BASOR 74 [1939], p. 23, and Bright's harmonizations, IB II:547-548). But while Joshua does fulfill God's former promises (Gen. 13:14-17; 15:13-20), Scripture knows nothing of a hexateuch. The Pentateuchal books of Moses are unique (Josh. 1:7-8; II Chron. 34:14; cf. Christ's own testimony, Luke 24:44), while Joshua forms a sequel to the Law (Josh. 24:26), though doubtless accepted upon completion as a "prophet," and fully canonical in "The Book" (I Sam. 10:25 ASVm).

The prophetical character of Joshua, moreover, affects content, in the book's two divisions: conquest (1-12), and settlement (13-24). The conquest embraces Israel's entrance into Canaan: Joshua's inauguration, the Jericho spies, crossing Jordan, and ceremonies (1-5:12); the conquest of the center: Jericho, Ai, and the assembly at Ebal (5:13-8); of the south: Gibeon, and the Jerusalem confederacy (9:10); and of the north: the Hazor confederacy, plus a summary (11-12). But since this took "a long time" (11:18; 1406-1400 B.C., 14:10), the Biblical content limits itself to representative instances of rewarded faithfulness: "Be strong, and there shall not a man be able to stand before thee" (1:5-6; 11:23). Israel's settlement embraces Joshua's territorial apportionments, at Gilgal (13-17), and Shiloh (18-19), including cities of refuge, Levitical towns, and Transjordan (20-22), and demonstrating how God "gave unto Israel all the land which He sware unto their fathers" (21:43). Then follow Joshua's two farewell addresses, enjoining upon Israel that response which prophecy ever elicits: "The Lord our God will we serve, and His voice will we obey" (24:24). J.B.P.

JOSIAH (jō-zī'à, Heb. yō'shîyāhû, Jehovah supports him), son of Amon and Jedidah and the grandson of Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah. Josiah's reign on the Davidic throne for 31 years was the last surge of political independence and religious revival before the disintegration of the Southern Kingdom which ended with the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

When palace slaves slew King Amon in 642 B.C. the eight-year-old Josiah was crowned king of Judah. While the boy-king grew to manhood, the imposing international influence of Assyria declined rapidly. Insurrections and rebellions in the East and the death of Ashurbanipal (c. 633 B.C.) provided an opportunity for a rising tide of nationalism in Judah. By 612 B.C. the coalition of Media under Cyaxares and Babylon under Nabopolassar converged on Nineveh to destroy Assyria's famous capital. Within three years the Babylonians had routed the last of the great Assyrian army. These decades gave Josiah the political advantage not only to assert Judah's independence but also extended its influence into the northern tribes — perhaps even kindling fond hopes of claiming the boundaries as established by David and Solomon.

Josiah's religious leadership ranks him with Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah as an outstanding righteous ruler. Gross idolatry — Baal altars, asherim, star and planetary worship, Moloch deity acknowledged in the sacrifice of children in the Hinnôm Valley, astrology, occultism, altars for worshiping the host of heaven in the temple court, and the shedding of innocent blood — all these permeated the land of Judah during the reign of Manasseh (686-642 B.C.), whose personal penitence and reform in all likelihood did not penetrate the kingdom of Judah sufficiently to reconstruct the religious pattern. Whatever reform had been affected by Manasseh after his release from captivity was countered by a reversion to idolatry under Amon. Josiah gradually reacted to these godless influences that permeated his kingdom (II Chron. 34). In the eighth year of his reign (c. 632 B.C.) he began to seek after God and four years later initiated reforms. Images, altars, and all manner of idolatrous practices were destroyed not only in Jerusalem and Judah but in the cities of Manasseh, Ephraim, Simeon, and as far north as Naphtali. At the same time offerings and contributions were collected throughout the nation for the restoration of the temple in Jerusalem which had been neglected for such a long period.

In the course of renovating the temple (622 B.C.) the book of the law was recovered. The reformation movement consequently was stimulated anew by the reading of this "book of the Law given by Moses." Not only had the reading and observance of the law been neglected in preceding decades, but it is possible that Manasseh even destroyed existing copies which were in circulation throughout the land of Judah. Huldah the prophetess warned the people of impending judgment awaiting them for their neglect of the law. Stirred by these developments Josiah led his nation in the observance of the Passover in a manner unprecedented in Judah's history.

With the king himself leading the reformation movement, changes in personnel occurred. Priests serving by royal appointment of former kings and dedicated to idol worship were removed from office. Josiah, however, made temple revenues available for their support. The religious climate established by Josiah must have provided favorable conditions for Jeremiah's ministry during the first 18 years of his ministry (627-609 B.C.), even though no references are made to the association of these great leaders in the historical records (II Kings 22-23 and II Chron. 34-35).

In 609 B.C. Josiah's leadership was abruptly ended. In an effort to interfere with Necho's plans to aid the Assyrians Josiah was fatally wounded at Megiddo. National and religious hopes vanished with the funeral of this 39-year-old king so that all Judah had reason to join Jeremiah in lamenting for Josiah. S.J.S.

JOSIBIAH (jŏs'ĭ-bī'à), a Simeonite mentioned only in I Chronicles 4:35. In ASV Joshibiah.

JOSIPHIAH (jŏs'ĭ-fī'à, Heb. yôsiphyâh, Jehovah will increase), the ancestor of 160 men who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:10).

JOT (jŏt), a corruption of iote (found in early editions of the KJV), an English transliteration of iota, the ninth letter of the Greek alphabet, which is the nearest equivalent of the Hebrew yodh, the smallest letter in the Hebrew alphabet and almost identical with our apostrophe sign, '. Used figuratively, the "jot" signifies something of apparently small moment. See Matthew 5:17,18.

JOTBAH (jŏt'bà, Heb. yotbâh, pleasantness), a Levitical city in Judah, just S of Hebron. Called Juttah in Joshua 15:55; 21:16. Mentioned in II Kings 21;19 as the home of the father-in-law of Jotham, king of Judah.

JOTBATH (jŏt'băth), Deuteronomy 10:7; see Jotbathah.

JOTBATHAH (jŏt'bà-thà, Heb. yotbâthâh, pleasantness), a place in the Wilderness of Paran in the peninsula of Sinai where Israel encamped (Num. 33:33,34; Deut. 10:7). Site unknown. In KJV once Jotbath (Deut. 10:7).

JOTHAM (jō'thăm, Heb. yôthâm, Jehovah is perfect). 1. The youngest of the 70 sons of Gideon, and the speaker of the first Bible parable (Judg. 9:5-57). After the death of Gideon, Abimelech, an illegitimate son, got the men of Shechem behind him and desired to make himself a king over Israel. To that end he slew his half-brothers, all but Jotham, the youngest, who hid himself, and so escaped. When the Shechemites had made Abimelech king, Jotham spoke his notable parable of the trees and the bramble and pronounced a curse upon them and upon Abimelech.

2. A man of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:47).

3. King of Judah. He was born a son of Uzziah, king of Judah. Uzziah had been for the most part a good and a powerful king, but his successes turned his head and he intruded into the priest's office (II Chron. 26:16). As a result, he was struck with leprosy, and Jotham acted as regent. Jotham began to reign just about the time when Isaiah began his great ministry (Isa. 6:1) and was probably influenced by that godly man, and perhaps by Hosea and Micah as well. He had victory over the Ammonites, who were forced to pay him heavy tribute, and he himself was a great builder, fortifying several places in Judah and building the upper gate of the temple. For his story see II Kings 15:32-38 and II Chronicles 27.

JOURNEY, SABBATH DAY'S, mentioned only in Acts 1:12, according to tradition, was 2,000 cubits, which would fit the description of the mount called Olivet as being a Sabbath day's journey from Jerusalem.

JOY. In the Word of God, joy is an attribute of Deity (Ps. 104:31), and is an important part of that ninefold "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22,23) which He imparts to believers (Gal. 5:24). Joy is often equated with happiness, but the two are quite distinct. Happiness depends largely upon happenings: good health, congenial company, pleasant surroundings, etc. Happiness and unhappiness do not exist together; but joy and sorrow can and do. Our Lord was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief" (Isa. 53:3) but "for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. 12:2). Paul and Silas, scourged and imprisoned and with their feet in the stocks could hardly be described as "happy," but at midnight they sang praises to God (Acts 16:23-33) with such joy that God caused an earthquake, and not only delivered them but brought joy and salvation to the jailer's household. A.B.F.

JOZABAD (jŏz'à-băd, Heb. yôzāvādh, Jehovah endows). 1. A man from Gederah in Judah who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4 but "Josabad" in KJV).

2. Two men of the tribe of Manasseh who also joined David (I Chron. 12:20).

3. One of the Levites whom Hezekiah appointed to be overseers in the house of God (II Chron. 31:13).

4. A chief Levite in the time of Josiah who gave large offerings of cattle to the Levites for passover offerings (II Chron. 35:9).

5. A Levite who assisted in the weighing of the gold and silver which Ezra and his companions had brought from Babylon as gifts for the house of God (Ezra 8:33).

6. A priest who had married a woman outside of Israel in the days of Ezra, and who gave his promise to put her away (Ezra 10:22).

7. A Levite who had committed the same offense (Ezra 10:23).

8. A Levite, who at the reading of the law in Nehemiah's reformation, translated from the Hebrew as it was read into the Aramaic so that the common people would understand (Neh. 8:7).

9. A chief Levite in Nehemiah's time who helped oversee the outward business of the temple (Neh. 11:16).

JOZACHAR (jŏz'à-kàr, Heb. yôzāchār, whom Jehovah has remembered), one of the two assassins of Joash, king of Judah. He was the son of an Ammonite woman named Shimeath (II Kings 12:20,21; II Chron. 24:26). In the second of these passages he is called Zabad, almost certainly by error of an early scribe. Jozacar in RV.

JOZADAK (jŏz'à-dăk, Heb. yehôtsādhāq, Jehovah is righteous), father of Jeshua the priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:2, etc.). Called Josedech in Haggai and Zechariah.

JUBAL (jōō'băl, Heb. yûvāl), son of Lamech by his wife Adah. He was the inventor of the harp and pipe (Gen. 4:21).

JUBILEE (jōō'bĭ-lē, Heb. yôvēl, ram's horn, trumpet; Gr. iobelaios). According to Leviticus 25, every 50th year in Israel was to be announced as a jubilee year. Three essential features characterized this year. First, liberty was proclaimed to all Israelites who were in bondage to any of their countrymen. The law provided that the price of slaves was to vary according to the proximity of the Jubilee Year. Second, there was to be a return of ancestral possessions to those who had been compelled to sell them because of poverty. This, of course, excluded the possibility of selling a piece of land permanently. This law applied to lands and houses outside of the walled cities, and also to the houses owned by Levites, whether in walled cities or not. As in the case of the price of slaves, the law made provision that the price of real property was to vary according to the proximity of the Jubilee Year. The third feature of this year was that it was to be a year of rest for the land. The land was to remain fallow, even though it had been so in the previous sabbatical year. The people were to live simply, on what the fields had produced in the sixth year and whatever grew spontaneously. It is impossible to say whether the Jewish people ever really observed the Jubilee Year.

JUBILEES, BOOK OF, a Jewish apocalyptic book written in the inter-testamental period. It gives a history of the world from the creation to the giving of the law, and defends Pharisaical views as against liberal Hellenistic tendencies.

JUCAL (jōō'kăl, Heb. yehûkhal, Jehovah is able), one of the evil princes of Judah who put Jeremiah into prison for his prophecies (Jer. 38:1).

JUDA (See Judah)

JUDAEA (See Judea)

JUDAH (jōō'dà, Heb. yehûdhâh, praised). 1. The fourth son of Jacob; his mother was Leah (Gen. 29:35). Few details of his life are known. He saved Joseph's life by persuading his brothers to sell him to the Midianites at Dothan (Gen. 37:26-28.) His disgraceful actions recorded in Genesis 38 left a stain upon his memory. He gradually appears to have achieved leadership among his brothers (Gen. 43:3; 46:28; 49:8-12) and no doubt it was during his own lifetime that the rivalry among them arose which was much later to give rise to the division of the kingdom. Through his son Perez, Judah became an ancestor of David (Ruth 4:18-22) and of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:3-16). The blessing of dying Jacob to Judah (Gen. 49:9, 10) is usually understood as being a Messianic prophecy.

2. Also the name of the Hebrew tribe descended from the man Judah described above. In the wilderness, the tribe camped to the E of the tabernacle, next to the Issachar tribe (Num. 2:3-5). Caleb, a hero among the Hebrew spies and captors of Canaan, was a member of this tribe (Num. 13:6; 34:19). Judah was one of the tribes which stood on Mt. Gerizim to bless the people at the ceremony of covenant renewal at Shechem (Deut. 27:12). After Joshua's death, this tribe seems to have been first in occupying its allotted territory in the southern hill country of Canaan, even to occupying temporarily the city of Jerusalem (Judg. 1:1-20). Upon settling in Canaan, the tribe of Judah occupied the territory extending from the extreme southern point of the Dead Sea eastward to the Mediterranean, lying S of Kadesh Barnea. Its western boundary was the Mediterranean. On the N, the boundary began at the northern end of the Dead Sea and lay westward in a crooked line, running to the S of Jericho, and just S of Jerusalem (the valley of Hinnom, which was the southern boundary of this city was also the Judeans' northern line) and thence to the Mediterranean through Beth Shemesh and Timnah. Of course, the Dead Sea was the eastern boundary (Josh. 15).

Judah's was one of the largest tribal territories. From E to W it measured some 45 miles. The north-south dimension of that part fit for intensive habitation was about 50 miles, while if the Negev area, suited only for scattered dwelling was included, the length was 100 miles. Judah's territory consisted of three north-south belts of land: (1) the Judean hill country (Josh. 15:48), the eastern slopes of which were the wilderness of Judah; (2) the lowlands of Shephelah (Josh. 15:33), the low, rolling land where the hill country meets the plain, and (3) the plain near the Mediterranean sea. The southern part, near and S of Beer-sheba was called the Negev. Much of the tribe's land was hilly and rocky, but apart from the wilderness of Judah and the Negev, was well suited for pasture and for the cultivation of the grape and olive (Gen. 49:11,12). In ancient times the hills were terraced.

During the period of the rule of the judges, Judah tended to be separated from the rest of the Hebrew tribes, which lived to the N, by pagan people dwelling between them (Gibeonites, Josh. 9; Jebusites, Judg. 19:10-13), and also by rough and wild land, with deep east-west valleys to the N of Judah. The Simeonites, who lived in southern Judean cities tended to become assimilated into Judah and thus to lose their tribal identity.

Othniel, the judge who delivered the people from the domination of Mesopotamia, was a Judean (Judg. 3:8-11). The Philistine threat must have been especially troublesome to this tribe, for the Philistine plain, as it came to be called, was actually Judah's coastal plain land. The story of Ruth and Boaz, which centers in Bethlehem, occurs during the time of the judges and first brings the country town of Bethlehem into prominence in Hebrew history. Saul, whose reign brings the judges' period to an end, ruled over Judah, and it was the Judeans who first anointed their fellow tribesman, David, king at Hebron (II Sam. 2:1-4).

3. Judah is also the name of five individuals who are mentioned in Ezra-Nehemiah. Three were Levites (Ezra 3:9; Neh. 12:8; Ezra 10:23), one a Benjamite (Neh. 11:9) and the fifth probably a prince of Judah (Neh. 12:34).

J.B.G.

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

1. The United Hebrew Kingdom. Saul, a Benjamite was Israel's first king (I Sam. 8-II Sam. 1). His reign was not a success, and when he died (about 1000 B.C.), a period of civil war broke out among the Hebrew tribes. Out of this chaos emerged David (II Sam. 1-I Kings 2), a member of the tribe of Judah, who founded the dynasty which continued to rule in Jerusalem until the destruction of the capital city by the Babylonians (587 B.C.). David and his son Solomon (I Kings 2-11) succeeded in unifying the Hebrew tribes and imposing their rule on the whole nation. During their reigns the Hebrews achieved national greatness and empire. When Solomon died, all of this came to an end; the greater part of the nation seceded from the Judean rule to form the northern kingdom of Israel. The Davidic dynasty continued to rule at Jerusalem over a small remnant of the nation. This remnant is called the kingdom of Judah.

2. Background of the Divided Kingdom. It must not be thought that the mere ineptitude of Rehoboam, Solomon's son (I Kings 12) caused the split of the Hebrew kingdom. Ever since their settlement in Canaan after the exodus from Egypt, the Israelite tribes had manifested a fierce independence of each other and a great reluctance to give up tribal sovereignty to a national head. On several occasions during the period of the judges (Judg. 8:1-3; 12:1-6; 20) strife and even open war broke out among the tribes. It would appear that the troubles in the period between the death of Saul and David's move of the capital to Jerusalem (II Sam. 2-4) amounted to a divided kingdom, with Judah (the southern center of power) adhering to David, but Israel (the Joseph tribes in central Palestine, and the northern tier of tribes) keeping aloof from David, seeking to establish Saul's son Ishbosheth as their king. Evidently they felt that accepting David's claims meant giving up too much local autonomy to the central government. After his capture of Jerusalem and the submission of all the tribes to him, David managed to keep the nation together by firm rule combined with a wise handling of explosive personalities. In the weakness of his old age, however, the centrifugal forces again asserted themselves (II Sam. 20). Solomon clamped on the nation a firm rule, assessing heavy taxes and forced labor. We infer that Judah was exempt from his most objectionable requirements, a condition hardly likely to please the ever restless Israelite tribes.

When Solomon died there already existed an Israelite government in exile, headed by Jeroboam, son of Nebat (I Kings 1:26-40). He returned to Palestine to confront Solomon's son Rehoboam with an ultimatum — "make the heavy yoke lighter or we will not serve you" (I Kings 12:1-11). Rehoboam, stubborn and inept, tried to assert force instead of making concessions, and Jeroboam split the kingdom by organizing a secession government in Israel, which ultimately (under Omri) was centered in the city of Samaria.

3. Resources and Organization of the Kingdom of Judah. Rehoboam continued to reign over a small southern region, mainly equal to the territory of Judah. Most of Benjamite territory appears to have gone with the northern rebels (I Kings 12:20), but Jerusalem, in the extreme south of Benjamin, stayed with Judah, because of the presence of Rehoboam's army there, and remained his capital. Thus the boundary between Judah and Israel must have run a few miles N of Jerusalem. All of southern Palestine (much of it desert) was held by Rehoboam. Even so, his territory was not more than half the size of the northern kingdom; his arable land, less than one-fourth as much as Israel's. Judah claimed suzerainty over Edom, and asserted it when she was able. Judah's population (estimated at 300,000) was about half that of Israel's. The northern kingdom had the best farm land and was favored with more rainfall than the south.

In spite of her small size Judah enjoyed certain advantages over Israel. Jerusalem, with its ancient heritage of the temple and its divinely ordained worship, together with the Davidic dynasty and the buildings and traditions of the strong Solomonic empire were hers. Her location in the southern hill country removed her somewhat from the ever increasing tempo of struggle for control of the road to Egypt by the Assyrians, which struggle was to eventuate in Israel's destruction. She tended to be a city state (no other Judean city could begin to compete with Jerusalem) with a homogeneous population and strong centralization of authority, thus avoiding the weakness of decentralization which characterized the northern kingdom. The continuing Davidic dynasty (Israel had nine dynasties during the reign of 19 kings) and a Levitic priesthood (attached to the Jerusalem temple) were sources of continuing strength.

4. The History of the Kingdom of Judah. It is difficult to isolate Judah's history. In the Biblical sources (the books of Kings and Chronicles) the accounts of Israel and Judah are intertwined, with Israel predominating. One gets the impression that Israel's story is dynamic and attractive, while Judah's existence (except for certain great periods) was conservative — essentially a "holding operation."

This article will not attempt to detail the events of the reigns of each of Judah's 19 kings. The student is referred to the articles in this dictionary on each of these kings for the details. The purpose of this article is rather to see the history as a whole. Judah's history from the death of Solomon to the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians may be divided into three periods.

a. Judah from the death of Solomon to the mid-eighth century, 922-742 B.C. During this period of nearly two centuries Judah and Israel lived side by side. For the first two generations the successive Judean kings fought against Israel, seeking to compel her to reunite with the South. Beginning with Jehoshaphat, however, they saw the impossibility of success in this attempt, for Israel was, if anything, more powerful than Judah. Jehoshaphat began a tradition of friendly cooperation with Israel, which, with few exceptions, characterized the Judean kings until the fall of Samaria left the South to carry on alone.

The split of the kingdom at the accession of Rehoboam has been described. Obviously, with this event the Hebrew empire raised by David and Solomon collapsed. Judah was now a second-rate power — a city state in the hills. As if to prove its degradation, Shishak, a soldier turned king of Egypt invaded Palestine seeking to revive the Egyptian empire. According to the Bible he badly looted Jerusalem; Shishak's own historical inscriptions at Karnak indicate that he sacked most of Palestine. Rehoboam's pathetic copper shields, a cheap imitation of the looted gold ones (I Kings 14:25-28) symbolize the condition of post-Solomonic Judah—the grandeur had departed.

Rehoboam and his son Abijah (Abijam) seem to have carried on Solomon's syncretistic tendencies; pagan rites flourished. Asa and Jehoshaphat instituted reforms aimed at purifying the worship of Yahweh of paganism. Jehoshaphat is known for the marriage of his son Jehoram to Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, of Israel, thus sealing his new policy of friendliness for the northern kingdom. This policy seems to have brought great prosperity to Judah, but also the threat that the baalism sponsored by Ahab in Israel might spread to the south.

Jehoram and Ahaziah were briefly succeeded by Athaliah, who was their wife and mother, respectively. She sought to stamp out all the Judean royal house and to make Baalism the worship of Judah. A palace-temple coup resulted in her death (837 B.C.), the restoration of the Davidic line in the person of Joash, the boy king, and the revival of the worship of Yahweh sponsored by Jehoiada the high priest.

Amaziah and Uzziah reigned during a great burst of political and economic prosperity, just before the coming of the Assyrian invasions and Israel's captivity. Judah and Israel occupy briefly much of the old Solomonic empire land. Increased trade brought home great wealth. Luxury (especially in Israel) was unprecedented. It was to the spiritually careless people of this time, at ease in Zion that the great eighth century prophets—Amos, Hosea, Jonah, Isaiah and Micah — came.

b. Judah during the period of the Assyrian Ascendancy, 742-687 B.C. In the third quarter of the eighth century an event occurred which was to influence all of succeeding history. The Assyrian empire, with its capital at Nineveh, moved westward in its effort to capture the civilized world. Ultimately Israel, located as she was on the road to Egypt, was destroyed by Assyria (722 B.C.) and Judah severely damaged.

King Ahaz first brought Judah into the Assyrian orbit when he called on her to relieve him from the attack of an anti-Assyrian coalition, Syria and Israel. Judah was saved, Damascus destroyed and part of Israel overrun by the Assyrians (733-732 B.C.), but at the cost of bringing Judah into the Assyrian orbit. There naturally followed spiritual subordination, and Ahaz introduced Assyrian religious practices into Jerusalem. This problem of imported paganism was to plague Judah until its fall. Late in Ahaz' reign the city of Samaria was destroyed and Israel's national existence brought to an end. Hezekiah, the pious son of Ahaz, sensing a weakening of Assyrian power, sought to throw off both the political and religious yoke of Assyria. Under him, Judah managed to survive the attacks of Sennacherib, although at fearful cost. Hezekiah reformed the national religion, purifying it of paganism. His treaty with the rising power of Babylon, a threat to Assyrian domination of Mesopotamia, although condemned by Isaiah, was another facet of his struggle to keep Judah free. The prophets Isaiah and Micah continue their ministry into this period. Certainly much of Hezekiah's success in religious reform was due to Isaiah's support.

c. The Last Century of the Kingdom of Judah, 687-587 B.C. During Judah's last century of national existence Palestine was the scene of intermittent warfare; empires clashed, fell and rose around her until finally she fell to the last Semitic world empire — Babylon. The destruction of the city of Nineveh (612 B.C.) spelled the fall of the Assyrian empire. It was replaced by the new Babylonian empire, of which Nebuchadnezzar was the militant head. Egypt still tried to play a part in the political struggle and her nearness to Palestine made her also a power to be reckoned with in Judah. Placed between great world powers, relying alternately upon each, but seldom (according to the prophets) on her God, Judah played a fateful, increasingly unsteady role until Jerusalem was destroyed and her people taken captive.

Manasseh, son of Hezekiah, through a long reign chose to submit again to Assyrian political and religious control. His grandson, Josiah, was the last good Hebrew king, and the last one whose reign saw anything like normal times in the Judean kingdom. Josiah's famous revival (621 B.C.), the most thorough-going in Judah's history, was aided by the rediscovery of the Mosaic law (probably Deuteronomy) in the temple. Josiah made a great effort to rid Judah of all paganism and to centralize all the worship of Yahweh at the Jerusalem temple. This meant rebellion against Assyria, which Josiah was able to carry out; in fact, it was during his reign that the Assyrian empire disintegrated. Josiah tragically lost his life trying to oppose the forces of the Egyptian Pharaoh Necho, who were crossing Palestine on their way to Syria to fight in the battles which marked the death throes of Assyria.

During Josiah's reign the young Jeremiah began his prophetic career, which extended into the period of the captivity. A sad man with a depressing message, Jeremiah predicted the fall of the nation because of her sins. Evidently Josiah's revival had done little to stop the downgrade trend.

Unsettled, fearful times followed Josiah's death. King Jehoiakim, a puppet of Egypt, was unworthy to follow his father Josiah. Jeremiah steadily opposed his easy trust that the temple would bring security. The Babylonians raided Jerusalem during his reign (605 B.C.). Finally the proud, wicked king was killed in a coup and his son Jehoiachin replaced him. After three months the Babylonians captured Jerusalem (597 B.C.) and took captive to Babylon many important persons, including the king. This was the beginning of the end. Babylon, having replaced Nineveh as the center of world power would dominate Judah until she destroyed her.

Zedekiah, another son of Josiah, was made regent in the place of captive Jehoiachin. He rebelled against Babylon, made a league with Egypt and so incurred the wrath of the Babylonians that they decided to destroy Jerusalem. After a bitter siege of a year and a half the city fell to Nebuchadnezzar and was destroyed, Zedekiah was blinded and carried to Babylon, and the great bulk of the population taken there with him (587 B.C.). Archaeologists have found that all of the cities of Judah were completely destroyed at this time. Thus ended the glorious kingdom of David and Solomon. Observers would have said that the Hebrew nation was annihilated, and indeed, the other nations conquered by the Assyrians and Babylonians did cease to exist. But the prophets proclaimed a better hope for the chosen people. "A remnant shall return" Isaiah had said, and in time this remnant, purged and returned, became the basis on which a new Israel would be built. J.B.G.

JUDAISM (jōō'dā-ĭz'm), the religious system held by the Jews. Its teachings come from the OT, especially from the law of Moses as found from Exodus 20 through Deuteronomy; but also from the traditions of the elders (Mark 7:3-13), some of which our Lord condemned. The principal elements of Judaism include circumcision, a strict monotheism, an abhorrence of idolatry, and sabbath-keeping.

JUDAS, JUDA (jōō'dăs, jōō'dà, Heb. yehûdhâh, praised, Gr. Ioúdas). 1. An ancestor of our Lord. (Luke 3:30 ASV).

2. A Galilean insurrectionist (Acts 5:37). According to Gamaliel, this Judas perished and his followers were scattered.

3. One of the brothers of our Lord (Matt. 13:55). This Judas is almost certainly the "Jude" who wrote the epistle by that name.

4. An apostle of Jesus called "Judas of James" (Luke 6:16) rendered in KJV "Judas the brother of James," and in ASV "Judas, the son of James."

5. One who apparently had a guest-house or hostel in the street which was called Straight in the city of Damascus and with whom Paul lodged (Acts 9:11).

6. One of the leading brethren in the church at Jerusalem at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15:6-35). His surname "Barsabaš" i.e. "son of Saba" hints that he may have been brother of Joseph Barsabas (Acts 1:23) "the Just" who was so highly regarded by the brethren before Pentecost that he was suggested as a substitute for Judas. Judas Barsabas was a preacher ("prophet," Acts 15:32) and with Silas, was entrusted with the decrees of the Council that they might be delivered safely to the Christians at Antioch. A.B.F.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, the arch-traitor, who betrayed our Lord. He and his father Simon were both surnamed "Iscariot" (see John 6:71 in Greek and in ASV). "Iscariot" is commonly thought to be from the Hebrew Ish Kerioth, i.e. "a man of Kerioth," and Kerioth is almost certainly in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:25). Nothing is known of his early life. He may have joined the disciples of Jesus from pure motives and probably showed evidence of business acumen and so was appointed as treasurer for the disciples (John 12:6; 13:29), but his hopes for a high place in an earthly kingdom of Jesus were dashed (John 6:66) and he became a thief. His indignation when Jesus was anointed at Bethany was hypocritical. His pretended zeal for the poor was really covetousness, and is so interpreted by John (12:6), though the disciples of Jesus apparently trusted him to the end (John 13:21-30). Jesus, however, was not deceived (John 6:64), but knew from the beginning who should betray him. It was only at the last supper that Jesus revealed that "one of you shall betray me" (John 6:71). Then Satan entered into Judas; Jesus dismissed him; and he went out to do the dastardly deed which he had already planned (Mark 14:10). He sold the Lord for thirty pieces of silver, betrayed him with a kiss, then in remorse threw down the money before the chief priests and elders (Matt. 27:3-10) and went out and committed suicide. Matthew (27:5) says he hanged himself, and Acts (1:18) says that falling headlong, he burst asunder. He is always mentioned last among the apostles. A.B.F.

JUDAS BARSABAS (See Judas)

JUDAS OF GALILEE (See Judas)

JUDE (jōōd, Gr. Ioúdas), writer of the last of the epistles in the NT. Both James and Jude in the opening of their epistles show their Christian humility and their faith in the deity of Jesus by referring to themselves as "bond-servants" of Jesus Christ, rather than His brothers in the flesh. Beyond this we know of him from Scripture only that, like his brothers, he did not believe in Jesus during His earthly life (John 7:5), but became His follower after the resurrection (Acts 1:14). Hegesippus (c. 110-c. 180) says that two grandsons of his were brought before Domitian as descendants of David, but were dismissed as harmless peasants.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF. The author of the epistle gives his name as Jude or Judas, and calls himself a bondservant of Jesus Christ and brother of James (vs. 1). There is good evidence for believing that Jude and James were brothers of the Lord (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3), although neither refers to himself as such in his epistle. They were not apostles, and did not believe in Him until after the resurrection. Its destination is quite general: "To them that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ" (vs. 1). It is not clear where he was when he wrote or precisely when he wrote. It could not, however, have been written later than A.D. 81, the year of the accession of the Roman emperor Domitian, as Hegesippus (c. 110-c. 180) says that two grandsons of Jude were brought before Domitian as descendants of David, but were dismissed as harmless peasants, and it is most likely that if Jude were still alive he would have been brought before the emperor. It could have been written as early as A.D. 64, if it was written before II Peter.

The occasion for the writing of the epistle was the appearance among Jude's readers of an alarming heresy with immoral tendencies, perhaps the Gnosticism rebuked elsewhere in the NT, and its aim was to save them from its inroads. How he had received information about this is not told, but it is obvious that he was deeply disturbed about it. A striking feature of the book is the use made of apocalyptic literature. There is an almost exact quotation from the Book of Enoch (1:9) in Verses 14 and 15, and Verse 9 apparently refers to something recorded in the Assumption of Moses. The epistle also has echoes from the Testament of Moses.

The epistle bears a striking resemblance to II Peter 2-3:4 in the subjects treated, the illustrations used, and even in the language. Because of this it is generally held that one of the writers must have made use of the other, but there is no agreement about which came first. It is apparent, however, that in Peter the description of false teachers is predictive, whereas in Jude the false teachers are actually present; and, moreover, in Jude the false teachers are worse than in Peter. Both writers seem to have in view the same corrupt parties. It appears, therefore, that Peter's is the older writing.

After the introduction and the reason given for the writing of the epistle in Verses 1-4, Jude announces the condemnation in store for the false teachers (vss. 5-16). He then explains the duty of Christians in the circumstances (vss. 17-23), and ends with a doxolgy (vss. 24,25).

Because of its brevity it was not quoted by the earliest Church Fathers and apparently was not everywhere known in the church. Origen and Clement of Alexander (c. 200) say that in their day it was not universally received, and Eusebius (c. 325) says the same thing. The Muratorian Canon, however, dating c. 200, includes it among the books of Scripture, and it was undoubtedly part of the Christian canon for many, long before this. S.B.

JUDEA, JUDAEA (jōō-dē'a, Heb. yehûdhâh, Gr. Ioudaía), a geographical term that first appears in the Bible in Ezra 5:8, where it designates a province of the Persian Empire. The land of Judea is also mentioned in the apocryphal books I Esdras (1:30) and I Maccabees (5:45; 7:10). Since most of the exiles who returned from the Babylonian exile belonged to the tribe of Judah, they came to be called Jews and their land Judea.

Under the Persian empire, Judea was a district administered by a governor who was usually a Jew (Hag. 1:14; 2:2). With the banishment of Archelaus, Judea became annexed to the Roman province of Syria; but its governors were procurators appointed by the Roman emperor. Their immediate superior was the proconsul of Syria, who ruled from Antioch (Luke 3:1). The official residence of the procurators was Caesarea. This was true during the ministry of Christ. Geographically, Judea was about 55 miles N to S, and the same distance E to W, extending from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea, with its northern boundary at Joppa, and its southern a few miles S of Gaza and the southern portion of the Dead Sea. Its exact boundary was, however, never fixed. S.B.

JUDGE (Heb. shōphēt, Gr. dikastés, krités), a civil magistrate. In patriarchal times the judges were the heads of families and the elders of the tribes. Moses, on the advice of Jethro, organized the judiciary of Israel, assigning judges for groups of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, while only the most important cases were brought before him (Exod. 18:13-26; Deut. 1:9-17). Samuel established an organized circuit court (I Sam. 7:16; 8:1). After the institution of the monarchy, cases were tried by the king in the palace gate (I Kings 7:7), but there were also local courts (I Chron. 23:4; 26:29). Jehoshaphat organized a supreme court at Jerusalem (II Chron. 19:5-8). The public could view the proceedings of the court (Exod. 18:13; Ruth 4:1,2). In criminal cases at least two witnesses were necessary (Deut. 19:15; Num. 35:30). The prophets often complained about courts corrupted by bribery and false witnesses (Isa. 1:23; Amos 5:12; Micah 3:11).

JUDGES, THE.

1. The civil magistrate. In patriarchal times Hebrew life was organized around the family and clan. Heads of families ("patriarchs") and elders of the tribes were the judges (Gen. 38:24) and their authority was based on custom.

After the Exodus from Egypt, Moses (upon the advice of Jethro (Exod. 18:13-26), organized the nation into groups of thousands, hundreds, fifties and tens, within each tribe. Over each unit a qualified man was placed as judge, and only the most important cases were brought before Moses (Deut. 1:12-18; 21:2). Upon entering Canaan, a similar plan of local government was followed (Deut. 16:18-20; 17:2-13; 19:15-20; Josh. 8:33; 23:2; 24:1; I Sam. 8:1). During the period of the judges the office assumed a very different character; this will be treated below.

When the monarchy was instituted, the king himself tried important cases (II Sam. 15:2; I Kings 3:9,28; 7:7; Prov. 20:8). David assigned Levites to the judicial office, and appointed 6000 as officers and judges (I Chron. 23:4; 26:29). According to II Chronicles 19:5-8, Jehoshaphat enlarged the judicial system of Judah with a kind of supreme court, made up of Levites, priests and heads of fathers' houses, at Jerusalem.

The prophets often complained bitterly that justice was corrupted by bribery and false witness (Isa. 1:23; 5:23; 10:1; Amos 5:12; 6:12; Mic. 3:11; 7:3). Kings were often unjust (I Kings 22:26; II Kings 21:16; Jer. 36:26) and the case of Ahab's seizure of Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21:1-13) shows how far a king could go in getting his own way, in flagrant contradiction of law and custom, at least in the northern kingdom of Israel.

In OT times the judges' activities were not limited to what today would be considered judicial functions. Our present division of powers between the legislative, executive and judicial is a modern innovation. The word judge is often parallel to king (Ps. 2:10; 148:11; Isa. 33:22; 40:23; Amos 2:3). In several Semitic languages the term used in the Hebrew Bible for judge (shōphēt) is used for rulers of various kinds. This breadth of meaning attached to the term judge in ancient times leads to its extended use in the book of Judges.

2. The leaders during the period of the judges. From the time of the death of Joshua to the reign of Saul, Israel's first king, the principal leaders of the people were called judges. These men and their times are described in the book of Judges and in I Samuel 1-7. They were charismatic leaders; that is, they were raised up to be Israel's "saviors" by a special endowment of the Spirit of God. It is clear that they were judges only in the broadest sense of that term. In reality, they were principally military deliverers, raised up to save the people of Israel from oppressing foreign powers. Much general information about the period of the judges, together with a complete list of their names and the regions in which they ruled is given in the article, JUDGES, BOOK OF.

This discussion will be restricted to a consideration of the careers and times of the most important of the judges. The times were most distressing. The period was cruel, barbarous and bloody. The tribes, scattered in the hill country of Canaan, were divided into many separate enclaves. Even the tabernacle at Shiloh, which should have provided a religious unity, seems to have been generally neglected in favor of the local high places. Only an unusual crisis, such as the crime which brought on the Benjamite war (Judg. 19:1-30; 20:1) could bring the tribes to united action. It would appear that Judah in the south was unusually isolated from the other tribes.

The first judge mentioned in detail is Ehud, son of Gera (Judg. 3:12-30). A Benjamite, he is said to have been lefthanded, a serious defect in those superstitious times. Few if any of the judges are pictured as ideal individuals. The occasion of the raising up of Ehud was an oppression by Eglon, king of Moab, who with the Ammonites and Amalekites(all Transjordan herdsmen or nomads), occupied the region of Jericho ("the city of palm trees," 3:13). After 18 years of oppression, Ehud led a revolt by killing Eglon when he presented the tribute. The gory details of the deed fit well this violent period. With Ephraimite help Eglon took the fords of the Jordan and slew the Moabites as they sought to flee homeward. There followed an 80-year period of peace.

In the second detailed deliverance story (Judg. 4,5), the scene shifts from the lower Jordan valley to the valley of Jezreel and the Galilee hill country in northern Palestine. The oppressor is Jabin, king of Canaan, who reigned in Hazor, whose 900 chariots of iron must have struck terror into the Hebrew tribes still in the stone age (I Sam. 13:19-22). The recent excavation of Hazor by Israeli scholars has underscored the importance of this Canaanite stronghold, probably the largest city in ancient Palestine. The deliverers were Deborah "the prophetess," surely the actual leader of the uprising, and Barak, son of Abinoam, a fearful man (4:8) who led the Hebrew army at Deborah's urging. The tribes of the Galilee hill country united for this battle, which was fought in the valley of Jezreel by the brook Kishon. Evidently a cloudburst upstream caused the Kishon to overflow onto the plains through which it flows, thus immobilizing the Canaanite chariots, upon which they depended (4:15; 5:20-22). The army of Jabin defeated, his general Sisera fled, only to be killed ignominiously by the woman Jael (4:17-22). Deborah's warlike song of praise (Judg. 5) is believed to be one of the oldest poems of the Bible, and is noted for its rough primitive vigor. A 40-year rest followed this deliverance.

The third great judge was Gideon (chaps. 6-8), the location of whose village of Ophrah is a matter of uncertainty. It was located somewhere W of the Jordan, probably in the region between Beth-Shan and Tabor. The oppressing Midianites, desert Bedouin from the Transjordan region, had crossed the Jordan, because of the internal weakness of the land, and were raiding in Palestine proper. Gideon is commonly remembered for his doubt and reluctance to take action (6:15,17,36-40; 7:10) but it should be noted that once he assumed command he proved a steady and effective soldier (6:25-27; 7:15-24). His ruse, carried out by a mere 300 companions, frightened the disorganized Bedouin from the valley of Jezreel into full retreat across the Jordan. Gideon promptly called the Ephraimites to take the Jordan fords, by doing which they destroyed the Midianites. Gideon appears to have established some form of regular rule over at least the region of the Jezreel valley during his lifetime. His importance can be gauged by his rather large domestic establishment (8:30). Adhering to the ancient ideal of charismatic leadership, he rejected the idea of setting up a dynasty (8:22,23). His rule is said to have lasted 40 years.

The story of Gideon's son Abimelech and his violent rule over the Shechem area in the central hill country is told in Judges 9. Abimelech is not called a judge and he appears more as a brigand or political-military adventurer than as a deliverer of Israel from an oppressing enemy. He died as he lived — his head crushed by a millstone; and finally killed by his armorbearer. Probably his career is described solely to give a feeling of the violent unsettled state of things during the times of the judges. If that is its purpose, it can be said to have succeeded.

Jephthah, a Transjordan chieftain, next appears (Judg. 11,12), as the deliverer of Gilead and Manasseh (northern Transjordan) from the oppression of the Ammonites — a pastoral people who pressured Manasseh from the south. He is chiefly remembered for his thoughtless vow (11:30,31). While authorities differ as to what was involved in it, it is not unlikely that the vow involved offering his daughter as a sacrifice to God in the event of victory over the Ammonites (11:34-39). If it be objected that this was completely out of keeping with Hebrew religious practice, it may be answered that this only shows the extent of the religious degradation of the Hebrews during this turbulent period.

The last of the great judges was Samson (Judg. 13-16) with whom the scene shifts to a different part of Palestine — the Philistine Plain. It is likely that Samson lived late in the judges period, at the time when a large invasion of the Palestinian seacoast was occurring. The invaders, sea peoples from the Aegean area, had been repulsed in their attempt to enter Egypt (by Ramses III) and had subsequently settled in what became known as the Philistine Plain. Samson lived in the Shephelah area which bordered that plain. He was dedicated to a life of Nazirite obedience before his birth. His life was the tragedy of one whose great potential was vitiated through the lack of self discipline.

Hardly a very religious person, Samson was known for his great strength. He thus became the Hebrews' champion against the Philistines, doubtless as the Philistine Goliath later did against the Hebrews. His failure to discipline his sensuous nature led him into three liaisons with Philistine women. Doubtless each was an instrument of the Philistine lords in their effort to subdue Samson.

We do not know that Samson ever led a Hebrew army against the Philistines. Rather, he made single-handed exploits in Philistine territory, a number of which are described (14:19; 15:4,5,8,15; 16:3). The story of Samson's subduing at the hand of Delilah is well known. Killing in his death more Philistines than he killed in his life (16:30), he became at the last a tragic figure. He had judged Israel 20 years.

Eli (I Sam. 1-4) and Samuel (I Sam. 2:12) are also called judges. Although they did do some of the work of the judges described above, it would seem better to regard them as priest and prophet respectively — transitional figures preparing the way for the monarchy. J.B.G.

JUDGES, BOOK OF. The seventh book of the OT takes its name from the title of the men who ruled Israel during the period from Joshua to Samuel. They are called judges (shōphetîm, Judg. 2:16), their principal function being that of military deliverers to the oppressed Hebrews.

The book makes no clear claim to authorship or date of composition. Much of it appears to be very old. The Jebusites are referred to as still dwelling in Jerusalem (1:21). David's capture of Jerusalem about 1000 B.C. (II Sam. 5:6-10) brought this situation to an end. The Canaanites still dwelt in Gezer (1:29) which city first became Hebrew at the time of Solomon (I Kings 9:16). On the other hand, there are also references which cannot be understood except as written at a time well after that of the judges. The thematic "In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25) could not have been written before the reign of Saul; indeed, it would be unlikely until a time well after the institution of the monarchy, when the earlier chaotic days tended to be forgotten. The reference to the worship at Dan "until the day of the captivity of the land" (18:30) seems to be a reference to the conquest of Galilee by Tiglath-pileser III in 733 B.C. It would seem, then, that the book contains very old material which may well have been edited at a later date. It may be noted that recent scholarship, while holding to a later date for the final editing of the book, emphasizes the historicity of the narrative and its use as the major source for our understanding of the period of the judges.

It is difficult to date the historical period covered by the book of Judges. It appears to have ended about a generation before Saul became king; thus we may place the end of the book at about 1020 B.C. The date of the death of Joshua, with which the book opens, depends upon the date of the Exodus from Egypt, about which there is much dispute. Accordingly, some scholars date the beginning of the judges period at c. 1370-60 B.C.; others, at c. 1220-10 B.C.; still others, later. At first sight it would appear that the book itself gives the answer, for it states the duration of the judgeships of the various judges. A close examination of the text, however, reveals that most of the judges were local, not national in their influence, and it appears likely that their periods overlapped. Further, the frequency of the number 40 for the length of their office (3:11; 5:31; 8:28; 13:1; I Sam. 4:18) makes it appear likely that this figure is a round number for a generation and not to be taken exactly.

The purposes of the book of Judges are: 1. To bridge in some manner the historical gap between the death of Joshua and the inauguration of the monarchy. 2. To show the moral and political degradation of a people who neglected their religious heritage and compromised their faith with the surrounding paganism. 3. To show the need of the people for the unity and leadership by a strong central government in the person of a king.

In its structure, the book falls into three easily recognizable parts: (1) Introduction: the state of things at the death of Joshua, 1:1-2:10; (2) Main body: the judges' cycles, 2:11-16:31; (3) Appendix: life in Israel in the days of the judges, 17-21.

1. Introduction, 1:1-2:10. This section gives a description of the state of the conquest of Canaan when Joshua died. It is a record of incomplete success. The less desirable hill country had been taken, but the fertile plains and the cities were still largely in Canaanite hands. This description does not contradict the conquest story in the book of Joshua, which only claims that the Hebrew armies had "blitzkrieged" the whole land, while plainly stating that not all had been possessed (Josh. 13:1-6). It was one thing for the Hebrew armies to sweep through the land; it was quite another for the individuals and tribes of the Hebrews to dispossess the Canaanites from the land and settle there. This latter they failed to do. This failure meant that the Hebrews lived as neighbors with pagan Canaanites, and thus the way was prepared for the syncretism which so characterized the Hebrews during this period. Their culture and religion were often largely Canaanite and pagan. This is the reason for the moral and spiritual degradation of the Hebrew people during the period of the judges.

2. Main body of the book, 2:11-16:31. Here occur the stories of the judges, the cycles of failure, oppression and relief by a judge. The cycle is set forth in the abstract in 2:11-3:6. There follow the stories of the judges. It will be noted that these men were not principally civil magistrates. They were rather military deliverers, who led the people of Israel to freedom against their enemies, and seem frequently to have been singularly unfitted to be what we would today denominate judges. The judges, and that part of Israel which they served (when that can be known), are here listed. For a discussion of the principal judges, see article JUDGES, THE.

1. Othniel (3:7-11).
2. Ehud (3:12-30): Central Palestine and Transjordan.
3. Shamgar (3:31): Philistine plain.
4. Deborah and Barak (4, 5): Central Palestine and Galilee.
5. Gideon (6-8): Central Palestine and Transjordan.
6. Abimelech (9): Central Palestine. Abimelech is considered by many as merely an outlaw and not a judge.
7. Tola (10:1, 2): Central Palestine.
8. Jair (10:3-5): Transjordan.
9. Jephthah (10:6-12:7): Transjordan.
10. Ibzan (12:8-10): Southern Palestine.
11. Elon (12:11, 12): Northern Palestine.
12. Abdon (12:13-15): Central Palestine.
13. Samson (13-16): Philistine plain.

3. Appendix, 17-21. The events recorded here seem to have occurred, not after the judges mentioned in the main part of the book, but during their judgeships. They are relegated to the appendix probably because they are stories in their own right and if inserted in the main body would have marred the symmetry of the judge cycles there. These stories describe life during this turbulent near-pagan period, and give a frank and unvarnished description of the brutality and paganism with which Israel was contaminated because of her close association with her pagan Canaanite neighbors.

The Levite (17, 18) was a priest who could follow his religious practice anywhere. He was hired as a family chaplain and soothsayer, and his presence was certain to bring "good luck" (17:13). He evidently functioned with idols (18:20) and was quite willing to change situations if the change involved a better salary (18:19, 20). All of this is in direct contrast to the divine command concerning the priesthood in the Mosaic law.

The migration of the Danites (chap. 18) was necessitated by their failure to capture the territory assigned to them (Josh. 19:40-48; Judg. 1:34-36.) They then traveled to a northern valley, remote and defenseless, captured it and settled there. Thus originated the northern Dan, known in the expression, "From Dan to Beersheba."

The story of the Levite's concubine (chap. 19) casts a livid light on the brutality and beastliness of the times and introduces the war of the tribes against the Benjamites (20, 21). This is not the only intertribal war of the period (8:1-3; 12:1-6). In fact, it is clear that the loyalty of the Hebrews at this time was a merely tribal one, as is the case with the Bedouin until today. There was no real Hebrew nation; Israel was at best a very loose confederation of tribes around a central sanctuary, the tabernacle at Shiloh (18:31).

The cruelty and paganism of the stories of Judges are often a stumbling block to readers. It should not be imagined that the writer is approving of everything which he records. Rather, the book should be viewed as a story of the tragic judgment of God upon a people who failed to keep their heritage of true religious faith by assimilating far too much of their surrounding culture. The story of the Judges has been called "The struggle between faith and culture." In this struggle, faith lost.

All this should not close our eyes to the beauty of the book of Judges as literature. Many of the stories would rank high in any collection of the short stories of the world. Even in the most brutal passages there is an austere dignity. Sin is never reveled in; it is always held up to the gaze of horror. In the pungent words of Jotham (9:7-15), Judges has preserved almost the only fable in ancient Hebrew literature. The song of Deborah, much studied by recent scholars, has a sonorous quality and vivid narrative power. The narratives of the book are amazingly brief. The Hebrew literary artist was at his best when he crammed action and emotion into a few sentences. J.B.G.

JUDGMENT (jŭj'mĕnt, Heb. dhîn, mishpāt, etc., Gr. krima, krisis, etc.), a word found many times in the Bible, referring sometimes to the pronouncing of a formal opinion or decision by men, but more often to a calamity regarded as sent by God, by way of punishment, or a sentence of God as the judge of all. Among the more important judgments of God prior to the Exodus are those upon Adam, Eve, and the serpent after the fall, (Gen. 3) the Flood (Gen. 6:5), Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 18:20), and the confusion of tongues (Gen. 11:1-9). God brings judgment to His creatures when they rebel against His will.

In the OT the relationship between Jehovah and Israel is thought of under the form of a covenant. God says He will take care of His people and protect them from their enemies if they will be His people, living in accordance with His will. The history of Israel, beginning with the Exodus, is the story of a succession of judgments upon the enemies of God's people and upon His covenant nation when they flouted His will. The "day of Jehovah" becomes a day of punishment for all the unjust, even for those who boast of belonging to the people of the covenant (Isa. 2:12; Amos 5:18; Hos. 5:8). The purpose of the judgment of God's people is not their total destruction, but their purification. A remnant will survive, and this will be the nucleus of the new Israel (Amos 5:15). In the later prophets there are expressions of a hope of an ultimate victory of the divine Judge, of a final or last judgment. Here God's judgment is not thought of so much in terms of His intervention in history, but of a last judgment at the end of time of all men. Perhaps the clearest expression of this is found in Daniel 12:1-3, where the dead are described as being raised, some for everlasting life, others for shame and everlasting contempt.

In the NT the idea of judgment appears in both human and divine contexts. Jesus warns against uncharitable judgments (Matt. 7:1). Paul says that the spiritual man cannot be judged by unbelievers (I Cor. 2:15), and in Romans 14 and I Corinthians 8-10 he warns against judging those who are "weak" in the faith.

In the NT, judgment is one of the aspects of the coming of the kingdom of God. God's judgment, says John the Baptist, will fall upon those who do not make ready the way of the Lord (Luke 3:9). Jesus declares that some day He will come to judge both the living and the dead (Matt. 25:31ff).

In the NT, as in the OT, judgment is an aspect of the deliverance of believers (Luke 18:1-8; Rom. 12:19; II Thess. 1:5-10; Rev. 6:10). God is long-suffering in meting out judgment so that men may be able to come to repentance (Luke 13:6-9; Rom. 2:4; II Peter 2:9). The notion of judgment, when God will overthrow every resistance, both among evil spiritual powers (I Cor. 6:2, 3) and also among men (Matt. 25:31-46). This judgment will affect all men, because all are responsible to God according to the grace that has been granted them (Matt. 11:20-24; Luke 12:17ff; Rom. 2:12-16). This present world will be shaken and destroyed (Matt. 24:29, 35), and a new world will replace the present one (II Peter 3:13; Rev. 21:1). God will entrust the administration of this final judgment to His Son at His appearance in glory (Matt. 3:11, 12; John 5:22; Rom. 2:16, etc.). S.B.

JUDGMENT, DAY OF (See Judgment)

JUDGMENT HALL (Gr. praitórion), originally the tent or building where the general or governor held council. In John 18:28—19:9 KJV renders it "hall of judgment" or "judgment hall," whereas ASV uses the Latin term praetorium, but with "palace" in the margin. The term comes in again in the story of Paul at Caesarea (Acts 23:35), where it refers to the palace of Herod, used as the official residence by the propraetors Felix and Festus in their day. In Matthew 27:27 KJV renders the word "common hall"; and in Philippians 1:13 KJV has "palace," and ASV "praetorian guard," but with "praetorium" in the margin.

JUDGMENT SEAT (Gr. béma, a raised place, platform, tribune), the bench or seat where a judge sits to hear arguments and pleas and delivers sentence. Although the word is used principally in the NT in connection with the trials of Christ (Matt. 27:19, John 19:13) and of Paul (Acts 18:12), its principal theological interest is concerned with the judgment seat of Christ before which all believers will stand (Rom. 14:10, II Cor. 5:10).

JUDITH (jōō'dĭth, Heb. fem. of yehûdhî, Judean, Jew). 1. One of the wives of Esau (Gen. 26:34) and daughter of Beeri the Hittite.

2. Heroine of the apocryphal book of Judith.

JULIA (jōōl'ya, Gr. Ioulía), an early Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom. 16:15), perhaps the wife of Philologus.

JULIUS (jōōl'yŭs, Gr. Ioúlios), a Roman centurion of the Augustan band in whose care Paul was placed for the journey to Rome (Acts 27:1,3). He trusted Paul to go to his friends at Sidon, and he with his soldiers saved Paul's and their lives by frustrating the sailors' plot near Malta.

JUNIA, JUNIAS (jōō'nĭ-a, jōō'nĭ-ăs), a kinsman and fellow prisoner of Paul (Rom. 16:7). He had become a Christian before Paul's conversion (Rom. 16:7).

JUNIPER (See Plants)

JUPITER (jōō'pĭ-tẽr, Gr. Zeús, páter), the chief of the Roman gods. The Greeks called him "Zeus." The people of Lystra called Barnabas "Jupiter" and Paul "Mercury" (Acts 14:12, 13). In Acts 19:35 that "which fell down from Jupiter" was probably a meteorite which the Ephesians worshiped as an image of Diana. Jupiter was worshiped all over the Greek and Roman world.

JUSHAB-HESED (jōō'shăb-hē'sĕd, Heb. yûshav hesedh, mercy has returned), a son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:20).

JUSTIFICATION (jŭs'tĭ-fĭ-kā'shŭn, Heb. tsedheq, tsādhēq, Gr. dikaióo, to make valid, to absolve, to vindicate, to set right). Justification may be defined as, "that judicial act of God, by which, on the basis of the meritorious work of Christ, imputed to the sinner and received by him through faith, He declares the sinner absolved from his sin, released from its penalty, and restored as righteous."

Representative Scriptures from which the doctrine is derived are Acts 13:38,39; Romans 3:24-26 and Romans 4:5-8, where justification is said to be an act of God in the life of the believer by which man is freed from the penalty of sin and identified with the life and nature of Christ in a positive application of grace.

The Nature of Justification. As a reversal of God's attitude toward the sinner because of his new relation in Christ, justification is: a declarative act, by which the sinner is declared to be free from guilt and the consequences of sin (Rom. 4:6-8; 5:18-19; 8:33-34; II Cor. 5:19-21); a judicial act in which the idea of judgment and salvation are combined to represent Christ fulfilling the law on behalf of the sinner (Rom. 3:26; 8:3; Gal. 3:13; II Cor. 5:21; I Pet. 3:18; Matt. 10:41 and I Tim. 1:9); a remissive act in which God actually remits the sin of man unto forgiveness (Rom. 4:5 and 6:7); and, a restorative act by which the forgiven sinner is restored to favor through the imputation of Christ's righteousness (Rom. 5:11; Gal. 3:6; I Cor. 1:30).

The major emphasis in justification is that it is an act of God. It is an act, however, from three perspectives: an act in process of completion, as a continuous operation of the work of Christ (Rom. 4:25; 5:18); an act as already accomplished in the completed work of Christ (Rom. 5:16-18 and I Tim. 3:16); and, at the same time, as a state in Christ to which the justified sinner is elevated (Rom. 8:10 and I Cor. 1:30).

The Essentials of Justification. Four basic essentials in the act of justification are taught by Scripture. Justification involves:

1. Remission of punishment, in which the justified believer is declared to be free of the demands of the law since they have been satisfied in Christ (Rom. 4:5) and is no longer exposed to the penalty of the law (Rom. 6:7). It is more than a pardon from sin, but a declaration by God that the sinner, though guilty, has had the fact of his guilt remitted in Christ.

2. Restoration to favor, in which the justified believer is declared to be personally righteous in Christ, and therefore accepted as being in Christ's righteousness. Mere acquittal or remission would leave the sinner in the position of a discharged criminal. Justification goes further in that it implies that God's treatment of the sinner is as if he had never sinned since he is now regarded as being personally righteous in Christ (Gal. 3:6). In this restoration there is not only acquittal, but approval; not only pardon, but promotion. Remission from sin is never separated from restoration to favor.

3. Imputed righteousness of God, which is granted the justified believer through Christ's presence in him. His salvation in Christ imparts the quality and character of Christ's righteousness to him (Rom. 3:25,26). Christ is made the Justifier through whom a new life is inaugurated in the believer (I Cor. 1:30). Paul uses the word righteousness to mean both the righteousness which acquits the sinner and the life-force which breaks the bondage of sin. Salvation can never be separated from the participational act of man in Christ, in which he is regarded judicially as having righteousness because the actual effect of righteousness has indeed come to him (Phil. 3:9; Rom. 3:22).

4. New legal standing before God in which, instead of being under the condemnation of sin, the justified believer stands before God in Christ. There has been an absolute interchange of position: Christ takes the place of the sinner, the place of curse (Gal. 3:15) being made sin in our behalf (II Cor. 5:21) and judged for our sin; while we stand in Christ's righteousness (Rom. 3:25) and are viewed as sons (Gal. 4:5).

The Grounds of Justification. The grounds upon which justification rests is the redeeming work of Christ's death. The inherent righteousness of Christ is the sole basis upon which God can justify the sinner (Rom. 3:24; 5:19; 8:1; 10:4; I Cor. 1:8; 6:11; II Cor. 5:1; and Phil. 3:9). It is this righteousness which, in being imputed to the justified believer, is the ground of his justification in that it declares him to have the same standing before God in personal holiness as Christ Himself (Titus 3:7).

The instrumental cause of justification is faith, as the response of the soul to God's redeeming grace (Rom. 3:28). Faith is the condition of justification not in that it is considered meritorious, but only as the condition by which the meritorious work of Christ is apprehended by man. The final ground of justification is the completed, finished, sufficient work of Christ atoning for man in His redeeming work upon the cross. C.B.B.

JUSTUS (jŭs'tŭs, Gr. Ioústos, just). 1. The surname of Joseph Barsabas, one of the two whom the "brethren" appointed as candidates for Judas' place among the Twelve (Acts 1:23-26).

2. The surname of Titus, of Corinth, with whom Paul lodged for a time (Acts 18:7).

3. The surname of Jesus, an early Hebrew Christian at Rome, evidently known to the Christians at Colosse (Col. 4:11).

JUTTAH (jŭt'ä, Heb. yuttâh, extended), a town of the tribe of Judah, about five miles S of Hebron in the hill-country (Josh. 15:55; 21:16). It was later given to the family of Aaron as a priestly city. The same as Jotbah q.v. The place is now called Jutta.

K

KAB (See Cab, also Weights and Measures)

KABZEEL (kăb'zē-ĕl, Heb. kavtse'ēl, [whom] God gathers), a city in the south of Judah near the border of Edom (Josh. 15:21). It was the home of Benaiah (II Sam. 23:20), one of David's mighty men. In Nehemiah 11:25 it is called Jekabzeel. The site is unknown.

KADESH (kā'dĕsh, Heb. qādhēsh, from qādhôsh, be holy), also Kedesh, Josh. 15:23, or Kadesh-barnea, was also known in Biblical times as En-mishpat (cf. Gen. 14:7). Though there is some uncertainty concerning its modern identification, it is usually identified as 'Ain Qedeis, discovered by J. Rowlands in 1842 and rediscovered by H. C. Trumbull in 1881, in the Negev (cf. Gen. 20:1), about fifty miles south of Beersheba. This K. should not be confused with Kadesh on the Orontes, the site of the famous battle between Rameses III and the Hittites, presently identified as Tell Nebi Mend (this K. is not mentioned in the Bible, with the possible exception of II Sam. 24:6, LXX). The first Biblical reference to K. is Genesis 14:7, where it is equated with En-mishpat, one of the cities singled out in connection with the invasion by the four eastern kings. When Hagar fled from Sarah (Gen. 16:7), she was met by the angel of the Lord at Beer-lahai-roi, which was located between K. and Bered (Gen. 16:14). Later, Abraham went from Mamre toward the Negev and lived between K. and Shur (Gen. 20:1). The primary relationship of the Israelites to K. centers in the period of some years that they spent there during the exodus from Egypt (cf. Deut. 1:46; Num. 33:37-38; Deut. 2:14). From Horeb (Sinai), via Seir, it was an eleven-day journey to K. (Deut. 1:2). K. is described as being in the wilderness of Paran (Num. 13:26); it is also said to be in the wilderness of Zin (Num. 33:36; cf. Num. 20:1); Psalm 29:8 mentions "the wilderness of Kadesh." These references illustrate the overlapping of geographic territories whose precise limits are difficult to determine and indicate the character of K. as a border location. When the Israelites reached this place, Moses sent the twelve spies to scout southern Canaan (Num. 13:1,17,26; 32:8; Deut. 1:19-25; Josh. 14:6-7). Encouraged by the Lord to invade the land at that time, the people rebelled (Deut. 9:23) and were sentenced to the delay in possessing the land (Num. 14:34). At K., Miriam died and was buried (Num. 20:1). It was in this area also that the waters of Meribah ("Contention") were located (Num. 20:2-13,24; Meribath-Kadesh, Num. 27:14; Deut. 32:51). It seems likely that while the Israelites were in this region they did not stay only at 'Ain Qedeis, which preserves the ancient name of K., but that they also availed themselves of nearby springs such as 'Ain Qudeirat and 'Ain Qoseimeh. K. was also on the west border of Edom and it was from K. that Moses sent emissaries to the king of Edom to request permission for Israel to pass through Edomite territory (Num. 20:14-16,22; cf. Judg. 11:16-17). The conquest of the southern section of Palestine by Joshua refers to an area from K. to Gaza (Josh. 10:41). K. also is named as marking the southern border of Judah (Josh. 15:3,23) and therefore the southern boundary of the land possessed by the Israelites (Num. 34:4; Ezek. 47:19; 48:28). C.E.D.

KADESH-BARNEA (See Kadesh)

KADMIEL (kăd'mĭ-ĕl Heb. kadhmî'ēl, God is in front), head of a family of Levites who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:40, Neh. 7:43). He helped in the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 3:9). One of his family sealed the covenant (Nah. 10:9).

KADMONITES (kăd'mŏn-īts, Heb. kadhmōnî, children of the East), a very ancient tribe, one of the ten whose possessions God gave to the seed of Abraham. They lived somewhere between Egypt and the Euphrates (Gen. 15:18-21).

KAIN (kān, Heb. kāyin, smith). 1. A town in Judah, in KJV spelled Cain (Josh. 15:57).

2. A tribal name; KJV has "the Kenite" (Num. 24:22; Judg. 4:11). See KENITES.

KALLAI (kăl'ā-ī, Heb. qallai, swift), a high priest in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:20), of the family of Sallai.

KAMON (See Camon)

KANAH (kā'na, Heb. qānâh, reeds). 1. A brook running from S of Shechem westward to the Mediterranean Sea. It formed a part of the boundary between the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:8; 17:9).

2. A city near the boundary of the tribes of Asher (Josh. 19:28) probably modern Kana, about eight miles SE of Tyre.

KAREAH (kà-rē'à, Heb. qārēah, bald), father of Jonathan and Johanan, who warned Gedaliah the Babylonian governor of Judah of his danger (II Kings 25:23, where KJV has Careah; Jer. 40:8-43:5).

KARKA (kàr'kà, Heb. ha-qarqā'âh, ground), a place on the southern boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:3). KJV has Karkaa.

KARKOR (kàr'kôr, Heb. qarqōr), a place in the territory of the Ammonites where Zebah and Zalmunna were resting with the remains of the great army of the Midianites, and where Gideon overtook them and destroyed them (Judg. 8:10). Exact location unknown.

KARTAH (kàr'tà, Heb. qartâh, city), a city in Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites in the days of Joshua (Josh. 21:34).

KARTAN (kàr'tăn, Heb. qartān), a city in Naphtali given to the Gershonite Levites in Joshua's time (Josh. 21:32). Copied in I Chronicles 6:76 as Kiriathaim (KJV Kirjathaim), which means the same.

KATTATH (kăt'ăth, Heb. kattath), a town in Galilee given to Zebulun (Josh. 19:15). Perhaps the same as Kitron in Judges 1:30.

KEDAR (kē'dêr, Heb. kēdhār, probably either mighty or dark). 1. One of the 12 sons of Ishmael, son of Abram by Hagar (Gen. 25:13). These sons were called "princes." They helped originate the Arab peoples.

2. The tribe which descended from him, and their territory. They were for the most part nomads (Ps. 120:5, S. of Sol. 1:5), raising sheep (Isa. 60:7), but sometimes intruding into villages (Isa. 42:11). The "doom of Kedar" declared in Jeremiah 49:28-33) tells us something of their desert civilization and also of their terror when they learned that Nebuchadnezzar was coming against them. Their territory was in the northern part of the Arabian desert.

KEDEMAH (kĕd'ē-mà, Heb. qēdhmâh, eastward), son of Ishmael, head of a clan (Gen. 25:15).

KEDEMOTH (kĕd'ē-mŏth, Heb. qedhēmôth, eastern parts), a place E of the Jordan given to the tribe of Reuben (Num. 21:21-32, Deut. 2:26), later set apart for Merarite Levites with its suburbs (Josh. 21:37).

KEDESH (kē'dĕsh, Heb. qedesh, sacred place). 1. A city of the Canaanites conquered by Joshua in his northern campaign (Josh. 12:22), later given to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:37), appointed as a city of refuge (Josh. 20:7, 21:32) and bestowed upon the Gershonite Levites. Here Barak and Deborah assembled the hosts of Israel to fight against Sisera of the Canaanites (Judg. 4:6-10), and about 600 years later Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, conquered the land of Naphtali, including Kedesh and took their people to Assyria (II Kings 15:29).

2. A city in the tribe of Issachar, given to the Gershonite Levites (I Chron. 6:72).

3. A city in the very southern part of Judah near the border of Edom (Josh. 15:23).

KEDESH NAPHTALI (See Kedesh)

KEDRON (See Kidron)

KEHELATHAH (kē'hē-lā'thà, Heb. kehēlāthāh, gathering), a station in the wilderness of Paran where Israel encamped (Num. 33:22,23).

KEILAH (kē-ī'là, Heb. ke'îlâh). 1. A city lying in the Shephelah (Josh. 15:44). It was threatened by the Philistines, but David rescued it (I Sam. 23: 1-13) and Abiathar the priest joined him there. The people of Keilah were ungrateful and David had to flee from there.

2. A man of Judah, descended from Caleb, son of Jephunneh (I Chron. 4:19).

KELAIAH (kē-lā'yà, Heb. kēlāyâh), also Kelita, a Levite who had taken a foreign wife in the days of Ezra and gave her up (Ezra 10:23).

KELITA (See Kelaiah)

KEMUEL (kĕm'ū-ĕl, Heb. kemû'ēl). 1. Son of Nahor and brother of Bethuel, therefore uncle of Laban and Rebekah (Gen. 22:21). Nahor had married his niece Milcah, daughter of Terah's oldest son Haran (Gen. 11:28) who had died before the family left Ur of the Chaldees. Kemuel had a son Aram.

2. A prince of the tribe of Ephraim appointed by Moses to help divide the land of Canaan (Num. 34:24).

3. Father of Hashabiah, a leading Levite in the days of David (I Chron. 27:17).

KENAN (kē'năn), a great-grandson of Adam (I Chron. 1:2). In KJV of Genesis 5:9-14 Cainan.

KENATH (kē'năth, Heb. qenāth, possession), a city of the Amorites in the region of Bashan in the kingdom of Og. In the last days of Moses, one Nobah, presumably of Manasseh, went and took it with its outlying villages and named it after himself (Num. 32:42). Later the two little kingdoms of Geshur and Aram, near Mt. Hermon, took Kenath along with the cities of Jair who had 23 cities in the land of Gilead (I Chron. 2:22,23). KJV apparently makes "Geshur and Aram" the direct objects instead of the subjects of the sentence, a possible but very unlikely rendering. Cf. ASV, which seems better.

KENAZ (kē'năz, qenaz, hunting). 1. A grandson of Esau through Eliphaz (Gen. 36:11,15). He and others are called "dukes" in KJV under the influence of English titles, and "chiefs" in ASV, but the Arab title "sheikh" would give a truer picture.

2. Father of Othniel (Josh. 15:17; Judg. 1:13; 3:9-11).

3. A grandson of Caleb through his son Elah (I Chron. 4:15), though the Hebrew seems ambiguous here. KJV reads "even Kenaz," and ASV, "and Kenaz," but neither is clear.

KENEZITE, KENIZZITE (kē'nĕz-īt, kē'nĭz-īt, Heb. qenizzî), a patronymic name derived from Kenaz. One of the ten tribes of Canaan in the days of Abram, mentioned only in Genesis 15:19. No one knows who was the "Kenaz" from whom these Kenizzites were descended; and the tribe disappears from history with this mention. Some think that the Edomite tribe descended from Kenaz, grandson of Esau (Gen. 36:11,15) united at least in part with Israel because Caleb of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 14:6,14) is called the "son" of Jephunneh the Kenizzite.

KENITES (kē'nīts, Heb. ha-qēnî, smith). 1. One of the ten tribes of Canaan in the time of Abraham (Gen. 15:19), perhaps the same as those doomed by the prophecy of Balaam (Num. 24:21,22).

2. The descendants of Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses (Judg. 4:11). Hobab visited Israel as they left Sinai and Moses invited him to come along with Israel and to act as a pathfinder (Num. 10: 29-32), which he did. His descendants were friendly with Israel; they went with Judah from Jericho (Judg. 1:16) and amalgamated with the tribe of Judah. Later, Heber the Kenite (Judg. 4:11) separated from the others and moved northward to Kedesh near the Sea of Galilee and made peace with Jabin, the king of Hazor. Heber's wife Jael, slew Sisera the Canaanite general, and so fulfilled Deborah's prophecy to Barak that a woman would get the honor for his victory (read Judg. 4). Later Saul, sent to destroy the Amalekites, gave friendly warning to the Kenites (I Sam. 15:6) to depart and save themselves, because of the kindness they had shown to Israel more than 500 years before. David told Achish, king of Gath (I Sam. 27:10), that he had raided the Kenites, but this was to deceive Achish.

KENIZZITES (See Kenezite)

KENOSIS (kē-nō'sĭs, Gr. kénosis, from kenóo, he emptied himself, divested himself of his privileges, Phil. 2:7). Apart from the context in Philippians, the verb has two main meanings: 1. to make empty of content, to deprive of possession or property; 2. to ruin, destroy, come to nothing.

Kenosis concerns what Christ did when he became man. In Philippians 2:6-8 Paul pictures Christ as existing in the form of God. He says that Christ did not count the being on an equality with God a prize to be taken advantage of or to be profited by. Rather, "he made himself of no reputation" (KJV), "he emptied himself" (ASV, RSV).

The idea that Christ emptied Himself has given rise to much theological speculation. Did Paul mean Christ emptied Himself of deity, that He ceased to be God? Certainly this is not what Paul meant. That would be self-annihilation and a complete transmutation of being. In the early 20th century some theologians insisted that Christ retained the divine attributes of holiness, love, and truth while emptying Himself of the attributes of omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence. A. H. Strong denied any such surrender of the characteristics of God. Because there were times that Christ did not show omniscience (see Matt. 24:36; Mark 13:32), Strong concluded that Christ did surrender the independent exercise of these attributes. From this point of view, Christ had, for example, omniscience when the Father granted to Him this quality. But all such speculation about attributes assumes that "empty himself" must be the meaning of kenoo in Philippians 2:7 and ignores the context.

A careful study of the context shows that a different translation is preferable. The pre-incarnate Christ is said to have existed or have been in the form of God. He did not regard His being on an equality with God as a prize to be used to His own advantage. Rather, He deprived Himself by taking (or when He took) the form of a servant. The question now must be asked: of what did He deprive Himself? He deprived Himself of the manner of living which He had with God before He became man. Behm shows how this is true when he says: "The form of God, in which the pre-existent Christ was, is nothing different than the divine 'glory'; the 'being in the form of God' of Paul corresponds perfectly with John 17:5: 'with the glory which I had with you before the world was'" (TWNT, IV, 759). By his own voluntary decision Christ deprived Himself of His manner of living, surrounded by glory. This manner of living He had always enjoyed with His Father. The form of God involved glory. The form of a slave involved humility. Christ did not cease to be God when He deprived Himself of divine glory. Neither has Christ ceased to be man because He is free from the humiliation of the servant. In depriving Himself of His pre-incarnate manner of living, involving the radiation of divine glory from His being, Christ made clear His complete awareness of all that redemption costs. Such a self-deprivation is described further in Philippians as a humbling of Himself (2:8), a becoming obedient even to the point of death. This is followed by God's exaltation of Christ with every being confessing that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2: 11). Glory forsaken is forever reclaimed.

KERCHIEF (See Dress)

KEREN-HAPPUCH (kĕr'ĕn-hăp'ŭk, horn of antimony, i.e. beautifier), the youngest daughter of Job, born to him after his release from the torments of Satan (Job 42:14,15).

KERIOTH (kēr'ĭ-ŏth, Heb. qerîyôth, cities). 1. Kerioth-hezron (not "Kerioth and Hezron" as in KJV), a city in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:25); otherwise "Hazor." Said to have been about ten miles S of Hebron.

2. A city of Moab, and judging from Amos 2: 1-3 probably its capital in the eighth century B.C. In "the judgment of Moab" (Jer. 48) Moab is pictured as ruined because of its idolatry (vs. 13) and its pride (vs. 29) and Kerioth is pictured as under judgment from God (vss. 24,41). The city lay in what is now Jebel Druz, nearly S of Damascus and in high country.

KEROS (kē'rŏs), one of the Nethinim (temple servants), some of whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47).

KETTLE (Heb. dûdh, a cooking vessel), mentioned with pan, pot and caldron, and elsewhere translated by all these terms. Also a basket for carrying clay or bricks (I Sam. 2:14).

KETURAH (kĕ-tū'rà), Abraham's second wife (Gen. 25:1), married probably after the death of Sarah and marriage of Isaac (Gen. 24:67); but called his concubine (I Chron. 1:32; cf. Gen. 25: 6). She was the mother of six sons, ancestors of Arabian tribes (Gen. 25:2-6; I Chron. 1:33).

KEY (Heb. maphtēah, opener), an Oriental key was made of wood, with nails or wooden pegs to fit corresponding holes in the bolt which held the door fast (Judg. 3:25). Figuratively, a symbol of authority, carried on the shoulder (Isa. 22:20-22). Greek kleís, something which shuts (Luke 11:52); symbolic of the authority given to Peter (Matt. 16: 19), but which Jesus still retains (Rev. 1:18; 3:7); the key which keeps destructive forces (Rev. 9:1) and Satan (Rev. 20:1) in the bottomless pit.

KEZIA, KEZIAH (kĕ-zī'à), the second of three daughters of Job born after his great trial (Job 42:14). The name means "cassia."

KEZIZ (kē'zĭz), a valley near Beth-hoglah in Benjamin, KJV; a city, Emek-keziz (Josh. 18:21 ASV, RSV). Emek means valley. Location uncertain.

KIBROTH-HATTAAVAH (kĭb'rŏth-hă-tā'à-và, the graves of lust or greed), the next encampment of the Israelites after they left the wilderness of Sinai. Here they longed for flesh and gorged themselves on the quails God sent, dying of the resulting sickness. This explains the name (Num. 11:34,35; 33: 16,17; Deut. 9:22).

KIBZAIM (kĭb-zā'ĭm), a town in Ephraim, assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:22). Jokmean appears in its place in I Corinthians 6:68.

KID (See Animals: Goats)

KIDNEY (kĭd'nē, Heb. always in the pl. kelāyôth, Gr. nephroí). This organ, being surrounded by pure fat, was adapted to burning in sacrifice, when the whole animal was not burned (Exod. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:4,10,15; 4:9; 7:4; 8:16,25; 9:10,19). Slaughter in a war which is a judgment of God is a sacrifice in which the kidneys figure (Isa. 34:6). "The finest of the wheat" ASV,RSV was called "fat of kidneys of wheat" KJV, ASV margin (Deut. 32:14). From their inaccessible location in the body, the kidneys were regarded as the seat of the emotions; KJV, ASV margin, reins, usually "heart" in ASV, RSV text (Job 19:27; Ps. 7:9; Jer. 11:20, etc.). Once RSV has "soul" (Prov. 23:16); ASV, RSV "inward parts" in Psalm 139:13. RSV has "kidneys" in Job 16:13, in a literal sense. In the NT, for KJV, ASV reins, RSV has "mind," parallel with "heart" (Rev. 2:23).

KIDRON (kĭd'rŏn, kī'drŏn, Heb. qidhrôn, Gr. Kédron), the valley along the E side of Jerusalem, in which is the Pool of Gihon, whose water was brought by an aqueduct into the Pools of Siloam within the walls. South of the city the Kidron joins the Valley of Hinnom near the Pool of En-rogel, and the united valley, Wâdi en-Nâr, runs down to the Dead Sea. Through the Kidron Valley runs a winter torrent, the Brook Kidron, dry much of the year. David's crossing of the Kidron (II Sam. 15:23) in his escape from his rebellious son Absalom, marked the decisive abandonment of his throne. When Solomon spared Shimei, he warned him that to cross the Kidron would bring him death (I Kings 2:37). Asa burned idols at the brook (I Kings 15:13; II Chron. 15:16); also Josiah (II Kings 23:4,6,12); Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:16; 30: 14). It is called "the brook" (II Chron. 32:4) which Hezekiah stopped, to deny the attacking Assyrians a water supply. Nehemiah went up it by night to view the state of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:15 KJV, ASV brook, RSV valley). Jeremiah mentions it in prophesying the permanent rebuilding of Jerusalem (Jer. 31:38-40). Our Lord crossed it on His way out of the city after the Last Supper, to reach the Garden of Gethsemane on the slopes of the Mount of Olives (John 18:1, KJV Cedron). He must often have looked across this valley "as he sat on the Mount of Olives" (e.g., Matt. 24:3; Mark 13:3) and crossed it on His triumphal entry to Jerusalem (Matt. 2:1-11; Mark 11:1-10; Luke 19:28-44; John 12:12-19). KINAH (kī'nà), a city in the extreme south of Judah, near the border of Edom (Josh. 15:21,22), perhaps near Arad (Judg. 1:16); site uncertain.

KINE (See Animals: Cattle)

KING, a male ruler, usually hereditary, of a city, tribe or nation. Heb. melekh may mean possessor, stressing physical strength, or counselor, decider, stressing intellectual superiority. Some combinations of the two ideas probably was in the minds of most people, the latter predominating in better governed societies. Gr. basileús, is of obscure origin, but always denoted a ruler and leader of a people, city or state. Kings often had priestly functions in the maintenance of the religion of the group, though most of these were separated from the kingly office in the Heb. monarchy: the king was expected to further religion, but not to act as its priest. In the Orient, kings came to be regarded as divine beings: this was true of Egypt from the beginning; the idea was taken over by the Greek empire of Alexander and his successors, later by the Romans, after their empire came to include most of the East.

The earliest king mentioned in the Bible is Nimrod (Gen. 10:8-12), whose Mesopotamian kingdom was extensive. From this region came the kings who warred with kings of Canaan and were driven off by Abraham (Gen. 14). God promised Abraham (Gen. 17:6) and Jacob (Gen. 35:11) that kings should be among their descendants. There were city-kings such as Abimelech (Gen. 20:2), called king of the Philistines (Gen. 26:1, 8); kings of Edom (Gen. 36:31; I Chron. 1:43) before Israel had kings. Later the Edomites called their rulers dukes, chiefs or sheikhs. Kings of Egypt, the pharaohs, figure in the Egyptian period of Israelite history (Gen. 39-Exod. 14; Deut. 7:8; 11:3); also later when Egyptian influence was strong in Judah. Israel contacted many kings in their wanderings (Num. 20:14-33:40; Deut. 1:4-4:47; 7:24; 29:7; 31:4) and in Canaan (Josh. 2:2-24:12; Judg. 1:7-11:25; I Sam. 14:47; 15:8,20,32, Agag; 21:10,12; 22:4). These varied in power from headmen of towns to rulers of large areas.

It is reiterated that in the time of the judges there was no king in Israel (Judg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25); every man did that which was right in his own eyes. Moses had foreseen that the people would demand a king as a strong human ruler (Deut. 17:14,15; 28:36), not content with theocracy, but the direct rule of God over them (Deut. 33:5). Hannah looked forward to a time when there would be a God-appointed and anointed king of Israel (I Sam. 2:10). Israel, however, toward the end of Samuel's judgeship, was unwilling to wait for a Messianic King, and demanded one like all the nations (I Sam. 8:5,22; 19:19,24; 12:1-25; cf. Hos. 13:10). Samuel duly warned the people what to expect of a king, then selected Saul, whose choice they ratified. The reigns of Israelite kings are chronicled; Saul (I Sam. 12-31; I Chron. 10); David (II Sam.; I Kings 1; I Chron. 11-29); Solomon (I Kings 1-11; I Chron. 28-II Chron. 9); later kings of Israel and Judah (I Kings 12-II Kings 25; II Chron. 10:36). Ezra, Nehemiah and Esther deal with kings of Persia.

The prophets (especially Isa. 1-31; 36:1-39:7; Jer.; Lam.; Ezek.; Dan.) refer to kings of Judah and other nations. Job reflects that in death all are equal with kings (Job 3:14); that God debases kings (12:18); Eliphaz observes that trouble and anguish vanquish a man as does a king prepared for battle (Job 15:24); Bildad says that the wicked "is brought to the king of terrors" (Job 18:14); Job remembers that in prosperity he was like a king (29:25); Elihu thinks of the fear inspired by a king (Job 34:18); and sees that God sets Leviathan "a king over all the children of pride" (Job 41:34). Psalm 2 contrasts the Messianic king (vs. 6) with kings of the earth (vss. 2 and 10). Some references in Psalms are to human kings (Ps. 20:9; 21:1,7; 33:16; 63:11; 68:12,14,29; 72:10,11; 76:12; 89:27; 102:15; 105:14,20,30; 110:5; 119:46; 135:10,11; 136:17-20; 138:4; 144:10; 148:11; 149:8); some to God as King (Ps. 5:2; 10:16; 18:50; 145:1; 149:2, etc.). Psalm 24 acclaims the Lord as King of glory. Psalm 45 may have been a marriage-song for King Solomon, but its language well suits a messianic interpretation. Proverbs contains maxims for a king's conduct (e.g. Prov. 31:1-9). Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon view a king's life from the inside. Isaiah develops the concept of a messianic King (Isa. 32:1; 33:17) identified with the Lord (33:22; 42:21; 43:15; 44:6). Jeremiah refers to God as King (Jer. 8:19; 10:7,10; 46:18; 48:15; 51:57) and to the messianic King (23:5). Ezekiel 37:22,24 refers to the Davidic king of restored Israel whom the context shows to be messianic. The messianic King enters Jerusalem riding on a colt (Zech. 9:9); and God is King (Zech. 14:9,16,17; Mal. 1:14). Nebuchadnezzar praises the King of heaven (Dan. 4:37).

The Gospels speak of kings in general (Matt. 10:18; 11:8; 17:25; 18:23; 22:2,7,11,13; Mark 13:9; Luke 10:24; 14:31; 21:12; 22:25); Herod the Great (Matt. 2:1,3,9; Luke 1:5); Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:9; Mark 6:14,22-27); David (Matt. 1:6); the messianic King of the Jews (Matt. 2:2; 21:5; 25:34,40; 27:11,29,37,42; Mark 15:2,9,12,18,26,32; Luke 19:38; 23:2,3,37,38; John 1:49; 6:15; 12:13,15; 18:37,39; 19:3-21); and God (Matt. 5:35). References in Acts are to earthly kings except 17:7, Jesus. A few references in the Epistles are to earthly kings; one is to God (I Tim. 1:17, cf. 6:15). In Revelation, besides earthly kings, reigning and prophesied, Jesus Christ is introduced as prince (ruler) of the kings of the earth (1:5), who made us kings (1:6; 5:10, ASV, RSV a kingdom; cf. I Pet. 2:9). The king of the apocalyptic locusts (Rev. 9:11) is the angel of the bottomless pit. God is King (Rev. 15:3) and the Lamb is King of kings (17:14). A king sits on a throne, holds a scepter (Ps. 45:6); wears a crown (II Kings 11:12); lives in a palace (I Chron. 29:1); rides in a royal chariot (I Sam. 8:11). From a few military and civil officers for city-kings and for Saul, the royal bureaucracy rapidly expanded (I Sam. 8:10-18) to the dimensions of David's (II Sam. 23:8-39; I Chron. 11:10,47) and Solomon's (I Kings 9:22; 4:1-28; II Chron. 8:9,10) establishments. Yet Solomon judged comparatively trivial cases (I Kings 3:16-28); Ahab shared the personal oversight of his cattle (I Kings 18:5,6). The Persian monarchy was a vast empire (Esth. 1:1). Kings frequently met death by assassination. Among God's chosen people a rightful king was designated by God and anointed by His representative (I Sam. 9:15,16; 16:1-13) with the approval of the people. He ruled by virtue of a covenant between God and His people, to which the king was a party (II Sam. 7). This covenant was extended and renewed as the basis of the NT Kingdom of God or of heaven, of which Jesus is sovereign until at the resurrection He delivers the Kingdom to His Father (I Cor. 15:24-28).

KINGDOM OF GOD (Gr. basileía toú theoú). The word "kingdom" is capable of three different meanings: 1. the realm over which a monarch reigns; 2. the people over whom he reigns; 3. the actual reign or rule itself. In English, the third use of the word is archaic and therefore is not always given its rightful place in discussion of the term; but in Greek and Hebrew, this is the primary meaning.

All three meanings are found in the New Testament. 1. The Kingdom of God is sometimes the people of the Kingdom. In Revelation 5:10, the redeemed are a kingdom, not, however, because they are the people over whom God reigns but because they will share His reign. The same usage appears in Revelation 1:6.

2. The Kingdom of God is the realm in which God's reign is experienced. This realm is sometimes something present, sometimes future. It is a realm introduced after the ministry of John the Baptist into which men entered with violent determination (Luke 16:16). John did not stand within this new realm but only on its threshold; but so great are the blessings of God's Kingdom that the least in it is greater than John (Matt. 11:11). Jesus offered the Kingdom to Israel, for they were its proper heirs (Matt. 8:12); but the religious leaders, followed by most of the people, not only refused to enter its blessings but tried to prevent others from entering (Matt. 23:13). Nevertheless, many tax-collectors and harlots did enter the Kingdom (Matt. 21:31; see also Col. 1:13). In all of these verses, the Kingdom is a present realm where men may enjoy the blessings of God's rule.

Elsewhere the Kingdom is a future realm inaugurated by the return of Christ. The righteous will inherit this Kingdom (Matt. 25:34) and will shine like the sun in God's Kingdom (Matt. 13:43). Entrance into this future Kingdom is synonymous with entering the eternal life of the Age to Come (Matt. 19:16,23-30; Mark 10:30).

3. The kingdom is also God's reign or rule. Basileia is used of kings who have not received "royal power" (RSV) or "authority to rule as kings" (Rev. 17:12). Later, these kings give their "kingdoms," i.e., their authority, to the beast (Rev. 17:17). In Luke 19:12 a nobleman went into a distant country to receive the crown (basileia) that he might be king over his country.

This "abstract" meaning of kingdom is evident in many passages. Only those who "receive the kingdom of God," i.e., accept God's rule here and now, enter into the realm of its blessings in the future (Mark 10:15). When we seek God's Kingdom and righteousness, we seek for God's rule in our lives (Matt. 6:33).

However, God's Kingdom is not merely an abstract rule. The Kingdom is God's rule dynamically active to defeat evil and redeem sinners. I Corinthians 15:24-26 says that Christ must reign as King until He has destroyed (katargeo) all enemies, the last of which is death, and that He then will deliver the Kingdom to God. From this passage, we understand that the Kingdom of God is the dynamic rule of God manifested in Christ to destroy His (spiritual) enemies and to bring to men the blessings of God's reign.

The New Testament pictures three stages in the victory of God's Kingdom. Death is not finally destroyed until the end of the millennial reign of Christ (Rev. 20:14). Yet Christ has already destroyed (katargeo) death and brought life and immortality to light (II Tim. 1:10) through His death and resurrection.

Satan will be finally destroyed in the lake of fire at the end of the Millennium (Rev. 20:10); but at the beginning of the Millennium he is to be chained and locked in the bottomless pit (Rev. 20:1-3). Here are two future stages in the "destruction" of Satan; but there is yet a third. Christ became incarnate "that through death he might destroy (katargeo) him who has the power of death, that is, the devil. . . ." (Heb. 2:14,15).

This first defeat or "destruction" of Satan's power is reflected in Matthew 12. Jesus claimed that His ability to cast out demons was evidence that the Kingdom of God had come among men (Matt. 12:28). Furthermore, He said that no one could enter a strong man's house (Satan's realm) and despoil his goods (deliver demon-possessed men and women) "unless he first binds the strong man" (vs. 29). By this metaphor of binding, Jesus asserts that the Kingdom of God has come among men to break Satan's power and deliver men from satanic bondage.

Thus the Kingdom of God — His redemptive rule — has come into history in the person of Christ to break the power of death and Satan; it will come in power and glory with the return of Christ to complete the destruction of these enemies. Because of this present victory of God's Kingdom, we may enter the realm of its blessings in the present yet look forward to greater blessings when Christ comes again.

We may now define the Kingdom of God as the sovereign rule of God manifested in Christ to defeat His enemies, creating a people over whom He reigns, and issuing in a realm or realms in which the power of His reign is experienced.

The diversity of the New Testament data has led to diverse interpretations. 1. The Old Liberal interpretation of Harnack views the Kingdom as the essence of ideal religion and altogether a present subjective and spiritual reality, having to do with the individual soul and its relation to God. 2. Consistent Eschatology. Albert Schweitzer held that the Kingdom was in no sense a present spiritual reality. On the contrary, Jesus taught that (a) the Kingdom of God was altogether a future eschatological reality which would come by a miraculous inbreaking of God to terminate human history and establish the Kingdom; (b) and this apocalyptic Kingdom was to come immediately. Jesus' mission was to announce the imminent end of the world and to prepare men for the impending day of judgment. 3. Realized Eschatology. C. H. Dodd has reinterpreted eschatological terminology so that it no longer refers to the "last things" at the end of the Age but to the "ultimate" realities experienced in Christ. The Kingdom of God is the eternal which was broken into time in Christ. 4. Inaugurated Eschatology is a mediating view between Schweitzer and Dodd. The Kingdom of God is indeed being realized in the present, but there must also be an eschatological consummation. Many scholars follow Schweitzer in holding that Jesus expected an immediate end of the world, but modify His view by recognizing that in some sense the Kingdom was also present in the person of Jesus. They hold that Jesus was right in the basic structure but wrong in the time of the coming of the Kingdom.

In conservative circles, four views may be distinguished:

1. Classical premillennialism (the view set forth in this article) teaches that the Kingdom of God has to do primarily with redemption. The Kingdom was offered to Israel; but when it was rejected, its blessings were given to "another nation" (Matt. 21:43), the Church (which is a "holy nation," I Pet. 2:9). The Kingdom now works in the world through the church, bringing to all who will receive it the blessings of God's rule. The return of Christ is necessary for the final defeat of the enemies of God's Kingdom and will involve two stages: the Millennium or thousand-year period when the glory of Christ's reign will be manifested in history and human society, and the Age to Come with its new heavens and new earth (Rev. 21:1; II Pet. 3:12-13). Israel, which is still a "holy people" (Rom. 11:16), is yet to be saved and brought into the blessings of the Kingdom, but in terms of New Testament redemption rather than the Old Testament economy. This view accepts the basic premise that the Old Testament prophecies are to be interpreted in terms of the New Testament teaching.

2. Dispensational premillennialism finds its definition of the Kingdom in the Old Testament. The Kingdom of God is theocratic, not soteriological. It is the earthly Davidic (millennial) Kingdom destined primarily for Israel. It does not have to do primarily with the Church nor with the redemptive blessings brought into the world by Christ but with the earthly national blessings promised to Israel. This view believes that God has two plans which must be kept separate: an earthly national plan for Israel and a spiritual redemptive plan for the Church. The Kingdom has to do with the former, not with the latter.

3. Amillennialism is a modification of classical premillennialism, accepting its basic definition and structure of the Kingdom but omitting the millennial stage. The Kingdom is God's redemptive rule in Christ working in the world through the Church which will come to its consummation with the Second Coming of Christ to inaugurate the Age to Come. Most amillennialists deny that Israel has any future but see the Church as the new Israel which has experienced the fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies in spiritual terms.

4. Postmillennialism sees the Kingdom as the reign of God in Christ through the Church, destined to conquer all the world and to establish God's reign in all human society through the triumphant preaching of the Gospel. Only after this "Millennium" or Golden Age will Christ return for the final judgment, the resurrection of the dead to inaugurate the Age to Come. G.E.L.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN (See Kingdom of God)

KINGDOM OF ISRAEL (See Israel)

KINGDOM OF JUDAH (See Judah)

KINGS, I AND II, BOOKS OF. These are named in English, as in Hebrew, by subject-matter: four centuries of Israelitish kings, from David (his death in 930 B.C.) to Jehoiachin (in Babylon, after 561). They thus provide a sequel to the books of Samuel, which embrace the reigns of Saul and David. The LXX actually entitles I and II Samuel "Books A and B of the Kingdoms" (Latin Vulgate and KJV subtitle: "I and II Books of the Kings"), so that I and II Kings become, correspondingly "III and IV King(doms)s." Like Samuel, Kings was written as a unit but was divided in two at the time of the LXX translation, about 200 B.C. In the original Hebrew canon, moreover, of Law, Prophets, and Writings, Kings preceded Isaiah-Malachi as the concluding volume of the "former prophets," following Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. For though listed among the "historical books" in English (and Greek), these four works possess an essentially prophetic character (contrast the priestly volumes of Chronicles, which see), employing the events of past history as a vehicle for contemporary preaching (cf. Dan. 9:6). Thus, even as Isaiah scanned the future to motivate his people's obedience (1:19-20), so the anonymous author of Kings drove home lessons, born of previous disasters, "Because they obeyed not the voice of the LORD their God" (II Kings 18:12).

The date of composition is not specified; but the author refers repeatedly to conditions that remain "unto this day" (e.g., the presence of the ark within the temple, I Kings 8:8; cf. 9:21; 12:19), indicating that he wrote prior to the destruction of Judah in 586 B.C. (II Kings 8:22; 16:6; 17:41 are less definite.) Even had he drawn upon earlier sources (see below), an Exilic writer would hardly have penned such words. Threatening predictions of the Exile (I Kings 9:7-9; II Kings 20:17-18; 21:14; 22:19-20) fail to invalidate this conclusion. I Kings 4:24 indeed speaks of the western Fertile Crescent as "beyond the River Euphrates" (ASVm); but this phrase had become stereotyped during Assyrian times and does not require Babylonian composition. Numerous stylistic parallels exist between the sermonic portions of II Kings 17 and 21 and the writings of Jeremiah. The whole book, moreover, breathes the spirit of Josiah's Deuteronomic reform of 621 B.C. (C. F. Burney lists 51 verbal parallels, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Kings, Oxford: Clarendon, 1903, pp. xiii-xiv). The prophet Jeremiah may thus well have composed I and II Kings, in his youthful enthusiasm for the Josianic reformation (Jer. 11:1-8; cf. Isaiah's similar authorship of a biography of Uzziah, II Chron. 26:22).

Yet following the climactic eulogy of Josiah, "Like unto him was there no king before him, that turned to the LORD . . . according to all the law of Moses," II Kings 23:25b adds, "Neither after him arose there any like him." Verse 26 goes on to assume the Exile (as does 24:3-4); II Kings 25:6-7, 11,21, describes the Captivity; and 25:27-30, though without awareness of the return in 538 B.C., speaks of events in Babylon from 561 down to the death of Jehoiachin (Jer. 52:34). It would appear, therefore, that the final two and a half chapters of II Kings from 23:25b, plus the total years of Josiah's reign in 22:1) must have been added, in Babylon, over half a century after the earlier writing. Talmudic tradition attributes the entire work to Jeremiah (Baba Bathra 15a); but Jeremiah seems to have died in Egypt, shortly after 586 B.C. (Jer. 42-44). J. E. Steinmueller indeed follows the rabbinic tradition that Jeremiah, in his old age, might have been taken to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, after his campaign against Egypt in 568 B.C. (A Companion to Scripture Studies, New York: J. F. Wagner, 1941-3, II:98). A more plausible approach, however, would be to suggest a later Babylonian prophet, such as Ezekiel, to supplement Jeremiah's work (Ezekiel's dated prophecies extended only to 571 B.C. (29:17); but cf. his known dependence upon Jeremiah and the stylistic similarity of such sermons as 20:5-32).

In compiling the books of Kings, Jeremiah(?) and his successor utilized written sources: "The book of the acts of Solomon" (I Kings 11:41) and "The books of the chronicles of the kings of Israel" (14:19; 15:31, etc.) and "Judah" (14:29; 15:7, etc.). These chronicles (not to be confused with canonical Chronicles, written in post-Exilic days) were probably based on court annals, but their contents went beyond what would have appeared in the official records (II Kings 15:15; 21:17). II Chronicles 32:32 thus refers to "the acts of Hezekiah," compiled by Isaiah and then incorporated into "the book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (cf. Isa. 36-38:8; 38:21-39:8, with II Kings 18:13,17-20:19). Other unidentified sources seemingly provided the detailed biographies of Elijah and Elisha (I Kings 17-II Kings 8:15), plus other prophetic narratives (cf. Robert H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament. New York: Harper, 1941, pp. 374-375).

Recognition of this "two-stage" composition, however, in no way condones the current negative criticism of Kings, divided throughout into conflicting strata (cf. IB, III:10) similar to those of "JEDP" in the Pentateuch (which see). The pre-Exilic stratum, such views allege, was produced by the same prophetic group that "discovered" Deuteronomy in 621 B.C. and is said to be characterized by a tolerance of pre-Solomonic high places (I Kings 3:4), by faith in the unconquerability of Judah (II Kings 8:19), and by antagonism against northern Israel (17:21-23). The Exilic stratum is then said to manifest opposite attitudes (I Kings 3:3; 9:6-9; 12:24; cf. ibid., pp. 377-378, 410-412). But Solomon actually conducted legitimate worship at no high place or shrine outside of Jerusalem (I Kings 3:15) other than at Gibeon, where rested the Mosaic tabernacle (I Chron. 16: 39; 21:29); the northern kingdom obviously possessed both commendable and evil features; and the preservation of Judah never appears as more than temporary (II Kings 20:19; 22:20).

The teachings of the books of Kings are, however, undeniably "deuteronomic." But since Deuteronomy-like phrases appear as frequently in the quoted words of David as they do in the author's own comments, an unprejudiced explanation must be sought, not in theories of wholesale Josianic forgeries, but rather in the fact of the Mosaic authenticity of Deuteronomy, upon which the lives and words of Judah's pious monarchs (cf. Josh. 1:7-8) were consciously patterned. For Kings constitutes more than bare history (cf. its relative neglect of the politically significant reigns of Omri and Jeroboam II), a key to its theological aims appearing in David's opening admonition: "Keep the charge of the LORD . . . as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest" (I Kings 2:3; cf. 3:14; II Sam. 7:14b). Divine retribution is then traced through the history of Solomon (I Kings 1-11); of the divided kingdoms, treated synchronously (I Kings 12-II Kings 17; cf. IB III:6, "a better scheme than most"); and of surviving Judah (II Kings 18-25). History, accordingly, metes out punishment to sinful Israel (II Kings 17:7-23) and Judah (23:26-27; 24:1-4), but also rewards for the righteous in both north (I Kings 21:29) and south (II Kings 22:19-20) and extending hope even in exile (25:27-30). Some may disparage the validity of this doctrine (Pfeiffer, op. cit., p. 381); but, while admitting that many human acts do not find immediate retribution, particularly now when God deals less directly with His people, evangelical Christianity yet proclaims as fundamental to the Gospel of redemption the holy theology of Kings, that whatsoever a man soweth that must he also reap. KING'S GARDEN, probably between the two walls of Jerusalem (II Kings 25:4; Jer. 39:4; 52:7), near the Pool of Siloam (Neh. 3:15).

KING'S HIGHWAY, the ancient N and S road E of the Jordan through Edom and Moab. Peaceable passage by this route was denied to the Israelites as they journeyed toward Canaan (Num. 20:17; 21: 22). The road is still in use.

KING'S VALE, OR DALE, the Valley of Shaveh E of Jerusalem, where Abram met Melchizedek (Gen. 14:17); and Absalom set up his pillar (II Sam. 18:18).

KINSMAN (kĭnz'măn, near relative, Heb. gō'ēl, one who has the right to redeem). Boaz exercised such a right by marrying Ruth and purchasing the property of her first husband's father, a near relative (Ruth 2:20-4:14). In Ruth 2:1, Heb. môdha', acquaintance, the feminine form of which is used figuratively (Prov. 7:4, ASV familiar friend, RSV intimate friend). Once Heb. qārôv, neighbor (Ps. 38:11). Heb. she'ēr, and its feminine form, flesh; of a relationship within which marriage would be incestuous (Lev. 18:12,13,17; also translated "kin" 18:6; 20:19; 21:2; in 25:49 RSV kinsman). Once used of a relative who can inherit (Num. 27:11). Once gō'ēl refers to one who can receive restitution for a wrong done to a dead relative (Num. 5:8). In the NT, Greek suggenés, of the same race (Luke 14:12; John 18:26; Acts 10: 24; Rom. 9:3; 16:7,11,21; in Mark 6:4, kin). The NT meaning is always the broad one of undefined relationship. In the OT, kinsman translates Heb. words with three distinct ideas: one who has a right to redeem or avenge; one too closely related for marriage; a neighbor, friend or acquaintance.

KIR (kûr, kĭr, Heb. qîr, inclosure, wall), a place to which the Assyrians carried the inhabitants of Damascus captive (II Kings 16:9; Amos 1:5), and whence they were to be restored to Syria (Amos 9:7). In Isaiah 22:6 soldiers from Kir are associated with others from Elam, which may indicate the general direction in which to look for Kir. In Isaiah 15:1 Kir-haraseth is called Kir of Moab, a different Kir. Heb. qîr means "wall," hence Kir may refer to a walled town, or to an enclosure where prisoners were kept, and may not be a true proper name at all.

KIR OF MOAB (See Kir)

KIR-HARASETH (kŭr-hăr'ă-sĕth), El-Kerak, E of the S part of the Dead Sea. The name appears in various forms: Kir of Moab; Kir-haresh (-hā'rĕsh); Kir-hareseth (-hăr'ē-sĕth, -há-rē'sĕth); Kir-heres (-hē'rĕs, -rĕz). The name formerly was thought to mean "City of the Sun," but now is interpreted as "New City." It was the capital of Moab when Jehoram, king of Israel, made war on Mesha, king of Moab (II Kings 3:4-25) and devastated the country except for this city, which he besieged. When Mesha offered his son as a sacrifice on the wall, the siege was raised (25-27). Its later destruction is a subject for serious lamentation (Isa. 15: 1; 16:7,11; Jer. 48:31,36).

KIRIATH, KIRJATH (kĭr'ĭ-ăth, kĭr'jăth, Heb. qiryath, a city). The word occurs alone (Josh. 18:28 KJV, ASV) where Kiriath-jearim (so RSV) is meant, and as part of other names identified with the same: Kiriath-arim (Ezra 2:25); Kiriath-baal (Josh. 15:60; 18:14). It is found in Kiriath-arba, Hebron (Gen. 23:2, etc.); of Kiriath-sannah (Josh. 15:49) and Kiriath-sepher (Josh. 15:15), both Debir; and in Kiriath-huzoth (Num. 22:39) an unknown place in Moab.

KIRIATHAIM, KIRJATHAIM (kĭr'ĭ-à-thā'ĭm, Heb. means double city). 1. A city in the uplands of Moab, given to Reuben who fortified it (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:19). Later lost to Israel, it was a Moabite town again (Jer. 48:1,23; Ezek. 25:9). Around it were plains, Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen. 14:5). East of the Dead Sea, a little S of Ataroth and E of Machaerus, el-Qereiyât.

2. A city of the Gershonite Levites in Naphtali (I Chron. 6:76); Kartan (Josh. 21:32). In N Galilee, SE or Tyre, el-Qureiyeh.

KIRJATH-JEARIM (kĭr'jăth-jē'à-rĭm, city of woods). With Gibeon, Chephirah, and Beeroth, one of four Gibeonite towns (Josh. 9:17), same as Baalah (15:9) and Kirjath-baal (15:60); a Canaanite high-place and center of Baal-worship, first assigned to Judah (15:60); at the SW corner of the boundary with Benjamin, to which it was later assigned (18:14,15,28). Men of Dan, seeking a new home, encamped W of it in Judah at Mahaneh-dan (Judg. 18:12). Here the men of Beth-shemesh brought the ark when it was returned by the Philistines (I Sam. 6:21; 7:1,2); here it remained 20 years; and hence David brought it up to Jerusalem (I Chron. 13:5,6; II Chron. 1:4; called Baale-judah in II Sam. 6:2). Men from Kirjath-jearim were among the returning exiles (Neh. 7:29; called Kiriatharim in Ezra 2:25). Men of Kirjath-jearim were listed in the genealogies (I Chron. 2:50-53). The prophet Urijah, son of Shemaiah, came from Kirjath-jearim. It is thought to be Tell-el-Azhar; by others Abû Ghôsh. Its location must be sought with reference to the other places mentioned, and it must be a high elevation. The name means "city of thickets or of forests," probably sacred groves.

KIRJATH-SANNAH (See Kiriath)

KISH (kĭsh, Heb. qîsh, bow, power). 1. A Benjamite, a son of Abiel and father of Saul, Israel's first king (I Sam. 9:1,3; 10:11,21). Called Cis in KJV of Acts 13:21).

2. Son of Abi-gibeon, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:30; 9:36).

3. A Levite in David's time, of the family of Merari and the house of Mahli (I Chron. 23:21,22; 24:29).

4. A Levite and a Merarite who assisted in the cleansing of the temple in Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 29:12).

5. A Benjamite, ancestor of Mordecai, the cousin of Queen Esther (Esth. 2:5).

6. A city in Mesopotamia, a few miles E of Babylon; Tell el-Oheimir, excavated in recent times. Not named in the Bible.

KISHI (kĭsh'ī), a Merarite Levite, ancestor of Ethan (I Chron. 6:44). Called Kushaiah in I Chronicles 15:17.

KISHION (kĭsh'ĭ-ŏn, kĭsh'yŏn), a city in the tribe of Issachar, given to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 19:20; 21:28 KJV Kishon; in I Chron. 6:72 called Kedesh).

KISHON, KISON (kī'shŏn, kĭsh'ŏn, or kī'sŏn, kĭs'-ŏn, Heb. qîshôn, curving), a stream which flows from sources on Mt. Tabor and Mt. Gilboa westward through the Plain of Esdraelon or Valley of Jezreel, and enters the Bay of Acre N of Mt. Carmel. In winter it becomes a raging torrent, which subsides into pools which are soon drained off for irrigation, except that the last few miles are fed from the slopes of Mt. Carmel and by tributaries from the N. It is treacherous to cross except at fords carefully chosen. It may be the brook E of Jokneam (Josh. 19:11). Along the banks of the river Kishon, Deborah the prophetess and Barak led Israel to victory over the Canaanite hosts of Jabin, under their commander Sisera (Judg. 4 and 5). The heavily armed soldiers and chariots which were not cut down by the pursuing Israelites were swept away by the torrent Kishon (Judg. 5:21; Ps. 83:9 KJV Kison). After his contest with the priests of Baal on Mt. Carmel, Elijah had the priests brought down to the brook Kishon and killed there. The stream is now known as the Nahr el-Muqatta.

KISS (Heb. nāshaq, Gr. philéo, philema, kataphiléo), a common greeting among male relatives (Gen. 29:13; 33:4; 45:15; Exod. 4:27; 18:7; II Sam. 14:33); male and female relatives (Gen. 29:11; 31:28); in farewell (Gen. 31:55; Ruth 1:9,14) and before death (Gen. 50:1). The kiss had a more formal character in connection with a blessing (Gen. 27:26,27; 48:10) or the anointing of a king (I Sam. 10:1). Friends kissed (I Sam. 20:41; II Sam. 19:39). The act might be a pretense (II Sam. 15:5; 20:9; Prov. 27:6). Kissing was an act of worship toward heathen gods (I Kings 19:18,20; Job 31:27; Hos. 13:2). Righteousness and peace will "kiss" each other, i.e., will unite to bless restored Israel (Ps. 85:10). Kisses may be a lure to illicit love (Prov. 7:13). The kiss in Psalm 2:12 is one of homage to the King's Son. The same Heb. word nāshaq is translated "touched" (Ezek. 3:13) of the gentle contact of the wings of the living creatures. The kiss was generally given on the cheek, forehead or beard, though a kiss on the lips is indicated (Prov. 24:26) and is probable (in S. of Sol. 1:2; 8:1). In the NT, the Greek verb philéo is usually translated "love," but when associated with the strengthened form kataphiléo, kiss repeatedly, effusively, it is translated "kiss," and the noun philema is always so rendered. Once Jesus' host did not give Him this customary greeting, but a sinful woman kissed His feet (Luke 7:38,45). The father kissed the returning prodigal (Luke 15:20). Judas kissed Jesus as a sign to the temple police (Matt. 26:48,49; Mark 14:44,45; Luke 22:47,48). The Ephesian elders kissed Paul in farewell (Acts 20:37). The kiss was adopted as a formal greeting among believers; the holy kiss (Rom. 16:16; I Cor. 16:20; II Cor. 13:12; I Thess. 5:26 or kiss of charity or love (I Pet. 5:14); given by men to men and by women to women. E.R.

KITE (See Birds)

KITHLISH (kĭth'lĭsh), a town in the lowland of the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:40); ASV, RSV, Chitlish (chĭt'lĭsh). Site unknown.

KITRON (kĭt'rŏn), a town in the territory of Zebulun, whose inhabitants that tribe did not drive out (Judg. 1:30).

KITTIM (kĭt'ĭm, Heb. kittîm). 1. Descendants of Javan (Gen. 10:4; I Chron. 1:7).

2. KJV Chittim, ASV Kittim. Where RSV has Cyprus, that island is probably meant (Isa. 23:1, 12; Jer. 2:10; Ezek. 27:6). Invasion from that direction was expected, to help topple the Assyrian empire. Where RSV retains Kittim, the word characterizes ships of Grecian pattern (Num. 24:24; Dan. 11:30), which roamed the Mediterranean very early. Many think that the reference in Daniel is to the Roman fleet; even so, the Romans owed much to Greek naval architecture.

KNEADING TROUGH, a dish in which dough was prepared to be made into bread. The plague of frogs infested them in Egypt (Exod. 8:3). The Israelites bound them, dough and all, in the bundles of clothing on their backs, when they escaped from Egypt (Exod. 12:34). Called "kneading bowls" in RSV. KJV has "store" for the same Heb. word, where ASV, RSV have "kneading trough" (Deut. 28:5,17).

KNEE (Heb. berekh, Gr. gónu). The first references are to taking on the knees in token of adoption (Gen. 30:3; 48:12; 50:23). The knees are equivalent to the lap (Judg. 16:19; Job 3:12; II Kings 4:20). Their strength or weakness is commented on (Job 4:14; Ps. 109:24; Heb. 12:12). Gideon rejected men who knelt to drink (Judg. 7:5,6). Diseased knees follow disobedience (Deut. 28:35). Knees smite together in fear (Nah. 2:10; Dan. 5:6). Daniel was set trembling on hands and knees (10:10). To bow the knee to Baal identified one as his worshiper (I Kings 19:18; Rom. 11:4). Kneeling expressed homage or worship (II Kings 1:13, to Elisha; Matt. 17:14; Mark 1:40; 10:17; Luke 5:8, to Jesus; I Kings 8:54; II Chron. 6:13; Ezra 9:3; Rom. 14:11 quoting Isa. 45:23; Eph. 3:14; Phil. 2:10; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; 21:5, to God in prayer; notably Luke 22:41, Jesus in Gethsemane; Dan. 6:10 shows that kneeling in prayer was already a customary practice). Kneeling in mockery, Mark 15:19.

KNIFE, a sharp-edged cutting instrument. 1. Heb. herev, usually sword, occasionally some other tool with a cutting edge; the flint knife used in circumcision (Josh. 5:2,3), kept for religious purposes long after bronze and iron were introduced; the swords (so ASV margin, RSV text) with which priests of Baal cut themselves in their contest with Elijah (I Kings 18:28); a sword (ASV, RSV) used as a razor (Ezek. 5:1,2).

2. Heb. ma'ăkheleth, a knife used to carve sacrifices (Gen. 22:6,10; Judg. 19:29; figuratively, Prov. 30:14).

3. Heb. sakkîn, knife (Prov. 23:2).

4. Heb. mahălāph, Ezra 1:9; named among temple vessels taken from Jerusalem as spoils, and returned after the Exile, are "29 knives" (KJV, ASV) which RSV calls "censers." The meaning is uncertain. A penknife (Jer. 36:23) was used to sharpen reed pens. Knives were not used to eat with, meat being cut in small pieces before serving, and bread broken at the table. The Philistines had metal knives long before they came into general use in Israel (see I Sam. 13:19,22).

KNOP (nŏp). 1. Heb. kaphtôr, capital (Amos 9:1; Zeph. 2:14 ASV, RSV; KJV lintel). A knob or bulb ornamenting the golden candlestick in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:31-36; 37:17-22, RSV capitals).

2. Heb. pĕqā'îm, ornaments carved of wood on the cedar walls of Solomon's Temple (I Kings 6:18); or of bronze on the laver (I Kings 7:24); shaped like gourds (so RSV text, ASV margin).

KOA (kō'ȧ), a people E of the Tigris, between Elam and Media, named with the Babylonians, Chaldeans, Assyrians, Pekod and Shoa as about to invade Judah (Ezek. 23:23).

KOHATH, KOHATHITES (kō'hăth, -īts), second son of Levi (Gen. 46:11), ancestor of Moses (Exod. 6:16-20; Num. 3:17,19; I Chron. 6:1-3). His descendants, the Kohathites, one of three divisions of the Levites, comprised four families (Num. 3:17-20,27-31). They camped S of the tabernacle. Numbering 8,600, on duty, they cared for the ark, table, candlestick, altars and vessels of the sanctuary. These they carried on foot, no wagons being assigned them (Num. 7:8,9). Joshua allotted them 23 cities (Josh. 21:4,5). Under the monarchy they are prominent (I Chron. 23:13-20; 24:20-25), especially Heman in the service of song (I Chron. 6:33ff; 16:41ff; 25:1ff). They took part in the religious service the day before Jehoshaphat's victory over his allied enemies (II Chron. 20:19); and in Hezekiah's cleansing of the temple (II Chron. 29:12-19).

KOLAIAH (kō-lā'yȧ, Heb. qôlāyâh, voice of Jehovah). 1. A Benjamite who settled in Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. 11:7).

2. The father of the false prophet Ahab, who suffered death for his false prophecies (Jer. 29:21).

KORAH, KORAHITE (kō'rȧ, -īt, Heb. qōrah). 1. A son of Esau (Gen. 36:5,14,18; I Chron. 1:35).

2. A grandson of Esau, nephew of No. 1 (Gen. 36:16).

3. A descendant of Caleb (I Chron. 2:43).

4. A Levite from whom descended the Korahites, doorkeepers and musicians of tabernacle and temple (Exod. 6:24; I Chron. 6:22). The Korahites, KJV also Korhites, Korathites, appear in Exodus 6:24; Numbers 26:58; I Chronicles 9:19, 31; 12:6; 26:1; II Chronicles 20:19. The sons of Korah are named in the titles of Psalms 42, 44-49, 84, 85, 87, 88).

5. A son of Izhar and grandson of Kohath (Exod. 6:21,24; I Chron. 6:37; 9:19) who led a rebellion (Num. 16; 26:9-11; 27:3; Jude 11 KJV Core). Korah, with two companions, resisted the civil authority of Moses. For refusing to appear before him as commanded, Korah, Dathan and Abiram and their followers were swallowed up by the earth. Then 250 rebellious Levites were consumed by fire from the Lord, but the children of Korah were spared (Num. 26:11).

KORE (kō'rē). 1. A Korahite whose son, Shallum, was a tabernacle gatekeeper (I Chron. 9:19; 26:1,19).

2. A Levite, son of Imnah, set over the free will offerings in Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 31:14).

KOZ (kōz). 1. A priest whose descendants returned from exile with Zerubbabel, but lost their position through inability to prove their descent (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63 ASV, RSV Hakkoz).

2. Ancestor of Meremoth, who helped in the repair of the wall (Neh. 3:4,21 ASV, RSV Hakkoz). In the case of both men, the KJV rendering Koz results from the translators taking "Ha-" as the Heb. article, and not as part of the proper name.

KUSHAIAH (kū-shā'yȧ), a Levite of the family of Merari (I Chron. 15:17). Called Kishi in I Chronicles 6:44.

L

LAADAH (lā'ȧ-dȧ), a man of Judah, of the family of Shelah (I Chron. 4:21), the progenitor of the inhabitants of Mareshah.

LAADAN (lā'ȧ-dăn), Ladan in RV. 1. An Ephraimite, an ancestor of Joshua (I Chron. 7:26).

2. A Levite of the family of Gershon (I Chron. 23:7-9; 26:21), called Libni in I Chronicles 6:17.

LABAN (lā'băn, Heb. lāvān, white). 1. The nephew of Abraham who lived in Haran on a tributary of the Euphrates river in Mesopotamia. He belonged to that branch of the family of Terah (Abraham's father) which was derived from Abraham's brother Nahor and his niece Milcah (Gen. 22:20-24), and is first mentioned when Rebekah is introduced, as Rebekah's brother (Gen. 24:29). In ancient Semitic custom, the brother was the guardian of the sister, and thus Laban takes a prominent place in the story of Rebekah's leaving for Canaan to be Isaac's bride. His grasping nature is hinted at in Genesis 24:30,31, where his fulsome invitation to Abraham's servant follows immediately after his appraisal of the servant's expensively equipped party.

Laban's later history is interwoven with Jacob's (q.v.). When Jacob fled from the anger of his brother Esau, he settled in his uncle Laban's house in Haran and stayed there 20 years. The relationship between Laban and his nephew is an interesting one. Both appear as resourceful, often grasping men, each eager to best the other in every transaction. Even in the circumstances surrounding the marriage of Jacob to Laban's daughters Rachel and Leah (Gen. 29) this competition is evident. After Jacob had served 14 years for his brides, there followed six more years in Haran in which, according to Jacob's testimony Laban changed his wages ten times (31:41). The famous contract involving the speckled and spotted sheep (30:31-43) was evidently one of the ten.

At the end of the 20 years, Jacob quietly stole away from Laban, taking his now large family with him to Canaan (Gen. 31). Pursuing him, Laban overtook him in Gilead. After mutual protestations and incriminations, uncle and nephew parted, after erecting a "heap of witness" — a kind of dividing line — between them. Laban is here called "the Aramean" (Gen. 31:24 RSV) and he gives the heap an Aramaic name (Jegar-sahadutha), while Jacob calls it by its Hebrew equivalent Galeed (Gen. 31:47), both meaning "heap of witness."

These Aramaic references are interesting guides in the quest for better understanding of the origins of the patriarchs. In an old confession the Hebrews were taught to say "A wandering Aramean was my father" (Deut. 26:5 RSV). It seems likely that the patriarchal ancestors of the Hebrews sprang from a mixed Semitic stock in northeast Mesopotamia, among which the Aramean was a prominent strain.

2. Laban is also the name of an unidentified place in the Plains of Moab, or perhaps in the Sinai peninsula (Deut. 1:1). J.B.G.

LABOR. The noun labor is today confined to the abstract use — the act of laboring (Gen. 31:42; Rom. 16:6). Formerly it expressed also the fruit of labor, as in Exodus 23:16, "When thou hast gathered in thy labors out of the field," or John 4:38, "Ye are entered into their labors." The word is also used of labor in childbirth (Gen. 35:16).

In Bible times there was no class of men known as "labor" in contrast with "management." All but a favored few labored, and hard work was looked on as the common lot of man and a result of the curse (Gen. 3:17-19), a bitter servitude. Slavery (q.v.) was commonly practiced in the Bible world; the conscription of freemen for labor on government building projects was practiced by Solomon (I Kings 5:13-17) and Asa (I Kings 15:22).

Although most workers in the simple culture of OT times were what we today would call "unskilled," there were certain skilled occupations. The potter (Jer. 18) has left behind him unnumbered examples of his skill. Some technology in the working of metals was known. Remains of smelting furnaces have been found. Stone masons, scribes (Ezek. 9:2; Jer. 36:2,4), dyers, weavers, and workers in precious stones and ivory carried on their work. But for the greater part life was simple, work arduous, hours long and wages small: "Yet is their strength labor and sorrow, for it is soon cut off, and we fly away" (Ps. 90:10). By NT times, things had changed, and the more complex civilization of the Roman world, with its skilled and more diversified occupations and better standards of living, had come to Palestine. J.B.G.

LACE, mentioned in the English Bible four times (Exod. 28:28,37; 39:21,31), always a translation of the Hebrew pāthîl ("thread" or "cord"), the "lace of blue" was used to bind the high priest's breastplate to the ephod.

LACHISH (lā'kĭsh, Heb. lākhîsh, perhaps meaning "rough"), the name of a Canaanitish royal city and Judean border fortress, that occupied a strategic valley 25 miles SW of Jerusalem, the southernmost of the five that transect the Palestinian Shephelah, or piedmont, and communicate between Judah's central ridge and the coastal highway leading into Egypt. First equated with Tell el-Hesy, Lachish has now been identified by written evidence (see below) with Tell ed-Duweir, a 22-acre mound excavated by J. K. Starkey from 1932 until his death by violence in 1938.

Even before 3000 B.C. Lachish was inhabited by chalcolithic cave dwellers, but in about 2700 an early-bronze city was constructed on the virgin rock. Following a gap occasioned by invaders of calciform culture (c. 2300 B.C.), middle-bronze Lachish arose, exhibiting cultural and political ties with Middle Kingdom Egypt (2000-1780). This was succeeded by a Hyksos-type community, which provided Lachish with its first observable fortifications, including the characteristic dry moat, or fosse. An inscribed dagger, dated about 1650, furnishes one of the earliest examples of that acrophonic writing from which all modern alphabets derive, two centuries older than the Sinaitic or the five subsequent Lachish inscriptions (Olga Tufnell et al., Lachish IV-Text, New York: Oxford, 1958, pp. 127-128). After the expulsion of the Hyksos from Egypt and their defeat in Palestine (c. 1578-1573 B.C.), a late-bronze Canaanitish citadel rendered at least nominal allegiance to New Empire Egypt. Its king, Japhia, joined with Adonizedek of Jerusalem in a confederacy against Joshua, 1406 B.C. (Josh. 10:3), only to be defeated and executed (10:23-26,12:11). In Joshua's subsequent sweep through the southwest, Israel captured Lachish (reinforced by Gezer) and annihilated its inhabitants, in accordance with Moses' ban (10:31-33, Deut. 7:2). Scripture contains no record, however, of its destruction (cf. Josh. 11:13); and, though assigned to Judah (15:39), Lachish must have suffered rapid Canaanitish reoccupation, for a late-bronze temple constructed in the former fosse exhibits little interruption in its use. A generation later, the Amarna letters criticize Lachish for furnishing supplies to the Khabiru (invaders which include the Hebrews; see Israel, sec. B) and for overthrowing the Egyptian prefect, Zimridi (Letters 287-288). Lachish was burned in about 1230 B.C. Some interpreters have attempted to associate this conflagration with Joshua's campaign (cf. Millar Burrows, What Mean These Stones?, New Haven: American School of Oriental Research, 1941, pp. 76-77); but the excavators themselves attribute its fall to the contemporaneous raids of Pharaoh Merneptah or to attacks by immigrating Philistines (Tufnell, Lachish II, 1940, pp. 23-24).

One of the famous Lachish Letters. This is No. 3. © MPS

Lachish was fortified by Rehoboam, shortly after the division of the Hebrew kingdom in 930 B.C. (II Chron. 11:9); and it witnessed the murder of King Amaziah in 767 (25:27). The Prophet Micah condemned Lachish's chariots as "the beginning of Zion's sin," perhaps because of the city's use as a staging point for the extravagant importation of Egyptian horses (1:13; cf. I Kings 10:28-29, Deut. 17:16). In any event, Lachish was successfully besieged by Sennacherib in 701 (II Chron. 32:9); thither Hezekiah directed his submission (II Kings 18:14); and from it the Rabshakeh's troops marched against Jerusalem (18:17,19:8). Starkey's excavations demonstrate successive destructions of Lachish in 597 and 587 B.C., corresponding to Nebuchadnezzar's second and third attacks against Judah. From the final ashes were recovered 21 inscribed ostraca. Consisting primarily of communications from an outpost commander named Hoshaiah to his superior, Joash, at Lachish, they constitute our first truly personal, Palestinian documents. Letter IV mentions signal fires (cf. Jer. 6:1) and establishes Jeremiah's assertion that Lachish and Azekah were the last cities, before Jerusalem, to fall to Nebuchadnezzar (34:7); and letter VI speaks of a warning prophet (like Jeremiah himself) and of critics that "weakened the hands" of anti-Babylonian resistance (Jer. 38:4). Finally, in Nehemiah's day a resettled Lachish (Neh. 11:30) achieved the construction of a palace and Persian sun temple that are among the finest of the period (Burrows, op. cit., p. 132). J.B.P.

LADDER, mentioned only once in the English Bible — Jacob's ladder between heaven and earth, seen in his Bethel dream (Gen. 28:12). The Hebrew term is sullām, properly "a staircase." Scaling ladders were frequently used in storming ancient cities. They are often pictured on the Assyrian and Egyptian monuments, and are mentioned in I Maccabees 5:30.

LAEL (lā'ĕl), a member of the family of Gershon, father of Eliasaph (Num. 3:24). Meaning "belonging to God," the name is almost unique in the OT. It is formed by the addition of the divine name "El" to the preposition "la."

LAHAD (lā'hăd), a Judahite family name (I Chron. 4:2).

LAHAI-ROI (See Beer-Lahai-Roi)

LAHMAM (là'măm, Heb. lahmām), a town in the Judean Shephelah (Josh. 15:40), possibly to be identified with modern el-Lahm, two and a half miles S of Beit Jibrin.

LAHMI (là'mī, Heb. lahmî), according to I Chronicles 20:5 the brother of the giant from Gath, who was slain by a certain Elhanan. In the parallel passage in II Samuel 21:9 the name Lahmi seems to have been corrupted to "Bethlehemite," Hebrew, Bêth Hallahmî.

LAISH (lā'ĭsh, Heb. layish). 1. A city in the upper Jordan valley, which was captured by the Danites and renamed Dan (Judg. 18:7,14,27,29). It is called Leshem in Joshua 19:47. Laish in Isaiah 10:30 (KJV) should be rendered Laishah (RSV) and is a town a little N of Jerusalem.

2. The father of Phalti or Phaltiel, a Benjamite, to whom Michal, David's wife, was given by Saul (I Sam. 25:44; II Sam. 3:15).

LAKUM, LAKKUM (lā'kŭm, lăk'ŭm), a town of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33), location unknown.

LAMB, a translation of several Hebrew words in the English Bible, most of them meaning the young of the sheep. One however (sheh, used in Exod. 12:3-6), refers to the young of either sheep or goats (cf. Exod. 12:5) and seems to include adult specimens at times.

The meat of lambs was considered a delicacy among the ancient Hebrews (Deut. 32:14; Amos 6:4; II Sam. 12:3-6). Meat was scarce among them, and the killing of a lamb would mark an important occasion. Lambs were used for sacrifices from the earliest times (Gen. 4:4; 22:7).

The lamb was a staple in the Mosaic sacrificial system. It was offered for the continual burnt offering each morning and evening (Exod. 29:38-42); on the Sabbath the number was doubled (Num. 28:9). On the first day of each month (Num. 28:11), during the seven days of the Passover (vss. 16, 19), at the feast of Weeks (vss. 26,27), Trumpets (29:1,2), on the Day of Atonement (vss. 7,8), and on the feast of Tabernacles (vss. 13-36) lambs were offered. The lamb was one of the sacrifices accepted for the ceremonial cleansing of a woman after childbirth (Lev. 12:6) or for the cleansing of a recovered leper (Lev. 14:10-18). Of unusual interest is the use of the lamb in the Passover ceremony (see Lamb of God). J.B.G

LAMB OF GOD, Jesus was called the Lamb of God by John the Baptist (John 1:29,36). The expression certainly emphasizes the redemptive character of the work of Christ. More than a score of times in the Revelation the lamb is used as a symbol of Christ, and in Christian art of the succeeding centuries the motif is continued, as it is also in the communion service of many churches in the words, "Lamb of God, Son of the Father, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us."

The OT is full of the lamb as a sacrificial victim (see lamb). Of special interest is the Passover lamb (Exod. 12:3-6) with the sacrifice of which deliverance from Egypt was achieved. This deliverance became in time a picture of redemption from sin (Luke 9:31; I Cor. 5:7). The substitutionary use of the unblemished lamb in sacrifice led to the idea of the Suffering Servant who as a lamb died in the place of sinners (Isa. 53:4-7).

LAME (See Diseases)

LAMECH (lā'měk, Heb. lemekh, meaning undetermined), the name of two men in the antediluvian records: 1. A son of Methusael (Gen. 4:18-24). This man, a descendant of Cain, had two wives, Adah and Zillah. Lamech's sons by Adah, Tubal and Jubal, founded the nomadic life and the musical arts; Lamech's son by Zillah, Tubal-cain, invented metalcrafts and instruments of war; Lamech also had a daughter Naamah, by Zillah. As far as the record reveals, this man was the first poet. His song (Gen. 4:23f) expresses every feature of Hebrew poetry (parallelism, poetic diction, etc.). This song, addressed to his wives, has been interpreted variously. Some hold that it is nothing less than a bombastic boast of revenge on any man who will dare to attack him while he is armed with the weapons forged by his son Tubal-cain. Others, with greater probability, maintain that Lamech, having already killed a man who attempted to murder him, is now claiming immunity on the ground that he acted in self-defense; thus, he logically asserts, his act will receive at the bar of justice a seventy-times-seven acquittal over Cain's cold-blooded murder of Abel.

2. The son of Methuselah (Gen. 5:28-31). This man, a descendant of Seth, became the father of Noah. His faith is attested by the name he gave his son, (Noah, meaning "rest") and by the hope of "comfort" (Gen. 5:29) that he anticipated in his son's life. Thus, basing his faith upon the promised deliverance from the Adamic curse (Gen. 3:14-19), he foresees, even if faintly, the coming of One of his seed (cf. I Chron. 1:3; Luke 3:36) who will remove that curse (cf. Rom. 8:18-25). He died at the age of 777. W.B.

LAMENTATIONS. This book, entitled in most English versions The Lamentations of Jeremiah, is placed between Jeremiah and Ezekiel in the LXX, Vulgate, and the English Bible. In the Hebrew text, however, it occurred in the Sacred Writings as one of the Megilloth or "five scrolls," of which it is the third. Its Hebrew title êkhâh ("Oh, how") is derived from the word with which the book commences. The Talmud renamed the book Qinoth ("Lamentations" or "elegies") as a more accurate designation of its true contents. This approach was adopted in the LXX title Thrénoi ("Elegies") and the Threni ("Lamentations") of the Latin versions. The latter introduced the ascription of the work to Jeremiah, and this was followed by most English versions. Because of its position in the Megilloth, the Book of Lamentations is read in synagogue worship on the fast of the ninth of Ab, during the evening and morning services. This particular occasion commemorates the destruction of Jerusalem by Chaldean forces in 586 B.C., and again by the Roman armies under Titus in A.D. 70.

The book comprises five poems lamenting the desolation which had overtaken the Holy City in 586 B.C. The first four compositions are highly artificial in structure, consisting of acrostics based on the Hebrew alphabet. Each verse of Chapters 1 and 2 commences with a word whose initial consonant is successively one of the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet. A slight variation of the regular order occurs in 2:16-17, 3:47-48 and 4:16-17. The third chapter is peculiar in that a triple alphabetical arrangement is followed, so that all three lines in each stanza commence with the same letter. The fifth chapter is not an acrostic, although like the others it contains 22 stanzas, and is a prayer rather than an elegy. Alphabetical forms of this kind probably served as a useful stimulus to memory at a time when manuscripts were rare and costly.

Some writers have regarded the mechanical structure of most of the book as incompatible with the grief and sincere penitence of the writer. These two ideas need not be inconsistent, however, particularly if the book was composed with a view to consistent liturgical usage. From the manner in which it has survived among the Jews it may well be that this was the intention of the author. The elegiac meter which characterizes the poems was occasionally employed in the writings of the eighth century B.C. prophets in Jeremiah (9:19 f), Ezekiel (19) and some Psalms (e.g., 84,119).

Although in the Hebrew no name was attached to the book, the authorship was uniformly ascribed by ancient authorities to Jeremiah. The LXX added an introductory note stating that "Jeremiah lamented this lamentation over Jerusalem," but the traditional view of the authorship appears to be rooted in the elegy composed for the mourning-period of the deceased Josiah (c. 609 B.C.) Many modern critics have envisaged several authors at work in the book, or else have assumed that Baruch was responsible for the work in its final form. The reasons adduced include the fact that the physical circumstances of the prophet would make the work of composition rather difficult; that there are certain implicit contradictions between the prophecy of Jeremiah and the Book of Lamentations, and that some literary expressions characteristic of Jeremiah are lacking in Lamentations. Thus the thought of Lamentations 2:9 that God no longer reveals Himself in His prophets is held to be inconsistent with the thought of Jeremiah. Similarly the reference in Lamentations 4:17 to the possibility of Egypt as a deliverer ill accords with the patriotism of the prophet (42:15-17; 43:12f., etc.).

On the other hand, most of the poems appear intimately connected with the calamity of the Exile. Chapters 2 and 4 indicate that the author personally witnessed the tragedy of 586 B.C., while the remainder of the book may have been written in Babylonia in the early captivity. It seems improbable that the final chapter was written in Jerusalem after the return from Exile, perhaps about 525 B.C., as has been suggested by some writers. The arguments for diversity of authorship do not seem particularly strong, though the possibility that the poems were recast in mnemonic form at a time subsequent to their original composition must not be overlooked. Until more decisive evidence is forthcoming, there seems little reason for questioning the substantial unity and traditional authorship of Lamentations.

The book bewails the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, and sorrows over the sufferings of the inhabitants during this time. It makes poignant confession of sin on behalf of the people and their leaders, acknowledges complete submission to the Divine will, and prays that God will once again favor and restore His people.

Analysis:

The fallen city admits its sin and the justice of Divine judgment. (Chapter 1,2).

Lamentation; reassertion of Divine mercy and judgment; prayer for Divine intervention. (Chaps. 3,4).

Further confession and prayers for mercy. (Chap. 5). R.K.H.

LAMP, an instrument used for artificial lighting. Lamps are frequently mentioned in Scripture but no description of their form and structure is given. Archaeology has recovered many specimens in a great variety of forms from the early simple shallow, saucer-like bowl with one side slightly pointed for the lighted wick, to the later closed bowl with only a hole on top to pour in the oil, a spout for the wick, and a handle to carry it. Lamps for domestic use were generally of terra-cotta or of bronze.

The KJV often uses "candle" and "candlestick" where "lamp" and "lampstand" would be more literal. The Hebrew nēr is generally rendered "lamp," but "candle" nine times, while lappîdh is rendered "lamp" eight times, and "torch" and "firebrand" twice each. The Gr. lampás is rendered "lamp" seven times, "light" and "torch" once each, but lýchnos, properly "lamp," is rendered "candle" eight times and "light" six, but in ASV always "lamp."

The use of lamps is mentioned in connection with the golden candlestick in the tabernacle and the ten golden candlesticks in the temple (Exod. 25:37; I Kings 7:49; II Chron. 4:20; 13:11; Zech. 4:2). As shown from their usage, the "lamps" of Gideon's soldiers were doubtless torches. The common NT mention of lamps is in connection with their household usage (Matt. 5:15; Mark 4:21; Luke 8:16; 11:33; 15:8). Such lamps were generally placed on a "lampstand," usually a niche built into the wall. It appears that the Hebrews were accustomed to burn lamps overnight in their chambers, perhaps because of a dread of darkness, more likely to keep away prowlers. The use of oil-fed lamps in a marriage procession is mentioned in Matthew 25:1. Since such lamps contained only a few spoonfuls of oil, a reserve supply would be a necessity. The lighted lamp is also mentioned metaphorically to symbolize (1) God's Word (Ps. 119:105; II Pet. 1:19); (2) God's guidance (II Sam. 22:29; Ps. 18:28); (3) God's salvation (Isa. 62:1); (4) man's spirit (Prov. 20:27; (5) outward prosperity (Prov. 13:9); (6) a son as successor (I Kings 11:36; 15:4). LANCE (See Arms, Armor)

LANDMARK (Heb. gevûl), an object used to mark the boundary of a field. Landmarks were frequently such movable objects as a stone or a post. Since a cunning and unscrupulous individual could take advantage of his neighbor by shifting the location of such boundary marks, thus robbing him of part of his means of support, such removal of landmarks was prohibited by the Mosaic law (Deut. 19:14; 27:17). Hebrew piety denounced the act (Prov. 22:28, 23:10) and it was considered equal to theft (Job 24:2).

LANE (Gr. rhýme), an alley of a city. Occurs once in Luke 14:21. The Greek word is elsewhere translated "street" (Matt. 6:2; Acts 9:11).

LANGUAGES. The first language spoken by the invading Israelitish tribes in Palestine was Hebrew, a Semitic tongue related to Phoenician, to the Canaanitish dialects of the tribes they dispossessed, and to the speech of Moab. The Tell-el-Amarna letters, and the inscription of Mesha, are evidence of this. Hebrew, over the first centuries of the occupation of Palestine, was both the literary and colloquial language. It remained the literary language permanently. In colloquial use it was replaced by Aramaic. The date of the change is difficult to determine with precision. Eliakim's request to the Rabshakeh (II Kings 18:26) to speak "in the Syrian language," which, as a common eastern language of diplomacy, the leaders understood, and not "in the Jews" language shows that Hebrew was still the Jewish vernacular in 713 B.C. Such was still the case as late as Nehemiah, two centuries later.

The next evidence is from the NT where phrases quoted in the Palestinian vernacular (e.g. talitha cumi, and the cry from the Cross) are undoubtedly Aramaic. Before Aramaic replaced Hebrew thus, it had, of course infiltrated its vocabulary. The other colloquial dialect of NT times was Greek, which also provided the literary language for the NT writings. It is the common dialect of Greek which is thus represented, that simplified and basic form which descended from Attic and became an alternative language in most of the Mediterranean basin, and especially in the kingdoms of Alexander's successors. Christ spoke Aramaic, but undoubtedly understood Greek, and read the Scriptures in classical Hebrew. Paul knew all three languages, and used them with equal facility, with the addition of Latin. LAODICEA (lā-ŏd'ĭ-sē'à, Gr. Laodikía), a wealthy city in Asia Minor founded by Antiochus II (261-246 B.C.), and head of the "circuit" of "the Seven Churches of Asia." The city lay on one of the great Asian trade routes, and this insured its great commercial prosperity. Laodicea was a leading banking center. In 51 B.C. Cicero, en route for his Cilician province, cashed drafts there. It was no doubt the rich banking firms which, in A.D. 60, financed the reconstruction of the city after the great earthquake which prostrated it. Laodicea refused the Senate's earthquake relief. She was "rich and increased with goods" and had "need of nothing" (Rev. 3:17). The Lycus valley produced a glossy black wool, the source of black cloaks and carpets, for which the city was famous. Laodicea was also the home of a medical school, and the manufacture of collyrium, a famous eye-salve. The scornful imagery of the apocalyptic letter to Laodicea is obviously based on these activities. It also has reference to the emetic qualities of the soda-laden warm water from nearby Hierapolis, whose thermal springs ran into the Maeander. Laodicea's water supply also came from Hierapolis, and Sir William Ramsay suggests that its vulnerability, together with the city's exposed position, and its easy wealth caused the growth in the community of that spirit of compromise and worldly-mindedness castigated in the Revelation. Under Diocletian, Laodicea, still prosperous, was made the chief city of the Province of Phrygia. E.M.B.

LAODICEA, CHURCH AT (See Laodicea)

LAODICEANS, EPISTLE TO, mentioned by Paul in Colossians 4:16 in urging the Colossians to exchange epistles with the Laodiceans. An epistle written by the Laodiceans to Paul is ruled out by the context; "from" (ek) here denotes present locality, not origin. Views of its identity are: 1. The spurious "Epistle to the Laodiceans" found among the Pauline epistles in some Latin Mss. from the sixth to the 15th centuries. Its 20 verses, being phrases strung together from Philippians and Galatians, are a forgery with no heretical motive. 2. A Pauline letter to the Laodiceans now lost. This is not improbable; opponents hold it multiplies epistles unnecessarily. 3. Our Ephesians. This view is very probable if the encyclical view of Ephesians is accepted, and accounts for Marcion's title of it as "the epistle to the Laodiceans."

LAPPED, LAPPETH (lăpt, lăp'ĕth, Heb. lāqaq, to lap, lick). The Hebrew verb is used (1) to indicate alertness and alacrity (in the test of Gideon's army; Judg. 7:5,6,7); (2) to indicate disgust and loathsomeness (in the comparison between Naboth's death and Ahab's death; I Kings 21:19; 22:38).

LAPPIDOTH (lăp'ĭ-dŏth, Heb. lappîdhôth, torches or lightning flashes), the husband of Deborah the prophetess (Judg. 4:4).

LAPWING (See Birds)

LASCIVIOUSNESS (lă-sĭv'ĭ-ŭs-nĕs, Gr. asélgeia). The ASV translates asélgeia "lasciviousness" (Mark 7:22; II Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19; Eph. 4:19; I Pet. 4:3; II Pet. 2:18; Jude 4), "lascivious" (II Pet. 2:7), "lascivious doings" (II Pet. 2:2), "wantonness" (Rom. 13:13). RSV uses "licentiousness" or "licentious" throughout. Aselgeia designates shameless immorality, a characteristic sin of ancient society.

LASEA (là-sē'à), a small seaport town on the S coast of Crete, about five miles E of Fair Haven, listed by Luke (Acts 27:8) in the log of Paul's voyage to Rome. No other ancient writer mentions the place.

LASHA (lā'shà, Heb. lāsha'), a place near Sodom and Gomorrah mentioned in Genesis 10:19 to mark off the Canaanite territory. Jerome, following Jewish sources, equates it with Callirrhoë, famous for its warm springs. The exact place has not yet been identified.

LASHARON (lă-shā'rŏn, Heb. lashshārôn, probably to Sharon), a royal Canaanite town whose king was slain by Joshua (Josh. 12:18). Listed along with Aphek, it is probably identifiable as the ancient Sarona, located on the plateau 6½ miles SW of Tiberias.

LATCHET (lăch'ĕt;-ĭt, Heb. serôk, [sandal-]thong, Gr. himás, same meaning), the thong or strap, usually made of leather, by which the sandal was fastened to the foot. It is used figuratively to describe (1) the most insignificant possession (Gen. 14:23); (2) the efficiency of an invading army (Isa. 5:27); (3) the most menial kind of service (Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27; cf. Acts 13:25). In Acts 22:25 himas is used literally of the thongs by which the Roman soldiers tied up Paul.

LATIN (lăt'ĭn), the language of the Romans, and, in Palestine, used primarily by the Romans. The official superscription on the cross was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin (Luke 23:38; John 19:20). The NT contains about 25 administrative and military Latin words translated into Greek.

LATTICE (lăt'ĭs). Latticework, made by crossing laths or other material across an opening, served a threefold purpose: (1) privacy (so that one might look out without being seen; (2) ventilation (so that the breeze might flow in without the sun's hot rays); (3) decoration (so that a house or public building might be architecturally more attractive), Judges 5:28; Proverbs 7:6; II Kings 1:2.

LAUGHTER (lăf'tĕr). 1. Laughter's limitations: it cannot satisfy (Prov. 14:13; Eccl. 2:2; 7:3,6; 10:19).

2. God's laughter: He laughs at His enemies (Ps. 2:4; 37:13; 59:8).

3. The believers' laughter: they sometimes laugh incredibly (Gen. 17:17; 18:12-15; 21:6); but they can laugh for real joy (Ps. 126:2; Luke 6:21) and at the wicked (Job 22:19; Ps. 52:6; Isa. 37:22).

4. The unbelievers' laughter: they laugh at Christ (Ps. 22:7; Matt. 9:24), at believers (Neh. 2:19; Job 12:4; Ps. 80:6), and at God's ordinances (II Chron. 30:10); but their laughter will vanish (Prov. 1:26; Luke 6:25; James 4:9).

LAVER (lā'vĕr, Heb. kîyyôr, pot, basin, Gr. loutrón), a vessel containing water, located between the altar and the door of the tabernacle, at which Jewish priests washed their hands and feet before ministering (Exod. 30:17-22). Solomon's temple had ten such lavers, used for animal sacrifices, and one "molten sea" for priestly ablutions (I Kings 7:23-47). These lavers were partly destroyed by Ahaz (II Kings 16:17); later the remains were carried to Babylon (II Kings 25:13; Jer. 52:17).

Undoubtedly the laver had typical meaning, signifying: (1) baptism as a cleansing from sin (cf. Acts 2:38; 22:16; I Cor. 6:11; Eph. 5:26; Titus 3:5; Heb. 10:22; I Pet. 3:20f); (2) the need of daily purification before approaching the Lord (cf. Ps. 24:3f; John 13:2-10; I John 1:7ff).

LAW. 1. The Terms of Scripture. Of Hebrew words, the one most frequent of occurrence, tôrâh, may refer to human instruction (Prov. 1:8), to divine instruction (Isa. 1:10), to a regulation (Lev. 7:7), to the law of Moses (I Kings 2:3) or to custom (II Sam. 7:19). Other words which may be so translated include dāth, hôq, mitswâh and mishpat. The common Greek word nómos is occasionally used of law(s) in the most general sense (Rom. 3:27) of a principle which governs one's actions (Rom. 7:23), of the Pentateuch (Gal. 3:10), and of other portions of Holy Scripture (as John 10:34; I Cor. 14:21), but most often for the Mosaic law (Acts 15:5). English synonyms include commandment, direction, judgment, ordinance, precept, statute and testimony.

2. The Moral Law. It is plain from the Decalogue (Exod. 20:3-17; Deut. 5:7-21) that morality is not to be derived from human standards and the verdict of society but from God and His declarations and one's relationship of subordination to Him. Right and wrong are not determined by the voice of society but by the voice of God.

The Ten Commandments enunciate the broad principles of God's moral law. We are warranted in finding positive teaching as to the will of God for our lives in those commandments which are couched in the negative and for discerning admonition and prohibition in those framed as positive exhortations. The Commandments constitute the regulative core of revelation as to acceptable lines of human conduct.

The first table of the law was considered to express man's duty toward God (Exod. 20:3-11) and the second his duty toward his fellow men (Exod. 20:12-17). The NT would seem to follow this division in summarizing the law, for Jesus said that it demanded perfect love for God and love for one's neighbor comparable to that which one has for himself (Matt. 22:35-40).

Rather than setting aside the moral law, the NT reiterates its commands, develops more fully the germinal truths contained in it, and focuses attention upon the spirit of the law as over against merely the letter. So it is that Paul affirms there is but one God (Eph. 4:6) and cautions against idolatry both directly and indirectly (I Cor. 10:14; Rom. 1:21ff). While the NT suggests an attitude toward the sabbath somewhat different from that of Jewish legalism (Mark 2:23-28) and comes to recognize the time of observance as the first day of the week (Acts 20:7; I Cor. 16:2), it preserves the observance as of divine institution and enriches its significance by associating with it Christ's resurrection. So also, the NT emphasizes the law of love (Rom. 13:8-10; Gal. 5:14; James 2:8) and selflessness and humility as representative of the mind of Christ (Phil. 2:3-8). Although the NT commandments are for the most part by positive exhortations rather than by warnings and prohibitions, the underlying principles are the same.

Scripture makes clear the function of the moral law. As the expression of the character and will of God, it set forth the only standard of righteousness acceptable to Him, but man was without power to conform to that perfect standard. The law made man aware of his sinfulness (Rom. 7:7,13), condemned him as unrighteous (Rom. 7:9-11; Gal. 3:13; James 2:9) and, having removed any hope of salvation through his own righteousness, brought him to the place where he would cast himself upon the grace of God that he might trust only in the righteousness and merit of the atoning Saviour, Jesus Christ (Gal. 3:24).

Christians are free from the condemnation of the law (Rom. 8:2) since the righteousness of Him who kept the law perfectly and who vicariously paid the penalty for the transgression of the law on the part of His people has been imputed to them. However, the believer is not only declared righteous by God (Rom. 4:5,6) but is renewed in righteousness and is progressively sanctified as the Holy Spirit applies the Word in his life (II Cor. 5:21; Gal. 5:16ff; I Thess. 5:23). The goal of the Christian is conformity to the moral image of God as manifested to man by the Incarnate Son (Eph. 4:13). So it is that the Christian is under obligation to keep the moral law (cf. Matt. 5:19ff; Eph. 4:28; 5:3; 6:2; Col. 3:9; I Pet. 4:15), not as a condition of salvation, but that he might become more and more like his Father in heaven (Rom. 8:1-9; Eph. 4:13), and this because of love for the one who redeemed him (Rom. 13:8-10; I John 5:2,3).

3. Social Legislation. In the giving of the law at Sinai, Moses first communicated to the people the body of principles, the Ten Words, and then the applicatory precepts. Careful study of the individual statutes shows the specific commands to be rooted in the basic principles set forth in the Decalogue.

OT laws of judicial, civil or political nature are to be found in the block of legislative material known as the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20:23-23:33), in the so-called Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26) and here and there throughout most of the Book of Deuteronomy, especially in chapters 21-25.

Since man is inherently sinful and lawless, social life must come under regulations. So it was that in OT times both Jews and Gentiles found themselves subject to law. Nor was the civil legislation binding upon the covenant line too different from that of the heathen nations. The Code of Hammurabi has much in common with the laws promulgated under Moses, and other ancient statutes are found as well among non-Jews as in Israel. Basic principles of right and wrong are the same everywhere and for all people, reflecting the work of the Holy Spirit in the realm of common grace. The difference was that in the Israelite theocracy the laws regulating society were recognized as declared through God's prophets and with divine authority, whereas in other nations the authority behind the codes was the voice of tradition or the voice of the state.

A basic institution ordained of God, the family was necessarily governed in its many relationships by various regulations that it might be preserved from corruption and dissolution. There were many prescriptions regarding marriage itself (Exod. 21; 22; 34; Lev. 18; 21; Num. 5; 25; 30; Deut. 7; 21; 22; 24; 25; 27). Within the family, children were to honor and obey their parents (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16; 21:18-21; 27:16). And since the family circle might include servants, slaves and strangers, there were laws pertaining to them (Exod. 12; 21; 22; Lev. 19; 22; 24; 25; Num. 9; 15; 35; Deut. 1; 12; 14; 15; 16; 23; 24; 27).

As might be expected, crimes against society were to be punished according to law. These might partake of a moral nature, such as sexual violations or perversions (Exod. 20-22; Lev. 18-20; Num. 5; Deut. 5; 22-25; 27). Again, they might have reference to crimes against individuals, either their persons (Gen. 9; Exod. 20-23; Lev. 19; 24; Num. 35; Deut. 5; 19; 21; 22; 24; 27) or their property (Exod. 20; 22; Lev. 6; 19; Deut. 5; 19; 23; 25; 27). Or, the offense might be one against the state (Exod. 20; 23; Lev. 19; Deut. 5; 16; 19; 27).

In addition to the laws already mentioned, other regulations governing property are to be found in Exod. 21-23; Lev. 6; 24; 25; Num. 27; 36; and Deut. 21; 22; 25.

OT legislation contained numerous stipulations pertaining to the operation of the state. Certain aspects of political organization were outlined (Exod. 22; Num. 1; 3; 4; 26; 33; Deut. 17; 23). Specifications were made regarding the army (Num. 1; 2; 10; 26; 31; Deut. 7; 11; 20; 21; 23; 24). Judicial prescriptions are set forth (Exod. 18; 20; 21; 23; Lev. 5; 19; Num. 35; Deut. 1; 4; 5; 16; 17; 19; 25; 27). And provision was made for bringing to the people a knowledge of the law (Deut. 6; 11; 27; 31; Josh. 8).

Many Israelite laws were laws of kindness. Even the treatment of animals was subject to regulation (Exod. 23; 34; Lev. 22; 25; Deut. 22; 25). The general commandment of love, whether for friends or strangers, was invoked (Exod. 23; Lev. 19; Deut. 10). The poor, unfortunate, lowly, defenseless and needy were to be treated humanely (Exod. 21-23; Lev. 19; 23; 25; Deut. 14-16; 21-27).

The prescriptions of the law were to the end that there might be peace and order, whether in the operations of the state, the family or in other spheres of human interrelations. The dignity of the individual was to be preserved. A high premium was set on selflessness and consideration of others. God's wisdom and grace were manifest in the legislation given the Israelites through His servant Moses.

4. Religious Legislation. Embodied in the OT are many laws governing the worship of God. Some are very general in nature, having to do with purity of worship. Large numbers of the laws concern the sanctuary, its priesthood, and the rites and ceremonies connected with it and the covenant relationship between the Israelites and their God. Some consist of prescriptions pertaining to special occasions of the religious year.

Basic principles of worship are outlined in the first table of the Decalogue (Exod. 20:3-11). They are then worked out into detailed applicatory legislation. Because Jehovah is the only true God, exalted and holy, other gods so-called are not to be worshiped (Exod. 22; 23; 34; Deut. 5; 6; 8; 11; 17; 30), apostasy is a sin (Deut. 13:1-18), idolatry is forbidden (Exod. 20:23; 34; Lev. 19; 26; Deut. 4; 7; 12; 16; 27) and such occult arts as witchcraft, sorcery and divination are not to be practiced (Exod. 22; Lev. 18-20; Deut. 18). So also, blasphemy is not to be tolerated (Exod. 22; Lev. 18; 19; 24) and God's sabbath day is to be kept inviolate (Exod. 23; 31; 34; 35; Lev. 19; 26; Num. 15).

Since Jehovah is the only true God, His people are not only to study and keep His law (Lev. 18-20; 25; Num. 15; Deut. 4-8; 10; 11; 22; 26; 27; 30) but are to separate themselves from the heathen and their religious practices (Exod. 22; 23; 34; Lev. 18-20; Deut. 6; 7; 12; 14; 18). They are to be a holy nation (Exod. 19; 22; Lev. 19; 26; Deut. 7; 14; 18; 26; 28), and they are to give to God the allegiance, love, gratitude and obedient service due Him (Exod. 23; 34; Lev. 19; 25; Deut. 4-6; 8; 10; 11; 13; 14; 17; 30; 31).

On Mt. Sinai, God delineated in detail to Moses the pattern for the sanctuary (Exod. 25-27), and the tabernacle was built in conformity to that pattern (Exod. 35-38). Later, its essential features were reproduced in Solomon's temple (II Chron. 3; 4). The sanctuary was in a special sense the dwelling place of God among His people and spoke silently of God's fellowship with them (Exod. 25:8,22). As the place where God drew nigh to the people and they to Him, it was designed to remind them of the Lord — His splendor, His magnificence, His glory, His transcendence, His holiness, His presence, His mercy and forgiveness, His requirements of men, and His covenant headship. Through its structure and the regulations as to who might enter each part, God's holiness was emphasized.

The brazen altar spoke of sacrifice and therefore of the necessity of worship and atonement. As one approached the holy God, the laver was mute evidence of the fact that cleansing from defilement must first take place. The altar of incense pointed to the importance of adoration and praise (Isa. 6:3,4; Ps. 141:2). The table of shewbread suggested the need for dedication, and the golden candlestick perhaps indicated that the worshiper should reflect in his life the light which comes from God and which is ever to be associated with Him. These conclusions rest upon the assumption that the sanctuary furnishings in the outer court and in the Holy Place were for the purpose of instructing the OT worshiper how men should draw near to God in worship.

On the other hand, the symbolism of the Holiest Place may be thought of as speaking of God in His approach to men. Through the tables of law in the ark, through the ark's cover and through the cherubim betokening the presence of God, Jehovah said to His people, "I, God, am a spiritual Being here in your midst. My law accuses and condemns. Who can keep it? But I have provided a covering, a propitiation, an atonement. Despite sin, it is still possible for you to look forward to dwelling in my immediate presence." The veil testified that that time had not come, but the typology was unmistakable.

The worshiper might come only as far as the court. The ordinary priest could enter the Holy Place. Only the high priest might enter the Holy of Holies, and that but once a year. The symbolism was plain: It was not a light thing to seek acceptance in the presence of the holy God, but there was indeed a way of approach.

Through the system of OT sacrifices, the worshiper learned that through the offering of sacrifice God dealt with sin and granted forgiveness (Lev. 4: 20), that through the shedding of blood there was atonement of sin (Lev. 16;15,16), that the animal of the ceremony was reckoned as a substitute for the worshiper (Lev. 16:20-22), that the sacrifices were perhaps not the full and final answer to the sin problem (since they must continue to be offered), that sacrifice without obedience to God's revelation was of no value (Isa. 1:10-17), and that God's suffering servant was to be a guilt offering (Isa. 53:10). The Mosaic legislation prescribes the kinds of sacrifices and the details governing them: The whole burnt offering (Exod. 20; Lev. 1; 6; Deut. 12:27); the sin offering (Lev. 4-6; 8-10; Num. 15); the guilt offering (Lev. 5-7; 19; Num. 5); the peace offering (Lev. 3; 7; 19; 22). Also, the law had much to say about other offerings and sacrificial dues (Exod. 10; 13; 18; 22; 23; 29; 30; 34; Lev. 2; 3; 6; 14; 19; 22; 23; 27; Num. 3; 5; 6; 8; 15; 18; 19; 28; 30; 31; Deut. 12; 14-18; 23; 26).

Through the priesthood, men came to understand that the transcendent, holy God cannot be approached in a casual way by sinful men but only by a mediator representing both God and man, that the mediator must be emblematic of holiness and perfection, and that God deals with sin through the representative acts of the mediator. As to the concept of the priesthood, the focus of attention was narrowed from the whole nation (Exod. 19:6) to the priests and Levites and finally to one man, the high priest, whose acts on behalf of the people brought reconciliation. Laws pertaining to the priesthood are to be found in Exod. 28-30; 39; 40; Lev. 2; 5-8; 10; 16; 21-24; 27; Num. 3-6; 15; 18; 31. The law codes regulated ceremonial cleanliness not only as regards the priests but in reference to food (Exod. 12; 22; 23; 34; Lev. 3:7; 11; 17; 19; 20; 22; Deut. 12; 14; 15) and purification (Lev. 5; 11-15; 22; Num. 6; 19; 31; Deut. 21; 24).

The feasts and festivals had significance which was partly historical, partly merely symbolical, partly typical. The Passover was a reminder of physical deliverance from bondage in Egypt (Exod. 12:17; Deut. 16:1). Sacred history and prophecy frequently blend, and so the observance of the Passover might well have had this message: As God delivered, so He will deliver. The central sacrifice in this festival as in others spoke as did the daily and weekly sacrifices, and the unleavened bread and the meat and drink offerings pointed to the importance of a holy, fruitful life before God. As a harvest festival, Pentecost signified rejoicing and the place of thanksgiving to God in the life of the covenant participant (Deut. 16:9,10) especially in the light of the deliverance from Egypt (Deut. 16:12). Except for the significance of the extra sacrifices, the Feast of Tabernacles (Exod. 23; Lev. 23; Num. 29; Deut. 16) may have been to the Jews little more than a reminder of God's love and care during the period of the nation's youth when the Jews wandered in the wilderness and were tested by deprivation that they might learn to trust in God and His provision. On the other hand, the Day of Atonement emphasized the need for the expiation of sin, the atoning nature of the blood sacrifice and the idea of substitution in relation to atonement.

The rite of circumcision symbolized the taking away of defilement that the individual might be rightly related to God and partaker of the covenant of grace.

The NT spells out the antitypes involved. As God's dwelling among His people was symbolized in the OT through the Garden of Eden, the tabernacle and the temple, so the New Covenant tells us that God as the Son "tabernacled among us" (John 1:14), that He indwells the individual believer (I Cor. 6:19) and the Church (II Cor. 6: 16), and that the final and everlasting dwelling place of God with man will be heaven itself (Heb. 9:24; Rev. 21:3).

In the New Dispensation, that which was symbolized by the Passover celebration and circumcision came to be represented and to be defined more clearly in the Lord's Supper and Christian baptism. The types and shadows of the ceremonial law gave way to antitypes.

The cross replaced the brazen altar. There was no longer a sanctuary laver but a "laver of regeneration" (Titus 3:5). "The prayers of the saints" (Rev. 5:8) took the place of the altar of incense. Dedicated lives came to be offered (Rom. 12:1,2) rather than symbolic shewbread, and good works produced by children of the light made unnecessary the golden candlestick. Instead of the mercy seat as a "propitiatory covering" (LXX translation of I Chron. 28:11), Christ became the propitiation for the sins of His people (Rom. 3:25; I John 2:2; 4:10), and man redeemed and in fellowship with God became the prophetic fulfillment of the symbolic cherubim, which were basically human in form (Ezek. 1:5; 10:21) and always associated with the presence of Jehovah (Gen. 3:24; Ps. 18: 10; Ezek. 1; 10; 28). The Lord Jesus was seen to be God's Passover Lamb (I Cor. 5:7), a perfect, all-sufficient sacrifice (Eph. 5:2; Heb. 7:27; 9:11-14). As the High Priest, Christ made reconciliation (Heb. 2:17) and lives to make intercession for His own (Heb. 7:25).

A covenant child, our Lord was related to the ceremonial law as shown by His circumcision (Luke 2:21) and His presence at the temple at the Passover feast (Luke 2:42). He instructed lepers to carry out the provisions of the law (Luke 17:14). He drove from the temple those who defiled it (Matt. 21:12,13). He and His disciples were accustomed to go to Jerusalem at feast time (John 7:37; 13:1,29).

Christ spoke negatively regarding the traditions of the Jews but not of the ceremonial law as set forth in the OT, yet He indicated that the time was coming when the ritual of the law would give place to spiritual worship (John 4:24).

In the transitional period after the cross, the resurrection and the ascension, conditions in each case determined whether the stipulations of the law should be observed. Paul might circumcise Timothy (Acts 16:3) but not Titus (Gal. 2:3,4). He could assure the Corinthians that circumcision in the flesh was not essential for salvation (I Cor. 2:2; 7:18,19) and, in writing to the Galatians, he could argue strongly against the contentions of the Judaizers (Gal. 2:4ff; 5:1ff) in line with the decisions of the council at Jerusalem (Acts 15:4ff). The argument of the book of Hebrews is that the types and shadows of the ceremonial law have passed away with the coming of Christ, the perfect High Priest, who as the Lamb of God offered Himself on Golgotha that He might satisfy every demand of the law and purchase salvation for His people.

By means of the ceremonial law, God spoke in picture language of the salvation He was to effect through the life and death of the Incarnate Son. Of necessity, therefore, it was but imperfect and temporary. The social legislation governing Israel was designed for a particular culture at a given period of history and so it, too, was but for a time, yet the principles which underlay it are timeless and applicable to all generations. God's moral law is in force everywhere and at all times, for it is a reflection of His very being. It has never been abrogated, nor indeed can be. See MARRIAGE, TABERNACLE, PRIEST. B.L.G.

LAW OF MOSES (See Law)

LAWGIVER (Heb. mehōqēq, Gen. 49:10; Num. 21:18; Deut. 33:21; Ps. 60:7; 108:8; Isa. 33:22; Gr. nomothétes, James 4:12). God is the only absolute lawgiver (James 4:12). Instrumentally, Moses bears this description (John 1:17; 7:19).

LAWYER (Gr. nomikós, pertaining to law), a term used to describe a class of men well versed in the oral and written law whose duty consisted in teaching young men and in deciding questions concerning the Law. The term is found in Matthew 22:35; Luke 7:30; 10:25; 11:45f, 52f; 14:3; Titus 3:9,13. (The best mss. omit it in Luke 11:45.) Tertullus, a Roman lawyer, presented the Jewish case against Paul (Acts 24:1ff).

LAYING ON OF HANDS (Gr. Epíthesis cheirón), an act pregnant with manifold implications. In the OT the act symbolizes (1) the parental bestowal of inheritance-rights (Gen. 48:14-20); (2) the gifts and rights of an office (Num. 27:18,23; Deut. 34:9); and (3) substitution, of an animal for one's guilt (Exod. 29:10,15,19; Lev. 1:4; 3:2,8,13; 4:4,15,24,29,33; 8:14,18,22; 16:21; cf. Gen. 22:9-13), of a tribe for the firstborn of other tribes (Num. 8:10-13), of one's innocency for another's guilt (Lev. 24:13-16; Deut. 13:9; 17:7). In the NT the act symbolizes (1) the bestowal of blessings and benediction (Matt. 19:13,15; cf. Luke 24:50); (2) the restoration of health (Matt. 9:18; Acts 9:12,17); (3) the reception of the Holy Spirit in baptism (Acts 8:17,19; 19:6); (4) the gifts and rights of an office (Acts 6:6; 13:3; I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6).

LAZARUS (lăz'ă-rŭs Lat. from Gr., for Heb. Eleazar). 1. Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, who lived in Bethany. Lazarus, during Christ's absence, took sick and died; Christ, after some delay, returned and raised Lazarus from death (John 11:1-12:19). The following factors enhance the importance of this miracle: (1) the number of days (four) between death and resurrection (John 11:39); (2) the number of witnesses involved (John 11:45; 12:17f); (3) the evident health of Lazarus after the event (John 12:1f,9); (4) the evidential significance of the event among the Jews (John 11:53; 12:10f).

This miracle (1) illustrates Christ's sympathy (John 11:5,11,34f) and power (John 11:40ff); (2) manifests the purposiveness of His miracles (John 11:4,40; 20:31); (3) gives concreteness to Luke 16:30f; (4) affords opportunity for eschatological teaching (John 11:23-25); (5) precipitates the crucifixion (John 11:45-53; 12:9-19).

The silence of the Synoptics is explainable thus: (1) the miracle was outside their scope; (2) it was not the leading accusation brought against Christ (cf. Matt. 26:61-66); (3) it was indirectly confirmed by the "envy" they attribute to the Jews (Matt. 27:18); (4) it did not fit into their plan as a didactic purpose as it did in John's (John 20:31).

2. Lazarus, a beggar who died and went to Abraham's bosom (Luke 16:19-31). The story illustrates these truths: (1) destiny is settled at death; (2) no purgatory awaits the righteous; (3) man has sufficient warning now.

LEAF, used in a threefold manner in the Bible. 1. Leaf of a tree (Dan. 4:12,14,21; Ezek. 17:9). Here we find the semi-physical or semi-spiritual uses: (1) the insufficiency of man's righteousness (Gen. 3:7); (2) the fruitfulness of the restored earth (Gen. 8:11); (3) the sign of a distressed and nervous spirit (Lev. 26:36; Job 13:25); (4) the spiritual productivity of the righteous (Ps. 1:3; Prov. 11:28 ["branch"]; Jer. 17:8; (5) the spiritual unproductivity of the wicked (Isa. 1:30); (6) the completeness of God's judgment (Isa. 34:4; Jer. 8:13); (7) the frailty and evanescence of man (Isa. 64:6); (8) the blessings of Messianic times (Ezek. 47:12); (9) the unfruitfulness of Israel (Ezek. 17:9; Matt. 21:19; Mark 11:13); (10) the nearness of the eschatological judgment (Matt. 24:32; Mark 13:28); (11) the glory of an earthly kingdom (Dan. 4:12,14,21); (12) the glory and fruitfulness of the heavenly kingdom (Rev. 22:2).

2. Leaf of a door. In I Kings 6:34 tsēlā' is thus used; and in Ezekiel 41:24 deleth is translated both by "doors" and by "leaves."

3. Leaf of a book. So deleth in Jeremiah 36:23.

LEAH (lē'a, Heb. lē'âh, meaning uncertain), Laban's daughter and Jacob's first (though not preferred) wife (Gen. 29:21-30); mother of Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah, a daughter (Gen. 29:31-35; 30:17-21). Loyal to Jacob (Gen. 31:14-16), she returned with him to Canaan, where, at her death, she was buried in Machpelah (Gen. 49:31). Two of her sons (Levi and Judah) became progenitors of prominent tribes in Israel; and through Judah, Jesus Christ came (Gen. 49:10; Mic. 5:2; Matt. 2:6; Heb. 7:14; Rev. 5:5; cf. Ruth 4:11).

LEASING (lēz'ĭng, Heb. kāzav, lie, falsehood), now obsolete, it is found twice in AV (Ps. 4:2; 5:6). RSV has "falsehood" and "lies."

LEATHER (lĕth'ĕr, Heb. 'ôr, skin, Gr. dermátinos, made of skin), designates the skin of certain animals after it has been specially treated. Those who performed this work as a trade were called tanners (Acts 10:32). Leather was a common article of clothing (Lev. 13:48; Heb. 11:37). However, John the Baptist (Matt. 3:4) and his prototype, Elijah (II Kings 1:8), are the only ones specifically mentioned as wearing "a girdle of leather." Leather was also used for armor, shoes, containers, and writing material.

LEAVEN (lĕv'ĕn, Heb. se'ōr, hāmēts, Gr. zúme). The answer to seven questions will cover most of the Biblical material. 1. Why was leaven so rigidly excluded from "meal offerings" (ASV) ["meat offerings" (AV)] in the Sinaitic legislation (Exod. 29:2,23,32; Lev. 2:1-16; 6:14-23; 7:9f; 8:2,26,31; 10:12; Num. 15:1-9,17-21; 18:9; cf. Exod. 23:18; 34:15)? The answer seems to lie in the fact that leaven, representing corruption, symbolizes evil.

2. Why was leaven permitted in certain other offerings (Exod. 23:15f; 34:22f; Lev. 2:11; 7:13f; 23:17f; Num. 15:20)? The answer seems to be this: leaven, a part of the daily food, is included in the offerings of thanks. Some hold that leaven here symbolizes the evil that still inheres in the worshiper.

3. Why was leaven excluded from the Passover (Exod. 12:14-20; 23:15; 34:18; Deut. 16:2-4)? The record seems to indicate Israel's haste in leaving Egypt prompted this exclusion (Exod. 12:11,39; Deut. 16:3). However, the Passover as a type of Christ must be taken into account here (cf. I Cor. 5:7f).

4. Does Lot's use of unleavened bread (Gen. 19:3) anticipate the symbolism of the Sinaitic legislation? Haste may have been the reason; but the latent symbolism of evil (as inconsistent with angels) cannot be entirely ruled out.

5. What does Amos 4:5 indicate? Simply this: the degenerate Northern Kingdom mixed the permitted (Lev. 7:13; 23:17) with the forbidden (Exod. 23:18; 34:25; Lev. 2:11).

6. What about the NT significance of leaven? Apart from Matthew 13:33 (see below) leaven symbolizes either Jewish legalism (Matt. 16:6,12; Gal. 5:9) or moral corruption (I Cor. 5:6ff).

7. What, then, about Matthew 13:33? This is a passage around which much controversy gathers. Some interpret leaven as symbolizing the final apostasy of the professing Church; others explain leaven as symbolizing the permeating effect of the Gospel in Christianizing the world. W.B.

LEBANON (lĕb'ănŏn, Heb. levānôn, white), a snowclad mountain range extending in a northeasterly direction for 100 miles along the Syrian coast, from Tyre to Arvad, and the country which bears its name. The name signifies the whiteness either of the fossil-bearing limestone cliffs or the snowy crests of this mountain system. Rising precipitously from the Mediterranean (Josh. 9:1), Lebanon proper averages 6000 feet above sea level (cf. the steep grades on the present Beirut-Damascus highway), with peaks reaching 10,200; but the elevation then drops to 2300 feet, for ten miles across the Orontes River valley, known as Coele (hollow) Syria. East of this "valley of Lebanon" (Josh. 11:17; 12:7), however, rises the Anti-Lebanon range, the southernmost promontory of which is Mt. Hermon, whose 9383-foot peak remains visible as far S as Jericho. Scripture speaks of Lebanon and Sirion (Anti-Lebanon, Ps. 29:6, = S(h)enir, Deut. 3:9, sometimes excluding Hermon, I Chron. 5:23, S. of Sol. 4:8), though "Lebanon" may designate both ranges (J. Simons, The Geographical and Topographical Texts of the Old Testament, Leiden: Brill, 1959, pp. 43,55-56; cf. LXX Antilibanos, in Deut. 1:7; 3:25; 11:24; Josh. 1:4; 9:1), or even Anti-Lebanon alone (Josh. 13:6), "Lebanon toward the sunrising" (13:5; Simons, op. cit., pp. 112-113). The melting snow of these watersheds (Jer. 18:14; S. of Sol. 4:15) creates the Orontes, flowing northward; the Abana, watering Damascus to the E; the westward-flowing Leontes or Litany; and the Jordan, meandering southward through Palestine to the Dead Sea. Yet these same peaks desiccate the moisture-laden western winds, causing desert farther E.

Lebanon's southern slopes grade into the foothills of Galilee, "literally the casting forth of the roots of Lebanon" (George A. Smith on Hos. 14:5, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, 19th ed.; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1896, p. 417); and the gorge of the Litany marks out a natural northwestern boundary for Israel (Deut. 11:24; II Kings 19:23). Lebanon thus "lies properly outside the Holy Land" (ibid., p. xvii); and, though included in God's promise, it was never totally occupied (Josh. 13:5; though cf. its eschatological possession, Ezek. 47:15,16; Simons, op. cit., p. 102). Its isolated crags, however, supported watch towers (S. of Sol. 7:4) and refuge-points (Jer. 22:20,23) and came to symbolize the exalted status of Judah's royal house (Jer. 22:6; Ezek. 17:3).

Ancient Lebanon was heavily forested with varieties of budding foliage (Isa. 29:17; Nah. 1:4), including the Phoenician juniper, which resembles the cypress (I Kings 5:8; II Kings 19:23; ASVm), and other tall conifers (Ezek. 27:5; cf. KB, p. 85), but above all the great cedars of Lebanon (I Kings 4:33). Biblical poetry expatiates on the motion of their massive branches (Ps. 72:16); on the fragrance of their wood (S. of Sol. 3:6-9; cf. 4:11 and Hos. 14:6 where Lebanon means trees, per Isa. 10:34; 40:16); on their height, as symbolical of dignity or pride (S. of Sol. 5:15; Isa. 2:13); and on their growth and resistance to decay (Ps. 92:12). The psalmists' inspired thought thus advances to the corresponding greatness of the Creator, who both plants the cedars (Ps. 104:16) and shatters them by His voice (29:5). The Lebanons were famous also for choice wine (Hos. 14:7), for thorny plants, and for beasts such as the lion and leopard (II Kings 14:9; Isa. 40:16; S. of Sol. 4:8). "The glory of Lebanon" climaxes Isaiah's prophetic descriptions (35:2; 60:13).

Coastal Lebanon was early inhabited by Phoenicians (Josh. 13:5-6), skilled in the employment of its cedars for civil and marine construction (Ezek. 27:4-5), while its sparser inland population was Hivite (Judg. 3:3; Hermon, Josh. 11:3). The name Lebanon appears in ancient Ugaritic, Hittite, Egyptian, and Babylonian, its first Biblical mention being Mosaic, 1406 B.C. (Deut. 1:7). It was cited in Jotham's fable against Shechem, c. 1130 (Judg. 9:15; cf. the reference to fire hazard), as well as in Jehoash's against Amaziah, over three centuries later (II Kings 14:9; II Chron. 25:18). King Solomon contracted with Hiram of Tyre for the use of Lebanon's cedars in the Jerusalem temple, 966-959 B.C. (I Kings 5:6-18; cf. Ezra 3:7, concerning the second temple also), 10,000 workers per month hewing the timbers and floating them in great rafts along the Mediterranean coast. Solomon likewise erected government buildings and palaces in his capital, including a hall and armory called "the house of the forest of Lebanon" from its rows of cedar pillars and paneling (I Kings 7:2-7; 10:17,21; ICC, pp. 162-165; cf. Isa. 22:8). The king's Lebanese building projects (cf. I Kings 10:27) led him to construction-work in Lebanon itself, at least portions of which came within his widespread domains (9:19; S. of Sol. 4:8). Subsequent advances by the pagan empires of antiquity furthered both the conquest and ruthless exploitation of Lebanon's resources (Isa. 33:9). Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks left their successive inscriptions at the mouth of the Dog River (Nahr el-Kelb); and Ezekiel compares the destruction of Assyria's king with the felling of cedars of Lebanon (31:3,15-16; cf. Zech. 11:1). Habakkuk bewails the violence done also by Babylon in cutting down these forest giants (2:17; cf. Isa. 14:8). By the days of Justinian (A.D. 527-565) the once extensive groves had suffered heavy depletion, and most of the remainder were destroyed during 1914-1919 to supply fuel for the Beirut-Damascus railway. Conservation projects, however, are now attempting reforestation. J.B.P.

LEBAOTH (lĕ-bā'ŏth, Heb. levā'ôth, lionesses), a town in S part of Judah (Josh. 15:32) also called Beth-lebaoth (Josh. 19:6) and (probably) Bethbirei (I Chron. 4:31). Location otherwise unknown.

LEBBAEUS (lĕ-bē'ŭs, Gr. Lebbaíos, hearty), one of Christ's apostles who is also called Thaddaeus (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18) and Judas (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13). John 14:22 distinguishes him from Judas Iscariot.

LEBONAH (lĕ-bō'nà, Heb. levônâh, frankincense), a town, mentioned only in Judges 21:19, N of Bethel on the highway between Shiloh and Shechem. It is now generally identified as the modern Lubban.

LECAH (lē'kà, Heb. lēkhâh, walking), a "son" of Er (I Chron. 4:21); probably the name of an unknown town.

LEEKS (See Plants)

LEES (lēz, Heb. shemārîm, pl. fr. shemer, something preserved), a word that describes that undisturbed and thick portion of wine that naturally falls to the bottom of the vat. The word is used figuratively throughout to express (1) the blessings of Messianic times (Isa. 25:6; cf. Isa. 55:1). (2) the spiritual lethargy and decadence of Moab (Jer. 48:11); (3) the indifference of Israelites to spiritual realities (Zeph. 1:12); (4) the bitterness and inevitability of God's wrath upon the wicked (Ps. 75:8 — "dregs").

LEFT (Heb. semō'l, the left, semā'lî, on the left, sim'ēl, take the left, Gr. euónymos, of good name). The word has a variety of connotations in the Bible: (1) simple direction (II Kings 23:8; Neh. 8:4); (2) geographic North (Gen. 14:15; Ezek. 16:46, RSV); (3) all directions (with "right") (Job 23:9); (4) the lesser blessing (Gen. 48:13-19); (5) weakness (Judg. 3:15,21), immaturity (Jonah 4:11), perversity (Eccl. 10:2), or evil (Matt. 25:33,41); (6) completion (with "right") (Ezek. 4:4,6); (7) special ability (I Chron. 12:2); (8) a woman's preference (S. of Sol. 2:6; 8:3).

LEGION (lē'jŭn, Gr. legión, or legeón, fr. Lat. legio), the largest single unit in the Roman army, including infantry and cavalry. A division of infantry at full strength consisted of about 6,000 Roman soldiers. Each division was divided into ten cohorts, and each cohort was further divided into six centuries. Each subdivision, as well as the larger whole, had its own officers and its own standards. The term "legion" in the NT represents a vast number (Matt. 26:53; Mark 5:9,15; Luke 8:30).

LEHABIM (lē-hā'bĭm, Heb. lehāvîm, meaning uncertain), the third son of Mizraim (Gen. 10:13; I Chron. 1:11). It is now generally believed that Lehabim and Lubim (II Chron. 12:3; 16:8; Nah. 3:9), otherwise known as Libyans (Jer. 46:9; Dan. 11:43) or the inhabitants of Libya (Ezek. 30:5; 38:5; Acts 2:10), represent the same ethnic group. Descendants of Ham, they occupied the N coast of Africa W of Egypt.

LEHI (lē'hī, Heb. lehî, jawbone, cheek), a place in Judah between the cliff Etam and Philistia, otherwise unknown, where Samson killed 1,000 Philistines with a jawbone (Judg. 15:9,14). Samson's exploit changed its name to Ramath-lehi ("the hill of the jawbone"; Judg. 15:19).

LEMUEL (lĕm'ū-ĕl, Heb. lemû'ēl, devoted to God), a king, otherwise unknown, to whom his mother taught the maxims in Proverbs 31:2-9. Though many identities have been proposed, the name undoubtedly describes Solomon (Prov. 31:1).

LESHEM (lē'shĕm, Heb. leshem, gem), the original of Dan (Josh. 19:47), a city at extreme N of Palestine (I Sam. 3:20); variant of Laish.

LETTER. In general, "letter" designates (1) an alphabetical symbol (Gal. 6:11, ASV); (2) rudimentary education (John 7:15); (3) a written communication (see below); (4) the external (Rom. 2:27,29); (5) Jewish legalism (Rom. 7:6; II Cor. 3:6).

A letter as a means of communication served many purposes: (1) information and instruction (II Sam. 11:14f; Esth. 1:22; 3:13; 9:20-30; Jer. 29:1ff); (2) credential of authority (Ezra 7:11-28; Neh. 2:7-9; Esth. 8:5,10ff; Acts 9:1ff; I Cor. 16:3; II Cor. 3:1); (3) means of propaganda and strife (I Kings 21:8-11; Ezra 4:7-24; Jer. 29:24-32); (4) forged counter-instruction (I Kings 21:8-11; II Thess. 2:2); (5) invitation (II Chron. 30:1-6); (6) cause of misunderstanding (II Kings 5:5-7; II Cor. 10:9-11) and concern (II Kings 19:14ff).

LETTUSHIM, LETUSHIM (lĕ-tū'shĭm, Heb. letûshîm, sharpened), the second son of Dedan (who was the grandson of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:3). His descendants (probably) settled in North Arabia.

LEUMMIM (lē-ŭm'ĭm, Heb. le'ummîm, peoples, nations), mentioned only in Genesis 25:3 as third son of Dedan, who was a grandson of Abraham by Keturah. The plural name possibly points to some tribe that settled in Arabia — otherwise unknown.

LEVI (lē'vī, Heb. lēwî, joined). 1. Jacob's third son by Leah (Gen. 29:34; 35:23). Levi, born in Haran, accompanied his father on his return to Canaan. He joined his brothers in sinister plots against Joseph (Gen. 37:4,28); and, with them, eventually bowed before Joseph (Gen. 42:6). A predicted famine caused Jacob's entire family to migrate to Egypt, where Levi died at age 137 (Exod. 6:16). His three sons, Gershon, Kohath and Merari (Gen. 46:11), later became heads of families. (See LEVITES.) Three things merit attention. (1) His name. His mother named him "Levi" at birth with the hope that Jacob, his father, would now be "joined" to her (Gen. 29:34). (2) His nature. His part in the massacre of the Shechemites on account of Shechem's raping of Dinah, his sister, manifested his twofold nature: duplicity and righteous indignation (Gen. 34:25-31). (3) His potential nobility. Jacob, with death imminent, pronounced a curse upon Simeon and Levi because of their iniquitous deed at Shechem (cf. Gen. 34:25-31 with Gen. 45:5-7); but, because of holy zeal (divorced from murderous savagery; cf. Gen. 49:5ff) manifested at Sinai (Exod. 32:25-29) and in Phinehas (Num. 25:6-13), Levi's curse became a blessing (Deut. 33:8-11) to his descendants.

2 and 3. Ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:24,29).

LEVIATHAN (See Animals)

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (lĕv'ī-rāt, lē'vī-, from Lat. levir, a husband's brother), an ancient custom, sanctioned by practice (Gen. 38:8ff) and by law (Deut. 25:5-10, which does not contradict Lev. 18:16; 20:21, where the participants are all alive), whereby a deceased man's brother or nearest male kin was required to marry his brother's widow and raise up seed in his brother's name. To repudiate this obligation meant public infamy. Ruth's marriage to Boaz recognized this law (Ruth 4:1-17). It also underlies the argument of the Sadducees in Matthew 22:23-33.

LEVITES (lē'vīts), the name given to the descendants of Levi. The relevant facts may be set forth thus:

I. Their Origin. Levi was the third son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. 29:34; 35:22-26). The Genesis record gives no intimation regarding the later greatness of the tribe bearing Levi's name. Such silence bears indirect testimony to the fact that the Genesis account, contrary to the theories of negative criticism, must have been written prior to the noble event that took place at Mt. Sinai (Exod. 32:25-29) which caused Levi's descendants to receive a special status in Israel. The Genesis record is thus free of any tendentious element with reference to Levi's later greatness as a tribe in Israel.

Furthermore, if the Genesis account had been written after the event on Mt. Sinai, as claimed by modern criticism it is difficult to understand why the story of Levi's notorious deed at Shechem (Gen. 34:25-31) was still retained — especially if, as also claimed by modern criticism, the early "history" was written, subjectively, to reflect the later greatness of Israel. Let us remember also that Genesis closes with a curse upon Levi for his participation in the crime at Shechem (Gen. 49: 5-7). This curse, pronounced by dying Jacob, would be utterly inconsistent with the critical view that Genesis, written by multiple writers late in Israel's history, reflects the national prestige of later times. The conservative view, accepting the Bible history as a record of real events, is free of such problems.

II. Their Appointment. Several discernible factors undoubtedly influenced the selection of Levi's descendants for their special place in Israel's religion. 1. The divine selection of Moses and Aaron, who were descendants of Kohath, one of Levi's three sons (Exod. 2:1-10; 6:14-27; Num. 26:59), obviously conferred upon the Levites an honor that was recognized by the other tribes. 2. However, an event of transcending importance at Mt. Sinai (Exod. 32:25-29) gave to the Levites as a tribe their place of privilege and responsibility in God's plan. The event just referred to transmuted the curse of Jacob's prophecy (Gen. 49:5-7) into the blessing of Moses' prophecy (Deut. 33:8-11). 3. Moreover, this choice was undoubtedly confirmed by a very similar event when an individual Levite, Phinehas by name, stayed the plague that was about to decimate the Israelites (Num. 25:1-13). Thus the true record of history shows how the curse upon Levi the ancestor became, by the wonders of God's providence, a blessing to his descendants.

It will not be amiss to consider here some of the purposes served in the divine plan by the selection of the Levites for their special ministry in the worship of God's ancient people. 1. As just recounted, their selection and appointment were rewards for their faithfulness to the Lord in a time of moral declension (Exod. 32:25-29). 2. The doctrine of substitution was illustrated by the selection of this tribe, for, although God claimed the firstborn males of all the tribes on the basis of the death of the firstborn among the Egyptians (Exod. 13:11-16), God graciously allowed the Levites to become substitutes for their fellow-tribesmen (Num. 3:9,11-13,40f,45-51; 8:14-19). 3. The simplification of service would surely result from the selection of one tribe, for one such tribe, closely knit by blood and by ancestral prestige, would be more manageable than uncertain detachments from many tribes. 4. The law of the tithe enhanced the selection of the Levites, for, in a sense, this tribe was a tithe of all the tribes; and it was to this tribe that the tithe was paid (Num. 18:21-30; Deut. 18:1-8; Neh. 10:37-39; Heb. 7: 5,9). 5. Israel's separation from the nations was further intensified by the selection of one tribe that was separated from all the tribes and separated and purified unto the Lord (Num. 8:5-22). 6. Life as a sojourn without an inheritance here is illustrated by the fact that the Levites had no inheritance in Israel; the Lord alone was their inheritance (Num. 18:20-24; 26:62; Deut. 10:9; 12:12; 14:27).

III. Their Organization. A threefold organization is discernible: 1. The top echelon was occupied by Aaron and his sons; these alone were priests in the restricted sense. The priests belonged to the family of Kohath. 2. The middle echelon included all the other Kohathites who were not of Aaron's family; to them were given certain privileges in bearing the most sacred parts of the tabernacle (Num. 3:27-32; 4:4-15; 7:9). 3. The bottom echelon comprised all members of the families of Gershon and Merari; to them lesser duties were prescribed (Num. 3:21-26,33-37).

IV. Priests and Levites. The Mosaic legislation made a sharp distinction between the priests and non-priests or ordinary Levites. 1. The priests must belong to Aaron's family; the Levites belong to the larger family of Levi. A priest was a Levite; but a Levite was not necessarily a priest. 2. Priests were consecrated (Exod. 29:1-37; Lev. 8); Levites were purified (Num. 8:5-22). 3. Levites were considered a gift to Aaron and his sons (Num. 3:5-13; 8:19; 18:1-7). 4. The fundamental difference consisted of this: only the priest had the right to minister at the altar and to enter the most holy place (Exod. 28:1; 29:9; Num. 3:10,38; 4:15,19f; 18: 1-7; 25:10-13). The rebellion of Korah, a Kohathite (Num. 16:1), against the uniqueness of Aaron's priesthood illustrated, in the way the rebellion was subdued, the heinous nature of attempting to enter the priesthood without the necessary prerequisites (Num. 16). The choice of Aaron was further confirmed by the budding of his rod (Num. 17:1-11; Heb. 9:4).

V. Post-Mosaic Changes. NT typology (cf. Heb. 8-10), considers the Sinaitic legislation as the standard form. The post-Sinaitic activity of the Levites may be succinctly summarized thus: 1. In the settlement in Canaan the Levites were necessarily relieved of some of their duties; the tabernacle no longer needed transportation. It is doubtful if the Levites ever fully occupied all the 48 cities assigned to them and the priests. The episode in Judges 17:7-13 does not, as maintained by critics, represent the earliest information concerning the priesthood.

2. In David's time the provision of Numbers 7:1-9, being neglected, brought death to a Levite (I Chron. 13:7-10; 15:12-15). David introduced innovations in the age and service of the Levites (I Chron. 23-26). Certain Levites, particularly Asaph, became musicians and probably wrote some of the Psalms (I Chron. 6:39,43; 15:16ff; 16:4ff; 25:1-9; Pss. 50; 73-83).

3. In the disruption of the united kingdom many Levites from the Northern Kingdom sought political and religious asylum in Judah (II Chron. 11:13-16; 13:9-12; 15:9); but some Levites were evidently involved in the apostasy of the Northern Kingdom (Ezek. 44:10-15). The Levites, during this period, were still considered as teachers (II Chron. 17:8ff; 19:8; cf. Deut. 33:10).

4. The Exilic period brings before us the symbolism of Ezekiel: only the true Levites, sons of Zadok, ministered in the temple (Ezek. 43:19; 44:10-16; 48:11f)

5. In the post-Exilic period Levites did not return from Babylon in the same proportion as the priests (Ezra 2:36-42; Neh. 7:39-45). Later, a special effort was required to get the Levites to return (Ezra 8:15-19). They were still considered to be teachers (Ezra 8:15ff) and musicians (Ezra 2:40f; 3:10ff; Neh. 7:43f).

6. Only a few references to the Levites are found in the NT (Luke 10:32; John 1:19; Acts 4:36; Heb. 7:11). Two points merit a final word: first, Levi, seminally in Abraham, paid tithes to Melchizedek (Gen. 14:17-20), thus proving the superiority of Melchizedek's (i.e., Christ's) priesthood to Aaron's (Heb. 7:4-10); second, since the Levitical priesthood could not bring perfection, it was required that another priest, from a different tribe and a different order, arise (Heb. 7:11-17; cf. Gen. 49:10; Ps. 110). W.B.

LEVITICAL CITIES. The plan set forth in Numbers 35:1-8 (fulfilled in Joshua 21) gave the Levites 48 cities. This plan involved a threefold purpose: 1. such cities caused the Levites to be "scattered" in Israel and thus fulfilled Jacob's dying prophecy (Gen. 49:7;) (2) thus "scattered," they could carry out their teaching ministry better (Deut. 33: 10); (3) since six of their cities were to be "cities of refuge" (Num. 35:6), they would thereby become more accessible to those seeking legal protection (Deut. 19:1-3,7-10,17ff). Negative criticism finds three problems: (1) The Levites were given "no inheritance" in Israel (Num. 18:20). True, but these cities were a gift from the other tribes (Num. 35:2,4,6-8). (2) No substantial evidence exists in pre-Exilic history for such cities. True, but Israel also failed to carry out fully other Mosaic legislation (cf. II Chron. 35:18; 36:21). (3) Numbers 35:1-8 is only an ideal theory never realized until Ezekiel 48:8-14. Not so; Ezekiel's symbolic idealization is based upon Numbers 35: 1-8 (and Josh. 21), though not literally confined to the earlier legislation.

LEVITICUS (lĕ-vĭt'ĭ-kŭs, Gr. Leveitikón, relating to the Levites), the designation in the English Bible of the third book of the Pentateuch, derived from the Latin rendering (Liber Leviticus) of the Greek title Leveitikón. The Hebrew title merely consists of the first word of the text (wayyiqrā'), "and he called." The book is closely associated with Exodus and Numbers in historical continuity, but differs from them in that the purely historical element is subordinate to legal and ritual considerations. Although the emphasis in Leviticus is more on priests than Levites, the English title is not inappropriate, since the Jewish priesthood was essentially Levitical (cf. Heb. 7:11).

Leviticus enshrines the laws by which the religious and civil organization of the primitive theocracy in Canaan was to be regulated. At Sinai the Israelites had been incorporated into a special relationship with God, had been given the covenant laws, and provided with a tabernacle for worship. Leviticus contains much that is technical in nature and meant for the direction of the priesthood in the conduct of worship and the regulating of social life. Thus it is distinct from Deuteronomy which is in effect a popular exposition of Levitical law.

The composition of the book was universally ascribed by ancient tradition, both Jewish and Gentile, to Moses the lawgiver of Israel. During the Middle Ages a number of writers denied certain aspects of Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, but it was only during the 18th century that literary criticism seriously challenged the traditional view. The movement grew in the following century and reached its classic formulation under Wellhausen in A.D. 1877. Using a background of Hegelian evolutionary philosophy he reconstructed Israelite history, and on the basis of a documentary hypothesis for Pentateuchal origins he assigned Leviticus to a post-Exilic date along with other elements of the so-called "priestly code."

This view has been widely espoused by liberal scholars, and in its developed form holds that Leviticus was compiled by temple priests between 500 and 450 B.C., using earlier legislation such as the "holiness code" (Lev. 17-26) which is regarded as dating from about 650 B.C. Most critical writers, however, concede that Leviticus contains very much older material, such as the Azazel or scape-goat ritual in Chapter 16 and traditional historical narratives including the punishment of Aaron's sons (10:1-7) and the stoning of the blasphemer (24:10-14).

The literary criteria employed in assigning a late date to the bulk of Leviticus have been criticized continuously since the time of Wellhausen, and the number of scholars who find them very difficult to sustain is increasing gradually. This arises in part from a wider knowledge of the media of communication in antiquity, and also from historical and archaeological considerations. It is now known that if the techniques of compilation alleged by Wellhausen had actually been employed in the composition of Leviticus and the rest of the Pentateuch, it would have been unique in the literary annals of the ancient Near East. Archaeological discoveries have shown that in actual fact the Hebrews employed much the same literary methods as their neighbors, and that significant areas of Biblical literature are closely related in language and style to contemporary writings.

The historical evidence furnished by the canon of the Samaritan Pentateuch indicates a date for Leviticus much in advance of that suggested by critical scholars. According to II Kings 17:24-28, organized Samaritan worship began in the time of Esarhaddon (c. 681-669 B.C.). Since the Samaritans employed only the Pentateuch as their basis for doctrine and worship, it is reasonable to assume that it was in its final form by about the eighth century B.C. Archaeological discoveries in the Dead Sea caves uncovered a fragment of Leviticus written in the Phoenician script current in the seventh century B.C. If this is a genuine product of that period it alone will compel careful reexamination of the entire Wellhausen theory. Other fragments of Leviticus dated c. 100 B.C. were also found in the caves, and appeared to have come from a Samaritan manuscript.

Analysis: The first seven chapters of Leviticus give the detailed sacrificial procedures showing how the various kinds of burnt offerings, the meal offering, the sin and guilt offerings and other sacrifices avail for the removal of sin and defilement under the covenant. A subsequent liturgical section (8:1-10:20) described the consecration of Aaron and the priesthood, being followed by the designation of clean and unclean beasts and certain rules of hygiene (11:1-15:33) The ritual of the Day of Atonement occurs in Chapter 16, followed by a section (17:1-20:27) treating of sacrificial blood, ethical laws and penalties for transgressors. The theme of 21:1-24:23 is priestly holiness and the consecration of seasons, while the following chapter deals with the legislation surrounding the sabbatical and jubilee years. A concluding chapter outlines promises and threats (26: 1-46), while an appendix (27:1-34) treats of vows. Man as sinner, substitutionary atonement and divine holiness are prominent throughout Leviticus. R.K.H.

LEVY (lĕv'ē, Heb. mas, tribute), a tax or tribute to be rendered in service. It is used of the 30,000 free Israelites conscripted by Solomon for four months service a year in Lebanon (I Kings 5:13-14); also of the tribute labor imposed upon the surviving Canaanites (I Kings 9:21).

LIBATION, the pouring out of liquids, such as wine, water, oil, etc, but generally wine, as an offering to a deity. Libations were common among the heathen nations (Deut. 32:38). Drink-offerings accompanied many OT sacrifices (Exod. 29:40-41; Lev. 23:13,18,37; Num. 15:4-10,24; 28:7-10). In Timothy 4:6, Philippians 2:17 Paul pictures his death as a drink-offering.

LIBERTINES (Gr. Libertínoi), probably originally captive Jews brought to Rome by Pompey in 63 B.C., (Suet. Tib. 36; Tac. Ann. 2.85; Philo. Leg. ad Gai. 23) liberated subsequently, and repatriated to Palestine, where, presumably they built a synagogue still occupied by their descendants a century after Pompey's Palestinian campaign (Acts 6:9). These people would be Roman citizens. There seems to be some evidence for a synagogue of Libertines at Pompeii. There is no substance in the conjectural alternative explanation that the Libertines were natives of "Libertum" near Carthage. The place is unknown to history or geography. The explanation adopted goes back to Chrysostom.

LIBERTY, freedom, the opposite of servitude or bondage, whether physical, moral, or spiritual. The term is used of slaves or captives being set free from physical servitude or imprisonment (Lev. 25:10; Jer. 34:8,15-17; Acts 26:23; Heb. 13:23), or the granting of certain privileges while in imprisonment (Acts 24:23; 27:3). In Ezekiel 46:17 reference is made to "the year of liberty," the year of jubilee. The term has a legal and moral tone in I Corinthians 7:39 in asserting the right of a widow to remarry. The special concern of Christianity is the spiritual liberty of believers in Christ. Found in union with Christ, it carries with it freedom from the ceremonial law (Gal. 5:1; 2:4) and must be valued and guarded. The essence of Christian liberty lies not in external freedom but in deliverance from the bondage of sin and its consequent inner corruption (John 8:34-36; Rom. 6:20-22).

Spiritual liberty is the result of the Spirit's regenerating work, for His presence and work within produces liberty (II Cor. 3:17), giving a sense of freedom through a filial relation with God (Rom. 8:15-16). Godly men of the OT knew a measure of this spiritual liberty (Psa. 119:45), but the Gospel reveals and offers it in its fulness. Using the picture of Isaiah 61:1, Christ proclaimed this liberty to be the goal of His mission (Luke 4:18). Intimately related to practical holiness of life (Rom. 6:18-22), spiritual liberty never condones license. Believers are warned against abuse of this liberty in sinful indulgence (Gal. 5:13; I Pet. 2:16; II Pet. 2:19), and speech and conduct are to be judged by "the law of liberty" (James 2:12) which has taken the place of the ancient law. In regard to things not expressly commanded or forbidden, Christian liberty must be granted, allowing for the exercise of individual judgment and Christian conscience before God (I Cor. 10:29-31); but its use must be limited by considerations of love, expediency, and self-preservation, lest that liberty become a stumbling block to the weak (I Cor. 8:9). In Romans 8:21 "liberty" points to creation's future deliverance from decay and imperfection when God's children are glorified. D.E.H.

LIBNAH (lĭb'nà, Heb. livnâh, whiteness). 1. A desert camp of Israel, the fifth station after leaving Sinai (Num. 33:20-21). Perhaps the same as Laban (Deut. 1:1); its location is unknown.

2. A Canaanite city, near Lachish, captured by Joshua (Josh. 10:29-32; 12:15) and named at the head of a group of nine cities in the lowland (15:42-44). It was designated a Levitical city in Judah (Josh. 21:13; I Chron. 6:57). Simultaneously with Edom it revolted from Jehoram (II Kings 8:22; II Chron. 21:10). As a strong fortified center it sustained the seige of Sennacherib for some time (II Kings 19:8; Isa. 37:8). It was the native city of Hamutal, the wife of King Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (II Kings 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1). Archaeology has identified it with modern Tell es Safi, at the head of the valley of Elah.

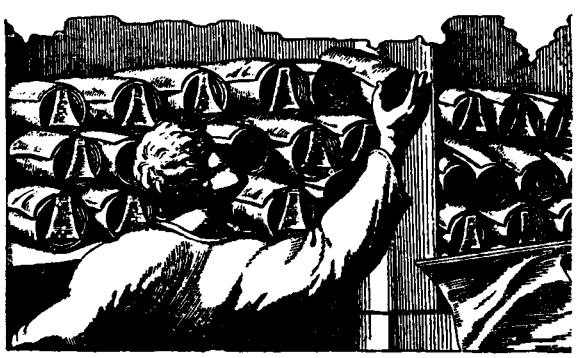
LIBNI (lĭb'nī, Heb. livnî, white). 1. The first-named of the two sons of Gershon, the son of Levi (Exod. 6:17; Num. 3:17; I Chron. 6:17,20). He is also called Laadan or Ladan (I Chron. 23:7; 26:21).

2. A Levite, son of Mahli, son of Merari (I Chron. 6:29).

LIBNITES (lĭb'nītes), the descendants of Libni, the son of Gershon (Num. 3:21; 26:58).

LIBRARIES. Polycrates of Samos, and Pisistratus of Athens are the first recorded owners of libraries. Euripides owned books, and Socrates, according to Plato, had access to collections (Plato, Apol. 26d; Philod. 97b.98b). Strabo states that Aristotle collected books, and taught the kings of Egypt to build libraries. The setting up of the great library of Alexandria by the first two Ptolemies (367 to 283, 308 to 246 B.C.) was a major event in the history of literature. On a conservative estimate, it contained half a million volumes, and under its scholarly librarians founded library methodology, and became a center of Hellenistic learning. The great library of Pergamum in Asia Minor, founded by Eumenes II in the early second century before Christ, was probably half the size of the Alexandrian library, and not nearly so influential. Lucullus is the first recorded Roman to possess a library (Plat. Luc. 42). Atticus, the friend and correspondent of Cicero, and Cicero himself, had considerable collections of books. Caesar commissioned the scholar Varro to collect a library for him (Suet. Iul. 44). The statesman C. Asinius Pollio founded the first public library at Rome (Plin. H.N. 7.30; 35.2), and Augustus established two, notably one on the Palatine attached to the temple of Apollo. Greek and Latin collections in both of these imperial foundations appear to have been kept separate, and a hall or reading room without a rule of silence seems to have been a feature (Gell. 13.19). Eventually, with further foundations by the Flavian emperors, Roman libraries totaled 26. Seneca regarded a library as essential as a bathroom. An Epicurean's library was found at Herculaneum (in the 'Villa of the Papyri,' excavated two centuries ago). Paul appears to have prized a small collection of good books (II Tim. 4:13). E.M.B.

A scroll library of Bible times. Each scroll has a papyrus ticket at the end to indicate title. JHK



LIBYA (lĭb'ĭ-à), the ancient Greek name for northern Africa W of Egypt. The Heb. is Put (Ezek. 30:5; 38:5; Jer. 46:9; Dan. 11:43), and so rendered in ASV, except Daniel 11:43. It was the country of the Lubim, descendants of Ham (Gen. 10:13). Cyrene was one of its cities (Acts 2:10).

LICE (See Insects)

LIEUTENANTS (Aram. ăhashdarpenîm), the official title of satraps or viceroys governing large provinces of the Persian empire as representatives of the sovereign. KJV has "lieutenants" in Ezra 8:36; Esther 3:12; 8:9; 9:3 and "princes" in Daniel 3:2,3,27; 6:1-7; "satraps" in ASV.

LIFE, a complex concept with varied shades of meaning, rendering several Heb. and Gr. terms. It may denote physical or natural life, whether animal (Gen. 1:20; 6:17; Rev. 8:9) or human (Lev. 17:14; Matt. 2:20; Luke 12:22, etc). It is the vital principle, or breath of life, which God imparted to man, making him a living soul (Gen. 2:7). This life is a precious gift and the taking of life is prohibited (Gen. 9:5; Exod. 20:13; Lev. 24:17). It is propagated through physical generation and is subject to physical death. It may signify the period of one's earthly existence, one's lifetime (Gen. 23:1; 25:7; Luke 16:25, etc), or the relations, activities, and experiences which make up life (Exod. 1:14; Deut. 32:47; Job 10:1; Luke 12:15). Occasionally it means one's manner of life (I Tim. 2:2; I John 2:16) or the means for sustaining life (Deut. 24:6; I John 3:17). But the primary concern of the Scriptures is spiritual or eternal life for man. It is the gift of God, mediated through faith in Jesus Christ (John 3:36; 5:24; Rom. 5:10; 6:23; I John 5:12; etc). It is not synonymous with endless existence, which is also true of the unsaved. It is qualitative, involving the impartation of a new nature (II Pet. 1:3-4). It is communicated to the believer in this life, resulting in fellowship with God in Christ, and is not interrupted by physical death (I Thess. 5:10). It will find its perfection and full reality of blessedness with God in the life to come (Rom. 2:7; II Cor. 5:4). As "the living God" (Deut. 5:26; Psa. 42:2; I Thess. 1:9; I Tim. 3:15), the eternal and self-existent One, God has absolute life in Himself (John 5:26) and is the source of all life (Ps. 36:9; John 1:4; 17:3; I John 1:1-2; 5:20). D.E.H.

LIFE, THE BOOK OF, a figurative expression denoting God's record of those who inherit eternal life (Phil 4:3; Rev. 3:5; 21:27). From man's point of view individuals may be blotted out (Ps. 69:28; Matt. 25:29), but from God's point of view it contains only the names of the elect which will not be blotted out (Rev. 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 20:15).

LIGHT (Heb. 'ôr, Gr. phós, and a number of other words), denotes natural light; also used figuratively. Scripture pictures the coming into existence of natural light through the sublime command of God ("let there be light" Gen. 1:3) as the initial step in the preparation of the world for vegetable and animal life. The origin and nature of light find their explanation in the nature and purpose of God Himself (I John 1:5). The possession of light is one of the most remarkable and valuable blessings of this earthly sphere, without which life as we know it could not exist. Scientific studies of the nature, properties, and effects of light have only enhanced its wonders. Its crucial importance for life early led to the worship of the sun, the great source of the world's light and heat (Job. 31:26-27), an idolatry condemned by Scripture (Lev. 26:30; Isa. 17:8 ASV).

Mention is also made of artificial lights as temporary substitutes for natural light, as the candlestick in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:6; Lev. 24:2) or lamps in the home (Matt. 5:15; Luke 15:8) or in church (Acts 20:8). Scripture mentions several instances of miraculous light: the light in the dwellings of the Israelites while the Egyptians were in thick darkness (Exod. 10:23); the pillar of fire which led the Israelites "all the night with a light of fire" (Ps. 78:14; Exod. 13:21; 14:20); the glistening brightness of Christ's garments at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:2); the light brighter than the noonday sun appearing to Saul on the road (Acts 9:3; 22:6; 26:13). Scripture uses light to portray figuratively various spiritual realities. Thus "God is light" (I John 1:5), "the Father of lights" (James 1:17), "dwelling in the light unapproachable" (I Tim. 6:16 ASV; Ps. 104:2). Jesus called Himself "the light of the world" (John 8:12; 9:5; 12:46). Zecharias and Simeon sang of His birth as the coming light (Luke 1:78-79; 2:32). In revealing God to men and giving spiritual light He is "the light of men" (John 1:4,9). Light is thus the appropriate symbol of spiritual illumination wrought by Christ through the indwelling Spirit (II Cor. 4:6; Eph. 5:14; I Peter 2:9; Ps. 36:9).

Since darkness is the symbol of sin, by contrast light is the figure of holiness and purity (Isa. 5:20; Rom. 13:12; I John 1:6-7; 2:9-11). It is also a general figure for that which tends to cheer or renders prosperous (Esth. 8:16; Job 30:26), hence especially of spiritual joy (Ps. 27:1; 97:11). The Word of God is symbolized as light (Ps. 119:105; Isa. 8:20). The figure is also applied to believers generally (Matt. 5:14; Eph. 5:8; Phil. 2:15), or to individuals, like John the Baptist (John 5:35). Finally, the figure is applied to the bliss of the heavenly state (Isa. 60:19; Col. 1:12; Rev. 21:23-24; 22:5). D.E.H.

LIGHTNING (Heb. bārāq, Gr. astrapé), a visible electric discharge between rain clouds or between a rain cloud and the earth, producing a thunderclap. In Palestine and Syria lightning is common during the heavy fall and spring rains. The lightning is generally accompanied by heavy rain, and at times by hail (Exod. 9:23-24). The Scriptures mention lightning as a manifestation of God's power, symbolizing His command of the forces of nature (Job 28:26; 38:35; Ps. 135:7; Zech. 10:1); lightnings are His instruments in bringing about the destruction of His opponents (Ps. 18:14; 144:6; Zech. 9:14-15). Lightning is used as a symbol of speed (Ezek. 1:14; Nah. 2:4; Zech. 9:14) and of dazzling brightness (Dan. 10:6; Matt. 28:3). In Matthew 24:27, Luke 17:24 Jesus uses the figure of lightning to indicate the unmistakable certainty of the fact that He will come again. In Luke 10:18 Jesus speaks of beholding Satan fallen as lightning, symbolic of a definite and terrific defeat.

LINE, the rendering in KJV of six different Heb. words and one Gr. word. Usually the meaning is a measuring line (II Sam. 8:2; Ps. 78:55; Isa. 34:17; Jer. 31:39; Ezek. 47:3; Zech. 1:16; 2:1), or a cord or thread (Josh. 2:18,21; Ezek. 40:3). In Isaiah 44:13 it means either "pencil" (ASV) or a cutting instrument. In Psalm 16:6 it means "portion" as fixed by measurement; in 19:4 it signifies the sound made by a musical chord (cf. Rom. 10: 18). In Isaiah 28:10 "line upon line," etc. is the drunkard's sneer at the childishness of Isaiah's ceaseless chidings. In II Corinthians 10:16 "line" means a "province" or sphere worked by another.

LINEN, thread or cloth, prepared from the fiber of flax. The use of flax fiber for cloth and other purposes is very ancient, being traceable as far back as the Stone Age. Flax was cultivated in Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Egypt, and linen was well known in the ancient Biblical world. Ancient Egypt was noted for its fine linen and carried on a thriving export with neighboring nations. Flax was being cultivated in the tropical climate around Jericho at the time of the conquest (Josh. 2:6). Having learned the art in Egypt (Exod. 35:25), Hebrew women practiced the spinning and weaving of flax (Prov. 31:13,19). The house of Ashbea attained eminence as workers in linen (I Chron. 4: 21).

Linen is the rendering for several different Heb. and Gr. words. The Heb. pīshteh denotes the flax plant (Josh. 2:6; Judg. 15:14; Prov. 31:13; Isa. 19:9) or the material made from it (Lev. 13:47; Deut. 22:11; Jer. 13:1; Ezek. 44:17; etc.), as opposed to woolen material. Shaatnēz is used twice to signify a garment made of two sorts of thread, linen and woolen, which the Israelites were forbidden to wear (Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:11). The term badh, used 23 times (Exod. 28:42; Lev. 6:10; I Sam. 2:18; Ezek. 9:2; etc.), means "linen cloth," with the subordinate ideas of white and fine. Shēsh, like the later term bûts, means "fine linen," the epithet "fine" being coupled with it by the translators to denote the finer quality of the linen. Shēsh is rendered "fine linen" 37 times and "silk" once (Prov. 31:22 KJV). Since its meaning is "whiteness" it may have included other materials besides linen. It is the equivalent of the Gr. bússos, "fine linen." The Heb. sādhîn denotes a wider undergarment of linen worn next to the body (Prov. 31:24; Isa. 3:23; "sheet" in Judg. 14:12,13 KJV) and is synonymous with the Gr. sindón, the term for the linen sheet in which the body of Jesus was wrapped (Matt. 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53). In Mark 14:51f it is apparently simply a sheet which the young man had wrapped around his body. In John 19:40; 20:5ff; Luke 24:12 "linen clothes" is othónion (in pl.), linen bands, linen cloth torn into strips. In Revelation 15:6 KJV and ASV marg. the word is línon, a linen garment.

The Biblical references show varied uses of linen. For clothing it was preferred to cotton material in warm climates because of the sensation of coolness given by linen garments. Its use is frequently mentioned in connection with the garments of the Aaronic priests (Exod. 28:42; Lev. 6:10; I Sam. 22:18; etc.), their tunics, breeches, and headdress being exclusively of linen, and the girdle largely of it (Exod. 28:39; 39:27-29). It was also preferred by others for dress in religious services, as the child Samuel (I Sam. 2:18), the Levitical singers in the temple (II Chron. 5:12), and even royal personages (II Sam. 6:14; I Chron. 15:27). Angels are described as dressed in it (Ezek. 9:2; 10:2; Dan. 10:5; 12:6), as also the host of the redeemed returning with Christ from heaven (Rev. 19:14). In Revelation 19:8 linen is used figuratively of the moral purity of the saints. Linen was also used for garments of distinction (Gen. 41:42; Esth. 8:15). Apparently linen garments of a coarser material were worn by men (Judg. 14:12f) and women (Prov. 31:22). But the use of fine linen for ordinary purposes was apparently a sign of luxury and extravagance (Isa. 3:23; Ezek. 16:10; Luke 16:19; Rev. 18:12,16). Linen was also used for nets (Isa. 19:9), measuring lines (Ezek. 40:3), girdles (Jer. 13:1), and for fine hangings (Esth. 1:6). In NT times at least, linen was extensively used by the Jews for burial shrouds, as at the burial of Jesus (Matt. 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53; John 19: 40; 20:5ff). Egyptian mummies were wrapped exclusively in linen sheets of vast proportions.

LINTEL (Heb. mashqôph, overhanging), the horizontal beam, of stone or wood, forming the upper part of a doorway (Exod. 12:22,23, vs. 7 "the upper door post" "lintel" ASV), to be marked by the blood of the paschal lamb at the first Passover. See also I Kings 6:31 (Heb. 'ayīl, "post or column"); Amos 9:1; Zephaniah 2:14 (kaphtōr, "capital of a column"; "capitals" in ASV).

LINUS (lī'nŭs), a Christian in Rome joining Paul in sending salutations to Timothy in II Timothy 4:21. According to Irenaeus (III.3.3)and Eusebius (H.E. III.2), he became the first bishop of Rome.

LION (See Animals)

LITTER, a portable couch or sedan, a palanquin, borne by men or animals. The word is used only in Isaiah 66:20, but in a compound form is rendered "covered wagons" in Numbers 7:3.

LITTLE OWL (See Birds)

LIVER (Heb. kāvēdh, heavy), the heaviest of the viscera, both in weight and importance, mentioned 14 times in the OT. Usually the reference is to the bodily organ in connection with sacrificial instructions (Exod. 29:13,22; Lev. 3:4,10,15; 4:9; 7:4; etc.). Its use for purposes of divination was common among heathen nations (Ezek. 21:21), but the practice is not verified among the Jews. Being closely identified with the source and center of life, it is mentioned in depicting profound sorrow (Lam. 2:11), and its injury was equivalent to death (Prov. 7:22-23).

LIVING CREATURES, mentioned in Ezekiel 1:5-22; 3:13; 10:15-20 and Revelation 4:6-9 (KJV "beasts") and apparently identical with the cherubim. In the creation account "living creature" designates aquatic animals (Gen. 1:21), mammals (1:24), or any animal (2:19).

LIZARD (See Animals)

LO-AMMI (lō-ăm'ī, Heb. lō'-'ammî, not my people), the symbolic name given to Hosea's third child; it is transliterated "Lo-ammi" in Hosea 1: 9:a, but translated "not my people' 'in Hosea 1:9b, 10; 2:23. Originally applied to express the rejection of the Northern Kingdom in contrast to the election of Judah (Hos. 1:6f), the name prophetically and paradoxically (Hos. 1:11; 2:23) becomes the designation of the rejected Gentiles now, during Israel's present blindness (Rom. 11:25f), incorporated into the true Israel of God (Rom. 9:24-26; cf. Deut. 32:21; Isa. 65:1; Rom. 2:28f; 9:6ff; 10: 19f; I Pet. 2:9f).

LOCK, LOCKS. 1. A mechanical device for fastening a city gate or a door. The primitive locks used to fasten city gates consisted simply of heavy beams of wood, the ends of which were dropped into slots cut into the masonry of the gate (Neh. 3:3-15; ASV "the bolts and bars"; cf. Deut. 3:5; I Sam. 23:7; etc.). Used figuratively, their strengthening spoke of divine protection (Ps. 147:13), their burning of a country's invasion (Jer. 51:30; Nah. 3:13). To strengthen them, iron bars were used (I Kings 4: 13; Isa. 45:2). When used to lock house doors (Judg. 3:23,24) they were reduced in size and became flat bolts. Usually several sliding pins dropped into corresponding holes in the bar, requiring a key to release them. Keys varied in size, often being large enough to be carried on the shoulder (Isa. 22:22). To open the door from without, the key was inserted through a hole in the door; the hole might be big enough to admit the hand with the key (S. of Sol. 5:5). Fear of the Jews caused the disciples to lock the door (John 20:19, 26).

2. In reference to the hair of the head, "locks" renders several different Heb. words. In Numbers 6:5 the term indicates the unshorn and disheveled locks of the Nazarite; in Judges 16:13,19 the braided locks of the Nazarite Samson; in Ezekiel 8:3 a forelock of the prophet's hair; in Song of Solomon 5:2,11 the luxuriant locks of the Hebrew youth. In Song of Solomon 4:1; 6:7; Isaiah 47:2 "locks" is better rendered "veil" as in ASV.

LOCUST (See Insects)

LOD (lŏd, Heb. lôdh), a town built by Shemed, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:12); located in the shephelah or low hills in SW Palestine. This is the Lydda of the NT.

LO-DEBAR (lō'dē'bär, Heb. lô dhevār, probably without pasture), a town in Gilead E of the Jordan, where Mephibosheth, Saul's grandson, lived in the house of Machir until summoned by David to eat at his table (II Sam. 9:1-13). Machir also supplied David's needs when David fled from Absalom to E Jordan (II Sam. 17:27ff). The town is otherwise unknown.

LODGE, a temporary shelter erected in a garden for a watchman guarding the ripening fruit (Isa. 1:8); it is of a more temporary nature than a watchtower. In relation to travelers, "a lodging" is a temporary place of sojourn for strangers (Acts 28:23; Philem. 22).

LOFT, the upper chamber or story of a building, used in KJV in I Kings 17:19 and Acts 20:9.

LOGIA, the Greek word for "sententious sayings" or "epigrams," employed in reference to the non-Biblical sayings of Christ, the latest collection of which is the so-called Gospel of Thomas discovered in 1945, and first made public in 1959. The Church has always been aware of sayings of Christ not included in the Gospels. Paul speaks of "the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20:35). The Moslems have retained some such sayings. An ode of the poet Nizami tells the story of the dead dog in the market place in whom none could find aught but horror and ugliness. "Pearls," said One standing hardby, "cannot rival the whiteness of his teeth." A mosque near Agra contains another Moslem memory of Christ. Among the arabesques is woven the logion: "Jesus, on whom be peace, said, The world is merely a bridge; ye are to pass over it, and not build your dwellings upon it." This saying may descend from Thomas, who, according to tradition, carried the Gospel to India. Its imagery may be based on the causeway of Tyre. The Codex Bezae inserts a logion after Verse 5 of Luke 6: "On the same day, seeing someone working on the sabbath, He said to him, Man, if you know what you are doing, blessed you are. If you do not know, you are accursed, and a transgressor of the law." Luke speaks of "many who have taken in hand to draw up a narrative," and tradition has it that Matthew, before he wrote his Gospel, made a collection of sayings of Christ. Many such collections were probably current, of which the Gospel of Thomas is one. De Joinville, the medieval French crusader and historian, tells of another. In his account of the Third Crusade, De Joinville tells of the visit of a monk on an embassy to the Lebanese sheik, "the Old Man of the Mountain." The monk reported that his host had a book called The Words of the Lord unto Peter. This was in A.D. 1248. In the closing years of the 19th century a sheet of such sayings was discovered among the papyri. It included two new and now well-known logia: "Thou hearest with one ear but the other thou hast closed"; "Whenever there are two they are not without God, and if one be alone anywhere I say that I am with him. Raise the stone, there thou shalt find me. Cleave the wood, and there I am." A second sheet was discovered in 1904. It contained the logion reminiscent of a saying of Plato: "Let him who seeks cease not till he finds, and when he finds he shall be astonished. Astonished he shall reach the Kingdom, and having reached the Kingdom he shall rest." See AGRAPHA.

E.M.B.

LOGOS (Gr. lógos), a philosophical and theological term and concept that goes back to the Ionian philosopher Heraclitus (c. 500 B.C.), with whom it expressed the universal reason permeating the world, and finding self-consciousness in the mind of the philosophers. Stoicism adopted the term for a dynamic principle of reason operating in the world, and forming a medium of communion between God and man. The latter function becomes prominent in Philo, with whom the Logos is at once the Stoics' active, intelligent, world-principle, the thought in the divine mind, which was identical with the sum-total of Plato's "Forms" or "Ideas," and a mediator between God and the matter of His creation. For Philo, as indeed for his predecessors, the Logos is neither personal nor impersonal. It was vaguely equated with God's utterance (Gen. 1:3; Ps. 33:9), His "word" in such passages as Psalms 107:20; 147:15,18, and such expressions as "the angel of the covenant," and with "wisdom" in such personifications as those of Proverbs 8 and Wisdom of Solomon 9:15ff. It is possible that the Qumran community fused the same Hebrew and Hellenistic concepts into their doctrine of the spirit of truth, which, like the spirit of error, was a creature of God. The relevant passages in the "Rule of the Community" document do not admit of dogmatism.

In the New Testament the Logos appears principally in Johannine contexts (John 1:1ff; I John 1:1; Rev. 19:13), though Pauline references and the Epistle to the Hebrews might be added. Logos is imperfectly rendered by "Word," and it is not easy to apprehend the full content of the idea in its Judaeo-Hellenistic context. There can be no doubt that both John and Paul saw value in expressing Christian thought in the terminology of the day, a point appreciated by the early Church Fathers in their sometimes perilous development of the Logos doctrine. Significantly enough, John wrote his prologues at the end of the first century when the first signs of Gnostic error were discernible. In John's use of "Logos" we must certainly see that blending of Judaic and Hellenistic concepts which appeared in Philo's use of the term. From its Greek ancestry, etymological and philosophical, the Johannine word would contain the notion of reason, but also the active expression of reason on a divine and perfect plane. Hence the conception of the visible universe as an expression of God's reason, that reason being the force and agency of creation, the Word which said: "Let there be . . ." But John becomes entirely original and creative when he boldly equates this reason with God Himself, and simultaneously sees its incarnation in Christ. It seems likely that John, in this bold thought, brought to firmer expression in the terminology of Hellenistic thought a concept already expressed in Hebrews 1:2,3 and in I Corinthians 8:6; Colossians 1:15-17. In view of the Colossian heresy of angelic mediatorship the last context is significant.

E.M.B.

LOIN, the part of the body between the ribs and the hip bones. It is the place where the girdle was worn (Exod. 12:11; II Kings 1:8; Jer. 13:1; Matt. 3:4; etc.), and the sword was fastened (II Sam. 20:8). Pain and terror were reflected in weakness and shaking of the loins (Ps. 38:7; 66:11; 69:23; Jer. 30:6). Girding the loins with sackcloth was the sign of mourning (I Kings 20:32; Isa. 32:11; Jer. 48:37). As the place of the reproductive organs the loins are euphemistically named for the generative function (Gen. 35:11; I Kings 8:19; Acts 2:30; Heb. 7:5). Since Oriental garments were worn ungirded about the house, to gird up the loins signified preparation for vigorous action (Exod. 12:11; I Kings 18:46; Job 38:3; Prov. 31:17; Luke 12:35; I Pet. 1:13). To have the loins girded with truth signified strength in attachment to truth (Eph. 6:14; Isa. 11:5).

LOIS (lō'ĭs, Gr. Loís), the maternal grandmother of Timothy. Commended by Paul for her faith (II Tim. 1:5), she apparently was associated with Eunice in the religious training of Timothy.

LORD, the rendering in the KJV for a variety of Heb. and Gr. terms. It is applied to both men and God and expresses varied degrees of honor, dignity, and majesty. In the Aramaic portion of Daniel (2:4-7:28) three words are rendered "lord": rab (2:10), a chief, leader, or captain; rabrevān, magnate or prince, of certain Babylonian nobles (4:36; 5:1,9,10,23; 6:17); mārē', an exalted one, of the king (4:19,24) and of God (2:47; 5:23). Seren, used only in Joshua, Judges, I Samuel, and I Chronicles, always designates "the lords of the Philistines." Sar (Ezra 8:25), a title of nobility, means a prince, while shālīsh (II Kings 7:2,17,19) indicates an officer of the third rank (ASV "captain"). The familiar term Baal (Heb. ba'al, master or owner) is applied to heathen deities or to a man as husband; in Isaiah 16:8 "the lords of the heathen" denotes heathen princes invading Moab. The Heb. 'ādhōnay, frequently rendered "lord" or "master," may be a term of respect (Gen. 23:11; 24:18), but its meaning of owner indicates one having absolute control, as an owner of slaves, or a king. As applied to God it denotes the owner and governor of the whole earth (Ps. 97:5; 114:7; Isa. 1:24). The term 'adōnai, perhaps the pl. of 'ādhôn, "the Lord," is always used where God is submissively and reverently addressed (Exod. 4:10; Josh. 7:8; Neh. 1:11; etc.). In the KJV 'ādhōnay is printed as LORD while LORD in capitals represents Jehovah (Heb. YAHWEH, the self-existent One), the supreme name of God alone, which the Jews, due to their interpretation of Leviticus 24:16, avoided pronouncing and read 'ādhōnay instead. In the ASV it is rendered "Jehovah," which the KJV has only in Exodus 6:3; Psalm 83:18; Isaiah 12:2; 26:4. Of the four Gr. terms rendered "lord," megistánes is used in Mark 6:21 and means (pl.) "great men, courtiers." Rabboni, "my Lord" (heightened form of Heb. rab), occurs in Mark 10:51 KJV and John 20:16 (transliterated). Despótes, implying absolute ownership or power, is rendered "Lord" in Luke 2:29; Acts 4:24; II Peter 2:1; Jude 4; Revelation 6:10. The prevailing Gr. term rendered "lord" is kurios, master or owner, one who has power or authority over some property (Matt. 20:8; Luke 10:2), animals (Luke 19:34), or persons (Matt. 13:27). It may be used as a term of respect (Matt. 21:30; John 4:15; 12:21). It is frequently used of God (Matt. 1:22; Mark 5:19; Acts 7:33; etc.) as well as of Jesus as Messiah who by His resurrection and ascension was exalted to lordship (Acts 2:36; Phil. 2:9-11; Rom. 1:4; 14:8). At times it is difficult to determine whether by "the Lord" the Father or the Son is meant (Acts 1:24; 9:31; 16:14; Rom. 14:11; I Cor. 4:19; II Thess. 3:16; etc.). D.E.H.

LORD'S DAY, the day especially associated with the Lord Jesus Christ. The expression occurs in the NT only in Revelation 1:10. The adj. kyriakós, translated "the Lord's," is a possessive and means "belonging to the Lord" — to Christ. It denotes a day consecrated to the Lord. Cf. the parallel expression "the Lord's Supper" (I Cor. 11:20). Some would equate it with the OT prophetic "day of the Lord," but clearly John is dating his vision and is not yet speaking of that prophetic day. The form of his expression marks a distinction between the prophetic "day of the Lord" (I Cor. 5:5; II Cor. 1:14; I Thess. 5:2) and the first day of the week on which Christ arose. It was the resurrection victory on that day which marked it as distinct and sacred to the Christian Church. The Gospel emphasis upon "the first day of the week" as the day of resurrection stresses its distinctiveness. On that day the risen Christ repeatedly appeared to His disciples (Luke 24:13-49; John 20:1-25), and again a week later (John 20:26). The Pentecostal outpouring apparently also came on that day. Acts 20:7 and I Corinthians 16:1-2 show that the early Church consecrated the day to worship and almsgiving (but not to earning). Sunday (the name is of pagan origin) as the day of special worship is a Christian institution and must be sharply distinguished from the sabbath. Nor were the OT sabbath regulations transferred to the Lord's Day as a "Christian sabbath." The sabbath related to the old creation (Exod. 20:8-11; 31:12-17; Heb. 4:4), while the Lord's Day commemorates the new creation in Christ Jesus. No "sabbath" observance was stipulated in the demands upon Gentile Christians in Acts 15:28-29. Some Jewish Christians continued to observe the sabbath and Jewish festivals, while some members of the primitive Church made no distinction between days (Rom. 14:5-6), but it was held to be a matter of liberty (Rom. 14:1), as long as the observance of a special day was not regarded as necessary for salvation (Gal. 4:10; Col. 2:16-17). D.E.H.

LORD'S PRAYER, THE, properly "the Disciples' Prayer," since not prayed with but taught to them by Jesus (Matt. 6:9-13; Luke 11:2-4). In Luke, Jesus, at the request of a disciple, gives a modified form of His earlier spontaneous presentation in the Sermon on the Mount. The earlier form is fuller and is commonly used. As a pattern prayer it is unsurpassed for conciseness and fullness, delineating the proper approach and order in prayer. It directs the disciples, as members of God's family, reverently to pray to a personal Heavenly Father. The petitions are divided into two parts, the first three relating to God's interests. They are arranged in a descending scale, from Himself, through the manifestation of Himself in His kingdom (the coming Messianic kingdom), to the complete doing of His will by His subjects. Placing God's interest first, the disciple can pray for his own needs. The petitions, whether counted as three or four, are arranged in an ascending scale — from the supply of daily material needs to the ultimate deliverance from all evil. The doxology in Matthew, which constitues an affirmation of faith, is lacking in the leading MSS and is generally regarded as a scribal addition derived from ancient liturgical usage. D.E.H.

LORD'S SUPPER. The meaning of the Lord's Supper may be gained by viewing its origin and theological significance.

Its historical significance arises out of the context of its institution by Christ on the night of His betrayal, when, celebrating the Passover with His disciples "as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave to the disciples and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins" (Matt. 26:26-28; Mark 14:22-24; Luke 22:19-20).

Its theological significance arises out of the interpretation placed on it by the apostle Paul who wrote, "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? For we being many are one bread and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread" (I Cor. 10:16-17 and I Cor. 11:23-28). Both the historical and theological significance constitute it as the basis of fellowship by which the assembled church commemorates the death and ressurrection of Christ as its source of spiritual life.

The table of the Lord is known in Scripture by many names, each of which is descriptive of an aspect of its nature. It is called the body and blood of Christ (Matt. 24:26,28); the communion of the body and blood of Christ (I Cor. 10:16); the bread and cup of the Lord (I Cor. 11:27); the breaking of bread (Acts 2:42 and 20:7) and as the Lord's Supper (I Cor. 11:20).

The meaning of the ordinance is suggested by these usages, as: the Eucharist (meaning "to give thanks"); the communion; a memorial feast in commemoration of Jesus' death; a sacrifice of praise; and the presence of Christ.

The Nature of the Lord's Supper. The nature of the Lord's Supper is delineated by two interpretations: the meaning of the "body" and "blood" of Christ; and, by the significance of its observance in the life of the believer.

Three major interpretations have been placed upon the meaning of Christ's reference to his body and blood: the Romanist doctrine of transubstantiation; the Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation; and the Reformed doctrine of symbolic commemoration.

Romanists assert that the elements used in the ordinance are literally transubstantiated as the actual body and blood of Christ at each observance, and that as such, they constitute a true sacrifice as an offering for the sins of man. Since the elements have become the actual body and blood, they are said to have intrinsic sacramental value for all who partake, with immediate consequences of grace and merit.

The Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation denies that the elements change, but asserts that the literal presence of Christ is present in, under, and with the elements so that Christ may be received sacramentally by those who observe the ordinance.

The doctrine of symbolic commemoration, advanced by Calvin, asserts that the term body and blood are not to be taken literally, but only symbolically, and that the observance of the ordinance is a commemoration of the death of Christ in which Christ is spiritually present. The Lord's Supper is, therefore, a perpetual memorial and seal of the covenanted grace of God, to be observed as a means of consecration and renewal of obedience to the will of God.

The significance of its observance in the life of the believer is, therefore, conditioned by the interpretations just mentioned. The doctrine of symbolic commemoration, held by most non-Lutheran Protestants since the Reformation, avows that its nature is twofold: in its symbolism; and, as a memorial feast.

The symbolism arises out of its application to the Christian life. It symbolizes the death of Christ for our sins, and our death to sin in Christ (I Cor. 11:26 and Rom. 6:1-13); the extension of Christ's death as the means of our righteousness (I Cor. 5:7); our participation in the death of Christ (I Cor. 10:16); the union between ourselves and Christ through his death (Rom. 6:4); and our expectant hope in Christ until He comes again (I Cor. 11:26).

The elements used suggest the symbolism. Bread, as a symbol of the body of Christ, suggests the staff of life, the very basis of life itself. The breaking of the bread suggests the breaking of Christ's life in redemptive sacrifice. Wine, as a symbol of the blood of Christ, suggests the pressing out of Christ's life, the bruising by divine wrath. Together they symbolize the sacrifice of the very life of Christ.

Its greatest significance, however, lies in its nature as a memorial feast. It is here that the believer interacts inwardly and spiritually with the grace of God displayed in the death of Christ. As he receives the elements, symbolic in their nature, he submits himself again to receive the merits of Christ's death, not as if it needs to be renewed periodically, but as a continual commemoration of the time when God's mercy drew him into grace and imparted Christ's righteousness to him. As a memorial to Christ's death it is a renewal of obedience to Christ's will — an acknowledgement again that his salvation is solely through the broken body and shed blood of Christ.

The Requirements of the Lord's Supper. Two requirements for participating in the Lord's Supper are specified in Scripture: that the communicant be regenerated by grace, and that he be walking a life consistent with commemorating the death of Christ.

Since the Supper symbolizes the inward experience of grace, only such persons as have participated in Christ's meritorious death can memorialize his death. Each communicant is required to examine his faith before participating (I Cor. 11:27-29).

Furthermore, the communicant must be living a life of obedience, refraining from deliberate sin, and intent upon a more intimate fellowship in Christ when he comes to the table, discerning the full meaning of his act in commemorating Christ's death in his life (I Cor. 11:28).

Though it is not specified in Scripture, it is more than probable that the early Church required baptism as a prerequisite, and that it should so be thought of as a qualification today.

The Administration of the Lord's Table. No form of administering the ordinance is specified in Scripture. Early practice by the apostolic Church suggests, however, that it was observed with some regularity and that it was the focal point of the worship of the Church.

The example of Christ constitutes the usual form among non-liturgical churches. Christ took the bread, blessed it, broke it and gave to His disciples. Hence the communicant is to receive the bread and cup and to partake of them. This reception symbolizes the participation in the communion with Christ of death to sin.

As the sharing of the bread and cup by Christ identified them in fellowship with His atoning ministry, so participating in the Lord's table identifies the communicant in fellowship with Christ, and with other believers.

Though there is no saving grace in the ordinance, there are some concomitant relationships existing in it. It depicts the total work of Christ in man's behalf, and captures in one act man's total response to this work. When the believer receives the elements he receives spiritual blessings in proportion to the faith he exercises in Christ. The commemorative aspect of the ordinance lies not in its nature, but within the heart of the believer. It is here that faith must be exercised, and here that the efficacy of the Lord's table lies. LO-RUHAMAH (lō-rōō-hà'mà, Heb. lô'-rūhāmâh, not pitied), the symbolic name given to Hosea's daughter; it is transliterated "Lo-ruhamah" in Hosea 1:6,8, but translated "not have mercy" in Hosea 2:4,23. It would seem to be a lesser description of the people described in Hosea as Lo-ammi. See LO-AMMI.

LOT. 1. A means of deciding an issue or of determining the divine will in a matter. The use of the lot to determine doubtful matters is very old and the practice of casting lots was common among the nations of antiquity: Haman's efforts to determine a lucky day to exterminate the Jews (Esth. 3:7); the detection of guilty Jonah by the pagan mariners (Jonah 1:7); the gambling of the Roman soldiers for the garments of Jesus (Matt. 27:35). See also Joel 3:3; Nahum 3:10; Obadiah 11. Its use among the Jews, generally with religious intent, is mentioned in determining the scapegoat (Lev. 16:8); assigning the land of Palestine among the tribes (Num. 26:55; Josh. 18:10; Acts 13:19); selecting men for an expedition (Judg. 1:1-3; 20:9); detecting a guilty party (Josh. 7:14; I Sam. 14:40-42); selecting the first king (I Sam. 10:20-21); dividing the returned priests into 24 courses (I Chron. 24:3-19); determining the service of the priests in the temple worship (Luke 1:5-9). In none of these instances is there a direct statement of the method or methods used in casting lots (but cf. Prov. 16:33). It was held in religious esteem by the covenant people and its use to determine God's will was usually accompanied by prayer (Judg. 1:1-3; Acts 1:24-26). Many scholars think that Urim and Thummim were used as lots. Only in the choice of a successor to Judas (Acts 1:26) is the use of lots by Christ's followers mentioned. As a distinctly Jewish mode of seeking divine direction its use was appropriate for the occasion. With the coming of the Spirit at Pentecost to take direction of the affairs of the Church its use is never mentioned again.

2. That which is assigned by lot, as a portion, share, or inheritance (Deut. 32:9; Josh. 15:1; Ps. 105:11; 125:3; Isa. 17:14; Acts 8:21; 1:17 ASV marg.). D.E.H.

LOT (lŏt, Heb. lôt, envelope, covering), Haran's son and Abraham's nephew (Gen. 11:31; 12:5). His life may be summarized under the following heads: (1) Departure and dependence. Lot's father died and left him his possessions; Lot now was willing to follow Abraham from Mesopotamia to Canaan, thence to Egypt, and back again to Canaan (Gen. 11:27-32; 12:5,10; 13:1). During this period there was unity and fellowship between the uncle and the nephew. (2) Decision and destiny. Due to a conflict between their herdsmen, Abraham suggested that his nephew choose another place. Lot, prompted by selfishness, chose the country in the environs of Sodom, a city that had already become notorious because of its wickedness (Gen. 13:5-13). This fatal choice determined his subsequent destiny. It was Abraham now who maintained the greater spiritual status (Gen. 13:14-18). (3) Devastation and deportation. Lot, then, in Sodom, was taken captive when Chedorlaomer and his confederates conquered the king of Sodom and his four allies (Gen. 14:1-12). Abraham, the separated and faithful one, pursued the enemies, and recaptured his nephew (Gen. 14:13-16). (4) Depravity and degeneration. Angels then visited Lot in Sodom to hasten his departure from the imminent doom decreed upon the wicked city. Though originally only a sojourner (Gen. 19:9), Lot acted like a citizen; he had imbibed their mores and standards. Look at his willingness to sacrifice his daughters' chastity (Gen. 19:8); his utter ineffectiveness in dealing with his sons-in-law (Gen. 19:14); his hesitation in leaving the doomed city (Gen. 19:15f); his unwillingness to leave the comforts of a city (Gen. 19:17-22). In spite of all these adverse things, Lot was, as the NT so plainly declares, a "righteous man" (II Pet. 2:7f); and, furthermore, his righteous soul was daily vexed with the "lawless deeds" (II Pet. 2:8, ASV) of Sodom's inhabitants. By implication, it seems that the term "godly" is also applied to Lot (II Pet. 2:9). (5) Dénouement and disgrace. Lot, because of fear, left Zoar and dwelt in a cave with his two daughters (Gen. 19:30), his wife already having become, because of unbelief, "a pillar of salt" (Gen. 19:17,26; Luke 17:29). In this cave one of the most unseemly scenes recorded in the Bible took place (Gen. 19:31-38). Made drunk by his daughters, Lot became the unwilling father of their sons, Moab and Ben-ammi, the progenitors of the Moabites and the Ammonites (Deut. 2:9,19; Ps. 83:8). Entirely unsupported is the critical view that maintains that this infamous incident in the cave was "created" by a later writer to justify the inferior position of the Moabites and the Ammonites in their relationship with Israel. The almost buried faith of Lot reappeared in Ruth, a Moabitess, the great-grandmother of David and thus a member of the Messianic line (Ruth 1:16-18; 4:13-21).

Lot's life illustrates many spiritual truths: (1) the degenerating influence of a selfish choice (Gen. 13:11f); (2) the effect of a wicked environment on one's family (Gen. 19); (3) retribution in one's children (Gen. 19:8,31ff); (4) God, the only true judge of a man's real state (II Pet. 2:7ff). LOTAN (lō'tăn, Heb. lôtān, a wrapping up), the son of Seir, a Horite chief, father of Hori and Heman (Homan), (Gen. 36:20,22,29; I Chron. 1:38, 39).

LOVE (Heb. 'ahăvâh, Gr. agápe), presented in Scripture as the very nature of God (I John 4:8,16) and the greatest of the Christian virtues (I Cor. 13:13). It receives definition in Scripture only by a listing of its attributes (I Cor. 13:4-7). It lies at the very heart of Christianity, being essential to man's relations to God and man (Matt. 22:37-40; Mark 12:28-31; John 13:34-35). Jesus taught that upon it hang all the law and the prophets (Matt. 22:40). It is the fulfilment of the law, for its sense of obligation and desire for the welfare of the one loved impels it to carry out the demands of the law (Rom. 13:8-10). Love found its supreme expression in the self-sacrifice on Calvary (I John 4:10).

The Bible makes the unique revelation that God in His very nature and essence is love (I John 4:8, 16), Christianity being the only religion thus to present the Supreme Being. God not only loves, He is love. In this supreme attribute all the other attributes are harmonized. His own Son, Jesus Christ, is the unique object of this eternal love (John 17:24; Matt. 3:17; 17:5; Isa. 42:1). God loves the world as a whole (John 3:16), as well as every individual therein (Gal. 2:20), and that in spite of man's sinfulness and corruption (Rom. 5:8-10; Eph. 2:4-5). God's love for His creatures manifests itself in supplying all their needs (Acts 14:17), but supremely in the redemption wrought for them (Rom. 5:8; I John 4:9-10). Believers in Christ are the objects of His special love (John 16:27; 17:23), causing Him to deal in chastisement with them (Heb. 12:6-11), but they are assured that nothing can separate them from His unfathomable love in Christ (Rom. 8:31-39).

All human love, whether Godward or manward, has its source in God. Love in its true reality and power is seen only in the light of Calvary (I John 4:7-10). It is created in the believer by the Holy Spirit (Rom. 5:5; Gal. 5:22), prompting him to love both God and man (II Cor. 5:14-15; I John 4:20-21). Love finds its expression in service to our fellow-men (Gal. 5:13) and is the chief test of Christian discipleship (John 13:35; Luke 14:26; I John 3:14). Love is vitally related to faith; faith is basic (Heb. 11:6; John 6:29), but a faith that does not manifest itself in love both toward God and man is dead and worthless (James 2:17-26; Gal. 5:6,13). The Christian must love God supremely and his neighbor as himself (Matt. 22:37-39). He must love his enemy as well as his brother (Matt. 5:43-48; Rom. 12:19-20; I John 3:14). Our love must be "without hypocrisy" (Rom. 12:9 ASV) and be "in deed and truth" (I John 3:18). Love is the bond uniting all the Christian virtues (Col. 3:14). D.E.H.

LOVE FEAST (Gr. agápe), a common meal eaten by early Christians in connection with the Lord's Supper to express and deepen brotherly love. Although frequently mentioned in post-canonical literature, these feasts are mentioned in the NT only in Jude 12 ("feasts of charity" KJV) and the doubtful reading in II Peter 2:13 (ASV marg.). But the situation in I Corinthians 11:20-22, 33-34 makes it clear that they were observed in the Corinthian church. The mention of breaking bread as associated with, yet distinguished from, the eating of a meal in Acts 20:7-11 indicates the practice by the church in Troas. They doubtless trace back to the communal meals observed in the early Jerusalem Church (Acts 2:42-47; 4:35; 6:1). As implied by the situation in I Corinthians 11, these love feasts were observed before, but in connection with the Lord's Supper (perhaps after the relation between the first Lord's Supper and the Passover). Because of abuses, which already appeared in apostolic churches (I Cor. 11:23-29; Jude 12), they were separated from the Lord's Supper. They subsequently fell into disfavor and were ultimately forbidden to be held in churches, largely due to the growth of the sacerdotal view of the Eucharist which regarded the union of the two as sacrilegious. A few smaller Christian groups today observe them. D.E.H.

LOVING-KINDNESS (Heb. hesedh), a term which denotes the kindness and mercy of God toward man in the OT. The KJV does not reveal the difference between the meaning of this Hebrew word when it is applied to God, and when to man. But ASV has carefully made this distinction translating it as "loving-kindness" when from God and "kindness" or "mercy" when merely human qualities are meant. This term does not occur in the NT, but the concept of "grace" covers about the same area of meaning.

LUBIM (lū'bĭm, Heb. lûvîm), a people who are always mentioned in conjunction with Egyptians or Ethiopians (II Chron. 12:3; 16:8; Nah. 3:9). (In Jeremiah 46:9 KJV has "Libyans" for pût in the Hebrew text; ASV has "Put"). They are believed to be the Libyans who inhabited the area directly W of Egypt along the northern coast of Africa, where modern Libya is situated. The Lehabim of Genesis 10:13 are regarded as the same people. These ancient Libyans are occasionally mentioned in the records of ancient Egypt, usually as enemies. But one reference shows Libyan troops assigned with Egyptian soldiers and others on an expedition to Phoenicia. (James B. Pritchard, Editor, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, Princeton University Press, 1950, p. 476). This notice corresponds with the appearance of the Libyans in the Bible, where they are always associated with the Egyptians or Ethiopians in war. No doubt they served as vassals of Egypt.

LUCAS (lū'căs, Gr. Loukás), occurs only in KJV in Philemon 24. ASV has Luke here. See LUKE.

LUCIFER (See Satan, Devil)

LUCIUS (lū'shĭ-ŭs, Gr. Loúkios). 1. A Christian from Cyrene ministering in the church at Antioch (Acts 13:1).

2. A kinsman of Paul who evidently was with him in Corinth when he wrote his epistle to Rome (Rom. 16:21).

LUD, LUDIM (lŭd, lū'dĭm, Heb. lûdh, lûdhîm), either one or two nations of antiquity. Lud was the son of Shem (Gen. 10:22; I Chron. 1:17). It is generally agreed that Lud was the kingdom of Lydia in Asia Minor. Ludim was the son of Mizraim (Egypt) (Gen. 10:13; I Chron. 1:11), which indicates an African country. Other Bible references are: Isaiah 66:19 "to Tarshish, Pul, and Lud that draw the bow, to Tubal and Javan, to the isles afar off" — indicates Lud was in the Mediterranean area. Jeremiah 46:9 in a prophecy against Egypt "Cush (Ethiopia) Put (Phut) that handle the shield; and the Ludim that handle and bend the bow" — shows an African location for Ludim. Ezekiel 27:10 in a prophecy against Tyre "Persia and Lud, and Put (Phut) were in thine army" — indicates Lud might be in Asia or Africa. Ezekiel 30:5 in a prophecy against Egypt "Ethiopia and Put (Phut) and Lud . . . in league with thee" — indicates an African setting for Lud. This interchanging of Ludim for Lud has caused some scholars to think they are the same people. If the Ludim were a different people in Africa just what nation they were has never been established.

LUHITH (lū'-hĭth, Heb. lûhîth), a town of Moab located on a slope (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:5).

LUKE (lūk, Gr. Loukás). According to the oldest extant list of NT writings, known from the name of its discoverer as the Muratorian Fragment, and dating from the latter half of the second century, Luke was the writer of the Third Gospel, and the Acts of the Apostles. From the latter book his association with Paul is established. In four passages of varying length the author of Acts writes in the first person (16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1-28:16). These so-called "we-sections" constitute the major portion of the extant biographical material on Luke. Apart from this he is mentioned three times in the NT (Col. 4:14; Philem. 24; II Tim. 4:11). From the first reference it is evident that Luke was a physician; from the last, that he was with Paul some time after he disappears from view at the end of the Acts of the Apostles. The context of the Colossians reference also suggests that Luke was a Gentile and a proselyte.

It appears from Luke's own writings that he was a man of education and culture. He begins his Gospel with an elaborate paragraph which shows that he could write in the sophisticated tradition of the Hellenistic historians, and then lapses into a polished vernacular. He used this speech with vigor and effectiveness. He is an accurate and able historian, and has left some of the most powerful descriptive writing in the NT. His medical knowledge and his interest in seafaring are apparent from his writings. Beyond this is tradition and conjecture. Luke was not "Lucius of Cyrene" (Acts 13:1), for Lucas is an abbreviation of Lucanus, as Silas for Silvanus, and Annas for Annanus. There is no solid support for the conjecture that Luke was one of "the Seventy" (Luke 10:1), one of the Greeks of John 12:20, or one of the two disciples of Emmaus (Luke 24:13). More certain evidence supports other conjectures and traditions. That he knew Mary is fairly clear from the earlier chapters of his Gospel, and the period of acquaintance may have been during Paul's incarceration at Caesarea. Eusebius and Jerome say that Luke was a Syrian of Antioch, and he does seem to have a close knowledge of the Antiochene church. On the other hand certain features of the story of Paul's visit to Philippi suggest that he had an intimate knowledge of that city and no little loyalty towards it. Here, too, on two occasions, he appears to have joined Paul's party. This has given grounds for the contention that Luke was a Macedonian. Tradition and conjecture could be reconciled if Luke was an Antiochene of Macedonian origin, who had studied at the medical school of Philippi, and spent significant years in Macedonia. Luke must have been a person of singular sweetness of character to earn the apostle's adjective "beloved" (Col. 4:14). He was obviously a man of outstanding loyalty, of unusual capacity for research, and the scholar's ability to strip away the irrelevant and dispensable detail. A bare tradition states that he suffered martyrdom in Greece. E.M.B.

LUKE, GOSPEL OF. 1. Authenticity. The authenticity of the Third Gospel has not been successfully challenged. References are frequent in the second century (Justin, Polycarp, Papias, Hegesippus, Marcion, Heracleon, the Clementine Homilies, Theophilus of Antioch). It is probable that Clement alludes to it (A.D. 95). It is mentioned as the work of Luke by the Muratorian Fragment (A.D. 170) and by Irenaeus (A.D. 180). Such testimony continues into the third century (Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen). Such a mass of evidence is quite decisive.

2. Date. Uncertain, but can be confined to fairly narrow limits. The abrupt termination of the Acts of the Apostles suggests that the author did not long survive his friend and associate, Paul. Nor is it likely to have been written after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The period of Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea saw Luke in Palestine, and this period (conjecturally A.D. 58-59) would presumably give abundant opportunity for the research which is evident in the record. Luke's Gospel is thus the latest of the synoptic Gospels.

3. Historiography. William Mitchell Ramsay's work on the Acts of the Apostles has established the right of Luke to rank as a first-rate historian in his own capacity. He was demonstrated to have maintained a consistent level of accuracy wherever detail could be objectively tested, and the vividness of narration so evident in the second work is visible also in the Gospel.

4. Style. Luke's preface is in the elaborated style of such among ancient historians, and demonstrates that Luke could write with facility in the literary tradition of his time. At 1:5 he moves into the easy vernacular which he employs for his whole narrative. His language is the common dialect, but used with grace and vigor, and with an educated man's skill in composition.

5. Peculiar features. Much incident and much teaching is peculiar to Luke's Gospel: (a) The Nativity section is fresh and different, and seems to point to direct contact with Mary herself. Especially to be noted is the story of the birth of John the Baptist, and the four psalms (1:46-55; 68-79; 2:14; 2:29-32) which form a striking link between the hymnology of the Old Testament and the New. (b) The human genealogy (3:23-38) of Christ, traced to Adam, is chosen in accordance with the cosmopolitan flavor of the Gospel, and the writer's conception of his book as the first movement of the great historical process which took the faith from Bethlehem to Rome. (c) The childhood of Jesus. The incident in the temple (2:41-52) is peculiar to Luke, and also points to the probability that Mary was the chief authority. (d) Discourses and sayings together with associated incidents, especially those contained in the unique section (9:51 to 18:14). Matthew and Mark report some of the sayings from this section in different connections. No revision, correction, or contradiction is involved, for preachers and teachers inevitably repeat their words on different occasions. Luke's Beatitudes (6:21-23) are an illustration. In Luke they were uttered "on a plain" (6:17), and were not associated with the discourse which contained the Lord's Prayer. The latter is associated with other teaching (11:6-28) which may have been omitted by Matthew from the discourse "on the mount." Chapters 7, 9, 10 contain incidents quite peculiar to Luke (the rejection by the Samaritans, and the Seventy). The discourses of 14:25-35; 17:1-10 are similarly unique. So is the visit to Zacchaeus (19), and important parabolic teaching (see [e] below). An interesting illustration of Luke's management of an incident similarly reported in the other three Gospels is the story of the banquet in the house of Simon the Pharisee, and its associated sayings and incidents (7:36-50. Cf. Matt. 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9; John 11:2-12:1-8). (e) Parables and illustrative anecdote peculiar to Luke merit separate listing: the two debtors (7:41-43), the good Samaritan (10:30-37), the importunate neighbor (11:5-8), the rich fool (12:16-21), the barren fig-tree (13:6-9), the lost coin and the prodigal son (15:3-32), the unrighteous steward, and the rich fool and Lazarus (16:1-12,19-31), the wicked judge, and the Pharisee and the tax-gatherer (18:2-14), the pounds (19:13-27). (f) Miracles: the draught of fish (5:1-11), the widow's son (7:11-14), the sick woman (13:11-13), the sick man (14:2-6), the ten lepers (17:12-19), the healing of Malchus in Gethsemane (22:51). (g) In the closing chapters of the Gospel, the prayer on the Cross (23:34), the penitent thief (23:39-43), the walk to Emmaus (24:13-35), and much of the Ascension story, is peculiar to Luke.

6. Special characteristics. Apart from material content there are special characteristics of Luke's approach which should be noted: (a) As in the Acts of the Apostles, he exalts womanhood, an emphasis natural enough if Luke was a Macedonian. Apart from the Nativity narratives, note in this regard 7:11-17; 8:1-3,48; 10:38-42; 13:16; 23:28. Luke alone mentions Anna, and tells the intimate story of Martha and Mary (10:38-42). He alone mentions the tender phraseology of 8:48; 13:16 and 23:28. (b) It is perhaps part of the universality of Luke's conception of the Christian message that he stresses the Lord's attitude towards the poor. Note: 6:20-25; 8:2,3; 12:16-21; 14:12-15; 16:13; 18:25. (b) The same notion of a universal evangel, natural in an associate of Paul, is found as vividly in his completion of John's Isaian quotation ("and all flesh shall see the salvation of God" 3:6), as in Acts 17:27. Note in the same connection the strain of racial tolerance. The tale of the good Samaritan, and the word of praise for the grateful Samaritan leper, illustrates this, as also do the rebukes of 9:49-56. (c) Luke also gives prominence to prayer. He speaks of the Lord's prayer at His baptism, after cleansing the leper, before calling the Twelve, on the Mount of Transfiguration, on the Cross, and at death. See also 11:8; 18:1; 21:36 and the two parables 11:5-13, and 18:1-8. (d) A kindliness of judgment pervades Luke's Gospel as was proper in one who was not himself an associate of the Twelve. Note his milder version of Peter's denial. The faults of the apostles are touched with gentle hand, for Luke was, after all, writing of the leaders of the Church. Note how the conversation on the leaven of the Pharisees and the ambitious request of James and John are, for example, omitted. Similarly the disciples in the garden slept "for sorrow" (22:45), and their flight in the hour of danger is not recorded. This tact throws light on the reserve which marks the educated man. Others had a right to record such things, and properly did so. With equal propriety Luke ordered his narrative differently.

7. Sources. Beyond the writer's own statement (1:2) that he collected his material from eyewitnesses, it is impossible to be dogmatic. From the first words of the Gospel it is evident that Luke had both written accounts and living witnesses to draw from. In parts he would appear to have followed Mark or Mark's authorities and tradition. Mary could have supplied the Nativity stories, and the unique material on the Passion and Resurrection had apostolic authority. E.M.B.

LUZ (lŭz, Heb. lûz, turning aside). 1. A town located on the N boundary of the area of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 16:2; 18:13). To this place Jacob came when fleeing from home. He slept there and God appeared to him in a dream. To commemorate the occasion Jacob changed the name of the town to Bethel (house of God) (Gen. 28:19). But the place continued to be called Luz down to the time of the Judges.

2. A town in the land of the Hittites built by a man from Luz in Canaan (Judg. 1:26).

LYCAONIA (lĭk'ā-ō'nĭ-ȧ, Gr. Lykaonía), a district in the central plain of Asia N of the Taurus range. in early Roman days a division (or conuentus) of the province of Cilicia. Trajan transferred it to Galatia, but it reverted largely to Cilicia under the boundary adjustments of Antoninus Pius. Iconium, an ancient foundation rich in history, was the administrative capital. The province generally was backward, the inhabitants still speaking a native tongue in the first century A.D. In Acts 14:6 it is implied that, in passing from Iconium to Lystra, a frontier was crossed, a statement once set down as an error of the historian. W. M. Ramsay demonstrated the accuracy of the passage from local inscriptions. E.M.B.

LYCIA (lĭsh'ĭ-ȧ, Gr. Lykía), a district on the coast of the southern bulge of western Asia Minor, forming the western shore of the Gulf of Adalia. A mountainous area, Lycia successfully maintained its independence against Croesus of Lydia, and was granted a measure of independence under the Persians. The Athenians established a brief foothold there in Cimon's day (468-446 B.C.), but Lycia reverted to Persian rule. Under Alexander's successors the area was part of Syria, but the Ptolemies of Egypt exercised brief authority in the third century. After the Roman overthrow of Syria, Lycia was placed briefly under Rhodes, a situation which was bitterly resented. Freed in 169 B.C., the region enjoyed comparative independence in the imperial system until Vespasian. Even then the forms of local administration were retained (see I Macc. 15:23; Acts 21:1,2; 27:5).

LYDDA (lĭd'ȧ, Heb. lôdh, Gr. Lýdda), or Lod, lies some 30 miles NW of Jerusalem at the mouth of the Vale of Ajalon and at the head of the valley which runs down to Joppa, an old highway called the Valley of the Smiths in recollection of ancient Philistine supremacy in iron (I Sam. 13:19). On the edge of the Maritime Plain, Lydda was of some commercial importance, "a village not less than a city" in Josephus' phrase. After the Exile, the settlements of the returning Jews reached this point before meeting the resistance of the occupants of the plain (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37). Sir George Adam Smith (Historical Geography of the Holy Land, pp. 161, 164) demonstrates that the local cult of St. George, venerated by both Christian and Moslem, may have mythological links with the Fish-God Dragon once worshiped in this area by the Philistines. The incident of Peter and Aeneas took place at Lydda (Acts 9:32-38).

LYDIA (lĭd'ĭ-ȧ, Gr. Lydía), Paul's first convert in Europe. She resided in Philippi as a seller of the purple garments for which Thyatira, her native city, was famous. She was evidently well-to-do as she owned her house and had servants. She was "one who worshipped God," meaning a proselyte. She and other women, probably also proselytes, resorted to a place by a river for prayer. She came into contact with the Gospel when Paul and his company came there and spoke to these women, and she became a believer. After she and her household had been baptized, she constrained the group to come to her home to stay, which they did (Acts 16:14,15). Her home thus became the first church in Philippi (v.40).

As Lydia was from a city in the kingdom of Lydia, and her name was the common term to denote a woman from Lydia, some scholars have suggested that her personal name was unknown, or that she may be either Euodia or Syntyche mentioned in Philippians 4:2 by Paul as women who labored with him in the Gospel.

LYRE (See Musical Instruments)

LYSANIAS (lī-sā'nĭ-ăs, Gr. Lysanías), tetrarch of Abilene mentioned by Luke (3:1). The tetrarchy is a small region in the Lebanon. There is no satisfactory explanation of the inclusion of this obscure non-Jewish ruler in the dating list. Epigraphical evidence frees the historian from the old allegation that he confused the tetrarch with an earlier ruler (see Expositor's Greek Testament, ad loc.).

LYSIAS (lĭs'ĭ-ăs, Gr. Lysías). Claudius Lysias, of the Jerusalem garrison, tribune by rank, was probably one of the career men of the days of Pallas and Narcissus, the powerful freedmen and executive officers of the Emperor Claudius. Lysias was a Greek, as his second name shows. His first name was assumed when he secured Roman citizenship "at a great price" (Acts 22:28), no doubt by favor of one of the venal freedmen of the court. Paul was fortunate in the officer he encountered. Lysias was a vigorous and capable soldier.

LYSTRA (lĭs'trà, Gr. Lýstron, Lýstrois), a Roman colony of Augustus' foundation, with an aristocratic core of citizens with franchise, a group likely to honor the similar status of Paul. The community at large was not culturally advanced. In Lystra, W. M. Ramsay discovered an inscription dedicating a statue to Zeus and Hermes, two deities who were linked in a local cult explained by Ovid (Met. 8:620-724).

Philemon and Baucis, the legend ran, entertained the two gods unawares with hospitality which the rest of the community churlishly withheld. Hence the identification of Paul and Barnabas with the same two deities (Latinized by Vulgate and KJV into Jupiter and Mercury). At Isauria, not far away, an inscription has been found to "Zeus before the gate"; hence probably the location of the proposed ceremony mentioned in Acts 14:13. Timothy was a native of Lystra (Acts 16:1). Its ruins are near the modern village of Katyn Serai

M

MAACAH, MAACHAH (mā'ă-kà, Heb. ma'ăkhâh, oppression). 1. Son of Nahor, brother of Abraham, by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24).

2. A wife of David and the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur; she became the mother of Absalom (II Sam. 3:3, I Chron. 3:2).

3. The father of Achish, king of Gath, in Solomon's time (I Kings 2:39).

4. The favorite wife of Rehoboam, and the mother of Abijam (II Chron. 11:20-22). She is said to be the daughter of Absalom (vs.20; I Kings 15:2), but Absalom had only one daughter, whose name was Tamar (II Sam. 14:27). The mother of Abijam, Micaiah (Maacah), is said to be the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah (II Chron. 13:2); probably she was the granddaughter of Absalom. She outlived Abijam and was queen during the reign of her grandson, Asa, until he deposed her for making an idol (I Kings 15:10,13; II Chron. 15:16).

5. A concubine of Caleb, son of Hezron (I Chron. 2:48).

6. Sister of Huppim and Shuppim and wife of Machir, the son of Manasseh (I Chron. 7:14-16).

7. Wife of Jeiel, the founder of Gibeon (I Chron. 8:29; 9:35).

8. Father of Hanan, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:43).

9. Father of Shephatiah, the overseer of the tribe of Simeon in David's reign (I Chron. 27:16).

MAACHAH (mā'ă-kà, Heb. ma'ăkhâh, oppression), a small country on the edge of the Syrian desert N of Gilead (ASV Maachah). The Ammonites hired a thousand men of the king of this nation to assist them in fighting against David. In the battle the Ammonites and their helpers were put to rout and the Syrians fled (II Sam. 10:6-14). David defeated them and they became subservient to him (II Sam. 10:18-19).

MAACHATHI, MAACHATHITES (mà-ăk'a-thī, mā-ăk'ă-thīts, Heb. ma'ăkhāthî), the people of the nation of Maachah, residing near the Geshurites in the region of Bashan. They were in the area taken by Jair, the son of Manasseh (Deut. 3:14), situated on the border of the kingdom of Og, king of Bashan (Josh. 12:5). The half tribe of Manasseh, and the tribes of Reuben and Gad were assigned among other adjacent areas, "Gilead and the border of the Geshurites and the Maacathites, and all Mount Hermon and all Bashan" (Josh. 13:11). The Israelites did not drive out the Maacathites or Geshurites, but dwelt with them (Josh. 13:13). The grandfather of Eliphelet, one of David's mighty men, was a Maacathite (II Sam. 23:34). After the fall of Jerusalem, among the men who came to Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor at Mizpeh, was Jaazaniah, the son of a Maacathite (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8). Eshtemoa, the son of Hadiah, a descendant of Judah, was a Maacathite (I Chron. 4:19). These Maacathites were descendants of the people whom the Israelites did not expel.

MAADAI (mā'ă-dā'ī, Heb. ma'ădhay, ornaments), son of Bani, one of the Israelites who married foreign women (Ezra 10:34).

MAADIAH (mā-à-dī'à, Heb. ma'adhyâh, Jehovah is ornament), one of the chiefs of the priests who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:5).

MAAI (mā-ā'ī, Heb. mā'ay, to be compassionate), one of the sons of the priests who blew trumpets at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36).

MAALEH-ACRABBIM (mā'à-lĕ-à-krab'ĭm, ascent of Akrabbim), a section of the area assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:3).

MAARATH (mā'a-răth, Heb. ma'ărāth, a place naked of trees), one of the cities in the territory of Judah, located near Hebron (Josh. 15:59).

MAASEIAH (mā'à-sē'yà, Heb. ma'ăsēyāhû, work of Jehovah). 1. One of the Levites appointed to play a psaltery in praise of God while the ark was brought up to Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:18,20).

2. One of the captains of hundreds, the son of Adaiah, whom Jehoiada, the priest, took in covenant with him to resist the usurpation by Athaliah of the throne of Judah (II Chron. 23:1).

3. An officer in the army of Uzziah, king of Judah (II Chron. 26:11).

4. A son of Ahaz, king of Judah, who was killed by Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim during a war with Israel (II Chron. 28:7).

5. The governor of Jerusalem in Josiah's reign, one of the officials whom the king put in charge of repairing the temple (II Chron. 34:8).

6. One of the priests who had married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:18).

7. A priest of the family of Harim who took a foreign wife (Ezra 10:21).

8. A priest of the family of Passhur who took a foreign wife (Ezra 10:22).

9. A man of Israel of the family of Pahath Moab who took a foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

10. The father of Azariah, a man who worked on the wall of Jerusalem near his house (Neh. 3:23).

11. One of the men who stood on the right side of Ezra as he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4).

12. One of the men who explained the law to the people (Neh. 8:7).

13. One of the chiefs of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:25). May be the same as No. 12.

14. One of the descendants of the son of Baruch of Perez who dwelt in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:5).

15. A Benjamite whose descendants dwelt in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:7).

16. A priest, one of those who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41).

17. Another priest who took part in this dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:42).

18. A priest whose son Zephaniah was one of the two men whom Zedekiah, king of Judah, sent to Jeremiah to ask him to inquire of the Lord for him (Jer. 21:1; 37:3).

19. The father of Zedekiah, a false prophet whom Jeremiah condemned (Jer. 29:21).

20. The keeper of the threshold of the temple in Jeremiah's time (Jer. 35:4).

21. An ancestor of Baruch (Jer. 32:12). ASV has Mahseiah.

MAASIAI (mā-ās'ĭ-ī, Heb. ma'say, work of Jehovah), a priestly family which dwelt in Jerusalem after returning from exile (I Chron. 9:12).

MAATH (mā'ăth, Gr. Maáth, to be small), an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:26).

MAAZ (mā'ăz, Heb. ma'ats, wrath), son of Ram, the first born son of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:27).

MAAZIAH (mā-à-zī'à, Heb. ma'azyâhû, consolation of Jehovah). 1. A priest of the 24 sons of Eleazar and Ithamar, sons of Aaron, to whom was assigned the 24th lot to serve in the tabernacle (I Chron. 24:18).

2. A priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:8).

MACCABEES (măk'à-bēs, Gr. Makkabaíai), the name given to a Jewish family of Modin in the Shephelah, who initiated the Jewish revolt against the Hellenizing policy which the Seleucid Syrian king, Antiochus Epiphanes, was unwisely endeavoring to force through in Palestine.

The story is told in the two books of the Maccabees in the Apocrypha. The rising began in 168 B.C., when Mattathias, an aged priest, struck down a royal commissioner and an apostate Jew, who were about to offer heathen sacrifice in the town. Mattathias leveled the altar, and fled to the hills with his sons. To his standard rallied the Chasidim ('the Pious,' Gk. Hasidaeans). The old priest died after a few months of guerrilla warfare, and the same early fighting claimed two of his sons, Eleazar and John. The remaining three sons, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, succeeded in turn to the leadership of the insurrection, and all left a deep mark on Jewish history.

Judas won the name of Maccabee, or "the Hammerer," and he was the only member of the family to whom the term was applied in the Apocrypha. It was later history which used it as a surname for all three brothers. Judas was a fine soldier and patriot, with a clear policy of Jewish independence and religious reconstruction. Raising and organizing a fighting force of Galileans, Judas defeated major military expeditions sent against him in 166 and 165 B.C. In December of the latter year, Judas formally cleansed the temple of Syrian pollution and celebrated the occasion with a great festival. This festival became a permanent fixture, falling on December 25, and lasting eight days (I Macc. 4:52-59; II Macc. 10:6; John 10:22).

For the next 18 months, Judas campaigned E of Jordan, while Simon, his brother, collected the Jews who were scattered through Galilee into the comparative safety of Judaea. Judas at this point lost some of the support of the Chasidim, whose ambitions were largely fulfilled by the re-establishment of the temple services. Religious division, the perennial problem of all the Jewish struggles for independence, was thus responsible for a weakening of Judas' hand. Lysias, the Syrian general, whom Judas had signally defeated at Bethzur in the autumn of 165 B.C., gained his revenge at Beth-zacharias. Judas was routed, and the Syrian garrison still holding out in the citadel of Jerusalem was relieved. Lysias was in control of Syria during the brief reign of the minor, Antiochus Eupator, who succeeded Epiphanes in 163 B.C., and he was sensible enough to abandon Epiphanes' attack upon the religion of the Jews, for the much more effective political policy of patronage. He set up a puppet high-priest, Alcimus, who was accepted by the Chasidim. Judas was thus isolated, but on Lysias' withdrawal, marched against Alcimus. Demetrius I, who succeeded Eupator in 162 B.C., an able and decisive ruler, sent a force under Nicanor to put down this new rebellion. Defeated by Judas, Nicanor retired to Jerusalem, but foolishly drove "the Pious" into renewed support of the Maccabee by threatening reprisals against the temple. With the country again behind him, Judas defeated the Syrians at Adasa. Judas was now in control of the land, and negotiated a treaty with Rome, in the terms of which Rome ordered Demetrius I to withdraw from Palestine. Judas' move was a shrewd one, for since the Peace of Apamea (188 B.C.) Syria existed by Rome's sufferance, and Demetrius had spent his youth as a hostage in Rome. Time was against Judas, for ere the Senate's prohibition was delivered to the king, Judas was defeated and killed by the general Bacchides at Elasa (I Macc. 3-9:22). The international policy, illustrated by the approach to Rome, had again alienated the fickle Chasidim, and the withdrawal of support fatally weakened Judas' power of resistance, and led directly to his military defeat.

Jonathan succeeded his brother in 161 B.C., and the Maccabaean revolt reverted to the guerrilla warfare with which it had begun. Dynastic troubles in Syria, however played into Jonathan's hands. Alexander Balas, supported by Pergamum and Egypt, aspired to the Syrian throne, and both Demetrius and Alexander thought it expedient to secure the support of so determined a fighter as the second Maccabee. Demetrius offered the control of all military forces in Palestine, and the governorship of Jerusalem. Alexander added an offer of the high-priesthood. Jonathan chose Alexander, and thus became the founder of the Hasmonaean priesthood. By skilful support of Demetrius II, who dethroned Alexander, Jonathan maintained and strengthened his position. The difficulties of the later Seleucid empire served his purposes well. Jonathan was even able to extend his power over the maritime plain, to fortify Jerusalem and other strong-points in Judaea, and to enter into treaty relationships with Rome. An army revolt in 143 B.C. unseated Demetrius II, and the young son of Alexander was enthroned as Antiochus VI. Power was in the hands of the generals, one of whom, Tryphon, laid hold of Jonathan by treachery, and executed him (I Macc. 9:23-12:54).

Simon, the third brother, inherited this critical situation. Simon was an able diplomat, who carried on his brother's policy of profiting with some success by Syria's internal troubles. In 143 and 142 B.C. he succeeded in establishing the virtual political independence of Judaea. In 141 B.C., at a great assembly of princes, priests, and elders of the land, Simon was elected to be high-priest, military commander, and civil governor of the Jews, "for ever until there should arise a faithful prophet." The high-priesthood was thus rendered hereditary in the family of Simon. Simon re-established the treaty with Rome, which had proved a useful diplomatic advantage over Syria, which Rome watched with some care, and was not sorry to see embarrassed by her petty imperialism. Simon was murdered by his son-in-law at a banquet (I Macc. 13-16:16). His son, the celebrated John Hyrcanus, succeeded him, and held the inherited authority for 30 years before passing it on to his son Aristobulus, who assumed the royal title. The Hasmonaeans continued their dynasty till 34 B.C. when Herod and the Romans put down Antigonus, the last of Mattathias' line, but the Maccabees proper ended with Simon in 134 B.C.

The story as above outlined is told in two independent narratives written by authors of different emphases and abilities, the First and Second Books of the Maccabees. The first book is an honest piece of historical writing, detailing without adornment the events of a stirring struggle for freedom. The second book covers much of the same material, but slants the account in the direction of religious instruction and admonition. "By way of briefly characterizing the two authors of I and II Maccabees," writes Bruce M. Metzger, "it may be said that the former was a sober historian who wished to glorify Israel and its heroic Maccabaean leaders and that the latter was a moralizing theologian who wished to emphasize the immeasurable superiority of Judaism over heathenism." (An Introduction to the Apocrypha, p. 130). E.M.B.

MACEDONIA (măs'ē-dō'nĭ-à, Gr. Makedonía), the term is of varied import. Lying geographically between the Balkan highlands and the Greek peninsula, Macedonia was both a Greek kingdom and a Roman province. The kingdom, in its early centuries, occupied a quadrangle of territory which formed only the eastern half of the Roman provincial unit. The province extended from the Aegean to the Adriatic, with Illyricum to the NW, Thrace to the NE, and Achaea to the S. Culturally, Macedonia came under strong Athenian influence in the latter years of the fifth century before Christ, and in the first half of the fourth century, the period between Euripides, who emigrated to Macedonia in 408 or 407 B.C., and Aristotle, who came to Macedonia as tutor to Alexander in 343 or 342, after the death of Plato. The population was Indo-European, but of mixed tribal elements, of which the Dorian stock was probably a strong ingredient.

The history of the early kingdom is confused, and the tradition that Perdiccas I conquered the Macedonian plain in 640 B.C. probably marks the emergence of one dominant clan among an agglomeration of mountain tribes striving for the mastery of a significant area on an ancient invasion route. Until the reign of Philip II (359 to 336 B.C.), the kingdom was insignificant in Aegean history, and preoccupied with the continual tension of tribal war. By consolidation, conquest, pacification, and an enlightened policy of the Hellenization, carried out with the speed, precision, ruthlessness, and clear-headed determination which marked the man, Philip unified Macedonia, and finally conquered all Greece. The orations of Demosthenes, directed against the Macedonian menace, are poignant documents of this day of Athens' democratic decadence, and the upsurge of Macedonian power which was to extend Greek rule to the east. It was the army created by Philip which followed Alexander, his son, to the Ganges, and overthrew the Persian Empire.

The history of Macedonia from Hellenistic times to the Roman conquest and annexation (167 B.C.) is undistinguished. Macedonia was the first part of Europe to receive Christianity (Phil. 4:15). The "man from Macedonia" of Paul's dream may have been Luke, who, if not a native of Philippi in Macedonia, was certainly long resident there (Acts 16:9ff). Paul was more than once in the province (Acts 19:21; 20:1-3; I Cor. 16:5; II Cor. 1:16). Macedonians were close to the Apostle; for example, Gaius and Aristarchus, Secundus, Sopater, and Epaphroditus (Acts 17:11; 20:4; Phil. 4:10-19; I Thess. 2:8,17-20; 3:10). The church in Macedonia was noted for its women leaders, a situation which reflects the wide emancipation of Macedonian women. E.M.B.

MACHAERUS (mă-kē'rŭs, Gr. Machairoús), Herod's southernmost stronghold E of the Dead Sea, built by Alexander Janneus (90 B.C.?) (Jos. Ant. 14.5.2). "The second citadel of Judaea" (Plin. H.N. 5.16). The fort was on the border of Peraea, the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas. To the S lay the domains of Aretas, Herod's father-in-law, King of the Nabataeans. When Herod intrigued to replace the daughter of Aretas by Herodias, the former escaped from Machaerus to her father in the Arnon Valley, 12 miles to the S. In the subsequent troubles Herod occupied Machaerus with Herodias and Salome, and here John the Baptist died (Matt. 14:3ff). In the Great Rebellion Jewish zealots were starved out of Machaerus by the Romans and the fort was razed. E.M.B.

MACHBANAI (măk'bà-nī, Heb. makhbannay, clad with a cloak), a Gadite who joined David's forces at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:13).

MACHBENAH (măk-bē'nà, Heb. makhbēnâh, bond), name of a place in Judah which occurs in the genealogical list of Caleb. It is from the same root as Cabban (I Chron. 2:49). ASV Machbena.

MACHI (mā'kī, Heb. mākhî), the father of Geuel, appointed from the tribe of Gad to be one of those who spied out the Promised Land (Num. 13:15).

MACHIR (mā'kĭr, Heb. mākhîr, sold). 1. The eldest son of Manasseh, son of Joseph. He married and had a family before the Israelites left Egypt (Gen. 50:23). By the time of the dividing up of the Promised Land, his descendants, the Machirites, were numerous and powerful. They conquered Gilead and settled there (Num. 32:39,40), except the family of Hepher which settled in Canaan (Josh. 17:3). So Machir is called the father of Gilead several times, and he is even said to have begotten Gilead (Num. 26:29. In Judges 5:14 Machir stands for Manasseh.

2. The son of Ammiel. David took Mephibosheth out of his house (II Sam. 9:4,5). This Machir was one of the men who brought refreshments to David as he fled from Absalom (II Sam. 17:27).

MACHNADEBAI (măk-năd'ē-bī), one of the men who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

MACHPELAH (măk-pē'là, Heb. makhpēlâh, a doubling), a field near Hebron which Abraham purchased from Ephron the Hittite for 400 shekels of silver in order to use a cave in it as a place of burial for Sarah (Gen. 23:19-20). Abraham (Gen. 25:9), Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob (Gen. 50:13) were also buried there (Gen. 49:31). Its name may mean it was a double cave. A Moslem mosque stands over the cave of Machpelah today, and entrance into it is forbidden.

MADAI (măd'ā-ī, Heb. mādhay, Media), a people descended from Japheth (Gen. 10:2; I Chron. 1:5). They occupied the same area which Persia, modern Iran, does today. They were called the Medes.

MADIAN (See Midian)

MADMANNAH (măd-măn'-nà, Heb. madhmannâh, dunghill). 1. A town in southern Judah located about eight miles S of Kirjath-sepher (Josh. 15:31).

2. Grandson of Caleb (I Chron. 2:48,49).

MADMENAH (măd-mē'-nà, Heb. madhmēnâh, dunghill), a town in the tribe of Benjamin, evidently a little N of Jerusalem, but its location is uncertain (Isa. 10:31).

MADON (mā'dŏn, Heb. mādhôn, contention), a royal city of the Canaanites, whose king Jobab was defeated by Joshua (Josh. 11:1; 12:19). It was located near modern Hattin, about five miles E of the Sea of Galilee.

MAGBISH (măg'bĭsh, Heb. maghbîsh, congregating), name of either a man, the head of a family of which 156 persons returned with Zerubbabel from exile, or of a place to which these people belonged. The list contains names of both towns and persons (Ezra 2:30). It is listed in some atlases as a town, location unknown.

MAGDALA (măg'dà-là, Gr. Magdalá), a town on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee, three miles N of Tiberias named only in the KJV rendering of Matthew 15:39. (ASV has more correct Magadan; Mark 8:10 the alternative Dalmanutha). It is identified mainly by the modern village of El Mejdel. Magdala may be Taricheae (Sir George Adam Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land, pp. 452, 453), one of the lost fishing towns of the lake. The town was the home or birthplace of Mary Magdalene.

MAGDALEN, MAGDALENE (See Mary)

MAGDIEL (mag'dĭ-ĕl, Heb. maghdî'ēl, God is noble), one of the chiefs of Edom (Gen. 36:43; I Chron. 1:54).

MAGI (mā'jī, Gr. mágoi). The magi were originally a religious caste among the Persians. Their devotion to astrology, divination, and the interpretation of dreams led to an extension in the meaning of the word, and by the first century the terms "magi" and "Chaldaean" were applied generally to fortune tellers and the exponents of esoteric religious cults throughout the Mediterranean world. Magus is, for example, the epithet of the charlatan Simon of Acts 8:9. The term is translated "sorcerer" in Acts 13:6,8. "The wise men from the east" of the Nativity story (Matt. 2) are often referred to as "the Magi." Nothing is known of their land of origin, but it is a likely theory that they came from Arabia Felix (Southern Arabia). Astrology was practiced there, and a tradition of Israelite Messianic expectation may have survived in the region since the days of the Queen of Sheba. Much early legend connects Southern Arabia with Solomon's Israel. Ancient report, linked to later astrological study, may have prompted the famous journey. This, of course, can be no more than speculation. The legend of "the Three Kings" is late and medieval. The old Arabian caravan routes enter Palestine "from the East." E.M.B.

MAGIC. Originally the word meant the science or art of the Magi, the Persian priestly caste, who, like the Levites, were devoted to the practice of religion. With the wide extension of the term "magus," the word magic, too, acquired broader significance. It came to mean all occult rituals or processes designed to influence or control the course of nature, to dominate men or circumstances by the alliance, aid, or use of supernatural powers, and generally to tap and to employ the forces of an unseen world. Divination, the art of forecasting the future with a view to avoiding its perils and pitfalls, might be included under the same classification. Its methods were frequently "magic." In lands ethnologically stratified, magic was often associated with the religion of a conquered or depressed class, or with imported faiths. Hence the frequency with which magic is found in the hands of foreign elements, and is secret in its practice and frequently under official ban as anti-social and illicit. Hence the stern prohibitions of the Bible against all forms of "wizardry" and "sorcery" (Exod. 22:18; Lev. 19:26; 20:27; Deut. 18:10,11). Hence, too, the security precautions surrounding the royal visit to "the witch of Endor" (II Sam. 28:7 seq.).

It was part of the advanced wisdom of the Mosaic code to show that active faith in a worthy deity, moral responsibility, and true religion, were not promoted by superstition and the practice of the occult, while genuine prophecy (in the wider sense of that word) was vitiated by such perversion. It was also realized that magic arts were part of the surrounding paganism from which it is the first preoccupation of the Old Testament to separate the Hebrew race. Magic, too, was widely practiced in Egypt (Exod. 7:11; 8:7,18,19; 9:11), and in Babylon (Dan. 1:20; 2:2). In both empires the craft and ritual of magic long antedated the Persian religious caste whose practices provided the later name. None the less, both before and after Moses, the intrusion of such unhealthy beliefs may be detected in Hebrew history. The incident of the mandrakes found by Reuben (Gen. 30:14) is a clear example, and perhaps, too, the obscure incident of Jacob's trickery with the rods "pilled with white strakes" at the water-hole (Gen. 30:37). It is not claimed in the record that the magic manipulation was the prime cause of the result. It is fairly evident that Jacob's empirical knowledge of animal genetics was determining the breeding trend, but he was remote from the lofty monotheism of his family, and the Euphrates valley towns were devoted to magic, hence the "teraphim" later in the story (Gen. 31:19. See also Judg. 17:5; I Sam. 19:13; Ezek. 21:21-26; Zech. 10:2). These were household deities, crudely carved, like the Roman Lares and Penates. In popular religion their worship was a base addition to, or substitute for the worship of Jehovah. Similar in concept was the cult of the "baals" of the fields, whose corrupt worship in fertility rituals and sympathetic magic was fiercely castigated by the prophets for the obscene thing it was. In every revival of pure worship the teraphim were swept away with other forms of vicious paganism (e.g. II Kings 23:24).

References to magic practices are also found in the New Testament. The reference to the heathens' "vain repetitions" (Matt. 6:7; for example see I Kings 18:26 and Acts 19:28) may allude to the belief in the magic repetition of set formulae such as the Tibetan's meaningless "om mani padme hum" ("Hail to the jewel in the lotus flower"). Simon (Acts 8:9) and Elymas (Acts 13:8) are spoken of as practicing "curious arts." There is evidence that this tribe of charlatans was widespread, and often in origin Jewish (e.g. "the Sons of Sceva" in Ephesus, Acts 19:14). The Emperor Tiberius had given much encouragement to "the Chaldaeans and soothsayers" by his belief in magic. Juvenal pictures the old prince in retirement on Capri "with his wizard mob" (cum grege Chaldaeo. Juv. 10.94). The Senate, indeed, had more than once banished them, but a Roman weakness for the caster of horoscopes and the purveyors of superstition always ensured the return of the magicians, whom Tacitus bitterly describes as "a tribe faithless to the powerful, deceitful to those who hope, which will ever be banned among us — and ever tolerated" (Hist. 1:22). Sergius Paulus, the governor of Cyprus, seems to have held his Jewish soothsayer with a light hand, and to have been quite convinced by the apostle's exposure of him. The story of the first Christian impact on the city of Ephesus reveals the tremendous influence of magic among the populace at large. With the spread of Christian doctrine, those who practiced "curious arts" brought their books of incantations of magic formulae to burn. The estimated price was "fifty thousand pieces of silver." The reference is probably to the silver denarius, one of which was the standard wage for a day's labor in the Palestine of the Gospels. The early Church, in general, did not dismiss magic as a delusion, but attributed its results to the work of malign and evil beings who were without power against a Christian. The Council of Ancyra (A.D. 315) first legislated against magic. E.M.B.

MAGICIANS (See Magic)

MAGISTRATE (măj'ĭs-trāt, Heb. shephat, judge, Gr. árchon, ruler, strategós, commander). The word shephat is found only once (Ezra 7:25) when it is translated "magistrates." The term archon is only once rendered magistrate (Luke 12:58). The word strategós is translated "magistrates" five times (Acts 16:20,22,35,36,38), where it denotes the rulers of the city of Philippi, a Roman colony. These authorities were called praetors in Latin. They were the highest officials in the government of a colony and had the power of administration of justice in less important cases.

MAGNIFICAT (măg-nĭf'ĭ-kăt), the song of praise by Mary recorded in Luke 1:46-55. This name comes from its first word in the Vulgate version, Magnificat mea anima (my soul doth magnify). Mary spoke this song in response to the assurance from Elizabeth that God would surely fulfill the words of the Angel Gabriel that she would be the woman chosen to bring the Son of God into the world. The song resembles closely the poetry of the Old Testament; its similarity to Hannah's prayer in I Samuel 2:1-10 is very striking. There can be no doubt that Mary said these words; all the Greek manuscripts ascribe it to her, but three Latin manuscripts read Elizabeth instead of Mary in verse 46.

MAGOG (mā'gŏg, Heb. māghôgh, land of Gog?), a son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; I Chron. 1:5); Josephus and Greek writers generally applied this name to the Scythians. Modern Christian writers indicate the Tartars of Russia and of southern Europe. The names of King Gog, "prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal" (Ezek. 38:2), resemble the modern Russia, Moscow, and Tobolsk. "The nations which are in the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog" (Rev. 20:8) means all the ungodly nations of the earth who oppose the people of God.

MAGOR-MISSABIB (mā'gôr-mĭs'ă-bĭb, terror on every side), the symbolic name which Jeremiah gave to Pashhur, the son of the priest Immer, who struck him (Jer. 20:3).

MAGPIASH (măg'pī-ăsh, Heb. magpi'osh, moth killer), a chief who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:20).

MAGUS, SIMON (See Simon)

MAHALAH (mā-hā'lā, Heb. mahlâh, disease), a child, sex uncertain, probably a son, of Hammolecheth, sister of Machir, son of Manasseh (I Chron. 7:18). ASV Mahlah.

MAHALALEEL (mā-hā'lā-lē'ĕl, Heb. mahălal'ēl, praise of God), the son of Kenan, who lived 895 years, and was the father of Jared (Gen. 5:12,13, 15,16,17; I Chron. 1:2; Luke 3:37). ASV Mahalalel.

MAHALATH (mā'hā-lăth, Heb. mahălath, sickness). 1. A daughter of Ishmael whom Esau took for his third wife (Gen. 28:9).

2. The first wife of Rehoboam; she was a granddaughter of David (II Chron. 11:18).

3. Musical term in the heading of Psalm 53 and 88.

MAHALI (mā'hā-lī, Heb. mahlî, sick), son of Merari, son of Levi (Exod. 6:19).

MAHANAIM (mā'hā-nā'ĭm, Heb. mahănayim, two hosts), a town so named by Jacob when he was met there by angels as he was returning from Padan-aram to Canaan (Gen. 32:2). This town was appointed a city of refuge, and was assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:38; I Chron. 6:80). It was situated in Gilead E of the Jordan, on the boundary between Gad and Manasseh (Josh. 13:26,30). After the death of Saul, Mahanaim was made the capital of Israel for a short time (II Sam. 2:8).

David, fleeing from Absalom, came to this place (II Sam. 19:32). Solomon's officer, Abinadab, was stationed in this city (I Kings 4:14).

Mahanaim is mentioned in an Egyptian inscription as one of the cities conquered by Sheshonk I (Shishak of the Bible). This occurred on his raid into Palestine mentioned in I Kings 14:25,26; II Chronicles 12:2,3. The exact location of Mahanaim has been much discussed, but still remains uncertain.

Song of Solomon 6:13 ASV refers to a dance called Mahanaim (in margin, "of two companies," KJV "of two armies"). James B. Pritchard, edit., Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, Princeton University Press, 1950, p. 243. C.E.H.

MAHANEH-DAN (mā'hà-nĕ-dăn, Heb. mahănēh-dhān, camp of Dan). 1. A place where Samson grew up and first began to be moved by the Spirit of Jehovah. It was situated between Zorah and Eshtaol (Judg. 13:25 KJV).

2. A place behind Kiriath-jearim where 600 men of war of the tribe of Dan encamped on their way to conquer Laish (Judg. 18:12). These both may be the same place though they seem to be several miles apart.

MAHARAI (mà-hăr'ā-ī, Heb. mahăray, impetuous), one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:28; I Chron. 11:30). He was the captain over 24,000 men to serve the king during the tenth month of the year. He was a Zerahite living in Netoph (I Chron. 27:13).

MAHATH (mā'hăth, Heb. mahath, seizing). 1. A Kohathite, an ancestor of Heman the singer (I Chron. 6:35).

2. One of the Levites who cleansed the temple in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 29:12). He was appointed one of the overseers of the dedicated things (II Chron. 31:13).

MAHAVITE (mā'hà-vīt, Heb. mahăwîm), the family name of Eliel, one of David's warriors (I Chron. 11:46).

MAHAZIOTH (mà-hā'zī-ŏth, Heb. mahăzî'ôth, visions), a son of Heman who praised God in the temple in song and with instruments (I Chron. 25:4). He was given the 23rd lot to serve in song (I Chron. 25:30).

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ (mā'hēr-shāl'āl-hāsh'băz, the spoil speeds, the prey hastens). This phrase was written down by Isaiah and officially recorded as a witness by God's direction. Later when the prophet's second son was born the Lord told Isaiah to give him this phrase as a name. It was a sign that Samaria would be carried away before the child would be old enough to talk (Isa. 8:1,3).

MAHLAH (mà'là, Heb. mahlâh, disease). 1. Eldest daughter of Zelophehad of the tribe of Manasseh. This man had no sons but seven daughters, who obtained permission to inherit land as if they were sons, provided they married within the tribe (Num. 26:33; 27:1ff; Chapter 36; Josh. 17:3ff).

2. Daughter of Hammolocheth, the sister of Machir, son of Manasseh (I Chron. 7:18).

MAHLI (màh'lī, Heb. mahlî, sick). 1. Son of Merari, son of Levi, ancestor of the Mahlites (Exod. 6:19 KJV, Mahli; Num. 3:20; Ezra 8:18).

2. Son of Mushi (I Chron. 6:47; 23:23; 24:30).

MAHLITE (màh'līt, Heb. mahlî), a descendant of Mahli, son of Merari (Num. 3:33; 26:58). There was one case among them of a family of daughters marrying cousins (I Chron. 23:22).

MAHLON (mà'lŏn, Heb. mahlôn, sick), son of Elimelech. Married Ruth in Moab, leaving her a widow about ten years later (Ruth 1:2,5; 4:9,10).

MAHOL (mā'hŏl, Heb. māhôl, dance), father of Calcol and Darda, men famous for their wisdom, but not as wise as Solomon (I Kings 4:31).

MAID, MAIDEN. 1. Heb. 'āmâh, handmaiden, or female slave, the property of her owners (Exod. 2:5; 21:20,26), and often a bondmaid (Lev. 25:44).

2. Heb. bethûlâh, virgin, a girl secluded and separated from intercourse with men. Often used with this meaning (Exod. 22:16; Judg. 19:24; Ps. 78:63; 148:12).

3. Heb. na'ărâh, girl, maiden (Exod. 2:5; Ruth 2:8,22,23; 3:2 and often).

4. Heb. 'almâh, a girl of marriageable age, occurs only seven times (Gen. 24:43; Exod. 2:8; Ps. 68:25; S. of Sol. 1:3; 6:8; Prov. 30:19; Isa. 7:14).

5. Heb. shiphhâh, maid servant, a synonym of āmâh, maid (Gen. 16:2,3,5,6,8; 29:24,29; 30:9,10, 12,18, etc.), bondmaid (Lev. 19:20), bond woman (Deut. 26:68; II Chron. 28:10; Esth. 7:4), hand maid (Gen. 16:1; 25:12; 29:24,29 and often), maid servant (Gen. 12:16; 24:35; 30:43, etc.).

MAIMED (See Diseases)

MAKAZ (mā'kăz, Heb. māqats), a town near Beth Shemesh where Solomon's supply officer, Bendeker, was stationed (I Kings 4:9).

MAKHELOTH (măk-hē'lŏth, Heb. maqhēlōth), a station where Israel encamped in the wilderness (Num. 33:25,26).

MAKKEDAH (măk-kē'dà, Heb. maqqēdhâh, a place of shepherds), a town near Libnah and Azekah conquered by Joshua. Five kings hid in a cave in this town and were killed and buried there (Josh. 10:16ff). The city was assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:41).

MAKTESH (măk'tĕsh, Heb. makhtēsh, mortar or hollow place resembling a mortar), occurs only once and is left untranslated as the name of a place; location unknown (Zeph. 1:11).

MALACHI (măl'à-kī, Heb. mal'ākhî, messenger of Jehovah or my messenger), the name given to the last book of the OT, and it is also probably the name of the prophet whose oracles the book contains. The book's title reads: "The burden ('oracle' RSV) of the word of the Lord to Israel by Malachi" (1:1). Thus it would seem that the prophet's name was Malachi. Malachi is the Hebrew expression meaning "my messenger" and it is so translated in 3:1, where there is an obvious pun on the author's name. For this reason, some have supposed Malachi to be a title for the prophet, not his proper name. But since the prophetic books of the OT always begin with the stating of the prophet's name, it seems more likely that here, too, the name of the prophet is given. It is not unusual to have puns on the names of real people (Ezek. 3:8,9). Nothing more is known about the author of this book.

The book of Malachi is believed to be one of the latest of the OT books. Since no statement as to its date is made in the book, one must seek to determine this by the nature of its contents. It is clearly post-Exilic. The temple had been completed and sacrifices were being offered (1:7-10; 3:8). A Persian governor (the word for governor in 1:8 is a borrowed word, used for the Persian governors in Palestine in post-Exilic times) was ruling in Jerusalem. This indicates a date later than that of Haggai and Zechariah.

It is also clear that the early zeal for the rebuilding of the temple has now died out, and a situation of moral and religious declension has set in. The mixed marriages (2:10-12), failure to pay tithes (3:8-10) and offering of blemished sacrifices (1:6-14) are conditions not unlike those referred to in the times of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 7-Neh. 13) and it would seem that Malachi's prophecy was given at about that time, or possibly shortly thereafter — about the middle or end of the fifth century B.C.

There are two principal themes in the book: 1) The sin and apostasy of the people of Israel, emphasized in chaps. 1,2; 2) The judgment that will come upon the faithless and the blessing in store for those who repent, predominating in chaps. 3,4. A more detailed analysis follows.

1. Title, 1:1.
2. An argument for the love of God towards Israel as shown in the contrasted experiences of Edom and Israel, 1:2-5.
3. A protest against the negligence of the priests in worship, 1:6-2:9.
4. A condemnation of those who divorce their wives and marry foreign women, 2:10-16.
5. An answer to those who complain that God is indifferent to injustice: a day of judgment is at hand, 2:17-3:5.
6. A rebuke for the neglect of tithes and offerings, 3:6-12.
7. A reply to doubters, and a promise to the faithful, 3:13-4:3.
8. A recall to the law and a prophecy of the coming of Elijah, 4:4-6.

Certain features are unique in this book:

1. The use of the rhetorical question and answer as a method of communication. This device begins most of the eight sections referred to above. It anticipates the later catechetical method of teaching.

2. Malachi contains prophetic and priestly interests. It has been called "Prophecy within the law." Generally the prophets exhibit little interest in sacrifices and ceremonial laws, preferring to stress the more inward aspects of religious life. Malachi, however, sees the people's apostasy manifested by their carelessness in the sacrificial offerings (1:6-14), the priests' neglect of their duties (2:1-9), and the failure of the people to pay their tithes and other offerings (3:7-12). This book is thus an antidote to the view commonly held today that the prophets did not believe in the necessity of the ritual law. They accepted the sacrificial system, but frequently protested against its abuse due to the people's failure to apprehend the necessity of inward faith and outward moral righteousness in addition to ritual cleanness.

3. The growing OT Messianic expectation is witnessed to in the announcement of God's "messenger of the covenant" by whose coming Israel will be purified and judged (3:1-5; cf. Matt. 11:10), and of the Prophet Elijah who will announce the day of the Lord (4:5,6; cf. Matt. 17:9-13).

J.B.G.

MALCHAM, MALCAM (măl'kăm, Heb. malkām), in Zephaniah 1:5 supposed to refer to Milcom, an idol of the Moabites and Ammonites. But the same form in Amos 1:15 is translated their king. In Jeremiah 49:1 (ASV) it may also mean "their king," but in vs. 3 it means the idol.

MALCHIAH, MALCHIJAH (măl-kī'à, măl-kī'jà, Heb. malkîyâh [Jer. 38:6 only malkîâ] my king is Jehovah). 1. A Gershonite, the ancestor of Asaph the singer in David's time (I Chron. 6:40).

2. An ancestor of the priest Adaiah who returned from exile and lived in Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:12).

3. A priest of David's time to whom was assigned the fifth lot of service (I Chron. 24:9).

4. An Israelite in the family of Parosh who had married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:25).

5. Another in the same family who did the same (Ezra 10:25).

6. A member of the family of Harin who was guilty of the same practice (Ezra 10:31).

7. A son of Harim who worked on the wall (Neh. 3:11), possibly the same as No. 6.

8. The son of Rechab, who repaired the dung gate of the wall (Neh. 3:14).

9. A goldsmith who worked on the wall (Neh. 3:31).

10. One of the men who stood on the left side of Ezra as he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4).

11. One of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:3).

12. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:42). May be same as No. 11.

13. Father of Pashur, messenger of the King Zedekiah to Jeremiah (Jer. 21:1) and who helped arrest the prophet (Jer. 38:1).

14. The son of King Zedekiah, and the owner of the dungeon into which Jeremiah was put (Jer. 38:6).

MALCHIEL (măl'kĭ-ĕl, Heb. malkî'ēl, God is my king), son of Beriah, son of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45; I Chron. 7:31).

MALCHIJAH (See Malchiah)

MALCHIRAM (măl-kī'răm, Heb. malkîrām, my king is high), son of Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:18).

MALCHI-SHUA (măl-kĭ-shōō'à, Heb. malkîshûa', king of aid), third son of King Saul (I Sam. 14:49; 31:2 [KJV Melchi-shua]; I Chron. 8:33; 9:39), killed by the Philistines (I Sam. 31:2; I Chron. 10:2).

MALCHUS (măl'kŭs, Gr. Málchos), a servant of the high priest whose ear Peter cut off with a sword during Christ's arrest (John 18:10).

MALEFACTOR (măl'ĕ-făk'tĕr, Gr. kakopoiós, evil doer), the term by which the Jewish leaders described Christ to Pilate (John 18:30). (ASV has "evil doer" here). Kakoúrgos, malefactor, the designation of the two thieves who were crucified with Christ (Luke 23:32,33,39).

MALELEEL (See Mahaleel)

MALLOTHI (măl'ō-thī, Heb. mallôthî, I have uttered), one of the sons of Heman, who with their father praised God with musical instruments. To him fell the 19th lot (I Chron. 25:4,26).

MALLOW (See Plants)

MALLUCH (măl'lŭk, Heb. mallûkh, counselor).

1. Ancestor of Ethan, a Levite, son of Merari (I Chron. 6:44).

2. Son of Bani, one of the men who married foreign women (Ezra 10:29).

3. Son of Harim, another man who took a foreign wife (Ezra 10:32).

4. A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:4). He had come from Babylon under Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:2).

5. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:27).

MALTA (See Melita)

MAMMON (măm'ŭn, Gr. mamonás, riches), the Aramaic word for "riches." Christ used it as a life-goal opposed to God (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:13). Jesus also employed the word in the phrase "mammon of unrighteousness" (meaning "money") in commenting on His parable of the unjust steward (Luke 16:11,13).

MAMRE (măm'rē, Heb. mamrē', strength). 1. An Amorite who was confederate with Abram (Gen. 14:13,24).

2. A place a few miles N of Hebron where oak trees grew. Abram dwelt by the "Oaks of Mamre" (KJV "plains of Mamre") (Gen. 13:18; 18:1). This place apparently derived its name from the Amorite above who lived there. The burial cave in the field of Machpelah is described as located before Mamre (Gen. 23:17,19; 25:9; 35:27; 49:30; 50:13). The modern name of the site is Ramet el-Khalil.

These impressive ruins, at Ramet el-Khalil (Mamre), may date back and mark the site of the dwelling of the patriarch Abraham when he lived under the oaks at Mamre. © MPS

MAN (Heb. 'ādhām, 'ish, 'ēnôsh, gibbôr, Gr. anér, ánthropos). The English word "man" occurs in the Bible over 3000 times, represented chiefly in the original text by the five terms given above. The basic meaning of these words for "man" is different in each case, but many times they seemed to be used somewhat indiscriminately. 'Ādām comes from the word 'ādāmâh (ground, or earth); it means man as being of the earth, a human being. It occurs 460 times in the meaning of "man." It also means "red" or "ruddy." It is used to contrast man and God, "God created man in his own image" (Gen. 1:27). God said "no man shall see me and live" (Exod. 33:20); in the sense of a human being, "Man that is born of a woman is of few days and full of trouble" (Job. 14:1); "Cease ye from man whose breath is in his nostrils" (Isa. 2:22). 'Ish is the most common word for "man" in the Old Testament. It occurs over 2000 times, meaning a man, a husband, an individual. "Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother and shall cleave unto his wife" (Gen. 2:24); "every man and woman whose heart made them willing" (Exod. 35:29); as an individual, "O deliver me from the deceitful man" (Ps. 43:1); "a man that hath friends must show himself friendly" (Prov. 18:24). 'Ēnôsh occurs most frequently (480 times) in plural form 'anashîm, as the plural of 'ish. In the singular form it emphasizes the inferiority or insignificance of man. It is chiefly found in the poetic books: "What is man that thou art mindful of him?" (Ps. 8:4); "as for man his days are as grass" (Ps. 103:15). Gibbôr means a mighty man, a hero. In its several forms it occurs over 150 times: "Gird up thy loins now like a man" (Job 38:3); "Go now ye that are men and serve the Lord" (Exod. 10:11); "a man's enemies are of his own house" (Micah 7:6).

A few other words are used a few times for "man"; bēn, son; ba'al, owner or master; zākār, male person; nephesh, soul; and 'āhād, one. In the NT anér means a man as opposed to woman; a husband. It is used over 200 times: "but the woman is the glory of the man" (I Cor. 11:7); "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife?" (Mark 10:2). Ánthropos is the common word for man in the New Testament, occurring over 550 times. It denotes a human being, man in the sense of a person: "Man shall not live by bread alone" (Matt. 4:4); "Blessed are ye when men shall hate you" (Luke 6:22); "he knew what was in man" (John 2:25). A few other Greek words are used sometimes for man: tis means someone, a certain one, it is used quite frequently; árrhen, male; ársen, male, and téleios, fully grown.

Paul, in his epistles, used certain terms to denote the spiritual condition of various persons. Old man (palaiós ánthropos) is the fleshly nature of a regenerated person (Rom. 6:6; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9). New man (kaínos ánthropos) denotes the spiritual nature of the regenerated individual (Eph. 2:15; 4:24). Natural man (psychikós ánthropos) means the man who has only natural life, an unregenerated man (I Cor. 2:14). Inner man (éso ánthropos) is the man within, the soul (Rom. 7:22; Eph. 3:16). Outward man (éxo ánthropos) means the man outside, that is, the body (II Cor. 4:16).

Man was brought into existence through creation by God (Gen. 1:27). His body is made of the dust of the ground and his soul of the breath of God (Gen. 2:7). Man is thus a soul with a body. Man also has a spirit (I Cor. 2:11), the moral nature which makes man religious, and gives him a conscience.

Science teaches, as does the Bible, that man is a single species (see Acts 17:26). He was created in God's image (Gen. 1:27). This likeness to the divine is personality plus the moral nature. Though man has a physical body similar to animals, his intellectual power and religious aspirations set him far above the beasts. Adam was created God-centered in his outlook. When he sinned, he became self-centered; the moral nature was perverted. So men ever since the fall of Adam have served themselves and practiced a corrupt religion. Redemption through faith in the blood of Christ turns the soul to be God-centered again and brings new life to the moral nature (II Cor. 5:17). C.E.H.

MAN OF SIN (See Antichrist)

MAN, SON OF (Heb. ben 'ādhām, Gr. ho huios toú anthrópou). This phrase was used once by the Lord in addressing Daniel (Dan. 8:17) and over 80 times in addressing Ezekiel. This name is confined to these two prophets. There must have been a special reason for its use with them. Both of them were privileged to behold visions of God. Probably the Lord wanted to emphasize to them that they were, after all, only men of the earth, in spite of this privilege.

Daniel used this phrase to describe a personage whom he saw in a night vision. He beheld one like unto "a son of man" who received an everlasting kingdom with great glory (Dan. 7:13,14). The individual so described can only be Jesus Christ. The phrase "a son of man" means that this personage whom Daniel saw looked like a human being.

When the Son of God came down to earth as a man, mingling with people, He very significantly took this phrase as His designation of Himself. Often He put His statements about Himself into the third person form to give His teachings more force. Whenever He did this He used this phrase as a name for Himself. No doubt He took it from Daniel's prophecy. The Jews must have been familiar with this prophecy. Jesus, in assuming this title, was saying to the Jews, "I am the Son of man in that prophecy." This title emphasized His union with mankind. It was also a name no one would criticize. Christ could not call Himself the Son of God, or the Messiah. The Jews would not accept Him as such. But they did not object to the term, the Son of Man. But no one else ever called Him by that name.

Once this phrase occurs without the definite article simply "a son of man" (John 5:27 ASV). Jesus made the statement that He had been given authority to execute judgment because He was a son of man. That is, because of His experience as a man, living among men, He was qualified to judge man. C.E.H.

MANAEN (măn'ā-ĕn, Gr. Manaén, the Gr. form of the Heb. Menahem, comforter), a leader in the church at Antioch (Acts 13:1). He is designated as the foster-brother of Herod the tetrarch (Herod Antipas).

MANAHATH (măn'ā-hăth, Heb. mānahath, resting place). 1. An Edomite, the son of Shobal (Gen. 36:23; I Chron. 1:40).

2. A town in Edom, site unknown (I Chron. 8:6).

MANAHETHITES (mā-nā'hăth-īts, Heb. mānahtî). 1. Half of the Manahethites, (ASV has "half of the Menuhoth"), a Judean clan, descendants of Shobal, son of Caleb, the son of Hur (I Chron. 2:52).

2. Another group, "half of the Manhethites," descended from Salma, son of Caleb, the son of Hur (I Chron. 2:54). ASV Manahathites.

MANASSEH (mă-năs'sĕ, Heb. menashsheh, one who forgets). 1. The elder son of Joseph, born in Egypt (Gen. 41:51). Jacob claimed him and his younger brother Ephraim for his own sons, and when he blessed them he predicted Ephraim would be greater than Manasseh (Gen. 48:5,19). Manasseh had a son, Machir, and his descendants made up the tribe of Manasseh. According to I Chronicles 7:14 Manasseh also had another son, Asriel. But in Numbers 26:30 Asriel and his descendants are listed with the sons of Gilead, son of Machir. So probably I Chronicles 7:14 means Asriel was Manasseh's grandson.

2. King of Judah, and son of Hezekiah. He was only 12 years old when he came to the throne in 687 B.C. Evidently after the death of his father the orthodox party was considerably weakened. The group in power around the new king were for doing away with the religious reforms Hezekiah had made. Manasseh was too young to hinder them. He went along with them. No doubt the people had resented being deprived of the high places, and they rebuilt them the first chance they had after Hezekiah's death. But Manasseh went way beyond this restoration. Judah was a vassal of Assyria, and paid tribute every year. The young king must have been much more impressed by the power of Assyria than by the power of God. He became a fanatical idolater, bringing a whole host of heathen practices into his realm. He built altars to Baal, and made a symbol of Asherah. He worshiped and served the host of heaven—sun, moon, stars, and planets. He built altars to them in the courts of the temple. He also put a heathen altar in the temple, and later moved the Asherah symbol into this building which had been dedicated to the true God of Israel (II Kings 21:1-7). He also had horses and chariots given to the sun (II Kings 23:11).

Much of this idolatry came from Assyria and Babylon where there was widespread worship of the heavenly bodies. Heathen practices expressly forbidden were introduced into Judah by Manasseh. He made his son pass through the fire, which probably means he sacrificed him to Moloch the god of the Ammonites; he practiced soothsaying; he used enchantments or observed omens; he indulged in sorcery; he sponsored ghosts and familiar spirits, that is persons in touch with the spirit world (II Kings 21:6; II Chron. 33:6). He persecuted the pious people who were faithful to the Jehovah, the true God (II Kings 21:6). Jewish traditions says he sawed the prophet Isaiah asunder. All this evil influence set loose in Judah sealed her fate. The subsequent reformation of Josiah could not bring the people back to true worship again. Manasseh brought his country to ruin (Jer. 15:4).

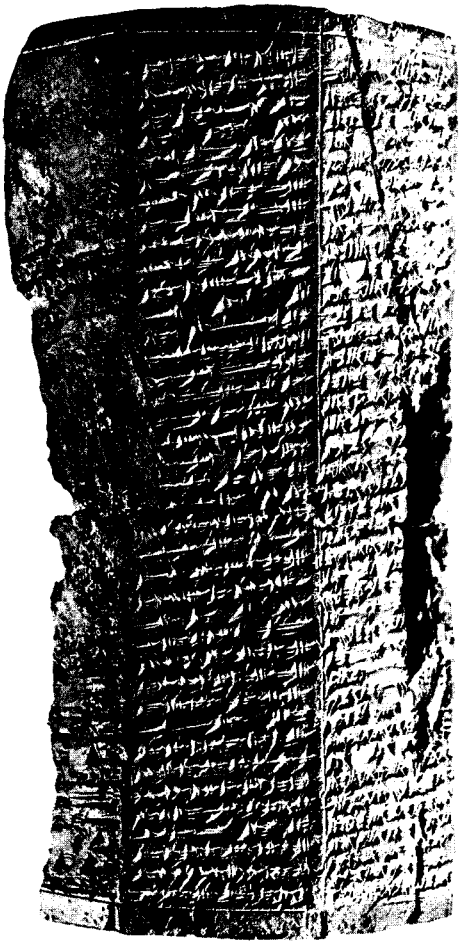
As a vassal of Assyria this king must have been suspected of disloyalty because he was taken captive by the king of Assyria and carried to Babylon. After a time he was returned to his throne in Jerusalem again, and repented of his sins and tried to undo his evil work (II Chron. 33:10-13, 15-17). He also did some building (vs. 14).

Many critics refuse to believe that this episode in the life of Manasseh could be true. If he actually had been taken captive to Babylon he would never have been sent back, and someone else would have reigned in his place. But in the Assyrian records is a report of Necho, an Egyptian king who was carried captive to Nineveh and later sent back to his throne by Ashurbanipal (Rassam Cylinder, Column II, lines 5-19). This incident, which all critics accept, is almost a parallel case to Manasseh's experience. The Assyrian king could find no one else to take his place and made him swear to remain loyal to Assyria. Other Assyrian inscriptions prove Judah paid tribute to Assyria during Manasseh's reign. He is mentioned by name in them (Prism of Esar-haddon, Col. V 54-VI 1 and Cylinder C of Ashurbanipal Col. 1 lines 23-50). All these inscriptions mentioned are translated in Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, Rassam Cylinder on page 295, Prism B of Esarhaddon on page 291, and Cylinder C of Ashurbanipal on page 294.

3. An intentional change of the name Moses (Judg. 18:30). Someone named Moses was priest of a brazen image at Dan, and since it was thought a disgrace for one with so honored a name to be guilty of such sacrilege, someone changed the name to Manasseh. This was easily done in Hebrew by the insertion of one letter in the name of Moses.

4. One of those who married foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

5. Another of those who married foreign wives (Ezra 10:33).



The prism of Esar-haddon, King of Assyria, which contains historical records, including mention of Manasseh's captivity and tribute. UMP

MANASSEH, TRIBE OF, the descendants of Manasseh. This tribe contained 32,200 men of war, those over 20 years old, (Num. 1:34) before the Israelites marched from Sinai. When the tabernacle was finished and dedicated, each tribe through its leader presented an offering. Gamaliel, the son of Pedahzur, offered on the eighth day for Manasseh (Num. 7:54). In the order of march where the three sections of the Levites intermingled with the other tribes, Manasseh came in the 11th place (Num. 10:23). In the layout of the camp Manasseh was on the W side in the third division (Num. 2:20). Forty years later the new generation in Manasseh numbered 52,700 men of war (Num. 26:34). Before the Israelites crossed over the Jordan river into Canaan, half the tribe of Manasseh along with the tribes of Reuben and Gad chose land E of the river and Moses assigned it to them (Num. 32:33). The descendants of Machir, son of Manasseh, conquered Gilead and lived there. Jair also captured other towns (Num. 32: 39-41). The half tribe of Manasseh was given the north half of Gilead, all of Bashan, and the region of Argob (Deut. 3:13). This territory included 60 cities among which were Gilead, Ashtaroth and Edrei (Josh. 13:31). The rest of the tribe was given ten parts of land in Canaan including areas for Zelophehad's daughters (Josh. 17:1-6). This territory was situated between Ephraim on the S and Asher, Zebulon, and Issachar on the N. Its eastern border was the Jordan river and on the W was the Mediterranean Sea (Josh. 17:7-10). Golan in the half tribe E of the Jordan was selected as one of the cities of refuge (Josh. 20:8). E of the river 13 cities of Manasseh were assigned to the Gershonites of the Levites, and W Manasseh furnished ten cities to the Kohathites of the Levites (Josh. 21:5,6). W Manasseh failed to drive the Canaanites out of the towns (Judg. 1:27). Gideon was of the tribe of Manasseh (Judg. 6:15), also Jair the Gileadite who judged Israel 22 years (Judg. 10:3). Jephthah came from Gilead in E Manasseh (Judg. 11:1). This half tribe, with Reuben and Gad, fell into idolatry and was later carried away into captivity by Assyria (I Chron. 5:25, 26) during Pekah's reign over Israel (II Kings 15: 29).

Manasseh joined David while he was a fugitive from Saul (I Chron. 12:19-22). When David was made king at Hebron, W Manasseh furnished 18,000 soldiers, and E Manasseh with Reuben and Gad 120,000 (I Chron. 12:31,37). People from W Manasseh and Ephraim joined with Judah in making a covenant to seek Jehovah during the reign of Asa, king of Judah (I Chron. 15:9-15). Certain pious souls from W Manasseh joined in the passover service during Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 30:10-22). When Josiah was king he destroyed idols and purged altars in Manasseh's territory as well as elsewhere (II Chron. 34:6). The people of Manasseh contributed to an offering for the repairing of the temple in Josiah's time (II Chron. 34:9). C.E.H.

MANASSES (See Manasseh)

MANASSITES (mȧ-năs'īts, Heb. menashshî, forgetting), descendants of the oldest son of Joseph (Gen. 41:51). A tribe of noble standing which Gilead, under Jephtha, delivered from the Ephraimites by the password Shibboleth" (Judg. 12:4-6). Moses gave them a city of refuge in Bashan (Deut. 4:41-43). Because of evil under Jehu, God caused the Manassites to be cut off (II Kings 10: 31-33).

MANEH (See Weights and Measures)

MANGER (Gr. phátne, a stall). The word was made notable by Luke's account of the birth of Jesus. The LXX used phátnē for the Hebrew which is given in II Chronicles 32:28 as stall and in Job 39:9 as crib (see Prov. 14:4 and Isa. 1:3). Luke alone gives phatnē as the birthplace of Jesus. Justin Martyr wrote about 100 A.D. that the stall was in a cave adjoining an inn. The cavern was used for livestock. Since Justin lived only 40 miles from Bethlehem, his word may be reliable. It is more probable that stalls were arranged around a courtyard of an inn with guests rooms and balcony above. Either kind of stall would have provided privacy for Mary and the cradle for the infant Lord.

MANNA (Heb. mān, Gr. mánna), a special food provided for the Hebrews during the exodus from Egypt. The name is of uncertain meaning. The Heb. man is a question and added to hu would be "What is it?" On the other hand it may be an adaptation of the Egyptian mennu, food. Josephus and other ancient writers attribute the name to the question "Is it food?" which is in keeping with the wilderness setting. Just what it was has puzzled naturalists for ages. It came at night, resembling hoar frost, coming with the dew (Num. 11: 9), and may have collected in dewdrops (Exod. 16:4). It was white, of delicious flavor, and resembled seed of the coriander, a plant of the eastern Mediterranean area which was both tasty and nourishing (Exod. 16:31). That it came by miraculous means is shown by its nature, its time of coming, and its preservation over the sabbaths (Exod. 16:20-26; Deut. 8:3). Being seed-like in form it had to be ground (Num. 11:7,8). As soon as other food was available, the manna ceased (Josh. 5:12).

While many attempts have been made to explain the manna as a natural phenomenon, ancient Hebrew scholars knew it to be of supernatural origin (Wisd. 17:20). No known substance meets the description of this food. A tamarisk plant grows along the route of the Hebrews from Sinai, that exudes a sweet liquid which collects at night upon twigs and falls to the ground. After sunrise it disappears unless protected. But this plant produces the food for only a brief period each year. Other naturalists would identify it with a peculiar mossy plant which, when mature, is ground and mixed with honey. It, however, is not available for the entire year.

The Bible makes it certain that manna came as a temporary provision for the chosen people. The poet Asaph called it "corn from heaven" (Ps. 78:24). It was also bread from heaven (Ps. 105:40). Hebrew writers called it "angels' bread" (II Esd. 2:1; Wisd. 16:20). Jesus referring to Himself, used it as a metaphor (John 6:31-63). John called it spiritual food, meaning a hidden agent for spiritual sustenance for the risen saints (Rev. 2:17). J.D.F.

MANOAH (mȧ-nō'ȧ, Heb. mānôah, rest), the father of Samson. Little is known about him except from the record in Judges 13, which states that he was of the tribe of Dan and was a good Hebrew who desired a son and heir. The appeal of his wife was answered by a visiting angel whose promise of a son was confirmed by a miracle during a sacrifice. He was a trustworthy parent, rearing Samson according to instructions. But he failed as a father so to indoctrinate his son as to make the idea of marrying a heathen woman abhorrent (Judges 14:1-11).

MANSIONS (Gr. moné, an abiding place), an expression that occurs only in John 14:2, where the plural is used. It is correctly rendered "abiding places," the plural form denoting the great extent of God's house as shown in Revelation 2:1.

MANSLAYER (Heb. meratstsēah, Gr. androphónos), a term used to describe a person who had killed another human being, whether by premeditation or accidentally or justifiably. Among the Israelites a manslayer could flee from an avenger of blood by taking asylum in a city of refuge (Num. 35:6,12) if the killing was not deliberate. There he was given a trial. If he was acquitted, he could stay in the city of refuge until the death of the high priest, after which he could return home (Num. 35:28). A deliberate murderer could find no protection in a city of refuge. If he tried it, he was immediately put to death (Exod. 21:14).

MANTLE, usually a large, sleeveless, outer garment, such as Elijah's (I Kings 19:18,19; II Kings 2:8,13,14), or such a garment with sleeves (Isa. 3:22).

MANUSCRIPTS, DEAD SEA (See Dead Sea Scrolls)

MAOCH (mā'ŏk, Heb. mā'ôkh, a poor one), father of Achish, a king of Gath (I Sam. 27:2). He protected David and his troop from Saul (I Sam. 29: 1-11).

MAON (mā'ŏn, Heb. mā'ôn, habitation). 1. A descendant of Caleb and father of Beth-zur, or perhaps the founder of this fortress near Bethlehem (I Chron. 2:42-45).

2. A town on an elevated plain south of Hebron. Around it lay an unpopulated region where David found refuge from Saul until the Philistines forced the king to cease pursuit. Because of this rescue, the hill was called Rock of Separation (I Sam. 23: 24-28, marg.). It was the home of Nabal and Abigail (I Sam. 25:1-3).

MAONITES (mā'ŏn-īts). Confusion exists regarding these enemies of Israel. They are named with others who were defeated by the Lord (Judg. 10: 11,12). They were called Mehunim and may have been from Arabia. Their descendants were among the temple servants of Ezra's day (Ezra 2:50). They came, no doubt, from the Arabian peninsula and were called Maonites because they grew strong on the Maon Plain.

MARA (mȧ'rȧ, Heb. mārâh, bitter), a name adopted by Naomi instead of her own, which meant pleasant or delightful (Ruth 1:20, marg.).

MARAH (mā'rȧ, Heb. mārâh, bitterness), a place about three days' journey from the Red Sea crossing, where the Hebrews found bitter water. When they complained, God showed Moses a plant whose foliage sweetened the water (Exod. 15:23-26).

MARALAH (măr'ȧ-lȧ, Heb. mar'ălâh), a city on the border of Zebulun's heritage (Josh. 19:10,11), about four miles from Nazareth. The location is not definitely known.

MARANATHA (măr'ȧ-năth'ȧ, Aramaic, mārānā' 'āthāh, our Lord comes!), an expression of greeting and encouragement as well as of triumphant faith, such as is shown in I Corinthians 16:22 RSV margin. That is to say, "Our Lord comes, regardless of man's enmity!" Paul put this word over against anathema (the curse) which befalls idolaters.

MARBLE (See Minerals)

MARCUS (mär'kŭs, Gr. Márkos), Roman name of a kinsman of Barnabas. He deserted Paul (Acts 13: 13) and later became a noted Christian worker (Acts 15:39; II Tim. 4:11).

MARESHAH (mȧ-rē'shȧ, Heb. mārēshâh, a possession). 1. The father of Hebron (I Chron. 2:42).

2. A grandson of Judah, more probably a town (I Chron. 4:21).

3. An important city of Judah, SW of Jerusalem (Josh. 15:44) which Rehoboam considered strategic and fortified (II Chron. 11:5-12). Good King Asa met a big Ethiopian army at Mareshah in the Valley of Zephathah and with divine aid overwhelmed it (II Chron. 14:9-15). Eliezer, a native of M. delivered a warning from God to wicked King Jehoshaphat for an unholy alliance with Ahaziah (II Chron. 20:35-37). It was a goodly city in Micah's day and he promised its people an heir (Mic. 1:15). Little of its record is found in the Bible. During the Maccabean period it was ravished by Judas Maccabeus (Jos. Ant. XII:8, 6). Hycranus, high priest about 130 B.C., captured it and compelled its citizens to adopt Jewish laws and customs (Ant. XII:9,1; X:2). It was strong enough to win special favors from Pompey (Ant. XIV:4,4), but when the Parthians invaded Judea, 40 B.C., the city fell and was destroyed. Discovery of some elaborate tombs about a mile S of modern Beit Jibrin confirmed the belief that El Sandagannah is its location.

MARI, an ancient city of the Euphrates Valley, discovered in 1933 as a result of work by grave diggers who uncovered a great statue. Excavations under the direction of André Parrot of the Louvre Museum resulted in rich finds, including some 20,000 cuneiform tablets, translation of which has opened up new vistas into ancient Syrian civilization. The Mari kingdom was contemporary with Hammurabi of Babylon and the Amorite tribes of Canaan, ancestors of the Hebrews. They worshiped Ishtar, whose images, like those of Diana of the Ephesians (Acts 19:21-29), were numerous. Dagan, "king of the Country" was the chief male god. A palace, covering more than six acres has been partly exhumed from centuries-old layers of sand and rubble. It was built of mud brick, but so well constructed that some walls 15 feet high remain intact, while pottery drains are usable. Even baths were provided. The cuneiform of some tablets shows a close relationship to that of Ur of the Chaldees of Abraham's day. Some of them contain correspondence with Hammurabi. Much material remains to be deciphered and translated. It is expected that reliable information about the Amorites will be discovered. Falling a victim to the wiles of Hammurabi, the country was destroyed in the 32nd year of his reign.

MARK, a word is used in the KJV to translate words of varied meanings: (1) 'Ôth, a special sign, a special brand. The 'ôth of Cain (Gen. 4:15) is considered a brand of infamy, but was more probably a sign of the covenant to be protected against avengers. The marks which Paul bore were scars (stigmata) caused by the beatings which he had suffered (Gal. 6:17). (2) Tāu', a seal or sign of ownership. Ezekiel saw this symbol put upon the foreheads of a special people (9:4,6). In a similar way, the redeemed are to be protected in the last days (Rev. 7:2-8). Tāw appears in Job 31:35 and is rendered "signature" in the RSV. The illiterate man still makes his "mark" as a signature. (3) Mattārā', a target. Jonathan pretended to be shooting at a mattārā' (I Sam. 20:20). Job felt himself to be such a mark (16:12) and so did Jeremiah (Lam. 3:12). (4) Qa'aqa', a form of tattooing banned by the Lord (Lev. 19:28). (5) Skopós, a goal or end to be attained. Paul set his heart upon such a mark (Phil. 3:14). (6) Cháragma, a particular brand or characteristic, denoting the nature and rank of men. This mark of the beast is physical (Rev. 13:16). J.D.F.

MARK, JOHN (Gr. Márkos, from Lat. marcus, a large hammer; Gr. Ioánnes, from Heb. Yôhānān, Jehovah is gracious), mentioned by name ten times in the New Testament. John was his Jewish name, Mark (Marcus) his Roman. In Acts he is twice 13:5,13) referred to simply as John, once (15:39) as Mark, and three times (12:12,25; 15:37) as "John, whose surname was Mark." In the epistles he is uniformly (four times) called simply Mark ("Marcus" three times in KJV).

The first allusion to John Mark may be in Mark 14:51,52. The most reasonable explanation for the passing mention of this incident is that it was a vivid personal memory in the mind of the author of the second Gospel.

The first definite reference is Acts 12:12. Peter, when delivered from prison, went to the home of John Mark's mother, where many believers were praying for him. When Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch from their famine visit at Jerusalem (Acts 11:27-30), they took along John Mark (Acts 12:25). This opened the opportunity for him to accompany them on their first missionary journey as an "attendant" (Acts 13:5, ASV).

The missionaries first evangelized the island of Cyprus. When they reached Perga in Pamphylia John returned home to Jerusalem. This decision was probably due to a mixture of homesickness, fear of perils in the mountainous country ahead, and displeasure that Paul had become the leader of the expedition (Acts 13:13, "Paul and his company"). Whatever his motive, Paul distrusted him and refused to take him on the second journey (Acts 15:37,38). The result was two missionary parties. Barnabas took Mark and revisited Cyprus, while Paul chose a new associate, Silas, and went overland to Asia Minor.

Mark next appears in Rome, where he is a fellow worker with Paul (Philem. 24). He is recommended by the apostle to the church at Colosse (Col. 4:10). Here he is called "sister's son to Barnabas" (KJV), but the proper sense of anepsios is "cousin" (ASV, RSV). That John Mark had fully reinstated himself with Paul is shown by the latter's statement in II Timothy 4:11: — "Take Mark, and bring him with thee; for he is useful to me for ministering." Peter refers to him as "Marcus my son" (I Pet. 5:13). This may be a mere expression of affection, or it may indicate that Mark was converted under Peter's ministry.

An early tradition says that Mark founded the church in Alexandria, Egypt, but this is uncertain.

R.E.

MARK, GOSPEL OF, is the shortest of the four Gospels. In comparison with Matthew and Luke it contains relatively little of the teachings of Jesus and nothing at all about his birth and childhood. Starting with the ministry of John the Baptist, it comes immediately to the public ministry of Christ, ending with His death and resurrection.

Authorship. On two points the tradition of the early church is unanimous: the Second Gospel was written by Mark and presents the preaching of Peter. Papias (c. A.D. 140) is quoted by Eusebius as saying: "And John the presbyter also said this, Mark being the interpreter of Peter, whatsoever he recorded he wrote with great accuracy . . . he was in company with Peter, who gave him such instruction as was necessary, but not to give a history of our Lord's discourses" (Eccl. Hist., III, 39). This suggests that Mark has given us a summary of the message of Peter.

Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150) quotes Mark 3:17 as from "Peter's Memoirs." Irenaeus (c. A.D. 185) writes that after the departure (exodus) of Peter and Paul from Rome, "Mark the disciple and interpreter of Peter, also transmitted to us in writing what had been preached by Peter" (ibid., V, 8). Most scholars hold that "departure" means "death." Clement of Alexandria, however, affirms that the Gospel was written during Peter's lifetime. Here is his statement: "When Peter had proclaimed the word publicly at Rome, and declared the Gospel under the influence of the Spirit; as there was a great number present, they requested Mark . . . to reduce these things to writing, and that after composing the Gospel he gave it to those who requested it of him. Which when Peter understood, he directly neither hindered nor encouraged it" (ibid., VI, 14). In spite of this minor confusion the early Fathers, including specifically Tertullian (c. A.D. 200) and Origen (c. A.D. 230), unite in affirming that Mark's Gospel gives us the preaching of Peter. Such strong tradition can hardly be discounted, though some recent scholars have sought to do so. It may be remarked that the traditional authorship of the Second Gospel is accepted more universally today than is the case with any of the other three Gospels.

Date. Most scholars today place the writing of Mark between A.D. 65 and A.D. 70, shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem in the latter year (see B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels, p. 499; C. H. Dodd, About the Gospels, p. 13; Vincent Taylor, Mark, p. 32). Conservatives commonly hold to a date in the 50's. The early dating was supported by Adolph Harnack (Date of Acts and Synoptic Gospels, pp. 126-133), and has recently been reasserted by Samuel Cartledge (INT, IX [1955], 187). Of course, if one accepts the tradition that Mark wrote after Peter's death, the later date would have to be adopted.

Place of Writing. About this there is little question. From the early Church — with the exception of Chrysostom — to the present it has been held that Mark's Gospel was written at Rome. Several distinctive features point in this direction. Mark uses ten Latin words, some of which do not occur elsewhere in the New Testament. He explains Jewish customs because he is writing to Gentiles. To his Roman readers he presents Jesus as the mighty conqueror and the suffering Servant of the Lord. Because of this purpose no genealogy is given, nor infancy narratives. These are found only in Matthew and Luke.

Character. In addition to those just mentioned, there are three main characteristics of this Gospel. The first is rapidity of action. The narrative moves quickly from one event to the next. This probably reflects the impulsive personality of Peter. Over 40 times we find that Greek word euthys, translated (KJV) as "immediately," "straightway," "forthwith." As Vincent aptly says: "His narrative runs" (Word Studies, I, 160). The second characteristic is vividness of detail. Mark often includes details omitted by the other Synoptics that make the narrative more alive. He gives special attention to the looks and gestures of Jesus. The third characteristic is picturesqueness of description. Mark's is pre-eminently the pictorial Gospel. He describes, for instance, the five thousand sitting on the green grass in "ranks" (lit., flower beds). Peter evidently was impressed with the striking scene of the groups of people in brightly colored Oriental garments of red and yellow sitting on the green hillside, and Mark has preserved the picture for us.

Mark's is the Gospel of action. Only one long message of Jesus is recorded, the Olivet Discourse (chap. 13). Mark includes 18 miracles of Jesus, about the same number as Matthew or Luke. In contrast he has only four of the parables, compared with 18 in Matthew and 19 in Luke.

Content. The period of preparation (1:1-13) for Jesus' public ministry is described very briefly. It consists of three items: the ministry of John the Baptist (1:1-8), the baptism of Jesus (1:9-11), and the temptation of Jesus (1:12,13). After only 13 verses of introduction — in contrast to 76 in Matthew and 183 in Luke — Mark plunges immediately into the public ministry of the Master.

First comes the great Galilean ministry (1:14-9:50). This is commonly thought to have lasted about a year and a half. It may be divided into three sections. The first period (1:4-3:12) was a time of great popularity. Jesus called four fishermen to follow Him — and later Levi — and engaged in a vigorous healing ministry. This was the time when large crowds thronged about Him.

In the second period (3:13-7:23) He appointed the 12 apostles and opposition began to show itself. The Pharisees clashed with Jesus over questions about sabbath observance and ceremonial cleansing. He healed the Gadarene demoniac and the woman with the issue of blood and raised Jairus' daughter. He sent out the twelve and fed the five thousand.

In the third period (7:24-9:50) Jesus gave more attention to His disciples. Three times He is described as withdrawing from the crowd to teach the disciples. After Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi He began a new phase of teaching: predicting His passion.

The great Galilean ministry was followed by the briefer Perean ministry (10:1-52), and then by passion week (11:1-15:47) and the Resurrection (chap. 16).

Outline (Indicated under "Content").

Ending. A word must be said about the last 12 verses of Mark. The two oldest Greek manuscripts, Vaticanus and Sinaiticus (both fourth century), end the Gospel at 16:8. The usual ending in our English Bibles (16:9-20) is also omitted in the Sinaitic Syriac. The majority of scholars now agree that these last 12 verses are not a part of the original Gospel of Mark, although the matter is not settled conclusively.

Priority. Most scholars today favor the theory that Mark's Gospel was written first and was used by Matthew and Luke when they composed their Gospels. The fact is that about 95 per cent of Mark is found in Matthew and/or Luke. The freshness and vividness of Mark's language suggest it was written first. It should be noted, however, that this position is still being challenged.

Evaluation. In the early Church the Gospel of Mark received the least attention of any of the four. This is not true today. The importance of Mark as giving us the basic message of the primitive Church (cf. Acts 1:22; 2:22-24,36) is increasingly recognized. The theological, as well as historical, value of this Gospel is widely appreciated. It is the logical place to start one's study of the four Gospels. R.E.

MARKET (Heb. ma'ărāv, a place for trade). The term also means things traded, hence should be rendered in Ezekiel 27:13,17,19 as merchandise. The NT word is agorá, the civic center in which people gathered for recreation (Matt. 11:16,17), where the unemployed loafed (Matt. 20:3,6), and where the proud paraded (Mark 12:38; Luke 11:43). It was a courtroom (Acts 16:19) and also a forum (Acts 17:17). From a corner shop the market developed into a great urban multi-purpose center.

MAROTH (mā'rŏth, Heb. mārôth), a town probably in the plain W of Jerusalem. Her citizens waited for good when evil was dooming God's chosen ones (Mic. 1:12 RSV).

MARRIAGE is an intimate personal union to which a man and woman consent, consummated and continuously nourished by sexual intercourse, and perfected in a life-long partnership of mutual love and commitment. It is also a social institution regulated by the Word of God and by the laws and customs which a society develops to safeguard its own continuity and welfare.

Nature and Purpose. Marriage is an order of creation. The Creator made man and woman, displaying His full image only as both man and woman. Each is made for the other, their essential natures being complementary, and brought into oneness in marriage (Gen. 12:26f; Matt. 19:4-6).

Marriage is the sacrament of human society. Husband and wife both share and perpetuate their happiness in having and rearing a family within the sphere of their own love. Thus marriage is more than an end in itself; it is the means to ends outside the married couple. The unity of husband and wife is of God's creative will, for from Him come the love and grace which enable them to grow together in life comradeship, to beget children, and to fulfill their responsibilities toward their children and to society as a family unit. Husband and wife become one in relation to the community, so that through marriage a new social unit emerges.

Scripture itself says little about the purpose of marriage. The earliest creation narrative suggests unitive purpose ("one flesh"), while the second creation narrative suggests procreative ("be fruitful and multiply"). The NT mentions the unitive and analogical purpose, but not expressly the procreative. In the OT the procreative purpose is addressed once to mankind generally, three times to the patriarchs Noah and Jacob. This does not imply the procreative purpose is the chief end. The importance Jesus and Paul attach to Genesis 2:24 suggests that the establishment of the "one flesh" union is dominant. The great Pauline conception of marriage is unitive, the analogue of Christ's union with His church. Ephesians 5:25-33 is Paul's instruction on marriage, while I Corinthians 7 shows him as pastor-counselor in a specific situation where an improper marriage relation might endanger the Christian witness. Moreover, sexual intercourse has no exclusive connection with procreation, that being only its biological end. Intercourse implies the possibility of conception, the certainty of union in "one flesh."

Distinctly Christian marriage is one in which husband and wife covenant together with God and publicly witness their commitment not only to each other but together to Him, to the end that they shall in unity fulfill His purposes throughout life (I Cor. 7:39; cf. II Cor. 6:14). Marriage is contracted "in the Lord," received as a divine vocation, acknowledged with humility and thanksgiving, and sanctified by the Word of God and prayer (I Tim. 4:4-5).

Man is unique in that he can conceive of the future, and can relate the present to the future, even to the eternal. He lives in terms of a moral structure, and with meaningful interpersonal relations. He is the only creature that can have marriage instead of mating, for marriage involves commitment for the future and the confidence of permanence. Man also discerns his own loneliness and incompleteness (Gen. 2:18) and the possibility of the complementary nature of marriage, husband and wife each fulfilling that which is lacking in the other.

Sexual Fulfillment. Sex is holy, being the creation and gift of God. It is fulfilled only as regulated by the law of God in marriage. Man and woman were created to complement each other physically as in other ways, and to share together in God's creative process. Man alone can make sex moral, giving it a nonbiological meaning, and making it creative of personal and spiritual values. Thus man makes sex a function of the whole personality, combining it with love and fidelity. While sexuality alone permits the establishment of a relationship which is procreative, a couple's God-centered union permits them to establish a spiritually creative relationship through their sexuality. Human sexuality, then, has a dual purpose of communion and reproduction.

The exclusive sexual relation between husband and wife points to the exclusive commitment of total responsibility for each other. Sexual intercourse is an act of the whole self, a personal encounter. Spiritually, the act itself must be offered to God in intention and in thanksgiving, husband and wife acknowledging that God is the Author of their love. Sexual intimacy affords husband and wife a medium for mutual disclosures, the senses becoming a channel of communication for all that lies too deep for utterance and yet must somehow be told in order to fulfill the total mutuality of marriage. Such intercourse is pleasurable, not merely because there is sensual gratification, but because of what it expresses of the joyful oneness of husband and wife. While the sense of independence is diminished, that of individuality is fulfilled. The sexual communion speaks of a pervading possessiveness, each partner offering a precious gift to the other which has been exclusively preserved for that one alone.

The sexual union is sacramental in the sense that is an outward sign of an inner commitment of love which is recognized as a gift from God. The union is more than physical, for from it emerges a spiritual gift and knowledge. And it is not a mere fact of nature; hence man is not in bondage to it. Rather, sex is a divine gift within a divine vocation, marriage, and as such it is subject to man's freedom and moral responsibility toward God the Giver. Sexual intercourse is to be employed according to the purpose of the Giver. Such fulfillment is both the need and the right of husband and wife alike (I Cor. 7:4). It must be part of loving the other for what one is in himself, and for what their union means in its exclusiveness and permanence. It is a creative relationship through which a couple express the whole meaning and quality of their marriage.

Love and Fidelity. Marriage is the highest fulfillment of human friendship, filling every ideal of human intimacy and mutuality and loyalty. Sex and parenthood both can enrich marriage; neither is capable of sustaining marriage. Love alone gives meaning and inward validity to marriage and guarantees its integrity. Fidelity, not as an expression of obligation, but as an element of love, is necessary to successful marriage.

The requisite love is other-person centered, giving and renouncing for the sake of the well-being of the beloved rather than in expectation of return. It is expressed through service, not exploitation, and is the ground for the most meaningful sharing of which human personality is capable. Such love dissolves differences and barriers, while such identification does not destroy self but rather extends self in a new dimension. In love for Christ is to be found the bond of oneness, and the determinant of the quality and strength of love for each other. Forgiving love is a creative force within marriage, deriving its nature from the experience of Christ's forgiving love. It will act as mercy, i.e., forgiving when there seems no adequate reason to forgive, and as grace, i.e., freely given with no promises demanded. It is creative love, suffering to achieve a high spiritual end. Marriage is endowed with spiritual significance when each partner is enabled by love to transcend his own self-centeredness and identify himself with the well-being and concerns of the other.

More than love is the sense that marriage is a divine order which is binding. Fidelity truly exists when the feeling of love is absorbed into one's personal will. Commitment is twofold: to the beloved, and to the divine will. Indissolubility is the principle upon which one is free to commit himself unreservedly to the marriage, to share and to venture all with confidence of fulfillment.

Paul comprehends marriage obligations for the husband under the principle of love, its highest standard being the love of Christ for His Church (Col. 3:19; Eph. 5:25,28). Fidelity is required (I Cor. 6; I Thess. 4:3-7; Gal. 5:19; Heb. 13:4). Thus is established an openness of exchange in which there is no concealment nor sense of "thine and mine."

Equality of the wife is indicated in the creation narrative where she is called a "helpmeet" (Gen. 2:18). By contrast, the subordination of the wife is appropriate as punishment for her initiative in the original transgression (Gen. 3:16; I Cor. 11:9). The NT continues the concept with modifications. Complete mutuality is taught in Ephesians 5 and in I Corinthians 7:3. Spiritual dignity is equal. The wife's duties, however, are summed up not under the principle of love, but of obedience (Eph. 5:22; Col. 3:18; I Pet. 3:1). This subordination is that of responsibility and subsequently of authority. It is not that of compulsion or of fear, and originates in her freedom and in reciprocal love for her husband. She is subject to her husband as he himself is subject to Christ and rules her, not by self will, but as fulfilling the will of God. The husband will have the respect and subjection of his wife so long as she has his love and headship under Christ. His love creates its own response, even as the love of Christ creates a reciprocal love in the believer (I John 4:19).

Monogamy and Indissolubility. The total unity of persons in marriage, comprehended in the expression "one flesh," demands monogamy and indissolubility. One cannot relate in this way to more than one person at a time, nor with reserve as to the length of time. It is indissoluble as in the union between Christ and His church. It is monogamous as is the relationship of Christ to His one bride, the Church. Monogamy is represented in the prophets as symbolic of the union of God with Israel (Hos. 2:19; Jer. 3:14; 31:32; Isa. 54:5). In the NT the bridegroom is God in Christ (Matt. 9:15), the bride the spiritual Israel elect out of every nation (II Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:23-32; Rev. 19:7). Monogamy is consistent with Christ's Golden Rule, for under polygamy other men were robbed and wives degraded. Polygamy is represented in the prophets as having its counterpart in idolatry. It made its first appearance in the lawless line of the Cainites (Gen. 4:23). The backslidings and calamities in the reigns of David and Solomon are attributed to the polygamy practiced (II Sam. 5:13; I Kings 11:1-3; Deut. 17:7). Monogamous marriage best stabilizes the sexual impulse and transforms it into a creative energy which contributes to the spiritual and societal life of man, has the better power to "domesticate" the sexual desire and build it into the total structure of human existence and purpose, and best promotes the slow growth of mutual understanding and sympathy essential for mutual completion and fulfillment in marriage. It best fosters the security of the familial conditions necessary to maturation of children.

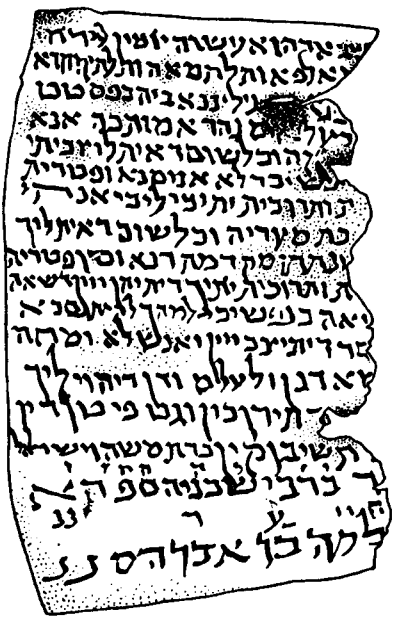
Divorce. The Lord's teaching on divorce (Matt. 5:31-32; 19:3-9; Mark 10:2-12; Luke 16:18) gives adultery as the sole reason a man may put away his wife. While Matthew suggests it is adultery on the wife's part only, Mark implies the same right belongs also to the woman. The Lord allowed, but did not make divorce mandatory. Throughout Scripture sin is characterized as spiritual adultery (Hos. 2:2; Jer. 3:9; 13:27), the essence consisting in difference to God, or even hatred of Him, and the giving of affection to others (Hos. 2:5; Jer. 2:20; Ezek. 20:30). Persistence entails the casting away, of which divorce is emblematic (Hos. 2:1f; Jer. 2:35f).

Divorce was granted on a bill of divorcement in OT times according to the Law (Deut. 24:1-2).



A Jewish bill of divorcement. DV

Remarriage was clearly acceptable. There was little else for a divorced woman to do. Jesus' statement in Matthew 5:31-32 that divorce is not to be allowed save for unchastity is not found in Mark. It does seem to indicate the principle that if a marriage is destroyed by unfaithfulness, it can not be further destroyed by divorce. Jesus was being put to the test by a group of hostile Jews who believed that only a woman could commit adultery, and Jesus there points out that a man can commit adultery too. He does not go further into the matter.

The Scriptures teach the higher law of forgiveness (Hosea) even for the repentant adulterer. Paul speaks in I Corinthians 7:10-15 of a specific case involving a mixed marriage. He states that should an unbelieving mate depart, the believer is not bound, the meaning of which is controversial. Some teach that Paul here allows for remarriage of the so-called innocent party. MARS HILL (Gr. Areios págos, Hill of Ares), a barren hill, 370 feet high, NW of the famous Acropolis in Athens. It was dedicated to Ares, the god of war. The elevated place became the seat of the Greek Council. Because of sudden interest in his message, Paul was taken there to clarify his mysterious teachings (Acts 17:16-34).

MARSH, swamp lands near the mouths of some rivers and at various places along the banks of the Jordan and of the Dead Sea. Cf. Ezek. 47:11.

MARTHA (mär'thà, Aram. lady, mistress), sister of Lazarus and Mary of Bethany. Luke mentions a visit of Jesus to the home of Martha at a certain village (10:38). It is inferred from this that the beloved friends of Jesus had resided in Galilee before going to Bethany. Another problem grows out of the connection between the name of Martha and that of Simon the Leper. Was Martha the widow of Simon? It is quite possible that she was and that the Bethany home had been inherited from him upon his death. Matthew 26:6-12 and Mark 14:3 may indicate this. It seems more natural to think of Martha as a near relative of Simon for whom she acted as hostess. The scriptural narrative reveals Jesus was an intimate friend of Martha, Mary, and Lazarus. The sisters knew of His ability to work miracles (John 11:3,5). He, no doubt, was a guest in their home during the last fateful days on earth (Matt. 21:17; Mark 11:1, 11). Martha was a careful hostess and was familiar enough with Jesus to complain to Him about her sister's conduct (Luke 10:38-42) and about His delay in coming when Lazarus was ill (John 11: 1-3,21). But she gave the Master an occasion for presenting the great statement about the resurrection, "I am the resurrection and the life" (John 11:25). J.D.F.

MARTYR (mär'tẽr, Gr. martús, martúr, witness). Because of its use in connection with Stephen (Acts 22:20) and others who died for Christ, the word came to mean one who paid the extreme price for fidelity to Christ. Antipas was a faithful witness (Rev. 2:13). The harlot, Babylon, was drunk with the blood of martyrs (Rev. 17:6).

MARY (mâr'ĭ, Gr. María, Mariam, from Heb. miryām). The name of at least five women in the NT.

1. Mary of Rome. A diligent worker in the church at Rome to whom Paul sent special greetings (Rom. 16:6).

2. The mother of John Mark. She lived in Jerusalem, where she had a house in which Christians met for prayer. It was to her home that Peter immediately went when he was miraculously released from prison by an angel (Acts 12:1-16). She may have been a woman of some means, as she had at least one servant, a girl named Rhoda (Acts 16:13). John Mark is described as being the cousin of Barnabas (Col. 4:10), but the exact relationship of Barnabas to Mary is unknown. Some scholars think the "upper room" in which Jesus observed the Lord's Supper was in her home, but there is no proof of this.

3. Mary of Bethany. The sister of Lazarus and Martha. She lived in Bethany (John 11:1), about a mile E of the Mount of Olives. Jesus commended her for being more interested in hearing Him than in providing a bounteous dinner (Luke 10:42). John relates that she joined with Martha in saying to Jesus after the death of Lazarus, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died" (11: 21). Afterward, a week before the last passover, when Jesus was a guest in the house of Simon the leper (Mark 14:3), she showed her devotion to Jesus by anointing His head and feet with costly ointment and wiping His feet with her hair (John 12:3). To those who complained of this as being wasteful, Jesus said that her act would always be remembered (Matt. 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9). Jesus looked upon what she did as being an act of love and as a preparation, though perhaps unintentional, of His coming death (John 12:7-8).

4. Mary the mother of James and Joses. Uncertainty exists regarding this Mary. There is reason for thinking that she, the "other Mary" of Matthew 27:61, and the wife of Clopas were the same person. Little is known about her except that she was very probably among the company of women who served Jesus in Galilee (Luke 8:2,3). She was at the cross when Jesus died (Matt. 27: 56; Mark 15:40). She witnessed the burial of her Lord (Mark 15:47), came to the tomb to anoint His body (Mark 16:1), and fled when told by the angel that Jesus was not in the tomb (Mark 16: 8). A comparison of Matthew 28:1, Mark 16:1, and Luke 24:10 seems to make it certain that the mother of James and Joses was also the wife of Clopas. That Clopas (Cleopas, Luke 24:18) and Alphaeus (Matt. 10:3) were the same has not been proved.

5. Mary Magdalene. Her name probably indicates that she came from Magdala, on the SW coast of the Sea of Galilee. After Jesus cast seven demons out of her (Mark 16:9; Luke 8:2), she became a devoted disciple of His. There is no real ground for thinking that she had been a woman of immoral life before Jesus healed her. The only ground for thinking so is the fact that the first mention of her (Luke 8:2) comes immediately after the story of the sinful woman who anointed Jesus (Luke 7:36-50). She followed the body of Jesus to the grave (Matt. 27:61) and was the first to learn of the resurrection (Matt. 28:1-8; Mark 16:9; Luke 24:1,10). Nothing is known of her life after Christ's resurrection. J.D.F.

MARY THE VIRGIN. All the authentic information we have about Mary the Virgin is found in the NT. In the opinion of many scholars she was descended from David, because she was told that her Son should receive "the throne of his father David," also because Christ is described as being of "the seed of David according to the flesh" (Acts 2:30; Rom. 1:3; II Tim. 2:8); and again because it is thought by many that Luke's genealogy of Christ is through His mother. She appears in the following passages: the infancy narratives (Matt. 1,2; Luke 1,2); the wedding at Cana of Galilee (John 2:1-11); the episode of Matthew 12:46; Mark 3:21,31ff; Luke 8:19-21; the incident at the cross (John 19:25ff); and the scene in the Upper Room (Acts 1:14).

1. Mary in the Infancy Narratives (Matt. 1,2; Luke 1,2). The source of these narratives is not known, but it is more than likely that they came from Mary herself. She lived into the apostolic period, whereas Joseph seems to have died before the crucifixion of Jesus, for there is no mention of him after the incident of Jesus in the temple when He was twelve, and she could very well have told the story to the early leaders of the church, including Luke. She was the "kinswoman" of Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist (Luke 1:36), but the exact nature of this relationship is uncertain. Luke tells the story of Jesus' birth from Mary's standpoint, describing her maidenly fears (1:26f), her humble submission to the will of God (1:38), her paean of praise to God for the favor accorded her in being the mother of the Messiah (1:39-55). Matthew, on the other hand tells the story from the standpoint of Joseph, describing his reaction when he found she was with child, his determination to protect her from shame and contumely as much as possible, his obedience to God's command that he marry Mary, his taking her and Jesus to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod. The two stories harmonize and dovetail perfectly.

Mary shows herself to be a woman with a quiet spirit, humble piety, self-control, and knowledge of the OT. She was not given to talking with others about the mysteries of her experience, but kept all these things hidden in her heart (Luke 2: 51). It is apparent that neither she nor Joseph fully understood her Son (Luke 2:50). In spite of their experiences with the supernatural in relation to Him, He was something of an enigma to them.

2. Mary at Cana of Galilee (John 2:1-11). In this episode Mary seems to have some intimation that Jesus possessed more than natural powers.

She may have needed some correction from Him regarding her notion about the use of those powers, but it is wrong to think that Jesus sharply rebuked her. It must be kept in mind that He actually did exercise His power by relieving an embarrassing situation, as she had suggested; and the word "woman" is the same word He used when on the cross He tenderly commended her to the beloved disciple (John 19:26). His words to her were a gentle suggestion that it was not for her or any other human being to determine His course of action, for that was entirely in the Father's hands.

3. The Episode of Matthew 12:46; Mark 3:21, 31ff; Luke 8:19-21. In this incident Jesus is informed, while teaching the multitudes, that His mother and brothers desire to see Him. The reason for this desire is not stated; but it appears from the context in Mark's account that they were concerned for His safety because of the bitter opposition of the authorities, who were accusing Him of casting out demons in the power of Beelzebub, and they wanted to induce Him to go into retirement for a time, until it was safe to teach in public again. Jesus' words, "For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother," are meant to teach that physical relationship to Him conveys no special privilege, no right of interference with Him, the same lesson that He taught on a later occasion, in Luke 11:27.

4. Mary at the Cross (John 19:25ff). In this incident we find Mary, who had come to Jerusalem for the Passover, watching with agony the crucifixion. Jesus shows His appreciation of the earthly filial relation by committing her to the trustworthy keeping of the apostle who was closest to Him.

5. The Scene in the Upper Room (Acts 1:14). After the resurrection and ascension of Jesus, Mary appears in the midst of the Christian community, engaged with them in prayer for the baptism of the Holy Spirit, but without any discernible preeminence among them. This is the last notice of her in Scripture. It is not known how or when she died.

After Mary's death many legends grew up around her name, but none of them are trustworthy. The craze for further particulars about her was partly satisfied by the writers of the Apocryphal Gospels. There is no direct evidence of prayer being offered to Mary during the first four centuries. Augustine was among the earliest of the Church Fathers who thought it possible that she had never committed actual sins, although he agreed that she shared the common corruption of humanity. This led eventually to the promulgation by the pope of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of Mary in 1854. About the middle of the fifth century some Christian leaders, wishing to exalt her, began to vie with one another in inventing new phrases in her honor. With the development of the idea that the celibate and virgin state is morally superior to the married state, it was suggested that she was a perpetual virgin and that the "brothers" and "sisters" of Jesus mentioned in the Gospels were not her children at all, but were either Joseph's children by a prior marriage or were the cousins of Jesus. In 1950 the pope declared the dogma of the Assumption of Mary, that is, that Mary's body did not decompose in the grave, but was reunited by God to her soul soon after she died. Roman Catholic theologians now openly refer to Mary as the "Co-creator" and the "Co-redemptrix" of the race. None of these post-apostolic developments have any support in Scripture. S.B.

MASCHIL (măs'kĭl, Heb. maskîl, attentive, intelligent), a Hebrew word found in the titles of Psalms 32; 42; 44; 45; 52; 53; 54; 55; 74; 78; 88; 89; 142. The meaning of the word is not certain, but it is usually taken to mean an instructive or meditative ode.

MASH (Heb. mash), a son of Aram and grandson of Shem (Gen. 10:22,23). Called "Meshech" in I Chronicles 1:17.

MASHAL (mā'shăl), a village in Asher (Josh. 19:26), assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 21:30). Called "Misheal" in Joshua 19:26, and "Mishal" in Joshua 21:30. It was probably located in the plain S of Acre, but its exact location is unknown.

MASON (See Occupations and Professions)

MASREKAH (măs'rē-kà, Heb. masrēqâh, perhaps, vineyard), a place mentioned in the list of kings that reigned in Edom "before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen. 36:31). It was the royal city of Samlah, son of Hadad (Gen. 36:36; I Chron. 1:47). Its locality is unknown.

MASSA (măs'à, burden), a tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; I Chron. 1:30). The marginal reading of the heading to Proverbs 31 refers to Lemuel as king of Massa, but the reading is doubtful. The tribe lived in the Arabian desert near the Persian Gulf.

MASSAH (măs'à, strife), name given to the site of the rock in Horeb from which Moses drew water for the rebellious Hebrews (Exod. 17:1-7; Deut. 6:16; 9:22). The name is connected with Meribah (Deut. 33:8).

MASTER, a term used to render a dozen Hebrew and Greek words in the Bible: (1) 'ādhôn, ruler, lord (Sir); often it denotes the master of a servant or slave (Gen. 24:9; 39:2; etc.); in the plural it usually is used only of God; (2) sar, prince, chief (I Chron. 15:27); (3) ba'al, owner (Exod. 22:8; Judg. 19:22; Isa. 1:3); (4) 'ûr (Mal. 2:12); (5) rav (Jonah 1:6; Dan. 1:3; etc.); (6) didáskalos, teacher (Matt. 8:19; 9:11; etc.); (7) despótes, sovereign master (I Tim. 6:1; II Tim. 2:21); (8) epistátes, overseer (Luke 5:5; 8:24; 45; etc.); (9) kathegetés, guide, leader (Matt. 23:10); (10) kúrios, lord, used frequently of God or of Christ (Matt. 1:20,24); (11) kubernétes, steersman, shipmaster (Acts 27:11); (12) rhabbí (Matt. 26:25,49).

MATHUSALA (See Methuselah)

MATRED (mā'trĕd, Heb. matredh, expulsion), the mother of Mehetabel, wife of king Hadar of Edom (Gen. 36:39), called Hadad in I Chronicles 1:50).

MATRI (mā'trī, Heb. matrî, rainy), head of a family of Benjamites from which Saul, son of Kish, was chosen by Samuel to be king of Israel (I Sam. 10:21).

MATTAN (măt'ăn, Heb. mattān, a gift). 1. A priest of Baal. He was among those who were slain under Jehoiada when Queen Athaliah had made Baal-worship supplant the worship of Jehovah (II Kings 11:1-18). Following the slaughter of Athaliah, a new order was begun (II Chron. 23:16f).

2. Another man named Mattan was among the conspirators who, incensed by the prophecies of Jeremiah, cast him into a filthy dungeon from which he was rescued by order of King Zedekiah (Jer. 38:1-28).

MATTANAH (măt'à-nà, Heb. mattānâh, a gift), the name of one of the camps of Israel while en route to Canaan, probably the site of a good well (Num. 21:18).

MATTANIAH (măt'ă-nī'ă, Heb. mattanyāhû, gift from Jehovah). This was a common name among the Hebrews; ten men who bore it are found in the OT record: 1. A brother of Jehoiachin's father whom Nebuchadnezzar set in Jehoiachin's place as king, changing the name to Zedekiah, which means Jehovah is mighty (II Kings 24:17).

2. A descendant of Asaph and chief choir leader (Neh. 11:17; 12:8). He was also a watchman over the storehouse (Neh. 12:25).

3. A Levite whose descendant, Jehazael, was inspired to help King Jehoshaphat battle against invaders from Moab (II Chron. 20:14).

4. Son of Elam.

5. A son of Zattu.

6. A son of Pahath-Moab.

7. A son of Bani, here as 4-7, one of those who had to put away alien wives (Ezra 10:26,27,30,37).

8. The grandfather of Hanan who was one of the Levites whom Nehemiah placed in charge of the Levitical storehouse (Neh. 13:10-13).

9. A son of Heman who was among the musicians whom David appointed to prophesy with instruments of music. He became head of the ninth group of Levites to whom was assigned this duty. There were 288 of these musicians, all skilled men (I Chron. 25:4,5,7,16).

10. A descendant of Asaph and one who helped Hezekiah restore the temple worship.

MATTATHA (See Mattathah)

MATTATHAH (măt'ă-thà, Heb. mattattâh, gift of Jehovah), a son of Hashum who was among the Israelites who put away pagan wives under Ezra (Ezra 10:33).

Matthew was a tax collector at Capernaum. © SPF

MATTATHIAS (măt'ă-thī'ăs, Gr. Mattathías, gift of Jehovah). 1. One of those who stood at Ezra's right hand as he read the law (Neh. 8:4).

2. The name borne by two ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:25,26).

3. A priest, founder of the Maccabee family (I Macc., ch. 2).

4. A captain in the army of Jonathan Maccabeus (I Macc. 11:70).

5. A son of Simon the high priest (I Macc. 16: 14-16).

6. An envoy sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabeus (II Macc. 14:19).

MATTENAI (măt'ē-nā'ī, mattenay, a gift from Jehovah). 1. A priest of the restoration who was among a special class called "heads of fathers" (Neh. 12:12-19).

2. Two priests under Ezra who were among the host who put away alien wives (Ezra 10:33,37).

MATTHAN (măt'hăn, Gr. Maththán, gift of God), grandfather of Joseph, Mary's husband (Matt. 1:15).

MATTHAT (măt'thăt, Gr. Matthát and Maththát, gift of God), two men in the ancestry of Jesus mentioned in the genealogy of Luke (Luke 3:24, 29).

MATTHEW (math'ū, Gr. Maththaíos), son of Alphaeus (Mark 2:14), a tax collector (telōnēs), also called Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27) whom Jesus met at the tax office and called to be one of His disciples (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). Since double names were common among the Jews, (e.g., Simon became Peter, Thomas was called Didymus, Bartholomew was probably also named Nathanael, and Saul became Paul), there can be little doubt that Levi and Matthew were one and the same person. Levi probably changed his name to Matthew ("gift of Yahweh," or if a late form of Amittai, "true") when he became a disciple of Jesus.

The readiness with which Matthew responded to Jesus' call seems to indicate that he had previously come into contact with Jesus and His teachings and had already decided to dedicate his life to His cause. That Jesus should have chosen a Jewish tax collector who was in the employ of the Roman government to become His disciple is indeed remarkable. Tax collectors were bitterly hated by their own countrymen and regarded as little more than quislings. However, Matthew's background and talents would be of great value to Jesus. As a tax collector he was skilled at writing and keeping records. In addition, he must have been a man of deep spiritual convictions. This is revealed by his concern for his former colleagues whom he invited to a dinner at his own house (Luke's account alone (5:29-32) makes it clear that it was Matthew's house, not Jesus'), Jesus being the honored guest. No doubt Matthew's purpose was to win these men to Christ. Apart from the mention of Matthew in the lists of the Apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Acts 1:13), no further notices of him are found in the NT.

W.W.W.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF, in the early Church Matthew was the most highly valued and widely read of the four Gospels. This is revealed both by its position in the canon — it is found in first place in all the known lists of the Gospels except two, — and by its widespread citation, for it is by far the most often quoted Gospel in the Christian literature before A.D. 180. Among the reasons for this popularity two are particularly important:

1. The Gospel's apostolic authority. Matthew's name was associated with it from at least the early second century.

2. Its emphasis on Christ's teaching. A growing church needed the authoritative word of Christ both to instruct converts and to refute heresy.

Authorship. The First Gospel, as is the case with the other three, is anonymous. Nevertheless, the Church, from the early second century until the rise of modern critical studies, unanimously ascribed it to Matthew, one of the Twelve (Matt. 9:9; 10:3; Mark 3:18; Acts 1:13), also called Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27), a tax collector by occupation. The results of source criticism, in particular the evident dependence of Matthew on Mark's Gospel, have led many, but by no means all, Biblical scholars (Of the older school the German Protestants T. Zahn and A. Schlatter, and more recently the Roman Catholic scholars B. C. Butler, and L. Vaganay, in addition to the Episcopalian, P. Parker, have defended the traditional view) to abandon the Matthaean authorship. Why would an eye witness to the life of Christ, as Matthew most certainly was, depend so heavily on Mark's account? On the other hand, how does one account for the early and unanimous tradition of Matthew's authorship? The answer of the consensus of modern Biblical scholarship is that the First Gospel was ascribed to Matthew, not because he wrote it, but because he was the author of one of its sources, viz., a sayings source, usually referred to as Q (from the German, Quelle, "source").

Despite the results of source criticism strong arguments persist for the traditional view: 1. Matthew's occupation as a tax collector peculiarly qualified him to be the official recorder of the words and works of Jesus. His job accustomed him to note-taking and the keeping of records. Since shorthand was widely known in the ancient Hellenistic world, perhaps he kept a shorthand-notebook record of Jesus' activities and teachings. E. J. Goodspeed suggests that Jesus, after the practice of the prophets (cf. Isa. 8:16,17), may have called Matthew to become a disciple for the specific purpose of preserving for posterity a written account of His teachings (Matthew Apostle and Evangelist, Philadelphia: Winston, 1959, pp. 50-56).

2. There is good historical tradition that Matthew actually wrote Gospel material. This comes from Papias of Hierapolis as quoted by the church historian Eusebius: "Matthew wrote down the Logia in the Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] language and everyone translated them as best he could" (Church History, III, xxxix, 16). Much uncertainty exists as to the meaning of this famous statement, but one of two explanations seems most likely: (a) the reference is to an Aramaic Gospel, written by Matthew prior to the Greek Gospel, for the Jewish-Christian community in Palestine; (b) Papias' statement refers to an Aramaic compilation of the sayings of our Lord made by Matthew for the instruction of Jewish converts.

In either case the Matthaean authorship of our present Greek Gospel is not excluded. If an Aramaic Gospel preceded our Matthew, the publication of the Greek edition completely superseded the Aramaic, since no fragment of an Aramaic Matthew remains. A Greek edition is more likely than a Greek translation, since the Greek Gospel does not, on the whole, give evidence of being a translation. If the second alternative is accepted, viz., that the Logia were a collection of our Lord's sayings, then it is possible that Matthew expanded these into a Greek Gospel. It is a significant fact that the so-called Q material, with which Matthew's Logia is most often associated, shows signs of being a translation from Aramaic.

It should further be noted that the Matthaean authorship of the First Gospel does not necessarily rule out its dependence upon Mark. Dr. G. E. Ladd well remarks: "If Matthew wrote a first edition of his Gospel in Aramaic for the Jewish-Christian community in Antioch and Mark wrote a Gospel in Rome embodying the Petrine tradition, it is entirely credible that when Matthew later produced a second edition in Greek, he made free use of the Petrine Gospel, thereby adding his own testimony to its authority and proving that the apostolic witness to Christ was not divided" (More Light on the Synoptics, ChT, March 2, 1959, p. 16).

3. It is more likely that the Gospel would have taken its name from the person who put it in its Greek dress than from the author of one of its sources. Dr. Goodspeed makes a strong case for this point (op. cit., passim). The Greeks were not interested so much in who was the authority behind the sources of a book as in who made the book available in the Greek language. In this respect it is significant that although Peter is certainly the source of Mark's Gospel, it was not called the Gospel of Peter but of Mark.

4. The unanimous Christian tradition is that Matthew wrote it.

Thus, although certainty eludes us, there are cogent reasons for holding to the traditional view that Matthew, the Apostle and eye witness to the events of Christ's life, wrote the First Gospel. If he used other sources, in particular Mark, he added his own apostolic witness to that of Peter's, and by so doing may have contributed to the alleviation of tensions between Gentile and Jewish Christianity.

Date and Place of Origin. We do not know precisely when Matthew was written. Its dependence upon Mark and its failure to mention the destruction of Jerusalem (especially in connection with Jesus' prediction of that event in chapter 24) suggest a date shortly before A.D. 70.

Antioch is the most likely place of origin. Early in the second century Ignatius of that city refers to Matthew as "the Gospel." Also, the Gentile-Jewish character of the Antioch church accords well with the contents of the book.

Characteristics:

1. Matthew is par excellence the teaching Gospel. In this respect it greatly supplements Mark which is more interested in what Jesus did than in what He said.

2. Matthew is the Gospel of the Church. He is the only evangelist who uses the word church at all (16:18; 18:17). The first occurrence is in Jesus' response to Peter's confession. Here its use is clearly anticipatory. In 18:17 the context is church discipline and seems to indicate not only the existence of a "church" but the emergence of problems within it.

3. Matthew is the Gospel of fulfillment. It is especially concerned with showing that Christianity is the fulfillment of the OT revelation. The many OT proof texts cited by the use of the formula "that it might be fulfilled," the emphasis on the Messiahship of Jesus, and the presentation of Christianity as a new "law" all reveal this basic concern of the author. F. F. Bruce has pointed out that "in places he even implies that the experiences of Jesus recapitulate the experiences of the people of Israel in Old Testament times. Thus, just as the children of Israel went down into Egypt in their national infancy and came out of it at the Exodus, so Jesus in His infancy must also go down to Egypt and come out of it, that the words spoken of them in Hosea 11:1 might be fulfilled in His experience, too: 'Out of Egypt have I called my son' (Matt. 2:15)" (The New Testament Documents, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1960, p. 41).

4. Matthew is the Gospel of the King. The genealogy of chapter one traces His lineage back to David; at His birth the magi come asking, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" (2:2); eight times the regal title "Son of David" is ascribed to Christ (1:1; 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30,31; 21:9,15); the triumphal entry clearly has kingly significance (21:1-11); in the Olivet Discourse Jesus prophesies His future kingly reign (25:31); Pilate asks, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" to which Jesus gives the tacit assent, "Thou sayest" (27:11); and over the cross the words are written, "This is Jesus the king of the Jews" (27:37). The climax comes at the very end of the Gospel where Jesus in the Great Commission declares: "All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth" (28:18). There can be no doubt that the author of this Gospel deliberately presents Jesus as the King.

Structure. The arrangement of the material reveals an artistic touch. The whole of the Gospel is woven around five great discourses: (1) 5-7; (2) 10; (3) 13; (4) 18; (5) 24,25, each of which concludes with the refrain, "And it came to pass when Jesus had ended these sayings . . ." In each case the narrative portions appropriately lead up to the discourses. The Gospel has a fitting prologue (1,2) and a challenging epilogue (28:16-20).

Outline:

1. Prologue: the birth of the King (1,2).
2. Narrative: the preparation of the King (3,4).
3. First discourse: the law of the Kingdom (5-7).
4. Narrative: the power of the King (8,9).
5. Second discourse: the proclamation of the Kingdom (10).
6. Narrative: the rejection of the King (11,12).
7. Third discourse: the growth of the Kingdom (13).
8. Narrative: the mission of the King (14-17).
9. Fourth discourse: the fellowship of the Kingdom (18).
10. Narrative: the King goes to Jerusalem (19-23).
11. Fifth discourse: the consummation of the Kingdom (24,25).
12. Narrative: the death and resurrection of the King (26:1-28:15).
13. Epilogue: the great challenge of the Kingdom (28:16-20).

MATTHIAS (mă-thī'ăs, Gr. Matthías or Maththías, gift of Jehovah), the one chosen by lot after the death of Judas Iscariot to take his place among the twelve apostles (Acts 1:15-26). He had been numbered among the followers of Christ (Acts 1:21,22). Some number him among the seventy, as, for instance, Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius. Nothing certain is known of his career subsequent to his appointment.

MATTITHIAH (măt'ĭ-thī'à, Heb. mattithyâh, gift of Jehovah), there are at least four men bearing this name in the OT. Scholars differ somewhat as to their identification. 1. A Korahite Levite, born of Shallum, put in charge of the baked offerings of the temple after the Exile (I Chron. 9:31).

2. A Levite, the sixth son of Jeduthun, appointed by David to minister before the ark in music and thanksgiving (I Chron. 15:18,21; 16:5; 25:3,21). Some make the man in 16:5 a different person but probably this is unwarranted.

3. One of the sons of Nebo who, after the Exile, put away his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:43).

4. One who stood at the right hand of Ezra as he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4). He could possibly be identified with Mattithiah of I Chronicles 9:31.

MATTOCK (măt'ŭk, Heb. mahărēshâh [I Sam. 13:20,21]; herob [II Chron. 34:6 — only in the margin in the RV], ma'dēr [Isa. 7:25]), a single-headed pickaxe with a point on one side and a broad edge on the other for digging and cutting.

MAUL (Heb. mēphîts, a breaker), originally a hammer such as used by coppersmiths. Today it refers to any smashing weapon like those carried by most shepherds (Prov. 25:18).

MAW (Heb. qēbâh), one of the stomachs of a ruminating animal. It was greatly prized by the ancients and with the shoulder and cheeks became the priest's portion of the sacrificial victims (Deut. 18:3).

MAZZAROTH (See Astronomy)

MEADOW (mĕ'dō, Heb. 'āhû [Gen. 41:2,18], ma'arēh [Judg. 20:33]), the first word, meaning "reeds," would make a meadow to be a place where reeds grow. The word comes from an Egyptian word meaning "marshy ground." The second word implies a portion of land without trees.

MEAH (mē'à, Heb. mē'âh, hundred), a tower between the sheep gate and the tower of Hananeel, being the most important point in this area on the Jerusalem wall. The origin of the name is unknown.

MEAL (Heb. qemah [Gen. 18:6]; sōleth [Lev. 2:1]; Gr. áleuron [Matt. 13:33]), the ground grain used for both food and sacrificial offerings. It typified Christ in His perfect humanity. It has a remote figurative use in such passages as Isaiah 47:2 and Hosea 8:7.

MEAL OFFERING (See Offerings)

MEALS in the Bible periods varied greatly in time of eating, diet and table customs. Generally two meals were served daily, although three were not uncommon. The time of these meals was not set like ours today. The first meal of the day could be served at any time from early morning until noon (Prov. 31:15; John 21:12,15). The rank and occupation of a person caused the time of the noon meal to vary. It came after the work of the morning was completed (Mark 7:4) or when the noonday heat made work too difficult (Ruth 2:14). The evening meal was not served at any set time but came when the day's work ended. This was usually the principal meal of the Hebrews (Ruth 3:7), while the Egyptians served their main meal at noon (Gen. 43:16). Jesus fed the multitudes at the end of the day (Matt. 14:15; Mark 6:35; Luke 9:12).

The food of the orientals generally may be classified into three groups, vegetables, fruits and animal foods. Wheat, barley, millet, spelt, lentils, beans, cucumbers, onions, leeks, garlic, salt-wort, pods of the carob tree referred to as "husks," and wild gourds were all eaten by the orientals. The corn referred to in the Bible was wheat. The grain was often picked in the field, rubbed in the hands to separate it from the chaff and eaten raw (Luke 6:1). Sometimes it was crushed with mortar and pestle and made into a porridge or cakes (Num. 11:8; Prov. 27:22). More often the grain was ground between two stones. The grinding was usually done by women (Matt. 24:41) or by servants (Exod. 11:5; Judg. 16:21).

No meal was considered complete without bread. "Indeed, in a sense, it constituted the meal. For the blessing was spoken over the bread, and this was supposed to cover all the rest of the food that followed . . ." (Alfred Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, New York: Longmans, Green & Co., 1897, Vol. II, p. 206). Bread was both leavened and unleavened. Sometimes honey and oil were mixed into the dough as it was being made in the kneading-troughs or wooden bowls. In these times of poverty bread was made from beans, millet and spelt (Ezek. 4: 9)." (H. I. Hester, At Home With the Hebrews, Missouri: The William Jewell Press, 1942, p. 22). Bread was usually eaten warm and seldom by itself, but was served with sour wine or meat gravy. (John 13:26; 21:13).

Spices, used freely as flavors, consisted of cummin or dill, mustard or mint. Salt also became an important item in the diet of these people.

Fruits grew in great abundance in Palestine and consisted of grapes, figs, olives, mulberries (Sycamore), pomegranates, oranges, lemons, melons, dates, almonds and walnuts. Grapes were eaten as fresh food and dried as raisins. They were the chief source of the wines, which were used both sweet and fermented. Olives were eaten as food as well as used to make olive oil. There were two kinds of figs, early (Isa. 28:4) and late (Jer. 8:13). The late figs were dried and pressed into cakes. Dates were used both raw and dried.

The bulk of the meat came from sheep, lambs, kids and fatted calves. Swine were eaten, but not by the Hebrews. Some game such as the hart, gazelle, goat, antelope and deer as well as doves, turtle-dove and quail formed part of the meat diet. Some eggs were used for food (Isa. 10:14), locusts and fish. The Hebrews used milk from cattle and goats for drinking. From this they made cheese and butter. Arabs drank the milk from camels. The cheese was made from curdled milk and after being salted and formed into small units was placed in the sun to dry. Some of this was later mixed with water to make a sour but cooling drink.

Knives, forks and spoons were not used in eating. Meat was cooked and placed with its gravy in a large dish on the table. The contents were taken either with the fingers or placed on bread and carried to the mouth. The hands were usually washed and a prayer was offered before the meal. The Egyptians sat at a small round table for their meals. The early Hebrews sat, knelt or squatted as they ate. "After the time of Amos (750 B.C.) it came to be the custom to recline at meals . . ." (Ibid. p. 75). This was probably derived from the Persians and became the NT practice. Women were sometimes included and sometimes excluded at mealtime. Three generally lay on one couch. Thus the head of one was on the bosom of another (John 13:23-25). They reclined at the three sides of a rectangular table leaving the fourth side free for the servants to use in serving.

Food was cooked in a variety of ways over a fire made from charcoal (Prov. 26:21), sticks (I Kings 17:10), thorns (Isa. 33:12), or grass (Luke 12:28). Archaeology is throwing light increasingly on the variety of utensils used in preparing food. H.Z.C.

MEARAH (mē-ā'rà, Heb. me'ārâh, cave), a town or district in NE Palestine belonging to the Zidonians (Josh. 13:4). It may exist today as the modern village, Mogheiriyeh.

MEBUNNAI (mē-bŭn'ī, Heb. mevunnay, well-built), one of David's bodyguard (II Sam. 23:27) who slew a Philistine giant (II Sam. 21:18). Due to a scribal error the spelling of this name is quite varied.

MECHERATHITE (mē-kē'răth-īt, Heb. mekhērāthî, dweller in Mecharah), a description of Hepher, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:36). Perhaps the name should read, Maachathite (II Sam. 23:34).

MEDAD (mē'dăd, Heb. mēdhādh, affectionate), one of the 70 elders appointed to assist Moses in the government of the people (Num. 11:24-30). He, together with Eldad, empowered by the Spirit, remained in the camp and prophesied. Joshua attempted to hinder them but they were defended by Moses.

MEDAN (mē'dăn, Heb. medhān, strife), a son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:2; I Chron. 1:32), brother of Midian and by some writers mistaken for him.

MEDEBA (mĕd'ē-bà, Heb. mêdhevā', uncertain), a city lying high in the grazing section of Moab E of the Jordan, and first referred to in Numbers 21:30. It is part of the section of land assigned to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:9), and is remarkably level portion of land (Denis Baly, The Geography of the Bible, New York: Harper & Brothers, 1957, pp. 30,172). The claim to this land was often disputed by the Reubenites, Ammonites and the Moabites. "Reuben, however, soon vanished from the scene, swallowed up by the vengeful Moab, and after the time of Joshua the tribe is only mentioned three times," (Ibid. p. 236). The Ammonites united with the Syrians in a campaign against Joab and were successfully defeated (I Chron. 19:7). The Biblical records together with the testimony of the Moabite Stone shows that it was constantly changing hands (cf. I Chron. 19:7 with Isa. 15:2). From I Maccabees one reads how John, the son of Mattathias was murdered by Jambri of Medeba. Jonathan and Simon avenged this death by lying in ambush in a cave and slaughtering a marriage party of the Jambri that was passing by (I Macc. 9:36-42). Josephus shows that later the city was taken by Hyrcanus after the death of Antiochus (Antiquities of the Jews 13:9, section 1). Later on in Roman history it became a seat of one of the early bishops. Today the modern Arab village, Madeba, occupies the general area, but the ruins of the old civilization are much in evidence. Some archaeological work has been carried on here. In 1896 an ancient mosaic map of Palestine was discovered and while it is badly damaged, it has proven of real value.

MEDES, MEDIA (mēdz, mē'dĭ-à, Heb. mādhî, mādhay), the inhabitants of the land of Media. The boundaries of this land have varied from time to time, but generally it was regarded as that land to the W and S of the Caspian Sea. It was bounded on the W by the Zagros mountains, on the N by the Araxes and Cyrus rivers, on the E by Hyrcania and the great Salt Desert, and on the S by Susiana or Elam. Josephus feels its name was derived from Madai, the son of Japhet (Antiquities of the Jews, 1:6, section 1). It is shaped like a parallelogram with its longest portion extending 600 miles and its greatest width about 250 miles, thus making it a territory of approximately 150,000 square miles (George Rawlinson, The Seven Great Monarchies, New York: John B. Alden, Vol. II, 1885, pp. 3-4). It had many natural barriers, making its defense easy. Its water supply was scant, thus making much of the land arid and sterile, though some of its valleys were abundantly productive. Irrigation for the most part was impractical, for some of its rivers were salty while others had worn such deep canyons as to make their waters useless for this purpose. Its few towns were scattered, since its people preferred to live in small groups. Its climate was varied, with some extreme temperatures in both directions. Minerals were many and animals and birds were plentiful. Eventually these factors led to luxurious living, spelling the downfall of the empire. It became famous for its horses, and at one time paid a yearly tribute of 3,000 horses, plus 4,000 mules and almost 100,000 sheep.

The people of Media were warlike and skillful in their use of the bow. They were linked very closely in their background, linguistically and religiously, to the Persians whom they antedate by several centuries and with whom they eventually united. While their early worship was polytheistic, there were some monotheistic leanings that were very significant. Their worship was conducted by priests and consisted of hymns, sacrifices — bloody and unbloody — and "... a peculiar ceremony called that of Soma, in which an intoxicating liquor is offered to the gods, and then consumed by the priests who drink until they are drunken" (Ibid. p. 46). Their religion was a revolt against the nature worship about them. They believed in real spiritual intelligence divided into good and bad. At the head of the good beings was one supreme intelligence who was worshiped as supreme creator, preserver and governor of the universe. He was called Ahuro-Mazdo and was the source of all good. Later there developed a worship of heavenly bodies along with a Zoroastrian dualism.

The people were a strong power for a long period. Shalmaneser plundered several of their more important cities but "there seems to have been no attempt to set up anything like Assyrian rule over any portion of Media but only to secure tribute" (Robert W. Rogers, A History of Babylonia & Assyria, New York: Eaton & Mains, 1901, p. 87, 113). They continued strong and were a menace to Assyria's last king, Ashurbanipal (Joseph Swain, The Ancient World, New York: Vol. 1, Harper & Brothers, 1950, p. 178). After the death of Ashurbanipal, the Median king Cyaxares carried on an extensive campaign.

The more than twenty references to these people or their land in the Scriptures show their importance. II Kings refers to their cities (II Kings 17:6; 18:11), Esther tells of the binding character of their laws (Esth. 1:19), Isaiah and Daniel tell of their power against Babylon (Isa. 13:17; Dan. 5:28). The last Scriptural reference to them is in Acts 2:9 where representatives are in Jerusalem at the time of Pentecost. H.Z.C.

MEDIA (See Medes)

MEDIATION (See Mediator)

MEDIATOR (mē'dĭ-a'tẽr, Gr. mesítes, a middle man), one who brings about friendly relations between two or more estranged people. He corresponds to the umpire or "daysman" of Job 9:33 AV. As used in the NT mesítes refers to the official position of Jesus Christ as He is related to man. He is mesítes, peacemaker, between God and man (I Tim. 2:5). He is the agent by whom the new covenant between God and man is made efficacious (Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24; II Cor. 5:18-21; Col. 1:21,22). Three facts regarding this divine ministry should be noted:

1. The Grounds of Mediation. Throughout the Bible the estrangement between man and God is repeatedly set forth. God is the moral ruler; man, His natural subject, has violated His laws, hence has gone away from God. All men are thus alienated (Rom. 3:23) because they refused to be led by the revelation which God made of Himself (Rom. 1:18-26). Three inescapable moral facts never cease to be realized by man, namely: the fact of a moral order, the fact of sin, and the fact that atonement must be provided to bring release from guilt. Since man cannot keep the law perfectly from birth until death, it is evident that he cannot be saved from the curse of sin by the law (Rom. 3:20; 8:3; John 7:19; Acts 13:39). The law, therefore, is the pedagogue, servant of God, who by making sinners aware of their estrangement from God, causes them to turn to Christ as mediator (Gal. 3:24,25).

2. Examples of Mediatorial Work. These can be found in the OT. Jonathan was intercessor for David before Saul (I Sam. 19:4). Abraham made intercession on behalf of Abimelech (Gen. 20), also Sodom (Gen. 18:23-33). Moses was mediator on behalf of Pharaoh (Exod. 8:8-13; 9:28-33) and for Israel (Exod. 33:12-17). Samuel was middleman when Israel was given a king (I Sam. 9: 15-27), and when she became wicked (I Sam. 12: 19).

3. Other Agents of Mediation. In addition to the intercessory work of such individuals as Moses, God dealt with Israel through other agents. Angels who acted as media through whom God's will was made known to man (Judg. 6:11; Gen. 22:15; 24:40; 32:1). Because of the tendency of unthinking worshipers to put the mediating angel in the place of the promised Messiah, later Jewish scholars refused to recognize angels as mediators. At times God appeared in human form (Dan. 8:17; Gen. 12:7; 17:1; 35:7,9). In some cases "angel of the Lord" seems to have been a manifestation of God, perhaps a temporary appearance of Messiah (Gen. 16:7; 13). As the revelation from God came to be more fully understood and the results of it more clearly seen, there came the priestly class between man and God (Lev. 1-7). With the development of this class there arose the elaborate ritualistic rules for worship whereby God set forth the requirements for making atonement. Leviticus 9-24 gives rules for special events, for healing diseases and for making atonement; chapter 25 establishes the holy days and seasons, and chapter 27 lists penalties for violation of the laws. From this elaborate ritual the priests and rabbis slowly developed a system of rules that separated man from God and made him feel wholly dependent upon the prelates for any and all contacts with God. So, as the priests degenerated, the people likewise became more wicked. During days of captivity, when priests were not always at hand to serve, the longing of the people for the Promised One increased. And when Jesus did come He broke down the middle wall of partition between sinful man and the offended God (Eph. 2:14).

MEDITERRANEAN SEA (mĕd'ĭ-tĕ-rā'nē-ăn, Gr. he thálassa, the sea). This body of water was the only ocean known to the Hebrews, so by NT times was designated as The Sea. Smaller seas were named, as Dead (or Salt) Sea, Sea of Galilee. The Canaanites occupied the land from Jordan to the Sea (Num. 13:29). It marked the end of the Promised Land (Num. 34:5). Joshua located it as "the great sea toward the going down of the sun" (1:4). It was the utmost sea (Deut. 11:24) or hinder sea (Deut. 34:2 RSV). It was also known as the Sea of the Philistines (Exod. 23:31). "Sea of Joppa" (Ezra 3:7) should be "sea at Joppa." Cedar for the temple was shipped from Tyre to Joppa (II Chron. 2:16). This sea played a big part in NT days. On one occasion Jesus may have seen its waters (Mark 7:24). Paul's missionary tours took him across the eastern half. If he did set foot in Spain, he saw most of this inland ocean.

The sea was known and used by many early civilized people, and they had intercourse across Palestine with civilizations of the Tigris-Euphrates valley. At one time it had an open channel to the Red Sea. Drifting sands from the African desert and silt from the Nile River closed this and made a land route from Asia to Africa. The sea is 2,300 miles long and more than 1,000 miles across at its widest point. An elevated area once reached from upper Tunisia in Africa easterly to Sicily. This shallow area divides the sea into the Eastern or Levant and the western sea. Its northern shore is broken by the Grecian and the Italian peninsulas. Crete and Cyprus made havens for shippers of ancient days. Paul was on both islands during his journeys (Acts 13:4; 27:7). J.D.F.

MEEKNESS (Heb. 'ănāwâh, suffering, Gr. praútes), a quality often commended in Scripture. The meek (oppressed) are assured of divine help and ultimate victory (Ps. 22:26; 25:9; 37:11). Jesus was sent to minister to the oppressed (Isa. 11:4; 29:19; Zeph. 2:3; Ps. 45:4). Meekness is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:23). It is characteristic of Jesus (Matt. 11:29; II Cor. 10:1). Believers are commanded to be meek and to show a lowly spirit one to another (Eph. 4:2; Col. 3:12; Titus 3: 2). A teacher should be meek (II Tim. 2:25). Meekness is a mark of true discipleship (I Pet. 3: 15:). The word does not imply a weak, vacillating or supine nature.

MEGIDDO (mĕ-gĭd'ō, Heb. meghiddô, meghiddôn), a city situated on the Great Road, which linked Gaza and Damascus, and controlling the principal pass through the Carmel Range, connecting the coastal plain and the Plain of Esdraelon. The road was the channel for the flow of peaceful commerce and also the route by which the armies of antiquity marched. One of the best recorded and most interesting military operations of ancient times took place at M. when Thutmose III defeated an Asiatic coalition headed by the king of Kadesh. The importance of the city is reflected in the statement of the Egyptian king that the capture of M. was the capture of a thousand towns. The continuing practicality of the M. pass for the movement of troops is seen from its effective use in 1918 by Allenby, whose cavalry thus took the Turks by surprise. The first mention of M. in the Bible is in the list of kings defeated by Joshua W of the Jordan (Josh. 12:21). In the tribal allotments, M. was in the territory of Manasseh, but this tribe was unable to conquer M. and the other fortress cities which rimmed the plains of Esdraelon and Jezreel (Josh. 17:11; Judg. 1:27).

During the period of the judges, Israelite forces under Deborah and Barak annihilated the army of Sisera in a battle which raged in part "by the waters of Megiddo" (Judg. 5:19), the sources of the Kishon. Though the Biblical record does not relate the circumstances under which Israel finally took the city, there are indications of the greatness of M. during the Solomonic period. M. is listed among the cities in the charge of Baana, one of the 12 officers responsible in rotation for the monthly provisions of the king and his court (I Kings 4:12). It is also singled out as one of the cities to which Solomon assigned forced labor for construction (I Kings 9:15); the text speaks of store-cities and cities for chariots and horsemen (I Kings 9:19; cf. II Chron. 1:14; see below). In the coup of Jehu against Joram, king of Israel, the hard-driving Jehu killed the Israelite king with an arrow, as Joram fled in his chariot, and ordered the shooting of the Judean Ahaziah, who also was attempting to escape. Mortally wounded, Ahaziah went as far as M. and there died (II Kings 9:27). In 609 B.C. Necho of Egypt marched north to aid the Assyrian remnant at Carchemish; on his way he was opposed by Josiah, king of Judah. In the brief battle which ensued in the plain of Megiddo, Josiah was hit by the Egyptian archers and soon died (II Kings 23:29-30; II Chron. 35:20-27, esp. vs. 22).

There is but one reference to M. in the prophetical writings of the OT; Zechariah mentions a heathen mourning which took place in the plain of Esdraelon: "On that day the mourning in Jerusalem will be as great as the mourning for Hadadrimmon in the plain of Megiddo" (12:11, RSV). The single NT reference to M. is in Rev. 16:16, where the word Armageddon is compounded from the Heb. har megiddôn, "hill of Megiddo," at which place "the battle of that great day of God Almighty" (16:14) will be fought. The excavation of the mound of Megiddo has provided much information concerning the history and culture of the city and considerable illumination of the Biblical text. The modern name for the site is Tell el-Mutesellim, where the first archaeological work was done by G. Schumacher of the Deutsche Orientgesellschaft in 1903-1905.

In 1925 the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago began a large-scale stratigraphic clearance of the entire mound and continued until 1939. When the work was halted, soundings had revealed 20 strata and the clearance had reached Stratum V. The more important discoveries include the city gate and wall, the governor's residence, and the stables of Stratum IV, the water system, the temples and palaces of earlier levels, and a remarkable find of ivories (early 12th cent. B.C., Stratum VII). Though there are questions concerning the date of Stratum IV, it usually is assigned to Solomonic times. The stables for at least 450 horses illustrate the statements of I Kings 9:15-19 and II Chron. 1:14. Evidence of similar structures had been found at Tell el-Hesi, Taanach, Gezer, and Tell el-Far'ah (Megiddo and Gezer are included among the cities in which Solomon engaged in building activities, I Kings 9:15,17). An interesting feature of Stratum IV is the use of three courses of hewn stone and a course of cedar beams, as described in the building processes of Solomon at Jerusalem (I Kings 7:12). The temples and shrines of the earlier levels and numerous cult objects from various periods shed light on the religious life of the city. Inscriptural material includes some Egyptian cartouches and titles; e.g., a fragment of a stela of Shishak (Sheshonk) appeared early in the work of the Oriental Institute. Schumacher found two seals with Heb. inscriptions, one reading "(Belonging) to Shema', servant of Jeroboam." Innumerable small objects also contribute to the knowledge of the art, daily life, and commercial relations of M. C.E.D.

MEGIDDON (See Megiddo)

MEHETABEL (mē-hĕt'ā-bĕl, God benefits). 1. A daughter of Matred, wife of King Hadar (Gen. 36:39).

2. One who sought to betray Nehemiah (Neh. 6:10-13).

MEHIDA (mē-hī'dà, Heb. mehîdhā', renowned), ancestor and family name of some Nethinim (temple servants) who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylonia to Judah (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54).

MEHIR (mē'hîr, Heb. mehîr, price, hire), a son of Chelub (I Chron. 4:11) and a descendant of Judah.

MEHOLATHITE (mē-hō'là-thīt, Heb. mehôlāthî), Gentile designation of Adriel to whom Saul married his daughter Merab (I Sam. 18:19; II Sam. 21:8). The place Abel-meholah was located in the Jordan valley near Beth-shan, the native place of Elisha (I Kings 19:16).

MEHUJAEL (mē-hū'jā-ĕl, Heb. mehûyā'ēl), descendant of Cain through Enoch and Irad, and father of Methusael (Gen. 4:18).

MEHUMAN (mē-hū'măn, Heb. mehûmān), one of the eunuchs of Ahasuerus, king of Persia (Esth. 1:10).

MEJARKON (mē-jàr'kŏn, Heb. mê hayarqôn), a place in the tribe of Dan between Gath-rimmon and Rakkon (Josh. 19:46), probably not far from Joppa. The place has not been identified.

MEKONAH (mē-kō'nà, Heb. mekhōnâh), a town in the southern part of Judah near Ziklag, and inhabited after the Exile (Neh. 11:28).

MELATIAH (mĕl-à-tī'àh, Heb. melatyâh), a Gibeonite who helped to repair the walls of Jerusalem in the days of Nehemiah (3:7).

MELCHI (mĕl-kī, Gr. Melchei), the name of two ancestors of Jesus through Mary, according to Luke's genealogy: (1) The son of Addi and father of Neri (Luke 3:28); and (2) the son of Janna and father of Levi, fourth from Mary (Luke 3:24).

MELCHIAH (See Malchiah)

MELCHISEDEC (See Melchizedek)

MELCHI-SHUA (mĕl'kī-shōō'à, Heb. malkî-shûa'), a son of King Saul slain with his brothers on Mount Gilboa (I Sam. 31:2). Malchi-shua in ARV).

MELCHIZEDEK, MELCHISEDEK (mĕl-kĭz'ĕ-dĕk, Heb. malkî-tsedhek, king of righteousness), a priest and king of Salem, which place is identified with Jerusalem. The reference in Genesis 14:18-20 is the first mention of this city in the OT.

Melchizedek went out to meet Abram after his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and the kings who were with him in the Vale of Siddim. He presented Abram with bread and wine, and blessed him in the name of "God Most High, possessor of heaven and earth." Abram gave him "a tenth of all." The Hebrew word for "God" in this instance is the same as in such phrases as "God Almighty" (17:1), "the Everlasting God" (21:33), "God, the God of Israel" (33:20), and "God of Bethel" (35:7), and is the oldest Semitic designation for God. Melchizedek was thus a monotheist and worshipped essentially the same God as Abram, who recognized him as a priest.

He appears the next time in Psalm 110:4: "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek." This psalm is of special interest because Jesus referred to it (Matt. 22:41f; Mark 12:35f; Luke 20:41f) and it is regarded as one of the Messianic psalms. The ideal ruler of the Hebrew nation would be one who combined in his person the role of both priest and king.

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews uses Melchizedek (Heb. 5-7) in his great argument where he shows forth Jesus Christ as the final and perfect revelation of God because in His person He is Son, and in His work He is Priest (Heb. 1:2-10:18). The author cites Psalm 110:4 indicating that Jesus' priesthood is of a different order from the Levitical "after the order of Melchizedek."

The author of Hebrews, looking back upon the history of his people, comes to the conclusion that the Levitical priesthood proved to be a failure in that it was incapable of securing victory over sin and full communion with God.

And so the author cites Psalm 110. The ideal priest must belong to "the order of Melchizedek." To the author, Christ was the fulfillment of this prophecy, for He came out of Judah, a tribe with no connection with the Levitical priesthood. While the claims of the old priesthood were based on genealogy, Christ's were displayed in His power of an endless life. The claim of Jesus to be the real fulfillment of the psalmist's prophecy rested upon the fact of His resurrection and the proof which it afforded that His life was indestructible. The psalmist had declared that the ideal high priest would be forever — and only one whose life could not be destroyed by death could be said to answer to the psalmist's ideal, a priest after "the order of Melchizedek." J.G.J.

MELEA (mē'lē-à, Gr. Meleá), an ancestor of Jesus through Mary, in Luke's genealogy (Luke 3:31).

MELECH (mē'lĕk, Heb. melekh, king), a son of Micah, a grandson of Mephibosheth or Meribbaal, and a great grandson of Jonathan, mentioned in the genealogy of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:35; 9:41).

MELICU (See Malluch)

MELITA (mĕl'ī-tà, Gr. Melíte), an island, now called Malta, situated in a strategically important position some 60 miles S of Sicily. It was colonized by the Phoenicians about 1000 B.C., and became part of the empire of Carthage some four centuries later. Rome acquired the island in 218 B.C., but the Carthaginian language continued to be spoken. Hence Luke's phrase "the barbarous people" (Acts 28:2), "barbarous," of course, being used in the Greek sense of "foreign-speaking." Melita was the scene of Paul's shipwreck. "Adria" (Acts 27:27) was not the Adriatic. This sea lay between Italy, Malta, Crete, and Greece, and may be geographically identified thus by references in Strabo (2:5:20), and Pausanias (5:25:3). The wind described in Acts 27:14 would thus drive a galley from Crete to Malta, if it is assumed that a cautious pilot would fight to keep the ship as far north as possible from the Syrtes quicksands (Acts 27:17). Acts 28:3 speaks of snakes in Melita. There are none there today. E.M.B.

MELZAR (mĕl'zär, Heb. ha-meltsar, overseer), a man in whose care Daniel and his three companions were committed by the chief of the eunuchs of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 1:11,16). The word occurs as a proper name only in the KJV. In other versions it is translated "steward." The exact function of the melzar is unknown.

MEMBER (Heb. yātsur, Gr. mélos), a word usually denoting any feature or part of the body (Job 17:7; James 3:5). "The members" is equivalent with "the body" (Ps. 139:16). The word is also used figuratively by the body of Christ (I Cor. 12:12-17; Eph. 4:16).

MEMPHIS (mĕm'fĭs, Heb. nōph, mōph; Copt. menphe, memphi, Gr. Mémphis), The first capital of united Egypt (c. 3200 B.C.), was situated on the W bank of the Nile, about 20 miles S of modern Cairo. Legend ascribes the founding of the city to Menes, the traditional first king. The original name of the city was "The White Wall"; later it was called Men-nefer-Pepi, after the name of the pyramid of Pepi I of the Sixth Dynasty, and it is from this name that "Memphis" is derived. The chief god of M. was Ptah; also prominent at Memphis was the worship of the Apis bull, whose famous burial place, the Serapeum, is located just to the W, in the necropolis of Sakkarah. All of the Biblical references to M. are in the prophets. Hosea foretold a return of Israelites to Egypt and refers to M. (Hos. 9:6). After the murder of Gedaliah, a number of Jews fled from Palestine to Egypt (cf. Jer. 41:16-18) and M. is mentioned as a place of their residence (Jer. 44:1, Noph). Both Isaiah and Jeremiah had seen the results of an Egyptian-Judean alliance and refer to M. (Isa. 19:13, Noph; Jer. 2:16, Noph). Jeremiah prophesied that M. would become a ruin (cf. Jer. 46:13,19); Ezekiel declared that the Lord would "destroy the idols and put an end to images in M." (30:13) and spoke of coming distresses in that city (30:16). Today there is little for the casual visitor to see in the Memphite ruins and only the colossus of Rameses II and the alabaster sphinx attract tourist attention. C.E.D.

MEMUCAN (mē-mū'kăn, Heb. memûkhān), one of the seven wise men at the Persian court who advised King Ahasuerus to punish Queen Vashti for her refusal to appear at the court festival (Esth. 1:13-22).

MENAHEM (mĕn'ȧ-hĕm, Heb. menahēm, comforted), son of Gadi and king of Israel (II Kings 15:13-22) whose reign of ten years began by killing his predecessor Shallum. "He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord." Through gifts, collected from his subjects, he bribed the Assyrian king Pul (Tilgath-pileser III) and was thereby able to retain his throne. In this restless period of the Northern Kingdom with sinful men usurping the throne time and again, Menahem was the only king who died a natural death. His son Pekahiah inherited the kingdom.

MENAN (mē'năn, Gr. Menná), an ancestor of Jesus through Mary in Luke's genealogy (3:31). Only the KJV has Menan; other versions have Menna.

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN (mē'nē, mē'nē, tē'kĕl, ū-fär'sĭn), four Aramaic words which suddenly appeared on the walls of Belshazzar's banquet halls where the king "made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine" (Dan. 5) out of the golden vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar from the temple at Jerusalem after its capture in 586 B.C. (II Kings 25:14f). The king became terrified when he saw the writing. "The wise men of Babylon" failed to interpret the words and Daniel was called in on the suggestion of the queen to decipher the message.

A great deal of discussion has taken place regarding this writing both as to the original form of the inscription and to its interpretation. The words should seem to refer to three weights in common use: the "mina," the "shekel," and the "half-mina." Or they may be terms used in Mesopotamian counting houses: "numbered, numbered, weighed, and divisions." It is to be noted that upharsin in the inscription (5:25) becomes peres in the interpretation. The u is the connecting participle "and," while pharsin is the plural form of "Peres" which word naturally suggests the Persians.

What Daniel had to deliver as the message by the mysterious writer was the fact that "God had numbered" the days of the kingdom; the king had been "weighed in the balances and . . . found wanting"; his "kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians." And there was not much time between interpretation and fulfillment, for "in that night Belshazzar the Chaldean king was slain."

J.G.J.

MENI (mē'nī, Heb. menî, fate, destiny), a word translated "number" in the KJV but in other versions "destiny" in connection with Isaiah's denunciation of the rebellious people (65:11). The word can hardly have the KJV meaning. More likely it refers to the god of "good luck," which people seemed to believe in instead of the God Isaiah proclaimed. There is a connection between "Fortune" (ARV) in the same verse (cf. Gen. 30:11, ARV).

MEONENIM (mē-ŏn'ē-nĭm, Heb. me'ônenîm), "Plain of Meonenim" (AV) or "the oak of Meonenim" (ARV), meaning "the augur's oak (or terebinth) of Meonenim" (ARV, mg). The place is unknown, perhaps named for an oracle tree, and mentioned only in Judges 9:37.

MEONOTHAI (mē-ŏn'ō-thī, Heb. me'ônōthay, my dwelling), a son of Othiel and father of Ophrah (I Chron. 4:13,14). He was a descendant of Judah through Caleb.

MEPHAATH (mĕf'ā-ăth, Heb. mēpha'ath, splendor), a town in the territory of Reuben (Josh. 13:18) and given to the Levitical family of Merari (21:37). At the time of Eusebius and Jerome a Roman garrison was stationed in this place.

MEPHIBOSHETH (mē-fĭb'ō-shĕth, Heb. mephîvōsheth). This name appears also as Meribaal in the genealogical lists of I Chroncles 8:34 and 9:40. 1. A son of King Saul and his concubine Rizpah. Together with his brother and other men Mephibosheth was delivered to the Gibeonites to be hanged with David's consent (II Sam. 21:8).

2. A son of Jonathan and grandson of Saul. His name appears as Merib-baal in the genealogical lists (I Chron. 8:34 and 9:40). After the disaster at Mt. Gilboa where both Saul and Jonathan were slain in the battle against the Philistines (II Sam. 1:4; I Chron. 10:1-8) Mephibosheth as a child of five was carried by his nurse to Lodebar, E of the Jordan where they took refuge in the house of Maachir, the son of Ammiel (II Sam. 9:4).

Upon David's accession to the throne Mephibosheth was called back to Jerusalem, given his father's inheritance, and allowed to eat at the king's table for the rest of his life. Saul's servant Ziba was commanded to serve him. The servant, however, tried to ingratiate himself with David at the expense of his master (II Sam. 16:1-4) by representing Mephibosheth as a traitor. David did not fully believe the servant's story, for later he received Mephibosheth in a friendly manner (II Sam. 19:24-30).

Mephibosheth was the father of Mica (II Sam. 9:12), or Micah in I Chronicles 8:35.

MERAB (mē'răb, Heb. mērav, perhaps increase), the older daughter of King Saul, her sister being Michal. After David had killed Goliath, the women sang his praises (I Sam. 18:7) and aroused Saul's jealousy. Saul sought to have David killed by the Philistines and so promised him Merab as wife if he would fight valiantly; then gave Merab to another man; but Michal loved David, and to win her David killed 200 Philistines. In II Samuel 21:8 by an early copyist's error "Michal" is written for "Merab," as the context clearly shows. Merab's five sons were slain by the men of Gibeon.

MERAIAH (mē-rā'yà, rebellious), a priest of Israel in the time of Joiakim (Neh. 12:12).

MERAIOTH (mē-rā'yŏth, Heb. merāyôth, rebellious). 1. A high priest of Israel in the seventh generation from Aaron (I Chron. 6:6,7).

2. Another in the priestly line and ancestor of the great Hilkiah (I Chron. 9:11).

3. Ancestor of Helkai, a priest in the days of Joiakim the high priest (Neh. 12:15). This one may have been the same as "Meremoth" in Nehemiah 12:3. In the very ancient Hebrew script the names are quite similar.

MERARI (mē-ra'rī, Heb. merārî, bitter), the youngest son of Levi who of course was patriarch of the tribe of Levi. The high priesthood descended through Aaron, and the other Levites assisted in the divine service. The "Merarites" had the responsibility for the woodwork of the tabernacle in its journeys (Num. 3:17,33-37). Later, they had 12 cities in Reuben, Gad and Zebulun (Josh. 21:7, 34-40).

MERATHAIM (mĕr-à-thā'ĭm, repeated rebellion), a symbolic name for Babylon, used by Jeremiah (50:21) in his "doom of Babylon" in chapters 50 and 51.

MERCHANDISE, MERCHANT (See Commerce)

MERCURIUS (mēr-kū'rĭ-ŭs, Gr. Hermés), in English, Mercury, according to Greek mythology the son of Zeus or Jupiter and Maia, the oldest of the Pleiades. As messenger of the gods he had wings on his feet and was notable also for eloquence. The people of Lystra called Paul "Mercury" because he was the chief speaker, and called Barnabas Jupiter (Acts 14:12).

MERCURY (See Mercurius)

MERCY (Heb. hesedh, kindness, raham, bowels, hānan, gracious, Gr. éleos, kindness, oiktirmós, compassion). 1. Forbearance from inflicting punishment upon an adversary or a law-breaker.

2. That compassion which causes one to help the weak, the sick or the poor. Showing mercy is one of the cardinal virtues of a true Christian (James 2:1-13) and is one of the determinants of God's treatment to us. Christian mercy is a part of the "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22,23), made up in part of love, long-suffering, gentleness and goodness. God's mercy toward sinful man was shown most clearly and fully in His giving of His beloved Son to die in our stead; and our Lord's mercy enabled Him to make willingly the awful sacrifice (Rom. 5:8).

MERCY SEAT (See Tabernacle)

MERED (mē'rĕd, rebellion), a descendant of Judah who married a daughter of one of the Pharaohs (I Chron. 4:17,18).

MEREMOTH (mĕr'ē-mŏth, Heb. merēmôth, elevations). 1. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:3).

2. One who returned with Ezra 457 B.C. and who weighed the silver and gold that had been brought back. He was son of Uriah, a priest of Israel (Ezra 8:33). He helped Nehemiah to rebuild the wall (Neh. 3:4,21). (These may be two persons.)

3. One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

4. A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5).

MERES (mē'rez, worthy), a Persian prince under Xerxes ("Ahasuerus") (Esth. 1:14).

MERIBAH (mĕr'ī-bà, Heb. merîbâh, contention). 1. A place near and to the NW of Sinai where Moses, at the command of Jehovah, struck the rock and water gushed out for the refreshment of the people (Exod. 17:1-7). Moses named the place "Massah," i.e., "tempting," and "Meribah" because of the striving of the children of Israel, and because they tempted Jehovah.

2. A place near Kadesh-barnea where the people again thirsted and where Jehovah commanded Moses to speak to the rock. Moses exceeded his instructions, and apparently wanting some of the credit for the miracle, he struck the rock, and water came forth (Num. 20:1-13). For this arrogance, Moses was forbidden to enter the Promised Land.

MERIB-BAAL (mĕr'ĭb-bā'ăl, Baal contends), son of Jonathan, the son of king Saul (I Chron. 8:34; 9:40). Possibly the same as Mephibosheth, q.v.

MERIBAH-KADESH (See Meribah)

MERODACH (mē-rō'dăk, Heb. merōdhākh, Akkad Marduk), a Babylonian god.

MERODACH BALADAN (mē-rō'dăk-băl'ā-dăn, Marduk has given a son), a king of Babylon called Berodach-baladan in II Kings 20:12. He was a strong, courageous leader of the Chaldeans, who lived in the marshes of southern Mesopotamia. In 722 B.C. he rebelled against the Assyrians, who had controlled Babylon for many years, and became king of Babylon. Sargon, king of Assyria, recognized him as Babylonian king in 721. He reigned 11 years. At about 712, Merodach Baladan sent an embassy to Hezekiah. While it came ostensibly to congratulate the Hebrew king on his recovery (II Kings 20:12-19; Isa. 39:1-8), the embassy really came to invite him to join in a confederacy with Babylon, Susiana, Phoenicia, Moab, Edom, Philistia and Egypt for a grand attack on the Assyrian empire. Sargon, getting wind of the plot, attacked and defeated his enemies individually. In 710 he took Babylon; in 709 Bit-Yakin (Merodach Baladan's home in southern Mesopotamia) fell and Merodach Baladan was captured. He managed to be reinstated in his princedom of Bit-Yakin. In 703 he briefly took Babylon and ruled there, but was again driven to Bit-Yakin by Sennacherib, Sargon's son and successor. Later he was obliged to flee the country and found refuge in Elam, while the Chaldeans were subjugated. Although Merodach Baladan had failed in his project to revive the power of the city of Babylon, the Chaldeans, whose chief he was, became from his days the dominant caste in Babylon (Dan. 2:2,10; 5:7; Ezra 5:12). J.B.G.

MEROM (mē'rŏm, Heb. mērôm, a high place), a district near the head-waters of the Jordan river, N of the Sea of Galilee. Most of it is high in comparison with the "waters of Merom" through which the Jordan flows and which is just about sea-level. In Bible times, the waters of Merom formed a small lake, but for a long time it was only a marsh which has recently been drained. Its only mention in Scripture is in Joshua 11:5,7 as the site of the great battle of Joshua's northern campaign in which he, with the help of God, greatly discomfited Jabin, king of Hazor, and his Canaanite allies. The men of the tribe of Dan, when searching for a more commodious land for the tribe (Judg. 18) passed through this region and described it as "very good" and "the land is large."

MERONOTHITE (mē-rŏn'ā-thīt), an inhabitant of Meronoth, a region in Galilee which was given to the tribe of Naphtali. Its principal town was Shimron-meron which Joshua conquered (Josh. 11:1; 12:20). For two Meronothites see I Chronicles 27:30; Nehemiah 3:7.

MEROZ (mē'roz, Heb. mērôz), a place in Galilee not far from Nazareth; infamous because its inhabitants "came not to the help of Jehovah" when Deborah and Barak needed help against Jabin, king of Canaan. Judges 5:23 attributes its curse to the angel of Jehovah.

MESECH (See Meshech)

MESHA (mē'shà, Heb. mēshā', mēshā'). 1. A place in southern Arabia which marks a boundary of the habitations of the early Semitic Arabs (Gen. 10:30).

2. A Benjamite mentioned only in I Chronicles 8:9. He was probably born in Moab. (These first two seem to have the root meaning "retreat," whereas the next two are spelled differently in Hebrew and mean "welfare.")

3. A fourth generation descendant of Judah through Perez, Hezron and Caleb (I Chron. 2:42).

4. A king of Moab in the days of Ahab, and his two sons who succeeded him, Ahaziah and Jehoram. From David's time (II Sam. 8:2) Moab had been more or less subject to Israel, and Mesha, who was a sheepmaster, had been obliged to pay a tremendous tribute (II Kings 3:4), but he rebelled against Ahaziah. Jehoram, with the help of Jehoshaphat of Judah, attacked and defeated him (II Kings 3:4-27). Mesha in desperation sacrificed his own son. For Mesha's account of the affair see article on MOABITE STONE.

MESHACH (mē'shăk, Heb. mēshakh), the heathen name given to Mishael, one of the four princes of Judah taken by Nebuchadnezzar to be trained in his palace as counselors to the king. These four had borne names containing the syllable "el" for "God" or "iah" for "Jehovah," but the names were changed to honor gods of Babylon (Dan. 1:3-7).

MESHECH (mē'shĕk, Heb. meshekh, tall). 1. A son of Japheth in the "Table of the Nations" (Gen. 10:2) associated with Magog and Tubal and thought by many to have been progenitors of Russians and other Slavic peoples.

2. The people descended from the preceding. They are noted as traffickers with Tyre in slaves as well as vessels of brass (Ezek. 27:13), and in Ezekiel 38,39 they are prophesied as joining in a northern confederation against Israel and as to be destroyed upon the mountains of Israel. The leader of this northern group is called "Gog."

3. A grandson of Shem, written "Mash" in Genesis 10:23 but "Meshech" in I Chronicles 1:17.

4. A tribe mentioned in Psalm 120:5 with (or probably contrasted with) the tents of Kedar. Probably the same as No. 2 above.

MESHELEMIAH (mē-shĕl'ē-mī'à), father of Zechariah, leading gatekeeper of the tent of meeting. He had seven sons (I Chron. 9:21; 26:1,2,9). Called "Shelemiah" in I Chronicles 26:14.

MESHEZABEEL (mē-shĕz'à-bēl, God delivers). 1. Ancestor of Meshullam (Neh. 3:4).

2. A covenanter with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:21).

3. A descendant of Judah through Zerah (Neh. 11:24).

MESHILLEMITH (See Meshillemoth)

MESHILLEMOTH (mē-shĭl'ē-moth, recompense). 1. Father of Berechiah, a noble Ephraimite who helped to clothe and feed the captives from Judah and to restore them to their homes (II Chron. 28:12).

2. Priestly ancestor of Amashsai, who dwelt at Jerusalem in the Restoration (Neh. 11:13). Meshillemith (I Chron. 9:12) is another spelling of the same name.

MESHOBAB (mē-shō'băb, restored), a Simeonite in the days of Hezekiah, who with others defeated the Meunim at Gedor, near Hebron, and took their pasture land (I Chron. 4:34).

MESHULLAM (mē-shŭl'ăm, Heb. meshullām, reconciled), a very common name in the OT. 1. Grandfather of Shaphan, trusted scribe of Josiah (II Kings 22:3).

2. A son of Zerubbabel in the Jewish royal family (I Chron. 3:19).

3. A leading Gadite in the days of Jeroboam II (I Chron. 5:13).

4. A chief Benjamite in Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:17).

5. Father of Sallu, a Benjamite of Jerusalem after the captivity (I Chron. 9:7).

6. Another Benjamite of Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:8).

7. A priest in the high-priestly lines whose descendants dwelt at Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11).

8. Ancestor of another priest (I Chron. 9:12).

9. A Kohathite, overseer of repairing the temple in the days of Josiah (II Chron. 34:12).

10. A chief man who returned with Ezra 457 B.C. (Ezra 8:16).

11. One appointed by Ezra in the matter of doing away with foreign marriages (Ezra 10:15).

12. One of the offenders in this matter (Ezra 10:29).

13. One who rebuilt two portions of the wall, but was connected by marriage with Tobiah, a hinderer (Neh. 3:4,30; 6:18).

14. Another repairer (Neh. 3:6).

15. One who stood with Ezra in the revival (Neh. 8:4).

16. A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:7).

17. Another covenanter (Neh. 10:20).

18. A man of Benjamin whose descendants lived in Jerusalem c. 444 B.C. (Neh. 11:7).

19. A priest c. 470 B.C. (Neh. 12:13).

20. Possibly the same man (Neh. 12:33).

21. Another priest c. 470 B.C. (Neh. 12:16).

22. A Levite gatekeeper at the time (Neh. 12:25).

MESHULLEMETH (mē-shŭl'ē-mĕth, fem. of Meshullam), daughter of Haruz of Jotbah, who married King Manasseh of Judah and was mother of Amon who succeeded to the throne (II Kings 21:19).

MESOBAITE (mē-sō'bā-īt, perhaps from Zobah), in ASV more correctly Mezobaite, a patronymic referring to a place otherwise unknown and unheard of (I Chron. 11:47).

MESOPOTAMIA (mĕs'ō-pō-tā'mĭ-à, from Gr. mésos, middle, and pótamos, river), the name applied in particular to the area between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, a region which in the Hebrew is called Aram, Aram-Naharaim, or Padan-Aram, along with various other names for localities or peoples of this region. In present day application the term is used of a territory practically coextensive with modern Iraq. There are indications of the latter usage in the NT, such as Acts 7:2 and possibly Acts 2:9 (see below). The English OT frequently translates 'aram naharayim, "Aram of the two rivers," as "Mesopotamia." Genesis 24:10 states that the servant of Abraham "went to Mesopotamia, unto the city of Nahor." This is in the vicinity of the Khabur River and attempts have been made to localize Aram-Naharaim between the Euphrates and the Khabur. Balaam, the soothsayer hired by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the Israelites, came from Pethor "of Mesopotamia" (Deut. 23:4; for a nearer definition of his homeland, see Num. 22:5). In Judges 3:8,10 the oppressor of the Israelites, Cushan-Rishathaim, is called "king of Mesopotamia." This geographic reference indicates the area E of the Euphrates and some commentators have regarded this king as a foreign conqueror of this territory.

Early in the reign of David, Hanum, the king of the Ammonites insulted the ambassadors whom David sent to bring condolences to the new Ammonite king upon the death of his father. Fearing reprisals on David's part, the Ammonites hired "chariots and horsemen from Mesopotamia, from Aram-maacah, and from Zobah" (I Chron. 19:6). In the description of the events which followed, the hired allies are lumped together under the term "Syrians." "Syria" is the usual English rendering of the Heb. aram. Aram (Gen. 10:22,23; I Chron. 1:17) was the progenitor of the Arameans, or Syrians. Bethuel and Laban are called Syrians (Gen. 25:20; 31:20 et al.) and even Jacob is referred to as a "wandering Aramean" (Deut. 26:5, RSV) from his stay in Padan-Aram, a term is used in the Bible only in connection with Jacob and which the LXX gives as Mesopotamia or Mesopotamia-Syria. There is some uncertainty concerning the meaning of the word Padan; it has been suggested that it means "garden," "field," or "plain." There can be no doubt about the location of Padan-Aram, for it is associated with Haran (Gen. 28:10; 29:4) and therefore is in the same general area as Aram-Naharaim. The most important cities in the region were Haran, on the Balikh River, and Gozan (II Kings 17:6, prob. modern Tell Halaf) on the Khabur, both of these rivers are tributaries of the Euphrates. It was in this district that relatives of Abraham lived and it is of more than passing interest to note that the names of a number of individuals thus mentioned in the Biblical text are preserved in place-names from this very area.

Several significant archaeological and historical features are associated with this Mesopotamia region. Tell Halaf is the type site for the period of prehistory whose beautifully painted pottery appears from Assyria to Syria and the Mediterranean coast. To the SE on the Euphrates, was Mari (Tell Hariri), which was an important state of the Hammurabi age. Its king, Zimri Lim, had a palace of almost 300 rooms and also a library and archives of more than 20,000 clay tablets. A royal concern for divination is attested by the presence of clay liver models found in one of the palace rooms; hepatoscopy was an important Mesopotamian practice and its appearance here is instructive in relation to the determined effort made by the king of Moab to procure Balaam to curse the Israelites. Just before the time of the Amarna letters, this area was the seat of Mitanni, a powerful Hurrian (Horite) kingdom ruled by an Indo-European aristocracy. The king of Mitanni was involved in the official correspondence with Egypt found at el-

Amarna and shortly thereafter Mitanni was overwhelmed by the Hittite Subbiluliuma.

In the NT, the mention of Mesopotamia as one of the regions from which the Jews of the Diaspora had come to Jerusalem (Acts 2:9, "residents of Mesopotamia," RSV) probably has reference to that part of the Near East included in modern Iraq and may refer more particularly to the area near ancient Babylon. Stephen's allusion to the fact that the call of God came to Abraham, "while he was in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran" (Acts 7:2), definitely puts southern Iraq in Mesopotamia, for Abraham was then in the city of Ur (Gen. 11:31). The southern part of Mesopotamia, including Ur and a number of other city-states, was known as Sumer; the central section was called Akkad and later was named Babylonia, after the city of Babylon gained the ascendancy; the northern division, along with Tigris, was Assyria, the land of Asshur. C.E.D.

MESS, any dish of food sent to the table (Gen. 43:34; II Sam. 11:8; Heb. 12:16).

MESSIAH (mĕ-sī'à), a word that represents the Hebrew māshîah, the Aramaic meshîhā', and the Greek Messías. "Messias" (John 1:41; 4:25 KJV), is a transcription of the Greek word. Thus "Messiah" is a modification of the Greek form according to the Hebrew. The basic meaning of the word is "anointed one." Christ is the English form of the Greek Christós which means "anointed." The Septuagint uses Christós 40 times to translate the Hebrew māshîah. In ancient Israel both persons and things consecrated to sacred purposes were anointed by having oil poured over them. When the tabernacle was dedicated, the building, its various parts, and the holy vessels were anointed (Exod. 30:26-30; 40:9-11). Official persons were consecrated with oil. Sometimes prophets were anointed when they were consecrated (I Kings 19:16). The statement in Isaiah 61:1, "the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings," is an allusion to this practice. Priests were also anointed with oil for their office (Exod. 29:21; Lev. 8:30). The kings apparently were anointed regularly (I Sam. 9:16; 16:3; II Sam. 12:7; I Kings 1:34). The king was "the Lord's anointed" in a special sense. In the OT the primary significance of the expression "the Lord's anointed" refers to the earthly king who is reigning over the Lord's people. It is a reference to the king's close relationship to the Lord and to the sacral character of his position and person. The Israelites did not think of crowning a king but of anointing him when he was enthroned. The fact that he was anointed was the essential characteristic of the ruler.

Where the expressions "the Lord's anointed," "mine anointed," "thine anointed," etc., occur in the OT, the reference is not used as a technical designation of the Messiah, but refers to the king of the line of David, ruling in Jerusalem, and anointed by the Lord through the priest. It is noteworthy that Isaiah uses the term only once and then of the Persian Cyrus (Isa. 45:1). Later, the expression, "Son of David" was a synonym for "Messiah" (Mark 10:47f; Matt. 21:9). It is obvious that there must be some historical connection between the designations "the Lord's anointed," "mine anointed," "thine anointed," "the anointed one," and the title "Messiah." The term "Messiah" apparently is a later expression and is an abbreviation of the fuller title "the Lord's anointed." It shows that the Messiah of Israel's Messianic hope derived His name from the sacral title of the kings of David's line. With the possible exception of Daniel 9:25,26 the title "Messiah" as a reference to Israel's eschatological king does not occur in the OT. It appears in this sense later in the NT and in the literature of Judaism. In the NT the Messiah is "the Christ," the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew māshîah.

Closely related to the eschatological character of the Messiah is His political significance. He is to destroy the world powers in an act of judgment, deliver Israel from her enemies, and restore her as a nation. The Messiah is the King of this future kingdom to whose political and religious domination the other nations will yield. His mission is the redemption of Israel and His dominion is universal. This is the clear picture of the Messiah in practically all of the OT passages which refer to Him. The Messiah will put an end to war, for he is the Prince of Peace, and He will rule righteously over His people. He Himself is righteous and is called the righteous Messiah or the Messiah of righteousness (Jer. 23:6). But this implies more than a just judgment and government of His people. The term "righteousness" when used in connection with the Messiah is inseparably related to salvation. The Messiah will establish the right of His people against any foe from without or from within. He will establish this salvation and maintain it in the face of all opposing forces. Righteousness and salvation are the same because the Messiah's righteousness is declared in His saving acts. Jewish writers have made much of this with reference to Malachi 4:2. At the same time it is frequently emphasized that by His righteousness the Messiah will establish justice and righteousness, in the ethical sense, in the land. Sin will be rooted out and Israel will become a holy people.

Perhaps the most profound spiritual work of the Messiah is seen in His position as the intermediary between God and the people by interceding for them. This is the Targum's interpretation of Isaiah 53, but this chapter is much more profound than the Jewish exegetes seemed to realize. It is true that the Targum on Isaiah identifies the Servant of the Lord with the Messiah, and that it uses this expression as a title of the Messiah, but His suffering is interpreted merely as the danger and anxiety which are His lot in this war with the ungodly. There is no real distinction here between the suffering of the Servant and the suffering to which the prophets of Israel were exposed in fulfilling their mission. But what is said of the suffering of the Servant of the Lord by Isaiah is infinitely more significant than this. In the suffering Servant the Messiah is seen making vicarious atonement through His passion and death which has a positive purpose in the plan of God for the salvation of sinful men. The Messiah, as the suffering Servant in a measure sums up the entire prophetic movement and constitutes a climax in OT prophecy.

The progress of prophetic revelation in history leads up to the idea of the innocent suffering Servant of God, who in the redemptive purpose of His death reconciles men to God. In the Messiah's sacrifice of Himself as an expiation for sin His priestly office is revealed to be combined with His work as prophet and king. The redemptive work of the Messiah includes the restoration of the paradise that existed in the beginning but was lost through the fall of Adam. There will be through the Messiah the establishment of the kingdom of the end time, the kingdom of God on earth, the restoration of Israel. As the Messiah was present from the first in the creation so He is also present as the central figure of the last events. He is declared to be the first-born of creation and also its end and goal of creation (John 1:1; Col. 1:15-17; Rev. 3:14).

The NT conception of the Messiah is developed directly from the teaching of the OT. The essential features of the OT picture of the Messiah are gathered up and transformed in the person of Jesus. He combined the idea of the suffering, dying, and glorified Servant of the Lord with that of the Son of Man who will return on the clouds of heaven. It is the Messiah, as the Son of Man, who will suffer, die, and rise again on the third day. It was "according to the Scriptures" that the Son of Man must suffer and die. But even though Jesus was victorious over death in His resurrection and ascension to the right hand of the Father, yet He did not reign in His full Messiahship in His righteous kingdom. Thus His ultimate victory was revealed to be in the future and consequently He must come again in power to establish His Messianic throne and kingdom. Jesus frequently used the phrase "The Son of Man" to express His interpretation of His nature and His part in the coming of God's kingdom. It seems that Jesus preferred this title in referring to Himself. He uses it primarily not to express His humanity. On the contrary, it is a proclamation of the paradox that He, who appears as an ordinary man, is at the same time the One in whom there are supernatural powers of the kingdom of God. It means that He who took upon Himself the form of a man will some day be revealed as "the Son of Man" with power and glory. The title, then, is an expression for the triumphant Messiah who comes on the clouds in the majesty of His exaltation.

The expression "the Son of Man" used of the Messiah reflects the general picture, in the NT of a more profound view of His person. The Messiah as the Son of Man is a pre-existent heavenly being. Long before Abraham, Jesus said, the Son of Man was (John 8:58; cf. John 17:5; Col. 1:17). The origin of creation is linked with the Messiah Jesus in various Scriptures (Col. 1:15-17; I Cor. 8:6; II Cor. 8:9). It is also as pre-existent that Jesus is called "elect" (I Pet. 2:6). God had prepared Him to carry out His purpose in redemption and eschatological judgment. Furthermore, the Messiah is revealed to be the Son of Man in a unique sense (John 1:1; Rom. 1:4). Jesus affirms this in His conversation with the priests and elders. Jesus is asked "Are you the Messiah . . . Are you the Son of God?" (Mark 14:62; Matt. 26:63f; Luke 22:67-70) and His claim is clear. As the Son of God, the Messiah possesses the power of God's authority. It is as the Son of God that the divine nature of the Messiah is supremely revealed. A.C.S.

MESSIAS (See Messiah)

METALS (See Minerals of the Bible)

METEYARD (mēt'yärd, Heb. middâh), an archaic word for "measures of length" (Lev. 19:35).

METHEG-AMMAH (mē'thĕg-ăm'à, the bridle of the metropolis), a town David took from the hands of the Philistines (II Sam. 8:1). KJV makes it seem like a proper noun, but cf. ASV.

METHUSAEL (mē-thū'sā'ĕl, more correctly Methushael as in ASV), father of the Cainite Lamech before the Flood (Gen. 4:18).

METHUSELAH (mē-thū'zĕ-là, Heb. methûshelah, man of the javelin), antediluvial Sethite, died at 969 years of age, in the very year of the Flood (Gen. 5:22-27). He was the son of Enoch and the father of Lamech (Gen. 5:21-27).

MEUNIM (mē-ū'nĭm, Heb. me'ûnîm, the people of Maon), an Arab city still existing S of the Dead Sea not far from the more famous Petra. They are listed among the tribes that Uzziah of Judah conquered. II Chronicles 26:7 in KJV calls them "Mehunims." Ezra 2:50, repeated in Nehemiah 7:52, speaks of their descendants. The Masoretes say that "habitations" (I Chron. 4:41) should read "Meunim." Ezra counts them among the "Nethinim" or temple-servants at the return (Ezra 2:50).

MEZAHAB (mĕz'ā-hăb, Heb. mêzāhāv), grandfather of Mehetabel who married Hadar, an Edomite king (Gen. 36:39; I Chron. 1:50).

MIAMIN (mī'à-mĭn, Heb. mîyāmîn, from the right hand i.e. fortunate). 1. One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:25).

2. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:5).

3. "Mijamin" q.v. in I Chronicles 24:9 and Nehemiah 10:7 is the same word in Hebrew.

MIBHAR (mĭb'hàr, Heb. mivhār, choice), one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:38), the son of Haggeri (ASV more correctly Hagri).

MIBSAM (mĭb'săm, Heb. mivsām, sweet odor, related to Balsam). 1. One of the 12 Ishmaelite patriarchs, corresponding to the 12 sons of Jacob (Gen. 25:13).

2. A grandson or great-grandson of Simeon, perhaps named after the preceding (I Chron. 4:25).

MIBZAR (mĭb'zàr, Heb. mivtsār, a fortress), one of the 11 "sheikhs" or chiefs, not "dukes," descended from Esau (Gen. 36:42).

MICAH (mī'kà, Heb. mîkkâh), short form of the name Micaiah (or Michael), meaning "Who is like Jehovah (or God)?" The name is applied to seven individuals in the OT: 1. An Ephraimite mentioned in Judges 18 and 19.

2. A Reubenite listed in I Chronicles 5:5.

3. A grandson of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:34; 9:40).

4. A Levite (I Chron.,23:20).

5. The father of one of Josiah's officers who is called Achbor in II Kings 22:12, but Abdon in II Chronicles 34:20 (Hebrew text — the Syriac says Abchor and the Greek manuscripts vary).

6. The canonical prophet Micah, the Moresthite (Mic. 1:1 and Jer. 26:18).

7. The son of Imlah, (II Chron. 18:14) usually called Micaiah.

Of these men, only No. 1, the Ephraimite, calls for special comment. The sixth, Micah the prophet, is unknown to us apart from the book that bears his name (see MICAH, BOOK OF). On the last, the son of Imlah, see MICAIAH.

Micah, the name of the Ephraimite, may indeed be a shortened form of Michael, as names compounded with El, "God," are more common in the early times before the monarchy. The record of Micah is a sad tale of apostasy in the days of the Judges. It forms a kind of appendix to the history of the 12 judges (Judg. 1 to 16), a place which it occupies along with the narrative of the Benjamite war (Judg. 19 to 21) and, in old Hebrew lists, the book of Ruth, which was at one time appended to Judges and like the other two stories concerns Bethlehem-Judah.

Micah had stolen some money from his mother, but confessed and restored it. She declared she had already dedicated it for an idol for her son and proceeded to use 200 shekels of it (a little over five pounds) to make such an image. Thereupon Micah set up a private sanctuary and ordained one of his sons as priest. Later he ordained a wandering Levite of Bethlehem-Judah. His idolatry, though far from the Mosaic prescriptions, was in the name of Jehovah and he evidently felt that a Levite, especially this Levite as we shall see, would win greater sanctity for his idol shrine.

This incident is linked with the Danite migration. The tribe of Dan first inherited in the South. Feeling restricted, they later moved to the far North where they appear later (Josh. 19:47; I Kings 12:29, etc.). On the way, their spies noticed Micah's sanctuary and later the Danite army pillaged Micah's shrine, abducted his priest and set up the sanctuary for their own, while the tabernacle was in Shiloh. The name of Micah's priest was Jonathan, a descendant of Moses (called Manasseh in Judg. 18:30 by courtesy of the Jewish scribes to protect the reputation of Moses, but the "n" is an insertion above the line! The Greek and other versions read Moses!) Thus Micah is mentioned incidentally to the record of this early apostasy of the tribe of Dan. R.L.H.

MICAH, BOOK OF, the fifth of the Minor Prophets, comes from the late 700's B.C. It predicts the fall of Samaria which occurred in 722, but concerns more especially the sins and dangers of Jerusalem in the days of Hezekiah around 700 B.C. As an outline will show, the message oscillates between condemnation for present sins and God's purpose of ultimate blessing for His people:

Outline:

I. Predicted desolation of Samaria and Jerusalem, 1:1-3:12.
II. Eventual blessings for Zion, 4:1-8.
III. Invasions and deliverance by the Davidic ruler, 4:9-5:15.
IV. Condemnations for sins, 6:1-7:6.
V. Eventual help from God, 7:7-20.

In the opening portion of the book, 1:1-3:12, God's judgment is first announced upon Samaria for her idolatry. Micah's interest seems to lie chiefly in Jerusalem, however, whose desolation is announced in 3:12 in very similar terms. Chapters 2 and 3 are a catalogue of Judah's sins. Oppression of the poor was a characteristic, but another basic factor was the refusal to hear God's prophets. As in Jeremiah's day, they preferred prophets who predicted peace (cf. 3:5 with Jer. 8:10,11; Ezek. 13:10). It is not improbable that Jeremiah and Ezekiel took their texts on this subject from Micah. At least, Micah's warning of 3:12 was well known in Jeremiah's day (Jer. 26:18). Jeremiah's friends quote these words verbatim ascribing them to the Micah of Hezekiah's time. Negative critics point out that Jeremiah quotes Micah as a prophet of doom and they conclude that every prediction of hope in Micah is not genuine. The conclusion seems far-fetched. Jeremiah's friends quoted only that part of the book which was applicable to their situation. This is no argument against the rest of the book.

The second section includes millennial verses which are practically identical with Isaiah 2:1-4. Many have questioned whether Micah quoted Isaiah, or vice versa or whether both quoted a common oracle. But Isaiah 2:1 calls this passage the word of Isaiah, which should decide the matter. Micah evidently uses Isaiah's promise and skilfully weaves it into his own composition.

The third section, 4:9-5:15, comes against the background of the wars of Hezekiah's day. The Assyrians carried captive 40 cities of Judah and received tribute from Hezekiah as Sennacherib himself tells us (cf. also, II Kings 18:13-16). But God delivered Jerusalem (II Kings 18:35). The "seven shepherds and eight principal men" of 5:5 probably is merely a symbolic numerical way of saying "one great deliverer" — a numerical device that can be paralleled in old Canaanite literature of Ugarit.

Yet in this section the captivity and return from Babylon are also predicted. Negative critics insist that similar passages in Isaiah 48:20; 45:28; etc., are late and actually written after the events described. In their denial of supernatural prediction, they must also say that Micah 4:10 is late. But according to Isaiah 39:6 and also by Assyrian testimony, Babylon was a menace in Micah's own day and these verses are quite appropriate.

Against these dangers to Judah God holds out the Messianic hope, 5:2. The mention of Bethlehem Ephratah identifies the Messiah as of David's line (cf. Isa. 11:1; Jer. 23:5; Ezek. 37:24; etc.). The "thousands of Judah" is read the "princes of Judah" in Matthew 2:6 by using different (and probably correct) vowels on the Hebrew consonants. "Thou Bethlehem," is masculine and therefore is probably a direct reference to the Messiah from Bethlehem, for the gender would be feminine if only the city were addressed.

The condemnations of Section IV (6:1-7:6) include several references to the Pentateuch and other historical books (6:4; 6:5; 6:16. Cf. also 5:6 with Gen. 10:8,9). The response of 6:8 is famous. Some have argued that it teaches salvation apart from sacrifice. Actually, it is an allusion to Deuteronomy 10:12 and involves Israel's duty to obey all the Mosaic injunctions. Christ probably alludes to this verse in his condemnation of the formalistic Pharisees (Matt. 23:23).

The book closes with the prophet's declaration of faith in the ultimate fulfilment of God's covenant of blessing for Abraham (7:20). R.L.H.

MICAIAH (mī-kā'yà, Heb. mîkhāyāhû, who is like Jehovah?), a true prophet of God, residing at Samaria the capital of the northern tribes of Israel c. 900 B.C. in the last days of Ahab, king of Israel and of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. Jehoshaphat, though a man of God, made the mistake of making affinity with Ahab, the worst of all the kings of Israel. (Contrast II Chron. 17:3-6 with I Kings 16:30-33.) Ahab took advantage of Jehoshaphat's visit by asking his assistance in taking Ramoth-Gilead from the Syrians whose king Benhadad I had taken it from Ahab's father, Omri. Jehoshaphat, letting his courtesy overcome his good judgment, consented, asking only that the prophets be consulted. Four hundred of Ahab's false prophets said, "Go up, for God will deliver it into the hand of the king." (For the whole story, compare I Kings 22 with II Chronicles 18).

When Jehoshaphat showed his distrust in the prophets and asked if there was not a prophet of Jehovah beside, Ahab replied "There is yet one man, but I hate him; the same is Micaiah, the son of Imla." A messenger was sent to bring Micaiah, who was told to prophesy favorably, but Micaiah replied that he could speak only what God would give him. After replying frivolously to Ahab's question, the king demanded the truth, and Micaiah told him how the hosts of heaven had planned to ruin Ahab by putting a false spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. Micaiah, after being insulted by the false prophet Zedekiah, was sent back to the city to be imprisoned and fed the bread and water of affliction until the king should return to deal with him. Micaiah boldly told Ahab that if he returned at all, Micaiah was a false prophet. Since Ahab partly believed this prophecy, he contrived a clever trick to get Jehoshaphat slain in his place. With a show of generosity he proposed that Jehoshaphat wear his kingly robes in the battle, but Ahab would disguise himself like a common soldier. To make the story short, Jehoshaphat cried out and escaped, but a Syrian drew a bow at a venture and the arrow slew Ahab. A.B.F.

MICHA (mī'cà, Heb. mîkhā', evidently, like Micah, an abb. of Micaiah, Who is like Jehovah?). 1. A grandson of Jonathan (II Sam. 9:12).
2. A Levite covenanter (Neh. 10:11).
3. Another Levite (Neh. 11:17).
4. Another (Neh. 11:22; Micah in I Chron. 9:15). These are uniformly Mica in ASV.

MICHAEL (mī'kĕl, Heb. mîkhā'ēl, who is like God?). 1. Father of Sethur, a spy from the tribe of Asher (Num. 13:13).
2. Two Gadites who dwelt in Bashan (I Chron. 5:13,14).
3. A Gershonite of the 11th generation, great-grandfather of Asaph, the singer (I Chron. 6:40).
4. A chief man of Issachar (I Chron. 7:3).
5. A Benjamite (I Chron. 8:16).
6. A captain of a thousand of Manasseh who joined David in Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).
7. The father of Omri of Issachar, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 27:18).
8. A prince of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat and brother of Jehoram, kings of Judah (II Chron. 21:2).
9. Father of Zebadiah, a chief Jew who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:8).
10. Last, and by far the most famous, the archangel whose chief responsibility seems to have been the care of the Jewish people. Michael had a dispute with Satan himself (Jude 9).

MICHAH (See Micah, Micha)

MICHAIAH (mī-kā'yà, Heb. mîkhāyāhû, who is like Jehovah?). 1. Father of Achbor, whom King Josiah sent with others to Huldah the prophetess to inquire about the prophecy which had been read to him (II Kings 22:12-14).
2. A daughter of Uriel of Gibeah, who had married Tamar, daughter of Absalom. She was the wife of Rehoboam of Judah and mother of Abijah who succeeded to the throne. See also "Maacah" which is another spelling of the name (II Chron. 13:2).
3. A prince of Judah whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the people (II Chron. 17:7).
4. Ancestor of a priest in Nehemiah's time, (Neh. 12:35).
5. A priest in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:41).
6. Grandson of Shaphan the scribe in Josiah's day who had brought the book of the law of the Lord to the king.
In ASV the name is Micaiah.

MICHAL (mī'kăl, Heb. mîkhāl, a contraction of mîkhā'ēl, Michael), the younger daughter of King Saul of Israel (I Sam. 14:49). Saul, insanely jealous of David, desired to kill him but found it impossible to do so by his own hands (I Sam. 18:11), so he tried trickery. He offered David his elder daughter Merab for his service against the Philistines, but changed his mind and gave her to another; then he learned that Michal loved David, so he offered her to David if he would give evidence of having slain 100 Philistines. He slew 200 and married Michal; but Saul hated him all the more. Once, when Saul sent to slay David, Michal helped him to escape (I Sam. 19:11-17), deceiving Saul's officers by putting an image in his bed, and thus giving him time to make good his escape. Though Michal truly loved David, she could not comprehend him, and so scoffed at him for rejoicing before the Lord (II Sam. 6:16-23). As a result, she never had a child.

MICHMAS, MICHMASH (mĭk'măs, mĭk'mash, Heb. mikhmās, mikhmāsh, a hidden place), a place in the ancient tribe of Benjamin about eight miles NE of Jerusalem. A notable battle occurred there between Israel and the Philistines in the reign of Saul (I Sam. 13,14). Michmash lay in the pass which goes eastward from Bethel and Ai down to Jericho, and at one place the pass was contained between two rocks, "Bozez" and "Seneh" (I Sam. 14:4). There Jonathan and his armor-bearer clambered up and started the victory over the Philistines, and there the British forces under General Allenby used the same strategy and won a victory over the Turks. In Isaiah 10:28, where the prophet is picturing with dramatic detail an advance of the Assyrian forces against Jerusalem, he mentions Michmash as the place where the invaders stored their baggage, hoping no doubt, to gather it on their return (Isa. 37:36). In the return from the captivity under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:27; Neh. 7:31) 122 men of this place are mentioned, indicating that it was a fair-sized community at the time. Here Jonathan Maccabeus made his governmental headquarters for a time (I Maccabees 9:73).

MICHMETHAH (mĭk'mē-thà, Heb. mikhmethâh), a landmark on the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:6 and 17:7). It was eastward of, but quite close to Shechem, and instead of being a town, it may have been, as its name implies, merely a "lurking place."

MICHRI (mĭk'rī, Heb. mikhrî), grandfather of Elah, a Benjamite in Jerusalem after the captivity (I Chron. 9:8).

MICHTAM (mĭk'tăm, Heb. mikhtām), a word of uncertain meaning found in the titles of six psalms of David (16, 56-60). The margin of KJV reads, "A golden Psalm." It very likely refers to a Psalm having to do with sin — its heinousness, atonement, or consequences.

MIDDIN (mĭd'ĭn, Heb. middîn), one of the six cities of Judah lying in the wilderness just W of the Dead Sea (Josh. 15:61).

MIDDLE WALL, a term taken from Ephesians 2:14, probably a reference to the barrier which stood between the Court of the Gentiles and the Court of the Jews in the temple in Jerusalem. Gentiles were forbidden to cross it under pain of death. Paul uses it as a symbol of the legal partition between Gentile and Jew, and points out that it has been removed by Christ.

MIDIAN, MIDIANITES (mĭd'ĭ-ăn, -īts, Heb. midhyān, midhānîm). 1. A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:1-6).

2. His descendants and the land which they claimed, lying mostly E of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, then southward through the Arabah and (in the time of Moses) including the southern and eastern parts of the peninsula of Sinai. In Genesis 37:25,36 a caravan of traders is called "Ishmaelites," then "Midianites," the former referring to their descent from Ishmael (Gen. 25:12-18) and the later to their abode in the land of Midian. When Moses fled from Egypt 40 years before the Exodus (Exod. 2:15-21) he helped the daughters of Reuel (or Jethro) the priest of Midian, was invited to their encampment, and married Zipporah, the priest's daughter. Thus the descendants of Moses had Midianite as well as Levite descent. Jethro, though priest of Midian, acknowledged Jehovah the God of Israel as supreme (Exod. 18:11) but neither he nor his son Hobab, though very friendly to Moses, could bring himself to join Israel (Num. 10:29).

Toward the end of the life of Moses, Midian had apparently become confederate with Moab (Num. 22:4). Through the counsel of Balaam, the Midianite women and girls wrought much harm in Israel and God commanded Moses to smite the nation (Num. 25:16-18). Two hundred years later, in the days of Gideon, God delivered Israel into the hand of Midian for seven years (Judg. 6:1-6). They allowed the Israelites to plough and to sow the seed, but they (the Midianites) did the reaping. Gideon defeated them and slew their two kings Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. 7:21). The names of these kings, and of the princes of Midian "Oreb" and "Zeeb" (Judg. 7:25) give us a picture of their civilization — Zeebah — "a slaying" or "a sacrifice"; Zalmunna — "to whom shade is denied"; Oreb — "a raven"; and Zeeb — "a wolf."

Though nomads, they had in the time of Moses great wealth; not only 675,000 sheep, 72,000 beeves (ASV "oxen"), and 61,000 asses, but also gold, silver, brass, iron, tin and lead; all of which are mentioned in the booty taken by the men of Israel (Num. 31:22,32-34). The Midianites have long since disappeared from among mankind.

A.B.F.

MIGDAL-EL (mĭg'dăl-ĕl, tower of God), one of the 19 fortified cities of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38); thought by some to be the "Magdala" of Matthew 15:39.

MIGDAL-GAD (mĭg'dăl-găd, tower of Gad), a city of Judah when Joshua divided the land (Josh. 15:37). Now probably Mejdal about 24 miles W of Hebron.

MIGDOL (mĭg'dŏl Heb. mighdôl). 1. A place just W of the former shallow bay at the N end of the Gulf of Suez, the westward arm of the Red Sea (Exod. 14:2; Num. 33:7). Close by, the Israelites made their last encampment in Egypt, and here Pharaoh thought that they were entrapped.

2. A place in the N of Egypt to which many Jews resorted in the days of Jeremiah, and where they even practiced idolatry in spite of the prophet's warnings (Jer. 44:1-14; 46:14).

MIGRON (mĭg'rŏn, Heb. mighrôn, precipice), a locality near Gibeah of Saul about seven miles NE of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Benjamin. Here Saul sat (I Sam. 14:2) under a pomegranate tree and here he made the headquarters of his little troop of about 600 men. In Isaiah 10:28 the prophet pictures the Assyrians as passing Migron as they approach to attack Jerusalem.

MIJAMIN (mĭj'ā-mĭn, Heb. mîyāmîn, from the right hand). 1. A priest in David's time (I Chron. 24:9).

2. A priest who covenanted with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:7).

3. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:5,7).

4. A man who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:25).

MIKLOTH (mĭk'lŏth, Heb. miqlôth, rods). 1. A Benjamite in Jerusalem after the Exile (I Chron. 8:32; 9:37,38).

2. A ruler of 24,000 men in the time of David (I Chron. 27:4).

MIKNEIAH (mĭk-nē'yà), a Levite harp player in David's time (I Chron. 15:18,21).

MILALAI (mĭ-à-lā'ī), a priest with a musical instrument in Nehemiah's celebration (Neh. 12:36).

MILCAH (mĭlkà, Heb. milkâh, counsel). 1. A daughter of Haran, Abram's youngest brother, who died at Ur of the Chaldees, and sister of Lot. She married her uncle Nahor and bore him eight children of whom one was Bethuel, father of Rebekah and Laban (Gen. 11:27-29; 22:20-23).

2. One of the five daughters, co-heiresses of Zelophehad, the Manassite. They had to marry within their tribe (Num. 36, esp. vs. 12).

MILCOM (See Moloch)

MILDEW, a pale fungus growth which discolors and spoils grains and fruits in warm damp weather. In Scripture it is always associated with "blasting" (Deut. 28:22; I Kings 8:37; Amos 4:9; Hag. 2:17).

MILE (See Weights and Measures)

MILETUS (mī-lē'tŭs, Gr. Míletos), in KJV once Miletune. According to Pausanias, Miletus, southernmost of the Greek cities of Asia Minor, was a Cretan foundation. According to Homer, it was occupied by "foreign-speaking" Carians who fought in the Trojan confederation. Possibly a short time after the Trojan War (12th century B.C.) Ionians seized the city. In the great age of Greek colonization (eighth to sixth century B.C.) Miletus planted many emporia right around the circle of the Black Sea, and the wealth of such foundations points to vigorous and expansive life in the metropolis. A similar conclusion may be drawn from the fact that Miletus maintained contact with Sybaris in Italy until the fall of that town in 510, and exerted some pressure on Egypt. Miletus must have exercised strong sea-power during these active centuries, and her military might is shown by the resistance she offered to the Lydian kings, and the privileged position accorded even by the greatest of those rulers, Croesus. When Croesus' kingdom fell to the Persians in 546 B.C., no attempt was made to reduce Miletus' independence. In 499 Miletus took the lead in precipitating the Ionian Revolt. In a naval engagement at Lade she suffered defeat, and the city was occupied by the Persians in 494. The disaster ended Miletus' long prosperity, until then damaged only by the factional strife which was endemic in all ancient Greek cities. The sixth century B.C. was the "floruit" of the Milesian savants, Thales, statesman, philosopher, physicist, and astronomer, Anaximander and Anaximenes, the physicists and astronomers, and Hecataeus, the geographer. Industry flourished, and Milesian woolen goods were famous. After Persia's defeat at Mycale in 479, Miletus regained her freedom, and joined the Delian League, Athens' security organization, leaving it in 412, in the day of Athens' decline and disaster, only to fall under Persia again. In the fourth century the city was under Caria, whence came her first founders. Aspasia, blue-stocking mistress of Pericles, Hippodamus, who planned the Piraeus, and Timotheus, the poet, belong to this second period of Milesian vigor. The rest of Miletus' history was undistinguished. A silting harbor, the common bane of that coast, ended her sea-power and sea-borne commerce. At the time of St. Paul's visit (Acts 20:15, 17) Miletus was a city of no great standing in the Roman province of Asia. The sea is now ten miles from the ancient site. E.M.B.

MILK (See Food)

MILL (Heb. rēheh, Gr. múlos, mulón), an apparatus used to grind any edible grain — wheat, barley, oats, rye, etc. — into flour. It consists of two circular stones, the lower one having a slightly convex upper surface to help the drifting of the broken grain toward the outer edge whence it drops. It is made of a hard stone, which after being shaped, is scratched with curved furrows so as to multiply the cutting and grinding effects. The lower stone has a stout stick standing at its center, and the upper one (called the rider) has a hole at its center so that it can rotate around the stick, and a handle eight or ten inches from the center by which it is turned. Generally it is worked by two women, facing each other, and each grasping the handle to turn the rider. One woman feeds the grain in at the center of the rider and the other guides and brushes the products into a little pile. The process is very ancient, for we read of "the maid-servant that is behind the mill" in the days of Moses (Exod. 11:5) and the process was no doubt old at that remote time. Even the manna which fell in the wilderness was tough enough so that the people used to grind it in mills or beat it in mortars before cooking it (Num. 11:7,8).

It is altogether probable that men pounded grain before they thought of grinding it, and so the mortar is probably more ancient even than the mill. Because men depended upon flour for "the staff of life" and because they generally ground it only as needed, it was forbidden to take a mill in pledge (Deut. 24:6). In Jeremiah 25:10 "the sound of the mill-stone" is mentioned as a sign of happy prosperous life, but in Isaiah 47:2 the prophet taunts the proud and delicate women of Babylon with the thought that they will have to become slaves and labor at the mill. When the Philistines blinded Samson (Judg. 16:21) he had to grind in the prison-house, and this mill was probably a larger one ordinarily turned by a blinded ox or donkey. Abimelech, usurping "king" of Israel, was slain by a woman who dropped a millstone upon his head (Judg. 9:53) and our Lord prophesies that at His coming "two women shall be grinding at the mill: one shall be taken and the other is left" (Matt. 24:41). A millstone cast into the sea is a symbol of absolute destruction (Rev. 18:21). A.B.F.

MILLENNIUM, the Latin word for "thousand years." It comes from Revelation 20:1-15 where a certain period of a "thousand years" is mentioned six times. During this period (1) Satan is "bound" with a "great chain," "locked up" and "sealed" in "the abyss," so that he can not "deceive the nations"; (2) persons designated as "martyrs" who have been "beheaded," "live" and "reign with Christ."

The "living" of the beheaded persons is declared (by synecdoche) to be "the first resurrection," that is, the resurrection of "those that are Christ's" (I Cor. 15:23) in contrast with the "living" of "the rest of the dead." "The rest of the dead" did not "live" until the end of the millennial period. After this period all the rest of the dead, without exception, are raised to stand before the "great white throne" of God.

Paul predicts (Rom. 8:17-26) that this created earth will realize its "hope," and will be delivered from the corruption of the curse (Gen. 3:17,18) "unto the glorious liberty of the children of God," and that this period of blessedness for the created earth will come after "the apocalypse of the sons of God." The latter event takes place at the Lord's return, according to I John 3:2 and Colossians 3:4.

Peter explains (Acts 3:20,21) that Christ, as to his visible presence, will remain in heaven until "the times of restitution of all things."

The reigning of the saints with Christ after His second coming is several times predicted in the Lord's teachings. In His ministry "beyond Jordan" on the last journey to Jerusalem, He said, "ye which have followed with me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:28). He repeated the same promise in somewhat amplified form at the last supper (Luke 22:18,28-30). It is doubtless this and similar promises of Christ to which Paul refers in I Corinthians 6:2,3, and II Timothy 2:12.

The reigning of the saints with Christ is definitely subsequent to His second coming: Paul rebukes the arrogant Corinthians, "Ye have begun to reign without us! I wish that you had begun to reign [in reality], so that we should be reigning with you" (I Cor. 4:8, original translation). Similarly the Augsburg Confession (Art. 17) condemns the opinion "that before the resurrection of the dead the godly shall occupy the kingdom of the world . . ."

The parable of the wheat and the tares (Matt. 13:24-30,36-43) explicitly places the kingdom in which the righteous participate subsequent to the harvest at the end of the age.

The parable of the nobleman who went to receive a kingdom, and then returned to take possession of it (Luke 19:11-28) is even more explicit. Alford and others point out striking similarities to aspects of the affairs of Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, whose rule over Judea had to be granted from Rome. (See Josephus, Antiq. XVII 11, ff and 13, 1.) Christ is the "nobleman" whose visible presence is now withdrawn from this world. He has resumed His eternal place at the right hand of the Father (Ps. 110:1; Heb. 1:13). At the time appointed by the Father (Dan. 7:13,14; Acts 1:6,7) He will return visibly and reign (Rev. 11:15,17). The words addressed to faithful servants, "have thou authority over ten cities" and "be thou also over five cities" (Luke 19:17,19) coincide with Christ's promises cited above.

The eternal sovereignty of Christ as co-eternal, con-substantial, and co-equal in the Triune Godhead, must not be confused with His temporal kingship for which we pray in the petition, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." The latter kingdom is a phase of His omnipotent rule which obviously has a beginning in future time.

Those who look for Christ's visible return preceding His millennial kingdom, that is, premillennialists, adhere to the grammatico-historical method of exegesis, taking propositional truth in its simplest sense, understanding statements as "literal" unless there is sound reason to believe them to be intended figuratively. On the other hand, there has always been a tendency to "spiritualize" or "demythologize" whatever seems unfamiliar, and the "interpretations" of the millennium are numberless. Those called post-millennialists hold that Christ will return after the millennium. Amillennialists deny that there will be a millennial reign on earth.

The "blessed hope" of the church in all generations (Titus 2:13, cf. I Thess. 4:17) is the immanent, glorious return of Christ. J.O.B.

MILLET (See Plants)

MILLO (mĭl'ō, Heb. millô', fullness), a mound or rampart built up and filled in with earth and stones to raise the level. 1. An ancient fortification in or near Shechem. In Judges 9:6,20 "the house of Millo" mentioned three times probably means the inhabitants of this tower or fortification.

2. A place just N of Mt. Zion and outside the city of David, though it was inside the city of Jerusalem from Hezekiah's time and onward. When David had taken Zion (II Sam. 5:7-9), he began to fill up Millo and to build thence inward toward Zion. Solomon later strengthened Millo (I Kings 9:15,24; 11:27), and Hezekiah, 300 years later, again strengthened Millo, this time against the Assyrians (II Chron. 32:5). Joash or Jehoash, righteous and godly king of Judah for 40 years, was the victim of a conspiracy of his servants against his life and it was at the house of Millo that they slew him (II Kings 12:20,21).

MINA (See Weights and Measures)

MIND, a word that renders a number of Hebrew and Greek nouns in Scripture. Among the more important are the Heb. lebh, heart; nephesh, soul; and the Gr. noús and diánoia, the former denoting the faculty of reflective consciousness, of moral thinking and knowing, while the latter means meditation, reflection. None of these words is used with any precision of meaning. In the NT the word "mind" frequently occurs in an ethical sense, as in Colossians 2:18 and Romans 7:25.

MINERALS OF THE BIBLE. The present science of mineralogy with its names and exact terminology is a young science coming later than physics, chemistry, astronomy, or mathematics. Mineralogy as a science certainly did not exist at the time the Bible was written. It is quite impossible to be certain in all cases that when a mineral name is used in the Bible, it is used with the same meaning as that attached in modern mineralogy. The gemstones or precious stones of the Bible are minerals with identities in a considerable state of uncertainty and confusion. There are of course a number of minerals that present no problems. Water is a mineral, the identity of which has always been certain. No one questions the meaning of gold, silver, and iron.

Mineralogists find it somewhat difficult to define the word mineral, but its scientific meaning can be clarified by the use of specific examples. A granite boulder belongs to the mineral kingdom as contrasted to the animal or vegetable kingdoms, but it is a rock and not a mineral. It is composed of a number of minerals most of which are of microscopic size. The minerals in granite visible to the naked eye are the clear, glassy, particles of quartz, one or more of the white or pink feldspars, and the darker biotite or hornblende. Quartz is classified as a mineral, first because it was formed in nature, second it was not formed by plant or animal, third it has a uniform composition throughout the particle, and finally quartz always crystallizes in the hexagonal system of crystals. Quartz is always composed of 46.7 per cent silicon and 53.3 per cent oxygen. Extremely slight amounts of impurities may impart a wide variety of colors, thus resulting in precious stones with differing names, yellow quartz being false topaz or citrine, purple quartz being amethyst. Pure water-clear quartz is rock crystal. Yet these various precious stones crystallize in identical hexagonal forms. The chemist may make silicon dioxide in the laboratory having the same percentage of silicon and oxygen as that of natural quartz. But it is not a mineral. It does not pass the test of having been formed in nature unattended by man; it is referred to as a synthetic. Alcohol in dilute form was certainly known by the ancients, but cannot be considered a mineral since it can be traced back to the sugar occurring in grapes, thus a vegetable source. Whereas quartz has a very definite composition, this condition is not a rigorous requirement for all minerals. The biotite or black mica of granite is a mineral somewhat variable in composition. This mineral contains chiefly the elements hydrogen, potassium, magnesium iron, aluminum, silicon and oxygen. Hydrogen and potassium may replace each other in the crystal pattern; magnesium and iron may also interchange. The shape of the crystal remains essentially the same as does the general appearance.

The minerals will be grouped as follows:

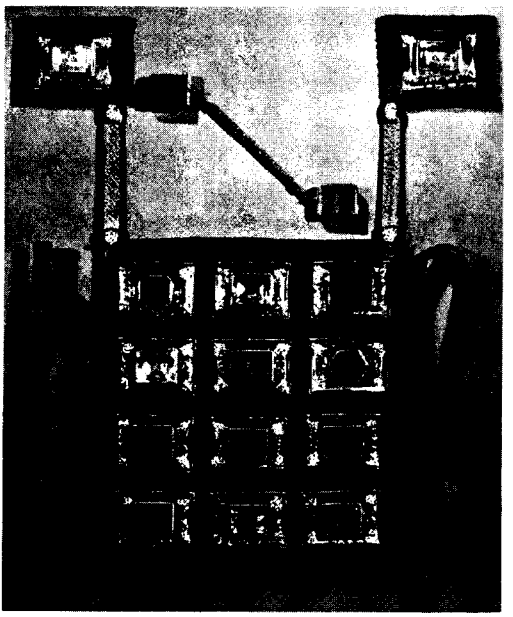
A. Precious stones.
B. Metals.
C. Common minerals such as salt, sulfur, and water.

A. PRECIOUS STONES. As indicated in the introduction to the minerals, there is much uncertainty in the identification of specific minerals as precious stones of the Bible. In spite of this difficulty man's reaction to beauty and to the things that endure does not change. Thus we share with the ancients certain criteria in the evaluation of precious stones. There must be beauty in terms of color, transparency, luster, and brilliance. There must be some degree of durability, at least if the gem is to be worn or handled. Selenite, a clear crystalline variety of gypsum, may be beautiful, but it is so soft that it can easily be scratched by the thumb nail. We now use a scale of hardness used by Mohs, the rating depending on the ease or difficulty of scratching. On this scale the hardness of thumbnail is 2½.

The Mohs Scale of Hardness (H)

1. Talc	5. Apatite	9. Corundum
2. Gypsum	6. Orthoclase	10. Diamond
3. Calcite	7. Quartz
4. Fluorite	8. Topaz

The most precious of stones are those having a hardness of 7, 8, 9, and 10, all of which would easily scratch glass, which has a hardness of 5½ to 6. Many of the precious stones of the Bible belong to the quartz and chalcedony family with a hardness of 7. Emerald is a green beryl (H 7½ to 8); topaz has a hardness of 8; the ruby and sapphire, both forms of the mineral corundum, have a hardness of 9.



Replica of Aaron's Breastplate, with twelve precious stones. Courtesy American Baptist Assembly, Green Lake, Wisconsin. © ABA

There are four principal lists of minerals recorded in the Scriptures. They are as follows:

1. The 12 precious stones of Aaron's breastplate, each stone representing one of the tribes of Israel (Exod. 28:17-20; 39:10-13).

A replica of this breastplate was presented to the Baptist Assembly at Green Lake, Wisconsin, in 1960. The replica and the story of its making are fully described (Aaron's Breastplate, by A. Paul Davis, St. Louis, Mo.). It is to be noted that with the exception of amethyst, the ninth stone of the breastplate, not a single gem stone named according to modern usage carries the same name as that of the King James Version. This is defensible, because of the considerable lack of agreement among scholars, and because of the absolute necessity of making a selection if a replica is to be made.

2. The wisdom list of Job (Job 28:16-19). Listed are the precious onyx, the sapphire, crystal, coral, pearls, rubies and topaz.

3. The gems of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13). Listed are the sardius, topaz, diamond, beryl, onyx, jasper, sapphire, emerald, and carbuncle.

4. The Precious Stones of the Holy City (Rev. 21:18-21). There is a precious stone for each of twelve foundations.

The Precious Stone List

1. Adamant (ăd'ă-mănt). (Also adamant stone). (Ezek. 3:9; Zech. 7:12). This is a reference to a very hard stone, "harder than flint." This could mean the hardest of all, diamond. But the ruby, the sapphire, or the less attractive forms of corundum with a hardness of 9 would also be exceedingly hard stones.

2. Agate (ăg'ăt). (Exod. 28:19; 39:12; Isa. 54:12; Ezek. 27:16). This member of the chalcedony family is described under chalcedony.

3. Amber (Ezek. 1:4,27; 8:2). The Hebrew word, hashmal, refers to the color of a bright fire. This would be some shade of yellow. Amber as we know it today is a fossil resin generally found on seacoasts or in alluvial soils. The characteristic color is yellow, with brown and red shades possible. Specimens in our museums often show entrapped beetles or other insects. It is such a mixture that it cannot properly be classified as a single mineral. It takes a high polish and has been valued for beads and other ornaments.

4. Amethyst (ăm'ē-thyst). (Exod. 28:19; 39:12; Rev. 21:20). A purple to blue-violet form of quartz. This is one of the loveliest forms of quartz and there is general agreement that the amethyst of the Bible is our present amethyst. Natural cubic crystals of fluorite in transparent blues and purples match amethyst for beauty, but this mineral has a hardness of only 4 and is easily split by the mere tap of the tip of a knife blade. Amethyst was the ninth stone of the breastplate and the twelfth of the foundations of the Holy City of Revelation. The museum in Denver, Colorado, has a magnificent display of clusters of amethyst crystals of priceless value. Amethyst was once thought to be an antidote for drunkenness.

5. Bdellium (dĕl'ĭ-ŭm). (Num. 11:7; Gen. 2:12). Bdellium today is a gum resin that comes from certain species of tree. What was the bdellium of Genesis and Numbers? In Genesis it is something associated with gold and the onyx stone. From this association one could assume it to be a precious stone. In Numbers, "the manna was as coriander seed, and the color thereof as the color of bdellium." A more literal translation of the latter phrase would be, "the eye thereof as the eye of bdellium." In Exodus 16:14 manna is compared with the hoar frost, and in Exodus 16:31, with white coriander seed. Milky quartz flecked with gold occurs today in many gold-mining districts of the world. Even today this milky-white quartz is cut and polished for gems as gold quartz. Under the circumstances it is quite probable that bdellium was white or milky quartz spotted with gold particles. At the same time one would assume that manna was white flecked with golden or yellow spots.

6. Beryl (bĕr'yl). (Exodus. 28:20; 39:13; Ezek. 1:16; 10:9; Dan. 10:6; Rev. 21:20). Beryl, a beryllium aluminum silicate, is now mined and valued as a source of the light metal, beryllium, a metal not known until 1828. A single crystal taken from a mine in the Black Hills of South Dakota weighed as much as 75 tons. Gem varieties include yellow or golden beryl, emerald which is a highly prized translucent to transparent sea-green stone, aquamarine which is blue, and Morganite a rose-red variety. Beryl was the tenth stone of the breastplate and the eighth of the foundations of the Holy City. This stone has been variously considered as a blue, a green, a yellow, or a red stone, possibly other than beryl as we know it.

7. Carbuncle (kär'bŭng-k'l) (Exod. 28:17; 39:10; Isa. 54:12; Ezek. 28:13). The third stone in the breastplate, the carbuncle, could have been any one of a series of red precious stones. The modern carbuncle is the almandite garnet, an iron aluminum silicate. Much of the garnet available is not clear enough, and sufficiently free of cracks, to be of gem quality, and is used for abrasives. Salida, Colorado, is well known for its unusually large-sized crystals.

8. Carnelian (See Sardius described under chalcedony) (Same as sard or sardius). This is the RSV translation of the first stone of the breastplate, and the sixth of the Holy City.

9. Chalcedony (kăl-sĕd'ō-nĭ) (Rev. 21:19) (Agate in RSV).

Quartz and chalcedony are both composed of silicon dioxide, but the chalcedony does not crystallize out in the bold hexagonal forms taken by quartz. Any crystalline character that the various forms of chalcedony have is that of microscopic size. The lighter colored varieties are named chalcedony in contrast to such names as carnelian, jasper, etc.

The following are some of the varieties of chalcedony:

a. Agate. Agate is chalcedony with colors unevenly distributed, often banded, with the bands being curved. Petrified wood is often a form of agate, in which the silicon dioxide has replaced the original wood. Agates are very widespread and variable and have become one of the most popular minerals for cutting and polishing. The moss agates found along the Yellowstone River from Glendive, Montana, to Yellowstone Park have become particularly well known. The "thunder eggs" of Idaho and Oregon may look like drab gray rounded stones, but when sawed in two with a diamond saw, they may reveal a center of lovely agate.

b. Carnelian, sard, or sardius. Carnelian is chalcedony with colors usually clear red to brownish red. Iron oxide imparts the color.

c. Chrysoprase. This is an apple-green variety of chalcedony.

d. Flint. This is usually a dull gray to black form, not prized or classified as a precious stone, but highly prized by primitive peoples for arrow heads, spear points, skinning knives, etc.

e. Jasper. Jasper pebbles may be picked up in many gravel deposits. The petrified wood of Arizona is largely jasper. Jasper is hard, opaque, takes a beautiful polish, and is sufficiently abundant so that it must have been used by ancient man as a gem stone. The chief colors are red, yellow, brown, and green, though it comes in many shades. Green jasper is also known as chrysoprase. The colors are largely due to iron oxide.

f. Onyx. Onyx is very similar to banded agates, except that the bands are flat. Specimens are usually cut and polished parallel to the layers. This enables cameo production. Objects of Mexican onyx, beautifully cut and polished and available in a number of Mexican border cities are really not onyx at all. The composition is calcium carbonate instead of silicon dioxide. A little hydrochloride acid added to Mexican Onyx will cause effervescence, whereas all the forms of silica react negatively. The onyx of the KJV is considered by some to be a beryl.

g. Sardonyx. A sardonyx is merely an onyx that includes layers of carnelian or sard.

10. Chrysolyte (krĭs'ō-līt) (Rev. 21:20). The seventh foundation of the Holy City is chrysolite, a yellow to greenish-yellow form of olivine. A green olivine is known as peridot. The mineral is a silicate of magnesium and iron. Even today most gem quality olivines come from an island in the Red Sea.

11. Coral (Job 28:18; Ezek. 27:16). When the writer of Job shows the priceless value of wisdom, he lists gold five times, silver once, and the precious stones, the precious onyx, the sapphire, the crystal, coral, pearls, rubies, and topaz, once each. Here must be named the most precious and valued of all metals and gems. Yet with these, man could not buy wisdom. Two of these, coral and pearl, are relatively soft and do not seem to belong to the company of hard, enduring and valuable gem stones named. One can defend the inclusion of pearl, since this was highly valued for its unique pearly luster, and for its rarity. But the inclusion of coral, which grows in the sea and is too soft to be ranked with precious stones, is more difficult to accept. It appears to be in the wrong company. But coral has been used for various ornaments, such as beads and necklaces. Other factors such as vogue, symbology, and even superstition, may attach value at certain periods in history.

In Ezekiel, coral is again associated with valued gems, sapphire, and agate.

12. Chrysoprasus (krĭs'ō-prāz) (Chrysoprase, RSV) (Rev. 21:20). The tenth foundation of the Holy City, chrysoprase may have been the apple-green form of chalcedony, sometimes called green jasper. A small percentage of nickel may account for the green color. Beads of genuine chrysoprase dating to 1500 B.C. have been taken from an Egyptian grave.

13. Crystal (Job 28:17; Ezek. 1:22; Rev. 4:6; 21:11; 22:1). The crystal of the Bible is something transparent and colorless, and valued as a gem stone. Clear quartz is the most logical choice for this. It is plentiful. It is remarkably brilliant and beautifully shaped even as it is found in nature. This of course does not rule out other transparent and colorless minerals such as topaz and diamond.

When modern science uses the word crystal, the meaning is completely different. A crystal is a substance bounded by flat faces, giving the specimen the form of a cube, an octahedron, etc. The shape of the crystal is characteristic of the substance and the outward form is not the result of cutting and polishing by man. Common table salt crystallizes out in the form of cubes.

14. Diamond (Exod. 28:18; 39:11; Jer. 17:1; Ezek. 28:13). The sixth stone of the breastplate. What was it? Almost surely not a diamond, for we have no evidence that the ancients ever cut diamonds. The reference in Jeremiah is to writing with a pen of iron having a diamond point. This pen could have been tipped with various hard minerals, capable of writing on very hard substances. (See Mohs scale of hardness in the introduction to precious stones.)

15. Emerald (Exod. 28:18; 39:11; Ezek. 27:16; 28:13; Rev. 4:3; 21:19). The emerald, the fourth gem of the breastplate and the fourth foundation of the Holy City, is indeed a stone worthy of such a high position. It is a lovely transparent to translucent deep green form of beryl, beryllium aluminum silicate.

There is no really good reason for trying to replace this emerald with a red stone such as a carbuncle or ruby. An emerald is a magnificent gemstone which was available to the Hebrews and it would be odd indeed if they did not prize it sufficiently to include it among the most precious. Until proof exists to the contrary, the emerald should be retained.

16. Jacinth (also hyacinth). (jā'sĭnth) (Rev. 9: 17; 21:20). (Also Exod. 28:19; 39:12 RSV). Today the jacinth or hyacinth is the transparent red, yellow, orange, or brown form of the mineral zircon, zirconium orthosilicate. Occasionally the correspondingly colored garnets are given these same names. Agreement has not been reached whether this 11th foundation stone was a yellow or a blue stone. If a blue stone, it could have been the true sapphire which is blue, or the golden sapphire which is yellow. In either case this would make the stone a form of corundum, aluminum oxide, next to diamond in hardness. Acceptance of the word sapphire would then necessitate changing the second foundation stone. We no longer use the term ligure for a gem stone. The seventh stone of the breastplate in the KJV is ligure, translated jacinth in the RSV.

17. Jasper (Exod. 28:20; 39:13; Ezek. 28:13; Rev. 4:3; 21:11,18,19). The last stone of the breastplate and the first in the foundation of the Holy City, jasper is described under chalcedony. It should be noted in passing that one characteristic of jasper as we know the stone is its opaqueness. Were it not for the odd descriptions of the gold of the New Jerusalem as clear or transparent as glass, early translators probably would not have chosen the word jasper at this point. For in Revelation 21: 11,18, jasper is described as clear as crystal.

18. Ligure (Jacinth RSV) (Exod. 28:19; 39:21). See Jacinth.

19. Onyx (ŏn'ĭks) (Gen. 2:12; Exod. 25:7; 28: 20; 39:13; Job 28:16; Ezek. 28:13). See Chalcedony. This form of chalcedony was the 11th stone of the breastplate, and possibly the fifth foundation of the Holy City. It was abundantly available and is still highly prized.

20. Pearls (Job 28:18; Matt. 7:6; 13:45,46; I Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4; 18:12; 21:21). Pearls, like coral, develop in the sea by the abstraction of calcium carbonate from sea water. The pearl develops around a bit of foreign matter within the shells of oysters or mussels. Like coral it cannot be classed with the hard enduring precious stones. It is easily destroyed. A small amount of acid would convert it to nearly worthless calcium chloride, a water-soluble salt, and the gas carbon dioxide. The reference in Matthew 7:6 implies a fragile structure. Swine might step on rubies without harming them, but pearls would be completely crushed. They are not much harder than finger nail. The references to pearls are found almost exclusively in the New Testament, and there is no reason to doubt the identity of this precious stone.

21. Ruby (Job 28:18; Prov. 3:15; 8:11; 20:15; 31:10; Lam. 4:7). Corundum as a mineral usually occurs as a dull, unattractive but hard form of aluminum oxide, often crystallized in hexagonal forms. Corundum of a rich, clear red variety is the ruby, while the other colors of gem quality corundum account for the sapphires. The best source for good rubies is Burma. In the first four of the references above, rubies are used as a norm for evaluating wisdom. In the fifth, it is used for measuring the worth of a virtuous woman. In the last reference there is a very clear indication that this stone was red. What better selection can then be made than that made by the translators?

22. Sapphire (săf'ĭr) (Exod. 24:10; 28:18; 39: 11; Job 28:6,16; Lam. 4:7; Isa. 54:11; Ezek. 1:26; 10:10; 28:13; Rev. 21:19). Sapphires, like rubies, belong to the corundum or aluminum oxide family, with a hardness of 9, or next to diamond. True sapphires are blue; others are colorless, yellow, or pink. The sapphire is listed as the fifth stone of the Holy City. It is generally agreed that our modern lazurite (Lapis lazuli) was called sapphire by the ancients. But we must remember that it is entirely possible that a variety of blue stones were termed sapphire. Lazurite does not seem to belong to the elite company of the most precious stones. For the greater part these most precious stones are noted for a rich purity of color which lazurite does not have. Lazurite is beautiful but usually is a considerable mixture of minerals, including pyrite, calcite, muscovite, pyroxene, etc. In hardness it is softer than glass. (H 5 to 5½.)

In three of the references given above, there is a strong implication that the mineral referred to was blue (Exod. 24:10; Ezek. 1:26; 10:1).

In Lamentations sapphire is linked to ruby, the other highly prized form of corundum.

23. Sardius or sardine stone. Same as carnelian. (See carnelian and also varieties of chalcedony.) (Exod. 28:17; 39:10; Ezek. 28:13; Rev. 4:3; 21:20). A red variety of chalcedony. The first stone of the breastplate, and the sixth of the Holy City.

24. Sardonyx (Onyx in RSV) (Rev. 21:20). This stone is merely an onyx layered with red sard or carnelian. See Onyx and carnelian under chalcedony.

25. Topaz (Exod. 28:17; 39:10; Job 28:19; Ezek. 28:13; Rev. 21:20). The modern topaz is an aluminum fluoro hydroxy silicate with a hardness of 8, thus harder than the quartz and chalcedony groups. The most highly prized is the yellow topaz, but colorless, pink, blue, and green varieties occur as well.

This probably yellow topaz, the second stone of the breastplate, and the ninth of the Holy City, is interpreted by some as a yellow citrine, a form of quartz, or chrysolite. (See chrysolite.)

B. METALS. Of the 103 elements now known to man, 78 are metals. Of these only gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, tin, and mercury were known to the ancients. The brass of the KJV of the Bible was copper in some instances and bronze in others. Brass was the most modern alloy of copper and zinc, bronze being the copper-tin alloy. A metal is an element with a metallic luster; it is usually a good conductor of heat and electricity. A metal such as gold, silver, and copper may occur in nature as the free recognizable metal, or as is the case with most metals, it may occur in compound form, chemically united with other elements in such a way that the ore appears dull and non-metallic.

Metallurgy is the science of winning the metal from its ore and the subsequent refining and treating for adapting it to its many and varied uses. The earliest reference to a man skilled in iron and bronze work is that in Genesis 4:22, this man being Tubal-cain.

Archaeologists recognize a chalcolithic or copper-stone age (4500-3000 B.C.) preceding the bronze age (3000-1200 B.C.). The iron age (1200-300 B.C.) follows. There is, of course, much overlapping, and none of these ages have really ended. In fact, when one considers the tonnages used, it should be apparent that we are still living in the iron or steel age.

The metals of the Bible will be discussed in the following order: 1. Gold; 2. Silver; 3. Copper; 4. Iron; 5. Lead; 6. Tin; 7. Mercury (Quicksilver).

1. Gold. Gold was known and used freely and skilfully in the oldest of civilizations. A multitude of gold ornaments in excellent condition in the museums of the world amply verify this. The earliest evidence of gold mining is that of rock carvings of Egypt, showing the washing of gold sands and the subsequent melting of gold in a small furnace. This went back to at least 2500 B.C. (G. Wilkinson, The Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, London 2.137, 1874). Strabo (Geographia 3.2) describes the country of the Iberians (Spain) as full of metals, gold, silver, copper, and iron. He further tells of mining gold by digging for it in the usual way and also by washing for it (hydraulic mining). This he wrote approximately 60 B.C. Pliny the Elder was killed in 77 A.D. when Vesuvius erupted. He had written 37 books of natural history; in his 33rd he accurately describes the occurrence of placer gold in stream beds, including the finding of nuggets. In addition he describes hydraulic mining that would put recent operations to shame; claiming that a river was brought from a distance and from the heights, with enough fall to wash away whole mountain sides, leaving the gold in sluice baffles. Most surprising of all, Pliny describes in some detail the use of mercury to capture the gold from the ore by amalgamation. This method is definitely used today by such large and efficient operations as that of the Homestake gold mine in the Black Hills of South Dakota.

Gold helmet of a prince of Ur, about 2500 B.C. It was hammered from one piece of metal. UMP

Gold is named very early in the Bible (Gen. 2:11,12). We are told that in the land of Havilah, in the vicinity of the Garden of Eden, there was gold, and further that the gold was good.

Why has man ever valued gold so highly? Why is gold good? Gold is good and highly prized because it is warmly beautiful. It is enduring, for it never rusts or dissolves away. It retains its beauty. Of the common acids, only a mixture of concentrated nitric and hydrochloric acids (aqua regia) will dissolve it. Strong acid alone will have no effect. Pliny mentions gold as the only metal unharmed by fire. In fact Pliny said each time it went through a fire it came out better or more refined than before. Gold is good because it is so adaptable to shaping. It can be melted without harm; it can he hammered to thin leaves, being extremely malleable. It may easily overlay large objects thus imparting beauty and protection to the whole. It may readily be alloyed with other metals with an improvement of the degree of hardness while still retaining the beauty of gold. In fact Pliny noted correctly that gold comes naturally alloyed with silver. Finally gold has been valued because of its scarcity. It seems reasonable to presume that if the core of the earth is largely iron that the free metals such as gold, platinum, and even cobalt and nickel have been largely lost to us by dissolving in this core.

Gold is also mentioned at the very end of the Bible in Revelation 21:15,18,21. Here the most precious of metals is envisioned as constituting the Holy City and its streets, gold transparent as glass. The reed used to measure the city was a golden reed.

In between the beginning and the end of the Bible are so many references to gold that one must use an extensive concordance if he wishes to find all these references. In the 37th chapter of Exodus is described the making of the ark of the covenant, the mercy seat, candle sticks, dishes, spoons, bowls, cherubim, vessels, a table, lamps, snuffers, snuff dishes, and an altar, all made of gold or overlaid with gold. The word gold is used 20 times in this chapter. The skilled craftsman was Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah.

Besides the items listed in Exodus 37, other items of gold are bracelets, bells, censers, crowns, calves, earrings, ephods, gods, girdles, hooks, jewels, rings, sceptres, shields, tongs, and shekels (coins). And this list is not completely exhaustive.

When the writer of Job in the 28th chapter raises the question of where wisdom should be found, he points out that wisdom is so priceless that gold, silver and precious stones could not buy it. It is a remarkable fact that gold is mentioned five times while each of the other most precious items is mentioned but once.

2. Silver. At the present time much more silver is obtained as a by-product of the refining of copper and lead than by mining native silver or silver ore. The methods used in this refining were not available to the Hebrews, since it requires the extensive use of electricity, cyanide, zinc and aluminum. However, silver is ten times as abundant in the crust of the earth as is gold, and much of it was mined by the ancients. Of silver, Pliny says, "Silver is only found in deep shafts, and raises no hopes of its existence by any signs, giving off no shining sparkles such as are seen in the case of gold." Pliny describes its use in making mirrors. He says, "The property of reflecting images is marvelous; it is generally agreed that it takes place owing to the repercussion of the air which is thrown back into the eyes."

The shekel and the talent of silver are terms much used, indicating a wide use of silver as a medium of exchange. At first this was done by weighing out the silver pieces. This is apparent in Job 28:15, "Neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof." In the NT it is clear that regular coins were freely in use. For example in Matthew 22:19,20, a penny was brought to Jesus and He asked whose image and superscription was on it.

Silver was used in conjunction with gold because of its beauty. A great many references are to silver and gold. Only occasionally are the terms reversed as in Esther 1:6, "the beds were of gold and silver." Again when Christ sent out the Twelve, he commanded them to provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in their purses (Matt. 10:9).

Many objects made of silver are referred to in the Scriptures. The cup that Joseph had secreted in Benjamin's sack of food was a silver cup (Gen. 44:2). Sockets, hooks, gods, chargers, bowls, trumpets, candlesticks, basins, cords, and images were made of silver. Demetrius, the silversmith of Ephesus, made silver shrines for Diana (Acts 19:24). Jesus was betrayed for 30 pieces of silver (Matt. 26:15).

Silver is used also in a figurative or symbolic sense for something refined and pure, free from dross. "The words of the Lord are pure words; as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times" (Ps. 12:6).

3. Iron. In spite of the advance in the light metals such as aluminum, magnesium, and beryllium, we are still living in the iron age. No other metal rivals iron in the tonnage of products. The reason for this is that iron ores, chiefly the oxides and carbonates, are abundant in concentrated deposits, the metal is easily won from the ore, and the metal may be varied in its properties over a very wide range. By removing impurities, by heat treatment, and by alloying, the strength, hardness, ductility, malleability, resistance to corrosion, appearance, and retention of temper may be varied.

Iron does occur free in nature, but on such a minute scale that it may be considered a curiosity. Terrestrial free iron is very likely secondary, having been formed from regular ores by hot carbon or carbon containing materials, a process which we carry out in a blast furnace. That ancient man found meteoric iron and shaped it to some use is clear. Iron beads taken from a grave in Egypt dating from about 4000 B.C. showed a nickel analysis corresponding favorably to that of meteorites. In fact, the Egyptians and those of other cultures referred to iron as the metal from heaven. In ancient religious literature the Egyptians claimed that the firmament of heaven was made of iron. An iron object dating to about 3000 B.C. was blasted out of the masonry at the top of the Great Pyramid at Gizeh and is now in the British Museum. No one knows who first discovered a way to make iron out of the abundant iron ore, by reducing it in a furnace with charcoal. This chemical reaction occurs so readily that the discovery was made in a dim undetermined past. One would conjecture it was made by accident. Frescoes dating about 1500 B.C. in certain Egyptian tombs show small furnaces with men operating bellows or mouth blowpipes. In essence this is still the principle of the blast furnace. The first reference to iron in the Bible is found in Genesis 4:22. Tubal-cain was a worker in brass and iron. In Deuteronomy 4:20, I Kings 8:51, and Jeremiah 11:4 there is ample evidence that the Hebrews were familiar with furnaces for making iron. The indication is strong that in Egypt as slaves they had to work at these fiery furnaces; their lot must have been extremely difficult. The smith with his forge was well known as shown in Isaiah 44:12 and 54:16. The Philistines made it very difficult for the Hebrews to occupy Palestine. They were skilled in iron and prevented the Jews from making their own tools and weapons, by not allowing a single smith in all the land. The Israelites were forced to go down to the Philistines to sharpen their shares, coulters, axes, and mattocks (I Sam. 13:19,20). But the great victories of David ended all this. With David's coming to power, iron became abundant. Iron is frequently named in the Scriptures, as are many tools and objects. One reason that these are not found in greater abundance is the fact that iron rusts too rapidly and thus returns to the earth. Additional items of iron not previously mentioned are as follows:

The bedstead of Og was made of iron (Deut. 3:11). Og was a giant and needed a strong bed and a big one, about 15 feet long and 7 feet wide.

The Israelites feared the Canaanites because they had chariots of iron (Josh. 17:16,18)

The spearhead of Goliath weighed 600 shekels (roughly 20 pounds) of iron (I Sam. 17:7).

There is ample evidence that many types of fetters and means of binding captives and slaves were made of iron. At times the term is, however used in a figurative sense (Ps. 2:9; 107:10; 149:8 Jer. 28:13,14).

Pliny in his 35th book of Natural History discusses iron, its occurrence and smelting at considerable length. He introduces this with the comment, "Iron serves as the best and the worst of the apparatus of life, inasmuch as with it we plough the ground, plant trees, trim the trees . . . with it we build houses and quarry rocks, and we employ it for all other useful purposes, but we likewise use it for wars and slaughter and brigandage." His further discourses are reminiscent of Isaiah 2:4 concerning beating swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks.

"Subdued in fire the stubborn metal lies;
One brawny smith the puffing bellows plies
And draws and blows reciprocating air;
Others to quench the hissing mass prepare;
With lifted arms they order every blow,
And chime their sounding hammers in a row;
With labored anvils Etna groans below,
Strongly they strike ; huge flakes of flames expire;
With tongs they turn the steel and vex it in the fire."

— From Virgil's Aeneid about 30 B.C.
(See Mellor Vol. XII, p. 497)

4. Copper. There are two metals that impart some shade of yellow or red to a coin, a statue, an ornament, or tool, namely copper and gold. If the object is of gold, it is readily recognized as such. Thus all other yellow metals or alloys have been variously named as copper, brass or bronze. In Deuteronomy 28:9 the KJV would have brass dug out of the hills. And in Job 28:2 brass is said to be molten out of the rock. In both these cases the correct translation is copper, for brass is a man-made alloy of chiefly copper and zinc. Two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold are referred to in Ezra 8:27. One reference to a coppersmith is found in II Timothy 4:14. In the KJV the word brass is used many times. In nearly all cases the word bronze should have been used. Bronze is an alloy of copper and tin. It is not impossible that there was a small amount of actual brass, but it is very unlikely. Copper ranks with the earliest metals known to man. It does occur as free copper, sometimes in enormous masses. The ores are extremely varied and plentiful. Pliny claimed that copper was first found on the island of Cyprus. Pliny also indicated that copper was sometimes alloyed with silver and gold and that Corinthian bronze was the most valued of all. It is quite logical to conclude that relatively pure copper was used by man before the copper tin alloy, bronze, ushered in the bronze age. An Egyptian dagger dating from about 4500 B.C. showed an analysis of nearly pure copper and no tin. Nails, knives, statuettes and other objects continued to be made of pure copper far into the bronze age. It is, however, reasonably certain that from about 3000 B.C. on, an increasing use of tin with copper resulting in an alloy, bronze, became the pattern for objects of metal. Many analyses of excavated bronze objects show this. Cyprus bronze usually had from two to four per cent tin. A Nineveh cup of 1000 B.C. tested over 18 per cent tin.

The earliest reference (KJV) to brass was that in Genesis 4:22. This was likely pure copper, though it may have been bronze. Whereas the 37th chapter of Exodus may be called the gold chapter, the 38th is the bronze and silver chapter. The KJV uses the words brass and brazen 15 times. Bronze is used to overlay many parts of the altar of burnt offering and the hangings of the court. Vessels, pots, shovels, fleshhooks, fire pans, grate, rings, and a laver are made of bronze. A partial list of copper or bronze objects includes the serpent made by Moses (Num. 21:9), the armor of Goliath consisting of helmet, coat of mail, greaves, and target (I Sam. 17:5,6), fetters of bronze (II Kings 25:7), bronze cymbals (I Chron. 15:19), gates (Ps. 107:16; Isa. 54:2), and idols (Rev. 9:20).

Remains of King Solomon's copper smelters at Ezion-geber, on the Gulf of Aqabah. ASOR

Perhaps the most exciting discoveries yet made concerning ancient copper mining are those initiated by the combined efforts of the American School of Oriental Research at Jerusalem, the Hebrew Union College, of Cincinnati, and the Transjordan Department of Antiquities in the spring of 1934. From the southern tip of the Dead Sea to the northern tip of the Gulf of Aqabah, this gulf being the eastern arm of the Red Sea, is a great rift, no doubt the result of an ancient earthquake. This rift, the Wadi Arabah, is arid and desolate but heavily mineralized even to this day. It seems reasonably certain as the result of the study and excavations by successive expeditions (The Other Side of the Jordan, by Nelson Glueck, American School of Oriental Research, New Haven, Connecticut) that between the tenth and eighteenth centuries B.C., the Israelites as the result of numerous battles won this rich source of copper and iron. This flowered into a gigantic operation under King Solomon. Many furnaces with slag piles may still be seen up and down the Wadi Arabah. The largest operation of all was at the port city of Ezion-Geber.

5. Lead. Free metallic lead is an extreme rarity as a mineral. The chief ore is that of lead sulfide, Galena, which often occurs as bright glistening clusters of cubic crystals. The metal is readily obtained from the ore and was known long before it came into common use. The British Museum has a lead figure of Egyptian origin dating to about 3000 B.C. Lead plates and statuettes have been found in Egyptian tombs of 1200 B.C.

References to lead in the Scriptures are as follows:

The high density of lead is noted in Exodus 15:10. In Numbers 31:22 lead is listed along with gold, silver, brass, iron and tin. Its use for lettering in rock is noted in Job 19:24. Bellows were used in a furnace with melting of lead (Jer. 6:29). Lead is listed with silver, brass, iron and tin as melted in a furnace (Ezek. 22:18,20) and again with silver, iron, and tin as the riches traded in the fairs (Ezek. 27:12). See also Zechariah 5:7,8.

6. Tin. Tin is not an abundant element, very little of it being mined today in the United States. The chief ore is the oxide cassiterite, which has to be reduced in a furnace. Pliny may have confused tin with lead, stating that there were two kinds of lead, plumbum nigrum, black lead (lead), and plumbum album, a white lead (tin). Although a goodly percentage of tin is found in the many bronze objects collected, actual articles of tin are rare. Tools, vessels, cups, and the like were apparently not made of tin. Could it be that the ancients were aware of the tin plague or museum disease? When tin remains long exposed to a temperature of 65 degrees Fahrenheit or lower, the shiny white tin slowly changes to the allotropic gray form and crumbles to dust.

The references to tin in the Bible are few. They are as follows: Numbers 31:22; Isaiah 1:25; Ezekiel 22:18,20; 27:12.

7. Mercury (Quicksilver). This strange metal which is liquid was not even recognized with certainty as a metal until J. A. Braun froze it to a solid in 1759. In the early history of mercury it was thought to be a form of silver and this up to as late as the sixth century. Mercury has been reported found in a grave of the 16th or 15th century B.C. (Mellor). Aristotle (320 B.C.) in the fourth book of his Meteorologica explains that mercury or liquid silver contains water and air and thus refuses to solidify on cooling. Pliny frequently discusses mercury.

The chief ore of mercury is a bright red mineral, cinnabar, which is mercury sulfide. With it occurs sometimes the free liquid mercury. One could thus reason that ancient man could not miss the unusual heavy red mineral, and the unusual silvery liquid drops. Furthermore, all it takes to obtain the free liquid mercury from the red cinnabar is to heat the material in a current of air.

When a small drop of mercury is rubbed on a silver coin, it spreads out quickly, forming an amalgam with a bright silvery luster. This also happens with many other metals including lead, tin, and copper. It can be driven off again by mere heating. Pliny (33.99) notes that the argentum vivum found in veins of silver in round drops always liquid, will break vessels by penetrating them. He also noted that copper could be gilded by first coating with this argentum vivum and then putting on gold leaf. These observations refer to the amalgamating power of mercury.

The Hebrew word, sig, interpreted as dross, meaning the scum or refuse, usually thought of in connection with silver refining, is found in the following passages: Psalm 119:119; Proverbs 25:4,5; 26:3; Isaiah 1:22,25; Ezekiel 22:18,19,20.

The Proverbs reference, "Burning lips and a wicked heart are like a potsherd covered with silver dross" (Prov. 26:23), is very strongly indicative of mercury or amalgam as the deceptive gloss on the worthless bauble. This type of deception must have been practiced. If so, it could also be "purged by fire," that is, the mercury could be distilled away, leaving the refined silver or other metal in the amalgam. Compare this with Christ's references to a cup clean on the outside and to the whited sepulchres (Matt. 23:25,27).

"Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water" (Isa. 1:22). Here again dross is something specific and reminiscent of Aristotle's conception that mercury was silver mixed with water and air. Pliny and Dioscorides both use terms for mercury that imply water-silver, clearly a result of its liquid character and silvery appearance.

Even the references in Ezekiel suggest the molten or liquid character of mercury. The house of Israel has become brass, tin, iron, and lead in the furnace; they have become dross. This could refer to their liquid character, while in the furnace.

C. THE COMMON MINERALS.

1. Alabaster (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3; Luke 7:37). All of these references include an alabaster box used to contain a precious ointment. Modern alabaster is a form of gypsum, hydrated calcium sulfate. It is soft, having a hardness of 2 and may be scratched by the thumbnail. It is easily carved and many larger decorative articles like book ends, vases, and paper weights are made of this material. It is usually very light colored, but may be mottled or veined with various colors. The ancients may have used a calcite or aragonite mineral, resembling our modern alabaster in its ability to take a high polish and in its general appearance. A simple test with the thumbnail would distinguish between the two varieties. Calcite has a hardness of 3 and cannot be scratched with the thumbnail.

2. Brimstone (Sulfur) (Gen. 19:24; Deut. 29:23; Job 18:15; Ps. 11:6; Ezek. 38:22; Isa. 30:33; 34:9; Luke 17:29; Rev. 9:17,18; 14:10; 19:20; 20:10; 21:8). It is generally agreed that the brimstone of the Bible is sulfur. In modern times most of our sulfur comes from deep deposits and is brought to the surface by hot water and compressed air. Sulfur deposits also occur in the vicinity of volcanoes. Hot gases such as sulfur dioxide and hydrogen sulfide are emitted, chemically react and deposit sulfur in the surrounding rock. In the vicinity of hot springs which in turn are the relics of previous volcanic action, sulfur deposits are found. When sulfur is burned, it burns with a blue flame forming a gas, sulfur dioxide, which is a poison and a bleaching agent. With moisture it forms sulfurous acid. In the Bible context brimstone is nearly always associated with fire and with punishment and devastation. No natural product readily available to the ancients would so completely symbolize the awful punishment meted out to the wicked. The flame is hot and the sulfur dioxide has a terrible suffocating stench, with the ability to lay waste and kill. To add to the horror, hot sulfur turns to a bubbling dark red and very sticky liquid.

3. Marble (I Chron. 29:2; Esth. 1:6; S. of Sol. 5:15; Rev. 18:12). Marble is recrystallized limestone, which is capable of being given a high polish. Limestone is somewhat impure calcium carbonate. A dolomitic marble contains a considerable amount of magnesium carbonate as well as the calcium compound. Marble is used for decorative purposes, for statuary, for pillars and walls of buildings. In two of the above references marble pillars are indicated. There is no reason to think that the marble of the Bible was much different from the marble of modern times, except in the sense that marble from different quarries varies in color and texture.

4. Nitre (niter) (Prov. 25:20; Jer. 2:22). The niter of the Bible cannot be the niter of mineralogy today. The latter is potassium nitrate or saltpeter and would have no chemical action with the acetic acid of vinegar such as is indicated in Proverbs 25:20. Neither would it be of any value whatsoever in washing with soap (Jer. 2:22). The same could be said of soda niter or Chile saltpeter, which is sodium nitrate. The usual interpretation of the Biblical niter is that the material is sodium carbonate. This would form a gas with vinegar and effervesce freely. Furthermore sodium carbonate would be useful in washing with soap. In fact it is used today to make soap and also as a water softener. And finally it does occur as the natural mineral in arid regions, either in solution in salty seas or in the mud surrounding such seas.

5. Salt. Salt is extremely abundant; the evaporation of one cubic mile of sea water would leave approximately 140 million tons of salts most of which would be sodium chloride or common salt. The salt sea of the Bible was no doubt the Dead Sea. In most of the many references to salt, either the preservative property or else the savor it adds to food was the point of interest. Jesus in Matthew 5:13 states that the children of the kingdom are the salt of the earth. This implies both the preservative and the taste qualities of salt. How could salt lose its savor? It has been suggested by some that in time the stored salt would chemically react and be salt no more. This is highly improbable. Under the conditions the salt would remain salt. But it certainly was contaminated with other salts such as magnesium chloride or sulfate, which in turn would attract moisture. In due time enough salt might leach away, leaving a quality of salt behind which would be continuously poorer salt. The less soluble contaminants would be left behind. The container might then be emptied on a foot path where it could at least keep down some of the weeds.

6. Water. This is the most marvelous and exciting mineral of the Bible. Every modern textbook of mineralogy includes a section of the oxides of nature such as those of silicon, copper, iron, aluminum, etc. But hydrogen oxide heads the list. This extremely abundant and widespread mineral is found either as liquid, water, or the solid forms snow and ice. There are more references to this mineral than to any other in the Bible.

As a chemical material it is a most unusual compound, with unusual properties. When it freezes it expands so that ice floats. The chemist accounts for most of its odd properties by explaining that hydrogen bonds form between oxygen atoms holding particles together into a framework. Were it not for these hydrogen bonds, water would boil away at 150 degrees Fahrenheit below zero.

The excitement concerning this mineral as named in the Bible comes in its many uses and implications. What is man without water? With it thirst is quenched, a cup of cold water is given, Peter tries to walk on it, the shepherd leads his sheep beside it. It is the water of life; with it man is baptized. It is made to come out of a rock; there are water wells where many events take place. So one might continue with many more of the rich allusions to the happenings of the Old and the New Testaments. G.R.M.

MINES, MINING, an occupation of man that is very ancient, for we read in the description of Eden and its surroundings before the Flood of "the land of Havilah, where there is gold: and the gold of that land is good" (Gen. 2:11,12); and in the account of the antediluvian Cainite patriarchs, Tubalcain was "the forger of every cutting instrument of brass and iron" (Gen. 4:22). In Job 28:1-11 "a mine for silver and a place for gold is mentioned"; the statement that "iron is taken out of the earth and copper is molten out of the stone" is followed by a poetic account of a man digging a mine. In Sinai are very ancient copper mines, worked by the Egyptians as early as Dynasty IV (the great pyramid builders); and, at the head of the Gulf of Akaba, at Elath, are the remains of Solomon's blast furnaces for copper. At this locality there is a constant strong north wind, and through openings and conduits this wind was used to form a draft for the furnaces. The great development of metal working in Israel must have come between the time of King Saul and of Solomon. Compare I Samuel 13:19-22, where the Philistines are in the iron age which the Israelites had not yet reached, with the accomplishments of Solomon's time (I Kings 7:13-50) only about a century later.

The Greeks and the Romans considered mining and metal working as very ancient, for they pictured Hephaestus or Vulcan, son of Zeus or Jupiter, as a metal-worker, a sort of mythological "Tubal-cain." In the time of Moses, the Midianites had gold, silver, brass, iron, tin and lead (Neh. 31:22) and the Israelites knew how to cleanse them by fire; and Moses described the Promised Land as "a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass (copper)" (Deut. 8:9). Although shafts have been found in the "valley of the cave" in Sinai, they do not penetrate far, and the reason is probably the inability of the ancients to ventilate their mines. The fact that the Midianites had tin in the days of Moses probably points to a very ancient penetration of the Phoenician ships through the Mediterranean and across to the S shore of Britain. A.B.F.

MINGLED PEOPLE (Heb. 'ērev, from 'ărav, to mix). The same Heb. word is rendered "mixed multitude" in Exodus 12:38 and Nehemiah 13:3. In the former passage the reference is to non-Israelite people who left Egypt with the Israelites. In Jeremiah 25:20 and 50:37 the term is used as an expression of contempt for the mixed blood of certain of Israel's enemies. In Numbers 11:4 such a motley body seduced Israel to sin.

MINIAMIN (mĭn'yȧ-mĭn). 1. A Levite in Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 31:15).

2. Head of a family of priests in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:17).

3. A priest in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:41). See Miamin and Mijamin, which have the same meaning.

MINISTER (Heb. shārath, shārēth, Gr. diákonos, leitourgós, hyperétes), originally a servant, though distinguished from a slave who may work against his will, and a hireling, who works for wages. Joshua, as a young man, was minister to Moses (Exod. 24:13) though in rank he was a prince of the tribe of Ephraim (Num. 13:8). As minister of Moses, he led the army of Israel against Amalek (Exod. 17:8-16) and was permitted to ascend Mt. Sinai with Moses. The queen of Sheba, visiting king Solomon, was amazed at the attendance (Hebrew "standing") of his ministers (I Kings 10:5). In the NT certain governmental officers are called "ministers of God's service" (Rom. 13:6). Another word, hyperétes, which originally meant "an under-rower" is also used for "minister": "And he closed the book and gave it back to the minister (ASV "attendant") and sat down" (Luke 4:20), and the same word is used of John Mark (Acts 13:5) as an attendant of Paul and Barnabas. God Himself, has His ministers, the angels (Ps. 103:21; 104:4 KJV), who praise Him and go about as His messengers. In Jeremiah 33:21,22 God calls the priests of Israel His ministers, and this usage of the word for priests or religious leaders has come over into the Christian Church. The Christian minister is not only a servant of God, but he should also make it his business to serve the local church to which he is attached; and lest this be thought to be a degradation of dignity, even our Lord declared "For the Son of man came not to be ministered unto but to minister and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45). The NT word diákonos i.e. "deacon" means "minister" and indicates the duty as well as the privilege of the office. "Deacon" should not be confused with "elder" or "presbyter." A.B.F.

MINNI (mĭn'ī, Heb. minnî), mentioned only in Jeremiah 51:27 as a kingdom associated with Ararat and Ashkenaz as instruments or agents for the destruction of the wicked Babylon. It was in what was later called Armenia and some think that the word "Armenia" is from har-minnî, i.e. the mountain of Minni. In 719 B.C., Sargon, king of Assyria defeated the Minni. The kingdom is little known and the known references to it are very scarce.

MINNITH (mĭn'ĭth, Heb. minnîth), a city of the Ammonites which Jephthah smote while overcoming this nation. It and Abelcheramim were the easternmost limit of Jephthah's victories (Judg. 11:33). It lay four miles N of Heshbon in the tribe of Reuben. It was a source of wheat for the markets of Tyre (Ezek. 27:17).

MINSTREL, in the OT a player upon a stringed instrument; but in the NT a piper, or player upon a flute. David played his harp to quiet king Saul when the evil spirit was upon him (I Sam. 16:23), and Elisha called for a minstrel to play, perhaps to calm his own mind so that he could better receive a message from God (II Kings 3:15). In Matthew 9:23 we read of "minstrels" (ASV "flute-players") at a funeral.

MIPHKAD (mĭf'kăd, RV Hammiphkad), the name of one of the gates of Jerusalem, near the temple and the SE corner of the city (Neh. 3:31).

MIRACLES. The word "miracle" (Latin miraculum) literally means a marvelous event, or an event which causes wonder. Some of the more important Biblical words designating miracles are thaúma, "wonder"; pele' and téras, "portent"; gevhûrâh and dúnamis, "display of power"; 'ôth and semeíon, "sign."

The usage of "miracle" in Christian theology includes, but goes beyond, the meanings of the ancient words. A miracle is (1) an extraordinary event, inexplicable in terms of ordinary natural forces; (2) an event which causes the observers to postulate a super-human personal cause; (3) an event which constitutes evidence (a "sign") of implications much wider than the event itself.

Negatively, miracles should be distinguished (1) from works of providence. We must recognize that in good usage "miracle" has a metaphorical or hyperbolical meaning. Every sunrise, every tree, every blade of grass is a "miracle." But works of providence are, for Christians, the ordinary works of God through secondary causes. Unbelievers generally deny the supernatural cause of such things.

On the contrary, in the Biblical events strictly regarded as miracles, the adversaries of faith acknowledged the supernatural character of what took place. After the healing of the man "lame from his mother's womb," the "rulers and elders and scribes" etc., "beholding the man that was healed standing with them . . . could say nothing against it." But they said, ". . . that a notable miracle hath been done by them is manifest to all them that dwell in Jerusalem, and we cannot deny it" (Acts 3:1-4:22). In the case of the miracle at Lystra (Acts 14:8-23) the pagans said, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men." With reference to the resurrection of Christ, Paul could ask a Roman court of law to take cognizance of an indisputable, publicly attested fact, for, said he, "This thing was not done in a corner" (Acts 26:26).

Miracles are further to be distinguished (2) from the type of answers to prayer which do not constitute "signs," or demonstrative evidence for unbelievers. When Elijah prayed for fire on the altar of Jehovah (I Kings 18:17-46), God answered with a demonstrative miracle which convicted the priests of Baal. In the experience of Christians, however, there are numberless events, constantly recurring, in which those who know the Lord can see the hand of God at work, but in which there is not the demonstrative "sign" element. It is a great mistake for Christians to distort their reports of answered prayer so as to make out "sign" miracles where nothing comparable to the Biblical "signs" has occurred. God gives abundant evidence of His love and care without any exaggeration on our part.

Miracles of God should also be distinguished (3) from works of magic. In magic, the wonder worker himself possesses a formula which causes the alleged result. The alleged supernatural power is controlled by the performer. Compare Exodus 7:11; 8:7. In miracles of God, the results depend wholly upon the divine will, and the one who works the miracle is simply an agent for the Lord.

Miracles of God must be distinguished (4) from miracles of Satanic or demonic origin. Christ warned in his Olivet discourse, "There shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders, insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect" (Matt. 24:24). Paul foretells of the Man of Sin "whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders" (II Thess. 2:9; Cf. Rev. 13:14; 16:14; 19:20).

Miracles must also be distinguished (5) from mere exotic occurrences. There are many events in nature which excite wonder, but such matters are evidences of nothing but oddity. Genuine miracles are always "signs" which teach a lesson. Every miracle of God is a part of God's great integrated system of revealed truth.

Epochs. The majority of the miracles recorded in the Bible fall into three great epochs. First came the miracles of the Exodus: the burning bush, the ten plagues of Egypt, the numerous miracles between the parting of the Red Sea and the crossing of the Jordan, the fall of Jericho, and the battle of Gibeon. This first epoch of miracles came at a time of great spiritual depression. The people in slavery in Egypt had forgotten the name of Jehovah their God. Wholly by His grace God brought them out, amalgamated them into a nation at Sinai, and brought them into the Promised Land. In all subsequent history, God's people have looked back to the miracles of the Exodus as a type of divine salvation.

There followed, after the first epoch of miracles, a long period of decline under the judges, and then a revival of godly faith under David and Solomon. During all this time miracles were very few. God left not Himself without a witness, but the working of miracles was not His chosen method.

Then came a period of idolatrous compromise and "inclusive" religion. The names of Jehovah and Baal were hyphenated, and even the good king Jehoshaphat was badly mixed up with idolatrous Ahab (I Kings 21:25,26; 22). So God gave the second great epoch of miracles centering in the ministry of Elijah and Elisha. By mighty "signs" and works of His grace, God restored and confirmed His pure worship.

The miracle of Jonah and two notable miracles at the time of Isaiah (II Kings 19:35; 20:9-11) were of outstanding significance, as were two or three special miracles in the experience of Daniel. But from the epoch of miracles in the time of Elijah and Elisha until the time of Christ and the apostles miracles were again very few. God worked through the prophets, through the providential discipline of the Babylonian captivity and in other ways. Enough revelation had been given by the time of Malachi for the spiritual life of God's people until the time of the coming of Christ. God's faithful servants were sustained without demonstrative "sign" miracles.

The greatest epoch of miracles in all recorded history occurred in the ministry of Christ and His apostles. It was, in a way, a time of the lowest ebb of spirituality. At the Exodus God's people had forgotten His name. At the time of Elijah and Elisha they had hyphenated His name with the name of Baal. But at the time of Christ and His apostles God's people had made the divinely prescribed system of worship an idolatrous object to such an extent that they were steeped in self-righteousness and hypocrisy. They read the Torah diligently, but they read with a dark veil of hardness over their eyes and hearts. They were so "religious" in their pride that they crucified the Lord of glory. It was to this kind of world that God sent forth His Son.

Nearly 40 demonstrative "sign" miracles wrought by Christ are recorded in the Gospels; but these are selected by the writers from among a much larger number. John says, "Many other signs [miracles] truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples which are not written in this book (John 20:30).

The ministry of the apostles after Christ's ascension began with the miracle of "languages" on the day of Pentecost. This miracle recurred until the church organization for this age was well established, and probably until the NT books were all put into circulation. There were numerous other demonstrative miracles. As the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews puts it, this "great salvation . . . at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him; God also bearing them witness both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost according to his own will" (Heb. 2:3,4).

The Purpose of miracles is revelation and edification. After calling to the many unrecorded miracles of Christ, John adds, "But these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name" (John 20:31). Christ several times expressed His purpose in working miracles. He rebuffed the mere desire to see the spectacular. "An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign." This was not a complete rejection even of idle curiosity, for He followed His rebuke with a powerful reference to Jonah as a type of His own resurrection (Matt. 12:39,40; cf. also Luke 23:8). To seek to see miracles is better than merely to seek free food (John 6:26). His miracles were evidence of the genuineness of His message. "The works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me" (John 5:36). He preferred that men would accept His message for its intrinsic worth, but to believe Him because of His miracles was not wrong. "If I do not do the works of my Father, do not believe me; but if I do, even though you do not believe me, believe the works, so that you may come to know and continue to realize, that the Father is in me and I am in the Father" (John 10:37,38 original translation).

The question of miracles today is disturbing to the faith of many. In the ancient church the Montanist party insisted that miracles and predictive prophecy must be perpetual gifts. Christ pointed out that miracles do not occur with any uniform regularity (Luke 4:25-27). In fact, if miracles were regular occurrences they would cease to be regarded as miracles. Paul's rules for the restriction of the use of foreign languages (I Cor. 14:) might be applied by analogy to all miracles. Evidently the miracle of languages which occurred on the day of Pentecost had been confused, in the minds of devout people in Corinth, with mere ecstatic meaningless ejaculations. Paul points out, "Languages are a sign not for believers, but for unbelievers." (vs. 22) And he commands that in Christian assemblies not more than two or, at the most, three, in turn, should be allowed to speak in a foreign language, and "if there be no translator, he [the one who wishes to speak in a "tongue"] must keep silent in the church" (Vss. 27,28). At the same time Paul does not forbid the language of untranslatable ejaculations in private (Vss. 2-5).

If Paul's restrictions were literally carried out in the modern church, making sure that the translator diermeneutes is a genuine translator, following known rules of grammar and syntax and vocabulary, the actual miracle of languages as it occurred on the day of Pentecost would never be interfered with. Rather it would be the better attested; but the counterfeit "miracle" would be eliminated.

If analogous methods were used in examining reports of alleged miracles, genuine miracles would never be hindered, but would be the better attested. At the same time delusions and exaggerations would be prevented.

Some have sought to account for the occurrence or non-occurrence of miracles on "dispensational" grounds. Such a view seems to have little basis. The period of time between Sinai and Calvary is recognized with general unanimity by dispensationalists as one uniform age of "Law." Yet this "dispensation" included the epoch of miracles under Elijah and Elisha, as well as long periods of which no miracles are recorded. To account for lack of miracles at the present time on dispensational grounds seems without scriptural or factual warrant.

From Bible history, and history since Bible times, the fact stands out that God does not choose to reveal Himself by demonstrative miracles at all times. On the contrary there have been long periods of history, even in Bible times, when God has not used miracles (except the "miracle of grace") in His dealings with His people.

It is a mistake to say that God cannot, or will not work demonstrative "sign" miracles in our day. It is, however, a reasonable opinion, not controvertible by any clearly attested facts, that God generally ceased to work through "sign" miracles when the NT was finished; and that it is His will that the "miracle of grace," the witness of the Spirit, answered prayer, and supremely, the written Word, shall be the chief sources of knowledge of Himself for His people during this age. It should be clear to all that the most godly, sacrificial, competent ministers, missionaries, and laymen today do not experience demonstrative "sign" miracles. God gives demonstrative miracles when, for reasons known to himself, He chooses to do so.

A healthy mind, full of faith in God's power and in God's wisdom, without denying that "sign" miracles may occur when God so chooses, expects to learn foreign languages by regular processes of study and hard work. A healthy Christian mind expects to observe the ordinary principles of bodily health and sanitation, using such physical provisions of food, shelter, and medicine as divine providence may make available. In spreading the Gospel one does expect the convicting ministry of the Spirit and the evidence of transformed lives, but one does not expect, unless God should so choose, that the sudden healing of a man born with twisted feet and ankle bones, will gather a crowd to hear us preach the Word. He is prepared to serve the Lord, to experience wonderful answers to prayer, and to find that the Word does not return void, regardless of "signs and wonders."

Miracles are an absolutely essential element in Christianity. If Jesus Christ is not God manifest in the flesh, our faith is a silly myth. If He did not arise from the dead in bodily form, the grave being empty and His appearance being recognizable, then we are yet in our sins and of all men most miserable. (See the author's Behold Him, Zondervan 1937, for a presentation of the evidences of Christ's resurrection). If the miracle of grace is not verifiable, the transformation of the life of the one who puts his faith in Jesus as his Lord and Saviour, then our Christian Gospel is a miserable fraud.

The rational nature of miracles has been misconstrued by David Hume and those who have followed his positivistic methods. Miracles are not violations of natural law as Hume supposed; they are intelligent acts of a personal God. They are not erratic or exotic occurrences; they are reasonable parts and phases of a cosmic program of revelation and redemption. There is no greater logical problem in the act of God in raising the dead than there is in the act of a man in lifting his hand. We speak or signal to our children and our neighbors with appropriate gestures; and God reveals Himself and His plan for us by "signs" or by other means according to His will.

Christianity is indeed a "supernatural" faith, but the distinction between the natural and the supernatural is only a convenient classification of events. From the point of view of the Biblical writers it was perfectly natural for God to wrestle with Jacob, or to roll back the Red Sea, or to raise his Son from the dead.

Consistent, miracle believing, Christian theism is just as unified in rational thought, just as scientific in its attitude toward evidence and verification, as any laboratory technician who believes that natural law does not exclude intelligent purposeful personal causation.

The Bibliography of the subject of miracles is enormous. In the opinion of the writer the best work in the field is Benjamin B. Warfield, Counterfeit Miracles, New York, Scribners, 1918. An excellent classic is Archbishop Richard Chenevix Trench, Notes On the Miracles of Our Lord, reprinted by Baker, Grand Rapids, 1949. A work often referred to by writers in this field is A. B. Bruce, The Miraculous Element in the Gospels, Hodder and Stoughton, 1929. The evidence for the incarnation and the resurrection are summarized in J. O. Buswell, Jr., Behold Him, Zondervan, 1936. For the rejection of the supernatural in history, the "demythologizing" of New Testament, see Rudolph Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, English translation, two volumes, Scribners, 1951, 1955. MIRIAM (mĭr'ĭ-ăm, Heb. miryām, various suggested meanings), the daughter of Amram and Jochebed and the sister of Moses and Aaron (Num. 26:59; I Chron. 6:3). She showed concern and wisdom in behalf of her infant brother, Moses, when he was discovered in the Nile by the Egyptian princess (Exod. 2:4,7-8). Miriam first appears by name in Exodus 15:20, where she is called a prophetess and is identified as the sister of Aaron. After the passage of the sea, she led the Israelite women in dancing and instrumental accompaniment while she sang the song of praise and victory (Exod. 15: 20-21). In Numbers 12:1 M. and Aaron criticized Moses for his marriage to a Cushite woman. Because of this criticism, M. was punished by the Lord with leprosy (Num. 12:9), but upon the protest of Aaron (vs. 11) and the prayer of Moses (vs. 13), she was restored after a period of seven days, during which she was isolated from the camp and the march was delayed. Her case of leprosy is cited in Deuteronomy 24:9. M. died at Kadesh and was buried there (Num. 20:1). Micah refers to her along with her brothers as leaders whom the Lord provided to bring Israel out of the Egyptian bondage (Mic. 6:4). C.E.D.

MIRMA (mûr'mà, fraud), head of a father's house in Benjamin after the captivity (I Chron. 8:10).

MIRROR, any smooth or polished surface as of glass or of metal that forms images by reflecting light. As is seen in Exodus 38:8, the "looking-glasses" of the serving women were made of brass, and so could be used as material for the laver. Elihu in Job 37:18 speaks of the sky as resembling a molten looking-glass. He was, no doubt, thinking of the brightness of the sky as like that of polished metal. Of the inadequacy of these ancient mirrors as compared with modern ones, Paul reminds us (I Cor. 13:12) by saying that "now we see through a glass darkly." Paul does not mean that the mirror is transparent, but that the image is indistinct. James compares a hearer of the word who is not also a doer to "a man beholding his natural face in a glass" (James 1:23,24) and then forgetting what manner of man he was. In all these cases ASV uses "mirror" for "glass" or "looking-glass" which is of course better, because the material was metal, not glass.

MISGAB (mĭs'găb, Heb. ha-misgāv, a lofty place), a town in the high hills of Moab, possibly another name for Moab's capital (Jer. 48:1).

MISHAEL (mĭsh'ā-ĕl, Heb. mîshā'ēl, who is what God is?). 1. A cousin of Moses and Aaron, being son of Uzziel, son of Kohath (Exod. 6:22; Lev. 10:4). He helped dispose of the bodies of Nadab and Abihu whom the Lord had slain.

2. A man, presumably a Levite, who stood with Ezra at the reading of the law (Neh. 8:4).

3. A prince of Judah, taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, who through his officer, changed his name to Meshach, a name of disputed, though undoubtedly heathen meaning. Mishael and his companions, Hananiah and Azariah, were thrust into a burning fiery furnace (Dan. 3:19-30) but came out unharmed, having had the fellowship of "one like a son of the gods."

MISHAL (mī'shăl, Heb. mish'āl), a Levitical city (Gershonite) in the tribe of Asher (Josh. 21:30); called "Misheal" in Joshua 19:26 and "Mashal" in I Chronicles 6:74.

MISHAM (mī'shăm), a Benjamite, builder of cities (I Chron. 8:12); son of Elpaal.

MISHEAL (See Mishal)

MISHMA (mĭsh'mà, Heb. mishmā'). 1. Son of Ishmael and a prince of the Ishmaelites (Gen. 25:14; I Chron. 1:30).

2. Progenitor of a large family of Simeonites through his descendant Shimei (I Chron. 4:25ff). They held their cities till David's time.

MISHMANNAH (mĭsh-măn'à, fatness), a mighty man of Gad, who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:10).

MISHRAITES (mĭsh'rā-īts), a family of Kiriath-jearim in Judah (I Chron. 2:53).

MISPERETH (mĭs'pē-reth), one who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7), called "Mispar" in Ezra 2:2.

MISREPHOTH - MAIM (mĭs'rē-fŏth - mā'ĭm, hot springs), a town or a region near Sidon to which Joshua chased the kings of the North who had joined against him (Josh. 11:8; 13:6). Perhaps the same as Zarephath where Elijah lodged (I Kings 17:9,10), the "Sarepta" of Luke 4:26. On the coast between Sidon and Tyre.

MIST. 1. Steamy vapor rising from warm damp ground into a humid atmosphere (Gen. 2:6).

2. A blinding dimness of vision like that caused by cataracts (Acts 13:11).

3. A part of the description of false teachers in II Peter 2:17.

MITE (See Money)

MITER (See Dress, also Priesthood)

MITHCAH (mĭth'kà, sweetness), probably a sweet fountain in Arabia Petraea (Num. 33:28,29). In ASV, "Mithkah."

MITHNITE (mĭth-nīt), patronymic designation of Joshaphat, a mighty man of David (I Chron. 11:43).

MITHRAISM, the cult of Mithras, a Persian sun-god, which reached Rome in or about A.D. 69, by the agency of the eastern legions who set up Vespasian as emperor (Tac. Hist. 3:24). It is possible that the cult was known in the capital a century before, but it was the latter half of the first century of the Christian era which saw its strong dissemination in the West, and indeed its notable challenge to Christianity. Based on the trials, sufferings, and exploits of Mithras, the cult appealed to soldiers; and two Mithraea on Hadrian's wall, one excavated in 1948 at Carrawburgh, and another still covered at Housesteads, reveal the popularity of Mithraism with the British legions. Professor Ian Richmond has established a sequence of destruction and rebuilding at Carrawburgh, which he interprets as indicative of the practice of Mithraism or Christianity at local headquarters. The same shrine has a place of ordeal under the altar, for the initiate advanced through various grades by way of physical suffering and endurance. The archaeologists on the same site were able to establish the fact that chickens and geese were eaten at the ritual feasts, and that pine-cones provided aromatic altar fuel. December 25 was the chief feast of Mithras, and in fixing on that date for Christmas, the early Church sought to overlay both the Mithraic festival and the Saturnalia. Christianity triumphed over Mithraism because of its written records of a historic Christ, and its associated body of doctrine adapted for preaching, evangelism, and the needs of every day. Christianity, too, was universal, excluding neither woman, child, nor slave. It preached salvation by faith and demanded no stern ordeals. E.M.B.

MITHREDATH (mĭth'rē-dăth, Heb. mithredhāth, given by Mithras, i.e., by the Sun), the Persian name of two men: 1. The treasurer of Cyrus, king of Persia, who had charge of the vessels from the temple (Ezra 1:8).

2. An enemy of the Jews in the days of "Artaxerxes," i.e., Cambyses, son of Cyrus (Ezra 4:7). He and others slandered the Jews and stopped their work for a time.

MITYLENE (mĭt-ĭ-lē'nē, Gr. Mutiléne). The name is more properly spelled Mytilene. It was the chief city of Lesbos, a splendid port with a double harbor (Acts 20:14), and a center of Greek culture. It was the home of Sappho and Alcaeus, the early lyric poets, and a considerable maritime and colonizing power. Sigeum and Assos were Mitylene's foundations. Mitylene's history forms the usual checkered story of a Greek state too weak for independence, and torn between the demands of rival imperialists, Persia, Athens, Rome.

MIXED MULTITUDE. When Israel left Egypt at the Exodus, they were accompanied by a "mixed multitude" (Exod. 12:38), made up, no doubt, of people who had been deeply impressed by the plagues and who realized the powerlessness of the gods of Egypt. Though they went with Israel, their hearts were in Egypt as is seen in Numbers 11:4-6. In the revival after the return with Ezra and Nehemiah, Israel separated itself from a similar group of "camp-followers" (Neh. 13:3).

MIZAR (mī'zär, Heb. har mits'ār, small), a small peak in the neighborhood of the great Mt. Hermon (Ps. 42:6). The word may be a common noun, "a little hill."

MIZPAH (mĭz'pà, Heb. mitspâh, mitspēh, watch-tower, lookout-post), as a common noun meaning "watchtower, guardpost" (mitspēh), is found in II Chronicles 20:24 and Isaiah 21:8. As a proper noun, it is used of: 1. An unidentified town in the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:38), in the vicinity of Lachish.

2. An unknown city in Moab (I Sam. 22:3), to which David went to confer with the king of Moab concerning a place of refuge for his parents while he was dodging the armies of Saul.

3. An unidentified region or valley mentioned in Joshua 11:3 (mitspâh), and 11:8.

4. A city in Gilead (Judg. 11:29; cf. Ramoth-mizpeh, Josh. 13:26).

5. A town in Benjamin (Josh. 18:26), tentatively identified as Tell en-Nashbeh (see below).

Mizpah is: (1) a town in Gilead (see above and Josh. 10:17), which may be associated with Genesis 31:49, where the name is given to a heap of stones set up as a memorial or witness between Jacob and Laban. This Gileadite city was also the home of Jephthah (Judg. 11:34); (2) most frequently Mizpah is the town of Benjamin (cf. 5 above).

At M. the Israelites gathered to consider the steps to be taken against Gibeah in the case of the atrocity related in Judges 19 (cf. Judg. 20:1,3; 21:1,5,8). M. was one of the cities closely associated with Samuel, for he made the circuit of Bethel, Gilgal, and M. and judged Israel in those places (I Sam. 7:16). At M. Israel came to meet with Samuel in repentance (I Sam. 7:5-16) and from there they went out to meet the attacking Philistines and to gain the victory which was celebrated by the setting up of the Ebenezer memorial, "between M. and Shen" (vs. 12). Asa, king of Judah, fortified M. with stones transported from the building venture of Baasha, king of Israel, at Ramah (I Kings 15:22; II Chron. 16:6). After the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 587/6 B.C., Gedaliah was appointed governor of Judah. He located his headquarters at M. (II Kings 25:22-23; Jer. 40:5-12) and the Jews who remained in the land gathered to him there. Johanan, the son of Kareah, and the other military leaders came to M. and warned Gedaliah of a plot against his life by Ishmael, son of Nethaniah. Johanan volunteered to kill Ishmael, but Gedaliah rejected the offer (Jer. 40:16) and ignored the warning. Ishmael carried out his plot successfully, killing not only Gedaliah but also other Jews and Babylonian soldiers who were there (Jer. 41:1-3; II Kings 25:25). The following day a group of 80 men on a religious pilgrimage arrived from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria. Ishmael deceived the men, killed them, and threw them into a cistern, except for ten men who were able to buy their lives. The cistern which Ishmael filled with the slain was part of the defense system which Asa had made against Baasha of Israel (Jer. 41:9). Ishmael took captive the remainder of the people of M., but the captives made their escape when Johanan and others gave pursuit. The survivors then went to Egypt, contrary to the Lord's command (Jer. 41:17-42:22). M. also appears in the lists of rebuilders of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:7,15,19) and is mentioned by Hosea (5:1) in his rebuke of Israel.

MIZPAR (mĭz'pär), a leading companion of Zerubabel (Ezra 2:2). Called Mizpereth (ASV Mispereth) in Nehemiah 7:7.

MIZPEH (See Mizpah)

MIZRAIM (mĭz'rā-ĭm, Heb. mitsrayim, form and derivation uncertain). 1. The second son of Ham (Gen. 10:6; I Chron. 1:8), is associated with northeastern Africa, possibly along with his brothers, Cush and Phut. Some of the descendants of Mizraim (Gen. 10:13-14; I Chron. 1:11-12) probably are also to be linked with this area.

2. The usual Hebrew word for "Egypt" and always so translated in the RSV.

MIZZAH (mĭz'a, Heb. mizzâh, terror), a grandson of Esau through his wife Basemath and his son Reuel. Reckoned as one of the chiefs of Edom (Gen. 36:13,17).

MNASON (nā'sŏn, Gr. Mnáson), a well-to-do Cypriot who had a house in Jerusalem, and who furnished hospitality for Paul and his party on their return from the third missionary journey. He had been a Christian from the early days of the Church (Acts 21:16).

MOAB (mō'ăb, Heb. mô'āv, seed). 1. Grandson of Lot by incest with his elder daughter (Gen. 19:30-38).

2. The nation or people descended from Moab. They settled first at Ar, just E of the southern part of the Dead Sea and quite close to the site of the destroyed cities of the plain. Moses was commanded of the Lord not to vex them when Israel passed through their vicinity on their way to the Promised Land. However, when Israel had well-nigh reached their destination and were encamped in the plains of Moab (Num. 22-24) Balak, sensing that he could not save himself from Israel by force of arms, hired Balaam to come and curse Israel. Balaam desired with all his heart to come; but after being rebuked by the voice of a dumb ass for his sin, he was permitted of God to proceed, but on condition that he would speak only what God gave him to speak. As a result, he prophetically gave blessing to Israel four times as he had to do, but he evidently said to Balak and the Moabites and Midianites, "Though you cannot conquer Israel by force of arms, you can seduce them" so the Moabite girls entered the camp of Israel (Num. 31:16) and seduced the men (Num. 25:1-9). As a result, God sent a plague that took off 24,000 men. It was on Mt. Pisgah in the land of Moab, that Moses died.

Nearly a century after the conquest of Canaan Israel "served Eglon, the king of Moab eighteen years" (Judg. 3:12-14). Moab was able to gather the Ammonites and the Amalekites against Israel, but when the children of Israel repented and prayed, God raised up Ehud who slew Eglon and so subdued Moab (Judg. 3:30). There seems to have been considerable travel to and fro between Moab and Judah, for in the days of the judges Elimelech of Bethlehem took his family to Moab to sojourn during a famine; there his two sons married and died, and Ruth, the Moabitess returned with Naomi, married Boaz and became an ancestress of David. David, when in difficulty with King Saul, took his father and mother to the king of Moab for their protection (I Sam. 22:3,4). Later, Mesha (q.v.) king of Moab, rendered heavy tribute to Ahab, king of Israel (II Kings 3:4). After the death of Ahab, he rebelled, but Jehoram, king of Israel with Jehoshaphat of Judah thoroughly defeated him and, so far as possible, ruined his land. From that time on, Moab gradually declined in accordance with the word of the Lord through His prophets. Amos 2:1-3 pronounces the death sentence upon Moab; Isaiah 15,16, "The burden of Moab" gives in much detail the coming destruction of Moab, and this was fulfilled by Shalmanezer of Assyria or by his successor Sargon. Isaiah puts his finger on the prevailing sin of Moab aside from his idolatry: "We have heard of the pride of Moab, that he is very proud; even of his arrogancy, and his pride and his wrath" (16:6) and Ezekiel and Jeremiah, a century and a half later complete the picture. Moab and Seir are to be punished for likening the house of Judah to the other nations (Ezek. 25:8-11). Jeremiah (chap. 48) depicts both past and future judgments upon Moab and Zephaniah 2:8-11 foretells utter destruction upon Moab for its wicked pride.

3. The land of the Moabites. Moab was bounded on the W by the Dead Sea, on the E by the desert, on the N by the Arnon, and on the S by Edom. It is about 3,200 feet above the level of the sea, and is chiefly rolling country, well-adapted for pasturage. Machaerus, the place where John the Baptist was imprisoned and lost his life, was in Moab.

MOABITE STONE, THE, an inscribed stone found in Moab and recording Moabite history. In 1868, F. A. Klein, a German missionary employed by the Church Missionary Society (Church of England) while traveling through the territory formerly occupied by the tribe of Reuben, E of the Dead Sea, was informed by an Arab sheikh of a remarkable stone inscribed with writing, and lying at Dibon, near Mr. Klein's route. The stone was bluish basalt, neatly cut into a monument about four by two feet with its upper end curved, and a raised rim enclosing an inscription. Mr. Klein informed the authorities of the Berlin Museum, and meanwhile M. Ganneau of the French Consulate at Jerusalem and a Capt. Warren had made "squeezes" and so had secured roughly the material of the inscription. While the French and the Germans were bargaining with the Turks for the stone, the Arabs, with Oriental acuteness, argued that if the stone as a whole was of value it would be far more valuable if cut to pieces, so they built a fire around it, poured cold water over it, and so well-nigh destroyed it; and would have succeeded had not the gentleman above mentioned ascertained the inscription. The fragments of the stone were purchased, pieced together and are now in the Louvre in Paris. The writing consisted of 34 lines, written in the Moabite language (practically a dialect of the Hebrew) by Mesha, king of the Moabites in the time of Ahaziah and Jehoram, the sons of Ahab, and giving his side of the story recorded in part in II Kings 3. It reads, in part: "I, Mesha, king of Moab, made this monument to Chemosh to commemorate deliverance from Israel. My father reigned over Moab thirty years, and I reigned after my father. Omri, king of Israel, oppressed Moab many days and his son after him. But I warred against the king of Israel, and drove him out, and took his cities, Medeba, Ataroth, Nebo and Jahaz, which he built while he waged war against me. I destroyed his cities, and devoted the spoil to Chemosh, and the women and girls to Ashtar. I built Qorhah with prisoners from Israel. In Beth-Diblathaim, I placed sheep-raisers." It seems strange that though Mesha names Omri who had long since died, he does not name his son Ahab, who reigned almost twice as long, and to whom Mesha had paid heavy tribute (II Kings 3: 4). Perhaps he hated his very name. Neither does he mention the sons of Ahab, Ahaziah and Jehoram, by name, though he warred against them. Probably he had the monument made before the time of his defeat by Jehoram and Jehoshaphat.

Though the inscription is almost in pure Hebrew, it was written in the old "round" letters, which were later superseded (some say in Ezra's time) by the "square" letters in which Hebrew is printed today. Very ancient Hebrew, and Arabic as well, were written practically without signs for vowel sounds, but the Moabite stone uses the aleph, waw and yodh not only as consonants but as vowels, and also uses the silent he at the end of the words, just as in the OT. Some have called the Moabite stone "the earliest important Hebrew inscription" though written in Moabite. Since Moab and Jacob were both descendants of Terah, it is not strange that their tongues should resemble one another.

MOADIAH (See Maadiah)

MOLADAH (mŏl'ă-dà, Heb. môlādhâh, birth), one of the cities mentioned in Joshua 15 and 19 in the lists both of Judah and of Simeon. It lies about ten miles E of Beer-sheba. Now called Khirbet-el-Milh. At the Restoration, Judah occupied it (Neh. 11:26).

MOLE (See Animals)

MOLID (mō'lid, begetter), an early member of the tribe of Judah, mentioned only in I Chronicles 2:29.

MOLOCH, MOLECH (mō'lŏk, mō'lĕk, Heb. hamōlekh), a heathen god worshiped especially by the Ammonites with gruesome orgies in which little ones were sacrificed. At least in some places an image of the god was heated and the bodies of children who had just been slain were placed in its arms. The worship of Moloch was known to the children of Israel before they entered Canaan, for Moses very sternly forbade its worship (Lev. 18: 21; 20:1-5). In spite of this prohibition, King Solomon, to please his numerous heathen wives, set up high places for Chemosh and for Moloch on Mount Olivet (I Kings 11:7), though its principal place of worship in and after Manasseh's time was the valley of the son of Hinnom (II Chron. 33:6), a place of such ill repute that "Gehenna," i.e., "the valley of Hinnom" became a type for hell (Matt. 5:29,30). The words "Moloch," "Molech," "Milcom" (I Kings 11:5), "Malcam" (Zeph. 1:5) are all variants of Heb. words meaning "the reigning one." Latter-day Jews often went from the sacrifices to Moloch into the house of the Lord to worship there (Ezek. 23:37-39) and this impiety was particularly offensive to Jehovah as it added insult to injury. Read Jeremiah 7:9-11; 19:4-13. Because of this heathen worship God gave the land of Israel over to the rule of its enemies for many years (Ps. 106:35-42). A.B.F.

MONEY. While "the love of money is the root of all evil" (I Tim. 6:10), the study of money, particularly of money mentioned in the Bible, is rich and rewarding. Not only did Jesus and the apostles admonish Christians about the use of money, they also used it themselves and brought it into their teaching. The early Christians used money in their daily lives just as Christians and churches do today. Translators of the Bible, however, have always had difficulty finding terms for the various kinds of money in the Bible which indicate the value or purchasing power in Bible times. Therefore, a knowledge of the nature and value of ancient money is very helpful to the Bible reader in understanding the Bible today.

Brief History of Money. Money in the sense of stamped coin did not exist, so far as is known, before 700 B.C. There was no coined money in Israel until after the Exile. Before this time exchange of values took place by bartering, by trading one thing for another without the exchange of money. This method was followed by the weight system, later by minted coins, paper money, until today we have the credit system by which one may live, buy, and sell without the use of money at all. Wealth is first mentioned in the Bible in connection with Abraham (Gen. 12:5), "And Abram took (from Ur to Canaan) Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered" (cf. 12:16,20). The three main items of wealth in the ancient world are listed in Genesis 13:2, and Abraham had all three: "And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold." Among the Romans the word for money was pecunia which is derived from pecus, the Latin word for cow or cattle. Perfumes and ointments also had great value. Besides gold, the Wise Men brought frankincense and myrrh to worship the new-born King.

The Shekel. The first metal exchange was crude, often shapeless, and heavy so as to approximate the value of the item purchased in actual weight. The buyer usually weighed his "money" to the seller. The Jewish shekel was such a weight (shekel means "weight"). It was based on the Babylonian weight of exchange, generally of gold, silver, bronze and even iron. Among the Jews the shekel was used for the temple tax, poll tax, and for redemption from the priesthood (Exod. 30:11-16; 13:13; Num. 3:44-51). Since Jesus was a first-born Son not of the tribe of Levi, His parents redeemed Him from the priesthood (Luke 2:21ff) by payment of a shekel (really a half-shekel coin). In Jesus' day the shekel was not a weight but a coin with the value of a shekel, worth about a day's wages at the time. The shekel shown (see plate) is such a redemption shekel. It is a genuine piece from the days of the Maccabees, 175-140 B.C., although some scholars believe it comes from the last revolt of the Jews against the Romans, 66-70 A.D. On the obverse (front) is a pot of manna (Exod. 16:33) with the legend (writing or inscription) "Shekel Israel." On the reverse (back) is Aaron's budding rod (Num. 17:8) with the legend in Hebrew letters, "Jesusalem the Holy." Other weights mentioned in the Bible are: talent (circle), māneh (part), gērâh (grain), and beqa' (half shekel). It required 3,000 shekels to equal one talent of silver, which reveals that the 10,000 talents the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18:23-25) owed his master was an overwhelming debt. The pound (Luke 19:13) is a translation of the old weight mina or maneh (Greek: mna). Since a talent was 60 minas, a mina equaled 50 shekels in Attic weight and 100 shekels in Old Testament weight, which means that in the parable the gift of the Lord to His people is a most precious gift, namely, the Gospel.

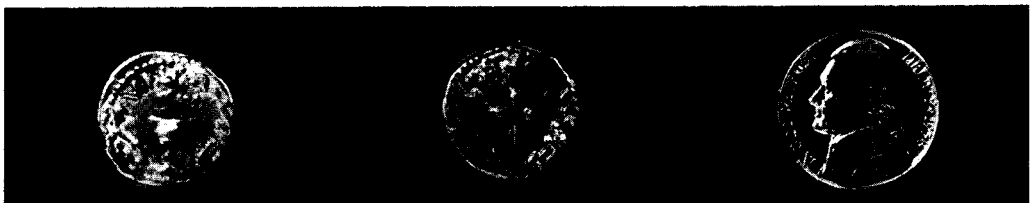
Beginning of the Coin System. The Hebrews were not the first people to use minted coins. Except for a few brief periods of independence, they were compelled to use the coinage of their pagan conquerors. Thus in the Bible we find a wide variety of coins — mainly Greek, Roman, and Jewish — all used by the same people. Most historians believe that the earliest money pieces were struck about 700 B.C. in the small kingdom of Lydia in Asia Minor. These early Lydian "coins" were simply crude pieces of metal cut into small lumps of a standard weight and stamped with official marks to guarantee the value. The Egyptians also developed such a system. Later the quality of the metal and the image on the coin indicated the worth in buying power, much like today. It is believed that the Jews first became acquainted with the coinage of the Babylonians and Persians during the Captivity and that they carried these coins with them when they returned to Palestine.



OBVERSE REVERSE AMERICAN NICKEL

Jewish Shekel. Perhaps struck by Simon Maccabeus about 140 B.C. (I Macc. 15:6). Pot of manna on the obverse and the flowering rod on the reverse. Note size as compared to an American nickel.

OBVERSE REVERSE AMERICAN DIME

Tetradrachma of Ephesus. Both the bee on the obverse and the stag (with palm tree) on the reverse were symbols of the goddess Diana of the Ephesians (Acts 19:28). The Greek letters E Ph beside the bee are abbreviation for "Ephesus."

OBVERSE REVERSE AMERICAN QUARTER

Tridrachma of Corinth. The goddess Athena is wearing a Corinthian helmet. An unusual coin because the head is on the reverse.

OBVERSE REVERSE AMERICAN HALF DOLLAR

Greek Tetradrachma, or Shekel of Tyre. Head of the god Melkarth on the obverse, and an eagle standing on the rudder of a ship on the reverse. The legend reads, "Tyre the Holy and Invincible."

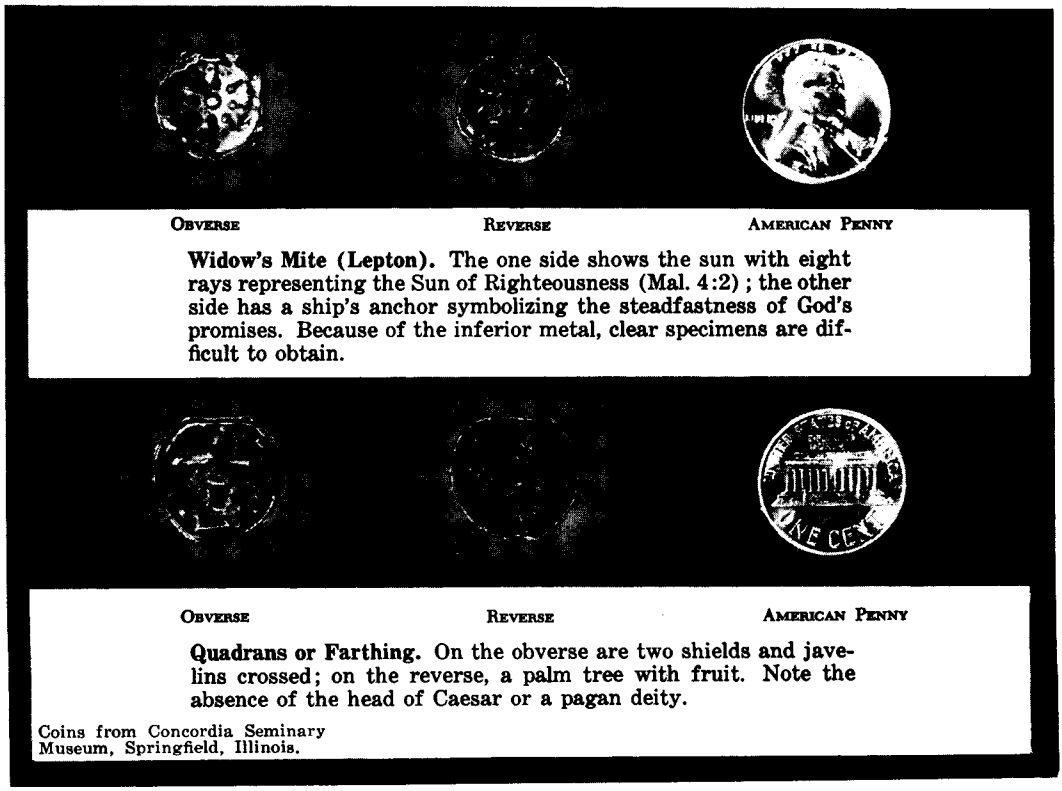
Coins from Concordia Seminary Museum, Springfield, Illinois.

The Drachma. After 330 B.C. the world-conquering Greeks developed the Persian and Babylonian coinage, and their own, into something of a fixed world system. Animals, natural objects, and the Greek gods were used as symbols on the coins. Each coin was made individually with hammer, punch, and die. The Greeks called these coins drachmas (drachma means "handful") of which there was a variety with about the same value. Later the terms drachma and shekel were used somewhat interchangeably. The "lost coin" (Luke 15:8) was a silver drachma equivalent to a Roman denarius, a day's wages. The temple or half-shekel tax (Matt. 17:24) was a didrachma. Another drachma was the tridrachma of Corinth, a silver coin about the size of our quarter with the head of Athena on one side and the winged horse Pegasus on the other. It was worth a day's pay and no doubt Paul earned it making tents and used it for payment of passage on ships during his journeys. A Greek coin Paul also may have "spent" is the now famous "bee coin," a silver tetradrachma of Ephesus dating back to 350 B.C. All these drachmas were about equal in value to the Jewish shekel.

The Stater. The coin Peter found in the fish's mouth was the Greek statér (Matt. 17:27). Since the temple tax was a half-shekel the stater would pay for two. Many authorities believe that the stater really was the tetradrachma of Antioch or Tyre since these coins were accepted at the temple. It is believed that the thirty pieces of silver (Matt. 26:15; 27:3-5) which bought the greatest betrayal in history were these large silver coins, tetradrachmas of either Tyre or Antioch from about 125 B.C. In Exodus 21:32 we read that 30 shekels was the price of a slave.

The Assarion. The Greek assárion is mentioned twice in the NT (Matt. 10:29; Luke 12:6): "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing (assárion)?" In the Roman Empire this Greek coin was both small in size and in value, and the English translators simply translated "farthing," in a similar small coin with which the people in England would be familiar. Today we might say "two sparrows for a penny," or "two for a nickel."

Lepton and Kodrantes (Widow's Mite). During pre-Roman times under the Maccabees (175-140 B.C.) the Jews for the first time were allowed to issue money of their own. One such piece, as we have seen, was the shekel. Another piece was the leptón, a tiny bronze or copper coin, which we know as the "widow's mite," "And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites which make a farthing" (Mark 12:42; Luke 21:2; 12:59). Leptón was translated "mite" because it was the coin of least value among coins. Even the metal was inferior and deteriorated easily. This coin should really be the "penny" of the Bible, not the denarius. The coin illustrated was struck much later by John Hyrcanus II, Jewish High Priest and ruler, 69-40 B.C. In contrast to the coins of pagan rulers, the Jewish coins had pictures from religion and agriculture instead of gods and men, obeying the command. "You shall not make yourself a graven image, or any likeness" (Exod. 20:4). The English translators are confusing when they also render kodrántes with "farthing": "And she threw in two mites which make a farthing (kodrántes)." The kodrántes had twice the value of a "mite," something like that of a two-cent piece today. The kodrántes shown here is really a Roman coin made for the Jews.



The Denarius. The most interesting coin of the Bible is the Roman denarius (Greek: denárion), known by collectors as the "penny" of the Bible because of this translation in the King James Version. This silver coin, which looks something like our dime, was the most common Roman coin during the days of Jesus and the apostles. Collectors have been able to obtain originals of all 12 Roman emperors (Augustus to Nerva) who reigned during the NT period, 4 B.C. to A.D. 100. There were also gold denarii but these were generally special issues and not nearly so numerous. The Romans as well as the Greeks struck mainly silver coins (alloys) and kept large government-owned silver mines throughout the empire, e.g., at Antioch and Ephesus. It is interesting to note that when Paul writes, "The love of money is the root of all evil," he really says in Greek, "The love of silver (philargyría) is the root of all evil" (I Tim. 6:10; cf. Luke 16:14; II Tim. 3:2).

The true value of the denarius may be seen in our Lord's parable of the laborers in the vineyard: "After agreeing with the laborers for a penny (Greek: denárion) a day he sent them into his vineyard" (Matt. 20:2,10). Sunday school teachers and children have always wondered why any man would toil all day and receive only a penny. Even those who worked but one hour deserved more than that. Was it because wages were so low? But if one remembers that in the Roman world the denarius represented a day's pay, the dilemma is solved. Army pay was also a denarius a day. For this reason it is misleading today to state, as Bible margins often do, that the denarius is worth "eighteen or twenty cents"; this is the value according to silver weight (pound sterling) but not according to buying power, which is the important thing. There is a relationship between "penny" and "denarius," however, which explains the translation. The English monetary system is based on the old Roman system. British symbols are: £-pounds; s-shillings; d-pence. The "d" for pence stands for the old denarius. The confusion began when "pence" became "penny" in our Bibles.

Similarly, in Jesus' parable of the unmerciful servant, we read: "But the same servant went out and found one of his fellow-servants which owed him an hundred pence (Greek: denárion)." This means that the amount the man owed was not a mere pittance, but a hundred days' wages; of course, it was insignificant compared to the 10,000 talents (30,000,000) denarii). Again, the lesson in good works taught in the parable of the Good Samaritan is greatly enhanced when we know the real value of a denarius. We read: "And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence (Greek: denárion), and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee" (Luke 10:35). The fact that the Good Samaritan paid two days' wages and was willing to pay anything more over that amount to aid an unknown stranger, greatly enhances his love for his neighbor. In our day a gift of two ten-dollar bills to the Community Chest is not so much!

The denarius is mentioned in the miracle of feeding the five thousand (John 6): "Philip answered him, Two hundred pennyworth (denarii) of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little." If one assumes that the treasury of the group contained 200 denarii, then Jesus and His disciples dispensed more money to the needy than is generally recognized. Similar light is thrown on the generous act of Mary who anointed Jesus with the precious spikenard. In John 12:5 Judas is quoted as saying, "Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence (denarii), and given to the poor?" Considering the value of a denarius in Jesus' day, Mary's gift was truly great. Few could afford it today. Perhaps Judas would not have grumbled over the $60.00 usually stipulated as the cost of this nard (20c x 300), but it was the 300 days' wages which evoked this cold comment from the lover of silver. Incidentally, one can appreciate the severity of the famine represented by the black horse by knowing the value of a denarius (Rev. 6:5-6): "And he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand.

OBVERSE REVERSE AMERICAN DIME

Denarius of Caesar Augustus, 43 B.C.-A.D. 14. The famous tribute money with the image of Caesar. Both sides of the coin glorify the Caesars. Note the similarity to the American dime, but in Jesus' day it was worth more than a hundred dimes in buying power since it was a day's wages.

OBVERSE REVERSE AMERICAN DIME

Denarius of Domitian, A.D. 81-96. Notice the typical Roman profile and Mars, god of war. The lettering on this coin is extensive. Most of these coins were of about the same thickness as our coins today.

Coins from Concordia Seminary Museum, Springfield, Illinois.

And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, A measure (quart) of wheat for a penny (denarius), and three measures (quarts) of barley for a penny (denarius)."

The denarius was also the "tribute money" which the Romans imposed on the Jewish people. The story of the attempt of Jesus' enemies to trap Him in a treasonable statement (Matt. 22:15-22) tells us more about the denarius. "Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar or not?" they asked. In answering, Jesus gave an example of early use of what we call visual aids. "Shew me the tribute money," He said. "And they brought unto him a penny (denarius)." He then asked them, "Whose is this image and superscription?" Since it was a denarius of Caesar, they answered, "Caesar's." The "image" on the denarius handed our Lord was the head of Caesar Augustus (43 B.C.-A.D.14), who issued the decree for the empire-wide census (Luke 2:1), or that of Tiberius Caesar reigning at the time, A.D. 14-39. Pictured is an original denarius, nearly 2000 years old, of the mighty Emperor Caesar Augustus. The obverse gives us the profile of this powerful Caesar. We note the typical Latin face and the head dress. From Nero's coins we can see that he was fat and pudgy. From the denarius came the idea of our American dime, one of which is pictured with Franklin Roosevelt's "image" in the same profile view. Caesar's name is spelled out entirely to the right of the head thus: CAESARAVGVSTVS. To the left of the head are the following Latin abbreviations, all run together: DIVIMPPATERPATRIAE. DIV means "divine"; IMP, "imperator"; PATER PATRIAE, Latin for "Father of His Country." On the reverse one sees the figures of two Caesars, and above and around the figures the Latin abbreviations: AVGVSPONCOSTRPGER. AVG is "Augustus"; PON, "Pontifex Maximus", religious ruler, or "Highest Priest"; COS, "consulship"; TRP, "Tribunica Potestate," Tribune power, civil head of the state. Below the images is the word CAESARES, Latin for "Caesars." From this coin alone one can discern that the Roman Emperor was an absolute monarch, head of both state and religion.

Photographs of a denarius of the Roman Emperor Domitian have been included to illustrate how much "literature" is often found on the Roman coins. Domitian reigned at the end of the NT period, A.D. 81-96, and is no doubt the emperor who banished the Apostle John to Patmos. From the profile on the obverse one can assume that he was heavy in stature with a small face and deep-set eyes and large nose. The lengthy lettering, beginning below the image and proceeding clock-wise around the coin is as follows: IMP, "Imperator"; CAES, "Caesar", title of king, not his name; DOMIT, "Domitian", his given name (praenomen); AUG. "Augustus," most distinctive title; GERM, "Germanicus" or German, hereditary title; PM, "pontifex maximus", head of the empire's religion. TRP, "Tribunica potestate," supreme civil head, representative of the people. On the reverse is the image of Mars, god of war, holding a spear and a shield. When the nation was at peace he was pictured carrying an olive branch, but not in the days of Domitian. Around the image of Mars, reading left to right, are the words: IMP, "Imperator" or Emperor; XXII, means date of 90 A.D.; COS XVI, 16th consulship, about 90 A.D.; CENS PER, "Censor Perpetuus", another title of the chief of state, granted for lifetime, hence "perpetual." Seldom does one see so much said in so little space.

To study and handle these coins, some over 2000 years old, indeed brings one close to the people who lived in Bible days and helps to understand the times in which they lived. For instance, a study of the denarius reveals that this coin was not only to serve as a medium of exchange, but also to disseminate information and propaganda for the emperor. Since there were no newspapers in those days, the government placed much information on its money, especially to glorify the emperor and to recite his deeds. The Roman emperors believed the people read the legends on the coins and went to much trouble to change them often, sometimes once a year. The coins also yield a good deal of historical information, i.e., the dates of the emperors, and help to establish the historicity of the Bible.

The value of the coins fluctuated much in ancient times. Therefore, it is often difficult to state the exact value of each coin. The government issued its money through money changers instead of banks and often the rate of exchange changed according to what a money changer was willing to give on a certain day. The denarius became much less in value after the second century.

Regarding the value of the Bible coins, it is generally misleading and confusing to give their value in pound sterling. For example, to state that a denarius is worth 20 cents may give the value in silver weight, but not the value in purchasing power which gives the true or real value of the coin, just as people have learned during these days of inflation in America. Bible translators will do greater service and reduce confusion by simply transliterating the Greek and Latin names for the coins (denarius, shekel, assarion, etc.), which the new RSV has attempted to do, and allow the Bible reader to interpret the value of the coins himself.

MONEY CHANGER. In Judaea in NT times, Roman money was legal tender and so was used for ordinary purposes, but the priests taught the people that only Jewish currency was fit for worship, so these men made a very profitable business for themselves. Having secured Jewish money from the priests, they sat in the court of the Gentiles and exchanged it (at a liberal profit for themselves) for Roman money, then would make another exchange with the priests, no doubt making a profit at both ends. (See Matthew 21:12 with its parallel in Mark 11:15). Our Lord drove them out saying that they had made the Lord's house a den of robbers (KJV "a den of thieves").

MONOTHEISM (mŏn'ō-thē-ĭzm, from Gr. mónos, one, théos, god), the doctrine or belief that there is but one God. Atheism is the belief that there is no god; polytheism, that there is more than one god; monolatry, the worship of one god as supreme, without denying that there are other gods; and henotheism, belief in one god, though not to the exclusion of belief in others. There are three great monotheistic religions: Judaism, Christianity and Islam (Mohammedanism), the latter two having their origin in the first. According to the Bible, man was originally a monotheist. This has been denied by the school of comparative religion, which teaches that monotheism was a late development in human religious experience. According to it, the religion of Israel was not originally monotheistic; it gradually became so through the influence of the prophets. W. Schmidt, S. M. Zwemer, and others have shown, on the contrary, that polytheism was a late development. The Christian doctrine of the Trinity is not in conflict with the monotheism of the OT. There are intimations of the doctrine of the Trinity in the OT. Christ and the apostles, moreover, saw nothing incompatible between monotheism and the doctrine of the Trinity. S.B.

MOON (See Astronomy)

MORASTHITE (mō-rās'thīt), an inhabitant of Moresheth, as was the prophet Micah (Mic. 1:1; Jer. 26:18). See MORESHETH-GATH.

MORDECAI (môr'dē-kī, Heb. mordekhay, from Marduk, chief god of Babylon). 1. A leader of the people of Judah during the return of Zerubbabel from exile (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

2. The deliverer of the Jews in the book of Esther. He was a Benjamite who had been deported during the reign of Jehoiachin (Esth. 2:5, 6). He lived in Shushan (Susa) the Persian capital and brought up his cousin Esther, whose parents were dead (2:7). When Esther was taken into the royal harem, Mordecai forbade her to reveal her nationality (2:20); yet he remained in close connection with her. Mordecai discovered at the palace gate a plot against the king. By informing Esther of the plot, he secured the execution of the two eunuchs responsible (2:19-23). When Haman was made chief minister, Mordecai aroused his wrath by refusing to bow before him. To avenge the slight, Haman procured from the king a decree to destroy the Jews (chap. 3). Mordecai then sent Esther to the king to seek protection for her people (chap. 4). Haman meanwhile prepared a high gallows on which he planned to hang Mordecai (chap. 5). By a singular, almost humorous turn of events, Haman fell from favor and was hanged on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai (chap. 7), Mordecai succeeded him as chief minister of the king (chap. 8). Thus the Persian officials everywhere assisted the Jews, who slew their enemies and instituted the feast of Purim to celebrate their deliverance (chap. 9). The book of Esther ends with an account of the fame and dignity of Mordecai (chap. 10). In the apocryphal additions to Esther, Mordecai is glorified still more. He is a favorite character in the Rabbinical literature as well. J.B.G.

MOREH, HILL OF (mō'rĕ, Heb. môreh, teacher), mentioned only in Judge 7:1. Near this hill the Midianites were camped when Gideon attacked them. Although it cannot certainly be identified, most scholars believe the Hill of Moreh to be present-day Jebel Nabi Dahi, sometimes called the Little Hermon, to the NW of the Plain of Jezreel, about eight miles NW of Mt. Gilboa and one mile S of Nain.

MOREH, OAK OF (KJV, "Plain of Moreh"), mentioned in Genesis 12:6 as a place near Shechem where Abraham camped and erected an altar to the Lord. It was probably the tree under which Jacob later buried the amulets and idols his family had brought from Haran (Gen. 35:4). In Deuteronomy 11:30 the Oak of Moreh is mentioned as a landmark near Ebal and Gerizim. Sacred oaks have been known in Palestine from early times. Probably believed to be the abode of ancestral spirits by the Canaanites, they were thought to have oracular powers, and may have been tended by priests, as are cedars of Lebanon today.

MORESHETH-GATH (mō'rĕsh-ĕth-găth, possession of Gath), a town mentioned only in Micah 1:14 in a group of places of the Judah-Philistine border area. Micah calls himself an inhabitant of Moresheth (1:1 RSV, cf. Jer. 26:18) — probably the same place. Gath may have been added to the name to indicate that this was the Moresheth which is near Gath. It may be identified with Tell ej-Judeideh, about five miles W. of Gath in the Shephelah.

MORIAH (mō-rī'à, Heb. mōrîyâh), a land or district where Abraham was told to offer up Isaac (Gen. 22:2). It was about a three days' journey from Beersheba where Abraham was living when given the command. Its location is not given. Jewish tradition has identified it with Jerusalem; Samaritan, with Mt. Gerizim. According to II Chronicles 3:1 Solomon built the temple on Mt. Moriah, where God had appeared to David (I Chron. 21:15-22:1). Whether this is the same Mt. Moriah mentioned in the account of Abraham is not certain.

MORNING SACRIFICE (See Offerings)

MORSEL, occurs once in the NT, where it means an "eating," i.e. one meal (Heb. 12:16).

MORTAL, MORTALITY, in the OT (only in Job 4:17) represents the Hebrew 'ĕnôsh (lit. "man"), translated "mortal man"; in the NT it is the translation of thnetós — subject to death (Rom. 8:11; I Cor. 15:53,54). Mortality occurs only in II Corinthians 5:4 and renders the same Greek word.

MORTAR. 1. A bowl-shaped vessel of stone or basalt rock in which grain, spices, etc., were crushed with the use of a pestle. The manna was so ground (Num. 11:8). Cf. Proverbs 27:22.

2. A substance (KJV mortar) used to bind bricks or stones together in a wall. Mud or clay was often used (Nah. 3:14); for better houses, a mortar of sand and lime. Some have thought that Ezekiel 13:10,11,14,15 refers to the latter, poorly mixed ("untempered" KJV). Recent scholars, however, believe the passage to refer to a whitewash (RSV) applied over a poorly made wall to disguise its weakness. In Babylon bitumen was used for mortar (Gen. 11:3 RSV). Many walls in Palestine were made by piling up large stones, using smaller stones, without mortar, to fill in the spaces between (cyclopean walls).

MOSAIC, a picture or design made by setting tiny squares or cones of varicolored marble, limestone or semiprecious stones in some medium such as bitumen or plaster to tell a story or to form a decoration. Mosaics are one of the most durable parts of ancient structures and often are the only surviving vestige. Mosaics have survived from ancient Sumer from as early as 2900 B.C. They were widely used in the early Christian and Byzantine buildings in Palestine, and remaining examples throw considerable light on ancient Biblical customs, as well as affording insight into early Christian beliefs and symbols.

Very famous is the fine mosaic picture-map of Jerusalem from the floor of a church in Madaba, probably from the sixth century AD. This is one of the earliest maps known from Palestine. The mosaics from the Arab palace at Khirbat al-Mafjar (near Jericho) are among the most beautiful known. Ancient Palestinian synagogues have yielded interesting designs and even pictorial art, as, e.g., the Beth Alpha synagogue, with its large circular representation of the zodiac, and the scene of Abraham sacrificing Isaac. J.B.G.

MOSERAH (mō-sē'rà, bond), in KJV Mosera, an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness near Bene-jaakan (Deut. 10:6 RSV). In Numbers 33:30 the plural form Moseroth is used as the name of the place. The site is unknown, but it was near Mt. Hor, by the border of Edom.

MOSES mō'zĕs, mō'zĭs, Heb. mōsheh, Egyp. mēs, drawn out, born), the national hero who delivered the Israelites from Egyptian slavery, established them as an independent nation, and prepared them for entrance into Canaan. Exact dates for the life of Moses are dependent upon the date of the Exodus. On the basis of an early date for the Exodus, c. 1440 B.C., Moses was born about 1520 B.C. (Merrill F. Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament, Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1954, pp. 140-152). Some scholars date the Exodus as late as 1225 B.C. (For a brief discussion and bibliography on various dates see Samuel J. Schultz, The Old Testament Speaks, New York: Harper, 1960, pp. 47-49).

Moses was born of Israelite parents in the land of Egypt. Perilous times prevailed. Not only were the Israelites enslaved, but a royal edict designed to keep them in subjection ordered the execution of all Israelite male children at birth. Hidden among the reeds near the river's bank, Moses was discovered by Pharaoh's daughter. So favorably was she disposed toward this Hebrew babe that she requested Moses' mother to nurse him until he was old enough to be taken to the royal court where he spent the first 40 years of his life.

Little is narrated in the Book of Exodus regarding the early period of the life of Moses. Stephen in his address to the Sanhedrin (Acts 7:22) asserts that Moses was not only instructed in the science and learning of the Egyptians but also was endowed with oratorical ability and distinctive leadership qualities. The court of Egypt provided educational facilities for royal heirs of tributary princes from city-states of the Syro-Palestinian territory subject to Egyptian pharaohs. Consequently Moses may have had classmates from as far N as the Euphrates River in his educational experiences in the Egyptian court.

Moses' first valiant attempt to aid his own people ended in failure. While trying to pacify two fellow Israelites he was reminded that he had killed an Egyptian. Fearing the vengeful hand of Pharaoh, Moses escaped to Midian where he spent a 40-year period in seclusion.

In the land of Midian Moses found favor in the home of a priest named Jethro (also known as Reuel in the Hebrew or Reguel in the Greek. In the course of time he married Jethro's daughter Zipporah. As shepherd of his father-in-law's flocks Moses gained a first-hand geographical knowledge of the territory surrounding the gulf of Aqaba. Little did he realize that through this area he would one day lead the great nation of Israel!

The call of Moses was indeed significant. Confronted with a bush afire he became conscious of a revelation of God, who commissioned him to deliver His people Israel from Egyptian bondage. Fully acquainted with Pharaoh's power, Moses was assured of divine support in contesting the authority of the ruler of Egypt. He furthermore anticipated the lack of confidence and the reluctance of the Israelites to accept him as a leader. To counter this God assured him that the great I AM was about to fulfill His promise made to the patriarchs to redeem Israel from bondage and settle them in the land of Canaan (Gen. 15:12-21). In addition two miraculous signs — Moses' staff which changed to a serpent and his hand which became leprous and later was healed — were provided as evidence for the verification of divine authority. Finally Moses was assured of Aaron's support in his divine commission to deliver the Israelites from the powerful clutch of the Pharaoh. Accompanied by his wife Zipporah and their two sons, Moses returned to the land of Egypt.

In a series of ten plagues Moses and Aaron countered Pharaoh's attempt to retain Israel in bondage. As a whole these plagues were directed against the gods of Egypt, demonstrating God's power to the Egyptians as well as to the Israelites. Pharaoh immediately expressed his attitude of resistance, retorting, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go." As Pharaoh continued to resist, his heart was hardened. Finally the last plague brought judgment on all the gods of Egypt, as the first-born sons were slain throughout the land. Then Pharaoh complied with Moses' demand and allowed the Israelites to depart (For discussion of Pharaoh's hardened heart see J. P. Free, Archaeology and Bible History (5th ed., rev.; Wheaton: Scripture Press, 1956, pp. 93-94).

On the eve of Israel's dramatic departure the Passover feast was initially observed (Exod. 12). Each family unit that followed the simple instructions of slaying a year-old male lamb or goat and applied the blood to the doorposts and lintel of their home was passed by in the execution of this divine judgment. In lieu of death the first-born son in every Israelite family belonged to God. Immediately after partaking of this Passover meal consisting of meat, unleavened bread, and bitter herbs, the Israelites left Egypt. The annual observance of the Passover on the 14th day of Abib (later known as Nisan) was to remind each Israelite of the miraculous deliverance under Moses.

The exact route by which Moses led the Israelites, who numbered some 600,000 men, plus women and children, is difficult to ascertain. Succoth, Etham, Pi-hahiroth, Migdol, and Baalzephon are place names with imprecise meanings whose geographical identifications are uncertain. When the Israelites reached the Red Sea (Sea of Reeds) they were threatened by the Egyptian armies from the rear. As they appealed to Moses, divine protection was provided in the pillar of cloud that barred the Egyptians from overtaking them. In due time a strong east wind parted the waters for Israel's passage. When the Egyptian forces attempted to follow they were engulfed in a watery grave. Miriam, Moses' sister, led the Israelites in a song of victory.

Under divine direction Moses led Israel southward through the wilderness of Shur. At Marah bitter waters were sweetened, at Elim the Israelites were refreshed by 12 springs of water and 70 palm trees, and in the wilderness of Sin daily manna was supplied, solving the food problem for this great multitude throughout their years of desert wanderings until they reached the land of Canaan. At Rephidim Moses was commanded to strike the rock, which brought forth a gushing water supply for his people. Confronted by an Amalekite attack Moses prevailed in intercessory prayer with the support of Aaron and Hur, while Joshua led the armies of Israel in a victorious battle. In his administrative duties Moses appointed 70 elders to serve under him in accordance with Jethro's advice. In less than three months' journey from Egypt the Israelites settled in the environs of Mount Sinai (Horeb) where they remained for approximately one year.

In this wilderness encampment Moses became the great law giver through whom Israel's religion was revealed. As a representative for his people Moses received the law from God. This law constituted God's covenant with His newly delivered nation. In turn the congregation ratified this covenant (Exod. 20-24), which included the ten commandments commonly known as the decalogue. To enable the Israelites to worship their God properly Moses was given detailed instructions for the building and erection of the tabernacle. These plans were carefully executed under Moses' supervision. At the same time the Aaronic family, supported by the Levites, was designated for their priestly service and carefully equipped for their ministration (Exod. 25-40). Details concerning various sacrifices, laws for holy living, and the observance of feasts and seasons were set forth through Moses as God's prescription for His people Israel (Lev. 1-27). In this manner the Israelites were distinctively set apart from the religious and cultural pattern of Egypt and Canaan (Samuel J. Schultz, op. cit., Chapter IV, "The Religion of Israel" pp. 56-74).

Moses also supervised the military census and organization of the Israelites during this encampment in the Sinaitic peninsula. The tabernacle with its court occupied the central position. Since the first-born of every Israelite family belonged to God by virtue of being spared during the last plague in Egypt, provision was now made for a Levite as a substitute. Consequently the Levites were placed immediately around the court, with Moses and the Aaronic family located at the east end before the entrance to the tabernacle. The other tribes were divided into four camps — each camp composed of three tribes — with the camp of Judah taking the place of leadership ahead of the priestly family.

Guidance and protection were provided for Moses and his people throughout this wilderness journey in the pillar of cloud and fire that was visible by day and night. Representing the presence of God with His people, this cloud first made its appearance in preventing the Egyptians from overtaking them (Exod. 13:21-22; 14:19-20). During Israel's encampment the cloud hovered over the tabernacle. Efficient human organization and responsible leadership provided the counterpart to the divine guidance conveyed by the cloud. Silver trumpets were used to assemble the leaders as well as to alert the people whenever divine indication was given en route. An efficient organization was in evidence whether Israel was encamped or journeying. Law and order prevailed throughout (Num. 1:1-10:10).

In an 11-day march northward from the Sinaitic peninsula to Kadesh, which was only about 40 miles SW of Beersheba, Moses not only encountered the murmurings of the multitude but was also severely criticized by Miriam and Aaron (Num. 11-12). The grumbling crowds who hankered for the fleshpots of Egypt were satiated to the point of intemperance when quails were supplied in excessive abundance. Aaron and Miriam were likewise humiliated when the latter was temporarily subjected to leprosy.

While at Kadesh, Moses sent out 12 representatives to spy out the land of Canaan. The majority report, given by ten spies, influenced the Israelites to demonstrate their unbelief. In open rebellion they threatened to stone Joshua and Caleb, the two spies who exercised faith and recommended that they should conquer and occupy the land promised to them. When God proposed to destroy the rebellious and unbelieving Israelites Moses magnanimously responded with intercession in behalf of his people. The final verdict involved all of the people who had been 20 years of age and older at the time of the exodus. They were doomed to die in the wilderness. Joshua and Caleb were the only exceptions.

Relatively little is recorded about Moses' leadership during the 38 years of wilderness wanderings (Num. 15-20). Not only was the political leadership of Moses challenged by Dathan and Abiram but Korah and his supporters contested the ecclesiastical position of Aaron and his family. In the course of these rebellions 14,000 people perished in divine judgment. Furthermore all Israel was given a miraculous sign when, among the 12 rods representing the tribes of Israel, Levi's rod produced buds, blossoms, and almonds. With Aaron's name inscribed on this rod the Aaronic priesthood was securely established.

The Israelites, denied permission to use the highway through the land of Edom, were led from Kadesh to the Plains of Moab by way of the Gulf of Aqaba. En route Moses himself forfeited entrance into the Promised Land when he struck the rock which he should have commanded to supply water for his people. When a scourge of serpents caused many murmuring Israelites to die, Moses erected a bronze serpent which offered healing to all who turned to it in obedience. This historical incident was used by Jesus in explaining His own death on the cross and the simple principle of salvation involved (John 3:14-16).

When Moses by-passed Moab and led the Israelites into the Arnon Valley, he was confronted by two Amorite rulers — Sihon, king of Heshbon, and Og, king of Bashan. Israel defeated both kings and as a result claimed the territory E of the Jordan River which was later allotted to Reuben, Gad, and half of the tribe of Manasseh. With this Amorite threat removed, the Israelites settled temporarily in the Plains of Moab, N of the Arnon River.

Balak, king of Moab, was so disturbed about Israel's encampment near his people that he chose subtle designs to bring about the ruination of God's covenant people (Num. 22-25). He enticed Balaam, a prophet from Mesopotamia, with rewards of riches and honor, to curse Israel. Balaam accepted Balak's invitation. While en route he was vividly reminded by his donkey that he was limited in his oracles to speak only God's message. Although the Moabite leaders prepared offerings to provide an atmosphere for cursing, Balaam was restricted to blessings for Israel each time he spoke. God did not allow His chosen people to be cursed. When Balaam was dismissed his parting advice to the Moabites and Midianites was to seduce the Israelites into immorality and idolatry. Incurring divine wrath by accepting invitations to these heathen festivities, thousands of Israelites died in a plague and many guilty leaders were executed. Furthermore Moses led his people in a punitive war against the Midianites. In this battle Balaam, the son of Beor, was killed (Num. 31:16).

Moses once more ordered a military census. This was supervised by Eleazer, Aaron's son who had served as high priest since his father's death. The total count of Israel's military manpower was actually somewhat lower than it had been when they left Egypt (Num. 26:1-65). Joshua was appointed and consecrated as the successor to Moses. Inheritance problems and additional instructions for regular offerings, festivals and vows were carefully delineated (Num. 27-30). Reluctantly Moses granted permission to the Reubenites, Gadites, and some of the Manasseh tribe to settle E of the Jordan, exacting from them the promise to aid the rest of the nation in the conquest of the land beyond the river (Num. 32). Moses, anticipating Israel's successful occupation of the land of Canaan, admonished them to destroy the idolatrous inhabitants. He appointed 12 tribal leaders to divide the land among the tribes and instructed them to provide 48 cities throughout Canaan for the Levites with adequate pasture area adjoining each city. Six of these Levitical cities were to be designated as cities of refuge where people might flee for safety in case of accidental bloodshed (Num. 34-35). Moses also provided solutions to inheritance problems when daughters inherited the family possessions (Num. 36).

The magnitude of Moses' character is clearly set forth in his farewell speeches to his beloved people. Even though he himself was denied participation in the conquest and occupation of the land, he coveted the best for the Israelites as they entered Canaan. His admonition to them is summed up in his addresses as given in the book of Deuteronomy. He reviewed the journey, beginning from Mount Horeb, where God had made a covenant with Israel. He pointed out especially the places where the Israelites had murmured, reminding them of their disobedience. Because of this attitude the generation that Moses had led out of Egypt was denied entrance into the land that God had promised them for a possession. With that as the background Moses warned them to be obedient. For their encouragement he pointed to the recent victories God had given them over the Amorites. This experience provided a reasonable basis for the hope of victory under the leadership of Joshua as they actually entered the land of Canaan (Deut. 1:1-4:43).

In his second speech (Deut. 4:44-28-68) Moses emphasized that love as well as obedience is essential for a wholesome relationship with God. The decalogue given at Mount Sinai was repeated. Whole-hearted love for God in daily life represented the basis for maintaining this covenant relationship in such a way that they could enjoy God's blessing. Consequently each generation was responsible for teaching the fear of the Lord their God to the next generation by precept and obedience. In this pattern of living they would be God's holy people in practice. Faithfully Moses delineated many of the laws already given, admonishing the people to be true to God, warning them against idolatry, advising them in the administration of justice, and adding various civil and religious regulations. He concluded this speech with a list of curses and blessings which were to be read publicly to the entire congregation after they crossed the Jordan. In this manner he set before the Israelites the way of life and death. Moses provided a written record of the law as a guide for Israel.

At the close of Moses' career, Joshua, who had already been designated as Israel's leader, was ordained as successor to Moses. In a song (Deut. 32) Moses expressed his praise to God, recounting how God had delivered Israel and provided for them through the wilderness journey. Then, with the pronouncement of a blessing upon each tribe, Moses departed for Mount Nebo, where he was privileged to view the Promised Land before he died. S.J.S.

MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF, an anonymous Jewish apocalyptic book, probably written early in the first century A.D. It is a prophecy of the future relating to Israel, put in the mouth of Moses and addressed to Joshua, patterned on the book of Deuteronomy. Many scholars, following Origen, believe that Jude's statement about Michael's contending with the devil for the body of Moses (Judge 9) is taken from the Assumption of Moses.

MOSES, LAW OF (See Law)

MOST HIGH, a name applied to God. It represents the Hebrew word 'ēl-'elyôn (Gen. 14:18,19,20,22; Ps. 7:17) which is translated "God Most High." The expression comes into the Greek of the NT as a part of the Semitic background inherited from the OT (Mark 5:7; Acts 7:48).

MOTE, a particle of dust or chaff, or a splinter of wood that might enter the eye. Used by Jesus (Matt. 7:3-5; Luke 6:41,42) in contrast with "beam" (KJV) or "log" (RSV) to rebuke officiousness in correcting small faults in others, while cherishing greater ones of our own.

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN. Hill, mount and mountain are terms roughly synonymous in the English Bible. Much of Palestine is hilly or mountainous. These elevations are not dramatically high, but are old worn-down hills. A central hill country stretches from N to S in Palestine, attaining its greatest elevations in Galilee (nearly 4000 feet above sea level) and finally ending in the Negev in the S. Much of Transjordan is high plateau land, although in Syria N of Palestine this section reaches great height in Mt. Hermon (c. 9100 feet above sea level), which is snow covered throughout the year.

Many ancient peoples considered mountains as holy places. Mt. Sinai (Deut. 33:2; Judg. 5:4,5) and Mt. Zion (Ps. 68:16) were specially revered by the Hebrews as the places of God's revelation and abode. Mountains in Scripture are symbolic of eternity (Gen. 49:26) and of strength and stability, but God is more strong and stable than they (Ps. 97:5; 121:1,2 RSV; Isa. 40:12). They also portray the difficult obstacles of life, but God will overcome these mountains for His people (Isa. 49:11; Matt. 21:21).

"Mount" in several places in the KJV refers to the earthen mounds raised against the wall of a besieged city by an attacking army (Jer. 6:6; Ezek. 26:8). J.B.G.

MOUNT OF BEATITUDES, the site of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5-7; Luke 6:20-49) which contains the beatitudes is not identified in the Gospels. Tradition has identified it with Karn Hattin, near Capernaum, but with very little basis in fact. Like many of the sites of Jesus' ministry, its exact location is unknown.

MOURN, MOURNING. The ancient Hebrews placed a much greater emphasis on external symbolic acts than do modern Western people, although people in the East today still carry on this respect for symbolic actions. Ceremonies for expressing grief at the death of a relative or upon any unhappy occasion are referred to frequently in the Bible. One reared in the modern Occident must be cautioned not to view these public expressions as hypocritical; they were a natural valid manifestation of grief in that culture.

The OT contains warnings against pagan mourning rites (Deut. 14:1,2; Lev. 19:27,28). Israelite priests were not allowed to take part in any mourning or other funeral ceremonies (Lev. 21:1-4,10, 11).

Upon receipt of bad news or in the presence of sudden calamity it was customary to rend the clothes (II Sam. 1:2) and to sprinkle earth or ashes upon the head (Josh. 7:6). Hair cloth ("sackcloth") was adopted as clothing (Isa. 22:12). We read of the covering of the head in mourning (Jer. 14:3), and also of the lips (Ezek. 24:17,22). Among those who habitually wore some covering on the head it was a sign of mourning to let the hair go loose (Lev. 10:6), which normally (like that of a Greek Orthodox priest in the Near East) would be coiled up.

A death in the household set in motion an elaborate ceremony of mourning which lasted a week or more. The members of the family and their friends gathered around the corpse and indulged in lamentations bordering on hysteria. The rites mentioned above were observed, but in a more abandoned form than for other mourning. William M. Thomson saw a ceremony of mourning carried out by the Arabs of Palestine a century ago. He described the three concentric circles of mourners, slowly marching, clapping their hands and chanting a funeral dirge. At times they stopped, and flinging their arms and handkerchiefs about in a wild frenzy, screamed and wailed like maniacs.

Professional mourners were often called in for a funeral (Jer. 9:17-22; Amos 5:16; Matt. 9:23). These were probably in earliest times to protect the living from the spirits of the departed, who were greatly feared. By Bible times, however, the mourning women were used merely as another manifestation of grief for the departed.

Jeremiah, the weeping prophet, made many references to mourning. He taught the mourning women their dirge (9:17-22), heard the land lament because of the destruction by the Babylonians (9:10; 12:4,11; 14:2; 23:10), mentioned Rachel's mourning (31:15,16). He urged Israel to mourn for its sins (4:8; 6:26; 7:29), and secretly mourned for the nation himself (9:1; 13:17). J.B.G.

MOUSE (See Animals)

MOUTH. The principal Hebrew words for mouth are peh, translated "mouth," but also "language," "corner," "edge," "skirt," and any opening, such as of a well (Gen. 29:2), of a sack (Gen. 42:27), of a cave (Josh. 10:22), or of a grave (Ps. 141:7); and hēkh, translated "mouth" and "roof of the mouth" (i.e., palate, Job 29:10). In the NT stóma is translated "mouth" except in the idiomatic "face to face" (lit. "mouth to mouth," II John 12; III John 14) and "edge (lit. mouth) of the sword" (Luke 21:24; Heb. 11:34).

The way in which the Bible constantly uses the organ of speech in the sense of "language" is a good example of the employment of the concrete for the abstract. Silence is the laying of the hand upon the mouth (Job 40:4), freedom of speech is the enlarged mouth (Eph. 6:19). So to receive a message is to have words put into the mouth (Jer. 1:9). Humiliation is the mouth laid in the dust (Lam. 3:29).

Finally, the mouth is personified; it is an independent agent. It brings freewill offerings (Ps. 119: 108), God sets a watch before it (Ps. 141:3); it selects food (Prov. 15:14), uses a rod (Prov. 14: 3), and has a sword (Rev. 19:15). This personification helped to contribute to the Jewish idea of the Angel of the Lord, the voice of the Lord, and prepared the way for the "word made flesh" (John 1:14). J.B.G.

MOWING of the ripe grain was done in early Bible times with a short sickle made of pieces of sharp flint set in wood or even bone. As the Hebrews became more technologically advanced, sickles were made of metal — bronze, and then iron. The farmer grasped the grain with his left hand and lopped off the stalks fairly high up. They were then bound into sheaves and taken to the threshing floor. The king's mowings (Amos 7:1) were the portion of the spring harvest taken by the king as taxes. Only after the king's agents had taken the tax-grain could the owner mow the rest of his field. See AGRICULTURE.

MOZA (mō'zȧ, Heb. môtsâh, sunrise). 1. A man of Judah, of the family of Hezron, the house of Caleb (I Chron. 2:46).

2. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:36, 37).

MOZAH (mō'zȧ, Heb. môtsâh), a town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:26). Its site is not certain; Qaloniyeh, about four and two-thirds miles NW of Jerusalem on the road to Jaffa, has been suggested.

MUPPIM (mŭp'ĭm, Heb. muppîm), a son or descendant of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21). He is also called Shupham (Num. 26:39) and Shuppim (I Chron. 7:12,15). Possibly the Shephuphan of I Chronicles 8:5 is the same person.

MURDER. From the days of Noah the Biblical penalty for murder was death: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. 9:6). Throughout OT times, the ancient Semitic custom of the avenger of blood was followed: a murdered man's nearest relative (the goel) had the duty to pursue the slayer and kill him (Num. 35: 19). Since in the practice of avenging blood in this fashion men failed to distinguish between murder and manslaughter, and thus vicious blood feuds would frequently arise, the Mosaic law provided for cities of refuge (Num. 35). To these cities a man pursued by the avenger of blood could flee. He would be admitted and tried; if judged guilty of murder he would be turned over to the avenger; if judged innocent, he was afforded protection in this city from the avenger. It appears likely that the advent of the monarchy began a trend away from the ancient goel custom, for we find the king putting a murderer to death (I Kings 2:34) and also pardoning one (II Sam. 14:6-8).

In a murder trial, the agreeing testimony of at least two persons was necessary for conviction (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6). An animal known to be vicious had to be confined, and if it caused the death of anyone, the animal was destroyed and the owner held guilty of murder (Exod. 21:29,31).

The right as asylum in a holy place was not granted a murderer; he was dragged away even from the horns of the altar (Exod. 21:14; I Kings 2:28-34). No ransom could be accepted for a murderer (Num. 35:21). When a murder had been committed and the slayer could not be found, the people of the community nearest the place where the corpse was found were reckoned guilty. To clear them of guilt, the elders of this place would kill a heifer, wash their hands over it, state their innocency, and thus be judged clean (Deut. 21:1-9). J.B.G.

MUSHI, MUSHITES (mū'shī, mū'shīts), a Levite, son of Merari, and the founder of a tribal family or "house," called the Mushites (Exod. 6:19; Num. 3:20; 26:58; I Chron. 6:19,47; 23:21,23; 24:26, 30).

MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS OF THE BIBLE.

The Lyre (Heb. kinnor). Jewish historians ascribe the first use of musical instruments to the seventh generation after the creation of the world. Genesis 4:21 states that Jubal, son of Adah and Lamech, offspring of Methusael, son of Mehujael, son of Irad, son of Enoch, son of Cain, Adam and Eve's firstborn "was the father of all such as handle the harp (kinnor) and organ (ugab)." The kinnor was the famous instrument on which, later on, King David excelled, and which has erroneously been called "King David's harp." The kinnor was a stringed instrument, but it had no resonant body like the harp. It was a lyre, and whether its original form was square or triangular is not known due to the ancient commandment to refrain from the creation of images. No representation of musical instruments and no original Biblical melodies have come down to us. The kinnor was made of wood — David made it of berosh, but in I Kings 10:12 it is recorded that Solomon made some of almug for use in the temple. According to Flavius Josephus, the Jewish historian, the kinnor had ten strings which were plucked with a plectrum, and they were probably tuned pentatonically, without semitones, through two octaves.

The kinnor was used on joyous occasions; for instance, it is stated in Genesis 31:26-27: "And Laban said to Jacob, What hast thou done, that thou hast stolen away unawares to me, and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the sword? Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me; and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth, and with songs, with tabret, and with harp (kinnor)?" The Jews refused to play the kinnor during the Babylonian Exile. They suspended their kinnorim on the willows; how could they "sing the Lord's song in a strange land?" (Ps. 137:4). The kinnor was gay, and when the prophets of old admonished the people, they threatened that the kinnor, the symbol of joy and happiness, would be silenced unless the people repented from their sins. The kinnor was one of the temple orchestra instruments and its tone is described as sweet, tender, soft, and lyrical. I Chronicles 25:3 states that Jeduthun and his sons prophesied with a kinnor; and I Samuel 16:23 says about David and Saul: "And it came to pass . . . that David took a kinnor, and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him." The kinnor was also a popular instrument among the more cultured classes in Israel.

The Pipe (Heb. ugab). The organ was the other instrument mentioned in Genesis 4:21. This instrument is not mentioned in the list of the musical instruments used in the temple and was not an organ, but rather a shepherd's pipe or flute. The only reference to ugab is in Job 21:12; 30:31 and in Psalm 150:4.

The Tambourine (Heb. tof). The two instruments mentioned in Genesis 31:27, to which reference was made earlier, were the tabret (tupîm) and the harp (kinnor). The form tupîm is the plural form of the Hebrew word tof. The tof was a small drum made of a wooden hoop and probably two skins, without any jingling contrivance like the modern tambourine. It was a rhythm-indicator, and used for dances and joyous occasions as well as religious celebrations. II Samuel 6:5 states that David employed the tof at the installation of the ark in Jerusalem. The tof is not listed among the musical instruments either of the First or Second Temple, despite its being mentioned three times in the Psalms: 81:2; 149:3; 150:4. The tof was played primarily by women: "And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel (tof) in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances" (Exod. 15:20); Jephthah's unfortunate daughter "came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances" (Judg. 11:34); and the women of Israel coming to greet King Saul after David had slain Goliath, came "singing and dancing . . . with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of musick" (I Sam. 18:6).

The Bell (Heb. pa'amon). In Exodus 28:33-35, where Jehovah prescribes the high priest's garments, he states: "And beneath upon the hem of it thou shalt make pomegranates of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, round about the hem thereof; and bells of gold between them round about: A golden bell and a pomegranate, a golden bell and a pomegranate, upon the hem of the robe round about. And it shall be upon Aaron to minister: and his sound shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not." The little bells (pa'amonim) were either small bells or jingles. This custom typifies the ringing of the bell during the Roman Mass to call the attention of the worshipers to the sacred function in the sanctuary. Bells and jingles upon the hem of garments were found not only in Israel, but are used by many primitive tribes in worship.

The Shofar or keren (horn) is the only temple instrument still being used today in the synagogue. Originally, the shofar was a ram's horn without mouthpiece. It was used chiefly as a signal instrument in religious as well as in secular ceremonies. One single incident stands out in conjunction with the blowing of the shofar. This is recorded in Joshua 6:20: "So the people shouted when the priests blew with the trumpets (shofar): and it came to pass, when the people heard the sound of the trumpet, and the people shouted with a great shout, that the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city." Judge frightened his enemies, the Midianites, by the sound of the Lord's horn blown by 300 of his men (Judg. 7:16-22). The blowing of the shofar was even attributed to Jehovah Himself, in order to frighten His enemies and to gather the scattered remnant of Israel to His sanctuary. Thus, Zechariah says: "And the Lord God shall blow the trumpet (shofar). . . . The Lord of hosts shall defend them" (Zech. 9:14,15).

During the latter part of the period of the Second Temple, two types of shofaroth were in use: the curved (male) ram's horn and the straight (female) mountain goat's horn. The Talmudian tractate Rosh-hoshana 3:2-6 gives a detailed description of the shofar: "All shofars are valid save that of a cow. The shofar blown in the temple at the New Year was made from the horn of the mountain goat, straight, with its mouthpiece overlaid with gold. At the sides of them that blew the shofar were two priests that blew upon the silver trumpets. The shofar blew a long note and the trumpets a short note, since the duty of the day fell on the shofar. The shofar blown on New Year's Day was to remind God of his promise to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and especially of Isaac's sacrifice and of the ram that substituted him (Gen. 22:13).

"The shofars blown on days of fasting were ram's horns, curved, with mouthpieces overlaid with silver. Between them were two priests who blew upon silver trumpets. The shofar blew a short note and the trumpets a long note, since the duty of the day fell on the trumpets. The Year of Jubilee is like to the New Year in the blowing of the shofar. Today, the sound of the shofar is to stir the hearts of the Jewish people to awe and reverence and to remind them of their duties to God. As a matter of fact, the Shofar Song is a simple but beautiful call to worship."

The Trumpet (Heb. chatzotzera or hasora). "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Make thee two trumpets of silver; of a whole piece shalt thou make them: that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps. . . . And if ye go to war in your land against the enemy that oppresseth you, then ye shall blow an alarm with the trumpets; and ye shall be remembered before the Lord your God, and ye shall be saved from your enemies. Also in the day of your gladness, and in your solemn days, and in the beginnings of your months, ye shall blow with the trumpets, over your burnt-offerings, and over the sacrifices of your peace-offerings; that they may be to you for a memorial before your God: I am the Lord your God" (Num. 10:1, 2, 9, 10).

Both the trumpets and the shofar were blown by priests and not Levites who were, so to speak, the professional musicians of the temple, and both these instruments served the same function of signaling.

Flavius Josephus has described the trumpet as a straight tube, "a little less than a cubit long," its mouthpiece wide and its body expanding into a bell-like ending. The form of the trumpet is still preserved on the Jewish coins of the latter part of the period of the Second Temple. And when, in 70 A.D., the Romans erected an arch for Emperor Titus after his conquest of Jerusalem, they depicted on it his triumphant return to Rome with the holy objects robbed from the temple, and among them a trumpet, which corresponds exactly to the description of Josephus.

Two of these silver trumpets were the minimum requirement for the temple service, and the maximum, 120. II Chronicles 5:12 states: "Also the Levites which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals and psalteries and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets."

The Harp (Heb. nevel). In I Samuel 10:5, Samuel the prophet tells the newly anointed King Saul that he would meet "a company of prophets coming down from the high place with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp (nevel), before them; and they shall prophesy." This is the first time the nevel is mentioned in the Bible. This large harp, like the lyre, was made of berosh and almug wood, but the harp had a resonant body. According to Josephus, the harp was played with the fingers and had 12 strings, in contrast to ten strings of the lyre, which was played with a plectrum.

These two instruments were the most important ones in the temple orchestra, and without which no public religious ceremony could be held. The harp seems to have been a vertical, angular harp, larger in size, louder, and lower in pitch than the lyre. The harp is mentioned frequently in the Book of Psalms: 33:2; 57:8; 71:22; 81:2; 92:3; 108:2; 144:9; 150:3.

The harp was often used at secular festivities. Isaiah the prophet complains "And the harp, and the viol (nevel), the tabret, and pipe, and wine, are in their feasts: but they regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operation of his hands" (Isaiah 5:12). Amos the prophet writes: "Take thou away from me the noise of thy songs; for I will not hear the melody of thy viols (nevels)" (Amos 5:23). And in Amos 6:4-6, he prophesies woe to them that "lie on beds of ivory . . . and eat the lambs out of the flock . . . that chant to the sound of the viol (nevel) . . . that drink wine in bowls."

The Psaltery (Heb. asor). The harp (nevel) is often associated with the word psaltery (asor from assara, the Hebrew word for ten). The psaltery (asor) is mentioned twice in the Psalms in connection with the harp (nevel): Psalm 33:2 and 144:9; and with both harp (nevel) and lyre (kinnor), in Psalm 92:3.

It is generally accepted that this was a ten-stringed, rectangular zither. To the early Church Fathers this psaltery was symbolical: the ten strings, the Ten Commandments; and the four sides, the Gospels.

The Oboe (Heb. halil or abub). It is stated in I Kings 1:40, that after Zadok the priest had anointed Solomon "all the people came up after him, and the people piped with pipes (halil), and rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them." The pipe (halil) was a double reed instrument and is the Biblical equivalent of the modern oboe. It was probably a double pipe instrument, which pipes could be blown individually as well as simultaneously. There is no mention of this instrument as having been used in the services of the First Temple. In the Second Temple, two to 12 oboes (halilim) were used on 12 days of the year — at the first and second Passover sacrifice, on the first day of Passover, at the Feast of the Weeks, and in the eight days of the Feast of the Tabernacles. The oboes were played at joyous festivities as well as mourning ceremonies. When Christ entered Jairus' home to restore life to his dead daughter, he found the funeral oboes in action. In Israel, even the poorest men hired at least two oboes for the funeral of their wives.

The Sistra or Rattle (Heb. mnaamin). II Samuel 6:5 states, "And David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir wood, even on harps, and on psalteries, and on timbrels, and on cornets (mnaamin), and on cymbals." In the KJV, this Hebrew word, "mnaamin," is translated cornets, which is incorrect. This actually refers to something which is to be shaken, probably the sistra, a rattle of Sumerian origin, which consists of a handle and a frame with jingling crossbars.

The Cymbals (Heb. seslim and msiltayim). The only permanent percussive instrument in the temple orchestra was the cymbal. In the Holy Scriptures, the use of cymbals is solely confined to religious ceremonies — the bringing back of the Ark from Kirjath-jearim (I Chron. 15:16, 19, 28); at the dedication of Solomon's Temple (II Chron. 5:13); at the restoration of worship by Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:25); at the laying of the foundation of the Second Temple (Ezra 3:10); and the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:27).

In Psalm 150, two types of cymbals are pointed out: "Praise him upon the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high sounding cymbals." The "loud cymbals" were of a larger diameter than the "high (pitch) sounding," and were two-handed cymbals. The high sounding cymbals were much smaller and played by one hand — the cymbals being attached to the thumb and the middle finger respectively.

In the time of David and Solomon, much stress was laid upon the cymbal and percussive instruments. The chief singer of David, Asaph, was a cymbal player (I Chron. 16:5). However, in the last century of the Second Temple the percussive instruments were restricted to one cymbal, which was used to mark pauses only, but not to participate while the singing and the playing were going on.

Although these temple instruments were definitely rhythmical in character, it is interesting to note that the rhythm of the melody was largely dependent on the innate rhythm of the words sung, for the content and the spirit of the words dominated the music. The singing and the playing of the instruments was not to perform or entertain or to elevate a lover of refined art, but rather to serve as a highly exalted form of speech. Rhythm proved important only in non-religious music, and the Jews also made a distinction between what they called spiritual music of the highly educated and the popular music of the masses.

The Organ (Heb. magrepha). The organ (magrepha) was perhaps a primitive pneumatic (wind) organ and an advanced form of the ancient "ugab" mentioned in Genesis 4:21, which has for centuries been wrongly translated "organ." The organ was constructed of a skin-covered box with ten holes and each of them able to produce "ten kinds of songs," so that the whole organ was able to produce 100 "kinds of songs." It was used solely as a signal instrument to call the priests and the Levites to their duties. Its tone was very strong, the Mishna tells us, perhaps a little exaggerated, that whenever the organ (magrepha) was played in the temple its sounds carried as far as Jericho.

Shalishim. I Samuel 18:6 states: "And it came to pass as they came, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Philistines, that the women came out of all cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet King Saul, with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music." This "instruments of music" has been the most disputed musical term of the Hebrew language. The Hebrew word "shalishim" is clearly connected with the Hebrew word that means "three," and many translators of the Bible have translated it as triangles, triangular harps, three-stringed lutes, and even three-stringed fiddles and a kind of pipe. Today, the word shalishim is generally regarded as referring to some dance form.

The Dance (machol) was considered an integral part of religious ceremonies in ancient Israel. This Hebrew word "machol" is found in the Holy Scriptures associated with the word tof or timbrel: "And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances." (Exod. 15:20); and again, "Jephthah came to Mizpeh unto his house, and, behold, his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances. . . ." (Judg. 11:34). "David danced before the Lord with all his might. . . ." (II Sam. 6:14). Religious dancing fell into disuse in the Jerusalem Temple and it is mentioned only twice in the Psalms (149:3; 150:4). On the Feast of Tabernacles, at the celebration of "Water libation," prominent men would dance, displaying their artistic skill in throwing and catching burning torches. The custom, however, of procession around the sanctuary, or around the altar, on the Feast of Tabernacles was retained in the temple, accompanied with singing.

Finally, a word about the orchestral instruments of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, as described by Daniel: "That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king hath set up" (Dan. 3:5). The Hebrew words for the above mentioned instruments would be: the keren (horn or trumpet), the mashrokitha (a pipe or a whistle), the kathrus (a lyre), the sabka (a kind of harp), the psanterin (a psaltery, a stringed instrument that was used to accompany the Psalms), the sumphonia, which means a combination of sounds, or just orchestra. "If we accept the Aramaic text of the Book of Daniel," says Curt Sachs, "the king's subjects heard the various instruments first singly and then all together, a performing custom of the orchestras of the East. The addition, 'all kinds of music,' may refer to drums and other percussion instruments. The people were thus instructed to wait for the horn signal, followed by solos of pipe, lyre, harp, and psaltery, after which the 'all kinds of music' (percussion instruments) would join the solo instruments in a sumphonia of sounds, which was the signal for them to fall down and worship the golden image."

The real meaning of the headings of the Psalms is still veiled in darkness. Whether they indicate the names of the instruments employed in accompanying the Psalms, or whether they refer to the tune to which they were sung, is still a problem for the musicologist. Curt Sachs made a comparison of moods of Psalms that have similar headings and found that the six neginoth Psalms (4, 54, 55, 61, 67, 76) are all prayers for escape, and that the three gittith Psalms (8, 81, 84) are joyful in character, and that the three Jeduthun Psalms (39, 62, 77) express a mood of resignation.

The word selah, which is found so frequently in the Psalms, is another word that has not been satisfactorily explained. Whether it means an interlude, a pause or cadence, is not known. Many scholars believe it indicates a musical interlude by the temple orchestra.

The history of Hebrew music, as well as the history of Israel's higher civilization in general and the organization of the musical service in the temple, began with King David's reign. To King David has been ascribed not only the creation and singing of the Psalms, but also the invention of musical instruments. II Chronicles 7:6 mentions "instruments of music of the Lord, which David the king had made to praise the Lord"; and according to I Chronicles 23:5, David himself said to the princes of Israel, to the priests and Levites, "four thousand praised the Lord with the instruments which I made to praise therewith."

King David chose the Levites to supply musicians for the Holy Temple. Out of the 30,000 who were employed at this time, the impressive number of 4,000 was selected for the musical service. I Chronicles 15:16 states: "And David spake to the chief of the Levites to appoint their brethren to be the singers with instruments of music, psalteries and harps and cymbals, sounding, by lifting up the voice with joy."

Years later, when King Solomon had finished all work for the temple and brought in all the things David his father had dedicated, the priest and the congregation of Israel assembled before the ark, and the musical service was begun by the Levites. I Chronicles 25:6-7 relates that the number of them with their brethren that were instructed in the songs of the Lord, "even all that were cunning," was two hundred fourscore and eight, and they were divided into 24 classes "under the hands of their fathers." On the day of the dedication of the temple, "the Levites which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals and psalteries and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets: It came even to pass, as the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord; and when they lifted up their voice with the trumpets and cymbals and instruments of music, and praised the Lord, saying, For he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever: that then the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord; so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God" (II Chron. 5:12-14). When the king and the people had offered their sacrifices, the Levites began to play, "and the priests sounded trumpets before them, and all Israel stood" (II Chron. 7:6).

In Solomon's Temple, the choir formed a distinct body. They were furnished homes and were on salary. Ezekiel says they had chambers between the walls and windows with southern views (Ezek. 40:44). The choir numbered 2,000 singers and was divided into two choirs. The Psalms, according to the Mishna, were sung antiphonally. The first examples in the Bible of antiphonal or responsorial singing are the songs of Moses and Miriam after the passage through the Red Sea (Exod. 15).

There were three forms after which the psalms and the prayers were rendered in the temple. First, the leader intoned the first half verse, whereupon the congregation repeated it. Then the leader sang each succeeding halfline, the congregation always repeating the same first halfline, which thus became a refrain throughout the entire psalm. Second, the leader sang a halfline at a time, and the congregation repeated what he had last sung. The third form was responsive in the real sense of the word — the leader would sing the whole first line, whereupon the congregation would respond with the second line of the verse. In ancient times, the people, in that they were primitive, would respond with but one word as refrain to laudations and supplications. Refrains such as Amen, Halleluyah, Hoshiannah (Oh, help!), Anenu (Answer us!), were mostly used in public worship. In later times we find a higher musical development of the people, as shown in their response with phrases as in Psalm 118:1-3 and Psalm 136.

The orchestra and the choir personnel were greatly reduced in the Second Temple. The orchestra consisted of a minimum of two harps and a maximum of six; minimum of nine lyres, maximum limitless; minimum of two oboes and a maximum of 12; and one cymbal. The Second Temple choir consisted of a minimum of 12 adult singers, maximum limitless. The singers, all male, were between 30 and 50 years of age. Five years of musical training was prerequisite to membership in the Second Temple choir. In addition to the male adults, sons of the Levites were permitted to participate in the choir "in order to add sweetness to the song."

The musical service in the temple at the time of Christ was essentially the same as that in King Solomon's Temple, with the exception of a few minor changes in certain forms of singing. There were two daily services in the temple — the morning and evening sacrifices. The morning sacrifice began with burning of incense on the golden altar within the Holy Place. The offering of incense took place before daybreak, and the priest upon whom the lot had fallen for the most honorable service in the daily ministry was alone in the Holy Place while burning the incense, and the congregation was praying without the gates of the temple at the time of incense offering. After this act followed the morning sacrifice. The president would direct one of the priests to ascend some pinnacle to see if it were time to kill the daily sacrifice. If the priest reported, "The morning shineth already," he was asked again, "Is the sky lit up as far as Hebron." If so, the president would order the lamb, which had been kept in readiness for four days, brought in. The elders who carried the keys now gave the order to open the gates of the temple. As the last great gate was opened a signal was given to the priests to blow three blasts on their silver trumpets, calling the Levites and the representatives of the people to their duties, and announcing to the city that the morning sacrifice was about to be offered. Immediately after this were the gates to the Holy Place opened to admit the priests who were to cleanse the candlesticks and the altar of incense. The opening of these great gates was actually the signal for slaying of the lamb without blemish. Following a prayer, the Ten Commandments were recited, which were followed by the Jewish Creed "Shema": "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord" (Deut. 6:4-9).

After the priestly benediction, which is taken from Numbers 6:24-26, the meal-offering was brought, and oil added to it. Having been previously salted, it was laid on the fire. Now the high priest's daily meal-offering was presented, which consisted of 12 cakes broken in halves. Twelve half-broken cakes were presented for the morning sacrifice and the other 12 for the evening sacrifice. Finally came the drink offering, which consisted of wine poured at the foot of the altar.

With the sacrificial acts over, the magrepha (organ) was sounded, which was the signal for the priests to prostrate themselves, but to the Levites it marked the beginning of the musical service. Two priests would now take their stand at the right and left of the altar and blow their silver trumpets. After this, these two priests would approach the cymbal player and take their stand beside him, one on the right and one on the left. When given a sign with a flag by the president, this Levite sounded his cymbal, and this was the sign for the Levites to begin singing a part of the daily psalm, accompanied by instrumental music. Whenever they stopped singing the priests would again blow their trumpets and the people would prostrate themselves. Not only psalms were sung but also parts of the Pentateuch. The Psalm of the day was sung in three sections and at the close of each the priests would blow three fanfares on their silver trumpets, a signal for the congregation to bow down and to worship the Lord.

The order of the Psalms in the daily service of the temple was as follows: On the first day of the week, Psalm 24: "The earth is the Lord's" in commemoration of the first day of creation. On the second day they sang Psalm 48: "Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised." On the third day, Psalm 82: "God standeth in the congregation of the mighty." On the fourth day, Psalm 94: "O Lord God, to whom vengeance belongeth." On the fifth day, Psalm 81: "Sing aloud unto God our strength." On the sixth day, Psalm 93: "The Lord reigneth." On the seventh day they sang Psalm 92: "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord."

With the singing of the daily Psalm, the morning sacrifice came to a close. The evening sacrifice was identical with the morning sacrifice, with the exception that the incense offering took place after the evening sacrifice, at sunset. Thus they began and ended the day with prayer and praise, of which the burning of incense was symbolical.

MUSTARD (See Plants)

MUTHLABBEN (mŭth'lăb'ĕn), an expression of doubtful meaning, occurring only in the title of Psalm 9. Probably it is the name of the tune to which the psalm was sung, just as in Christian hymnals tunes are named, e.g., "Old Hundredth."

MUZZLE. The Mosaic law forbade the muzzling of oxen when they were treading out the grain, i.e., threshing (Deut. 25:4). This was a simple, humane command, in accordance with the kindly spirit of much of the law. St. Paul makes a curious use of the injunction in I Corinthians 9:9 and I Timothy 5:18 where he quotes the command in support of his thesis: "The laborer deserves his wages" (RSV).

MYRA (mī'rà, Gr. Mýra), now Dembre, one of the southernmost ports of Asia Minor, and once the chief haven of Lycia. Hither Paul came on the "ship of Adramyttium" (Acts 27:5), the seaport on the Aegean opposite Lesbos, and the likeliest vessel to put the party into the westward flowing stream of traffic from Asia. There was an Alexandrian cornship in port to which they transferred. The vessel had chosen this northerly coasting route because of the lateness of the season. Some are, however, of the opinion that the Lycian coast was the regular shipping route from Egypt (e.g. W. M. Ramsay, Saint Paul the Traveler and Roman Citizen, p. 319).

MYSIA (mĭsh'ĭ-ȧ, Gr. Mysía), a district occupying the NW end of Asia Minor bounded (proceeding clockwise from the west) by the Aegean, the Hellespont (i.e. the Dardanelles), the Propontis (i.e. the Sea of Marmora), Bithynia, Phrygia, and Lydia. There were five areas: 1. Mysia Minor along the northern coast. 2. Mysia Major, the southeastern hinterland, with Pergamum as its chief city. 3. Troas, a geographical unit in the northwestern angle between Mt. Ida and the sea, the name deriving from the legend that it was under the rule of Troy, whose stronghold was a few miles inland at the entrance to the strait. It was a strategic area, a fact which no doubt accounted for the Achaean assault on Troy. It was also the scene of Alexander's first clash with the Persians (on the Granicus river). 4. Aeolis or Aeolia. This was the southern part of the western coast, a linguistic and ethnological, rather than a geographical unit. Near the end of the second millennium before Christ, Aeolian Greeks from Boeotia and Thessaly had migrated to this area by way of Lesbos and Tenedos. (The Troas was not occupied by Greeks until much later). Until the Persian conquest the political organization of this Hellenized district was a league of small city-states. 5. Teuthrania was the southwest angle between Temnus and the Lydian frontier. The aboriginal or early inhabitants of Mysia, the Mysi, had Tracian affinities and were probably, like the Trojans and the Hittites, an early wave of Indo-European invaders. The Hellespont made no fundamental racial division in early times.

From 280 B.C. Mysia formed part of the kingdom of Pergamum and fell to the Romans in 133 B.C. by the will and testament of Attalus III. It thereafter formed part of the province of Asia. The area was traversed by Paul on his second missionary journey (Acts 16:7,8), but no work was done. There is, however, evidence of very early church foundations. E.M.B.

MYSTERY (Gr. mustérion). The word mystérion occurs 28 times in the NT (including I Cor. 2:1 where it is present in the better MSS). Neither the word nor the idea is found in the OT. Rather, they came into the NT world from Greek paganism. Among the Greeks mystery meant not something obscure or incomprehensible, but a secret imparted only to the initiated, what is unknown until it is revealed. This word is connected with the mystery religions of Hellenistic times. These religions, very popular in the world of the first Christian century, consisted of secret rites and celebrations, which were only known to or practiced by those who had been initiated. There were many of them, the most famous being that of Eleusis, near Athens, associated with the worship of Demeter and her daughter Persephone. Other famous mysteries originated in Egypt. The mysteries appealed to the emotions rather than the intellect and offered to their devotees a mystical union with the deity, through death to life, thus securing for them a blessed immortality. Great symbolism characterized their secret ritual, climaxing in the initiation into the full secret of the cult.

Although occurring once in each of the synoptic Gospels and four times in Revelation, the chief use of mystery in the NT is by Paul. He, as an educated man of his day knew well the thought world of the pagans and accepted this term to indicate the fact that "his gospel" had been revealed to him by the risen Christ. This fact could best be made clear to his contemporaries by adopting the pagan term they all understood, pouring into it a special Christian meaning.

In a few passages, the term refers to a symbol, allegory or parable, which conceals its meaning from those who look only at the literal sense, but is the medium of revelation to those who have the key to its interpretation. So Revelation 1:20; 17:5,7; Mark 4:11; and Ephesians 5:32 where marriage is a mystery or symbol of Christ and the Church.

The more common meaning of mystery in the NT, Paul's usual use of the word, is that of a divine truth once hidden, but now revealed in the Gospel. A characteristic usage is Romans 16:25,26, ". . . my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret for long ages, but is now disclosed and through the prophetic writings is made known to all the nations . . ." (cf. Col. 1:26; Eph. 3:3-6). A mystery is thus now a revelation: Christian mysteries are revealed doctrines (Eph. 1:9; 3:3,5,10; 6:19; Col. 4:3,4; Rom. 16:26; I Tim. 3:16). Christianity, therefore, has no secret doctrines, as did the ancient mystery religions. To the worldly wise and prudent the Gospel is foolishness (Matt. 11:25; I Cor. 2:6-9); it is not uncommunicated to them, but they do not have the capacity to understand it (II Cor. 4:2-4). The Christian mystery, then, is God's world-embracing purpose of redemption through Christ (Rom. 16:25). J.B.G.

MYSTERY RELIGIONS, a term applied in the Greek, the Hellenistic, and the Roman world, to the cult of certain deities which involved a private ceremonial of initiation, and a reserved and secret ritual. They were probably survivals of earlier religions, maintaining themselves as secret societies after the introduction of the Olympian and other Indo-European deities, and ending after what seems a common social pattern, by winning their way with the conquering people. The deities with whose worship the Greek "mysteries" were principally connected, were Demeter, whose cult was organized into the ceremonials of Eleusis (q.v.), and Dionysus, whose predominantly female cult is strikingly illustrated by Euripides' play "The Bacchae" (see intro. to E. R. Dodd's edition 1960, and chapter 11 The Male Characters of Euripides by E.M. Blaiklock, Wellington N.Z. 1952). The worship of Demeter and Dionysus appears to have been in origin a nature worship, with a ritual symbolizing death and resurrection in a seasonal sequence, and a spiritual reference of this natural pattern to the experience of the soul.

Little is known about the rites of worship and initiation, for the initiates seem to have been faithful in the keeping of their vows of secrecy, but it is fairly certain that the worship had to do with notions of sin, ritual uncleanness, purification, regeneration, and spiritual preparation for another life. It is probable that their influence was widespread, and, on the whole, salutary in tranquility of spirit and uprightness of conduct. Besides the worship of the goddess and the god already named in connection with metropolitan Greece, there were other ancient deities whose cults can be properly named "mystery religions," for example, the worship of Orpheus, Adonis or Tammuz, Isis, and especially Mithras (q.v.). S. Angus (The Mystery Religions and Christianity, London, 1925) is of the opinion that the triumph of Christianity over the powerful rivalry of the mystery cults, and especially Mithraism, was due principally to its possession of a historic Person as the center of its faith. Paul adapted some of the vocabulary of the mystery cults to a Christian purpose, and his use of the word "mystery" for a truth revealed, but comprehended only by the "initiated," is a clear reference to them. N

NAAM (nā'ăm, Heb. na'am, pleasant), a son of Caleb, and thus a descendant of Judah (I Chron. 4:15).

NAAMAH (nā'ä-mà, Heb. na'ămâh, pleasant), the feminine of Naam, is the name of: 1. A daughter of Lamech and Zillah (Gen. 4:22). She was sister of Tubal-cain, "the forger of all instruments of bronze and iron."

2. A woman of Ammon, wife of Solomon, and mother of Rehoboam (I Kings 14:21,31) and as such the chief lady of the court.

3. A town mentioned in Joshua 15:41 as an inheritance of Judah. It was situated in the lowland, probably near Makkedah, although the site has not been identified. Some believe it was located where the modern Na'anah now is. There is no other mention of this place. In Job 2:11, etc., Zophar is called the Naamathite, but there is nothing else to connect him with this town.

NAAMAN (nā'ä-măn, Heb. na'ămān, pleasant). 1. A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21). He was the eponymous ancestor of the Naamites (Num. 26:40).

2. The "commander of the army of the king of Syria" (II Kings 5:1-27). He was a courageous general in the continuous warfare existing in those days. To the successful story of his life, the Scriptures, however, add the pathetic phrase, "but he was a leper." This was a most dreadful disease at that time and meant ostracism and an untimely death.

A young girl, who had been taken captive in one of the Syrian raids into Israelitish territory, served Naaman's wife. One day she said to her mistress, "Would that my lord were with the prophet who is in Samaria! He would cure him of his leprosy" (5:3).

After a fruitless visit at the court of the king of Israel, Naaman finally goes to the prophet Elisha and is told to wash himself seven times in the River Jordan, a suggestion which is met with anger and contempt as Naaman recalls the clear waters of the rivers of Damascus which were "better than all the waters of Israel" (5:12).

Prevailed upon, however, by his servants to heed the prophet, Naaman "dipped himself seven times in the Jordan, according to the word of the man of God, and his flesh was restored like the flesh of a little child, and he was clean" (5:14), thus manifesting the power of God through his prophet. Naaman's cure led to his acceptance of the God of Israel as the only "God in all the earth."

The rest of the story as told in II Kings 5:15-19 shows how the people believed in henotheism — the belief that nations had their individual gods. Naaman wanted some of Israel's soil to take home so that he could worship Israel's God even if it was "in the house of Rimmon" where he had to worship in company with his king. (Rammon was the thundergod of the Assyrians.)

The great Omaiyid Mosque at Damascus, today the city's most magnificent structure is, according to tradition, built on the site of the temple of Rimmon where Naaman deposited his load of soil from Israel.

In Luke 4:27 Jesus referred to this incident in "the time of the prophet Elisha" when he spoke in the synagogue at Nazareth. J.G.J.

NAAMATHITE (nā'ä-mà-thīt, Heb. na'ămāthî, a dweller in Naaman), a gentilic noun with an article, applied to Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9). The place was probably in N Arabia.

NAAMITES (nā'ä-mīts, Heb. ha-na'ămî), patronymic name of a family descended from Naaman, Benjamin's grandson (Num. 26:40).

NAARAH (nā'ä-rà, Heb. na'ărâh, a girl). 1. One of the wives of Ashhur, the father of Tekoa (I Chron. 4:5f).

2. A place on the border of Ephraim (Josh. 16:7).

NAARAI (nā'ä-rī, Heb. na'ăray), the son of Ezbai (I Chron. 11:37), one of "the mighty men of the armies" in David's time.

NAARAN (nā'ä-răn) Heb. na'ărān), one of the towns in the possession of the sons of Ephraim (I Chron. 7:28). In Joshua 16:7 the place is called Naarah.

NAARATH (See Naaran)

NAASHON, NAASSON (See Nahshon)

NABAL (nā'băl, Heb. nāvāl, fool), a rich sheepmaster of Maon in the southern highland of Judah. The vivid narrative in I Samuel 25:1-42 tells how he insulted David when the latter asked food for his men, who had protected Nabal's men and flocks; how his wife Abigail averted David's vengeance by her gifts and by wise words, and so won David's esteem. Abigail returned home to find Nabal feasting like a king. After he sobered, she told him, and his heart died within him, and he became as a stone, dying ten days later. Then David sought and won Abigail as his wife.

NABATEA, NABATEANS (năb'ă-tē'ăn, Gr. Nabataioi), an Arabian tribe named in the Apocrypha but not in the Bible, and important to Bible history. Between the sixth and fourth centuries B.C. they moved to Edom and Moab (as alluded to in Mal. 1:1-7; Obad. 1-7). In Hellenistic times they were a formidable foe to the Greek successors of Alexander the Great, their capital, Petra, being inaccessible and impregnable. While their king Aretas I befriended the early Maccabees, they were in conflict with the later Maccabees. By NT times their territory stretched from the Mediterranean Sea S of Gaza, and the Red Sea, to the Euphrates, including Damascus. They lost Damascus when the Romans came to the aid of the Jews against them, but later recovered it, so that their king Aretas IV controlled it when Paul was there (II Cor. 11:32). Aretas IV fought with the Romans against the Jews, and was victorious over Herod Antipas, who had divorced Aretas' daughter to marry Herodias. Nabatea was absorbed into the Roman province of Arabia, A.D. 106. The Nabateans, a nomadic people, influenced by Aramean, Hellenistic and Roman culture, developed skill in pottery, fine specimens of which have been recovered. The architecture of Petra, "the rose-red city," is remarkable; its religious high places, pillars and figures carved out of sandstone cliffs of a canyon is accessible only on foot or muleback. By 100 B.C. they developed water storage and irrigation systems in the highlands of Transjordan, the remains of which are still impressive. Yet the Nabateans in the Sinai peninsula and other outlying districts remained nomadic. They were traders between Egypt and Mesopotamia, dealing also in wares from India and China, both by caravan overland and by sea from a port on the Aqabah.

NABONIDAS, NABONIDUS (năb'ō-nī'dŭs), the last ruler of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, 556-539 B.C. His son Belshazzar (Dan. 5; 7:1; 8:1) was co-regent with him from the third year of his reign. His very existence was doubted until cuneiform tablets chronicling his reign were discovered and read. They record how he fled from Babylon when it was taken by the army of Cyrus king of Persia, Oct. 29, 539 B.C., how he returned and was arrested. His wife Nitocris, daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, died soon after, and was honored with an official five day period of mourning. No record of Nabonidus' death has yet been found.

NABOPOLASSAR (năb'ō-pō-lăs'ăr), first ruler of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, 626-605 B.C. Allied with Medes and Scythians he overthrew the Assyrian Empire, destroying Nineveh in 612 B.C., as prophesied by Zephaniah 2:13-15 and Nahum. The destruction earlier prophesied by Jonah was averted by repentance (Jonah 3). When Pharaoh Necho came to aid the Assyrians, Josiah king of Judah opposed him and was killed at Megiddo (II Kings 23:29; II Chron. 35:20-27). Nabopolassar died in Babylon about the time his son Nebuchadnezzar II was engaged in the battle of Carchemish.

NABOTH (nā'bŏth, Heb. nāvôth), the Israelite who owned a vineyard beside the palace of King Ahab in Jezreel. The king coveted this land for a garden, but Naboth refused to sell or exchange his inheritance, which made Ahab "heavy and displeased" (I Kings 21:4). His wife Jezebel undertook to get it for him. She brought this about by having Naboth falsely accused of blasphemy and stoned to death (I Kings 21:7-14). When Ahab went to take possession of the vineyard, Elijah met him and pronounced judgment on Ahab and his family. For a repentant mood, temporary stay was granted (I Kings 21:27-29), but after further warning by Micaiah the prophet, punishment fell on Ahab (I Kings 22:24-40) and on his son Joram and wife Jezebel (II Kings 9:25-37, where the vineyard is called "property, field, plot of ground," see KJV, ASV, RSV, showing that its use had been changed as Ahab purposed in I Kings 21:2).

NACHON, NACON (nā'kŏn, Heb. nākhôn), a Benjamite at whose threshing floor Uzzah was smitten for touching the ark (II Sam. 6:6). Also called Chidon in I Chronicles 13:9. Nacon in ASV, RSV.

NACHOR (nā'kôr), ASV, RSV Nahor, the grandfather of Abraham, in the genealogy of Jesus (Luke 3:34).

NADAB (nā'dăb, Heb. nādhāv). 1. Firstborn son of Aaron and Elisheba (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 26:60; I Chron. 6:3; 24:1). He accompanied Moses, Aaron, the 70 elders and his brother Abihu up Mt. Sinai, where they saw the God of Israel (Exod. 24:1,2,9-15). He and his father and brothers were appointed priests (Exod. 28:1). Nadab and Abihu offered "strange" (RSV unholy, i.e. unauthorized) fire in burning incense before the Lord. Fire from the Lord devoured them; they were buried, and no mourning permitted (Lev. 10:1-7; Num. 3:4; 26:61).

2. Great-grandson of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:26, 28,30).

3. A son of Jeiel the "father" of Gibeon (I Chron. 8:30; 9:36).

4. King of Israel for two years, succeeding his father Jeroboam I (I Kings 14:20; 15:25-31). His evil reign was ended by assassination at the hands of Baasha of Issachar who reigned in his stead. Thus ended the dynasty of Jeroboam, fulfilling the prophecy of Ahijah (I Kings 14:1-20).

NAGGAI, NAGGE (năg'ī, năg'ā-ī, năg'ē), an ancestor of Jesus Christ (Luke 3:25). KJV Nagge, ASV, RSV Naggai, both Greek forms of Heb. Nogah.

NAHALAL, NAHALLAL, NAHALOL (nā'hà-lăl, nā'hà-lŏl), a town in Zebulun whose inhabitants were not driven out but made tributary. Perhaps Tell en-Nahal, N of the River Kishon, NE of Mt. Carmel. In Joshua 19:15 KJV has Nahallal, ASV, RSV correctly Nahalal. All have Nahalal in Joshua 21:35, Nahalol in Judges 1:30.

NAHALIEL (nà-hā'lī-ĕl, nà-hăl'ī-ĕl), a valley between Mattanah and Bamoth where the Israelites camped on their way from the Arnon to Jericho (Num. 21:19). Perhaps Wadi Zerqâ Mā'in, which flows into the Dead Sea midway of its eastern side.

NAHAM (nā'hăm, Heb. naham, comfort), a descendant of Judah through Caleb. I Chronicles 4:19 KJV has "his wife Hodiah the sister of Naham," ASV, RSV "the wife of Hodiah, the sister of Naham."

NAHAMANI (nā'hà-mā'nī, nà-hăm'à-nī), one of the leaders of the people who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:6,7).

NAHARAI, NAHARI (nā'hà-rī), a Beerothite, Joab's armorbearer (II Sam. 23:37; I Chron. 11:39).

NAHASH (nā'hăsh, Heb. nāhāsh), probably from a root meaning serpent rather than from one meaning oracle or one meaning copper. 1. An Ammonite king whose harsh demands on the men of Jabesh-gilead led Saul to rally the Israelites against Nahash and to defeat him. This victory proved decisive in making Saul king (I Sam. 11:1,2; 12:12).

2. An Ammonite king whose son Hanun David befriended. Mistaking David's intentions, Hanun insulted David's messengers. David avenged the insult, and had no more trouble with the Ammonites (II Sam. 10; I Chron. 19). His son Shobi brought provisions to David during his flight from Absalom (II Sam. 17:27-29). 1 and 2 may be the same, though the length of time between the beginning of Saul's reign and the rebellion of Absalom in David's reign favors the view that 2 was a descendant of 1.

3. A parent of Abigail and Zeruiah (II Sam. 17:25). The state of the Heb. text baffles attempts to tell whether this Nahash was a man or a woman. I Chronicles 2:16 calls Jesse father of Abigail and Zeruiah. Either Nahash was their mother, or Nahash was an alternative name for Jesse, or the former husband of Jesse's wife. Nahash is a masculine name.

NAHATH (nā'hăth, Heb. nahath). 1. A son of Reul, son of Esau (Gen. 36:13,17; I Chron. 1:37).

2. A descendant of Levi, ancestor of Samuel (I Chron. 6:26); perhaps = Toah (I Chron. 6:34) and Tohu (I Sam. 1:1).

3. A Levite, overseer of offerings in the days of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

NAHBI (nà'bi), the representative from Naphtali among the spies sent out by Moses (Num. 13:14).

NAHOR (nā'hôr, Heb. nāhôr). 1. Son of Serug, father of Terah, grandfather of Abraham (Gen. 11:22-26; I Chron. 1:26,27).

2. Son of Terah and brother of Abraham (Gen. 11:26-29; 22:20,23; 24:15,24,47; 29:5; Josh. 24:2). The city of Nahor is in Mesopotamia (Gen. 24:10). The God of Nahor is the same God as the God of Abraham (Gen. 31:53). KJV has Nachor in Joshua 24:2 and Luke 3:34.

NAHSHON (nà'shŏn, Heb. nahshôn), the son of Amminadab (I Chron. 2:10,11); ancestor of David (Ruth 4:20); leader of the tribe of Judah on the march through the wilderness (Num. 1:7; 2:3; 10:14), and in presenting offerings at the dedication of the tabernacle (Num. 7:12,17). His sister Elisheba married Aaron (Exod. 6:23, KJV Naashon). He is named in the genealogies of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:32, in both of which KJV has Naasson).

NAHUM, THE ELKOSHITE (nā'hŭm, Heb. nahûm, compassionate), the name is a shortened form of Nehemiah. Of Nahum and his city of Elkosh nothing is known outside of the book that bears his name. See Nahum, Book of.

NAHUM, BOOK OF. The short book of Nahum is largely a poem, a literary masterpiece, predicting the downfall of Nineveh, the capital of Assyria. Nineveh was conquered by the Babylonians, Medes, and Scythians in 612 B.C. Nahum declares that Nineveh will fall as did "populous No" (Thebes) which the Assyrians themselves had conquered in 663 B.C. The book therefore was written between 663 and 612. These were turbulent times. In 633 Assurbanipal, the last great king of Assyria, died. Soon Babylon rebelled and the Assyrian power rapidly dwindled. In Judah, the wicked Manasseh reigned until about 641, followed by Amon's two year reign and then the long reign of the good king Josiah (639-608). Perhaps it was in Josiah's days that Nahum prophesied the overthrow of the mighty nation that had so oppressed the Jews. At least, Zephaniah likewise prophesied in Josiah's time the overthrow of Nineveh (Zeph. 1:1; 2:13).

The book of Nahum is in two parts, first a poem concerning the greatness of God (1:2-15), then another and longer poem detailing the overthrow of Nineveh (2:1-3:19). The impassioned expressions of Nahum can be the better understood when we remember how Assyria had overthrown the Northern Kingdom of Israel in 722 B.C. and had later taken 40 cities of Judah captive, deporting over 200,000 people —according to Sennacherib's own boast in his royal annals (cf. II Kings 18:13). The cruelty of the Assyrians is almost beyond belief. Their policy seems to have been one of calculated terror. Their own pictures show captives staked to the ground and being skinned alive! No wonder Nahum exulted at the overthrow of the proud, rich, cruel empire of Assyria.

Some modern critics take issue with Nahum's theology, saying that such vengeful expressions are far from the spirit of the Gospel. Such views are usually based on a one-sided conception of New Testament teaching. In truth, God is merciful. Nahum recognizes this in a quotation from Exodus 34:6 (Nah. 1:3) — also in Nahum 1:7, "He knoweth them that trust in Him." Nahum also quotes from Isaiah the promise of good tidings of peace for his own (Neh. 1:15; Isa. 52:7). But for Nineveh the cup of iniquity was full. A century and a quarter earlier, Nineveh had repented at the preaching of Jonah. But the repentance was temporary and now a hundred years of savage cruelty and oppression of God's people must be paid for. Assyria, the pride of Tiglath-pileser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Assurbanipal, must be laid in the graveyard of nations.

The poem of Nineveh's doom (2:1-3:19) is really quite remarkable. The figures of speech are bold, and in staccato fashion the strokes of war are given. The glamour of the attack with whip and prancing horses and flashing swords suddenly gives way to the picture of the innumerable corpses that mark Nineveh's defeat (3:2,3). If it was wrong for Nahum to rejoice at Nineveh's fall, what shall be said of the heavenly throng of Revelation 19:1-6? Inveterate sin must at last bring condign punishment. The death-knell of all opposition to the Gospel is here: "Behold I am against thee, saith the Lord of hosts" (Nah. 2:13; 3:5). R.L.H.

NAIL. 1. Heb. tsippōren, finger-nail (Deut. 21:12); Aram. tephar, (Dan. 4:33; 7:19).

2. Heb. yathēdh, tent-pin (Judg. 4:21,22; 5:26); a peg driven in the wall to hang things on (Ezra 9:8; Isa. 22:23-25), or tent-peg (Zech. 10:4).

3. Heb. masmēr, nails of iron (I Chron. 22:3) and gold (II Chron. 3:9; Isa. 41:7; Jer. 10:4) or either (Eccl. 12:11). Nails, pins and pegs were first of stone chips, wood, or bone, then copper or bronze, or in fine work, gold or silver.

4. Gr. hēlos, used to nail Jesus' hands to the cross (John 20:25). Paul speaks of God nailing to the cross of Jesus the handwriting of the law which condemned us (Col. 2:14).

NAIN (nā'ĭn, Gr. Naín), modern Nein, a village of Galilee. Though unwalled, it had gates, near which Jesus raised a widow's son from death (Luke 7:11-17). The situation is beautiful, on the NW slope of the Hill of Moreh, known as Little Hermon. Eastward are ancient rock-hewn tombs. The view is wide, across plains NW to Mt. Carmel, N to the hills behind Nazareth, six miles away, NE past Mt. Tabor to the snowy heights of Mt. Hermon. S is Mt. Gilboa.

NAIOTH (nā'ŏth, -ōth, Heb. nāyôth), a place in or near Ramah of Benjamin, not far N of Jerusalem, where David stayed with Samuel during an early flight from Saul (I Sam. 19:18-20:1). It was the home of a band of prophets. When Saul pursued David thither, Saul himself was seized with the spirit of prophecy, giving rise to the saying, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" Thus David escaped from Saul.

NAKED (nā'kĕd). The Heb. and Gr. words so translated mean: without any clothing (Gen. 2:25; 3:7-11; Isa. 20:2-4); poorly clad (Job 22:6; I Cor. 4:11; Matt. 25:36-44; James 2:15); without an outer garment (John 21:7). Often it is uncertain which meaning applies (II Chron. 28:15; Mark 14:51,52). RSV clears up some cases. There are also figurative senses: uncovered, open (Heb. 4:13); without the body (I Cor. 15:37; II Cor. 5:3,4); without preparation of the inner man (Rev. 3:17; 16:15). "Naked" is also a euphemism for parts of the body which should not be exposed (Lev.18:1-19) and for shameful acts (Gen. 9:22, 23).

NAME (Heb. shem; Gr. onoma). In Bible times the notion of "name" had a significance it does not have today, when it is usually an unmeaning personal label. A name was given only by a person in a position of authority (Gen. 2:19; II Kings 23:34), and signified that the person named was appointed to a particular position, function, or relationship (Gen. 35:18; II Sam. 12:25). The name given was often determined by some circumstance at the time of birth (Gen. 19:22); sometimes the name expressed a hope or a prophecy (Isa. 8:1-4; Hosea 1:4). Where a person gave his own name to another, it signified the joining of the two in very close unity, as when God gave His name to Israel (Deut. 28:9,10). To be baptized into someone's name therefore means to pass into new ownership (Matt. 28:19; Acts 8:16; I Cor. 1:13,15). In the Scriptures there is the closest possible relationship between a person and his name, the two being practically equivalent, so that to remove the name is to extinguish the person (Num. 27:4; Deut. 7:24). To forget God's name is to depart from Him (Jer. 23:27). The name, moreover, is the person as he has been revealed; for example, the "name of Jehovah" signifies Jehovah in the attributes He has manifested — holiness, power, love, etc. Often in the Bible the name signifies the presence of the person in the character revealed (I Kings 18:24). To be sent or to speak in someone's name signifies to carry his authority (Jer. 11:21; II Cor. 5:20). In later Jewish usage the name Jehovah was not pronounced in reading the Scriptures (cf. Wisdom 14:21), the name Adhonai ("my Lord") being substituted for it. To pray in the name of Jesus is to pray as His representatives on earth, in His Spirit and with His aim, and implies the closest union with Christ. S.B.

NAMES. By giving names, God enabled us to express relations of His creatures (Gen. 1:5,8,10; 2:11-14). Man named the beasts (Gen. 2:19,20), and woman (Gen. 2:23) by derivation. Her personal name is from her function as mother of all living (human) beings (Gen. 3:20). Cain's name is a pun on two Heb. words (Gen. 4:1). Seth is a reminder that God "appointed" him instead of Abel (Gen. 4:25). "Men began to call upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. 4:26) when they began to recognize Him by His revealed name, Jehovah (Yahweh). God changed the name of Abram to Abraham in view of his destiny (Gen. 17:5). Names in Genesis 10 are of individuals (Nimrod) or nations (Egypt=Mizraim; Jebusites, etc.) or eponymous ancestors or tribes descended from them. People were named for animals (Caleb, dog; Tabitha=Dorcas, gazelle), plants (Tamar, palm-tree), precious things (Penninah, coral or pearl), qualities (Hannah, grace; Ikkesh, perverse; Ira, watchful) or historical circumstances (Ichabod, the glory is departed), for relatives (Absalom named a daughter for his sister Tamar), etc.

The significance of the names of the tribes of Israel is brought out in Genesis 48 and 49. Men were distinguished as sons (ben, bar), women as daughters (bath) of their fathers (Benzoheth, Simon bar-Jona, Bathsheba). Names compounded with El (God) or Jeho-, -iah (Jehovah) became common. Jacob (Gen. 32:24-32) received the name Israel, prince with God, for Jacob, supplanter, and recognized God without learning His secret name. Prophets gave their children symbolic names (Isa. 8:1-4; Hos. 1:4-11). Messiah was given significant names: Immanuel, God with us; Jesus, Saviour (Isa. 7:14; Matt. 1:21,23; Luke 1:31). In His name (Acts 3:16) miracles are wrought, as He promised (John 14:13,14). When we act in Jesus' name we represent Him (Matt. 10:42). Place names are for natural features (Lebanon, white, because snow-capped; Bethsaida and Sidon from their fishing; Tirzah, pleasantness, for its beauty; etc.). By NT times both personal and family names were common (Simon bar-Jona) or descriptive phrases were added, as for the several Marys. Hybril or duplicate names occur in a bilingual culture: Bar (Heb.) -timeus (Greek); Saul (Heb.)=Paul (Roman); John (Heb.), Mark (Roman). Patriarchal times saw names as indicators of character, function or destiny. Soon names began to be given more hopefully than discriminatingly, until finally we are not sure whether the name tells us anything about the nature: was Philip a "lover of horses," or could Archippus ride them? The many genealogical tables in the Bible follow the practice of ancient historians, showing the importance of descent and of the relations thus established between individuals. E.R.

NANNAR (nän'när), the name given at Ur to the Babylonian moon-god Sin.

NAOMI (nā'ō-mī, nā-ō'mĭ, Heb. nā'ŏmî), wife of Elimelech of Bethlehem. Bereft of husband and sons, she returned from a sojourn in Moab with her Moabite daughter-in-law Ruth, depressed that one whose name meant "pleasantness" might now appropriately be called "bitterness." She advised Ruth in the steps which led to Ruth's marriage to Boaz, and nursed Ruth's child (Ruth 1:1-4:22).

NAPHISH (nā'fĭsh, Heb. nāphîsh), a son of Ishmael whose clan was subdued by Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (Gen. 25:15; I Chron. 1:31; 5:19). His descendants, temple servants, returned with Zerubbabel from exile (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52; Nephisim, Nephushesim, etc.).

NAPHTALI (năf'tà-lī, Heb. naphtālî). 1. A son of Jacob. Naphtali was the second son of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. The name is a play on the word pāthal "fight," or "struggle." Of the patriarch himself practically nothing is known. He had four sons (Gen. 46:24). Jacob's blessing for this son is brief and noncommittal (Gen. 49:21).

2. The Tribe of Naphtali. Naphtali appears in the lists of Numbers as a tribe of moderate size. It furnished 53,400 soldiers at Kadesh Barnea (Num. 1:43) and 45,400 at the mustering of the troops across from Jericho (Num. 26:50). In the wilderness organization, Naphtali was supposed to encamp on the N side of the tabernacle under the standard of Dan, and this group of tribes brought up the rear in marching. Interestingly, they settled together in Canaan. Naphtali's prince Ahira gave the last offering for the dedication of the altar (Num. 7:78). Naphtali received the next to last lot in the final division of the land (Josh. 19:32-39), but in many ways its inheritance was the best.

The territory of Naphtali, as nearly as we can tell, included the fertile scenic area just W of the Sea of Galilee and the sources of the Jordan. It reached from the lower limits of the Sea of Galilee almost up to a point opposite Mt. Hermon. On the W it reached half-way to the Mediterranean, being bounded by the tribe of Asher. The chief cities of Naphtali were Hazor, Chinnereth at the N end of the Sea of Galilee, and Kadesh Naphtali. The latter was the northernmost city of refuge in western Palestine.

Kadesh Naphtali was the home of Barak, and Naphtali figured largely in Deborah's conquest of Hazor (Judg. 5:18). It also assisted Gideon (Judg. 7:23). Naphtali is mentioned as one of Solomon's revenue districts (I Kings 4:15), and the collector was a son-in-law of the king.

Naphtali, lying exposed in the north, was conquered by Ben-hadad (I Kings 15:20) and was later deported after the first invasion of Tiglath-pileser about 733 B.C. (II Kings 15:29), who settled Gentiles in the territory. This event is mentioned in Isaiah 9:1 with a prediction of the Messiah who preached, as Matthew reminds us, in this same region of Galilee of the Gentiles in fulfillment of the ancient prophecy. R.L.H.

NAPHTUHIM (năf-tū'hĭm, năf'tū-hĭm, Heb. naphtūhîm), a "son" of Mizraim or (RSV) Egypt (Gen. 10:13; I Chron. 1:11). Naphtuhim being plural in form denotes a people. Their location has been sought inconclusively in various parts of Egypt.

NAPKIN (năp'kĭn, Gr. soudárion, Latin sudarium), a cloth for wiping off perspiration. In the parable of the pounds one man kept his pound in a napkin (Luke 19:20). The face of Lazarus was covered with one when he came forth from the tomb (John 11:44, RSV cloth). One had been on the head of Jesus when He was buried (John 20:7).

NARCISSUS (nàr-cĭs'ŭs, Gr. Narkíssos), a Roman whose household Paul greeted. The apostle's salutation is not addressed to Narcissus himself but to the members of his household. He may have been the favorite freedman of Claudius the emperor (Rom. 16:11).

NARD (See Plants, Spikenard)

NATHAN (nā'thăn, Heb. nāthān, God has given). 1. Prophet at the royal court in Jerusalem during the reign of David and the early years of Solomon. David consulted him regarding the building of the temple (II Sam. 7; I Chron. 17). Nathan at first approved, but that same night had a vision directing him to advise David to leave temple-building to the son who should succeed him. David humbly obeyed, expressing gratitude to God for blessings bestowed and others promised. Later Nathan rebuked David for adultery with Bathsheba (II Sam. 12:1-25). David earnestly repented. Its title links Psalm 51 with this incident. When Adonijah sought to supplant his aged father David as king, Nathan intervened through Bathsheba to secure the succession for her son Solomon (I Kings 1:8-53). Nathan wrote chronicles of the reign of David (I Chron. 29:29) and shared in writing the history of the reign of Solomon (II Chron. 9:29). He was associated with David and Gad the seer in arranging the musical services for the house of God (II Chron. 29:25).

2. A son of David, born to him after he began to reign in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:14; I Chron. 14:4). His mother was Bathshua, daughter of Ammiel (I Chron. 3:5). He is named in the genealogy of Jesus Christ as son of David and father of Mattatha (Luke 3:31).

3. Nathan of Zobah, father of Igal, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:36). He may be the same as Nathan the brother of Joel (I Chron. 11:38).

4. The two Nathans mentioned in I Kings 4:5 as fathers of Azariah and Zabud may be the same man, and identified with No. 1, the prophet. If Zabad (I Chron. 2:36) is the same as Zabud, his father Nathan may also be the prophet. In that case we know that the prophet's father was Attai, a descendant of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:25).

5. One of the leading men among those who returned from exile, whom Ezra sent on a mission (Ezra 8:16).

6. One of the returning exiles who had married a foreign wife, and who put her away (Ezra 10: 39).

Zechariah 12:12 prophesies that the house of Nathan will join on the Day of the Lord in mourning over "him whom they have pierced." From the association with the house of David it would seem that the descendants of the prophet (No. 1) are meant (Zech. 12:10-14); but the descendants of David's son (No. 2) may be meant.

NATHANAEL (nȧ-thăn'ā-ĕl, Heb. nethan'ĕl, God has given), one of the number of the 12 apostles introduced to Christ by Philip(John 1:45ff; 21:2). Nathanael was presumably of Cana of Galilee. The circumstances surrounding his calling are somewhat striking, since Christ praises his integrity upon their initial encounter, and demonstrates to Nathanael His own foreknowledge by reference to the fig tree. Evidently knowledge of the Scripture was considerable on the part of Nathanael, because of the rather amazing theological repartee, bordering on sacred pun, which was conducted between Christ and him (1:51). Nathanael is commonly identified as Bartholomew. The two names are used interchangeably by the Church fathers.

NATHAN-MELECH (nā'thăn-mē'lek, Heb. nethan melekh, king's gift), an officer to whom King Josiah remanded the horses "sacred to the sun" after burning the chariots in the fire (II Kings 23:11). The LXX styles him "Nathan, the king's eunuch."

NATIONS, the rendering of the Heb. gôyim (sing. gôy) which, however, is also rendered "Gentiles" and "heathen" and, a few times, refers to the Israelites, as in Genesis 12:2; Deuteronomy 32:28, etc. Ordinarily, it corresponds to the meaning of "Gentiles." The Gentiles were not sharply differentiated from the Israelites by the latter in OT times, but after the Babylonian exile, Gentiles were treated with scorn and hatred, and in NT times they were cursed if they even asked about divine things. The reason for this change in attitude was undoubtedly the awful sufferings the Israelites endured from the Gentiles between the time of the Exile and the time of Christ.

NATURAL. 1. In Deuteronomy 34:7 the word is the rendering of lēah, moist, full of sap, and has reference to physical vigor.

2. In the NT the word renders phýsis, meaning belonging to nature, as in Romans 1:26,27; II Peter 2:14; according to nature, as in Romans 11:21,24; psychikós, meaning animal, sensuous, as in I Corinthians 15:44 ("natural body"); and unconverted, as in I Corinthians 2:14 ("natural man"); and génesis, origin, birth, as in James 1:23 ("natural face").

NATURE, a word which in the KJV is found only in the NT where it renders génesis (James 3:6, "course of nature," meaning "the entire compass of one's life") and phýsis, the inherent character of a person or thing (Rom. 1:26; 2:14; 11:21-24; I Cor. 11:14; Gal. 4:8), by birth (Rom. 2:27; Gal. 2:15; Eph. 2:3), disposition (II Pet. 1:4).

NAUGHTINESS (See Sin)

NAUM, NAHUM (nā'ŭm, nā'hŭm), one of the ancestors of Christ mentioned by the third evangelist (Luke 3:25).

NAVE (nāv), the hub of a wheel (I Kings 7:33).

NAVEL (nā'vĕl, Heb. shōr). Following the LXX, a different reading has been suggested in Proverbs 3: 8: she'ĕr, muscle, body. In Ezekiel the reading "navel" has been retained in the sense of the umbilical cord not being cut; a picture of an unwanted, untended babe (Ezek. 16:4).

NAVY (See Ships)

NAZARENE (năz'ȧ-rēn, Gr. Nazarenós, Nazoraios). 1. A word derived from Nazareth, the home town of Christ. Jesus was often called a Nazarene. Used by His friends, it had a friendly meaning (Acts 2:22; 3:6; 10:38). Jesus applied the title to Himself (Acts 22:8). Used by His enemies, it was a title of scorn (Matt. 26:71; Mark 14:67). It is not altogether certain what Matthew intended in the words, "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken through the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene" (Matt. 2:23). It is usually thought that he refers to Isaiah 11:1, where the Messiah is called netser or shoot out of the roots of Jesse. The name Nazareth was probably derived from the same root. Matthew sees a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy in the parents of Jesus taking up their residence in Nazareth.

2. In Acts 24:5 adherents of Christianity are called Nazarenes.

NAZARETH (năz'ȧ-rĕth, Gr. Nazarét and other forms), a town in lower Galilee belonging to the tribe of Zebulun, nowhere referred to in the OT, the home town of Mary and Joseph, the human parents of Jesus (Luke 1:26; 2:4). After the flight into Egypt to escape the ruthless hands of Herod the Great (Matt. 2:13ff), the holy family contemplated returning to Bethlehem of Judea. Hearing that none too propitious a change had occurred in the government, they withdrew to Nazareth in Galilee.

The rejection of Jesus Christ in the synagogue of Nazareth has been the cause of debate whether indeed there were two rejections or merely one. Though the matter will never be entirely settled, it seems as if there were two such experiences in the life of Christ. (Cf. Luke 4:16-30 with Mark 6:1-6 and Matt. 13:54-58.) The first occurred at the beginning of the ministry of Jesus. (Luke 4: 14). The second transpired on the occasion of Christ's final visit to Nazareth (Matt. 13:54ff). The very exegetical structures of the stories appear to make their own demands for two incidents, as in the first (Lukan) account there arose such great hostility that the congregation actually attempted to take His life. In the second instance, a spirit of faithless apathy was the only noticeable reaction to His words. (Cf. Luke 4:29-31 with Matt. 13:57,58).

In regard to the city of Nazareth itself, the ancient site is located by the modern en-Natzirah, a Moslem village of about 10,000 inhabitants, on the most southern ranges of lower Galilee. Nazareth itself lies in a geographical basin so that not much of the surrounding countryside is in plain view. However, if one scales the edge of the basin, the sights of Esdraelon with its 20 battlefields and the place of Naboth's vineyard meet the eye. A distance of 30 miles can be observed in three directions. Unfortunately, however, the people of Nazareth had established a rather poor reputation in morals and religion. This is seen in Nathaniel's question: "Can any good come out of Nazareth?" (John 1:46). J.F.G.

The Nazareth Inscription, otherwise known as the Nazareth Decree, an Ordinance of Caesar, c. 50 A.D., now in the Louvre in Paris. LMP

NAZARETH DECREE, an inscription cut on a slab of white marble, sent in 1878 from Nazareth for the private collection of a German antiquarian named Froehner. It was not until 1930, when, on Froehner's death, the inscription found a place in the Cabinet de Médailles of the Louvre, that the historian Michel Rostovtzeff noticed its significance. The Abbé Cumont published the first description in 1932.

The decree runs: "Ordinance of Caesar. It is my pleasure that graves and tombs remain undisturbed in perpetuity for those who have made them for the cult of their ancestors, or children, or members of their house. If, however, any man lay information that another has either demolished them, or has in any other way extracted the buried, or has maliciously transferred them to other places in order to wrong them, or has displaced the sealing or other stones, against such a one I order that a trial be instituted, as in respect of the gods, so in regard to the cult of mortals. For it shall be much more obligatory to honor the buried. Let it be absolutely forbidden for anyone to disturb them. In the case of contravention I desire that the offender be sentenced to capital punishment on the charge of violation of sepulture."

Evidence suggests that the inscription falls within the decade which closed with A.D. 50. The central Roman government did not take over the administration of Galilee until the death of Agrippa in A.D. 44. This limits the date, in the opinion of competent scholarship, to five years under Claudius (e.g. vid. A. Momigliano, The Emperor Claudius and His Achievement, 1932). It is possible to date the inscription rather more precisely. The Acts of the Apostles, confirmed by Orosius and Suetonius, the Roman historians, says that Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome (18:2). This was in A.D. 49. Suetonius adds that this was done "at the instigation of one Chrestos." The reference is obviously to Christ, and Suetonius' garbled account confuses two Greek words christos and chrestos.

Claudius was a learned man, misjudged by his contemporaries because of physical defects, probably due to the effects of what may possibly have been Parkinson's disease. His interest in continuing Augustus' religious policy led to a wide knowledge of the religions of the Empire, and would prompt investigation in the courts of any case involving cults or religious beliefs. Suetonius' phrase, and the act of expulsion, probably reflect the first impact of Christianity in Rome, disturbance in the ghetto, proceedings in the courts, and a review of the rabbis' complaints with a Christian apologia in reply, before the court with the Emperor on the bench. He hears the Pharisaic explanation of the empty tomb (Matt. 28:13), and Nazareth having recently fallen under central control, he proceeds to deal with the trouble on the spot. Inquiries are made in Palestine, and the local authority asks for directions. The result is a "rescript" or imperial ruling. Claudius wrote more than one long letter on religious matters (e.g. a notable letter to the Jews of Alexandria in A.D. 41). The decree set up at Nazareth was a quotation from such a communication, verbatim or adapted from a larger text.

E.M.B.

NAZIRITE, NAZARITE (năz'ĭ-rīt, năz'ā-rīt, Heb. nāzîr. Connected with nadhar, to vow, hence, people of the vow, i.e. dedicated or consecrated). An Israelite who consecrated himself or herself and took a vow of separation and self-imposed abstinence for the purpose of some special service.

Origin. The question whether the concept of the Nazirite was indigenous to Israel has often been asked. It would appear that the practice of separation for religious purposes is very ancient and is shared by a number of peoples. In Israel, however, it assumed unique proportions. Its regulatory laws are laid down in Numbers 6:1-23. There were two different types of Nazaritism, the temporary and the perpetual, of which the first type was far more common. In fact, we know only of three of the last class: Samson, Samuel and John the Baptist.

Distinguishing traits. The three principal marks which distinguished the Nazirite were: (1) a renunciation of wine and all products of the vine, including grapes; (2) prohibition of the use of the razor; (3) avoidance of contact with a dead body. It should be noted that he was not expected to withdraw from society, that is, to live a monastic type of life, nor to become a celibate. The question has been raised whether the Rechabites of Jeremiah 35 were included within the Nazirite classification. It appears, however, that the Rechabites had more the status of a (Hebrew) nomadic group, since they were not merely forbidden to drink wine, but also to refrain from owning real estate. They lived in tents (Jer. 35:7,10).

Nazirites in the NT. John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was a Nazirite from birth (Luke 1:15). The connection between John the Baptist and the Qumran community is rather tenuous, nor can it be proved that the men of Qumran were all Nazirites. The case of Paul and Naziritism has frequently called forth discussion. Though it can not be established that the Apostle assumed such a vow, it is certain that he did assume the expenses of those who did (Acts 21:23f). The court of Herod Agrippa supported a large number of Nazirites, according to Josephus.

Reasons for assuming the vow. The reasons for taking a Nazirite vow were numerous. A vow might be assumed before the birth of a child; by one in some sort of distress or trouble; by a woman suspected by her husband of unfaithfulness in their marriage relationship until the suspicion should be removed. Women and slaves could take vows only if sanctioned by their husbands or masters.

The period of time for the Nazirite vow was anywhere from 30 days to a whole lifetime. During the Maccabean days, a number of Jews became Nazirites as a matter of protest against the Hellenistic practices and demands of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Nazirites and the Prophets. There is only one clear-cut mention of the Nazirites by the prophets. The prophet Amos (2:11,12) voices a complaint of Jehovah against the children of Israel that He had given to Israel the prophets and the Nazirites as spiritual instructors and examples, but that the people had given wine to the Nazirites and had offered inducements to the prophets to refrain from prophesying. NEAH (nē'ā, Heb. hanē'âh), a town given by lot to the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13), possibly the same as the "Neiel" of vs. 27. Its exact location is unknown.

NEAPOLIS (nē-ăp'ō-lĭs, Gr. Neápolis), a town on the N shore of the Aegean Sea; the seaport of Philippi to which Paul and party sailed after seeing the "Man of Macedonia" at Troas (Acts 16:11, 12). Paul may have revisited Neapolis on his return trip to Jerusalem (Acts 20:3-5). The exact location of Neapolis is yet uncertain. However, on the basis of literary and archaeological evidences, it would appear that it is near Kavalla.

NEARIAH (nē'ā-rī'ā). 1. A descendant of David (I Chron. 3:22).

2. A descendant of Simeon (I Chron. 4:42). The LXX renders both occurrences as "Noadiah."

NEBAI (nē'bī), one of the signers of the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:19).

NEBAIOTH, NEBAJOTH (nē-bā'yŏth, nē-bā'jŏth, Heb. nevāyôth). 1. The firstborn son of Ishmael, son of Abraham (Gen. 25:13; 28:9; 36:3; I Chron. 1:29).

2. Isaiah mentions Nebaioth as a tribe (Isa. 60:7). Some scholars regard Nebaioth as identical with the Nabataeans.

NEBALLAT (nē-băl'ăt), a Benjamite town occupied after the Exile, named along with Lod and Ono (Neh. 11:34). It is now Beit Nabala, four miles NE of Lydda.

NEBAT (nē'băt), the father of Jeroboam I, the first king of the northern confederacy after the great schism (I Kings 12:15).

NEBO (nē'bō, Heb. nevô, Assyr. Nabu). 1. A god of Babylonian mythology. The special seat of his worship was the Babylonian city of Borsippa. He receives mention by Isaiah (Isa. 46:1). Nebo was the god of science and learning. The thrust of Isaiah the prophet against him seems to be that Nebo himself, the imagined writer of the fate of all, is destined to go into captivity.

2. The name of the mountain from which Moses beheld the Promised Land (Deut. 34:1ff).

3. A Moabite town near or on Mount Nebo (Num. 32:3).

4. A town mentioned immediately after Bethel and Ai (Ezra 2:29; Neh. 7:33).

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, NEBUCHADREZZAR (nĕb'ū-kăd-nĕz'ĕr, nĕb'ū-kăd-rĕz'ĕr), the great king of the Neo-Babylonian empire who reigned from 605 to 562 B.C. It was he who carried away Judah in the 70-year Babylonian captivity. He figures prominently in the books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the later chapters of Kings and Chronicles. Until recently, not many of Nebuchadnezzar's historical records had been found, though his building inscriptions are numerous. Now the publication by Wiseman of Nebuchadnezzar's chronicle fills in some of the gaps.

The name Nebuchadnezzar means "Nebo protect the boundary." The form Nebuchadrezzar is probably a minor variant. Cf. the variations Tiglath-pilneser (I Chron. 5:26; II Chron. 28:20) and Tiglath-pileser (II Kings 15:29). The appearance of the "n" may be an inner Hebrew phenomenon. Wilson and Young suggest that it is a rendition of the name assuming a variant etymology, "Nebo protect the servant." (R. D. Wilson, A Scientific Investigation of the Old Testament, rev. ed. by E. J. Young, Chicago: Moody Press, 1959, p. 68).

Nebuchadnezzar's father, Nabopolassar, seems to have been a general appointed by the Assyrian king. However, in the later years of Assyria he rebelled, and established himself as king of Babylon in 626. The rebellion increased and finally Nabopolassar with the Medes and Scythians conquered Nineveh, the Assyrian capital, in 612. The Medes and Babylonians divided the Assyrian empire and a treaty was probably sealed by the marriage of the Median princess to the Babylonian prince, Nebuchadnezzar. In 607 the crown prince Nebuchadnezzar joined his father in the battle with the remnants of the Assyrian power and their allies, the Egyptians. In 605, when his father was in his last illness, he decisively defeated the Egyptians at Carchemish. At this time Nebuchadnezzar took over all Syria and Palestine. Apparently Jehoiakim, king of Judah, who had been vassal to Egypt quickly did homage to Babylon and gave hostages (Dan. 1:1). Nebuchadnezzar at this time got news of his father's death and with a picked bodyguard he hastened home to secure his throne. On repeated occasions thereafter he struck toward the west. In about 602 B.C. Jehoiakim revolted (II Kings 24:1), probably with promise of Egyptian help, but was forced to submit. In 601, Nebuchadnezzar attacked Egypt itself but was defeated, as he frankly admits. Later, Pharaoh Hophra submitted to him. Again Jehoiakim rebelled, in 597, and Nebuchadnezzar called out his troops for another western expedition. Jehoiakim died either in a siege or by treachery (Jer. 22:18,19) and his son Jehoiachin ascended the throne. But he lasted only three months till the campaign was over, and he was taken as a hostage to Babylon where he lived and finally was given relative freedom. Here the Biblical account (II Kings 25:27-30) is confirmed by discovery of the Weidner tablets (ANET p. 308).

Nebuchadnezzar installed Jehoiachin's uncle as puppet king, taking heavy tribute from Jerusalem. Ezekiel was among the captives of that expedition. Nebuchadnezzar's chronicle agrees with the Biblical account, telling how in 597 B.C. he "encamped against the city of Judah and on the second day of the month Adar (Mar. 15/16) he seized the city and captured the king. He appointed there a king of his own choice, received its heavy tribute and sent them to Babylon." (D. Wiseman, Chronicles of the Chaldean Kings, London: British Museum, 1956, p. 73). This discovery gives about the best authenticated date in the Old Testament.

In later years the Chronicle tells of repeated expeditions of Nebuchadnezzar toward the west to collect tribute and keep the satellite kingdoms in line. Unfortunately, the present tablets do not go beyond 593, so there is no record of the final and brutal devastation of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., when Zedekiah revolted. The historical gap extends to 556 B.C. except for a brief account of a campaign to southern Asia Minor by Neriglissar in 557.

Nebuchadnezzar is celebrated by the historians of antiquity for the splendor of his building operations as well as for the brilliance of his military exploits. Koldewey's excavations in Babylon illustrate the histories. Still impressive are the remains of the Ishtar gate and the processional street lined with facades of enameled brick bearing pictures of gryphons. The temple of Esagila was famous, as were also the ziggurat or temple tower and the hanging gardens. These were regarded by the Greeks as one of the wonders of the world, though nothing certain of them has been excavated. According to legend, they were built for Nebuchadnezzar's wife, the Median princess Amytis who was homesick for her mountains. Parrot, in a study of the ziggurat, reconstructs it as a pyramidal tower, 298 feet square and rising in seven stages to a height of 300 ft. (A. Parrot, The Tower of Babel, London: SCM Press, 1955, pp. 46-51).

Our historical records are brief and could hardly be expected to mention the incidents of Nebuchadnezzar's life detailed by Daniel. But there is nothing unreal in the dream of the vision of chapter 2 nor in the incident of the idol and the fiery furnace. A similar practice seems to be referred to in Jeremiah 29:22. It has been pointed out that this incident is more suited to the Babylonian period than the later Persian time, for the Persians worshiped fire and would be less apt to use it for execution.

As to the madness of Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel 4, there is no historical account remaining for us, but it must be remembered that much of Nebuchadnezzar's reign is an historical blank. Anything could have happened. Among the Dead Sea Scrolls has been found a fragment, the Prayer of Nabonidus, which refers to an illness of the king for seven years which was healed by God after the testimony of a Jewish magician. (J. T. Milik, Ten Years of Discovery in the Wilderness of Judea, Naperville, Ill.: Allenson, 1959, p. 36). Some now say that this is the source of the legend which in Daniel is misapplied to Nebuchadnezzar. This can hardly be proved or denied from historical evidence. It seems equally possible that the canonical record was duplicated and applied to the later king. Indeed, more than one king suffered from illness and from mental distress — Assurbanipal and Cambyses may be mentioned. If truth is stranger than fiction, both Nebuchadnezzar and Nabonidus may have suffered in a somewhat similar way —the similarities being emphasized in the latter prayer. There is perhaps a bare possibilty that the names are confused. Two rebels after the reign of Cambyses apparently took the name of Nebuchadnezzar (Wiseman, op. cit. p. 37). There is uncertainty as to the name of Labynetus who mediated the Median-Lydian treaty of 585. Some think he was Nabonidus, some say Nebuchadnezzar (ibid. p. 39).

Is it out of the question that Nabonidus also on occasion adopted the name Nebuchadnezzar? He had abundant precedent, but we have no positive evidence.

Of the death of Nebuchadnezzar we have no knowledge. He was succeeded by his son Evil-Merodach, then by his son-in-law, Neriglissar, for brief reigns. Nabonidus, who followed after the short reign of Labashi-Marduk, was perhaps related. There is some evidence that Nabonidus' mother was the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar by a second wife Nitocris. With the passing of the brilliant Nebuchadnezzar, however, the Neo-Babylonian empire soon crumbled and fell an easy prey to the Persians under Cyrus. R.L.H.

NEBUSHASBAN (nĕb'ū-shăs'băn, Akkad. Nebo, save me), an important officer in the army of Nebuchadnezzar at the time of the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. To his care another Babylonian official delivered the Prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 39:11-14).

NEBUZARADAN (nĕb'ū-zâr-ā'dăn, Akkad. Nebo has given seed), Nebuchadnezzar's general when the Babylonians besieged Jerusalem (II Kings 25: 8,11,12,20; Jer. 52:12ff). The prophet Jeremiah was made the special charge and responsibility of Nebuzaradan (Jer. 39:11-14). Nebuzaradan bears the title the "Captain of the guard." After the fall of the city of Jerusalem in 586-85 B.C., Nebuzaradan was commissioned by Nebuchadnezzar to conduct the captives to Babylon. Before the appointment of Gedaliah (Jer. 40:5) Nebuzaradan was provisional governor of Palestine for the Babylonians. Nebuzaradan presented the option to Jeremiah to travel with him to Babylon or to remain in his own land (Jer. 40:1-6). The prophet chose to remain.

NECHO, NECHOH, NECCO (nē'kō, Heb. par'ōh nekhōh or nechoh), ruler of Egypt (609-595 B.C.), son of Psamtik I, famous in Greek history. Necho began his rule at a propitious time. The Assyrian Empire was falling and the Neo-Babylonian Empire was emerging. He thus was able to gain control over Syria until his humiliating defeat at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar at the battle of Carchemish. Of particular interest to the reader of the Bible is Josiah's defeat by Necho at the battle of Megiddo (II Kings 23:29; II Chron. 35:20ff). When Josiah died, Jehoahaz was made king, but Necho dethroned him and set up in his stead his brother, Jehoiakim (II Kings 23:29-34; II Chron. 35:20-36:4). In 605 B.C. he was badly defeated by Nebuchadnezzar at the battle of Carchemish, and lost all of his Asiatic possessions (II Kings 24:7).

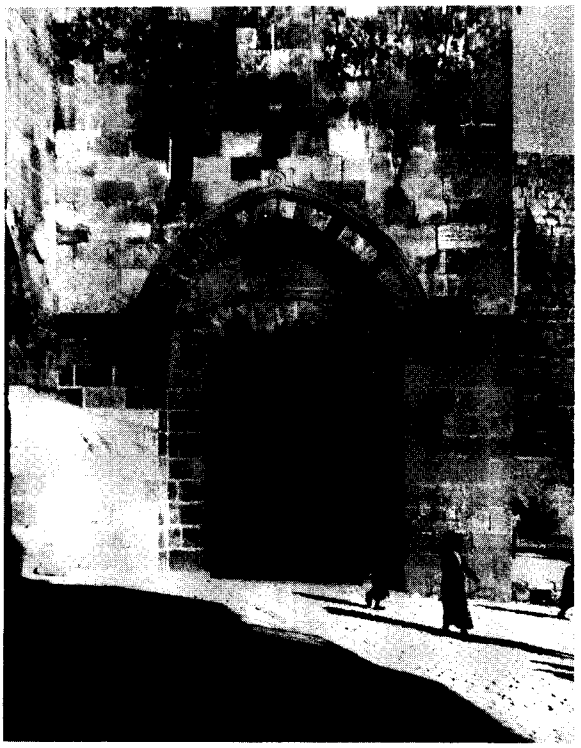
NECK (Heb. tsawwār, tsawwā'râh, Gr. nótos), a term often used in Scripture with literal and figurative meanings. The bowed neck is often used as a symbol of submission, while the unbowed or "stiff neck" represents insubordination and disobedience (Exod. 32:9; Deut. 9:13; Ps. 75:5; Ezek. 2:4; Acts 7:51). It was a military custom for the conqueror to place his foot upon the neck of the vanquished (Josh. 10:24; Ps. 110:1; Rom. 16:20). "To shake off" or "to break the yoke" signifies to gain freedom. "To fall upon the neck" of a person is a common mode of salutation in the East and sometimes portrays great emotional stress (Luke 15:20; Acts 20:37; Gen. 46:29).

NECKLACE (Heb. rāvîdh), a chain worn as an ornament around the neck, and to which might be attached pendants (Isa. 3:19) or rings (Gen. 38: 25). The word is not found in the KJV, but such ornaments were very popular in ancient times.

NECROMANCER, NECROMANCY (nĕk'rō-măn-sĕr, nĕk'rō-măn-sē). Necromancy was a form of witchcraft, and was considered as one of the "black" or diabolical arts. Etymologically, the term signifies conversing with the dead for purposes of consultation or divination. The Mosaic law sternly forbade such a practice (Deut. 18: 10,11). The most familiar case in the Bible is that of King Saul and the witch of Endor (I Sam. 28: 7-25). There are several quite legitimate interpretations of this admittedly difficult passage; perhaps the most feasible view is that God for His own purpose allowed Saul to converse with the deceased Samuel. See especially vs. 12 of this account.

NEDABAIAH (nĕd'ă-bī'ă), a descendant of King David (I Chron. 3:18).

NEEDLE'S EYE (Gr. raphís), found only in Christ's statement, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. 19:24; Mark 10: 25; Luke 18:25). Jesus probably intended to teach that it is utterly absurd for a man bound up in his riches to expect to enter the kingdom of God. There is a rabbinical parallel, "an elephant through a needle's eye."



The Jaffa Gate in the wall of Jerusalem, showing the "Needle's Eye." Small doors such as this were common features of the gates of ancient cities; humans could pass through easily, but large animals, such as camels, had to be unloaded and kneel to get through, even then with difficulty. © MPS

NEEDLEWORK (Heb. riqmâh, embroidery), the art of working in with the needle various kinds of colored threads in cloth. The coverings of the ancient tabernacle in the wilderness were so embroidered. In Deborah's song, Sisera's mother imagines that he is collecting embroidered garments to bestow upon his ladies in waiting (Judg. 5:30). The king's daughter is regarded as clothed in clothing which has been embroidered (Ps. 45:14).

NEESING (nē'zĭng, Heb. 'ăṭishâh, to sneeze or snort). In Job 41:18 the crocodile is described as "neesing." This is Elizabethan English for "sneezing" or "snorting." It is hard to tell which the KJV translators intended here.

NEGEB (nĕg'ĕb, Heb. neghev, dry), the desert region lying to the south of Judea, and hence the term has acquired the double meaning of the "South," because of its direction from Judah or the "desert" because of its aridity. It came to refer to a definite geographical region, as when we read concerning Abraham that he journeyed from the South to Bethel (Gen. 13:1). Numbers 13:22 represents the 12 spies as spying out the land by way of the South. The Negeb is the probable site of Debir, a city of Judah c. 12 miles SW of Hebron.

The physical characteristics of the Negeb are that of rolling hills which abruptly terminate in the desert region. It is bounded on the E by the Dead Sea; on the W by the Mediterranean Sea. It is a land where the water supply is scarce, because of a very meager amount of rainfall in the summer months. At other seasons of the year, however, it is used by the nomads for pasturage. In this territory Hagar encountered the angel when she fled from the face of her mistress, Sarah (Gen. 16:7, 14). Here both Isaac and Jacob dwelt (Gen. 24:62; 37:1). This territory was part of the original territory of the Amalekites (Num. 13:29). On the basis of Joshua 19:1-9, the Negeb was allotted to the tribe of Simeon. However, in Joshua 15:20-31, it was given to the tribe of Judah. Many of David's exploits are described as happening in the Negeb, centering around Ziklag (I Sam. 27:5f). After Nebuchadnezzar sacked Jerusalem in 586-585 B.C., a group of Jews retreated to the Negeb, where they were harassed by the Edomites who sided with the Babylonians. Judas Maccabaeus expelled the Edomites in 164 B.C. John Hycranus compelled them to become Jews in 109 B.C.

NEGINAH (See Music)

NEHELAMITE (nē-hĕl'ă-mīt, Heb. hanehĕlāmî). Shemaiah, a false prophet, an adversary of Jeremiah, is styled a Nehelamite (Jer. 29:24,31,32). The place name Nehelam is not found in the OT.

NEHEMIAH (nē'hĕ-mī'ă, Heb. nehemyâh, Jehovah has comforted). 1. One of the leaders of the return under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

2. The son of Azbuk, a prince of Beth-zur who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:16).

3. The son of Hachaliah and governor of the Persian province of Judah after 444 B.C. Of Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah little is known aside from what is in the book that bears his name. His times, however, are illuminated by the rather considerable material found in the Elephantine Papyri from Egypt which were written in the fifth century B.C. These papyri come from a military colony of Jews residing on an island up the Nile and are written in Hebrew. They include copies of letters to and from Jerusalem and Samaria. They name several men who are also mentioned in the book of Nehemiah.

Nehemiah was a "cupbearer" to King Artaxerxes (Neh. 1:11; 2:1). Inasmuch as some of the Elephantine papyri which are contemporary with Nehemiah are dated, we know that this Artaxerxes must be the first, called Longimanus, who ruled in 465-423 B.C. The title "cupbearer" clearly indicates a responsible office — not merely a domestic servant — for the king speaks to Nehemiah as an intimate and also indicates that he regards Nehemiah's journey to Jerusalem only as a kind of vacation from official duties (2:4). Furthermore, the credentials given Nehemiah by the king and also the office of governor entrusted to him shows that the king looked upon him as a man of ability. That a captive Jew should attain to such an office need not surprise us when we remember the examples of Daniel, Esther, and others. Indeed some ancient courts made it a practice to train captive noble youths for service in the government (Dan. 1:4,5).

Nehemiah was an officer of the palace at Susa, but his heart was in Jerusalem. Word came to him from Hanani, one of his brothers, of the ruined condition of Jerusalem. Smitten with grief, Nehemiah sought the refuge of God's people — prayer — and God answered abundantly.

Hanani is called Nehemiah's brother in 1:2. In 7:2 a Hanani and Hananiah are both mentioned. It is possible that this verse means to equate the two forms of the name Hanani, calling Nehemiah's brother ruler of the palace at Jerusalem. It has been suggested that this Hanani is the same man mentioned in the Elephantine Papyri as an official who seems to have come into Egypt on a government mission. On one such trip Hanani learned about the sad state of affairs in Jerusalem and told Nehemiah (C. G. Tuland, Hanani-Hananiah, JBL, LXXVII, 157-161).

Only about 12 years earlier, in Artaxerxes' seventh year (457 B.C.), Ezra had gone back to Jerusalem with about 1,750 men, plus women and children (Ezra 8:1-20) and treasure worth a king's ransom (Ezra 8:26,27). But, if we refer Ezra 4:6-23 to the days of Ezra himself, it appears that his adversaries had persuaded the king to stop Ezra's efforts at rebuilding. The city, therefore, lay unrepaired, needing a new decree from the king. This permission Nehemiah providentially secured, thanks to his position at the court. Nehemiah therefore appeared at Jerusalem with a royal commission to continue the work that Ezra had begun.

Nehemiah was a man of ability, courage, and action. Arriving at Jerusalem, he first privately surveyed the scene of rubble (2:1-16), and encouraged the rulers at Jerusalem with his report of answered prayer and the granting of the king's new decree (2:18). Then he organized the community to carry out the effort of rebuilding the broken-down wall. Courageously and squarely he met the opposition of men like Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem (who are all now known from non-Biblical documents) and at last he saw the wall completed in the brief span of 52 days (6:15).

Nehemiah cooperated with Ezra in numerous reforms and especially in the public instruction in the law (chapter 8). However, he left for Persia, probably on official business, in 431 B.C. (13:6). Later he returned to Jerusalem, but for how long we do not know. Of the end of his life we know nothing. The Elephantine papyri indicate that a different man, Bagohi, was governor by 407 B.C. R.L.H.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF. The Book of Nehemiah closes the history of the Biblical period. Closely allied to the Book of Ezra, it was attached to it in the old Jewish reckoning. It gives the history and reforms of Nehemiah the governor from 444 to about 420 B.C.

Outline:

I. Nehemiah returns to Jerusalem, 1:1 — 2:20.
II. Building despite opposition, 3:1 — 7:4.
III. Genealogy of the first returning exiles, 7:5-73 (= Ezra 2:2-70).
IV. The revival and covenant sealing, 8:1 — 10:39.
V. Dwellers at Jerusalem and genealogies, 11:1-12:26.
VI. Dedication of the walls, 12:27-47.
VII. Final reforms, 13:1-31.

Nehemiah's great work of restoring the wall of Jerusalem depended basically on securing permission from the king. Ezra had returned to Jerusalem with a sizable group of people and much gold and silver only a dozen years previously (see art. Nehemiah), but had been hindered in his work by adverse royal decrees secured by his adversaries. In God's providence, Nehemiah secured the return of royal favor.

The actual building of the wall was parceled out among different leaders. Various cities of the province of Judea gave contingents of workers and we can here learn something of the extent of Nehemiah's domain. The rapidity of building may have been due to preliminary work that Ezra might have accomplished. Most of the gates and sections of chapter 3 cannot be identified with assurance. Perhaps the wall enclosed only the eastern hill of Jerusalem.

The opposition to Nehemiah by Sanballat and others combined ridicule, threat, and craft. Sanballat is called the governor of Samaria in the Elephantine Papyri. He was apparently not anxious to see a rival province strengthened and there was religious antagonism as well to Nehemiah's strict reform program.

Internal difficulties also developed. The rich charged interest of one per cent (per month, apparently, 5:10) whereas the Mosaic law required outright charity to the poor. But against all opposition the wall was built by men who used both sword and trowel in the work of the Lord.

The genealogy of Nehemiah 7 is of interest, being a duplicate of that appearing in Ezra 2. There are unimportant differences between the lists such as is to be expected in the copying of detailed data like this. It is instructive to note that the record of Zerubbabel's returnees which Nehemiah used was a written record — not preserved by oral tradition as many have suggested was the method used for the passing on of Israel's histories.

Nehemiah's reform involved the teaching of Moses' law by Ezra and others at the feast of tabernacles (as commanded in Deut. 31:10). This led to the great prayer of confession of Nehemiah 9, redolent with quotations from and allusions to the Pentateuch. A covenant was solemnly sealed to walk in the law of the Lord as given by Moses (10:29).

Nehemiah's final reform included the removal of Tobiah from the temple precincts. Tobiah had entered through friendship with Eliashib the high priest while Nehemiah was back in Persia. Also a grandson of Eliashib had married Sanballat's daughter (13:28)! Evidently Eliashib was followed by his son Johanan in the reign of Darius II (423-404). This Johanan is mentioned in the Elephantine papyri as high priest in Jerusalem. His mention would indicate that Nehemiah's history continues till at least 423 B.C. R.L.H.

NEHILOTH (nē'hĭ-lŏth), a musical term found in the title to the fifth Psalm. May mean "wind instrument."

NEHUM (nē'hŭm, Heb. nehûm), one of the 12 heads of Judah returning with Zerubbabel, also called Rehum (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

NEHUSHTA (nē-hŭsh'tà, Heb. nehushtā'), the mother of King Jehoiachin of Judah. She was the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem (II Kings 24:8). She was exiled with her son to Babylon (II Kings 24:12; Jer. 29:2).

NEHUSHTAN (nē-hŭsh'tăn, Heb. nehushtān, perhaps brass serpent), the name given to the serpent of brass surviving from the times of Moses, but destroyed by Hezekiah during his reforms because the Israelites had been making it an object of worship (II Kings 18:4).

NEIEL (nē-ī'ĕl), a boundary town between Zebulun and Asher (Josh. 19:27), may be the same as Neah (vs. 13).

NEIGHBOR (Heb. rēa', 'āmîth, friend, qārôv, shākhēn, Gr. plesíon, near-by, geíton, inhabitant). The duties and responsibilites of a man towards his neighbor are varied. In the OT, injunctions are given more in the negative than in the positive. The tenth commandment is directed towards the protection of the neighbor's property (Exod. 20:17); the commandment immediately preceding, towards the protection of a neighbor's reputation (vs. 16). Cities of refuge were appointed for him who killed his neighbor accidentally (Deut. 19:4). The book of Proverbs is replete with admonitions concerning one's neighbor of which the following may be regarded as the epitome: "He that despiseth his neighbor sinneth" (Prov. 14:21). Due regard for one's neighbor is expressed in the great OT and NT precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev. 19:18c; Matt. 19:19). The parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30-37) was given in answer to the question, "Who is my neighbor?" (vs. 29).

NEKEB (nē'kĕb, Heb. neqev), a town on the NW border of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33). Its site is uncertain.

NEKODA (nē-kō'dà), the head of a family of Nethinim who could not prove their Israelitish descent at the return from Babylon (Neh. 7:50,62; Ezra. 2:60).

NEMUEL (nĕm'ū-ĕl, Heb. nemû'ēl). 1. A Reubenite, brother of Dathan and Abiram who led the insurrection against Moses and Aaron (Num. 26:9).

2. A son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Num. 26:12; I Chron. 4:24), where variant "Jemuel" is used.

NEPHEG (nē'fĕg, Heb. nephegh, sprout, shoot). 1. Son of Izhar, brother of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Exod. 6:21).

2. A son of David (II Sam. 5:15; I Chron. 3:7; 14:6).

NEPHEW (Heb. nekēdh, Gr. ékgonon), a term found in the KJV four times, meaning grandson

(Judg. 12:14), descendant (Job 18:19; Isa. 14:22), grandchild (I Tim. 5:4).

NEPHILIM (nĕf'ĭ-lĭm, Heb. nephilim), a term rendered "giants" in the KJV, describing certain of the antediluvians (Gen. 6:4) and aboriginal dwellers in Canaan (Num. 13:32,33), where they are identified with the Sons of Anak. Though no direct trace of a people of such abnormal stature has been discovered, there is ample evidence as to the underlying tradition. One should reject the view that they were angelic fallen beings (Deut. 1:28).

NEPHISH (See Naphish)

NEPHISHESIM (nē-fĭsh'ĕ-sĭm), a family of Nethinim (temple servants), perhaps originally from the tribe Naphish (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52).

NEPHTHALIM (See Naphtali)

NEPHTOAH (nĕf-tō'a, Heb. nephtôah, an opening), a spring between Judah's and Benjamin's border (Josh. 15:9; 18:15). Identified as modern Lifta, a village two miles NW of Jerusalem.

NEPHUSIM (nĕ-fū'sĭm), a variant reading of Nephishesim, the head of a family of the Nethinim who returned from exile (Ezra. 2:50).

NER (nûr, Heb. nēr, a lamp). 1. Father of Abner (I Sam. 14:50; 26:14).

2. The grandfather of King Saul (I Chron. 8:33. See II Sam. 8:12; I Kings 2:5,32).

NEREUS (nē'rūs, Gr. Nereús), a Roman Christian to whom the Apostle Paul extended greetings (Rom. 16:15). The name has been discovered on an inscription containing a listing of the emperor's servants. Whether this is the same Nereus is uncertain.

NERGAL (nār'gal, Heb. nereghal), a Babylonian deity of destruction and disaster, associated with the planet Mars (II Kings 17:30).

NERGAL-SHAREZER (nār'găl-shà-rē'zêr, Assyr. nerghal sar-usar, may Nergal protect the prince), the son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar. Amil-Marduk, who succeeded Nebuchadnezzar as king, was assassinated by Nergal-Sharezer, who thereupon became king (Jer. 39:3-13).

NERI (nē'rī, Gr. Neri), a name listed in the ancestry of Jesus Christ, the grandfather of Zerubbabel (Luke 3:27). See NERIAH.

NERIAH (nē-rī'a, Heb. nērîyâh, whose lamp is Jehovah), the father of Seraiah and Baruch, the latter being the scribe of Jeremiah (Jer. 32:12,16, 36:4; 43:3). In Baruch 1:1, the Gr. form is given, Nerias, which Luke uses in abbreviated fashion as Neri (Luke 3:27).

NERIGLISSAR (See Nergal-Sharezer)

NERO (nē'rō, Gr. Néron), the fifth Roman emperor, born A.D. 37, commenced reign 54, died June 9th, 68. The original family name of Nero was Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, but after he was adopted into the Claudian gens by the Emperor Claudius, he assumed the name of Nero Claudius Caesar Germanicus. Nero's father was Enaeus Domitus Ahenobarbus, a man given to viciousness and vice. His mother was Agrippina, who cared little for her son's morals but was interested only in his temporal advancement.

The first years of Nero's reign were quite pacific and gave promise of good things to come. Nero himself could boast that not a single person had been unjustly executed throughout his extensive empire. During these "rational years" of Nero's administration, the Apostle Paul was brought before him as the regnant Caesar in compliance with his own expressed appeal (Acts 25:10,11) c. A.D. 63. We can hardly do otherwise than infer that Paul was freed of all charges to continue his labors of evangelization.

The Emperor Nero.

Nero's marriage to Poppaea opened the second period of his reign. He killed his mother, his chief advisers Seneca and Burrus, and many of the nobility to secure their fortunes.

In A.D. 64 a large part of Rome was destroyed by fire. Whether or not Nero actually ordered the burning of the city is very controversial. However, justly or not, the finger of suspicion was pointed in Nero's direction. A scapegoat was provided in the Christians. Tacitus, who certainly cannot be accused of being called a Christian, bears testimony as to the severity of the sufferings inflicted upon them. "Their death was made a matter of sport; they were covered in wild beast's skins and torn to pieces by dogs; or were fastened to crosses and set on fire in order to serve as torches by night . . Nero had offered his gardens for the spectacle and gave an exhibition in his circus, mingling with the crowd in the guise of a charioteer or mounted on his chariot. Hence, . . . there arose a feeling of pity, because it was felt that they were being sacrificed not for the common good, but to gratify the savagery of one man" (Tacitus, Annals XV, 44).

Nero's private life was a scandal. Surrendering himself to the basest of appetites, he indulged himself in the most evil forms of pleasure. Conspiracies and plots dogged the latter years of Nero. He was advised to destroy himself, but could not find the courage to do so. Learning that the Senate had decreed his death, his last cruel act was to put many of them to death. He finally died by his own hand in the summer of 68. Thus perished the last of the line of Julius Caesar. Both Paul and Peter suffered martyrdom under Nero. J.F.G.

NEST (Heb. qēn, Gr. nossiá or kataskénosis). The nests of birds differ from species to species (Job 39:27; Jer. 49:16; Ps. 104:7). The first occurrence of the word nest in the Bible is in the parable of the prophet Balaam (Num. 24:21). In Deuteronomy 22:6, the law forbids one who happens to find a bird's nest with the mother and her brood from harming the mother bird. Among Semite people in general, it is viewed with extreme disfavor for anyone willfully to disturb a bird in the nest. Isaiah compares the despoiling of Israel by the Assyrians to the robbing of a bird's nest (Isa. 10:14; Matt. 8:20; Luke 9:58).

NETHANEEL (nē-thăn'ē-ĕl, Heb. nethan'ēl, God has given), the name of ten OT men: 1. The prince of Issachar just after the Exodus (Num. 1:8; 2:5, in ASV "Nethanel").

2. Son of Jesse and older brother of David (I Chron. 2:14).

3. One of the priests who played trumpets before the ark (I Chron. 15:24).

4. A Levitical scribe whose son Shemaiah was a recorder under David (I Chron. 24:6).

5. Fifth son of Obed-edom, appointed as one of the doorkeepers of the Tabernacle (1 Chron. 26:4).

6. A prince of Judah whom Jehoshaphat appointed to teach in Israel (II Chron. 17:7).

7. A wealthy Levite in Josiah's time (II Chron. 35:9).

8. A priest in Ezra's time who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:22).

9. A priest and head of a household in the days of Joiakim c. 470 B.C. (Neh. 12:21).

10. A priestly musician in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:36). Nathaniel of Cana of Galilee in the days of Jesus (John 1:45-49) had the same name, though in the Greek it is slightly changed.

NETHANIAH (nĕth'ă-nī'a, Heb. nethanyāhû, whom Jehovah gave). 1. Father of Ishmael the assassin (Jer. 40:8-41:18).

2. A chief singer (I Chron. 25:2,12).

3. A teaching Levite (II Chron. 17:8).

4. Father of Jehudi whom the princes sent to Baruch for Jeremiah's book (Jer. 36:14).

NETHINIM (nĕth'ī-nĭm, Heb. nethînîm, given ones), a large group of temple servants, mentioned only in the later records of the OT. In a sense, all the Levites were "Nethinim" (Num. 8:19), for they were given by the Lord as a gift to Aaron and his sons for the divine service. At the conquest of Midian (Num. 31) the prey was divided between the warriors and the congregation and a fixed proportion was "given" for the Lord's service (vss. 40,42,47) of which 32 were "Nethinim" to the priests and 320 to the Levites in general. Later, when the men of Gibeon deceived Israel by claiming to have come a great distance (Josh. 9) they were allowed to live but were made "hewers of wood and drawers of water." The 392 descendants of these two groups, called "Nethinim" only in I Chronicles 9:2 and in Ezra and Nehemiah, came back with Israel after the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 2:43-58). At Ezra's return he lists 220 Nethinim (Ezra 8:20) and explains that David had appointed these for the service of the Levites.

NETOPHAH, NETOPHATHITES (nē-tō'fà, nē-tō'fa-thīt), a village of Judah and the inhabitants thereof. It lies about three miles S of Jerusalem and 3½ miles S of Bethlehem. The "villages of the Netophathites" (I Chron. 9:16, Neh. 12:28) were apparently given to, or inhabited by Levites, although Netophah is not mentioned in the earlier books. Several of David's men are named as from this place (II Sam. 23:28,29; I Chron. 2:54). Seraiah, the son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, is mentioned (II Kings 25:23) among the slayers of Gedaliah, the governor.

NETTLE (See Plants)

NETWORK represents three distinct words in the Hebrew: 1. "Networks" (Isa. 19:9 KJV) is "white cloth," probably white linen as in ASV. 2. An ornamental carving or bas-relief upon the pillars of Solomon's temple (I Kings 7:18-42). 3. A Network of brass which served as a grate for the great altar of burnt-offerings at the tabernacle (Exod. 27:4, 38:4).

NEW BIRTH, the beginning of spiritual life in a believer (John 3:3,5,6; II Cor. 5:17; I Pet. 1:23). See REGENERATION.

NEW MOON (See Calendar, Feasts)

NEW TESTAMENT, a collection of 27 documents, the second part of the sacred Scriptures of the Christian Church, the first part being called by contrast the "Old Testament." In the name "New Testament," apparently first given to the collection in the second half of the second century, the word "testament" represents Greek diathéke, variously translated "testament," "settlement," "covenant," the last of these being on the whole the most satisfactory equivalent. The new covenant is the new order or dispensation inaugurated by the death of Jesus (compare His own reference to "the new covenant in my blood" in I Cor. 11:25); it was so called as fulfilling the promise made by God to His people in Jeremiah 31:31ff that He would "make a new covenant" with them whereby the desire and power to do His will would be implanted within them and all their past sins would be wiped out (cf. Heb. 8:6ff). By contrast with this covenant the earlier covenant established by God with Israel in Moses' day came to be known as the "old covenant" (cf. Heb. 8:13). The foundation documents of the new covenant inaugurated by Jesus are accordingly known as "the books of the new covenant (or testament)," the earlier Scriptures, which trace the history of the old dispensation, being known as "the books of the old covenant (or testament)" from the time of Melito of Sardis (A.D. 170) onwards ("the reading of the old covenant" in II Cor. 3:14 refers not to the sum-total of OT scripture but rather to the Mosaic law which formed the basis of that covenant).

Contents. In speaking of the books of the NT we must be clear whether we refer to the individual documents, or to the whole collection as such. The individual documents naturally existed before the collection, and some of them were grouped in smaller collections before they were ultimately gathered together in the NT collection. All, or nearly all, the individual documents belong to the first century A.D.; the NT as a collection made its appearance in the second century.

The order in which the 27 documents appear in our present-day NT is an order of subject-matter rather than a chronological order. First come the four Gospels—or rather the four records of the one and only Gospel — which narrate Jesus' ministry, death and resurrection. These are followed by the Acts of the Apostles, which takes up the Gospel story with Jesus' resurrection and shows how, over the next 30 years, Christianity spread along the road from Jerusalem to Rome. This book was originally written as the continuation of one of the four Gospels — Luke's. These five constitute the narrative section of the NT.

The next 21 documents take the form of letters written to communities or individuals. Of these 13 bear the name of Paul as writer, two the name of Peter, one of James, one of Jude (Judas). The others are anonymous. One of these, the Epistle to the Hebrews, is more properly described as a homily with an epistolary ending; its authorship remains a matter of guesswork to this day. The three which we know as the Epistles of John are so called not because they bear John's name but because from early times they have been closely associated with the Fourth Gospel (which, though itself anonymous, has from the first been known as John's). The first epistle is rather an exhortation in which the writer impresses on his readers the practical implications of some of the leading themes of John's Gospel. In II and III John the writer refers to himself as "the elder."

The last book of the NT bears some features of the epistolary style, in that it is introduced by seven covering letters, addressed to seven churches in the Roman province of Asia; but for the most part it belongs to the class of literature called "apocalyptic," in which the outworking of God's purpose on earth is presented in the form of symbolical visions. Written probably when the Flavian dynasty ruled the Roman Empire (A.D. 69-96), its aim is to encourage the persecuted churches with the assurance that they are on the winning side; that Jesus, and not the Roman emperor, has won the victory which entitles Him to exercise sovereignty over the world and to control its destiny.

Order of Writing. While the four Gospels deal with events of the first 30 years of the Christian era, and the epistles belong to the remaining two-thirds of the first century, several of the epistles were in existence before even the earliest of the Gospels. With the possible exception of the Epistle of James, the earliest NT documents are those epistles which Paul wrote before his two years' detention in Rome (A.D. 60-62). This means that when one of the earlier Pauline epistles mentions an action or saying of Jesus, that mention is our earliest written account of it; thus, Paul's account of the institution of the Holy Communion (I Cor. 11:23ff) is earlier by some years than the account of it given in our oldest Gospel (Mark 14:22ff).

Jesus Himself wrote no book, but He gave His teaching to His disciples in a form which could be easily memorized, and enjoined them to teach others what they had learned from Him. And there is good reason to believe that one of the earliest Christian writings was a compilation of His teaching, arranged according to the chief subjects of which He treated, although this document has not been preserved in its original form but has been incorporated in some of the existing NT books.

The necessity for a written account of the story of Jesus was not felt acutely in the earlier years of the Christian mission. In those years, when there were so many eyewitnesses of the saving events who could testify to what they had seen and heard, their testimony was regarded as sufficient, and the Gospel story circulated far and wide by word of mouth. But even in those early years the necessity might and did arise for an apostle to give instruction in writing to people from whom he was separated at the time. For example, when Paul, during his missionary activity in Ephesus and the surrounding district, heard disturbing news of the state of affairs in the church which he had founded three or four years previously in Corinth, he was unable just then to visit Corinth in person, but sent his converts there a letter conveying much the same message as he would have given them orally had he been with them. Again, a few years later, during a brief stay in Corinth, he proposed to visit Rome in the near future, and thought it wise to prepare the Christians of that city, where he had never been before, for his coming; so he sent them a letter, in which he took the opportunity of making a full-length statement of the Gospel as he understood and preached it. In such "occasional" circumstances the NT epistles were first written. Yet the apostles were conscious that they expressed the mind of Christ, under the guidance of His Spirit, and so their letters are full of teaching, imparted to their first readers by apostolic authority, which retains its validity to the present time, and has by divine providence been preserved for our instruction.

The Gospels began to appear about the end of the first generation after the death and resurrection of Jesus. By that time the eyewitnesses were beginning to be removed by death, and the time must come when none of them would be left. It was desirable, therefore, that their testimony should be placed on permanent record so that those who survived them would not be at a disadvantage as compared with first-generation Christians. Around A.D. 60, then, we find Gospel writing first undertaken. Mark provides the Roman church with an account of Jesus' ministry, from His baptism to His resurrection, which we are told was based in large measure on the preaching of Peter. In the following years Matthew provides the churches of Syria and the neighborhood with an expanded account of the story of Jesus, in which His teaching is presented in systematic form; and Luke, Paul's companion and "beloved physician," having traced the course of events accurately from the beginning, sets himself to supply the "most excellent Theophilus" with an ordered narrative of Christian origins which not only relates "all that Jesus began both to do and to teach until the day in which he was received up" (Acts 1:1,2), but goes on to tell what He continued to do after He was received up, working by His Spirit in His apostles. Then, towards the end of the century, John retells the same story in such a way as to bring out its abiding and universal significance, so that his readers may apprehend the glory of Jesus as the Word became flesh, and by believing in Him may have life in His name. These four records are not biographies in the ordinary sense of the term; they are concerned rather to convey the apostolic witness to Jesus as Son of God and Saviour of the world.

The Gospel and Pauline Collections. For some time these four evangelic records circulated independently and locally, being valued, no doubt, by those for whom they were primarily written. But by the beginning of the second century they were gathered together and began to circulate as a fourfold Gospel-record throughout the Christian world. When this happened, Acts was detached from Luke's Gospel, to which it formed the sequel, and commenced a separate, but not insignificant, career of its own.

Paul's letters were preserved at first by the churches or individuals to whom they were sent; at least all that have come down to us were so preserved, for here and there in his surviving correspondence we find reference to a letter which was probably lost at a very early date (cf. I Cor. 5:9; Col. 4:16). But by the last decade of the first century there is evidence of a move to collect his available epistles and circulate them as a collection among the churches. Thus Clement of Rome, writing as secretary of his church to the church of Corinth about A.D. 95, can quote freely not only from Paul's Epistle to the Romans (which would naturally be available to him) but also from I Corinthians and possibly from one or two of his other epistles. What provided the stimulus for this move to collect Paul's letters, or who began to collect them, we can only speculate. Paul himself had encouraged some interchange of his letters (cf. Col. 4:16), and one or two of them were probably from the start general or circular letters, not intended for one single group of recipients.

By the early years of the second century, at any rate, a Pauline collection was in circulation — first a shorter collection of ten epistles, and then a larger collection of 13 (expanded by the inclusion of the three "Pastoral Epistles," those addressed to Timothy and Titus).

From the earliest days of such collections, the Pauline epistles appear to have been arranged mainly in descending order of length. That principle is still apparent in the arrangement most familiar today: Paul's letters to churches come before his letters to individuals, but within these two groups the letters are arranged so that the longest comes first and the shortest last. (One departure from the rule is that Galatians, which is slightly shorter than Ephesians, nevertheless precedes it, and has done so since the second century; certain theories have been propounded to explain this, bound up with the original purpose of Ephesians and Marcion's preference for Galatians.)

Canon of the New Testament. The circulation of two collections — the fourfold Gospel and the Pauline corpus — did not constitute a NT, but it represents a stage towards that goal. About A.D. 140 the Gnostic, Valentinus, according to Tertullian, accepted practically the whole NT as it was accepted later in the second century. It is not certain, however, whether Valentinus accepted the NT as a closed canon, or simply quoted as authoritative most of the documents which Tertullian acknowledged as making up the NT.

What chiefly stimulated the Church to define the NT limits more precisely was not the activity of the main Gnostic groups, but of Marcion. Marcion came to Rome about A.D. 140 from Asia Minor, where he had tried unsuccessfully to press his views on the church leaders. He rejected the OT completely, as revealing a different God from the God whom Jesus revealed as Father, and held that most of the writings which the Church accepted as authoritative were corrupted by Judaizers. He proposed a Christian canon comprising (1) "The Gospel" (an edition of Luke's Gospel edited in accordance with his own viewpoint) and (2) "The Apostle" (ten epistles of Paul, excluding the Pastorals, similarly edited). Paul, in Marcion's eyes, was the only faithful apostle of Christ, all the others having Judaized; but even Paul's letters had been corrupted by Judaizers and required editing.

The publication of Marcion's canon — very much a closed list — was a challenge to the orthodox leaders. If they refused his canon, it was incumbent on them to define the canon which they accepted. They replied to his challenge by saying, in effect, that they did not reject the OT writings; they accepted them as Holy Scripture, following the example of Christ and the apostles. Along with them they accepted the NT writings — not one Gospel only, but four (one of the four being the authentic text of the Gospel which Marcion issued in a mutilated form); not ten epistles only of Paul, but 13; not epistles of Paul only, but of other apostolic men as well. They also accepted the Acts of the Apostles, and appreciated more than ever its crucial importance as the pivot of the NT. Acts links the fourfold Gospel with the apostolic writings because it provides the sequel to the former and the historical background to much of the latter. Moreover, it provides irrefutable evidence of the genuineness of Paul's apostleship. Tertullian and others were not slow to expose the folly of the Marcionites who asserted the exclusive apostleship of Paul while rejecting the one book which supplied independent testimony to his apostleship. Of course they had no alternative but to reject it, as it bore witness at the same time to the apostleship of Peter and others, whom the Marcionites repudiated. But the very fact that Acts attested the apostleship both of Paul and of Peter and his colleagues gave it all the greater value in the eyes of orthodox churchmen. From this time it came to be called "The Acts of the Apostles"; indeed one zealously anti-Marcionite document, the Muratorian list (c. A.D. 200), goes so far as to call it "The Acts of all the Apostles." That was a great exaggeration, but Acts does at least record something about most of the apostles or apostolic men to whom are ascribed the epistles which the orthodox churchmen accepted as authoritative.

Thus, from the second half of the second century onwards, the Church acknowledged a NT of the same general dimensions as ours. For a considerable time there was some questioning about a few of the books at the end of our NT, and claims were sometimes made for the recognition of books which did not ultimately retain a place within the collection. But after generations of debate about the few "disputed" books in relation to the majority of "acknowledged" books, we find the 27 documents which make up our New Testament today listed by Athanasius of Alexandria in A.D. 367, and not long afterwards by Jerome and Augustine in the West. These scholars were not imposing decisions of their own, but stating what was generally recognized. It is unhistorical to represent the limits of the NT as being due to the verdict of any church council. When first a church council did make a pronouncement on this subject (A.D. 393), it did no more than record the general consensus of the Church in east and west.

The invention of the codex, or leaf-form of book, made it possible for the NT writings, or indeed the whole Bible, to be bound together in one volume, as had not been possible with the older roll-form of book. The earliest comprehensive codices known to us belong to the fourth century; but already in the third century, and possibly even in the second, it was practicable to collect groups of NT books together in smaller codices. The Chester Beatty Biblical papyri include one codex of the four Gospels and Acts and one of the Pauline epistles and Hebrews.

Authority of the New Testament. The authority of the NT is not based on archaeological evidence or on any other line of comparative study. By such means we can confirm the historical setting of the record in the first Christian century, and provide ourselves with an illuminating commentary on it. The value of this should not be underestimated, but the essential authority of the NT derives from the authority of Christ, whether exercised in His own person or delegated to His apostles. The NT documents are the written deposit of the apostles' witness to Christ and of the teaching which they imparted in His name. When we emerge from the "tunnel" period which separates the apostolic age from the last quarter of the second century, we find the Church still very conscious of apostolic authority. The apostles are no longer there, but the apostolic faith is confessed, the apostolic fellowship is maintained, and apostolic church order is observed. We find, too, that the apostolic writings (whether penned directly by apostles or indirectly by "apostolic men") are available in the NT canon to serve as the Church's rule of faith and order — the criterion by which it may be determined whether doctrine or fellowship or anything else that claims to be apostolic really is so. And from those days to our own, it is the NT that, from time to time, has called Christians back to the ways of apostolic purity, to the truth as it is in Jesus. Reformation is not something that the Church needed once for all, in the 16th century; true "reformation according to the Word of God" is an abiding need of the Church. And where the NT is given its proper place in the Church's faith and life, true reformation goes on continually.

Not only in the works and words of Jesus during His earthly ministry, but in the continuing ministry which He has exercised since His exaltation, does He reveal God to men. Therefore not only the Gospels, which record the revelation given in the days of His flesh, but the other NT books, which record the further outworking of that revelation, are accepted by the Church as her normative foundation documents. The Holy Spirit, who came to make the significance of Jesus plain to His followers and to lead them into all the truth, still performs these services for us; and the NT writings are His primary instrument for their performance. How else could the Spirit take the things of Christ and declare them to us today if these writings were not available as a basis for Him to work on? The Spirit who was imparted in fullness to Jesus and who worked by the apostles is the Spirit under whose direction the Christians of the earliest centuries were enabled to recognize so clearly the documents which bore authoritative witness to Jesus; He is also the Spirit by whose illumination we in our day may appropriate that witness for our own and others' good.

In all this we do not ignore the place of the OT as an integral part of the Christian Scriptures. For the two Testaments are so organically interwoven that the authority of the one carries with it the authority of the other. If the OT records the divine promise, the New records its fulfilment; if the OT tells how the world was prepared over many centuries for the coming of Christ, the New tells how He came and what His coming brought about. If even the OT writings are able to make the reader "wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" and equip him thoroughly for the service of God (II Tim. 3:15-17), how much more is this true of the NT writings! Our Lord's statement of the highest function of the former scriptures applies with at least equal force to those of the NT: "these are they which bear witness of me" (John 5:39).

THEOLOGY, THE NEW. The new (radical) theology is characterized chiefly by a departure from the neo-orthodoxy of Karl Barth and Emil Brunner which has dominated a segment of the theological scene during the past forty years. This article considers briefly three of the main expressions of this radicalism: Paul Tillich, Rudolf Bultmann and some of the proponents of the "God is dead" movement.

Paul Tillich (1886-1965) constructed a philosophical-theological system by accumulating a mass of historical, biographical and speculative data and arranging it by means of his "method of correlation" — philosophy (reason) asks the questions and theology (faith) gives the answers.

As an apologetic, Tillich's system begins with Being. In that no reality is more basic, all meaningful philosophies of life must start here. Being is Unconditional, all other realities are conditioned. Therefore, any statement made concerning Being, other than "God is Being," is symbolic. Symbols, such as the miracles, the Incarnation, the cross or the resurrection, participate in and point to the Unconditional, but in no way define it. To judge otherwise, would be to formulate an autonomous or a conditional god, which is idolatry.

Man is estranged from his ground of being. In Jesus as the Christ, however, he finds his way of salvation. Although existing under the conditions of man, Jesus as the Christ came under the control of His ground of being. Thus His way has become the way for all men. The way is through "ecstasy" — the supreme extension of man's ability to reason without doing violence to his rational powers. Acting concurrently with this (faith) rational exercise of man, is the "reaching down" of the Unconditional or the ground of man's being. Although the experience is always opaque, it is revelatory and satisfying to man's ultimate concern.

History is to be taken seriously, with culture providing the form which religion fills with content. Critical evaluation of the various philosophies and religions is possible by use of the Protestant principle. Positively, this principle constructs a system; negatively, it criticizes all systems including its own construction. In Tillich's judgment this principle will outlive all systems of religion or philosophies of life.

So massive in content and intricate in systemization is Tillich's theology, that all attempts to digest or summarize his thought should be viewed as pointers to rather than expressions of his thinking. A knowledge of his Systematic Theology (3 volumes) is essential for an understanding of his philosophy.

Rudolf Bultmann (1884-) is a German New Testament scholar who has developed a radical method of Biblical interpretation. The historical framework for the life of Jesus as found in the gospel records is the creation of the early church which best expresses her faith. Therefore, in order to find the basic Christian message (Kerygma) the records must be stripped of their historic (?) increments. That is to say, they must be demythologized.

Furthermore, it is not the reality of the experienced object that is important, but rather the immediate experience of consciousness. Consequently, the gospel message has meaning only when it brings meaning as an event to the individual through a decision made in faith. When the Bible speaks in this way, it is kerygma; when it speaks merely as history, it is mythos.

New Testament scholars of a more conservative bent have judged that Bultmann's abandonment of determining the historical Jesus has also disqualified him from formulating a Biblical Christology — a fundamental doctrine with historic Christianity.

Both Tillich and Bultmann contributed to the radical theologians who now constitute the "death of God" movement. However, some of the latter statements of Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906-1945) point more directly to this radical theology.

Bonhoeffer was willing to abandon the definition of God as an individual reality in behalf of God as the ground of all being (Tillich); he also was willing to promote a secular Christianity. This meant the displacement of the old religious symbols (miracles, the cross, etc.) for new, more meaningful ones, understandable to the people outside the church. Furthermore, he believed that God was active in the world (without the help of the Church) and consequently the Church should react to its smallness and move out where the action is.

Bonhoeffer and his disciples have influenced many radical thinkers including: Bishop John A. T. Robinson, (Honest to God); William Hamilton, (The New Essence of Christianity); Paul van Buren, (The Secular Meaning of the Gospel); Harvey Cox, (The Secular City); Thomas J. J. Altizer, (Radical Theology and the Death of God); and Gabriel Vahanian, (The Death of God; The Culture of Our Post-Christian Era).

Basic to the more radical proponents of this movement is their insistence on the renunciation of the Transcendent God plus the Biblical symbols which they contend are no longer meaningful to contemporary man. This transference from an interest in the metaphysical to the pragmatic is interpreted as being expressive of the mature man. Man is reaching the apex of his existence; he no longer needs a god out there!

Although the ground from which this radical theology has sprung is fundamentally that of neo-orthodoxy with its existential, dialectic dimensions, it may be that future critical evaluations of this movement will judge it as basically a revival of the rational liberalism of the pre-Barthian era. Especially is this likely if liberalism is viewed as a mentality rather than a system of doctrine.

NEW YEAR (See Feasts, Feast of Trumpets)

NEZIAH (nē-zī'a, sincere), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56).

NEZIB (nē'zĭb, Heb. netsîv), a village mentioned only in Joshua 15:43, belonging to Judah and lying about 10 miles NW of Hebron. The word means "something set" and thus a "garrison." It retains today its name "Beit Nusib" i.e. "House of the garrison."

NIBHAZ (nĭb'hăz, Heb. nivhaz), a god, whose image in the form of a dog was made and worshiped by the Avites when the Samaritan race was being formed (II Kings 17:31).

NIBSHAN (nĭb'shăn, Heb. nivshān), a town in the S of Judah between Beersheba and the Dead Sea (Josh. 15:62).

NICANOR (nī-kā'nôr, Gr. Nikánor), one of the seven chosen by the church at Jerusalem to administer alms (Acts 6:5).

NICODEMUS (nĭk'ō-dē'mŭs, Gr. Nikódemos, victor over the people), a leading Pharisee, "a ruler of the Jews" and a member of the Sanhedrin. Perhaps from curiosity, and possibly under conviction, but certainly led of God, he came to Jesus by night (John 3:1-14). He must have thought of himself as quite condescending to address Jesus, the young man from Galilee, as "Rabbi," but Jesus, instead of being puffed up by the recognition, quickly put Nicodemus in his place by announcing the necessity of a new birth in order "to see the kingdom of God." Nicodemus did not then understand, but was deeply touched, though he had not yet the courage to stand out for the Lord. Later, when at the Feast of Tabernacles (John 7:25-44) the Jewish leaders were planning to kill Jesus, Nicodemus spoke up, though timidly, in the Sanhedrin, suggesting their injustice in condemning a man without a fair trial. After the death of Jesus, however, Nicodemus came boldly with Joseph of Arimathea (John 19:38-42), provided a rich store of spices for the embalmment, and assisted in the burial of the body. After that he is not mentioned in Scripture.

NICOLAITANS (nĭk'ō-lā'ĭ-tănz, Gr. Nikolaitaí), a group of persons whose works both the church at Ephesus and our Lord hated (Rev. 2:6) and whose doctrine was held by some in the Pergamene church (Rev. 2:15). Nothing else is surely known about them, but some have guessed that they were the followers of Nicolas of Antioch, one of the first so-called "deacons" (Acts 6:5), but there is no evidence for this. Their doctrine was similar to that of Balaam through whose influence the Israelites ate things sacrificed to idols and committed fornication (Rev. 2:14,15). A sect of Nicolaitans existed among the Gnostics in the third century, as is known from church fathers of the time (Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, etc.). It probably had its origin in the group condemned in Revelation.

NICOLAUS, NICOLAS (nĭk'ō-lā'ŭs, nĭk'ō-lăs, Gr. Nikólaos, conqueror of the people), a "proselyte of Antioch" mentioned only in Acts 6:5 whom the church at Jerusalem very early chose to administer alms as one of the seven original "deacons." Being confused with the "Nicolaitans," (q.v.) many writers even in early times have accused him of originating this sect.

NICOPOLIS (nĭ-cŏp'ō-lĭs, Gr. Nikópolis, city of victory), an ancient city of Epirus situated on the Gulf of Actium, and founded by Augustus Caesar to celebrate his decisive victory over Mark Antony, 31 B.C. (In modern terms "on the Gulf of Arta" on the west coast of Greece.) When Paul wrote his epistle to Titus, in the interval between his first and his final imprisonment under Nero at Rome, he had determined to winter there (Titus 3:12).

NIGER (nī'jêr, Gr. Níger, black), a surname of Symeon, one of the five "prophets and teachers" of the church at Antioch who were led of the Lord to send forth Paul and Barnabas on the first missionary journey (Acts 13:1-3). Probably a Hebrew-Christian from North Africa.

NIGHT (See Time)

NIGHT HAWK (See Birds)

NILE (nīl, Gr. Neílos, meaning not certainly known), the main river, not only of Egypt, but of Africa as well, being exceeded in all the earth in length only by the Amazon and the Missouri-Mississippi rivers; and in the extent of the territory which it drains ranking sixth among the river systems of the world. The word "Nile" does not appear in the Heb. OT or in the KJV, strange to say, but in ASV we find it thrice in Isaiah 19:7 where KJV has "brooks." When we find in Scripture the words "the River," we can generally judge by the context whether the Nile, as in Genesis 41:1, or the Euphrates as in 31:21, is intended; though in Psalm 72:8 we may be in doubt. The common Bible name for the Nile is ye'ôr, an Egyptian word meaning "river" and almost always referring to the Nile, except in Daniel 12:5,6,7, where it clearly refers to the Tigris (cf. Dan. 10:4). The word "Shihor" (KJV "Sihor"), with the root meaning of "turbid," means the Nile in Isaiah 23:3; but in Joshua 13:3, I Chronicles 13:5, etc., where it marks the southwestern border of Canaan, it refers to the Wadi el Arish, a little channel that enters the Mediterranean about half way from the present Suez Canal to the southern end of the Dead Sea. The same stream is meant in Genesis 15:18 where we read "the river of Egypt."

The Nile issues forth from Lake Victoria on the Equator and flows northward nearly 2,500 miles to the Mediterranean. Of this, the northernmost 500 miles can be said to be in Egypt, from Assouan northward. The "White" Nile rises as above at the Equator and has a fairly even flow northward till it is joined by the "Blue" Nile at modern Khartoum in the Sudan. This stream and the other affluents which join the Nile from the E, rise in the mountains of Ethiopia and are fed by the torrential rains of the springtime. They fluctuate greatly, and provide the annual inundation which for thousands of years has flooded and fertilized lower Egypt. The ancient mythological belief was that the goddess Isis annually shed a tear into the upper Nile, thus causing the flood which is so great a blessing that Egypt has been called, from the time of Herodotus onward "the Gift of the Nile."

Near the end of June the water at Cairo and onward takes on a greenish tinge and an unpleasant taste, because of the vast multiplication of the algae, then about the beginning of July the life-giving inundation begins so that the delta region is overflowed and the stream deposits the rich gift of sediment brought down from the mountains. During an average year, the vast delta seems almost like a sea with islands protruding here and there. If the inundation is unusually deep, many houses are destroyed and loss ensues, while if it is much below the average level, famine follows. This failure of the inundation for seven successive years (Gen. 41) was used of God to work a great but peaceful revolution in Egypt in which Joseph bought up for the pharaoh practically all private property except that of the priests, and brought the Israelites into Egypt for a stay of several hundred years.

Through Upper Egypt, the Nile flows for many miles through high walls of sand and rock, with the desert encroaching on both sides, so that only by great efforts could the people irrigate a narrow strip of land, but from a point a few miles S of Cairo, the Nile divides, the Delta begins, and Lower Egypt (i.e. Northern Egypt) has long been one of the most fertile regions in the world.

From the days of Abraham, who as Abram, went down into Egypt (Gen. 12:10) till the infancy of our Lord Jesus Christ (Matt. 2:14) Egypt, and therefore the Nile, were well known by Israel and exerted a potent effect upon the civilization of Israel. In describing the Promised Land, Moses (Deut. 11:10-12) emphasized its difference from Egypt "where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot" (i.e. by irrigating furrows manipulated, and then altered from time to time by foot power); and the prosperity or poverty of Egypt at various periods was in proportion to the ingenuity and faithfulness of the people in spreading the water of the Nile upon their plants. The rise and fall of the Nile is very regular, but there have been times (e.g. 1877) when an unusually feeble flood led to widespread famine and many deaths. It was, no doubt, a series of these dry years in the days of Joseph which caused the seven years famine (Gen. 41) and which led, under God, to the descent into Egypt. Hundreds of years later, we find various references to the rivers of Egypt in the prophets: e.g. in Isaiah 7:18 we read that "Jehovah will hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost parts of the rivers of Egypt" and this hints at the prevalance of flies there, and even today the land seems full of them. In Isaiah 19:5 "the water shall fail from the sea, and the river shall be wasted and become dry" — "the sea" is a common title given to the Nile, which during the annual inundation must resemble a sea from parts of the Delta. In Isaiah 19:7 it is said that the meadows by the Nile and the sown fields of the Nile shall become dry and shall be driven away — and this has come to pass literally when the irrigating works have been neglected for a time. Strange to say, KJV renders ye'ôr, which plainly refers to the Nile, by the word "brooks" three times in this verse. A.B.F.

NIMRAH (nĭm'rà, Heb. nimrâh, limpid or flowing water), a city in Gilead, assigned by Moses to the tribe of Gad (Num. 32:3) and cf. vs. 36 where it is called "Beth-nimrah" i.e. "house of limpid water." It lies about ten miles NE of Jericho. In Joshua 13:27 it is described as being "in the valley" and as a part of the former kingdom of Sihon, king of the Amorites whose capital was Heshbon.

NIMRIM (nĭm'rĭm, Heb. nimrîm), a place in Moab noted for its waters (Isa. 15:6; Jer. 48:34). It was probably SE of the Dead Sea.

NIMROD (nĭm'rŏd, Heb. nimrōdh). In the "Table of the Nations" (Gen. 10) many of the names seem to be those of cities, e.g. Sidon (vs. 15), countries, e.g. Canaan (vss. 6,15), or tribes, e.g. "Heth and the Jebusite," etc. (vss. 15-18), but Nimrod stands out clearly as an individual man, and a very interesting character. The beginning of his kingdom was in Babylonia, whence he moved northward and became the founder of Nineveh and other cities in or near Assyria. He became distinguished as a hunter, ruler, and builder. Many legends have grown up around the name of Nimrod, some claiming him to have been identical with "Ninus," an early Babylonian king or god. Again, some have associated Nimrod with the building of the Tower of Babel (Gen. 11:1-9). Others have identified him with the ancient king of Babylonia, Gilgamesh, but there is no proof that the two were identical.

NIMRUD (nĭm'rŭd), ancient Calah in Assyria, founded by Nimrod, and scene of extensive excavations. See CALAH.

NIMSHI (nĭm'shī), the grandfather of Jehu whose coup-d'etat ended the rule of the house of Ahab (II Kings 9:2,14). Elsewhere Jehu is called "son of Nimshi" (I Kings 19:16).

NINEVEH, NINEVE (nĭn'ĕ-vĕ, Heb. nînewēh), one of the most ancient cities of the world, founded by Nimrod (Gen. 10:11,12), a great-grandson of Noah, and enduring till 612 B.C. Nineveh lay on the banks of the Tigris above its confluence with the Greater Zab, one of its chief tributaries, and nearly opposite the site of the modern Mosul in Iraq. It was for many years the capital of the great Assyrian empire, and its fortunes ebbed and flowed with the long strife between Babylonia and Assyria. Of the two kingdoms, or empires, Babylonia was the more cultured but Assyria the more warlike. The kingdom over which Nineveh and its kings long ruled was N of Babylon and more in the hills, and these facts made more for warlikeness than the more sedentary culture of a warmer climate. Babylon was the more important from Abraham's time to David's; then from David's time to that of Hezekiah and Manasseh, Nineveh and its kings were paramount; then from the time of King Josiah and the prophets Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Habakkuk and Daniel, Babylon was again at the head.

Among the great rulers of Assyria might be mentioned Tiglath-pileser I, who made conquests about 1100 B.C., and Ashur-nasirpal and Shalmaneser III, who inaugurated a system of ruthless conquest and deportation of whole populations, which greatly increased the power of Assyria and the influence of Nineveh. It was this latter king (sometimes numbered as II instead of III) who defeated Hazael of Syria and boasted of receiving tribute from Jehu of Israel. The Assyrians, instead of numbering their years, named them from certain rulers; and lists of these "eponyms" have been found, but with a gap of 51 years around the beginning of the eighth century B.C., due, no doubt to some great calamity and/or the weakness of her kings. It was in this space of time that Jonah was sent of the Lord to warn the people of Nineveh, saying "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown" (Jonah 3:4) but God gave Nineveh a respite for nearly 200 years. Esar-haddon, the great king of Assyria from 680-668 B.C., united Babylonia to Assyria and conquered lands as far away as Egypt (Isa. 19:4) and North Arabia. He was succeeded by his greater son Ashur-bani-pal (called by the Greeks "Sardanapalus"), who presided over Assyria in its brief climax of power and culture, but Nabopolassar of Babylon, who reigned from 625 to 605, freed it from Assyria and helped to bring about the destruction of Nineveh in 612 B.C. (Some date this destruction 606 B.C.) About 623 B.C., Cyaxares, king of the Medes, made his first attack on Nineveh, and this was probably the occasion of Nahum's prophecy. (His book is undated, but 3:8 speaks of No-amon in the past tense, and it was destroyed 663 B.C., and of Nineveh's destruction as future, so it must have been written about this time.

For many centuries the very location of Nineveh was forgotten, but it has been discovered and excavated (largely by Botta and Layard from 1843-'45), and among its buried ruins the great palace of Sargon, with its wonderful library of cuneiform inscriptions and its still striking wall ornamentation, has been exhumed. Because the name Sargon was omitted in some of the ancient lists of kings, some of the scholars scoffed (around 1840) at Isaiah 20:1, "when Sargon, king of Assyria sent him," saying in effect, "This is one of the errors of Isaiah, for we know that Sargon never did exist," and it is said that when Botta sent to Berlin some ancient bricks with the name Sargon baked into them, the "scholars" claimed that he forged the bricks! Nahum's reference (2:4) to chariots raging in the streets and rushing to and fro in the broadways of Nineveh does not prophesy automobile traffic, as some have tried to make out, but refers to the broad streets which distinguished Nineveh.

NISAN (See Calendar)

NISROCH (nĭs'rŏk, Heb. nisrōkh), a god who was worshiped at Nineveh. In his temple Sennacherib was slain by his two sons Adrammelech and Sharezer after his return from his disastrous experience near Jerusalem (Isa. 37:36-38 repeated in II Kings 19:35-37). The name is not found elsewhere.

NITER (nī'tĕr, Heb. nether). Not the same as our present niter, but an impure mixture of washing and baking sodas found in deposits around the alkali lakes of Egypt. The references in Scripture are to its fizzing with vinegar and its use in cleansing (Prov. 25:20 "nitre," ASV "soda"). (Jer. 2:22, ASV, "lye").

NO (nō, Heb. nō' 'āmôn, the city of the god Amon), the great city and capital of Upper Egypt, lying on both sides of the Nile at the great semi-circular curve of the river about 400 miles S of Cairo. It was the capital of Egypt as early as the 11th century. Its tremendous ruins at Luxor and Karnak are among the world's wonders. Its fuller name was No-amon (Amon from a local god), but so similar to the Hebrew for "multitude" that the KJV mistranslates it. "The multitude of No" (Jer. 46:25) should be "Amon of No," as in ASV and "populous No" (Nah. 3:8) should be "No-amon." It was known to the classical writers under the name of Thebes. Its site is now occupied by some small villages on both sides of the Nile.

NOADIAH (nō'ă-dī'ă, Heb. nō'adhyâh, with whom Jehovah meets). 1. One of the Levites before whom the gold and silver vessels were weighed on the return to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:33).

2. A false prophetess, associated with Sanballat and Tobiah, who tried to terrorize Nehemiah, and against whom Nehemiah prayed (Neh. 6:14).

NOAH (nō'ă, Heb. nōah, rest). 1. The son of Lamech and tenth in descent from Adam in the line of Seth (Gen. 5:28-29). He received this name because Lamech foresaw that through him God would comfort (Heb. nāham, same root as "Noah") the race and partially alleviate the effects of the Edenic curse. Noah was uniquely righteous (6:8-9; 7:1; Ezek. 14:14) in a totally corrupt age (Gen. 6:1-13). When he was 480 years old, 120 years before the Flood (6:3), he was warned of God that the world would be destroyed by water (Heb. 11:7). He was then given exact instructions for building the Ark (Gen. 6:14-16). While engaged in this colossal task, he warned men of the coming catastrophe, as a "preacher of righteousness" (II Pet. 2:5), while God in longsuffering waited for men to repent (I Pet. 3:20). Noah's three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, were not born until he was 500 years old (Gen. 5:32). One week before the Flood, God led Noah and his family into the Ark, and then, supernaturally directed, the animals "went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life" (7:15). When all were safely inside, God shut the door (7:16).

The Flood came in Noah's 600th year, increased steadily for 40 days, maintained its mountain-covering depth for 110 more days, and then subsided sufficiently for Noah to disembark in the mountains of Ararat after another 221 days (see FLOOD OR DELUGE). During all this time, "God remembered Noah, and every living thing . . . in the ark" (8:1), implying that God did not leave the task of caring for these creatures entirely to Noah. To determine whether it was safe to disembark, Noah sent forth first a raven and then a dove at regular intervals (8:6-10). The freshly-plucked olive leaf proved to him that such sturdy plants had already begun to grow on the mountain heights. God commanded him to disembark, and Noah built an altar and offered clean beasts as burnt-offerings to God. The Lord then promised never to send another universal flood, confirming it with the rainbow sign (8:21-22; 9:9-17). God blessed Noah and his family and commanded them to multiply and fill the earth (9:1). Animals were henceforth to fear man and they were given to be food for man, except the blood (9:2-4). Human government was instituted by the provision of capital punishment for murderers (9:5-6). Among the things preserved in the Ark was sinful human nature. Noah became a husbandman, planted a vineyard, drank himself into a drunken stupor, and shamefully exposed himself in his tent (9:20-21). Ham, presumably led by his son Canaan, made fun of Noah. For this foul deed, Canaan was cursed and Ham received no blessing (9:25-27). On the other hand, Shem and Japheth showed due respect to their father (9:23) and received rich blessings for their descendants. Noah lived 350 years after the Flood, dying at the age of 950 (9:29).

In the Babylonian flood account (the Gilgamesh Epic), Noah's counterpart is Utnapishtim. He likewise received divine warnings of the Flood, built a huge ark, preserved human and animal life, sent out birds, and offered sacrifices. However, the gross polytheism and absurdities of the Babylonian account demonstrate that it suffered from a long oral transmission and that it did not influence Genesis in any way (cf. Merrill Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament, Zondervan, 1954, pp. 46-71).

2. One of the five daughters of Zelophehad, of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3), who received an inheritance in the land in their father's name, in spite of having no brothers. J.C.W.

NOB (nŏb, Heb. nōv), a town of the priests in the tribe of Benjamin just N of the city of Jerusalem. The language of Isaiah 10:32 would indicate that it was within sight of Jerusalem. In the time of King Saul the tabernacle stood here for a time, and David's visit to Ahimelech the priest (I Sam. 21) was the cause or at least the occasion for the complete destruction of the city by Saul (I Sam. 22:19). David, fleeing from Saul, asked for provision for his young men and for a sword, all of which the priest granted; but a mischief-maker, Doeg the Edomite, was a witness to the transaction and reported it to Saul, who in his insane hatred and jealousy of David, caused the priests to be slain and their city to be destroyed.

NOBAH (nō'bȧ, Heb. nōvâh, barking). 1. A man of Manasseh in the days of Moses, who in the conquest of the land of Bashan took the city of Kenath from the Amorites (Num. 32:42).

2. A town in the neighborhood of which Gideon finally defeated the Midianites and took their kings (Judg. 8:11).

NOBAI (See Nebai)

NOBLEMAN, one belonging to a king, basilikós, as in John 4:46-53, or one well born, eugenós, as in the parable of the pounds (Luke 19:12-27).

NOD (nŏd, Heb. nôdh, wandering), a district eastward from Eden to which Cain went in his wandering (Gen. 4:16). (Cf. Ps. 56:8, "my wanderings.")

NODAB (nō'dăb, Heb. nôdhāv), a tribe of Arabs, probably Ishmaelites E of the Jordan, early conquered by the two and a half tribes (I Chron. 5:19). Probably a patronymic name from an ancestor "Nodab," "noble."

NOE (See Noah)

NOGAH (nō'gȧ, Heb. nōghah, brilliance), a son of David born in Jerusalem (I Chron. 3:7; 14:6).

NOHAH (nō'hȧ, Heb. nôhâh, rest), the fourth among the ten sons of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:2), but not mentioned in Genesis 46:21.

NON (See Nun)

NOON (See Time)

NOPH (nŏf, Heb. nōph), better known as Memphis, a city on the W side of the Nile S of Cairo (Isa. 19:13; Jer. 2:16; 46:19).

NOPHAH (nō'fȧ, Heb. nōphâh), a city of Moab (Num. 21:30), site unknown.

NORTH. The word often occurs merely as a point of the compass, but there are many passages, especially in the prophets, where it refers to a particular country, usually Assyria or Babylonia (Jer. 3:18; 46:6; Ezek. 26:7; Zeph. 2:13). While Nineveh and Babylon were E of Jerusalem, they are usually referred to as "the north" because armies from there could not come across the desert, but had first to go to Northern Syria and then S. It is uncertain what country Ezekiel 38:6 refers to by "the north."

NOSE, NOSTRILS (Heb. 'aph, nehîrayim). Because the nostrils quiver in anger, the word for nostril is rendered "anger," almost akin to "snorting" in 171 places; and this is used not only of Jacob (Gen. 27:45) but of Moses "the meekest of men" (Exod. 32:19) and even of the Lord (Num. 11:1,10). A tempestuous wind is described poetically as "the blast of thy nostrils" (Exod. 15:8; II Sam. 22:16), referring of course to God. A long nose was counted an element of beauty (S. of Sol. 7:4), and the nose was often decorated with a ring (Ezek. 16:12 ASV, cf. Isa. 3:21). A hook in the nose however was a means of subjection (Isa. 37:29).

NOSE JEWEL (See Dress)

NOVICE (nŏv'ĭs, Gr. neóphytos, newly-planted), used only in I Timothy 3:6 concerning the requirements for being a bishop. The Greek term from which we get "neophyte," i.e., "newly planted," refers to a recent convert.

NUMBERS. The Hebrews in ancient times used the common decimal system as a method of counting. There is no evidence that they used figures to denote numbers. Before the Exile they spelled the numbers out in full, as is seen in the present text of the Hebrew Scriptures, in the Siloam inscription, and on the Moabite stone. After the Exile some of the Jews employed such signs as were used among the Egyptians, the Aramaeans, and the Phoenicians — an upright line for 1, two such lines for 2, three for 3, etc., and special signs for 10, 20, 100. At least as far back as the reign of the Maccabean Simon (143-135 B.C.), they numbered the chapters and verses of the Hebrew Bible and expressed dates by employing the consonants of the Hebrew alphabet: aleph for 1, beth for 2, etc. The letters of the Greek alphabet were used in the same way.

Numbers were used conventionally and symbolically. Certain numbers and their multiples had sacred or symbolic significance: 3,4,7,10,12,40,70. For example, three expressed emphasis, as in "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it" (Ezek. 21:27). From early times seven was a sacred number among the Semites (Gen. 2:2; 4:24; 21:28). Ten was regarded as a complete number. Forty was often used as a round number (Exod. 24:18; I Kings 19:8; Jonah 3:4). Some of the higher numbers also seem sometimes to have been used as round numbers: 100 (Gen. 26:12; Lev. 26:8; II Sam. 24:3, etc.), 10,000 (Lev. 26:8; Deut. 32:30, etc.).

The later rabbis developed the theory that all numbers have secret meanings and all objects their fundamental numbers, and elaborate mathematical rules were devised to carry out these concepts. The system came to be known as gematria (a corruption of geometria). Some Bible students think that an example of this is found in Revelation 13:18, where the number of the beast is 666. It is thought that the context shows that the number was intended to be recognized as a definite person by those who knew how to interpret the book, while outsiders were left in the dark regarding his identity. S.B.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF, the fourth book of the Pentateuch, called In the Wilderness by the Jews after its first significant word. The Hebrew title is more meaningful than the English, for the book picks up the story of the wilderness wandering after the arrival at Sinai (Exod. 19), and tells the story of the Bedouin-like travels of Israel through all the 40 years of wandering.

The name Numbers comes from the Greek translation which gives a misleading impression of one of the features of the book. Both at the beginning (1:2-46) and near the end (26:2-51) the number of the Israelites is given — a little over 600,000 males above 20 years of age. The procedure sounds familiar to us. We call it a census. But the Biblical censuses were not just that. Israel was not merely interested in vital statistics. This was a count of the fighting force. Indeed, it probably was an actual mustering and organizing of the army. It is for this reason that the women, children, and Levites were not included. The numbering occurs twice because the army was called up twice for battle — first at the abortive attempt to invade the land at Kadesh-Barnea, and second at the end of the 40 years of wandering just before the conquest of Canaan.

Exception has been taken to the large number of Israelites — totaling an estimated two million. Some say the territory could not sustain so many people. This is true if the Israelites traveled as a closely-knit group seeking forage in a limited radius. But if they fanned out with their flocks over a wide area, they could sustain themselves as did the large Nabatean kingdom in the same area in Roman times. Furthermore, God specially and miraculously fed and sustained Israel. The size of the Israelite nation was surely great or Joshua would never have been able to conquer and occupy the land of Palestine as he clearly did. Large and well fortified cities were conquered in the area from Lachish in the S to Hazor 120 miles to the N, as well as the territory in all Trans-Jordan. Six hundred thousand men, not all active, would not have been too large a force to accomplish such a feat. David in later days of prosperity called up an army of 1,300,000 (II Sam. 24:9). David's numbers support the size of Joshua's army. Joshua's action explains the sinfulness of David's act. He was not merely taking a census either. He apparently was starting an unwarranted aggressive war.

The body of Numbers up to 10:11 gives additional legislation and the organization of the host. From 10:11 to 12:16 is recorded the march from Sinai to Kadesh-Barnea. Then comes the debacle at Kadesh recorded in chapters 13 and 14. The three leaders of this occasion, Joshua and Caleb, the believing spies, and Moses the intercessor are forever memorialized as among God's great men. Chapters 15 to 21:11 tell the story of repeated faithlessness on the part of the people. Apparently during much of the 40 years, according to Amos 5:25f and Joshua 5:2ff, the people wandered far away from God and even their national unity may have lapsed temporarily. The 40 years are treated very briefly.

From 21:11 on is given the conquest of Trans-Jordan and the preparations to enter the land. Sihon and Og of the northern territory were conquered in swift moves detailed more extensively in Deuteronomy. Then Numbers tells the very interesting story of Balaam, the hireling prophet who was supernaturally restrained from cursing Israel (22-24). These chapters are now studied with new interest because they appear to show a very early type of Hebrew. Final material includes the summary of the journeys (33), cities of refuge (35) and Joshua's installation (27). R.L.H.

NUN (nŭn, Heb. nûn), a man of Ephraim and the father of Joshua (Exod. 33:11; Neh. 8:17). His descent is given in I Chronicles 7:25-27.

OAK (See Plants)

OATH (ōth, Heb. shevû'âh, 'ālâh, Gr. nórkos), an appeal to God to witness the truth of a statement or of the binding character of a promise (Gen. 21:23; 31:53; Gal. 1:20; Heb. 6:16). Two varieties of the oath are found in the OT, a simple one for common use, and a more solemn one for cases of greater solemnity. Oaths played a very important part not only in legal and state affairs, but in the dealings of everyday life. A number of formulas were used in taking an oath, such as "the Lord be between thee and me forever" (I Sam. 20:23) and "as the Lord liveth" (I Sam. 14:39). Certain ceremonies were observed in taking an oath — in ordinary cases the raising of the hand toward heaven (Gen. 14:22; Deut. 32:40), in exceptional cases the putting of the hand under the thigh of him to whom the oath was taken (Gen. 24:2; 47:29). Sometimes one taking an oath slew an animal, divided it into two parts, and passed between the pieces (Gen. 15:8-18). Swearing was done by the life of the person addressed (I Sam. 1:26), by the life of the king (I Sam. 17:55), by one's own head (Matt. 5:34), by the angels, by the temple (Matt. 23:16), by Jerusalem (Matt. 5:35), and by God. It was forbidden to swear by a false god (Josh. 23:7). A virgin could take an oath if her father did not disallow it; and a married woman, if her husband permitted it. By the time of Christ the OT law regarding oaths (Exod. 22:11) was much perverted by the scribes, and our Lord therefore condemned indiscriminate and light taking of oaths, saying that men should be so transparently honest that oaths between persons are unnecessary. The lawfulness of oaths is recognized by the apostles, who called on God to witness to the truth of what they said (II Cor. 11:31; Gal. 1:20).

OBADIAH (ō'bə-dī'ə, Heb. 'ōvadhyâh, servant of Jehovah), the name of several OT characters: 1. The governor of Ahab's household (I Kings 18: 3-16) who "feared Jehovah greatly" but who seemed to fear Ahab even more.

2. Head of a household of David's descendants (I Chron. 3:21).

3. A chief man of Issachar in David's time (I Chron. 7:3).

4. One of the six sons of Azel, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:38 copied in 9:44).

5. A Levite who returned early from captivity (I Chron. 9:16) called "Abda" in Nehemiah 11: 17.

6. One of the martial Gadites who joined David in the wilderness (I Chron. 12:9).

7. Father of Ishmaiah, a prince of Zebulun in the days of David (I Chron. 27:19).

8. One of five princes of Judah whom Jehoshaphat sent out to teach the people of Judah the law of the Lord (II Chron. 17:7).

9. A Levite of the Merarite family, whom Josiah made an overseer of repairing the temple (II Chron. 34:12).

10. A Jew who led back 218 men in Ezra's return from captivity (Ezra 8:9).

11. A priestly covenanter with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5).

12. A gate-keeper of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:25).

13. The prophet who wrote the book of Obadiah.

OBADIAH, BOOK OF. The subject of the book is the destruction of Edom (vs. 1). From time immemorial Edom and the Edomites were hostile to Israel.

The book, like others of the Minor Prophets, is undated. The principal clue to the date of its writing is in verses 11,14. If "the day that thou stoodest on the other side" (vs. 11) alludes to the events of II Kings 8:20-22, II Chronicles 21:16-18, when the Edomites and others rebelled against King Jehoram early in the ninth century B.C., the book probably would be dated quite early; but if the reference is to Psalm 137:7, II Chronicles 36: 20, Ezekiel 25:13,14, the prophecy would be late; later than 586 B.C. The more likely view is that II Chronicles 28:16-18 is the apposite reference and that the time was late in the eighth century B.C., during the reign of Ahaz of Judah. At that time Edom and the Philistines were associated in warfare against Judah, and the names of the two nations are again coupled in Obadiah 19.

Verses 1-9 pronounce punishment upon Edom. Compare Jeremiah 49:7-22 with Obadiah 1-9. Apparently one of the two prophets made use of the other, or both made use of a common source which is no longer available.

In verses 10-14 Edom is arraigned for its guilt in standing with the enemies of Israel in the time when Judah and Jerusalem were in deep distress. In verses 12-14 the prophet exhorts Edom to quit its evil association with the enemies of Jerusalem. In verses 15,16 "the day of Jehovah" i.e. a time of awful judgment is proclaimed as being "near upon all the nations" and national annihilation is predicted for those peoples who fight against Jehovah — they "shall be as though they had not been." To this point in Obadiah, Jehovah has been addressing Edom in the second person singular, but in the closing paragraph, he speaks of a coming restoration of Israel when Zion shall be holy and God will use Israel as a flame to destroy Esau. The people of the Negeb (the southern part of Judah) are to possess the land of Edom; Israel will greatly enlarge its borders (vss.19-21). The principal message of Obadiah to the peoples of today would seem to be the proclamation, not only of the danger of fighting against God, but also the peril of fighting His people. A.B.F.

OBAL (ō'băl), an early Arab, son of Joktan (Gen. 10:28), called Ebal in I Chronicles 1:22. Samaritan Pentateuch has "Ebal."

OBED (ō'bĕd, Heb. 'ōvēdh, worshiper), the name of five OT men: 1. An early man of Judah, descended through Hezron and Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:37,38).

2. One of the mighty men of David's army (I Chron. 11:47).

3. A Levitical gate-keeper of the tabernacle in David's time (I Chron. 26:7).

4. The father of one of the captains whom Jehoiada chose to help make Joash king (II Chron. 23:1).

5. If no names are omitted in the Messianic genealogy, the son of Boaz and Ruth and grandfather of David the king (Ruth 4:21,22 copied in I Chron. 2:12, Matt. 1:5, and Luke 3:32).

OBED-EDOM (ō'bĕd-ē'dŏm, Heb. 'ōvēdh-'ĕdhôm, one who serves Edom). 1. A man of Gath into whose house David had the ark of God carried after "Perez-uzza" when God struck Uzza dead for touching the ark when the oxen stumbled (II Sam. 6:10-12, I Chron. 13:9-13). Obed-edom and his family revered the ark and God blessed them greatly. He probably is the same Obed-edom as the one in I Chronicles 26:4-8 who had eight sons and 72 early descendants.

2. One of the musical Levites (I Chron. 15: 18-24) who played a harp.

3. A son of Jeduthun who was a door-keeper of the tabernacle (I Chron. 16:38).

4. Perhaps the same as # 3, appointed with his sons over the treasury (I Chron. 26:15).

5. A descendant of # 4 who kept the treasury in Amaziah's time (II Chron. 25:24).

OBEDIENCE (Heb. shāma', Gr. hypakoé). Man normally comes under five principal authorities which require obedience: first, as a child, his parents (Col. 3:20); then, in school, his teachers (Prov. 5:12,13); then in industry or business, his employers or masters (I Pet. 2:18); fourthly, the government (Rom. 13:1,2) and lastly and principally, God (Gen. 26:5 etc.). The supreme test of faith in God is obedience (I Sam. 28:18). He who obeys because he loves God, is very wise. Throughout the Bible obedience is linked to faith (Gen. 22:18; Rom. 1:5; I Peter 1:14). Christ Himself obeyed the Father (Phil. 2:8), giving to us the supreme example of obedience. Christians are called "children of obedience" (I Pet. 1:14).

OBEISANCE (ō-bā'săns, Heb. shāhâh), the act of bowing low or of prostrating one's self; whether before (1) God (Mic. 6:6), (2) a god (II Kings 5:18), (3) an earthly ruler (Gen. 42:6), or (4) in courtesy toward one's equals (Gen. 23:12). A careful distinction must be made between obeisance in courtesy and that which partakes of or borders on worship. The former is a mark of culture but the latter is a dreadful sin if directed to other than the true God (Exod. 20:4-6).

OBIL (ō'bĭl, camel driver), an Ishmaelite in the days of David who was put in charge of the king's camels (I Chron. 27:30).

OBLATION (See Offerings)

OBOTH (ō'bŏth, Heb. 'ōvōth, water-bags), a place E of Moab, where Israel encamped (Num. 21: 10,11; 33:43).

OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Apothecary, a compounder of drugs, oils and perfumes. More often the word could well be translated "perfumer." All large oriental towns had their perfumers' street. Their stock included anything fragrant in the form of loose powder, compressed cake, or essences in spirit, oil, or fat, as well as seeds, leaves and bark.

Perfumes were used in connection with the holy oil and incense of the tabernacle (Exod. 30:25,35; 37:29; II Chron. 16:14; Neh. 3:8). The ritual of Baal-worshipers (Isa. 57:9), and the embalming of the dead and rites of burial (Gen. 1:12; 16:14; Lk. 23:56) all used the perfume. The apothecary compounded and sold these sweet spices and anointing oils.

The frequent references in the OT to physicians and apothecaries indicate the high esteem in which the professions were held.

Artificer, a fabricator of any materials, as carpenter, smith, engraver, etc., (Gen. 4:22; Isa. 3:3). Especially workers skilled in metals, carving wood and plating it with gold, setting precious stones, and designing embroideries. From this word comes "artifacts," an archaeological term, meaning anything that was made or modified by human art or workmanship. Solomon procured many men of this class from Hiram, King of Tyre, when building the temple (I Chron. 29:5; II Chron. 34:11).

Author, the composer of a literary production. An authority on a statement or fact. Agur and Lemuel are referred to as having recorded "words" in the form of prophecy and wisdom (Prov. 30:1; 31:1).

Bakers, occupied a special street in Jerusalem (Jer. 27:21). The baking of bread is one of the chief household duties. But in the towns and principal villages, the larger oven of the regular baker is required. The superiority of this bread is implied in the Arabic proverb, "send your bread to the oven of the baker, though he should eat the half of it."

The modern oriental baker does not, as a rule prepare the dough, but bakes what is sent to him for that purpose. A common sight is the baker's boy carrying on his head a tray of new bread for one house, and on his side a similar tray for another house. The dough is prepared by the house baker and sent to the public baker, who kneads it into flat cakes for his oven.

The oriental oven is a long, low stone vault, like half a railway engine boiler, with a stone pavement down the middle and a long narrow strip at each side for the firewood.

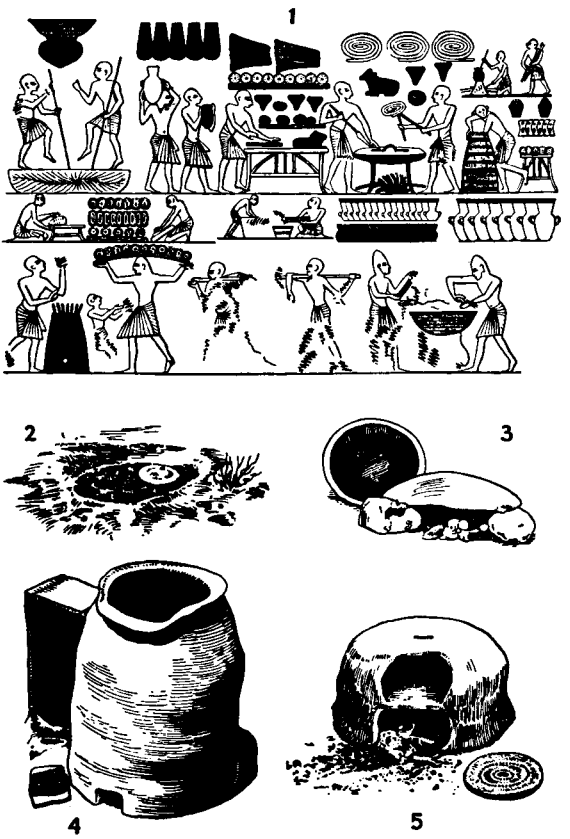
In addition to the home baker and the public baker was the royal baker, who baked for the king (Gen. 40:2).

The Hebrews made use of large stone jars, open at the mouth, about three feet high, with a fire inside for baking bread and cakes. As soon as the sides were sufficiently heated, the thin dough was applied to the outside, the opening at the top being closed. Sometimes wood was used for heating, but more often thorns and occasionally dry dung was used (Ezek. 4:12).

Kinds of ovens: 1. The bowl oven, the simplest form of oven, was used by ancients, and was made of clay, with a movable lid. The bowl was placed inverted upon small stones, and thus heated with dry dung heaped over and around it.

2. The jar oven, heated by grass or stubble, dry twigs or thorns (see above).

3. The pit oven, partly in the ground and partly built up of clay and plastered throughout, narrowing toward the top. The fire was kindled inside the oven.



Above, 1. A contemporary illustration of a royal Egyptian bakery. 2. Simplest form of baking, on a stone on an open fire. 3. Bowl oven. 4. A jar oven. 5. An oven with fire-pit below and baking space above. DV

Barber. The barber may have originated in connection with the shaving of the head as part of a vow. The instruments of his work were probably, the razor, the basin, the mirror, and perhaps the scissors. He usually plied his trade in the open, on the street.

The word barber occurs but once in the Scriptures (Ezek. 5:1). However, great attention was paid to the hair and beard among the ancients. The barber must have been a well-known tradesman.

Beggar, one who lives from the alms of others. It was his regular business to solicit alms publicly, and even to go from door to door. Beggars are numerous in the East. They are usually "maimed, lame or blind" (Luke 14:13). The commonest and most pathetic form of infirmity is blindness. Some of these blind beggars are led by children and have regular places to station themselves.

The begging is sometimes only a simple statement of poverty, "I am poor," "I want a loaf of bread," or "give me the price of a loaf." But occasionally the expressive gesture of bringing the forefinger across the teeth and holding it up as a proof that there is absolutely no trace of food employed. It is "cleanness of teeth" (Amos 4:6).

Some of the beggars pose as sent of God. "I am your guest! I am God's guest! God will direct you! God will recompense you! God will preserve your children! God will prolong your days!" The beggars are thus the street-preachers of the E. Sometimes one finds entire families who beg for a meager living.

The beggars divide up the shops among them, and at the end of the week, they go around to get their allowance. Beggars are encouraged by a superstitious hope that alms given may atone for things obtained by cheating. Alms-giving has a high place among the religious virtues of the E.

Butler, an officer of considerable responsibility who attended Eastern monarchs. This officer is of very great antiquity, being mentioned in connection with the Egyptians, the Persians, the Assyrians and the Jewish rulers. The butler (also called cupbearer) was required to taste of the foods and wines before serving them, as a pledge that they were not poisoned (Gen. 40:1; Neh. 1:11). The butlers enjoyed the esteem and confidence of their royal masters.

Carpenter, a worker in wood; a builder. Joseph, the legal or foster father of Jesus, was a carpenter (Matt. 13:55); so also was Jesus (Mark 6:3). The work of carpenters is frequently mentioned in the Bible (Gen. 6:14; Exod. 37; Isa. 44:13). David employed Phoenician carpenters in building his palace (II Sam. 5:11; I Chron. 14:1).

The chief work of the carpenter was making roofs, doors, window-shutters, lattice-squares, divan frames for the houses, plows and yokes. Hence, Jesus knew yokes, as well as the various aspects of farm life; and could say "my yoke is easy and my burden is light." Along the coast there was a small industry of boat building.

Some of the tools used by the ancient Egyptians were the adze, saw, square, awl, hammer and gluepot (Jer 10:4; Exod. 21:6). The adze was their favorite implement. In ripping a board with the saw, the carpenter sat on the board and sawed away from himself (Isa. 44:13).

In its broadest sense, carpentry included an artificer in stone and metal, as well as wood.

Chamberlain, an officer employed to look after the personal affairs of a sovereign. Potiphar seems to have had such an officer (Gen. 39:1). This officer was introduced into the court by Solomon, and was sometimes referred to as "steward" (I Kings 4:6; 16:9; 18:3) or "governor."

His duties seem to have been to superintend the palace and attend to royal etiquette. This post later became one of special increasing influence, including the right of introduction to the king. He thus became the chief minister.

Erastus, the "chamberlain" of the city of Corinth, was one of those whose salutations to the Roman Christians were given (Rom. 16:23). The office was apparently that of public treasurer.

Clerk. The clerk or "town clerk" (Acts 19:35) was likely the city recorder. He was probably a magistrate of considerable authority and influence. He may have been mayor or the chief sovereign of the city. The clerk is often mentioned in Ephesian inscriptions.

The clerk may have been literally a temple-keeper, for this term, found on Ephesian coins struck about the time of Paul, originally signified a temple servant whose business it was to sweep out and decorate the temple, and ultimately grew to be an honorary title of towns in Asia Minor which were especially devoted to the service of any divinity and possessed a temple consecrated to that divinity.

Confectioner, a female perfumer or apothecary (I Sam. 8:13). When the orange-trees, violets and roses were in bloom, the women made scented waters which they kept in large, closely-sealed bottles for use in the summer as cooling syrup-drinks. These were presented to guests in tumblers of brass and silver trays. The king's confectionaries would be occupied with the preparation and mixing of such flavoring essences.

Coppersmith, a worker in any kind of metals. It is likely that Alexander was given this title because copper was so common in his day (II Tim. 4:14). The coppersmiths had a particular way of smelting the copper and iron. Their smelters were located so as to face the wind currents, thus using the natural winds to fan their fires sufficiently for smelting. King Solomon not only mined copper in the Arabah (S of the Dead Sea) and had it smelted at Ezion-geber, but enjoyed a thriving trade in this very useful metal (I Kings 7:45).

Counselor, an adviser in any matter, particularly the king's state adviser (II Sam. 15:12; I Chron. 27:33). Usually one of the chief men of the government (Job 3:14; 12:17). In the NT the name likely refers to a member of the Sanhedrin (Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50).

Doctor of the Law. Gamaliel was such a person (Acts 5:34,40). He kept and handed down the Cabala, or sacred laws as received from Mount Sinai. He was the 35th receiver of the traditions. This term may also have applied to the scribe in his practical administration of the law in the pronouncement of legal decisions.

Diviner, one who obtains or seems to obtain secret knowledge, particularly of the future, and is a pagan counterpart of prophecy. He stands in contrast to the prophet of the Lord, since he was believed to be inspired by demon power, and the Lord's prophet by the Spirit of God. Balaam was a heathen diviner but rose to the status of a bona-fide prophet of the Lord, although he seems to have reverted back to paganism (Num. 22-24). Though the diviner is classed with the prophet, this does not mean an endorsement of divination.

Dyer. A Bible land society both wove and dyed its own textiles. The practice of dying textiles was in existence even before the time of Abraham. Dying vats and clay looms that were used as weights have been found in Lachish.

The dyer obtained his dye from various sources. The crimson was obtained from a worm or grub that feeds on the oak or other plants. Indigo was made from the rind of the pomegranate. The purple was made from the murex shell-fish found on the beach at the city of Acre. It was also found along the Phoenician coast N of Acre. Luke tells of Lydia, "a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira" (Acts 16:14). Excavations have revealed that "a guild of dyers" existed in the vicinity of Thyatira.

Farmer. Farming had its beginning with the first man, Adam. Cain tilled the soil, and Abel was a livestock farmer, perhaps a shepherd. The early farm implements were very crude. The plow was a very crude affair, made of wood and having an iron share, small and shaped like a sword. Asses and oxen were used to pull the light plow, which had only one handle, except in cases where human beings were used in place of oxen.

When Israel entered the land of Canaan, farming took on a new aspect. Every seventh year the farmers allowed the ground to be idle. Whatever grew of itself was left to the poor, the stranger and the beasts of the field. To the Hebrews the terms "grain" and "corn" included almost every object of field culture. The farmers cultivated millet, spelt, various species of beans and peas, pepperwort, cummin, cucumbers, melons, flax and perhaps cotton. Farming was practiced by Cain, Noah, Elisha, David, Uzziah, and Solomon. Farmers were also called husbandmen, tillers of the ground, and laborers, and they were subject to certain laws.

Fisher. The Bible speaks of the fish of the Nile River and of the Mediterranean Sea. The frequent allusions to the art of fishing are in connection with the Sea of Galilee. The Israelites in the wilderness said: "We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt" (Num. 11:5). Several methods of fishing were practiced. 1. The casting-net, when the fisherman stood on the bank or waded breast-deep into the water, and skillfully threw the net which he had arranged on his arm into the water in front of him. It fell in the shape of a ring, and as the weights dragged it down, the net took the shape of a dome or cone and enclosed the fish. 2. The dragnet was used in herring and salmon fishing, with floats along the top of the weights to sink the net. It was usually operated from boats. 3. Hooks or angles were occasionally used. Fish were speared on the Mediterranean coast, being attracted to the surface by a moving torch. Night fishing was very common, especially on Galilee. In modern times Jewish fishing fleets operate along the Mediterranean coast and on Galilee. Shoals of fish are sometimes seen on the Sea of Galilee from the shore when the fishermen in the boat may not see them (John 21:4-6).

Fuller, one who washed or bleached clothing (II Kings 18:17; Isa. 7:3; 36:2). This is one of the oldest arts, and at an early period was comparatively perfect. Both men and women engaged in cleaning clothes and other materials. The fuller may have been a sub-division of the dyers. However, it consisted chiefly in cleaning and bleaching garments. The cleansing was done by treading or stamping the garments with the feet or with rods or sticks in containers of water. Alkaline, potash, niter and herbs were employed in the washing and bleaching process.

The fullers discovered a singular art of bleaching cloth white by the aid of alkali, soap, putrid urine, fumes of sulphur and the ashes of certain desert plants. Therefore, the fuller's shop was usually located outside the city where offensive odors could be avoided, the cloth could be trampled clean in a running stream, and the fuller then have room to spread the cloth out for drying. In Jerusalem the "fuller's field" was located near the conduit of the upper pool, which was in all probability in the Kidron Valley between Gihon (the present Virgin's Fountain), and the well En-rogel (Isa. 7:3).

Herdsman, a tender of oxen, sheep, goats and camels. The patriarchs were great herdsmen. The occupation was not inconsistent with state honors. David's herdsmen were among his chief officers of state (Gen. 13:7; 26:20; I Sam. 21:7; Amos 1:1; 7:14). In general, however, the herdsman was seldom the owner of the flock or herd which he tended.

The rich owners of herds placed them in charge of herdsmen, whose duty it was to protect them from wild beasts, to keep them from straying and to lead them to suitable pasture. The herdsmen usually carried a sharpened or metal-pointed goad, and a small bag or scrip for provisions. Their dress consisted of a long cloak. Their food was very simple, and they usually lived on what they could find. Their wages were given them in products of the herd.

Hunter. The hunter or fowler was one of the earliest occupations. It was originally a means of support, but later became a recreation. It was held in very high repute and was engaged in by all classes, but more frequently with royalty (Gen. 10:9; 27:3,5; I Sam. 26:20; Job 38:39; Prov. 6:5).

Three principal methods of hunting are mentioned in the Bible: 1. Shooting with the bow and arrows (Exod. 27:3). This method has been superseded by the fowling-piece. 2. Snaring by the spring net and cage, especially for birds, such as quail, partridge, and duck (Amos 3:5; Jer. 5:27). 3. Pits were covered with a net and brushwood for deer, foxes, wolves, bears, lions, etc. (Ps. 35:7; Isa. 24:18; 42:22).

Judge. The head of the house was considered the judge over his own household, even with life and death (Gen. 35:24). With the enlargement of the human family this power quite naturally passed to the heads of tribes and clans. After Israel came into the wilderness beyond Sinai, Moses found the responsibility of handling all the judicial matters too great. Upon the advice of his father-in-law, Jethro, he chose "able men, such as feared God, men of truth, hating covetousness" to handle these matters. There were to be judges over thousands and judges over hundreds and judges over fifties (Exod. 18:19-26). The more difficult cases were referred to Moses, and he turned such cases over to a higher court, with its seat at the place of sanctuary, and it was handled by priests and judges, the high priest being the supreme judge.

After coming into Canaan, judges sat at the gates of the cities (Deut. 16:18).

Lawyer, one who is conversant with the law. There were court lawyers and the synagogue lawyers (Matt. 22:35; Luke 7:30; 10:25; 11:45,46, 52; 14:3; Titus 3:13). The scribe functioned in the capacity of a lawyer in the pronouncement of legal decisions. (See Doctor of the Law.)

Magician, one who practiced superstitious ceremonies to hurt or to benefit mankind. The Hebrews were forbidden to consult magicians (Gen. 41:8; Exod. 7:11,22; Dan. 1:20; 2:2; 5:11; Acts 13:6, 8). Magic is of two kinds — natural or scientific and supernatural or spiritual. The first attributes its power to a deep, practical acquaintance with the power of nature. The second attributes its power to an acquaintance with celestial or infernal agencies.

There are many accounts of the use of magical art in the Scriptures. Before Israel left Egypt the magicians were called by Pharaoh to duplicate the works of God in converting the rod of Aaron into a serpent. They were sometimes classified with the "wise men." In the interpretation of dreams and visions the magicians and soothsayers were called. The Chaldeans were particularly famous as magicians.

Mason, a worker in stone. Many of the most wonderful antiquities of the East were due to the work of the mason. Certain villages were famous for their masons. The farmers were usually skilful in building low terrace walls of undressed stone for the fields and vineyards. But buildings required a master mason.

The mason was acquainted with the proper kind of foundation. He knew how to lay the cornerstone. He knew how to select and lay the stones in the wall. His equipment consisted of the plumbline, the measuring reed, the leveling line, the hammer with the toothed edge for shaping stones, and a small basket for carrying off earth.

Musician. Since music was a very prominent art in Biblical times and played such an important part in the life of Israel, and their religious exercises and festivities, there was necessity for those who were apt in playing instruments, and in singing hymns and psalms. Hebrew music was primarily vocal, yet many of the Psalms have signs indicating that they were to be accompanied by musical instruments. The "chief musician" occurs in the titles of 54 of the Psalms. Asaph and his brothers were apparently the first to hold this position, and the office was probably hereditary in the family. Among the instruments used by the Hebrews were the cymbal, harp, organ, pipe, psaltery, sackbut and trumpets.

Nurse, one who looks after, tutors or guides another, as in a period of inexperience or sickness. In ancient times the nurse was an honorable person (II Sam. 4:4; II Kings 11:2). Most patriarchal families had a nurse or nurses. Rebekah's nurse went with her to Canaan, and was buried with great mourning (Gen. 24:59; 35:8). Foster fathers or mothers were sometimes referred to as nurses (Ruth 4:16; Isa. 49:23).

Physician, one who understands and practices medicine in the art of healing. The priests and prophets were expected to have some knowledge of medicine. In the days of Moses there were midwives and regular physicians who attended the Israelites (Exod. 21:19). They brought some knowledge of medicine with them from Egypt, whose physicians were celebrated in all antiquity. In the early stages of medical practice, attention was more frequently confined to surgical aid and external applications. Even down to a comparatively late period, outward maladies appear to have been the chief subjects of medical treatment among the Hebrews, although they were not entirely without remedies for internal and even mental disorders.

The medicines prescribed were salves, particular balms, plaster and poultices, oil-baths, mineral baths, etc. In Egypt the physicians aided in carrying out the elaborate preparations connected with embalming the body.

Plowman, one who used or held the plow. Husbandmen and plowmen were used synonymously in the Scriptures. The plowman was a farmer in general. The plow now used by Arabs in Palestine is lightly built, with the least possible skill or expense, and consists of two poles, which cross each other near the ground; the pole nearer the oxen is fastened to the yoke, while the other serves, the one end as the handle, the other as the plowshare. It is drawn by oxen, camels, cows or heifers. The operator of this instrument is a plowman.

Porter. The Biblical porter was a gate-keeper and not a burden-bearer (II Sam. 18:26; I Chron. 9:22). The Levites who had charge of the various entrances to the temple were called porters (I Chron. 9:17; 15:18; II Chron. 23:19). In some instances the same original word is rendered "doorkeeper" (I Chron. 15:23,24). A porter was stationed at the city gates, and among shepherds was responsible for keeping the doors of the sheepfold.

In David's time the porters of the temple, who were also guards, numbered 4,000 (I Chron. 23:5).

Potter. Although regarded as an inferior trade, it supplied a universal need, and potters lived in settlements in the lower city of Jerusalem (Jer. 18: 2-4), in the neighborhood of Hebron and Beit Jibrin, where clay was plentiful and the royal potteries probably were situated (I Chron. 4:23).

There has been great demand for potters in the Orient. This is because copper vessels are so expensive, leather bottles are not suitable for some purposes and earthen vessels are so easily broken.

The maker of earthenware was one of the first manufacturers. The potter found the right kind of clay, prepared it by removing stones and other rough substances, shaped and made it into the vessel desired, baked and marketed it. If the vessel became marred in the making, it was "made over again another vessel." When one became broken after baking it was discarded, and thrown into "the potter's field."

The Hebrew potter, sitting at his work, turned the clay, which had first been kneaded with the feet, into all kinds of vessels on his wheels, which were generally of wood.

Preacher, one who heralds or proclaims, usually by delivering a discourse upon a text of Scripture. This method of presenting messages from God to man is as old as the human family. Noah is referred to as "a preacher of righteousness" (II Pet. 2:5). The prophets were given the responsibility of delivering messages of truth in song, in accusation and in rebuke, pleading and exhortation, prophecy and promise. The temple, the synagogue and the church has been designed chiefly as a place where the profession of preaching has been practiced, by man becoming the human channel through which God sent His messages.

Since the completion of the Bible, preaching has come to mean the giving out of the Word of God whether it be in prophesying, teaching, or preaching.

Priest, one who offers sacrifices, or presides over things relating to God. Previous to the Mosaic ritual, the offering of sacrifices pertained to private individuals. The father was the priest of his own family, and officiated at the domestic altar; being succeeded at death by his firstborn son. Possibly a more general priesthood existed, such as that exercised by Melchizedek.

When the Mosaic dispensation was introduced, a particular order of men was appointed to that special service (Exod. 28) with a very solemn and imposing ceremony. From that time, the offering of sacrifices was restricted, in the main, to those who were duly invested with the priestly office (II Chron. 26:18). All the posterity of Aaron were priests, except those who were disqualified by the special requirements laid down in the Mosaic law.

After the Captivity, those who could not prove their descent from Aaron lost their privileges as priests. The corruption of the priesthood, by making the office a means of amassing wealth and gaining political power, hastened the ruin of the Jewish nation. Christ is described in the NT as the firstborn king, the anointed, a priest after the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 7:8).

Prophet(-ess), a person who acts as the organ of divine communication with men, especially with regard to the future. The prophet differs from the priest in representing the divine side of this mediation, while the priest rather acts from the human side. The term "prophet" is an Anglicized Greek word, and literally denotes one who speaks for another or in another's name. The Hebrew term rendered "prophet" is thought by some to signify one elevated or excited, so as to pour forth animated oracles, or, according to others, a person imbued with the Spirit of God. Strictly speaking, a prophet is one to whom the knowledge of secret things is revealed, whether past (John 4:19), present (II Kings 5:26), or to come (Luke 1:76-79).

The wives of the prophets and also women who had the gift of prophecy were known as prophetesses. Among the prophetesses mentioned in the Bible are Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, Noadiah, and Anna.

Publican, an under-collector of Roman revenue. Of these there appear to have been two classes: 1. The "chief of the publicans" of whom Zacchaeus is an example. 2. The ordinary publican, the lowest class of the servants engaged in the collecting of the revenue, and of whom we have an instance in Levi, who was afterwards the Apostle Matthew.

The publicans were hated as the instruments by which the subjection of the Jews to the Roman emperor was perpetuated, and the paying of tribute was looked upon as a virtual acknowledgment of his sovereignty. They were noted for their imposition, rapine and extortion, to which they were tempted to oppress the people with illegal taxes that they might more quickly enrich themselves. The publicans of the NT were regarded as traitors and apostates, defiled by their frequent intercourse with the heathen, and willing tools of the oppressor. Hence, they were classed with sinners, harlots and the heathen (Matt. 9:11; 21:31; 18:17).

Rabbi, a title given by the Jews to the teachers of their law. It was also applied to Christ by His disciples and others (Matt. 23:7,8; John 1:38,49; 3:2,26; 6:25). The term Rabbi literally means "master" (John 1:38; 20:16). The use of the term cannot be verified before the time of Christ.

Recorder, an officer of high rank in the Jewish state, exercising the functions, not simply of an annalist, but of chancellor or president of the privy council (Isa. 36:3,22). He was not only the grand custodian of the public records, but kept the responsible registry of the current transactions of government (II Sam. 8:16; 20:24; II Kings 18:18).

In David's court, the recorder appears among the high officers of his household (II Sam. 8:16; 20:24). In Solomon's court, the recorder is associated with the three secretaries, and is mentioned last, probably as being their president (I Kings 4:3).

Robber, one who engages in theft and plunder. Ishmael, the Bedouin, became a "wild man" and a robber of trade (Gen. 16:12). Among the nomad tribes of the East it has been considered in the highest degree creditable.

The Mosaic Law strictly forbade robbery, as other wrongs against others and it was denounced in the Proverbs and by the prophets. The Prophet Hosea compares the apostate priests to "troops of robbers that wait for men." Robbery is frequently referred to in the Bible, and there are robbers in every age, but never is it commended.

Ruler, one who rules or governs, or who assists in carrying on a government. An honor often bestowed by kings on their subjects. Daniel was made ruler over the whole province of Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar for interpreting a dream; and again made third ruler of the kingdom after interpreting the writing upon the wall at the time of Belshazzar's great feast (Dan. 2:10,38; 5:7,16,29).

high priest who was considered the "ruler of the house of God" (I Chron. 9:11).

Sailor, one whose occupation is navigation, or the operation of ships. Particularly one who manipulates a ship with sails. Those that trade by the sea (Rev. 18:17).

Saleswoman, a woman who sells merchandise. Lydia, the "seller of purple" from Thyatira was a convert of the Apostle Paul at Philippi (Acts 16:14,15,40).

Schoolmaster, one who exercised careful supervision over scholars, forming their manners, etc. Such person was considered stern and severe. The Mosaic Law is likened unto a "schoolmaster to bring us to Christ" (Gal. 3:24) because it awakens a consciousness of sin, and prepares the soul for an acceptance of Christ.

Scribe, persons employed to handle correspondence and to keep accounts. They were given a high place alongside the high priest. Hezekiah set up a body of men whose work it was to transcribe old records, or to put in writing what had been handed down orally (Prov. 25:1). The scribe came to be a student and interpreter of the law.

In the time of Christ, the scribes had attained great influence and power as a class, and were regarded with great respect. They were given the best places at feasts and the chief seats in the synagogues (Matt. 23:5; Luke 14:7).

Seer, one who is considered able to foresee things or events. A prophet (I Sam. 9:9) — "Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to enquire of God, thus he spake, Come and let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a prophet was beforetime called a seer." Samuel identified himself as a seer (I Sam. 10:19). He is referred to as "the seer" who ordained David and Samuel (I Chron. 9:22).

Senators, the "elders of Israel" who formed one of the three classes represented in the Sanhedrin. The scribes and priests formed the other two classes (Acts 5:21). They were considered chief men or magistrates (Ps. 105:22). In other places this same Hebrew word is translated elder.

Sergeant, Roman lictors or officers who attended the chief magistrates when they appeared in public, and who inflicted the punishment that had been pronounced (Acts 16:35,38). They were literally "rod-holders."

Servant, sometimes applied to any one under the authority of another, and not necessarily a domestic or slave. In some passages of Scripture, the word properly means "young man" or "minister." It is applied to the relation of men to others occupying high position, as Eliezer, whose position in the household of Abraham compared with that of the prime minister (Gen. 15:2; 24:2).

Servitor, one who ministers to, or serves, but not in a menial capacity (II Kings 4:43). May be "one in waiting."

Sheepmaster, one who is both a shepherd and the owner of the sheep (II Kings 3:4). In some areas, the sheepmaster is one who owns a superior kind of sheep.

Sheep-Shearer, one who shears the sheep. When the wool is long and ready to "harvest," a sheep-shearing time is announced, and it is a great time of rejoicing (Gen. 38:12; II Sam. 13:23,24). This is a festival corresponding to our "harvest-home," usually marked by revelry and merry-making (Gen. 31:19).

Shepherd, one employed in tending, feeding and guarding the sheep. Abel, Rachel and David were all keepers of sheep. The shepherd's equipment consisted of a scrip made of goat's skin with legs tied, and in which was placed food and other articles. He usually carried a sling to protect himself and the sheep against wild animals. He carried a rod (stick) about 30 inches long with a knob on one end. He had a staff that looked like our walking cane, usually with a crook on one end. He carried a flute made of reeds to entertain himself and to content his sheep. His cloak was used as bedding at night. He led his sheep, and knew them all by name, and they knew his voice. He saw that they were all safe in the fold at night.

Silversmith, a worker in silver (Acts 19:24). The most famous example of a silversmith was Demetrius, whose business was interfered with by the evangelistic work of the Apostle Paul.

Singer, a trained or professional vocalist. The Hebrew music was primarily vocal. Barzillai mentioned "singing men and singing women" (II Sam. 19:35). Solomon was a composer of songs, "A thousand and five" (I Kings 4:32). David's trained choir numbered 288.

Slave, a person held in bondage to another, having no freedom of action, his person and service being wholly under the control of his master or owner. Jewish slaves were of two classes — Hebrew and non-Hebrew — and both were protected by law. Hebrew slaves became such through poverty or debt, through theft and inability to repay, or in case of females, because they had been sold by their parents as maid-servants. Their slavery was the mildest form of bond-service.

At the time of Christ, slavery was established throughout the world and interwoven even by the wisest men as a normal state of society. But Christianity, by teaching the common creation and redemption of men and enjoining the law of kindness and love to all, first moderated the evils of slavery, then encouraged emancipation, and the ultimate extinction of the whole institution.

Smith, a workman in stone, wood or metal. The first smith mentioned in Scripture is Tubal-cain. So requisite was the trade of the smith in ancient warfare that conquerors removed them from a vanquished nation to more certainly disable it (Isa. 44:12; 54:16; Jer. 24:1).

Soldier, one engaged in military service, and receiving pay for his services. In the earlier times, every man above the age of 20 was a soldier (Num. 1:3); and each tribe formed a regiment, with its own banner and its own leader (Num. 2:2; 10:14). Up until the time of David, the army consisted entirely of infantry (I Sam. 4:10; 15:4), the use of horses having been restrained by divine command (Deut. 17:16).

The Jews had experienced the great advantage to be obtained by chariots, both in their encounters with the Canaanites and at a later period with the Syrians, and hence much importance was eventually attached to them by the Hebrews.

Sorcerer, one who practiced the arts of the magicians by which he pretended to foretell events with the supposed assistance of evil spirits (Isa. 47:9,12; Acts 8:9,11). In its broader sense, a sorcerer is one who practices in the whole field of divinatory occultism.

Spinner, a person who used the distaff and the spindle in the making of thread from wool, flax or cotton. From the whirling spindle we get the word spin. From this also comes the "spinning wheel" (Prov. 31:19; Matt. 6:28).

Steward, one to whose care is committed the management of the household (Gen. 43:19; Luke 16:1). The term is also applied to ministers (I Cor. 4:1) and to Christians (I Pet. 4:10). The meaning of the word is different in Genesis 15:2 where it is rendered "he that shall be possessor" in the ASV.

Tanner, one who is skilled in dressing and preserving hides, or skins of animals. Among the ancient Jews, ceremonial uncleanness was attached to the occupation of the tanner, and hence he was obliged to pursue his calling outside the town. The tanneries of Joppa are now on the shore S of the city. Several circumstances confirm the tradition of the present "house of Simon" there (Acts 9:43; 10:6,32).

Taskmaster, one whose duty it is to assign tasks. An overseer or bond master (Exod. 1:11; 3:7; 5:6, 10,13,14). Pharaoh appointed taskmasters over the Hebrews to make their work hard and wearisome. He hoped by such oppression to break down their physical strength, and thereby to reduce their numerical growth, and also to crush their hope of ever gaining their liberty.

Tax Collector, Taxgatherer, one who collected or gathered a certain tax or revenue for the government. The publicans of the Roman Empire were engaged in this flourishing traffic. The farming out of import and export duties, excise on various commodities, and of the government tithe on produce, is universally practiced. A commercial company guarantees to the government a fixed sum for a certain tax or monopoly, and then directly or by further sub-letting proceeds to fix such a scale or charges as will ensure a profit by the transaction.

It has led to much oppression and injustice, and has fostered a feeling of hostility towards anything connected with the government. Zacchaeus was a tax collector (Luke 19:23).

Teacher, one who imparts instruction, and communicates knowledge of religious truth or other matters. "Doctors" or teachers are mentioned among divine gifts in Ephesians 4:11, where the Apostle seems to reckon them among the extraordinary donations of God and uses no mark of distinction or separation between "apostles" with which he begins, and "doctors" with which he ends. The latter doubtlessly refers to well-informed persons, to whom inquiring Christian converts might have recourse for removing their doubts and difficulties concerning Christian observances, the sacraments, and other rituals, and for receiving from Scripture the demonstration that "this is the very Christ" and that the things relating to the Messiah were accomplished in Jesus.

Tent-maker, one skilled in making tents from hair or wool, or skins. The early patriarchs were largely tent-dwellers, and therefore had to have some knowledge in tent-making. In the NT times it was the custom to teach every Jewish boy some trade. Jesus was a carpenter, and Paul was a tent-maker. Paul practiced this trade in company with Aquila at Corinth (Acts 18:1-3).

Tetrarch, a ruler of the fourth part of a kingdom or province. This title is applied in the Bible to any petty ruler in the Roman empire. His authority was similar to that of a king, and that title was often given to him (Matt. 14:9).

Tiller, the greatest occupation of the Hebrews; tilling the soil, or cultivating the soil. This word is used synonymously with husbandman. A useful and honorable occupation (Gen. 9:20; Isa. 28:24-28). Christ used the word figuratively (John 15:1) in parables and elsewhere to denote God's care for His people. Cain was a "tiller of the soil" (Gen. 4:2).

Times, Observer of, a phrase referring to those persons who had a superstitious regard for days that were supposed to be lucky or unlucky, as decided by astrology. Such people were condemned (Deut. 18:9-14). Such persons were supposed to be able to foretell political or physical changes by the motion of clouds.

Town Clerk, a keeper of the public records, who presided over public gatherings, and performed the duties of the chief magistrate when he was away. An official of great importance (Acts 19:35).

Treasurer, important officer in Oriental courts, probably having charge of the receipts and disbursements of the public treasury (Ezra 1:8; 7:21; Isa. 22:15). This title was given to the officer of state of great importance, and was considered superior to all others and was sometimes filled by the heir to the throne (II Chron. 26:21).

Watchman, one whose duty was to stand in the tower on the walls or at the gates of the city. They also patrolled the streets, and besides protecting the city and its inhabitants from violence, were required to call out the hours of the night (II Sam. 18:24-27; S. of Sol. 5:7; Isa. 21:11,12).

Weaver, one who was skilled in the making of cloth or rugs from spun thread or string. The art of weaving was probably learned from the Egyptians by the Israelites; and they seem to have made progress in it from their own resources, even before they entered Palestine. Weaving was for the most part in the hands of women, although there were also weavers among men. The stuffs woven were linen, flax, and wool (Exod. 35:35; Lev. 13:48; I Chron. 11:23; Isa. 38:12).

Wizard, a "knowing or wise one." Witch was the name given to the woman and wizard the name given to the man who practiced witchcraft. There was a pretended communication with demons and spirits of the dead by means of which future events were revealed, diseases cured, evil spirits driven away, etc. It was severely denounced (Exod. 22:18; Lev. 20:6; II Kings 9:22; Gal. 5:20).

Writer. The knowledge of writing was possessed by the Hebrews at a very early period. The materials on which they wrote were of various kinds. Tables of stone, metal, plaster, wax-covered frames, skins, paper made from bulrushes and fine parchment were used. The pens were also different to correspond with the writing material (Judg. 5:14; Ps. 45:1; Ezek. 9:2). The prophets were often told to write, by the Lord, and may be considered writers (Rev. 1:11; 21:5).

OCHRAN, OCRAN (ŏk'răn, Heb. 'ōkhrān), father of Pagiel, prince of the tribe of Asher, appointed to assist in the first census of Israel (Num. 1:13; 7:72).

ODED (ō'dĕd, Heb. 'ôdhēdh, he has restored, or prophet). 1. The father of Azariah the prophet.

2. A prophet in Samaria in the days of Ahaz, king of Judah (II Chron. 28:9-15). Pekah, king of the northern tribes, had taken captive 200,000 Jews, after slaying 120,000 valiant men of Judah, and as the captives and the spoil were being brought into Samaria Oded rebuked them and persuaded them to feed and clothe the captives and to return them to Judah. Oded strongly emphasized the wrath of God which had brought ruin to the Jews, and would ruin Israel also.

ODOR (ō'dẽr, Heb. besem, Gr. osmé), that which affects the sense of smell. In ASV the word refers to a pleasant or sweet odor, while an unpleasant one is called "ill savour" or "stench." The Levitical offerings which did not deal with sin were called offerings of sweet savor; and the incense also (Mal. 1:11) with its perfumed odor was acceptable to the Lord. The prayers of the saints (figuratively) are offerings of a sweet savor to the Lord (Rev. 5:8). Hypocrisy yields a stench (Amos 5:21).

OFFENSE (ŏ-fĕns, Heb. 'āsham, hātā', Gr. skándalon). The word is used in a variety of ways in Scripture, as it is in English: injury, hurt, damage, occasion of sin, a stumbling block, an infraction of law, sin, transgression, state of being offended. In the NT it is often used in the sense of stumbling-block (Matt. 5:30; 11:6; 18:6; I Cor. 8:13, etc.). Throughout the NT there is warning by Christ and the apostles against doing anything that would turn anyone away from the faith.

OFFERINGS. The need for purification from sin or the desire of the worshiper to enter into fellowship with God underlay the prescription regarding the various kinds of offerings. They were derived from both the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and while they had certain elements in common with sacrificial rites in other nations, they were unique in many respects.

Sin offering, first mentioned at the consecration of Aaron (Exod. 29:10 seq.) was a special expiatory sacrifice. A bullock was killed before the bronze altar and on its projections (KJV horns) part of the sacrificial blood was smeared. The remainder was dashed against the base of the altar and the fat burned ceremonially. The flesh and skin were taken outside the tabernacle and burned separately. The law of the sin offering (Lev. 4:1-35; 6:24-30, etc.) provided for acts of unconscious transgression, mistakes or other inadvertencies. While cognizance was taken of differing circumstances and classes of offenders, no atonement could be made for deliberate rebellion against the covenant and its provisions (Num. 15:30). The worshiper normally laid his hand on the head of the sin offering, symbolically designating it as his substitute in the sacrificial ritual. Poor people were permitted to offer two turtledoves or a small amount of fine flour. The flesh which remained after portions had been burned belonged to the priest, and was eaten in the sanctuary precincts (Lev. 5:13). A special sin offering for the nation took place annually on the Day of Atonement, in which a bullock and a goat were sacrificed and their blood ceremonially smeared on the mercy-seat. Another goat was driven into the wilderness after symbolic transfer of communal sin (Lev. 16:1-28).

Trespass offering (Lev. 5:14-6:7), or guilt offering, signified expiation and restitution, and availed for inadvertent offenses, false swearing and improper dealings with a neighbor. By itself the offering made atonement towards God, but an additional one-fifth was required as a fine to compensate a neighbor adequately. The sacrificial ritual involved the slaughter of a ram, and was similar to that of the sin offering, although the imposition of hands and the sprinkling of blood in the holy place were not mentioned. Special offerings were required for the cleansing of a leper (Lev. 14:12-20) and a defiled Nazarite (Num. 6:12). All guilt offerings belonged to the priests, and were most sacred in character.

Peace offering symbolized right spiritual relations with God, and was among the earliest of the sacrificial offerings. The worshiper, if an ordinary Israelite, could bring a bullock, a lamb or a goat, male or female, and the ritual followed that of the sin-offering (Lev. 3:1-17). If the worshiper was a priest the fatty portions of the animal were removed and burned on the altar of God, while the blood was sprinkled at the base of the sacrificial altar. The ritual for a goat followed that laid down for a bullock.

Meal offering, or meat offering (KJV), was instituted when Aaron and his sons were consecrated (Exod. 29:41). It was forbidden to be offered on the altar of incense (Exod. 30:9), but was used when the tabernacle was completed (Exod. 40:29), and invariably accompanied the morning and evening burnt offerings. The ordinary Israelite was required to bring a mixture of fine flour, oil and frankincense, prepared in a variety of ways (Lev. 2:1-16), but without the addition of leaven or honey. All cereal offerings were to be seasoned with salt. The ritual for a priestly offerer required him to remove a token handful and burn it together with oil and frankincense as a memorial on the altar. What was left was most holy, and became priestly property.

Drink offerings, or libations, were common in the patriarchal period (Gen. 28:18; 35:14), and accompanied many of the sacrifices (Exod. 29:40f). They could not be poured upon the golden altar of incense (Exod. 30:9), and were required as an accompaniment of all freewill and votive offerings (Num. 15:5 seq.), the continual burnt sacrifice (Num. 28:7f). sabbaths (Num. 28:9f) and other established feasts (Num. 28:14-31; 29:6-39). The reference in Deuteronomy 32:38 indicates that drink offerings were common features of heathen cultic rituals. Oil and wine, used separately or as a mixture, constituted the normal libation.

Wave offering, heave offering. One part of the ritual associated with the peace offering involved the wave and heave offerings. Both were apparently initiated at the consecration of the Aaronic priesthood (Exod. 29:24-28). According to Leviticus 7:30-34, the worshiper was required to provide it from his own peace offering. When Aaron was consecrated, Moses placed the breast on the high priest's hands and waved the offering before the Lord. The portion was holy, and was a priestly prerequisite (Lev. 10:14f). The waving ritual applied also to the leper's male lamb (Lev. 14:12), the lamb of the guilt offering (Lev. 14:24), the sheaf of the firstfruits (Lev. 23:10-15), and the Nazarite's offering (Num. 6:19f). The Hebrew term implied a brandishing movement with the hands, symbolizing the presentation of the sacrificial portion to the deity and its return with approbation to God's priestly representative. Jewish interpreters state that in the wave ritual the priest laid the portion on the hands of the offerer, placed his own beneath and then instituted a movement back and forth, up and down. If this description is correct, priest and worshiper were making the sign of the cross.

The heave offering comprised the right thigh, the choicest part of the animal usually reserved for the guest of honor at a feast (cf. I Sam. 9:24). One cake of the peace offering was also treated as a heave offering (Lev. 7:14). The sacred portions were to be eaten by the priests alone (Lev. 10:14f). In Numbers 18:24 the Levites were promised a tithe of the Israelite heave offerings, and they in turn submitted a tithe of this to the priests (Num. 18:26-32). Deuteronomy 12:6,11 required all heave offerings to be eaten at the central sanctuary. Like the wave offering it was essentially sacred and belonged to the officiating priest. The Hebrew term comes from a root meaning "to be high," "to be exalted," which indicates a portion removed from a larger quantity rather than something "hurled" or "thrown." It was a token offering separated wholly to the service of God.

All offerings were related directly to covenantal religion, the basic principle of which was obedience. Each sacrifice was a reminder of human depravity and of divine provision for the helpless sinner. Without obedience and faith, however, the offerings were valueless. R.K.H.

OFFICER, a holder of an official position. The word is used in a variety of senses: (1) one who has been set up over others (I Kings 4:7, etc.); (2) a eunuch, such as Oriental kings set in charge of their women and also of much of the routine business of the court (Gen. 37:36, etc.); (3) a writer or clerk (Exod. 5:6; Deut. 20:9, etc.); (4) a police officer or bailiff (Luke 12:58); (5) originally an assistant or under-ruler (Matt. 5:25).

OFFSCOURING (Heb. sehî, refuse, Gr. perípsema, dirt), a contemptuous word for sweepings, scrapings, filth, dung, etc. "Thou hast made us an offscouring and refuse" (Lam. 3:45); "the filth of the world, the offscouring of all things" (I Cor. 4:13).

OG (ŏg, Heb. 'ôgh), Amorite king of Bashan (Deut. 31:4; Josh. 2:10; 13:21; I Kings 4:19). He was a man of gigantic stature, a physical characteristic of which there is strong evidence among the Canaanitish tribes. He held sway over 60 separate communities. Og's defeat before the invading Hebrews (Deut. 3:1-13) became proverbial, for it dispelled a legend of invincibility based upon the daunting appearance of some of the Canaanitish hoplites (Deut. 1:28). The tradition was long-lived (Ps. 135:11; 136:20). Og's territory was assigned in the partition of Palestine to Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe Manasseh (Num. 32:33). The "bedstead of iron" preserved as a museum piece at Rabbah among the Amorites (Deut. 3:11) was possibly a sarcophagus cut from black basaltic rock. Iron was not common in Palestine at the time, the Iron Age having been introduced by the Philistines. To prepare a sarcophagus was common aristocratic practice.

OHAD (ō'hăd, Heb. 'ōhadh, meaning unknown), the third son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10) and head of a clan in that tribe (Exod. 6:15).

OHEL (ō'hĕl, Heb. ōhel, tent), a son of Zerubbabel, a descendant of King Jehoiakim (I Chron. 3:20).

OHOLAH, OHOLIBAH (ō-hō'là, ō-hŏl'ĭ-bà, Heb. 'ohŏlâh, 'ohŏlîvâh), symbolic names for Samaria and for Jerusalem, pictured as harlots wandering off from God (Ezek. 23).

OIL (Heb. shemen, Gr. élaion), in the Bible almost always olive oil, perhaps the only exception being Esther 2:12, where it is oil of myrrh. The olives were sometimes beaten (Lev. 24:2), sometimes trodden (Mic. 6:15), but generally crushed in a mill designed for that purpose. The upper stone, instead of rubbing against the lower as in a flour mill, rolled upon it and so pressed out the oil. The wheel usually was turned by ox-power or donkey-power, the animal being blindfolded. Olive oil was not only a prime article of food, the bread being dipped in it, but it was used for cooking, for anointing, and for lighting. Oil was one of the principal ingredients in making soap (Jer. 2:22).

Anointing with oil was for three diverse purposes: wounded animals were anointed for the soothing and curative effects of the oil (Ps. 23:5); people anointed themselves with oil for its cosmetic value (Ps. 104:15); but most notably men were anointed as an official inauguration into high office. Priests (Exod. 28:41; 29:7), prophets, and kings (I Kings 19:15,16) were anointed and were called "messiahs" i.e., "anointed ones" (Lev. 4: 3,5,16; I Sam. 2:10; I Chron. 16:22). Anointing the head of a guest with oil was a mark of high courtesy (Luke 7:46). Oil is used also as a symbol for the Holy Spirit. Our Lord's Messiahship was not bestowed with the use of literal oil, but was evidenced when the Holy Spirit came down upon Him in the form of a dove at His baptism (Luke 3:22, etc.). Oil was also the prime source of light in dwellings and in the tabernacle. It was contained in little clay vessels so arranged that a wick lying in the oil was supported at one end, where the oil burned and furnished just about "one candle power" of light. A.B.F.

OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES. The use of perfume in the form of ointment or impregnated oil was a Middle Eastern practice long before it spread to the Mediterranean world. In all probability it was originally used for ceremonial purposes, first religious then secular, and became a personal habit with the growing sophistication of society, and the need for deodorants in hot lands (Esth. 2:12; Prov. 7:17; 27:9; Isa. 57:9). So universal was the practice that its intermission was an accepted sign of mourning (Deut. 28:40; Ruth 3:3; II Sam. 14:2; Dan. 10:3; Amos 6:6; Mic. 6:15; etc.). The skin, as well as the hair, was thus perfumed and anointed (Ps. 104:15), and, especially on high occasions, the scented unguent was used with profusion (Ps. 133:2). Its use was also a courtesy to an honored guest (Luke 7:46). Among the directions listed for the service of the tabernacle are two prescribed "recipes," possibly Egyptian in form (Exod. 30:23-25; 34-36). It is to be noted that one recipe prescribes 750 ounces of solids in six quarts of oil. It is possible that the oil was pressed off when the scent of the aromatic gums was absorbed. The liquid would then be used as anointing oil, while the solid provided an incense. The process of manufacture is not clear, and the account takes for granted that "the art of the apothecary" (more correctly "perfumer") is commonly familiar to the reader (Exod. 30:25,35; Neh. 3:8; Eccl. 10:1). It is, however, clear enough that the compound was based on the aromatic gum of Arabian plants (indigenous especially in Arabia Felix in the south of the peninsula) and that the medium or base was some form of fat or oil (probably calves' fat and olive oil). In its later trade form the perfume was sometimes packed in alabaster boxes or flasks (Luke 7:37). Such ointment was heavily scented (John 12:3) and costly (John 12:5). E.M.B.

OLD TESTAMENT. The OT is composed of 39 books — 5 of law, 12 of history, 5 of poetry, 5 of major prophets, and 12 of minor prophets. The classification of our present Hebrew Bibles is different — 5 of law, 8 of prophets, and 11 of miscellaneous writings. These 24 in various combinations contain all of our 39 books. Neither of these classifications exhibits the fact that much of the Pentateuch is history, nor do they show the chronological relations of the books. A logical survey of the OT literature may approach the subject chronologically.

Before Abraham. The first 11 chapters of Genesis give a brief outline of major events from the creation to the origin of the Jewish people in Abraham. Genesis 1 is a majestic revelation of God creating all the material and organic universe climaxing in man. This picture is not given in the categories of modern science and yet is in general agreement with much modern scientific theory. A prominent theory of today declares that all matter had a beginning in the distant but measurable past with a vast nuclear explosion, from which the universes have been differentiated. Creation of the universe or of man is not dated in Genesis. The creation of plants, animals and man is spread over six "days" or periods of indefinite length (called one "day" in 2:4). Genesis 2 and 3 detail the special creation of man and God's dealing with him in Eden. Man on probation fell into sin and the race was involved in sin and misery. God, however, promised a Redeemer (3:15) and instituted sacrifice as a type thereof.

The Flood. As men multiplied, sin increased and God sent a flood to destroy all mankind (chap. 6-8). Evidence is accumulating that about 8,000 B.C. some catastrophe associated with increased sedimentation on ocean floors overtook the earth with the last glaciation perhaps, and with the change of polar climates, which resulted in the destruction and freezing of great numbers of Siberian mammoths and other animals. Many widely separated cultures, including the old Babylonian, preserve legends of a great flood.

Early Genealogies. Pre-flood and post-flood genealogies are schematic and rather obviously incomplete, as are other Biblical genealogies. If Genesis 11:10-26 has no gaps, Shem would have outlived Abraham, which does not seem to be the Biblical picture. The dates of Noah and of Adam given in the margins of some Bibles assume the completeness of these lists and therefore are not valid.

Abraham and the Patriarchs. As sin again increased, God chose Abraham to found a new nation which God would protect, isolate to a degree, and through whom He would reveal Himself at last as Saviour. Abraham left polytheistic Mesopotamia and lived in Canaan where God instructed and blessed him, his son Isaac, and grandson Jacob. From Jacob came the 12 sons who fathered the tribes of Israel. The midpoint of Genesis, chap. 25, records the death of Abraham who lived in the Middle Bronze Age, about 1900 B.C. His characteristic was faith. To the sacrifices God now added infant circumcision as a sign of His covenant. Although circumcision was practiced elsewhere in antiquity, infant circumcision seems to have been unique. It was to be a sign both of the material and spiritual aspects of the covenant.

Bondage and Exodus (Exod. 1-19). Through providential circumstances of famine and through Joseph's exaltation, God took Jacob's family to Egypt for a period of growth. At first it was sheltered under Joseph's viziership. Later Israel was enslaved. God regarded the bitter bondage and through Moses delivered Israel by an outstretched hand. Ever since, Israel has remembered the deliverance from Pharaoh's army when the Lord brought them through the Red Sea (actually, one of the lakes through which the Suez Canal now passes). God led Israel to Mt. Sinai where the company of slaves became a nation under Moses, the great lawgiver, and where the Ten Commandments and other legislation were received.

The date of the Exodus has been much discussed. The Biblical data (I Kings 6:1; Judg. 11:26; Acts 13:20) appears to favor a date of 1440 or 1400 (LXX) and a conquest of Palestine in the Amarna Age. Some of the archaeological evidence favors this, but some is interpreted to favor an invasion at about 1230 B.C. There was indeed a general desolation of Palestinean cities at that time, but was it by Joshua, or due to other conflicts in the troubled period at the beginning of the Iron Age? The cities of Palestine also changed hands in the Amarna Age — about 1360 B.C. — and this date of Joshua's conquest is preferable.

Israel's Law (Exod. 20 — Num. 10). At Sinai Israel encamped for one year. Here God revealed Himself and His commandments in majestic miracle. The Ten Comandments of Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5 summarize the eternal principles of man's duty to God and to his fellow men. The last 20 chapters of Exodus, except for the apostasy of the golden calf, which took place while Moses was on the mount, concern the building of the tabernacle. Leviticus mainly concerns the ceremonial worship of Israel — the offerings, feasts, and cleansings. The section Leviticus 18-22, however, also includes regulations for civil conduct of the nation, as does Exodus 21-23. Leviticus 11-15 includes laws of cleanliness which have a typical aspect. Their main purpose, however, seems to have been to protect Israel in her food, to protect from vermin by enjoining strict cleanliness, and to protect from contagion by instituting certain quarantines.

The Wilderness (Numbers 11-36). Numbers adds some laws to Leviticus, but mainly tells the story of the abortive attempt to invade Canaan from the S and the experiences during the 40 years of wilderness wanderings. The first numbering is not a mere census, but a mustering of the ranks for the invasion. In Numbers 14, Israel at Kadesh Barnea hears the reports of the spies and in little faith, fails to conquer. Condemned to wander, they live as nomads at the edge of the arable land in Sinai until the generation of wrath dies. Several of the rebellions of these years are given in Numbers. At the end of the book a new mustering of the people provides 600,000 fighting men for Joshua's army. These numbers seem large, but in those days they allowed for no exemptions from the army for physical or other reasons. The numbers compare favorably with David's manpower of 1,300,000 and Saul's army of 330,000 and the figures in Judges 20:2,15 of 426,000.

Deuteronomy. Moses before his death conquered trans-Jordan and allowed two and a half tribes to settle there. In Deuteronomy, Moses retells the story of this campaign and recounts much of the history and regulations of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers.

Job. The date of Job is uncertain. As it seems to speak of a time before the Levitical legislation, and names descendants of Uz, Buz, and others of Abraham's kin, it may be placed in the general time of Moses and in the area E of Palestine. It poses the problem of the suffering of the righteous and answers that the sovereign God has His own purposes for which He is not answerable to men. It suggests a further answer that apparent injustices in the treatment of men are to be adjusted in a future life.

The Conquest. Joshua's invasion of Canaan is detailed in the first half of his book, Chap. 1-12. In a whirlwind campaign, after the miracles of the crossing of Jordan and the fall of Jericho, he gained possession of the middle of the country. At Aijalon, he conquered the army of the southern confederacy and, thanks to the extended day of the battle, demolished the enemy before it took refuge in its cities. The deserted cities were then easily taken. Shortly, he turned N to Hazor and its confederates and won a signal victory, burning it to the ground. But Israel did not at once effectively occupy the area. The Canaanites reestablished themselves in many cities. Key fortresses like Bethshan, Megiddo, and Jerusalem never were subdued. The land was allocated to the tribes in the last half of the book of Joshua, but the period of the judges witnessed a varying battle with the Israelites restricted mainly to the central mountain section.

The Judges and Ruth. For some 350 years the Israelites lived disorganized and to an extent disunited. Frequently falling into apostasy, they were punished by God. Then a leader arose for military deliverance and often for spiritual reviving as well. Sketches of six of these twelve judgeships are given. The rest are barely named. The beautiful story of Ruth, the Moabite convert, belongs in this time.

The Early Monarchy. The last judge was Samuel. In his days Philistine expansion became a great threat to Israel. The sanctuary at Shiloh was destroyed, as excavations also attest, at about 1050. The nation was laid low. Yet under the leadership of four great men, Israel in 100 years attained its peak of greatness. Samuel, the first of these men, was a prophet of power. His preaching, prayers, and policies led to an evangelical revival that was the basis for much of later successes. He was followed by Saul who was capable, but not good. Condemned in the records for his disobedience, he nevertheless seems to have made a real military contribution to Israel's unity. His army numbered 330,000 men. He gained important victories in the S and E and had some limited successes against the Philistines. His strength was sapped by disobedience to God and insane jealousy of David. He made a pitiable spectacle at the house of the witch of Endor before his final failure, in which he dragged down his fine son Jonathan and all Israel with him to defeat.

The Golden Age. David's history as king begins in II Samuel, which parallels I Chronicles after the first nine chapters of genealogies in the latter book. God had schooled David the hard way. Highly emotional, and consecrated to God as a child, he had gone through deep waters. Military lessons had come in repeated dangers as he was exiled by Saul. Faith was begotten and tested in adversity. At last, in God's time, He used this background to make David Israel's greatest conqueror, and best-loved poet, the founder of the royal house and re-establisher of Jehovah's worship. Family troubles resulting from the grievous sin with Bathsheba marred his later days, but the greatness of the man was shown in the depth of his repentance. He was a man after God's own heart.

In David's day, men would probably have honored him mostly for his military successes, his power and wealth, but actually, his greatest blessing to mankind has doubtless been his work in the establishing of psalmody. David composed at least half of the Psalms and arranged for the temple choirs and for Israel's liturgy. I Chronicles 15,16, and 25 tell something of this work. Amos 6:5 mentions his lasting fame as an inventor of musical instruments. David's psalms of praise have lifted up the hearts of millions in godly worship. His psalms of trust in the midst of trouble have for centuries comforted those in sorrow and in despair. Psalm 23 is perhaps the best-loved of the OT. In the hour of death and in times of deliverance alike, it has expressed the faith of untold multitudes of God's people. Associated with David in song were the prophets Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun and others.

Solomon inherited David's vast kingdom which reached from the Euphrates in Syria to the border of Egypt and from the desert to the sea. To these large possessions Solomon added the natural resources of the copper mines S of the Dead Sea. He built a famous foundry at Ezion Geber, using the force of the prevailing winds to increase the temperature of his fires. For the first time man had harnessed the forces of nature in industrial processes. The products of his industry he exported in lucrative trade that drenched Jerusalem in opulence. His building program was extensive and is illustrated by many excavations, especially at Megiddo. It is best remembered in his construction of the temple, described in I Kings and II Chronicles. This remarkable building was so engineered that the stones were cut at a distance and the sound of a hammer was not heard on the spot. It was double the dimensions of the wilderness tabernacle and more lavishly adorned. Its two rooms repeated the tabernacle plan with the inner shrine, a suitable type of the holiness of God, unapproachable except through atoning blood. In the outer room the priests maintained the light of the seven-branched candelabra, symbolic of the Holy Spirit; the shewbread, typical of communion of man with God; and the altar of incense, representing the prayers of saints. The building was about 30 ft. high and wide, and 90 ft. long. A porch in front was also 30 ft. high (according to some texts) and the building was flanked on each side with three stories of rooms for priests' quarters and storage. In the front court was the great altar where Israel declared its faith that there is remission of sin through the blood of a substitute. Nearer the temple was the large and ornate laver or "sea" for the cleansing of sanctification. Near the end of his reign Solomon and his kingdom decayed. Solomon's many wives were probably not due to lust, but to his extensive political alliances. They proved his undoing, however. He had married these foreign wives (outlandish women, Neh. 13:26) and joined them to some extent in their heathen worship. For this compromise he was rejected.

Divided Monarchy to Ahab. Solomon's sins bore bitter fruit. Rehoboam attempted to maintain the old glory without returning to the old sources of power. God punished by allowing division. Jeroboam I took 10 tribes and established the Northern Kingdom about 920 B.C. Ahijah promised him God's blessing if he would do God's will, but for political reasons he at once broke with the worship of Jehovah at Jerusalem. He set up golden calves at Dan and Bethel in the N and S of his realm, instituted a new priesthood and counterfeit feasts. He thus sealed his doom. Following kings did not depart from Jeroboam's sins. In the next 200 years of its existence the Northern Kingdom had nine dynasties, many revolutions, and sank deeply into idolatry. The Southern Kingdom, Judah, had its troubles, but many of its kings like Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah were great and good men.

The N fell most deeply into the worship of the Baals of Phoenicia in the reign of Ahab. He was faced with the threat of the Assyrian empire expanding to the W. His policy was to form a western coalition. Thus he married Jezebel, daughter of the king of Tyre. He united with Jehoshaphat of Judah, marrying his daughter to Jehoshaphat's son. Politically, he was successful and his coalition at the battle of Qarqar in 854 stopped the Assyrians. The Assyrian records tells us that Ahab was their principal opponent.

Religiously, Ahab was a failure. The Bible, being more interested in character than in conquest, shows the unvarnished sins of Ahab and his queen Jezebel. At this time the great prophets Elijah and Elisha ministered in the N. Their deeds are graphically told in I Kings 17 to II Kings 13. Only a passing reference is made to them in Chronicles which is a book more interested in Judah. Elijah, the fearless prophet who stood alone on Mt. Carmel was one of two men in all history taken to heaven without death. Encouraged by Elisha, Jehu revolted, exterminated the dynasty of Ahab, slaughtered the devotees of Baal, and even killed Ahaziah of Jerusalem who was in Samaria at the time.

The Kingdoms to Hezekiah. For the chronology of the kingdoms, a reliable guide is E.R. Thiele, Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1951). The dynasty of Jehu began about 840 B.C. and lasted a century, its chief king being Jeroboam II, 793 to 753. The kings of Judah included some good men, but from about 740 to 722 both kingdoms were evil and felt the scourge of the great Assyrian monarchs, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, and Sennacherib. This was the time of Isaiah and the first six Minor Prophets. Their messages in the N went unheeded and Samaria was destroyed in 722. In Judah there was a revival under Hezekiah and God wonderfully delivered him.

Isaiah and his Contemporaries. Hosea, Amos, and Micah prophesied especially to Israel, Obadiah and Joel to the Southern Kingdom. Jonah, the disobedient prophet, finally ministered in Nineveh. His experiences — miraculous, of course — in the fish's belly may well have affected his skin and compelled attention from the Ninevites. At least, the repentance of the Ninevites may well have delayed their invasion of Israel for a generation. It did not have lasting results in the Assyrian Empire. Amos and Micah give a forthright denunciation of the sins of the court and of the rich men of Israel. At the same time, Amos and Hosea, especially, denounce the idolatry of Bethel and of Samaria. Against the background of rebuke, these prophets announce Israel's and Judah's hope — the coming of the child from David's city, Bethlehem, and the re-establishing of the fallen tabernacle of David. To Isaiah, the evangelical prophet, it was given to condemn Ahaz for his idolatry, to encourage Hezekiah in his reforms, and to see beyond his day the threat of Babylon, the liberation of the exiles by Cyrus, and the coming of the Messiah in future suffering and glory. We think instinctively of the prediction of the virgin birth of Christ in Isaiah 7:14, of the atonement in chap. 53, and of the portrayal of the new Jerusalem in chap. 60.

Judah's Fall. The reforms of Hezekiah were engulfed in the long and wicked reign of his son Manasseh. Further decline followed in Amon's two years. Then in 640 the good king Josiah came to the throne. In his 13th year, Jeremiah began his ministry, and in five years more Josiah in a real revival invited all Judah and the remnant of Israel to a great passover. But, as reading of Jeremiah shows, the mass of the people were not changed. Josiah's successors reverted to type.

In 612 B.C. Babylon conquered Nineveh and the Assyrian government fled west. Egypt assisted Assyria, attempting to keep the old balance of power. On Egypt's first march N against Babylon, Josiah attempted to prevent Pharaoh Necho's passage at Megiddo and was killed. His son Jehoahaz succeeded him, but when Necho returned southward in three months, he took Jehoahaz to Egypt as a hostage and set his brother Jehoiakim on the throne. In 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar in his first year conquered the Assyrian and Egyptian forces at Carchemish on the Euphrates and proceeded S to Judah. He received Jehoiakim's submission and carried Daniel and others into captivity. In 597 Jehoiakim died, perhaps by assassination, and his son Jehoiachin took the throne, revolting against Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar came and on March 15, 597 (see tablets recently published by D. J. Wiseman) Chronicles of Chaldaean Kings, London: British Museum, 1956, p. 33) destroyed Jerusalem and took Ezekiel and others captive. He put a third son of Josiah, Zedekiah, on the throne. Zedekiah continued the wicked policies of the others. In 586 B.C. he too rebelled and Nebuchadnezzar returned in a final thrust, devastating Jerusalem and the cities of Judah. Palestine never fully recovered.

Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah were early contemporaries of Jeremiah. Nahum predicted the downfall of Nineveh. Habakkuk is famous for contrasting the wicked Babylonian invader with the just man who lives by faith.

Jeremiah first had a ministry to his people, rebuking them for sin and idolatry. The Assyrian and Babylonian gods had filtered into Judah until their idols were as numerous as the streets in Jerusalem. When some Jews had gone to Babylon, Jeremiah counseled the later kings to submit. Resistance was futile and would make it hard for those Jews already in exile. God would care for Israel in captivity and in 70 years would bring them back (Jer. 25:11,12).

The Exile. For 70 years, from about 605 B.C. to about 538 B.C. the Jews were slaves in Babylon. Some Jews were left in Judah, and Jeremiah at first ministered to them. Many Jews had fled to Egypt and finally Jeremiah was taken to Egypt by some of these men. In Babylon God blessed the Jews and kept them in the faith through the witness of Ezekiel, Daniel and others.

Ezekiel prophesied to his people, being still greatly concerned with Jerusalem before its final fall. Like Jeremiah, he used many object lessons in his preaching. Finally (Ezek. 33) came the word that the city had fallen. Thereafter Ezekiel emphasized more the coming of the Davidic King Messiah. His final chapters picture in schematic form the re-establishment of the temple, a prophecy held by many to apply to millennial times. Daniel was a towering figure of those days. Beloved of God and vouchsafed many remarkable visions of the future times, he maintained his faith while an important figure at court. His prophecies accurately depict the future kingdoms of Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome and tell both of Christ's first coming and His return. Christ's own designation for Himself, "Son of man," likely comes from this book. The book has been heavily attacked by criticism, but there is no good reason to deny the authorship by Daniel.

Post-Exilic Times. When Cyrus the Persian conquered Babylon, his policy was to allow captive peoples to go home. Thus he befriended the Jews. Ezra and Nehemiah tell about these returns. Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi prophesied in this period. Zerubbabel led back the first contingent of about 50,000 men shortly after Cyrus gave them permission. His work is detailed in Ezra 1 to 6. He laid the foundation of the temple at once, but did not finish it till 516 under the prophesying of Haggai and Zechariah. A second contingent returned in 456 under Ezra, as is related in Ezra 7 to 10. Nehemiah returned with various royal pledges in 444 and these two together did much work in restoring Jerusalem. Nehemiah organized the work and carried through the rebuilding of the wall. Ezra, a ready scribe in the Law of Moses, instructed the people in the faith. Malachi, the final book of the OT, was written around 400 B.C. It reveals the problems of the day caused by insincerity among some of the priests themselves. But it also, like so many of the other prophets, pointed forward to Messianic times. The OT closes with the annunciation of the rise of a new and greater prophet in the spirit and power of Elijah who would precede the Messiah of Israel. R.L.H.

OLIVE (See Plants)

OLIVES, MOUNT OF (called Olivet in two KJV contexts: II Sam. 15:30; Acts 1:12).

1. Geographical. The feature is a flattened, rounded ridge with four identifiable summits, named from the olive groves which anciently covered it. It is of cretaceous limestone formation, something over a mile in length, and forms the highest level of the range of hills to the E of Jerusalem (Ezek. 11:23; Zech. 14:4), rising 250 feet higher than the Temple Mount, and to 2600 feet above sea level. Hence the supreme tactical significance of the Mount of Olives, demonstrated in the Roman siege of Jerusalem under Titus in A.D. 70. The Romans seem to have named the northern extension of the ridge "the Lookout," or Mount Scopus, for this very reason. It gave "a plain view of the great temple," according to Josephus (B.J. 5:2:2). The legions had a large camp on the Mount itself, which, as Josephus describes it in the same context, "lies over against the city on the E side, and is parted from it by a deep valley interposed between them." The valley is the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat, through which flows the Kidron stream, encompassing the city in a slight curve to the E, before turning SE to flow down the long valley to the Dead Sea.

Near the foot of the Mount of Olives, on the western slope above the Kidron is the likely site of the Garden of Gethsemane. In NT times the whole area seems to have been a place of resort for those who sought relief from the heat of the crowded city streets. Dean Stanley called it the "park" of Jerusalem. In much earlier times it must have been heavily wooded, for when the Feast of the Tabernacles was restored in 445 B.C., Nehemiah commanded the people to "go forth into the mount and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and branches of thick trees to make booths" (8:15). The palm fronds of Palm Sunday were also gathered there. Four summits are traditionally distinguished. Scopus has already been mentioned. R. A. S. Macalister (HDB p. 668) considers it erroneously named, and not the vantage-point to which Josephus refers. Second, there is the 'Viri Galilaei,' the Latin invocation of Acts 1:11 ("Ye men of Galilee"), and the reputed site of the Ascension. To the S, above the village of Silwan (old Siloam) is the so-called Mount of Offence. This vantage-point is separated from the rest of the mount by a deep cleft. It faces W along the line of Jerusalem's second valley, the Valley of the Sons of Hinnom or Gehenna. The eminence derives its name from the tradition that Solomon here built his altars to Chemosh, "the abomination of Moab," and to Moloch, "the abomination of the children of Ammon" (I Kings 11:7). The "offence" of this blatant paganism was purged by Josiah four and a half centuries later (II Kings 23:13). The Josian context adds Ashtoreth and Milcom to the "abominations" on the site.

2. Historical. Historical associations have found incidental reference above, where their significance is inseparable from topography. The following points should be added. The ridge, besides being a tactical vantage point in war, was a peace time highway into Jerusalem. It was the route of David's flight from Absalom in the time of the palace rebellion (II Sam. 15:30; 16:1,13), and, significantly, was the route of Christ's approach for the triumphal entry on Palm Sunday, for it was there that the acclaiming multitude met Him. Hence, too, the prominence of the Mount in Josephus' account of the "Egyptian false prophet" and his 30,000 dupes (B.J. 2:13:5). "These he led round from the wilderness," the account runs, "to the mount which is called the Mount of Olives, and was ready to break into Jerusalem by force from that place." Here, it would appear, Felix met the rebels with his legionary force, and broke the revolt. The remaining OT reference to the Mount of Olives is the scene of the theophany of Zechariah 14:4, an obscure apocalyptic portion which awaits a clear explanation.

Historically the Mount of Olives finds its chief interest in NT times, where it is a locality intimately connected with the Jerusalem ministry of Christ. It is important here to distinguish authentic history from the thick accretions of legend and tradition. Christ's first sight of the city was from the summit of the Mount of Olives (Luke 19:41), and His visits to the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus in Bethany, must have taken Him frequently that way (Luke 21:37). The barren fig-tree of His striking object lesson on fruitless profession was probably on the slopes (Matt. 21:19). The Mount was also the scene of His apocalyptic utterance, inspired no doubt by the prospect of doomed Jerusalem from the mountainside (Matt. 24, 25). Gethsemane has already been mentioned as a locality somewhere on the Mount of Olives. The rest is wavering ecclesiastical tradition. Macalister remarks (HDB loc. cit.) that "the places pointed out have by no means remained unaltered through the Christian centuries, as becomes evident from a study of the writings of the pilgrims." He lists among the spurious sites, the tomb of the Virgin, the grotto of the Agony, one or both of the sites of the Garden, admitted though it is that it was somewhere on the Mount, the "footprint of Christ" in the chapel of the Ascension, the tomb of Huldah, the impossible site for Christ's lament over Jerusalem, the place where He taught the Lord's Prayer, and where the Apostles' creed was composed. This does not exhaust the list of legends. It has been the fate of Jerusalem to suffer thus from the pious, but not too scrupulous imagination of men. More authentic are a few archaeological remains, some Jewish and Christian tombs, and an interesting catacomb known as "the Tombs of the Prophets." E.M.B.

OLYMPAS (ō-lĭm'păs, Gr. Olympás), a Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom. 16:15).

OMAR (ō'mär, Heb. 'ômār), a grandson of Esau through his oldest son Eliphaz (Gen. 36:11,15).

OMEGA (ō-mē'gà), literally, big "O," last letter of the Greek alphabet, long o. In three contexts (Rev. 1:8; 21:6; 22:13) it is employed as a symbol of inclusiveness: ". . . Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last."

OMER (See Weights and Measures)

OMNIPOTENCE (ŏm-nĭp'ō-tĕns), the attribute of God which describes His ability to do whatever He wills. God's will is limited by His nature, and He therefore cannot do anything contrary to His nature as God, such as to ignore sin, to sin, or to do something absurd or self-contradictory. God is not controlled by His power, but has complete control over it; otherwise He would not be a free being. To a certain extent, He has voluntarily limited Himself by the free will of His rational creatures. Although the word "omnipotence" is not found in the Bible, the Scriptures clearly teach the omnipotence of God (Job 42:2; Jer. 32:17; Matt. 19:26; Luke 1:37; Rev. 19:6).

OMNIPRESENCE (ŏm'nĭ-prĕz'ĕns), the attribute of God by virtue of which He fills the universe in all its parts and is present everywhere at once. Not a part, but the whole of God is present in every place. The Bible teaches the omnipresence of God (Ps. 139:7-12; Jer. 23:23,24; Acts 17:27, 28). This is true of all three members of the Trinity. They are so closely related that where one is the others can be said to be (John 14:9-11).

OMNISCIENCE (ŏm-nĭsh'ĕns), the attribute by which God perfectly and eternally knows all things which can be known, past, present, and future. God knows how best to attain to His desired ends. God's omniscience is clearly taught in Scripture (Prov. 15:11; Ps. 147:5; Isa. 46:10).

OMRI (ŏm'rē, Heb. 'omrî). 1. Sixth king of Israel whose reign may be tentatively dated from 886 to 874 B.C. Omri, an able if unscrupulous soldier, and founder of a dynasty, is the first Hebrew monarch to be mentioned in non-Biblical records, and the fact may be some measure of his contemporary importance. It was not until 847 B.C. that Mesha included Omri's name in the inscription of the Moabite Stone, but it is a fact that Omri subdued Moab. It is of more significance that the Assyrian records after Omri's day frequently refer to northern Palestine as "the land of Humri" (the Assyrians spelled the name with an initial aspirate).

The brief but vivid account of Omri's somewhat sinister reign, and his military coup d'état, is told in I Kings 16:15-28. Omri was commander-in-chief under Elah, son of Baasha. When Elah was murdered by Zimri, Omri was proclaimed king by the army in the field, a pattern of events which was to become grimly familiar in the imperial history of Rome. The army was engaged, at the time, in siege of the stronghold of Gibbethon, a Levite town (Josh. 21:23) in the tribal territory of Dan (Josh. 19:44), which the Philistines appear to have held for a considerable period (I Kings 15:27; 16:15). Omri immediately raised the siege, marched on the royal capital of Tirzah, which does not appear to have been vigorously defended against him. Zimri committed suicide by burning the palace over his head. There was some opposition to the dominance of the military, for four years of civil war ensued, with half the populace supporting Tibni, son of Ginath, as king. Omri prevailed, and after a six-year reign at Tirzah, transferred the capital to Samaria, an eminently sensible move from the point of view of military security. Here Omri reigned for at least another six years. Samaria was named after Shemer, from whom Omri bought the hill-site (I Kings 16:24).

Omri is dismissed by the Hebrew historian as an evil influence (I Kings 16:25,26), and indeed, his marriage of Ahab, his son, to Jezebel, princess of Tyre, to cement, no doubt, a trade alliance, was fraught with most disastrous consequences, continuation, though it was, of Solomon's and David's Tyrian policy. The calf-worship of Jeroboam (I Kings 12:32) was continued at Bethel throughout the reign, and 140 years after his death, Micah is found denouncing "the statutes of Omri" (6:16). The palace of Omri has been excavated at Samaria, a series of open courts with rooms ranged round them. Omri died opportunely, one year before the first tentative thrust of the Assyrians towards the Mediterranean and Palestine. It was in 874 B.C. that Ashur-nazir-pal marched to "the Great Sea of the land of Amurru," and received tribute from the peoples of the coast. The Assyrian action is the preface to much misery.

2. A Benjamite, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

3. A man of Judah, family of Perez (I Chron. 9:4).

4. A prince of the tribe of Issachar in David's reign (I Chron. 27:18).

ON (ŏn, Heb. 'ôn). 1. A Delta city of Egypt, called by the Greeks Heliopolis (City of the Sun) and so rendered in the Septuagint (Gen. 41:45,50; 46:20). In Ezekiel 30:17 the name has been changed to "Aven" by misvocalization. "Aven" means "idolatry." It is called Bethshemesh in Jeremiah 43:13, a word of similar import. On is an Egyptian word signifying "light" or "sun," so the Greek and Hebrew names are fair translations. "Cleopatra's Needle" of Thames Embankment fame was originally one of the obelisks before the temple of the Sun at On, erected by Thothmes II (1503-1449 B.C.). On was founded at a very early date and was an important city long before the unification of Egypt. Herodotus' description of Egypt in his Second Book gives On (or Heliopolis) great attention. It was a nodal point of communication and a terminus of numerous caravan routes. In consequence it was the major center of commerce in northern Egypt. The priest of On, whose daughter Asenath became Joseph's wife, was thus a person of considerable importance. The worship of the Sun-god which was centered there had peculiar features which suggest Syrian influence. Ra was identified with Baal by Semites, and with Apollo by the Greeks. There must therefore have been a cosmopolitan element in the temple cult to match the atmosphere of a center of international trade. It is perhaps significant that On is named as the place of sojourn of the Holy Family after the flight into Egypt. Strabo the geographer describes the site as almost deserted in early Roman times. His account was written just before the Christian era. It is still a ruin, the site of the famous temple being marked by one conspicuous obelisk, a monument set up by Sesostris I about 2000 B.C.

2. A Reubenite chief who took part in the rebellion of Korah (Num. 16:1). E.M.B.

ONAM (ō'năm, Heb. 'ônām, strong). 1. Fifth son of Shobal, son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:23).

2. Great-great-grandson of Judah (I Chron. 2: 26,28).

ONAN (ō'năn, Heb. 'ônān, strong), second son of Judah by a Canaanite wife, daughter of Shua. He refused to consummate a levirate marriage with Tamar, widow of his elder brother Er, who had been wicked, and so Jehovah slew him too, leaving Tamar twice a widow (Gen. 38:4-10).

ONESIMUS (ō-nĕs'ĭ-mŭs, Gr. Onésimos, profitable), probably a common nickname for a slave. Paul puns on the word in Philemon 11 and again in vs. 20. A plain reading of the letters to Philemon and the Colossian church leads to the conclusion that Onesimus was a slave of Philemon of Colossae who robbed his master, and made his way to Rome, the frequent goal of such fugitives, the "common cesspool of the world," as the aristocratic historian Sallust called the city (Cat. 37:5). Some Ephesian or Colossian in Rome, perhaps Aristarchus (Acts 27:2; Philem. 24; Col. 4:10-14), or Epaphras (Col. 1:7; 4:12,13; Philem. 23) seems to have recognized the man and brought him to Paul in his captivity. Onesimus became a Christian and was persuaded to return to his master. From the incident came the exquisite letter of Paul to Philemon, which demonstrates so vividly the social solvent which Christianity had brought into the world. It would appear that Onesimus left Rome in company with Tychicus, carrying the letter to Philemon, and also the Pauline communications to the Ephesian and Colossian churches. Nothing more is known. The tradition that Onesimus became the martyr-bishop of Berea is of doubtful authenticity. E.M.B.

ONESIPHORUS (ŏn'ĕ-sĭf'ō-rŭs, Gr. Onesíphoros, profit-bringer), an Ephesian who ministered fearlessly to Paul at the time of the apostle's second captivity in Rome (II Tim. 1:16-18; 4:19). Paul's warm gratitude, and his care in the midst of his own distress to convey his greetings to the Ephesian family, is a light on his generous character, and further evidence of his capacity for commanding devotion. There are no valid grounds for concluding, as some scholars do, that Onesiphorus was dead at the time Paul wrote, much less to base upon the passage a doctrine of prayers for the dead. (See Guthrie, The Pastoral Epistles, Tyndale NT Commentaries, pp. 135, 136.) In the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla an Onesiphorus appears as a man of Iconium. A man of the same name was martyred in Mysia between A.D. 102 and 114.

ONION (See Plants)

ONLY-BEGOTTEN, a title applied to our Lord by John (John 1:14,18; 3:16,18; I John 4:9) and once in Hebrews (11:17) connected with the doctrine of the "eternal generation of the Son of God" (cf. Ps. 2:7 with Acts 13:33; Heb. 1:5; 5:5).

ONO (ō'nō, Heb. 'ônô, strong), a town ascribed to Benjamin in I Chronicles 8:12 because it was built by Shemed, a Benjamite, though in the territory originally assigned to the tribe of Dan. It lay in the plain, near the valley of craftsmen (Neh. 11: 35) and was about six miles SE of Joppa. Many of its men returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:33), and the town was later inhabited by men of Benjamin (Neh. 11:35). Nehemiah refused an invitation thither (Neh. 6:2).

ONYCHA (ŏn'ĭ-kà, Heb. shehēleth), an ingredient of the sweet-smelling incense which Moses was directed to make (Exod. 30:34). It is supposed to have been the covering of a certain mussel found in India, which when burning emitted an odor resembling musk. Very costly. See INCENSE.

ONYX (See Minerals)

OPHEL (ō'fĕl, Heb. ha-'ōphel, hill), properly a hill, but when used with the definite article in Hebrew, it is rendered "Ophel" and refers to a part of Jerusalem. In II Kings 5:24 the word is rendered "tower" in the KJV and "hill" in the ASV, but no one knows the exact location. In Micah 4:8 it is rendered "stronghold" in the KJV, but the ASV has "the hill of the daughter of Zion," and probably refers to the Ophel of Jerusalem. In Isaiah 32:14, the KJV has "forts," but the ASV, more accurately, "hill," and probably refers to Ophel. Ophel lies outside the wall of modern Jerusalem just S of the Mosque "el Aksa" and above the junction of the valleys of the Kidron and of the "son of Hinnom." Jotham, king of Judah, built much upon the wall of Ophel (II Chron. 27:3), and his great-grandson Manasseh further improved it (II Chron. 33:14), so that thenceforward it was inside the ancient city. In the restoration period it was principally a place of residence for the temple-servants, the Nethinim (Neh. 11:21).

OPHIR (ō'fêr, Heb. 'ôphîr). 1. A son of Joktan, son of Eber (Gen. 10:29). Of Eber's two sons, Peleg became ancestor of the "Hebrews" thus named from Eber, but Joktan and his progeny moved into Arabia. The names in "the table of the nations" (Gen. 10) often indicate locations, and Ophir is placed between Sheba and Havilah, both of which were in southern Arabia.

2. The land occupied by the descendants of Ophir. In I Kings 9:28 it is mentioned as the source of much gold (cf. Gen. 2:11,12 where Ophir's neighbor Havilah is cited for its good gold). Ophir in Arabia was not only the source of gold, but it may have been a way-station for the "ships of Tarshish" coming westward from India, if the apes, ivory, and peacocks (I Kings 10:22), to say nothing of the almug trees (I Kings 10:11,12), had to come from India. These large ships which made the round trip once in three years (I Kings 10:22) could have voyaged from the neighborhood of Goa on the west coast of India to Ophir, and thence up the Red Sea and the Gulf of Akaba to Ezion-geber (I Kings 9:26), keeping in sight or nearly in sight of land all of the way. Although many of the ancients, including Josephus (Ant. 8:6:4), thought of Ophir as being in India, the consensus of opinion today would place it as indicated above, in Arabia. Although gold is not mined there today, Ophir was famous for its gold from very early days (Job 22:24; 28:16).

OPHNI (ŏf'nī, Heb. hā-'ophnî), a city in the northern part of Benjamin, mentioned only in Joshua 18:24. It lay about 2½ miles NW of Bethel on one of the two main roads northward from Jerusalem to Samaria. Now called Jifneh.

OPHRAH (ŏf'rà, Heb. 'ophrâh, hind). 1. A town in Benjamin (Josh. 18:23). Now called Et-Taiyibah. It lies on a conical hill about three miles NE of Bethel and probably is the "Ephraim" of John 11:54 to which our Lord retired when under persecution.

2. A town in the tribe of Manasseh (Judg. 6:24) pertaining to the Abi-ezrites, a family of that tribe. Here the Angel of Jehovah appeared, sitting under an oak tree, and talked with Gideon, commissioning him to deliver Israel from the Midianites, and here Gideon put the ephod to which the children of Israel bowed down.

3. A son of Meonothai, an early member of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:14).

ORACLE (ŏr'à-k'l, Heb. dāvar, Gr. lógion). 1. An utterance supposedly coming from a deity and generally through an inspired medium. This is the classical usage, cf. "Sibylline Oracles."

2. In the Bible, an utterance from God. In II Samuel 16:23 we read that Ahitophel was so highly regarded before he turned traitor to David, that his words were considered as oracles from God.

3. In the ERV the word oracle is incorrectly used to render devîr, a term used to describe the Holy of Holies in the temple (I Kings 6:5f). In heathen temples "oracle" was used to describe the room where the utterances were delivered by the oracle.

4. The OT was referred to as "living (KJV 'lively') oracles" (Acts 7:38), and in Hebrews 5:12 "the oracles of God" would include Christian teaching. Christians are told to speak as the oracles of God (I Pet. 4:11).

ORATOR. 1. Isaiah 3:3 (KJV) has "the eloquent orator," where ASV reads "the skilful enchanter" which is correct, for the word is derived from the verb for charming serpents.

2. A public speaker, especially an advocate. Acts 24:1 mentions "a certain orator, named Tertullus" whom the Jews employed to speak against Paul before Felix, not that they lacked eloquence, but because Tertullus, a Roman, could make the accusation in Latin, the language of the Roman courts.

ORDAIN, ORDINATION. In the KJV "to ordain" is the rendering of about 35 different Hebrew, Greek, and Latin words. The word has many shades of meaning, chiefly the following: (1) to set in order, arrange (Ps. 132:17; Isa. 30:33); (2) to bring into being (I Kings 12:32; Num. 28:6; Ps. 8:2,3); (3) to decree (Esth. 9:27; Acts 16:4; Rom. 7:10); (4) to set apart for an office or duty (Mark 3:14; John 15:16; Acts 14:23).

Ordination in the sense of setting aside officers of the Church for a certain work by the laying on of hands was practiced in apostolic times (I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6), but it is nowhere described or enjoined. No great emphasis was placed on this rite.

OREB AND ZEEB (ō'rĕb, zē'ĕb, Heb. 'ōrēv, ze'ēv, raven and wolf), two princes of the Midianites in the days of Gideon. After Gideon's notable defeat of the Midianites, the Midianites who survived fled, and Gideon called upon the men of Manasseh to cut off the retreat at the crossings of the Jordan. Here they captured the two princes and beheaded them. The places of their deaths were named in their memory: Oreb died at the rock of Oreb and Zeeb at the wine-press of Zeeb (Judg. 7:24,25). Asaph, hundreds of years later, recalls these events in Psalm 83:11. The exact location of the killing is unknown.

ORNAMENT (See Dress)

ORNAN (ôr'năn), a Jebusite prince (called Araunah in II Sam. 24:16ff, etc.) whose threshing-floor was purchased by David after a plague (I Chron. 21:15-25).

ORONTES (ō-rŏn'tēz), the chief river in Syria, almost 400 miles long, rises in the Anti-Lebanon range, at the height of almost 4000 feet, and flows N for the major portion of its course. It turns W round the northern end of the range at Antioch, and then bends SW to the sea. Its fertile valley forms the only extensive area in Syria-Palestine not broken by mountains where a powerful political unit might take shape. This geographical fact is evident in history. The Orontes valley was the scene of the campaign of Rameses II against the Hittites in 1288 B.C. The campaign, and the culminating battle of Kadesh on the river, form the most publicized feat of ancient Egyptian arms. Juvenal, the Roman satirist, writing of the undesirable Syrian immigrants in Rome, uses the river as a metaphor for the whole province. "Long since," he writes, "has Syrian Orontes been a tributary of the Tiber" (3:62). E.M.B.

ORPAH (ôr'pà, Heb. 'orpâh, neck, i.e. stubbornness), a Moabite woman whom Chilion, son of Elimelech and Naomi, married. She loved her mother-in-law, but kissed her goodbye and remained in Moab, while Ruth, Naomi's other daughter-in-law, clave to her (Ruth 1:4,14; 4:9,10).

OSTIA (ôs'tyà), the port of Rome, on the Tiber mouth, some 16 miles from the city, traditionally founded by Ancus Marcius. Archaeological investigations have not yet confirmed dates earlier than 350 B.C. Ostia became a naval base during the Second Punic War, and continued to grow in commercial importance until the end of the second century of the Christian era. Evidence for a Christian community in Ostia can be traced with certainty as far back as A.D. 200. The ravages of Goth and Hun, and the appearance of endemic malaria made the site a desert.

OSTRAKA (ŏs'trà-kà), inscribed fragments of pottery (sing., ostrakon). In the ancient world handy writing material was rare, but potsherds, or broken pieces of earthenware, were abundant, hence the habit of writing brief memoranda or communications on such ready material. The surface holds the inscription well and some important ancient documents have come down to us in this form (e.g. the Lachish Letters). In ancient Athens the use of potsherds, or ostraka, for voting tablets in the peculiar Athenian process of relegation, led to the term "ostracise." The verb originally meant the writing on an ostrakon of the name of the person the voter wished thus to exile. Most of the ostraka from early Ptolemaic Egypt are tax-receipts. Later, orders, lists, brief letters, school exercises, magic formulae, and religious texts, both pagan and Christian, appear. A good deal about Egyptian Christianity has been deduced from this source. The material is scattered, most ostraka being recovered casually from rubbish-mounds or house-ruins. E.M.B.

OSTRICH (See Birds)

OTHNI (ŏth'nī, Heb. 'othnî, abbrev. of Othniel), son of Shemaiah, a doorkeeper of the tabernacle under David (I Chron. 26:7).

OTHNIEL (ŏth'nī-ĕl, Heb. 'othnî'ēl), son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, who with Joshua had brought back a good report of the land of Canaan after spying it out. Caleb, in his old age at the division of the land, offered his daughter to any one who would take Debir, about ten miles to the SW of Hebron. His nephew Othniel took Debir and so acquired Achsah as wife (Josh. 15:13-19; Judg. 1:11-15). Within 15 years after the death of Joshua, Israel fell off into apostasy and God delivered them into the hand of Cushanrishathaim (Judg. 3:8-11), king of Mesopotamia. In their distress they prayed to the Lord, who raised up Othniel to deliver them. He was thus the first of the seven "judges" to deliver Israel from foreign oppression. He so restored Israel that a period of 40 years of peace set in. His son was Hathath (I Chron. 4:13).

OUCHES (ouch'ĕz, Heb. mishbetsôth). 1. Settings for precious stones on the high-priest's ephod (Exod. 28:11).

2. A rich texture inwrought with gold thread or wire (Ps. 45:13).

OVEN, a chamber which is heated so as to roast or to bake the food materials placed therein. There were three principal types. In Egypt there was in nearly every house an erection of clay built upon the house floor. In this, or on this, baking was done. In Palestine and Syria, a barrel-shaped hole in the ground is coated with clay and a quick hot fire of brambles or dry dung mixed with straw heats it. The dough, beaten very thin, is spread on the inside and almost immediately taken out, baked. In some places, a curved plate of iron is put over the sunken oven; but in cities the oven is a chamber of stone, from which the fire is raked when the oven is very hot, and into which the unbaked loaves are placed (Hos. 7:4-7). See also BREAD and OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS (BAKER).

OVERSEER, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, each with its distinctive meaning: Heb. pāqadh, inspector, overseer (Gen. 39:4,5; II Chron. 34:12,17); menatstsehîm, foreman (II Chron. 2:18; 34:13); shōtēr, almost always officer; Gr. epískopos, bishop, overseer (Acts 20:28).

OWL (See Birds)

OWNER OF A SHIP. The phrase is found in Acts 27:11, where it says, "Nevertheless the centurion believed the master and the owner of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul." A distinction is made between the master (kybernétes) and the owner (naúkleros). Kubernétes refers to the steersman, or pilot; while naúkleros refers to the sailing-master of a ship engaged in state service (although the word also means ship-owner). This was, however, a corn ship in the imperial service, and would not be privately owned.

OX (See Animals, Cattle)

OX GOAD, a pointed stick used to urge the ox to further effort (Judg. 3:31). SEE GOAD.

OZEM (ō'zĕm, Heb. 'ōtsem). 1. The sixth son of Jesse (I Chron. 2:15).

2. A son of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:25).

OZIAS (See Uzziah)

OZNI (ŏz'nī, Heb. 'oznî), son of Gad and father of the Oznites (Num. 26:16).

P

PAARAI (pā'ȧ-rī, Heb. pa'ăray, devotee of Peor), one of David's mighty men called "the Arbites" (II Sam. 23:35). He is called Naarai in I Chronicles 11:37.

PADAN-ARAM (pā'dăn-ā'răm, plain of Aram). The word originally, as shown by the cuneiform contract tablets, signified a unit of measuring. It is the home of Jacob's exile (Gen. 31:18), the home of Laban. Beyond much controversy, it is to be identified with Haran of the upper Euphrates Valley. It is also sometimes translated as simply "Mesopotamia." In Genesis 48:7, Padan only; RSV, Paddan-aram.

PADON (pā'dŏn, Heb. pādhôn, redemption), the name of one of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47).

PAGIEL (pā'gĭ-ĕl, Heb. pagh'î'ēl, a meeting with God), the son of Ocran who was over the tribe of Asher (Num. 7:72).

PAHATH-MOAB (pā'hăth-mō'ăb, Heb. pahath-mô'āv, governor of Moab), a head of one of the chief houses of Judah. Part of the descendants of this man returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11) and another part returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:4). A son of Pahath-moab, Hashub, aided in repairing both the wall and tower of the furnaces (Neh. 3:11). He is one of the lay princes, whose name appears second in the signing of the sure covenant (Neh. 9:38; 10:14). His place in this list speaks of his importance. Eight of the sons of this man put away their strange wives (Ezra 10:30).

PALACE (Heb. 'armôn, bîrâh, hēkhāl, Gr. aulé), the dwelling place of an important official. Palaces are found all over the Biblical world. The science of archaeology has given much light on these ancient structures. Israel built many palaces and one finds frequent mention of them in the Scriptures. At Gezer the remains of a palace belonging to the period of Joshua's conquest have been found. It is thought to be the palace of Horam, king of Gezer, whom Joshua conquered (Josh. 10:33). Many of these old palaces were made of stone. This palace belongs to the group of palaces known as fortress palaces. They were sometimes the entrances to great tunnels. Some were constructed over important wells or springs of water which they controlled (Garrow Duncan, Digging Up Biblical History, Vol. I, London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1931, pp. 38, 147-148).

The ruins of another palace at this site stem from a much later period. It is the Maccabean Palace and is thought to be the private headquarters of John Hyrcanus, the military governor (George Barton, Archaeology and the Bible, Philadelphia: American Sunday School Union, 1916, pp. 168-169).

W. F. Albright has excavated Saul's palace-fortress at Gibeah. Not much remains in order here, but enough to reveal the massive walls that once made up this structure (W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine, Baltimore: Penguin Books, 1956, pp. 120-121).

David had two palaces at different times in his ministry. The first was a simple one located at Hebron, but the second one was much more elaborate, built of cedar trees furnished by Hiram of Tyre and erected by workmen that Hiram supplied (II Sam. 5:11). Solomon's palace that came later was a much more lavish structure, judging from its description given in I Kings 7. It was about 150 feet by 75 feet in size, constructed mostly of cedar in the interior and of hand-hewn stones for the exterior. Some of the foundation stones were 15 feet long. Solomon's wealth together with the skilled Phoenician craftsmen must have produced a magnificent building. Nothing remains of this building today.

Remains of a palace have been found at Megiddo. Another palace has been discovered at Samaria and identified as belonging to Omri. The foundation of this palace is in the bedrock of that area. Most of these palaces are similar in style — a series of open courts with rooms grouped around them.

An ivory palace belonging to Ahab is mentioned in I Kings 22:39. For a long time scholars denied the truthfulness of this record, but the archaeologist has confirmed the report. It was a large edifice 300 feet long from N to S. Many of its walls were faced with white marble. Wall paneling, plaques and furniture have been uncovered, made of or adorned with ivory. Clarence Fisher, one of the excavators at Samaria, says that its name, "ivory palace," was probably derived from the ivory decorations as well as the marble-faced walls which resemble ivory (Barton, op. cit., p. 168).

Two ivory panels from Samaria, probably decorative pieces from King Ahab's ivory palace. PAM

Later on in the history of Israel material prosperity produced a very great wickedness that led to murder even in these royal palaces of splendor. This was especially true in the time of Jeroboam II.

Probably the most famous palace in the NT period was the one belonging to Herod the Great. Josephus informs us that this structure was built in Jerusalem. Its rooms were of a very great height and adorned with all kinds of costly furniture (Flavius Josephus, Complete Works, translated by William Whiston, Grand Rapids: Kregel Publ., 1961, p. 385).

Besides these palaces of Palestine, there were many splendid structures in Mesopotamia in the Assyrian and Babylonian period. The remains of the great temple of Sargon II have been found at Khorsabad, 12 miles N of the site of old Nineveh. It was a mammoth structure covering 25 acres of land. Some of its walls were from nine to 16 feet thick. In the Oriental Institute Museum in Chicago one may see one of the stone bulls that once stood at the entrance of this palace. It is 16 feet long and 16 feet high, weighing 40 tons.

There are many other important palaces in Mesopotamia. One was that built by Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon, elaborately decorated. Another has been found on the Euphrates at Mari. This one has been quite well preserved and reveals paintings, offices, apartments and even a scribal school. Albright refers to it as one of the "show places of the world" (William F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity, Baltimore: The John Hopkins Press, 1940, p. 111). This discovery was important for many reasons but especially because it ". . . revolutionized our idea of the development of Near-Eastern art in the early second millennium B.C." (Albright, op. cit., p. 111).

Many famous palaces belonging to the pharaohs also have been found in Egypt. Perhaps the best known of these is the palace of Merneptah, from about 1230 B.C. Many of these were very elaborate structures. H.Z.C.

PALAL (pā'lăl, Heb. pālāl, he judges), son of Uzai who helped in repairing the Jerusalem walls (Neh. 3:25).

PALESTINE (păl'ĕs-tīn, Heb. pelesheth, Gr. Phylistieim, Allóphyloi).

1. Name. The term "Palestine" occurs four times in the KJV (Exod. 15:14; Isa. 14:29,31; Joel 3:4). In all four contexts it refers to Philistia, the coastal strip in the southeastern littoral of the Mediterranean occupied by the Philistines, an Indo-European people from Crete. ERV renders "Philistia" in all cases. Philistia itself derives from the Hebrew term for the region eres Pelistim, "the land of the Philistines"; and "Philistine" was a native term of unknown origin and significance. Josephus uses Palaistine in the same restricted geographical sense (e.g. Ant. 1:6:2; 13:5:10). It is in Herodotus, the fifth century Greek historian, that the extension of the term to cover a wider area is first seen (2:104; 3:5,91:7:89). The name "Palestine" is therefore another example of the common phenomenon whereby a land or a people is named after the part or the division with which first contact is made. The Romans, for example, called the Hellenes Graeci, and the land of Hellas Graecia, after the minor tribe immediately opposite the heel of Italy. The French name for Germany, Allemagne, derives from the trans-Rhenane federation of the Allemanni. The Arabs call all Europeans "Franks." Herodotus derived his knowledge of Palestine from Egypt, and possibly popularizes the Egyptian nomenclature, which named the whole ill-defined area to their north from the name of the occupants of the "Gaza Strip." A Philistine settlement had existed there since patriarchal times (Gen. 26). The older Semitic name was Canaan, a word of doubtful origin. According to Sir George A. Smith, the great geographer of Palestine, Canaan may mean "sunken" or "low land," and hence may have originally applied only to the coastal strip, as distinct from the highlands, extending then, after the fashion already noted, to wider geographic significance.

2. Locality and Area. The limits of Palestine in ancient times lack precise definition, save in the case of the second century Roman province of the name, whose boundaries may be fairly certainly drawn. The Leontes river (mod. Litani) is commonly regarded as the logical northern boundary, and the Wadi el 'Arish the natural frontier with Egypt. Political frontiers, ancient and modern, have not always respected these ideal boundaries. Even the limits poetically marked in the phrase "from Dan to Beersheba" do not correspond (Judg. 20:1). Dan was Laish, 30 miles due E of Tyre on the sources of the Jordan. Beersheba lay 150 miles to the S, as the crow flies, just where Palestine merges into the desert of the Negev. The "Promised Land" of Joshua 1:4 is geographically much more inclusive. The seacoast formed a definite enough western boundary, though from ancient Philistine to modern Egyptian, alien powers have always disputed possession of the fertile lowlands behind the coast. The deepening desert made a firm, if wavering boundary-line to the E. W of a line drawn down the Jordan valley, Palestine measures 6,000 square miles. If areas E of Jordan, from time to time counted part of Palestine, are also included, the total area is nearer 10,000 square miles. It is thus a little larger than the State of Vermont. It is remarked above that the distance from Dan to Beersheba is 150 miles. From W to E the distances are smaller still. In the N, from Acco to the Sea of Galilee, the distance is 28 miles. From Gaza to the Dead Sea in the S the distance is 54 miles.

3. Climate. In spite of its narrow limits, the varied configuration of Palestine produces great variety of climate. Thanks to the adjacent sea, the coastal plain, lying between latitudes 31 and 33, is temperate, with an average annual temperature of 57° at Joppa. Inland 34 miles, Jerusalem, thanks to its height of 2,600 feet registers an annual average of 63°, though with wider variations. Fifteen miles away at Jericho, 3,300 feet below Jerusalem, and 700 feet below sea level, tropical climate prevails with intense and enervating summer heat. A similar contrast marks the temperate climate round the Sea of Galilee, and the tropical heat round the Dead Sea. Prevailing winds are W or SW, and precipitate their moisture on the western slopes of the high country in a rainy season extending roughly from October to April. An occasional sirocco, or east wind, brings burning air from the great deserts of the hinterland (Job 1:19; Jer. 18:17; Ezek. 17:10; 27:26). The southern desert, S of Beersheba, is a parched wilderness, at present the scene of some of the world's major experiments in "dry-farming." The chief climatic advantage is a heavy fall of dew. The "former rain" of the Biblical phrase (Joel 2:23) was the early part of the rainy season. This period is commonly followed by a time of heavy falls alternating with fine clear weather, until March or April, when the "latter rain" falls with immense advantage to the maturing crops before the dry season, the ripening, and the harvest.

4. Geography. (a) The coast. The coast of Palestine is a line which sweeps S, with a slight curve to the W, without break or indentation. North of Carmel is Phoenicia, where a great maritime nation found the means to use and tame the sea, but N of Carmel, significantly, the coast is more hospitable, and offers hope of haven for ships. Those who lived behind the stern, flat coast of Palestine necessarily found the sea a barrier (Josh. 1:4), and an image of violence and restlessness (Isa. 17:12,13). By the same token, they were agricultural rather than maritime. From Carmel S to the Nile Delta, the coastline is built of sandhills and low cliffs, without a sheltering off-shore island to form a roadstead, or a river-mouth to give a minimum protection from the sea. It is "a shelf for the casting of wreckage and the roosting of sea-birds" (G. A. Smith: Historical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 128). The currents are parallel with the coast, and still bear the silt of the Nile. The prevailing wind beats on the shore with ceaseless surf. No intruder, with the possible exception of the Philistines, has ever landed there. Palestine's invaders have followed the open roads of her N-S plains and valleys. For the same reason, artificial harbors anciently built on the coast, even Herod's fine port of Caesarea, have always been difficult to maintain. On the first relaxation of human effort, the sea has overwhelmed them. A recent survey of the coast has indicated that the lost ports of Palestine are likely to prove a fruitful field of under-water archaeological exploration. The makeshifts or artificial ports on the Mediterranean coast may be listed as follows: Dor was used as a port, but it was an open roadstead, and never in firm control of the Israelite authorities. Joppa was little better, save that some off-shore reefs broke the force of the Mediterranean swell, and offered a fair-weather port. First under Philistine, and later under Syrian control, Joppa fell to the Jews as a conquest of Simon Maccabaeus in 148 B.C. "To add to his reputation," runs the account, "he took Joppa for a harbor, and provided an access for the islands of the sea" (I Macc. 14:5). Simon found a considerable Greek population in the port, and was put to some trouble in occupying and fortifying it. After 85 years, during which the Syrians twice reoccupied the port, Pompey allotted it to Syria in his organization of the East (63 B.C.). In 47 Caesar returned it to the Jews, and Augustus made it part of the domains of Herod the Great. These historical vicissitudes illustrate the disadvantages of a littoral geographically so difficult. Ashkelon, the only Philistine city actually on the coast, and a foundation old enough to find mention in the Tell-el-Amarna letters, served also as a port, and archaeology may establish the presence of harbor works. Caesarea, Herod's ambitious foundation 20 miles S of modern Haifa, was an efficient port. Herod spent 12 years building not only a harbor but a city of some magnificence. Enormous blocks of stone formed a breakwater 200 feet wide in 20 fathoms of water, and made the only real harbor on the coast. Hence the Hebrew name Leminah, a Hebraic rendering of Greek limen, "a harbor." Associated harbor buildings, navigational aids, and a well-equipped town made Caesarea the natural seat for Roman authority in Palestine.

(b) The Maritime Plain. A coastal plain shaped like a long spear-point with its tip where Carmel thrusts to the sea is the main western geographical feature of Palestine. North of Carmel, the small plain of Acco or Acre, a detached section of the coastal plain, should be mentioned. S of Carmel, widening from eight miles to 12, and extending for 44 miles, is the Plain of Sharon, once an extensive oak-forest, well-watered, and bounded to the S by low hills. S again of this inconsiderable barrier, and similarly widening over the course of its whole 40 miles to the borders of Egypt, is the famous Plain of Philistia, after which the whole land was named. Marshes, the "Serbonian Bog" of Strabo, Diodorus, and Pliny, were found at the southern end of the Philistine plain. They were salt marshes behind the coastal dunes, and are mentioned because they were a breeding-ground of disease, which has played its part in history. Hereabouts Sennacherib's army was destroyed, perhaps by some devastating plague, sent, as Scripture says, by the angel of the Lord. Historical records, extending as far as Napoleon, refer to similar decimating attacks of pestilence among large bodies of men traversing this area. In spite, however, of the unhealthiness of the marshy strip, the coastal plain has always been a highway of commerce or aggression. By this path traveled the Egyptian conquerors seeking out their northern foes, the Hittites, Thothmes III, Ramses II, and Seti I. By this same path, and thence into the plain of Esdraelon, traveled Cambyses, Alexander, Pompey, Saladin, Napoleon, and Allenby. The plain forms the western blade of the Fertile Crescent, the grand highway between Africa, Asia, and Europe.

(c) The Uplands. The tumbled hill-country which forms the core or backbone of the land, is a continuation of the more clearly-defined Lebanon ranges to the N of Palestine. This extended mountain chain breaks up into confused hills in the desert of the S. Three divisions are to be distinguished: Galilee, Samaria, and Judah. Galilee is rugged, especially to the N, where a height of 4,000 feet above sea level is reached near Merom. The southern portion is less hilly, and might even be described as rolling land, arable, fertile, and temperate in climate. S of Galilee, the Valley of Jezreel, or the Plain of Esdraelon, cuts the range, the location of many important ancient towns, and an open highway to the N. The town of Megiddo controlled the pass into the Plain of Sharon. Since Mt. Carmel dominated the road along the coast, Megiddo was a place of paramount strategic importance. From the strife which, through the centuries, necessarily gathered around it, Har-Magedon, or "the Hill of Megiddo" became a symbol of the struggle of nations (Rev. 16:16). Two valleys from Esdraelon gave access to the Jordan. One passes between Tabor and Moreh, the other between Moreh and Gilboa. Here lay the best E-W traverse of the land. The Samaria hill-country forms the geographical heart of Palestine. The uplands rise in the N to 1,640 feet in Mount Gilboa, and throw up two conspicuous peaks of Ebal (3,077 feet above sea level), and Gerizim, a rather lower eminence. Fertile valleys intersect these high masses, and since the valley-floors are themselves of considerable altitude, the higher country has not the visible height or prominence which the sea level figures appear to indicate. The third division of the hill country is Judah. Here the summits are lower than in the region of Samaria, falling to 2,600 feet in Jerusalem, and touching their highest point, 3,370 feet near Hebron. This country forms a watershed which strains the moisture from the Mediterranean sea breezes. The eastern slopes, in consequence, deteriorate into the barren "wilderness of Judah," deeply intersected by the arid ravines which converge on the Dead Sea. This barren wasteland was the refuge of David in his outlaw days. Ordered life and agriculture concentrated on the W in the so-called "Shephelah," the sloping foothills and valley tongues which led up from the coastal plain into the Judaean hills. In sheltered folds of the hills, argiculture flourished, and fertility seeped down from the higher land. The Shephelah was disputed territory. In days of strength the Hebrew highlanders pressed down towards the plain. When the strength of the hill-men wavered or flagged, the Philistine lowlanders thrust up into the foothills. The Shephelah saw a pressure front between the Semitic claimants from the desert and the E, and the W. Fortresses such as Lachish, Debir, Libnah, Azekah, and Bethshemesh, were located in the Shephelah. To the S the Judean hill-country breaks up into the arid wilderness of the Negev. There is strong archaeological evidence for a considerable population in this area in the early centuries of the Christian era, made possible by efficient water conservation, irrigation systems, and the effective use, through rock-mulching, of the heavy fall of dew.

(d) The Jordan Valley. This depression, which contains the Jordan River and its associated sheets of water, is part of a huge split in the crust of the globe, a geological fault which extends N to form the valley between the two Lebanon ranges, and S of the Dead Sea, to form the arid valley of the Arabah, the Gulf of Aqabah, and the African chain of lakes. The Jordan rises from multiple sources on the western slopes of Hermon, and becomes a distinctive stream a few miles N of the shallow reedy lake called Huleh today, Semechonitis by Josephus, and "the waters of Merom" in Joshua 11:5. The Canaanitish stronghold of Hazor lay a few miles to the SW. From its sources to Huleh, the Jordan drops 1,000 feet over a distance of 12 miles, and enters the lake seven feet above sea level. Over the 11 miles to the Sea of Galilee, it drops to 682 feet below sea level. From Galilee to the Dead Sea there is a further drop of 600 feet. Galilee is the OT Chinnereth or Chinneroth (Num. 34:11; Josh. 12:3), names echoed in the NT Gennesaret. John, writing for Gentile readers, calls the lake "the Sea of Tiberias" from the name of the town founded by Herod Antipas on the shore. Some of Palestine's most fertile soil is found around the shores, and the lake itself was the center of an extensive and vigorous fishing industry. Capernaum, Bethsaida, and perhaps Chorazin, were lakeside towns. So were Tiberias and Tarichea, neither of which is mentioned in the Gospels, unless the latter town is, in fact, Magdala. Bethsaida means "fishing-place," and Tarichea derives its name from a Greek word meaning "preserved fish." Both names therefore point to the lake's fishing industry. It is clear that the first disciples were called from an active and prosperous stratum of Galilean society. Flowing S from Galilee, through a wide-floored valley walled by cliffs, the Jordan follows a fantastically meandering course, taking 200 miles of winding stream to cover 65 miles measured in a straight line. Much of the valley floor is tangled vegetation, fed lushly by the periodic flood-waters of the river. It is this wilderness which Jeremiah calls "the swelling," or "the pride" of Jordan (12:5; 49:19). Fords are numerous. The river enters the Dead Sea near Jericho. This lake has no outflow and its water is therefore 25 per cent salt deposits, the raw material of a flourishing chemical industry recently established in the region of the lake. Two-thirds of the way down the eastern coast, W of Kir-hareseth in Moab, an irregular peninsula known as "the Tongue" projects into the sea. S of this peninsula the water is only a few feet deep, forming a large bay known anciently as "the Vale of Siddim" (Gen. 14:3). Here, it is thought, were situated the "cities of the plain" Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar. About 2,000 B.C. a great catastrophe overwhelmed the area and depressed the ground level. Underwater archaeological exploration seems to confirm that Sodom and its associated towns perished in this cataclysm.

(e) The Plateau of Transjordan. This is not part of modern Palestine, and was alien territory over much of ancient history. It was, however, intimately connected with Biblical history, and its geography relevant in consequence. N of the Yarmuk, a tributary of the Jordan S of the Sea of Galilee, is Bashan. Through this region in NT times curved the eastern members of the federation of ten cities known as the Decapolis. In its eastern quarter lay the Trachonitis of the Greeks (Luke 3:1), a tumbled waste of ancient volcanic stone, a natural defensive area, and part of the principality of Og of Bashan (Deut. 3:4). S of Bashan, and extending to the river, is Gilead. Jabbok whose banks were the scene of Jacob's contest (Gen. 33), rose near Rabbath-Ammon, the Philadelphia of the Decapolis, and irrigated a considerable territory. In the tribal settlement recorded in Numbers 32 and Joshua 12, Manasseh was allotted all Bashan in the N, Reuben the Moabite highlands in the S, and Gad the central land of Gilead. Hence the identification of Gad with Gilead in Judges 5:17. In Gilead was the Cherith, scene of Elijah's retreat, and David's refuge of Mahanaim. It was well-watered and wooded. S of Jabbok, down to the Arnon, which joins the Dead Sea, half-way down its eastern coast, the plateau becomes increasingly arid and desolate. This area contains the height of Nebo, the old land of Ammon. S of Arnon is Moab, a high plateau seldom controlled by Israel, and further S still is Edom, a region valuable for its minerable deposits, and first controlled and exploited by David and Solomon. It was possibly the iron of Edom, smelted in the considerable industrial district which had been developed just N of the Gulf of Aqabah, which enabled Israel to emerge from the Bronze Age, and meet the iron-using Philistines on their own terms. Petra, the strange rock of the desert trade-routes, was originally an Edomite stronghold. This survey of the form and shape of Palestine may appropriately conclude with an eloquent passage from Sir George Adam Smith: "There is no land at once so much a sanctuary and an observatory as Palestine: no land which, until its office was fulfilled, was so swept by the great forces of history, and was yet so capable of preserving one tribe in national continuity and growth: one tribe, learning and suffering and rising superior to the successive problems these forces presented to her, till upon the opportunity afforded by the last of them she launched with her results upon the world. It is the privilege of the student of the historical geography of Palestine, to follow all this process of development in detail. If a man can believe that there is no directing hand behind our universe and the history of our race, he will, of course, say that all this is the result of chance. But for most of us, only another conclusion is possible." (Historical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 112).

5. Animal Life. Besides the common domesticated animals of the ancient Middle East, the horse, ox, sheep, goat, camel, ass, mule, Palestine was the habitat of numerous predatory beasts, principally the lion, leopard, wolf, jackal, and fox. The hare, the coney (a species of rabbit), the wild boar, and the deer were also found. A concordance, under any of these heads, will show the variety of metaphor and imagery based on animal life, both tame animals and the "beasts of the field." The dog was considered almost a wild creature, and provides a term for uncleanness, treachery, and contempt. The dog of Palestine was a pariah and scavenger, and used in neither hunting nor shepherding, save for the doubtful reference of Job 30:1. The cryptic reference in Deuteronomy 23:18 probably has to do with homosexual prostitution (SEE ANIMALS). Song birds are rare, but scavenger and predatory fowl included the eagle, vulture, owl, hawk, and kite. The heron, bittern, osprey, partridge, peacock, dove, pigeon, quail, raven, stork, and sparrow were common, and find frequent reference in both Testaments (SEE BIRDS). Fish were plentiful, especially in Galilee, where the shoals were dense. The chief edible fish seem to have been carp. Bees, grasshoppers, and locusts were among the insects (SEE INSECTS). Palestine lies in the belt of territory subject to locust invasion, and the Book of Joel is striking evidence for the destructive visitation of such insect swarms.

6. Plant life. Flowers are abundant in spring, giving brilliant display for a brief period only. Hence their use as a symbol of the ephemeral nature of life (Job 14:2; Psalm 103:15). The "lilies of the field" (Matt. 6:28) may have been a comprehensive term covering anemones, irises and other blooms. The rose was probably the crocus (S. of Sol. 2:1; Isa. 35:1). Trees grow vigorously in Palestine under proper cultivation, but the forest coverage in ancient times is a matter for conjecture. It may safely be assumed that parts of Palestine must have been more heavily wooded in ancient times than in any other period. Invasion and the Turkish tax on trees combined over the centuries to destroy the arboreal flora of Palestine. On the other hand, Palestine is not an ideal region for major forest growth. Smith remarks: "The distribution of woodland may have been different (i.e. in ancient days) but the woods were what we find the characteristic Palestine wood still to be—open and scattered, the trees distinguished rather for thickness than for height, and little undergrowth when compared with a northern or a tropical forest. Here and there groves of larger trees, or solitary giants of their kind, may have stood conspicuous on the bare landscape" (op. sup. cit. p. 81). The chief varieties were the oak, including the evergreen ilex, the terebinth, the carob, and the box, which attains a height of 20 feet, some pines, cypresses, and plane trees by the water. The plane is probably the tree of Psalm 1, "planted by the rivers of water." Josephus mentions the walnut, and the sycamore is mentioned in Amos (7:14), Isaiah (9:9,10), and Luke (19:4). Smaller growth is formed of dwarf or scrub oak, dwarf wild olive, wild vine, juniper, and thorn. Such scrub often marks the abandoned sites of ancient cultivation. Oleanders sometimes line river-beds. The olive, the vine, the fig, and the date-palm were the chief fruit-bearing trees or plants of ancient Palestine, and balsam groves were farmed at Jericho. Corn crops were barley, wheat, and millet. Wheat grew in the broader valleys and plains, the best areas for its cultivation being Philistia and Esdraelon. Barley grew on the higher slopes, a less valued crop. It is significant that the apprehensive Midianite soldier saw Israel in his dream in the symbol of a barley-cake rolling disastrously from the hills (Judg. 7:13). Beans and lentils were the chief vegetables. Jacob's "pottage" (Gen. 25:30) was probably a variety of red beans or lentil. The land was poor in grass, pasturage, as Western countries know it being unknown. Hence the imagery of grass in reference to the brevity of life (Ps. 90:5-7; 103:15; Isa. 40:6). (SEE PLANTS) E.M.B.

PALLU, PALLUITE (păl'ū, păl'ū-īt, Heb. pallû', distinguished, a descendant of Pallu), Reuben's second son (Gen. 46:9). (See also Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:5,8; I Chron. 5:3). He was the founder of the Palluites (Num. 26:5).

PALMER WORM (Heb. gāzām), means "caterpillar," but the insect meant in the Heb. text is probably a kind of locust (Joel 1:4; 2:25; Amos 4:9).

PALTI (păl'tī, Heb. paltî, delivered). 1. One of the 12 spies, from the tribe of Benjamin (Num. 13:9). Once Phalti in KJV (I Sam. 25:44).

2. The man to whom Saul gave Michal, David's wife (I Sam. 25:44).

PALTIEL (păl'tĭ-ĕl, Heb. paltî'ēl, God delivers). 1. The son of Azzan from the tribe of Issachar (Num. 34:26).

2. Once Phaltiel in KJV (II Sam. 3:15), the same as Palti 2.

PALTITE (păl'tīt, Heb. paltî, delivered), the Gentile name of Helez, one of David's valiant men. Called the Pelonite (I Chron. 11:27; 27:10). Same as Palti.

PAMPHYLIA (păm-fĭl'ĭ-à, Gr. Pamphylía). At the time of St. Paul, Pamphilia was a small Roman province of southern Asia Minor extending along the Mediterranean coast 75 miles and 30 miles inland to the Taurus Mountains. It was surrounded by Pisidia on the N, Cilicia to the E, and Lycia to the SW. It never became an important province and its boundaries were often changed by sudden and arbitrary political decisions. The Emperor Claudius brought it into the Roman provincial system in the first century A.D.

The tiny country is first mentioned in the NT in Acts 2:10 where it is said that some of the people at Pentecost were from Phrygia and Pamphilia. The Apostle Paul visited the territory on his first missionary journey when he preached at Perga, its chief city (Acts 13:13; 14:24). At this point John Mark left the party and returned to Jerusalem (Acts 13:13; 15:38). Later, when Paul as a prisoner "sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphilia" (Acts 27:5), he evidently crossed the Pamphilian Gulf. It is said that most of the inhabitants of Pamphilia were backward and illiterate. Christianity never flourished there as in other places of Asia Minor.

PANNAG (păn'ăg, Heb. pannagh, meaning uncertain), one of the articles of trade between Judah and Israel (Ezek. 27:17).

PAPHOS (pā'fŏs, Gr. Páphos), the capital city of Roman Cyprus, located at the extreme W end of this large island. The Paphos of the Bible is really New Paphos, a Roman city rebuilt by Augustus; the old Greek city of Paphos, dedicated to the worship of Aphrodite, lay ten miles to the S. In New Paphos Paul and Barnabas encountered the wiles of the Jewish sorcerer Elymas in the court of Sergius Paulus, the Roman governor. Paul's miracle of blinding the magician led to the conversion of Paulus (Acts 13:6-13). New Paphos is now known as Baffa.

PAPYRUS (pə-pī′rŭs, Gr. papýros), a plant-like reed or rush which grows in swamps and along rivers or lakes, often to the height of 12 feet with beautiful flowers at the top. The stalk is triangular in shape, something like a giant celery stalk. In ancient times it was found mainly along the Nile in Egypt but was also known in Palestine. For commercial use the stalk was cut into sections about a foot long and these pieces were then sliced lengthwise into thin strips which were shaped and squared and laid edge to edge to form a larger piece. Other strips were laid horizontally over these strips and both were pressed together, dried in the sun, scraped and rubbed until there emerged a smooth yellowish sheet much like our heavy wrapping paper, only thicker and heavier. The juice of the pith served as the glue but sometimes other paste was added.

The manufacture of papyrus was a flourishing business in Egypt, where baskets, sandals, boats and other articles were made of it. It was not unknown among the Hebrews (Job 8:11) and some believe that the ark of Moses was made of papyrus (Exod. 2:3). But the most common use of the product was for writing material, so much so that "papyrus" became the name for writing paper. The art of making papyrus goes back to 2,000 B.C. and it was the common writing material in the Greek and Roman worlds from 500 B.C. until A.D. 400, when vellum largely replaced it until the 15th century as paper and the printing press took over. There is little doubt that the New Testament books were written on papyrus (pl. papyri). The material was also called chartes in Greek and John no doubt wrote his Second Epistle on such paper (II John 12). For long books (rolls or scrolls) many pieces of papyrus were glued together and rolled up. Such a roll was called biblos or biblion from which our word Bible is derived (cf. Tim. 4:13; Rev. 10:10; Ezek. 2:9-10). The width of the roll varied from three to twelve inches and sometimes the roll got to be as long as 25 feet. Luke's Gospel is estimated at 30 feet, but II Thessalonians may have been only 18 inches long and short letters like Jude or Philemon were perhaps written on a single small sheet. The writer wrote in columns evenly spaced along the length of the roll and the reader read one column at a time, unrolling with one hand and rolling up with the other.

Papyrus, however, becomes brittle with age and easily decays, especially when damp. This is why the autographs of the New Testament writings have perished. They may also have been literally read to pieces and during persecution were deliberately destroyed. But thousands of ancient papyri have been found in the dry sands of Egypt and elsewhere. Our libraries contain large collections of both Biblical and secular papyri — Bible texts, legal documents, marriage contracts, letters, etc. Many of the New Testament papyri ante-date all other codices. Examples are the Rylands Papyrus, the famous Chester Beatty Papyri, and the more recent Bodmer Papyrus of the Gospel of John. They have added much to our knowledge of the Greek language and the text of the NT. L.M.P.

PARABLE (păr'ă-b'l, Gr. parabolé, likeness), derived from the Greek verb parabállo, composed of the preposition para meaning beside and the verb bállo, to cast. A parable is thus a comparison of two objects for the purpose of teaching.

Although the word properly belongs to the NT, being found there 46 times, it does occur 15 times in the OT. There it is the translation of the Hebrew mashál. It seems to be used in the OT in several senses. Sometimes it is a proverbial saying or byword (I Sam. 10:12; 24:14). In Numbers it is seen more as a prophetic figurative discourse (Num. 23:7,18,24). Ezekiel employs the word much as one would today with the idea of similitude or parable (Ezek. 17:2; 21:5; 24:3). Several writers treat the word as a poem (Num. 21:27-30; I Kings 5:12; Ps. 49:5; 78:2). The writer of the Proverbs thinks of it as a sentence that contains ethical wisdom (Prov. 10:1; 25:1). Finally it is associated with the riddle or dark saying (Ps. 49:4; Ezek. 17:2; 20:4-9). Five times the NT uses the Greek word paroimía for parable. This may be synonymous with parabolé or, as found in the Johannine writings, may refer to a didactic, symbolic or figurative utterance (John 10:6; 16:29).

There are a number of English words similar in meaning to the parable, and probably no one has been more definite and clear in distinguishing between these than Trench. Trench summarizes thus: "The parable differs from the fable, moving as it does in a spiritual world, and never transgressing the actual order of things natural — from the mythus, there being in the latter an unconscious blending of the deeper meaning with the outward symbol, the two remaining separate and separable in the parable — from the proverb, inasmuch as it is longer carried out, and not merely accidentally and occasionally, but necessarily figurative —from the allegory, comparing as it does one thing with another, at the same time preserving them apart as an inner and outer, not transferring, as does the allegory, the properties and qualities and relations of one to the other (R. Trench, Notes on the Parables, pp. 15-16). The importance of definition is shown by Moulton when he says that, because of varied definition of a parable, scholars have counted 79, 71, 59, 39, 37, and 33 parables in the New Testament (W. J. Moulton, "Parable" in Hastings, Dictionary of Christ and The Gospels). See also Herbert Lockyer, All the Parables of the Bible (Zondervan, 1963).

In comparing the parable with the similar figures of speech, one must bear in mind that often the parable contains elements of these other figures. For instance, there are often elements in the parable that must be treated as allegorical. This does not justify giving the parable an allegorical interpretation.

While Christ did not invent the parable, it is significant that He is the only one who used them in the NT. At one time in His ministry it was His only method in speaking to the masses (Matt. 13:34). It is interesting to note when Christ began to use this methodology. So abrupt was the change in His form of teaching that His disciples asked Him why He did this (Matt. 13:10). In His reply one notes the value of this method of instruction. It was an effective method of revealing truth to the spiritual and ready mind and at the same time of concealing it from others (Matt. 13:11). Christ came as Israel's King and only after they had rejected Him did He employ this form of imparting spiritual truth. Those who had rejected Him were not to know the "mysteries of the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 13:11).

In the discussion of the parable there is probably no area fraught with greater disagreement than the principle of interpretation. Ramm in discussing the rules for interpreting the parables notes four principles: "perspective, cultural, exegetical and doctrinal" (Bernard Ramm, Protestant Biblical Interpretation, Boston: W. A. Wilde Co., 1956, p. 257). Perspectively, one must understand the parables in their relation to Christology and God's kingdom. One must not overlook the cultural background in which our Lord lived and worked.

Ramm shows four things that are involved in the exegetical principle: "(1) Determine the one central truth the parable is attempting to teach. . . . (2) Determine how much of the parable is interpreted by the Lord Himself. . . . (3) Determine whether there are any clues in the context concerning the parable's meaning. . . . (4) The comparative rule" (Ibid., pp. 258-267).

The following classification of parables is adapted from A. B. Bruce, The parabolic Teaching of Christ, London: 1904, pp. 8ff:

I. Didactic Parables

A. Nature and Development of the Kingdom:
1. The Sower (Matt. 13:3-8; Mark 4:4-8; Luke 8:5-8)
2. The Tares (Matt. 13:24-30)
3. The Mustard Seed (Matt. 13:31,32; Mark 4:3-32; Luke 13:18,19)
4. The Leaven (Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:20,21)
5. The Hidden Treasure (Matt. 13:44)
6. The Pearl of Great Price (Matt. 13:45,46)
7. The Drag Net (Matt. 13:47-50)
8. The Blade, the Ear, and the Full Corn (Mark 4:26-29)

B. Service and Rewards:
1. The Laborers in the Vineyard (Matt. 20:1-16)
2. The Talents (Matt. 25:14-30)
3. The Pounds (Luke 19:11-27)
4. The Unprofitable Servants (Luke 17:7-10)

C. Prayer:
1. The Friend at Midnight (Luke 11:5-8)
2. The Unjust Judge (Luke 18:1-8)

D. Love for Neighbor:
1. The Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30-37)

E. Humility:
1. The Lowest Seat at the Feast (Luke 14:7-11)
2. The Pharisee and the Publican (Luke 18:9-14)

F. Worldly Wealth:
1. The Unjust Steward (Luke 16:1-9)
2. The Rich Fool (Luke 12:16-21)
3. The Great Supper (Luke 14:15-24)

II. Evangelic Parables

A. God's Love for the Lost:
1. The Lost Sheep (Matt. 18:12-14; Luke 15:3-7)
2. The Lost Coin (Luke 15:8-10)
3. The Lost Son (Luke 15:11-32)

B. Gratitude of the Redeemed:
1. The Two Debtors (Luke 7:41-43)

III. Prophetic and Judicial Parables

A. Watchfulness for Christ's Return:
1. The Ten Virgins (Matt. 25:1-13)
2. The Faithful and Unfaithful Servants (Matt. 24:45-51; Luke 12:42-48)
3. The Watchful Porter (Mark 13:34-37)

B. Judgment on Israel and Within the Kingdom:
1. The Two Sons (Matt. 21:28-32)
2. The Wicked Husbandmen (Matt. 21:33-34; Mark 12:1-12; Luke 20:9-18)
3. The Barren Fig Tree (Luke 13:6-9)
4. The Marriage Feast of the King's Son (Matt. 22:1-14)
5. The Unforgiving Servant (Matt. 18:23-25)

H.Z.C.

PARACLETE (păr'ȧ-klēt, Gr. parákletos, literally called to one's side, hence advocate), one who pleads another's cause. It is used by Christ of the Holy Spirit in John's Gospel (14:16,26; 15:26; 16:7) and of Christ in I John 2:1. The rendering of the word in ERV is Comforter in the Gospel, and Advocate in the Epistle.

PARADISE (păr'ȧ-dīz, Gr. parádeisos, park), a word of Persian origin, found only three times in Scripture (Luke 23:43; II Cor. 12:4; Rev. 2:7), referring in each case to heaven. There was a similar word in the Hebrew OT, parades, translated forest or orchard (Neh. 2:8; Eccl. 2:5; S. of Sol. 4:13). Scholars feel that it was introduced into the Greek language very early and Xenophon made it especially familiar.

The LXX uses the word 46 times and there it is applied to quite a wide category of places. It is used of the Adamic Eden (Gen. 2:15; 3:23); of the well watered plains of the Jordan that Lot envisioned (Gen. 13:10). Since it was used to describe gardens of beauty and splendor, one is not surprised to see the NT begin to use the term to refer to the place of spiritual bliss (Luke 23:43).

The exact location of paradise is uncertain. Paul uses it in II Corinthians 12:4 and identifies it with the third heaven. Ecclesiasticus 44:16 identifies paradise with heaven into which Enoch was translated. Christ's single use of the term seems to establish its location best for the believer, for He uses it as comfort for the dying thief. H.Z.C.

PARAH (pā'rȧ, Heb. pārāh, heifer), a city in Benjamin's territory (Josh. 18:23) now identified as Farah, a short distance NE of Jerusalem.

PARALLELISM. This word is not found in the Bible, but is rightfully placed here since it refers to a unique aspect of OT Hebrew verse. Hebrew poetry is not characterized by either rhyme or meter, but by parallelisms. There are several forms, but four are most common: synonymous (Ps. 36:5), antithetic (Ps. 20:8), synthetic (Job 11:18), and climactic (Ps. 29:1).

PARALYSIS (See Diseases)

PARALYTIC (See Diseases)

PARAMOUR (păr'ȧ-mo͝or, Heb. pilleghesh, a concubine), a term used in Ezekiel 23:20 of a male lover, but rendered elsewhere by concubine.

PARAN (pā'răn, Heb. pā'rān, ornamental), a wilderness area first referred to in Genesis 14:6 as "El-Paran." Its boundaries seem to be uncertain; according to some authorities it may include the wilderness of Shur; according to others, the two have separate boundaries. It lies in the central area of the Sinaitic Peninsula. The four eastern kings passed up this region in their attempt to suppress the rebellion of their subjects (Gen. 14:6). It was the area in which Ishmael lived (Gen. 21:21). On two occasions after the Israelites left Mt. Sinai they camped in this wilderness (Num. 10:12; 12:16). When Moses commanded the spies to search the land of Canaan as God had commanded, they went up from the wilderness of Paran (Num. 13:3) and later returned to it (Num. 13:26). When David was grieved at the loss of Samuel, he resorted to Paran (I Sam. 25:1). Through Paran ran one of the main routes of that day, so that Hadad after revolting from King Solomon went through Paran in his flight to Egypt.

Twice in the Scriptures (Deut. 33:2; Hab. 3:3) Mount Paran is referred to. Two mountains are suggested as being identified as Mount Paran, but the rugged range of mountains W of the Gulf of Akaba seems to be the most logical site. H.Z.C.

PARBAR (pär'bär, Heb. parbār, suburb), a word apparently of Persian origin, and referring to some building on the W side of the temple area (I Chron. 26:18; II Kings 23:11).

PARCHED GROUND (Heb. shārāv, a mirage), a phrase used only once in the Scriptures (Isa. 35:7). The ERV uses "glowing" here, referring doubtless to the strange movement of air just above dry, hot earth accompanied by mirages. The word here may be rendered "looming sand-waste" which is the Arabic name for mirage.

PARCHMENT (See Writing)

PARDON (Heb. nāsa', sālah, kāphar, to lift, forgive, pardon, cover, expiate, cancel). Pardon is distinctively an OT word and if all its forms are included it occurs only 20 times. However, it is so closely related to forgiveness and justification that the three are often taken together. The divine pardon offered to the sinner stands in sharp contrast to human pardon. God demands a righteous ground for His pardoning of the sinner, that can be found only in the atoning work of Christ at Calvary. In the OT the animal sacrifices had a typical significance and covered (kāphar) the believer's sin until it should finally be removed. Note Romans 3:25 in this connection. Pardon is one aspect of salvation. When Moses comes again into the presence of God after Israel's sin at Sinai, he prays for pardon (Exod. 34:9). Some sins could not be pardoned (I Sam. 15:25-26; II Kings 24:4), but for the one who met God's conditions pardon was offered in abundance (Isa. 55:7). H.Z.C.

PARENT (Gr. goneús), a distinctly NT word. Although our English word does not occur in the OT, there is much instruction there about the parent-child relation. Children were to honor their parents (Exod. 20:12) and obey and reverence them (Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16). Failure in these relations on the part of the child was a sin which could be punished by death (Deut. 21:18-21). The same high regard for parents is expected of children in the NT (Eph. 6:1; Col. 3:20). Parents were expected on the other hand to love their children, care and provide for them and not to provoke them to wrath (II Cor. 12:14; Eph. 6:4; Col. 3:21).

PARENTAL BLESSINGS were given much importance in OT times. Blessings from godly parents were prophetic of a child's future and assured him of success, whereas a parental curse was a severe loss (Gen. 27:4,12,27-29).

PARMASHTA (pär-măsh'tà, Heb. parmashtā', the very first), one of the sons of Haman. He is listed as one of those slain by the Jews (Esth. 9:9).

PARMENAS (pär'mē-năs, Gr. Parmenás, constant), one of the seven chosen to care for the daily distribution to the poor (Acts 6:5). Tradition tells of his martyrdom at Philippi.

PARNACH (pär'năk, Heb. parnākh, meaning uncertain), the father of Elizaphan the prince of Zebulun (Num. 34:25).

PAROSH (pā'rŏsh, Heb. par'ōsh, a flea), one whose descendants returned to Babylon under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:3; Neh. 7:8) and under Ezra (Ezra 8:3, Pharosh in KJV). One of their number, Pedaiah, helped rebuild the walls (Neh. 3:25).

PAROUSIA (pă-rōō'sĭ-à, Gr. parousía, presence, coming), a word translated by both "coming" and "presence" in KJV. This is the word most frequently used in the NT of our Lord's return, and describes both the rapture and the return of Christ to the earth (I Cor. 15:23; I Thess. 4:15; Matt. 24:3; I Thess. 3:13; II Pet. 1:16). Arndt and Gingrich show that the word, found in classical writings and in the apocryphal books as well as in the NT, has developed in two directions. It is used by false cults to express the coming of a hidden divinity and, on the other hand, has become the official term for the visit of a person of high rank. In view of the latter, the use of parousia in connection with the Lord's return is fitting. When it is translated "presence" it means the presence made possible by the coming of the individual. H.Z.C.

PARSHANDATHA (pär'shăn-dā'thà, Heb. parshandātha', inquisitive), the eldest of Haman's sons (Esth. 9:7).

PARTHIANS (pär'thĭ-ănz, Gr. Párthoi). Luke's geographical list of the people who were in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:9) is headed by "Parthians and Medes." By "Parthians" Luke no doubt meant all the Jews and proselytes who lived in the old Parthian Empire to the E, known today as Iran. The earliest dispersion of the ten tribes took place in the eastern countries. Later they were augmented by immigration and colonization so that by the first century A.D. the number of Jews in the eastern territories ran into millions.

There is only scant information about the early history of Parthia, a small country 120 x 300 miles, NW of old Persia and S of the Caspian Sea. Alexander subdued the people, and after the breakdown of his far-flung empire they fell under the rule of the Seleucids. After a successful revolt they soon became a rival power of Rome. Proud Roman Crassus was defeated and killed by them in 53 B.C. In 40 B.C. they seized Jerusalem. At one time their empire extended from the Tigris to India. Rome and Parthia learned to respect each other's power and there were many years of somewhat peaceful co-existence which extended through the first century A.D. Their success was due mainly to their unusual way of fighting. Almost all of their soldiers were mounted on horseback. They were excellent with the bow and arrow so that they have been described as "archers fighting on horseback." Known for their prowess in war, instead of the arts and sciences, they never developed a literature of their own. But it is certain that the apostles of our Lord preached the Gospel among them.

PARTITION, MIDDLE WALL OF. In Ephesians 2:14 Paul asserts that Christ has broken down the "middle wall of partition" which divided Jews and Gentiles, and has made of the two one new man. Paul probably has in mind a literal wall as a tangible symbol of the division between Jews and Gentiles — the wall in the temple area in Jerusalem separating the court of the Gentiles from the courts into which only Jews might enter. On this wall was a notice in Greek and Latin warning Gentiles to keep out on pain of death. In 1871 archaeologists who were excavating the site of the temple found a pillar with this inscription, "No man of another nation to enter within the fence and enclosure round the temple, and whoever is caught will have himself to blame that his death ensues." Paul himself almost lost his life in the temple enclosure when at the end of his third missionary journey his Jewish enemies accused him of bringing Trophimus the Ephesian past this barrier in the temple (Acts 21:29). PARTRIDGE (See Birds)

PARUAH (pà-rōō'à, Heb. pārûah, blooming), the father of Jehoshaphat employed by Solomon (I Kings 4:17).

PARVAIM (pär-vā'ĭm, Heb. parwāyim, meaning uncertain), a place mentioned in II Chronicles 3:6 from which Solomon obtained gold for the temple.

PASACH (pā'săk, Heb. pāsakh, to divide), the son of Japhet who descended from Asher (I Chron. 7:33).

PASDAMMIM (păs'dăm'ĭm, Heb. pasdamîm, place of bloodshed), a place in Judah of encounter between David and the Philistines (I Chron. 11:13). It is called also "Ephesdammim" (I Sam. 17:1).

PASEAH (pă-sē'a, Heb. pāsēah, lame). 1. A son of Eshton (I Chron. 4:12).

2. The head of a family of Nethinim (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:51), one of whose descendants helped in the restoration of one of the gates of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6).

PASHUR (păsh'hêr, Heb. pashhûr). 1. A priest, the son of Immer (Jer. 20:1), the "chief governor" in the Lord's house. Angered at the prophecies of Jeremiah, he placed him in stocks located near the house of the Lord. When released, Jeremiah told him that Jehovah had changed his name to Magormissabib, meaning "terror on every side." Jeremiah also foretold Judah's future captivity by Babylon.

2. The priestly son of Melchiah who was one of the chief court princes during Zedekiah's reign. When Nebuchadnezzar was preparing for one of his attacks on Jerusalem, he was sent by the king to Jeremiah. Later he joined others in seeking to have Jeremiah put to death. In all probability he is the same person referred to in I Chronicles 9:12; Ezra 2:38; Nehemiah 7:41; 10:3; and 11:12.

3. The father of Gedaliah mentioned in Jeremiah 38:1 who aided in Jeremiah's imprisonment.

PASSAGE (Heb. ma'avar, ford), may refer to the ford of a river (Gen. 32:23), a mountain pass (I Sam. 13:23), or a crossing (Josh. 22:11).

PASSOVER, FEAST OF (See Feasts)

PASTORAL EPISTLES. I. Authorship. The term "pastoral epistles," as a common title for I and II Timothy and Titus, dates from the early part of the 18th century. It is not exact. Though these letters do furnish worthwhile directions for pastors, the addressees were not pastors in the usual, present-day sense of that term. Rather, they were Paul's special envoys sent by him on specific missions and entrusted with concrete assignments according to the need of the hour. For biographical articles see TIMOTHY and TITUS.

In the 19th century F. Schleiermacher rejected the Pauline authorship of one of these epistles (I Timothy), and F. C. Baur of all three. Baur had many followers, and today this rejection is rather common. The grounds on which it is based are as follows:

1. Vocabulary. Difference in vocabulary between these three (I and II Timothy and Titus) and the other ten Pauline epistles (Romans, I and II Corinthians, etc.) must be admitted, but has often been exaggerated. Of words found in the three but not found in the ten only nine are common to the three. Detailed study, moreover, has shown that the Pastoral Epistles contain not one single word that was foreign to the age in which Paul lived and could not have been used by him. Besides, vocabulary always varies with the specific subject that is being discussed. Thus, in addressing Timothy and Titus, who were in need of good counsel with respect to their own task of imparting instruction, the frequent use of words belonging to the word-family of teaching is certainly not surprising. Other factors which may have influenced the choice of words are: the character of the addressees, the apostle's age and environment, the progress of the Church with its ever-expanding vocabulary, and the not improbable use of secretaries.

2. Style. This argument is self-defeating, for candid examination of the actual facts clearly points to Paul as the author of these epistles. The three and the ten picture the same kind of person: one who is deeply interested in those whom he addresses, ascribing to God's sovereign grace whatever is good in himself and/or in the addressees, showing wonderful tact in counseling. Again, both the three and the ten were written by a person who is fond of litotes (cf. "not ashamed of the gospel" [Rom. 1:16], with "not ashamed of the testimony of our Lord" [II Tim. 1:8]), of enumerations (I Tim. 3:1-12; cf. Rom. 1:29-32), of play upon words (I Tim. 6:17; cf. Philemon 10,11), of appositional phrases (I Tim. 1:17; cf. Rom. 12:1), of expressions of personal unworthiness (I Tim. 1:13,15; cf. I Cor. 15:9), and of doxologies (I Tim. 1:17; cf. Rom. 11:36). When the three are compared with those sections of the ten that are comparable, it is clear that their style is definitely Pauline. Hence, many critics now grant that Paul wrote some but not all of their contents. But this theory does not go far enough in the right direction, for those who hold it are unable to show where the genuine material begins and the spurious ends. The acceptance, in some real sense, of Pauline authorship for the entire contents is the only theory that fits the facts.

3. Theology. It is claimed that grace is no longer in the center, and that there is here an over emphasis on good works. The facts contradict this verdict. Is not grace the heart and center of such passages as I Timothy 1:14, II Timothy 1:9, and Titus 3:5? It is true that in these three epistles the fruit (good works) of faith is emphasized, but the reason is that the nature of faith and its necessity over against law-works had been fully set forth in the letters which preceded. The tree is first; then comes the fruit.

4. Marcionism. It is said that the Pastorals controvert second-century Marcionism (a heresy with erroneous views of Christ's person), hence cannot have been written by first-century Paul. The question is asked, "Does not I Timothy 6:20 refer to the very title of Marcion's book Antitheses?" This is shallow reasoning. Surely a merely verbal coincidence cannot prove any relationship between Marcion and Paul. What the author of I Timothy 6:20 has in mind is not Marcion's contrast between Christianity and Judaism but the conflicting opinions of those who speculated in Jewish genealogies. Other supposed allusions to second-century isms are equally far-fetched.

5. Ecclesiastical Organization. Do not the Pastorals reveal a marked advance in church-government, far beyond the time of Paul? Some reason that the three evidence the beginning of pyramidal organization, where one bishop (I Tim. 3:1,2; Titus 1:7) rules over several presbyters (Titus 1:5). In the Pastorals the terms bishop (overseer) and presbyter (elder) refer to the same individuals, as is proved by I Timothy 1:5-7 (cf. I Tim. 3:1-7; Phil 1:1; I Peter 5:1,2). With respect to age and dignity these men were called presbyters; with respect to the nature of their task they were called overseers. From very early times the Church had its elders (Acts 11:30; 14:23; cf. I Thess. 5:12,13). It is also very natural that Paul, about to depart from this earthly realm, should specify certain qualifications for office, so that the Church might be guarded against the ravages of error, both doctrinal and moral.

6. Chronology. It is maintained that the book of Acts, which records Paul's story from his conversion to a Roman imprisonment that terminated in the apostle's execution, leaves no room for the Pastorals, which presuppose journeys not recorded in Acts. Acts points toward release, not execution (Acts 23:12-35; 28:21,30,31); so do Paul's prison-epistles (Phil. 1:25-27; 2:24; Philemon 22). Early writers—Clement of Rome, Eusebius—as well as later ones — Chrysostom, Jerome, etc. — bear witness to two Roman imprisonments with ample room for the writings of the Pastorals after the first of these two.

As to internal evidence, not only does the writer call himself Paul, apostle, but he also describes himself, and this description agrees with that of Paul in Acts. The letter-plan of the three, moreover, is similar to that of the ten. All the evidence, accordingly, favors the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals.

II. Background and Purpose.

1. Common to Timothy and Titus. Released from his first Roman imprisonment Paul, perhaps while on his way to Asia Minor, leaves Titus on the island of Crete to bring to completion the organization of its church(es) (Acts 2:11; Titus 1:5). At Ephesus Paul is joined by Timothy (back from Philippi? cf. Phil 2:19-23). On leaving for Macedonia Paul instructs Timothy to remain in Ephesus, which is sorely in need of his ministry (I Tim. 1:3,4). From Macedonia Paul writes a letter to Timothy in Ephesus (I Tim.) and one to Titus in Crete (Titus).

2. Further Background and Purpose of I Timothy. At Ephesus Judaizers are spreading strange and dangerous doctrines (I Tim. 1:4,7; 4: 7). Both men and women attend worship spiritually unprepared (I Tim. 2). To cope with that situation there is Timothy — timid Timothy. Letter's aim:

a. To impart guidance against error (cf. 1:3-11, 18-20; chap. 4; chap. 6). With this in mind proper organization is stressed: choosing the right kind of leaders (chap. 3, chap. 5).

b. To stress the need of proper preparation and conduct (for both men and women) with respect to public worship (chap. 2).

c. To bolster Timothy's spirit (I Tim. 4:14; 6: 12,20).

3. Further Background and Purpose of Titus. The reputation of the Cretans is poor. True sanctification is needed (2:11-14; 3:10). Gospel workers (such as Zenas and Apollos, whose itinerary includes Crete and who probably carry with them Paul's letter) must receive every assistance. As to Paul himself, having recently met Timothy, and the situation in Crete being critical, it is but natural that he wishes to have a face-to-face conference with Titus also.

Purpose of Paul's letter to Titus:

a. To stress the need of thorough sanctification.

b. To speed on their way Zenas the law-expert and Apollos the evangelist (3:13).

c. To urge Titus to meet Paul at Nicopolis (3: 12).

4. Background and Purpose of II Timothy. Emperor Nero, blamed for Rome's fearful conflagration (July, A.D. 64), in turn blames Christians, who suffer frightful persecution. Paul is imprisoned (second Roman imprisonment). He faces death (II Tim. 1:16,17; 2:9), Luke alone is with him. Others have left him, either on legitimate missions (Crescens, Titus) or by reason of having fallen in love with the present world. (Demas; 4:6-11). Meanwhile, soul-destroying error continues in Timothy's Ephesus (1:8; 2:3,12,14-18,23; 3:8:12). Letter's purpose, accordingly:

a. To urge Timothy to come to Rome as soon as possible in view of the apostle's impending departure from this life, and to bring with him Mark and Paul's cloak and books (4:6-22).

b. To admonish Timothy to cling to sound doctrine, defending it against all error (chap. 2; 4:1-5).

III. Contents.

I Timothy

Theme: The Apostle Paul, writing to Timothy, gives directions for the administration of the church.

Chapter 1

Paul salutes Timothy, and repeats his order that Timothy remain at Ephesus to combat the error of those who refuse to see their own sinful condition in the light of God's holy law, while pretending to be law-experts. By contrast, Paul thanks God for having made him, who regards himself as "chief of sinners," a minister of the gospel.

Chapter 2

Paul gives directions with respect to public worship. Prayers must be made in behalf of all men. Both the men and the women must come spiritually prepared.

Chapter 3

The apostle gives directions with respect to the offices and functions in the church.

Chapter 4

He warns against apostasy, and instructs Timothy how to deal with it.

Chapters 5 and 6

He gives directions with respect to certain definite groups and individuals: old(er) men, young(er) men, old(er) women, young(er) women, etc.

Titus

Theme: The Apostle Paul, writing to Titus, gives directions for the promotion of the spirit of sanctification:

Chapter 1

In congregational life. Well-qualified elders must be appointed in every town. Reason: Crete is not lacking in disreputable people who must be sternly rebuked.

Chapter 2

In family and individual life. All classes of individuals that compose the home-circle must conduct themselves so that by their life they adorn their doctrine. Reason: the grace of God has appeared to all unto sanctification and joyful expectation of the coming of "our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ."

Chapter 3

In social (i.e., public) life. Believers should be obedient to the authorities and kind to all men. Foolish questions should be shunned and persistently factious men should be rejected. Concluding directions with respect to kingdom travelers and believers in general.

II Timothy

Theme: Sound Doctrine.

Chapter 1

Hold on to it, as did Lois and Eunice; as I (Paul) do; and as did Onesiphorus.

Chapter 2

Teach it. This brings great reward, for the Gospel is glorious in its contents. Vain disputes serve no useful purpose.

Chapter 3

Abide in it, knowing that enemies will arise, and that it is based on the sacred writings.

Chapter 4

Preach it, in season, out of season. Remain faithful in view of the fact that I, Paul, am about to set sail.

PATARA (păt'ə-rə, Gr. Pátara), an ancient seaport of Lycia near the mouth of the Xanthus. Coins date from 440 B.C. There was an old oracle of Apollo situated in the town. Hence the poetic title for the god "Patareus" (Hor. Od. 3:4:64). The trade of the river-valley and its position on the Asia Minor coast gave the port its importance. It was convenient for ships running E before the prevailing autumn wind for Phoenicia or Egypt. For example, Paul made for Tyre in one stage from Patara (Acts 21:1,2).

PATHROS (păth'rŏs, Heb. pathrôs), mentioned five times in the OT prophets (Isa. 11:11; Jer. 44: 1 and 15; Ezek. 29:14; 30:14) in connection with the repatriation of Jewish remnants. Pathros was Upper Egypt, the Egyptian "Pteres" or "Southland," extending from S of Memphis to the First Cataract. The division corresponds to two ancient kingdoms. There is papyrological evidence for settlements of Jews at Syene at the southern extremity of Pathros as early as 525 B.C. The "Pathrusim" of Genesis 10:14 seem to be the inhabitants of this territory.

PATHRUSIM (păth-rōō'sĭm, Heb. pathrūsî, an inhabitant of Pathros), Egyptians who, it is believed, came from Pathros, Egypt, from which their name is derived. They are descended from Mizraim (Gen. 10:13f; I Chron. 1:11f).

PATIENCE (Gr. hypomoné and makrothymía). Both of these Greek words are translated by our English word patience, but they are not exactly synonymous in meaning. Hypomoné is the quality of endurance under trials. Those possessing this virtue are free from cowardice or despondency. It is mainly an attitude of heart with respect to things. Makrothymía, longsuffering, is an attitude with respect to people. Longsuffering is listed in Galatians 5:22 as a fruit of the Spirit. Patience is a virtue that God prizes highly in man and seems to be best developed under trials (James 1:3-4; 5:11). Both terms are used of God (Rom. 2:4; 15:5; I Pet. 3:20), but as descriptive of His qualities seem always to apply to persons and never to things. H.Z.C.

PATMOS (Gr. Pátmos), a tiny wind-swept island of the Sporades group, lying off the coast of Asia Minor in the Aegean Sea about 28 miles S of Samos. It is only ten miles long and six miles wide at the broadest point, and its coastline is so irregular that it is only 25 sq. miles in area. Being of volcanic origin, it is rocky and almost treeless, with many volcanic hills rising as high as 800 feet. The harbor of Scala, the chief city, divides the islet, which is shaped like a horse's head, into two parts.

Few people would know of the island if it were not mentioned in the Bible. It was one of the many isolated places to which the Romans banished their exiles, and according to tradition the Emperor Domitian banished the Apostle John to this lonely place from Ephesus in 95 A.D. (Rev. 1:9). During the estimated 18 months spent there, he received the visions of the Lord now recorded in The Revelation. The cave or grotto near Scala in which John lived is still pointed out to travelers, as well as the Monastery of St. John above the city. During the middle ages the island was all but deserted but today has a population of 3,000 or more. It was under Turkish rule until 1912, when it passed into the hands of the Italians. Today it is known as Patino. L.M.P.

PATRIARCHS, PATRIARCHAL AGE. (Gr. patriárches, the father of a family, tribe, or race), a name given in the NT to those who founded the Hebrew race and nation. In the NT it is applied to Abraham (Heb. 7:4), the sons of Jacob (Acts 7:8,9), and David (Acts 2:29). The term is now commonly used to refer to the persons whose names appear in the genealogies and covenant-histories before the time of Moses (Gen. 5,11, histories of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, etc.). In the patriarchal system the government of a clan was the right of the eldest lineal male. The patriarchal head was the priest of his own household.

While many scholars of the past have tended to regard the Biblical accounts in the patriarchal dispensation as legendary, recent archaeological discoveries have confirmed the truthfulness of the narratives and have thrown much light on customs of the time which had been somewhat puzzling, such as Abraham's taking Sarah's slave Hagar as a concubine, Abraham's making his steward Eliezer his heir, and Rachel's carrying away her father's household gods. Excavations at Ur, where Abraham lived, reveal it to have been a rich commercial center, with inhabitants of education and culture. S.B.

PATROBAS (păt'rō-bàs, Gr. Patróbas), a Roman Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom. 16: 14).

PAU (pā'ū, Heb. pā'û, bleating), the capital city of king Hadar of Edom (Gen. 36:39); written Pai in I Chronicles 1:50. It remains unidentified.

PAUL (Gr. Paúlos, from Latin Paulis, little), the great apostle to the Gentiles. The main Biblical urce for the life of Paul is The Acts of the Apostles, with important supplemental information from the Pauline Epistles. Allusions in the epistles make it clear that many events in his checkered and stirring career are unrecorded (cf. II Cor. 11: 24-28).

Names. His Hebrew name was Saul (Gr. Saúlos) and he is always so designated in Acts until his clash with Bar-Jesus at Paphos, where Luke writes, "But Saul, who is also called Paul" (13:9). Thereafter in Acts he is always called Paul. In his epistles the apostle always calls himself Paul. As a Roman citizen he doubtless bore both names from youth. His double name is implied in Luke's statement, "Saul, the one also Paul" (Saulos ho kai Paulos). It was a common practice among Jews of the dispersion. The change to the use of Paul is peculiarly appropriate at the time when he entered upon his position of leadership in bringing the Gospel to the Gentile world.

Background. Providentially, three elements of the world's life of that day, Greek culture, Roman citizenship, and Hebrew religion met in the apostle to the Gentiles. Paul was born near the beginning of the first century in the busy Graeco-Roman city of Tarsus, located at the NE corner of the Mediterranean Sea. A noted trading center, it was known for its manufacture of goats' hair cloth, and here the young Saul learned his trade of "tentmaking" (Acts 18:3). Tarsus had a famous university; although there is no evidence that Paul attended there, its influence must have made a definite impact on him, enabling him the better to understand prevailing life and views in the Roman Empire. He had the further privilege of being born a Roman citizen (Acts 22:28), though how his father had come to possess the coveted status is not known. Proud of the distinction and advantages thus conferred on him, Paul knew how to use that citizenship as a shield against injustice from local magistrates and to enhance the status of the Christian faith. His Gentile connections greatly aided him in bridging the chasm between the Gentile and the Jew. But of central significance was his strong Jewish heritage, being fundamental to all he was and became. He was never ashamed to acknowledge himself a Jew (Acts 21:39; 22:3), was justly proud of his Jewish background (11 Cor. 11:22), and retained a deep and abiding love for his brethren according to the flesh (Rom. 9:1-2; 10:1). Becoming a Christian meant no conscious departure on his part from the religious hopes of his people as embodied in the OT Scriptures (Acts 24:14-16; 26:6-7). This racial affinity with the Jews enabled Paul with great profit to begin his missionary labors in each city in the synagogue, for there he had the best prepared audience.

Born of purest Jewish blood (Phil. 3:5), the son of a Pharisee (Acts 23:6), Saul was cradled in orthodox Judaism. At the proper age, perhaps 13, he was sent to Jerusalem and completed his studies under the famous Gamaliel (Acts 22:3; 26:4-5). Being a superior, zealous student (Gal. 1:14), he absorbed not only the teaching of the OT but also the rabbinical learning of the scholars.

At his first appearance in Acts as "a young man" (7:58), probably at least 30 years old, he was already an acknowledged leader in Judaism. His active opposition to Christianity marked him as the natural leader of the persecution that arose upon the death of Stephen (7:58-8:3; 9:1-2). The persecutions described in 26:10-11 indicate his fanatical devotion to Judaism. He was convinced that Christians were heretics and that the honor of Jehovah demanded their extermination (26:9). He acted in undoubting unbelief (I Tim. 1:13).

Conversion. The persecution was doubtless repugnant to his finer inner sensitivities, but Saul did not doubt the rightness of his course. The spread of Christians to foreign cities only increased his fury against them, causing him to extend the scope of his activities. As the persecutor, armed with authority from the high priest, was approaching Damascus, the transforming crisis in his life occurred. Only an acknowledgment of divine intervention can explain it. Repeatedly in his epistles Paul refers to it as the work of divine grace and power, transforming him and commissioning him as Christ's messenger (I Cor. 9:16-17; 15:10; Gal. 1:15-16; Eph. 3:7-9; I Tim. 1:12-16). The three accounts in Acts of the conversion are controlled by the immediate purpose of the narrator and supplement each other. Luke's own account (chap. 9) is historical, relating the event objectively, while the two accounts by Paul (chaps. 22, 26) stress those aspects appropriate to his immediate endeavor.

When the supernatural Being arresting him identified Himself as "Jesus whom thou persecutest," Saul at once saw the error of his way and surrendered instantaneously and completely. The three days of fasting in blindness were days of agonizing heartsearching and further dealing with the Lord. The ministry of Ananias of Damascus consummated the conversion experience, unfolded to Saul the divine commission, and opened the door to him to the Christian fellowship at Damascus. Later in reviewing his former life Paul clearly recognized how God had been preparing him for his future work (Gal. 1:15-16).

Early Activities. The new convert at once proclaimed the deity and Messiahship of Jesus in the Jewish synagogues of Damascus, truths that had seized his soul (9:20-22). Since the purpose of his coming was no secret, this action caused consternation among the Jews. Paul's visit to Arabia, mentioned in Galatians 1:17, seems best placed between Acts 9:22 and 23. There is no hint that its purpose was to preach; rather it seems that he felt it necessary to retire to rethink his beliefs in the light of the new revelation that had come to him. The length of the stay is not certain, but Paul came out of Arabia with the essentials of his theology fixed.

Upon returning to Damascus, his aggressive preaching forced him to flee the murderous fury of the Jews (Acts 9:23-25; Gal. 1:17; II Cor. 11:32-33). Three years after his conversion Saul returned to Jerusalem with the intention of becoming acquainted with Peter (Gal. 1:18). The Jerusalem believers regarded him with cold suspicion, but the good offices of Barnabas secured his acceptance among them (Acts 9:26-28). His bold witness to the Hellenistic Jews aroused bitter hostility and cut the visit to 15 days (Gal. 1:18). Instructed by the Lord in a vision to leave (Acts 22:17-21), he agreed to be sent home to Tarsus (Acts 9:30), where he remained in obscurity for some years. Galatians 1:21-23 implies that he did some evangelistic work there, but we have no further details. Some think that many of the events of II Corinthians 11:24-26 must be placed here.

After the opening of the door of the gospel to the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius, a Gentile church was soon established in Syrian Antioch. Barnabas, who had been sent to superintend the revival, saw the need for assistance, remembered Saul's commission to the Gentiles, and brought him to Antioch. An aggressive teaching ministry "for a whole year" produced a profound impact on the city, resulting in the designation of the disciples as "Christians" (Acts 11:20-26). Informed by visiting prophets of an impending famine, the Antioch church raised a collection and sent it to the Jerusalem elders by Barnabas and Saul (11:27-30), marking Saul's second visit to Jerusalem since his conversion. Some scholars would equate this visit with Galatians 2:1-10, but Acts 11-12 reveals no traces as yet of such a serious conflict in the church about circumcision.

Missionary Journeys. The work of Gentile foreign missions was inaugurated by the church at Antioch under the direction of the Holy Spirit in the sending forth of "Barnabas and Saul" (13:1-3).

The first missionary journey, begun apparently in the spring of A.D. 48, began with work among the Jews on Cyprus. Efforts at Paphos to gain the attention of the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, encountered the determined opposition of the sorcerer Elymas. Saul publicly exposed his diabolical character and the swift judgment that fell upon Elymas caused the amazed proconsul to "believe" (13:4-12). It was a signal victory of the Gospel.

After the events at Paphos Saul, henceforth called Paul in Acts, emerged as the recognized leader of the missionary party. Steps to carry the Gospel to untrodden regions were taken when the party sailed to Perga in Pamphylia on the southern shores of Asia Minor. Here their attendant, John Mark, cousin of Barnabas (Col. 4:10 A.S.V.), deserted them and returned to Jerusalem, an act which Paul regarded unjustified. Arriving at Pisidian Antioch, located in the province of Galatia, the missionaries found a ready opening in the Jewish synagogue. Paul's address to an audience composed of Jews and God-fearing Gentiles, his first recorded address in Acts, is reported at length by Luke as representative of his synagogue ministry (13:16-41). The message made a deep impression, and request was made for more the next sabbath. The large crowd, mainly of Gentiles, that flocked to the synagogue the following sabbath aroused the jealousy and fierce opposition of the Jewish leaders. In consequence Paul announced a turning to the Gentiles with their message. Gentiles formed the core of the church established in Pisidian Antioch (13:42-52). Jewish-inspired opposition forced the missionaries to depart for Iconium, SE of Antioch, where the results were duplicated and a flourishing church begun. Compelled to flee a threatened stoning at Iconium, the missionaries crossed into the ethnographic territory of Lycaonia, still within the province of Galatia, and began work at Lystra, which was apparently without a synagogue. The healing of a congenital cripple caused a pagan attempt to offer sacrifices to the missionaries as gods in human form. Paul's horrified protest (14:15-17), arresting the attempt, reveals his dealings with pagans who did not have the OT revelation. Timothy apparently was converted at this time. Fanatical agitators from Antioch and Iconium turned the disillusioned pagans against the missionaries and in the uproar Paul was stoned. Dragged out of the city, the unconscious apostle was left for dead, but as the disciples stood around him he regained consciousness, reentered the city, and the next day was able to make the trip to neighboring Derbe. After a fruitful and unmolested ministry there, the missionaries retraced their steps to instruct their converts and organize them into churches with responsible leaders (14:1-23). They returned to Syrian Antioch and reported how "God had opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles" (14:27). That is a summary of Paul's philosophy of Gentile missions, salvation solely through faith in Christ.

The Jerusalem Conference (Acts 15; Gal. 2:1-10) arose out of the tension produced by the mass influx of the Gentiles into the church. This movement evoked the anxiety and opposition of the Pharisaic party in the church. Certain men from Judea came to Antioch and taught the brethren that unless they received circumcision they could not be saved. This demand, contrary to the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, aroused sharp controversy and resulted in Paul, Barnabas, and certain others being sent to Jerusalem concerning this matter.

While some scholars reject the identification, it seems best to equate Galatians 2:1-10 with Acts 15. The differences are due to the differing standpoint of the two writers, Luke's account being historical, while Paul's was personal. In Acts there are apparently two public sessions, vss. 5 and 6, while Paul speaks of a private meeting with the Jerusalem leaders. After ample discussion of the problem, the conference repudiated the view of the Judaizers and refused to impose the law on Gentile believers, only requesting them to abstain from specific offensive practices. The decision was formulated in an epistle and sent to Antioch through Judas and Silas as official delegates.

Their position vindicated, Paul and Barnabas continued their ministry at Antioch. Apparently during this time the incident of Galatians 2:11-21 occurred. The Jerusalem conference left unmentioned the problem of the relation of Jewish believers to the law. As represented by James, Judaic Christians continued to observe the Mosaic law, not for salvation, but as a way of life, because they were Jewish believers. Peter's withdrawal from table fellowship with Gentiles, lest he offend those of the circumcision, led him into inconsistency which Paul recognized as undermining the status of the Gentile believer.

For the second missionary journey Paul and Barnabas separated because of their "sharp contention" concerning John Mark. Barnabas sailed to Cyprus with Mark, while Paul chose Silas and revisited the churches in Galatia (15:36-41). At Lystra Paul added young Timothy to the missionary party, having circumcised him to remove obstacles for work among the Jews. Negative leadings closed the door to missionary work in Asia and Bithynia, but at Troas the positive call to Macedonia was received (16:1-9). The use of "we" (16:10) reveals Luke's presence with the group that sailed for Macedonia. The vivid accounts of Lydia's conversion, the deliverance of the demon-possessed slave girl, the subtle charges against and imprisonment of Paul and Silas, the startling events that followed (16:11-40) bespeak the hand of an eye-witness. Paul's demands of the magistrates next morning established the dignity of the preachers and safeguarded the status of the young church.

Leaving Luke at Philippi, the missionaries next began an expository ministry in the synagogue at Thessalonica. With the synagogue soon closed to him, Paul apparently carried on a successful Gentile ministry there. A Jewish-instigated riot forced the missionaries to flee to Berea, where a fruitful ministry resulted among the "noble" Bereans. When the work there was interrupted by agitators from Thessalonica, Silas and Timothy remained, but Paul, the leader of the work, was brought to Athens by some brethren (17:1-15). From I Thessalonians 3:1-2 it appears that Timothy and Silas came to Athens as requested; Timothy was sent back to Thessalonica, and Silas apparently went back to Philippi (Phil. 4:15; II Cor. 11:9).

Stirred by the Athenian idolatry, Paul preached in the synagogue and daily in the market. Drawing the attention of the Athenian philosophers, he was requested to give a formal exposition of his teaching. His appearing on "Mars' Hill" was not a formal trial. His memorable speech before the pagan philosophers (17:22-31) is a masterpiece of tact, insight, and condensation, but the contemptuous interruption at the mention of the ressurrection prevented an elaboration of the further essentials of the Gospel. A few converts were made, but Paul regarded the mission at cultured, philosophical, sophisticated Athens with keen disappointment.

On the contrary, the work at Corinth, a city of commerce, wealth, squalor and gross immorality, proved to be a definite success, lasting 18 months (18:1-17). After finding employment at his trade with Aquila and Priscilla, recently expelled from Rome, Paul preached in the Corinthian synagogue. Apparently he was depressed from his experience at Athens, but the coming of Silas and Timothy lifted his spirits and a vigorous witness was begun (18:5). Timothy's report concerning the Thessalonians caused the writing of I Thessalonians. A few months later, because of further information from there. II Thessalonians was written. Unable to return to Thessalonica Paul wrote both letters to meet the needs of his converts. Some would also place the writing of Galatians at Corinth, but Galatians is capable of a wide range of dating within the Acts framework. A successful work among the Gentiles resulted in the formation of a large church, the majority of the members being from the lower levels of society (I Cor. 1:26). With the arrival of the new proconsul, Gallio, perhaps in May, A.D. 52, the Jews accused Paul of teaching an illegal religion, but the governor, declaring a religious controversy outside his jurisdiction, refused to judge the matter. His action in effect gave tacit governmental recognition to Christianity.

From Corinth Paul took Aquila and Priscilla with him as far as Ephesus, intending upon his return to continue the profitable partnership with them there. Refusing an invitation for further ministry in the Ephesian synagogue, Paul hurried to Judea. He apparently visited Jerusalem and then spent some time at Antioch (18:18-22).

Paul's departure from Antioch traditionally marks the beginning of the third missionary journey. It is convenient to retain the traditional designation, but it should be remembered that with the second journey Antioch ceased to be the center for Paul's activities.

Having strengthened the disciples in "the region of Galatia and Phrygia," Paul commenced a fruitful ministry at Ephesus, lasting nearly three years (19:1-41; 20:31). His work at Ephesus, one of the most influential cities of the E, placed Paul at the heart of Greco-Roman civilization. After three months of work in the synagogue, Paul launched an independent Gentile work, centering his daily preaching in the school of Tyrannus for a two-year period. The Ephesian ministry was marked by systematic teaching (20:18-21), extraordinary miracles (19:11-12), signal victory over the magical arts (19:13-19), and devastating inroads on the worship of Diana (19:23-27). Streams of people came to Ephesus for purposes of commerce, religion, or pleasure, where coming into contact with the Gospel many were converted and spread the message throughout the province (19:10). But the work was marked by constant and fierce opposition (20:19; I Cor. 15:32). The financially-prompted tumult led by Demetrius brought the work of Paul at Ephesus to a close (19:23-20:1).

While at Ephesus Paul inaugurated a collection among his Gentile churches for the saints in Judea (I Cor. 16:1-4). Since its delivery was to mark the close of his work in the E, Paul was making plans to visit Rome (Acts 19:21), intending from there to go to Spain (Rom. 15:22-29).

While at Ephesus Paul experienced anxieties due to various difficulties in the Corinthian church. In a letter now lost (I Cor. 5:9) he counseled them about their relations to pagan society. Perhaps he also made a brief visit to Corinth (II Cor. 12:14). The arrival of a delegation from Corinth with a letter from the church was the immediate occasion for the writing of I Corinthians (I Cor. 16:17,18; 7:1), wherein Paul dealt with the evils plaguing that church. Titus was sent to Corinth with plans for him to come to Paul at Troas. Paul found an open door at Troas, but anxiety because of the continued absence of Titus caused him to leave for Macedonia. The report of Titus, whom he met in Macedonia, relieved Paul's anxiety and was the immediate occasion for the writing of II Corinthians (II Cor. 2:12-13; 7:5-16), which was sent back to Corinth by Titus (II Cor. 8:6, 16-18). After "much exhortation" in Macedonia, Paul spent the three winter months in Corinth (Acts 20:2-3), where he wrote the Epistle to the Romans to prepare them for his coming visit and secure their support for his contemplated work in Spain (Rom. 15:22-29; 16:1,23).

The plan to take the collection to Jerusalem directly from Corinth was canceled because of a discovered plot on Paul's life; instead he went by way of Macedonia, leaving Philippi with Luke after the Passover (Acts 20:3-6). The church-elected companions in travel awaited them at Troas, where they spent a busy and eventful night (20:7-12). Hoping to reach Jerusalem for Pentecost, Paul called the Ephesian elders to meet him at Miletus. His farewell to them is marked by tender memories, earnest instructions, and searching premonitions concerning the future (20:18-35). The journey to Jerusalem was marked by repeated warnings to Paul of what awaited him there (21:1-16). Some interpreters hold that Paul blundered in persisting on going to Jerusalem in the face of these clear warnings, thus cutting short his missionary labors. Paul apparently interpreted the warnings not as prohibitions but as tests of his willingness to suffer for the cause of his Lord and the Church.

Paul the Prisoner. Although cordially received at Jerusalem by James and the elders, Paul's presence created tension in the church because of reports that he taught Jews in the dispersion to forsake Moses. To neutralize these reports they suggested to Paul a plan to prove that he had no aversion to a voluntary keeping of the law. Always anxious to avoid offense, Paul agreed to their proposal. The act of conciliation apparently satisfied the Judean believers but was the cause of Paul's arrest. Certain Jews from Asia, seeing him in the temple, created a tumult by falsely charging him with defiling the temple. Rescued from death at the hands of the Jewish mob by the Roman chiliarch and some soldiers, Paul proved his love for the Jews by securing permission to address them from the castle steps. They gave silent attention until he mentioned his commission to the Gentiles, when the riot broke out anew. A scourging, ordered to force information out of him, was avoided by Paul's mention of his Roman citizenship. Efforts by the chiliarch the next day to gain further information about Paul before the Sanhedrin proved futile. That night the Lord appeared to the discouraged apostle, commended his efforts at witnessing, and assured him that he would go to Rome. Informed of a plot to murder Paul, the chiliarch sent Paul to Caesarea under a large protective guard (23:17-23:35).

The trial before Felix at Caesarea made it clear to the governor that the charges against Paul were spurious but, unwilling to antagonize the Jews, he simply postponed a decision. Asked to expound the Christian faith before Felix and his Jewish wife, Drusilla, Paul courageously probed their consciences by preaching "of righteousness, and self-control, and the judgment to come." Terrified, Felix dismissed the preacher but later gave Paul opportunities to use bribery to secure his release. Felix after two years was summoned to Rome and left Paul an uncondemned prisoner (24:1-27).

With the coming of the new governor, Festus, the Jewish leaders renewed their efforts to secure Paul's condemnation. When it became clear to Paul that he could not expect justice from the new governor, he used his right as a Roman citizen and appealed his case to Caesar, thereby removing it from the jurisdiction of the lower courts (25:1-12). When Herod Agrippa II and his sister Bernice came to visit the new governor, Festus, perplexed about Paul's case, presented the matter to Agrippa, an acknowledged expert in Jewish affairs. The next day before his royal audience Paul delivered a masterly exposition of his position and used the occasion to seek to win Agrippa to Christ. Uncomfortable under Paul's efforts, Agrippa terminated the meeting, but frankly declared Paul's innocence to the governor (25:13-26:32).

Paul was sent to Rome, perhaps in the autumn of A.D. 60, under the escort of a centurion named Julius. Luke and Aristarchus accompanied him. Luke's detailed account of the voyage has the minuteness, picturesqueness, and accuracy of an alert eye-witness. Adverse weather delayed the progress of the ship. At Myra they transferred to an Alexandrian grain ship bound for Italy. Futile efforts to reach commodious winter quarters at Phoenix caused the ship to be caught in a typhonic storm for 14 days, ending in total wreck on the island of Malta. After three months on Malta, the journey to Rome was completed in another Alexandrian grain ship. Paul's treatment in Rome was lenient; he lived in his own hired house with a soldier guarding him. Permitted to receive all who came, he was able to exercise an important ministry in Rome. The "Prison Epistles," Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians and Philippians, are abiding fruit of this period which afforded him opportunity to meditate and to write.

Closing Years. Acts leaves the question of Paul's release unanswered, but there is strong evidence for believing that he was released at the end of two years. The amicable attitude of the Roman government in Acts favors it, the Prison Epistles expect it, the Pastoral Epistles demand it, and tradition asserts it. Paul's subsequent activities must be inferred from scant references in the Pastorals. From their contents it seems clear that I Timothy and Titus were written before the outbreak of the Neronian persecution. After his release, perhaps in the spring of A.D. 63, Paul went east, visited Ephesus, stationing Timothy there when he left for Macedonia (I Tim. 1:3). He left Titus to complete missionary work on Crete, and in writing to him mentions plans to spend the winter at Nicopolis (1:5; 3:12). From Nicopolis he may have made the traditional visit to Spain, working there at the outbreak of the Neronian persecution in autumn of A.D. 64. II Timothy makes it clear that Paul is again a prisoner in Rome, kept in close confinement as a malefactor (1:16-17; 2:9). At his first appearing before the court he escaped immediate condemnation, but in writing to Timothy he has no hope of release (4:16-18,6-8). He was executed at Rome in late A.D. 66 or early 67. Tradition says he was beheaded on the Ostian Way.

Achievement and Character. Paul's achievements proclaim him as an unexcelled missionary statesman. His labors firmly planted churches in the strategic centers of Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia, while his plans for work at Rome and in Spain reveal his imperial missionary strategy. His foresight led him to select and train strong young workers to carry on the work after him. Paul was supremely the interpreter of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, interpreted to the Gentile world through his labors and letters. It was primarily through his agency that the world-wide destiny of Christianity was established, liberated from the yoke of legalism. His epistolary writings, formulating, interpreting, and applying the essence of Christianity, are vital to Christian theology and practice. His theology was rooted in his own revolutionary experience with Christ. He saw man's inability to attain to righteousness through his own efforts, but realized that God had provided a way of salvation, wholly out of grace and love, in Christ Jesus, available through faith in Him alone. He also saw that the Gospel made strenuous ethical demands upon the life and conduct of the believer. The essence of the Christian life for Paul was union with Christ; Him he loved and served, and yearned for His imminent return.

Physically, Paul did not present an imposing appearance, as is evident from II Corinthians 10:10. Tradition pictures him as being small of stature, having a decidedly Jewish physiognomy. That he possessed a rugged physical constitution seems plain from all the hardships and sufferings he underwent (II Cor. 11:23-27), as well as his ability, amid his spiritual anxieties, to earn his own living through manual labor. He endured more than most men could endure, yet he keenly felt his bodily frailty. Especially was he afflicted by "a thorn [or stake] in the flesh" (II Cor. 12:7). The exact nature of the affliction can only be conjectured; attempts at identification have varied widely. Whatever its precise nature, his feelings of weakness made him constantly dependent upon divine empowerment (II Chron. 12:10; Phil. 4:12-13).

The many-sided personality of the man is difficult to gather into one picture. He seems to embody polar extremes: bodily weakness and tremendous power, a keen intellect and profound mysticism, strongly attracting and furiously repelling men. Intellectually he was a man of outstanding ability, one of the world's great thinkers. He grasped truth at its full value and logically worked out its implications. But his subtlety of intellect was combined with practical good sense. He was a man of strict integrity, ever careful to maintain a good conscience. His life was characterized by a love of the truth which allowed no temporizing for the sake of expediency. Having understood his duty, he followed it unflinchingly, undeterred by possible consequences to himself. He was characterized by native zeal and ardor, giving himself wholly to his work. He was warm-hearted and affectionate, longing for and making strong friendships. He was humble, sincere, and sympathetic. He was by nature a religious man, and his religion, even as a Jew, much more as a Christian, dominated his life and activities. The secret of his unique career lay in his fervent nature as possessed and empowered by the Living Christ. D.E.H.

PAULUS, SERGIUS (pô'lŭs, sûr'jĭ-ŭs, Gr. Paúlos. Sérgios). When Paul and Barnabas visited Paphos, the capital of Cyprus, on their first missionary journey, they were called before Sergius Paulus, the Roman proconsul (AV, "deputy"), because this man of understanding "desired to hear the word of God" (Acts 13:6-12). When Elymas, his court magician, attempted to turn him against the Gospel, Paul through a miracle struck him with blindness. The incident so affected Sergius Paulus that he "believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord" (Acts 13:12). It is often said that Paul, then known as Saul of Tarsus, took his name from this first Gentile convert, but this may be only coincidence.

PAVEMENT, THE (Gr. lithóstrotos, paved with stones), the courtyard outside the Praetorium or palace in Jerusalem where Pilate passed public sentence on Jesus (John 19:13). Archaeologists believe it was either an area paved with large blocks of stone (4x3x2 ft.) laid in concrete, or a special mosaic. Some think it was "an elevated dais or tesselated pavement." (Interpreter's Bible Vol. 8, p. 774.) The meaning of Gabbatha, the Hebrew equivalent, is uncertain, although it has been traced to the Latin word for "platter" and perhaps referred to a paved court shaped like a dish or bowl. In II Chronicles 7:3 the term is used for the open court of Solomon's Temple.

PAVILION (pă-vĭl'yŭn, Heb. sōkh [Ps. 27:5], sukkâh [Ps. 31:20], booth, tent), a covered place in which a person may be kept hid. It is used chiefly to symbolize God's favor and protection provided for His children (Ps. 18:11). It grows out of the fact that to the eastern king's inner court or pavilion none has access except those to whom he gives permission.

PEACE (Heb. shālôm, peace, Gr. eiréne, concord), a frequent word in both testaments used in a variety of ways. In the OT times it was the usual word of greeting (Gen. 29:6). It is used also throughout the Bible to indicate a spirit of tranquillity and freedom from either inward or outward disturbance (Num. 6:26; I Kings 4:24; Acts 9:31). When nations enjoyed this, it was regarded as a gift from God (Lev. 26:6; Ps. 29:11). Perhaps its most frequent use in both testaments is to denote that spiritual tranquillity which all can enjoy when through faith in Christ they are brought into a right relation with God. There is the peace with God enjoyed by all truly regenerated persons (Rom. 5:1; Col. 1:20) and the peace of God enjoyed only by believers who meet its conditions (Phil. 4:6-7). Perhaps both aspects are implied in such passages as Isaiah 26:3 and John 14:27. Christ came to provide peace on earth (Luke 2:14), but this will not be realized fully until He returns again to effect it in person (Isa. 9:6-7; 11:6-9; Mic. 4:3). H.Z.C.

PEACE OFFERING (See Offerings)

PEACOCK (See Birds)

PEARL (Gr. margarítes). In the OT (Job 28:18, KJV), the RV and RSV have more correctly rendered the word "crystal." In the NT the word is used in several ways. It denotes the costly precious stone (I Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4). Pearls are accidental concretions formed within the bodies of certain mollusks, especially the Avicula margaritifera from the Indian Ocean and Persian Gulf.

The word has a figurative use in the NT. In Matthew 7:6 it is used to stand for spiritual truths which should not be cast before profane men who will not receive them. Christ is set forth in the parable of Matthew 13:45-46 as a merchant seeking the "pearl of great price," the Church. In the Book of Revelation the 12 gates of the New Jerusalem are each made from a pearl.

PEDAHEL (pĕd'à-hĕl, Heb. pedhah'ēl, God delivers), a prince of Naphtali appointed by Moses to apportion Palestine (Num. 34:28).

PEDAHZUR (pē-dā'zêr, Heb. pedhāhtsûr, the rock), a prince of the tribe of Manasseh, father of Gamaliel whom Moses appointed to aid in numbering the people (Num. 1:10; 2:20).

PEDAIAH (pē-dā'yà, Heb. pedhāyāhû, Jehovah redeems). 1. One from Rumah, father of Zedudah who was Josiah's wife and Jehoiakim's mother (II Kings 23:36).

2. Father of Zerubbabel, son of Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:18).

3. The father of Joel and ruler of western Manasseh under David (I Chron. 27:20).

4. One from the family of Parosh who aided in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25).

5. A Benjamite, father of Joed, Kolaiah's son (Neh. 11:7).

6. A Levite appointed by Nehemiah as one of the treasurers over the Lord's house (Neh. 13:13).

PEEP (Heb. tsāphaph, to chirp), a word describing the cry of a bird (Isa. 10:14) and the noise made by wizards uttering sounds that are supposed to come from the dead (Isa. 8:19).

PEKAH (pē'kà, Heb. peqah, to open), the son of Remaliah the 18th king of Israel. In the 52nd year of Uzziah, he usurped the throne by murdering his predecessor, Pekahiah. He began to reign about 734 B.C. and reigned for 20 years (II Kings 15:27). Incensed by the weakening of Israel under the leadership before him, caused by internal trouble and the heavy tribute paid to Assyria, he formed a league with the Gileadites to resist the encroachments of Assyria. To strengthen his position further and accomplish his purposes, he allied himself with Rezin of Damascus against Jotham, king of Judah (II Kings 15:37-38). The godly character of Jotham (II Chron. 27) probably delayed the realization of this plot until Jotham's son, Ahaz, was on the throne. The details of this campaign are recorded in two places in the OT (II Kings 16; II Chron. 28). Perhaps the most important thing about this struggle was that it occasioned the important prophecies of Isaiah 7-9. Finally Pekah became subject to the Assyrian power (II Kings 15:29) and a short time later was murdered by Hoshea. His sad epitaph is summarized in II Kings 15:28, "He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord."

PEKAHIAH (pĕk'à-hī'à, Heb. peqahyâh, Jehovah has opened), Israel's 17th king, the son of Menahem. He was a wicked king, following the practices of idolatry formulated by Jeroboam (II Kings 15:24). There are some problems regarding the date of his reign caused by the statement in II Kings 15:23, "In the fiftieth year of Azariah." By dating the beginning of his reign 735 B.C. most of the date problem dissolves. After a brief reign of but two years, he was brutally murdered by Pekah and along with him the 50 Gileadites associated with him.

PEKOD (pē'kŏd, Heb. peqôdh, visitation), a name applied to an Aramaean tribe living to the E and near the mouth of the Tigris and forming part of the Chaldean empire in Ezekiel's day (Jer. 50:21; Ezek. 23:23).

PELAIAH (pē-lā'yà, Heb. pelā'yâh, Jehovah is wonderful), Elioenai's son from Judah's royal house (I Chron. 3:24). This name was given also to the Levite who aided Ezra in explaining the law (Neh. 8:7) and later sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:10).

PELALIAH (pĕl'ă-lī'ă, Heb. pelalyâh, Jehovah has judged), the priestly father of Jeroham and son of Amzi who was a worker in the Lord's house (Neh. 11:12).

PELATIAH (pĕl'ă-tī'ă, Heb. pelatyâh, Jehovah has delivered). 1. Hananiah's son who descended from Salathiel from the family of David (I Chron. 3:21). He was the grandson of Zerubbabel.

2. Ishi's son who headed a Simeonite group that helped rid the area of the Amalekites (I Chron. 4:42) in Hezekiah's reign.

3. One of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:22).

4. One of the princes of the people, son of Benaiah (Ezek. 11:1) who along with others devised iniquity and gave wicked counsel in Jerusalem (Ezek. 11:2). Ezekiel was instructed to prophesy against them and while he was doing so Pelatiah fell dead (Ezek. 11:13).

PELEG (pē'lĕg, Heb. pelegh, division), one of the sons of Eber, brother of Joktan and the father of Rue (Gen. 10:25; 11:16-19; I Chron. 1:25). The reason for his name is that "in his days was the earth divided" (Gen. 10:25). This probably refers to the confounding of the language and the consequent scattering of the descendants of Noah (Gen. 11:1-9).

PELET (pē'lĕt, Heb. pelet, deliverance), Jahdai's son (I Chron. 2:47); also one of Azmaveth's sons from the tribe of Benjamin who joined David at Ziklag while he hid from Saul (I Chron. 12:3).

PELETH (pē'lĕth, Heb. peleth, swiftness). 1. The father of On, from the tribe of Reuben, who became a part of the conspiracy against Moses and Aaron (Num. 16:1).

2. A descendant of Jerahmeel through Onan (I Chron. 2:33).

PELETHITES (pĕl'ē-thīts, Heb. pelēthî, courier), a group who along with the Cherethites formed David's bodyguard. Perhaps, as the meaning of their name suggests, they were the ones who conveyed the king's messages to distant places.

PELICAN (See Birds)

PELLA (pĕl'ă), a name that does not occur in the Bible, but is mentioned by Josephus as one of the towns of the district named Decapolis, or Ten Cities, by the Romans, which is mentioned in Matthew 4:25 and Mark 5:20; 7:31. Pella thus lay E of the Sea of Galilee in the mountains of Gilead. Josephus mentions Pella together with the towns of Gerasa, Gadara and Hippos in the same proximity. It is described as a flat fertile valley surrounded on all sides by a higher plain or plateau. Today it is full of old ruins, including an ancient Christian church. An interesting Biblical aspect of Pella is that it is supposed to have been one of the main refuge cities of the Christians during destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans (cf. Matt. 24:16). At the time of Christ the cities, which formed a city league originally formed by Pompey in 62 B.C., were Greek in culture and highly commercialized. See DECAPOLIS.

PELONITE (pĕl'ō-nīt, Heb. pelônî, separates), the title of two of David's mighty men, Helez and Ahijah (I Chron. 11:27,36). It is thought that this designation originated from their place of birth because of the reference in I Chronicles 27:10 that Helez was from Ephraim's tribe.

PEN (See Writing)

PENCE (See Money)

PENDANT (See Dress)

PENIEL, PENUEL (pē-nī'ĕl, pē-nū'ĕl, Heb. penî'ēl, face of God). 1. The spot where Jacob wrestled with the angel of God (Gen. 32:24-32). The exact location is unknown, though it was not far from Succoth and E of the Jordan.

2. Hur's son, the father of Gedor (I Chron. 4:4).

3. One of Shashah's sons (I Chron. 8:25).

PENINNAH (pē-nĭn'ă, Heb. peninnâh, coral), one of Elkanah's wives, who bore children and taunted Hannah (I Sam. 1:2-7) while she was childless.

PENKNIFE, a small knife used to sharpen the pens or writing reeds of Jeremiah's day (Jer. 36:23).

PENTATEUCH, THE (pĕn'tă-tōōk, Heb. tôrâh, law or teaching). This is composed of five books: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. These books, whose canonicity has never been called into question by the Jews, Protestants, or Catholics head the list of the OT canon. As a literary unit they provide the background for the OT as well as the New.

Chronologically the Pentateuch covers the period of time from the creation to the end of the Mosaic era. Since the date for the creation of the universe is not given, it is impossible to ascertain the length of this entire era.

Genesis begins with an account of creation, but soon narrows its interest to the human race. Adam and Eve were entrusted with the responsibility of caring for the world about them, but forfeited their privilege through disobedience and sin. In subsequent generations all mankind became so wicked that the entire human race, except Noah and his family, was destroyed. When the new civilization degenerated, God chose to fulfill His promises of redemption through Abraham. From Adam to Abraham represents a long period of time for which the genealogical lists in Genesis 5 and 10 hardly serve as a time table.

The patriarchal era (Gen. 12-50), narrates the events of approximately four generations, namely those of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. Scholars generally agree that Abraham lived during the 19th or 18th century B.C. — some dating him a century earlier and some considerably later. The contemporary culture of this period is much better known to us today through recent archaeological discoveries. In 1933 a French archaeologist, Andre Parrot, discovered the ruins of Mari, a city located on the Euphrates River. Here he found numerous temples, palaces, statues, and some 20,000 tablets which reflected the culture of the patriarchal era. Nuzu, a site E of Nineveh, excavated about 1925-1941, yielded several thousand documents which likewise provide numerous illustrations of customs that reflect the patriarchal pattern of living as portrayed in the Genesis record.

After the opening verses of Exodus the rest of the Pentateuch is chronologically confined to the lifetime of Moses. Consequently the deliverance of Israel from Egypt and their preparation for entrance into the land of Canaan is the prevailing theme. The historical core of these books is briefly outlined as follows:

Exodus 1-19, From Egypt to Mount Sinai
Exodus 19-Numbers 10, Encampment at Mount Sinai (approximately 1 year)
Numbers 10-21, Wilderness Wanderings (approximately 38 years)

Numbers 22-Deuteronomy 34, Encampment before Canaan (approximately one year)

The Mosaic law was given at Mount Sinai. As God's covenant people the Israelites were not to conform to the idolatrous practices of the Egyptians nor to the customs of the Canaanites whose land they were to conquer and possess. Israel's religion was a revealed religion. For nearly a year they were carefully instructed in the law and the covenant. A tabernacle was constructed and erected as the central place for the worship of God. Offerings and sacrifices were instituted to make atonement for their sins and for expression of their gratitude and devotion to God. The Aaronic family, supported by the Levites, was ordained to serve at the tabernacle in the ministration of divine worship. Feasts and seasons likewise were carefully prescribed for the Israelites so that they might worship and serve God as His distinctive people. After the entrance into Canaan was delayed for almost 40 years because of the unbelief of the Israelites, Moses reviewed the law for the younger generation. This review, plus timely instructions for the occupation of Palestine, is summarized in the Book of Deuteronomy.

For study purposes the Pentateuch lends itself to the following analysis:

I. The era of beginnings, Genesis 1:1-11:32.
  A. The account of creation, 1:1-2:25.
  B. Man's fall and its consequences, 3:1-6:10.
  C. The flood: God's judgment on man, 6:11-8:19.
  D. Man's new beginning, 8:20-11:32.

II. The patriarchal period, 12:1-50:26.
  A. The life of Abraham, 12:1-25:18.
  B. Isaac and Jacob, 25:19-36:43.
  C. Joseph, 37:1-50:26.

III. Emancipation of Israel, Exodus 1:1-19:2.
  A. Israel freed from slavery, 1:1-13:19.
  B. From Egypt to Mt. Sinai, 13:20-19:2.

IV. The religion of Israel, Exodus 19:3-Leviticus 27:34.
  A. God's covenant with Israel, Exodus 19:3-24:8.
  B. The place of worship, 24:9-40:38.
  C. Instructions for holy living, Leviticus 1:1-27:34.
    1. The offerings, 1:1-7:38.
    2. The priesthood, 8:1-10:20.
    3. Laws of purification, 11:1-15:33.
    4. Day of atonement, 16:1-34.
    5. Heathen customs forbidden, 17:1-18:30.
    6. Laws of holiness, 19:1-22:33.
    7. Feasts and seasons, 23:1-25:55.
    8. Conditions of God's blessings, 26:1-27:34.

V. Organization of Israel, Numbers 1:1-12:10.
  A. The numbering of Israel, 1:1-4:49.
  B. Camp regulations, 5:1-6:21.
  C. Religious life of Israel, 6:22-9:14.
  D. Provisions for guidance, 9:15-10:10.

VI. Wilderness wanderings, Numbers 10:11-22:1.
  A. From Mt. Sinai to Kadesh, 10:11-12:16.
  B. The Kadesh crisis, 13:1-14:45.
  C. The years of wandering, 15:1-19:22.
  D. From Kadesh to the Plains of Moab, 20:1-22:1.

VII. Instructions for entering Canaan, 22:2-36:13.
  A. Preservation of God's chosen people, 22:2-25:18.
  B. Preparation for conquest, 26:1-33:49.
  C. Anticipation of occupation, 33:50-36:13.

VIII. Retrospect and prospect, Deuteronomy 1:1-34:12.
  A. History and its significance, 1:1-4:43.
  B. The law and its significance, 4:44-28:68.
  C. Final preparation and farewell, 29:1-34:12.

The authorship of the Pentateuch has been a major concern of OT scholars for the last two centuries. According to the consensus of scholarship as developed since 1750, the Pentateuch was composed of four major documents, which actually reflected the historical conditions between Davidic and exilic times. These documents were then combined into one literary unit shortly before 400 B.C. This Graf-Wellhausen theory, as it is popularly known, has been somewhat modified in recent decades by regarding the Pentateuch as essentially Mosaic in that these documents were orally transmitted. This evolutionary historical approach often confuses the practice of Israel's religion with that which God had revealed to them through Moses.

The Pentateuch itself supports the view that Moses is essentially responsible for its authorship. References throughout the rest of the OT as well as the NT point to Moses as the author. Being personally involved as the deliverer and lawgiver of Israel, Moses was familiar with the developments as recorded in the last four books of the Pentateuch. Very likely he had many scribes to assist him in keeping a record of all the details that pertain to organization, geography, and history. Naturally it would have been his concern to leave a written copy of the law and a history of this unique experience of the Israelites before his departure. Especially was this in accord with his desire that they should carefully conform to the law in order that they might continually enjoy God's favor.

How Moses obtained the information recorded in the book of Genesis is not known. Since evidence of writing in the Ancient Near East dates back into the fourth millennium B.C., it is quite probable that the Patriarchs passed on some written records to their descendants. Oral tradition may have supplemented these sources. Some of the information, particularly the creation account, may have been imparted to Moses by divine revelation.

Moses was well qualified to write the Pentateuch. Trained in the court of Pharaoh he undoubtedly knew the Egyptian and Akkadian (Babylonian) languages in addition to his native Hebrew. Babylonian classics, civil administration, and military science may have been part of his curriculum. With this background and training plus the experience of leading Israel under divine guidance from Egyptian bondage to the borders of Canaan, Moses may have climaxed his career with the composition of the Pentateuch. Equally important was the divine enduement through which this literary production not only became the great Torah (law) for the Jewish nation but has been universally regarded as the introductory section to the Holy Scriptures.

PENTECOST (pĕn'tĕ-kŏst, Gr. pentecosté). The word derives from the Greek for "the fiftieth day." It was the Jewish Feast of Weeks (Exod. 34:22; Deut. 16:9-11), variously called the Feast of Harvest (Exod. 23:16), or the Day of First-Fruits (Num. 28:26), which fell on the 50th day after the Feast of the Passover. The exact method by which the date was computed is a matter of some controversy.

Originally, the festival was the time when, with appropriate ritual and ceremony, the first-fruits of the corn-harvest, the last Palestinian crop to ripen, were formally dedicated. The festival cannot therefore have antedated the settlement in Palestine. Leviticus 23 prescribes the sacred nature of the holiday, and lists the appropriate sacrifices. Numbers 28 appears to be a supplementary list, prescribing offerings apart from those connected with the preservation of the ritual loaves. In later Jewish times, the feast developed into a commemoration of the giving of the Mosaic Law. To reinforce this function, the Rabbis taught that the Law was given 50 days after the Exodus, a tradition of which there is no trace in the OT, nor in the Jewish authorities, Philo and Josephus. It was the events of Acts 2 which transformed the Jewish festival into a Christian one. Some have seen a symbolic connection between the first-fruits of the ancient festival, and the "first-fruits" of the Christian dispensation. "Whitsunday" is therefore the 50th day after Easter Sunday. The names derives from the white garments of those seeking baptism at this festival, a practice of very ancient origin.

Of the events of Pentecost recorded in Acts 2, the "gift of tongues" requires consideration, for the claim to such a supernatural manifestation became, in the early decades of the 20th century, the most characteristic mark of religious groups which may be generally termed "Pentecostal." The nature of the "tongues" (Acts 2:4) is difficult to determine. The following points must be taken into account. First, those listed in Acts 2:9-11 were Jewish pilgrims from the synagogues of the Dispersion among the peoples named. They would all readily understand the two tongues of Palestine, Aramaic and Greek. The few foreign proselytes, who were no doubt of their number, would also be conversant with Greek, if not with Aramaic. No multiple "gift of tongues" in the literal sense of the phrase was therefore necessary, nor, if such an endowment was indeed given, as most commentators imply, did it long endure. Paul and Barnabas were clearly without knowledge of the tongue of Lystra (Acts 14:11-14), in spite of the fact that Paul says that he had "spoken with tongues" after the fashion discussed in I Corinthians 12 and 14 (cf. also Acts 10:46 and 19:6). It is generally assumed that the latter manifestation was a species of ecstatic utterance, which Paul tries to tone down, tolerate it though he does as a passing phase, and because, without specific direction, he hesitates to quench ardent spirits in the Church. Commentators vary strikingly. R. B. Rackham (Acts of the Apostles, p. 21) holds that Pentecost saw the glossolalia of Corinth, but that it was worship, not proclamation, that formed the subject of the message. Peter alone preached. Rackham admits that verses 8 and 11 require that some of the utterances should have been clothed in foreign words. In a polyglot world it is to be expected that such emotional and ecstatic speech would contain intrusions of alien vocabulary. F. F. Bruce (The Acts of the Apostles, p. 82) regards the phenomenon of Pentecost as a deliverance, under the urge of ecstatic emotion, from the pecularities of Galilaean speech and something different from the Corinthian experience, a purified or exalted utterance which removed dialectical barriers to understanding.

It seems reasonable, therefore, in view of the fact that, in a Greek and Aramaic-speaking audience, no immediately practicable purpose can be envisaged for a multiple employment of languages, to reject the view that alien tongues were used for the preaching of the new faith at Pentecost. The lack of any need for "interpreters" also makes it difficult to identify the situation with the one Paul sought to regulate in the Corinthian church. The "tongues" made for clarity; they did not destroy it for those who listened with sympathy. E.M.B.

PEOR (pē'ôr, Heb. pe'ôr, opening). 1. The name given to the mountain in Moab to the top of which King Balak led Balaam that he might see and curse Israel (Num. 23:28). It was a high peak near the town of Baal-Peor opposite the valley in which Israel camped (Deut. 3:29).

2. In Numbers 25:18; 31:16 and Joshua 22:17 Peor is used four times as a contraction for Baal-Peor.

3. Moses uses the term in two places (Num. 25:18; 31:16) to refer to the god of Baal-Peor.

PERAEA (pĕ-rē'a, Gr. Peraía, Peraíos, Peraítes), a word that does not occur in the Bible, but was used by Josephus and others to designate the small territory on the E side of the Jordan opposite old Judea and Samaria known in the Gospels as the land "beyond the Jordan" (peran tou Iordanou). For example, the words in Matthew 4:25 apo tes Galilaias kai Ioudaias kai peran tou Iordanou should be understood as "from Galilee and Judea and Peraea," and is so listed on Bible maps (cf. Matt. 4:15; Mark 3:7-8). The curious statement in Matthew 19:1 which says that Jesus "departed from Galilee and came into the coasts of Judea beyond Jordan" must mean that Jesus went from Galilee to Judea by way of Peraea, the usual road the Jews took in order to avoid going through Samaria.

In the days of Jesus, Herod Antipas ruled the unfertile desert country together with Galilee; but after the Herods, at the time the Gospels were written, Peraea belonged to the larger province of Judea. It stretched from Pella in the N to Machaerus in the S. In the days of the Maccabees it was inhabited chiefly by Gentiles, but at the time of Christ it had a heavy Jewish population. Gadara may have been the capital. John baptized in Bethabara "beyond the Jordan," or in Peraea (John 1:28). Jesus did much of His teaching in Peraea (Mark 10:1-33) and made His final journey to Jerusalem from there (John 10:40; 11:54). Today it is part of the modern Kingdom of Jordan with the capital at Amman.

PERAZIM, MOUNT (pĕr'ȧ-zĭm, Heb. har perāṭsîm, mount of breaches), usually identified with Baal-perazim, where David obtained a victory over the Philistines (II Sam. 5:20; I Chron. 14:11).

PERDITION (pêr-dĭ'shun, Gr. apóleia, perishing, destruction). The idea of a loss or destruction predominates in the use of this word. In each of the eight uses of the English word in the NT (John 17:12; Phil. 1:28; II Thess. 2:3; I Tim. 6:9; Heb. 10:39; II Pet. 3:7; Rev. 17:8,11), the final state of the wicked is referred to. In popular usage men make this word a synonym for hell and eternal punishment.

PERDITION, SON OF (Gr. huiós, tés apoleías), a phrase used to designate two men of the NT. Christ uses it in referring to Judas Iscariot (John 17:12). Paul uses the same title in II Thessalonians 2:3, applying it to the "man of sin" who is the Antichrist. It is derived from the custom among the Hebrews of noting a certain trait or characteristic in a person and then referring to him as the son of that trait. The term, therefore, would designate these two men as being the complete devotees of all that "perdition" signified.

PEREA (See Peraea)

PERES (pē'rĕs, Aram. peras, to split), one of the words that was written by the hand on the wall for Belshazzar and interpreted by Daniel (Dan. 5:1-29). It is the singular of "upharsin" (Dan. 5:25) and interpreted in Daniel 5:28.

PERESH (pē'rĕsh, Heb. peresh, dung), Machir's son by his concubine, Maachah, the Aramite (I Chron. 7:14,16).

PEREZ (pē'rĕz, Heb. perets, breach), one of Judah's twin sons by his daughter-in-law, Tamar (Gen. 38:29). He is called also "Pharez" (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:20,21).

PEREZ-UZZA (pē'rez-ŭz'ȧ, Heb. perets-'uzâh, the breach of Uzzah). Uzzah was one who accompanied the ark on its journey from Kiriath-jearim. When the oxen stumbled, Uzzah, contrary to the command of God, took hold of the ark and died immediately. David, therefore, named the spot "Perez-uzzah" (II Sam. 6:8). It is perhaps to be identified with Khirbet el-Uz, "the ruins of Uzzah" located a short distance from Kirjath-jearim.

PERFECTION, PERFECT (Heb. shālēm, tāmîm, Gr. téleios, teleiótes). The most common OT term is tāmîm, whose basic meaning is close to the fundamental and etymological sense of the English word, "complete" or "finished." It is used for the ritually clean victim of sacrifice (Exod. 12:5), and for uprightness of character (Gen. 6:9; 17:1; Ps. 119:1). It is applied to the Law, and to God Himself. In the NT the commonest term is teleios, an adjective formed from the noun telos, an end. The metaphor involved suggests that perfection is the attainment of the end or aim of being, and is therefore a relative term to be understood within its context. Absolute perfection can therefore be an attribute of God alone. Hence the explanation of such apparent contradictions as Philippians 3:12 and 15. So, too, Matthew 5:48, command though it is, involves no impossibility. The Christian is enjoined to fulfill the functions of his being as God fulfills His, and the sermon in which the precept is embedded explains the mode and manner of such attainment. The concept of perfection which has been taught by some theologians and preachers has erred in neglecting the relativity of the term and such clear teaching as that of John (I John 1:8), James (3:2) and Paul (Phil. 3:12).

PERFUME (Heb. qetoreth, sweet smoke, incense, a word rendered "perfume" in Exodus 30:35,37; Proverbs 27:9). There are many passages in the Bible that indicate the fondness for and use of perfume in Oriental countries. Perfumes had many uses in the Orient as the Bible indicates in many places. Spices were dried and mixed with resins and burned as incense at various occasions. In connection with the tabernacle worship, God revealed a special divine formula which could not be copied for personal use by the Hebrews apart from punishment (Exod. 30:7,8,34-38). These perfumes were prepared by men known as "apothecaries'" (Exod. 30:35; Eccl. 10:1).

Moses mentions one perfume to be made of pure myrrh, sweet cinnamon, sweet calamus, cassia and olive oil. It was to be used only as a holy anointing oil. Anyone who duplicated it would be cut off from his people (Exod 30:22-33).

Hebrews used perfumes for embalming their dead (John 19:38-40); for burning with the dead (II Chron. 16:14); for preparing a virgin to appear before the Persian king (Esth. 2:12-14); for preparing women for marriage (S. of Sol. 1:12-14); for setting a trap, by the harlot, for the innocent (Prov. 7:17). Special sweet-scented oils were used to anoint the bodies of those to whom respect was to be paid (Luke 7:37). When one wanted to mortify himself he would refrain from such oils (Dan. 10:3).

In the hot eastern countries perfumes became a sanitary necessity. They were used both to cover up bad odors which abounded in the Orient and to make life more enjoyable for all concerned.

Quite a large number of scents were used in the compounding of these perfumes. Perhaps the most frequently mentioned are frankincense (S. of Sol. 3:6) and myrrh (Ps. 45:8). For a list of plants and trees used in perfume making, see Winifred Walker, All the Plants of the Bible, New York: Harper, 1957. H.Z.C.

PERGA (pûr'gȧ, Gr. Pérge), the chief city of old Pamphilia of Asia Minor located about 12 miles from Attalia on the River Cestris which formed an inland port. Paul and Barnabas passed through the city twice on the first missionary journey, both going and returning (Acts 13:13-14; 14:24-25). Here John Mark left the party and returned to Jerusalem. During Greek times a celebrated temple of Artemis, or Diana, was located in the vicinity which perhaps was the reason Christianity never flourished there as in other cities of Asia Minor. Today it is known as Murtana and the well-preserved ruins still reveal an immense theater holding about 13,000 people.

PERGAMUM, PERGAMOS (pûr'gȧ-mŭm, Gr. Pérgamos), a city of Mysia in the Caicus valley, 15 miles inland; in KJV, Pergamos. Royally situated in a commanding position, Pergamum was the capital until the last of the Pergamenian kings bequeathed his realm to Rome in 133 B.C. Pergamum became the chief town of the new province of Asia, and the site of the first temple of the Caesar-cult, erected to Rome and Augustus in 29 B.C. A second shrine was later dedicated to Trajan, and the multiplication of such honor marks the prestige of Pergamum in pagan Asia. The worship of Asklepios and Zeus were also endemic. The symbol of the former was a serpent, and Pausanias describes his cult image "with a staff in one hand and the other on the head of a serpent." Pergamenian coins illustrate the importance which the community attached to this cult. Caracalla is shown on one coin, saluting a serpent twined round a bending sapling. On the crag above Pergamum was a throne-like altar to Zeus now in the Berlin Museum (Rev. 2:13?). It commemorated a defeat of a Gallic inroad, and was decorated with a representation of the conflict of the gods and the giants, the latter shown as monsters with snake-like tails. Zeus, to deepen Christian horror at Pergamum's obsession with the serpent-image, was called in this connection, "Zeus the Saviour." It is natural that "Nicolaitanism" should flourish in a place where politics and paganism were so closely allied, and where pressure on Christians to compromise must have been heavy. Pergamum was an ancient seat of culture and possessed a library which rivaled Alexandria's. Parchment (charta Pergamena) was invented at Pergamum to free the library from Egypt's jealous ban on the export of papyrus. E.M.B.

PERIDA (pē-rī'dȧ, Heb. perîdhā', divided), one of Solomon's servants (Neh. 7:57). Spelled "Peruda" in Ezra 2:55.

PERIZZITE (pâr'ĭ-zīt, Heb. perizzî). References in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges make it clear that the Perizzites were a pre-Israelitish tribe or racial group of Palestine (Gen. 13:7; 34:30; Exod. 3:8,17; 23:23; 33:2; 34:11; Deut. 20:17; Josh. 3:10; 24:11; Judg. 1:4). Apart from these well-defined Biblical references, the Perizzites seem to have left no other marks on history. No non-Biblical document mentions them. There is an etymological similarity between the word and the term for "dweller in an unwalled village," hence the suggestion that the Perizzites were Canaanitish argriculturists (or nomads) who were not a part of the ordered town and village communities of Palestine, but were not racially distinct. The suggestion is reasonable but cannot at this stage be proved. E.M.B.

PERJURY (pêr'jêr-ē), a word not found in our English Bible (KJV), but closely related to several Biblical words such as oath or punishment. Oaths were very common in the OT and frequent mention of them is made in the New. Oaths consisted of a promise made and an appeal to God for the ratification of it. Such oaths were considered binding promises, so that to break an oath was regarded as perjury as well as using falsehood under oath (Lev. 19:12; Ezek. 16:59).

PERSECUTION (pêr'sĕ-qū'shŭn), in its most common sense, signifies a particular course or period of systematic infliction of punishment or penalty for adherence to a particular religious belief. Oppression is to be distinguished from it. Pharaoh oppressed the Hebrews; so did Nebuchadnezzar. Daniel and Jeremiah were persecuted. Systematic persecution began with the Roman imperial government. Notably tolerant towards alien religious beliefs in general, the Romans clashed with the Christians over the formalities of Caesar-worship. In that fact, according to W. M. Ramsay, lies the prime significance of the persecutions. Persecution began as a social reaction, and became political later, a process which can be detected in the surviving documents (Acts of the Apostles; Tacitus' Annals; Pliny, Epistles X). The state's policy of repression was intermittent, and, as the evidence of Tertullian shows, was visibly daunted by the growing numbers of the Christians. A considerable body of literature has gathered round the difficult theme of the legal basis on which the authorities pursued their policy, and on the incidence and severity of the persecutions themselves. Disregarding Claudius' anti-semitism of A.D. 49 (Acts 18:2), in which the Christians were not distinguished from Jews, Nero must be regarded as the first persecutor. In A.D. 64 (Tacitus, Annals 15:38-44) this emperor used the small Christian community as scapegoats for a disastrous fire in Rome and the charge of incendiarism which was popularly leveled against him. Domitian's execution of Glabrio and Flavius Clemens in A.D. 95, and the exile of Domitilla for "atheism," and "going astray after the customs of the Jews" (Dio Cassius 67:44), was probably anti-Christian action, an incident which strikingly reveals the vertical spread of Christianity by the end of the first century. Pliny's famous correspondence with Trajan in A.D. 112 (Pliny, Epistles 10:96,97) reveals the state more moderately but quite uncompromisingly in action. Trajan's policy, laid down for Pliny in Bithynia, was followed by Hadrian and Antoninus Pius (A.D. 117-161). Marcus Aurelius was guilty of a sharp persecution at Lyons (A.D. 117). At the close of the second century, with the death of Septimius Severus, a long period of peace followed, broken by Maximinus Thrax, Decius, and Valerian, but without widespread action or much determination. Diocletian continued a now established policy of toleration until A.D. 303 when, under the influence of Galerius, he initiated the last short but savage period of persecution, described by Lactantius and Eusebius. (The historical questions involved are dealt with in W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire before A.D. 170; E. G. Hardy, Christianity and the Roman Government. More briefly, the social background and historical significance are dealt with in Tyndale Lectures 1951 and 1959 by E. M. Blaiklock: The Christian in Pagan Society and Rome in the New Testament). E.M.B.

PERSEPOLIS (pēr-sĕp'ō-lĭs, Gr. Persépolis). This city, royal seat of the Achaemenid kings of Persia, lay 30 miles NE of modern Shiraz. It was founded by Darius I (521-486 B.C.), and archaeological investigation establishes the fact that this king leveled the rock-terrace and built the great hall of audience. Xerxes and Artaxerxes carried on the work, the Hall of the Hundred Pillars being attributed to the latter. The whole complex of palaces and public buildings was fortified. The bas-reliefs surviving in the ruins are among the best examples of Achaemenid art. The burial-place of the dynasty is nearby. Destruction dates from Alexander the Great, who took Persepolis, and burned and looted it as an act of warfare designed to break Persian resistance, in 331 B.C. There is some evidence that the fire was confined to the main palace (Diod. 17:71,72). Persepolis is mentioned in II Maccabees 9:2 in connection with an attempted raid by Antiochus Epiphanes (215-163 B.C.), an outrage defeated by strong local resistance. The reference suggests that Persepolis was still a rich and powerful city a century and a half after Alexander's vandalism. E.M.B.

PERSEVERANCE (pûr-sĕ-vēr'ans, Gr. proskartéresis), a word found only once in the Bible (Eph. 6:18, KJV), where it is used in connection with prayer. The Bible has a number of other words that convey the same idea. For instance, epimenein in Acts 13:43 carries the idea of perseverance. This same thought is clearly the idea in Matthew 10:22 where the Latin uses the word persevero. Abraham persevered and this trait is expressed by the word ekarteresen (Heb. 11:27). Thus the idea of perseverance is certainly Biblical even though this English word is rare in our Bibles.

This word comes into use frequently in most theologies. The Calvinist believes the doctrine to be a Scriptural one and, therefore, defends it, while it is denied by the Arminian. Perhaps the most complete discussion of the subject in which both Calvinistic and Arminian positions are set forth and the Calvinistic idea is defended was written by John Owen. (John Owen, Works of, London: Richard Barnes, 1826, Vol. VI, pp. XXXI — 533; Vol. VII, pp. 2-324). Theologically considered the word signifies "that they whom God has regenerated and effectually called to a state of grace can neither totally nor finally fall away from that state, but shall certainly persevere therein to the end and be eternally saved" (Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology, Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans Publ. Co., 1941, p. 545). It is possible because the indwelling Spirit keeps those whom God has redeemed. Such passages as John 3:36; 5:24; 10:27-30; Philippians 1:6 are cited to support this.

The Arminian objects that the doctrine is contrary to Scripture (Luke 13:24; II Tim. 2:5; Col. 1:23; Heb. 6:4-6,11: II Tim. 2:17-18). Striving would be unnecessary if the saint could not lose his salvation. That it leads to immorality and that it is inconsistent with human freedom are both offered as objections. H.Z.C.

PERSIA (pûr'zhà, Heb. pāras, Gr. Persis). As a geographical term Persia may be taken to mean the Iranian plateau, bounded by the Tigris valley on the W and S, the Indus valley on the E, and by the Armenian ranges and the Caspian Sea to the N, comprising in all something near one million square miles. The plateau is high and saucer-shaped, rimmed by mountains rich in mineral wealth, but with wide tracts of arid desert in the interior. The land lies across the old road communications of Europe and Asia, a situation which has done much to determine Persia's ethnology and history. It is seldom possible to separate history and geography, and the term Persia has signified both less and more than the geographical and general meaning thus set forth. The original Persia was a small area N of the Persian Gulf, known as Persis, the modern Fars. It was a rugged area with desert on its maritime borders, its chief town known to the Greeks as Persepolis. The Medes lay to the N, Elam was on the W, and Carmania to the E. This small province was the original home of the Iranian tribe who finally dominated the whole country, and founded the vast Persian Empire, which at the time of its widest extent, stretched from the Aegean Sea, the Dardanelles, and the Bosporus, to the Indus River, and from N to S extended from the Black Sea, the Caucasus, the Caspian Sea, the Oxus and the Jaxartes, to the Gulf, the Indian Ocean, and the cataracts of the Nile. This was the imperial power described by Herodotus, which clashed with the Greeks at the beginning of the fifth century before Christ, and which Alexander overthrew a century and a half later. This, too, was the imperial Persia of the OT which rose on the ruins of Babylon, which is seen in the story of Esther, and which formed the background of the events described in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The Persians belonged to the race or group of nations which spoke the hypothetical Indo-European language, so called and conjectured because most of the languages of Europe together with the Indic languages descended from it. The Iranian dialects formed a southern group. A common linguistic ancestry, and therefore, in all probability, a common homeland, can be demonstrated for all this group. Migrations during the third and second millennia before Christ, mainly W, E, and S, appear to have spread tribal groups who spoke a common language through the European peninsulas, into India, and the northern Middle East. The picture is complex. Britain itself, for example, experienced three waves of invasion, Celtic (itself multiple), Roman, and Teutonic (Angles, Saxons Danes). Infiltration into the Middle East was as tangled a process. Just as the inhabitants of an enclave by the Tiber, speaking a minor Italic dialect, imposed their will upon the whole of Italy, and began the process of historical evolution which produced the Roman Empire, so the Persians emerged to dominate the whole complex of the Iranian tribes, 12 in number according to Xenophon (Cyro. 1:2:5), 10 according to Herodotus (1:125). A ninth century Assyrian inscription mentions Parsua as a northern country adjoining Media. This may be the first historical reference to the Persians before their movement S into Anshan and Parsa, the Persis above mentioned. The Assyrians reference may catch the Iranian tribe in the process of its migration. In Persis, the Persians were at first subject to the power of their northern neighbors, the Medes, although Elam, encroaching from the W, tended to form a buffer state between them. If reasons are sought for historical processes, it could have been the stimulus of Elam which caused Persian expansion.

Through Elam, Persis had contact with the developed civilizations of the Euphrates Valley. On the other hand, it may have needed no more than the emergence of a masterful personality to initiate the process. Such a person was Cyrus, second of that name from the ruling family of the Achaemenids. Cyrus is the Latinized form of Greek Kuros, Persian Kurash. According to tradition (Herod. 1:107-130), Cyrus was related to Astyages, king of Medea. Rising against his relative, Cyrus threw off the Median hegemony and established the Persians as the dominant tribe in 549 B.C. Some form of governmental partnership appears to have been established, for Medes held privileged posts in the new administration. Cyrus then moved W to defeat the Lydian Empire of Croesus in 545 B.C. (Herod. 1:71ff), and S to defeat Nabonidus of Babylon in 538 B.C. The conquest of Lydia gave Cyrus Asia Minor; the overthrow of Babylon made him master of the Euphrates River plain, Assyria, Syria, and Palestine. Thus arose the greatest West Asian Empire of ancient times. It was indeed the first of the world's great imperial organizations, a foreshadowing of the system of Rome, beneficent and humane when set beside the Assyrian Empire in comparison, but too loosely held and geographically divided to survive. The conflict between Samaria and Jerusalem, depicted in the story of Nehemiah, is illustration of the indiscipline which could reign in remoter corners. Nehemiah was working by royal decree, and yet found his work hampered by armed interference. Ezra's fear (Ezra 8:22) suggests similar pockets of anarchy.

Cyrus' great empire was organized by him and by Darius (Dariavaush, 521-486 B.C.), who succeeded him, after a period of revolt and dynastic trouble. Coming to terms with geography, Cyrus and Darius sought to combine a measure of local autonomy with centralization in a supreme controlling power, a difficult task even where communications are swift and efficient. The empire was cut into provinces, each under the rule of a satrap, who might be a local ruler or a Persian noble. About the person of the satrap were military and civil officials directly responsible to the king, who also kept himself informed on local matters by means of his "eyes," or his itinerant inspectors. This was an attempt to check maladministration in the satrapies, and to anticipate such challenges to the royal power as that described by Xenophon in his Anabasis. All provinces were assessed for monetary and man-power contributions to the central treasury and armed forces. An attempt was wisely made to preserve efficient forms of local government, and Greek city-states on the Ionian seaboard still functioned with religion, language, and civic government intact. Inscriptions suggest that there were three official languages, Persian, Elamitic, and Babylonian. Darius further unified his empire by an efficient gold coinage, state-highways, and a postal system, arrangements which became famous for their usefulness. The four books of the OT in which Persia forms a background all illustrate the royal tendency to delegate special authority to individuals for specific tasks.

Cyrus and the Achaemenid kings were Zoroastrians, worshipers of Ahura Mazda, "the Wise Lord." The Magi of the Medes appear to have been reorganized by Cyrus into a Mazdaist priesthood. Zoroaster taught that Ahura Mazda, together with his holy spirit, wars against an evil spirit, Ahriman. There was an element of Messianism in the cult, for it taught that after the earthly life of a future Saviour, God will finally triumph over evil, and all souls pass over the "bridge of decision," and enjoy eternal bliss, though some must first go through a purgatory of fire. Zoroaster stressed truth and mercy. Isaiah 45:7 is supposed by some to be a reference to Zoroastrian religion. The context is a tribute to Cyrus, and in contrast with the crude paganism of other peoples, the Persian monotheism may have appeared to the Hebrews to contain elements of divine insight. The notable favor shown to the religion of Jehovah in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah may illustrate the same affinity from the other side. It will be useful in conclusion to list the Persian kings whose reigns have significance in OT history: 1. Cyrus, 538-529 B.C. II Chronicles 36: 22,23; Ezra 1 to 5 passim; Isaiah 44:28; 45:1; Daniel 1:21; 6:28; 10:1.

2. Cambyses, 529-522 B.C. Some have suggested that Cambyses is the mysterious Darius the Mede of Daniel 5:31; 6:9,25; 9:1; 11:1. Others regard this obscure person as Gobryas, governor of Media, who exercised authority for Cyrus in Babylon.

3. Gaumata, a usurper, held brief royal authority until put down by Darius 522-521 B.C.

4. Darius I (Hystaspis) 521-486 B.C., the great imperialist, whose sea-borne attack on Greece was defeated at Marathon in 490 B.C. He is known for his trilingual inscription at Behistun, famous in linguistic studies. This is the Darius mentioned by Ezra under whose protection permission was given for the temple to be built.

5. Xerxes I (Ahasuerus) 486-465 B.C. This is the mad king who in a mighty combined operation sought to avenge Marathon, and whom the Greeks defeated at Salamis (480 B.C.) and Plataea (479 B.C.). The feast and assembly of Esther 1:3 is plausibly equated with Herodotus 7:8, while Esther 2:16 is a reference to the events of Herodotus 9:108,109.

6. Artaxerxes I (Longimanus), 464-424 B.C. It was this monarch who permitted Ezra to go to Jerusalem to restore the affairs of the Jewish community (Ezra 7 and 8), and who promoted the mission of his cup-bearer Nehemiah, 13 years later. (In Ezra 4 chronology is broken and it is a matter of some difficulty to identify and arrange events. The IVF Commentary (in loco) deals with the matter well). Nehemiah 2:1; 5:14; 13:6. Note: Darius the Persian (Neh. 12:22) is Codomannus, last king of Persia, overthrown by Alexander in 330 B.C. E.M.B.

PERSIS (pûr'sĭs, Gr. Persís, Persian), a Christian woman at Rome greeted by Paul as "the beloved, who labored much in the Lord" (Rom. 16:12).

PERUDA (See Perida)

PESHITTA (pĕ-shēt'tà), or "simple" version, is the common name for the ancient Syriac (Aramaic) translation of the Bible. The OT was translated before the Christian era, no doubt by Jews who spoke Aramaic and lived in the countries E of Palestine. Syriac Christians rendered the NT during the early centuries of the Church, the standard version being that of Rabbula, bishop of Edessa in the fifth century. The Syriac Bible played an important role in the Christian missionary thrust into the countries of the Far East, including India.

PESTILENCE (pĕs'tĭlĕns, Heb. dever, Gr. loimós), a word frequently found in the OT to refer to any fatal epidemic often coming as the result of divine judgment (Exod. 5:3; Jer. 14:12). The word is used in the NT only by Christ (Matt. 24:7; Luke 21:11).

PESTLE (pĕs''l, Heb. 'ĕlî, lifted), an instrument made either of wood or stone, rounded at the ends and used to grind in a mortar (Prov. 27:22).

PETER (pētêr, Gr. Pétros, rock), the most prominent of the 12 apostles in the Gospels and an outstanding leader in the early days of the Christian Church. His original name was Simon, a common Greek name, or more properly Symeon (Acts 15: 14), a popular Hebrew name.

Background. He was a native of Bethsaida (John 1:44), the son of a certain John (John 1: 42 ASV; 21:15-17 ASV), apparently an abbreviation for Jonah (Matt. 16:17). As a Jewish lad he received a normal elementary education. As a native of "Galilee of the Gentiles" he was able to converse in Greek, while his native Aramaic was marked with provincialisms of pronunciation and diction (Matt. 26:73). The evaluation by the Sanhedrin of Peter and John as "unlearned and ignorant men" (Acts 4:13) simply meant that they were unschooled in the rabbinical lore and were laymen. With his brother Andrew he followed the hardy occupation of a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee, being partners with Zebedee's sons, James and John (Luke 5:7). He was a married man (Mark 1:30; I Cor. 9:5) and at the time of Christ's Galilean ministry lived in Capernaum (Mark 1: 21,29).

Gospel period. Of the second period of his life, from his first encounter with Jesus until the ascension, the Gospels give a vivid picture. Simon attended the preaching ministry of John the Baptist at the Jordan and, like Andrew, probably became a personal disciple of John. When he was personally introduced to Jesus by his brother Andrew, Jesus on seeing him with prophetic insight remarked, "Thou art Simon the son of Jona: thou shalt be called Cephas" (John 1:42). That John translated the Aramaic Kēphās into Greek Petros, both meaning rock, indicates that it was not a proper name but rather a descriptive title (cf. "sons of thunder," Mark 3:17). The designation, afterwards more fully explained in its prophetic import (Matt. 16:18; Mark 3:16), came to be regarded as his personal name. (No other man in the NT bears the name Peter). After a period of companionship with Jesus during His early Judean ministry (John 1:42-4:43), Peter resumed his ordinary employment.

With the commencement of Christ's Galilean ministry, Peter and Andrew, with James and John, were called by Jesus to full time association with Him to be trained as "fishers of men" (Mark 1:16-20; Luke 5:1-11). With the growth of the work, Jesus selected 12 of His followers to be His nearest companions for special training (Mark 3:13-19; Luke 6:12-16). In the lists of these 12 designated apostles (Luke 6:13), Peter is always named first (Mark 3:16-19; Luke 6:14-16; Matt. 10:2-4; Acts 1:13-14). His eminence among them was due to his being among the first chosen as well as his native aggressiveness as a natural leader. But the other disciples did not concede to Peter any authority over them, as is evident from their repeated arguments about greatness (Matt. 20:20-28; Mark 9:33-34; Luke 22:24-27). While He was with them, Jesus alone was recognized as their leader.

The development of an inner circle among the disciples is first seen when Jesus took Peter, James, and John with Him into the house of Jairus (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51). The three were further privileged to witness the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28) and the agony in the garden (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33). Even in this inner circle Peter usually stands in the foreground, but the Fourth Gospel indicates that his position of eminence was not exclusive.

Peter was the natural spokesman of the 12. When Christ's sermon on the Bread of Life produced a general defection among His followers, Peter spoke for the 12 in asserting their loyalty to Him (John 6:66-69). Again, at Caesarea Philippi, when Jesus asked the 12 their view of Him, Peter promptly replied, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16). His confession of the Messiahship and Deity of our Lord expressed a divinely-given insight higher than the current view which regarded the Messiah only as a man exalted to the Messianic office (cf. Matt. 22:41-46). His confession elicited Christ's prompt commendation and the further assertion, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:18). By his believing confession Peter has identified himself with Christ the true Rock (I Cor. 3:11; Isa. 28:16; I Pet. 2:4-5), thus fulfilling Christ's prediction concerning him (John 1:42). He has thus become a rock (petros), and upon "this rock" (petra), composed of Peter and the other apostles joined by faith to Christ the chief corner stone (Eph. 2:20), Jesus announces that He will build His triumphant church.

The story in Acts historically interprets Peter's use of the keys in opening the doors of Christian opportunity at Pentecost (chap. 2), in Samaria (chap. 8), and to the Gentiles (chap. 10). The power of binding and loosing was not limited to Peter (Matt. 18:18; John 20:23). But Peter was also the spokesman in attempting to dissuade Jesus from His announced path of suffering, thus proving himself a "stumbling-block" (Matt. 16:23; Mark 8:33).

Peter came into prominence in the Gospel story also in connection with the matter of the payment of the temple-tax (Matt. 17:24-27), his inquiry as to the limits on forgiveness (Matt. 18:21), and his reminder to Jesus that they had left all to follow Him (Matt. 19:27; Mark 10:28). During Passion Week his activities were prominent. He called Jesus' attention to the withered fig tree (Mark 11:21), and with three others he asked Jesus concerning His prediction about the temple (Mark 13:3). With John he was commissioned to prepare for the Passover (Luke 22:8), objected to the Lord's washing his feet in the Upper Room, but impulsively swung to the opposite extreme when informed of the implications of his denial (John 13:1-11), beckoned to John to ask the identity of the betrayer (John 13:23-24), and stoutly contradicted Jesus when warned of his impending denials (Matt. 26:33-35; Mark 14:29-31; Luke 22:31-34; John 13:37-38). In the garden, when chosen with James and John to watch with Jesus, he slept (Matt. 26:37-46; Mark 14:33-42). In fleshly zeal he sought to defend Jesus and received His rebuke (John 18:10-11). He fled with the other disciples when Jesus was bound, but anxious to see the end he followed afar, was admitted into the court of the high priest through John's action, and there shamefully denied his Lord in three rounds of denials (Matt. 26:58, 69-75; Mark 14:66-72; Luke 22:54-62; John 18:15-18, 25-27). The look of Jesus broke his heart and he went out and wept bitterly (Luke 22:61-62). That Peter witnessed the crucifixion is not stated (but cf. I Pet. 5:1).

On the resurrection morning he and John ran to the tomb of Jesus to investigate the report of Mary Magdalene (John 20:1-10). Somewhere during that day the risen Lord appeared to Peter (I Cor. 15:5). At His post-resurrection manifestation to seven at the Sea of Galilee, John was the first to recognize the Lord, but, typically, Peter was the first to act. Following the group breakfast, Christ tested Peter's love and formally restored him by the threefold commission to feed His sheep (John 21:1-23).

Early Church. The third period in Peter's life began with the ascension of Jesus. In the early days of the Church (Acts 1-12), Peter appeared as the spokesman of the apostolic group, but there is no hint that he assumed any authority not also exercised by the other apostles. He suggested the choice of another to fill the place of Judas (1:15-26), preached the Spirit-empowered sermon on Pentecost to the assembled Jews (2:14-40), and with John healed the lame man, the first apostolic miracle to arouse persecution (3:1-4:21). He was used to expose the sin of Ananias and Sapphira (5:1-12), was held in high esteem by the people during the miracle ministry in the church that followed (5:12-16), and spoke for the 12 when arraigned before the Sanhedrin (5:27-41). With John he was sent to Samaria where, through the laying on of hands, the Holy Spirit fell on the Samaritan believers and Peter exposed the unworthy motives of Simon (8:14-24). While on a tour through Judea Peter healed Aeneas and raised Dorcas from the dead (9:32-43). Through a divinely-given vision at Joppa Peter was prepared and commissioned to preach the Gospel to Cornelius at Caesarea, thus opening the door to the Gentiles (10:1-48). This brought upon him the criticism of the circumcision party in Jerusalem (11:1-18). During the persecution of the Church by Agrippa I in A.D. 44, Peter escaped death by a miraculous deliverance from prison (12:1-19).

Later life. With the opening of the door to the Gentiles and the spread of Christianity, Peter receded into the background and Paul became prominent as the apostle to the Gentiles. In the Acts narrative Peter is last mentioned in connection with the Jerusalem conference, where he championed the liberty of the Gentiles (15:6-29). The remaining NT references to Peter are scanty. Galatians 2:11-21 records a visit to Syrian Antioch where his inconsistent conduct evoked a public rebuke from Paul. From I Corinthians 9:5 it appears that Peter traveled widely, taking his wife with him, doubtless in Jewish evangelism (Gal. 2:9).

Nothing further is heard of Peter until the writing of the two epistles that bear his name, apparently written from Rome. In the first epistle, addressed to believers in five provinces in Asia Minor, the shepherd-heart of Peter sought to fortify the saints in their sufferings for Christ, while in the second he warns against dangers from within. A final NT reference to the closing years of Peter's life is found in John 21:18-19. John's interpretation of Christ's prediction makes it clear that the reference is to Peter's violent death. Beyond this the NT is silent about him.

Tradition uniformly asserts that Peter went to Rome, that he labored there, and there in his old age suffered martyrdom under Nero. The embellished tradition that he was bishop of Rome for 25 years is contrary to all NT evidence. He apparently came to Rome shortly after Paul's release from his first imprisonment there.

Character. The character of Peter is one of the most vividly drawn and charming in the NT. His sheer humanness has made him one of the most beloved and winsome members of the apostolic band. He was eager, impulsive, energetic, self-confident, aggressive, and daring, but also unstable, fickle, weak, and cowardly. He was guided more by quick impulse than logical reasoning, and readily swayed from one extreme to the other. He was preeminently a man of action. His story exhibits the defects of his qualities as well as the tremendous capacities for good which he possessed. He was naturally forward and often rash, liable to instability and inconsistency, but his love for and associations with Christ moulded him into a man of stability, humility, and courageous service for God, becoming one of the noble pillars (Gal. 2:9) of the Church. D.E.H.

PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF, the keynote of the First Epistle of Peter is suffering, and the Christian method of meeting it. The writer endeavored to convey a message of hope to Christians who had been undergoing persecution, and who were succumbing to discouragement because they could find no redress. It contains a hortatory presentation of Christian truth, calculated to strengthen believers.

Authorship. Of the two epistles that bear the name of Peter, the first is better attested. Echoes of its phraseology appear as early as the epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians (c. 125), the Epistle of Barnabas (c. 135) and the writings of Justin Martyr (c. 150). The Second Epistle of Peter refers to a former epistle which probably means this one (II Pet. 3:1). It was unanimously accepted as Petrine by all of the fathers who mention it by name, beginning with Irenaeus (c. 170).

The internal structure reflects Peter's mind and life. The first main paragraph, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath begotten us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead (1:3) expresses the joy which Peter felt after the forgiveness bestowed on him by the risen Christ after the denial. The injunction to "feed (shepherd) the flock of God" (5:2) is almost identical in language with Jesus' commisson to him at the lake of Galilee (John 21:16). "Gird yourselves with humility" may be a reminiscence of the last supper, when Jesus girded Himself with a towel and washed the disciples' feet(John 13:4,5).

There are also some remarkable agreements between the vocabulary of I Peter and the speeches of Peter in Acts (I Pet. 1:17; Acts 10:34; I Pet. 1:21; Acts 2:32; 10:40,41; the quotation I Pet. 2:7, 8 with Acts 4:10,11).

Destination. The epistle was directed to members of the Dispersion located in the northern Roman provinces of Asia Minor which Paul did not visit, and which may have been evangelized by Peter between the Council of Jerusalem (A.D. 48) and the Neroian persecution at Rome (A.D. 64). There is some question whether the "Dispersion" should be taken literally as applying strictly to Jews, or whether it may be used figuratively of Gentiles, Christians who were scattered abroad. In favor of the former conclusion are one or two passages which seemingly indicate that the recipients were Jews (2:12; 3:6); on the other hand, "Gentiles" may be equivalent to "brethren," and the references to the ungodly past of these people (1:14; 4:3) do not seem to agree with the hypotheses that they were of Jewish descent. If Peter wrote this epistle from Rome, he may have been writing to refugees from the Neronian persecution who were converts from Judaism or proselytes who turned from Judaism to Christianity.

Date and Place. If the Silvanus (5:12) and Mark (5:13) were the same persons mentioned in Paul's epistles (I Thess. 1:1; II Cor. 1:19; Col. 4:10; II Tim. 4:11), I Peter must have been written subsequent to Silvanus' departure from Paul and prior to Mark's rejoining him. Silvanus was with Paul in Corinth in the early fifties, and Mark probably rejoined him just before his death, which took place about A.D. 65-67. Furthermore, I Peter bears traces of the influence of Paul's Epistle to the Romans and to the Ephesians in its structure and thought (cf. I Pet. 2:13; Rom. 13:1-4; I Pet. 2:18; Eph. 6:5; I Pet. 3:9; Rom. 12:17; I Pet. 5:5; Eph. 5:21) which would imply that it was written after A.D. 60. Probably I Peter was written about the year 64, when the status of Christians in the empire was very uncertain, and when persecution had already begun in Rome.

The place of writing is closely connected with the date. "Babylon" (5:13) may refer to the ancient city on the Euphrates, where there was a large Jewish settlement in Peter's day, or to a town in Egypt near Alexandria, where Mark traditionally ministered, or figuratively to Rome as the center of the pagan world (Rev. 17:5; 18:10). The second alternative need not be considered seriously, for the Egyptian Babylon was only a border fort. Opinion among commentators is divided between the other two opinions. In the absence of any strong tradition that Peter ever visited in the literal Babylon, it seems more likely that he wrote this epistle from Rome, shortly before his martyrdom. He would have had opportunity to find some of Paul's writings there and to have met Silvanus and Mark, both of whom were familiar to Paul.

Those who deny the Petrine authorship place the epistle in the early second century under the reign of Trajan (A.D. 96-117). Sir William Ramsay assigned it to the time of Domitian (A.D. 87-96), conceding that Peter might have been executed in the time of Vespasian or Domitian (c. A.D. 80).

Structure and Content. In general arrangement I Peter resembles closely the Pauline epistles, with a salutation, body, and conclusion. Its main subject is the Christian's behavior under the pressure of suffering, its key is the salvation which is to be revealed at the last time (1:5). The epistle may be outlined as follows:

I. Introduction, 1:1,2
II. The Nature of Salvation, 1:3-12
III. The Experience of Salvation, 1:13-25
IV. The Obligations of Salvation, 2:1-10
V. The Ethics of Salvation, 2:11-3:12
VI. The Confidence of Salvation, 3:13-4:11
VII. The Behavior of the Saved under Suffering, 4:12-5:11
VIII. Concluding Salutations, 5:12-14

PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF, is a general treatise, written to warn its readers of threatening apostasy. It purports to be written by Simon Peter and contains a definite allusion to a preceding letter (3:1).

Authorship. II Peter has the poorest external attestation of any book in the canon of the NT. It is not quoted directly by any of the fathers before Origen (c. 250), who affirms the Petrine authorship of the first epistle, but who seemed uncertain about the second, although he did not repudiate it. Eusebius, to whom we are indebted for quoting Origen's testimony, placed II Peter in the list of disputed writers. Its literary style and vocabulary differs from that of I Peter, and its close resemblance to the book of Jude has led some scholars to believe that it is a late copy or adaptation of that work. Numerous scholars have pronounced it spurious, and have relegated it to the middle of the second century.

On the other hand, the internal evidence favors Petrine authorship. It seems strange that if a forger knew First Peter, he could not have been more careful to copy its style exactly. The allusions to Peter's career agree with the existing records, and can best be explained as the testimony of an eye witness. They include the Transfiguration (1:17, 18), at which Peter was present (Matt. 17:1-8), and the Lord's prediction of his death (1:14; John 21:18,19). The Greek of the second epistle is more labored than that of the first, but if Peter did not have the aid of Silvanus in this work, as he did in the first epistle (I Pet. 5:12), he may have been forced to rely on his own writing. Doubtlessly he knew Greek, as most Galileans did, but he may not have been able to write it easily. II Peter reads more like a book which has been composed with the aid of a dictionary rather than by a man whose native tongue was Greek.

The allusion to the writings of "our beloved brother Paul" (3:15) confirms the impression that II Peter was written by someone who knew Paul personally and who treated him as an equal. A writer of the second century would have been more likely to say "the blessed apostle," for he would have regarded Paul with a greater veneration, and would thus have used a more elevated title.

There is, therefore, some reason for accepting the Epistle as Peter's. The relative silence of the early Church may be explained by the brevity of the epistle, which could have made it more susceptible to being overlooked or lost.

Date and Place. II Peter must have been written subsequent to the publication of at least some of Paul's letters, if not of the entire collection. It cannot, therefore, have been written before A.D. 60; but if Paul were living, or were still well known to the existing generation, it could not have been later than 70. Probably A.D. 67 is as satisfactory a date as can be established. The writer was anticipating speedy death (1:14), which may mean that the epistle was sent from Rome during the tense days of the Neronian persecution. There is no indication, however, that Peter had spent a long time in Rome. He may have labored there only at the conclusion of Paul's life between 63 and 67.

Destination and Occasion. The reference to a previous letter sent to the same group (3:1) connects this document with I Peter, which was written to the Christians of northern Asia Minor. Whereas the first epistle was an attempt to encourage a church threatened with official persecution and repression, the second epistle dealt with the peril of apostasy, which was even a greater threat. An influx of conscienceless agitators who repudiated the lordship of Christ (2:1) and whose attitude was haughty (2:10), licentious (2:13), adulterous (2:14), greedy (2:14), bombastic (2:18), and libertine (2:19) seemed imminent. Knowing that he would not be spared to keep control of the situation, Peter was writing to forestall this calamity and to warn the church of its danger.

Content and Outline. The key to this epistle is the word "know" or "knowledge," which occurs 16 times in the three chapters, six of which refer to the knowledge of Christ. This knowledge is not primarily academic, but is spiritual, arising from a growing experience of Christ (3:18). It produces peace and grace (1:2), fruitfulness (1:8), is the secret of freedom from defilement (2:20) and is the sphere of Christian growth (3:18). It may be that the false teachers were Gnostics, who stressed knowledge as the means of salvation, and that Peter sought to counteract their falsehoods by a positive presentation of true knowledge.

II Peter teaches definitely the inspiration of Scripture (1:19-21) and stresses the doctrine of the personal return of Christ, which was ridiculed by the false teachers (3:1-7). It concludes with an appeal for holy living, and with the promise of the new heavens and the new earth.

The following is a brief outline of the Epistle:

I. Salutation, 1:1
II. The Character of Spiritual Knowledge, 1:2-21
III. The Nature and Perils of Apostasy, 2:1-22
IV. The Doom of the Ungodly, 3:1-7
V. The Hope of Believers, 3:8-13
VI. Concluding Exhortation, 3:14-18. M.C.T.

PETHAHIAH (pĕth'ȧ-hī'ȧ, Heb. pethahyâh, Jehovah opens up). 1. The head priest of the 19th course of priests during David's reign (I Chron. 24:16).

2. A disobedient Levite who, in the time of Ezra, had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:23). Most scholars identify him with the one mentioned in Nehemiah 9:5.

3. Meshezabeel's son who descended from Zerah from the tribe of Judah. He was the counselor for King Artaxerxes ". . . in all matters pertaining to the people" (Neh. 11:24).

PETHOR (pē'thôr, pethôr), mentioned twice in connection with the hireling prophet Balaam (Num. 22:5; Deut. 23:4). Both passages place Pethor in Mesopotamia on the Euphrates. There is a reference in an Assyrian inscription of Shalmaneser II to a place called Pitru on the Sagur near its confluence with the Euphrates. It cannot be proved that Pitru is Pethor, but if such a reasonable inference is true, Pethor would appear to lie just W of Carchemish on the W bank of the Euphrates.

PETHUEL (pē-thū'ĕl, Heb. pethû'ēl, God's opening), the prophet Joel's father (Joel 1:1).

PETRA (pē'trȧ), translates sela', meaning rock, cliff, or crag, and, as a proper noun, seems to refer to one or two places in the OT (Judg. 1:36; II Kings 14:7; Isa. 16:1). No certain geographical identification is possible, although the second reference may be to the Petra of later history, the "rose-red city half as old as time," of Dean Burgon's sonnet, and capital city of the Nabataeans from the close of the fourth century before Christ until A.D. 105, when it became part of the Roman Empire. The town lies in a basin surrounded by mountains. The town's considerable ruins are not impressive, in spite of Burgon's oft-quoted eulogy; the main curiosities of Petra being the narrow canyons which form its approaches, and the rock-hewn temples and tombs in the surrounding cliffs. Nothing is known of Petra's history before the Nabataeans took over in 312 B.C. E.M.B.

PEULETHAI, PEULTHAI (pē-ŭl'ē-thī, pē-ŭl'thī, Jehovah is a reward), a Levite who was Obed-edom's eighth son. He was a porter of the tabernacle in the time of David (I Chron. 26:5).

PHALEC (fā'lĕk, Gr. Phalék), a Greek form of the Hebrew Peleg (Luke 3:35).

PHALLU (See Pallu)

PHALTI (făl'tī, Heb. paltî, delivered). 1. The spy from Benjamin's tribe sent by Moses to search out Canaan (Num. 13:9).

2. Saul's son-in-law, called also "Phalti" (II Sam. married after Michal's husband, David, had been driven away (I Sam. 25:44). He is called "Phaltiel" in II Samuel 3:15,16.

PHALTIEL (făl'tī-ĕl, Heb. paltî'ēl, God delivers). 1. A prince of Issachar (Num. 34:26).

2. Saul's son-in-law called also "Phalti" (II Sam. 3:15).

PHANUEL (fà-nū'ĕl, Heb. penû'ēl, face of God, Gr. phanouél), the father of Anna the prophetess (Luke 2:36).

PHARAOH (fâr'ō, Heb. par'ōh). The government of Egypt, and ultimately the supreme monarch in whom all its powers were vested, was known as the "Great House," in Egyptian "Per-o," whence descends the term pharaoh. The recorded pharaohs of Egypt, 26 separate dynasties, extend from Menes, 3400 B.C. to Psamtik III, deposed at the Persian conquest in 525 B.C. The term pharaoh can be traced back to the Twenty-Second Dynasty (945-745 B.C.), since when it was commonly attached to the monarch's name. Thus "Pharaoh Necho," and "Pharaoh Hophra" are exact Hebrew renderings of the Egyptian title.

Pharaohs of Egypt are mentioned in the following OT contexts: 1. Genesis 12:10-20. The date of Abram's descent into Egypt must be in the early years of the second millennium B.C. Amenemhet I, according to Breasted's dating, was pharaoh from 2000-1970 B.C. There is no strong evidence that northern Egypt was already under the power of the Hyksos intruders at this time, plausible though it may seem to connect the patriarch's sojourn with the presence of racially related rulers. On the tomb of Khnumhotep at Beni Hassan, dating from the 20th century B.C., the visit of such a Semitic party is vividly portrayed.

2. Genesis 39 to 50 passim. It is reasonable to place the period of Joseph's (and Israel's) favor in Egypt in the times of the Hyksos invaders. These foreigners, which included Canaanitish and Semitic elements from Palestine, supplanted the weak rulers of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Dynasties, and settled in the Delta and Lower Egypt, where they maintained their power for some two centuries. They were driven out in 1580 B.C.

3. Exodus 1 to 15 passim. Controversy surrounds the identity of the pharaoh of the Oppression, and the date of the Hebrew Exodus. One, to some extent, depends upon the other. John Garstang's excavations at Jericho in the early 1930's seemed to establish a date for the Hebrew storming of the city round the turn of the 14th century. This would postulate a date for the Exodus around 1440 B.C., and would identify Thutmose III as the Pharaoh of Oppression, and the famous princess Hatshepsut as Moses' protectress. The theory produces a neat pattern of dates, and the events of the Oppression through to the infiltration of the tribes into Palestine correspond very well with events of Egyptian history during the years 1580 to 1350 B.C., the period of the great Eighteenth Dynasty. Ahmose I would thus be the "pharaoh who knew not Joseph." Indeed, as the first native ruler after the expulsion of the hated Hyksos, he would be naturally hostile to the shepherd protégés of the old regime. The breakdown of Egyptian control in Palestine under Amenhotep IV (Ikhnaton), would also account for the comparative facility of the Hebrew conquest, and explain the "Habiru" references of the Tell-el-Amarna Letters.

Competent orthodox scholarship, however, not without backing from more recent work at Jericho, still argues for the older dating, under which Seti I (1313-1292 B.C.) is regarded as the pharaoh of Exodus 1:8. Ramses II (1292-1225 B.C.), in whose reign the store-cities of Pitham and Ra'amses were completed, would thus fill the rôle of Pharaoh of the Oppression, and perhaps the Exodus (Exod. 1:11; 12:40). Ra'amses was the fort from which the great militarist Ramses II sought to control his Asiatic empire, and the war-base from which he marched to his great battle with the Hittites at Kadesh on the Orontes, the conflict depicted on the walls of the Ramesseum at Thebes. Those who thus identify the Pharaoh of the Oppression, point out that the Egyptian hold over Palestine slackened after Ramses' treaty with the Hittites, and that this weakening of policy allowed the fragmentation of the country from which the Hebrew incursion profited. Some more precisely date the Exodus in the reign of Ramses' son, Merneptah, mainly on the strength of the "Israel Stele," discovered by Flinders Petrie in 1896. This inscription, self dated in 'the third year of Merneptah' (1223 B.C.), tells of the pharaoh's victories in Canaan. One line runs: "Israel is devastated. Her seed is not" (or "Her crops are destroyed"). A natural reference from this statement might, however, be that Israel was already in settled possession of large tracts of Palestine. At this point the matter must, at the moment, be left.

4. I Chronicles 4:18 speaks of "the sons of Bithiah the daughter of the pharaoh, whom Mered married." No identification of this pharaoh is possible, and the name of the princess appears to be Hebraized.

5. I Kings 3:1; 9:16,24; 11:1. Solomon's reign may be reliably dated 961 to 922 B.C., which period corresponds with the reign of Pharaoh Sheshonk I (945 to 924 B.C.), the founders of the Twenty-Second Dynasty. Under this pharaoh Egypt's foreign policy again took on an aggressive character, and at all such times it was Egypt's custom (not without illustration in recent events) to establish the safety of the northern approaches, virtually her only invasion route. Hence the policy of Thutmose III, Ramses II, Seti I, and Sheshonk. The dynastic alliance with Solomon, and the handing to his suzerainty of the city of Gezer, were part of the recurrent Egyptian plan to create a "glacis" or a defensive buffer in Palestine. The ruler who acted with such foresight and energy can hardly have been one of the feeble monarchs of the earlier dynasty. A further facet of the same policy is revealed by Pharaoh's befriending of Hadad of Edom (I Kings 11:14-22). Hadad was a useful weapon for possible employment against a recalcitrant Solomon, or against a hostile Palestine.

6. II Kings 18:21 and Isaiah 36:6 both mention the pharaoh of Sennacherib's day. He is "that broken reed of a staff, which will pierce the hand of any man who leans on it," says the Rabshakeh to the people of Jerusalem. The date is 701 B.C. Egypt was in the state of political disintegration and weakness pictured in Isaiah 19. Shabaka was pharaoh, the first monarch of the feeble Twenty-Fifth Dynasty. The army scraped together to face the Assyrian threat was a motley horde of mercenaries and ill-armed levies. Egyptian contingents had served in the past against Assyria, but this was the first time the two empires, that of the Tigris and that of the Nile, actually confronted each other. Sennacherib led in person. Shabaka entrusted his force to his nephew Taharka who, some 13 or 14 years later, became king of Ethiopia. Hence the title given in II Kings 19:9 by anticipation of events. The Assyrian rapidly dealt with Taharka's force, and was proceeding to overthrow Palestine and the strong pocket of resistance which he had left screened by a task-force in Jerusalem, when the famous plague which decimated his host fell upon him. This overwhelming catastrophe was the cause of the Assyrian retreat, and deliverance both for Palestine and Egypt.

7. II Kings 23:20-35. Pharaoh-Necho was the last of the pharaohs to endeavor to re-establish Egyptian authority in the northern approaches. He succeeded Psametik I, founder of the Twenty-Sixth Dynasty, in 609 B.C., and reigned until 593 B.C. Immediately upon his accession, taking advantage of the collapse of Nineveh, Necho drove N into Philistia. On the plain of Megiddo, where Egypt had won control of the land 900 years before, Necho routed and killed Josiah. He moved on to the Euphrates, unopposed by Nineveh, but not feeling strong enough to go against that stronghold. From Ribleh on the Orontes, three months after the battle at Megiddo, Necho deposed Jehoahaz, and sent him to die in Egypt. He placed Jehoiakim on the throne of Judah, and fixed a tribute for the conquered land. Two years later Necho's new empire fell before the attack of Babylon. Jeremiah refers to the event (37:7; 46:2).

8. Ezekiel 29:1. The date is 587 B.C., and the pharaoh referred to must therefore be Hophra, or Apries, in the first year of his rule. He reigned from 588 to 569 B.C. This was the pharaoh whose troops failed to relieve Jerusalem in 586 B.C., and whose weak action against Nebuchadnezzar's Babylon brilliantly vindicated the advice of Jeremiah. Egypt escaped the calamity which befell Palestine by prudent modification of her challenge. Preoccupied with Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar did not press the war against Egypt, and Apries brought his country its last flourish of prosperity before the land fell before the Persian conquest. See EGYPT.

PHARES, PHAREZ (fā'rēz, Gr. Pharés, breach), Judah's twin son by his daughter-in-law, Tamar (Gen. 38:29; I Chron. 2:4). He had a large number of descendants (Ruth 4:12) who continued to play a prominent role right up until the captivity (I Chron. 27:3; Neh. 11:4,6). In a number of these passages he is called "Perez."

PHARISEES (fâr'ĭ-sēz, Heb. perûshûn, Gr. Pharisaíoi). Of the three prominent societies of Judaism at the time of Christ — Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes — the Pharisees were by far the most influential. The origin of this most strict sect of the Jews (Acts 26:5) is shrouded in some obscurity, but it is believed the organization came out of the Maccabean Revolt (165 B.C.). There was, however, a group of Jews resembling the Pharisees as far back as the Babylonian Captivity.

The name "Pharisee," which in its Semitic form means "the separated ones, separatists," first appears during the reign of John Hyrcanus (135 B.C.). Generally, the term is in the plural rather than in the singular. They were also known as chasidim, meaning "loved of God" or "loyal to God." They were found everywhere in Palestine, not only in Jerusalem, and even wore a distinguishing garb so as to be easily recognized. According to Josephus, their number at their zenith of popularity was more than 6,000. Because of the significant role the Pharisees played in the life of the Lord and the Apostles, knowledge of the character and teachings of this group is of great importance for the understanding of the NT. They are mentioned dozens of times, especially in the Gospels, and often form the foil and fabric of the works and words of Jesus.

Three facets or characteristics of the Jewish nation contributed to the development of the Pharisees, or paradoxically, it may be said that the Pharisees made these contributions to Judaism, so that ultimately Pharisaism and Judaism became almost synonymous. The first of these is Jewish legalism, which began in earnest after the Babylonian Captivity. The temple worship and the sacrifices had ceased and Judaism began to center its activities in the Jewish Law and in the synagogue. The Pharisees studied the traditional exegesis of the Law and made it a part of Jewish thought. The rise of the Jewish Scribes, who were closely associated with the Pharisees, also gave great impetus to Jewish legalism. The Pharisees, who were more of a fraternal order or religious society than a sect, were the organized followers of these experts in interpreting the Scriptures; they formalized the religion of the Scribes and placed it into practice. This is why the Scribes and Pharisees are often mentioned together in the NT. The Pharisees were not the practical politicians like the more liberal Sadducees, but were the religious leaders of the Jews. The highest qualification for membership was strict adherence to the Law, oral or written. Josephus, a contemporary Jewish historian, aptly describes them as "a body of Jews who profess to be more religious than the rest, and to explain the laws more precisely." A modern authority on Judaism, C. F. Moore, says, "the Pharisees were a party whose endeavor it was to live in strict accordance with the Law thus interpreted and amplified by the study and exposition of the Scribes, and the tradition of interpretation which they had established, and to bring the people to a similar conformity." (Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era, p. 66). This familiar characteristic of the Pharisees is well exemplified in the NT concerning the sabbath (cf. John 9:16).

A concomitant and blood brother of Jewish legalism was Jewish nationalism. Continued persecution and isolation crystallized this narrow spirit. During the Captivity the Jews were a small minority in a strange nation. The fierce persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.), who made a bold attempt to Hellenize and assimilate the Jews, only drew the Jewish people closer together. The Pharisees took the occasion to cultivate a national and religious consciousness which has hardly been equaled.

A third contributing factor to Pharisaism was the development and organization of the Jewish religion itself after the Captivity and the Revolt. Formulation and adaptation of Mosaic law by Scribe and rabbi, increased tradition, and a more rabid separatism from almost everything resulted in almost a new religion much the opposite from that handed down in the Covenant by the prophets. Pharisaism epitomized this spirit. Especially did they vehemently oppose all secularization of Judaism by the pagan Greek thought which penetrated Jewish life after the Alexandrian conquest. They ferreted out and sought the death of any liberal or antinomian person, especially if he were a fellow Jew. The Jewish ability to die for their "religion" made the people all the more proud of their traditions and law. This pride even developed into a feeling of superiority over other nations and people. The extreme separatism from the Samaritans, for example (John 4:9), which went far beyond inter-marriage and social intercourse, came from a superior feeling as well as religious emotion and found its most extreme expression among the Pharisees. They became a closely organized group, very loyal to the society and to each other, but separate from others, even their own people. They pledged themselves to obey all facets of the traditions to the minutest detail and were sticklers for ceremonial purity. They even vowed to pay tithes of everything they possessed in addition to the temple tax. They would not touch the carcass of a dead animal or those who had come into contact with such things. They had no association with people who had been defiled through sickness. In truth, they made life difficult for themselves and bitter for others. They despised those whom they did not consider their equals and were haughty and arrogant because they believed they were the only interpreters of God and His Word. It is only natural that ultimately such a religion became only a matter of externals and not of the heart, and that God's grace was thought to come only from doing the Law.

The doctrines of the Pharisees included predestination, or, as some have termed it, a teaching of special divine providence. They also laid much stress on the immortality of the soul and had a fundamental belief in spirit life, teachings which usually caused much controversy when they met the Sadducees who just as emphatically denied them (Acts 23:6-9). Being people of the Law they believed in final reward for good works and that the souls of the wicked were detained forever under the earth, while those of the virtuous rose again and even migrated into other bodies (Josephus, Antiq. 18:1,3; Acts 23:8). They accepted the OT Scriptures and fostered the usual Jewish Messianic hope which they gave a material and nationalistic twist.

It was inevitable, in view of these factors, that they bitterly opposed Jesus and His teachings. If they despised the Herods and the Romans, they hated Jesus' doctrine of equality and claims of messiahship with equal fervor (John 9:16,22).

He in turn condemned both their theology and life of legalism. They often became a fertile background against which He taught God's free salvation by grace through His own death and resurrection. Clashes between Jesus and the Pharisees were frequent and bitter, as examples in the Gospels reveal: He calls them a generation of vipers and condemns them for impenitence (Matt. 3:7); condemns their work-righteousness (Matt. 5:20); upbraids their pride against others (Matt. 9:12; Luke 19:10); scorns their lovelessness on the sabbath (Matt. 12:2); rebukes them for not being baptized (Luke 7:30); teaches them regarding divorce (Matt. 19:3) and taxes (Mark 12:17); condemns them for their covetousness (Luke 16:14). The Pharisees, in turn, accused Jesus of blasphemy (Luke 5:21); of being in league with the devil (Matt. 9:34); of breaking the Law (Matt. 12:2); and often planned to destroy Him (Matt. 12:14). Jesus' longest and most scathing rebuke of the Pharisees is found in Matthew 23. Sample: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones. and of all uncleanness" (Matt. 23:27).

The picture of the Pharisees painted by the NT is almost entirely black, but the discriminating Bible student should bear in mind that not everything about every Pharisee was bad. It is perhaps not just to say all Pharisees were self-righteous and hypocritical. Many Pharisees actually tried to promote true piety. What we know as Pharisaism from the NT was to some degree a degeneration of Pharisaism. Jesus condemned especially their ostentation, their hypocrisy, their salvation by works, their impenitence and lovelessness, not always Pharisees as such. Some of the Pharisees were members of the Christian movement in the beginning (Acts 6:7). Some of the great men of the NT were Pharisees — Nicodemus (John 3:1), Gamaliel (Acts 5:34), and Paul (Acts 26:5; Phil. 3:5). Paul does not speak the name "Pharisee" with great reproach but as a title of honor, for the Pharisees were highly respected by the masses of the Jewish people. When Paul says he was "in the matter of the Law, a 'Pharisee,'" (Phil. 3:5), he did not think of himself as a hypocrite but claims the highest degree of faithfulness to the Law. In similar manner, church leaders today might say, "We are the Pharisees." Much of modern scholarship, however, has cast the Pharisees into too favorable a light; when one reads our Lord's heated denunciation of Pharisaism in Matthew, chapter 23, where He specifically lists their sins, one has not only a true but a dark picture of Pharisaism as it was at the time of Christ. PHAROSH (See Parosh)

PHARPAR (fär'pär, Heb. parpar). The scornful Naaman contrasted the silt-laden waters of the Jordan with "Abanah and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus" (II Kings 5:12). Abanah is identified with the Barada. Pharpar is possibly the Awaj, a stream which rises E of Hermon, and one of whose sources is the Wadi Barbar. Naaman's remark does not necessarily mean that the river is close to Damascus.

PHARZITE (fär'zīt, Heb. perets), a descendant of Pharez, son of Judah (Num. 26:20).

PHASEAH (See Paseah)

PHASELIS (fà-sē'lĭs, Gr. Pháselis), a Rhodian colony in Lycia dating from the seventh century B.C. It is mentioned in I Maccabees 15:23 as the recipient of a letter from the Romans on behalf of the Jews. The port was important as a stage on the great east-west trade-route between the Aegean and the East. Phaselis abetted the pirate fleets of the Cilician Zenicetes, and was captured and punished by the loss of its territory by Servilius Isauricus in 77 B.C.

PHASELUS (fà-sēl'ŭs), a Latinization of Phasael, alternatively Phasaelus, the son of Antipater the Idumaean, and brother of Herod I. He succeeded with his brother to the viziership of Hyrcanus II on Antipater's death, but lacking Herod's acumen was tricked by the Parthians, in their invasion of Palestine, and committed suicide in captivity in 40 B.C. Herod named one of the towers of his Jerusalem palace after him. The base survives under the so-called "tower of David" in modern Jerusalem.

PHEBE (See Phoebe)

PHENICE, PHOENIX (fē-nī'sē, fē'nīks, Gr. Phoiníke), a town and harbor on the S coast of Crete (Acts 27:12). It has been identified with Loutro, the only harbor W of Fair Havens large enough to accommodate a galley as large as the vessel in the story. Some difficulty in this identification arises from the fact that Luke speaks of the harbor as "looking towards the south-west and north-west." Loutro faces E and the ERV resolves the difficulty by taking the text to mean "in the direction in which the south-west and north-west winds blow." There is no proof for this assumption. EGT lists and documents the authorities (vol. II, pp. 521, 522). (Note: Phenice is also used as a term for Phoenicia.)

PHICHOL (fī'kŏl, Heb. pîkhōl), the army captain belonging to Abimelech, who was the Philistine king of Gerah (Gen. 21:22,32; 26:26).

PHILADELPHIA (fĭl'à-dĕl'fĭ-à, Gr. Philadelphía, brotherly love), a Lydian city founded by Attalus II Philadelphus (159-138 B.C.). The king was so named from his devotion to his brother Eumenes, and the city perpetuated his title. Philadelphia was an outpost of Hellenism in native Anatolia. It lies under Mount Tmolus, in a wide vale which opens into the Hermus Valley, and along which the post-road ran. It is on a broad, low, easily defended hill, which explains Philadelphia's long stand against the Turks. The district is disastrously seismic, and the great earthquake of A.D. 17 ruined it completely. Placed right above the fault, Philadelphia was tormented by 20 years of recurrent quakes after the disaster of 17. Hence, says Ramsay, is derived the imagery of Revelation 3:12 ("a pillar," "go no more out," "a new name"). The "new name" is certainly a reference to the proposal to rename the city Neocaesarea in gratitude for Tiberius' generous earthquake relief. The district was vine-growing, and a center, in consequence, of Dionysiac worship. A Christian witness, in spite of Moslem invasion and pressure, was maintained in Philadelphia through medieval and into modern times. E.M.B.

PHILEMON (fī-lē'mŏn, Gr. Philémon, loving). Paul's epistle to Philemon dates, in all probability, from the period of his Roman imprisonment. Pauline authorship is not seriously disputed. It is addressed to "Philemon . . . Apphia . . . Archippus, and the church in your house." Apphia would be Philemon's wife, and Archippus, not improbably, his son. Archippus would appear to have been a person of some standing, but perhaps not notable for stability of character (Col. 4:17). It is to be noted that the Christian community was organized around a home, a practice of the early church. Many ancient churches were no doubt founded on the sites of homes where early Christians met. There is no evidence of church-building of any sort before the third century. The fourth century Christian chapel, recently discovered in the Roman villa of Lullingstone, Kent, England, is an illustration of the earlier practice. Justin Martyr provides similar evidence.

The occasion of the letter was the return of the runaway slave Onesimus to his master. There is a celebrated letter of the Roman writer, Pliny, on a similar subject, written perhaps 40 years later (Plin. Ep. 9.21). It is interesting to compare Pliny's language of humane generosity with Paul's language of brotherly affection. Pliny puts the plea for forgiveness on humanitarian and philosophical grounds; Paul founds all he has to say on Christian fellowship. He writes with exquisite tact and with words of praise before referring to obligation. The word "brother" comes like a friendly handclasp at the end of vs. 7; "for my son Onesimus," with curiously poignant appeal at the end of vs. 10. He is "Paul the ambassador" (the translation "aged" is certainly incorrect), and as such might speak of duty. An imperial legate had a right to speak for the emperor, and the analogy would not be lost on Philemon. Paul reminds Philemon that, in respect of bondage, his own position did not vary from that of the man for whom he pleaded. Onesimus was a fellow-bondsman and son. The Talmud said: "If one teaches the son of his neighbour the Law, this is the same as if he had begotten him." Paul has the rabbinical saying in mind. "Onesimus" means "useful," and the writer puns on the word in vs. 11, and proceeds immediately to point to the sacrifice he himself was making. Onesimus was "briefly parted" from Philemon, says Paul, and he proceeds strongly to hint that manumission might be the truest mark of brotherliness. With a closing touch of humor Paul gives Philemon his note of hand for aught the runaway owes, discounting, as he returns to seriousness, Philemon's own deep debt.

"Yes," Paul concludes, "I would have profit of you." He puns once more on Onesimus' name (onaimen is the verb). The remark is a further plea for Onesimus' freedom. The approach is characteristic of early Christianity. Slavery is never directly attacked as such, but principles are steadily inculcated which must prove fatal to the institution. To speak of brotherly love between master and slave ultimately renders slavery meaningless.

The letter ends on notes of intimacy. There was something truly Greek about Paul. The great Greek orators seldom placed the climax of their speech in the closing words. The oration closed on a minor note, designed to bring the excited audience back to normality and rest, and so it does here.

PHILETUS (fĭ'lē'tŭs, Gr. Philetos, worthy of love). Like several other men named in the Scriptures — Judas, Alexander, Demas, Hymenaeus — Philetus is remembered only for the evil he did. St. Paul alone mentions him as a false teacher in the church of Ephesus, who together with Hymenaeus, held that "the resurrection is past already" (II Tim. 2: 17), that is, he did not radically deny a doctrine of the resurrection but allegorized it into a spiritual awakening or conversion and not a bodily resurrection as St. Paul taught in I Corinthians 15.

PHILIP (See Herod)

PHILIP THE APOSTLE (fĭl'ĭp, Gr. Philippos, lover of horses). In the lists of the apostles (cf. Matt. 10:3) the fifth in the list is called simply Philip, but the church has always called him "the Apostle" to distinguish him from Philip the Evangelist or Philip the Deacon (Acts 6:8). His home town was Bethsaida of Galilee and no doubt he was a close friend of Andrew and Peter who lived in the same fishing village (John 1:44). It is almost certain that he was first a disciple of John the Baptist, because Jesus called him directly near Bethany beyond the Jordan, where John was preaching (John 1:43). He is often characterized as being timid and retiring, but it is to be remembered that he brought Nathanael to Jesus (John 1:45). A more apt description appears to be that he was reluctant to believe wholeheartedly in the Kingdom and at times he seems to have had difficulty in grasping its meaning (John 14:8-14). This no doubt is why Jesus asked him the unusual question to arouse and test his faith before feeding the five thousand: "How are we to buy bread so that this people may eat?" (John 6:5-6). He served as something of a contact man for the Greeks and is familiarly known for bringing Gentiles to Jesus (John 12:20-23). The last information regarding Philip in the NT is found in Acts 1:13 where we are told that he was among the number of disciples in the upper chamber before Pentecost. His days after this are shrouded in legend and mystery, but the best tradition says that he did mission work in Asia Minor. The historian Eusebius says that he was a "great light of Asia" and that he was buried at Hierapolis.

L.M.P.

PHILIP THE EVANGELIST (fĭl'ĭp, Gr. Philippos, lover of horses). Although the Church, beginning with the second century, often confused him with Philip the Apostle, this Philip's name does not occur in the Gospels, but his story is told in the Book of Acts. He was one of the famous seven deacons, said to be "men of good repute, full of the Spirit and of wisdom" (Acts 6:2). He is second in the list, following Stephen, the first Christian martyr (Acts 6:5), so he must have been well known in the early church. Since he was a Hellenist, that is, a Greek-speaking Jew, as a deacon he was to serve under the apostles (Acts 6:6) by taking care of the neglected Hellenist widows and of the poor in general in the Jerusalem church. But after the death of Stephen the persecutions scattered the Christians abroad and, due to the great need, the deacons became evangelists or Christian missionaries. They even performed signs and wonders among the people (Acts 8:39; 6:8). In Acts 8 it is said that Philip preached in Samaria with great success: "And the multitudes with one accord gave heed to what was said by Philip, when they heard him and saw the things which he did." He cast out devils and healed the paralytics and the lame just as the apostles did. Some of his converts were Simon the magician of Samaria (Acts 8:9-13) and the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:26-40). Thus perhaps Philip was instrumental in introducing Christianity into Africa. Most of his labors seem to have been centered along the Mediterranean seaboard, where following the Lord's command, he preached to the Gentiles. It can easily be seen, therefore, why Paul dwelt at his home (Acts 21:8-9), since they had much in common. Philip was a forerunner of Paul in preaching to the Gentiles. In Acts 21 it is said that Philip had four unmarried daughters who were prophets. Little else is known of his later life. L.M.P.

Ruins of ancient Philippi. JFW

PHILIPPI (fĭ-lĭp'ī, Gr. Philippoi), a Macedonian town in the plain E of Mount Pangaeus. It was a strategic foundation of Philip II, father of Alexander, in 358/7 B.C. The position dominated the road system of northern Greece; hence it became the center for the battle of 42 B.C. in which Antony defeated the tyrannicides, Brutus and Cassius. After Actium (31 B.C.), Octavian (the future Augustus), constituted the place a Roman colony, housing partisans of Antony whose presence was undesirable in Italy. There was a school of medicine in Philippi connected with one of those guilds of physicians which the followers of early Greek medicine scattered through the Hellenistic world. This adds point to the suggestion that Luke was a Philippian. There is a touch of pride in Luke's description of Philippi, "a city of Macedonia, the first of the district" (Acts 16:12 ASV). Amphipolis was, in fact, the capital. W. M. Ramsay comments: "Afterwards Philippi quite outstripped its rival; but it was at that time in such a position that Amphipolis was ranked first by general consent, Philippi first by its own consent. These cases of rivalry between two or even three cities for the dignity and title of "first" are familiar to every student of the history of the Greek cities. . . . The descriptive phrase is like a lightning-flash, revealing in startling clearness the whole situation to those whose eyes are trained to catch the character of Greek city history. . . ." (St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, pp. 206, 207). Philippi was the first European city to hear a Christian missionary, as far as the records go. Paul's choice of the locality throws light on the strategy of his evangelism. For an ancient description of the site see Appian 4:105-131.

E.M.B.

PHILIPPIANS (fĭ-lĭp'ĭ-ănz), one of the most personal of all the Apostle Paul's letters. It is written to "the saints in Christ Jesus who are at Philippi" (1:1).

The church at Philippi in ancient Macedonia was the first European church founded by Paul, and thus represents the first major penetration of the Gospel into Gentile territory (cf. Phil. 4:14-15). The events leading to the founding of the congregation are related in Acts 16:9-40. The great apostle, accompanied by his co-workers, Silas, Timothy and Luke, was on his Second Missionary Journey through Asia Minor. Forbidden by the Holy Spirit to preach in Asia and in Bithynia to the N, they made their way to Troas, farthest port of Asia on the Aegean Sea. In Troas, Paul received a vision from the Lord to take the Gospel to Europe. There stood a man in the night — a Greek of Macedonia who begged him: "Come over into Macedonia and help us" (Acts 16:9). Paul and his companions immediately answered this divine call and set sail for the nearest port — Neopolis of Philippi, named for Philip II of Macedon, the father of Alexander the Great.

Philippi had been thoroughly colonized by the Romans after 30 B.C. but the city was still more Greek in culture than Roman. Also the city was the first station on the Egnation Way and was the gateway to the East. Luke describes the city as follows: "And from thence to Philippi which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony; and we were in that city abiding certain days" (Acts 16:12). It is not unusual, therefore, that Paul's first convert there was a merchant woman named Lydia, a seller of purple. Her whole household was baptized and became the nucleus of the new church (Acts 16:15). The remarkable conversion of the jailer with its accompanying miraculous events also took place in Philippi (Acts 16:25-34). There was, therefore, a very intimate relationship between the apostle and this church. No doubt this was true also because the congregation consisted mainly of Gentiles and Paul saw in them the real future of the church. They were poor, but the fruits of faith were abundant. On several occasions they collected funds for Paul and also aided him while in prison (Phil. 4:10-16). He visited this favorite congregation whenever possible. He has no rebuke for it in this letter. The members are his "joy and crown" (1:8).

Before 1900 it was universally accepted that the epistle to the Philippians was written at Rome where Paul was in prison after his Third Missionary Journey. In recent years, however, scholars have developed the hypothesis that it was written during Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea, but still more recently from the prison in Ephesus. The main reason for their hypotheses is that the old arguments for Roman authorship no longer fit the Roman situation alone. The problem of distance, the travels mentioned in Philippians itself, the similarity to the earlier epistles to Thessalonica, Galatia and Corinth make us believe it is more likely that the letter was written from Ephesus. Although no specific imprisonment of Paul is mentioned in Ephesians, it is possible Paul was in prison in Ephesus (cf. Corinthians 9:23; I Cor. 15:32).

Very few scholars — mostly extreme radicals — have said Paul did not write the letter. Today it is almost universally believed that the Apostle Paul is the author. Some scholars also believe the letter is made up of two or three smaller letters of Paul, but the best scholars now proclaim that the epistle is a single document, written wholly on one occasion.

The letter was occasioned by the gift of funds and clothing which Epaphroditus brought to Paul in prison. Paul took the opportunity to thank the Philippians for this and other favors. In doing so, as was his custom, Paul added practical Christian admonition to humility, joy and steadfastness, which a reading of the letter will reveal. The main emphasis is joy; the concept "rejoice" appears no less than 16 times in the letter. It also is a theological letter. The doctrines of the person and work of Christ, justification by faith, the second coming of Christ, etc., are found among the practical admonitions.

General outline of contents of the letter: Chapter I: Greetings and thanksgiving (1:1-11). Progress of the Gospel (1:12-20). On remaining in the world and working and suffering for Christ (1:21-30). Chapter II: Exhortation to humility based on the humiliation and exaltation of Christ (2:1-13). Exhortation to the Christian life (2:14-18). Personal remarks involving Timothy and Epaphroditus (2:19-30). Chapter III: Warning against false teachers (3:1-3). Paul's mighty confession of his faith (3:4-14). The Christian's hope of heaven (3:15-21). Chapter IV: "Rejoice in the Lord alway!" (4:1-7). Admonition to Christian virtues (4:8-13). Paul's confidence in Divine Providence (4:14-19). Final greeting (4:20-22). L.M.P.

PHILISTINES (fĭ-lĭs'tēnz, Heb. pelishtîm), the name given to the people who inhabited the Philistine plain of Palestine during the greater part of OT times. The five cities of the Philistines were Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath and Ekron (Josh. 13:3; I Sam. 6:17). They were situated in the broad coastal plain of southern Palestine, except for Gath which is in the Shephelah or hill-country. Our word "Palestine" is derived from the term Philistine.

Origins. The origin of the Philistines is not completely known. They are said to have come from Caphtor (Jer. 47:4; Amos 9:7), which is believed to be a name for Crete, or perhaps for the island world of the Aegean area. It is clear that they had migrated to Canaan within historical times and that this migration was remembered by the Hebrews.

Most authorities connect the coming of the Philistines with certain political and ethnic movements in the eastern Mediterranean area in the late 13th and early 12th centuries B.C. Five groups of sea peoples left their homeland and moved southeastward at this time. They destroyed Ugarit (an ancient city-state in what is now Syria), and sought to invade Egypt, where they were repulsed by Raamses III in a great naval and land battle about 1191 B.C. Raamses on his monuments pictures these peoples as Europeans. Their pottery indicates that they came from the Greek islands, particularly Crete. The Philistines were one of these groups, and the Thekels another. After their repulse by the Egyptians, they invaded Canaan, the Philistines settling in what is now called the Philistine Plain, and the Thekels settling farther N, in the Sharon Plain.

What caused these people to leave their Aegean homeland and come to Canaan? There appears to have taken place at this time a great torrent of migration out of Europe, which swept through the Aegean world, Anatolia and northern Syria, destroying the Hittite empire and creating a situation of movement and folk wandering which was destined to change the ethnic makeup of the eastern Mediterranean world.

Civilization. The Philistines had a unique political organization. Their five city states were ruled by five "Lords of the Philistines" (Josh. 13:3; Judg. 16:5). The term "lord" is seren (always used in the plural, serānîm), a non-Semitic word probably to be equated with tyrannos, the Greek word denoting the ruler of a city state. The Philistine city states were certainly united in some sort of a confederation.

It is clear that the Philistines were more wealthy and more advanced in technology than their Hebrew neighbors. According to I Samuel 13:19-22 they had the knowledge of metal working, while the Hebrews did not. This monopoly the Philistines jealously guarded, forcing the Hebrews to come down to them even for agricultural implements, which they repaired at exorbitant cost (vs. 21 RSV). This situation has been confirmed by archaeology; the Philistines were in the iron age when they came to Palestine; the Hebrews attained to this level of advance only in the time of David. This technological superiority (the Philistines even had chariots, I Sam. 13:5) is the reason for the Philistines' military domination of the Hebrews so evident toward the end of the period of the Judges and in Saul's reign.

While the Philistines seem to have taught the Hebrews technology, the Hebrews and Canaanites influenced their Philistine neighbors in other ways. Soon after migrating to Canaan the Philistines seem to have adopted the Canaanite language and Semitic names. The Philistines worshiped the Semitic gods Dagon (Judg. 16:23; I Sam. 5:1-7), Astarte (I Sam. 31:10) and Baalzebub (II Kings 1:2,6,16). On the other hand, their non-Semitic origin is recalled in the epithet "uncircumcised" (Judg. 14:3) so frequently used of them in the Bible.

History. The book of Judges mentions the Philistines as a major contender against the Hebrews for the possession of Palestine. No doubt the tribes of Judah, Simeon and Dan felt the pressure most, for their lands were adjacent to the Philistines.

The judge Shamgar fought them (3:31). A Philistine oppression is briefly mentioned in 10:6,7. The story of Samson, last of the deliverers mentioned in the book of Judges, is set in a violent struggle with the Philistines (13-16; note 14:4c; 15:11). Samson, a man of great strength but little self-discipline was finally snared by a Philistine spy, Delilah (16:4-21). No doubt the Danite migration (chap. 18) was occasioned by the Philistine pressure which kept the Danites from occupying the territory assigned them, and forced them to seek a more easily taken area. The book of I Samuel opens with the theme of Philistine oppression with which Judges closes. Eli's judgeship seems to have been characterized by Philistine domination (I Sam. 4-6). Samuel was able to see a measure of victory over them when he defeated them at the battle of Mizpah, and forced them to return to Israel certain cities they had taken from her (I Sam. 7:7-14). Saul's reign, although it began well, ended in complete defeat for the Hebrews, and the Philistines seem to have overrun most of Palestine W of the Jordan, even occupying Bethshan, at the eastern end of the valley of Jezreel (I Sam. 13:5; 14:1-52; 17:1-58; 31:1-13).

During the latter part of the reign of Saul, David, the contender for the throne, fled for safety to the Philistines (I Sam. 21:10-15; 27:1-28:2; 29:1-11), who gladly protected him, thinking thus to contribute to the weakness of the Hebrews. No doubt David learned from the Philistines many things he later used to advantage when he became king, including perhaps the technique for working iron.

Probably David remained a Philistine vassal during the 7½ years he reigned at Hebron (II Sam. 2:1-4). When at the end of this time he asserted his independence and united all Israel under his rule, he was immediately opposed by them, but in two battles decisively defeated them (II Sam. 5:17-25). From this time on, the Philistine grip was broken. In later campaigns (II Sam. 21:15-22; 23:9-17) David consistently bested them and it seems clear that from this time on the Philistines were confined to their own territory and were no longer a threat. It would seem that David had peaceful relations with them at times, for his bodyguards, the Cerethites and Pelethites appear to have been recruited from them (II Sam. 8:18; 15:18).

After the death of Solomon and the division of the Hebrew kingdom the Philistines reasserted the independence they had lost to David and Solomon. Their cities appear to have engaged in commerce, for which their location certainly fitted them (Joel 3:4-8; Amos 1:6-8). Some of them paid tribute to Jehoshaphat, after whose death they raided Judah (II Chron. 17:11; 21:16,17). When the Assyrians later sought to control the road to Egypt, it is quite natural that the Philistines were frequently mentioned in their inscriptions, along with Israel and the other "Westlands" countries. Sargon (722-705 B.C.) captured the Philistine cities, deported some of the inhabitants and set over them an Assyrian governor. In the days of Hezekiah the Philistines played a great part in the revolt against Sennacherib. It appears that among them, as in Jerusalem, there were two political parties, one recommending submission to the world conquerors, the other urging a stubborn fight for freedom in union with their neighbors the Judeans.

Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal name Philistine tributaries as well as the Judean king Manasseh. The later struggles between Egypt and Assyria were the cause of great suffering to the Philistine cities, and practically close their history as strictly Philistinian. The cities did continue as predominantly non-Jewish centers, becoming Hellenistic cities in the Greek period.

Early Biblical Mention of the Philistines before the times of the Judges. Certain "Philistines" are mentioned in Genesis. The Philistine land is referred to (21:32,34). Abimelech king of Gerar is called "king of the Philistines" (26:1; cf. 26:14, 15). These references have often been regarded as anachronisms, since the Philistines appear not to have entered Canaan before the period of the judges. A more generous judgment has seen here a later revision of the text, bringing the proper names up-to-date. It is possible that a later editor, perhaps during the Hebrew kingdom, may have revised the proper names to make them meaningful in his time, thus introducing the term Philistine into Genesis (cf. also Exod. 13:17; 23:31; Josh. 13:2,3).

On the other hand, recent studies of the problem suggest another approach. Folk movements never are completed in one generation. It is not impossible that the great Philistine movement which entered Canaan during the judges period may have had a small precursor as early as the Patriarchal age. The army of Rameses III which repulsed the invading Philistines in 1191 B.C., itself contained soldiers who are portrayed on the Egyptian monuments as Philistines. Evidently these had joined the Egyptian army as mercenaries at an earlier date. Further, pottery identified as Philistine has turned up in Palestinian excavations recently in layers earlier than those of the judges period. It also seems that the sea peoples invading Egypt came from land as well as sea, and Rameses III refers to "The Peleset (i.e. Philistines) [who] are hung up in their towns," implying that some of these troublesome people had already settled near by.

It therefore seems not impossible that some Philistines were settled in Gerar by the time of Isaac. They were not a large hostile group (as later), but a small settlement with which the patriarch had more or less friendly relations.

PHILO JUDAEUS (fī'lō jōō-dē'ŭs), the Jewish scholar and philosopher, was born in Alexandria about 20 B.C. Alexandria had an old tradition of Jewish scholarship, and Philo sprang from a rich and priestly family. Few details are known of his life, save that in A.D. 39 he took part in an embassy to Rome to plead the case of the Jews whose religious privileges, previously wisely recognized by Rome, were menaced by the mad Caligula. The embassy is described by Philo in the Legatio ad Caium. Philo lived until A.D. 50 and was a prolific author. His writings include philosophical works, commentaries on the Pentateuch, and historical and apologetic works in the cosmopolitan tradition of Alexandrian Jewry, which had long sought to commend its literature to the Gentile world. Hence Philo's development of an allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament. His aim was to show that much of the philosophy of the Greeks had been anticipated by the Jews. He was also, like Paul of Tarsus, a citizen of two worlds, and sought to synthetize his own Hellenistic and Hebraic traditions. His doctrine of God most notably reveals this synthesis. His doctrine of the Logos is discussed above under its own heading. The Logos, in Philo's rendering of the Greek doctrine, was simultaneously the creative power which orders the universe, and also a species of mediator through whom men know God. John seems therefore to have had Philo's philosophy in mind when he wrote the first 18 verses of the Fourth Gospel, sharply personal though John's interpretation is. Others, too, were influenced by Philo's mysticism and principles of exegesis. Clement and Origen used his works, and the Latin Fathers generally following his methods of allegorical interpretation, established a tradition of exegesis which still finds favor in some quarters. E.M.B.

PHILOLOGUS (fī-lŏl'ō-gŭs, Gr. Philólogos, fond of learning), a believer in Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom. 16:15).

PHILOSOPHY. The words "philosophy" (love of wisdom) and "philosopher" each occurs only once in the Bible, and that in a derogatory sense. Thayer (Lexicon p. 655) indicates that Greek usage connoted "zeal for, or skill in, any art or science." It is not genuine philosophy which Paul deprecates, but "philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men, after the rudiments [i.e. idolatrous principles] of the world, and not after Christ" (Col. 2:8).

The same thought is expressed in the discussion of "wisdom" in I Corinthians (1:18-2:16; 3:18-21), where Paul not only emphasizes the inadequacy of worldly wisdom, but says, "we speak wisdom among the mature" (2:6), a "wisdom" based upon revelation. This is similar to the "wisdom" doctrine of Job, Ecclesiastes, certain psalms, and especially Proverbs. The book of Ecclesiastes, which teaches that "all is vanity under the sun," may be regarded as an answer to modern philosophical naturalism.

The "philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoics" (Acts 17:18) who led Paul to the Areopagus and heard him only part way through, are not to be taken as worthy or even serious representatives of those philosophies. Their superficiality is indicated in vs. 21. They "spent their time in nothing else but either to tell, or to hear some new thing." J.O.B.

PHINEHAS (fĭn'ē-ăs, Heb. pînehās, mouth of brass). 1. A son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron (Exod. 6:25; I Chron. 6:4,50; 9:20; Ezra 7:5; 8:2), who slew Zimri and Cozbi at God's command (Num. 25:6-15; Ps. 106:30). He conducted a successful embassy to the trans-Jordan tribes regarding the altar they had built (Josh. 22:13-34). These incidents evidence his great zeal and faithful service.

2. A son of Eli, unfaithful in his ministration of the priest's office (I Sam. 1:3; 2:12-17,22-25, 27-36; 3:11-13). He and his brother Hophni brought the ark into the camp of Israel in hope of its presence bringing victory against the Philistines, but the ark was taken and Hophni and Phinehas slain (I Sam. 4).

3. Father of the Eleazar who with other priests accounted for the valuables brought back to Jerusalem with the exiles returning from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 8:32-34).

PHLEGON (flē'gŏn, flĕg'ŏn, Gr. Phlégon, burning), a believer in Rome to whom Paul sent a loving greeting (Rom. 16:14).

PHOEBE, PHEBE (fē'bē, Gr. Phoíbe, pure), a woman mentioned in the Scriptures only in Romans 16:1,2. She was one of the first deaconesses, if not the first, of the Christian Church, and was highly recommended by the Apostle Paul. In a single sentence Paul speaks of her Christian status ("sister"); of her position or office (diákonos); of her service record ("she has been a helper of many and of me also"); and of the importance of her work ("assist her in whatever matter she has need of"). Phoebe was serving as deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, port of Corinth, when Paul arrived there at the end of his third journey, and where he wrote his letter to the Romans. Either she was on her way to Rome to serve that church, or Paul entrusted her to carry this important epistle to the Roman Christians.

PHOENICIA, PHENICIA (fē-nĭsh'ĭ-à, Gr. Phoiníke), a strip of coastal territory between the Lebanon range, the uplands of Galilee, and the Mediterranean Sea, containing the trading-ports of the great maritime people which bore its name. Exact definition of boundaries is not possible, for the Phoenicians were associated with their cities rather than with their hinterland, after the fashion of the Greek colonies, and for analogous reasons. It can be said, however, that to the N Phoenicia never extended beyond Arvad or Arados, on the modern island of Ruad, 80 miles N of Sidon. The southern limits were Acco, modern Acre, just N of Carmel, and, according to the Egyptian papyrus which tells the story of Wen-Amon, Dor, just S of Carmel. The Semitic name for the land was Canaan, the "Kinachchi" or "Kinachna" of the Tell-el-Amarna letters, and the "Chna" of Phoenician coins. The name is of doubtful significance, but may mean "lowland," as distinct from the uplands parallel with the coast, which are a geographical feature of the eastern end of the Mediterranean. The term Phoenicia is from a Greek word meaning "dark red," but there is no clear reason why this was applied to the land. "Phoenix" in fact, may mean "dark red" because the Phoenicians were the discoverers of the crimson-purple dye derived from the murex shell-fish. "Phoenix" also means a date-palm, and there may be a clue in the fact that the palm is a symbol on Phoenician coins.

The Phoenicians were Semites who came to the Mediterranean as one ripple of the series of Semitic migrations which moved W and S round the Fertile Crescent during the second millennium B.C. Abraham was part of this historical process, but the movement brought major tribal elements, the Amorites, for example, to Palestine, the Kassite dynasty to Babylon, and the Hyksos to Egypt. The tribes who occupied the coastal strip turned their attention to the sea because of the pressure on the agricultural lands in the narrow lowland strip, never more than 20 miles wide, behind them. A tradition of sea-faring may have accompanied the immigrants from the Persian Gulf, itself the first scene of human navigation and sea-borne trade. Such was the challenge and stimulus which made the Phoenicians the most notable sailors of the ancient world, and led to their feats of colonization, which spread their trading-posts round the African coast from Carthage westward, and established them in Spain and Sicily.

It is not known whether they built the towns which formed the centers of their power and trade, or whether, descending to the sea, they found the towns awaiting their occupation. According to Herodotus, who visited Tyre (2:44), the city was founded in 2755 B.C. He does not name the founders. Like that of the Greeks, the Phoenician civilization was organized round the city. That is why Phoenicia had no place in history as a political unit. It is Tyre and Sidon, and less frequently other cities, such as Acco and Dor, which appear in the record as units. Sidon was the most powerful and influential of the Phoenician cities. To Homer, Phoenicians were commonly Sidonians. Giving Telemachus a mixing bowl, King Menelaus of Sparta says: "Phaedimus the king of the Sidonians gave it to me. . . ." (Od. 6:618. Also ib. 15:118 and Il. 6:290). The OT uses the same nomenclature. "The gods of Sidon," Baal and Ashtaroth (Judg. 10:6) were the gods of the Phoenicians generally (also Judg. 18:7; I Kings 5:6; 11:5 & 33; 16:31; II Kings 23:13). The reference to "Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians" (I Kings 16:31) is at first sight strange, for Ethbaal was king of Tyre. The explanation above given, that "Sidonian" had become a generic term for "Phoenician," is established, however, by the fact that Vergil, the Roman poet, who follows the legend that Dido, Queen of Carthage, was the daughter of Belus (= Ethbaal), king of Tyre (Aen. 1:621), calls Dido in the same context (ib. 613 cf. 678) "Sidonia Dido."

Phoenicia first appears in recorded history in the Egyptian account of the northern campaigns of Thutmose III. In his campaign against the Hittites of 1471 B.C., the pharaoh found it necessary to secure the Phoenician coastal strip as an essential avenue of communications. He punished severely the revolt of Arvad, the northernmost town of the Phoenicians, and went to considerable pains to organize the series of Phoenician ports as supply depots. Sporadically, as with the rest of the lands to the N, Egypt asserted or relaxed her authority. The Tell-el-Amarna letters show Phoenicia in the same state of disunity and internal rivalry as Palestine during the weak reign of the mystic Amenhotep IV. Seti I (1373-1292 B.C.) pushed his conquests as far as Acco and Tyre, Ramses II (1292-1225 B.C.) as far as Biruta (mod. Beirut). The whole coast revolted in the reign of Merneptah (1225-1215 B.C.), including Philistia, for the pharaoh boasts: "Plundered is Canaan with every evil."

Egyptian influence fluctuated over the next century, and when Ramses XII (1118-1090 B.C.) sent the priest Wen-Amon to buy cedar for his funeral barge, the Egyptian envoy was treated with the scantest courtesy in Dor and Tyre. An entertaining papyrus tells his story. A century later found Hiram king of Tyre in alliance with David, a partnership which developed into a trade alliance in the days of Solomon. Solomon's fleet of "ships of Tarshish" at Ezion-geber on the Gulf of Aqabah seems to have been part of a combined trading venture whereby the Phoenicians used Solomon's port and piloted Solomon's ships to Southern Arabia and India (I Kings 10:22; II Chron. 9:21). If indeed "ivory, and apes, and peacocks" are Tamil words, Tarshish in these passages must be sought in the East rather than the West. The cargoes are certainly not Spanish.

With the division of the kingdom, Phoenicia became the neighbor and partner of the Northern Kingdom, while Judah lay across the communications with the Gulf of Aqabah and the Red Sea. Hence Ahab's alliance with Jezebel, the prosperity of the North (Ahab's "Ivory House"), and the sequence of events which led to Elijah's protest and the contest on Carmel. The Assyrians had dealings with Phoenicia. Ashur-nasir-pal (884-860 B.C.) imposed tribute on Tyre and Sidon after his thrust to the sea. Shalmaneser II added Arvad. Tiglath-pileser (745-727 B.C.) reasserted the Assyrian authority, which had lapsed. Shalmaneser IV (727-722 B.C.) unsuccessfully besieged Tyre for five years. Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.) besieged Sidon, and took tribute from Sidon and Acco, but left Tyre undisturbed. Tyre was a formidable task for a besieger. Ashur-banipal (668-626 B.C.) claimed to have reduced Tyre and Arvad, but by the end of the reign Phoenicia was free again, as Assyria lapsed into one of her phases of fatigue. Nebuchadnezzar (604-652 B.C.) invested Tyre for 13 years, and seems to have captured the city (Ezek. 26 to 29) or received its surrender on terms. Hence, probably, the pre-eminence of Sidon in Persian times. According to Diodorus and Herodotus, Sidon provided Xerxes with his best ships for the great raid on Greece. All the Phoenician cities submitted to Alexander after Issus (333 B.C.), except Tyre, which Alexander took after a vigorous siege of seven months. Under the Successors, the power of the Ptolemies of Egypt first extended far up the Phoenician coast, but after 197 B.C. the Seleucids of Syria controlled the land, until the whole area passed into Roman hands in 65 B.C. The reference to a "Syrophoenician woman" in Mark 7:26, reflects the fact of the century and a half of Syrian rule.

The Phoenician stock must by this time have been heavily diluted by emigrant blood, principally Greek. The whole area figured largely in the early evangelism of the Church (Acts 11:19; 15:3; 21:2). Phoenicia's achievement was principally in the realm of trade, and in her simplification and diffusion of the alphabet, as a tool and means, no doubt, of commercial intercourse. Ezekiel 27 and 28 give some notion of the extent and variety of Phoenician trade, but the Phoenicians did nothing to spread or communicate the knowledge, geographical and social, which their voyaging won. Tyre's colony at Carthage blockaded the Straits of Gilbraltar for many generations in an attempt to guard the western and Atlantic trade routes, and this secrecy was a Phoenician principle. The land made no contribution to art and literature, and its religious influence, heavily infected with the cruder fertility cults, was pernicious. E.M.B.

PHRYGIA (frĭj'ĭ-à, Gr. Phrygía), in Bible times an inland province of SW Asia Minor. Its table lands which rose to 4,000 feet contained many cities and towns considerable in size and wealth. Most historians agree that the province included greater or lesser territory at different times and there is no common agreement on the boundaries since they shifted almost every generation. It seems that at one time it included a greater part of western Asia Minor. Then it was divided into Phrygia Major and Phrygia Minor; later the Romans even divided it into three parts. Some Bible students believe the term Phrygia is used loosely in the NT, as in the Book of Acts, and that it even included small provinces like Pisidia. In these days "Phrygia" meant an extensive territory which at times contributed territory to a number of different Roman provinces. It is thought to have this broader meaning in Acts 2:10 which speaks of devout Jews from Phrygia at Pentecost.

Whatever the exact extent of the province, it receives its renown mainly from Paul's missionary journeys. Paul and his co-workers visited the fertile territory which contained rich pastures for cattle and sheep and a heavy population needful of the Gospel during all three missionary journeys. If Phrygia is understood in its broader sense, Paul and Barnabas introduced Christianity into the province during the first journey (Acts 13:13 and 14:24). Acts 16:6 briefly describes the visit of Paul and Silas on the second journey in these words: "And they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia, having been forbidden by the Holy Spirit to speak the word in Asia." On his third journey he quickly revisited the province on his way to Ephesus and Corinth (Acts 18:23): "After spending some time there (in Antioch) he departed and went from place to place through the region of Galatia and Phrygia, strengthening all the disciples." Although a great deal of Christian activity took place in ancient Phrygia, with this reference it passes from the Biblical record. L.M.P.

PHURAH, PURAH (fū'rà, Heb. purâh, branch), a servant of Gideon who went down with him to visit the host of Midian (Judg. 7:10,11; ASV, RSV Purah).

PHUT (fŭt, Heb. pût), third son of Ham (Gen. 10:6; I Chron. 1:8 Put, and so elsewhere in ASV, RSV). His descendants are not named. A comparison of translations of Heb. pût in KJV, ASV and RSV reveals the difficulty of locating Phut (Isa. 66:19; Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 27:10; 30:5; 38:5; Nah. 3:9). The question is partly textual, whether there is confusion between Put and Pul (Isa. 66:19), between Ludim and Lubim; partly etymological, whether the word is of Egyptian origin; partly involved in the location of lands with which Phut is associated. Some locate Phut W of Egypt on the North African coast; some in Nubia; others E of Somaliland, on both sides of the Red Sea, in both Africa and Asia. Genesis 10:6, which names Phut between two African lands, Cush (Ethiopia) and Mizraim (Egypt), and Asian Canaan, suggests the ambiguity, and no other reference removes it. The men of Phut were valued mercenary soldiers of Tyre (Ezek. 27:10) and Egypt (Jer. 46:9). They used shield (Jer. 46:9) and helmet (Ezek. 38:5), probably also the bow (Isa. 66:19). Possibly there were settlements of them in widely scattered places. Certainly they traveled far to fight. E.R.

PHUVAH, PUA, PUAH (fū'và, pū'à, Heb. pû'âh).
1. The second son of Issachar (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23; I Chron. 7:1).
2. The father of Tola of the tribe of Issachar, who judged Israel after the death of Abimelech (Judg. 10:1).

PHYGELLUS (fĭ-jĕl'ŭs, Gr. Phýgellos). In his second letter to Timothy (1:15) Paul mentions by name Phygellus and Hermogenes as being among those Christians of Asia (western province of Asia Minor) who had turned away from the apostle. From the context (II Tim. 1:13-14) it may be asumed that the apostasy included the repudiation of Paul's doctrine. If we connect Phygellus with II Timothy 4:16 ("At my first answer no man stood with me") we may infer that he, being in Rome, forsook Paul's personal cause in the Roman courts at a crucial time when his testimony could have meant much for the future of the Church. Some scholars feel that Phygellus may also have been one of the leaders of a group of wayward Christians in Rome (Phil. 1:15-16).

PHYSICIAN (See Occupations & Professions)

PI-BESETH (pī-bē'sĕth, Heb. pî-veseth), a city in the delta of Lower Egypt (Ezek. 30:17) near Aven (On or Heliopolis), on the western bank of the Pelusiae branch of the Nile. The names of Rameses II and of Shishak, conqueror of Rehoboam, are inscribed on the ruins. The red granite temple of the goddess Basht, admired by Herodotus, has been excavated, also a unique cemetery of cats sacred to Basht; buried, not mummified. Pi-beseth was occupied in the Fourth Dynasty of the Old Empire, the Middle Empire, Hyksos times, the New Empire to its end, and Roman times.

PICTURES (pĭk'tūrz), occurs three times in KJV. Numbers 33:52 ASV, RSV has "figured stones." Stone idols appear to be meant. In Proverbs 25:11 ASV has "network", RSV "setting." Pleasing inlaid work in gold and silver seems to be the sense. In Isaiah 2:16 another word from the same Heb. root is translated "imagery" in ASV; margin "watchtowers." RSV has "beautiful craft," with a note, "Compare Gk: Heb. uncertain." The carved figureheads of ships, usually idolatrous symbols, may be intended. The Heb. root suggests something conspicuous, showy.

PIETY (pī'ĕ-tē), occurs once in KJV, ASV; RSV "religious duty." The phrase "show piety at home" refers primarily to reverence for parents; filial piety; but other uses of related Greek words broaden the sense to "godly behavior."

PIGEON (See Birds)

PI-HAHIROTH (pī'hā-hī'rŏth, Heb. pî-ha-hîrôth), the place in northeastern Egypt where the Israelites last camped before crossing the Red Sea. Here the Egyptian army overtook them (Exod. 14:2,9; Num. 33:7). Exact location unknown.

PILATE (pī'lăt, Gr. Peilátos), the 5th procurator, or governmental representative, of imperial Rome in Palestine at the time of Christ, holding this office A.D. 26 to 36. Whether it be considered an honor or a disgrace, he is the one man of all Roman officialdom who is named in the Apostles Creed — "suffered under Pontius Pilate." To Christians, therefore, he is known almost entirely for his cowardly weakness in the condemnation of Jesus to Roman crucifixion in A.D. 30. The four Gospels relate the sad but glorious story fully, especially the Gospel of John. Pilate is also mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (3:13; 4:27; 13:28) and in I Timothy 6:13 where we are told that Jesus "before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession." His name Pontius was his family name, showing that he was descended from the Roman family or gens of pontii, while Pilate no doubt comes from the Latin pilatus meaning "one armed with a pilum or javelin."

Beyond this, little is known of his early or later years, since most of the secular references may be only legend and tradition, such as the story that he was an illegitimate son of Tyrus, King of Mayence, who sent him to Rome as a hostage. In Rome, so the story goes, he committed murder and was then sent to Pontus of Asia Minor where he subdued a rebellious people, re-gained favor with Rome, and was awarded the governship of Judea. It is more probable that, like the sons of many prominent Romans, he was trained for governmental service and either because of his political astuteness or as a political plum he was given the hard task of governing the troublesome Jews by the Emperor Tiberius. The Romans had many such governors throughout the provinces, which was part of their success in local government. Judea had a succession of these smaller rulers before and after Pilate. Generally they were in charge of tax and financial matters, but governing Palestine was so difficult that the procurator there was directly responsible to the emperor and also had supreme judicial authority such as Pilate used regarding Christ. The territory included Judea, Samaria and old Idumea.

Most procurators disliked being stationed in a distant, difficult, dry outpost such as Judea. Pilate, however, seemed to enjoy tormenting the Jews, although, as it turned out, he was seldom a match for them. He never really understood them, as his frequent rash and capricious acts reveal. The Jewish historian Josephus tells us that he immediately offended the Jews by bringing the "outrageous" Roman standards into the Holy City. At another time he hung golden shields inscribed with the names and images of Roman deities in the temple itself. Once he even appropriated some of the temple tax to build an aqueduct. To this must be added the horrible incident mentioned in Luke 13:1 about "the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices," meaning no doubt that Roman soldiers slew these men while sacrificing in the Holy Place. These fearful events seem to disagree with the role Pilate played in the trial of Jesus where he was as clay in the hands of the Jews, but this may be explained by the fact that his fear of the Jews increased because of their frequent complaints to Rome.

According to the custom, Pilate was in Jerusalem at the time to keep order during the feast. His usual headquarters were in Caesarea. After the Jews had condemned Jesus in their own courts, they brought Him to Pilate, no doubt residing in Herod's palace near the temple, early in the morning. It is surprising he gave them an ear so early in the day (John 18:28). From the beginning of the hearing he is torn between offending the Jews and condemning an innocent person, and he tries every device to set Jesus free apart from simply acquitting Him. He declares Jesus innocent after private interrogation; he sends Him to Herod; he has Jesus scourged, hoping this will suffice; finally he offers the Jews a choice between Jesus and a coarse insurrectionist. When he hears the words, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend," and "We have no king but Caesar!" he thinks of politics rather than justice and condemns an innocent man to crucifixion. Washing his hands only enhanced his guilt. Pilate is to be judged in the light of his times when one lived by the philosophy of self-aggrandizement and expediency.

Scripture is silent regarding the end of Pilate. According to Josephus, his political career came to an end six years later when he sent soldiers to Samaria to suppress a small harmless religious rebellion in which innocent men were killed. The Samaritans complained to Vitellius, legate of Syria, who sent Pilate to Rome. His friend Tiberius died while he was on his way to Rome and his name disappears from the official history of Rome. The historian Eusebius says that soon afterwards, "wearied with misfortunes," he took his own life. Various traditions conflict as to how and where Pilate killed himself. One familiar legend states that he was banished to Vienna; another that he sought solitude from politics on the mountain by Lake Lucerne, now known as Mt. Pilatus. After some years of despair and depression he is said to have plunged to his death into the lake from a precipice. L.M.P.

PILDASH (pĭl'dăsh, Heb. pildash), sixth son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. 22:22).

PILEHA (pĭl'ē-hà, Heb. pilhā'), one of those who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:24; ASV, RSV Pilha).

PILGRIM (pĭl'grĭm, Gr. parepídemos, a sojourner in a strange place). Hebrews 11:13-16 shows that the faithful sought a heavenly city and did not consider themselves permanently attached to earth. I Peter 2:11 exhorts Christians to purity because of this status. Pilgrims might be exiles (RSV), or voluntary sojourners in a foreign country.

PILGRIMAGE (pĭl'grĭ-mĭj, Heb. māghôr, a place of sojourning, or the act of sojourning; (see Exod. 6:4, ASV, RSV sojourning(s); Ps. 119:54). In Genesis 47:9 (ASV margin and RSV text, sojourning, a lifetime is meant. The Heb. root ghûr means "to dwell as a foreigner, newly come into a land in which he has no citizen rights, such as the original inhabitants possess." The Bible usage, whether the word is translated "pilgrimage" or otherwise, began with the wanderings of Abraham and his descendants, and later was applied to the status of a believer in the one true God, dwelling on an earth unfriendly to Him and to His people.

PILLAR (pĭl'êr), translates several Heb. words in the OT. Hezekiah's pillars (II Kings 18:16) are called doorposts in RSV and ASV margin; Heb. 'ōmenôth from a root meaning to stand firm. The pillars for the house of the Lord (I Kings 10:12) are called supports in RSV; ASV margin "or, a railing; Heb. a prop"; Heb. mīse'ādh, a support. More frequent are derivatives from the Heb. root ntsb, to stand. There is a religious element in the purpose and use of such pillars; stones set erect as memorials of a divine appearance in connection with the worship of the one true God (Gen. 28: 18-22; 31:13; 35:14; Exod. 24:4; Hos. 3:4; 10:1, 2; Isa. 19:19). Stone pillars were set up in token of an agreement with religious sanctions between men (Gen. 31:43-52) in addition to a heap of stones raised by the parties. Rachel's grave was marked by a pillar (Gen. 35:20). Absalom in his lifetime erected a pillar to be his memorial (II Sam. 18: 18). Lot's wife, looking back at the ruin of Sodom, became a pillar of salt (Gen. 19:26). In Judges 9:6 ASV margin has "garrison," but RSV like KJV has "pillar," though garrison is a possible meaning. Abimelech was made king either at a military strong-point, or by a religious ceremony at a consecrated pillar.

Standing stones used in idolatrous worship are referred to (Deut. 12:3) and are usually called images in KJV, where ASV margin has "obelisks" and ASV, RSV text "pillars" (Exod. 23:24; 34: 13; Lev. 26:1; Deut. 7:5; 12:3; 16:22; I Kings 14:23; II Kings 17:10; 18:4; 23:14; II Chron. 14:3; 31:1; Mic. 5:13). In Ezekiel 26:11 KJV reads "garrisons," ASV, RSV "pillars," ASV margin "obelisks." The Heb. may mean either. Another common Heb. word for pillar, 'amûdh, from a root "to stand," refers to the PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE (see special article) which guided Israel in the wilderness; to pillars of shittim wood (KJV) or acacia (ASV, RSV) in the tabernacle (Exod. 26:32,37) or of bronze or material not named (Exod. 27:10-17; 36:36,38; 38:10-17,28; 39:33,40; 40:18; Num. 3:36,37; 4:31,32); to pillars of Solomon's Temple (I Kings 7:2-42; II Kings 25:13-17; I Chron. 18:8; II Chron. 3:15, 17; 4:12,13; Jer. 27:19; 52:17-22). Ezekiel 40:49; 42:6 speaks of the pillars of the new temple the prophet saw in vision. Samson broke down the Philistine temple at Gaza by pushing apart its supporting pillars (Judg. 16:25-29). Esther 1:6 refers to the marble pillars of the Persian king's palace. ASV margin has "or, on the platform" for the pillars by which Joash and Josiah stood (II Kings 11:14; 23:3). Solomon's litter or palanquin had pillars (RSV posts) of silver (S. of Sol. 3: 10). Turning to figurative uses, columns (so RSV) of smoke (Judg. 20:40; — but the Heb. is tîmerôth, palm-trees, referring to the spreading tops, in

S. of Sol. 3:6; Joel 2:30). God promises to make Jeremiah an iron pillar (Jer. 1:18). A man's legs are compared to pillars of marble (S. of Sol. 5:15; ASV alabaster columns). The seven pillars of wisdom are mentioned but not defined (Prov. 9:1). The pillars of the earth (Job 9:6; Ps. 75:3) and of heaven (Job 26:11) need not be taken literally, since Job 26:7 states that God hangs the earth upon nothing. In Hannah's song (I Sam. 2:8) the Heb. is mātsûq, molten pillars. In the NT, Gr. stýlos, pillar, occurs figuratively, of God (I Tim. 3:15); of men (Gal. 2:9; Rev. 3:12); of an angel's legs (Rev. 10:1). E.R.

PILLAR of cloud and fire. God guided Israel out of Egypt and through the wilderness by a pillar of cloud by day. This became a pillar of fire by night that they might travel by night in escaping from the Egyptian army (Exod. 13:21-22). When the Egyptians overtook the Israelites, the angel of the Lord removed this cloudy, fiery pillar from before them and placed it behind them as an effective camouflage (Exod. 14:19,20,24). The pillar of cloud stood over the tent of meeting outside the camp, whenever the Lord met Moses there (Exod. 33:7-11). The Lord came down for judgment in the cloud (Num. 12). Also in 14:13-35. God met Moses and Joshua in the cloud at the tent of meeting, to make arrangements for the succession when Moses was near death (Deut. 31:14-23). Psalm 99:7 reminds the people that God spoke to them in the pillar of cloud. When Ezra prays in the presence of the returning exiles at Jerusalem, he rehearses the way in which God led the people by the pillar of cloud and fire (Neh. 9:12,19). I Corinthians 10:1,2 speaks of the fathers being under the cloud, baptized unto Moses in the cloud. No natural phenomenon fits the Biblical description: the cloud and fire were divine manifestations, in a form sufficiently well-defined to be called a pillar. E.R.

PILLOW (pĭl'ō). In Genesis 28:11,18, Heb. mera'ăshōth, at the head, refers to the stones Jacob set up, either under his head (ASV, RSV) or at his head for shelter during sleep outdoors. The same Heb. word is translated bolster in I Samuel 19:13, 16, in connection with kevîr, a quilt (ASV margin) or fly-net thrown over the head. In Ezekiel 13:18,20 the Heb. is kesāthôth, fillet, arm-band, from a root "to bind, take captive." In modern Heb. it means pillow, bolster, cushion. RSV translates "bands," in conformity with the belief that the women sewed magic amulets on their arms. Only in Mark 4:38, Greek proskephálaion, cushion for the head, or any cushion (ASV, RSV), do we have an approach to the modern meaning. Here we probably have the pad on which a rower sat.

PILOT (pī'lŭt, Heb. hōvēl, sailor, rope-puller). mentioned among the skilled craftsmen of Tyre (Ezek. 27:8,27,28,29).

PILTAI (pĭl'tī, Heb. piltāy), a priest, head of his father's house of Moadiah in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:17).

PIM (See Weights and Measures)

PIN (Heb. yāthēdh), a tent peg, usually of wood, sharpened at one end, shaped at the other for attaching the tent cord (Judg. 4:21; 5:26, KJV nail, ASV tent pin, RSV tent peg). The tent pins of the tabernacle (Exod. 35:18; 38:31; 39:40; Num. 3:37; 4:32) were of bronze (Exod. 27:19; 38:20). The pin of Judges 16:13,14 was a stick used for beating up the woof in the loom. Pins were used to hang things on (Ezek. 15:3), and this meaning occurs figuratively (Isa. 22:20-24 KJV, ASV nail, RSV peg; Ezra 9:8 KJV, ASV nail, RSV hold, note, Heb. nail or tent peg). The same Heb. word is translated stakes in Isaiah 33:20; 54:2 where Zion is compared to a tent. In Deuteronomy 23:13 KJV has paddle, ASV margin, shovel, RSV stick, where a tool for digging is meant. The tent peg (KJV, ASV nail) like the corner stone assures support (Zech. 10:4 RSV). Crisping pins (Isa. 3:22 KJV), Heb. hārîtîm, were probably bags or purses (ASV satchels, RSV handbags).

PINE (See Plants)

PINNACLE (pĭn'ă-k'l, pĭn'ĭ-k'l, Gr. pterýgion), anything shaped like a wing; on a building, a turret, battlement, pointed roof or peak. The pinnacle of the temple (Matt. 4:5; Luke 4:9) is the spot to which the devil conveyed Jesus, and whence he invited Him to cast Himself down. Many reasons have been advanced for various locations, but none is certain.

PINON (pī'nŏn, Heb. pînōn), a duke or chief of Edom, of the family of Esau (Gen. 36:40,41; I Chron. 1:52).

PIRAM (pī'răm, Heb. pir'ām), Canaanite king of Jarmuth, and one of those who joined Adoni-zedek against Gibeon, and who was killed there, either by Joshua or by hailstones (Josh. 10:1-11).

PIRATHON (pĭr'ă-thŏn, Heb. pir'āthôn), a town of Ephraim in the hill country of the Amalekites, where Abdon, one of the judges, lived and was buried (Judg. 12:13-15). Benaiah also was from Pirathon (II Sam. 23:30; I Chron. 11:31; 27:14). Perhaps Pharathon, now Far'atā, W of Mt. Gerizim, S of Samaria.

PIRATHONITE (See Pirathon)

PISGAH (pĭz'ga, Heb. ha-pisgâh), a mountain on the NE shore of the Dead Sea; Râs es-Siâghah, slightly NW of Mt. Nebo. First mentioned in Numbers 21:20 as a peak in Moab looking down on Jeshimon (KJV) or the desert (ASV, RSV), on the route of the Israelites toward the Promised Land. Balak brought Balaam into the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah, where he built seven altars and tried to persuade Balaam to curse Israel (Num. 23:14). Ashdoth-pisgah (KJV) or the slopes of Pisgah (ASV, RSV text; ASV margin, springs) helps define the territory of the tribes settled E of the Jordan (Deut. 3:17). The springs (KJV text, ASV margin; ASV, RSV text, slopes) of Pisgah are named in bounding the same territory, as taken from the kings of the Amorites (Deut. 4:49). From the top of Mt. Pisgah Moses viewed the Land of Promise, which he was not permitted to enter (Deut. 3:27; 34:1). The latter verse either identifies or closely associates Mt. Pisgah with Mt. Nebo. The two peaks are near to one another, and the Heb. name, from a root meaning "pass through," means "cleft," probably referring to the shape of the mountain, either as sharply cut out, or as cleft in two peaks. The peak (head or top) of the mountain, and its slopes, and springs thereon, and a field near the top, figure in the Bible references. E.R.

PISHON, PISON (pī'shŏn, Heb. pîshôn), KJV Pison, first of the four rivers of Eden, flowed around the whole land of Havilah. Conjectures as to its identification are almost as numerous as the rivers of southwestern Asia, and include the Persian Gulf thought of as a river, and even the Nile.

PISIDIA (pĭ-sĭd'ĭ-ă, Gr. Pisidía), one of the small Roman provinces in southern Asia Minor just N of Pamphilia which lay along the coast. It was mountainous, but more densely populated than the rough coastal areas, especially because it contained the important city of Antioch. Because of this, Paul visited the city twice. On his first journey (Acts 13:14-50) he preached a lengthy sermon in the synagogue, testifying of Christ. A week later "came almost the whole city together to hear the word of God" (vs. 44). Then the jealous Jews stirred up both the honorable women and the chief men of the city (vs. 50) and Paul and Barnabas were forced out of this greatest Pisidian city. On his second journey Paul revisited Pisidia and Antioch, going "throughout Pisidia confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith" (Acts 14:21-24).

PISON (See Pishon)

PISPA, PISPAH (pĭs'pà, Heb. pispā'), an Asherite, a son of Jether (I Chron. 7:38).

PIT (pĭt), represents several Heb. and two Greek words whose usages are not sharply distinguished. A pit may be a bitumen deposit (Gen. 14:10 so ASV margin; RSV); a deep place, natural or made by man (Matt. 12:11; Gen. 37:20-29; II Sam. 17:9; Exod. 21:33,34, etc.); often a well (Luke 14:5, so ASV, RSV) or cistern (Jer. 14:3 ASV, RSV; Isa. 30:14 ASV, RSV; Lev. 11:33 ASV, earthen vessel; RSV cistern, etc.). Pit stands also for death, the grave, or Sheol (Job 33:18; Isa. 14:15; Num. 16:30,33 ASV, RSV Sheol; Rev. 9:1,2).

PITCH (Heb. zepheth, pitch), either bitumen or a viscous, inflammable liquid associated with it, which was found in Mesopotamia and around the Dead Sea (Gen. 14:10 RSV); used to make vessels watertight (Exod. 2:3); Heb. kōpher, pitch, and cognate verb (Gen. 6:14). Also as a destructive agent (Isa. 34:9; cf. Gen. 19:24). As a verb, pitch renders several Heb. words also translated "encamp, set up" (ASV, RSV) and refers to placing tents, or the tabernacle (Gen. 12:8; 31:25; Exod. 17:1; Num. 1:51; Josh. 8:11, etc.); or other objects (Josh. 4:20); Gr. pégnymi, fix or fasten in (the ground).

PITCHER (Heb. kadh), an earthenware jar with one or two handles, ordinarily borne on the head or shoulder for carrying water (Gen. 24:14-20, 43-46 ASV, RSV jar). Jars empty of water once held lamps (Judg. 7:16-20 RSV, jars). To break one was so serious as to be a figure for death (Eccl. 12:6). KJV translates "barrel" (for meal) in I Kings 17:12-16; for water in I Kings 18:33. Once Heb. nevel, an earthen jar, is rendered "pitchers" (Lam. 4:2 RSV, earthen pitchers). Gr. kerámion is an earthenware vessel or jar (Mark 14:13; Luke 22:10 RSV jar).

PITHOM (pī'thŏm, Heb. pithōm), a city in Egypt in the valley between the Nile and Lake Timsâh; perhaps Tell er-Retâbah; dedicated to the sun-god Atum; with Raamses to the N, one of the store-cities built by the slave-labor of the Israelites (Exod. 1:11) probably in the reign of Seti I or Rameses II (1319-1234 B.C.) Recent excavations at Tell Mashkûtah near Succoth have uncovered bricks made without straw in the upper layers; made with stubble and weeds pulled up by the roots on the middle level; and made with good, clean straw at the bottom of the walls. An inscription at Raamses relates that it was built with Semitic slave-labor from Asia. Whether Pithom is at Tell Mashkûtah or Tell er-Retâbah, it must be in the neighborhood, and the archaeological evidence mentioned above illustrates its construction by Israelite slaves. As a store-city on the frontier it held supplies of grain for military forces operating thence.

PITHON (pī'thŏn, Heb. pîthôn), a son of Micah and descendant of King Saul (I Chron. 8:35; 9:41).

PITY (pĭ'tē), a tender, considerate feeling for others, ranging from judicial clemency (Deut. 7:16, etc.) through kindness (Prov. 19:17; 28:8; Job 6:14) and mercy (Matt. 18:33) to compassion (Lam. 4:10). Pity may be mere regard for a thing (Jonah 4:10); for a thing deeply desired (Ezek. 24:21); or the concern of God for His holy name (Ezek. 36:21). Pity for one's children is of the essence of fatherhood, human or divine (Ps. 103:13); inherent in the redemptive activity of God (Isa. 63:9). The several Heb. words are translated variously in all versions, the translators being guided by the meaning in context rather than by the particular word used, for each has a wide range of connotation. In the NT three Gr. words occur once each: eleéo, have pity (Matt. 18:33); eúsplangchnos, compassionate (I Pet. 3:8, ASV, tender hearted; RSV, a tender heart); polýsplangchnos, of great mercy (James 5:11 RSV mercy) referring to God.

PLAGUE (See Diseases)

PLAGUES OF EGYPT, ten in number, these were the means by which God induced Pharaoh to let the Israelites leave Egypt. A series chiefly of natural phenomena, unusual in their severity, in that all occur within one year, in their accurate timing, in that Goshen and its people are spared some of them, and in the evidence of God's control over them, overcame the opposition of Pharaoh, discredited the gods of Egypt (the Nile and the sun), and defiled their temples.

1. Water becomes blood (Exod. 7:14-25). When the Nile is at flood in June, its water turns red from soil brought down from Ethiopia, but is still fit to drink, nor do fish die. But when the river is at its lowest, in May, the water is sometimes red, not fit to drink, and fish die. The Egyptians had to dig wells, into which river water would filter through sand. God directed Moses to lift up his rod at the right time. Once the time was disclosed, the Egyptian magicians could do likewise.

2. Frogs (Exod. 8:1-15). When the flood waters recede, frogs spawn in the marshes, and invade the dry land. God directed Moses to lift up his rod at such a time. This sign the Egyptian magicians also claimed to produce.

3. Lice (Exod. 8:16-19). What insect is meant is uncertain; RSV has "gnats," ASV margin, "sandflies or fleas." So many biting, stinging pests abound in Egypt that people might not be discriminating in naming them. The magicians failed, by their own admission, to reproduce this plague, and recognized in it "the finger of God," but Pharaoh would not listen to them.

4. Flies (Exod. 8:20-31). The rod is no longer mentioned. Swarms of flies came over Egypt in unusual density, to feed on dead frogs. God directed Moses as to the time. The magicians no longer compete with Moses. Now there is a differentiation between Goshen and the rest of Egypt. The Israelites, with higher notions of cleanliness, may have disposed of the dead frogs in their territory. Pharaoh tentatively offers to let the people go to sacrifice to their God, only in the land of Egypt (8:25). Moses protests that their sacrifice will be an animal which the Egyptians think it improper to sacrifice, and insists that they must go three days' journey into the wilderness. Pharaoh assents, provided they do not go far, and the plague is stayed at the intercession of Moses. The plague removed, Pharaoh again refuses to let the people go.

5. The plague (RSV) of murrain (KJV) upon cattle (Exod. 9:1-7). This is announced with a set time (tomorrow) for its occurrence. There is no record of its removal: presumably it wore itself out. The perhaps better cared for Israelite cattle are spared: evidence of God's favor and power.

6. Boils (KJV), blains (ASV) or sores (RSV) upon man and beast (Exod. 9:8-12). Moses was told to take ashes (ASV soot) from the furnace (RSV kiln) and sprinkle it in the air. Whether a symbolic act or the physical cause, the air over Egypt was filled with dust, and it became boils breaking out on man and beast. The magicians, still watching Moses, could not stand because of the boils. From the specific mention that the plague was upon "all the Egyptians" we may infer that the Israelites were not attacked. This plague was not recalled: presumably it wore itself out.

7. Hail (Exod. 9:13-35). God directs Moses to stretch forth his hand, and hail (which rarely occurs in Egypt) will descend in unusual violence. Egyptians who feared the word of the Lord — and after such displays of power there may have been many such —brought their cattle in out of the coming storm: those who did not, lost them to the violent hail. Only in Goshen there was no hail. The hand of God directed its local incidence. The season must have been January or February, for the flax was in the ear and the barley in bud (RSV) or in bloom (ASV: 9:31,32).

8. Locusts (Exod. 10:1-20). After seven plagues, even a frequently recurring one, such as locusts, is so dreaded that Pharaoh's servants use bold language in advising that the Israelites be let go (10:7). Goshen is not spared this visitation. Still Pharaoh is obdurate.

9. Darkness (Exod. 10:21-29). A sand storm, accentuated by the dust-bowl condition of the land, and borne on the west wind which drove off the locusts, brought a tawny, choking darkness. The patience of God is at an end: Pharaoh will see the face of Moses no more. Three days the darkness lasted, but the children of Israel had light in their dwellings.

10. Death of the first-born (Exod. 11:1-12:36). This final and convincing demonstration of God's power broke down the resistance of Pharaoh long enough for the Israelites to escape. The Israelites are directed how to protect their first-born with the blood of the passover lamb, that they may not be slain along with those of the Egyptians. They "borrow" valuables of the Egyptians, and amid the lamentations of the latter are allowed to leave. Egypt has had enough. Even if the deaths were due to bubonic plague, as many think, the incidence upon the first-born alone is not thereby explained. Bubonic plague is said to take the strongest, but the first-born would not include all these. The character of this plague is clearly that of divine judgment upon incurable obstinacy.

The memory of the plagues was cultivated as a warning to Israel in later centuries (Ps. 78:43-51; 105:26:36; 135:8,9; Acts 7:36; 13:17; Heb. 11:28). E.R.

PLAIN. 1. Heb. 'āvēl, meadow (Judg. 11:33, see ASV margin).

2. Heb. 'ēlôn, terebinth (Gen. 13:8, etc.), ASV oak; ASV margin and RSV terebinth.

3. Heb. biq'âh, broad valley, plain (Gen. 11:2, etc., ASV, RSV valley; in Ezek. 3:22; Amos 1:5).

4. Heb. kikkār, a round thing; the plain of Jordan (Gen. 13:10-12, etc., RSV valley); the valley of Jericho (Deut. 34:3); the plain (Neh. 3:22 ASV margin, circuit); the plain around Jerusalem (Neh. 12:28 ASV margin, RSV circuit).

5. Heb. mîshôr, a level place; the tableland (so ASV margin, RSV) E of Jordan (Deut. 3:10, etc.); a plain as opposed to the hills (I Kings 20:23); tableland (ASV) as distinguished from the low country or Shephelah (II Chron. 26:10); a plain path (Ps. 27:11 RSV level); plain (Jer. 21:13; 48:8,21 RSV tableland; Zech. 4:7).

6. Heb. 'ărāvāh, desert-plain, steppe; of Moab (Num. 22:1, etc.); of Jordan near Jericho (Num. 31:12, etc.); the Arabah, the deep valley from the upper Jordan to the Persian Gulf (Deut. 1:1, etc.). By another reading of the text, ASV, RSV have "fords" in II Samuel 15:28; 17:16.

7. Heb. shephēlâh, lowland; usually the strip W of the mountains of Judea, ASV lowland, RSV Shephelah (I Chron. 27:28, etc.).

8. Greek tópos pedinós, a level, flat place (Luke 6:17 ASV, RSV a level place) which may have been on a mountain (Matt. 5:1) or elsewhere.

9. An adjective and adverb. Heb. nākôah (Prov. 8:9 RSV straight). Heb. tām (Gen. 25:27 ASV quiet, margin, harmless, Heb. perfect; RSV quiet): Jacob conformed. Gr. órthos, straight, correct (Mark 7:35 RSV plainly).

10. As verb. Heb. bā'ar (Hab. 2:2). Heb. shavâh (Isa. 28:25 ASV, RSV leveled). Heb. sālal (Prov. 15:19 ASV, a highway; RSV a level highway).

PLANE TREE (See Plants)

PLANTS OF THE BIBLE. The problems confronting the student of the plants of the Bible have long been perplexing ones. Even though difficult, however, few studies hold more fascination for the interested person. Only recently has the correct translation of many of the plants of the Testaments been accomplished. This critical analysis by botanical authorities has cleared away much of the earlier confused interpretation of the plant names included in such categories, for example, as spices, gums, incenses, brambles, and thorns.

Many names of plants growing in the Holy Land during Bible times present little or no difficulty for the translator, for they clearly refer to the plants or the close relatives of the plants that are growing now in our own temperate regions. The almond is an example of this. Others, however, still elude the systematist, their origins lost in antiquity.

Algum Tree, Juniperus excelsa Bieb (ăl'gŭm, Heb. 'algûmmîm), now known as Grecian juniper, it reaches a height of 65 feet and is pyramidal in shape. It is abundant in the mountains of Lebanon and Gilead. The wood was eminently suitable for King Solomon's Temple (II Chron. 2:3,4,7-9).

Almond, Amygdalus communis L. (ă'mŭnd, Heb. shākedh, to watch for), belongs to the peach family and blooms very early; its pink blossoms appear before the leaves. It blooms prematurely when budded branches are placed in water in a warm place. The Israelites adopted the almond flowers with their sepals and petals (knops and flowers, Exod. 25:33-36) for the ornamentation of the cups of the golden candlesticks.

Almug Tree, Pterocarpus santalinus L. F. (ăl'-mŭg, Heb. 'almûggîm, wrought wood), a tree providing a sweet-scented timber which is black outside and inside a ruby red. It is a native of India and takes a high polish. It is known as red sandalwood. The wood is strong and so antiseptic that it is insecticidal. King Solomon's builders undoubtedly deliberately selected the wood of the almug tree for the pillars of the temple because of its specific qualities of strength, beauty, and long life (I Kings 10:11,12).

Aloes (OT), Aquilaria agallocha Roxb (ăl'ōz, Heb. 'ăhālîm, aloes), a large and spreading tree known as eagle wood or lign aloes. The inner wood of the tree, particularly when in a state of partial decay, is fragrant (Ps. 45:8).

Aloes (NT), Aloe succatrina Lam (ăl'ōz, Gr. alóe), a member of the lily family, this plant has a cluster of thick fleshy basal leaves which contain aloin, a substance which, dissolved in water and added to myrrh, was used by the ancients in their highly perfected art of embalming (John 19: 38-40).

Amomum (Gr. ámomum), an odoriferous plant or seed used in preparing precious ointment (Rev. 18:13, not found in KJV). The exact species is not known. It grew in Armenia, Media, and Pontus, with seeds in clusters like grapes (Pliny, Hist. Nat. 12.28).

Anise, Anethum graveolens L. (ăn'ĭs, Gr. ánethon, dill), an annual, weedy umbellifer which grows like parsley and fennel. Wrongly translated anise, this plant was cultivated for its aromatic seeds, which records tell us were subject to tithe (Matt. 23:23).

Apple, Prunus armeniaca L. (ăp'l, Heb. tappûah). Much discussion has taken place over the "forbidden" fruit of the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3: 3-13) as well as the true botanical nature of the "apple" in the numerous other references. The western "apple" did not thrive on the soils of ancient Palestine. Modern writers seem to concur in the opinion that the apricot is the only fruit meeting all the requirements of context. The apricot tree is a shade tree nearly 30 feet in height. Its fruit is regarded second only to the peach; its perfume strong and revitalizing.

Apples of Sodom, mentioned by Josephus (BJ, IV, 8.4), but it is uncertain to what he refers.

Aspalathus, Convolvulus floridus L. F. (ăs-păl'ă'thŭs, Gr. aspálathos), a thorny, woody shrub bearing flowers similar to its morning glory-like relatives. Both the flowers and the wood are aromatic (Ecclesiasticus 24:15).

Balm (balsam), Commiphora opobalsamum Engl. (bām, Heb. tsŏrî, balsam), the gum or thickened juice from the balsam trees believed to be the true balm of Gilead indigenous to Arabia (Ezek. 27:17).

Balm, Balanites aegyptiaca (L) delile (bām, Gr. resin or gum, Heb. tsŏrî). The balm here recorded is the false balm of Gilead. It is the juice of a small tree growing in abundance around the Dead Sea. It was used as a healing salve (Jer. 51:8).

Barley, Hordeum distichon L. (bär'lē, Heb. se'ōrâh, long hair, Gr. krithé), a grain cultivated for man and beast from remotest antiquity. It is considered to be the most universally cultivated cereal. Barley bread was a staple food of the Hebrews and a symbol of poverty and scorn (Hos. 3:2). Barley corns were used by the Hebrews as a unit of measure.

Bay Tree (Green Bay Tree, q.v.)

Bdellium, Commiphora africana (Arn.) Engl. (dĕl'-ĭ-ŭm, Heb. bedhōlah), a tree that grew eastward of Persia. From its incised bark oozed a gum which when dry became transparent and wax-like and looked like a pearl (Num. 11:6,7).

Beans, Vicia faba L. (bēn, Heb. pôl, bean), the broad bean, extensively cultivated in Palestine. Dried ground beans were mixed in with grain flour to make bread (Ezek. 4:9). A staple article of diet for the poor of Palestine.

Bitter Herbs (Herbs, q.v.)

Box Tree, Buxux longifolia Baiss (Heb. te'ash-shûr, ashur wood), a hardy evergreen forest tree of Lebanon and northern hills of Palestine. Because of the hardness of its wood it was used to provide inlays for cabinet work (Isa. 41:19; 60:13).

Bramble, Rubus ulmifolius Scott (brăm'b'l, Heb. ātādh, bramble), a strong growing bushlike plant with long, arching, stout, prickly stems. It is the blackberry bush of the European countrysides (Judg. 9:14,15).

Brier, Ruscus aculeatus L. (brī'ēr, Heb. sillôn), a prickly plant that is painful. A member of the lily family this small, evergreen shrub bears leaves reduced to small scales which enclose leaf-like branches with sharp apexes (Ezek. 28:24).

Bulrush, Cyperus papyrus L. (bo͝ol'rŭsh, Heb. gōme'), a tall, slender reed-like plant which formerly grew prolifically in and along the banks of the lower Nile. Papyrus provided the earliest known material for the making of paper which gets its name from the plant (Exod. 2:3).

Bush (Burning Bush), Loranthus acaciae zucc. (bo͝osh, Heb. seneh), one of the many thorny acacias which in early times grew thickly over the Holy Land. When the berries of the mistletoe cover the bush, red, glowing, and transparent, they give the appearance of a burning bush (Ex. 3:2).

Camphire, Lawsonia inermis L. (kăm'fīr, Heb. cōpher), one of the earliest known of the spices and perfumes, and lauded by King Solomon for its beautiful fragrance. It is also the henna of the Arabs. The dried leaves of the henna crushed and made into a paste provide a violent yellow stain for the hair and beard. No relation to the camphor tree of Chinese origin. The camphire still luxuriates by the Dead Sea at Engedi (S. of Sol. 1:14).

Cassia, Cinnamomum cassia Blume (kăsh'ĭ-à, Heb. kiddâh), a fragrant tree resembling the cinnamon, though its bark is less delicate in taste and perfume. Its buds are used in place of cloves. The small leaves provide the medicine known as senna leaves (Exod. 30:22-25).

Cedar, Juniperus oxycedrus L. (sē'dēr, Heb. 'erez, meaning undetermined), the brown-berried cedar or juniper of the mountains. It was the cedar that was used for sacrificial duty in the temple and by the priests at the altar (Num. 19:1, 2,6).

Cedar of Lebanon, Cedrus libani Loud. (Heb. 'erez, derived from an old Arabic root meaning a firmly-rooted, strong tree), a magnificent evergreen often 120 feet high and 40 feet in girth. It exudes a fragrant gum or balsam. The wood does not quickly decay, nor is it eaten by insect larvae. It is of a warm red tone, solid and free from knots (Ezek. 31:3,5; Ps. 92:12).

Chestnut (plane tree), Platanus orientalis L. (chĕs'nŭt, Heb. 'armôn, peeling off, naked), a stately tree thriving along the streams and rivers of the Holy Land. Each year the bark peels off, leaving the trunk and older branches smooth and yellowish-white (Gen. 30:37).

Cinnamon, Cinnamomum zeylanicum Nees (sĭn'à-mŭn, Heb. qinnāmôn), a tree about 20 feet high with stiff, evergreen leaves, native of Ceylon. Commercial cinnamon is obtained from the inner bark. The branches, one inch thick, are cut when this bark peels easily. Quills are produced when the cleaned inner bark dries around a thin rod (Exod. 30:23).

Cockle, Agrostemma githago L. (kŏk'l, Heb. bo'shâh, stink), a sturdy noxious weed introducing itself into wheat and barley fields. The seeds are poisonous if ground with flour (Job 31:40).

Coriander, Coriandrum sativum L. (kō'rĭ-ăn-dēr, Heb. gadh). The seeds of this plant in the carrot family are the size of a peppercorn. They have a sharp though pleasant aroma. Common in the Holy Land, the seeds were used for culinary and medicinal purposes (Exod. 16:31).

Corn (Wheat, q.v.)

Cotton, Gossypium herbaceum L. (kŏ't'n, Heb. karpas). Like the hollyhock, cotton belongs to the mallow family. Only once is it mentioned in the Bible (Esth. 1:5,6 RSV). The clothing in which Egyptian mummies were wrapped was cotton fabric.

Cucumber, Cucumis sativus L. (kū'kŭm-bēr, Heb. qishshū'îm). The refreshing fruit of the cucumber vine was one delicacy the children of Israel constantly desired after leaving Egypt. It grew best along the banks of the Nile. Isaiah 1:8 records: "The daugher of Zion is left . . . as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, as a besieged city." The lodge, a hut of four poles and walls of woven boughs, housed the watchman. In Hebrew a garden of cucumbers is miqshâh.

Cummin, Cuminum cyminum L. (kŭ'mĭn, Heb. cammōn). This plant is not found wild. It is the only species of its genus, and western Asia is its home. Its aromatic seeds are crushed and mixed with bread and added to the meat pot. The small tender seeds are harvested with a rod; if threshed otherwise, they would be ruined (Isa. 28:26,27).

Cypress, Cupressus sempervirens var. horizontalis (Mill) Gord (sī'prĕs, Heb. tirzâh), the true cypress with its hard, durable, reddish-hued wood. Authorities accept the statement that cypress wood was used to construct the ark (Isa. 44:14).

Desire (caper) Capparis spinosa L. (dē-zīr, Heb. tapher). This plant provided a much-needed appetite stimulant for the aging. It is the young pickled buds that give the "desire" of relish to the food. The fruit is inedible (Eccl. 12:5).

This great, venerable cedar of Lebanon is known as "God's Cedar." © MPS

Dove's Dung (Star of Bethlehem), Ornithogalum umbellatum L. (dŏ'vz dŭng, Heb. divyônîm), the bulb of the spring-blooming Star of Bethlehem. Dug up and dried, it can be eaten roasted or ground to flour and mixed with meal to make bread (II Kings 6:25).

Ebony, Diospyros ebenaster Retz (ĕb'ŭn-ē, Heb. hovnîm, ebony), a wood mentioned once in the Bible (Ezek. 27:15). It is hard, heavy and durable, and will take a glistening polish. This black heartwood of certain trees native to Ceylon and southern India, has long been used with native ivory to make inlaid objects.

Eelgrass, Zostera marina L. (ēēl'grăs, Heb. sûph, weeds), the marine eelgrass of tidal waters. It may grow out to a depth of 35 feet in the sea itself. Its three- to four-foot-long slimy, ribbon-like leaves lie in submerged masses, a menace to the offshore diver who may become fouled in their coils (Jonah 2:5).

Elm (Turpentine Tree, q.v.)

Flag (Exod. 2:3,5; Bulrush, q.v. see; Job 8:11; Isa. 19:6, Rush, q.v.).

Fig, Fiscus carica L. (fĭg, Heb. te'ēnâh, to spread out), the first of the fruits to be recorded in the Bible (Gen. 3:6,7). It is a good shade tree (I Kings 4:25). The fruit often appears before the leaves. "Cakes of figs" and strings of dried figs were for eating when traveling (I Sam. 25:18).

Fir, Pius halepensis Mill. (fûr, Heb. berôsh). Translated "pine" by botanical authorities, the fir tree was an emblem of nobility and great stature. The largest of the pines on Mount Lebanon was the Aleppo Pine. Throughout the crusades there was an entire forest of these pines between Jerusalem and Bethlehem (Isa. 60:13,14).

Fitches, Nigella sativa L. (fĭch'ĕz, Heb. ketsah), or vetches, belong to the bean family, while the "fitches" of Isaiah 28:25-27 belong to the buttercup family and are called the "nutmeg flower" (unrelated to the cultivated nutmeg). Both cummin and nutmeg flower seeds are still harvested and threshed in the Holy Land as described by Isaiah. Its tiny, hot, and easily-removed seeds are sprinkled on food like pepper.

Flax, Linum usitatissimum (flăks, Heb. pishtâh), the plant used to make linen. The fibers from the stem of the plant are the most ancient of all textile fibers. Flax supplied the linen thread for the swaddling clothes of the infant Jesus, as well as in His burial wrappings (Luke 23:50,52,53).

Frankincense, Boswellia thurifera Roxb. (frăngk'ĭn-sĕns, Heb. levônâh), a clear yellow resin that exudes from the incisions made in the bark of the frankincense tree and hardens into small yellow tears. The tree is native of northern India and Arabia (Matt. 2:10,11).

Galbanum, Ferula galbaniflua (găl'bà-nŭm, Heb. helbenâh), a gum resin excreted from the incised lower part of the stem of any one of the nine species of this genus Ferula growing as stout herbaceous perennials in the Holy Land. When the hardened tears of this resin are burned, the odor is pungent and pleasant (Exod. 30:34-36).

Gall, Papaver somniferum (gôl, Heb. rō'sh), the juice of the opium poppy. Opium is the dried juice that exudes from the incised capsules of the opium poppy. It induces a sleep so heavy that the person becomes insensible. The juice of this poppy was added to vinegar and offered to Jesus (Matt. 27:34).

Garlick, Allium sativum L. (gär'lĭk, Heb. shûm), one of the staple foods and an ingredient of many medicines. This bulbous plant grew in great abundance in Egypt. Small bulblets known as cloves of garlic grow around the main bulb. Numbers 11:5 is the only verse in the Bible mentioning the vegetables that were constantly missed by the Israelites during their journey toward the Promised Land.

Gourd, Ricinus communis L. (gôrd, Heb. qîqāyôn, nauseous to the taste), a large bush ten feet high with broad leaves. This is our castor bean. Castor oil is pressed from its seeds. This oil was not used medicinally by the Hebrews but as fuel for lamps and in their ceremonial rites. All true gourds are indigenous to tropical America so could not have been known in Palestine in Biblical times (Jonah 4:5-7).

Gourd (Wild Gourds, q.v.)

Grape (Vine, q.v.)

Green Bay Tree, Laurus nobilis L. (bā, Heb. 'zrāh), a tree symbolic of wealth and wickedness (Ps. 37:35,36). The tree resembles a shrub, the young shoots sprouting from the ground around the parent stem. A perfumed oil is expressed from its evergreen leaves.

Hemlock, Conium malculatum L. (hĕm'lŏk, Heb. rō'sh), a tall and poisonous herbaceous plant which when injured emits a disagreeable odor. All parts of it, particularly the seeds, contain an oily substance known as caria. If taken internally by humans this irritant causes paralysis, convulsions and even death (Hos. 10:4).

Herbs, Bitter Herbs (ûrbs). Endive (Cichorium endiva L.), Common Chicory (Cichorium intybus L.), Garden Lettuce (Sactuca sativa L.), Water Cress (Nasturtium officinale R. Br.), Sorrel (Rumex acetosella var. multifidus (L.) P. D. C. and Lam.), and Dandelion (Taraxacum officinale), Heb. merōrîm, bitter herbs. These are the bitter herbs gathered fresh and eaten as a salad at the time of the Passover (Exod. 12:8; Num. 9:11).

Hyssop (NT), Sorghum vulgare var. durra (Forsk) Dinsm. (hĭs'ŭp, Lat. hyssopus), a sorghum cane reaching a height of over six feet. The seed is ground for meal and is known in Palestine as "Jerusalem corn." This is thought to be the hyssop of John 19:28,29. The "parched corn" received by Ruth from Boaz may have been the grain from this sorghum (Ruth 2:14).

Hyssop (OT), Origanum maru var. aegypticum (L.) Dismn. (Heb. 'ēzôv), the Egyptian marjoram, a member of the mint family. The hairy stem of the much-branched inflorescence holds water very well, a characteristic identifying it with its place in the Passover rites (Exod. 12:21,22).

Juniper, Retama raetam (Forsk.) Webb. and Berth (jōō'nĭ-pĕr, Heb. rōthem, to bind), a plant wholly unrelated to the true juniper (Juniperus). A member of the pea family, the "flowering broom" as it is called, is a desert shrub. For centuries it has furnished shade for flocks and man and fuel for his fire (I Kings 19:3,4).

Leeks, Alium porrum L. (lēk, Heb. hātsîr), a robust bulbous plant of the lily family with rather succulent, broad leaves the bases of which are edible. The much desired small bulbs growing above ground are used in seasoning (Num. 11:5).

Lentil, Lens esculenta Moench. (lĕn'tĭl, Heb. 'ădhāshîm, to tend a flock), a small trailing member of the pea family. Its seeds are used as a meal when dried and ground. When soaked and cooked, they made a nourishing meal known as "pottage" (Gen. 25:29,30,34).

Lilies (of the field), Anemone Coronaria L. (lĭl'ĕz, Gr. krínon), the plant of Luke 12:27. It is thought to be the anemone or windflower. Blooming from a bulb after the spring rains, its colorful blossoms carpet the plains and roadsides.

Lily, Lilium Chalcedonicum L. (lĭlē, Heb. shôshān), a true lily, its flowers a glowing red, the chalcedonicum lily grew in King Solomon's garden. It was a symbol of loveliness (S. of Sol. 5:13).

Lily (Water Lily, q.v.)

Locusts, Ceratonia Siliqua L. (lō'kŭst, Gr. kerátion), the fruit of the carob tree; accepted in the East as the food eaten by John the Baptist. It is known as St. John's bread. A member of the pea family, the carob tree produces peas in which the seeds are embedded in a flavorful, sweet and nutrious pulp (Matt. 3:4). Doubtless the pods of the carob (locust tree) were the "Husks" eaten by the prodigal son in Jesus' parable (Luke 15:16).

Mallows, Atriplex halimus L. (măl'ō, Heb. mallûah, salty tasting plant), most likely a species of salt bush or salt wort known as "sea purslane"; a robust bushy shrub related to spinach. Because of the implied saltiness from the Hebrew most authorities agree that these were not true mallows. It was a food of the poor (Job 30:1,3,4).

Mandrake, Mandragora offinarum L. (măn'drāk, Heb. dûdhay), a member of the potato family, the mandrake is also called "love-apple." The "apples," although insipid tasting and slightly poisonous, are much desired as an edible fruit. The mandrake root is large, sometimes resembling the human body in shape. It was used as a charm against the evil spirits and, as indicated by the story of Rachel and Leah, was credited with aphrodisiac qualities (Gen. 30:14-16).

Melon, (Watermelon), Citrullus vulgaris Schrad. (mĕl'ŭn, Heb. 'ăvattihîm). Cultivated in Egypt since before recorded history, the fruits weighed as much as 50 pounds. Being abundant during the growing season, they were used by rich and poor alike for food, drink and medicine. The seeds were eaten after roasting. Some authorities believe that the reference to "melons" in Numbers 11:5 includes both watermelons and muskmelons, although the former had their origin in Africa and the latter in Asia.

Carob pods (locusts, or husks), known as St. John's Bread.

Millet (See Pannag)

Mint (Horse Mint or larger garden mint), Mentha Longifolia L. Huds. (mĭnt, Gr. hedýosmon). This pungent garden mint with the sharp-scented pennyroyal, and the refreshing peppermint added much to making the meat dishes of the Jews more palatable. These three varieties of mint grow in Palestine and are classified as lesser herbs. They are mentioned only in Matthew and Luke (Luke 11:42). All have medicinal value.

Mulberry Tree (mŭl'bĕr'ĭ, Heb. bekhā'îm). The Heb. word is the name of a tree (II Sam. 5:23,24; I Chron. 14:14,15) which cannot be identified.

Mustard, Brassica nigra L. W. Koch (mŭs'tĕrd, Gr. sínapi). A thick stemmed plant, under good conditions often growing higher than a man can reach. The field mustard was an important economic plant of the Holy Land. The leaves were used as "greens" and the seeds were either powdered or made into paste. The larger plants were the favorite haunts of the smaller birds (Matt. 13:31,32).

Myrrh (NT), Commiphora myrrha (Nees) Engl. (mûr, Heb. mōr), one of the most valuable of the gum resins. Either naturally or when the stems are injured, the gum oozes from the shrub-like tree. The pale yellow liquid gradually solidifies and turns dark red or even black. This aromatic gum was sold as a spice or medicine (Matt. 2:11; John 19:39,40).

Myrrh (OT), Cistus creticus L. (mûr, Heb. lōt), a small shrub known as the rockrose or "lot plant" which grows in rocks and sand in Palestine. It produces the perfumed gum which has been mistranslated "myrrh" in parts of the OT (Gen. 37:25,26,27). Not the true myrrh of the NT, q.v.

Myrtle, Myrtus comminis L. (mûr't'l, Heb. hādhas, sweetness), a large evergreen shrub with fragrant flowers and spicy-sweet scented leaves. All parts of the plant are somewhat perfumed. It has been used as a symbol of beauty and sweetness (Isa. 55:13). Out of its leafy twigs were made wreaths of acclaim and its boughs adorned the booths of the ancients at feast time (Zech. 1:7,8).

Nettle, Acanthus spinosus L. (nĕt''l, Heb. hārûl), a bushy plant of great size (Job 30:7) and of rapid growth. The acanthus grew as a common weed throughout the Holy Land (Zep. 2:9). Its leaf was carved in stone and became the basis of early Greek and Roman ornamental decoration.

Nuts (Walnut), Juglans regia L. (Heb. ĕghôz), our "English walnut," sometimes called Persian walnut. It is a native of Iran. Dye is obtained from the leaves and husk that covers the nut. The nuts are eaten, pressed to obtain a table oil or formed into oil cakes for the cattle. In Biblical times as now many gatherings were held under the spreading, shading branches of this beautiful tree (S. of Sol. 6:10,11).

Nuts (Pistachio), Pistacia vera L. (Heb. bōtnîm). Carried by Jacob's sons to Egypt, this nut known as the green almond has been in cultivation in the Holy Land for nearly 4,000 years. The nuts are borne in clusters. They are oval, containing two green edible halves covered by a reddish outer shell (Gen. 43:11).

Oak (Holly Oak), Quercus ilex L. (Heb. 'allôn), a magnificent, long-lived tree growing usually alone and on high ground. Its leaves are holly-like; glossy green and spiny on the edges. The oak is the religious symbol of strength and long life (Gen. 35:8).

The Mustard Tree. © MPS

Oak (Valonia Oak), Quercus aegllops L. (Heb. allôn), one of the six species of oaks found in Palestine, the Valonia oak is not an evergreen. It grows in forests stands on the hillsides above the fertile valleys in Bashan. A black dye of commercial value is obtained from the acorn cups. The acorns are fed to the swine. Its insect galls contain allic acid and tannin from which ink is made (Zech. 11:2).

Oil Tree, Elaeagnus angustifolia L. (Heb. 'ets shemen). Sometimes called "Jerusalem willow" or "Oleaster," this tree produces a fruit like a small olive from which may be pressed an inferior grade of medical oil. The fruits are edible but slightly bitter (Isa. 41:19).

Frankincense and Myrrh.

Olive, Olea europaea L. (ŏl'ĭv, Heb. zayith), an evergreen tree, the true olive. One tree could supply a family with fats. It flourishes only near the sea and under cultivation. The olives were beaten down with poles when ripe (black) and crushed by an upright stone wheel. The oil thus obtained was stored in vats. Oil for the temple lights was expressed specifically for that purpose (Exod. 27:20). Heated in lye to remove the bitter principle and soaked in brine, green olives were eaten with coarse brown bread (Hos. 14:6).

Onion, Allium cepa L. (ŭn'yŭn, Heb. betsel), a bulbous plant mentioned only in Numbers 11:5. Both the inflated leaves and the bulbous underground base of this plant were universally used as food and have been cultivated since time immemorial.

Onycha, Cistus ladaniferus L. (ŏn'ĭ-kà, Heb. shehēleth), a rock rose like the OT Myrrh, q.v. It produces the gum known as labdanum. Late in the year this resin exudes from stems and leaves. It is spicy-aromatic and fragrant (Exod. 30:34,35, 36).

Palm (Date), Phoenix dactylifera L. (pām, Heb. tāmār), a tree with a single trunk. The crown of the date palm may be 100 feet above the ground. Its cultivation goes back at least 5,000 years. The fruit hangs in clusters below the leaves. A single inflorescence may have as many as 10,000 flowers. The leaves are woven into mats and the fibers provide thread and rigging for boats. The sap, after fermentation, becomes a liquor or vinegar (Num. 33:19).

Pannag (Millet), Panicum miliaceum L. (Heb. pannagh), a millet used to make a good grade of flour, its seeds being hard and white. One stalk may carry a thousand grains. The common people ate a mixture of wheat, barley, beans, lentils and pannag moistened with camel's milk and oil (Ezek. 4:9 and 27:17).

Parched Corn (Wheat, q.v.)

Pine Tree, Abies cilicica L. (Heb. tidhhār), the pine mentioned in Isaiah 60:1. It is the Cilician fir. (The fir is the pine; see FIR). This is a tall tree with wood that is easy to cut and tool.

Plane Tree (Chestnut, q.v.)

Pomegranate, Punica granatum L. (pŏm'grăn-ĭt, Heb. rimmôn, apple with grains), one of the trees grown in the hanging Gardens of Babylon. Its hard, thin-rinded, apple-shaped fruits contain many seeds, each in a pulp sack filled with a tangy, sweet amethyst-colored juice. Although a low shrub or small tree, giving little shade, its refreshing fruit more than compensated the tired traveler who rested under it (I Sam. 14:2). The pomegranate was used as a decorative model in building (I Kings 7:18,20) and in textile designs (Exod. 28:31,33, 34).

Poplar, Populus Alba L. (pŏp'lêr, Heb. livneh), a tall straight tree that sends out long shoots when young. It grows in the hills of Palestine. Young, fast-growing trees, growing from root buds are found in abundance about older "mother" trees.

Pulse (II Sam. 17:28, pŭls, Heb. qālî and Dan. 1:12,16; Heb. zēr'ōnîm). There is as yet no satisfactory identification of these Hebrew terms as they relate to our word pulse. Beans and lentils, both or either one probably were used as part of the ingredients of "pulse."

Reed, Phragmites communis Trin. (rēd, Heb. 'āghām, flowing together like water), the plumed hollow-stemmed water plant found in the Holy Land by the sides of rivers and in standing waters (Job 40:21). It grows in clumps, its stalks reaching 12 feet in height. Reed pens were made from the canes.

Rie, Rye (Spelt), Triticum aestivum var spilta L. L. H. Bailey (rī, Heb. kussemeth), probably the "rie" of Exodus 9:32. It grows taller than wheat, yet will survive where other grasses will not thrive. Isaiah 28:24,25,26 makes it plain that the farmers of Israel knew of the ability of this grain to grow under adverse conditions.

Rolling Thing (Rose of Jericho), Anistatica hierochuntica L. (Heb. galgal), the "rolling thing" of Isaiah 17:13 and the "wheel" of Psalm 83:13. In all probability these refer to the Palestinian tumbleweed, long known as the "holy resurrection flower." A member of the mustard family, the six inch-long stems of this annual lie in a circle flat on the ground until the seeds are mature; then the stems become dry and incurved, forming a globe. The wind finally breaks the dry tap root at ground level, rolling the plant over and over. Finally coming to rest, with the help of the rains, roots appear, the stems unroll and new shoots with leaves and flowers soon appear.

Rose (Narcissus), Narcissus tazetta L. (Heb. hăvatstseleth), a bulbous-rooted plant, most likely the yellow narcissus that grows wild and in abundance on the plain of Sharon. The "rose" of Isaiah 35:1.

Rose of Sharon, Tulipa sharonensis Dinms. (Heb. hăvatstseleth). A literal translation of the Hebrew word hăvatstseleth indicates a bulbous plant instead of a woody vine or shrub belonging to the genus Rosa. Botanists have concluded that the Sharon tulip found on sandy soil on the Sharon coastal plain is the "Rose of Sharon" of our Song of Solomon (S. of Sol. 2:1,2).

Rue, Ruta graveolens L. (rōō, Gr. péganon), mentioned only once in the Bible (Luke 11:42). Of the four varieties grown, the species graveolens, meaning "strong smelling," is the most common. It was relished for its peculiar though strong taste and was useful in cookery and medicine.

Rush (Flag), Juncus effusus L. (rŭsh, Heb. 'aghmôn), known as the common soft or bog rush. There are 20 varieties of this grasslike plant growing in and along the water courses of Palestine. The Egyptian bulrush (Exod. 2:3) according to most commentators is cyperus papyrus; however, regarding the "rush," "reed," and "flag" referred to in other portions of the OT (Job 8:11; Isa. 9:14; 9:6-15; 35:7), there is still much disagreement. All are related ecologically if not taxonomically.

Saffron, Crocus sativus L. (săˈfrŭn, Heb. karkōm), the stigmas of the autumn crocus, highly valued for their aromatic odor and their vivid orange dye used in food coloring. The plant grows from a bulb (S. of Sol. 4:14).

Scarlet, Chermes ilicis on quercus coccifers L. (skârˈlĕt, Heb. shānî), a lasting and rich scarlet dye produced by the Kermes insect (Chermes ilicis) which breeds in the soft down on the twigs of the Oak tree quercus Coccifera. This dye was used for the scarlet and crimson coloring of wool and linen thread in Bible times (II Chron. 3:14; Jer. 4:30; Heb. 9:19; Rev. 18:12).

The shittah tree, or acacia, the source of the oft-mentioned shittim wood of the Bible, from which the Ark of the Tabernacle was built. © MPS

Shittah Tree, Acacia seya L. Delile (shĭt'ä, Heb. shittâh), a gnarled, rough-barked, thorny tree of the pea family. The acacia or shittah tree of Isaiah 41:18 is mentioned only this once in the Bible, but its wood (shittim) is referred to many times. Shittim wood is insect repellent; a very beautiful close-grained wood, orange when cut, turning darker with age. It was used to fashion the Ark of the Tabernacle (Exod. 25:10). The shittah tree yields gum arabic and gum senegal.

Spicery (Spices, q.v.)

Spices, Astragalus tragacantha L. (spīs, Heb. nekhō'th). The word "spices" of II Chronicles 9:1 is an inaccurate translation of the word for thorny astragal or necath of the Bible. Its naturally-exuded gum is the gum tragacanth of commerce (Gen. 43:11; II Kings 20:13; Isa. 39:2; S. of Sol. 4:10, 14; 5:1,13; 6:2; 8:2,14).

Spikenard, Nardostachys (Wall.) P. D.C. jatamansi (spīk nērd, Heb. nērd). The rose-red, fragrant ointment made from the dried roots and woolly stems of the spikenard plant was a favorite perfume of the ancients. A precious ointment (Mark 14:3), it was and still is transported in an alabaster box to preserve its fragrance. Because it had to be imported from northern India, it was extremely yet understandably costly.

Stacte (Storax), Styrax officinalis L. (stăk'tē, Heb. nātāph, a liquid drop), a highly-perfumed gum resin that exudes from the incised bark of the storax tree, used in Biblical days as a component of the perfume formulated for use in the Holy Place (Exod. 30:34).

Strange Vine (Vine, q.v.)

Sweet Cane (Sugar Cane), saccharum officinarum L. (Heb. qāneh), a stout perennial resembling Indian corn, but growing to a height of 15 feet. The juice of the sweet cane mentioned in Isaiah 43:24, although not used at that time for sugar-making, was highly esteemed for sweetening foods and drinks and the pithy sweet stalks for chewing.

Sweet Cane (calamus, sweet calamus), Andropogon aromaticus Roxb. (Heb. qāneh hattōv, the good cane), the ginger-grass from northwestern and central India. It is called this because its bruised leaves give off a strong, spicy, aromatic scent and their pungent taste is like ginger (Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:19).

Sycamine, Morus nigra L. (sĭk'ä-mĭn, Gr. sykáminos), the black mulberry tree. Botanists consider the leaves of this tree inferior to those of Morus alba the white mulberry as a food for the silk worms. It is, however, cultivated throughout Palestine for its delectable fruit (Luke 17:6).

Sycamore, Ficus Sycomorus (sĭk'ämôr, Heb. shiqmâh), the sycamore fig tree. A tree bearing fruit, like the ordinary fig, directly on the stem, but being of inferior quality. The wood is most durable (Amos 7:14; Luke 19:1,2,3,4).

Tares, Lolium temulentum L. (târz, Gr. zizánion), the annual bearded darnel or rye grass that flourishes in wheat fields. It is difficult to tell it from wheat or rye until it heads. After harvest the wheat is fanned, then put through a sieve. The smaller darnel seeds left after fanning pass through the sieve leaving the wheat behind. The darnel is host to an ergot-like smut fungus which infects the seeds. The fungus is a serious poison if eaten by animals or man (Matt. 13:25).

Teil (Turpentine Tree, q.v.)

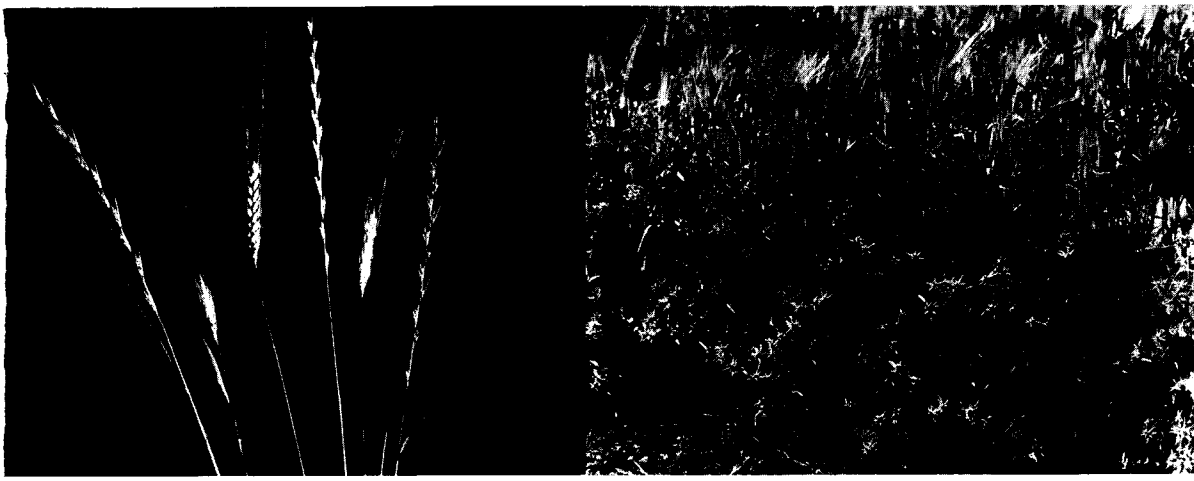
Thistles, Silybum marianum L. Gaerth. (thĭs''l, Heb. dardar, Gr. tríbolos), a prickly plant. There is rather uniform agreement that most of the references to "thistles" and "thorns" in both the Old and New Testaments are generic in character (II Kings 14:9; II Chron. 25:18; Hos. 10:8; Matt. 7:16; 13:7; Heb. 6:8). Of the many thistles that grow in the Holy Land the Silybum or Mary's thistle and the true star-thistle centaurea calcitrapa L. are the commonest. Producing seeds in great numbers which are freely disseminated, the thistles are found in every part of Palestine.

Thorns (Crown of Thorns), Paliurus spina-christi Mill. (thôrn, Gr. akántha), the Christ-thorn. A straggling shrub growing from three to nine feet in height. Its pliable branches with their uneven stiff thorns (the longer ones straight and the shorter recurved) lent themselves to the platting of the "crown" or "wreath" made by the soldiers (Mark 15:17).



"The tares and the wheat." "Some seed fell among thorns." © MPS

Thorns, Zizyphus spina-christi L. (Gr. akántha), one of numerous and different spiny plants included under this generic term thorn. Zizyphus, above (Isa. 7:19 and 53:13; Matt. 7:16) and Rhamnus palastine Boiss., the Palestine Buckthorn, (Gen. 3:18; Prov. 15:19; Isa. 33:12; Ps. 58:9 and Hos. 2:6) are the two "thorny" shrubs most widespread and well-known in Biblical times in Palestine. Both were planted as hedges and the latter used as fire wood under the meat pots.

Thyine Wood, Tetraclinis articulata (Vahl) Masers (thī'ĭn, Gr. thýinos), a small, slow-growing evergreen tree related to our arbor-vitae. A priceless commodity, thyine wood, mentioned only once in the Bible (Rev. 18:12), is rich in color, fine-grained, taking a high polish and almost indestructible. The tree, commonly said to be "worth its weight in gold," yields a resin known as "sandarac" which is used in making varnish and as an incense.

Turpentine Tree (Teil Tree), Pistacia terebinthus var. palaestina (Boiss.) Post. (tûr'pĕn-tīn, Heb. 'ēlâh, strong), a thick-trunked, spreading tree of the hot, dry places. It usually grows as a solitary tree and casts a dense, cooling shade. When the bark is cut, a perfumed oily resin flows out. This is the cyprus turpentine of commerce (Isa. 6:13).

Vine (true), Vitis vinifera L. (Heb. gephen), the first plant to be recorded as cultivated in Biblical history. The grape, its origin lost in antiquity, grew first on the ground, over walls or on crude supports. Later it was trained on a trellis, and finally cultivated in vineyards. It was a symbol of fruitfulness and its harvesting a time of joyous festivity (Gen. 40:9-11; Deut. 8:8; Ps. 105:33; Zech. 3:10).

Vine (Strange Vine, Wild Grapes) (Isa. 5:2-4; Jer. 2:21). These two references seem to call for a plant that is closely related to the true vine in appearance in order to deceive the owner of the vineyard. A "wild" or unselected strain of the cultivated grape would be such a plant.

Vine (Wild Vine, Vine of Sodom, q.v.)

Vine of Sodom (Heb. gephen sedhôm, Deut. 32:23). It is uncertain what plant is intended.

Water Lily, Nymphaea caerulea Sav. (Heb. shôshān), a blue-flowered lily with floating leaf pads. Its seeds and rootstock are edible. The flowers served as a pattern in ornamental design (I Kings 7:19,22,26).

Weeds (Eelgrass, q.v.)

Wheat, Triticum compositum L. (Heb. hittâh), the most common cereal grain. This is the wheat of Joseph's time which bore seven ears in one stalk (Gen. 41:22). Wheat was planted in the winter by the Hebrews. Today as in the time of Jesus, certain varieties of wheat may yield 60 or even 100 grains to a head (Matt. 13:3-8). The heads roasted over fire constituted the parched corn of the OT (Lev. 23:14; Ruth 2:14; I Sam. 17:17 and 25:18).

Wild Gourd, Citrullus colocynthis Schrad. (gôrd, Heb. paqqū'ōth-sādheh, to burst), a vine resembling the cucumber, running wild over large areas in the Holy Land. When the orange-sized fruit is ripe, it bursts. The dry, powdery pulp is highly inflammable. The powdered pulp, when used as a medicine is a violent purgative (II Kings 4:38-40).

Willow (Aspen), Populus euphratica Oliv. (ăs'pĕn, Heb. 'ărābhîm), the "willows" in Psalm 137:2. The trees inhabit the river and stream banks from Syria to Palestine, and especially the Jordan valley. They are now quite generally considered to be the Euphrates aspens. Their most interesting characteristic is their leaves; attached obliquely to the twigs by a flattened, weak petiole, they continually sway back and forth like "weeping and wailing women."

Willow, Salix alba L. (wĭl ō, Heb. 'ărābhîm), a fast-growing tree found in moist places and on the margins of rivers and shallow streams. The "green withs" of Judges 16:7-9 and the "willows" of Job 40:22; Isaiah 15:7; 44:4 and Ezekiel 17:5 are generally thought by authorities to belong to the true Palestine willows of which there are four species.

Wormwood, Artemisia judaica L. (wûrm'wo͝od, Heb. la'ănâh), a species related to our western sagebrush and the source of an essential oil obtained from the dried leaves and tops of the plant. Absinthe, a liqueur, the continuous use of which leads to mental deterioration and even death, derives its flavor from this oil (Lam. 3:15,19). The plant is a symbol of bitterness.

PLASTER (plăs'tẽr). The Egyptians plastered their stone buildings, even the finest granite, inside and out, to make a smooth surface for decoration. The poor used a mixture of clay and straw. On better buildings the first coat was gypsum and red clay or ashes, the finish coat slaked lime and white sand, sometimes with chopped straw. In Palestine and Syria, an outside clay coating would have to be renewed after the rainy season. Mortar was usually made with limestone, the process otherwise similar to that in Egypt. The Arabic word for mortar means "clay." Heb. sîdh (Deut. 27:2,4) means "to boil up," because of the action when water is poured on unslaked lime. Gîr (Dan. 5:5) means "burned in a kiln" (either lime or gypsum). Tûah (Lev. 14:42-48) means "to daub, smear."

PLASTER, MEDICINAL. In Isaiah 38:21 KJV, ASV) a cake of figs applied (RSV) to a boil.

PLEDGE, personal property of a debtor held to secure a payment (Gen. 38:17-26). Several synonymous Heb. words occur. The law of Moses was concerned with protection of the poor. If the pledge was an outer garment, it must be restored at sunset for a bed covering (Exod. 22:26-27; Deut. 24:12,13). The creditor was forbidden to enter his neighbor's house to take the pledge (Deut. 24:10,11). A handmill or its upper millstone might not be taken (Deut. 24:6), nor a widow's clothing (Deut. 24:17,18). Abuses of the pledge are censured (Job 22:6; 24:3,9; Amos 2:8; Hab. 2:6 ASV, RSV; "thick clay" in KJV mistranslates the Heb.) A wager is meant in II Kings 18:23 ASV margin, RSV; (Isa. 36:8). He who goes surety for strangers ought himself to be taken in pledge (Prov. 20:16; 27:13). The pledge David was to take from his brothers in exchange for cheeses may be a prearranged token (RSV) of their welfare (I Sam. 17:18). The pledge (ASV, RSV) in I Timothy 5:12 (KJV, ASV margin, faith) is the marriage troth (Greek pístis, faith).

PLEIADES (See Astronomy)

PLINY (plĭn'ē), Caius Plinius Caecilius Secundus, called "the Younger," to distinguish him from his learned uncle, lived from A.D. 61 to about A.D. 114. Pliny spent his youth under the guardianship of the distinguished soldier, Verginius Rufus, and was strongly influenced in all matters of literature and scholarship by his scientist uncle. Pliny passed through the ordered stages of the standard public career of a Roman aristocrat of the early Empire, survived Domitian, and as consul suffectus in A.D. 100, pronounced the customary oration of thanks to Trajan, later publishing the speech as the Panegyricus, a surviving work of no great merit. Pliny had a reputation as a lawyer, but his claim to fame in the modern world is his collection of ten volumes of literary letters. The epistles, exquisitely written, cover all manner of subjects, from the eruption of Vesuvius to the famous description of the Christian Church in Bithynia, a province which Pliny governed in A.D. 112, just before his death. Trajan's replies to his requests for instruction survive, and are important evidence for the official attitude towards the Christians (Ep. 10:96,97; Ramsay The Church in the Roman Empire, Ch. X).

PLOWMAN (See Occupations & Professions)

PLOW, PLOUGH, a farming tool used to break up the ground for sowing. An ancient plow, as Heb. harash indicates, scratched the surface, but did not turn over the soil. It consisted of a forked stick, the trunk hitched to the animals which drew it, the branch braced and terminating in the share, which was at first the sharpened end of the branch, later a metal point. It was ordinarily drawn by a yoke of oxen (Job 1:14; Amos 6:12). Plowing with an ox and an ass yoked together was forbidden (Deut. 22:10), but this prohibition is not observed today. A man guided the plow with his left hand, goading the oxen and from time to time cleaning the share with the goad in his right, keeping his eyes front in order to make the furrow straight (Luke 9:62). Plowing done, the farmer sowed (Isa. 28:24-26 RSV). He who does not plow in autumn will have no harvest (Prov. 20:4 RSV). ASV, RSV have "lamp" for KJV, ASV margin "plowing" (Prov. 21:4). Amos 9:13 foretells a time when the soil will be so fertile that there need be no fallow interval between harvest and the next plowing. Then foreigners will plow for Israel (Isa. 61:5). Plowing indicates destruction (Jer. 26:18; Mic. 3:12). Hosea 10:11-13 contrasts plowing for righteous and for evil ends (see Job 4:8; Ps. 129:3). Servants plowed (Luke 17:7). The plowman should plow in hope of a share of the crop (I Cor. 9:10). Elisha plowing with 12 yoke of oxen indicates his ability and the magnitude of his farming operations (I Kings 19:19). Samson calls the Philistines' badgering his betrothed to tell his riddle, "plowing with his heifer" (Judg. 14:18).

The typical forked-stick Palestinian plow. KC

PLOWSHARE (plou'shâr, the blade of a plow), to beat swords into plowshares was symbolic of an age of peace (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3); to beat plowshares into swords portended coming war (Joel 3:10).

PLUMB LINE (plŭm lĭn), a cord with a stone or metal weight, the plummet, tied to one end; used in testing whether a wall is perpendicular. Plumb line and plummet are used figuratively of God's action in testing the uprightness of His people (Amos 7:7-9; II Kings 21:13; Isa. 28:17).

POCHERETH (pŏk'ē-rĕth, pō'kĕ), a servant of Solomon whose descendants returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59).

POET (pō'ĕt, Gr. poietés, a maker). In Acts 17:28 Paul quotes from Phaenomena, 5, by the Greek poet Aratus (c. 270 B.C.) of Soli in Cilicia. A similar phrase occurs in the Hymn to Zeus, by the Stoic philosopher Cleanthes (300-220 B.C.), who taught at Athens. I Corinthians 15:32 may contain a quotation from Menander; Titus 1:12, from Epimenides. The poetic quality of many OT and NT passages entitles their authors to be called poets.

POETRY (pō'ĕt-rē). We recognize as poetry literature which has regular, rhythmically-patterned form and imaginatively concrete, emotionally charged substance. If the substance is lacking to the form, we call it verse; if the form is lacking to the substance, we call it poetic prose. All these terms are elastic: there is a wide range between what is readily recognized as poetry and what is obviously prose. The Greek conception of poetic form was so different from the Heb., and both from ours, that we must admit wide variation in our judgments as to what is poetry in the OT. Even in the Greek NT the influence of Hebrew poetry is so great, and the evidence for Greek poetic form so meager, that no hard and fast limits can be set to what is and what is not poetry. Former centuries had a feeling that to recognize a literary form such as poetry in any portion of Scripture was not consistent with due respect for its character as divine revelation. As Biblical criticism developed, there was a tendency to go to the other extreme, and to regard the Bible as "mere" literature. Yet there has been a growing recognition that for God and His patriarchs, prophets, and apostles to speak in poetic language, even in poetic form, does not derogate from the authority of the Bible as the Word of God. The growth of this feeling is illustrated by the fact that while the KJV is all in prose, the ASV prints a number of passages as poetry, and the RSV so prints a great many more. The Greek word poet means maker, creator: that God the Creator should be a poet is not surprising. Perhaps the wonder is, that more of the Bible is not in poetic form! In the NT we must remember that most of its human authors were Jews, to whom Greek was a second language. Luke the Gentile has more poetry than any other. Few men write poetry in any but their native language.

Poetry in the Bible has not in the past been so widely recognized because attention has been focused on the revelation of divine truth and its formulation in doctrine; the form of Heb. poetry is so different from ours that it is not easily recognized as such; through translation, the form has been lost. Secular poetry was not highly esteemed among the Hebrews (Isa. 5:12). That sacred poetry sometimes shared this ill repute may be inferred from Amos 6:5, though Amos may have referred only to David's musical compositions. Certainly the Psalms of David and of others were highly esteemed. Poetic prose has many examples (e.g., Gen. 1-3; Matt. 25:31-46; I Cor. 13). Hebrew poetry is marked by a distinctive vocabulary and syntax: some words and constructions occur only in poetry. Hebrew rhythm is irregular as compared with ours or the Greek. Greek rhythm is based on vowel length; ours on accent. Hebrew rhythm is based on the accented or tone syllables, and thus in a degree partakes of the characteristics of both, for tone implies length as well as stress. Since the vowel signs and the accented system in Hebrew are medieval and not ancient, we cannot be sure exactly what Hebrew poetry sounded like in OT times. A half-line usually has 2, 3 or 4 accents, a whole line 4 to 8. The lines are sometimes combined into stanzas or strophes (II Sam. 1:17-27). Rhyme is rare, but is believed to be present in a few cases (e.g., Gen. 4:23; 12:1-3; Judg. 16:23,24; Job 10:8-11; 16:12; Ps. 105; Isa. 27:3-5); alliteration (e.g. Ps. 6:8); assonance (e.g., Gen. 49:17; Exod. 14:14; Deut. 3:2). Refrains occur (e.g., Ps. 107; 136).

The most obvious feature of Hebrew poetic form is its parallelism. Many varieties have been distinguished, of which the three principal are: synonymous, in which the meaning of both members is similar (e.g., Ps. 15:1; 24:1-3; I Sam. 18:7); antithetic, in which the meanings of the members are opposed (Ps. 37:9; Prov. 10:1; 11:3); synthetic, in which noun corresponds to noun, verb to verb, and member to member, and each member adds something new (e.g., Ps. 19:8,9). Acrostic poems were favorites (e.g., Ps. 9,10; 34; 37; Prov. 31:10-31; Lam. 1-4). In Psalm 119 all the verses of each stanza of eight verses begin with the same letter of the Heb. alphabet. Mgr. Ronald Knox renders the acrostic psalms in English acrostics. Of the books always recognized as poetic, Psalms is a hymn book, containing songs suitable for public worship, and for private devotion; historical and other didactic poems. Proverbs is a collection of proverbs and other didactic poems. The Song of Solomon, at first glance appearing to be a secular love-cycle, has always been interpreted as an appropriate, rich and inspired expression of the love between the Messiah, Jesus Christ, and His Bride, the Church of OT and NT saints. Job is dramatic, though not technically a drama, and rises to ecstatic heights in God's address to Job (38-41). Didactic poetry and prose alternate in Ecclesiastes. Of the prophetic books, most of Isaiah is poetry; Jeremiah, except the historical sections; most of the minor prophets, except Haggai and Malachi. Of Jonah, only his prayer (2:2-9), and of Zechariah only 9:1-11:3,17; 13:7-9 are printed as poetry in RSV. Lamentations is poetry, 1-4 being acrostic, while in chapter 5 the singer's emotion may have become too intense to be confined in this artificial form. In Daniel there are poetic sections: 2:20-23, a psalm of praise; 4:3, praise; 4:34b,35, Nebuchadnezzar's praise of God; oddly, 6:26,27, Darius' decree; 7:9,10,13,14, 23-27, apocalyptic. In Ezekiel, prose alternates with poetry.

Short poems (so printed in RSV) are embedded in the historical books, as follows: Adam to Eve (Gen. 2:23); God to the serpent, Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:14-19); Lamech to his wives (Gen. 4:23, 24); Noah about his sons (9:25-27); Melchizedek's blessing (14:19,20); God to Rebekah (25:23); Isaac blesses Jacob (27:27-29); and Esau (27:39,40); Jacob blesses Joseph (48:15,16); and prophesies concerning his sons (49:2-27); the victory song of Moses (Exod. 15:1-18,21); the priestly blessing (Num. 6:24-26); a quotation from the Book of the Wars of the Lord (21:14,15); the song of the well (21:17,18); a ballad (21:27-30); Balaam's prophecies (23:7-10,18-24; 24:3-9,15-24); Moses' song (Deut. 32:1-43); and blessing of the people (33:2-29); the curse on a future rebuilder of Jericho (Josh. 6:26b); a quotation from the Book of Jasher (Josh. 10:12b,13a); the song of Deborah and Barak (Judg. 5); Samson's riddle, solution, and his answer (Judg. 14:14,18); his victory song (15:16); Hannah's song (I Sam. 2:1-10); a poem by Samuel (15:22,23); a women's song (18:7); David's lament over Jonathan (II Sam. 1:19-27); over Abner (3:33,34); his psalm (Ps. 18:2-50; 22:5-51); his last words (23:1-6); a quatrain by Solomon (I Kings 8:12,13); a popular song (12:16 = II Chron. 10:16); a prophetic poem by Isaiah (II Kings 19:21-28); a soldiers' song (I Chron. 12:18); a refrain (II Chron. 5:13; 7:3b "for he is good, for his steadfast love endures for ever"); a snatch of song by Solomon (6:1b,2,41,42). The English reader and also the casual student of Hebrew will do well to content himself with appreciating the beauty of the poetic imagery in which so much of the OT is dressed, without trying to analyze the poetic form, for such analysis is a doubtful and uncertain work for experts, and has as little relation to appreciation and interpretation of the meaning, as botany has for the enjoyment of flowers. It is the thought within the form which edifies.

In the NT, easily recognizable poems are all in the Gospel according to Luke: the Magnificat of Mary (1:46b-55), adapted from Hannah's song (I Sam. 2:1-10); the prophecy of Zacharias (1: 68-79); the angels' Gloria in Excelsis (2:14); and the Nunc Dimittis of Simeon (2:29-32). All these are echoes of Hebrew poetry, sung by Hebrews. Snatches of Christian hymns are thought to be found in the epistles (Eph. 5:14; I Tim. 1:17; 3: 16; 6:16; II Tim. 4:18). Paul rises to heights of poetic eloquence (e.g., Rom. 8; 11:33-12:2; I Cor. 13; 15:25-57). James' letter is lyrical. The language of Jesus is poetic in the highest degree. The NT contains many quotations of OT poetry. But it is the elevated thought of the NT as of the OT and not the technical form, which gives us the feeling of poetry. Thus Bible language has lent itself admirably to the use of hymn writers in many languages, and to their native poetic forms. E.R.

POETS, PAGAN, QUOTATIONS FROM. New Testament quotations from pagan poets are confined to the writings and speeches of Paul. 1. Acts 17:28. Both Cleanthes (q.v.) and Aratus of Soli use the words quoted in the Areopagus address. They occur in Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus and in Aratus' Phaenomena, a poem on astronomy. It is impossible to say who used the words first. It is possible that both writers were quoting Epimenides, the half-legendary Cretan poet and prophet of 500 B.C. (See E. M. Blaiklock, Acts of the Apostles, Tyndale Commentaries, p. 146). 2. Titus 1:12. "Liars, evil beasts, slow bellies" is a quotation from Epimenides, according to Clement of Alexandria. 3. Acts 17:27. "Feel after" may be an echo of Odyssey 9:416. The verb is used of the groping of the blinded Cyclops. 4. Acts 21:39. Paul's phrase "A citizen of no mean city" is an echo of a line of Euripides (Ion 8) applied to Athens. The Tarsians were probably in the habit of appropriating the quotation. 5. I Corinthians 15:33. "Evil communications corrupt good manners." The line is an iambic senarius from the poet of the New Comedy, Menander (342-291 B.C.). 6. In the Greek text, Hebrews 12:13 contains a hexameter, "every good and perfect gift," and Acts 23:5 an iambic senarius, "thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of the people," which may indicate an unknown poetic source, or may be metrical accidents (e.g. in KJV: "Husbands love your wives, and be not bitter against them"; "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace"). E.M.B.

POISON (poi'z'n, Heb. hēmâh, rō'sh, Gr. thymós, iós), the venom of reptiles (Deut. 32:24,33; Job 20:16; Ps. 58:4; 140:3 = Rom. 3:13). James 3:8 may reflect a belief that the tongue conveyed the poison. Job 6:4 refers to poisoned arrows. Vegetable poisons also were known (Hos. 10:4 hemlock, RSV poisonous weeds; II Kings 4:39 wild gourds). The "deadly thing" of Mark 16:18 was a poisoned drink.

POLE (pōl, Heb. nēs), the standard (ASV) on which the brazen serpent was displayed that the people might look and live (Num. 21:8,9).

POLITARCH (pŏl'ĭ-tärk, Gr. politárches). The Acts of the Apostles twice refers to the city magistrates of Thessalonica as "politarchs" (Acts 17: 6 and 8). Since the term was unknown elsewhere, it was once set down as a mistake of Luke. Sixteen epigraphical examples now exist in modern Salonica, and one is located in the British Museum on a stone which once formed part of an archway. It was evidently a Macedonian term. It was Luke's general practice to use the term in commonest educated use. Hence he called the officials of Philippi "praetors," and an inscription has similarly established the fact that this was a courtesy title given to the magistrates of a Roman Colony.

POLL (pōl), as noun, Heb. gulgōleth, skull, head, a unit for counting persons (Num. 1:2-22 RSV, "head by head"; 3:47 RSV, "apiece"; I Chron. 23: 3,24 RSV omits poll). Poll as verb, Heb. gāzaz, shear (Mic. 1:16 ASV, RSV, "cut off hair") as sign of mourning; gālah (II Sam. 14:26 ASV, RSV, "cut the hair") kāsam (Ezek. 44:20 ASV, "cut off," RSV, "trim the hair").

POLLUTION (pŏ-lū'shŭn, Heb. gā'al, Gr. alisgema), may be from menstruation (Ezek. 22:10 ASV, RSV impurity); from food sacrificed to idols (Acts 15:20,29); from the evil in the world (II Pet. 2:20 ASV, RSV defilements). Imperfect offerings, brought with a wrong motive were polluted (Mal. 1:7-9). An altar was to be of unhewn stone: to cut was to pollute it (Exod. 20:25 RSV profane). Several Heb. and Greek words translated "pollute" refer to ceremonial or moral defilement, profanation, and uncleanness.

POLLUX (pŏl'ŭks, Gr. Dióscouroi), with Castor (Acts 28:11 KJV), one of the Dioscuri or Twin Brothers (ASV, RSV), sons of Zeus and patrons of sailors.

POLYGAMY (See Marriage)

POMEGRANATE (See Plants)

POMMEL (pŭm'l, Heb. gullâh, basin, bowl, II Chron. 4:12,13; I Kings 7:41,42), the bowl- or globe-shaped part of the capitals of the temple pillars.

PONTIUS PILATE (See Pilate)

PONTUS (pŏn'tŭs, Gr. Póntos, sea), a large province of northern Asia Minor which lay along the Black Sea (Pontus Euxinius). All the references to Pontus in the NT indicate that there were many Jews in the province. Jews from Pontus were in Jerusalem at the first Pentecost (Acts 2:9). Luke mentions in Acts 18:2 that a certain Christian Jew named Aquila was born in Pontus. So far as we know, Pontus and the other northern provinces were not evangelized by Paul. The Holy Spirit did not permit him to preach in Bithynia (Acts 16: 7). However, the Apostle Peter addresses his first letter to "the strangers (Jewish Christians) scattered throughout Pontus, etc." lending credence to the tradition that Peter preached in N Asia Minor rather than in Rome after Pentecost. In secular history, Pontus is noted for the dynasty of kings headed by the great Mithridates which ruled from 337 to 63 B.C.

POOL, a pocket of water, natural or artificial. Heb. 'ăgham, a marshy, reedy pond, refers to natural depressions; by the Nile (Exod. 7:19; 8:5); in the wilderness (Ps. 107:35; 114:8 ASV, RSV); desolated Babylon (Isa. 14:23); the restored wilderness (Isa. 35:7; 41:18); dried up in judgment (Isa. 42: 15); for the sluices and ponds of Isaiah 19:10, ASV, RSV adopt entirely different readings of the text. Heb. berēkhâh, pool, from root "bless" refers to an artificial pool to conserve water for irrigation or drinking. Large ones were made by damming streams. Smaller ones were rectangular, wider than deep, to collect rain from the roofs or from the surface of the ground: similar to cylindrical pits or cisterns which served the same purpose. Water from springs was collected in masonry pools. All these were indeed blessings in a dry land. We read of the pool of Gibeon (II Sam. 2: 13); of Hebron (4:12); of Samaria (I Kings 22: 38); of Heshbon (S. of Sol. 7:4); of Shelah or Siloah (Neh. 3:15); the upper pool (II Kings 18: 17; Isa. 7:3; 36:2); the pool Hezekiah made (II Kings 20:20); the lower pool (Isa. 22:9); the old pool (Isa. 22:11); the king's pool (Neh. 2:14); the pool "that was made" (Neh. 3:16, RSV, the artificial pool). Solomon made pools to water his forest nursery (Eccl. 2:6). Psalm 84:6 speaks of the rain filling pools (ASV has "blessings" here). Nineveh was of old like a pool (Nah. 2:8 KJV, ASV) or, being destroyed, like a pool whose waters have run out (RSV). Greek kolymbéthra, pool, place for diving, swimming-bath; the pool of Bethesda (John 5:2,4,7); of Siloam (John 9:7,11).

POOR (Heb. 'evyôn, dal, 'ānî, rûsh, Gr. ptochós). God's love and care for the poor are central to His providence (Ps. 9:18; 12:5; Eccl. 5:8, etc.). He enjoins like consideration on us (Exod. 22:23, etc.). The Mosaic law has specific provisions for the benefit of the poor (Exod. 22:25-27; 23:11; Lev. 19:9,10,13,15; 25:6,25-30,39-42,47-54; Deut. 14:28,29; 15:12,13; 16:11-14; 24:10-15,17-22; 26: 12,13; Ruth 2:1-7; Neh. 8:10). Israel as a nation was born out of deep poverty (Exod. 1:8-14; 2: 7-10), and was never allowed to forget it (e.g., I Kings 8:50-53). If Israel met the conditions of God's covenant, there would be no poor among them, but God knew this would never be realized (Deut. 15:4-11). Wilful neglect leading to poverty is not condoned (Prov. 13:4-18, etc.). But national disasters brought it about that the poor became almost synonymous with the pious (e.g., Ps. 68:10; Isa. 41:17). Even in the early nomadic and later agricultural economy there were slaves and poor freemen; much more in the urban and commercial economy of the monarchy. The wrongs of the poor concern the prophets (e.g., Isa. 1:23; 10:1,2; Ezek. 34; Amos 2:6; 5:7; 8:6; Mic. 2:1,2; Hab. 3:14; Mal. 3:5).

At the outset of His ministry, Jesus, taking for His text Isaiah 61:1,2, presents as His first aim, "to preach the gospel to the poor." That physical poverty is meant is shown by the contrasts in Luke 6:20-26. Matthew 5:3 speaks of spiritual poverty. Jesus moved among the poor and humble. He associated Himself with them in His manner of living, His freedom from the encumbering cares of property (Matt. 8:20). He understood and appreciated the sacrificial giving of a poor widow (Mark 12:41-44). He recognized the continuing obligation toward the poor, as well as appreciating a unique expression of love toward Himself (Mark 14:7). The early church moves amidst the poor, who are not too poor to be concerned for one another's welfare (II Cor. 8:2-5,9-15), drawing inspiration from Christ's leaving heavenly riches for earthly poverty. The origin of the diaconate is linked with a special need (Acts 6:1-6). Those with property contributed to the common fund (Acts 2:45; 4:32-37). The Jerusalem Council asked Paul and Barnabas to remember the poor (Gal. 2:10). James has some sharp words about the relations of rich and poor (James 1:9-11; 2:1-13; 5:1-6).

POPLAR (See Plants)

PORATHA (pō-rā'thà, pŏr'à-thà), one of the sons of Haman the Agagite. He died with his brothers (Esth. 9:8).

PORCH (Heb. 'êlām, 'ūlām, porch), in Solomon's temple (I Kings 6:3, etc.); in Solomon's palace (I Kings 7:6ff); in Ezekiel's new temple (Ezek. 40: 7ff). RSV has vestibule. Heb. misderôn, porch, colonnade (Judg. 3:23 RSV vestibule), before an upper room. Gr. proaúlion, place before a court, vestibule (Mark 14:68 RSV gateway, margin, ASV margin, forecourt). Gr. pylón, gateway (Matt. 26: 71). Greek stoá, roofed colonnade (John 5:2), five porches at the pool of Bethesda; John 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12, all ASV margin, RSV portico). In every case an area with a roof supported by columns appears to be meant.

PORCIUS (See Festus)

PORTER (See Occupations & Professions)

PORTION (pôr'shŭn), a part, that is, less than the whole of anything; a share (Num. 31:30,47; as of food served to one person (Neh. 8:10,12; Dan. 1: 5-16; 11:26; Jer. 51:33,34, see ASV, RSV; Deut. 18:8); of property acquired by gift (I Sam. 1:4,5) or by inheritance (Gen. 31:14; Josh. 17:14); a plot of ground (II Kings 9:10,36,37, RSV territory); destiny (Ps. 142:5; Job 20:29; 31:2; Lam. 3:24). Several Heb. and Gr. words are translated "portion," sometimes otherwise in ASV, RSV, and the shades of meaning are determined by the context. The most significant meaning appears in passages like Psalm 119:57, where one's relation to God and eternal wellbeing are involved.

POST (pōst, Heb. mezûzâh, doorpost; rûts, to run; 'ayil, strength). The first word represented the parts to the doorway of a building (I Kings 6:33). The last word is a post also, but has a larger use than door-posts. It was anything strong (Ezek. 40:14, 16). One of the most common uses of the word post is its reference to anyone who conveyed a message speedily. These were very early means of communication (Job 9:25). The first went by foot and later by horses. Royal messages were conveyed in this way (II Chron. 30:6,10).

POT, the translation of more than a dozen Hebrew and Greek words. Most of them referred to utensils for holding liquids, and solid substances such as grain and ashes. The Hebrew word sir was the most common pot used in cooking (II Kings 4:38; Jer. 1:13). It was also the vessel that held ashes (Exod. 27:3). Some of these vessels were made of metal and others of clay, and there were a great variety of sizes and shapes. Their chief NT use was for water or wine (John 2:6; Mark 7:4).

POTENTATE (pō'tĕn-tāt, Gr. dynástes, mighty one), a person with great power and authority (I Tim. 6:15). The Greek word is used of men in Luke 1:52 (KJV "the mighty") and Acts 8:27 (KJV "of great authority").

POTIPHAR (pŏt'ĭ-fêr, Heb. pôtîphar, whom Re has given), one of the pharaoh's officers mentioned in Genesis in connection with Joseph's sojourn in that land. He purchased Joseph from the Midianites, and made him head overseer over his house. When Joseph was falsely accused by the wife of Potiphar, he cast Joseph into prison (Gen. 39:1-20).

POTIPHERAH (pō-tĭf'êr-à, Heb. pôtîphera', the one given by the sun-god), the Egyptian priest of On whose daughter, Asenath, was given to Joseph for a wife (Gen. 41:45,50; 46:20).

POTSHERD (pŏt'shûrd, Heb. heres), a piece of earthenware. Job used a potsherd to scrape his body in his affliction (Job 2:8). Potsherds are referred to in other places in the Bible (Ps. 22:15; Prov. 26:23). There are many inscribed potsherds known as "ostraca" that furnish valuable information for the archaeologist.

POTTAGE (pŏt'ĭj, Heb. nāzîdh, boiled), a kind of thick broth made with vegetables and meat or suet. Jacob bought Esau's birthright for a mess of pottage (Gen. 25:29,30,34. See also II Kings 4:38-39).

POTTER (See Occupations & Professions)

POTTER'S FIELD (pŏt'êrz fēld, Gr. Akeldamá), the piece of ground which the priests bought with the money Judas received when he betrayed our Lord to be crucified (Matt. 27:7). It was used by the Jews as a burial plot in which to bury strangers. Judas is mentioned as the purchaser in Acts 1:18, but this is probably an idiomatic way of referring to a thing said to be done by the person whose action occasioned its transaction. This field is referred to in Acts 1:19 as "Aceldama" meaning "the field of blood." Alluding to the purchase of this field, Matthew refers to this transaction as fulfilling a prophecy spoken by "Jeremy the Prophet" (Matt. 27:9), though just what Matthew referred to here is not clear.

POTTER'S GATE, a gate in the wall of Jerusalem which is thought to be referred to by Jeremiah (Jer. 19:2). It may be the same gate that leads to the Valley of Hinnom or the Dung Gate.

POTTERY. Pottery making is one of the oldest crafts in Bible lands. James L. Kelso and J. Palin Thorley have termed pottery "the first synthetic to be discovered by mankind . . . an artificial stone produced by firing clay shapes to a temperature sufficiently high to change the physical and chemical properties of the original clay into a new substance with many of the characteristics of stone" ("Palestinian Pottery in Bible Times," BA, VIII (1945), 82). References, both literal and figurative, to the potter and his products occur throughout the Scriptures.

Pottery Production in Palestine. Let us follow Jeremiah down to the potter's house (Jer. 18:1-6). This "factory" was in the Valley of Hinnom near the Potsherd Gate (Jer. 19:2 RSV) and near the tower of the furnaces or pottery kilns (Neh. 3:11; 12:38). In addition to his workshop the potter (Heb. yôtsēr) needed a field (Matt. 27:7) for weathering the dry native clay-dust ('āphār) or wet stream-bank clay (tît, Nah. 3:14) and for mixing it with water and treading it by foot into potter's clay (hōmer), as in Isaiah 41:25. For cooking vessels, sand or crushed stone was added to temper the clay. In his house the potter kneaded the clay for several hours to remove all air bubbles. He could either build up a large vessel free-hand, using long sausage-like rolls of clay; or he could "throw" a ball of plastic clay on the center of a pivoted disc or dual stone wheel ('obnāyim) spun counter-clockwise by his hand or by his apprentice. By thrusting his forearm into the mass of wet clay he hollowed out the interior. The centrifugal force imparted to the spinning lump enabled the potter in a matter of minutes to form a vessel with only light pressure from his fingers. In mass production he pinched off (qātsar, Job 33:6b) the completed juglet from the cone of clay spinning on the wheel. Impurities in the clay or insufficient treading could mar the vessel on the wheel. The potter easily remedied this by reshaping the clay into a ball and making a less elegant object out of the former discard (Jer. 18:3,4).

After drying to a leathery consistency the vessel was replaced on the wheel for "turning," cutting and paring off excess clay as on a lathe. To fill the pores and beautify the vessel the potter could coat the pot with "slip," clay of the consistency of cream, often with a mineral color added. Next, he might burnish or rub the surface with a smooth stone to produce a sheen; or he might paint on a design. Finally, the jar was "fired" by heating it, usually between 700°C and 1050°C in an open fire or in a kiln. Firing was the most difficult art for the apprentice to master, and this skill was probably passed on from father to son as a trade secret. Such potters' installations have been found in a cave at Lachish (c. 1500 B.C.), within the Essene community center at Qumran, and by the Nabataean city of Avdat (Eboda) in the Negev.

God, who formed (yātsar) Adam from the dust ('āphār, Gen. 2:7), is likened to our Potter who fashions us according to His will (Job 10:8,9; 33:6; Isa. 29:16; 45:9; 64:8; Lam. 4:2; Rom. 9:20-23; II Tim. 2:20,21). He will smite the wicked as one smashes a piece of pottery (Ps. 2:9; Jer. 19:10,11; Rev. 2:27).

Historical Development of Pottery Styles in Palestine. Ceramic vessels, like clothing and automobiles, have been changing in fashion down through the centuries of human existence. Recognizing this fact, the Egyptologist Flinders Petrie in 1890 catalogued the sequence of broken pottery according to the varying shapes and decorations at Tell el-Hesi in southwestern Palestine. He succeeded in assigning rough absolute dates to several of his pottery periods by identifying certain wares with wares previously discovered in datable Egyptian tombs. Today when an archaeologist uncovers no more precise evidence (e.g. inscriptions on clay tablets, monuments, or coins), he depends on dominant pottery styles from an occupation level of an ancient city to furnish the clue to the date. On the second day of excavation in 1953 the Wheaton Archaeological Expedition verified that Dothan was settled in Joseph's time (Gen. 37:17) by unearthing orange and black burnished juglets and a double-handled juglet, exactly similar to Hyksos Age juglets found in the 1930's at Megiddo.

NEOLITHIC AGE — ?-4000 B.C. Pottery — all handmade — began to appear around 4500 B.C. But scores of generations before the first pottery at Jericho, people who practiced irrigation and constructed massive city fortifications settled the town. The vessels were either exceedingly coarse or else made with much finer clay, usually with painted decorations, and well-fired.

CHALCOLITHIC AGE — 4000-3100 B.C. At the time copper came into use the peculiar pottery styles included: swinging butter churns; jars with small "cord-eye" handles; cups with a long, tapering, spike-like "cornet" base; and ossuaries for human bones, made of pottery in the shape of miniature houses.

EARLY BRONZE AGE — 3100-2100 B.C. In this millennium potters began to use the stone disc tournette or turntable, predecessor of the potter's wheel. Characteristic EB features are: flat bottoms, hole-mouth pots, spouts on jars, inward-projecting bowl rims, ledge handles on water jugs, and bands of parallel, wavy, or criss-cross lines painted over the jar's surface.

MIDDLE BRONZE AGE I — 2100-1900 B.C. A transition period in pottery styles, these centuries saw the coming of Abraham to Palestine and an irruption of semi-nomadic Amorites from Syria who destroyed many towns and depopulated much of Canaan.

MIDDLE BRONZE AGE II — 1900-1550/1480 B.C. The Hyksos, descendants of the Amorites and native Canaanites, dominated Palestine in this era. Hazor was their chief city. They were already entering Egypt as merchants or Egyptian slaves in the 19th century when Jacob came to Goshen. Later they ruled in Egypt, 1730-1570 B.C. In the 19th century the fast-spinning potter's wheel revolutionized the industry in the Near East. Virtually all Middle Bronze II pottery was wheel-made. Distinctively Hyksos were the pear-shaped juglets with "button" base, double- or triple-strand handles, chalk-filled pinprick designs, and highly burnished vessels with orange or black slip. Bowls and jars with ring or disc bases were introduced in Palestine, as well as dipper flasks and chalices. Hyksos cities in southern Palestine fell before the pursuing Egyptians about 1550 B.C., whereas cities in northern Palestine remained in Hyksos hands until the campaigns of Thutmose III (c. 1480 B.C.).

LATE BRONZE AGE — 1500-1230 B.C. With the Hyksos power broken, numerous petty kings ruled in Canaan. The native pottery declined in gracefulness and technique as the prosperity slumped. Thus imported vessels from Cyprus are all the more striking: milk bowls with wishbone handle, and "bilbils," jugs with a metallic ring when tapped. From 1400 to 1230 B.C. Mycenaean pottery imports were common: stirrup vases, squat pyxis jars, and large craters with horizontal loop handles. While the nomadic Israelites invaded Canaan about 1400 B.C., they continued using wooden bowls, goatskins, and cloth sacks (Lev. 11:32) and produced little pottery until they could conquer a town and discard tents for more permanent houses.

IRON AGE I — 1230-925 B.C. In the latter time of the Judges, Israel was more settled and iron came into common use. Typical pottery objects were the traveler's water canteen, many-handled wine craters, and lamps with a thick, disc-like base. The decorative features are the most distinctive: hand burnishing and gaudy, painted designs, even on rims and handles. After 1150 B.C. Philistine painted-ware, very similar to late Mycenaean pottery elsewhere, is outstanding with its designs of swans pluming themselves, dolphins, spirals, loops, and maltese crosses. In Israel the period ended when Pharaoh Shishak destroyed many towns on his Palestinian campaign.

IRON AGE II — 925-586 B.C. During the Divided Monarchy the cities of Israel prospered materially and their potters excelled. Most helpful for dating a town to this period are the ring-burnished water decanters; wheel burnishing on banquet bowls; twisted, ridged handles on storage jars; black perfume juglets; and the beautiful red, highly-burnished Samaria ware. Archaeologists have unearthed Hebrew writings in ink on potsherds, such as the seventy-odd Samaria ostraca from the palace of Jeroboam II and the 21 Lachish letters dated to 589/8 B.C. From Isaiah's time onward in Judah belong many inscribed handles of jars for wine, olive oil, or grain. In some cases, as on those found at Gibeon, the name of the owner of a vineyard was inscribed. On others the letters lmlk ("belonging to the king") appear together with the name of one of four cities, probably where royal potteries were established to make jars of the correct capacity for the payment of taxes in produce (cf. I Chron. 4:23 RSV). Nebuchadnezzar's devastating invasion produced a cultural void in Palestine for 50 years.

IRON AGE III — 538-333 B.C. During this Persian period locally made storage jars had pointed bases rather than the earlier rounded style. The lip of the lamp evolved into an elongated spout. The most distinctive pottery in the sixth century was imported Greek black-figured ware, and in the fifth, Greek red-figured ware. Coins, which began to appear in Palestine in the fifth century, aid the archaeologist in dating.

HELLENISTIC AGE — 333-63 B.C. Alexander's conquest began the Hellenization of Palestine. The double potter's wheel, with a large foot-power wheel to turn the thrower's wheel (Ecclesiasticus 38:29,30), was a Greek improvement. The ubiquitous Rhodian wine-jar handles, each stamped with the name of the potter or of the annual magistrate in Rhodes, immediately classify a stratum of an ancient town as Hellenistic.

ROMAN AGE — 63 B.C.-A.D 325. Pompey's capture of Jerusalem in 63 B.C. brought Palestine under Roman domination. Significant pottery styles are the beautiful red-glazed (terra sigillata) bowls and plates, jugs and pots with horizontally-corrugated surfaces, and the exquisitely painted, extremely thin Nabataean pottery from about 50 B.C. to A.D. 150.

Identification of Biblical Terms for Pottery Objects. The Hebrew and Greek words, about which there is some degree of understanding, are classified under several main groups:

A. Bowls, basins, and cups. The "cups" of Biblical times were usually small bowls without handles. Flat dinner plates were unknown, shallow bowls serving as platters and dishes.

1. Kôs, potérion, "cup," a small individual drinking bowl for water (II Sam. 12:3; Ps. 23:5; Matt. 10:42) or for wine (Prov. 23:31; Jer. 35:5; Matt. 26:27). It may be symbolic of one's destiny, whether it be of salvation (Ps. 16:5; 116:13) or of judgment and suffering (Isa. 51:17,22; Jer. 49:12; Matt. 20:22; 26:39; Rev. 14:10).

2. Tselōhîth. Only in II Kings 2:20, this vessel must be an open, shallow bowl to hold salt, for salt would cake up in a cruse.

3. Tsallahath. Similar to #2, this may be the well-known ring-burnished bowl of Iron II. It had no handles to hang it up; hence it was turned over to dry (II Kings 21:13); it could be used by a sluggard both to cook and to contain his food. (Prov. 19:24; 26:15 — the word "bosom" should be "bowl").

4. 'Aggān is a banquet bowl, ring- or spiral-burnished on the interior, with two or four handles, similar in size and purpose to our punch bowls (S. of Sol. 7:2). It is the word "cups" in Isaiah 22:24, able to be hung from the nail or peg in the tent-pole but large enough to help cause the peg to give way (see also nēvel on this verse).

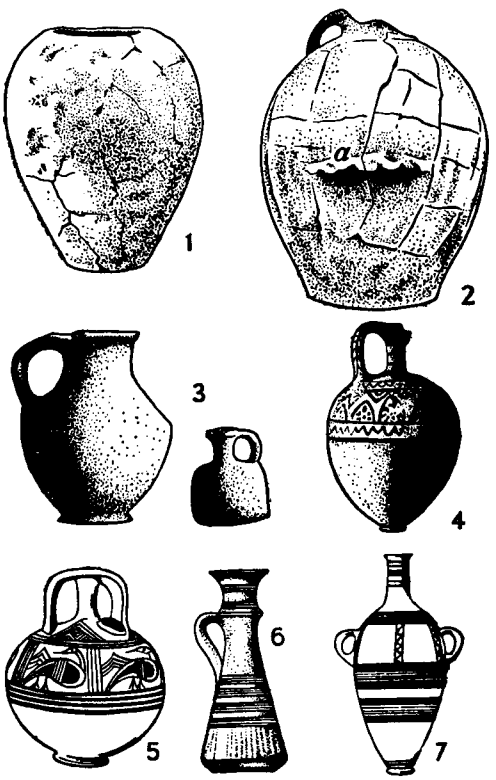
5. Sēphel is probably an earlier style of #4, since the Arabic word for a large four-handled bowl in Palestinian villages today is sifl. Since it is called a "lordly bowl," Jael may have offered Sisera curded milk in one imported from Mycenae or Cyprus, decorated with painted designs and having pushed-up horizontal loop handles, holding from four to ten pints (Judg. 5:25). Or it may have been smaller and of the variety known as the Cypriote milk bowl with a wishbone handle, typical of LB II, and holding from one to three pints. Gideon used a similar bowl into which to squeeze the dew from his fleece (Judg. 6:38).

6. Trúblion, a large deep dish or bowl, either of metal or fine Roman sigillata pottery, from which all could take out food (Matt. 26:23).

7. Niptér, a basin or vessel for washing the hands and feet (John 13:5). In Iron Age II the Israelites had oval ceramic footbaths, about two feet long, with a raised footrest in the middle and drain-hole at the bottom of one side.



Pottery styles from Palestine. 1, 2. Large jars, from Jericho, Early Bronze Age. No. 2 has both loop and ledge handles, to facilitate balancing jar on the head. 3. Small jugs with handles, from Megiddo, Middle Bronze Age II. 4. Finely modeled egg-shaped jug, from Jericho, Hyksos style. 5. Decorated Philistine jug from Gezer. 6. Vase ornamented with rings, from Taanach, late Israelite. 7. Pitcher from Tell Zakariyeh (probably Azekah), Late Bronze Age. DV

B. Cooking pots. Sherds of these common vessels are very numerous in excavated cities since every household needed several such pots. Because these vessels broke or cracked easily, they were often "despised," considered as the lowliest type of pottery; hence they seldom occur in tombs.

1. Sîr, the wide-mouth, broad, round-bottom cooking pot, in Iron I handleless, in Iron II and later with two handles. The large diameter of its mouth permitted it to be used as a washpot (Ps. 60:8). It could be of great size, large enough to boil vegetables for all the sons of the prophets at Gilgal (II Kings 4:38). It was used by the Israelite slaves in Egypt (Exod. 16:3) and by the poor family whose only fuel was the thorn bush. (Eccl. 7:6; the word for "thorns" is sîrîm, thus a play on words).

2. Pārûr is a one- or two-handled cooking pot, deeper and with narrower mouth than the sîr. With one hand Gideon carried a pārûr containing broth, in the other hand carrying a basket containing bread and meat (Judg. 6:19). The Israelites boiled manna in a pārûr (Num. 11:8 ASV).

3. Marhesheth is a ceramic kettle used for deep-fat frying (Lev. 2:7; 7:9); the meal-offering cakes made in this vessel would be of the texture of our doughnuts.

4. 'Etsev, the despised vessel of Jeremiah 22:28, was probably a cooking pot, not an idol. Thus Coniah was a "big pot," about to be broken.

C. Jars. These include the large stationary jars for water (Arabic zîr), apparently not mentioned in the Bible, as well as the smaller jars for carrying water from well to house and for the storage of grain, of olive oil, and of wine.

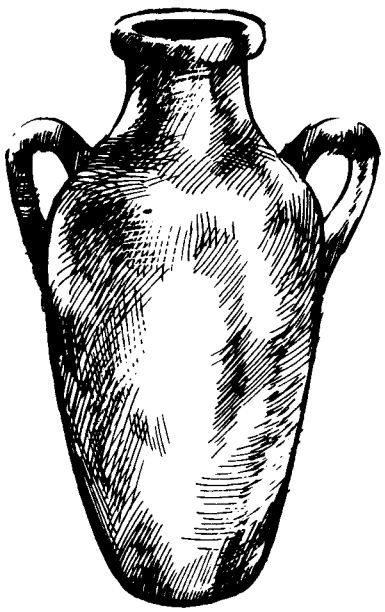
1. Kadh, hydría, a jar 13 to 20 inches tall, with two handles, egg-shaped bottom, and a small mouth, used for carrying water on one's shoulder (I Kings 18:33; Eccl. 12:6; John 4:28). In Rebekah's day the flat-bottom, folded ledge-handle jar was in use in Palestine. For storing grain or meal the jar was often more cylindrical, with or without handles (I Kings 17:12ff — not a "barrel"!). The LB jars used by Gideon's three hundred to conceal their torches must have had handles and must have been common and easily obtainable (Judg. 7:16ff).

2. Nēvel originally referred to a wineskin (I Sam. 1:24; 10:3; 25:18; II Sam. 16:1; Jer. 13:12); a prepared goatskin holds five to 12 gallons. In ceramics the nēvel is the storage jar used especially for wine, olive oil, and grain. It held approximately a bath, or about six gallons, and stood about two feet high. Since the nēvel had two handles, it was possible to hang it from a peg, but its weight might break the peg (Isa. 22:24). The men of Judah, recipients and containers of Jehovah's blessings as well as of His judgments, are likened to the nēvel: the breaking of a storage jar with its valued contents would be a household disaster (Isa. 30:14; Jer. 13:12; 48:12; Lam. 4:2).



Large Palestinian water jar. UANT

3. 'Āsûk in II Kings 4:2 is the typical Iron II jar for olive oil. It has three handles arranged at 90° around the mouth; the fourth quadrant has a funnel or spout probably "intended to hold the small dipper juglet used for taking oil from the jar. . . . Any drippings of oil from the juglet would go through the pierced spout back into the jar, or, in the unpierced variety, would be caught in the funnel" (J. W. Crowfoot, G. M. Crowfoot, Kathleen M. Kenyon, The Objects from Samaria. London: Palestine Exploration Fund, 1957, p. 193). Various sizes stand from six to 16 inches in height.

Decanters, flasks, and juglets.

1. Baqbûq, the handsome ring-burnished water decanter of Iron II. Its narrow neck causes a gurgling sound when the water is poured; hence its name. It came in graduated sizes from four to ten inches high. James L. Kelso says, "It is the most artistic and expensive member of the pitcher family. It was thus well-fitted to typify Jerusalem in Jeremiah's illustrated sermon (19:1-15). Its use was doubly significant since it had the narrowest neck of all pitchers and therefore could never be mended (19:11)" (The Ceramic Vocabulary of the Old Testament, New Haven: American Schools of Oriental Research, 1948, p. 17). to the prophet Ahijah a gift of honey in a baqbûq with other foods, a trifling gift from a king (I Kings 14:3).

2. Tsappahath is the two-handled traveler's flask or canteen so popular from LB until the middle of Iron II. "It was made of a lightly baked clay, which gives a certain porosity to the jar so that the air blowing on the moist surface of the canteen cools the water within. The mouth of the canteen is shaped both for drinking and for easy stoppering" (Ibid., p. 30). See I Samuel 26:11ff; I Kings 19:6. In I Kings 17:12-16 this word is employed for the oil jar of the widow of Zarephath. While the porous clay of the canteen is ill-suited to contain oil, the widow was very poor and may have had to put her few vessels to unwonted uses; probably also she never had had a large supply of oil before this.

3. Pak is a small juglet for holding perfumed anointing oil (I Sam. 10:1; II Kings 9:1,3). In one or both of these cases the "vial" or "box" of KJV may have been a lovely Cypro-Phoenician juglet. Or it may have been the local blue-black hand-burnished juglet found in such quantities at Megiddo and Tell Beit Mirsim.

4. Kerámion, the one-handled ribbed water jug, eight to twelve inches high, by which Jesus' disciples were to identify the owner of the house with the upper room (Mark 14:13; Luke 22:10). Ordinarily only a woman would be seen carrying a jug of water into the city from the fountain.

E. Other vessels.

1. Nēr, the common pottery lamp burning olive oil. Basically the nēr in OT times was a small bowl or saucer; while the molded clay was still soft, the potter pinched in the rim at one section to hold the linen or flax wick (Isa. 42:3). Never more than a few inches in diameter, the lamp was suitable for carrying in the palm of the hand when walking (Ps. 119:105; Zeph. 1:12) or for placing in a niche in the wall of the house or cave-home. The Oriental feared darkness and left a lamp burning all night (Prov. 31:18); thus it was just as essential as the millstones for grinding grain (Jer. 25:10). The presence of a burning lamp with its light symbolized joy and peace (II Sam. 22:29); whereas the extinguishing of the lamp suggested utter gloom and desolation (Job 18:5,6; 21:17; Prov. 13:9; 20:20; 24:20). Since the ancient considered his life to be continued through his sons, his "light" was not put out if he had a son; thus the lamp also symbolized posterity (I Kings 11:36; 15:4; II Kings 8:19). In patriarchal times (MB I) the lamp sometimes had its rim pinched in four places. Some Israelite lamps had seven such pinched "wick-holders," undoubtedly reminiscent of the seven-branched golden candlestick or lampstand of the tabernacle and temple.

2. Lampás is also a hand-sized clay lamp but with considerable change in shape from the OT lamps. By the first century A.D. the pinched rim had given way to a nozzle for the wick. This type was carried by the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1-8), by the band led by Judas (John 18:3 Berkeley Version), and by the Christians congregating in an upper room in Troas (Acts 20:8). See LAMP.

3. Lýchnos is the lamp placed on a lampstand (lychnía) (Matt. 5:15; Luke 11:33-36).

4. Menôrâh usually refers to the golden lampstand in tabernacle and temple. But in II Kings 4:10 it probably refers to a pottery lamp of a different style from the nēr. Often discovered in Palestinian sites are "cup-and-saucer" lamps, a high cup in the center of a small bowl all made in one piece by the potter. Sometimes this style has been found in connection with shrines, serving a ritual purpose. Since the Shunammite couple considered Elisha a holy man of God, they chose a type of lamp appropriate for him.

5. Tannûr, klíbanos, refer chiefly to the common oven in every home, for baking flat bread (Lev. 2:4; 7:9a; Hos. 7:4-8). Like a hollow truncated cone, the tannûr was made of clay nearly an inch thick. The household oven varied from 1½ to 2½ feet in diameter, and often was plastered over with additional mud and potsherds on the outer surface. Placed over a depression in the courtyard floor, the oven was preheated by a smoky fire of grass, thorns, twigs, or stubble kindled inside it (Matt. 6:30; Mal. 4:1). The soot was then wiped off (Lam. 5:10) and the thin sheets of dough were slapped onto the concave inner surface of the oven and baked in a few seconds. A large cooking pot could be placed over the top opening, making the tannûr serve also as a stove (Lev. 11:35). When ten women could bake their pitifully small loaves in a single oven, then famine was stalking the land (Lev. 26:26).

6. 'Âh is the small brazier for holding burning coals. King Jehoiakim's winter house may have had a metal brazier or a ceramic one (Jer. 36:22, 23).

7. Mahăvath must be the nearly flat disc-like baking tray or griddle mentioned in Leviticus 2:5; 6:14; 7:9; I Chronicles 23:29. Such pans, 12 to 14 inches in diameter, have holes punched or notched on the concave surface which is placed over the fire.

8. Paropsís, the side dish for relishes and other delicacies filled only by the extortion practiced by the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 23:25,26, ASV).

POWER (pou'êr, Heb. chiefly hayil, kōah, 'ōz). In the OT: of man (Gen. 31:29); military (I Chron. 20:1); official (Esth. 1:3); of Satan (Job 1:12); but chiefly of God (I Chron. 29:11; II Sam. 22:23; Isa. 40:29). In the NT: Gr. dýnamis, power; of men (Luke 1:17; Acts 3:12; I Cor. 4:19, 20); of God (Luke 1:35; 5:17; Rom. 1:16,20); as His Name (Matt. 26:64); of Christ (I Cor. 5: 4); of the Holy Spirit (Luke 4:14; Rom. 15:13, 19). Greek exousía, authority; of men (Acts 5:4; Rom. 9:21; 13:1-3; I Cor. 9:4-6; 11:10); of God the Father (Acts 1:7); of Christ (Matt. 9:6,8; 28: 18); of Satan (Acts 26:18). See ASV, RSV. Gr. words ischýs and krátos occur almost with the sense of dýnamis.

PRAETOR (prē'tôr). The word derives from the verb praeire, to go before or to lead, and designated originally the highest Roman magistrate. Hence the adjective praetorius in such expressions as praetorium for a provincial seat of government, and the cohors praetoria for the imperial guard. When the praetors of earlier days became known as consuls, the term praetor was applied to officials elected to administer justice. The usage may be traced back to 366 B.C. although there is some question whether a new office was created on or around that date, or whether the term represents a new division of functions. With Rome's acquisition of overseas provinces, there was an enlargement of praetorial activity, and the number of the officers increased to four in 227 B.C. to cover the administration of Sicily and Sardinia, and to six in 197 B.C. to cover Spain. Hence a resumption of military functions, earlier held by the consuls only, and a narrowing of the margin of superior authority between consul and praetor. The praetors played a major part as officers of justice in developing the corpus of Roman law. With the principate the office, though nominally in existence, declined in prestige, power and functions, until eventually it was an honorary sinecure. E.M.B.

PRAETORIAN GUARD (prē-tō'rĭ-ăn). The term "Praetorian Guard" does not actually occur in the Scriptures, but has been implied in the statements of Paul about the Praetorium and Caesar's household (Phil. 1:13 and 4:22), which have been viewed as the emperor's army garrison or bodyguard in Rome. Recently, however, scholars have discovered that "Caesar's house" refers not only to soldiers but to all those in government service, and this not confined to Rome but also in the provincial capitals as well. This gives the term a somewhat broader meaning and allows that Paul could have written the captivity letters while in prison in a city outside of Rome.

PRAETORIUM (prē-tō'rĭ-ŭm), also Pretorium, the Latin term for the Greek praitórion which among the Romans could refer to a number of things. Originally it meant the general's tent in the camp of an army station. Sometimes it referred to the military headquarters in Rome itself or in the provincial capitals. It also meant the staff of men in such an establishment or even the session of a planning council. In the Gospels (Matt. 27:27; Mark 15:16; John 18:28,33) it refers to the temporary palace or headquarters ("judgment hall") of the Roman governor or procurator while in Jerusalem, which was actually Herod's palace adjacent to the temple. Cf. Acts 23:35. It was the scene of the trial of Jesus before Pontius Pilate. No doubt the debated reference in Phil. 1:13 (cf. Phil. 4:22 "Caesar's household") means the headquarters of the emperor's bodyguard which modern research has shown could have been either in Rome or in some of the provincial capitals.

PRAISE (prāz), a broad term for words or deeds which exalt or honor men (Prov. 27:21), women (Prov. 31:30), heathen gods (Judg. 16:24) or God, especially in song (Exod. 15:11, RSV glorious deeds). Some of the Heb. and Greek words mean thangsgiving, blessing, glory, and are often so translated (II Chron. 7:3,6; Luke 1:64; John 9:24). Greek areté, virtue, occurs in I Peter 2:9. ASV excellencies, RSV wonderful deeds. We are to be the praise of God's glory (Eph. 1:6,12,14). The book of Psalms is filled with praise, increasing in intensity toward the end (Ps. 145-150). Psalms 113-118 are called the Hallel, the praises. Praise for redemption dominates the NT (Luke 2:13,14; Rev. 19:5-7).

PRAYER (Heb. tephillâh, Gr. déesis, proseuché). As an interesting aspect of comparative religion, prayer can be objectively, psychologically dissected, and historically studied; and unquestionably all of these approaches to it have a definite value. Our major interest, however, is with the concept and role of prayer in Biblical faith; prayer outside the revelational orbit will here be dealt with quite incidentally.

I. The Phenomenon of Prayer. Created in the image of God, man is incurably religious: "Atheists are made, not born." And because religion is universal and ineradicable, prayer is the same. Recognizing their dependence upon some higher order of reality, people everywhere seek a propitious relationship with that higher order no matter what their understanding of it may be — primitive or sophisticated, gross or spiritual, anthropomorphic or impersonal. People never outgrow their need for prayer any more than their need for air and food; prayer does not become anachronistic either culturally or chronologically. Living in a precarious world, surrounded by the vast and terrifying forces of nature, inescapably death-shadowed, people in their weakness, anguish, and need pray spontaneously. Especially in times of crisis is the instinctive nature of prayer disclosed (cf. Ps. 107:23-28).

While comparative religion documents the universality of prayer, the pages of the Bible also supply abundant evidence of this fact. Thus the priests of Baal cried unto their gods (I Kings 18:26-29); thus, too, among the learned idolators of Athens Paul found altars at every turn (Acts 17:15-23), mute witnesses of man's groping search for supernatural help and mercy. Poignant indeed is David's cry in Psalm 65:2.

Perhaps this universal phenomenon merely attests a universal illusion; perhaps there is no supernatural order, and hence human beings lift their hands to an empty sky. But the opposite hypothesis is equally as valid, more so indeed: prayer, we may boldly assert, attests the reality of a supernatural order upon which man ultimately depends and with which he was created to fellowship.

Yet though prayer is a universal phenomenon, it becomes unique and commanding in Biblical faith. So Friedrich Heiler writes in his remarkable study of this universal phenomenon, "Christianity, including the prophetic religion of the Old Testament is 'the peculiar home of personal prayer,' as Soderblom remarks, or it is, as Bousset says, simply, 'the religion of prayer,' that is, the religion in which prayer is the focus of personal piety. To be a Christian means to be one who prays. 'Thou then art not a Christian that art not a praying person' — such is the judgment of Bunyan. Luther remarks in his homely way: 'As a shoemaker makes a shoe, and a tailor makes a coat, so ought a Christian to pray. Prayer is the daily business of a Christian.' To be sure, prayer is the essential utterance of all the religions of the world; it is not an exclusively Christian but a universally human phenomenon. But the personal life of prayer, free and living intercourse with God, has its native abode in Christianity as it has nowhere else in the entire history of religion" (Friedrich Heiler, Prayer, New York: Oxford University Press, 1932, p. 119).

And Biblical prayer, let it be borne in mind, is here and now the focus of our concern.

II. The Philosophy of Prayer. Scripture nowhere offers any apologia for prayer: it simply assumes the necessity and effectiveness of man's communication with God, provided certain conditions are met (cf. Section V. below, "The Principles of Prayer"). It does not argue, therefore, whether prayer is compatible with a system of law. In fact, it does not teach a reign of law; it teaches the sovereignty and activity of the living God in whose hands nature is like pliable clay. Consequently, it teaches that in answer to prayer God may produce events which a system of law left to itself could not and would not produce. And why, we may ask, is this incredible? Human will and intelligence constantly produce events in nature which nature left to itself could not and would not produce. Thus once we assume the reality of the living God, answered prayer becomes credible even in terms of modifying the natural order, to say nothing of modifying the psychological order (Prov. 21:1).

But even if the reality of the living God is assumed, a Person who is dynamic Will rather than static Intelligence, a Person who can be described in terms of anthropomorphic realism, must we not admit that the very idea of prayer implies a Deity whose mind can be changed? If God is all-wise, all-powerful, and all-good, prayer is apparently superfluous and futile. In His omnipotence He knows our needs, just as in His goodness and omnipotence He will certainly supply them. Moreover, He has assuredly mapped out from all eternity the entire course of things. Then why pray? The Bible does not debate these issues which emerge, obviously, from the paradoxical relationship between human responsibility and divine sovereignty. It asserts both sides of this paradox and leaves the riddle for future unraveling. Steadfastly, however, it presupposes that the relationship between God and man is genuinely interpersonal, not the relationship between impersonal automata but the relationship between Thou and I, Parent and child, Friend and friend, Master and servant, King and subject, Creator and creature. Hence it makes God's knowledge, power and goodness the very ground of petition (Matt. 6:32; 7:7-11). Hence, moreover, it makes prayer the channel of human creativity and causality in cooperation with the divine ordaining and over-ruling. Things are brought to pass only as man prays, and without his prayer some things do not occur (I Tim. 2:1-4), although of course the prayer, together with its answer and all of its outworking is embraced in God's eternal counsel.

Loyal to the teaching of Scripture, so doughty a Calvinist as Charles Haddon Spurgeon could say, "Prayer is able to prevail with Heaven and bend omnipotence to its desire." And Soren Kierkegaard could write in his diary, "The Archimedean point outside the world is the little chamber where a true suppliant prays in all sincerity — where he lifts the world off its hinges" (cf. Heiler, op. cit., p. 279). Nor must we ignore this fact: according to the Bible prayer goes unanswered unless certain conditions, which we shall shortly examine, are met. Nothing could show more plainly that prayer is the farthest removed from pious pretense; it is no matter of spiritual gymnastics possessing only a reflex value psychologically. Quite the reverse. Biblically considered, it is a force, a vera causa, the efficacy of which depends upon a proper interpersonal relationship: Let Heiler once again sum up the case for us: "Because the man of today, entangled in the prejudices of a rationalistic philosophy, struggles against the primitive realism of frank and free prayer, he is inclined to see the ideal and essence of prayer in a vague, devotional mood and in aesthetic contemplation. But the essence of prayer is revealed with unquestionable clearness to penetrating psychological study, and it may be put thus: to pray means to speak to and have intercourse with God, as suppliant with judge, servant with master, child with father, bride with bridegroom. The severely non-rational character of religion nowhere makes so overwhelming an impression as in prayer. For modern thought, dominated by Copernicus and Kant, prayer is as great a stone of stumbling as it was for the enlightened philosophy of the Greeks. But a compromise between unsophisticated piety and a rational worldview obliterates the essential features of prayer, and the most living manifestation of religion withers into a lifeless abstraction. There are only two possibilities: either decisively to affirm prayer 'in its entirely non-rational character and with all its difficulties,' as Menegoz says, or to surrender genuine prayer and substitute for it adoration and devotion which resemble prayer. Every attempt to mingle the two conceptions violates psychological veracity" (op. cit., p. 362).

III. The Practice of Prayer. As a many-faceted phenomenon, prayer must not be reduced merely to supplication, as is sometimes done. The immense sweep of Biblical teaching with respect to this phenomenon can scarcely be compressed into the single and rather crass category of "getting things from God," to quote the title of a once popular book by Charles A. Blanchard. Prayer, essentially, is communion, a desire to enter into conscious and intimate relationship with the Thou who is our life (Ps. 63:1-8; Ps. 73:25-26; Luke 6:12; I John 1:3). And the astonishing corollary of this truth is that God hungers for man's fellowship (Rev. 3:20). Prayer is also adoration, the praise of God because of His greatness and goodness. The Book of Psalms is a collection of man's loving, awe-inspired praise as, contemplating his Creator and Saviour, he is lost in wonder and amazement at the purity, pity, and power of the perfect Person. Again, prayer is thanksgiving, the outpouring of gratitude to God because of His grace, mercy, and lovingkindness. Psalm 103 is a classic expression of the emotion aroused by unmerited blessing. The entire Psalter, indeed, is full of such hymns. Once more, prayer is confession as sinful man acknowledges his guilty disobedience. David's penitential candor in Psalm 51 voices the common experience of transgression followed by grief-stricken remorse before God. Inevitably this kind of prayer becomes petition as the offender beseeches cleansing. In the words of Heiler, "Petition for the forgiveness of sins occupies a central position in prophetic prayer, while in mysticism it belongs to the periphery of the devotional life. The devout person seeks to be delivered from the feeling of guilt which oppresses him, from the crushing sense of his nothingness and powerlessness, which prevents him from meeting life in confidence and hope. Nothing but divine grace, freely bestowed, can transform the bitter self-condemnation to firm self-confidence, the trembling fear to peace and trust" (op. cit., p. 243). Prayer, still further, then, is petition, a plea for personal help. Under the pressure of need man begs God for some specific favor. The legitimacy of petition is guaranteed by the very prayer which our Lord taught us to pray, in which we ask not only for pardon but likewise for bread and deliverance (Matt. 6:9-15). Paul is following his Master when he directs his converts to ask quite literally for anything (Phil. 4:6). Prayer, yet again, is intercession which we may define as petition on behalf of one's neighbor, entreaty for his good, his beatitude. Consider Paul's burden for Israel (Rom. 9:1-2; 10:1) in which egocentric interests are completely obliterated. Prayer, finally, is submission. As man abandons his own desires, he surrenders his will to God's will. This is prayer at its highest level, the antithesis of primitive magic which thinks that the supernatural may be coerced, wheedled, shamed, or bribed into doing man's will (cf. Heiler, op. cit., pp. 32-35). When this level is reached, the instrumental use of the supernatural has been transcended by a faith which commits life unreservedly to the divine love, wisdom and power. The supreme illustration of such surrender is of course our Lord Jesus Christ who after His Gethsemane-struggle could say, "Not my will, but thine be done" (Luke 22:42). So when a worshiper practices prayer, he may be engaging in adoration, communion, thanksgiving, confession, petition, intercession, and submission.

Regardless of what kind of prayer he may be practicing, however, the pivotal factor is his attitude. Posture, language, place or time — none of these trifles matter. In all such respects the greatest liberty is permitted if only a man's heart is en rapport with God. In the Bible, accordingly, people pray kneeling (I Kings 8:54; Ezra 9:5; Dan. 6:10; Acts 20:36), standing (Jer. 18:20), sitting (II Sam. 7:18) or even lying prostrate (Matt. 26:39). They pray sometimes with hands uplifted (I Kings 8:22; Ps. 28:2; 134:2; I Tim. 2:8). They pray silently (I Sam. 1:13); they pray aloud (Ezek. 11:13); they pray alone (Mark 1:35; Matt. 6:6); they pray together (Ps. 35:18; Matt. 18:19; Acts 4:31); they pray at fixed times (Ps. 55:17; Dan. 6:10) or at any time (Luke 18:1); they pray everywhere (I Tim. 2:8) — in bed (Ps. 63:6), in open field (Gen. 24:11,12), in temple (II Kings 19:14)), at the riverside (Acts 16:13), on the seashore (Acts 21:5), or battlefield (I Sam. 7:5); they pray spontaneously (Matt. 6:7), they pray liturgically (e.g. Ps. 120-126); they pray, as we have observed, quite literally for everything (Phil. 4:6; Gen. 24:12-14; I Tim. 2:1-4).

The intensity, freedom and effectiveness of Biblical prayer may best be seen in the lives of its greatest personalities. Consider, for instance, the prayers of Moses (Exod. 32:11-13,31,32; 33:12-18; Num. 11:11-15; 14:13-19); Abraham (Gen. 18:22-33); Jacob (Gen. 32:24-30); Elijah (James 5:17-18); David (Ps. 3, 32, etc.); Solomon (II Chron. 1:7-12; 6:14-42); Hezekiah (II Kings 19:14-19; cf. Isa. 37:14-20); Ezra (9:5-15); Jeremiah (17:13-18; Lam. 5); Paul (Eph. 1:15-22; 3:14-19, etc.). Though these instances are rather arbitrarily selected, they nevertheless verify Heiler's conclusions. In Biblical faith and practice (1) prayer is carried on apart from sacrifice; (2) prayer is a matter of continuous intercourse with God;

(3) prayer is not only a human work or achievement; it is inspired, elicited, and energized by the Spirit of God; (4) prayer is a gift of power to be conscientiously desired, developed, and disciplined; (5) prayer is not a quest for mundane happiness but rather for divine fellowship and eternal salvation; (6) prayer is vastly more than petition and persuasion, it is "adoring reverence, wonder, ecstasy, yearning, desire, surrender, love, confidence, trust, resolve, resignation, serenity"; (7) prayer is in spirit and in truth, release from all limitations of place; the believing heart becomes God's temple (John 4:24; I Cor. 6:19-20) (cf. Heiler, op. cit., pp. 105-115).

IV. The Pattern of Prayer. In this area of spiritual experience as in every area of relationship with God, Jesus Christ has left an unsurpassed and perfect example (I Pet. 2:21). Prayer occupied a place of singular importance in His own life and teaching. In time of decision and crisis He gave Himself to prayer. Thus our Lord prayed when He was baptized (Luke 3:21-22); when He chose His twelve apostles (Luke 6:12-13); when He was transfigured (Luke 9:29); when He was engaging in sustained and exhausting service (Mark 1:35-39); when He called forth Lazarus from the grave (John 11:41-42); when He was burdened for Simon Peter (Luke 22:31-32); when He faced betrayal, execution, and divine abandonment (Mark 14:32-42); when He thought of His disciples and their future ministry (John 17); and when He died (Luke 23:46).

But our Lord also prayed in times of joy (Luke 10:21), even as He prayed gratefully when food was served (Luke 22:17; John 6:11). Prayer, indeed, was so evidently the habit of our Saviour's life that His example aroused within His followers a longing for the same power and blessing (Luke 11:1). Every kind of prayer may be found in the Gospel record — communion, adoration, thanksgiving, petition, intercession, and submission; yes, every kind but one — confession. With that exception it may be said that our Lord's model prayer (Matt. 6:8-15), together with His parables and discourses on this subject, sprang from His own experience with the Father (Matt. 6:1-7; 18:21-33; Mark 11:22-26; Luke 7:3-4; 11:5-13; 18:1-8; John 14:13-14; 15:1-7; 16:24-26).

Now in His state of exaltation our Saviour functions as a Priest whose all-absorbing task is intercession (Heb. 7:25).

Questions concerning the necessity and value of prayer evaporate in the light of this Example. Philosophical and psychological difficulties are transcended as we follow the divine Pattern.

V. The Principles of Prayer. Undeniably, however, some requests are denied: fervent pleas do go unanswered — if we may ignore the contention that "No" and "Not yet" and "In some strange disguise" are divine answers equally as valid as "Yes." It is not merely that some of God's devoted servants have seasons when prayer seems to be unavailing (Ps. 88:13-14; Lam. 3:44; Hab. 1:2, 13); there are likewise cases where a repeated petition is refused for reasons which may be humanly opaque (II Chron. 12:7-9). Yet granting that some cases of unanswered prayer are at present inexplicable (I Cor. 13:12), there are other cases where the divine refusal can be accounted for by the suppliant's failure to obey the principles which govern effective intercession. The God-man relationship, we have previously asserted, is not that of automata; it is genuinely interpersonal. Hence, as in any I-Thou fellowship, certain conditions must be met. Assuming, then, that filial bond established by an acceptance of Jesus Christ as Saviour (Matt. 5:1-2; 6:8; Rom. 8:14-17; Gal. 3:23; cf. John 8:44), the following principles appear to be regulative. 1. Prayer avails only as it is made in faith (Heb. 11:6; Matt. 17:20; Mark 11:23-24; James 1:6). 2. Prayer avails only as it is made in the Name of Jesus (John 14:13; 15:16). This is scarcely reducible to a verbal formula thoughtlessly attached to any petition. No doubt it implies a trustful acknowledgment of our Saviour's person and work; but, in addition, this principle bespeaks an identification of purpose, a request to which Christ can affix His imprimatur because it is in harmony with His own concerns. 3. Prayer avails only as it is made in keeping with the will of God (I John 5:14-15). Hence sinful egocentricity precludes effectiveness in supplication (James 4:2-3). 4. Prayer avails only as it is made under the direction and dynamic of the Holy Spirit (Jude 20). This is not simply because of our tepid hearts; it is also because of our darkened minds. We are ignorant of God's will, and this ignorance must be dispelled (Matt. 20:22; John 4:10; Rom. 8:26-27). 5. Prayer avails only as it is made by a suppliant who has confessed and renounced sin (Ps. 66:18; Prov. 28:9; Isa. 59:1-2). 6. Prayer avails only as it is made by a forgiving heart; our Lord repeatedly indicates that unforgiveness is a fatal hindrance to effective intercession (Matt. 6:12-15; 18:21-35; Mark 11:25-26; cf. James 5:14-16). 7. Prayer avails only as it is made in a context of harmonious relationships on the human level (Matt. 5:23-24; 18:19; I Pet. 3:1-7). 8. Prayer avails only as it is made with importunity (Luke 11:5-8; 18:1-8), for persistence evidences genuine care, compassion, and concern. 9. Prayer avails only as it is made with concentration and intensity (James 5:16). This is one reason why our Lord teaches the need for detachment (Matt. 6:6; cf. Mark 1:35). This, too, is why He advises fasting (Mark 9:29; cf. Acts 13:1-3).

Albrecht Durer's famous representation of prayer, "Praying Hands."

VI. The Profit of Prayer. Under the pressure of emotional and physical suffering Job skeptically inquired, "What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have, if we pray unto him?" (Job 21:15). But prayer, obviously, is of incalculable profit. From the standpoint of human responsibility, it is the major element in the outworking of God's redemptive program (I Tim. 2:1-4). Besides this, prayer is the source of vision, power, creativity, and blessing in personal experience. Consequently, because of its profit, we are enjoined to give this ministry unquestioned priority (Luke 18:1; Eph. 6:18; Phil. 4:6; I Tim. 2:1; I Thess. 5:17). Neglect of prayer or indolence in prayer is nothing short of sin (I Sam. 12:23), since it impedes the operation of God's grace in man's life. V.C.G.

PREACHER, PREACHING (See Occupations & Professions)

PREDESTINATION (See Election)

PRESBYTERY (prĕz'bĭ-tĕr-ē, Gr. presbytérion), the Christian elders who formally recognized Timothy's spiritual gift (I Tim. 4:14, RSV the elders). The same Greek word occurs in Luke 22:66 (KJV, ASV the elders, RSV the assembly of the elders) and Acts 22:5 (KJV, ASV the estate of the elders, RSV council of elders) for the organized body of Jewish elders in Jerusalem.

PRESIDENTS (prĕz'ĭ-dĕnts, Heb. sārekhîn, chief). Administrative officers whose duties are not clearly defined. Three were placed by Darius over the 120 satraps in his kingdom and Daniel was one of the three (Dan. 6:2-7).

PRESS (Gr. apothlíbo, to crowd and óchlos, a crowd), words used in Mark 2:4 and Luke 8:19 in the sense of crowd.

PRESS FAT (prĕs'făt, Heb. yeqev, a trough), the vessel used to collect the liquid from pressed grapes (Hag. 2:16).

PRESS (oil or wine), a rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words used to refer to a device used for extracting liquids from certain fruits from which wines and oils were made. Some of these were small handmills while others were made of two large stones. One turned on the other by horses or mules so that the fruit was crushed between them.

PRICK (Heb. sēkh, a thorn, Gr. kéntron, a goad), any slender-pointed thing, like a thorn (Num. 33:55). The Greek expression is used of the spiritual goads of conviction against which Saul kicked before his conversion (Acts 9:5; 26:14).

PRIEST, PRIESTHOOD. The English word "priest" is derived from the Greek presbytéros, which means elder, and suggests the priestly function of counsel. The NT word for "priest," hiereús, related to hierós, holy, indicates one who is consecrated to and engaged in holy matters.

The Hebrew kōhēn, priest, is of uncertain origin, but seems originally to have meant a "seer," as well as one who has to do with divine things. The derivation of the words does not give much light on the Biblical usage. For practical Bible study we may simply say that a priest is a minister of any religion, whether heathen (Gen. 41:45; Acts 14:13) or Biblical (Matt. 8:4; I Pet. 2:5,9).

The history of the formal priesthood in Israel begins with the time of the Exodus. In the patriarchal times the heads of families offered sacrifices and intercessory prayers, and performed general religious functions, but there seems to have been no specialization and no separate priestly office, as there was among the Egyptians (Gen. 47:22, 26), and in the instance of Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18-20).

It is in Exodus 28 and 29 and Leviticus 8 that we have the record of the founding of the Aaronic order of priests. The choice of the tribe of Levi as the priestly tribe to serve as assistants to the Aaronic priests is recorded in Numbers 3 (see Exod. 32:26-29; Num. 8:16ff).

It is not possible in this article to go into technical historical and critical questions related to the OT priesthood. The reader who is interested in those matters will find extended discussions from a relatively conservative point of view in ISBE, HBD and in Oehler's Old Testament Theology (see index). The common critical view is given in R. H. Pfeiffer's Int. to the OT, 1941 (see "Priesthood," "Priestly Cities," and "Priestly Code" in the index, p. 913). Current critical opinion on the historical priesthood is reflected in the Journal of Biblical Literature for March 1961 in an article by Professor R. B. Y. Scott of Princeton University discussing the relationships between the priests, the prophets, and the wise men; and in the first article of a series by Professor Menahem Horan of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem on the ancient Levitical Cities.

Major attention must here be confined to the theological, devotional, and ethical implications of the Biblical idea of the priest and the priesthood.

The priesthood of Christ is the principal theme of the Epistle to the Hebrews. "Christ as our redeemer executeth the offices of a prophet, of a priest, and of a king, both in his estate of humiliation and exaltation" (Westminster Shorter Catechism, p. 23). The three offices of Christ are the subject of Chap. XV of Book II of Calvin's Institutes. The distinction of the offices, particularly the priestly, is not to be made rigidly, as though there were no overlapping; nevertheless the distinction has been found illuminating and profitable for an understanding of the Bible.

That Christ combines in Himself the three offices is a matter of special significance. After the establishment of the Aaronic priesthood, it was considered an offense in Israel for anyone not officially consecrated as a priest to offer formal ritual sacrifices. The rebellion of Korah (Num. 16) involved intrusion into the priesthood, even though he and his associates were Levites (vss. 8,9). King Saul was rebuked for a similar intrusion (I Sam. 13:18ff), and King Uzziah was smitten with leprosy for this offense (II Chron. 26:16ff).

The offices of prophet and priest might be combined in one person (John 11:49-52). Jeremiah was a member of a priestly family (Jer. 1:1). The offices of king and prophet might also be combined (Acts 2:29-31), but the kingly line of David was of the non-priestly tribe of Judah, and therefore no king of David's line could have been also a priest according to the Levitical law.

The NT writers make much of the fact that Jesus was "of the house and lineage of David" (Luke 2:4,5. Cf Mark 11:10; Matt. 21:9). How then could He be also a priest? The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews finds the scriptural answer in the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 6:10,20-7:17), who was Abraham's superior and both king and priest. This amplifies Zechariah's prophecy (6:13) that "the Branch" (cf. Isa. 4:2; Jer. 23:5,6) will be "A priest upon his throne."

The atonement of Christ was just as effective before the event as afterward. The highpriestly office of Christ did not begin at His incarnation; it was a fact known to David (Ps. 110:4) along with His sovereign lordship (vs. 1). His priesthood with reference to fallen humanity was established in the eternal decrees of God, and has been exercised in every age on behalf of God's elect. The Bible presents Christ, our Prophet, Priest and King, as a figure of cosmic proportions, whose work as our Redeemer has "neither beginning of days nor end of life."

The priestly ministry of Christ is introduced in the Epistle to the Hebrews 1:3 in the words, "when he had made a cleansing of sins." This is, of course, a reference to His death on the cross, regarded as an atoning sacrifice. But this act of sacrifice was not a mere symbol, as were all of the Aaronic priestly acts; it was of infinite intrinsic worth. He was "crowned with glory and honor for the purpose of suffering death, in order that by the grace of God he might taste of death [sufficiently for the offer of salvation] for every man" (2:9).

Christ's priesthood was in no sense contrary to the Aaronic order. It fulfilled all the soteriological significance of it. But the priesthood of Christ furnished the substance of which the Aaronic priesthood was only the shadow (Col. 2:17; Heb. 8:5) and symbol.

Examination of the wealth of detail in which the priesthood of Christ is said to complete and supersede the Aaronic priesthood, especially in Hebrews 5-10, would require an elaborate and extended thesis. All that is possible here is an attempt to clarify certain points of misunderstanding.

The tabernacle of which Christ is the High Priest is the entire cosmic scene of the redemption of God's elect. This was the "pattern" which Moses saw (Heb. 8:5), God's plan of salvation. It includes all the spiritual and temporal furniture of heaven and earth. The cross of Christ was the altar of sacrifice on which He offered Himself. When He gave up His life on the cross, the atonement was "finished" (John 19:30) once and for all (Heb. 7:27; 9:26) with absolutely nothing more for God or man to add to it. The meaning of Romans 4:25 is not that His resurrection added anything to our justification, but that, having died "on account of the trespasses" which we had committed, He was raised from the dead "on account of the justification" which He had fully accomplished in His death. His resurrection does not add to the atonement, but it proves that His death was a victory.

On the day of atonement in Levitical ritual (Lev. 16) the high priest had to go in and out past the veil, or curtain, which separated the holy of holies from the outer holy place. By this symbolism the Holy Spirit (Heb. 9:8,9) signifies that "the way of the sanctuaries was not yet made clear" while the Levitical mode of worship still had its proper standing. But when Jesus' body was broken on the cross, this symbolized the rending of the veil (Heb. 10:19-22) and the clear revealing of the way into the very presence of God (Matt. 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 23:45).

The notion that the atonement was not finished until Jesus presented His blood in some far distant sanctuary is entirely unscriptural. The atonement was finished on the cross in the immediate presence of God the Father. The "way of the sanctuaries" is now fully revealed. The veil is rent from top to bottom and no longer hides the "place of mercy."

True, the veil is once spoken of (Heb. 6:18-20; see also 4:14) as though it still cut off our view, but this is a different metaphor. It is not the "mercy seat" which is hidden in Hebrews 6:18-20, but the "hope which lies before us," the "unshakable kingdom" (Heb. 9:28; 12:26-29).

The present intercession of Christ is taught in Hebrews 7:25; Romans 8:34. (Cf. Rom. 8:26,27 for the intercession of the Holy Spirit.) But there is nothing in the Scripture to indicate an unfinished atonement or, as it were, an unfinished case in court. (The Adventist doctrine of "investigative judgment" is particularly erroneous. See Walter Martin's discussion of this doctrine in his valuable book on Seventh Day Adventism. Zondervan 1960). The NT word for intercession does not necessarily indicate any plea being offered. It suggests conferring over, or brooding over. Similarly the word "advocate" in I John 2:1 does not mean that our case is not completely settled. "Who is going to implead against the elect of God?" (Rom. 8:33.) Satan accuses, but he has no standing in court. The case is settled, the verdict is rendered. We are justified in Christ. Now our "Advocate," our great High Priest broods over us and counsels and guides.

The comparisons of different priesthoods in the epistle to the Hebrews are not between the religion of the OT and the "Churchianity" of this age. The comparisons are between the outward form of Judaism and the reality in Christ. Every argument against Judaism could be turned with equal logic against the outward forms of the church, if Christ be not the center of it all.

The priesthood of believers can be but briefly mentioned. Our church sacraments conducted by ordained ministers are analogous to those of the OT. They are but shadows, as worthless as "the blood of goats and bulls and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean" (Heb. 9:13), unless they are received by genuine faith in the atonement of Christ. No human being in any age could do more than shadow forth the atonement of Christ. (Ps. 49:7) "None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him."

All believers in all ages when mortal men exist are "a kingdom of priests" (Exod. 19:6; I Pet. 2:5,9; Rev. 20:6. The correct reading in Rev. 1:6 and 5:10 is not "kings" but "a kingdom" of priests). Paul in Romans 15:16; Philippians 2:17; II Timothy 4:6 uses symbols of priestly ritual with reference to his own ministry. We do not reign with Christ, i.e. we are not "kings," until He comes to reign (Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:18,28-30; cf. I Cor. 4:8) but we are priests as we bring the Word of God to men, and bring men to Christ. It is significant that the priestly function of believers continues through the millennial reign of Christ (Rev. 20:6), but not in the perfection of the new heavens and new earth (Rev. 21:4; 22:5) when mortality will have ended, and sin been completely eliminated. There will be no need for the priesthood of believers after the judgment of the Great White Throne. "Today" is the day of salvation (Heb. 3:13). J.O.B.

PRINCE, PRINCESS (prĭns, prĭn'-sĕs). A prince is a leader, an exalted person clothed with authority. A princess is the daughter or wife of a chief or king. Several Heb. and Greek words occur, the meaning varying with the context. There are princes of various nations (Matt. 20:25 ASV, RSV rulers); of (part of) the land of Canaan (Gen. 34:2); of Ishmael's descendants (Gen. 17:20; 25:16); of the Hittites (Gen. 23:6); of Egypt (Gen. 12:15); of the Philistines (I Sam. 18:30); of Persia (Esth. 1:3), called satraps in ASV, RSV of Daniel 3:2, etc.; of Babylon (Jer. 39:13 ASV, RSV chief officers); of Tyre (Ezek. 28:2); of the north (Ezek. 32:30); of Meshech and Tubal (Ezek. 38:2 ASV margin, chief princes). There were merchant princes in Tyre (Isa. 23:8). The heads of the tribes or of the congregation of Israel are princes (Num. 1:16 RSV leaders; Josh. 9:15 RSV leaders). David is called prince (I Kings 14:7 ASV margin, RSV leader), and he eulogizes Abner as a prince (II Sam. 3:38). The enemies of Jesus call Him Beelzebub, prince of the demons (Mark 3:22). The devil is the prince of this world (John 12:31 RSV ruler). Personal spiritual powers of evil are princes (I Cor. 2:6 ASV, RSV rulers; Eph. 2:2). Messiah is the prince (Dan. 9:25); of Peace (Isa. 9:6); of Life (Acts 3:15 ASV margin, RSV Author); of the kings of the earth (Rev. 1:5 ASV, RSV ruler). Bethlehem is called one of the princes of Judah (Matt. 2:6 RSV rulers) because the Davidic dynasty had its origin there.

Of princesses far less is said. Solomon had 700 princesses as wives, in contrast with 300 concubines (I Kings 11:3). Jerusalem is apostrophized as a princess (Lam. 1:1). A king's daughter (Ps. 45:9-12) a prince's daughter (S. of Sol. 7:1 RSV queenly maiden), and a daughter of a prince of Midian (Num. 25:18) are mentioned. The new name of Abraham's wife, Sarah, means princess (Gen. 17:15 ASV margin).

PRINCIPALITIES (prĭn'sĭ-păl'ĭ-tēz, Heb. mera'ăshôth, headparts, Gr. arché, first). The Hebrew word is found only in Jeremiah 13:18. Six times the NT uses the word in the English Bible to refer to powerful angels and demons (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 6:12).

PRINT, the translation of two Hebrew words and one Greek word, meaning a mark made by pressure. Moses forbade the Jews to make any cuttings or marks on the dead or living body (Lev. 19:28). Once the word is found in Job (Job 13:27). Twice John uses the word to refer to the print of the nails in Christ's hands (John 20:25).

PRISCA, PRISCILLA (prĭs'kà, Gr. Príska; prĭ-sĭl'à, Gr. Priskilla). Priscilla (diminutive of Prisca, Rom. 16:3) was the wife of the Jewish Christian, Aquila, with whom she is always mentioned in the NT. They were tentmakers who seem to have migrated about the Mediterranean world teaching the Gospel wherever they went. Paul meets them in Corinth (Acts 18:2); they instruct Apollos in Ephesus (Acts 18:24-26); Paul sends them greetings in Rome (Rom. 16:3); and in I Corinthians 16:19 Paul speaks of them being in Ephesus again where they had a church in their house. In Romans 16:3-4 Paul not only lauds their service but their courage as well ("who for my life laid down their own necks"), and plainly states that all the churches owe them a debt of gratitude. From all the scriptural references one may easily infer that Prisca was a well-known and effective worker in the early church.

PRISON (prĭz''n), a place where persons sûspected, accused, or convicted of crime are kept. Most Heb. and Greek words used have the idea of restraint. Joseph was cast into a pit while his brothers decided how to dispose of him (Gen. 37:22-28), and into the Egyptian king's prison, in the house of the captain of the guard (Gen. 39:20-40:7). Samson was confined in a Philistine prison at Gaza (Judg. 16:21,25). Prisoners taken in war were usually killed or enslaved (Num. 21:1 ASV, RSV captive; Isa. 20:4). Under the monarchy Micaiah the prophet was imprisoned (I Kings 22:27; II Chron. 18:26), where his food was bread and water. Jeremiah was threatened with prison (Jer. 29:26) including the stocks and shackles or collar (ASV, RSV), and subjected to long imprisonment (Jer. 32:2; 33:1) in the court of the guard in the king's house; again in a dungeon, whence he was transferred to the house of Jonathan the scribe, which had been made a prison (Jer. 37:14-21); then in a dungeon or cistern (RSV) in the prison (Jer. 38:6-28), whence Ebed-melech rescued him; restored to the court of the guard; and finally released (Jer. 39:14). Kings were imprisoned by conquerors (II Kings 17:4; 25:27,29; Jer. 52:11,33; Eccl. 4:14).

The pitiable state of those in prison is spoken of (Ps. 79:11; Isa. 14:17; 42:22; Lam. 3:34; Zech. 9:11), and their hope in God (Ps. 69:33; 102:20; 142:7; 146:7; Isa. 42:7). John the Baptist was imprisoned for criticizing a king's marriage (Matt. 4:12; 11:2; 14:3,10 and parallels); Peter and John for preaching about Jesus (Acts 4:3; 5:18-25); Peter was delivered by an angel (Acts 12:3-19). Paul led Christians to prison (Acts 8:3; 22:4; 26:10) and was himself often in prison (II Cor. 11:23); with Silas at Philippi (Acts 16:23-40); in Jerusalem (23:18); in Caesarea (25:27); on shipboard (27:1,42); under house arrest in his own rented dwelling (28:16,17,30). He refers to his imprisonment as for the Lord (Eph. 3:1; 4:1; Phil. 1:14,17; II Tim. 1:8; Philem. 9); to his fellow-prisoners (Rom. 16:7; Col. 4:10). Barabbas was released from prison in place of Jesus (Matt. 27:15,16 and parallels). Jesus refers to imprisonment on civil process, as for debt (Matt. 5:25; 18:30; Luke 12:58); to visiting those in prison (Matt. 25:36,39,43,44); and predicts that His followers will be put in prison during persecution (Luke 21:12; Rev. 2:10). Peter expresses willingness to go to prison with Jesus (Luke 22:33). Disobedient spirits are now in prison (I Pet. 3:19,20); Satan will be imprisoned during the Millennium (Rev. 20:7). E.R.

PROCHORUS (prŏk'ō-rŭs), the third in the list of the first deacons (Acts 6:5) who were elected to take care of the Greek-speaking widows and probably the Christians stricken with poverty in Jerusalem.

PROCONSUL (prō'kŏn-sŭl, Gr. anthýpatos), a Roman official, generally of praetorian or consular rank, who served as deputy consul in the Roman provinces. The term of office was one year, although it could be longer in special instances, but the powers of the proconsul were unlimited in both the military and civil areas. Sergius Paulus, St. Paul's famous convert (Acts 13:7), and Gallio (Acts 18:12) were such officials mentioned in the Bible. They are often called "deputy" in the English Bible.

PROCURATOR (prŏ'kū-rā'têr), the Latin term for the Greek hegemón, which is translated "governor" in the KJV. Pilate, Felix and Festus were such governors in Palestine with headquarters in Caesarea. Generally the procurators were appointed directly by the emperor to govern the Roman provinces and were often subject to the imperial legate of a larger political area. It should be noted that Quirinius, "Governor of Syria" (Luke 2:2), was really not a procurator but an imperial legate of the larger province of Syria.

PROFANE (prō-fān', Heb. hālal, to open and Gr. homologéo, to own before). The basic idea seems to be to desecrate or defile. For one to do what he was not allowed to do in connection with holy things or places was to profane them. Such things as the altar, the sabbath, the sanctuary and God's name could all be profaned. Esau was called a profane person because he despised his birthright (Heb. 12:16). A godless or unholy person in the NT is called profane.

PROMISE (prŏm'ĭs, Heb. dāvār, speaking, speech; dāvar, to speak; 'āmar, to say; 'ōmer, speech; Gr. epaggelía, promise). In the OT there is no Heb. word corresponding to promise; the words word, speak, and say being used instead. In the NT, however, the word promise is often used, usually in the technical sense of God's design to visit His people redemptively in the person of His Son. This promise is first given in the proto-evangelium (Gen. 3:15), is repeated to Abraham (Gen. 12:2,7, etc.), and to David that his house would continue on his throne (II Sam. 7:12,13,28), and is found repeatedly in the OT (Isa. 2:2-5; 4:2; 55:5, etc.). In the NT all these promises are regarded as having their fulfilment in Christ and His disciples (II Cor. 1:20; Eph. 3:6). Jesus' promise of the Spirit was fulfilled at Pentecost. Paul makes clear that God's promises to Abraham's seed were meant not only for the circumcision but for all who have Abraham's faith (Rom. 4:13-16). In the NT there are many promises of blessing to believers, among them the kingdom (James 2:5), eternal life (I Tim. 4:8), Christ's coming (II Pet. 3:9). S.B.

PROPHECY (See Prophets)

PROPHETS. Three Hebrew words are employed in the OT to designate the prophets, namely, nāvî', rō'eh and hōzeh. The last two words are participles, and may be rendered "seer." They are practically synonymous in meaning. The first term, nāvî', is difficult to explain etymologically, although various attempts have been made. The significance of these words, however, may be learned from their usage.

Each of the words designates one who is a spokesman for God. The usage of nāvî' is illustrated by Exodus 4:15,16 and 7:1. In these passages it is clearly taught that Moses stands in relation to the pharaoh as God. Between them is an intermediary, Aaron. Aaron is to speak to the pharaoh the words which Moses gives to him. "And he (i.e., Aaron) shall be thy spokesman unto the people: and he shall be, even he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God" (Exod. 4:16). The man who can be designated a nāvî', then, is one who speaks forth for God.

The two words rō'eh and hōzeh, perhaps have primary reference to the fact that the person so designated sees the message which God gives him. This seeing is probably to be conceived as having taken place in a vision. At the same time, even these two words serve to designate a man who, having seen the message of God, declares that message. The Biblical emphasis throughout is practical. It is not the dark background of the mode of reception of the prophetic revelation that stands in the fore, but rather the deliverance of the message for God.

In the Greek language the term prophetes (a forth-teller) had a wider significance than did the Hebrew word. It signified one who spoke for the god and interpreted the god's will. He would interpret the message of the Delphic oracle (e.g., Herodotus 8:36,37) or expound the utterances of the mantis. At times the word might indicate those who kept or guarded the oracles. In the LXX the term merely serves as a translation of the Hebrew and does not have the broader connotations that adhere to it in the classical literature.

The Greek also employed the verb manteuomai, which might be used of prophesying but also of divining. It could also refer to consulting an oracle, and at times could have merely the significance of foreboding or presaging. Related to it is the noun mantis which could apply to a prophet, but also to a seer or diviner, one who obtained information by observing omens (cf. Iliad 1:106). The noun manteia could designate divination as such, the power of divination, oracular and obscure expressions, the method of divining and the seat of an oracle. In the LXX, Numbers 22:7, it even denotes the rewards of divination.

The Biblical prophet must be distinguished from the prophetes of the Greeks. The latter really acted as an interpreter for the muses and the oracles. The prophets, however, were not interpreters. They uttered the actual words which God had given to them, without any modification or interpretation upon their part. The Bible itself gives an accurate description of the function of the true prophet, ". . . and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him" (Deut. 18:18b). The words are placed in the prophet's mouth by God, i.e., they are revealed to the prophet, and then the prophet speaks unto the nation precisely what God has commanded him.

Position of the Prophet in the Old Testament Economy. The establishment of the prophetic institution was necessitated by the settlement of the nation Israel in the Land of Promise. In entering Canaan, Israel came with the precious possession of the law. This law, revealed by God at Mt. Sinai, laid the broad basis upon which the life of the people of God was to be built. The basic principles of divinely revealed ethics and morality are found in the Ten Commandments, and sundry rules for particular situations are expressed in the other laws. Upon this basis the life of the people of God was to be conducted.

At the same time this law was not adequate to meet all the situations that would arise when the period of Israel's nomadic wanderings should come to an end. This inadequacy was not due to any inherent weakness in the law itself, but simply to the fact that the law did not speak in detail upon every possible situation that should arise in Israel's life. There would be occasions when a specific revelation of God would be needed in order to show the nation the course which it should pursue. This needed revelation God would give to the people by means of His servants, the prophets.

When Israel was to enter Canaan, it would find a people that sought to learn the future and the will of the gods by the practice of various superstitions which the Bible calls abominations (Deut. 18:9). These abominations were being regularly and continually practiced by the inhabitants of Canaan, and there was a danger that the Israelites would be influenced by them and would themselves learn to do them. To offset this danger the Lord declared that He would raise up the prophets and that the Israelites were to hearken to the prophets and to obey them (Deut. 18:15). Scripture uses the singular, "prophet," but it is clear from the context that the reference is to a body of prophets.

The prophet whom the Lord will raise is said to be like Moses, and this similarity appears in that just as Moses was a mediator between God and the nation, so the prophet would serve as a mediator. At Horeb, when God appeared to the nation, the people trembled, and asked that Moses alone should speak to them. God commended Israel for their request, and announced that there would be a mediator, even the prophets. The prophets, then, served as mediators between God and the nation. Just as the priests represented the people before God, so the prophets represented God to the people.

In ancient Greece we have the god, the oracle, the prophet, and the people. The same seems to have been the case in the Mesopotamian countries also. In Israel, however, there was only one intermediary between God and the people, namely, the prophet. This arrangement was truly unique. One who heard the words of the prophet heard the very words of God Himself, and these words required implicit obedience.

In many nations of antiquity there were soothsayers or men who had visions. They represented a part of that web of superstition which covered the ancient world. The prophetic institution of Israel, however, according to the testimony of the Bible, was of divine origination. God Himself raised up this institution (Deut. 18:15-18), and it is this fact which distinguished the prophets from the soothsayers of the Homeric world, and from other so-called "prophets" of antiquity.

The Relation of the Prophets to Moses. Unique as was the prophetical body, it can properly be understood only as having served under Moses. Moses occupied a position of preeminence in the OT economy. He was faithful in all God's house as a servant, and so pointed forward to Christ who as a Son is faithful over God's house (Heb. 3:1-6). To the prophets God made Himself known in dreams and visions, and probably also in dark, enigmatic sayings. To Moses, however, God spoke clearly and distinctly, mouth to mouth, as a man speaks to his friend (Num. 12:1-8). A distinction in the method or manner of revelation thus appears with respect to Moses and the prophets. Moses was the leading figure of the Old Testament economy, and the prophets served under him. The revelations made to them were sometimes obscure and ambiguous, in that they were given in dreams and visions. It would follow therefore, that when the prophets spoke, they spoke in terms and forms of thought which were current in and which characterized the OT dispensation.

The entire Mosaic economy must be understood as a witness of the later-to-be-revealed NT economy. Moses and the prophets therefore were types of Christ and of His blessings. They witnessed, not to themselves, but to the "things to be spoken of" (Heb. 3:1-6). In speaking of the future salvation under Christ the prophets spoke sometimes in language that was not free from ambiguity, and the interpretation of their prophecies must depend upon a further revelation and in particular upon the NT.

It is sometimes said that the prophets were forthtellers and not foretellers. Such a disjunction, however, is not warranted. It is true that the prophets were forthtellers, speaking forth the message of the Lord. That message, however, sometimes had to do with past occurrences, as when the prophets often reminded the nation of how God had brought it out of the land of Egypt and given it Canaan for a possession. They also spoke of contemporary events, as witness the words of Isaiah with respect to the situation that confronted Ahaz (Isa. 7). At the same time, it must not be forgotten that the prophets also spoke of the future. They predicted future calamity to come upon the nation because of its refusal to repent for its sins, and they spoke also in language beautiful and mysterious of the coming of One who would save His people from their sins. The prophets truly were forthtellers, but they were foretellers as well, and the predictive element is extremely important for a proper understanding of the true nature of the prophets.

Classification of the Prophets. In the arrangement of the books in the Hebrew Old Testament there are three parts, the Law, the Prophets and the Writings. The division known as the Prophets is further subdivided into the former and the latter prophets. Under the first heading are included Joshua, Judges, I-II Samuel and I-II Kings. These books are anonymous, and their authors are not known. The authors, however, as the designation "former prophets" indicates, were men who held the prophetic office in ancient Israel. They wrote an interpretative history of the background of the period in which the great writing prophets lived and worked. Without this interpretative history it would be impossible to understand the work of the great prophets. The former prophets cover the period from Israel's entrance into the land of promise until the destruction of the theocracy under Nebuchadnezzar. It is with just this period that the writing prophets deal.

The latter prophets are also called writing prophets. They are the prophets who exercised so great a ministry in Israel — Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the Twelve. The designation "latter" does not necessarily have reference to historical chronology, but is simply a designation of those prophetical books which follow the "former" prophets in the Hebrew arrangement of the Old Testament.

The "latter" or "writing" prophets were not anonymous. The reason for this is that they were entrusted by God with the task and responsibility of addressing prophetical messages not only to the men of their own day but also to posterity. They must be accredited to their audience as genuine prophets, and for that reason their name is known to us. There were some prophets whose names we do not know, as, for example, the man who approached Eli and announced to him the downfall of his house. To us it is not necessary that the name of this man be known; it is enough that it was known to Eli. Those who received the messages of the prophets had sufficient evidence of their accreditation. To those first recipients of the messages the names were known; to us it is not necessary to possess similar information. The writing prophets, however, have uttered messages which are more relevant to us; they have spoken, for example, of the coming of the Messiah, and it is essential that we be assured that those who uttered such messages were truly accredited spokesmen of the Lord.

It must be noted, however, that the former and the latter prophets complemented one another. The "former" prophets set forth the history of a particular period in Israel's life; the "latter" or "writing" prophets interpret particular phases of that history. The one is necessary for the proper understanding of the other.

The Scripture does not say much as to the method in which the great "writing" prophets prepared their messages. The theory has been advanced by Herman Gunkel that the prophets were first of all oral preachers, and that they did not write their messages. The written books which we now possess, Gunkel argued, were the work of disciples of the prophets. From the example of Jeremiah, however, it would appear that the prophets did write down their messages. What the precise relationship between their spoken word and their written messages is it may be impossible for us fully to know. It could very well be that the prophets often spoke far more than they have written down. It could be that in many instances they enlarged upon their messages when they were delivering them orally, and that they made digests of these messages for writing.

With respect to the last 27 chapters of the book of Isaiah, for example, it may well be that these messages were never delivered orally. It is quite likely that the prophet, after retirement from active preaching and prophesying, went into solitude during the latter days of Hezekiah and wrote down the wondrous messages which concern the future destinies of the people of God and their deliverance from sin by the Servant of the Lord. It is quite possible also that some of the prophecies of Jeremiah are the results of intense polishing and reworking. These written messages need not in every instance have been identical with what had been delivered orally. What we have in the Scriptures is what the Spirit of God intended us to have.

Schools of the Prophets. After the people had entered the Promised Land there came a time when "every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judg. 21:25). It was evident that the nation must have a king, but the first requests for a king were made in a spirit and for a purpose that conflicted with what God intended the theocracy to be. The first king was not a man after God's own heart, but one who was sufficient unto himself. This was a time when there was danger not only from the idolatry of Canaan but also from the incursions of the Philistines. At this time, for the encouragement and spiritual welfare of the nation, there were raised up bands (hevel) of the prophets.

It is difficult to say what is intended by the word "band." Whether the groups of prophets so designated had a formal organization or not, one cannot tell. It may be that such groups were more or less loosely knit together, and that they served under Samuel. For that matter it cannot be positively asserted that Samuel was the founder of such groups, although such a supposition would seem to have much in its favor.

Following Samuel's death these prophetical bodies seem to have disappeared from the scene, and we hear no more of them until the times of Elijah and Elisha. During the days of these men groups of prophets again appear, although most likely they are not to be thought of as hereditary descendants of the bodies that existed under Samuel. The reason for this is that in Elijah's day they appear only in the northern kingdom. The theocracy had become divided, due to the schism introduced by Jeroboam the son of Nebat. There was now need for support against the worship of the Tyrian Baal as well as the calf worship of Dan and Bethel. Both Elijah and Elisha exercised a vigorous ministry in the N, but the government was opposed to them. They needed particular assistance, and this was found in the companies which now bear the designation "sons of the prophets." The phrase reveals the close and intimate association in which these men stood to the great prophets, Elijah and Elisha. After this period, however, they seem to die out, and we hear no more of them.

The Prophets and the Temple. The regular worship of ancient Israel after the establishment of the monarchy was conducted in the temple located in Jerusalem. This worship was in the hands of priests, men who represented the nation before God. What was the relation in which the prophets stood to the temple worship? It used to be held, particularly by the school of Wellhausen, that the prophets and the priests were working in opposition one to another, that the priests represented a sacrificial type of worship, whereas the prophets were more concerned about ethics and behavior. It was even held that the prophets denied that God had ever required sacrifices, and this supposition was used to support the position of Wellhausen that the books of the Pentateuch in which sacrifices were enjoined were not composed until late in Israel's history, when the priestly religion had triumphed over the prophetical.

This reconstruction of Israel's history, once so dominant, is more and more losing ground. It is now being recognized, even by those who are very sympathetic to Wellhausen, that there was not, after all, such an antagonism between prophet and priest. In fact, some of the prophets, such as Jeremiah and Ezekiel, were themselves priests. Indeed, what the prophets were condemning, as a more careful and sober exegesis has shown, was not the sacrifices themselves, but the manner in which the sacrifices were offered (cf. Isa. 1:9-15). The sacrifices were truly an approach to God, but the worshiper must come with clean hands and a pure heart. Else the sacrifices in themselves, divorced from a proper attitude of humility and repentance upon the part of the worshiper, were nothing but vain oblations, and were not acceptable to the Lord.

If, then, the prophets were not condemning sacrifice in itself, what was the relation in which they actually stood to the worship of the temple? In recent years the opinion has become more and more widespread that the prophets were servants of the temple, and that they may even have received a salary and been in the employ of the temple. It is perhaps safest to say that this question cannot be answered positively one way or another. The prophets at times may have been officially connected with the temple; at times they may have been more or less on their own. It is difficult to say how they did earn their livelihood. The servant of Saul had suggested the giving of a small gift to Samuel in return for information as to the whereabouts of the lost asses of Saul's father (I Sam. 9:8). Possibly the prophets at times were dependent upon such small gifts and upon donations which they had obtained for services rendered. That they were actually officials in the employ of the temple is a matter upon which it is wisest not to speak dogmatically.

True and False Prophets. True religion has always been plagued by imitators. Alongside the faithful and true prophets of the Lord there were others, men who had not received a revelation from God. Jeremiah refused to have anything to do with these men. They were not true prophets, but men who deceived. There were those who claimed to have received messages from God, who as a matter of fact did not receive such messages.

Some of these false prophets may themselves have been sincere men who were deceived, but many of them doubtless were wicked men. Isaiah condemns them as drunken (28:7), and from the representations given in the Bible, it would seem that they were simply deluders, blind leaders of the blind. It was possible, however, for the devout Israelites to distinguish between messages uttered by true prophets and those spoken by the false. True prophets were accredited in that their prophecies were fulfilled (Deut. 18:20ff). When they spoke concerning the far distant future, their messages could be believed, inasmuch as their messages which concerned the present or immediate future would be fulfilled. Furthermore, they always spoke in the name of the Lord. False prophets, on the other hand, would find that their prophecies were not accredited or fulfilled. Hananiah, for example, predicted that the Exile would be of only two years' duration (Jer. 28:1ff). His prophecy would be shown to be false in that, when the two years had expired, the Exile would not be over. Thus, he would be generally discredited. Also, there were prophets who uttered prophecies in the name of other gods, and even accompanied their predictions with signs and miracles (Deut. 13:1-5). From such the people were to turn away. Also, it must be remembered that the true prophets actually did speak the Word of God, and God's people would recognize that Word. False prophecy is best conceived as a degeneration of the true.

Messianic Prophecy. Any proper estimation of the prophetic movement must take into account the following three factors. Prophecy was a continuous movement, extending over several centuries in Israel's history. There was nothing essentially similar to it anywhere in the ancient world. The prophets, during so many centuries, all claimed to be recipients of messages from Yahweh, the God of Israel, and to speak the messages which He had given to them. Lastly, in all these messages there runs a teleological element; the prophets spoke of a future deliverance to be wrought by the Messiah. It is this element of prophecy which we call "Messianic Prophecy."

The word "Messiah" is itself not of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament. It means "one who is anointed," and this anointing possesses an abiding character. The Messiah is a human individual who is to come to earth to perform a work of deliverance for God. He is also Himself a divine person, as appears from passages such as Isaiah 9:5,6. His coming to earth reveals the coming of the Lord. His coming is in connection with the supernatural, in that God is truly with Him. Furthermore, His coming represents the end of the age. It is to be in the "last days," and hence is eschatological. He is to come as a king, a descendant of David and is to reign on David's throne. Lastly, the purpose of His coming is to save His people from their sins. He is a Saviour, and is to bear the sins of His own that they may stand in right relation with God.

Messianic prophecy must be understood against the dark background of human sin. Man's disobedience in the garden of Eden had involved man in corruption of the heart and also in guilt before God. Man could not of his own efforts make himself right with God and hence it was necessary that God take the initiative. This God did in announcing that He would place enmity between the woman Eve and the serpent. God also announced the outcome of that enmity, in that the Seed of the woman would bruise the serpent's head (Gen. 3:15). This was the first definite announcement that the Messiah would come and that His work would be victorious.

All subsequent Messianic prophecy is based upon this mother promise. To Noah it was announced that the blessing of God would be with Shem, and hence among the descendants of Shem one must look for the Messiah. The promise is then narrowed down to Abraham and after him to Isaac. For a time it seemed that Abraham would have no son, and then Ishmael was born to Abraham's concubine. Yet the promise was not to be fulfilled through Ishmael, but through Isaac. After Isaac had been born, however, Abraham is commanded to slay him. Finally, when Abraham's faith is sufficiently tested, it is made clear that Isaac is after all the one through whom the Messiah is to come.

Of Isaac's two sons, Jacob is chosen and Esau rejected. Finally, Jacob calls his 12 sons about him and announces to them what will take place in the "latter days" (Gen. 49:1). In his prophecy he clearly points to the fact that Shiloh will come in Judah. Later, Balaam, a heathen soothsayer, also prophesies of the coming of a "Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall arise out of Israel" (Num. 24:17a). In Deuteronomy, in the passage in which the divine origin of the prophetic movement is revealed, we learn also of the Prophet to come, who was to be like Moses. Whereas in a certain sense, the entire prophetic body was like Moses, there was really only One who followed Moses, and that One was the Messiah.

In the books of Samuel (II Sam. 7) it is revealed that the throne of David is to be established permanently, and that a ruler on that throne will rule over an eternal kingdom. Upon the basis of this prophecy we are to understand many of the Psalms which speak of a King (e.g., Pss. 2, 45, 72, 110) and also many of the prophecies. The Messiah is to be the King of a kingdom that will never perish. This is taught by Isaiah, for example, who announces the supernatural birth of the Messiah and the government over which He is to rule. He is to be born of a virgin, and His supernatural birth is to be a sign to the people that God is truly with them. They need not fear before the growing power of Assyria. The Assyrian king will not destroy them nor render void the promises of God. They are to look to the King whom God will present to them. This king is the Messiah. His kingdom is to be eternal; it is to be built up in righteousness and justice, and it is to be the hope of the people.

Daniel also speaks of this kingdom as eternal. He contrasts it with the kingdoms of this world which are both temporal and local. These kingdoms, great and powerful as they are, will nevertheless pass away, and there will be erected a kingdom that will belong to a heavenly Figure, the One like a Son of Man. His kingdom alone will be universal and eternal, for He is the true Messiah. Stressing, as they do, the kingly work of the Messiah, many of these prophecies do not lay their emphasis upon the actual saving work which the Messiah was to perform.

There was a danger that the eyes of the people would be so attracted to the Messiah as a king that they might tend to think of Him only as a political figure. This danger became very real, and the Jews did more and more conceive of Him as merely One who was political, who would deliver them from the yoke of foreign oppressors.

To offset this danger it was necessary that the people know full well that the Messiah's work was truly to be spiritual in nature. Hence, in the latter portion of his book, Isaiah with remarkable lucidity speaks of what the Messiah will do to save His people. It is in these great "Servant" passages that we learn that the Messiah is to be a Saviour. He is set forth as one laden with griefs and sorrows, but they are not His own. They belong to His people, and He bears them in order that men may be free and may have the peace of God. The Messiah suffers and dies vicariously; that is the nature of His saving work, and that it is which Isaiah presents with such great vividness.

All the prophets were under Moses, and just as Moses was a type of Christ, so it may be said that the prophetical body as such, being under Moses, was also typical of the great Prophet to come. Although they did not understand the full depth of their messages, yet they were speaking of the coming salvation and so of Jesus Christ. Through them God spoke in "divers manners" and in "divers parts" unto the fathers. What is so remarkable is that, when their messages are taken as a whole and in their entirety, they form such a unified picture of the work of the Messiah.

We must guard against the view that there is merely a correspondence between what the prophets say and what occurred in the life of Jesus Christ. There was of course a correspondence, but to say no more than this is not to do justice to the situation. Jesus Christ did not merely find a correspondence between the utterances of the prophets and the events of His own life. Rather, the events of His life constituted the fulfillment of what the prophets had declared. It is this point upon which we must insist if we are to understand them properly. As was said of Isaiah, so we may say of the entire prophetic body, They saw Christ's day and spoke of Him. E.J.Y.

PROPHETESS (Heb. nevî'âh, Gr. prophétes), a woman who exercised the prophetic gift in ancient Israel or in the early Christian church. In general, she would possess the charismatic gifts and powers characterizing the prophets themselves. There are at least four women bearing this designation in the OT: (1) Miriam, sister of Moses (Exod. 15:20); (2) Deborah (Judg. 4:4); (3) Huldah, (II Kings 22:14); (4) the unnamed wife of Isaiah, who bore him children with prophetic names (Isa. 8:3). In the NT, Philip the evangelist is said have had "four unmarried daughters who prophesied" (Acts 21:8, 9). After Pentecost, the differentiation between the sexes with regards to prophetic gifts was removed (Acts 2:19; cf. Joel 2:28). See PROPHECY, PROPHET, etc.

PROPITIATION (prō-pĭsh'ĭ-ā'shŭn). This is one of the semi-technical Biblical words which designate the Atonement, q.v. The English word "propitiation" is of Latin derivation, and signifies an objective "provision" for "pity," or mercy. This accurately translates the Greek word hilastérion (Rom. 3:25; Heb. 9:5. In Luke 18:13 and Heb. 2:17 a similar verb is used, and in I John 2:2; 4:10 a similar noun). Hilastérion in turn translates the Hebrew kippōreth, mercy seat, or the objective place of mercy, often referred to in the Pentateuch.

The NT committee of translators substituted "expiation" for "propitiation" in Romans 3:25 in the RSV, specifically because they would not admit an objective element in the atonement. (See the testimony of Rev. Joseph Bayly in S. S. Times for June 4, 1946, p. 194.) Although few English readers recognize the difference, "expiation" is more suggestive of a mere votive offering to gain favor, and substituting it for "propitiation" in Romans 3:25 opens the way to interpret that passage as though the atonement were a persuasive inducement offered to man, and not to God. In this translation both the lexicography of the word and the hermeneutics of the passage are violated. (See the significance of the noun ending "-terion" in A. T. Robertson's large Grammar, pp. 154, 157, 157n; and in Goodwin and Gulick Greek Grammar, p. 829.)

That the meaning of hilastérion (propitiation) in Romans 3:25 is "an objective provision for mercy," is borne out by the context. In vs. 24 we are said to be "justified by the apolýtrosis ('liberation procured by the payment of a ransom' [Thayer]) which is in Christ Jesus." This can only mean that our account, as sinners, before a holy God, is objectively settled. In vs. 26, this "propitiation . . . by His [Christ's] blood," this "vindication of His [God's] righteousness," is said to be directed to the purpose "that He might be just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." In other words, the propitiation by the blood of Christ vindicates God's holy character as He justifies the sinner.

Without the propitiation, God would be saying, "Sin may be ignored." With the propitiation in the blood of Christ, God is saying "This is what your sin cost me, and I bore it in my Son, as I justified you."

In the OT ritual the climax of all is the sprinkling of blood on the "mercy seat" in the holy of holies on the day of atonement. How eminently appropriate that the LXX translators should use for this word "provision for (or place of) mercy," hilastérion, with which Paul later set forth the objective significance of the atonement of Christ! J.O.B.

PROSELYTE (prŏs'ĕ-līt). The Greek word prosélytos (from the verb prosérchomai which means to "come unto") is the common LXX translation of the Hebrew word gēr which means a foreign resident. It is the word often rendered "stranger," as in the phrase "thy stranger that is within thy gates" (Exod. 20:10; Deut. 5:14). Before NT times the word had come to apply to a more limited group religiously and a more extended group geographically. In the NT and in the writings of Philo and Josephus the word designates a person of Gentile origin who had accepted the Jewish religion, whether living in Palestine or elsewhere.

The word occurs only four times in the NT:

1. In Jesus' denunciatory discourse, Matthew 23:1-39, one of His serious charges against the "scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!" is, "ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of Gehenna than yourselves" (vs. 15). Rabbi Emil G. Hirsch, Ph.D. of the U. of Chicago, in the article on "Proselyte" in the Jewish Encyclopedia (Vol. X p. 221) mentions (but does not accept) the opinion that Matthew 23:15 "refers to an actual incident, the voyage of R. Gamaliel, R. Eliezer, G. Azariah, R. Joshua, and R. Akiba to Rome, where they converted Flavius Clemens, a nephew of Emperor Domitian." This is an anachronism, for this Flavius Clemens suffered martyrdom in A.D. 92 and his conversion to Christianity (not Judasim) must have been long after the words of Matthew 23:15 were uttered, and after the time of Rabbi Gamaliel. But the story, unreliable as it is, may illustrate the kind of evil political zeal which Jesus denounces.

At any rate, the words of Jesus do not condemn proselytes as such, nor call in question the sincerity of the majority of proselytes. It is hypocritical Pharisaism which is condemned here, and that alone.

The other three NT occurrences of the word "proselyte" are all in the book of Acts.

2. In the long list of places and peoples represented in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost "Jews and proselytes", (Acts 2:10) are mentioned. There is, however, nothing whatever in the record to indicate any special attitude on the part of the proselytes in any way different from the rest of this Jewish crowd. That proselytes are mentioned in the manner they are, would indicate that they constituted a noticeable proportion of the multitude. There were thousands of pilgrims; there must have been hundreds of them who were proselytes. Of the 3,000 who were swept into the Christian movement that day, and the hundreds more who soon joined them, the probability is that there were many hundreds of proselytes.

3. When it came to the selection of the first diaconate (Acts 6:1-6) one of the seven was "Nicolas, a proselyte from Antioch" (vs. 5). Some think, from the names of the other six, that three of them were Greek-speaking Jews, to represent the Hellenists who had complained (vs. 1). Of this there is no certainty; but since one of the seven deacons was a proselyte, we may have some rough indication of the proportion of the proselytes in the early Jerusalem church.

4. After Paul's great sermon in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:14-41), we read that "many of the Jews and devout proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas, who, speaking to them, urged them to come and abide (prosménein) in the grace of God" (vs. 43). From this point on in the record we cannot distinguish the proselytes. "The Gentiles" came in great crowds, and "the Jews" became jealous and hostile (vss. 44-52).

Were all proselytes fully initiated Jews? Or did the term also include Gentile believers in God who had not accepted the initiatory rites, but who were associated with synagogue worship in varying degrees of fellowship? The opinion is prevalent, and is supported by Rabbi Hirsch (op. cit. 1903) that the phrase "proselyte of the gate," based upon such expressions as "thy stranger that is within thy gate" (Exod. 20:10; Deut. 5:14; 14:21) distinguished uncircumcised proselytes, i.e., those who had not fully identified themselves with the Jewish nation and religion.

On the other hand, Prof. F. C. Porter, Ph.D. of Yale, in the article on "Proselyte" in Hastings Dictionary of the Bible, 1902, (Vol. IV p. 135) says, "The phrase 'proselyte of the gate' has nothing to do with the seboumenoi tou Theou [worshipers of God]. It is simply a late rabbinical title (after (Exod. 20:10; Deut. 5:14, etc.) for sojourners in Israel's land. . . . In distinction from these, the proselyte was called by the late Rabbis the 'Proselyte of righteousness' while in the Mishna he is simply the 'gēr'." Porter thinks that in the time of the NT, Philo, and Josephus, there was only one class of proselytes, those who had gone all the way with the three initiatory steps, (1) circumcision of all the males of the family, (2) ceremonial washing or baptism for the women as well as the men, and, as long as the temple stood, (3) an offering. Others, he thinks, no matter how devout, were not called proselytes.

Much has been written on the details and technicalities of this question. The probability is that the first century Jews had no very fixed or rigid use of the term, and they differed among themselves.

The LXX version of Exodus 12:48 reads, "If any proselyte come to you to keep the passover, thou shalt circumcise all his males, and then he shall come to keep it, and he shall be as a native of the land. No uncircumcised [man] shall eat of it." In this instance, the proselyte as such is called a proselyte when he had not as yet accepted circumcision. Since the LXX was the Bible of the first century Jews outside of Palestine, it is hard to believe that the word proselyte for them referred exclusively to the fully initiated. The term must have included a multitude of non-initiated believers and inquirers as well as the fully initiated.

The fact is that Judaism up to the time of Christ was not the narrow racial national religion it is sometimes made out to be. There were evidently many Gentiles in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch. Note, "Men of Israel and ye that fear God" (Acts 13:16); ". . . of the stock of Abraham and whosoever among you feareth God" (vs. 26); "Jews and devout proselytes" (vs. 43); "the gentiles . . . were glad" (vss. 47,48); ". . . Jews stirred up the devout and honorable women" (vs. 50). See also the references to those who worshiped, or feared God (Acts 10:2,7,22,35; 16:14; 17:4,17; 18:7); and study the instance of Cornelius (Acts 10:1-11:18) and Jesus' relations with the Roman centurion (Matt. 8:5-13; Luke 7:1-10).

Among the non-Israelitish recognized worshipers of the true God in the OT are Melchizedek, Job (the entire book is Gentile), Ruth, Rahab, Naaman, Uriah the Hittite, the Ninevites at the time of Jonah's preaching; the converts at the time of Esther (8:17). The "wise men from the East" are in the same category. The exclusivism of Ezra and Nehemiah was not to the contrary; it was the exclusion of idolatrous unbelief.

The subject of Israel's ancient mission among the Gentiles would require a far more extended study than is possible here. But, for example, Psalm 15; Isaiah 2:2-4; 44:5; Jeremiah 3:17; 4:2; 12:16; Zephaniah 3:9,10; Zechariah 8:20-23 are only a few of the OT passages indicating an evangelistic attitude toward the Gentiles. J.O.B.

PROSTITUTE (prŏs'tĭ-tūt). The word occurs once in KJV (Lev. 19:29 ASV, RSV harlot), but also in ASV, RSV (Deut. 23:17, KJV whore). The idea is usually conveyed by "harlot" (Gen. 34:31; Matt. 21:31,32; Luke 15:30) or in KJV "whore" (Lev. 21:7). A famous example is Rahab (Josh. 2:1; Heb. 11:31; James 2:25). Israel, unfaithful to God, is called a harlot by the prophets (Isa. 1:21; Jer. 2:20; 3:1; Ezek. 16:15,16; Hos. 4:15). A special class of prostitutes performed sex acts in heathen worship; Heb. kedēshâh, a separated or "holy" woman (Deut. 23:17; Hos. 4:14). Tamar dressed herself like one of these (Gen. 38:15-24). The world-ruling city of Revelation 17 is called a whore (KJV) or harlot (ASV, RSV). Male prostitutes, KJV whoremongers, ASV fornicators, RSV immoral, are named (Eph. 5:5).

PROVENDER (prŏv'ĕn-dêr, Heb. mispô'), a term of rather wide meaning or usage, signifying feed, as grain or hay fed to cattle, horses and the like (Gen. 24:25,26; 42:27; Judg. 19:19,21). Sometimes, the feed was mixed with salt and fed to the younger animals (Isa. 30:24). The Bedouins of the deserts were especially anxious to provide rich pasture-land, not only for its immediate use, but also for its future utilization for dried grain. Several other Hebrew words are employed, but they imply essentially the same thing.

PROVERB (prŏv'ûrb), a pithy saying, comparison or question; in OT usually Heb. māshāl, from a root meaning "represent, be like"; notably of Solomon's proverbs (I Kings 4:32; Prov. 1:1,6; 10:1; 25:1; Eccl. 12:9); others (I Sam. 10:12; 24:13; Ezek. 12:22,23; 16:44; 18:2,3). A man may become a proverb (Deut. 28:37); or Israel (I Kings 9:7; II Chron. 7:20); ASV, RSV have "byword" in Psalm 69:11; RSV in Jeremiah 24:9; ASV parable, RSV taunt in Isaiah 14:4. Numbers 21:27, a short poem (quoted in Jer. 48:45,46), RSV ascribes to "ballad singers." Māshāl is also translated parable; a few times utter, speak, be like, compare. Heb. hîdhâh, riddle, perplexing saying or question, is translated proverb once in KJV (Hab. 2:6, ASV margin, riddle, RSV taunt). It is also translated riddle, dark saying, sentence, speech, hard saying. In the NT, Greek parabolé, whose basic meaning is "comparison, placing side by side," is once translated proverb (Luke 4:23 KJV, RSV; parable in ASV). Usually it is translated parable; a few times comparison, or figure. Greek paroimía, also equivalent to Heb. māshāl, and to mîdhâh, means a saying of popular origin, ancient and widely known, accepted as obviously true (II Pet. 2:22). In John 16:25,29 ASV has dark sayings, margin, parables; RSV figures. A proverb is thought of as a short saying, a parable one somewhat longer, but the distinction is relative, and is not always observed by Bible writers. Comparison, using the concrete facts of life to represent its abstract principles, is the essential characteristic of both. A proverb may be a snatch of poetry, showing parallelism of structure; a sharp question; a pregnant sentence; a very brief story. Felicity of expression insures its long preservation and wide currency through oral transmission, even after it is fixed in literary, written form. E.R.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF. The best representative of the so-called Wisdom literature of ancient Israel, the Book of Proverbs comprises 31 chapters of pithy statements on moral matters. Its text is "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Prov. 1:7).

The headings in 1:1 and 10:1 claim a Solomonic authorship for the bulk of the book, and this claim, though often denied in recent days, has no objective evidence against it. Chapters 25-29 are said to be by Solomon, "copied out" by the men of Hezekiah. This obscure reference may refer to later collecting or editing of other Solomonic material. Of the authors Agur (chap. 30) and King Lemuel (chap. 31) we know nothing. They may even be poetic references to Solomon himself. Proverbs is mentioned in the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus (47:17), written about 180 B.C. Although the canonicity of Proverbs, Ezekiel, and a few other books was questioned by individual rabbis as late as in the council of Jamnia, A.D. 90, still it had long been accepted as authoritative Scripture, as the quotation in the Zadokite Document shows (col. 11, 1.19ff). It is quoted and alluded to several times in the NT.

An outline of the book should recognize the material and style of the composition. Damage has been done by some who find in the book merely a collection of ancient maxims for success — a kind of Poor Richard's Almanac. Actually the book is a compendium of moral instruction. It deals with sin and holiness. And the vehicle of instruction is a favorite Semitic device — teaching by contrast. The style of Proverbs with its pithy contrasts or more extended climactic poems can be paralleled in ancient literature in Egypt and Mesopotamia. The Hebrew author, however, has given instruction on life and holiness in the proverbial form. The case is similar in our Christian hymnody. We have abundant examples of secular poetry and melody combined in ordinary song. But Christian hymns use the vehicles of poetry and song to express distinctively Christian thought and experience.

Outline:

I. Introduction, 1:1-1:9.
II. Sin and righteousness personified and contrasted, 1:10-9:18.
III. Single-verse contrasts of sin and righteousness, 10:1-22:16.
IV. Miscellaneous and longer contrasts, 22:17-29:27.
V. Righteousness in poems of climax, 30:1-31:31.

The first section of the book begins (1:7) and ends (9:10) with the statement that the "fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." It is obvious therefore that the wisdom extolled in Proverbs is not just a high degree of intelligence but a moral virtue. This is made plain in the first section by the contrasts involved. Wisdom is personified as a righteous woman, (8:1). This is natural because wisdom in Hebrew is a feminine noun. The foolish woman is presented as inviting men with identical words (9:4 and 16), but she invites them to sin. The harlot, who is given large place in this section, is typical of all sin. Murder and theft are the opposite of wisdom in chapter 1, but usually and forcefully the strange woman, the simple woman, the foolish woman — the harlot — is held up as the opposite of personified righteousness. Some find in wisdom, 8:22 a foreshadowing of Christ, but this is not sure. It is not so used in the NT.

In the major section, 10:1-22:16, the same contrast appears in single-verse aphorisms. Here the personification of sin and righteousness does not appear, but the same synonyms for virtue and vice are repeatedly used and should be understood as such. Perhaps the greatest error in interpreting the book comes from the tendency to quote these Proverbs as mere secular maxims instead of godly instruction. Folly here does not mean stupidity, just as foolish woman of 9:13 does not refer to an ignoramus. Both terms refer to sin. Through this whole section the terms wisdom, understanding, integrity, knowledge, etc. are synonymous terms referring to holiness. Their opposites, fool, folly, simple, scorner, contentious, vain, etc. refer to wickedness. In short, a foolish son is not a dullard, but a knave. A contentious woman is not merely argumentative, but downright evil. A scorner is not just supercilious, but is a wayward soul. The lack of context sometimes beclouds the interpretation. But occasionally a verse is partially repeated elsewhere where the variant form clarifies the meaning (cf. 27:15 and 21:19).

Section IV, 22:19-29:27, is more general, but uses the same vocabulary of morality. In this part are some special parallels with an Egyptian work entitled The Wisdom of Amen-em-Opet. The correspondences, however, do not invalidate the above claim that the author of Proverbs gives distinctive treatment to his theme.

The last section, 30:1-31:31, includes several climactic proverbs — four — which apparently emphasize the fourth point. Cf. 6:16-19 where among seven things the seventh is the climax. Here also is the famous final poem — an alphabetical poem — extolling the virtuous woman. R.L.H.

PROVIDENCE. The universal providence of God is the basic assumption of all Scripture. As in English, the corresponding Hebrew and Greek words such as rā'âh (Gen. 22:8; I Sam. 16:1) and problépon (Heb. 11:40) in their contexts mean far more than mere foresight or foreknowledge. The meaning is "prearrangement." As used historically the theological term "providence" means nothing short of "the universal sovereign rule of God."

The definition in Q. 11 of the Westminster Shorter Catechism expresses the view of all Bible-believing Christians; "God's works of providence are, His most holy, wise, and powerful preserving and governing all His creatures, and all their actions." Divine providence is the out-working of the divine decrees, which are "the purpose of him who worketh all things after the council of his own will" (Eph. 1:11).

The Biblical doctrine of divine providence does not imply a mechanistic or fatalistic view of the processes of the world or of human life. In a more extended treatise on this subject, secondary causes, and the relation between human responsibility and divine sovereignty would have to be canvassed. For the present purposes it must suffice to quote what seem to the writer the best available brief creedal statements on these matters:

"Although, in relation to the foreknowledge, and decree of God, the first cause, all things come to pass immutably and infallibly, yet, by the same providence, He ordereth them to fall out according to the nature of second causes, either necessarily, freely, or contingently.

"[God's providence includes the permission of] all . . . sins of angels and men, and that not a bare permission, but such [permission] as hath joined with it a most wise and powerful bounding, and otherwise ordering and governing of them, in a manifold dispensation, to his holy ends; yet so as the sinfulness thereof proceedeth only from the creature, and not from God; who, being most holy and righteous, neither is nor can be the author or approver of sin" (Westminster Confession, Chap. V Paragraphs II and IV).

"Second causes" are the ordinary forces and events of nature which God usually employs to accomplish His purposes.

That God's providence includes His decree to permit sin should not seem strange or paradoxical. One of the good features of so-called "progressive education" is learning by experience, and this is based on the assumption that what ought not to be is not the same as what ought not to be permitted. One of the clearest Biblical illustrations of this principle is found in Joseph's words to his brethren in Genesis 50:20, "As for you, ye thought evil against me [they had sold him into slavery]; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass as it is this day, to save much people alive."

It is customary to distinguish special providence from general providence. The former term refers to God's particular care over the life and activity of the believer. "We know that, in reference to those who love God, God works all things together for good" (Rom. 8:28 original tr.). "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord" (Ps. 37: 23; see Phil. 1:28). "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things [daily needs] shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6: 23). The entire book of Job is devoted to the temporal sufferings of a godly man under divine providence. Hebrews 11:40 teaches that providence, for men of faith, includes something far better than experiences of this life.

General providence includes the government of the entire universe, but especially of the affairs of men. "Behold the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the Lord's thy God, the earth also with all that therein is" (Deut. 10:14); ". . . the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance; when he separated the sons of Adam he set the bounds of the people . . ." (Deut. 32:8; see also Neh. 9:6; Dan. 4:35).

Divine providence is presented as "upholding all things by his powerful word" (Heb. 1:3); ". . . he maketh his sun to rise upon the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust" (Matt. 5:45, see Ps. 68:9; Rom. 1:20; Acts 14:15-17. See Common Grace.)

Although God's grace is always offered to all men (Acts 10:34,35), yet the main stream of historical revelation and blessing for the world, through the instrumentality of Israel and the Church, is a principal theme of all Scripture (see Rom. 3:1,2; 9:3-6; 11:1; I Tim. 3:15; Acts 7:1-60; 13:16-43). To this end God sometimes moves in unrecognized events and processes (Isa. 40:1-5; 44:28-45:4).

Not only is the general course of nature sustained by God's providence, but the moral order and its logical consequences as well: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. He that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption. He that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting" (Gal. 6:7,8). Divine providence sustaining the moral order is the principal theme of the book of Proverbs.

The distinction between God's immanent or natural action and His transcendent or supernatural action is of supreme importance in the understanding of the doctrine of providence. The reader should consult the article on MIRACLES. The case for Christianity depends entirely upon the miracles of the incarnation and the resurrection of Christ. Nevertheless, as the article on miracles shows, godly faith has always existed in a world in which there are long periods of time, even in Bible history, in which God does not choose to give "signs" or display miracles as evidences. It is imperative that we learn to see the glory of God in the regular works of providence as well as in the miraculous.

Christian men of science sometimes complain that fundamentalists tend to invoke the supernatural whenever there are gaps in scientific knowledge, to the embarrassment of Christians when scientists fill in the gaps with well accredited facts. A mere "God of the Gaps" idea may be as harmful as mechanistic pantheism. The genuinely miraculous in Christianity is not dimmed but rather magnified, by recognition of God's providential faithfulness in the regular processes of nature. J.O.B.

PROVINCIA (prō-vĭn'sĭ-à), a word of doubtful etymology, signifies the sphere of duty of a magistrate. The "roads and forests of Italy" for example, were a province, supervised by the appropriate commissioner. With the gradual acquisition of the empire, spheres of magisterial duty signified increasingly the defense, organization, and government of overseas territories, and the word province acquired that geographical significance which became its prime Latin meaning, and its exclusive derived meaning. The provinces of Rome in this sense of the word were acquired over a period of more than three centuries. The first was Sicily (241 B.C.). The last were Britain, organized by Claudius, and Dacia, acquired by Trajan. Marcus Aurelius made a province out of Mesopotamia. Under the settlement of 27 B.C., all provinces were divided into two categories. First there were the imperial provinces, those which required a frontier army, and which, in consequence, were kept under the control of the emperor, who was commander-in-chief of all armed forces. Secondly there were the senatorial provinces, those which presented no major problems of military occupation or defense, and which were left in the control of the Senate. Imperial provinces were governed by the emperor's legati, or, in the case of smaller units like Judaea or Thrace, by procurators. The senatorial provinces were under proconsuls (e.g. the "deputy" (KJV) of Acts 13:7. Cyprus became a senatorial province in 22 B.C.). Egypt, a special case, was governed by a prefect. E.M.B.

PROVOCATION (prŏv'ō-kā'shŭn, Heb. ka'as, mārâh; Gr. parazelóo, parorgízo), any cause of God's anger at sin; the deeds of evil kings (I Kings 15:30; 21:22; II Kings 23:26); of Israel (Ezek. 20:28); of mockers (Job 17:2). In the prayer of repentance of the returned exiles (Neh. 9:18,26) the provocation (RSV great blasphemies) consisted in making the molten calf. In Psalm 95:8 ASV, RSV transliterate instead of translating Heb. Meribah, the geographical location named for the provocation when the Israelites demanded water, which Moses brought out of a rock (Exod. 17: 1-7; Num. 20:13,24; 27:14; Deut. 32:51; 33:8; Ps. 81:7), the waters of Meribah. The one NT passage in which (in KJV) provocation occurs (Heb. 3:8,15,16 RSV rebellion) relates to this incident. The verb provoke occasionally has a good sense, to stir up (Heb. 10:24).

PRUNING HOOK (Heb. mazmerôth), an agricultural tool used in the cultivation of the vine, with a sharp knife-like end for pruning (Isa. 2:4; Joel 3:10; Mic. 4:3).

PSALMS, THE BOOK OF, follows "the law" and "the prophets" in Hebrew (Luke 24:44), inaugurating the final division of the OT, called "the writings" (because of their heterogeneous, non-professionally prophetic authorship; see CANON). It is the longest book in the Bible. The majority of its chapters, moreover, are antedated only by Genesis-Ruth. But the basic reason why Psalms is more quoted by the NT and more revered by Christians than any other Old Testament book is found in its inspiring subject matter. Both for public worship — "the hymnbook of Solomon's temple" — and for individual devotional guidance, its 150 poems constitute the height of God-given literature.

I. Name. The Hebrew designation of Psalms is Tehillîm, meaning "praises," a term that reflects much of the book's content (cf. Ps. 145, title). Its name in Latin and English Bibles, however, comes from the Greek, Psalmoí, which means "twangings [of harp strings]," and then, as a result, songs sung to the accompaniment of harps. This latter name originated in the LXX (cf. its NT authentication, Luke 20:42) and reflects the form of the book's poetry. The same is true of its alternate title, Psalterion, meaning "psaltery," and then, a collection of harp songs, from which comes the English term "Psalter."

II. Authorship. The Psalms, naturally enough, make no attempt within their respective poetic framework to elaborate the circumstances of their composition. But, as might indeed be expected, many of them do prefix explanatory titles in prose, indicating their authorship and occasion for writing, as well as poetic-type and musical direction (see below, Sections V and VI). Most commonly appears the phrase, Psalm of Moses (David, etc.). The Hebrew preposition rendered by the word "of" expresses authorship (cf. Hab. 3:1, "of Habakkuk the prophet") but also possession (Ps. 24:1a, "the Lord's") or dedication (Ps. 4, etc., RSV, "to the choirmaster"). But while "Psalm of David" has sometimes been interpreted to mean merely "of Davidic character," or, "belonging to a collection entitled, David," its actual usage in Scripture clearly indicates Davidic authorship (cf. Pss 7, 18). The book of Psalms thus assigns 73 of its chapters to David, two to Solomon (Pss. 72, 127), one each to the wise men Heman and Ethan (Pss. 88-89, cf. I Kings 4:31), one to Moses (Ps. 90), and 23 to the Levitical singing-clans of Asaph (Pss. 50, 73-83) and Korah (Pss. 42 (including 43), 44-49, 84-85, 87 — 88 concerns compilation; see below, Section IV. 49 remain anonymous.

Modern Biblical criticism consistently rejects the psalm titles as of little value (IB, IV, 8). One suspects, however, that such denials spring from an evolutionary bias, which refuses to admit as genuinely Davidic the advanced spiritual conceptions that Scripture thus assigns to an era 1000 years B.C. From the viewpoint of lower criticism, no reason exists for denying their authenticity within the text of the OT: All Hebrew MSS contain these titles; the earliest versions (such as the LXX) not only exhibit their translation but even misrepresent certain of their meanings, which had been lost in antiquity; and Hebrew Bibles regularly include them in the numbered verses of the inspired text (thus raising the verse numbers of many of the psalms by one or two digits). From the viewpoint of higher criticism, the exhaustive analysis of Robert Dick Wilson (PTR 24 (1926), 353-395) has demonstrated the compatibility of David's authorship with the content of each psalm attributed to him (cf. Ps. 44, once considered to be Maccabean, but equally comprehensible as from David's era, under military duress (H. C. Leupold, Exposition of the Psalms, Columbus, Ohio: Wartburg Press, 1959, pp. 344-345). Archeological research in Babylonia and Egypt has brought to light advanced hymnody centuries before Abraham; and the recovery of Canaanitish literature at Ugarit has furnished significant parallels to the Psalms, from the time of Moses. (cf. J. Patton, Canaanite Parallels in the Book of Psalms, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1944, and the hesitancy of modern scholars to assign to later periods certain presumed Aramaisms in language, IB, IV,11). David himself is known to have enjoyed musical and literary endowments (I Sam. 16:16-18, Amos 6:5; cf. his acknowledged composition of II Sam. 1:19-27, etc.), to have exercised leadership in the development of Israel's liturgy (II Sam. 6:5,13; I Chron. 15-16,25; II Chron. 7:6, 29:30), and to have realized Spirit-born empowerment as "the sweet psalmist of Israel" (II Sam. 23:1-2; Mark 12:36; Acts 1:16, 2:30-31, 4:25; see DAVID). The NT repeatedly authenticates ascriptions to David: Pss. 16 (Acts 2:25), 32 (Rom. 4:6), 69 (Acts 1:16, Rom. 11:9), 110 (Luke 20:42, Acts 2:34). Certain of the anonymously-titled psalms are also recognized as of Davidic composition: Pss. 2 (Acts 4:25), 95 (Heb. 4:7, where "in David" = his person, not his book, as if Psalms were entirely his), 96, 105, and 106 (underlying David's words in I Chron. 16:8-36, though cf. HDB, IV,148). But it is significant that no psalm which claims other authorship, or contains later historical allusions (as Ps. 137, exilic) is ever attributed in Scripture to him.

III. Occasions. The titles of 14 of the Davidic psalms designate specific occasions of composition and contribute to a historical understanding of Scripture as follows (chronologically):

Ps. 59 (= I Sam. 19:11) sheds light on David's jealous associates (vs. 12)
56 (I Sam. 21:11) shows how David's fear at Gath led to faith (vs. 3)
34 (21:13) illuminates God's subsequent goodness (vss. 6-8)
142 (22:1) depicts David at Adullam, persecuted (vs. 6)
52 (22:9) emphasizes Saul's wickedness (vs. 1)
54 (23:19) judges the Ziphites (vs. 3)
57 (24:3) concerns En-gedi, when Saul was caught in his own trap (vs. 6)
7 (24:9) introduces slanderous Cush (vss. 3,8 correspond to I Sam. 24:11-12)
18 (II Sam. 7:1) is repeated in II Samuel 22
60 (8:13-14) illumines the dangerous Edomitic campaign (vs. 10; I Kings 11:15)
51 (12:13-14) elaborates on David's guilt with Bath-sheba
3 (15:16) depicts David's faith vs. Absalom vs. 5)
63 (16:2) illumines the king's eastward flight vs. 11)
30 (II Sam. 24:25, cf. I Chron. 22:1) reviews David's sin prior to his dedication of the temple area (vss. 5-6)

Among the remaining psalms that express authorship, the 23 composed by Israel's singers exhibit widely separated backgrounds, since these Levitical clans continued active into post-Exilic times (Ezra 2:41). Most of them pertain to the Davidic or Solomonic periods. Psalm 83, however, suits the ministry of the Asphite Jahaziel in 852 B.C. (cf. vss. 5-8 with II Chron. 20:1-2,14), while Psalms 74, 79, and the concluding strophe of 88-89 were produced by Asaphites and Korahites who survived the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (74:3,8-9; 79:1; 89:44). A few anonymous psalms stem from the Exile (137), from the return to Judah in 537 B.C. (107:2-3, 126:1), or from Nehemiah's rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls in 444 (147:13). Yet others that depict tragedy could as easily relate to the disorders of Absalom's revolt or to similar Davidic calamities (cf. Pss. 102:13-22, 106:41-47, with the critical caution of R. Laird Harris, in Carl F. H. Henry, ed., The Biblical Expositor, Philadelphia: Holman, 1960, II,49). Liberal scholars once spoke confidently of numerous Maccabean psalms (second century B.C.); but the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, that date from this very period and contain manuscripts of both the canonical psalms and of the Hôdhāyôth (secondary psalmodic compositions), establishes the Persian era as the latest possible point for inspired psalmody (Frank M. Cross, The Ancient Library of Qumran and Modern Biblical Studies, Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1958, p. 122). It reinforces the evangelical hypothesis of Ezra as the writer of I-II Chronicles (the last book in the Hebrew Bible) and as compiler of the entire Jewish canon, shortly after 424 B.C. (Darius II, mentioned in Neh. 12:22).
